XI. Theological Opinions. A discussion of the theological opinions of Eusebius is impossible within the limits of an article like the present. Leaders who desire to see what may be said on either side, are referred to Barrowi (ad ann. 340, c. 38 sq.), Petaurius (Dogm. Theol. de Trin. lib. i. cap. xi sq.), Montfaucon (Praelim. in Comm. ad Psalm. c. vi), and Tillemont (H. E. vii. p. 67 sq.), among those who have assailed, and Bull (Def. Fid. Nic. ii. 8, 20, iii. 9, 3, 11), Cave (Hist. Ed. ii. app. p. 42 sq.), and Lee (Theo- plact. p. 212 sq.), among those who have defended, his opinions, from the orthodox point of view. A convenient summary of the controversy will be found in Stein, p. 117 sq. It is clear from the latter list of names (which might be considerably enlarged) that his orthodoxy cannot be hastily denied. Dr. Newman himself, speaking on this point, says that "in his own writings, numerous as they are, there is very little which fixes on Eusebius any charge, beyond that of attachment to the Platonic philosophy. He has strongly convicted himself with the Arian party, it would have been unjust to have suspected him of herey" (Arians, p. 282). If we except the works written before the Council of Nicaea, in which there is occasionally much looseness of expression, his language is for the most part strictly orthodox, or at least capable of an orthodox exposition. Against the two main theses of Arius, (1) that the Word was a creature (kata given like other creationes, and (2) that there was a time when He was not, Eusebius is explicit on the orthodox side (e.g. c. Marc. i. 4, p. 22, de Eccl. Theol. i. 2, 3, p. 61 sq., x. i. 8, 9, 10, p. 66 sq.). He states in direct language that the Word had no beginning (Theoph. ii. 3, comp. de Laud. Const. 2). If elsewhere he represents the Father as prior to the Son (e.g. Dem. Ev. iv. 3, δ νεκροθαρια του νιου και της γενεσις αυτου προφυλεστηκε, this priority is not necessarily intended to be temporal, and in such a case the meaning of the writer must be interpreted by his language in other passages. Nor again do such expressions as "second existence," "second cause," necessarily bear an Arian sense; for they may be taken to imply that the word in which has ever been recognised by the most thoughtful writers on the orthodox side. But though his language may not be "his act is nothing;" his "act is nothing;" he is his confession. This is the strongest point in the indictment. His alliance with the Arian party is indisputable; but he inference drawn from it may be questioned. His friendship lay much among Arians, and he may have made too many concessions to friendship. His natural temper suggested tolerance, and the cause of the Arians was, or seemed to be, the cause of comprehension. He had a profound and rooted aversion to the Subilliamism of Marcellus and others, who were acting with Athanasines; and as it was necessary to take one side or the other, he may have ranged himself with Eusebius of Nicomedia and his allies. The best means of averting this danger which seemed to threaten the truth. Where we have no certain information as to the motives which guided him in his conduct, it seems only fair to accept his own statements as final with respect to his opinions.*

* "The remark has been made," writes Dr. Newman (Arians, p. 263), "that throughout his Ecclesiastical History, no instance occurs of his expressing abhorrence of the superstitions of Paganism," and that his custom is either to praise, or not to blame, such heretical writers as fall under his notice; and in his note he refers to Kestner, de Eccl. Auctoritat. p. 17.

If the reader will refer to Kestner, he will find that the passage assumes a different complexion when read in its own context; but this by the way. Nothing could be more erroneous as a statement of facts, than Dr. Newman's language here. Even if it had been true, that there is no abhorrence of paganism expressed in the History, great parts of the Propreratio and Theophania, not to mention the Triennial Oration and the Life of Constantine, are one beside another, abhorrent, and eternally abhorrent, of the superstitions and horrors of heathendom; so that the comparative silence in the History must be explained by the fact that the mention was not suggested, except incidentally, by his theme. On the other points—the attitude
XII. Posthumous Fame. While the Arian controversy was still fresh, the part taken by Eusebius was remembered against him in the Greek Church, and the mention of him in orthodox fathers is generally depreciatory. But as the direct interest of the dispute wore out, the tide turned and set in his favour. Hence in the fifth century we find a disposition to clear him of any complicity in Arian doctrine. Thus Socrates (H. E. ii. 21) is at some pains to prove him orthodox, alleging passages out of his works as evidence of catholicity. So again Gelasius of Cyzicus stoutly defends this "most noble tiler of ecclesiastical husbandry, and lover of truth" (φιλωτηστικά), as he calls him (H. S. N. ii. 1). He assures his readers that if there be any suggestion, however faint, of Arian heresy (μεταφυςεις Αριστοκρατίας), and that Eusebius himself "scorned the Arian panegyric" (τούτον εδοθαν γερά τον αριστοκρατικόν), assures them that he represents him, as we have seen (p. 314), as the leading champion of orthodoxy against Arian opponents. But at a later date the tide turned once again. The turning-point was the Second Council of Nicaea. The occasion was the Iconoclastic controversy. The Iconoclasts deplored his "fondness for his views" (see above, p. 344). The opposite party sought to disparage him. If they could only brand him deeply enough with the mark of heresy, the ground was cut from under their antagonists. The opinions of these later ages respecting Eusebius find expression in Photius. "His own books," says this writer, "can only be understood that he is called an "Arian" (τον Αριστοκρατικόν). In his very repentance," he continues, "he shews himself more plainly to be impenitent." A permanent injury was inflicted on his reputation by dragging him into the Iconoclast disputation. In the Latin Church he fared somewhat better. Jerome indeed did his best to damage his reputation, accusing him of "being a standard-bearer of the Arian faction," "the most flagrant champion of the impiety of Arius"—so he stigmatizes the teacher to whom he was more largely indebted than perhaps to any one else. But, notwithstanding this virulence of language, the eminent services of Eusebius to Christian literature carried the day in the Western Church. Two popes successively threw the shield of their authority over his reputation. Gelasius declined to place his History and Chronicle on the list of proscribed works (Decret. de Libr. Apoc. 4). Pelagius II gives expression to a truly noble sentiment while defending him: "Holy Church," he says, "weigheth the hearts of her faithful ones with kindness rather than their words with rigor" (Ep. 5. 921). It is worthy of notice that neither Gelasius nor Pelagius refers directly to the charge of Arianism. The offence of Eusebius, which seemed to them to require apology, was his defence of the heretic Origen. As an unknown Latin writer of a later age, quoted by Valois, doubtless expressing the feeling of his own time, calls Eusebius "the key of the Scriptures and the guardian of the New Testament." But a more remarkable fact still is the canonization of Eusebius, notwithstanding his real or supposed Arian opinions. In an ancient Syrian Martyrology (quoted above, p. 319 sq.), which is translated from the Greek and which can hardly date more than half a century after his death, May 30 is assigned to "the commemoration of Eusebius, bishop of Palestine," where he takes his rank among the honored martyrs and confessors of the church. Nor was it only in the East that this honour awaited him. In the Martyrologium Hieronymianum we find the entry "In Caesarea Cappadociae depositio sancti Eusebii" (Hieron. Op. ii. 578). The person intended was doubtless Eusebius the predecessor of St. Basil [Eusebius (2)] p. 355 sq.; as the addition "Cappadociae" shews (see Lassner, de Martyrologio Romano, p. 71 sq.; Plat. in the Biblioth. 1876). But the indissoluble fame of the other Eusebius of the other Caesarea eclipsed this comparatively obscure person and finally obliterated his name from the Latin calendars. The word "Cappadociae" altogether disappeared. In Usuard the notice becomes "In Caesarea Palestinae sancti Eusebii historiographi (with an i. t. n. l.) and in the Hieronymian Martyrologies, where he is not distinctly specified, the historian Eusebius is doubtless understood. Accordingly, in several Gallican service-books the historian is commemorated as a saint (see Valois, Testimonia pro Eusebio); and in the Martyrologium Romanum itself he held his place for many centuries. In the revision of this Martyrologium under Gregory XIII his name at length struck out, and Eusebius of Samosata substituted in his place, under the mistaken idea that the latter had been originally commemorated, and that Caesarea had been substituted for Samosata by a mistake. The Martyrologium Hieronymianum, which contained the true key to the error, had not yet been discovered. [L]

EUSEBIUS, CHRONICLE OF. This work may be described in words suggested by the author's own account of it at the beginning of his Eclogae Propheticae, as "chronological tables, to which is prefixed an epitome of universal history drawn from various sources." The ECLOGAE PROPHETICAЕ constitutes the first book of the Chronicle, the tables the second. As tables, as will more clearly be seen from the specimen we give farther on, exhibit in parallel columns the successions of the rulers of different nations, in such a way that the reader can see at a glance with whom any given monarch was contemporary. And they are accompanied by notes marking the year of some of the more remarkable historical events, these notes also constituting an epitome of history. The context of a second passage, where Eusebius refers to his Chronicle (Prap. Ec. i. 9), accounts very clearly for the interest which Christians felt in the study of comparative chronology. If their heathen opponents contrasted the antiquity of their rites with the novelty of the Christian religion, the Christian apologists retorted by proving that the most celebrated Grecian legislators and philosophers were very much junior to the Hebrew legislator, and to the prophets who had beforehand testified of Christ, and who had taught a religion of which the Christian was the legitimate continuation. This argument is the subject of the section of the Praeparatio Evangelica to which we have referred; and Eusebius there quotes largely from preceding writers who had proved the antiquity of the Jews; from Josephus, from Tatian, from Clement of Alexandria, and in parcular from Africanus. This last writer (see the article on him, Vol. I. p. 56) had made the synchronisms between sacred and profane history his special study, and he published the results in a chronological work which gave Eusebius the model and, to a great extent, the materials for that which is the subject of this article.

A chronicle whose chronicle has a vitality which is not affected by the efforts of subsequent imitators; but one the merits of which are scientific is inevitably superseded by the works of later writers, who, having learned from it all that it is able to teach, combine therewith the fruits of more advanced knowledge.
Thus the chronology of Africanus has perished, the first cause of its falling into neglect probably being the superior popularity of the work which Eusebius had founded on it. In like manner, the Greek of Eusebius's own work has been lost, and until comparatively recent times it was only known through the labours of successors who had made use of it, in particular of Jerome, who translated it into Latin, enlarging the notice which related to Roman history, and continuing the chronology to his own time. In 1806, Scaliger published an edition of the Chronicle, in which he attempted to restore the Greek of Eusebius, collecting from Syncellus, Cedrenus, and the chronoi of which he believed himself able, mainly by the help of Jerome's translation, to identify as copied from Eusebius. In this work he shewed great learning and industry, but over-confidence in his critical sagacity sometimes led him to claim for Eusebius more than really belonged to him; and his restitution of the first book, where he had but little guidance from Jerome, did not inspire confidence at the time, and has since proved to be untrustworthy. It seems over-bold also to pronounce concerning two lost works that the one was little but a transcript from the other; yet this was the judgment which Scaliger confidently expressed concerning the obligations of Eusebius to Africanus. It is very certain that Eusebius owed much to Africanus, but we are not entitled to assume, as Scaliger did, that Eusebius copied Africanus without alteration in every place where he does not expressly state his dissent from him.
In closely going over the work of Jerome, Scalgier was strongly impressed by the haste and carelessness with which the Latin translator did his work, trusting too much to the attendants who read to him or wrote for him. The most striking instance is Jerome's creation of a historian, Paradisus, out of the two Greek words, wap and Sur. He translates Minor Kypros as wap Dak, "Minoi Cretes."

ut Paradisus memorat." Scaliger was in consequence led to impute mistranslation to Jerome every time that he found a difference between Jerome's Latin and the Greek; and there are no ceases in the later Greek chronologers. And though of his great edition of Jerome's works, contains much able criticism of Scaliger's work, urges that we have no right to assume that the Greek chronologers simply copied Eusebius without introducing any changes of their own, or that in any difference between them and Jerome they must be pronounced right and he wrong, there remain, after every allowance made, several cases where Jerome cannot be cleared from the charge of having blundered. The objections made by Vallarsi to Scaliger's restoration of the first book, and his opinion that the Chronicle never had contained anything which could properly be described as a first book, need not be considered, the question having been set at rest by the discovery of an Armenian translation of the Chronicle, which was published in 1818, when it enables us now to state what the contents of the first book really were

The author, at the commencement of his work, deprecates the expectation of too minute accuricy in the investigations on which he enters, and thinks that our Lord's words, "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons," are applicable not only to the end of the world, but also to the knowledge of all times and seasons. He pleads the difficulties, in the case of the Greeks, arising from the comparatively recent beginning of civilization in that nation, concerning which he quotes the saying of the oft quoted story told in the Zumaecus of Plato, that the Greeks were but children; in the case of the Egyptians and the Chaldeans, arising from the fables of which their early history is full. Even Hebrew chronolology is not free from difficulties of its own. He then, in the first section, gives a sketch of Chalde-and Assyrian history, subjoining a table of the succession and lengths of reigns of Assyrian, Median, Lydian, and Persian kings, ending with the Darius conquered by Alexander. The authors whom he employs are Alexander Polybius, and, as known through him, Berosus; Abydenus, Josephus, Castor, Diodorus, and Cephalion. He notes the coincidences of these writers with Hebrew history, and he suggests that the inredible lengths assigned to reigns in the early Chaldean history may be reduced by the supposition that the "sari," said to be periods of 3000 years, in reality were far shorter periods. In like manner, the Egyptian chronology may be shortened by supposing that the years of their periods were in reality but months. Africanus had previously mentioned this solution. Another is mentioned farther on in this first book, viz.
that some of the Egyptian dynasties may have been, not consecutive, but synchronous. The second section treats of Hebrew chronology, the authorities used in addition to the sacred volume in being Josephus and Africanus. He notices the chronological difference between the Hebrew, Septuagint, and Samaritan text, and conjectures that the Hebrews, desirous to justify by patriarchal example their love of early marriages, systematically shortened the intervals between the birth of each patriarch and that of his first son. He gives other arguments which decide him in favour of the LXX, especially as their version was the only one in use in the Christian church which had received it from our Lord and the apostles. A trifling difference here shows that Scaliger was wrong in supposing that Eusebius slavishly copied Africanus, for he reckons the years from the Creation to the Flood as 2242, instead of 2282, which we learn from Syncellus were counted by Africanus, the difference no doubt arising from a difference of reading as to the years of Methuseelah; for in this case there is a well known variation of reading, probably in the first instance arising out of a conjectural emendation made in order to get rid of a chronology which would have made Methusealah survive the Deluge. In the next division of time, from the Deluge to the birth of Abraham, which Eusebius makes the initial point of his own tables, he follows the Septuagint, except that he omits the second Cainian, making the number of years 945; and thus placing the birth of Abraham, according to the Creation, 31184. He notes in his tables that the Hebrew chronology made this interval 1949 years, which agrees within a year with that derived from our copies. Eusebius places the Exodus in the year from the birth of Abraham 505, in which he appears to agree with Africanus, but differs with him in respect to the next interval, that to the building of Solomon’s temple. Josephus counted that interval 592 years, which agrees closely enough with the 450 years assigned to the period of the Judges in the received text of Acts xiii. 20. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21), as Eusebius notes, does not substantially disagree from Josephus. After Josephus Africanus had extended this interval to 744 years. He may have been, as Scaliger supposes, desirous to maintain the then received computation of 5500 years from the Creation to the birth of our Lord, notwithstanding his throwing out of the chronology the 130 years of the second Cainian. For he gained as many years elsewhere, enlarging, for instance, the period of the Judges by counting 30 years for the elders that outlived Joshua, 40 years of anarchy after Samson, and 30 years of peace, arbitrary insertions for which he is censured by Eusebius. The great crex of Scripture chronologers has been how to reconcile the interval of about 600 years between the Exodus and Solomon’s temple, which is what most naturally comes out from adding up the years assigned to the Judges, with the statement (1 Kings vi. 1) that the interval was only 480 years. A reconciliation could be effected, and the times of the Judges shortened, by throwing out of the computation the years when the land is said to have sinned so much as to require a return to the wilderness, which he counted in the years of some contemporary judge; if it were not that the authority of the apostle Paul, as already quoted, seems to favour the longer computation. Eusebius is moved to decide in favour of the shorter mainly by the consideration that between Naasson and David there intervened but Salmom, Boaz, Obad, and Jesse. These are genera, and within a period of, according to Africanus, over 700 years, or, according to Josephus, 600, would give on the lowest computation the inadmissible length of 120 years to a generation. Eusebius therefore counts the interval 480 years, as in 1 Kings. If in Acts xiii. he adopted the reading of the oldest MSS now extant, he does not found on it any attempt to maintain Paul’s chronological accuracy, his line of defence being that the apostle’s object was not to teach scientific chronology, but that he merely had occasion, while preaching the saving doctrine of Christ, to make incidental mention of the times of the Judges, in doing which he conformed to the received chronology of the time. The consequence of the shortening of the Hebrew chronology by Eusebius in the period now under consideration was to bring down the place of Moses as compared with the line of Greek chronology. In the preface to his second book Eusebius states that his predecessor had made Moses contemporary with Inachus, and 700 years earlier than the Trojan War. His own computation made Inachus contemporary with Jacob, and Moses with Cercopes, but he contends that this leaves Moses still nearly 400 years older than the capture of Troy, older than Dacilus’s Deluge or Phaethon’s Conflagration, older than Racotus’s, Cadmus’s, Jason’s, Castor and Pollux, or Hercules; older than Homer and the Seven Wise Men of Greece, and Pythagoras the first philosopher. In the next period, Eusebius counts 442 years from the foundation of the temple by Solomon to its destruction under Zedekiah. How the 70 years’ captivity are to be reckoned, and his conclusion is that there are two prophetic periods of this length. The one begins with the destruction of the temple, and ends with the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, and the rebuilding of the temple under Zerubbabel. In so counting, Eusebius claims that he follows Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21), who remarks that this is only true as respects the end of the period. Clement had made his 70 years begin with the captivity under Jeconiah, as the prophecy of Jeremiah xxix. seems to demand. The other prophetic period of 70 years he makes end in the first year of Cyrus (who was an altar was set up at Jerusalem, and the foundations of the temple laid), and begin with the first prophesying of Jeremiah in the fifteenth year of Josiah. In the tables, Eusebius gives another way of counting this period, viz. from the third year of Jehoiakim to the nineteenth of Cyrus. From the second year of Darius, which he counts as the first year of the 65th Olympiad, Eusebius counts 548 years to the preaching of our Lord and the fifteenth year of Tiberius, which he reckons as the fourth year of the 201st Olympiad; and as the year from the creation of the world 5228. He gives as elements of this part of the calculation the lengths of the years of the Persian kings, of Alexander, of his successors, and then a period of 14 years from Antiochus Epiphanes, carrying the calculation from this point through the Maccabees (with respect to whom he refers again to Africanus) and the Jewish princes who succeeded them. Both in this and in the first part of this book, Eusebius sums up his calculations by giving the total of years derived from the Vicennalia of Constantine (325), which is made the closing point of the Chronicle. The third part of the first book contains a sketch of Egyptian history commencing with an extract from Diodorus, but mainly taken from Manetho, from whom large extracts had also been made by Africanus and Josephus. For the history after the time of Alexander the Great, Porphyry is employed. The fourth part treats of Grecian history. The first authority employed is Cassius, who seems to have drawn up his results in chronological tables, and from them Eusebius takes his history of the kings of Sicily, of Argos and of Athens. Eusebius next gives a notice of the foundation of the Olympic contests, contrasting that with the first olympiad authentic Greek history begins. He gives a list of Olympic victors, which according to the title professes to end with the 2474th, but which actually is continued to the 249th. This is the latest that could have appeared in the work of Africanus, so that the breaking off the list here is evidence of the source whence it is derived. Next follows from Diodorus a list of kings of Corinth and Lacedaemon, with a table of the nations who successively held dominion of the sea, with the number of years for which each held it. After this come Macedonian, Thessalian, and Syrian history, the authority of Porphyry being followed in the later history. The tables, must have found this method unsuitable on account of the length of time covered by his tables, which go back more than 1200 years before the first olympiad. And the same objection applied to the use of other celebrated eras which Eusebius does not mention, such as that of Nabonassar or of the Seleucidae. On the other hand, the differences between the Hebrew and the Septuagint chronology would have made it inconvenient to date years from the Creation; for when Eusebius has occasion to make such a computation, he gives the result according to both systems of chronology. The important differences between the Hebrew and the Septuagint all lie in the period prior to the birth of Abraham; that, accordingly, Eusebius records as the first event in his Chronicle, and makes it the beginning of his era, in respect of their distances from which all subsequent events are dated. The next columns give the successions of the rulers of different nations. Eusebius only counts the chronology of three nations as going back so far as the commencement of his Chronicle, the Assyrians, the Sicyonians, and the Egyptians; and he places the first year of Abraham as corresponding to the forty-third year of Ninus, king of Assyria, to the twenty-second of Europa, king of Sicily, and to the first year of the sixteenth or Theban Egyptian dynasty. With the foundation of new monarchies the number of columns increases, rising to as many as eight; diminishing again as kingdoms disappear, until, towards the close of the Chronicle there remains but the single line of Roman emperors. The remaining space in the tables, called by Scaliger the Spatium Historicum, contains entries of different historical events. These entries have been liable to much dislocation in the process of transcription, copyists altering their position as the space at their disposal made it convenient. Thus, while the Armenian and Jerome's translation, as a general rule, agree as to the dates of the accession of the kings, they differ perpetually as to the entries in the historical space. We give an example to illustrate the difficulty of recovering with any certainty the chronological system of Eusebius from these entries. Eusebius, as we have already mentioned, had before him a list of the nations who successively held dominion over the sea with the number of years of the rule of each. This list he worked into his tables, no doubt counting the years back from the crossing of the Hellespont by Xerxes.
which is its final point. But it is now, to all appearance, a hopeless task to recover the arrangement of Eusebius. Thus, the first name on the list is the Lydians, ninety-two years; and these years are given in the Armenian 848–928, by Jerome 842–960. There is but one entry out of seventeen in which the Armenian and Jerome agree. In this case there is no room for doubt that the notes were originally intended by Eusebius to be connected with definite years. But many of the others might from the first have been as well affixed to one year as another, and probably were not at first intended to be connected so much with particular years as with particular decades of years, indicating vaguely as they do the times about which certain events happened or when certain men flourished. It appears to us that these historical notes, incorporated with the tables of reigns, are what Eusebius had in view when, at the beginning of his Eclogae Prospexiticas, he refers to certain places with that he had written with them an epitome of history. The word he uses is ἐντοπισαμένης; if that contained in the first book had been intended, a different word would have been used. There is every reason for thinking that more editions of the Chronicle than one were published by Eusebius in his lifetime, and that later times added to the Vicennalia of Constantine; but the Prospuratatio Evangelica, in which the Chronicle is referred to, had been published several years previously. It is possible that the hypothesis that Eusebius himself published different editions of his Chronicle may give the true explanation of the difference between Jerome's and the Armenian. These are more than can be ascribed to the fault of transcribers. The Armenian version and Jerome's can readily be compared in Scheen's edition, where both are to be found on the same opening of the page, and the comparison is helped by a valuable memoir of Mommsen's on the subject (Abkomm. der philologisch-histor. Classe der Königl. Sächs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, i. 669). The account which Jerome gives in his preface of his claims to originality is that as far as the taking of Troy his work was a mere translation of that of Eusebius; that from that date on to the point at which the work of Eusebius closes, his work was still but translation, only enlarged by notices, taken from Suetonius and others, relating to Roman history, concerning which Eusebius, as a Greek writing for Greeks, had not been full; and that the conclusion continuing the Chronicle from the point where Eusebius breaks off to his own time was entirely his own. Mommsen is both wise and strict in the part of the Chronicle written before the time of our Lord the Armenian must have mutilated the work of Eusebius by capricious omissions, there being a multitude of notices absent from it, which are found in Jerome, and which are proved really to belong to Eusebius by being quoted as his by subsequent Greek authors. In the history after Christ, the Armenian appears to have faithfully reported Eusebius, almost everything additional that is found in Jerome being capable of being traced to non-Eusebian sources. Mommsen has expended some pains in tracing the sources of Jerome, and finds that, as indeed he had previously remarked, he is even more indebted to the history of Eutropius, which he does not mention, than to the work of Suetonius, which he does. Mommsen gives several illustrations of the haste and carelessness with which Jerome used his authorities. For instance, Jerome describes the emperor Claudius as "patrius Drusi qui apud Magnutisacum monumentum habitet," a strange statement, which is accounted for by a reference to Eutropius, where we find, "patrius Caligulae, Drusi qui apud M. m. habet filius.

Some lengths of the reigns of Roman emperors, which are merely entered in the Armenian by the round numbers of the years are given in Jerome, with the more minute accuracy of months and sometimes of days; and one of Jerome's statements, viz. that Pertinax reigned six months, instead of a year as in the Armenian, is proved, by a Greek quotation, really to have been made by Eusebius. Jerome also gives notices, not found in the Armenian canon, of emperors, who are mentioned in Eusebius, but the source of these is found in a list of the places and manner of deaths of the emperors, still found in the Armenian, which Eusebius had prefixed to his tables. He had also prefixed a table of the lengths of their reigns, but that has been lost from the Armenian by mutilation, so that we do not now possess the original discrepancies which Jerome removed between the list and the entries in the tables, or whether Jerome's version represents a later edition of the work of Eusebius. The succession of the Roman bishops will form the subject of a separate article [Rome, Bishops of]. Suffice it here to say that Jerome and the Armenian versions of the bishops differ from the Armenian in such a way as to suggest that Jerome had exchanged the work of a translator for that of a chronologer, reforming the system of his original by means of an independent list. Jerome's chronology of the Roman bishops approaches much more nearly than the Armenian to that of the later work of Eusebius, his Church History. Appended to Scheen's edition of the Chronicle is a translation, by Roediger, of a Syriac chronicle which goes down to the year a.d. 638, and which epitomises the work of Eusebius, though possibly, as von Gutheschmid conjectures, known to the Syriac writer through the intervention of Anianus. In this there are few cases where the Syriac agrees, as to the lengths of episcopates with Jerome, where he differs from the Armenian, and in three of them from the Church History of Eusebius as well. As it is improbable that Jerome's work could have been known to the Syriac writer, we are led to believe that Jerome mutilated the work, at least for what has been said as to Jerome's rough and ready method of working, it seems to us improbable that he took more pains in correcting the chronology of Eusebius by the help of other authorities than he himself lays claim to have done. And it seems to us that the simplest account of the plan which has been described is the hypothesis that Jerome worked on a later edition of the Chronicle than that represented by the Armenian translation. We have referred [Evodius] to Harnack's theory as to the principle on which the Chronicle dates the ascensions of bishops of Antioch. The difficulties in the way of accepting that theory are stated in the prologomena to Lightfoot's Eusebius, the Armenian two years before that emperor's accession. Now, in addition to Roediger's Syriac epitome already mentioned, there have been published by Bruns, in Eichhorns Repertorium für bli. und morgenl. Litteratur, xl. 273, extracts from another Syriac chronicle. These two witnesses are independent, for the Armenian has discovered a text of the Syriac chronicle. It may be noted here that in the later MSS. of Jerome's Chronicle the historical notices are all collected into the right-hand margin, the Syriac Historicum of Scaliger; and Jerome's preface as printed in the given MS. of Scaliger the directions for distinguishing the use of differently coloured inks to what nation each notice belonged. The older MSS. insert the historical notices in two places, between the columns of kingdoms. The Armenian also gives the notices in two places, the inner and outer margins. Scaliger considered that the directions in the preface which are not found in the older MSS. had been emitted by scribes, who found the use of different inks too troublesome, and he drew the paradoxical inference that the later MSS. contained the oldest text. But Schoene points out that it would be far more laborious for any scribe to separate into two, according to nations, notices which he had found all together than to join them; and he has found as many instances in the MSS. for what he calls the summer solstice B.C. 774, and that it begins at the autumnal equinox B.C. 2018; and from Julius Caesar to Pertinax, that it begins at the autumnal equinox B.C. 2019. He gives an explanation, which need not be here repeated, how the different calculation of the middle period is to be accounted for by the use of different scribes by the chronicles. Setting this aside, the other two reckonings, which differ by nine months, are best harmonized by the assumption that Eusebius's first year of Eusebius makes his olympiads begin with the year of Abraham 1240, that is to say, with Jan. 1, B.C. 777, the true date being the summer solstice B.C. 776. The olympiads of Eusebius therefore are only bisextile Julian years, differing by a year and a half from the true olympiads. Jerome makes his olympiads begin year later than Eusebius, and so brings them into closer harmony with the true olympiads.

After the reign of Pertinax there ensues a confusion in the chronology, and the agreement with the Armenian and Jerome as to the dates of the accession of the emperors ceases. In fact,
Eusebius, who in this part of the history appears to have worked on an Alexandrian table of regna, in which years are counted from the beginning of the month Thoth, i.e. Aug. 29, assigns a whole year to the reign of Pertinax, which lasted only three months, or five if we take in the reign of Julianus; he gives seven years to Caracalla, who really reigned only six years two months, and he gives seven years to Philip instead of five and a half years. In this way the time between the deaths of Commodus and of Philip is made three years too long. One of these redundant years is afterwards cut out by the omission of the year 223 between the resignation of Diocletian and the acceptance of the title of Augustus by Constantine. Jerome, partially, but only partially, corrects these errors. It has been thought surprising that Eusebius should have gone wrong in the part of the chronology which lay near his own time; of this von Gutschmid offers the following ingenious explanation. Among others he states that year 39 on March 25 to Jan. 1 occasionally leads to a mistake of a year in the dates of events which occurred in the first three months of years before the change of style. Chronological confusion to a much greater extent arose when the genuine olympiads came in different places to different periods, to some, to two, to three, to four years indeed, but not commencing at the same time as the true. A change in the way of counting the dates could not be made in any history from one period to the other without a breach of continuity at the point of transition. It has been explained (Vol. I. p. 598) what use was made of the help of eight (or four) years in counting the Easter full moons. Von Gutschmid tries to show there was in use in Alexandria such a cycle, in which the summer solstice of the year 284 commenced a period, and a different one at Rome commencing with Jan. 1, 293. His hypothesis is, that with Pertinax the sources from which Eusebius had previously been drawing were exhausted, that he then employed materials in which Alexandrian pseudo-olymiads were used, and later himself employed the Roman way of reckoning. This explanation is too complicated to carry with it complete conviction; and it does not seem to us incredible that Eusebius should have simply blundered in making out his chronology by the help of lists of emperors' reigns. Modern chronology is kept straight by the habitual use of the reckoning A.D., but if we dated events by the years of the reigning sovereign, we should be liable to error every time there was inaccuracy in our information how much each monarch lived, or by how much the letters of public documents showed him to have entered. The part of history which persons in general know worst is that which immediately precedes their own time. It was much easier for Eusebius to preserve historical accuracy in the early history, where he had the guidance of trustworthy histories; but for the periods for which the histories he had been following came to an end, and where he had to make, as best he could, a way for himself. Whatever may be thought of the correctness of von Gutschmid's explanation, it does not affect the value of his rule for turning Eusebian years of Abraham into years B.C. and A.D.; viz. in the period from the first olympiad to the beginning of the vulpus era, that is to say from the year of Abraha 1140-1160, subtract the year of Abraham from 2017, and the remainder gives the year A.D.; thenceforward to Pertinax, viz. from the year of Abraham 1720-2008 subtract 1690, and the remainder is the year A.D.; from 223 the last year in the Armenian subtraction 2018 in order to obtain the year A.D. Von Gutschmid has also compared the Eusebian with the true date of a number of events entered in the Spatius historiwm, as to the position of which the Armenian and Jerome agree. He finds that in putting these dates into his classes, in one of which the dates fairly correspond to those obtained by the preceding rule; in the others the dates as given by olympiads in the table will be right if we consider these as true olympiads. Cases of this kind would arise whenever Eusebius copied the dates given in olympiads by older authorities without any attempt to assign them to the years chosen.

We do not occupy space with an enumeration of editions of the chronicle, because, for the student's practical purposes, previous editions are superseded by that of Schoene, Berlin, 1873, 1886. Full explanation is given as to the mode of using the tables, p. xii. In his preface, men will be found the labours of previous editors, as also in Fabricius, Biblior. Gr. Basel, vii. 340, and in the preface to Aucher's edition of the Armenian. This version was made from a MS. brought from Jerusalem to Constantinople, of which transcripts were sent to Aucher in Venice in 1793 and 1795; but various hindrances delayed publication till 1816. We have not room to speak of the anticipation of this work by Zohrab and Mai in 1815. Petermann, for Schoene's edition, failed in his attempt to make a new collation of the Jerusalem MS., but he was able to compare the transcript of 1793 with a later one made by Aucher himself; and also another MS. of his akin to the Jerusalem MS., but in Petermann's opinion not derived from it, but rather both from a common original. The Armenian version speaks to be as early as the 5th century. Some errors in it are obviously to be accounted for as originating in a misunderstanding of Greek words; other features indicate a Syriac original; and though it is possible that the errors just mentioned may have been introduced by the Syriac translator, yet Petermann's opinion is that there were in Armenia in the 5th century two versions, one made directly from the Greek, the other through the medium of Syriac, and that two or three centuries afterwards these were combined into the published text. It is the languages through which the words of Eusebius passed, some of them certainly have become much disguised in the process. It would require a sagacious critic from the words "Hedrus primus virtutem ostendit, superabat eum iracundiam," to restore the original text of the passage after the text of the Syriac. Scaller's edition contained in addition to the chronicle of Eusebius, besides the Latin continuation of St. Jerome an εντοχή κρήνων taken from the Paschal chronicle at that time unpublished, the Chronographia of the Patriarch Nicæmones, and what he called ισπανικών αυγομετρία which is not an ancient work, but a collection of historical notices made by Scaliger himself, in some cases even translated by him from Latin into Greek. Subjoined to his Latin chronicles are what Scaliger calls most useful extracts from Eusebius, Africanus, and others turned into Latin, "ab homine barbaro inepto, Hellenismi et Latinitatis imperitissimo." [CHRYSOST. SCALIGERAN.] The substance in it is of such a character that this description is not too severe; for instance: τὸ ἔμαθεν ἢ τὴν τῶν Ἀρχαίων is rendered "Ille solis confixus est ab Acheim," but the historical matter contained in the notices promises to repay more careful investigation than it has yet received. These excerpts have been newly edited in Schöne's edition from a careful collation with the original MS. at Paris. Schöne's edition also contains the χρονογράφων στομονος, a work of the year 853, which had been published by Mai (Script. Vit. Soc. Coll. vol. i.), the first part of which professes to be drawn from the labors of Eusebius. The list of Alexandrian patriarchs has traces, in a number of curious alterations, of having been derived from a list in which the Monophysites are treated as the orthodox and the adherents of Chalcedon as heretics. [G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (24), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, by whom Basil the Great was ordained to the presbyterate. Eusebius was a layman and unbaptized at the time of his elevation to the episcopate A.D. 362. On the death of Dianius, the church of Caesarea was divided into rival factions, nearly equally balanced, and, as in the case of Ambrose of Milan, the choice of a layman universally known and respected and of high character for orthodoxy, was the readiest way out of the dilemma, as involving no acknowledgment of weakness on either side. Eusebius was by no means cowed by the honour thus forced upon him. Military force had to be employed to overcome his reluctance, and to compel the consecrating prelates to fulfill their functions. No sooner were they free than the bishops endeavored to annul their act and declare the consecration of Eusebius void. But the counsels of the elder Gregory of Nazianzus prevailed. He represented to them that it would have been the more honourable course to have risked their lives by refusing to ordain Eusebius, rather than to have yielded to the dictation of the populace through fear, and then annul their own act. There were discussions enough in the church, without their adding to them (Greg. Naz. Orat. xix. 36, pp. 308-9). The election of Eusebius was ratified, to the indignation of the emperor Julian, who grudged the loss of so valuable a servant to the state, and he held the see for a period of eight years till 370. Eusebius proved a very respectable prelate, who would have filled his office with credit to himself and advantage to the church in ordinary times; he shewed himself, however, quite unequal to the circumstances of severe trial in which he soon found himself. He was, writes Dr. Newman (Biographical Sketches, p. 4), "a bishop of orthodox profession, but had little of the theological knowledge or force of character necessary for coping with the formidable heresy with which the church was assailed." One of the earliest acts of his episcopate was to ordain Basil to the presbyterate. The coldness which grew up between Eusebius and Basil, probably arising from jealousy of the superior knowledge and greater influence of the latter, his insulting conduct towards Basil, leading to Basil's three years' retirement to Pontus, his desire to retain Basil's aid in combating the attack of the Arians under Valens on the church of Caesarea, and the ultimately successful mediation of Gregory Nazianzus and his old friend, are fully narrated in another article. [BASILII OF CAESAREA.] (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. §§ 51-53; Epist. 19, 20, 189, 197.)

In 366 Eusebius saw Basil return to Caesarea. Each had learnt wisdom from the past. Basil was content to guide the counsels of Eusebius without publicly trenching on his prerogatives, while Eusebius was satisfied with official power and dignity, flattering himself, in Gregory's words, that he himself was ruling while Basil was actually the ruler. (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. § 57-59.) The harmony continued unbroken to the death of Eusebius, A.D. 396. Freyta states that Eusebius is reckoned by some among the martyrs, but why, it would be hard to say (Freyta, xv. 13, 14; xvi. 9, 14, 17). Florintinns thinks that Usuard confounds Eusebius of Cappadocia with Eusebius the historian, whom he notes on June 21. Upon this point see annotations of Papebrochius in A.D. 584, Boll. Jun. iv. 75; and on the other side, Till. Mem. vii. 39. See also EUSEBIUS (23), supr. p. 348 b. [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (25), fourth bishop of Cahors, succeeding St. Ursinus and followed by Rusticus. He is mentioned in this order in one of the Vita of St. Desiderius, a later bishop of the same see. (Vit. Desid. cap. 4 in Patr. Lat. iv. 223 c; Gall. Christ. i. 120.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (26), bishop of Chalea in Cœle Syria, a zealous man and a staunch Catholic, ordained by Eusebius bishop of Samosata, though in another province, after his return from exile, c. A.D. 375 (Theod. H. E. v. 4). He attended the council of Constantineople, A.D. 381 (Labbe, ii. 955). Theodore narrates a visit paid by him to Marcian the military (Hist. Rel. c. 3, p. 789). [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (27), St., bishop of Cibaliss, a town and district in Pannonia between the Drave and the Save, subject to the metropolitan authority of Scythian (Dict. G. & R. Geog.). He suffered martyrdom during either the Valerian or the Diocletian persecution. He is the only bishop of this see whose name is known. (Farlati, Myriarch Sacr. vii. 574; A.A. SS. Boll. 28 April, iii. 356; Mart. Guardi, Ap. 28.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (28), bishop of Clazomenae near Smyrna, present the council of Epiphan A.D. 431 and Chalcedon A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 729; Mansi, iv. 1216, vi. 1085.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (29), bishop of Como, 512. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 313; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 260.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIUS (30), bishop of Constantinople; vid. of Nicomedia. [EUSEBIUS (60).]

EUSEBIUS (32), bishop of Cyzicus, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 970.) He is described by Procopius (Bell. Pers. i. 25) as a man of overbearing character, and was ultimately murdered by the people of Cyzicus, as Malalas relates, in a conspiracy headed by John of Cappadocia, who was then an exile at Cyzicus. (Jo. Malalas, Chron. lib. xviii. p. 480, ed. Dindorf; Le Quien, Orient. Christ. i. 754.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (33), bishop of Dorylaem in Phrygia Salutaris, the constant supporter of orthodoxy against Nestorius and Eutyches alike. About Christmas A.D. 428, when Nestorius was asserting his heresy in a sermon at Constantinople, there stood up in full church a man of excellent character (ἀρχηγὸς τῶν ἑων ἔνθεεν), still a simple layman, but distinguished for “not incon- sillable (οὐκ ἡμισυμφόρος)” and orthodox zeal, and asserted in opposition to Nestorius, that the “eternal Word begotten before the ages had submitted also to be born a second time” (i.e. according to the flesh of the Virgin). This bold assertion of the faith caused great excitement and division in the church. Cyr. Hist. i. 20 in Migne, vol. i. 41 D; Marius Mercator, pars ii. lib. i.; Patr. Lat. cxviii. p. 769 n.) The “vir robus, adhue laicus” of this narrative is certainly, as Theophanes (Chron. p. 76) expressly says he was, our Eusebius, who has the credit of being the first to oppose the Nestorian heresy. (Evang. Hist. i. 9 in Patr. Gr. ixvi. 2448.) He was also the first to follow the utterances of Anastasius, the synod of Nestorius (Theophan. Chron. p. 76.) He was at this time a “rhetor” (Evgr. l. c.) distinguished in legal practice. (Leont. Byzant. Cont. Nestor. et Eutych. lib. iii. in Patr. Gr. ixvi. 1389) and an “agens in rebus” to the court, (Gesta de Num. Auct.; cap. i. in Galland, Bibl. x; n. 604; cf. Tillemont, xiv. note xi. on Cyril of Alexandria.) Theophanes (l. c.) calls him a σχολαστής τῆς βασιλείας Κωνσταντινουπόλεως.

After the sermon of St. Proclus against Nestorius, and before the orthodox had separated from the communion of Nestorius, in consequence of the council of Ephesus, there appeared, fixed in a public place, an inscription which gives the identity of Nestorius’s doctrine with that of Paul of Samosata. This document common opinion attributed to Eusebius (Leontios, Cont. Nestor. et Eutych. lib. iii. cap. 43 in Patr. Gr. lxvi. 1389 προτεθέσθη, ἐν φανε, πάρα Ευσεβίου). In the Greek text of the document (Har- dium, p. 285), it is said to be “παρὰ τῶν κληρικῶν Κωνσταντινουπόλεως,” which is clearly wrong, as it is written in the first person singular (we should perhaps read ἐκάθεν τῶν, &c.). This public protestation begins by conjuring any one into whose hands it may fall to make its contents known or give a copy of it to all the bishops, clergy and laity in Constantinople. It draws out the parallel between the doctrine of Nestorius and that of Paul of Samosata, who both deny that the child born of Mary was the Eternal Word; it asserts the true faith out of the creed in use at Antioch (whence Nestorius and Anastasius came), and addresses the testimony of Eustathius bishop of Antioch, one of the bishops present at Nicea, and ends with an anathema on him who denies the identity of the Only Begotten of the Father and the child of Mary. Eusebius must have been a priest at the time when St. Cyril wrote his five books against Nestorius (Cyril. Opera, iv. 41, 42, 43, 45, 48). So much is implied in the reference of Jo. Malalas, Chron. to Λαταχοί, i.e. about A.D. 430. He was certainly bishop of Dorylaem in A.D. 448. We learn from his own statement that he was poor. (Labe, Concil. iv. 221.) At this date he bestowed himself against the heretical teaching of Eutyches. Common hostility to Nestorius had united Eusebius and Eutyches; but about this time Eusebius, perceiving the heretical tendencies of his friend, frequently, as he afterwards told the council of Constantinople, visited him, and exhorted him to reconsider his ways. (Labe, Concil. iv. 154 D.) Finding him however immoveable and obstinate, Eusebius took the opportunity of making known his views under Flavian, Nov. 8, 448, apparently for some other purpose (cf. Tillem. xv. 490) to present a “libellus” against Eutyches. In this “libellus” he describes himself as unsuspected of heresy, always fighting against heretics, and defending to the utmost of his power the orthodox faith. (Labe, in loc.) Eusebius, iv. 231, 231D mentions the losses of Eutyches in error, and demands that he should be summoned before the council to answer the charges of heretical teaching which he made against him. Flavian, who was very unwilling to admit the petition, urged Eusebius more than once to visit and speak to Eutyches in private. Eusebius replied that it was impossible for him to talk with such a man. His position was finally granted by the council, though with unwillingness, and a feeling about the propriety of Eusebius’s conduct. At the second session of the council (Nov. 12), Eusebius requested that the second letter of St. Cyril to Nestorius and his letter to John of Antioch should be read in the council and presented as an argument against orthodoxy. This led to a profession of the orthodox faith from Flavian, which was assented to by the other bishops. At the third session of the council (Nov. 15) Eusebius asked that what reply Eutyches had made when summoned to attend. It was found that he had refused to come, alleging a determination never to quit his monastery, and saying that Eusebius had been his enemy’s (σώλας) his enemy. (Eutyches [q.v.]) He was again summoned, with the same result. Only at the third summons was he with difficulty induced to submit to the demand. Meanwhile Eusebius was pressing his point with the council persistently and even harshly; he behaved with such warmth that Flavian said, “I am heartily wear- ed with him, in his zeal for orthodoxy” as the discovery of the attempt which Eutyches had made to secure the adhesion of the other archimandrites to his views (Faustinus [q.v.]) Eusebius urged that he should be immediately treated with the rigour he deserved. (Labe, iv. 231.) Flavian still urged patience and moderation.
EUSEBIUS OF DORYLAEMUM

At last, on Nov. 22, Eutyches appeared with a large monastic and imperial escort, and was examined on the subject of his orthodoxy, heavily pressed by this time to have become a little afraid of the power of Eutyches: "I am poor," he said, "he threatens me with exile; he has wealth, he is already depicting (άνεγκλητικός) the oasis for me." Eusebius feared also lest Eutyches should turn round and assert to the orthodox faith—which causing him to be suspected of making calculated charges with an evil intention. (Labbé, iv. 221, c, d, 6.) The question with which he tried Eutyches was this: "My lord archimandrite, do you confess two natures after the Incarnation, and do you say that Christ is consubstantial with us according to the flesh or not?" To the first part of this question Eutyches could not but be got to give assent; he was condemned by all the bishops, and sentence of deposition was passed on him. He at once wrote to pope Leo I. in his own defence (Leo Mag. Ep. xxi. 739), complaining of the "machinations" of Eusebius. We are told that Eusebius sent Eutyches a recital of the Acts of the council of Constantinople, which Eutyches had declared to have been falsified. With him were fourteen others from among the bishops who had condemned Eutyches, out of the whole number of thirty-four. This examination was held at Constantinople in April 449. (Labbé, iv. 235.) Eutyches was represented by three delegates; Eusebius and others remonstrated against his not being present in person, but the emperor's orders overruled their remonstrances. During this examination Eusebius made it a special point that all examination into the case of Eutyches, and into any question other than the authenticity of the acts, should be referred to a general council. (Labbé, iv. 208.) The examination of the acts does not seem to have brought to light any inaccuracy of importance.

When Eusebius arrived in Ephesus at the beginning of August, A.D. 449, to attend the council, he was permitted to lodge with Stephen, metropolitan, for he was not permitted to attend the meetings of the council. (Labbé, iv. 111 D, 4.) He was not permitted to attend the meetings of the council. It was urged as a reason for this that the emperor had forbidden it. (Labbé, iv. 145 A, b.) Certainly when Flavian urged that he should be admitted and heard, Epilidas, one of the imperial commission, opposed the proposal (Hefele, Concilien-

Eusebius put in prison (Liberat. cap. xii.; Galland, xii. p. 140), and immediately sent into exile (JOSEPH. A. 155. Galland, x. 508). Eusebius escaped and his refuge at Rome, where Leo welcomed him and granted him communion. He was there till April 481 (Leo Mag. Ep. lxxx. lxxx. lxxx. 1037, 1041), for Leo mentions his presence in a letter to Pulcheria at this date and commends to her care his diocese, "which some one who has been insinuously thrust into his place is said to be laying waste." Liberati, however (Brenzner, cap. xii. in Galland, xii. 140) says that no bishop was put into the place of Eusebius. Perhaps Leo, whose words are "qui injuste assessor inter subrogatus," represents no more than a rumour at Rome. Leo also commends him to the care of Antolinus of Constantinople, the successor of Flavian, as one who for the sake of the faith has undergone many dangers and troubles. Eusebius of course, left Rome to attend the council of Chalcedon. He had addressed a formal petition to the emperor Marcian against Dioscorus, and he appears in the council as his accuser. His petition to the emperor was first read in the first session of the bishops at his own request (Labbé, iv. 95); he complains more than once of the conduct of Dioscorus in excluding him from the council of Ephesus (145, 156). His innocence, with that of St. Flavian, was fully recognized at the close of the first session of the council of Chalcedon (Labbé, iv. 322, 323); but he was not yet satisfied; at the third session, on Oct. 13, he presented a further petition against Dioscorus, addressed to the council, in which he represents himself as speaking on behalf of himself, of Flavian (τοῖς ἐχθρίσισι) and of the orthodox faith. He urges the iniquities of Dioscorus at Ephesus, and begs for complete excommunication for himself, and condemnation for Dioscorus. (For the conduct of the latter and his condemnation, cf. s. v. p. 861; Labbé, iv. 381.) We find Eusebius again in the fourth session of the council, taking a part in the case of certain Egyptian bishops who declined to condemn the heresy of Apollinaris, allying in excuse of their refusal to follow to bound to follow their patriarch (i.e. Dioscorus), and that in so doing they were acting in accordance with the council of Nicaea. Eusebius has but one word to say, "ψυχομετά" (Labbé, iv. 513 A). We find him a little later (fifth session, Oct. 22) siding at first against the imperial officers, and the wishes of the Roman legates for making no addition to the council's definition of faith. (Labbé, iv. 558 D; cf. Bright, Hist. of the Church, p. 409.) Afterwards, however, he assisted at the revision which made that definition a complete expression of the doctrine of Leo's tome. In the eleventh session we find him (599 A) voting for the deposition of both claimants, Bassian and Stephen, to the see of Ephesus, on the ground that both alike had been irregularly consecrated. He appears in the fifteenth session (Oct. 23), as signing the much-contested twenty-eighth canon of the council on the subject of the portion to be held by the see of Constantinople. (Labbé, 172.) Just at this time, if Eusebius's name is in the rescript of the emperor Marcian, June 452. This rescript has for its special object to rehabilitate the memory of Flavian, but it secures also that the condemnation of the robber council should in no way injure the reputation of Eusebius and Theodoret. (Labbé, iv. 886.) Nothing more is known of Eusebius. His name indeed appears in the list of bishops signing the decrees of the council at Rome in A.D. 503, but this list certainly belongs to some earlier council. (Cf. Baron. ann. 503, i.x.) Comparing him with Flavian we cannot help feeling that there was a want of generosity in his treatment of Eutyches, whose superior in logical power and theological perception he undoubtedly was. But none can deny him the credit of having been a watchful guardian of the doctrine of the incarnation all through his life, and a keen-sighted and persistent antagonist of error, whether on the one side or the other, who by his sufferings for the orthodox faith may be said to have merited the title of Confessor. [C. G.]

EUSEBIUS (28) EMESENUS, bishop of Emesa, now Hems, in Syria, c. A.D. 341-359. He was born at Edessa, of a noble family. As from his earliest years he was taught the Holy Scriptures, his parents must have been Christians. Eusebius enjoyed all the advantages of a liberal education which, begun in his native city under teachers who resorted thither, was carried on in Palestine, and subsequently at Alexandria. In Palestine he studied theology under the celeb- rated Eusebius of Caesarea and Patriarch of Scythopolis, from whom he imbibed the Arian leanings which distinguished him to the end of his life. Some terms of his standard-bearer of the Arian party, "signifer Arianorum factionis" (Chron. sub ann. x. Constantii), and his Arian tenets are spoken of by Theodoret as too well known to admit question. (Theod. Erasm. Dial. iii. p. 257, ed. Schultze.) About A.D. 331 Eusebius visited Antioch. Eustathius has been recently deposed and banished, and the see was occupied by one of the short-lived Arian intruders, Euphranius, with whom he lived on terms of intimacy. His heterodox leanings would thus receive additional strength. Eusebius's high personal character and reputation for learning marked him out for the episcopate. He had, however, no desire to become a bishop, and to secure the newsee by force to the office upon him, according to the strange custom of the time, he left Syria and repaired to Alex- andria. Here he devoted himself to the study of philosophy in the celebrated schools of that city. When he had made himself fully acquainted with their systems, he returned to Antioch, of which Flaccillus (otherwise called Flacillus) was the Arian bishop. Eusebius was received with the honour due to his learning and reputation for piety. Flaccillus received him into his episcopal residence, and admitted him to his friendship and confidence. When the Arian synod met at Antioch A.D. 340, under the predominant influence of Eusebius of Nicomedia, to nominate a successor to the newly deposed Athanasius, the sustained life, attractive eloquence, and popular manners of Eusebius, together with his personal acquaintance with Alexandria and its leading inhabitants, marked him out for the vacant throne. Eusebius, however, was by no means disposed to yield to his namesake's wishes. He well knew how deservedly beloved Athanasius was with the Alexandrians, and he shrank from facing the storm of unpopularity a bishop intruded into his seat would have to meet. He resolvedly declined the proffered dignity, and Gregory was chosen in his stead. Eusebius's scruples, however, to the episcopate were by this time overcome, and he allowed himself to be created bishop of the see of Emesa. This city, situated on the river Orontes to the north-east of the Libanus range, some distance to the north of Laodicea, was famous for its magnificent temple of Elagabalus, the Syro-Mithraic sun-god, from which the young priest Bassianus, himself a native of Edessa, had been chosen by the army as their emperor, assuming the title of the deity whose minister he had been. A report, based on Eusebius's astronomical studies, had reached the excitable inhabitants that their newly chosen bishop was a sorcerer, addicted to judicial astrology. His approach was the signal for a violent popular commotion, before which he fled, taking refuge with his friend and future pase- gyst, George, bishop of Laodicea. By his exertions, and the influence of Flaccillus of Antioch, and Narcissus of Neronias, the people of Emesa were convinced of the groundlessness of their suspicions, and he obtained quiet possession of his episcopal see. He was a favourite with the emperor Constantius, who took him with him as a counsellor and friend on several of his military expeditions, especially those directed against Sapor II, king of Persia. It is singular that, as we learn from Sozomen, the charge of Sabellianism was brought against him. The anabaptistic Arian leanings were so pronounced. The his- torian attributes the charge to mere malevolence, excited by jealousy of his exalted qualities. His death occurred before the end of A.D. 359. He was buried at Antioch (Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 101). His funeral oration was pronounced by George of Laodicea, who ascribed miraculous powers to him. Eusebius of Emesa was a very copious writer, and his works enjoyed much popularity. Jerome (u. a.) speaks somewhat contemptuously of his productions as merely elegant and rhetorical compositions, written with a view to applause, chiefly studied by those who delight in having themselves clapt (vulg. Superbose) in the phrase of some by a sort of praise. Eusebius, however, as he praises, as he glorifies the Great, a truth for which he says Eusebius endured many and severe struggles, which he quotes with high commendation in his Eramistes (Dial. iii. p. 258, ed. Schultze). Theodoret also speaks of works of his against Apelles (Haer. fab. 135), and Manes (ib. 265). He also wrote a commentary on Genesis, of which Jerome speaks depreciatively (Comm. in Gen. tom. iii. p. 113), and a commentary on the New Testament, fragments of which, as well as of his commentaries on the Old Testament, are published in the Codex. Three homilies are accepted by some authorities as genuine, and are printed by Migne: (1) on the descent of John the Baptist to Hades and his preaching there; (2) on the treachery of Judas; (3) on the evil and Hell. Fifty homilies were published in Latin by Ganne, Paris, 1547, among which is a catechism made up from various Latin fathers. All the extant remains of Eusebius are printed by Migne, Patrolog. tom. ixxvi. p. 461 ff. and by Mai, Bibl. Gracc. tom. ii. p. 528 ff. See also Fabricius, Bibl. Gracc. tom. vii. p. 412 ff.

EUSEBIUS (47), bishop of Jubaiteia, in the Byzacena province of Africa. One of the catholic bishops summoned to a conference with the Arians at Carthage, and subsequently sent into exile, where he died, by Hunneric the Vandal king of Africa, A.D. 484 (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 192; Notitia in Victor. Vit. 58, Migne, Patrol. Lat. iviii.).

EUSEBIUS (48), bishop of Laodicea, in Syria Prima. He was a native of Alexandria, where he became a deacon. In the persecution under Valerian, A.D. 257, when the venerable bishop Dionysius had been banished from Alexandria, Eusebius remained behind in the city, ministering to the confessors in prison, and burying the dead bodies of the martyrs. The faithfulness of his services is gratefully commemorated in a letter of Dionysius (apud Euseb. H. E. vii. 11). During the civil strife which followed the death of Valerian, when Alexandria was in revolt, A.D. 262, Amphilianus, who had assumed the purple, was driven into the strong quarter of the city called Bucoche, where he was besieged by the Ἰωνιας, the general of Gallienus, and was hard pressed by famine. Eusebius without the entrenchments, and his friend Anatolius within the besieged quarter, strenuously exerted themselves to lessen the horrors of the siege. Eusebius having obtained promise of quarter from Theodotus for all who would surrender themselves, informed Anatolius, who induced the senate, cooped up in Bruchium, to accept the terms for all useless hands. Nearly the whole of the besieged availed themselves of this opportunity of escape, including a large number of Christians, many disguising themselves as women and making their way out by night. The fugitives were kindly received by Eusebius, who supplied them with food and medicine, and carefully tended the sick and suffering. On the summoning of the synod at Antioch, A.D. 264, to consider the charges against Paul of Samosata, Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, being unable to be present through age, commissioned Eusebius as his representative. The see of Laodicea was then vacant. The Laodicenes resolved that Eusebius should be their bishop, and when he was refused to receive he was seized and forcibly consecrated. As bishop of Laodicea he sat at the synod when Paul of Samosata was deposed, A.D. 270. He was succeeded by his old friend Anatolius διδοῦχος δανέως δανεῖον. (Euseb. H. E. vii. 11; vid. 32; Tilletem. EUSEBIUS (89), ST., sixth bishop of Macon, succeeding St. Justus, and followed by Florentius, succeeded, following pastors, Macon, A.D. 588, Lyons in the same year, and Valentinia in the year 584 or 585. He was buried in the church of St. Clement at Macon. (Gall. Christ. iv. 1041; Mansi, ix. 936, 943, 946.)

EUSEBIUS (58), bishop of Magnesia on the Meander in the province of Asia, one of the Arian seeckers to Philoppoeus from the council of Sardica, A.D. 347. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 697; Mansi, iii. 139.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (54), bishop of Magnesia, near Mount Sipylos, in the province of Asia, present at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 735; Mansi, iv. 1215.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (56), bishop of Maranopolis, an unknown town in Mesopotamia, subscribing to the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, through his metropolitan, Simeon bishop of Amida. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1007; Mansi, vii. 165.)

EUSEBIUS (56), twenty-second bishop of Milan, between Lazarus and Gerunius, succeeding the former in 449. He was one of the bishops of Milan to whom Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, in the succeeding generation dedicated epigrams in verse. This author calls Eusebius a man of extraordinary value, from the East out of regard to a people that were strangers to him. At the time of his election to the see he was a deacon at Milan, and Ughelli states, upon what authority does not appear, that he was consecrated by pope Leo the Great. At the period of his accession the controversy was on foot that led to the assembling of the fourth general council, which commenced at Chalcedon on Oct. 8, 451. In anticipation of it Eusebius, at Leo's request, held a synod of his province, in which was considered the important letter which Leo had recently addressed to Flavian patriarch of Constantinople, giving his view of the doctrine in dispute. The letter was considered at length in the synod of Milan, the particulars of which are known from an extant synodical epistle of Eusebius addressed to Leo, and now printed among the epistles of Leo (ep. 97 in Pat. Lat. liv. 945), and in Mansi (vi. 141). Its editorial date is August or September, 451, and it was signed by or on behalf of eighteen suffragans. According to the traditions of the church, Mirolas was the compiler of the Ughelli and Cappelletti, Eusebius showed much zeal in restoring the churches which had been ruined by the Gothic invasion of north Italy, and in renewing the service books which had been burnt. An ancient metrical inscription in the church of St. Thecla given in the note at Ennodius as cited by Ughelli, and a brass plate to him as the restorer of that church in particular, after its destruction by fire. Ughelli states that Eusebius was present at pope Hilary's synod at Rome, Nov. 17, 466, and that, returning to Milan, he died Aug. 12, 466, and was buried in the basilica of St. Stephen. But in the list of bishops attending the Roman synod his name is not included, nor is Milan represented at all (Mansi, vii. 965), a circumstance which suggests either that he was then vacant, or that Eusebius was in his last illness. Cappelletti does not accept Ughelli's statement, but believes Eusebius to have died in 465. (Ughelli, It. Sacr. iv. 50; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 110, 301; Ennodus, Clem.; ii. carm. 88 in Pat. Lat. lxii. 350.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (87), bishop of Milebntus; his name is found in the list of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 919; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (55), bishop of Nantes, present at the first council of Tours, 461. (Sirmion, Concilia Galliae, i. 126; Gall. Christ. xiv. 757.) [R. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (59), bishop of Naples, c. 644-650. (Gesta Episcoporum Neapolitanorum, part i. 28, in Scriptores Rerum Italicarum et Longobardorum, 1378, p. 416.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIUS (90), bishop of Nicomedia. Our knowledge of the character of this prelate is derived almost exclusively from the embittered language of his theological antagonists, and from the hints given by them concerning the extraordinary influence he wielded over the fortunes of some of the great party leaders of the 4th century. The fascination Eusebius exercised over the minds of Constantine and Constantius, the dexterity with which he utilized both secular and ecclesiastical law, in order to punish his theological enemies, the ingenuity with which he blinded the judgment of those who were not alive to the magnitude of the problem they were addressing, the power he had over the thinking world, the unprincipled way in which he brought men to a belief in the practical identity of his personal views with those of the Catholic church, together with the political and personal ascendancy he achieved, reveal mental capacity and diplomatic skill worthy of a better cause. During twenty years his shadow haunts the pages of the ecclesiastical historians of the period, though they seldom bring us face to face with the man, or preserve either his spoken words or his correspondence. Some of the most noteworthy expressions of his thought which have survived have been latterly brought into discredit. The chronology of his life is singularly perplexed, and while studying it we must steer through our way by the statements of the only authorities to which we can appeal. It is difficult to understand the pertinacity and even ferocity with which Eusebius and his party pursued the Homousian leaders, and to reconcile their sleepless and dogged antagonism to the great Catholic bishops with their well-accustomed compromises, their shifting of fronts, and their theological evasions. Denys (The Arians of the Fourth Century, p. 272) admits their consistency in one thing, "their hatred of the sacred mystery." He thinks that this mystery, "like a spectre, was haunting the field and disturbing the complacency of their intellectual investigations." Their consciences did not scruple to "find enemies of a tenacious statement..." Not only did they compromise themselves by signature, and if they were as unscrupulous as their enemies supposed, might therefore have dismissed the controversy from their minds. Yet, as a matter of fact, they did not treat as either insignificant or unimportant that which they were in the habit of declaring to be such; but they set all
The controversy between the Arian and the orthodox turns on problems and inquiries of which the full solution lies beyond the range of the human intellect. They agreed as to the unique and exalted dignity of the Son of God, they both alike described the relation between the first and second hypostasis in the Godhead, as the Son is dependent upon us in the paternal and filial relation. They even agreed that the Son was "begotten of His Father before all worlds"—before the commencement of time, in an ineffable manner—that the Son was the originator of the categories of time and place, that "by His own will and counsel He has subsisted before time and before ages, as perfect God, only begotten and unchangeable." (Letter of Arius to Eusebius of Nicomedia preserved by Theodoret, i. 5.) They agreed that He was "God of God," "Light of Light," and worthy of all honour and worship. Orthodox went further, and in order to affirm that the Deity of the Son of God is absolute and not relative, infinite and not finite, asserted that He was of the same

\textit{σωφρονίς} with the Father. There Arius and Eusebius stopped, and pressing the significance of the image of Father and Son by materialistic analogies into logical conclusions, they argued that "generation" implied that "there was a period, rather than a time" when He was not, that "He was not before He was begotten." The one element, said they, which the Son did not possess by his generation was the eternal, absolute

\textit{σωφρονίς} of the Father. Arius wrote that to say the contrary was an "impious to which we could not listen, even though the heretics (meaning the party of Alexander) should threaten us with a thousand deaths" (Theod. i. 5). "We affirm," said Eusebius, in his one extant authentic letter, addressed to Paulinus of Tyre (Theod. i. 6), that "there is one who is unbegotten, and that there also exists and is such a creature, proceeding from Him, yet who was not made out of His substance, and who does not at all participate in the nature or substance of Him who is unbegotten." The mind grows dizzy in this exalted region of speculation, and thought trembles as it dogmatizes on the eternal nature of the internal "relations" in the nature of the "absolute" and Infinite God; but if we follow out the logical conclusions that are involved in the denial of the orthodox statement on this transcendental theme, it is more easy to understand the abhorrence with which the dogmatic negations of the Arians were regarded by the Catholic church. The position taken by Arius and Eusebius involved a virtual Dithesism, and re-opened the door to a novel Polytheism. After Christianity had triumphed over the gods of heathendom, Arius seemed to be re-introducing them under other names. The numerical unity of God was at stake in these speculations; and a schism, or at least a divarication of interests in the Godhead, seemed to be possible. Moreover the "Divinity" of the Incarnate Word was on this hypothesis less than God; and so behind the Deity which He claimed there loomed another Godhead, between whom and Himself antagonism might easily be predicated. The Gnosticism of Marcion had already drawn such antagonism into sharp outline, and the entire view of the person of the Lord, thus suggested, rapidly degenerated into a cold and unchristian humanitarianism.

The exigencies of historic criticism and of the exegesis of the New Testament compelled the Arian party to discriminate between the Word, the divine nature of God, the Son, and the Logos. They could not escape the conclusion, since God could never have been without His "logos," that the logos was in some sense eternal. They could not honestly apply their negative formulæ to the logos, and so took advantage of the distinction drawn in the Greek schools between \textit{λόγος} and

\textit{λόγος}, allowed that it answered to the eternal wisdom and also to the eternal manifestation of God, and discarding the trammels of the figurative expression by which the internal relations of the Godhead can alone be represented to us, they declared that they could not carry the materialistic or temporal accompaniments of our idea of Father and Son into this "generation," and boldly accepted the sublime paradox with which Origen had refuted Sabellianism, viz. the "eternal generation of the Son." To suppose the relation between the Father and Son other than eternal was to be involved in the argument of materialization and Gnostic speculation. As they were compelled to formulate expressions about the infinite and eternal God, they concluded that any formula which divided the essence of God left infinity on the one side, and the finite on the other, i.e. that there would be, on this hypothesis, an infinite difference even in majesty and glory between the Father and the Son. This was blasphemy to those who held the Divinity of the Son of God.

The controversy was embittered by the method in which Arius and Eusebius appealed to Holy Scripture. They argued that Godhead and participation in the divine nature were attributed to the Lord Jesus Christ in the same terms in which similar distinctions are yielded by God’s will and appointment to other creatures, angelic, human, or physical (Theod. H. E. i. 6, 8), and thus the rank in the universe of the Redeemer of the world might be indefinitely reduced, and all the confidence placed in Him ultimately proved to be an illusion. The method of argument had a tone of gross irreverence, even if the leaders can be quite acquitted of blasphemous levity or intentional abuse. It is difficult adequately to appreciate the wrath shown by Athanasius (\textit{Contra Arias}, Sermon. i. 1; \textit{De Conc. Anti. cap. ii}) against the mire chosen by Arius for the composition of his Thalia. He and Eusebius doubtless calculated the effect which would be produced by the elephantes joke which roused the ire of the church Fathers. At any rate, we can see that if the angle of the original controversy be almost microscopic to modern eyes, yet the arc subtending the angle may itself become infinite if we follow out to the full its legitimate consequences. Two nearly parallel lines may apparently correspond with two lines which intersect at a great distance, yet a measureless difference between them will manifest itself if we follow our two pairs of lines out into infinity.

One of the tactics adopted by the Arian or Eusebian party was to accuse of Sabellianism those who did not accept their interpretation of the relation between the Father and the Son. We can easily believe that many Arians, and many Catholics, who were not versed in philosophical discussion, were incapable of discriminating between the views of Sabellius and an orthodoxy which vehemently or unguardedly censured that the Son was coeternal with the Father. Sabellius repudiated violently the Pantheistic tenacity of the Sabellian doctrine. They dreaded a merely modal Trinity. It was perilous in their opinion to regard Father, Son, and Holy Ghost as merely subjective aspects of the Divine Being. They repudiated an "inversion of the Logos (which) became little more than a figurative personality of divine power in the life and conduct of a mere man." (Newman.) It was politic of them to charge Athanasius, Eustathius, Marcellus of Ancyra, and others, with Sabellianism, and endeavour to make the world, if not the church, believe that they alone held the Catholic faith, and that those who refused to tolerate their negative definitions were "impious heretics."

Eusebius of Nicomedia is the most prominent and most distinguished man of the entire movement. He has been confidently and plausibly accepted as the teacher rather than the disciple of Arius. Athanasius himself made the suggestion. At all events, we learn on good authority, that of Arius himself, that they were fellow disciples of Lucian of Antioch (Theodoret, H. E. i. 5). It is true that Lucian afterwards modified his views, and Eusebius is not infixed for the truth, but his rationalizing spirit produced a great effect on the schools of Antioch. Antioch was singularly prepared by Jewish prejudices, and by the remains of the Ebonitic and Essenic spirit which lingered in certain parts of Syria, Asia Minor, and Mesopotamia (Pauzéz of Samaria) to receive a rational of the person of Christ, which was deprived of its mystery and of its authoritative claims. Aristotelian logic was quickening an incipient nominalism, and broad eclecticism was growing rank in the schools of Antioch. Lucian imbibed and consecrated the tendency. Eusebius submitted to his influence before he came into a relation with the Arians. According to Ammianus Marcellinus, Eusebius was a distant relative of the emperor Julian, and therefore possibly a relative of Constantine.

We know nothing further of his early life, nor how he came to enter or serve the church. Constantine implies that at one time he was the friend and supporter of Licius. It may have been through the wife of Licius and sister of Constantine that he received his first ecclesiastical appointment. This was the bishopric of Beirut (Beirut) in Syria, the port which was much used by all travellers from Antioch or Damascus to the West. We cannot say under what pretext he was translated to the episcopal see of Nicomedia, a city which since the accession of Diocletian was still the principal seat of the imperial court. The Eclectic Letter of the Egyptian Council comments severely on the step: "He left the one see contrary to the law, and contrary to the law invaded the other; he deserted his own see, for he failed in affection, and took possession of another's, though he failed in a plea." In Nicomedia the ambitious spirit of Eusebius, and personal relations with the imperial family, gave him much influence. "He was," says Sozomen, "a man of considerable learning, and held in high repute at the palace." The palace and cathedral of Nicomedia were memorable in the history of Christianity (Diocletian), and her were spun the webs by which the Arian conspiracy for a while prevailed over the faith and discipline of the church. One of the most authoritative documents of Arius is a letter sent by Arius to Eusebius of Nicomedia, when stung by what he describes as his persecution and afflictions, following the first suspension of his presbyterical functions at Baulacis, Alexandria, and in which [Aureus] he reminds Eusebius of their ancient friendship, and briefly states his own views. He boasts that Eusebius of Caesarea, Theodotus of Laodicea, Paulinus of Tyre, Athanasius of Anazarbus, Gregory of Berytus, Athius of Lydda, and all the bishops of the East, if he is condemned, must be condemned with him (Theod. H. E. i. 5). It is true that Lucian afterwards modified his views, and Eusebius is not infixed for the truth, but his rationalizing spirit produced a great effect on the schools of Antioch. Antioch was singularly prepared by Jewish prejudices, and by the remains of the Ebonitic and Essenic spirit which lingered in certain parts of Syria, Asia Minor, and Mesopotamia (Pauzéz of Samaria) to receive a rational of the person of Christ, which was deprived of its mystery and of its authoritative claims. Aristotelian logic was quickening an incipient nominalism, and broad eclecticism was growing rank in the schools of Antioch. Lucian imbibed and consecrated the tendency. Eusebius submitted to his influence before he came into a relation with the Arians. According to Ammianus Marcellinus, Eusebius was a distant relative of the emperor Julian, and therefore possibly a relative of Constantine.

9 The Benedicites make conjectures as to this relationship between Julian and Eusebius; Thiifmont, however, can see no good ground for them (Min. vi. 741).
EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDIA

trivial error, but not so far gone but that Paulinius, if he were to try, might put him right. He made the tacit assumption that the party of Alexandria asserted "too unbegotten beings," a position utterly denied by themselves. He repudiated strongly the idea that the Son was made in any sense out of the substance of God. In fact, he declares the Son "to be entirely distinct in nature and power," that the method of His origin is known only to God, not even to the Son Himself. Stress is laid by Eusebius on the use of the verb "created," in Prov. viii. 22-26. The term, he said, could not have been used if the "wisdom" of which the prophet was speaking was ἐκ ἀφωγόρως τῆς ἀθάνατης. "For that which proceeds from Him who is unbegotten cannot be said to have been created or founded either by Him or by another." The effect of the word "begotten" is reduced to its minimum by saying that the term is used of "things," and of persons entirely different in nature from God. "Men," "Israel," and "drops of dew" are in different scriptures said to be "begotten" of God. The meaning of ἀθάνατης, "the term cannot and does not carry similarity, still less identity of nature.

On the first exhibition of the divergent opinions of Alexander and Arius, the emperor Constantine treated the conflict as if it were one capable of easy adjustment by a wise exercise of Christian temper. In the year 324 he wrote them a joint letter, which he entrusted to Hosius of Cordova (Sozomen, H. E. i. 16), in which he called upon the disputants for his sake, and for the sake of peace, to terminate their controversy. The dispute was a "trifling and foolish verbal dispute," and he called on the disputants to regard the problem as secondary, and to urge that any difference of judgment was compatible with union and communion on their part. It is highly probable that the mind of Constantine had been led to this step by the Bishop of Nicomedia, while the strong pressure put upon Alexander to receive Arius into communion of the Nicene Church, and the persistent demand of the Eusebians. The effort at mediation failed, although it was conducted by the skilful diplomacy and tact of the venerable Hosius. As the dispute was no mere verbal quibble, but did in reality touch the very object of Divine worship, the ground of religious hope, and the unity of the Godhead, such words of remonstrance poured fresh oil on the flame. Arius was again condemned by a council at Alexandria, the entire East was disturbed, and the well-meaning interference of the emperor augmented the acrimony of the disputants. The angry letter of Constantine to Arius, which must have been written after his condemnation by the Alexandrian council and before the council of Nicæa, shows that the influence of Eusebius must now have been in abeyance. Though Constantine was not a theologian, he hated a recalcitrant subordinate in church or state, and hence the undoubted vacillation of his mind towards Alexander, Arius, Eusebius, and Athanasius. The next appearance of Eusebius is at the ocumenical council of Nicæa in 325, where he does not hesitate to play the part of the defender of the excommunicated presbyter, and to be the advocate and interpreter of his opinions before the council. We must concede to him some credit for moral courage in risking his position, not only as a bishop, but as a court favourite, for the sake of his theological views, and in opposing himself almost single-handed to the nearly unanimous judgment of the first representative assembly of the Christian episcopate—a judgment now fanned into enthusiasm by the breath of martyrs and monks from the African monasteries, and accepted hurriedly but passionately by the emperor of the world. The courage was of short duration, and made way for disinclined wiles. He soon displayed an inconsistent and temporizing spirit. Whether he continued to hold that the discussion covered a merely verbal difference, we know not, but it is certain that when the Arian bishops in the council found that the Godhead of the Redeemer was declared by the vast majority to be of the very essence of Christ, they made every effort to accept the terms in which that Godhead was being expressed by the council, making signs to each other that term after term, such as "Power of God," "Wisdom of God," "Image of God," "Very God of very God," might be accepted because they could use them of such divinity as was "made" or "subtended" as such by the Divine appointment. Thus they were becoming parties to a test, which they were at the same moment intending to evade. The term ἡμοουσια, as applied to the Son of God, rallied for a while their conscience, and Eusebius declared it to be untenable. According to Theodoret (i. 9), the "formulary pronounced by Eusebius contained undiscerned evidence of his blasphemy; the reading of it occasioned great grief to the audience on account of the depravity of the doctrines; the writer was covered with shame, and the impious writing was torn to pieces." This absurdity and inconsistency of the Arian party is exaggerated by Theodoret, for he adds, "the Arians unanimously signed the confession of faith adopted by the council." This is not precisely the case. There were seventeen bishops (Soz. i. 20), who in the first instance refused their signatures, among them both the Eusebius, Theognis of Nicæa, Menophantus of Ephesus, Secundus of Potamia, Theonas, Patrophilus, Narcissus, Maris, and others. Eusebius of Caesarea, after long discussion, signed the symbol, which was in fact an enlargement of a formal creed that he had himself presented to the council in its entirety, on the ground that the negative dogmas of the Arian party, which were antagonized by the council, could not be found in Scripture. Others of his party followed. According to Theodoret (i. 9), they all, with the exception of Secundus and Theonas, joined in the condemnation of Arius, and Sozomen (i. 21) declares explicitly that Eusebius of Nicomedia, with others, "sanctioned" the decision of the synd to the consubstantiality of the Son, and the excommunication of those who held the Arian formulae; but Sozomen goes on to say that "it ought to be known that Eusebius and Theognis, although they agreed to the exposition of faith set forth by the council, neither agreed nor subscribed to the deposition of Arius." He may have drawn a distinction between anathematizing his supposed views, and consenting to the ecclesiastical and civil degradation of the man. Otherwise these two statements are somewhat inconsistent. Sozomen, apparently, makes this refusal to sign, on the part of Eusebius and Theognis, to have been the reason or occasion of their own exile, and of the filling up by Constantine of their respective sees with Amphion and Chrestus. Philostorgius seems, in the fragments of his worthless history which remain, to have put another colour upon the transaction. He admitted that the whole rank and file of the Arian party, with the exception of Secundus and Theonas, signed the symbol, and adds that they did it deceitfully (δε δεα), and with the mental reservation of substituting in their case ὑστερον (of similar substance), for ἀναθηματος (of the same substance). He adds, according to his editor, that they did this under the direction of Constantine, the sister of Constantine; and further he relates that "Secundus, when sent into exile, reproached Eusebius for having signed, saying that he did so in order to avoid going into exile, and that Secundus expressed a confident hope that Eusebius would shortly be exiled, an event which took place three months after the council." Moreover Athenasius (de Decretis Syn. Nic. cc. 3, 18) expressly says that Eusebius signed the formulary, and made no reference to any reservation of either kind.

Notwithstanding their signature, for a reason which is not cleared up perfectly, Eusebius and Theognis were banished for nearly three years from their respective sees. Theodoret (H. E. i. 20) preserves a portion of a letter written by the emperor Constantine against Eusebius and Theognis, and addressed to Nicea. The document displays bitter animosity, and, for so actute a prince, a curious simplicity. Considerable confusion accompanies it, and Baronius has seen fit to assign its composition to a much later period. As it refers to the period of the Nicene council and the feeling then existing between Constantine towards Eusebius, it is important. Constantine reveals a private grudge against Eusebius for his conduct when Licinius was contending with him, and he professes to have seized the accomplices of Eusebius, and to have possessed himself of damaging papers and trustworthy evidence against him. He reproaches Eusebius with having been the first defender of Arius, and with having deceived him in hope of retaining his benefits. This is coupled with angry reference to the conduct of Eusebius in urging on Alexandrians and others the duty of communion with the Arians. And this pertinacity is suggested by Constantine as the actuating cause and occasion of his exile.

Now Epiphanius (Haer. lviii.) 1 details the circumstances of the union of the Melitian schismatics with the Arians, and the disinterested part taken by Eusebius in promoting his good offices with the emperor, if they are their turn would promote the return of Arius to Alexandria, and would promise intercommunication with him and his party. "I was myself deluded and deceived by Eusebius," said Constantine. "In everything he acted according to the desire of him whose mind is full of evil. . . . I sent orders for the apprehension of certain individuals in Alexandria who oppose our faith (i.e. Arians), but those good and excellent bishops who by the clemency of the council had been admitted to penitence (i.e. Melitians), not only received them under their protection, but also participated in their evil deeds. Hence I came to the determination of banishing those ungrateful persons to some far distant region." This, doubtless from its connexion, refers to Eusebius and Theognis.

The terms of hatred and disgust with which Constantine speaks of Eusebius in this letter, render his early return to Nicæa very puzzling. Sozomen (ii. 16) and Socrates (i. 14) both record a letter which in the year A.D. 328. Eusebius and Theognis wrote, not to Constantine, but to "the Bishops," explanatory of their views, in which they endeavoured to prove that they had the same faith that you do, and that after a diligent examination of the word ὑστερον, we are wholly intent upon preserving peace, and that we are seduced by no heresy. Having proposed for the safety of the church such suggestions as occurred to us, and having certified what we deemed requisite, we signed the confession of faith. We did not certainly sign the ordinance, but this was not because we impugned the confession of faith, but because we did not believe the accused to be what he was represented to us, the letters we had received from him and the discourses he had delivered in our presence compelled us to entertain a contrary opinion of him. So far from opposing any of the decrees enacted in your holy synod, we asent to all of them—not because we are wearied of exile, but because we wish to avert all suspicion of heresy. . . . The accused having justified himself and having been recalled from exile, &c. &c. we beseech you to make our supplication known to our most holy emperor, and that you immediately direct us to act according to your will. If this letter is a genuine utterance of the mind of Eusebius, it demonstrates the fact of his partial and incomplete signature of the symbol of Nicaea, and that the incompleteness turned on personal and not on doctrinal grounds. It vindicates somewhat the character of Eusebius, as it assigns the cause of the exile to that inchoate signature, it implies the return of Arius from exile, independently of his personal influence, and reveals what must be granted to be a certain chivalrous regard to the character and safety of Arius. Other statements of Sozomen (ii. 27) are in harmony with it, for he relates that an Arian priest was on terms of intimacy with Constantina (sister of Constantine and widow of Licinius), who represented to her that Arius was the victim of Alexander's personal enmity. Sozomen further states that she, as a dying request, besought Constantine not to leave good men in perpetual banishment, and that this induced Constantine to permit Arius to draw up an artfully devised document expressive of his faith, which satisfied a synod of bishops at Jerusalem, and was enough to placate the vacillating mind of the emperor.

1 Letter of Constantine (Thed. i. 29).

There are reasons for hesitating to receive these statements. The part said to be taken by Constantine in the return of Arius is hampered by serious chronological difficulties;² but the letter itself is in obvious contradiction with the evidence already offered that Eusebius and Theognis signed the symbol, anathemas and all. If they had not signed, they would have been banished then and there, and not as Philostorgius says, "three months after the council," in Nov. 325. Even Socrates implies it was after the council. The banishment could not have taken place in the midst of the trials of Athanasius, or he would have in his numerous references to Eusebius have mentioned it. De Broglie³ urges that it would be much more probable that some other influence brought to bear on Constantine should have first secured the return of the bishops, and then that they should have secured the recall of Arius from exile. The circumstance that it would have been addressed to the bishops rather than to Constantine is treated as suspicious, because Eusebius had not been condemned by them, seeing he had signed the formulaires. The alleged spuriousness of the letter, on the other hand, rests upon the assertions of Philostorgius (i. 54) and Epiphanius (vi. 5) that Eusebius did join in the anathemas and sign in toto. Are we to believe them against the conjoint testimony of Sozomen and Socrates, who expressly give a consistent representation of another kind, and one undoubtedly more favourable to Eusebius? The difficulty about the recall of Arius was solved by a statement of Sozomen (i. 22) that Eusebius and Theognis secured the return of Arius to Alexandria, whereas the letter given by Sozomen and Socrates merely refers to his recall from exile.

The most powerful argument of De Broglie and others against the genuineness of the letter, as being written after the exile of Eusebius, is the silence of Athanasius, who never once makes use of the argument it would have put into his hands, as to the identity of the position and sentiments of Arius and Eusebius.

Philostorgius⁴ tells us another rumour that after the council Eusebius desired to have his name expunged from the list of signatories, and a similar statement is repeated by Sozomen (i. 21) as the possible cause of the banishment of Eusebius. The fact may, notwithstanding the adverse judgment of many historians, have been that Eusebius signed the formululary, expressing at the time the view he took of its meaning, and how he discriminated between an anathema of certain positions and the persecution of an individual. It is probable that a signature, thus qualified, may have saved him from immediate banishment, that in the course of three months his sympathy with Arius as a deposed and banished man provoked old sores in the mind of Constantine, and his underhand proceeding with the Meletians roused the emperor's indignation and led to his banishment. The probability that Arius was recalled first, as positively stated in what purports to be a contemporary document, is certainly greater than that merely a priori probability on which De Broglie insists. Moreover, if Arius had been restored to favour, the vacillating mind of Constantine may have been moved to recall the two bishops. At all events, about 329 we find Eusebius once more in high favour with Constantine (Socrates, H. E. i. 23), discharging his episcopal functions, persuading Constantine that he and Arius held substantially the creed of Nicea.

The course thenceforward pursued by Eusebius was to use his great power at the court, and the ascendancy he had already acquired over the mind of Constantine to blast the character and quench the influence of the most distinguished advocates of the anti-Arian views. He put all the machinery of church and state into operation to unseat Athanasius, Eustathius, Marcellus, and others; and by means which are open to the severest reprehension, he steadily and unscrupulously strove to enforce his latitudinarian compromise on the Catholic church. In the first place, it is not difficult to trace his hand in the letter Constantine addressed to Athanasius, now archbishop of Alexandria,⁵ in which Constantine threatened Athanasius with depositional if he did not admit to the church those who were anxious for such communion. Moreover, Athanasius assures us that Eusebius wrote to him personally with the same object in view.

The answers rendered by Athanasius both to Eusebius and to the emperor made it clear that the project could never succeed so long as Athanasius remained at Alexandria. This was the occasion on which the Meletians were encouraged to concoct the earliest of those charges against the honour, sobriety, and loyalty of Athanasius, which for a quarter of a century were almost lifted into artificiis stantis vel cadentis evincendae.

While the charges against Athanasius were in process of incubation, considerable controversy had prevailed between Eusebius of Caesarea and Eustathius of Antioch on the true meaning of the important term Homousios, and while Eustathius [Eusebius (Gusar)] in his great zeal for the Nicene faith, had unscrupulously refused to admit Arians into communion, he laid himself open, in the opinion of Eusebius of Caesarea, to the charge of Sabellianism (Soz. ii. 18). This provided the opportunity for Eusebius of Nicomedia to strike a blow at one of the pillars of the Nicene formululary. Nothing can exceed the treachery shown by Eusebius on this occasion. His apparently friendly visit to Eustathius, on his way to Jerusalem (Soz. ii. 19; Theod. i. 21), the gathering of his supporters and rallying of the Arian notables, on his return to Antioch, shew the scheme to have been deeply laid. ⁴ "Eusebius," says Athanasius, "caused the emperor to write to me." (Apol. contr. Aris., 59; Soz. ii. 22; Soz. l. 27.)
or beginning of 331, the council of his friends was held at which the charge of Sabellianism was, according to Theodoret (i. 21) and Philostorgius (ii. 7), gravitated by the accusation brought by a woman, that Eustathius was the father of her child.

Socrates makes no distinct mention of the latter charge, and it must be remembered that this was not an uncommon device of the enemies of ecclesiastics. We may charitably hope that Eusebius was not a party to the odious incrimination, but it is obvious that some such charge was brought, for Sozomen speaks of the accusation of "unholy deeds," and Eusebius, the historian, appears to confirm it. The upshot was that, through this and other vexed-up charges of disrespect to the emperor's mother, the bishop of Antioch was deposed and exiled by the Eusebians.

The letter of Constantine upon the affair, and against heretics generally, brought the controversy to a close, until the death of Athanasius. The career of Eusebius of Nicomedia during the remaining ten years of his life is so closely intertwined with the romantic sufferings of Athanasius that it is difficult to indicate the part he took in the persecution of Athanasius without reproducing the story of this great hero of the Catholic faith.

The first charge which Eusebius encouraged the Meletians to bring against Athanasius concerned his taxing the people of Egypt for linen vestments, and it turned upon the supposed violence of Macarius, the representative of Athanasius, in the act of reproving (for uncanonical proceedings) Ischyros, a priest of the Cuthian sect, upon the overthrow on that occasion of the altar and the chalice. These charges were all absolutely disproved by Athanasius before Constantine at Nicomedia. On the return of Athanasius to Alexandria he had to encounter fresh opposition. The well-known but probably unhistorical story of the murder of Arsenius, with its grotesque accompaniments, was gravely laid at his door. [Arsenius; Athanasius.] To this, at first, he disdained to reply. Eusebius declared even this to be a serious charge, and made much capital out of the refusal of Athanasius to attend the council at Csesarea, which was investigated, and Constantine was already on the eve of his public reception. A.D. 335, at the council of Tyre, Athanasius was compelled to attend, and meet a complicated series of accusations of the most varied character. Though these charges were refuted in the most convincing manner, Athanasius had no chance with his infuriated colleagues, who sat as his judges, and who refused even the evidence of their own senses in favour of the accused prelate, and he fled to Constantinople, to lay his case once more before the emperor. In his absence, the council of Tyre passed a sentence of deposition, which Arsenius, who was said to have been murdered by him, and who had confessed his sin and shame in extant letters to Athanasius, actually signed. Constantine summoned the whole synod of Tyre before him, Eusebius and a few of his party, Theognis, Patrophilus, Valens, and Ursicius, obeyed the summons, and confronted Athanasius. Instead of standing on the veracity of the disputed charges, upon which nevertheless the sentence of deposition rested, Eusebius and his friends met him with new accusations, likely to damage him in the view of the emperor. When Athanasius protested that he was utterly unable to do that which was alleged, viz., prevent the importation of corn from Alexandria to Constantinople, Eusebius thundered him down with the declaration that he was a rich man, and could do what he pleased. Constantine yielded to the apparently malicious invectives of Eusebius, and banished Athanasius to Tyries, in Feb. 335. The cause of banishment is given as that, as Sozomen says nothing about the delay of the corn-ships, while Athanasius himself (Apol. c. Ar.) says that this charge had been raised in Constantine's own letters. The statements of the Apology (§ 8, § 87) are slightly divergent, and twice over (Ap. § 87, Hist. Ar. § 53) Athanasius declares that Constantine sent him to Tyre that in order to deliver him from the fury of his enemies. While Athanasius was in exile, Eusebius and his party aimed a second blow, by impeaching Marcellus of Ancyra for refusing to appear at the Council of Dedication at Jerusalem, A.D. 335, and also for the sale of souls, an implication of heresy to which he exposed himself while zealously vindicating his refusal to hold communion with Arians. [Artemius; Marcillecta.] Marcellus was deposed by the Eusebians, and not restored to this see till the council of Sardica reinstated him.

Arius was present at the Council of Debra, at Jerusalem, and having propounded a view of his faith, which was satisfactory to the council, he was received into the communion of the church, and sent by Eusebius to Alexandria, whence, as his presence created great disturbance, he was summoned to Constantinople. There Eusebius had planned his public reception into the church. The tragic end of Arius on the eve of his public reception, A.D. 336, is described by Sozomen (ii. 29, 30) in words quoted from Athanasius. (De morte Arios, Ep. ad Episc.) The death of Alexander of Constantinople followed very shortly, in 336, when the effort to elect Cyril in his place (without the consent of the bishop of Nicomedia) roused the ire of Eusebius, who intrigued to secure his first deposition. Eusebius must still have retained the favour of Constantine, as he appears to have administered baptism to the dying emperor, May 337. Jerome says that by this act Constantine avowed himself an Arian. "But all history protests against the severity of this sentence." (De Brogle.) Hefele supposes that Constantine regarded Eusebius as the great advocate of Christian unity, and as one who felt it to be right to expel from positions of importance and influence in the church those who were stumbling-blocks in the way of his comprehensive charity. Moreover, in this year of Constantine, Eusebius was one who had signed the Nicene symbol, and had renounced the secessions of Arius. Philostorgius (ii. 1) believed that Eusebius was the Arian priest to whom Constantine entrusted his "will," for presentation to his son; it is far more probable that this functionary was the Arian priest called by later writers Eustathius, who at sundry important epochs exercised much influence over him. There is reason to think that Constantinian before his death had determined to recall Athanasius, and this is the ostensible ground on which Constantine II (Emperor of the West) took the steps necessary to secure that result. The ecclesiastical historians of the period often differ in their chronology, and perplex us by their divergent statements as to the time when Eusebius was raised to the episcopate of Constantinople. Those who state that Eusebius was unlawfully translated from Nicomedia to Constantinople, in direct violation of that canon which prohibits bishops and presbyters from going from one city to another, and he asserts that this took place on the death of Alexander. There is, however, proof of another kind that Paul, who was twice banished through the influence of Eusebius, was the immediate successor of Alexander.

Paul was nominated by Alexander, but the Eusebian party put forward Macedonius (Soz. iii. 4), and were defeated. The dispute thus occasioned was turned against Constantine, and through the machinations of the enemies of Paul a synod was convened, and he was expelled from the church, and Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, was installed in the bishopric of Constantinople, and with this statement Socrates (ii. 7) agrees. Paul's first occupancy of the see must have been brief and troubled. Differences have been raised as to the time when Paul was first banished, and whether he suffered from the Eusebian charges before or after his elevation to the bishopric. It would seem that he was bishop when Athanasius visited Constantinople, and this visit is supposed by Pagi to have been made to his own instance, from the preoccupation desire he had to advance the interests of the Catholic party in the Constantinopolitan church. According to him Athanasius must have been witness of the discomfiture of Paul and the steps which led to the election of Eusebius. For a while the education of Julian was entrusted to the courtly bishop, who had unbounded influence over Constantine. Gibbon says that Julian never expressed any gratitude to Eusebius for his instruction. Baronius suggests, with unscrupulous bitterness, that Julian's apostasy may be attributed, in part, to the time-serving spirit of compromise conspicuous in the career of Eusebius. However that may be, the course taken by Constantine was in the main due to Eusebius.

In 340 the Eusebius held a synod at Antioch, at which Athanasius was once more condemned. In 341 (May) the council developed into the celebrated council in Eusebius, held also at Antioch, which, under the presidency of Eusebius or Placitus of Antioch, and with the assent and presence of Constantius, diverse canons were passed, which are esteemed of authority by later ecclesiastical councils. These two councils are confused and identified by Socrates (ii. 2), and by Sozomen, and strange complications have arisen from the supposition that what was treated as a true synod by Julius, and was termed by Hilary a Synodus Sanctorum, could possibly have passed resolutions condemnatory of Athanasius.

The history of this controversy does not belong to the life of Eusebius. The cruel injustice to which Athanasius was subjected by long exile is freely attributed to Eusebius, as its mainspring and constant instigator. Nevertheless the last thing we are told about Eusebius by Socrates (ii. 13) is that he appealed from the council of Antioch to Julius, bishop of Rome, to give the definitive sentence as to the faults and sins of Athanasius, but that before the sentence of Julius reached him, he immediately after the council broke up, breathed his last, and went out of his body, and so he died," A.D. 342. Gregory of Tours gives the following account of him: "A Parisian bishop died: his brother Faramodus, a priest, was a candidate for the office, but one Eusebius, a merchant of Syrian birth, by dint of many presents obtained the see. Made bishop he dismissed the whole schola (according to Ruinart, the readers, singers, and others who were under the direction of the archdeacon) of his predecessor, and appointed his fellow- countrmen to the offices of the church. Eus- ebius, however, did not enjoy his honours long, and on his death he was succeeded by the Faramodus or Faramundus, whom he had dis- appointed. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 26 in Mign. Patr. Lat. Lxxi. 558; Gall. Christ. vii. 22.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (71), bishop of Pelusium, between Ammonius and Georgius. He was present at the council of Ephesus in 431 (Mansi, iv. 1127 A, 1129 B, 1366 D, v. 615 c). His contempor- ary lairdore, abbot of Pelusium, depicts him in the darkest colours. Eusebius, according to this account—which we have no means of checking—was a man of some taste and some ability, an "agreeable" preacher (Ep. i. 112; ep. v. 301), but at once hot-tempered (v. 196; ep. iii. 44) and easily swayed by men yet worse than himself (Ep. ii. 127; v. 451); his hands were not clear of simoniacal gain, which he employed in the building of a splendid church (i. 37; ii. 133); he "entrusted the flock to dogs, wolves, foxes" (v. 147), "the monasteries to herdsmen and runaway slaves" (i. 262); he was forgetful of the poor, and inaccessible to re- monstrance (iii. 282). His confidants were Lucius, the archdeacon, who was said to take money for ordinations (i. 29); Zosimus, a priest, who disgraced his grey hairs by vices which exceeded those of his youth (i. 140; ii. 75, 205, &c.), and took to himself contributions meant for the poor (Ep. v. 210); and three deans, Eustathius, Anatolius, and Maron (Ep. i. 228; ii. 28, 29, &c.), with whom Gotthius (Ep. ii. 10), Simon, and Chaeremon (Ep. v. 48, 373) are associated. The greediness of those who ad- ministered the church property was insatiable (Ep. v. 79). The offences of these men, or some of them, were so great that men cried out against them as effective advocates of Epi- curanism (Ep. ii. 153, 230), and Isidore, bishop, had to tell his correspondents that he had done his best (as, indeed, many of his letters show, e.g. i. 140, 435; ii. 28, 39, &c.) to reclaim the offenders, but that the physician could not compel the patient to follow his advice, that "God the Word Him- self" could not save Judas (Ep. iv. 205), that a good man should not soil his lips by denouncing their conduct (Ep. iii. 229; v. 116), and that nothing remained but to pray for their conver- sion (Ep. v. 2, 105, &c.), and in the meantime to distinguish between the man and the mistake (Ep. ii. 59), and to remember that the un- worthiness of the minister hindered not the effect of the sacraments (Ep. ii. 32). But the fullest account of the misgovernment of the church of Pelusium is given in the story of Justinianus (Ep. ii. 127), whom Eusebius had ordained, and made "accusans" or charge- steward. He played the knave and the tyrant, treated the bishops as his tool, was more than once in peril of his life from the indignation of the citizens, went to Alexandria, was menaced by Cyril the archbishop with excommunication, but returned and was united to Cyril himself in participation in simony. These things, and such as these, induced many to leave Pelusium in disgust; the "altar lacked ministers" (Ep. i. 38); a pious deacon, such as Eutonius, was oppressed by Zosimus (Ep. ii. 131), and attacked by the whole clergy, to some extent out of subserviency to the bishop (v. 564).

Eusebius is not mentioned among the fathers of the council of Chalcedon in 451. In 457 he was assisted, along with Peter bishop of Majuma, at the ordination of Timotheus Aecurus for the see of Alexandria (Evag. H. E. ii. 8), and those who were parties to that proceeding are stated by Theodorus Lector (H. E. i. 9) to have been deposed bishops. The epistle of the four bishops to Anatolius (Cod. Encyc. in Mansi, vii. 533 A) represents the two bishops (here unnamed) who ordained Timotheus as having no commis- sion with the Catholic church. (Le Quien, Ori- chr. ii. 533; Tillem. Mem. xv. 747, 748, 788-788.) [W. B. and C. B.]

EUSEBIUS (72), bishop of Pergamon, one of the Arian seceders to Philippopolis from the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Mansi, iii. 159); Le Quien (Oriens Chri. i. 715) supposes him to be the same as Eusebius, one of the fifteen bishops who met in synod at Gougna in Paphlagonia, and condemned the heretical asceticism of Eustathius. The date of this synod is disputed. [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (73), fifth archbishop of Basa, succeeding Severus and followed by Marcellus. He subscribed two councils, the doubtful one of Cologne in 346, and that of Sardica in 347. (Gall. Christ. xi. 7; Mansi, ii. 1379, 1377.) [S. A. B.]
EUSEBIUS OF SAMOSATA

EUSEBIUS (74), seventh bishop of Sabratha, succeeding St. Trophimus, and followed by Eusebius, he was present at the second council of Orleans in 533 and the fifth in 549, and according to the life of St. Radeugundis by the nun Baudonivia (Migne, Patr. Lat. ixxii. 672) he summoned another council in conjunction with Leontius bishop of Bordeaux; but nothing further seems to be known of it. We learn from some verses of Venantius Fortunatus (lib. i. cap. xii, Patr. Lat. ixxviii. 74) that he founded a church in honour of St. Bibilnus, which Leontius completed. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1057; Mansi, Conc. viii. 838, ix. 138.)

EUSEBIUS (75) I, ST., fourth bishop of St. Paul de Trois Châteaux in Dauphine, between St. Sulpicius and St. Torquatus, lived perhaps about the beginning of the 3rd century. His day of commemoration is March 23. (Gall. Christ. i. 705; Gams, Series Episc. 615.)

EUSEBIUS (76) II, fourteenth bishop of St. Paul de Trois Châteaux, between Victor and Bette. He represented his predecessor at the council of Lyons in A.D. 567. His bishop, he was one of the subscribers of the second council of Valence, in 584 or 585, and, through a delegate, of the second council of Mâcon, A.D. 585. He is said to have died on March 23, and was honoured on that day in his own diocese. (Gall. Christ. i. 708; Mansi, Conc. ix. 788, 946, 978.)

EUSEBIUS (77), bishop of SAMOSATA. Samosata, the capital of Commagene on the Euphrates, distant from Cæsarea in Cappadocia about three hundred miles of difficult travelling, is interesting to the student of ecclesiastical history as being the early home of Paul, bishop of Antioch, between the years 260-270, whose monachism took a purely Unitarian form, denying the divine element in the person of Christ. Samosata is interesting between the years 360-375, as being the seat of the bishopric of Eusebius, the friend alike of Basil the Great, of Meletius, and of Gregory Nazianzen. All that is definitely known of Eusebius is gathered from the epitaphs of Basil and of Gregory, from some apocryphal texts, and from the fragments of a treatise on the History of Theodoret. The fervent and laudatory phrases in which these divines address their friend might suggest hyperbole if it were not so repeated and constant. We are compelled to admit that his personal character must have been lofty and pure, that he was treated with almost unique reverence, that his singular piety and extra-ordinary zeal commanded the respect of his enemies. Gregory assures Eusebius that the severe and almost fatal illness which prevented his paying him the respect of a visit when passing through Cappadocia, gave him less pain than the disappointment of not seeing his friend, with much more to the same effect. (Ep. xxvii. Greg. Naz. Opp. ed. Pruneus, Colon. vol. i. 792.) And in another letter (Ep. xxix.) he styles him a “pillar and ground of the truth,” a “light-bearer to the world,” a “gift of God to man,” “a rule of faith,” “all these things at once and more than these, together.” Gregory knew how to utter a panegyric, but this was in a private letter, and it corresponds with the equally exuberant way in which St. Basil of CHRIST. BIOGR.—Vol. II.

Cæsarea rejoices in his presence, deprecates his absence, and extols the effect of his teaching and the enthusiasm inspired by his virtues. He was probably much older than Basil, who speaks of him in 369 in most reverential terms. (Eph. xxiv. Basiliæ operæ, ed. Par. tom. iii. The quotations from Basil are made according to the Paris enumeration of the letters.) We find him bishop of Samosata in the year 361, when he took part in the consecration of Meletius as bishop of Antioch. At this time Meletius was in communion with the Arians, and a coalition of bishops of both parties placed the document affirming the consecration in the hands of Eusebius. Even Tillemont admits that at this time he must himself have been in communion with the Arians. Theodoret (ii. 31, 32), however, represents the election of Meletius as partly due to the ignorance of the Arians who, unaware of the real sentiments of Meletius, imagined that he was an adherent of their party and petitioned Constantius for his appointment. Moreover Theodoret says that Eusebius was a “noble defender and champion of the truth.”

Meletius very soon proclaimed in an explicit way his Nicene Trinitarianism, and opened himself to the usual charge of Sabellianism, and was banished by Constantius. Meanwhile Eusebius had “returned to his own city,” having in possession the written pledge of the appointment of Meletius to the see of Antioch. The Arians were anxious to destroy this proof of their complicity with the appointment of Meletius, and persuaded Constantius to demand, by a public functionary, the recovery of the document. Eusebius replied, “I cannot consent to restore the public deposit, except at the command of the whole assembly of bishops by whom it was committed to my care.” This reply incensed the emperor, who then wrote to Eusebius commanding him to deliver up the decree, threatening him with amputation of his right hand unless he complied with the injunction. Theodoret says that the threat was only meant to intimidate the bishop, if so, it failed of its effect, for Eusebius stretched out both his hands, exclaiming, “I am willing to suffer the loss of both my limbs rather than resign a document which witnesses the condemnation of the impiety of the Arians.” It is said that the bravery of Eusebius extorted the admiration of Constantius, who, however, shortly afterwards died.

On the accession of Julian many exiled bishops, orthodox and Arian, Donatist and Catholic, were restored to their sees. Among them Athanasius returned to Alexandria, and Meletius to Antioch. But in the interim, the orthodox, who had separated themselves from Eusebius, the Arian interloper, had favoured a separate community in Antioch, and they were unwilling to return to the mother church on the reappearance of the orthodox Meletius.

Eusebius of Vercelli and Lucifer of Cagliari undertook to reconcile the parties and establish concord. But Lucifer was baffled by the pertinacity of the disputants, and made matters worse by ordaining Paulinus over the orthodox episcopate, for giving a schismatical communion, which retained its separated church life for eighty-five years.

Tillemont hesitates to claim for Eusebius, as 2 B many writers have done, the honour of being the Christian confessor in the persecutions under Julian, who, according to Gregor. Naz. (Orat. c. Julianum, i. p. 133 n.c.), when suffering on the rack and finding one part of his body not as yet bruised and tortured, complained to the executors for not conferring equal honour on his entire frame. The persecution under Julian, notwithstanding the details recorded by Theodoret and Gregory (Orat. c. Julianum, iii. 7), was not of the character to render this treatment of a Christian bishop very probable. The death of Julian and the accession of Jovian gave liberty to the church, and facilitated the holding of synods at Alexandria and at Antioch in 363. Accius of Caesarea, who had hitherto been a zealous Arian and anxious to find himself on the winning side, induced his party to declare their adherence to the Nicene formula, with express acceptance of the great term Homousia, as one “very well interlaced of the fathers, interpreted and explained with commodious phrases and fit epithets,” and as incompatible with the “blasphemous doctrine of the last word not, according to him, “that the Son is born of the substance of the Father, and is in respect of substance similar to him.” (Socrates, iii. 25.) The synod held at Antioch adopted, with this explanation, the Nicene formulæ, and the document was signed by Meletius of Antioch, Eusebius of Samosata, Accius of Caesarea, and twenty-two other bishops. This circumstance seems to suggest that Eusebius up to this time, as well as Meletius, had not sufficiently cleared themselves from Arian proclivities, and were even then somewhat compromised by semi-Arian equivocations.

During and after the temporary lull in the imperial patronage of the Arian party, it is probable that the great exertions of Eusebius took place. He is represented as travelling in the guise of a soldier (Theod. iv. 13) through Phoenicia and Palestine, ordaining presbyters and covering a large tract that has since become known to Basil, who on the occasion of the death of Eusebius of Caesarea wrote to Gregory, (Bas. Ep. xlvii. Paris ed.) the father of Gregory of Nazianzus, advising the selection of Eusebius of Samosata to the vacant bishopric. The Paris editors of Basil plausibly suggest that the letter thus numbered was written by Gregory to Eusebius concerning Basil, rather than by Basil concerning Eusebius. The part which Eusebius did take in the election of Basil is well known, and though the strict interpretation of canonical rules might render such interference in the affairs of Cappadocia unsuitable, yet numerous instances occur of the like eagerness. The efforts made by Gregory the younger and Eusebius were crowned with success. Basil became bishop of Caesarea. The appointment gave Gregory extreme satisfaction, and in a letter (Greg. Naz. Ep. xxix.) charged eulogies he dilates on the intense satisfaction with which the visit of Eusebius to Caesarea had diffused through the community. The bedridden had sprung from their couches, and all kinds of moral miracles had been wrought by his presence.

From this time forward the correspondence between Basil and Eusebius reveals the prestige of their joint lives, and throws some light upon the history of the church. Two ecclesiastics are passionately eager for another one's society, and appear to have formed numerous designs for mutual interchange of visits, which fell through.

In 372 Eusebius signed, with Meletius, Basil, and twenty-nine others, a letter addressed to the Western bishops, in view of their common troubles from the presence of Arian opponents.
The letter is given (Basil. Ep. xxii. Paris ed.)
at length, and commences with the names of Meletius, Eusebius, Basilius, &c., in an order due to the dignity, character and age of the respective bishops, and a melancholy Jeremias it is, recounting disaster and disorder, uncanonical proceedings, and Arian heresy. The Eastern bishops feel it some solace to pour out their hearts to their brethren in Italy and Gaul, and trust to receive from them sympathy and advice. Great honour is paid to the unadulterated pristine purity, which the Western churches have preserved intact, while the Eastern must have been lacerated and undermined, and divided by heretical ideas and unconstitutial acts. Later in the same year Basil treats Eusebius to meet him at Phragmon in Armenia, where an assembly of bishops was to take place (Ep. xxcvii).
If Eusebius will or cannot attend the conference, neither will Basil; and in another letter (Ep.
xxvii.) he passionately urges him to visit him at Caesarea. Letters from Eusebius appear to have been received by Basil, who (Ep. c.) once more improves a visit at the time of the festival of the martyr Eusebius (Eusebius), since many things, said he, demand mutual consideration.

At the end of the year Basil (Ep. cv.) managed to accomplish the laborious journey to Samosata, and to secure from his friend the promise of a return visit. This promise, said he, had ravished the church with joy. In the following year, 373, Basil urged Eusebius to fulfill his promise, and (Ep. cv.) assured him that Jovinus had answered his expectations as bishop of Nicopolis.
Jovinus was a worthy pupil of Eusebius, and gratified Basil by his canonical proprieties.
Everywhere the edriver apatm of Eusebius exhibit the express image of his sanctity, γρηγορια ἄρες τοις χριστιανοῖς. It appears from other authorities (Tillemont, Art. iii.) that the said Jovinus relapsed afterwards into Arianism. The good offices of Eusebius were solicited by Eustathius of Sebasto, who had quarrelled with Basil, in order to bring about a reconciliation.
Basil's principle of "purity before reconciliation" convinced Eusebius of his wisdom and moderation.

The date of the council of Gangra is a great puzzle, but it was probably held in the year 372 or 373. At this council Eustathius of Sebasto, in Armenia, was condemned for Arian tendencies, and for hyperacetic practices, which amounted to something like the Manichean condemnation of matter. There has always been a difficulty in deciding who was the Eusebius mentioned prima loco in the heading of the synodal letter, as the see is not mentioned. It is perfectly conceivable that it should have by the term, the conflict need never have raged over it.

been the bishop of Samosata, and that as Basil estreated his advice with reference to Eustathius, he may have joined him, Hypatius, Gregory, and other of his friends, whose names also occur in this pronunciamiento. His age and moral eminence, and the enthusiasm of his friends about him, may have given him this prominent position. The canons of Gangra, twenty in number, are detailed with interesting comment by Hefele and others, who accepts the view of the Penny Cellier that it was held in 376, nor that of the Ballerini that it was held between 362 and 370, as this turns on the bare supposition that the Eusebius was no other than Eusebius of Nicomedia Constantinople. Hefele thinks the chronology entirely uncertain, and mainly on the grounds of the difficulty of this identification. I venture to make the above suggestion, which would throw considerable light on the practical character of the bishop of Samosata.

In the year a.D. 373 by a letter of Basil (Ep. xxixvi.) we learn that Eusebius had successfully interceded in his behalf with the emperor in the interests of his father and his tutor, who had been confined in a monastery at Ephesos under the protection of the pope. The diagram which Eusebius sent to his tutor in his own words is here given, and the possessors of the copybook, in much the same character, as that which the emperor received. From this, however, is only a supposition. Eusebius must be credited at this time with eager desires after personal and mutual recognition of church privileges between the East and West. Even Basil (Ep. xxixvi.) appears to suggest caution in the matter. As a result of which Eusebius was induced to visit Rome in the year 374. The Paris editors put at an earlier date, viz. a.D. 368 or 369, the letters (Ep. xvii. xxvii.) descriptive of Basil’s illness, and the fact that he was in the habit of being called the bishop of Basil to his friends, but whensoever written, they reveal the extraordinary, almost magical, confidence put by Basil in his brother bishop. He had been in fact personally healed by the intercessions of Eusebius, and now, since all medical aid has failed in the case of Hypatius his brother, he recommends him to Saint Pancras, to the care and prayers of Eusebius and his brethren. It is remarkable that Eusebius was allowed to remain undisturbed during the bitter persecutions of the orthodox at the hand of the emperor Valens. At length his hour came, and few pages in the history of the time are more vivid than those which portray the circumstances of his exile. Valens made a promise to the Arian bishop Eudoxius, who had baptized him, that he would banish all who held contrary opinions. Thus in the year 375 Meletius was expelled from Antiocch. (a second time), Pelagius from Laodicea, and Eusebius from Samosata.” (Thed. iv. 13.) The imperial summons demanded Eusebius’s instant departure to Thrace. (Thed. iv. 14.) Cellier (v. 3) places this event in 374. The officer who served the summons was hidden by Eusebius to conceal the cause of his journey. “For if the multitude (and Eusebius), who are all imbued with divine zeal, should learn your design they would drown you, and I should have to answer for your death.” After the conduct of worship, he took one domestic servant, a “pillow, and a book,” and started in the dead of night. “When he arrived at the banks of Euphrates, which washes the walls of the city, he leaped into a ferry-boat and desired the rowers to convey him to Zeugma, which he reached at break of day.” The effect of his departure upon his flock is graphically described by Theodoret. The clemency of the emperor, the entreaties to return to Samosata, and to brave the wrath of the emperor, the humble submission of the bishop to the will of the prince, are all told with a few striking sentences. Eusebius left a deep impression behind him. He had excited a persistent and intense antagonism to the views of the Arians, which assumed a very practical form in the church, and Eusebius was excommunicated. The emperor exiled Eusebius to a complete isolation. He was avoided as if smitten with deadly and contagious pest. The very water he used in the public bath was wasted by the population of the city as contaminated by his use of it. The repugnance being invincible, the poor man, inoffensive and gentle in spirit, retired from the unequal contest. His successor, Lucius, “who was a wolf and a receiver of the flock,” was received with scant courtesy. The children of the city spontaneously burned a ball which the ass on which the Arian bishop was mounted had accidentally trodden upon. Lucius was not conquered by such manifestations of dislike, and took counsel with the Roman magistracy to banish all the Catholic clergy. Meanwhile Eusebius by slow stages reached the banks of the Danube at a time when “the Goths were ravaging Thrace and besieging many cities.” On his way through Cappadocia he failed to see Gregory, who had been hanged by his master and regarded as a punishment for his own sins.1 The most vigorous eulogium is passed upon Eusebius for his power to console others. There was scarcely a strip of blue sky in the heavens at the time, but the faithfulness of Eusebius was a joy to the bishops of the East. The Arian bishop of Thrace received a noble letter from Eusebius, on the privilege of having seen and conversed with such a man (Ep. clxviii.), and Gregory thought his prayers for their welfare must be as efficacious as those of a martyr. Cellier seems to think that Basil enjoyed a passing interview with his friend. We see no sign of it. While Eusebius was concealed in his place of exile, Basil contrived to institute means of communication between him and his old flock. From one of Gregory’s letters (Ep. xxx.) it would seem difficult whether the vacant bishopric was filled, but, as we have seen, Theodoret was explicit on this head, and Basil (Ep. xcv.) while approving of the resistance made by the church to the pastoral offices of Eunomius, warned the clergy, with moving words, against internal commotion and dissension. Numerous letters passed between Basil and Eusebius more in the tone of young lovers than that of old bishops, and some interesting hints are given as to difficulty of communication. Eusebius was eagerly longing for letters, while Basil protested that he had written no fewer than four, which never reached their destination. The bad roads, the carelessness of the "runners," the illness of Basil himself, were regarded as some explanation of apparent neglect. Grave anxieties had arisen in his mind as to the ἀνεστάλης, and this he does not venture to commit to paper, but entrusts to a namesake of Eusebius, a reader. Basil (Ep. cxxvii. dated 376–380) was intending to have sent a letter to Eusebius to the vicar of Thrace, and also by a certain Ἱερομοιον of Philippiopolis, who was visiting his neighbourhood, but the vicar came late in the evening when he was busy at his work and left early in the morning, and so never received the letter. A like calamity occurred on the occasion of the visit of the "Praepotus," and thus, though his heart was bursting with news and anxiety, he had been compelled to keep them all to himself. The letter went on to speak of the vicar as a favourer of heretics, though he questions whether he was able, from the stress of his occupations and the character of his mind, to understand Christian doctrine. Still, he entered upon the active part of summoning an heretical synod in mid-winter in Galatia, and there had deposed Hypsinus on a worthless and unsustained charge, and appointed one Ecdicius in his place, and he had moreover endeavoured to force Eustathius of Sebaste on Nicopolis. In another letter to Eusebius (cxcxii.) he deplores the appointment of Ecdicius, complains bitterly of the treatment he received, and lack of fair dealing on the part of the Western church, Antiochus, who had been to see Eusebius in his exile and carry the news of his suffering to the church at Samosata, was among those whom Lucius the Arian bishop exiled, and had to retire to an exile in Armenia. But it is not least of the doom of the dawn of Basil, notwithstanding his intense orthodoxy, was far from happy in his estimate of the sympathy accorded to him by the Western church, and mysterious hints are not unfrequently dropped as to the sentiment entertained at Rome with reference to himself, Eusebius, and Meletius. In the year 377 Dorotheus found that the two latter were, to the horror of Basil, reckoned at Rome among the Arians. Basil (Ep. cclxvi.), addressing Peter of Alexandria, condemns the implicit charge with great bitterness, and justly asks whether their present suffering and banishment for their anti-Arian position was not a sufficient proof of the injustice of the accusation. The charge itself appears to have fallen through, and it appears that Eusebius suffered less fear from the barbarian ravages of the Goths than from this momentary assault on his honour.

In the year 378 the persecuting policy of the emperor Valens was brought to a close by his death. The emperor Gratian recalled the banished prelates, and gave peace to the Eastern church. Theodoret (H. E. v. 4, 5) expressly mentions the permission to Eusebius to return.

Notwithstanding the apparently non-canonical character of the proceeding, Eusebius ordained numerous bishops on his way from Thracae to the Epiphates. Acacius at Heraclea, Theodoret at Hierapolis, Isidore at Cyrus, Eulogius at Edeus, were among the number. All these names were appended to the creed of Constantinople. Barlaam conjectures that he was empowered by the council of Antioch to take this step. The council of 146 orthodox bishops was held in October of the year 379, at which Eusebius was present, and in the records of which his name follows that of Meletius. But a more plausible explanation is, that his virtue and the reverence he universally inspired, proved mightier than the letter of the canons.

It was when he was engaged in the like work, taking part in the ordination of Marist at the little town of Dolica (Theod. H. E. v. 4), that a woman charged with Arian passions hurled a brick, which fell upon his head, and wounded him fatally.

It was not improbable that he had other enemies, who were delighted at his tragic fall, at this moment of his triumph. A beautiful incident is recorded by Theodoret, to the effect, that the aged bishop in the bliss of having secured the crown of martyrdom and in the spirit of the proto-martyr, as well as of his Divine Lord, extorted promises from his attendants that they would make no search for his murderer. When the magistrates were ready to prosecute those who had clearly plotted the death of Eusebius, the Catholics earnestly besought pardon for them. The 21st June is the day on which the Eastern churches commemorate his so-called martyrdom. In the Roman calendar the 21st June is the day chosen for the same purpose. His nephew Antiochus probably succeeded him in the bishopric of Samosata. (Tillem. viii. 326; Celliner, v. 5.)

EUSEBIUS (78) II., bishop of Samosata is the latter part of the 5th century, deposed by the emperor Zeno at the instigation of Peter the Fuller, bishop of Antioch, on the plea that he was favouring the tyrants, but really because he rejected the Henoticon. (Theophan. ann. 482; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 956.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (79), bishop of Sebastae (Samaria), who signed the semi-Arian formula at Seleucia, A.D. 358. (Epiph. Hær. ixii. No. 28; p. 874, &c.; Mansi, iii. 324; Le Quen, Or. Christ. iii. 651.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (80), bishop of Seleucia Pieria, who signed the Acacian formula at Seleucia, 359. (Epiph. Hær. ixiii. No. 96; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 777; Mansi, iii. 324.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (81), bishop of Seleucopolis, in Syria, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 449 c, 494 c; Le Quen, Or. Chr. ii. 922.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (85), bishop of Siena, at the council of Rome in 465 (Ugb. Ital. Soc. iii. 528; Cappell. Le Ch. d'Ital. xvii. 373, 557; Mansi, vii. 959.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (83), bishop of Sunicza, in the province of Numidia, who was amongst those banished by Huneric, A.D. 484. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 291; Notitia in Victor. Vit. 56, Nigre, Patr. Lat. livit. [L. D.])

EUSEBIUS (84), ST., first bishop of Sutrium in Etruria, present at the synod of Rome in 465; in 487 the see was held by Constantius. (Cansani, vii. 759 e; Ugellii, Ital. Sac. i. 1274; Cap. Le Ch. d' Itai. xxiv. 267.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (85), bishop of Tarragona, from before 610 (? to about 632; signs among the metropolitan the (disputed) Decretum Gunde- marii in 610 [GUNCTHANAR]. In the letter in which Braulio asks St. Isidore for his Etymology (can. 631 or 632, apud Esp. Sgr. s. xrv. 322, 329) he speaks of Eusebius as just dead, and prays St. Isidore to use his influence with the king for the appointment of a suitable successor. Isidore replies (l. c.) that he will do his best, but that the king is not favourably inclined to the candidate mentioned by Braulio, and in 632 Guida signs the letter of Co. Toliv as metropolitan of Tarragona. To this Eusebius was addressed a curious and much discussed letter from the king Siebert (612–621), first published by Florez (Esp. Sgr. vii. 326) but well known to Spanish antiquaries before his day. The king's opening sentences speak in the most violent language of a letter just received from Eusebius, which, "omai contagione pollutam extremis vix attigimus mani- bus." Eusebius and his friends are accused of being the adherents of worthless causes, "inaniun —sectoreca causarum," and of having been led away, "miseric hominibus et infatul." The re- proach against Eusebius of having taken part in certain theatrical games and performances "ludis theatris tauroorum (or phanorum)," is universally believed. Who does not see what is so evident? The bishop has ventured to accuse publicly men devoted to divine things. Let him, however, not expect any further indulgence from the king, but a severe condemnation of the rule of the church of Barcelona "hic visu qui leo magis quam miserum placit hominibus." The matter is to be settled before the forth- coming Easter, so that "de ejus gaudeamus Pontifex optabili, et de vestra tandem vel eras concessions." This obscure and barbarously written letter was, however, not taken seriously, as was the case of the deposition of a Eusebius bishop of Barcelona, for participation in the games and spectacles which still in the 7th century maintained themselves all over Spain, and were essentially heathen in form and matter. (On the survival and gradual transformation of the ancient theatre in Spain, see Gaus, K. G. i. pt. i. 38–55, 126. Schack, Gesch. der dram. Lit. und Kunst in Spanien, Berlin, 1854, L. Amador de los Rios, Hist. de la Lit. Espaol, l. 441.) It is now, however, plain from Braulio's letter and the signature quoted above that Euse- bius was metropolitan of Tarragona, and that the king's letter refers to some opposition of his to the election of a certain candidate for the see of Barcelona (probably SEVERIUS, q. v.), whom the king was determined to see appointed. The mention of the games is apparently used as a threat to extort submission, and does not of necessity imply anything of the charge. The letter throws valuable light upon the state of episcopal elections at the time, and together with Isidore's letter to Braulio, and other cases, shews that when in the closely follow- ing fourth council of Toledo, special care was taken to define and re-affirm the canonical pro- cedure of election by clergy and people; conse- cration by metropolitan and comprovinciales, and confirmation by the crown (which is not men- tioned, but apparently taken for granted—C. Tol. iv. 10), the Spanish church, led by the great Isidore, was defending itself against certain very real, but at least in these cases at least, great abuses of the royal power. (Esp. Sgr. s. xrv. 82; Gams, K.-G. ii. pt. 2, 79; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324.) [M. A. W.]

EUSEBIUS (86), about the year A.D. 600, bishop of Thessalonica; author of a Letter to Andrew the Monk and Ten Books against the Errors of Andrew the Monk, which works are both lost. An account is given of them by Photius.

In 593 pope Gregory the Great addressed a letter to him, and the bishops of Dyrrhacium, Milan, Nicopolis, Corinth, Prima Justiniana, Crete, Larissa, Sardinia, and Sicily, on the subject of the decree of the emperor Maurice, which had declared all ecclesiastics subject to the rulers of their country, and had given certain instructions about admission to monasteries which Gregory altered.

In 598 the pope again wrote to Eusebius, on the subject of a presbyter named Luke, who with a certain Peter boasted that he did not receive the council of Chalcedon. There was also a letter on the subject of the title of uni- versal bishop, arrogated by the patriarch of Constantinople. In 600 Theodore, reader of the church of Thessalonica, was sent to Rome by Eusebius. For some reason Theodore entrusted the letters he was carrying to a monk named Andrew, with whom he had long been acquainted. The monk, actuated by an excess either of folly or of rage, publicly read the letter of Eusebius to the pope, that anybody reading it must have thought the writer a heretic or a fool; besides this he composed several discourses under the name of Gregory highly discreditable to that acute theologian; and committing the blunder of making him speak in Greek. The pope wrote an account of these forgeries to Eusebius, and begged him to suppress the discourses if they fell into his hands; confessing that he did not understand Greek and had never composed any work in that language.

Photius says that the monk Andrew, who belonged to the sect of the Aphthartodecas, wrote a letter also to Eusebius, begging him for God's sake to read it. Eusebius wrote him a very candid answer, saying that he did not know how to write, had made many blunders, and should never have broken the repose of his monastic life to undertake a duty for which he was so unift. He then confuted Andrew's chief errors, and exhorried him to retract. Andrew, however, composed a treatise in defence of his propositions, which produced from Eusebius the Ten Books. His style is said to have been plain and clear, sufficiently pure, and not without judgment. (Jugis, De synth. Graec. citi. p. 451; Fabricius, Bibl. Gracc. Harles. vii. 417; Dupin, *Escl. EUSEBIUS (87), 40th occupant of the see of Tours, succeeding Albertus and followed by Ostalbis, subscribed the council of Attignay in A.D. 765. He set, according to some sixteen, according to others, twenty years. (Mansi, xii. 675; Gall. Christ. xiv. 32.)

EUSEBIUS (89), bishop of Tyre, attended the second council of Constantinople, A.D. 553, and signed the acts. His name appears among those who invited pope Vigilius to the council. (Lalbe, v. 416, 429, 514, 581; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 809.)

EUSEBIUS (90), bishop of Valentinianopolis, in Proconsular Asia, by whom Antoninus, bishop of Ephesus, was accused in the spring of 400, before Chrysostom and the conclave of bishops sitting at Constantinople, of simony and other scandalous acts of avarice. Chrysostom perceiving that the moving cause of the delation was a personal quarrel between Eusebius and the accused party, endeavoured to induce him to withdraw the written charges, on the promise that he would investigate the case, and if proved, correct it. Eusebius, however, with much vehemence persisting in his accusation and refusing the cancellatory office of Paul, bishop of Hierapolis, presented the libel a second time to Chrysostom within the choir of the cathedral as he was about to commence the eucharistic office, calling on him, by the life of the emperor and other fearful adjurations, to attend to the charges it contained. Chrysostom was too much disturbed by Eusebius' violence to continue the service, and requesting Pansophius, a bishop of Pisidia, to take his place as celebrant, he retired with the rest of the bishops. Service over, he took his seat in the baptistery, and having summoned Eusebius before the conclave and warned him of the responsibility of bringing forward charges of so much importance, the bishop was bound to prosecute, the indictment was admitted and formally read to Antoninus, who met the several counts by a flat denial of their truth. The importance of the charges led Chrysostom to determine to investigate them on the spot. The intrigues of Antoninus' powerful friends, and the alarm caused by Gainas having prevented Chrysostom from leaving Constantinople, a commission of three bishops was appointed to hold a court at Hypeaepae, a town near Ephesus, to examine the charges in conjunction with the bishops of the province. If either accuser or accused failed to appear within two mouths, he was to be excommunicated. Both obeyed the summons, but only to frustrate the ends of justice. The hollowness of Eusebius' character, and the unreality of the righteous horror he had assumed were revealed when it was discovered that the accused and his accuser had come to terms, and that Eusebius had accepted a bribe from Antoninus to annul the prosecution by feigned delays. At first no witnesses were forth-coming, and when forty days had been granted for their production, instead of employing the time in looking them up, Eusebius went off to Constantinople and kept himself close, that no one might know where he was. The time allotted having expired, and neither Eusebius nor his witnesses appearing, the commissioners sent circular letters to the bishops of Asia pronouncing sentence of excommunication on him as a slanderer and a runaway. In spite of the summer heats, on which Eusebius had relied to drive the commissioners away before the expiration of the time they lingered on at Hypeaepae for another month, at the end of which they returned in despair to Constantinople. There they happened to fall in with Eusebius, who, ever ready with an excuse, when upbraided with his conduct, pleaded sickness as the cause of his delay, and promised that he would still produce his witnesses. Meanwhile Antoninus was removed by death from a human to a divine tribunal. The case of the six bishops who were involved in the accusations of simony and the partner in crime, however, was still prosecuted, and the death of Gainas in January, A.D. 401, having set Chrysostom at liberty, he crossed over to Asia, and arriving at Ephesus conducted the trial in person. The shameless Eusebius again appeared on the scene, declaring that he had been unjustly excommunicated, and claiming to be readmitted to communion. The bishops refusing to allow his claim on the ground of his having failed to substantiate his charges against his brethren, he reasserted their truth, and engaged to bring forward abundant evidence in support of his accusations. The evidence proved overwhelming; the accused, who at first denied their guilt, were driven to a humiliating confession of having obtained the episcopal rank by purchase, and were condemned to be deprived of their see. They were not, however, excommunicated, and the heirs of Antoninus were required to repay the purchase-money in each case. The latter history of this base and shameless man is unknown. (Pallad. Dial. pp. 128-140; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 711.)

EUSEBIUS (91), bishop of Valerina (Valera de Arriba, near Cuencas) in 633, when he subscribed the acts of the council of Toledo he was also signed the fifth council of Toledo in 636. He precedes thirty-eight bishops in the first case out of sixty-two, and signs fifteenth or fourteenth (? ) of twenty-four in the second (Mansi, x. 642. 855; Exp. úigur. viii. 203; Aguistle-Catalan, iii. 385).

EUSEBIUS (92), bishop of Vienne, placed by the Sammarthani in 374; he subscribed the acts of the synod of Nismes in 394. These acts are not to be found in the older collections, but are given by Hefele (Conc. Grec. b. 8, § 110) from a MS. lately discovered at Darmstadt (Gall. Christ. iii. 1213.)

EUSEBIUS (93), St., bishop of Vercelli (Vercelli), known for his zeal and sufferings in the cause of orthodoxy in the 4th century. He was born in Sardinia, but there appears no record of his life, except his death in Rome, and was there ordained a "reader," and in the year 340 was consecrated bishop of

Vercellae. St. Ambrose, in a letter addressed to the church of Vercellae (Ep. 63), gives Eusebius great praise for his devotion, and especially commends him as having been the first bishop in the West who joined the monastic discipline with the discharge of episcopal duties. He took several of his clergy to live with him, and adopted something of a monastic rule for their daily life. In 354 (Jaffé, Reg. Pontif., p. 10) he was asked by Libernus the bishop of Rome to go with Lucifer of Cagliari and others to the emperor Constantius, to suggest the summoning of a council, which might pronounce on matters of dispute between the Arians and the orthodox. The council was held in the next year at Milan. At first Eusebius absented himself from it. But he ultimately yielded to the united solicitations of the Arian party which led in the council, of Lucifer and Pancratius, the orthodox delegates of Libernus, and of the emperor Constantius, and took part in its deliberations. The proceedings of the council were committed to speech and the action of the bishop of Milan [DIONYSIUS (14)] was undecided. The practical question was whether the bishops present should sign a condemnation of Athanasius. Eusebius was so peremptory in refusing to do this as to excite the anger of the Ariantizing emperor, who banished him, together with some priests and deacons to Scythopolis in Syria. Patrophilus, a leading Arian, was bishop in Scythopolis, and Eusebius calls him his "jailer." In the course of his confinement here, two messengers arrived bringing a sum of money and assurances of good will from the churches of Vercellae and other neighbouring places to the exiled bishop. In a reply which he sent back by the hands of the messengers, and which has been preserved, Eusebius gives full particulars of the annoying treatment to which he was subjected at Scythopolis. He was a troublesome prisoner, having twice all been sentenced to death because he would not accept provisions from Arian hands. After a while he was removed to Cappadocia, and then to Egypt. From the Thebaid in Egypt he wrote a letter, which is extant, to Gregory, bishop of Elvira in Spain, praising his anti-Arian constancy.

Someem Julian, who succeeded Constantius in 361, permitted all banished bishops to return to their churches. Eusebius, being one to whom the interests of orthodoxy were paramount, did not hasten home at once, but went to Alexandria to consult with Athanasius. The two bishops agreed to convok a council, which was held in the year 362 at Alexandria. [ATHANASIUS, Vol. I. p. 197.] One of the objects of the council was to put an end to a schism at Antioch, and when its meetings were over Eusebius went thither as the bearer of a synodal letter or "tomé," addressed by the council to the Antiochenes. He found, however, on his arrival that he was too late. Lucifer of Cagliari had preceded him, and had aggravated the schism by the hasty consecration of Paulinus as a rival bishop; and Eusebius immediately withdrew from Antioch. [MELITIUS, PAULINUS.] Lucifer proceeded to renew communion with Eusebius and with the synod of Alexandria, the former of which, and the bishop of the Arian council, were willing to receive back bishops who repented of their connexion with Arian heresy.

Leaving Antioch, Eusebius made a tour amongst the Eastern churches, using his influence to confirm them in the orthodox faith. From the East he passed into Illyria, and so to Italy, which, in the words of Jerome, "put off its mourning on Eusebius's return."

He now joined with the zealous Hilary of Poitiers in endeavours to re-establish orthodoxy in the Western churches. With this view they stirred up opposition to the Ariantizing Auxentius bishop of Milan, but they were foiled by a profession of orthodoxy on the part of Auxentius. This was in 364. After this nothing is recorded of Eusebius until his death, which is placed by Jerome in the year 371.

The extant writings of Eusebius are three letters; one a brief answer to Constantius, announcing that he would attend the council at Milan, but would do there whatever should seem to him right and according to the will of God; the second to the men of the church at Vercellae and to Gregory of Elvira. They are to be found in Galland, Biblioth. Patrum, and in Migne, Patro. Lat. t. xii. Jerome mentions Eusebius as having translated, with the omission of what was heterodox, the commentaries on the Psalms of his namesake of Caesarea; and he also names him, with Hilary of Poitiers, as a translator of Origen and the same Eusebius; but nothing further is known of these translations. A famous "Codex Vercellensis" is thus described by Tregelles:—"A MS. of the 4th century, said to have been written by the hand of Eusebius bishop of Vercellae, where the codex is now preserved. The text is defective in several places, as might be supposed from its very great age. It was transcribed and published by Irici, at Milan, in 1748... This MS. is probably the most valuable exemplar of the old Latin in its unaltered state."

The chief authority for the life of Eusebius is St. Jerome, who gives him a place amongst his Viri Illustres, and makes allusions to him in his letters and elsewhere. There are several letters addressed to him by Libernus, and there are allusions to him in the works of Athanasius. Mention of him may be also found in the works of Hesychius, of Theodore, of Sozomen. The Sermoquae relating to him preserved in the works of Ambrose are admittedly spurious.

Priests.

EUSEBIUS (98), priests who were martyrs (Nos. 109, 112)

EUSEBIUS (96). Aug. 14, presbyter, confessor, at Rome, a.d. 358, and by some styled martyr. From the earliest times his name has been everywhere celebrated. A church dedicated to him is mentioned in the first council held at Rome under pope Synnachus, a.d. 498 (Mansi, viii. 236, 247). It was rebuilt by pope Zacharias, cir. 749 (Anastas. Lib. Pontif. art. Zacharias, p. 32). The facts of his history are very obscure. His Acts tell the following story...
EUSEBIUS—PRIESTS

(Baluz. Miscell. t. ii. p. 141.) Upon the recall of pope Liberius by the emperor Constantius, Eusebius preached against them both as Arians; and since the orthodox party, who now supported Felix, were excluded from all the churches, he continued to hold divine service in his own house. For this act of nonconformity he was arrested and brought before Constantius and Liberius, when he boldly reproved the pope for falling away from Catholic truth. Constantius thereupon consigned him to a dungeon four feet wide, where he continued to languish for seven months and then died. He was buried by his friends and co-presbyters Orosius and Gregory, in the monastery of Calistus, where they placed over him the simple inscription "Eusebio Hominem Dei." Constantius then arrested Gregory for his kindness to the body of his friend, and consigned him to the same dungeon, where he also died, and was in turn buried by Orosius, by whom the Acts of Eusebius profess to have been written. The Bollandist and Tillmont point out some grave historical difficulties in this narration, especially the fact that Constantius, Liberius, and Eusebius never could have been in the city together. Petrus de Natalibus gives us the story of a bishop Equilinus, which may throw some light on this difficulty. He speaks on the zeal of Eusebius, which shines forth against those heretics Constantius and Liberius, and which so annoyed Liberius that at the request of the pope the civil power intervened, and imprisoned the recalcitrant priest. This narrative does not require the presence of the emperor at all. The whole matter is a source of great trouble to Roman Catholic writers, because the saintly character of St. Eusebius, guaranteed by the Roman martyrology as revised by pope Gregory XIII., seems necessary to involve the fall of Liberius. The Bollandists at great length vindicate the catholicity of Felix II., and of course are equally zealous champions of St. Eusebius and Tilenmont, and in the present day Hefele, in his History of the Councils, vol. ii. sec. 81 ("Pope Liberius and the Third Sirmian Formula"), are equally decided opponents of Felix. But what then becomes of St. Eusebius, whose orthodoxy and faithfulness are proved by the oldest monuments of the church? Tilenmont maintains that he has not been separated from the Church by Felix, and concludes in the following words, which are a plain instance of begging the question: "But notwithstanding the facts told by Ado, the sainthood of St. Eusebius appears sufficiently attested by the records of the church to assure us that he could not have been a perjured person, nor a schismatic, nor, consequently, a partisan of Felix," conveniently forgetting that the sainthood of Felix himself is equally well attested. (Mart. Rom. Vet. Hieron., Baedae, Adonis, Usuardi, Wandalberti, Ferrarius, Cat. SS.; Kal. Front.; Sacrament. S. Gregor.; Baronius, 357, 57; Tilenmont, Mem. t. vi. 438, 776-778.) The party of Eusebius and Felix must have been very numerous among the populace, as they carried the day at the election of the next pope, eight years later, A.D. 366. Ursicinus was the candidate of the friends of Liberius, Damasus of those of Felix. On one day there were four candidates: Eusebius, Ursicinus, which was stained by the party of Damasus, the dead bodies of one hundred and thirty-seven men. Damascus at last conquered, and Ursicinus was banished. This triumph may help to account for the early insertion of the names of Eusebius and Felix in the list of saints and martyrs. (Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. xxvii. c. 3; see also editions of Marcellinus and Faustinus, belonging to the party of Ursicinus, addressed to the emperors and to Martial, in Sirmond. Opp. t. i. p. 127; Neander, E. H. vol. iii. 313, Bohn's ed.; Milman's Lat. Christ. i. 85-89.)

EUSEBIUS (97), a deposed presbyter, who, in violation of the decrees of the council of Melitene, was reinstated by Eulpinus bishop of Satala. (Soz. H. E. iv. 24.)

EUSEBIUS (88), presbyter, a correspondent of Sulpicius Severus, among whose remains a letter addressed to him has been preserved. The letter unfortunately fails to throw light upon the position or character of Eusebius, unless we are entitled to infer, from his being so eagerly addressed, that he shared the reproach repented in the letter. It would seem that Severus, who had written a short treatise on the life of St. Martin, and had recorded many of his miracles, had failed to notice that he who had often extinguished fires, by which the lives of others were endangered, had once been in the greatest danger from fire himself. Why it should have been so was the question. Severus reminds Eusebius that of the Lord himself it was said, "He saved others, Himself he cannot save," he shews that the danger in which the saint had been, as in the case of the viper on the hand of St. Paul at Melita, illustrated his glory. Surrounded by fire he came out unharmed.

The letter is that marked i in the edition of the works of Severus by Clericus, Leipzig, 1709, i. 356.

EUSEBIUS (89), of Cremona, presbyter, a friend of St. Jerome, and known through the writings of that father. He was with him at Bethlehem in the year 393, and became the unconscious means of extending into Italy the strife concerning Origenism which had been begun at Jerusalem. Epiphanius had written a letter to John bishop of Jerusalem, in vindication of his conduct on his recent visit to Palestine, A.D. 394. [EPHESIUS I], p. 150.; JEROBOAM.] This letter was widely circulated and much praised; and Eusebius, not knowing Greek, begged Jerome to translate it for him. This he did in a rapid and cursory manner (Jerome ad Pammachium, Ep. 57, 22, ed. Vallingal.) The translation is given among Jerome's letters (Ep. ii. ed. Vallingal.) This document was stolen from the cell of Eusebius by one whom Jerome calls a Pseudo-monachus, and whom he believed to be in the service of Rufinus, together with another letter in which Rufinus was spoken of with praise (Jer. cont. Ruf. iii. 4). Rufinus appears to have sent the translation of Epiphanius's letter to Rome, with accusations against Jerome of having falsified the original in translating it. This accusation Jerome answered in his letter to Pammachium, "On the best method of interpretation" (Ep. 57), written two years later. Eusebius remained at Bethlehem till the Easter of the year 396, when he left Palestine and returned hastily to Italy (perhaps with Par-
EUSEBIUS—PRIESTS

EUSEBIUS (101), presbyter and archimandrite of the monastery of St. Eulogius in Constantinople. This archimandrite Eusebius, contemporary with the foregoing, appears in the Greek (not in the Latin) heading of the address of the archimandrites to Marcellus (Lebbe, Concil. iv. 131; Mansi, vii. 75), and as subscribing by his deacon Theodulus the deposition of Eutyches in the council of Chalcedon (Mansi, vi. 754).

G.

EUSEBIUS (102), priest of Jerusalem, who was at Constantinople in the year 536, with the patriarch Mennas, in whose company he was fond of dilating on the reformatians that were going forward at Jerusalem under Peter the bishop of that city. Mennas, in his letter to Peter, styles Eusebius "communia frater, imo communia benefactor Deo amantisissimus presbyter." (Mansi, Concil. viii. 1165; Baron. Annal. ann. 536, 34v.)

H.

EUSEBIUS (103), cardinal-priest at Rome, who signs a diploma of pope Paul I, A.D. 761, given by Baronius from the original in the convent of St. Silvester at Rome. He occupied the church of St. Laurentius in Lucina. (Baron. A. E. ann. 761, vii.)

H.

Descons and Reader.

EUSEBIUS (104), a deacon of the church of Constantinople, who, happening to be at Rome on ecclesiastical business in A.D. 404, when Theophilus's report of the proceedings connected with the deposition of Chrysostom reached pope Innocent, prevailed upon the latter to wait for fuller information on the other side before he took any decisive step. (Pallad. Diai. cap. 1, p. 9, ed. Bigot.)

V.

EUSEBIUS (105), deacon, who, with his companion, the deacon Lamprotus, had shared the persecutions endured by the aged presbyter Hypatius in behalf of the sufferers at Constantinople after Chrysostom's deposition. Chrysostom, in his letter to Hypatius from Cucusus in 405, praises the two deacons for their zeal and constancy (Chrysost. Epist. 189). He may be the deacon Eusebius addressed by Niltus on the subject of Divine Providence in afflictions (Nil. ep. 235 in Pat. Gr. ixxiv. 169).

EUSEBIUS (106), a reader, who accompanied the bearer of a letter from Basil to Eusebius of Samosata A.D. 375. He had been for a long time eager to visit Eusebius of Samosata, but Basil had restrained him till the weather was milder, on account of the delicacy of his health (Basil, Ep. 198 [263].

Martyrs.

EUSEBIUS (107), martyrs who were bishops. (Nos. 24, 27, 77.)

G. T. S.
EUSEBIUS—Monks

EUSEBIUS (110)—April 24, martyr under Diocletian. Basil’s Menology represents him as converted by witnessing the miracles of the mega-martyr St. George, and as suffering soon after him. [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (111)—March 5, a martyr at Caesarea in Palestine under Diocletian. He suffered apparently at the same time as Pamphilus and others as narrated in Eusebius (Mart. Pal. cap. xi.). In the Roman Martyr, he is connected with Hadrian and Eulabius, mentioned at the end of that chapter. (Marty. Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (112)—Aug. 14, priest, martyr in Palestine towards the close of 311 or beginning of 312, when Maximinus made a tour through the provinces subject to him, and in conjunction with Theoctesius devised measures for the persecution of Christianity and the establishment of paganism. Eusebius was brought before the president of the province, Maximus, and tortured to compel him to sacrifice. He appealed to the sovereign, who was then present, by whom he was beheaded on the next day. (Eusebius, H. E. lib. ix. cap. 2-9; Celiier, ii. 483.) [G. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (113), a Christian of Gaza, who, with his brothers Nestabis and Zeno, was martyred by the pagan inhabitants of that city in the reign of Julian. (Soz. H. E. vi. 9.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (114)—Oct. 22, martyr at Adrianople under Julian, a.d. 362. He was tortured and burned with Philip a bishop, Severus a presbyter, and Hermes. (Martyr. Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (115)—May 30, martyr with Christianus, Romanus, and many others by fire at Nicomedia (Bas. Monal.). His memory was specially commemorated in a chapel dedicated to St. Euphemia in Petrum, in the northern quarter of Constantinople. (Acta SS. Boll. Mai. vii. 237.) [G. T. S.]

Monks.

EUSEBIUS (116), a Scotish monk, said by Dempster to have flourished a.d. 369, and to have written Translationes Andreae, and In Sacros Scripturas aliquod. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 255-6; Tanner, Bibl. 271.) [J. G.]

EUSEBIUS (117), the third in age of the four Origenian Nitrian solitaries known as the “Tall Brethren.” (Chrysostom, Vol. I. p. 525; Dioscorus (4)). (Soz. H. E. vi. 7; Baron. Annal. ann. 399.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (118), abbot of Mount Coryphe, in the 5th century. He was brought up by his uncle Marianus, a solitary, and, like him, at first lived a secluded life near Antioch. At the earnest entreaty of St. Ammonius, he quitted his solitude to become abbot of Mount Coryphe, a lofty hill in the same neighbourhood. His life is given by Theodoret. It is recorded of him, among many other austerities, that he chained his neck to his girdle to prevent his eyes seeing the beauties of nature, and that for forty years he looked upon nothing out of doors but the path which led from the monastery to the chapel. He was followed by a multitude of disciples, and appointed heads to many monasteries which he founded. He is mentioned as having taught philosophy to St. Sidonius (Sedf. Apoll. Epis. iv. 1.). He was commemorated as Jan. 23. (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. iv. in Patr. Gr. lxxxi. 1339; Acta SS. Jan. ii. 486; Celiier, Hist. des Autres ecclés. x. 53; Bailleul, Ver des Saints, Jan. 23.) [I. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (119), an anchoret of Asicha in Syria. His austerities are mentioned by Theodoret, who for a long time was the only visitor he would receive. He clothed himself in skins, lived upon peas and beans soaked in water, and is said to have passed seven weeks fasting, having eaten nothing but fifteen figs. He died some time after the year 400. (Theodoret. Philos. cap. 18; Acta SS. 15 Feb. ii. 824; Celiier, Hist. des Autres ecclés. x. 58.) [I. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (120), solitary, in the 5th century, a disciple of St. Marcusius, whom, according to the saint’s desire, he buried in a secluded and unknown spot. Celiier suggests that he is identical with the abbot whose Life was written by Theodoret (No. 118), but no connection of the latter with St. Marcusius is mentioned by either the Bollandists or the Bailleul (Celiier, Hist. des Autres ecclés. x. 53). [I. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (121), Syrian monk, one of a large sect nicknamed Boraus, or “Grazer,” from their habits. They lived in the open air, ate no bread nor meat, nor drank wine. At feeding-time each took a sickle and wandered over the hills like cattle grazing, cutting and eating herbs. In the intervals they passed their time in praying and singing hymns. (Sozomen. H. E. vi. 53.) [I. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (122), a solitary at Carisba, the ancient Haran, briefly mentioned by Sozomen. (Soz. H. E. vi. 33.) [I. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (123), an abbot of age and piety, suddenly excommunicated by Maximinus bishop of Syracuse. For this the bishop was reproved by Gregory the Great in 592, but when he wished again to enter into communion with the abbot, Eusebius refused, upon which Gregory wrote to him, reproving him for his pride. (Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. ep. 34, 35, in Migne, lxxvii. 572-574; Ceilier, Ant. Soc. ii. 487.) [A. H. D.A.]

Lay Dignitaries.

EUSEBIUS (124), consul with Rufinus the year of the council of Sardica, a.d. 343. He may have been the same as the colleague of Hypatius in 355. (Socr. Eccl. Hist. ii. 20; Baron, el ann. 347.) [W. M. S.]

EUSEBIUS (125), FLAVIUS, May 22, a.d. 359, consul with Flavius Hypatius at the date of the formula of Sirmium and Ariminum (Athenins. Op. par. i. p. 576; Soc. Hist. III. 39.) He was brother of the empress Eusebia, wife of...

of Constantius II. (Amm. xxi. 6, § 4), and brother of his colleague Hypatius (Amm. xviii. 1, § 1). Both were banished by Valens (probably about a.d. 374) on the charge of aspiring to the empire but were immediately recalled, the emperor still continuing to treat them with the greatest indignity (Amm. xxix. 2, § 9–15).

[M. F. A.]

EUSEBIUS (126), eunuch, and grand chamberlain under Constantius II. Socrates (i. 2, 16) relates that after the death of Constantius in 337, Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nicaea, bestirring themselves on behalf of the Arians, made use of a certain presbyter who had been instrumental in recalling Arius from exile. This presbyter, having been entrusted by Constantine with his will, was in high favour with Constantius. He persuaded Eusebius the head chamberlain to adoptarian opinions, and the rest of the chamberlains followed. The united force prevailed on the emperor also.

In 354 Eusebius was successful in checking a revolt among some troops at Chalon-sur-Soane (Amm. xiv. 10, § 5). Julian promotes the arrest of Gallus as a concession of Constantius to the malice of Eusebius (Ad. Ath. 272 d), and this quite agrees with the account of Philostorgius, who tells us that it was owing to the entreaties of the eunuch and his companions that the sentence of exile was afterwards changed for that of death, and also that Eusebius intercepted the messengers whom Constantius, in a moment of compunction, had sent to reverse the sentence (Hist. iv. 1; cf. Amm. xiv. 11, § 3).

After the death of Gallus in 354, Eusebius was appointed with Arboreus to inquire into the charges against the party of Gallus, and according to Ammianus put them indiscriminately to death (xv. 3, § 2). The same authority informs us that the appointment of the incompetent Subianinus as prefect is the sequel, and the consequent revolt of the Persians, was due to his influence (xviii. 5, §§ 4, 5; xix. 2, § 3). Eusebius was the bitter enemy of Julian, and did all in his power to alienate Constantius from him (Jul. Ad. Ath. 274 a; cf. Epist. 17, 384 d).

In 359 Eusebius was the mainspring of the plan of Eudoxus and others for dividing the council to be held on the subject of Ariusism, making the Western bishops sit at Rimini, the Eastern at Seleucia; part of those in the secret were to sit at each council, and try to gain over their opponents in different ways to Arian views. Eusebius the chamberlain was a dear friend of Eudoxus, and all the other laymen of influence favoured the plan in order to please the chamberlain. (Sozom. Eccl. Hist. iv. 15.)

On the death of Constantius in 361 nothing remained for Eusebius but to submit to Julian, since no one else could be made emperor; and accordingly Eusebius tried to curry favour with Julian by assuring him of the loyalty of the court (Amm. xxii. 15, § 4). He was unable, however, to avert what Ammianus and Philostorgius represent as the just reward of his deeds. One of the first acts of Julian was to condemn him to death (Amm. xxii. 3, § 12). Ammianus describes him as the prime mover of all the court intrigues of his day, and sarcastically calls the emperor one of his favourites (Amm. xviii. 4, § 35).

EUSEBIUS (127), vicar of Pontus, uncle of the empress Dominica, who menaced St. Basil with torture and death if he refused to surrender a lady who had fled to his church to escape a hateful marriage. [Basil. of Caesarea, V. i. p. 290 a.]

EUSEBIUS (189), a magician, born at Myndus in Caria, a disciple of Eusebius of Pergamus. [Eusebius (4).] On the visit of the emperor Julian to the latter, Eusebius seeing his inclination towards the art of magic, persuaded him to go to Ephesus and consult Maximus, who subsequently acquired so great an influence over him. (Eunap. Vit. Maximini. in Vit. Soph.)

[F. M. A.]

EUSEBIUS (190), a young man whom Basil calls his son, in whose behalf he wrote to Sophronius prefect of Constantinople, and to Abagius a.d. 374. Eusebius was implicated in a charge under which a large number of persons had been convicted. Basil requests that he may not be condemned unheard, and that a thorough investigation of his character should be instituted. (Basil. Ep. 177, 178 [334, 360].)

EUSEBIUS (191), a college friend and chamber-companion of Basil at Athens. He came to Caesarea during Basil’s temporary absence from home shortly before his death. Basil wrote to express his deep regret at missing the sight of his old friend, and to introduce a presbyter, Cyricus, to him. (Basil. Ep. 371 [11].)

[E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (322), a pagan of advanced years, styled by Gregory Nyssaeus “a mountain of unbelief,” converted by that father during his stay at Constantinople for the council, a.d. 381. (Greg. Nysae. de Zuta, ii. p. 62.)

[E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (183), a friend of Ambrose, wrongly identified with the bishop of Bologna (No. 22), addressed by Ambrose in two letters, 54 and 55. He had a son Faustinus, to whom Ambrose’s letter 39 is written; and he had sent some of his grandchildren to Milan to be educated under the care of Ambrose, including an Ambrosius and Ambrosia, as well as a Faustinus the younger. Ambrose’s treatise, de Institutione Virginis, is addressed to him, the occasion of it being the dedication of Ambrosia as a virgin.

EUSEBIUS (184) Scholasticus, an author who, about a.d. 400, wrote a poem in heroic verse in four books, entitled Faustus, describing the rebellion of Gaianus the Gothic commander against Arcadius, a.d. 399. Of this rebellion Eusebius had been a spectator. (Socr. H. E. vi. 6 ; Niceph. H. E. xiii. 6.)

EUSEBIUS (185), a gentleman of Hippo, apparently of the Donatist party, to whom St. Augustine wrote a letter (Ep. 34) complaining of the behaviour of the Donatists in respect of a youth who in the midst of violent conduct towards his mother had sought and received baptism from them. He asks whether this had been done with the sanction of the bishop, Pro-culeianus, and if it be so, as he disliked the notion of a conference of delegates from each party to discuss the matter, he proposes that he should himself discuss it quietly with him either alone or in conjunction with a colleague, or if he objected to him as an opponent, that his own place should be taken by Sausmucius bishop of Tunis. In a second letter (35), written apparently in reply to an answer from Eusebius, Augustin mentions cases of which he says Pro-

Their Acts are evidently spurious, and rejected by Tillemain (Mén. t. ii. 226, 685) as unworthy even of discussion. The fact of their martyrdom has strong and early evidence. As they could not take many books with them, Antichus, a monk of St. Sabas near Jerusalem, wrote, at the request of Eustachius, an abridgement of the Scriptures, containing in one volume all that was necessary for salvation, to supply the loss of his library. EUSTADIUS, abbess. She was the daughter of noble parents, at whose desire she married. After having given birth to a son whom she named Tetradius she was left a widow. She then devoted herself to a monastic life, and founded the "ecclesia mediæ Monasterii" (Moyen-Montier) at Bourges, of which she became abbess. Many miracles are recorded of her, and she was commemorated on June 8. She lived in the 7th century, and died at the age of more than ninety years. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 133.) [I. G. S.]

EUSTADIUS (2) (Ambros. ep. 42, p. 970 in Pat. Lat. xvi. 1129 A; Epist. Decretal. tom. i. 675), bishop [EUSTADIUS (18)]. [F. A.]

EUSTADIUS (3) (Gall. Chr. xii. 808), bishop. [Euthamius].

EUSTADIUS (4) (Eustathius, Eustachius), fifth bishop of Marseilles, succeeding Venerius, and followed by Graecus, in the latter half of the 5th century. He ordained St. Exuphron, who afterwards became the sixth bishop of Orange. Gennadius, who lived towards the close of this century, in his de Vitis illustr. (cap. 79 in Migne, Patr. Lat. ivi. 1103), says that Mnasus, a priest of Marseilles, composed and dedicated to Eustachius a hymn upon the sacrament of the Eucharist. (Gall. Christ. i. 634.) [S. A. B.]

EUSTADIUS (5) (Eustachius), 26th occupant of the see of Bourges. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. x. 26) states that he was a deacon of Autun, who succeeded Sulpicius I. in the see. He died in 607, or according to Le Cointe (Ann. Eccl. Franc. a. 602, n. xxvii., tom. ii. 555) in 602, and was commemorated as a saint in his own diocese Dec. 31. His successor was St. Apollinaris. (Gall. Christ. ii. 15.) [S. A. B.]

EUSTADIUS (6), born in Burgundy about the year A.D. 560. He belonged to a family of illustrious ecclesiastics and was nephew to and was consecrated by St. Mecitius. When grown up, he embraced a monastic life, and entered the monastery of Luxovium (Luxeuil, in Franche-Comté), under the rule of St. Columbanus. He was appointed head of the school attached to the monastery, and soon made it one of the most celebrated of the age. In 610, St. Columbanus retired from Luxeuil, and Eustadius was chosen to succeed him. As abbot he gained the confidence of Cotaire II., who sent him to Italy to try and induce Columbanus to return. This Columbanus refused to do, but confirmed Eustadius in his appointment as abbot. In 616 and 617 Eustadius was employed in missionary labours, at first in his own neighbourhood among the Varasci inhabiting the basin of the Doubs, of whom some were idolaters and others were infected with the errors of the Photinus or Donus; and afterwards among the Boii or Bavarians, where he remained about a short time and then returned to Luxeuil to continue the work. While he was absent, one of his monks, Agrestinus, wishing him to discard the authority of Rome, made a schism in the monastery of Luxovium. Eustadius, returning, expelled Agrestinus, who then inveighed fiercely against the rule of St. Columbanus, and so persistent were his accusations that at length a council on the subject was convened at Mâcon in 623 (Buillet, Vies des Saints, March 29). Eustadius, in his speech at this council, cited Agrestinus to appear within the year before the judgment seat of God, there to plead his cause against St. Columbanus, and his opponent was murdered a few months later (Baron. 817, 11). Eustadius died in the fifteenth year of his rule, A.D. 625. Martyrologies vary as to the day on which he was commemorated, some saying March 29, others Oct. 11. Eustadius wrote a life of Columbanus [COLUMBANUS]; his own life was written by his contemporary Jonas of Bobbio, and has been printed by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. iii. 785) and by Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. sac. ii. p. 108). See also Baronius, Annales Eccles. A.D. 615, 10, &c.; Ceillier, xi. 617; Cave, Historia Liter. i. 575. [I. G. S.]

EUSTATHIA, sister of Ambrosia, at Jerusalem, whose acquaintance Gregory Nyssen made during his visit to the holy city, and to whom, together with Basilia, perhaps the daughter of one of them, Gregory Nyssen addressed a letter after his return home, A.D. 379, indicating the disappointment he felt at the unholy lives of so many who dwelt among the holy places. (Greg. Nyss. Opp. vol. iii. p. 659; ed. Morel, 1636; Pat. Gr., cit. 1015.) The authenticity of the letter is vindicated by Isaac Cavaubon, by whom it was first printed, with a Latin version and notes, in 1606. [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (1), bishop of Parium, on the Hellespont; he is mentioned among the bishops who attended the funeral of St. Parthenius, bishop of Byzantium, who lived during the reign of Constantine the Great, A.D. 306–337. (A.A. SS. Holland. Feb. ii. 42; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 787.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (2), bishop of Arethusa, in Syria Secunda, north of Emesa. He was present at the first general council held at Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Manu. ii. 693; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 915.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (3), bishop first of Berrhoea in Syria, and then of Antioch, c. A.D. 324–331, designated by Theodoret (II. E. i. 7) "the Great," θέρας, one of the earliest and most vigorous opponents of Arianism, venerated for his learning and his virtues, and admired for his eloquence (Soc. Hist. E. i. 2; ii. 19; Thed. Hist. E. i. 8). He was recognized by Athanasius as a subject of Athanasius and his learned fellow-labourer and fellow-sufferer in the cause of the orthodox faith (Athen. Hist. Arian. § 5). Eustathius was a native of Sidon in Pamphylia (Hieron. de Vir. Illus. c. 85). Nothing is known of his early life, but the title of "confessor," given him by Athanasius more than once (tom. i. pp. 702, 812) indicates that he witnessed to, and suffered for, the faith, in the persecution of Diocletian. He became bishop of Berrhoea, and while he occupied that see, the esteem in which he was held is shewn by his being selected as one of the orthodox prelates to whom Alexander of Alexandria sent a copy of his letter, addressed to Alexander of Constantinople, as a subject of Arius and his errors (Thed. Hist. E. i. 4). The date of his translation from Beroea to Antioch is uncertain. Sozomen, however, is decidedly in error in placing it after the Council of Nicaea, and making it the act of the assembled fathers of that synod (Soz. Hist. E. i. 2). Thedoret states more correctly that he sat at that council as bishop of Antioch, and that his election to that see was the unanimous act of the bishops, presbyters, and faithful laity of the city and province (Theodoret, Hist. E. i. 7). According to Thedoret he was the immediate successor of Philogonus; but according to the Chronicle of Jerome, which is supported by Theodorus and others, a certain Paulinus, to be distinguished from Paulinus of Tyre, intervened for a short time (Tillemont, vol. vii. p. 22, note i. p. 646). Eustathius accepted the weighty charges very reluctantly, as if foreseeing the troubles it would bring upon him. At the Council of Nicaea Eustathius occupied one of the first, if not the very first place among the assembled prelates (Facund. viii. 4). Whether he occupied the seat of honour at the emperor's right, as Thedoret announced the papistical address to Constantine is doubtful. The Allocutio ad Imperatorem given by Labbe (Concil. ii. 633) is certainly supposititious. This fact is asserted by Theodoret (H. E. i. 7), but contradicted by Sozomen (H. E. i. 19), who assigns the dignity to Eusebius. Eusebius himself maintains a discreet silence, but he evidently wishes it to be inferred that the anonymous occupant of the place of honour mentioned by him was himself (Euseb. de Vit. Const. iii. 11). This is accepted by Valesius (not ad loc.) On his return to Antioch Eustathius used his authority with great decision to check the rising heresy. He banished from his clergy as were suspected of holding Arian tenets, and resolutely rejected all ambiguous submissions. Among those whom he refused to receive among his clergy were Stephen, Leonius, and Eudoxius (who successively occupied his episcopal seat after his deposition), George of Laodicea, Theodorus of Tripolis, and Eustathius of Sebasto (Athanas. Hist. Arian. § 5). As well in his published writings as in his sermons, he lost no opportunity of declaring the Nicene faith, and shewing its agreement with Holy Scripture. Theodoret (H. E. i. 8) makes special mention of one of his sermons on Prov. viii. 22, "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way," &c., from which he gives a long extract. The troubled relations of Eustathius with the two Eusebii may be dated from the Council of Nicaea. At this synod Eusebius of Caesarea and Eustathius of Antioch were to be made bishops of their respective sees, but on theological views as in favour of the emperor. The elevation of one meant the depression of the other. To one of Eustathius's uncompromising and somewhat old-fashioned orthodoxy, Eusebius appeared a foe to the truth, the more dangerous on account of his ability and the weight of his authority; hence his heretical proclivities. Eustathius did not shrink from denouncing his departure from the Nicene faith. Eusebius retorted with the charge of Sabellianism, accusing Eustathius of holding one only personality in the Deity (Soz. H. E. i. 23; Soc. Hist. E. ii. 18; Theod. H. E. i. 21). Their position became more and more one of mutual suspicion and hardly concealed enmity. Eusebius, endowed with far more subtlety and worldly wisdom than Eustathius, was watching his opportunity to overthrow the rival by whose personal and official superiority he was overshadowed. He could reckon on the support of the majority of the neighbouring bishops, especially with his namesake of Nicomedia, impatient like himself of the power and influence of Eustathius. The changed feeling of the emperor and the court favour now shewn towards the Arianizing party deprived their enterprise of any risk of compromising themselves with the imperial power. The two Eusebii had not to bide their time, concetr their measured skillfully, and seize the first favourable opportunity, and success was certain. The occasion was not slow to present itself. Eusebius of Nyssa, writing to the emperor's variance by a request to be permitted to visit the magnificent sacred buildings erected by him at Jerusalem. Constantine not only acceded to his petition, but assigned him vehicles and every other convenience for the journey, at the public expense. Thegna of Neces accompanied him. Their progress was much opposed by the emperor's valets. On their passage through Antioch the two prelates had a fraternal reception from Eustathius, and they parted with every appearance of friendship. Their next meeting was of a very different character. His inspection of the sacred buildings over, Eusebius returned to Antioch with a large cortege of partisan bishops—Aetius of Lydda, Patrophilus of Scythopolis, Theodotus of Laodicea, and the prime mover of the whole conspiracy, Eusebius of Caesarea. The cebal entered Antioch with the air of masters. The plot had been maturing in their absence. With men, and charged against the bishop of inconsistency and other gross crimes. Eustathius was summoned before this self-constituted tribunal, and in defiance of the opposition of the better-minded bishops, and in the absence of any trustworthy evidence, he was condemned on the ground of heresy, profanery, and tyrannical conduct, and deposed from his episcopate. The deposition of a bishop when they loved and revered aroused the indignation of the excitable people of Antioch, who took up arms in his defence. Some of the magistrates and other officials headed the movement, and encouraged Eustathius to refuse to obey so unjust a sentence. An artfully coloured and exaggerated account of these disturbances and Eustathius's complicity in them was transmitted to Constantine. His enemies had already poisoned the emperor's mind by reporting that he had given currency to some scandalous tales derogatory to the character of the emperor's mother, Helen. ("Stabulamuriam fruam ferunt." Ambros. de hist. Theod. 42.) His fate was sealed. A count, believed to have been Strategus Macedonianus, was despatched to quell the sedition and to put the sentence of the council into execution. Eustathius gave an example of submission to constituted authority. Accompanied by a large body of his clergy, resolved to share his fate, he left Antioch without resistance, or manifesting any resentment against the authors of so foul a wrong. (Socr. H. E. i. 24; Soc. H. E. ii. 18; Theod. H. E. i. 21; Philost. H. E. ii. 7; Euseb. Hist. Const. iii. 59.) Jerome states that the place of his banishment was Trajanopolis in Thrace, but he appears to have spent the larger part of his exile at Philippi, where he died, c. 337. The date of his deposition is much controverted. It may be probably placed at the end of 339 or the beginning of 341 A.D. It can hardly be questioned that there is an error in the text of Jerome (de Vir. Illust. c. 65) and Athanasius (Hist. Arian. § 5), which refers the event to the reign of Constantius instead of Constantine. (See Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. vol. vii. note 3; sur Saint Eustathe; Wetzer, Restituto vers chronolog. rerum contra Arican. greg.; De Brosses, L'Eglise et l'Empire, ch. vii.) His body, which in Jerome's time was still buried in the place of his banishment—"ubi usque hodie conditus est" (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 85)—was brought back to Antioch by Cal多, then bishop of that city, in the presence of the emperor Zenos, and received with the utmost honour by the citizens, c. 482 (Theod. Lec. ii. p. 557; Theophan. p. 114). The deposition of Eustathius was the origin of a lamentable schism in the church of Antioch, which had the effect of dividing the Catholic church into two parties, and creating much dissension and discord in the ranks of the orthodox. This schism lasted nearly a century, not being completely healed till the episcopate of Alexander, A.D. 413-420.

Eustathius was a copious writer, and is much praised by early authorities for the eloquence of his language, which, according to Sozomen (H. E. ii. 19), had somewhat of an archaic cast, and the grave dignity of his style, as well as for his knowledge of Scripture and power of orthodox interpretation (Hieron. Epist. 70 [84], ad Magnum.). Of his numerous writings, we possess only one entire work, called De Energatriyothe odoeious Origenem, printed by Galland. In this work he attacks Origen with great vehemence, ridicules him as a υφυντορμις, and controverts his idea that the prophet Samuel was actually called up by the witch of Endor (Galland, V.E. Patr. Bibl. vol. iv.) and Migne (Patrol. vol. xlviii. p. 614, ff.). Of his other works, we only have a few scattered fragments. Excerpts from his eight books against the Arians, gathered from Photius, Facundus, Gelasia, &c., are given by Galland (A. E.), Fabricius (Biblioth. Grac. ii. 131 ff. ed. Harles), and Migne (A. s. p. 691 ff.). Some passages from his sermon on Prov. vii. 32 and from his exposition of Ps. xcv. and xcii. are to be found in the Ezechias of Theodoret (Dias. ii. p. 90; dial. iii. p. 156, &c.). His discourse on Prov. ix. 5 is quoted in the acts of the second Nicene council (Labbe, Concil. vii. pp. 1099, 1475). His expositions of Holy Scripture are frequently quoted in the Catena. On his innumerable letters, "infinitis epistolae" extant in Jerome's time, not one remains. A liturgy bearing his name, but probably spurious, appears in Renaudot (i. 254) and Migne (A. s. p. 698 ff.). A spurious commentary on the Hecateron bearing his name is also printed by Migne (p. 707 ff.). (Fabricius, Biblioth. Grac. vol. ix. p. 131, ff. ed. Harles; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 187; Galland. Vet. Patr. Bibl. tom. iv.; Migne, Patrolog. tom. i. p. 131 ff.; Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. tom. vii. p. 21 ff.; De Brosses, L'Eglise et l'Empire, tom. ii. p. 294 ff.). [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (4), bishop of Sebastia, or Sebaste (the modern Sioue), a town of Pontus, on the northern bank of the Halys, the capital of Armenia Minor (c. A.D. 357-380). Eustathius occupies a more conspicuous than honourable place in the unhappy dissensions between the adherents of the orthodox faith and the various shades of Arian, semi-Arian, and Anomoecian heresy which destroyed the peace and retarded the growth of the church during the middle of the 4th century. Originally a disciple of Arius he retained to the last the taint of his early heretical training, proving in Basil's words that the Ethiopian could not change his skin, and after repeated approaches more or less nearly to the Nicene faith, and with occasional professor of accepting it, he probably ended his days as a heretic. The frequent and rapid transformations his creed experienced are a proof that Eustathius's religious convictions did not rest on any well-grounded dogmatic basis, but that with an underlying tendency in favour of his early Arian teaching, he had no fixed principle to save him, to use Basil's image, from being "carried hither and thither, like the clouds, with every changing wind." (Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 9). Few in that epoch of conflicting creeds and formularies of faith ever signed more and more various documents. Basil enumerates his signature of the formularies of Ancyra, Scylencia, Constantinople, Lambaecaus, Nice in Thrace, and Cyprus, which, if all not directly at variance with one another, were sufficiently diverse to indicate the vagueness of his theology (Basil. l. c.). By his frequent changes of opinion Eustathius naturally forfeited the confidence of the rival schools of theology, and was subjected to repeated sentences of censure and deposition. He was deposed by Eulalius, the bishop who ordained him, and by Eusebius of Constantinople, excommunicated by a synod at Neocaesarea, convicted of perjury at a council at Antioch, condemned by the bishop of Melitene, deposed and excommunicated at Constantinople, and at Consantine, "while his hyper-asetic extravagances were the cause of the summoning of the council at Gangra, where he and his followers were synodically condemned. Lamentable as were Eustathius's vacillations of faith and dogmatic inconsistence, the general character appears to have been not only free from reproach, but of so high a standard as to account for the powerful influence he exercised over others. There must have been something more than common in a man who could secure the affection and respect for many years of Basil the Great, "as bearing about him, all the marks of a zealous and honest theocratic erring man" (J. H. Newman, Hist. Sketches, iii. 20), and in Basil's own strong language, "exhibiting something more than man," μετίκο η η και δημος τον (Basil. Epist. 212 [370], § 2), and of whom, after the painful dissensions which embittered Basil's later years, that great saint could say that from childhood to extreme old age he had watched over himself with the greatest care, the result of his self-discipline being seen in his life and character (Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 4). His life was one of unspiring austerity. As bishop, he manifested a loving care for the sick and needy, and was unwearied in his exertions in the fulfilment of his episcopal duties. The force or Eustathius's character is evidenced by the rapid success of the system of coenobitic monasticism which was introduced by him into Asia, and which Basil took as his model. This Sozomen attributes to personal influence alone, inasmuch as he was devoid of eloquence. (Soz. H. E. iii. 14; Basil. Epist. 223 [79], § 3.)

Eustathius was born in the Cappadocian Cæsarea towards the beginning of the 4th century. According to Socrates and Sozomen (Socr. H. E. ii. 43; Soz. H. E. iv. 24), he was the son of Eulalus, bishop of Cæsarea. No bishop of that name, however, appears to have held the see at that time, and the statement is probably erroneous. As he was ordained at Antioch about the time that Eulalus was bishop of that city, it is possible that there has been some confusion between a natural and a spiritual father. He studied at Alexandria under the heresiarch Arius (c. A.D. 320) and, according to Basil, was regarded as one of his most genuine disciples (Basil. Epist. 223 [79], § 3; 244 [82], § 9; 263 [74], § 3). On leaving Alexandria he repaired to Antioch, where he was refused ordination on account of his Arian tenets by his orthodox namesake, the bishop of that city (Athanas. Suid. p. 812). He was afterwards ordained by the Eulalians of whom we have just spoken (c. 331), but was very speedily degraded by him as account of his refusal to wear the clerical dress (Socr. H. E. ii. 45; Soz. H. E. iv. 24). As the twelfth canon of Gangra (convened, as we have said, at a later period, to correct the extravagances of Eustathius) condemns the wearing of the περιβόλας (the rough pallium adopted by philosophers and monks to shew their contempt for luxury and the man of the world) "the covering, which he reasonably concludes that this, and not the use of the secular garb, was the offence which was thus punished. From Antioch Eustathius returned to his native city of Cæsarea, where he obtained ordination from Hermogenes, the orthodox bishop of that city, on declaring his unqualified admission to the Nicene faith (Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 9; 263 [74], § 3). On the death of Hermogenes, Eustathius repaired to Constantinople and attached himself to Eusebius, the bishop of the Imperial city, "the Coryphasus of the Arian party" (Basil. H. E. c.). By him he was a second time deposed (c. A.D. 335) on the ground of some unspecified act of unfilialness in the discharge of duty (Soz. H. E. iv. 24). He retired more to Cæsarea, where, by a careful concealment of his Arian proclivities, he sought to commend himself to the then bishop, Dianius, a man whose love of peace was stronger than his zeal for orthodoxy, of which, moreover, his sincerity was not very keen. The subsequent period, till he became bishop of Sabeate, is almost a blank in Eustathius's history. We must, however, assign to it the theological argument held by him and his friend Basil of Ancyra with the Cæsarean Anomoæus. Actius, who is regarded by Basil the Great in some sense as Eustathius's pupil (Phil. Epist. 125, § 5), in which, according to Philostorius (H. E. iii. 16), they were shamefully worsted, but according to Gregory Nyssen (in Eunom. lib. 1. pp. 289, 296) obtained a decided victory. However this may have been, Eustathius zealously seconded Basil's endeavours to blacken Actius's character with Gallus, which were nearly ending in his execution (Philos. H. E. iii. 27). It was certainly during this period that together with his early friend and fellow disciple, the presbyter Aërius [Ækrius] Eustathius undertook an ascetic life, and became the founder of coenobitic monasticism in Armenia and the adjacent provinces (Epiph. Hell. 75, § 2). The rule laid down by him for the government of his religious communities of both sexes formed the model of the system subsequently established by Basil the Great, whose good sense cleared it of the extravagances alluded to by Socrates and Sozomen, which are not unlikely to have been the cause, otherwise unknown, of his excommunication by the council of Neo-Cæsarea.

mentioned by those historians (Socr. H. E. ii. 43; Soc. H. E. iv. 24). It was while Eustathius was regulating his cœnobitic foundations (c. a.D. 358) that he was visited by Basil, who, emasculated of the ascetic system, had been travelling far in search of the most perfect example of that life, and found it eventually very near his own home. Basil records the delight with which he saw the coarse garments, the girdle, the sandals of undressed hide, and witnessed the self-denying and laborious lives of Eustathius and his followers. His admiration for such a victory over the world and the flesh dispelled all suspicions of Ariano sentiments, and the desire to spread them secretly, which had been rumoured (Basil. Epist. 223 [79], § 3). After Basil had retired to the banks of the Iris and commenced his own monastic life, he and his brother Gregory received frequent visits from Eustathius, who would sometimes accompany them across the river to Ancyra, the residence of their father, the sainted Macrina, where they would spend whole days and nights in friendly theological discussion (ibid. § 5).

We are ignorant of the exact date of Eustathius' elevation to the episcopate, but it must have been before a.d. 357, when Athanasius speaks of him as bishop (Orat. in Arim. i. p. 290; Solit. p. 812). He was made bishop of Sebasteia, according to the same authority, by the influence of the Arian party, which hoped to have him in an able and facile instrument. His early companion Aelius was a candidate for the bishopric, and felt the mortification of his failure very severely. Eustathius showed the utmost consideration for his friend, whom he ordained presbyter, and appointed manager of a house of refuge for the poor, the foundation of which was one of the first acts of his episcopate. The failure of Eustathius' attempts to conciliate Aelius' wounded pride, the grave but groundless charges brought against him, and the final rupture between them, are detailed in another article [AELIUS]. Somewhere about this time we may place his conviction of perjury in the council of Antioch mentioned by Sozomen (H. E. iv. 24), and his condemnation and deposition by his council at Armenia c. a.d. 357 (Basil. Epist. 263 [74]). Neither of these untoward events appear to have entailed any lasting consequences.

Eustathius was one of the prelates assembling at the semi-Arian synod summoned at Ancyra by George of Ladizas before Easter a.d. 358, to check the alarming spread of Anomoean doctrines, and accompanied Basil of Ancyra and Eleusius of Cyzicus when conveying the synodal letter, equally repudiating the Anomoean and Homoean doctrines, and declaring for the Homoeousian to the emperor Constantius at Sirmium (Soz. H. E. iv. 13, 14; Basil. Epist. 263 [74], § 3). When the council met at Seceleucia the next year, Sept. 27, 359, Eustathius occupied a prominent place in its tumultuous and indecisive proceedings, and was the head of the ten episcopal deputies, Basil of Ancyra, Silvanus of Tarsus and Eleusius of Cyzicus being other chief members, sent to Constantineople to lay their report before Constantine. The closing days of the year were spent in stormy discussions, in which Eustathius took the lead on the semi-Arian side as against the pure Arians. He vehemently denounced the blasphemies of the bold Anomoean, Eudoxius, bishop of Antioch, and produced a formulary of faith declaring the dissimilarity of the Father and the Son, which he asserted to be his composition. Eudoxius denied the authorship of the paper, which he said had been drawn up by Aetius. Aetius was summoned by the emperor, and acknowledged the parentage of the document. Eustathius, however, insisted that though Eudoxius might not be the author of this paper, he held all the doctrines contained in it. Constantius declaring that he must pronounce it a proved fact, and order its condemnation, we are on conjecture, Eustathius adroitly suggested that Eudoxius might clear himself from all suspicion if he would pronounce an anathema on the propositions of Aetius. This pleased the emperor, and Eudoxius, as cowardly as he was profane, after various subtile shifts, was driven, by Constantius' threats of deposition and banishment, to anathematize the views he inwardly held and afterwards openly promoted. To revenge himself on his accusers, Eudoxius, in his turn, demanded that Eustathius and his fellow-deputies should be required to condemn the Homoeousian a formulary, and comply with the requirements of Scripture. Silvanus of Tarsus succeeded in persuading Constantius that if not actually expressed, it might be established from Holy Writ, and, following up his success, induced Constantius to require of Eudoxius to subscribe a repudiation of the leading Arian propositions. Constantius then proceeded to the personal examination of Aetius, who was successfully encountered by his old opponents, Eustathius and Basil (Theod. H. E. ii. 27; Soz. H. E. iv. 23). All seemed to augur the triumph of orthodoxy, when the arrival of Vales and Ursacius, from Armenia, again challenged the authority of the Western bishops and the general proclamation of the Homoeousian suddenly changed the scene. Constantius was overjoyed at the attainment of his object, and after a protracted discussion, extending through the last day and night of the year, compelled Eustathius and the other Semelican deputies to sign the fatal formulary. It was then, in Jerome's words, "inge-nuit totus orbis et se esse Arianum miratur est" (Hieron. in Lucif. 19). This base concession, however, profited the recrants but little, and when the synod, called by the emperor, of which Acacius was the ruling spirit, met at Constantineople in January a.d. 360, Eustathius was deposed in a violent and tyrannical manner by those who were at the same time accusers and judges, together with Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil of Ancyra, Eleusius of Cyzicus, and other prelates of high consideration. The grounds of deposition were in no case professedly dogmatic. Party spirit and personal hatred were the real causes; but in each instance some old charge of a frivolous nature was reproduced, and made the ostensible plea. Eustathius was not even allowed to defend himself. His former deposition by Eusilus was regarded sufficient (Socr. H. E. ii. 41-43; Soz. H. E. iv. 24). Constantius confirmed the sentence, sent the deposed bishops into exile, and bestowed their sees on others. The death of Constantius in A.D. 361, and the accession of Julian witnessed the recall of Eustathius to his see with the other banished bishops. He immediately repudiated his signature of the creed of Ariminum, and did all he could to shew his horror of pure Arianism. Sozomen informs us that, together with Eusebius, Sophronius, and others of the same sentiments, he held several synods, in which the partisans of Acacius were condemned, the creed of Ariminum denounced, and the Homoeousian asserted as the true mean between the Homoeousian of the West and the Anomoousian of Aetius and his followers (Soz. H. E. v. 14). With the accession of Valens in A.D. 364, Arianism once more assumed the ascendancy in the East. The see of Ancyra was assigned to Macedonius, and he now began to be called, seeing the emergency, by imperial permission, met in council at Lampactus a.d. 365, under the presidency of Eusebius. Here they repudiated the proceedings of the Acacian council of Constantinople in A.D. 360, and the creed of Ariminum, renewed the confession of Aetius (in Eusebius), and pronounced a sentence of deposition on Eudosios and Acacius (Soz. H. E. iv. 2-4; Soz. H. E. vi. 7). These proceedings irritated Valens, who refused to confirm their decrees, and required them to hold communion with Eudosios. On their refusal he sentenced them to fine and banishment, and the heads of his former synods, To escape complete annihilation, the Macedonians determined to send deputies to the Western emperor Valentinian and Liberus, bishop of Rome, who had now recovered from his unhappy lapse in A.D. 357, offering to unite with them in faith. Those chosen to go were Eustathius, Silvanus, and Liberus, who was the friend of Hilarion, for before they arrived Valentinian had left Gaul, and Liberus at first looked coldly on them, and refused to receive them, as Arians. On their declaration that they had long since returned to the right path, and had condemned the doctrine of the Anomoousian, Liberus required them to give him the Nicene creed, and their acceptance of the Homoeousian. On their doing this, Liberus consented to receive Eustathius and his companions into communion, and gave them letters in his name and that of the Western church to the prelates of the Eastern church, expressing his satisfaction at the proof he had received from their representatives of the identity of doctrine between the East and the West (Socr. H. E. iv. 12; Soz. H. E. vi. 11). No mention was made of the new Macedonian heresy concerning the Holy Spirit, which was infecting the Eastern church, and of which Eustathius and the other deputies were among the chief promoters. On the receipt of the papal letters, Eustathius and his companions at once repaired to Sicily, where a synod of bishops was summoned by them, which, on the profession of their orthodoxy, gave them letters of communion, with which they returned to their own country. On their return a synod of orthodox bishops was assembled in A.D. 367 at Tyana, to receive the letters of communion from the West and other documents (Soz. l. c.; basil. Epist. 244 [82] § 5). Eustathius and his fellow deputies were recognised as true Catholics, and they were acknowledged as the rightful bishops of their sees. The council appointed by their synod to meet at Tarsus, to consolidate the union so happily inaugurated, was prohibited by Valens, who, yielding to his wife's urgency, had committed himself to the Arian party by receiving baptism from Eudosios, and who now put forth an edict ordering the expulsion of all the bishops, who, having been deposed by Constantius, had been restored by Julian. Eustathius, to save himself, had the contemptible weakness to sign a formula at Cyzicus of Homoeousian character, which also denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Basil says tersely of Eustathius and his party, "they saw Cyzicus and returned with a different creed" (Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 5; § 9; 226 [73]). On Basil's elevation to the episcopate in A.D. 370, Eustathius excommunicated him as his greatest and most holy of men, professed an earnest desire to be of service to his friend in his new and responsible office. On the plea that Basil would be in want of fellow helpers and counsellors, he recommended persons to his notice, who, as Basil bitterly complained, turned out to be spies of his actions and watchers of his words, interpreting all a malicious sense, and reporting his supposed heretical leanings to their chief (Basil. Epist. 223 [79], § 3). The subsequent relations of Eustathius and Basil, which so much embittered his episcopate, have been detailed in another article (Basilii of Cappadocia). Eustathius not only helped others of his former companions, openly charging him with Apollinarian and other heretical views and accusing him of haughty and overbearing conduct towards his suffragans and clergy, but also encouraged the clergy of his diocese and province to separate themselves from him, and form a rival communion. Demetrius, the Bishop of Philippi, who was the friend of Eusebius, openly charged him with Arianism in the ascendant, and orthodox everywhere punished, began openly to court communion with those whom he had repeatedly denounced. His deposition by the dominant party at Constantinople remained a fact which the Arians took care to remember, and up to this time they had declined to recognize him as a canonical bishop. As they were now the party in power, it was of the utmost importance to secure their goodwill. This he sought by the most humiliating concessions. He had overthrown the altars of Basilides, bishop of Gangra, as an Arian, and he now supplicated him to admit him to his communion. He had trebled the people of Aramea heretics, consecrated Eplidius for holding intercourse with them, and he earnestly sought their recognition. At Ancyra, the Arians refusing to recognize him publicly, Eustathius submitted to communicate with them in private houses. When the Arian bishops met in synod at Nyssa he sent a deposition of his clergy to invite them to Sebastia, and caused them to be conducted through the province with every mark of honour. On their arrival he gave them the best entertainment, and allowed them to preach and celebrate the Eucharist in his churches, and withheld no mark of the most intimate communion (Basil. Epist. 257 [72], § 3). These humiliations had but tardy and partial success in obtaining his public acknowledgment but this was not deemed to be eclecticism. The efforts made by Eustathius to secure the favour of the Ariotic party by repressing the Nicene faith, the effrontery with which he employed his former recognition by Liberius as a means of investing his words and actions with the authority of one in close communion with the great church of Rome, extorted from Basil a vehement letter of remonstrance, addressed to the bishop of Rome, and the other Western bishops, depicting the evils inflicted on the Eastern church by the wolves in sheep's clothing, and requesting Liberius to declare publicly the terms on which Eustathius had been admitted to communion (Basil. Epist. 263 [74], § 3). As will be read in the article already referred to (vol. i. p. 292 ff.) all Basil's efforts to obtain this mark of sympathy and brotherly recognition from the West were fruitless. He continued to be harassed by the casuistical attacks of Eustathius till his death A.D. 379. If the see was vacated by his death, and not, as Hefele holds, with much probability, by his deposition at Gangra, Eustathius soon followed him to his great account. In the following year, A.D. 380, Peter became bishop of Sebaste, and thus, in the words of Tillemont, by a remarkable disposition of providence St. Basil's brother was seated on the throne of Eustathius, Basil's most dangerous enemy” (Hæc. Eccl. ix. 574).

No little uncertainty hangs over the synod of Gangra, which is too intimately connected with the name of Eustathius to be passed over. The question of its date, and the identity of the Eustathius there condemned with the bishop of Sebaste, which, though affirmed by every ancient authority, has been denied by Blondel (De la Primauté, p. 138), Baroziani (Annal. iii. ann. 381, n. 53), Du Pin (Novaæ Biblioth. ii. 382), and called in question by Tillemont (Hist. des Perf. x. note 28, S. Baüle), has been carefully investigated by Hefele (Hist. of the Church Concils, ii. 325 ff. Engl. trans.). He pronounces himself unable to arrive at any certain conclusions as to its date (Gangra, Council of, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, i. 709), but regards the notion that another Eustathius is intended as undeserving of any serious consideration. The self-righteousness and heretical form of asceticism, professing a higher degree of spirituality and despising church ordinances, condemned in the twenty-one canons or anathemas of this council, is in complete accordance with the account of Eustathius as the founder of the ascetic and coenobitic life in Armenia given by Socrates (H. E. ii. 43), and Sozomen (H. E. iv. 54), Labbe (Concil. ii. 413). Ecclesiastical history is entirely silent as to the after fortunes of this hyperascetic sect. Hefele states that “in accordance with the decisions of Constantinople, Eustathius is said to have repudiated his peculiarities, and again dressed himself like other ecclesiastics, not as a monk” (a. p. 337).
EUSTATHIUS—Bishops

Lat. x. 527), and no doubt the one of the same name among the Macedonian bishops whom Chrysostom thanks for their firm adherence, A.D. 406. (Chrys. Ep. 189, Pat. Gr. ii. 706.)

EUSTATHIUS (14), bishop of Attalia, in Pamphylia, A.D. 431. His story is noticeable as a case of resignation of a see. Part of the last day of the council of Ephesus (July 17) was taken up with a consideration of his affairs. He was an old man, and was far from home and friends. He had been canonically elected and consecrated to Attalia, but various hostile parties made numerous accusations against him. It seems that he could easily have acquitted himself, but being timid and confused he wrote a renunciation of his see. The provincial council of Pamphylia thereupon placed Theodorus on his throne. Eustathius, for whose character little respect can be felt, had always intended to keep the name and honours of the episcopate. He therefore presented himself before the council of Ephesus, with tears and lamentations, to demand them, asuring the fathers at the same time that he had no thought of resigning his diocese. The canons did not allow the resignation of a see, so he had been deprived of communion. The council inquired into the charges brought against him, and restored him communion and rank on his promise not to do any episcopal act on his own authority. They permitted the provincial synod of Pamphylia to deal with him still more kindly if they pleased. (Concilia Generalia, i. 500, ed. 1828; Cellier, viii. 59.)

W. M. S.

EUSTATHIUS (15) I., bishop of Pararaus in Cappadocia, of the party of John of Antioch and the Orientals at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and consequently cut off from the communion of the orthodox (Baluze, Concil. p. 507); subsequently he joined the synod held at Constantinople by archbishop Flavien, which condemned Eutyches, A.D. 448 (Mansi, vi. 760). Ten years later, A.D. 458, he subscribed the synodal letter of the second Cappadocia to the emperor Leo (Mansi, vii. 399; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 410; Ganis, Series Episc. 440).

EUSTATHIUS (16), bishop of Docimium in Phrygia Salutaris, present at the general council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Mansi, iv. 1294), and also at the synod held by Flavian at Constantinople, 448, which condemned Eutyches (Mansi, vi. 760), where his name is written in the acts Eustochius, a corruption found also in some MSS. of the transactions of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, at which also he was present. (Mansi, vii. 157; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 585.)

EUSTATHIUS (17), bishop of Aegae, on the seashore of Cilicia, to whom Theodoret addressed a letter relating to a Catharimian lady named Maria, who having been taken captive at the sack of Carthage by Generici, A.D. 439, had been sold as a slave, together with her waiting-maid, to an inhabitant of Theodoret's diocese of Cyrrhus. Some Christian soldiers quartered there hearing of her misfortunes had purchased her freedom, and she was disposed of returning to her native country, where she heard that her father was still alive and holding a magistracy. Theodoret requests Eustathius to put Maria under the care of some of the Western merchants who resorted to the fair at Aegae whose fidelity might be relied on to convey the unfortunate lady safe to her destination. (Theod. Epist. 70.)

EUSTATHIUS (18), bishop of Temnus in the province of Asia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 707.)

EUSTATHIUS (19), bishop of Sabatha or Savatra, in Lycaonia; in the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon his name was subscribed in his absence by Onesiphorus of Iconium, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1084; Mansi, vii. 165.)

EUSTATHIUS (20), bishop of Sarancorum Tribus in Phoenicia Secunda. He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and also signed the synodal letter to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 127, 183, 559; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 883.)

EUSTATHIUS (21), bishop of Colonias, in the lesser Armenia, signed the synodal letter which the bishops of that province sent to the emperor Leo concerning the murder of St. Proterius of Alexandria and the fanatic of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 430; Mansi, vii. 583.)

EUSTATHIUS (22), bishop of Berytus (Beyrouth) in the 5th century. He was one of the time-serving, cowardly prelates attached to the court, who regarded their rank as a position to be secured at all costs, changing their faith with change of circumstances, and bowing the knee to the dominant party. The object he kept steadily in view was the aggrandizement and independence of his see of Berytus, then suffering to Tyre. For this he curried court favour, and lent himself to the arbitrary power of the "Papal Synod." He was a bishop of some consideration for theological knowledge, and was appointed one of the three commissioners, with Photius of Tyre and Urania of Himera, by Theodosius II, A.D. 448, to examine the tenets of Ibas of Edessa, against whom serious complaints had been made by the Nestorian party as being falling under the Nestorian heresy, and who had been acquitted at a council at Antioch in consequence of two of his accusers failing to appear. This commission was dated Oct. 26, A.D. 448, and was addressed to Damasus, the secretary of state (Labbe, Concil. iv. 638). The commission was opened at Berytus, Feb. 1, A.D. 449, in the residence of Eustathius, recently erected by him in the vicinity of the magnificent new church he had built as part of his scheme for the exaltation of his see. The examination was continued for some time. Ibas indignantly disclaimed the blasphemies attributed to him, and produced a document signed by a large number of his clergy to prove that they had never heard him utter words contrary to the faith (ibid. p. 637). The accusation broke down. But the investigation was revived a week or two afterwards at Tyre. Urania was absent (ibid. 635). Eustathius and his brother commissioners succeeded in arranging matters between the retaining parties. They then signed a concordat, which was signed, Feb. 25, by
EUSTATHIUS OF BERYTON

At a later session of the council, Oct. 20, the point at issue between him and Photius of Tyre was discussed (ibid. 530). As a reward for the real service he had shown in support of the church party at the "Lactrocinium," Eustathius had obtained from Theodosius a decree giving metropolitical rank to the see of Beryton (Lupus, in Canon. 950). Flavian's successor Anatolius, together with Maximus of Antioc and some of the court bishops, had conspired to take upon themselves, at the close of 449, to dismember the diocese of Tyre, and had assigned five churches to the newly suffragan see of Beryton (Labbe, iv. 542-546). Photius disregarded this partition, and continued to consecrate bishops for these churches. For this he was in a high-handed spirit excommunicated by Anatolius, and the prelates he had consecrated were deposed and degraded by Eustathius (ibid. 530). Photius got frightened, and submitted to this interference on the threat of deposition, protesting at the same time that he did so by constraint. He now required of the council to return the power to the episcopal see of Tyre, and pronounce the acts of Eustathius null and void. The council on hearing the case decided against Eustathius, and refused to allow the gathering of bishops at Constantinople which had presumed to dismember the bishopric, any right to the title of a church council (ibid. 542-550). When at a still later session, Oct. 26, Ibas appeared and demanded restoration, Eustathius and Photius attested the fact of his acquittal at Tyre (ibid. 631).

When in 457 the emperor Leo, anxious to give peace to the sorely divided church of Alexandria, and yet wishing to avoid the summoning of a synod, directed letters to the chief metropolitans on the question of the intrusion of Timothy Aelurus, Eustathius was one of those consulted, and joined in the condemnation of the intruding patriarch (ibid. 890). A fragment of a defence of the letter of pope Leo against Timothy Aelurus is preserved by Cononius (Lec. in Antioc. ii. 257), and is printed by Migne (Pat. Gr. lxxxv. 1803). The church built by him at Beryton is described by Zacharias Scholasticus de mundi opificio. (Tillemont, Mon. Eccl. x.; Le Quien, Oriens Chris. ii. 818; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 440.)

EUSTATHIUS (23), bishop of Philoelaethia, in the province of Sparta; his name is appended to the letter of the synod of Constantinople to the patriarch John, condemning Severus of Antioch, A.D. 518, which was read in the fifth session of the synod also held at Constantinople under Menas, A.D. 558, which condemned Anthimus and Severus. In his subscription Eustathius calls Philoelaethia the metropolis of the province of Lydia, as if it set up rival claims to Sardis. (Le Quien, Oriens Chris. i. 870; Mansi, viii. 1047.)

EUSTATHIUS (24), bishop of Peræa, in Mesopotamia, driven out of his bishopric by the emperor Justin I. on account of his adherence to the heresy of Severus, A.D. 516. (Le Quien, Oriens Chris. ii. 946; Assemani, Bih. ii. Diæ. de Monophys. § 2.)

EUSTATHIUS (25), bishop of Antioch (Agrippias), on the seaboard of Palestine, who was one of the signatories of the synodal letter.
EUSTATHIUS—Bishops

of John of Jerusalem to John of Constantinople against Severus, A.D. 518. (Labbe, v. 191; Le Quien, Oriens Christi. iii. 632.) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (36), bishop of Compli in Thrace, mentioned in the petition of Stephen of Larissa to the Roman synod under pope Boniface II., wherein he complains that they and other Thessalian bishops had been summoned to appear before Epiphanius of Constantinople, who had no jurisdiction over them, on an accusation of irregularly ordaining Stephen, A.D. 531. Through mutilation of the records, the decision of the synod is lost. (Le Quien, Oriens Christi. ii. 115; Mansi, viii. 743.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (27), bishop of Tiberiopolis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the synod held at Constantinople under Meennas, A.D. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christi. i. 799; Mansi, viii. 1146.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (28), bishop of Tholona (Tlos) in Lycia, at the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 536 (Mansi, viii. 974). When an appeal was made concerning a suit between him and Pistus, a deacon of the church of Telmessus, and the judges were in doubt whether it should be decided according to the law as it stood, or as it was at the time of the suit, the emperor Justinian ordered, by his Norella cvx., Theoderus, praetor throughout the East, that it should be decided by the law as it was at the time of the original pleadings (Kriigel, Corpus Juris Civilis. pt. iii. p. 490), and that this should form a rule for all future cases. Le Quien (Oriens Christi. i. 979) says that the emperor ordered the praetors not to heurate in correcting the decisions of the bishops. Baronius adduces this case as an instance of Justinian asserting an ecclesiastical jurisdiction disallowed by the canons (A. E. ann. 541, xvi.). [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (39), bishop of Damascus; present at the fifth general council held at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, x. 174; Le Quien, Oriens Christi. ii. 836.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (30), bishop of Maximianopolis (formerly Imara), in Thracia, near Rhodope; was present as a metropolitan at the fifth general council at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 391; Le Quien, Oriens Christi. i. 1200.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (31), II., bishop of Parnasus in Cappadocia, present at the synod called Trullana, or Quinisexta, held at Constantinople, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1005; Le Quien, Oriens Christi. i. 418.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (32), bishop of Amblada, in Lyconia, subscribed the canons of the synod called Quinisexta or Trullana, held at Constantinople, A.D. 692. (Mansi, x. 1004; Le Quien, Oriens Christi. i. 1078.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (33), bishop of Celenderis (Chelendrech) in Isauria, on the western coast of Cilicia. He was present at the seventh general council held at Nicea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 1000; Le Quien, Oriens Christi. ii. 1016.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (34), bishop of Lamus in Isauria, at the mouth of the river of the same name; present at the seventh general council held at Nicea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 150; Le Quien, Oriens Christi. ii. 1018.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (35), bishop of Hyrcania is the province of Lydia, present at the second Nicean council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christi. i. 888; Mansi, xii. 1102.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (36), bishop of Laodicea, the metropolis of Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the seventh general or second Nicean council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christi. i. 795; Mansi, xi. 994.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (37), bishop of Soli in Cyprus, present at the seventh general council (Nicea), A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christi. ii. 1073; Mansi, xii. 1099.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (38), bishop of Erithrea is the province of Asia, opposite Chios, present at the seventh general council (Nicea), A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 997; Le Quien, Oriens Christi. i. 728.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (39), March 29, bishop of Cyrus, an ancient town of Bithynia, and martry amid the Iconoclastic controversies. (Bas. Hs.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 790.) [G. T. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (40), succeeded Politian as orthodox patriarch of Alexandria, in 801, during the caliphate of Al-Rashid. He was patriarch of Mark over the Jacobite communion. He had been a linen manufacturer, but his life was changed by the discovery of a treasure, hidden in the place where he exercised his trade. He resolved to dedicate himself, with his unexpected wealth, to God, and entering the monastery of Al-Kosairi, was presently raised to its chief office in that office he built a church, dedicated to the two apostles, within the walls of Al-Kosairi, and also a room for the use of the bishop.

At the moment of his call to the chair of Alexandria, the recent cessation of the Iconoclastic controversy, and the position of the caliph for the service rendered him by Politian, might well have raised the hopes of the orthodox, but the short and uneventful patriarchate of Eustathius brought no change in the slow decline of their power. The Jacobites, on the other hand, were strengthened at this time by their reconciliation with the Barasannahians, a subdivision of the Apechali, who, at the close of the 5th century, had seceded from the main body in order to uphold the episcopal consecration of Barasannahius. Eustathius died in 805, and was succeeded by Christopher. (Estychi Annals, Oxon. 1658, tom. ii. 411; Le Quien, Oriens Christianissimi, Paris, 1740, ii. 464; Nestle, Patriarchate of Alexandria, ii. 195, 197; L'Art de dérover les Dotes, Paris, 1818, iii. 482.) [F. P.]

EUSTATHIUS (41), dean, by whose hands the elder Gregory of Nazianzus sent a letter to Eusebius of Samosata, cir. A.D. 370, begging him to come to Caesarea and aid in securing the election of Basil to the vacant see. (Basil, Epist. 47 [4].) [L. V.]
EUSTATHIUS (42), deacon, who enjoyed the confidence of Basil, and by whom Basil sent a letter to Eustathius of Samosata, A.D. 372 (Basil, Ep. 47 [4]). Later in the year Basil had to nurse Eustathius for two months in an illness, which afterwards attacked the rest of his household and finally himself (id. Ep. 136 [297]).

EUSTATHIUS (43), monk, who was a member of the family of Gregory Nazianzen at the time of his death, and appointed by him one of the guardians of his poorhouse. He was joint legate with Gregory, the deacon of a farm at Arianzene. (Greg. Naz. Testam.)

EUSTATHIUS (44), deacon of Macedonia, for whose deposition twenty-three Macedonian bishops, in the course of their synodal letter, petitioned Innocent I. the bishop of Rome, A.D. 414. In his reply, Dec. 13, 414, Innocent declines, on the ground that Eustathius, who had been frequently approved by him, had never been accused of any offence against the faith or of any mortal sin. (Innoc. Ep. 17, c. 7, § 13. Pat. Lat. xx. 539; Cellarius, Audaces Sac. vii. 515.)

EUSTATHIUS (45), an aurifex of Philadelphi in Lydia, A.D. 431, induced by Jacobus, a Nestorian, to abjure Quarto-decimanism and petition Theophanes, bishop of Philadelphia, to be restored to communion. He had also subscribed the "symbolum" of Jacobus. (Labbe, Concill. iii. 675, 678, 683.) [CHARISIUS (5)] [T. W. D.]

EUSTATHIUS MONACHUS (46), a solitary known only from his letter De Dubius Nicolæ ad Timotheum Scholasticius against the errors of Severus. It would seem to belong to the age of Justinian in the 6th century. The Greek text was printed by Mai, Vet. Script. Noc. vii. 277, and with a Latin translation by Migne, Patrolog. Gr. ixxvi. 1, p. 901 sq. [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (47), (EUSTRATIUS), presbyter of Constantinople, biographer of the patriarch Calixtus I. (533-569), and his chaplain. He was a faithful adherent to his superior in misfortune and prosperity, and regarded him as the greatest and holiest of men. His life, written in a tart and prolix style, was printed by Scuris (de Prov. Hist. SS. April 6, p. 83); by Mennchen, with annotations and introductory observations (Boll. Acta SS. 6. Ap. i. 559); by Papebroch in Greek, the name here being Eustathius (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. i. Append. p. lix.; and elsewhere). [EUSTACHYUS (18), sub fn.] He is identified with his contemporary Eustathius of Constantinople by Cave (c. 536), Fabry (Bibl. Gr. ed. Harles, x. 725, xi. 629), and some others. [EUSTATHIUS (53)]. [W. M. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (48), a reader in the church of Caesarea in Palestine, deposed by the bishop Eulogius (No. 5), on the false charge of having corrupted the virgin daughter of a presbyter. Having obtained the bishop's permission to marry the girl, he persuaded her to enter a monastery, where, at the birth of the child, according to Palladius, the innocence of Eustathius was miraculously proved. He devoted himself to an ascetic life, was endowed with extraordinary gifts, and was popularly regarded as a martyr. (Pallad. Hist. Lusiac. c. 141, pp. 1041-1045; Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. xi. 518.) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (50), March 14, otherwise called Eutychius, martyr with many others at the hands of the Arabs, at Carnæa, in Mesopotamia, in the 22nd year of Leo the Isaurian, A.D. 740. (Acta SS. Boll. Mart. iii. 355.) [G. T. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (51), a famous philosopher of Cappadocia, whom Basil travelled far in search of shortly after his return from Athens, A.D. 355, and to whom he addressed a letter from Alexandria (Basil, Ep. 1 [126]). [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (52), physician, ἐργατικός, to whom Basil addressed the doctrinal treatise which stands among his epistles (Ep. 189 [80]), maintaining the unity of the Divine nature in all three Persons of the Trinity, and ascribing the proper divinity of the Holy Spirit. This treatise is also found in a somewhat enlarged form among the writings of Gregory Nyssen (Opp. i. 5), but is ascribed by the best authorities to Basil (Tillem. Mém. Eccl. ix. 678, "S. Basilii," Note 77). [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (53), a domestic in the family of Theodora, a disciple and correspondent of Chrysostom. Theodora had expelled him from her house for some real or alleged misconduct. Chrysostom wrote from Cucusus very earnestly in behalf of Eustathius, saying that if he had been accused wrongfully simply justice required his restoration to favour, and that if he were really guilty Theodora should forgive him as she hoped to be forgiven. (Chrysost. Epist. 117.) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (54) of Elessa, a Messenian condemned at Antioch. (Photius, Cod. 52.) The common reading was Ἠὐσταθίου ἄλλος, and the person intended was supposed to be Eustathius of Seleucea; but according to Bekker this puzzle of a complimentary title given to a condemned heretic originated in a corruption of Ἑλληνικῶς written ἄλλως. [Kuchler.] [G. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (55), a quaeator at Constantinople, witness to the inventory presented by Germanus and Cassianus in refutation of the charge against Chrysostom of having made away with the church goods. (Pallad. Dial. p. 27.) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (56), translator of Basil's Homilies on the Hexameron into Latin, cir. A.D. 440. The translation was much praised by Cassiodorus. It was first printed by Nicholas Faber at Paris in his edition of the works of Basil, 1603. (Cassiod. Divin. Lect. cap. 2 in Patr. Lat. ix. 1110; Siegbert, Gmbl. de Gr. Eccl. cap. 21 in Patr. Lat. cl. 552; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 429.) [C. H.]

EUSTATHIUS (57), of Epiphaneia in Syria, wrote a history from the earliest times to the twelfth year of the emperor Anastasius. The work itself has perished, but we have citations from it or allusions to it several times in Evagrius, especially for the reign of Zeno (e.g. H. E. i. 9, ii. 15, iii. 29, 37, v. 24; Suidas, s. v.; Cave, Lit. Hist. i. 466). Nicephorus (H. E. iv. 57) speaks of his work as elegant.

[C. H.]

EUSTOCHIUM, third daughter of Paula (q.v.), the friend of Jerome, from whose writings all that is known of her is gathered. [The references given in this article are to the volumes and pages in Vallarsi's edition.]

Her original name, apparently, was Julia (i. 69), her father, Totius, was her ancestor through the Julian family. The Greek name Εὐστοχία (implying justness of aim) seems to have been added as a term of endearment. She was still of tender age (l. 184) when her sister Blerilla died, a.d. 384. We may suppose, therefore, that she was born about 370. She had shown from childhood a readiness to fall in with the ascetic views imbibed by her mother, and was confirmed in these by frequenting the house of Marcella (l. 952). Her uncle Hymettius, with his wife Praetextata (see Thierry's St. Jerome, i. 161), endeavoured to turn her from her purpose by inviting her to their house, changing her room, and bending over the mirror. The flattery of a patrician reception-room (l. 394, 683); but she resisted their seductions. Jerome relates that on the night after this attempt, an angel of threatening countenance appeared to Praetextata, warning her that, if she persevered in her wicked design, she would be bereaved of her husband and children, and that all this came to pass. By this and similar occurrences Eustochium became confirmed in her resolution, and she took the vow of perpetual virginity, being the first Roman lady of noble birth who had taken this step (l. 394). To confirm her in this course, Jerome addressed her in his celebrated treatise De Virginitate Servandae (l. 88), in which his experience as a hermit in the desert, the description of the monks of Nitria, the vision which had caused him to abandon classical studies, and a series of vivid pictures of the condition of Roman society, are made to enforce the superior sanctity of the state of virginity. This treatise, by exciting great anxiety against Jerome, was one of the causes of his leaving Rome and returning to Palestine. Paula and Eustochium resolved to go there also, and in the year 385 they embarked at Portus for the East. Eustochium accompanied her mother and Jerome in their journeys through Palestine and Egypt, and in their settlement at Bethlehem. There she was received with her mother in the building and management of the hospice and convent, and, on her mother's death in 404, became head of the establishment till her own death in 418, two years before that of Jerome. Jerome was himself at that time too weak to write her life, as he had written that of his other friends; but many passages in his writings give a picture of her character, and of her manner of life. She was small in stature; but, Jerome says, "in parvo corpuscula incertae animos cernebatis" (l. 290). She had great courage and decision of character (l. 394). She followed the ascetic teaching of Jerome and her mother with unwavering confidence and enthusiasm (l. 402, 403). She had considerable inquisitive energy; she spoke Greek and Latin with equal facility, and she learnt Hebrew also so as to sing the Psalms in the original (l. 720). Thierry considers that the incident relative to Sabinius (l. 1084) shows that she was deficient in the power of influence, and that the convent degenerated under her. Jerome, however, gives no hint of this. He praises her skill in the training of virgins, whom she led in all acts of devotion (l. 290), and to whom she set an example by undertaking all menial offices (l. 403). She was eager in her wish for the knowledge of the Scriptures, so that to her importance Jerome ascribes the writing of many of his Commentaries, which were sent to her in conjunction first with her mother and afterwards with her niece the younger Paula. The letters which Jerome wrote for her instruction were innumerable (ii. 956, Epistolaram ad Paulam et Eustochium, quia quotidie scribatur, incertus est numero). She attended her mother with devoted care during her last long illness (l. 721, 723), and, though left after her death in poverty (l. 671), she continued in her vocation to the end. She had as her coadjutress the younger Paula and the younger Melania, and continued with them her convent work and her study of Scripture, so that to the same Jerome the latest commentaries are dedicated. She is reckoned as a saint in the Roman church, her festival being on Sept. 28.

EUSTOCHIUS (1), June 23, provost and martyr at Anicrya, in Galatia, under Maximin, a.d. 311. (Bos. Men.)

EUSTOCHIUS (2), a layman who had given serious cause of offence to Cassian, whose younger Basil deprecates in his letter (Ep. 72, 73 [351, 388]). [CALLISTHENES.]

EUSTOCHIUS (3), a citizen of Constantinople, an early friend of Gregory Nazianzus, with whom he appears to have studied at Athens (Greg. Naz. Ep. 61), and to whom he subsequently sent a pupil named Proenus (Ep. 111). Nicobulus, the husband of Gregory's niece, having sent his son to study under another soothsayer named Stagirius, Eustathius was so much offended that he wrote to Gregory complaining of this breach of friendship, and bringing serious charges against his rival. Gregory replied, remonstrating faithfully but affectionately on his unworthy jealousy, which brought reproach on philosophy, and injured his own pupils (Ep. 61). Eustathius took these remonstrances in bad part, and began attacking Gregory himself, who wrote to him that he cared nothing for his insults, but that he had better hold his tongue if he could (Ep. 92).

EUSTOCHIUS (4), St., fifth archbishop of Tours, between St. Bricius and St. Perpetus. He was of senatorial rank, and, according to Gregory of Tours, "magnificæ sanctitatis vir"
EUSTOCHIUS

EUSTOCHIUS (6), eighth bishop of Angers, between Emerinius and Adelphius. He subscribed the first council of Orleans in 511. (Mansi, viii. 357; Gall. Christ. xiv. 547.)

EUSTOCHIUS (6), patriarch of Jerusalem, in succession to Peter, and according to Papebroch from a.d. 544 to 556. On the death of Peter, Eustochius, excommunicated of the church of Alexandria but residing at Constantinople, was favored by the emperor Justianin in preference to Macarius, an Originist, who had been first elected. At the synod of Constantinople a.d. 553, Eustochius was represented by three legates, Stephanus bishop of Raphis, Georgius bishop of Tiberias, Damasus bishop of Sozusa or Sosytsana (Mansi, ix. 173 c); and when the acts in condemnation of Originism were sent by the emperor to Jerusalem, all the bishops of Palestine except Alexander of Abila confirmed them. But in the monasteries of that province, and especially in that named the New Laura, the partisans of the proscribed opinions grew daily more powerful, notwithstanding the resolute efforts of the patriarch against them. In 555, after eight months of persistent admonition, Eustochius went in person, accompanied by the deacon Athanasius, the bishop of the opposition, and forcibly expelled the whole body of the Monophysites, replacing them by sixty monks from the principal haurra and sixty from other orthodox monasteries of the desert, under the prior Joanus. By these proceedings Originism was rooted out of Palestine. According to Victor Tunnensii Eustochius was removed from the patriarchate, and Macarius restored. (Cyrillus Scythopol. in Cotel. Monum. Eccles. Graec. iii. 373; Evagrius, H. E. iv. 37, 38; Victor Tunun. in Pat. L. xuiii. 982 a; Theoph. Chronog. A. M. 6689; Papebroch, Patriarch. Hierosol. in Boll. Acta SS. Intro. to vol. iii. of May, p. xxvii; le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 210.) Pagé (Ann. 561 iii.) discusses the chronology. See also Clinton, F. R. 537, 557.

EUSTOCHIUS (7), bishop of Avila, signs the seventh Council of Toledo, a.d. 646. (Esp. Sopr. xiv. 22; Aguirre-Catalan, iii. 429.) [JUSTINIANUS]

[M. A. W.]

EUSTOCHIUS (8), of St. Praxedes, cardinal-archbishop, present at the canonization of St. Swithbert by pope Leo III. In the presence of Charlemagne in the church of St. Swithbert at Werda (Kaiserswerth on the Rhine below Düsseldorf), on Sept. 4, 804. (Epicile of St. Ludgerus, cap. 8, in Surius, de Prob. Hist. SS. tom. ii. Mart. 1, p. 20, and in Baron. Annal. ann. 804, iv.)

EUSTOLIUS, a consecrated virgin of Antioch, whose intimate relations with Leucius, afterwards bishop of that see, having caused scandal, he mutinied himself in order that he might continue to enjoy her society without reproach. (Athanas. Apolog. pro fuja, c. 26, p. 718; Soccr. H. E. ii. 26.)

EUSTOLIUS, bishop of Nicomedia at the council of Anncy, a.d. 314. (Mansi, ii. 584 d; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 584.)

EUSTORGIUS (1), April 11, presbyter and martyr at Nicomedia (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi.)

EUSTORGIUS (3), named by Ambrose, with the title of confessor, as one of his predecessors in the see of Milan (Op. iii. p. 920). According to Ulpianus' Italia Sacra, he was the tenth bishop of Milan.

EUSTORGIUS (3), bishop of Dios-hieron (Christopolis) near Ephesus; his name was subscribed in his absence to the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, by the order of Stephen bishop of Ephesus, through Hesperor bishop of Pitane, a.d. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 723; Mansi, viii. 168.)

EUSTORGIUS (4), bishop of Milan, a.d. 512-518. There is a letter to him from Avitus archbishop of Vienne (Avit. Epist. in Patr. Lat. iixi. 227), addressed to him as a bishop. Avitus thanks him for the liberal contribution which he had sent him for the use of the church in Gaul. He is identified as bishop of Milan in a letter of Theodoric to count Adilla, enjoining that due care should be taken of the possessions of his see in the island of Sicily (Eustoricius, Var. ii. 29). He is supposed to have been the Eustorgius mentioned in the poems of Fanodius (Garon. ii. 50). In the epistles of the church to those among those attributed to Theodoric, but most probably written by himself, there is a remarkable one (Var. i. 9) addressed to Eustorgius, respecting the bishop of Augusta (Aosta), unjustly accused by his clergy of treasonable intentions. Theodoric would not punish them himself, but he remitted the case to the bishop of Milan, who he knew would deal with the case according to ecclesiastical usage. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 643; Ugh. Ital. Sac. iv. 55; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 113.)

EUSTOSIUS, Nov. 10, martyr at Antioch, with Demetrius a bishop, and Anianus a deacon. (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi.)

EUSTRATIUS (1), Dec. 13, martyr at Sebaste in Armenia, under the prefect Agricola in the Diocletian persecution (Bac. ier.; Col. Ryment.; Bar. Annal. 311, 20); Dec. 12 (Col. Armen.).

EUSTRATIUS (2), a kinsman of Gregory Nazianzen. In his behove Gregory wrote to Olympius, governor of Cappadocia (Turkey), begging that he would pardon some unspecified offence (Ep. 177).
EUSTRATIUS (3), count, addressed by Firmus bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who commends to his patronage an instrumental performer unsurpassed in skill by ancients or moderns, whose sacred music the count had often enjoyed. For the sake of Firmus and of the church itself this musician should be warmly encouraged. Firm. ep. 39, Pat. Gr. i. 1505. [C. H.]

EUSTRATIUS (4), EUSTACHIUS bishop of Sufes, near the river Bagrada, in the Byzasene province of Africa, one of the bishops banished by Genseric on the accusation that he had referred to him in his sermons, as Victor Vitensis narrates, in his book De Persecutione Vandal., b. i. c. 7 (Patrol. Lat. xviii. 190). He seems, however, to have returned, as he was summoned to the conference at Carthage, A.D. 484, and subsequently banished by Hunneric. He is mentioned in Bede's Martyrology, on 28th Nov. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 268; Patrol. Lat. xcv. 1117). [L. D.]

EUSTRATIUS (5), presbyter of the Greek church at Constantinople, contemporary with the patriarch Eutychius, author of a work variously cited as De Vita functorum Statu, De Vita functorum Animis, On the State of the Dead. Photius (cod. 171) mentions the work describing its scope, but citing no formal title. Leo Allatius discovered the actual work and printed it with a Latin translation in his Agreement of the Churches of West and East about Purgatory, Rome, 1655, pp. 336 sq. The Latin version alone appeared afterwards in the Max. Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xxviii. 362; Cave, i. 538; Cellier, xi. 347. This author has been identified with Eustathius, the biographer of Eutychius. [EUSTATHIUS (47).] The treatise argues (1) that the souls of the dead, blessed or accursed, think and act after separation from the body; (2) that the souls which have appeared to men have their characteristic qualities; (3) that prayers for the dead are efficacious. His arguments are a strange medley. [W. M. S.]

EUSTRATIUS (7), bishop of Apamaea or Myrcia, in Bisitius, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 657; Mansi, xii. 1096.) [L. D.]

EUSTRATIUS (8), bishop of Methymna, in the island of Lesbos, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 961; Mansi, xii. 1096.) [L. D.]

EUSTRATIUS (9), bishop of Cotraia (otherwise Cordatus or Coradus) in Iasoria. Its situation is doubtful. Eustathius was present at the seventh general council at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 142; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1032.) [J. de S.]

EUSTRATIUS (10), bishop of Debeltum in north-eastern Thracia. Was present at the seventh general council held at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 150; and Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1184.) [J. de S.]

EUSYCHIUS, hermit. [EUSYNIUS.]

EUTACTIUS. [ARCHONTIUS.]

EUTALIUS, bishop of Edessa. [EUTALIUS (2).]

EUTALIUS, a bishop in Cyprus, one of those to whom the synodal of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria in the year 400, in condemnation of Origen, is addressed. (Jerome, Ep. xxii.) [W. H. F.]

EUTERIUS (1), Feb. 22, martyr with thirty-one others at Nicomedia, under Diocletian, A.D. 304. He was a member of the imperial guard. The exaggerations with respect to the martyrdoms at Nicomedia are very great. In the modern Roman Martyrology, on March 13, 10,000 martyrs at Nicomedia are noted. In Greek Menology, at Sept. 4, there are 3628 commemorated, while at Dec. 25 we are told that many thousands of martyrs were there buried in a church. (Acts SS. Boll. Feb. iii. 288.) [G. T. S.]

EUTERIUS (2), first abbot of Monza, in Avvernse, mentioned in a charter of Pope Sixtus, citing that Euterius obtained authority for the erection of the monastery from king Thedoric and his son king Clovis, i.e. Thierry III. and Clovis III. The tenor of the charter is given by Mabillon (Annal. t. ii. p. 204), but the text does not occur in the collections of Pertz and Baluze. See also Gall. Chi. ii. 392. [C. H.]

EUTHALIA (1), Aug. 27, virgin and martyr at Leontini, in Sicily, about the year 257. She is said to have been killed by her brother Sermilianus, on becoming a Christian. Her name was inserted in the Roman calendar by pope Paul V. Her acts, which are fabulous, were published by Octav. Cajetanus in his Fab. SS. Scol. t. i. p. 76. (Acta SS. Bell. Aug. vi. p. 12; Mem. Gregori. Serlet. in Canisius Antiq. Lect.) [G. T. S.]

EUTHALIA (2), a lady, a correspondent of Chrysostom, to whom he wrote from Cæsarea in A.D. 404 and 405, thanking her for her kindness in writing to him, and begging her to continue to do so frequently. He praises her for despising the things of this world, and directing her chief care to her spiritual state. (Chrysost. Epist. xxxii. 178.) [E. V.]

EUTHALIA (1), bishop of Byblus in Phoenicia, north of Beyrut. He is mentioned in the Basilian Menologion (June 13, Patrol. Gr. cxxxvi. 496), as having administered baptism to the martyr Aquillina during the persecution of Diocletian. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 821.) [J. de S.]

EUTHALIA (2), bishop of Edessa, present at the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325 (Mansi, ii. 694, where the name occurs under the form Ethalios, Athalios, Atholus. The Chronicle of Edessa, cap. 14 (Assem. Bibl. Or. i. 394), says he was made bishop in 324, and built the cemetery and the south side of his church. Assenian transliterates the name Astiallos, which means (Stanley, East. Church, p. 104, 4th ed.) the brought of God," like the Greek Theophares. The Syrian writer Amrus (Assem. iii. 589) calls him Rabulas. Moses of Choren (ib. ii. cap. 89) in the French translation of Le Vaillant (p. 373) calls him Euthalius, and in the Italian version of Cappelletti (p. 193) Eutilio. This writer speaks of Euthalius journeying to the council in company with Jacobus of Nisibis and John of Persia.

[C. H.]

EUTHALIUS (3), a fellow deacon with Gregory Nazianzen. The civil authorities having endeavoured to compel him to military service after he had attained the presbyterate, Gregory wrote to Amphiliacus, then a leading advocate, to use his influence to get him off (Ep. 159). If he was the same person, he was accused by one Philadelpheus, a kinman and brother presbyter, of having imprisoned and beaten him. Gregory wrote desiring a deacon named George, to whom from some authority in the church, to bring Euthalius before him to answer to the charge (Ep. 182).

[E. V.]

EUTHALIUS (4), bishop of Colophon in the province of Asia, present at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1217; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 726.)

EUTHALIUS (5), a deacon of Alexandria, afterwards bishop of Sylae, for there is no doubt that both designations belong to the same person.

The time at which he has flourished has been erroneously stated by Cave as A.D. 396 (Hist. Lit. sac. iv.). But this date, mentioned in a short statement on the martyrdom of St. Paul at the close of the twenty-third Epistle of that Apostle, does not apply to himself, but to one whom, in the course of the Prologue, he had described as "a certain father most wise and most beloved of Christ." Immediately afterwards, however, he gives the date of his own day as sixty-three years later, thus bringing the date in this Prologue to the close. Such an indication, bringing the date of this Prologue, was confirmed by the fact that the works of Euthalius are dedicated to Athanasius the Younger, who was bishop of Alexandria about the middle of the fifth century. At that time Euthalius appears to have been a deacon of the Alexandrian church, and to have turned his attention to the study of the Holy Scriptures. Since he has generally been known as the author of the Euthalian Sections, we shall speak of him first.

It is hardly necessary to remind the reader that the different books of the New Testament were originally written without divisions of any kind, whether of chapters, verses, or words, from their beginning to their close, while at least is the appearance presented by them in our most ancient MSS.; and, as it can be shewn that these MSS. were copied in their form from old papyrus rolls, there is not the slightest reason to doubt that the characteristic of their structure, of which we are now speaking, belonged to them in their earliest condition, when they issued from the hands of the sacred writers. The inconveniences arising from this must have been manifold and great, but the first steps towards improvement seem to have proceeded less from any desire to remedy these, than from the wish to supply an easy means of reference to the parallel passages of the gospels. This was done by what are known as the Ammonian Sections, together with the Eusebian Canons, any detailed account of which would lead us too far away from our present purpose. It is enough to say that to Ammonius of Alexandria, in the 3rd century, is generally ascribed the merit of having been the first to divide all the four gospels into sections, regulated by the substance of the narratives contained in them. As yet, however, no similar principle of division had been carried into any of the other books of the New Testament. It was Euthalius who introduced a system of division into all the books of the New Testament not yet divided, except the Apocalypse, which proved as acceptable that it spread rapidly over the whole Greek church and has become, by its presence or absence, a valuable test of the antiquity of a MS.

Euthalius was not indeed really the first to suggest the whole of that scheme of division associated with his name. As far as the Epistles of St. Paul are concerned, he himself tells us that he only adopted the scheme of the "father" already alluded to. The name of this father is nowhere given, and Mill's conjecture (Prolegomena N. T. p. 78) that it was Theodochus of Monestria, whose name was concealed, because he was at that time under censure of the church, has hardly sufficient positive ground to rest on. But, whoever he may have been and however Euthalius may have been stirred up by his example to independent exertion, there seems to be no doubt that the latter, by means, in all probability, of his other labours, and of the more critical apparatus, by which we have here to speak, procured for them the acceptance which they soon obtained. It will give some idea of the length of these glossa if we observe that in the Epistle to the Romans there were 19; in that to the Galatians 12; in that to the Ephesians 10; in First Thessalonians 7; in Second Thessalonians 8; in Hebrews 22; in the Epistle to Philemon 2; and so with the other Epistles.

In themselves these sections possess no value. The whole value arises from the fact that they were very widely adopted throughout the church, and that transcribers of manuscripts were in the habit of using them, and marking them on their own part. Since not a single copy is known in the Ammonian Sections, with their numbers in the Eusebian Canons, are marked, the evidence is almost irresistible that the manuscript falls between the time of Eusebius and the early part of the 5th century. Where our evidence as to antiquity is often at the best defective, every consideration that can render the least help is to be valued; and thus this simple arrangement has preserved the name of Euthalius when all his other labours might have failed to do so. Of these labours we have now to speak.

They relate mainly to three points in connexion with the text: the Larger Sections or Lessons, which Euthalius was the chief instru-

tement of leading the Greek church to adopt upon a uniform plan; the smaller divisions, or \( \sigma'\varepsilon\varphi\alpha\varsigma \) as they were called, to which, if he did not introduce them, he at least gave a greater currency than they previously possessed; and his plan of collecting and noting the quotations from the Old Testament in the New. We will remark upon each of these:

(1) The Lessons. Fixed lessons to be read in public worship had been known even in the synagogue, and there can be little doubt that they passed into the Christian church, at least as soon as the canon was settled. But up to the time of Euthalius there seems to have been little or no uniformity in them. Individual churches, for the most part, had divisions of their own.
The scheme proposed by Euthalius, however, so commended itself that it speedily became general wherever the Greek tongue was spoken.
The whole of the New Testament, except the Gospels and the Apocalypse, was divided by it into fifty-seven portions, some certainly very difficult to divide, from the others. In Acts there were 16; in the Pauline Epistles 31; 5 in Romans; 5 in First Corinthians; 4 in Second Corinthians, &c.; in the Catholic Epistles, 10;
2 in James; 2 in First Peter; 1 in Second Peter, &c.; in all 57. Of these, 53 were for the Sundays of the year, which seem alone to have been composed by the Alexandrian Synaxarists, and it is supposed by Mill that the other four were for Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Epiphany. (Proleg. in N. T. p. 96.)

(2) The smaller divisions. These are the well-known \( \sigma'\varepsilon\varphi\alpha\varsigma \) \( \tau \) that is, lines, in Latin versus, each containing either a few words complete in themselves, or so as much as it was possible to read without effort at one breath. Like that of the sections or capitula formerly spoken of, the plan of these \"verses\" was not introduced by Euthalius. It had already been adopted in the case of some of the poetical books, and even in some of the poetical parts of the prose books of the Old Testament. The Testament had occasionally employed it. It had been sanctioned by Origen. The Vulgate had used it, and it is found in the psalms of the Vatican and Sinaitic manuscripts, both as old as the time of which we speak, if not even older. Nay, the idea had also been partially applied to the New Testament, for Scripture refers to Origen as speaking of the 100 \( \sigma'\varepsilon\varphi\alpha\varsigma \) of the second, and third epistles of St. John, of the few of St. Paul's Epistles, of the \"very few\" of I John; while Eustathius of Antioch, in the 4th century, is said to reckon 135 from John viii. 59 to x. 31 (Introduction to Codex D, p. 17). It is clear, however, from the figures thus quoted, that many of these divisions cannot have been \( \sigma'\varepsilon\varphi\alpha\varsigma \) in the strict sense of the term. They must have been of very unequal length, and for the most part considerably larger than those divisions to which the term properly belongs.
The credit due to Euthalius lay in this, that what was before partially and imperfectly done, was united under one head, and comprehended with greater care. His work thus forms an important step in the process by which punctuation, so invaluable to the ordinary reader of the Bible, was at last reached.

But it was hardly as a system of punctuation, however imperfect, that the divisions to which we refer were at first designed. Euthalius, in describing his labours on the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles, makes no mention of this. He speaks only of increased facility of reading, and more especially of the meet expression which his labours afforded to that love and admiration of scripture which ought to lead to its being adorned in everycreasing measure by successive students. (p. 400)
In the Epistle to the Romans he made 920 such \( \sigma'\varepsilon\varphi\alpha\varsigma \); in Galatians, 293; in Ephesians, 312; in First Thessalonians, 193; in Second Tes-ssonians, 106; in Hebrews, 703; in Philem., 37; and so on.

(3) Still a third part of the labours of our author was expended upon enumerating all the quotations from the Old Testament, and even from profane writers, to be found in those books of the New Testament to which his attention was turned. These he numbered in one catalogue; assigned to the various books wherein they were taken in a second; and quoted at length in a third.

The points of which we have hitherto spoken refer to the outward arrangements of the sacred text; but, if we may look upon the Arguments which are published as a part of the works of Euthalius as his own, and not as the production of a later hand, we went also into the substance and meaning of the books edited by him. These Arguments contain short summaries of the books to which they are prefixed, and convey a simple and excellent idea of their contents. It has indeed been contended by Zacagnius, their editor, that they must belong to a later time than that of Euthalius, inasmuch as they present discrepancies from statements in other parts of his works as to the places where the Epistles were written (Praef. p. 60). Thus the Argumentum to First Corinthians states that it was written from Ephesus (p. 589); but in the collected statement as to the cities whence all the epistles were written, Philippus is said to have been the place (p. 584). The argument is by no means conclusive. It may be urged with equal, if not more probability, that the general statement is the interpolation, and that it is extremely unlikely that at a date later than that of Euthalius, any one could have been found to depart from the long-standing tradition of the church.

However this may be, it is not without interest to observe that both Euthalius himself and his patron Athanasius had wonderfully correct ideas of the manner in which such a work as one on the text of the New Testament should be set about; for when the patriarch, interested by his deacon's success with the Pauline Epistles, urged him to undertake a similar treatment of the Acts and Catholic Epistles, we are told that he immediately set out to Caesarea in order that he might there have the best opportunity of comparing the famous MSS. of Origen and of Pam-philus the martyr, which had been collected by Eusebius, bishop of that city. At the close of his work, he is said to have sent drafts of the states that he had done this. (Works, p. 512.)

Beyond the critical labours of which we have spoken, it does not appear that Euthalius atttempted much. He wrote indeed a short life of St. Paul, which forms the first part of his work on the fourteen epistles of that apostle. But is is so bold and meagre that it is altogether undeserving of notice. Besides this, it has been said that the Acts of the Apostles and the Gospel of St. Luke; and that in an ancient catena on the epistle to the Romans fragments of his writings were to be found. None of these statements seem to be correct. Zacagni, at all events, tells us that he had searched everywhere for the commentaries spoken of, but in vain. (Proef. p. 71.)

We have seen that Euthalius began his labours as a deacon of the church, and it was in this capacity that he earned the distinction which has hinged his name down to posterity. In later life he was appointed to a bishopric, and he is known as Episcopus Sullensis. Socratees observes that Sulci in Sardinia is the only see of that name that he can find (Intr. p. 58, n. 1). Possibly that may be the place; yet it is unlikely that one who had belonged to the church at Alexandria, and who had earned his promotion at the hands of his bishop, would be sent all the way to Sardinia, and to the See of Sulci. It is possible that the See of Sulci may have been the same name as Salsa, a city of the Thebaid near Syene, and that there, in recognition of his labours, Euthalius was honoured with the episcopate; but Galland throws doubt on the conjecture. It is unnecessary to inquire further into a point of this kind, on which it is almost impossible to throw any light.

The works of Euthalius remained long unknown. Cave had spoken of them as hidden away somewhere, but obviously without any notion where they might be. At last, however, in A.D. 1639, they were edited and published at Rome by Laurentius Alexander Zacagni, prefect of the Vatican Library, in the first volume of his Collectanea Monumentorum Veterum Ecclesiae Graecae ac Latinae. The edition has prefixed to it a long preface by the editor, in which different questions relating to Euthalius are discussed with much care. It has been printed in Galland (Biblioth. Pat. x. 197) and in Migne (Pat. Gr. lxxxv. 621). Notices of Euthalius will also be found in the Prolegomena of the New Testament of Wetstein and Mill, and in Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament.

EUTHARIC, an Ostrogoth, belonged to the stock of the Amali. He was an indirect descendant of Ermanaric, and grandson of Berthmund, who had wandered from the Ostrogoths to the Visigoths (Dahn, Die König der Germanen, ii. 115, 116). He married Amalasuntha, the only daughter of Theodoric. Their son Athalaric was born anno 518. Theodoric allowed his son-in-law to be adopted by Justinian ("actus est per arma filius Cassiod. Var. Epist. lxxxv. 11 Migne, lxxxv. 723"). Athalaric was consul in 518, and though he was hostile to and severs upon the Catholics, by the magnificence of his games and his genial bearing he condescended the people of Rome. He died a few years before Theodoric. (Jordanes, ed. Clovis 168; Excerpta Valesiani, i.e. the chronicle of Maximian, a bishop of Ravenna, ed. Thomsen, 1875, p. 301; Dahn, Die König der Germanen, ii. 176.)

tactor, Gratus, at the council held under Eusebius of Milan, in A.D. 431. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 97, 1085, in Pat. Lat. iv. 846 n.) He is identified in Gallus Christianus, xii. 806, with a bishop Eustatius or Eustachius, who was present at a council in A.D. 381 at Aquileia (S. Ambros. Opera, 780, 1), whom Gall. Christ. and Gama (Series Episc. p. 828) call "Saint," and who is identified, without much ground, with a Eustachius mentioned in the "de laudibus municipii" published among his works (Acta S. Victoric (see Gheqoëri, A.D. SS. Belgio, i. 420, § 11). [EUTSTATIUS (12).] [C. G.]

EUTHERIUS (1) (ERHERIUS), subscribed the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Athanas. i. 132. Patr. Grsec. xxv. 337). [W. M. S.]

EUTHERIUS (2), bishop of Tyana, an earnest Nestorian, and an acknowledged leader of that party both in the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and for some time afterwards. Before the assembling of that council he was in active correspondence with John of Antioch, on the subject of the allegiance of the church of Alexandria and his adherents (Cyril (?), vol. i. 764 a. ; Theodoret. Ep. 112. ; Migne, Patrologia Gr. lxxxiii. 1310). He was one of the 68 who demanded that the council should not be opened until John's arrival (Synodicon ad. Traged. Irenan. ; Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxiv. 566). The appeal of Nestorius after his deposition to the emperor is signed by Euthérius, as are also the sentences of deposition pronounced in the synod convened by John of Antioch at his lodging (Acta Concilior. u. s. 598). On July 1 Cyril and his party wrote to the emperor to complain of the proceedings of John and his friends, among whom they name Euthérius (Act. Co. Ep. Labbe and Cossart, u. s. 740-751). On July 18, John of Antioch and his adherents were deposed and excommunicated, and Euthérius among them (Act. Co. Ep. acta v. u. s. 654). Both parties now issued circulars to the churches relating what they had done, and what had been done by others, and both were signed by Euthérius. Towards the end of the month a letter arrived from the emperor, commanding all to return to their homes in peace. This was addressed to fifty-one bishops by name, and among them Euthérius. Euthe terius would seem to have at once obeyed the imperial injunction, and shortly after we find him in friendly correspondence with his neighbour, Firmus of Caesarea, notwithstanding that Firmus had taken part in his excommunication, on the subject of a lawsuit which was pending between two members of their several flocks. (Firm. ep. 23. ; Patrol. Gr. lxxi. 1498.) But before the end of the year, deposition of Euthérius at Ephesus had been confirmed at Constantinople.

Soon after this Firmus was sent to Tyana, to ordain a successor to Euthérius, and met with great opposition on the part of the citizens, who were evidently much attached to their bishop. Long ago also, the imperial officer who was in command of the Isaurian troops stationed in the city, interfered; and both Firmus, and the person whom he had ordained in spite of the opposition with which he met, were compelled to flee. The newly ordained bishop soon renounced his orders, and seems to have returned to lay life. (Theodoret, Ep. Hypomnem. Alex. Hierap. Synodicon. c. 45, u. s.)
EUTHERIUS

When negotiations were opened for reconciliation between the rival patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch, one of the conditions upon which John and his adherents at first most strenuously insisted was the restoration of, among others, the deposed bishop of Tyana (Theodore, ad Hesiod. ep. Mar. Mercator.); Migne, Patr. xlviii. 1081). In the meanwhile, Eutharius and his fellow sufferers had written to Cyril, to Maximian, the newly appointed successor of Nestorius, and also to Xystus bishop of Rome, to protest against the extreme measures of which they were the victims. (Cyril, ad Donatum. ep. 45, ol. 42; Migne, Patr. Gr. lxviii. 250, and Act. Co. Epk. pt. ii. c. 38.) In their letter to Xystus they not only complain of Cyril, but they also charge him with having introduced “novelties.” At the same time they express their painful astonishment that John should have so far yielded to Cyril as he had done, and pray the intercession of Xystus with the emperor in their behalf. (Synodicon, c. 117, u. s. 727; and Migne, Patr. i. 594."

After the reconciliation had been effected, Eutharius wrote to John to renounce with him on his inconsistency and want of loyalty to what he once contended for, but says nothing of his having abandoned his friends, and left them to their fate. (Synodicon, c. 73, u. s. 681.) Eutharius wrote to Alexander II. Hierapolitanus, who was equally opposed to the reconciliation, a long letter in which he ably defends the position which they and others were still determined to maintain (Synodicon, c. 201, u. s. 815); and to Helladius bishop of Tarsus, who had also written to Alexander, to enforce his position, if he had any. (Synodicon, c. 74, u. s. 684.) Eutharius was ultimately banished to Scythopolis, and from thence to Tyre, where he died. (Synodicon, c. 190, u. s.)

Eutharius is the author of a treatise in seven chapters, with a preface, letter addressed to Eutharius, bishop of Parmisia, in which Photius ascribed to Theodoret (Phot. Biblioth. c. xiv, Migne, Patr. Gr. ciii. 79), which has since been attributed by some to Maximus the Martyr, and by others to Athanasius (Garner’s notes on Marius Mercator in Patr. l. xviii. 759, 1098, 1097; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. ed. Harles, viii. 304), in which he subjects the “Scholia” of Cyril of Alexandria, “de Incarnazione Unigeniti” (Mar. Mercat. u. s. 1066) to elaborate and searching criticism. This treatise is still published with the works of Athanasius, but among the “Dubia,” under the title of “Confutationes quarumdam Propositionum” (Athanas. Op. Patr. Gr. x. 337, in Praef. to the Dubia, p. 1287, and cf. the titles of chapters 8–24, inclusive of the “Libri” read by Photius with those of the seventeen chapters of the “Confutationes”). Gams infers from the preface letter that Eutharius published this treatise before his banishment.

EUTHERIUS (3), bishop of Stratonicia, in the province of Lydia. His name is appended to the protest signed by several bishops against the opening of the Council of Ephesus before the arrival of John of Antioch; nevertheless, he attended the first session, which was held on the day of the protest, A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 893; Mansi, iv. 1224; Baluz. Synod. c. 7, Concil. 698.)

EUTHERIUS (4), (Aethereius), bishop of Sardis, the metropolis of the province of Lydia, received a letter from the emperor Leo, ordering him to collect his province, and to inquire about the murder of St. Proterius of Alexandria, and about the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. The synodal letter sent in answer to Leo is extant. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 862; Mansi, iv. 523, 571.)

EUTHERIUS (5), a person whom pope Gregory the Great styles “magnificis memoris,” and for whose death he writes to console Clementius, Patricius. From some misapprehended allusion to episcopal duties in the letter Eutharius has been conjectured to have been a bishop. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 11; Patr. Lat. xlviii. 458.)

EUTHERIUS (6), bishop of Chartres. [Eutharios (2).]

EUTHMIUS or Euthymius, deacon and martyr at Alexandria. He died in prison. (Mar. Vit. Rom., Adon., Usuard.)

EUTHONUS, an Italian bishop who suffered martyrdom in Bithynia, A.D. 311. (Baronius, Annal. 311, 18.)

EUTHORIO, king of the Visigoths. [Eutric.]

EUTHMIUS (1), a convert at Milan, cir. A.D. 390. During the struggle between the emperor Justinus and Ambrose at Milan, Justinus offered high dignities and rewards to catch a would withdraw Ambrose from the church and conduct him into banishment. Euthymius purposely took a residence near the church, and kept a carriage in readiness. At the end of a year, however, and on the very day in which he had hoped to take Ambrose by surprise, he was himself surprised and was taken into banishment in the very carriage which he himself had provided. Euthymius, reflecting upon the workings of Providence, was himself converted. (Paulin. in Vit. Ambros. sec. 12.)

EUTHMIUS (2), a presbyter of Constantinople, who with Philip presided over the church in that city, from which office they were deposed on account of their adherence to the cause of Chrysostom, and the freedom with which they had condemned the proceedings of his persecution. Chrysostom wrote to Euthymius from Caucasus in A.D. 404 to console him under his trials, and to encourage him to persevere. (Chrysost. Epist. 318.)

EUTHMIUS (3), the youngest of the four Nitrian solitaries known as “the Tall Brothers.” [Chrysostom; Diodoros.] [E. Y.]

EUTHMIUS (4), abbot in Palestine. He was born in 377, at Melitene in Armenia. His parents’ names were Paulus and Diospias, and his birth was considered an answer to prayer made at the shrine of the martyr Polyaeuctes. His tutor was Aacius, afterwards bishop of Melitene. He was placed at an early age under the direction of Ortes, bishop of that town. After his ordination to the presbyterate he was placed in charge of all the monasteries in and near the place.

Finding this care too great an interruption to his meditations, in his twenty-ninth year he escaped to Jerusalem, to visit the holy places, and settled at the dwelling of a community of separate monks called Pharan, six miles from Jerusalem.

Having made a particular friendship with another hermit, named Theoctistus, he used to take long walks with him into the desert of Cetila at sacred seasons. On one of these occasions, in the fifth year of his stay at Pharan, they came to a tremendous torrent, with a cavern on one of its banks. Here they determined to live lost to the world. They were, however, after a time discovered by some shepherds, who were at first terrified by their appearance, but afterwards sent them gifts from their village. The fathers of Pharan also found them out, and came at times to see them. About 411 Euthymius began to take to monastic life. They turned the cavern into a church, and built a monastery on the side of the ravine where it was situated. Theoctistus had charge of it.

In 420 he erected a laura, like that of Pharan, on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. The fathers of this place and his own disciples were allowed to come to consult him on Saturdays and Sundays, and his advice was always given with captivating sweetness and humility. In A.D. 428 the church of his laura was consecrated by Juvenal the first patriarch of Jerusalem, accompanied by the presbyter Hesychius and the celebrated Passarion, governor of a monastery in Jerusalem.

A new turn was given to the life of Euthymius by a cure which he effected for Terebon, son of Aspebutes, prince of the Saracens. The biographer Cyril had obtained the details from many of the Fathers, but the most authentic edition of the story was given to him personally by another Terebon, grandson of the subject of the cure. Prince Aspebutes, the Saracens, was tributary to the Persians, but came under the supremacy of Rome in the following manner. Towards the end of the reign of Isedeger, king of Persia, a persecution was aroused against the Christians. Orphans were appointed on all the monasteries as prefect of the East; he received him kindly, and made him prefect of all the subjects of the Empire then living in Arabia. The son Terebon, who was not yet grown up, had for some time suffered from some kind of paralysis, which had withered his right side from head to foot. The boy is said to have had a dream indicating the abode of Euthymius and Theoctistus. At any rate, the sheikh Aspebutes brought him to that gloomy retreat. When they arrived with a large train of followers, they were refused admittance to Euthymius because it was neither Saturday nor Sunday. The sheikh challenged Theoctistus by the hand, and silently pointed to his affected leg. Terebon, too, himself made an eloquent appeal. Theoctistus reported the scene to his superior; Euthymius did not care to disobey what was said to be a heavenly vision, and came down to the party below. His prayers are narrated to have restored health to the patient, and the whole company believed on the Lord Jesus. Euthymius ordered a little recess for water to be hollowed out in the side of the cave, and baptized them on the spot. The sheikh took the name of Peter. His brother-in-law Maris refused to leave the place, and joined the community of anchorites, bestowing all his wealth for the enlargement of the buildings. The report spread over Palestine and the neighbouring countries, and Euthymius was besieged with applications for medical assistance and prayer.

Mindful of his former untroubled tranquillity, he meditated a flight to a still more secluded place, which is called Ruba in the narrative. Theoctistus, however, divined his intention, and collecting all the brethren, made them fall on their knees and beseech him to remain. But in spite of this, some few days later he set out with a disciple named Domitian, and took up various stations on the barest peaks of the awful solitude near the Dead Sea, in some cases founding small settlements of monks amongst the ruins left by Amorites or Moabites.

The next event of importance is the visit of Peter, bishop of the Saracens, on his way to the council at Ephesus, A.D. 431. Euthymius exhorted him to unite with Cyril of Alexandria, and with Acacius of Melitene, and to do in regard to the creed whatever seemed right to those two prelates.

When the council of Chalcedon issued its decrees (451) two of his disciples, Stephen and John, who had been present, carefully brought them to their master, to see whether he approved of them. The report of his sanction spread through the desert, and all the recluses would have followed his example but for the influence of the monk Theodosius, whose life and doctrine appear to have been equally unsatisfactory, who even did his utmost to persuade Euthymius himself to reject Chalcedon, but without success.

The empress Eudoxia, an energetic Eutychian, next crosses the path of Euthymius. After the death of her husband in 456, Eudoxia went to Jerusalem, alleging a vow as the cause of her journey. She does not seem to have been satisfied with her religious position, and being urged by her brother Varianus to become reconciled to the Catholic church, she determined to have the opinion of the celebrated anchorite of Palestine. Knowing that he would never set foot in a town, she built a tower about four miles south of his laura, on the highest part of the great waste. She sent to him Cosmas, guardian of the so-called True Cross at Constantinople, and Anastasius a bishop. He came; and after giving his blessing to the empress, advised her that the violent death of her son and of Valentinian, the irruption of the Vandals, the captivity of her daughter Eudoxia, and of her grandchildren, might all be viewed in connexion with her Eutychian opinions. She should abjure her schism, and embrace the communion of Jrenual, patriarch of Jerusalem. The empress obeyed Euthymius and took the vows of a nun, and her example was followed by a multitude of monks and laymen. A celebrated anchorite, also, named Gensinius, owed his separation from Eutychianism to Eutychius.

Eutychius died in A.D. 473; his obsequies were celebrated by the patriarch Anastasius and a large number of clergy, among whom are mentioned Chrysippus, Guardian of the Cross, and a deacon named Fidus.

EUTYCHIMIUS, patriarch. [EUPHRIUS (4).]

EUTHYMius (9), bishop of Sardis. He was a strong opponent of the iconoclastic emperors. He was present at the Nicene council, A.D. 787, in which he took an active part, and read the confession of faith in the name of the council at the fourth session. He was banished by the emperor Nicephorus, and, according to the Bollandists, ultimately suffered martyrdom under the emperor Theophilus. He is commemorated Dec. 29 (Cant. Byzant.), and on March 11. (Mansi, xii. 904, 1016, 1038, 1148, xiii. 135, 171, 366, 382; AA. SS. Bol. 11 Mart. ii. 73, 3 April, i. 283 in the Life of Nicetas; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 862).

EUTYCHIMIUS (9), bishop of Sardis in Thrace, present at the council held at Nicea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, xii. 149, 372; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1182).

EUGINIUS (9), or Euthychius, Nov. 13, martyr, with his brother Paschalius and two others, in the Arian persecution, raised by the Vandals against the Catholics in the 5th century. Ado notes them on Nov. 12, and records how faithfully they maintained their faith against Sigeric king of Vandals. He tortured and killed them. (Prosper, Chron. a.d. 437; Reinart in Hist. Persuict. Vandai. p. 431, a.d. 441; Tillemont, Mem. xvi. 500; Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuard.)

EUTICHIUS (1)—May 21. A deacon and martyr, with Polius and Timotheus, at Caesarea in Mauritania. (Marti. Vet. Rom., Mart. Hieron., Adon., Usuard.)*

EUTICHIUS (2), hermit. [EUSITIUS.]

EUTICHIUS (1), Oct. 5, martyr in Sicily, with Placidus and thirty others. (Marti. Hieron., Adon., Usuard, Raban.)*

EUTICHIUS (2), Dec. 11, martyr in Spain. (Marti. Hieron., Adon., Usuard.)*

EUTICHIUS (1), Sept. 19, martyr, with St. Januarious, bishop of Beneventum. [JANUARIUS]

EUTICHIUS (2), Sept. 29, martyr, with Plautus, at Heraclea in Thrace. (Marti. Hieron., Usuardi, Rabani.)*

EUTICHIUS (3), Dec. 28, presbyter and martyr at Ancysa, in Galatia. He suffered with a deacon, Demetianus. (Marti. Hieron., Usuardi.)*

EUTROPIA (EUTRHO). In the Irish annals reference is made to a sacrificial act of special enormity, which took place at Kildare, the true year probably being A.D. 762 (Ann. T. G.). The entry in the Four Masters (by Donovan, i. 588–589, A.D. 753) is:—"Euthegn (Eutychins, Ann. Uit., and Leteguins, Ann. Tigernach), a bishop, was killed by a priest at the altar of St. Bright, at Kildare (as he was celebrating mass, Ann. Clon.), between the crocaginel and the altar: from whence it arose that ever since a priest does not celebrate mass in the presence of a bishop at Kildare." In the Ann. Uit. and Tigernach, this is said to have taken place in a derethae or duirtheach, 48 mēid mēid a Cairt which, in the former, O'Conor interprets as "in hispicio pauperum Eudarins," and in the latter as "in dono pontificio monasterii Cildarensis," but evidently the "derethae" was the oratorium or church (Pethis, Round Towers of Ireland, 343–58; O'Conor, Er. Bib. Scrip. ii. 255, iv. 99).

EUTO, bishop. [ETRHO.]

EUTONIOUS, one of the fourteen bishops who met at Disopolis (Lydda) to condemn Pelagianism. (Aug. Contra Julian. Lib. i. cap. 5, § 19, in Pat. l. xlv. 622). [EUTHROIUS (3)]

EUTRECHIUS, prefect of the East, A.D. 447. Theodoret addressed a letter of congratulation to him on his appointment, containing expressions of affection for him, and his assurance that it was reciprocal (Theod. Epist. 57). Theodoret wrote to him again in 448, after the machinations of Dioscorus had prevailed with the feuds Theodosius II. to issue an imperial edict forbidding him to leave his diocese of Cyrrhus, as a disturber of the public peace. Theodoret expresses his surprise that Eutrehius refrains from having him no intimation of the plots laid against him, and his regret at the failure of his hopes that Eutrehius's appointment would have calmed the tempest in the church. He was worse treated than murderer and adulterer, in not having any opportunity of answering the charges. (Epil. 80). He describes how Eutrehius seems to have replied to the assurances of friendship. Theodoret answers that he does not question his affectionate feeling, and begs that he will endeavour to find out who are the real movers of this persecution, and represent to the emperor how unjust it is to condemn him unheard. (Epist. 91).

EUTROPIA (1), martyr. [EUPERPHIA (I).]

EUTROPIA (2), wife of the emperor Maximus (Hercules). Her full name, Guleia Valeria Eutropia, is preserved on an ancient medal (Goltz). She was a native of Syria (Victor. Chron. sub voc.). By a former marriage she had a daughter Flavia, whom Hercules espoused to the emperor Constantius. By Hercules she was mother of Maxentius, the usurper, and of Fausta, the wife of Constantius. A letter of Constantine seems to show that she embraced Christianity, for he tells the bishops of Palestine that his pious mother-in-law (ἡ διοικετήσις κυριοτρία) had reported to him the desecration of Mamre. (Euseb. Prol. Const. iii. 52; cf. Sozomen, H. E. ii. 4, § 6). [M. F. A.]
EUTROPIA

EUTROPIA (3), third daughter of the emperor Constantius I. by his wife Eudoxia, and therefore half-sister to Constantine the Great. She was the mother of Nepotianus, the usurper (Zosim. ii. 43), with whom, according to St. Athanasius, she was put to death in 350 (Apol. Ad. Imp. Const. cap. 6). Her husband was probably the Popilius Nepotianus who conspired in 301. (Cf. Du Cange, sub voc., and Tillemont, Hist. Emp. Constantin., art. iii. ad fin.)

[M. F. A.]

EUTROPIA (4), Dec. 14, virgin, martyr at the hands of the Vandals, A.D. 407. She was sister to Nicasius bishop of Rheims, who suffered in the same invasion. St. Jerome (Epist. ii. ad Agermonium) describes the ravages of the Vandals on this occasion. [Nicasius.]

[G. T. S.]

EUTROPIUS (1), the first bishop of Saintes. According to Gregory of Tours, he was said to have been sent to Gaul by Clement, bishop of Rome, at first consecrated bishop by Eutropius’s name. Here he preached the gospel until after a time the heathen rose against him, and by a blow upon the skull he met with a martyr’s death. The continuance of the persecution prevented his body receiving honourable or Christian burial, but most of the legend affects to trace the ultimate destination of his remains. Gregory tells us that at the close of the 6th century they were solemnly interred by St. Palladius in a church dedicated in their honour, the foul being still visible upon the skull. And from another source we learn that there was a church at Saintes called by Eutropius’s name, which Leontius restored when almost in ruins. He is commemorated on April 30. His successor is the see of St. Blaize. His Acta are to be found in the Bollandists, but they are admittedly not genuine. (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. i. 56; Vener. R. Mer. i. 18; Migne, Patr. Lat. ixi. viii. 70; Bobb. Acta SS. April. iii. 733; Gall. Chr. ii. 1054; Baron. Annal. ann. 95, vii.)

[S. A. B.]

EUTROPIUS (2), bishop of Adrianopolis. [Eutropius (3).] [T. de S.]

EUTROPIUS (3), one of the orthodox bishops in Macedonia thanked by Chrysostom, A.D. 406, for their adherence. (Chrys. Ep. 165; Pat. Gr. iii. 705.)

[C. H.]

EUTROPIUS (4), bishop of Evaza, a town of uncertain position in Asia Minor, one of the spearsmen who pronounced in favour of the letter of St. Cyril, and subscribed the deposition of Nestorius at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1151, 1217; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 731.)

EUTROPIUS (5), bishop of Ettene (Trisenna) is the first Pamphilian; spoke in favour of the two letters of Cyril to Nestorius at the eccumenical council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1003; Mansi, iv. 1149.) [L. D.]

EUTROPIUS (6), bishop of Adada, in Pusidria, present at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. He signed too the letter of the synod of Pusidria to the emperor Leo, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 575, 571; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1063.) [L. D.]

EUTROPIUS (7), bishop of Pergamos, voted for the decrees of Dioscorus at the Latrocinium CHIST. EORLOG.—VOL. II.

Epheсинum, A.D. 449 (Mansi, vi. 853, 932); his name was subscribed to his absence to those of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by Hesperius bishop of Ptane, at the instance of Stephen bishop of Ephesus. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 715.)

EUTROPIUS (8), bishop of Aureliopolis in Lydian, signed the synodal decree of Gennadius of Constantinople against the Simoniaci, A.D. 452. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 896; Mansi, vii. 917.)

EUTROPIUS (9), twenty-sixth bishop of Mainz, between St. Aureus and Adalbertus. He is said to have sat twenty-three years, and to have died in 477 (Gall. Chr. v. 435), or according to Le Coante, 474 (Ann. Ecol. Franc. an. 474, tom. 1. p. 105).

[S. A. B.]

EUTROPIUS (10), bishop of Orange (Arausio), which was at that time in the realm of Burgundy. Authorities.—A letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (vi. 6) assigned by Ceiller (Ant. Sacr.) to the close of the year 473 or 474, after the retreat of the Visigoths from Avignon, to a Latin to Verus, a later bishop of Orange (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vi. 699); Audo and Usuard, under May 27. He enjoyed a high reputation for spirituality, and the best effects of awakening it in others. Sidonius begs that he may be permitted to experience the influence of the great gifts possessed by Eutropius, insomuch as for his own part he is deeply conscious of a state of spiritual famine and ignorance. The above date gives us the time when this honoured prelate flourished; but we do not know anything further concerning him.

[J. G. C.]

EUTROPIUS (11), eleventh bishop of Angers, between St. Albinus and Domitianus. He lived about the middle of the 6th century, and is said to have consecrated the monastery and churches of Glenfriul on the Loire. He also transferred the body of his predecessor to the church of St. Germanus, which thenceforth was called after him. (Gall. Chr. xiv. 548; Vita S. Albini, 21, Vita S. Mauri, 48, in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. i. p. 112, 292, Paris, 1668-1701.]

EUTROPIUS (12), a monk, irregularly consecrated bishop of Ephesus by the imposition of the hand of the dead bishop, Procopius, c. A.D. 560. Like Procopius, he adhered to the heresy of the Julianistæ or Incorrupticœ, and ordained ten bishops to various sees, including those of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch, for the dissemination of his heretical views. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 682; J. S. Assemanus, Biblioth. Orient. ii. 86-8.) [L. D.]

EUTROPIUS (13), bishop of Valencia in Spain, towards the end of the 6th century, originally abbat of the monastery of Servitiana, the site of which is now doubtfull. Most writers, including Florez (Esp. Segr. viii. 57) place it near the ancient Sastabas (Xativa), while Gams (K. G. von Spanien, ii. 2, 57) inclines to a more southerly position near Olleria. It was founded by St. Donatus, an African monk, who fled to Spain at the time of an inquisition, “barbarorum genium” (Hilflos. de l'An. Ill, cap. 4).
EUTROPIUS

A.D. 590, and was according to Ildephonsus the founder of Spanish monasticism. Eutropius was the successor of Donatus. Joannes Bclarenensis mentions him first under the year 584. In 589 Eutropius, already with Joannes Bclarenensis the most famous of Spanish abbots, assisted St. Leander in drawing up the acts and directing the proceedings of the third council of Toledo—the conversion council under Recared (Joan. Bcl. Chron. in Pat. L. lxxii. 867, 869; Exp. Sagra. vi. 387). Ximeno in his Noticios Preliminares de los mas antiguos Escritores de Valencia, p. ix. rightly dwells on the great position he must have attained to have been thus associated with the most distinguished of Spanish ecclesiastics, in such an important piece of work, in preference to any bishop. Games thinks that he was one of the abbots sent by Recared to Gregory the Great with letters requesting the pallium for Leander (K. G. ii. 2, 31, 59), and points to the superscription of one of his two extant letters to Peter bishop of Arcavits, Ad Petrum popam, de die monasterio et unam monasteriorum directa Romae. The first letter to bishop Peter is concerned with the eight vices, gastrimargia, forniciatio, philargyria, ira, tristitia, acedia, cænonodia, superbia. The second is in answer to one from Peter, who seems to have reminded Eutropius of the too harsh rule of Servititanus. Eutropius replies in words of fiery vindication of his own views, which, if they were penned at Rome, seem to show the immediate influence of Gregory and Benedict. We know from St. Isidore alone (de Vir. Ill. cap. 45) that he was bishop of Valencia and that he still abided at Servititanus another letter, now lost, to Licianus of Cartagena on the subject of the administration of the chrisma to children in baptism. His episcopal career must have been very short, as in 589 Celsinus was bishop of Valencia, and in 610 Marinus, on the faith at least of the Decretum Gudemarsi [GUTHRIE]. Between these dates we have strong indications of his journey to Rome, if the journey itself is to be accepted.

St. Martin of Braga, Donatus, Eutropius, Joannes Bclarenensis, St. Emilian and St. Fructuosus were the heads of Spanish monachism in the sixth and seventh centuries. Under the head St. Martin of Braga is discussed the much vexed question of the rule or rules observed in the Gothic monasteries. (Exp. Sagra. viii. 166-169; Castro R. de Bbe. Español, ii. sac. vi. p. 279; the two letters, apud Migne Patr. Lat. lxxx.)

EUTROPIUS (15, March 3, a Cappodician by birth, and martyr at Cyzicus, on the Hellespont, under Maximin, either A.D. 307 or 311. He was tortured and crucified by the president Asclepius, together with Cleonicus and Basiliscus. (Bas. Men.; Barb. Annot. 311, 19.) [G. T. S.]

EUTROPIUS (16), author of the Chronicle Historiae Romanae from the founding of the city to the death of Julian, dedicated to the emperor Valens. He is said to have been secretary to the emperor Constantine, and to have accompanied Julian in his Parthian expedition. (Brev. x. 16.) He was not a Christian, but a fair-minded heathen like Ammianus. Cf. l.c. at Julian "gloriae audixit as per eam animi perenneque immodici, religiosique Christianse inceptor, prontae tamen ut cruoere abstinent." For further details, see the Dictionary of Gr. and Rom. Biography.

EUTROPIUS (17), a man of high character and literary attainments, proconsul of Asia, 334, a correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen. That he was the same person with Eutropius the historian, though maintained by Valensius, is a pure conjecture, embarrassed with chronological difficulties. Gregory Nazianzen having occasion to visit the province of Asia during his proconsulate, Eutropius received him with much distinction as a man of letters and begged him to write to him. Eutropius fell into trouble through suspicion of complicity in the supposed plot of Theodorus against Valens, A.D. 374, but escaped, no evidence having been found against him. Having ceased to be proconsul, he visited the neighbourhood of Nazianzen, and wrote to request a visit from Gregory, who replied, expressing his deep regret at being prevented from going to him by illness. If he is the same person who became prefect of the East in A.D. 381, the anticipations of his future elevation expressed by Gregory were fulfilled. (Greg. Nn. Epist. 131, 138; Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 29.) [E. V.]

EUTROPIUS (18), a young reader and scribe of the church of Constantinople, of great personal beauty and of the most spotless purity of life, who was tortured to death after the expulsions of Chrysostom, in the vain hope of extracting from him the names of authors of the mystagogical confabulations which immediately followed his departure. Eutropius was examined before the prefect Optatus, who treated him with the most merciless barbarity. He was severely wounded, the flesh of his sides and his face was lacerated with iron combs until his bones were laid bare, and his eyebrows were torn off; lighted torches were applied to his journey parts of his body, and he was cruelly racked. But young and delicate as he was, his tortures elicited no confession. He was therefore taken to prison, and his feet set in the stocks, where he died. Some presbyters of Arcacius's party, fearing lest he mangled body should be seen by others, gave him a hasty interment by night. The pious imagination of his fellow-sufferers conceived that heavenly mourners accompanied the young martyr to the grave, and that the funeral chant was sung by celestial voices. Sossen records the story of a vision of St. Stephen the protomartyr, seen by Sisinius, the bishop of the Novatians, declaring that after long search he had found but one good man in Constantinople, and that one was Eutropius. Sisinius, on waking, sent one of his presbyters to discover this one righteous person, whom after a search through all the prisons, he found at last at the point of death, and having made the bishop's dream besought him to pray for him. (Pallad. Dial. cap. 20, p. 198, ed. Bp., etc. St. H. E. vii. 24; Baron. Annot. ann. 404, lxxii.)

EUTROPIUS (19), a presbyter who headed a division among the Macedonians on account of a difference of opinion between him and Catherine (Socr. H. E. v. 24.) [E. V.]
EUTHROPIUS (20), eunuch and chief adviser of the emperor Arcadius. He may be the eunuch of the same name whom we read about in Zosimus I. 163, that he was the slave of a soldier named Ptolemi, who gave him to the general Arintheous (I. 61), who in turn gave him to his daughter on her marriage (I. 104). When too old for further service he came to court (I. 145), where by the influence of Abundantius he was raised to high positions (I. 154). These he abused by peculation and avarice (I. 191), but in spite of this he became successively judge (I. 231), general (I. 235 foll.), and consul (I. 287).

One of his first acts under Arcadius (A.D. 395) was to persuade the emperor to marry Eudoxia, the daughter of the chieftain of Rufinus, who had intended his daughter to enjoy that honour (Zosim. v. 3). After the murder of Rufinus by the soldiers at the instigation of Gainas, Eutropius set himself to supplant Timasius, who had now become his most dangerous rival. He persuaded a certain Bzargus to act as his accuser, and having used him successfully for the purpose, and procured the banishment of Timasius, afterwards had him put to death (Zosim. v. 8, 9, 10). He was now practically master of the Eastern empire, as Stilicho was of the Western. Arcadius being simply a tool in his hands (emporios' prokouménos, Zosim.). His next act was to get his former benefactor Abundantius banished to Sidon. He then proceeded to procure a decree of the senate procuring Stilicho a public enemy (Zos. ch. xi.). By securing the adherence of Gibio he transferred the province of Africa from the Western to the Eastern empire, but this Stilicho soon recovered. The account of the avarice of Eutropius given by Claudian is fully borne out by Zosimus. The last of the great men in the state found life under such rule intolerable. Accordingly Gainas formed a plot with Tribogildus to invade the empire. Eutropius was entrapped by the emperor with the promise of support. He was designated as general Leo, a favourite of his own and utterly incompetent, and Gainas, who secretly favoured the rebellion. Had it not been for the exertions of a volunteer named Valentinus, the plot must have been successful (Zos. v. 13–10). In 398 he was raised to the rank of patrician, and was appointed consul for 399. He comes before the notice of the church historians as an active supporter of the election of Chrysostom to the see of Constantinople, A.D. 397 (Soc. H. E. vi. 2, 11; Soc. H. E. vii. 2, 20). For a time they were opposed on terms of great intimacy (Soc. vi. 5, 2), and the discourses of the bishop after his fall also imply this. He represents himself as having been originally a friend of the cause, but estranged by his pride and avarice. His fall was as rapid as his elevation was unprecedented. The same year, 399, which saw him pronounced a despot, was able to bring about his downfall had it not been for the co-operation of the empress. She was a bold and ambitious woman, and had probably been long jealous of Eutropius. The emperor sent for him and deprived him of all his honours. Thereupon he fled for refuge to the altar of the Christians, although he had himself just helped in passing a law which took away the right of sanctuary. Himself the first victim of his own impiety, his case afforded a striking instance of the working of retributive justice (Soc. H. E. vii. 7, 6; Soc. H. E. vi. 5, 4, Chrysost. in Eutrop. 5; cf. Eunap. apud Suid. sub voc.). The emperor sent to arrest him, but the bishop refused to give him up, and on the following day delivered the homily which is still extant, pointing the moral of the instability of human fortune by the spectacle of the late favourite crowning beneath the holy table. Zosimus tells us that the emperor violated the right of sanctuary, dragged him from the church, and banished him to Cyprus. St. Chrysostom, however, plainly tells us that he had remained in the church he would have been safe ("οὐχ ἡ ἐκκλησία ἀνήκεν ἢ ἀνήκεν καὶ ἐκκλησίαν ἄνηκεν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἁμαρτών ἄμειναν," de Captro Eutrop. 1). The banishment, at all events, is certain. Gainas was not satisfied with this, and fresh charges were laid against him. He was accused of aspiring to the pomp of the emperor at the time of his entering upon the consulsiphip (Philost. xi. 6), was tried, convicted, and finally beheaded at Chalcodon (Soc. H. E. vii. 7, 5; Soc. H. E. vi. 5, 7). St. Chrysostom made his conviction the occasion of a second discourse, which is still extant, under the title De Captro Eutropius. After his death his name was erased from the list of consuls, and the law which he had passed as to the right of asylum was annulled. He was the first eunuch who ever attained consular rank. (Soc. H. E. vi. 5, 3.) All the historians agree in their estimate of his character, and single out his avarice as his distinguishing feature. Nothing can more strikingly prove the weakness of Arcadius than that such a man should have been able to gain so great an influence over him.

A marble slab has recently been found in the neighbourhood of the ancient Chalcodon, not far from the little church of St. John Chrysostom, bearing the following inscription:

Εὐτροπίου τάφος εἰς κεραυνόν ἦ γιὰ κλαθεὶς σώματα τῆς ἁμαρτέων ἐγένετο ἅμα ναυτών.
Ἀγεραμοί καὶ τῇ τῆς στίγμης ἀργοὶ ἄρα τρία, ἡ ἀριστερά, τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τῷ ἅγιῳ τεύχεον.
Πέτροι ἐκ γῆς εὐρέοι πλακαὶ τόνῳ κραδάς στεφανὸν ἀναβαθμίζουσιν τούτο γέρας περίχων.

The place is still called the harbour of Eutropius, and the letters are said to be of the character of those of the 4th century A.D. The inscription may therefore be a memorial of the subject of this article. (Eötvös. Zeitung, April 26, 1878.)

EUTROPIUS (21), a Gallic priest, of the 5th century, who, according to Gennadius (de Viris Illustrib. xlix.; Migne, Patr. Lat. ivii. 1087), wrote two letters or consolatory treatises to two sisters, handmaids of Christ, who had been dis-inherited by their parents for their devotion to celibacy and love of religion. The letters have not survived to us, but, according to the same author, they were elegant and clear in style, and reason and Scripture were alike employed to fortify the argument. It has been suggested, and is not impossible, that he was identical with the bishop of Orange (No. 10). [S. A. B.]

EUTROPIUS (22), layman addressed by Sidonius Apollinarius in the 5th century.

Name.—This name, though it has not descended to modern times, was a common and popular one during the period embraced in this work. It is one of the long list, coined after the fashion recommended by Cicero respecting new terms, which will be accepted, says the poet Ars Poetica, 52, 3), "si Graeco fonte candidum parvo detorta"; εὐτρωπός (eurotētikos, active, and thence secondarily well-disposed) being of course its base.

1. Authority.—Two letters of Sidonius Apollinarius (Lib. i. ep. 6; lib. iii. ep. 6 in Sirmiood, vol. i. and in Migne, Pat. Lat. Viii.), were addressed to Eutropius, being on a visit to Rome, where he believed that he had been supernaturally cured of a fever, while praying in the church of the Apostles (meaning St. Peter's), writes to his friend Eutropius, urging him that he should try to obtain some dignity worthy of his birth. If Eutropius acts on this advice, Sidonius is pared to help him to the very best of his ability. This Eutropius was evidently a layman. Sidonius appears to respect him, and to regard him as one unduly neglected by those in authority, though such neglect may partly arise from indolence or backwardness on his own part, as the following passage seems to indicate: "Munere Dei tibi congruit sevi, corporis, animi vigor integer: dein quod equis, armis, veste, sumptu famulici instructus, solum (nisi fallimus) incipere formidam." We do not know the date of the birth or death of this Eutropius, but he was probably somewhat younger, or at least not older (his distinguished correspondent). The duty specially suggested to him by Sidonius was that of militiam pia, on which Du Cange may be consulted (iv. 6). [J. G. C.]

EUTROPIUS (23), the father of St. Benedict of Nursia. (Pet. Diacon. Vitr. Ill. cap. 1, Pat. Lat. clxiiii. 1011 A, where the reading is Eutropius.) Another reading appears to be Eupropius. (Cellier, Histoire des Autres ecclés. xi. 158.) [T. G. S.]

EUTULANUS. [Endlus.]

EUTUUIUS, an Anglo-Saxon king mentioned in one of the hymns attributed to Alcuin (Hymn., ii. Alc. Cpp. ii. 549, ed. Prob.). The editor of those hymns may have been a West Saxon subregulus, or else identical with Escwine. But the poem, which says of him, "Qui primum imperum Saxonum rite regebat," and makes him to be succeeded by Caedwalla, negatives both these suppositions. The name is evidently a corruption of Centwine, which king is accurately described in the poem. [Centwine.] [G. H.]

EUTYCHES (2), a Christian of Cappadocia taken prisoner by the Goths, c. A.D. 286, and with some of his fellow captives suffered martyrdom for the faith after having sown the seeds of the gospel in the land of their captivity. (Thall. H. E. ii. 5.) The body of Eutyches was sent to Basil c. 372, at the instigation of Asclepius, bishop of Thessalonica, for which that saint set him a letter of warm thanks. (Basil. Epist. 165 (3597).) [E.]

EUTYCHES (3) (Eutyches), April 15, martyr with Maro and Victorinus in Italy. They were exiled at first to the island of Pontus, and afterwards executed in the persecution of Nerva. [Domitilla.] (Mart. Rom. Vet., Aedonis, Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHES (4) and EUTYCHIANISM. Eutyches was archimandrite of a monastery near Constantinople. For seventy years (as he told Pope Leo) he had lived a monastic life, and during thirty out of those seventy he had presided over his 300 monks. This life-long education in a monastery helps to explain the character attributed to him. He was an honest and pious, but narrow-minded man; full of fiery zeal against Nestorianism, and ready to discern herey from a language different from the dogmatic phraseology he had accepted; an "im prudent and not very learned man," and led into the error called (after him) Eutychianism by his "want of learning rather than by subtlety of thought" (Leo). He was known among his contemporaries as a staunch upholder of the views and conduct of Cyril of Alexandria; the archbishop had even sent to him, as a special mark of favour, a copy of the Acts of the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. He enjoyed high favour at court through the influence of the eminence Chrysaphus, at that time minister, and his own god-child. But neither powerful ecclesiastical and political patronage nor his own passionate energy against Nestorianism enabled him when suspicion rested upon his own episcopate. By whom he was accused, whether by Theodoret in his Eunomites, or by his former friend Eusebius of Dorylaeum, or by Demosthenes of Antioch, it seems difficult to decide (cp. Hesiod. ii. 319; Martin, 75-78); but it is clear that to Eusebius is due the definite charges first brought against him at Constantinople in 448.

Flavian, who succeeded Proclus in 447 as archbishop, convened a synod in Constantinople on Nov. 6, 448, to consider some questions between the metropolitan of Sardis and two of his suffragan bishops. Eusebius was present, and, at its conclusion, handed in a complaint against Eutyches. Eusebius as a layman had twenty years before exposed and opposed Nestorianism; he was now the first to urge a West Saxon subregulus to oppose the extreme errors of an opposite kind. He complained that Eutyches "defamed the holy Fathers and himself, a man who had never been suspected of herey;" and alleged himself prepared to convict Eutyches of being undeserving of the name of orthodox, and of being inimical to the orthodox faith. He had listened to the document in astonishment, and suggested that Eusebius should first privately discuss with Eutyches the points in dispute. Eusebius retorted that he had already several times privately, and an old friend, retur-

Eutyches struck in, "This is quite enough to enable us to take action against Eutyches; but that time is not come yet. The two priests (Mammus and Theophilus) were now sent. They were instructed to tell Eutyches that his replies to the deputies had given great offence, and that he must come and explain them, as well as meet the charges originally brought against him. They took with them a note to the effect that if he did not go before them, two might be necessary to deal with him according to canonical law, and that his determination not to leave his cell was simply an evasion. During their absence, Eusebius brought forward a further charge. Eutyches, he asserted, had written and circulated among the monks a little book on the faith, to which he had requested their signatures. The statement was evidently an exaggeration; but it was of sufficient importance to deserve verification. Priests and deacons were at once sent to the neighbouring monasteries to make inquiries. In the meantime Mammus and Theophilus returned. They reported that they had encountered many obstacles. The monks round the door of the monastery had affirmed the archimandrite to be ill; one Eleusinius had next appeared reporting himself the representative of Eutyches; and it was only on the assurance that the letter, of which they were the bearers, contained neither hard nor secret messages that they at last procured an audience. To the letter Eutyches had replied that nothing but death should make him leave his monastery, that the archbishop and the synod might do what they pleased, and that they had much better spare themselves the trouble of summoning him a third time. In his turn, he wished them to take a letter; and, on their refusal announced his intention of sending it to the synod. Eusebius at once broke out, "Guilty men have always some excuse ready; we must bring Eutyches here against his will." His condictions were more reasonable, and, at the desire of Flavian, two priests (Memnon and Epi-

Flavian and the bishops present accepted these propositions, and a resolution to the same effect was sent to the absentees for their approval and signature. The synod thus professed its belief in "Jesus Christ the only-begotten Son of God, perfect God and perfect man, of a reasonable soul and body subsisting, begotten before all ages, without beginning; of the Father according to the Godhead, but in these last days for our sake and for our salvation born of the Virgin Mary, according to the manhood; consubstantial with the Father, as touching His Godhead, and consubstantial with the mother, as touching His manhood." "We confess," they stated, "that Jesus Christ, after the Incarnation, was of two natures in one Hypostasis and in one Person; one Christ, one Son, one Lord. Whosever asserts otherwise, him we exclude from the clergy and the church" (Mani, vi. 679). The third session took place on Nov. 15, when the deputies announced the result of their interview with Eutyches. He refused to appear before the synod, on the ground that he had made a resolution, as early as the beginning of his monastic life, never to leave the cloister. Further, he wished to inform the synod that Eusebius had long been his enemy, and, in this instance, had greatly slandered him; for that he (Eutyches) was ready to assent to and subscribe the statements of the holy Fathers at Nicæa and Ephesus. On the synod was moved by the Synod of Nov. 15, it was attended with general satisfaction, and the session, information was brought to Flavian that certain monks and deacons, friends of Eutyches, and Abraham, archimandrite of a neighbouring monastery, requested an audience. They were at once admitted. Abraham informed the archbishop that Eutyches was ill, and had deputed him to wait upon the archbishop and speak for him. Flavian's reply was paternal and conciliatory. He regretted the illness of Eutyches, and, on behalf of those present, expressed their willingness to wait till he was restored to health. "Let him remember," he continued, "that he is not in the presence of strangers, but among men who would receive him with fatherly and brotherly affection, and many of whom have hitherto been his friends. He has pained many, and must defend himself. Surely if he could leave his retirement when the error of Nestorius imperilled the faith, he should do so much more when his own life is in question. He has but to acknowledge and anathematize his error, and the past shall be forgiven. As regards the future he must give assurance to us that he will only teach conformably to the doctrines of the Fathers." The archbishop closed the audience with words replete with significance, "You (monks) know the seal of the accuser of Eutyches." Fire itself seems to him cold in comparison with his burning zeal for religion. God knows I have besought him to desist; but, as he persists, what could I do? Do you suppose that I have any wish to destroy you, and not rather gather you together? It is the act of an enemy to scatter, but the act of a father to gather."

The fifth session opened on Wednesday, Nov. 17, with Memnon's report on their mission to Eutyches. The archimandrite, he stated, received their letter with the remark that he had sent Abraham and the others to declare to the archbishop and the synod that he (Eutyches) assented to the definitions of Nicaea and Ephesus, and to all that Cyril had spoken. Eusebius started up with the interruption: "If Eutyches assents now and from compulsion, that does not put me in the same case as the man who must do it with the past and not with the future." The archbishop calmed him, and Memnon was allowed to proceed. Eutyches had assured him that he had sent Abraham on account of his own illness. "I pressed him, nevertheless," said Memnon, "to appear personally before you; but first he wrote a letter, or message, next—when we offered to remain with him till then—he begged us to request you not to command his attendance this week, and added that he would (God willing) attend on the following Monday."

Before any decision was pronounced upon this request, the deputies who had been sent by the synod to the various monasteries were asked to make their report. They stated that they had been to several monasteries. Martin, archimandrite of the first, told them that he had received a document from Eutyches on Nov. 12, which he had been requested to sign; that on his objecting that the definitions of the faith should emanate from bishops and not monks, Eutyches had answered, "If you do not support me, the archbishop, after he has destroyed me, will destroy you." Martin had not sent the document, but Eutyches had informed him that it contained what he had told the council of Ephesus and Cyril had taught. A second archimandrite had told them that the monks who had brought him the paper for his signature, had assured him that it contained the definitions of the fathers at Nicaea and Ephesus; but that his request to be allowed to compare it, previous to signing it, with the acts of those councils, had not been accepted, and the monks had departed, seemingly displeased. Other abbots disclaimed all knowledge of paper on the subject. Eusebius, however, declared that it was a false statement. The synod maintained that it was the honest opinion of Eutyches. "The charge is proved," he cried, "and we can proceed against him. Moreover, the man is a liar; at one moment he tells us that it is his determination not to come out. At another he promises to come." More rational counsels prevailed. Eutyches was interrogated on Nov. 17, and that in the event of his failing to appear, he would be deprived of his clerical functions and monastic dignity.

The bishops met for a sixth session on Saturday, Nov. 20, and agreed that Eutyches might be accompanied on the Monday following by four of his friends. The indefatigable Eusebius then rose. He had been given to understand that when Mamas and Theophilus had visited Eutyches, the archimandrite had made use of expressions which had not been reported to the synod, but which threw great light on his opinions. At the request of the bishops, Theophilus narrated what had occurred. Eutyches, he said, wished to argue with them; and in the presence of several of his monks he put these questions:—"What, in Holy Scripture, is there any mention of two natures? Which of the Fathers has declared that God the Word has two natures?" Mamas had replied to the effect that the argument from the silence of Scripture was insufficient. "The word ἀποδείκνυς does not occur in Holy Scripture; we owe it to the definitions of the Fathers. And similarly we owe to them the affirmation of the two natures." I (Theophilus) then asked Eutyches if he believed that God the Word was "perfect (τελεας) in Christ." "Yes," he answered; and he gave the same answer to my next question:—"Do you believe that he has one mind to do with the past and not with the future?" Whereupon I urged, "If in Christ be perfect God and perfect man, do these perfect (natures) form the one Son? Why will you not allow that the one Son consists of two natures?" Eutyches replied:—"God forbid that I should say that Christ consists of two natures or disputable natures. Let the synod depose me, or do what they please. I will hold fast by the faith which I have received." Mamas substantiated the truth of what Theophilus had stated, adding that what led to the discussion was the remark made by Eutyches:—"If God the Word became flesh to restore fallen human nature," and the question which he (Mamas) had at once put:—"by what nature, then, is this human nature taken up and restored?" It was a natural question on the part of Flavian to ask, why this conversation had not been reported before: it was a base, but thoroughly Oriental answer to reply:—"Because we had been sent with Eutyches about his faith, but to summon him to the synod. We gave you his answer to the latter point. No one asked us about the former, and therefore we held our peace."

The synod met in its seventh, last, and weightiest session on Monday, Nov. 22. Eutyches' letter eventually presented himself, accompanied by a multitude of soldiers, monks, and others, who refused to allow him to enter till assurance had been given that he should depart as fast as he entered. A letter from the emperor (Theodosius) was presented. "I wish," it said, "for the peace of the Church, and steadfast adherence to the orthodox doctrines of the fathers at Nicaea and Ephesus. And because I know that Flor- entius the patriarch is a man approved in the faith, I desire that he should be present at the session of a synod, which has to deal with matters of faith." The synod received the letter with shouts, "Long live the emperor! His faith is great! Long live our pious, orthodox, high-priest and Auguste, on Nov 24th, 381!" When Florentius was conducted to his seat, the accuser (Eusebius) and the accused (Eutyches) took their places in the midst of the assembly, and the session began by the recital of all the papers bearing on the point between them. Cyril's letter to John of Antioch was again read; but, after the words—"We confess our Lord Jesus Christ... Consubstantial with the Father, according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with the Son... the union of the two natures was made; wherefore, we confess one Christ, one Son, one Lord. And in accordance with the perception of the unconfused union (ἡ τοῦ ἐνεργοῦ ἐνεργοῦ ἐνεργεῖα), we confess the Holy Virgin theotokos, because she was made the man and became man and united to Himself by conception the temple taken from her." Eusebius exclaimed, "Certainly, Eutyches does not acknowledge this, he has never believed it, but taught the very opposite to every one who came to him." Florentius declared that Eutyches himself should be asked if he assented to these documents or not; but again Eusebius broke in, "If he does so now; then, Eusebius, shall appear to be a calumniator, and I shall lose my office." Eutyches, he asserted, had already threatened him with banishment; Eutyches was a rich man, and possessed plenty of influence; and he (Eusebius) was one and possessed nothing. Flavian and Florentius succeeded in calming Eusebius, and the former turned to Eutyches with the question: "Do you confess union out of two natures?" "I do," he answered; but when Eusebius put the question in a more precise form: "Do you confess the existence of the two natures after the Incarnation, and that Christ is consubstantial with us according to the flesh?" Eutyches replied, "I have not come here to dispute, but to testify what I think. My opinion is contained in this paper. 1 pray you command that it be read."be continued: "This is my belief. I worship the Father with the Son, and the Holy Ghost with the Father and the Son. I acknowledge that the only person of the Son is from the body of the Holy Virgin, and that He became perfect man for the sake of our salvation. This is my confession before the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and before your holiness." Further questions followed. The archbishop put the plain question: "Do you confess that Christ is of two natures?" Eutyches answered, "I have never yet presumed to dispute about the nature of my God; that He is consubstantial with us, have I never said. I readily admit that the Holy Virgin is consubstantial with us, and that our God was born of her flesh." Flavian, Florentius, Basil of Seleucia, and others, pressed upon him: "If you admit that Mary is consubstantial with us, and that Christ took His manhood from her, it naturally follows that He, according to His manhood, is consubstantial with us." Eutyches answered: "I do not say that the body of man has become the body of God; but in speaking of a human body of God I say that the Lord became flesh of the Virgin. If you wish me to add that His body is consubstantial with ours, I will do so; but I cannot use the word consubstantial in such a manner as to deny that He is the Son of God." Flavian's retort was justified by the result of this other controversy, and not because it is your belief." Florentius again appealed to Eutyches: "Do you believe or not that our Lord who was born of the Virgin is consubstantial with us, and after the Incarnation—has two natures?" and the answer came: "I acknowledge that our Lord before the union of the Godhead and the human nature had two natures; but after the union, I confess but one." Finally the synod desired Eutyches to make a full explanation, and to pronounce an anathema on opinions opposed to the documents which had been recited. Eutyches replied that he would, if the synod desired it, make use of language (viz. consubstantial with us, and of two natures) which, in his opinion, was very much open to question; "but," he added, "inasmuch as I do not find such language either in Holy Scripture or in the writings of the Fathers, I must decline to pronounce an anathema on those who do not accept it, lest—in so doing—I should be anathematizing the Fathers." Once more Florentius interposed: "Do you acknowledge two natures in Christ, and His consubstantiality with us?" "Cyril and Athanasius," answered Eutyches, "speak of two natures before the union; the Eusebius is one nature after the union." "If you do not acknowledge two natures after the union," persisted Florentius, "you will be condemned. Whosoever refuses the formula 'of two natures' and the expression 'two natures' is unorthodox; to which the synod responded with the cry, "and to receive this under compulsion (as would Eutyches) is not to believe in it. Long live the emperor!" The sentence was pronounced: "Eutyches, formerly priest and archimandrite, hath proved himself affected by the heresy of Valentinus and Apollinaris, and hath refused—in spite of our admonition—to accept the true faith. Therefore we, lamenting his perverseness, have decreed, through our Lord Jesus Christ, blasphemed by him, that he be excluded from all priestly functions, from our communion, and from his primacy in his monastery." Excommunication was pronounced upon all who should consort with and abet him, and the sentence was signed by thirty-two (two hundred and twenty-three archimandrites. Eutyches left the council-chamber muttering an appeal to Rome. Action was at once taken by both parties. The monks rallied round Eutyches, and the influence of Cyprian was exerted in his behalf. Eutyches himself wrote to the emperor and to the bishops, and placarded notices about Constantinople, protesting against his sentence, and justifying his teaching. Of these letters the most important is that to pope Leo. In it he accuses Eusebius of acting at Satan's bidding, not in the interests of orthodoxy, but with the intention of destroying him. He repeats that he could not accede to the demands of the synod, acknowledge two natures in Christ, and anathematize all who opposed this doctrine, because Athanasius, Gregory, Julius, and Felix had rejected the expression "two natures," he himself having no wish to add to the creed of the see of Ephesus, nor to define too particularly the nature of God the Word. He adds that he had desired the synod to lay the matter in dispute before the pope, promising to abide by his decision; but that this favour not having been granted, he obeyed the synod in great discontent, and implored the pope to give an unprejudiced judgment upon the points in dispute, and to extend protection to him.
Flavian, on his part, circulated the decree of excommunication. He charged the monks to obey it, he communicated it to the emperor, to the pope, and the bishops in the provinces; but his interviews with the emperor were painful to himself, and marked by great suspicion on the part of the emperor; and his letter to Leo was forestalled by that of Eutyches, and required a second, more explanatory of the synodal acts, and refuting the mis-statements of Eutyches, before the pope was satisfied. Leo eventually gave Eutyches his answer in the celebrated "epi-

It was soon evident that court favour inclined to Eutyches; and early in 449 a commission was appointed by the emperor to examine a charge of falsification of the acts of the late synod of Constantinople, proffered by Eutyches against Flavian. The revision of the proceedings brought to light no such material differences as Eutyches alleged, and the commission had no choice but to confirm the synod's pronouncement. Eutyches, however, was not satisfied; but an agitation was thereby advanced, which was productive of the greatest misery.

A council had already been summoned by the emperor Theodosius to meet at Ephesus. Eutyches and Dioscorus, patriarch of Alexandria, had demanded it; and their position had been supported by Chrysaphius. This conjunction was, in itself, ominous; it more than justified Flavian's openly expressed conviction that a council convened under such patronage could do no good. Chrysaphius was notoriously opposed to Flavian; the eunuch could bear no rival at court; and (if the story be true) he had never forgiven Flavian's eloquence in pronouncing the archbishop's rebuke of his culpity. Dioscorus retained the traditional jealousy of the see of Constantinople, and—in defiance of all canonical law—had admitted Eutyches to communion, and declared him reinstated in his functions as priest and archimandrite.

The imperial summons was couch in the names of Theodosius II and Valentinian III, and was dated May 30, 449. It stated the cause of the summons to be due to the doubts and disputes which had arisen concerning the faith; it invited Dioscorus to present himself with ten metropolitans and ten bishops at Ephesus on August 16; and extended the invitation to other bishops, Theodoret of Cyrus (Kars) being exempted unless specially summoned by the council. A second letter to Dioscorus appointed the Syrian abbot, Barsamas, representative of the Eastern priests and archimandrites, evidently with the intention of considering and composing certain Nestorian disputes. The imperial instructions to the commissioners, Epiphanius and Eudocius, charged them to repress all unruliness at the sessions, to preserve order, and carry through the business carefully and quickly. One sentence was especially significant: "The bishops who, at Constantinople, had passed judgment upon Eutyches were to attend the proceedings at Ephesus, but were not to be allowed to take part in them, because their own already expressed opinions were to be examined anew." Proclus, the proconsul of Asia, was ordered to support the commissioners. Two further imperial decrees remain to be noticed. The first appointed Dioscorus president of the synod, with Juvenal of Jerusalem, and Thalassium of Ccesarea, as special assessors, in order to check the monument made by certain Nestorian bishops to Jesus Theodoret; and the wish was expressed that no consideration should be shown for any who added to or diminished from the Nicene Creed; the second was addressed to the council itself, and, directly blaming Flavian for his actions towards Eutyches and his (alleged) unwillings to let drop the matters in dispute between them, desired the council to go into the subject thoroughly, to root out the errors, to expel the followers of Nestorius from the church, and fix the true faith on a firm and irreproachable basis.

The synod—the "Lactantianum" or "Rober-synod," as posterity was taught to call it by Leo—met for the first time on August 8, 449. It was synod at which "Flavian was presented as an oppressor, and Eutyches as a victim, and terrible was the day on which it opened. The true faith received in the East a shock from which it had never completely recovered since. The Church was witnessed departing from the symbol of faith which have never returned to her, and perhaps never will." (Martin.)

Leo was not present: Julius, a bishop, Renatus, a priest, and Hilary, a deacon, accompanied by a notary, appeared as his legates. They brought with them the famous tome, or dox-ical letter, to Flavian and Dioscorus, and left it. In his letter to Theodosius (June 13, 449) Leo expresses his regret that "the foolish old man" (Eutyches) had not given up opinions condemned by the synod of Constantinople, and intimates his wish that the archimandrite or the archbishop should, if he would keep his promise to the pope, and amend what was erroneous in his views. In the letter to Pulcheria (same date), the pope consisiders Eutyches to have fallen into his error "through want of knowledge, rather than through wickedness" in his letter to the arch-mandrites of Constantinople, he states his contiction that they do not share the views of Eutyches, and exhorts them to deal tenderly with him should he renounce his error; and in his letter to the synod he quotes the confession of St. Peter, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." (St. Matt. xvi. 16), as embodying belief in the two natures, and argues that all Eutyches had really understood these words, he would not have swerved from the path of truth. In most of these letters Leo refers to the tests as containing the true teaching of the Church.

That tome was indeed presented at the synod; but a synod "bought with gold and packed with brutal men." (Ennemius of Dorylaeum) described by the express Eutyches as "tedious, and disastrous," and stigmatized by Leo himself, as "no court of justice, but a gang of robbers," was not likely to permit the recital of a document condemnatory of the man (Eutyches) they were pledged to acquit. It was presented, but shelved.
EUTYCHES

The history of the synod, in its relation to Eutyches, is discussed elsewhere [Diocletianus].
The Christian world was rent in pieces by its proceedings. Egypt, Thrace, and Palaetine, ranged themselves with Dioscorus and the emperor; Syria, Pontus, Asia, Rome, protested against the treatment of Flavian, and the schism of Eutyches. Dioscorus excommunicated Leo, Leo excommunicated Dioscoros. Theodosius applied the formula confirmed by the decisions of the synod in a decree which denounced Flavian, Eusebius, and others, as Nestorians, forbade the elevation of their followers to episcopal rank, deposed them if already bishops, and expelled them from the country. Leo wrote letters to the emperor Theodosius, to the church at Constantinople, and to the anti-Eutychian archimandrites. He asked for a general council; he is interested in the emperor Valentinian III, who with his wife (Eudoxia) and his mother (Galla Placidia), happened to be at Rome on the feast of St. Peter's chair (Feb. 22, 450); and he appealed to Pulcheria, whom he believed upon her erroneous idea of the views of Eutyches—especially gladdened him. The letters of Valentinian and Leo were answered by Theodosius, in a strain which left no doubt as to his intentions; "the synod at Ephesus has been perfectly unbiased; they had come to conclusions entirely consonant with orthodoxy; Flavian had been justly deposed on account of his innovation on the faith." He desired Leo to recognise Anastasius, as Alexandrian whom Dioscorus had consecrated to Constantinople, and (at that time) a partisan of Eutyches; a request which Leo met by the stipulation that Anastasius must first prove his orthodoxy, by formulating a confession of faith on the lines laid down by Cyril, the council of Ephesus, and his own letter to Flavian.
The wrangle was suddenly silenced by the death of Theodosius (July 450). Pulcheria raised her husband, Marcian, to the throne, and orthoday triumphed over any Eutychianism, as well as Nestorianism, was conquered (Leo). Marcian accepted at once and cordially to the pope's request for a council; Anastasius convened a synod of bishops, archimandrites, priests, and deacons were at Constantinople, and in the presence of the emperor legislated those monks, as were in the whole assembly, anathematized Eutyches, Nestorius, and their followers. Pulcheria wrote to confirm the news, and added that Flavian's body was to be brought to Constantinople and buried in the Basilica of the Apostles, and that the exiled bishops were to be recalled.
Leo's joy was sincere, but his wish for a council was now so urgent. The danger which existed when Theodosius was emperor had passed away. Eutychianism and Nestorianism had been anathematized; his own tome had been everywhere accepted; of more immediate importance, in his opinion, than discussions upon matters of doctrine, was the practical question, how best and most speedily to reconcile the penitent and to punish the obstinate. The war in the West, the invasion of Gaul by Attila, would prevent the bishops of the West from attending a council in Italy, where he wished it to be. Nestorianism was as successful among the bishops of Syria, and would unquestionably have his should a council be called in the East, as the emperor desired. He feared that the men who would unite for the condemnation of Eutychielianism, would, out of that very condemnation, find means for a triumph of Nestorianism over orthodoxy.
Leo pressed his views respectfully and firmly;
but, in deference to the emperor's convictions, he did not insist upon them. He consented to send representatives to the future council, while he urged that no fresh discussion should be allowed whether Eutyches was heretical or not, or whether Dioscorus had judged rightly or not, but that debate should turn upon the best means of reconciling and dealing mercifully with those who had gone wrong. For a similar reason he urged Pulcheria to cause the removal of Eut-yches from the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and to place an orthodox abbot at the head of his monastery; the one step would check the existing means of intercourse, the other would free the community from false teaching. That the last piece of advice was needful seems clear from the appeal made about this time to Marcian by one Anastasius and other archimandrites.
Eutyches, they urged, had many followers, and especially among his own monks. These persons had paid no attention to the summons to obedience addressed to them by Anatolius and his council. Therefore, urged the petitioners, let them be proceeded against according to monastic rule, and let fresh archimandrites be appointed to see that the imperial enactments be enforced.
The fourth great council of the church, originally summoned to meet at Nicea on Sept. 1, 451, met—after various inevitable delays and change of locality—at Chalcedon, on Oct. 8. Its general history is given under Dioscorus; here one or two points only need be considered which have special reference to the subject of this article.
During the first session the secretaries read the documents descriptive of the introduction of Eutyches at the synod of Ephesus (the Lateri-cinium) and the conclusions of his paper. Eutyches of Dorylaeum interrupted them when they came to words which attributed to Eutyches the statement, "The third general council (that of Ephesus, 431) hath directly forbidden any addition to the Nicene creed. "That is untrue," Eutyches exclaimed. "If you find the later copies," retorted Dioscorus. Diogenes of Cyrillicus urged that Eutyches had not repeated the Nicene Creed as it then stood; for the second general council (that of Constantinople, 381) had certain-y appended (against Apollinaris and Macedonius) to the words, "He was incarnate," the words "by the Holy Ghost of the virgin Mary," though he considered the appended words an explanation rather than an addition; but the Egyptian bishops present disclaimed (as Cyril had previously done) any such revised version of the Nicene confession, and greeted the words of Diogenes with loud exclamations of disapproval.
Angry words were again exchanged, when the reader continued: "[Eutyches] anathematize all who say that the flesh of Our Lord Jesus Christ came down from heaven. "True," interrupted Eusebius, "but Eutyches has never told us whence Christ did take His manhood;" and Diogenes and Basil of Seleucia also pressed Eutyches, though pressure upon this point at Constantinople, had refused to speak out. Dioscorus now, and to his honour, protested: "Let Eutyches be not only punished, but burnt, if he holds heterodox opinions. I only care to preserve the Catholic faith, not that of any individual man;” and then he turned upon Basil for having said one thing at Constantinople and another at Ephesus. “I did so,” pleaded Basil, “out of fear of the majority. Before a tribunal of magistrates I would have remained firm even to martyrdom; but I did not dare oppose (a tribunal of) the Fathers (or bishops).” And his appeal for pardon on that ground was caught up by the others. “Yes, we all sinned (at Ephesus); we all implore forgiveness.”

At the fourth session (Oct. 17), eighteen priests and archimandrites, headed by Faustus, were admitted to the presence of the Council. They were questioned about a petition (perhaps a counter-petition to their own) addressed to Marcin previous to the opening of the council, by Carusus and other Eutychians, who styled themselves archimandrites. Faustus replied, “We do not believe (Carusus and Dorotheus) were archimandrites, the rest were men who lived in martyries (chapels dedicated to martyrs), or were unknown to them, and he demanded their punishment for the assumption of a title which was not theirs.

The commissioners commanded that Carusus and the rest be summoned. They came to the number of twenty. The quick eye of Anatolius discovered among them two men who had been already condemned for heresy; and all present shrank with horror from one man in the company—Barsamas. The petition was read. It was an impassioned appeal to the emperor to preserve the orthodoxy of the church, to summon a council, and in the meantime forbid the expulsion of any man from his church, monastery, or martyr. The hearing had hardly finished when Diogenes denounced Barsamas as the man who had killed Flavian; and cries of “Out with the murderer!” prevented for some moments the recital of another paper which the Eutychians had prepared to be read to the council. This second document the Eutychians excused themselves for not having previously attended the council, on the ground that the emperor had forbidden it; and they now professed the request that “his holiness the archbishop Dioscorus and his bishops should be invited to attend. Angry exclamations burst forth on all sides; “Anathema to Dioscorus! Christ hath denoted him. Turn out these men, and blot out the insult they have offered us. We will not listen to a petition which calls the deceased Dioscorus a bishop.”

The commissioners had the courage to insist that the paper should be read through. “The emperor,” it proceeded, “had assumed to himself that at the council the creed of Nicæa only should be established, and that nothing should be undertaken previous to this.” It urged that the condemnation of Dioscorus was inconsistent with the imperial promise; and he and his bishops should therefore be again called to the council, and the presented schism would be removed. Should, however, the council declare to act thus, they (the Eutychians) declared that they would hold no communion with men who opposed the creed of the 318 fathers at Nicæa. At the same time, to prove their own orthodoxy, they appended their own signatures to that creed and to the Ephesian canon which confirmed it.

Aetius, archbishop of Constantinople, now reminded these petitioners that church discipline required monks to accept from the bishops instructions in matters of faith; he pointed out to them that all those present held the confession of faith approved at Nicæa and Ephesus as firmly as themselves, that the writings of Cyril and Leo were not to be taken as superseding, but as explaining the faith; and he called upon them to say out boldly whether they would assent to the present council or not. The commissioners joined in the explanation and appeal. Carusus fenced with it: “I have no need to anathematize Nestorius. I have spoken as much against him over and over again.” “The anathematize Eutyches,” cried Aetius. “It is written,” said Carusus, “judge not, and ye shall not be judged;” and then he turned upon Aetius, “Why are you talking, and the bishops sitting still?” Aetius persisted, “In the name of the council, I ask you, Do you assent to their decision?” “I have not,” answered Carusus; “condemn me and send me into exile. Paul hath taught me, if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be anathema’ (A.V. accursed) (Gal. i. 8). If Eutyches doth not believe what the Catholic church believes, hold him anathema.”

The appeal of Faustus and other anti-Eutychian archimandrites to the emperor already mentioned, was now ordered to be read. The Eutychian archimandrite, Dorotheus, immediately asserted the orthodoxy of Eutyches. The commissioners retorted, “Eutyches teaches that the body of Christ is not united to the flesh of the bystanders.” What say you to that?” Dorotheus avoided a direct answer by quoting the language of the Constantinopolitan creed in this form, “Incarcerate of the Virgin and made man,” as interpreting it in an anti-Nestorian sense; but he declined to attest the language used on the point by Leo in his tome. The commissioners were now on the point of passing judgment, when the Eutychians, who had refused a space for consideration of two days, asserted that the emperor had promised them an opportunity of fair debate with their opponents in his presence. It was necessary to ascertain the truth of this, and the Council of Oct. 17 ended.

On Oct. 20 the bishops and commissioners met again. Alexander, the priest and periodist ("visitor," see Suiser, Theana, i. n.), who had been deputed to see the emperor, informed the council that he and the decurion John had been sent by the emperor to the monks, with a message to the effect that, had he (the emperor) considered himself able to decide the dispute, he would not have convened a council. “I now charge you,” continued the emperor, “to attend the Council and learn from them what you do not yet know. For what the holy general council determines, that I follow, that I rest in, and that I believe.” The imperial language was interpreted. More impetuous spirits present wished to enforce at once against Carusus and the Eutychians, the fourth and fifth canons of the Council of Antioch (341) which deposed bishop, priest, and deacon found guilty of persistent disobedience or of schismatic worship. This the commissioners rightly refused. The Eutychians were granted thirty days’ consideration, at the end of which time, should they still remain contumacious, they would be deprived of ecclesiastical rank and office. The matter does not appear to have been brought before the council again, but from Leo’s correspondence (Ep. 136, 141, 142) it would seem that Cæsarius and Dorotheus persisted in their views and were ejected by Marcian from the see of Ierousalēm.

On Oct. 22, in the fifth session, the memorable “Definition of faith agreed upon at the council of Chalcedon” was recited and received with the unanimous cry, “This is the faith of the Fathers; this is the faith of the Apostles. We all assent to it. We all think thus.” It was signed by the metropolitan and by the imperial commissioners, and instructions were given that it should be laid before the emperor. The hearing of this “definition” upon Eutychianism may be briefly noticed. After declaring “the sufficiency of the wise and saving creed” of Nicaea and Constantinople, inasmuch as that creed taught “completely the perfect doctrine concerning the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and fully explained the Incarnation of the Lord to those who received it faithfully,” it goes on to admit that some “dare to corrupt the mystery of the Lord’s Incarnation, others (i.e. the Eutychians) bring in a confusion and mixture (εἰρήκουσιν καὶ σφάλματα) and absurdly imagine the nature of the flesh and of the Godhead to be one, and teach the monstrous doctrine that the Divine nature of the Only-Begotten was a commixture capable of suffering;” “Therefore the present holy, great, and ecclesiastical Council... has added for the confirmation of the orthodox doctrines, the letter of Leo written to Flavian for the removal of the evil opinions (κακαολογία) of Eutyches. For it is directed against those who attempt to rend the mystery of the Incarnation into a dual of Son and Father it repels from the sacred congregation those who dare to say that the Divinity of the Only-Begotten is capable of suffering; it is opposed to those who imagine a mixture or confusion of the two natures of Christ: it drives away those who fancy that the form of a servant which was taken by Him of us, is of an heavenly nature, and to an end and at an end forever those who speak of two natures of the Lord before the union, and feign one after the union.”

“We then,” was the conclusion, “following the holy Fathers, all with one consent teach men to confess one and the same Son, one Lord Jesus Christ; the same perfect in Godhead and also perfect in manhood: truly God and truly man, of a reasonable soul and body; consubstantial with the Father according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the manhood; is all things like unto us without sin; begotten before all ages of the Father according to the Godhead, and in these latter days, for us and for our salvation, born of Mary, the Virgin Mother of God, according to the Manhood; and one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-Begotten, to be acknowledged in two natures, infallibly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably (ὑπὸ δύο φύσεων δυνατώς, ἀδερφώς, διαμέριστος, ἐκ τούτου γενόμενος), the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one person and one hypostasis, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son and Only-Begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ, as the prophets from the beginning have declared concerning Him, and the Lord Jesus Christ Himself taught us, and the creed of the holy Fathers has delivered to us.”

On Oct. 25, Marcian, accompanied by Pulcheria and the court, opened and closed the sixth session. In his address he explained that he appeared in person, as Constantine had done before him, not to overawe and coerce any, but to strengthen and confirm the faith: his efforts and his prayers were alike directed to one end, that all might be one in true doctrine, hold the same religion, and honour the true Catholic faith. The archdeacon Actius recited in his presence the confession of faith approved at the previous session, and the question then put by the emperor: “Is the opinion of all expressed in the formula just read?” was answered by a shout from all sides, “This is the belief of us all! We are unanimous and have signed it unanimously! We are all orthodox! This is the belief of the Fathers; this is the belief of the Apostles; this is the belief of the orthodox; this belief hath saved the world! Long live Marcian, the new Constantine, the new Paul, the new David! Long live Pulcheria, the new Helena!”

Three ordinances brought by the emperor, and referring to the conduct and treatment of refractory monks (such as the Eutychians), were afterwards incorporated in the canons of the council (II. iv. 11x.); and they, together with canons viii. and xxxii. were probably found sufficient to repress for a time monks who went “to the royal city of Constantinople, and remaining there for a long time, raised seditions and disturbed the ecclesiastical state (xxiii.).

Imperial edicts followed speedily after the close of the council (Nov. 1). One dated March 13, 452, was especially directed against the Eutychians. They had persisted in disseminating their “foolishness,” in spite of the council and the emperor. Marcian now warned them that their contumacy would be sharply punished, and this warning was presently carried into effect. On July 28, Eutychians and Apollinarians were deprived of their priests, they were forbidden to hold meetings, or to live together in monasteries; they were to be considered incapable of either inheriting property under a will or deviseing such property to their co-sympathizers; they were to be reckoned unfit for military service. Eutychian priests who had seduced from their post in the church and the monks from Eutyches’ own monastery were banished from Roman territory. Their writings were to be burnt, and the composer and circulator of such works was to be punished with confiscation of goods, and with exile. Dioscorus and Eutyches were exiled, but the latter died probably before the sentence was carried into effect.

“With none of these who have been the authors of heresies among Christians, was blas-
EUTCHEANUS (3), bishop of Rome from January A.D. 275 to December A.D. 283, during a period of 8 years 11 months and 3 days, and buried in the cemetery of Callistus, was one of the facts about him given in the Liber Pontificalis, that he is said to have been martyred, and as a saint and martyr he is honoured on Dec. 1 in the Roman Calendar. But his claim to the latter title is disproved by the silence on the subject of the earliest known recension of the Lib. Pont., the Felician catalogue, and by his name occurring in the Liberian Depositio Episcoporum, not in the Depositio Martyrum. The Felician catalogue speaks of him as "sanctus tuscus, ex patre marino," and says that he appointed the blessing of fruits upon the altar, and that he buried 462 martyrs. The later editions of the Pontifical record add that it was beans and grapes he said that he ordered to be blessed upon the altar, that it was his own hand that he buried so many martyrs, and that he ordered that no martyr should be buried without a dalmatic or a purple ciborium. Two spurious decretals are attributed to him. One is to the Bishops of Buxteh, directing the offering at the altar, and benediction there, of grapes and beans, and blessing of fruits at the tomb of the priest, and containing a long disquisition about the two natures in Christ. The other is to the Church of Sicily, regulating and controlling accusations and proceedings against the clergy, with a view to their protection and immunity. Ten decreta also appear as his in the collections of Gratian, Ivo, and others. [T. B.]

EUTCHEANUS (4), the first bishop of Bazzi (Hazara) of whom any record remains, gives the acts of the Council of Elberri, a.D. 360. The see of Bazzi, one of the ancient suffragans of Toledo, may probably claim an existence of some antiquity with that of Acci. The two towns are only twenty-six miles apart, and were in 1489 made one bishopric by Ferdinand and Isabella. The last bishop of Bazzi under the old order whose name remains is Serra-redondo, in the 14th century. (Ebs. Sagr. vii. 84; Aginem. Catalañi, ii. 30.) [W. A. W.]

EUTCHEANUS (5), bishop of Amaus (Eutchianus i6.)

EUTCHEANUS (6), a monk who had his abode in the mountain range of Olympus separating Phrygia from Bithynia, and who gained there a great reputation, owing to the many miracles he was said to perform. He lived in the time of Constantine, and, though an adherent of the Novatian party, he appears to have enjoyed the confidence and respect of that emperor. Socrates, in his Eccles. History (i. 13), has preserved some of his famous deeds, which illustrate the growth of that influence by which the clergy came at last to assert their superiority to the civil power. One of the imperial bodyguard was EUTYCHIANUS (7), bishop of Patara in Lycia, celebrated for its temple of Apollo; one of the forty bishops who at the synod of Seleucia, 385, signed the heretical form of faith drawn up by Acacius of Caesarea and George of Alexandria. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 977; Mansi, iii. 321.)

EUTYCHIANUS (8), prefect of the praetorian guards at Constantinople and prefect of the last, in which capacity an edict was addressed to him by Arcadius, July 13, 399, commanding him to take measures for the destruction of any pagan temples still remaining in Phoenicia. (Cod. Theod. xvi. c. 10, p. 285.) This edict was not enforceable by the influence of the emperor. (Theod. Hist. c. 29, p. 29.)

The name of Eutychianus appears among the witnesses authenticating the correctness of the inventory of the church goods presented after the confiscation by Germanus and Cassianus. (Pallad. Dia. p. 27.) An edict was addressed to Eutychianus, dated Nov. 18, A.D. 404, commanding him to expel from the churches all those who refused to communicate with Aracius, Theophilus, and Porphyry, and to prevent their meeting for worship elsewhere. (Cod. Theod. xvi. c. 4, c. 5, p. 103.)

EUTYCHIANUS (9), bishop of Epiphania in Syria Secunda. He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 570; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 917.)

EUTYCHIANUS (10), bishop of Baris, a town of uncertain position in the ecclesiastical province of the Hellespont. In the sixth session of the Council of Chalcedon, 451, Diogenes of Cyzicus, his metropolitan, subscribed his name in his absence to the definition of the faith. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 769; Mansi, vii. 164.)

EUTYCHIANUS (11), first bishop of Tharsus or Anastasopolis; also called Justiniana Nova, in Mesopotamia, near the confines of Persia. In

506 Thomas bishop of Amida having been employed by the emperor Anastasius in fortifying Daras, set some of his clergy to superintend the works, and among them the presbyter Eutychianus, who became the first bishop of the city. He was succeeded by Thomas of Rhenaia. (Asseman, Bibl. Or. ii. 58, from the Syriac Eccles. Hist. of Zacharias of Melitene in Armenia; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 988.)

EUTYCHIANUS (12), a cleric of the episcopal church of Adana in Cilicia, one of the household, and a constant companion of St. Theophilus, the ecconomus or vice-domus of that church A.D. 538. There is attributed to him a History of the Episcopate and Conversion of St. Theophilus, the Greek MS. of which is described by Labeceius among those in the imperial library of Vienna (Lambec. Comment. de Biblioth. Curs. Vindob. ed. Col. lib. viii. cod. 11, num. 9, p. 156). Labeceius bestows much pains in sustaining the genuineness of the work, which has been doubted. A Latin translation by Paulus Diaconus of Naples is given by Surius and the Bollandists (Surr. de Prof. Hist. SS. tom. i. Feb. 4, p. 39; Boll. Acta SS. 4 Feb. i. 483; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 519.)

EUTYCHIUS (1), bishop of Melitene (535-547).

EUTYCHIUS (2).

EUTYCHIUS (3), sixth bishop of Syracuse in the third century, between Abraham and Anthemius. He died, and was buried at Palermo (Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, i. 600.)

EUTYCHIUS (4), bishop of Syracuse, between Julianus and Januarius. He died, and was buried at Palermo (Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, i. 605.)

EUTYCHIUS (5), bishop of Seleucia Pirra in Pissidia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 695; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1053.)

EUTYCHIUS (6), bishop of Amasea, in the district of Hellenopolis, in the province of Pontus Polemonianus, A.D. 329; present at the council of Nicea. (Mansi, ii. 694 d; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 525.) He is especially connected with the martyr-bishop of Amasea, his predecessor, Basilius or Basilus (Basiliius, Vol. i. p. 295), who in his last letter to the church of Amasea (Baronius, 316, axil) had expressed a hope that Eutychius the son of Callistratus should be named his successor.

EUTYCHIUS (7), bishop of Smyrna, one of the fathers of Nicea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 694 a; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 741.)

EUTYCHIUS (8), bishop of Satara. [Eve-}

EUTYCHIUS (9), bishop of Philippopolis in Thrace. Signed the epistle of the Eusebian bishops to the African church, A.D. 344. (Mansi, iii. 139, and Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1158.)
EUTYCHIUS (10), a bishop of an unnamed see who signed the acts of the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Athenasius. Apol. adv. Ariam. c. III. § 50.). [E. V.]

EUTYCHIUS (11), occurs in the Chronicon of Jerome, sub anno 349, as the first of the bishops intruded by the Arians into the see of Jerusalem after the deposition of Cyril by Acacius. He is mentioned by no other authority. Tilmont (Mém. Écol. vi. 425) suggests that he may have been the same with Eutychius, bishop of Eleutheropolis [EUTYCHIUS (13)]. See Tilmont's note on the intruded bishops of Jerusalem, viii. 782. [E. V.]

EUTYCHIUS (12), a bishop deposed at the same time as Acacius, by the semi-Arian faction at Seleucia, A.D. 559 (Socr. H. E. ii. 40). [E. V.]

EUTYCHIUS (13), bishop of Eleutheropolis (Hebron), in Palaestina Prima. He succeeded Theophilus on his translation to Castabali in Cilicia. Eutychius had been brought up in the orthodox faith under Maximus, bishop of Jerusalem. The community he conceived of Maximus's successor, Cyril, led him to attach himself to Cyril's bitter enemy, Acacius of Caesarea, and to profess his theological views. At the synod of Seleucia, 359, he signed Acacius's semi-Arian formula (Mansi, iii. 322). After the condemnation of Athanasius by the Eusebian synod at Milan, 353, Eusebius of Vercelli, one of the three bishops who nobly refused to sign the sentence, was banished to Eleutheropolis, where he was subsequently joined by his fellow confessor to the truth, Lucifer of Cagliari, whose original place of exile had been Germanicia. Eutychius is charged with having treated both the bishops with violence and contumely. It is asserted that when Lucifer was celebrating the holy communion with a handful of orthodox believers, the doors being closed, Eutychius forcibly broke the door down, and interrupted the sacred rite, carrying off the sacred vessels and books, and dispersing the communicants. (Marcelli, et Faustini. Liber Precon. ad Theodorum, p. 89.) Eutychius, in turn, charges him with being a Catholic at heart, but concealing his belief for the sake of retaining his bishopric. This he seems to have done till his death, although he was excommunicated and deposed by the party opposed to him at Seleucia. In A.D. 363 he signed the synodal letter of the bishops assembled at Antioch, including Meletius, Acacius, and Eusebius of Samosata to the emperor Julian, on the consubstantiality of the Divine Word. (Socr. H. E. iii. 25; Labbe, ii. 828.) Jerome speaks of Eutychius having been one of Epiphanius's hearers "in monasterio," while the latter was still a presbyter, i.e. before A.D. 358 (Hieron. Epist. ad Pamphil. 61; i. 690; Epiphan. Haer. ixxii. No. 23-27). [EUTYCHIUS (11)]. [E. V.]

EUTYCHIUS (14) (TYCHIUS), bishop of Erythrae in the province of Asia, present at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 727; Mansi, iv. 1156, 1215.) [L. D.]

EUTYCHIUS (15), bishop of Hadrianopolis in Vetus Epirus, present both at the second council of Ephesus, "the Latrocinium," A.D. 449 (Mansi, vi. 929), and at the ecumenical council of Chalcedon, 451. (Mansi, vii. 124; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 141.) [L. D.]

EUTYCHIUS (16), bishop of Trani, present at the fifth and sixth Roman synods under pope Symmachus in 503 and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (De Roli de Germania, who accepts, with a slight variation, the arrangement of Hefele, § 220). See Mansi, viii. 299 and 315. All subscriptions to the fifth synod must be received with caution. [A. H. D. A.]

EUTYCHIUS (18), ST., patriarch of Constantinople. His biography, composed by his chaplain Eustathius, has been preserved entire. [EUSTATHIUS (4)].

Eutychius was born at Theum in Phrygia cir. A.D. 512. His father Alexander was a general under Belisarius; his mother's name was Synesia. It is not clear whether it was to Constantinople or to Augustopolis, an episcopal see in Phrygia, that he went at the age of twelve to study under the care of his great- father Hesychius, a presbyter and the treasurer of the cathedral. After his education was finished, he thought of becoming a monk; but the bishop of Amasea, in Iberia,, hearing of it entered him among his clergy, and made him pass through all the degrees of the ministry, intending him even for the episcopate. The bishop afterwards changed his mind, and Eutychius assumed the monastic habit at Amasea, at the age of thirty, cir. A.D. 542.

At some council that was being held at Constantinople, towards the end of the patriarchate of Menenas, Eutychius, then archimandrite, attended as apocrisiarius for the bishop of Amasea, who was ill. Eustathius calls this council the fifth of Constantinople; but this did not commence until 553, when Menenas was dead. Perhaps we are to understand some preliminary gathering held in preparation for it. The archimandrite had the honour of being lodged at the palace of the patriarch, and won his esteem that Menenas begged him never to leave him, and pointed him out to his clergy by the words, "That man will be my successor." Eutychius earned the admiration of the emperor also. One day, in a conference before Justinian, the question was discussed whether the living could pass sentence on the dead. Eutychius supported the affirmative by quoting the example of Josiah, who dug up the bones of the worshippers of the golden calf and buried them. This opinion suited the emperor and clergy, Eutychius was loaded with honor, and became an intimate of the imperial court. Mennas died in 552, probably on August 25, and while his body lay in state Justinian nominated Eutychius to an assembly of the senate and clergy for the patriarchate.

At the beginning of 553 Eutychius wrote to pope Vigilius who was then at Rome, making his profession of the catholic faith, declaring his acceptance of the four councils and the letters of St. Leo, and requesting Vigilius to preside over the council that was to be held on the question of the Three Chapters. Vigilius refused, and Eutychius shared the first place in the assembly with the patriarchs Apollinarius of Alexandria and Dominicus of Antioch. In conjunction with these he even went so far as to invite Vigilius again to the second session, but the pope excused himself on the ground of ill-health. The subscription of Eutychius to the Acts of this synod, which sat from May 5 to June 2, 553, is a summary of the decrees against the Three Chapters.
EUTYCHIUS—Patriarch

The next important event in the patriarchate of Eutychius was his violent collision in 564 with Justinian, when this emperor adopted the theses of the Aghathodocetae. Eutychius, in a long address, demonstrated the incompatibility of that theory with Scripture; but Justinian insisted on his subscribing to it, and finding him uncompromising, ordered his arrest.

On Jan. 22, 565, Eutychius was celebrating the feast-day of St. Timotheus in the church adjoining the Hormidias palace (cf. Du Cange, Cyp. lib. ii, p. 96, lib. iv. p. 93, ed. 1729) and was at the time engaging in conversation with a monk, when an officer with a band of soldiers broke into the patriarchal residence, and at length entered the church, and carried the patriarch away. Eutychius was first taken to a monastery called Choraceus, and on the following day to that of St. Olias near Chalcedon.

The eighth day after this outrage, Justinian called an assembly of princes and prelates, to which he summoned Eutychius. The charges against him were trifling and absurd: that he used ointments, that he ate delicate meats, that he prayed long. Cited thrice, Eutychius replied that he would only come if he were to be judged canonically, in his own dignity, and in command of his clergy. Condemned by default, he was sent to an island in the Propontis named Principis. He landed at night in a storm, and was comforted in the morning by the circumstance that the first thing on which his eyes rested was a cross painted on the wall with the inscription, "Christ is with you: stand firm," a charm against earthquakes. He was next sent to his old monastery at Amasea, where he spent twelve years and five months.

Eutychius relates many wonderful works performed by the Lord in his lifetime, all acts of healing, and possibly both the diseases and the cures are true but exaggerated.

On the death of Joannes Scholasticus, whom Justinian had put in the patriarchal chair, the people of Constantinople loudly demanded the return of Eutychius. Justinian was deaf, Justin II. had succeeded, and had associated with himself the young Tiberius. The emperors immediately sent an honorable deputation to Amasea to bring back Eutychius, even if he were unwilling; but his joy was great, and, having blessed the monastery and people, he returned to Constantinople. There an immense concourse met him, shouting aloud, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," and "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace." In questionable imitation of our Lord he entered the city on an ass's colt, over garlands spread on the ground, the crowd carrying palms, palm branches in his hand, and his head illuminated, public banquets were held, new buildings inaugurated. Next day he was met by the two emperors with conspicuous honour at the church of the Virgin in Blachernae. He then proceeded to the Great Church, which was filled from end to end, mounted the pulpit, and blessed the multitude. He afterwards distributed the communion during the space of six hours, as all wished to receive the elements from his own hands. The date of his restoration was October, 577.

On Sept. 26, 578, in the lifetime of Justin, Tiberius was crowned by Eutychius (Zonar. Annal. lib. xiv. § 11; Du Cange, Fam. August. p. 85), and on Oct. 5 Justin died. Theophanes makes the mistake of describing Eutychius as offering prayer on the occasion of the association of Tiberius in the empire, whereas he was not recalled till afterwards.

Towards the end of his life Eutychius maintained in a book on the resurrection, now lost, that after the resurrection the body will be more subtle than air, and no longer palpable. Gregory the Great, then residing at Constantinople as delegate of the Roman church, felt himself bound to oppose this opinion and Gregory sent to Luke xxiv. 39, "Handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Eutychius said this was a sign granted to prove the Resurrection to the Apostles. Gregory replied that it would be a curious sign if it was to give us a doubt. Eutychius answered that though the Body might be palpable then, it grew more subtle after. Christ being raised dieth not more, rejoined Gregory (Rom. vi. 9). Flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God, answered Eutychius (1 Cor. xv. 50). Flesh, responded Gregory, has two meanings in Scripture, human nature, and sin's corruption. The result of the discussion was that each adhered to his own opinion. The emperor Tiberius talked to the disputants separately, and tried to reconcile them; but the breach was persistent. Finally, the emperor ordered the book to be burnt. It happened immediately afterwards that both Eutychius and Gregory fell ill. Gregory recovered, but Eutychius died. He was visited by the emperor on his deathbed, and gave him his blessing. He breathed his last quietly on Sunday after Easter Day, April 5, 582, at the age of seventy. Some of his friends told Gregories in his ear, a few moments before his end, he touched the skin of his hand, saying, "I confess that in this flesh we shall rise again." This was probably compatible with his previous view, but at any rate Gregory availed himself of this excuse to leave the matter alone (Paul. Diacon. Vit. Greg. Mag. lib. 1, cap. 23; 27-30; Vit. Greg. ex ejus Script. lib. 1, cap. 5, §§ 6-8; Greg. Mag. Mornal. xiv. §§ 72-74).

The chronology of his life here followed is that fixed by Heschen in his introductory argument to the life by Eutathius (Boll. Ada SS. 6 Ap. i. 550).

The literary remains of Eutychius are his Letter to pope Vigilius already mentioned, printed in Greek and Latin by Mansi (ix. 186), and by Mingre (Pat. Lat. lxxix. 63; Pat. Gr. lxxvii. 2401), and some fragments of a Discourse on Easter and the Holy Eucharist. One portion of this, in Greek, was first published by Mai in his edition of Euthy. The whole city was illuminated, public banquets were held, new buildings inaugurated. Next day he was met by the two emperors with conspicuous honour.
EUTHYCHIUS—MARTYR

Luke by Nicetas, he collected under the above title, adding a Latin translation, in his Biblioth. Nov. (t. iv. p. 54), and this was reprinted by Migne, Patr. Grac. lxxvi. 2391). In this treatise Eutychius argues against the Quarto- decimans, against the Hydroperastatae who used water only instead of wine at communion (he says that the only apostolic tradition is the mixture of both), against certain schismatic Armenians who used only wine, and against some Greeks and Armenians who adored the elements as soon as they were offered and before consecration. The last work of Eutychius was a discourse on the manner of existence of reasonable natures in space, a sort of physical theory of the future life. It is mentioned in a treatise of Eustratius of Constantinople (De Vita Functorum Status, cap. 14), who says the object of the work was to prove that the soul is not liable to corruption. The title, which is all that survives, runs: περὶ τῶν ἐν τῷ καθ ἐκείνους ὁμοίων χάριν ἐκείνων καὶ χαρών, which Allatius translates De ipsis qui secundum modo naturalis sua finit in loco, notione videlicet et sola mente praedictis. The Greek and Latin are to be found in Allatius (De Utriusque Ecclesiæ de Purgat. Consens. p. 433), and the Latin alone in La Bigne, Mag. Bibli. Patr. xxvii. 438.

The life of Eutychius was in the Venetian Library, and was edited by Lipomannus, Surius, and Petrus Franciscus Zinus. Another copy was in the possession of Queen Christina of Sweden, and had belonged to Paulus Rhamnusius.

Eutychius was celebrated as a saint by the Greeks, on April 6. His name is found in the Metrical Ephemeris and in the Muscovite Tables. The emperor Basil's Menology has a short biography of him. Molanus mentions him in his Actarium Usuardi.

EUTYCHIUS (19), bishop of Tyndarion (on the north coast of Sicily), is encouraged by Gregory the Great (Lib. iii. indici. xl. Epist. 53; Migne, lxxvii. 659), to persevere in the conversion of "quosdam idolorum cultores atque Angeliliorum dogmatum." [A. H. D. A.]

EUTYCHIUS (20), bishop of Melos in the Aegean, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 945; Mansi, xi. 616.) [L. D.]

EUTYCHIUS (21), Aug. 24, legendary disciple of St. John the Apostle. He was born at Sebastopolis. Basil's Menology strangely represents Eutychius as joining St. Paul and suffering with him after the death of St. John. According to the same, he was flung into a furnace, from which he escaped unhurt, and after visiting St. John's flock at Ephesus, returned to his own city, where he died, according to Molanus, by a martyr's death. [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (22), presbyter and martyr, by some commemorated on April 15, by others on May 15, and by them named Eutitus. He lived at Ferentinum, an ancient episcopal city of Eturia, where he suffered, either slain A.D. 289 or else during the Diocletian persecution, in company with the bishop Donusia. His memory has been celebrated by Gregory the Great in his Dialog. lib. iii. c. 38, where it is related how the martyr appeared to Redemptus, bishop of Ferentinum and foretold the horrors of the Lombard invasion. St. Gregory severity states that he had this story from St. Redemptus himself, who lived in his own time. The vision appeared in 560. The Lombard invasion took place in 566. Gregory wrote his Dialogus in 585. (Rom. Mart. Apr. 15; Boll. Acta SS. ii. 378.) J. S. Assemani in his De Sanctorum Ferentinæ (1745) has an exhaustive dissertation on this saint, his name, church, and festival, distinguishing him from other saints of the same name. [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (23), Feb. 4, martyr at Rome under Maximian, A.D. 304. He was buried is the cemetery of Callistus, where his tomb was afterwards ornamented by pope Damasus, c. 364. [DAMASUS.] In Acta SS. Boll. Feb. i. 438, will be found a copy of an inscription on a marble tablet, erected to the memory of the martyr in the church of St. Sebastian, wherein Damasus laid down a marble pavement. (Ferrarius, Cod. SS.) [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (24), son of Polycentus of Melitene, an Armenian martyr under the pres- ident Antiochus, A.D. 311, Maximian being emperor. (Baron. Annal. 311, xxi.) [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (25), Jan. 20, martyr with Bassus, Eusebius, and Basilides, in the Diocletian persecution. They held a high position in one of the imperial households, where they were so impressed by the courage and steadfastness of a martyr, Theopemptus, that they too embr speed the faith, for which they suffered in various ways. Eutychius was bound to four stakes, which being allowed to rebound, tore him into pieces. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (26), A.D. 358, subdeacon of Alexandria, martyred by the Arian in the persecu- tion of the Alexandrian church. This account is given of him by Athanasius: "imitating the Scythians, the Arians seized Eutychius, a subdeacon, who honourably served the church, and when they had got him beaten on the back with bulls' hides almost to the point of death, demanded that he should be sent to the mines; not any mere chance mines, but in particular those that are called Phaeno, where a condemned homicide would be unable to live more than a few days. And, what is still more extraordinary, they would not allow him even a few hours to be healed of his wounds, but got him sent out on the road forthwith, saying, that if that were done all would tremble and join them. But he had not gone far when, prevented by the pain of his wounds from reaching the mines, he died in the way. He died rejoicing, for he had gained the glory of martyrdom; but the impious persecutors not even then were touched with shame, but as it is written, 'having cruel bowls,' she accomplishing this crime, again devised a deed of Satanic darkness. For when there came supplicants from the people to beg pity for Eutychius they ordered four excellent men of free birth to be arrested, one of whom was Hermias, who said..."

to wash the feet of beggars; these the general order to be hairy, scourged thence, and trampled down by the priscians. But the Arians, more heartless even than Scythians, seeing that they did not die of the pain of the beating, began to extol state and threaten. We shall write, cry them, to the emperors, and tell them that you did not fling them to our taste. Frightened at these words, he was obliged to scourge them again. During the punishment, knowing why they were beaten, and of whom they had been slandered, 'It is for the truth,' they said, 'that we are beaten; we do not communicate with heretics; flog on as you will, you will be judged by God for this.' That was all they said. The persecutors wished them to be imprisoned till death released them; but the people of God, watching their opportunity, begged mercy for them; and after seven days or more they were dismissed." (Athanas. Opp. pars. i, p. 300 in Patr. Grec. xxv. 765; A.D. SS. Bolland. 26 Mart. iii. p. 620, 713.) [W. M. S.]

EUTHYCHIUS (27), a Spaniard by birth, and a martyr a.D. 437 with three others, Arcadius, Probus, and Paschasius, during the Vandal persecution in Africa. Refusing to join in communion with the Arians, they were put to death. (Prosper. Aq. Chron. p. 745; Patr. Lat. lib. 597; Baronie Annoy. A.D. 437.) [G. T. S.]

EUTHYCHIUS (28), a leading person among the Quattredecimans of Philadelphia in Lydia, prevailed upon in 431, by the Nestorian Jacobus, to seek from bishop Theophanes a restoration to church communion. He also signed the symbols of Jacobus. (Labbe, Conc. iii. 675, 678, 686.) [CHARMIUS (1).] [T. W. D.]

EUTHYCHIUS (29), one of the archicham- ridae Euthychnus, as they called themselves, who, being exiled, cast an appeal to the emperor Marcian in the Euthychian interest in a.D. 451, asking for a general council (Labbe, iv. 524). The orthodox archichamnites, sitting in the council of Chalcedon before their Euthychian brethren were summoned, would not recognize him as archichamnite, but described him as belonging to the Basilica of Celsus or Celestius. (Labbe, iv. 518.) [C. G.]

EUTHYCHIUS (30), of Constantinople, founder of a sect. [EUNOMIUS EUTHYCHIAN.]

EUTHYCHIUS (31), a holy man in the district of Narsia, who was called to be abbot of a monastery in his neighbourhood. For a quaint and amusing story of him and his friend Florentius see Greg. Magn. Dist. lib. iii. cap. 15; Migne, 1xvii. 249. (Mabillon, Acta SS. O. B. R. i. 120.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUTHYCHIUS (32), a prefect, bearer of a letter of pope Gregory the Great, who calls him "vir magnificus," to Cridianus, May 602. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xii. ind. v. ep. 54; Patr. Lat. Irxvii. 1244.) [C. H.]

EUTHYCHIUS (33), the last known exarch of Ravenna. His predecessor Paul, who had been directed by the emperor to take or kill the pope excommunicated by the Iconoclastic decree, had been killed, A.D. 727, in an engagement at Ravenna between his own followers and the supporters of image worship. The emperor CHRIST. BISCH.—VOL. II.

then sent the patrician and exarch Euthychius (who had been formerly exarch according to Anestas. Liber Pontif. Greg. ii. § 185, but it does not appear when) to Naples to carry out his designs against pope Gregory II. Euthychius sent a subordinate to Rome to take the pope's life, who was discovered, and whom the Romans desired to kill, but the pope restrained them. They then anathematized the exarch, and told him that if they would willingly die for their pope, Euthychius tried to bribe the Lombard king Liutprand and the dukes to combine with him against the pope, but in vain. After this he probably went to Ravenna. The chronology of the events is here uncertain, but probably, before 792, Ravenna was attacked by Liutprand, Charles destroyed, and the town ultimately taken by his nephew Hildebrand and Peredue duke of Vicenza. The exarch fled to Venice, and Gregory II. wrote to the doge Ursus, and to Antonius patriarch of Grado, in the following remarkable words, "ut ad primum statum sanctorum Regini aliciae in Imperialis servitio dominorum filiorumque nostrorum Leonis et Constantini magnorum imperatorum ipsa revocetur Ravanum civitatem." A Venetian fleet under the doge at once went to Ravenna. Hildebrand was captured, Peredue killed, and Euthychius reinstated. At the time we are told the army of Ravenna and the Venetians, in the fervour of their faith as image-worshippers, would have elected another emperor if the pope had not forbidden them. (Andreas Dandali Chronicon, iii. 2-5 in Muratori, SS. xii. 153; Johannis Chron. Venetum in Pertz, Monum. vii. 13; Pasch. Dial. Constan. 54.)

In 729 Euthychius entered into friendly relations with Liutprand, and they combined for an expedition to the south, Euthychius to take Rome, Liutprand to subdue the dukedoms of Benevento and Spoleto. The dukes submitted, and the combined forces appeared before Rome. At this critical moment Gregory appeared in Liutprand's camp, and induced him to submit to the church. At the king's request the pone consented to be reconciled to the exarch, and when Tiberius Petianus, an usurper, rebelled against the empire in Tuscany, the pope sent assistance with the forces of Euthychius against him. Tiberius was defeated, and his head sent to Constantinople. (Pseudo-Philippus, II. in Liber Pontifficis, Migne, cxviii. 981-983.)

With Gregory III. (731-741) the next pope, Euthychius was on friendly terms, and sent him six columns of onyx. These were placed in St. Peter's, and adorned with figures of Christ, the Apostles, and other saints; doubtless as a protest against the Iconoclasts. In 743 Liutprand began pressing upon the exarchate, and when he was preparing to besiege Ravenna, Euthychius and John the archbishop sent to ask help from pope Zacharias. The pope sent an embassy to Liutprand in vain, went to Ravenna where he was warmly received by the exarch and the people, and then went on to the court of Pavia. The king submitted, and agreed to restore to the empire the conquests he had made. After this we have no further certain knowledge of Euthychius. In 749 king Ratchis is pressing upon the Pentapolis, and in 751 king Astolphus dates a diploma at the place of Sella. 764 is the probable date for the approximate date of the fall of the exarchate, and it is generally assumed, though without any special evidence, that Euthychius was EUTCHYRIUS, bishop of Thessalonica, addressed on September 1, A.D. 437, by pope Leo the Great, in his 150th letter (formerly 119th). He urges him and three other bishops to be courageous against the Eutychians, assuring them that such conduct will confirm the good will of the emperor Patricius. (Leo Mag. Epist. cl. Patr. Lat. liv. 1119; Le Quien, Oriens christ. ii. 34; Ceillier, x. 233.) [W. M. S.]

EUNOIS, Arius, bishop of Antioch, appointed by the influence of Constantius after the deposition of Meletius, A.D. 361. Eunaisos was the companion and intimate friend of Arius from an early age. He was one of the eleven presbyters and deacons of that church, deposed together with Arius by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, c. A.D. 320 (Socr. H. E. i. 6; Soz. H. E. i. 15; Theod. H. E. i. 4; ii. 311; Athanas. de Syn. p. 907). He was again condemned and banished, together with Arius, by the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. When Arius was recalled from banishment, and summoned to the emperor's side in A.D. 330, he was accompanied by Eunaisos, who by this time had been advanced to the presbytery. The Eunaisos restored both regius to the emperor's confidence by an evasive declaration of their faith and a professed acceptance of the creed of Nicaea (Socr. H. E. i. 25, 26; Soz. H. E. ii. 27). He accompanied Arius to Jerusalem at the great gathering of Eusebian bishops for the dedication of the church of the Anastasis, Sept. 15, A.D. 335, and with him was received in communion by the council then held (Soz. H. E. ii. 27; Athan. de Synod. p. 891). In A.D. 361 Constantius, having banished Meletius bishop of Antioch, summoned Eunosios from Alexandria, and commanded the bishops of the province to consecrate him. Athanasius, who calls him by the epithet "the Catholic" (Athanas. Hist. Arian. p. 850), states that he was subsequently deposed. If so, the deposition took no effect (Socr. H. E. ii. 44; Theod. H. E. ii. 27; Philost. H. E. v. 5; Athan. de Synod. p. 907). A few months later Constantius, having while in the east been seized with the fever which put an end to his life, on Nov. 3, A.D. 361, summoned the newly-appointed bishop Eunaisos to his bedside, and received from his hands the sacrament of baptism. Whether this took place at Antioch or at Mopsucrene, in Cilicia, is uncertain (Athan. de Synod. 907; Philost. H. E. vi. 5). On the accession of Valens Eunosios was urged by Eudosios to convene a synod of bishops at Antioch to take off Aetius's sentence. Eunosios replied that it was the part of Eudosios himself to take the initiative. He, however, ultimately yielded to Eudosios's importunity, c. A.D. 364 (Philost. H. E. vii. 5). On the death of Athanasius in A.D. 373, Eunosios was, at his own petition, despatched by Valens with Magnus the imperial treasurer, and a force of troops to install the imperial nominee, the Arius I. of Samosata, in the room of Peter the deacon elected and enthroned bishop. This commission was carried out with shameless brutality and persecution of the orthodox (Socr. H. E. iii. 21; Thad. iv. 21, 22). Eunosios's death is placed by Socrates in A.D. 376, and is said to have taken place at Constantinople (Socr. H. E. iv. 33). Jerome (in Loc. cit. c. vii. p. 144) seems to assert that he lived into the reign of Theodosius. This is improbable, and the passage is probably corrupt. (Le Quien, Or. chr. ii. 713; Baron. de l'ann. 325, lxxix.; 335, xlix.) [E. V.]

EUROIS, bishop of Caesarea in the latter half of the 4th century. On the death of Aetius, A.D. 356, Cyril of Jerusalem had influence enough to secure the appointment of his nominee, Philipmenus, to the vacant see. A rival bishop, however, was speedily appointed by Cyril's bitter enemy, Eutychianus of Scythopolis, called by Epiphanius (whose historical statements must be received with caution) Cyril "the Edder." Philipmenus having disappeared from the stage, Cyril nominated his sister's son, Gelasius, to the bishopric, who in his turn was forced to make room for Eunosios, appointed by some influential (Epiph. Haeres. lxxix. 15). Eunosios held his see against his rivals during the reign of Valens, but was deposed on the accession of Theodosius, A.D. 379, and Gelasius was restored. We are informed by Jerome (ib. viii. 119) that Eunosios had been originally educated in the city of which he afterwards became bishop under Theopnecus, the rhetorician, having Gregory Nyssen as a fellow student. While bishop of Caesarea, he exercised himself to restore the library collected by Origen and Pamphilus. (Hieron. Epist. 141 ad Marcell.) According to Jerome, Eunosios was a copious and popular writer, "serafort ejus variar et multis locupletar trautascus quos nemo pensante scit," the whole of which have perished. [E. V.]

EUROIS. In the Latin list of the fathers of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, occurs the name IUNUS bishop of Cema in Lycaonia, which is most probably a corruption for Eunosios. (Le Quien, Oriens christ. i. 106; Mansi, iii. 570.) [L. D.]

EVA (1), martyr. [DATIVUS]

EVA (2), the fourth abbot of Gloucester. So like her predecessor, Eadburga, is said to have been a widow of Wulfhere king of Mercia. According to the Historia Glouce. (ed. Hart, i. 7) she was blessed by Wilfrid of Worcester in 735 and died in 767, after which time the rule of abesses was discontinued. She is called in the same work, in another place, Gaffe. She seems to be a creature of legend. (Th. p. 4.) [S]

EVAGORAS (1), an Egyptian bishop, who signed at the council of Sardica, A.D. 347. (Athan. Opp. pars. i. 135.) [J. W. S.]

EVAGORAS (2), bishop of Illusa (Gaza) Phrygia Pachastiana; his name was subscribed to his absence by his metropolitan, Nunechus of Laodicis, to the definition of the faith that was read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 453. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Oriens christ. i. 81.) [L. D.]

EUTCHYRIUS (34), martyr. [EUTCHYTHUS (59)]
EVAGRIUS (3), bishop of Heraclea, near M. Lycaon in Macedonia, present at the council of Sardica, A.D. 347. (Mansi, iii. 38; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 81.) [L. IV.]

EVAGRIUS (2), bishop of Mytilene in Lesbos, one of the succeeding bishops at the council of Sardica. He signed the Arian creed of Acacius of Caesarea and George of Alexandria, and was consequently ejected from his episcopate by a decree of the council, A.D. 359. (Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 40; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 953; Mansi, iii. 321.) [L. IV.]

EVAGRIUS (5), one of the bishops who subscribed the synodal letter at Antioch to the emperor Jovian, A.D. 363 (Socr. H. E. iii. 25). His designation is Evagrius Nicollorum (ZueLsb). Sceili remarks Valesius on this passage, was an oriental town of site unknown. (Patr. Graec. Irivii. 454 E.) [C. H.]

EVAGRIUS (4), orthodox bishop of Constantinople for about two months during 370, between Paul and Gregory of Nazianzus, chronologically, his episcopate occurs during that of the heterodox Demophilus. In the year 370 died Eusebius, the heterodox bishop of Constantinople, after holding the see nineteen years. Valesius happened a short time previously to have left Constantinople for Antioch, so that the election was sure, in such excited times, to take place without consultation with him. Arianism was in great force at the capital of the East; the Arians at once chose Demophilus. The Catholic or, as Socrates calls them, the Homoeans, thinking it a favourable opportunity to get a bishop of their own (they had not had one at Constantinople since the death of Paulus, twenty years before), chose Evagrius, a person otherwise unknown. Socrates states that he was consecrated by Eustathius bishop of Antioch, supposed to have been at Constantinople, but Valesius (note 55 on Soc. iv. 14) shows that this private act must have been done before the end of the reign of Constantius, for Julian, and after him Jovian, recalled all the exiled bishops to their sees. The age of Eustathius would now have been between 90 and 110, and therefore remarkable enough to be mentioned. Both Victor Tununensis and Theodorus Lector state that Eustathius died at Philippi, evidently in exile. However that may be, Evagrius, by whomsoever consecrated, had a short term of office. His appointment was the signal for an outburst of persecution from the Arians. The news of the ecclesiastical turmoil quickly reached the emperor Valens on his travels. He feared that a tumult might be raised such as would endanger the safety of the empire. He ordered troops to be despatched from Nicomedia to the metropolis, and banished both Nicomedia and the consecrating bishop. The latter, who may have been some other Eustathius, was exiled either to Bizya or to Cyrus, Evagrius to some other place.

The authority for the duration of his episcopate is Eutychius of Alexandrius, in his Annals, translated into Latin by Pococke.

Evagrius is believed to have been the author of some comments on St. Luke, which Nicetas, descan of Constantineople, afterwards bishop of Serres, included in his Catena Patrum on that evangelist, and which Mai printed in the 9th volume of his Scriptores Vetern. See also Cellller, vi. 333. [W. M. S.]

EVAGRIUS (6), commonly known as Evagrius of Antioch (his birthplace and the chief sphere of his work) to distinguish him from others of the same name, and more especially from Evagrius the historian. The dates of his birth and his death are uncertain; but he is known to have been consecrated bishop over one of the parties in Antioch in A.D. 388 or 389, and he must have lived until at least A.D. 392.

Life.—Evagrius was the son of a citizen of Antioch named Pompeianus. He appears to have been of full age by A.D. 362, and was probably already ordained presbyter when we find him about that date travelling to Italy with Eusebius, bishop of Verulam (347). On the death of Eusebius in A.D. 370, Evagrius returned to Antioch in company with Jerome. He was certainly at that time a presbyter. Some identify him (e.g. Stephen in his Life of Chrysostom, but see Fabricius ubi supra, tom. viii. p. 455) with the presbyter who trained Chrysostom in monastic discipline. This identification is probably correct, though it is remarkable that Chrysostom received ordination, first as a deacon from St. Meletius, and then as priest from Flavian, the bishops of that party in Antioch which stood opposed to the one subsequently headed by Jerome.

For the history of the dispute in Antioch the reader must be referred to the authorities given above, more particularly Theodoret, and to the articles, Flavianus, Meletius, Paulinus. In this place it must suffice to comment upon two points, one involving a general question, the other having special reference to Evagrius. The first point relates to the contest at Antioch. This, though originally springing out of the Arian controversy, soon became a question partly personal and in part connected with the influence, if not the actual jurisdiction, of the Roman see. Indeed St. Jerome (among whose high and noble gifts judicial fairness cannot be reckoned) wrote a letter (No. 15, ed. Ben.) of impassioned partisanship to his friend Damascus [Damascius], which seems to imply that the bishop of Antioch who is accepted at Rome must of necessity be the right one, and that Meletius, with all others not so accepted, must be counted profane. This history has not in any way been tioned the view taken by Jerome in this affair. Meletius, as has been already observed, ordained St. Chrysostom; and, though he may have died out of communion with Rome, has been always allowed, both in the West and in the East, to have been orthodox in doctrine, most blameless in life, and in short one whose name is fully entitled to the honourable prefix of saint. It would be needless to mention this, had not the passage from St. Jerome been cited in controversy (e.g. in Dr. Newman's Essay on Development, p. 279) as if it expressed the general sentiment of the church of his age.

The second point concerns Evagrius. Our information concerning him is not sufficiently ample to enable us to use very positive language concerning his conduct and character. His consecration to the episcopate by Paulinus was, as Theodoret (I.c.) and St. Ambrose (I.c.) both assert, in many ways uncanonical. Paulinus, even if his own position had been wholly unimpeachable, had no right to make another man bishop without consultation of the other bishops of the province, nor to give solitary consecration in the teeth of the famous fourth canon of the Nicene council, which required the co-operation of at least two assisting bishops.

There is a primum facie case against anyone who accepts advancement, as Evagrius did, under such circumstances. It is, however, reasonable to bear in mind the strong influence exerted in all ages, even on good men, by the violence of party spirit, when a contest is still at its height. The circumstances may have disposed the combaters no longer any doctrinal point at issue (καταργείται ἡπείρα τοῦ δογματικοῦ ἐξερεύνησι), as Theodoret has it), in all probability rather increased than diminished the bitterness of the rivalry. One who is described even by Jerome (I.c.), as Evagrius is, a man acris ac ferventia ingenii, may easily have been persuaded by Paulinus that he was doing good service to the church of Christ by accepting the post of successor. The Nicene canon was understood to be indeed a matter of order, but not such a rule as actually to invalidate a consecration once effected (on the principle fieri non dubit, factum valet), and the rival bishop Flavian had broken a solemn promise made by himself that he would never aspire to the see. St. Ambrose (I.c.) takes a western view of the matter, and recommends an appeal to our holy brother, the bishop of the Roman church, but he finds even more fault with the conduct of Flavian than with that of Evagrius, and describes each of the rivals as stronger in the attack than in the defence—vitae seu vitae consortiae magis ordinatio sua quia suum (bonum) et fretus. If excuses can be made for Flavian by charitable critics (e.g. Stephen in his Life of Chrysostom), it seems undeniable that the course pursued by Flavian must also have created in the minds of the large party which accepted Evagrius the impression that he had no colourable case, and that the primal irregularity of his consecration might be condemned. On the death of Evagrius, which appears to have been sudden, no successor was appointed, and Flavian, mainly through the influence of Chrysostom (who highly eulogized him as a worthy successor of St. Meletius), succeeded in healing the division.

Writings.—Evagrius of Antioch, while still a presbyter, read to his friend St. Jerome (Jerome, I.c.) treatises on various topics (discorsae, hypostaseum tractatus). These were not published when Jerome wrote, and if they were subsequently made public, they have not come down to us. Jerome's tone concerning them implies some admiration. He adds that Evagrius translated into Latin (as notorius sermonem) the life of St. Antony from the Greek of Athanasius. Whether we do or do not possess this translation is a matter of considerable controversy, it depends in some degree upon the decision of the previous question, whether we have or have not got the actual biography of St. Antony which St. Athanasius composed. The point has already been discussed in this dictionary. [ANTONY, ATHANASIIUS.] If we accept the position therein (which is that of Du Pin, Newman and others) that the biography ascribed to Athanasius is substantially his, we are then to discuss whether the translation gives us as that of Evagrius of Antioch by the Benedictine editors of Athanasius (tom. i. p. 284, p. 785 et seq.) and by the Bollandists (St. Sanctor, for Jan. tom. ii. p. 107) is genuine and authentic.

Cave (Historia Literaria, vol. i. p. 239, ed. Osong, 1740) rejects it; and Osdin (de Sept. Eccles. antich. tom. i. pp. 358 seqq. 392 seqq.) defends it, and supports Cave. To the present writer the arguments of these distinguished critics appear to resolve themselves into one only; namely, that the Life of Antony by Athanasius is spurious, and that consequently the translation ascribed to Evagrius is also spurious. To dogmatize when such considerable authorities are at variance would be rash. But we believe that most modern critics would consider it all but certain that the author of the Latin biography ascribed to Evagrius had before him a copy of the Greek essentially identical with that which we now possess. It is true that his version is often a very lax one. This is fully admitted by the Benedictine editors, who indeed perhaps overstate the laxity in the following words—"Evagrii versionem quod spectat, usque ad librum illam est, ut apud numerorum verborum Athanasii nihil pensi habeas videtur, immo ad eum ac scopo frequentissime abservat, soleique benedicti Athanasianae exprimere quam in Graecis eam rentur." But the notion of preserving precise strictness in the translation of a biography of some length is a comparatively modern one. What strikes us is the amount of agreement between the Greek and the Latin in the texts cited from Holy Scripture. This is surely a crucial test, as the passages in question are for the most part merely illustrative; and it would be most improbable that two independent authors should select the same. Jerome assures us that Evagrius did translate this work of Athanasius: and we incline to the belief that the translation before us is that to which he referred.

The late Professor Ramsey (Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography, art. EVAGRIUS OF ANTIOCH) mentions the existence of a MS. in the library of Worcester Cathedral, described in the Catal. MSS. Angliae et Hiberniae (vol. ii. p. 17) as containing a life of St. Antony written by Evagrius and translated by St. Jerome. He justly remarks that there probably is some error in the MS itself or in the description of it.

[1. G. C.]

Pompeianus, the father of Evagrius, was, according to Jerome (Chron. anno 2, Aurelian), a descendant of the general officer of the same name who commanded in the campaign of Aurelian against Zenobia, circ. 275. Evagrius belonged to the Eustathian division of the orthodox church at Antioch, of which he became a presbyter. After the unhappy schism at Antioch had been perpetrated by the rash act of the headstrong Lucifer in consecrating Paulinus, Evagrius left Antioch, and accompanied Eusebius of Vercellae to Italy, A.D. 363 or 364. Here he zealously co-operated with Eusebius in restoring peace to the churches disturbed by the results of the disastrous council of Ariminum, and re-establishing orthodoxy on the terms laid down by the synod of Alexandria of A.D. 362. He also afforded pope Damasus important aid in getting the better of his rival Ursicius and his faction, A.D. 385. Bishops of this Eustathian communion

The bishop of the church of Antioch was, according to Jerome (Epist. 52. [52.] He restated his return to Antioch, Evagrius wrote in harsh terms to Basil, accusing him of a love of strife and controversy, and of being unduly swayed by personal partialities. If he really desired peace let him come himself to Antioch and endeavour to re-unite the Catholics under one head. If he could not come he should at least write to them, and use his influence with Meletius to put an end to the discussions that were rending the church. The letter Basil sent in reply is a model of courteous sarcasm. If Evagrius was so great a lover of peace, why had he not fulfilled his promise of communicating with Dorotheus, the head of the Meletian party? Deeply seared evils could not be cured by light measures. A single letter would effect nothing. Much mutual conference and discussion was required. Even if the season had not rendered the mountains impassable, he was too feeble a state of health to travel to Antioch. But some one else, the patriarch of Alexandria, desired it. As regarded the deputation to the West, he had no one qualified to undertake the duty. It would be far better for Evagrius to depute some one from Antioch, who would know the parties to be approached, and the form the letters should assume. A.D. 389. On the death of Paulinus, A.D. 388, Evagrius manifested the hollowness of his professed desire for peace by becoming himself the instrument of prolonging the schism. He was ordained by the dying bishop Paulinus, in his sick chamber, without the presence of witnesses or any assisting bishops, in direct violation of the canons of the church. Flavian, it will be remembered, had been consecrated by the other party on the death of Meletius, A.D. 381. Thus the hope of healing the schism which had long been so great a scandal to the Christian world, and had caused division between holy men agreed on all else, was again frustrated. (Socr. H. E. v. 15; Theod. H. E. v. 23.) The Christian world being still divided, a council was summoned at Capua, A.D. 390, to determine whether Flavian or Evagrius was the lawful bishop of Antioch. At this council Evagrius appeared, but hesitated to attend, telling the emperor that he would rather resign the bishopric into his hands than engage in any public controversy. The bishops assembled at Capua found the question too knotty for them to solve, and after declaring their readiness to admit all orthodox bishops to communion, relegated the decision to the bishops of Alexandria and the Egyptian bishops. In fact, the case of each was so bad that it was almost impossible to distinguish between them. Each, in the words of Ambrose, depended more on the defects of his competitor's ordination than on the validity of his own, so that if Flavian had reason to fear the trial of his cause, Evagrius had no reason to press it. (Ambr. Ep. 8, p. 150.) It was not long, however, before the death of Evagrius deprived Flavian of his rival. It is not certain when this happened; but it was not before A.D. 392, in which year Jerome speaks of him as still alive. (De Vet. illustr. c. 125.) Jerome records the acute, winsome and fervid character of his intellect, and speaks with praise of treatises on various subjects, which he heard him read while still a presbyter, but which he had not yet published. (Ibid.) Evagrius was the owner of the village of Maronis, twelve leagues from Antioch, renowned for its fame as the dwelling place of St. Malchus. (Hieron. Vit. Malchi, p. 255.) Palladius, although a partisan of the Meletian side, praised Evagrius for the many contests he endured in his labours for the church. (Pallad. Dialog. p. 51.) Notwithstanding the doubts as to the validity of his consecration, the church of Antioch enrolled the name of Evagrius in her diptychs as one of her bishops, and he stands in the list of the orthodox bishops of Antioch given by Theodoret at the end of his Ecclesiastical History. [E. V.]

[H. W. P.]

EVAGRIUS (7), bishop of Soli, in Cyprus; present at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, at the seventh session of which he supported Augustinians, the archbishop of Cyprus, and Evagrius declared it. As regards the deputation to the West, he had no one qualified to undertake the Antioch; this claim was allowed and confirmed by the council. (Mansi, iv. 1465; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1072.)

EVAURIUS (8), bishop of Valentia in Phrygia Pacatiana, or of Neva Valentia in Orbisina, a town to be identified in the latter case with Bala, near Nicophorion or Callinicum, on the Euphrates. In the subscriptions he is called bishop of Balanta. He was a supporter of Nestorius at the council of Ephesus, a.d. 431, signed the protest against the operation of the council before the arrival of John of Antioch, as also the synodal decrees and letters of the Orientals, and was consequently cut off from communion by the orthodox (Baluz. Concil.; Synodicon, c. 7 and 13, pp. 699, 706). Some suppose two bishops of this name, but are not supported by the subscriptions. (Gams, Series Episc. 437, 440; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 817, ii. 895.)

EVAURIUS (9), a monk to whom is addressed an epistle, found among the works of Gregory Nazianzen, as his "Oratio xiv." p6p oie6/Tosx. This ascription has been generally regarded as erroneous by the best critics, on the ground of the inferiority of its style. It is attributed by Galland and others to Gregory of Nyssa on the authority of the Panoplia of Euthymius, and several MSS. (Tillemont, ix. p. 709, S. Græg. de Nazianzœ, note 28; Cellier, v. 241; vi. 125.)

EVAURIUS (10), FLAVIUS, consul, together with Flavius Eucherius, when Gregory Nazianzen made his will. (Greg. Naz. Test.)

EVAURIUS (11), a deacon of Nazianzen, mentioned by Gregory Nazianzen in his will in grateful terms as the partner of his labours and his cares. In testimony of his affectionate gratitude, Gregory bequeathed some articles of apparel and thirty gold pieces. (Greg. Naz. Test.)

EVAURIUS (12), PONTICIUS, anchoret and writer, born at Ibona in Pontus Galaticus, according to Tillemont, in 345. Jerome (Epist. ad Hisidion) styles him Hyperboræus. Valensius thinks this is an error of the copyst for Ephesius. But it is more probably a contemptuous play on the word Hærodia, such as Jerome was fond of employing when dealing with his theological adversaries. The father of Evagrius was a presbyter. If, as Tillemont thinks not impossible, Gregory Nazianzen's 153rd epistle has reference to Evagrius of Pontus, his father bore the same name as himself, and he himself received instruction in rhetoric, and the first principles of religion from Basil's friend. However this may be, it is certain that he was ordained reader by Basil, and deacon by Gregory Nyssen, who took him with him to the council of Constantinople, a.d. 381. For that we have the authority of Palladius (Hist. Lausiac. c. 86, p. 1010), who was his pupil. Both Socrates (H. E. iv. 23) and Sozomen (H. E. vi. 30) state that it was Gregory Nazianzen by whom he was ordained, and whom he accompanied to Constantinople, and that he became his archdeacon. But this is an error. (Tillemont, A. R. Eccl. 741, x. 761; Valensius ad Sozomen, vi. 30.) Gregory Nyssen had so high an opinion of the powers of Evagrius as a theologian and dialectician that he left him behind in Constantinople to aid the newly appointed bishop, Nectarius (who it will be remembered before his consecration was a layman of theological training), in dealing with heretics. The imperial city proved a dangerous home for the young deacon. The eloquence of his sermons, commended by the graces of a very handsome person and a scrupulous care in dress, attracted crowds of listeners, including many ladies of rank. One of these, the wife of an ex-prefect, conceived a guilty passion for him, which he returned. The husband's jealousy was awakened, and Evagrius only escaped assassination by a timely flight. It was said that he was warned of his peril by a dream (Soz. H. E. vi. 30). Jerusalem was the place of his retreat. Here he was hospitably received by Melania the elder, by whom he was nursed during a severe attack of fever, and who, perceiving the weakness of his disposition, availed herself of his sickness to lead him to give up the world altogether and embrace an ascetic life as the only safeguard against the temptations to sensual pleasure to which he had more than once almost been a prey. On his recovering Evagrius went to Egypt, the home of the ascetics, where, after two years spent in great austerities in the Nitrian desert, he plunged still deeper into the solitude, and practised severer mortifications in the cells of Scetis. Here he had the two Macari as his instructors and models in the ascetic life. After enduring many terrible temptations, recorded by Palladius, and having obtained mastery over his bodily passions, he became qualified to be the instructor of others in asceticism. Palladius became his companion and disciple in 381. Among his other disciples were Rufinus, and Heracleides of Cyprus, afterwards bishop of Ephesus (Soz. H. E. vii. 18). Palladius gives several anecdotal illustrative of the height of ascetic virtue attained by Evagrius and his fellow hermits. On one occasion he threw into the fire a packet of letters from his masters and other near friends, as the purer of them should entangle him in worldly thoughts once more (Cassian, v. 32; Tillemont, x. 376). His reputation for wisdom and piety led Theophilus, the metropolitan of Alexandria, to desire to make him a bishop, and Evagrius was forced to flee to resist his importunities (Soz. H. E. iv. 23).

Evagrius passed the remainder of his life in the cells of Scetis, where he died worn out with austerities in the seventeenth year of his recluse life, a.d. 598, at the age of fifty-four, "signis et prodigiosis pollinis" (Gennad. Iliast. Vir. c. xi). Evagrius was a serious champion of the doctrines of Origen, for which he fell under the lash of Jerome, whose enmity towards him had been excited not only on theological grounds, but as having been the instructor of Rufinus during his sojourn in Egypt, and having enjoyed the patronage of Melania. Jerome speaks in contemptuous terms of his writings (Ad Epist.); especially of his book πελάτος ἀμαθείας, when combating the tenet ascribed to the Origenists that a man could raise himself to a superiority to temptation (i.e. as Jerome says, "becoming either a stone or god"), and live without sin. He also charges him with being a precursor of Pelagius (in Petiov. p. 260). Jerome excuses Evagrius of including in his book "de monachia" many who never were monks at all; and those who were were Origenists, and had been condemned by their bishops. Evagrius was a very copious writer, and Jerome himself (u. s.) bears witness to the celebrity of his works, which, he tells us, were widely read not only in the East in the original, but also in the West, having been translated into Latin by his pupil Rufinus, as after-wards happened by Socinus. Socinus (u. s.) speaks in high terms of his learning, and eloquence, and the persuasive power of his writings. The existing remains of his writings are printed by Galland, Bibl. Patr. vii. 551—581, and Migne, Patrolog. vol. 86.

(1) "Monachus," πειρατία εν "αὐτῇ πρακτορείᾳ," on "active virtues," in 100 chapters. Of this work Socrates gives two fragments (H. E. iii. 7, iv. 23), and the whole treatise is printed by Cotelerius (Mon. Ecol. Græc. tom. ii. p. 70). (2) "Gnosticus," "as eu qui cognitionis maneri donata sunt," in 50 chapters. A fragment is given by Socrates (H. E. iv. 25). It was translated into Latin by Gennadius. (3) "Antirhetica," a collection of passages from Scripture, with comments, distributed under eight heads, against the eight divisions of evil thoughts. This was also translated by Gennadius. It was published in Greek and Latin by Liege, together with Palladius's Life of Chrysostom, Pat. 1690, 4to, and in Latin only, Bibl. Patr. Lugd. 1677, tom. 27. (4) "A Century of Propers." (5) "966 Greek Problems." (6) A Letter to Melania. (7) A book, πειρατίας. (8) 100 Sentences for the use of Anchorites living alone. (9) Short Sentences, translated by Gennadius, who describes them as being of great obscurity, only intelligible to the hearts of monks. (10) "Evagrius," in two books, one of them addressed to monks, and the other to a virgin dedicated to God (printed without the author's name), Bibl. Patr. u. s., and among the works of Mena (ed. Suares, pp. 613—626). (11) "Liber de verbo omnipotentis rationibus" (Coteler. u. s. lxxvii). (12) "Scholiæ de tetragrammatō Dei nominā" (ed. p. 110). To these may be added the "Compendium," found in a manuscript in the name Evagrius, on Job, Proverbs, and other books of the Old and New Testament. Combebys, in his Bibliotheca Concōntinentiva, gives two such passages, one in the Catena on "the good Samaritan" (vol. t. p. 553), the other on the Parable of the Founds (vol. viii. p. 812), which he ascribes to our author (vol. i. p. 11). (Oudin, l. 883; Tillemont, Men. Eccl. p. 369 fr.; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. ix. 284, ed. Harles; Dupin, Hist. Eccl. iii. i.; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 275.)

EVAGRIUS (14) (Evstithius), prefect of Egypt in the reign of Theodosius I. We hear of him in connection with the disturbances at Alexandria, arising from the desecration of the heathen temples by the bishop Theophilus (Soz. H. E. vii. 15; Soz. H. E. v. 15, 16, 17). This event is placed by Socrates and Sozomen during the time of the emperor's visit to Rome, which was in 383. The pagans made the occasion of resistance, taking up a position in the temple of Serapis, but were finally dissolved. There was a law of Theodosius against the pagans dating June 17, 391, addressed to Evagrius, so that he seems to have been prefect for three years. He is mentioned by Eunapius (Dial. 15) as present at the time of the disturbances at Alexandria, where, however, the common reading is Eustathius.

EVAGRIUS (14), presbyter and monk under St. Martin of Tours, after whose death he betook himself to Sulpicius Severus, with whom he was living in 405. (Guliph. Ecol. iii. 1, 2.) He is proved by Ceiller to have been the author of a dissertation between Theophilus, a Christian, and Simon, a Jew (mentioned by Gennadius, de Viris Ills. cap. i. and printed by Martens in 1717), and of Deliberations between Zaccheus, a Christian, and Apollonius, a philosopher, which in an ancient MS. of the abbey of Vendome precedes the former work, and is plainly by the same author. Both works are to be found in Patr. Lat. vol. xx. (See Ceiller, viii. 424.)

EVAGRIUS (15), philosopher, the friend and fellow-student of Sosiphoenax, by whom he was converted and induced to accept the doctrines of the resurrection of the dead and eternal retribution. (Tillemont, xii. 527.)

EVAGRIUS (16) (Baron. Amm. u. a. 555. lxxvii.), a Trithête heretic. [EUSDIUS (14).]

EVAGRIUS (17), an ecclesiastical historian of the 6th century, who wrote a church history in six books, embracing a period of 163 years, from the council of Ephesus A.D. 431, to the twelfth year of the emperor Mauricius Tiberius, a D. 594. He was born at Epiphaniae in Coele Syria, A.D. 536 or 537. His parents seem to have been Christians, for he tells us himself that they were among the multitudes who, at a time when they were expecting destruction at the hands of Chorozes, hastened to Apamea, a city not far distant from Epiphania, that they might there embrace the wood of the true cross, and thus if possible escape the fate with which they were threatened, or at all events be strengthened for their departure to a better world (iv. 25). Evagrius was a child at school at the time, but was taken with his parents to Apamea for this purpose. The infant in Christ was said to shine with any particular light upon his training; but it illustrates the feelings of the age, and enables us better to understand how one who gives in his works many tokens of sobriety and judgment should have been the eulogial gatherer of legends that he was. From Apamea Evagrius would seem to have gone to Antioch, the capital of Syria, and there to have entered the profession of the law. He must have prosecuted the profession with success, for he received the surname of Scholasticus, a term often applied to lawyers (Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v.), gained great favour with Gregory bishop of Antioch, and was chosen by him to assist him in his judgments. At the same time he seems to have won the esteem and goodwill of all classes, for on the occasion of his marriage, a second one, the city was filled with rejoicing, and great honours were paid him by the citizens.

The relations of Evagrius with Gregory appear, as far as this world goes, to have been among the most fortunate circumstances of his life. He accompanied that bishop to Constantinople, and advocated his cause when he was summoned to answer for them for heinous crimes. The defence was successful. He also wrote for him a book containing aurratus, disputations, with sundry other matters," which must have been highly thought of, for he tells us that, in consequence of it, he was preferred by Tiberius Constantinus to the honour of quaestor, and by Mauricius Tiberius to that of magister militum, "where the lieutenants, and magistrates with their monuments are registered" (vi. 23). This, his own account of his promotion, is more to be trusted than the insinuation contained in Gibbon's sneer that, in his praise of Maurice, he had been "so wisely indi-crate that the emperor knew and rewarded his favourable opinion" (Decline and Fall, ch. 45).

The year of his death is not known. It must have been subsequent to A.D. 594, at which date, the twelfth year of Maurice's reign, he wrote his history at the age of 58 (iv. 28).

It is the history of Evagrius that chiefly inter-est us, for his other works have perished. That history was intended to be a continuation of the histories of Eusebius, Sozomen, Zosimus, Priscus, Joannes Rhetor, Prosopius of Caesarea, Agathius, and other good authors. He saw that the information to be found in them was too scattered to permit of its full value being felt; and he resolved to gather it together, as previous historians had done, to the end "that the famous deeds which shimmered in the dust of forgetful-ness must be stirred with his pen, and presented for immortal memory; that not only every man might know what had happened until that age, when, where, in what sort, against whom, by what men, but also that worthy act, by reckless security and languishing slothfulness the sister of ob-li-vion, might be put clean out of remembrance" (Preface to his Hist.).

These words of his own preface indicate well not only his object but the spirit in which he pursued it, while at the same time they illustrate the unnecessarily inflated style in which perhaps the very sense of the importance of his work not unfrequently led him to indulge. It is fair, however, to allow that he largely attained his end. He is a warm, often an enthusiastic writer, orthodox in his sentiments, and eager in his denunciations of prevailing heresies, yet nothing was demanded by the feel-ings of the time. Jortin indeed has condemned him as "in points of theological controversy an unjustly prejudiced zealot" (Jortin, Remarks on Eccl. Hist. ii. p. 120); but we cannot forget that Evagrius was a lawyer, not a theologian, and that we must look from him for the popular rather than the learned estimate of the theological controversies urged with such keen-ness in his time. It is not so much in this respect that his judgment fails him as in the credulous enthusiasm which led him to accept too easily the legends of the saints then constituting the spiritual nutriment of Christians. Evagrius in other respects shows many of the best qualities of a historian. He has learned from Eusebius the importance of quoting original documents; and not a few such, decrees of councils, supplications to emperors, letters of emperors, and bishops, &c., are preserved in his pages, forming most important authorities for the events to which they relate. He took great pains in collecting his materials, and sometimes made happy use of them. Goss (in Herzog) especially praises his defence of the Emperor Constantine against the slanders of Zosimus.

In his general arrangement he follows the reigns of the emperors of the East from Theodossius the Younger to Maurice: but the arrangement of details is faulty, and in the loose heaping together of his materials, as well as in the failure to place much that he refers to in the light of any general aim, we see the want of the artistic skill of a historian. There is often, however, great spirit in the narrative, of which we have an excellent specimen in his account of the council of Chalcedon (ii. 18). The work is chiefly valuable in relation to the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, and the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. The style, as may be gathered from the extract already given from the preface, is frequently turgid, but upon the whole it is good.

The History of Evagrius was first published by R. Stephens (Par. 1544); but the best edition is that of Valesius, with notes (Par. 1673). Still later, in 1720, it was reprinted at Cambridge in the 4 Hist. Eccl. Scriptores eum seda Valesii et Reading. There is a fair English translation by Meredith Hammer, London, 1819, along with a translation of Eusebius and Sozomen.

EVAL. ST. (ULDES), the patron saint of St. Ival in Cornwall. The parish church is on the Sunday nearest Nov. 20. The Celtic names are planted thickly on this part of the coast, and the dates of the parish feasts have been mostly preserved, while on the eastern side of Cornwall the dates have been in many cases lost (see Cressy's Church History of Brittany, ix. 19, 1).

[C. W. B.]

EVALDUS, bishop of Vienna. [EOALDE]

EVAUCIUS. [EVAUNCH]

EVAUNDER (1), a bishop of Nicomedia, in-vented by "Praedestinatus" (i. 17) as an opponent of the Ophites.

[G. S.]

EVAUNDER (2), bishop of Ursinum (Ajaccio), in Corsica, one of the nineteen bishops appointed by Constantine to bear the case submitted to him by the Donatists, A.D. 313. (Optatus, de Scism. Dom. i. 23; Aug. Opp. vol. iii. 773; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xvi. 507; Ugh. Ital. Soc. iii. 493.)

[H. W. F.]

EVAUNDER (3), one of the solitaries of the diocese of Nazianzus, highly extolled by Gregory
EVANDER

Eyasvaras as rich in the gifts of God, exceeding in purity of soul the whiteness of his grey hair. (Greg. Naz. Caron. 47, p. 108.) [E. V.]

EVANDER (4), bishop of Dicia in Phrygia Pacatiana, a town known only from the records of the councils; present at the council of Chalcedon, a.d. 451 (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 824; Mansi, vii. 157). Gama (Series Episc. 368, 440), following Fairlatt, supposes another Evander at this council, bishop of Diciae on the coast of Epirus, the modern Antivari, in Albania (Farlatt, Hagiocal Sacir. vii. 1). [L. D.]

EVANDER (5), bishop of Cnidius or Stadus, the well-known town on the peninsula of Caria; present at the fifth general council, a.d. 553. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 917; Mansi, ix. 385.) [L. D.]

EYANDRIUS, an Eastern bishop of the 5th century, addressed by Firmus archbishop of Caesarea, in his 15th letter. Firmus invites him to attend a commemoration of certain saints in Argeni. In the council of Chalcedon, a.d. 451, occurs an Evander bishop of Dicia in Phrygia (Evander (4)); but it has been thought that Dicia would be too far from Caesarea for such an invitation. (Firm. Cas. Episc. Epist. xv. Paris. Grac. lxvii. 1492.) [W. M. S.]

EVANGELIUS, bishop of the Scythians, named as "pontifex et praepositus" of the churches among those people (Vid. Patrum, cap. 16 in Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 404 c). Le Quien makes him first bishop of Timi in the time of Dioslethus, Philius being his successor (Or. Chr. i. 121). [C. H.]

EVANGELIUS (1), a presbyter, known through two letters of Jerome to him (73 and 165, ut. Vall.). Vallarini thinks he was of Africa, and was the Evangelus bishop of Assurae mentioned in the Gesta Colationum Carthaginensium (Evangelus (3)), and also the Evangelus to whom Amianus Clemens dedicated his translation of Chrysostom's Homilies (see Migues's Patr. Lat. xi. 1176). The first letter was. reduced by questions relating to Melchizedek. The second by an assertion, which Evangelus rejected, that deacons and presbyters were originally equal. This leads Jerome to develop well-known views on the three orders of the ministry. [W. H. F.]

EVANGELIUS (3) the only known bishop of paulia (Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, i. 528), also called Paulia (Vasula, Procop. de Aedif. iv. 1), in Dacia Medi-

Cenana (Wiltsch, Handbuch, i. § 88). He was set at for the emperor Anastasius, who was a zealus Eutychian, a.d. 516, in the hope that he might prevail upon him to renounce the communion of the Catholics. But, notwithstanding that Evangelus readily refused to consent to the emperor's wish, he was allowed to return to his see in peace, Anastasius, it is said, being afraid of the Illyrian soldiers who were quartered at Paulia and seem to have been greatly attached to their bishop. (Marcellin. Com. Chron. o. a. 516; Farlatt, Hagiog Sacir. vii. 77; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 307.) [T. W. D.]

EVANGELIUS (4), deacon of Sipontum, who in 593 complained to Gregory the Great that his daughter had been seduced by his bishop's nephew (Patxi. 1548); and that, having been a captive of war, he was in debt for his ransom money. Gregory directed that the bishop should discharge this debt from the property of the church if the means of Evangelus were insufficient, and that the seducer should either marry the girl or be confined in a monastery. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. iii. ind. xi. epp. 41, 43.) [C. H.]

EVANTHIUS (1), one of the judges appointed by the emperor Constantius to hear the defence of Photinius (Epiphan. Haer. lxxi. 1. Patr. Gr. xlii. 375 b). [C. H.]

EVANTHIUS (2), St., seventh bishop of Mende, succeeding St. Hilarius. He was present at the fourth council of Orleans in a.d. 541. His successor was Partenious. (Greg. Tur. Vit. Patron. de S. Gallo. c. iv. Migues, Patr. Lat. lxxxi. 1032; Gall. Christ. i. 87; Labbe, Conc. v. 1071.) [S. A. B.]

EVANUS (1), St., seventh bishop of Autun, in the first half of the 5th century. He appears in the Ascovaria of Grevenus and Molanus to Usuard on Sept. 13, on which day he is commemorated. (Gall. Christ. iv. 337; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 21.) [S. A. B.]

EVANUS (2), St., 27th occupant of the see of Vienne, succeeding Philipus and followed by St. Verus III. He was present at the first council of Macon (a.d. 581), the third of Lyons in 583, the second of Valentinia in 584, and the second of Macon in 585. There is extant a letter on the subject of abstinance from the blood of animals which was long attributed to this Evangelus, but was probably written by an archdeacon of Toledo of the same name (see the following article). He died in 586, and is commemorated by some Jan. 13, by others, including the Bollandists, Feb. 3. (Mansi, ix. 936, 943, 945, 957; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 39; Ada, Chronicum, actus sexta (575) in Migues, Patr. Lat. cxxi. 111; Gall. Christ. xvi. 27.) [S. A. B.]

EVANUS (3), mentioned as archdeacon of Toledo about the year 720 by Isidorus Pcenasia (§ 49), who speaks in high praise of him and of his contemporaries, Froladorius bishop of Gundix and Urban preconcer (probably) of the cathedral of Toledo, three men who by their learning, wisdom, and sanctity were a great support of the church. The "doctrina" and "sapientia," of which Isidorus speaks, were displayed in a letter to the Judaising Christians of Saragossa, who refused to eat the blood of animals (conf. Adrian's letter to Egilla, ed. Etila). The letter is printed by Aquirre (Col. Max. Conc. Hisp. iii. 587), by Migues (Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 719), Caninius (Theor. Monum. tom. i. p. 522), La Bigne (Max. Affl. Patr. tom. x. 1092). (Caninius, Col. Hist. i. 540, cf. Ceiller xi. 852) and Fabricius call the author of this letter a Spanish abbot, and he is so called in the title of the letter, but there is no ground for "abbas" in the letter itself, and Aguirre proves that it belongs to the archdeacon. It may possibly be to this letter, or at any rate to the followers of Evantius that Egils refers, when he complains to pope Adrian that certain persons in Spain stigmatize those who refuse to eat blood or things strangled as "rudes aut ineruditi.

Evantius and Urban are also mentioned by Cilicia in his life of St. Isidore (Exp. Sup. v. p. 507) as his authorities for the miracles there described. Cilicia implies that he heard from them all that he narrates, but he does not expressly say that they were eye-witnesses as Bayer reports (l. c.). Indeed, as St. Isidore died in 636, and Isidorus Facensis places the deaths of Urban and Evantius under the era 775 (A.D. 737) this, although possible, is not very probable. Isidore speaks of them as "viri doctores et sanctimoniae studio satis pollentres," an indirect testimony to the tolerance and mildness of the early Mohammedan rule.

EVARIUS (1), king of the Visigoths. (Evario (1.).)

EVARIUS (2), one of the tribe of the Rugini who had accompanied Theodoric into Italy and always kept themselves distinct from the Ostrogoths. He was elected king by his own people after the murder of Ildibald, whom the Ostrogoths had chosen as king when Vitiges was carried prisoner to Constantinople. The Ostrogoths, however, were thoroughly discontented with the inefficiency of Evario, and called Totila, nephew of Ildibald, to be their king, Ann. 541. But Evario entered into secret negotiations with the emperor Justinian to betray Italy to him, and receive the title of prince of the Ostrogoths. During the absence of his messengers Evario was murdered by the Goths after a five months' reign, and Totila became sole king. His life illustrates one of several phases of disunion which existed among the followers of Theodoric after his death. (Procopius, de Bell. Goth. ii. 2, ed. Bonn. ii. pp. 287-290. Dahm, Die Könige der Germanen, ii. 227.)

EVARIUS. [Evaricius.]

EVARIUS (called Aristus in the Liberian catalogue), bishop of Rome at the beginning of the 5th century. With respect to the exact date of the inception of his episcopate, as well as the names and order of succession of his predecessors [LIMUS, ANASCLEPTUS, CLEMENT], ancient accounts are greatly at variance. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 34, iv. 1) gives Clemens as his immediate predecessor, the third year of Tranjan (101) as the date of his accession, and nine years as the duration of his episcopate: but in his Chronicle he makes the latter seven years. (Cron. iv. 1.) Ireneus, an older authority, who probably got his information when at Rome in the time of Eusebius towards the end of the century, also makes Clemens his predecessor, but gives no dates. (Adv. Haeres. iii. 3, 4.) The Liberian (A.D. 354) and subsequent Roman catalogues, as well as Augustin and Optatus, represent him as succeeding Anacleptus, and the former authorities give A.D. 96 as the commencement of his episcopate (thus beginning, according to them, in the reign of Domitian), and between thirteen and fourteen years as its duration. These discrepancies, and the absence of dates from the earliest notice by Ireneus, suggest the conclusion that Evantius is to be ranked in the group of early heals of the Roman church, of whom no authentic tradition was preserved. The conflicting accounts that have come down to us of his three predecessors seem certainly to imply a hazy tradition of their period: and that of Evantius may be taken as partaking of the same dimes, it not having been till later in the 2nd century that, along with the more complete organization of episcopal government, official records of the bishops began to be preserved. Lippus (Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe) takes this view, and adds the fact that Ireneus, in his letter to Victor about the observance of Easter, refers to the practice of Telesphorus and Xystus only, as evidence of the absence of any distinct tradition before the earlier of these two bishops, who succeeded the successor of Evantius. In the Felician catalogue (530) Evantius is described as a Greek of Antioch (his father being a Jew of Bethlehem), is said to have assigned titles (or parishes) to the presbyters of the city, to have appointed seven deacons to attend the bishop when preaching, and to have been buried near the body of St. Peter in the Vatican. Later accounts, unsupported by Ireneus, who assigns the crown of martyrdom to Telesphorus alone among the Roman bishops before his own day, make him a martyr; and as such he is venerated now on Oct. 26.

Two decretal epistles are assigned to this bishop by the Pseudo-Bisdo, both addressed to the bishops of Africa; one containing the direction about seven deacons attending the bishop when preaching, and also regulations about marriage; the other comparing the bond between bishop and pope with that between husband and wife, preserving against undue accusations of bishops, and reserving to the see of Rome the power of terminating all cases arising from such accusations.

EVASIUS (1) L. ST., first bishop of Asti c. A.D. 265, martyr under the praeses Statulinus, with Projectus a "levite" and Mallanus deacon. They suffered under either Gallienus or Diocletian, near the town of Sedulum, the modern Casal di S. Vaso in Liguria near the Po, and were commemorated on Dec. 1. Only two bishops of Asti of this name are recognized by Ughelli, but Cappellelleti reckons three additional ones between them, belonging respectively to the years 364, 389, 419. (Ug. Int. Soc. iv. 396;

EUVASUS (2), II., bishop of Asti, c. 740. Tyros (Cod. Dipl. iv. 119) gives a record of a donation by king Liutprand to St. Euvasus (ann. 743). There is some doubt as to the donation and as to its date. It seems possible that it was made to this bishop in memory of the earlier Euvasus, bishop and martyr. EUVASUS (4), donatist bishop of Gibrill in opposition to Quodvulteius the Catholic, at the conference at Carthage, 411. (Mon. Vet. de Don. p. 448; Morelli, Afr. Chr. i. 171.) [H. W. P.]

EVE, GOSPEL OF. A book called the Gospel of Ewe is said by Epiphanius (Haer. xxvi. p. 84) to have been current among some Gnostic sects; and from it apparently are taken two extracts which he proceeds to give. We are probably to take as mere sarcasm of Epiphanius his statement that this gospel was called after her from her having found the fruit of "knowledge" through the revelation of the serpent who spoke with her. It is more likely that we are to look for illustration to the Pericastic use of the name of Eve "the mother of all living" (Hezipp. v. 16, p. 141), and to the Ophite doctrine concerning the "first woman" (Iren. i. 39, p. 106). [G. S.]

EVELLIUS—May 11. He was a member of St. Peter's College. Converted by the sufferings of St. Torquatus, he was baptized, and therefore beheaded by the tyrant. This martyrdom is so early and genuine authorities. (Mart. Rom. Notker; Ferrarius, Catal. SS.; Bar. Andal. a.d. 69, num. 44.) [G. T. S.]

EVEUTIUS (2), bishop of Ticinum (Pavia); who joined with Ambrose in condemning Palladius and Secundianus at the council of Aquileia, a.d. 381. (Ambrose, Opp. iii. pp. 836, 843.) He also added his signature to a letter addressed by Ambrose and a synod of Milan to Syricus, applauding his condemnation of Jovinianus and others. (Ibid. p. 1044.) [J. L. D.]

EVEUTIUS (3), bishop of Vienne. [Evan- tius (3).]

EVEUTIUS (5), a presbyter. [C. H.]

EVEUTIUS (6), bishop of Cyzicus, who held the see of the Hellespontic province, received letters, along with the other metropolitan from the emperor Leo I., ordering him to assemble his province in synod, and to take its opinion about the murder of St. Proterius, bishop of Alexandria, and about the faith of the council of Chalcedon.
Evetius narrated a similar letter he received from the emperor, which is extant, A.D. 458. (Le 584.)

Or. Chr. i. 594). In the synodal of the province of Pontus Polemoniacus to the emperor Leo I in 458 Evippus signs as metropolitan (Mansi, vii. 605). His name however does not occur in the extant lists of the metropolitans whose communications Leo had invited (Mansi, vi. 523, 788). As far as now known, the subfragans sees of Evippus’s province were Comana, Polemonacum, Cœnus, all three represented in the synodal, and Terasins, which had a bishop at the council of Chalcedon, 451. The sees of Irizium and Pitussa are found later. [C. H.]

Evodius. See also Evodius.

Evodius (L), according to early tradition, first bishop of Antioc. (Euseb., Chron. arm. Abr.
2058; II. E. iii. 22.) The episcopate of Evodius has indirectly the older testimony of Origen, who speaks of Ignatius as the second bishop after Peter (in Luc. Hom. 6, vol. iii. p. 938; see also
p. 2). This tradition has all the appearance of being historical. Ignatius early acquired such celebrity that it is not likely the name of an unquestioned person would have been placed before his, if the facts did not require this arrangement. The language used about episcopacy in the Ignatian epistles agrees with the conclusion that Ignatius was not the first at Antioch to hold such an office. As time went on, the fitness of things seemed more and more to demand that Ignatius should not be separated from the Apostles. Athanasius (Epist. de SYNODIS, i. 607) speaks of Ignatius as coming after the Apostles without mention of any one intervening; Chrys-sotom makes him contemporary with the Apostles (Hom. in Ignat. vol. ii. p. 593; the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) have recourse to the expedient adopted in the parallel case of Clement of Rome, the hypothesis of a double ordination, Evodius being said to have been ordained by Peter, Ignatius by Paul. Theodoret (Dial. l. Immuth., iv. 82, Migne) and others represent Ignatius as ordained by Peter. The authorities on the subject are given at length by Zahn (Patres Apostol. ii. 327). Malalas, 252 (325), has a circumstantial story how Peter, happening to pass through Antioch at the time of the death of Evodius, ordained Ignatius in his room, and how about the same time Mark was succeeded in the episcopate of Alexandria by his disciple Anianus, as the learned chronologist Theophrilus related. He further ascribes to Evodius the giving to the disciples the name of Christians. The Theophrilus here mentioned is doubtless he who was bishop of Antioch, a.d. 170.
We are not warranted in ascribing to him the testimony of Malalas than that Theophrilus mentioned the episcopate of Anianus; an interesting fact, from which we may probably infer that he gave account of the succession of bishops, not only at Alexandria but also at his own see, Antioc.

There is reason to believe that the earliest tradition did not include an ordination even of Evodius by Peter; for the chronicle of Eusebius places the departure of Peter from Antioch three years, or according to St. Jerome’s version, two years before the ordination of Evodius. The chronology of the early bishops of Antioch has lately been investigated by Harnack (Die Zeit des Ignatius).
He notices that the chronicle of Eusebius does not, as in the case of the bishops of Rome and Alexandria, accompany the name of each bishop of Antioch with a note of the length of his episcopate; but on the other hand it that it does not abstain from assigning a date for the accession of each, as in the case of the bishops of Jerusalem, where Eusebius owns to having no chronological information. He infers that the earliest list must have contained only names of bishops of Antioch without any note of length of episcopates, but still that Eusebius must have had the work of some preceding chronologer to guide him. He tries to prove that this work was the chronicle of Africanus, and also that Africanus had without any real chronological information put down dates for the accession of each bishop on the old traditional list, according to an arbitrary scheme of his own. Harnack’s supposed discovery of the principle of this scheme may be rejected as a mere ingenious fancy (see Hilgenfeld’s review, Zeitschrift, 1878, p. 403); but we may well believe that Eusebius got his chronology of early bishops of Antioch from Africanus, to whom he acknowledges his obligation, and whose chronicle has generally been believed to be the basis of that of Eusebius. If the belief had been entertained at the beginning of the 3rd century that Evodius had been ordained by Peter it is unlikely that Africanus would have omitted to mention the name of any ordainer, and incredible that he would have assigned a date to the event which absolutely excludes an ordination by Peter. It deserves to be remarked that the Clementine Recognitions do not mention Evodius, though his ordination by Peter would have been the natural termination of the work if the author had heard of any such tradition; and also that Tertullian (de Præscip. 32) is silent about it in a place where we might have expected him to mention it. The explanation of the date assigned by the chronicle of Eusebius to the succession of Evodius is revealed, on inspecting it in the form given by Jerome, where we find three consecutive entries in three consecutive years, giving the assumption by Peter of the episcopate of Rome, and the appointment of Mark and Evodius respectively to the bishops of Alexandria and of Antioch. It is apparent that the chronology has no historical basis, and that their order merely expresses the order in dignity of the three sees in the time of the chronologer. Thus, while we accept the episco-pate of Evodius as a historic fact, we have EVDIUS (3), bishop of Uasalis in prosconsular Africa, not far from Utica. (Aug. Civ. B. xiii. 21.) Born, as well as St. Augustine, at Tagaste, he became intimate with him at Milan, a.d. 385 or 386, and the friendship thus begun lasted through life. He was at first a soldier, but left the army on becoming a Christian, in which all-important change he preceded his friend. Having determined to return to Africa the two friends proceeded together as far as Ostia, where Monicas, the mother of Augustine, died. Augustine relates how, after her death, Eudius took the lead among the assembled company in chanting Ps. Prior. (Aug. Conf. iv. 8, 12.)

In the course of their subsequent lives, Augustine and Eudius frequently exchanged letters, and in two treatises written in the form of dialogues, the latter is represented by Augustine as the interlocutor with himself. One of these dialogues, De Consulate Animal, written a.d. 391, the other, De Libero Arbitrio, begun about the same time, was not finished till 395. Four letters of Eudius to Augustine are extant, numbered in the list 158, 160, 161, 163, all written about 414, and one is mentioned as having failed to reach its destination. No. 158 gives an account of the dying death in the monastery in which Eudius was then living, of a youth, his secretary, the son of Armeunas, a presbyter of Melitenes, and of an apparition of him after death to a widow named Urbea. Upon this last he proceeds to Augustine various speculative questions concerning the condition of the departed in his reply to this (Ep. 159). Augustine declares his inability to solve all his friend's questions, and refers him to his twelfth book, De Gen., which he was intending to republish. He appeals, however, to the experience of many persons as to the reality of apparitions, especially mentioning one which occurred to a young physician named Genecius, whose doubt concerning the future life had been removed thereby. In No. 160, Eudius proposes to Augustine an abstract metaphysical question as to the time in life or after the death. We cannot understand about God, he says, without the aid of reason. Therefore reason seems to be anterior in time to God, and as reason helps to demonstrate the being of God, so the Son's existence demonstrates the being of the Father. In No. 161 he proceeds further questions concerning the incarnation, and finds fault with certain expressions used by Augustine in a letter to Volusianus, which he had read in a remonstrance to the Pelagians addressed to Innocent, bishop of Rome (Aug. Ep. 177, 185). In 425 he is mentioned by Augustine as a trust-
EWA, ST.

EWOULUS, bishop of Avignon. [EULUS]

EWOULUS (Gall. Chr. ii. 500), bishop of Limoges. [EULUS]

EWOULIS (Evoortius), bishop of Zeugma in the Syrian province of Euphrates. His name appears also as Evocius, and in Greek as Eulpios. The name of his see appears also on coins as Zevgarov (Smith’s Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Geogr. s. v.). Present at the council of Antioch in A.D. 448 (Harduin, Concil. ii. 515 ii), and at Chalcedon in 451. He signs the synodal letter of the latter council to Leo I. (Leo Mag. Ep. 96, 1105, Migne), but here his name appears as Evodus, bishop of Sauna, q. v. [C. G.]

EVOPTIIUS, a native of Cyrene, succeeded his elder brother Symius, as bishop of Ptolemais, the chief city of the Libyan Pentapolis, c. A.D. 430. He was one of the leading prelates at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Labbe, Concil. iv. 285), and was one of the seven bishops deputed by the Cyrillian party to lay their case before the emperor (Labbe, Concil. iii. 784). He set Cyril Theodoret’s condemnation of hisautopietas, for which courtesy Cyril thanked him in a gracious letter. (Rud. iv. 887, 480; Liberat. c. ix. 41.) [E. V.]

EVORIC, king of the Visigoths. [EURI]

EVOBTIIUS (Euvoríus), often in the English Calendar Encomius, bishop of Orleans, appearing in one Martyrology as a martyr, but in all other records as a confessor. The question of his date depends on his identification with Eortius, whose name is subscribed to the acts of the council of Valence A.D. 374. The Hollandist biographer argues at great length against this identification, and places Evoritius under Constantine; but the other opinion is maintained by Tillemont. The acts of this bishop, assigned by the Hollandist to the 6th, by Tillemont to the 8th century, are so filled with fables that nothing trustworthy can be extracted from them. (Acta SS. Sept. 7; Tillemont, Mémo. viii. 555; Gams, Spir. Ep. 592.) [R. T. S.]

EVOTUS. [SARAGOSA, MARTYRS OF.]

EVREMUND. [ESREMUND]

EVRESIUS, bishop of Termessus in the second Pamphylia, one of the Nicene fathers, a.d. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1019; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

EVRICHERIUS, bishop of Lagonia. [ERICHORES.]

EVROU, ST. [EUKULUS]

EVRITIIUS. [Euvoríus]

EWA, ST., gave name to the Cornish parish of St. Ewe, west of Mevagissey. John of Tintern, Capgrave’s predecessor in collecting the lives of the saints, spells the name “Iwy” (see appendix to Ritson’s Arthur, p. 168). The church sometimes has the prefix “La” (Flynn’s Records, iii. 202, “Laungev in Poudershires”), which seems to be prefixed in Domestay to meet of the Cornish churches of British origin that are mentioned there. [C. W. B.]
EWAIN, EWEEN. In the short prose chronicle which precedes the metrical in the Chronicle Elegiacum (Skene, Chron. Picta and Scot., 177), the following obits are given of kings of the Scots in direct lineal succession, viz., Ewan, A.D. 741; Murezau, A.D. 744; Ewen, A.D. 747; Hed (Abbub), A.D. 777; Fergus, A.D. 804. From this chronicon they appear to have been inserted in the Chronicle of Mabion (Gale, Hist. Angl. Script., t. i. pp. 136-7). But with the same or less alteration, they appear in the other Scots Chronicles (Skene, i. 130, 140, 171, 287, 305). Allowing for the uncertainty of dates and nominal forms, these are evidently Echactus (Achy, Eichold, Eugenius) III. c. A.D. 708-733; Murdock, c. A.D. 733-736; Eoghan (Achy, Eugenius), c. A.D. 736-739; Aodh Flu of Edina (Kilnianz Efinnus, by translation Hed Albus, erroneously Abbub), c. A.D. 739-769; and Fergus, c. A.D. 769-772. [J. G.]

EWALD (Creery, Ca. Hist. Brit. ix. 19, 1), Cornish saint. [EVAL] [C. H.]

EWALD. [HEWALD].

EWEM, in the anonymous fragment which forms the earliest extant life of St. Ketigern, and is acknowledged to have been the basis of Jocelin's fuller narrative, is the name of the sceler of St. Ketigern's mother, and the father of St. Ketigern. He is there called "Ewem Wergend nobilesissima Brittonum prope orus"; and again, "In gestis historiarum [historian?', vocatur Ewem filius regis Uli" (op. Forbes, S. Nin. and S. Kent. 245). Jocelin gives no name. Provo, Aberdeen, has "patre Lupio Leurthe." This Ewem or Eugenius is evidently Owein, son of Uliien Rhiwedd, whose name is so familiar in the Welsh poetry of Tales-in and other bardic works (Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, passim); he is the Ywaine, Ewen, Owein, Owain, of the Romances and Welsh Trials, in both of which he is represented as a bold warrior, with his father Uriance, and at last slain in battle by Frawddoc, i.e., Theudric, king of Berica (A.D. 580-587). Geoffrey of Monmouth (Hist. i. c. 1) calls him Ewancus, and represents him as the honoured friend of king Arthur, as the nephew of Angusel, king of Alba, and of Lot, the ruler of Lothian; and as himself the ruler of Moray by special gift from Arthur. It is probably from this bardic and legendary source that the anonymous writer is the time of Herbert, bishop of Glasgow, venerated to name Ewem as the father of his saintly patron and literary hero. (See Ritson, Met. Rom. iii. 225 sq.; Williams, Eumin, Welsh, 386; Rees, Welsh Saints, 261.) [J. G.]

EWINUS, ST., or Uni, brother of St. Ia, and St. Ercus, and patron saint of Uny-Lelay, in the Hayle estuary, where St. Ia landed. His festival was Feb. 1. (On the derivation of the name, see.) and the parish feast of Lelant is still on the Sunday nearest to Feb. 1, the tendency having been to move the feasts on to the next Sunday. Lelant (a corruption of Lanant) is the mother church to St. Ives (In) and Towadneck, and St. Caen, and to a small extent, to Pen-y-bont, the Episcopal seat of the neighbourhood (see Leland, Itin. iii. p. 19; Oliver's Itin. Doces. Exon. p. 75, 440, 442; Whittaker's Cathedral of Cornwall, ii. p. 4 and 99).

William of Worcester says "Sanctus Vuy (misprint for Uny), fratex sancti Herych, jacet in ecclesia parochialii Sancti Vuyi propo villam Lelant super mare borbale per tria milliaria de Mont-Meygill; ejus dies agitatur diebus Februr.ii." [C. W. B.]

EXACONITAE. [EXCOnITAE.]

EXARNS, bishop of Osnobola, who signed the acts of the council of Merida, 666, in the eighteenth year of Rekewinth. (Mansi, xi. 89; Loaiza, Concil. Hisp. ii. 533; Esp. Sfor. xiv. 215; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 267.) [M. A. W.]

EXCALCETI, superstitious people classed as heretics by Philaster (61), followed by Augustine (68). They counted it a duty to walk barefoot in obedience to God's command to Moses (Ex. iii. 5), and in imitation of Isaiah (xx. 3). [G. S.]

EXCOMMUNICATION (excommunicatio) strictly construed = the judicial act excluding individuals or churches from communion, or participation in the sacrament of the Eucharist. It is thus stronger than διωγμή, which, in fact, its effect; and more specific than ἐφορέωμεν or ἀνάθημα, though it is implied in both. For nobody was ever cast out of the church or placed under anathema who was admissible to communion; yet people were constantly refused communion without being anathematized or cast out of the church as well. Higher privileges might be suspended without involving the loss of the lower; but forfeiture of the lower presupposed that of the highest. The highest privilege to which the church could admit was the sacrament in which Christ was given and received. None with the best dispositions could be admitted to it who had not been baptized: nor any that had been baptized, but were living in unreptent sin. Probably there is no recorded instance of excommunication, as such, in the New Testament unless the command of τιμωρήσετε μηδέ συνανθρώποι (1 Cor. v. 11), interpreted by x. 29, may be supposed one; and probably the first recorded it of it in ecclesiastical history was supplied by Pope Victor in his dispute with the churches of Asia Minor about Easter—διωγμούσης ἑγορό πάνω τε οὐκ οὖν δικαιοποιήσεται ἐκκλησία. (Euseb. E.H. v. 24). This is the more curious, as the Latin word for it has really no Greek equivalent. Hence St. Athanasius, in affirming the same thing of the bishops who met at Seleucia, has to use the same phrase—διωγμούσης παντός ἐκκλησίας οὖν ἐπισκόπους. (De Syn. § 12), there being no such word in use as διωγμός. The Greeks had a delicacy, no doubt, in associating ecclesiastical censure so directly with a subject of so much awe. This is, however, the point of view to which our attention should be confined here; viz. exclusion from the sacrament, and its effects, so far as they are spiritual, and connected with the soul, according to the teaching of the Fathers. For explanations of the term in church-law, where it is commonly taken in a much wider sense, as Albaspineus has shown (Observ. Ecc. 1. i. comp. Marili. Alter. de Cons. Ecles. lib. 1. disp. ii. c. 3); and for the spiritual consequences of different times connected with it in either sense, see the Dictionary of Antiquities and of the Bible, s. v.
EXCOMMUNICATION

Remur: Ipsi praedicate et monente: "Ego sum panis vitae, Qui de coco decedisti. Si quis uberit de Meo pane, vivet in aeternum. Panis satem, quem ego dedero, caro mea est pro seculi vitii." Quandod ego dederim, neque in vitium, neque in libidinem eriderit de Eius pane, ut manifestum est eos vivere, qui corpus Eius attigant, et Eucharistiam jure communicationis accipient: ita contra temporalem est et orandum, ne dum quis abstusit separatus a Christo corpore, primo remanent a salute: communicari vel dictum est: "Nisi oeditis carmen Filii Hominalis, et bibite Ejus, non habebitis vitam in vitis." Et ideo Paschae nostrae, id est, Christum dari nobiscum quotidianis petimus, ut qui in Christo manemus et vivimus, a sanctificatione Eius et corpore non recedamus" (de Ovart. Dom. ad Verba). Such was the general view taken of this petition in primitive times, and irrespectively of the explanations given to the word τινοςεύριον. This, according to St. Cyril of Jerusalem, is τινοςεύριον, τος ουκ ηδήν της ψυχης καινακαισμούς (Cathech. xxiii. 15). It was rendered by the Latins in general "quotidianum," whence St. Isidore seeks to re-establish it (Ep. ix. 136). It is hardly possible to translate vel carna tributur, hic exposcitur... (Excl. Off. i. 15); and St. Augustine, "non miserum, si nominato pane et cetera necessaria intelligantur" (Serm. liii. § 5, ed. Ben.); but the he adds: " Ergo, panem nostrum, &c. quid est? Sic vivamus, ut ab altari tuo non separemus." And in another sermon (lxx. § 6), he asks, in reference to the next petition: "Quid est quo eramus, nisi ne malum aliquid admissamus, unde a tali pane separemus."... Thus excluding a mass from the Eucharist was thought in those times equivalent to depriving him of the daily bread of his soul; and this St. Cyril tells Pope Cornelius should never be lightly done, showing from two subjoined cases what his own practice was. The first was that of the lapsed. "Si tuerasumam jam priores, frater carissime, parti-pato iudiciem nobiscum consilio, ut qui in per-sectionibus infestatione supposito ab adversario, et lapset, ab altari tuo non separemus..." "Servi ducendum fideli agnoscunt fideles," says St. Augustine (Serm. cxxi. § 1, ed. Ben.). And as they know what they get in it, so they know, likewise, what they lose, when they are refused it on just grounds, or absent themselves from it with deliberate purpose. It was this universal instinct, doubtless, that influenced the authors of the primitive liturgies everywhere to order the recital of the Lord's Prayer by all, before communion was given; and gave rise to the tradition mentioned by pope Gregory I. (Ep. lib. ix. 12) that the apostles employed no prayer in the breaking of bread but that one: the daily bread for which they asked in that prayer being, pre-eminently, "the bread from heaven," which they received then. It was intended to be the daily food of the soul, in their opinion, as what they ate and drank was of the body. Thus St. Cyri-con: "Panem vitae Christum est... et quo modo dicimus Pater nostro, quia intelligendum et credendum Pater est, sic et panem nostrum vocamus, quia Christus eorum, qui corpus Eius contingunt, panis est. Hunc autem panem dari nobis quotidie postulamus, ne qui in Christo sumus, et Eucharistiam quotidie ad cibum salutis et vitis vocemus, cultum vobis, insignes, delecto, dum abstent et non communicantes a celesti pane probemur, a Christi corpore separrabilia ecclesiara in verbo veritatis institutor, liberum arbitrium negat esse in hominibus, quia Deo totum tribuit quodd recta vivimus? Nam quid legem Dei culpatis, quia non ex ipsa justificari hominem significat: quandoquidem quod illa iubet, a Domino Deo precibus impetrandum esse declarat? . . . (C. Ep. Past. v. 9). The baptized had only to ask for grace to be kept from sin. They were, therefore, considered to be doubly responsible before God, whenever they sinned by choice; and to be barred from the Eucharist by every such sin till it had been forgiven. How then, was forgiveness of such sins to be had? By "the ministry of that reconciliation," as the apostle calls it (2 Cor. v. 18-19), wherewith "God had reconciled the world to Himself in Christ," committed by Christ to his church. As Theodoret has paraphrased his meaning: "Εδόθησαν τοις διαμαρτυρηματι της ἁμαρτίας, ημεῖς δέ, ἐπουραγησάμενοι της ἐνεργείας ἐξοριστώμενοι. One of St. Cyril's paraphrases of the Lord's (John xx. 21-3): "Summing up the institution of the apostleship in a few words, He tells them, that He sends them as the Father had sent Him; that they might thus feel it to be their duty to call sinners to repentance, and heal those that were sick in mind, spirit, soul, and body, and ever seek in their ministry, not their own will, but the will of Him who sent them, and do their utmost to keep the world in His teaching." . . .

It was in the spirit of this injunction that a system of canonical discipline was gradually framed for those who had fallen into such sins as should exclude them from the Eucharist: for those to whom there could be no doubt those words of the apostle would apply: "Whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." Such spying the church would have to itself, as well as to her members, to prevent. "Quod non statim Domini corpus iniquitatis manibus acceptum, aut ore polluto Domini sanguinem bibat, sacerdotibus sacrilegus frustratur," says St. Cyprian of the lapsed of his day. And again, more fully: "Quocunque occurrit scriptura Divina, si in imperio spirituale manducavit carnem et anima quacunque manducaverit ex carne sacrificii salutaris, quod est Domini, et immuniqvia ipsius super ipsum est, peribit anima illa de populo suo" (Lev. xii. 19, 20). Apostolus item testetur et dicit: "Non potestis calicem Domini bibere, et calicem de moderatorum: non potestis mettere Domini communicare, et mensa demoniorum" (1 Cor. x. 21).

Idem contumacijs et pervicacibus comminutus et deidentur, dicebant: "Quicunque ederit panem aut biberit calicem Domini indignus, reus est corporis et sanguinis Domini" (ib. xii. 27): spondet his omnius et contemptis, ante expiata delicta, ante exonomologesim factam criminis, ante purgatis sanctiam sacrificio et manu sacerdotis, ante offensam placatam indignantis Domini et minantis, vis infirmitur corpi Ejus et sanguini: et plus modis in Dioymum manibus atque ore deliquans, quam cum Domini negaverant. . . . (De iustitiis cap. iii. 21).

The public opinion finally was unanimous with the church in putting a bar between all such offenders and the church's holiest rite: and was content that the church should decide what that bar should be. Public opinion went with the priest in all ages, though . . .

An inhibition, in the words of St. Ambrose: "Apostolus docet ut separemus nos ab omni fraude iniqui. Agentem. Perciaciamus eum gladio spirituali, qui est Verbum Dei. Non fratri, non prope frater, qui est Verbum Dei: sed eum non immundum a Christo secernamus altari, ut emendet et corrigat lapsus suos, quid ac sacramento Christi redire mereatur" (De Ep. et Ex. § 82). As he told the emperor Theodosius to his face: "I dare not offer the sacrifice, should you elect to be present: for how can what is unlawful for the slayer of one innocent person be conceded to the slayer of many?" ... (Ep. 51, ed. Ben.). "Or how will you extend hands reeking with blood unjustly spilt to receive the Lord's body: or approach the mouth, that illegally sanctioned the slaughter of so many persons in wrath, to His precious blood? Withdraw, then: and far from endeavouring to aggravate one crime by another, accept the sentence which God, the Master of all things, confirms: its whole design being to promote your cure" ... (Theodor. H. H. v. 18). Even when soldiers were sent by Valentinein, in the Arian interest, to occupy his church, his orders were: "ut abstinenter a communionis consortio" (Ep. I. § 20). For, as he says elsewhere: "Sequestrari, oportet graviter lapsum, ne medicum fermentum totam massa curruptum... Et benedicat 'expurgandum,' non proficiendum: quod autem ministrum, non totum jussit. Ideo enim purgatum, ut utile et inutilis separaretur. Quod autem projiciatur, nihil in se utile habere creditur" ... (De Poen. i. 15). And there was yet a further limitation which was always implied: viz. that nobody should be so debased for offences that were not either proved or owned. The acts of Theodosius, and of the soldiers of Valentinein, were public acts that proved themselves. Bishops might use too much precipitation in cases that were less obvious. "Et ita fit," as Origen says (In Lev. xiv. 3), "ut interdum ille qui feritas minitatur, intus sit: et ille foris qui intus retinet se: ... atque epidem in Data. Most of our brethren were of that age, when St. Augustine was most explicit on this point. "Nos a communione prohibere quenquam non possimus," he says (Serm. ccxi. § 10), "quamvis haec prohibito nonudum sit mortalis, sed medicinalis, nisi aut sponte confessamus, aut in aliquo, sive secaculii sive ecclesiasticorum, iudicio nosse. Sibi remanerit quidem in utrumque sudeb assumere, ut cuiquum ipsa sit et ascensus et iudex." One effect of this caution on the part of the church would of course be, that three parts of the crimes committed would escape punishment, if not observation, unless voluntarily confessed; and thus every person would be left to shift as it suited his own fitness to communicate — in most cases: in all cases, that is, where the sin committed was not one of those prescribed in the canons, and for which consequently no canonical penalty was incurred. Offenders of this sort naturally formed a large and important body, that all believed in some degree understood themselves to be debarred, ipso facto, not merely from communicating, but from worshipping with the faithful in any way, till they had performed their penance to the satisfaction of their bishop, which, of course, could not be done without making known their sin, and during the whole period under consideration this was a public act, and there was a set time for performing it. As St. Eligius, bishop of Noyon (A.D. 640) has it in the first of his homilies at Maudry Thursday: "Ut igitur audire vestra dictio, haec omnis pedem lotus nostrorum conciliorum est magnum inconstantiam ipse die, sicut ecclesiae tenet consuetudo, pesientiam fit reconciliatio. Ut enim autam nos dis- tum est a Patribus, cum tanta est plaga pecati atque impetus morbi, ut medicamenta corpore eae sanguinis Domini differenda sint, auctoritate antistitis debet se quiesque ab altario renoveris, quod ad legam penitentiam, et eodem auctoritate reconcile- liari. Lectum quippe modo est: 'Quis man- ducet et bibit indignum,' &c. Hoc enim est indicia illud accipere qui accipiet te tempo, quod debeat penitentiam agere. Ut mihi ad vos, 0 fratres, nunc habebundis est sermo, quos sancte pres- ses ecclesia nostre officio hodiern reconcilest Deus... In reconciliatione autem vestra, nobis estis episcopos attendere ut auctores, sed ut ministri: nam quis sit auctor manifestatur sedregnum. doctor... 'Omnia autem ex Deo, Qui reconciliavit nos sibi per Christum... Exercet omnes... Servus Christi... (ap. Migne, Patrolog., lxxxvii. 610.) However, even such offenders might at times honestly doubt whether they had actually sinned to the extent contemplated in the canons: as, for instance, where their sin had been committed under compulsion or without full purpose or knowledge of its gravity, or had been but half executed. And for the greater number of sins by far, there would be no external standard of any sort to gauge their precise gravity. In all such cases the church was content to insist on the general duties of self-examination and repentance, leaving, or rather committing, the execution of both to the individual conscience, where consciences were willing and strong enough to act for themselves, but always giving everybody the option of having recourse to her minis- ters for the exercise of those powers with which they had been entrusted by Christ. For sometimes it was held that a man might be severely wronged with themselves in particular cases that was required, or were possessed by a morbid feeling of their general unworthiness and need to be reassured; of such St. Ambrose says, "Severeiores in se judices sunt qui posse praescribunt sibi, declinant remedium" (De Poen. i. 9). Quoddam enim sit in antiquo, si manus, iniuriae, ut, De Est.}

iv. 6). Besides, the invitation was to all, as Theodoret says: "He calls the Lord's sacrifice the Lord's Supper, as being partaken by all equally, whether rich or poor, slaves or masters, rulers or subjects... open to all alike is the Lord's table." (I Cor. xi. 20); and St. Chrysostom: "The Lord's Supper," that is, "the Master's, ought to be common to all. For what belongs to the master is not the property of one servant more than another, but is shared by all alike (I. v. 21). Again, why should he remind us of that time, of that evening, when Christ was betrothed to his bride? You might wonder if any rapacious plunderer, or ungodly luxury, or unrighteousness might be excited in us from such remembrance? For let a person be a very stone, yet he could not think of Him on that night, first sorrowful with His disciples, then betrayed, bound, led away, condemned, and tormented to the extent He was, without feeling himself mired inwardly like wax, and becoming dead to the things of this world. To you I would apply, as to the Eucharist, this saying that you do not give way to excess, but perhaps to less. You do not allow yourself to be disturbed by the mercy you have received; live then accordingly, and be at one with your neighbour... (Ib. v. 24). Consider how the apostles employed themselves, whenever they partook of that holy feast; what time they devoted to prayer and psalm-singing; how they kept holy vigil... and do you consider yourself fasting to communion merely that you may appear in some sort fit to receive; but when you have received, instead of continuing your moderation, let it all go. Whereas, it is not of equal moment to be sober after and before, for you should be sober both; but, of the two, most after having received the Bridegroom. You should be sober before receiving, in order to become worthy to receive; and after, in order not to appear unworthy of what you have received. What then? Should you fast after you have received? I don't see that. I would not force; I would simply show that I have a good conscience. I would be merely to say that you do not give way to excess... (Ib. v. 27). But "let a man prove himself." As he says in his 2nd Epistle: "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove yourselves" (2 Cor. xiii. 5): not as we do now; instructed rather by the time of year, than by zeal of heart. For our thought is not to prepare ourselves so that we may be come filled with composure and purged from all our sins, but so that we may come on great festivals, and when everybody else comes. Such, however, was not the teaching of the apostle, whose one concern for coming to communion was a pure conscience. For a festival, according to his teaching, was a manifestation of good works, uprightness of mind, and irreproachable conduct; possessed of these, you will be able to keep festival at all times, and to come to communion at all times too. It is for this reason he says: "I pray for myself, and for them that hear me," in other words, he bids each man not to have recourse to another, but to prove himself, directing the tribunal to be without publicity and the proof without witnesses... (Ib. v. 28).

As Theodoret has it: "Be your own judge, and take accurate account of all the acts of your life; examine your conscience, and so receive the gift." (Ib.). One possible result of this teaching, of course, would be that the bad might frequently communicate side by side with the good. So they might, replies the Fathers, but it would be no more than Judas had done at the outset. Oi μόνοι οι θεωκα ἀπόστολοι, ἢλλα καὶ τὸ πρόσωπον, τῶν μικρῶν μετεώρον ἁματος τα καὶ ἀματος, as Theodoret says of our Lord on that occasion (Ib. v. 23-25), and St. Augustine was at no loss to discriminate between what each got by communicating. "Namquid Judas," he asks, "Magistri vobis et traditor impius, primum ipsum manibus ejus consuetudinem carnis et sanguinem Eius cum ceteris discipulis, sicut aportius Lucas evangelista declarat, manducaret et biberet, manus in Christo aut Christus in eo? Tam multe denique quia vel corde ficto carce illam manducaret et san- guinem bibit, vel cum manducaverint et biberint, apostatae sint, namquid manent in Christo aut Christus in iis?... (Sermon. lxii. § 17). For the Fathers, as they recognised two distinct parts in this sacrament, the outward and the inward, and made the Holy Ghost exclusively the source of the inward grace, this difficulty whatever in reconciling a real objective presence, as it is called, after His descent on the elements, with the reception of the outward part alone by every receiver, whose heart He found closed to the inward, that is, to Christ (art. EUCHARIST, near the end). Hence they denounced coming to communion for false purposes or in unrepeated sin, as tridling with God in its worst form. "Not only," says Theodoret, "will you get no salvation from it by receiving unlawfully, but you will have penalties to pay for coming to it as a drunkard" (Ib. v. 29); and again, "if we took account of our acts, and delivered a just verdict against ourselves, we should not receive chasiment from God; still even for the greatest offences He corrects us with mercy, to the end that we may not be given over to the destruction of the wicked" (Ib. v. 31). St. Ambrose adopts a sterner tone: "It is not your judgment whether virtue or sin is hidden, unless he has a wedding garment on, or faith combined with love. He, therefore, who brings not peace and charity with him to Christ's altar will be bound hand and foot, and thrust into outer darkness" (in Luc. vii. § 204). In the same spirit he says in another place (De Poen. l. 15): "Be not deceitful, neighbour, and separate a Christi corpore;" and in another: "Etideo nempe in peccato positus arrogare sibi debet auctoritatem aut usurpationem sacramen- torum... (Ib. ii. 11), in other words, if a priest, let him not administer; if a layman, let him not receive for communion..." There were thus, according to the Fathers, three descriptions of excommunicate persons in the sacramental, or strict, sense of the word:—

1. Persons excluded from the Eucharist by their bishop, or his superiors. 2. Persons excommunicating themselves virtually, by staying away when they were not invited, or by persons receiving in sin, whose mouths therefore received the sacrament, and yet the "res sacramenti" was never conveyed to their souls. Of these, the first might, as has been said, be debarred from the sacrament ever so long, without losing Christ, while the lust could never, by...

receiving the sacrament ever so often, attend to Christ. Of the first, on the other hand, all who were justly debarred and of the second all who wilfully debarred themselves from it, became spiritually diseased; and unless they repented in time, they would die at last. At first it was merely that their spiritual growth was arrested: but, in process of time, decay set in; the living bond that held them to Christ was detached fibre by fibre, till at length the branch and the vine parted company. "Unum de duobus palmiti congruit," as St. Augustine says: "aut vitis, aut vires; si in disciplina, nec vires, ut erige in igne non sit, in vite sit."

In this the Fathers argued on principles of analogy from nature to grace, or from one channel of grace to another, as on kindred points. For if by a real participation of Adam's nature, we were truly liable to death; we needed a real participation of His nature, who is the second Adam, to be able truly to live again. The supernatural life sown in us at our baptism, moreover, needed supernatural alimentation to expand and grow; and the more so, the more generous, proportionably to the constant and copious, or the scant and stint supply that it received. Food likewise, they said, was only profitable to the body, when it was assimilated and taken up by the system: the purest and best food was powerless to impart vigour, and might be death, to a diseased frame. Water was the sacramental element under which new life was conveyed to man: bread and wine the sacramental elements under which its choicest aliment was assured to it: the Holy Ghost, finally, the agent and dispenser of both. In His hands, whatever might be the acts of His fallible ministers, neither could ever be stolen on false pretences: nor any defrauded of either, whose dispositions entitled them to their full benefit. Such were the principles by which the Fathers were guided in dispensing or withholding the Eucharist: and as long as principle and practice went hand in hand, it is the Church's right to require the other. In our days, truth is veritas, exommeunicatur. Romanii similiter communicant qui volunt: qui autem solutur, nos excommunicantur..." (Capit. collect. ex Frog. in Migne, Patro. xci. 955.) And Amalarius, presbyter of Metz, as late as the 9th century, writes to his friend Guatrad: "It is ordered in the canons that all who come to church should communicate; or failing to do so, should state their reason: which being found satisfactory should excuse them, otherwise they should be excommunicated. Now I learn that you have cast your anchor at sea, and not in port. For you have fixed it in Gennadius, bishop of Hareselles. Let me beg of you to fix it in the safe harbour of St. Augustine, as is confessed by all the churches. Gennadius counselled your communicating on Sundays chiefly, because, perhaps, it was not his custom to celebrate the Eucharist every day... Justa Augustinum, quasque fidibus tibi susurras, et in te sempiternam communionem less frequent. Auricular confession produced similar effects later in the West. St. Isidore shews his sense of this, by repeating and supplementing St. Augustine (Ep. liv. § 4), in what follows: "Ceterum si non sunt tanae pec- cata, ut excommunicandus quisque judicetur, non se debet a medicina Domincorum corporis separare, ne dum forté diu abstinentus prohibetur, a Christi corpete separetur; manifestum est enim eoe vivere, qui corpus Ejus attingat. Unde etiam timendum est, ne dum diu quiescet separatus a Christi corpore, aliusque remanet a salute, igitur dicente, 'Nec omnem, nec carnem Filii hominum,' etc. Qui enim jam peccare quierit, communicare non desinit..." (De Ecol. Of. I. 18). A later writer of the same school (append. ad op. St. Isid. ed. Migna, de Ecol. Dogm. c. 53), says: "Quotidie Eucharistiae communemone perceipere nec laude, nec reprehendo. Si in omnibus diebus non communis, et ignes est, Ut ergo in igne non sit, in vite sit."
EXERESIS IUS 437

mon lived in an age when excommunication had been degraded almost to the level of impounding cattle: and when people were refused the Exhilarat for personal disputes about the goods of this world, often or for anything else; or for a thousand things, at any rate, besides sin. The president of the 4th Lateran council takes credit for the "salutary statute" as he terms it, which he there promulgated, and ordered to be published in all churches, lest any should excuse themselves through ignorance from conforming to it; his behest being, that all the faithful of either sex should make their Easter communion at least in every year: still even so, they must all have previously confessed in private to their priest: who might, at his discretion, bid them abstain from communicating even then: and nobody could pronounce on their fitness, but one licensed by him (can. 21). The broadest way, and the widest gate, as the other canons testify, for gaining or regaining admission to the highest privileges of the church militant was then to take part in the incessantly bawled jubilee war.

[2. S. P.]

EXERESIS, bishop of Gerasa, in Arabia, one of the Acacian party at the synod of Seleucia, A.D. 359, and at the council of Constantinople, 360. (Epiph. Haeres. ixxii. 20; Nazian, iii. 324; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 861.)

[2. E. V.]

EXHILARATUS (1), episcopus Metaurensis, according to Cappelleti (Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 189), bishop of Urbino, signing the second letter of pope Agatho, sent in 890 after a synod is Rome to the third council of Constantinople. (Nazian, xi. 314.)

[2. H. D. A.]

EXHILARATUS (2), a Sicilian bishop, concerning whom pope Gregory the Great writes to Basilus, the defender at Panormus in 603. The proceedings of Exilaratus had been frequently reported to Gregory; bishop Leo, who had been judge in his cause, had twice tightened his punishment; Gregory had summoned him to Rome, and dealt severely with him. On sending him back to his church Gregory directs Basilus to keep an eye upon him, and admonish him to behave with charity towards his clergy while correcting their faults; the clergy on their part were to be warned against insolent and uncommissive behaviour towards their bishop. Exilaratus had evidently been a tyrannical disciplinarian. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 4. Patr. Lat. ixxvii. 1306.)

[2. C. H.]

EXHILARATUS (3), duke of Naples, which is his time was almost the only place in Italy continuously under the power of the Byzantine emperors. In A.D. 726 or 727, during the time when Italy generally was in a state of revolt against the emperor Leo, on account of his decree against image worship, Exilaratus, with his son Hadrian, led an attack on Campania, and tried to persuade the inhabitants to join him in an attempt upon the pope Gregory II.'s life. A body of Romans came out against him and took him and killed him with his son. (Vita Gregori II. in Liber Pontificiorum, Migne, ccxviii. 581.)

[A. H. D. A.]

EXHILARATUS (4), an officer whom Gregori the Great in 594 was going to employ in the affair of Maximos the invading bishop of Salona (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. iv. ind. xii. ep. 47). He appears to be the person whom in another letter (lib. vii. ind. xii. ep. 32) Gregory, 597, terms a "secundicerius" (vid. Du Cange, Glossar, sub voc.), through whom the presbyter Anastasius sends Gregory his benediction (Patr. Lat. ixxvii. 772, 890 c).

[C. H.]

EXITIOSUS, a secretary at the conference at Carthage, A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. de Don. Oberhaut, pp. 344, 466.)

[H. W. P.]

EXITZIOSUS, bishop of Veri, in the province of proconsular Africa. One of the catholic bishops summoned to a conference at Carthage with the Arians by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484, and was there burnt to death.

(Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 351; Victor. Vit. Notitia, 55, Patrol. Lat. xviii. 772.)

EXOCHIUS. [EXOTUS.]

EXOCIONITARUS, EXOCIONITARUS in Theod. Haer. Fab. iv. v. 3), an Arian sect, so called from the district of Constantinople where they had churches outside (Eoia) the pillar (closer) of Constantine, and hence called "Exocionites" or "Eoicuminum" (Codinus, de Signis Constantin. p. 46, ed. Bonn; Du Cange, Constantinop. Christ. lib. ii. p. 153; Suicer, Theol. s. v. "Exocionites"). They seem to have been Eunomians. A.D. 379 Theodocius expelled them from the churches which they had hitherto occupied, and bestowed them upon the Catholics (Socrates, H. E. v. 20; Chron. Pasch. a. s. c. Cod. Just. i. v. 20). Justianus, however, made an exception in their favour when he suppressed the assemblies of all other heretics (Ceiling, Hist. Compend. p. 645 ed. Bonn). Alaric, the son and successor of Theodoric, is called an Exoconite as being an Arian (Chron. Pasch. a. s. 468.)

EXOTUS (EXOCHIUS, EXOTUS), thirteenth bishop of Limoges, following Rubicius II. and succeeded by St. Ferreolus, or, according to some, tenth. He is only known as the subject of a most laudatory epistle by Venantius Fortunatus, from which we learn that he sat fifteen years. (Venant. Fort. Miscell. iv. 6; Migne, Patrol. Lat. ixxvii. 157; Gall. Christ. ii. 503.)

EXPECTATUS, ninth bishop of Fréjus, succeeding Desiderius, and followed by Asterius, or, according to a conjecture of Le Coite, by Epiphanius. (Cf. Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 24.) At the fifth council of Orleans (A.D. 549) he was represented by this Epiphanius, a priest, and was present in person at the fifth of Aries (A.D. 554) and the second of Paris (civ. A.D. 555). Nothing further is known of him. (Le Coite, Hist. Franc. an. 582, a. xii. tom. ii. p. 233; Nazian, iii. 137, 703, 740; Gall. Christ. i. 424.)

EXODUS, in the Bible, is the 13th book of the Old Testament. It contains the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, their journey through the wilderness, and the giving of the law on Mount Sinai. It is divided into five parts: the wilderness, the book of Numbers, the book of Deuteronomy, and the book of Joshua. The book of Exodus begins with the story of Joseph, who was sold into slavery by his brother Benjamin, and later became the viceroy of Egypt. When Egypt was threatened by a famine, Joseph recommended his brother Benjamin to his father, Jacob. Jacob and his family then went to Egypt, where Joseph welcomed them. The Israelites soon became a large and powerful group, and Joseph's brother Benjamin, called Pharaoh, gave them land and resources. Eventually, Pharaoh's son, Pharaoh, became unhappy with the growing power of the Israelites and planned to destroy them. However, his prime minister, Moses, warned him of the danger, and Pharaoh was convinced to release the Israelites. Moses then led the Israelites out of Egypt, and to the Red Sea, where they crossed over to the land of Canaan. During this period, Moses received the Ten Commandments and other religious laws. The book of Exodus is an important source of information about the Israelites and their religious beliefs. It is also a key text in Jewish and Christian tradition.
EXUPERIUS (8), a bishop of Derbea, present at the council of Aquileia, A.D. 381 (Mansi, iii. 600). He was thirteenth bishop, and succeeded Joannes. His first known successor was Martinianus II. (Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 627; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 692.) [C. H.]

EXUPERIUS (9), a Roman soldier, to whom Jerome wrote (Ep. 145), exhorting him to give up his calling and to come with his brother Quintilian and follow the more perfect life of monachism at Bethlehem. Palladius says that Exuperantius came to Bethlehem, but was, after a time, driven away by the violence and envy of Jerome. (Palladius, Hist. Lausi. c. 80.) [W. H. F.]

EXUPERIUS (10), a certain bishop who had the rashness to erect and dedicate an oratory in the diocese of another bishop, Joannes. On this subject pope Gregory the Great writes to Joannes the subdeacon of Ravenna. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. xiii. ind. vi. ep. 17. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1272.) Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 94) places him among the bishops of Parma. [C. H.]

EXUPERIA, martyr at Rome under Valerian in 258, with Sempronius, Olympius, and others; commemorated July 26 and October 31. (Rom. Murt.; Baronius, Annuall. ann. 259, xxx. ed. Theiner.) [C. H.]

EXUPERIUS (2), the standard-bearer and companion in martyrdom of St. Maurice, the leader of the Theban legion, A.D. 286, commemorated Sept. 29. Ursus; Rom. Martyr. [MAURICIUS.]

His body was translated in the 10th century to the monastery of Gembloux, by Guilbertus the founder, by whom it was dedicated in honour of St. Peter and St. Exuparius (Molain. Nat. SS. Sept. 29).

[G. T. S.]

EXUPERIUS (3), first bishop of Bayeux, is reported to have been sent by St. Clement. But this is only an instance of the tendency of the Gallic churches to claim an apostolic or sub-apostolic origin. Exuperius really belongs to the latter part of the 4th century, when the sees of Erceux, Lisieux, and Coutances were formed, with Rouen for metropolitan. In the disturbed times of the invasions of the Northmen the body of this bishop was removed to a quiet resting-place, and finally deposited at Corboliun (Corbeil), where, as well as at Bayeux and other places, it is invoked under the names of Suspirius, Spiritus, or Spire. Many miraculous details are given in biographies of later centuries. He appears in the title of the Bollandist life (and there in Potthase) as bishop of Corboliun. Acta SS. Aug. 1; Gall. Christ. xi. 347.

[R. T. S.]

EXUPERIUS (4), a rhetor at Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Narbonne. He was made prelate of Spain by the Dalmatian Caesars, whom he had instructed. Baronius (A. E. ann. 406, xxxv.) maintains that he was the bishop of Toulouse mentioned by St. Jerome. Others, however, maintain that he was made bishop of Cahors, where according to Ausonius (Profess. Bardig. 11, Pat. L. xix. 558) he died. But the words of Ausonius do not imply that he was bishop in Cahors, and the Sammaranthi believe that the bishop was a different person from the rhetorician, who made a fortune in Spain, and simply retired to Cahors for tranquillity. Gall. Christ. l. 116; Tilletmon, Mon. x. 823.

[R. T. S.]

EXUPERIUS (5), bishop of Toulouse in the beginning of the 5th century. He was known to Jerome, who dedicated to him his Commentary on Zechariah, and who urged his friend Faustinus (Ep. lvi. 11), A.D. 394, to profit by his instructions, in order to "behave sedately et fideliter." We infer from this that he lived at Rome before his episcopate. He was a man of great simplicity of life, and carried this simplicity also into the appliances of Christian worship, so that Jerome praises him (Ep. cxxv. 20) as the custos out of avarice from the temple. Jerome also (Bibl.) sets him forth as an example to Rusticus, afterwards bishop of Narbonne, who was leading an ascetic life in his diocese. He applied to pope Innocent for advice on various points of discipline, and on the question what books should be held to be canonical. Three replies were sent, in a letter dated Feb. 405 (Inn. Ep. vi.), answering his questions clearly, and giving the scriptural books as they are now received, excluding the Apocrypha. Exuperius appears to have suffered great losses, but to have made them the means of a noble Christian independence (Jerome, Ep. cxxv. 20). He was held in high esteem, and is reckoned as a saint by the Roman church. (Ceillier, vii. 511.)

W. H. F.]

EXUPERIUS (6), eighth bishop of Limoges, following Dativus and succeeded by Astidius, or according to Gams (Ser. Episc. 694), tenth, succeeding Adeleus. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (1891) give a catalogue to show the effect that he suffered much from the Arians during the thirty-five years of his episcopate in the reign of Constantius. S. A. B.

EXUPERIUS (7), follows Eutropius in the list of bishops of Coutances, c. A.D. 475. Gall. Christ. xi. 864.

[R. T. S.]

EYNARDUS. [Einhard.]

EZEKIEL, a Jewish writer, the author of a dramatic work in Greek iambics, called the Ἐγκρυπτή, the subject being the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. All that can be asserted with certainty as to his date is that he was anterior to Clement of Alexandria, who quotes some fragments (Simplic. l. 25, p. 414). Eusebius (Praep. Ev. lxi. 28, 29) also gives these fragments, together with several others. The last, which contains an account of the appearance of a wonderful bird (apparently suggested by the ambiguity of the word φωτις, Ex. xv. 27), is copied also by Eustathius (ad Hezician. p. 25). It has been conjectured that an anonymous fragment in iambics, given by Epiphanius (Hemer. 64, p. 544), may have formed part of the prologue to the same work. The fragments have been well restored by Gaisford in his edition of the Praep. Ev. For earlier editions see Fabricius's Bibl. Gr. ii. 305, ed. Harles, and Heinichen's note ad loc. The fragments are given also in Didot's Antiques Classici, forming part of the appendix to Euripides.

[G. S.]

EZIUS (IZIUS, EZZIUS), abbot of St. Peter's at Juwavia (Salzburg). According to Hund he was consecrated in 696 as fifth bishop of Salzburg, ruled twenty-five years, and was buried in the church of his monastery. (Hund, Metrop. Salzburg. l. 2.) Potthast and Hansi follow Mabillon in excluding him from the list of bishops (Hansin, Genn. Socr. ii. 68, 70; Potth. Bibl. suppl. p. 398).

[C. H.]

EZNIK (EZIA, ENID), in the name of an Armenian doctor of the church in the 5th century. His native place was Koghb or Kolp (whence he was called the Kolpensian), and he himself a disciple of the patriarch Sahak (Isaac) and Mgecrops, the preceptor Armenie. Besides his mother tongue he understood Persian, Greek, and Syriac. In the course of long journeys through Syria, Mesopotamia, and Greece, he added to his stores of theological learning, and made himself thoroughly acquainted with ecclesiastical literature. We find him later raised to the rank of bishop. In this capacity he took part in the synod of Artaohast, A.D. 450, which expelled the demands of the Persian viceroy, and to which he added, that the Armenians should adopt the Zoroastrian religion, in an epistle marked with dignity, courage, and faith.

He died an aged man, as bishop of Ragwrand.
in his answer to a letter from the Roman clergy informing him of their bishop's martyrdom, speaks of the "glorious departure of the good man, his way, the arrival that his honourable consummation had corresponded to the integrity of his administration" (Ep. 39). The Roman clergy also, writing to Cyprian, deprecate their want of a bishop "for controlling all things in those times of difficulty, and for treating the lapsed with authority and judgment, and the departure of Fabian of most noble memory" (Ep. 30).

In the Liberian Catalogue (A.D. 354) he is said to have divided the regions (of the city of Rome) among the deacons, to have caused many fabrics to be made through the cemeteries, and to have suffered martyrdom on the 20th January, 250. In the Felician Catalogue (A.D. 530), and in later editions of the Liber Pontificalis, it is added that he made also seven subdecanies to superintend the seven notaries who are previously mentioned as having been appointed by the earlier bishop Cyprian. The conflict between Armenian Christianity and Parism. The sources whence he derived his knowledge of the latter appear to have been not the sacred literature of the Parsees themselves, but the popular form which the Zoroastrian faith had at that time assumed in Persia. The fourth book is moreover of interest and value for the history of heresy. The representation here given of the Marcionite doctrine of Principia, and the various myths regarding the origin of the human race, its corruption by matter, the mission of Christ, His crucifixion, descent into hell, and victory over the Demiurg, contain much that is peculiar and characteristic, but much also that belongs not to the original forms of Marcionism but to some of its later developments. Of Eznik's Homilies nothing has been preserved, while on the other hand a whole series of Exhortations or Moral Sentences exist as a kind of appendix to his Devision of Faits and Doctrines. These are by others attributed to Nilus.

FABIANUS (I), (called by the Greeks and in the Liberian Catalogue FABIUS, by Eutychius and in the Alexandrian Chronicle FLAVIAN) bishop of Rome early in February, A.D. 236 to January 20, A.D. 250, and contemporary with the emperors Maximin, Gordian, Philip the Arabian, and Decius, under the last of whom he suffered martyrdom. Eusebius relates that all, the brethren being assembled in the church to choose a successor to Anterus, Fabianus, then a layman lately come to Rome from the country, was pointed out as the chosen of Heaven by a dove settling on his head, wherupon all the people, moved with one divine inspiration, declared him worthy by acclamation, and at once placed him on the episcopal throne (H. E. vi. 29). A similar story was told also in connexion with the consecration of the successors of the deceased (21).

That the choice proved a good one may be concluded from the testimony of Cyprian, who, tion of the title (Roma Soterrorum, by Northcote and Browne).

In connection with the buildings (fabricæ) assigned by the good authority of the Liberian Catalogue to Fabianus may be quoted the statement contained in the Philosophumenon, attributed to Hippolytus, to the effect that Zephyrinus (his own contemporary, and Bishop of Rome, some 20 years before Fabianus) "had entrusted Callicius with the government of the clergy, and set him over the cemetery." (Philosoph. ix. 11.) This is a further evidence of the careful provisions made by the bishops of the 3rd century for the decent burial of Christians. The cemetery entrusted to Callicius is supposed by De Rossi to have been one common to all the Christians of Rome, at that time given to the church by some noble family, and to be clearly identified with the catacomb called the Coemeterium Callici, already alluded to, on the Appian Way. Over this newly acquired burial-place De Rossi concludes the pope to have placed Callicius (who as stated above was also the president of the clergy), so as to satisfy the law which required recognized burial confessions to be represented by a deacon and subdeacon. This view is confirmed by the fact of Victor, the predecessor of Zephyrinus, being the last pope said to have been buried on the Vatican, thirteen out of his eighteen successors having been deposited in this new cemetery. The cemeteries which Fabianus provided with buildings may have been others given afterwards by wealthy individuals after the example thus set, the buildings being oratories, or structures in provision for the guardianship of the tombs. The further statement, above mentioned, about the seven deacons, subdeacons, and deacons, though but partially supported by the early authority of the Liberian Catalogue, may still be regarded as expressing a true tradition of the early provision made for preserving records of martyrs.

Fabianus is specially named by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 36) as one among many other bishops to whom Origen wrote in defence of his own orthodoxy. Cyprian mentions him (Ep. 59) as having, with Donatus bishop of Cartagin, written a letter severely censuring one Frumentius, a heretical bishop of Lambessa in Numidia, who had been condemned by a synod of ninety bishops at Lambessa for "many and grievous faults."

What has been so far mentioned comprises all that is known about Fabianus with certainty. Doubt, and more than doubt, rests on the story (accepted by Andrea da Chesne, in Vol. Pontif., and in the main by the Bollandists) of his having been the founder of the seven Gallic churches of Toulouse, Arles, Tours, Paris, Narbonne, Clermont, Limoges; to which he is said to have sent respectively, Saturninus, Trophimus, Gratus, Donatus, Paulus, Astresimus, and Martianus, as missionary bishops. Tillemont regards the story with suspicion, as being absent from early records. It is disputable also on other grounds. The following are the ancient testimonies. In the Passio St. Saturnini Episc. Tolosani (c. 2, and Auctori) it is stated that Saturninus went to Toulouse "Decio et Grato consilium," i.e. A.D. 258. In the Passio St. Trophimi (about 590) refers to this statement, and adds that the other missionary bishops above referred to were sent at the same time (Hist. Franc. I. 28); and elsewhere (x. 30), that one of these, Gratus of Tours, was sent in the first year of Decius by Sixtus the Pope of Rome. Now, since Fabianus was martyred in the January of the year assigned to the mission, it seems improbable that he was its organizer; and who was Sixtus, named by the historian as the then existing pope? The Bollandists meet these difficulties by supposing the mission to have been designed by Fabianus before his martyrdom, and carried out after it by Sixtus, a leading prebyster at Rome, erroneously described as pope. But, further, there is an evident error in the statement about Trophimus having been then sent to Arles. We have the testimony of Pope Zosimus (Ep. 1. ad Episc. Gall.), that the church of Arles had been founded by Trophimus sent from Rome; but this must have been before 250, since it appears from Cyprian (Ep. vi. 7) that in 254 Marcellinus had long been bishop of that see. It would seem then that at any rate the additions made by Gregory of Tours to his extract from the 'Passion of Saturninus,' rested only on vague and uncertain traditions, and that there are no valid grounds for attributing the foundation of those Gallic churches to Fabianus.

Still more improbable is the story, accepted by the Bollandists and Barinnus, and resting mainly on the authority of the Acts of St. Pontius, that the Emperor Philip and his son became Christians, and were baptized by Fabianus. [PHILIPPUS.]

Three spurious decrealts are attributed to Fabianus. One forbids all communication with excommunicated persons, quoting the apostolic precept. Another, addressed to all the bishops of the East, orders the annual consecration of new chriat, tracing the order from the Apostles, and contains stringent rules, having for their object the protection of the clergy from accusations by persons of bad character or suspected of heresy, and especially the faithful of their own flocks, except on the ground of heresy. A third has the same drift as the last mentioned, with further provision for appeals exclusively to the see of Rome. There are also ten Decretals assigned to him by Gratus and others, on matters of discipline; which, being other things, fasting, confirmation three times a year, and obligations of bread and wine every Sunday at the altar, are enjoined; perjury, marriage within the prohibited degrees, and of insane persons, are forbidden; the age of thirty is fixed for ordination, and illiterate priests are prohibited from saying Mass.

His festival is kept on the 20th January, the day of his martyrdom. The Greeks commemorate him by the name of Fabius on the 6th of August. [J. B.—Y.]

possibility that Fabian was the magistrate of another prefecture. Tillemont (H. E. iv. p. 744, 2nd ed. notes sur St. Sebastien IV.) conjectures that Fabius was prefect of the city from July 286 to August 287, and that he was preceded in the first year and followed in the second by Junius Maximus. Corsini (Series Prot. 284–288) adopts this ingenious supposition, for which a precedent exists. Tiburtius the martyr, when scourged between the legs by Fabianus, challenged the prefect to thrust his hand into boiling water in the name of Jupiter and see if the water would scald. "I," he added, "shall tread upon these burning cinders as upon roses, in the name of Jesus Christ their creator." Fabianus replied, "Everyone knows that your Christ taught you the art of magic." (Acta S. Sebastiani, xxii. 81, 82 in Bull. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 377.) [L. D.]

FABIUS (4), bishop of Elberi. [Flavius (1).]

FABIUS (5), an Arian who lived at the commencement of the 6th century, in the north of Africa, probably Carthage, and who not only caused great annoyance to Fulgentius of Ruspe, but elicited from him a great work, the fragments of which alone are now extant. This work is entitled, Festi Catholicii instrumenta excerpta de libris S. Fulgentii contra gesta quae adversus eum Fabianus haereticus falsa continuiit. It was originally divided into ten books. The Père Chifflet discovered and preserved in his Requisit des Œuvres de saint Fulgence thirty-nine fragments of these books, which may still be read (Migne, Patrol. Lat. xxv. pp. 750–834, Ben. ed. p. 377 ff.). Cave refers, among the lost works of Fulgentius, to nineteen books, de Veritate Praedestinationis et gratiae contra Fabianum, and says that seven fragments from this work were included by Theodulphe Aurelianus, "in collectaneis suis de processione Spiritus Sancti," and that J. Simond published, among the works of Alcimus Avitus other fragments of this work, Paris, 1643; and says that Chifflet published thirty-nine fragments from a very ancient MS. of the same books (Hist. Literaria, p. 386). The confusing statement of Cave arises from his mistakes in the bibliographies, who, however, had studied Fulgentius, "Jam reversus ex exilio noem et decem libros Fabiani mentionis falsa gesta convincens, de veritate praedestinationis et gratiae libros confecit tres." Deprez has corrected the text, reading noem for noem. Baronius therefore stated the number of books as ten, and also referred to the well-known three books on predestination, which had nothing to do with Fabian. Cave omitted the closing words, confecit tres, and therefore misunderstood the sentence. The fragments preserved by Chifflet are entirely occupied by the most subtle disquisitions on the idea of election of the Godhead, e.g. on "The one Highest Paraclete, Messenger, Teacher, and Judge," "The Functions of praying, groaning, interceding in Christ and the Holy Spirit?" "On the One Infinite," in three personalities; on "The Worship of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit," and the like. The fragments contain no personal reference to the bishop of Carthage, but are after the return of Fulgentius from exile, Fabianus, an Arian of reputation, secured an interview with the bishop of Ruspe, and then, with a view to undermine his influence, published numerous discourses under the name of his rival. Fulgentius, to free himself from these false representations of his views, produced a work in which he author of the Vida Fulgentii supposes that Fabianus was the anonymous slanderer to whom Fulgentius refers in his preface to the work Ad Monimentum, de duplicit Praedestinatione Del. If so, Fabianus must have endeavoured to show the contrariety between the thoughts of Augustine and Jerome on the one hand and Fulgentius on the other. The fragments that remain are exclusively occupied with the Arian controversy, and are remarkably free from personal bitterness or local colouring (cf. Baronius, ann. 523, xxvii). [Fulgentius (5).] [H. R. H.]

FABIOLA (1), a noble Roman lady, a friend of St. Jerome, who wrote for her two dissertations (Ep. ixvii. and ixviii. ed. Vall.) on the dress of the high priest, and on the stations of the Jerusalemites in their march through the desert. Jerome also wrote a memoir of her in his touching letter to Oceanus (Ep. ixvii. ed. Vall.) in the year of her death, 399. Thierry (St. Jerome, ii. 11) has worked up the intimations about her into an interesting and dramatic story.

She was descended from Julius Maximus and was extremely wealthy. She was a woman of a lively and passionate nature, the subjugation and direction of which was a triumph to the church. She had married a man whose views were such that she was forced to divorce him. She then, to escape the temptations of an unprotected state, accepted a second husband, the first being still alive. It is probable that this separated her from Paula and the other friends of Jerome, and from church communion. (On this point Thierry, who inverts the order of the facts as given by Jerome, is at issue with Jerome's statement that she received the communion again immediately after her penitence.) This may account for the fact that we hear nothing of her during Jerome's stay at Rome. But, after the death of her second husband, she voluntarily went through a public penance. At the church of the Lateran, on Easter eve, in the presence of the bishop, she took the hands of people, who were deeply affected by the scene, she appeared in the porch amongst the penitents, with tears and cries, with rent garments and bare feet and head, casting away her jewels and disfiguring her face. After this, having publicly renewed her communion with the church, she sold all her possessions, and determined to administer the vast sums thus acquired for the good of the poor. She supported monasteries in various parts of Italy and the adjacent islands; and she joined Pammacchius in the institution of an hospital (evosomassio), where she gathered in the sick and the outcasts and tended them with her own hands.

In the year 395 she suddenly appeared at Bethlehem, and seemed to wish to remain there. She made the journey with her kinsman Oceanus, who also returned with her to Rome the following year. But several causes conpired to prevent Bethleem of Carthage meeting in Rome. The Originenstical strife had lately broken out which divided Jerome and his friends from Rufinus and Melanion, and the new-comers did not escape the discord. Oceanus warmly opposed the side of Jerome; Fabiola seems to have taken the side of Jerome. But efforts were made, if we may believe Jerome (Cont. Ref. iii. 8), to draw them into the camp of his adversary. Letters which had been fraudulently taken from the cell of Jerome's friend Eusebius, and in which the former was praised, were found in the rooms of Fabiola and Oceanus. If this proceeding was intended to rouse the empress between Fabiola and Jerome it entirely failed. Jerome bears witness to the earnestness with which she attached herself to his teaching, her eagerness and instability in asking questions, her unwillingness to believe in his confessions of ignorance of many things which she put before him. The two treatises above mentioned are the results of her importunity. He describes how on one occasion she recited from memory the letter which he had written to Heliodorus from the desert twenty years before (Ep. 14, ed. Vall.).

It is not likely that Fabiola would have stayed long at Bethlehem. Jerome represents her as liking to be surrounded by a crowd. Her idea of the solitude of Bethlehem, he says, was that she should not be cut off from Mary's inn. But little time was given for the experiment. Jerome was still seeking a suitable dwelling-place for her, and was at the same time engaged in writing for her his treatise on the mystical meaning of the high priest's garments, when the inroads of the Huns into the Roman empire, the consequence of the treachery of the praetorian prefect Rufinus, caused a panic in Palestine. The Huns had taken Antich, and were threatening to burst upon Jerusalem. Jerome and his friends hurried to the sea-coast at Joppa, and had hired vessels for Egypt, when, as they were on the point of sailing, the situation suddenly changed. The Huns abandoned their purpose, and turned back without crossing the Lebanon. Jerome, with Paula and Eustochium, returned to Bethlehem; but Fabiola, less in love with Palestine, continued her journey to Rome. Jerome records how he advised the treatise on which he was engaged, and the cables were being loosed and the sails hoisting for the voyage.

If possible, that, as Thierry supposes, the episode to which Jerome's letter to Amandus (Ep. 55, ed. Vall.) relates has to do with Fabiola, and is to be placed here. Amandus, a Roman presbyter, afterwards bishop of Burdigala, wrote to Jerome for an answer to three questions on difficulties in the New Testament, and Jerome found added to this letter a little paper containing these words, which purported to be from a "sister" of Amandus. "Ask whether a woman who has left a husband of the vilest character and has accepted a second through violence (per vim) can, without such penitence, communicate with the church, while the first husband is living." Thierry supposes that this question was really put on behalf of Fabiola, and that, not liking to speak to Jerome directly on the subject, she took care that he should find the letter at Bethlehem after her departure. If so, and if it implied that she had some third marriage, and wished not to renew her public penitence, she tried no comfort from Jerome. His answer was cautious but decided. He suspected that the "vis" under which she had taken the second husband was simply that of passion, and he declared that no woman during her husband's life could maintain a claim to do this. If indeed it related to her, Fabiola seems to have been satisfied, and worldly desires stirred in her no more.

The last three years of her life were occupied with incessant activity in good works. She considered all her properties as given to Christ, and herself as merely a stipendiary and an administrator of what was His. In conjunction with Pammachius, she instituted at Portus a hospice (xenodochium) perhaps taking her model from that established by Jerome at Bethlehem; and it was so successful that, as Jerome says, in one year it became known from Parthia to Britain. But to the last her disposition was restless. She found Rome and Italy too small for her charities; and she was preparing some long journey or change of habitation when death overtook her in the year 399. Her funeral was celebrated as a Christian triumph. The whole city came forth to see it, the streets were crowded, the hallelujahs reached the golden roofs of the temples. Jerome's book on the forty-two stations (mansioes) of the Israelites in the desert, which he had been composing for her, but had been unable to complete till after her death, was dedicated to her memory, and became to its author a counterpart of the memoir of her life which he sent with it to Oceanus, an image of her progress to the heavenly rest.

FABIOLLA (2), a lady who wrote to St. Augustine, regretting the separation from heaven and from personal intercourse with the saints, which the conditions of the present life necessitate. In his reply Augustine points out that absence and separation are corporal only and not real, for that real intercourse is carried on through the mind and spirit. As every one is more nearly present to himself than to anyone else, so also two persons at a distance from each other can converse more effectively in this way than if in the presence of each other they both remained silent. Fabiola appears to be the same person as the whom St. Jerome sent two volumes of his commentary of Ezekiel, a.d. 411. Aug. Ep. 267; Hieron. Ep. 129; Tillemont. (102, vol. xiii. p. 265.)

[H. W. P.]

FABIUSt bishop of Rome. [FABIANUS (1).]

FABIUS (1), bishop of Antioch, succeeding on the martrydom of Babylas in the Decian persecution a.d. 250. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 39; Chron. sub ann.). There is uncertainty as to the correct form of his name. He is called FABIUS by Eusebius, FLAVIUS by Nicephorus, FABIANUS by Rufinus, and FLAVIUS by Syncellus and Jerome. FABIUS was disposed to look favourably upon the Novatians, which had extended to Antioch, and Novatian having sent him notice of his consecration as bishop of Rome, it seemed not improbable that FABIUS would acknowledge him as a canonical bishop. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 44.) Cornelius bishop of Rome, fearing the consequences of a such a step, and the portion of the bishop of one of the chief sees of Christendom, entered into a long correspondence with FABIUS on the subject. (Hieron. de Vit. Ill. Cornelius,
c. 66.) Eusebius mentions this correspondence (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43). Dionysius of Alexandria likewise wrote to Fabius on the case of the Chaldaeans. The example of Scarpion, that it was not right to exclude penitents from communion (6 c. 44). Eusebius preserves another letter of the same prelate to Fabius, narrating the sufferings of the martyrs during the Decian persecution at Alexandria (6 c. 41). Fabius still continuing favourably inclined towards Nestorius, it was proposed to hold a council at Antioch, which was prevented by the death of Fabius after an episcopate of only two years. He was succeeded by Demetrius (6 c. 46). [L. V.]

FABIUS, prefect of Rome. [FABIANUS (3).]

FABIIUS (2) VICTOR, a soldier and martyr at Marseilles. The authorities vary as to the date of his passion. Cellier fixes A.D. 290; Ruinart, A.D. 290 or 303. The former date is the more probable, as there were several martyrs in the army in the early portion of Maximian's reign, and long before the persecution became general upon Diocletian's first edict. All these martyrs took place in the western portion of the empire and under the operation of military law. [CASSIANUS (3).] (Euseb., Hist. Eccl. viii. 4.) Fabius made himself notorious by his activity, and was therefore called upon to sacrifice. Upon his refusal, which he accompanied with acts of insolence very common at that time, going so far even as to set up the altar in the emperor's presence, he was tortured, and condemned to be ground to death in a hand-mill. The machinery having broken down, however, he was decapitated, when a celestial voice was heard crying, "Viicti, beate Victor, viictisti." During the tortures, which lasted several days, his steadfastness converted his guards Alexander, Longinus, and Felicianus, who brought him by night from his prison to the seaside, where they received baptism at his hands. This action being reported to the emperor, he at once beheaded them. All the bodies were cast into the sea, but recovered by the Christians and buried in a crypt. The acts of Fabius Victor are not original; they are attributed to Cassian, or some other author of the 5th century. (Cellier, iii. 366; Ruinart, 292-97.) [G. T. S.]

FABIIUS (3), martyr at Carisana in Mauritania; commemorated July 31. He refused to bear the standard, and was beheaded, probably under Maximian and about the year 295, when there were several military martyrs in North Africa. We possess in Ruinart the genuine acts of St. Cassian, St. Maximilian, and St. Maresillus of that date, and all from the same district. (AA. SS. Boll. vii. 179; Mart. Vet. Rom., Adonis, Usuardi; Rom. Martyr.) [G. T. S.]

FABIIUS (5), martyr at Faesulae in Umbria, period uncertain; commemorated May 17 (Acta SS. Maii iv. 132.) The Bollandist suspects he is the same Fabius who is commemorated in Roma. Martyr. with Anthimus on May 11. They were martyred in the Diocletian persecution at the 22nd milestone on the Via Salaria. The Martyr. Hieron. and Mort. Usurrii commemorate Anthimus without any mention of Fabius. [G. T. S.]

FABIIUS (6), a shorthand writer under the vicar of Africa at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (M. Vet. Don. p. 344, ed. Othen.iii.) [H. W. P.]

FABIIUS (8), bishop of Fermo, predecessor of Passivus, the latter a contemporary of Gregory the Great mentioned in Epist. lib. ir. Indict. i. ep. 19. (Migne, lxixvii. 960.) [A. B. D. A.]

FABRICIANUS, bishop of Epidaurus (Ragusia) in Dalmatia, A.D. 530. (Fabius, Hygin. Sacra. vi. 410.) [J. de S.]

FACHTNA, apparently the same as FACHMAN, latinized FACCUNDUS, and used interchangeably with it, yet not so freely but that it clings more closely to some individuals. (1) The best known Fachtas was bishop of R., Aug. 14, surmounted Mongach. He was first abbot of Molana, a small island near the mouth of the Blackwater. His chief dedication, however, is that of Ross in the county of Cork. He was not only bishop there, but he gathered round him a large school, one of the most famous of that age, for studying the liberal arts (Usher, Ext. Ant. vi. 471-72). Fachtans probably died towards the end of the 6th century. (Laisca, Ext. Hist. ir. ii. 192-8, 317-8; Colgan, Acta SS. 585, cc. 3, 4, 579, n. 1; Kelly, Cal. Irish Saints, 131-2; Ware, Tr. Ant. c. 26, 29, and Irish Bp. by Harris, 583-4.)

(2) Son of Polachtan (Tolechtagh, Ann. Tu.) was abbot of Clonfert, co. Longford, and died 729 (Ann. Tu.; Four Mart. A.D. 723). [H. G.]

FACUNDUS, bishop of Ermiana or Hermia, in the province of Byzaecena. In 464 he was at Constantinople, and apparently at the council which Mennas convened in the autumn of that year on the subject of the "Three Chapters." He, however, refused to subscribe, and withdrew from communion with those who did (Contr. Mocian. Migne, u. s. 859). After the dismissal of the council, and at the request of the unwilling signatories, he set himself to the preparation of a defence of the condemned "Chapters," but before he had completed the task he was interrupted by the arrival of Vigilius the bishop of Rome, who required all further proceedings on the subject to be suspended (Pro Defens. Tr. Capitul. præfet. u. s. 927, xii. 1, 853). This was in January, A.D. 547 (viii. Kal. Feb. Marcellin. Com. Cor. u. s. 547. Migne, Patro. li. 946). The next year, A.D. 548, Vigilius also convened a council on the subject at Constanti- nople, consisting of about seventy bishops, in which Facundus took an active part (Pro Defens

s.a.prof.; Lib. cond. Mocian.]. After that council Facundus resumed his "Defence," but was compelled to complete it hurriedly at the command of the emperor who had called him to account for refusing to subscribe his edict (Contr. Mocian. s.a. 890; Proc. Def. Prof. s.a. 897). The work was then presented to Justinian. In that, its original form, it seems to have consisted of only two books, which were afterwards expanded into seven, and then again into the twelve in which it now appears. ("Facundus... super Justinian principalis scripta, de duabus naturis Dom. Christ. duos libellos." Cassiodorus, Exp. in Paul. Ps. cxxxviii. in Migne, Patrol. LXX. 994, "Et tempore vic. libri Facundii refusule," Victor. Tausenn. Chrov. s.a. 550 in Migne, Patrol. LXXVIII. 938.)

Soon after this Facundus returned to Africa, and was present at a council of the bishops of the prefecture, A.D. 550, when Vigilius was excommunicated for having condemned the "Three Chapters" (Victor. Tun. u.s.). These proceedings gave great offence to Justinian, and numbers of the African bishops were deprived and imprisoned or sent into exile, while others were compelled to seek refuge in flight. Among these last was Facundus (Victor. Tunusins. u.s. s.a. 551, 552, 553, 554; Fac. Contr. Mocian. u.s. 853, 855). He remained in concealment for several years, and nothing more is heard of him until A.D. 571, when Mocianus, a "scholasticus," having written in severe reproachment of those who still withheld themselves from communion with the signatories to the condemnation of the "Three Chapters," his brethren again requested him to take up his pen in their defence. Though very ill at the time he readily complied, and prepared a treatise mainly for their use, which is of great value for the history of the whole controversy (u.s. a. 853-859), "nunc in praedictum magnum Synodum. Chaled. resuscitavit questio "aeternum et clementi annos finitas" (u.s. 886). At the same time he also published a Letter to the subject, apparently designed for more general use (Ep. Fid. Cath. in Defens. Tr. Opp. Migne, u.s. 867). After this he heard no more of him. [T. W. D.]

FAEBHARDAITH (FEHORDAITH), abbot of Tighen, now Dalna, in the barony of Upper Bally, co. Meath. He seems to have been put to death in A.D. 789, during a raid from Osseory. (For Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 387-9, A.D. 781; Ann. Ult. a. 785.)

FAGADUIN, bishop. [FAGADUINJ.

FAELAN (FAELAN, FÉILLAN, FÓILLAN, FÚLLAN, PHÜLLAN). Faolan, the diminutive of Fael, a wolf, has assumed a great variety of forms. In Ireland the favourite form seems to be Fáelán, and in Scotland Fülân. It gave the family name O'Félán, and is now Phelan and Phelan (Joyce, Jr. Names of Places, 2 ser. 153). Colgan adopts Fóllanu, and gives a list of twelve entries bearing the name (Acta SS. 614, c. i.; see Bishop Forbes' "Notice of the Bell of St. Félain" in Proc. Soc. Antiqu. Scotl. viii. 267 seq.).

(1) Amhlobar (the Stammerer, or rather the Lepor) of Rath Eran and Kill-féélán, commemorated June 20. He is said to have been son of king Aenghus by his second wife Eithne, who died with her husband in battle, A.D. 489. He is also said to have been a disciple of St. Ailbe, and when St. Ailbe wished to go to Tyle (Thule), but sent out instead twenty-two disciples, one of these was Fáelán of Rátharann. This place is now called Dùndurn, and is in the parish of Comrie, Perthshire, in the immediate vicinity of the present village of St. Fillian's, which lies at the east end of Loch Earn. (Scott. Hist. 188.) Regarding his Irish dedication, Dr. Reeves says, "His Irish church is situate in the Queen's County, in that part of the parish which is in the barony of Cullenagh (Ord. Surv. Sheet. 18). In 1623 it was called Killyhelan [i.e. Cilli-Fhethlann] (Leinster Inquis. Com. Regnat. Nos. 24, 25, Jac. 1.), which name is now disguised in Ballyheiland." The church of Averdour in Fife was dedicated to him, and so probably was that of Forgach or St. Fillian's, Fifeburgh, it is hardly possible to distribute the dedications fairly between the two Fillian, so near in the name and locality. (Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 341; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 83.)

(9) Brother of St. Farey. [FÓILLANUS (2).]

(3) Son of Aedh, commemorated Mar. 31 (Mart. Doneg.; Mart. Tall.). Colgan (Acta SS. 799) thinks that Fáelán was son of Aedh Danmanus or Benjamin, and not of the royal stock of Munster. [FAITHLENN.]

(4) Son of Ceallach, abbot of Kildare, perished in an attack of the Hy-Néill upon the Leinstermen in the year 804. (For Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 407-9, A.D. 799; Ann. Ult. a.d. 803.)

[J. G.]

FAELCHU. (1) Of Finglas, commemorated Sept. 24. In the Life of St. Abban in Colgan (Acta SS. 615, c. 20, 623, u. n.) an account is given of St. Abban founding churches and monasteries in the south of Ireland, and southward from Connaught as far as Muskerry in Cork, then turning east and north, proceeded through Tipperary till he reached Killculen, on the banks of the Lifey, where he built a most regular monastery at Cluain-find-glasse, probably Finglas beside Dublin, and there Faelchu died A.D. 763 (Ann. Tg.). Colgan would place it in Munster.

(2) Abbot of Iona, A.D. 716-724, having his feast on April 3. He was son of Dorbene and at the race of Conall Gulban. At seventy-four he was appointed to Iona, A.D. 716 (Ann. Tg.), the only year which would meet the condition "in iv. Kal. Sept., die Sabbathi suscipit." He succeeded Duncach, and appears to have been chosen, perhaps as coadjutor, or actual abbot, the year before Duncach died. In A.D. 724, at a ripe old age, he died, and was succeeded by Cillane Fada. Skene thinks it probable that he had been at the head of a Columban monastery in the territory of the northern Picts before his elevation to the abbacy, and that he is the same as Velocins, the patron saint of Dunmull and Logy, in Mar, both in Aberdeenshire. Skene is also of opinion that he represented the conservative party at Iona. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 313, 319; O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 228 n. 20, 234 n. 48, iv. 72 n. 2; Colgan, Acta SS. 745, col. 2, n. 2, and Tr. Thum. 481 n. 13, iv. 284 n. 12; Calcutt, Calendar of Irish Chartularies. iii. 157-9; Reeves, Adamnan, 381; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 177-8, 278 sqq.; Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scot. i. 114, 119; Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. 1, 288.)

The two chief events of his primacy were, as related in the Annals of Tigernach, (a) the driving of the family of Ely by king Ninian across the Grampian range in A.D. 717, on account, probably, of their not obeying the orders of that Pictish king regarding the newly adopted usages; and (b) the adoption of the coronal tonsure in A.D. 718. (O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 229.)

[J. G.]

FAELDOBAIR (1) Of Clochar, bishop, June 29 (Mart. Doneg.; Mart. Tall.). He died A.D. 702 (Ann. Ror.), but has been confounded by Ware, Colgan, and Lanigan with Faeldobair of Kildare, who regarded his date.

(2) Beg, called also The Wise, died at Fohbar, or Fore, in Westmeath, in the year 731. (Four Mast. A.D. 725; Ann. Ult. A.D. 730.)

[J. G.]

FAELGHUS.

(1) Abbot of Killeigh, in King's County, died A.D. 898. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 186 n. 2, 413, A.D. 803; Ann. Ult. A.D. 807, calling him "princeps").

(2) Son of Tuathcháil or Touthgaille, a wise man of Clonard, in Meath, died A.D. 784. (Four Mast. A.D. 777; Ann. Ult. A.D. 783.)

[J. G.]

FAENDELAICH (FAENDELAICH).

Commemorated on Sept. 18. There was a Faendalech, son of Mnaech, who was abbot and bishop of Armagh, and whose sudden death is entered in the Ann. Ult. A.D. 794 (O'Conor, Rev. Hib. in Scriptor. iv. 117). He seems to have succeeded Ferdorcrich in A.D. 768, but there appear to have been many claimants to the episcopal dignity and a consequent confusion in the succession. Faendalech probably resigned his abbacy in 771, and the vacancy continued till 778, when Dubdaltere was appointed. During his rule the city of Armagh in A.D. 770 was twice burned. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 463 n. 4; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 194, 295, 294; Stuart, Armagh, 94-5.)

[J. G.]

FAFILA (1) (FAVILA), the father of the famous Felayo, according to certain chroniclers. (Felagius.)

[M. A. W.]

FAFILA (2), son of Pelayo, and king of the Asturias after his father's death. He reigned two years (737-739), and built the church of the Holy Cross at Canasa. In 739 he was killed by a bear (Seb. Sal. c. 12), and was buried in the church he had built. For the famous inscription still existing in the church of the Santa Cruz at Canasa, which professes to date from Fafila's lifetime, and contains the names of himself and his queen Froiluba, see Hubner's Inscrip. Hist. Esp. i. 149. An amended text of it, as transcribed by the Spanish scholar Fernandez Guerra y Orbe, will be found among the Additaments to the Inscrip. Brit. Christ. (M. A. W.)

FAGAN (FAGAN), usually represented in the legend of king Lucius as sent with Dyfan by pope Eleutherus to Britain, where they instructed and baptized at the end of the second century. Geoffrey of Monmouth (Hist. iv. c. 20) boldly affirms that they "almost extinguished the pagans of Britain," demonstrating their work in the churches and temples that had been founded in honour of many gods to the one only God and his saints, and filled them with congregations of Christians." There is a parish in Glamorganshire still bearing the name of St. Fagan, four miles from Caerdis. In Leland's survey (Lal. vol. iv. 284 n.) the parish church had been rebuilt and was dedicated to St. Mary, but the older parish church bearing the name of St. Fagan survived. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 82-7, 338; Hadad and Stubbs, i. 28; Sp. Forbes, SS. Nin. and Aenl, 53, 354-55; Girald. Camb. Descrip. Camb. i. c. 16, wks. vi. 202; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. cc. 4-5, wks. v. 53-77, 126-27.) He is placed among the chiroepiscopi of Llandaff prior to the time of St. Dubricius (Lib. Landan, 623), and is reputed as the founder, with Daman, of the ancient see of Congersbury (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. i. 153, 154). See also W. J. Rees, Cambro-Briton Saints, 61.)

His day is, perhaps, Feb. 10, but a "Faganus confessor" occurs in some English books under Aug. 8. (Deruvianus.) (J. G. and C. W. B.)

FAILA (FAILENNA, FAOILEANN, FOILEN-NA.). (1) Virgin, March 3. She was descended from the illustrious house of the Hy-Finachrach; her mother was Cuillean or Cuillicanda, and her three brothers, Colgan, Aedh, and Sorac. Her church was at Kil-faile, now Killicott, noted for its pilgrim raids. St. Faila must have spoken about A.D. 580. (Colgan, Acta SS. 248, c. 238, c. 3, and n. 4, 456; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 326-9; Kelly, Cat. Ir. Saints, 82.)

(2) Virgin, Nov. 13. She was daughter of Eoghan (Mart. Doneg., by Todd and Reeves, 304) and, like the preceding Faila, belonged to the house of the Hy Finachrach, but through a different son of Dathi, and thence to a different sept, which was named from her father, Hy Finachrach Aideine (Reeves, Adamnan, 45). (J. G.)

FAILBE (FAVILUS).

(1) Son of Pzan, abbot of Iona, March 22 (Mart. Doneg.) He was of the noble race of Conall Gulain, a Tyrconnel, and, like so many of his family, sought voluntary exile in the arch-monastery of Iona. There he spent many years, till at the death of Cuimine Alibhe in A.D. 669 he was himself called on to rule, which he did for ten years, when St. Adamnan succeeded him. In the Selecta de Aenusa it is said that during his primacy he twice revisited Ireland, and Colgan imagines that the most probable occasion for these journeys was the Pascchal controversy, but Skene thinks it is as likely to have been in connexion with missionary enterprise, St. Maelrubha about that time having carried the Gospel to the north-western shores of Scotland. The journeys were evidently considered very important, as all the annals record a visit to Ireland in the year 673, and his return in 676 (Ann. Thg.). He died A.D. 679. He is referred to by St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Columb. i. c. 1) as "meus successor; noster abbas Failbeus." (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. 97 sqq.; Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scot. ii. 202; Reeves, Adamnan, 16, 28, 275; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. vi. 245, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 679; O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 209 n. 4.)
(3) Beg, abbot of Iona, also called Fedhlhímidh, March 10. His obit appears in the Four Mast. a.d. 734. "Fedhlhímidh or Faibhe, abbot of Iona, died after the 87th year of his age." Reeves (Adomnán, 385) does not count this Faibhe among the abbots of Iona, but only coadjutor-abbot, or set up as a rival abbot in the confusion caused by the paschal controversies. He held this office from the primacy of Faecu, as the Ann. Tigernach, a.d. 725, have the entry "Fiedhinnus Principatum Hionae tenet." He thus held an abbacy there while Cillene Foda (A.D. 724-729), Cillene Droicreach (A.D. 726-729), and Sliabhine (A.D. 732-767), were more generally accepted as the abbots of the Columban brotherhood. Faibhe may have headed the conservative or traditional party, which was then certainly on the decline (O'Conor, Rer. Hdb. Scot. ii. 231 n. 20; BP. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 335-3; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 281-88).

(3) Of Erdagh or Erdaimh, commemorated Feb. 8, April 8. There is entered on these two days in the Irish Kalendars "Faibhe of Erdagh," referring probably to the same individual (Mart. Doug. by Todd and Reeves, 43, 98 n. 1; 99; Mart. Taltagh, in Kelly, Gal. Ir. SS. x. x.) in the Four Mast. (by O'Donovan, i. 729) is the name "Aed Theobaldus, Faibhe, son of Guaire, successor of Maelrubhais, was drowned, and the crew of his ship along with him; they were twenty-two in number." The true date is probably 737 (Ann. Ttg.). (Reeves, Adomnán, 385; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 285 sq.; 000, Rer. Hdb. Scot. ii. 241, 242; Geog. pap., Acta SS. 576; Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scot. i. 120; BP. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 335.) Applecross is a parish on the west coast of Ross-shire, and lies between Loch Torridon and Loch Carron (see Cosmo Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. ii. 402).

(5) Beg (medicus, Ann. Ult.) is said in the Four Mast. a.d. 711, and Ann. Ult. a.d. 712, to have been abbot of Clonmacnois, in King's County, and the former adds that he "was of the Gallenga of Corann," that is, as interpreted by O'Donovan (Four Mast. i. 311 n. b), of a sept of the race of Ollill Olum, king of Munster, seated in the diocese of Achonry, in the province of Connacht, Corann being the name of a barony, a townland of the county of Sligo. The Ann. Ttg. place his death at probably its true date, a.d. 713, and say he is of the Gallenga in Corann (CO Sánaigearch in Corannach to which O'Conor has erroneously prefixed "bishop" (O'Conor, Rer. Hist. Scot. ii. 228).

enim Apostolus: 'Conde creditur ad justitiam, et autem confesso fit ad salutem.' (Serm. ad Caten. de Symb. § 1.) Of these the latter words, threatening but not showing how it affected, and still affects, the first. It is the virtue that stands for special treatment here.

I. "Whatever be the particular faculty or frame of mind denoted by the word," says Dr. Newman, "certainly faith is regarded in Scripture as the chosen instrument of meeting heaven and earth, as a novel principle of action, most powerful in the influence which it exerts both on the heart and on the Divine view of us, and yet in itself of a nature to excite the contempt or ridicule of the world." (Univ. Sermons, Serm. ix. p. 189). These characteristics, here so well summarized, "its apparent weakness, its novelty, its special adoption, and its efficacy," were precisely the points on which the fathers had to enlarge in meeting objections urged against it in pagan times. Credo stands first of all in the creed," says Rufinus, "agreed with what the apostle Paul, writing to the Hebrews, says: 'He that cometh to God must first of all believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek Him.' The prophet, too, says: 'If ye will not believe, neither shall ye understand' (Is. vii. 9, LXX). This he proves in detail so far from being peculiar to religion that it is an accepted principle in every walk of life, to start from faith. All we cannot see for ourselves, but must learn from others, whether past, present, or future, is an object of faith. Many truths we cannot understand we accept on faith. What wonder then if, in approaching God, we are required to accord to Him what ordinary routine exacts from all? "Hae autem idicrvo in principiis praemissimis," he continues, "quia pagni nobis objicere solent, quod religio nostra, quia rationibus deficit, in solis credendi persuatione consistat" (In Symb. Apost. § 3). How Rufinus have we learned from the recent Homily of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, whose fifth catechetical lecture formally treats of faith: "the eye of the whole conscience that creates in it understanding," as it is there called: and St. Cyril in turn, drawing from Origen, who quotes Celsus, saying, "Some there are who will not give not adequate account of those things they believe, but always meet you with, 'Don't inquire, only believe: and, thy faith will save thee': who maintain, further, that worldly wisdom is an evil, and folly a good." (c. Cels. i. 9-11); and even Origen in this passage, repeating much of what his master, St. Clement of Alexandria, had said before him in his fifth book of Stromatae or Miscellaneous, where there is much also worth remembering that is didactic. As, for instance, the following: "Remove every ground for inquiring, and faith is made firm and sure. Our position accordingly, which cannot be gainsaid, is, that it is God who speaks, and has declared Himself in His word on every point that we had selected for inquiry. Who, then, is so absurd and so godless as not to believe God when He speaks, or to require proof from God as from men?" (v. p. 548). This brings us back to Rufinus again. He draws attention to a distinction of form in the creed, for he defines the Creed as "Hominis," on his side, though bishop Pearson seems sceptical of its intrinsic worth (On the Creed, vol. i. p. 22; Burton's ed. with the notes). Of the concluding articles of the creed, then, Rufinus observes: "Non dixit in sanctam ecclesiam, nec in remissionem peccatorum, sed in sanctorum, si enim addidisset in praeseptionem, unum superioresibus eademque vis fieret, nunc autem illius quidem vocabulis ubi de Divinitate ordinatur fides, in ... dicitur ... in caeteris verbo, ubi non de divinitate, sed de creaturis ac mysteriorum sacrorum capendi litterarum itaque praeseptionis syllabæ Creator a creaturis secernitur, et Divina separantur ab humanis." (§ 36). Nothing can be more certain than this. Faith in the Infinite is the only faith that can be without reserve. A Being of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness is the only being who can neither deceive nor be deceived. Faith in Him is the only faith that can be called "divine." To place the same faith in any being short of the Infinite is creature-worship. We may believe man: it is our duty. We may not believe in man: that is idolatry. Verax Christus, mendax Petrus," according to St. Augustine (Serm. de Veró. Ev. cxxvi. § 1). And again, "Quod non potest in Paulum, nemo in Petro, nemo in aliis apostolorum, hoc potest in Domino" (Serm. ixvi. § 5, 20). And again, "Credimus Apostolos, non credimus in Apostolum; non enim Apostolus justificat impiam ... " (Tract. in Joam. xiii.).

Here we must remark, in passing, on the Latin and Greek form of the Nicene creed as now used. It is the Latin form, "Et unam sanctam catholicam et apostolicam ecclesiam," which has, in all probability, preserved the reading of primitive times. The Greek, "εἰς τὸ μὲν εὐαγγέλιον," was either meant to be construed with the preceding clause—viz. "The Holy Ghost . . . who spake by the prophets to one holy Catholic" etc., as was all but demonstrated by professor Baletta some few years back: or else the word εἰς is a corrupt—perhaps an Aramaic—substitution for εἰς. The English, "And I believe in one Catholic etc." is made very orthodox in the Latin. All the articles of the creed agree so far, indeed, that we believe them on the authority of God Himself. We should be justified in disbelieving them, we should err in believing them, if they came to us vouched for only by man. Who knows God for-instance, not granted to us in the remission of sins or eternal life? As St. Irenæus says of the Incarnation itself, "Propositum hoc, generationem ejus quis enarrabit? Quoniam homo est, et quis agnoscet Deum? Cognoscit autem Illum illum, cui Pater Qui est in coelo revelavit, quoniam Is, Qui non ex voluntate carni, nec ex voluntate viri, natus est Filius hominis, Hic est Christus, Filii Dei vivi." (Hær. iii. 19). But again, believing even an eternal truth, is intrinsically different from believing in God. "Quid est credere in Deum?" asks St. Augustine. "Credeendo amore, credendo diligere, credeendo in Deum ire, et Eius membris incorporari" (Tract. in Joam., xxi. 6). In other words, believing in God includes loving Him to the same extent.

Hence, to resume the teaching of the fathers up to this point, we find two characteristics of divine faith, radically distinguishing it from human, to be: first, that it has God alone for its object; and secondly, truth authentically taught by God not for its own sake per se. It is, therefore, illimitable and beyond argument, in both respects. Its foundations, from whichever side ability to act is in exact proportion to our believing." Finally, St. Isidore of Seville—to quote from a writer as long after St. Augustine, as the rest were before him—in the second book of his Sentences: "It is impossible to arrive at true blessedness, except through faith; and he is blessed, who, by believing rightly, leads a virtuous life: and that he is virtuously cleaves to the right faith. . . . Faith is in no case exerted by force, but instilled by persuasive arguments and examples . . ." (c. 2.) The sternness of the last remark is enhanced doubly by coming from Spain. "Yet neither St. Ambrose nor St. Martin, in their day," says Butler, "would communicate with Ithacius, bishop of Ossebona, or those bishops who held communion with him, because they sought to put heretics to death" (Lives of the Saints, Sept. 11).

Faith, then, according to the teaching of the fathers, is a new graft on an old stock; a supernatural virtue developed out of a natural instinct; belief in God evoked from the ready-made habit that exists in all men of believing each other. Furthermore, being a gift of the Holy Ghost, it carries with it its own evidence, which is love—all-powerful, if accepted, to inspire confidence where reason and experience are wholly wanting, or of the slenderest kind, or even point the other way.

What Aristotle calls the moral proof, depending on the character of the speaker, needs no confirming, when that person is God. For the same reason, though divine faith, equally with human, is an act of the whole man, assent must always be dictated in the former by trust; and understanding a thing, never be made a condition of believing it. Faith in the Infinite, rightly requires us to believe many things we cannot fathom, or only fathom after believing them. "Through faith" says the apostle, "we understand that the worlds were framed by the Word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear" (Heb. xi. 3). Whence St. Augustine: "Frisus crediti, postes intelligenti; cui autem Dominus Deus, ut cum crediderit, cito intelligat, Dei donum est, non humanae fragilitatis." (De Trin., § 6, 1.)

One more specificity which the Fathers attribute to divine faith is its expansive character; deepening and widening in harmonious sympathy with the revelation of His benign purpose, which it has pleased God to unfold gradually to man. Thus, what used in primitive times to be simple belief in God—and in heathen lands is no more still—has been long heightened and expanded under the Gospel into full-blown belief in Three Divine Persons, now known to constitute the Godhead; of the redemption of man by the second Person, Who became flesh for His sake, and of the sanctification of man by the third, shed abroad in his heart. As St. Augustine puts it: "Superiorius temporibus omnium modo latuit sacramentum justificationis ex fide. Eadem tamen fides mediatoris salvos justos faciebat antiquos—puisillos cum magnis. . . . (De Conc. ap. Nupt. ii. 24) "slave in its justus quos sacra Scriptura in justos quos quidem illa non commemorat, sed tamen tuis credenti sunt: vel ante diluvium, vel inde usque ad legem datum, vel ipsius legis tempore, non solum in filiis Israel, sicut fuerunt Prophetae, sed etiam extra eundem populum, sicut
Each bishop, on his consecration, sent "communication letters," containing a profession of faith, round to his brother bishops, of which there are at least 100. (St. Irenaeus, vii. 8, in his orthodoxy.

All such professions, orthodox or heretical, public or private, purported to be compositions of Scripture; either drawn up in its very words or embodying its substance, intact and complete. But the Holy Father, St. Augustine, tells his catechumens: "quod recessus estis, et redituri, ista verba quae auditis, per divinas Scripturam sparsa sunt: sed inde collecta et unum reducta, ne tardoribus hominum memoria laboraret, ut omnis homo positus dicere, positum teneres, quod credit..." (De Synth. Serm. ad Catech. § 1). In other words, the subject matter of divine faith was held by the Fathers to be contained in Holy Scripture, and thence drawn out into creeds; and as long as creeds aspired to be more than a collection of Scriptural truths expressed in Scriptural language, they were so completely the outpourings of divine faith all through, that they might well be called by the same name. Subsequently, when human inferences from Scripture came to be placed on the same footing as Scriptural statements themselves, and the conclusions of theologians elevated into matters of faith by the living authorities of the church, belief in the church militant obtained as a practical principle, to the obscuration of belief in God; and divine faith waned in the individual, while ecclesiastical formulae, enlarged and multiplied, were forced on his acceptance.

The beginning of this change dates, indeed, from the 9th century. To dwell further on it, therewith would be to exceed our limits. It has been glanced at, however, because the contrast brings out how exclusively the subject-matter of divine faith was maintained by the Fathers to be the written Word; and its object, as well as its author, to be God, has been at least in part saved.

Besides the minor treatises of St. Augustine, De fide et operibus; De Fide comum quam non videntur; De fide et symbolo; Serm. ad Catechum.; Enchiridion; his more important works against Pelagianism (vol. x. of the Ben. ed.) should be consulted; also, treatises De Fide, by St. Ambrose, St. Pius the Great, St. Bernard, St. Bernardus; De ecclesiis; Beccaria, De Iudicio; et omnibus. Mareschel, Concord. Potrum, generally, contained in Schrumpf's Analysis; Feseller, Int. Patr. Estius and the older schoolmen on Book iii. Dist. 22-25 of the Sentences; Suarez, de Trip. Vitr. Theol. Fidei, Spec. et Cordatis; Pearson, in the Cred. Art. L.; Waterland, Faber, and Newman On Justification; bishop Harold Brown, in Art. XL., and Art. JUSTIFICATION. [L. S. F.] FAITH, RULE OF

rule in his observance of Easter. Irenaeus, in a passage quoted under CREEDS (Vol. 1. p. 698, § 10), employs the words “Rule of Faith” to the traditional belief of the church. To this traditional belief he refers in numerous passages.
So does Tertullian, using the title Regula Fidei as his tracts de Virgin, melanox, c. 1; de Monogaminia, c. 2; de Praescript. c. 13. The last passage refers to several points not mentioned explicitly in the baptismal creed. There are passages in the work of Novatian de Trinitate which run thus: “The Rule of Truth requires that we should believe. . . . The same Rule of Truth teaches us to believe . . . .” where the Rule of Truth must be equivalent to the church’s order, requiring a belief in the church’s teaching, this teaching furnishing the standard by which every statement was to be measured.
Once more, Victorinus of Petavium (Hahn, § 12) speaks of the arundo et mensura fidei, the measuring rod of the faith. So far the statement of Bingham (Antiq. x. iii. 20) that the word καθολου (rule) was one of the many titles given to the symbolon or creed requires enlargement.
This distinction was fully recognised in later years. At present, we may refer to the large mass of teaching put forward confidently by Irenaeus, not only in the passages quoted in the article of CREEDS, but throughout his great work.
Thus he says, i. 22. 1: “If we hold the rule of truth we can detect and confute” such and such assertions of the Valentinians; in i. 27. 4, he speaks of people adulterating the truth and teaching of the church; in ii. 30. 9, of the advantage we possess in standing by Him “whom the law announces, whom the prophets proclaim, whom Christ reveals, whom the apostles hand down, whom the church believes.” In iii. (Introduction) we read of the duty of contending for the true and life-giving faith which the church received from the Apostles and delivered to her children. On this faith he enlarges much, especially in chap. 3, in which he appeals to the churches of Christendom, and especially to the churches of Rome, Smyrna, and Ephesus.
He claims that what was contrary to the teaching of these churches must be false, for “the apostles have poured into the church, as into a sea, the whole thing, the whole thing, the truth, so that every one that will may drink out of it the water of life.” Compare chap. 5. 1. In book v. he confirms all his teaching out of the discourses of our Saviour. Such was the faith which the Apostles handed down, and which was sufficient “to measure” the early heretics.

Passing from Irenaeus to Origen we have, in the latter’s work, ἕκαστος ἠμαρτάνων, indications of other points which were considered to be part of the faith handed down by the Apostles. He enumerates these among others: that every rational soul possesses freewill and choice, and that we have to pass through a struggle with the devil and his agents; again, that this world was made at a certain time, and is hereafter to be dissolved; that the Scriptures were written per Spiritum Dei et sensum habentem, non eum solum qui in manifacto est, sed et aliwm quaedam latens pharisieon.
Of course, these years were already those spent into the Baptismal Creed. Further illustration of the same distinction is given by St. Cyril of Jerusalem. His fourth lecture is devoted to a brief summary (ἀναπαραλαῖτοι στόχοιο) of the doctrines which are necessary to be believed, and he introduces such that is deeply interesting on the following subjects:—God, Christ, the Birth from the Virgin, the Cross, the Burial, Resurrection, Ascension, the Future Judgment, and the Holy Spirit. But these lessons are followed by others on the condition of man, his soil, his body, on his food, his clothing, his resurrection; the latter, the Holy Scripture, including a list of the books “which we read confidently in the church.” In Saint Augustine’s Enchiridion (15, vol. vi. col. 375) the Regula Fidei is the creed. But in his Letters this phrase (as well as the corresponding Regula Veritatis) is used of the general or traditional teaching of the church. Thus (Ep. xcvii. § 40) in discussing the conduct of Cyprian as to the rebaptizing of heretics, Augustine says that “if Cyprian’s opinions were wrong at one time, he afterwards corrected them by the rule of truth.”
In another letter (Ep. cxxv.) he says that “they who deny the baptism of persons after baptism, are utterly alien from the rule of the Catholic faith, and from the teaching of Christ and His Apostles.” (See, too, Ep. cxlvii. § 34.
In Epp. cxlvii. § 39, and cxxii. § 11, regula fidei stands for the baptismal creed.)

As time passed along, the rule of the faith was considered to include the decisions of the councils which were generally received. Thus the council of Chalcedon did not only confirm the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople, but it also adopted the synodal letters of Cyril of Alexandria, and the letter of Leo to Flavian, and, by way of addition or explanation, it put out its own confession. This confession was substantially incorporated with the document which Quesnel conceived to be the letter on the faith which used to be addressed by the popes of Rome on their election to the bishops of the East. Again, the collections of councils give, under the first council of Toledo, “the rule of faith which the bishops of Tarraconica and others transmitted to Balconius, bishop of Gallician, against all heresies, and especially against the Priscillanists.” (Labbe, ii. 1227; Mansi, iii. 1008.)
In the preface to the canons of the second council of Orange (C.
Arausiacus, antiqu. ii. 1200, Labbe, v. 1927; Mansi, viii. 711) we read that some persons had wandered from the rule of the faith in regard to grace and free-will. The language quoted above as from the first council of Toledo was repeated at Braga in 563 (Labbe, v. 856; Mansi, iv. 774).
The well-known councils of Toledo (No. III. anno 589; No. IV. anno 633; No. VI. anno 638; No.
XI. anno 675) put forth representations of “the Catholic faith” in ever-increasing volume, but it is only in the last (apparently) that the bishops used the phrase “Rule of Faith.” They said that for three days they consulted together in order that they might lay down these expanded rules of faith, of which simplicity. (The result of their deliberations occupies four columns in Labbe’s folio, vi. 541—545.) A similar desire to expand the rule according as necessity seemed to arise, may be observed in other councils, as in Milan
A.D. 680, and in Rome the same year. About these years, too, the pontifical wrot~ to the popes on the offices of the church (Migne, lxxxii.), in which we find (p. 817) a long chapter entitled De Regula Fidei. The articles enumerated in it FAITHLEC (FAITHLEI) founded the abbey of Contoutskert, in the barony of South Ballintober, co. Roscommon (Ware, Jr. Ant. c. 20; Mon. Hb. 90). [G. J.]

FAITHLENN, "son of Aedh Diarmhan, of the race of Corc, son of Lugaidh, &c., traced up to Oilill Olum, is commemorated in Mart. Doneg. at June 8. His name is the same as Faelain, son of Aedus Damanian or Bennanus, of the royal house of Munster, of whom, along with Colman and Fethadius, Colgan gives a short account at March 31. [FAELAIN (4)]. If they are not the same, they are brothers, and flourished in the first half of the 7th century, Aedh Bennan, king of West Munster, having died in A.D. 619, at which year the Ann. Tigernach have the death of Aedh Bennan, king of Munster (O'Conor, Rev. Hb. Script. ii. 184). At Sept. 5 there is a Faithleen, whom Mart. Tallaght calls "Faithleinn Deochoin," and O'Clery (in Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 297) suggests that he may be this Faithleinn. [G. J.]

FALCIDUS, a person, apparently a deacon of Rome, who endeavoured to shew (1) that in the pontificate Levites were in an equality with priests; (2) that under the New Testament deacons were to be so regarded in reference to presbyters. This presumptuous claim a writer, formerly supposed to have been St. Augustine, confutes in a treatise entitled De Sacratud Romanorum Levitarum. It is contained in a work entitled Questiones ex urbeque maritim. i.e. gathered both from the Old Testament and the New Testament, and is now placed in the appendix to vol. iii. of the works of Augustine, but it is no longer ascribed to him as its author. The writer shews conclusively enough that as the greater contains the less, so the presbyterate contains the diaconate, but that this does not imply that the two orders are identical. (Aug. Opp. vol. iii. App. p. 2301, qu. 101.) [H. W. P. J.]

FALCO (FOULQUS), 19th bishop of Maestricht (aft. Liége), succeeding his brother Encherius I. about A.D. 488, and followed by Enchorius II. upon his death, about A.D. 512. Upon his consecration he appears to have usurped episcopal rights over the church of Mouzon, which belonged to the see of Rheims, ordaining priests and deacons to it, and appointing an archdeacon and a precentor (primicerius scholae clarissimae), and appropriating the church revenues. These pretensions drew down from St. Remigius, the archbishop of Rheims, a letter of remonstrance, to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxv. 968. (Geoff Pontificum Lcodiniun. i. 54, Liége, 1612, ed. Chapeaule; Gall. Christ. iii. 817; cf. Cellier, Hist. des Artistes sacrés, xi. 81.) [S. A. B.]

FALCONIA (FALTONIA) PROBA, of much esteem in the middle ages as a Christian poet, but of uncertain name, place, and family. Of her works there is but one extant, Contesces Virginiens (Bibl. Nat. Paris. 708-716, Paris, 1824; Virgil. Cant. exc. Hebr. Steph. an. 1578; Migne, Patr. Lat. t. xix. 802-818). She uses Virgil's words, after a short original preface, to tell the events of the Bible from the creation to the ascension of Christ, but her hexameters have little point in Christian teaching, and, from the very exigencies of the case, breathe little of Virgil. Her own identity is much disputed, and she is wholly unknown if she be not (and this identification appears to be generally assumed for want of information to the contrary) Ascia (or Valeria) Faltonia Proba, the pious wife of Sextus Anicius Petronius Probus (called by lictor, "Aedus Amicus proconsul"), whose wealth, wealth, and liberty made him one of the most honoured Romans in the end of the 4th century. [FALCONIA PROBA, in Dict. Greek and Roman Biography.] Her husband was consul with Gratian, and a Christian, though late in life; and her three sons, Olybrius, Probinus, and Probus, were also consuls. She had great influence at Rome, and used it in favour of the Christians: her daughter-in-law, Julianus, was the friend of St. Augustine, and her grand-daughter, Demetrius, the friend of St. Jerome. [DUMITRAS] From Cucusus in Armenia the exiled St. Cyprian, in A.D. 406, wrote a letter (Ep. 165 al. 188) to her in reference to the persecutions and disorders at Rome, recommending the confessors to her charity; and when Alaric had taken Rome (A.D. 410), and the widow Proba had found refuge in Africa, she came more immediately under the influence of St. Augustine of Hippo, and received from him (Ep. 130 al. 121) a letter in which, recognising her widowhood and wealth, he especially recommends to her the great duty of prayer. The time and place of Proba Falconia's death are unknown, and the above attempt at identification, though common, is very doubtful. (Baronius, Ann. Ecc. a. 385, i. ii. and 410, ir.; Cave, Script. Eccl. Lat. i. 255; Lindemannus, Corp. Gram. Lat. vol. ii. 65; Montfaucon, Dair. Ital. 38.) [J. G.]

FALDUS, bishop of Lyons. [FALOALDA]

FALLE, ST. [FIDOLUS]

FALLAMHAIN (FOLLOMAN), bishop, is commemorated on July 31, along with his brothers Colman, Jarnog, Natal or Naib, and Papan, who are said to have been the sons of Nadfraech, or rather the sons of that Aegeus, son of Nadfraech, king of Cashel or Munster, whom St. Patrick converted and baptized, and who was slain at Cillossedach, now Kells, co. Carlow, in A.D. 489. Fallamhain was bishop of Santry, now a village in the barony of Coolecon, co. Dublin. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 207; Rogers, Antiq. Ulster, i. 168, c. 2, 176; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. 4 ser. iii. 185.) [NAILL.] [J. G.]
FALTONIUS PINIANUS

FALTONIUS PINIANUS. [PINIANUS.]

FALVAX. The standard catalogue of the archbishops of Tarracina contains the death of Falvax, a.d. 578; but in most lists the name is marked as doubtful, and even placed at the end of the catalogue from uncertainty where it ought to stand. Domencia, in his life of Cyprian, archbishop of Carthage, places him before that bishop, and says that he died "cum insigni nomine et pietate." (Fluxus, Epist. Aegypt., v. 77; Annales, Series Episc. 76.) [L. D.]

FANTINUS (1), confessor. [FANTUS.]

FANTINUS (2), defender, who in 599 received letters from Gregory the Great in behalf of the Jews turned out of their synagogue, and on many other subjects. He is called defender of Palestines in one place, in another of Naples. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ix. indicii. ii. ep. 53; lib. x. indicii. iii. ep. 14, etc.; Migne, lxxxv. 993-1078.) [FANTUS (68).] [A. H. D. A.]

FANTINUS, martyr, July 31, with Deodata his wife, under Diocletian. They were rich and of noble birth, living at Syracuse. While still bachelors they were charitable and devout, earnestly supplicating the gods to send them a child. In due time the child was born and named Fantinus, and they continued pangs till he reached the age of twelve. One day, when hunting, the boy pursued a deer into a cave where dwelt a hermit, by whom he was converted and baptized. Returning home he led his parents to embrace the faith. On making a public profession they were arrested, severely scourged, and cast with their child into prison. There in the middle of the night an angel appeared with a light, who encouraged the parents to endure, and allowed the boy to escape. A short time after, the parents suffered martyrdom. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 177; Calendar, Vitae SS. Storia i. 149.) [G. T. S.]

FAOLEANN. [FAILA.]

FAOLEENN, FAOLAN. [FAOLAN.]

FABA, ST. (Burgundofaran), daughter of Chasarius, a high official at the court of Theodenbert king of Austria. Her mother was Leonegunda. She was at an early age consecrated to a conventual life by St. Columbanus, but being opposed by her father she fell ill. Her father intimated to the earnest representations of Columbanus and Eustathius. She then recovered, and took the veil at Meaux in 614. She was afterwards elected abbess of a convent called after her, Fara-medior, near Meaux. Here she established the rule of St. Columbanus, and died in 655. Her festival was kept on Dec. 7. An account of her will be found in Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. t. ii. p. 400), based on the earlier mention of her by Jonas of Bobbio in his lives of Columbanus (sec. 50) and Eustathius (sec. 13) which are also given by Mabillon (ibid. pp. 22, 113.) [L. G. S.]

FARAMUNDUS (1) (Faramude), twelfth bishop of Paris, succeeding Eusebius II. and succeeding Simplicius. He was a son of Eugenius, the twenty-first bishop, on whose death he sought the bishopric, but was postponed in favour of the Syrian Eusebius II. (circa a.d. 591). On the latter's death, however, which was not long delayed, he succeeded him according to the catalogue. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. t. ii. 26; Gall. Chr. vii. 22; Gams, Series Episc. 598.) [S. A. S.]

FARAMUNDUS (2), usurping bishop of Liege, or, as the see was then called, Maastricht. Upon the death of Childeric II. in 673, St. Lambert was driven from the city and Faramundus put in his place. But after an exile of seven years, St. Lambert was restored by Pippin, and Faramundus ejected from the province. (Vita S. Landecberti, auct. Godescalco, in Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedict. sec. iii. pt. i. pp. 71-2; Paris, 1668-1701.) [S. A. B.]

FARAMUNDUS (3), seventeenth bishop of Cologne, succeeding Anno I. and followed by Ruginfredus. His exact date is uncertain, but he sat early in the 8th century. Some have identified him with the preceding, but without authority. (Gall. Chr. iii. 629.) [S. A. B.]

FARRANN was one of the three brothers, called O'Burchan, viz., Farann, Boithgal, and Maolstoe, in the time of Cathal, son of Finghin, king of Munster, who died a.d. 742 (Ann. Tig.). These three are said to have been respectively bishop, judge, and poet, and to have made a digest of laws under the title Judicia Coelestia. (O'Reilly, Irish Writers, p. 81; O'Flaherty, Ogygia, ii. pt. iii. 78; Tanner, Bibl. 273; O'Conor, Proleg. ii. 67.) [J. G.]

FARANNAN. [FORANNAN.]

FARDULFUS, a native of Lombardy, whom Charles the Great carried into France along with king Didier, after the capture of Pavii. While in exile he became the fortunate discoverer of a plot formed against the life of Charles by his eldest son, Pepin, and upon the death of Magniarius, a.d. 790, was preferred, in consequence of this service, to the abbacy of St. Denys. Gratitude for his promotion led him to enlarge the monastery by the addition of a magnificent hall in which to entertain his patron. In a short poem, ascribed to Alcuin (Migne, Patrolog. vol. ci. p. 552), he is eulogized on account of his munificence in this and other respects. An ancient MS. belonging to the abbey records that he accompanied the king in his expedition against the Saxons in 795, and was likewise one of the delegates whom Charles appointed to visit and report upon the various provinces of his realm, with a view to the better enforcement of law. He died in 806, and was buried within the walls of the abbey of St. Denys. His only extant writings are three short elegiac poems, (1) An inscription written for the façade of the hall above mentioned. (2) An inscription for a chapel dedicated to St. John the Baptist, which he built in performance of a vow made in the first year of his exile. (3) A fragment addressed in all probability to his royal patron. (Migne, Patrolog. xii. p. 825.) [E. M. F.]

FARMUS, bishop of Viseo. [FIRMINUS.]

FARNAN. [FORANNAN.]

FARO (Burgundofara), St., nineteenth bishop of Meaux. There are three lives of him.
Faro

Extant, the chief and oldest of which, written by Hildegard, bishop of the same diocese, in the 9th century, in a diffuse and wearisome style, and by no means free from errors, is to be found in the Annals of Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti, ii. 606–625, Paris, 1688–1701. He was born in the district of Brie (Pagus Brigiensis), in Burgundy. Agnericuis, his father, was a noble of the court of theobert of Austrasia, who entertained St. Columba, and received the saint's blessing on his sons and daughters (Visa S. Columbani, Mabillon, ii. 255). His mother's name was Landegundis. Changaudois, bishop of Laon was his brother, and the famous St. Fara and Agnerudis were his sisters. His biographer quaintly derives his name from famen and ros, quod caelestis doctrina fando alius manabat eis ab ore, but it appears to have been the equivalent for a noble in the Burgundian language. The first part of his life was spent in courts. Theobert, Theodoris, Coltae II. and Dagobert II. were successively his patrons. His biographer asserts, though incorrectly (see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. 2, 26), that the founder of Cluny, his relation of the elder II. Influenced, probably, in part by his sister St. Fara, he became a priest, after persuading his wife to take the veil. With his wealth he enriched the church of St. Stephen at Meaux, and was remarkable for his hospitality to the English and Irish missionaries. To St. Placitus, or Fergus, he gave land of his own for a monastery in the forest of Breuil, and St. Chelles, or Kilian, another Irishman, he received into his monastery and sent on a mission to the Atrebates (Artois). Under Dagobert I., son of Clotaire, he held the office of chancellor, or referendaris, in which capacity his signature is appended to a charter of the year 628 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 507). About this last date he became bishop of Meaux, succeeding Gundulf, and not Waldbert, as his biographer supposes (see Mabillon ut supr. n. and Le Coite, Annu. Eccl. Franc. an. 642, n. xiv. tom. iii. p. 647). His career as bishop is outlined by the dates of the charters he signed, but beyond them we have few details. In A.D. 635 or 636, he consecrated, in company with Audoenus, an altar at the monastery of Rebaiz, which Audoenus had built by Dagobert's command (Le Coite, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 636, n. ii. tom. iii. p. 30). In 644 he was present at the translation of the bodies of St. Crispin and St. Crispinian (Le Coite, an. 648, n. xii. tom. iii. 240). In 652 he subscribed a charter of Landericus, bishop of Paris, for the monastery of St. Dionysius (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 289). In 657 he was at the second council of Sens (Le Coite, an. 657 n. 16, tom. iii. 450). In 658 he subscribed the charter of Eunus, bishop of Sens, for the monastery of St. Pierre le Vif (Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 1171); and in 662 he was one of the bishops to whom Berthefridus of Amiens addressed his concession for the monastery of Corbie (Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 1178). In 696 he signed that of Drauinus, bishop of Soissons, for the convent of the Blessed Virgin in that city (Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 1183). He was himself the builder of a monastery on his own land, which he dedicated to the Holy Cross, John the Baptist, and all the Apostles, according to Le Coite (an. 642, n. lixii. tom. iii. 102) in A.D. 642, and in which he entertained Adria, the companion of Theodore, on his way to England, in 698 (Beza, Hist. Ecol. iv. 1). In his biography are found several miracles. He died, according to Mabillon, in 672, and was buried in the church of the monastery he had built. His successor in the see was St. Hildegardus. His day of commemorations is the 28th of Oct. (Usuard, Mart. Migne, Patr. Lat. xxiv. 629; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ii. 593; Gall. Christ. viii. 1599.)

[4. S. A. B.]

FAROALDUS I., the first Lombard duke of Spoleto, c. 580. According to Paulus Diaconus (iii. 13) he attacked and devastated Clasis, the port of Ravenna. This is improbable. (Note by Wits, Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 100. Catalogus Imperatorum Ducum, etc. in Mon. Lang. p. 521.)

[5. A. D. A.]

FAROALDUS II., duke of Spoleto, c. 703, son of Thrasamund. He invaded Clasis, the port of Ravenna, but at the command of king Liutprand restored it to the Greeks. His son Thrasamund rebelled against him, c. 724, deposed him and made himself duke. (Paulus Diacon. vi. 30–44. Catalogus Imperatorum Ducum, etc. in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 522.) Pope John VII. confirmed the privileges and property of the abbey of Farfa at the request of Farold (Jaffe, Regesta Pont. p. 173; Troya, Ecles. Dipl. ad 374, ii. 61.) He is also mentioned in Historia Ffarianum (Pertz, Monum. Scriptores, xii. 524.)

FASCIUS (Fascius), a Christian of Hippo Regius, who, having incurred a debt of fifteen soli, and called him to an account, and for a period of three years. In order to avoid the disgrace of a public appeal to the congregation to meet this difficulty, Augustine was obliged to borrow the money from Macedonius (Maciodonius), under promise that he should make up the deficiency, if any, should be made up from the property of the church, assuring them at the same time that whatever was given in this way was really offered to God. (Aug. Ep. 248; Bingham, Orig. viii. 11, 4; Tillemont, th. 93, vol. viii. p. 338.)

[6. W. P.]

FASIR, one of the leaders of the Circumcellions, whom their followers dignified with the title of "leaders of the saints." (Opt. iii. 4.) (Donatini, Vol. i. p. 863; Ambrosii.)

[A. W. P.]

FASI SICULI [CHRISTIAN PIUS].

FASCIUS [FASCIUS].

FASSTOSUS. A monk and presbyter is the north African church at the commencement of the 6th century, at the time when the persecuting zeal of the Arians under their Vandal princes had desolated the church and exiled her bishops. Fasstosus, according to the strongly-worded accusations of Valgentius of Ruspe, deser-FASTIDIUS, of whom Genadius of Marsella, in his book De Illustrissimis Viris (written about A.D. 480, see Ebert's Geschichte der Christlich-Lateinischen Literatur, i. 427), c. 56, says—"Fastidius Britanniarum episcopos scriptis ad Fastatum [que dam] de Vita Christiana librum usum, et alium de Viduata servanda, sana et bea digna doctrina." The Corby MS. of Genadius has merely "Fastidios Britto," but the other MSS. read as above, and Fastidius may have been one of the numerous Celtic bishops without fixed sees. He only wrote one work, addressed to a widow, Fatilia, whom he calls "deilectissima soror," but the last chapter is headed "Viduarum tripexus genus;" the book itself he compares to country bread, which is better for the hungry than that made of very fine flour. It is printed in Galland, ix. p. 481-483, as a separate work, after Holstenius's example, having been previously assigned to St. Augustine. In literary tradition the great name swallows up all the little names, and some semi-Pelagian works have thus been assigned to the very father who combated Pelagianism. Fastidius actually quotes his fellow-countryman Pelagius twice, though without naming him, and Genadius himself a semi-Pelagian, prays him for his sound doctrine. In one place Fastidius speaks of those who sin "after Adam's example," the very phrase of Pelagius; in another he copies Pelagius's advice as to how the saints should pray, words similarly addressed to a widow, Iulia, the mother of Demetrius. (See Galland, ix. pref. p. xix.; H. Wharton's Historia de Episcopis et Decanis Londinensibus, p. 6; Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 10.)

FATHERS, THE. This term has been applied variously, both in classical and Christian times (see DICT. OF CHRISTIAN ANT. I. 665). It is here considered with reference to those primeval writers of the Christian church whose remains constitute what is called Patristic literature—a literature commencing with the 1st but ending practically with the 7th century, there having been few representatives of it acknowledged in the West and East alike subsequently to the sixth council, A.D. 680, when the last of the great heroes relating to the Incarnation—viz., Monothelitism—was condemned. And, in truth, when we come to inquire when and where the application of the term in this sense commenced, we shall find that when isolated instances might be cited of its earlier application, it dates as a phrase from the time when the bishops who met in eccumenical synods at Nicæa for the first time began to be so designated by their supporters and admirers in the struggle that ensued between the Nicæans and those who made rather to men than books; to lives and deaths in defence of the faith rather than logic or rhetoric. Those who had lived for it were called brethren; those who had suffered for it, athletes or confessors; and those who had died for it, martyrs; even in referring to their works for what was held and taught in primitive times. (Comp. Euseb. E. H. v. 28. 2.) tertullian himself founds his rule, not on the consent of fathers, but of churches (De Praes. c. 32–6). It is St. Athanasius who first quotes "fathers" as witnesses to the faith: "If the faith," he says, "commenced with the present consolatip;"—"as the Ecstasy emanating from his opponents was being dated—"how will the fathers and the blessed martyrs fare?" (cap. Soc. E. H. ii. 37). And again, "It is not only now that the canons and formularies of the church were placed in our hands; but they were handed down to us securely and faithfully by the fathers." (Ep. Enucle. § 1.) It was in a measure of the council of Nicæa that per-rogative which it retains to this day. The first fathers to be quoted as a distinct authority were "the ἤχον" (318) fathers." All earlier or later writers upholding the doctrine set forth in their creeds, or by the help of Augustine, were not considered as having any distinct and style by succeeding councils and of controversy, in quoting from their works. "We pronounce," say the bishops of the fourth council in their first canon, "it to be befitting and just that the canons of the holy fathers made in every synod to this time remain in full force and authority, but that no one is confirmed, nor their framers classed with fathers in this pronouncement. Subsequently the fathers were distinguished according to the age in which they lived by the epithets apostolic, ante-Nicene, post-Nicene, &c.; or, with reference to their writings, apologists, doctors, commentators, &c.; or, with reference to their country, Greek, Latin, African, Gallican, Anglican, &c. Of African fathers, St. Fulgentius in the 6th century was the latest; of Greek, St. John Damascene in the 8th; of Latin, St. Gregory the Great in the 6th, Venerable Bede in the 9th, St. Peter Damian in the 11th, and St. Bernard in the 12th. Another distinction ought also to be pointed out and remarked upon: viz., into saints and unsaints. For as there are numerous saints in the calendar who were never styled fathers, so there are several of the fathers who were never styled saints. Origen and Tertullian, in particular, have been placed in this latter class, all the world over, as being unsound on some points, though, for general purposes, their authority ranks high even among the fathers. Further, as it was no pope, but common consent, which qualified the honour in which their names should be held, so neither was it any pope, but common consent, that dictated which of the fathers should also be styled saints. Canonization, in the modern sense of the word, was a process unknown in their day. The epithets ante-Nicene and post-Nicene explain themselves; but the chronological division of fathers who lived ante-nicene or posterior to the first council of Nicea, a.d. 325. Apostolical, viz., such as were personally known to the apostles, or anyhow flourished in the same age, form a subdivision of group I., with St. Clement of Rome, St. Ignatius of Antioch, and St. Polycarp of Smyrna, for its chief heads. All that can be said about them personally, or their extant letters—the only species of composition remaining to us certainly belonging to this period—will be found in this work under their respective names. Under "Barbaras," similarly, will be found all that can be said of the epistle ascribed to him; and under 'Hermas,' of the allegorical work bearing his name, called 'The Shepherd.' The authorship and character of the 'Epistle to Diognetus' is discussed under that title. At first the writings of the fathers were for the most part "apologetic," that is, of a defensive character. Even the epistles of St. Ignatius, and of St. Clement of Rome, so far as they are depreciatory, though addressed to believers, might be so classed. For St. Clement depreciates deicides as being against Christian brotherhood; St. Ignatius as being against church-order. Indeed, it should be pointed out that though, popularly, by Apologists are meant such as opposed Christianity from the time assigned to them already, very little could be said about their works here that would not involve repetition. Thus much it may, however, be well to add: 1. These treatises have, generally speaking, a two-fold value for us, which is more than can be said of half the mere controversial works of the next period. For they are valuable, both as shewing the objections urged against Christianity by contemporaries with the living facts in full view; and as answering by anticipation objections of the same kind recast and repeated in modern times. Greeks, Romans and Jews of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd centuries were judges of the intrinsic merits of the cause they defended by the Apologists than the accust thinkers and subtlest reasoners in lands permeated by Christian influences can be now; and the wholesale conversion of the vastest, most civilized, most heterogeneous empire that the world has yet seen by Christianity, is a homage to the weight of argument in its favour at its commencement, and antecedently to its achievement, such as we may fairly say no other cause can be shewn to have received before or since. Further, in estimating their collective value, we must never forget that the greater portion of these treatises has not come down to us. 2. It must be remembered that, from the nature of the case, Christian Apologists, when they had pangs for their opponents, could only base their arguments on such grounds as pugnacium would admit. Pagan subterfuges and pagan mythology supplied them, of course, with topics in abundance for retorting on their opponents; but the principles of morality and natural theology were the sole topics to which they could appeal of a positive kind. In reasoning with the Jews, again, the Scriptures of the Old Testament form the bonds to the argument from the Revelation. It was first in controversy with heretics, that the New, as well as the Old Testament, formed the stand-point on both sides. Heretics attacked the interpretation put on the whole Bible by the Church, and the fathers defended it. As, therefore, St. Justin Martyr was the earliest of the extant Apologists proper, so the great work of St. Irenæus may be called the earliest of the Apologies special. And these two classes of works may be compared with profit. For this distinction is of the utmost importance to ourselves, in estimating their respective references to Scripture. Tertullian supplies us with some treatises of each kind, for example: Nov. throughout his Apology, and his work addressed To the Nations, though desecrating on Jewish history and Christian customs in both, he never once quotes Scripture as Scripture. In a single passage of his work Against the Jews, he is surprised into saying: "Et merito evangelium—whom, however, he will not name—et prophetae usque ad Joannem." (c. 8). In the very next chapter, as though conscious of having gone too far, he quotes sayings of the Jews and of Christ recorded in the Gospels, but without quoting, where they are to be found. "Sic et Babylon apud Joannem nostrum Romae urbis figur at est" (25) is his sole remaining explicit reference to the New Testament; but, again, the work to which he refers is not named. In his treatise, De Praescriptione Haereticarum, on the one hand, he accepts the testimony of all the Gospels, but he quotes professedly more than one hundred times, with the books as often as not, named, from which he quotes. St. Irenæus was contemporary with Tertullian, and St. Justin Martyr, about a quarter of a century prior to both. The Refutation of all Heresies contains quotations from heresies about as much earlier than St. Justin, as St. Hippolytus, his reputed author, was later than St. Irenæus.

These quotations from heresies we class for convenience with the Apologies and work against Tertullian by St. Justin: their Refutation, whether by St. Irenæus or not, is the well-known work of St. Irenæus on the same subject. On comparing them, we get a repetition of the same phenomena noticed in the treatises corresponding to them by Tertullian, for which a cause must be sought.

That is to say: (1) St. Justin, in his first Apology, produces a number of the sayings of Christ as the sayings of Christ, but omits points of detail, where they are to be found. In quoting from the books of the Old Testament, on the contrary, he names their authors without any reserve. First in one passage, speaking of the institution of the Eucharist, he ventures on referring to what the apostles had handed down, εις τον βλεπον ανωμαλουσαν—using a word familiarized already to his hearers in the "Memoriae of Socrates" by Xenophon, as Grabe points out—κατεναν ουκ ουκεται, as if apologizing for having named them. And in the next chapter, he refers to the "Memoriae of Hermas," and the "Apocalypse of Peter" with the "Writings of the Prophets," as though covering his reference to the first by the last. In his second Apology there is no reference to them whatever. In his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, Moses, Isaiah, Hosen, David, Ezekiel, Amos, Malachi, Zacharias, Daniel, are being quoted, but nowhere, when he speaks of the Gospels and twenty passages where the sayings of Christ are quoted as His, there is but one where the alleged saying is said to be found written in the Gospel generally. (2) The sayings of Christ are not, but four, where they are said to be written in the "Memoriae of the Apostles," and some of these, the last, where the writer admits having learnt it from thence (§§ 101, 102, 104, 105). (2) Of all the citations from the works of heretics in their Refutation, but one, ηδη, from Basilides, refers to 'the Gospels' by name (vii. 10), though there are numbers where the sayings of Christ are quoted as His.

Reserve so studiously cannot have been accidental, whether we be justified in affirming it proceeded from ignorance of the Gospels in the shape they now bear, for Tertullian, who maintains equal reserve throughout his works against heathen and Jews, in his single work on Prescription, could have scarce shown more intimate familiarity with them than he whom the New Testament had he now been alive. Christian had been authoritatively warned against "cutting their pearls before swine," and this, and not lack of materials to refer to, prompted their reserve, when quoting professedly from books with which even heretics shared more or less. If Origen, writing against Celsus, is more explicit at times, it is due to the fact that he was really writing for Christians whose minds had been shaken by the vigorous onslaught upon their sacred books of one concomitant with their contents. Nevertheless, compare this work of Origen with that of St. Irenæus against heresies, and the contrast is plain. The Gospels were no authority for Celsus, nor did he raise questions, or expend criticism, about their authors. He disputed their facts, reviled their doctrines, imputed their miracles to occult arts. Origen, accordingly, referred to them from the standpoint of his opponent, and no further. The heretics, refuted by St. Irenæus, appealed to them, and to works which they placed on the same footing, in confirmation of their own peculiar views. St. Irenæus was, therefore, called upon not merely to quote Scripture, but to show distinctly what interpretations had been put upon it by the church, and what books received into the canon. Such was the diligence, and such the prophetic instinct, with which he performed his task; that, as if purposely to meet an exception to their genuineness, made 1700 years after his time, he quotes not only the opening but the concluding words of the Gospel of St. Mark, as they stand now (c. Haer. iii. 10).

(3) It has been often observed, as of the fathers in general, so of the apologists in particular, that they repeat each other. This is true, but it is not peculiar to either by any means. All it proves is: 1, that they were literary men—readers, as well as writers, that is, And, 2, that they had a literature of their own. Tertullian and St. Irenæus lived in the same age so completely that each may well have read and pondered over the other. Yet there is little or no ground for saying that Tertullian was indebted to St. Irenæus for his masterly treatise, De Præscript., though considerably more than the germ of it is contained in the second and third chapters of the third book of the latter against Heresies. St. Vincentius of Lerins in the 5th century, could scarce be supposed unacquainted with the writings of both, but his Commentaries could not, with any justice, be stigmatized as the work of a plagiarist. A literature circumscribed in its range by the same facts, and inspired to overflowing by the same principles and aspirations, must necessarily repeat itself again and again in varying degrees, as occasion may require. Men who think alike, and put pen to paper on the same subjects, must inevitably write alike, whether professing to quote from each other or not. Floating ideas are inseparable from every such literature. Now, that there was such a thing as patriotic literature, from the earliest times downward, is a fact which cannot be denied, though probably nine-tenths of it have been lost. Of the great work of St. Irenæus against heresics, and of the commentaries of Origen on the Old and New Testament for instance, what have we now remaining but fragments or translations? How many more works by them and by others have totally disappeared, that Eusebius names as entertaining confused notions of what they professed to believe, or with believing some things which their successors pronounced heretical. Now, first, as regards their personal orthodoxy, it has been too solidly vindicated by bishop Bell against Petavius, ever to be called in question again. Next, as regards definite thought and formulated expression, it is a charge which would apply with as much force to the post-Nicene fathers as to ante-Nicene, to the present as to past ages alike. It is a simple fact, that all truth gains by discussion amongst men. And if the ante-Nicene fathers merely permitted themselves language that was subsequently refined, and expressed views that were subsequently qualified, after careful analysis by all of what they taught or believed, and authoritative declaration by the church of the boundaries between truth and error; they could not, without manifest unfairness, be contrasted unfavourably with any that followed them on that ground alone.

When St. Athanasius, for instance, in his certain exposition and development in the Diognæus against the Arians; and St. Augustine certain passages in St. Cyprian, St. Ambrose, and Rufinus, against the Pelagians; are not reminded of words like "hypothesis," and phrases like "Dominicus homo," requiring or less, exactness in St. Athanasius himself and of the two books of Retractions, let us face to the voluminous works of St. Augustine by his own request? "Quid igitur opus est," as he nobly says of his predecessors, "ut error accurmur epuscula, qui prius quam haeresibus oritetur, non habuerunt necessitatem in difficulter solvendum quaecumque: quod procul dubio equum, si respondere tabibus cogentur". "(De Præd. c. 14.) Or, again, in apologizing for his own shortcomings: "Pulchimus enim singulis quamque haeresibus intahale ecclesiae proprias quaestionum, contra quas dilegentius defenderetur Scriptura Divina, quam sitnulla necessitates cogat." "(De Ius Div. c. 25.) Or, in another subject: "Et de Patre quindecim libris dissertavert docti et spiritualissimi viri... de Spiritu Sancto autem noundum tam copioso nec diligerent disputatum est a doctis et magnis Divinarum SCRIPTURARUM tractatores, ut intelligi facile posse et Eius proprium, quod propter ut Eum neque Filium neque Patrem dicere possimus, sed tantum Spiritum Sanctum". "(De Fide et Syn., § 18, 19.) Yet this treatise was delivered as a discourse, "in the presence of the whole African episcopate, just twenty years after the publication of the well-known treatise, De Spiritu Sancto, by St. Beili. The fact is, the fathers in all ages had their attention concentrated on the controversies of their own day, and seldom either raked up exploded errors, or refuted new by anticipation. Truth was drawn out by them in logical sequence, but without any design on their part, by being asserted against one error after another in succession. From the 1st to the end of the 4th century, all heresies, beginning with Gnosticism and ending with Macedonianism, were directed against the fact of the Incarnation of the Trinity, and embodied a denial either of the reality of the Human and Divine Natures in the Incarnate Word, or of the existence of that Person of one substance, power, and eternity met also decisively by the doctrine of the descent of Christ into hell, which was acknowledged on all hands, and understood to mean the descent of His human soul. As Tertullian says of Prætos, "Ipse dicit Patrem descendentem in virginem, ipsum ex tā natum, ipsum passum, desire ipsum esse Jesum Christum" (c. 1). No other contemporary works against it have been preserved entire. Arius distinguished between the "Patris". As he who became the man and refused to follow Artemon and Paul of Samosata, who had pronounced Him to be no more than man, yet denied Him to be very God. Thence, then, was the thesis which the first council of Nicaea resolved on maintaining under anathema, and which all the earlier post-Nicene fathers defended with their pens and lives, beginning with St. Athanasius. It is to his works, indeed almost exclusively, that we must go for a refutation of Arianism proper. St. Hilary supplies historical facts: in some cases of great value. St. Gregory Nazianzen, servid oralatio; St. Cyril of Alexandria, or three tracts; and the five books of St. Basil against Eunomius expose the impious tenets of the party called Anomoeans. But of other then renowned controversyists and champions of orthodoxy, Hosius of Cordova, Alexander of Alexandria, Eustathius of Antioch, Eusebius of Vercelli, Meletius, and Paulinus, only fragments or letters remain. Eusebius the historian left a work against Marcellus, bishop of Ancyræa, who was thought, in opposing Arianism, to have fallen into Sabellianism. Of his own orthodoxy the truest account seems to be, that he was no follower of Arius any more than of St. Athanasius. Failing in their attacks on the Second Person in the Trinity, but unable to recover their equilibrium, a portion of the semi-Arians, headed by Macedonius, patriarch of Constantinople, called in question the Godhead of the Third. This caused a further addition to the creed on that head, which, though put into form, and accepted at Constantinople, was first promulgated at Chalcedon. I didymus of Alexandria, St. Basil, and St. Ambrose, left treatises on the subject, but they went no deeper than to the point which had been assailed, leaving a wide field open to St. Augustine, and the theologians of Charlemagne.

The manner of the Incarnation—in other words, how God became man—was the latest point controverted. Apollinarius, father and son, started the idea that the Word had been made flesh without assuming a human soul. Nestorius, that He had assumed not merely soul and body, but a human person. Eutyches, that He had united both natures in His own Person, but that after their union they were no longer two. Monothelism, that there were no longer two wills. It was easy to see that all these positions were met by the simple words of the creed "was made man," in their full, obvious, and ascribing acceptance. As St. Augustine puts it: "Qui temporali dispensationi multis modis haec dictavit haeretici. Sed si quis tenerius catholico fideum, ut toto hominem credat a Verbo Dei esse suceptum: id est, corpus, animam, spiritum—satis contra illos munitus est" . . . (De Fide et Smyth, § 8). Nevertheless each point was contested and had to be made good in succession. St. Athanasius himself wrote two books against the Apollinarians. They were himself. He began life with the Manicheans, whose errors he espoused subsequently with much force. He was a semi-Pelagian on some points himself, till he commenced refuting Pelagius; and had he lived on till the schism of the Eastern and Western churches had become fact, he would have found his famous argument against the Donatists—Securus judicat orbit terrarum—crumble away under his feet.

Dogmatism was not the creation of St. Augustine: yet neither is his dogmatic tone different from his with whom it originated, as we shall see. In the work of the renowned Origen, de Principiis, we have the earliest specimen of a dogmatic work on revealed truth in the Christian church; and these are the lines on which it was constructed, unless Rufinus misrepresents them: \textit{Sicut enim multis apud Graecos et barbaros pollicitibus virtutem, desivimus apud omnes eas quasere, qui eam falsis opinionibus asserantem, postestquam credidimus Filium Dei esse Christianum, et ab ipso nobis hanc descendam esse nec ullam quasen qui cum multis sint, qui putant sentire quse Christi sunt, et nonnulli eorum diversa a prioribus sentiant: servetur vero ecclesiastica praedicatio per successionis ordinem ab apostolis tradita, et usque ad praeceps in ecclesia permanens: illa sola credenda est veritas, quae in nuce ab ecclesiastica apostolica tradita.}\ (§ 2). Within these limits, and no further, he conceived himself at liberty to speculate, or form conclusions of his own. Whether he never exceeded these limits is another question. But the ground was untrod, and he was a pioneer of such amazing insight and energy, that, right or wrong, he has been a luminous beacon in each case for all who followed. But it was only by degrees that any fresh advance was made. Credos had to be got into shape before they could be systematically expanded. This, in reality, was the earliest shape which dogmatism assumed in the church; and of this, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his fourth and fifth letters to the bishops of Egypt, was the first, but one of the best specimens we possess. The commentary now given to Rufinus is another of the same kind. Many such tracts or sermons occur among the works of St. Augustine; and after his time it became a literature. Expositions of faith were published by St. Athanasius and St. Cyril, and there are letters of each highly prized for their dogmatic character, particularly the third letter of the latter to Nesi-torius, which, with the letter of St. Leo to Flavian, were received in the definition of the fourth council as authoritative exponents of the Incarnation. Two longer treatises by St. Cyril,—\textit{On the Holy and Essential Trinity}, the second entitled \textit{The Treasury}—should not be passed over here; nor, again, the twelve books, \textit{On the Trinity}, by St. Hilary, nor, again, the \textit{Anacrasis} of St. Epiphanius, with the seven books, \textit{On the Incarnation}, by St. John Cassian, written at the request of St. Leo.

But the master-piece by far of this period in dogmatism was the great work of St. Augustine on the Trinity, and never perhaps was a deep subject handled more delicately or expounded more luminously, or each conclusion of the author respecting it expressed with more modesty and reserve. This is his temper at start-

inspired by his. St. Augustine moreover, in his third book Upon Christian Doctrine, gives his own rules for interpreting Scripture, which he comes to that point; and in mentioning the rules of Tiberiusus the Donatist afterwards with approbation, shows that he was unacquainted with any biblical authority to whom he could refer with more confidence. No doubt in their sermons, and devotional works generally, the Fathers expatiate with a freedom that has provoked criticism, on the mystical sense; but this is just the case where the appeal to it is seldom otherwise than edifying, and arguing from it cannot mislead. So far as their specifications are concerned there is certainly no disproportionate prominence given to the mystical sense, nor any neglect shown for the literal, by SS. Jerome, Chrysostom, and Cyril; Theodoret and Theophylyact, who pass for the best patristic commentators on the Old and New Testaments. St. Augustine cannot be called a commentator in the ordinary sense of the word; nor his noble, and for all devotional purposing, that work upon the Psalms, a commentary. The Morala of St. Gregory the Great on the book of Job is another of the same kind. But, as interpreters of Scripture, we should in all fairness judge the Fathers from their commentaries rather than from their sermons, or works written for spiritual instruction. Again, to estimate their commentaries aright, we must compare them, not with the accumulated wealth of ages in modern times, but with Ammonius upon Aristotle, Servius upon Virgil, the expositors in general upon the classics, their contemporaries. It must be conceded, indeed, at stressing their subject-matter matters to their advantage; still it would have covered them with confusion, had they proved unequal to it. Taking them as they stand, it will hardly be denied that the commentaries of the Fathers on the Scriptures in general are better reading than ordinary scholia, and St. Chrysostom on the Psalms Exposition than Servius on the Aeneid. Several complications from the Fathers, however, must not be considered their equivalents in this comparison.

Letters, again, form another important branch of patristic literature, and here likewise, though we have the letters of Cicerio and others of the Augustinian charge that the Fathers may fairly be said to hold their own. The papal neglects, to begin with alone, comprising a multitudinous as well as continuous correspondence without a break, spread over at least fifteen centuries, have no parallel either in ancient or modern times, among royal, scientific, or ordinary correspondence; nor in the archives of any kingdom whatsoever. Of mere Fathers, we have: 270 genuine letters from or to St. Augustine, 428 of St. Basil, 242 of St. Gregory Nazianzen, 150 of St. Jerome, 50 of St. Paulinus of Nola, 147 of Apollinaris Sidonius, 225 of St. Chrysostom, 146 of Theodoret, to name no more, all teeming with information on questions, and feelings, and customs of the day; edifying alike for the high sentiment and aspiration they breathe, and for the spiritual instruction, no less than the theological and ecclesiastical lore with which they abound. It is of this branch that the author says: "I might perhaps have made another, and a very interesting branch of the prose Christian literature, the epistolary." Those desiring some choice specimens of it ready to hand may find them in the exquisitely rendered extracts from letters of St. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Basil, for the most part in the Church of the Fathers, by Dr. Newman. But the letters that passed between St. Jerome and St. Augustine (Ep. xxviii, xli, lxiii—lxiv, lxv—lxvi.ii) may well be read for the noble passage of controversy they exhibit between two great men; the letters of St. Jerome to Sunnia and Fretela (Ep. civ.) for its biblical criticism; to Evagrius (Ep. cxiv.) for remarks on ecclesiastical orders; of Paula and Eustochium to Marcella, preserved among his letters (Ep. xlv.) for its notices of the Holy Land at that date. Several of the letters of St. Paulinus of Nola possess interest, as being written in the joint names of husband and wife—Paulinus et Thesaria—and that husband a bishop or priest at least, and addressed in three cases to St. Augustine (Ep. iv, vi, xiv); another (Ep. I.) asks his help in interpreting Scripture.

Several of the letters of Apollinaris Sidonius are addressed 'domino papae Lupo salutem'; viz. to St. Lupus, bishop of Troyes, who accompanied St. Germanus from France to aid the bishops of Britain in their struggle with Pelagianism. Other letters from him to other bishops are couched in the same style, proving its application to bishops in general to have been in constant use then. Of the twelve books called Variae by Cassiodorus, consisting for the most part of letters, edicts, and rescripts, it has already been observed in this work (art. Cassiodorus) that "apart from the study of those pages, it is hardly possible to obtain a true knowledge of the Italy of the 6th century."

In sermons, we have none to compare with the Fathers, but those who followed in their wake. It is a species of literature that begun with Christianity, and is peculiar to it; and therefore cannot be criticized by comparison with other styles, though for mere eloquence it is surpassed by none. Neither Ciceron nor Demosthenes ever produced greater, or more elevated, or more lasting effects on their hearers than St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine, for instance. Suidas, says that St. John Chrysostom had a longest jest, or edict, was of more force than the longest jest or edict of the Nile. Photius credits him with the purest language, splendid imagery, varied matter, and graceful anecdotades without end. His twenty-two sermons, delivered when he was a priest at Antioch, on the occasion of a sedition in which the people threw down and trampled upon the statues of Theodotius and the empress Flacilla, in the absence of his bishop, who went to intercede for the people, while he preached repentance to them, are models of the noblest cast. As the last of them was preached, the bishop returned with full pardon for all. Of St. Augustine, Possidius, his biographer and disciple, says that he was no sooner ordained priest than he was permitted to preach by his bishop, Valerian, even when he was present himself, a thing wholly without precedent in Africa till then. His sermons were so popular, that many practiced committing them to memory while they were preached; others emulated the work in them. They are divided by his Benedictine editors into four classes:—1. On the

Sciences of the Old and New Testaments; 2. On the seasons; 3. On the saints; 4. On miscellaneous subjects. Nothing is more wonderful in them than his handling of types and his power of developing and applying them. Last this was for edification, solely, not argument; nor can he be charged with unmindfulness of the letter in expounding Scripture. Speaking of his own success in preaching down the brutal fights that had long been a national custom in Mauritiania, he says, "Non tamen egiisse aliquid me ostendente, sed unum etiam acclamationes, sed cum flentes viderem" (De Doct. Christiana) with a touch of true genius. Some of his sermons must have occupied nearly two hours in delivery; but to judge from other extant specimens, these must have been exceptional. All the 154 sermons of St. Peter Chrysologus, whose surname bespeaks his eloquence, were of a much shorter type, and besides them, 21 of St. Gaudentius, 21 of St. Celarius of Arles, and 96 of St. Leo. But of this shorter type, the homilies of St. Gregory the Great on Ezekiel and on the Gospels are perhaps the most striking.

Of much value were the works among the Fathers, and hynmology may be properly called their creation. Of these St. Gregory Nazianzen wrote verse with facility, and St. Paulinus with elegance. Prudentius "was especially the poet of dogs," says Osnabrum: but the attempts of Juvenal and Dacitus, Sedulius and Victorinus to turn the homilies into literary verses into drivel must be pronounced failures: though they cleared the ground for Milton and Klopstock. St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, and Venantius Fortunatus composed many beautiful hymns. Boethius, author of the Consolatio Philosophiae, was a true philosopher; Cassiodorus, author of the twelve books of Variae, a man of letters and cultivated taste. To Dionysius Exiguus we owe the study of canon law in the West, and the custom of dating from the Christian era. The work of St. Isidore of Seville On Etymology, in twenty books, is replete with curious facts and ancient lore. The six books on music by St. Augustine, the only remaining specimen of a series brought out by him on the arts then taught, produced a number of kindred treatises by later writers of less note.

Two more classes of works remain to be noticed: historical and spiritual.

1. Ecclesiastical history commenced in the 2nd century with Hegesippus, of whose work in five books, now unfortunately lost, Eusebius speaks in terms of high praise (E. H. iv. 8); the same praise being unquestionably due to his own in ten. Putting its style on one side, which is turgid at times, it must, for the information it contains, and the truthfulness with which it has been composed, be pronounced of the same value to us, as the nine books of Eusebius are to the ancient world. But for his opposition to St. Athanasius, nobody would have thought of disputing his orthodoxy; of his devotion to the Christian religion there can be no question, as long as his Praeparatio and Demonstratio remain to speak for themselves. His Chronicon opened a new era in historical writing, and succeeding ages. But of ecclesiastical historians it is impossible to speak, without noticing the fact, that a reputation for orthodoxy has seldom figured among their strong points. So great, the success of Eusebius, was a profound Nazianzen; Theodoret took fierce part against St. Cyril; Philostorgius was at least a semi-Arian; neither Sozomen nor Evagrius rank high on other grounds; Sulpicius Severus has alone never been discredited as a writer or as a Christian, and though his is but an abridgment, it contains some facts of importance, which, according to V. Guizot, "are not found elsewhere. History, less than science, predisposes men to regard views in matters of faith, both shaping their estimate of the unseen world by the facts of the seen.

Of works of narrow compass St. Optatus has given us a fair account of the Donatists; Liberatus, of the Nestorians and Eutychians; St. Epiphanius and Philostorgus, of heretics in general, down to their own times. Later, the history of kings and of empires, of wars and of peoples, came to be written by Christians exclusively, and in most cases, down to the 16th century, by persons in holy orders. Nor is it out of place to observe, before quitting the branch, that the entire literature of pre-Christian times must have been irrecoverably lost; if, indeed, kind in succeeding ages, had it not been for Christian scribes, among whom Pamphilus, the friend of Eusebius the historian, was perhaps the earliest and most indefatigable; so early MS. of any portion of it being now extant, but what has been the work of their hands. (Comp. Del. Chr. Antil. L. xxvii, i. 15.)

2. Of spiritual treatises, if so few have come down to us from those times, one reason is because they were, to begin with, oral. All instruction was oral at first. Numbers had delivered catechetical lectures before St. Cyril; but these were the first to be taken down. And must have been deeply devotional, to judge from his. We have fragmentary speciments elsewhere in the ancient service-books. But the Confession of St. Augustine created a new flood of spiritual works, with material for meditation and self-examination in the closet. Witness the collection of kindred pieces that formerly claimed him as their author, in the appendix to the sixth vol. of the Benedictional of his works (p. 74 et seq.). The six books of St. Chrysostom On the Precepts; the four books of Dialogues by St. Gregory the Great, and his work On the Pastoral Care, were soon in the hands of all who could read. Each of the two last were translated into Greek and Angl-Saxon, and the former of them into Arabic as well. Martyrologies and lives of the saints formed another class of works expressly written for edification, but meant as little to be measured by their historical exactness, as sermons by their conformity with biblical criticism or with logical rule. It is a characteristic of all biographies that they abound with anecdotes, whose value rests on no better evidence than hearsay. Such, then, is a compressed outline of a literature, which has no doubt its faults as well as its shortcomings, but, in addition, recommendations which it would not be easy to parallel. First, it is a literature on which character is impressed conspicuously throughout, whose whole tone is spiritual and holy, and whose object is to promote the civilization of man through religion. Imperfections of style it may have; imperfect knowledge it may betray; defects of temper it may at times be led into; still, their daughter of the emperor Maximian Heracleius by Eutropia, and second wife of Constantine the Great. She was born at Byzantium, married in 307, and soon after her marriage she and her husband a great service in revealing her father's plot against his life. She was the mother of six children, three sons, afterwards emperors: Constantius, b. 312, Constantius, b. 317, and Constantine, b. 320; and three daughters:

Constantia, named Augusta by her father, and married first to Hanzahil, king of Pontus, and then to Gallus Caesar; Constantia, said to have been the foundress of St. Agnes at Rome, and to have professed virginity; and Helena, wife of the emperor Julian.
(Ducange, Fam. Byzant. p. 47.)

She was put to death by her husband, probably in 326, under very doubtful circumstances:
see the article on CONSTANTINE, Vol. I, p. 630.

FAUSTA (3), a virgin and martyr with Evilasius at Cyzicus, under Galerius, A.D. 305.
She was the daughter of rich parents, who, having carefully instructed her in the Christian faith, left her name at thirteen. Becoming famous for her religious activity she was reported to the emperor, who sent his Primus Falastii, Evilasius, to torture her.
Converted by her constancy and arguments she was in turn tortured by the propraetor Maximinus.
Some of the Martyrologists, as Rabanus and Symeon Metaphrastes, hold this last as a third martyr, converted by the sufferings of the other two.
Bede, Usuardus, Rabanus, Notkerus, and Mart. H. E. commemorate them on Sept. 20. Rabanus and Notkerus commemorate them at Jan. 7 as well.
(Men. Basil. at Fob. 6.) The acts are extant in Greek and Latin. (Surius, vita SS. I. 863; Acta SS. Bull. Sep. vi. 144.) They are so full of legend that Tillemont's sentence, "nullus infest illius veri species," does not seem too severe.
(Tillemont, Men. tom. v. p. 61.)

FAUSTIANUS (FAUSTINIANUS), sixth bishop of Dax, succeeding Liberius A.D. 584.
He was nominated to the episcopate by the pretender Gundobald. Bertram, of Bordeaux, at that time the metropolis of Dax, excused himself, mistrusting the consequences, and ordered Palladius of Saints to consecrate him. Orestes, bishop of Bazas, was also present, though he afterwards denied it before the king. But Gundobald being soon afterwards killed, Guntram assembled the second council of Macon, A.D. 585, at which Faustianus was deposed, but Bertram, Orestes, and Palladius, who were responsible for his consecration, were ordered to support him by turns and pay him a hundred pieces of gold a year.
In spite of his deposition he appears to have subscribed the synod. He was succeeded by Nicetius, whom Chilperic had nominated for the bishopric at the time of the usurpation.

pregnant at the time of his death, and the child afterwards born, Flavia Maxima Constantia, became the wife of the emperor Gratian. (Amn. xxi. 15, § 6.) [M. F. A.]

FAUSTINA (2), wife of Julianus, a wealthy man living in Dalmatia at the beginning of the 5th century, and friend of St. Jerome, whose letter to him (118, ed. Vall.) was written after his wife's death. [W. H. F.]

FAUSTIANUS (3), legendary father of CLEMENS ROMANUS (Clem. Recog. ix. 33). In the Clementine Homilies (xiv. 8) the name of the father is given as Faustus, and Faustianus is that of one of Clement's brothers. [G. S.]

FAUSTIANUS (3) (FAUSTINUS), bishop of Bononia (Bologna), c. A.D. 312, and successor of St. Zama. It seems uncertain whether he immediately succeeded St. Zama, or whether the see had remained vacant during the persecution of Diocletian. He died probably c. A.D. 330, and was succeeded by St. Basilius. (Boll. Acta SS. 26 Feb. iii. 639; Ugghelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 8; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 446.) [B. S. G.]

FAUSTIANUS (6), one of the sixty-one bishops of Numidia, who met in council at Mileum, Milevis, or Mereum ("Milah," Shaw, p. 633), A.D. 416, and joined in an address to pope Innocent I. against the errors of Celestius and Pelagius. (Aug. Ep. 176.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTIANUS (7), one of the bishops who met in council at Carthage, A.D. 416, and joined in an address to pope Innocent I. concerning Pelagius and Celestius. Probably the same as the preceding. (Aug. Ep. 175.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTIANUS (8), bishop of Utica; present at the council held at Carthage by bishop Boniface, A.D. 525. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 363; Mansi, viii. 647.) [L. D.]

FAUSTIANUS (9), bishop of Dax. [FAUSTIANUS.]

FAUSTINUS, a name sometimes interchanged with Faustus. [FAUSTIANUS.]

FAUSTINUS (1), legendary brother of CLEMENS ROMANUS (Clem. Recog. ix. 35; Clem. Hom. xiv. 9). [G. S.]

FAUSTINUS (2) (Cyp. Ep. 57, A.D. 252), African bishop, present at the second synod of Carthage under Cyprian, De Pace. He does not appear in any subsequent council. [E. W. B.]

FAUSTINUS (4), bishop of Tuburbo, or Tuburbo, a small, and as St. Augustine remarks, insignificant town of proconsular Africa; condemned as a traditor by the Donatists without inquiry, A.D. 312, but not further proceeded. (Aug. ad Don. post. coll. 22, 38, vol. ix. p. 518; Tillemont, 8, vol. vi. p. 18.) A Faustus bishop of Tuburbo was present at the Council of Arles, A.D. 314 (Routh, R. S. iv. 513, 2nd ed.; Mansi. ii. 477 n.), and is perhaps the same person. [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (5), bishop of Bononia (Bologna). [FAUSTIANUS (2).]

FAUSTINUS (6), the seventh known bishop of Iconium, and metropolitan (Le Quien, Reg. Chrest. i. 1068), coming between Eusilius (FRAU- LIUS I) and Joannes I. St. Basil, writing in 373 (ep. 138, al. 8) mentions his having been invited to Iconium to ordain a successor to Faustinus, who was dead. In 374 Boil (ep. 161, al. 393) complimented John's successor Amphiloctius with an allusion to I Sam. i. 3, "the asses are lost (πῶνα ἀπόλαυσαν) that Israel may have a king," insinuating that Faustinus and John were men of dull parts. The reading of ἐξηγητός for πῶνα (which would imply that they belonged to the Aram party) is not accepted. [E. H.]

FAUSTINUS (7), seventh, or perhaps ninth, bishop of Brixia (Brescia), succeeding Ursus c. A.D. 350. He is believed to have written the Acts of St. Apollinarius, and of SS. Faustus and Jovita the martyrs (Feb. 15). He died c. 375, and was succeeded by St. Philastrius. (Ammm. 16 Feb. ii. 886; Ugghelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 729; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xi. 556.) [K. S. G.]

FAUSTINUS (8), Donatist bishop of Hippo Regius, about A.D. 380; mentioned by St. Augustin as having recommended that because there were few Catholics in Hippo no one should bake bread for them. In one case a baker vowed that the tenant of a Catholic desecrated, threw away unbaked the bread intended for his landlord, and refused all communication with him. (Aug. c. Petil. ii. 84, 184; Tillemont, 37, vol. vi. p. 140.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (12), Donatist bishop of Tamabaja, in Byzacena; present at the preceding. (M. V. D. 447.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (13), Donatist bishop of Naxos, in Byzacene; present as the preceding. (M. V. D. p. 467.)

FAUSTINUS (14), bishop of Silla, in Numidia; present as the preceding. (M. V. D. p. 466.)

FAUSTINUS (15), the name of two bishops present at the council of Milevis, or Mileum, A.D. 416. But the name of one of them is also given as SAINUS. (Aug. Ep. 176.)

FAUSTINUS (16), perhaps a bishop, to whom are ascribed (l.) a homily On the Passion, wherein the sufferings of Abel, Isaac, and Jonah are put forth as types of the passion of Jesus Christ (Patrol. Lat. lxx. 407); (ii.) a fragment of a sermon justifying the addition of a week to the Lent fast, preserved in the book of Aeneas bishop of Paris, Against the Greeks, cap. 176. (Migne, Patrol. Lat. cxxi. 742); (iii.) an exhortation to use this present world in such a manner as to gain a better one, printed among the sermons of Eusebius Emessin. under the title, Sermo V. exhortatorius, Sancti Faustinii Episcopi (La Bigne, Bibl. Patr. vi. 679). These compositions have been generally attributed to Faustinus bishop of Riez, but as Ceillier states (Ant. Sacr. x. 435-8) they differ in style, and are probably to be attributed to a bishop of the 5th century otherwise unknown. As to the Sermo in Kalendia Januaris, which has been ascribed to the same writer, see No. 19.

FAUSTINUS (17), twelfth bishop of Le Puy, deposing St. Armentarius or Hermentarius, and followed by Fortius or Fortius in the latter half of the 5th century. Sidonius Apollinaris speaks of a bishop Faustinus in friendly terms, who may perhaps be identical with him. (Sid. Apoll. lib. iv. Epist. 6. Migne, Patr. Lat. viii. 509; Gall. Christ. ii. 689.)

FAUSTINUS (18), bishop of Girba, a town situated on an island near the lesser Syrtis, included in the Tripoli- zone of the African province, and by which it was distinguished from Girba in the proconsular province; one of the Catholic bishops banished by Hunneric after the conference with the Arians at Carthage, A.D. 484. (Norcelli, Africa Christ. i. 171; Notitia in Victor. Vit. 60, Migne, Patr. Lat. viii.)

FAUSTINUS (19), fifteenth bishop of Noyon and Tourai, succeeding St. Medardus and followed by Gundulfus, about the middle of the 6th century. The Bollandists printed a sermon entitled Episcopi Faustinii Sermo in Kalendia Januaris, drawn from the archives of the monastery of Aquiscuitum, and Le Cointe ascribes it to this bishop. It is directed against some Satamalian rites which apparently had survived from pagan times, and which were joined in by Christians as well as heathens; and it reminds the people that the first day of the year is a long standing custom a fast-day. (Gall. Christ. ii. 581; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franco, an. 345, vii. tom. i. 685-690; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 2.)

council of Toledo, which ratified the translation of Felix, formerly of Seville, to the see of Toledo [Felix (153)]. At the time of this translation of Felix, Faustinus was metropolitan of Braga, and was thence transferred to Seville by Egica. He signis the Acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo, and according to Roderic of Toledo (lib. iii. cap. 13, apud Schott, Hisp. Ill. iv. 144) was present at the seventeenth council, A.D. 694 (Exp. Sagr. ix. 228; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 333). (M. A. W.)

FAUSTINUS (21), a presbyter and martyr, with his brother Jovita a deacon, Feb. 15, at Brixia in Italy, under the emperor Hadrian, about the year 120. (Martyr. Vet. Rom. Usuardi, Notker; Euseb. H. E. iv. c. 9.) Their acts, which are full of legendary stories, are said to have been written by Faustinus bishop of Brixia, A.D. 350 (cf. Acta SS. Boll. Feb. ii. 307).

[G. T. B.]

FAUSTINUS (22), Aug. 7; martyr at Milan under Commodus, about A.D. 182 (FAUSTVS, Vet. Rom. Mart.). He was son of a Milanesan Christian, named Philip. Together with his father he was baptized by Cyprian, bishop of Milan, and going in military service he seems to have been called on to discharge some idolatrous ceremony. Upon his refusal he suffered the penalty of military law and obtained the crown of martyrdom. The Bollandists are astonished at Baronius placing his martyrdom under Commodus, while in his Annales he tells us that there was no persecution under this emperor. But many suffered for Christ under the operation of military law even when no general persecution took place. For a Roman soldier there was no freedom of conscience. [F. FUNDANUS.] (Vet. Rom. Mart. Mart. Hieron., Usuardi, Adonis, Notker; Ferrarius, Catalogus SS.)

[G. T. S.]

FAUSTINUS (23), martyr at Foro in the Decian persecution, according to the tabulae ecclesiasticæ quoted by Baronius. (Baron. A. E. ann. 254, 255.)

[G. H.]

FAUSTINUS (24), commemorated Feb. 17, suffered with forty-four others. Baronius conjectures that they suffered at Rome, but their date is not fixed. Ferrarius (Catalogus SS.) tells us that before the correction of the present Roman calendar no mention of them existed therein (cf. Martyr. Hieron., Bede.). [G. T. S.]

FAUSTINUS (25), July 29, martyr at Rome in the Diocletian persecution with Simplicius and Beatriz or Vinator, their sister. He suffered at the seventh milestone on the Via Portuensis. One of the most valuable illustrations of Christian antiquity in De Russi's La Roma Sottoravvis Cristiana, tom. iii., is his account of the cemetery of Generosa, wherein they were buried. Beatriz, having rescued the bodies of the martyrs which had been flung into the Tiber, hastily buried them in the sandpit of one Generosa, a Christian woman, whence the origin of the cemetery; a catacomb, which had long been looked for elsewhere, was accidentally discovered a few years ago. It is approached from a small ruined basilica, dedicated to Faustinus, Simplicius, and Beatriz, and built (it would seem) by pope Damasus in 382. This

FAUSTINUS (26), a presbyter (Cyp. Ep. i. 1, 3). [G. T. S.]

FAUSTINUS (27), a presbyter of Orange at the council of Arles, 314 (Mansi, ii. 476; Routh, Rel. Sac. iv. 303, 312, 2nd ed.). [C. H.]

FAUSTINUS (28), a son of Ambrose's friend Eusebius. It is probable that he is the person to whom Ambrose's letter 39 was written. He had a son of the same name. [EUSEBIUS (133).]

FAUSTINUS (29), catholics, mentioned by Athanasius as inciting the populace to molest Catholic congregations. (Ath. Hist. Aran., ad Monach. § 55 in Opp. par. i. 298.) [C. H.]

FAUSTINUS (30), a Roman, perhaps a presbyter, at the end of the 4th century. He was one of the many who took a strong part in resistance to the Origenistic doctrines then agitating the church. Tranquillus, his brother (either by nature or spiritual relationship), finding him pronounce a very strong judgment on Origen as ‘penitus respuedum,’ wrote to St. Jerome then at Bethlehem, to know the truth. Jerome's answer, which is discriminative and moderate, is written to Faustinus, and forms the sixty-second letter in Vallarsi's edition.

FAUSTINUS (31), a gentleman of Caesarea, whose acquaintance Chrysostom made during his sojourn in that city, on his way to Cæcumen A.D. 404, and from whom he received many kindnesses, to which he refers with warm expressions of gratitude in a letter, announcing his safe arrival at his place of exile (Chrysost., Epist. 84). [K. V.]

FAUSTINUS (32), a layman of Philadelphia, one of those who adjured Quartodecimans opinions and signed the symbolum of Jacobus in 431 (Mansi, iii. 1353 d). [EUTYCHIUS (28).]

FAUSTINUS (33), a Roman presbyter who on the death of Liberius bishop of Rome in September, 369, sided with Ursinus, and soon afterwards was one of the many who suffered exile on his account (e. the edicta in Baronius, Ann. a. a. 369, iii. iv. v.; 371, i. ii. iii.; DAMASK., Vol. i. 783). In the preface to a petition which he and a fellow exile, Marcellinus, presented to the emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, c. A.D. 383, there is an account given both of the schism and of that which led to it, which is so damaging to Damasus personally, as well as to his party and their proceedings, that such writers as Damasus do not scruple to violently impugn its veracity (Libellus Precum, Migne, Patrolog. xiiii. 82; Baron. Ann. a. a. 367, xiv.). But it is fully sustained by the evidence of Ammianus Marcellinus (xviii. 3), and even by that of Socrates (H. E. iv. 29), who in his narrative of what took place transcribes Rufinus (Valesius, note in Socr. u. s.), a contemporary who had ample means of direct information as to the facts.

Both Faustinus and Marcellinus were Lib- erians. Their petition contains, perhaps, the most trustworthy account we possess of that party and of the personal career of Liberius, bishop of Cagliari, with whom it had its origin. It was written at Eleutheropolis in Palestine. The bishop of that see was Turbo, a deacon of his predecessor Eutychius the semi-Arian (Epiphan. Haer. lxiii.; Baronius, u. s. a. 351, xxvii. xcviii.; Gams, Ser. Episc. 453). The exiles bitterly complain of his cruelty both to Liberius, when he was in his power some years previously, and of late to themselves (c. Ep. Conc. Rom. ad Gratian. et Valentin. a.d. 381 (?); Labbe et Cossart, i. 1000; Renouard. Gratian. ib. 1003) and earnestly implore the interposition of the emperors in their behalf. The reply was a rescript addressed by Theodosius to Cynegius, prefect of the East (A.D. 384, Gothofred. Prosopogr. Cod. Theod. a.n.), commanding him to see that they had full liberty, and that the civil authorities protected them from further molestation (Migne, u. s. 106, 107).

About the same time that he and Marcellinus thus appealed to the emperors, Faustinus wrote a work on the Trinity, addressed to Flancus the wife of Theodosius, which was prepared at her request. This work has been strangely ascribed to Gregory the Theoretic bishop of Eliberis (e.g. Baronius, A. E. a. s. 371, civ.; Gams, u. s. 34), and is, no less strangely, still printed as having been addressed to Gallus Placidus (Migne, u. s. 29), notwithstanding that the latter expressly states that it was addressed to Flancus, and that its author was Faustinus (de Str. Eccl. Migne, liviii. 1069). He has also left a confession of faith addressed to Theodosius in reply to some persons who had charged him with Sabellianism (Migne, xiiii. 70).

FAUSTINUS (34), a priest of the monastery of Anastasia Barba, a letter to whom is extant, preserved from Eusebius (Labbe, Bibl. i. 665). But no other testimony is available to shew that the monastery then existed, and the letter is doubtless spurious. (Celliler, Ant. Eccl. viii. 453.)

[FAUSTINUS (35), a penitent who had publicly confessed his sin with tokens of great humility, when St. Nilus wrote to the priest Charde, who was treating him with too severe a discipline, urging gentleness and mercy towards repentant sinners. (Nil. ep. 243, p. 212, Pat. Gr. ixix. 498; a.; Celliler, viii. 222.)

FAUSTUS—BISHOPS

FAUSTUS (3), bishop of Panemotichus in the second Pamphylia (coins of Julia Domna are extant bearing the name of this town), one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Orienta Christ. i. 1051; Mansi, ii. 700.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (4), bishop of Limenes in Pisidia; present at the first Constantinopolitan council, A.D. 381. (Le Quien, Orienta Christ. i. 1051; Mansi, iii. 570.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (6), bishop of Sassana (Sarsina). He succeeded Valerianus a.d. 437, and died c. 459. His successor was Probus. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 485.) [R. S. G.]

FAUSTUS (7), bishop of Apollonia, probably the town of that name in Bithynia, 484. He wrote a letter to Peter the Fuller, of Antioch, concerning the clause that bishop had added to the Trisagion, "Qui crucifixus est propter nos," which Faustus condemns as heretical and blasphemous (Cave, Script. Eccles. I. 457; Mansi, vii. 1127, gives the letter in full). This bishop of Apollonia is not mentioned either in Le Quien's Orienta Christiana, or in Gams's Series Episcoporum. [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (8), bishop of Buriona, a town of uncertain position, mentioned only in connexion with this bishop. Victor Vitensis (de Persecutione Vandali, l. c. xli) cites him as a witness to the miracles wrought at the place where certain martyrs perished during the persecution under Hunneric; "a blind woman received her sight in the bishop's presence." Faustus appears to have died before the persecution under Hunneric, as there is no further mention of him. (Morelli, Africa Christ. i. 110; Migne, Patrol. Lat. lvii. 196.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (9), bishop of Castra Severianum, in the province of Mauretania Caesariensis; one of the Catholic bishops who, after the conference at Carthage with the Arians, was banished by king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Morelli, Africa Christ. i. 130; Notitia in Victor. Vit. 50; Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (10), an orthodox African bishop, banished from his see of Telepte in 484, by Hunneric. Faustus founded a small monastery in this district which became celebrated, from the circumstance that the young procurator, Fabius Fulgentius, had recourse to its founder, when he was first smitten by the desire to enter upon the "religious" life. This was in the year 480. Fulgentius was well known to Faustus (Vita Fulgentii, in Acta SS. et Migne, Patr. Lat. cc. 4-8), who strongly disapproved the motive from a method of life so contrary to all his previous habits. His resolution and courage induced Faustus to grant a brief noviciate to Fulgentius, during which he was put to severe tests. The mother of Fulgentius betook herself to Faustus in a state of frenzy (furibunda), and besought upon him violent reproaches. She loudly bewailed her lot, and clamoured at the gates of the monastery. Faustus did not allow her to see her son, although the latter overheard her bitter ejaculations. Faustus argued that as Fulgentius was born to this severe strain upon his integrity, it was safe to admit him to the brotherhood. It appears that Faustus made no demand upon Fulgentius for his paternal property, which the latter handed over to his mother for the education and advantage of his brother Claudius. Under pressure of persecution, Fulgentius sought separation from Faustus (Fulgentius of Ruspe), who nevertheless exercised a certain authority over him. As Fulgentius for many years manifested intense reluctance to occupy any position of trust and importance, and was tempted to make numerous romantic escapes from the dignities that were thrust upon him, Faustus was appealed to, and he suddenly ordained Fulgentius as presbyter, and commanded him to undertake the duties of both presbyter and abbot (c. 15). His influence over Fulgentius is his principal title to remembrance. [H. R. R.]

FAUSTUS (11), sometimes called Faustus the Breton, from his having been born in Brittany, or (as Tillemont thinks) in Britain, but more generally known as Faustus of Riez (Faustus Riensis, al. Regiensis seu Breganconis) from the name of his see in Provence. He was born towards the close of the 4th century, and died in A.D. 492, or possibly somewhat later.

Authorities. — 1, his own writings, for which see below; 2, the letters of his friend and contemporary, Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. Lib. ix. Ep. 3, 9); 3, Gennadius 1 (Theor. Verorum Catalogus, cap. 65); 4, St. Avitus (Epist. iv.); 5, acts of the third Council of Arles (Concilium Arlesanum, about A.D. 455, and of another council at the same place which may be termed the fourth), held in A.D. 475; also of a Council of Lyons (Lugdunense) said to have been held shortly after that of Arles; 6, a letter of pope Hormisdas, written in A.D. 520, to an African bishop named Possessor, who had consulted him concerning the writings of Faustus. For Nos. 5 and 6 see Labbe's Concilia, tom. ii. pp. 806, 1038 (ed. Parisiis, 1714). For editions of the other authorities cited the reader is referred to their respective names in this Dictionary.

Life. — We are ignorant of the condition of the parents of Faustus, and even of their names. He may have lost his father while he was young, for we only hear of his mother, whose servile piety and striving demeanour made a great impression on all who saw her, insomuch that to be allowed to kiss her was esteemed a favour. She lived to a great age, and saw her son become a bishop. Faustus studied Greek philosophy, but in a Christian spirit. He also mastered the principles of rhetoric, and may possibly have pleased for a time at the bar as an advocate. A brother, named Memorius, appears to have been ordained prior to this period, and to have lived with Faustus during his later career at Riez.

While still youthful (probably about A.D. 426 or a little later), Faustus retired from the world and entered the famous monastery of Lerins (Lerianum), at that time presided over by St. Maximus. Here he became a thorough ascetic, and a great student of Holy Scripture, without, 2 H 2 however, giving up his philosophic pursuits. It was probably at Lerins that he acquired the reputation assigned to him by Gennadius of being an illustrious extempore preacher. He became a presbyter, and about 492 or 493 succeeded Maximus as abbot of Lerins.

His tenure of this office was marked by a keen dispute with his diocesan Theodore, bishop of Frejus, concerning their respective rights. So much scandal was caused by this controversy, that the third council of Arles was convened by Ravennius, bishop of Arles, for the sole purpose of settling it. The decision, which seems to be a kind of compromise, leaves considerable ecclesiastical power in the hands of the abbot. This may be an early instance of encroachment on episcopal authority by a corporate body. But, considering how strongly even the best men may be influenced by the spirit of concord, we are not unjustified, without further evidence, in blaming either side. In such cases men think of the rights of their successors, and consequently a difference between a bishop and the ruling body of a monastery, a college, or a cathedral, is an event which may happen in any age of the church. Of Faustus’ death we have no definite account, a successor named Gratus (cf. Gratius or Gregorius), who was heretical on the union of the two natures in the Person of Christ, belongs also to this period of his life.

The next event of importance in the career of Faustus is his succession in the episcopate of Gaul from St. Maximus, whom he had already succeeded in the abbacy of Lerins. Of the fact there is no question, but its date is extremely uncertain. Baronius (followed by Ramsay in Smith’s Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography) places it as late as A.D. 472; but Tillemont (Met. Eccles. tome vi. p. 775) makes an ingenious case against so late a date as this, and is inclined to place it at least, as early as 462, or even in 456. Happily the vagueness of the chronology does not in this case seriously affect the history. There is no question but that Faustus continued as bishop the stern self-discipline which he had practised as monk and abbot. He often retired to Lerins with a view of inspecting the observance of his monastic regimen, and became known throughout his diocese, and beyond its bounds, not only as a striking preacher, but also as one who gave both temporal and spiritual succour to the sick, both in body and mind. He seems, however, to have taken a somewhat stern view on the subject of late repentence, like that so prevalent, at an earlier period in the church of North Africa. In the councils of Arles and of Lyons above-named a presbyter named Lucidus, accused of having taught falsity through misunderstanding the writings of Augustine (ex libris Sancti Augustini male intellectus), was censured, and induced to make a retraction. The signatures of eleven bishops were admitted, according to the report given us by Faustus, to his letter against Lucidus; and Leontius, bishop of Arles, invited Faustus to compose a treatise on the subject of grace and free choice. (The case of Lucidus is thought of sufficient importance to be noticed by Bähr in his Dogm. der kath. dogmatik, tom. i. lib. ix. cap. 2, § 2; and also by Diblenger, in his Church History, vol. ii. chap. 4, § 2.)

We next find Faustus mixed up in secular affairs, inasmuch as he appears from Sidonius to have had some share in bringing about that treaty, concluded in A.D. 475 between the emperor Næpus and Euric, king of the Visigords, which Tillemont and Gibbon agree in regarding as discreditable to the Roman empire. It certainly wrested Auvergne and subsequently Provence from the hands of an orthodox sovereign, and threw them into those of an Arian one. This result was an unfortunate one for Faustus. About A.D. 491 he was banished from his see, in all probability in consequence of his writings against Arianism. Kind and powerful friends supported him during his exile, which he bore, though suffering from illness, with fortitude and dignity. His banishment is naturally attributed to king Euric, on whose death, in A.D. 483, Faustus was enabled to return to Riez. His life, as has been remarked, was prolonged until at least A.D. 495, possibly until some years later. Of his character it is impossible to speak without first considering his publications.

Writings.—These have not come down to us in a complete and satisfactory condition. The ill-repute of the Arians and their association with the pagans probably much lessened their chance of being carefully edited. If, for reasons to be mentioned presently, they have in some quarters been rather over-censured, it must be owned that there is nothing extant from the pen of Faustus of Riez to justify the extravagant encomiums lavished on their style and matter by his friend Sidonius Apollinaris. The following are still accessible:

1. Professio Fidei, contra eos, qui per idem Dei Voluntatem alios dicitur ad Vitam autri alios in Mortem deprimunt: hinc Solum con Gentibus asservant, inde Liberum arbitrium cum Manichesum negant. (Bibliotheca Maxima Patrum Lugduni, A.D. 1677, p. 523.)

This treatise is addressed to the then bishop of Arles, bestissimi ac reverendissimi Leontii Papae. (Leontius.) Faustus opens it with a severe attack on the teaching of Pelagius as heretical, but proceeds to express a fear of the opposite extreme, of such a denial of man’s power as a new augury, as would virtually amount to fatalism.

2. Epistulae Fausti Episcopi ad Lucum Presbyterum (ibid.). This letter, to which reference has already been made, is similar in tone to the preceding, but rather fiercer in its language. Faustus here, too, anathematizes the error of the Pelagians; but he also says a few words to any one who shall have declared that the vessel of wrath cannot arise so as to become a vessel for honour; or that Christ did not die for all men, or willeth not that all should be saved, or to any one (it seems desirable here to give the author’s own wording) “qui dixit illam qui perit, non esse suam pro se posset, et de baptizato, vel de illius sUltis pagos, quos credere putavit et noluit.”

3. De Gratia Dei et Humanae Meritum libri Arbitrio Libri II. (ibid. p. 525.) The first book of this treatise is like an expansion of No. 1. After again censuring Pelagius, the writer argues strongly on behalf of the need of supernatural co-operation with the Divine aid. Towards the close of the first book, and still more emphatically in the second, he gives his interpretation of some of those passages of Holy Scripture (as e.g. Exodus iv. 21, vii. 13; Romans ii. 11-20), which make most strongly for Arianism. This is the part where Faustus is most extreme and least successful. The idea of an antinomy, of the acceptance of two apparent contradictions, which in this life must remain unharmonized, is a comparatively recent one, though we find it in the writings of Bossuet. But it had not dawned upon the mind of the 5th century, that of the 16th, and many passages in this book resemble the writings of a much later age, and might almost be supposed to have come from the pen of some Armenian controversialist in the age of the synod of Dort. In cap. x. of this second book, which has for its title "Gentes Deum Naturaliter Sumus," Faustus calls attention to the language of Daniel towards Nebuchadnezzar, and his censure of Belshazzar, as assuming heathen recognition of God (Dan. iv. and v.). He also appeals for the same purpose to the first chapter of Isaiah, to the repetitiveness of the Ninevites (Isa. xiv.); and he even cites Jeremiah (viii. 7-10). In this chapter the writer anticipates a sermon by bishop Horsley to the same effect. Perhaps the famous expression in the apology of Tertullian, O testimonia animae salutaris Christianae, and the language of St. Justin Martyr, St. Clement of Alexandria, and some other fathers, might be considered to favour the view of heathendom here taken by Faustus.

4. Fausti Rheginiae Episcopi ad Monochos Sermo.—The title seems privata facie to indicate a publication subsequent to the author's elevation to the episcopate. But it may, of course, have been written at an earlier date, as just as it is e.g. common among ourselves to speak of the works of archbishop Leighton, although most of that prelate's writings are prior, in point of date, to his consecration as bishop.

The tone of this short letter resembles that of the author's other writings. He refers to excommunicating a terrible weapon, only to be used in the last resort. It is said and to monks go back to the world, especially if, after doing so, they retain their monastic dress. The lower creation sets a better example. "Aves ipsae diligent nidos suos. Amant ferae locum quibus extranea sunt." As usual, he is energetic in his appeals to the human element in religion. "Ut jejun. Resit the devil. Cherish all graces, especially obedience and humility." "Quanto nos anserim in studio, tante illo apnont adjuvatum se quo nos appenderimus ad dilectissime tante addam ad gloriam. Qui iubet, abere illud." With this admonition may be classed Sermones secund Monachos, which certainly seem to have been addressed to the community of Lerins, while Faustus presided over it. (These are all given in the Patr. Bibl. Max. ubi supra pp. 545-7; also by Martene and Durandus in their Scriptor. et Monument. ampliss. Collect. tom. ix. p. 145, Paris, 1733; by Brockel, Codex Regum, append. p. 469. Ang. Vind. 1759; and by Bunsen, Thevetius Monumentorum, tom. i. p. 330. Amst. 1725.)

5. Responsum ad objecta quasdam de Ratione Fidei Catholicae.—This is an epistle consisting of two portions so distinct from each other, that several critics have, with Grauwitz, regarded them as separate treaties. The former part is a brief statement of the case against Arianism. It explains the distinction between Persona and Nature in reference to our Lord's Incarnation, and appears to be addressed to an orthodox, but perplexed friend, whom the author treats as a superior. The second portion is metaphysical, and discusses the nature of the soul, which Faustus seems to pronounce material. Claudius Mamertus, in his De Statu Animae, wrote against Faustus on this point. It is, however, possible that Faustus may not have meant more than to draw a marked distinction between the Creator and the creature; arguing, as he does, nihil credendum incorporum praeceptor Divinum. (This is given in the Patr. Bibl. Max. and has also been published in the collection of ancient French ecclesiastical writers edited by P. Pittho, Paris, 1556.)

6. Homilia de S. Maximino Laudibus.—This eulogy of the person, whom Faustus twice succeeded, has been, by a singular mistake, ascribed to Eusebius of Emesa. [EUSEBIUS EMESIENS.] But this Eusebius died about A.D. 360, a century before the date of Faustus, and before the existence of the famous monastery of Lerins. (It is given in another patristic collection, the Bibl. Magn. Patr. published at Cologne in 1618, tom. v. pt. 1.)

7. Epistles. (These, to the number of nineteen, are also given in the collection just named [ibid. xx. part v.], and a selection is also to be found in the Lyons Patr. Bibl. Max. cited throughout this notice.) That to Lucidus has already been described. The one addressed to Gratianus given by H. Canisius (in his Antiquae Lectiones, tom. v. and reproduced by Bunsen ubi supra) has been already mentioned. Cunniades describes Gratianus as a Nestorian, but his errors, apparently resulting rather from ignorance than willfulness, seem more akin to those of Eutyches. The other epistles of Faustus touch upon problems of metaphysics and theology, but do not make any important additions to our knowledge of their author.

Taking Faustus of Riez as an ecclesiastic and as a writer, we have before us this phenomenon. Here is a man of unimpeachably good character; of an earnest, active, ascetic life; orthodox on the central doctrine of the Christian faith, and even suffering exile for it as a confessor; but stigmatized as a semi-Pelagian, and consequently by many authorities, both ancient and modern, denied the title of saint. But his own flock at Riez, deeply moved by his life and preaching, and warmly attached to his memory, insisted on giving him at least a local canonization. To them he was Sanctus Faustus Rienensis; they erected a basilica, dedicated in his name, and kept Jan. 18 as the anniversary of his festival.

The decision of this question will depend upon the verdict passed by the student on the school to which Faustus belonged. [v. SEMI-PELAGIANISM.] In the case of Arianism it is possible to answer with an emphatic affirmative or negative to the really essential question put by Arius, viz. is the Redeemer, or is he not, only a creature? But Pelagianism and semi-Pelagianism involve questions of degree, and cannot be thus trenchantly stated. The excellent life of Faustus does not prove (no more than that of Pelagius himself) that he may not have written some dangerous, if not absolutely heretical, statements. concerning man's free agency. But the following considerations also seem to deserve attention.

If St. Augustine was—as so many now believe—betrayed by his opposition to Pelagius into some extravagances, the reaction in Southern Gaul must be in part ascribed to the influence of this extreme tendency. In the Italy of the 5th and 6th centuries the weight of Augustine's name and that of his followers, St. Hilary and St. Prosper, was so great, that those who refused entire acquiescence in their views were unfavourably regarded at Rome. In a later day much of the learning of the French fell into the hands of decided Jansenists, such as the editors of the Lyons Bibliotheca Patrum, Natalis Alexander, and Tilllemont. The Jansenist school has so many claims upon our admiration and respect that in some quarters it seems to be assumed that its decisions on all such questions are final. This, however, can hardly prove to be the ultimate verdict of impartial history. The apologies made by learned Jesuits, such as Sirmond, on behalf of Faustus, may be somewhat viewed with suspicion, as coming from a partial source; but it is hardly possible to deny that the account given by Tilllemont is much more strongly imbued with partisanship and a disposition in pejus interpretari. Baronius reminds his readers that Faustus wrote before the date of the second Council of Orange, presided over by St. Caesarius [CAESARIUS], (which did so much to lull the disputes on predestination), and rather lean towards allowing the citizens of Riez to have their way, and continue their homage to his memory. "Maneat igitur Fausto integra ura sua, nec ex nostris scriptis sentiat praecedulum." The cardinal does not seem to pay regard to the letter of pope Hormisdas to Possessor, which tends, to say the least, in the opposite direction. But, if confronted by it, Baronius might perhaps have taken refuge in the convenient resource, that the bishop of Rome was here writing only as a private doctor, and not pronouncing a decision ex cathedra.*

FAUSTUS (12), II., fifth bishop of Riez, succeeding Constantius, and followed by Emerius. He was represented at the fifth council of Orleans, A.D. 549, by Claudianus, a deacon. (Mansi, ix. 137; Gall. Chris. i. 393.)

[8. A. B.]

FAUSTUS (13), twenty-fourth bishop of Auch, succeeding Paulinus and followed by Fabius. He was present at the second council of Macon (585), and died the same year. There is a Faustus, whose praises as the builder of a church of St. Martin, are sung by Venantius Fortunatus (Misc. lib. i. cap. 4 in Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxxviii. 67), who may possibly be this bishop. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 22; Mansi, ix. 957; Gall. Chris. i. 975.)

[8. A. B.]

FAUSTUS (14), ST., fifth bishop of Tarbes succeeding Amelius, perhaps about the close of the 6th century. All we know of him is derived from the legendary life of St. Licerius his disciple, whom he taught, and who after his return from exile to Vicus-Julius (Aire) remained with him till his death. This life, which is ascribed to Bernardus Guido, was first published by Labbe, and is also to be found in Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vii. 46. Nothing trustworthy is known of Faustus, and his successors are unknown even by name till Sarsotius, towards the close of the 9th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 1256.)

FAUSTUS (15), comm. Oct. 4, a deacon and martyr, with his fellow deacons, Gissus, Eusebius, and Chaeremen and many other disciples, probably, of Dionysius bishop of Alexandria, when head of the celebrated catechetical school in that city, A.D. 232-247 [DIONYSIUS I (6)]. They suffered, some in the Decian persecution, A.D. 250 (Menolog. Graec. Mon. Sahianus, s. v. Valerian and Gallienus, A.D. 258, and Faustus is an advanced old age under Diocletian. (Eusebius, E. H. vii. c. 11. (8. T. E.

FAUSTUS (16), commemorated Sept. 6, martyr at Alexandria, with Macarius and others under Decius, Valerius being prefect of the city. (Menolog. Graec. Sirilla.)

[8. T. E.]

FAUSTUS (18), commemorated Aug. 1, martyr at Rome with Bonus and others at the same time as pope Stephen, under Valerian. (Mart. Bedae, Usuardi; Euseb. H. E. vii. 10.]

[8. T. E.]

FAUSTUS (19), martyr at Cervera, in January and Martin, their feast is placed by the Bellandists on Oct. 13, but the Gothic and the most ancient Spanish breviaries Sept. 28. The date of their martyrdom is uncertain. Two points, however, throw light on it. (1) a verse of Prudentius, which probably refers to it, "Corduba. Asturiae, Zoelum. Tragica coronas;" cf. Prudent. Frag. Hymn. 4, 10; (2) the mention of "sarmatissimae imperatrices" in some MSS. of the Acta, which would seem to fit the Diocletian persecution. Tamayo de Salazar (Martyr. Hosp. Oct. 19) gives the date as 298, but with equal confidence he makes them brothers to Diocletian of St. Marcellus and St. Nona. The first position seems disposed of by the word "societas" in the Acta applied to the bond between them, and the connexion with St. Marcellus probably arises from the confused notices of them in the Martyrologies, where three other martyrs of Chalcedon share the same day, one of whom is named Marcellus, and they appear to be confused with one another and with the Cordesian martyrs. There was a church in their honour at Cordova in the 9th century (Memorias Sacramentariae of St. Eulogius, cap. 9, lib. 2, and Merida in the 7th, if the document known as De Vitis et Mort. Paer. Emerit. (Esp. Bap. iii. p. 355) is to be trusted. On the contrary, Cordova by St. Ferdinand their church was re-dedicated to St. Peter, and the supposed relics of the three saints, together with others, were discovered in it Nov. 21, 1575. (Florez, Ep. Negros, vol. x, 321, 508; Boll. A.A. SS. Oct. vii. 1.) the Acta are given at P. 2450 of the fine 18th-century Sacrorum, which in Florence's time was still in the monastery of Cardenas, but is now in the Brit. Mus. Addit. MSS. 25,800. See also Mart., Adon., Usuard.)

FAUSTUS (20), one of a company of martyrs at Albinum in proconsular Africa in the Diocletian persecution, according to the Acta Martyrum professing to be drawn from the proconsular records, and quoted by Baronius. (Baron. A. E. ann., 303, 311.)

FAUSTUS (21), martyr, April 16. [SARACOSA, MARTYRS OF.]

FAUSTUS (22), commemorated Nov. 26, perhaps identical with the Faustus of Oct. 4 (No. 15), a presbyter and martyr at Alexandria, with Dios and Ammonius, who suffered under Maximinus, A.D. 308, at the time when Peter, bishop of that city, was also put to death by his command. (Martyr., Adonis, Usuard.; Euseb. H. E. viii. 13.)

[G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (23), commemorated Sept. 8, martyr at Antioch with Timothy (Martyr. Usuardi), called Faustinus (Martyr. Bedae), and Faustianus (Martyr. Hieron.).

[G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (24), commemorated Nov. 19, an aged deacon and martyr. (Martyr. Usuardi.)

[G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (25), probably a monk, the bearer of a letter from St. Augustine to his friend Bonifatius, the tribune, from whom he had brought a letter to Augustine requesting his advice, c. A.D. 413. (Aug. Ep. 189.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTUS (26), monk of Constantinople, son of Julianus. The father, who had been a soldier in the time of the emperor Theodosius, was prevailed to embrace a monastic life by St. Basil of Constantinople. Faustus followed the example, and was shorn by his own father. Both lived in the greatest credit with the emperor and the senate, and miracles are recorded of the Faustus was commemorated on Aug. 3. (Basil. Menon.)

[C. H.]

FAUSTUS (27), a deacon mentioned by Syrius, bishop of Poloena in Cyreneaca, who praises the clergy for heading their flocks against their enemies when the soldiers would not come forward, and commends above all the valour of the many (μακρινοὶ) Faustus, who was the foremost combatant. (Syrius, Ep. 122, in Migne, Patrol. Græc. ivii. 259; Cæliari, Aut. Sacr. viii. 31.)

FAUSTUS (28), a presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople, ranking first among the contemporary holders of that office. In the year A.D. 448 Eutyches, the heretic, endeavoured to secure his support, in common with that of the other archimandrites of Constantinople, for his views. With this object he sent round a tome to which he tried to induce the archimandrites to subscribe. When Eutyches' agents, Constantius and Eleusius, came to Faustus to request his signature as Exposition of the faith of the three hundred and eighteen Fathers of Nicaea and of the Fathers of Ephesus? *"Let me have it," said Faustus, "to compare with the copies which I have of the decrees of those councils." This however, they would not allow, and retired. When narrating this incident to messengers from the archbishop Flavian, Faustus added, "As to us, we are the children of the church, and have, after God, but one father, our archbishop." (Labbæus, Concil. iv. 211; Tillemont, xv. 501.) This Faustus, with Martin, a brother archimandrite, enjoyed the especial confidence of Leo I. He wrote to him, Martin and the other archimandrites, in June A.D. 449, against the heresy of Eutyches (Leo Mag. Ep. 32, 358, Migne). He addresses them again in October, after the "Robber Council," exhorting them to constancy (Ep. 51, 837). He writes again to Faustus and Martin in March, 450 (Ep. 61, 983), in answer to a letter from them, in the same strain. Again in July he writes to all the archimandrites complaining of the silence of Anastasius and the bishops who conspired him to the see of Constantinople, as to his having given adequate evidence of orthodoxy (Ep. 71, 1012). In the same year he wrote an undated letter to Faustus alone (Ep. 72, 1016), praising his faith and constancy, and in November he wrote to Faustus and Martin (Ep. 75, 1022), saying how intolerable to the Western bishops was the action of the "Robber Council" at Ephesus. In A.D. 451 Faustus, with eighteen other orthodox archimandrites of Constantinople, addressed a letter to the emperor Marcian against the Eutychians, asking him, with a view to preventing the spread of that heresy, to allow them to subject its monastic supporters to the rules of monastic discipline (τινι ουκεται των μοναχων δικαιον), and if they obstinately continued to punish them as they deserved, they asked also that a certain cave to which the Eutychians seem to have retired (Πηθανετος την ουρανιον και καινους) might be handed over to them. (Labbæus, iv. 511.) After the meeting of the council of Chalcedon in 451, the bishops there assembled summoned Faustus, among other orthodox archimandrites, to take their seats in the council when Carosus and the other Eutychian archimandrites were summoned before it. Their names appear as subscribing to the deposition of Eutyches, in Act i. of the council. [C. G.]

FAUSTUS (29) (FAUSTIUS), the Latin form of the Irish CONOlALL.

FAUSTUS (30), monk of Agunnium (St. Maurice) in the Vales, accompanied his abbots, St. Severinus, on a journey to Paris to visit king Clovis I, who was sick of a fever. Severinus died on the return journey at Château-Landon, where Faustus appears to have established himself instead of returning to Agunnium. At the age of sixty he wrote a life of Severinus, c. A.D. 523-4, at the command of Childerich, who had built a church over the tomb of the saint. This work was corrected and adorned by some one whose name is unknown, at the suggestion of Magnus bishop of Sens, at the beginning of the 9th century, and in this new form is published by the Bollandists (A.A. SS. Feb. ii. 547). The original work in its imperfect state has been edited by Mahillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. p. 568), but doubts have been thrown on its genuineness (Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 111). Cave (Script. Eccl. i 574) wrongly identifies this Faustus with Faustus Cassinensis, who lived half a century later.

FAUSTUS (31), CASSINENSIS, an Italian confided in childhood by his parent to St. Bene- dict to be brought up in the monastery of Monte Cassino; A.D. 543 he was sent by the saint to take part in the foundation of Glaneuil in Anjou, the first Benedictine establishment in France, of which St. Maur was the abbot. After a sojourn there of forty-six years, Faustus returned to Italy, and took up his residence in the Lateran monastery, whither the monks of Monte Cassino had retired after their monastery had been destroyed, and there he died. He is revered as a saint (A.A. SS. Bell. Feb. ii. 839-841). He wrote a life of St. Maur after his return to Italy, which is printed by the Bolzaniana (Acta SS. Jan. 1, 399 to 1051), and contains as a prologue a short autobiography. Some doubts have been cast on the genuineness of this work, but without good reason; Odo (Eudes) abbot of Glaneuil rewrote the work, altering only the style and not the facts, A.D. 863; there is no cause for supposing that he is the actual author of the work; the work of Faustus is only a creature of his imagination. The work is dedicated to all monks of the East and West, and mentions the approval of pope Boniface, either the third or fourth of that name. Cave wrongly identifies this Faustus with Faustus of Aquanus, who was over sixty years of age A.D. 528. (Cellier, Act. Sacr. xi. 310-12; Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 496; Cave, Script. Eccl. i. 574.)...
FAVENTIUS, bishop of Regium Lepidii (Seggio, in the Duchy of Modena), present at the council held under Eusebius of Milan, A.D. 451 (Leo. Mag. Ep. 97, 1082, Migne). [C. G.]

FAVILA. [FAPILA.]

FEACHNACH (Feachtach, Ann. Uit.) abbot of Fobar, now Foró, co. Westmeath, died A.D. 781 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 776, i. 381). [J. G.]

FEADHACH (Feadach, Ann. Uit. Feachtach, Feadhach), son of Conchae, and abbot of Louth, now Louth, died A.D. 780 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 784, i. 381; Lanigan, Ch. Hist. Ir. iii. 302). [J. G.]

FEAMMOR, virgin. [BLATH.]

FEAR—[FER—]

FEABUS, bishop of Orleans in the 5th century, between St. Magnus and Gratianus (Gall. Chr. viii. 1419). [C. H.]

FEBEDIOLUS (Fидiulus), fourth bishop of Benea, succeeding St. Melanius and followed by Victorus, subscribed the 5th council of Orleans, A.D. 546. (Manli, i. 156; Gall. Chrift. i. 740.) [S. A. B.]

FEBRONIA, commemorated June 25th, martyr under Diocletian, A.D. 304. She is said to have lived at Nisibis in Mesopotamia, where she was a member of a religious house and celebrated for her beauty, piety, and charity. Diocletian suspecting a young man of noble family named Lyeinachus, of a secret inclination to Christianity, sent him to the distant East to prove his fidelity to heathenism by uprooting the Christian faith. To secure his obedience he entrusted the chief power to the matters in the hands of the young man's uncle and guardian, Selenus, an ambitious, determined, and cruel man. Having arrived at Nisibis he was taken by江苏, worked while Lyeinachus in secret endeavoured to tempt the fate of the persecution. Selenus, having arrested

Febronia, was so struck with her beauty that he offered her the hand of Lysimachus in marriage, and, upon her refusal to accept it or to sacrifice, put her to death with the most cruel torments. Stung with remorse, Selenus committed suicide, while Lysimachus sought baptism and became a monk. Her Acts professed to be the work of an eyewitness, and member of the same monastery, named Thamas. They were originally written in Syriac or Greek. (Boll. AA. SS. Jun. v. 17—24; Synmone Metaphrastes; Menolog. Conc. ii. 5.)

FECHIN, bishop of Lerida, signs the acts of the council held at Lerida in A.D. 546 (not 534 as Dahn and others have it, see Tychon y Samiro, Colec. de Can. ii. 146), attended by eight bishops and one proxy, and presided over by Sergius, metropolitan of Tarragona. (Florez, Esp. Sagra. xlv. 99, 170; Hefele, Conciliumschrifte, ii. 683; Aguirre-Catalani, i. 171.) [M. A. W.]

FECHIN, FECHIN, FECHIN, ST. Beside the following there are other Fechins or Fechins commemorated in the Irish Calendars, at Feb. 22, Aug. 2, and Dec. 28.

(1) Fechin, abbot of Fobhar or Fore, was a zealous labourer for Christ in the west of Connaught in the seventh century, and his name is still remembered in connexion with his religious foundations. Only two ancient Livs seem to be extant. (Colgan, Acta SS. 130—139.) Bp. Challoner (Brit. Sacrif. pt. ii. 68—70) and Bp. Forbes (Kal. Scott. Saints, 458—58) have given memoirs of the saint, but the latest and fullest is by O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 356—82). His name is attached to wells and churches in many localities in Ireland. In none of the Livs is there any record of his visiting Scotland, yet there is Échadseachan or Échadseachan in Dumfriesshire, and under the intituled form of Vigeanus his dedication is found at St. Vigean beside Arbrath. His being called Mo-ocern or Ecorus by St. Aengus and in the Col. Gene tol seems to be based on a mistake, though Colgan (Acta SS. 140 n.) accepts it as a fact.

(2) St. Fechin, one of the priests of the third class of Irish saints, belonged to the same noble race as St. Brigida. He is said to have been born at Billy, in the barony of Leyan and county of Sligo. So soon as he was of age for education, he was placed under the charge of St. Nathi (Aug. 9) of Achonry in the same barony of Leyan, but whether he entered the priesthood under him or not is uncertain. After a time he left his own country for greater retirement, and built his monastery at Fobhar, or Fore, now St. Feighin's, in the barony of Fore and county of Westmeath. (For the remains at Fore, see Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 174—5, 453; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 365 sq.) But besides the monastery of Fobhar, where three hundred monks were under him "secedum regulam a sancti patris institutium," other places are associated with his name, as the islands of Omeay and Ardollen in Galway, Cong near Lough Corrib, Ballysadare and Drumrat in Sligo. (On the localities see specially Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 46—50, and O'Hanlon, Lives of the Irish Saints, i. 360 sq.)

He died in the yellow plague, which proved fatal to so many saints in Ireland in A.D. 665.

FECHNO (Fethchu, Fethchu, Fethro, Flicina, Fichna, Fichno), one of St. Columba’s companions in the first voyage to Iona, and the planting of the faith in the Hebridies of Scotland. He was son of Rodan, and brother of Rus. He devoted himself to preach the gospel among the Picts, bringing them back to the piety of the days of St. Ninian. Miracles were said to be wrought at his tomb. By the early Scotch historians his feast is Aug. 12, and the year of his death 580. Colgan evidently prefers July 23, A.D. 588, for the date of his death (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 356; Colgan, Acta SS. 588; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 372; Usher, Eccl. Antiq. xviii. 237–38). He is invoked in the Litanies of Dunblane (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, p. 1.).

FEDHILIM (Fedella, Fedelmai, Fedhelm, Fedelmair, Fethelma), virgin, daughter of Ailill, king of Leinster (ob. 544). She was baptized, with her sister Mughain, by St. Patrick at a fountain near Naas. Both of them took the veil, became famous for virtue, and (it is said) for miraculous signs, and were commemorated on Dec. 9. (Mart. Donegal, by Todd and Reeves, 331; Tripart. Life of St. Patrick.)

FEDHILIMIDH (Fedhlimidh, Felix), a common name in the ecclesiastical annals of Ireland.

(1) Fedhlimidh, of Cill-mor Dithrubh, who is commemorated on Aug. 9, is said to have been brother of Diamid (Jan. 10) of Inis-colman and others, and to have belonged to the race of the Hy-Fianrac (Diamid 4). (Colgan, Acta SS. In his Locality of Patriciana, the Rev. J. F. Shearmur shews his father to have been Cuirrin, son of Laisre luird, descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages, and his mother to have been Deigha or Deidi, the daughter of Trian, son of Dubhthac mac Ua Lugair; he attributes the feasts of both Aug. 3 and 9 to him (Journ. Roy. Hist. and Archd. Assoc. 4, ser. iii. p. 24 Gen. Table, and p. 56). To Fedhilimidh is usually ascribed the foundation of the see of Kilmore, co. Cavan, yet there are no particulars of his life connecting him with either the place or its episcopate, and there is no account of any bishop being there prior to the fifteenth century. But as in the calendar he is placed at Cill-mor Dithrubh (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 215), it is suggested by O’Donovan, and accepted by Reeves, that he in no sense belonged to Cavan, but lived at Kilmore, a parish in the barony of North Ballinabo, co. Roscommon, which lies close to the Shannon, and is the “Cill-mor Dithrubh” where St. Columcille (Lux. Bp. founded his monastery of Kilmore. This St. Fedhlimidh must have flourished about the middle of the sixth century.

FELICIANA, one of the band of noble Roman ladies who gathered round St. Jerome when he was at Rome, A.D. 383–5. She is saluted by him in a letter to Paula (xxx. 14, ed. Vall.) as “rect carnis et spiritus virginitatem felicem." She is possibly the same as Felicitas (4). [W. H. F.]

FELICIANUS (2) I, fourth in the list of the bishops of Foligno, his native town. His predecessor is anonymous, following Britius; his successor, also anonymous, is followed by Felicianus II. According to the Roman Martyrology he was consecrated to the see of Foligno by Victor, bishop of Rome, and in extreme old age was martyred in the Decian persecution. The period assigned to his episcopate is from A.D. 203 to 254, and his commemoration day is Jan. 24. In the time of Otho the Great numerous relics of the saints were brought out of Italy, and Theodoric bishop of Metz, attending that emperor in his expedition beyond the Alps, was one of the most zealous collectors of such treasures, for the enrichment of his monastery of St. Vincentius at Metz. Siebert names Felicianus among those whose remains were thus transported. The Bollandists give the Acta in three sections. (Siebert. An. 506; Porr. Lat. cix. 192; Barlaeus, Hist. sanct. ann. 293, ii. 254, 254; Bull. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 581; Ughel. Ital. Sacr. i. 684.)

FELICIANUS (2) II, 6th in the list of bishops of Foligno, following the anonymous successor of Felix I, and preceding Paulus. His election is stated to have been confirmed by Marcellinus, bishop of Rome, A.D. 296. He is thought to be the Felicianus mentioned without a see among the 308 bishops of the council of Sirmium, A.D. 303. (Mansi. L. 1253; Ughel. Ital. Sacr. i. 685.)

FELICIANUS (4), Donatist bishop of Musti, Nubita, or Mustita, a town of which there is some doubt whether it was in Numidia, or in proconsular Africa. The Notitia Africae places it in the former, but the latter view is the more probably correct. The Donatist party was strongest (Aug. Enarr. in Ps. 21, 22; de Unit. Ecc. 19, 51); but (1) Musti of the Provincia (Abd-er-Rabbi) was a well-known place, at which Roman remains still exist (Shaw, p. 93). (2) Bishops from other towns in the Provincia are mentioned as well as Felicianus, as being present at the council of Bagaun, e.g. from Membresa and Assuris. (3) The civil proceedings arising out of that council were carried on before the proconsul, and not, as it seems, in Numidia. In order to reconcile the difficulty, several writers, as Noris, Tillemont, Morelli, and Gams, have supposed another Musti to have existed in Numidia, but of this there is no authentic trace. (Ant. Itin. 48, 49; Aug. c. Cresc. iv. 5; c. Gaudenc. ii. 7, 7; Enarr. in Ps. 57, vol. iv. p. 685.)

However this may be, there is no doubt that the name of Felicianus of Musti is one of the most prominent in the history of Donatism, and that it almost always occurs in connexion with that of Prætextatus of Assuris, the place mentioned above. Probably, but the expression of St. Augustine is not quite definite, he assisted at the consecration of Prætextatus, A.D. 391. Two years later he was accused of heresy by his colleague Cahunus who condemned him, and of the twelve who joined in ordaining Maximian in his place, A.D. 393 (Aug. c. Parm. 1, 4, 8; c. Cresc. iii. 13, 16; c. Petil. 1, 12; Ex. in Ps. 36, 20; Doctr. i. 887). At the council of Bagaun, April 24, A.D. 398, Prætextatus presided, and was succeeded in his position by the 310 bishops there assembled. None of the Maximianists attended, but they were all condemned by the council, especially those who assisted at the ordination of Maximian, of whom Felicianus was undoubtedly one. The sin of all who took any part in this act was denounced in the strongest terms possible, but to all, excepting the twelve ordainers, a respite was granted until Dec. 25 of the same year (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 19, 22; 54, 60; 56, 62; iv. 4, 5; c. Gaudenc. ii. 7, 7; Ep. 51; de Gest. cum Emerc. 9). In March of the year following (A.D. 399) the Priminastian party commenced proceedings in the civil courts for the purpose of ejecting the Maximianist bishops from their sees, on ground supplied, as it would appear, by the imperial edicts issued to protect orthodox bishops and churches, such as the Priminastian representatives themselves were exclusively the object of (Theodos. iii. 24 and 26). They were carried on first before the proconsul Herodes, at the suit ostensibly of Peregirus, a presbyter, and the elders of the people of Musti, represented by an advocate named Titius; and they lasted during three or four proconsulates until that of Theodorus, but in what year he filled the office is uncertain. One of the proconsuls during the time was Serenus, who pronounced a decree against Salvius of Membresa (see above), but similar doubt exists as to his date (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 55, 59; 56, 62; iv. 3; 48; 48, 59; de Gest. cum Emerc. 9). Certain it is that the proceedings were carried on more or less continuously till A.D. 398, but without producing the desired effect, though Felicianus was attacked, not only before the proconsul, but before the municipal authority of Musti (Aug. c. Cresc. iv. 4; Ep. 57). During this time the condemned Maximianist bishops suffered annoyance, and even persecution, in which Salvius of Membrase was cruelly put to death. This persecution was chiefly instigated by Optatus, bishop of Thamugadi, surnamed the Gildonian, from the support which he received from Gild the tyrant, as he may be called, of Africa at that time. These severities succeeded, at length, in terrifying the people of Musti and Assuris into inviting, or rather demanding, that their bishops, of whom Prætextatus had died, and been succeeded by Rogatus, should return to the communion of Priminastus (Aug. c. Cresc. ii. 10, 60; iv. 35, 32; Mon. Vet. Doc. p. 405, ed. Oberthür). They returned unconditionally, without any act of humiliation, and all their acts during the time of separation were accepted without question by the Donastitian communion. It is on this point that Augustine is never weary of insisting in his arguments against the Donastitans: "If," says he, "Felicianus and Prætextatus were rightly exiled, how could they be restored rightly on these terms? If wrongly, how could the acts of the Donastitans towards them be justified? They baptized many persons during their time of separation, yet none of these underwent re-baptism. The baptisms performed by Maximianists were not condemned; yet if the council of Bagaun was right, Felicianus and the rest condemned by its 310 bishops, were little less than murderers, and in returning, ought to have been treated as penitents, not re-admitted on equal terms."

(Aug. c. Parm. i. 4, § ii. 3, 7, 15, 34; de Bap. l. i. 2; c. Petil. ii. 7, 16; 52, 120; c. Cresc. iii. 59, 43; iv. 10, 13; Post. Coll. 4, 4; Epp. 76, 108).

After this restoration, Felicianus appears as the Donatist bishop of Musit at the great Enquiry, A.D. 411, but took no prominent part in its proceedings (Mon. Vet. Dom. p. 401, ed. Oberthür).

[W. H. P.]

FE LICIANUS (5), the name of five bishops present at the Carthaginian conference of A.D. 411, namely, the bishop of—

Cufrauti, in Byzaene; a former bishop had been condemned by the Donatists, and not received by the Catholics, and no Donatist appointed. (M. V. D. p. 409; Tillemont, 77, vol. vi. p. 189.)

Ferada Minor, in Byzaene. (M. V. D. p. 418.)

Utina, in proconsular Africa. Donatist. (M. V. D. p. 440.)

[H. W. P.]

FE LICIANUS (6), the name of three Catholic bishops banished by Hunicus after the convention at Carthage in 484 (Victor. Vit. Notit. 56-58 in Migne, Pat. Lat. liviii), namely of—

Girutarae, in the province of Numidia. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 170.)

Ida, in the province of Mauretania Caesariensis; along with Subitians, who was bishop of the same see, he went to the convention; as he is placed lower in the list than Subitius, he is supposed to have been a Donatist who joined the Catholics, and would have retained his rank and see according to the rule of the African church. (A. C. i. 190.)

Meta, in the province of Numidia. (A. C. i. 225.)

FE LICIANUS (7), the name of a person either real or imaginary, but of whom, if real, nothing is known, though he is called by Alcuin an Arian bishop. He is represented as one of the interlocutors in a dialogue carried on with St. Augustine on the nature of the Trinity. The treatise which contains this is entitled Contra Felicianum Arrianum de Unitate Trinitatis, and was former-mly ascribed to Augustine. It is quoted under his name by Alcuin, Bede, and Peter Lombard. The first who doubted its genuineness was Erasmus, and it was afterwards assigned, chiefly on internal grounds, by the Jesuit father, P. P. Chillet, to Vigilius bishop of Tapsa or Tapsis in Byzacene, c. 484, and this judgment has been followed by the later editors of St. Augustine's works. The arguments of the dialogue are confessedly founded less on scriptural grounds than on such as belong to the nature of the case, and the work terminates somewhat abruptly. (Aug. Opp. vol. viii. app. pp. 1158-1172; Cave, Hist. Lat. i. p. 458; Tillemont, 342, vol. xiii. p. 914.)

[H. W. P.]

FE LICIANUS (8), bishop of Ruspe, in North Africa, elected on the day of the death of Fulgentius, A.D. 533 (Vit. Fulg. cap. 69), and consecrated in the following year, A.D. 534.

While a presbyter he shared the exile of Fulgentius in Sardinia (Vit. Fulg. proc. sec. 2). As bishop he took part in the council of Carthage under Reparatus in 534. (Mansi, viii. 841.) To him was addressed the Vita Fulgenti, prefixed to the works of Fulgentius. (Vit. Fulg. in Pat. Lat. Irv. 117; also in Bolt. Acta SS. Jan. i. 32; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 266.)

[H. R. K.]

FE LICIANUS (9), bishop of Vicenza, c.A.D. 809. (Cappellotti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 822.)

[R. S. G.]

FE LICIANUS (10), commemorated Nov. 18, martyr at Vienne, A.D. 163, with Severian and Eupereus. Their relics were translated to the church of St. Romanus in Vienne some time about the year 800. (Martyr. Ussauri, Abn., Chronic. Adonis.)

[G. T. S.]

FE LICIANUS (11), commemorated Jan. 29, martyr in Africa with Pelianus and others (Martyr. Romana, Hieron.); probably at Alexandria or Carthage in the beginning of the Decian persecution, when the entire population was summoned man by man to sacrifice, and hundreds were put to death. See letter of Donatus bishop of Alexandria, describing this process in Eusebius (H. E. vi. 41).

[G. T. S.]

FE LICIANUS (12), commemorated June 9, martyr with Primus at Nomentum, now Menton, an ancient city of Latium, four miles and a half from Rome. Their acts are given in three different versions in Surius. Cellier, however, does not regard them as authentic. The story, which is surrounded with many difficulties, is briefly thus:—The emperors Diocletian and Maximian being at Rome, the martyrs, who were Roman citizens, were brought before them, at the instigation of the heathen priests, who declared that the gods would neither give oracles nor blessings till they were compelled to sacrifice. The emperor ordered them to be led to the altar, and to sacrifice to Jupiter and Hercules. Upon their refusal, they were committed to the charge of Promotus, governor of Nomentum, with strict orders to compel them to obedience, or else to punish them with the severest tortures, which he forthwith executed. Weared out with their obstinacy, Promotus made a final effort, calling them before his tribunal, and endeavoured to persuade them to obedience. Whereupon Felicianus refused, saying: “I am now eighty years old, but have known the truth for thirty years, during which I have chosen the service of my master the eternal God, thinking nothing of the pleasures of the world.” Upon this they were beheaded, and their bodies cast to the dogs; but neither birds nor beasts would touch them. The Christians recovered the bodies, and built a church in a sand-pit at the arch on the Via Nomentana, where a church was afterwards built. (Martyr. Ussauri, Bede, Hieron., Adonis; Surius, Hid. SS. June 9.)

FE LICIANUS (13), commemorated July 21. A soldier and martyr under Maximiian at Marsielles. (Francois Victor.) (Martyr. Adonis, Ussauri, Hieron.)

[G. T. S.]

FE LICIANUS (14), commemorated Oct. 29; martyr in Lucania with Hyaclitus, Quintus, and Lucius (Martyr. Ussauri).

FELICIANUS

FELICIANUS (18) (Cyp. Ep. 59. xi. xii.), an apostle of Rome sent from Cornelius to Cyprian, a.d. 232 and the bearer of intelligence from the latter to Cornelius of the movements of the party of Felicissimus; whose death prevented Cornelius from being forewarned, and disconcerted him much. [E. W. B.]

FELICIANUS (17), to whom Dionysius Exiguus dedicated his translation of the epitate of St. Proclus of Constantinople to the Armenians. Dionysius addresses him as "pastor," and then styles him "venerable," adding that it is at his instance and for his ears that he translates this epitate into Latin. We must infer him, therefore, to have been a Latin ecclesiast of some distinction, but whether bishop or priest is uncertain, as Dionysius styles the "presbyter Eugubius," to whom he dedicates another of his translations, also "venerable." We meet with no subscriber of this name to the various councils contemporary with Dionysius. [E. S. F.]

FELICISSIMUS (1), deacon of Carthage, whom Novatus associated with himself in the management of a district called Mons. (Cyp. Ep. 41.) He was the chief agent (signifer sedis) in the anti-Cyprianic party, which combined the five presbyters originally opposed to Cyprian's election, with the later-formed party for the easy redemption of the lapsed. (Ep. 43, 45.) The charge of peculation and debauchery (Cyp. Ep. 41, 59) is weakened by its reapparence in the case of every deacon in opposition. (E.g. Novatian.) But Cyprian (Ep. 82) more shortly states that he had been, when the persecution arose, on the point of being tried before the presbytery on charges of homicidal cruelty to his father and wife. Like other African and Spanish deacons (Neander, vol. i. p. 324, ed. Bohn) he acquired influence through his adoration of church property, and was able to threaten with excommunication any one who accepted relief of office from Cyprian's commissioners (Calvinus), who doubtless seemed to interfere with his functions. He was then excommunicated by them (Ep. 42) with Cyprian's consent, but any future adherents were warned that their excommunication would be perpetual. (Ep. 43.) Still they were heard again by the first Council, a.d. 251 (Ep. 45. v.), and condemned. The mild resolution of the Council of a.d. 252, easeing the redemption of the lapsed on their earnest repentance (Cyprianus, p. 744 a), destined his locus standi. The party then associated with that of Privatus, who consecrated Fortunatus anti-bishop; and Felicissimus called from Rome to concatenate or to intimidate Cornelius into a recognition of him. (Ep. 59.) Failing here, the party melted quietly away into the cities.

68.1. On the Mons, see Cyprianus, Vol. i. p. 743. Obs. 2. The expression that Novatus "discourseth constit Felicissimus" cannot fairly be pressed into "Novatus ordained him," although it might mean that he procured hisordination, as we read similarly that he "fict Epicopum Novatianum." But as Cyprian (Ep. 41) is already familiar with him, and speaks of his "vetera fraudem, de quibus jam multa cognoveram," it more probably means that Novatus appointed him deacon of his own presbyteral district. Obs. 3. Reitberg (in accordance with his general theories), treats the faction of Felicissimus as anti-episcopal, i.e. presbyterian in principle; but there is no foundation for the idea, [see Cyprianus, p. 743.]

FELICISSIMUS (3), a layman, "quietus semper et sorbuis," one of the earliest confessors at Carthage in the Decian persecution. (Cyp. Ep. vi.) See Pearson (Anm. Cyp. A.D. 250, vii) as to his being made into a martyr by Bede and other Roman martyrologists. [E. W. B.]

FELICISSIMUS (3), presbyter, described at condemnation of Priscillian, 386, at Treves, as a recent convert. He was beheaded (Sulp. Serv. li. 51). [M. B. C.]

FELICISSIMUS (5), bishop of the two sees of Sedelia and Utina, in the province of proconsular Africa; present at the synod of Carthage held under bishop Boniface, A.D. 525. (Morelli, Africa Christiana, i. 272; Manzi, viii. 648.) [L. D.]

FELICISSIMUS (7), commemorated Aug. 6; martyr at Rome with Agapetus, both of whom were deacons in attendance upon pope Sixtus, who suffered under Valerian in virtue of an edict which adorned A.D. 238. This edict is extant in Cyprian, Ep. 82, ad Successum. After various tortures they were all beheaded. The deacons were buried in the cemetery of Praetextatus. (Martyr. Usuard, Adonis, Hieron., Bede, Suri Vitae SS, Acta S. Lawendii, Aug. 10; Neander, Hist., i. 193, ed. Bohn; Baron. A. E. ann. 261. iv.) [G. T. S.]

FELICISSIMUS (8), commemorated July 2; martyr in Campania under Diocletian, with Aristo and others. In the list of St. Sebastian (Surius, vol. i. Jan. 20) there is an account of their conversion by the efforts of St. Sebastian and St. Polycarp. These Acts are evidently corrupt, as they give the title of Episcopus episcoporum to the bishop of Rome. Ceillier, however, considers them to have been written before the end of the 4th century, as they are the work of gladiatorial shows as still existing, which were abolished in or about A.D. 403. (Martyr. Usuard, Adonis; Till. Mem. iv. 515.) [G. T. S.]

FELICISSIMUS (9), commemorated May 20; martyr, a.d. 303, under Diocletian, with Hera-clius and Paulinus at Tudertum (Martyr. Usuard.,

FELICISSIMUS (10), Nov. 24, martyr at Perugia, according to Usuardus at Rome according to Jerome (Martyr. Hieron., Usuard.).

[G. T. S.]

FELICISSIMUS (11), commemorated March 14; martyr at Nicomedia with Dativus, Frontisinus, Joquinus (Martyr. Hieron., Nötf.).

[G. T. S.]

FELICITAS (1), commemorated on Nov. 25; martyr at Rome with her seven sons, under Antonius Pius, Publius being prefect of the City, about A.D. 150. The story of the martyrdoom of Felicitas and her sons is fixed by their Acts under Antonius Pius, and at his personal command. Now it is almost certain that there was no authorized persecution in his reign (Antonius Pius). Public calamities, a famine, an inundation of the Tiber, earthquakes in Asia Minor and in Rhodes, ravaging fires at Rome, Antioch, and Carthage, stirred up the mob to seek for the favour of the gods by the shedding of Christian blood (Julii Capitolini Vita Antonii Pii). While they were thus doing, Felicitas and her children suffered without any participation on the emperor's part. In her Acts Publius the prefect is represented as commanded by Antonius to compel her to sacrifice, in which he fails, though he appeals to her maternal affection as well as to her fears. He then calls upon her seven sons, Januarius, Felix, Philippus, Sylvanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis, and with a similar want of success, the mother, exhorting them thus,
"Behold, my sons, heaven, and look upwards, whence you expect Christ with His saints." The prefect, having tortured some of them, reported the whole matter to the emperor, at whose command they were beheaded. Their martyrdom is commemorated by Gregory the Great, in Rom.
3 super Evang., where, preaching in a church dedicated to her, he lauds Felicitas as "plus quam martyris quae septem pignoribus ad regnum praemissis, toties ante se mortua est. An poena primum est sed perennit octavam" (Martyr. Vet.
Rom., Hieron., Bede, Adonis, Usuard.).

[G. T. S.]

FELICITAS (2), March 7; martyr at Carthage with Perpetua, Revocatus, Saturninus, and Secundinus. They were all catechumens, and baptized after their arrest. Felicitas and her companions having been interrogated by Hilarius, the proconsul, and remaining steadfast in their profession, were condemned to be thrown to the beasts on the anniversary of the young Geta's accession. Felicitas, being in the eighth month of her pregnancy, and the law not permitting women in her condition to be executed, was greatly distressed at the delay of her martyrdom. Prayer was therefore made that God might give her a speedy delivery, and this accordingly took place a few days after. While the pangs of labour were upon her the jailer, hearing her utter some natural exclamations of pain, said,
"If thy present sufferings are so great, what wilt thou do when thou art thrown to the wild beasts? This thou didst not consider when they put thee into prison." She answered,
"What I now suffer I suffer myself, but then there will be another who will suffer for me because I also shall suffer for Him." They were all put to death together in A.D. 202 or 203, during the reign of Severus, whose later years were marked by a very rigorous perse-27 in Hist. August. Script.). Few martyrs are better attested than this one. The ancient Roman calendar, published by Bucherius, ad dating from about the year 360, mentions only three African martyrs, viz. Felicitas, Perpetua, and Cyprian, and fixes the day of their death as March 7. Their name is em-bodyed in the canon of the Roman Mass, which mentions none but really primitive martyrs.

Their martyrdom is mentioned by Tertullian in his book, De Anima, 1v., and is treated at length in three sermons, 280, 281, and 282, by St.
Augustine, while their burial at Carthage, in the Basilica Major, is asserted by Victor Vitensis, Lib. i. de Percut. Vandal. Their acts were for a long time missing, and after a long search were found by Lucas Holstenius among the MSS. in the convent library at Monte Cassino.
They profess in part to have been written by Perpetua. Some think from their style that they were edited by some one after he adopted Montanist views. (Martyr. Vet. Rom., Hieron., Beda, Adonis, Usuard; Ruinart, Acta Sincera;
Prosper in Chron. Labbeano; Beda, de Sex Actat.; Neander, vol. i. 170; vol. ii. 209-212, ed. Bohn.)

[G. T. S.]

FELICITAS (3), martyr with Augustine
Capua; according to some, during the persecution which raged during the brief reign of Decius, about A.D. 250. Valerian, afterwards emperor, and a persecutor as well, occupied at that time the post of public censor, restored by vote of the senate, Oct. 27, A.D. 251. He may have been the immediate agent in the persecution. According to others (Tilmum. iv. 174) the martyrdom happened in Valerian's persecution, A.D. 257. St. Cyprian is said to have encouraged them to persevere in an epistle which is now lost. (Lactantius, de Mort. Percut. cap. 4; 5; Ceillier, li. 341.)

[G. T. S.]

FELICITAS (4), a Roman lady, eminently for her sanctity, a friend of St. Jerome, who saw him again through Asia in the letter (45, ed.
Vall.) written from Portus, when he was leaving Italy for the last time for Palestine, a.d. 38.

FELIX (I) I., bishop of Rome, probably from January 5, A.D. 292, to Dec. 30, A.D. 274, in the reigns of the emperors Claudius and Aurelian. These are the dates according to our oldest and most trustworthy authority. For the Liberian Catalogue (354) names the consuls of the years above mentioned as those contemporary with his accession and death, and gives 5 years, 11 months, and 25 days as the duration of his episcopate, while the Liberian Depositio Episcoporum gives the 30th of December as the date of his death. Later authorities, including the Liber Pontificalis, differ as to the date and duration of his episcopate. But there seems to be no good reason for doubting the correctness of the earliest record. He appears in the Roman Calendar as a saint and martyr, his day being the 30th of May. His martyrdom is asserted, not only in the later editions of the Liber Pontificalis, but also in the early recension of 550, known as the Felician Catalogue, where we read, "Martyrio coronatus fuit temporibus Claudii et Aureliani." It is attested also in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus (431), and by Cyril of Alexandria and Vincentius of Lerins, in the same century. But, notwithstanding this testimony, the fact of his martyrdom seems inconsistent with the silence on the subject of the Liberian Catalogue in the previous century, and with his name appearing in the Depositio Episcoporum, not the Depositio Martyrum, of the same date. There is also this further argument against his martyrdom, that, if Eusebius is to be believed, the intended persecution under Aurelian, to which he is said to have fallen victims, never in fact took place. For Eusebius states (E. E. vii. 30, Chron. ad ann. 2292, Ab.) that the emperor died when on the point of signing the edict of persecution, and that consequently it never took effect. It is true that Lacantius (de Morte Perscr. c. 6) gives a somewhat different account, representing the edict as having been signed, but its effects stopped by the flight of the emperor. But it reached the distant provinces. This account leaves room for the operation of the edict for a time in Rome, at least for the martyrdom of Felix under it. Still, the apocryphal character of other legends about martyrs under the supposed Aurelian persecution (appearing in the Acts of Synods and elsewhere) would throw suspicion on the story of the martyrdom of Felix, even if the absence of all mention of it in the Liberian Catalogue did not invalidate its probability.

It has been supposed that the story may have arisen from a substitution of the name of Felix I. for that of Felix II., the antipope to Liberius in the following century, for whom his followers claimed the honour of martyrdom. This supposition is supported by the fact that the pontifical annals which make Felix I. a martyr assign to him also the same place of burial as is assigned to Felix II., viz. his own cemetery at the second milestone on the Aurelian Way; whereas it is distinctly stated in the Liberian Catalogue that he was buried, like other popes of the period, in the cemetery of Callistus. (See Lepius, Chron. d. röm. Bischöfe, p. 251 et seq.) Another probable supposition is that the stories of the martyrdom of both these popes arose from a confusion of them with an African martyr of the same name, the translation of whose remains to Rome was celebrated on the same day as is devoted to Felix II. in the Roman Calendar (Dolinger, Fables of Popes of the Middle Ages).

Nothing is known with any certainty of the acts of Felix I., except the part he took in the deposition of Paul of Samosata from the see of Antioch. A synod at Antioch (A.D. 290) having deposed this heretical bishop, and appointed Domnus in his place, announced these facts in letters addressed to Maximus and Dionysius, bishops of Alexandria and Rome, and to other Catholic bishops. Felix, who had in the meantime succeeded Dionysius, addressed a letter on the subject to Maximus and to the clergy of Antioch, fragments of which are preserved in the Apologia of Cyril of Alexandria, and in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus, and which is also alluded to by Marius Mercator, and by Vincent of Lerins in his Commonitorium. Paul refusing to cede his place to Domnus, the case was laid before the Emperor Aurelian, present at Antioch in 272 or 273, after his victory over Zenobia. He decided in favour of whichever claimant to the see should be recognised by the bishops of Italy and of Rome. The consequence was the expulsion of Paul (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30).

It is stated in the Liber Pontificalis that Felix I. ordered the sacred mysteries to be celebrated over the graves of martyrs.

Three decrees, undoubtedly spurious, are assigned to him (Harduin, Concil.). One, to a bishop Paterius, has for its object the protection of the clergy from accusations for crimes, the controlling of the process in case of accusations being made, and the reserving of appeals to Rome. Another, purporting to be in reply to complaints received from a synod of Gallican bishops, relates to the accusation and trial of bishops before provincial synods, disallowing the entertainment of any charges against them by persons of suspected character, and protecting the accused from spoliations during the progress of any trial. It also orders masses in remembrance of martyrs. A third, to a bishop Benignus, is doctrinal, condemning the assertions that, because no one has seen the Father at any time, the Son sees Him not, and that, because the Father is invisible and the Son visible, the Son is less than the Father.

FELIX II.—Pope

FELIX (3) II., made bishop of Rome after the exile of Pope Liberius (A.D. 355). This Felix has obtained a place in the Roman Calendar as a saint and martyr, and in the Pontifical and in the Acts of St. Felix and St. Eusebius is represented as a legitimately elected and orthodox pope, persecuted by the emperor and the Arian faction. Contemporary and other ancient writers (Faustus and Marcellinus, Hilary, Athanasius, Jerome, Rufinus, Sozomen, and Theodoret) unanimously represent him, on the contrary, as an interloper into the see, placed there violently and irregularly by the emperor and the Arian party, and make no allusion to his martyrdom.

The following is drawn by Marcellinus and Faustus, two contemporary Luciferian presbyters of Rome, who must have had good opportunity of knowing the truth. It occurs in the preface to their Libellus Pecamin addressed to the emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius during the pontificate of Damasus, who separates and publicly censures the writers. We have occasion to complain of being persecuted. Immediately on the banishment of Liberius all the clergy, including the archdeacon Felix, swore before the people that they would accept no other bishop during the life of the exiled pope. Notwithstanding this, the clergy afterwards ordained that Felix, though the people were displeased and abstained from taking part. Damasus, pope after Liberius, was among his persecuted supporters. After two years the emperor visited Rome, and, being solicited by the people for the return of Liberius, at length consented on condition of his complying with the imperial requirements, but with the intention of his ruling the church jointly with Felix. In the third year Liberius returned to Rome, when the people met him with joy. Felix was driven from the city, but after a little time, at the instigation of the clergy who had perjured themselves in his election, burst into it again, taking his possession of Julius beyond the Tiber. The whole multitude of the faithful, and the nobles, again expelled him with great ignominy. After eight years, during the consulsipate of Valentinianus and Valens (i.e. A.D. 365) on the 10th of the Calends of December (Nov. 22) Felix died, leaving Liberius without a rival as bishop of Rome till his own death on the 8th of the Calends of October (Sept. 24), A.D. 366. The other ancient writers of repute mentioned above confirm this account, supplying further details, and with no discrepancies such as to affect the main drift of the narrative. From their combined relations we learn that the election and consecration of Felix took place in the imperial palace, and that Felix and Liberius were consecrated from their churches: that three of the emperor's eunuchs represented the people on the occasion, the consecrators being three heretical bishops, Epictetus of Centumellae, Aecarius of Caesarea, and Basil of Ancyra; and that it was only the Arian section of the clergy, though appearing as the free clergy at Epictetus' bidding, "in viribus (Caere?) "ad latum formam (fori?) Trajanit," on the 3rd of the Ides of November, when his body was taken in the night by certain clergy, including the presbyter Damasus, and buried in the 12th of the Calendae of December in a basilica on the Via Aurelia at the second milestone from the city, which he had himself founded, and endowed with a field on the spot which he had bought. The Acts of St. Felix agree with his life in the pontifical, though with some differences as to dates. In the Acts of St. Eusebius it is stated that, when Liberius had been seized by the tyrant, he was described in his life in the Pontifical, Eusebius, a Roman presbyter, began to denounce him as a heretic and a friend of Constantius. On many, in consequence of this denunciation, avoiding the communion of Liberius, the churches were seized by him, Felix was ejected, and Liberius restored. Then follows a detailed account of the seizure of Eusebius, his examination by the emperor, assisted by Liberius, his imprisonment and martyrdom.

The two accounts of these transactions given on the one hand by Marcellinus and Faustus, supported by such a number of reputable authorities as the Acts of Martyrs, the former is undoubtedly to be preferred. The latter authorities are in no case altogether trustworthy, and in this instance are inconsistent with each other, showing signs also of their compilation at a later time than those of the events referred to by evident historical inaccuracies, viz., the incorrect designations of Ursacius, and Valens, and the confusion between Constantius and Constantine. They may be considered due to a desire to clear the reputation of Felix, his party having become dominant on the elevation of Damasus, his support to the papacy after the contest which ensued on the death of Liberius. [See DAMASUS.] It may be, however, as is maintained by Lipsius in his Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe, that they contain elements of truth, as representing the genuine traditions of the party of Felix, though coloured and distorted. This writer endeavours to reconcile the two accounts, and to reduce the conflicting accounts. He even supposes that the alleged martyrdom of Felix may have had a foundation in fact; that, strengthened through the action of Eusebius, and supported by the majority of the clergy, who were now alienated from Liberius, he took his account of his compliance with heresy, he held his position as a rival bishop in the basilica on his own property alluded to, that conflict had ensued between the two parties, in one of which Felix might have been killed, and hence come to be regarded as a martyr. (See the same writer, as above cited, for the probable chronology of the events.) Dr. Dehlerer (Popelhofen des Mittelalters) regards the whole of the stories in the pontifical and the Acts (so far as they contradict the historical narrations) as fabulous, and considers that the martyrdom of Felix to be sufficiently disproved by the expression "requievit in pace" applied to him in the earliest and least fabulous of these accounts, the life of Liberius in the pontifical. He considers the tradition of his martyrdom to have arisen from a confusion of his name with that of an African martyr Felix, the translation of whose remains to Rome was celebrated on the same day, July 28, as is devoted to Felix II. in the mass and the orthodoxy of Felix himself, even the writers who are most adverse to him do not distinctly impugn it; though all agree that he owed his elevation to the heretics Athanasius, who speaks violently against Constantius and the ordination of Felix, says of him that he was worthy of them. Rufinus says of him, "Non tam sectae diversitatis quam communiunionis et ordinatiois connivit via Eustachia maculatur." Socrates, having just said that he then embraced the Arian heresy, adds that some affirmed that he by no means embraced the Arian opinion, but had undergone their baptism compelled by force and necessity. Sozomen similarly asserts the report of some that he perpetually adhered to the Nicene faith, and that on the ground of religion he was entirely without reproach, the only ground of reproach against him being that even before his ordination he had been associated with heretics. If against these testimonies in his favour be urged the improbability that the emperor could allow his ordination without the same compliance with heresy as he undoubtedly required and at last obtained from Liberius, it may be replied that after the banishment of the latter the attitude of the Emperor was such as to deter the emperor and his advisers from the dangerous step of elevating an avowed heretic to St. Peter's chair. Still, from the charge of association with Arians and toleration of their communion, and also apparently of perjury, Felix cannot with any probability be regarded as free. Probably, like Liberius, he was all the time orthodox at heart, and avowed his orthodoxy boldly, as Liberius did, when pressure was removed.

Though Felix, as well as Liberius, has obtained a place in the list of lawful popes, and has even been canonized, it is evident from what has been shown that his claim to such a place is more than doubtful. And, accordingly, Augustin, Optatus, and Eutychius, regarding him (as did Athanasius, Jerome, and Rufinus) as a mere interloper, exclude him entirely from their lists of popes. In the Roman church, however, his claim to the position given him appears to have remained unquestioned till the 14th century, when, an emendation of the Roman Martyrology having been undertaken in 1582, under Pope Gregory XIII., the question was raised and discussed. Baronius, who was an actor in what took place, relates the circumstances. He himself was at first adverse to the claims of Felix, and wrote a long treatise against them; a cardinal, Sanctorius, defended them. The question was finally decided by the accidental discovery, in the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian in the forum, of a coffin bearing the inscription, "Corpus S. Felix, papae et martyr, qui damnavit Constantium." In the face of this, which seemed like a personal reappearance of the calumniated saint to vindicate his own claims, Baronius was convinced in spite of his own arguments, and retracted all that he had written. (Baron. ad Liberium, c. xii.) Accordingly Felix retained his place in the martyrology, though the title of pope was afterwards expunged from the oratio for his day in the breviary. What became of the inscribed slab is not known. Of course in the absence of any knowledge of its date, its testimony is valueless.

An expedient for justifying the position of Felix as well as that of Liberius among the lawful popes is that of supposing, that the see having become vacant on the banishment, or fall into vacancy, as the latter, the former was legally elected in his place, and continued lawful pope till his death, when Liberius again became so by virtue of a second election (Bellarmine, de Rom. Pontif. l. 4. c. 17). But of any such second election there is no intimation, whether in any existing record. Barouius dispenses with its necessity, supposing Liberius to have resumed his old position, on the next vacancy of the see, after breaking with the Arians (Baron. ad Liber. Irvii.).

The festival of Felix is kept on July 29.

Two spurious decreals are assigned to him by the Pseudo-Isidore. One, addressed to Athanasius and the African bishops, relates to charges against bishops, its object being to protect them, and to reserve appeals to Rome: the other, addressed to the clergy generally, is directed against Arianism, and exhorts to patience under persecution and other trials. [J. B.—y.]

FELIX (3) III. (otherwise II.); see preceding article; bishop of Rome after Simplicius, from March A.D. 483 to February A.D. 492, during nearly nine years. The circumstances attending his election are in the first place noteworthy. They are known to us from the acts of a council held at Rome under Pope Symmachus (498–514). In the synod which was held, it was stated that the clergy having met in St. Peter’s Church for the election of a successor to Simplicius, Basilius (Praefectus Praetorio, and Patrician) interposed in the name of his master Odacce the Herulian, who since the year 476 had ruled the West as king of Italy. This Basilius alleged, as a fact known to his hearers, that Simplicius before his death had conjured the king to allow no election of a successor to take place without his consent; and this for the avoidance of the tumult and detriment to the church that was otherwise likely to ensue. He expressed surprise that the clergy, knowing this, had taken independent action; and proceeded in the name of the synod, to propose a law, prohibiting both the pope to be then elected, and all future popes, from alienating any farms or other possessions belonging to the church; declaring invalid the titles of any who might thus come into possession of ecclesiastical property; requiring the restitution to the church of alienated farms with their proceeds, or the sale for the benefit of religious uses of gold, silver, jewels, and clothes, unfit for church purposes; and further subjecting all donors and recipients of church property to anathema. The assembled clergy seem to have assented to this law, and to have been then allowed to proceed with their election, the choice falling on Caesar Felix, the son of a presbyter, as called Felix. The Roman synod under Symmachus, on the document being read which gave an account of these things, protested against the interference of laymen with the election of a pope which had been allowed on the occasion referred to, and to laymen being presumed to pronounce an anathema, and further requested Symmachus to declare void the law that had been promulgated, as having been enforced by merely lay authority, and, however assented to at the time by bishops, invalid for want of papal confirmation. Sym-machus, while he assented to this request, at the same time caused the synod to re-enact the law against alienating farms, and to extend its prohibitions to all bishops and presbyters as well as future popes. (Syn. Rom. 3, sub Symmacho; Harduin, Concil. vol. ii. p. 977.)

The pontificate of this Felix was chiefly remarkable for the commencement of the memorable schism of thirty-five years, between Rome and the Eastern patriarchates. For a clear understanding of what led to it, a brief reference to certain previous events is in the first place needed. In the year 451 the Council of Chalcedon had condemned the Monophysite or Eutychian heresy, adopting the definition of the schism of thirty-five years, between Rome and the Eastern patriarchates. For a clear understanding of what led to it, a brief reference to certain previous events is in the first place needed. The same council had also enacted certain canons of discipline, of which, the fifth and the seventeen, gave to the patriarchal throne of Constantinople the final determination of canons against Metropolitans in the East and West, and, the twenty-eighth, assigned to the most holy throne of Constantinople or the East, Rome, equal privileges with the elder royal Rome in ecclesiastical matters, as being the second after her, with the definite right of retaining metropolitans in the Pontic, and Asia, and those in Asia, and those in the islands of Barbarians therein. This last canon the legates of Pope Leo, present at the council, had protested against at the time, and Leo himself had afterwards repudiated it, as contrary (as he expressed himself) to the Nicene cases, and an undue usurpation on the part of the see of Constantinople.

It was in connexion both with the heresy, condemned by the council of Chalcedon, and with the privileges assigned by its canons to the see of Constantinople, that the schism between the East and West ensued during the pontificate of Felix.

The condemnation of Monophysitism at Chalcedon by no means silenced its obloquy. In the church of Alexandria they were especially strong and resolute. There, A.D. 477, Peter Mousas (or the Stammerer) had by them been elected patriarch, but had been deposed by the Emperor Zeno in favour of Timotheos Solofacvus, who professed orthodoxy. The latter prelate dying in 492, Peter Mousas was again elected by supporters to the patriarchal throne in opposition to John Talmas, who was elected by the orthodox. At first the Emperor Zeno, and Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, opposed Peter’s appointment, the former ordering his expulsion, and the latter writing to Pope Simplicius against him. Soon, however, Acacius (offended, according to the account Liberat. de Constant. Talmas not having sent him the usual synodal letters announcing his election, and penned by the emissaries of Peter Mousas) induced the emperor to accept the latter on condition of his signing the Henoticon, a formula of faith, ambiguous, or pronounced. Which Zeno at this time put forth under the advice of Acacius in the hope that all parties might come to terms by signing it. John Talmas now fled to Rome to solicit the support of Pope Simplicius, who wrote to Zeno and Acacius, complaining of the expi-sion of John, and insisting that Peter should either be required to accept the faith of Chalcedon, or be expelled from communion. After the death of Simplicius in 483, Felix at once took up the cause. In a synod at Rome he condemned the Heptasulon, renewed his predecessor's excommunication of Peter Mogus, and addressed also letters to Zeno and Acacius, which were despatched by the hands of two bishops, Misenus and Vitalis, to whom was joined Felix, Defender of the Roman church. In his letter to Acacius he urges him to comply at length with the injunction of Simplicius, by supporting the faith of Chalcedon, renouncing Peter Mogus, and inducing the emperor to do the same. With this letter he sent also a formal summons (citation libellum) requiring Acacius to appear at Rome and there answer before a synod to the charge of having disregarded the injunction of Simplicius, and to other charges brought against him by John Talaias. In his letter to Zeno, having said that he had waited in vain for a reply to the letter of his predecessor, he implores the emperor to refrain from rending the seamless garment of Christ, and, following the steps of Simon the Greco and of Felix, to remove all support of the one faith which had raised him to the imperial dignity, the faith of the Roman church, against which the Lord had said that the gates of hell should not prevail. He urges him also not to shrink from severe measures of coercion. To this letter also was added a more formal document (impersonation libellum), in which the usurpation of Peter Mogus is described, as requiring expiation, affecting the whole Eastern church, and implicating Acacius. Mention is also made of the charges brought against Acacius by John Talaias, and of the summons to submit himself to St. Peter that had been sent to him in accordance with both ecclesiastical and imperial law, and which it is hoped he will attend to without delay. Misenus and Vitalis, charged with these documents, set forth without Felix, who was detained by sickness. At Abydos they were seized, deprived of their papers, and required under threats to communicate with Peter Mogus. Under the same threat, they are said to have been won over by bribes, and, being so allowed to proceed to Constantinople, they complied with the imperial demands. In the meantime Felix was kept informed of what went on there by those steady champions of orthodoxy the "Acometae," or Sleepless Masks, whose abbot, Cyril, had written to him from Constantinople, before the arrival of the legates, to warn him against delay; on which Felix had written to his legates charging them to do nothing till they had consulted Cyril and taken instructions from him. After their compliance at Constantinople Cyril sent messages to Rome informing the pope that the name of Peter Mogus was at length openly, and no longer secretly as before, read from the diphythys in the presence of Misenus and Vitalis, that the latter openly communicated with him and Acacius, and that a man (who had been ordained by two heretics only) had, after the flight of John Talaias, presumed the orthodox, and had been supported in all his acts by Acacius. The account of things sent by letter to Felix by the emperor and Acacius was, that John Talaias was deposed for perjury, having accepted the see of Alexandria in defiance of his previous oath that he would never do so; and that Peter Mogus had proved his orthodoxy by signing the Nicene Creed, "belo the steps of the faith of which the Chalcedonian synod also rested." Zeno stated also, in his letter, that Peter Mogus as well as Acacius had actually accepted the faith of Chalcedon. With respect to this last assertion the historians Nicephorus and Evagrius speak of Peter as a Protes, who sometimes declared his acceptance of, and sometimes utterly condemned, the decrees of Chalcedon, obliging his clergy to join in the condemnation. They say that Acacius had manifested with him on this ground, and for having, as was alleged, caused the body of his orthodox predecessor, Timothy Solofacius, to be ignominiously disinterred, but that he had then denied the truth of the charges: also that Zeno had sent a legation to Alexandria to inquire into the matter, which proved without any good result. However, both the emperor and Acacius continued to support Peter, being probably moved thereto by the high tone of the pope quite as much as by their own satisfaction with Peter. After the release of Misenus and Vitalis from confinement at Abydos, Felix, the Defender, arrived at Constantinople, where he was denied access to Acacius, and is said to have been imprisoned and had his papers taken from him. The papal legates having at length returned to Rome, Felix convened a synod of sixty-seven Italian bishops, in which he deposed and excommunicated the two faithless legates, renewed the sentence of excommunication which had been already pronounced against Peter Mogus, and finally published a sentence of deposition and excommunication, which was signed by the sixty-seven bishops, against the patriarch Acacius himself, declaring him to be incapable of being ever loosed from the anathema then pronounced. The sentence alleged against Acacius as the ground of this irreparable sentence were, first, his invasion of the provinces of other bishops, contrary to the canons, in having ordained one John Cordonatus bishop of Tyre, within the province of Antioc, and raised to the priesthood one Hymeron, a deacon, whom the patriarchs had deposed; second, that he would have been unlawful even had the persons promoted been catholics, instead of heretics, as they were; secondly, his communicating with and promoting condemned heretics, especially Peter Mogus; thirdly, his having been a party to the imprisonment and corruption by bribes of the legates sent from Rome; and lastly, his disregard of the summons requiring him to clear himself at Rome of the charges against him, and his refusal to admit even to an interview the Defender Felix, who had been the bearer of this summons. With respect to the first of these charges it is to be observed that what Acacius had done was doubtless in virtue of the authority assigned to him by the canons of Chalcedon, above mentioned, which Pope Leo had repudiated; and with respect to the power assumed by Felix, alleged to be according to ecclesiastical and imperial law, of summoning a patriarch of Constaninople, the latter supreme, the latter proceeded, and was doubtless that of the canons referred to previously by Pope Leo as contravened by the objectionable canons of Chalcedon, and by him on that occasion called Nicene. In both instances the canons meant appear to have been those of Sardica. A council held at this place in 343, being one of Western bishops only, had given appellate jurisdiction over metropolitans to Julius then bishop of Rome: and these canons had been erroneously referred to by subsequent popes (beginning with Zosimus, A.D. 415) as Nicean, and interpreted as giving not only appellate but also coercive jurisdiction to the bishops of Rome perpetually over the whole church. Felix also addressed letters to the emperor, to the clergy and monks of Constantinople, and to those of the patriarchates of Antioch and Alexandria, acquainting them with the judgment. The conveyance of these documents to Constantinople, and their promulgation there, was a task of difficulty and danger. It was entrusted to one Tutus, an aged Roman ecclesiastic and Defender of the church, who, after arriving at his destination, was, like the legates sent before, won over by bribes, and himself communicated with Acacius. The sentence of excommunication was at last served on Acacius by one of those zealous champions of Felix, the sleepless monks, who had in some way obtained from Tutus the fateful parchment. He effected his purpose by fastening it on a window through which he could afterwards officiate in church. The patriarch discovered it, but proceeded with the service without regarding it, and then, in a calm, clear voice, ordered the name of Felix, bishop of Rome, to be erased from the diplomas of the church. This memorable occurrence was on August 1, A.D. 484. And another, on the 26th of November, Charles, nephew of the emperor, stood mutually excommunicated, and the first great schism between the East and West, which lasted thirty-five years, began. The emperor, and the great majority of the prelates of the East, supported Acacius; and thus the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, as well as that of Constantinople, remained out of communion with Rome. Felix, having excommunicated his emissary Tutus, wrote to the monks of Constantinople and Bithynia, acquainting them with the fact, and warning them to hold no communion with the deposed Acacius. The latter, however, in spite of the pope, retained his see undisturbed till his death. As to John, he was deposed and excommunicated, and had been the immediate cause of the quarrel, Felix, unable to procure his elevation at Alexandria, made him bishop of Nola in Campania, where he ended his days (Libertatus, Breviset).

Another noted Monophysite who, as well as Peter Mongus, had excited the orthodox zeal of Felix was another Peter, called Fullo (i.e. the Fuller), who during the reign of the Emperor Leo had been raised by his party to the patriarchal throne of Antioch, and had been several times deposed and reinstated. Eutychianism was not the only heresy of which he was accused. He had added to the Sermanticus the clause, 'They are crucified for Thee,' thus attributing passibility to the Godhead. To him, therefore, from a Roman synod, Felix had addressed a letter of earnest remonstrance, which is extant, accusing him of a multitude of heresies, especially in respect to his addition to the Sermanticus, and imploring him to stop in his course. 'If he hearkened to this letter, and another addressed to him by Felix, being disregarded, the latter sent him a final synodal letter, which is also extant, in which, in the name of Peter, the chief of the apostles and the head of all sees, he pronounced a sentence of deposition and excommunication. He also wrote to the emperor announcing Peter's excommunication, and urging his expulsion from Antioch. Acacius also, as well as other bishops, had written to this Peter in strong reprobation of his addition to the Sermanticus, and in the final sentence pronounced by Felix they are alluded to as concurring, or being expected to concur, in the sentence. But after the rupture between Rome and Constantinople in 484, Acacius pro pre further proof of his defiance of the pope by reinstating the heretical patriarch in his see. This appears from the letter of a Roman synod, dated Oct. 5, 485, and signed by forty-three bishops, to the clergy and monks of the East. The immediate purpose of this letter is to apprise the orthodox Easterns of the excommunication of Acacius, the knowledge of which, they say, might possibly have been kept from them, and to induce them to concur in it. They therefore send a copy of the sentence, and detail the circumstances that had led to it, and they say in some pains to explain to the Orientals the immemorial custom of the church when absent, and the reasons for their deviation from it (they say) by the Council of Nice, that the pope, as St. Peter's successor, should determine and confirm all things done in synods, thus implying a little doubt as to the acquiescence of the Easterns in this view. They then go on to state how Acacius had proceeded to such a pitch of impudent presumption as to excommunicate the Bishop of Christ's deposition of the Bishop of Christ's deposition, and how lately (as they heard) deposed from the see of Antioch the holy bishop Calentinus and put Peter, whom he had himself often before condemned, in his place. They conclude with an anathema against Peter Mongus, Acacius, Peter Fullo, and all their followers.

In the year 489 Acacius died, and was succeeded by Flavitas, or Fravitas. Felix, having of the vacancy of the see, wrote to Thalson, an archimandrite of Constantinople, warning him and his monks (who appear throughout to have espoused the cause of Rome) to communicate with no successor to Acacius till the see of Rome had been fully apprised of all proceedings, and had declared his renunciation of communion. Thalson, thereupon, sent a letter to the pope, who declared to him that ecclesiastics had been deposed from communion. Flavitas, after his election, unwilling (as Nicephorus expresses it) to be deposed without the consent of the Roman pontiff, sent a legation to Rome charged with letters, in which he declared his renunciation of Peter Mongus, and craved intercommunion. The legation was accompanied by some of the Constantinopolitan monks, who seem to have given a good account of the orthodoxy of the new patriarch. But when Felix intimated to the messengers the necessity of the name of Acacius, as well as that of Peter Mongus, being erased from the diplomas, they replied that they had no instructions to that effect, and were contented with merely inserting a letter from the pope to Flavitas insuring compliance with the condition required. Nicephorus states that Flavitas had written also to Peter Mongus declaring his communion with him and his renunciation of Felix, and that it was the pope's having heard of this double dealing that caused the disaffection and contumely. But of this the extant letter of Felix to Flavitas makes no mention. Flavitas having died within four months after his election.
FELIX III.—Pope

The pope's letter to him, as well as a reply from Peter Mousos, was received by his successor Euphemius. The letter of Peter condemned the Council of Chalcedon, and Euphemius in consequence at once broke off communion with him, removing with his own hand his name from the diplomas. He also replaced the name of Felix, to whom he sent letters, as his predecessor had done, professing his own orthodoxy, and desiring intercommunion. Felix, though satisfied as to the faith of Euphemius, still insisted on the erasure of the name of Acacius, which condition being still demanded by the, breach was not continued.

In the April of the year 491 the Emperor Zeno died, and was succeeded by Anastasius, to whom Felix sent a congratulatory letter. The new emperor, whose policy at that time was one of toleration towards all religious dissentants, was not recorded to have replied; and on the 24th of February in the following year Felix himself was removed by death.

Between the date of his rupture with the East and that of his death Felix had been employed in helping to reconstitute the African church, which had lately suffered under persecution at the hands of Julianus. This, however, had so subsided that the bishop of Carthage had met to compose the breach with great cruelty under king Hunneric, who died in 484, had ceased under his nephew and successor Gundamund, when a number of apostates sought readmission to catholic communion. A synod of thirty-eight bishops was held at Rome under Felix in the year 488, the result of which was a synodical letter from him, dated the 15th of March in that year, laying down the following terms of readmission:—1. Bishops, priests, and deacons, who had allowed themselves to be rebaptized by the Arians, whether willingly or under pressure, were to do penance during life, and be admitted to lay communion only at the point of death. 2. Others, whether clerics, monks, virgins, or laity, who had been rebaptized voluntarily, were to be received on condition of repentance, after twelve years, of which three were to be passed among the ancients, seven among the novices, and two more of which were to be spent in the refutation of a book of the vatican, being still allowed them during any period of their penance if at the point of death. 3. Persons not being bishops, priests, or deacons, who had been rebaptized under pressure of persecutions, were to be admitted to communion after three years' penance, and imposition of hands. In all cases those who had been rebaptized were declared incapable of ordination. Children who had been rebaptized were, on the ground of the ignorance incident to their age, to be admitted to communion after a short period of penance.

Felix is honoured as a saint in the Roman calendar on the 25th of February. His extant works are fifteen letters, to most of which reference has been made. Of these seven were first published by Sirmonti in 1631. Gratian gives further a decretum as his, to the effect that the pope will yield to priests in ecclesiastical cases.

The ancient authorities for his life are his own letters and those of his successor Gelasius, the Breviarium of Liberatus Diaconus, and the Church Histories of Evagrius Scholasticus and Zosimus Callistus.

FELIX IV.—Pope

FELIX (4) IV., (otherwise III.; see FELIX II.), bishop of Rome from July 526 to October 530, during four years, two months, and fourteen or eighteen days (Anastas. Biblloth.). The same authority states further that he was a Samnite, the son of his father's name Castoridi, that he built the basilica of SS. Cosmas and Damian, restored that of the martyr St. Saturninus which had been burnt, and that he was buried on the 12th of October, in the basilica of St. Peter. There is little to be told of this pope, except the circumstances of his appointment. His predecessor, John I., had died in the prison of Ravenna, into which he had been thrown by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, who then ruled the West as king of Italy. On his death Theodoric took the unprecedented step of appointing his successor on his own sole authority, without waiting for the customary election by the clergy and people. His choice fell on Felix, to whom there seems to have been no objection on the ground of personal character or belief. This high-handed proceeding seems to have been resisted for some time, but at length acquiesced in, the see having been kept vacant for probably owing to the long delay. This appears from a letter from Athalaric, who succeeded Theodoric in the same year, to the Roman Senate, in which he commends that body for having at length acquiesced in Theodoric's nomination, accepting "a man probably instituted by divine grace, and commended by the royal examination." He also reminds them that there was no disgrace in having had to yield to a prince, and hopes that no one may ever be affected by the past contention (Casiodor. lib. 8, Ep. 15). No subsequent king or emperor laid claim to a like power of interference in the appointment of popes, freedom of election being henceforth allowed, as before, to the clergy and people, though the confirmation of elections by the civil power was insisted on, and continued till the election of Zachary in 752, when the confirmation of the arch of Ravenna, as representing the Eastern emperor, was first dispensied with by the Western emperor. The same continued to be the theory of papal elections till the appointment was given to the College of Cardinals during the pontificate of Nicholas II., A.D. 1059. (For previous interventions of the civil power see articles on Boniface, Exulianus, Felix III., Symmachus, Laurentius.) Theodoric died only ninety-eight days after the death of John I. (Anastas. Biblloth.), an awful account of his end being given by Procopius (de Bell. Goth. lib. i.), the horrors of which have been regarded as a judgment for his treatment of the deceased pope, and his general insurrection towards the church. (Baronius on Felix IV.)

The only further event known as marking the pontificate of Felix is the issue of an edict by Athalaric, the grandson and successor of Theodoric, requiring all civil suits against ecclesiastics to be preferred before the bishop and not the secular judge, on pain of the latter losing his suit, and forfeiting ten pounds of gold, to be distributed by the bishop to the poor. If, however, the bishop should fail to render justice, application was to be allowed to the secular judge. The edict was called forth by Felix, with the Roman clergy, having complained to Bishops in Alphabetical Order of their Seats or Countries.

BISHOPS IN AFRICA, WITH NO SEES NAMED.

FELIX (5), African pseudo-bishop, temp. Cypri. [PRIVATUS.] [E. W. B.]

FELIX (6), African bishop. [Cypri. Ep. 56; AHNIMNIUS.] [E. W. B.]

FELIX (7), African bishop (in Syn. iv. Carth. de Basileide, A.D. 254; Cypri. Ep. 87). It is useless to try to settle which other Felix he is, or to identify with. [E. W. B.]

FELIX (8), African bishop. [Cypri. Ep. 57; Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. 2 de Facce.] [E. W. B.]

FELIX (9), African bishop in Syn. Carth. 5, sub Cypri. de Bap. Haer. 1; Cypri. Ep. 70. [E. W. B.]

FELIX (10), a bishop mentioned in a letter of Constantine to the bishops of Numidia concerning the restoration to the Catholics of a church at Cirta, of which they had been deprived by the Donatists A.D. 330. [Mon. Vet. Don. p. 215, ed. Oberthür.] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (11), the name of one or more than one Donatist bishop, to whom St. Augustine wrote at the same time as to Eulinus. [ELUSINUS (1).] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (12), a bishop, to whom, as well as to Hilarinus, St. Augustine wrote concerning Bonifacius, a presbyter, whom he considered to have been unjustly accused, and therefore not deserving of removal from his office. [Aug. Ep. 77.] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (13), a bishop, present at the council of Milevis, or Mileum, in Numidia, held against the Pelagians, A.D. 416. [Aug. Ep. 176, 162.] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (14), a bishop, present at the council of Carthage against the Pelagians A.D. 416. He was, perhaps, the same as he on whose behalf St. Augustine wrote a letter of introduction to Valerius, count of Africa. [Ep. 175, 181, 186.] [H. W. F.]

FELIX (15), bishop of Abarca, in the province of proconsular Africa, only of the Catholic bishop banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484, after the convention at Carthage. Ruinart identifies him with the paralytic FELIX ABDINUSCAUS (No. 15). [Morn. Antiq.CHRIST. 1, 59; Notitiae in Vet. Vit. 55, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvi.] [L. D.]

FELIX (17), bishop of Abbir Major, banished by Hunneric in 484, after the convention at Carthage. He was aged and paralysed, having been a bishop forty-four years, and he had to be strapped upon the animal which carried him to his desert exile. [Victor Vit. Vandal. ii. in Patr. Lat. lxxvi. 209; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 61.] [C. H.]

FELIX (18), bishop of Abors, in the province of proconsular Africa, subscribed the letter which the bishops of that province sent to Paul, the patriarch of Constantinople, against the errors of the Monothelites, which letter is to be found in the acts of the Lateran council, 649. [Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 64; Mansi, x. 940.] [L. D.]

FELIX (19), bishop of Accl. [Id. Val. Gesch.]

FELIX (20), bishop of Adermatum (Heliogabalum), the metropolis of the Byzacena province of Africa; exiled by Genericius, A.D. 453, because he had entertained John, a foreign monk [Victor Vit. Persac. Vandal. i. 7.] The Notitia makes no mention of this see; or in the list of these exiled by Hunneric, so that Felix is thought to have lived in exile till A.D. 484. [Morcelli, Africa Christ. 1. 63.] [L. D.]

FELIX (21), bishop of Agrigentum (Girgentum), present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelites. [Hefele, § 307; Mansi, x. 866.] [A. H. D.]

FELIX (22), bishop of Ambi, in the African province of Mauretania Caesariensi, a town known only from the mention of this bishop; among the Catholic bishops exiled by the Vandal king, Hunneric, A.D. 484. [Notitiae in Vet. Vit. 59, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvi.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. 1. 75.] [L. D.]

FELIX (23), first recorded bishop of Aquania, or Anagni, present at the Roman council held 487 under Felix III. [Mansi, Concil. ii. 1171; Ugheb. Ital. Socr. i. 307.] [C. B.]

FELIX (24), bishop of Antium (Anzio), present at the council mentioned in the preceding article. [Mansi, vii. 1171 a; Ugheb. Ital. Socr. xiv.] [C. B.]

FELIX (25), bishop of Apollonia in Srv Epiro, present at the council of Ephesus in 431 [Mansi, iv. 1125 a, 1368]. His first signature appears to describe him as likewise bishop of the neighbouring city of Bullis. (Farlati, Ital. Sacr. vii. 396.)

FELIX (28) I, bishop of Aptungus, a person around whom has raged a tempest of controversy, the centre of which may be said to have been the condemnation of Cassilianus to the see of Carthage (vol. i. p. 867). The place of which he was bishop is written variously, Aptungus, Abtungae, and Autumnae; but its situation is uncertain, except that it has been in some processual Africa, and probably not far from Zama, between it and Furius (Opt. i. 18). It must have been of a place of some importance, for it possessed a municipal government, of whose principal officers the names and titles of some are recorded (Mon. Vet. Rom. pp. 160–167, ed. Oebertur). His history begins at the death of Memurias, when Cassilianus having been chosen as his successor by the vote, as we are told, of the whole people, Felix of Autumnae was one of those who laid hands on him, if not the sole officiating bishop, A.D. 311 (Aug. Brecol. Coll. iii. 14, 26 · 10, 29). He was not only not distinctly condemned as a Christian, but was not even cast out by the church earlier than the council of Nice, A.D. 325 (Conc. Nic. c. 4; Bruns. i. p. 18).

When the storm began to rage against Cassilianus, an important element lay in the question, whether, previously to his own appointment to a Christian bishopric, Felix himself had not been guilty of the infamous crime of "tradition" (vol. i. p. 881). He was consequently denounced without scruple by the enemies of Cassilianus, as the "fountain head of all the subsequent evils" (Aug. Ep. 88, 3; c. Cresc. iii. 61). But though many indirect complaints were made, no formal examination appears to have taken place into the case of Felix, until the Donatist party had failed to establish their case against Cassilianus in the Court of Enquiry held at Rome, under Melchiades, October 2, A.D. 313. Fieled in this attempt, and also in the results of the enquiry as to the true position of the Catholic church, which ended in Africa under Konstantius and Olimpius, at the direction of the emperor, they turned their attack on Felix, and the emperor gave orders to Aelianus, the proc- soil of Africa, to hold an enquiry on the spot, which took place on February 15, A.D. 314, eleven years after the facts (Aug. Const. Coll. 28, 56; Ep. 43, 3–14; 88; c. Cresc. iii. 61). It was held at Carthage in the presence of many persons who had held municipal offices at the time of the persecution, A.D. 303, 304. The prosecutor was Maximus, a Donatist, the counsel on the Catholic side, Aprianus, but Felix himself was not present. The principal witness was Alibus Cassilianus, formerly chief magistratus at Aptungas ("dunmivir, sedilis, magistratus"), who deposed that when the imperial officials came to execute the edict at the house of Felix, he was reported to be absent, but that a man named Giosias went with them to the church, from which they had removed the episcopal chair and other certain documents ("epistolarum notaritiae") not belonging to holy Scripture, and all the doors, and then burnt all these publicly. And now came a piece of fraudulent testimony, which, if it had been proved true, would have substantiated the charge against Felix. At some time later than the events just now described, a man named Maurus purchased, it was said, the bishopric of Zama, for which he was publicly denounced by Felix. A man named Ingenuus, a friend to Maurus, formerly secretary to Augustus, a former colleague of Cassilianus in the sedition, was sent to arrange with his friend Felix with "tradition" at the time of the persecution. In order to prove this, he paid a visit to Cassilianus, bearing with him a letter which purported to have been sent by Felix to his friend Cassilianus, to the effect that he had in his possession, though not of his own property, certain papers, namely, a letter in number, which he was unwilling to surrender, and with this view wished his friend Cassilianus to say that, as inquisitor, he had burnt them at the time of the persecution, intending by this clumsy device to make him an accomplice, in suggesting that they had belonged to Felix, and that the latter had thus been guilty of "tradition." At first he came alone, but when Cassilianus endeavoured to drive him away, he brought with him on a second occasion Augustus, the friend of Cassilianus, to support his request. Cassilianus dictated to Augustus a letter, in which he said he had been present when Felix wrote it, at the time of the search. The letter is imperfect, but clearly contains no account of any act of "tradition" on the part of Felix, and it concludes with the usual salutation. To this last, however, Ingenuus made a fraudulent addition, to the effect that Felix had given direction to the officials about taking with them the key of the place in which the books were deposited, so that they might fulfil their purpose concerning them, but desiring them to spare the oil and flour used for sacred purposes. This forged postscript was of course intended to implicate both Felix and Cassilianus, but under threat of torture, he confessed the fraud, as well as the fact that he travelled about the country endeavouring to stir up opposition to the Catholic church. Thus self-convicted, the procurator sentenced him to be imprisoned at the pleasure of the emperor, and pronounced a judgment of complete exsultation in favour of Aquileia. In the name of the emperor in a letter to Probianus, the successor of Aelianus, in which he ordered Ingenuus to be sent to Rome. This decision was repeated in a letter to Verinus, or Valerius, the vicar of Africa, A.D. 321. The case of Cassilianus and Felix, though not named, is no doubt implied in the thirteenth canon of the council of Arles, which prescribes caution in removing from the clerical order persons accused of "tradition." The whole case was brought up again at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, and the absence of Felix at the time of the enquiry was pressed hard by the Donatists as a fatal defect in the integrity of the acquittal, but Augustine argued that his absence was, in truth, an argument for its fairness, that all the documents were in existence, and that there was no doubt of the completeness of the imperial decision. (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 81, iv. 79; de Unit. Bapt. 28; Brecol. Coll. 41, 42; Post. Coll. 56; Mon. Vet. Rom. pp. 160–167, 169, ed. Oebertur; Bruns. Conc. i. 108; Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. 92.)

in opposition to Maximus. The latter signs the first at the Lateran council in 649 (Mansi, x. 866 a.; De Rubeis, Monum. Ecc. Aquil. 303; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. viii. 71, 555). Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. v. 33) believes there is authority for regarding both the bishops as one, under the name of Maximus Felix. [C. H.]

FELIX (39), bishop of Aquisira, in Mauretania Caesariensis, identified by Morcelli with Artigasia; exiled by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitiae in Victor. Vit. 59, Migne, Patrol. Lat. iv.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 81.) [L. D.]

FELIX (30), twenty-ninth bishop of Arles, between John I. and Walbert; signs with the following. (G. C. i. 549; Mansi, xi. 506.) [C. H.]

FELIX (81), bishop of Ascoli, signed the second Epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third Council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 303; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX, bishop of Asturica (Astorga) (No. 99.) [C. H.]

FELIX (38), bishop of Atino, said to have been consecrated by pope Pelagius in 592, and to have sat thirty years, preceding Gauldentinus. A chronicle quoted by Ughelli makes him a martyr. (Ugh. Ital. Sacr. vi. 498; x. 592.) [C. H.]

FELIX (33), bishop of Bagai (interesting place, see Morcelli), in Numidia; present at the seventh synod of Carthage under Cyprian, the third on Baptism, A.D. 256. (Sent. Epp. 12.) He was one of the nine martyr bishops of the mines of Sigus. [NEMESIAN.] (Cyp. Ep. 76, 77.) [E. W. B.]

FELIX (34), bishop of Baianae, in the province of Numidia; present at the council of Carthage, under Gratus, A.D. 349, where he seems to have held the position of primus of his province, since he is named first among the bishops present in the praesidio to the canons then enacted; the Numidian province was always reckoned next to the proconsular. (Mansi, iii. 144; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 94.) [L. D.]

FELIX (36), bishop to the Barbaricains (146). [C. H.]

FELIX (37) L., c. 520, bishop of Benevento. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 21; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. viii. 17.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (38) II., c. 585, bishop of Benevento. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 21; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. viii. 17.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (39), bishop of Bellanum (Bellon) c. A.D. 347. His successor was Joannes. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 108, 214.) Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. v. 146) dates him 547. [R. S. G.]

FELIX (40), bishop of Berecina, in Numidia, a town not mentioned by geographers. He is the first of the list of the Numidian bishops exiled by king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitiae in Victor.) [C. E.]

FELIX.—BISHOPS

Vit. 56, Migne, Patrol. Lat. iv.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 101.) [L. D.]

FELIX (41), thirteenth bishop of Besancon, succeeding St. Claudius II. and followed by Tetradius II. at the beginning of the 6th century. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xv. 18) quote the work of an anonymous canon of St. Paul's at Besancon to the effect that Felix gave himself up to intemperance and plundered the goods of the church. The canon followed his example, and exceeded all bounds in their violence and debauchery, so that the citizens at last rose in indignation, and saying some, drove the others from the city. Felix, in alarm for his own life, fled into Upper Burgundy, where he died. [S. A. B.]

FELIX (43), seventh bishop of Bononia (Bologna), a native of Milan, and a pupil and deacon of Ambrose, at whose death he was present. He became bishop of Bologna, c. A.D. 400, succeeding St. Eusebius. He died A.D. 429, and was succeeded by St. Petronina. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii.; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacr. x. 161.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (45), ST., twenty-fourth bishop of Bourges, following St. Probianus and succeeded by Remedia. He was consecrated by Germanus of Paris, A.D. 568 (Venant. Fort. Vit. S. Germani, liii.; Patr. Lat. iv. 477). In 573 he subscribed the fourth council of Paris and the letter of the same council to Sigebert. (Mansi, xi. 867, 869.) Venantius Fortunatus has some verses addressed to Felix in praise of a pyx (turris) which he had made of gold to contain the host (lib. iii. c. 25. Patr. Lat. iv. 477). There is a Felix mentioned in the will of Bertram bishop of Le Mans (to be found in Patr. Lat. iii. 402), whom Le Coët supposes to be Felix of Bourges (Ann. Ecc. Franc. an. 615, an. xiii. tom. ii. 688). The year of his death is unknown, but he was buried in the church of St. Austrepius de Castro in the suburbs. Gregory of Tours says that at his tomb, which was of Parian marble, many miracles were wrought, and that nearly twelve years after his death his body was found to be untouched by corruption (Greg. Tur. Li. de Glor. Confess. cap. 102). [S. A. B.]

FELIX (47), bishop of Brosca, 817. Certain inscriptions are quoted by Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 565) to show that Theodelinda caused a baptistery to be erected in Como during his episcopate. [A. E. D. A.]

FELIX (48), bishop of Bulla, in proconsular Africa, exiled by Hunneric after the conference of 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 55; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 197.) [C. E.]
FELIX—BISHOPS

FELIX (49), Donisat bishop of Bulla Regia, an important town on the confines of proconsular Africa, four days W. S. W. from Carthage (now probably Bul Bull. (Ant. Itin. 43, 4), present at Cath. Conf. a.d. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 420, ed. Oertber.)

[F. W. F.]

FELIX (60), bishop of Bullis in Illyria. V. of Apollonia.

FELIX (61), African bishop, "a Balsacensis," in Prov. Proc. From an unexpected inscription in Maffei, Morcelli concludes that this is a corruption of "Colonia Balsica Lucana" (v. l. Bastiacgenis, abustiacgeni, abusti lacinii). He was present at the council of Carthage, under Cyprian a.d. 253, and gave his opinion that questions of rebaptizing heretics ought each of them to be decided on their own merits, and not only by the general custom of the church. (Cypr. Squall. Lpp. 83; Ang. de Bapt. iii. 8, 11.) [E. W. B.]

FELIX (62) of Caesar Augustus (Saragossa), wrote to Cyprian and the African bishops on affair of Basilides. (Ep. 67, vi.) As to the question whether he was bishop of Saragossa, see Baluze & loc. (ap. Bouth, Ref. S. p. 158). But it seems likely that he is the "Felix prebymyster" of the title.

FELIX (63), bishop of Calahorra, signs the acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo, a.d. 695, in the sixth year of Egica. For a discussion of the late tradition which connects this bishop with the St. Felix now venerated in the episcopal of Calahorra, see Risco, Exp. Squall. iiii. 162. (Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 335.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (64), bishop of Camerino, signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 689, after a synod in Rome, to the third Council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 302; Hezela, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

[F. W. F.]

FELIX (66), bishop of Canessa, or else Canessa (No. 154).

FELIX (67), bishop of Caris, near Carthage, in the proconsular province of Africa; banished to the island of Corsica by the Vandal king Huneric, a.d. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 55, Migne, PatroL Lat. iv. ; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 122.) [L. D.]

FELIX (68), bishop of Casae Nigrae, in the province of Numidia; banished with the preceding. (Notitia, 56; Morcelli, i. 124.) [L. D.]

FELIX (69), bishop of Castellum, in Mauretania Stilensis, one of many towns of this name in Africa; banished with the preceding. (Notitia, 59; Morcelli, i. 128.) [L. D.]

FELIX (60), i. nineteenth bishop of Chalonsur-Marne, succeeding St. Leudomerius, and followed by Ragnobaudus. He was one of the bishops who in a.d. 589 signed the letter to Gundegesius, archbishop of Bordeaux, on the disturbances in the monastery of St. Croix, at Poitiers [Chrodonlidian. He was also present at the council of Rheims in 625. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 41; Mansi, x. 594; Gall. Christ. ix. 863.) [S. A. B.]

FELIX (61), ii., 25th bishop of Chalonsur-Marne succeeding Chauflus, and followed by Bladadus, about the beginning of the 6th century. The name alone survives. (Gall. Christ. ix. 863; Gams, Series Episc. 534.) [S. A. B.]

FELIX (62), bishop of Cisterna (No. 168).

FELIX (68), 27th bishop of Clermont, succeeding Gyronius and followed by Garivaldus in the latter half of the 7th century. He was buried in the church of St. Stephen. (Gall. Christ. ii. 245.) [S. A. B.]

FELIX (64), Et., a bishop of Como, to whom Ambrose's third and fourth letters are addressed. Ambrose had ordained him bishop, and calls the day of his ordination his birthday. The letters show him to have been an intimate friend of Ambrose, and highly successful in his ministry at Como.

[J. L. D.]

FELIX (55), bishop of Compostella (99).

FELIX (66), bishop of Cremona, 537, a native of Cremona, died 562. (Cappelletti, La Chiesa d'Italia, xii. 128; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 561.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (67), bishop of Crepulius, in the Byzacene province of Africa, according to Morcelli on the coast; banished by the Vandal king Huneric after the conference of Carthage, a.d. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 57, Migne, PatroL Lat. ivii. Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 141.) [L. D.]

FELIX (68), bishop of Curnis or Curubes, a town in the proconsular province of Africa; banished to Corsica with the preceding. (Notitia, 55; Morcelli, i. 150.) [L. D.]

FELIX (69), bishop of Diabe. (Optart. de Schism. Don. i. 18, in Patr. Lat. xi. 105, var. lec.) Vit. of Zaba (No. 184.) [C. H.]

FELIX (70), bishop of Diamium (Diena), signs the acts of the 11th council of Toledo, a.d. 575, the last council of the reign of Wamba. At the twelfth and thirteenth councils he was represented by vicars. He died before 684. The first bishop of Diamium was probably Antonius (q. v.) (636), and the see disappears with the Moorish invasion. The bishop was a suffragan of Toledo. (Exp. Squall. vii. 212; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 247.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (71), bishop of Dumium (129).

FELIX (72), the apostle of the East Angles and first bishop of Dunwich. He was born and ordained in Burgundy, and, having offered his services as a missionary to Huneric, archbishop of Canterbury, was sent to preach to the East Angles, among whom he settled in the see of Dunwich, ruled for seventeen years and died there. Bede gives the length of the episcopate of Felix and his successors, Thomas, who was bishop for five years, and Berhutgil or Boniface, who ruled for seventeen years, and whose succensor was consecrated by Theodore about the year 670. The date of the appointment of Felix is thus thrown back to the year 631 at the latest, between which year and 627 he probably was consecrated bishop by Honorius, his ordination in his own country having, it would seem, been to priest's orders and not to the episcopate. Felix found the East Angles still heathen, for although Redwald had become a Christian in Kent, he had apostatized on his return home; Eorpwald, his successor, had been converted under the influence of Edwin of Northumberland, but had been murdered almost immediately afterwards; and, after three years of disturbance, Sigebert mounted the throne at the same time that Felix undertook the mission.
Bede describes the conversion of the East Angles as very effectual; it was indeed the only mission of the Kentish church of which so much could be affirmed, as, even here, during the episcopate of Boniface, the Mercian bishop Jaruman had a great share in the establishment of the faith, which, so long as Penda lived, must have been in a very precarious state. Sigebert, after a short reign, retired into a monastery, leaving his kingdom to his kinsman Egovic, and shortly after both Sigeberht and Egovic were killed in battle with Penda. Anna, the next king, and father of a family of saints, occupied the throne during the remaining years of the life of Felix. Although the state of East Anglia was anything but peaceful, Felix managed to found schools and to obtain teachers from Kent, a fact recorded by Bede, and his middle age pressed for an argument for the antiquity of the university of Cambridge.
The death of Felix can scarcely be placed later than 647: he was commemorated as a saint on the 8th of March. The historians of Ely and biographers of St. Etheldreda have added to these details derived from Bede some particulars which may be traditional and are more or less legendary.
According to the Ely history Felix had become acquainted with Sigebert when the latter was in exile in France, and had been a bishop before he undertook the mission (c. 1. p. 13); after his death his body was translated to Seaham or Soham, near Ely, which he had founded; Redham (Reed-ham) also was a church of his foundation. After the Danish invasions his bones were removed Romsey (c. 6, pp. 21, 22). Felix Stowe, on the Suffolk coast, is said to be called from him; and several churches are dedicated in the name of Felix, which may probably be referred to him in preference to the other saints of the name. The church of Felling in Yorkshire is one of these.
Basingdon in Norfolk is no doubt dedicated to him; and the church of Kirby Ravensworth in Yorkshire to St. John the Evangelist and St.
Felix (Parker, Angliom Kalendar, p. 215).
The missionary career of St. Fursey in East Anglia coincides with the early years of Felix, but the two are never mentioned together, although in his time, as in Sigeberht, they must have acted in concert. Probably Felix represented the clerical and energetic missionary element, whilst Fursey was a monk and ascetic.

There is a life of Felix in Capgrave, f. 146, amainly an expansion of Bede's narrative, and another still in manuscript among the lessons of the monks of Dryby. See Hist. Cut. Mon. 234, 235; Bede, H. E. ii. 15, iii. 18, 20, 25;

FELIX—BISHOPS

FELIX (85), African bishop, "a Gurgilitibus" (Suet. Ep. 74, Prov. Byz.), Morcelli conjectures this to have been on river Triton, if so near Cape.

[F. W. B.]

FELIX (86), bishop of Hadrumetum (20).

FELIX (87), bishop of Hierpina, in Byzacae; banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 57; Patrol. Lat. iviii; Morcelli, Africa Chr. i. 170.)

FELIX (88), bishop of Hispelleum (Spello) in Umbria, martyr under Maximian; commemorated May 18. In Usuard the city is named "urbis Spellatensis," which some identify with Spoleto. In preference to this and other possible identifications Henichen, who discusses the question, decides for Hispelleum (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iv. 167).

[C. H.]

FELIX (89), bishop of Hizirzada or Iziria in Numidia, present at the Carthaginian conference is 411. (Gesta Collat. Carth. cap. cxxxiii. p. 271, is Patr. Lat. xi. 1308 a; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 183.)

[C. H.]

FELIX (90), Donatist bishop of Idicira, in Numidia (Oued Bousselah, Ant. Juns. 28, 4), guilty, in conjunction with Urbanus, of great excesses during the period of Donatist ascendancy under Julian, A.D. 361-362, especially at Tipasa (Tefesah), a town on the sea-coast of Mauritania Caesariensis. Unless the language of Origen be grossly exaggerated, the conduct of Felix and his fanatical partisans was brutal, unrelenting, and licentious in the extreme, resembling in all respects, as he describes it, the "wild and desperate wickedness" of soldiers let loose upon a city taken by storm. From Tipasa the party appears to have gone to Tyseeria, a place whose situation is indetermined ("Tididinianus," Gams, Scr. Episc. p. 489), and there to have laid violent hands on Donatus, its septuagenarian bishop, whom they forced by terror into a declaration favourable to their sect, and even, perhaps, to resign his see; but the words which seem to express this may perhaps be taken in a rhetorical description of the violent treatment received by him. (Opt. ii. 19; Tillemont, vol. iv. p. 139.)

[H. W. P.]

FELIX (91), bishop of Interamna (162).

FELIX (92), bishop of Iria Flavia (Compostela), signs the acts of the third council of Braga, 675; in the last place, as Idalpiana qui cognominor Felix, Iriani Ecclesiae Ephoruni. In the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth councils of Toledo (A.D. 681, 683, 688) he appears as Felix Iriensis, and is the last-mentioned council his name takes precedence of thirty-five bishops. The order of seniority in the various signatures is tolerably conclusive for the fact that the Idalpus Felix of the council of Braga is the same as the Felix of the subsequent councils of Toledo. For a notice of the untenable theory that this Felix of Iria afterwards became metropolitan of Seville, and is to be identified with Felix the successor of Julian, see Felix (No. 152). (Exp. Sgr. xii. 58; Aguirre-Catalaní, iv. 265, 270, 297, 312.)

[M. A. W.]

FELIX (93), bishop of Jactera (Zactarna) in Numidia; present as delegate of the Numidian province at the synod of Carthage under Boniface, A.D. 525, and again at the council likewise held at Carthage under Restitutus, A.D. 555, in which was discussed the liberty of monasteries, which he strongly upheld. (Mansi, viii. 647, 841; Morcelli, Africa Chr. i. 188.)

FELIX (94), bishop of Jadera (Zara) in Dalmatia, present at the council of Aquileia, 381, and took part in the condemnation of Theodoricus and Secundianus (Ambrose, Opp. iii. 893). It is probably the same bishop who joins in the condemnation of Jovinianus and others (A. 1044).

FELIX (95), bishop of Janua (Genoa), succeeded St. Valentinus c. A.D. 307. He is said to have been a man of remarkable learning and sanctity. He was succeeded by St. Syrus, who had been his pupil. (UgHELLi, Itali. Sorc. iv. 112; Capelletti, Le Chiese & Stel. xiii. 278.)

[R. S. G.]

FELIX (96), Donatist bishop of Lambia. Lambessa, or Lambese, an important town of Numidia (Lamba, Ant. Itin. 34, 2), alleged to be absent through illness from Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. His name was confounded by the Donatist party with that of Felix of Zuma. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 449, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

FELIX (97), bishop of La Mentana (123).

FELIX (98), bishop of Lameorte in Africa, banished by Hunneric in 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 56; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 192.)

[C. H.]

FELIX (99), one of the two bishops raised to the see of Leon-Astorga and Merida, in the places of their deposed predecessors Basiliades and Martialis (q. v.). Our only information respecting him and his colleague, Sabinus, is derived from St. Cyprian's letter (Ep. 68, Migne, Patr. Lat. ii. 411); Felixus Premaglori et Pheidus consistensibus ad Lectionem et Aristacianum, ibem Lucilio Diciano et Pheidus suavitate consistenter, tertio in Domino. There is considerable difficulty in ascertaining these two sees rightly between the four bishops in question. Baronius, Routh, Dupin and Aguirre make Basiliades and Martialis bishops, not of Leon-Astorga and Merida, but of Leon and Astorga respectively. Tillemon rightly joins the churches of Leon and Astorga, but avoids assigning the bishops, while Ceillier (H. 265, 562-4) holds Basiliades to have been bishop of Leon-Astorga, and Martialis bishop of Merida. Flores does the same, on the ground that as Leon-Astorga is mentioned before Merida and Basiliades are Martialis, therefore the two names must be connected, as also those of Martialis and Merida. This argument is certainly not conclusive. We know from Cyprian's letter that Sabinus was made bishop in the room of Basiliades. His name, however, is mentioned after that of Felix, so that no such inference can really be drawn from the passage of names. Gams (Kirchenlex. von Spornice, i. 236), in contradiction of all previous writers, maintains that Sabinus was made bishop of Merida in the room of Basiliades, and Felix of Astorga and Leon in the room of Martialis, supporting his view by various ingenious arguments drawn from the name of Sabinus and the circumstances. of his election, which are described in some detail by Cyprian [SCHR.15]. If this is accepted Felix would appear as the first bishop of Astorga or Leon, or of both together, known in history. Only one episcopus Legionensis appears in British or Gothic Spain—Decius of Leon, who signs the canons of Eliberti 305 (a signature probably to be understood in the same way as that of Postumius (q. v.) of Emerus, i.e. Porto, C. Tol. iii. 589). [M. A. W.]

FELIX (100), 18th bishop of Limoges, succeeding Simplicius and followed by Adelphius II. [GALL. CHR. ii. 505]. There is a story in the life of St. Eligius, of how St. Eligius, while a layman, obtained the see for Felix from the king. [Vita S. Eligii, ii. 29; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. i. 558]. He was represented at the council of Chalons about A.D. 650, by Paterinus, an abbot (Mansi, x. 1194). In A.D. 650 he wrote a letter to St. Desiderius, Didier of Cahors, which is extant, but in no way remarkable. [Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 266]. [B. A. B.]

FELIX (101), reckoned the seventh bishop of Lucca, between Fullanus and Obequentius, identified by some with the Felix Lucensis (where other readings are Lunensis and Gumiensis) in the list of those present at the Roman council of Hilarius, A.D. 465 (Mansi, Concil. vii. 959; Ugh. Ital. Sacr. i. 794). The reading Lunensis, which makes Felix the first bishop of Luna, a see afterwards transferred to Sarzana, is adopted by Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. i. 844) and Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 420). [H. C.]

FELIX (102), bishop of Lucca. A confirmation by him of goods granted to the monastery of St. Fredianus, in Lucca, c. 685, is given in Troya, Cod. Dipl. ii. 565. Also in Marutari, Antiq. Med. Aev. v. 367. King Cunibert, c. 686, confirmed the charter of Felix, given to the same monastery (Troya, Cod. Dipl. iii. 11). [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (104), Donatist bishop of Magarmonza in Numidia, present at the preceding. [M. V. D. p. 402]. [H. W. P.]

FELIX (105), Donatist bishop of Manazena Regina, in Numidia, present at the preceding. [M. V. D. p. 451]. [H. W. P.]

FELIX (106), bishop of Manfredonia (159). [C. H.]

FELIX (107), bishop of Marazana in Numidia (Anton. Rin. Marazana, in Notitia, “Maraziana” Sentt. Ep. 46), is the “alter Felix,” who is a martyr bishop at Sigua in mines (Cyp. Ep. 76, 79), and the scribe or author of Ep. 79. [C. H.]

FELIX (108), bishop of Martana (Martula), cir. 306; commemorated on Oct. 30, according to Ferrarius (Cat. SS. qui non sunt in M. R.). Jacobillus reckons him the same as the martyr bishop of Bispellum (No. 88), May 18, and as preserving over both sees. [Ugh. Ital. Sacr. x. 129]. [C. H.]

FELIX (109), bishop of Mathur in Numidia; banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, after the conference between the Catholics and Arians at Carthage, A.D. 484. He died in exile. [Notitia in Victor. Vitt. 56, Migne, Patr. Lat. iv. vii.; MERC. Africa Chrish. i. 217]. [L. B.]

FELIX (110), bishop of Mazia in the province of Mauretania Caesariensia; exiled with the preceding. [Notitia; 59; MERC. i. 219]. [L. B.]

FELIX (111), Donatist bishop of Manza, a town of proconsular Africa, perhaps Hamuniel Enf, eighteen miles from Carthage; but, as there was more than one place of the same name, this is not certain. [Dict. Geog. ii. p. 239]. He was present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. [Mon. Vit. Don. p. 442, ed. Oberthür]. [H. W. P.]

FELIX (113), bishop of Metz. Nothing is recorded of him save some incredible stories in the chronicles of the bishops of Metz. He is there said to have ruled for forty-two years, and died in the fourth year of Hadrian, a.d. 121. He was commemorated on Feb. 21. [Gall. Chr. xii. 860; Boll. A.A. SS. 21 Feb. iii. 256]. [R. T. S.]

FELIX (114), 35th bishop of Metz, succeeding Aptatus, and followed by St. Sigibedinus early in the 8th century. The authors of the Galli Christiani (xiii. 703) quote the Codex of St. Symphorian to the effect that he sat nine months, and died on Dec. 22. He is said to have been buried in the church of St. Symphorian. [S. A. R.]

FELIX (115), Donatist bishop of Mopix in Mauretania Sitiensis, in opposition to Leo the Catholic bishop; present at the Carthaginian conference of 411. [Gast. Colat. Carth. cap. 143, 180, in Patr. Lat. xi. 1319 a, 1323 a.]

FELIX (116), bishop of Mura, in the proconsular province of Africa; summoned to a conference with the Arians at Carthage, and subsequently banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, a.d. 484. [Notitia in Victor. Vitt. 56; in Patr. Lat. ivii.; MERC.; Africa Chrish. i. 239]. [L. B.]

FELIX (117), St., elected bishop of Natta in Britannia 550, died 8th January, 582. [Ada Sanctorum, 7th July, ii. 470-77]. He is repeatedly mentioned by Gregory of Tours (iv. 4, 51, v. 32, 50, vi. 15, ix. 39; Liber de Glorio Confessarum, c. 78; Vitae Patrum, c. vi. 4), who says that Felix once wrote him a letter full of reproaches, because Gregory would not yield up some property to him. Gregory says he was careless and boastful, and that he himself replied that if Felix had only been bishop of Marseilles the ships from Egypt would have brought no oil or spices hither, but only paper for the lamps of good men by his writings. [Hist. Fr. v. 4]. He was one of the few Western scholars who knew Greek. Fortunatus, who addressed several poems to Felix (iii. capm. 8), praises him for his... discipline in his diocese after the rebuilding of the churches, which, it seems, had been destroyed by the Goths in the year 410 or 411. He consulted Innocent I., bishop of Rome, on certain difficult points which had arisen. Innocent, commending the deference he had displayed towards the Roman see, which he termed the chief bishopric, proceeds to mention some of the disqualifications for the clerical office. He is surprised that so well informed a man as Felix should have consulted him on points known to all in the world, and his serious labours must have made him forgetful of the canons which had decided all the points he had brought before him. Innocent's reply is placed by Jaffé (Regest. Pontif. p. 26) between the years 402 and 417. (Innocent, Ep. 37, ed. Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 608; Mansi, Concil. iii. 1045, Ep. 4.) Ughelli says he was present at a council with Decentius bishop of Eugubium (Ital. Sacr. i. 1065; see also Gams, Sacr. Episc. 709).

FELIX, bishop of Padua (181).

FELIX, bishop of Palermo, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Heeke, § 307; Mansi, x. 867.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (129), bishop of Paris, mentioned in the Acta S. Genorefan, under the name of Villicus or Julicius. (A.A. SS. Jan. 1. 143 b; Gall. Christ. vii. 15.) Commemorated on Jan. 3. [R. T. S.]

FELIX, bishop of Parium, in the proconsular province of Africa; subscribed the letter against the errors of the Monothelites sent by the synod of his province to Paul, the patriarch of Constantinople, a.d. 646. (Mansi, x. 939; Morcelli, Africa christ. i. 253.)

FELIX (131), bishop of Potawia (Pudus). He succeeded Evagrius c. A.D. 293. He is said to have introduced the practice of burying Christians in a ground apart from the pagans. He died c. A.D. 313, and was succeeded by Paulus, a Roman. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 308; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 484.)

FELIX (132), IL, bishop of Patavium, c. A.D. 523. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 487.)

FELIX (133), III, bishop of Patavium, succeeded Virgilius c. 591, and was succeeded, 609, by Audacius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 309; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 488.)

FELIX (134), ninth in the list of the bishops of Pavia (Ticinum), between Crispinus and Maximus, as given in Ughelli, who places his accession in 253 and his martyrdom on July 15, 255. In some accounts of the bishops of Pavia the place of Felix is occupied by a Crispinus II., a discrepancy discussed by the Bollandists. Gams omits Felix, and places Crispinus and Maximus in the 5th century, with Epiphanius between them. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1078; Roll. Acta SS. Jul. iv. 25; Gams, Sacr. Episc. 800.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX, bishop of Pesaro (Pisurarn), receives a letter from Gregory the Great, blaming him for interfering with a monastery and allowing public men-sangare (lib. vi. indet. epist. 46; Migne, lxvii. 832). [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (137), bishop of Portus Romanus addressed by Gregory the Great (lib. ix. indict. ii. Ep. 29; in Migne, lxixvii. 830). Gregory (Dei. iv. 51, 53) states that Felix was born in the Sabine province, and that to him he owes some of his information. Felix was present at the synod of 595 about the service of the pope, the goods of the church, etc., and also at the synod of 601, which tended to free monasteries from episcopal control. These are two separate synods according to Hefele, §§ 288, 289; according to Jaffé, from a consideration of the signatures there was only one, and that in 595. (Regesta Pont. p. 114; Mansi, ix. 1228, and x. 488.) [H. D. A.]

FELIX (138), bishop of Oporto, A.D. 692, but made metropolitan of Braga by the same sixteenth council of Toledo, which, in consequence of the conspiracy of Sisbert, transferred Felix of Seville to Toledo and Faustinus of Braga to Porto. (Felix (150).) In the latter's edition he is made to sign the acts of the sixteenth council as bishop both of Braga and Porto; but according to four of the council MSS. it should be "Bragensis atque Dumiensis sedem Episcopos." The see of Duinum, which included the monastery of Duinum only, and which was founded in memory of St. Martin of Duinum, was often administered by the bishop of the neighbouring diocese and town of Braga. For the groundless legend of the martyrdom of Felix by the Arabs in 724, see Exp. Sagra. xv. 161, and Boll. A.A.SS. May 15. (Exp. Sagra. xv. 158; Aguirre-Catalán, iv. 333.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (140), archbishop of Ravenna, 708–729. He was consecrated by pope Constantine. At the request of his consecrator he was unwilling in some way to submit to the papal supremacy. Hence his later fate, according to the author of the Life of Constantine, was not undeserved. (Vita Constantini I. in Liber Pontificalis, Migne, cxxxviii. 947.) The people of Ravenna had killed the exarch John Biczopoulos, and had rebelled against the emperor Justinian, who sent a force under Theodore, c. 709, against Ravenna. Felix was captured, and carried off to Constantinople, where he was blinded, and sent into exile in Pontus. Justinian's successor, Philipicus, took pity upon Felix, caused search to be made for his property which had been taken from him, and recovered all except one candlestick. He then gave him presents, and sent him back to Ravenna. Felix died in 724, Nov. 25, and was buried in the church of St. Apollinaris in Classe, where his sarcophagus and epitaph are still to be found. He had written many works, but he caused them to be burnt before his death, because on account of his blindness he could not revise them. One was saved by the priests, a commentary on St. Matt. xxiv. 15, which was extant in the 9th century when Agnellus wrote, but has perished. According to Agnellus, Felix had been head of the monastery of St. Bartholomew, in Raven. (The Life of Felix is given in the Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Rom. of Agnellus, Monum. henn. lat. 478, which is inaccurate in many details, and may be partly corrected from the Liber Pontificalis Vita Constantini I. Migne, cxxviii. 947.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (141), Donatist bishop of Rome, sent thither from Africa by his party, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. Objections were made to his appearance by the Catholic members, as not being an African bishop. Petullia, on the part of the Donatists, defended it as being simply the result of the general migration from Rome at the time of the Gothic invasion. The president pointed out that his duty was to deal with an African question, but admitted his signature on the understanding that this admission was not to prejudice the rights of Innocent, the Catholic bishop who was not present. (Aug. Ep. 53, 2; Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 430–432, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (142), bishop of Rotaria, in Numidia, present at the council of Cirta, A.D. 305, who gave an opinion on the side of moderation. (Aug. c. Crescent. iii. 30; Opt. i. 14.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (143), bishop of Rusubiria (Rusulchar), a port of the province of Mauretania Tingita, but assigned to M. Caesariensis by the Notitia; and the Catholic bishops summoned to Carthage by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484, and subsequently banished by him. (Notitia in Vict. V. 58; Migne, Patr. Lat. lvi.; Mervél, Africa Christi. i. 287.) [L. D.]

FELIX (144) OF SARAGOSSA, probably bishop of Saragosse, described in the letter of Cyriacus and the African bishops on the case of Basilides and Martinus as "ille Felix de Caesaragogus fidel cultor atque defensor veritatis," who had written letters to the council assembled at Carthage, describing the fall of the two deposed bishops. There has been much dispute as to whether he is to be regarded as bishop of Saragosse. Spanish opinion, on the whole, opposed to the bishopric. (See Aguirre, Coll. Mem. Conc. Hisp. i. Diss. 14, Exc. i, and Risco in the Exp. Sagra. xxi. 99.) Nothing, however, can safely be inferred from the substance of the episcopal title, which is equally absent with regard to the catalogue of African bishops given in the supercription of Cyriacus' letter (Ep. 68, apud Migne, Patr. Lat.); and, on the whole, it seems most probable that Felix was bishop of Saragosse. If so, we should have no information, dating from the middle of the 3rd century, of the existence of three bishops in northern Spain—Tarragona (Ferrocruce), Astorga (FELIX), and Saragosse. To these the Spaniards would certainly add Braga, but all the proofs are doubtful. (Exp. Sagra. xxi. 290; Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, i. 283.) [C. No. 52.] [M. A. W.]

FELIX (145), bishop of Sardinia in Occonia in Dacia. This see was subject to the metropolite of Prima Justiniana at the end of the 6th century, but Felix resisted the authority of Joannes, and elicited a severe letter of reproach from Gregory the Great, who threatened further ecclesiastical censures if he refused submission. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. v. 14 in Patrol. Lat. lax. 151. Witsch gives Lycinianus as the name of the minister, who had been transferred to Prima Justiniana, c. A.D. 530. See also Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 281–285.) It is not known whether Felix submitted, or how long he lived. [J. de S.]

FELIX (146), a bishop sent by Gregory the Great, c. 595, together with an abbot Cyriacus, to convert the Barbaricians, an idolatrous portion of the population of Sardinia. Their religious instruction had been neglected by the native bishops, whom Gregory accordingly reproves. (Greg. Mag. Epis. lib. iv. ind., Epist. 23–26.)

[R. S. G.]

FELIX (147), bishop of Sarina, a.D. 495–533, between Aedocatus and Sergius. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Italia, ii. 497, 518.) [C. H.]

FELIX, bishop of Sassari (179).

FELIX (149) II., bishop of Segermis; subscribed the letter which the bishops of his province wrote to Constantine, the son of Heracleius, against the novel doctrines of the Monothelites, A.D. 641; "et Gernissi" in the subscription has been emended into "Segernity ana." (Manni, x. 928; Morelli, Africa Christian. i. 773.) [L. D.]

FELIX (150), bishop of Scelmelay, a town either in the proconsular or Numidian province of Africa. He was present at the council convened at Carthage by bishop Geneiathius, A.D. 390, and was the author of three of the canons there enacted concerning the discipline of the clergy, two of which were afterwards embodied in Gratian’s decretal. (Manni, iii. 693; Moreelli, Africa Christian. i. 273.) [L. D.]

FELIX (152), metropolitan bishop of Seville shortly before C. Tol. xvi. in can. 12 of the council, Siebert of Toledo is deposed for conspiracy against Egica and his family; and Felix, then metropolitan of Toledo in his place, by election of the council, and consent of the clergy and people of Toledo. The council, however, in this only ratified the praedicto and autordis of Egica, "diicti Domini nostrii," who had commanded (justifiably) Felix to assume the charge of the see of Toledo. His election is spoken of as "in praetiriter," and we may probably see it in one of the first excerpts of C. Tol. xxi. 6, which had placed the election of bishops in the hands of the king and the metropolitan of Toledo. In this case, however, the council inserted both the delivery judgment upon Siebert and to confirm the election of Felix, probably because Felix could not confirm himself, and possibly because the strong hand of Julian (i. v.) having been withdrawn, it was felt desirable, at a critical moment for the government, to make some concession to the wishes and the interests of things. This Felix is not to be identified with the Felix bishop of Irin who signs C. Tol. xii. (Exp. Sigr. vi. 285), but rather with the Felix, archbishop of Toledo, who signs the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth councils, and disappears from the lists. Felix of Seville and Toledo is heard of. He was in all probability the friend and protégé of Julian, whose life he wrote, and whose ambitious policy with regard to the see of Toledo he seems to have attempted to carry out, though with inferior ability and vigour. Isidorus Facensias in the 8th century says of him, after some expressions of praise, "concilia satis praecellae etiam adhibec cum ambuscus Principibus agit" (Isid. Pac. Esp. Sigr. viii.). The princes were Egica (687–701) and his son Wittiza, associated with his father in the government from 688; and it has therefore been inferred from this passage that, besides the sixteenth council of Toledo already quoted, Felix presided also at the seventeenth and eighteenth. For his presidency at the seventeenth in 694 we have the authority of Roderic of Toledo (iii. 13), writing from Mss. in which the signatures of the council, not now extant, were contained; and it is of course possible that he survived the eighteenth, under Wittiza, the acts of which are lost, though the passage from Isidore of Beja, already quoted, is our only ground for supposing it. The life of Julian of Toledo, attributed to Felix, and which with Julian’s life of Idefon Mask appears as an addition in many Mss. to the De Viris Ill. of Isidore and Idefonsus, is accepted by Gams as genuine. (Kirchengev. von Spanien, ii. (2) 222; Exposit. Sigr. vi. 316; Aguirro-Catalan, iv. 333; Hefele, Conc. Gesetz. iii. 318, 323.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (154) II., bishop of Spigno (Ugelli, Ital. Soc. vii. 810), addressed by Gregory the Great. In 591 he is requested to take charge of the vacant church of Canusium (Canosa in Apulia, a see afterwards united with Bari) and directed to ordain two porochial presbyters for it (lib. i. ind. i. ep. 53). Ugelli (Ital. Soc. vii. 790) on the authority of this letter places Felix as commendatarius among the bishops of Canusia, having evidently so read the name of the church. In 593 Felix is bidden to make, with two notaries of the Roman see, an inspection of the valuables of the Sipontine church and forward a summary account of them signed by him, without any delay or excuse, to Gregory. For the dissolute morals of his nephew Felix (Evangelus) he is severely blamed, and the debt owing by his deacon Evangelus for his ransom he is directed to discharge out of the church funds (lib. iii. ind. xi. ep. 42, 43). In this year also Felix is reproached as unfeeling for having withheld payment, from the same source, of twelve solidi incurred by Tribunus, charged both with the penalty of the bishop of Bari. [Felix (56).] [C. H.] FELIX, bishop of Spello (88).

FELIX (155), bishop of Spoleti, signed the second Epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680 after a synod in Rome to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 302; Hefele, § 314.)

[F. H. D. A.]

FELIX (166), bishop of Suava (Sua), in the province of Numidia; banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, a.d. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 57, Migne, PatroL Lat. viii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 284.)

FELIX (157), Donatist bishop of Summa, or Zamma, a town in Numidia. He was not present at Carth. Conf. a.d. 411; but as the name of a bishop of that see appeared in the list of signatures, the error, being challenged by the Catholics, was after some discussion admitted by the Donatists. (Mon. Vet. Dom. p. 448, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

FELIX (188), Donatist bishop of Tacaepae, or Tacaep, a town of proconsular Africa, near some hot springs (Gabo, Cabes, or Qubes, Ant. Itin. 78, 3), said by his party to be prevented by illness from appearing at Carth. Conf. a.d. 411. (Mon. Vet. Dom. p. 419, ed. Oberthür.)

FELIX (160), bishop of Teveste (Theveste), in Numidia; banished by Hunneric, 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 56, Migne, PatroL Lat. viii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 308.)

[H. W. P.]

FELIX (162), bishop of Terenii (Lateranum), present at the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th Roman synods under pope Symmachus in Oct. 501, Nov. 502, in 503, and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Daha (Die Königre der Germanen, iii. 209), who accepts, with a slight alteration, the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. (Mansi, viii. 252, 258, 299, 314; Ugh. Ital. Sac. i. 750.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (183), third bishop of Terracina, c. a.d. 366, succeeding Sabinus. It is related in a Vatican manuscript quoted by Ughelli how the prayers of Felix in the church of St. Caesarius at Terracina obtained a cure for Placidia, daughter of Valentinian III., when possessed by a demon. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1298.)

[R. S. G.]

FELIX (164) II., bishop of Terracina, present at the Lateran synod under Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 887; Hefele, § 307.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (165), bishop of Thenea, in the Byzaenec province of Africa; subscribed the letter of the bishops of his province against the Monothelites, c. a.d. 641. (Mansi, x. 928; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 313.)

FELIX (166), bishop of Tibiura Tibursica. Vol. of Tabzocae (No. 174).
his final refusal Felix and his companions were delivered for transportation into Italy. After four days' sail they arrived in Sicily, having partaken of no food during the journey, doubtless from sea sickness, wherein we find an incidental proof of the authenticity of these Acts. At the various points Agrigentum, Catana, Messana, Taurumimum, wherever they touched, they were received with the greatest honour by the Christians. Thence they were carried by the prefect—who perhaps called at so many towns to rouse the zeal of the officials—to Venetia, in Apulia, where, having again called upon him to surrender the sacred writings, he condemned him to death for disobedience. Doubtless the known sentiments, or perhaps the secret instructions of Maximian, encouraged the court officials in exceeding the limit fixed by the letter of the edict. Felix finally suffered by beheading, Aug. 30, on which day he is commemorated by Bede. At his execution he is reported to have said, "Thanks be to Thee, O God. Fifty-six years have I lived in the world. I have guarded my virginity, I have preserved the Gospels, I have preached the faith and truth. Oh, Jesus Christ, Lord God of heaven and earth, I offer my neck as a sacrifice to Thee, who abidest to eternity, to whom be glory for ever." The Acts and Martyrologies call the town where Felix was bishop, Tuzboca, with considerable variations in the spelling. Baronius, however, well suggests, though without any MSS. authority, Thibaris, a well-known episcopal city, of Numidia, whose bishop, Catholic and Donatist alike, appears at the Carthage conference, a.D. 411, while Tuzboca is utterly unknown. The companions of his martyrdom were Audacius and Januarius, presbyters, Fortunatus and Septimus, readers. There is considerable confusion as to various details in different versions of the Acts, which D'Acquista and Baluze have in vain endeavoured to remedy. (Martyr. Vet. Romae, Bede, Adonis, Usuardi; Baronius, Annal. a.D. 302, cxxi.-cxxii.; Ruinart, Acta Sancera; Surius; D'Achery, Spicileg. t. xii. 634; Baluz, Miscell. t. ii. p. 77; Tillemont, v. 202.)

FELIX (178), reckoned by Matthaeus the first of the undoubted bishops of Turres (de Turribus), or Torres, a see afterwards removed to Sassari, in Sardinia (Matth. Sard. Sac. 144). He was one of the bishops exiled by Hunneric in 484 (Victor Vit. Notit. 60 in Pat. L. viii. 276 b). Cappelletti recognises earlier bishops, and among them another Felix, a.D. 404. (Le Chiese d'Ital., xiii. 131.)

FELIX (179), bishop of Urgel, a city of Catalonia, near the Gallic border, at the roots of the Pyrenees, on the Segre and one of its affluents. As Urgel lay within the dominions of the Visigoths, and belonged to the ecclesiastical province of Narbona, that monarch watched the movement represented by Felix with the greatest concern. Felix was a native of Spain (Eginhard. Ann. s. a. 792, in Migne, Patrol. Lat. civ. 441), and early distinguished himself, both by his high character and the ability (Alcuin, Hist. Boni, a.D. 6 Felix, Episc. in Migne, c. 144 ; Elipand. Epp. ep. 3, ad Carol. Mag. sec. 2, in Migne, xcvii. 868 c). About a.D. 783 he was consulted by Elipandus bishop of Toledo on the adoptionist theory of Paulinus patriarch of Aquileia was commissioned to draw up a libellus on the subject, to be sent with the decree of the council to the “Spanish provinces” (Paulinus. Libellus, Sacrificium, in Migne, ccxiii. 151–156). In 756, three years afterwards (A.D. 756) Paulinus held a council at Aquileia in which Adoptionism was again condemned. (Co. Forozul, in Migne, ccxiii. 285; Madrisius, Diss. de Conc. Forozul. lb. 54).

In the meanwhile Felix replied in a libellus of considerable length to the letter which he had recently received from Rhodinian, in which he says that he found “more heresies or rather blasphemies than he had previously read in his writings” (Ep. 83, ad Dom. Reg. in Migne, cc. 273 D). Charles, hearing of this, requested Alcuin to prepare an answer, and Alcuin consented. At the same time, on the plea that he felt himself unequal to the task alone, Alcuin prayed the king to forward copies of the libellus to Leo III, Paulinus of Aquileia, Bishop of Treves, and Teudulf bishop of Orleans, with a request that they would also answer it. Paulinus compiled in his Contra Felicem Urgellitanim, which he inscribed to Charles. (Migne, ccxiii. 390–467). As Felix is not known to have been at Rome more than once, it was probably at this date that he wrote the letter to Eulpandus which the latter received with extreme delight, and sent on to the brethren at Cordova who “thought rightly about God” (“Eulpandp. Ep. 5, u. z.). From this it appears that on his arrival in Southern Italy, he encouraged others to hope that his opinions would meet with a better reception than that accorded to them at Ratisbon. If so, he was more than disappointed, as at a council convened by Hadrian he was again prevailed upon to recant. At the same time he drew up a libellus of which Hadrian approved, and laid it first on the altar, and afterwards on the relics of St. Peter, taking an oath that the opinions there expressed were those that he would maintain thenceforth (Eginhard. u. z.; Mansi, xiii. 856; Leo III. ap. Co. Rom. A.D. 799, Mansi, xiii. 1031).

Notwithstanding his double recantation, however, Felix does not appear to have been restored to his see (Eulpandp. Ep. 5, ad Carolum Mag. inv. 1592). Felix apparently returned to Urgel, and was soon as active as ever in disseminating the opinions which he is said to have so solemnly recanted (Alc. Ade. Elip. u. z.; Leo III. u. z.). Alcuin, who had held him in the highest esteem, and still retained great respect for him, now seems to have written a letter of earnest remonstrance, addressing him as “vir venerandus et in Christi charitate desiderandus,” “episcopus,” “pater,” “pater amandus,” and reminding him of their former correspondence, he beseeches him to “arise and return to his Father, and to the bosom of the church,” adding, “Christ calls you, the sacred laws for still the saints desire you as a citizen.” In this letter Alcuin speaks very highly of the writings of Felix, though he takes strong exception to his Adoptionism. (Migne, cc. 119–126.) In 794 Charles convened a council at Frankfort, to which Felix was summoned, but where he does not seem to have been present. It was then decreed that an assembly condemns the “impious and wicked heresy of Eulpandus bishop of Toletum and Felix bishop of Orgellis” (Mansi, xiii. 909).

the period of Donatist ascendency under Julian, especially at a place called Lamella, between Sidiid and Zabi. Where two Catholic deacons were slain, Primus, son of Janusarius, and Donatus, son of Ninus, A.D. 361 or 362 (Opt. ii. 18).

FELIX, bishop of Zaceria (No. 99); of Zara
(No. 94); of Zurna (No. 157).

Clergy and Monks.

FELIX (186) of Nola in Campania, a priest, called also by St. Augustine a confessor, whose personal history is known chiefly through the poems of Paulinus bishop of Nola A.D. 409-431, on which Bede has founded a history in prose.
He was of Syrian extraction, but born at Nola, where his father Hermis had settled. He devoed himself from a very early age (fifteen) to the service of God and of the church, and, having passed through the lower grades of the ministry, was ordained priest by Maximus bishop of Nola, c. A.D. 250 (a date as early as A.D. 84 is sometimes given). During the persecution under Decius, Maximus retired from his see for refuge, and the persecutors laid hold on Felix, and having imprisoned treated him with excessive severity. But, says his encomiast Paulinus, like St. Peter he was delivered by an angel, and, having reached his bishop at a moment when he was at the peak of death, revived him by means of some grapes, of which he found a bunch hanging on a thorn-bush.
He took him on his shoulders, and carried him to a place of safety, where an old woman took charge of him, whilst he himself returned home and remained there until the time of danger had passed away. The circumstances just related took place, we are told, in a single night. During the reign of Valerian persecution was renewed, A.D. 257, and again Felix became an object of attack. Having taken refuge in some ruined buildings, the search of the persecutors was diverted from his place of concealment by their seeing a cobweb spread across the opening, by which they were led to suppose that it had not lately been entered by any one. Meanwhile Felix escaped by another way, and took refuge in an old war-trunk, in which he was fed during six months by an old woman who lived in a neighbouring house.
When persecution ceased he returned to the town, and was received with joy by his fellow-Christians. Maximus was now dead, and they made a strong effort to place him in the vacant seat, but Felix refused, and persuaded them to elect Quintus, a priest of seven days' older standing than himself. We are not informed of the date of his death, but many miracles are said to have been wrought around the place of his interment, over which a church was built, according to local tradition, by pope Damasus.
At the time of the Gothic invasion, A.D. 410, he is said to have appeared to many persons. St.
Augustine, who was intimate with Paulinus, declared his belief in the reality of these maniifestations, for when a question of serious misconduct had arisen between two members of a monastery under his superintendence, named Spes and Bonifacius, he recommended that they should both of them repair to the tomb of St.
Felix, and there await a Divine revelation of their respective guilt or innocence. He also speaks of an apparition of Felix at the time of the barbarian invasion, as attested by a trustworthy witness (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 219, 246; Ep., 78; de Curtu mort. c. 16; vol. vi. p. 606; de Dolcitl. quest.
ii. 2; vol. vi. p. 157.) The legend became a popular one during the middle ages, and appears in the Golden Legend of Jac. de Voragine, c. 19.

[Faulinus.] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (187), a deacon of Carthage, who, having written a severe letter during the persecution of Maxentius, A.D. 311, was concealed, at some risk to himself, by Mensurius, who refused to give him up to the government. [Mensurius.] [Opt. l. 17.] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (188), a deacon of Milan, sent by Ambrose with a letter to the emperor Theodosius (Ambrose, Opp. iii. 1109). [J. L. D.]

FELIX (189), a young monk of Adrumetum, who went with Florus to Usalitis, and there dictated to him the letter of St. Augustine which caused so much disturbance among the brethren. In company with Cresconius and another Felix, who, from some unknown cause arrived later than his companions, he took a journey to Hippo to confer with Augustine on the matter. They were in a great hurry to return home before Easter, but Augustine prevailed on them to remain longer under the festival, perhaps because of the late arrival of the other Felix, and thus gained time to explain the questions to them more fully. (Aug. *Ep. 214, 215, 216; Tillemont, 318, vol. xiii. pp. 873-878; Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xxiv. 45, 46. [Cresconius (4), Evodus (3), Florus (12).] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (191), deacon of the church at Ruspe, who, by his desire to secure the appointment of an unsuitable person during the Vandal persecution, was the means of preventing for some years the election of a bishop. He endeavored to arrest the consecration of Fulgentius by very questionable and even violent means, A.D. 509. He failed in his attempt, and was subsequently subdued into obedience by the gentle spirit of Fulgentius, who shortly afterwards ordained him as presbyter. He died within the year 503. (Vita Fulgentii, c. xvii.; Migne, Patr. Ep. 134; Ceillier, xi. 5. [Fulgentius (29).] [H. R. R.]

FELIX (192), deacon, one of the five legates whom Hormisdas specially instructed and sent in A.D. 519 to treat with John, bishop of Constantinople, and the whole Eastern church on the question of reconciliation with the Western (Baronius, Annum. ix. a. 519, 2. The legates appear to have remained some time in the East, and to have kept Hormisdas acquainted with the course of events, especially as to the circumstances and motives of the riots that were occurring in Thessalonica and all through the East. The legates returned to Rome in A.D. 520. (Ch. a. 520, 28. See the whole proceedings in Mansi, *Concilia, viii. 441 sq.; Hormisdas Papae Epistola et Decreta, psp. 31 sq. Migne, Patr. Lat. Ep. 80. 8, 9. [J. G.]

FELIX (193), African monk, the head of the little monastery in Byzacena to which Fulgentius retired shortly after his entrance upon the monastic life. (Vita Fulgentii, cc. 8-11, 15, in *Boll. Acta SS., Jan. 1. 35-38; Patr. Lat. Acta 124 sq. Felix strove to induce Fulgentius to assume chief command. He consented to undertake the educational department only, while Felix retained that of the property. The friendship of these two men was ardent and protracted. They lived together, before an incoherence of barbarians, to Sicca Veneria or Siscia, and there endured great indignities from an Arian priest, who also bore the name of Felix. The monk Felix displayed a beautiful spirit of self-renunciation. Fulgentius, in his search for austerity and severity of rule, deserted Felix more than once, yet it was through Felix and his monks that Faustus ordained Fulgentius: and when that father was subsequently made bishop of Ruspe, and when he erected a monastery in close contiguity to his church, he persuaded Felix to come and preside over it; transferring to it the majority of his own monks, so that leaving the remnant of his family under the deputy control of one Vitalius, the two houses were brought under the same management. During the double exile of Fulgentius, Felix appears to have retained the position, and his life must have been prolonged for some years after the death of Thrasium in 533. On the return of Fulgentius, though a bishop, he resolved to conduct himself as monk, and to submit to the smallest matters to the authority of the abbot Felix (26. c. 29). [Fulgentius (59).] [H. R. R.]

FELIX (196), an abbot in Eumompharae, of the Ponza islands, off the coast of Campania. He was the bearer of a letter in 601 from Gregory the Great to the subdeacon Anthimus, the rector or defender of Campania, who is directed to supply Felix with 1500 pounds of lead. (Epist. *Lib. i. Indict. ep. 50. Migne, Lat. Ep. 513. [A. R. D. B.]

FELIX (197), mentioned by Alcinus in connexion with Elipandus and the Adoptionist controversy, different from Felix bishop of Urgel. Mabillon thinks he was abbot of Oba, a Benedictine monastery founded in 789 by Abdon, the son of king Silo in Asturias. (Alcinus, *Hy. 587, col. 2, n. ed. Froben.; Mabili Anadel. ii. 273, num. 53; Patr. Lat. xcv. 889. [C. B.]

The names of his companions were Speratus, Martinez, Cythius, Veturius, Aquilius, Lactantius, Januarius, Generosus, Vesta, Donata, Secunda. Their Acta seem genuine, being strikingly confirmed in one particular by a contemporaneous document. The Acta call the presbyter under whom they suffered Saturninus, while Tertullian ad Scapulam, lib. iii, treating of persecutors, says, "Vigilius Saturninus, who first used the sword against us, lost his eyes." Saturninus, however, seems to have used the deliberation in his course of action which was characteristic of legal procedure of this kind at Carthage. He called on the men to subscribe on the same day. On another day he called on the women to do so, and offered all of them time for consideration. One of them, Donata, replied, "We render honour to Caesar as Caesar, but worship and prayer to God alone." Persisting in their refusal, they were condemned to be beheaded. On receiving their sentence they thanked God, and as they came to the place of execution they fell on their knees and again gave thanks. The ancient Calendar of the church of Carthage, discovered Mabillon and assigned by him to the 5th century, commemorates them on the same day. (Martyr. Felix (213), commemorated July 27; martyr at Nola. In several of the martyrlogies he is noted with three women, Julia, Jucunda, Januaria, who suffered at Niconyma. They all died probably in the Diocletian persecution. (Martyr. Rom., Vet., Bedae, Notkeri; Fernandus, Catal. Generalis.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (215), commemorated Aug. 1; martyr under Diocletian and Maximian at Gerona in Spain. By his Christian energy in preaching God's word he rendered himself so remarkable that Dacian, the proconsul, notorious for his persecuting zeal, ordered him to be seized and then put to death with various torments, to which the imaginations of the monks have added numerous miracles and angelic appearances. FELIX (217), commemorated Aug. 30; presbyter and martyr at the second milestone on the road to Ostia. There may possibly, or even probably, be a confusion between this and the previous uncanonical, both suffered in or about the same place. The Martyrologies, however, give more details about this man. He lived under Diocletian and Maximian, and suffered in the fresh persecution which ensued upon the publication of the fourth edict, April 30, 304. Having been racked and tortured by the prefect Draco, he was taken to several shrines and commanded to sacrifice. He steadfastly refused, and according to a monkish legend, worked so many miracles at each shrine as ought to have converted the most determined persecutor. A Christian encountering the martyr on his way to execution and stirred up with that mania for martyrdom which then seized men like an epidemic, cried out that he also was a Christian; whereupon he was seized, and executed in company with Felix. His name being unknown, the Christians denominated him Aduactus, because he was added to the crown of St. Felix. The confusion about this commemoration among the authorities is almost inextricable. Hieronymus notes him on Aug. 29, with four women, of whom one is Adana. Bede (ed. Colomb.), on Aug. 30, commemorates Felix the bishop of Tubzola in Africa, among whose fellow martyrs was Aduactus, a presbyter. In ed. Bull. of Bede both Felix of Rome and of Africa are noted on that day. All efforts to unravel the matter would now be hopeless. (Martyr. Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi, Notkerl. Wandalbert.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (218), commemorated Sept. 24; martyr at Autun, with Andochius a presbyter and Thyrus a deacon, during the reign of Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 161-180, probably about the same time as the martyrs at Lyons, A.D. 177. (Martyr. Roman., Hieron., Bedae.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (219), commemorated Oct. 12; martyr with 4976 others, bishops, priests, deacons, and laymen, in Africa, under Hunerici, A.D. 477. Cyprian and Felix were the most distinguished presbyters who suffered at that time. They were martyrs in behalf of the Catholic faith as against Arianism, which Hunerici and the Vandals supported. The numbers may seem large, but all the authorities represent the arian persecution of North Africa, which lasted from A.D. 429 to 523, when the accession of Hilderici brought peace, to have been a very frightful one. (Martyr. Adonis, Usuardi; Victor Vitensis, de Persecut. Vandal. i. 2) Victor was himself a bishop of Vota in Numidia, expelled by Hunnerici. Other authorities for the Vandal persecution are the life of St. Fulgentius, who was distinguished in the persecution at Thrasimund, A.D. 496, contained in Biblioth. Mar. Patrum, tom. ix. pp. 4-16; Procopius, de Bello Vandal. c. 7, 8; Gibbon, cap. xxi. Rainart, the last editor of Victor Vitensis, illustrated the whole subject with a copious and learned apparatus of notes and supplement. [G. T. S.]

FELIX (220)—Oct. 24; martyr. (No. 114.)

FELIX (221)—Nov. 5. The Hieronymian Martyrology commemorates him in Italy on Nov. 1, and places a Felix in Africa on Nov. 3. Baroinus places him under Trajan, while the acts of Caesarius place him under Claudius Nero. Tillemon considers the whole story of this Felix and his fellow-martyrs, Eusebius, Caesarius, and Julianus at Taracina, to have been very much corrupted. [CAESARIUS (15).] It is pityfully that it is best to leave them in the number of those whose sainthood we are sure of, but of whom we know nothing else. (Martyr. Hiero., Bedae, Usuardi, Wandalberti; Tillemon, Mon. Eccles. ii. p. 574.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (222), commemor. Nov. 6; martyr at Teniza in Africa. St. Augustine, when expounding the 127th Psalm, is said to refer to him where he says, "Felix martyris, verè fidelis et corōnē, cujus hodie dies est." (Martyr. Hiero., Adonis, Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (223)—Nov. 15; martyr (122).

FELIX, martyrs. See also Nov. 32, 121.

Miscellaneous.

FELIX (224), addressed by Sidonius Apollinarius (ii. Ep. 3) in a letter of congratulations to his elevation to the dignity of patriarch. [G. T. S.]

FELIX (225), a notary to whom Fulgentius addressed a work entitled De Trinitate, in thirteen chapters. He is addressed in engaging terms, and reminded that he is surrounded by those who are infected with various errors. Fulgentius hurried him with a practical mode of counsels from the orthodox faith. The only authority to which he appeals, with the exception of the quotation from Augustine in his Scripture. [FULGENTIUS (35).] (Fulg. Opp. p. 498 in Migne, Patr. ixv.; Ceillier, xi. 50.) [H. B. R.]

FELIX (226) GALLIUS, friend of Cassiodorus. He was advanced to the consulsiply by Theodorici, in recognition of his public services (Cassiod. Var. lib. ii. Ep. i. and ii.); he probably the same person whom CassiodorusDesign i as having assisted him in the composition of the epistles contained in the first ten books of Varieties. [E. N. Y.]

FELIX (227), chartularius and "vicus consularis," remembered by Gregory I. to Maximinus FELIX—MISC.
FEoca, St., an Irish devotee, who gave his name to the parish of St. Feock, on Falmouth harbour, in Cornwall, where the Celtic tongue was still spoken down to 1640. It is possible that the name is the same as that of St. Fieoe, bishop of Sletty, in Ireland, to whom is doubtfully attributed the famous hymn in praise of St. Patrick. (Todd, St. Patrick, 1864.)

[C. W. B.]

Feolcberht, presbyter in the diocese of Ely, in Normandy, calls the synod of Clovesho, 803.

[K. H.]

Feologeld, the sixteenth archbishop of Canterbury (M. H. B. 616). Before he was raised to the archiepiscopal see he had been an abbot in one of the Kentish monasteries, and his name in that capacity occurs in several charters.

Not to mention the spurious act of Bapchil, misdated 798 (Kemble, C. D. 1018; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 517), Feologeld, priest and abbot, is found among the Kentish abbots at the council of Clovesho in 803 (K. C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546); he attests an act of archbishop Ethelheard in 805 (K. C. D. 189), and of one of King Cuthred the same year (D. 190). He is mentioned along with archbishop Wulfred, and abbot Wernoth of St. Augustine's as one of the chief members of a council at Ache in 810 (K. C. D. 256; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 567); consents to a grant of Ceolwulf, king of Mercia, in 823 (K. C. D. 217), and to the reconciliation of Wulfred and Cenwrythryth at the council of Clovesho in 823 (K. C. D. 220; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 601). On the death of archbishop Wulfred he was elected to the archiepiscopal see. According to the Chronicle, in 829 (which must be corrected to 831, both because of the error of two years in the computation of the chronicle and because Wulfred survived until the latter year, K. C. D. 227, dying on the 34th of March, Ob. Cond. in Ang. Sax. i. 539), archbishop Wulfred died, and his abbot, Feologeld was chosen to the archiepiscopal on the 7th of the Kalends of May: "and he was consecrated on a Sunday, the 5th of the Ides of June, and he died on the 3rd of the Kalends of September."

(M. H. B. 344.) It must be observed that this notice occurs only in one MS. of the Chronicle, all the others containing 832 (Me. B. 832): "this year Ceolwulf was chosen bishop and ordained, and abbot Feologeld died." The day, however, given for Feologeld's consecration was a Sunday in 832, and as the name occurs in nearly all the lists of the archbishops, the authority of the single MS., which is a Canterbury MS., may be accepted as sufficient. Some few lists omit the name of Feologeld and substitute that of Swithred, of whom, however, nothing is known (M. H. B. 616). The pontificate of a few weeks was too short to contain any events of historical importance, and the name of Feologeld as archbishop is not found on coins or in charters. It would be interesting to know what abbey he had presided before his promotion; it was probably in or near Canterbury, but we know too little of the constitution of the cathedral at the time to favour the conjecture that he may have presided as abbot over the monastery of Christ Church itself. See Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 609; Einemam, p. 14.

[Feradnach] (1) Abbot of Saighdr, now Serkjeran, in the barony of Ballybritt, King's County, died A.D. 914 (Four. Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 908, i. 421).

(2) Son of Sechnall, scribe and abbot of Achadhbo-Caighnagh, now Aghaboe, in the barony of Upper Osory, Queen's County, died A.D. 933 (Four. Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 908, i. 421).

(3) Son of Seighen, abbot of Reshrine, now Rathlin island, off Antrim, died A.D. 799 (Four. Mast. A.D. 794, i. 403; Ann. Ult. A.D. 794).

Ferdachrich (Ferdachrich, Ferdachricho, Fermachrich) is etymologically the man of two boundaries or countries.

(1) Abbot of Dairinis, died A.D. 744 (Ann. Tys.). He seems to have become mixed up in the Kalendaris with St. Maccartane of Clougher (Maccartanes). This Dairinis (Oak-island) is identified as Molan or Molana, where St. Masadfaid erected an abbey or monastery at the mouth of the Blackwater, near Youghal, co. Waterford. (Four. Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 742, i. 343; Ann. Ult. A.D. 748).

(4) Abbot and bishop of Armagh, succeeded Cearl-Peter at Armagh, A.D. 758, and died A.D. 768. In the Irish Annals, Ferdachrich is always called abbot, but, Ware, Lagenian, and other authors usually follow the Poisiter of Cabled in placing him among the bishops or archbishops of Armagh. (Four. Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 771, i. 376 n. 377; Ann. Ult. A.D. 770; Legian, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, §§ 13, 14; Ware, Tr. Bps. by Harris, 41; Stuart, Armagh, 94.)

(Ferdhunach, latised Ferdhinnachus, and phonetically contracted into Ferdhinnach, literally “churchman.”)

(1) Abbot of Tuam, died A.D. 782, and commemorated on October 10 (Mart. Doneg.). He is included among the bishops of Tuam. (Four. Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 777, i. 383; Ann. Ult. A.D. 781; Legian, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 16.)

Ferdulcus, Duke of Friuli, in the beginning of the 8th century. He bribed the Slaves to invade his duchy, and was ultimately killed in fighting against them. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 24.)

[F. J.]
FERFUGILL

FERFUGILL (YEARFOUMAILL, FERFUGILL), of Clondalkin, bishop, commemorated on March 10, is not found in the Mart. Doneg., but in Mart. Tallaght there is on this day "Firnaghil Eps." (Kelly, Col. Ir. Saints, xviii.) In his short memoir, Colgan (Acta SS. 577) states that he flourished after the middle of the 7th century, when having risen to the episcopal dignity, he governed the church of Clondalkin (now a parish and village in the baronies of Uppercros and Newcastle, co. Dublin), and that after a rule of many years, and the acquisition of a fame for sanctity, he died A.D. 783. Lanigan (Ecc. Hist. Ir. iii. 202) places his death in A.D. 783, but the true date is A.D. 789 (Ann. Uit. a.d. 789; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 784, i. 391).

[J. G.]

FERGEOLEUS, Jan. 12, bishop of Grattanepolis (Grenoble), and martyr in the 7th century. (Acta SS. Boll. Jan. 1, 749.) [G. T. S.]

FERGHUS (FERGHEUS, FERGHEAS, FERGUSS, FERGUSA), from 'fear' a man and 'gus,' strength or valour (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 132). In Mart. Doneg. there are eleven dedications to saints of this name, and in Mart. Tallaght thirteen, called Ferghus, Fergus, and Fergusus, but of most of these, as usual, we know merely the feast. [FERGUS.]

(1) Of Drumlethglas, commemorated Mar. 30. He was son of Aengus, and descended from Caelibhath king of Ireland, (Four Mast.). Ware (Irish Bishops, by Harris, 194) places him second in the list of bishops at Down, but Lanigan (Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 12, § 1) and Reeves (Ecc. Ant. 42-44) consider him the first. His death is placed at different years in the Irish Annals from a.d. 557 to 589, but the true date is probably a.d. 584 (Ann. Tyn.). He appears to have been a distinguished person, for the fact of his having founded Cill-M-bian (a place now unknown) is mentioned, along with his death, in all the Annals. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 211.)

(2) Son of Cathal, a bishop, died A.D. 765 (Four Mast.), but his place in Ireland is unknown.

[J. G.]

FERGIL (1), the Geometer. [VIRGINILUS.]

(2) Ferghil of Cill-mor-Elimbere, now probably the church of Kilmore-Equilland, co. Armagh, died A.D. 770. (Ann. Uit. a.d. 789; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 795, i. 387, 388 n. 4.)

(3) Us Thadgh, scribe of Lusca, now Lusk, co. Dublin, died A.D. 800. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 795, i. 405; Ann. Uit. a.d. 799.) [J. G.]

FERGNA (FEARONA, FERBNAUS, VIRNOCS). These are some of the forms of a name which is found among the Scotch and Irish saints, and is etymologically the diminutive from the Irish "ferg," anger.

(1) Brit, fourth abbot of Iona, and bishop, commemorated on March 2. Of this person, Colgan (Acta SS. 448-50) gives a life which gathers up under eight heads the most of what is known or imagined about him. He was of noble Irish extraction, being son of Faillice, who was descended from Conall Gulban through his son Enna Bophaghe. He followed his relation, St. Columba, to Iona, and, as his disciple, so progressed in learning and virtue as to merit participation in a heavenly vision, as related by St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Columb. iii. c. 19). He became abbot of Iona, A.D. 605, on the death of St. Laisren (Ann. Tyn). In that office he continued till his death A.D. 623. A gloss on Mar. O'Gorman calls him a bishop, and this is followed in the entry of his death and feast in the Four Mast. (A.D. 622) and Mart. Doneg. (March 2), but the Ann. Inisfallen. (A.D. 616), Ann. Uit. (A.D. 622), Ann. Tigern. (A.D. 623), Mart. Tull. and Kal. Drum. merely call him abbot. Such an exceptional appointment as a bishop-abbot at Iona at that period, and especially when taken in connexion with the testimony of Bede (Ecc. Hist. iii. 4) that the abbot was always a priest, cannot be entertained by Dr. Reeves as other than a later fabrication. (Colgan, Tr. Tráthn. 370 n. 14, 481 n. 22; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 12; Ussher, Ecc. Ant. vi. 245, Ind. Chron. A.D. 598, 623; Reeves, Adamnan. 223-24, 373, 463; Bolandists, Acta SS. Mar. 2, t. i. 125, placing him among their pretermissi: O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, iii. 41-2; C. Innes, Orig. Par. Soc. ii. pt. i. 287; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, sc. ii. pt. i. 135; Skene, Celt. Soc. ii. 151 sq.; Bp. Forbes, Celt. Scot. Saints. 6, 199, 398; Kelly, Col. Ir. Saints, 81.)

(2) In his Vit. S. Columbae (iii. c. 23), St. Adamnan tells of a Feargna who retired from the monastery in Iona, and spent twelve years as an anchorite at Muirbulemar, on the island of Hinda, one of the Garveloch islands on the west of Scotland. He was at Cluain-Finchill in Ire and with Logaidh, when the death of St. Columba was revealed to the latter by a vision. It seems evident from Adamnan's narrative that this Fergus or Virgous could not have been the abbot of Iona, but only a hermit in the solitary island Eilean na Naomh, where the bee-hive cells of the recluses are still to be seen (Skene, Celt. Soc. ii. 131, 249; Reeves, Adamnan, 322 sq., Edinb. 1874.). [J. G.]

FERGUS (FERGUSIANUS) (1), bishop and confessor, has his legend given in the Breviary of Aberdeen (Prop. SS., pars aestiv. i. 103-64), but in the other older calendars is usually called Tergus and Tergusius. The truth of the legend seems wonderfully confirmed by the church dedications which mark his route, and appear to stamp the story as a genuine tradition. Probably of Irish birth, and after being many years in Ireland as a bishop, he came with a few presbyters and clerics to the western parts of Scotland, and settled for a time in Strathern, where he founded three churches, Stroeghan, Blackford, and Dolpatrick, all dedicated to St. Patrick. Thence he went north to Caithness (Cathania), where for some time he occupied himself in converting the barbarous people by his doctrine and by his life; there we find Wick and Halkirk dedicated to him. Passing southward again, he visited Buchan in Aberdeenshire, and built a basilica at a place called Lungley, now the parish of St. Fergus; Dyce in the same county was dedicated to him. Still southward, on the same coast, and beside Montrose in Forfarshire, a church was situated at the entrance of St. Fergus' Creek, and dedicated to St. Fergus. And at Glamis in the southwest of the same county the legend gives the place of his rest; this, the church of Glamans, is dedicated to St. Fergus, and there are St. Fergus's cave and his well. A pious abbot of Scone is said to have carried off St. Fergus's head long after to the monastery of Scone, where it must have remained till the year 1503, when King James IV. had a silver case provided for it, and made his "offrand to Saint Fergus heide in Scone." The carrying the head to Scone might suggest a reason for the curious fact of a close connexion existing between the church of Caithness and the abbey of Scone, and of the abbot of Scone holding a prebend in the cathedral church of Caithness; but on the other hand we find offerings made from that county to "God and St. Michael" and to the canons remaining at Scone, without any reference to St. Fergus (C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. i. pt. i. p. xxiii. n. ii. pt. ii. 621-22). His festival is variously given from Nov. 15 to 18, and his time is uncertain. (Book of Deer, pp. iii.; C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. i. pp. xxiii. and Scot. Eart. Scot. Hist. 5, 71-2, 126, and al.; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 163, 219, 243, 350-38; Ogilvie, Christ. in Buchan, 14-5, 34, 43-5; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 232-33; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c., ii. pt. i. 7, 116, 141; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 199.)

(4) [FERGUSUS.] [J. G.]

FERGUSUS, a bishop, but of what place is unknown. Along with "Seclitus Britanniae Episcopus de generi Scotorum," he signed the canons passed at the council held in Rome, under pope Gregory II. A.D. 721, as "Fergusus Episcopus" (Mansi, viii. 109). There was sufficient intercourse at that period between Rome and Britain to account for the appearance of a Pict from Ireland being found at the threshold of the church, but we have hardly sufficient material for otherwise identifying him or fixing his see if he had one. Dempster ascribes to him Commentariorum in Evangelium S. Matthiae, lib. i., and says Bale calls him Fergusus. [FERGUSUS (1)]. (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c., ii. pt. i. 7, 116, 141; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 232; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 337-38; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. i. 16, wks. vi. 331.) [J. G.]

FERMIERUS (popularly Frainge), ST. and confessor in Angoulême, and the isle of Gosin, in the department of La Vendée, commemorated Aug. 30. The Bollandists identify him with St. Fremerius, martyr in the diocese of Bazas. (Bell. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 842, Oct. i. 32.) [S. A. B.]

FERRANDUS, deacon of Carthage, disciple of Fulgentius of Ruspe. [FULGENTIUS (3)].

FERRANUS, "Episcopus Culdaeus in Scotia," is mentioned by the Scotch annalists, and placed by Dempster in the middle of the 8th century, but by Lesky in the end of the 3rd or beginning of the 4th. The former says he wrote Hermones psal. lib. I., and Camerarius places his feast on May 24. (Boetius, Hist. vi. f. 99; Dempster, Hist. Ecol. G. Scot. i. 292; Lesneus, de Rech. Gest. Scot. lib. iii. 117; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 150; Tanner, Bib. 278; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 257, 338.) [J. G.]

FERREOLUS (1), June 16, presbyter and martyr at Besançon. He suffered with Ferretus, a deacon. They are said to have been sent there by Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons. [Martyr. Hieron. 2. 2; Wandelberti (which place the commemoration on Sept. 5), Adonis, Bedae, Usuardi; Greg. Tuno. de Gior. Mort. c. 71; Gall. Christ. xv. 4; Tillemont, Mm. iii. 98; Surius, Vitae SS. t. ii. and t. vii.) A street in Besançon is called Rue des Martyrs, as being the traditional place of their sufferings. [G. T. S.]

FERREOLUS (2), Sept. 18, martyr at Vienne in Gaul, under Maximian, about A.D. 304. He was a military tribune when the persecution broke out. For a time he exercised great influence to protect Christians like St. Julianus, who had taken shelter with him. At last, seeing the speedy advent of the persecution, he advised them to fly, and prepared himself to meet the coming storm. The prefect, Crispinus, shortly afterwards called on him to sacrifice. Upon his refusal, he was tortured and imprisoned. In his Acts we read of a miraculous deliverance from the prison-house, which, however, admits of perfectly natural explanation, in the secret presence of many Christians among the officials. Being recaptured, he was put to death by beheading. [Martyr. Hieron. 2, ed. Adam, Usuard.; Greg. Tuno. Lib. de Mirac. Juv. et al. ep. ii.; Sidon. Apoll. lib. viii. ep. 1, md Mavroec, Venantius Fortunatus, lib. viii. narr. 4; Renuari, Acta Sinocra.) [G. T. S.]

FERREOLUS (3), ST., fifth bishop of Urra, succeeding his uncle St. Firmius, and followed by Albinus. He is said to have been born in the province of Narbonne, of noble parents named Ambertus and Bilthild, or Biltilis, A.D. 521. Among his ancestors he numbered the emperor Avitus and two prefects of Gaul, while on the mother's side he was a grandson of king Lothaire I. At the age of seven he was sent in company with his uncle St. Firmius, who was then only twelve years old, to Roricus, bishop of Uzes, and his great uncle, for instruction in letters and religion. At the age of thirty-two, upon the death of his uncle, he was consecrated to the see, A.D. 553. He is said to have striven earnestly for the conversion of the Jews, who were numerous in the province, mixing freely with them and inviting them to his table, so freely indeed, that his enemies accused him to king Childerich of plotting with them against the throne and country. He was summoned to the palace and sent into exile at Paris, where he remained three years, until the king, being convinced of his innocence, remitted him to his diocese with presents. On his return he convened a diocesan synod to discuss the means of converting all the Jews of the district. Many, it is said, became Christians, and the stubborn were compelled to labor on the earth or emigrate elsewhere. He died A.D. 581 (Gall-FERROELUS, ST.

Christ. vi. 613), and is commemorated Jan. 4. Gregory of Tours says, "At this time died Ferreolus, bishop of Uzes, a man of great sanctity and full of wisdom and understanding, who, in imitation of it, was composed several books of letters" (Hist. Franc. vi. 7). According to the Charterae Fontamellesinae (Spicilegium, ii. 263), he suffered martyrdom. There is still extant a rule composed by him for a monastery, which he built at Uzes, and which was called after him. Before instituting it, he submitted it to the criticism of Lucretius, bishop of Die. (Migne, Patr. Lat. ixxvi. 959; cf. Cailleret, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés xi. 312, for a short statement of it.) [S. A. B.]

FERREOLUS (4), ST., fourteenth bishop of Limoges, succeeding Exotius and followed by Asclepius. In the eighteenth year of his reign (A.D. 579), Chilperic I. laid very heavy taxes on his kingdom, which caused great distress and riots. At Limoges Marcus the royal commissioner was saved from the popular fury by the intervention of Ferreolus. The bishop rebuilt the church of Brive-Curetta (Brive-la-Gaillarde). In A.D. 585 he was present at the second council of Mâcon. He is said to have died A.D. 595. He is commemorated Sept. 18. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc.v. 29, v1. 10; Mansi, ix. 957; Vita S. Areol, ss. 16, 17 in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Brev. sacri i. 352; Migne, Patr. Lat. ixxvi. 1157, 1138; Gall. Christ. ii. 503.) [S. A. B.]

FERREOLUS (5), twenty-fourth bishop of Autun, succeeding Ischoo, and followed by St. Leger. His name occurs in the Gesta Dagoberti I. Regis, cap. xxxvii. (Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxvi. 1411), and in a charter of the same king in favour of the matriculari of the monastery of St. Denis (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 535). He was present at the council of Cléons (cirk. A.D. 659), and died in 637. The see remained vacant for two years. (Mansi, n. x. 1193; Gall. Christ. iv. 348.) [S. A. B.]

FERREOLUS (6), ST., thirteenth bishop of Grenoble, succeeding Clarus, and followed by Boe, is said to have been martyred A.D. 683, but accounts differ as to the manner of his death. According to the Breviary of Vienne (Jan. 16), he was killed by a blow from a staff while preaching to the people of Grenoble. But Saussetus (Jan. 12) makes him one of the victims of Droit, mayor of the palace, by whom he was first driven from his see and afterwards murdered. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. 1, 749; Gall. Christ. vii. 226.) [S. A. B.]

FERREOLUS (7). [ERNAN.]

FERROLIO, bishop of Osca (Huesca), in the province of Aragon, between A.D. 803–809. He is also called bishop of Aragon, and again "Episcopus in sancto Petro et in Iacca." Huesca was the metropolis, but being in the hands of the Moors, the bishop resided at Jacca till such time as Huesca could be recovered, when Jacca was to take the position of a suffragan see. (Ansay, Fundaciones de Huesca, p. 351; Gams, Series Episc. 36.) [L. D.]

FERROCINCTUS, one of the bishops who subscribed the third council of Paris (A.D. 557) without appealing his see. Le Coite conjectures him to have been the fifth bishop of Evreux, succeeding Licinius and followed by Victor. (Mansi, ix. 747; Le Coite, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 557, n. xxxvii. tom. i. 629; Gall. Christ. xi. 567.) [S. A. B.]

FERRUTIUS, martyr. [FERREOLUS (4).]

FERRUTIUS, Oct. 28, a military martyr at Mainz, probably about the year A.D. 296, when a considerable number of soldiers suffered. In Gaul, as in Africa, an idea seems to have just then got abroad among many, that the Roman military service was utterly unlawful for Christians. [FAHUS (2) VICTUS, FABUS (6).] Ferrutius having resigned his post was seized, imprisoned, and starred to death by his commanding officer. His memory is preserved for us in a sermon preached by Moginhard, a monk of Fulda, upon the translation of his relics to the newly-founded monastery of Bleidenstadt, three miles from Mainz, A.D. 850. A church had been previously dedicated to him by Rieculfe, archbishop of Mainz, A.D. 812. (Martyr. Rom.; Ceiller, xii. 523.) [G. T. S.]

FESTUS (1), Sept. 19, deacon of Beneventum, who, when visiting St. Januarius his bishop at Puteoli, where he had been arrested for the sake of Christ, was also seized by a magistrate named Timothy, cast to the beasts, and beheaded. He suffered under Diocletian and Maximian, A.D. 304. [JANUARIUS.] (Martyr. Rom. Vot., Adonis, Usuardi; Basil. Menod.) [G. T. S.]

FESTUS (2), bishop of Strategus, a town of unknown position in the ecclesiastical province of Hellas, supposed to be Strategus in Acraniam. He was one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 696; Le Quiné, Orac. Christ. ii. 222.) [L. D.]

FESTUS (3), a pupil of St. Basil, who addressed to him and Magnus (probably Festus's brother) a letter of earnest affection, requesting the young men how he had planted the seeds of piety in their hearts, had watered them with his prayers, and entertained good hope of their bringing forth worthy fruit. Basil testifies to the delight of imparting knowledge to those who will open their minds to receive it; and rejoices in the thought that, though separated from them, he can still instruct them by his letters, if only they will attend to his words. (Basil, Epist. 294 [210].) [E. V.]

FESTUS (4), a Christian in the imperial service, possessing authority, perhaps as a landed proprietor, over many persons in the province of Hippo Regius. In pursuance of the edict of Honorius, A.D. 405, he appears to have written letters with the view of reclaiming these persons from Donatism, but without success. St. Augustine wrote a letter to him describing the excesses and inconsistencies of the Donatists, and justifying the imperial proceedings against them, but recommended that instead of communicating directly with these persons, Festus should send out trustworthy agents who should confer with him in the first instance, and arrange the plan of operations for endeavouring to reclaim them (Aug. Ep. 89). [H. W. F.]
FESTUS

FESTUS (6), a Roman senator, and father of Elpis, reputed to have been the wife of Boethius. He is probably the same person who is coupled with Symmachus by Eunéus (Puran. Didasc.).

[S. M. Y.]

FESTUS (6), bishop of Satatins, in the province of Mauretania Stifensis; summoned to a conference at Cartaghe, and subsequently banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notiss in Vict. St. Migne, Patrol. Lat. iv. viii. viiiii. iv. vii. l. 37. Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 271.)

FESTUS (7), patriarch of Rome, employed by king Theodoric on an embassy to the emperor Anastasius II. He was elected pope, A.D. 496. He was mixed up in the attempts to heal the breaches of the churches. He was addressed by the apostriarius of the church of Alexandria at Constantinople, requesting communion with the Roman see. When pope Anastasius died, A.D. 498, Festus returned to Rome, having made a secret arrangement with the emperor Anastasius that the bishop of Rome should subscribe the Henoticon. On his arrival he found that Symmachus was chosen to succeed Anastasius II, and in order to fulfil his engagement he procured the election and consecration of Laurentius, and got up an accusation against Symmachus. Theodoric, however, determined in the favour of Symmachus, and the schism was healed by Laurentius's acceptance of the bishopric of Nocera. (Mansi, viii. 194, 246;CELLIER, Ant. Sacr. x. 519, 521.)

FESTUS (8) (Fuscus), bishop of Capua, who complained to Gregory the Great that he was despised by the clergy and citizens of Capua. He died before Gregory, who, after the death of Festus, ordered the restitution of a sum of money which he had unwisely taken from his archdeacon. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iii. ind. xi. epist. 34 in Migne. lxxvii. 631; lib. v. ind. xii. epist. 13, 14 in Migne, 734; lib. v. ind. xii. epist. 33 in Migne, 759.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FESTUS (9), bishop of Merida, from about 672 to about 690. He is known to us only from the speech of Egica (687-701) annexed to the acts of the sixteenth Council of Toledo [EGIC]. From this we learn that at the beginning of Wamba's reign "Theudemund Spuriarius noster" [THEUDEMUND], was, at the instance of Festus, then bishop of Merida, degraded by Wamba from the noble class and obliged to fill the office and perform the duties of numerarius at Merida. What was the reason of Festus's appeal to the king and what part exactly the bishop played in the transaction is far from clear. It is a curious instance of the infraction of a purely secular punishment by ecclesiastical means. (Exp. Sacr. ii. 218; Tejada y Ramiro, Coll. de Can. de la Ig. Esp. ii. 594.)

[M. A. W.]

FESTUS (10), Dec. 21, martyr in Tuscany, with a companion named John. (Martyr. Rom. Vet. Hieron., Adonis, Ueuardor; Ferrarius, Cat. SS.)

[G. T. S.]

FETHAIH (Fethaidh) is commemorated on March 31 in the Irish Martyrologies and Colgan (Acta SS. 798) has a short notice of Fethaidh, whom he seeks to identify with Feadhach, son of Cormac, abbot of Louth, Slaine, and Duleek, who died in A.D. 789, but the identification is no more than conjecture.

[Colgan i. 190, 191.]

FETHCHU (Fedchun, Fedchicho, Fethnú) At July 6 and 23 in Mart. Doneg. there are commemorated Fedchhu, of Uamadh Fhui, and Fethchu; in Mart. Tallaght they are Fedchhui or Fedchhoinid and bishop Fethnu. Colgan at March 12 (Acta SS. 588) gives a remembrance of Fedchhu to whom the Feadhach of Feadhach Feadhach. Hence Fedchhu is identifies with Fechino or Fethan companion of St. Columba. [Fechno.]

[J. G.]

FFAGAN (Stubbis, Reg. Sac. 154), legendary British bishop. [Fagan.]

FFILIL, ST., a Welsh saint, to whom Rhos Filili or Rhos Sili in Gower is dedicated. He is placed by Rees among the saints who resided between A.D. 566 and 600. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 277.)

[C. W. B.]

FFFFINAN, ST., an Irish saint, to whom Llanfanin in Anglesey is dedicated. There is also an Irish saint called Ffinian, who is said to have visited St. David at Meneris, about 590, and to have built three churches. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 238; Haddon and Statham, 168.)

[C. W. B.]

FFLEWYN. [Flewyn.]

FFOMREU, abbot of St. Illtyd, or Llantwit Major, Glamorganshire, witness to the deed of restoration of Abermell to king Ithael to bishop Berthgwyn of Llandaff, in the latter part of the sixth or early in the seventh century. (Lb. Land. by Rees, 429.)

[J. G.]

FFRAID. [Fraid.]

FIACC (Fieich, Fieichun), bishop of Sleibhte (now Sletty), commemorated October 12. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. vi. 96-106, and Suppl. tom. 119-121) have compiled a memoir, which contains almost everything known about him, and the date they assign is "sub sanctu. V., ut sup. ant.," i.e. "We are told in the Assisi. Ttrockan that St. Patrick conferred the orders of bishop upon him, so that he was the first bishop that was ordained among the Lagenesians, and St. Patrick gave a "Cunntach" or box to St. Fiacce, containing a bell, a "menster" or reliquary, a crozier, and a "poolle" or book satchel. He also left seven of his people with him (Fetrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 338; Wilson, Preflat. Annals, 657). But in teaching the faith, St. Fiacce is often styled not merely bishop, but archbishop of Leinster: thus the ancient Scholast upon The Hymn of St. Fiacce in Praise of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaug. n. 11) states the fact of his consecration as bishop, and then adds "tandem Lageniae Archiepiscopus instituit; quo etiam munere ejus Comorombii sive successoribus abinde funguntur." (See also Colgan, Tr. Thaug. 8 n. 1, 285, col. 1, and Acta SS. 217 n. 29; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 574, 278.) But this notion has arisen from a misinterpretation by Colgan of the title applied to St. Fiacce by the Scholast, and the adoption of a false local designation which was not used in Ireland till the 12th century. The word in the original Irish of the Scholast is Ape-Eprcoba, but FIACCHINA, a diminutive of Fisch, a raven.

(1) It is a name which we find in the Irish Kalendars on March 30 and April 29, but without any distinct identification. The Scholia on the Feílire of Aenghus the Culdeis calls the latter "monk of Mochuda" (Marti. Doney. by Todd and Reeves, 114 n. 3, 115), and O'Corry (ib. 91) thinks it probable that either one or other of the two Fischnas may be the person of whom Cuimín of Condeir gave the character, that he never pronounced a bad word, but always a word pleasing to God, and of whom he further suggests that he was, perhaps, of the race of Englan, son of Niall.

(3) Companion of Columba. [Fechino.]

J. G.

FIACHRA (FIACHRUS, gen. from FIACHRACH), (1) abbot of Conaval and Clonard, was widely venerated throughout Ireland on Feb. 6. He had dedications in the county of Kilkenny. In The F一般是 of Aengus, he is praised as "Fischra—a manly man, the noble abbot of Iarad," and he gave the riticium to St. Comgall, of Bangor (Comgall (11)). He flourished in the beginning of the seventh century. (Colgan, Acts SS. 406 c. 5, Mart. Doney. by Todd and Reeves, 43; Kelly, Cat. Ir. Saints, ix.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 412; O'Connor, Rev. Hibern. Scrip. iv. 184; Ust. Journ. Arch. ii. 214-15; Reeves, Adamnan, 317; Fleming, Coll. Sacr. 312-313.)

(2) Son of Fothadh, abbot of Baslick, near Ballinotober, county Roscommon, died A.D. 759. (Four Mast.)

FIACHRAIDH (FIACHRA), son of Fisch, is commemorated in the Irish Martyrology, and in the Scotto-Irish Kalendur of Drummond Missal on October 12, and specially called the son of St. Fisch. He was born probably before St. Fisch met with St. Patrick, and was presented to the episcopate; but beyond his being commemorated at Sletty, where it is likely that he lived with his father, we know nothing more of his history. [Fiac.] (Marti. Doney. by Todd and Reeves, 273; Kelly, Cat. Ir. Saints, xxxiv.; Colgan, Tr. Tham. 182 n. 264; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 26.)

FIACRIUS, sometimes FEPHUS, Fr. Fisch. (Probably Irish-Gaelic Fischara [gen. Fischraoch] from Fisch a raven, and -ru or -raidh, a collective suffix. Fisch also signifies value, worth, &c.)

Fiacrus, a saint of Gaul, was almost certainly by birth an Irish Celt. Hector Boece, indeed, (Hist. of Scotland, ix. 19), claims him as a fellow-countryman, saying that he was a younger son of Eugenius IV. king of Scotland, who withdrew from his father's court out of desire for an ascetic life; but it is far more probable that he was one of the great body of Irishmen who in the 6th and 7th centuries were driven by an impulse of missionary zeal to visit the continent of Europe [Missions, in Dictionary of Christian Antiquity, p. 1908]. Early in the 7th century
The authorities for the life of St. Fiacre are found in Surius, viii. 745, ed. Turin, 1877; in Mabillon, Acta SS. Renect. spec. ii. p. 596 ff.; and in the Bollandist Acta SS. Aug. 30, vol. vi. p. 604 ff. with the Comment. Provinc. of Stilling. There is a Histoire de Saint-Fiacre by J.J. Anser, Paris, 1782, which the writer has not seen. See also Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 272–274.

FIANA, in an Irish Life of St. Barry of Cork, is represented as belonging to a female school which that saint had at Loch Inre, and as giving the last sacrament to him at Cloyn before his death (Caufield, Life of St. Fin Barre, v.)

FIANCHU, abbot of Lughmada, now Loch, died a.D. 770 (Four Mast.), or abbot of Lauges, now Luane, co. Meath, died a.D. 774 (Ann. Uit.); evidently both belong to the same individual.

FIANAGALCH, son of Annmadch, son of Macelmarach, abbot of Inisbofn in Loch Ree, co. Longford, died a.D. 750 (Four Mast.).

FIANGUS, abbot of Roscrea, in the barony of Ikerrin, co. Tipperary, died a.D. 805 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, a.D. 800, i. 411.) [J. G.]

FIARI, bishop of Agen. [FOEADARUS]

FIARMUS, bishop of Viscn. [PIRAS (12)]

FIDELIS (1), April 21, martyr in the Diocletian persecution, at Edessa with his mother Bassa and his brothers Theogonus and Agapius. Encouraged by the exhortations of Bassa her sons suffered first, and then she also was beheaded. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron.) [G. T. S.]

FIDELIS (3), wife of Pneumatis, and addressed with him in a consolatory poem of considerable length by Paulinus of Nola on the death of her son Celsus. The poem is chiefly on the resurrection of the dead. (Migne, P.L. lxi. 698.) [L. D.]

FIDELIS (4), companion of St. Teil from Armorica in the 6th century, and included among the clerical witnesses to grants of land to St. Teilo. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 253; Lib. Landav. by Res, 551-55, 365-67; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. vi. 80.)
FIDELIS

FIDELIS (B), ST., priest, abbat. [FIDELIS.

FIDELIS (B), ST., commonly accepted as bishop of Merida before Masona (who presided at C. Tol. iii. in 589), and placed therefore by Florez between 560 and 571. His life rests entirely upon the testimony of the not very satisfactory pieces of writing known as the Opus. de Vita et Miraculis Patrum Eneritesium, and attributed in the MSS. to a certain Paulus Diaconus (not to be confounded of course with his famous namesake of Lombard memory).

Fidelis, according to this life, was the successor and adopted son of Paulus bishop of Merida. A company of Greek merchants visiting Merida were entertained by the bishop, and in return sent him a present by the hands of a boy whom they had brought with them as a servant. The bishop was struck with the boy, asked him his name and history, and discovered that he was his own sister's son. He immediately claimed him from the merchants, sent a message through them to his sister, and thenceforth the boy was brought up at Merida. He was, of course, dedicated to the church, and made a deacon in due time. Paulus in his old age took a strange and unnatural step with regard to Fidelis. "Hume sibi successorem elegit, moxque etiam in loco suo se vivente ordinavit, et omnium honorum suorum haeredem instituit," coupling the legacy with the condition that, if after the death of Paul, the clergy of Merida confirmed the appointment of Fidelis, the money should pass at Fidelis's death to the see of Merida; if they did not confirm it, because of those "insidias facibus successus," the money was to remain at Fidelis's absolute disposal.

After Paul's death, what he had foreseen happened. "Quidam pestiferi homines" began to make objections to Fidelis's appointment. The legal, however, of the alienation of Paul's property from the church finally silenced all opposition, and the objectors, "plus invitii licet quam sponte se pedibus ejus prostraverunt." Thus it came about that the church of Merida became equal if not superior in riches to any in Spain. The principal events of Fidelis's pontificate—leaving the miracles out of account—appear to have been the rebuilding of the episcopal palace (atrium), and the restoration of the church of St. Eulalia. The old palace fell just after the bishop and all his clergy had quitted it on their way to Mass. The new house was made far more splendid than the old. Its pavement and walls were adorned with shining marbles. Afterwards the church of St. Eulalia (see Prudentius's famous description of its architecture in the 4th century, Peristeph. Hymn 3) was restored in a wonderful manner, and high towers were added to it. At last, after many marvellous appearances of saints and angels, Paul was warned by a vision, seen not by himself but by a certain religious man of the town, of his approaching death. Like St. Fructuosus and St. Isidore, he had himself carried into the church, and there distributed large sums to the poor, remitting, moreover, all debts owing to him, and returning the chirographa and cautions he had received on account of them. He died in the church, and was buried with his predecessor.

Seven churches are named as existing in or close to Merida in the life of Fidelis, and are vaguely mentioned under the general title of basilicae martyrum. In the early part of the document, of which this life forms a part, we read of more than one monastery in the immediate neighbourhood of Merida, so that the impression left on the mind is one of the great ecclesiastical importance of the city. No such impression remains to us as to the ecclesiastical state of any other Spanish town under the Goths. (Esp. Sylag. xii. 176, 350; Gams, Kirchenj. von Spanien, ii. i. 425; Bolland. A.A. SS. Feb. 1.)

FIDELIS (T), according to the list of Muelin's Hetvica Sacra (l. viii.), eleventh bishop of Constance, elected a.D. 681 on the death of Ganguphus, and followed by Theobald. His name is omitted from the list of the Gallia Christiana (v. 893).

FIDELIS (S), an abbat living in Asturias, addressed by Elibandus in a letter, a.D. 785. Beatus, a monk of Asturias, together with Etherius, afterwards bishop of Oviedo, had exerted themselves with success in combating the Adoptionist views, whereupon Elibandus, archbishop of Toledo, wrote an angry letter to Fidelis, wherein he says "that those who do not confess that Jesus Christ is the adoptive Son according to His humanity, but not according to His divinity, are heretics," and, remarking on the youthfulness of Etherius, compares Beatus to Bonosus the Pho-tinian, and Faustus the Manichee, and finally implores Fidelis to root out the Beatian heresy. In the second book of his answer Beatus calls Fidelis "frater," so that though Elibandus wrote to him as if he was an Adoptionist, he really held the true faith; he is said to have shown the letter to no other persons besides Beatus and Etherius. (Prober, Acad. ii. 587, 601, 985; Collieri, Ant. Sacr. xii. 214.)

FIDENSIUS (1), Sept. 27, martyr under Dio-cletian and Maximian, A.D. 304, at Tuderatum, in Umbria. They are said to have been born in Cappadocia, whence they came to Rome, where they were converted. Upon the outbreak of persecution the bishop was arrested, tried, and delivered to the commander of the first cohort for execution. The rest of their story is distorted with legendary miracles. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Ferrarius, Catal. Sanctorum; Bell. Acta SS. Sept. vii. 479-481.)

FIDENSIUS (2), bishop and martyr with twenty others, most probably in the Diocletian persecution. He is, perhaps, the same as Fidentianus, commemorated Nov. 15, in the Rom. Martyr. Baronius would identify them with twenty martyrs who suffered at Tarsus, in

511
FIDENTIUS (3), one of the Donatist bishops who petitioned Constantine that some Gallic bishops should be appointed as judges in the case of Cæcilianus. (Ulp. i. 22.)

FIDENTIUS (4), bishop of Cefaia, in the proconsular province of Africa; present at the conference between the Catholics and Arians, A.D. 411, where he declared that in his diocese there was no rival Donatist bishop; for, as Valentinian, the deacon of the Donatist archbishop Primianus, added, one of the same name as the Catholic bishop, had lately died in that see. (Mansi, iv. 110, 266; Morello, Africa Christ. i. 133; Mon. Vet. Dom. i. 413, ed. Oeberthür.)

FIDENTIUS (8), bishop of Diana (Zanah), a town in the interior of Numidia, north-west of Lambes in (Ant. Itin. 34, 3), at Carta in (Ant. Itin. 11, ed. Oeberthür.)

FIDENTIUS (9), Donatist bishop of Culfita, perhaps Chullu (id Quoll), on the sea-coast of Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Dom. i. 445, ed. Oeberthür.)

FIDENTIUS (7), bishop of Tucci (Martos), one of the suffragans of Seville, from about 610 to about 633. His signature appears among those of the second council of Seville (919), at which Isidore and Fulgentius were present, and in 633 his vicar, Centarius, signs for him at the fourth council of Toledo in the first place among the vicars, as representing the senior bishop of those unable to attend personally. (Exp. Sogir. xii. 389; Aguirre-Catalan, iii. 355-385.)

FIDENTIUS (8), with the consent of the duke of Friuli, founded an episcopal see for himself at Castrum Julianum (Julia Carnica, now destroyed), c. 725, and was followed in the see by Amator. (Paulus Diaconus, v. 51.)

FIDENTIUS (9). In the preface to the work of St. Agobard against the Adoptist opinions and writings of Felix of Urgel, which was composed A.D. 818, the author states that his own work is really a summary of the writings of others on the same point, amongst whom he mentions Fidentius, an ecclesiastical writer otherwise unknown. (Hist. Litt. de la France, iv. 572.)

FIDES (1), Ang. 1 (Usuardus et Rom. Mart.), June 23 (Nocerius), Sept. 16 (Bon. Hila. Symeon Metaphrastes); martyr with her mother, Sophia, and her sisters, Spe and Charitas. (Carit.)

FIDES (2) (St. Faith), Oct. 6; virgin and martyr at Agen in Aquitaine, in the Diocletian persecution, under the president Dacian, 304. Her example encouraged St. Caprasius to endure martyrdom. (Caphasius.) (Mart. Rom., Hieron., Adonis, Usuard, Notker, Rabani; Tillemont, iv. 543, 735; D. J. Solesmes, vii.) Her name of Faith was attached to seventeen churches in England besides the crypt of old St. Paul’s. In art she is represented with a bundle of rods or a brazen bed in her hands. (J. H. Parker, Cat. of Angl. Ch. 121.)

FIDHAIRLE Ua Suasnaigh, abbot of Rathain (now Rahin), commemorated Oct. 1. After the expulsion of St. Carthach Machuda (May 14) from Rathain or Rathin near Tullamore in the King's County, about A.D. 530, the place fell nearly out of sight till Fidhairle Ua Suasnaigh founds it anew, and becomes its patron. He was brother of Fidhmune Ua Suasnaigh and Fidhghus Ua Suasnaigh; also eterne brother of Dichitheas O'Triallagh, of Aedhain of Cloghoggill, and of Colman Ua Finnchach of Templeshannon (p. r.). He died A.D. 763 (Ann. Tigernach), and is said by Mac Fheargais to have had a church at Rinnale, co. Cork. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 758, l. 361) (Cromer, Iter Hibern. Scriptior. ii. 250, iv. 99; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Oct. 1; Mart. Doneg., by Todd and Reeves, 205.) [FIDHMUNAINE.]

FIDHBHADHACH (1), abbot of Bagen, died A.D. 767 (Four Mast. A.D. 762; Ann. Uí Mh. A.D. 768.)

FIDHBHADHACH (2), of Cill-Delge, son of Kildalkey, co. Meath, died A.D. 753. (Four Mast.)

FIDHMUNAINE (Fionngh, Fionnch). Ua Suasnaigh of Raithin (now Rahin), commemorated on May 16. With Fidhairle and Fidghus his brothers, he was son of Fidhbhanach, son of Codinillig, descended from Fiscura, son of Echaidh Mischmarthe, his mother being Fanamhla or Ferbla, daughter of Dinn Dubh, of the same house. Fidhmune died, according to the accurate entry in the Ann. Tigernach, in A.D. 757. The Ann. Clogomnae add slightly to our information: "A.D. 751, Luanaus alias Fionnch O'Suasnae of Rahin, died." He was interred at Rahin near Tullamore in the King's County, and is also designated by O'Clery (who lower FIIDOLUS, a bishop of Rennes. [Februarius.]

FIIDOLUS (popularly FAUL of FAILELE), B.T., priest and abbot at or near Troyes in the 6th century, was born of noble parents in the city of Clermont. From his early years he seemed marked out for the service of God, and in due time entered the ranks of the clergy. In an expedition of king Theoderic against his native city he was taken prisoner with many others. As his captors were returning with him through the territory of Troyes, they were met by Aventinus, the abbot of a monastery at or near that city, who had been warned in a vision to ransom Fidolus, and adopt him into his community. Twelve pieces of gold was the sum demanded and paid. By his diligence and obedience in the monastery, Fidolus strove to repay the debt. At time went on he was chosen first to be prior, and then upon the death of Aventinus, abbot of the foundation. In this office he was remarkable for his meekness and austerity, and his preeminent sanctity was attested by numerous miracles. He is commemorated May 16. This account is from a meagre life, first published by Camusat, and afterwards more correctly by the Belgianists. The authors of the Histoire Litéraire de la France adjudge it from its style to the close of the 6th century, forty or fifty years after the saint's death. Another life is to be found in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti evi dently of a later date, which simplifies the former only to make it incorrect, as, for instance, where it treats as contemporary Theoderic, the brother of Theodebert, who was reigning in A.D. 596, and Camelius, the bishop of Troyes who was pre t at the first council of Orleans in 511. Who the Theoderic of the earlier life may have been, is not clear, but probably he was the eldest son of Clotilda, in which case the expedition will be explained as having taken place in A.D. 507. [Cf. Gest. ii. 17, or iii. 14, 15. The site of Fidolus' monastery is also doubtful, some placing it at a little town called Insula on the Seine, about two leagues from Troyes, others within the walls of Troyes, and others again in the suburbs of that city, where afterwards a church in honour of St. Aventinus was built. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 588; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti. i. 196, Venice, 1733; Bouquet, Recueil des Historiens, iii. 406; Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 415, 416; Gall. Christ. xii. 531.) FIIDUS (2), African bishop, applied to Cyprian and Council, (1) to complain of bishop Therapius having resented to lay communion a lapsed presbyter, Victor, before due and sufficient penance. (2) To state, and to ask for an affirmation of, his opinion that infants ought not to be baptized within two or three days of their birth, alleging both the law of circumcison, and stating that it was repugnant to the feelings to give the kiss of peace to a newborn child. Cyprian replies to Fidus for the council (3rd Carth. A.D. 250), (1) censuring, but declining to reverse the action of Therapius; (2) disagreeing with Fidus, both as to the law and the sentiment. (Cyp. Ep. 11v.) The Epistle very useful to Augustine in his controversy with Pelagians. [E. W. B.]

FIIDUS, bishop of Joppa, one of the fourteen bishops who took part in the synod summoned by Eugubius, metropolitan of Caesarea, at Diospolis, A.D. 416, stigmatized by Jerome as "a miserable little synod," in which Pelagius was acquitted of heresy (Labe, Concil. ii. 553; August. contr. Julian. c. 5). We find Fidus afterwards at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, at which he warmly espoused the cause of Cyril, whose letter against Nestorius he declared to be such as might have been written by the Holy Spirit Himself (Labe, Concil. iii. 468), while that of Nestorius was far removed from the truth, and approached very near the evil doctrine of Paul of Samosata (ibid. 477). He signed the sentence of deposition against Nestorius (ibid. 540), and the anathema against any who should compose another creed (ibid. 585). Fidus visited the celebrated solitary, St. Simeon Stylites, at his laura, in company with his nephew Fidus, afterwards bishop of Dor, and Anastasia, afterwards patriarch of Jerusalem. (Cyrill. Sce thop. Vita S. Euthymii. c. 60.) [E. V.]

FIIDUS (3), bishop of Dor in Palaestina Prima, nephew of the preceding. He, while still a lector, accompanied his uncle, the bishop of Joppa, and Anastasia, on a visit to St. Euthymius (Cyrill. Sceythop. Vita S. Euthymii. c. 60). He was ordained deacon by Anastasius immedi dately after he became bishop of Jerusalem, A.D. 458, was despatched to Euthymius to request him to allow him to visit him, and shew the truth of his prophecies of his elevation to the episcopate (ibid. 96). [ANASTASIBUS.] On the death of Euthymius he accompanied An tastia, as his deacon, and his obsequies, and was left by him at the laura to erect a suit table tomb (ibid. 110, 111). Having been des patched by Martyrius, bishop of Jerusalem, to Constantinople with letters to the emperor Zeno and the bishop Acacius relative to the Apoclis tae, on his voyage out he was shipwrecked at midnight, and almost perishing himself of the cold, he saw a vision of Euthymius, who told him that the journey he proposed would bring no advan tage to the church, and that he was to return home, and assure Martyrius that the schismatics would soon return to the unity of the church. He also commissioned Fidus to convert his laura into a cenobium, to be erected around his sepulchre (ibid. 113-115). In obedience to the vision, with the sanction and aid of the patriarch, he pulled down the scattered cells and erected a monastery, of which Cyril gives a lengthened description (ibid. 116-121), which was dedicated with great pomp by Martyrius, A.D. 494 (ibid. 122). In that or the following year, Fidus became bishop of Dor (ibid.). Nothing more is known of him. He died before A.D. 518. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 575.) [E. V.]

FIGULUS, an ecclesiastical writer, known only from the citations by Smaragdus abbot of Saint Mihel (9th century) in his sermons on the Epistles and Gospels for the year, which are abridgments of the writings of twenty fathers of the church. Between Isidore of Seville and Bede he places Figulus; perhaps the name is corrupted.

FILACRIUS (Hilarus), bishop of Novara, 552. For his tombstone and epitaph, see Cappelletti. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 447; Ugheili, Itali. Sacr. iv. 683.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FIBLBTH, bishop of London. [Eadberht.]

FILEAS (Usuard. Mart. Feb. 4), bishop of Thmus. [Fileas.]

[F. H.]

[H. W. P.]

FILLANUS, fifth bishop of Soissons. (Gall. Christ. ix. 332.)

[R. T. S.]

FILLABRIUS, bishop, who subscribed the third council of Arles in 461. (Isid. Mer. in Pat. Lat. xxx. 382.)

[C. H.]

FILIBERTUS (Aelein, Carm. 76, Opp. ii. 213, ed. Froben), abbot and founder of the monastery of Jumièges. [Philibertus.]

[C. H.]

FILIMIRUS (Filimirus), bishop of Lamego in Lusitania, signing the acts of the eighth council of Toledo in 653, and of the tenth in 656. (Eos. Supr. xiv. 158; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448, iv. 136.)

[M. A. W.]

FILLAN, with Felan, Filan, and Phillan, seems to be the Scotch form of the Irish Fælan, and the person so named at Strathfillan was no doubt an Irishman, yet as his legend is purely Scotch, and his name of St. Fillan is associated with a memorable epoch in Scotch history, it seems best to treat him under this designation. For the sake of clearness, however, it may be mentioned that two Irish saints of the same name had their churches in Perthshire, viz.: Fælan Amblachan of Ruthern (June 20), whose dedication is at St. Fillan's in the parish of Comrie, at the east end of Loch Earn, [Fælan, (1)], and Fælan Macogna or Moescena who is the present St. Fillan of St. Fillan's in the quondam sacra parish of Strathfillan, which was the site of the extensive parish of Kilfin. His legend is given in Breo. Aberdon. (Prop. SS. paras hyem. f. xxvi–vii., and quoted at length by Bishop Forbes (Kol. Scott. Saints, 342–43). The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. 9, tom. i. 594–95) have a notice, "De S. Filiano sive Feliano Abbate in Scoti," mostly taken from Camerarius and Boethius, with the Chron. Pasch. and Breo. Aberd. Colgan (Acta SS. 49) has a memoir similarly compiled; so also Baring-Gould (Lives of the Saints, Jan. 9, i. 127–28); and O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 134–44) devotes to his Life an article of three chapters, and treats it with great fulness and lucidity. Fillan was a son of Ferdalach, or Feristh, of the race of Fiantach Finn, by Kientgerma, daughter of Cellach Cualanna, king of Leinster. The date of Fillan is very doubtful, as his legend is evidently full of anachronisms, introduced in order to magnify the saint. The Bollandists follow Camerarius in placing him in the 7th century, and Colgan suggests the beginning of the 9th, but the middle of the 8th seems the most probable date for his death. His chief dedications were at Killin and Strathfillan, where his memory was cherished and miraculous gifts zealously resorted to, specially in mental diseases, till even a late date (Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. new ser. i. 259 sq.). His cave is shewn at Pitenweem, Fifeshire; his name is found corrupted in Killinna, near Loch-alsh, in Ross-shire, and Killalian, an old parish in Renfrewshire; and his wells in other places may mark dedications. (For his dedications, see Bp. Forbes, Kol. Scott. Saints, 344–46; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 139.) There are three of St. Fillan's relics of special interest, viz. his arm, bells, and crozier. (a) The estimation in which St. Fillan was held in Scotland was greatly enhanced by the part he was supposed to take in procuring for the Scots the victory at Bannockburn, and he and his arm having been specially venerated before the battle, as related in Bellenden's Boece, ii. 380 sq., and as attested by the subsequent gifts to St. Fillan at the priory built and dedicated to St. Fillan at Strathfillan (Uelt. Journ. Arch. ii. 213–4; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. xii. 122 sq.). (b) The Cogygerach, Quigmach, Quirich, or Pastoral Staff of St. Fillan, which was carefully preserved till a recent date at Killin in the custody of the hereditary keepers named Dewar, who had it by regular descent, and who carried it with them to Canada, has been brought back to Scotland, and was presented to the National Museum of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland on March 22, 1877, when the late Dr. John Stuart, secretary of the society, read a long, learned, and very interesting paper on St. Fillan's crozier and on his name and legend generally. (For the Cogygerach, see Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. ii. 12–5, iii. pt. ii. 235–43, xii. 121, 122 sq.; Spald. T. Miscell. iii. pp. xxii. 237; Wilson, Proc. Antiq. FILLEUL, bishop of Rouen. [Flavius (6)].

FILIMIRUS, bishop of Lamego. [Filimirus].

FILOCALUS, FURIOUS DIONYSUS, calligrapher to pope Damasus. The Damasian inscriptions in the catacombs are formed in letters of peculiar beauty, so that a fragment belonging to one of them can be easily recognized (see Vol. I. p. 784). What is known as the Liberian catalogue of the popes formed part of a collection made in the year 354, the ornamented title-page of which bore the inscription "Furio Dionysius Filocalus titularis." Mommese (Über den Chronographen vom Jahre 354; Mund:undungen der Königl. Sächs. Gesellschaft, i. 585) identified the writer with the artist of a Danasine fragment preserved at the Vatican, "Scribit Furius Dion." All possibility of doubt was removed in 1856 by the discovery (De Rossi, Roma Sotterranea, i. 116) of the epitaph of pope Eusebius, ending—

Scribit Furius Dionysius Filocalus, Damasus [Damasi sul, De Rossi] pappos cultor atque amator.

De Rossi gives the name Filocalian to the collection just mentioned, objecting to Mommsen's designation by the year 354 on the ground that what was done in that year was in substance the reproduction of a work made twenty years previously. [See Chronicon Hibern.] [G. S.]

FILTERIUS, a Gallic bishop (see unknown), is one of those to whom the letter of pope Celestian on behalf of Prosper and Hilary, is addressed. (Collari, Act. Soc. x. 277.) [T. S.]

FILTIOSUS, bishop of Agger in the Byzacene province of Africa, one of the Catholic bishops summoned to Carthage for a conference with the heretics by the Vandals king Hunneric, and subsequently banished a.d. 484. He is identified by some with Fusculus, one of the bishops who were severely beaten by Hunneric before their banishment. (Victor Vit. de Pers. Vandal. ii. 21; Nat. ad. 57; Migne, Patrol. Lat. viii.; Novell, Afric. Christ. i. 72.) [L. D.]

FILUMENUS, a Donatist, perhaps a bishop, who, after the decision of the Roman Court of Inquiry in favour of Caecilius, requested the emperor that he should be detained, for peace' sake, at Brescia, while Eunomius and Olympos were despatched to Africa to ascertain the true position of the rival parties. (Vol. i. 368; Opt. i. 25.) [H. W. P.]

FIMOYNE. [FIDHMUN.] FINAN, FINNNAN. This name assumes a vast variety of forms, and, being radically the diminutive of Finau (white), is the Irish equivalent of the Latin albus. It is found as Finan, Fianan, Fidann, Finna, Finian, Finnian, Fidiane, either simply or with a Latin termination; there also is Finnao, Fianio, and Vinianus, to which the Scotch add Wynnain, the Italian Fidiana and Frigidian, and the Irish Findbarr or Findbairn. It was a favourite name in Irish Monasticism. [FINNAN, FRIDYAN, and WYNN.]

(1) Son of Ermann, is commemorated in the Irish Kalendars on Feb. 12, having died a.d. 676 (Ann. Tigi). O'Conor (Rec. Hdb. Scriptor. iv. 80 n. 9) seeks to identify him with that St. Finnan, the "soldier of Christ," who, after being present at the battle of Drum-ceatt, a.d. 563, "blameless in the life of an anchorite for many years," was near Dunker, and survived to tell St. Adamnan (St. Columb. i. c. 49) the events of the battle. But evidently the dates will not admit of this, and Dr. Reeves (Adamnan, 96) seems to prefer Colgan's suggestion (Tr. Thunm. 380 n. 103) that the anchorite was Finan Lobhar. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 505; Mart. Doney. by Told and Reeves, 47; Kelly, Cat. Ir. Saints, etc.; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 284 n. 1.)

(2) Son of Ferga, Oct. 4, disciple of St. Finian of Clonengag. (Colgan, Acta SS. 352, c. 19; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 518, 588.)

(3) Son of Pipan, of Rath, commemorated Nov. 25. He was son of Pipan, son of Amadhaig, of the race of Coen Gulban; he thus was brother of St. Faibbe (Mar. 22), who died a.d. 679, the eighth abbot of Iona. His church was at Rath or Tempul-Ratha, in Cinel-Conaill, and is now known as Rannaynterdoney, in the county of Donegal (Colgan, Acta SS. 46, c. 1, and Tr. Thunm. 380 n. 104; 481 n. 21, 490 n. 44; Reeves, Adamnan, 376, who says he is locally called Peenan).

(4) Son of Rimhidh, bishop, commemorated on Jan. 8. Of this person no particulars are known, and yet he must have been one of much importance, as he is mentioned in all the Irish Annales and Martyrologies; he died a.d. 690 (Ann. Tigri.) At a.d. 693 (Collari, Act. Soc. x. 277), he is called him "Fynian mac Rivea Bushep." He may possibly be the bishop of Lissiasne, who is commemorated on the following day, and died in the year 661 [FINAN (7)]. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 133, 144; Mart. Doney. by Todd and Reeves, 11; Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 71, 250, 347.)

(5) Cam of Cessan-Eithig, now Kinitty. There are three lives of this saint mentioned by Hardy (Descr. Cat. i. 127-28, 788). Born at Corca Dubhne, now Corkaginy, in Kerry, he was early associated with St. Brendan (May 6) of Confort, whose pupil he is said to have been, and with St. Senan (Mar. 1-8) of Iniscathay or Scattery Island, to whom he appears to have been related. He belongs to the 7th century, and his monastery is believed to have been destroyed by the northern pirates. But a beehive house of Cyclopean style preserves the memory of his sojourn in Kerry; it is situated on Church Island, in Lough Lee or Curann Lough, on the boundary of the baronies of Iveragh and Dunkerrin, in the county of Kerry, and four miles to the north of Derryneave abbey, in Irish Doine Fhionain, which derives its name from the saint." His name is also preserved in Rubhannane, Finan's thirtor fort, now a townland near Ventry. (Petrie, Round Towers, 130-1; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 430; Colgan, Acta SS. 325, c. 20, 529 n. 11, 534, c. 27, 540 n. 21, and Tr. Thunm. 380 n. 102; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 3rd ed. 148; Nicholson, Ir. Hist. Lit., 46.)

(6) Lobhar (The Loper), of Swords, Mar. 16. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Mar. 16, tom. ii. 439-42) give, after a learned commentary as preface, a life of St. Finan (communicated by Henry Fitzsimons, but belonging to the 11th century). He was a native of Ely O'Carrol, in King's County, and flourished after the middle of the 6th century. He is connected with four Irish dedications: (a) Swords, near Dublin. (b) Innisfallen, an island in Lough Lein or the lower Lake of Killarney, in Kerry. (c) Ardfinian, in the county of Tipperary; he has probably given his name also to Kilfinane, in Limerick, where his well remains and his festival was celebrated. (d) Clonmore; probably the Clonmore in Carlow. (Colgan, A.D. 232, 215; 276-77, 637-28, and Tr. Thom. 349, 400, 404, 451 n. 40, 490 n. 50, 509, c. 7; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 10, iii. c. 18, § 3; Reeves, Adamnan, 279; Ware, Ir. Ant. c. 28; Mon. Hb. 60, 68; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 3 ed. 147-49, 2 ser. 78. He had dedications at Egan Finnan or Sunart, Argyl shire; Mochnrum, Wigtownshire; Miggie, Aberdeen; Abernethie in Monymusk, Aberdeen; and perhaps Kilfinan, Argyllshire, but some count Finn of Lindisfarne, his patron. In the Dunkeld Litanies he is called Finnanach among the holy bishops, or Finnane in the list of holy abbots. (Bp. Forbes, Kat. Scot. Saints, pp. viii. 1x. 347; C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 14-5, 49, 199.)

[J. G.]

FINAN (7) (FINANUS, FINNAN), a monk of Hii, or Iona, who succeeded Aidan, in A.D. 632, as bishop of Lindisfarne. He was ordained in Scott land, and was Rori, or rector of the church of which he was a member, and was sent to Lindisfarne when the vacancy took place. Finn rebuilt the church "more Scottorum," and made it worthy, as Bede says, to be the seat of a bishopric. The standard was not a high one. The church was constructed only of oak planks, that a wolf might not be able to enter it. This was afterwards dedicated by archbishop Theodore in honour of St. Peter. (Bd. iii. 25; Symeon, H. E. D. l. 4.) Aidan and Finn had under their charge the whole of Northumbria. The mission of arch bishop Paulinus came to an end in A.D. 633, and, after a brief interval, the monks of Hii stepped in, and worked the neglected diocese. Lindis farne was selected to be the seat of the bishopric instead of York, because it was nearer to Hii, and in its situation was the counterpart of that island. The missionaries had also a fuller scope there for their ascetic life than they could have found in the old Roman capital. The system carried on at Lindisfarne was that of Columba at Hii. The monastery was governed by an abbot, selected by the bishop, with the consent of the brethren, and all the clergy inside and outside the monastery, including the bishop, observed the monastic rule. (Bed. VITA Cath. c. 16; Skene's Celt. Scot. ii. 157-158.) The system was then at its best. Missionary exertion extended far and wide, and its fruits were visible in the numbers who were baptized and educated, in the churches that were built, in the monasteries which were founded and endowed. (Bed. H. E. iii. 5.)

Finn had two great missionary successes beyond the boundaries of Northumbria. Penda, son of Peada, king of Mercia, sought the hand of Alchfrida, a daughter of Ousiu of Northumbria. Ousiu made the adoption of Christianity by the suitor and his people the condition of his consent to the union. Peada asserted, being chiefly influenced by Alchfrid, Ousiu's son, who was also his brother-in-law. He was baptized therefore by Finn, with all his suite, in one of the royal vills near the Tyne. Bede calls it Ad Muruan, which is probably Benwell. Four priests, Cedd, Adda, Betti, and Diuna, went back with Peada as missionaries. Of these, Diuna was ordained afterwards by Finn, as the first bishop of the mid-English and Mercia. (H. E. li. 21.) The special connexion between Northumbria and Mercia, in addition to the over-lordship of Osuin, contributed largely to this religious victory. Another triumph followed. Sigebert, king of the East Saxons, was converted to Christianity by Osuin, and was also baptized by Finn at Ad Murum. Sigebert asked for missionaries, and Cedd was sent to him from Mercia. On one occasion, when Cedd, who had been a monk of Lindisfarne, returned home to confer with Finn his superior, his old master, pleased with his success, sent for two other prelates and ordained him bishop. (H. E. iii. 22.)

Finn was of course a rigorous observer of the Columban method of observing Easter. Whenever anyone came into Northumbria from France or Kent, Finn invariably heard that his practice was at variance with the Roman usage. There were some in Northumbria who upheld that use, such as James the Deacon, whom Paulinus had left behind him, queen Eanfled with her chaplain and suite, and, notably, an ecclesiastic of the name of Sicanus, who came from Columba's See. Finn, who had learned in France or Italy the incorrectness of the Northumbrian practice. With Finn Ronan had 'many an argument on the subject, but in vain. Bede says that Finn had a "ferox animus," which was impervious to reason. (H. E. iii. 25.)

Finn was buried on the 31st August, A.D. 651. There is a notice of him in the Acta SS. Feb. iii. 21, founded chiefly upon Bede. See also Col gan's Acta SS. Hiberniae, i. 357; Hardy's Cat alogue, i. pt. 1, 259; and Forbes's Lives of the Scottish Saints, 348-9. Finn's opposition to Rome deprived him of a place in the Roman calendar. He is to be found, however, in the old Scottish lists, and there is a notice of him in the Aberdeen Breviary.

[J. B.]

FINAN (8), abbot of Cloone, in the barony of Dartry, co. Meath, succeeded Nuad, A.D. 751, and died A.D. 778 (Four Mast. A.D. 773; Ann. Ultera. A.D. 777.)

FINBAR. [BARRY and FINNBAR.]

FINBIL, abbas of Cluan-Bronagh, now Clonbrony, in the barony of Clonard, co. Longford, succeeded Eillibhrig in 785 as the fifth abbe, and died in 809 (Four Mast. A.D. 804; Ann. Ultera. A.D. 808.)

FINCAN, FINCANA (FINCANE, FINTANA, FINSEGAD), Oct. 13, daughter of St. Donald of the Glen of Ogilvie, in Forfarshire; probably is the beginning of the 8th century. She is the patron saint of Echt, Aberdeenshire, and perhaps has given her name to Finlachan in Nairn, in Argyllshire (C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. i. 314), but Dr. Reeves (Adamnan, 66) thinks St. Finchan has a preferable claim. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 278; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 165; Boethius, Scot. Hist. i. c. 55; Vener. Dio. Aberd. 638; Bp. Forbes, Kat. Scot. Saints, 155, 165, 214, 239, 347.)

FINchan (FINDCHAN, FINCHAN), commemorated Mar. 11. In the Irish calendars there are five saints of this name, and the Mart. Dalhachius calls the one commemorated on Mar. 11, Finchan an pe 1 finneh, or

"Finchell of long-continued sufferings." Finchell had come with St. Columba from Ireland, and so approved himself as to be made reverent of the monastery at Artaichin in Tirere. There he ruled prudently for some years, till returning to Ireland he met with Aedh Dubh, a notoriously cruel and bloody man. When Finchell came back to Artaichin he had Aedh with him, having, as is said by Colgan, induced Aedh to take up the royal monk's cowl. So high was his opinion of his penitent, that in the course of time he sent for a distant bishop to have him ordained, and laid his right hand upon the head of Aedh along with the ordaining bishop's. This sacrilegious ordination was severely denounced by St. Columba. Finchell wiped out the stain of his crime by suffering, but the date of his death is unknown. (Colgan, Tr. Thum, 346, c. 379 n. 49, 436, c. 97, 496 n. 42, 502, col. 1; Lamigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 14; Reeves, Eccl. Antig. 279, and Adamnan, 69-71, with the elaborate notes on the whole passage in Todd, Patrick, 7-10; Kelly, Col. Ir. Saints, 95; Bp. Forbes, Kil. Scott. Saints, 347-8; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 94, 130; Haddan and Stubbs, Concilia, 8; p. ii. p. 107.) His name is found in Kilfinichen or Killinchine, in the island of Mull, and his chair is pointed out above the church; his Scotch name is St. Fitzell, as is under the inscription Beandochy, Perthishire, is dedicated to him. (C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. p. i. 314; Old Stat. Acc. Scot. xix. 342, 359; New Stat. Acc. Argyle, 286-97; Reeves, Adamnan, 66, 145; Scott. Past. Eccl. Scot. iii. pt. i. 83; Bp. Forbes, Kil. Scott. Saints, 347-48.)

FINCHILL (FINCHELL, FINCHHALH, FINCHILL, FANDOCH, FANDIFF, or FANDуч), commemorated at Steall-Guarie, now Siver-Gorri, a mountainous district in the barony of Clunieck, co. Carvran, on Jan. 15th, but is otherwise unknown. He may also be the Finchell, virgin, of April 24. (Marti. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 27, 421; Marti. Tull. in Kelly, Col. Irish Saints, xiii.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 437.)

FINCHIOU (FANCIHU, FANCIHO, FINCHHU), son of Finlich, of Brigown, commemorated Nov. 25. His life in Irish is preserved in the Book of MacCarthy Reagh, a MS., now better known as the Book of Lismore. Finchih was baptized by St. Albbe, was a pupil of St. Comgall (May 10), and was seven years in the abbacy of Bangor after St. Comgall, but there is no mention of him as such in the Irish Annals, and Silvanus or Silvanus is given (Colgan, Acta SS. 423; Marti. Doneg. Feb. 28) as St. Comgall's immediate successor. His name seems to have been originally Gaulio, with the surname Fin, and by transposition Finchih. His life was one of extreme austerity in accordance with the spirit of his age or the ideals of a later date (Marti. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 317-19; Reeves, Eccl. Ant., referring to Fleming, Coll. Sac. 314. In the Feilir of Armenus he is said to have settled at Croich, co. Monaghan, and his chief residence was at Bri-gobhan, now Brignew, near Fermoy, in the baronies of Condon and Clan-gibbon, co. Cork. (Book of Obitis, C. C. Dublin, pp. lxxiv-v. 182.)

FINGAR (GWNER, GWYNNE), ST., an Irish saint who gave his name to the parish of Gwinnar, close to the Hayle estuary in Cornwall. There is a "passio" of him and his sister Pila, falsely attributed to St. Anselm. (Migne, Anselm, ii. 325-334.) It was written at the request of some member of St. Fingar's church, perhaps in the 12th century, in the age of religious biographies and commemorative legends. It is quite unhistorical, except perhaps so far as the names are concerned. The name Gwinnar gives the Cymric form of the word meaning "white," which in Irish is Finn. The legend makes Fingar to be one of St. Patrick's converts in Ireland, a son of King Clito, who in anger drives him out, and he flies to Brittany. After returning, he again sets out with his sister Pila, and lands in the port of Hayle, where they suffer martyrdom at the hands of king Theodoric, and a sacred fountain still marks the spot. This may have taken place about 450. (See the Acta Sanctorum, 23 March, iii. 456-59, and supplem. 144; Hardy's Catalogue of Materials, i. 55, No. 167.) It is possible that a different life was seen by Leland. (Holin. ed. 1744, vol. iii. fol. 4.)

FINNAN. [FINAN and FINNHAN.] Finnann Scuatus, abbot Calduain, is said to be Dunpiste (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 286) to have flourished A.D. 402, and written De Vida S. Echabhi, lib. i. He is commemorated Feb. 22 (Tanner, Hist. 280), but he is probably a reflection, in Dunpiste's hands, of St. Finnian, bishop of Clonard, who had a commemoration on Feb. 23.

FINNAN, abbat of Swords. [FINAN (60).]

FINK. [FINCHAN.]

FINLAGAN, a saint having dedications in Argyshire. (Bp. Forbes, Kil. Scott. Saints, 348.) [FINNLOUGH.]

FINNBHAR is variously represented as BARRE, BARR, BARRINDUS, BARRY, FINBAR, and FINDVAR; it is also equivalent to FINNAN, FINNIA, &c., and literally means "light-haired." This variety of synonymous names is a cause of great confusion and difficulty. [FINNAN] (Reeves, Adamnan, 103; Caulfield, Life of St. Fin Barre, 11, n. x.) (1) Son of Archo, the (1) Son of Archo, of Inis-doomle, abbat, commemorated July 4. This saint, who is to be distinguished from Barry of Cork [BARRY], being of the race of Eochaidh Finn Fothart, and family of St. Brigida, was abbat of Inis-Doomle, now Little Island, near Waterford. St. Barfinn was his brother (Marti. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 187, 299). He was a companion of St. Mocheimocu, and with many others is said to have been trained under FINNCHAN

St. Conmag of Bangor, so that he would belong to the beginning of the 7th century (Colgan, Acta SS. 590, c. 11, 597 n. 11). Luigan (Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 17, § 5) suggests that Inis-Dimbeal may really have been Inishlounaght, co. Tipperary, where St. Mochoemocos for some time lived.

(2) Mac Ua Bairdene does not find a place in the Irish Kalendar or in the Féitire of Aenghus, yet his death is given in the Four Mast. and Ann. Ult. in the year 437. If he was a son of Restitutus, the Lombard, who is said to have been brother-in-law of St. Patrick, he is yet never quoted among the nephews of the apostle of Ireland. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. p. 132 n. 1; Petrie, Round Towers, 163–67; Colgan, Tr. Thamn, 238 n. 3; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 381 sq.) [J. G.]

FINNCHAN. [FINCHAN.]

FINNCHU, FINNCHU, FINNCHUO. [FINCHU.]

FINNE, priest of Druim-lisce, is commemorated on Feb. 9, and is, O'Hanlon thinks, of an early date. His dedication is probably now Drumlease, co. Leitrim. (See an interesting account of the place and its patrician foundation in O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 433–37.) [J. G.]

FINNIA, FINDIA. On Sept. 28 the Féitire of Aenghus commemorates ‘the two shining Finnia,’ and the second hand inserts the name in Mort. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 261), but their history is unknown. One called Fine or Finnia died abbess of Kildare, A.D. 805 (Four Mast. A.D. 800; Ann. Ult. A.D. 804; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 152); and another was sister of St. Itsa or Mida, daughter of Connafield (Colgan, Acta SS. 73, c. 2). [J. G.]

FINNIA. FINDIA, FINIANN, FINNIN.

Among the Irish saints in the sixth century a foremost place is held by the two Finnias, who connected the period of St. Patrick and St. Brigid with that of St. Columba and St. Conmag. The word Finnian appears to be the diminutive of Finn, ‘white,’ and as a name has a great variety of forms. [See Finnian and Finian.]

(1) Of Clonard, bishop or abbot, commemorated Dec. 12. This early Irish saint, the master of so many Christian teachers, has a place in all the Irish Kalendar, and is commemorated in the Scotch Kat. Drummond, Kat. Celt., and Mort. Aberd. (Bp. Forbes, Kat. Scott. Saints, 36, 92, 137). Colgan (Acta SS. 383 sqq.) has published one life ‘ex codice Ms. Salamancae,’ and the special office of St. Finnian; Hardy (Descr. Cat. i. p. 128–29, pt. ii. 789) notices four Lives of St. Finnian, and Nicholson (Irish Hist. Lb. 46) refers to a Life in Trin. Coll. Dublin. A Life in Irish is in a thick quarto volume, among other Irish Lives, in the Burgundian Library at Brussels (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. iii. 485). St. Finnian was descended from Ailill Teldub, from whom he had the designation Ul-Teldub; his mother was named Talsch; he was a native of Leinster. For deeper insight into spiritual truth he crossed the Irish Channel to the city of Kilmaine or Menevia, and placed himself under St. Merchan, that he might stay with that holy man, and some say he remained thirty years, but the time was probably much shorter. During that time he is said to have founded three churches, which are now entirely unknown, unless one of them be Llannfain subject to Llanshangel Ysgellig, Anglesey (Rees, Welsh Saints, 239–40; Williams, Ew. Welskem. 155–56). Returning to Ireland he is said to have founded several churches, his chief foundation being at Clonard, in the county of Meath, from which scholars came out in as great numbers, in the words of Ussher, as Greeks of old from the sides of the horse of Troy. The usual number ascribed is three thousand, and O'Clergy (Mort. Doneg.), following Mr. O'Gorman, calls him ‘a docteur of wisdom, and tutor of the saints of Ireland in his time.’

He is always known as ‘the preceptor of the twelve apostles of Ireland’ (Todd, St. Patrick, 99 n. 1; Mahillon, Annal. Bened. i. 208). It is now impossible to establish the date of his commencment of his work at Clonard, but considering the celebrity with which his name is everywhere known, and owing to the fame he had already obtained, he must have been there before A.D. 520. Even his ecclesiastical position there is undetermined; in the later accounts of him he is called, as by Ware, bishop of Clonard, but the probability is that he was never more than abbot, and it is noteworthy that neither in his Acts, nor in the Irish Kalendar, is he called a bishop. Ware says he wrote some Protectations and other things, but nothing is extant. He is reported to have preached before St. Brígida, visited St. Enna at Aras, and received the birth of St. Columba of Iona, and received the viaticum from St. Columba of Tirdaglas. He died in the year 550 (Ann. Fig.), or 552, when so many died of the contagious black jaundice, and was buried at Clonard. His chief feast is Dec. 12, but he is also commemorated on Feb. 23.

(2) Of Moville, bishop, Feb. 11 and Sept. 10. In the more purely Scotch Kalendar he is commemorated as Wynnin, also Vinim, Vinna, and Vinian. By the Welsh he is called Winius. There seems to be little doubt but Finnia of Moville and Wynnin of Kilwinning in Ayrshire are the same person. But the same cannot be said of Fridian bishop of Lucca. [Fin.]

Caspargre (Norm. Leg. Angl. sol. civisi b) gives an English or British Life of ‘St. Finn, bp. and cleruici,’ and there seems to be a little life or lives preserved in the Burgundian Library at Brussels (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. iii. 480, 485). For the rest we are obliged to have recourse to the lives of St. Fridian and contemporary Irish churchmen.

St. Finnian of Moville, near Newtownards, co. Down, belongs to the second order of the Irish saints, and is venerated as the patron saint of Ulster, especially in the county of Down. His father was Cairpre, of the royal house of the Dal Fiatach, his mother was Lassara or Lasair (Colgan, Acta SS. 646, c. 5; Tod, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 88 n. 3). His education was first under Colman of Dromore, and then co. Down; by the latter he was next recommended to the school of St. Caolan or Mochaoi of Nendrum (now Mahee island, in Strangford Lough), who died A.D. 497. St. Mochoi sent him to the Magnum Monasterium in Britain, to be under bishop Neannio. The late Dr. Tod (Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 104 n. 4) concludes that this conclusion is a mistake, and only a few names are added later, such as Futernia, Rosat, and Cupidula Casu, was the
(2) Virgin, commemorated on Nov. 9, and had her dedication at Craghagh, in Monawey, in the barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary (Mart. Denv. Nov. 9; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, vii. 85.)

[ J. G.]

FINN TAN (FINDAN, FINNTAN, FINNEGAN), a common Irish name, which is the same as Finn and Finigan, being the diminutive of Finn, and signifying "little white-haired man."

(1) Son of Aedh, abbat, commemorated Sept. 19. Colgan (Tr. Thom. 337, c. 31, 384 n. 27, 480 n. 6) strives to identify him with the Finn, son of Aedh, who (Adamnan, Vit. St. Columb. ii. c. 31) accompanied St. Columba across Drumalban in Scotland, and founded the monastery of Kiallaun-inde; but where this was is unknown.

(2) Son of Gabhren, of Clonenagh, commemorated Feb. 17. Hardy (Descript. Cat. i. pt. i. 192, pt. ii. 789) notices the Lives given by Colgan and the Bollandists. O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, Feb. 17, ii. 574-98) goes fully into details. In most of the purely Scotch Kalendar he is confounded with St. Bish, bishop of Lindisfarne, whose feast was on the same day.

The father of St. Finnatan belonged to the house of Escohid Finn Fothair in Wexford (Colgan, Acta SS. 355, c. 2; Todd, St. Patrick, 252, 287). His mother's name was Findath. He was probably born about the year 525 or 530, as being slightly St. Columba's junior, and received his education under St. Columba of Tirdaglas, having for his fellow-pupils St. Caemhan of Enach-Traim, and St. Mucemun. While yet a young man (juvenia) he founded the monastery of Clonenagh near Maryborough, Queen's County. There he established about A.D. 548 one of the famous schools of Ireland, and pupils came to him from all the country, the most illustrious being St. Conall the abbot of Banogar.

Of the monastic rule of St. Finnatan we have no detailed account, and no trace of it is extant; but both for himself and his pupils he prescribed and observed strictly, so that he was called "chief head of the monks of Erin." Like hermits, they laboured with their own hands, and for a plough used a light hoe. They denied themselves all flesh-meat, and had not even a cow to supply them with milk. The discipline at Clonenagh was deemed unusually severe, and St. Cianenech is said to have been the means of having had the rule considerably softened. The Book of Cluain Eithneach, said by tradition to have been written by St. Finnatan, is one of the numerous class of lost books of Ireland. In Keating's time in the beginning of the seventeenth century, it was preserved and highly prized, but it has since disappeared (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 380-2), and we have no distinct account of its contents.

The year of St. Finnatan's death is uncertain: Colgan and Ussher say he flourished A.D. 550-60; Ussher (Index Chron.) puts his death at A.D. 603, which is the date in the Ann. Tigernach, and Ware (Tr. Writ. c. 13) apparently accepts it; but Colgan (Acta SS. 355 n. 28), followed by Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 229), says he must have died long before St. Columba, whose death took place A.D. 597. Kelly (Cat. Ir. Saints, 74-5) says he was called Stationarius, because he prayed with his arms extended like a cross.
FINNTAN

At Kilfountain, near Dingle in Kerry, there is a pillar-stone, on which is engraved the name Finnten, to the saint from whom the place derives its name, but he may not have been the patron of Dunleise (Journ. Killearn. Arch. Coll. Soc. new ser. ii. 189; Arch. Combr. 3rd ser. i. 103). If he lived in the time of St. Comgall of Bangor, he flourished in the end of the 6th century (Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 13 § 2, 31, Hardy, Descrip. Cat. i. pt. ii. 729; Kelly, Col. Irish Saints, 50).

Tall-na-psalm, commemorated March 27. On this day the Martyrologies of Donegal and Tullaghgheen commemorate St. Finntan Tall-na-psalm, Os-psalmorum, or Mouth of the Psalms, and Colgan (Acta SS. 771) gives a short notice, "De S. Fintanu Psalmeano." In his Index Chren. Colgan says, "S. Fintanus, dictus Os Psalmerun," flourished A.D. 598. (Kelly, Col. Irish Saints, 106.)

Corach, bishop of Clonfert, commemorated Feb. 21. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. 21, tom. iii. 233) place him among their preeminent saints, and O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, ii. 657-658) attempts to give a criticism of the foundation on Colgan's short account of the saint. In this Colgan (Acta SS. 385) states that he was both abbott and bishop, and as such ruled several churches for many years. (a) Lennachill, now probably Laughil, Queen's County. (b) Clonenagh, near Maryborough, Queen's County, where he either lived or was buried. (c) Clonfert in Connaught, where by an unusual arrangement he held both the abbacy and the episcopate at the same time. (d) Cluain sittench in Leix, Queen's County, which was either founded or ruled by him. Colgan suggests several reasons for his receiving the name Corach, "a wise," and the most likely one is that he had a musical voice and instructed the monks in some new mode of singing the hymns and services of the church. The year of his death is unknown; he probably flourished about the end of the 6th century, and was succeeded at Clonfert by St. Senach, who died A.D. 620, yet even in the order of succession he cannot be without doubt. (Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 3; Kelly, Col. Irish Saints, 77.)

Son of Eochaidh, and brother of Colman (4) and Conaillegh, both of Snaore, was descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages, and is said to have lived at Bealach, but where this "road" or "pass" lay is unknown. His mother was Ailfeann, daughter of Lencus of Killiney, co. Dublin, and his feast Jan. 1. His usual name is Finntan Mac Ecchech. He probably belongs to the first half of the 7th century. (Marty. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 5; Marty. Tullaghgheen in Kelly's Col. Ir. Saints, xi.; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. iii. 48; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 24, ii. 607; Colgan, Acta SS. 355, col. 1; Reeves, Adaman, 173.)

Inclusus. [FINNTAN.]

(11) Of Oenttrebha, abbate of Bangor, died A.D. 612 (Four Mast. and Ann. Ulter.). Oentrebha is the old name of Antrim (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 251). Finntan was the fourth abbate and held the abbacy for three years, between Silian and Mac Laisre.

(12) Of Roscoenuch, disciple of St. Barry, at FIRMILIANUS, ST. 521

Loch Irec (Colgan, Acta SS. 697; Caulfield, Life of S. Fin Barre, v.) [J. G.]

FINTAN, FIDAN, patron of Augia Rheni, now Rheingaw or Rheinis, near Schaffhausen, whose life was published by Goldastus (Rev. Alaman. Scriptor. i. 318 sqq.), by Mabillon (Acta SS. 8. & 8. tom. v. sac. iv. pt. i. 359), and by Zapf (Rit. tom. i. 233 sqq.). Though an Irishman, he has no place in the Irish Kalendars. According to the Life, he was born in Leinster. His sister had been carried off in one of the earliest incursions of the Northmen, and Fintan being sent by his father in search of her, was himself taken captive by the same pirates; this must have been some years prior to A.D. 795. Slipping away from them as they rounded the north of Scotland, he commenced himself to the waves, and was carried apparently to the coast of Caithness, where he remained with a bishop for two years. Thence he proceeded to Rome, visiting St. Martin's at Tours by the way; from there he went to Switzerland, and lived with a nobleman for four years "in clericatu." Then he became a monk at Rheinis in the fifty-first year of his age; and in the monastery, and as a monk in an adjacent cell, he spent twenty-seven years, his monastic profession being dated in A.D. 800, and his death in A.D. 827. Though not the founder of Rheinis, he was adopted as the patron, and his feast is Nov. 15. (Lasian, Eccl. Hist. Fr. iii. c. 20, § 7; Reeves, Adamnan, pp. xxii. — Tanner, Bibl. 280; O'Connor, Ep. Num. c. 61, &c.; Proleg. ii. 186; Ware, H. A. L. c. 24, and Ir. Writ. i. c. 6; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 16, wks. vi. 277, Chron. Ind. A.D. 795.) This St. Fintan or Fidhan is to be distinguished from one of the same name at Augia Dives, now Reichenaun, whose feast is Nov. 16, and who is identified with St. Fintan of Lrmochili, or at least having his feast on the same day. [FINTAN (12).] [J. G.]

FINTAN, presbytery, confessor. (Usuard, Mart. Feb. 17.) [FINTAN (2).]

FIONCIUS, bishop of Lamego, signs the acts of the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo in 688 and 693 [FILICHIUS]. (Exp. Scriptor. xiv. 139; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333-338.)

FIRMATUS, deacon, commemorated, with his sister, Flavia or Flaviana, virgin, at Auverre, Oct. 5. (Usuard, Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 163.)

FIRMIANUS, bishop of Centuriones in Numidia, banished by Huneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notitiae, 56 in Migne, Patrolog. Lat. iviii.; Nicocleti, Africa Christ. i. 196.) [L. D.]

FIRMILIANUS (1), ST., bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, one of the greatest prelates of his time; a friend of Origen, ranked with Dionysius the Great, appealed to by Cyprian, and a rebuker of St. Stephenus. In A.D. 232, tenth year of Alex. Severus, he already held the see in his see (Eus. vi. 26, 27), though Cave (Hist. i. p. 123) speaks of A.D. 233 as the year of his elevation. When Origen soon after left Egypt, Firmilian induced him to visit the "climate of Cappadocia, εἰς ἡγαγώνων ἰδίαν χαίροντας τὴν ζωὴν, skilled alike in philosophy and theology.

Routh (vol. iii. p. 149) points to him as one of the oldest authorities who states with precision the Anti-Pelagian doctrine. Basil (de Spiritu Sancto. xxiv.) speaks of his Λέον as early testimonies to the exactness of his own doctrine, and quotes his agreement with Cyprian on baptism in the epistle to Amphilectus (Ep. 180). The fact that he is not mentioned by other ecclesiastical writers shows that he cannot have been voluminous. A book upon the persecutions is absurdly attributed to him by Moses Chor-nensis. (Routh, R. S. vol. i. p. 103.)

FIRMILIANUS (3), successor of Urbanus as governor of Palestine in the reign of Maximin, whose chief agent he was in the persecution of the Christians in those parts. The horrible tortures which he employed are described at length by Eusebius. The best known of his victims is PAMPILLIUS. After the death of Maximin he was beheaded by order of Licinius, probably in A.D. 313. (Euseb. de Mart. Pal. chaps. viii. ix. xi.)

[F. W. B.]

FIRMILIANUS (1), bishop of Mimat (Mende); commemorated on Jan. 4. Some argue that he must have lived between St. Privatus, who was slain in the time of Gallus and Valerian, and Genialis, who subscribed the first council of Arles, 314. He may possibly have preceded the first bishop of Avignon. His body is said to have been found ipso reclinante at La Canourgue (Canonic). (A.A. SS. Jan. i. 93; Gall. Christ. i. 86.)

[M. F. A.]

FIRMILIANUS (2), bishop of Amiens, a native of Pampeluna. He was the son of Firmus, a senator of Pampeluna, and became the earliest convert of Honorius the apostle of Pampeluna. There he was subsequently ordained a bishop by Saturninus bishop of Toulouse, but apparently only as a missionary bishop for Gaul, though he has been reckoned (Gams, Ser. Ep. 62, 487) first bishop of Pampeluna. In Gaul he is said to have preached in the districts of Albi, Auvergne, Angers, Beauvais, and Amiens. Of the last he was reckoned the apostle and first bishop. He is said to have been martyred by order of the Roman governor, and was commemorated on Sept. 25. But his death is placed at various dates, from the apostolic age down to A.D. 303, and our knowledge of his history rests wholly on the equally authentic statements, given at great length by the Bollandists, who defend them (perhaps not very successfully) against the arguments of Tillemont, in his article on St. Saturninus. (Mém. vol. iii. 303; A.A. SS. Sept. vii. 51; Gall. Chr. x. 1150.)

[R. T. S.]

FIRMILIANUS (3), bishop of Amiens, cir. 370 or 380, said to have been baptized by Firmilanus L, and to have ruled the see for forty years. (Boll. A.A. SS. 1 Sept. i. 175.)

[R. T. S.]

FIRMILIANUS (4), driven from Italy under the Arian king Theodoric, and having found refuge at Metz was there chosen bishop on the death of Adelphus. But the duration of his episcopate is variously stated at eight and twenty-eight years. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 684.)

[R. T. S.]

FIRMILIANUS (5), a native of Toul, raised late in life to the bishopric of Verdun; died A.D. 502, when Clovis was besieging the town. [EXSCRIPTVS.] (Gall. Christ. xiii. 1165.)

[F. T. S.]

FIRMILIANUS (6), ST., fourth bishop of Uzes, born in the province of Narbonne, of noble parenthood, about A.D. 516. At twelve years he was sent to Uzes with Ferreolus his brother Augustus's son, and his successor in the bishopric, thus seven years old, to be instructed by his uncle Hiloricus. His progress was so rapid that in his twentieth year he was ordained a priest, though the canon was thereby infringed, and consecrated suffragan and successor of his uncle, upon whose death shortly afterwards he was appointed to the see in the 22nd year of his age (A.D. 538). In his episcopate the see of Uzes was separated from the archbishopric of Narbonne, and joined to that of Arles or Bourges. St. Firminus was present at the fourth council of Orleans in 541, the fifth in 549, and the second of Paris about 551. He is said to have been a joint author with Cyprian and Victorinus of the life of St. Cæcilius of Arles, and has been supposed by some to have been one of his disciples. Some verses of his contemporary, Arator (A.D. 490-556 or 560), sub-deacon of the church of Rome, prove that he was known beyond his country (quoted in the Gall. Christ. vi. 612). He died in 558, at the age of eighty-seven, and was commemorated Oct. 11. His tomb in the church of St. Basilium was celebrated for its miracles in the 9th century. (See the letter of Annnu, bishop of Lyons, to Theobald of Langres, s. 6, in Mige, Patr. Lat. exvii. 81.) He is said to have built two churches at Uzes, and there was long existing an abbey called after him in the city. He was succeeded by his nephew St. Ferreol. (Usuard. Mart. Oct. 11; Bull. Acta SS. Oct. v. 635; Mansi, ix. 120, 136, 740, Patr. Lat. lxvii. 1001, 1253, Gall. Christ. vi. 611.)

[S. A. B.]

FIRMILIANUS (7), sixth bishop of Vence, following Prosper and succeeded by Deuterius (circ. A.D. 550-540). (Gall. Christ. iii. 1214.)

[S. A. B.]

FIRMILIANUS (8), bishop of Triehe, who with other bishops of Istria and north Italy, maintained a separation from Rome, on the question of the Three Chapters. He afterwards was reconciled to the church of Rome, and troubled, in consequence, by Severian, patriarch of Carthage, head of the separatists. Gregory the Great in 602 writes to encourage him to be firm (lib. xii. 33, ind. v. in Migne, lxvii. 1243); also in 603 to Smaragdus the exarch, asking him to protect Firminus. (Lib. xii. 33, ind. vi. in Migne, lxvii. 1283.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FIRMILIANUS (9) (FIRMINUS), ninth bishop of Tarentaise, between St. Herasclius and Probian about the commencement of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702.)

[S. A. B.]

FIRMILIANUS (10), bishop of Blda (Blora), south of Viterbo, present at the Lateran synod under Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 867; Hefele, § 307.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FIRMILIANUS (11), said to have been 7th bishop of Lodève, succeeding Anatolius, and followed by Ansemundus (circ. A.D. 652), but the evidence of his existence is dubious. (Gall. Christ. vi. 528.)

[S. A. B.]

FIRMILIANUS (12), June 24; a military martyr with six others, in Armenia, under the emperor Maximin, A.D. 312. Some short time previously
FIRMINUS

Armenia, under the teaching of Gregory the Illuminator, had embraced the faith with enthusiasm. When, therefore, in May, 311, Maximian set a general persecution upon foot throughout the land, the Armenians took up arms in defence of their oppressed brethren, and defeated the emperor with great loss. During this campaign our martyr seems to have suffered. (Martyr. Rom.; Eusebius, H. E. lix. cap. 8–9; Mason, Diocletian Persecution, pp. 130, 325.) [G. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (13), a young man of high birth and godly parentage, to whom St. Basil wrote, c. A.D. 373, reproaching him for the paucity and brevity of his letters, and expressing the sorrow with which he had heard that he had deserted the ascetic life, and, following the example of his paternal grandfather, had adopted the military profession, and beseeching him to return to his home, and enter on the career of civil distinction open to him (Basil. Epist. 116 [174]). Firminus at once yielded to Basil's remonstrances, and wrote, stating that through the influence of persons he felt est in obtaining honorable discharge, and declaring his resolution to adopt a celibate life (ibid. 117 [234]). [E. V.]

FIRMINUS (14), a layman of Caesarea, whose friendship Chrysostom formed during his stay in that city on his way to Cucusus A.D. 404. Chrysostom wrote to him on his arrival there to announce the safe accomplishment of his journey, his satisfaction with Cucusus, and the kindness of its inhabitants (Chrysost. Epist. 80). [E. V.]

FIRMINUS (1), bishop of Verona, probably early in the 3rd century. (Ughelet, Ital. Sacr. v. 551; Cappelletti, Chiese d'Italia x. 740.) [R. S. G.]

FIRMINUS (2), martyr of Carthage, a.d. 250. [Armito.] [E. W. B.]

FIRMINUS (3), Aug. 9, martyr with Rusticus at Verona, 304. He was sprung from a noble family in Bergamo, which rendered his steadfast adherence to the faith the more meritorious to the emperor Maximian, who at the time was carrying on the persecution with great vigour in north Italy, being a resident at Milan. Firmus was arrested, and in company with a relative, Rusticus, led before the emperor, and by him delivered over to the prefect Anulinius, who took them to Verona, and there put them to death. A story prevailed of the bodies having been taken to Africa and subsequently brought from thence to Verona, which gave rise to a controversy for centuries between the two towns as to which of them possessed the remains, until the question was settled by St. Charles Borromeo in the year 1575 solemnly transferring the relics from a tomb in the suburbs to the cathedral. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron.; Petrus de Natali, Catal. SS. lib. 7, cap. 42; Boll. Acts SS. Aug. ii. 419–423.) [G. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (4), Feb. 4, martyr: whose name appears nowhere save in the local offices of the church at Genoa. He probably is the same as the Firminus commemorated on Feb. 2, as a martyr at Rome, A.D. 304, with Fortunatus, Pelicanus, Candidus, and twenty-four others. (Murt. Rom., Hieron., Usuardi; Boll. Acts SS. Feb. i. 960.) [G. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (5), June 24, one of the seven brothers; military martyrs, in Armenia, under Maximian. [Firmius (19)]. [G. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (6), June 1; martyr in Greece under Maximian, A.D. 312. (Murt. Rom.; Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (7), a Moorish chief, who revolted against the Romans in the reign of Valentinian. Our chief authority is Ammianus Marcellinus (xix. 5). From him we learn that Firmus was the son of Nebel, the most powerful of the Moorish chieftains. The revolt soon assumed serious proportions, and Count Theodosius, father of the future emperor, was sent to quell it. He seemed for a moment to have gained his object, whereupon Firmus had recourse to a new expedient. He sent Christian envoys, thinking thereby to make up for obtaining honours, and not disappointed. This unnatural alliance appears from St. Augustine to have been permanent and well-known; since he reproaches the Donatists for having employed this "barbarous rex," whom he characterizes as "Hostis immansissimus Romanorum," to persecute their enemies the Rogatists, and for recognizing him as a legitimate king (Cont. Parminiunam, i. 10, 11), so much so, that the Rogatists gave them the nickname of Firmianus (Ep. 87, Migne). In the latter passage, he also mentions an atrocious act of a Donatist bishop of Riscicada, who formed a plot with Firmus to come into his city and exterminate the Catholics. The revolt appears to have begun in the middle of 372; since Romans, who was superseded by Theodosius, is mentioned as count in June of that year (Cod. Theol. ad loc.). It must in that case have lasted at least two years, since Ammianus (ch. 6, 1) makes it contemporary with the revolt of the Quadi, which occurred in 374. It is referred to briefly by Zosimus (iv. 16), Orosius (Hist. vii. 33), and Paulus Diaconus (Hist. Miscell. lib. xii.), who quotes Orosius. Symmachus (Ep. i. 64, al. 58) apparently alludes to it, when he says that the barbarians seized a large treasure when they took Caesarea.

There is a medal extant, of uncertain date, with the inscription, D. N. Firmus P. F. Aug., which Spanheim (de Praest. et Usu Numm. Antiq. Diss. xi. p. 364, ed. Amst. 1717) thinks to be our Firmus. This may certainly be supported by Zosimus (loc. cit.). Other authorities have supposed the name to be another form of Firmius, a tyrannus in the time of Aurelian. [M. F. A.]

FIRMINUS (8), ST., bishop of Tagaste in the African province of Numidia, mentioned by St. Augustine in his De Mendacio (xiii. 23), as protecting a fugitive, "for," said he, "I can neither tell a lie by saying that I have not concealed him, nor can I deliver him into your hands." So great was his constancy even when brought before the emperor that he preserved the man who had thrown himself on his protection. He is commemorated on July 31. (A.A. SS. Boll. Jul. viii. 180; Morelli, Africa Christ. t. 258.) [L. D.]
FIRMUS (9), a presbyter in the beginning of the 5th century; an active man and trusted with matters of importance. He visited St. Jerome at Bethlehem first in the year 405, and was charged by him with letters for St. Augustine (Ep. 115, 116, ed. Vail.). He was again with Jerome ten years later, and was repeatedly employed by the famous writer to keep him informed of the progress of the Nestorian controversy and the younger Paula at Ravenna on his return to Italy in the year 415. He afterwards proceeded to Africa, where he was in communication with St. Augustine (Jerome to Augustine, Ep. 134, ed. Vail.). We hear of him again as the bearer of a letter from Silvanus (afterwards pope) to Augustine and Alypius, and again returning with the answer in the year 318 (Aug. Ep. 191, 194). [W. H. F.]

FIRMUS (10), a bishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, who was present at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and took a rather conspicuous part in its proceedings. He protested against the decision delivering the opening of the council for the arrival of John of Antioch, and called upon Mennon, the bishop of Ephesus, to state how many days had elapsed since the sessions ought to have commenced (Labbe, Concil. iii. 450). On the arrival of the legates of the Roman see, and the reading of the letter of pope Celestinus, Firmus declared that the sentence against Nestorius contained in it should be regarded as final, and Nestorius pronounced canonically deposed (ibid. 618). He highly praised Cyril's exposition of the Nicene faith for its clearness, which left nothing doubtful, and for its perfect consistency with the Catholic faith (ibid. iv. 168). He was one of the delegates to Theodosius (ibid. 1313). He was deposed by the Oriental party at Tarsus (Trag. Iren. cc. 38, 66, 138, 141, 201), notwithstanding the high commendations lavished on him by John of Antioch (ibid. c. 4). Forty-five letters of Firmus were published by Muratori from a MS. in the Ambrosian Library (Script. Græc. Patav. 1709, also in Migne, Patrol. Ixxvii. p. 1477 sqq.). These are charming examples of a refined epistolary style, short, bright, playful, and very interesting from the light they throw on the manners of the age. They do not touch at all on theological questions. He died A.D. 459 (Socr. H. E. vii. 49). [E. V.]

FIRMUS (11), bishop of Tipasa in the African province of Numidia, one of the delegates of his province to the council assembled at Carthage by Boniface A.D. 525 (Mansi, viii. 647). His name is found amongst the five African bishops present at the first session of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 553; but it may have been a successor to his see of the same name. (Mansi, ix. 174; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 327.) [L. D.]

FIRMUS (12) (FARMUS, FARNUS), bishop of Viseo, one of the suffragan churches of Merida, in the years 638 and 646, the dates of the seventh and eighth councils of Toledo, the acts of which he signs. Before and after the Suevian occupation of Gallicia, Viseo was a suffragan church of Merida; but during the rule of the Suevi it was transferred to Braga. (Esp. Supr. xiv. 314; Aguirre-Calatani, iii. 423-448.) [M. A. W.]

FLACCUS, the name of two African bishops, one of Bulula in Byzaeena, the other of Vicus Pacis in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484, after the conference at Carthage between the Arians and Catholics. (Nobilis, Victor. Vit. 57 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. viii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 137, 353.) [L. D.]

FLABIANUS. [FLAVIANUS.]

FLACCUS (1), a proconsul of Africa, though at what time is uncertain, mentioned by St. Augustine as a man of ability, education, and judgment. Licentius, one of the interlocutors in the dialogue contra Academicos, gives him as an instance of a man who, though unwillingly, could not help bearing witness to the correctness of the conjectures made by a notorious conjurer named Albicierus. One of these was that without previous information, as was said, he named correctly a property which Flaccianus was about to buy, and another that being asked of what region the conjurer was thinking, he answered, though an illiterate man, a line of Virgil which he had then in his mind. He is also mentioned by Augustine as having brought to his notice a prophecy concerning our Lord delivered by the Erythrean Sibyl. Augustine is also said to have written magical letters to him, which were lost. (Aug. c. Acad. i. 18, 21; GC. Dix. xvi. 23; Tillemont, vol. xiii. p. 35.) [H. W. P.]

FLACCUS (2) (FLAVIANUS), bishop of Rhodope. Baroinus quotes a Vatican manuscript purporting to be an epitome of Flaccianus, or perhaps Flavianus, a bishop of Rhodope, to Peter Fullo, patriarch of Antioch, charging him with Arianizing in his interpretation of the Triagion. The writer says he has been driven to find refuge at Rome from the spiritual tempers of the east. Baroinus, placing him in 483, conjectures he may have been among the bishops who came from Egypt with John of Alexandria to Rome. The epistle is probably spurious, but Le Quen thinks the person to whom it is attributed a real one, and puts him among the bishops of Trajanopolis, the metropolitan see of the province of Rhodope. (Baroin. ann. 483, 1xii.; Le Quen, Or. Chr. i. 1191.) [C. H.]

FLACCUS (3), bishop of Thessalonica. I. Name.—A medal, engraved by Du Cange and by Baroinus, has the inscription "Ael. Flaccialis Aug. By the Greek writers, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Nicephorus, etc., the name is given as Pusaflæa. Others, e.g. Philippinus (H. E. x. 7) call her Pauclisia. The treatise of Faustus of Iconium, which professes to be written at the request of the empress, who, from all internal evidence would seem to be Flaccia, is entitled in the ordinary editions, "Ad Galliam Pauclisiam." There seems, therefore, to have been a confusion, owing to the similarity of the names Pauclisia and Pauclisia, between the subject of this article and the well-known Gallia Pauclisia.

II. Origia, etc.—Clavius tells us that she was by birth a Spaniard (De Laud. Sac. 89), and Valesius (Not. ad Sus. H. E. vii. 6. 3) concludes that she must have been the daughter of Antoninus, prefect of Gaul, and consul in 632. This is founded upon Themistius (Or. xvi. p. 263 B, ed. Harduin, who says that Theodosius conferred the consulsip upon his κυρίας. This, says Valesius, can be no other than Antonius, his father-in-law. The words, however, seem hardly to warrant such an assumption of certainty. We gather from St. Jerome (Ep. 70, 2, Migne) that his wife was the mother of Arcadius and Honorius, who married Salina, daughter of the Moorish prince Gildo. [GILD.]

III. Life and Character.—Her marriage with Theodosius probably took place in 376, since her eldest child seems to have been born in 377. She was the mother of Arcadius and Honorius, afterwards emperors, and of a daughter Pulcheria, who died just before her mother, and who is commemorated in a funeral oration by St. Gregory Nyssae (vol. iii. p. 863, Migne's ed.). Some think that the Gratian mentioned by St. Ambrose (de Ob. Theod. § 40, Migne) was also her son, but St. Gregory Nyssae (de Plac. ad fin.) tells us plainly that she had only three children. The Chron. Pasch. (ad ann. 386) makes a mistake with regard to her, calling her the second wife of Theodosius, which is obviously incorrect (cf. esp. Soc. H. E. iv. 31, 18). Her masterpiece is the ode by St. Ambrose, St. Gregory Nyssae, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Nicephorus, among Christian writers, and equally by the heathen Themiutis.

Sozomen (H. E. vii. 6. 3) calls her ισαρτάτη φίλας τού δόγματος την εν Νικαια σωμάδου, and narrates how she deterred the emperor from having as a hostage, as he had intended, with the Arian Eunomius.

Theodoret (H. E. v. 19) tells us that so far from being elated by her high position, she made herself the servant of the lowest, and used to visit the hospitals and the homes of the sick and to minister to them with her own hands; also, that she continually reminded her husband of the gratitude which he owed to God for his many gifts, and by this means nourished the seeds of good within him. St. Ambrose (de Ob. Theod. § 40, ed. Migne) speaks of her as a "fideis unna Deae."

"Theodoret (p. xix. p. 231 a) tells us that it was by her advice that the emperor pardoned the conspirators in 385 [THEODOSIUS], and that in this, as in other cases, their sentiments were in perfect harmony—συμμόρφων της δικαιώματος αυτή και δει βοηθουσέναι εις μάς.

Nicephorus Callitius (H. E. xii. 42) repeats almost verbally the account given by Theodoret.

IV. Death, etc.—She died apparently in 385, on Sept. 14 (cf. Tillemont, Emp. vol. v. note 25 on Theodosius), at Scutumis, in Thrace, whither she had gone for the sake of the waters. St. Gregory, to whom we owe this last piece of information, prefers her funeral oration, which is still extant (vol. iii. p. 878, in Migne's edition of his works), in which he praises her throughout as a model of Christian virtues. (Vid. also Zonaras, xiii. 18.)

The Chron. Pasch. (1. c.) and Du Cange (Cyp. Christ. ii. 5, 3) mention a palace at Constantinople, on whose corners statues were erected to her at Antioch was destroyed shortly after her death in one of the tumults which arose on the subject of taxing, and the affection which the emperor entertained for her memory is strikingly shewn by the signal vengeance which he resolved to exact, and which he was afterwards persuaded to mitigate (Theod. H. E. v. 20; Niceph. H. E. xii. 41). Tillemont (Emp. vol. v. art. 26) says that the Greek church reckons her as a saint. This is founded upon the Menaion for Sept. 14, where the words are: "Και μονή της ευσεβεστάτας βασιλείας Παλαιάς, η άμαρτος των βασιλείων θεωσών," followed by the following lines: "Θαυμάντοι λεγομένοι στίγμα γι' ή Παλαιά, εν οὐρανοί οἴσαντον εύφρης στίγμα. Αὕρη πάντοτε της της χρόνος εν υπέρβαλη και τη των ροώντων ενυπελίε στρατος Άγιοι." The Bulliot writer on Sept. 14 contends that this commemoration is not sufficient to justify Tillemont's conclusion, since the bishops of the sixth general council are immediately afterwards commemorated in much the same way, and since she is not mentioned in the Menolog. Synaxar. Typica, etc. His conclusion is that Flacciellae mention est in Menaion impressa sed potius tanquam venerabilis quam ut sancta. In Ferrarius, however (Catal. Sanct. qui in Martyr. Rom. non sunt), she is mentioned as being commemorated at Constantinople, on Aug. 14, which seems hardly to bear out the statement of the Bulliot writer. "Apud Ferrarium memoria est Flacciellae, tanquam imperetriis beatae memoriae," meaning apparently not as a saint. The fact that she is not commemorated in the Roman calendar seems therefore to have prejudiced the Bulliot writer unduly against her claims, and Tillemon's conclusion is apparently the more correct of the two.

[M. F. A.]

FLACCILLA (2), elder daughter of the emperor Arcadius by Eudoxia, born in 397. (Marcellinus, Chron.) She apparently died young, as she is not mentioned by Sozomen or Philostorgius among the children of Arcadius. (Cl. Philost. xii. 6; Soz. H. E. ix. 1.)

[M. F. A.]

FLACCILLUS (FLACCILLUS), Arian bishop of Antioch, A.D. 353-342. There is a very remarkable discrepancy as to the true form of the name of this bishop. Jerome, in his Historia Ecclesiae, calls him Placciullus; Sozomen, Placcius or Placitus (H. E. iii. 5); Theodoret, Flaccitus (H. E. i. 21), while Athanasius (Apol. ii. pp. 797, 799) and Eusebius (in Marcell. lib. iii. pr. p. 57), followed by Theophanes, write the name Flacciellus. He appears in the modern catalogue of the patriarchs of Antioch as Placentius (Seale, Patriarchs of Ant. p. 156). After the deposition of Eustathius, A.D. 331, the episcopal succession was singularly rapid. Eulalius held the see but three months, Euphrontius, the immediate predecessor of Flaccillus, only fifteen. The episcopate of Flaccillus was a matter of lesser length, though the exact dates are uncertain, about nine years. Nothing is known of Flaccillus previous to his becoming bishop of Antioch on the death of Euphrontius, and little is recorded of him as bishop save his official acts. He presided at the council of Tyre, 335, held, by the emperor's desire, to investigate the charges against Athanasius, and joined in the sentence of deposition pronounced upon him. From Tyre he passed on with his episcopal brethren to Jerusalem to celebrate the dedication of the Church of the Resurrection, which took place Sept. 13 in that year. Tillemont thinks it probable that Flaccicillus resided at the council which succeeded the solemnities of the consecration by which Anian and Eusebius were ordained as orthodox believers, who had suffered from the calamities of jealous rivals. Six years later, we find him occupying the same position at the celebrated "Council of the Dedication" held at Antioch, 341 (Socr. ii. 8, 9; Soz. iii. 5). Flaccillus is associated by Theodoret with his two Arian successors, Stephen and Leontius, as men whose unjust and impious deeds it would require a volume to recount (Theod. H. E. ii. 24). No definite charge, however, is specified. Flaccillus must have had some reputation for erudition, since Eusebius dedicated to him his work against Marcellus of Ancyra, with the request that he would make any additions or corrections he might think desirable (Euseb. in Marcell. i. iii. pr. p. 57). He must have died about A.D. 345, and was succeeded by Stephen. [E. V.]

FLACCUS (1), bishop of Sanius or Sanaus, in Phrygia Pacatiana, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quen, Origen Christ. i. 805; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

FLACCUS (2), bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia Salutaris. One of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325 (Mansi, ii. 695); subsequently he joined the Eusebians, and was one of the Easterners whose "indecent and suspicious flight" provoked the anger of the Council of Sardica, A.D. 347. His name is appended to the letter to the churches, which the seeders published at their synod at Philippopolis. (Mansi, iii. 140; Le Quen, Origen Christ. i. 804.) [L. D.]

FLACCUS (3) ALBINUS. [ALCUIN.]

FLACHERTAC. [FLAITHBHERTACH.]

FLACILLUS, bishop of Jassus, on the coast of Caria, present at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quen, Origen Christ. i. 913; Mansi, vii. 156.) [L. D.]

FLAITHBHERTACH (1) Abbot of Cillmor-Emhir, now Killmore, situated three miles to the east of Armagh, died A.D. 812. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 807, i. 419.) [J. G.]

(2) Flaithearthach or Flachertach, son of Loingseach, became monarch of Ireland A.D. 722, and after reigning seven years, retired A.D. 729 to Armagh, where he died in monastic seclusion, A.D. 760 (Four Mast.) or more truly A.D. 765. (Ann. Ult. A.D. 764.) [J. G.]

FLAITHGHIAL (FLAIDHEIL), son of Taichleath, abbot of Drum-rath, said by Colgan (Acta SS. 876) to be a church in Léiny, Cunaught, died A.D. 793. (Four Mast. A.D. 788; Ann. Ult. A.D. 792.) [J. G.]

FLAITHNIA (FLAITNE) son of Congall, and called The Wise, died A.D. 715. (Four Mast. A.D. 713; Ann. Ult. A.D. 714.) [J. G.]

FLAITHNIAIDH, son of Congall, abbot of Cloond, co. Longford, died A.D. 781 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 381, A.D. 778); but in Ann. Ult. A.D. 782, there is the obit of Mac Flainnabhadh, abbot of Cloond. (O'Conor, Eri. Hist. Scrip. iv. 111.) [J. G.]

FLAMMS, abbot of Chimen. It is stated in the Life of St. Germanus of Paris by Fortunatus that a letter which Flammeris received from Germanus was the means of curing a sick monk, who was allowed to maintain the signatur with his tongue, and so receive the precious inkt into his system. (Vit. S. Germa. § 58, in Mabill. Acta SS. G. S. B. i. 230, and in Pat. Lat. lxxii. 72.) [C. H.]

FLAMINA, May 2, virgin and martyr is Gaul during the Diocletian persecution. She suffered under the president Basilus. She was particularly venerated for her influence on sorcery. The offices of the church of St. Hilarius, near Clermont, under whose altar she rests, is said to be the prayer to God that by her intercession the worshippers might be protected from all diseases of the eyes. (Ferrarius, Catal. SS.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. i. 181-183.) [G. T. S.]

FLANN (FLAINN, FLANNUS) means "red" or "crimson," is used as a proper name, and the latinized form is Frenius or Florence: its original idea was probably a ruddy-faced man (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 145).

(1) Febla, of Armagh, commemorated April 24. His name does not appear in the Irish Kalendars. He succeeded Segene at Armagh A.D. 688, where he is called abbot, bishop, and archbishop, and was there for twenty-nine years. The most celebrated event of his rule was the assembling of the synod at Tara in Meath, about A.D. 697 (Potrie, Tara Hill, 171-2). There were forty bishops or abbots presided over by Flann Febla; and the best known person present, and the person at whose suggestion the convention is said to have been held, was St. Adamnan (Sept. 23), abbot of Iona, Colgan (Acta SS. 454, col. 1) had a copy of the acts of the synod, and copies of the same are now preserved in the Burgundian Library at Brussels (Ns. 2324), and in bishop Marsh's library, Armagh, in a book entitled, Presidents of Sec of Armagh, Ns. (Trans. Roy. Irish Acad. xvii. 173, Annap); they have been printed by Martene (Thebenea in Nov. Anec. tom. iv. col. 18), and are probably the eight canons known as the "Cain Adamnan." [ADAMNAN (2).] (Reeves, Adamnan I., ii. 178, 179; Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. iii. c. 11, § 10; Colgan, Acta SS. 473, col. 2, 566, and Tr. Thomn. 218, i. 563,) He died A.D. 715. (Ann. Ty. ; Stuart, Armagh, 94.)

(3) Sinna Us Cola, abbot of Cleonaighe, one of the Ui-Creamhthainn, died A.D. 726. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 323.)

(4) Abbat of Banger. At Dec. 15, in Mart, Duneog, there is merely the commemoration of "Flann, abbot of Beanachor." In the Irish Annals he is entered as St. Flann of Aestebr (the ancient name of Antrim), abbot of Beanachor; he died A.D. 725. (Ann. Ty.; Four Mast. A.D. 725; Ann. Ult. A.D. 727; O'Conor, Eri. Hist. Scrip. ii. 236, iv. 80; Reeves, Exc. Antip. 277, 278, 381.)

(5) Son of Cinoing, abbat of Cill-mor-Rithairb (now probably Kilmore, co. Roscommon, founded by St. Columba), was murdered: the Four Mast. say in A.D. 730, the Ann. Ult. in A.D. 734 (Four Mast. by O'Donnay, i. 327; O'Conor, Rev. Her. Scrip. iv. 95).
FLANNAN

(8) Beg, commemorated July 17. By Colgan (Tr. Thomann, 509, c. 8), and Lanigan (Eccles. Hist. Ir. iii. 171) he is identified with the "Flann, son of Ceillic, son of Crumad, bishop of Beachrann," who died A.D. 739 (Ann. Tgj.). Lanigan accepts this Beachrann as the small island Raithlin, Rathylin, or Raighares, off the coast of Antrim; but O'Donnay is unable to decide whether it is that or the island of Lambay, off Brega, near Dublin (Four Mast. by O'Donnay, i. 336 n. 4, 337; O'Conor, Rev. Hist. Scrip. ii. 243, iv. 88; Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 249, 292).

(8) Aghile, bishop of Aughrim, a village in the county of Galway, died A.D. 741 (Four Mast. by O'Donnay, i. 338 n. 4, 339; Ann. Ult. a.d. 740).

(9) Ua Dorchua (Ua Dochrua, Ann. Ult.), abbot of Inishkeen, co. Monaghan, died A.D. 771 (Ann. Ult. a.d. 770; Four Mast. by O'Donnay, i. 385).

(10) Bishop, wise man, and abbot of Inishkeen, co. Monaghan, died A.D. 784 (Four Mast. by O'Donnay, i. 384 n. 385).

(11) Finn, commemorated Jan. 14. On this day the Irish Calendars commemorate Flann Finn, of Cuilinn, in the vicinity of Corgach (Mart. Domest. Mart. Tidalgot). As appearing in the "Recueil de Armagnac, he probably flourished not later than the eighth century. He is to be distinguished from Flann Finn, son of Macruhlae Ua Cruinnueill, chief of Gneil Keghain, who died A.D. 698 (Four Mast.), and from Flann Finn, who was known by this name in Ireland, but in England as Aelfred son of Owgy king of Northumbria.

(12) Son of Ceillic, abbot of Finneghla, scribe, archivist, and bishop, died suddenly A.D. 812 (Ann. Ult., a.d. 811; Four Mast., by O'Donnay, i. 867, i. 419). [J. G.]

FLANNAN, of Killaloe, commemorated Dec. 18. The name is etymologically the diminutive of Flann. Of this saint there appear to have been two lives, which are now lost. Hardy (Descript. Cat. i. 229) notices a Vita St. Flanniani Episc. Luminensis, in MS. Bodl. Rawl. i. 505.

Flannan was the son of Toirdhelbach, latarized Theodoricus, king of the Dalcasians in Munster, who became a monk at Lismore after he had endowed his son's church at Killaloe with ample revenues, and thus prepared his own final resting-place. Flannan had one of the famous schools of Ireland at Killaloe. Colgan calls him "Episcopus Luminensis," and Ware, the first bishop of Killaloe, having been consecrated at Rome by pope John in A.D. 639; but Lanigan (Eccles. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 2) wholly doubts the tale of his Roman visit, and even the date of his consecration. Dr. Petrie, however (Ardagh Tocain, 281) seems more inclined not to accept the legend. Besides his dedication at Killaloe, the island Inis-flannan in Lough Corrib and Ios-fhlanan Point, with the ruins of St. Flannan's church in Mainl Bay, preserve the memory of this saint. In Inisheen island there is Tobar Flannan (O'Flaherty, Tuar-Cnualaithe by Hardiman, 24, 109, 111, 115, 116); and he has probably also given their name to the Flannan islands, to the west of Lewis (Bp. Forbes, Cat. Scott. Saints, 350; Martin, West. Is. 15, 16, 2nd ed.). [J. G.]

FLAVIA DOMITILLA. [DOMITILLA.]

FLAVIANUS, bishop of Rome. [FABIANUS (I).]

FLAVIANUS, bishop of Antioch. [FA-RIANUS (I).]

FLAVIANUS (2) (FABIANUS), bishop of Elberi; signing 14th among the nineteen bishops present at the council of Elberi in 305. The see of Elberi (so spelt on Gothic coins, Tovelmy wrote Illeribis, Pliny Illeri), now represented by Granada, makes its first appearance in history with this bishop. (As to the site of Elberi see Dory's "Observations geographiques sur quelques anciennes Localités de l'Andalousie" in his Recerches, i. 328.) For a clever attempt to give historical form to the famous legend of the seven apostolic men, amongst whom St. Cecilins is made bishop of Elberi, see Gams, P.B. Kirchen-geschichte von Spanien, i. 79-178. (Bp. Segur. xii. 111; Aguure-Catalani, vol. ii.) [M. A. W.]

FLAVIANUS (2), said to have been bishop of Tente (Chietit), c. A.D. 320-340. (Gams, Novus Episcoporum, p. 875.) [H. S. G.]

FLAVIANUS (3), bishop, supposed to have belonged to the province of Cappadocia, yet not clearly referred to any see, though by Cellier (vi. 215) called bishop of Cappadocia, and regarded by the Bellandists (Acta SS. 9 Mart. ii. 9) as Flavian patriarch of Antioch at the same period. [FLAVIANUS (4).] (Tillemaen, Mon. Hist. Eccl. i. 580, 703.)

About the year 393, Gregory of Nyssa wrote to Flavian (ep. i.), as he did to other bishops, complaining of the treatment he had received at the hands of Helladius, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, and demanding satisfaction; the letter to Flavian is long and interesting, giving an account of his hurried flight from Seleucia, his unwelcome interview with Helladius, and his delight at escaping from him safe and well. He then reviews his whole relation to Helladius as one of entire superiority. [J. G.]

FLAVIANUS (4) L., bishop of Antioch, 381-404. Flavian was born at Antioch, of a distinguished and wealthy family. He had several brothers and sisters. One of the latter, who had survived all the rest, was living with him in A.D. 387, in very feeble health, at the time of his journey to Constantinople to appease the wrath of Theodosius. He was very young when the death of his father left him heir of the family property, which was of considerable amount.
When bishop continued to occupy the family mansion at Antioch, which he devoted to the reception of the sick and distressed of his flock. We know nothing of Flavianus's early training, or of his instructors in the faith. Chrysostom, in his highly-coloured eulogium pronounced on receiving ordination to the priesthood at his hands, records that although reared in the midst of affluence, he was remarkable for his earliest years for his temperance and control over his bodily appetites and for his contempt of luxury and a rich table. Although the premature death of his father deprived him of parental control at an early age, and he was exposed to the temptations incident to youth, wealth, and good birth, he overcame them all. From his youth he devoted himself to a religious life, sparing no pains to obtain complete self-mastery, and to cultivate his spiritual faculties. He adopted the strictest asceticism, and according to Theodoret (H. E. ii. 24) at the time that a half-concealed Arianaism was carrying all before it and a-states to avoid a breach with Eugenianus. He was encouraged, he together with his friend and fellow-champion of the orthodox faith, Diodorus (a few years later the celebrated bishop of Tarsus), left his home and adopted the life of a solitary. The sad necessities of the times soon recalled the two friends to Antioch, where, while still laymen, they exerted a powerful influence in favour of the truth, and by their zeal in unceasing kept alive an orthodox remnant in the midst of the dominant Eusebians. The crafty Leontius (ὁ ἀρχιερατεὺς) was then the intruding bishop of Antioch, who while a Eusebian at heart sought by concealment of his real sentiments to avoid a breach with the orthodox. Diodorus, by a temporizing policy to preserve a hollow peace in his church. The adroitness with which the party to which Leontius belonged eluded any distinct declaration of their belief on the most critical questions, and veiled their heresy by dogmatical speech was as far as they went, felt short of the full Catholic belief, menaced the faith with formidable perils. From the time of the expulsion of Eusebius, c. A.D. 328, the orthodox party at Antioch had been destitute of a head, and as the counsel of Eustathius himself before he quitted Antioch was that his adherents held the faith of the church, and, in spite of his illegal deposition, continued in communion with his successors in the see, there was no small risk of their being gradually absorbed by the Eusebians, and losing their hold of the Catholic faith. This danger was strenuously met by Flavianus and his friend Diodorus. They rallied the faithful about them, and by their example and influence accustomed them to assemble round the tombs of the martyrs, where they held nocturnal meetings for worship, and exhorted them to adhere steadfastly to the faith. As a powerful instrument for kindling zeal, Flavianus and Diodorus are said by Theodoret to have revived the practice of the antiphonal chanting of the psalms, which tradition ascribed to Ignatius. (Theod. H. E. ii. 24; Socr. H. E. vi. 8.) The statement of the Arian historian Philostorgius that they altered the lesser Doxology from its older form, “Glory to the Father by” or “in the Son,” to “through the Son” (Philost. H. E. iii. 49), though, as St. Basil has shown, when charged with introducing a similar novelty, at variance with facts (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 29 [70]), probably contains so much of truth that until the rise of the Arian heresy had rendered cautious in theological phraseology necessary, the various traditional forms of the doxology had been used indifferently, and that Flavianus and Diodorus were among the first to enforce the exclusive use of the form which was least susceptible of any heterodox perversion. The measure adopted by Leontius to check the growing influence of these religious gatherings by causing them to be transferred from the martyrs without the walls to the churches of the city, had the effect of increasing their popularity and strengthening the cause of orthodoxy. Flavianus and Diodorus became all powerful at Antioch. Leontius was unable to resist their wishes. The threat of withdrawing from his communion and travelling to the west to lay their remonstrance before Constantius and the Oriental bishops compelled him to retract his steps, and inhibit the synod of Antioch in A.D. 360 on the exercise of the functions of the diaconate to which he had admitted him. (Theod. H. E. ii. 24.) [AETIUS] Leontius is reported to have said, pointing to his white hairs, "When this snow melts there will be plenty of mud," meaning that his death would be followed by great disturbances. (Soz. H. E. iii. 20.) The history of the next twenty years fully proves the truth of his words. His successor in the see of Antioch was Eudoxius, the profane and intriguing bishop of Gerniana, and the open patron of Aetius. On his promotion to the see of Constantinople in A.D. 365, and the deposition of his successor, the excellent Meletius, Eudoxius, the old comrade of Arius, was made bishop of Antioch A.D. 361, and Arianaian at once assumed the ascendency. Eudoxius was repudiated with horror by all the orthodox. Those who up to this time had remained in communion with the Emperor now separated themselves altogether and recognised Meletius alone as their bishop. The old Catholic body, however, who bore the name of Eustathians, could not bring themselves to submit to the authority of a bishop consecrated by Arians, however orthodox, and continued to worship apart from the company of leisures and Eudoxius as well as from Eusebius. They had as their head Paulinus, a presbyter so highly esteemed by all parties that even Eudoxius abstained from any interference with him, and permitted him to hold his religious assemblies in a small church in the new city, situated on an island of the Orontes. (Soz. H. E. iii. 9.) This schism between two orthodox bodies, who should have united in defence of the common faith, was the cause of much pain to Athanasius and the orthodox. A council was held at Alexandria, early in A.D. 382, one object of which was the healing of those unhappy dissensions. The wise decision that Paulinus and his flock should unite with the patriarch Meletius, who had now returned from exile, was unhappily rendered nugatory by the pre-eipitancy of Lucifer of Cagliari, who, instead of accompanying Eusebius of Vercellae to Alexandria, had gone straight to Antioch to accommodate matters, and now perpetuated the schism by retaining Paulinus as his coadjutor. Meletius, who followed him to Antioch, could do no more than lament the irreparable mischief caused by Lucifer's rash act. The schism thus openly declared lasted till A.D. 415, and was productive of the greatest injury to the church. (Socr. H. E. iii. 6; Soz. H. E. v. 12; Theod. H. E. iii. 5.) Flavianus, however, still continued the ruling spirit at Antioch, and during the unhappy discussions and serious persecutions of the next twenty years proved the zealous champion of orthodoxy. He and his friend Diodorus having been raised to the presbyterate did much to supply the place of their beloved bishop Meletius during his lengthened banishments. Flavianus's zeal for the truth and courage in maintaining it in the face of fierce opposition was proved during the reign of Valens, when the Arians, secure of imperial favour, tyrannized over the orthodox at their will. Valens took up his residence at Antioch in June A.D. 370. This was the signal for a violent persecution of the orthodox. Meletius was banished for the third time, and the duty of administering to the faithful and supporting them under their prolonged trials devolved on Flavianus and Diodorus. The Catholics having been deprived of the use of their churches took refuge among the ravines and caves and mountains which overhang the city. Here they met for worship, exposed to all the inclemency of the elements, and liable to the assaults of a rude soldiery, by whom they were repeatedly dislodged, and compelled to find another place of assemblage. At one time the banks of the Orontes, at another the "Cathedra Maior" of the city, resounded with the psalms and hymns with which their insatiable leaders sought to kindle their courage. Theodoret tells us that Flavianus abstained from preaching in public, committing that office to his more eloquent companion Diodorus, whom he furnished with the subjects of his discourse, and scriptural arguments in support of his theses. (Theod. H. E. iv. 25.) The obliquity with which the orthodox, when driven from one place of assemblage, gathered in another, irritated Valens exceedingly. Many were seized and cruelly punished, and not a few were put to death. The favourite death was drowning. The presence of theercy stood on an island of the Orontes, and, by an anticipation of the "noyades," of a later age, the faithful were taken out in boats and thrown out to perish on its rapid waters. (Socr. H. E. iv. 17.) We have no evidence that Flavianus was a sufferer in this persecution, but it is difficult to see how so pronounced a leader of the orthodox could altogether escape. The persecution, which had already relaxed, ceased entirely with the death of Valens in A.D. 378. The exiles for the faith were everywhere recalled, and Meletius quickly resumed the charge of his Antiochene flock. His official recognition as the Catholic bishop of Antioch was more tardy. Gratián had commanded that the churches should be given up to those prelates who were in communion with Damasus, bishop of Rome, and that the Ariam instigators should be expelled. Easy as the execution of this enactment might be elsewhere, a small difficulty was experienced in Antioch. The presence of two bishops with equal claims to orthodoxy, Paulinus and Meletius, to whom a third was added, Vitalian, who held Apollinarian views, Sapor, a military officer high in command, to whom Gratian had committed the execution of the edict, was naturally no judge of theological niceties and was much perplexed how to decide. Flavianus came to the rescue and, by cleverly framed questions, involving the critical points, addressed to the other two bishops, convinced Sapor that the right lay with Meletius. The separation, however, still continued. Paulinus declined the proposal of the peace-loving Meletius, that they should unite their flocks, and that placing the volume of the Gospels on the vacant episcopal throne, each should recognize the other as of equal authority with himself, and that at the death of either the survivor should be the sole bishop. The unhappy Antiochene schism continued to divide the Christian world. The Oriental churches recognised Meletius, while the West and Egypt maintained the cause of Paulinus. (Theod. H. E. v. 1-3.) Three years later, A.D. 381, Flavianus accompanied Meletius to the council of Constantinople, where he signed, as a presbyter, with Euplides (Labbe, Concil. ii. 955). At the death of Meletius, which took place during the session of the council, Gregory of Nazianzus, who had reluctantly succeeded him as president, entreated his brother bishops to accept the episcopal charge over the lamentable schism, by recognizing Paulinus as the orthodox bishop of Antioch (Greg. Naz. de Vita Sac. v. 1572, sq. p. 757). But this, however right in itself, would have been to give a triumph to the Westerns. The council was composed of Oriental bishops only. Unworthy monuments of the interests of the church, and, in spite of the earnest remonstrances of the aged Gregory, Flavianus was elected as the successor of Meletius. We cannot altogether excuse Flavianus for thus allowing himself to be the instrument of perpetuating the schism. His act becomes less pardonable if it is true, as Socrates and Sozomen state (Socr. H. E. v. 5; Soc. H. E. vii. 2, 3), that he was one of the six leading clergy of Antioch, who had bound themselves by an oath at the death of either Meletius or Paulinus not to seek the bishopric themselves, but to acknowledge the survivor as the rightful bishop. This charge, however, rests upon the authority of Sozomen and Sozomen, whose accuracy is far from being unquestionable, and its truth is rendered very doubtful by the absence of any reference to it in the letters of Ambrose, or any of the contemporary documents published by the adherents of Paulinus during the progress of the controversy. The consecration of Flavianus was performed by his life-long friend, Diodorus of Tarsus, and Accius of Beroea, and received the ratification of the council. Paulinus monstrated in vain (Theod. H. E. v. 23), but his cause was sharply maintained by Damasus and the Western bishops, as well as by those of Egypt; while even at Antioch, though the majority of the Meletian party welcomed Flavianus with joy, as seeing their beloved bishop revive in him (Chrys. Hom. cum Presbytr. flat ordinatus, § 4), some, indignant at the breaking of an engagement, real or implied, separated from his communion, and connected themselves with Paulinus (Socr. H. E. vii. 11). The West refused all intercourse with Flavianus, and the council, meeting at Aquileia in the September of the same year, wrote to Theodosius in favour of his rival, Paulinus, and requested him to summon a council at Alexandria, to decide that and other controverted questions. Theodosius thought it better that the council should be held at Rome. The Eastern prelates were invited, but declined to attend, and held a second synod of their own at Constantinople in 382. Perfect unanimity could not be secured even here, as the bishops of Egypt, Cyprus, and Arabia recognised Paulinus as the rightful bishop, and demanded the banishment of Flavianus, who was supported by the bishops of Palestine, Phoenicia, and Syria (Socr. H. E. v. 10). A synodal letter was, however, despatched to Damascus and the Western bishops which, among other subjects, recognised Flavianus' ordination as legitimate. (Theod. H. E. v. 9.) Paulinus himself attended the council at Rome, accompanied by Epiphanius and Jerome, the latter of whom espoused his cause very ardently. The result of this council was to confirm the West in its refusal to acknowledge Flavianus; it is a pity that such an election of bishop, as it was said they even went so far as to excommunicate him and his two consecrators. (Socr. H. E. vii. 11.) Meanwhile the two rival bishops continued to exercise the episcopal functions among their respective flocks. The consequences of thus setting up church against church were very disastrous. Church discipline became impossible, when the attempt to exercise it led to a desertion to the opposite camp. Such a transference of allegiance was rendered easier by the difference between them being simply one of church order, not of doctrine. Some time after his consecration, Flavianus, accompanied by Apollinaris, together with other bishops, priests, and leading laymen, paid a visit to the celebrated solitary, Marcellus, with the hope of inducing him to receive holy orders; but the aged ascetic maintained an obstinate silence, and the deputation had to depart baffled. (Theod. Vit. Patr. iii. 4.) Early in his episcopate, Flavianus was also engaged in a dispute with the Syrian sect of fanatic perfectionists known as Euchites or Messalians. To make himself acquainted with their doctrines, which it was their habit to conceal, he resorted to an act of deception which we cannot but condemn. Having summoned Adelphius, the head of the sect, and an old man of feeble body, he prevailed on his guard by professions of friendship and of a simple desire to become acquainted with his tenets, and thus led him to a full declaration. On this he threw off the mask, denounced his heretical views in the strongest terms, and expelled him and his adherents. (Theod. H. E. iv. 11.) Adelphius proceeded to Rome, and the result was to ordain him to the presbyterate. He was received by the bishops, and took his seat in the synod. These overtures were rejected at a synod held by Flavianus. He had previously received a synodal letter of a gathering of bishops held at Side, under Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, acquainting him with the principle held by the synod that the end sanctifies the means, and that falsehood for a good end was no sin; and warning him not to be too ready to credit their professions. Flavianus wrote to the bishops of Asia respecting the punishment and excommunication of the Messalians, for which he received a letter of thanks. Flavianus also wrote to an Armenian bishop, reprimanding him for patronizing these pestilent heretics. (Photius, Cod. iii. p. 37; Theod. Haer. Fab. iv. 11, p. 243.)

In A.D. 386 Flavianus ordained Chrysostom presbyter. Chrysostom, on the occasion of his ordination, or very soon after it, preached an inaugural discourse in the presence of his bishop, on whom he passed a very laboured eulogium, which, however well deserved, a modern standard of good taste would have reserved for another occasion. (Chrys. Hom. cum Presb. fut. ordinatus, § 3, 4.) The sedition at Antioch on the occasion of the destruction of the Imperial Statues, A.D. 387, showed the noble, self-sacrificing character of Flavianus in its graver colours. His absence from the episcopal palace during the first violence of the storm had prevented his doing anything to arrest its fury. But when the brief fit of popular madness was over, and the Antiochenes awoke to a sense of their danger, Flavianus at once yielded to their entreaties to become their advocate with the emperor, which with a firm heart and unwearied endeavours to appease his just wrath. Regardless of his advanced years, the dangerous sickness of his only surviving sister, the inclemency of the season, and the length and difficulty of the journey, the dauntless old man started immediately on his errand of mercy. In the words of Chrysostom—"Having learnt that the good shepherd layeth down his life for his sheep, he took his departure, venturing his own life for us all, notwithstanding there were many things to forbid his absence and enforce his stay. For this reason he would encounter every danger, and nothing would avail to detain him." (Chrysost. In hom. xxxii.) The success of Flavianus' mission has been stated in another article. (Chrysost. l. p. 521.) It was instant, and it was complete. His wrath having had time to cool, Theodosius was already disposed to mercy; and his favourable disposition towards the Antiochenes was confirmed by the boldness of the aged bishop, who had risked so much to offer his intercession in person. If Flavianus' bearing is more submissive—it might be almost called abject—than appears to us consistent with the dignity of a Christian bishop pleading for his flock, we must remember the difference between the old man of feeble body and those invested with sovereign authority, and rejoice that his intercession proved so effectual. Theodosius granted a free pardon to the city of Antioch, and urged Flavianus to lose no time in returning, that he might relieve the people of Antioch from the agony of suspense. After the severe strain and anxiety of the last few weeks, Flavianus was unequal to a rapid journey. An express courier was therefore dispatched to convey the joyous tidings. The bishop followed at a more leisurely pace, but reached Antioch in time to keep the Easter festival, and had the happiness of finding his aged sister still alive. (Chrysost. de Stat. xxii.) The next year, A.D. 388, witnessed the death of Paulinus. This event, however, had not at once, as might have been hoped, the effect of healing the schism; for on his death-bed, in direct violation of the nineteenth and twenty-third canons of the council of Antioch, Paulinus, without the authority of a synod or the assistance of any other bishop, had taken the ill-advised step of consecrating Evagrius, a presbyter of his church, his successor. (Socr. H. E. v. 15; Soz. H. E. vii. 15; Theod. H. E. v. 23.) The scandal of this long-continued schism was deeply felt in the West, and was a cause of trouble to Theodosius, in whose esteem Flavianus stood high. Accordingly, on his return to Constantinople from the West in A.D. 391, he proposed to Flavianus, whom he had summoned to appear in person at a synod to be assembled at Capua. Flavianus excused himself on the ground that the winter was just setting in, but promised to obey the emperor’s bidding in the spring, and returned to Antioch. (Theod. H. E. v. 23.) Though there is some discrepancy as to whether the Western bishops actually joined communion with Evagrius, there is no doubt that their feeling was strongly in his favour, and that they were indisposed to admit the claims of his rival. Flavianus had some reason to fear that the Western synod would not be altogether impartial in his favour, and even went so far as to send a secret report of the soundness of his own cause, he declined to attend. It is probable that Evagrius was there. Whether Ambrose or Siricius took part in it is uncertain. The feeling manifested was strongly against Flavianus, but no decision was come to his absence, and the final adjunction was entrusted to Theophilius of Alexandria, and his suffragans, who had remained neutral. (Ambros. Epist. lvi. (ix.).) Flavianus disregarded the summons addressed to him by Theophilius, and seems to have appealed to another synod which he urged Theodosius to summon in the East. Ambrose wrote to Theophilius, sharply condemning Flavianus for having recourse to state aid and imperial rescripts to support him in his disobedience to ecclesiastical authority, and for seeking to impose on the bishops—many of whom were old and poor—the trouble and expense of travelling to another synod. After much wrangle the Western prelates were urgent with Theodosius to compel Flavianus to come to Rome and submit to the judgment of the church. Flavianus replied to the emperor with much dignity, that, if the question was one of heresy or immorality, he would not shrink from the trial; but if his episcopate was only the object of attack, he would prefer to resign it altogether. The emperor might assign the see to whom he pleased. Such magnanimous sentiments were in harmony with Theodosius’s own generous heart. He admired his courage and his wisdom, and commanded him to resume the government of his church. (Theod. H. E. v. 23.) Flavianus’s refusal to submit to the arbitration of “the haughty and tyrannical Egyptian” received the high commendation of Nestorius. (Mercator, tom. ii. p. 86, 8.) The knot which seemed insoluble was, before long, cut by the death of Evagrius. Flavianus’s influence prevented the election of a successor. The Eustathians, however, still refused to acknowledge Flavianus as their bishop, and continued to hold their assemblies apart. (Soz. H. E. vii. 15; viii. 3; Socr. H. E. v. 15.) This separation continued till the episcopate of Alexander, A.D. 414 or 415. The bishops of the other Western churches and the West was finally healed by Chrysostom, who took the opportunity of the presence of Theophilus at Constantinople, for his consecration to that see in A.D. 396, to induce him to become reconciled with Flavianus, and to join him in despatching an embassy to Rome to supplicate Siricius to recognise Flavianus as the canonical bishop of Antioch. The deputies chosen for this mediation were Aecarius of Beroea, and Isidorus, presbyter and hospitaler of Alexandria, for whom Theophilus had striven to obtain the bishopric of Constantinople, to whom Flavianus added some leading presbyters of his church. Their mission was entirely successful. All were heartily weary of the schism which was a discredit to the church, and were glad to have a decent excuse for bringing it to an end; and Acacius, who was the chief of the mission, returned to Antioch bringing letters of communion from Rome and Egypt. (Socr. H. E. v. 15; Soz. H. E. viii. 3; Theod. H. E. v. 23.) As a proof of the cessation of all angry feeling, and of the means of conciliating his opponents, Flavianus put the names of Paulinus and Evagrius on the fourth list of the Synod of 396, p. 203.) Flavianus lived just long enough to see with sorrow the deposition and exile of his beloved and distinguished son in the faith, Chrysostom, against the injustice of which he protested with his last breath. His death probably was placed in A.D. 404. (Pallad. Dial. p. 144; Soz. H. E. viii. 24; Theophan., p. 68.) He governed the church of Antioch for twenty-three years; and Tillemont thinks it probable, from chronological considerations, that he lived to the age of ninety-five years. The Greek church has commemorated him on Sept. 26.

Flavianus was more famous as a bishop than as a writer. He left behind him certain remains, of which a few fragments are preserved to us by Theodoret and others. Theodoret in his Epanistia quotes one on Joh. i. 14 (Dial. l. p. 46), another on St. John the Baptist (ib. p. 68), on Esoster, and the treachery of Judas (Dial. ili. p. 230) or the Theophrastus, and a passage from his commentary on St. Luke. (Dial. ii. p. 160.) His homilies are also quoted in the proceedings of the council under John of Antioch, and that of Chalcedon (Funct. lib. viii. c. 4, p. 319; Labbe, iv. 830); and by Leontius, in Nest. et Eulych. (p. 979). (Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. vol. 5.)

FLAVIANUS (7), bishop of Philippoi in Macedonia. He acted as proxy for his metropolitan Rufus bishop of Thessalonica, and sat among the metropolitans at the Council of Florence A.D. 431. In the first session he suggested the second and third summons to Nestorius, that nothing required by ecclesiastical procedure should be omitted; he asked for quotations from the ancient fathers of the church on the points in which Nestorius was said to have erred from the teaching of the Church of Egypt, which had been inserted in the acts of the council, and took an active part in all its proceedings. FLAVIANUS OF CP.

FLAVIANUS (8), eighteenth bishop of Constantineople, between Proclus and Anatolius. The length of his episcopate is a little uncertain, but it was about two or three years. He is described by Nicephorus as being at his election guardian of the sacred vessels of the great church of Constantineople, with a reputation for a heavenly life.

At the time of Flavian's consecration Theodosius was staying at Chalcedon. Chrysaphius his minister appears to have immediately inaugurated his scheme against the new patriarch. He suggested that the emperor should ask Flavian to send him some kind of present or firstfruits in acknowledgment for his elevation. Flavian replied by returning what seems to have been a common compliment on such occasions, some fresh loaves or cakes. These were rudely rejected by the insolent enmarch, who wrote back the following letter, 'I desire something in the shape of gold. The prelate answered that unless he used some of the sacred vessels for the purpose, he had nothing of the kind. The ill-will of Chrysaphius achieved its object, for the courageous integrity of the churchman stirred up great bitterness against him; and by some means Pulcheria was kept ignorant of the discredituable proceeding.

Two methods of attack against Flavian now presented themselves to the scheming brain of the minister; the direct subversion of the authority of the emperor's sister Pulcheria and the support of Eutyches, one of the archimandrites of Constantineople, a theological opponent of the archbishop. Stirring up the jealousy of the emperor Eudocia, he persuaded her to warn her husband with entreaties that he would remove a person who seems to have been a kind of secretary of state to Pulcheria. Baffled unsuccessfully, the emperor then turned his attention to the faithful ally which had caused his death; but she could shew his dead body all the honours which affection and respect could dictate.

Among the letters which touch on the career of Flavian, may be mentioned the reply of Peter Chrysologus, archbishop of Ravenna, to a circular appeal by Eutyches against his condemnation by Flavian; the letter of Theodoret congratulating Flavian on his condemnation of Eutyches; another from Theodoret, when the bishops of Syria had taken up Theodoret's defence, which was one of twenty-two with which he entrusted the deputation which they sent to Theodosius. Leo, who was plunged in the profoundest grief, wrote him a beautiful letter before hearing that he was dead.

FLAVIANUS—Bishops

FLAVIANUS (10), St., bishop of Adramyt- tium in the province of Asia, present in the Latrocinium Ephesinum, 449 (Mansi, vi. 992); his name was subscribed in his absence by Hesperorus of Pitane at the instance of Stephen of Ephesus to the definition of the faith that was read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 701.)

FLAVIANUS (11), bishop of Gabala in Syria, south of Laodicea. He signed the synodal epistle of the province of Syria Secunda to the emperor Leo, in reference to the murder of Proterius, A.D. 455. (Mansi, vii. 551; Le Quien, Gr. Chr. ii. 793.)

FLAVIANUS (12), twelfth recorded bishop of Paris, between Felix and Ursicinus, about A.D. 486, judging from his position in the list, which is here undated. (Gall. Chr. vii. 15.)

FLAVIANUS (13), bishop of Casena (Cesena), c. A.D. 485-499. He was succeeded by Ignatius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 441; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 527.)

FLAVIANUS (14), bishop of Vamalla in Mauretania Sitifensis, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 60 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. iviii.; Morelli, Af. Chr. i. 946.)

FLAVIANUS (15), patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 489. [PRAVITTA.]

FLAVIANUS (16) II., bishop of Antioch, 498-512.Vacillating in faith, and of little moral strength, he occupied a more prominent than honourable position in the unhappy dissensions which troubled the Eastern church at the close of the 5th century. In connexion with the Monophysite troubles at Alexandria, and the deposition of Acacius by pope Felix, A.D. 484. After much unworthy compliance with the demands of the emperor Anastasius, he was ultimately driven from his see, and ended his life in banishment A.D. 518. He had previously been a monk in the monastery of Tilmognon, in Coele-Syria (Evagr. H. E. iii. 329), and at the time of his elevation to the episcopate filled the office of "apocrisarius" or nuncio of the church of Antioch at the imperial court of Constantinople (Vit. Tun. Chron.; Theophan. Chronogr. p. 125). Before his consecration Flavian passed for an opponent of the decrees of Chalcedon, and on his appointment he sent Solomon, a presbyter of Antioch, to announce the fact to John Haemula, bishop of Alexandria, and to convey letters of communion with the request that he would grant the same to him (Evagr. H. E. ii. 23). He speedily, however, withdrew from intercourse with the patriarchs of Alexandria, and joined the opposite party, uniting his name with Elias of Jerusalem, and Macedonius of Constantinople (Liberat. c. 18, p. 128). Flavian soon found a bitter enemy in the turbulent Monophysite, Xenaias or Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis, originally a Persian slave, raised to the episcopate by Peter the Fuller, who pursued him with uncompromising hatred, never resting till he had succeeded in working his overthrow. On Flavian's declaring for the council of Chalcedon Xenaias denounced his patriarch as a concealed Nestorian. Flavian made no difficulty in anathematizing Nestorius and his doctrines. Not content with this concession, Xenaias demanded that he should anathematize Diodorus, Theodore, Theodoret, and a host of others, declaring that unless he publicly condemned them he was as much a Nestorian, even if he should anathematize Nestorius ten thousand times over (Evagr. H. E. iii. 31). On his refusing, Xenaias stirred up against him the party of Dioscorus, in Egypt, and uniting with himself Eusebius of Saisma, and Nicias, of the Syrian Laodicea, personal enemies of Flavian, he laid a complaint against Flavian as a Nestorian before Anastasius, A.D. 507 (Evagr. u. s.; Theophan. p. 128). Anastasius used a severe pressure, to which Flavian thought it most politic to yield partially, vainly trusting that his concessions would satisfy his enemies, and that they would allow him to live in peace. He conveyed a synod of the province of his patriarchate which drew up a letter to Anastasius confirming the three first councils, passing over that of Chalcedon in silence, and anathematizing Diodorus, Theodore, and the others. It was asserted that Flavian also added some clauses respecting the two natures, at variance with the decisions of Chalcedon (Evagr. u. s.; Theophan. p. 129; Labbe, Concil. iv. 1414). These concessions provoked fresh demands. Xenaias, whose object was Flavian's overthrow, pursued his advantage, and required of him a formal anathema of the council of Chalcedon, and all who admitted the two natures. On his refusal, Xenaias again denounced him to the emperor, who received with cold aversion the complaints and remonstrances addressed to him, as well as the formal profession of belief in which Flavian declared his acceptance of the decrees of Chalcedon, only so far as they condemned Nestorius and his proceedings. Disunited Xenaias having gathered the bishops of Isauria and others induced them to draw up a formula of faith anathematizing Chalcedon and the two natures, and as Flavian and Macedonius refused to sign this, they declared them excommunicate, A.D. 509 (Evagr. u. s.; Theophan. p. 131). The next year we find the vacillating Flavian receiving letters from Severus, the uncompromising antagonist of Macedonius, on the subject of anathematizing Chalcedon, and the reunion of the Aecphaloi with the church (Liberat. c. 19, p. 135). This intelligence so irritated Macedonius that he pronounced an anathema on his former friend, and drove with indignation from his presence the apocrisarius of Antioch (Theophan. p. 131). On the expulsion of Macedonius, A.D. 511, Flavian yielded to the emperor so far as to recognise his successor Timotheus, on being convinced of his orthodoxy, but without discouraging his display of the violent and hostile canonical measures by which he had been deposed. This exasperated Anastasius, who readily acceded to the request of Xenaias and Soterichus that a council should be convened, ostensibly for the more precise declaration of the faith on the points at issue, but really to bring about the deposition of Flavian and Elias of Jerusalem.
FLAVIANUS II. OF ANTIOCH

The synod met at Sidon early in a.d. 512. About eighty bishops assembled, under the joint pres- dency of Xenais and Soterichus. Flavian and Elia were one accord to secure themselves from the menaced deposition. They sent adulatory letters to Anastasius, containing fresh concessions, which even went so far as to reject the decrees of Chalcedon, but diplomatically concealing their divergence of opinion on one critical point. The council was broken up by the emperor's mandate, to the extreme vexation of Soterichus and Xenais, without pro- nouncing any sentence on the two patriarchs (Labbé, Concil. iv. 1414; vii. 88; Theoph. p. 131; Coteler. Monum. Eccl. Græcor. iii. 399). Their re- priere, however, was but short. Anastasius was easily convinced that he had been made the dupe of disingenuous declarations, and that Flavian and Elia secretly held to the decrees of Chalce- don, which they had openly repudiated. These calumnious charges received the powerful sup- port of the Monophysite leader Severus, then at Constantinople, who became his successor in the see of Antioch. Elia managed to detain his see for a time through the intercession of St. Sabbas. As for Flavian his perplexities were increased by the inroad of a tumultuous body of monks from Syria Prima, clamouming for the anathematiza- tion of Nestorius and all supposed favourers of his heretical doctrines. Some of the rabble of Antioch, bribed, it was said, by Xenais, joined this turbulent body, but the citizens generally rose against them, slew many of them, and threw their bodies into the Orontes. The con- fusion and bloodshed was increased by the appearance of a rival body of monks pouring down from the mountain ranges of Coele-Syria, eager to do battle in defence of their metropol- ian and former associate. Flavian was com- pletely unversed, and as the only means of re- storing peace to the city, and maintaining his see, he yielded to the demands of the stronger party, and pronounced a public anathema in his own name on the decrees of Chalcedon, and the four so-called heretical doctors. This was a severe mortification to his enemies, who were determined to get rid of him in order that his patriarchate might be given to one of their own party. The old charges of disingenuousness were revived, and he was accused to the emperor of condemning with his lips what he still held in his heart. The guilt of the recent disturbances at Antioch was also attributed to him, which afforded the civil authorities a sufficient pretext for desiring him to leave Antioch for a time, as the only way of restoring quiet. His quitting Antioch was eagerly seized on by the emperor as an acknowledgment of guilt. He declared the see vacant, and sent Severus to occupy it, and at the same time banished Flavian to Petra, in Arabia. Here he spent the last six years of his life. His death is placed by Moschus close to that of his chief enemy, the emperor Anastasius, in July, 518. Flavian's restoration to his see was one of the points demanded by Vitalian in his rebellion, a.d. 513 or 514 (Kutych. Alex. Annal. Ecol. p. 140; Marcellin. Chron.; Theophan. p. 134; Evagri. H. E. iii. 32). Flavian is com- memorated as a confessor by the church of Rome, together with Elias of Jerusalem, on July 4. (Baron. Annal. 498-512; Tillemont, MEM. Eccl. xvi. 675-680, 703-708.)

FLAVIANUS—BISHOPS

FLAVIANUS (17), bishop of Cotrina in Pamphylia, present at the council held at Con- stantinople under Mannus, a.d. 536, which con- demned Anthiusus, G. Quien, Orient. Christ. i. 1010; Manni, viii. 1147.)

FLAVIANUS (18), bishop of Verselli, c. 536. (Cappelletti, L'Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 365; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 762.)

[See A. H. D. A.]

FLAVIANUS (19), bishop of Crotone, c. a.d. 557. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ix. 528.)

[See R. S. G.]

FLAVIANUS (20), bishop of Como, c. 542. (Cappelletti, L'Chiese d'Italia, xi. 313; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 261.)

[See A. H. D. A.]

FLAVIANUS (21), 14th bishop of Le Puy, succeeding Foribus or Fortius, and followed by St. Aurelius, in the latter part of the 6th cen- tury. (Gall. Christ. ii. 690.)

[See S. A. R.]

FLAVIANUS (22) (FLAVIANIUS, FLAVIA- NICIUS), ST., a bishop of Autun, placed by the authors of the Gallia Christiana, following Le Cointe, twenty-first in the series, between Lefastus and Auspicius, about a.d. 610. He was commemorated Aug. 23. (Gall. Christ. iv. 347; Le Cointe, Ann. Ecol. Franc. an. 610 n. ii. 614. n. xiv., tom. ii. 598, 663.)

[See S. A. R.]

FLAVIANUS (23), bishop of Utica, the well- known town in proconsulare Africa, subscribed the letter of his province to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, against the Monothelites a.d. 646. (Mansi, xz. 942; Morcelli, Africa, p. 363.)

[See L. D.]

FLAVIANUS (24) (FLAVINUS), bishop of Novaria (Novara), c. 660. He was succeeded by Vigilinus (or perhaps Virginilus), and followed by Pamphronius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 948; Cappelletti, L'Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 448.)

[See R. S. G.]

FLAVIANUS (25) LL., bishop of Como, c. 692. (Cappelletti, L'Chiese d'Italia, xi. 318; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 202.)

[See A. H. D. A.]

FLAVIANUS (26), bishop of Tortona, 769 at earliest. (Ughelli gives 765.) One of a somewhat doubtful list of bishops. (Cappelletti, L'Chiese d'Italia, xii. 672; Ughelli, iv. 628.)

[See A. H. D. A.]

FLAVIANUS (27) (FARINAS), May 25, a deacon and martyr in Africa with SS. Mos- tanus, Lucius, Julianus, and four others. They were all disciples of St. Cyprian, and in holy orders. Arrested by the proconsul Maximus soon after the death of St. Cyprian, they were detained in prison for several months. In the spring of a.d. 259 they were brought up for examination. The friends of Flavianus endeavoured to secure his safety by denying that he was a deacon and therefore outside the scope of the emperor's edict, which ordained death against the clergy alone. (Cyprian's Epist. 82, ad Successor.) Flavianus, however, avowed that he was a deacon, and suffered three days after his companions. The acts of these martyrs are described by Ruinart as "worthy of all faith, and such as may be numbered among the most precious and truthful monuments of antiquity." They are divided into two parts—1, a letter which they wrote to the faithful from prison; 2, the narra-FLAVIANUS.—MISCELL.

FLAVIANUS (28), governor of Syria in the time of Diocletian, and charged with carrying out the law against Christians, A.D. 303. (Eusebius, "Hist. Eccl." vii. 25.)

FLAVIANUS (29), Jan. 30, martyr in the Diocletian persecution at Centumcellae (Givita Vecchia), where he appears to have discharged the office of deputy-prefect under the prefect of the city of Rome, whose jurisdiction extended 160 miles from the city. Baronius commemorates him on Jan. 30. ("Epist. Rom." 184.)

FLAVIANUS (30), vicarius of Africa, 377. In the October of that year, the emperor Gratian addressed an edict to him commanding him to see that all churches then occupied by the Donatists were given up to the Catholics, and ordering all private houses used by the Donatists as places of meeting to be confiscated (Cod. Theod. vi. 23). Flavian was himself a Donatist (Augustin. ep. 87, § 8 in Patr. Lat. xxxii. 296); he was also a friend and a correspondent of the Athenian sophist Himerius. (Photius, "Biblioth. celiiz.")

T. W. D.

FLAVIANUS (31), praetorian prefect at the time of the death of Valentine II. He had a reputation for skill in augury, and encouraged Eugenius to rebel against Theodosius, assuring him of victory. (Soz. H. E. vii. 22.)

Zosim. i. 11.) He was prefect of Italy and Ilyryia in 382, 383, and 391, and consul in 394. He was the brother of Symmachus, many of whose letters to him are extant, comprising the whole of the second book according to the present arrangement. He comes before the notice of students of church history in connexion with St. Ambrose. It was at the request of Flavianus that Eugenius restored the altar of St. Ambrose at Milan. (Paulin. "Vit. Amb. xxvi.") In consequence of this, St. Ambrose refused to accept his presents for the church, and so enraged Flavianus that, on his departure from Milan, he threatened as soon as he returned to make the church a stable for his horses, and to force the clerics to serve as soldiers. (Paulin. "Vit. Amb. xxxii.") However, he did not live to carry out his threat. He seems to have died soon afterwards in guarding the Alps against Theodosius I, A.D. 394. Theodosius, after his victory, restored much of the property of Flavianus to his son, who bore the same name, and was afterwards prefect of Rome in 399. (Symm. Ep. iv. 7.)

M. F. A.

FLAVIANUS (32), a presbyter and archimandrite of the monastery of Hermillus, or Hermasus, in Constantinople. He subscribed the deposition of Eugenius at the council of Constantinople in A.D. 448. (Labbe, iv. 232 B.)

C. G.

FLAVIUS COLOMBO, successor of Euphrinus as bishop of Autun. Cir. A.D. 500. ("Gall. Christ." iv. 240.)

R. T. S.

FLAVINUS, bishop of Novara. ("Flavianus" 24.)

FLAVINUS, thirty-seventh bishop of Chartres, following Hado and succeeded by Godalhardus, perhaps late in the 8th century. ("Gall. Christ." viii. 1102.)

S. A. B.

FLAVITA, bishop of Constantinople. ("Fra-Vitt.")

FLAVIUS (4) LATINUS, legendary bishop of Brixia (Brescia), c. A.D. 84 or 90, preceded by St. Clates a martyr, and followed by St. Apollonius. (Ugghelli, "Ital. Stat." v. 728; Cappelletti, "Le Chiese d'Ital." xi. 550.)

R. S. G.

FLAVIUS (5), bishop of Antioch. ("Fabius" 3.)

FLAVIUS (6), addressed in a letter by Dionysius of Alexandria in A.D. 360 or 261 on the Paschal question. (Eusebius, "Hist. Eccl." vii. c. 20.)

J. G.

FLAVIUS (7), Roman senator, belonging to the Anician family, and probably the sole consul in the year 457 (Clinton, "Hist. i. 700); he is probably, and is usually regarded as, the father of the celebrated statesman and politician Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius (Migne, Patr. Lat. lixii. 555; Cellier, "Auteurs sacrés," x. 645) ("Boethius"), though Baronius (Ann. a. 457, 1) identifies the consul in A.D. 457 with the philosopher. He seems to have died while his son was yet young ("Boethius, Consol. Phil." ii. 3), but nothing is definitely known. (Gibbon, "Hist. c. 39; Robertson, "Ch. Hist." iii. c. 6.)

J. G.

FLAVIUS (8), bishop of Chartres. His date is approximately fixed by the fact that his successor was ruling in A.D. 490. ("Gall. Christ." viii. 1095.)

R. T. S.

FLAVIUS (9) FLIVUS, FILIUS, ST., sixteenth bishop of Rouen, following St. Gildardus, or Godardus, and succeeded by St. Præfectactus; was present at the second council of Orleans in A.D. 534, the third in 538, and the fourth in 541. He is commemorated in Aug. (Mansi, viii. 838, ix. 20, 120; "Gall. Christ." xi. 10; Acta SS. Aug. iv. 640.)

S. A. B.

FLAVIUS (10), seventeenth bishop of Rheims, succeeding Romanus and followed by Maiparius, was present at the council of Clermont, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 863; "Gall. Christ." ix. 13.)

S. A. B.

FLAVIUS (11), ninth bishop of Châlon-sur-Saône (Cable), succeeding St. Agricola and followed by Lupus; secretary, or referendarius, to king Guntram. He subscribed the first council of Mâcon (581), that of Lyons in 583, the second of Valentinia, and the second of Mâcon (both in 585), and in 591 was present at Nanterre at the baptism of Clotaire. In the Epitomata of Fredegarius to the history of Gregory of Tours, he is said to have favoured the fiction of Gundulph, who came from Constantinople pretending himself to be the son of Clotaire. He is said to have founded or restored the monastery of St. Peter in the suburbs. The date of his death is unknown. (Greg. Tur. "Hist. Franc." v. 46, x. 28; Mansi, ii. 937, 944, 946, 958, x. 469; "Gall. Christ." iv. 867.)

S. A. B.
FLORENTIANUS

FLORA (3), lady of rank, mother of Cyriacus. [CYRIACUS (3)].

FLOREBERT (1) (FLOREBERT, FLOREBERT), thirty-first or thirty-second bishop of Liège, succeeding St. Hubert, whose son he was, and followed by Fulcarinus. He is said to have been abbot of Stavelo (Stabalus), a monastery in the diocese, before his elevation. His death is placed in A.D. 745, after an episcopate of about eighteen years, in which he enriched the church with many gifts. He was buried in the church of St. Lambert, in the same tomb with Peter and Andoletus, who suffered martyrdom with that saint. (Gesta Pontificum Leodienium, tom. i. 145, ed. Chapeauleville, Liège, 1612; Gall. Christ. iii. 830.)

FLOREBERT (2), first abbot of the monastery of Ghent. He received St. Livinus and his companions after their departure from Ireland. (S. Livini Vita, 22; Migne, Patr. Lat. ixxvii. 338.) It was at his request that St. Livinus wrote an epistle to St. Baro, the martyr of Ghent, which, with an accompanying letter, he sent to the abbot. Both are in elegiac verse, and are extant. (Patr. Lat. ixxvii. 345.)

FLORENIUS, a prebendary of Epernay. [EPIPERNAIUS (9)].

FLORENCIUS, bishop of Merida. [FLORENTIUS].

FLORENCIUS, bishop of Saetabis, signs the acts of the fourth and fifth councils of Toledo, 633 and 636. He is the second bishop of the see known. Saetabis (referred to by Silius Italicus, Punic. iii. 373) is the modern Xativa, and we have no mention of the see after the Moorish conquest. (Esp. Segr. viii. 47; Aguirre-Catalanii, iii. 385-405.)

FLORENDUS (FLORENDINUS), tenth bishop of Chalons-sur-Marne, following Amandus, and succeeded by PROVIDERUS, in the latter half of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 862.)

FLORENTIA—Nov. 10. Martyr with Modestus and Tiberius in the Dacian persecution at Agatha (Agde). (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi, Wandalberti; Petrus de Natal. lib. 10, c. 46.)

FLORENTIANUS (1), bishop of Midea in Numidia, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notit. 56 in Migne, Patr. Lat. liii.; Mercelli, Africa Christ. i. 227.)

FLORENTIANUS (2), bishop of Utica. [FLORENDINUS (5)].

FLORENTIANUS (3), bishop of Vieux Pacis in Numidia, present as the delegate of his province at the council held by Sosius at Carthage A.D. 395, where he made excuse for the absence of his primate (Missor) on the ground of old age, and handed his letter to the archbishop. (Mansi, viii. 638, 647; Morelli, Africa Christ. i. 553.)

FLORENTINA (1), a young lady to whom St. Augustine wrote expressing his willingness to give her all the help in her studies that he could give. He enlarges on the great responsibility of all who profess to teach, and reminds her that after all God is the true impartor of all knowledge. (Aug. ep. 266.) [H. W. P.]

FLORENTINA (2), St., the sister of Leander, Isidore, and Fulgentius; younger than Leander, and older than Isidore, who was the youngest of the family. When the family exile took place she was young. "You have, therefore," says Leander in the last chapter of Lib. ad Florentiam, "no recollections which need stir your soul with longings (to return), and blessed art thou who knowest nothing of what I suffer." After their parents' death Leander, metropolitan of Seville before 575, assumed the position together with his sister, and at an unknown date, but in any case before Leander's death in 600, she became a nun. Tradition places her convent near Astigi (Ecija), of which her brother Fulgentius was bishop, and identifies its site with a little village on the banks of the Xenil, called Nuestra Señora del Valle, whither a procession goes every year from the Hospital of Santa Florentina in Ecija. According to various MS. breviaries (the evidence of the breviaries, however, in such points as these is seldom worth much), she was not only superior of her own convent, but of many others which voluntarily placed themselves under her guidance—a position of which there is no trace in any of the contemporary documents. To her, after her profession, Leander addressed the treatise which Isidore (de Vir. Ill. cap. xii.) calls de institutione virginum et contempnunt mundi Libelli, and which is commonly known as the rule of St. Leander, or the Libelli ad Florentiam. Thus far it is that Leander was at the time it was written the superior of her convent. On the contrary, the senior who, in cases where it was necessary to distinguish within the convent walls, between the high-born and wealthy and the poor and low-born, "is to be praised, if she bear herself discreetly towards individual persons, adjudging to each what is necessary"—and with regard to whom, Leander directs, when forbidding private property in the convent, "Whatever thy hand shall touch, seniori ostende, in commune repone," seems to be distinct from the Soror Florentinæ to whom the treatise is addressed. Floret gives the name of the superior as Turtura (Esp. Sapr. x. 120), supposing that the famous passage at the end of the rule—"Noli ab eo evolare nisi ubi turtura reposit lucubros suos. Simplicitatis filia es, quae Turtura nata es... Turturum pro matre responde. Turturum pro magistra attendo," etc.—from which the name of Turtura as the wife of Fulgentius and mother of Isidore and her brothers, was commonly obtained by older writers, really refers to the abbes of Florentina's convent, and that she, and not the wife of Severianus, was called Turtura. The passage, however, must always remain of doubtful meaning. The rule opens with a long introduction in the form of a letter devoted to the praises of virginity, and consists of twenty-one chapters. Intercourse with women still in the world must be avoided by the nuns; communication even with holy men is forbidden; they must be frugal in eating and drinking, and persevering in reading and prayer. The Old Testament is to be read in a spiritual sense; in fasting regard is to be paid to the weak and infirm; wine is only to be used as a medicine; they must remain within the convent (in monasterio), must avoid all appearance of vice private, and not imitate those virgin wives who remain in the world (cap. 17). Can. 13 of the council of Elbriberi, and Gams's remarks upon it (X. G. ii. (1) 64) may be compared with this last passage. These women vowed to celibacy, but remaining in their parents' or relations' houses, represented in Leander's time the older type of monachism which existed before the conventual type. Of this older type Emilia of Merida is commonly taken as the most famous Spanish representative (although neither in the Acta, nor in Prudentius's well-known hymn, is there any mention of voces in her case, whereas the council of Elbriberi speaks of her—Deo, and of the pactum virginitatis ") One sees from the Libelli ad Florentiam that in Leander's time the practice, though still continued, was discredited and passing away, and we remember no later notice of it in Spain. For certain modern instances of it elsewhere see Gams, l.c.

Leander, however, was not the only rule which Florentina possessed, if we are to take the words "Habes Regulam quam sequaris" (cap. 14) in the sense which Gams assigns to them (Ibid. de Vir. Ill. cap. v). Considering the familiarity which Isidore, Leander, and other lost works of Hosius, it is not improbable that Leander may have modelled his own treatise upon it. The last chapter of the Regula is full of interest for the light it throws upon the early history of the family to which the brother and sister belonged. We have already quoted part of it (see above, and under FULGENTIUS). Towards the end Leander asks for his sister's prayers: "Nor do thou forget our younger brother, Isidore, whom our common parents left under God's guardianship to the care of his surviving brothers and sister (tribus superstitesbus germanis), and thus joyfully, and without fear for his infancy, departed to God,... Love him the more dearly and pray the more to Jesus for him as thou knowest him to have been the more tenderly loved by our parents,... For I am well assured that thy virginal prayer for us will touch the Divine ear." It was at Florentina's request that this young virgin named Florentina and her brothers, was commonly obtained by older writers, really refers to the abbes of Florentina's convent, and that she, and not the wife of Severianus, was called Turtura. FLORENTINUS. See also Florentius.

FLORENTINUS (1) (Florentius), bishop of Treves, succeeded St. Severinus, and said to have been martyred. Our only information, however, with regard to him comes from the Roman Martyrology and the Treves breviary, in which he is related to have lived and suffered in the 4th century, before the conversion of Constantine. But the Bollandist Van Hecke swells these small materials by a long dissertation to prove that Christianity in Gaul, and at Treves in particular, had its origin in the apostolic age. Herein he differs from the Bollandist author of the life of St. Maternus. (AA. SS. 17 Oct. viii. 16.)

FLORENTINUS (2), bishop of Merida. [Florentius (8)].

FLORENTINUS (3) (Florentius), Donatist bishop of Adrumetum, in Byzacena, present at the Donatist council of Cabarussis, A.D. 393. (Ang. En. in Psal. 36, c. 20.) [H. W. P.]

FLORENTINUS (4), the name of three bishops at the Carthaginian conference of 411, viz. one (also called Florentius) of Hippo Diarrhytum; or rather, as he comes from Africa (Ben. Zurt.), assistant on the Catholic side (Mon. Vet. Dom. pp. 288, 345, 425, ed. Oberthür); (Donatist) of Farni in Byzacene (M. V. D. p. 447); (Donatist) of Tubusius or Thugusitus in Mauretanica Sitifensis (Boru Ticha, Ant. Ritu. 32, 2). (M. V. D. p. 440). [H. W. P.]

FLORENTINUS, bishop of Tenedos. [Florentius (19)].

FLORENTINUS (5), bishop of Utica, and another bishop of Tusculum in the Byzacene, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 55, 57 in Migne, Patr. Lat. ivii. ; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 342, 362.) [L. D.]

FLORENTINUS (6), bishop of Tisili, in the proconsular province of Africa, present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 525. (Manai, viii. 648 ; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 328.) [L. D.]

FLORENTINUS (7) (Florentius), the first known bishop of Ciusium (Chiusi), c. A.D. 465. He was at the council held at Rome in that year. (Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. iii. 667 ; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xx. 576.) [R. S. G.]

FLORENTINUS (8), bishop of Passum (Capaccio), A.D. 499, attending the Roman synod of Symmachus (Manai, viii. 325 B. 289 A; Volti, Vescovi Pustani, p. 1). Ugelli (Ital. Sac. viii. 465) misreads the name Laurentius. [C. H.]

FLORENTINUS (9), bishop of Ancona c. 603. Florentius archdeacon of Ancona (No. 17), has been supposed identical with this bishop, but it seems more probable that our bishop had been previously a deacon at Ravenna (No. 18), and that he was chosen bishop of Ancona on the recommendation of Gregory the Great. (Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 378 ; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vii. 27-29.) [R. S. G.]

FLORENTINUS (10), bishop of Cadiz. (Bagnullius) present at the Lateran synod concerning the election of popes and image worship under Stephen IV. in 769. (Manai, xii. 715; Hefele, § 343.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLORENTINUS (11), a Christian official to the court of Africa, who had carried of Faventius by force, and to whom St. Augustine wrote on the subject (Ep. 114). [Faventius (11)].

FLORENTINUS (12)—Sept. 27. Martyr with Hilarius at the village of Semonz, near Autun. He had been a soldier, but retiring therefrom he devoted himself to the religious life. In one of theruptions of the barbarians his tongue was torn out, after which, continuing to preach, he was beheaded. He died about A.D. 406. His relics were translated in A.D. 855 to the abbey of Ainay-de-Lyon. His acts are extant in a Wolfe format, shape, one longer, the other shorter. They were written by a monk of the abbey of Bonneval after the translation of the relics. They are of course very corrupt. There has been a long controversy between Malbon, Castellan, Ruinart, and others about the exact place of his martyrdom, some contending for the ancient town of Sion in the Rhone valley in Switzerland, others for Semonz and Autun in France, of which there is a full account in the Boll. Acta SS. Sept. viii. 404-427. (Mart. Rom. Hieron., Usuardi; Ruinart, Hist. Persec. Wandel. p. 409; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. viii. 420; Gall. Christ. xiiii. 734.) [G. T. N.]

FLORENTINUS (14), a correspondent and friend of Sidonius Apollinaris. Ambitious like many others of possessing a letter from Sidonius, he wrote to the bishop complaining of his delay in coming to see him and in writing to him. Sidonius, either not inclined to encourage his admirers in this way, or too modest to think his compositions of any consequence, disappointed Florentinus by this brief reply, "I come and write." (Sid. Apol. Ep. 19, in Migne, Pat. Lat. ivii.) [C. H.]

FLORENTINUS (15), first abbot of the monastery of the Apostles at Arles, established by St. Aurelian. He is said to have been born in 483, made abbot in 548, and to have died in 553. Januarius, a monk of the same foundation, composed on the occasion of the translation of his remains, in 588, from the monastery burial-ground to the church of the Sancta Cruz, an acrostic epitaph, which is given by the Acta SS. Mai. v. 39. He was commemorated on April 12, as the day of his death, and May 21, the day of his translation. (Gall. Christ. i. 599.) [S. A. B.]

FLORENTINUS (16), Irish missionary at Amboise, said by Vosscher (Eccles. And. c. xvi. wsk.
vi. 309-10, and Ind. Chron.) to have lived in A.D. 500, but the dates and facts of his life are confused. (Lanigan, Evoli. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 16; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. 24, tom. x. 850-58.)

[J. G.]

FLORENTINUS (17), archdeacon of Ancona. He was one of three candidates recommended to pope Gregory to succeed to the vacant see of Ancona, the others being Rusticus deacon of Ancona, and Florentinus deacon of Ravenna. Gregory hears this character of him, that he is well versed in the Scriptures, but too bowed down by age, and too parsimonious, and moreover has solemnly sworn never to be a bishop. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. iv. ind. vii. ep. 11 ed. Migne); Jaffé (Reg. Pontif. 153) dates this letter Dec. 603. The vacancy appears to have been filled by either this Florentinus or the following; see Cappelletti (Le Chiese d’Ital. vii. 28, 190).

[C. H.]

FLORENTINUS (18), deacon of Ravenna, one of three candidates, and the most popular, recommended to pope Gregory for the vacant see of Ancona. (See preceding article.) In the case of his being appointed it would be necessary, Gregory observes, to procure the free approval of his own bishop, whose consent ought not to appear constrained by any mandate of the pope. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. iv. ind. vii. ep. 11 ed. Migne.) [FLORENTINUS (9)]

[C. H.]

FLORENTINUS (1), sixth recorded bishop of Tongres, between St. Severinus and Martinus, belonging apparently to about the year 230, judging from his position in the list, which is here dateless and without further record. (Gall. Christ. iii. 809.)

FLORENTINUS (2), the first known bishop of Fosaurum (Icera), c. A.D. 247. He is said to have built a cathedral at Pesaro, and to have placed in it the relics of the martyr St. Terentius. (UgHELLI, Ital. Sacr. ii. 948; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Ital. iii. 340.)

[R. S. G.]

FLORENTINUS (3) PUPPIANUS, a bishop and confessor in the Decian persecution, of whom nothing is known but what is contained in Cyp. Ep. 66. He had written a slanderous letter to Cyprian and receives a warm and singular reply. He appears apparently written to him as “Thascius Cypritanus,” omitting the sacerdotal Christian name Caeclitus [CYPRIAN], and the reply is headed, “Cypriano qui et Thascius Florentio qui et Puppiano, &c.” Through the epistle he calls him Puppianus carefully, as if to annoy, and quotes with precision the Caecilius Cyprianus Episcopus Christianorum of the edict. He sarcastically contrasts with his own exile “the dignity of charity and martyrdom,” “the highest sublimity of martyrdom,” which Florentius had attained, and asks to confirm him in the episcopate. Florentius had doubted the truth of his visions, and Cyprian promises to inquire in vision whether he may admit him to communion. Pearson (p. 47) takes Florentius to have been a Novatianist, but it may be doubted, considering this last threat, whether the “cum in ecclesia esses et mune communicares” is more than a sneer (like that of Firminus to Stephen), as if he had excommunicated himself.

[E. W. B.]

FLORENTINUS (4) I. (FLORENTINUS), bishop of Vienne, martyr, c. A.D. 253. Ado in his Chronicon (Act. Sacr. ann. 241) calls him Florentinus, and says he was eminent in life and learning in the reign of Gordian, and remained until the time of Gallienus and Volusianus, when he was exiled and martyred. In his Martyrology Ado records him as Florentius under Jan. 3, and calls him eighth bishop of Vienne. (See also Boll. Acta SS. 3 Jan. i. 127; Gall. Chr. vi. 10.)

[C. H.]

FLORENTINUS (5), bishop of Tresves.

[FLORENTINUS (1)].

FLORENTINUS (6), bishop of Ancysra in Phrygia Pacatiana; one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325 (Manasi, ii. 985), and afterwards one of the council sent to Philippi to enforce the Council of Sardica, 347. (Manasi, iii. 139; Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 799.)

FLORENTINUS (7), bishop of Puteoli (Poseuomi), c. A.D. 355. He appears to have been deposed for misconduct, but to have returned and taken reposition of his see (by force, as would appear from the expression “eam ecclesiæ invasit”) fifteen years after his condemnation. (UgHELLI, Ital. Sacr. vi. 318; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Ital. xvii. 881.)

[R. S. G.]

FLORENTINUS (8) (FLORENCUS, FLORENtinus), bishop of Merida from about 321 to about 357. Our first notice of him is probably as the Florentius Dianus, who accompanied his bishop, Liberatus of Hebridea, to the first council of Arles (A.D. 314). Among the signatures to the council of Sardica, he appears as “Florentius ab Spania de Emerita”; and later on his name became well known from the strange story of his death given in the Libellus Precum of Marcianus and Faustinus, addressed to Valentinian and Theodosius (Sirmond., i. 136). According to these Luciferian prebendaries, Florentius, for the sin of having continued in communion with Hesius of Cordova after his signature of the Sirmium Formular, was stricken with a sudden and awful death in the church of Merida, before a great concourse of people. Twice he recovered, but in his senseless, and twice recovered sufficiently to remount the episcopal throne. The sect, however, again repelled him “ut quasi indignum,” and he fell for the third time and expired. The writers of the Libellus call the whole “great city of Emerita” to witness to the truth of their story. It may no doubt have a kernel of truth; various forms of sudden and fatal illness would present the appearances mentioned; but considering the accounts given in the same document of the deaths of Hesius and Potamius, and the animus of the whole, not much faith need be given to the story. Florentius was probably the first Metropolitan bishop of Merida. On the subject of the changes in the church organisation of Spain during the 4th century, see Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. (1) 168. (Esp. Segr. xiii. 133; Harduin, i. 259.)

[M. A. W.]

FLORENTINUS (9), bishop of Cahors about the year 370. He may be the same whom Paulinus of Nola addresses (lib. iv. Ep. 30). He was succeeded by his brother Alethius, mentioned by Gregory of Tours. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ii. 15; Gall. Christ. vii. 575.)

[B. T. S.]
FLORENTIUS (10), bishop of Ravenna, appears to have succeeded Probus in that see, c. A.D. 501, and to have been followed by Liberius, c. 374. He is said to have been a man of great learning and eloquence. (Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 330; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 26.) [R. S. G.]

FLORENTIUS (11) II, bishop of Vienne, assisted at the Council of Valence, A.D. 374, and may possibly have preceded the metropolitan of Apamæa. (Cellier, iv. 600; Tillemont, iii. 623; Labbe, Conc. ii. 904; Gall. Christ. xvi. 10.) [R. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (12) (Florentius), sixth in the list of bishops of Arretium (Arezzo), between Severianus and Maximus, succeeded A.D. 375, died A.D. 377. (Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 409.) [C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (13), bishop of Adrumetum. [Florentius (9).]

FLORENTIUS (14), bishop of Hippo Diarrhytus. [Florentius (11).]

FLORENTIUS (15), African bishop, whose name, as well as that of Secundianus, is associated with that of St. Augustine in a letter concerning Leporius, addressed to Proculus and Cyrilinus. (Ep. 219.) [Leporius] [H. W. P.]

FLORENTIUS (16) (Florentinus), bishop of Toul (Troy). His accession is variously stated as from A.D. 409 to 417. He appears to have died c. A.D. 449. Innocent I. once wrote to him, reproving him for having infringed on the diocesan rights of Ursus bishop of Nomentum. (Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 216; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vi. 624; Cellier, Autour Sacr. vii. 525.) [R. S. G.]

FLORENTIUS (17), A.D. 448, bishop of Sardis and metropolitan of Lydia. He had a difference with two bishops of his province. This gave occasion to Flavian, bishop of Constantiopole, to assemble a council, probably of prelates who were at that city on various business. The best known present are Saturninus of Marcianopole, Basilius of Seleucia, Seleucus of Amasues, and Julian of Cos. The council assembled in the chapter-house of the cathedral. (Cellier, x. 689; Labbe, vi. p. 485.) [W. M. S.]

FLORENTIUS (18), a bishop of the Western church, whose name stands at the head of the 117th letter of Theodoret. This has, with reason, been thought to have been a circular letter addressed to the Occidental bishops generally. It was written at the same time with that to pope Leo (Epist. 113), A.D. 449, after Theodoret had been deposed by the Latrocinium of Ephesus, and when attempts were being made to drive him into exile, and was conveyed to the West by two episcopoi, Abramius and Hypatius, and Alypius, the exarch of the monks of the diocese of Cyrurus. Theodoret exerts his correspondent to come forward as the champion of the apostolic faith, and help in driving away the heretics then troubling the East, and not to look coldly on those who, like himself, were suffering for the truth's sake, but give them the benefit of his protection, and thus prove to his enemies that they could not have their own way in everything (Theod. Epist. 117). [E. V.]

FLORENTIUS (19), bishop of Lesbos, Tenedos, Proselenae, Agiali, according to signature affixed to the third and sixteenth acts of the council of Chalcedon. He appears also as "Episcopus, Lesbi, Tenedi, Helleponti" (in the acts of the "Robber Council"), "Episc. Lesbi, Tenedi" (Act. vi. Chalced.), and as "Episc. Lesbiteriae" (Les-bi Tenedi? synodal letter to Leo I, Leo Mag. Ep. 98, 1106, Migne; Oriens Christ. i. 949). Though he was present at the Robber Council at Ephesus in A.D. 449, and assented to the condemnation of Flavian and Eusebius, he appears to have recognised his error before the council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451, at which he was also present, and on the orthodox side. At this latter council his weakness prevented him from writing, and he employed a chorepiscopum, by name Chrysocles, to subscribe for him. (Manii, vi. 932, vi. 160, 408—here described as "of Mytilene," 456; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 955.) [G. C.]

FLORENTIUS (20), bishop of Hadrianopolis in Pisidia; present at the oecumenical Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451; he also signed the synodal letter of Pisidia to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1049; Manii, vi. 106, 571.) [L. D.]

FLORENTIUS, bishop of Cladium. [Florentinus (7).]

FLORENTIUS (21), one of three bishops, Severus and Equitius being the others, to whom pope Simplicius wrote, Nov. 19, 475. (Manii, Concil. vii. 973; Jaé, Regest. Pontif. 49.) [C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (22), bishop of Centenaria, in Numidia, banished by Hanneric, 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 56 in Migne, Patr. Lat. iii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 130.) [L. D.]

FLORENTIUS (23), bishop of Nova Germania in Numidia, banished as the preceding. (Notitia, 56; Morcelli, i. 244.) [L. D.]

FLORENTIUS (24), bishop of Semina in proconsular Africa, banished to Corbica as the preceding. (Notitia, 56; Morcelli, i. 274.) He died in Corbica, and was venerated as a saint, though his remains were carried into Italy (AA. SS. Boll. ii. Jun. 179.) [L. D.]

FLORENTIUS (25), ST., eighth bishop of Orange, between Verus and Vinclanialis. According to the Pseudo-Epiphram of the consecration of Placeintia in Italy, where he is commemorated Oct. 17, he was a native of Tures. He subscribed the council of Epson, A.D. 517, and the fourth of Arles, A.D. 524. A bishop of his name too was present at the first of Lyons in 517, but it is doubtful whether the signature belongs to him. The bishop of St. Paul de Trois-Châteaux, who was contemporary with him. His death is placed about A.D. 526. He was honoured as the patron of the town of Florentia, in the diocese of Placeintia, which possessed his relics, the translation of which was commemorated March 19. (Audo and Usanard, Oct. 17; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxiii. 380, 381; Boll. Acta SS. i. 572; Boll. Theol. Rel. ii. 76; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. viii. 565, 570, 627; Flor. 1759-98; Gall. Christ. i. 676.) [S. A. B.]

FLORENTIUS (26), 11th bishop of St. Paul de Trois-Châteaux, succeeding St. Michael and followed by Heraclius. He is known only by his subcription of the council of Epona (A.D. 517).
He must be distinguished from the priest of this diocece (45), who wrote the life of St. Rusticula.
(Mansi, viii. 565; Gall. Christ. i. 707.)

FLORENTIUS (27), bishop of Lampsota, in Numidia; present at the council of Carthage
A.D. 525. (Mansi, viii. 647; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 198.)

[ A. B. A. ]

FLORENTIUS (28), bishop of Campilia, in the district of Massa Populonia in Etruria,
c. 540-546; possibly bishop of Populonia itself;
but he is of doubtful authenticity.
(Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiiii. 681, 724; Acta Sact. Boll. 15 Mai. iii. 470.)

[A. D. H. A.]

FLORENTIUS (29), bishop of Matelica. His name is joined with that of pope Vigilius in the Dunmesthe Theodori, i.e. the document issued by Vigilius in Constantineople, August 551, and containing sentence of deposition against Theodore Askidas, bishop of Cesarea, and Mennas, patriarch of Constantineople. (Mansi, x. 60; Hefele, § 264.)

[ A. D. H. A.]

FLORENTIUS (30), bishop of Epidauros
(Ragusa) in Dalmatia, c. A.D. 600. (Farlati, Hagiogr. Sacr. vi. 410.)

[J. de S.]

FLORENTIUS (31), the name of two bishops in the proconsular province of Africa, viz.
of Eguges and of Zempta (Zenta), who signed the letter of the synod of his province, which was sent to Paul patriarch of Constantinople against the errors of the Monothelites, A.D. 646.
(Mansi, x. 911; Morcelli, Africa Chri.
d. 370.)

FLORENTIUS (32), St., twelfth bishop of Straburg, succeeding St. Arbogastus and followed by Wiggeron, or Wiggerus (A.D. 679-687), was born in Ireland. Together with his predecessor, also an Irishman, and two others, he came to Austria early in the reign of Dagobert II., possibly in company with that prince, whom upon his father Sigebert's death (c. A.D. 655) had been privily sent away to Ireland by Grimold, the mayor of his palace, and did not return to his knightly calling until the year 670. In Alsace he settled himself in the forest of Hasel or Haselau, where the Bruschn flows from the Vosges, and built, probably with Dagobert's aid, the monastery of Haselau at about six leagues from Straburg. Elected to the bishopric upon the death of Arbogastus, he founded at Straburg the monastery of St. Thomas, mainly as a refuge and house of entertainment for the Irish. He retained the friendship of Dagobert, whose doughter he was said to have freed from demonical possession, or according to another account restored to speech and sight. After an episco-poal of eight years he died A.D. 687, on Nov. 7.
He was buried in the monastery church of St.
Thomas, but at the beginning of the 9th century his remains were translated to Haselau by Rathi, one of his successors in the see.

[S. A. B.]

FLORENTIUS (33), June 1, martyr at Perga with Marcellinus, Cyriacus, Faustinus, and Julianus under Decius, A.D. 250. The Rom.
Mort. commemorates them on June 5.

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (34), July 15, martyr at Carthage with the deacon Catullinus. (Catullinus 2.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (35), July 25, martyr with Felix. They were natives of Sipontum, an ancient town in Apulia. They belonged to a body of eighty-three soldiers who suffered martyrdom at one time under Maximian at Furconium, a town of Central Italy.
(Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron.;

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (36), Oct. 13, martyr at Thessalonica in Maximin's persecution, Menol.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (37), May 11, martyr at Osmo (Auximut), not far from Ancona. He suffered with Sisinus, a deacon, and Dioctetius under Maximian.
(Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (38), Oct. 10, martyr at Cassius and with Cassius and many others.
Probably they were soldiers, as Bonn was the headquarters of a legion, and a fortress. (Mort. Rom. ed. Baron.; Mart. Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (39), Oct. 27, martyr at Trois-Châteaux. (Mort. Rom. ed. Baron, Usuardi.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (40), presbyter and confessor, commemorated on Sept. 22; placed by Usuardi in "pago Pictavens," and by the Bellundistan at a mountain of Gaul called Glouna, at the extremity of Aquitaine, near the Loire

According to his very legendary Acts, which are said to belong to the 9th century, Florentius came to Lyons, thence proceeded to Tours and thence to Glouna, where he built an oratory. He paid a yearly visit to St. Martin at Tours, lived to the age of 123 years, of which 63 were after the death of St. Florimus, and was buried at Glouna.

[J. G.]

FLORENTIUS (41), priest of a church near Subiaco, where St. Benedict of Nursia had one of his twelve monasteries. It was to avoid the jealousy of Florentius at his growing fame that St. Benedict removed from that spot to Monte

[C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (42), father of St. Nicetius (Nicerius) of Lyons. The story is that the see of Genova being vacant, Florentius, who was a senator, was chosen for the office, the Pope confirming the election. Coming to his house he announced the fact to Artemia his wife, who exclaimed, "Cease, I pray you, to desire this bishops. In my womb I carry a bishop of your own flesh." Florentius thereupon declined the office in compliance with the text of Scripture which said, "In all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice." Gen. xxi. 12.
(Greg. Tur. Viteae Patrum, viii.)

[S. A. B.]

FLORENTIUS (43), a recluse in the district of Nursia. For the story of his friend Eutychius and himself, see Greg. Mag. Dial. (lib. iii. cap. 15 in Migne, lxvii. 249), and Mabillon (Acta Sanctorum, O. S. B. i. 120). [A. H. D. A.]

FLORENTIUS (44), subdeacon of Rome. He was elected by the Neapolitans as their bishop, but not being able to make up his mind to accept the appointment, he took to flight. Gregory, discovering the secret, wrote to Scholasticus, Bishop of Campania, to assemble the people of Naples for a 15); Jaffé (Reg. Pont. p. 102) dates this letter Dec. 592. The bishop who succeeded was For-tunatus (No. 21).

[C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (48), a presbyter of Trois-Châteaux, author of the life of St. Rusticula, an abess of the monastery of St. Caesarius at Arles (Mabillon, Acta SS. Benedicti, i. 189). It was written soon after her death, A.D. 631, at the instance of her successor, Cebula. Its literary style is good. (Ceillier, xi. 695). [S. A. B.]

FLORENTIUS (49), magister officiorum under the emperor Constantius II. He was son of Nigrinianus, and acting for the magister officiorum in A.D. 355 (Ammianus Marcellinus, Rec.
Gest. xvi. 5, 12); in his official capacity he presented to the emperor Constantius the two books which Lucifer of Cagliari wrote in behalf of St. Athanasius. They were so bold and outspoken that the emperor directed Florentius to return the codex to Lucifer, and ask definitely if he acknowledged it to be his. Florentius's letter accompanying the codex and Lucifer's reply, acknowledging the authorship to the fullest extent, are given in Migne (Patr. Lat. xiii. 935-6). In the days of Julian (A.D. 361)
he was banished to the island of Boa or Baro, on the coast of Dalmatia. (Amm. Marcell. lib.
xxii. 3, 6; Tillemont, Mon. Hist. Eccl. vii. 517; Ceillier, Actores sacrés, iv. 242). [J. G.]

FLORENTIUS (47), a wealthy man of Italy who retired to Jerusalem to pursue the monastic life late in the 4th century. He was known to Jerome, Evagrius, Heliodorus, and Rufinus; but Jerome had not actually seen him when their correspondence took place in the year 374.
Florentius had already at that time established himself at Jerusalem, and was becoming known throughout the world for his kindness and magnanimity towards the strangers who went there.
Heliodorus (afterwards bishop of Altinum), who had gone with Jerome to Antioch in 374, appears to have gone on to Jerusalem, leaving his friend behind. At Jerusalem he was entertained by Florentius, and on his return gave a glowing description of his charities. Jerome begs Florentius to be the intermediary of his correspondence with Rufinus, and asks him to transmit several books to him, and promises others in return. We hear nothing of him after Jerome himself went to Jerusalem; perhaps he may have died early; perhaps he may have taken the part of Rufinus in the controversy between the two former friends.
But in the year 382, when Jerome wrote the continuation of Eusebius' Chronicle, he thus speaks of him (sub ann. A.D. 378): "Florentius, Somoas et Rufinus insignes monachi habentur;
e quibus Florentius tam misericors in egenos fuit ut vulgo pater pauperum nominatus sit."
admission of Florentius to the synod. Flavian replied that everybody knew the soundness of Florentius's faith, and that he might take his place in the council if Eutyches wished it. Eutyches replying that he would consent to anything God and his holiness the bishop thought right (ibid. 220). Florentius was sent for. He took his seat among the metropolitans, next to Seleucus, bishop of Amasea (ibid. 238; Liberat. c. xi. p. 60). Florentius disclaimed all desire to depute his ecclesiarch to forget his position as a layman; but it is evident that he took a very leading and authoritative part in the discussion, and manifested a strong leaning towards the acquittal of Eutyches. But his efforts to induce the archimandrite to acknowledge the two natures in Christ, or, at least, to adopt language which might satisfy the council, were fruitless, and he was compelled in the interests of orthodoxy to give the word for his condemnation (ibid. 507, 517). As Eutyches left the hall, which was resounding with the acclamations of the assembled bishops at the much-desired sentence, he lodged with Florentius an appeal against his condemnation to the churches of Rome, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, which he asserted he had just publicly made, but which in the uproar had been disregarded. Florentius ran to apprise Flavian of it in order that it might be entered on the minutes of the trial. But the bishop had already left the hall of judgment, and availed himself of the plea that the trial was closed to exclude the registration of the appeal (ibid. 244).

Eutyches having taxed Flavian with having falsified the records of the proceedings of the synod, an investigation was held in the following April to examine and verify them, at which Florentius virtually presented at the command of the emperor and the desire of Eutyches, who evidently expected greater impartiality from a layman, accustomed to judicial proceedings, than from a prejudiced clerical body (Liberat. Brevar. c. xi. p. 60; Libbo, iv. 250). On the denunciations of Eutyches requiring to be presented to worship before their master, he overrode the opposition of Flavian to their appearance (ibid. 239), and compelled the reluctant Aetius, who had acted as notary, to produce the minutes of the trial. No inaccuracy of importance was detected, though Eutyches complained that there were many omissions. The most important of these was the absence of any mention of the appeal he declared he had made to the leading Christian churches, which was consequently disallowed (ibid. 242-247). When the council of Chalcedon met for the consideration of the doctrines of Eutyches, Florentius was present, with other high civil dignitaries; but there is no record of the part he took.

We have a letter to Florentius from Theodor, written A.D. 449, defending himself from the charges of unsoundness in the faith, protesting that he holds and ever has held the truth as delivered by the apostles and prophets, and taught by Ignatius, Eusebius, Basil, and other chief doctors of the church, and declared by the Nicene fathers, and beseeching Florentius to close his ears against all calumnies against him (Theod. Epist. 89). Iodose of Pelusium also wrote to him to complain of a bad governor named Gigasithianus, whom he begs Florentius to treat as he deserves (Iod. Pelus. Epist. lib. i. 480). We have a letter to him from Firmus of Caesarea, begging his acceptance of some Easter gifts (epiBopa). (Firm. Epist. 29.) [E. V.]

FLORENTIUS (51), father of Gregory bishop of Tours. He was the son of Georgius, a member of one of the senatorial families of Auvergne. Gregory relates that he was cured of an attack of recurrent fever by the prayer of St. Martinus, abbot of Clermont. (Vitae Patrum, liv. 5.) [S. A. D. B.]

FLORESINDUS, metropolitan of Seville from about 682 to before 693, signing the acts of the thirteenth council of Toledo, summoned by Ervig in 683. He signs last among the metropolitan. At the fourteenth council of Toledo, 694, he is represented by the abbot Gaudencius. At the fifteenth council, 688, he signs in the third place among the metropolitans. (Eosp. Supr. ix. 224; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 270, 287, 304, 313; Gems, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. 2, 219; Mansi, xi. 1075, 1091, xil. 21.) [M. A. W.]

FLORIANI. Under this title, with the alternative names Carcopratiani and Milites, Philaster (57) describes a sect of heretics who denied the resurrection and judgment, who disbelieved Christ's birth from a virgin, and who taught and practised immorality. Philaster had given a separate article to the CARPOCRATIANS, and the name Milites would rather lead us to think of those Gnostics whom Epiphanius (xxvi. 5) calls Επιρροτομικοι and Philobites. The name Floriani does not elsewhere occur, and all that can be said about it is that there seems no reason for connecting it with FLORENRIUS. [G. S.]

FLORENIUS (1), bishop of Caesara, in Gallia Cispadana, a member of the Court of Inquiry held at Rome concerning Caesarianus, (Opt. i. 23.) [CAECILIUS (5)]. [H. W. F.]

FLORENIUS (2), Donatist bishop of Putiza, a place in Numidia, prevented by illness from attending the Carthaginian conference, but having given his advice as a member of that name, A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Dom. p.p. 430, 432, ed. Oberhür.) [H. W. F.]

FLORENIUS, bp. of Placentia (Piacenza). [FLAVIANUS (9)].

FLORENIUS (3), bp. of Olerzo (Opi§tergium) in Venetia. He was desirous of martyrdom, and is supposed to have been martyred c. 620, probably by the Lombards according to tradition. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 322, 323.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLORENIUS (4), bishop of Piacenza, c. 648. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 15; Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 198.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLORENIUS (5), said to have been 25th bishop of Aries, following St. Virgilius, and succeeded by Cyprianius, or Theodosius, in the early part of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 541; Le Coite, Ann. Ecol. Franc. an. 604, n. viii. tom. ii. 563; Gems, Series Episc. 493.) [S. A. D.]

FLORENIUS (6), May 4, martyr in the Diocletian persecution at Lorch (Laurocun), the chief town of Noricum Ripense. The president of Noricum, one Aquilinus, as soon as the edict of persecution arrived, called upon the officials to sacrifice. Florianus held the important post of "princeps officiorum." He refused to obey, and was sentenced to be flung into the Anius with a stone tied round his neck. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuardi, Rabani, Notkeri, Wandalberti; Surii, Vit. SS. t. iii.) [G. T. S.]

FLORIANUS (7), addressed in a letter which is attributed to St. Ambrose. He is represented as having asked direction from St. Ambrose on the subject of repentance and amendment. The letter is given among St. Ambrose's works as genuine in the Roman edition (tom. v. p. 202, Ep. 29, Rom. 1582), but is reckoned spurious by the Benedictines (Patr. Lat. xvii. 749 sq.) and by Ceillier (xi. 511). Florimius is otherwise unknown.

[J. G.]

FLORIANUS (8), abbot, addressed in a poetical epistle by Arator, who compliments him as being spiritually instructed in the grace of Christ, but he is not otherwise identified (Patr. Lat. xviii. 63 and note). He is said by Ceillier (xi. 197) to have been abbot of Romain Moutier in the present canton of Vaud.

[3. G.]

FLORIANUS (9), martyr with Calanicus and fifty-eight others at Beil Jibrin (Kleutheropolis), between Jerusalem and Gaza. According to the Roman martyrlogy he suffered at the hands of the Saracens, who invaded Palestine and took Jerusalem by an honourable capitulation in A.D. 637, Heraclius being still a boy. It has not been possible to explain the expression "royal court" by referring to any known soeuron of an emperor in Asia Minor within the limits which the chronology demands; and Lightfoot has plausibly suggested (Contemp. Rev. May 1875, p. 839) that the expression may have been loosely used of the court of T. Aurelius Fulvius, afterwards the emperor Antoninus Pius, and who was proconsul of Asia, A.D. 135 (Le Bas and Waddington, Fastes des Provinces asiatiques, p. 724). Florimus may possibly have come from Italy in the proconsul's retinue. The title of the letter to him was: On Monarchy, or that God is not the author of evil; and Eusebius remarks that Florimus seems to have maintained the opposite opinion concerning God. It would be rash in us, who have not seen the letter, to assert that this inference of Eusebius was erroneous, but since the characteristic of dualism is not to make God the author of evil, but to clear Him from the charge by ascribing evil to an independent origin, the title would lead us to think that the letter was directed not against one who had himself held God to be the author of evil, but against one who had charged the doctrine of a single first principle with necessarily leading to this conclusion. And we should have supposed that the object of Eusebius was to show that it was possible to assert God to be the sole origin and ruler of the universe without holding evil to be His work. However this may be, later writers have naturally followed the report of Eusebius.

Philaster (79) having described it as the heresy of Colletus that he denied things evil to be God's work, contrasts with this the doctrine of another named heretic, who taught that things which God made were in their own nature evil. Augustine (68), in other respects following Philaster, calls the anonymous heretic Florimus, and with little probability, as we shall presently see, makes him the founder of a sect of Florinians. He probably arrived at this result by considering the notice in Eusebius with Philaster's mention in another place of Florinius. The great work of Irenaeus does not mention Florinus, and has nothing which we can conjecture as likely to have been common with the letter of which we have been speaking. The tract of Tertullian against Hermogenes is on the same measure deals with the same subject, but freely as Tertullian used the church of Rome, which office he lost on account of his having fallen into heresy. He is known to us by two notices (v. 15, 20) in the ecclesiastical history of Eusebius, who drew his information from works written by Irenaeus in opposition to Florinus. One was a letter to Florinus, of which Eusebius has preserved a most interesting fragment, in which Irenaeus records his youth, his recollections of Polycarp, representing how that bishop, whose good opinion he remembered Florinus had once been anxious to gain, would have been shocked at his present opinions. Scholten, in order to save a theory of his from destruction, has found it necessary to assail the genuineness of this letter (Der Apostel Johannes in Kleinzieben, p. 41), but his arguments are too weak to need refutation, and the fragment contains unmistakable internal evidence of genuineness. It states that Florinus at the time of his acquaintance with Polycarp was doing prosperously at the royal court in Lower Asia, Irenaeus being still a boy. It has not been found possible to explain the expression "royal court" by referring to any known soeuron of an emperor in Asia Minor within the limits which the chronology demands; and Lightfoot has plausibly suggested (Contemp. Rev. May 1875, p. 839) that the expression may have been loosely used of the court of T. Aurelius Fulvius, afterwards the emperor Antoninus Pius, and who was proconsul of Asia, A.D. 135 (Le Bas and Waddington, Fastes des Provinces asiatiques, p. 724). Florimus may possibly have come from Italy in the proconsul's retinue. The title of the letter to him was: On Monarchy, or that God is not the author of evil; and Eusebius remarks that Florimus seems to have maintained the opposite opinion concerning God. It would be rash in us, who have not seen the letter, to assert that this inference of Eusebius was erroneous, but since the characteristic of dualism is not to make God the author of evil, but to clear Him from the charge by ascribing evil to an independent origin, the title would lead us to think that the letter was directed not against one who had himself held God to be the author of evil, but against one who had charged the doctrine of a single first principle with necessarily leading to this conclusion. And we should have supposed that the object of Eusebius was to show that it was possible to assert God to be the sole origin and ruler of the universe without holding evil to be his work. However this may be, later writers have naturally followed the report of Eusebius. Philaster (79) having described it as the heresy of Colletus that he denied things evil to be God's work, contrasts with this the doctrine of another unnamed heretic, who taught that things which God made were in their own nature evil. Augustine (68), in other respects following Philaster, calls the anonymous heretic Florinus, and with little probability, as we shall presently see, makes him the founder of a sect of Florinians. He probably arrived at this result by considering the notice in Eusebius with Philaster's mention in another place of Florinius. The great work of Irenaeus does not mention Florinus, and has nothing which we can conjecture as likely to have been common with the letter of which we have been speaking. The tract of Tertullian against Hermogenes is on the same measure deals with the same subject, but freely as Tertullian used the labours of others, and of Ireneaus in particular, there is nothing which entitles us to say that he employed the letter to Florinus. If Florinus ever in a heretical sense made God the author of evil, his errors afterwards took the opposite direction, and he became a Valentinian. It was in reply to him that Ireneaus composed his work On the Ogdoad, to which he must himself have attached considerable value; for he prefixed to it an adscription to ensure fidelity in its transcribers, which pleased Eusebius so much that he not only copied it into his ecclesiastical history, but prefixed it to his own work on Chronology. Concerning the time of the controversy of Ireneaus with Florinus, we have to balance the arguments that, if it had taken place before the publication of the treatise on heresies, we should expect to find some trace of it in that work; and, on the other hand, that, after the publication of a treatise which deals so fully with the whole subject of Valentinianism, a separate treatise on the Ogdoad would have been unnecessary. The scale seems to be turned in favour of the later date by the fact that there is a Syriac fragment (Harvey, ii. 457), which purports to be an extract from a letter of Ireneaus to Victor of Rome concerning Florinus, a presbyter, who was a partisan of the error of Valentinianism, and had published an abominable book. No such letter is mentioned by Eusebius, but otherwise the extract presents no ground for suspicion. The letter calls the attention of the bishop of Rome to writings which would seem to have been uncensured by him, and which were doing mischief, as bearing the authority of a presbyter of his church. It may be inferred that however the doctrines of Florinus may have verged on Valentinianism, he had not formally joined that sect, else he could not have retained his position. Whether the interference of Ireneaus was followed by the deposition or the retraction of Florinus, it does not appear that he was the founder of any heretical sect; probably he did not long survive, for he must have been a considerably older man than Ireneaus. He is not named by Epiphanius, by Philaster, or by Pseudo- Tertullian, who has so many notices of Roman heretics; and it is likely, therefore, that he was not named in the later work of Hippolytus, nor in the lectures of Ireneaus, on which that work was founded; he is not named in the later work of Hippolytus, nor by Tertullian. This silence is not easily explained if either Florinus or any school of Florinian were a source of danger to the church after his exposure by Ireneaus.

[FLORINUS (3), bishop of Cesena. [FLORINUS (1).]

FLORINUS (3), a Greek, sixth in the list of the bishops of Eugubium or Gubbio in Umbria, behind Decentius and Anastasius, a.d. 426. (Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 634.)

FLORINUS, bishop of Cesena. [FLORINUS (5).]

FLORIUS, bishop of Aemonia (Cittanova) in Istria, about ten miles north of Parenzo, c. 324. On a journey to Constantinople he died. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Itali, vii. 747; Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 223.)

[CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.]

FLORIUS (1), said to have been bishop of Calaris (Cagliari), in the 2nd century. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Itali, xxii. 48; Cosii, Città di Cagliari, &c., p. 56.) [R. S. G.]

FLORIUS (2), traditionally the first bishop of Lodève; but according to the Sammarchiani the ancient tradition rests on no evidence. (Tillemont, Mem. iv. 506; Gall. Christ. vi. 536.) [R. T. S.]

FLORIUS (3), one of twelve Gallic bishops congratulated by Leo the Great, Aug. 16, 498, on the consecration of Ravennatus by them to the see of Arles (Leo Mag. Ep. 40). He occurs again among about 40 Gallic bishops in the synodal letter of Ravennatus to Leo, and likewise in Leo's reply. (Leo Mag. Ep. 99, 102, ed. Migne, Patr. Lat. iv.; Mansi, Concil. vii. 151.)

[FLORIUS (4), bishop of Amiata or Pompeipolis, in Pontus, a.d. 598. He was born at Constantinople. His father's name was Florius, and his mother's Euphemia. He is stated to have attained to great knowledge and skill both in secular and sacred literature. He married, and had two sons, but in later life took monastic vows. He was later made bishop of Amiata, a town which being close to Eupatoria shared with it the common name of Pompeipolis. He held his see under the younger Justin, Tiberius, and Mauritius. In the Memoirs of the Greek church his name is found to be celebrated on Dec. 18. (Basil. Mem.) [F. A.]

FLORIUS (5), bishop of Cesena, c. 588. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Itali, ii. 530; Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 445.)

[FLORIUS (6), the name of three Italian bishops, viz. of Cesena, Forconium, and Feligno, who signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680 after a synod in Rome to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 303, 315; Hefele, § 314; Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 421.)

[FLORIUS (7), bishop of Mentesa, signs the acts of the thirteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth councils of Toledo, 683, 688, 693 (Mansi, xi. 222, 22, 84). The see of Mentesa disappears at the time of the Moorish invasion. Taric destroyed the town, and Florius is the last bishop. (Esp. Sagr. vii. 360; Roderic. Tolet. lib. iii. cap. 22, ap. Schott, Hispania Illustrata; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 297, 313, 333.) [PARDUS.] [M. A. W.]

FLORIUS (8), a Roman officer, probably consular of Numidia, a.d. 303, by whom the persecution against the Christians was carried on with extreme severity. (Böcking, Not. dig. Occup. p. 17; Optatus, iii. 8; Ang. cont. Crez. iii. 29, 30.) [H. W. P.]

FLORIUS (9)—Aug. 18, Martyr with Laurus his brother in Iliumurco under Licinianus, between 312 and 316. They were towns, and natives apparently of Byzantium, where they were employed by two Christian sculptors, Procopius.
FLORUS

Ius and Maximus, who suffered martyrdom there. Upon this Florus and Laurus escaped into Ilyricum, where they obtained employment from the president of the province. Pleading him by their skill, they were sent to the emperor Licinius, who was then probably living at Sirmium, the capital of Ilyricum. He gave them orders to erect an idol temple, which they did, but ended by dedicating it to the true God and breaking the idols, for which the emperor cast them into a deep well. Their relics were translated to Constantinople in the time of Constantine the Great. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron. Ussward.; Bas. Memot.) [G. T. S.]

FLORUS (10), deacon of the church of Syracuse, accompanied his bishop, Chrestus, to the council of Arles (A.D. 314), and was his only companion, though the invitation of the emperor (Eusebius, i. 5) allowed two ecclesiastics to go. (Mansi, ii. 475; Ceilier, ii. 625.) [J. G.]

FLORUS (11), magister officiorum under Theodosius the Great in the Eastern empire in A.D. 391. At the end of that year he became presbyter. During A.D. 391-3 many of the imperial decrees are addressed by Theodosius to him for execution (Cod. Theodos. i. pp. 107-115, ed. Ritter), entrusting him, among other duties, with the putting down of the heathen sacrifices, and with the establishing an inquisition against the Manichean and Encratite heretics. [J. G.]

FLORUS (12), a.D. 436, a young monk of Adrumetum. He made a visit to a monastery at Usalas with his friend Felix, another young monk. Here he read Augustine's letter (No. 194) to the presbyter Sixtus. It struck him so much, that he asked permission of the monks of Usalas to make a copy, and transcribed it at the dictation of Felix. After their sojourn at Usalas, Florus went on to Carthage, Felix returned to Adrumetum. Here Felix read the letters of his brother brothers of that house. Some of them considered it fatal to the doctrine of free-will; and, when Florus returned, accused him of being the author. The monastery was in quite a turmoil of theological disputation, of which the abbott Valentine was kept in ignorance. Florus felt himself obliged to tell him the truth of the matter; whereupon Valentine read the letter, recognized the style of Augustine, and allowed one of the recalcitrant brothers, Cresconius, to make a pilgrimage with Felix to Hippo, which restored peace to the monastery. When they arrived, the bishop explained the letter to Sixtus, and wrote a letter on the subject to the abbots of Adrumetum and his confraternity. He had intended to give them other treatises on the subject of Pelagianism, but they were unwilling to wait until copies were made. He kept them, however, till after Easter, to give them more complete instruction on the theory of grace. Besides a second letter to Valentine, he composed for them the treatise De Gratiam et Libero Arbitrio. He subsequently received a letter from the abbat, and a visit from Florus. This gave rise to his chapter on the subject in the Liber Retractationum, where he explains that he had been under the impression that the disputants of Adrumetum had maintained that free-will was denied in defending grace. (Augustinus, Liber de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio; Liber Retractationum 11. 66; Epist. 154, &c.; Patrolog. Lat. xxiii. 516, &c.; Ceilier, ii. 513.) [W. M. S.]

FLORUS (13), a Gallic noble in the middle of the 6th century, said to have shewn St. Mauro the spot whereon to build his monastery and to have entrusted his son Bestolphus to the care for education, an example that was followed by many other nobles. (Wend. Flor. Hist. an. 553, ed. Coxe.) [C. H.]

FLORUS (15), martyrlogist, called by Cave (Script. Ecc. Hist. Lat. i. 692) monk of the Gallican congregation of St. Trudo in the diocese of Lyons, about the year 760, but more frequently identified with Florus Magister, deacon or priest of Lyons, who was commentator on Scripture and one of the chief opponents of Joannes Scottus in the Predestinarian controversy about the middle of the 9th century. His personal history is thus doubtful, but his work in the martyrlogy is very important from its close connexion with that of Bede. He is said to have materially enlarged the imperfect Martyrologium of Bede, and when Henschelius first discovered the complete Martyrologium in the library of H. Bouchier, the French senator at Dijes, and compared it with the fragment he had previously found in queen Christina's library at Rome, he imagined that in the different characters in which the former was written, he could detect the original Martyrologium of Bede and the later additions by Florus: and hence in the Bollandine edition (Acta SS. Jan. tom. i. 40 sq.) an attempt is made to distinguish the genuine work of Bede from the additions by Florus and others. But the original and additions are really indistinguishable, and there is no separate and entire Martyrologium of either; while the extent to which others may have extended the work of Florus is unknown. Avo's Vetus Romanus Martyrologium (Migne, Patr. Lat. xxiii. 143 sq.) professed to be merely a filling in of martyrs to the days omitted by Bede and Florus, while Usuardus's Martyrologium was a condensing of the other martyrlogies. The martyrlogist Wandalbert (Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 577) expresses his obligation to a subdeacon of Lyons named Florus, who excelled in Scriptural studies; but it is doubtful whether this is the martyrlogist. (Boll. Acta SS. Mart. ii. praef. p. 94 sq., giving Henschel's account of his finding the Martyrologium of Bede and the reasons for his distinguishing the parts belonging to Bede and Florus from others; see also St. Jan. i, praef. Gen. § vi. p. xlviii, for the sources whence the Martyrologium is taken; Giles's Bede, iv. praef. pp. lii, iv; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcv. 799 sq., giving both the Cologne and Bollandine editions, with Smith's preface and notes; Ceilier, Anteks sacrés, ii. 465.) [J. G.]

FLOSCLUS (FOSCLUS), thirteenth bishop of Orleans, succeeded St. Prosper, and died about the year 450. He is entitled martyr or confesser.
in some MSS., but not in the Roman Martyrology, nor by Sausayse in the Gallican. There is a strange legend that St. Evurtius, on occasion of a difficulty in selecting a bishop, caused Foculus when a mere baby to take a name from the altar; whereas the child cried three times "Anianus is bishop," and spoke no more for a year. His feast is kept on Feb. 2. (Hieron., Usuard, Mart.; Gall. Christ. viii. 1413.)

[8. T. S.]

FLUMINIUS, bishop of Tabudiun (Tutbuda) in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, 484. (Victor. Vit. Noticia, 56 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.; Morselli, Africa Christ. i. 294.)

[8. D.]

FOLALDUS, bishop of Lyons. [FULCOALDUS.]

FOCALDUS, FOCOALDUS, bishop of Auxerre. [FULCOALDUS.]

FOEGADIUS (FAEGADIUS, PRAEGRADIUS, SEBATIUS, SARADIUS, or PHEDADUS, called in Gascony St. FIARE), bishop of Agen. His name, which suffers many corruptions, appears to be Greek, a tongue then common in Aquitania. His accession to the episcopate was probably later than 347, since he is not mentioned in the acts of the Sardican council. He rejected the second Sirmian formulary sent by Constantius into Gaul, and refused it in a work contra Ariano. He attended the council of Ariminum, and took an active part in the first proceedings, but refused to sign the Arian confession, even after nearly all his brethren had yielded. But, importuned by the prefect Taurus, he was at last deceived into subscribing by a trick of Valens, who to the statement Christ is "not a creature," had privily added the words "as other creatures." (Sulp. Serv. Chron. ii. 44.) Foeadius, on discovering the fraud, protested so vehemently as to clear himself in the eyes of all, and he attended the councils of Valence, 374, and probably that of Saragossa in 380 (Agen, belonging then to Spain), for the name Fidatus occurs among those subscribed, and his friend Delphius, of Bordeaux, was proscribed. In 392 when St. Jerome wrote his catalogue of illustrious men, he was in deprecitudo. St. Ambrose addressed a letter jointly to him (under the name Sebatius) and Delphius (Ep. 86, ii. 1106). The two books against the Arians were the only work of his which Jerome knew. It may be found in Pat. Lat. vol. xx. It is an able treatise, but contains nothing very remarkable, unless it be the definition (lib. i. cap. vii.) of substance in its ecclesiastical use. "Substantia dicitur id quod semper ex se esse est; hoc est, quod propriiter intra se virtute consistit, quae vis uni et soli Deo competit." In addition to the above work the treatise De Fide Orthodoxa contra Arianos, and the Libellus Fidei, which stood as Nos. 49 and 50 of the Orations of Gregory Nazianzen, really belong to Foeadius. They also are in Pat. Lat. vol. xx.

The former is written to explain some points which had been misunderstood in the treatise of Severus, and the latter is a formal confession of orthodox faith. (Cellier, Aut. Eccl. v. 372; Gall. Christ. ii. 895; Tillemont, Mem. vi. 427; Bull. AA. SS. Ap. 25.) [8. T. S.]

FOENDALACH (FOENDALACH, FOENNELACH), son of Meanach, bishop of Armaghs, succeeded Ferdachrich or Ferdachry A.D. 768, but sat with difficulty for only three years, when Dubadhiele obtained the primatecy, Gormghal being an unsuccessful claimant at the same time. Foendalach lived till A.D. 794. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 18, § 14, c. 29, § 6; Vallet, Eccl. Bishops, "Armagh.") [8. G.]

FOLACHTACH (FOLACHTACH). (1) Son of Teach Tuse, abbot of Clonmacnois, died A.D. 770 (Four Mast. A.D. 765; Ann. Ulton. A.D. 769). Teach Tuse, the House of St. Tusa, now Taghadro or Tappo, is situated near Maynooth, co. Kildare, and Folachtach probably had been born there; the ancient church has disappeared, but the round tower remains to shew its ecclesiastical importance. (Four Mast. o' Donovan, i. 358, n. 7, 369.)

FOLCBERHT (1) An abbot who attests a grant of Offa to Archbishop Jaenberht in 774 (Kemble, C. D. 121, 122); his name is attached also to questionable charters of the same king, granted to Worcester a little later (Sud. nos. 145, 150).

(2) A priest of the diocese of Elhumah, who attended the council of Claves in 803 (K. C. D. 1024; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 547). [8.]

FOLCBERHT, a nun of Bath, to whom, in conjunction with the abbess Berngvidi, Ethelmod, with the consent of king Ethelred of Mercia, gave land on the Cherwell. (K. C. D. 21.) [8.]

FOLCRED, a Mercian abbot, who attests an act recorded in the council of Cahalhyth, probably belonging to the year 801 (Kemble, C. D. 118; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 531). [8.]

FOLCUINIUS (FOLCUWICUS, WOLFWICUS), noticed in the Gallia Christiana (v. 742) among the abbots of Weissenburg on the Lauter in Alsace, and in the CH. v. 763 among the bishops of Worms; he appears first as successor to Vernharius in the abbacy of Weissenburg and in the see of Worms in the year 766. He was buried in the nunnery of Mons Sti. Andreae, beside his predecessor Vernharius. [8. G.]

FOLLIANUS, martyr. [FAELAN.]

FOLRADUS, abbat. [FULRADUS.]

FONTEIANUS, bishop of Sagalassus, in Pidisa, present at the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451, signs the synodal letter of the council to Leo I. (Harduin, Concil., ii. 369 e; Leo Mag. Ep. 98, 1106, Migne.) His name appears in the list of bishops signing the decree of the council held at Rome in 603. The list, however, belongs certainly to some earlier council. (Harduin. ii. 987 e; Baron. 503, ix.; Oriens Christ. i. 1041.) [8. G.]

FONTEUS (1), bishop of Vaison. He was bishop in 450, in which St. Leo wrote him a FONTENIUS [Fontenius], bishop of Feltre, one of the ten bishops who signed a letter to the emperor Maurice in 591, which was sent by certain bishops of Venetia and Rhaetia II (after they had held a synod of which we have no record) to justify their refusal to condemn the Three Chapters (Mansi, x. 466; Hefele, § 281). His name is also in the list of those bishops who are supposed to have held a synod in 579 under Elias, archbishop of Aquileia, concerning the translation of his see to Grado (Hefele, § 280; Mansi, ix. 926). This synod is probably fictitious. (Mansi, ix. 929; Chronicon Patriarcharum Graecorum in Mon. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 393, and note by Witz.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORRANNAN (Forannan, Farnan, Forandunus, Forannan), commemorated Feb. 15. Colgan (Acta SS. 336-38) calls his father Quintus or Contans, descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages. While St. Forannan was preaching in Ireland, St. Columba went to Hy. When he returned, about A.D. 575, to heal the divisions of the church, a numerous assembly met together to welcome him. At that time St. Forannan is said to have received from St. Columba the church called at first All na fairgliona, and afterwards All-Forannan, now Altarman, parish of Easkey, in the north-west of the county of Sligo. There he lived in a cave. Colgan (Acta SS. Ind. Chron.) says he flourished A.D. 565. He is probably the original of Ferranus in the Scotch annals (Reeves, Oddece, Evid. d.). He is not to be confounded with Forannan, son of Ronan, bishop of Water-on-the-Meuse in the end of the 10th century, commemorated on April 30 (Colgan, Tr. Taurum, 485, cc. 51-6, 490 n. 44; Todd, St. Patrick, 33-5).

(2) Abbot of Clonard, commemorated Feb. 12. Colgan (Acta SS. 336 n. 7) has made the curious mistake of identifying St. Forannan at A.D. 751, which is really (according to the Four Masters, whom Colgan usually follows) the year of the death of St. Forannan, bishop of Meath, a place not yet identified [Forannan (4)] (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 353). St. Forannan of Clonard died A.D. 748 (Ann. Tg.; Four Mast. A.D. 740; Ann. Ult. A.D. 744; O’Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 509).

(3) Abbot of Kildare, commemorated Jan. 15. In his list of the prelates of Kildare, Colgan (Tr. Taurum, 629, col. 1) attaches to this day the feast of St. Forannan, who was abbot of Kildare, and died in A.D. 697, according to the Annals of Ulster and of the Four Masters. He succeeded Lochene Meann, the Wise, in A.D. 697, but Colgan probably intends to identify him with the son of Aedh, whose feast is Feb. 15, as the Kaldanes have such a name on Jan. 6 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 297, 299; O’Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 219-20; Lanigan, Ch. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 4).

(4) Forandus, bishop of Meath (Taurum) (Four Mast.) or Meath tuirian (Ann. Ult.), died A.D. 756 (Ann. Tg.; Four Mast. A.D. 751; Ann. Ult. A.D. 753), but his place is unrecognised.

FOREBFLATT (Forebflat), daughter of Conna, abbot of Claonbroey, near Granard, co. Longford, died A.D. 780 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 779; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 776, i. 380, n. 4, 381).

(2) Forbhshasach or Forbosach, son of Maoltos, abbot of Roscommon, died A.D. 779 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 778; Four Mast. A.D. 774).

FORBBIUS (Fortius), thirteenth bishop of Le Fruy, succeeding Faustus, and followed by Flavianus, in the southern part of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. ii. 690.) [S. A. B.]

FORCRON (Forconnus), abbot of Cleamacnoise, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's County, died A.D. 688 (Ann. Tg.; Four Mast. A.D. 686). [J. G.]

FORDRED. [Forthere, Forthred.]

FORMARIUS, a bishop of Cingulium (Cingoli) in the 6th century. It is uncertain whether he was the predecessor or the successor of Julianus, who held the see A.D. 544-558, and consequently whether he acceded c. A.D. 510 or 559. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vii. 454, 465.) [R. S. G.]

FORMENIUS (Firmin, Firminus, Parminius), a legendary king of Thrasoe, who had dedicated his kingdom and retired as a hermit among the Alps, at the time that Dathi, son of Flachna or Erinn, led his army as far as the Alps, and perished there by lightning in the beginning of the 5th century. Dathi's death is represented as a divine vengeance upon him for destroying St. Formenius's cell, with its round tower of sand and stones. This legend is given in the Book of Lecan, f. 302 b, and in the Lebor na hUidhir, f. 55, p. b. col. a; it is also quoted at length in Mac Firbis's Genealogies, &c., of the Hy-Finnach (by O'Donovan, pp. 18-23), and referred to by O'Flaherty (Oggia, ii. pt. iii. c. 87, p. 301); Keating calls him Formenius. [J. G.]

FORMERIUS, martyr. [Fermerius.]

FORMINUS, bishop of Bleda (Bleda), c. A.D. 649. He sat in the Lateran council held by Martin I. in that year. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vi. 180.) [R. S. G.]

FORTCHERN (1), son of Follimith, commemorated Feb. 17 and Oct. 11. Of this saint we have several ancient notices, though none of them actually taking the form of a Life: Colgun (Acta SS. 364-65) has a memoir; the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. tom. iii. 13-15) give a Commentarius Criticus, quoting mostly from Ussher, Joceline, and Evynus. Ússher (Eccl. Ant. c. 17. Wks. vi. 418-14) and Todd (St. Patrick, 287-89) quote extracts from Tireschan from the Book of Armagh (fol. 16 a b). St. Fortchern was son of Fedelimhida, son of Laeghnaire king of Ireland, and his mother was Scatha, daughter of a British king. Under St. Patrick he laid aside all earthly pursuits, and gave over the care of his three sheep entrusted to him, and instead became a hermit, and lived in a recessed cave with a small stone bed for his sleep, and a rough stone table for his meal, and a stone seat for his worship of God. (Four Mast. A.D. 449). Michael, John, and other relics of St. Patrick's relics, along with other sacred vessels, were in a place called Rath-sin. At his master Loman's urgent desire before death, he accepted the episcopal charge of the church at Athtrium, now Trim, in Meath, but held it only three days, and then, retiring into entire privacy, built the monastery of Roscrea. St. Finian of Clonard is stated to have stayed with him thirty years before going over to Britain. He is venerated on different days at different places: at Killfortchern in Kildrane, in the present county of Carlow, on Oct. 11, and at Trim in Meath, along with other seventeen patrons, on Feb. 17, as a second dedication. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 273; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 137 n.; Todd, St. Patrick, 150-51, 258-62; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. ir. i. 427-29; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 556, 601-3.)

(3) Son of Deaga or Deague, is classed among the ancient Irish writers, in company with Fleechus or Fiacc, Cenflelaidh, and Maelmuir; some fragments of his writings remain in Bodl. Laud. f. 95, and Cod. Stow. iii. f. 7, vi. f. 4. Tigernach is said to have drawn his materials from him, and Cennflelaidh to have interpolated his poetry. Though some place him as far back as the days of Julius Caesar, he probably belonged to the 7th or 8th century. (O'Conor, Proleg. ii. 66 sq.; and Apul. Nescap. 63, 101.)

FORTHRE (1) (Forter), the second bishop of Sherborne (M. H. B. 620). He succeeded Alvin as bishop, whose death occurred in 709, and was alive at the time when Bede completed his history (Bede, H. E. v. 18, 23); the venerable historian describes him as a man very learned in Holy Scripture. He ruled his diocese from 709 to 737, in which year he went with queen Frithgith of Wessex to Rome (Chr. Z. H. B. 328), after which no more is heard of him. During this long time his name frequently appears in charters; in 712 as "famulus famularum Dei," he was a benefactor to Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 63; Mon. Angli. i. 47); in 716 he attested the act of the council of Clovesho by which Withrede's privilege was confirmed (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300); his name is attached to two doubtful grants of Iene to Glastonbury in 725 (K. C. D. 73, 74), and to a similar charter of Ethelheard dated in 729 (Rh. 76). Glastonbury was locally within his diocese, and the finity of his date was a great convenience to these writers of these documents. A grant to Abingdon (Rh. 81), which purports to have been signed by Forther "in Banesinga villa," is scarcely more trustworthy. There is also a charter of the date of archbishop Notherl, which is attested both by Forther and by his successor Herewald, a conjunction which, considering the circumstances of Forther's resignation, raises a presumption in favour of its genuineness (K. C. D. 82). More interesting and undoubtedly trustworthy are the notices of Forther which occur among the remains of St. Boniface; one of these is a letter of Britwald, archbishop of Canterbury, addressed to Forther, in which he beg him to insist that Beorwald, abbat of Glastonbury, should release a captive girl, for whom her brother Eppa was ready to pay a ransom of 300 solidi (Ep. Bonif. ed. Würthwein, No. 155; Mon. Moguntina, ed. Jaffé, pp. 48, 49). The other is a letter of bishop Daniel of Winchester, to Forther, referring to him a newly ordained deacon, named Merwala (ed. Würth. Ep. 148; Mon. Mog. p. 99).

FORTHRED (1) (Fordred, Forthebræc), a Northumbrian abbot, who is mentioned in a letter from pope Paul I. to Eadbert king of Northumbria, in A.D. 757 or 758. It appears from it that Eadbert had deprived Forthred of three monasteries, which had been given to him by a certain abbess, viz., Stanninggrave, Cucha-walda, and Domenasthu, and bestowed them on a person of the name of Moll, Forthred's brother. Forthred went to Rome to complain, and Paul writes to Eadbert (archbishop Egbert's name being also inserted in the letter) desiring him to make restitution. The places referred to are probably Stonegrave in Ryedale, co. York, where there are some very early remains, the neighbouring church of Coxwold, and Jarrow on the Tyne, which is situated at the mouth of a rivulet called the Don (cf. Symeon, Chron. 33, and n.). The letter is printed in Wilkins, i. 144, and in Haddan and Stubbs, i. 394-4.

It is improbable, from the difference in dates, that this Forthred is identical with a Mercian abbot of the same name, who died A.D. 803 or 805 (cf. Haddan and Stubbs, ut supra, or with Forthred, a priest, to whom Alcuin, about the same time, gave a general letter of recommendation where he was setting out for Rome (Ep. Alcuin. ed. Jaffé, p. 894). [J. R.]

FORTHRED (2), Mercian abbot, whose death is noted in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle under the year 903 (M. H. E. 341), to be corrected to 805. In the list of signatures to the act of Clovesho in 803 Forthred appears as a priest and abbat of the diocese of Leicester (Kemble, C. D. 1024). There is among Alcuin's letters (Mon. Alcuin, ed. Jaffé, p. 894) an epistle of commendation written in favour of a priest named Fordred, who was going on pilgrimage; this possibly refers to the abbat. The earlier notice of an abbat, Forthred in Northumbria, can scarcely be referred to him. (See No. 2.) Forthred's name is attached to charters from 790 to 803 (K. C. D. 159, 161, 166, 170, 171, 172, 173, 175, 185, 1810, and 1820.)

FORTIS (1) (St.), martyr, and, according to a vague tradition, an early bishop of Bordeaux. Venantius Fortunatus, in a poem on Leontius, archbishop of the same diocese, tells him "tertius a decimo huic urbi antites haberes" (Lib. i. cap. 15, Migne, Patr. Lat. i. 125, 78). As we have only eight names before that of Leontius, FORTIS (3), a Donatist bishop mentioned in the history of the inquiry before Zenophilus. He endeavoured to reconcile Silvanus, Donatist bishop of Cirta, to Nundinarus, a desecram of the same church, who accused him of "tradition" and other crimes. He wrote letters to this effect to Silvanus, and to the clergy and elders of the church, and received one to the same effect from another bishop, Sabinus, imploring him, as a personal friend of Silvanus, to lose no time in effecting the reconciliation before the festival of Easter. (Mon. Vet. Dom. iv. pp. 174-176, ed. Oberthür.) [NUNDINARUS, SILVANUS.] [H. W. F.]

FORTIS (3), Donatist bishop of Cedia, in Numidias, who joined with others in an address to Primianus and other Donatist bishops, requesting them to undertake the management on their side of the controversy to be held at Carthage, A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Dom. pp. 429-432, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. F.]

FORTIS (4), bishop of Caputcella in Maurétania Caesariensis; banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 58 in Migne, Patr. Lat. ivii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 120.) [L. D.]

FORTIS (5), archbishop of Milan, 641 to 643, lived at Genoa, and probably died there, as did several of his predecessors, after the invasion of the Lombards. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 132; Ughelli, Itali. Sacr. Inv. iv. 137.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTIS (6), bishop of Agga (Aggya) in the proconsular province of Africa, signed the letter of his patriarch to Paulinus of Constantine, nople, to warn him against the errors of the Monothelites, which he was favouring, A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 942; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 71.) [L. D.]

FORTIUS, bishop of Le Puy. [FORNIUS.]

FORTUNA, martyr, Carth. A.D. 250. [ARISTO.]

FORTUNATA, Oct. 14, virgin and martyr at Caesarea in Palestine, under the pontificate Urbanus, in the Diocletian persecution. She suffered with Carponius Evaristus and Prisciansus, her brothers. Her body is said to have been translated to Naples, out of the records of which church Baronius transferred her name to the Roman martyrology. He tells us that her relics were found at Naples, a.d. 1561, in the church of St. Gaudioso. (Mart. Hieron.) Ussuarus writes the name Fortunatus, and commemorates him as bishop of Tudertum. He also notes another of the same name on Oct. 15. [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATIANUS (1), bishop of Assurac in Mr. Procons. Lapsed (as a sacrificator; arm.) in Decian persecution; endeavoured to resume office without penance, though admissible even with penance only to lay communion. Pamphlets, copied by Fell, calls him a Novatianist; plainly wrong. Cyprian (Ep. 65) insists on his being repelled, and counsels other lapse against forming a sect round him. [EPACTUS (3)]. [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATIANUS (2), bishop of Aquileia in the middle of the 4th century; known to us chiefly through St. Jerome, who includes him in his catalogue of Viri Illustres (c. 97). He was born in Africa, but became bishop of Aquileia in the reign of Constantius. In 343 he was present at Sardica (Mansi, iii. 39). He was a man of considerable influence, and judged less hardly of the semi-Arian opinions than most of the Catholics. He persuaded Liberius, the bishop of Rome, who was ready to go into exile for his faith, that he might properly subscribe the formula of the council of Sirmium; and he even went so far as to consent to the condemnation passed upon Ananias in the Council of Milan (A.D. 355. See Ceiller, iii. 592). He wrote a commentary on the Gospels, divided into sections or chapters, in an abrupt, unpolished style. Jerome condemns him vehemently ("detestabilis habetur") for the advice given to Liberius; but in his earlier work, in the desert, Jerome highly valued his commentary, which he begged Paulus of Concordia to send him in the year 374 (Ep. 10, ed. Vall.), calling it "a pearl from the Gospels, the word of the Lord which is tried as silver." [F. H. F.]

FORTUNATIANUS (3), bishop of Capua in the Byzacena, a town to be distinguished from the one of the same name in Numidias; present at the council held at Carthage by Gratian, A.D. 349: as his name occurs first among the Byzacene bishops he is supposed to have been primate of his province. (Mansi, i. 153; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 119.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATIANUS (4), bishop of Sicca Veneria, an important town of Numidia, on a branch of the river Bagradas (Reff, Shaw, p. 95), perhaps the same person as the bearer of the letter to Paulinus (see No. 12). St. Augustine wrote a letter to him requesting him on his behalf to ask pardon of a bishop, not named, whom he thought that he had offended by some expressions in a letter concerning the seeing God in a merely human or physical sense. This Augustine declared to be impossible, for God is a spirit, and therefore not limited to time or space, but if his language had seemed to be in any way scornful or derisive, he desired to apologize. He proceeds to explain his meaning, viz., "that God can only be seen on earth in a spiritual, or, to use his own expression, an invisible manner. He quotes on his own side Ambrose, Jerome, Athanasius, and Gregory Nazianzen, and shews that any other view of the question must savour of anthropomorphism. After the resurrection the human body will cease to be animal and become spiritual, but into any minute explanation of the matter he professes himself incompetent to enter, or to quote any authority on the point. "We know," he says, "that we shall see God "as he is" (1 John iil. 2), and that He will be "all in all" (1 Cor. xv. 28), and that without holiness no man can see Him (Heb
FORTUNATUS

Fortunatus is a presbyter of Tagaste, by whom St. Augustine sent a letter to Paulinus and Thrasibius, sometime between A.D. 394 and 410. (Aug. Ep. 80.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (18), a heathen, yet advocate for his sister St. Victoria in the Diocletian persecution in Numidia. He tried to gain his sister off from death by suggesting that she was merely misled for a time, but she repudiated the evasive suggestion, and disavowed even his fraternal relationship except as he should keep the commandments of God. There is no notice of his conversion. (Baronius, Ann. Eccl. a. 303, ivii.; Bell. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 518-529; Ruinart, Act. S. Mart. 389. All authorities follow the Acta S. Saturnini et Soc. Mart. in Numidica. See also Ceillier, Antverp. sacrés, iii. 21.) [J. G.]

FORTUNATUS (1), bishop of Thucuboris in Proc. Prov. of Africa, near Carthage. He attended all Cyprian’s synods of which we have lists (his seniority identifying him), viz., Syn. Carth. 2 sub Cyp. de Pace, A.D. 252. (Ep. 57.) Syn. 4 de Basilide, A.D. 254. (Ep. 67.) Syn. 5 de Bap. I, A.D. 255 (Ep. 70), and spoke seventeenth among the eighty-seven bishops of Syn. vii. de Bap. iii., possibly the same as (2) and (3). [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (2), to whom Cyprian’s De Exhortatione Martyrii is addressed, is possibly the preceding. [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (3), the colleague of Codonius in the embassy to Rome (Cyp. Ep. 44 and 45). From the neighbourhood of the bishop of Thucuboris (No. 1) to Carthage, and his frequent presence there, one may conjecture that he was his colleague. [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (4), the African bishop mentioned in Cyp. Ep. 50, is more likely to have come from the neighbourhood of Carthage. [A. H.]

FORTUNATUS (5), though he is named in some lists as an early bishop of Aquileia, it appears doubtful whether there was any bishop of that or similar name before Fortunatus, who was present, 343, at the synod of Sardica. [FORTUNATUS (3).] (Ugelli, It. Sacr. v. 31; Cappellatti, Le Chiese d’Ital. viii. 34-27.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (6), bishop of Caesarea, the metropolis of Mauretania Caesariensis, present at the council of Arles A.D. 314. His name is inserted among the Gallic bishops. (Mansi, ii. 477; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 114.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATUS (7), bishop of Dionysiana in the Byzacene province of Africa, present at the council held at Cartharussum in the same province, which is mentioned several times by Augustine, where the Maximianists condemned Primian, the rival Donatist bishop of Carthage A.D. 393. (Mansi, iii. 847; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 151.) [L. D.]
FORTUNATUS (8), probably ninth bishop of Naples, c. A.D. 344. He is recognized as bishop of Naples in a circular addressed to him and many others by the Arian bishops assembled in the "pseudo-synod" of Philippopolis in 343. He seems to have died before A.D. 359. (Mansi, iii. 129; Ughelli, Itat. Sac. vi. 42.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (9), the name of six bishops present at the Carthaginian conference of 411, viz. the bishop of Capoe (Gafsa, Ant. Itin. 71, 7), an important town south of Numidia; of Undesita, or Bajesita in Numidia; of Abenass in proconsular Africa; of Casa Caralense in Numidia; (Donatist) of Vescorri, a town of Mauretanian Sitifensis; of Rusucurris, Rusucurro, or Rusucurium (Dellis, Ant. Itin. 16, 4), a seaport town of Mauretania Caesariensis. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 399, 404, 405, 419, 421, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (10), bishop of Cirta or Constantinae, chief town of Numidia, associated with St. Augustine, for whom he was present together with Alpius (orr. loc. Absentius) and Augustine, when some of the clergy of Cirta put into their hands a letter, written no doubt by Pelitian, Donatist bishop of Cirta, to his own clergy concerning the claims of Donatists to the same letters which a Donatist presbyter, at the command, he said, of an angel, placed in the hands of Generousus, a Christian gentleman, of whom we hear elsewhere as consular of Numidia. To this letter Augustine replied in his own name and in those of Alpius and Fortunatus. (Ep. 53; 1 Petil. l. i. p. 459; Eutrop. xiv. p. 326–329; Cellarius, i. p. 390.) He also appears to have joined in a letter concerning Pelagianism, sent to pope Innocent by the council of Milevis, A.D. 416. (Aug. Epp. 53, 176.) [Favennius (1).] [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (11), bishop, to whom Primaus appears to have written three books (not extant) upon heresies. (Primaus, Opp. Prolog. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiv. 407; Tilmont, Mem. Hist. Eccl. xxiii. 54.) [J. G.]

FORTUNATUS (13), the name of four bishops, viz. of Anagni, of Foligno, of Value near Solmona in Abruzzo, and of Sessa (Susian) in Campania, present at the 1st, 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th synods under pope Symmachus, from 493 to 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen) who accepts, with a slight alteration, the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. (Mansi, viii. 234, 253, 268, 299, 315.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (14), bishop of Catania (Catana), c. A.D. 514. He was sent with Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, and others by pope Hormisdas on an embassy to the emperor Anastasius in the year 515. (Mansi, Concilia, viii. 389; Jaffé, Regesta Pontific. 65.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (15), bishop of Petput (Pupitii), in proconsular Africa, present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 595. (Morelli, Africa Christian. i. 258; Mansi, viii. 645.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATUS (16), bishop of Todi ("Te

FORTUNATUS (17), VENANTius HON-
ORIUS Clementianus, bishop of Poitiers, and the last representative of Latin poetry in Gaul, was born about the year 530 at Cenéa, the modern Ceneda, in the neighborhood of Tar-visium (Trevixo). (Vit. Sanct. Martin. lib. iv. 698.) Nothing is certain about his family, but he seems to have resided at an early age at Aquileia, where he came under the influence of one Paulus, who was instrumental in his conversion. Paulus Diaconus (Hist. Langob. lib. ii. 25) relates that he studied grammar, rhetoric, and poetry at Ravenna. Here he came almost blind, but was restored to sight by the oil of a lamp which burned at the altar of St. Martin of Tours in the church of St. Peter and St. John. In fulfillment of a vow made in gratitude for his recovery, he set out on a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Martin of Tours about 565. He himself relates in his famous moral poem, the Life of St. Martin. Quitting Italy, he crossed the Alps, and, passing into Austrasia, visited the court of king Siegfried, by whom he was hospitably entertained, and for whom he composed an epithalamium, on the occasion of his marriage with Brunehault, couched in terms of extravagant flattery, which reproduce the expressions of disgust leveled at the Northern barbarians in the dedication of his poems to Pope Gregory. Siegfried helped him on his way to Tours, and assigned him Sigvaldus as a guide (Moselet. ii. 20). Euphrondus was at this time bishop of Tours, with whom, on arriving at his destination, Fortunatus entered into close friendship (Moselet. iii. 1–3). After fulfilling his vow he continued to travel in Gaul, receiving everywhere the admiration and sympathy of the best Gallo-Roman society, and employing his time in correspondence with his former hosts, or in the composition of those fugitive poems which form the staple of his works. The disturbed state of his native country, owing to the incursions of the Lombards, seems to have been the prime cause of his prolonged sojourn in Gaul, but an additional inducement was the society of Rhegond of Poitiers, for whom he conceived a Platonic attachment, which the imaginative genius of Aug. Thierry (Écrits mérovingiens, tom. ii. rec. vi.) has invested with a romantic air, but hardly warranted by the generally heartless and sensual tone of the poet's writings. Rhegund was the daughter of Bertarius, king of the Thuringians, who, having been espoused against her will to Lothair I., king of Neustria, had separated from him, and retired in 550 to Poitiers, where she founded the convent of St. Grol, more for purposes of literary than of religious seclusion, appointing her own domestic Agnes the first abbess. At what date Fortunatus visited Poitiers is uncertain, but it was no more than natural that a visitor of his literary eminence should find welcome in the cultivated society of St. Croix, or have been induced to take up his residence as chaplain and almoner to the convenant. Here he had abundant opportunity for indulging his literary and social tastes. Rhadegund, being in close relation with the most distinguished men of the time, may have served him in turn as poet-chaplain in correspondence with them, but despatched him from time to time on delicate missions, for which his courtly manners qualified him in no ordinary degree. In this way he became intimate with Gregory of Tours, Syagrius of Antan, Felix of Nantes, Germanus of Paris, Arrius of Clermont, and many others, to whom his poems are addressed. His leisure hours were employed in composing Lives of the Saints, Theological Treatises, and Hymns, among which latter are to be found the famous "Vexilla Regis," composed for a religious ceremony at Poitiers, and the "Pange Lingua," which, though generally ascribed to his pen, was more probably composed, as Sidonius has shewn (Sidon. in Not. ad Epist. Sidon. Apoll. lib. iii. ep. 4), by Claudianus Mamertus. After residing for some time at the convenant of St. Croix, he was ordained priest, and, subsequently to the death of Rhadegund in 597, succeeded Plato in the bishopric of Poitiers; but this dignity he only attained shortly before his own death, at the commencement of the seventh century.

The works of Fortunatus Venantius comprise:

(1) Eleven Books of Miscellanies, chiefly in elegiac verse, being a collection of fugitive pieces upon a great variety of subjects, interesting for the light they occasionally throw upon the manners of the time, or upon the history of art (Miscell. lib. 12; lib. iii. 13), but from a literary point of view all but worthless. Among his works are to be found two prose treatises of doubtful authenticity on the Lord's Prayer, and an epitomized version of the Aquitanian creed of Rufinus.

(2) The Life of St. Martin of Tours in four Books, consisting of 2245 hexameter lines. This was hastily composed in the space of two months, and is little more than a metrical version of Severus Sulpicius's incomparably better prose. In the fourth book the saint is represented as prescribing to the poet a pilgrimage to his own relics at Tours, to which fiction we owe the latter's description of his travels.

(3) An elegiac poem in three cantos, unless they are three distinct poems, written in the character, and evidently under the inspiration of Rhadegund. The first, entitled "De Excilio Thuringiae," is dedicated to her cousin, Amalfred (or Hermafrod); the second is a panegyric of the emperor Justin II. and the empress Sophin, who had presented Rhadegund with a piece of the true cross. The third is addressed to Arbeus, the young son of Amalfred, upon the death of his father.

(4) To these have been added in recent times — (i) a collection of 150 elegiac verses addressed to Rhadegund and Agnes, which was discovered by M. Guérard in the Royal Library at St. German, and published by him in the twelfth volume of his "Notices des Manuscrits." (ii) A short epigram "Ad Theuclildem," brought to light by Mal in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and first published in his Epistolae.

(5) The Lives of Eleven Saints—St. Hilary of Poitiers, St. German of Paris, St. Aulin of Angers, St. Peter of Avranches, St. Rhadegund of Poitiers, St. Amant of Rodes, St. Médard of Noyon, St. Remy of Rheims, St. Lubin of Chartres, St. Mauril of Angers, and St. Marcel of Paris—but the first book of the Life of St. Hilary and the lives of the three last named saints are to be attributed in all probability to another name (see next article). To these must be added an account of the martyrdom at Paris (A.D. viii. ed. Octob.) of St. Denys, St. Rusticus, and St. Eleutherius.

The following works of Fortunatus are lost:—

(1) The Life of St. Severinus (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Confess. c. 45).

He is also said to have composed an itinerary of his Travels, and a treatise upon the Art of Reigning addressed to the Empress St. Empress.

The poetry of Venantius Fortunatus represents the expiring effort of the Latin Muse in Gaul. Even the poet himself felt the decadence not merely of language, but of thought, which characterizes his verse:—

"Aet ego sensus inopis . . .
Faeco graviss. sermo leviss. ratione pigrissens, Mente hebes, arte carens, usus rudi, ore nee exper."

Vit. S. Martin. v. 29-30.

and it is difficult to dissent from the severe judgment he has passed upon himself. His style is pedantic, his taste bad, his grammar and pro- sody seldom correct for many lines together. Two of his longer poems, however, display a simplicity and pathos which are foreign to his usual style. One of these treats of the marriage of Galesuintha, sister of Bruneauht, with Chilpere; the other is the Elegy upon the Fall of Thuringia. For what is of real merit in these two pieces are in all probability in the genius of Rhadegund rather than to any sudden access of inspiration in the poet himself.

The first edition of the works of Fortunatus was published at Cagliari in 1573, but this contained only the hymns. The earliest edition which can lay claim to any completeness is that of the Jesuit Christopher Brower, published in 4to at Mainz in 1634. The best is that of Michael Angelo Luchi, 2 vols. 4to, Rome, 1786, which is reprinted in Migne's Patrologia, vol. Lxxxvi., together with an appendix containing the discoveries of Guérard and Mazière.

FORTUNATUS (18), a bishop, see unknown, who has been confounded with Venantius Fortunatus bishop of Poitiers. He was born at Vercellae, migrated from Lombardy into Gaul, and became intimate with St. Germanus, who induced him to write the Life of St. Martinus. He was in all probability the author of the first book of the Life of St. Hilary of Poitiers, and of three other lives of saints ascribed to his more distinguished namesake. He died at Celles, in the diocese of Sens, curs. A.D. 569. (Rivet, Hist. Lit. de la France, tom. iii. p. 298.) [E. M. Y.]

FORTUNATUS (28), bishop of Pola, c. A.D. 806, succeeding Peter. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 805.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (27), bishop of Trieste in 788; translated to the patriarchate of Grado in 802, succeeding John (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 682). In 803 he received the pallium from pope Leo III. His life was an eventful one. The murderers of his predecessor suspected him, probably correctly, of intending to avenge his death, and forced him to fly from his see. He went to France to Charles the Great, to whom he accused his enemies of partisanship for the emperor Constantine. Charles sent him back with a charter of confirmation given in the third year of his empire. Meanwhile his office had been usurped by a deacon named John, and he appears to have fled again into France. However, in 818 he obtained from Louis the Pious a charter confirming him in the patriarchate. In 821 he was accused of favouring the designs of Ludwig, king of Pamphylia, against the monarch of Constantinople. There he remained three years, till 824, when he presented himself before Louis with other ambassadors from the emperor Michael. The king sent him to Rome to clear himself of the charge of treason before the pope, but he died soon after while still in France. He is described as a man of unassuming and distinguished virtue, and he is said to have conferred many benefits on his church, partly of his own munificence, partly by his influence with Charles the Great. His successor in the patriarchate was Venerius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 1180; Einhard, Annal. an. 805, 821, 824 in Pertz, i. p. 231, 208, 212; Bar. xii. 805, x.; Pag. xiv. an. 821, xviii. an. 824, xiv.)

Mabillon identifies him with the Fortunatus who, as abbot of Moyen Moutier (Mon. Media nense), disputed with his monks as to the distribution of the revenues of the monastery, to the administration of the whole of which he laid claim. Scharndus, abbot of the monastery of St. Michael in the same house, was deposed, having failed to arrange the quarrel, which he did on the terms of the monks receiving a portion of the revenues for their due sustenance and the abbot taking the rest. The quarrel broke out afresh in the time of Hiamundus, his successor. (Protharri Epist. iii. in Migne, Pat. Lat. ci. 865; Mabillon, Annales, xxvi. n. 83; xcvii. n. 827; xxix. n. 64; tom. ii. pp. 340, 414, 491.) [S. A. B.]

FORTUNATUS (28), July 12, deacon of the church at Aquileia, and martyr there under Nero, with his bishop Hermagoras. (Hermagoras.) (Mart. Usuardi, Adonis.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (29), April 33, deacon and martyr at Valence. (Felix (203).) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (30)—Aug. 8. Martyr at Salerno in Italy with Caesius and Anthes. They suffered under Maximin, A.D. 304, or thereabout, Leontius being proconsul. Their acts are extant, but in a very corrupt shape. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; AA. SS. Bull. Aug. p. 163-189.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (28), bishop of Sarzina [now united to Bertinoro], 702-730. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 488.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (26), bishop of Pola, c. A.D. 806, succeeding Peter. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 805.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (31), Aug. 23, deacon of the church at Belgrade, and martyr there with another deacon, Donatus, and several others of the clergy in the Diocletian persecution under Victorinus, president of Mysia. (Ferrarius, Cat. SS. [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (32), martyred with cruel tortures with his brother Felix (FELIX (207)), at Aquileia, in the reign of Diocletian; commemorated June 11. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

FORTUNATUS (33), martyred with Septimius, both of them readers, at Venusia, in the reign of Diocletian; commemorated Oct. 24. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

FORTUNATUS (34), Oct. 15, martyr at Rome, on the Aurelian Way (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuard.) at Capua with Luplius (Ferrarii Cat. SS.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (35), Jan. 9, martyr at Smyrna with Vitalis and Revocatus (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuard., Wandalbert); in Africa (Mart. Hieron.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (36), Feb. 2, martyr at Rome with several others. A curious instance of the way in which the number of martyrs was increased by the mistake of transcribers occurs in connexion with this name. Canisius, in his edition of the Martyrologium Germanicum, reads: "Eodem die diep ipse in urbe, triginta milium martyrum qui in persecutione Diocletiani coronati sunt." Canisius copied from Galesinus who used a coder which read thus: "et xxxiii. alienum," and which he took as "xxx." Mart. Hieron. seems to place their martyrdom on the Flaminian Way, at the 17th milestone from the city, a place now called Possambrote. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Hieron., Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (37), subdeacon of Carthage (Cyp. Ep. 84.) [Philumenus.] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (38), subdeacon of Carthage, bearer of Ep. 35 to Rome. (Cyp. Ep. 86.) [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (39), presbyter of Carthage [Donatus], one of the five who opposed the election of Cyprian (Cyp. Ep. 59), who subsequently became the pseudo-bishop of the lax party about Felicissimus, on the question of the lapsed (Ep. 14); consecrated by the excommunicated heretic bishop Privatus of Lambæae. [Cyprian.] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (40), deacon of the church of Nazianzus, and bearer of a letter from Gregory his bishop, to Alypius governor of Cappadocia; in an accompanying letter St. Gregory very highly recommends his deacon's probity, and recommends him to the government's good offices. (Greg. Naz. Ep. 84, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 155-7; Caillier, Auteurs sacrés, v. 254.) [J. G.]

FORTUNATUS (41), a Donatist presbyter, of whom it was alleged at the council of Carthage, a.d. 394, that Primianus had cast him into a sewer because he had baptized sick persons. (Primianus.) (Aug. S. in Ps. 36, 20; Mon. Vet. Dom. p. 256, ed. Oebertiir.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (42), subdeacon, by whom pope Celestine wrote to Patroclus bishop of Arles, a.d. 428. (Jaffé, Regest. Pontif.; Ceillier, Aut. sacr. viii. 130.) [C. H.]

FORTUNUS (43), abbot of the monastery of St. Laurentius and St. Zeno, at Cesena in Romagna. Gregory the Great writes to Marinius, abbot of Raveonna, desiring that he shall be restored to his monastery, if it be found that he has been unjustly deposed. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xiv. indicii. vii. epist. 6. Migne, lxvii. 1308.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (44), abbot of a monastery called "Balneum Ciceronis" ("at Puteoliis, aut in agro Tusculano"), gave to Gregory the Great some of the materials for his Dialogues. (Dialog. lib. i. 4, 10; Migne, lxvii. 165, 208.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS, deacons who were martyrs. See Nos. 28, 29, 81.

FORTUNATUS (45), one of the bearers of the letter of Clemens Romanus. [Clemens Romanus, i. 556, col. 2.] [G. S.]

FORTUNATUS (46), Anastasius, prefect of the legion of Trajan, at the martyrdom of Marcellus the centurion, a.d. 298. (Ruiniart, Acta Sinc. Mart. p. 303, 2nd ed.) [C. H.]

FORTUNATUS (47), a member of the Donatist congregation at Taca, a town of Numidia, of which Verisimus was the bishop. (Mon. Vet. Dom. p. 401, ed. Oebertiir.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (48), a Manichean presbyter with whom Augustine held a public disputation, at the request of his fellow-citizens, Donatists, and others, in the baths of Socinus at Hippo, August 28, a.d. 392. (Vasidianus, Vit. Aug. in Aug. Op. i. 38, ed. Migne, Patr.; Aug. Retract. ii. 611; Disp. contr. Fortunat. lib. viii. 111.) Fortunatus had a numerous following at Hippo, but being worsted by his great antagonist, he was compelled to fly from the city. He was soon succeeded, however, by another presbyter who seems to have been Felix. (Aug. Ep. 79. w.s. ii. 272.) [Faustus (34), Felix (233)] [T. W. D.]

FORTUNIO, martyr, Carthage, a.d. 250. [Aristo.] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNUS (1), Donatist bishop of Tubur-sicus or Tuburiscia, a town of Numidia, with whom St. Augustine held a controversy c. a.d. 397, of which he gives an account in a letter to the Donatists, Eulogius, Glorius and Felix (Ep. 44). Partly in consequence of the tumult, partly because of the unwillingness of the reporters to do their duty, no proper report was made of the controversy. Augustine therefore transcribed from memory as much as he was able to report, and laid it before his correspondents. The arguments used by Fortunius to support the principle of his sect appear to have been—(1) its universality; (2) the divine command to eschew false prophets, and the false charge so often made and refuted of the "tradition" on the part of Felix of Aptungus; (3) the complicity of foreign churches in the cruelties of Macarius; (4) a letter said to have been addressed by the council of Forty Martyrs, the

Sardicas, A.D. 347, to the African bishops of the Donatist communion. To this Augustine replied by showing the absence of authority to support this document, which was in truth of Arian origin. He also showed that the Donatists were not the only persons who had suffered persecution, and that their having been exposed to it was no proof of their superior holiness. After proving that evil persons are frequently tolerated by God, as for example the Traitor himself Judas Iscariot, Augustine enforced his favourite argument that on earth there must be toleration of evil until the time of final separation. When Fortunius excommunicated Genethius, a former bishop of Hippo, for his forbearance towards Donatism, Augustine remarked that on Donatist principles even he ought to have been rechaptised. After some further discussion, Augustine proposed that a conference should be held of ten persons on each side in some quiet place, and he undertook that all necessary documents should be forthcoming. (Aug. Ep. 44.)

The name of Fortunius is mentioned as one of the bishops present at the council of Bagais, A.D. 394, and it is very probable that this was the same person as the one mentioned above. (Aug. cont. Cresc. iii. 53, iv. 10.) [H. W. P.]

Fortunianus (2), a person unknown, who had married a woman, Ursus, probably before the wars of Avaric. She was carried off into captivity, and afterwards returned to find Fortunianus married to another woman named Restituta. The question referred to pope Innocent was, which of the two was his wife. In his letter to Probus (Ep. 38, Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 609), dated by Jaffé (Regesta, 23) between the years 402 and 417, Innocent decided, "fide Catholica suffragante," that Ursus, still alive and undisposed, was his only wife. (Cellarius, Acta martyrum, vii. 324.) [J. G.]

Fortunianus (4), bishop of Eugubium (Gubbio), A.D. 603. He succeeded St. Gaudenius or, according to Uggelli, Gaudioso. Cappellotti doubts whether there was a bishop of Gubbio of that name. (Uggelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 677; Cappellotti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 586.) [R. S. G.]

Fortunianus (5), bishop of Cellae in the Byzacena province, a name common to several African towns, subscribed the letter of his province to Constantine the son of Heraclius, against the errors of the Monothelites A.D. 641, which was read at the first Lateran council. (Mansi, x. 927; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 154.) [L. D.]

Fortunianus (6), bishop of Optina in the proconsular province of Africa, signed the letter of the synod of his province to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, against the errors of the Monotheletes, which he favoured, A.D. 646. This letter was read at and the first Lateran council, 649. (Mansi, x. 940; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 250.) [L. D.]

Fortunianus (7), bishop of Carthage. There are no data for a precise chronology of his episcopate. Morcelli (Afr. Chr. iii. 363) makes his succession to Dominicus, after an interval, in 630, somewhat confused. In 666, he is believed to have imbibed Monothelite opinions under the influence of Pyrrhus, who had then recently come as an exile into Africa and was a zealous proselytizer (Morcelli, 375). In the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, a number of Fortunianus were recognized as bishop of the Church of St. Sophia during the patriarchate of Paulus (Mansi, xi. 594 c). This visit must have occurred before 648, when Paulus was deposed for Monothelitism. Morcelli (377) puts it in 646. His fraternizing with Paulus at Constantinople was regarded by his brethren in Africa as an open profession of heresy, and they seem to have construed his absence as a desertion of his church. A council was held without him in 646 at Carthage, the senior bishop, Galusus of Pups, presiding, and Monothelite doctrine was condemned. From that time Fortunianus disappears, and Morcelli commences the episcopate of his successor. [T. W. D.]

Fortunianus (also called Fortunatus). April 21, a martyr at Alexandria with Aratus, a presbyter, Felix and Vitalis. According to Mercurio Hieron., Felix was son of Arator. In later martyrlogies the ascetic views prevalent about clerical celibacy converted the word "filli" into "silvii," and another martyr was thus added to the list. (Marti. Hieron., Usuardi, Adonis.) [G. T. S.]

Forty Martyrs, the. The following groups occur under this title:—

(1) Forty soldiers, March 9, who suffered under Licinius, 320, at Sebast in Armenia. A list of their names is given in the martyrlogy of Adu under March 11. For their various festivals see art. Sebastian, Forty Martyrs of, in the Dict. Chr. Antiq. They were young, brave, and noted for their services. The Emperor, having ordained that the military police of the cities should offer sacrifices, the governor called upon these forty to comply with the law. They refused, and withstood every attempt by bribe or threat to influence their resolve. Thereupon a new punishment was devised. They were immersed for a whole night in a frozen pond in the midst of the city, and, to render their sufferings the more acute, a hot bath was placed within their sight ready for any who might choose to avail themselves of it, their doing so however being the sign of apostasy. The trial was too great for one. He left the pond and flung himself into the bath, gaining, however, nothing thereby, for as soon as he touched the hot water he died. The number of forty was not however broken. The sentinel who watched the bath had a vision. He saw angels descend and distribute rewards to all who were in the pond save to the one unhappy apostate. The guard at once stripped off his clothing and took the vacant place in the pond. The next morning they were all taken in vehicles and flung into fires. There was one Melitio, younger and more vigorous than the rest, whose resolution they thought they might possibly yet shake. His mother, however, who was present, with her own hands placed him in the executioner's cart, exhorting him thus: "Go, my son, finish this happy voyage with thy comrades, that thou mayst not be the last presented to God." Their relics were carefully preserved and carried to various cities, where many churches were built in their honour. The mother Emelma, and the sister Matrina, of St. Aedh, are said to have been buried for their monastery near the village of Annas in Pontus, where already a church had been built in their honour (Greg. Nys. Vit. S. Macrin.). Sozomen (H. E. ii. 2) tells a strange story about the adventures of another set of their relics in addition to the authorities above quoted, of the Frisii, Ablact. Sacr. t. i. p. 599, in Sicily, Scolamense. Their popularity throughout the entire East has ever been very great (cf. Dr. Zireck, Geschichte der Bulgaren). In Burton's Unexplored Syria, App. ii., a church in their honour is noted at Huns, near Damascus; cf. also Melchior de Vogüé, Les Églises de la Terre Sainte, p. 367.

(2) Another set of Forty Martyrs in Persia, 375, is commemorated on May 20 (Assemani, Mart. Orient. i. 141). Among them were the bishops Abdas and Ebed-Jesu. (Ebed-Jesu) (Ceiller, iii. 82, 336; Bas. Mon.)

(3) Under Dec. 24 Forty Virgins Martyrs under the emperor Decius at Antioch in Syria are noted in Mart. Hieron., Adon, Usuard. [G. T. S.]

FOSSONIUS (Fossonius, Corotius), fifth bishop of Vermandois, between Maximus and Asternus, or Fraternus. The first eleven bishops of this see are mere names undated; the twelfth was living in A.D. 511. [Gall. Chr. i. 975.]

FOTAIDE is the name given in the Four Masts, A.D. 432, to the father of Culfhran, father of St. Patrick, but he is usually called Fothius in the Lives. [J. G.]

FOTHAD, the canonist, receives special honour from the Irish annalists for his efforts on behalf of the clergy. He was a teacher at Aranaigh and abbot of Farman Mura, now Fobban (Upper), in the barony of Inisheenow West, co. Donegal; he had been tutor of Aedh Oirdnide, monarch of Erin A.D. 793–817, to whom on his accession he dedicated a Royal Precept or Rule of Government, a vigorous poem of seventy-two stanzas, still preserved in the Book of Lismore. He appears to have been, or some time after, been taken by Aedh into the number of his counsellors. When Aedh assembled his forces consisting of clergy and laity, and led them into Leinster as far as Dun-Cuair (now Rathcore, a small village in the barony of Lower Moyensrath, co. Meath.—Four Mast. i. 408 n. 2), a controversy arose between the king and northern clergy whom he had compelled to accompany him to the war, the case was referred by king and people to the decision of St. Fothad. The clergy objected to being called to the field at the will of the king, and when the dispute was submitted to Fothad and the bishop of Armagh, he decided in the metrical sentence or "canon" from which his name "na canois" is said to have been derived, exempting the clergy from all compulsory military service. And this sentence, being acquiesced in by king Aedh, continued ever after to be the rule throughout Ireland. It was as follows (from the Four Masts, by O'Donovan, l. 409):

"The Church of the living God, let her alone, waste her not, Let her light be apart, as best it ever was. Every true monk, who is of a pure conscience, For the Church to which is due let him labour like every servant. Every soldier from that out, who is without [religious] rule or obedience, Is permitted to aid the great Aedh, son of Niall. This is the true rule, neither more nor less: Let every one serve in his vocation without murmur or complaint."

(O'Curry, Man. Cust. Anc. Irish, ii. 61, 95, 175–76; O'Conor, Rev. Hibern. Scriptor. iv. 132, 202, and Epist. Nuncup. 55; Reeves, Adamnan, 255; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iv. c. 20, § 8.) This took place, according to the Four Masts, in A.D. 799, but more correctly in A.D. 804. Its name, however, may have been based upon his acquaintance with canon law. In Colgan's Breve Chronicon (Tr. Thom. 292) there is at A.D. 799 "S. Fothadus cognomento De Canonibus, Doctor et Scriptor Ardinachanus, Scriptis et Sanctissimis deservit." At A.D. 805 the Ann. Inisfallin have, as rendered by O'Conor (Rev. Hibern. Scriptor. vol. ii. pt. ii. 26), "Fothad Othna, i.e. Fothad Canoine [Fothadus Monasterii Othnae, i.e. Fothadus Canoonum Scriptor] quiuebit," but according to the calculation (ib. ib. i. § 7) this date should be A.D. 810, which agrees with the corrected date of the Ann. Ulm. "An. 818. Fothad monasterii Othnae mortuit." [J. G.]

FOTINIANI. (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 6, 65, v.) [Phuotiniani.] [T. W. D.]

FOTINUS seems to be the Scotch ecclesiastical name of Pothinus, bishop and martyr at Lyons, A.D. 177. (Miller, Arboath and its Abbey, 163, 187; View Disc. Aberd. 255; Bp. Forbes, Kol. Scotts. Saints, 851.) [J. G.]

FOTINUS (Ambros. de Fid. l. 1), heretic. [Phuotin.] [T. W. D.]

FOUR CROWNED MARTYRS. Severus, Severianus, Carphophorus, Victorinus, who suffered at Rome in the Diocletian persecution, and were commemorated on Nov. 8 (Mart. Adon., Us.). A martyrium in their honour existed at Canterbury from the earliest times of the Augustinian mission (Bed. ii. 7). For an account of their festival and other particulars, see Dict. Chr. Ant. art. Coronati Quattuor. [C. H.]

FRAECH (Freach, Freach, Freigus, Freoch, Frongoid). Cruinuthar Fraech, i.e. priest Fraech, is commemorated, in the Irish Kalendares, at Dec. 20, as "of Clusain Collaing, in Muintir Molain," now Clonen, a parish in the baronies of Carrigallen and Mohill, the diocese of Ardagh, and the county of Leitrim. He was son of Cathachus, and of the race of Conmac, son of Forsus, son of Ros, son of Righache (Colgan, Se respecting, SS. 598, c. 3). Mart. Ir., ed. Tod and Reeves, 343; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 142). He was maternal uncle of St. Berach (Feb. 15), of Clusain-cairthe, and gave him baptism and the rudiments of education. [Berach (2)]. His exact date is not known, but he appears to have flourished about A.D. 570. and thus been contemporary with many well-known saints and founders of schools and monasteries, such as St. Columba, St. Kevin, St. Brigid, St. Dennis, the Brendan, and St. Daigh (Colgan, Acta SS. 340, cc. 2-4, 345, c. 2, 346, nn. 2, 753, c. 17, 756 n. 18, and Tr. Thauon, 410, c. 8; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 6). Etymologically, Fraech is the Irish for heath. (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2nd series, 99.)

[J. G.]

FRAGITANUS, a priest of Cordova, unjustly deposed by the bishop of Cordova (probably Agapitus) on his own authority only. The second synod of Seville, held A.D. 619 under the presidency of St. Isidore, ordered his restoration, and laid down the principle that no priest or deacon could be expelled from his office without the consent of a council. (Eps. Sagra. x. 233; Aquigre-Catalani, ill. 355.)

FRAID, FFRAID, the Welsh form of St. Bride. [Brigid．] (Mv. Arch. ii. 42, 51; Welsh Saints, 189-90; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 156-57.)

[J. G.]

FRAMBAUDUS, FRAMBALDUS (FRAMBAUDUS), abbot of Senlis (Silvanectum) and confessor, perhaps belonging to the first half of the 6th century, is fully treated of by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 16 Aug. iii. 300-302) in a commentary prefixed to Labbe's Etiquum S. Frambalbi Abb. ex vet. Brev. Sibon. According to the Etiquum he was born in Aquitaine, of noble parents; when a priest, he went to Le Mans (Cenommannus) and retired with some brethren to a neighbouring wood. But regarding his life and acts there is the utmost uncertainty; to Ado, Usuardus, and even later martyrologists he was unknown. He was probably venerated at both Le Mans and Senlis, on Aug. 16 or 23. His relics are specially mentioned as having been preserved in the church of St. Frambaudus in Senlis.

[J. G.]

FRAMBOLDUS, ST., fourteenth bishop of Bayeux, succeeding St. Gerebhaldus and followed by St. Hugo I. early in the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xi. 350.)

[S. A. B.]

FRAMECHLIDUS, FRAMECHEW, mother of St. Austreberta, and wife of the count Palatine Fidefridus (A.D. 479). The following is given in the Vita S. Austrebertae (Bolland. Acta SS. 10 Feb. ii. 419-23), and again critically presented by the Bollandists (15, 17 Maii, vii. 800-2). She flourished under king Dagobert I. (A.D. 628-638), and is venerated at Montreuil in Picardy on May 17, or, as some less probably say, 27.

[J. G.]

FRAMENGERUS, twenty-sixth bishop of Noyon, between Guaranfius and Hunnuanus, said to have sat two years, and died A.D. 723. (Gall. Christ. ix. 995.)

[S. A. B.]

FRANCILIO (GANZICLIO, VINCILICLIO), fourteenth bishop of Tours, following Leo, and succeeded by Injurious. He was a native of Poictiers, where his family was of senatorian rank. He had a wife, who was named Clara, but no family, and both were possessed of landed estates, the bulk of which they bestowed upon the church of St. Martin at Tours, the rest upon their relations. He held the see for two years and a half, dying A.D. 929. Gregory of Tours, who is the authority for all that is known of him, relates that on the night of the Feast of the Nativity ere he descended to observe the vigils, he bade his servant fetch him a draught, after swallowing which he immediately expired. Gregory infers that he was poisoned. He was buried in the church of St. Martin at Tours.

(Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 17, x. 31, 14; Gall. Christ. xiv. 19.)

[C. H.]

FRANCIO, metropolitan bishop of Philippopolis in Thrace, present at the council of Chalcedon 451, and appears among the bishops who subscribed the synodal letter of the council to Leo I. (Harduin, Concilia, ii. 367 6; Leo Mag. Ep. 98, 1104, Migne; Oriens Christ. i. 1157.)

[C. G.]

FRANCLA (FRACLA, FRANDA), one of the three sisters of SS. Tressan, Gibrian, &c.; she went from Ireland to Gaul in perhaps the 5th century, but her acts are unknown. (Boll. Acta SS. 8 Maii. ii. 299-9; O'Halloran, Irish Saints, ii. 377.)

[J. G.]

FRANCO, seventh bishop of Aix, succeeding Avolus, and followed by Pentius (5th circ. A.D. 566). The story of Tours has the following story of him. Childeric, chief of the household of king Sigebert, claimed some of the church lands of Aix. The bishop appealed to the king, who decided against him, and fined him 300 pieces of gold for wrongfully withholding lands from the payment of taxes. Returning to his see, the bishop threw himself upon the tomb of St. Metries, the confessor of Aix, and exclaimed with tears, "No lamp shall be kindled here, nor psalm chanted, most glorious saint, until thou hast revenged thy servants upon their enemies and restored to holy church the lands taken from her. So saying, he threw thorns upon the sepulchre and went out fast and at doors and placed more thorns against them. Childeric was forthwith stricken with a fever, but his pride was not broken till his sickness had lasted a whole year, when he sent messengers to restore the lands, and to offer by way of restitution 600 pieces of gold. This done, he expired where he lay, and the church was revenged upon her foes. (Lib. de Glor. Confess. lixii.; Gall. Hist. i. 301.)

FRANCO I., 233rd bishop of Le Mans, between Josephus and Franco II., born at Baisin, and noble Frank parents. In his youth he repaired to Charlemagne's court at Aix, and in 792 was appointed by him bishop of Le Mans. The influence he had won at court he employed for the aggrandisement of his see. In 796 he obtained a grant of privileges from the king in favour of his diocese (Bouquet, v. 766). In 802 he extended his jurisdiction over the monastery of St. Calais (Carliefus) by means of forged records, as it was said, which deceived the king's chancellor (Bouquet, v. 766). In the same year he obtained decree for the payment of certain church dues. And finally in 814 he received a confirmatory charter for the privileges of the church of Le Man from Louis the Pious (Bouquet, vi. 459). He died in 818 at a place then called Balian, one of the possessions of the see, but was buried in the church of St. Vincent at Le Mans, where an epitaph fixed the duration of his episcopate at twenty-two years. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 356.)

FRANCOLINUS, sixth bishop of Conceranos, following St. Licerius. He subscribed the council of Naborne, A.D. 788 or 791. His successors in the diocese are not known for nearly a hundred years. (Mansi, xiii. 923; Gall. Christ. l. 1127.)

FRANTA, one of the obscure Suevian kings of Spain after the defeat of Reikiar in 456 by Theodoric II. of Toulouse. He appears to have been the head of certain Suevian districts, while Maldras was king in the north and west of Gallicia. "Suevi in partibus sæculi Gallaeciarum, e quibus parvae Francianæm, pars Maldrum Regem appellet," says Idatius. Franta belongs, therefore, to a time of confusion between the death of Reikiar and the accession of Remismund to the undivided monarchy at Frumarii's death, when the Suevi split up into various parties, were making the best head they could against the allied Goths and Provincials. The period was ended in 460 by the death of Frumarii and by the renewal of the alliance between the Suevi and Goths, which alone enabled the Suevi to keep down the provincials of Gallicia. (Idatius, apud Zep. Socr. iv.; Inscr. Hist. Sacrum, ed. vi.; Dahn, v. 956.)

FRATER, bishop of Geneva, said to have attended the council of Milan, A.D. 347, and died 361. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 368.)

FRATERNUS. The name occurs among the signatures to the epistle of the bishops of Gaul to Leo the Great, A.D. 451; and the lists of the see of Glanum identify him as bishop of that place (Gall. Christ. iii. 1230).

FRATERNUS, bishop of Auxeerne. Gama (Srex. Episc. 501) says he was consecrated Sept. 26, A.D. 448, and slain in the Hans in Sept. A.D. 451. This supposes him to have immediately succeeded St. Germanus, but Theod. (Mem. xvi. 26, 836, 839) while shewing that the chronology of the period is very difficult, thinks that Alodia succeeded St. Germanus, and that, after Alodia died in 482, there was a vacancy for ten years; then Fraternus was appointed, and his death took place at the hands of the barbarians on the day of his consecration. The Gallia Christiana (xii. 206) and many martyrologies say he was martyred, but the Bollandists do not state this. (Acta SS. 22 Sept. viii. 135-138; see also Sel. ii. 670, vii. 280.)

FRATERNUS I. and II., bishops of Langres in the 4th or 5th century. (Gall. Christ. iv. 516.)

FRAVITTA (Flavita, Flavianus, Phra- vittas, or Phreittas), 33rd bishop of Constantinople A.D. 485, between Acacius and Euphemius. Fratius, Theophanes, and Liberatus Dionysius are very short in their account of him; the principal authority is Nicephorus Callistus. He relates that on the death of Acacius, the emperor Zeno placed on the altar of the great church of Constantinople two sheets of paper. One was blank; the other contained a written supplication to Almighty God that He would deign to send an angel to inscribe on the blank sheet the name of him whom He wished to be raised to the patriarchal throne. A feast of forty days was proclaimed, and all were exhorted to pray earnestly for a favourable issue. The church was given into the custody of a confidential eunuch, the imperial chamberlain, and the imperial seal was set on the casket in which the papers lay. There was a presbyter named Fravitta in charge of the church of St. Thecla, in one of the suburbs of the city. He appears to have been a Goth; at any rate, at the beginning of the century, a Goth of that name was consul and commander-in-chief of the forces of the East. Fired with the ambition of leaping into so magnificent a position at one bound, he sounded the integrity of the eunuch. Finding him accessible to gold, he paid him large sums, and made him large promises on the understanding that he would write his name on the blank sheet, and seal up the casket afresh with the imperial signet. At the end of the forty days the casket was opened; the name of the presbyter of St. Thecla was found; and the eunuch, in the religious world of Constantinople rejoiced at the Divine interposition; and amid universal acclamations Fravitta mounted the chair of Gregory Nazianzen and of Chrysostom. But his abominable wickedness was not to remain hid. Death spelt his calculations; within four months he had breathed his last, and the powerful eunuch was pressing his executors for the promised gold. Unable and unwilling to discharge so scandalous a debt, they fled to the emperor, and revealed the odious tale. Zeno was at first dumb with amazement; but though Fravitta was dead, the fraudulent forger remained to expiate his crime: he was turned out of all his employments and driven from the city. Zeno, ashamed of his failure, entrusted the election of the new patriarch to the clergy. Such is the account of Nicephorus Callistus. In the correspondence between Zeno, Fravitta, and pope Felix on the subject of the appointment no trace can be found of such a story. The fact that the replies of the bishop of Rome extol the piety of his most glorious son the emperor, and exhibit delight that so holy a person Fravitta had been from his childhood chosen by God to fill the see, cannot be construed into an allusion to so remarkable a mode of episcopal election. It is true that Fravitta shewed peculiar anxiety to secure the acquiescence of the Western patriarch in his elevation, and refused to ascend the vacant throne without his acquiescence; but there would be reason enough for that in the uncertain character of the times, the former banishment of his patron Zeno, and his own recent obscurity. To strict theologians Fravitta must have been a strange enigma; for at one and the same time he wrote letters to Peter Mognus asking for his communion, and the synodal to pope Felix begging his sanction and co-operation. To shew an earnest of good intentions, this document was carried to Rome with another from the emperor, by the catholic monks of Constantinople, who had always kept distinctly separate from Acacius the late patriarch, and his friend Mognus. The accompanying letter of Zeno demonstrated great affection for Fravitta; he had only laboured for his appointment, because be thought him worthy of the dignity; and to restore peace to the churches and unity to the faith.

Pope Felix was delighted with the letters, and had that of the emperor read aloud in presence of the deputation and of all the clergy of Rome, who repeatedly expressed loud approval. When the pope however wished the monks from Constantinople to engage for the rejection of the names of Ancius and Mongus from the dipityches, they replied that they had no instructions on the point. Felix therefore hastened to write to Zeno and Fravitta, dismissing authority, but beseeching them as a matter of conscience. Before his letter reached Constantinople, Fravitta was no more.

Felix wrote also to Thalassius and other abbots of Constantinople forbidding them from communicating with their bishop until they should be authorized by the see of Rome. This was hardly in keeping with the disclaimers of the letters to Zeno and Fravitta. The joy of the pope, moderate as it must have been by this time, was altogether destroyed by the arrival at Rome of a copy of the letter which Fravitta had sent to Mongus. Directly contrary in tenor to that which Felix had received, this document actually denied all communion with Rome. The deputation of monks had not yet left for Constantinople, but the pope would not hear a word more from them. Whether Fravitta obtained his chair by the dishonourable means recorded by Nicephorus Callistus or not, he stands disgraced by this duplicity. (Niceph. Callist. xvi. 19. Pat. Grac. cxvii. s. 684, p. 152; Joann. Zonar. Annal. xiv. iii. Patr. Græc. cxxxiv. § 53, p. 1214; Liberat. Disc. Brac. xviii. Patr. Lat. levii. 34; Felicis Pap. Epist. xii. and xiii. Patr. FREARDUS, recluse, near Nantes. (Usuardus, Mart. Aug. 1.)

[J. G.]

FREDERBERTUS, twelfth bishop of Angoulême, succeeding Damasius or Tornianus, and followed by Launus I., in the middle of the 8th century. He is said to have obtained the concession of a charter from king Pipin. (Gall. Christ. ii. 982; Gams, Series Episc. 460.)

[S. A. B.]

FREDENGAND (FRIDEGANDUS), commemorated July 17. He was one of the Irish missionaries who followed St. Fursey into Gaul, and he built his monastery upon the Sambre; it is now the monastery of St. Peter, and stands two miles from Namur. He was also held in special honour at Turvain or Dorne, near Antwerp, as he is said by Mirandus to have died and been first buried there. (Colgan, Acts SS. 51 n. 1, 96, c. 6, 292, c. 13, 299 n. 2;) Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 462.) Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 281-2) has compiled a short notice of St. Fridengandus, mostly from continental sources, attributes to his pen Homiliae de Sanctis, lib. 1. and says he flourished about A.D. 600 or 650. (Tanner, Bibl. 296.)

[FREDEREGIUS]

The name assigned to a chronicler, whose chief claim to attention arises from his taking up the history of France and Burgundy at the point where it is left by St. Gregory of Tours (Gregorius Turonensis) and continuing it to A.D. 641, with some incidental notice of events of his own time occurring as late as A.D. 656-658. The chronicler is distinguished from others of his name by the surname Scholasticus.

 Authorities.—(1) His own work, for which see below; (2) Adrien de Valois, Gesta Francorum, lib. xv. Paris, 1646; (3) Fabricius, Bibl. monach. medie. et infima Antiqua. Discussions on this writer may also be found in the preface by Dom. Ruinart to his edition of Gregory of Tours and Frédégaire (Paris, 1699); in the notice prefixed by M. Guizot to his translation of Frédégaire, and in the article “Frédégaire,” seemingly from the pen of M. Guzat, in the Nouvelle Biographie générale (Paris, Didot, 1856).

Life.—Of the career of this annalist we are wholly ignorant. Inasmuch as the only original portion of his writings is all but exclusively occupied with Burgundy, the very chronology being marked by the reigns of Burgundian kings, it is naturally inferred that he was the inhabitant of that realm. Adrien de Valois (better known by his Latinized title of A. Valuesius) fixed upon Avenches as his birth-place, and maintained that he had found the name Frédégaire assigned to the chronicler in an ancient manuscript. The evidence for these statements seems but slight, and Ruinart vainly sought the name, but as it had already been given to our author by Marquard Frerher and Joseph Scaliger, it will probably be considered as his title for all time. As Frédégaire writes in the tone of a contemporary concerning events which occurred in the middle of the 7th century, we must assume that he flourished at that period.

Writings.—The editio princeps, published in 1850, at Basle, in 1568, was printed as an appendix to the works of St. Gregory of Tours under the following title: Frédégaire scholasticus Chronicon, quod ille, iubente Childerando comite, Pipinis patris patriae, scripsit. The first three are a mere compilation from the works of Julius Africanus, St. Jerome, and the early Spanish chronicler, Idautus. The fourth book is an abridgment of the first six books of the history of St. Gregory of Tours; while the fifth is an independent continuation of the work of Gregory. This fifth book is naturally the one which has attracted attention. Besides the Basle edition, that of Ruinart, and the translation by Guizot already named, may be mentioned the transcript in the Lyons Bibliotheca Patrum Maximus (tom. xi. pp. 815 et seq.).

Frédégaire is strictly the chronicler as distinguished from the historian. He gives a dry summary of the invasions of Burgundy by barbarians, of inundations, of the death of a count by order of the king, without one word of regret at the national calamities, or any hint whether he regarded the death of the chieftain as a murder or a just punishment. He was probably a monk. Certainly his point of view, in the few passages where it is made manifest, is ecclesiastical. He naturally rejoices over the conversion of the Goths from Arianism; and relates with evident appreciation the boldness of St. Columbanus (Columbanus) in bearing the wrath of Brunehild by his refusal to bless the illegitimate children of her son, king Thierry.
The above estimate will be found confirmed by Guizot (L.c.), who remarks on the downward course of the French of this period, and also by Sismondi in his Histoire des Français (three i. chap. 2). And yet, however, to St. Gregory of Tours, speaks feelingly of the descent experienced on turning from his works to those of this mere chronicler of events; but in turn evinces some gratitude, when he comes to a later generation, which had not even a Fredegarius to hand down its history. [J. G. C.]

FREDEGUNDIS, FREDEGUND, originally a slave of Chilperic I. (Gesta Reg. Fr. 31), became his wife by supplanting Audovera. Whilst Chilperic was absent on an expedition against the Saxons, Audovera brought forth a daughter. At Fredegund’s instigation the daughter was baptized before the return of Chilperic, and Audovera was induced by Fredegund to hold the child at the font, thereby becoming godmother to her own daughter. Chilperic on his return accorded Audovera, compelling her to take the vows of a nun, and abandon to his bed. (On the authenticity of this story v. Löbell, Gregor von Tours, p. 23, note.)

The position of Fredegund was little more than that of a concubine, one wife of many (cp. Löbell, pp. 21 sqq.); and in 567 Chilperic, in order to have a wife of equal station and rank to that of his brother Sigebert, married Brunchilde’s elder sister, Galiswinda, daughter of the Visigothic king Athanagild. Chilperic promised his father-in-law to discard his other wives. But before the year was out Fredegund recovered her influence. Quarrels arose between Fredegund and Galiswinda; the unhappy Galiswinda thought to be allowed to return home if she left her treasure behind. Chilperic dissimulated, and Fredegund had her rival fully murdered, and a few days afterwards was openly married to Chilperic (Fredegundin recept in matrimonio, Greg. Turon. iv. 20).

The duty of bringing Galiswinda’s death devolved upon Sigebert, her sister’s husband, and it would appear that he and his brother proceeded to take steps to depose Chilperic, but that an arrangement was arrived at by the intervention of Guntram, by which the wrath of Brunchilde and Sigebert was bought off by the presentation to Brunchilde of Galiswinda’s “morning-gift” of five Aquitanian cities. (Greg. ix. 20; see G. Richter, Annalen d. Deutschen Reichs, note, s. a. 567.)

Bloodthirsty though her contemporaries were (such as Giswinda of Spain, Greg. v. 33, Austrichildis, Guntram’s wife, v. 36), Fredegund far exceeded them all. Her biography is simply a history of the murders she committed. She studied the art of assassination, and was no mean adept at it. See her address to the two clerks whom she employed in one of her attempts to murder Childerbert. (Greg. vii. 29.) Having once begun the policy of getting rid of her enemies by assassination, she did not scruple to continue it to the end. She brought about the deaths of her stepsons Meroveus (v. 14, 19 s.), and Cloris (v. 40), she made more than one attempt on the lives of Brunchilde and Brunchilde’s son Childerbert (v. 20, x. 18, also against Guntram. Gregory vii. 43, 18), and an exceptionally horrible attempt with her own hand on her own daughter Rigunth (ix. 34). According to the Gesta (c. 35) she caused her husband Chilperic to be murdered because inadvertently she had discovered to him her adulterous intercourse with Landeric, and Landeric (Greg. vii. 29) doubts the truth of this charge. Gregory has not alluded to it, nor does he ever mention Landeric. Compare, however, bk. vii. 7, where Childerbert, in demanding the surrender of Fredegund, accuses her of this murder amongst others.

She crowned her wickedness in the eyes of her contemporaries by having Pretexhtatus, bishop of Rouen, who had given her mortal offence by blessing the marriage of Meroveus and Brunchilde, murdered before the altar, and by openly poisoning a Frank noble who protested against her wickedness (viii. 31, 41).

But her political assassinations were almost the least horrible that she committed. Her personal revenge was absolutely implacable. Once offended, she never rested satisfied with anything short of the blood of her victim. And her revenge was prompted by various motives, inspired with a passion that was above all caution, as in the case of Leudastes, towards whom she shewed the most calculating cold-blooded cruelty (v. 50, vi. 32); superstition, as in the case of Mummolos (vi. 35); and lastly, the frantic rage of disappointed passion or bulked vengeance (vii. 20, vi. 19). No wonder that Guntram, her brother-in-law, calls her “an enemy of God and man” (ix. 20); and Gregory adds “that she had no fear of God before her eyes” (vii. 15). Devoid of natural affection as she generally appeared to be (v. 23, cp. vii. 7), even she felt remorse for her wicked deeds when she saw her children dying before her face. Seized, Gregory says, with a tardy repentance, she addressed her husband thus: “Long has the divine mercy suffered our evil deeds; we have been warned by fevers and by other ills, but we have not repented. And now we are to lose our children, now they die, shin the tears of the poor, the weeping of the widow, the sighs of the orphan. We are bereft, and without hope, none remains to us for whom to hoard. Do not our collars overflow with wine, our granaries with corn, our chests with gold, silver, and precious stones? And yet the dearest treasure we possess, that we lose. Come, let us burn these unjust taxation rolls, let us be content with the revenue that satisfied our father Clotaire.” The king hesitated. “What!” she cried, “you shrink? Follow me. Even though we lose our beloved children we shall at least escape eternal punishment.” Chilperic yielded, the rolls were burned, and the tax remitted (v. 35, cp. also 11).

That she really ruled rather than Chilperic, or that at any rate she was the moving spirit in much political action that was taken, is evident from what has already been narrated or referred to, especially from the stories of Pretexhtatus and Leudastes. Nor was she without vigour and resources in adversity as well as in prosperity. On the murder of her husband she was left with her infant son Clotaire, apparently defenceless and surrounded by implacable and unscrupulous enemies. She took refuge and sanctuary at St. Claz, and was not content enough to place herself for the moment under the protection of Guntram, the least dangerous of her enemies, escaping but only just escaping the vengeance of Childebert. "Let my lord come," she wrote, "and take the kingdom he had from his brother. I have a little child that I desire to place in his arms. For myself I submit to his rule" (vii. 4–5, 7). Subsequently she had to retire to Rueil (vii. 19), but even when her fortune was at its lowest ebb she still hoped to find an escape for herself by the murder of her foes (vii. 20). Later on her capital was at Tournai, and it was there that in order to maintain internal peace within her realm she caused three turbulent Frankish chiefs to be murdered at her table (x. 27). Apparently a rising took place, Fredegund was seized, and was to be delivered over to Childebert. She contrived, however, to raise a counter revolution within Childebert's kingdom in Champagne, and was herself rescued. Again she appealed to Guntram, and got him solemnly to preside at the baptism of Clotaire (x. 28). In 593 Guntram died, and Childebert became sole king of the Franks. Clotaire's kingdom and Fredegund's rule at this time appear to have embraced little more than the Frisian, Flemish, and Norman coast lands, the extreme north-west of Neustria (Donnell, Anfänge d. karol. Hauser, p. 218). On Childebert's death, however, in 596, Fredegund seized Paris, Soissons, and other cities (Fred. 17) without warning or declaration of war (Stella barbarum), and ravaged the country around Soissons, defeating the forces of Theobert and Theoderic at Lafaux (Fred. 17). A few months afterwards she died, in 597, and was buried in St. Germain-des-Prés, at Paris.

Even though she may not have been guilty of the murder of her husband, it is preposterous to attempt to exalt her in any way into a heroine. The eulogy upon her by Fortunatus (Carm. iv. 1) may have been prompted by flattery or fear. But apologies such as were made in the last century by M. Dreux du Raliel (Mémoires historiques etc. des Reines et Régentes de France, vol. i. 670, and in this century by Luden, onl only be maintained, as Löbell (pp. 342–4) has pointed out, at the expense of the authenticity of Gregory or of the character of the Frankish nation. Much relating to the history of Fredegund is to be found in Thierry's Histoires des Temps mérovingiens. [T. R. B.]

FREDERICUS. [FREDEGUS.

FREDERICUS (FREDIENUS), the first bishop of Braga after the Moorish invasion, according to a document said to have been discovered in the Braga archives in 1589 by Fray Geronymo de Roman, who left a MS. history of the church of Braga, from which Flores extracts. The document, from Roman's account of it (Flores does not seem to have seen it himself or even a copy of it), purported to be a donation by Alfonso the Chaste of certain parts of the diocese of Braga together with Braga itself to the bishopric of Lugo in exchange for territory taken from Lugo and given to the new church of Oviedo. (The bishopric of Oviedo was founded 802–812, Gams, K. G. ii. 2, 349.) The deed, however, describes an unsuccessful attempt made by Alfonso I. the Catholic (737–757) to restore the see of Braga in the person of Fridesindus in the seventh year of his reign, about 744 there-fore. The attempt failed, says the document, because of the wars and uncertainties of the time, and Braga is now handed over to Lugo. As far as Alfonso I. and Fridesindus are concerned, the fact is a priori possible. Braga was one of the first towns deserted by the invaders at the time of the Berber insurrection [Alfonso I.], and Alfonso may well have cherished the thought of incorporating part of Galicia with the ancient metropolis and strong town of Braga, and may then have found his resources not equal to the task of re-population and defence against such struggling bands of Berbers as became the ancestors of the modern Maragatos, near Astorga and Leon [Maragatos]. But the ecclesiastical history of northern Spain in the 8th and 9th centuries, and indeed for a good deal later, is a chaos, through which, in the present state of information, it is almost impossible to see one's way, and these Oviedo and Lugo documents are specially suspicious. [Exp. Sagr. xv. 168.]

FREDIANUS, bishop of Lucena. [FRUDIAN]

FREDARIOUS, bishop of Aci (Gadiz) after the Moorish invasion, about A.D. 720, according to Isidore Faciens, who praises him for learning and piety, together with Umay and Evantius. [Ibid. Faciopap Exp. Sagr. viii. 297.]

FREGUS, a man of holy life, whom St. Kentigern found on his death-bed in old age at a place called Kernach, now Carnock, in the parish of St. Ninian's, Stirlingshire. After his pious death on the following day, his body was placed on a wain drawn by two untamed bulls, brought by them to Cathures, now Glasgow, to a cemetery which had been consecrated by St. Ninian, and there buried by St. Kentigern, who thus seems to have had Glasgow pointed out as his dwelling-place. (See the legend in Vita S. Kentgerii, c. 9; Bp. Forbes, Lives of SS. Nin. and Knl. xxxiii. 50–5, 178–9, 329; Skene, Celt. Soc. ii. 184.)

FREHELM, an abbot whose death is noted by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 653), under the year 764. His name occurs as a priest abbet in the Liber Vitae Dunelmensis, p. 6.

FREETHOMOND, an abbot in the diocese of Worcester, who attested the act of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) His name, under the form of Fromond, is likewise appended to a charter of 824. (C. D. 218.) His monastery was probably Westbury.

FREETHORED, a priest of the diocese of London, who attested the act of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.)

FREETHUBERT, a priest of the diocese of Elumham who attested the act of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547.)

FRETULA, a learned man, living in Getica at the beginning of the 3rd century. He is known to us by the reply made by St. Jerome to a letter from him and his colleague Susian (Jerome, Ep. 106, ed. Vall.). It is not certain from Jerome's expressions what the condition of his correspondents was. It might appear that they were, or had been, military men. Vallarsi in his note gives reason to think that they became bishops. [Fratiller.] They were diligent students of Scripture, perhaps engaged in translating parts of it for the use of the northern tribes. Finding that in the psalter, of which they had Jerome's version made at Rome in 383, there were many things disagreeing with the LXX, they wrote to Jerome in the year 403, he living then at Bethelhem, to obtain an explanation of these differences. He replies at full length, going through the whole list of passages which they had sent him. He points out that the edition of the LXX called Kephe, which they and most persons used, was faulty, and differed in many ways from the other versions given by Origen in the Hexapla; and that, when Greek versions of the Old Testament differed, recourse must be had to the Hebrew. Jerome dwells also with delight on the evidence given by the letter of Fretela and Sunnias that even among the Getae were now found students of Scripture, while Greek was preferred to live on in ignorance, the hands of men of the north, which had grown callous by handling the bow, now turned the pages of the Scriptures. It is from these expressions that Ceillier and others have assumed that Fretela and Sunnias were soldiers. [W. H. F.]

FREYDO (Fratido, Fraiddo), ninth or tenth bishop of Spires, succeeding Basarius or Otho, at the end of the 8th or beginning of the 9th century. [Dall. Christ. v. 717.]

FRIARUS, recluses, has his history given as a moral tale by St. Gregory of Tours (Vita Patrum, c. 10, Patr. Lat. illxi. 300, 1054 sq.). He was especially pious as a youth. In manhood he retired with an abbot Subauilius (or Baudus) and a deacon Secludus, to an island called Vindaniunum near Nantes, where he died and was buried. His death is said (65) to have taken place on Aug. 1, A.D. 570 or 577, but his feast was on Aug. 2. [Uerard. Mort. Aug. 1; Bull. Acta SS. 1 Aug. l. 56 sq.; Le Coiteau, Ann. Ecol. Franc. ii. 188, Paris, 1666.]

FRIECEFUSUS (Fricorauus, Frichor, Fricchius, Fricorius), also called Hadrianus on the continent on account of the harshness of the Irish name to the foreign ear, was a close companion of St. Caedoc, the apostle of the Norini, and their work is undistinguished. [Caedocius.] He is mentioned with Caedocius in Alemin's Vita B. Richardi, c. 1, according to one reading (Alcuin, Opp. ii. 176, ed. Froben). Friecesus became an inmate of the monastery of Centula, and was buried there about the middle of the 7th century. In the 10th his tomb was prepared by abbat Angilbert, and an inscription placed on it, like that on St. Caedocius. [Hartlaub, Cent. Lat. 1. c. 5, iv. c. 33; Bull. Acta SS. 31 Mai. 262; Mabillon, Ann. Ben. A.D. 615, 627; D'Achery, Spic. t. v. p. 176, t. vi. p. 429; O'Connor, Epist. Nuncup. 149, 228-9.]

FRIDEGANDIS. [Fredeand.] FRIDEGILS, priest. [Frithegils.]

FREDERICUS (Frédericus, Frédis, Frédéricus, Frédarius, Freddricus), brother of Theodoric II, king of the Visigoths, assisted Theodoric in the murder of their brother, Thorismund, in A.D. 452 or 453 (Iatius, Chron. A.D. 453; Dubos, Hist. Crit. i. l. ii. c. 19; Baronius, Ann. a. 451, l. ii.). He complained to Hilary bishop of Rome, through a deacon named Helius, of the irregular appointment of Hermes, A.D. 462, to the see of Narbonne, as related by St. Hilary in Ep. vii. to Leontius (Mansi, Cons. conc. 933-4; Migne, Pat. Lat. ivi. 24; Cellarius, Anteuros sacros, p. 387). He fell in battle against Aegidius, the Roman commander, about A.D. 469. (Bouquet, Script. des Hist. ii. 701, 704.) [J. G.]

FRIDERICUS, son of Flecteus, Fava, or Phæba, king of the Rugi, a Norician tribe. Flecteous (see Vita S. Germani Noricorum Apostoli) by Eugippius (Migne, Pat. Lat. isi. 1167 sq.) was a friend to St. Severinus, but his wife Gisla was a bitter enemy, and Fridericus their son, though anxiously warned by the saint before his death, became a violent oppressor, and a sacrilegious robber. He is said to have been murdered by another Frederic, his nephew. (Baronius, Ann. Ecol. 482, 487, 488.) [J. G.]

FRIDESINDUS, bishop of Braga. [Fridesindus.]

FREDISWIDA, ST. (Frideswitha, Frideswitha, Frisewitha, Friswy, Frideswida, Frideswithina), of Oxford. Her reputed period makes her just contemporary with Bede, her birth being placed c.r. 650, and her death c.r. 735; but she is not mentioned in Bede, nor does her name occur in the Monuments Historica Britanniae. Gosceline, who collected his early English memoirs just after the conquest, has none of Frisidwy. Yet at the conquest neither her name nor her foundation had perished. She is named as having been buried at Oxford in the Anglo-Saxon catalogue of Saints printed in Hicken's Theasurn (pt. iii. p. 120), and in the Oxfordshire Domesday the canons of St. Frideswyde are mentioned. The biographical sketch of the biography begins to be written in the twelfth century, to which period belongs a Bodleian manuscript life, noticed by Hardy (Dena. Cat. i. 462). William of Malmsbury too in that century gives an account of her in his Gesta Pontificum. (315, ed. Hamilton), and in his Gesta Regum (i. 327, ed. Hardy) he speaks of her monastery. His story of the saint has every appearance of a genuine tradition, being as vague as undecisymphantal as might be expected under the circumstances. She was a king's daughter; she refused her hand to a king, and to escape his importunity fled to Oxford, the suitor being smitten with blindness in attempting to gain the town. There she founded a monastery, ruled it, died, and was buried, and when Malmesbury wrote her house was still existing, occupied by regular canons. Malmsbury died about 1142, and wrote therefore a little before the date of the earliest recorded Oxford professor, Vacarius. This legend therefore would have been written just when Oxford University was commencing its historic life; but the legend gives no hint of St. Frideswyde being as yet connected with Oxford in any tutelary sense. In 1180 occurred St. Frideswyde's translation; afterwards commemorated on Feb. 12. This is briefly recorded as an event in the chronicle of Wykes 2 0 2 (Gale, ii. 22), but somewhat circumstantially described, though without a date, by prior Philip of St. Frideswide's, whose manuscript is placed by Hardy (i. 460) at about 1200. The translation was in this instance a survival of the relics from the obscure spot of their original interment in the church (on the site of the present Christ Church), to a conspicuous shrine in the same, and prior Philip's statement must be accepted as authentic, from his proximity to the event. The ceremony was evidently regarded as important by William, and understood from the prior's language that king Henry II. was present. The Bollandist questions this interpretation, and the language perhaps admits some room for question; but it is certain that Henry was at Oxford in Jan. 1180. At all events the king expressly sanctioned the proceeding, which were witnessed by the archbishop and several of the bishops and nobility. Wood states that it was from this date that St. Frideswide began to be regarded as the tutelary saint of the town and university, that her church became the mother church of both, and that a ceremonial procession of the clergy and laity in common was made to it on certain stated occasions (see Wood, Annals of Oxford, ann. 1268). The significance of the event of 1180 will be appreciated when it is recollected that in 1187 or thereabouts is the first express mention, by Gildas Cambrensis, of students coming to Oxford. The assembling of prelates and nobles to create the festival of Feb. 12 would indicate that an effort was being made to promote the academic reputation of the place. It is, moreover, at this period, the reign of Henry II., that historians have seen the first revival of the English race and its commencing amalgamation with the Norman. It may have been a sign of this tendency, and a stimulant of it, that the English youth found a saint of their own ancient blood distinguished as their patron when they flocked in to study under the shadow of the Norman castle. Henceforth, accordingly, St. Frideswide's tradition grows more definite. A fourteenth-century Harleian manuscript (Harl. i. 462) names her father Didan, her mother Safrida; the suitor king is Algar, a Mercian; she dies and is buried at Thornbury, now Binsey, near Oxford, and her translation thence to Oxford takes place 400 years afterwards. In the fourteenth century again her story was told by John of Tim- mouth, in whose roll of Anglo-Saxon saints she stands No. 122 (Smith, Catalogue of Cotton MSS. p. 29), and this memoir was adopted by Capgrave. Here likewise appear the names Didan, Safrida, Algar; but the burial and translation are placed at Oxford, as they also are in the traditions collected by Leland (Collect. vol. i. p. 342), who adds to our information, above all other sources after the event, that the pious woman who taught Frideswide to be a saint was named Algiva.

On the whole, the defect of early mention in contrast with posterior and late celebrity need not create any suspicion against St. Frideswide. Higher and more continuous, but without her exist without her existence, is one of the salient features of her life. It is in her favour that her principal commemoration day, Oct. 19, was that of her death, not that of her translation. It is also in her favour that through all the Danish period, when monastic history was blotted out of so many localities, Oxford was probably one of the safer parts of England, and Frideswide's foundation seems to have been nearly continuous as a religious house of some kind, so preserving a continuous and authentic memory of her. Malmesbury Abbey too, where William of Malmesbury wrote, was not a great distance off, and its history was nearly continuous from the heptarchy downwards, a circumstance which adds to the trustworthiness of its records; and this again is in her favour.

St. Frideswide had an office in the Sarum Breviary, and she occurs in our present calendar (Oct. 19), but only one church in England out of Oxford is known to have been dedicated in her name, that of Frilsham in Berkshire. In France she was the tutelary saint, as St. Frewine, of Bomy in Artois. She also had her special offices in the Norman abbey of Fontenelle, out of the manuscript legendary of which one Mabillon has contributed to her published biographical literature. (Mab. Acta SS. G. S. B. iii. part i. p. 534.) Mr. J. H. Parker in his Calendar of the Anglican Church, gives an engraving of St. Frideswide, by Emmanuel Leutaurdess of the chapel of Cardinal Wolsey. It represents her carrying an abbatial staff, with an ox crouching at her feet.

The Acta SS. Boll. (Oct. viii. 560 sqq.) are very full on St. Frideswide, and print some of the MSS. noticed by Hardy. See also Mon. Angl. ii. 143.

FRIDIAN (FRIDIAN, FRIDIGIAN, FRIDIANA), of Lucca, commemorated Mar. 18. He is mentioned by Gregory the Great (Dial. iii. 9). For his Lucca episcopate see Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 794; Cappelleli, La Chiese d'Italia, xv. 497, 498. Regarding this person we have a difficulty in obtaining a clear representation. Colgan (Acta SS. 633 sqq.), O'Conor (Rec. It. Script. iv. 124, 125) and Ware (Hist. Ant. c. 26), wholly identify him with St. Finnian (Sept. 10) of Moville. [FINNIAN (2).] But Lanigan (Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 6), Todd (St. Patrick, 102, n., and Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 37 sq.), and Reeves (Annal. Antiq. Nat. iv. 157 sqq.), identify him with St. Finnian and Frigidian or Frigidiana or Frigidian are entirely different persons, whose histories are mixed up together in medieval legend. The bishop of Lucca may probably have been an Irishman, and born like St. Finnian in the province of Ulster, but no account or explanation can be given of the confusion in the Acts. Colgan (supra) gives two lives of St. Fridan, which are allowed by him to be of late compilation and are of nearly the same contents. According to Colgan's First Life of St. Fridan, bishop of Lucca, taken from the office of the saint that was celebrated at Lucca, the blessed Fridan, "at prime cardinal brevita sua," belonged to "Hibernia, an island of Scotia," and was educated from infancy in the love of Christ, and how to please Him. He was put under Mogenius, who was a bishop and taught him the liberal arts in a city called Candida. There Mogenius plotted against him, and fell in his own snare. After Giesen his enemy forsook his kindred and country (dimissis gavis et patria suis), went into Hibernia, and took the religious habit at a place called Machile. After performing many miracles on the quick and the dead, he left all and went to Italy. In Tuscany
he led an eremitic life, aiming always at perfection, and proving himself a truly faithful servant to Christ. At the urgent request of the clergy, and with the consent of the citizens, he became bishop of Lucca, where he laboured with great care and watchfulness for twenty-eight years, and built as many churches. But this First Life gives no account of his death or of leaving Lucca. Colgan's Second Life of St. Fridolin, bishop of Lucca, and of the Order of the Caunes, Bishop of St. Augustine, taken from a MS. in the Chartreuse of Cologne, goes over almost the same ground as the first, but gives additional particulars at the beginning and the end. He was the son of the great king of Ulter, whose name was Ulitach (but Coegrave thinks this a mistake, and would regard Ulitach as not a proper name, but an appellative equivalent to "of Ulster;" Colgan, _Supra_, pp. 641, n. 1, 649, c. 5, Append.). Refusing his father's proposals of marriage, and despising earthly honours, he set out for Rome, and was honourably received by pope Pelagius (up to his death of that name, A.D. 555-60). He afterwards returned with many gifts and relics, put himself under Megenius at Candida, left that place for the reason given above, and, forsaking his nation and country, took up his abode at Mische in Hibernia. But he went again to Italy, and died bishop of Lucca, in Tuscany. His body lay buried in the basilica of St. Vincentius, till the time of Charles and Pepin, the most serene kings, when John, bishop of Lucca, had the remains removed and placed in a splendid shrine, with all pomp and ceremony. It is plain that in these two Lives we are in the main upon a purely Scottic track, and can easily follow the saint as he attends the famous schools at Candida Casa and Moville, and perhaps pays a visit to the Continent. But the difficulty is, at the same time, to identify Fridolin with the founder of the school at Moville, and to give any reasonable account of St. Finnin's being made bishop of Lucca, or of St. Fridolin's coming to have such a purely Irish history. Butler (Lives of the Saints, iii. pp. 252-53) gives in a short account of St. Fridolin, says he was the eleventh bishop from St. Paulinus founder of the church, and that he died A.D. 378, which is the year in which the name, Ulta, place the month of St. Finian. But Ussher and Reeves say he flourished A.D. 570, and Colgan places his death about the year 595. Tanner (Irish, 299) refers to _Liber de Canonebus_ and _Canones B. Fridigian_ as works still extant, but erroneously attributed to St. Fridigian. (Bp. Forbes, _Kath. Scott. Saints_, 463-466 on "Wynnara," and SS. _Nn._ and _Knt._, xiii.; Ussher, _Eccl. Ant._ c. 17, Wks. vi. 412, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 570; Lanigan, _Eccl. Hist. Ir._ ii. c. 10, § 3; Todd, _St. Patrick_, 102-5, and _Book of Hymns_, fasc. i. 89-100.) [J. G.]

FRIDOLIN (Winfred), abbot of Seckingen, commemorated March 6. Of St. Fridolin, the Traveller, and abbot of Seckingen on the Rhine, we have a full account, from the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. 6 tom. 429-44), and Colgan (Acta SS. 478-93). Baring-Gould (Lives of the Saints, March 6, iii. 91 sq.) has a memoir, with references to the continental authorities. Fridolin was Irish by birth, and of noble descent, but we know neither his family nor native place; some would represent him as the son of a Scoito-Irish king. In Ireland he was ordained and taught: he sought for a wider field in France, and became, he become Bishop of Lucca, where he laboured with great care and watchfulness for twenty-eight years, and built as many churches. But this First Life gives no account of his death or of leaving Lucca. Colgan's Second Life of St. Fridolin, bishop of Lucca, and of the Order of the Caunes, Bishop of St. Augustine, taken from a MS. in the Chartreuse of Cologne, goes over almost the same ground as the first, but gives additional particulars at the beginning and the end. FRITHGILS (Fridilda), a priest of that northern monastery of which Ethelwulf wrote the metrical history. [ETHELMULF (2).] (Acta SS. S. B. sac. iv. pt. 2, p. 324; compare Liber Vitae Dunelm. p. 34.) [S]

FRITHGITHA (Fridighitha), the wife of Ethelheard, king of the West Saxons, 728-739. In the year 736 or 737, probably the latter, she denounced the world, and, accompanied by Forthhere, bishop of Sherborne, went to Rome, where she probably died. (Chr. S. M. H. B. 329; Flor. Wig. 542; H. H. 727.) Her name is associated with her husband's in a grant to Glastonbury, dated 729 (Kemble, C. D. 76; Mon. Angl. i. 59), and she is mentioned in the grant of Taunton to Winchester as especially urging Ethelheard to make the gift. (K. C. D. 1002.) [S]

FRITHWALD (Fredwold), an ealdorman of Surrey, who assisted St. Eorcanwald in the foundation of the abbey of Chertsey. He is described as a dependent of Wulflhere, king of Mercia (Kemble, C. D. 986, 987), and is said to have married Wilburga, a daughter of Penda, son of Wulhere, by whom he became father of St. Oswald. V. S. Osith, ap. Surius, Oct. 7, f. 222; R. de Disticii i. 111, 115. The Chertsey Cartulary contains a charter of Frithwald, bestowing on Chertsey which he describes as found in first under king Egbert of Kent, 500 manentes on the banks of the Thames near the port of London. The charter is a fabrication of no authority, as it is another granted by Frithewold and Eorcanwald together, to the same monastery (K. C. D. 986, 987), but the tradition which connects him with Chertsey is ancient and not inconsistent with probability. See Will. Malmesb. G. P. (ed. Hamilton), p. 142; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 535; Mon. Angl. i. 422, 423. [S]

FRITHOBERT (Fridbert, Fridenbertus, Frithuwulph, Frithebryht) was consecrated bishop of Hexham, in the place of Acus, the friend of Wilfrid, on Sept. 8, A.D. 734 (Symeon, Chron. p. 12; Ric. of Hexham, p. 1). In A.D. 740, during the disgrace of Cynewulf of Lindseyfame, he had the charge of that see for a year (Symeon, H. E. D. ii. 2). There is little more known about him. He died on Dec. 23, A.D. 766 (Symeon, Chron. p. 22; Ric. of Hexham, p. 37; A. S. C.). At the translation of the remains of the saints of Hexham in A.D. 1154, Frithbert's bones were discovered, with an inscription on the coffin which contained them. (Memoriales of Hexham, ed. Surtees Soc., pp. 199-200.) One of his teeth was among the relics at Durham. (Hist. Dun. Scr. Tres. app. p. 427.) [J. R.]

FRITHWALD, a Mercian monk to whom, under the designation of "Monacho Winfridi Episcopi," a grant is made by Osbera, ealdorman of the Hwicians, by the leave of Ethelred, king of Mercia. (Kemble, C. D. 17.) The charter is either corrupt or spurious. Bishop Winfrith had been deprived in 675, and might have been still alive, but the indiction given in the date does not agree with the year 680. [S]

FRITHWALD (Fredwold, Fredweold, Fredewaldus), succeeded Pechtelm as bishop of Candida Casa or Whitburn in A.D. 735 (Flor. Wigorn. i. 54). He died in A.D. 764 (Symeon, Chron. 22). [J. R.]

FRITILAS, a queen of the Marchamundi, in the end of the 4th century. She was so much impressed by what she heard of the Christian character of St. Ambrose, that she begged him to send her instruction in the Christian faith, and became a zealous believer. She travelled to Milan to see Ambrose, but arrived after his death. (Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii, § 37.) [J. L. D.]

FRITILAS, bishop of Xeres and metropolitan of Tinghir. His name is of Gothic derivation and he may have been possibly the Fritila or Fretelas to whom Jerome wrote his 106th epistle. [FRETELA.] He attended the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431, but secluded and signed the protest against the condemnation of Nestorius. (Mansi, iv. 1209; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1107.) [J. de S.]

FROARICUS, bishop of Porto (Portus) from about A.D. 675 to 690, signs the acts of the third council of Braga, and of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth councils of Toledo. His absence from the fourteenth, which was somewhat hastily convened, immediately after the termination of the thirteenth, to meet the demands of some envoys from Rome [ENNIO, JULIAN], is easily explained by the distance of his see from Toledo. (Expo. Sepr. xi. 38; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 262, 272, 283, 284.) [M. A. W.]

FRODA, an abbot who attests the grant of Ini to Malmesbury dated May 26, 704. (Kemble, C. D. 50.) [S]

FRODOBERT, abbate of the Monasterium Cellense, near Troyes. His life, written by a monk of his own monastery, or perhaps by Adso abbate of Montdidier, was published by Camuza (Camus, Prompt. Sacr. Ant. Tres. Dioec. 1 sqq. Trec. 1613); by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 8 Jan. i. 505); and by Mabillon (Acta SS. S. B. ii. 598). He was born at Troyes and educated under Ragnegundis the bishop (c. 650). After becoming a cleric he went to Luxeuil, and was there under abbot Walbert. After some years he returned to Troyes, and remained under bishop Bertold (c. 656). But burning to be free from the world and all human conversation, he chose out a fitting place for his purpose, and procured a grant of it from King Clovis, in a marsh which lay in a suburb of the city of Troyes. There building this monastery, frequently called Insula Germanica (also Insula Trescaisia and LItt), he formed a school which became famous, and died in the time of bishop Abbé (666-673). He was consecrated on Jan. 8. In the Life, he is said to have been a contemporary of the French kings Clovis son of Dagobert, and Clovis his son, i.e. Clovis II. and Clovis III. [J. G.]

FRODOMUNDUS (Rotmundus), twelfth bishop of Coutances, succeeding Hughrius or Hilderic, and followed by Willebertus. He was the founder of a nunnery, dedicated to St. Mary, in his diocese, as appears from an inscription discovered in the 17th century, and given by Nabilon in his Annales ad ann. 675, c. 535. (Gaff. Christ. xii. 686.) [S. A. B.]

FROILA (1), bishop of Mentesa. He signed the acts of the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653. (Florea, Exp. Sagr. vii. 260; Aguirez-Catalan, iii. 448; Maasi, x. 122.) [Pardus.]

FROILA (2), brother of Alfonso I. (the Catholic) king of Asturias. He is mentioned by Sebastian of Salamanca (Exp. Sagr. xiii. 481) as having shared in his brother's successful forays against the Moors, that is to say, according to Professor Dozy's most interesting explanation of this period from Arabic sources (Recherches, etc. i. 126), in his expeditions over that tract of desert country lying between the mountainous districts of northern Galicia, Asturias, and Cantabria, and the frontier line of Galicia-Cornia, Tavera, Toledo, Guadalajara, Tindela and Portos, upon which the Berber insurrection (c. p. 128) followed immediately by the great famine of 750-755, had obliged the invaders to fall back towards the middle of the 8th century. Alfonso's and Froila's expeditions, therefore, were not exactly victorious campaigns, as the Christian chroniclers represent them. Rather the two brothers seem to have explored the abandoned districts, to have put to death what Muslims remained, and to have carried back with them the Christians of the deserted towns, most of whom had embraced Mohammedanism under the rule of the conquerors (Doxy, l. c. from the Alcor Madijnous, fol. 75 r.), but who now gladly returned to their old faith. (Una quoque Arabes occupatores supralitterarum civitatum interficere, Christianos secum ad patriam duxit (Alfonso).) (Sob. Sal. cap. 13.) Froila was the father of Aurelius and Veremundus (Lemundo I.), both of whom were among the successors of Alfonso I. (Sob. Sal. cap. 17, 20.) [M. A. W.]

FROILA (3), Fruela, king of Asturias from 759 to 768, son of Alfonso the Catholic and of Pelayo's daughter Ermesinda. He reigned eleven years with considerable success, both at home and abroad. Sebastian of Salamanca (circa 880) speaks of his many victories over "the Cordovan enemy, hostem Cordobensem," and especially mentions a battle at Pontonivia, in Galicia (to the north-east of Tuy), where 54,000 infidels perished—"qui quinquecenta quattuor milia Chaldaeorum"—a number only to be outdone by the slaughter at Cordona I. The Musulman general Haunmar, son of Ademranham Ibn Hisean was taken prisoner, and put to death. On this defeat, the Mohammedan annalists, so far as Prof. Dozy's Recherches, vol. i., enable us to consult them, are silent, although Ibn Khalidoum (Dozy, l. c. p. 101) speaks of Froila's constantly increasing power, and of the recovery by him of certain important towns, in which last particular, however, he appears to confuse him with his father, Alfonso I. Later on a rebellion of the Basques, who had never acknowledged the authority of the Gothic kingdom for long together (Dahn, v. 199.), and who were now a horn in the side of the new state, was put down and punished. A certain young girl, named Numis (q. v.), among the captives, attracted Froila's attention. He made her his wife, and she became the mother of his famous son, Alfonso the Chaste (Sob. Sal. cap. 16). Disturbances arising in Galicia, where the Suevi had never been wholly amalgamated (Wittiza was probably sent by Ercigis to Tuy in 658 for the purpose of keeping down this disaffected country), Froila deviated from the whole district, not so effectually, however, as to prevent another rising some years later under his successor Silo (Sob. Sal. cap. 16, 18). Apparently in the last year of his reign he murdered (proprius mans, says Sebastian) his brother Vimaranaus, "ob invidiae Reguli," according to the Chron. Albred., while Sebastian is altogether silent as to the cause. The murder, if political, was not successful. In vain did Froila, according to the 13th-century chronicles, adopt his brother's son Veremundus (Rod. Tol. iv. 6). The party of the murdered man was not to be conciliated, and Froila speedily paid the penalty of his act, "non post multis temporis taliem justa acediae suis interfector est" (Sob. Sal. i. c.). He was buried with his wife, Numis, at Ovetum.

Froila appears to have lost an impression of harshness and cruelty upon his generation, which has descended into all subsequent accounts of his reign. "Victorius egit," says the unknown author of the Chron. Albred., "sed asper moribus fuit....ob fraterem merely in Canicas interfector est." The monk of Silos (about 1100) repeats the charge of harshness, without however mentioning the murder of Vimaranaus. He is bent upon adding to most of the particulars already chronicled the fact or tradition that Froila checked the marriage of the clergy which had prevailed under Wittiza. "Iste imposuit finem illi nequissimo scribi quod Wittiza rex inter Christum et vasum sanctitatis alterius missum est...misere immenventur, saliet ne Christi sacrosanctas canamam confugia ulceris sortinentur." (For an account of the growth and intentions of the clerical tradition respecting Wittiza, see art. under his name.) Rod. of Toledo, d. 1249, incorporates all previous accounts and adds a wholly new detail about Froila, which, if trustworthy, is the most important fact in the internal history of his reign. "He peopled Ovetum," says the archbishop, "and built there the cathedral church,...i.e. the church of San Salvador."

As far as chronicles are concerned, we have here the first appearance of this statement, in this form, at least, Lucas of Tuday's earlier statement, "iste episcopatum in Ovetum transulit a Luconii civitate," based upon the acts of the so-called council of Oviedo in the Cod. Ovet., must not, however, be overlooked. (His. Ill. iv. 73.) Roderic of Toledo, whose historical work is of a high order for his time, spoke on the authority of the Oviedo archives, which, in the first half of the 12th century, had been overhauled, compiled, and to a large extent falsified by Pelayo, bishop of Oviedo, from 1101-1129. 3 3 One of the documents included in the Chron. Albred., makes him the brother of Alfonso I. This is a confusion, however, with the real brother Froila (vo. 2).

It appears, indeed, upon examination that Froila's connexion with Oviedo (beyond the mention of his burial there by Sebastian of Salamanca) rests upon a privilege granted by Alfonse the Chaste to the church of St. Salvador at Avilés, in confirmation of his father's will, in which Froila is spoken of as having built and endowed the churches of the Saviour and of SS. Julian and Basílisa (Esp. Sgov. xxviii. Mariana, ed. Valência, 1787, iii. 511), and upon an inscription in the church of the Saviour not now existing, but which was copied and described by Pelayo of Oviedo in the Cod. Oest. before 1129. (Hubner, Inscr. Hsp. Christ. No. *93.) Both document and inscription speak of a destruction and rebuilding of Froila's churches. "Noscito," says the first stone of the inscription, "hic ante istum fuisset alterum, hoc eodem ordine situm quod princeps condidit salvatori domino suppex per omnia Froila," &c. The second stone speaks of the destruction of the older church by the pagans, a gentilis decretum sordibusque contubernal, et restitutum by Alfonso. The inscription is thus in complete agreement with the donation in which Alfonso, on the occasion of the "recuperationem domus tuae" (the donation is addressed to Christ in the curious rhymed prose of the time, see art. IDEMUS), confirms all that had been granted by his father. Very much might be written on the subject of these two sources, which, if genuine, are the earliest certain records of the second kingdom. Hubner has placed the inscription among the falsae et suspectae, no doubt on account of its connection with the too-well-known Pelayo of Oviedo. Professor Dozy, however, has been able to bring forward from the Arabic side what appears a very strong confirmation of the genuineness of both these sources. For his description of the campaign of Hicham I. against the Asturian kingdom, in 794, during the reign of Alfonso the Chaste, of the capture of the capital (which can be no other than Oviedo) and of the destruction of the churches of the royal residence, which is expressly mentioned by the Arabic annalist Naurawi, see his Recherches, i. c. vol. i. p. 145. Both the capture of the capital and the destruction of the churches are passed over in complete silence by the Christian chroniclers, who otherwise describe the campaign. The Oviedo inscription, if genuine, would thus furnish our only knowledge of the fact, from the Christian side. In all probability, then, Froila built two churches at Oviedo, and occasionally lived there (in the privilege above quoted Alfonso speaks of having been born and baptized at Oviedo, "quo solo natus, loco quod umbris exiit"), though it was not made the capital of the new state, until the reign of his son. At his death he was buried in the church he himself had built, as his uncle Fafila had been before him, in the church of Santa Cruz. Then in 794 and 795 came the storm of the Moorish invasion, and Froila's churches were either partially or wholly destroyed. (The foundation of what is still existing of Alfonso's buildings in the cathedral may very well be Froila's work.) If this is so, Froila's reign marks an important stage in the history of the infant kingdom. The first period, when the refugees as mere mountain guerrilleros maintained a precarious independence under a warlike chief, is past. The reign of Alfonso the Catholic, and the backward rush of the wave of invasion which marked it, had changed all this. When Froila succeeds his father a belt of uninhabited country divides the Christian kingdom from the Moors, and the Mohammedan frontier line, which under Pelayo touched Leon, runs now between Pamplona and Coimbra. Sheltered behind the deserted plateaux of Castille as well as by their own mountains, the refugees of Pelayo's time begin to develop a settled policy; threatened, however, on the one side by the Suevic pirates of Galicia, and on the other by the turbulent Basques. The move inland from Pravia and Cangas to the site of Oviedo, with its splendid natural capabilities both for defence and cultivation, made by Froila, opens a new time and prepares the way for the more definite steps taken by his son, under whom the kings of Asturias become kings of Oviedo, to remain such till the next forward move is made to Leon, and by whom "all things were ordered at Oviedo as they had been ordered at Toledo, both in the church and in the palace." (Chron. Almod. ap. Exp. Senv. xiii. 452.) For the supposed first foundation of Oviedo itself in the fourth year of Froila by the priest Maximus and his uncle, the abbot Fromisran, see FROMISLAN. [M. A. W.]

FROILUBA, the queen of Fafila, Pelayo's son and successor in the kingdom of Asturias. She was buried with him in the church of Santa Cruz, near Cangas de Onis (Sch. Sul. cap. 12), and her name appears in the well-known inscription still existing there. [FAFILA (2.)] At various places in the Asturias, stones are found roughly engraved with the story of Fafila's fatal encounter with the bear, and in these Froiluba appears as holding back, or saying farewell to her husband. Sandoval (Historias de Los Cinco Obispos, p. 91) and Flores, Reyes de España, i. 35, describe the most famous of these stones, inscribed in the doorway of the church of San Pedro de Villanuera, and which tradition supposes to have been placed there by Alfonso I. the Catholic, and Ermesinda, Fafila's sister, in memory of his tragic death. The Rev. H. F. Tozer describes one of the ancient stones of the same subject of Fafila and his wife at Santa Maria de Villamayor. (Gent. Mag. August, 1865.) [M. A. W.]

FROISCLUS (FROISCLUS), an Arian, was made bishop of Tortosa in the room of his Catholic FROMISTAN

predecessor Julian [JULIANUS] by the Arian king Leovigild. In 589, however, under Leovigild's converted successor, Recared, Froisclus, with the other Arian bishops, attended the famous third council of Toledo and renounced his heresy in the following form: "Froisclus in Christi nomine civitatis Dertosanae episcopus anthamattianus haeresis Arrisiare dogmata superius damnata, salem hanc sanctam catholicam quam in Ecclesiam Catholicam veniens credidi manu mea de toto corpus subscribisse."

After the reunification of the Arian bishops the council proceeded to its work, and among the signatures to its decrees are found those of the two bishops of Huesca, Julian, and Froisclus (five other pairs of bishops appear among the subscriptions). Julian signs first, as bishop of Tortosa; "Froisclus Hemon ibi episcopus," follows.
In the year 599 Julian and Froisclus appeared at the council of Barcelona, and both signed as bishops of Tortosa, the signatures of Calahorra and Ampurias intervening. It is not known which survived the other. (Esp. Sagr. xlli. 81; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 293.) [UNAM]

FROMISTAN, first abbott of the monastery of St. Vincent at Oriedo, and first discoverer of the site of Oriedo itself, according to a certain document, which in Morales' time (Viaje Santo, 1793, p. 120), was shown in the library of the monastery. (For the text see Esp. Sagr., xxxvii. Append.) It is an agreement between twenty-five persons whose names are given, headed by Montañosus presbyter, and the abbots Fromistian and his nephew Maximus, presbyters, upon the subject of the foundation of a monastery in connexion with the church of St. Vincent, founded twenty years before the agreement by Fromistian and Maximus. "It is known to all," say the twenty-five, "that this place which they call Oreto, thou, Maximus, didst first establish, and,
I together with thy serfs, didst first level and clear it (planasti illum), when it was but a mean, unexpected and uninhabited mountain, and afterwards in company with thy uncle, 'Dominico Fromstiano Abb.' didst first and the aforesaid place the church of St. Vincent, Levite and Martyr of Christ." Later on, the twenty-five signatories renounce the world, and, "as is the custom of the churches, et eruditio regula, transferring themselves and their property to the use and possession of the church of St. Vincent, under the rule of Fromistian "abbati nostro" and of Maximus. Then follows, "And I, 'Fromista Abbas, who now twenty years ago, with my nephew Maximus, priest, discovered this mean and uninhabited spot, and found the church of St. Vincent, and foot upon us the rule of the Blessed Abbot Benedict' (to which place also we gave all our possessions) so receive you to the service of God, and so make confirmation and testament with you all and with my nephew Maximus, as that, etc." Then follow threats of excommunication against those who shall at any future time transgress the rule of St. Benedict, or tamper with the possessions and the church of St. Vincent, and the agreement is signed by Fromistian and Maximus on the one side, and Montanus on behalf of the twenty-five monks on the other, in the era 819 (A.D. 781).

If this document is genuine, it is the earliest historical mention of the Benedictine rule in Spain (leaving out the more than doubtful foundation charter of the monastery of Obena, supposed to have been granted by Adalgaster, which is a mere copy of the charter of St.
Victor of Oriedo with the name changed from St. Vincent of Oriedo (Esp. Sagr. i. c.
Append. v.) It is far from universally accepted, however, by modern Spanish critics, and it will be impossible to assign it its proper place in the religious history of Spain until a more thorough critical investigation has been made of the earlier charters and monastic records of northern Spain.

[Ma. A. W.]

FRONIMIANUS, brother of Braulio of Saragoza, to whom that bishop sent his life of San Millan. [EMILIANUS (8).] [Ma. A. W.]

FRONIMIUS (1), bishop of Besarnum, related in an anonymous life to have compiled the church of St. Stephen in that town, and established there a coenobium, obtaining privileges for it from popes Damasus and Siricius. If this statement could be relied upon, the period of Fronimius would be the latter end of the 4th century (Gall. Chr. xvi. 17). [R. T. S.]

FRONIMIUS (2), 5th bishop of Agde, suc-cceeding Leo, and followed by Tigridius, and 8th of Vence, succeeding Deutherius and followed by Aurelianus. He was a native of Barges, but migrated into Septimania, where he found great favour with the count Sigevass, the successor of Athanagild, king of the Visigoths, and was consecrated to the see of Agde. But after his patron's death be was accused by the Arian Leovigild, whose son Hermengild was betrothed to Ingudis, the daughter of Sigebert, of attempting to poison her mind against him as a heretic, and was compelled to flee from his diocese to escape assassination. He repaired to king Childe-bert, who made him bishop of Vence upon the death of Deutherius. He subscribed the second council of Mâcon in A.D. 585, though his see is not appended, and died in 588. Gregory of Tours, who is the author for the foregoing narrative, also recounts how a servant of this bishop was cured of epilepsy at the tomb Vitae Patrum, cap. viii, a. 8; Labbe, Sacr. Cons.
ix. 959, Flor. 1759-98; Gall. Christ. iii. 1214,
v. 668.) [S. A. B.]

FRONITASUS, Jan. 2, martyr in Gaul with Severinus, Severianus, and Silanus, his companions.
They were disciples of St. Fronto, reputed to have been appointed bishop of Vesunna (afterwards Pettoricium, now Perigueux) by St. Peter himself. They were sent by Fronto to preach the gospel among the Gauls. They were seized by the president Squindo and put to death by him in the first persecution under Nero. The Bollandists say Claudius was emperor, but then Claudius was one of Nero's names after he was adopted by the emperor Claudius, A.D. 50. [Dal-well, in Disert. Cypriani, xi. 13, shows how doubtful are the stories of all martyrs under Nero, except those which happened in Rome. "Aliam itaque persecutionem comminiscantur necesse est, quam illam cujus menmit Tacitus, sive alios praeterque Romam Christianos in ea passos comminiscantur." ([Acta SS. Boll. Jan. i. 73.]

[Fonteinus, bishop of Peltre. [Fonteinus (2).]

Froninianus (1), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, c. A.D. 300; supposed to have suffered martyrdom A.D. 303. ([Farlati, Hsr. Sacr. i. 707.]

Froninianus (2), bishop of Gerona in the early part of the 6th century. In the 5th century, owing to the political troubles of the country, the lack of councils leaves us almost without information as to the succession of bishops over Spain. From the year 404, in which the bishopric of Gerona is mentioned by Innocent I. in his letter to the synod of Toledo (Innoc. ep. 3, cap. 2 in Patr. Lat. xx. 489 c), to the signature of Froninianus, at the council of Tarragona in 516 (Mansi, viii. 544), we have no record of the see, which must have been fought over during all that time again and again by Goths, Suevi, and Provinciales. In 517, on the prayer of Froninianus, a council was assembled at Gerona, which drew up ten canons concerning liturgical and disciplinary matters, for which see Aguirre-Catalani, i. 129; Mansi, xi. 547; *Hom. Sacr. xii. ii. 44, 220, 475; Hefele, Cosm. Gesch. ii. 655.[M. A. W.]

Froninianus (3), bishop of Ancyræ towards the close of the 6th century. He had previously been bishop of Salona, but had been deposed for refusing to subscribe the condemnation of the "Three Chapters," and banished to Antioch in the Thebaid. In 562 he was recalled from exile, and translated to Ancyræ (Victor, Tununens. Chron. s. n. 532, Migne, Patr. Lat. ivii. 961; Le Quien, Orbes Chrétiens i. 455, 456). The next known bishop of Ancyræ was Paulius, c. A.D. 590. ([T. W. D.]

Froninianus (4), bishop of Salona, A.D. 630-638. ([Farlati, Hsr. Sacr. ii. 265.]

[de S.]

Froninianus (5) was one of the series of bishops who held the see of Huesca or Osca during its occupation by the Moors, and did not therefore assume that title, but styled themselves bishops of Aragon, or bishops of Jacca after that town was recovered from the Moors. They resided at the monastery of St. Pedro de Ciresa or that of St. Juan de la Peña. The only information we have about Froninian is derived from the Life of St. Urbez or Urbichius, who was a hermit, and lived near Huesca. Froninian is said to have been devoted to St. Urbez, to have frequently visited him, and to have been miraculously cured by him of a fever. He appears to have been a bishop about A.D. 802. ([D. Ayora, Fundacion de Huesca, 278, 351.]

Froninianus (1), reckoned the first bishop of Florence, c. A.D. 56, and probably its first instructor in the Christian faith. ([Ugheini, Ital. Sacr. iii. 14; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvi. 432.]

Froninianus (2), Jovianist, condemned by pope Sisirdus. In Cellarius (iv. 652) he is called Felix Fronint, but the more common form is Plotinus and Froninianus. Baronius (Ann. vi. ann. 390, xliii. ed. Thunier) has Prinotinus, with alternative readings Pontinus and Froninianus. (See also Patr. Lat. xxiii. 1171 n.)

Froninianus (3) (Froninianus), bishop of Avignon, 306-324. He was born of an opulent family at Alba in Italy, became a presbyter at Rome, died from the persecution of Galerius into Gaul and settled at Avignon. Here he led a retired life for two or three years, and so gained the affections of the people that he was unanimously chosen to succeed Primus as bishop. This account is stated by the Sammarthians to rest on the authority of the manuscript registers of the see of Avignon and Savaro's catalogue of the bishops. ([Gall. Chr. i. 856.]

[de C.]

Froninianus (4) (Victor, Tununens. Chron. ann. 502, bishop of Salona. ([Froninianus (4).]

[de T. W. D.]

Frono (1). That the first bishop of Perigueux was St. Frono all the authorities agree. But all else, age, country, and particulars of his life, are uncertain. There is, as the Sammarthians pitifully observe, profound silence concerning him in all the ancient writers, long and minute accounts of him in the more recent. ([Gall. Christ. ii. 1446; Tillemont, Mém. iv. 502; Gams, Srh. Episc. 597.) Usuard's account of him is that he was ordained a bishop at Rome by St. Peter, along with Georgius, a presbyter, who was raised from the dead by the apostle's staff, and became Frono's companion in travel. St. Frono was the apostle of Périgueux, died in peace, and was commemorated Oct. 25. (Usuard, Mart. Oct. 25.)

[de T. S.]

Frono (2), a member of the Ephesian church, sent by that church to meet Ignatius at Smyrna on his way to Rome. ([Ign. Ep. ad Eph. 3.]

[de G.]

Frono (3), M. CORNELIUS. We learn from Minucius Felix (ix. xxxi) that an oration against the Christians was published by Frono, in which the charge was dwelt on that presumptuous and incestuous intercourse took place at the Christian meetings. This Frono is described as a native of Cirta, and therefore may be safely identified with the tutor of Marcus Aurelius, concerning whom, see Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography; Teuffel, Gesch. der röm. Lit. 730. No reference to the Christians is found in Frono's extant remains. ([de G.]

Frono (4), FRONTONUS, FRONTONIUS, abbot, is commemorated by Usuard (Apr. 14, sp. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 384, and note) also by Ado (ob. cxxiii. 247), and Notker (ob. cxxiii. 1065). The Bollandists (Acta SS. 14 Apr. ii. 201-3) treat De S. Fronkone obitate in Eremita Nigriensi in Aegypto, giving prefatory notes and a Vita, autore coepto, ex MS. et Rosendo in Vitis Patrorn. The same life is given from Rosweyde by Surius (de Prob.
FRANTO

Sact. ii. 158-9, and is said to have been written by one who received the information from one of St. Fronto's monks; by some it is attributed to St. Jerome, yet probably only as a collector of lives. According to the Life, Fronto, there called Frontoani, abhorring the common life and seeking for solitude, gathered to him some brethren (called seventy), and led them into the Nitrian desert, where they cultivated the ground and lived in pious austerity; the special trials of the abbot were probably only as the brethren becoming resting under the monastic severity. The last clause of the life says he flourished in the thirteenth year of Antoninus the emperor, which would be A.D. 151 or 152.

J. G. [FRONTO (6), priest of Malum, is said in the Passio S. Theodoti Ancyr. (Boll. Acta SS. 18 May, iv. 163-5; Ruinart, Acta Mart. Siccor. 350-5) to have carried away the body of the martyr Theodotus. He had come to Ancyrna on the evening of the day on which St. Theodotus suffered, and by giving the soldiers, who were watching the body, to drink freely of the wine with which his ass was laden, he snatched the corpse while they slept, and laying it on the ass sent it by a safe messenger to Malum. This was in A.D. 303. Fronto raised his own wine: “agriculturam enim exercet egregius iste vir.”

J. G. [FRONTO (6), martyr, April 16. [SARAGO., MARTYRS OF.]

FRONTO (7), Arian bishop of Nicopolis, a town in the mountain district of Lesser Armenia. He seems to have originally belonged to the orthodox party, and was one of the clergy at Nicopolis; but he was won over by the Arians, and by their assistance was consecrated bishop of Nicopolis. Basil (Ep. 238, 239, 240) consoles the clergy of Nicopolis for the defection of one of their number, he declares Fronto to be an object of execration throughout the whole of Armenia, and refuses to acknowledge him as a bishop or to accept his ordinations; (Ep. 246, 247) he exhorts the people of Nicopolis to endurance under the trials and persecutions arising from their bishop's conduct and opinions. It appears that Fronto held the see only for a brief period (A.D. 372-375) (Patr. Græc. xxii. 306; Cellier, Ant. socr. iv. 481; Le Quien, O. C. i. 427.)

L. D. [FRONTO (8), bishop of Phaselis in Lyca, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 985; Manni, v. 1086.)

L. D. [FRONTO (9), bishop of Milan, c. 555-566, said to have been ejected as a schismatic. There appears, however, a doubt whether any bishop of Milan so named lived at that date. If he did, he must have been the successor of Vitalis and the predecessor of Auxianus, which last seems clearly to have been elected A.D. 566. (UgHELLI, It. Sacr. iv. 82; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xi. 117.)

R. S. G. [FRONTO (10) appears in the Series Episcoporum of Gams as an archbishop of Bordeaux in the early part of the 8th century, between Antonius and Verebulphus, but a doubt is suggested whether he and his predecessor should not be attributed to the see of Angoulême. He is omitted by the authors of the Gallia Christiana (ii. 795). [S. A. B.]

FRONTIUS, seventh bishop of Angoulême, succeeding Mererius and followed by Heraclius. Before his elevation he was sent by Abbonius, the predecessor of Mererius, on a mission to Sabaudes bishop of Pottiers, or Saintes, to ask that the holy monk. St. Eparchius, might be at liberty to make his abode in the diocese of Angoulême. Frontius obtained the see of Angoulême by murdering the occupant, Mererius, but enjoyed the fruits of his crime for one year only (A.D. 758-79). (S. Eparchii Vita, s. 4, Boll. Acta SS. Jul. I. 118; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 37; Gall. Christ. ii. 980, 1452.) [S. A. B.]

FRUCTUOSUS (1), martyr, bishop of Tarragona in the 3rd century. The Acta of his martyrdom, and of that of his two deacons, Eulogius and Angurius, who suffered with him, are the most ancient of Spanish Acta, and are marked by a realistic simplicity which contrasts very favourably with the style of many of the Acts of the Diocletian persecution, with those of the two Eulalii for instance. Prudentius made use of them in his hymn to the martyrs (Felix Tarracii Fructuosi vestris, etc., Peristephi, vi.), and they are largely quoted by St. Augustine in one of his sermons (No. 275, Migne, Patr. Lat. xxviii.). The Hieronymian Martyrologies confuse both names and place, but in Bede, Usuard, and Ado, they are correctly given, as in the mass general of later martyrologies. In the fine 10th century Sanctorale, from the monastery of Cardeña, mentioned under St. Eulalia of Barcelona (q.v.), the Acta of Fructuosus and his companions are grouped at fol. 131-138 (Brit. Mus. Addit. MSS. 25, 609). Acta. Under Valerianus and Gallienus, in the consolatium of Aemilianus and Præses (ann. 259), Aemilianus Præses of Tarragona, "aut feritas impulsa aut imperitis ampla," issued an edict directed against the Christians, compelling all to sacrifice to the gods. Hearing this, the bishop Fructuosus, together with the whole church of Tarragona, gave themselves to unceasing prayer. One night, after Fructuosus had retired to rest, four apparitores appeared at his gate and summoned him and his deacons before the Praeses. He roused his companions, they dressed hastily and were led to prison. This was Sunday, and they remained in prison till Friday, enjoying, however, a certain amount of intercourse with the brethren outside. Fructuosus even baptized a catechumen within the prison. On their appearance before the Praeses, a short dialogue ensued between themselves and the judge, in which all thrice simply and steadfastly avowed their faith. Finally the Praeses asked Fructuosus "Art thou the bishop of the Christians?" He answered. "I am." To whom the Praeses, "Thou wast," and he gave orders for them to be scourged and burnt alive. On their way to the amphitheatre a crowd both of Christians and Liturgies, though Gams thinks it not likely (Kirchenrecht, von Spanien, i. 270). The Acta quoted by Augustine seem to have contained a statement about the age of Fructuosus, which is not found in any of the printed copies. Comparing the relative power of the martyrs and the gods, and referring, of course, to the mythical founder of Tarragona, he says, "Contra uam infirnum et tremetnum omnibus membris senem, quid valet Hercules?" This would throw the birth of Fructuosus into the 2nd century, and is interesting as bearing upon the date of the introduction of Christianity into Tarraconensis. Fructuosus is the first bishop of Tarraco whose name remains. In Hübner's Inscriptiones Hisp. Christ. nos. 57, 85, are two inscriptions from Movera in Estremadura, and Medina Sidonia, of the 6th and 7th centuries respectively, containing the names of Fructuosus and his successors. Their festival was on Jan. 21. (Exp. Syl. xvi. 9; Gams, K.-G. i. 265.)

FRUCTUOUSUS (2), a person present at the search for sacred books and utensils in the case of Silvanus, during the persecution, A.D. 303-304. (Ang. c. Cresci. iii. 29; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 170, ed. Oberthür.)

FRUCTUOUSUS (4), a bishop present at the council of Carthage, against the Pelagians, A.D. 416. (Ang. Ep. 175.)

FRUCTUOUSUS (5), bishop of Giru Marcelli (Marcelliana) in Numidica, banished by Humeric, A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia. 56, in Migne, Patr. Lat. iviii.; Morcelli, Africa Chrisl. i. 172.)

FRUCTUOUSUS (6), bishop of Emporias (Ampurias), appears at the third council of Toledo, A.D. 589, represented by his archpriest Galanus. (Exp. Syl. xiii. 269; Aguirre-Catalana. iii. 325.)

FRUCTUOUSUS (7), bishop of Eugubium (Gubbio), said to have been consecrated by Benedict I. A.D. 577, and if so was probably the immediate predecessor of Gaulus. Doubts, however, of his existence, have been expressed. (Ugellii, Itali. Soc. i. 877; Cappelletti, Chiese d'Ital. v. 380.)

FRUCTUOUSUS (8), bishop of Lerida in 633, when his signature is found among those given to the acts of the fourth council of Toledo. He may possibly be identified with the Fructuosus diaconus who signs the acts of the council of Egara in 614 as the representative "Domine mei Gomarellis episcopi." (Exp. Syl. xlii. 105, 106; Aguirre-Catalana. iii. 363, 542.)

FRUCTUOUSUS (9), bishop of Beja (Vila Franca) in the proconsular province of Africa, subscribed the letter of his province against the errors of the Monothelites to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, who favoured their views, A.D. 646. This letter was read at the first Lateran council. (Mansi, x. 939; Morecelli, Africa Chrisl. i. 185.)

Lesley supposes (Prof. in Missale Mixtum, &c. no. 210) that Fructuosus had in his mind certain words of the Missa omnia offerentium as they appear in the Mozarabic Liturgy (p. 229, i. 35, and at p. 5, i. 91), and brings forward the speech, as one proof among others, of the antiquity of the Liturgy. ("Eclesiam sanctam catholicam in orationibus in mente habeamus, ut eam Dominus et fide et spe et chritiate propitius ampliare dignetur," &c.) But it is of course quite possible, if we are to suppose any connexion between the two passages, that the words of the Acta were absorbed into the FRUCTUOUS (10), ST., bishop of Dumium, and afterwards of Braga, a famous Spanish saint of the 7th century, whose life was written shortly after his death by St. Valerianus, abbot of the Monasterium 'Rubinense' (San Pedro de Montes), near Astorga, one of the houses founded by St. Fructuosus. The father of Fructuosus was a Gothic noble who had led the country's forces in war, and who possessed lands and flocks in the Vierzo. (A mountainous district between Astorga and Lugo—the Asturica Augusta and Lucus Augusti of the Romans—watered by the Sil and its tributaries, and bounded to the north by the Asturian mountains, and to the south by the plateaux of central Spain. It owes its name to the Roman town of Bergidum, once the centre of the district.) Once when going upon a round of inspection of his estates the father took the boy Fructuosus with him, and the child, struck with the loneliness and beauty of the mountain valley, inwardly resolved to found a monastery there which should have grounds to make his father happy, and in which he himself might be buried. On his father's death he placed himself under the teaching of the neighbouring bishop, Conatius (q. v.) of Palencia, as a preparation for a hermit's life. Here marvels already began to surround him, and to point him out as a future saint. As soon as he was old enough he sent his son to the monastery of San Isidro in Madrid, near Avila, where he left Palencia for the innermost recesses of the Vierzo, founding his first monastery, the Monasterium Complutense (so called from its dedication to the martyrs of Complutum, SS. Justus and Pastor), in the "narrow plain of emerald green, nearly half a mile long, and about 100 ft. wide, deeply sunk in the heart of the wild mountains," where stands the modern village of Compludo. Without reserving anything for himself, St. Fructuosus gave up his property to the use of the brotherhood, and presently the solitary valley was full of monks flocking thither from all parts of Spain. One person only saw the rising house with envy and dissatisfaction; that was his father-in-law, who had hoped apparently for the inheritance of the saint's property, and now saw all given to strangers. He accordingly went to the king, and petitioned that some of the property of the new monastery might be assigned to him on the pretence of using it in some state service. Fructuosus no sooner heard of it than he stripped the altar, covered them with ashes, and wrote a letter of rebuke and warning to the delinquent, who, indeed, speedily died without any heirs to enjoy the property he had wished to plunder. Meanwhile the fame of the saint grew day by day, and soon the numbers of his adherents grew so large that leaving others in charge of the convent, he withdrew farther into the wilderness in search of more undisturbed solitude.

Near the source of the Oza, a river rising among the heights of the Montes Aguinaus (or Aquinas, the Eagle's Crag), and running thence into the Sil below Ponferrada, he founded his second monastery, the Monasterium Vianaense, afterwards the famous San Pedro de Montes, of which his biographer Valerius was abbot, which was restored in the 10th century by San Gennadio, and existed as a monastery until the general dissolution of the religious houses in the present century. Later on he founded the Visusine, north of the Sil, among the Aguiar mountains, which passed long afterwards into the possession of the Cistercian house of Garcinaco, the Ponsense, on the coast of Galicia, and many others, whose names are not given. Thus the saint, "giving the last remains of his great fortune to churches, to the poor, and to the freedmen of his house, penetrated every day into great deserts, peopling them with monks by means of the convents which he built, giving them the wherewithal of living holily, and instructing them for a time by his example. Then he himself would fly deeper into the rocks and woods to avoid the commerce of men, and to be known and seen of God only." Once some jackdaws, which had been tamed in the convent, found out his retreat, and proclaimed it by their cries of joy. Again a doe, which was pursued by the hounds, fled to him for shelter. The saint protected her, and the animal followed him home, and thenceforward never left him. When the saint slept she slept at his feet, when he went far away from him. At last, to the grief of the saint, an ill-disposed youth killed her. The youth was seized with fever, and nothing but the prayers of Fructuosus saved him from death.

After this half legendary time in the Vierzo we come to the more public portion of the saint's life. He seems to have lived in the shrine of St. Eulalia of Merida, and thence to Seville and Cadiz. Near Cadiz Fructuosus founded a monastery nine miles from the sea, to which monks flocked so abundantly that the Dux exercitus of that province complained to the king that there would soon be no men left for the army. His fame also was a noble lady, Benedicta by name, who lived first in a hermitage built for her by the saint, and became afterwards the abbess of a convent of eighty nuns. Here also Fructuosus determined to end his life in the Holy Land, and he accordingly chartered a vessel for the voyage. But the king (Rechwenith), warned of this intention, and fearing lest such a light of sanctity should be lost to Spain, ordered that the saint should be brought before him. When he appeared at Toledo the king compelled him to accept the see and abbacy of Dumium, founded by St. Martin. Thence, in 656, at the tenth council of Toledo, he was transferred by the unanimous voice of the bishops to the metropolitan see of Braga, in the place of the deposed Potamius. A question arose in the same council concerning the will of the deceased bishop of Dumium, Rechmir, which was found to contain provisions contrary to the canons. For the amending of these clauses the council deputed the management of the whole matter to Fructuosus (Canc. 43 p.).

After his elevation to the see of Braga Fructuosus, still leading the hermit's life of austerity and almsgiving, founded one more monastery on the road from Braga to Dumium (which, under the name of San Fructuoso, and under Franciscan rule, was still existing in the 18th century), and began also the building of the Visusine church. When they were building he was inwardly warned of his approaching death, and, being eager to leave his work perfected and complete, he carried on the work of building, not only by day but by night also, the masons working by torchlight under the saint's direction. At last the final touch was given, and the work stood completed. Then Fructuosus knew that his last day was come. He told his disciples, who wept bitterly, while he alone was joyful. One of them asked him whether he feared death. "No, indeed," he answered; "for though a sinner, I am going to the presence of my Lord." They bore him to the church, and there, after he had received the penitential habit, he remained prostrate before the altar through the day and night. "As the day dawned he lifted his arms in prayer, and yielded his stainless and holy soul into the hands of God."

The preceding account is taken from the life by Valerius, with the exception of the connexion of the saint with the bishopric of Diumum, and of the proceedings with regard to Reciniger. Valerius, whose life was in many points similar to that of Fructuosus, was, as we have said, abbot of San Pedro de Montes towards the end of the 7th century, and from the opuscula of his remaining (Epsy. Sapr. xvi.) as well as from his biography, we see that he gathered up many of the local memories and stories of Fructuosus remaining in the Vierz. He speaks of intercourse with old pupils and servants of Fructuosus, and for the general story of the saint's life he says that he was indebted to Cassian, abbot of San Fructuoso, and the saint's first disciple, and to the priests, Benezatus and Julianus, who had accompanied him in his journeys. Our only other sources of information respecting Fructuosus are—(1) the acts of the tenth council of Toledo, or rather the decreum appended to the acts, on the subject of the crime, penitence, and deposition of Potamius (q. v.), and the succession of his see, and the gathering of several of his letters as to the youth of Fructuosus at the time, and the comparative immaturity of his work on the one hand, and as to the possible influence on him of the example of the life of San Millan on the other. There is no indication of date in the letters, but they must have been written before the year 631, in which Benezatus died, and are probably a good deal earlier, as there is no trace of complaint in them of that decay of intellectual power of which Braulio speaks sorrowfully elsewhere. The dates of San Fructuosus's life are quite unknown. That of his appearance at the tenth council of Toledo, in 631, is the only fixed point. Gams (Kirchengesch. ii. 153–157) thinks he did not long survive the year 660, which would throw the period of his principal monastic activity back to the first third of the century. He was buried in the convent of San Fructuoso, near Braga, where his remains were removed to Compostella in the 12th century, by the well-known archbishop Diego de Gelmirez. The cult of the saint began immediately after his death (see conclusion of Acta), and in the 10th century San Genesio appears as the restorer or second founder of the monastic system inaugurated by Fructuosus in the "holy Vierz."

The first letter, Fructuosi presbyteri ad Braulionem, speaks of the fame of Braulio, and how the news of his life and deeds "pleases our humble ear amid the hoarse sounding waves of the foaming brine, of the eddying ocean, and the unquiet seas," which looks as if the letter were written from that monastery on the Gallician coast, of which we hear in the life. Braulio is asked to solve certain biblical questions (of a curiously trifling kind), and finally Fructuosus winds up with a request for the loan of certain books, for seventeen of the Collations of Cassian, for the lives of the holy men, Honoratus and Germanus, "vestrique beatissimi novi Aemiliiani" [Emilianus (8)], and with a prayer for his kindy remembrance of those "far off and sunk in the dark district of the west," who thus address him. The bishop's letter, of much greater length and pretensions, answers his questions, which, however, Braulio thinks Fructuosus might have answered for himself, and contains a pæan of gratitude to the saint. As to the books, the bishop is not able to give a satisfactory answer. Of some of them he has no duplicates, others have been taken out of his cupboard, and cannot be found (see preface to the Vita Sancti Aemiliiani, for an interesting correspondence between this passage and what he there says of the loss of life MS.). But when found they shall be sent to Fructuosus.

Finally, Fructuosus is not to talk despondently of the province in which he lives, but is to remember its Greek origin ("Graecam originem sibi defendit," conf. Isid. Etym. ix. 2, Hi (Gallanci) graecas sibi origines asserens), and the illustrious men it has brought forth, such as Orosius, Turribius, Iatius, and Caritiers. Only let him beware of the venom of the Priscillians, peculiar to that country, and which has in bygone times infected even such men as the holy Orosius.

Various inferences may be drawn from these letters as to the youth of Fructuosus at the time, and the comparative immaturity of his work on the one hand, and as to the possible influence on him of the example of the life of San Millan on the other. There is no indication of date in the letters, but they must have been written before the year 631, in which Benezatus died, and are probably a good deal earlier, as there is no trace of complaint in them of that decay of intellectual power of which Braulio speaks sorrowfully elsewhere. The dates of San Fructuosus's life are quite unknown. That of his appearance at the tenth council of Toledo, in 631, is the only fixed point. Gams (Kirchengesch. ii. 153–157) thinks he did not long survive the year 660, which would throw the period of his principal monastic activity back to the first third of the century. He was buried in the convent of San Fructuoso, near Braga, where his remains were removed to Compostella in the 12th century, by the well-known archbishop Diego de Gelmirez. The cult of the saint began immediately after his death (see conclusion of Acta), and in the 10th century San Genesio appears as the restorer or second founder of the monastic system inaugurated by Fructuosus in the "holy Vierz."

FRUSCOBUS, bishop of Mentosa. [FRUSCUBUS.]
FRUMARIUS, Suevian king of Spain from cir. 460 to cir. 463. He belongs to the period from 456 to 463, when the Suevi were struggling against the allied Gothic and Roman armies. Theodoric II., who had been the ally of the Suevian king Reikar (448-456) up to 456, fell back in that year upon the foedus with Rome, which his successor Euric was soon to set aside altogether. The Suevi, attacked by the allied Goths and Provincials, were hard pressed. In the course of the campaign Reikar was taken and executed, and Theodoric appointed Aliulf governor of the Suevian territory. In the extreme north-west of Gallicia, however, a band of Suevi made Maldrada king. (Idat. ann. 460.) A time of great confusion follows. Maldrada, Aliulf, and Franta all appear as Suevian kings between 456 and 460. In 459 (? Maldrada made his son Remsubm district-king (Besirks-König, regulus, Jord. c. 44), and in 460, after Maldrada's murder, we have the first appearance of Frumari (Idat. ann. 460). Who Frumari was is far from clear. He may have been a son of the brother murdered by Maldrada in 460 (Dahn, vi. 566), and if so, a cousin of Remsubm. At any rate, he seems to represent a time of anarchy and confusion, when the West Suevi, who after Reikar's defeat and death, made Maldrada king, appears as distinct from, and at one time even in discord with the East Suevi under Remsubm. Under the year 460 Idatus speaks of the descent of Frumari upon Aquae Flavinae, of the capture of himself, "capit Idatio Episcopo, septimo Kalendas Augusti in Aquae Flavieni Ecclesia," as the determinant of the district. [Idatus.] Meanwhile Remsubm, who appears so far to have acted in concert with Frumari, was ravaging the country of the Auregenes on the Minho and the coast about Lugo. Immediately afterwards dissensions arose between the two chiefs, followed by a short truce between the Suevi and Provincials, and negotiations between the Suevi and the Goths, at that time occupying the position of Roman foederati in various towns of the peninsula, possibly set on foot by Remsubm with the object of obtaining help against Frumari. (Dahn, i. c.) The Gothic and Suevian legates meet in Lugo, and Remsubm goes twice to Theodoric at Tolouse. During his absence, in spite of the presence of certain Gothic troops commanded by Cyril in Gallicia, collisions occurred between the Provincials and Frumari's Suevi. (Idat. ann. 462.) In 463 (according to Dahn; Florez gives 464) Frumari died, and Remsubm thereupon united all the Suevian districts in one kingdom, strengthening his position moreover, by close alliance with Theodoric II.

The supposition that after Maldrada's death Frumari at first ruled the West Suevi as district-king (Besirks-König) in dependence on Remsubm, and that he subsequently broke loose and assumed an independent position, Dahn thinks "not likely"—though it remains quite possible. (Idatus, Chron. apud Exp. Sagr. iv., Migne, Patr. Lat. ii. 387; Iisdor, Hist. Suevorum, idem, v. i. p. 124, "Könige der Germanen, v. 386."

FRUMENTIUS (2), March 23. Two African martyrs of the same name are commemorated on this day. They were merchants who suffered for the Catholic faith, at the hands of the Arians, in the Vandal persecution under Hunneric, A.D. 471. (Marty. Rom. Vet.; Adonis, Usuardi; Victor. Vitas, de Persecut. Vandal. lib. 3.) [G. T. S.]

FRUMENTIUS (3), the name of two African bishops, viz. of Tibursica near Tagaste, in Numidia, and of Telepte in the inland part of the Byzacene, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Noticia, 56, 58; Patr. Lat. vIIIi.; Morelli, Africa Christ. i. 311, 315.) [L. D.]

FRYGES. (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 40, 50, 65, v.) [Pryges.] [T. W. D.]

FUGATIUS, a form of FaGAD (Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. iv. cc. 5-7); also used by Baronius (Ann. Eccl. A.D. 183, i. 227). [J. G.]

FUGITIVUS, metropolitan of Seville in Dec. 465, when the tenth council of Toledo was held. Florez identifies him with the abbot Fugitus, whose signature, together with that of the abbot Ildefonsus, afterwards the famous Ildefonsus of Toledo, occurs among those of the ninth council of Toledo (provincial not national), which met Dec. 2, 458. (F. G. I. Supr. ix. 219; Aurrere-Catalani, iv. 145, 154.) [Margar.]

FULARTACH (FALERTUS, Felbertus, FoLARATAIO, Fularaciius). (1) Son of Brecc, commemorated Mar. 29, Dec. 21. Colgan (Acta SS. 787) gives a brief notice of this hermit, whose sanctity is more carefully recorded in kalendars and festalities than in other histories. He was descended from the most illustrious family of Rudhraige, and of the race of Conal Cearrauth, in Ulster. He had a hermit-cell at Offaly, on the borders of Kildare and King's County: this was named Disert-Fulartagh. Some say the hermit afterwards became bishop at Clonard, but the Annals, like the Four Masters, place the death of "Fulartach, son of Brecc, an anchorite," at A.D. 755, and that of the bishop of Clonard at A.D. 774 (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 251, iv. 108). Evidently the Annals contemplate different persons, but O'Gorman and later writers regard them as one.

(2) Of Donagbheatrick, bishop. In the Tripe Life of St. Patrick there is mention made of Felartus, whom Colgan (Acta SS. 788) calls Fulartus, giving at the same time a memoir of St. Fulartus, bishop. In the middle of the fifth century he was a steady and active disciple of St. Patrick, and for many years was his constant companion and assistant. It is said in the Vita
FULCARIUS

S. Benigni that when St. Patrick came into the west of Connaught, he refused the hospitality he sought at the house of Echinnus, son of Brian, son of Ethoglao, king of Connaught, and that, retracing his steps, he came to a place afterwards known as Donaghpatrick, near Lough Corrib, where he built a church and gave it to bishop Fulartus. Fulartus had two virgin sisters, who were dedicated to the Lord, namely, Crot, who had been twice married, and Croche, who was on an island of the name of Cui-chomacine on the coast of Connemara. (Colgan, Tr. Thum. 134, c. 39, 136, c. 52, 178 n. 110, 111; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 518; Laugien, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 5, § 10, c. 7, § 8; Kelly, Cat. Ir. Saints, 108, 109.)

FULCARIUS (Fulcher, Fularcizus), 32nd or 33rd bishop of Limerick, succeeded Florbertus and followed by Agilfridus, is said by Aegidius to have sat for fifteen years. He is one of the bishops addressed in the twelfth letter of pope Zachary, written probably a.D. 748. (Migne, Patr. Lat. ixxxix. 948.) In 757 he signed a charter for the monastery of Gorze, confirming the privileges granted by St. Chrodegangus. (Migne, Patr. Lat. ixxxix. 1121–6.) His signature is also found appended to two charters given in a.D. 762 by king Pipin for the foundation of the monastery of Prum. The Plocatum Attinacense was subscribed by a "Fulericus Episcopus civit. Tungiri." This can hardly be other than Fulcarius, especially as variations in the spelling of the name from that of Baronia above given, are found in other accounts. This, however, involves the rejection of Aegidius's fifteen years for the duration of the bishopric, unless with Pagius we believe the plenitude to be properly dated three years earlier than the date above given. (Gall. Chro. pag. 1830; Bar. Patrolog. Reg. 762 n. iv.; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. xi. 675, Flor. 1759–98; Aegidius, Gest. Pontif. Loc. i. 147, ed. Chapenuville, Liége, 1812.)

FULCILIUS, eighth bishop of Nevers, succeeding Agrilo and followed by Rannacus, or according to Coquelle's list, ninth, succeeding St. Agrilo and followed by St. Arigius, about the close of the 8th century. (Coquelle, Hist. du Néerwis, sub fin. Paris, 1612; Gall. Christ. xi. 627.)

FULCAOLDUS (1) (Coaldus, Baloldus, Fraldus, Fouldus, Fouldus) forty-third bishop of Lyons, succeeding Godwinus, and followed by Madalbertus, or Mautbert. All we know of him is derived from the life of St. Bonitus (St. Bon or St. Bonis), bishop of Clermont, who died and was buried at Lyons, and whose remains his successor, Nordobert, had vainly sought to obtain from Godwin, the predecessor of Fulcaoldus. Proculus was more successful with Fulcaoldus, and installed the relics at Clermont (Vita S. Boniti, § 31 et seq., Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedict. sec. iii. pars 1, p. 59, Paris, 1868–1910). It was during his episcopate that Lyons, in common with a great part of France, fell under the domination of the Saracens. In that calamitous period, and, if we may believe the ecclesiastical historians, the yet more peaceful time of Charles Martel's ascendency, which followed the battle of Tours (732), the archbishopric of Lyons, like the see of Vienne, was long vacant, while no less than ten years elapsed between the death of Fulcaoldus in A.D. 744 and the consecration of his successor. (Gall. Christ. iv. 31; cf. Ada, Chron. Migne, Pat. Lat. cxiii. 122.)

FULCALDUS (2), abbot of Faris (between Rome and Rieti), from A.D. 740 to 758. He came originally from Aquitaine. In 746 he received a gift of land from Lupus duke of Spoleto. His name is found in connexion with various exchanges of land and other transactions in diplomas of various dates from 744 to 756. (Troyes, Cod. Dipl. Nos. 567, 574, 586, etc.; iv. 148, etc.; Catal. Abb. Forf. p. 585, and Contrauctio Farfori, p. 526, in Ferris. Monum. vol. xi.)

FULGENTIAUS (1), legendary bishop of Arina in Campania, cir. A.D. 100. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. 22; Ugelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 129.)

FULGENTIIUS (2), bishop of Otiracio in Umbria (Utriculensis), mentioned in Greg. Magn. Dial. (lib. iii. cap. 12; Migne, Lxvii. 240) as having been ill-treated by Tetilia and the Gaths. His date is 545 according to Cappellati. (Le Chiese d'Italia, iv. 573, 579.)

FULGENTIUS (3), Fabius Claudius Gordanianus, bishop of Ruspe, was born in the year a.D. 468 and died a.D. 553. His life was spent for the most part in those provinces of northwestern Africa which were brought under the cruel tyranny of the Vandal kings, Genseric, Hunneric, and Theodoric, and he witnessed and suffered from the persecutions inflicted by those enemies of the Catholic faith. The writings of Fulgentius himself, a biographical memoir of the saint prefixed to his works, and addressed to Felicianus his successor in the bishopric of Ruspe, supposed to be written by Ferrandus, a deacon of the church at Carthage (Felicianus (14), Ferrandus), and a treatise De Percussione Vincens, written by Victor Vitensis in 487 (viz. Bibliotheca Maxima Patrum, tom. vii. and Migne, Patr. Lat. tom. livii.), are the principal sources of information concerning this outbreak of barbaric malice. Every refinement of cruelty seems to have been visited upon the presbyters, bishops, and virgins, of the north African church during the reign of Genseric and Hunneric. At the first incursion of the Vandals the whole country was desolated, the houses of prayer and basilicas were often razed to the ground; neither age nor sex was any shield from these cruelties, and the tombs of the martyrs were rifled for treasure. The bishops were banished from their sees, the clergy were harshly used, and every effort was made to alienate the masses of the people from the Catholic faith. At the commencement of the reign of Hunneric (Victor, lib. ii.), a gleam of sunshine cheered the church, during which the vacant see of Carthage was filled by Eugenius (Eugenius (21)), whose extraordinary virtues are daily recorded by his biographers. His popularity with the people excited the rage and animosity of the conquerors, who forbade their own people to enter the church where he ministered. Those who disobeyed these orders were submitted to torture, were blinded, and died many of the inhuman treatment. Women were scalp and stripped and paraded through the streets. Victor says, "We knew many of these." Hunneric must have hated Christianity in any form, as Jocundus, the Arian patriarch was burned alive, and Manicheans were hunted down like wild beasts. At the end of the second year of his reign, the king refused all position in the court or executive to any but Arians, and banished to Sardes all who refused to conform; heavy pecuniary fines were imposed whenever a bishop was ordained; peculiar and malicious inhumanity was visited upon Christian women, from the consequences of which many died and many were crippled for life. In 486, the bishops and priests were exiled into the desert [FELIX OF AN-DRADE], and in the eighth year of the reign of Hun-neric, a bishop was exiled, and an edict was promulgated (Victor, b. lib. iii.), in which the Homonoians were summoned to renounce their faith, a date being fixed for their submission, their churches were doomed to be destroyed, their books burned, their pastors banished. The consequences of this bloody edict are detailed with horrorous circumstances by Victor, and even Gibbon allows that they must have been inhuman in their severity. The cruelties of the Diocletian persec-tion were equalled if not surpassed by the measures thus taken to extirpate the homousian faith. Gordian, the grandfather of Fulgentius, a senator of Carthage, was exiled by Genseric.
His sons were reduced to their home during an interval of grace, to find their property in the hands of Arian priests. They were not allowed to remain at Carthage, and settled themselves at Telepte, in the province of Byzacene. One of them, Claudius by name, married Maria Anna, a Christian lady, and she gave birth in 486 to Fulgentius.

The mother of Fulgentius was particularly careful to secure the best education for her son. She compelled his study of the Greek language, and would not allow him to indulge in the perusal of Roman literature, until he should have committed to memory the greater part of the poems of Homer, and of the plays of Menander. He was then allowed to pursue a more varied course of study. He displayed great talent for business and much versatility. His fine character recommended him to the court, and he was appointed fiscal procurator of the province, and learned his first lessons in the art of ruling men. But in the midst of these pur-SUITS he became enamoured of heavenly things, and after persuing Augustine's comment on Ps. xxxvi.
(xxvii. Heb.), he was attracted by the "pleasures of a mind at peace with God, which fears nothing but sin." At the time when Hunneric had exiled bishops to the neighbouring deserts, with the hope of weakening their confidence in the Catholic faith, young Fulgentius began to retreat from society, deprived himself of ordinary recreation, and devoted himself to fasting, prayer, and various austerities. One of these exiled bishops, Faustus, had formed a little monastery not far from Telepte, to which Fulgentius betook himself. The old bishop was induced by plot of ground for the erection of a spacious monastery, which was at once crowded by inhabitants. The fertility of the soil, and the other advantages it possessed, seemed a positive defect in the pursuit of the divine life. Restless under physical comfort he fled once more to a lonely island, which was more satisfactory to him, seeing that neither wood nor drinkable water could be found upon it, and that access to the mainland was almost interdicted. Here he occupied himself with manual toil and spiritual exercises. Felix having discovered the retreat of Fulgentius persuaded Faustus to ordain him as a presbyter, and under pain of excommunication to compel his return to his monastery. Faustus hoped by these means to keep him under jurisdiction, to intercept these romantic escapades, and curb the restlessness of his nature. This ordination occurred shortly after the death of Hunneric, and accession of Thrasimund. The latter monarch, though a bigoted Arian, was more liberal and refined than his predecessors. (Gibbon, iii. iv.) Several charges were brought against him, for he had forbidden the churches which had been deprived of their bishops during the reign of Hunneric to fill up the vacant sees, yet many of these churches dared to disobey the order. No sooner was a bishop appointed than he was at once banished to Saridania or elsewhere. (Victor, Exc. lib. iii.) Several obits were contended for the privilege of having Fulgentius as their bishop, but with his marvellous faculty in concealing himself, he was able for a while to baffle their importunity, and he returned with a genuine Noto Episcopari upon his lips to his monastery. It was not, however, for long. The little town of Ruspe (or Ruspe), a small sea-port on a projecting spur of the coast, not far from the Syrtis Parva—int. 35° 1', long. 11° 1'—had remained without a bishop. This had been the case, not from obedience to the royal mandate, but from the machinations of another Felix, a deacon who had prevented a suitable man from accepting the episcopal title from Fulgentius, and when he was actually taken by force from his cell to Victor the primate of Byzacene and consecrated bishop of Ruspe. This was in the year 508, when he was forty years of age. He made no change in his costume or daily regimen, he declined to wear the orarion, the ornamental chasuble, or any coloured garment. He walked barefoot, or at least shod with nothing more luxurious than a monk's sandal; he wore a little white or black cloak, a linen sari round his neck, a leathern girdle round his loins, and must have looked more like a Hebrew prophet than a Christian bishop of the 6th century. It is expressly stated that he wore no different costume in the celebration of the mysteries, saying that the heart and not the clothes needed changing. He never allowed himself meat or wine. Eggs, herbs, and seed-corn, unground and undressed, were his food. His prayers, vigils, and fastings were incessant as before. His first demand from the people of Ruspe was a plot of ground on which to build a monastery. This was soon granted, and the building erected, and his old friend Felix summoned to preside over it. This blending of episcopal and monastic rule was soon brought to an abrupt end by Thrasimund, who dismissed him and other newly elected bishops to Saridania. He accepted his fate with joy, at the privilege of suffering for his Master. As he passed through Carthage presents were heaped upon him, which he sent to the new monastery at Ruspe. Though the last of the exiled bishops he was soon recognised as the greatest of them, and was entrusted with delicate and difficult duties. In the name of the sixty exiles he wrote important letters on various questions of theological and ecclesiastical importance. His literary faculty, his great knowledge of Scripture, and his reputation as a theologian, probably induced Thrasimund to summon him from Saridina to Carthage, and to enter into personal dispute with him. It is possible that the king, supposing by his threats and promises, his banishment of the bishops, his cajolery and other devices, that he had gained a victory, and, moreover, being thoroughly convinced of the truth of his own profession, wished to discuss the Catholic doctrine and crush it by fair argument. Ten objections to the Catholic faith were thus presented to Fulgentius. To these he was requested to give satisfactory replies. The result was that he wrote his One book against the Arians, Ten Answers to Ten Objections. The third of these objections resembles a common argument of the earlier Arians, viz. that the passages of Scripture, Prov. viii. 22, John xvi. 29, Psalm 11, 7, and others imply that the Son is created; "generated in time," and therefore not of the same essence with the Father, to which Fulgentius replied that they all refer to the Incarnation, and not to the essence of the Son of God. He used the argument of Athanasius, which makes the customary worship of the Son of God verge either on Polytheism or Sabellianism if we do not at the same time recognise the consubstantiality of the Son. To say, said Fulgentius, the Catholic position, compels the objector to adopt the alternative of saying that the Son of God was either from something or from nothing. The supposition that He was made "out of nothing" reduces Him to the rank of a creature; the other supposition that He was made "from something" involves a co-eternal Being, and some form of Manichean dualism. Throughout this ingenuous polemic, Fulgentius laid the greatest emphasis on the unity of God's essence, and assumed, as a point not disputed between himself and his opponents, that Christ was the object of Divine worship. This argument throws some light upon the later Arianism. The reply was not considered satisfactory by Thrasimund, who could not but have perceived that logically and rhetorically Fulgentius had the best of the argument. He, therefore, in order to cover him with reproach in the eyes of his Arian supporters, sent another group of objections, which were to be read to Fulgentius. No copy was to be left with him, which might enable him by mere logical agility to gain a superficial victory, but yet he was expected to return categorical answers. The statement of this Nebuchadnezzar-like policy might appear to be a biographical exaggeration, if it were not sufficiently vouched for by the opening chapters of the Ad Trismiumdom Regem Vandalorum Libri tres (cf. Schroech, Christliche Kirchengeschichte, xviii. 108). The first book treats "of the Mystery of the Mediator, Christ, having two natures in one person." The second book "of the Immaculaty of the Divinity of the Son of God." The third book, "of the Sacrament of the Lord's Passion," In the first of these books he displays great familiarity with Scripture, and endeavours to establish the eternal creation of the Logos, and the birth in time of the Christ, when the Logos took flesh, and by “flesh” he endeavours to shew is meant the whole of humanity, body and reasonable soul, just as occasionally by “soul” is denoted not only reasonable soul but body as well. In bk. i. the author shews that the whole of humanity needed redemption, and was taken up into union with the Eternal Word; in bk. ii. he shews that nothing less than Deity in His supreme wisdom and power could effect the redemption. As the assurance that Christ is “the First and the Last,” does not mean that Christ will have an end, so the ἐκάκος of John i. 1, cannot mean that the Godhead of the Logos had a beginning. He cannot be localis by whom locis is made, nor temporalis by whom tempus is originated. The Godhead of Christ may be “everywhere” in His “power,” but not “everywhere” in His “grace.” He ingeniously endeavours to shew that he was not addressed to Mary, as a refusal to admit her affectionate treatment of his body, until she had appreciated His Divinity. The church is now His body, and they who do not appreciate His unity of essence with the Father must not have the privileges of His church. In many other ways he argues the immensity of the Son and also of the Spirit of God, and here again the common ground held by the Arius and himself, as to the worship of Christ, is worthy of special note. In bk. iii. he opposes strongly not only Patrissiasmus, but all theopatrisi, theopatriotism and the supposition that the Deity of Christ felt substantialiter the sorrows of the Cross. The dryphysis position is urged with remarkable earnestness, and held to be completely compatible with the unity of the person of Christ. The personality of the Christ the Son of God is distinguished from the personality of the Father, with an almost semi-Arian force, while he holds that the Son and Father are, as the Fathers and the Son are one and the same. Sicut inseparabiles est unipate naturae sic incostitubiles permaneat proprie persone (lib. iii. c. 3). (Cf. here unus deumino; non confusione substantiâ; sed unipate persone, of the Athenian Creed.) Yet though Christ emptied Himself of His glory, He was full of grace and truth. The two natures were united, not confused, in Christ. Totus in patre et totus in utero matris. He suffered in the flesh. His Deity, although it took on Him possible flesh, yet remained impassible, because immutable. The “unction” of the Holy Spirit was received by Christ as man and not as God. Inasmuch as He was the Eternal Son, there was no inequality to be redressed, no imperfection to be imparted. But seeing that there was taken up into His one personality the reasonable soul and flesh of man, not a human personality, but human nature, He could weep at the grave of Lazarus and die upon the Cross. Chapter 20 shews conclusively that Fulgentius must have read as the text of Heb. ii. 9, χαιρετος Θεος rather than χαιρετε Θεος, as he lays repeated emphasis on the ραν Θεος. He bore in His cross the sins of others. He had none of His own. No corruption befell His body in the grave; nor did any punishment overtake His soul in Hades. Schroech (xvii. 112) speaks slightly of the argument, as simply proving that Fulgentius knew his own position. The author of the Vides assures us that Thrasmuhid in his vision, before the birth of the Logos, had a vision of the Logos as a child and a man, and sent messages from the Logos to India to the people of India; also that Fulgentius rejoined. The existing work entitled pro Fide Catholica, etc. Fintam Episcoporum Arianum, liber unus (Opp. Migne’s ed. pp. 708-720) cannot be the work of Fulgentius; it possesses nothing of his style of address, makes no reference to Thrasmuhid or to India, and consists of little more than rough invective, followed by a cento of passages of Scripture, which, however, are not taken from the Vides as generally used by Fulgentius, but from the old Latin (cf. Schroech). The actual reply of Fulgentius, which no longer exists, and his great personal popularity seem to have roused the indignation of the Arius party at Carthage, and to have led to what is called his second exile. This measure was adopted by the king, who directed his forcible seizure. In the dead of night Fulgentius was hurried on board a vessel bound for Sardinia. The Contrary is said to have been overthrown, and a Syllage, where he received a sorrowing ovation on the part of the persecuted church. He is said on this occasion to have predicted the speedy close of the persecution. His biographer adds that he did not boast of any predictive powers, nor would he as a miracle-worker pray for the healing of the infirm, always urging that our prayer should be that the will of the Lord might be done. He disconcerted the idea of miracles, saying that without righteousness they were valueless, and might lead to everlasting condemnation. On reaching Calarissi (Cagliari) in Sardinia, he was received by the exiles with great enthusiasm and reverence. Here he remained until the death of the king in 523, and displayed extraordinary energy in his literary, polemical, and monastic work. In conjunction, and with the assistance of Brumanius, the ‘antistes of the city, he built another monastery, where more than forty monks assembled, and carried out the rule of community and observant life with the possession or maintenance of any personal interests. The equity, benevolence, and self-abnegation of these coenobites are extolled in high terms, but the most interesting feature of his character is said to have been his sweetness and gentleness to the youngest and weakest. His cheerfulness, tenderness, and urbanity, were never disturbed until bound by his office and his vows to act with severity towards insubordination or sin. Symmachus, bishop of Rome, wrote a letter of congratulation to these valiant champions of Christ. (Anast. in Symmacho, Baron. ann. 504.) It was during this period that the majority of his extant letters were penned, for the most part in answer to difficult theological questions that were proposed to him, and it was then also that he revealed his strong sympathy with the opinions of Augustine on the doctrines of predestination, of grace, and of remission of sin, at a time when these were being called in question by the semi-Pelagians of Southern Gaul and North Africa. (Cf. Neander, General Church History, Clark’s tr. vol. iv. 417 ff.; Shed. History of Christian Doctrine, vol. ii. p. 104, ff.; Wiggers, Augustinianism and Pelagianism, II. Theil. 369-393; Schroech, xviii.)

FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE

The most extended of these dissertations is Ad Omnium, hœri tres. 1. De claio præcessio.
FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE

Fulgentius is known for his eloquent and polemical writings, particularly against the Manichaean heresy. He was a member of the clergy and a prominent figure in the Church during the late 4th and early 5th centuries. His works are characterized by their forceful language and their attempt to defend the orthodox faith against its enemies.

In the passage you have provided, Fulgentius is discussing the concept of predestination and its implications. He argues that sin is a prerequisite for salvation, a view that was controversial in his time. This is evident in his statement: "Sin," he said, "is not in Him, so sin is not from Him. That which is not His work cannot be His predestination."

Fulgentius also addresses the question of why God permits evil, a common theme in Christian theology. He suggests that God permits evil to reveal His goodness and to bring about eventual salvation. This is reflected in his words: "He may punish another, gives grace to one who is unworthy of it, even if He finds another worthy of His anger. Here He insists on the point, which has repeatedly been debated. In the two books he had written on grace, viz., that the good will, the new heart, the right spirit, are God's gift (Ezek. xxxvi. 26). God begins, conducts, completes, the whole activity of the good-will, prepares us in every good work to do His will. The beginning of our calling, the augments from the Spirit who are in God's predestinatio (Rom. viii. 29). Those who are predestinated to glory are first predestinated to righteousness. He crowns in the saints which He has gratuitously given, but He will condemn in the wicked that which He has given. Do not say then that God does not predestinate the beginning of all sin. Predestination is always of the good. All evil is from the perseverance of the human will. God foreknows those who are about to sin, but does not predestinate them to it."

Fulgentius' arguments are a reflection of the complex and dynamic nature of Christian thought during this period, where the concepts of predestination, free will, and the nature of sin were all under intense scrutiny.

As a historical figure, Fulgentius' writings continue to be studied and debated, providing insights into the theological debates of the early Church.
the difference between Esau and Jacob depended on the fact that Esau was condemned before his birth, because of his future evil deeds. Fulgentius, with more logical consistency, maintains that Esau perished in his original sin; Jacob was saved by gratuitous favour. Divine grace and human will co-operate, but Divine grace always precedes the human aspiration after it. God works in us to will and do; free-willnulliter efficitur nisi divinitus adjutetur.

The question of creationism versus traducianism is left aside, because it was by Augustine, but Fulgentius maintains that if "creationism" be true, still every child at the creation of its soul receives the taint of original sin by its contact with the body. In the three books, De Veritate Predestinationis, the purely gratuitous doctrine of absolute predestination is argued from the assumed fact that some infants are baptized, and therefore saved, while a child of heathen or even Christian parents, not being baptized, is condemned to eternal fire! Aeternis et ignibus deputatus. In the Epistola to Peter the deacon he goes even further, and asserts that unborn children are not supplieo mappae (see, e.g., Wiggers, l.c. 378). The case of unbaptized adults differs only by their punishment being not only of their original but actual sin. Book ii. is a repetition and enforcement of his doctrine of free-will existent, but not capable of good. The question then arises, but is never answered, whether the poor are to be excepted on the idea that the mere dignity or office of emperor or bishop, or the like, can be all that is meant by "a vessel of mercy," he says it may be the reverse, and in a wonderful passage shews the greatness of their responsibilities. (Book iii.) Since predestination is not righteousness, it is no excuse for carelessness. If predestinated, we do undoubtedly and necessarily pray, watch, and practice good works, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit. While Fulgentius was in Saragossa, he conducted an extensive private correspondence. In his letter ad Gallam, he assured the widow Gallula that virginity was a higher grace than the glory of marriage, but he also encouraged her to hope that by maintaining her widowhood she might rise almost as high in the kingdom of God as a virgin can. In two letters, ad Probas, virginity for the body and humility for the soul were set forth as the two great graces, and fasting and prayer commended. He introduces the Augustinian doctrine that holy servitude is the true freedom. In a letter ad Theodorum, he appeared very much alive to the advantage of the conversion of the great and influential. In a letter ad Venantium he urged that conversion consisted of "the hope of pardon and the acts of penitence, and such a hope of pardon as leads to penitence." Julius failed from being destitute of hope, while many perish now from being too confident of Divine mercy, and thus fail from never performing a true penitence. There was an extensive correspondence on matters relating to charity, the conjugal debt and the like, which simply accord with the current matters of the monastery. These efforts of his pen have been preserved.

In the year 523 Thrasimund died, having before his death called on his successor, Hilderic, to swear that on his accession he would carry out to the full the policy already inaugurated against the professors of the Homousian (Catholic) Faith. Hilderic, with his more orthodox sympathies, had not acquired an adequate sense of the prime virtue of truth, for he considered that his oath would not be violated, if, before his accession, and before Thrasimund's breath was out of his body, he should prepare the way for the return of the Catholic bishops, and the election of new ones in the churches still vacant. On the death of Thrasimund, the bishops were received at Carthage with transport. They were received with greater enthusiasm than was Fulgentius, who was honoured with extraordinary demonstrations of welcome. Triumphal arches, lamps, torches, banners, accompanied his entire journey to his humble bishopric. On arriving at Ruspe, he yielded in the monastic entire deference to Felix, took the position of the humble neophyte, and made no suggestion except that of more vigorous work for the cleric, more frequent fasting for the monks. In the year 524 a council was held at Juncensis (Cellier, Vie de S. F. xi. 9, and Hist. des Conciles, xi. 925, where it is especially characterized by the formula, "Ci." The object of which would seem to have been the enforcement of a more rigid attention to the canons. At this council, Fulgentius was called to preside. His precedence was disputed by a bishop who was called Quodvultdeus, on the ground that he was not even a presbyter. After the council, Fulgentius besought out of charity that his brethren would transfer this nominal precedence to his rival, thus heaping coals of fire on the head of an antagonist. The power of Fulgentius over the heart and conscience must have been very great. Even the primate of Carthage, Boniface, at his approach, put his hand to the establishment of a new church, and wept tears of joy under his powerful discourse. It was during this period of his life that Fulgentius wrote his great work against Fabianus, fragments only of which remain. Even the fragments are more abundant than many of his finished writings. The manuscripts containing them were deposited in the monastery, and by them resting problems bearing on the Divinity of the Holy Spirit and on other elements of Trinitarian doctrine. The Sermones, which remain to attest the power of Fulgentius, are of very different character, and, from his flowing eloquence and biting style and tender sensibility, may easily be credited with the power of securing. The most noteworthy libri which remain to be noticed are those which were addressed to Scarcilas and to Ferrandus the deacon; and one which discussed the Sermo Fastidiosi—the work of an Arius who seems to have roused the plauda spirit of Fulgentius into unusual storm; and there may be added the Libellus de Triudate ad Felicem Notariatum. The first of these was occasioned by a letter from Scarcilas to Fulgentius (preserved in Migne, Epist. x. p. 577), which brought from Fulgentius a reply—a libri: De Incarnazione Fili Divi de mutatione animation Aurem. Scarcilas had been troubled by the question whether the whole Trinity had not been incarnate in Christ, and whether God could have been the author of carnivorous, predatory, and venomous beasts. Fulgentius powerfully discriminates between the Son and the Trinity, and clearly involves himself in the double procession of the Holy Spirit. He claims the Father to have created by the Son everything, every fly and scorpion and tiger. Men are only wounded by the poison and malice of these creatures by reason of their sins. The mightiest beings are submitted to man. There is no evil in nature. In addition, he draws weighty distinctions between the sins of the just and the wicked.

Ferrandus [Fulgentius Ferrandus] the des- con wrote a most abject and obsequious letter to Fulgentius, asking for advice (Ep. xi. Migne) on the puzzling question whether he might count upon the salvation of an Ethiopian, who had come up to the church, as a catechumen eagerly desiring baptism. He had been instructed and prepared for the ordinance, but was taken too ill to respond to the questions put to him at the moment of baptism. He passed into a state of unconsciousness and died. Since he received the sacrament in this unconscious state, is he saved? If the question be answered in the affirmative, Fulgentius was forced to submit this question to the holy bishop's judgment. The baptism of a catechumen, known to be dead at the time of the ceremonial, and would he do so with a similar hope? Ferrandus argued his first case with great ingenuity, basing it on the practice of infant baptism, and he concluded his inquiry by seeking from Fulgentius advice as to the admission of converts to communion in the Eucharist after baptism, supposing death to have intervened. The answers of Fulgentius to Ferrandus reveal, with much vividness, the character of the man, his sacramental doctrine, and the blending with his ecclesiastical theo- bles some powerful elements of common sense. His reply starts with the thesis that faith is the indispensable condition of salvation, baptism or no baptism. Unbaptized heretics will be condemned, and heretics and enemies of the church will not be saved by their baptism. The Ethiopian gave credible evidence of faith, and was baptized, both conditions being indi- pendent. He is the same sinner as before. But he repartes baptism of the really dead, on the ground that baptism removes the stain and curse of original sin. The seat of this sin is the soul. If the soul is severed from the body, baptism is worthless. He decided that the benefits of the Eucharist are contained in baptism, and hence, he says, for many centuries past, infants are not fed with the Eucharist after their baptism. Ferrandus also beset Fulgentius with five other questions, to which he replied in Ep. xiii. with much ingenuity.

An interesting correspondence appears to have passed between Fastidius, an Arian priest, and several of the friends of Fulgentius and himself, on some of the principal questions at issue in the Arian controversy. The Sermon of Fastidiousus is given in Migne, p. 375. The main point of it is that the Son is fœcundus, creatus, fundatus, that the Homousians, who assert that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are inseparable, cannot hold this opinion, and that the unity of the Son is to be found in the flesh, etc. He argued his points with some acuteness and bombast, and when Victor asked for Fulgentius's judgment on the Sermon, Fulgentius replied with unusual acrimony of language and personal denunciation of the character of the apostate priest. His great point is that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are meant wherever the word "God" is used. The One God fills all space and time, and the elements of the Trinity cannot be divided. The Wisdom, Love, and Power of God cannot be separated. As born of God, the Christ is equal to the Father, as sharing in humanity and born of a human mother, he is less than the Father is, naturæ et factum. He maintained the eternal generation of the Son, but also the co-operation of the undivided Trinity in the creation of the humanity of the Christ. He declared that the charge of Ferrandus against the Homousians is only compatible with the Sabellian hypothesis, which probably Ferrandus would at once have endorsed, but Fulgentius argued that the personality of the Son is that around which humanity, not transfigured or changed, is taken up. The sufferings and all the other incidents of the Incarnation were not endured substantialiter, but personaliter. The Divine nature of the Only-begotten God remained impassible while the flesh was crucified and buried. The这事 is the suffering of a person, but quæ naturæ, it was the experience of his flesh only. His soul and body were separated at death. His soul went into Hades, his body to the grave, but His Divine nature at that very moment filled all space and time, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit.

Many of the same statements are repeated by Fulgentius in the Letter Addressed to the Monks of Skyhia, who accepted all the decisions of Chalcedon, who anathematized Pelagius, Julian, and even Faustus, and asked for further light. These four monks were, Peter the deacon, John, a monk, Leonius, a monk, and another John, a reader. The reply of Fulgentius and fifteen other bishops consists of sixty-seven chapters. The points of chief interest are that Fulgentius denied that the Virgin was conceived immacu- late, and also that when speaking of the eternal generation of the Son, he used the naturalis expression, ex utero Patris. In this work he laid the strongest emphasis on the Neoplatonic hypothesis of regeneration, and he weakened the universalism of numerous expressions of God's love by declaring that "all" does not mean "all men," but "all kinds of men." The reconciliation of all things to Himself, necessitates a limitation of the all, or else lands one in the admission of the ultimate reconciliation of the devil and his angels. Fulgentius made a belief in predestination to be necessary to salvation. Unless a man believes it, he cannot belong to the elect.

In the work addressed to Felix, a notary, he reiterated his view of the doctrine of the Trinity, and added a dissertation on angels and men, antedating a later speculation found in Athanasius, that the human race was created to fill up the places of the fallen angels. While Fulgentius was thus pursuing his literary work with such remarkable industry, he retired from his monastery at Ruspe to another on the neighbouring island of Circeo, and redoubled his labours and meditations, until health gave way. When told that it was absolutely necessary, to prolong his life, for him to have the comfort of a bath, he obstinately refused it, preferring not to break his rule. He died in January, 538, in the sixty-fifth year of Fulgensius Ferrandus, a disciple and companion of Fulgentius of Ruspe (3); sharing his exile to Saragossa when the Catholic bishops were removed from their sees during the persecution by the Arian kings of the Vandals. Ferrandus received the hospitality and spiritual care of Sts. Agapitus and Epiphanius and was near to the death of Thrasimund, A.D. 553, returned to Carthage, where he became deacon of the church. In all probability, he was the author of the Vita Fulgentii prefixed to the works of the latter, and dedicated to Felicianus. (Hofmann, Lex. s. a.; Herzog, Encycl. art. by Wagemann; Petrus Pithaeus, in preface Lec-tori, prefixed to Breviscio Canonum Ferrandi, Col. Canonum, p. 303. Wiggers, Augustinismus und Paganismus, ii. Theil, p. 370.)

Two letters of Ferrandus to Fulgentius are extant (Migne, Patro. lxxvi. pp. 578-455), with the lengthy and careful replies of the latter. [FULGENTIUS (3.)] The form of these letters asked for advice on the question, whether the baptism of a dying, unconscious catechumen was lawful; and if so, whether the baptism of a corpse was also justified. The second letter concerned the most intricate questions:—1. Of the Separability of the Persons of the Trinity, since the Trinity itself is inseparable in will, nature, and work. (Wiggers, 1. c. p. 373.)

2. Whether the Divinity of the Christ suffered on the Cross, or whether the Divine Person suffered only in the flesh. The fifth question concerned the double gift of the cup to the Apostles, as mentioned in St. Luke's gospel. Ferrandus was not only an interrogator, but was often appealed to for his own theological judgment. Among his extant letters may be enumerated those to Antonius, deacon of the church in Rome; to the Comes Regnus, and to Severus Scholasticus. (Baronius, ann. 559, 9.) In his collected writings (Bibliotheca Patrum, Chillett, 1649) some other treatises are preserved, such as one entitled, De Duabus in Christo naturis, and an Epistola Anicita de quaeions an aleptic ex Trinitate pascua est. Baronius (ann. 553, 18) refers this letter to an early period in his career. He charges it with prolixity. It is interesting to see how closely Ferrandus here follows the lead of Fulgentius, by declaring that though one person of the Trinity suffered, it was only in curse. The Comes Regnus, in the first place, asked Fulgentius, and after his death he asked Ferrandus for special instruction on the legitimacy or otherwise of military service, which led to the completion of the fragment of Fulgentius, and to the composition of an ethical discourse, De septem regulis innocentiae, charged with practical rules, rules of life, seven rules:—I. Gratia Dei adutorium tibi necessarium per singulos actus crede. II. Vita tua spectum sit ubi multibus tuis vecund quid agere debent. III. Non praeeete appatens, sed psodoes. IV. Dilige rempublicam sicut te ipsum. V. Humanis divina praeponi. VI. Noli esse multis judegyt invenisse, sed in uno. Memento te esse Christianum. Ferrandus also edited and completed another work which Fulgentius at his death left incomplete. One on the later Eutychian doctrine of the incorruptibility of the Body of Christ from and after His birth (aphthartodocism). Ferrandus was impelled to both these efforts by the Comes Regnus, who had previously asked Fulgentius himself to solve these philosophical and ethical problems for him. Ferrandus is also the author of a Breviscio canomum ccelestiaeorum. (Codex Canummen, V. Pithaeus, and Miscellanea Eclecticis, Petrus Pithaeus, p. 369) A collection and digest of 232 canons arranged by quarry and according to Laodicen, Sariscia, Constantinople, Carthage, &c. chiefly appertaining to the election, ordination, and character of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, as well as a variety of details concerning the feasts of the church, the duties of clerics, virgins, catechumens, &c. From the mention of certain canons and councils by Fer-randus, it is argued that it must have been compiled during the reign of Anastasius, who died in 518. He appears to have had access to a knowledge of the Greek councils through a translation and digest of such canons as had been previously in use in Spain. The mention of later synods and writings has led others to believe that the Breviscio was compiled at or about A.D. 547. (CANNON-LAW, DICT. CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES.) Ferrandus took a not unimportant part in the violent discussions produced by the edict of Justinian I., which goes by the name of Constitutio Trias (περὶ τριῶν καθηματῶν), in which that emperor who was ambitious of securing for himself a place among great orthodox and successful theologians, had endeavoured to conciliate and win the Monophysite leaders over to the orthodox and Catholic church by pronouncing a condemnation on certain passages from the writings of Theodoret, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Isaac of Edessa, which the venu-FULGENTIUS, bishop of Astigi (Ecija) in the first quarter of the 7th century. He was the brother of Leander, Florentius, and Isidore, and is mentioned in connexion with all three. His name occurs five times in contemporary or quasi-contemporary documents, i.e.—

(1) In the last chapter of Leander's Libellus ad Florentinam (Holstenius, ed. Brockie, Cod. Reg. i. 405), where his name is mentioned in a passage which has perplexed many critics. In the first part of the chapter Leander exhorts Florentine to hold fast her profession, and not to think of going back to her native country ad "genital solum.... ubi si te Deus habitare voluisset non te indutur ejiceret." Their mother, Leander declares, had often said to him that even if she could go back she would not, "ut etiam diu viventer patriam illam non reviseret." Thou therefore, says Florentina, beware of what thy mother feared, and the evil from which she had experienced it fed, do thou prudently avoid." "Alas!" he continues, "unhappy me! I grieve because I have sent thither our common brother Fulgentius, and I dread the dangers he may encounter there with a never-ceasing fear. He will be safer, however, if thou, in absence and security will pray for him." This passage, which Floroz professes himself unable to understand (Esp. Sagr. x. 88), and which puzzled the clear head of Nicholas Antonii (Bibl. Vet. lib. 3, cap. 1, 3), is connected with the general question of the native place, parentage, and early history of this famous family, a question we propose to touch upon under the head of its most illustrious member, Isidore of Seville. It will be sufficient to remark in this place that the danger incurred by Fulgentius in returning to his native place at the bidding of Leander — possibly on some family business — is a warning to us against the explanation of older writers, a spiritual danger to his faith from contact with Arianism, but is to be explained in all probability by the very plausible hypothesis that the family came originally from territory which after A.D. 554 fell into the hands of the Byzantine troops, rashly summoned into the country by the pretender Aethagund, and the last remnants of which were not recovered by the Goths till about the year 624 (Isidore, Hist. Goth. ann. 554; Dahn, König der Germanen, v. 124). Leander, therefore, is speaking of the physical risks run by one who ventures into an enemy's country, though no doubt the elder brother, Baccarecch's all-powerful minister and adviser (Leandri), would have known how, in some measure at least, to protect the younger in the fulfillment of his task whatever it may have been. At any rate, Fulgentius returned safely, was made bishop of Astigi (Ecija) in the province of Seville, probably by the influence of Leander, and if so before the year 600 (in which Leander died), and is next met with—

(2) In connexion with the doubtful Decretum Gundemerari, 610 (Gunthamar), when his signature as Episcopus Asiligitanus Sedis appears, together with that of his brother and metropolitan Isidore, Leander's successor.
FULIBURS

(3) Among the bishops of the second council of Seville, held in 619, which was a synod of the province of Baetica, and at which Isidore presided, as metropolitan, Fulfidus was almost certainly one of his bishops. In two letters addressed to Isidore, which are preserved to us, Fulfidus speaks of his respectful submission to the authority of his prelate, and of the care he took in the instruction of his clergy.

(4) In Æneas's life of Isidore, where among the list of Isidore's works we find Ad Germanum et servum Fulgentium Episcopum epistolam Officiorum libris duo, and lastly—

(5) In Isidore's own preface to the De Exst. Off. addressed to "domino meo et Dei servo Fulgentio episcopo." Fulgentius had asked him, says Isidore, for a short account of the origin and authors of the church offices. "Haeque ut voluisti libellum de origine officiorum misi."

For an account of the supposed translation of the bodies of Fulgentius and Florentina to a safe place in the mountains of Guadalupe, near Berzocana in the 8th century, of the invention of the bones under Alfonso XI. (circa a.d. 1330) and of a transference of a part of the relics to Carthagena in 1592 by order of Philip II., see Exp. Sagr. x. 105. In the same year (p. 90) Floreze exposes the confusion with Fulgentius, which began with the name of a false Lucas of Tolentino, in the 13th century, and led later to the elevation of Fulgentius to the honour of doctor of the church on the strength of works written by his namesake. The pseudo-chroniclers have been very busy with Fulgentius. For an example of their work see the Acta de Ros, given in Xamay de Salazar, Martyr. Ripa. p. 155. The Bollandists, adapted from that by Quintandueñas, shews many traces of their influence. (A.A. SS. Jan. i. 971; Exp. Sagr. x. 89; Aguirre-Catalán, ii. 324, 355.) [M. A. W.]

FULIBURS, the name given to the third abbot of Bath. (Mon. Angl. i. 206.) [S.]

FULLANUS (1) (FULLARIUS), bishop of Lavae, perhaps c. 400. There is a tradition that he suffered martyrdom in Germany with St. Ursula and her nuns, but his very existence is doubtful. (Ugolioli, Not. Sac. i. 344; Cap-pelle, Chiese d'Ital. xv. 497.) [R. S. G.]

FULLANUS (2) (FAELAN, FOILANUS), a brother of St. Fursey, to whom he committed his monastery at Cuoharebes in East Anglia, when he determined to become an anchorite. (Bede, H. E. iii. 19.) After the death of Fursey he is said to have gone with his brother Uldan into Brabant, and to have founded the monastery of Foise, in the diocese of Cambrey, leaving this monastery in the care of Fursey. After the death of Uldan he went to Nilelles, where he lived for some time under the rule of St. Gertrude. Whilst on his way to visit his brother at Foise, he was killed in the forest of Stognies by an assassin, about the year 656, and buried at Foise, where under the name of Fullanus he was commemorated on Oct. 31. (Mabillon, Acta SS. O. S. E. sac. ii. p. 295.) Capgrave (vol. 149) gives a life of Foilanus, in which this story is preserved with additions and corrections. Foilanus is there called Eulfan, and his story is designed as having pontifical honors, but no explanation of the term is given. It is also said that before setting out on his last journey he gave exact directions for his burial; his speech before his death is given at length, and we are told that his body, and those of his companions, were hidden in the wood. Gertrude, wondering at his long absence, sent to Ulanus to inquire about him; Ulanus replied that he had had a vision of a snow-white dove ascending to heaven. After three days' fast Gertrude set out to seek the bodies, which she discovered by a miraculous sign seventy-eight days after the murder, Jan. 16. Grimold, the mayor of the palace, and Dido, bishop of Poitiers, were at the funeral. Other lives of Fullanus are mentioned by Sir T. D. Hardy in the Cat. Mat. i. 254. [S.]

FULRADUS (1) (FULRADUS, FULREDUS), 14th abbot of St. Denys at Paris, principal chaplain to Pippin and Charles the Great, and archbishop of France. He was the son of wealthy parents in Alsace, named Ricolius and Ermengarde. He was already abbot in A.D. 750, and for many years afterwards was entrusted by kings and popes with missions of the highest confidence and importance. In A.D. 751 he and Burchard, bishop of Würzburg, went on that embassy from the Franks to the pope Zaccharias, which began with a mission to the well-known message, "That it were better that he who had the power should have the name," and which resulted in the deposition of the shadowy Merovingian kings by papal authority, and the election and coronation of Pippin at Soissons. A little later, St. Boniface of Mainz sought his aid. The letter still remains in which Boniface, appealing to his proved friendship, begs him to use his influence with Pippin for his scattered missionaries on the frontiers of paganism, and the little monastery school he has founded, that when his own supervision shall be withdrawn by the death which he feels approaching, they may not be scattered and abandoned to destruction (Patr. Lat. lxxix. 779). In 754 another mission took Fulradus to Italy. Pippin in a victorious campaign had imposed terms of submission upon Astulfus king of the Lombards, and Fulradus was now deputed to escort pope Stephen back to the holy see with a retinue of Franks. But scarcely had the king crossed the Alps on his return, when Astulfus repudiated his engagements and marched on Rome. Fulradus was the messenger whom Stephen selected to bear the letter summoning Pippin and his Franks to the rescue in the name of St. Peter; and at the prosperous close of the second campaign it was he who was commisioned to restore the usurped cities to their allegiance to Rome, which he accomplished by offering the keys of twenty-two towns with Pippin's deed of gift at the shrine of St. Peter. The pope was, not unnaturally, well disposed to the abbey and its monastery, more especially as much of his exile had been spent there. It was there in fact that he saw, in his illness, the vision in which, as he relates, St. Peter, accompanied by St. Denys himself, had promised him a happy restoration to the holy see (Patr. Lat. lxxix. 1022). Accordingly in 737 Stephen granted to Fulradus's abbey the almost unique privilege of having daily mass celebrated by bishops, abbots, and monks and consecrated by the bishops of the country, to govern their monastery and the dependent foundations of Fulradus, which were under the protection of the holy see (Patr. Lat. lxxix. 1015). This concession was confirmed by pope Adrian in 786, after Fulradus's death.
FULRADUS (xvi. 1211; cf. Fleury, Hist. Eccles. lib. xlix. tom. ix. pp. 504-5, for the functions of these benefices and the absence of the abbots of St. Denis from the list for 1024, a fact which has led historians to suppose that the charter of Imperial privilege of 1013 was a forgery). By the time of his death he had given a hospital and house at Rome (Patr. lxxix. 1013). By the emperor he permitted him the privilege of wearing a certain shoe made by Italian abbots in the 10th century. [Ibid. lxxix. 1017]; and by another he conferred the right to use six decans of St. Denis and wearing the dalmatic, the use of which seems to have been a privilege of the Roman clergy (ibid. lxxx. 1018). Nor were the kings more backward, as is testified by the great number of charters of Pippin, Carloman and Charles the Great, alluded to in the Gallia Christiana (vii. 343) many of which are to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. tom. lxxx. and xcvii. Among the Fœcere Justiciables in Félibien's Histoire de l'Abbaye royale de St. Denis, Fulradus's name is also introduced into the fabulous vision of Eucherius of Orleans respecting Charles Martel in hell. He and Boniface were the supposed witnesses to whom Eucherius showed the empty tomb of Christ, the risen dragon and the marks of fire (see the epistle to Louis, grandson of Charles the Great, from the bishops at the council of Kloery in Bouquet, iii. 659, and Enhardi Fuld, Annales, Persz. i. 345). In 777 Fulradus published his will (Acta SS. Ord. S. Benet. sec. iii. pt. ii. p. 341, Paris, 1688-1701), in which he disposed of his property, declaring that he was buried at St. Denis, but was afterwards translated to the monastery of Leberaw, in Alsace, his own gift to St. Denis. But he wrote an epitaph on him, which still remains (ibid. p. 339).

FULRADUS (2), abbot of the monastery of Altahense in Bavaria (St. Maurice at Nieder Altaich on the Bogen Bach, an affluent of the Danube). The emperor Charles the Great addressed him a letter published by Bernard Perz, and also by Migne, Patr. Lat. xxviii. 935. The abbot is directed to appear by the 20th of June at Starnsburg with a band, armed and equipped, to join in a campaign against the Saxons. The letter contains minute directions as to the weapons and tools to be provided and his conduct on the march. [S. A. B.]

FUNDANUS (Fundanus), rhetorician of Carthage, shortly before the time of St. Augustine of Hippo. He accidentally became blind in one eye, and the fact of his having had two sons after this occurrence, one seeing with only one eye, and the other with two, is used by St. Augustine as an illustration against the Pelagian Julian; but the son who had by nature what the father had by accident, and the other had more than the father himself at the time had to transmit. (S. Augustin. contra Jul. Pel. c. 6, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. xlvii. 832; Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, ix. 508.) [J. G.]

FURIA (Fundanus (1)) MINUCIUS, proseal of Asia in the reign of Hadrian. He received the Imperial investiture of the provinces of his favour as being extend. By the pope he came to be at Rome (Patr. lxxx. 1013). By another he permitted him the privilege of wearing a certain shoe used by Italian abbots when he officiated at the mass (ibid. lxxx. 1017); and by another he conferred the right upon six decans of St. Denis of wearing the dalmatic, the use of which seems to have been a privilege of the Roman clergy (ibid. lxxx. 1018). Nor were the kings more backward, as is testified by the great number of charters of Pippin, Carloman and Charles the Great, alluded to in the Gallia Christiana (vii. 343) many of which are to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. tom. lxxx. and xcvii. Among the Fœcere Justiciables in Félibien's Histoire de l'Abbaye royale de St. Denis, Fulradus's name is also introduced into the fabulous vision of Eucherius of Orleans respecting Charles Martel in hell. He and Boniface were the supposed witnesses to whom Eucherius showed the empty tomb of Christ, the risen dragon and the marks of fire (see the epistle to Louis, grandson of Charles the Great, from the bishops at the council of Kloery in Bouquet, iii. 659, and Enhardi Fuld, Annales, Persz. i. 345). In 777 Fulradus published his will (Acta SS. Ord. S. Benet. sec. iii. pt. ii. p. 341, Paris, 1688-1701), in which he disposed of his property, declaring that he was buried at St. Denis, but was afterwards translated to the monastery of Leberaw, in Alsace, his own gift to St. Denis. But he wrote an epitaph on him, which still remains (ibid. p. 339).

FURIA, a Roman lady, friend of St. Jerome, and known to us through his works, especially through a letter (Ep. 54, ed. Vall.) which he wrote to her (De Vindicatum saevo). She was of the race of Camillus. Her father was of patrician and consular rank, and she was possessed of a large fortune. Her mother, Tatiana, imbued her in early life with ascetic views, but she seems to have hesitated between these and the ordinary life of the world. She married a son of Probus, who had held the consulate, and her brother was the husband of Bessilia, the daughter of Paula and sister of Eustochium. Her husband died early, leaving her with a family of young sons; her mother also was dead, and her father old and infirm, at the time that Jerome wrote to her (A.D. 394). The year before she had projected a splendid but undesirable second marriage, and her friends at Bethlehem were cast down at hearing of her luxurious life and of the worldly society which she frequented. But she determined to put an end to all this aside and to live as a widow, and wrote to Jerome, with whom she had probably been acquainted ten years before at Rome, for counsel as to the regulation of her life. His reply is a pendant to his famous letter to Eustochium (Ep. xxiii. ed. Vall. De Virginitate). His description of the evil to which she was about to be exposed, the jealousy of young widows who were known to be likely to marry again, of the flattery of nurses and slaves, of the subserviency of the clergy, are amongst his most vivid pictures of Roman society. He gives Furia a scheme of an ascetic and charitable life.
and commends her to the pastoral care of Exsnuperius, who was then living at Rome, but was afterwards bishop of Toulouse. [W. H. F.]

FURSEUS (1), abbot of Lagny and patron of Peronne, Jan. 16. Belonging to the next generation after Columbanus, and following in the same track of missionary enterprise from the shores of Britain, St. Fursey has left an indelible mark upon the church of France, and upon the speculative conceptions of popular religion of later ages. His visions gave a distinct impulse to the developing and fixing of the mediæval belief with regard to the condition of the departed, and have afforded, at least in part, the basis of probably the most sublime and best-known poetical production of the later middle age, Dante's La Divina Commedia. With those of Drychestel (Bede, Eccl. Hist. v. 12) they form a well-defined landmark in the evolution of Christian teaching, as showing how theological speculation was taking shape in the seventh century, from the few and mysterious unveilings of inspiration to the more systematic and theological systematiza-tion at the time of the Reformation. They are important as indicating the current of theological and dogmatic thought, which was shaping the doctrine and discipline of the church in the following centuries, and thus have a value and significance far beyond their own individual value.

For the life of St. Fursey there is abundant material, showing the hold he has taken upon the Christian imagination. The primary authority is Bede (Eccl. Hist. iii. 19), who proiously quoted from a "libellus vitae ejus," probably written about A.D. 670 or 675, or at least soon after the death of St. Fursey.
This is supposed to be the tract edited by Surius (De Prob. Sanct. Vit. i. 259-263), and given, with the addition of miracles, by the Bollandists, Colgan, and Mabillon, but collated with other MSS. Many foreign writers have treated of St. Fursey, of whom O'Mahlon (Irish Soc. Hist. 1911, p 48) is the most note-able of the Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. 16, tom. ii. 35) give two lives.
Hardy (Desc. Cat. i. pt. i. 239-246, pt. ii. 794, 795) presents all the MS. authorities, with notices of the several lives. The Benedictines (in Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iii. 616-615) have given a very useful résumé of his life and the foreign authorities.

St. Fursey was of noble birth, his father being Fintan, son of Finlog, a regulus in South Munster, and his mother Gelges, daughter of Aedh Finn, a prince in Connaught. The year and place of his birth are uncertain, but his education seems to have been at the monastery of Inchaquin, on Lough Corrith, under Meldan.
His first foundation was at Rathmoy, now probably Killursa, on the east side of the lough, and there he formed a school or religious retreat, and it may be his church which now stands in ruins at Killursa. He then went to Munster to deepen religion among his own relations, and it is then, according to his Vita, that his visions or ecstatic dreams are said to have been given him during a period of extreme sickness. They evidently are the workings of a mind of peculiar spiritual sensitiveness, the imagination dwelling upon the current form of theological thought and moulding it into the clear outline of a divine inspiration. They, no doubt, owe something to the methodizing of the scribe and the spiritual application of the homilist; yet, after all, they present a wonderful picture of early Christian teaching. Bede seems to give a brief summary, or rather only one scene. Desmuy, in his Life of Fursey (Paris, 1607), devotes three chapters to describing the falling into the ecstatic state, the visions of heaven and of the torments in Gehenna, while the old life carries him first through Gehenna with all its torments and Satanic blasphemies, to the bright abodes of the blessed, where he meets St. Beocan or Beodan and his old master, St. Meldan. Unlike the vision of Drychestel, the fires do not seem to be in any sense purgatorial, but, like it, the whole tale was used for a homiletic purpose, warning against and suggesting remedies for special sins, and proposing charity as the surest path to eternal blessedness.

After preaching in Ireland for some time (ten or twelve years seem too long), St. Fursey left Ireland, and was kindly received by king Sige-bert of the East Angles, with whose consent he built his cell in the castle of the bishop of Beccles in the county of Suffolk. Smith assigns this to the year 633 (Mon. Hist. Brit. i. 190, n. 1). At Cobhernessburg he lived as an anchorite, his monastery being assigned to the charge of the two priests Gobban and Dicul. But when Penda king of the Mercians, the scourge of the country and church, brought calamity and ruin, the retreat of the saint, he sought refuge with Gaul with his brothers Faeland [FULLANUS] and Utaan, and receiving land from Erchinoald, mayor under Clovis II., built the monastery of Lagny, " Latinicum coenobium," near the Marne, six leagues from Paris. The date of this is much disputed; Smith accepts Mabillon's, Baronius's and Fleury's date of A.D. 644, but others think this too early, and Colgan prefers A.D. 648 or 649. In Desmuy's life there is a long account of Fursey's progress to Rome, his reception there by pope Martin I. (A.D. 649-55) and his return through the kingdom of Austリア, his marvelous experience by king Inchaquin, and his miracles, but this part is very doubtful, and may be traced to his connexion with Sige-bert of the East Angles. At the court of Clovis he was very favourably received through the influence of Erchinoald. The fame of Lagny spread over the sea to Ireland, attracting others from its shores. Erchinoald continued to be St.
Fursey's liberal patron to the last, and near his residence at Peronne two religious houses were built; Baldechildis or Balside the queen was also very favourable to him. But before his death St. Fursey wished to revisit some of the churches he had founded, and leaving Emilian or Eloquius in charge of Lagny, got as far north as Macerius or Masarellis, where on his first arrival in France he had secured the friendship of duke Haimo. Here he was taken ill and died.
His body was brought to Peronne and buried in the new church upon Mont Cigues; four years after it was translated by Eligius bishop of Noyon and Gutherus his abbot in the church of Camerliso, and a chapel built for it on the east side of the altar of the same church, and the place became a favourite resort of pilgrims from all parts of Gaul and Britain. The date of his death is uncertain, authorities varying from A.D. 630 to A.D.
660; he died probably about the year 650. His chief feast is Jan. 16, but he is also commemorated on Feb. 6, 9, 25, March 4, July 14, Sept. 17, 28, Dec. 26. At the first-named day he has a place in all the kalendars, and shews a wide extent of popular favour, but Dempster's ascription to him of De Vita Monastica, lib. i., is not to be accepted; Harris (W. Fr. Writ. i. c. 4) attributes to him a prophecy, and in Trim. Coll. Library, Dublin (MS. H. 11, Nos. 6–7), some poems and a litany, said to have been composed by him, are preserved.

FUSCANA, Feb. 13, virgin and martyr at Ravenna under the emperor Decius, A.D. 250. She suffered with her nurse Maura, and by command of the president Quintianus. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Petrus de Nat. Cattal. SS. lib. iii. c. 119.)

FUSCIANUS (1), the praefectus urbi who condemned Callistus to be scourged and sent to the mines of Sardinia (Hippol. Ref. Haer. ix. 15, p. 287). Tertullian (Ad Nat. i. 16) tells a story of a remarkable case tried before the same prefect. Capitolinus (Per. 4) contrasts the severity of Fuscianus as a magistrate with the mildness of Pertinax, his successor. It is possible that the same influence which obtained the release of the Christian prisoners in Sardinia obtained also the disgrace of the magistrate who had condemned them; and if Marcia had any share in the appointment of Pertinax it is the more intelligible why she and her advisers should have turned to him on the death of Commodus. The date of the trial of Callistus is limited in one direction by the consideration that in the interval of seven years between the death of Perennis and that of Commodus, Pertinax filled successively the offices of consular legate of Britain, superintendent of the imperial charitable foundations, proconsul of Africa and city prefect, so that it seems improbable that his tenure of the last office could have been longer than a couple of years. Hence we conclude that Fuscianus did not go out of office earlier than A.D. 190 or 191. Bunsen inferred from his having had his second consulship in 188 that his appointment to the office of city prefect must have been later; but the opposite inference is more probable. A first consulship no doubt must have preceded the appointment, but a second consulship was a special honour, rather more likely to have followed it; for there seems reason to think that it was then usual to give it to the city prefect on the earliest opportunity, if he had not had it already. For many years before and after Fuscianus every one whom we have been to have been city prefect, appears also as having a second consulship at what may well have been the same time. Victorinus was prefect (perhaps immediately) before Fuscianus had his second consulship in 183, Pertinax, his successor, in 192. The next prefect, Sulpicius, entering on office immediately after Jan. 1, could not be one of the ordinary consuls for 193, but he was one of the consules spectro.

We are not aware of the entrance of Fuscianus on office A.D. 187; and if we date the trial of Callistus 189, and his return 191, it will agree well enough with the statement of Hippolytus that Callistus was not long enough away to permit the delinquencies ascribed to him to be forgotten. Fuscianus appears to have held office again under Severus, A.D. 197. (Cod. Just. v. 54, 1.)

Clinton, following Pauvinius, describes this prefect as C. Allius Fuscianus, and these names, in fact, are found in three inscriptions (Gruter, 126; 786, 10; 1077), though not with any identification that the bearer held office. Two of these inscriptions belong to the years 149 and 186 respectively; the last would correspond to the date of the present Fuscianus; the other might be supposed to refer to his father, also a Caius. But we think that there is better reason for supposing the prefect to have been the Seius Fuscianus whom Capitolinus names together with Victorinus as having been friends and fellow students of Marcus Aurelius. Victorinus died as prefect some time after 185; therefore the chronology offers no difficulty to his having been succeeded by Fuscianus, who may have been a younger man. And Dion Cassius states (Ixxix. 4) that Fuscianus the prefect had a grandson named Seius Carus, who was put to death in the reign of Elagabalus. It must be owned however that historians do not give so favourable a view of the administration of Commodus, as would be indicated by his bestowing the most important magistracies successively on men of high character—his father's trusted friends; and that Dion in particular might have been expected (Ixxii. 4) to have named Fuscianus as an exception when he speaks of Commodus having put to death his father's friends.

FUSCIANUS (2), Dec. 11, martyr with Victorinus and Gentianus at Amiens in the Diocletian persecution. Rictorvarus the president, after inflicting various tortures, beheaded them, A.D. 304. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Petrus de Nat. catt. SS. lib. i. c. 57.)

FYNDOCHA (FYNDOCHA, FRUDOCHA), virgin, commemorated Oct. 13 in company with Fintana, is usually believed to have been one of the nine daughters of Donald, in the Glen of Ogrie, belonging to the 8th century. But Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 276), who ascribes to her pen de Vita Contemplativa Conventualibus, lib. i., places her in the sixth. Instead of our finding Fintana or Fintan associated with Fndochea, the latter is often found with Sitha, and hence Fndochea is identified with Oria, called also Manoita. She is also called by some Frudochea. Echt, Aberdeen, has Fndochea for patron (Brev. Aberd. Prop. SS. p. est. f. 129); a chapel of St. Fndochea was on the island of Inchaidh, and Inishail, in Lorne, was dedicated to her. (C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 129; Dp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 352 et al.; Bollandists: Acta SS. Aug. 24, tom. iv. 399, giving her among their pretermissi, and Oct. 13, tom. vi. 223-3, treating of her in a long note.) [J. G.]

GABRINUS (1) (GAVINUS)—May 30. Martyr, with Crispulus, under Hadrian, at Turres (Torres) in Sardinia. His relics were transferred to the Vatican by pope Gregory III. (Mart. Rom. Let., Hieron., Adon., Usuard., Notk.; Ferrarri Cat. SS.; Till. Mein. ii. 230, 587, v. 143.) [G. T. S.]

GABRINUS (2) (GAVINUS)—Oct. 25. Martyr at Torres in Sardinia in the Diocletian persecution. A priest Protus and a deacon Januarius, having been arrested and placed under his care, succeeded in converting him; whereupon he was baptized. He then allowed his prisoners to escape, for which he was executed. Hearing of his death, they gave themselves up, and were also put to death. The cathedral of Torre was dedicated under the name of St. Gabunius, May 4, 517. Tillemon considers the Gabunius of May 30 and that of Oct. 25 the same person. (Mart. Hieron.; Till. Mein. ii. 230, v. 145; Ferrarri, Cat. SS.) [G. T. S.]

GABRINUS (3)—Feb. 19. A presbyter, who was brother of Caius bishop of Rome, and father of a virgin and martyr named Susanna, about whom a number of romantic fables will be found in the Bollandist upon this day (Acta SS. Feb. iii. 61). Tillemon fixes upon 290 as date of her death and 293 as that of her birth. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard., Notk.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 128; Till. Mein. iv. 571, 572.) [G. T. S.]

GABRINUS (4) (GAVINUS) of Huesca (Ossa) signs the acts of the conversion council of 588. Antedius a deacon subscribes for him at the second council of Saragossa, 592 (Mansi, x. 472; Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 253, 690). [M. A. W.]

GABRINUS (5) (GAVINUS), bishop of Arcavi- ca from about A.D. 868 to about 893, signing the acts of the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo (Mansi, xii. 21, 84). He is the last bishop of Arcavica under the Gothic rule. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 315, 333; Esp. Negre, vii. 7.) [M. A. W.]

GABRINUS, a Donatist who returned to the communion of the church, but without undergoing re-baptism, an omission which Gau- dentius professed to blame greatly, but which was defended by St. Augustine, who also denied the insinuation of Gaudentius, that the change had been brought about by compulsion. (Aug. c. Gaud. i. 11, 12; 12, 13; 32, 43.) [GAU- DENTIUS (7).] [H. W. P.]

GABRIL, (1), in the Gnostic systems. In the system of JUSTINUS the name of one of the paternal angels (Hippol. v. 26, p. 151). In an Ophite system the name of one of the seven demons (Orig. Adv. Cels. vi. 30). St. Luke's account of Gabriel's connexion with the Annunciation is recognised by MARCUS (Iren. i. 15, p. 77). In Pistis Sophia (p. 12) it is Jesus Himself who takes the form of Gabriel (described as ἐν οἴδανω αἰώνω), and is supposed by the Archons of the Aeons to be Gabriel. In this form He introduces into the womb of Mary certain heavenly powers, which are to constitute the Saviour's body and soul. In like manner Elizabeth had received an inferior heavenly power as well as the soul of Elias to animate John the Baptist; and the mothers of the twelve apostles each receive a still lower heavenly power which takes the place of the soul, that otherwise would have come from the peace of the Archons; so that when the apostles are born no such soul is found in them. This is what is meant by our Lord's words, "Ye are not of this world, even as I am not of this world."

GABRIEL (2), presbyter, abbot of St. Stephen's, near Jerusalem. His memoir by the Hollander (Acta SS. 26 Jan. ii. 731–2), is extracted from their Vita S. Euthymii by Cyril of Scythopolis (20 Jan. i. 302–328). He was a eunuch, and with his elder brothers, Cosmas and Chrysippus, men of Syria, but educated in Cappadocia, presented themselves to Euthymius, and continued with him in his laura till called from it by the empress Eudocia, wife of Theodosius II., about a.D. 458, who had them made priests and presented them with monasteries. Gabriel became abbot of St. Stephen's in the beginning of 460, and died there about 490, in the 86th year of his age.

GAIANUS (3) (CAIANS), bishop of Medaba in Palestina Tertia; he, together with his two brothers, Andrew and Stephen, natives of Melitene, were among the earliest members of the laura of Euthymius (Cyrill. Scythop. Vid. S. Euthym. § 41). They were relatives of Synodius, who had been the tutor of Euthymius when a boy (ibid. § 54). Having been sent by Euthymius with letters to Antipater, bishop of Bostra, to obtain the release of Terebon, who was unjustly detained by another Arab sheik, Antipater was so much delighted with him that he refused to allow him to return, and ordained him bishop of Medeba (Coll. § 97). He subscribed to the council of Chalcedon, 451, by his metropolitan Constantinus. (Mansi, vii. 167; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 771.)

GAIANUS (6) (GAIANAS, GAINAS), monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, chosen by the party of the Incoercibilists, or Phanomnaste, whilst the party of the Corruptibilists, or Phthatorolatru, put forward Theodosius (a.d. 537). It was the custom at Alexandria that the patriarch elect should keep vigil by the body of his predecessor, placing the right hand of the corpse upon his head, and after the funeral, in which he himself took part, receive the pall of St. Mark from his neck. Whilst Theodosius, who had been consecrated, was performing this rite, the rabble of the opposing faction broke in and drove him from the city. But Gaianus having held the see for only three hundred days was banished by order of the empress Theodora, first to Carthage and afterwards to Sardinia. The rest of his life is unknown. From this Gaianus the sect of Incoercibilists at Alexandria received the name of "Gaianites." (See Liberius, Breviar., xx.; L'Art de vérifier les Dates, iii. 473.)

GAIBALDUS, GAIBALT, bishop of Natisbon. [GAIBALDUS (3)].

GAIBHREN, GAIBHREIN (GAIRN, GAIRHRIN), commemorated June 24, identified by O'Corry (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Revett, 179) with Gabhrin or Gabrenus, a fellow-student of Mochua of Bally (Life of Mochua, cap. in Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 48).

GAIDOALDUS succeeded Eunin as duke of Trent c. 595. After some discord with the Lombard king Agilulf, the cause of which is unknown, he was peaceably received by him, c. 602. Paulus Diaconus calls him "vir bonus ac fide catholicus" (iv. 10, 37).

Within the next two years, however, he seems to have added intrigue against the new king to his desecration of the old, and in 633 the fourth council of Toledo pronounced sentences of confiscation and exclusion from communion against both Suinthila and Gaila. The wives and children of the brothers are with them excluded “a societate gentis atque consortio nostro.” (Tejada y Ramiro, Coll. de Can. de la Ig. GAIMAS, a Goth who had taken service in the Roman armies, first mentioned as being appointed one of the commanders of the barbarian allies by Theodosius at the commencement of his campaign against Eugenius, a.d. 394. He was sent the following year by Stilicho in command of the reinforcements dispatched by him to Arcadius. The latter, stung by the court, wrote to the suggestion of Gaiamas, to meet them before the gates of Constantinople. After the army had saluted the emperor, the soldiers, at a signal given by Gaiamas, flung themselves upon the obnoxious minister Rufinus, the enemy of Stilicho, and murdered him before the emperor’s eyes. Gaiamas was judged that most of the fruits of this conspiracy should be reaped by the envious Eutropius, and plotted his downfall. (Eutropius.) Meanwhile Gaiamas threw off the mask, joined his countryman Tribigild at Thyatira, and marched on Chalcedon. For his demands for the surrender of the ministers of Arcadius, their preservation by the entreaties of Chrysostom, and the firmness with which the latter compelled the demand of Gaiamas that a church should be granted to the Arians within the walls of Constantinople, see Chrysostom, p. 524, and the authorities there cited. A peace was patched up between Arcadius and Gaiamas; the latter was appointed master-general of the armies, both horse and foot, and entered Constantinople with his Gothic followers. The inhabitants, especially the money-changers, were alarmed by the crowds of barbarian warriors who filled the streets, feared every moment that a general pillage might begin. Gaiamas himself, who had left the city after directing the barbarians who remained behind to wait the signal of his return, was repulsed in a premature attack on the walls. He was declared a public enemy, and the Goths in the town, who had taken refuge in the church granted for their use (Chrysostom, p. 523) were attacked and massacred, and the church was burnt. Gaiamas retreated to the Chersonese and endeavoured to cross the Hellespont; but his rafts were sunk by the Roman fleet, and Gaiamas, after losing a great part of his troops, was obliged to relinquish the attempt, Dec. 23, a.d. 400. (Chronicon Paschale, i. 567, ed. Dindorf.) He then marched into the interior of Thrace, but the passage was barred by Ulde king of the Huns at the head of his forces. Gaiamas made a gallant attempt to cut his way through, but was defeated and slain. His head was brought to Constantinople, Jan. 3, a.d. 401. (Chronicon Paschale, above cited.) For a further account of Gaiamas, see Arcadius, in Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, and Gibbon, c. 32. (Zosimus, iv. 57, 58, v. 17–22.)

GAIRINUS (Gérin, Guérin), ST., martyr, brother of Leodegarius (St. Léger). He took part with his brother in his contest with Ébrin, and with him was accused of having been concerned in the murder of Chilperic II. Though the charge was not proved, he was fastened to a stake and stoned to death, 678. There is extant a consolatory letter to their mother Sigrida at Soissons by St. Léger. (Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvii. 373.) He was commemorated Aug. 25 and Oct. 2. (Bull. Acta SS. Oct. i. 355; Mabille. Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedict. ii. 600.)

GAIO (Gaiuonux, Gaynouonux), abbat of Flavigny in Burgundy, and 31st bishop of Autun, between Modenrnxus and Hiddo. In the Chronicon of Hugo abbat of Flavigny, Gaynouonux episcopus is said to have succeeded Walinus in the abbacy in 603. Later, against the year 755, is placed the death of Gaynouonux episcopus, and the ordination of Manasses as abbat in his place, and this statement is repeated in the series of the abbats of Flavigny at the end of the Chronicon (Migne, Patr. Lat. cliv. 136, 150, 309). The first of these dates is plainly a mistake, and Le Coiteul conjectures in its place the year 747 (Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 747, n. xxxii. tom. v. p. 180). The identity of the bishop and abbat rests only upon conjecture. (Gall. Christ. iv. 588, 456.)

GALACTORIUS, bishop of Benebarum or Benarnum, now probably Lescar in Bear. His signature is found to the canons of the council of Agathas or Agde in A.D. 506 (Manii, Concilia, viii. 337). He is said to have fought at the head of the Bearnese against the Arian Visigoths, by whom he was defeated and made prisoner. On his refusing to abjure the Catholic faith he was cruelly put to death. This cannot have happened later than A.D. 507, as Clovis passed the winter of that year at Bordeaux, after defeating and slaying Abaric king of the Visigoths. He was commemorated on July 27. (Boll. AA. SS. July vi. 434; De Synodus, Mart. Gall. 1151; Gall. Christ. i. 1265.) [F. D.]

GALANUS, bishop of Emporius (Ampurias) from 392 onwards. He appears first as archdeacon representing bishop Fructuosus at the third council of Toledo in 589 (Manii, ix. 1002 c). He was present as bishop of Emporius at the second council of Saragossa, 592, and at the council of Barcelona, 599. (Manii, x. 472 b, 484 a; Aguirre-Catalani, ii. 238, 342; Esp. Brev. xi. 270.) [M. GALENUS, CLAUDIUS, physician, born A.D. 130 at Pergamus, flourished chiefly at Rome under the Antonines, and died in 200 or 201. For a full account of him see Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography. He belongs to church history only as the author of a few incidental words referring to Christianity that occur in his voluminous writings. Thus in his De Pulsusman Differentiis (lib. iii. cap. 3, sub fin. in Opp. tom. viii. p. 657, ed. Kühn) he writes: "It is easier to convince the disciples of Moses and Christ than physicians and philosophers who are addicted to particular sects." In the same treatise (lib. ii. cap. 4, p. 579) he condemn the method of Archigenes, who requires his dicta to be received absolutely and without demonstration, as "though we were come to the school of Moses and of Christ." In the De Remus Affectuosis Dignatione (Kühn, t. xix.) there are still more references to Christianity, but that treatise is spurious. An Arabic writer has preserved a fragment of Galen's lost work, De Republica Platonis, which is to the following effect:—"We know that the people called Christians have founded a religion in parables and miracles. In moral teaching we see them in newise teaching them to philosophers; they practise celibacy, as do many of their women; in diet they are abstemious, in fastings and prayers assiduous; they injure no one. In the practice of virtue they surpass philosophers; in probity, in continence, in the genuine performance of miracles (vera miraculorum patrimonia—does he mean the Scripture miracles, on which their religion was based?) they infinitely exceed them." (Cusari, Biblth. Arabico-Hispiana, vol. i. p. 253). For apologetic remarks on Galen's testimony see Bardner's Credibility (Works, vol. vii. p. 306, ed. 1838). [C. H.]

GALERIUS, emperor. (GAIUS GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS is the full name on his coinage; he is called MAXIMIAN in some Acts of Martyrs, that having apparently been his name until Diocletian changed it; see Lact. Mort. 18; the appellation of ARMENTARIUS is but a nickname taken from his original occupation.) He was a native of New Dacia, on the south side of the Danube. His mother Romula had fled thither for refuge from the predatory Carpi, who pillaged her own country on the other side of the stream. In later times he asserted that his father was none other than the god Mars, who seduced his mother under the form of a dragon (Lact. Mort. 9; Aur. Vict. Epit. xI. 17). As a youth he was employed as a beastherd on his native plains, but soon joined the army, and learned war under the stern tuition of Aurelian and Probus. Without education, and without virtues, he raised himself by his undoubtedly military gifts, until he was actually selected (in conjunction with Constantius), by Diocletian, to fill the office of Caesar of the East in Diocletian's famous scheme for the reorganization of the empire, A.D. 292. His connexion with Diocletian war strengthened by a marriage with Valeria, the Christian daughter of Diocletian. There were no children of the marriage, which was anything but happy, but the gentle Valeria adopted for her own husband's bastard son Candidian.

[DIOCLETIAN.] Galerius had indeed none of the gifts of a ruler, nor any appreciation of his father-in-law's policy, but his authority with the army made him a useful coadjutor. Five years after his call to the Caesarship (A.D. 297), he was sent to conduct the chief war of the reign of Diocletian, the last which ever gave the empire a triumph, against Narses king of Persia. The first campaign proved unsuccessful through the deficiency of numbers, and Diocletian was so exasperated that he forced the haughty Galerius to walk a mile on foot behind his chariot in the sight of the army (Amm. Marc. XIV. xi. 10). This humiliation Goaled Galerius to fresh exertions, and in a second campaign he utterly routed Narses, and forced him to purchase peace at the cost of five provinces near the source of the Tigris.

Little more is recorded of Galerius until the year 303, which brings him prominently in contact with the church. He had conceived a hatred for the Christians, not based, like that of Diocletian, on political suspicion, nor, like that of Marcus or Julian, on philosophical disapproval, but originating (so far as we can see) almost wholly in his fanatical superstition and his aversion from Christian morality. His mother, who appears to have exercised great influence over him, was a noted votress of the Phrygian oracles, and continued to hold the entreaties to demolish Christianity. Her authority was supported by that of the magician and so-called Platonist, Theonexus (Cedr. vol. 1. p. 47, ed. Bonn), who had also acquired an ascendency over Galerius. The winter of 302–3 was spent by Galerius at Nicomedia, where he used every effort to compel the reluctant Diocletian to annul the legislation of Gallienus, to break the forty years' amnesty between the empire and the church, and to crush the religion which Diocletian had so conspicuously favoured. His urgency was so great and so formidable (Diocletian being depressed with the approach of his great malady, and Julian not yet dead), that step by step he gained his point, until Diocletian consented to prescribe the open profession of Christianity and to take all measures to suppress it short of bloodshed (Lact. Mort. 11, "rem sine sangue transigii"). The first edict of Diocletian, however, was not strong enough to content Galerius. The demolition of buildings which proclaimed the power of the church, the prohibition of synaxis, the burning of the books used in the Christian ritual, the civic, social, and military degradation of Christians, were slow ways of abolishing the obnoxious religion. Galerius longed for more summary action to be taken, and that an assault should once more be tried. His one desire was to effect the removal of Diocletian's expressive clause, that "no blood was to be shed in the transaction."

Shortly after the promulgation of the First Edict, a fire broke out in the part of the palace where Diocletian lived. Lactantius, who was the historian of the event, without fear of contradiction that it was set alight by Galerius. His object was to persuade the Augustus that his trusty Christian chamberlains were conspiring against him; but on application of torture to the whole household, they were acquitted. A fortnight later the same act or accident was repeated, and this time Galerius (who, ostensibly to escape assassination, perhaps really to avoid discovery, took immediate departure) convinced Diocletian of the existence of a Christian plot. Thus convinced, the emperor signed his second edict, ordering the incarceration of the entire clergy, though even now there was to be no bloodshed, against which Diocletian set his face from first to last.

In Galerius' favour it must be said, that in his mode of putting these edicts into execution he shews occasional signs of an intention to adhere, though very loth, to the principles of Diocletian's legislation. It is true that his return into his own province in 304 is marked by a sudden crowd of martyrs where the edicts had before not even been published: but his conduct, in the case of St. Romanus shows that, when directly appealed to, he felt bound to forbid the capital punishment of even obstreperous Christians (Eus. Mart. Pal. ii.).

The time was coming, however, when Galerius was to have more liberty of action. In 304, he probably desired a total collapse of Diocletian's health, the so-called Fourth Edict was issued by Maximin, no doubt in conjunction with Galerius, making death the penalty of Christianity. Diocletian began to recover in March 305. For years past he had intended to abdicate on the 1st of May in that year. But now, for some reason, he hesitated to dispense with an account of the commotion which he found had been caused in the empire by the Fourth Edict. Galerius, who had long looked constantly upon the diadem promised him against that date, would brook no more delay, and with much violence compelled the embittered Augustus to retire, leaving himself nominally second to Constantius in the government. The death of that prince in July, 306, left Galerius supreme.

It was the beginning of the downfall of Diocletian's system. Galerius was driving the empire wild with his taxation, which were imposed upon the city of Rome itself. Usurpation followed without intermission, that step by step was to put down Maximiatus, was taken prisoner, and Galerius, who followed with a large army to rescue him, learned that Severus was dead, and at the same time found himself deserted by his troops, and compelled to best a hasty retreat. In 307, Nov. 11, he effected a meeting at Carnuntum (near Freiburg) between Diocletian, Maximin, and himself, at which (probably in spite of his father-in-law's advice) Galerius appointed Licinius to be Augustus, though he had never been a Caesar.

These troubles had not diverted the attention of Galerius from persecution, which was going on at too great a pace to last. In the year 308, March 31, the emperor issued, in conjunction with his nephew Maximin, a bloody edict against the Manichaeans (Cod. Greg. ed. Hanel, lib. xiv. p. 44*). The question cannot be discussed here, but the writer of this notice believes that he has proved this to be the true date of the Manichaean edict in his essay on "The Persecution," pp. 278. The same year did indeed see an order to substitute mutilation for death in cases of Christianity; as Eusebius 2 Q

CHRIST. HISTOR.-VOL. II.

says (Mort. Pol. iv.), "The confagration subdued, as if quenched with the streams of sacred blood." But the relaxation was only for a few months. In the autumn of 308 a new edict of persecution was issued, which began a perfect reign of terror, not to be concluded till two full years had elapsed. These two years were the most prolific of bloodshed of any in the whole history of Roman persecutions; and the vast majority of persons who in the East (for the persecution in the West had ceased with the accession of Constantine, and usurpation of Maxentius) are celebrated as "martyrs under Diocletian" really suffered between 308 and 311. This part of the persecution bears marks, however, rather of the genius of Maximian Daza than of Galerius.

Towards the close of the year 310 Galerius was seized with an incurable malady, which seems to have been partially caused by his vicious life. This gradually developed into the frightfully malignant disease vulgarly known as being "eaten of worms." The fact rests not only on the authority of the church historians (Eus. H. E. viii. xvi. 3 foll.; Lact. Mort. 33), but also upon that of the pagan Aurelius Victor (Epit. xl. 4) and the precious fragment known as Anonymus Valesii. Galerius had all his life been a slave of superstition; and now, face to face with death, and so awfully a death, he thought (apparently) that a compromise might be effected with the God of the Christians, whom he undoubtedly regarded as an active and hostile power. From his dying bed was issued his famous edict of toleration, bearing the signatures also of Constantine and of Licinius, which finally put an end to the "persecution of Diocletian." This most extraordinary document (which may be read in full in Eus. H. E. viii. 17, and also in Lact. Mort. 34) begins with an assertion that the emperors in their desire for conservative reform, had taken steps to reduce "to a good disposition the Christians who had abandoned the persuasion (seeded in their own fathers)." The fact is that the persecution is ascribed to the fact that the Christians had wilfully departed from the "institutions of the ancients which had pervadventure been first set on foot by their own forefathers," and had formed schismatical assemblies on their own private judgment. Primitive Christianity is here meant by the phrase "institutis referens," and the edicts had had no object but to bring the Christians back to it. But the only effect of the edicts, Galerius continued, was to bring many into trouble; in spite of them, the Christians would "neither display due reverence to the gods nor pray heed to the God of the Christians;" and seeing this, Galerius was determined, mercifully under certain unspecified conditions, which were conveyed privately to the magistrates, to allow Christianity once more and to permit the building of churches. Finally, in return for this indulgence, the Christians are told to pray to their God for the recovery of Galerius.

Thus did the dying persecutor the sacrilegiously to duple the church into believing him a kind reformer, and the church's God into remitting his temporal punishment. But it was of no avail. "The Unknown God to whom he had at last betaken himself, gave no answer to his insolent and tardy invocation" (De Bрогlie, i. 207). The edict was posted at Nicomedia on April 30, and on the 5th or 13th of May 311, it was announced that Galerius was dead. [A. J. M.]

GALESUINTHA, queen. [Galesuinta]

GALINDO, supposed to be the original Spanish name of Prudentius bishop of Troyes, before he changed it on coming to live for his education in France. It is given to him in the Annales Bertiniani, a.D. 861, which seems to be the only authority. (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxv. 965; Ceillier, xii. 493.) [J. G.]

GALINUS (Salvinus), 42nd bishop of Auch, succeeding Revelius and followed by Elisaesus about the close of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 977.) [S. A. B.]

GALLA (1), St., May 8, one of many martyrs commemorated with St. Ancius or Agatius, a Roman soldier at Byzantium about 303. (Mort. Hieron.; Bull. Acta SS. 8 Maii ii. 291, 762.) [A. B. C. D.]

GALLA (2), first wife of Flavius Julius Constantius, half-brother of Constantine. (Hist. xiv. 11, § 27) tells us that she was the sister of the consuls Rufinus and Cerealis. She had two sons and one daughter by Julius Constantius. The name of the eldest son is unknown, but Julian tells us that he was put to death by the emperor Constantius II. (ad Ath. 370 D.) The second son, born in 323, was Flavius Julius Gallus Caesar. The daughter, whose name is not recorded, was the first wife of the emperor Constantius II. (Julian, ad Ath. 272 D.; cf. Euseb. de Vit. Const. iv. 49; Du Cange, Fam. Aug. 37.) [M. F. A.]

GALLA (3), a lady in Spain in the later part of the 4th century, connected with Adrian in the diffusion of the Zoroastrian idea of which Priscillian was the champion. Jerome speaks of her as the type of those women who in the next generation busied themselves in the spread of Pelagianism. (Jerome, Ep. cxxiii. 4, ed. Vall.) [W. H. F.]

GALLA (4), the daughter of Valentinian I. by his second wife Justina. In 383 according to the Chron. Pasch., 386 according to Marcellinus, she became the second wife of the emperor Theodosius I. and by him she was the mother of Gallus Placidus (Zosim. Hist. iv. 43; Chr. Pasch.). She died in child-birth, a.D. 394 (Zosim. iv. 57). Galla, like her mother, was an Ariam (Philostorg, H. E. x. 7.) [T. W. D.]

GALLA (5) PLACIDIA, daughter of Theodosius I. by his second wife Gallus. On the death of her father, a.D. 395, she and her half-brother Honorius were left under the care of Stilicho and his wife Serena, the latter being the daughter of Gallus's paternal uncle Honorius (Olympiod. op. Phot. Biblioth. ixx.). In 408 Serena was unjustly accused of being in correspondence with Alaric, who was then besieging Rome, and Placidia is said to have been a party to the cruel sentence which was passed upon her (Zosim., Hist. v. 38). Two years afterwards the city was captured and Placidia taken prisoner. Notwithstanding that great exertions were made to procure her release, especially by Constantin,
GALLA

Her future second husband [CONSTANTIUS III, Dict. G. and H. E.], who was ready high in the imperial service, she was still detained in captivity, though treated by her captors with great respect (Olympiod. u. s.; Zosim. vi. 12). In January, A.D. 414, she was married to Ataulfus, who had in the meanwhile succeeded his uncle Aicarius. The marriage, which was celebrated with great splendour, took place, according to Olympiodorus (u. s.) and Iatadius (Chron. s. a.), at Narbona in Gaul. By Ataulfus she had a son, who was named Theodosius after his grandfather. He died in his infancy, and was buried near Barcelona. Soon after this Ataulfus was fatally wounded by one of his domestic, and on his death-bed charged his brother to send Placidia to Honorius. She did not return to Italy, however, until A.D. 416, when she was brought to Ravenna by Eupathius, an imperial officer, who had been sent to Gaul to receive her. She now took up her abode with Honorius and influence over Ravenna, and in January A.D. 417 she was married to Constantius, but greatly against her will. By him she had two children, Valentinian and Honoria (Olympiodor. u. s.).

Her influence over her second husband was soon betrayed in his active persecution of the Pelagians (Prosp. Chron. s. a. 419). In February, A.D. 421, Honorius admitted Constantius to a share of the empire. The persecution of the Pelagians was then renewed with great vigour. On Sept. 11, 421, Constantius died. Placidia again took up her abode with Honorius at Ravenna; but great scandal arising from the rascipuous relations of the latter, and their mutual affection being replaced by bitter hate, which occasioned serious disturbances in the city, she and her children were sent to Theodosius II. at Constantinople (Olympiod. u. s.). During her disgrace she was greatly befriended by Boniface, who was already count of Africa (Placidia, ii. 4). On the death of Honorius in August, 423, Boniface refused to acknowledge Joannes in Africa, which he held for Placidia and her son (Prosp. Chron. s. a. 424). Theodosius at once declared himself in favour of Valentinian and sent him and his mother with an army to depose Joannes. Having been deposed, Placidia entered into a correspondence with Aquileia, and immediately put to death (Olympiod. u. s.; Marcell. Chron. s. a. 425; Philostorg. H. E. xii. 11). Valentinian being but a child, the authority of Placidia was now supreme, and among her first acts was the issue of three edicts in rapid succession for the banishment of all "Mauchaeans, heires, and schismatics, and every sect opposed to the Catholic faith" (Cod. Theod. XI. v. 62, July 17; c. 63, Aug. 4; c. 64, Aug. 6, A.D. 425, all dated from Aquileia), and another restoring to the clergy all the privileges of which they had been deprived by Joannes (Cod. Theod. XI. ii. 4, Oct. 8, A.D. 425). The schismatics whom she especially had in view were the adherents of the antipope Eulalius, who were still numerous in Rome. These edicts were soon followed by another of great severity, directed against apostates (Cod. Theod. XI. viii. 8, April 7, A.D. 429).

In 427 Aetius, whom she had long forgiven for supporting Joannes, and who was now greatly in her favour, persuaded Placidia that her tried friend Boniface, to whom she was under such heavy obligations, was meditating revolt. He at the same time, by letter, persuaded Boniface that Placidia was resolved upon his ruin. His double treachery was but too successful. Boniface, in despair, appealed for help to the Vandals, who gladly responded to his appeal, and Africa was overrun by their forces. Some of his many friends at Rome, who refused to believe that one who had hitherto borne so high a character could be guilty of the treason with which he had been charged, procured Darius [DARIUS, Vol. I. 789 a] to be sent to Africa to inquire into the facts. On his arrival Boniface shewed him the letters which he had received from Aetius, and Darius reported accordingly to Placidia. She at once explained the whole matter to her friend, and urged him to do his best to repair the injury which the empire had sustained. But it was too late, the Vandals were masters of the country, and Africa was lost (Prosp. u. s.; Augustin. Ep. 220; Gibbon, c. xixii.). In 435 Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, visited Ravenna, where he was taken ill and died. Placidia was lavish in her attentions to him on his death-bed, and afterwards caused his body to be carried into Gaul with great honour (Constant. Vib. Germ. ii. 21, 24).

In the education of her children Honorio and Valentinian she was most unhappy (Prosp. u. s.). Both of them disgraced themselves by the grossest misconduct. Her administration of the empire was equally unfortunate. On this account especially Cassiodorus institutes a contrast between her and Amalasuntha, the mother of Aetharic, and greatly to her disadvantage. (Pros. lib. xi. ep. i in Migne, l. xi. 503). In 449 Placidia was at Rome with Valentinian. The legates of Leo had just returned from the robber council of Ephesus. Leo was greatly distressed at what had taken place in that assembly, and bitterly bewailed its proceedings to Placidia, who immediately wrote to Theodosius and his sister Eudoxia (Pedriani, i. 4), expressing the fervent hope of the empire, of the faith of their ancestors, and their influence to procure the restoration of Flavian, the deposed bishop of Constantinople. The reply of Theodosius was by no means complimentary. He briefly refers his suit to what he had written to Leo, simply saying that "Flavian, who is said to be the chief cause of this mischief," had been canonically deposed, and concludes with telling her that "he had never thought of anything contrary to the faith," as "some said he had" (Conc. Chalced. pt. i. Ep. 26, 28, 30; Labe, iv, 53, 55, 58). Placidia died at Rome soon afterwards, and was buried at Ravenna (Iatadius, Chr. s. a.; Gibbon, u. s.). She is said to have erected the palace which bore her name at Constantinople, and to have done so during the lifetime of her father (Chron. Pasch. s. a. 385). [T. W. D.]

GALLA (6), St., wife of Eucherius bishop of Lyons (434–450). The legend is that Eucherius, on being converted to a religious life, had himself walled up in a cave on his own estate on the banks of the Durance and spent his time in prayer, that he was taken thence by force and made bishop of Lyons, and that his wife Gallus installed herself in the cave, her daughters Tullia and Consordia ministering to her there as she had done to Eucherius. The story of Gallus, Tullia, and Consordia, has been supposed to belong to

GALLIANUS (2), ST., seventh bishop of Embrun, succeeding Catullinus and followed by St. Palladius (c. A.D. 524-555). He was represented at the fourth council of Arles by Emeterius (A.D. 524), was present at that of Carpentras in 527, perhaps at the second of Orange in 528, though his name is not found in the subscriptions, at the third of Vaison in the same year, and at the fourth of Orleans in 541, and was represented by Probus at the fifth of Orleans in 549 (Manst. viii. 627, 708, 718, 728; ix. 120, 137). He is said to have consecrated the church of the Spanish martyrs, Vincent, Orentius, and Victor, built by Palladius at Embrun. In the life of St. Palladius (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iv. 96) he is spoken of as preceding St. Palladius, while in the Breviary of Embrun he appears as his successor. This discrepancy has been eluded in the lists of the Embrun bishops by the supposition of two bishops of the name, the preceding and the other following St. Palladius, and this arrangement has been followed in the Gallia Christiana (iii. 1060-1) but with an expression of doubt. Following Le Coite (Ann. Ecl. Franc. an. 536, n. xvii. tom. i. 457) we have recognised only one. Those who believe in two assign the first four of the above-mentioned councils to Gallianus I. and the other two to Gallianus II. [S. A. B.]

GALLICINUS, ST. (GALLITANUS), sixth bishop of Bordeaux, between St. Amantius and Cyprianus in the latter half of the 5th century. He is mentioned in an ode contained in a letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. viii. epist. 11, Migne, Patr. Lat. ivii. 605). From a letter of the same author, in which he laments the ravages of the Goths in Aquitania, who had slain, amongst others, the bishop of Bordeaux, it has been inferred that he suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Eutic king of the Visigoths, about A.D. 475 (lib. vii. Epist. 6, Migne, Patr. Lat. ivii. 571; Gall. Christ. ii. 790). [S. A. B.]

GALLIENUS, P. LICINIVS, emperor. He was the son of the emperor Valerian, and was appointed by the senate conductor to his father very shortly after Valerian’s accession, in August 253. In 260, his father’s miserable captivity in Persia freed him from an irksome moral restraint and left him politically irresponsible. No notion of his character may be formed from the words with which he received the melancholy news. Parodying the philosopher who said “I was aware that I had begotten a mortal,” he replied, “I was aware that my father was mortal.” (Poll. Gall. 17.) Gallienus was a man of marked ability, accomplished and versatile, an orator and a pretty poet, drawn to the mystic Platonism... of Plotinus, to whom he was disposed to offer a territory in Italy to be governed on Utopian principles. (Porphyry. Vit. Plot. c. 12.) Yet his character was entirely without moral earnestness. In his clearness and folly he more nearly resembled Nero than any other prince between the two. He made no attempt to govern. Certainly no man ever had more excuse for neglecting duty on the plea of difficulty. The number of generals who claimed and exercised independent power has been stretched to thirty, fancifully called "the Thirty Tyrants." Gallienus made but feeble and desultory attempts to put any of them down, turning into wretched jests each new humiliation, and taking refuge in sensuality from the hopeless task of state reorganization.

Such a view of his character and of the political situation is necessary to the understanding of the one great act which brings him into church history. On his father's fall, he found himself confronted by the church against which Valerian had declared deadly warfare. He was legally bound to put every clergyman to death he could find, and to deal in almost as summary a fashion with all other Christians. [Valerian.] Gallienus had had three years' experience of the difficulty and wearisomeness of this task. There was no prospect of its coming to an end. The object, too, was not very apparently useful. The "Thirty Tyrants" were foes formidable enough to attract what little attention could be spared from pleasure. Accordingly, in 261, he issued an edict (προφήτης, etc., a document publicly displayed and proclaimed, not an ἀναγραφή or private instruction to the magistrates) by which Christianity was for the first time put on a clearly legal footing as a regular religio licita. This edict of Gallienus is the most marked epoch in the history of the church's relation to the state, since the rescript of Trajan to Pliny which had made Christianity distinctly a religio licita. The words in which Eusebius describes the edict (the text of which is lost) imply no more than that actual persecution was stopped (ἀπείρωσε τῶν λαχειαν, Eus. Hist. Eccl. vii. 13), which might have been the case without a legal recognition of Christianity; it might merely have implied the cessation of bloodshed; but Eusebius has preserved a copy of the encyclical rescript which the emperor addressed to the Christian bishops of the Egyptian province, which bears a most remarkable testimony to the position which the church had won. "The emperor Caesar P. Licinius Gallienus . . . to Dionysius, Pinnas, Demetrius, and the other bishops." The words "the bishops" have a perfectly recognised meaning for the pagan government; it needs no more paraphrase than "the pro-consuls" would have needed. The purport of the rescript is to inform the bishops that orders had been issued to the pagan officials to evacuate the consecrated places (εἰ τὸν θεὸν οἱ προσταινούσαι;); the bishops have but to produce their copies of the rescript, which will serve them as a warrant against any interference in reoccupying (Σαραμαίνει τῶν ἁγίων). Thus formally, universally, and deliberately was done, what Alexander Severus had but done in an isolated case and in a freak of generosity, i.e. the right of the Corpus Christianorum to hold property was fully recognised. If Christianity had not been explicitly made a religio licita, this would have been impossible. The great proof, however, of the footing gained by the church through Gallienus's edict lies in the elevation of his successor Aurelian in the matter of Paul of Samosata. Though Aurelian's bigoted sun-worship and hatred of the church were well known, and his death alone prevented a great rupture, the Catholics were so secure of their legal position as actually to appeal to the emperor in person to decide their dispute; both and Aurelian, as the law then stood, not only recognised the right of the church to hold property, but also to decide internal disputes (though they concerned property) according to her own methods.

The most elaborate account of the secular history of Gallienus will be found in Bernhardt's Geschichte Roms von Valerian bis zu Diocletianus Toto, part I. (Berlin, 1867). [A. J. M.]

Jerome speaks of Gallienus as "pars animae meae." (Jerome, Pref. to bk. ii. of Chron. vol. viii. 224, ed. Vall. Migne, Pat. Lat. xxvii. 33.) [W. H. F.]

GALLINICUS, patriarch of Constantinople, [Gallinicus (2).]

GALLINICUS (Gallinicius) appears among the Eutychians, who, claiming to be archimandrites, appealed to the emperor Marcian for a general council in A.D. 451 (Labbe, iv. 524); but the orthodox archimandrites in the council of Chalcedon would not recognise his claim to the title (Labbe, iv. 521 A). His name appears only in the Latin text, where he is described as "inhabiting a memoria" with ten persons under him." [Cf. Epipdus (31).] [C. G.]

GALLIONUS, a Maxianist bishop mentioned as being absent from the council of Cabarsus, A.D. 393. (Aug. En. in Ps. 38, 20; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 238, ed. Oertzh.) [H. W. P.]

GALLITIANUS of Bordeaux. [Gallicianus.]

GALLIUS (Gallus), thirteenth bishop of Arezzo (Arezzo), c. A.D. 447. He succeeded Eusebius II., and was succeeded by Benedictus. He is said, even while bishop, to have led the life of a hermit in the neighbouring marshes and mountains, only shewing himself to his people when absolutely necessary. (Ughelli, Ital. Soc. l. 456; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvii. 71.) [R. S. G.]

GALLOMAGNUS, twelfth bishop of Troyes, succeeding Ambrosius and followed by Agrippus, was present at the fourth council of Paris (A.D. 507).
GALLONIANUS

573), and signed the letter addressed by it to king Sigebert. He also subscribed the first council of Magon (A.D. 581 or 582). He is said to have obtained the relics of St. Nicetius of Lyons, which were placed in the church called after him, formerly dedicated to St. Maurus. (Mansi, ix. 387, 389, 936; Gall. Christ. xii. 457.)

GALLONIANUS, bishop of Utica, in prosconsular Africa, present at the two synods at Carthage, A.D. 419. (Mansi, iv. 433, 438; Morelli, Afr. Christ. i. 382.) [R. S. G.]

GALLONISTUS (GALLONISTUS, GALLONISTUS, GALLONISTUS), bishop of Adria, present at the Lateran synod on Monothelism under pope Martin in 649. (Hefele, S. 307; Mansi, x. 867.) For the connexion of the see with Ravigo, vdf. Ugh. Ital. Soc. ii. 297; Spieresius de Alvaratis, Adriens. Episc. 32. [A. H. D. A.]

GALLUS (1) CAESAR, son of Julius Constantius (younger brother of Constantine the Great) and his mother Eudocia, A.D. 325 appointed Caesar by Constantius 330, executed by his orders 354.

1. Authorities. 2. Life. 3. Character and Relation to the Church.

1. The authorities for his life are generally those referred to for that of his half-brother Julian. The most important is Amnianus Marcellinus (q. e.) whose fourteenth book (the first now extant) is chiefly concerned with Gallus. The Arian church historian Philostorgius also records a good many facts about him which are not found in other Christian writers. The facts of his life are given as length in Tillemont, Comp. vol. iv. under Constantius, arts. 22, 30-34, and Julian, 1, 2.

2. The life of Gallus may be divided into two periods: (1) as a young man; (2) as Caesar.

(1) As a young man, A.D. 325-350.—Julius Constantius, the patrician, the youngest and most remarkable of the sons of Constantius Chlorus and St. Helena, married as his first wife Gallia, a sister of Rufinus and Cerealis, two men of rank, who had filled the offices of consul and praetorian prefect with reputation (Amn. xiv. 11, 27). She bore him two sons, the eldest of whose name is unknown to us (Jul. ad S. P. Q. Athan. p. 270 B, ed. Spanheim), and the subject of this article, who presumably received his name from his mother. He was born at Massa Veternensis near Siena in Tuscany (Amn. xiv. 11, 27). Gallia could not have survived the birth of her younger son, since we find Julius married a second time to Basilia (q. e.) five or six years later. At the death of Constantine the Great in 337, Gallus was twelve and Julian about seven years old.

In the general massacre of the younger branches of the imperial family which then took place, the two young brothers were alone preserved—Gallus being ill of a sickness which seemed likely to be mortal, and Julian being an infant (Soson or Constantine, p. 851). The preservation of Gallus is described by Gregory of Nazianzus to the exertions of Mark bishop of Arles, amongst others (Or. 4, 91), and that of both brothers to the clemency of Constantius, who shielded them from the revolting soldiery (bk. 21). Yet neither of them could feel much gratitude to their protector, who permitted, if he did not command, the slaughter of their father and elder brother, their uncle and six cousins (Jul. Ep. ad S. P. Q. Athan. p. 270 D). Gallus was at first banished from Constantinople (perhaps to Tralles; see Hertlein's note, p. 271 B), and attended the professors of the schools of Ephesus (Socrates, H. E. iii. 13, cf. Erod. Gesch. der Röth. Julians, p. 27, note 32, Jena, 1877), and was thus separated from his brother, who seems to have remained in the capital. It was not until several years had passed that they were reunited, being then sent to a place called "Macell. Fundus" in Cappadocia by the command of Constantius. Their six years' residence in this retirement was adorned with the state and luxury becoming their rank, but was felt, by Julian at least, to be little better than an imprisonment, inasmuch as they were encircled by sires, and were debauched from intercourse with the outside world. (Jul. ad Athan. p. 271; Amn. xv. 2, 7, gives the name. His words in xiv. 1, "et 40 orantes misericordiam concedat," in actual fact, the primitia ad principale culmen incesso salus protectus," seem a mere exaggeration; cf. Greg. Naz. Or. 4, 22; Sozomen, H. E. v. 2.) Both of them were brought up as Christians, and entered with apparent zeal into the externals of the Christian life. They were even enrolled as readers in the ranks of the clergy, and rivalled one another in building chapels over the relics of martyrs. In one case, that of the martyr Mamas, it was noticed that the work of Gallus succeeded, while that of Julian was continually falling down (Gregory and Sozomen, ad supr.). It is not improbable that this circumstance was regarded as ominous, even at this moment, by some of those whose business it was to keep a close watch upon the young princes. It was probably from this retirement that Gallus was called directly to the court to receive the unexpected dignity of Caesar which the childless Constantius determined to appoint (Jul. ad Athan. p. 271 B).

... eis tén deôn kathêkyn, kai elôs, p. 272 A. Sozomen, I. c., introduces a sojourn of Gallus in Ionia at this point, but apparently from misunderstanding Socrates, i. I.) Gallus was now twenty-five years of age, of a tall, handsome, well-knit person, with soft, light hair, and a small beard. He had, however, a brusque and harsh temper, which contrasted unfavourably with the gentle manners of his brother, and which was destined to display itself to his disadvantage in his later years (Amn. xiv. 11, 23; Jul. ad Athan. p. 271 D).

(2) Gallus as Caesar, 350-354.—The reason which led Constantius to appoint a colleague was no doubt the difficulty of the sovereign moment of the empire to which he succeeded on the death of his brother Constans in 350. In the West he was distracted by the very formidable usurpation of Magnentius in Gaul and the less dangerous rising of Vetranio in Illyria, while in the East the Persians were a perpetual source of anxiety. He determined that he should give the command of the Eastern empire to his cousin, in order to turn all his energies against Magnentius. Vetranio had not been a determined antagonist, professing himself throughout friendly to Constantius, and acting, as is said by some writers, under the authorization of his sister Constantia, widow of the king Hinniwas after the abduction of Vetranio that the appointment of Gallus took place. Various precautions were taken to ensure his fidelity. He had to make a solemn oath upon the Gospels not to undertake anything against the rights of his cousin, who similarly pledged himself to Gallus.

He received at the same time the strong-minded and unfeminine Constantia as his wife, and Luciliana, the count of the East, as his general. (Zosimus, 2, 45. Philostorgius, iv. 1, refers to the oath between Constantius and Gallus; cp. Chron. Pasch. p. 540; Zonaras, xiii. 8.)

Gallus perhaps used his new power to obtain a relaxation of his brother's seclusion—at any rate, Julian was released and permitted to pursue the studies which attracted him at Constantinople. Gallus then set out for the East, and in passing through Bithynia saw Julian prolonging the labour which had cost him so dear. (Julian, Epist. 149: Philip. 147; Gallus did not deny them but, in the bluntness of his style, he shared the blame upon his wife. This excuse was not favourably received, and Constantius issued an order for his execution, which took place towards the close of the year 354. (Ibid. 11. 11–23. For the malign influence of Eusebius. cp. Jul. ad Ath.
p. 272 b.) Some say that Constantius repeated and recalled his order; but Eusebius prevented the messengers from arriving in time to save him, and was afterwards in consequence put to death by Julian (Philostorg. iv. 1).

3. Character and Relation to the Church.—All authorities (including Julian) agree that Gallus was harsh and truculent in temper. Yet he had some popular qualities, and with a little more prudence might have easily made himself a formidable rival to Constantius. He loved the games of the circus, which were the delight of the people of Antioch, and reviled the bloody spectacles of gladiators, which had been forbidden since the days of Constantine (virtus et

In another direction, too, Gallus appears to have been supported by a considerable popular feeling, viz. in his translation of the body of the martyr Babylas, bishop of Antioch, to Daphne, the delicious sanctuary of Apollo in the suburb of the city. Here he built a chapel to the saint opposite the heathen temple, and did something to purge the place of its incon-tinence and superstition. (Sozomen. H. E. v. 19.
Lihanius, ἀπεκ τῶν γραμματέων, t. ii. p. 556 ed.
Beiske, in an oration addressed to Theodosius the Great, seems to refer to the suppression of the Maiana by Gallus.)

His instruction had been Arian under the direction of Constantius, and he seems to have been influenced not a little by the Anomoean Aetius. This notorious man had been sent to him with a request that he should be put to death as a heretic. Gallus spared him on the intercession of Leontius, bishop of Antioch, and became very friendly with him. According to Philostorgius, who reports these facts, he made him his religious instructor, and attempted by his means to recall Julian to the faith, when he heard that he was wavering (Philost. H. E. iii.
27). It was doubtless this Arian connexion that made the Arian historian favourable to Gallus.
GALLUS

There is no reason indeed to doubt that the young Caesar was a zealous Christian after a sort, and that he was distressed by his brother's danger of apostasy. A letter expressing this anxiety, and the relief he felt at the report brought by Aetius, is extant, and is generally printed at the end of Julian's Epistles. Petavius and others consider it spurious, inasmuch as the writer says, "the report has reached me that you are deserting your first religion, which you received from your forefathers." (In ep. vii. 4) As their grandfather Constantius Chlorus was not a Christian, this phrase has been thought to indicate a forger's hand (see the note in Heyler, Jul. Epistolae, p. 545). Tillemont, however, does not see sufficient reason to reject the letter (Emp. 4, p. 492); and Julian's maternal ancestors had perhaps long been Christians. On the other hand, such a letter, if written, would hardly have been preserved by Julian, while it is in the kind of writing which a forger to invent would incline, therefore, on the whole, to think it spurious. Whatever may have been the case with this letter, Julian tells us that they corresponded rarely and about few things (ad Athen. p. 273 ἀλ.), and they do not seem to have seen each other after the meeting at Nicomedia, which followed Gallus's enthronement (Socr. H. E. iii. 1, p. 169). Julian (we are told by Libanius) sent his brother good advice; and if he had followed it, he might have retained both his life and the throne (Libanius ad Julianum Consulam, t. i. p. 376, Reiske).

On the relations of Gallus with Libanius, see Sievers, Leben des Libanius, pp. 62 foll. Liban. θέλητα φιλοδοξοί τυχόν, tom. 1, p. 65 foll. Tillemont (Julic. art. 30) seems to represent Gallus as more favourable to Libanius than was really the case (cf. Liban. Epist. 394 α.). [J. W.]

GALLUS (2), the name under which Salpicius Severus relates in his dialogues the portion of the life of St. Martin omitted in the biography. (Sulp. Serv. Dial. i. init. Opp. Vindob. 1866, p. 132 in Pat. Lat. xx. 189.) [R. T. S.]

GALLUS (3), bishop of Tica, in Byzaene, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, though this was denied by Petilianus. (Mon. Vet. Dom. p. 121.) [H. W. P.]

GALLUS, bishop of Arretium. ([GALLIUS.]"

GALLUS (4), a priest of the diocese of Troyes, who having left his wife and fled to Auvergne, was induced by a letter of St. Lupus to come back. (Sid. Apoll. vi. Ep. 3.) [R. T. S.]

GALLUS (5)—Feb. 22. Consul and martyr at Antioch. He cannot be identified, the name occurring very frequently in the consular fasti of the first three centuries. Syria was a consular province. (Mart. Hier.; Acta SS. Boll. Feb. iii. 288.) [G. T. S.]

GALLUS (6), an early bishop of Aosta, succeeding St. Jocundus. According to an epitaph in the monastery of St. Ursus, given in the Gallia Christiana, he was consecrated Oct. 15, 528, and died Oct. 5, 546. He was followed by Litifredus. Although included by some in the number of saints, he has no appointed day (Gall. Christ. xii. 808; Gams, Syriac Episc. 820). [S. A. B.]

GALLUS L. ST.

GALLUS (8), fourth bishop of Valence, between St. Apollinaris and Maximus II. He was present at the Fifth council of Orange, 543. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 394; Majn. i. 136.) [S. A. B.]

GALLUS (9), L. ST., sixteenth bishop of Clermont, succeeding St. Quintianus. His father Georgius was a senator, his mother Leocadia is said to have been descended from Vetius Epagathus the martyr of Lyons, A.D. 177. He was uncle to Gregory of Tours, who has left a short account of his life. From his earliest years he evinced piety and devotion, and when his father would have married him to a senator's daughter he fled to the monastery of Courron, about two leagues from Clermont, and begged for the tonsure. The abbot refused to receive him without his father's consent, to inveigle what was obtained, though not without difficulty, as he was the first-born of the house. He especially excelled in the wonderful sweetness of his voice, which led the bishop, St. Quintian, when he heard it, to take him away from the monastery to Clermont. His fame coming to king Theoderic, who had collected at Treves many clergymen of that diocese, he was instantly summoned to the court, where he soon rose high in favour with both king and queen.

St. Quintian of Clermont and Aprunculus of Treves died about the same time (circa A.D. 527). The latter diocese desired Gallus for its bishop, but he had begged that of Clermont from the king, who gave it to him, in spite of a deputation from the clergy, who had elected another, and sought the royal sanction with rich presents. Gregory observes here that now was beginning the evil custom of kings selling bishopship and clergy buying them. St. Gallus used to say that he could make a bishop out of the ricas who carried the food to the cook who prepared the meal made by Theoderic in honour of his elevation. As bishop he subscribed the council of Orleans (533) by the hand of Laurentius a priest; he was present at that of Clermont (535); he was represented by Optenardus at the third of Orleans (538), and was present in person at the fourth (541) and fifth (549). Gregory relates several anecdotes and miracles of him. To his intercession was ascribed the comparative immunity of Clermont from a plague (lues inguinaria), which seems to have devastated a great part of France, and is several times alluded to by Gregory. By way of thanking, for the deliverance of his diocese, he instituted Rogations in the middle of Lent, in which there was a procession with singing of psalms to the tomb of St. Julian the martyr.

On his death-bed he summoned his flock around him, and partook of the sacrament with them, and after receiving parts of the Scripture and blessing the bystanders, he died in the fifty-fifth year of his age. His episcopate lasted twenty-seven years, though Venantius Fortunatus, in his epitaph on him, "forte metri legibus coarctatus," as a commentator suggests, gives the number as twenty-six. Amid lamentations, in which even the Jews took part, he was buried in GALLUS, II, ST.

Though appropriated by Dempster and Came-rarius as an Albanic Scot, he undoubtedly was of Irish birth, and his original name was Cellbach, Calech, or Caillech. He is said to have belonged to the sept of the Hy-Ceannsealach, and been related to St. Brigid of Kildare. He was ute and probably a younger brother of St.
Deiclius (Jan. 18), abbot of Luere, but beyond his having been of noble descent, and son of Cethernach, son of Oescu, his mother being a queen of Hungary (Ussher, Brit. Ecol. iv. 431), we have no further particulars of his lineage. Trained at Bangor, in the famous school of St. Comgall, and carefully instructed in grammar, poetry, and the sacred rites, he accompanied Columbanus into Gaul,
A.D. 585, followed him in his exile from Luzeul, went with him along the Rhine into Switzerland, and, apparently from his aptness at learning the languages, proved a most useful assistant in preaching the Gospel to the Suevi, Helvetii, and neighbouring tribes. [COLUMBANUS
When Columbanus in the year 612 left Switzerland to escape the persecution of the Burgundian court, and crossed the Rhetian Alps to Bobbio, Gallus was detained at Bregenz by a fever, and we need not imagine, with Walafrid, that any unworthy reason could be imputed by Columbanus to his companion for remaining behind. So soon as he could, after the departure of his master, Gallus returned to his friend the priest Willmar, at Arbona on the south shore of the Lake of Constance, and seems soon to have made up his mind to devote his remaining years to the conversion of the wild tribes who inhabited this eastern frontier of Austria. Finding a suitable place on the banks of the Steinah or Steinsach, he built his cell and oratory in the midst of a thick forest.
Twelve others accompanied him. His collection of rude huts determined the site of the famous town and monastery of St. Gall. Three years after, Columbanus died at Bobbio, and bequested to his old associate his abbatial staff as the last token of property. With this and other gifts, which had urged him to destroy the heathen images at Bregenz, and made him, according to the legend, an invincible foe to the demons of the lake and of the mountain (Pertz, ii. 5), who retired in silence before him, Gallus laboured for the conversion of the heathen, and soon acquired such a fame for wisdom and holiness that, when the see of Constance became vacant in A.D. 616, the episcopate was urgently pressed upon him; and again, in A.D. 625, when his old companion abbot Eustace died at Luzeul, he was earnestly invited to return and take the oversight of his former home. But with firmness and courtesy he declined both the prefixed dignities, and for the bishopric of Constance was allowed to nominate his own deacon John, as the more suitable person, being a native of the place. The sermon he preached at John’s consecration is still extant in the Latin in which it was probably pronounced; it is given by Canisius (Cant. iv. 569); see also for illustration, Geir, Der H. Gallus; Rettberg, calling of the Gentiles, and ending with a powerful appeal to Christian faith and life, which gives us a pretty distinct idea of the state of the corrupt and barbarous society he was seeking to leaven. But beyond these few incidents we know little of his abbacy and work among the Alemani and Swabians. In extreme old age he was induced at the pressing request of the priest or bishop of Arbona to revisit Arbona, but catching a fever there, under which he suffered fourteen days, he died Oct. 16, 645 or 646, at the age of 95, but some would propose an earlier date. He was buried at Arbona.

The sermon—which has received a variety of titles, as An Abrifment of the Holy Scriptures, An Abrifment of Christian Doctrine, A Discourse as to the Way of Governing the Church—seems to be the only really genuine literary remains of St. Gall, but Dempster (Hist. Ecc. Gent. Scot. i. 299-301) attributes him to many other works. Tanner (Bibl. 307) adds Epistola ad Duxiciam from Ussher (Synogog, Wks. iv. 430) and to others. Bangastu’s Epistle in Hist. Lit. de la France in thinking the Epistles given by Canisius and Ussher were the work of Gallus the Younger, bishop of Clermont. (Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 180, and Kelt. Oct. 15; Lescaud, de Rech. Gent. Scot. i. 146, 147; Care, Script. Eccl. Hist. Lit. 452.)

The story of St. Gall gives rise to one of the most celebrated monasteries of the middle ages, and its library to this day stands unrivalled in the wealth and variety of its ancient manuscripts. (For an account of the school of St. Gall and its cultivation of the fine arts, see Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 245-246.)

GALNUTIUS, saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GALONICA, ST. (GALONICA, GALENIA), the companion of St. Aquilina. They were at first employed to draw St. Christopher from the faith, but being converted suffered martyrdom. There is some obscurity as to whether the so-called Mozarabic breviary hymn does not represent them as solitars (Liturg. Mon. Mag. ii. 1167, congratulates with l. 795 n., 799 n.) instead of women, as in the later Western authorities. The name of Aquilina’s companion has other variations, ‘Niceta’ (Baronius, Suris, 12th-cent. Passionale), and ‘Nicera,’ or ‘Nicea’ (Walter of Spires, Legenda Aurea, etc.). They are commemorated in the Roman martyrlogy July 24. Mr. Baring-Gould mentions also Calnice as an alias for Aquilina.

GALSUNThA (GACHILESONDA, GALSONTA, GALSUNTHA, GALESWINTHA, GALSUNDA, CHILPREADI), wife of Chilperic I, king of the Franks; daughter of Athanagild king of the Visigoths of Spain and Galsuntha. In 587 Siegbert, one of Chilpéric’s brothers, married Brunichilde the younger sister of Galsuntha. Chilpéric was stirred to emulation, and the same year sent an embassy to ask for the elder. His envoys were instructed to give assurances that, if his request were granted, he would put away the women with whom he had been living. Athanagild consented, and the bride elect was escorted in a triumphal progress through France, and received by Chilpéric with great honour at Rouen. Before her marriage she abjured the Arian heresy in which she had been brought up, and was baptised into the Catholic communion. For a short time the king loved her much, for, as Gregory explains, she had brought much treasure. But very soon he forgot the promise which he had made to her father, to relinquish his other women, and Fredegund resumed her influence. Slighted by her husband and insulted by his mistress, Galsuntha, weary of vain remonstrances, offered to give up her dowry if only she were sent back to Spain. Chilpéric assembled, and sought to soothe her with reassuring words, but, at Fredegund’s instigation, secretly instructed a slave to strangle her in her bed. After a few days’ signed mourning, the king married Fredegund. Galsuntha’s sanctity was said to have been attested by a miracle at her tomb. Chilpéric could not conceal his guilt from his brothers, who, urged on by Sigebert, undertook to avenge her death by depriving him of his kingdom. The quarrel was not finally composed till, by the treaty of Andelot, twenty years later, the five towns of Aquitanie on the Garonne, Bayonne and Bigorre, which formed Galsuntha’s Wedding-gage, were made over to Brunichilde (Greg. Tur. ix. 20). The chief authorities for Galsuntha’s life are Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 28; Epist., i. 1; Alinon, iii. 5, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 625; and the poem written in her honour by Venantius Fortunatus (vii. 7, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 215-220). As to the last, however, though graphic in its details, it is not quite apparent how far the author has drawn on his own imagination. For modern accounts of this marriage see Lébèl, Greg. von Tours, p. 314, Doreau, D. du Ratin, Mém. fr. eccl. de France, i. 223-9 and the somewhat highly-coloured story of Augustus Thierry (Récits du Temps Mérovingiens, i.).

GAMALIEL I., also called GAMALIEL THE ELDER, RABBAN GAMALIEL, or simply GAMALIEL, son of the priest Simon, grandson of Hillel I., of the royal family of David. He succeeded to the presidency of the Sanhedrin, a.D. 30, in the reign of Agrippa I., and was one of the most distinguished doctors of the law at the beginning of the apostolic age. The fact that Gamaliel succeeded to the patriarchate about the same time that was written in his forward as the Messiah, that he propounded the law when Jesus preached the gospel, that he was the teacher of the apostle Paul, whose character he greatly moulded, and that it was before him in council that the apostle Peter was brought, makes any information which we may obtain about the teachings of this remarkable rabbi of the utmost importance to the student of ecclesiastical history and antiquity. His great maxim was to search the Scriptures to ascertain their true import, and faithfully to pay to the Lord’s sanctuary what belongs to the Lord. Hence he urged on his disciples to put themselves under approved teachers of the word of God, so as to learn to prize the saving of truth, to shun every species of doubt which leads to transgression, and not to pay the dues prescribed in the divine law according to conjecture. “Secure for thyself a teacher, keep thyself from doubting, and do not pay thy tithes conjecturally too often” (Abot, i. 10). How this maxim operated on the Great Apostle of the Gentiles may be seen from a comparison of Rom. xiv. 23; 1 Tim. ii. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 15. What distinguishes him most are the benign statutes which he promulgated to protect the helpless, to ameliorate the condition of the oppressed, and to impart relief to all needy irrespective of creed or nationality, thus seeking to exalt the Mosaic law by setting forth the humane lessons which it teaches, as will be seen from the following extracts.

I. The Mosaic laws about the sabbath, which enjoin that “no man must go out of his place on the seventh day,” and “that no manner of work shall be done in it” (Exod. xvi. 29, xx. 10 with Jerem. xvii. 21, 22; Neh. x. 32, xiii. 15–19), were understood to involve abstention from the use of arms on this sacred day. Hence the faithful Jewish soldiers allowed themselves to be massacred by the enemy rather than violate the sabbath (1 Maccab. i. 32, &c.; 2 Maccab. vi. 11; Josephus, Antiq. XII. vi. 2; War. II. xvi. 4). Though the law was afterwards interpreted more leniently, viz. that it was only offensive war that was forbidden and that it did not forbid defensive action (1 Maccab. xii. 34, 43, &c.; Josephus, Antiq. XIII. i. 3, XIV. vi. 2; War. II. xvi. 4), it still was held that it forbids the soldiers to return home and carry their weapons when the sabbath is at the termination of a war they are more than a sabbath day’s journey from their homes. It was Gamaliel who interpreted the law still more liberally, and enacted that all persons called out to resist hostile invasions or to render help at inunctions, or at fires, or at the falling down of houses, or at child-birth, might walk 2000 yards, that is 6 stadia 750 Roman paces, or sabbath-day’s journey, as it is called in the New Testament (Acts i. 12), in any direction (Flavius Josephus, Antiq. 23). It was this canon which gave rise to the beautiful maxim that the Sabbath is delivered into your hands, not into its hands (Yoma, 85 b), alluded to by our Saviour (Mark ii. 27).

II. The rather uncertain grounds on which the Mosaic law permits divorce (Deut. xxiv. 1–4) exposed women in the time of Christ to great injustice on the part of unprincipled husbands and gave rise to social disorders. A husband who had sent a bill of divorce to his wife by a messenger could revoke it in any court of justice, thus causing the greatest inconvenience to the woman and her children, inasmuch as she could not be sure whether she was free or not. Gamaliel ordained that the husband could only recall it in the presence of the same messenger who carried it (Gittin, 22).

III. At the time of Christ and in the apostolic age many of the Jews had duplicate names, Hebrew and Greek. The practice of only signing one name in legal documents exposed the woman to the mercy of an unprincipled husband, inasmuch as he could insist on the instrument being invalid. Gamaliel, by decreeing that the clause “and every other name which describes the person” should be added to the signature (Gittin, 34), protected the helpless woman.

IV. According to the ancient law it required two witnesses to attest the death of a person and to declare a married woman legally a widow. This caused the greatest inconvenience, inasmuch as it was not always possible to produce two witnesses. Gamaliel ordained that upon the mouth of one witness shall the thing be established (Yevamoth, 110).

V. According to a custom already alluded to in the Book of Tobit (vii. 5), every Jew had to make a settlement on his wife on day of marriage (ראביה). Usurpacious children not infrequently deprived their widowed mother of this settlement by declaring that she had compounded for it in the lifetime of their father. Gamaliel enacted that her declaration to the effect that she had not relinquished the portion due to her is to be taken as binding (Gittin, 34). It is this special legislation for the protection of widows, which throws light on his disciple’s advice on the same subject (1 Tim. v. 1–16).

VI. He ordained that the poor heathen should have the same right as the poor Jews to gather the gleanings after the harvest, that equal provision should be made for both, that the sick heathen should be attended to, that the last honours should be paid to the dead. It was non-Israelite mourners should be comforted in towns which are inhabited by both Jews and Gentiles (Gittin, 59–81, &c.; Jerusalem Gittin, v. 2). This lesson to care for the poor of all nations, without distinction of creed, which Gamaliel inculcated on his disciples, illustrates the remark of the Apostle to the Galatians, vi. 10.

VII. The authority which he, as president of the Sanhedrin, exercised over the Jewish communities out of Palestine, and which may be seen from his edicts still extant, not only shews the ecclesiastical organization at the time of Christ and the apostles, but throws light upon an incident in the life of St. Paul recorded in the New Testament. On one occasion when he was on a journey in Syria, the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem had to declare the year intercalary, but they did it subject to his approval, and when Gamaliel returned he said, “I am satisfied therewith, and will also give my assent intercalary” (Mishnah Eduth, vii. 7; Sanhedrin, ii. 6). As both the form and the language of these decrees are of the utmost importance to the student of Christian antiquities, and the history of the apostolic age, we give a translation of one of them, subjoining the original in the foot-note. To our brethren the exiles in Babylon, the exiles in Media, the exiles in Greece, and to all other exiles of Israel, peace be multiplied to you. We make known to you that the lambs of this year are still tender, the pigeons are not yet fledged, and the spring is altogether late. It hath therefore pleased me and my colleagues to lengthen the present year by thirty days.” (Comp. Jerusalem Sanhedrin, i. 2.) This document explains the fact mentioned in Acts i. 1, 2; xiii. 5, that letters from the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem authorising a certain thing were binding upon the Jewish communities far and wide, and that which was therein set forth was strictly obeyed. It moreover shows that the language of the Jews at that time, both in Palestine and elsewhere, was Aramaic.

VIII. An incident in the life of R. Gamaliel, related in different parts of the Talmud, is an important contribution to the history of the Septuagint. We are told that when he was once sitting on the Temple mount, the Greek version of Job was for the first time shown to him. He, however, so strongly disapproved of the book being popularised that he ordered the builders who were working at the temple to immure the copy in the wall (Jerusalem Sabbath, xvii. 1; Toschepta Sabbath, xiv. p. 128, ed. Zuckermandel; Babylon Sabbath, 115 a; Sopherim, v. 15). It will thus be seen that at the time of Agrippa I. the Greek translation of Job was unknown in Palestine, and that when a single copy was brought either from Egypt or Syria to R. Gamaliel, he at once had it concealed (Tosephta). R. Gamaliel had other copies, and it being in circulation at that time, the concealing of this single copy would have been useless (comp. Graetz, Montatschrift, xxvi. 83–91; Ginsburg, Commentary on Sopherim, v. 15).

IX. So great was the esteem in which he was held by the nation at large, that he was the first rabban of president of the Sanhedrinh, who was honoured with the title rabban (ר巴נן), the master, the teacher, which is the Aramaic form of the Hebrew rab (רבי), used in Babylon, and with suffix Rabbi (רבי), used in Palestine, (Toschepta Eduyoth). Rabban (ר巴נן) = PaBbαv however, is the highest title of the three forms, and is rendered still more venerable by the pronominal suffix, first person, viz. rabbanı (ר巴נן) = PaBbαv! my master, or rabbanı, as it is pronounced in Aramaic. It was the desire of blind Bartimeus and of Mary Magdalene to shew the greatest veneration for Christ, which made them call Him the most distinguished title recently bestowed upon the highest and most honoured person of the whole Jewish nation (Mark x. 51; John xx. 16). Though it is difficult adequately to render this title in English; yet it will be seen that of the two passages in which it occurs in the New Testament, the first (Mark x. 51) fails to give the force in the authorised version, whilst the second (John xx. 16) conveys a feebler idea of the original, since it makes it equivalent to Rabbi (רבי) PaBbαv, which occurs fifteen times in the New Testament (Matt. xxiii. 7, 8; xxvi. 25, 49; Mark ix. 5; x. 21; xiv. 45; John i. 33, 39; iii. 2, 26; iv. 31; vi. 25; ix. 2; xi. 8), and is translated by the same expression master eight times (Matt. xxvi. 25, 49; Mark ix. 5; x. 21; xiv. 45; John iv. 31; ix. 2; x. 8), though it is lower in degree than rabbonı.

X. His absolute faith in the ultimate victory of Divine truth, his great liberality of sentiments, and his prudence and humane conduct in the most difficult and cruel circumstances, who unceasingly strove to differ from him in matters of religion are attested by the record in the New Testament of the wise counsel which he gave about the treatment of the Apostles (Acts v. 34–40). That he composed or sanctioned the well-known prayer against Christian heretics, as is asserted by Conyof the nation, whilst some, losing all faith in the love of the God of Abraham for his people, made common cause with the Romans. These reneguades were appointed as judges and preservers in order to try the sons brethren for treason.
They became the tools in the hands of the oppressors and mainly aided by treachery the self-imposed destruction of the nobler and more heroic portion of the nation. In the midst of these disintegrating and destructive forces, R.
Gamaliel commenced his patriarchate. His faith in the promise that "the seed of Israel shall never cease as a nation," never wavered.
He rallied the remnant of believers around him at Zabne, and with never-failing zeal endeavoured to rouse in the people a consciousness of their divine mission. But the very remnant who were willing to receive from the mouth of the patriarch and his colleagues words of comfort derived from the promises declared by God's holy prophets were exposed to a far more powerful agency, which shook them to the very foundation. Infant Christianity had put forth its apostolic efforts to gain the suffering Jews for Jesus, pointing out to the weary and heavy-laden the only source of peace and rest, and won over to its ranks many of the most pious and most learned children of Abraham.
Gamaliel had, therefore, to devise means so as to guard his brethren against this threefold agency, which, though antagonistic in its nature, combined to break up the Jewish community.
To effect this the patriarch had the aid of some of the most distinguished doctors of the law, who were members of the Sanhedrin at Zabne in the days of the apostles. Of these colleagues may be mentioned R. Abba, his brother, R. Eliezer,
b. Hyrcanos, his brother-in-law [Eliacer],
R. Joha, b. Chananya, R. Zadok with his son R.
Eliezer, b. Torphon, R. Samuel the less, who is sometimes erroneously identified with the Arach, R. Akiba, R. Simon Hupekulhi, R. Akiba
b. Mahelalai, &c.
His first aim was to re-examine and harmonize all the canonical decisions and traditional expeditions of the Scriptures which had developed themselves in the different schools of Shammai and Hillel, and which had hitherto been transmitted orally. The destruction of Jerusalem, the execution by the Romans of some of the most distinguished doctors, the dispersion of others into different countries, and the conversion of others again to Christianity, threatened with bringing the loss of important traditions, and to produce diversity of opinion and practice.
He therefore had all these decisions brought before the Sanhedrin at Zabne by their different disciples. These were discussed publicly, and Gamaliel ruled that the decision of the majority must be final, and henceforth become unable the uniform practice, and that insubordination on the part of the minority is to be visited with the penalty of excommunication.
So rigorously did he carry out his rule that he excommunicated his own brother-in-law, the celebrated R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanos, refusing to yield to the majority. [Eliacer b. Hyrcanos.]
Another important point undertaken by Gamaliel II. was to determine the time and order of the daily prayer. As the Temple which was the central place of national worship, was now destroyed, and as the sacrifices ceased, he ordered that every Israelite is bound to pray three times a day, morning, afternoon and evening; the morning prayer to take the place of the morning sacrifice, the afternoon or Mincha prayer to take the place of the evening sacrifice, and the evening prayer to represent the steaming of the fat of the evening sacrifice. He appointed R. Simon Hupekulhi, one of the members of the Sanhedrin to arrange the eighteen benedictions to include a prayer for the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and asked R. Samuel the less, another member of the Sanhedrin, to adapt the old collect against heretics, entitled Birchath Ha-Mininim (ביכרת הミיניים), to the present circumstances so as to include therein the new sect of Christians which had recently sprung up in the Jewish community (Deraochote, 28 b). It will thus be seen that with the exception of the collect for the speedy restoration of the holy city, and the verbal alteration in the collect against the heretics, these eighteen benedictions are of pre-Christian form. It was then a part of the Temple and synagogue service prior to and at the advent of Christ. As there can therefore be no doubt that our Saviour and the apostles joined in these prayers when they resorted to the temple and the synagogue, we subjoin them in their re-arranged form according to the order of Gamaliel II. 1. (דבירתי) Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, the God of our fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, great, omnipotent, fearful, and most high God, who bountifully shewest mercy, who art the possessor of all things, who rememberest the pious deeds of our fathers, and sendest the redeemer to their children's children, for his mercy's sake in love. O our king, defender, saviour and shield! 2. (דבירתי) Blessed art thou, O Lord, the shield of Abraham. 3. (דבירתי) Thou art powerful, O Lord, world without end; thou bringest the dead to life in great compassion, thou holdest up the falling, healest the sick, loosest the chained, and shewest thy faithfulness to those that sleep in the dust. Who is like unto thee, Lord of might, and who resembles thee?—a saving of the falling and bringing again, and causing salvation to flourish—and thou art sure to raise the dead. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who raisest the dead! 4. (דהיון) Thou art holy, and thy name is holy, and the holy ones praise thee every day continually. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the holy God! 5. (דהיון) Thou mercifully bestowest knowledge upon men and teachest the mortal prudence. Mercifully bestow upon us, from thyself, knowledge, wisdom, and understanding.
Blessed art thou, O Lord, who mercifully bestowest knowledge! 6. (דהיון) Our Father, lead us back to thy law; bring us very near,
O our king, to thy service, and cause us to return in sincere penitence into thy presence!
Blessed art thou, O Lord, who delightest in repentance! 7. (דהיון) Our father, forgive us, for we have sinned; our King, pardon us, for we have transgressed; for thou art forgiving and pardoning. Blessed art thou, O Lord, merciful and plenteous in forgiveness! 8. (דהיון) magnificent deliverer. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the deliverer of Israel! 8. (םהינפ). Heal us, O Lord, and we shall be healed, save us and we shall be saved, for thou art our boast; grant us a perfect cure for all our wounds, for thou O Lord, O Lord, our king, art a faithful and merciful physician: Blessed art thou, O Lord, who healest the sick of thy people Israel! 9. (דוד). Bless to us, O Lord our God, for this year and all its kinds of produce; send thy blessing upon the face of the earth, satisfy us with thy goodness, and bless this year as the years gone by. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who blessest the seasons! 10. (udad).

Cause the great trumpet to proclaim our liberty, raise the standard for the gathering of our captives, and bring us together from the four corners of the earth. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who gathrest together the dispersed of Israel! 11. (דרש). Reinvest our judges as of old, and our councillors as of yore, remove from us sorrow and sighing and do thou alone, O Lord, reign over us in mercy and love, and judge us in righteousness and justice. Blessed art thou, O Lord the King, who loveth righteousness and justice! 12. (לע). Let the apostates have no hope, and let those who perish wickedness speedily perish; let them all be suddenly cut off, let the proud speedily be uprooted, broken, crushed, and humbled speedily in our days. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who breakest down the enemy and humblest the proud! 13. (עק). On the righteous, on the pious, on the elders of thy people, the house of Israel, on the remnant of the scribes, on the pious proselytes, and on us bestow, O Lord our God, thy mercy; give ample reward to all who trust in thy name in sincerity, make our portion with them for ever, and let us not be ashamed, for we trust in thee! Blessed art thou, O Lord, the support and refuge of the righteous! 14 a. (לע). To Jerusalem, thy city, in mercy return, and dwell in it according to thy promise; make it speedily in our day an everlasting building, and soon establish therein the throne of David. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hearest the prayers of thy people Israel in mercy! Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hearest prayer! 14 b. (לע). The branch of David thy servant speedily cause to flourish, and exalt his horn with thy help, for we look to thy help all day. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who causeth to flourish the horn of David! 15. (לע). Hear our voice, O Lord our God, have pity and compassion on us, and receive with mercy and acceptance our prayers, for thou art a God hearing prayer and supplications. Our king do not send us empty away from thy presence, for thou hearest the prayers of thy people Israel in mercy! Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hearest the prayers of thy people Israel in mercy! Blessed art thou, O Lord, who restor eth thy Shechinah to Zion in love. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who restor eth thy Shechinah to Zion! 17. (לע). We thankfully confess before thee that thou art the Lord our God, and the God of our fathers, world without end, and that thou art the shepherd of our life and the rock of our salvation from generation to generation; we render thanks unto thee and celebrate thy praises. Blessed art thou, O Lord, whose name is goodness and whom it becomes to praise! 18. (לע). Bestow peace, happiness, blessing, grace, mercy, and compassion upon us and upon the whole of Israel thy people. Our father, bless us all unitedly with the light of thy countenance, for in the light of thy countenance didst thou give to us, O Lord our God, the law of life, loving kindness, justice, blessing, compassion, life, and peace. May it please thee to bless thy people Israel at all times and in every moment with peace. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who blessest thy people Israel with peace!

As scruples were entertained whether the ancient number of eighteen should be increased, the new prayer for the restoration of peace (14a) ordered by R. Gamaliel was combined with the old prayer for the kingdom of David (14b). This, however, gave rise to another question whether it was right to merge the two benedictions. Hence they were separated, and the present number of nineteen, which is justified by an appeal to Ps. xxi., where the number nineteen occurs nineteen times (Bereishoth, 28 b). The dates of Benedictions 1–3 and 16–18 are lost in remote antiquity; Benedictions 4–13, 14 b, 15, 16, were compiled during the Maccabean struggles and the Roman ascendency in Palestine, whilst 14 a was the new addition. Three of these benedictions were pronounced by the priests on the people every morning in the hall of the square in the Temple court; the high priest recited Benedictions 16 and 17 in the Temple on the great day of Atonement (Yoma, 68 b), whilst the four-and-twenty representatives of the people recited all of them in the Temple every day (Sabbath, 24 b). Hence the great importance which Gamaliel attached to the making of these benedictions, which constituted an essential part of the sacerdotal Temple service, the central point of the daily prayer. For the same reason he fixed the service for the Passover eve in the place of the Paschal sacrifice, and himself composed several phrases on it. On the 17th of Nisan, on that evening (Bereishoth, 37; Tosaphoth Bereishoth, iv.). He exerted himself to the utmost to do away with pernicious customs which weighed heavily upon the people, but which they had not the courage to discard. Thus it was an ancient custom among the Jews to bury their dead with great pomp. The heavy expense which this entailed upon families with small means often crippled their resources for life. Fear of this heavy burden not unfrequently led many to leave their dead unburied. Gamaliel forbade this extravagance, and ordered his family to bury him in simple white linen (Mod Nedarim, 27; Ketuboth, 8 a; Tosaphoth Nedarim, iv.), and this mode of burial is followed by the Jews to this day. He also sacrificed the length and breadth of Syria to become personally acquainted with the condition of the people in the different towns and villages. He investigated their institutions, visited their synagogues and schools, delivering public addresses, giving decisions, and organizing places for education. It was on these journeys that he came in frequent contact with the apostolic fathers and the early Christians. Like many other indefatigable spiritual heads, he could brook no contradiction. Difference of opinion on the part of his decisions, and arbitrarily excluded the public from attending the discussions at the Sanhedrin, though it was contrary to ancient custom to carry on the debates with closed doors. This fomented secret discontent with his conduct, which so manifestly assisted itself openly, and led to his temporary deposition from the patriarchate. The immediate occasion of the open rupture between him and the Sanhedrin was as follows. A disciple came before R. Joshua, the vice-president (גְּנֵרְבָּן) with the question, "Whether the recital of evening prayer was a duty or a voluntary act?" to which he replied that it is voluntary. It so happened that with his concurrence and to respect the decisions of his opponents. He now endeavoured to seek reconciliation with those whom he had offended. To this end he visited R. Joshua, whom he had mostly sinned against. When he entered R. Joshua's house, he found to his utter amazement that this distinguished and greatly beloved doctor of the law was engaged in his accustomed needlework. "Have you to get your livelihood in this way?" exclaimed the wealthy ex-president. This gave R. Joshua the desired opportunity for expostulating with him about his indifference to the manner in which some of the members of the Sanhedrin had got a living. "It is bad, indeed, that you have only now got to know this. Woo to the age whose guide you are, you know not the cares of the sages and what trouble they have to earn a subsistence" (B. H. 29) Ḥ. Gamaliel meekly listened to the merited reproof, and then sincerely asked R. Joshua's pardon. He not only willingly but eagerly endeavoured to have him reinstated as patriarch. About this there was no difficulty, for as soon as R. Eleazar heard that a reconciliation had taken place between them he, accompanied by the members of the Sanhedrin, went to R. Gamaliel's house the following morning to pay him the homage due to the president. R. Eleazar's voluntary resignation, however, was not accepted; it was so arranged that they should both have the dignity, R. Gamaliel alternately presiding over the Sanhedrin a fortnight, and R. Eleazar a week. The lesson which Gamaliel thus learned he never forgot. Henceforth he was most affable and forbearing. He cultivated friendship with all classes of people, with the learned of all nations, with Christians and the different religious orders which sprang up at the end of the 1st and the beginning of the 2nd century of the Christian era. Of his intercourse with heathen philosophers we have an interesting account in the following anecdote, which shows how much the Gentiles of that period read the Septuagint, and with what weapons they attacked its contents. A Gentle sage remarked to him, "Your law says, 'God is a jealous God.' Why, then, does he manifest his jealousy against idolaters and not against the idols?" To this
GAMALIEL

R. Gamaliel replied in a parable. "A king hath a son that delighteth to call his dog by the name of his own royal father. Now with whom will the king be angry, with the dog or with his son?" Then saith the heathen philosopher, "Why doth not God destroy these idols if they are such worthless things?" Saith R. Gamaliel, "If the heathen only worshipped useless things God might do it, but they worship the sun, the moon, the water, &c., and shall God destroy the world because of fools?" (Aboda Zara, 54 a-55 a). Of his intercourse with Christians we may adduce the following account. A Christian believing that "life and immortality are brought to light in the Gospel" (2 Tim. i. 10), extolled the doctrines of the New Testament by asking R. Gamaliel, "How do you know (without the New Testament) that the dead will rise again?" To this Gamaliel replied, "From the words, 'the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers to give them' (Deut. xi. 21), but as the fathers were dead it havepassed a resurrection when alone the land could be given to these fathers" (Sanhedrin, 90 b). This shews the force of the interpretation given by Christ of Matt. xxii. 32, and the inference he deduced therefrom. This liberal intercourse made him one of the most popular presidents of the Sanhedrin. R. Gamaliel was in years, full of honours, and beloved by all, Gamaliel died about A.D. 117. At his funeral Onkelos, the celebrated translator of the Pentateuch into Chaldee, who was one of his disciples, paid him royal honours by burning costly garments and furniture to the value of seventy Tyrian minas = 21,4, declaring that "R. Gamaliel spake words more than a hundred kings from whom the world hath nothing" (Twofold Sabbath, viii. p. 119, ed. Zuckermandel; Aboda Zara, 11 a). R. Eleazar, his co-president, and R. Joshua, his former antagonist, ordered general mourning, to which the whole nation readily responded. R. Gamaliel left two sons, named Simon and Abbà, and a daughter he married to his brother, R. Aboa. At the marriage he gave her the significant paternal blessing, which strikingly illustrates the patriarch's character, "May you never be compelled to seek your parental root again" (Yebamoth, 15 a). His son Simon succeeded him in the presidency under the title of Simon the Ill. (comp. Sappapar, Kerem Cleqem).

GAMALIEL (3), patriarch of the Jews in the reign of Theodosius II, from whom he received the title of honorary prefect. He seems to have abused his power by arbitrary and illegal conduct, and we have extant a law of Theodosius of the year 415, by which he is deposed. (Cod. Theod. vi. 22.) Three of the charges against him are that he had ventured to act as judge in cases where Christians were concerned, that he had tried to force circumcision upon Christians, and that he had kept Christian slaves. It is probable that this is the same Gamaliel whom St. Jerome mentions (Ep. L7, § 3) as an enemy of the consular Hesychius. He appears to have been the last of the Jewish patriarchs, since in 429 the office is represented as extinct (Cod. Theod. vi. 29), and it is reasonable to connect this with the fact of his flagrant abuse of power.

GAMALINUS, bishop of Perrha, in the province of Comagune, during the reign of the emperor Anastasius, whilst Severus was patriarch of Antioch, whose heretical opinions Gamalinus adopted, c. A.D. 512. Assemani (Bibl. Orient. i. 409 n.) narrates from Syriac authorities his uniting with Paul bishop of Edea in the expulsion of certain pseudo-monks who pretended to partake neither of bread nor wine, nor water, yet made frequent use of the consecrated elements. (Le Quien, O. C. ii. 944.) [L. D.]

GAMELBERTUS (GAMELBERTUS, GAMELBERTUS, AMELBERTUS, AMELBERRTUS), parish priest in the village of Feagum or Michelbsuch in Lower Bavaria. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 27 Jan. ii. 783 sq.) represent him as flourishing at the time of Charlemagne's final repression of Tassilo duke of Bavaria, a.d. 788. According to an anonymous Vita which they give, he was born one of noble parents at Michelbsuch, at the command of the Isar and the Danube. He preferred study and retirement, to which, after promotion to the priesthood and a visit to Rome, he devoted himself. He was a man of only moderate learning, but devoted to his pastoral duties. Forsaking the family mansion, he built himself a cell adjoining the parish church, where he might practise his nightly devotions without restraint. In the Lenten fast he secluded himself absolutely, allowing no one to visit him, and never going out except to celebrate mass, which he did daily, concealed however from the laity by a veil suspended before the sanctuary, while a deacon delivered the sacrament to the communicants. During the same season he heard confessions and gave absolution through a window in his cell, but was never seen. [J. G.]

GANDERICUS (CANDERECUS, GAUDERICUS, GAUDERICUS), thirty-fifth bishop of Lyons, succeeding Theodoricus, or Tetricus, and presiding over the church, under the rule of Vitalianus (comp. Mappart, Kerem Cleqem).

GANDO, 15th bishop of Strasbourg, between Aldus and Uto I., according to Gall. Chr. i. 780. Winpheling (Cat. Episc. Argent. p. 16) places him 19th between Gundoaldus and Uto I., and finds him described as a man "clari ingenii." From his position in the list he may have lived early in the 7th century. [C. H.]

GANGULPHUS, martyr. [GANGULPHUS]

GANRICUS of Treves. [GANRICUS (2)]

GANGULPHUS. After Bosco, who was bishop of Constance about A.D. 942, the history of the see of Constance is lost in obscurity till the time of Audoinus, who lived about A.D. 736. A catalogue of the 14th century gives as the bishops of Constance during this interval, Oph-tanus, Picturinus, Severus, Joannes, and Buffo, or Boso. This list is adopted in Gallia Christiana, v. 894, and by Mansius (in Pistorius, Rerum Germanicarum Scriptores, iii. 702). Another list, however, in Mangel's Chronicle, written in A.D. 1548, fills up the interval with Gargulis, Fidelis, and Theobaldus. This is followed by Dami, Series Ep. 271, who spells the name Gargulphus, and von Müller, Helvetia Sacra, ii. 8. Gelpke (Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz, ii. 282) prefers the former list.

GARALT, abbat. [GERALDUS.]

GARBAN (GARBAN, GARDAN, GERVAN), (1) In the Life of St. Barry Garban son of Finabarr is named among his pupils at Lough Ine. Colgan (Acta SS. 750, 751) places his feast on March 26, and thus identifies him with Garban abbat of Achadhu. Harris and Archdall follow Colgan and attach Garban to Dun gargavan, on Dunargavan Bay, as its founder, though Lanigan seems to have made the mark in copying a title. The "fort of Garvan" in all likelihood "swears its name not to a monk but to a chief slain." He flourished in the middle of the 7th century, if he was a pupil of St. Barry. [BARRY.] (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 318, 319; Mart. Donagh. by Todd and Reeves, 87.)

(3) Garban, priest of Kinsale, a parish near Sweers, co. Dublin, commemorated on July 9. His father was Langath, and his mother Cainer, who was mother also of St. Mocha or Cronan (Aug. 9) of Clondalkin, and other saints. He was a disciple of St. Coemgen (June 3) of Glen-dalch, and seems to have had considerable influence with that holy man. (Mart. Donagh. by Todd and Reeves, 191, 213; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 44, 45; Forbes, Kat. Scotti. Sainct, 15.)

(4) Garvanus, son of Aengus, was one of the bishops of Tuath, of which he is said to have been present at a council called in Ireland in the time of St. Forannus and St. Columba for meeting the public necessities and allaying quarrels. He was a descendant of Coall Crimthain, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, and, if a contemporary of these holy men, he flourished about the middle of the 6th century. (Colgan, Acta SS. 396, c. 5, and Tr. Thom. 463, c. 55.)

GAR, son of Cewydd ab Caw, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, said to have had a church in Glamorganshire dedicated to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 263.)

[3. G.]

GARDINGUS, bishop of Tuy, one of the Arian bishops who embraced Catholicism at the famous third council of Toledo, A.D. 589. The signature of the Catholic bishop of Tuy, Nephila, appears in the same council. Gardingus was probably made bishop of Tuy by Leovigild, to the exclusion of the Catholic bishop, after the final annexation of the kingdom of the Suevi, A.D. 585. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 298; Esp. Esp. xxii. 30.) [ANILA.] [M. A. W.]

GARIGLISI (1), Numidian bishop, addressed Cyp. 70. (Ep. Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. de Bap. Haur. 1.) [Compare with the name "Gargilisus."

[2. W. B.]

GARIABUS (GARIALBUS), about twenty-second bishop of Angers, between Godoberus and Boso, perhaps about the middle of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. iv. 551.)

[3. A. B.]

GARIALBUS (1), son of Grimosde king of the Lombards, by the sister of king Goderbet, whom he had ejected. Garibalde, while a boy, was left at his father's death, A.D. 672, as king of the Lombards, but in three months he was turned out by Perthai, brother, and formerly joint ruler with Goderbet. (Paulus Diaconus, v. 38, and Catalogus Archon Langob., in Monumenta German. Historiarum, pp. 155, 508.)

[4. A. H. D. A.]

GARIALBUS (2) (GAREBALDUS), twenty-second bishop of Touli, succeeding Dofo and followed by Godo, is said to have been the son of Wulfoaldus, a count. In 708 he was witness to a charter of Pippin and Piecrutius in favour of the monastery of Epternach, in the diocese of Treves (Migne, Pat. Lat. ixxxii. 540). In 709 he subscribed a charter of his father, for the foundation of the monastery of St. Michael, near Verdun (Migne, Pat. Lat. Ixxxivii. 1258). He added many new possessions to his church, and is said to have died about A.D. 735 (Gall. Christ. xii. 905.)

[5. S. A. B.]

GARIALBUS (3), GARIOBALDUS, GARIOYALBUS (GARIBALDUS, GARIADANUS, GATHIALDUS, GAIHALT, GAUHALDUS, GHEHALDUS), bishop of Ratisbon, St. Boniface, on his return from his third journey to Rome, A.D. 739, was invited by Odilo duke of Bavaria to visit that country. There he made many converts, and finding that Vivlio, who had been consecrated by the pope, was the only bishop in Bavaria, he, with the duke's approval, divided Bavaria into four sees, Salzburg, Frising, Ratibud, and Passau. The last was assigned to Vivlio, and to the others St. Boniface appointed Joannes, Erembercht, and Garivaldus. The authority for this account is a letter of pope Gregory III. to St. Boniface, dated Oct. 29, in the twenty-third year of the emperor Leo (A.D. 740), in Migne, Pat. Lat. Ixxix. 584, in which he approves of St. Boniface's arrangements, mentioning that the latter had informed him "dum episcopos non habebant in provincia, nisi unum nomine Vivilio." Pagi, however, in his notes on Baronius, xii. 739 IL, 756 VIII., on the authority of certain verses of an anonymous writer, who lived in the next century, argues that one Wicpertus was bishop of Ratibod, and that till his death in A.D. 756 Garibaldus was only his coadjutor. However, the authority of the above quoted passage seems preferable. There was also a Wicpertus, bishop of Augsburg, whose life is given in the Boll. Acta SS. Aprili. li. 547, who GARIPALD, duke of Turin, sent by Godbert (Joint king of the Lombards with his brother, losing, in 661) to obtain help against his brother from Grimoald duke of Benevento. Garipald intrigued with Grimoald, who killed Godbert with his own hand. The story is so told as to throw all the blame of treachery on Garipald. (Paulus Diacon. iv. 51; Pauchet, Forschungen z. d. G. ii. 458.) Garipald was shortly afterwards murdered by a hand of the house of Godbert.

[ A. H. D. A.]

GARISIGIUS (CHARRISIGIUS, CARRISIGIUS), twenty-eighth bishop of Tours, succeeding Latuinus, and followed by Chrotermus (i. c. a.D. 650). The catalogue assigns two years for the duration of his episcopate. (Gall. Christ. iv. 28.)

[S. A. B.]

GARIVALDUS (GAROFAELUS), twenty-eighth bishop of Clermont in the latter half of the 7th century, succeeding Felix. According to one of the lives of St. Fauguecutes (Prix), upon the death of Felix the greater part of the clergy or people desired to have St. Prix for their bishop, but Garivaldus, who was archdeacon of the city, usurped the see. He survived his intrusion only forty days, and was succeeded by St. Prix (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 634; Gall. Christ. ii. 245).

GARTNAI DH, GARNAIT, GARTNAICH, GARTNAITH, GARTNART, GARTNAY (GARTNAICH), son of Domelich or Domnach, succeeded Brude, the friend of St. Columba, on the Pictish throne, in the year 584, and seems to have belonged to the southern Picts in Scotland, as his residence was not at Inverness but at Abernethy on the Tay, where he built a monastic church dedicated to St. Bridget, and thus aided in the revival of the Christianity founded among the southern Picts by St. Ninian. According to Tigernach he died a.D. 599. (Skene, Celt. Scotl. i. 233, 235, ii. 136, 137; Robertson, Scot. under her Early Kings, i. 185, App. ii, Reeves, St. Adamnan, 372. For this king and the many forms of his name, see Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 462, "Gartnart."

[J. G.]

GARUAN, G. RIAN. [GARSHAN.] GATIANUS, said by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 25 and 522) to have been sent by the see of Rome in the first year of Decius to Gaul, where he became first bishop of Tours. Persecution arising he hid himself in the caves of a few Cistercian monks, and celebrated in secret the "mysterium solemnissimis diei dominici." His death is placed in the Roman Martyrology at Dec. 20, 301. (Gall. Chr. xvi. 4.)

[R. T. S.]

GATIANUS, martyr. [GATIANUS (G.)] GATSA KELEK, the name of a monster. Half a man and half a dog, who is said to have assisted SS. Andrew and Bartholomew in their preaching the gospel in Parthia. [ARENAS. The Conflicts of the Holy Apostles, p. 51, translated from the Ethiopic by S. C. Malan.]

[G. T. S.]

GAUBALDUS of Ratisbon. [GAURALDI]

GAUCHIOBERTUS, bishop. [GAUCHIOBERTUS]

GAUDELENUS (GAUDOLANUS), bishop of Lerida, a.d. 653. The deacon Sauturinus represents him at the eighth Council of Toledo (653). (Mansi, x. 1293; Aguirre-Catalan, iii. 448; Ep. Sagra. xlii. 107.)

[M. A. W.]

GAUDENCIUS, bishop of Astigi. All our information about him is derived from a letter addressed by the bishops who attended the first council of Seville, a.d. 590, to his successor Pegasius. This letter was in reply to one the latter had sent them by his deacon, containing a list of the slaves belonging to the church of Astigi, of whom some had been manumitted by his predecessor Gaudenci-us, and others given by him to his relations. The letter of the bishop states that they had consulted the canons to see if such a manumission or gift was valid, and had found that if a bishop had given his private property to anyone but the church (his sons and descendants only excepted), the gift was void. (Compare canons 7 and 33 of the Council of Agatho, in Mansi, viii. 325-330.) Therefore, if the church of Astigi was not in possession of the property of Gaudencilus, the slaves he had manumitted were not legally free. However, if his property was sufficient to manumit the church for the value of the slaves, they were to remain free. If, on the contrary, he had not made compensation to the church, the bishops, being more inclined to humanity than severity, decided that those who had been so manumitted should remain free in other respects, but should be so far subject to the rights of the church that they could not leave their property to any but their sons, who in turn were to be subject to the like condition, and if any of the class died without leaving issue qualified to succeed him, the church was to become entitled to his property. As to the other slaves, whom the said bishop had transferred to his relations, they were to be restored to the church, unless he had paid the full price out of his own means. Though the address of this letter does not mention the see of Pegasisus, we know that it was Astigio, as in the second part of the letter the words occur, “Hanc formam non solum vestra, hoc est Asti- gitana, servavit ecclesia.” Servandus too, as descom of Pegasisus, bishop of Astigio, subscribes the acts of the third council of Toledo, A.D. 589. (Esp. Sur. x. 85; Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 693; Gans, Kirchengeschichte, ii. part ii. 19.)

GAUDENTIUS—Aug. 30. A virgin martyr at Rome with three others. (Mart. Hieron., Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

GAUDENTIANUS, bishop of Volterra, probably in the time of Cunibert, 688-700. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Italia, xviii. 215.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (1), bishop of Pisa, one of the judicial committee appointed to examine the case of Caecilianus at Rome, A.D. 313. (Opt. i. 23; Ugelli, Ital. Sac. iii. 351.) [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS (2), bishop of Niassus (Nissa) in Moesia Superior, deposed by the Arians. He was present at the council of Sardica in A.D. 347. (Mansi, iii. 39, 42; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 514.) [J. de S.]

GAUDENTIUS (3), bishop of Turris Tam- allaiaea, or Trettamalia, a town of Byzacena, between Tescapae and Leptis Magna (Telemin), Ant. R. 74, 3. Another reading gives Tydinae as the place of his see. He was present at the council of Carthage concerning Donatism, A.D. 348 or 349. (Morocelli, Africa Christ. i. 339, Bruna, Concil. i. 111.) [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS (4), bishop of Armenia (Rimini), c. A.D. 346-360. When the Arians, under the patronage of Constantius, held a council at Rimini, A.D. 359, Gaudentius appears to have retired from his diocese for a time, but to have speedily returned, and opposed the Arians so vigorously, declaring the decrees of the council null, that his enemies in their anger stoned and best him to death. (Acta SS. Oct. 14; Ugelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 410; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Italia. ii. 372.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (5), ninth bishop of Arretium (Arezzo). He succeeded Eusebius c. A.D. 381. He was put to death as a martyr in the following year by the prefect Marcellinus, a bitter persecutor of Christianity, and was succeeded by Decius. Ugelli accounts for the martyrdom taking place under a Christian emperor by the circumstance that Valentinian at the commencement of his reign appointed pagan prefects. (Rom. Mart. Jun. 19; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iii. 848; Ugelli, Ital. Sac. i. 456; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Italia. xviii. 69.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (6), the name of three Numidian Donatist bishops, viz. of Nigzirbuz or Nibizirbuz, Zerta, and Tigiss; the first two present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411, the third prevented by illness. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 167, 202, 209.) [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS (7), Donatist bishop of Tamugada, Tamogada, or Tamugadi, a town of Numidia, about fourteen Roman miles north-east of Lambessa (Tennagadi) (Ant. R. 34, 2), one of the seven managers on the Donatist side in Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, but appearing to have taken no very active part in the proceedings. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 288, 408, ed. Oberthür.)

The principal occasion on which his name has become notorious is his controversy with St. Augustine, A.D. c. 420. When Dulcius [Dul- cius] had sent him a letter of a pacific nature respecting the course to be pursued by the imperial government towards the Donatists, Gaudentius replied in two successive letters, one shorter, the other more at length. These letters Dulcius placed in the hands of Augustine, who replied to them in the two books entitled contra Gaudentium (Aug. Opp. vol. ix. 707-751, ed. Migne), and which may be regarded virtually as representing the closing struggle of the Donatist controversy (Vol. i. p. 895).

In the first book Augustine criticizes the complimentary form of address used by Gaudentius towards Dulcius, as inconsistent with the severe principles of his sect, and defends the language of Dulcius, but disclaims any responsibility on the part of the church for language used by a layman and a soldier. Gaudentius had said that he studiously discouraged any hindrance being offered to those who wished to quit the Donatist communion and return to the church, for, says he, “we who have learned that no one ought to be forced into religious belief, cannot retain against their will those who wish to leave us.” To this Augustine replies that if Gaudentius thinks it right to promote return, he should do so openly, but if wrougthing, it is dishonourable and cruel in him and his party to sanction it.

The second letter of Gaudentius is longer, and so also, consequently, the reply of Augustine to it. Its arguments may be exhibited briefly, though not in their precise order, as follows:—

I. Holy Scripture forbids equally the punishment to be inflicted, or the guilty to be spared (Ex. xxiii. 7). Gabinus [Gabinus], and those turncoats who have renounced Donatism, ought either before their departure not to have been treated as guilty persons, or after it not to be received by the Catholics as innocent.

II. God gave man free will, but persecution abolishes this; how can then the conduct of the persecutor be thought to agree with the will of God?

III. The church is founded, not on the laws of sovereigns, but on the preaching of prophets.

IV. Scripture in general, our Lord and His apostles, foretell persecution as the lot of the righteous; therefore righteousness is on the side not of the persecutors, but of the persecuted. (Matt. v. 11, 12; John xv. 2, 3; 2 Tim. iii. 12; Rev. vi. 9, 11; Wisdom v. 1-6.)

V. The good shepherd dies for his flock, and ought, therefore, not to avoid persecution, but to perish at his post. On this ground to follow the example of Nazis in committing suicide, who is praised in his deed by Scripture, is justifiable and praiseworthy. (2 Macc. xiv. 27-46.)

VI. The case of Emeritus, who was falsely reported to have become a Catholic, was grossly misrepresented. [Emeritus.]

To these arguments St. Augustine replies:

I. The imperial government does not wish to kill, but to correct, and only in extreme cases to banish those who hinder others from exercising... their free choice in returning to the church. In matters of cruelty the Donatists go beyond the government, for they threaten to commit suicide, while Dulcitius and the government wish to save them from their own violence. In this respect they are really wishing to suffer not for Christ’s sake but for their own, and thus they are not martyrs, but only deceitful heretics. The example of Raisis is related only, not commended by the author of the Book of Maccabeus, and after all, the authority of this book is not to be placed on a level with that of the other books of Scripture. Moreover, even our Lord commanded His apostles to take flight during persecution, as St. Paul in fact did when he was in danger at Damascus (Matt. x. 23; Acts ix. 23, 25). If our Lord’s promise concerning the limits of flight in such cases (Matt. x. 23) cannot fail, but the Donatists exclude themselves from its operation, how can they be truly said to belong to Christ? It is not all who suffer, but those who suffer “for the sake of righteousness.”

But, in truth, what right have the Donatists to complain of persecution (a) whose forefathers persecuted Caucasians with the utmost bitterness; (b) whose partisans, especially the Circumcellionists, have used all manner of violence towards Catholics; (c) whose preachers had no scruple in enjoying immunity during the time of Julian, while the Catholics were suffering persecution, a contrast which destroys the assumption on the part of the Donatists of persecution as a mark of exclusive goodness; (d) again, what becomes of their consistency when the story is told of Scardus, bishop of Tigicis, who fled to avoid the violence of Purpurius at theDonatist council of Cirta, A.D. 305, and who must himself have been guilty of “tradition,” for otherwise how could he have escaped in the persecution under Diocletian? (e) Lastly, let Gaudentius remember the flagrant instances of violent conduct on the part of his own predecessors. Is this the Church? (f) But it is almost equivalent to persecution to behold, as Catholics and well-disposed persons are obliged to do, the perversity and obstinacy of men who are bent on destroying both themselves and others.

IV. As to compulsion, (a) our Lord in His Parable of the sower (Matt. xiii. 12) desired His servants to “compel” men to enter His kingdom. (b) It was by state authority that the people of Nineveh were brought to repentance.

V. As to state interference, (a) kings have been guardians of the church, and God gives in charge to them to correct disobedience. (b) If error is not to be corrected, how can human punishment be justified? The primeval law of punishment was one of death, but in truth the emperor wishes to spare life.

VI. What can be more inconsistent than the conduct of the Donatists towards the Maximianist Felicianus, whom they first denounced and persecuted, and afterwards received without impugning, sanctifying all his acts done during secession?

VII. The case of Emeritus was no doubt misrepresented, but the Donatist cause gains no advantage from the true statement of it. When he appeared, as he did of his own accord, he neither offered argument on behalf of himself and his party, nor replied to any urged against them by Augustine, but simply remained silent. He can thus claim no credit for being a faithful confessor assailed by persecution.

VIII. Gaudentius regards Gabinius, and those who have returned to the church, as idolaters, for they have, he says, adopted its worship under compulsion. Is the church of God a mere human creation, or have not these people acted as they have done deliberately, because they have recognised its divine mission, and like sensible men have become weary of a system destitute of divine foundation?

IX. Gaudentius takes credit for not hindering such persons from returning, but on his own principles, is he not sanctioning idolatry by doing so?

Finally, Augustine invites Gaudentius to a friendly conference on the disputed points.

The second Book, c. Gaudenius, is a reply by Augustine to another letter, in which Gaudenius quotes the authority of St. Cyprian to show the inadmissibility of the new sect. Augustine replies that his authority does not shelter them, why did they leave the church? Because they could not endure the presence of “tares” among the “wheat.” But in order to set themselves on the right ground in this point, it is necessary for them to apply the meaning of the parable as the world outside of the church, in which alone they said that “tares” were to be found. Further, that the “bad fish” of another parable were in their view supposed to be unknown to the fisherman, and therefore not to be included in the church. On this principle, says Augustine, many of the parishioners of sins committed by persons unknown to them. Does Gaudentius remember the mistake made by Emeritus at the conference, when he denied the reading of Matt. iii. 12, “floor,” “stream,” i.e. that by the “floor” was meant the church, but, being corrected by his colleagues, maintained that by “shovel” was meant offenders who could not injure the good (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 564, ed. Oberth.). But this opinion does not agree with that of Gaudentius, who holds that the good are injured by the neighbourhood of the evil. If this last opinion be the true one, what hope can there be for the Donatists themselves, who separated themselves from known evils, but who must have perished through existence of unknown? But, in truth, the doctrine of Cyprian is against both Emeritus and Gaudentius. He taught that Christians ought not to withdraw from the church on account of the existence in it of “tares.” But, say the Donatists, “tares” are only to be found in the world, not in the church. The contrary says that tares and wheat are to grow together till the harvest, and that He will not come till the gospel has been preached to all nations. There must, therefore, be many nations among whom no wheat has been sown, and from whom therefore it cannot have perished. As to baptism, the Donatists blame the Catholics for not recognizing heretics, but on their principles how could Felicianus baptise duly, who was condemned by the council of Bagaria, even more severely than Caucasians had been at an earlier period, yet he was permitted to return to the Donatist community without question. But besides this, when Cyprian wished to re-baptize heretics, Stephen, bishop of Rome, refused to do GAUDENTIUS, the bearer, together with Quadrulteus, of a letter from Severus to St. Augustine. (Aug. Ep. 110.) [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS, a Roman to whom St. Jerome wrote in the year 413 on the education of his daughter Pacatula. The child had been born at the time of the sack of Rome by Alaric (410), and the father had consecrated her to the state of virginity. He wrote to Jerome, then at Bethlehem, begging him to write a letter of precepts of piety and asceticism for his child. Jerome replied in a letter to the father, which he hoped Pacatula might read in after years. The letter shows how piety and asceticism were in those days impressed on the minds of the young, and also proves how the miseries consequent on the inroads of the barbarians made Christians abandon the world. (Jerome, Ep. 128, ed. Vall.) [W. H. F.]

GAUDENTIUS appears among the Eustychians, who, claiming to be archimandrites, appealed to the emperor Marcian, in A.D. 451, for a general council (Labbe, iv. 524). The orthodox archimandrites at the council of Chalcidon refused to recognise his claim to be an archimandrite, and described him as a pseudo-priest (cf. Epistulae) with five others under him (Labbe, iv. 523 a.). [C. G.]

GAUDENTIUS, bishop of Antium, present at the council held at Rome by Hilarius, A.D. 465. (Mansi, vii. 907; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 684.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS, bishop of Albenga (Albenga), present at the council at Rome under Hilarius, A.D. 465. (Mansi, vii. 905; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 592.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS, supposed to be the first bishop of Scylacium (Scullvare). He was present at the council at Rome under Hilarius, 465. (Mansi, vii. 906; Ugolli, Ital. Socr. iv. 488; Fenelius, Antiquitates Scylacenses, Scyl. 14.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS, bishop of Verona, probably c. 465, in which year he is said to have been present at the council at Rome, but his date is uncertain. (Acta SS. 12 Feb. i. 602; Ugolli, Ital. Socr. v. 576; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia. x. 747; Biancolini, Vescovi di Verona, pt. ii. p. 2; Mansi, viii. 908.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS, bishop of Auffinium in the Abruzzi, complained of to Simplicius bishop of Rome, A.D. 475, by some of the neighbouring bishops, as having conferred orders improperly, and misappropriated the property of his church. He was consequently deprived of the power of ordaining, condemned to make good his wrong doings, and allowed for the future but a very slight control over the revenues of his diocese. (Jaffe, Reysta Pont. Romana. p. 49; Ceillier, Autecrae sacr. x. 402.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS, bishop of Putea in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 58; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 200.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS, the name of two bishops, viz. of Salerno and of Tadinum (Gua-Tadino in Umbria), present at the first synod under pope Symmachus, March 499. (Hefele, § 209; Mansi, viii. 253.) [A. H. D. A.]
GAUDENTIUS

GAUDENTIUS (19), bishop of Nola, who received letters from Gregory the Great, providing for and giving directions about the church at Canus (Lib. v. ind. xii. Ep. 13 and 33 in Migne, lxxxvii. 731, 759.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (20), 9th bishop of Constans, succeeding Martin, and followed, after an interval of three years, by Joannes I. His death is mentioned in the life of St. Gall of Walafrid (cap. xiv. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 990). It took place probably in 616 or the following year. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, cap. xvi. s. ii. n.: Gall. Chr. v. 893.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDENTIUS (21), bishop of Atina (Atino), said to have been appointed by Honorius of Rome subsequently to A.D. 625, and to have held his see for fifteen years. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vi. 540.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (22), bishop of Tergeste (Trieste), signing the second epistle of pope Agatho which was sent in 680 to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 311.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (23), bishop of Valeria from a little before 675 till after 693, during, that is to say, part of Wamba's reign, the whole of Ervig's and the greater part of Egica's. He appears as junior bishop at C. Tol. xi. (675) and subscribes the acts of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth councils (A.D. 684, 688, and 693), being represented at the thirteenth by his vicar Vincent. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 247, 287, 304, 313, 333; Exp. Sopr. viii. 205.) [M. A. W.]

GAUDENTIUS (25), bishop of Perugia, at the Roman synod under Zacharias in 743 concerning monastic discipline, etc. (Mansi, xi. 367; Hefele, § 364.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (26), vicar of the prefect of the seven provinces of Gaul, from one of Sidonius Apollinaris. From two letters of the latter, one addressed to Gaudentius himself, we learn that he had risen to his position without the advantage of high birth. (Sidon. Apoll. Epistolae, lib. i. ep. 3 and 4. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 450, 451.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDENTIUS (27), an abbot to whom Dionysius Exiguus addressed his history of the finding of the head of John the Baptist, about 550. (Patr. Lat. lxxxv. 417.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDERICUS of Lyons. [GANDERICUS.]

GAUDERICUS of Treves. [GUNDERIC (2).]

GUADESTEUS (GODESTEUS, GODESTHEUS), bishop of Orense from before A.D. 646, till about 656, present at the seventh council of Toledo, A.D. 646. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 423; Exp. Sopr. viii. 44.) [M. A. W.]

GAUDINUS, ST., twenty-fifth bishop of Soissons, followed St. Adolbertus, and succeeded by Macharius. In the Gallican martyrology (Feb. 11) it is stated that having publicly rebuked some citizens for their nunnery, he was secretly seized, dragged to the Viae Herlius, and there cast into an open well, where he perished. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 553.) In 693 a Gaudinus is said to have subscribed the pisciculum of king Clovis at Valence, but whether of Soissons or Lyons is not certain. (Gall. Chr. ix. 339.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDILONUS. [GAUDELENTUS.]

GAUDIOSA, the queen of the famous Pelayo, the first king of Asturias (Seb. Sal. cap. 11; ep. 1. 15), was married to her husband in the church of St. Eulalia of Valamero, between Cangas and Covadonga, but the remains of both, according to Morales (Coronos, lib. 13, cap. 6), were transferred by Alfonso X. to the church of our Lady of Covadonga, where the tomb of Pelayo is still shown. (Flores, Regnas de España, i. 83.) [M. A. W.]

GAUDIOSUS (1), bishop of Abitina, in proconsular Africa, said to have been banished by Genseric c. A.D. 440, and to have died in exile at Naples A.D. 452. (Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 64.) Barennes mentions some legendary circumstances collected at Naples by his father. (Barennes, Mart. Oct. 28, notes: A. E. am. 416, x.) See also Ruinart, Comment. on Victor VII. cap. ii. sec. 5, p. 255, in Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 405.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDIOSUS (2), bishop of Pippianum, in proconsular Africa, was at the council of Carthage, A.D. 525. (Hardouin, Concil. ii. 1082; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 583.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDIOSUS (3), ST., a saint of Tarassos, in Aragon, the city of which he was bishop. According to Acta given by J. T. Salazar (Mart. Hisp. vi. 59) he was the son of Guntha, a man of high rank at the court of Theodoric, while the latter governed Spain during the minority of Amalasuntha, afterwards the wife of Theodoric's death, and was a pupil of St. Victorian. The Acta then relate that he went to Constantinople, where he married a Syrian lady, and that he was appointed by the emperor Maurice, who reigned from A.D. 582 to A.D. 602, præfector in Africa and they identify him with the Gaudiosus, the magister militum, to whom St. Gregory the Great wrote in A.D. 590 (S. Gregorii Epist. i. 76 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 530). Gaudiosus afterwards returned to Spain, and was appointed by king Gondemar, who reigned from A.D. 610 to A.D. 612, bishop of Tarazona, as successor to Stephanus, who signs the canons of the third council of Toledo (A.D. 589). The Acta represent that the Arians were then so powerful in Spain that no one, however brave, ventured to acknowledge himself a Catholic; but that Gaudiosus was not deterred thereby, nor by the contemporary executions by the Arians of Boethius and Symmachus (which really happened about A.D. 529-532), from preaching the orthodox faith, and that he wrote many letters to St. Isidore of Seville, and to Maximus and Braulio of Saragossa, to encourage them to resist Arianism. Finally, these Acta place his death in A.D. 530. From the above account of the Acta it will be seen how untrustworthy they are, and it may be added that the statement that Gundemar appointed Gaudiosus as successor to Stephanus is erroneous, as Florivius. in A.D. 610, subscribes the decree of Gundemar as bishop of Tarazona (Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 483); and further, that Ariаниsm in Spain was never formidable after the third council of Toledo in A.D. 589. From the mention of St. Victor, who died in A.D. 561 in his eightieth year, Gaudiosus apparently flourished in the first half of the 6th century, and this agrees with the Chronicle of Maximus (in Migne, Patr. Lat. ixxx. 625), which places him about A.D. 533. Gans (Ser. Episc. 76) also places him about A.D. 530. He gave many gifts of lands and farms to the monastery of St. Martin, of which St. Victorian was abbot. He died on Nov. 3, on which day he is commemorated. His body is preserved in the monastery of St. Victorian, in the diocese of Lerida. (Boll. AA. SS. Jan. i. 741; Esp. Sgr. xlvii. 230.) [F. D.]

Gaudiosus (4), bishop of Eugubium (Gubbio), who received a letter from Gregory the Great, ordering him to provide for the destitute church of Tadumum (Gualdo-Tadino in Umbria), and to send a priest to be consecrated as its bishop. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. ep. 87; Migne, lxxviii. 1016.) [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudiosus (5), a poor man of Rome, who complained to pope Gregory the Great soon after his accession (9th indict. i.e. A.D. 590) that the agents of the church claimed his sons as bondmen, and were violently enforcing the demand. Gaudiosus had proved to Gregory by satisfactory evidence that his wife Sirconia, once a slave, had been bestowed as a gift by a lady Leza on a lady Morena, and that this last had emancipated her by letter. Gregory writes to the subdeacon Anthemius to see justice done. If there were no documents with the church to invalidate those of Gaudiosus, the man was not to be molested; for it was intolerable that, when people bestowed liberties at their own cost, the church was the natural guardian of those liberties, should revoke them. (Greg. Mag. Epp. i. ep. 55, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 516.) [C. H.]

Gaudiosus (6), bishop of Naples, c. 637-644. (Gesta Episcoporum Neapolitanorum, part i. 27; Scriptores Burmitaliacum Lanoy, 1878, p. 413.) [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudiosus (7), bishop of Salernum (Salerno), probably before A.D. 648. He is said to have been of the family of the Dukes of Naples. His successor was Luminosus. (UgHELLI, Ital. Soc. vii. 488.) [R. S. G.]

Gaudiosus (8), the name of two bishops, viz. of Rieti and of Capua, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 866; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudiosus (9), bishop of Segna (Segni), present at the Roman synod, held under pope Agapito in Oct. 679, concerning Wilfrid and the affairs of England. (Hefele, § 390; Mansi, xii. 178.) He also signed the second letter of pope Agapito, which was sent in 690, after a synod in Rome, to the third council of Constantinople. (Hefele, § 314; Mansi, xi. 310.) [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudicus (10), bishop of Puteoli, who signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 299; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudicus (11), bishop of Brescia, 690. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 568; Ugelli, Ital. Soc. iv. 531; Mancini, Rom. Man. 7; Bull. Acta SS. 7 Mart. i. 648.) [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudicus (13), bishop of Sutri, at the Roman synod of 741. (Mansi, xii. 367; Hefele, § 364). Others call this bishop Gratiosus II. (Ugh. Ital. Soc. i. 1274; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vi. 225, 267); the synodal subscriptions having both "Gaudiosus Sudrio" and "Hirtioso Sutirino," must be the latter being reckoned a corruption of Gratiosus. [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudicus (14), possibly bishop of Bieda (Biera), south of Viterbo, present at the Roman synod of 743. But the signature is uncertain. (Mansi, xii. 367.) [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudicus (15), bishop of Messina, at the second council of Nicea in 787. (Mansi, xiii. 723, 732.) [A. H. D. A.]

Gaudio, bishop of Strasburg. [GANDOJO.]

Gaudio (2) (Gaud, Galdu, Waldus), ST, second bishop of Eureux, succeeding St. Faurinus, after an interval caused by the devastations of the barbarians, and followed by Maurusio. He is said to have been consecrated by Germanus archbishop of Rouen, and after administering the diocese for forty years, to have resigned the bishopric and retired to a desert spot in Neustria, where he died in 491. His body is said to have been found at the village of St. Pair, near Granville, in 1131. He was commemorated Jan. 31. (Gall. Christ. xi. 566; Hist. des Evesques d'Eureux par Chassant et Sauvage, 5-6; Bull. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1110.) [S. A. B.]

Gaudricus of Lyons. [Gandericus.]

Gauffridus. [Guyfridus.]

Gaufricus of Troyes. [Gandericus.]

Gaufric (Gery), fourth bishop of Cambrai, succeeding St. Vedulphus and followed by St. Bertholdus (circ. 580-589), was born at Yvoix in Luxembourg, and was ordained priest by St. Magniericus of Troyes. He was nominated to the see by Childeric II., and consecrated by Egidius of Rheims. He devoted himself to the extirpation of the remnants of idolatry and the settlement of the discipline of the church. He built a monastery close to the city, calling it after St. Medardus, though it afterwards bore his own name, and there he was buried. He was commemorated Aug. 11. The monastery in after times was pulled down to make room for a citadel built by Charles V. (Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. ii. 664; Gall. Christ. iii. 4.)

SAULIUS—May 31. Martyr in Spain with Germanus and Silvanus under Dacian the president in the Diocletian persecution. (Mart. Hieron., Usuard., Notk.)

GAUSBERTUS of Angers. [Godobertus.]

GAUSBERTUS (1) (Godobertus, Gaucohertus), twenty-seventh bishop of Chartres, succeeding St. Malardus and followed by Deodatus. His signature is found to three charters between about 658 and 666. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 1170, 1181, 1186; Gall. Christ. viii. 1101.)

SAULIUS (2) (Godobertus), thirteenth bishop of Poitiers, succeeding St. Maximinus, and followed by Godo, about the middle of the 8th century. He is named in a charter of king Louis the Pious, not Pippin as stated in the Gallia Christiana, for the monastery of Nobilium (Noallé) as one of the benefactors. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1155, inst. 946; Gams, Series Episc. 601.)

GAUSOLINUS of Metz. [Godislinus.]

GAUSUALDUS, bishop of Como, c. 741, (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Italia, xi. 319; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 283.)

GAUTERCIUS, twenty-fifth bishop of Troyes, succeeding Allobertus and followed by Ardunus, about the beginning of the 8th century. He is mentioned in an ancient MS. catalogue of Auxerre (Gall. Christ. xii. 469.)

GAUTUS, bishop of Neelon in Arabia. The situation of this town is obscure, the only mention of it being in the record of the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where Constantinus, bishop of Bostra, and metropolitan, signed on behalf of certain of his bishops, including Gautus of Neelon. It has been conjectured that the name may be an erroneous spelling of Eleole or Alon. (Le Quin, Or. Christ. ii. 867; Mansi, vii. 137.)

GAUZILOENUS (Godislinus), seventeenth bishop of Le Mans. After the death of his predecessor, Herlemondus I, the see was vacant several years, until count Rothgar forced a son of his own, described as "in litteterus et indocetus," upon the unwilling clergy. The metropolitan of Tours refused to consecrate, but the archbishop of Rouen, bribed, as it was said, performed the rite. In 743 he obtained from king Childeric III. a charter of confirmation of privileges for the estate of Ardunum, and another for the monastery of Anisola, both given in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 1147, 1150. Gauzileus was soon afterwards dethroned by Pippin, and succeeded by Herlemondus II. (Gesta Pontificum Canom.; Mabillon, Vet. Anecdot. 285-287; Gall. Christ. xiv. 354.)

SAULIUS (3) (Geslinus, Gavino). Bishop of Calaborra from A.D. 633. Subscribes the fourth, sixth, and eighth councils of Toledo, in A.D. 633, 635, 638. (Mansi, x. 642 a. 1222 a; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385, 413, 448; Esp. Sagra. xliiiii. 158.)

GAWAINE. [Gwalchmai.]

GAWEN, Welsh saint. [Govan.]

GAYROIUS. [Gairo.]

GEANBERKT (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. No. 144, A.D. 781), archbishop. [Jenaerbt.] [N. H. W.]

GEBAUDUS or Gebavultus. [Gebul.

GEBMUND, the eighth bishop of Rochester (M. H. B. 616). He was appointed by Theode archbishop of Canterbury to succeed Cucilhelm, who had deserted his see (Bedes, H. E. iv. 12), soon after the year 676, probably about 678. The length of his episcopate is uncertain; and it has been argued that the date 683, to which his death is referred by the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (M. H. B. 323), is the probable date, inasmuch as if he had survived archbishop Theodore, Berhtwald, the succeeding archbishop, need not have gone abroad for consecration (Smith, note on Bedes, H. E. v. 8; Wharton, Ang. Soc. i. 330). On the other hand, there is a charter of Osber, the under king of the Hwicci, GEDALIUS, bishop of Hospitia in Numidia, banished by Huneric, A.D. 464. (Victor Vit. Notit. 57; Mocroll, Afr. Crist. i. 188.)

GEDEON, ST., thirty-seventh bishop of Besançon, succeeding Hervaeus and followed by Bernoinus, about the close of the 8th century. There is extant a royal diploma given by a king Charles, to compose a quarrel that had arisen between Gedeon and Rigbertus abbott of St. Oyan (Eugendin) in the Jura, as to the possession of a cell in which St. Lupicinus was buried. Upon the report of Docto abbot of Luxeuil and Count Adelard, who had been commissioned to investigate the matter, the property was adjudged to the abbat. It has been doubted whether the author was Charles the Great, in which case the date of the instrument is A.D. 783, or Charles the Bald, in which case it would be A.D. 862. Mabillon, after first assigning it to the former date, finally decided for the latter (Annot. an. 790, n. i. tom. ii. 294), and the authors of the Galia Christiana (iv. inr. 3) print it with that date, but their successors (xv. 19) advise reasons for adopting the earlier year, and it seems that the position of Godoin in the indices of the Besançon church supports their contention. Moreover, mention, moreover, is made of him as a charter of Lothair, given in 809 as one of the predecessors of Aroninus, the archbishop then sitting (Gall. Christ. xv. inr. 4). The earlier position is assigned to him in the Series Episcoporum of Gans (p. 514).

GEFEL, clerical witness to a grant to bishop Grecilia of Llandaff, late in the 7th or early in the 8th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 421, 422.)

GEGHIA, of Inis Geghia, is mentioned in Vita S. Faranamani among those who came to salute St. Columba when he visited Ireland, but seems to be otherwise unknown. (Colg. Acta SS. 337, c. 7, 340, n. 47, and Tr. Thauin. 463, c. 55.)

GEGOBERGA, ST. (Segoberga, Cæcilia, Clara), second abbess of the double monastery of Habend, afterwards Remiremont or Romberg, founded cir. A.D. 620 by St. Amatus and St. Romaric on the top of the hill of Habend in the Vosges, near the Moselle, but rebuilt after its destruction by Huns, by the emperor Louis III. in the 10th century, at the foot of the mountain on the other side of the river, giving birth to the town of Remiremont. She succeeded St. Macte fled the first abbess, perhaps A.D. 620, and she was still abbess in 653, when the life of St. Romaric the second abbess and her contemporaries was addressed to her. Her successor, St. Tecta or Gertrude, was residing in 670 (Mabillon, Acta SS. 0. S. B. sec. ii. 670, ed. 1669). This is all that can be gathered from the contemporary lives. Tradition adds that she was the daughter of St. Romaric, and that he built his nunnery for her and her sister Adaltrude, that she changed her name from Segoberga to Cæcilia on becoming a nun, and that she was called Clara after her death on account of the many eures performed at her tomb, particularly of blindness and diseases of the eye (Sollerius in Bull. Acta SS. 12 Aug. ii. 732). Saussaye (Mart. Gallic. p. 321) and other later writers say that she was blind.

GEILA, brother of Suinhilda. (Gaila 8.)

GEINTEN (Gemthenus, Gentenus), priest of Tirguire, commemorated Sept. 2 (Mart. Doneg.); identified by Colgan (Tr. Thauin. 143, c. 102, 180, n. 14, 267 A) with Gemthenus of Esch-sinech, who is mentioned by St. Evinus as a disciple of St. Patrick and a teacher in Magh-Luirg, Connaught.

GELASIA. a virgin eminent for her piety, praised by Palladius for never letting the sun go down upon her wrath either against her domestics or any other person. (Pallad. Hist. Anonic. c. 146, p. 1048.)

GELASINUS, martyr at Athelopeia in Phocidacia, A.D. 297. He was acting as "secundus minus" (Horat. lib. i. ep. 18) in a theatre full of people. Persecuted to death the most of the Christian rise, his fellow actors flung him into a bath and baptized him. Coming forth clad in white, Gelasius said, no longer, however, in mockery, "I am a Christian, for I have seen in the bath an awful and majestic spectacle, and for Christ's sake I am ready to die." The people thereupon took and stoned him, the magistrate terminating his sufferings by beheading him. Theodoret in Sor. 3 de Martyribus refers to such sudden conversions of actors as having occurred more than once. [GENEBIUS] Chron. Paschale. sub ann. 268, i.e. A.D. 297. He was commemorated by the Greeks on Feb. 27. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 675.)

GELASIIUS, Sept. 29. [GENEBIUS 10.]

GELASIIUS (I. I), bishop of Rome after Felix III. (or II.) from March 492 to November 496, during about four years and a half. At the time of his acccession the schism between the Western and Eastern churches, which had begun under his predecessor, had lasted more than seven years. Its occasion had been the excommunication by pope Felix of Acacius, the patriarch of Constantinople, for supporting and communicating with Peter Mongus, the once monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, who had, however, satisfied Acacius by subscribing the Henotican, and afterwards the Nicene creed. There had been other grounds of complaint against Acacius, notably his disregard of the authority of the Roman see; but the above had been the original cause of quarrel. (See Felix III., Acacius.) Acacius being now dead, the subject of dispute was reduced to the retention of his name in the diplomas of the Eastern church. Felix had demanded its erasure as a condition of intercommunion with his successors. But they had refused to comply. The patriarch of Constantinople was now Euphemius, the emperor was Anastasius. On his accession Gelasius wrote a respectful letter of salutation to the emperor, as appears from an allusion to it in an extant letter from Gelasius to one Faustus, of which hereafter. It appears also from this same letter that the emperor did not reply. To Euphemius the patriarch the new pope did not write, as was usual in a matter of his accession. Euphemius, however, wrote twice to Gelasius, the second letter being sent, when no notice had been taken of the first, by a deacon called Similicius, to Rome. These facts, and the purport of what Euphemius wrote, are gathered from the extant letter which Gelasius now wrote in reply to the missus. But it seems, having received no communication from the new pope; he had expressed a strong desire of reconciliation between the churches, and a hope that Gelasius, whom he complimented as “not needing to be taught,” and as “intending all things necessary for the unity of the ecclesiastical body,” wished to see such a concord in a spirit of charity as able to restore concord. He had reminded him of the condescension of Christ. He had insisted that Acacius himself had been no heretic, and that before he communicated with Peter Mango the latter had been purged of heresy. He had asked by what synodal authority Acacius had ever been condemned. He had been of the opinion that the patriarch of Constantinople would never allow his name to be erased, but had suggested that the pope might send an ambassador to Constantinople to treat with them on the subject. Gelasius, in his reply, couched in a tone of imperious humility, utterly refuses any compromise. He speaks of the custom of the bishops of the apostolic see notifying their elevation to inferior bishops as a condescension rather than an obligation, and one certainly not due to such as chose to cast in their lot with heretics. He treats with contempt the plea of the determined attitude of the people of Constantinople. The shepherd ought, he says, to lead the flock, not be led by the sheep. The idea of himself sending to treat with them was out of the question, as if they would listen to him, towards whom they showed themselves but ill-disposed, when their own bishop confessed his inability to influence them. As to the original cause of dispute, Chalcedon had condemned the heresy held by Peter Mango, and by implication, too, he had not been absolved; and Acacius had communicated with him. Acacius had therefore been rightly excommunicated, and those who retained his name in their diplomas were associated in his condemnation. But the main gist of the letter is to assert in no measured terms the supremacy of the see of Rome, and the necessity of submitting to it. "We shall come," he concludes, "brother Euphemius, without doubt we shall come to that tremendous tribunal of Christ, with those standing round by whom the faith has been defended. There it will be proved whether the glorious confession of St. Peter has left anything short for the salvation of those who were given him to rule, or whether there has been rebellious and pernicious obstinacy in those who were unwilling to obey him."

The next year (493) Theodoric, the new Ostrogothic king of Italy, having sent an embassy, headed by two Romans, Faustus and Irenaeus, to Constantinople, Gelasius took the opportunity of writing a long letter to the Eastern bishops. Its main drift was to justify the excommunication of Acacius by asserting that he had exceeded his powers in absolving Peter Mango without the authority of the Roman see, and that for his own condemnation by pope Felix there had been no need (as was alleged to be the case by convention of a new synod. He complains also in the same letter of the expulsion of certain Catholic bishops in the East from their seas. Faustus, one of the ambassadors of Theodoric through whom this letter had been sent, replied in behalf of the Eastern bishops. Gelasius answered this letter in the same spirit, and in which allusion has been made. It is a long justification of his position with regard to Acacius, and of the supreme authority claimed by him for the Roman see. In reply to the assertion that what had been done by Rome was contrary to the canons of the church, he deigns in some parts of his letter to rest his case on the authority, saying (as before) that the council of Chalcedon had virtually condemned Acacius, and adding that in excluding him from communion the bishop of Rome had only done what any other bishop might have done; also that the canons of the church (referring doubts to those of Sardis, which were quoted by the popes of Rome) gave supreme jurisdiction to the see of Rome. But in other parts he plainly asserts the supremacy of the apostolic see over the whole church as due to the original commission of Christ to St. Peter, and as having always existed prior to, and independent of, all synods and canons. He speaks of "the apostolic judgment" which he supposed both the voice of Christ and the tradition of the elders and the authority of canons had supported, that it should itself always determine questions throughout the church. With regard to the possibility of Acacius being absolved now, having died excommunicate, he says that Christ Himself, who raised the dead, is never said to have absolved those who died in error, and that even to St. Peter it was an earth only that the power of binding and loosing had been given, not beyond the grave. An address in such a tone was not calculated to conciliate. The result was that the name of Gelasius himself was now removed from the diplomas of the Constantinopolitan church.

After the return of Faustus and Irenaeus to Rome, Gelasius wrote a long letter to the emperor, in which his position with regard to the question of Acacius is again justified, and the supremacy of Rome, resting on canons as well as original prerogative, is again insisted on, while the emperor is exhorted to use his temporal power to control his people in spiritual as well as mundane matters. This letter is noteworthy as containing a distinct expression of the view taken by Gelasius of the relations to each other of the ecclesiastical and civil jurisdictions. Each he regards as separate and supreme in its own sphere. As in secular things priests are bound to obey princes, so in spiritual things all the faithful, including princes, ought to submit their hearts to priests; and, if to priests generally, much more to the prelate of that see with whom he has proper jurisdiction, which should be over all priests, and to which the subsequent piety of the general church has perpetually accorded such pre-eminence. Gelasius also wrote on the same subjects to the bishops of various provinces, including those of East Illyricum and Dacia. In his address to the last he enlargets on its being the function of the Roman see, not only to carry out the decisions of synods, but even to give to such decisions their whole authority. Nay, the purpose of synods is spoken of as being simply to express the assent of the church at large to what the pope had already decreed, and what was therefore already binding. The pope takes the case in the instance of the council of Chalcedon. Further, instances are alleged of popes having on their own mere authority reversed the decisions of synods, absolved those whom synods had condemned, and condemned those whom synods had absolved. The cases of Athanasius and Chrysostom are cited as examples of the exercise of such power. Lastly, any claim of Constantinople (contemptuously spoken of as in the diocese of Heraclea) to be exempt from the judgment of “the first see” is put aside as absurd, since “the power of a secular kingdom is one thing, the distribution of ecclesiastical dignities another.”

In the year 495 Gelasius convened a synod of forty-six bishops at Rome for the purpose of absolving and restoring to his see Marcus of Cunea, one of the bishops sent by pope Felix I to Constantinople in the affair of Acacius, who had been then overthrown, and in consequence excommunicated. Before receiving absolution the papal letters required to be made the declaration before the synod that he “condemned, anathematized, abhorred, and for ever execrated Dioscorus, Aetius, Peter Mongus, Peter Fullo, Acacius, and all their successors, accomplices, attesters, and all who communicated with them.”

The death of Gelasius in the November of the following year (496) prevented any further steps under his auspices with respect to the great schism, which the attitude assumed by him had certainly not tended to heal.

In addition to his extant letters on the subject, some of which have been quoted, there is a curious treatise of his called Tomus de anathematis voculo. It refers in the first place to those canons of the council of Chalcedon, given independent authority to the see of Constantinople, of which pope Leo had disapproved, setting forth that the fact of this council having done so did not impair the validity of what it had rightly done, and that the approval of the see of Rome was the sole test of what was right. It passes next to the subject referred to in its title, the circumstance of pope Felix I, in his condemnation of Acacius, having bound him with an irrevocable anathema. This, it is argued, could not be taken to imply that the same power that had imposed the anathema could not have removed it on the repentance of the person so bound; for that Arias and other heretics who had undoubtedly been involved in the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost had in fact, on their repentance, been reconciled to the church. The irrevocability, then, of the sentence against Acacius had referred to his heresy if persisted in, not to his person, had he renounced his heresy. But if he had done so, the sentence had become utterly irrevocable now, since Acacius had died impenitent. The intention of the argument seems to be to explain away the apparent limitation of the absolving power of Rome which the terms of the sentence by Felix had implied, and also to justify the now perpetual and irrevocable exclusion of the name of Acacius from the diptychs of the church.

The tract contains further statements and arguments as to Rome alone having been competent to reconcile Peter Mongus or to absolve Acacius, and in reference to the idea of the emperor having power in the latter case without the leave of Rome. The distinction between the spheres of the ecclesiastical and civil jurisdictions is drawn that was set forth (as above shewn) in the letter to the emperor. In this instance Melchizedek is referred to as having in old times been both priest and king; the devil, it is said, in imitation of him, had induced the emperors to assume the supreme pontificate; but since Christianity had revealed the truth to the world, the union of the two powers had ceased to be lawful: Christ, in consideration of human frailty, had now for ever separated them, leaving the emperors dependent on the pontiffs for their everlasting salvation, the pontiffs on the emperors for the administration of all temporal affairs. Milianus (Lat. Christianity) remarks on the contrast between the interpretation of the type of Melchizedek and that given in the 11th century by by pope Innocent IV, who takes Melchizedek as prefiguring the union in the pope of the sacred and royal dignity.

There are two other works attributed to Gelasius in which views are expressed not easily reconciled with those since endorsed by his successors. One of these is a tract, the authenticity of which has not been questioned, against the Manicheans at Rome, in which the practice, adopted by that sect, of communion in one kind is strongly condemned. His words are, “We find that some, taking only the portion of the sacred body, abstain from the cup of the sacred blood. Let these (since I know not by what superstition they are actuated) either receive the entire sacraments or be debarred from them altogether; because a division of one and the same mystery cannot take place without great sacrilege.” Baronius evades the obviously general application of these concluding words by saying that they refer only to the Manicheans, who, in order to avoid suspicion of heresy, communicated with Catholics, but, in accordance with their own principles, in their kind only. In his own view he argues, the condemnation is of their doing so with this intent, not of the thing itself; and thus that the expression “without great sacrilege” means “without taint of suspicion of most wicked heresy.” And this interpretation he says is germane to the sense of the passage.
It can hardly be said to be so to that of the language used.

The passage above referred to occurs in a treatise, de duabus Naturis, against the Eutychians and Nestorians. Arguing against the Eutychian position that the union of the human and divine natures in Christ implies the absorption of the human into the divine, the writer adds the Eucharist as the image, similitude, and representation of the same mystery; the point being that, after consecration, the natural substance of the bread and wine remains unchanged, so the human nature of Christ remained unchanged notwithstanding its union with divinity. His words are: "The sacraments of the body and blood of Christ which we take are a divine thing, inasmuch as through them we are made partakers of the divine nature; and yet the substance or nature of bread and wine remains not to be. And certainly an image and similitude of the body and blood of Christ are celebrated in the act of the mysteries. It is then plainly enough shown to us that the main thing is to be thought of in our Lord Christ Himself that we profess, celebrate, and take in His image; and as they (i.e. the elements) by the operation of the Holy Spirit pass into this substance, namely a divine one, yet remain in the propriety of their own nature, so is that principal mystery itself, the essence and vehicle of the Eucharist, that they represent in us." This language, both in its own import and in regard to its relevancy to the argument against Eutychianism, seeming inconsistent with the doctrine of Transubstantiation, Baronius meets the difficulty, first by disputing the authorship of the treatise in which it occurs, and secondly by explaining it away. On the first of these heads it is argued that the Liber Pontificalis speaks of Gelasius having written five books against Nestorius and Eutyches, and that Genadius (Script. Eccles. c. 94) describes his work on this subject as "Grande et praeclarum volumen," whereas the treatise in which the words above quoted occur is a short one, in one book only, and therefore was not written by Gelasius; that the treatise in question quotes many Greek authors, but only two Latin ones, viz. Ambrose and Damasus, which was unlikely to have been the case had the pope been its author; and that it praises the writings of Eusebius of Caesarea, an author whom the pope Gelasius, in one of the documents attributed to him, rejects. Hence Baronius, followed by Bellarmine and others, attributes the probable authorship of the treatise before us, not to the pope Gelasius, but to another Gelasius, of Cyzicus, in the same age. The last of these arguments is worthless, inasmuch as the Decretum de libri recipiendis, alluding to rejecting Eusebius, is now generally considered on good grounds to be later than the time of Gelasius. Nor is the untrustworthy authority of the Liber Pontif. of much weight, or the expression of Genadius, "grande et praeclarum," inconsistent with the considerable treatise in question being the work intended, found as it is in all old manuscripts among the works of Gelasius, ascribed to him, and referred to as his, and even distinctly quoted, by St. Fulgentius, his contemporary (St. Fulgentius Ep. ad Ferrandum, c. xix.). Dupin on such grounds strongly maintains the pope's authorship against Baronius, and alleges further the internal evidence of style (Dupin, Noua Bibloia, second part of 5th century).

But Baronius, as has been said, endeavored also to explain the language of the treatise, by whomever written, to be consistent with transubstantiation. The drift of his explanation is that in every similitude there is some dissimilitude, that in a work of this kind the exact and proper meaning of words need not be pressed as long as the general sense intended can be gathered, and that in this case the writer, in speaking of the substance of the elements of the Eucharist, really meant their accidents. It may be remarked that if, on the one hand, the authoritatively enunciated views of Gelasius on the relation between civil and ecclesiastical authority, in communion in one kind, and on transubstantiation, are inconsistent with those subsequently endorsed by Rome, yet, on the other hand, few, if any, of his successors have gone beyond him in their claims of supreme and universal authority belonging by divine institution to the Roman pontiff.

Many letters of Gelasius, with fragments of others, are given in the standard collections, of which five have been referred to and quoted, viz. those to Euphemius, to the Eastern bishops, to Faustus, to the emperor Anastasius, and to the bishops of Dardania. Among his other works there is a "Tractatus de iure senatorii," in which, against the celebration of the feast of Lupercalia, it appears that the people were for reviving this feast, which the pope had suppressed, under the idea that certain maidens then prevalent were due to its discontinuance. It has been supposed that the feast of Candlemas, kept on the same day, was substituted for the heathen celebration. Other treatises of his have been already described. There is also one against Pelagianism. A Decretum de libris recipiendis, fixing the canonical books of Scripture, distinguishes between ancient ecclesiastical writers to be received or rejected, and containing a strong assertion of the supremacy of the bishop see, appears to have been issued, by Gelasius, to a Roman synod under him. It bears signs of a later date, having been first assigned to Gelasius by Hincmar of Rheims in the 7th century. The most memorable of the works attributed to him is the Gelasian Sacramentary, which was that in use till Gregory the Great revised and abbreviated it. [R. C. SACRAMENTARY in Dict. Chr. Antq.] A Sacramentary in several languages found in the queen of Sweden's library, and published by Thomasius in 1680, is supposed to be the Gelasian one. Gelasius has been canonized, his day being the 18th of November.

The main authorities for his life, besides the Liber Pontificalis are the letters of himself and his contemporaries, and his other extant writings. [J. B.—J.]

GELASIIUS (2), archbishop of Salamis, the metropolis of the island of Cyprus, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325 (Manli, ii. 996). Athanasius (Apoll. contra Arian., 56, in Migne, P. G. xxv. 130). Gregory I. Designates him a Cypron bishop of Gerasia, as subscribing to the council of Sardica, 347. Gerasia might have been identified as Gelasius, but for the fact of the name occurring in the third place instead of the first. In the life of Epiphanius his successor Gelasius is said to have attained the glory of a confessor along with
GELASIIUS OF CAESAREA

St. L'appa bishop of Ceitra in the same island. (Bell. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 39 f.; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1044.)

GELASIIUS (3), third bishop of Arretium (Arezzo), c. A.D. 386. His predecessor was Dematus, his successor was Dominianus or Donatianus. Gelasius is said to have baptized the whole household of Andreas, a nobleman of Arretium, numbering fifty-three persons, who were afterwards martyred. Gelasius himself was probably a martyr. (Ugelli, Ital. Sac. i. 456; Cappellatti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xviii. 68.)

R. S. G.

GELASIIUS (4), bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, c. 367-393, "distinguished by the purity of his doctrine and the sanctity of his life." (Theodoret. H. E. v. 8.) He was the son of the sister of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, by whom he was appointed bishop of the metropolitan see of Caesarea, c. A.D. 387. (Epiphani. Haer. lib. ixii. 57.) During the reign of Valens Caesarea was occupied by an intruding Arian bishop, Eusebius, who forced Gelasius from exercising his episcopal function. On the death of Valens and the accession of Theodosius in c. A.D. 379, Eusebius was expelled and Gelasius resumed the quiet possession of his see which he held till c. 394. He was dead in A.D. 395, when Porphyrius, bishop of Gaza, was consecrated by his successor John. He attended the general council of Constantinople in c. A.D. 381, when he took part in the election of Nectarius. (Theod. H. E. v. 8; Labbe, Concil. ii. 955.) He was again at Constantinople in c. A.D. 354, when he assisted at the consecration of the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, erected by Rufinus in the suburb of the Oak, and took part in the council held Sept. 24, to decide the dispute between Bagaudius and Agapius, who each claimed the bishopric of Aix. (Labbe, Concil. ii. 1152.) Jerome speaks with commendation of his literary powers, stating that he was "reported to have written brilliantly, but to have concealed his writings." (De Vir. Ill. c. 126.) Melito of Sardis, writing of Gelasius, (1) a continuation of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, undertaken at the request of his uncle Cyril, which, in deference of chronology, he describes as a Greek translation of Rufinus's history; and (2) a treatise against the Anomoeans, which he praises as being much superior in style to the history. (Phot. Cod. 89, p. 219; Cod. 102, p. 276.) His writings are lost, with the exception of one or two fragments. Theodoret quotes a passage from a sermon on the Epiphany (Eunapius, dia. i. p. 46; dia. iii. p. 251; ed. Schultze, 1772), and Leontius of Byzantium gives two passages from his exposition of the creed (Lavrae). (In Neon. et Euthych. lib. i. p. 978.) Gelasius is said to have been the first to insert the name of his great predecessor Eusebius on the diplomas, (Fabr. Bibl. Gracae, lib. v. c. 24; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 561.)

E. V.

GELASIIUS (5), bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, placed by Le Quien next after Irenaeus, who held the see in A.D. 453. He was the author of two books Against the Anomoeans, spoken with much commendation by Photius, who states that in learning, dictation, and argumentative power he far excelled the other two writers on ecclesiastical history of the same name. Photius highly praises the earnestness and conscientiousness of his style, the elegance of his language, and the force of his arguments, but condemns his pedantic abuse of logical terms such as a mere tautology, and the faults of his arrangement. This work is identified, but probably erroneously, by Cave and Baronius (see ann. 498) with the author of the work De Duobus Naturis, ascribed with greater reason to pope Gelasius A.D. 492-496. (Photius, Cod. 88, 89, 102; Fabr. Bibl. Gracae. lib. v. c. 24; Le Quien, Orient. Christ. iii. 567.)

E. V.

GELASIIUS (6), third bishop of Poitiers. Nothing is recorded of him save that he was buried in the church of St. Hilary at Poitiers. (Bell. Acta SS. 26 Aug. v. 817; Gall. Christ. ii. 1142.)

R. T. S.

GELASIIUS (7), bishop of Ipsa in Phrygia Salutaris. Theophylactus, a priest, acted as his representative at the seventh general (second Nicene) council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 148; Le Quien, O. C. i. 841.)

GELASIIUS, MARTYR. (GELASINUS.)

GELASIIUS (9), a person whom Eustathius of Sebaste fell in with in Cilicia, and to whom he delivered a statement of his faith, which Basil asserts none but Arisius or one holding kindred sentiments, could have confessed. (Basil. Epist. 130 [196], 224 [345].)

GELASIIUS (10), ST., a youth of Placentia (Piacenza), cir. 400, commemorated on Feb. 4. The liturgical offices of the church of that city record that he was of noble and Christian parents, and remarkable for piety from his earliest years. It is said that on one occasion he was privileged to behold angels in converse with his brother Opilius, while the latter was praying in his chamber, on which occasion he heard a voice saying, "Suffer little children to come unto Me." (Bell. Acta SS. 4 Feb. iii. 465.)

C. H.

GELASIIUS (11), a friend of Sidonius Apollinaris. He complains that his name has not been associated with any poetical effusion of Sidonius; he must have something which he may often repeat; he deems Sidonius's page, when he indulges the sporting vein, too much stocked with hendecasyllabics; so begging that the chattering trochee may be dropped, he would have his verses to run in trimeter iambics. Sidonius has long discontinued this measure, but will not disappoint his friend. The result is a sketch in fifty-five lines of trimeter iambics respecting the classic poets, their various metres and graces. (Sidon. Apoll. Epp. ix. 13, Patr. Lat. iiii. 655.) In the concluding letter he refers to Gratus as "virum sat benignissimum."

GELASIIUS (12), martyr, commemorated on Feb. 4 at Rome in the Forum Sempronii, with Aquilinus, Geminus, Magnus, Donatus. (Usuard, Mart.)

C. H.

GELASIIUS (13) of Cyzicus, in the second half of the 5th century, author of a work on the history of the council of Nicaea, entitled by Photius, Πραγματεύματα τῶν πρῶτων Συνόδων ἑτέρων καὶ τῶν ἑπτά, The Acts of the First Council in three books; though, as Photius remarks, the work deserves the name of a History as much as of Acts, διὸ μᾶλλον πραγματεύμα τῶν ἑτέρων (Phot. Cod. 15). Our only knowledge of the author is derived from his own statements concerning himself. Photius acknowledges his inability to determine who he was, though he thinks it possible that he may have been bishop of Caesarea, a different person, however, from the other bishops of the same name, viz. Cyril’s nephew, and the writer of the work against the Anomoeans. Le Quien also places him among the bishops of Caesarea, but with considerable doubt. If he did occupy that see he must have died before A.D. 484, when Timotheus was the bishop (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 568). But the idea is almost certainly erroneous, and has arisen from the title affixed by some blundering scribe mentioned by Photius, assigning the work to a bishop of Caesarea.

We learn from Gelasius’s own words that he was the son of a presbyter of Cyzicus, and that, while he was still residing in his father’s house, he fell in with an old parchment volume which had belonged to Dalmatius, bishop of Cyzicus, and had got into his father’s hands, containing a full account of the proceedings of the council of Nicea (σημαίνει δὲ καὶ τὰ κατὰ τὸν Ἰούσιον Κωνσταντίνον ἐγγύτερον). This document not supplying all the information he desired, Gelasius entered upon an examination of the works of other writers dealing with the same subject, from which he filled up the gaps. He mentions the work of an ancient writer named John, a presbyter otherwise unknown, as well as those of Eusebius of Caesarea, and Rufinus, whom he calls a Roman presbyter, who were both eye-witnesses of the transactions, and many others. If this Rufinus is to be identified with Rufinus Tyrannius, the ecclesiastical historian, Gelasius has been guilty of the grave historical blunder of making him present at a council held twenty years before his birth. It is, however, absolutely certain that some other person of the same name may not have been intended. From these and other sources Gelasius compiled his history of the Nicene council. It is sometimes taken for granted by those who only know the work by report that it contains a complete collection of the synodal acts of the council. There is, however, no evidence of the existence of such a collection, or of anyone having seen or used it. Athanasius had none such to refer to (cf. Athanas. de Decret. Syn. Nic. l. 2), and certainly we do not possess it in Gelasius (cf. Hefele, Hist.-of Councils, Eng. tr. 263, 294). From the work itself, that the principal fact of its importance was Bithynia, and that the thorough knowledge of the proceedings of this council and its decrees had been of great use to Gelasius in confusing the Euchthians in that province during the ascendency they gained under the usurper Basiliscus, 475-477, when they were appealing to the decisions of the Nicene fathers as favouring their cause. The ancient historians are unanimous in the publication of his historical collections, by which alone he is known to us. If this work had answered in any respect to its pretensions it would have been of immense value. But either the original document must have been most untrustworthy, belonging rather to the domain of fiction than fact, or Gelasius himself must have so overlaid it with the inventions of his own imagination, that as an historical authority it is almost worthless. The prolix disputations and lengthy orations, of which it is full, as Caret has justly remarked, are evidently the writer’s own composition. Dupin’s verdict is still more severe. He calls Gelasius “a sorry compiler, who gathered all he met with relating to his subject, both bad and good, without examining whether it was true or false.” His work is little more than a compilation from the ecclesiastical histories of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, to which he has added little but what is very doubtful or manifestly untrue. “There is neither order in his narrative, nor exactness in his observations, nor elegance in his language, nor judgment in his selection of facts, nor good sense in his judgments.” As instances of its untrustworthiness we may mention that he states that the council was summoned by the pope, Sylvester I. (Euseb. Hist. viii. 35), while Hosius of Cordova presided as its deacon, and devotes many chapters (Lib. ii. c. 11-24) to disputations on the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, which had not at the time become subject of controversy at all. Natalis Alexander also condemns the work as being “levissimi ponderis,” except what is confirmed by other authorities, and says of it “non est verum” (Exch. Hist. iii. iv. dissert. 13). The style, according to Photios, is characterized by poverty and meanness. The work is divided into three books, τὰ ποιήματα. The first book, which deals with civil history, contains the life of Constantine until his victory over Licinius, in eleven chapters. In the second book, in thirty-six chapters, comprehends the history of the council, embellished with imaginary speeches, and discussions between the bishops and heathen philosophers that cannot have taken place. His statement that Arius took these philosophers with him to help him in his disputations with the orthodox party seems, indeed, not probable. It is, however, considered by many a part of the best and most authentic narrative of the debates between Phædus, a heathen philosopher holding Arius opinions, and the most learned members of the council, Eustathius, Hosius, Eusebius, &c. is stamped by Valesius (Annot. in Socr. H. E. l. 8), as decidedly supposititious. The acquaintance with theology and familiarity with the Holy Scriptures, shown in Phædus’s arguments, exceeds all probability. In Bruglie is probably correct in regarding these discussions as specimens of Christian declamation, written as literary exercises, but not with any deliberate intention to deceive, but accepted as authority by the uncritical compiler (L’Étud. et l’Emp. l. 23) to be “most certainly spurious.” “None of the ancient fathers have any thing comparable with one among the moderns has endeavoured to defend their historical value; most do not even mention them; and those who do quote them content themselves with denying their genuineness.” The third book, as we have it, gives only three letters or edicts of the emperor Constantian.
GELASIUS (1) To Arians and the Arians; (2) To the Church of Nicomedia; (3) To Theodorus. Originally, we know from Photius, it carried on the history to the death of Constantine and his baptism, which preceded it, which is stated to have been performed by an orthodox presbyter, who is anonymous. It is supposed that the last book has been mutilated on purpose to destroy the evidence against the story of the emperor having been baptized by pope Sylvester at Rome. The first portion of it, which was printed was the second book, which was included by Alphonsus Pisanus in his History of the Nicene Council. The whole was published with a Latin translation and notes by Robert Balfour, a Scotchman, Paris, 1599. It has been included in all the collections of the councils from those of Sirmondus, 1508, and Binius, 1518. It is to be found in the second volume of Labbe's collection (col. 103-286) as well as in those of Harduin and Mansi. (Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 15, 88, 89; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. lib. v. c. 24; lib. vi. c. 4; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 454; Dupin, iv. 187; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 593.)

GELASIUS (14) (Bacchus Junior), monk and martyr; commemorated on Dec. 17. He belonged to Palestine, in the reign of Irene and her son Constantine VI. (790-797), and was of Christian descent, but his father had apostatized to the Saracens and brought up his seven sons in the religion of Mahomet. After his father's death, Galasius sought the laura of St. Saba, where he resided as a recluse under the name of Bacchus. The abbot, fearing punishment from the Saracens for having baptized Galasius, dismissed him, and Galasius, returning home, baptized five of his brothers, but the sixth, who refused baptism, denounced him to Aemar, and Galasius was decapitated. (Basil. Menol. ii. 38.)

GELASIUS (15), a monk who forsake his monastery. A letter is preserved addressed to him by St. Theodorus Studites, in which the latter exhorts him to return without losing an hour. This letter was probably written by St. Theodorus in his first or second labourment, that is, either in a.D. 797-8 or in a.D. 799-811. (S. Theodori Studii Epist. i. 9, in Migne, Patr. Grsec. xxix. 937; Cellier, Histoire des Act. sacr. iii. 308.)

GELATUNA. [GELATUNA] GELLANUS, bishop of Repera In Mauretanian Casarsianis, banished by Hunneric, 484. (Victor. Vit. Notit. 59, Patr. Lat. viii. 274 b; Morelli, Afr. Christ. i. 261.)

GELMER, the last king of the Vandals in Africa, 530-534, as usually dated, though Clinton computes the commencement of his reign in June 531 (F. R. i. 734). He was the son of Gelard, grandson of Gentor, great-grandson of Genseric. In the reign of Hilderic he headed the malcontents, seized his king, and his brother Haceric the exterminated the partisans who supported them. The emperor Justinian, who was a friend of Hilderic, sent Belisarius with an army to avenge him, and this general reduced all the Vandal dominion in Africa, Sicily, Sardinia, and the Italian coasts. According to Clinton's chronology (F. R. ii. 756, 758) Belisarius was victorious in Dec. 533, and after three months, when winter was over, that is in March 534, Gelimer surrendered to the imperial commander Phocas. He was sent a prisoner, first to Carthage and afterwards to Constantinople. His reign had lasted two years and nine months (Clinto, P. R. Epit. 221). Gelimer, on being introduced to Belisarius at Carthage, broke into unrestrained laughter, a behaviour which was variously interpreted. The bystanders imputed it to the weakness of his mind, through the calamities he had sustained; but his friends repudiated the imputation and maintained that he was but expressing a humorous sense of the instability of earthly affairs, contrasting his former prosperity with his present humiliation. Others have seen in Gelimer's laugh the laugh of Democritus, as though all the grandeur of human fortune deserved no better than ridicule. His bearing afterwards at Constantinople seems to favour one of the latter interpretations. After gracing the triumph of his conqueror, he was led into the hippodrome where Justinian sat enthroned amid a vast concourse of the people. Gelimer neither uttered a groan nor shed a tear, but kept uttering Solomon's sentence, "Vanitas vanitatum et omnia vanitas." Arrived at the foot of the throne, he was divested of his purple robe; and obliged to bow his head to the ground in obeisance to the emperor. No further sufferings were inflicted on him, and he was allowed to retire on an estate provided for him in Galatia. He would have been honoured with the title of patrician had he not persistently refused to abandon the Arian heresy, which he had inherited from his predecessors (Procop. Bell. Vand. lib. i. c. 9). Thus ended the Vandalic power in Africa, which had endured (according to Clinton) ninety-five years since the first entry of the Vandals into Africa, 429, and one hundred and five years since the conquest of Carthage by Genseric in 439. All that time the Catholic church in Africa had been oppressed by Arian domination, but yet the downfall of the Vandals has restored its supremacy. (C. H.)

GELIONIUS (GILDERNUS, GELDERNUS), said to have been twelfth bishop of Chloun-sur-Sabas, succeeding Waledinus, or, according to Gums, Antedil, and followed by St. Gratian, about a.D. 841. (Gall. Christ. iv. 971.)

GELONICA, martyr. [GALONICA].

GEMARA. [TALMUD].

GEMELLUS (1)—Dec. 10. A native of Paphlagonia and martyr under Julian. Having heard that the emperor was at Ancyra in Galatia, he went and upbraided him for his apostasy. For this, Julian is said to have tortured and finally crucified him in the city of Edessa. (Basil. Menol.)

GEMELLUS (2) (GEMELUS), the Donatist bishop of Tanboca, Tamboca, or Tambaiba, in Byzacena, at the North council of Carthage, in a.D. 393. (August. in Ps. xxxvi. 20; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 257, ed. Oberthür.)

GEMELLUS (3), a layman of distinction residing at Constantinople, a catechumen of Chrysostom's, whose cause he espoused very warmly regardless of the trouble he thus brought upon himself. (Chrysost. Epist. 192.) He was still unrepentant when Chrysostom was expelled, and he was anxious to receive the sacrament at the hands of his revered teacher. Chrysostom, however, exhorted him not to defer his admission into the church till his return, delighted as he should have been to baptize him, but to receive the rites at the hands of some of his friends and adherents. The intelligence of this would cause him the sincerest pleasure (ibid.). Gemellus having been raised to some important official position in Constantinople, Chrysostom wrote him a very warm congratulatory letter expressing his satisfaction, not so much on his accession to dignity as on the opportunity it afforded him of exercising his power for the good of others, in which he was sure he would not be wanting. (Epist. 124.) Not having received any reply, Chrysostom wrote again in a tone of disappointment, assuring him, however, that he was convinced that his silence did not proceed from pride of station or from any failure of affection towards him. (Epist. 79.) Chrysostom's letters to Gemellus indicate a very high estimate of Gemellus's character and qualifications, as well as that anxious solicitude for his welfare which could only be satisfied by frequent intelligence. In one letter he expresses an eager desire to know whether his health has derived any benefit from the warm baths he was proposing to visit. (Epist. 194.)

GEMLLIUS (4), subdeacon and founder of the church of St. Agnes at Ravenna, and also "rector" of Sicily, in the time of Exuperantius, bishop of Ravenna. (Agnellus, Liber Pontif. Ruvemn. pt. iii. p. 254, ed. 1708, pt. i. cap. 1 in Patr. Lat. cviii. 523.)

GEMLLIUS (5), bishop of Stratonicea, in the ecclesiastical province of Lydia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and subsequently signed the synodal letter of his province to the emperor Leo concerning the death of St. Proterius and the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 153, 573; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 893.)

GEMLLIUS (6), bishop of Miletopolis, on the Rhynedacum, in the ecclesiastical province of the Hellespont. Diogenes of Cyzicus subscribed his name in his absence to the confession of faith which was read before the emperor Marcian, at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 164; Le Quien, O. C. i. 779.)

GEMLLIUS (7), 7th bishop of Vaison, succeeding Ethillus and followed by Alethius, was present at the council of Epona in A.D. 517. (Mansi, viii. 564; Gall. Christ. i. 923.)

GEMLLIUS of Antioch. (GEMINIUS (1))

GEMLLIIUS (1)—Sept. 16 (Usuard.). Sept. 17 (Hae. Mm.). Martyr at Rome under Diocletian and Maximian, with Lucia a widow. Her son Eutropius, being an idiot, accused her, now aged 75 years, before the judges Apofrasius and Megasius, who delivered her to death. Gemellius was converted by her patience under torture, and suffered with her. (Mart. Rom. Vat., Adom., Usuard.) [LUCIA.] [G. T. S.]

GEMLLIUS (2), bishop of Mutina (Modena) from before A.D. 380 to c. 388, when the same year he was succeeded by Theodulus. His predecessor had been Theodorus. He was present at the council of Milan under St. Ambrose, a.d. 390. (Mansi, iii. 680; Ambr. Epiph. class. i. 48. Patr. Lat. xvi. 1139; Cappelletti, Le Chier d'Italia, iv. 225.) Sillingard (Catal. Episc. Ital. 5) makes him succeed Antonius in 386 and succeeded by Theodorus in 387.

GEMLLIUS (3), bishop of Volterra, at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649. (Mansi, x. 895; Hefele, § 907.)

GEMLLIUS (4), bishop of Reggio (na Emilia), signing a double donation by Astolph, c. 752, in favour of the abbey of Nonantula (Troyes, Cod. Dipl. iv. 430). He consecrated the abbey, c. 753, according to the author of the Life of Anslem abbat of Nonantula, in Monumentorum Italicum et Langobardicorum, p. 566.

GEMLLIUS (5), bishop of Modena, signing a double donation by Astolph, c. 752, in favour of the abbey of Nonanata (Troyes, Cod. Dipl. iv. 430).

GEMLLIUS (6), bishop of Mutina (Modena) from before A.D. 380 to c. 388, when the same year he was succeeded by Theodulus. His predecessor had been Theodorus. He was present at the council of Milan under St. Ambrose, a.d. 390. (Mansi, iii. 680; Ambr. Epiph. class. i. 48. Patr. Lat. xvi. 1139; Cappelletti, Le Chier d'Italia, iv. 225.) Sillingard (Catal. Episc. Ital. 5) makes him succeed Antonius in 386 and succeeded by Theodorus in 387.

GEMLLIUS (7), 7th bishop of Vaison, succeeding Ethillus and followed by Alethius, was present at the council of Epona in A.D. 517. (Mansi, viii. 564; Gall. Christ. i. 923.)

GEMLLIUS (8), bishop of Modena, signing a double donation by Astolph, c. 752, in favour of the abbey of Nonanata (Troyes, Cod. Dipl. iv. 430).

GEMLLIUS (9), bishop of Mutina (Modena) from before A.D. 380 to c. 388, when the same year he was succeeded by Theodulus. His predecessor had been Theodorus. He was present at the council of Milan under St. Ambrose, a.d. 390. (Mansi, iii. 680; Ambr. Epiph. class. i. 48. Patr. Lat. xvi. 1139; Cappelletti, Le Chier d'Italia, iv. 225.) Sillingard (Catal. Episc. Ital. 5) makes him succeed Antonius in 386 and succeeded by Theodorus in 387.

GEMLLIUS (10), bishop of Mutina (Modena) from before A.D. 380 to c. 388, when the same year he was succeeded by Theodulus. His predecessor had been Theodorus. He was present at the council of Milan under St. Ambrose, a.d. 390. (Mansi, iii. 680; Ambr. Epiph. class. i. 48. Patr. Lat. xvi. 1139; Cappelletti, Le Chier d'Italia, iv. 225.) Sillingard (Catal. Episc. Ital. 5) makes him succeed Antonius in 386 and succeeded by Theodorus in 387.

GEMLLIUS (11), bishop of Mutina (Modena) from before A.D. 380 to c. 388, when the same year he was succeeded by Theodulus. His predecessor had been Theodorus. He was present at the council of Milan under St. Ambrose, a.d. 390. (Mansi, iii. 680; Ambr. Epiph. class. i. 48. Patr. Lat. xvi. 1139; Cappelletti, Le Chier d'Italia, iv. 225.) Sillingard (Catal. Episc. Ital. 5) makes him succeed Antonius in 386 and succeeded by Theodorus in 387.
GEMINIUS (3), Donatist bishop of Cluipa, or Cliepa, an important seaport town on the east coast of proconsular Africa, deriving its name from Cliepa, a shield (Kalbis). (Shaw, p. 89; Dic. of Geo. i. 242.) He was present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. i. 133.)

[ H. W. P. ]

GEMINIUS (1) (GEMINUINIANUS), presbyter of Antioch. Jerome in his Chronicle (where one reads his name as Gemmanus) places him in the year 230, mentioning him with Hippolytus and Berillus of Bostra, "clari scriptores." In his Vr. Ill. likewise Jerome puts him in the time of the emperor Alexander, when Zebennus was bishop of Antioch, 231, and Heraclius was ordained bishop of Alexandria, 233, stating that he composed "a few monuments of his genius." Of these works nothing further is now known. (Hieron. Vr. Illust. cap. 64; Cave, i. 123.)

[G. H.]

GEMINIUS (2)—Jan. 4. Martyr in Africa with Aquilinus, Eugenius, Marianus, Quintus, Theodorus, Triphonis. (Mort. Adon. Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

GEMINIUS (3)—Feb. 4. Martyr at Rome with Aquilinus, Gelasius, Magnus and Donatus. (Mort. Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

GEMMINUS (4), confessor in Italy. According to the legend (Boll. Acta SS. 9 Oct. iv. 1039-42) he was by birth a Syrian; his parents Militianus and Bellis were noble; he was brought up as a Christian, though his parents were idolaters, but subsequently converted. After his father's death he found it necessary to seek shelter in Italy, where he landed on the coast of Umbria, and proceeded to Spoletum and Casseretum. Thence he removed to Ferentum, and near to it or at Canerium he died A.D. 815. The Ballondians say he had dedications near Casseretum and Ferentum, at Civitellen, on mount Agnus beside Nocera, and near the city of Hottis, all in Umbria or Etruria. [J. G.]

GEMMANUS (GERMANUS). While St. Columba was a deacon, he is said to have been under the tuition of a Christian bard named Gemmanus, as other hagiographers place him among the famous poets. Gemmanus, who lived in Leinster, probably in the plain of Meath, near to Clonard. Colgan seeks to identify him with Gorman (Oct. 25), of Cill-Gorman, in the east of Leinster, but the name in all likelihood is Gemmanus, and only assumes the form of Germanus from the desire of different writers to make it conform to the familiar type. In the incident related regarding him and St. Columba in the life of the latter by St. Adamnan, St. Gemman was an old man, but we know nothing further of his life or the date of his death, except that he brought his poems and offered them to St. Finnian (Dec. 12) of Clonard, in whose praise he is said to have written a hymn while St. Finnian lived. Lanigan is inclined to think that he was a foreigner, but this idea is based on the name being Germanus. (Colgan, Tr. Thaurnus, c. 25, 383, n. 39, 395, c. 40, 450, n. 4n, Acta SS. 395, c. 23; Reeves, St. Adamnan, i. 137; Skeen, Celt. Scot. ii. 53; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. tr. ii. c. 11, § 8; Todd, St. Patrick, 140; Woulfe, Tr. Woulfe, i. c. 2.) [J. G.]

GEMMARDUS, eighth bishop of St. Paul de Trois-Châteaux, following Sallutianus and succeeded by Ingilbertus, perhaps towards the close of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 708.)

[S. A. B.]

GEMMULUS, a deacon, afterwards an archdeacon, at Rome. Two letters are preserved from him to St. Boniface, of which the priest Deneardus was the bearer. St. Boniface had sent the latter to Rome with letters to the pope, and also to Gemmulus after the synod of Seleucus (A.D. 744), in which he gave an account of what had occurred at the synod, and also of the heretics Aldabert and Clement. In the first of these letters Gemmulus tells him of the condemnation of these heretics and their followers by a council at Rome. He also mentions he had, to the best of his power, taken care of the nuns entrusted by St. Boniface to his charge, and acknowledges the receipt of a present of a silver cup and a sindon or cloth for receiving the bread offered at the Eucharist, which St. Boniface had sent him with his blessing, and sends in return a present of four ounces of cinnamon, two melons of pepper, and a pound of crozerum or crotzerum, which from the second letter appears to have been a remarkably fragrant kind of incense. In the second letter he excuses himself for not having sent him the epistles of St. Gregory he had asked for, on the ground that he had been ill of gout, as Deanesus could bear witness, but promises if he recovers to perform St. Boniface's wishes. We have also a letter from St. Boniface to him, written apparently near the end of the archbishop's life; he addresses Gemmulus or "Jammulius" as archdeacon, and tenderly regrets their separation from one another. (Bonif. ep. 59, 59, 86 in Mornum. Magnai. ed. Jull. 153, 156, 25.)

[F. D.]

GEMTHENNUS, disciple of St. Patrick. (Colgan, Tr. Thaurnus, 143, 163, 297.) [GUINNEN.] [J. G.]

GENBERHIT (Kemble, C. D. 113), archbishop. [JACKENBURT.] [C. II.]

GENEBAUDUS I. (GENEBAUDUS, GENNOBAUDUS), ST., first bishop of Luon, established in the see by St. Remigius bishop of Rheims, the metropolitan, to whose history by Flodoard we are indebted for almost all the knowledge we have of him. The Acta ascribed to Hinneman of Rheims (Boll. Sept. ii. 538) add nothing to Flodoard's account. He was of noble birth, and learned in both sacred and profane literature. Before his ordination he separated from his wife, a niece of St. Remigius. But the separation proved more than he could bear, and after a period of secret intercourse with her he threw himself at the feet of St. Remigius, and tearing off his stole confessed his sin. The saint ordained a penance. A dimly lighted cell and oratory were built against the church of St. Julian, and the door was locked and sealed by St. Remigius. There he passed seven years, his metropolitan presiding over the diocese with his own. On the assurance of an angel that his sin was forgiven, he emerged from his prison with the consent of Remigius. He was succeeded by his son Latro (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. I. xiv.) He was re-episcopated at the Synod of Orleans, A.D. 546, by Medallus his archdeacon.
GENEBAUDUS II., seventeenth bishop of Leon, succeeding Madelarius and followed by Waino I. He is one of the bishops addressed in the twelfth letter of pope Zachary, written probably A.D. 748 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 948). In 762 he subscribed two charters of king Pippin for the foundation and endowment of the monastery of Prüm (Migne, Patr. Lat. xcv. 1537, 1541), and in the same year, or in 765, he signed the Placitum Athinonese (Bar. Pagius, an. 762, n. iv.; Mansi, xii. 661). The date of his death is not known. (Gall. Christ. ix. 512.)

GENEBERN or GENEGBRED, martyr, friend of St. Dimpna. [GENEBERN.]

GENEBRADUS, bishop of Lauda (Lodi). He lived between A.D. 345 and 378. His predecessor was St. Dionysius, his successor St. Bassianus. Ughelli believes that he was bishop of Laodiceum (Laon). (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 893; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xii. 285.)

GENEREUS, a baker at Ioana in the time of St. Columba, mentioned in the life of that saint by Adamnan. He has had a minor kind of importance thrown upon him through the controversial use made of the various readings in the text regarding his occupation. In the edition of St. Adamnan by Colgan and the Bollandists he is called a “pizzaro” (pistor), and O'Donnell evidently borrows the same from his copy of St. Adamnan; but the true reading, as adopted by Canisius, Messingham, and Dr. Reeves, is “pistor” and “opus pistorum,” so that Generalis is not to be classed among the cultivators of ancient Irish art, but among the lower members of the Columban household. He is called by St. Adamnan “a certain religious brother,” and a “Saxon,” and apparently was in favour with St. Columba. (Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. I., ii. 124, n. 112; Reeves, St. Adamnan, 208, 209; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 430.)

GENEROSA (1), a Christian woman at Rome. [FAUSTINA (25)].

GENEROSA (2)—July 17. Martyr at Scilla in Africa. [FELIX (212)]. [F. T. 8.]

GENEROSUS (1), a Christian gentleman of Constantia (Cirta), to whom a Donatist presbyter wrote, at the command, he said, of an angel, to recommend the claims of Donatism. To this letter St. Augustine, in conjunction with Alypius and Fortunatus, replied [FORTUNATUS], shewing that these claims were groundless, and that the succession of bishops at Rome, notwithstanding the intrusion of a Donatist [FELIX (45)], was unbroken, whereas Donatism was a novelty. To separate, therefore, from the Catholic church was to separate from the Christianity of the whole world. Besides this, some of the Donatist bishops, as Silvanus, had themselves been guilty of “tradition,” the crime which they imputed so fiercely to the Catholics, whereas the repeated inquiries into the case of Caecilianus had only served to establish his innocence of it. But the main principle of the Donatists, that the evil must be separated from the good in this world was itself false, and they themselves were not consistent in their application of it when they readmitted Felicianus of Musti into their community. The writer of the letter to Generosus, when he speaks of an angel, ought to remember that his knowledge of the form of angel of light, or else, if he saw no angel, he has laid himself open to the charge of falsehood. These circumstances are given under A.D. 400 by Tillemont (Mem. xiii. 328, art. 126) and Ceillier (Act. sac. i. 83); but Barouius (A. E. ann. 398, xxii.) under 398.

This letter must have been written between A.D. 398 and 400, during the pontificate of Anastasius, who is mentioned in it as holding the see of Rome. It seems not impossible that by the term “angel” the writer of the letter to Generosus may have meant to denote Petilian, the able and busy Donatist bishop of Cirta, whose knowledge, if not at his suggestion, it was probably written, and who was not without anxious to gain over to his side a layman of high standing like Generosus. Morelli, followed by Gams, considers Generosus to have preceded Profuturus as bishop of Cirta. But this is unlikely, for (1) he is nowhere distinctly called bishop in the letter on which Morelli relies for proof; (2) in the superscription to that letter the names given are those of Alypius, Augustine, and Fortunatus, and in his reply to the letters of Petilian, Augustine speaks of Fortunatus as being at that time bishop of Cirta. This reply was written about A.D. 400, i.e. about the same time as the letter to Generosus. We conclude therefore that Generosus was not at that time, nor at any other, a bishop, but only a Christian layman of high character and position. (Morelli, Afric. Christ. i. 142; Gams, Sgr. Episc. p. 465; Aug. 1. Pet. i. 1; Retract. ii. 25; de Unic. Bapt. xvi. 29; Ep. 53; Tillemont, 126, 127, vol. xii. pp. 328, 333; Ceillier, ix. 430.)

Generosus appears afterwards to have become consular of Numidia, in which capacity Augustine wrote to him in the case of Faventius. [FAVENTIUS (1.)] (Aug. Ep. 116.) Gams (Sgr. Episc. 465) in recording a Generous bishop of Cirta “ante 400” has probably in view, erroneously, the subject of this article. [H. W. E.]
GENEROSUS, a legate from the formentioned monastery. He belongs to the 6th century.

GENEROSUS (3), bishop of the combined sees of Nomentum (La Montana) and Curium (both since merged in the see of Sabina), c. 601. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, i. 598 n.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GENESIUS (1)—Aug. 25. A comedian at Rome and martyr A.D. 285. He was converted while mocking Christian baptism. [GELASINIUS.] He was tortured for the faith, during which he cried, "There is no king but Christ, for whom I will be killed a thousand times, as you cannot take him out of my mouth nor tear him from my heart." A church at Rome was dedicated in his honour from ancient times, which was restored and beautified by Gregory III. A.D. 741 (Anastasius Bibliothec. iv. 199). Baronius fixes the date of his martyrdom at 303, and Tillmont (Moen. iv. 685) at 285 or 286. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron. Adom., Usuard.; Kat. Front.; Robert, Acta Sancr.; Surul Vitae Sanctorum; Coll. ii. 467.)

[G. T. S.]

GENESIUS (2)—Aug. 25. A notary at Arles, and martyr A.D. 308. Originally a soldier, he then became registrar of the local court, where he was one day called upon, in the course of duty, to read one of the edicts of persecution issued by Diocletian and Maximian. Though only a catechumen, he refused to do so, but resigned his appointment and fled. Ardently longing to receive baptism, he returned to Arles, where he prayed the bishop to administer it to him. For some reason, whatever through stress of persecution or some defect in preparation, the bishop deferred it for the present, assuring him, however, that, if called upon to die for Christ, "in thus shedding his blood, he should receive the perfection of the grace of baptism." He was soon after arrested, wheedon, as St. Paulinus of Nola has as account says, "by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit," he flung himself into the Rhone, whereby he received baptism, the river having become him for a second Jordan. The officers followed him to the other bank and there beheaded him without any formal trial. Ado, speaking of his death, says that "he received the crown of martyrdom, being baptized with his own blood." (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adom., Usuard.; Prudent. Hymn. 4., Peristephan.; Greg. Turon., de Glor. Mart. cap. 68, 69; Ven. Fortunat. Misc. i. viii. c. 6; Euseb. Epres. Hom. 50, by some attributed to Hilary of Arles; concerning history of Genesius by St. Paulinus of Nola, see Hist. Lit. de la France, t. ii.; Till. Moen. v. 569.) On the point of martyrdom taking the place of baptism, compare the learned dissertation of Doddow (Dis. Cypr. xiii.).

[G. T. S.]

GENESIUS (3), bishop of Brixellum (Brescello). His date is uncertain, but he was anterior to Cyprianus, who was bishop c. 451. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 443.)

[R. S. G.]

GENESIUS (4), 5th bishop of Sisteron, between Avolus and Pologrorius or Polychronius. He subscribed the fourth council of Paris (A.D. 573), and the letter addressed by the assembled bishops to king Sigebert. (Mansi, ix. 868, 809; Gall. Christ. i. 476.)

[S. A. H.]

GENESIUS (5), second bishop of Montpellier, between Bocius and Gumblins. At the third council of Toledo (A.D. 509), he represented his predecessor, while still an archdeacon. In A.D. 597 he was present as bishop at another council of Toledo, and at the fourth of Toledo in A.D. 633, he was represented by his archdeacon Stephanus or Stephanus. (Mansi, ix. 1002; x. 473, 643; Gall. Christ. vi. 732.)

GENESIUS (6), St., 25th bishop of Clermont in Auvergne between Proculus and Gyroindo (A.D. 656-662). He is said to have been born of a family of senatorial rank belonging to Clermont. While archdeacon of the city he undertook the training of Praetextatus (St. Fritz), who was one of his successors in the episcopate. Nominated to the see upon the death of Proculus, he would only accept it after a general fast of three days had borne witness to the sincerity of the choice. In the fifth year of office, wearied of its pomps and dreading its temptations, he removed, secretly with his clerks, so as not to attach the garb of a pilgrim. His flock thrown into confusion by his disappearance, and ignorant whether he was alive or dead, sent a deputation to Rome to ask counsel. There their bishop was found, and with difficulty was persuaded to return. He died in the following year, after founding the monastery of Chantoin. He was buried in the church which he had built and dedicated to St. Symphorian, but which afterwards took his name. He also erected on his own land the monastery of Manlius or Grandilieu (Magniloence), and appointed Evodius director of it. His day of commemoration was June 3. (Vita S. Genesii, Vita S. Procogoti, Bull. d'Ann. 5th June 323, Jan. 639; Gall. Christ. ii. 245.)

[S. A. B.]

GENESIUS (7), St., thirty-eighth bishop of Lyons, succeeding St. Ambrose, and followed by Lantbertus. Before his elevation he was an abbot, according to Milhion not of Fontenelle, as some have supposed, but attached to the palace and camp of the king. (See the note to the Vita S. Amberti, Mabill. Acta SS., Ord. S. Bened. ii. 1053, Paris, 1608–1701.) He was, at all events, assiduous at court, and filled the post of chief almoner to St. Bathildis, the wife of Clovis. (Vita S. Bathildis, Mabill. ut supra, ii, 778-78.) The year of his consecration is not certain, but from a passage in the Life of St. Bertilla (Mabill. ut supra, sec. iii. pt. i, p. 24), where Genesius, described as magnum Sacerdos dominus, terms which seem to imply episcopal rank, was deputed by queen Bathildis to introduce Bertilla and her attendant nuns into the newly built religious house of Nola (Chelles), we may infer that it was before 659, probably to which date the monastery was completed. In 662 or 663 he subscribed the charter of Bertefredus of Amiens, for the monastery of Corbie (Migne, Patr. Lat. ixviii. 1181). A little later he incurred the resentment of Ebroin, the mayor of the palace, by assisting St. Leger, and an armed band was sent to Lyons to expel him. But the archbishop collected a force and successfully defended the city. (Vita S. Lodegarini, Mabill. ut supra, sec. ii. 886, 882.) In 666 he subscribed the charter of St. Drausius, bishop of Soissons, for the monastery of the Blessed Virgin, (Migne, Patr. Lat. ixviii. 1188.) The date of...
GENESIS

his death cannot be fixed with certainty, but he was still alive in 677 or 678, as is proved by a diploma of Theodoric III. (Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxvii. 1327), in which he is mentioned as one of the judges of Chraminus. Maibillon believes that he died in the latter of these two years. (See the note to the Vita S. Amberti, ut supra.) Nov. 1 is given for the day of his death, and is the day of his commemoration in the diocese of Lyons. St. Bathildis on her death-bed thought she saw her "faithful friend" in a choir of angels waiting to receive her soul. (Vita S. Amberti, xiv., Maibill. ut supra, p. 782.)

He was buried in the monastery of Kula. (Gall. Christ. iv. 47.)

[5. A. B.]

GENESIUS (3), bishop of Anastasiopolis, in Galatia Prima. He took part in the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680. (Mansi, ii. 220 a, 333 a, 628 c; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 496.)

[T. W. D.]

GENESIUS (9), count of Clermont in Auvergne. He is reckoned among the beatiﬁed, and the Bollandists (Acta SS. 5 June i. 504) devote to him a "Synopsis de cultu, actae, actis, e Scripturis Arvern."

and print the "Officium, ex Canonario Capituli Camerarius," but his personal acts are unknown beyond the legend in the office, which abounds with the miraculous. According to this, his father was Andustius and his mother Tranquilla. From youth his sanctity was attended by miracles, of which specimens are recorded. He built and liberally endowed five churches or religious houses in his castle of Cameraria, and was the special friend of St. Bonitus bishop of Clermont and of St. Meneleus abbott of the monastery of Menat near Clermont. He died on June 5, and was buried at Combronde, or Combronde, the Bollandists say, before A.D. 740.

[6. J. O.]

GENESIUS (10) (or perhaps GALADIUS), Sept. 29, martyr at Perinthus, with bishop Entychus or Entychius and two others. (Wright's Syrian Martyr. in Journ. Soc. Lit. 1860, 439.)

[9. T. S.]

GENETHLIUS (1), bishop of Carthage, between Restitutus and Aurelius, from A.D. 374 to 391, according to Morcelli, who calls him Geneclus. He presided over the synod of Carthage which sat in 386, 387, or 390 (Mansi, iii. 957; Hefele, Concilia, bk. iii. § 106, p. 390), and passed thirteen canons, which are extant, the first declaring the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity, while the others treat of discipline (cit. Hefele). Augustine says his memory was greatly revered by the Donatists on account of his conciliatory disposition, which would not allow the law against them to be put in force. (August. ep. 44, § 12; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. iii. 298.)

[C. H.]

GENETHLIUS (2), presbyter, a friend and correspondent of Basil, to whom he wrote a long letter exposing the treacheries of Eustathius of Sebaste, and the artifices by which he endeavored to bring Basil’s orthodoxy into discredit. (Basil, Epist. 224 [345].)

[6. V.]

GENETHLIUS (3), bishop of Arges at the synod held at Constantinople by Flavian, A.D. 448, when Entychus was condemned. (Mansi, vi. 752; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 183.)

GENETIUS or GENIUS, bishop of Tuy from about A.D. 670 to about 682. He subscribes the acts of C. Braga III., A.D. 675, as senior suffragan, immediately after the metropolitan Leodegarius. (Aguirre-Catalina, ii. 262; Esp. Sagra. xxii. 32.) [ANILA.]

GENEVEUS (GENEVAEUS), ST., 6th bishop of Dol in Brittany, succeeding Tiberienius, or, according to some, St. Budocus, and followed by Restitius, perhaps in the early part of the 7th century. He is said to have died on July 23, on which day he is commemorated, though the Bollandists admit him into their Acta with some doubt. (Acta SS. July 23; Gall. Chr. xiv. 1041.)

[5. A. B.]

GENEVIEVE. [GENOFEVA.]

GENGERBERT (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. No. 110), archbishop. [JAENERT.]

GENGULPHUS, ST. (GANGOLPUS, GENGOL), martyr, commemorated on May 11. He was a native of Varennes in Burgundy, where he was murdered, A.D. 760, at the instigation of his wife, by her paramour, for which reason he seems to have been elevated to the rank of martyrdom. He appears to have been a man of a rich and noble family. One of his ancestors, a certain Gengolphus, had been constituted "defensor" and "advocatus" of the neighbouring monastery of Besus by a letter of Clotaire king of the Franks dated Aug. 17, 686 (Chron. Tec. in D'Achere, Spicilegium. iv. 403, ed. 1729). [G. T. S.]

GENIALIS (1), named in the diptychs of the church of Cauvallon as first bishop of that see. His date is ﬁxed by the fact that his name appears in the recently discovered acts of the council of Nismes in 394. (Hefele, Concil. Geok. § 110; Gall. Christ. i. 940.) [R. T. S.]

GENIALIS (2), condemned with Jovinianus as sharing his heresy by pope Siricius, and by St. Ambrose and other bishops assembled at Milia A.D. 390 (Amb. Opp. iii. 1044). [J. L. D.]

GENISTAE. Justin Martyr (Tryph. 89), speaking of Jewish sects, mentions as two of them, the Genistae and Meristae. This notice was for a long time overlooked by writers on heresies, though they generally enumerate pre-Christian sects, and Philostratus in particular to lengthen his list of Jewish heresies. It is just possible that the writer of the Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 6) had the passage of Justin in his mind, and identiﬁed the Genistae with the Ebionites, whose notions were heretical concerning the birth of Christ; and the Meristae with the Essenites, who separated themselves from the rest of the people. But for a clear recognization of the passage we have come down to bisbor of Seville (Oreg. viii. 9) who explains that the Genitae were those who boasted of the pure race of Abraham, by mixture of Babylonish blood, and the Meristae those who separated the Scriptures, denying the divine inspiration of certain prophecies. This is obviously mere guess-work, but no subsequent conjectures can be pronounced to be clearly more fortunate. We do not get as much help as might be expected from a comparison with Hegesippus (Luseb. H. E. iv. 21), who speaks of the seven sects of the Jews; and Justin, without calling attention to the number, enumerates exactly seven. Common to both lists are the Sadducees, Pharisees, Galileans, and Baptists or Hesperbaptists; while against the Hellenists, Genitae, and Meristae of Justin, we have to set the Samaritans, Masbothaeans, and Essenes of Hegesippus. There is an enumeration of Jewish sects in the Clementine Recognitions (i. 54), but no trace there of reference to the passage in Justin. It is possible that the Genitae of Justin may be the same as the people whom Thedorett calls Kaiaour and Cem. Alex. Kaiaour; but if so, we lose the explanation Caiusse for the word without gaining any light on the meaning of the first.

[G. S.]

GENIUS, bishop of Aisch. [EONUS.]

GENIUS (HYGINUS)—May 3, martyr at Lectura (Leuctura), an episcopal city in Aquitaine. He was famous as a Christian teacher, and it is said he had converted thirty soldiers who were sent to arrest him during the Diocletian persecution. They failed to execute their orders, all were put to death. He died in a cave, where he had sought refuge. His acts are very legendary. (Ferrarius, Cat. Ss.; Acta SS. Bull. Mai. i. 384-393. His life is to be found in Labbe, Nov. Bibl. MSS. lib. in Coll. litter. Apul. p. 504, Paris, 1657.) [G. T. S.]

GENNIADIUS (1), bishop of Eibus (Ibiobon) in Murs, present at the council of Nicaea, a.D. 325; (Mansi, ii. 1094; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 863.)

[J. de S.]

GENNIADIUS (2), bishop of Membosa or Membrasa, a town of proconsular Africa, 350 miles from Carthage, 35 miles from Mesti (Medjaz el Bibb). (Ant. His. 45, 3; Procop. Bell. Vand. ii. 15.) He was present at Carth. Conf. a.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 133.) [H. W. P.]

GENNIADIUS (3), a physician of Carthage, who had also practised at Rome, a friend both of Evodius and St. Augustine. In one of Augustine’s letters to Evodius, Gennadius is mentioned as having at one time doubted the reality of life after death. His doubts were removed by a vision which convinced him that the power of mental and spiritual sight is independent of the body. (Aug. Ep. 159.) [H. W. P.]

GENNIADIUS (4), presbyter and archimandrite, addressed by Cyril of Alexandria. Gennadius had broken off communion with Proclus the patriarch of Constantinople, being scandalized at his liberality in consenting to communicate with Juvenal of Jerusalem. Cyril commends Gennadius for his zeal, and expresses strong disapproval of Juvenal; but at the same time he justifies Proclus under the circumstances, and says that he should himself have acted in the same way. (Cyril. Alex. ep. 56 al. 48; in Pat. Gr. ixvii. 319; Tillem. Mon. xxv. 208.)

GENNIADIUS (5), bishop of Hermopolis Magna in the Thebaid, present at the Ephesine Latrocinium, a.D. 449. (Mansi, vi. 927; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 593.)

[J. de S.]

GENNIADIUS (6), bishop of Teos, present at the Latrocinium Ephesinum, a.D. 449 (Mansi, vi. 932). But he also, though absent, assented to the council of Chalcedon in 451, and his name was subscribed by the order of Stephen, metropolitan bishop of Ephesus. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 728.)

[Le D.]

GENNIADIUS (7), a praepocus Augustalis in the Eastern empire, a.D. 396, in which year there was addressed to him a constitution of the emperor Arcadius, dated from the Eutychian, and his official residence at Diocletianopolis (Procli. Genn. xiv. xcvii. u. 96; Gothofred). Gennadius was still Augustalis when the Libyans invaded the Pentapolis (Synesius, Catastasi in Migne, Patrolog. Gr. lvii. 1563). At some date he also filled the office of proconsul of Achaia (Claudian. Ep. 5). Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, the metropolis of the Pentapolis, c. a.D. 407-415, tells that he was a Syrian, and speaks of him in terms of great praise. (Ep. 73, in Migne, u. s. 1439.)

[TH. D.]

GENNIADIUS (8), the name of two Phrygian bishops, viz. of Moysana and of Acoannes, present at the council of Chalcedon, a.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 159; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 817, 823.)

[L. D.]

GENNIADIUS (9), bishop of Gusatus in Crete, was present at the council of Chalcedon, a.D. 451 (Mansi, vii. 161), and subscribed the synodal epistle of the Cretan bishops to the emperor Leo, a.D. 458. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 267.)

[J. de S.]

GENNIADIUS (10), 21st bishop of Constantinople, 438-471, between Anatolius and Aemilianus. His first public appearance was in an attack on Cyril, in two works, 431 or 432, Against the Anathemas of Cyril, and Two Books to Ptolemaus. In the latter he exclaims, "How many times have I heard blasphemies from Cyril of Egypt? Woe to the scourge of Alexandrinus!" "Can we sufficiently deplore the corruptions of which he has been and is the author? There are no blasphemies which he does not vomit against the holy fathers, against the apostles, against Jesus Christ Himself. He destroys the humanity which the Word took of us and for us; he makes that nature suffer which is incapable of suffering." In spite of these heathen censures, it seems probable that in 433 Gennadius was one of those who became reconciled with Cyril, and he may have been the presbyter and abbot who in 444 received Cyril's approbation for making a difficulty about communicating with Proclus. [GENNIADIUS (A).]

At any rate, in 458, he was a presbyter at Constantinople, and designated by Leo to fill the see. The emperor was determined to find a man of spotless reputation, on whom no suspicion had ever breathed, of holy life and conspicuous learning, and such was Gennadius. It was not a unanimous election; for Anian influences were at work, and Anicius, who was destined to occupy the chair thirteen years later, already received some votes. From the beginning of his episcopate Gennadius gave the orthodox satisfactory proofs of zeal for the Catholic faith and the maintenance of discipline. All the time of his tenure of his great office, an office greater than ever since the policy of his predecessor, occur measures for the good of the body ecclesiastical, in which the emperor is associated with the patriarch, and which the patriarch no doubt planned. His discretion was before long tested. Timothy Aelurus, chased from the see of Alexandria by order of the emperor, had obtained, through the canvassing of certain enemies of orthodoxy, leave to come to Constantinople, intending, by a pretence of Catholicism, to re-establish himself on his throne. Gennadius thought it best to consult the experience of the greatest of contemporary ecclesiastics, Stesicorus, bishop of Rome. Leo replied on June 17, 460, urging him to do his utmost to prevent the bad effects to be expected from the voyage of Timothy, and to labour for the immediate consecration of an orthodox prelate for Alexandria. The plan succeeded as Leo desired; Timothy Aelurus was banished to the Chersonese, and Timothy Sophianus was chosen for Alexandria in his stead. An appointment which Gennadius made about this time, that of Marcian, who had been a Novatian but had come over to the orthodox church, to the important and influence post of chancellor of the goods of the church of Constantinople, shewed at once his liberality of spirit, and desire for order. The two Egyptian solitaries who described Gennadius to Moschus, as mentioned below, communicated a story which is also told by Theodorus Lector. The church of St. Eleu-therius at Constantinople was served by a reader named Carius. He led a disorderly life and Gennadius gave him a severe reprimand. It was useless. According to the rules of the church, the patriarch had him flogged. The flogging was also ineffectual. The patriarch sent one of his officers to the church of St. Eleutherus to beg that holy martyr either to correct the evil servant of his church or to take him from the world. Next day, says the story, Carius was found dead, to the terror of the whole town. Theodorus also relates how a painter, who had the presumption to depict the Saviour under the form of Jupiter and had his hand withered, was healed by the prayers of Gennadius.

It is related in the life of Daniel the Stylite, that Gennadius ordained that saint presbyter at the request of the emperor Leo, standing at the foot of the Phareos and performing the ceremonies there, because Daniel, who knew what was intended, did not wish his bishop to mount his retreat. "I should have come before," said the prelate, according to that account, "if I had not been prevented by business." You would never come at all," replied the enthusiastic presbyter brusquely, "unless you had been sent." The buying and selling of holy orders was one of the crying scandals of the age. Measures had been taken against simony by the Council of Chalcedon. In 459 or 460, Gennadius, finding that the evil practice had not at all abated, held a council at Constantinople to consider it. An encyclical was issued, adding anathema to the former sentence. The synodal was sent to the bishop of Rome, and to the metropolitans of the East, with a request that it should be published in their provinces and strictly carried out.

In 459 Martyrius had been raised to the see of Antioch, but was driven out by Peter the Fuller, who, by the help of the emperor's brother-in-law, seized his place. Gennadius, by his entreaties with the emperor, obtained the restoration of the extruded patriarch. Peter the Fuller a second time seized the archbishopric. The patriarch of the East again appealed to the emperor, and Julian was made orthodox successor to Martyrius.

Towards the end of his life Gennadius is said to have been praying one night before an altar, when suddenly he saw a spectre of a demon. The demon declared that he yielded during the life of Gennadius, but that after his death he would cause manyills to the church, and would reduce it to his obedience. This story may have arisen from Gennadius foreseeing that Anicius would succeed him, and from the alarm which he must constantly have felt at the disorders of the church, with which even his high courage and resolution could not cope. He prayed to God to overawe such a monster; but the anxiety which he felt hastened his end. He died in 471, about August 25. That is his day in the Greek calendar.

Gennadius stands out as an able and successful administrator, about whom no historian has had anything to speak but praise, if we except the petrarchism which was the result of his desire for order. The two Egyptian solitaries who described Gennadius to Moschus, as mentioned below, communicated a story which is also told by Theodorus Lector. He led a disorderly life and Gennadius gave him a severe reprimand. It was useless. According to the rules of the church, the patriarch had him flogged. The flogging was also ineffectual. The patriarch sent one of his officers to the church of St. Eleutherus to beg that holy martyr either to correct the evil servant of his church or to take him from the world. Next day, says the story, Carius was found dead, to the terror of the whole town. Theodorus also relates how a painter, who had the presumption to depict the Saviour under the form of Jupiter and had his hand withered, was healed by the prayers of Gennadius.

GENNADIUS—PREBYSUTER

[W. M. S.]

GENNADIUS (11) MASSILIENSIS, prebyster of Marseilles.

Authoritas.—His statement regarding himself, and his treatise De Viris Illuminibus, together with the inferences deduced from this, and his only remaining extant work, the short Epistola de Fide med, which is more commonly known by the title Libelli de Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus. (Concerning editions, see below.)

Life. — The existence of Gennadius must have been wholly comprised within the 5th century of the Christian era, inasmuch as he died in A.D. 496. Of the date of his birth and of his ordination to the priesthood we are ignorant. But in the De Viris Illuminibus we learn from himself, through the notice above-mentioned, that he was a prebyster of Marseilles, that in addition to the above-named tracts he wrote a work in eight books against all heresies, another in six against Nestorius, and tracts on the Millennium and the Apocalypse (de Mille Annis et de Apocalypsi Beatit Ioannis). The epistle he sent to pope Gelasius (epistolam de fide mei misi ad beatam Gelasiam, urbis Romae episcopum) is this. This is the last extant work of the Roman see lastfed only four years, namely, from A.D. 492 to 496.

Writings. — It is unfortunate that our estimate of one of the two extant works of Gennadius is rendered difficult by some doubts concerning the correctness of our present copies. If we accept the De Viris Illuminibus as it is commonly published, then the brief notices concerning St. Augustine, St. Prosper, and Faustus the Breton [Prosper, Faustus Rhenensis], warrant us in classing Gennadius of Marseilles with the semi-Pelagians [Semi-Pelagians], inasmuch as he ceases Augustine and Prosper, and praises Faustus. Moreover, the short account of St. Jerome at the commencement of the book, a very tardatory one, seems inconsistent with the hostile reference to Jerome contained under the article Rufinus in the same catalogue.

The most obsessional passages of a semi-Pelagian character are said to be altogether omitted in the two extant copies of this work. In the Loci Locantes and the Verona, and in a MS. preserved at Corbie in France. (Ramsay's art. "Gennadius" in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Bks, compared with Mabillon Vetusta Annae, ed. Paris, 1723.) This is no doubt an important fact. But it must be borne in mind that it is not certain that these MSS.

were in reality the earliest, and that it is by no means impossible that a copyist, especially in Italy, might omit them as unsuited to the theological atmosphere of his own age and country. The existence of a semi-Pelagian school in the southern Gaul of the fifth and sixth centuries—a school embracing among its more or less pronounced adherents many justly honoured names—is a plain matter of unquestioned history, and it is highly probable that Gennadius belonged to it. To the present writer the passages in question do not look like forgery: they cohere with the context; and Mabillon (I.c.), though leaving the question open for further investigation, does not venture to condemn them.

The account of Jerome given by Gennadius stands on a different footing. The absence of any such notice would not be remarkable because the De Viris Illuminibus (otherwise Cataloga Scriptor. Ecod.) of Jerome, of which the work of Gennadius is at once an imitation and a continuation, ends with a notice of Jerome given by himself. Besides the divergence from the art. "Rufinus" already noticed, the style seems more rhetorical, and the tone more enthusiastic than is common with Gennadius. If it be accepted as a genuine notice by Gennadius, we may add to his list of extant works a longer biography of St. Jerome, occupying nearly three folio pages, and given by Mabillon (I.c.), who seems to incline towards accepting it. The tones of the longer and the shorter notices are concordant, and both are in the singular expression italicized in the following extract from the shorter one: "Ad Bethlehem oppidum juvenis [Hieronymus, &c.] advenit, ubi prudens animal ad praesepe Domini se obtulit permanseram. But the name of Jerome is so completely what an Italian poet has termed that such an addition as the prefix of the short notice is a probable one, and the genuineness of the longer life must seemingly stand or fall with it. On some evidence as lies before him the present writer would reject them both.

"Nomen d'immensa invicta, "

E d'Indomato amor,

Taking then the De Viris Illuminibus in its most commonly accepted form (which agrees with the above decision), it may be remarked, that it was probably published about A.D. 495, and that it contains, in some ten folio pages, a century of short biographies of ecclesiastics between A.D. 392 and 495. Although lacking the lively touches, so frequent in the similar work of his great predecessor, the catalogue of Gennadius exhibits a real sense of proportion. The greater men stand out in its pages, and it conveys much real and valuable information. With due allowance for the bias referred to, it may be regarded as a trustworthy compilation, for which our gratitude is due.

The other treatise, variously entitled, as has been remarked, Epistola de Fide med, or de Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus Liber, begins with a sketch of the profession and doctrines of those retaines in the three creeds retained in the Prayer Book of the English Church, interwoven with the names of those who are considered by the writer (with occasionally questionable accuracy) to have impugned this or that article of belief. A few lines will illustrate this feature:

"Nihil creatum
GENNADIUS—PRESBYTER

ant servilus in Triallate cedendum, ut vult Dio-nysi, fons Arii; nihil inaequale, ut Eunomius; nihil inaequale gratiae, ut vult Aetius: nihil anterius posteriorius aut minus, ut Aris; nihil ex-traneum aut officiale alteri, ut Macedonius (cap. 4)." Gennadius considers (as later writers, e.g. Aquinas) that all men, even those alive at the second Advent, will have to die (7). But this conviction, though derived from a widespread patristic tradition (maximam Patrum turba tradente) is, he admits, rejected by others equally catholic and learned. Of the theories concerning the soul of man subsequently known respectively as the creativist and the traducianist views, he espouses the creativitist side. He will not allow the existence of the spirit as a third element in man besides the body and the soul, but looks upon it as only another name for the soul (19). Heretical baptism is not to be repeated, unless where it has been administered by heretics, who would have declined to employ the invocation of the Holy Trinity (52). He recommends weekly recitation of the Eastern liturgy by all, who are not under the burden of mortal sin. Such as are should have recourse to public penance. He will not deny that private penance may suffice; but even here outward manifestation, such as change of dress, is desirable. Daily reception of holy communion he will neither promote nor blame (55).

Evil was invented by Satan (57). Though celibacy be rated above matrimony, to condemn marriage is Manichaeans (67). A Christian who has been twice married should not be ordained (72). Churches should be called after the martyrs, and the relics of martyrs honoured (73). He does not believe that any but the baptized attain eternal life; not even catechumens, unless they suffer martyrdom (74). Penitence thoroughly avails to Christians even at their latest breath (80). The Creator alone knows our secret thoughts. Satan can learn them only by our movements and manifestations (81). Marvels may be wrought in the Lord, but those evil by bad form the year (84). Men can become holy without such marks (85).

The assertion of the freedom of man's will is strongly asserted in this short treatise. But the commencement of all goodness is assigned to divine grace. The language of Gennadius is here not quite Augustinian; but neither is it Pelsgian, or the work would not have been so long included among those of St. Augustine.

Editions.—The two treatises of Gennadius are easy of access; the De Viris Illustratis is given in most good editions of the works of St. Jerome (as e.g. Vallarsi's, the Benedictine, or that of Victorius, Paris, 1759); and the Liber de Eccelestissis Doctissimis is to be found in the Appendix to Green's Benedictine edition of St. Augustine (p. 75). The former treatise has also been published in company with the similar catalogues by Isodore of Seville and Honorius, as well as Jerome's, by Sulphridus, 8vo. Coloni, 1530; with notes by Miraens, Antwerpiae, 1632, and with notes by Miraens and E. S. Cyprianos, 4to. Helmstadii, 1700, and by F. Exce., in the Juxta Elenchus Hauni, 1718.

The date of the publication of the De Viris Illustratis is, as has been said, about A.D. 495. The De Ecceles. Doctissimis is evidently, from Gennadius's own statement, an earlier work. This limits it to a period between A.D. 492-494, as otherwise it could not have been sent to Gelasius. [J. G. C.]

GENNADIUS (18), bishop of Hermopolis Parva (Demahur) in Egypt. He was the last of the orthodox bishops, and was related to Timotheus of Alexandria (Liberatis, Breviarium, cap. xvii. in Patrol. Lat. Ixivii. 1022). The same writer mentions that Gennadius was sent by Timotheus to the emperor Zeno, c. A.D. 484, and remained some time at Constantinople. (Bod. cap. xvi.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 516.) [J. de S.]

GENNADIUS (18), bishop of Zenopolis, is Pamphylia, present at the fifth general council, 553 (Manasi, ix. 393). As there is another town of this name in Lycia, writers have supposed two bishops of the name of Gennadius. (Gans, Series Episc. 450, 451; Le Quien, Orient. Chur. i. 993, 1038.) [J. D.]

GENNADIUS, third abbot of St. Germer de Flais in the diocese of Beauvais (Gaz- marius). He was previously vice-domini of the church of Rouen and was succeeded, perhaps in 715, by hiskinsman St. Benignus abbot of Fontanelle. (Gall. Chr. ix. 789.) [C. H.]

GENOCUS, friend of St. Finnian of Clonard, and probably the name as Megenog, bishop of Gill-dumhaha-glaimin. [Mogenou.] (Colgan, Acta SS. 196 b, 394, c. 11, 398, n. 11.) [J. G.]

GENOVEFA (Genevieve), patron saint of Paris and of France. The story of her life, as derived from the most ancient records, is as follows: About the year 430 St. Germans of Auxerre and St. Lupus of Troyes, being on their way to England to combat the Pelagian heresy, stayed one evening at Nantere, then a village, about seven miles from Paris. The villagers assembled to see two prelates of such renown, and a little girl in the crowd attracted the notice of St. Germans. Calling to her, he asked the bystanders who she was, and learnt that her name was Genovefa, that she was seven years of age, and her parents' names were Severus and Gerontia. The parents were summoned to his desire, and in the spirit of prophecy he bade them rejoice in the sanctity of their daughter, for that she would be the means of saving many. Then addressing himself to the child, he dwelt on the high state of virginity, and engaged her to consecrate herself. The bishops then held a service in the church, and at nightfall bade Severus bring his daughter again at early dawn. Before departing St. Germans reminded her of her promise, and giving her a brazen coin marked with the cross, bade her wear it as her only ornament, and leave gold and precious stones for the servants of the world. Henceforth miracles marked her out as the spouse of Christ. Her mother was struck blind for a thoughtless blow, and only healed by the girl's supernatural gift.

Brought to the archbishop of Paris, generally supposed to have been Felix, to be formally consecrated as a virgin, he recognised her sanctity, and preferred her over the two older girls who accompanied her. In course of time her parents died, and Genovefa was taken by her grandmother to live in Paris. Here she fell ill, and lay three days in a trance, in which an angel led her to see the dwellings of the just, and the rewards prepared for those who love God. She received, too, the gift of declaring men's thoughts. Through these privileges displeased the envious, and people were beginning to murmur against her, when St. Germanus arrived in Paris on a second journey to Britain. Of the people who came to meet him he asked tidings of St. Genovefa, and was met with the murmurs of her detractors. Disregarding their tales, he sought her dwelling, humbly saluted her and showed the people the floor of her chamber wet with her secret tears, and, before departing, commended her to their love. But a fresh source of persecution soon arose. The rumour of Attila's merciless and irresistible progress reached Paris, and the terrified citizens were fleeing with their families and goods. But Genovefa, prophesying that Paris would remain unharmed, and that those places they deemed safe would be ravaged, assembled the matrons and bade them seek deliverance by prayer and fasting rather than by flight. Then the Parisians relied entirely on her, and all the people took counsel to kill her. But at this time there arrived in Paris an archdeacon bearing from St. Germanus the gift of some eulogiae or eucharistic leaves (vid. Dict. Ch. Antiq.) for Genovefa. He addressed the people, declaring the testimony of his bishop, and dissuaded them from their purpose. Nor did the Huns reach Paris, but were diverted through the efficacy of her prayers, as after ages believed (civ. 448).

The accounts we have of her do not enable a connected history to be given of her life. In fact, they are little besides a string of miracles. Nenu, Arcis-sur-Aube, Troyes, Orleans, Tours, the three last are said to have been given by St. Laun, besides Paris, all witnessed the usual commonplace miracles of the age. Childeric, the father of Clovis, having sentenced some prisoners to death, leaves Paris to escape her importunate entreaties for their release. The gates behind him by his order are locked, but fly open at the approach of Genovefa. The same thing happens to the doors of the baptistery of a church at Nenu when she and St. Ciluin, who had resolved to become a nun, were seeking sanctuary from the latter's disappointed lover. To her wonder-working powers, no less than to her zeal, was due the building at Paris of what was in its beginning a humble chapel (vilea mediocria, Geeta Duaperi, i.3; Bouquet, ii. 580) in honour of St. Denis and his companions, whom she held in especial reverence.

But her abstinance and self-inflicted privations are perhaps her greatest characteristic. From her fifteenth to her fiftieth year she ate twice a week, and then only of barley or beans. Wine and strong drink were unknown to her. After her fiftieth year, by command of her bishop, she added a little fish and milk to her bread. Every Saturday night she kept a vigil in her church of St. Denis, and from the Feast of Epiphany till Easter she remained immured in her cell. Such was her fame that it came by means of travellers and merchants to Simeon Stylites, on his pillar in Syria, who sent his greetings to her, and asked for her prayers.

Before her death Clovis, of whose conversion a later legend has made her the joint author with Clotilde, began to build for her the church which later bore her name. Unfinished at his death, it was completed by Clotilde, and dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. Upon Genovefa's death (Jan. 3, A.D. 512) she was buried in it.

The chief authority for the history of St. Genovefa is an anonymous Life, the author of which asserts that he wrote eighteen years after her death, therefore, about A.D. 530. It was first published by Jean Ravis, of Nevers, in his Des Femmes Illustres, Paris, 1591, and then by Suris, with corrections in the style (Jan. 3), again, by the Bollandists, in 1643, from better MSS., together with another life differing from the former only in unimportant particulars (Acta SS.). The two lives are in considerable divergence of opinion as to the authority to be attached to this life. The authors of the Hist. Litt. de la France (iii. 151) believe in its authenticity, and characterize the author as grave, judicious, full of piety and learned for his age. On the other hand, it has been assailed by Heitmuller, and his successor, St. Genovefa worthy of credence (see Saintyves, Vie de Ste. Geneviève, p. 12, and cf. Valesiana, pp. 43-45, Paris, 1694). If we compare the life of St. Germanus of Auxerre by Constantinus (c. 5, Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 211) with that part of St. Genovefa's which relates to him, we can hardly doubt that they have a common source, or that one of them is taken from the other, with slight alterations. And that episode being subtracted, there is nothing in the remainder which might not well be the work of a later age. It seems clear that the history must be accepted with great doubt. There is no foundation for the story of the woman who was placarded with Genesius, a priest, whose name occurs in the narrative. The life of St. Lupus (c. 2, Acta SS. Jul. vii. 74) has a mere allusion to the history of Genovefa. Immemorial lives of St. Genovefa have appeared in France in modern times, some of which are referred to below, but they are for the most part of a devotional character, and useless for critical or historical purposes.

A noticeable feature in the legend which has grown up round the name of St. Genovefa, and in which it differs from the original sources, is the prominence which it gives to the supposed humility of her birth and condition. The peasant girl of Nantes, feeding her father's sheep, has been the favourite conception of her in sacred art, and the Clois and Parc de Ste. Geneviève are still pointed out near Paris as the scene of her occupation. This is remarkable, as beyond the fact that her parents dwelt in a village, there is no evidence of her birth being humble, whether the other incident of her baptism (Valesiana ut sup.), and the practice of the Catholic church in the treatment of its heroines has certainly not erred in this direction. Nor does it appear that she has ever been considered in any special way the guardian saint of the poor.
GENOVEFA

The posthumous history of St. Genovefa was more eventful than her life. Though Bede's in his first Martyrology in which her name appears, her cult seems to have commenced in very early times (cf. Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. s.c.), and to have extended from Paris through France generally. Hers was one of the shrines which, in 696, a synodical council of Paris and of Reruno lowered the rank of its own and of Vienne (Vita S. Eliguais, i. 32, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 504), and her tomb became as celebrated for miracles as she herself had been when alive. In the 9th century her body had to be removed from its resting-place no less than three times to preserve it from the ruin which overtook the church and monastery at the hands of the Northmen. Twice it was carried to a distance from Paris (845 and 856), and the third time (885) within the city walls, where her coffin, carried in solemn procession to the point where the assault was fiercest, brought victory to the Parisians (Abbo, de Bello Parisiaco, lib. ii.; Migne, Patr. Lat. 744). The flight and restoration were on each occasion attended by numerous miracles (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 149, seq.). It was not till 890 or 891 that she, St. Germanus and St. Maclovius were finally restored to their own churches. In 1130, though some place it earlier, occurred the famous miracle of the Germanus Church by order of Pope Innocent II. Paris was devastated by a plague called the ignis sacer, against which all human remedies proved futile. At last the coffin of St. Genovefa was carried in solemn procession and elevated in her church. All who pressed near it were healed, except three, who were in the church and remained unbelievers. Henceforth, the solemn carrying in procession of St. Genovefa was the favourite remedy for every public calamity, such as floods, famine, pestilence, or even unseasonable weather. In 1161 the coffin was solemnly opened in the presence of the archbishop of Sens and two other prelates, in consequence of a rumour that the body was not that of St. Genovefa. The vaults of the church were dismantled, and the coffin of Pope Innocent II. was found secure (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 152). In 1177 the abbey, which had never been completely restored since the ravages of the Northmen three centuries before, was entirely rebuilt by Stephen, the abbot of that time (Epist. 147, 148, 153; Migne, Patr. Lat. ccxi. 434, 485, 488). In 1242 the wooden coffin, in which the remains had hitherto been enclosed, was exchanged for one of gold, silver and precious stones. From 1565 to 1604 the precious relics had to be concealed on account of the civil wars. In 1757 was commenced the present church from the designs of Soufflot to commemorate the recovery of Louis XV. from illness. Thirty years. Reprin

GENSERIC

GENSERIC, king of the Vandals, the illegitimate son of Godigisus, king of the Vandals, reigned for some time in Spain jointly with his legitimate brother Gunicer. [GUNICER.] On the death of the latter, a.d. 428, he succeeded to the undivided sovereignty. He is said to have been originally a Catholic, but early in life embraced the Arian heresy. Before the death of Gunicer, count Benisac, who through the influence of his rival Atius had been forced to seek safety in revolt, but invited the Vandals to invade Africa. This invitation was readily accepted by Genseric, who assembled the Vandals with their families at the Straits of Gibraltar. On hearing, however, that Hermigarius, king of the Suevi, had ventured to enter the province of Carthage, he turned upon the invaders, drove them with their king into the Guadiana, and then in May, a.d. 429, according to Ipatius (in a.d. 427 according to Prosper), crossed into Africa. His host numbered 50,000 warriors, and poured like a torrent over the fertile and defenceless province. At Carthage, and Mactar, the African and the Vandal, met and cast their uncovenanted matches against each other. Neither age nor sex proved any protection against the violence of the Vandals. Hippo was besieged, but through the efforts of Count Boniface, who had discovered the stratagem of Atius, and had returned to his allegiance, supported by an army of allied Goths, the Vandals were obliged to starve, after a siege of fourteen months to abandon the attempt. St. Augustine died in August, a.d. 450, in the third month of the siege. (Possidius, Life of St. Augustine in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxii. 59.) Soon afterwards Boniface, who had received reinforcements from Rome and Constantinople under Aspar, the magister militum, ventured to give battle to the Vandals, but after a hotly contested engagement the Vandals gave way with great loss. He then abandoned Africa and returned to Italy. Genseric, however, who apprehended another expedition of the united forces of the Eastern and Western empires, was not unduly elated by his success, but concluded at Hippo, on February 10, a.d. 455, a peace with Valentinian, by which he undertook to pay a tribute for the territories he had conquered, and to leave unmolested those still held by Valentinian, and sent his son Huneric as a hostage. In a.d. 437, Genseric began to persecute the Catholic bishops in the ceded territories, of whom Possidius Novatus, and Severianus were the most illustrious, and not only took their churches from them, but banished them from their sees. At the same time, four Spaniards, Arenilus, Yrbusus, Pschasius, and Eutychius, who were faithful servants of Generisic, but who refused at his command to embrace Arianism, were tortured and put to death. Paulillus, a younger brother of Pschasius and Eutychius, was cruelly scourged and reduced to slavery.
Generisic, after procuring the restoration of his son, took Carthage by surprise, Oct. 19, A.D. 439.
The bishops and noble laity were stripped of their possessions and offered the alternative of slavery or exile. Quodvultdeus, the bishop of Carthage, with a number of his clergy were compelled to embark in unseaworthy ships, in which, however, they reached Naples in safety.
All the churches within the walls of Carthage were taken from the Catholics, and handed over to the Arians, and many of those outside, especially two dedicated to St. Cyprian, shared the same fate. It should, however, be recollected that the Arians in this were only meting out to the Catholics the treatment they received in towns where the latter party was the stronger.

[CHERUSSON, p. 524; AMBROSIUS, p. 95.]
Generisic ordered the funeral processions of the Catholics to be conducted in silence, and sent the remaining portion of the clergy into exile. Some of the most distinguished of the clergy and laity of the provinces divided among the Vandals, ventured to present themselves before the king with a petition to be allowed for the consolation of their people to live in peace under the dominion of the Vandals. He replied, "I have resolved to let none of your race and name escape. How then do you dare to make such a demand?" and he was with difficulty restrained by the entreaties of his attendants from drowning the petitioners in the adjoining sea.
The Catholics, deprived of their churches, were obliged to celebrate the divine mysteries where and as best they could.

The year after the capture of Carthage, Generisic sent another and a third invasion into Sicily, and besieged Palermo. At the instigation of Maximus, the leader of the Arians in the island, he persecuted the Catholics there, some of whom suffered martyrdom at his hands.
According to Prosper, he was recalled from Sicily by news of the arrival in Africa of count Sebastian, the son-in-law of count Boniface, but Idatius places his arrival ten years later.
Sebastian, however, had come as a friend to take refuge at his court, but Generisic, who feared his renown as a statesman and general, at first tried to convert him to Arianism, that his refusal might supply a pretext for putting him to death.
Sebastian evaded his demands by a dexterous reply, which Generisic was unable to answer, but some other excuse for his execution was shortly afterwards found.

In A.D. 441, Generisic was attacked by a great fleet and army sent by Theodosius under the command of Areobindus, Anaxilus, and Germanus, who, in the invasion, proved rather a burden to the island than a defence to Africa. They were recalled the next year to defend Thrace and Illyricum against an invasion of the Huns.

The same year a new peace was concluded by which Valentinian retained the three Mauritanias and part of Numidia, and ceded the remaining part of his African dominions to Generisic, who divided the Zenatinae or provincular province, in which Carthage was situated, among the Vandals and kept all in possession.
The noblest and wealthiest of the natives were reduced to slavery, and handed over with all their property to the king's sons Hunneric and Genzo. While the Vandals, who were in possession of all the richest lands, were exempted from all imposts or taxation on the inferior lands, which the former owners had been allowed to keep, was so crushing that the unfortunate natives were left totally stitute, and many of them suffered death for trying to evade the demands of the tax-gatherers by concealing their money. To guard against another invasion or a revolt of his subjects, Generisic dismantled all the towns except Carthage, to prevent the invaders or rebels from finding any fortified post they might use as a basis of operations. About this time Generisic discovered a plot among his nobles against himself, and the massacre of the most conspicuous members of it. Probably from alarm at this conspiracy, he began a new and severer persecution. The Catholics were allowed no place for prayer or the ministration of the sacraments. Every allusion in a sermon to Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, or Holofernes was regarded as aimed at the king, and the preacher was forthwith punished with exile.
Among the bishops banished at this time, Victor mention, Urbanus of Girba, Crescius, a metaropolitans who resided over 120 bishops, Habeldeus of Teudela, Eustratius of Sufuctum, two of the provinces of Tripoli, and Felix of Adrumetum.
The last was banished for receiving a foreign monk. Generisic prohibited new bishops being consecrated to fill the places of those banished.
In A.D. 454, however, he yielded to Valentinian's requests, so far as to allow Deogratias to be consecrated bishop of Carthage. The see had remained vacant since the banishment of Quodvlutdeus fifteen years before. In A.D. 455, Generisic, Generisic, in league with the son of Eudoxia, sailed to Italy, and took Rome without a blow. At the intercession of Leo the Great, he abated from torturing or massacring the inhabitants, and burning the city, but gave it up to a systematic plunder. For fourteen days and nights the work of pillage continued, the city was sacked of all its remaining treasures, and Generisic then returned unmole-to Africa, laden with booty and carrying with him many thousand captives, among whom was the empress Eudoxia and her two daughters.
The eldest became the wife of his son Hunneric;
the youngest, with her mother, was eventually surrendered to the emperor Leo. The most remarkeable objects among the spoils were the vessels of the temple and the gild bronze tiles that formed the roof of the Capitol. The sufferings of the prisoners were alleviated by the charity of Deogratias. [DEOGRATIAS.] After the death of Valentinian, the whole of Africa fell into the hands of Generisic, and also Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, and the Balearic Islands.
His fleets year after year sailed from Carthage in the early spring, and ravaged all the coasts of the Mediterranean. As he was leaving Carthage on one of these expeditions, the helmsman asked him whether he ordered him to steer. "Against those," he replied, "who have incurred the wrath of God." In these expeditions his object was not only to plunder, but to persecute. Spain, Italy, Dalmatia, Campania, Calabria, Apulia, Bruttium, Venetia, Lucania, Epirus, and the Peloponnesse, all suffered from his ravages. The Vandals were not, however, always invincible. In A.D. 458, their fleet of sixty ships was defeated by galleys of Roman workmanship, and the Vandal fleet was driven back to the Gulf of Genoa, according to Idiatus, but according to Sidonius (301 in Migne, Patr. Lat. VIII. 653) off Agrigentum. After the death of Deogratias, A.D. 457, Genseric did not allow any more bishops to be consecrated in the proconsular province, the peculiar domain of the Vandals, so that of the original number of 164 only three were left in Victor's time. One Proculeus was sent to compel the bishops to give up all their books and the sacramental vessels. When this was refused, Proculeus and his escort seized them by force, and made the very altar cloths into shirts for themselves. St. Valerian, bishop of Abbena, was expelled from his see. No one was allowed to receive him into his house, or even to permit him to remain on their land, and he was long obliged to lie by the roadside in the open air. At Regin the Catholics had ventured at Easter to take possession of their church. The Arians, headed by a priest named Adduit, attacked the church, part of them forcing an entrance with drawn swords, and part entering through the windows. The reader was killed by an arrow in the pulpit, and many of the congregation were slain on the altar-steps. Most of the survivors were afterwards executed by Genseric's orders. Genseric, by the advice of the Arián bishops, commanded all who held office about his court to enunciate Arian dogmas. According to Vitae ecclesiasticæ, when Amognat, one of the number, refused, he was tightly bound with cords, but they broke like a spider's web; and when he was hung head downwards by one foot, he seemed to sleep as peacefully as if he were in bed. His persecutors finding themselves unable to overcome his resolution, were about to kill him; but, say the chroniclers, as he was about to die, they would then have been reverenced as a martyr. He was accordingly compelled to labour in the fields and afterwards to tend cattle near Carthage.

Meanwhile the Romans refused to give up Africa as lost without a further struggle. The emperor Majorian, of whom the romantic story is told that he visited Carthage in disguise to explore with his own eyes the resources of his enemy, in A.D. 460 assembled a fleet of 300 vessels at Carthagena for the invasion of Africa. His plans were betrayed by domestic treason to the Vandals, who surprised and carried off the greater part of his ships. Genseric, however, alarmed at this attempt, concluded peace with Majorian.

In A.D. 468, Leo collected a mighty armament of 1113 ships, each containing 100 men (Codices, 350, ed. Dindorf), under the command of his brother-in-law Basiliscus. The campaign opened favourably. Marcellinus, who had acquired Dalmatia, and assumed the title of Patriarch of the West, joined Leo against the common foe and drove the Vandals out of Sarplina. In the opposite direction, Heraclius recovered Tripoli. The main armament landed at the Hermenea promontory (Cape Bon) about forty miles from Carthage. Has Busiris attacked Carthage immediately, it would probably have fallen, but Genseric, by means, as it was generally believed, of a large bribe, induced him to grant a truce for five days. He used the interval to man all the ships he could, and the wind becoming favourable, attacked the Romans and sent them flying. After the charge of the Roman ships, panic and confusion spread through the vast multitude, most of whom tried to fly, but a few fell fighting gallantly to the last. After this victory, Genseric recovered Sarplina and Tripoli, and ravaged the coasts of the Mediterranean more cruelly than before, till a peace was concluded between him and the emperor Zeno. Severus, the emperor's ambassador, when taking leave, requested Genseric, instead of giving him the gifts usually presented to an ambassador on his departure, to set his prisoners at liberty. The king replied he had no power over those who had fallen to the share of the other Vandals, but released to him those who had fallen to his own or his sons' lot, and allowed him to ransom as many of the others as he could. (Malchus de Lagationibus, 3, ed. Dindorf.) At the same time Genseric, at Leo's entreaty, allowed the churches of Carthage to be reopened, and all the exiled bishops and clergy to return.

Soon afterwards he died, on Jan. 24, A.D. 477. He is said to have fallen ill as the law of succession in his family that the eldest male should succeed to the throne, so that the succession should not pass from father to son, but from brother to brother or uncle to nephew. This was, however, the usual rule of succession in early times. The Irish custom of Tanistry is an instance of it, and the best known example furnishes by the law of succession of the house of Otmhan.

According to the description of Jornandes (de Gothorum Origine, c. 33), in Cassiodorus, l. 412, in Migne, Patr. Lat. LXXII. 1274), Genseric was of moderate stature, and was lame from a fall from his horse. He was a man of few words, and thus was better able to conceal the deep designs he had for his nearest relations. His passion for wine was so strong as to even be accounted scorned luxury, and was greedy of empire. He was a master of all the arts by which nations could be won to his side, and quarrels might be excited and the seeds of mutual discord sown among his enemies. A terrible instance of his cruelty is related by Procopius (de Bello Vandalico, i. 22). Enraged by a repulse at Tanarus, he sailed for Zante, captured 500 nobles of the island, and in revenge cut them in pieces and flung their bodies into the Adriatic. In forming an estimate of Genseric's character, it must be remembered that all our information about him is derived from authors who hated and dreaded himself and his nation both as heretics and enemies. After everything that has been said for Sulpian's rhetoric (De Usuriatione Dei, vii. in Migne, Patr. Lat. III.), it must be admitted that, according to his description of the morals of the Vandals and those of the dissolute Carthaginians, the barbarian heretics appear in a more favourable light than the civilized Catholic.

Genseric's name is variously spelt Giceric, Gaicericus, Geisericus, and Zinzirichus. The sources for the above account are the Chronicles of Prosper and Idiatus (in Migne, Patr. Lat. II);

GENTIANUS, twenty-ninth bishop of Angers, succeeding Maurilius and followed by St. Benedictus, about the close of the 8th century. (Gall. Hist. xiv. 552; Tresvoux, Hist. de l'Eglise et du Diocese d'Angers, i. 80.)

GENTILUS, bishop of Cabda, in proconsular Africa, was present at the council of Cartaghe, a.d. 464. (Mansi, ii. 939; Morelli, Afr. Christ. i. 146.) [R. S. G.]

GENULFUS, is regarded as first bishop of Cahors. But the old lection which relates his preaching of the gospel in that part of the country, relates also that after three months he deserted; and this fact seems hardly consistent with the belief that he was bishop. The Bedolland biographer supposes that he was consecrated bishop at Rome, and sent to establish himself in any place where he might be able to found a church. Probably he was but the first missionary. He may be the same with Gundulfs, who appears in the Roman martyrology at June 17 as sent by pope Sixtus II. in the time of Decius, and who came to the country of the Biterigis. He is hence described by Pothast as bishop of Bourges. His biography, with plentiful miracles interspersed, and an appendix of additional miracles by an anonymous Benedictine, is found in Boll. Jan. 17; Acta SS. ii. 82; Gall. Chr. i. 118. [R. T. S.]

GEORGIAN CHURCH, THE. [IEREBAN CHURCH.]

GEORGIUS (1), bishop of Salonae (Spalato) is bishop, between Joannes I. and Thedorus I. He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Diocletian. (Farlati, Ital. Sacr. i. 647, et seq.) [J. de S.]

GEORGIUS (2), bishop of Prusa in Bithynia, one of the Nicene fathers, a.d. 325. (Mansi, ii. 696; Le Quien, O. C. I. 615.) [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (3), bishop of Laodica ad mare in Syria Prima (335-347), a leading figure in the second rank in the Trinitarian controversies of the 4th century. At first an ardent adherer of the teaching of Arius, he subsequently joined the ranks of the semi-Arians, but seems ultimately, outstepping his original position, to have united with the Anomoaeans, whose uncompromising opponent he had become, and to have died professing their tenets (Newman, Arians, part ii. ch. iv. § 1, p. 275). George was a native of Alexandria. In early life he devoted himself to the study of philosophy, in which he gained considerable distinction (Philost. H. E. viii. 17). He was ordained presbyter by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria (ibid.

Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 69). Having embraced the opinions of Arius he united himself to Eusebius of Nicomedia in his exertions to procure their recognition by the church. Having passed from Alexandria to Antioch, he endeavored to act the part of a mediator between Arius and the Catholic body, writing at the same time to Alexander and the leading Arians, with the view of explaining away the differences that kept them asunder. In his letter to the latter he showed how, by a sophistical evasion, based on 1 Cor. xi. 1. (2ρας φυλακαδει, το υπερθυσ του θεου might be accepted by them (Socr. H. E. ii. 45; Athanas. de Synod. p. 887). Naturally, the attempt at reconciliation was a complete failure, while the result to himself was his deposition and excommunication by Alexander, both on the ground of false doctrine and also of the open and habitual irregularities of his life (Athanas. de Synod. p. 886; Apol. ii. p. 728; de Fug. p. 718; Theod. H. E. ii. 9). Athanasius styles him "the most wicked of all the Arians," reproached even by his own party for his grossly dissolute conduct (De Fug. 718). After his excommunication by the church at Alexandria, George endeavoured to obtain admission among the clergy of Antioch, but his application was steadily rejected by Eustathius (Athanas. Hist. Arian, p. 812). On this he retired to Arathusa, where he acted as presbyter; and on the expulsion of Eustathius he was welcomed back to Antioch by the dominant Arian faction. Eusebius of Caesarea having declined the see of Antioch, George was consecrated as bishop in A.D. 332, together with Euphranius, on whom the choice ultimately fell, by the emperor Constantine, as "of much approved faith" (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 63). He was not long in attaining the episcopate, being appointed bishop of Laodicea on the death of the Arian Theodos (Athanas. de Synod. p. 890; Or. i. p. 290; Soz. H. E. vi. 25). Athanasius states that at his elevation to the episcopate was his own act (De Fug. 718). As bishop he was present and took a leading part in the successive synods summoned by the Arian faction against Athanasius. He was at the council of Tyre in 335 (Athanas. Apol. ii. p. 722), that of Jerusalem in the same year (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 4), and that of the dedection at Antioch in 341, at which Athanasius was deposed and Gregory appointed bishop of Alexandria (Soz. H. E. iii. 5). It is probably the George named by pope Liberius in his letter to the emperor Constantine (Hilar. Praym. ii. 39-43; Tillemont, Hist. Eccles. Eusebe de Vercell, note 3). On the assembling of the council of Saridica in 347 he kept his seat from joining his brother bishops, by whom he was, with many others, unanimously deposed, as having been previously condemned by Alexander, and as holding Arian opinions (Theod. H. E. ii. 9; Labbe, Concil. ii. 678; Athanas. Apol. ii. p. 765; de Fug. p. 718). Of this deposition George took no heed, and in 358, on Eudoxius, the newly appointed bishop of Antioch, openly siding with Arius and the Anomoaeans, he wrote an earnest appeal to Macedonius of Constantinople, and the other bishops who were visiting Basil at Ancyra for the purpose of consecrating a newly-elected church, calling on them to lose no time in summoning a council to condemn the Anomoaean heresy and eject Arius, unless they desired that city to be lost to them.
altogether. His letter is given in full by Sozomen (Hist. E. iv. 13; Lobbe, Concil. ii. 790). At Seleucia, in 359, when the semi-Arian party was split into two, George headed the more numerous faction opposed to that of Acacius and Eudoxius, whom, with their adherents, they deposed (Soc. H. E. ii. 40). If, as is probably the case, he is to be identified with the George named by Ibas (Epist. 231 [722]) as sharing with Eudoxius and Acacius in the persecutions of the orthodox at Constantinople in 360, the difference was short-lived. One of the frivolous charges against Cyril of Jerusalem, on which he was deposed at this council, was his receiving George into communion after his deposition (Soz. H. E. iv. 25). During his episcopate George was brought into contact with the two Apollinarians (father and son), the younger of whom subsequently occupied the see of Laodicea, where they were both residing as teachers of rhetoric. Their intimacy with the heathen sophist Epiphanius of Petra had been the cause of their excommunication by George's predecessor Theodosus, who was himself an Arian. Another pretext for their excommunication was, according to Sozomen, that Apollinaristus the younger had given a hospitable reception to Athanasius when passing through Laodicea, which had resulted in an intimate friendship. George's obstinate refusal to readmit Apollinaristus, even though his case was assigned by Socrates and Sozomen as the cause of his developing the heresy by which he has become celebrated (Soc. H. E. ii. 46; Soz. H. E. vi. 25). On the vacancy of the see of Antioch after the expulsion of Anianus, George was the chief in-trumenter of the election of Meletius, believing him to entertain the same opinions with himself. He was speedily undeceived, for on his first entry into Antioch the emperor Constantius having desired the bishops who were present to deliver success-ive expositions of the crucial text—"The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way, before His works of old" (Psalms v. 22), after George himself had delivered an equal number of Arrian colophons, and so on and so on, the flight of Athanasius, and for eight months after the adherents of Gregory (meaning George), are said by the Fragmentist to have been put in possession of the churches on "Pavui 21," or June 15, 356. George's installation was a signal for new infictions on Alexandrian church-people. "After Easter week," says Athanasius, "virgins were imprisoned, bishops led away in chains" (some 25 are named in Brev. B. 721); "attacks were made on houses," &c; and on the first Sunday evening after Pentecost a number of people who had met for prayer in a secluded place were cruelly maltreated by the commander, Sebastian, a "pitiless Manichaeus," for refusing to accommodate his "longue." He belonged to the Acacian section of the party; he was consequently obnoxious to the semi-Arians, who "deposed him" in the council of Selucia.
GEORGIUS OF CAPPADOCIA

even allowed the notorious adventurer Aetius, founder of the Anomoeans or ultra-Arianists, to officiate as deacon at Alexandria, after having been ordained, as Athanasius tells us (De Syn. 39), who, although hitherto "compelled" the Arian bishops of Egypt to sign the decree of the Acacian synod of Constantine of 356 against Aetius (Philostorius, iii. 2). He induced Theodore, bishop of Oxyrhynchos, first to submit to degradation from the ministry, and then to be re-ordained by him as a presbyter (year 361) to Dr. bassophamus, Sirmond. i. 135). He managed his own matters so well as to gain and keep the confidence of Constantius, who congratulated the Alexandrians on having abandoned such "grovelling teachers" as Athanasius, and entrusted their "heavenward aspirations" to the guidance of "the most venerable George," and who also exorted the two Abyssinian sovereigns to send their bishop Frumentius (whom Athanasius had consecrated) to Alexandria, in order to be instructed by George in the true knowledge of the "Supreme God" (Ath. Apol. to Const. 30, 31). But, in fact, George was far from recommending his form of Christianity either to the orthodox or to the Persians of Alexandria. "He was not severe," says Sozomen, "to the adherents of Athanasius," not only forbidding the exercise of their worship, but "inflicting imprisonment and scourges on men and women after the fashion of a tyrant;" while, towards all alike, "he acted as if determined to strike terror, and wielded his authority as if it belonged to the episcopal rank and character." He was "hated by the magistrates for his supercilious and imperious demeanour, by the people for his tyranny" (Soz. IV. 10, 30). He stood well with Constantius, who was guided theologically by the Acacians, and whose ears were as "wide open" (so Ammianus phrases it), so that the hands of his chamberlains were to bribes (see Greg. Orat. xxi. 16). It was easy for the "pope" of Alexandria to embitter his sovereign (as Julian says he did, Ep. 10) against the Alexandrian community, to name several of its members as disobedient subjects, and to suggest that its grand public buildings ought by rights to pay tax to the treasury (Ammianus, etc.).

Meantime, he showed himself in the light of a keen, grasping man of business, enriching himself by vexatious and ignoble monopolies, "buying up the nite-works, the marshes of papyrus and reed, and the salt lakes, and even keeping in his own hands, not from humanity, but for profit," the management of funerals; so that it was not safe for the dead to be buried without one buying those who let out biers under his direction (Epiphanius, Haer. ixxvi). He showed his anti-pagan zeal by arbitrary acts and insulting speeches; he procured the banishment of Zeno, a pagan physician in extensive practice (Julian, Ep. 45); he prevented the pagans from offering sacrifices and celebrating the national feasts (Soz. IV. 30); he brought Artemius, "duke" of Egypt, much given to the destruction of idols (Theodoret, iii. 18), with an armed force, into the very citadel of Alexandrian paganism, the superb temple of Serapis, which was forthwith stript of images, votive offerings, and ornaments (Julian, I. c.; Soz. I. c.). He ought to have known the temper of that multi-farious population, which had often been lashed into furious tumult by far less provocation than he recklessly gave. On the 1st day of Thoth, the 29th of August, A.D. 358 ("the consolatio of Tatianus and Cerinthus," adds the Maffian Fragment) he appeared before the church of St. Dioscorus, where George was then residing; and it was with difficulty, and after hard fighting, that soldiers rescued him from their hands. On the 5th of Paophi, i.e. October 2, he was obliged to leave the city; and the "Athanasiots" occupied the churches from October 2 to December 1, 357, again ejected by Sebastian. On June 23, 358,—the year of the councils of Ariminum and Seleucia—an imperial secretary named Paul arrived with a mandate for the restoration of George, and punished many who had taken part against him. So says the Fragmentist; but his next statements involve a difficulty. He says that five months later, on the 30th of Abyr (= Nov. 25), George returned, but that this was in the year of the consuls Taurus and Florentius, which was A.D. 361, "3 years and 2 months," he adds, "after his flight:" and that this return was only "3 days" before the insurrection which proved fatal to him. There is evidently a confusion in his account. It is impossible that the imperial mandate should have been inoperative from June 23, 359, to November 26, 381. Probably George returned soon after he had quitted the Seleucian council, i.e. in the November of 359, and the "3 years and 2 months" represent the period between his flight and that of the emperor; or, perhaps, on his return at this time, if not after some previous visit to "the court," that as he passed by the splendid temple of the genius or Fortune of Alexandria, he fixed his eyes on it with scornful hatred, and exclaimed in the hearing of the crowd that escorted him, "How long will this sepulchre stand?" (See Ammian. I. c.) This speech agrees well with the epitaph here attributed by Ammianus to the reinstated bishop, that he would make many a man suffer for his exile. It would naturally strike "like a thunderbolt" ("velut fulmine," Ammian.) on pagan listeners, and would feed the vindictive wrath which was keeping its accounts and binding its time. That time came at last, as Ammianus thinks, after the emperor Julian had arrived at Antioch in 362, and had put to death Artemius, but as soon as the news of his accession had arrived at Alexandria, Nov. 30, 361. George was in the height of his pride and power; he had persecuted the pagans anew, and wounded them to the quick by carrying about in procession a number of skulls which had been found below the floor of a temple of Mithras, which had been granted to him by Constantius, and on the site of which he intended to build a church (Soc. iii. 2). He was also carrying on, with the assistance of a "count" named Diodorus, the still unfinished works of the great Caesarean church; and Diodorus had shown the long curs of some boys by way of insult to paganism (Maff. Fragm., Ammian.). But now, the pagans were officially informed, there was an emperor who worshipped the gods; the latter, therefore, could at last be avenged. The shout arose, "Away with George!" and "in a moment," says the Fragmentist, they throw him into prison, and with him Diodorus, and Dracontius the master of the mint, who had overthrown a pagan altar, which he found standing there (see Ammianus). The captives were kept in iron until the morning of Choiaec 28 (Dec. 24). Then, as if "impatient," says Gibbon, "of the tedious forms of judicial proceedings," the pagan mob again assembled, dragged forth the prisoners with "blistered thumbs and fang," beat them with fists and sticks (cf. Epiphanius, l. c.), "pulled their limbs this way and that," and utterly killed the life out of them. As Julian, in his letter of remonstrance, expressed it, "the people actually tore a man in pieces, as if they had been dogs" (Ep. 10, see it in Soc. iii. 3). When the deed was done, they flung the mangled body of George on the back of a camel, which they led through every part of the city, while the two other corpses were drawn along with ropes. At last, at 1 P.M. they burned the remains on the shore, and cast the ashes into the sea, by way of preventing them from being honoured as martyrs by the Christians; the Paschal Chronicle adds that they were mingled with the carcasses of animals. Compare the Fragment with Ammianus, who adds that "the wretched men might have been defended by the Christians, had not all been equally embittered against George."

The murderers were all of them pagans, as was shown to Julian's lament in a letter of which, however, the Arian Philostorgius had the hard-have only been the nameless Christian, who, according to Eusebius, was the first priest of the Diocletian persecution, and the Bollandists think he may have been the nameless Christian who, according to Eusebius, bore the name of George. But the date of his martyrdom is said to have been in the first century.

GEORGIUS (6), the first bishop of Anicium (Le Puy) at some period before the 5th century. The legend is that he was sent from Rome by St. Peter in company with St. Fronto, and that he first exercised his ministry at Vetulia in the diocese of St. Peter, and then at Anicium, and finally at Vetulia in the diocese of St. Peter, and then at Anicium, and finally at Vetulia, where he is said to have been canonized. The see of the bishops of Le Puy was originally at Vetulia. This bishop was commemo-

GEORGIUS (7), bishop of Pelusium. He is mentioned in the life of St. Sabas written by Cyril of Scythopolis (ap. Doudarre, Monum. Eccl. Græci, iii. 220 sq.), as having been consecrated by Zoilus of Alexandria. This dates the period of his episcopate between a.D. 538 and 551, in which latter year Zoilus was consecrated (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 534.)

GEORGIUS (8), the name of four bishops attending the council of Constantinople in 553, their respective sees being—

Tiberias (Mansi, ix. 173 b, 191 c, 193 b, 202 c, 230 b, 297 d, 346 d, 368 a, 389 a) in Palestine (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 708);
GEORGIUS—Bishops

Ptolemais (Mansi, ix. 176 b, 392 c), but whether Ptolemais in Phocisicia, i.e. Acre, or Acre in Phocisicia, as Le Quien is uncertain, and places the bishop under both (see C. ii. 621, 816);

Justinianopolis in Armenia (Mansi, ix. 192 d, called Gregorius at pp. 175 c, 391 d; O. C. i. 435);

Novo Justinianopolis in Siria (Mansi, ix. 175 c, 394 d, 391 c), the same as in upstairs on the Haurus in Tarsus (C. i. 1203).

[J. de S.]

GEORGIUS (9), bishop of Pessinus in Galatia, and metropolitan, cir. A.D. 600. Pessinus was suffering from drought, and Theodorus Siceota, bishop of Anastasiopolis in the same province, was invited by George and the people to come and unite with them in a solemn supplication. From the church of St Sophia the assembled citizens made a procession headed by the two prelates to the church of the Holy Angels beyond the walls, and on their return Theodorus celebrated the sacrament at St Sophia's, when rain fell in torrents. (Vit. Theodori, cap. xi. § 68, in Boll. Acta SS. 52 Apr. iii. 52; Le Quien, Oeuvres Chr. i. 491.)

[C. H.]

GEORGIUS (10) I., said to have been ninth bishop of Carpana, between Oloofridus and Petrus f. at the beginning of the 7th century. (Le Coute, Ann. Eccl. Fr. an. 604 s. viii. tom. ii. 563; Gall. Christ. i. 897.) [S. A. B.]

GEORGIUS (11) II., patriarch of Alexandria, between Joannes Eleemosynarius and Cyrus. In the chronological table (rejected by Henschel, viti. Acta SS. Boll. Mart. iii. p. xxvi and Patrol. Gr. civ. 1169) which accompanies the text of Theophanes, George's first year is placed under A.D. 611 (the Alexandrian system being employed), and the first year of his successor under A.D. 625, fourteen years being thus assigned to his patriarchate; but the text, omitting to notice the commencement, places its close in A.D. 621 (Theoph. Chron. in Pat. Gr. civ. 634, 579 b, 690); Patr. Morn. (in Patr. Gr. 1054) gives him eleven years, but without dates. The annals (not very trustworthy) of Eutychius of Alexandria (pt. 2, p. 267) state that George began his rule in the thirteenth year of Heraclius (i.e. A.D. 622), and the first of the caliph Omar, and that after four years, when the Moslem armies had overrun Palestine and were advancing on Egypt, he set sail for Constantinople and was succeeded by Cyrus. In another passage, however, this annalist places the retirement of George in the third year of Omar (Pat. Gr. ex. 1095, 1122).

Nearly all modern writers agree in making him die in 630 (as Baronius, Pagi, Le Quien, Clinton); but Eutychius, in the above, is authority for the fourteen years, dates his accession in 616, as does Ordin. Le Quien thinks there must have been some interregnum after John, owing to the desolate condition of Alexandrian affairs, and he does not therefore date the accession. (Le Quien, Orn. Chr. ii. 447; Baron. A. E. s. v. 630, x. 630 xi. ii., and Pagi iii.; Clinton, F. E. ii. 547.) Baronius states that George may have been the relative of his predecessor mentioned by Leontius; but Pagi remarks that Leontius makes the relative too young for a patriarch.

CHRIST. RORR.—VOL. II.

Photius (cod. 96) describes at great length a life of Chrysostom, entitled τὰ ζητὶ τῆς Χρυσοστομίας, written by a George bishop of Pessinus, under whom he is unable to identify. He calls the style poor, and says the matter is called from Palladius, Socrates, and others; concluding with the observation that the author appears ὀφείλει παραστάσει, Schott taking this participle to mean παρατηρεῖν, "he treats of history," By general modern consent the writer is this patriarch. The life itself is extant in more than one manuscript; that in the imperial library of Vienna is described by Lambecius (Biblioth. Caesar. Vindob. t. viii. p. 578, num. 13, ed. Koller). In 1557 a Latin version of it, by Godfridus Tilmannus, was published under the title "Historiae lineatarum". The editions of Chrysostom's works (vol. viii. p. 157). The editions of Chrysostom's works by Migne and Montfaucon omit the life by George. Le Allatius (in Fabr. xii. 16) that Cyril of Alexandria, Theodoret, and John Moschus, in addition to Socrates and Palladius, are laid under contribution by George. Savile criticizes the life in the form of an "Ammonito" (printed in Pat. Gr. xlvii. p. xxvii). David Blondel in a searching chapter of his De la Primauté en l'Église, 1641, points out (pp. 1229 sqq.) numerous instances of George's corrupt copying of his predecessors besides a long list of his inventions. The reader may also consult Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 577), and especially Oudin (de Script. Eccl. i. 1599 sqq.), who gives an elaborate statement of the reasons which led him to attribute the Chroniques Paschale to this author.

[G. H.]

GEORGIUS (12) I., patriarch of Antioch during the Saracen domination, residing at Constantinople. The chronology is very uncertain. Eutychius of Alexandria (Annal. pt. 2, pp. 1223, 324, 348, in Patr. Gr. ex. 1108 c, 1114 d) states that he was the Macarius who was made Macarius in 197, a.s. [A.D. 638], and that he succeeded Macedonius in the third year of the Caliph Othman, i.e. in A.D. 645 or 646, and was appointed at Constantinople, where five years afterwards he died and was buried, having never visited Antioch; that he was succeeded by Macarius; and that he was anathematized with Macedonius, was banished at Paris (Fabr. Bibl. Gr. viii. 457, ed. Harles) and may be seen in Surius (de Prod. Hist. SS. 27 Jan. i. 474). The Greek was edited, 1612, by Henry Savile in his edition of Chrysostom's works (vol. viii. p. 157). The editions of Chrysostom's works by Migne and Montfaucon omit the life by George. Le Allatius (in Fabr. xii. 16) that Cyril of Alexandria, Theodoret, and John Moschus, in addition to Socrates and Palladius, are laid under contribution by George. Savile criticizes the life in the form of an "Ammonito" (printed in Pat. Gr. xlvii. p. xxvii). David Blondel in a searching chapter of his De la Primauté en l'Église, 1641, points out (pp. 1229 sqq.) numerous instances of George's corrupt copying of his predecessors besides a long list of his inventions. The reader may also consult Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 577), and especially Oudin (de Script. [G. H.]

GEORGIUS (13) seventh bishop of Agde, between Tigris and Wilesindus, present at the eighth council of Toledo in A.D. 653. Some have identified him with St. Georgius archbishop of Vienne, but apparently without sufficient reason. (Mansi, x. 1222; Gall. Christ. vi. 668; av. 33.)

GEORGIUS (14), bishop of Syracuse, who received a letter from pope Vitalian in 688. (Mansi, xi. 19; Jaufre, Regest. Pont. 165.)

[A. H. D. A.]
GEORGIUS (15), bishop of Catania, present at the Roman synod, held under pope Agatho, in Oct. 679. (Hefele, § 290; Mansi, xi. 179.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GEORGIUS (16), patriarch of the Nestorians, a disciple of Jesiub, whom he succeeded, A.D. 600. When a young man he gave Beth-habba his inheritance, to the monastery there established, and thus attracted the notice of Jesiub, then bishop of Nineveh, whom he afterwards accompanied to Adiabene. Jesuub, on becoming patriarch, appointed Georgius his successor in the latter see, and finally recommended him to the bishops as his successor in the patriarchate. Georgius bishop of Nisibis at first would not recognise the new patriarch; but when the latter visited him in his own city, the indignation of his flock compelled submission. Scarcely had the patriarch returned when Georgius bishop of Mesene [GEORGIUS (21)] rebelled against him. This necessitated another journey. The quarrel was adjusted by the good help of the rabbi Codah, abbot of Bethel. After this the patriarch restored order among the Cataraneses (Beth-patorye), and then went home to his monastery. The literary labours of Ananias were undertaken at his request. He died at Hirts, after an episcopate of twenty years. Thomas Margaees multisizes a poem by George, which he has De quattuor quadraginta et tercentenam bonus est, neque ex tua bonitate mutatur. His other works consisted of some orations, nineteen canons extant in an Arabic version, and a litany, translated by Schonfelder. (Assem. Bib. Or. iii. i. 149-153; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1123.)

[C. J. B.]

GEORGIUS (17), bishop of Nisibis, a Persian, contemporary with and an opponent of George patriarch of the Nestorians, and like him ordained by Jesuub. [GEORGIUS (16).] He was author of the hymn, "Praise to thy pity, Messiah our king, Son of God," &c. used in the Nestorian and Marvoute offices. (Assem. Biblioth. Oriental. iii. i. 456.)

[C. J. B.]

GEORGIUS (18) II., patriarch of Antioch. In the period of the Saracen domination between Thomas and Stephen III. He is frequently mentioned at the council of Constantinople in 680, being described as presbyter and monk, the apoconarius and representative of the bishop of Jerusalem (Mansi, xi. 311 c. 5494, &c.). At the Trullan or Quinisext council of Constantinople, A.D. 692, his title is bishop of Antioch (Mansi, xi. 988 c). Eutychius of Alexandria (Anast. pt. 2, p. 363, in Patr. Gr. cxi. 1118) places his ascension in the first year of the Caliph Abdullamelech (I.e. A.D. 683), and assigns twenty-four years to his episcopate. Constans, in his Life of St. Spiritus of Antioch (p. 157), only five, from 690 to 695. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 743.)

[C. H.]

GEORGIUS (19) I., 44th bishop of Constantinople, patriarch and metropolitan for six years (678-683) during the interrupted episcopate of 670, and the reign of the emperor Constantine III. Folgonus. At the time of his elevation he was chancellor and treasurer of the church of the Deipara in the district Sphoracium. His patriarchate was remarkable for the 6th General Council, held at Constantinople in 680. Of the council an account is given in the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities. It remains here to point out the part taken by George, who was at this time a Monothelite. The first occurrence Nov. 7, 680, was an appeal by the Roman legates to George and Macarius to account for the origin of certain novel expressions concerning the nature of Christ, which for forty-six years since the days of the patriarch Sergius had been troubling the churches. George and Macarius replied that they had learned these phrases from the oecumenical councils, from recognised fathers, and particularly from Sergius, Paul, Pyrrhus, and Peter who had in succession filled the chair of Constantinople, from pope Hen- rius, and from Cyrus of Alexandria. The emperor then allowed them to demonstrate their position, provided they adduced proofs only from general councils and recognised fathers. On this, Macarius asked the prince to order the warden of the charters of the church of Constantinople to bring to his hands of the councils from the Patriarchal Palace. The rest of the day was spent in reading the acts of Ephesus.

In the 7th session, Feb. 13, 681, the Roman legates begged Constantine to ask the patriarchs George and Macarius whether they agreed with the letters sent by pope Agatho and his council. The patriarchs asked for copies of them, that they might verify the quaternary at leisure. The originals were carefully sealed up.

In the 8th session, March 7, came the recantation of George. He admitted that the quotations were genuine, and declared his agreement with Agatho. On this, bishop after bishop of bipatriarchate came forward and made the same announcement. The patriarch then requested that the name of pope Vitalian should be replaced in the dip tychs, and the assembly endorse this ratification of peace.

In the 18th session, August 9, George made a request, which was supported by the bishops of his province, that the names of his four predecessors, Pyrrhus, Paul, and Peter, should be excepted from the anathemas pronounced against the Monothelite leaders. But the council refusing to see any grounds for their excommunication, George declared that he yielded to the opinion of the majority, and anathemas were pronounced afresh on the four patriarchs of Constantinople, Theodore of Pharan, Cyrus of Alexandria, Honorius of Rome, Macarius of Antioch, and all heretics.

In the 17th session, September II, the declaration of faith was determined, and was read aloud by Agatho, reader and notary of the patriarch George. It declared for two natural wills and two operations in Jesus Christ. George signed after the signature of the bishop of Jerusalem. The proceedings terminated with the composition of a synodal letter to pope Agatho. Before, however, the legates departed for Rome, news arrived of the pope's death, which took place in Jan. 682.

Nothing more is known of George, except that he was consecrated bishop of Constantinople in 683, and that Theodore returned. George is commemorated as a saint by the Greeks on August 18th. (Theoph. Chronogr. §§ 300, 301, Patr. Graec. civii. 723, 733, &c.; Pope Paul V.'s Concil. General. iii. 8, &c.; Beda, de Temp. Natione, Patr. Lat. xc. p. 568; Paulus Diaconus, &c.)

GEORGIUS (24), ST., thirty-seventh bishop of Vienne, between St. Bolbonius I. and St. Deodatus. He is mentioned in the Chronicon of ADO as a bishop of great virtue (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxiii. 117 d). There is some uncertainty as to his date. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xvi. 33) quote an index to the effect that he died Nov. 2, 699, and was buried in the church of St. Peter, while the Necrology of Vienne makes him contemporary with the emperor Anastasius II., who did not reign till A.D. 713. In Gaius's list again he is placed earlier than either of these dates (p. 654). If he was identical with Georgius bishop of Ægea, as has been conjectured, though without good ground, the earliest of the dates is the most probable.

[GEORGIUS (38), bishop of "the Arabs," or of "Nations" (Syr. 'amme), according to Barhebraeus (Lib. Ethnic. 4) a contemporary of Jacobus of Edessa and John of Damascus, cir. 710. (From Barhebr. Chron. we learn that these Arabs were Monophysites, who at last became Moslems, owing to the persecutions of the Eastern emperors.) Syrian writers ascribe many works to him. Georgius Assamyan mentions two, viz. a commentary on the Scriptures, much quoted by Barhebraeus in his Store-

GEORGIUS (21), bishop and metropolitan of Mesene, a district of Mesopotamia at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates represented by Basora, cir. 650 (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1209). He was one of the monks and disciples of Jesus of III, created metropolitan by that patriarch on account of the wide extent of his jurisdiction (Thomas Margensis in Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. 151). The opposition he offered to Jesus's successor (M. 152) is mentioned under GEORGIUS (19).

GEORGIUS (22), bishop of Agrigentum, who signed the synodal of Agatho at Rome in 690 (Mansi, xi. 306). Georgius is the reading of all the manuscripts, and there is no authority for Gregorius given by Baronius in the notes of his Roman Martyrology, and copied from him by others. See GEORGIUS (35) of Agrigentum.

house of M. stories, and a dodocasyllabic poem, in twenty-four sections, called De Chronico (Syr. metu Krumiyn). It is a kind of sacred calendar, treating of the ephats, the movable feasts, the solar and lunar cycles, the months, and weeks, and other matters relating to the ecclesiastical reckoning. The poem was written, as the writer himself tells us, to vindicate the honour of the Syriac against the Arabic muse. (Assem. Bibl. Or. i. 494–5). Other works: an epistle to one Joshua, published in Lagarde's Analec.; and a Syriac version of Arist. ἡλίκην ἀγανελάς, Hoffm. de Hermeneuticae acud Syros Aristotelis. Lips. 1889.

GEORGIUS (27), bishop of Martyropolis (Maiherara), in the province of Mesopotamia, on the tributary of the Tigris. This bishop originally presided over the see of Apamea, and was translated to Martyropolis by the emperor Philip in the first year of his reign, A.D. 711 (Theophanes Chronogr. a.m. 6294). He adhered to the orthodox faith according to the decisions of the council of Chalcedon, in behalf of which he wrote works that are quoted in the extant apologetic letter of Elias, a Jacobite bishop. He seems to have also been bishop of Tarsus, a town identified by Assamani with Martyropolis, but probably a separate bishopric lower down in Mesopotamia. Assamani wrongly assigns Georgius to the end of the 6th century. (Bibl. Orient. i. 485; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1000.)

GEORGIUS (28), bishop of Portus. In Oct. 708, he followed pope Constantine in his journey to Constantinople, with Nicetas bishop of Silva Candida. (C. Constantii a Pontificis, Migne, cxxvii. 949; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 178.) In 731 he was present at the Roman council under Gregory II. (Mansi, xii. 285).

GEORGIUS (30), archbishop of Salami, the metropolis of Cyprus, a strong upholder of image worship, and consequently anathematized by name along with Germanus who had resigned the see of Constantinople, and John of Damascus, at the synod held (see Mansi, xii. 575) by Constantine Copronymus, a.d. 754, as recited in the sixth session of the second Nicene council, when this anathema was removed. He is here described as a meek man who endured the blows and insults of the heretics without retort. [GEORGIUS (44.]) (Mansi, xiii. 556–7; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1051.)

GEORGIUS (31), bishop of Sinagiglia (Senogalla), present at the Lateran synod under Stephen IV. in 769. (Mansi, xii. 715.)

GEORGIUS (32), bishop of Preneaste, who ordained the intruding pope Constantine subdeacon and deacon, June 28, 767. On the following 5th July, with Eustatius bishop of Alba and Cotonatus bishop of Porto, he consecrated Constantine pope. (Vita Stephani, iv. Liber Pontificis, Migne, cxxviii. 1180; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 198.) He also subscribed a letter of pope Paul I. in June 761, to the abbot John, about the privileges of the monastery of St. Stephen and St. Silvester in Rome. He is there called Gregory. (Pat. Lat. ixxxix. 1184; Mansi, xii. 649; Jaffé, 195.) [A. H. D. A.

GEORGIUS (33), bishop of Ostia, who took part in important missions by the popes in the second half of the 8th century. In 756 he was sent by Stephen III. to Pippin with letters concerning the disasters inflicted by the Lombards (Cod. Carol. Jaffé, p. 47, 54). In 757, after the death of Aistulf, he was sent again to Pippin by Stephen III., and in 758 or 759 by Paul I. In 759 or 760 Georgius was commissioned by the pope to Pippin, and apparently remained for some time at Pippin's court. In 764 Paul wrote, specially permitting Pippin to retain him. In 767 pope Constantine II. wrote to Pippin, asking him to send Georgius back to Rome. (Cod. Carol. Jaffé, pp. 66, 77, 82, 84, 102.) In 769 the name appears among the custodes to the Lateran synod concerning the election of popes and image-worship. (Mansi, xii. 714; Hefele, § 343.)

In 787 (according to Jaffé, Mon. Alloc. p. 155, &c., in 786), Georgius (wrongly called Gregory by Spelman and others) wrote to pope Hadrian announcing what he had done, together with Theophylact bishop of Todi and the abbot Wibgod, a legate of Charles the Great, during his mission to England.

Georgius landed in England in 786. He went first to the court of Offa, then to the court of Northumbria, where a synod was held (probably that of Pincanahale). He returned to Offa, where a synod of bishops was held, probably in Chelsea (Haddan and Stubbs, Concil. and Documents, vol. iii. p. 443, p. 445 note, and Legatina synods p. 447–462; also Jaffé, Monumenta Alcuina, p. 155–162). The acts of the southern synods are to be found in the letter of George, which appears to be incomplete. They are also alluded to in a later letter of pope Leo III. ann. 797 to Kenulf king of the Mercians. (Jaffé, Monum. Alloc. p. 365.) [A. H. D. A.

GEORGIUS (34), bishop of Antioch in Pisidia. He took part in the second Nicene council, which restored image-worship, a.d. 787 (Mansi, xiii. 137). When Leo V. (the Armenian) made a fresh attempt to crush out this form of worship in the East, Georgius refused to comply with his orders, and was driven into exile, where he died, c. a.d. 814. He is commemorated by the Greeks on April 18. (Le Quien, O. C. i. 1039; Basil. Men. in Migne, Patrolog. Græc. cxviii.)

GEORGIUS (35), bishop of Trinumitus in Cyprus, taking part in the proceedings of the 7th general (second Nicene) council, a.d. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 144; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1072.)
GEORGIUS—Bishops

GEORGIUS (38), given by Ughelli as the first bishop of Neglia (Veglia or Bieglia), and believed to have been Sergius bishop of Neglia, otherwise Bargylia. He attended the second council of Nicaea, A.D. 787. A Sergius is spoken of as having suffered martyrdom at Bieglia, but he does not appear to have been its bishop. (Manzi, xii. 1105 C, xiiii. 147 B; Ughelli, Rer. Sacr. viii. 538; Sarneiuli, Vesc. di Bieglia, p. 12.) [S. S. G.]

GEORGIUS (37), the name of several other bishops attending the council of Nicaea in 787, viz. of—

Antioch in Pisidia (Manzi, xiii. 137 a, Gregorius in the Latin; Le Quien, Or. Gr. i. 1039.);

Appia in Phrygia Pacatiana (M. xii. 1107 a, xiiii. 148 c; O. C. i. 626). Basilinopolis in Bithynia (M. xii. 1003 a; O. C. i. 626). [Gregorius (48).]

Brida or Pruilla in Asia (M. xii. 1098 b, O. C. i. 704). Camuliana in Cappadocia Prima (M. xii. 1098 a; O. C. i. 393).

Gordius in Lydia (M. xiiii. 1102 d; O. C. i. 883). [Gregorius (48).]

Cibyra in Caria, not Libya as M. xiiii. 1105 b, Latin; edde Gregorius (47) of Cibyra.

Midaeum in Phrygia Salutaris (M. xiii. 1107 b; O. C. i. 842).

Nissa or Nessus in Lydia (M. xiii. 145 e, not Gregorius as in the Latin at xiiii. 1103 e; O. C. i. 987). He is the only known bishop of this city.

Oenomus in Lydia (M. xiiii. 148 a, not Gregorius as in the Latin at xiiii. 1105 a; O. C. i. 990).

Pelaius or Feltia in Phrygia Pacatiana (M. xii. 1106 d, xiiii. 148 c; O. C. i. 802).

Plotinopolis in Thrace (M. 1110 c, xiiii. 149 b; O. C. i. 1186). Thermae Basilice in Sicily (M. xiiii. 141 c; Pirri, Sicil. Sacr. i. 494). [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (38) L, patriarch of Armenia (792-795) between Solomon and Joseph II. He was of the town of Aschunag in the canton of Araksidzin (Saint-Martin, Mém. sur l’Arm. i. 439; Le Quien, O. C. i. 1393). [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (40), bishop of Amastris (Sesamum), on the coast of Paphlagonia, in the reign of Constantine VI. and Irene, and under the patriarchates of Tarasius and Nicephorus. He was by the desire of the people of Amastris, he was almost forced away by Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, and consecrated the bishop, although Constantine VI. (c. d. 797) had fixed on some one else. When he had experienced some ill-treatment from his metropolitan of Gangra, he managed to have his see elevated to the rank of an archbishopric, so as to be subject only to the patriarchal throne of Constantinople. (Le Quien, O. C. i. 563.) He was a man of great sanctity of life, and was revered as a saint by the Greeks and Latins on Feb. 21 (Acta SS. Feb. iii. 268). Le Quien makes him follow Gregorius, who attended the council of Constantinople in 787, and suspects that they are both the same person. [Gregorius (48).] [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (41), (Gregorius), 20th bishop of Amiens, between Vitulius and Jesse. He was of the bishops who consecrated the churches of St. Saviour and St. Benedict in the monastery of St. Riquier (Mendoloum) in A.D. 798, and also thirteen altars in the church of St. Mary in the same year. (Vit. St. Angilbert, t. ii. Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 99.) Some chronicles edited by Joseph Scaliger, after the chronicle of Eusebius, are attributed to him. (Gall. Christ. x. 1157.) [S. A. B.]

GEORGIUS (42), an obscure bishop of Mitylene in Lesbos (called “Episc. Melitennus,” by Baroni, Annul. a. 735, iii., Pagi ii.). He is treated by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 7 Apr. i. 688-689), but there is much doubt as to his period and acts. According to Basil’s Menologium, April 7 and May 16, he was born of wealthy and piuse parents, and his great virtue was in almsgiving. He was elected bishop of Mitylene, and is said to have been a great opponent of the Iconoclasts in the time of Leo III. The Issarian (A.D. 717-41), but he is also said to have lived in the time of Leo V. the Armenian (A.D. 813-30), and the solution by Papebrochius, that his life may have extended to the times of both emperors, is impossible. [J. G.]

GEORGIUS (43), martyr, Ap. 23 (variously called Megas推广应用, Bas. Mem.; Προκαθορητ. Sym. Metaph.) Theologus, Καλλικράτης, Bickh.; by the Arabs, Abi Manz; by the Persians, Khudz, Burchardt; traditionally the patron saint of England), a military tribune and martyr under Diocletian at Nicomedia, A.D. 303.
He was a native of Cappadocia and of good birth, and akin to St. Nina the woman by whom the Iberians were converted in the reign of Constantine (Malan, Hist. of the Georgian Church, p. 32; Soc. i. 20). He entered the army as a centurion, and rose to be a military tribune. Some time before the outbreak of the great persecution, he accompanied his mother to Lydda, in Palestine, where she possessed property. As soon, however, as he heard of the publication of the first edict (Feb. 23, A.D. 303), he returned to Nicomedia, where, as some think, he was the celebrated person who tore down the imperial proclamation, and then suffered death by roasting over a slow fire (Enseb. H. E. viii. 5). [DIOCLETIAN.] They lay stress on a very doubtful argument, derived from his natalia, and suppose that the edict having been published on Good Friday, which fell that year on April 16, his trial, prolonged torture, and slow death filled up the time to April 23, which, as J. Assemani says (Kal. Eccles. Univ., vi. p. 584), has been universally fixed by all chroniclers as the day of his martyrdom. But then, unfortunately for this argument, Lactantius tells us (De Mort. Pers. xii. xiii.) that the edict which was torn down by the nameless Christian was published on Feb. 24 (cf., however, Acta SS. Boll. April. iii. 109, for a full statement of the argument). The date of the edict is certainly the centenary of the destruction of the edict to a martyr named John). The earliest historical testimony to the existence and martyrdom of St. George comes from an inscription in a church at Etrr's or Edirr's, in Southern Syria, copied by Burchard and Porter, and discussed by Mr. Hog in two papers read before the Royal Society of Literature, published in their Transactions, t. vi. p. 292, t. vii. p. 106. This inscription states that the building had been a heathen temple, but was dedicated as a church in honour of the great martyr St. George, in a year which Hog, by an acute argument, fixes as A.D. 346. (For another view, however, which makes the inscription to a p. 46, see Böckh, l. c. Corp. Inscription. Graec. ed. Kirchhoff, i. iv. num. 8627.) His name occurs again in another inscription in the church of Shaka, twenty miles east of Etrr's, which Hogg dates at A.D. 367. (Böckh. l. c. num. 8609, cf. 8630; for other instances of transformations of heathen temples into churches and hospitals in the 4th and 5th cent., see Böckh, l. c. 8645, 8647.) We next meet with St. George in the decrees of the council assembled at Rome by pope Gelasius, A.D. 494 or 496 (Hefele, Concil. i. 610, iii. 219, ed. Paris, 1889). This synod condemned the acts of St. George, together with those of Cyricus and Julianus, as corrupted by heretics, but expressly asserted that the foundation of the church was reserved to the martyr, and as such worthy of all reverence. (Cf. Pitra, Spicileg. Solemnen. iv. 391, for a repetition, three centuries later in the East, of this condemnation by the patriarch Nicephorus, in his Constitut. Ecclesiast.) After the period of Gelasius, the testimonies to his existence rapidly thicken in value. Gregory of Tours in the 6th century mentions him as highly celebrated in France, while in the East his cultus became universally established (cf. Fleury, H. E. xxxiv. 46), and churches were erected in all directions in his honour, one of the most celebrated being that built probably by Justinian over his tomb at Lydda, whither his relics had been transferred after his martyrdom. This church still exists. (For an engraving of it, see Thomson's The Land and the Book, ii. 292; cf. Robinson's Biblical Researches, iii. 51-55, with Le Quien, Oriens Christian, iii. 1271, for particular St. George's connexion with Lydda.) Another famous one is that of Thessalasia described in Texier and Pullan, Byzantine Architecture, pp. 132-143, where strong reasons are presented for assigning its erection to Constantine (cf. Procopius, De Aedif. iii. 4, ed. Bonn.).

(2) The Medieval Legends.—The condemnation of the acts of St. George by Gelasius gives us the clue to the source whence the legendary stories connected with him sprang. The Arians of the 5th century displayed great literary activity, availing themselves of every chance for diffusing their opinions. (Mai, Nou. Col. t. iii. par. i. pp. 238, 239.) They seem to have corrupted his acts for their own purposes. Their story is that he was hanged by Dianius, the persecutor, according to some, of Rome, according to others, of Persia, by whom he was in vain ordered to sacrifice to Apollo. He was then confronted with the magician Athanasius, who undertook to confound the saint. After various attempts the magician was converted and baptized, as well as the queen Alexandra. After many miracles and various trials he at last ascended to heaven. It is a strange fact that, notwithstanding the decrees of Rome and Constantinople, this Arian corruption became the basis of all the subsequent legends, and even found its way into the hymns of St. John Damascene in honour of St. George (Mai, Spicileg. Rom. t. ix. p. 729; Ceillier, xii. 89). The addition of a horse and a dragon to the story arose out of the imaginations of medieval writers improving upon the allegorical ideas of earlier times. The dragon evidently represents the devil, and was suggested by St. George's triumph over him at his martyrdom. A glance at Eusebius, Vita Constantin. i. 5, where we find the description of a v. 45, see Böckh, l. c. Corp. Inscription. Graec. ed. Kirchhoff, i. iv. num. 8627.) His name occurs again in another inscription in the church of Shaka, twenty miles east of Etrr's, which Hogg dates at A.D. 367. (Böckh. l. c. num. 8609, cf. 8630; for other instances of transformations of heathen temples into churches and hospitals in the 4th and 5th cent., see Böckh, l. c. 8645, 8647.) told in Johnson's Historie of the Seven Champions of Christendom, and the old ballad of St. George and the Dragon, reprinted in the third volume of Percy's Reliques, many features of which Speiser reproduces in his Étudé Queen. Busbecq in the 16th century found in the heart of Asia Minor a legend of the Turkish hero Cheddar to whom were ascribed exploits similar to those of St. George (cp. 1, pp. 93, 95, ed. 1633). He also found the Georgian Christians venerating above every other image that of St. George on horseback, regarding him as having conquered the evil one (ep. 3. p. 209). [IEREMIAN CHURCH.]

(9) Omnasion with England.—St. George and his story were well known from the seventh century, most probably through the Roman missioners sent by Gregory. In the end of the seventh century, Arculf, the early traveler, when returning to his bishopric in France, was carried northward to Iona, about A.D. 699, where he told the monks the story of St. George, whence, through Iona and Scotland, it became widely known in Britain. [ARCELF; ADAMMN]. In accordance with these facts, we find that St. George has a place in the Anglo-Saxon ritual of Durham assigned to the early part of the 9th century, published by the Surtees Society in A.D. 1846, while again, among the publications of the Oxford Society for the Study of the Anglo-Saxon Court of St. George, the work of Aelfric, archbishop of York A.D. 1020–1051. (Passion of St. George, ed. Hardwick, in Percy Society's publications, A.D. 1850; in its preface is much interesting information on this point.) His special fame, however, in this country arose immediately (see further History of Crusades, William of Malmesbury (Gesta Reg. Angl. ed Sir T. D. Hardy, ii. 559) tells us that, when the Crusaders were hard pressed by the Saracens at the battle of Antioch, June 28, 1089, the soldiers were encouraged by seeing "the martyrs George and Demetrius hastily approaching from the mountainous districts, hurling darts against the enemy, who being thus overwhelmed, ran away," (Hieron, S. xvi.); Michael's Hist. of Crusades, i. 173, ed. London; on the military fame of St. Demetrius see Büch, Corp. Inscrip. iv. 8642; Du Cange, Gloss. i. 974; Texier and Pullan, Byzantine Architecture, pp. 123–132). This timely apparition at the very crisis of the campaign led the Crusaders, among whom were ascribed a large contingent of Normans, under Robert, son of William the Conqueror, to adopt St. George as their patron. During the campaigns of Richard I. in Palestine, St. George appeared to that king, so that he became a special favourite with the Normans and English. (Itinerar. of Richard I. in Chronic. of Crusades, ed. Bob. p. 129). It is said that in 1222 a national council at Oxford ordered his feast to be kept as a lesser holiday throughout England. He was not, however, formally adopted as patron saint of England till the time of Edward III. That prince founded St. George's Chapel at Windos in 1348. In 1349 he joined battle with the French near Artois, when, as is reported, he "suddenly impulsive," says Thomas of Walsingham, "he drew his sword with the exultation, Ha! St. Edward, Ha! St. George, and routed the French" (cf. Smith's Student's Histo., cap. x. sec. 8). From that time St. George replaced St. Edward the Confessor as patron of England. In 1350, according to some authorities, the order of the Garter was instituted under his patronage, and in 1415, according to the Constitutions of archbishop Chicheley, St. George's Day was made a major double feast, and ordered to be observed like Christmas Day. In the first prayer book of Edward VI. St. George's feast was a red letter day, and had a special epistle and gospel appointed. This was changed in the next revision and never restored. (Ashmole, Order of the Garter; Astin, Register, and Pott, Antiquities of Windsor and History of Order of Garter, a.d. 1749.) The same influence of the Crusades led to the adoption of St. George as their patron by the republic of Genoa, the kingdoms of Arragon and Valencia, and to the institutions of order of knighthood under his name all over Europe (cf. A.A. S3. Boll. April. iii. 160). In northern Syria, again, St. George's day is even still observed by the Christians as a great festival (Lyde, Secret Sects of Northern Syria, London, 1853, p. 196).

(4) Controversy.—The consentient testimony of all Christendom attested the existence of St. George till the Reformation. Calvin first questioned it. In his Institutes, lib. iii. cap. 20, sec. 27, when arguing against invocation of saints, he ridiculed those who esteem Christ's intercession as of no value unless "St. George, St. Chrysostom, and Hippolytus aut similes larvae," where, unfortunately for himself, he places Hippolytus in the class of ghosts or phantoms together with St. George. Dr. Reynolds, in the beginning of the 17th century, was the first to identify the orthodox martyr of Lydda with the Arian bishop of Alexandria (see further History of Crusades, William of Malmesbury). Against him Dr. Heylin argued in an exhaustive treatise dedicated to king Charles I. (History of St. George of Cappadocia), where on pp. 164–168 will be found a very full list of all the authors who up to that date had referred to St. George, including a quotation from a reputed treatise by St. Ambrose, Liber Præfationum, on which, as he informs us, he has drawn, with no stress. The controversy was continued during the last century, when Pegge discussed before the London Society of Antiquaries (whose anniversary is held on St. George's Day) the theory that St. George was a mere allegory, and Mr. Byron's view that Gregory the Great was the real patron of England. Dr. Milner, in the last century, wrote a book in defence of the historical reality of St. George, provoked doubtless by Gibbon's well-known sneer in cap. xxiii. of his history. For further history of the controversy, see the exhaustive paper of Mr. Hogg already quoted, and an essay on St. George in Baring-Gould's Myths of the Middle Ages, where an ingenious attempt is made to account for the popularity of his cultus in the East by connecting it with the worship of Tammuz and Adonis, and with various other Eastern beliefs. (Mart. Vet. Rom., Mart. Aed., Mart. Ursard, which all fix his martyrdom at Diospolis in Persia (cf. Herod. ed. Rawlinson, i. 72, v. 49, v. 72); Heges., vol. i. 72; Heges., vol. v. 72); Heges., vol. v. 72; Diospolis may be the Bythinian town of that name, which was in the Persian empire under Cyrus. sobbing and wailing because of his dream. He thought he was standing by the throne of Christ where many thousand people were depressing His anger, and He would not hear them. At last came a woman robed in purple, and interceded for the suppliants, but still Christ was inexorable. This was at the dawn of Holy Thursday, and on the following day, Good Friday, an earthquake overthrew the maritime cities of Palestine. (Joan. Mosch. Prat. Spir. cap. 50.) [C. H.]

GEORGIIUS (51), prebendar of the church of St. John and Paul at Rome attending the Roman council of 745 (Mansi, xi. 381). The prebendar of the same church in 721 was Gregorius, who may have been the same person, as the two names are frequently interchanged by the error of transcribers. [GEORGIIUS (69)] This George is identified in other letters of the same date (Mansi, 374 B, 377 D, 379 B), from his order in the list, though his church was not mentioned. (See also Jaffé’s Monum. Mon. 136, 141, 144, 147.) [C. H.]

GEORGIIUS, prebendar and messenger of pope Gregory III. [GEORGIIUS (69)].

GEORGIIUS (52), a solitary of Mount Sinai, stated to have been the brother of St. John Climacus. (Daniel, Vit. Joan. Clim. in La Bisa, Max. Bibl. Pat. x. 388 e.) After living the life of an anchorite for seventy years, he was summoned by his brother to succeed him as abbot of the monastery of Sinai, a responsibility which filled him with apprehension. St. John Climacus, when dying, promised that if his prayers were of any avail with God, Georgius should be taken out of the world within a year; and he in fact died six months after his brother. (Joan. Mosch. Prat. Spir. cap. 127 ; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Eccl. xi. 678.) [L. G. S.]

GEORGIIUS (53), a venerable Palestinian monk in the monastery of Theodore bishop of Capadocia (p. 600, Le Quiro, O. C. iii. 717). Theodore, who spoke of him to John Moschus, had for twelve years observed that George was never troubled, although at that time sloth, negligence, luxury, and insubordination were rampant. No one like him could rein the eye, close the ear, control the tongue; he was as a sunbeam in the hearts of all the brethren. (Joan. Mosch. Prat. Spir. cap. 109.) [C. H.]

GEORGIIUS (54), PISIDES, poet, dean of the great church at Constantinople. Little is known of his life, which was probably uneventful. He lived at Constantinople during the reign of the emperor Heraclius, a.d. 610–641, and the patriarchate of Sergius, and was in high favour with both of them, undoubtedly on account of his poetical gifts. He is called by some authorities chartophylax (keeper of the archives), by others scomlepaphys (keeper of the archives), at the church of St. Sophia, and from certain expressions in his poems, De Expeditione Persicâ (ii. 122, iii. 131), it appears that he accompanied Heraclius in some of his campaigns against the Persians. His works may be divided into two classes, (a) those relating to the history of his own times; (b) religious poems. Those that have come down to us of the first class are, (1) De Expeditione Persicæ, a poem in three books or declamations (hæpodes) narrating the expedition of Heraclius against Chosroes, A.D. 615; it is full of adulation, both of the pious and of the valour of the emperor, and applies to the Persians the verse of the 156th Psalm, "Blessed be he be that taketh thy children and disasbeth them against the stones." [n. 114]; (2) Bellum Avaricum, narrating the fruitless attack of the Avars on Constantinople, whilst the Persian army was encamped at Chalcedon; (3) Hymnus Acastiæus, a hymn to the virgin to be sung standing, a thank-offering for the same defeat of the Avars; (4) In Sacram Resurrectionem, where George exhorts Constantine, the son of Heraclius, to follow the example of his father; (5) Heracleias, a rapid review of the life of the emperor, written on the news of the death of Chosroes. Of the second class there are these: (1) Hexaenomeran, the longest and most elaborate of George's works, dedicated to Sergius. It consists of 191 lines, and must be impeded; (2) De Anastasi Vitoæ, a short moral poem; (3) Contra Securan, against the Monophysite heresy, but ignoring Monothelitism, which was favoured by the patriarch; there is also a prose work, Vita S. Anastatii Martyris, a Persian who suffered martyrdom in Palestine when that country was under the dominion of Chosroes. Great writers quote from other works of this author, of which fragments are alone extant. George composed in iambic metre, and his verses are correct and elegant; greatly admired by his contemporaries, he is a court poet, writing with an eye to his patrons, and profuse in his praises of them; his elegance often sinks into frigidity. He must be distinguished from George bishop of Niemedia, who flourished at the end of the 9th century, with whom Cave wrongly identifies him. (Migne, Patr. Græc. xxii. 1160–1754; Villier, x. 653; Cave, Script. Eccl. Hist. i. 593; Alphatius, de Georgio in Fabric. Bibl. x. 541–50.)

GEORGIES (58, presbyter abbat, who required of St. Maximus concerning the mystery of Christ's person, in reference to the Monothelite controversy. Maximus addresses him as an unwasted student of holy Scripture, and one abstracted from all lower things in the contemplation of the spiritual. (S. Maxim. Conf. Opusc., in La Bigne, Max. Bibl. Pat. tom. xii. p. 521.)

GEORGIES (59), presbyter, a Paulinist, to whom Sergius patriarch of Constantinople wrote c. A.D. 620, seeking for authorities on the Monothelite argument. (S. Maxim. Conf. Disput. cum Pyrrho in La Bigne, Max. Bibl. Pat. xii. 503 a.)

GEORGIES (60), patrician of Africa, c. A.D. 647 (Maxim. Ep. 18; Migne, Patr. Græc. xci. 584). [Gregorius (77.)]

GEORGIES (61), archimandrite of the monastery of St. Theodore, thanked in a letter from pope Martin I. A.D. 640 (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 162) for having supported Stephen bishop of Dares, the oriental legate of the Roman see under the late pope. Martin exhorts him to yield a similar obedience to his own legate in the East, John bishop of Philadelphia. (Martin. ep. 8 in Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 167, and Mansi, Concil. x. 819.)

GEORGIES (62), presbyter and monk of the monastery of St. Renatus at Rome, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680 (Mansi, xi. 616 d). He, or another of the same name, was legate of pope Agatho to the council (6. 611).

GEORGIES (63), of Nesra in Adiabene, also called Bar Sa目da (Sayode), i.e. son of fishermens. He was archimandrite of Beth-haba, A.D. 690, in the patriarchate of Ananias. He wrote a treatise De Obiidentia (di klessemblonemoth). Thom. Marg. (Hist. Monast. lib. ii. cap. 20) says he will not write a life of Georgios, because that has been done by bishop David in chap. i. of the Little Paradise. In lib. i, cap. 21, Marg. tells how Ananias sent some monks accused of heresy to Georgios, who found them not guilty. (Assem. Biblioth. Orient. iii. i. 217–218.)

GEORGIES (64), a native of Scythopolis, presbyter of the great church of Constantinople, mentioned by Phocas bar Sergius of Edessa in the 8th century as having written in defence of the authenticity of the writings of Dionysius Areopagita. Some extracts from George's book are given by Phocas (W. Wright, Cat. of Syriam MSS. in the Brit. Mus. pt. ii. p. 495, col. 1).

GEORGIES (65), deacon of Anambris in Paphlagonia, signing for his bishop Zoius at the council of Constantinople in 692. (Mansi, xi. 1000 b.)

GEORGIES (66), surnamed Cnidopoeus (Κανθώβους), presbyter and logographus in the church of the Severians at Alexandria, late in the 7th century, who disputed with Anastasius Similta the priest and monk (Anastas. Similta. Vinæ Dux, cap. 10 in Migne, Patr. Græc. xiii. 188.).

GEORGIES (67)—Oct. 21. Martyr at Jerusalem with sixty others, at the hands of the Saracens, A.D. 723. They were buried in the church of St. Stephen at Jerusalem. (Acta SS. Boll. Oct. ii. 366–362.)

GEORGIES (68), surnamed Limnetes—Aug. 24. A monk, and opponent of Leo the Isaurian in the iconoclastic controversy, A.D. 736. Like the rest of the monks, he was an enthusiastic supporter of the worship of images. He usually lived a very ascetic life beside a lake near Mount Olympus in Asia Minor, whence his surname. According to some, he was put to death; according to others, he was mutilated by the emperor for his opposition. (Bas. Menal.; Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Acta SS. Boll. Aug. iv. 841; Maimbourg, Hist. Iconoclast. t. i. l. 2, p. 108, ed. 1866.)

GEORGIES (69), prior "scholas cantorum," at Rome, mentioned in a letter of pope Paul I. to Pippin, 763, as then dead and having been succeeded by Simeon. (Codex Carolinus, Jaffé, no. 41, ann. 758–67; Pat. Lat. lxxix. 1187; Jaffé, Reg. Pontif. 196.)

GEORGIES (67), martyr, commemorated Aug. 27, according to Usuardus (more correctly July 27, according to Baronius). He went to Jerusalem upon a pilgrimage, and on his return, bearing relics from the Holy City, he was killed by the Saracens at Cordova, together with Aurelius, Felix, Natalia, and Liliosa, some time in the 8th century. Usuardus fixes Oct. 20 as the day of his translation of his body into France, upon which point his authority may be completely trusted, as he was himself the agent in the removal. In the year 858 Usuard was sent with another monk named Odillard by the abbey of St. Germain, near Paris, to look for the relics of St. Vincent at Valcntia in Spain, a city which was then in ruins, owing to the ravages of the Saracens. They bore with them a commendatory letter from King Charles the Bald. They did not find the relics of Vincent, but discovered and bore away from Cordova the bodies of George the deacon, of Natalia or Natalis, and of Aurelius. On their return to France they found that the community of St. Germain had fallen into a place in the diocese of Sens because the Normans had burned their monastery. They did not, therefore, return to Paris till 863, when Charles the Bald was so delighted with the relics that he ordered Usuardus to compile his famous Martyrology. (Marti. Usuard., Roman. ed. Baron.; Eulogii, lib. ii. cap. 10; M. Bontii, Præf. Mart. Usuard. in Migne's Patrol. Lat. vol. 123, 583–586; Ceillier, xii. 611.) [G. T. S.]

GEORGIUS (69) SYNECELLUS, a monk of Constantinople towards the close of the 8th century, and author of a Chronographia or Chronology of the world, existing from the days of Adam to those of Diocletian, A.D. 285, when the further progress of the work seems to have been stopped by his death. He received the epithet Synecelles from the office held by him near the person of Taurus patriarch of Constantinople. This office was that of a kind of privy councillor of the patriarch, an advisor in all his affairs (Pa Gange, Glossarium, s. v. Synecelles).

Nothing is known of the birth or early history of George, but his writings, the honours received by him in later life, and the testimony of Theophanes of Constantinople, a contemporary writer and a continuator of his Chronographia, are sufficient to prove the high esteem in which he was held. Theophanes speaks of him as an illustrious and most learned man, who had examined with the greatest diligence the works of his predecessors, and had attained a success which had marked none of them. (Theophan. Chronogr. procem. p. 4 in Corp. Scr. Hist. Byz. Bonn.) This tribute of praise has not, however, been received without question by succeeding writers. Scaliger in particular, offended at some of George's depreciatory remarks on his favourite Eusebius, uttered too, it would seem, at a time when Synecelles was making large use of the very authority he was underrating, is very severe in his language of condemnation, styling him light and foolish and insane, and charging him with having obtained his whole history from the person whom he took it upon him to depreciate (Dissertatio by Bredovius, prefixed to the second volume of the works of Synecelles in the Corpus Script. H. B. p. 10). There seems to be but little foundation for these charges. That George but made use of Eusebius is unquestionable, he used all from whom he thought that he could gather materials for his work. Of the writers, such as Julius Africanus, and Alexander Polyhistor, he has preserved many fragments that would otherwise have been lost, and a large portion of the Chronicon of Eusebius has been from him restored to its true author.

The work of Synecelles has always been highly esteemed in the church, more especially for its preservation of passages from earlier writers, who would otherwise have been almost unknown. It is worth noticing that among the quotations given in it are a good many from the Aposlephal book of Enoch. The Chronographia, of which only one MS., in the National Library at Paris, is known, was first published by the Dominican Jacob Goar in the year 1652. The best edition now is that of Dindorf, in the Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, in two vols., with the Dissertatio of Bredovius and the Preface and Notes of Goar. [W. M.]

GEORGIUS (69)—Jan. 22, martyr. During the reign of Leo the Armenian, the pagan Bulgarians attacked Adrianople, seized Manuel the bishop, whom they at once martyred, with a large number of captives, clergy and laity. Tzocus, the Bulgarian prince, gathered together the captives, among whom was Georgius, and upon their refusal to adjure their faith put them all to death. (Bas. Menon; Finlay, Hist. of Greece, i. 114.) [G. F. S.]

GEORGIUS (70), the name of three hegumen of Greek monasteries, present at the council of Nicea in 787, viz. of Dominica (Mansi, xiii. 153 c.).

The Holy Theotokos (ib. 155 b).

Pega (ib. xiii. 1112 d, Gregorius in the Latin). [C. II.]

GEORGIUS (71), presbyter at the council of Nicea, 787, representing the bishop of Cyprus and Cilicia (Mansi, xiii. 145 b, Greek; Gregorius in the Latin). [C. III.]

GEORGIUS (72), a layman of Paepusus, went to Gregory Nazianzen by his friend Theodorus bishop of Tyana, that he might convince him of the guilt he had involved himself in by refusing to be bound by an oath he had taken, on the ground that it had never been registered. Georgius had brought the matter into court, and seems to have gained his suit. Gregory succeeded in bringing him to repentance, and sent him back to Theodorus with the request that he would inflicts suitable penance on him, regulating its length by his contrition (Greg. Naz. Epist. 210). Georgius's letter was read in the second council of Constantinople by Epaenetus, the bishop of Tyana, by whom Georgius was stated to have been the superior of a convent at Paepusus (Labbe, Concil. v. 477). Tillemont doubts the correctness of this statement (Mém. Eccl. ix. 570). [E. V.]

GEORGIUS (73), a prefect under the emperor Phocas. He was sent into Palestine, about 606, to compel the Jews to receive baptism, a course often pursued by the Byzantine emperors, and a notable instance of which occurred a century later, at the beginning of the reign of Leo the GEPTAN

GERADUS, bishop of Bologna. [GERARDUS.]

GERAINT. [GRANSTIRUS.]

GERALDUS (1) (GARALTY) of Mayo, abbot and bishop, March 13. A life of this saint taken from a MS. of the monastery of All Saints, in Lough Ree, and supposed to have been written by the monk Augustin Magrailand, is given by Colgan (Acta SS. 599 sq.) It is also given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 13 Mart. ii. 288) from MSS. in the Bodleian Library, but is cut up and presented with a running comm. (Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. ii. 571, pt. ii. 797, gives the MS. and printed authorities; see also the article in O’Hanlon’s Irish Saints. iii. 361 sq.) Unfortunately this life is almost entirely unworthy of credit, being full of anachronisms and fables. Geraldus is believed to have been of Saxon lineage and birth, and is generally supposed to have been one of those who accompanied Colman (Feb. 19) from Lindisfarne after the synod at Whitby (Cogan (23)) in the year 664: but if so, he must have been young when he left Northumbria and settled with the other Saxons in Colman’s new foundation at Mayo, unless, with some, we place his death at a very early date. He became abbot of the monastery of Mayo, but whether he was also bishop or not is a matter of dispute, depending in great measure upon the interpretation to be put upon the entry in the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Tighernach, at A.D. 731 and 732, and thus upon the date assigned to his death. It is not to be credited, as told in the Life of St. Gerard, that Adamnan (Sept. 29), who died A.D. 704, governed the church of Mayo for seven years after St. Gerard’s death, and that therefore St. Gerard died at latest in the year 697, as accepted by Ussher and O’Conor. The Four Masters give his death in A.D. 736, but O’Donovan is very strongly in favour of the entry in the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Tighernach being real, “A.D. 732, the pontiff of Mayo of the Saxons, Gerard, died,” i.e. “Gerald, pontiff of Mayo of the Saxons, dies.” This is the date usually received, but it is not free from doubt, as the reading varies so much from the usual idiom. He is also said to have been superior of a monastery at Elitheria or Killan-alithir, “the church of the pilgrim,” and of another called Teach-Saxon, both in the diocese of Tuam, and probably dependencies of Mayo. His feast is usually observed on March 13, but March 10 and 12 are also named as his commemorations. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. ii. iii. c. 19, § 7; Gen. &c., of H. &i. 845; O’Donovan, 396 sq.; after O’Donovan, 422.) Reeves, St. Adamnan, liii. iv., Uhsher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. vol. ind. Chron. A.D. 692, 697; O’Conor, Rev. Hist. Script. ii. 219, n. 4, 238, n. 41, iv. 82, n. 2; Ware, Hist. ant. c. 26; Prose, Roy. Accad. viii. 57; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 75; Kelly, Cat. Ir. S. Mar. 12, pp. xvii. 95, 304.

GERALDUS (2) L. (GERALDUS), said to have been thirteenth bishop of Aft, following Magnericus, or Magnicus, and succeeded by Seandrus, but the only authority for his existence is the occurrence of his name in the catalogue of the monastery of St. Aignan. His date is placed towards the close of the 8th century (Gall. Christ. i. 338, 356).

GERALDUS (1) [GERONITUS], sixteenth bishop of Bologna, between Julianus I. and Theodoreus I. The signature Laurentius Bohieniensis occurs in the 5th synod of Rome in 500 (Mansi. viii. 299 c), and Bohieniensis has been suspected as a misreading for Bononiensis, thus making Laurentius and not Gerardus the bishop of Bologna at that date. But Ughelli shows that the suspicion is groundless (Ug. Ital. Sac. ii. 11; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Ital., iii. 462, 579).

[O. H.]

GERALDUS (2) (GERALDUS), bishop of Veltiria (Vettelri), c. A.D. 596–600. He had been a monk under Gregory the Great. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 59; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Ital. i. 458.)

[O. S. G.]

GERARDUS (3), tenth bishop of Lään, succeeding Peregrinus, and followed by Sculfus in the latter half of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 512.)

[O. A. B.]

GERASIMUS (1), one of four bishops named in the inscription of an edict of the emperor Gratin, in which he defines the respective limits of the jurisdictions of ecclesiastical and civil tribunals. The edict is dated Treves,July 17, A.D. 375 (Cod. Theod. XVI. ii. 23). The others are Artemius, Eudocius, and Apullus. There was an Artemius bishop of Embrun, A.D. 374 (Gall. Ch. iii. 1055), and an Artemius bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, after A.D. 388 (Gall. Ch. ii. 229; Greg. Turon. Hist. Fr. i. 41; ii. 12).

[T. W. D.]

GERASIMUS (2), a celebrated anchorite of Palestine towards the middle of the 5th century. He was a native of Lydia. After having gained great celebrity by his monastic virtues, he was led astray by Theodosius the intruding bishop of Jerusalem, and adopted his heretical tenets. Having been led to visit Euthymius at his laura he was by him brought back to a sound faith (Cyril. Scythop. Vit. S. Euthym. § 77). Gerasimus afterwards founded a large monastery near the Jordan, affording accommodation for as many as seventy anchorites, in the middle of which he constructed a cenobium for the younger monks, who were not yet accustomed to the austerities of monastic life. His rule, which is given by Cyrillus, was one of excessive severity. He absolutely refused his anchorites leave to heat water, to partake of cooked food, or to have a lamp to read by. Such indulgences he said were suitable only for coenobites. He is reported to have fasted through the whole of Lent, taking no food for forty days besides the sacramental elements. He died March 5, A.D. 475. John Moschus gives a long account of his familiar companionship with a lion (Joaness Mosch. Prat. Spir. cap. 107; see also Boll. Acta SS. 5 Mart. i. 386).

GERBALDUS, thirty-fourth or thirty-fifth bishop of Liége, beth. Agilfridus and Walcardus. In the Gesta Episcoporum Lothianorum of Anselm the name only occurs (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 1081). He is said to have sat for twenty-five years, and to have died on the 15th of November, probably in 810, after enriching the church with gifts. He is one of the bishops mentioned as having been present at the canonicalization of St. Liudger in the spurious letter attributed to St. Lindger of Münster. (Gesta Pontificum Leodium, tom. i. 150, ed. Chapenville, Liége, 1612; Gall. Christ. iii. 832.)

GERBERTA, daughter of St. Gertrude abbess of Hamay and mother of St. Adalbald. (Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. ii. p. 941, ed. 1699.)

GEREBERN (Genebern, Genebrard), martyr, commemorated May 15. He was an Irish priest, who baptized and instructed St. Dimma (May 19) of Gheel, while her Christian sympathies were yet unknown. (Dimma.) He also accompanied her from Ireland to the Continent, and was put to death at the same time and place with his pupil. He is commemorated on the same day, and is regarded as the patron of Sonsbeck in the ancient Duchy of Cleves. But by Dempster (Hist. Eccles. Societ. i. 311) he is called S. Gerchernaus Scotus, i.e. S. Philibius Scoti discipulus in extrema senecta ac S. Philibii socius presbyter vitae religiosissimae. &c., and is said to have left Wales for Ireland, and written Ad Dynpanam Institutio, lib. i.; Pro vero Dei cultu, lib. i.; his martyrdom taking place at Gheel in the year 700 (Tanner, Bibl. 312). But evidently much of this is fanciful. (Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Brit. ii. c. 16, § 13; O'Hanlon, Life of St. Dynpana, pass.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, May 15; Usuard, Mart. Auct. 15 Mai. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxvii. 57 sq.)

GEREBERTUS, sixteenth bishop of Verdun, succeeding his uncle Gislaufidis, and followed by Armonius. Before his consecration he was a monk of Tholey (Theogelium), a monastery in the diocese of Treves, in which capacity he fought against the exactions of Ebroin. He is said to have died in 689, after an episcopate of twenty-four years (Gall. Christ. xiii. 563, 1170).

GEREBOLDUS, ST., thirteenth bishop of Bayeux, succeeding St. Rognobertus, and followed by St. Framboldus, subscribed the council of Rouen, held under the presidency of the archbishop Anbertus (A.D. 682 or 689). He was buried in the monastery of Liberiacum (Livray) which he founded, and is commemorated in his own diocese Dec. 7. In the Auturia of Grevena to Ussard for that day occurs a legend of his being imposed upon and cast into the sea as a punishment for his firm resistance to the sin of unchastity. (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 778; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. xi. 1044, Flor. 1759-98; Gall. Christ. xii. 350.)

GERETRANUS, ST.

GEREMARUS, abbot of Flavicium (St. Germer de Flay) in the district of Beauvais. He is said to have been born at the villa of Girardranda or Walandra, on the Itta, about A.D. 10, his parents being named Rigobert and Aga, the latter of a noble Frankish family. He was invited to court by king Dagobert, who greatly honoured him; married a lady named Domnus; founded a monastery called Insula, near Flavicium, on a spot afterwards named St. Peteris in the Wood, and placed Archarius as abbot over it. Longing at length for monastic retirement himself, he made over his property to his son Amalbert, and retired from court in the eleventh year of the reign of King II., 690, and lived on a piece of land near the town of Pentallum near Rouen, on the river Lirisius. Of this house he became abbot, but resigned his office and withdrew as a hermit to a cave near the Seine, in which seclusion he was ordained presbyter by Audouenus (St. Ouen), bishop of Rouen. His son, who had succeeded him at Court, and followed the king to the war against the Frisons, died in 654 prematurely cut off, and with the property which thus returned to his hands Geremar erected the monastery of Flavicium, on the Itta, over which he presided for three years and a half, until his death on Sept. 24, 658. An anonymous ancient life of Geremar was appended by D'Achery in 1651 to his edition of Guibert of Nogent, and may also be seen in Patrolog. Lat. ciii. 1203. It was edited with a few notes by Mabillon (Acta SS. O.S.B. ii. 455) and by the Bollandists (Sept. vi. 698) with more notes and a commentary by Perier. In these notes some of the obscure localities of the narrative are identified. The Itta is the Epte. Warandrand is Vazres near its left bank, 5 miles from Gournay. Flavicium is Germer de Flay, across the Epte and in a line due east with Beauvais. Pentallum (which was existing in the ninth century) was beyond the Seine between Pontademer and Honfleur; Lirisius the Limais. Geremar's successor in the monastery of Flavicium is not known, but the third abbot is named Gennardus (Gall. Christ. ix. 787).

GEREON, martyr. [LEO THIBAEL]

GERESINA is described by Dempster (Hist. Eccles. Societ. i. 312), as matron and queen of Sicily, a Scot by birth, sister of St. Daria, aunt of St. Ursula, mother of St. Adrian prince and martyr, and of the daughters Babilia Aurea and Victoria, and also sister of bishop Macrinius; she suffered in Germany with St. Ursula and her eleven thousand virgins, A.D. 454. But the whole tale is evidently fabulous.

GERETRANUS, ST., eleventh bishop of Bayeux, succeeding Leudovaldus, and followed by St. Rognobertus, at the close of the 6th century. He is commemorated in the Gallican Martyrology, Dec. 7 (Gall. Christ. xi. 349). [S. A. E.] GERFRID (1) (GILFREDUS, GILFRIUS), said to have been twenty-second bishop of Laon, following Siegobaudus, and succeeded by Wamilo II, but his consecration for the church of Noyon was contested. He was present in 798 and 799 at the dedication of the churches of the monastery of St. Ricier (Centulense) in the diocese of Amiens. (Le Coite, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 799, n. vii. tom. vi. p. 81; an. 818, n. xx. vii. 493; Mabillon, Annales Ord. Ben. ii. 331; Gall. Christ. i. 512.) [S. A. B.]

GERFRID (2) succeeded his uncle Liudger as bishop of Münster in A.D. 809. In A.D. 819 he and his uncle Hildegrim, bishop of Halberstadt, are mentioned together as visitors of the abbey of Werden. In A.D. 824 he received from Frithiward half a farm in the vill of Besig, in the Riparian Gau, with rights of pasture and wood-taking, in exchange for half a farm in the vill of Castorps, in the Brokterga, and 20 "Furlangas" in the vill of Werins, in the Gau of Dregin. In the same year, he granted 3 milia to Noluton, founded by St. Liudger, of which his cousin Heriburgius was abbot. The farms of Buchbildi and Oldinchus. In A.D. 838 he is mentioned as being present at the palatine in Nimeguen, at the settlement before the emperor Louis and his sons Louis and Charles, of a dispute between count Guibert and abbots Ernhaus of Fulda. He died in A.D. 839. (Eichard, Regesta Historiae Westfaliae, i. 89-99; Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptor. iii. 3.) [F. D.]

GERICUS. [GOERICUS.]

GERNUS. [GARINUS.]

GERIVALDUS, bishop. [GARIVALDUS.]

GERMANA, virgin martyr; commemorated Oct. 1. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 1 Oct. i. 31-4) give her acts taken by Vignierius from three Ms. codices of the priories of St. Germana and St. Machutus (Maclou), and prefix a commentarius praevisus; her acts, written by an anonymous author, have no evident authority, and the date of her martyrdom is unfixed to more than the 5th century. Its place is conjectured to have been at Bar-sur-Asne rather than Bar-sur-Seine, in the French department of the Aube, and her priory was probably or near the present Mont-St.-Germaine. (See also Sausseus, Mart. Gall. 674, Paris, 1637.)

According to her legend, she suffered death at the hands of the Vandals when they came into France; her decapitated body was buried in the church of St. Stephen, or where it afterwards stood. Vignierius calls her deceased. [J. G.]

GERMANICUS (1), a nobleman concerning whom Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. iv. 13) writes to Vicius. He was son of one bishop and father of another, yet at sixty years of age dressed and lived like a young man. Sidonius is distressed at his spiritual condition, andpraystthe teacher to influence him to enter the sacred ministry. [R. T. S.]

GERMANICUS (2)—Jan. 19. A martyr in the flower of youth with the aged Polycarp at Smyrna, a.d. 167. [POLYCARP.] His courage in provoking the beasts to which he was condemned is praised in the circular letter addressed by the church of Smyrna to other Christian churches. He suffered a short time before Polycarp. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Adon. Usuard.: Euseb. H. E. iv. 15; Ruinart, Acta Sancora; Celiier, i. 393.) [G. T. S.]

GERMANIO (1), the thirty-second bishop of Jerusalem, who succeeded Pius at the end of the 2nd century. He was succeeded by Gordius. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 10; Epiphanius, Haer. i. 20.) [E. V.]

GERMANIO (2). Pope Innocent I. In a letter to Marcinus, bishop of Naisus, written at Ravenna, states that Germanus and Lupteius, who claimed to be a priest and deacon respectively, had come to him as a deputation from many others in the same position as themselves. They complained that, notwithstanding that their ordination by Bonosus had been long before his condemnation, Marcinus refused to admit them to communion with him, although he promised them to keep possession of their churches. They also accused one Rusticus, who apparently had been ordained by Bonosus, of getting himself ordained a second time. Innocent accordingly reminds Marcinus that he had pronounced that those who had been ordained by Bonosus before his condemnation ought to be received back into the church if they had wished, or even then wished, to return. (S. Innocent. Epist. 16, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 519; Cellier, Histoire des Aut. sacr. vii. 514.) [BONOSUS.] [F. D.]

GERMANUS (1), of a bishop of some part of Egypt, and for a time an adversary of St. Dionysius of Alexandria. In answer to the calumnies, St. Dionysius wrote various letters, parts of which are extant in Eusebius. Germanus had accused St. Dionysius of cowardice in neglecting his people while he took care of his own personal safety, and in taking to flight in order to avoid persecution, and of refusing to hold the public assemblies of the faithful. Germanus' answer to this, St. Dionysius recounts what had happened in the persecutions under the emperors Valerian and Decius. (Eusebius, bk. vi. ch. 40, and bk. vii. ch. 11; Tillemont, iv. pp. 272, 273.) [J. W. S.]

GERMANUS (2), bishop of Neapoli (Sicam, or Nabis), in Palaestina, present at the council of Ancyræ, A.D. 314, and that of Neocossaeas in the same year. (Mansi, iii. 534, 548; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 647.) [J. de S.]

GERMANUS (3), bishop of Petra, who was intrusive by the Arian party into that see, when the orthodox bishop Asterius was banished by Constantius. He assembled the synod at Petra in A.D. 359, a.d., and signed with the semi-Arian party. (Epiphanius, Haer. lxxxiii. § 26; Mansi, iii. 524 a; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 723.) [E. V.]

GERMANUS (4), bishop of Corcyra on the coast of Cilicia. He was present at the second general council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 568; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 879.) [J. de S.]

GERMANUS (5), bishop of Besançon, in the 4th century. His martyrdom is fixed at A.D.

But in the Baume, near Besançon, shows no trace of having ever had walls. The foundation of the abbey of that place is ascribed to Germanus. (Boll. Acta SS. 11 Oct. v. 622, 626 e; Gall. Chr. xlv. 7.) GERMANUS (6), the name of two bishops of Mauretanica Caesariensis, viz. of Gyparsia (Catholic) and of Zugabberia, Sugabbaris, or Suebiarita (Donatist), present at the Carthaginian conference of 411. (Mon. Vet. Dom. 128; 135.) [H. W. F.]

GERMANUS (7), one of the bishops who met at Carthage, A.D. 412, against Pelagius and Celestius. (Aug. Ep. 175.) [H. W. F.]

GERMANUS (8), ST, bishop of Auxerre in the fifth century. His life was written about 40 years after his death, i.e. about A.D. 488 (Gallica Christiana, xlii. 262) by Constantius, a presbyter of Lyons, himself an eminent personage in the Gallic church, and highly esteemed by Sidonius Apollinaris (Sidon. Ep. i. i, iii. 2, in which latter epistle he addresses Constantius as "aetate gravis, nobilitate sublimis, religione venerabilis," and as a benefactor in more than one sense to the city of Chalon). Constantius undertook the task at the request of Patiens bishop of Arles, who was not only the bishop of Auxerre, but the presbyter of Lyons, and was hence named at the end of his written life. He published it at the request of Consurius bishop of Auxerre. In his preface he says that a long time has elapsed since the death of Germanus, who was born "probably about the year 378" (Life of St. German, in Lives of the English Saints, p. 15) at Auxerre (Auëssiodorum, Autissiodorium, or Autansion, Ammian. xvi. 2, 5), reckoned as the third city in Lagodunensia Quarta, or Senonea (Bingham, l. ix. c. 6, s. 8), and situated near the southern border of what was afterwards named Champagne, and about the centre of the present department of the Yonne. It is described in Gallica Christiana, as an "old and illustrious city, not inferior to many great Gallic cities in respect to its fertile soil, its vineyards, its navigable river"; it had been evangelized, according to its local traditions, by Peregrinus, sent from Rome in the middle of the 3rd century, and Amator, who came to its see in 388, was reckoned as its fifth bishop. The parents of Germanus (to adopt the familiar abbreviation of his name) were of noble descent; their names (see Tillemont, xv. 8) are given as Rusticus and Germanilla. They caused their son to be baptized, and gave him the best attainable education; he attended "Gallic schools," in which, as St. Jerome wrote in A.D. 411 (Ep. 125, 6) "learning was most flourishing;" among the great number of "auspicia," or the most accessible to a native of Auxerre, was at Lyons; after a time he went to Rome, studied for the bar, and practised as an advocate before "the tribunal of the prefect," on his return he married a lady named Eustachia, and rose to high secular office by becoming one of the six "dukes" of Gaul, each of whom had the government of a certain number of provinces (Gibbon, ii. 320). Auxerre was included in Germanus's district: the young duke, "whose habit then was rather to indulge in the pursuits of youth than to give serious heed to Christian duties," was a keen huntsman, and used to hang up the heads of his game on a large pear-tree in the midst of his native forest. This Amator, who saw in it a resemblance to a Pagan fashion of honouring large trees. He often reminisced with Germanus, but in vain. However, one day the "duke" went to a country estate of his, and the bishop took the opportunity of destroying the pear-tree, and casting away the heads of game, which Constantius calls " aucelec." Germanus, hearing of this, actually set off for Auxerre in order to kill the bishop: Amator, warned of his peril, and "thinking himself unworthy to be a martyr," took the extraordinary step of visiting the prefect Julian, then at Antan, and requesting his permission to make German a cleric, as he was the fittest man to succeed to his own see. Julian reluctantly assented: Amator returned, exhorted his flock to choose his future successor, because he felt his death to be at hand, led them to the church, bade them lay aside their weapons, and set the Germans on them. The two men expired in the doors being barred, laid hands on the duke, cut his hair short, and then conferred on him the clerical character, bidding him live as one who was destined to be bishop. Soon afterwards he fell ill, obtained from his people a promise to elect German and, on Wednesday morning, May 1, 418, caused himself to be carried to the church, and was buried there. Twelve years more upon his throne. He was buried beside his predecessors in the neighbouring Mount Austrics, and German, unanimously elected, was consecrated on Sunday, July 7. "He received the episcopate under compulsion, but it wrought in him a sudden and total change." His wife became to him as a sister: he distributed his property to the poor: he became a severe ascetic, as Constantius says, a "persecutor of his body," abstaining from salt, oil, and even from vegetables, wine, excepting a small quantity muced in Christmas-day or Easter-day, and from wheaten bread, instead of which he ate barley bread, with a preliminary tawing (coinem procelam). He wore the same hood and tunic in all seasons, and slept on ashes in a frame of boards. "Let anyone speak his mind," says Constantius, to whom some details of German's life must have come down not free from exaggeration: "but I positively assert that the blessed German endured a long martyrdom." At that time the hospitable guests a good meal, though he would not share it with them. He founded a monastery outside Auxerre, on the opposite bank of the Yonne, which he often crossed in a boat to visit the abbot and brethren. His biographer, who believes miracles to have accompanied him through life, tells, how by the application to him was effectual against an epidemic affection of the throat, which had proved widely fatal. We must now follow German to Britain. Pelagianism had been rife in its founder's native island; and the British clergy, unable to refute the heretics, requested help from the church, which we may say from their mother church, of Gaul. Accordingly, a number was assembled, and by consent of all application was made to the two glorious luminaries of religion, German and Lupus, the bishop of Troyes, both of whom accepted the call, the more really because of the labour involved in it. So says Constantius, who is followed and for the most part trusted by the army, to which he belongs. But here comes a difficulty. Prosper of Aquitaine, a contemporary, in his Chronicle for the year 429, says that pope Coelestinus, "at the suggestion of the deacon Palladius, sent Germanus as his representative" (sic suus) into Britain: and in his Contra Collatorem, written about 432, speaks of Coelestinus as "taking pains to keep the Roman island" (Britain) "catholic" (c. 21, or 24). Now Prosper could not but be well informed about the proceedings of Coelestinus, for he was at Rome, for the express purpose of lodging a complaint against Gallic Semi-Pelagians, in 431. Constantius wrote about sixty years after Germanus' British journey, but with full access to local information. Unless Prosper wrote a mere falsehood, Coelestinus must have had something to do with Germanus' mission; but it is likely enough that Prosper from his "Roman" standpoint would overrate the importance of Coelestinus' action, and also that Coelestinus would dwell simply on the election of the Gallic synod. The truth probably lies in a combination of the pope's action with the councils, at any rate so far as German was concerned. Lupus is not named with German by Prosper; of him evidently Coelestinus took no thought, but we may reasonably believe that Coelestinus' mission was sent by the pope to German either before (as Tillemont thinks, Memoires, xiv. 154) or at the time of the Gallic synod: it is not probable that, as Lingard supposes, the synod's commission was only to Lupus, and German was "sent" by the pope alone (Angil. Sac. Ch. i. 8).

When the two prelates, travelling northward, reached Metrodorum or Nanterre, near Paris, German saw in the crowd which came to meet them a girl named Genovefa, asked her whether she wished to dedicate herself to God, received her affirmative answer, and bade her live as one exposed to Christ. She became "St. Genevieve of Paris." Lupus had a brilliant voyage across the Channel: Constanthus, in whose eyes German's path was, as a matter of course, strewn with miracles, affirms that he stilled the storm by pouring oil into the sea, with invocation of the Trinity. Arrived in Britain, the bishops preached the doctrines of grace in churches, in the country, on the roads, with great effect: at last the Pelagian leaders took heart, and challenged them to a discussion, which took place apparently near Verulam. A great multitude assembled; "on the one hand," says Constantius, "was Divina authority, on the other, human presumption;" the heretics, conspicuous by their wealth and their rich garb, were put to silence by the doughty and discoursing disciples, and opened the debate in speeches more verbose than forcible. The two bishops replied, appealing to Scripture in support of the Catholic position; "pursing forth," says Constantius, "the torrents of their eloquence with the thunder peals (Bede alters this into 'showerers') of evangelists and apostles. They silenced their opponents, and the shouts of the assembly proved their victory. German and Lupus then visited the reputed tomb of the British proctomartyr Alban, and Constantius saw the famous tale of the Alleluia Victory. The Britons were menaced by Picts and Saxons; German and Lupus encourage them to resist, catechize and baptize the still heathen majority. After they had strengthened them, German, after a voyage of 430, station them in a narrow glean, and at the invaders' approach repeat thrice the Paschal Alleluia. The Britons send the shout ring ing through the defile; the enemy is seized with panic, and "faith without the sword wins a bloodless victory." On returning home German found the people of Auxerre suffering under an unusual demand of tribute; he set forth at once for Arles, the seat of the central government, and obtained from the prefect Auxilius a "remedies," or remission of the demands.

In 447 he was again entreated by British churchmen to aid them against Pelagianism. He took with him Severus, bishop of Treves, a disciple of Lupus, and having, on his way, vindi cated Genovefa against calumniators, he landed in Britain, and (not without a miracle, according to Constantius) triumphed again over the Pela gians, and procured their banishment from the island. Welsh traditions have much to tell about German's activities on behalf of the British church. They lay the scene of the Alleluia victory at Maes-garmon, near Mold; they speak of colleges founded by German, of national customs traced to his authority; and although much of this is legendary, and the stories in Nennius about his relations with king Vortigern are apocryphal, it seems improbable that he did more for British Christianity than Constantius knew of, or felt an interest in recording. He had no sooner returned home than another occasion for his humane intervention presented itself. The Armoricians, whose country had not yet acquired, through British immigration, the name of Brittany, were in a state of chronic revolt against the empire. They were, if not the whole, yet the greater part of that vast coalition of insurgents who went by the name of Bagaudae (Life of St. German, p. 219), but who had been goaded into insub ordination on the morrow of rebellions and robberies, the proscriptions and spoliations carried on by the provincial government (Sulpician, Oub. Dei, v. 6). Aetius, now again at the head of affairs under the emperor Valentinian III., and invested with the dignity of patrician, gave permission to Eochar, king of the Alanis, to invade their territory, which had once apparently been under German's rule as duke. He now stepped between the people and their one mics; he went to meet the Alanis, where "cavalry, like an iron mass, filled the road" (Constant. ii. 5). He reached the presence of Eochar, and entreated him to pause; the barbarian put aside the request; the old bishop, taking his life in his hands, mounted his horse, and with his bridles, and this daring act overawed the barbarians to promise a truce until German should have obtained favourable terms for Armorica from the emperor or from Aetius. German set forth at once for Italy, and a beautiful instance of his kindness of heart occurred while he was crossing the Alps. He fell in with a poor old labourer, lame and carrying a burden. They came to a torrent crossed by slippery stones. The bishop of Auxerre, the envoy between Armoricians and their emperor, himself about 70 years old, carried over on his own shoulders first the bundle, and then the old man himself. It was June 19, 448, when he reached Milan; after leaving it, he yielded, against his attendants' wish, to a request for his presence on the part of a fever-stricken family. He entered Ravenna by night, but his hope of their escaping a public reception was disappointed. Gallia Placidia, the empress-mother, sent him a silver dish full of delicate food, but containing no meat. He sold the dish for the poor, having given its contents to his attendants; in its place he sent back a little wooden patera with barley bread; the empress, we are told, kept the bread, and encircled the plate with gold. He was said to have opened a prison by his prayers; the fact being, apparently, that the empress, at his entreaty, released the inmates. He obtained pardon and immunity for the Armoricans, but unfortunately news came that they had again revolted. His power of helping them was thus destroyed by their own act; they were punished by the invasion which could no longer be delayed. Greenland's life-work was over; he had now a dream in which he seemed to receive from his Lord provision for a journey to his country. The bishops who constantly attended on him, and to whom he told the dream, interpreted it in an earthly sense; he answered, "Well do I know what country is which God promises to His servants." He was soon afterwards taken ill. His lodging overflowed with visitors; a choir kept up ceaseless psalmody by his bedside. He expired on the 31st of July, 448, having been bishop 30 years and 25 days; his body was embalmed, and a magnificent funeral journey to Gaul attested the reverence of the court. In Gaul, roads were mended and bridges made in expectation of the corpse; and the interment took place in a chapel near Auxerre, on October 1. So lived and died St. German, of whom the "Missa S. Germani" says, in a terse summary of his career, "He so began as to increase; he so sought as to conquer." Constantius's Life of Germanus is in Surius's De Pontificibus Sanctorum Bavariae; and Av. in a metrical Life, and a prose account of his "miracles," both by a monk named Hereric, are in Acta Sanctorum, July 31. Hereric wrote under Charles the Bald. He follows Constantius in ignoring a papal commission to German (Monr. Life); but he gives the legend of German sending his disciple Patrick to Celestine, and Celestine sending him to Ireland (De Mirac.). He professes to give incidents which Constantius had passed over. In spite of his wearisome prolixity and exaggerations, one line of his on German's excellence is worth quoting; after mentioning his teaching, labour, kindness, constancy, fervour, he adds: "Quodque est praecipium, dilectio plurima fratrwm."

GERMANUS (9), bishop of Amiens, said by Rosweyd, on the authority of Belgian MSS., to have been "Anglus Natisce" converted by St. Germanus of Auxerre in 429. Other accounts make him Scotch (i.e. Irish) by birth, and relate that his father, prince Audians, came for some purpose to Scotia, and there fell in with the French saint. Rosweyd also believes him to be the same with St. Eloquiws, who came with SS. Fursey, Columbanus, and others from Ireland to Gaul. By others he is supposed to have been a companion of St. Boniface in the 8th century. His legend contains an extraordinary notice if Julian the archdeacon, whom he made a priest. In this legend Germanus of Auxerre meets Audinius and his wife Aquilia with their little son, and struck with their angelic appearance takes the child, gives him his own name, and educates him. The young Germanus, when grown up, sailed on a waggon-wheel to Gaul, and working everywhere miracles, visited Rome, Spain, and England again, but was at last martyred at Amiens. (Boll. Acta SS. 2 Mai. i. 259.)

GERMANUS (10), reputed bishop of Ma. In the Mart. Tottiguli on July 30 there is the commemoration of Germanus, son of Goll, said by many to have been the Germanus who was appointed by St. Patrick to be the first bishop of Ma, as related by Joceline. His consecrations is assigned to the year 447, and he is still reckoned patron of the ruined church within the precincts of Peel Castle, in the parish of St. German, Isle of Man. His ancient feast in Ma was July 3. (Colgan, Acta SS. 59, cc. 1, 2, 60, n. 5; and Tr. Thas. 86, c. 92, 98, c. 132, 113, n. 103; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. vi. 181, Ind. Chron. A.D. 474; Mart. GERMANUS (13), bishop of Fissanus (Pesaro) c. A.D. 497. He was sent on a mission to Constantinople, together with Creconius, bishop of Tod, by pope Anastasius ii. (Man. viii. 189 d; Ugellii, ItaL Secr. ii. 948; Cappelletti, De Chiese d'It. iii. 341; Jaffe, Regest. Pont. p. 61; Ceillier, Autres Sav. i. 515.)

GERMANUS (15), third bishop of the Verno- mandii (Vermandosia) before the 6th century. The seat of the bishopric was afterwards fixed at Noyon. (Gall. Christ. ix. 979.)

GERMANUS (16), bishop of Capua, seat with other legates in 519 to Constantinople by pope Hormisdas. They were instructed to hold communion with no one who would not sign the Lbelius, which contained the condemnation of the patriarch Acacius and his successors, Euphemius and Macedonianus, on the ground of their unorthodoxy in the matter of Monophysitism. The legates were received with great honour in Constantinople. Hormisdas wrote several letters to Germanus and his companions (Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 67–69; Man. viii. 442, seq.). Gregory the Great relates that St. Benedict saw the soul of
GERMANUS OF PARIS

GERMANUS (18) (GERMAIN), ST., 20th bishop of Paris, born at Autun of parents of rank named Eleutherius and Eusebia (c. a.d. 496). He was sent to school at Avallon, between Autun and Auxerre, and next, to Lurs, near Vezelay, to the Loria, where he was well educated. In due time he was ordained deacon by St. Agrippinus, and three years later priest. He was next made abbot of the monastery of St. Symphorian at Autun, by Nectarius the bishop. Here his generosity to the poor was so great that he nearly starved his monks, whom he induced in rebellion. In 516, being present at Paris on some mission to Childerbert, when that see was vacant by the death of Eusebius, he was raised to the archbishopric. His great object seems to have been to check, as far as he was able, the unbridled licence of the Frank kings, and to ameliorate the misery produced by wars. In 517 he was present at the third council of Paris, at which the assembled prelates tried to devise some cure for the evils suffered by the church from the miseries and disturbances of the times. He appears to have exercised considerable influence over Childerbert, though the authenticity of the charter cannot be said to have that kind of sanctity to give to him and the Church of Paris the royal domain of Celles in the district of Melun. It is not unreasonable to suppose that Childerbert's edict against the pagan revelry with which holy days were celebrated was due to St. Germanus (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 1121). It was no doubt, too, that his advice that Childerbert should call the church of St. Vincent to receive the stole of that martyr which he had brought from Spain. (See the charter given by Almoine, de Gest. Franc. ii. 20, ed. Jac. du Brevi, Paris, 1802, and cf. the Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 270.) This church was said to have been consecrated by St. Germanus. Childerbert died on Dec. 23, 538). Childerbert's successor Clothaire was, according to Venantius Fortunatus, at first not equally amenable, but a sickness changed his disposition. It was to St. Germanus that Eadegund in 539 wrote Sacraentales Litteras, conveying him to intercede for her with the king, who was on his way to take her by force from her husband Tarsi. This king himself in tears at Clothaire's feet before the shrine of St. Martin of Tours, the archbishop induced him to forego his resolve and ask the queen's pardon. In 566, at the second Council of Tours, he was one of the seven prelates who signed the letter to Eadegund sanctioning rules for her monas- teries; he consecrated Agnes in 570, and in 588 Charibert was excommunicated by him for sacrilege. In 573 St. Germanus was present at the fourth Council of Paris, at which Promotus was deposed, and he subscribed the letter addressed by the council to Sigebert, with special words of entreaty of his own. In 575 when Sigebert was preparing to crush his brother Chilperic, and for this purpose summoned to his standard the barbarians from across the Rhine, Germanus appealed in a letter to queen Brunichilde to avert the destruction which was impending over the country (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 77; cf. Cellier, xi. 307), and when Sigebert arrived in Paris on his way to besiege Chilperic in Tournay, St. Germanus met him and prophesied his death if he persisted in seeking his brother's destruction. The assassins of Fredegund soon after verified the prediction. Germanus himself survived but a short time, dying the 28th of May. The year is given as 577, but the Leiria, where he was buried in an oratorium near the vestibule of the church of St. Vincent, and a metrical epitaph, ascribed to Chilperic, but not perhaps his unaided composition, was placed above his remains. (Almoine, lit. 10; Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. t. 445, Paris, 1668-1701; Gall. Christ. vii. 20.)

In some of the Mss. of Aimoin (de Gest. Franc. iii. 9, Bouquet. iii. 69, n.) there is a story, apparently without foundation, that he made a pilgrimage to the holy places at Jerusalem, and on his return visited Justinian at Constantinople, whose presence gave him relief, but gladly accepted some relics for his church of St. Vincent. This story is repeated in the Chronique de St. Denis (liv. iii. 2, Bouquet, iii. 210-211).

In the 7th century his tomb was enriched and ornamented by St. Eligius of Noyon (Audoenus, Vita S. Eligii, i. 32, ed. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 504), and in a.d. 754 the body was removed with great ceremony by Lantredus, abbot of St. Vincent, from the oratory into the church itself, in the presence of Pippin and his son, Charles the Great, then a child. This church henceforth was called after him (St. German des Prés).

Besides the letter to Brunichilde above mentioned, there is extant by St. Germanus a treatise on the mass, or exposition of the old Gallic Liturgy (Patr. Lat. lxxii. 89; cf. Cellier, xi. 308 seq., for the reasons for ascribing to it). It was first published by Martene and Durand (Theaurus Anecdotorum, v. 91). For a description and criticism of its contents see Cellier ut supr. and the Historia ecclesiastica, iii. (ed. de C. Clarmont) 43. Among its writings is also generally counted the privilege which he granted to his monastery exempting it from all episcopal jurisdiction (c. 565). This document is mentioned by Gisleman, who lived in the 9th century (Vita S. Doctoreci, Bouquet, iii. 430), and given in full by Almoine (de Gest. Franc. iii. 2, pp. 75-8, ed. Jacob du Brevi, Paris, 1608). His authenticity has not vehemently attacked and defended (see Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 81 n. and the authorities there referred to). St. Germanus's life was written by Venantius Fortunatus, his contemporary and friend, but the work is infected with the worst faults of the age, and is, in fact, little else than a string of anecdotes, to be found in Mabillon's Acts SS. Ord. S. Bened. t. 244-245, Paris, 1668-1701. Besides, and more important than it are the scattered notices in Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 26, 42, 52; v. 8; ix. 39; De Glor. Conf. lxxx.; Venant. Fort. Misc. ii. 13 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 102; Gesu Reg. Franc. c. xxvii.; Almoine, Hist. Franc. t. 16; Vita S. Doctoreci in Bouquet, iii. 437-8; Vita S.

GERMANUS (19), bishop of Damascus, and metropolitan of the province Phoenicia Secunda. He is mentioned by theophylactus Simocatta (lib. ii. cap. 1, 2), as having lived in the time of the emperor Mauricius. He was invited to the camp of Priscus, to perform the ceremonies and services proper to Passion week and Easter, in order to calm a rebellion among the soldiers. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 883. The account given by Theophanes varies considerably, but it is less trustworthy than that of Theophylact.)

GERMANUS (23), bishop of Ciumutubium in Africa (in what province is uncertain), at the council held in proconsular Africa A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 940 c; Mercelli, Afr. Crist. i. 144.) It has been suggested that the name of the town may be a corruption of civ. m. Tuburium, i.e. civitas major or minor) Tuburbi (Victor Vitensis, p. 15, vidi. Patr. Lat. xviii. note 52, 291 b).

[R. S. G.]

GERMANUS (24), bishop of Umana (Numana) near Ancona, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the heresy of the Monothelites. (Mansi, x. 866, 1163; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

GERMANUS (25), bishop of Tarentum, signed the second letter of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, x. 299.) [A. H. D. A.]

GERMANUS (26), 49th bishop of Constantinople, and patriarch, between John VI. the heretic and Anastasius I. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 235). He was born of a noble family, about 635, in the days of the emperor Heraclius. His father, Justianin, was a Patricius, who held many of the highest offices of state, but having become involved in a scheme against the succession of Constantine Pogonatus, was executed with the other conspirators. Germanus was on the same occasion castrated for his violent conduct (Theoph. Chrony. p. 293, sub anno mundi 6160). This was about 668, so that if Germanus was born in 635 he must have been over thirty years of age. By 680 he had risen to a leading position, for it is stated in a subsequent letter of pope Gregory II. to Leo the Isaurian that the sixth general council in that year originated in the zealous efforts of Germanus. (Migne, Pat. Lat. ixxxix. 517 n.)

The date of his appointment to the see of Cyrus is not known; but we learn from Theophanes (Chrony. A.D. 704, p. 320 in Pat. Gr. civiii. 771), and from Nicephorus the patriarch (De Reb. post Maur., p. 54, in Pat. Gr. c. 951) that he was bishop there in the reign of Phili-picus, who was emperor from Dec. 711 to Jan. 713. He is said by Theophanes and Nicephorus to have written at this time against the 5th General Council, and to have helped Philippius in his efforts for the Monothelites. But from the letter of Gregory just referred to, and from the further testimony borne to Germanus at the second council of Nicaea in 787 (Mansi, xiii. 718 n) this accusation is scarcely probable, and it is likely that the story which reached Theophanes and Nicephorus arose among Isaurian opponents.

On June 4, 713, the Catholic Artemius or Anastasius II. received the crown of the East. In his second year, 715, August 11, he held a synod, and procured the deposition of the heterodox patriarch John VI., and the translation of the bishop of Cyrus. Germanus must have been at this time eighty years old. How Stephanus junior, then an unborn child, through the eagerness of his mother obtained the patriarch's blessing at the ceremony of his enthronization in the great church will be related in the life of Stephanus.

Germanus signified his first year of office by holding a synod of a hundred bishops, in which he anathematized his predecessors Sergius, Cyrus, Pyrrhus, Peter, Paul, and John, and declared for the Two Willis and Two Operations. He thus avowed himself on the side of complete orthodoxy. This Council is said to have been held during the first siege of Constantinople by the Saracens. (Mansi, xiii. 258) it was to the latter that the row began at the end of 715 or the beginning of 716.

About Jan. 716 Anastasius was dethroned by Theodorus IV., the Adramyttian. Germanus was sent with other friends of the fallen emperor to Nicaea to acquaint him with the events of the capital and the hopelessness of his case (Theoph. 325; Niceph. 58), but does not seem to have otherwise suffered by this revolution. The rule of Theodosius, who shewed himself a zealous Catholic, terminated in March 717. The chronology of these few ephemeral reigns is obscure, and we have followed Pagi who has investigated it. (Baron. ann. 714; Fagi, l-rr.)

On March 25, 717, Germanus crowned Leo the Isaurian. The ceremony was performed with the customary honours of an orthodox prince, on the demand of the new emperor himself. Leo swore that he would keep the Catholic faith undefiled in all things, and wrote to pope Gregory II. asking for communion. Germanus also wrote to the pope, assuring him of the truth of the professions of Leonid. The early years of the reign of Leo were disturbed by another siege of Constantinople by the Saracens. It is spoken of by Bede, Paul the Deacon, and Anastasius, and appears to have lasted more than a year. Three hundred thousand persons are said to have died of the plague that
GERMANUS—Bishops

January, 730, Leo summoned an assembly at his palace, determined to make a new effort to give the patriarch a new robe. The old man was still living, and the contest took off his pontifical robe, and concluded a long speech with these words: "If I am a fool, I throw myself into the sea; apart from a general council, sire, I can make no change in the faith." He retired to an estate of his family, and lived the rest of his life in prayer and silence. He was ninety-five years old at the time of his abdication, and lived rather more than three years afterwards, dying on May 12, 733.

The earliest biographical account of Germanus is a short notice in Basil's "Memoirs" under May 12, on which day he was consecrated bishop. The letters of pope Gregory II. to his contemporaries contain a few interesting passages relating to him. From these sources, and from other later writers, a memoir of the patriarch was drawn up by Hesychius (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 155). Fabricius (Bll. Gr. xi. 155) gives a list of his works, which were printed with annotations by Migne, and placed with the Vetus by Hesychius in vol. xxiii. of the "Patrol. Grac.

Besides the three letters already mentioned, "A Letter from the Greeks to the Armenians in Defence of the Decrees of the Council of Chalcedon" is attributed with plausibility to Germanus. The "Treatise on the Limit of Life" by Photius (cod. 723) has been reprinted. It defends Gregory of Nyssa from those who imputed to him the doctrines of Origen. "History of the Holy Councils and of the Heresies since the Departure of the Apostles." [HERESIOLOGIST.] This is not to be confounded with a "Treatise on the Six General Councils," edited without a name by Justellus, Harduin, and Galland, and occasionally attributed to Germanus. Another work attributed by Cardinal Mai to Germanus, according to the authority of a very old MS. in the Vatican, is a "Discourse on the Limit of Life," among the questions of Photius to Ambrose. This work sets the fathers on an equality with the Apostles, especially Basil, Gregory the Theologian, and Athanasius.

The mystical treatise on the Mysteries of the Liturgy is thought to be more safely attributed to Germanus II. Patriarch in the 13th century. But there is no reason why the "Sermon and Hymns on the Virgin, the Presentation, the Worship of the True Cross," and others usually given among the works of Germanus I., should not be his. [W. M. GERMANUS (27)—July 7. Martyr under Trajan. Seeing a martyr, Astus, smeared with honey and stung by wasps, Germanus blessed him, for which act he was arrested with six others, and executed. (Baa. Menel.) [G. T. S.]

GERMANUS, presbyter of Antioc. [GERM NUS (1).]

GERMANUS (29), martyr at Gerona with Paulinus, Justus, and Scicius, during Diocletian's persecution. Germanus and Paulinus are said to have been brothers, and first cousins of Justus and Sciusus, who were also brothers. They all were stone-cutter and were put to death by Rufinus, the deputy of Dacianus, the praezes of Spain, for refusing to make images of heathen gods. On the taking of Gerona by Charlemagne their bodies were found in the church outside the walls then dedicated to the Virgin, but afterwards to St. Felix, and were translated to the cathedral. Amaldus, canon, and afterwards bishop of Gerona from about A.D. 1198 to A.D. 1216, removed their remains to a chapel he founded in their honour. The only source of our information about these saints is an apocryphal life, said to have been procured at Rome by the above-mentioned Remaelus. This life is considered by the Bollandists editors to be the work of some forger, who imposed upon the simplicity of the good canon. The names of Dacianus and Rufinus were well-known, and the part they had played in Dacielian’s persecution, and the fact that the saints in question were four in number, suggested to the compiler of the “Quatuor Coronati” the circumstances of their having been sculptors, and having suffered martyrdom for refusing to make images of heathen gods. The same editors doubted whether they should include these Acta in the A.A. SS., but finally decided to do so, and leave the reader’s judgment. These saints are commemorated on June 8. (Bell. A.A. SS. June, ii. 58; J. T. Salazar, Mart. Bisp. iii. 463; Esp. Sagra. xiii. 272.)

GERMANUS (30)—Oct. 23. A martyr in Spain with Servandus, under the president Victor, during the Dacielian persecution. Germanus was buried at Emerita (Merida) near St. Eulalia. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.)

GERMANUS (31)—Nov. 13. A martyr in Palestine with Antonius and Zebias, A.D. 308. (Ensebis, do Mart. Palæst. c. 9; Bas. Mem. i. 196.)

GERMANUS (32), a presbyter of Constanti- nople, one of Chrysostom’s most faithful adherents. He was one of the deputation who conveyed to the council of the Oak the reply of Chrysostom himself and that of the assembled bishops. (Pallae Dico, pp. 12, 17.) After the confabulation of the cathedral, he with Cassian the deacon, as custodians of the treasury, drew up an inventory of the goods of the church Chrysostom had been accused of confiscating. In A.D. 405 he and Cassian were the bearers of a letter to pope Innocent from the clergy and laity of Constantinople describing the violent deposition and expulsion of Chrysostom and the persecutions to which his friends were still exposed (6. p. 27; Soz., H. E. viii. 26; Innoc. Pap. Epp. 7, 10, in Pat. Lat. xx. 501 note τ, 512; Chrysostom’s first ep. to Innocent, § 2, in Pat. Gr. lii. 531). He was a very intimate friend and probably a relation of Cassian, whom he accompanied in his travels in Egypt and elsewhere. So great was their attachment to one another that they were said to have one soul in two bodies. Germanus’s name frequently occurs in the Conference of Cassian. ( Canon. Cassian. Colot. var. loc. esp. i.

1, 9, where see notes by Gazarus, in Pat. Lat. xii. 485, 489; Cellier, viii. 147, etc.)

GERMANUS (33), April 29, presbyter; martyr at Alexandria. (Wright, Syn. Martyr. in Journ. Soc. Lat. 1869, 428.)

[ G. T. S.]

GERMANUS (34), deacon, who with Memnon, the keeper of the sacred vessels, and the priest Epiphanius, was sent by the council of Constantinople, A.D. 448, to convey their third citation to Eutyches to appear before the council. (Manas vi. 496 n.)

[ F. D.]

GERMANUS (35), presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople, who subscribed by the hand of the deacon Glycerius the deposition of Eutyches, at the council of Constantinople in A.D. 449 (Labbe, iv. 232). He appears also among the orthodox archimandrites, who appealed to the emperor Marcian against the Eutychians in A.D. 451. (Faustus (28)) [C. G.]

GERMANUS (36), brother of St. Gibrinus, a Scot, one of the many Christian teachers attracted to Rheims by the fame of St. Remigius, the bishop. Colgan says he flourished in the year 509. (Colgan, Acta SS. 232 n. 4, 271, c. 1; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Fr. ii. c. 16, § 15; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 301, 303.)

[ G. J.]

GERMANUS (37), nephew of the emperor Justinian I., and addressed as “vir illustrius- mus” during the lifetime of Justinus I. by pope Hormidas, when he wrote to him in A.D. 519, and recommended to his good offices three papal legates, the bishops Helias, Thomas, and Nicestratus (Manas, Conc. viii. 473-4, c. 69, 61). But he appears to have been little mixed up with the church’s history.

[ J. G.]

GERMANUS (Reeves, St. Adamnan, 137), teacher of St. Columba. [GERMANUS] [J. G.]

GERMANUS (38), prior of Westminster. He is said, in the legendary history of Westminster, to have consecrated Oxford, the first abbot, and to have held the title of prior, in the year 616 (Sporley, MS. Hist. West. Mon. Angl. i. 266). The whole list of these early abbots is mere fabrication.

[ G. S.]

GERMANUS (39), abbot of Grandivalle or Münsterthal in Alsace, and martyr, in the 7th century. He was a native of Treves, where his father Optarus was of senatorial rank. In his youth he was educated by Modoaldus, bishop of Treves (cir. 622). When grown up he distributed his property to the poor and sought the monk araulphus, then living as a hermit in the desert of Horenbeg, who gave him the tonsure and sent him to the monastery of St. Romaric, then called Castellum and afterwards Herrnberg on the summit of the mountains. After residing here for a time he went in company with a Burgundian named Chuanes to the monastery of Luzovium (Luselui) in the Vosges mountains, where Waldebert was then abbot. Waldebert having built a monastery upon an estate which he named Sadius, he accompanied in a first visit to the bishop of Alsace, placed Germanus over it. After a time Gudonisus was succeeded in his honours by Bonifacius or Cathicus, who opposed the monastery, devastated its lands, and ill-used the tenantry. Germanus renounced, for which GERMARUS, abbat. [GERMARUS.]

GERMERIUS, ST., May 16, eighth in the list of the bishops of Toulouse, succeeding Herclianus, and followed by Magnalius, early in the 6th century. According to the apocryphal Acta, purporting to be by Pictorius, his contemporary and comrade, he was born at Aquigluina, or, according to another reading, Jerusalem. Upon the conquest of Toulouse by Clovis, in 507 or 508, and consequent establishment of the orthodox faith, he settled in that city, and was ordained subdeacon, and deacon, by Gregory, bishop of Saintes, and finally consecrated bishop of the diocese by Tornaldus, with the approbation of Clovis, signed by an invitation to his palace and gifts to the church of Toulouse. Upon his death, after fifty years passed in the episcopate, he was buried at Doz, where a monastery was afterwards built and called his name. His remains were said to have been in later times translated to the church of St. James, at Murellum, or Muretum, on the Garonne. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 591; Gall. Christ. xiii. 7.) [S. A. B.]

GERMINATOR. [GENIALIS.]

GERMINIUS (1), bishop of Cyrus, the metropolis of the Hellespontine province, who was translated to Sirmium in Pannonia by the emperor Constantius, A.D. 356 (Athan. H. Arian. 307). He belonged to the Arian party, and was the joint composer with Valens, Mark of Antioch, and George of Alexandria of the third Sirmian creed, drawn up in his episcopal city, sometimes called the "dated creed" because its heading recites the consuls for the year and the day of the month, May 22, 359, which provoked the sarcasm of Athanasius (de Synod. 8). At the council of Ariminum, in the same year, his creed was produced and read, but was indignantly rejected by the supporters of the Arian faith, who deposed Germinius along with the other leaders of the Arians and semi-Arians, declaring them enemies and disturbers of the church, and wrote a letter to Constantius telling him what they had done. (Socrates, H. E. ii. 37; Soz. H. E. iv. 15; Le Quen, O. C. l. 740.) [L. D.]

GERMINIUS (2). The eighteenth sermon of St. Gaudensius bishop of Brescia, according to the common reading, is addressed to a person of this name, and this is the reading adopted by Ceillier (Auteurs sacrés, viii. 41). Migne’s editions (Patr. Lat. xx. 971) prefers the reading Germignus, and mentions that one MS. reads Hermigius. Gaudensius praises him as a person who was well acquainted both with profane and sacred learning. The subject of the letter is an explanation of the parable of the Unjust Steward, which Germinius had requested Gaudensius to give him, as he had been unable to find an satisfactory interpretation of it. The precise date of Gaudensius’s episcopate is uncertain, but it is probable that it extended from about A.D. 386 to A.D. 410. [F. D.]

GERMOCHUS, ST., an Irish chief who accompanied St. Brecan (Vol. I. p. 333) to Cornwall in the middle of the 5th century. The parish of Germoe is next to Breage, and they are united parishes. There is a holy well in the parish, and a building called king Germoe’s throne, which may have taken the place of an earlier one. William of Worcester gives St. Germoe’s day as June 24 (p. 107, ed. Nasmith). [C. W. B.]

GEROBOLDUS. [GORALDUS.]

GEROBOCH succeeded St. Willibald as bishop of Eichštät in A.D. 786. He is said to have given to his cathedral a golden chalice and a jewelled case of gold for keeping the Gospels in. The date of his death is given as Feb. 2, A.D. 801. Popov however (Anfang des Christenthumes in Süd Deutschland, 225) points out that the dates of the five bishops who followed St. Willibald are doubtful. The Liber Pontificalis of Gundecar, the source of the early history of the diocese of Eichštät, states their episcopates lasted one hundred years, and later writers divided this period into five nearly equal parts, assigning one to each bishop, and it is in this way the date of A.D. 801 for Geroch’s death is arrived at. (Battistini, 200th. Suppl. p. 311; Pertsch, Monumenta Germaniae, lxx. 243, 256.) [F. D.]

GERODULDUS, forthieth bishop of Mentz, succeeding Richbertus or Rigobertus. According to a quotation in the Gall. Christ. from Mersseus, he was a man of wisdom and capacity, able in the transaction of business, but civil rather than ecclesiastical, of distinguished personal appearance, undaunted courage, and great magnanimity, but fonder of the life of courts than of the services of the church, for which he cared little or not at all. He was killed in battle by the Saxons in one of Charlemag’s campaigns (A.D. 745), and was succeeded by his son Gewiulph, who avenged his father’s death and was deposed at the second council of Germany. [GWELIUSCH.] (S. Bonifaci Vita, lib. i. cap. 37; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxix. 652; Gall. Christ. v. 437.) In the Gallia Christiana he also appears among the bishops of Worms (v. 663). [S. A. B.]

GERONCIUS (THERONCIUS), bishop of Assio (Medina Sidonia, or Xerze de la Fontera (Esp. Supr. x. 15, Cortes y Lopez, Diez Geogr. Hist. de la España Antigua), from about A.D. 690 onwards. He subscribed the acts of the sixteenth Council of Toledo, A.D. 693. (Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 333; Esp. Supr. x. 60.) [ROFINUS] [M. A. W.]

GERONTIUS. See also GERONTUS.

GERONTIUS (1) (LEONTIUS), bishop of Larissa in Syria Secunda, south of Apamea. He was one of the fifteen bishops who took part in the synod of Neo-Caesarea, c. A.D. 315, held shortly after that of Anery, and attended by nearly the same persons. Considerable doubts have been cast upon the real date, and even the existence, of this synod; however, the record in the Liber Simudicus (Mansi, i. 551) contains several important differences. (Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i. 210; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, ii. 640; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 917.) He subscribed also, according to some MSS., the caunus of the council of Nice in A.D. 325.
GERONTIUS (3), bishop of Come-Chartan (Charra) in the province of Phoenicia Secunda, north-east of Damascus. He was one of the bishops who attended the first general council at Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 694; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 849.) [J. de S.]

GERONTIUS of Barium. [CERVASYUS (3)-]

GERONTIUS (3), bishop of Raphanae in Syria Secunda, south of Apamea. His name appears among the signatures at the synod of Philippopolis, A.D. 344, where his see is written erroneously “Lampania.” (Mansi, iii. 139; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 921.) [J. de S.]

GERONTIUS (4). Amongst the subscriptions to the canons of the Sardican council, 347, is found “Gerontius a Macedonia de Brebi,” and “de Brevi,” corrupt readings that, in all probability, should be altered to Beryhooē, or perhaps it should stand Doberu. Doberus was a town in Macedonia, of which two bishops are mentioned. (Mansi, iii. 39, 41; Le Quen, Oriens Christ. ii. 77; Tillemont, Mem. Excl. vol. vii. “St. Athanasius,” note 50; Gams, Series Episc. 429.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (5), bishop of Tomi, or Constantinople (the modern Kustendji), in Scythia Minor, present at the council of Constantinople, 381 (Mansi, iii. 572); in the law of Theodosius, issued to Auzonius, proconsul of Asia, he is called Terentius bishop of Scythia. (Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 1213.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (6), bishop of Claudiopolis, the metropolis of the province of Honoria, present at the synod at Constantinople under Nectarius, A.D. 394. (Mansi, iii. 852; Le Quen, Or. C. i. 509.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (7), bishop of Nicomedia, metropolitan of Bithynia, “a singular specimen of an ecclesiastical adventurer.” He had been a deacon at Milan during the episcopate of Ambrose, whose grave displeasure he incurred by publishing a ridiculous story of an Empusa, or spectre with asses’ legs (Deoraez). Air, by which he asserted he had been attacked by night. Gerontius set at nought Ambrose’s injunction to remain in seclusion for a year and pass his time in penitence, and repaired to Constantinople, where his skill in medicine, aided by a plausible address and popular manners, gained him favour with persons of power at the imperial court, through whose instrumentality he obtained the metropolitan see of Nicomedia. He was consecrated by Helladius, bishop of Caesarae, and exarch of Poitou, for whose son Gerontius’ court influence had procured a high appointment in the army. Ambrose, on hearing of Geroatius’ elevation to the episcopate, wrote to Nectarius, the bishop of Constantinople, demanding his deposition. The new bishop, however, had speedily managed to ingratiate himself so completely with the people of Nicomedia that the intelligence of Ambrose’s requisition aroused a vehement opposition, which the gentle Nectarius wanted spirit to resist. Chrysostom, however, on being invested with power, speedily employed it to rid the church of so great a scandal. Gerontius was deposed, and Panasiphoni, formerly tutor to the empress Eudoxia, was consecrated in his room. The loss of their favourite bishop gave great umbrage to the Nicomediants. They rose in open sedition, and exiled both in public and private the excellences of Gerontius, and the benefits both rich and poor had derived from his medical skill. Both at Nicomedia and also at Constantinople, to which they sent deputations, the people paraded the streets singing litanies, as in the time of some great public calamity. Chrysostom stood firm, and compelled Gerontius to retire. The Nicomediants parted from him with great reluctance, and showed the utmost aversion to his pious and gentle successor. The deposition of Gerontius was one of the charges brought against Chrysostom at the council of the Oak. (Soz. E. E. viii. 8; Photius, Cod. 59, p. 60; Le Quen, Or. C. i. 888.) [E. V.]

GERONTIUS (8), a Macedonian bishop. Two letters of Pope Innocent I. are addressed to him. The first, in twenty-two other bishops acting along with him, is dated Dec. 13, A.D. 414, and is in reply to letters sent by the bishops to the pope by the archdeacon Vitalis. The questions it chiefly deals with are whether the clergy might marry widows; whether if a man whose wife had died before he had been baptized had married again, he should be considered to have married twice; and how those ordained by heretics, and especially by Bonosus, were to be treated? The second is addressed to him with six “episcopis per Macedoniam constituimus,” and relates to the case of Dabalius and Taurianus, who had been condemned by the Macedonian bishops. (S. Inuocell. Epist. 15 and 18, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 596, 557; Collisius, Histoire des Aut. sacr. vii. 574.) [BONOSUS.] Gerontius is one of the ten orthodox bishops of Macedonia to whom, with Anysius, a letter of Chrysostom is addressed. (Chrys. Epist. 163, in Migne, Patr. Græc. iii. 706.) [ANYSIUS.] [F. D.]

GERONTIUS (9), bishop of Claudiopolis in Iauria, on the Calycadus. He was present at the first meeting of the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and signed the protest against the condemnation of Nestorius. His epistles to the bishop of the church of John of Antioch. (Mansi, iv. 1270; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 1027.) [J. de S.]

GERONTIUS (10), bishop of Basilinopolis in Bithynia, present at the synod held at Constantinople by Flavian, A.D. 448 (Mansi, vi. 757), and also at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451; he is probably the bishop referred to by Anastasius of Nicæa at the 13th session as having been consecrated by his predecessor at Nicæa, and so claimed as his suffragan. (Mansi, vii. 305; Le Quen, Or. C. i. 825.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (11), bishop of Seleucia Pieris in Syria, present at the Ephesine Latrocinium, A.D. 449, and two years later at the council of Chalcedon. He also signed the catholic epistle of his province addressed to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458, referring to the murder of Proterius at Antioch, and also the encyclical of Gennadius against the simoniacs. (Mansi, vi. 914; Patrof. Gr. Ixxvi. 1620; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 773.) [J. de S.]
GERONTIUS (12), bishop of Arcadiopolis, a town unknown in the province of Asia; at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, his name was subscribed in his absence to the definition of the faith by Hesperius of Pitane at the instance of Stephen of Ephesus. (Mansi, viii. 168; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 711.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (13), bishop of Milan, probably c. A.D. 465. He succeeded Eusebius, and was followed by Benignus, but the dates are not precisely ascertained. Gerontius being placed by different authorities at various periods between A.D. 462 and 478. (UgHELLI, Ital. Sacr. iv. 73; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 110.)

[ R. S. G.]

GERONTIUS, bishop of Camerino. (Hierontius.) [ R. S. G.]

GERONTIUS (14), bishop of Fidenae, present at the third Roman synod under pope Symmachus, Oct. 501, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209), who accepts with a slight alteration the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. (Mansi, viii. 252.)

[ A. H. D. A.]

GERONTIUS of Bologna. (Gerardus.)

GERONTIUS (16), a bishop to whom Eudocius, bishop of Pavia, from A.D. 511 to A.D. 521, addresses a poem (Emnod. Carm. lib. ii. 85, in Migne, Patr. Lat. ixii. 350). In it he praises Gerontius, saying that his predecessor had no reason to fear death when he knew he would have such a successor. [F. D.]

GERONTIUS (17), a presbyter living as a solitary, whom in 405 Chrysostom prevailed upon to undertake missionary work among the pagan inhabitants of Phoenicia. He was anxious to visit Chrysostom at Cucusus on the way to the scenes of his labours; but Chrysostom advised him to return straight to Phoenicia as he had already lost time by illness, and he might be detained by winter which was approaching. It is evident that Gerontius was relinquishing his life of solitary contemplation with a reluctance which Chrysostom endeavoured to overcome by urging upon his greater glory and higher reward of the active exertions for the souls of others on which he was about to enter. Constans, he informed him, had orders to supply him with necessary funds for building, and the relief of those in want, and he urged instant despatch. (Chrysost. Epist. 53, 54.) [E. V.]

GERONTIUS (18), priest of Constantinople, deposed in company with Cepodius (q. v.), as a Eutychian heretic, by the archbishop Anastolius in A.D. 451 (Labbé, iv. 522 D). Some one of the same name appears among the Eutychians, headed by Charous, who, claiming to be archimandrites, appealed to the emperor Marcian in the same year asking for a general council (Labbé, iv. 524). The orthodox archimandrites however in the council of Chalcedon did not recognise this Gerontius whether as archimandrite or as anything else, stating Ἐπίσκοπον οἴκεων ἄνθρωπος. (Labbé, iv. 518.) [C. G.]

GERONTIUS (19), bearer of two letters from Julian bishop of Cos to pope Leo (Leo Mag. Ep. 140, 1295; 141, 1296, Migne) in the end of A.D. 454, or the beginning of 455; also carried letters from Leo the pope in September 457 to the emperor Leo (Ep. 148 of Ep. 158, 1328) and at the same time to Julian and to Actius, presbyter of Constantinople (Ep. 152, 158; 1314, 1315). [C. G.]

GERONTIUS (20), archimandrite, to whom Theodoret wrote, thanking him for his letters which expressed the piety of his soul, and his active services on his behalf, and asking for his prayers. (Theodoret, Epist. 50.) [E. V.]

GERONTIUS (21), archimandrite of Palestine towards the middle of the 5th century, successor of Melania in the government of her convent at Jerusalem, which he held for 45 years. He was a resolute Eutychian, and attached himself to Theodosius the intruding bishop of Jerusalem, refusing to communicate with Juvenal the legitimate prelate. He was sent by Theodosius, together with Elpidius another archimandrite, to Euthymius the celebrated solitary, to keep him to his conference without the view of settling their doctrinal differences. This invitation was indignantly rejected by the aged anchorot, whose words convinced Elpidius of his errors, but failed to have any effect on Gerontius (Cyrill. Scytoph. Vit. S. Euthym. §§ 74, 75). He was equally deaf to the exhortations of the emperor Eudocia, who, after an interview with Euthymius, had renounced the doctrines of Eutyches, and by her conversion had led many to adopt the Catholic faith (ibid. 86). When the rest of the schismatic monks (aposchistae) had been prevailed upon by Martyrius, soon after his accession to the episcopal throne, A.D. 476, to return to the unity of the church, Gerontius and Romanus of Thessalonica alone remained obstinate. For this they were expelled from their monasteries, and passed the remainder of their days as homeless wanderers in great misery (ibid. 124). [E. V.]

GERONTIUS (22), a turbulent Eutychian monk, whom the schismatic party at Jerusalem elected as their president (ἄρχων ἰδιός) after the flight of Theodosius the intruding bishop of that see, c. 476, who is stated to have been guilty of as many acts of violence and homicide as Theodosius himself (Cyrill. Scytoph. Vit. S. Euthym. § 113). He seems to be different from Gerontius, St. Melania's successor. (Cf. Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. vol. xvi.; Acace de C. P. a. i.) [E. V.]

GERONTIUS (23) (Geraint), son of Erbin, and king of Damnonia, killed A.D. 508 (or 530) at the battle of Lisnaborough, perhaps near Lym Regis, fighting against Cerdic. (Lappenberg, i. 108, transal.: Nash, Tabulæ, 328: Rees, Welsh Saints, 113, 169, 232.) He was possibly called a saint from his being killed in battle against the pagan Saxons. His pedigree is given under Constantinus, St., Vol. i. 660. The celebrated elegy on him is attributed to Llywarch Héva and he is the hero of the second Mabinogi, which Twsnon has followed in his idyll. [C. W. E.]

GERONTIUS (24) (Geraint), king of Cornwall, died A.D. 590 at Din-gerein, the round fort existing in the parish of St. Gerrans, near St. Just in Roseland, east of Falmouth Harbour. (Leland, and Earle’s Saxon Chronicle, 290.) In the life of St. Teilo it is said that the saint on his way from Wales to Brittany, at the time of the yellow death, visited king Gerennius and promised to come back to him before his death, which was seven years and seven months afterwards. (Liber Landavensis, 102, 107.) The king was probably canonized by the popular voice. The feast day of this parish was on Aug. 10, and is now on the second Sunday in August. (Whitaker, Cathedral of Cornwall, i. 202, 293, 303; ii. 17.)

[C. W. B.]

GERONTIUS (25), the accuser of Lampetius. (Phoebius, Cod. 52.) [EUCHITIS.] [G. S.]

GERONTIUS (26), abbas, presiding over the monastery of St. Euthymius in Palestine, who related to John Moschus the following story. One day he was ascending the mountains on the other side of the Dead Sea, in company with two other anchorites, when they observed at a distance another anchoret walking on the shore. They saw some Saracens pass him, one of whom presently turned back and decapitated him. As Gerontius and his companions were deploiring the dead, they suddenly beheld a bird swoop down from the sky, carry the Saracen up in the air, let him drop, and kill him. (Joann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 21, in Pat. Lat. lxxiv. 129.)

GERRIG, Welsh saint. [Gerrig.]

GERTRUDIS (1), ST., first abbess of Nivelle in Brabant, daughter of Pippin of Landen, the first of the three Pippins, mayor of the palace under Clothaire II., Dagobert I., and Sigebert II. Landen, the home of the family and the birthplace of Gertrude, was about twenty miles west of Tongres and some forty miles north-east of Nivelle. Pippin and Ida of Montreuil, the daughter of Sigebert II., was honoured as saints, had three children: Grimoald who succeeded his father; St. Begga, mother of Pippin of Herstal and foundress of the monastery of Anden, and Gertrude, the youngest. Gertrude shewed her vocation to a religious and celibate life at a very early age, by her refusal, more decided than courteous, of an offer of marriage made to her by Dagobert I. on behalf of a young nobleman then present. This must have happened in 625. On the death of Pippin in 639 Ita, by the advice of the bishop St. Amandus, built a large double monastery at Nivias (Nivelle) on land belonging to herself and Gertrude. She made her daughter abbess, and passed the rest of her life as a nun under her rule, helping her with advice and sympathy. It was Gertrude's great delight to receive pilgrims and religious travellers, and entertain them hospitably; she often procured relics or sacred books by their means from Rome or elsewhere, or got them to teach her and her nuns hymns or portions of Scripture, of which she was so fond that she is said to have learnt nearly the whole of the Bible by heart in the course of her life. With the assistance of her mother, she gave an estate at Fosse or Mors les Fossez to the Irish monks, SS. Poilhan and Ultan, that they might build a monastery there, to be a perpetual place of reception for pilgrims and travellers journeying that way; she gave them all that was needful for the work, and when it was finished Ultan took the government of it, and Poilhan returned to Nivelle to teach psalmody to the nuns, and be useful to Gertrude in many ways. Twelve years after the death of Pippin, and five from the time that Gertrude became abbess, Iduberga died.

Gertrude then chose a few of the best qualified of her monks and nuns to help her in managing the affairs of the community. Nevertheless she soon found herself overburdened by the duties and responsibilities of her office. She was about the age of thirty when she resigned her post to her niece Wulfetrude, who was twenty, and had been brought up from childhood under the care of her saintly aunt and grandmother. She lived three years in increased asceticism and constant devotion, and died at the age of thirty-three, about 659 or 664; Barolius and Henoch of Gaul give the earlier date, May 11, and the latter. She is one of eleven holy women named Gertrudis venerated by the Benedictines as belonging to their order, four of whom lived in the 7th century, and one in the time of Charlemagne. She seems to have been regarded during her life as a person of supernatural power, and to have been worshipped as a saint very soon after her death; a church was dedicated in her name in the tenth generation by Agnes, third abbess of Nivelle, whom she had brought up with St. Wulfrude. All biographies of this saint are based on one by a contemporary monk, who had some of the facts from herself and the others from eyewitnesses. It is given in full by Malchion (A.A.S. 0.S.B. sac. ii. 464), part of it is in Bouquet (iii. 317, De Dagoberto). She is mentioned in the life of B. Pepin, the duke (Bouquet, ii. 803; A.A. SS. Holland, Feb. iii. 290; Duchesne, Script. i. 594). The accounts of her endowment of the Irish monks and of her death are given at considerable length in a letter of St. Gall (A.A. SS. Holland, Feb. iii. 290; Duchesne, Script. i. 118). She is also incidentally mentioned in most of the biographies and chronicles of her time collected by Bouquet, and generally with some epithet indicating her reputation for sanctity. Her name is in the martyrology of Bede, and in the matrical one attributed to him, and in the modern Roman Martyrology, on the 17th of March. She appears also in the martyrology of Usuard, and in the Additions to that of Ade.

She is patron saint of travellers, pilgrims, cats, of several towns in the Netherlands, against fever and against damage by rats and mice, especially the out of door sorts. She is represented with rats at her feet, or running up her pastoral staff, or on her dress. [A. B. C. D.]

GERTRUDIS (2), ST., abbess of Hamay. Her parentage is not recorded. By her husband Rigomar she became the mother of Gerberta, and perhaps also of Sigfrid. When a widow, Gertrude built the cathedral of Hereford, of which she was so fond that she is said to have learnt nearly the whole of the Bible by heart in the course of her life. With the assistance of her mother, she gave an estate at Fosse or Mors les Fossez to the Irish monks, SS. Poilhan and Ultan, that they might build a monastery there, on the Scarp, very near that of Marchienne, founded by Rictrude, the wife of her grandson Adalbald. She adopted her great-granddaughter Eusebia, daughter of Adalbald, and made her her heir and successor. St. Gertrude died about a.p. 649 or 655, and was honoured Dec. 6. The chief authority for her is the Life of St. Rictrude (Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B. ser. ii. 584, ed. 1689; Boll. Acta SS. 12 Mai. iii. pp. 87 c, 101 f, 154 b). [A. B. C. D.]

GERTRUDIS (3), virgin and martyr of Vandalusia (Vauzduzeliet) in the country afterwards called Lorraine. Her feast immediately followed Ascension Day. She was the daughter of a heathen prince of Brabant, and embraced Christianity without her father's knowledge. He wished to marry her to another pagan prince, but she refused, having determined upon a celibate life. She fled into the wilderness, but was followed and murdered by her brother at Belval. She is reputed to have been the niece of Gertrude, abbess of Nivelles (No. 1), and if so, she belongs to the 7th century; but there is not much reliance to be placed upon her Life. (Acta SS. Boll. Mai. vii. 515.) [G. T. S.]

GERTRUDIS (4), ST. (CÉBERTRUD, CÉBERTRUDE, GERBRITRIDE, GERBERITRIDE, TETTA), third abbess of the double monastery of Habend, afterwards Remiremont, in the 7th century, succeeding Goboberga. [GEOBERBAGA.] In Mabillon's Observations priorum de Vita St. Gertrudis de Nivello (Acta SS. O.S.B. ser. ii. 462, ed. 1669), the Gertrude of this article is called first abbess of Habend; but she was in fact third abbess, as appears from the Life of St. Amatus (Mab. ut supra, 129, 133), that of St. Romairic (p. 415 et seq.), and that of St. Adelpius (p. 602 et seq.). She succeeded St. Cecilia, otherwise Clara or Gogoberga, and was followed by St. Perpetua, according to Mabillon's Observations priorum to the Lives of St. Romairic and St. Adelpius. It is recorded of this abbess that she went out with candles, crosses, and music, at the head of a procession to meet the funeral of St. Adelpius, the third and contemporary abbat of the male side of the community, who had died at Luxeuil, but was brought back to be buried at Habend. [A. B. C. D.]

GERTRUDIS (5), ST., nun at Blangy in Artois, eldest of five daughters of Sigfrid son of Weis, father of Becs, founder and first abbess of Blangy. About a.d. 682, Ruodgiarius, a great man of the court, tried to impose on Gertrude's marrying him although she had taken the veil, and he refused to leave the monastery without seeing her. St. Bertha having allowed him to see her as she stood at the altar singing with the other nuns and dressed like them, told him that if he dared to carry off the bride of Christ he might do so. Ruodgiarius did not dare. The authority for this story is a Life of St. Bertha written in the 11th century, given at length in Boll. Acta SS. 4 Jul. ii. 52, the bulk of it being, as observed by Bouquet (Recueil, iii. 621) and Duchesne (Script. Franc. i. 605), silly and fabulous. [A. B. C. D.]

GERTRUDIS (6), ST., of Neustadt. There is a legend that Gertrude, alleged to have been a sister of Charlemagne, fled from his court to become a nun, and founded a church at Neustadt and a monastery at Carleburg, both near Würzburg in Franconia. The Bollandists, as Mabillon observes, leave no stone unturned to discover anything about this saint, but come to the conclusion that Charlemagne had no sister Gertrude, and that all trustworthy accounts of the saint whose cloak was kept in veneration at Neustadt, are hopelessly lost, the monastery having been sacked by the mob in 1525, and the books and documents destroyed. (Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B. ser. ii. pars i. 718, ed. 1672, Life of St. Burchard of Wurtzburg and introduction to Life of St. Gertrude of Nivelles; Boll. Acta SS. 17 Mart. ii. 601, notes to St. Gertrude of Nivelles.) [A. B. C. D.]

GERULPHUS—Sept. 21. Murdered about the middle of the 8th century, at Truncinium (Dronghesse) in Flanders, when returning from a confirmation held by Eliaerus bishop of Noyon. His life was written in the 10th century by a Belgian monk, who inveighs against his father because he left unfulfilled his son's bequests to the church. Gerulphus was buried by his father at his birthplace, a village called Merenbeia, whence, on Oct. 8, 915, his relics were translated with great pomp to Drongessee. In 1030 all the relics in Flanders were gathered to Oudenaarde, in Western Flanders, and borne in solemn procession, to secure peace, when his body, as being that of a Flemish martyr, took the first place. (Molani, Nat. SS. Belg.; Acta SS. Boll. Sept. vi. 250-270.) [G. T. S.]

GERUNTUS (1). Among the works attributed to St. Jerome is a letter addressed to the daughters of Geruntius. Their father had insisted in his will a clause disinheriting them on account of their devoting themselves to chastity, and their love of religion, and the letter is an answer to their inquiries as to what they should do. The writer advises them not to appeal to the secular judge, and exhorts them, if they have offended Geruntius for Christ's sake, to persevere in offending him. For If Christ is the cause of offence, the disinheriting clause of their impious father's will is a reason for joy and not for grief. It appears probable that the author of this letter was the presbyter Eutropius, who is stated by Gennadius (de Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, c. 49, in Migne, Patr. Lat. iviii. 1087), to have written two letters to two sisters who had been disinherited by their parents for their devotion to religion, in which he supported their position not only by arguments but by numerous quotations from Scripture in a description which agrees with the letter ascribed to St. Jerome. This letter was written about a.d. 400, as it speaks of St. Paulinus of Nola's retirement from the world, which took place about a.d. 395, as a recent event (S. Hieronymi Opera, xi. Ep. 2, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxx. 49; Cellieri, Anteux secreti, vii. 647). [F. D.]

GERUNTUS (2), a presbyter of the Capadocian Caesarea, to whom Firmus his bishop wrote, expressing his regret that he should have been detained so long from his duties, and especially those of the Easter Festival, by sickness, and gently reminding him that now that his indisposition had yielded, and only delicacy of health remained, he should return as soon as he could. Firmus thanks him for his Easter gifts to his table, two brace of partridges, half a home-fed pig, as big as a wild boar, and an amount of wine, as well as a pair of young coots. (Firmus, Epist. 10.) [E. V.]

GERUNTUS (3), abbat, with another named Chalcidonus, over the twin abbeys, Viviers and Castel, of the monastery founded by Cassiodorus. They appear to have been the first abbas, but it is not said to which of the houses they respectively belonged (Ceillier, i. 238).

Cassiodorus gives his abbas excellent advice for the higher training of their monks. He bids them especially to exercise hospitality, to succour the poor, to instruct the country people in good manners, and in the way of salvation; to study the Holy Scriptures and the commentaries of the doctors, the lives of the fathers, and the Acts of the saints; to mortify their passions, and to believe all that they ought. (Cassiod. Inst. Div. Ltd. cap. 32, in Patr. Lat. lxx. 1147.)

GERUNTUS (9), king of Damnonia, to whom Aldhelm, abbot of Malmsbury, wrote, a.d. 705, at the request of a synod, respecting the time of keeping Easter, and the mode of making the teneur. The letter was addressed, “Domino gloriosissimo, occidentalis regni sceptra gubernator; Geruntoni regis, simulque eunctus Dei sacerdotibus per Domnoniam conversantibus” (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 268: see above, v. ALDELM, I. 78, and Malmsbury’s Gesta Pontificum, v. § 215, p. 361), and it had the desired effect. Gerontius reigned at least till a.d. 710, for in that year the Saxons Chronicle says, “Ine and Neuf, his kinsman, fought against Gerobachus, king of the Welsh.” That the Celtic chronicles preserved no account of this important chief of the West Britons, under whom the schism was healed, proves the truth of Nennius’s words, “I have endeavoured to write some extracts which the broken spirit (hebetudo) of the British monarchy, for the treasures of this island, Britain, have had no knowledge, nor have they set down any memorial in books.” They had no heart to chronicle the misfortunes of their nation. (See Haigh in Yorkshire Archaeol. Journal, 1877, iv. 446.) Ine’s humane laws, about a.d. 690, show that the English had been conciliating their Celtic subjects. Perhaps Gerontius the last of the Celtic kings was the first Christian church that the conquerors spared, and it thus became a meeting-place for the traditions of the two races. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 164.) Probably two bishops of the Cornish church joined with Wini, the English bishop of Wessex, in consecrating Ceddula to York, a.d. 684. (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 124.)

GERVASIUS (1), June 19 (U.S.); Oct. 14. (Bsa. Menol). Martyr with Protasius at Milan, under Nero. His story is very curious. They were two brothers, the sons of Vitalis, whose martyrdom at Ravenna and mythical acts are recorded in Mart. Adon, April 28. After 300 years, and when their memory had entirely faded from among men, God is said to have revealed their place of burial to St. Ambrose in a dream. [AMBROSIA]. The empress Justina was striving to obtain possession of one of the churches of Milan for her Ariam worship, and help was needed to sustain the orthodox in their opposition to the imperial authority. Just at this time a new and splendid basilica was awaiting consecration. The people, as a kind of orthodox demonstration, wished it consecrated with the same pomp and ceremonial as had been used in the case of another new church near the Roman Gate. To this St. Ambrose consented, on condition that he should have some new relics to place therein. He therefore ordered excavations to be made in the church of St. Nabor and St. Felix, near the rails which enclosed their tomb. Very soon their labours were rewarded by the discovery of the bodies of “two men of wondrous size, such as ancient times produced” (Amb. 382, § 2). The people in all parts of the city came to view the entire and very much blood. They were removed to the church of St. Fausta, and on the next day to the new Ambrosian church, where they were duly enshrined. At each different stage St. Ambrose delivered impassioned and fanciful orations. In that pronounced on the occasion of their entombment, he waives that they had already expelled demons, and restored to sight a blind butcher, one Severus, who was cured by merely touching the pall that covered the sacred relics. The Arians on the other hand ridiculed the matter, asserting that Ambrose had hired persons to feign themselves demons. The whole affair has afforded copy for the most merciless matter for criticism. Mosheim (cent. iv. p. l. ii. c. 3, sect. 8), Gibbon (c. xxvii), Isaac Taylor (Ancient Christianity, vol. ii. 242–272), consider the thing a trick got up by the contrivance and at the expense of St. Ambrose himself. Taylor, indeed, in the lengthened passage just cited, discusses the action of the present Gerobachus, king of the Welsh. That the Celtic chronicles preserved no account of this important chief of the West Britons, under whom the schism was healed, proves the truth of Nennius’s words, “I have endeavoured to write some extracts which the broken spirit (hebetudo) of the British monarchy, for the treasures of this island, Britain, have had no knowledge, nor have they set down any memorial in books.” They had no heart to chronicle the misfortunes of their nation. (See Haigh in Yorkshire Archaeol. Journal, 1877, iv. 446.) Ine’s humane laws, about a.d. 690, show that the English had been conciliating their Celtic subjects. Perhaps Gerontius the last of the Celtic kings was the first Christian church that the conquerors spared, and it thus became a meeting-place for the traditions of the two races. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 164.) Probably two bishops of the Cornish church joined with Wini, the English bishop of Wessex, in consecrating Ceddula to York, a.d. 684. (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 124.) to Bertrada, Charles the Great's mother, by whose influence he was elevated to the bishopric.

But three years after the Queen mother's death a vacancy occurred in the abbey of Fontanelle by the death of Wilde. The post had been promised to Wittboldus, Wilde's nephew, and Charles the Great's chaplain, but as he was engaged on a mission to Constantinople, which was likely to be of long duration, the abbacy was conferred on Gervoldus (A.D. 786 or 787).

To obtain this dignity, he relinquished the see, in which his successor's name is unknown. Gervoldus had been much employed on state affairs, and at one period of his life had been entrusted by Charles with the direction of the abbey. He was the first known bishop of Barri, present at the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 599). The name does not occur in Man's lists, and seems to have been taken from the "Geronius de Brebi" and "de Brevi," which occur there (Manii, Ill. 39 b, 42 d, 46 e). (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xxi. 132; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 129.)

Gervysius (3), bishop of Tarentum, 659. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xxi. 132; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 129.)

Gervysius (4)—July 6. He was a native of Chalon-sur-Saône, and living in the 7th century. Having made a pilgrimage to Rome, he was murdered by robbers on his return, when but a few miles from home. He was thereupon elevated to the rank of a martyr, and miracles were attributed to him. His acts are of the 10th or 11th century, and worthless as historical records. They testify, however, to the existence at that time of the practice of infant communion in the West. "At his baptism, which was performed by the bishop, after the ceremony was completed, he placed the holy body of Christ in the infant's mouth, as is the custom. Then, seeing a drop of blood on the child's lips, he said to those around, 'Know, for certain, that this child as he is joined by name to the blessed martyr Gervysius, so he will be a brave soldier of Christ, being joined to Him by His blood.'" On the custom of infant communion, consult Suarez, Disp. 62, de Eucharist. sect. 4, and Disp. 69, sect. 2. Concerning apparitions of Christ's body in the sacrament, sometimes as a boy, sometimes as flesh or blood, see Suarez, Disp. 55, de Eucharist. sect. 1-4. (Acta SS. Bell. Jul. ii. 314-316.)

Gevulio, bishop. (Gewiliebus.)

Gervoldus, sixteenth bishop of Evreux, following Maurinus. He was of aristocratic parents, named Walgarius and Walda, and chosen on that account, while still a clerk, as chaplain at NARBONNE, while AMALARIC and his supporters fled into Spain. From the time of the battle near Ptolemais until June 508, the victorious Franks and Burgundians pressed their advantage in southern Gaul, finding little or no resistance, and helped everywhere by the Catholic party, whose efforts had been for some time past directed towards transferring the rule of southern Gaul from the Ariani Visigoths to the orthodox Franks. [Euric, Alaric II.] Chlodwig's (Clovis') son Theuderic with the Burgundians under Gundobad marched on the towns of the Rhone and Loire early in 508, and Gesalic, attacked by Gundobad, fled from Narbonne—which was taken over the Pyrenees to Barce-

ona. In June, 508, however, the great Theudoric appeared on the scene from Italy on behalf of his grandson Amalaric, and matters changed greatly. His championship of Amalaric led Gesalic later to seek an alliance with the Franks and Burgundians against his half brother and Theudoric, but as Dahn points out (l. c. p. 114) the conversion initiated by Clovis was carried on by Ambiani, and others, that already in 507 he had betrayed Narbonne and what remained of southern Gaul to the Franks in return for aid against Amalaric in Spain, finds no authority in the sources. After great successes against the Franks and their allies in 508-9, Theudoric's general, Iba or Ebba, attacked the Visigoths near Barcelona and drove him from Spain in 510. He fled to Africa to ask help from the Vandals (mindful perhaps of his grandfather Euric's old alliance, with Generalis), was however refused it (according to Isidore, Hist. Goth., ad ann. 507. Exp. Sagra. vi. 450), and returning not to Spain, but to Aquitania "ob moenia Thaurdularic," opened negotiations with the Franks. He stayed there one year, and then entered Spain with an army (furnished him by the Franks?), met Iba near Barcelona, was defeated, pursued, and killed (512). His personal character was all along such as allowed him no chance of success. During his short reign at Barcelona, he made himself hated by his own people by his jealousy of and envenomation against "socii commercii villasimus, its inficilicata et ignavia summus." He counts, however, as the rightful successor of Alaric, and Amalaric's reign only begins from his death. (Dahn, v. i. c.; Lafuente, Hist. de España, ii. 331.)

[GEWIELEB] (Gewilbo, Gewelio, Gewil, Gewelio, Gewiullius) forty-first bishop of Mentz, deposed at the second council of Germany, A.D. 745. His father Geraldus, who preceded him in the see, fought under Carlemann against the Saxons, and was killed. The see thereupon took orders and was elevated to the bishopric. Soon afterwards (A.D. 744) Carlemann gave his daughter Agatha in marriage to a Saxon, and Gewilbo accompanied him. While the two armies lay encamped on opposite sides of the river Wisara, Gewilbo sent his servant to the Saxons to seek the slayer of his father and challenge him to single combat. Riding to the charge the two met in the centre of the stream, and the Saxons fell pierced by the bishop's sword. The battle became general, and the Saxons were routed. For this crime of homicide, and for spoiling with hawks and hounds, he was deposed at the council on the accusation of Boniface, who was made bishop in his place. The deposition is alluded to in a letter from pope Zachary to Boniface (S. Buriisci Vita, lib. i. cap. 37 in Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxvii. 652; Zach. Pap. Epistolae, xiili. in Migne, 949; Bur. xii. ann. 745, iii. iv.)

Serrarius (Rerum Moguntinorum, tem. i. p. 170, ed. Frankfort, 1722) quotes from a MS. of D. Latomius to the effect that after his deposition he left all his property to the church, and received for his sustenance the villula of Spase-sheim and a church called Caput Montis, where he lived in good repute fourteen years and displayed especially the virtue of hospitality. He never again sought to attend councils or synods at Mentz, but sometimes at the Lord's Supper would wash feet in the churches, in tokens of hi
GILBERTUS

GILBERTUS (1) — June 24. Martyr with Agaodus, near Paris; they were, according to legend, converted by missionaries sent into Gaul by St. Peter. (Mart. Usuard.; Acta SS. Bell. Jun. iv. 815-817.)

GILBERTUS (2), 13th bishop of Nevers, succeeding St. Deodatus, or, according to Coquelle's list, twelfth, between Rauracus and Rognes. It is said that in old MS. of the church of Nevers he is described as sitting in A.D. 665 (Gall. Christ. xii. 628; Gams, Series Episc. 584; Coquelle, Hist. du Diocèse, sub fin. Paris, 1012).

GILBERTUS, bishop of Noyon. [GILBERTUS.]

GILDARDUS (GILDARDUS, GODARDUS), bishop of Rouen. A belief prevailed in the middle ages that he and St. Medardus were twin brothers, were ordained on the same day, and died on the same day. But no mention of Gildardus occurs in the earliest lives of St. Medard, and Gildardus attended the first council of Orleans in 511, while St. Medard was not consecrated till 530. He was buried in a chapel of St. Mary, in later times called after him, at that time without the walls, but afterwards enclosed by the growth of the city. He was commemorated at Rouen with his reputed brother, June 8. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 67; Mauny, vii. 356; Gall. Christ. xi. 10.)

GILDARDUS (2) ST., priest of Luperciacum (Leury), in the district of Nevers, conjuncturally assigned to the 7th century and comme-

GIBRIANUS, GIBRIANUS (GIBIANUS, GIBRIAN), commemorated May 8. In the Lives of St. Tressan, S. Gibrian, S. Eliaquin, and others, we have the account of the arrival of a band of Christian teachers in Gaul in the time of Clovis I, but it is very doubtful whether all the reputed members of that band belonged even to the 6th century. According to some accounts there were seven brothers and three sisters, the chief among the former being Tressan, German, and Gibrian. The last-named spent a holy life in the district of Chalons-sur-Marne, and long after he had died there, his remains were translated to the abbey church of St. Remigius at Rheims, where his memory was kept on May 8. (Hist. Lit. de France, v. 876.) He is usually assigned to the beginning of the 6th century. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Fr. ii. c. 16, § 13; Cambrensis, de Scot. Fort. iii. c. 4, pp. 138-147; Acta SS. 8 May, ii. 297-300; Tanner, Bibl. 316.) [J. G.]

GIBBOALDUS, tenth bishop of Angoulême, in the early part of the 7th century. He is mentioned, though without his see, in the will of St. Berthembrus, bishop of Tuns, as the former possessor of an estate thereby devised. (Mabill. Vet. Anecdot. p. 261, Paris, 1723; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 404; Gall. Christ. ii. 581.) [S. A. B.]

GIBULDUS (GIBAUDUS, GIBAULTUS), a king of the Alemani, towards the close of the 5th century. In the Acta S. Lupi (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 70, 81) this king is spoken of as shewing especial reverence for St. Lupus, and setting free, without ransom, some prisoners whom his people had carried off from Brienne, in Champagne, on receiving a letter from that saint. In the Vita S. Severini (c. vi. § 27, Boll. Acta SS. Jan. 1, 491) he also appears as friendly to St. Severinus the apostle of Noricum, to whose entreaties he granted the release of some other captives. We do not know whether he was the king of the Alemani whom Clovis conquered in 486. (Mascou, Hist. of the Ancient Germans, xi. 8, 9; Bar. an. 482 n. liv.-livii.) [S. A. B.]

humility, and at length died peacefully (785). An epitaph is also given by Serarius expressive of the bishop's piety. In the Gallia Christiana he also appears in the list of the early bishops of Worms (v. 663). See also Monument. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, pp. 2, 3, 151, 471-473, 495, 496. [S. A. B.]

GILLO (GIOULUS), is said to have been servant of Guthunon, and to have remained at Oustirk in Flanders after Guthunon's death. Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 315-18) puts his death in A.D. 299, yet much doubt the Christianity of Scotia at that time. [GUTHONON.]

GIBERIUS, bishop of Bigastrum from after 565 till before 673. He appears at the eighth and ninth councils of Toledo, A.D. 655, 656, and is represented at the tenth by his vicar Episcopal. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 444; iv. 145, 158; Esp. Sagr. v. 127.) [VINCENT.] [M. A. W.]

GIBRANUS (GIBRANUS, GIBRAN), commemorated May 8. In the Lives of S. Tressan, S. Gibrian, S. Eliaquin, and others, we have the account of the arrival of a band of Christian teachers in Gaul in the time of Clovis I, but it is very doubtful whether all the reputed members of that band belonged even to the 6th century. GIBALDUS, tenth bishop of Angoulême, in the early part of the 7th century. He is mentioned, though without his see, in the will of St. Berthembrus, bishop of Tuns, as the former possessor of an estate thereby devised. (Mabill. Vet. Anecdot. p. 261, Paris, 1723; Migne, Patr. GIGANTIUS (otherwise SIGANTIUS), a correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen. The wickedness of the world around having led him to adopt an ascetic life, he wrote to acquaint Gregory with his determination, and to request him to pay him a speedy visit. His letter also contained a clear statement of the orthodox faith on the Trinity, the perusal of which caused Gregory the greatest joy, which he expressed in his reply. He could not promise to visit him immediately on account of the approach of winter and the feebleness of his health, but he would come when he could (Greg. Naz. Epist. 239). On a subsequent occasion he fulfilled his intention, but found Gigantius absent, so that, as he complains in an epigram, having come to the fountain and found it without water, he went away more thirsty than ever. (Carm. Lamb. ii. 180.) [E. V.]

GIGNANTIUS or GIGANTIUS, a bishop present at the council of Milevis against Pelagianism, A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 176.)

GIGNEUS, a disciple of St. Enna, but also a foreigner. He was living at Ballynacourty, co. Galway, when St. Enna visited that district, and he may be the cook of St. Enna, who for a slight transgression of the monastic rule was banished from Aran, and perhaps took up his abode on the island of Tawyn or Tawin, in the parish of Ballynacourty. (Colgan, Acta SS. 709, c. 24, 711, c. 1.) [J. G.]

GILDAS (Gildasius, Gildus, Gillas), commemorated January 29. A close and accurate account of Gildas is surrounded with difficulties, and after all that has been written, the facts of his life and his very existence are left in uncertainty. In the medieval Lives he appears in a well-defined individuality, but a more critical view detects so many anachronisms and historical defects, that it has been questioned, first, as to whether he ever lived, and secondly, as to whether there were more Gildases than one, and if more, how many. Though he is mentioned by name, and his writings quoted from by Bede, Alcuin, William of Newburgh, Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Gildas Cambrensis, there is no memoir of him written within several centuries of the time when he is supposed to have flourished, and the two oldest, on which the others are founded, cannot be regarded in a higher light than as ordinary specimens of that unhistorical tone of mind which prevailed in the 11th and 12th centuries. In order to surmount the chronological and historical difficulties, Usheer, Ware, Bale, Pitcairn, Colgan, and O'Connor have imagined that there must have been at least two, and more, and a younger, perhaps even four or six, about the 5th and 6th centuries. These have received different designations to mark them, and thus have obtained a recognised position in history. But the more probable and more generally received opinion is that, though called Albanics, Albanus, Badonics, Cambrians, Hibernicus, Hibernicus, Historicus, and Saxon, the Gildas who is generally accepted could not have lived earlier than about the end of the 5th century, or later than about the end of the 6th. The oldest authority is Vita Gildæ, autore monacho Ruyensi anonymo, first published by Johnnies a Bosco (in the Bibliotheca Floriacensis, pp. 249 sq.), then by Colgan (Acta SS. 181 no. 138 sq. ed. G. J. Low, p. 183 sq. ed. Paris, giving the complete text), and the Bodleian (Acta SS. 29 Jan. iii. 573 sq.). This Life has often been published in Latin and English since that time, and is attributed to the 11th century, or earlier. The other was written by Caradoc of Llancarvan in the 12th century, and first published in Stevenson's Gildas de Excidio Britanniarum (Engl. Hist. Soc. 1838) from two MSS. in the British Museum; on this Capgrave's De S. Gildæ Abb. et Mart. (Nov. Leg. Angl. f. 156) is founded. (For published and MS. Lives, see Hardy's Descript. Cot. i. pt. i. 151-6, pt. ii. 793.) Along with voluminous notes and special sections treating of the many points in dispute regarding Gildas, the Bodleian gives only one Life as above, but Colgan publishes four, the two principal being Capgrave's, followed by some extracts from the Life by Caradoc as given by Usheer, and the Ruyensis: the former he calls Vita S. Gildæ Albanis Abb. et Confess. from Capgrave, and the latter Vita S. Gildæ Badonici Abb. et Confess. from John a Bosco. Proceeding upon what seems more or less a common groundwork of fact, these Lives present much that is irreconcilable in themselves and with each other. "Nor need this seem so very strange," says O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 473-4), "when both accounts had been drawn up several centuries after the lifetime of Gildas, and when they had been written in different centuries and in separate countries. The diversities of chronological events, and of persons hardly contemporaneous, will only enable us to infer that the sources of information were occasionally doubtful, while the various coincidences of narrative seem to warrant a conclusion that both tracts were intended to chronicle the life of one and the same person. It deserves remark, however, that "" (quoting from Mon. Hist. Brit. i. pt. i. 59, n), ""both are said to have been born in Scotland. One was the son of Niu, the other of Cau, the eldest son [7 brothers] of one was Huel, of the other Cull. Both lives have of a bell, both Gildases go to Ireland, both go to Rome, and both build churches. The monk of Ruys quotes several passages from Gildas De Excidio, and assigns it to him; and Caradoc calls him, 'Historiographus Britomart,' and says that he wrote Historiae de Regine Britomart. To this we may add the conclusion of Ep. Nicolson (Engl. Hist. Lit. 39, 3rd ed.): "'He was monk of Bangor about the middle of the 6th century: a sorrowful spectator of the miseries and almost utter ruin of his countrymen by a people under whose banner they had hoped for peace.'" By those who suppose there were two or more bearing the same name Albanius is placed in the 5th century (425-512, Usheer), and Badonius in the 6th (520-570, Usheer). Those who believe there was only one Gildas do not entirely agree as to his dates, one for his birth being sought between A.D. 484 and 520, and one for his death between A.D. 565 and 602. In his De Excidio Britomart, he gives the year of ""obessionis Badonicini monachi, qui prope Subrinum ostium habetur, ..., annos ..., qui jam et mene natiuitatis est "" (c. 26). The Annales Cambriae place the ""bellum ludens"" in the year 516, and the Annales Tiberi-adius Gildas' death in the year 570; these dates are probably to be accepted, for (570 ed. the translation). This writing ascribed to Gildas was long regarded and spoken of as one treatise, De Excidio Britomart; but it is now usually divided into the Historia Gildae and Epistola Gildæ. The former is a dry and barren recital of the events of British history under the Romans, and between their withdrawal and his own time; the latter is a querulous, confused, and lengthened series of bitter invectives cast into the form of a declamatory epistle addressed to the Britons, and relating specially to five kings, ""reges sed tyrannos,"" named Constantius, Aurelius, Coaan, Veretiporus, Cuneglasus, and Maglocnus. Accusations, however, and reproaches are cast so freely against kings, priests, and people, especially against the crimes of the kings, and the ignorance, avarice, idleness and other faults of the priesthood, that many, though probably without quite sufficient reason, have come to regard the composition as the work of a later writer, and as intended in the eclesiastical differences of the 7th and 8th centuries for purely polemical purposes, while others would

...to even a still later date. (See useful notes on both sides in Notes and Queries, 4 ser. i. 171, 271, 511, and on the side of genuineness and authenticity, Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iii. 290 sq.)

Of Gildas's work only two MSS. are known to exist. One is in the library of the University of Cambridge (Dr. I. 17, and Ff. I. 27, the latter having only the Historia); a third MS. (Cotton Libr. Vit. A. vi.) is lost, but fortunately represented with great accuracy in Josselin's edition. The work has often been published in this country and on the continent; edited by Haydock, Paris, 1758; by Josselin, London, 1658; by Stevenson, London, 1838 (Eng. Hist. Soc.); and republished at Berlin, 1844, with German introductions and notes, by San Marte. It is also found in Mon. S. Patr. Orthodox. t. i. Basa, 1555, and t. ii. Basa, 1669; Hist. Brit. Script. xv. ed. Gale, Oxon. 1691; Mon. Hist. Brit. 1847. The Welsh poet Stubbis, Council, &c., Oxford, 1869. Translations are by Habington, Lond. 1638; by Giles, Lond. 1841; republished, with additions, in Bohn's Six Old English Chronicles. (For its bibliography, see Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. Ang.-Sax. per. i. 1654; Mon. Hist. Brit. i. pt. i. 59 sq.; Min. Brit. Hist. 1, 2, ed. Pickard, Lond. 1846; Josselin, Hist. Doc. Acta, &c., Brit. iii. iv. pref.; Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iii. 280-284.)

His history is often confounded with the Historia Britonum of Nennius [NENNUS], and many other works have been attributed to the one or more Gildases; the De Victoria Ambrosii Aurelii, which is quoted by Geoffrey of Monmouth, is not now admitted; and the prophetic verses ascribed to him by Bede are evidently spurious. Some canons or rules of discipline, ascribed to Gildas, are given by D'Achery (Spicil. Vet. Script. t. ix. 4-50, Paris, 1669). He is sometimes (Rees, Welsh Saints, 225 sq.; Williams, Emyn. Welsh, 17, 18, 160) identified with the Welsh poet Awarn, and the Irish annalista associate David, Cadoc, and Gildas in giving an order of mass to the second order of Irish saints, which proves at least the strongly Irish connexion through which he has been called Hibernus and Hibernicus. (Bollandists, Acta SS. 29 Jan. iii. 566-562; Colgan, Acta SS. 176-203, 228-229; Lasagna, Eccl. Hist. II. i. c. 9; Usher, Brit. Eccl. Anti. c. 13-17, and Ind. Chron.; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. Ang.-Sax. per. 115-113.)

[G. G.]

GILDAS. (I.) Albanicus, Albanicus, commemorated Jan. 29. If we assume with Usher and others that Gildas Albanicus or Albanius, was the person with whom the Irish distanced others of the name of Gildas, and that the Vita Gildasae, written by Carodoc of Llanearvan, is the memoir of this saint, we find him to have been one of the twenty-four sons of Nau (called Can by Capgrave, Canus by Mabillon, and Navus by Bale), king of Albania (Scotland); to perfect his learning he went seven years to Gaul, and on his return became anchorite, teacher, and preacher throughout the three kingdoms of Britain (called by Camden, Brit. 573, the Silures, Dimetae, and Ordovices), announcing at this time the birth of St. David. He also passed over into Ireland and resided chiefly at Armagh, where he converted many to the Catholic faith. There the news reached him that his brothers had gone to war against king Arthur, and that his eldest brother Huwel had fallen. Leaving, therefore, his school at Armagh, he returned to Britain, met Arthur, and gave him the forgiveness he desired for having been the cause of Huwel's death, proceeded to Rome with a famous bell (which he wished to present to the pope, but which showed by its silence that St. Cadoc had a better claim to it), and on his return to Britain had a school at Llanearvan, co. Glamorgan, where he wrote a beautiful copy of the Gospel, which was long preserved in the church of St. Cadoc. He afterwards retired, settled at Gwernan, an island in the Severn, and after a time, finding this place disagreeable on account of the pirates from the Orkney Islands, he went to Glastonbury and wrote his Historiae de Regibus Britanniae. He then became a recluse near Glastonbury, built a chapel to the Holy Trinity, died, and was buried there in the middle of the church of St. Mary. Following this Life, Abp. Usher places Gildas's birth in the year 425, his visit to Armoricia in 455, his return to Britain in 462, Huwel or Howel's death in the island of Mona and Gildas's return from Ireland in 508, his resort to Glastonbury in 510, and his death in 512 (Usher, Brit. Hist. ii. 324; Dods, Eccles. Anti. xviii. 326; Plancher, Dans les ouvrages de W. Usher, Brit. Anti. eccl. 215 sq., and Ind. Chron., ed. Elrington; Stephen, de Esc. Brit. xxi.-xii.; Colgan, Acta SS. 179, 180; Creasy, Ch. Hist. Brit. ii. c. 3). There are attributed to him, but without any semblance of truth (except in the one fact of a Gildas having written De Ecclesia Britannica), Commentarii Quart. Evangeliorum, lib. iv.; De urmis habitationum virorum, &c., lib. i.; Vitae Britonum ... censuram, lib. i.; De Sexto Cognozcendo, lib. i.; Super eodem Sexto, lib. i.; Regum Britonum ... historiam, lib. i.; De victorii Aurelii Ambrosii, lib. ii.; Acta Germani et Lapid., lib. i. (Tanner, Bibl. 319, following Bole and Fiteuse; Ware, Jr. Writ. ii. c. 1; Biographie universelle, t. xviii. 395; Fitzmaurice, Histoire de l'Ile Anglo-Sax. t. 92, 93; Balausse, Hist. Mag. Brit. Script. t. 43.)

(II.) Badonicus, Historicus, and Sapiens, commemorated Jan. 29. Accepting this Gildas as different from the preceding, and following the account given by the monks of his name in the S. Gildas Sapientis Vita, we seem to have a distinct historical outline. This Gildas was born at Arcula on the river Ut (Dunbaron on the Clyde in Scotland); his father was Canus, and of his four brothers the eldest was called Cuillus, and succeeded his father in the kingdom. Gildas was educated by St. Illtud, and his school companions were St. Samson and St. Paul, who were afterwards famous bishops in Armorica. From them he learned to distinguish himself from others apparently there, and returned to North Britain, where he laboured among those who were Christians, but not Catholics, being entangled in divers heretical deceits. At the invitation of St. Brigid (Feb. 1), and also of king Ammericus (Ailmire), he returned to Ireland, the foresaid king promising to obey the holy man in all things if he would restore the Catholic faith in his kingdom. From Ireland he passed through England to Rome and Ravenna, and, returning to Brittany in the reign of king Childeric, built a monastery at Ruys (in Monte Reveushi), where he died and was buried. At Ruys he wrote "epistolarem libellum in quo quinque Reges ipsius insulae..."
(i.e. Brittain) redarguit diversitatem sceleribus atque criminibus irretituras." As in this he says of himself that he was born in the year the battle of Mons Badonicus was fought (hence his name Badonomicus), Ussher places his birth in the year 520, his writing his querulous epistle in 584, and his death in 599 at Rheims. (Ussher, Brit. Eoc. Ant. c. xii. xv, Works. v. 506 sq., vi. 316 sq., and Ind. Chron., ed. Elrington; Tanner, Bibl. 319-322, but mixing up the two lives, and adding in a note that he wrote De Immortalitate Animae, lib. i.; De Excidio Britanniae, lib. i.; in suis Temporis Clerum, lib. i.; De Gestis Britonum Histor. lib. i. See also Creasy, Ch. Hist. Brit. xii. c. 10; Colgan, Acta SS. 181-202, with notes and learned appendix of four chapters; Cave, Hist. Liter. 424-426, putting him later than Ussher does; Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iii. 279-285, following the Life in Mabillon, and putting his arrival in Armorica in the year 520, his writing in 530, and his death in 565, giving also a detailed account of the most ancient part of the work, and attributing it to them on the continent; Fleury, Hist. Chr. xxii. 15; Ware, Irish Writ. ii. c. 1; Gen. Eccl. Dict. i. 851, 852; Biographie universelle, t. xvii. 365-367; Balaesus, Ill. Mag. Brit. Scrip. fol. 33; Pitsius, de Ill. Angl. Scrip. 192; Williams, Ensia. Welsh. 155, 156; Howell, Mon. Ant. Hist. 193-195, 2nd edit.)

(III.) Cambrius. This Gildas is evidently a reflexion of the historical writer, but is placed by Pitsius (de Ill. Angl. Scrip. 70), Balaesus (Mag. Ill. Brit. Scrip. t. 15), and others, in the 1st century, in the Christian era, and credited with the authorship of numerous writings; he seems, however, to be entirely fictitious. (Tanner, Bibl. 319.)

(IV.) Quartus has received his name to distinguish him from Albanius, Badonicus and Cambrius, and is said by Pitsius to have flourished as an old man in 860, and by Dempster in 870. According to these writers he was an Irishman, monk at Bangor, and writer of Historia Britonum, lib. i.; Brevarium Gildae, lib. i.; De Mirabilibus Britanniae, lib. i.; De Primis Habitatoribus Britanniae, lib. i.; De Rege Arturo, lib. i.; De Sempuloro ejus incognito, lib. i.; and some others. But these are more than doubtful, especially as the first work is Nennius's History. Ussher places him in A.D. 820, and says he wrote Liber de Comploto, in 99 chapters, of which in his Synode (Wks. iv. 472) he gives the preface, which is addressed to a monk called Rabanus, the work itself being in MS. in the Cottonian Library. (Colgan, Acta SS. 201, 202, 2. 4; Pitsius, de Ill. Angl. Scrip. 70, 160; Balaesus, Vit. Ill. Brit. Scrip. t. 21; Dempster, A.D. 297, and Col. June 23; Dewes, Hist. Eoc. Gent. Scot. i. 308.)

[J. G.]

GILDAS, abbot, fellow-student of St. Samson and St. Paul. He came from Ireland to France in the reign of king Grainlon, who built for him and his disciples a monastery on the island of Bayes in the 5th or 6th century. Colgan (Acta SS. 179) takes this account from the Brevery of Nantes, and presents it at Jan. 29; but the legend is evidently a part of that of Gildas Badonicus, and reappears, only under a different form, and in more detail connecting him with St. Philibert of Jumièges in the 7th century, in the memoir of St. Gildasius, confessors of Blarat at Jan. 31, taken by Colgan (6. 296-8) from the Brevery of Quimper. [GILDAS (II. I.) (O'Flahie, Ir. Saints, Jan. 29 and 31, i. 495, 496, 602-607; Usuard, Mart. Auct. 27 Jan. ap. Migne, Pat. Lat. exxiii. 702.)] [J. G.]

GILD EMIRUS (GULDEMIRUS), bishop of Complutum, from before 681. He is represented by his vicar Annoniobius at the twelfth Council of Toledo, A.D. 681. (Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 370; Exp. Sagra. vii. 188.) [ASTURIUS] [M. A. W.]

GILDO (1), a presbyter appointed to succeed Rufus as bishop of Lanzelum in Numidia, but not yet installed at the time of Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 200.) [H. W. F.]

GILDO (2), son of Nubel and brother of Firmus (FIRMINUS (7)), invested by Theodosius with the title and authority of count of Africa. Having revolted against Honorius, he was defeated near Berkastel in the winter of 398 and died by his own hand (Gibbon, c. xixi). During the time of his ascendency he favoured the Donatists, and Optatus, bishop of Thamusia, received the name of Gildonianus in consequence of the support which Gildo gave to him, and the violence which he exercised towards the Catholics. (Tillemont, 73, vol. vi. p. 181.) [ORPAA.] [H. W. F.]

GILES. [AGEDUINUS.]

GILLMIR. This is the name, according to Villanueva, (Visigo. Litterario, xiii. 6) of the bishop of Gerona, otherwise known as Miron, whose signature is found to the acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 693. (Masi, xii. 56 a.) Gams, (Ser. Episc. 32) places both Miron and Gillmir in the list of bishops of Gerona. (Exp. Sagra. xiii. 67; Tejada y Ramin, ii. 580.)

GILLAS, British historian. [GILDAR.]

GILENUS is spoken of by the Scotch annalists, Fordun, John Major, Camerarius, and Dempster as a Scot who lived in Gaul, and was a disciple or contemporary of St. Columbanus (Nov. 21). Dempster says he wrote Speculum Vitae Humanae, lib. i.; Epistole ad Pratres, lib. i. and iii. and published A.D. 546 must be too early. Fordun says he lived in the time of the Scotch king Eugenius, or Eocha Buidhe in the beginning of the 7th century, and Camerarius commemorates him on June 23; he must, however, have been a Hibernian Scot. (Fordun, Scotochr. i. iii. c. 32; Joannes Major, de Gest. Scot. i. ii. c. 7; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 159, and Col. June 23; Dewes, Hist. Eoc. Gent. Scot. i. 308.)

GILLES. [EIDITUS.]

GILLUS (GELUS), Aug. 30, martyr at Ancyras with six others. (Wright, Syrian Mart. in Journ. Soc. Lit. 1866, 428.) [G. T. S.]

GILULFUS (GULULBUS), bishop of Asti (Asi), c. A.D. 813. It is said that the archives of his cathedral were burnt A.D. 820. His successor was Roserius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 479; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia. xiv. 88.) [T. S. G.]

GIOVANNICIIUS. [JOANNICIIUS.]
GIRALDUS

GIRALDUS of Velitrac. [GERARDUS.]

GIRICUS. [GERICUS.]

GIRIGR (GERIGR, GWIGR.), patron of Llangigr or Llangwrig, in Montgomeryshire. The more common form of his name is Curig or Cyricus. [CIRCUS.]

[GEECUS.] (Rees, Welsh Saints, 83, 207; Camb. Quart. Mag. i. 490, iii. 507.) [J. C.]

GISA, daughter of Grimoald king of the Lombards. She was given by her brother Remwald, duke of Benevento, as a hostage to the emperor Constant, who was besieging Benevento, c. 663. She afterwards died in Italy. (Paulus Diaec. v. 8, 14; Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1578, p. 146-150.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISBLEICUS, Visigoth king. [GISALLEC.]

GISELHERE, GISELHERUS, the seventh bishop of the South Saxons at Selsey (M. H. B. 619). His date, as ascertained by charters, falls between 783 and 787, and in the latter year his successor Totta was in office (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402), and in the latter his successor Totta (ib. p. 461). The name of Giselhere appears in the list of prelates present at the council of Brentford in 781 (Kemble, C. D. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 408), and in a grant of Gisbert, abbot of the South Saxons, dated at Selsey in 780. (Kemble, C. D. 1012.) [S.]

GISELPERTUS, duke of Verona in the time of Paulus Diaecos. He opened and rifled the grave of king Alboin. (Paulus Diaecos, ii. 28.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISIBARIUS, a priest, Scot, disciple and associate of St. Rubbert, or Rupert. He wrote Ad Boarios Homilias, and flourished about A.D. 630. (Dempster, Hist. Ecol. Gent. Scot. i. 308; Tanner, Bibl. 328.) [J. G.]

GISILARIUS, priest. [GISILARIUS.]

GISIUS, bishop of Mutina (Modern), succeeded Geminianus IV. c. A.D. 796, and died probably A.D. 811 or 812. His successor was Deodata. (Ugellii, Ital. Scol. ii. 113; Cappelletti, Le Chise dell' Italia xv. 235.) [R. S. G.]

GISLA (1) (GISLA, GISLANA), daughter of Pippin and only sister of Charles the Great, born A.D. 737. The robes in which she issued from the baptismal font were sent by her father to the pope, Paul I., in token of her spiritual adoption by him (cf. the letter of Paul, Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxix. 1183). Her hand was sought in marriage by Constantine Copronymus, the emperor of the East, for his son Leo, and later by Adalgisus, son of Desiderius, king of the Lombards; but both offers were opposed by the reigning popes, and neither was accepted (cf. the letter of Stephen III. written in 770 to Charles CHART. M.O.B.—VOL. II. and Carloman in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcviii. 255, and Bouquet, v. 543). Almost from girlhood she was dedicated to religion, and became ninth abbess of Chelles (Cala), the monastery of St. Bathildis, where she built at her own cost the church of St. Mary and St. Saviour. Here she was visited by Charles, when sick, in 804, and by Alcuin, of whom we have two letters addressed to her. (Bouquet, v. 615, 616; Migne, Patr. Lat. c. 362, 363.) There is extant a diploma by which she granted large possessions to the monastery of St. Denys in A.D. 799 (Bouquet, v. 760). Her death took place in 810. (Annales, in Pert. i. 11; Eginhardi Vita Caroli Magni, xiii. in Bouquet, v. 97, 613; Monum. Carolini, ed. Jaffé, var. loc. see index; Translatio S. Bathildis, in Mabill. Acta SS. O. S. B. sac. iv. pars 1, p. 452, Paris, 1688-1701; Gall. Christ. vii. 560.) [S. A. B.]

GISLA (2) (GISOLA), daughter of Charles the Great and Hildegarde, baptized, and received from the font at Milan, by Thomas the archbishop, in A.D. 781. With the rest of her family she is celebrated in the magniloquent verse of Angilbert (225-242; Pert. ii. 25), who lauds her beauty and her horsemanship in the chase, to which she was wont to accompany her father. Alcuin wrote her a short letter (Migne, Patr. Lat. c. 363; Bouquet, v. 616), exhorting her to lead a life of holiness. (Eginhardi Vita Caroli Magni, xviii. in Bouquet, v. 96; Annales Lauriacensium, and Enlart in Pert. i. 160-1.) [S. A. B.]

GISLA (3), daughter of Theodulfus bishop of Orleans (ob. A.D. 821), who addresses one of his poems to her, and gives her the gift of a psalter (ib. i. 4 in Migne, Patr. Lat. cv. 326.) [S. A. B.]

GISLARIUS (GISLARIUS, GISOLARIUS), presbyter of Salzburg about the middle of the 8th century, a companion of St. Hildegib, St. Rudbert and others in Germany; he probably was an Irishman, and seems to have died at Salzburg. Associated with St. Chunibaldus he is commemorated at Feb. 8, Sept. 24, and Oct. 20. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 3 Feb., i. 151) place them among other premonstratensians at Salzburg, and give at Sept. 24 a Spilgeo Historiarum, "de SS. Chunialdo et Gislario presbyteris Salesburgh in Germania, de cultu translatione et gestis, circa sec. viii." (ib. Sept. tom. vi. 708-13.) Colgan was preparing a life of the same two holy men for Sept. 24. (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. v. 374; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 111, ii. 414; Hanfius, Germ. Scol. ii. 46, 48.) [J. G.]

GISLEBERTUS (GILBERTUS), thirty-third bishop of Noyon and Tournoy, between Dido, or Dodo, and Plun. He was educated in the monastery of Elenon (St. Amand on the Scarpe, dep. Nord) and before his elevation became its abbot. In A.D. 769 he subscribed the Lateran Council under Stephen III. He died A.D. 782 in his own monastery, and was buried in the church of St. Peter and St. Paul. Two epitaphs, one of them by Alcuin, are extant. (Gall. Christ. iii. 250; ix. 998; Massili, xii. 715.) [S. A. B.]

Gislemorius—Sept. 16. One of the Theban legion, and regarded as patron of Borgo di San Donino in Italy. [MAURIUS; LEGIO THEBANAE.] [F. B.] 2 X
GISLENUS (GUILAIN, GUILAINE), ST., founder and first abbot of the monastery of Cella, afterwards St. Gulain, in the 7th century. The story of his life, which has come down to us, is as follows. He was born of noble stock in Attica, and after being trained in philosophy at Athens entered a monastery subject to the rule of St. Basil. In his time he became a priest, and bethinking of the example of St. Dionysius the martyr, who left Athens to seek Rome, he resolved to go thither likewise. He had not been there long when a voice from heaven bade him depart and come to Hainault. Thither he went, accompanied by two disciples, called Lambert and Bellarius. On his arrival he sought an interview with St. Amandus, whose fame filled the neighbourhood, and commenced to build a cell on a spot called Castrilocus. He afterwards obtained from Dagobert a site upon the Halne in Hainault, and here he built a monastery, which was at first called Cella, and afterwards gave rise to the town named from him St. Ghislain or St. Gulain. Autbert, archbishop of Cambray (656-668) and Amandus consecrated it. The remainder of his life was spent in works of piety, and among other good deeds he persuaded St. Walderstrude to purchase the spot on which he had first settled, and there build a monastery. In this work some assistance was given by St. Hildulfus, and the monastery of Castrilocus (St. Vaudre du Mous; cf. Gall. Christ. iii. 144) was there erected. To him too, St. Aldegundis, who founded the monastery of Melodium (Mauheuge), and others, owed their conversion. He died at Cella (A.D. 681, according to Mabillon's conjecture), and was buried in his own church, although, in the time of Charles the Great, when the oratorium was restored by abbot Elefas, his bones were removed for the consecration, and were not again restored to their original resting-place.

The foregoing account is from the anonymous Life published by Mabillon (Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti, ii. 716, Paris, 1698-1708) and by the Bellanens (Acta SS. Oct. iv. 1090). In his preliminary observations Mabillon enumerates as many as six different lives. In the Actarum of Molanus to Usuard (Mart. Oct. 9) Gislenus is called bishop of Athens, but there seems to be no foundation for such a statement. His day was Oct. 9 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iv. 1010). [S. A. B.]

GISLERE (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. No. 143, A.D. 781), bishop of Selsey. [GISLERHERE]

[C. H.]

GISLOADUS, fifteenth bishop of Verdon, succeeding St. Paulus and followed by his nephew Gerebertus. He had been a monk of Tholey (Theologium), in the diocese of Trevès. He was perhaps the bishop Gislochardus, one of those consulted by Sigebert as to the foundation of the monasteries of Malmédy and Stavelo in the Ardennes, which took place in A.D. 645, the year of his consecration (Notger, Vit. S. Remodi; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 680). He was also one of the bishops to whom Numerianus, archbishop of Treves, addressed his charter in favour of the monastery built by St. Deodatus of Nevers, in the Vesiges (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 1191). His death is placed A.D. 665. (Gall. Christ. xii. 1179, instr. 291.) [S. A. B.]

GISOLA, daughter of Charles the Great. [GIELA.]

GISTLIANUS (GISTILLIANUS, GISTILLISANUS, GIVSILLIANUS, GWISILLIAN), bishop at Mevrea before St. David his nephew, and son of Gynris of Caer Gawch, by his second wife Anna, daughter of Gwrtysfey Fendigaid (Vortimer). His first house was at Old Mevrea, near the present St. David's, and was endowed by his father Gynris, but was afterwards removed to Rheidol, where the cathedral now stands, at the suggestion of St. David. (Roes, Welsh Saints, 163, 173, 194; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 425; Leland, Collect. iii. 103; Jones and Freeman, Hist. of St. David's, p. 243.) [J. G.]

GISULFUS, first duke of Eruli, and the first Lombard duke appointed upon the invasion of Italy by Alboin in 569. The district was the first conquered by Alboin, who, before proceeding farther into Italy, offered the charge of it to his nephew and marshal (marcheis) Gisulf. Upon condition of being allowed to retain certain selected families to settle with him he consented, and received the title of the "dux." (Paulus Diaconus, ii. 9.) Gisulf was one of the dukes under whose rule the Lombards lived for ten years after the death of Kleph, when there was no king (Paul. Diaconus. ii. 32). After some discord with the king Agilulf, of whom the cause is unknown, he was received peaceably by him, c. ann. 602 (Paul. Diaconus. iv. 27). Together with the king he ratified the appointment of a bishop (or patriarch) to Aquileia, which was then in opposition to the see of Rome. He lost his life, together with the greater part of his army, c. 610, in resisting an invasion of the Avars. His son, Grimoldus, then a child, escaped to the court of Benevento, and afterwards became duke of Benevento, and eventually seized the kingdom. It is possible that the first duke appointed was Grasulf, father of Gisulf, and that Paulus Diaconus is wrong. (Monast. Langob. Rerum, 1878, p. 77; Muratori, Ann. a. 590; Pabst, Forschungen z. d. G. p. 428.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISULFUS, a Lombard duke, who was the son of Romulus, exarch of Ravenna, into Iberia, and saw himself up with his whole grand. He was at the time quite young (Letter of Romanus to Childeric, king of the Franks; Troya, Cod. Dipl. i. p. 132). It is possible that he is the same as the above-mentioned Gisulf. (This is not allowed by Troya, but see Muratori, Ann. a. 590.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISULFUS, duke of Benevento, 899-706, succeeded his brother Grimold. In the time of pope John VI, c. 702, he laid waste Campania, and took many captives, who were all redeemed.
GISISULPHUS

GISISULPHUS, bishop of Chiasso (Clusium), appeared apparently to act as judge upon Aus- treidus bishop of Sienna, mentioned in a letter of pope Stephen III, May, 752, to Stabilis bishop of Aretzo. (Troya, Cod. Dipl. iv. 413; Jaffe, Regest. Pont. p. 189.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISISULPHUS II, duke of Benevento, son of Rembold, and nephew of king Ludwig II. His father died c. 731, when he was quite a child. An attempt was made to kill him, but the people of Benevento protected him. Luitprand then came and carried him off for a while to his court at Pavia, placing another nephew, Gregory, in the duchy. Gregory died in 739, and Godeslaus became duke, but on the arrival of Luitprand, three years after, he prepared to fly to Constantinople, but before embarking was killed by the Beneventans. Guisl then became duke of Benevento in 742. His gifts and concessions to the monasteries of Allis, S. Vincenzo on the Volturno and others, range from September, 742, to the beginning of 751, in which year he probably died. (Troya, Cod. Dipl. n. 553–643 passim. Oelner, Königspap. excurs. i. p. 444; Paulus Diaconus, vii. 55–58.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISISULPHUS, bishop of Cajazzo in Campania, c. 778. (Cappelletti, La Chiese d’Italia, xx. 69.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISVALDUS, confessor, companion, and disciple of St. Dyssibod, accompanied his master to Belgium, and flourished a.d. 654, but Dem- stter (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Sott. 1. 313) refuses the suggestion of Lalescu (de Reb. Sott. lib. iv. p. 154) that he lived at Fulda. [J. G.]

GIULFUS (BULFUS), ninth bishop of Stras- b burg, said to have ruled in the 7th century. (Goll. Christ. v. 779; Potthast, Biboth. Suppl. p. 414.) [R. T. S.]

GIUSTILIANUS. [GIUSTILIANUS.]

GIVERICUS (GIVERINUS), bishop of Mentesa (cr. Jaen), before 646. He sent a deacon, Ambrose, to represent him at the seventh Council of Toledo, a.d. 646 (Agui rre-Catalani, iii. 426; Esp. Syn. vii. 269). [FARDUS.] [M. A. W.]

GIZOLARIUS, priest. [GISLARIUS.]

GLADUSA, Welsh saint. [GWLADUS.]

GLAPHYRA, virgin, of Amasea, Jan. 13. She appears to have been in Licinius’s household at Nicomedia, and afterwards at Amasea, where she became acquainted with Basilieus the bishop, assisted him, with the help of Licinius’s wife, who was Constantine’s sister, to build a church at Amasea, and at last suffered death with him about the beginning of the 4th century. Her Acta are given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 13 Jan. i. 771–2) from the Acta Martyrum S. Basilie Episcopi Amaseae; see also Assemani (Act. Mart. Occid. et Orient. pt. ii. 310), but they do not amount to history. [J. G.]

GLASANUS (GLASCUS) is commemorated at Oct 1, in Mart. Donyn., and may be the same as the Glassicus, whom St. Patrick left at Kil- glas, when that saint was preaching in Daluradus, co. Antrim, and was being opposed by the sons of Coelhadius. (Colgan, Tr. Thos. 147 c. 181, 182, n. 202; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 338.) [J. G.]

GLAUCLAS, an alleged interpreter (épaves) of St. Peter, who was claimed as the instructor of BASILEIDES. (Glem. Al. Strom. vii. 17, p. 809.) [G. S.]

GLAUCUS, bishop of Alii (Aliani), in Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the fifth general council, a.d. 553. (Mansi, x. 393; Le Quen, Oriens Christian. i. 809.) [L. D.]

GLEWIS, lay witness to a grant by Erb, king of Gwent and Exyngry, to St. Dubricius and the see of Llandaff (Lib. Laned. by Rees, 318). He may be the same as Glywyw of Glewisia (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 309). [Glympes (2).]

GLIN-MAUR, i.e. magne-genus, surname of Esta de Northumbria. [Kata (3).] (Hist. Nennii in M. H. B. 75 n.) [C. H.]

GLIUSUS, GLYSVIUS, GLIVUSUS, Welsh chieftain, the father of Gywriwyv Filwr (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 145; Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. 87, 88). [Glywywes (2).] [J. G.]

GLODYW, clerical witness to grant of Caer Riou, near Monmouth, by king Athwys, son of Fehruwael, to bishop Cadwared (Ctswgarett and the see of Llandaff in the 8th century. (Lib. Laned. by Rees, 484.) [J. G.]

GLORINUS, bishop of Junce, in Maurotania Caesariensis, and supposed to have been primate of that province, was banished by Hunneric a.d. 484. (Vic. Vitae. Notit. 59; Morcelli, Atr. Christ. i. 182.) [R. S. G.]

GLORIOUS (3), bishop of Camerino, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Hefele, § 307; Mansi, x. 986.) [A. H. D. A.]

GLORIOUS, a person to whom, in conjunction with Eulius and Felix, St. Augustine addressed two letters. In the first of them the name Grammaticus is added, and other persons are mentioned, though not by name. (Textus (3).) (Aug. Ep. 43, 44.) [H. W. P.]

GLOWYBWY, clerical witness to a grant by king Rhys, son of Ithael, to bishop Cadwared (Ctswgarett) and the see of Llandaff in the 8th century. (Lib. Laned. by Rees, 485.) [J. G.]

GLUIUSUS, Welsh chieftain. [Glympes (2).]
GLUNSALACH, son of Costamhail. O'Clery suggests that this saint, who was of the race of Conall Cearnach, and lived at Slishb-Fusaid, a mountain near Newton-Hamilton, co. Armagh, may have been a famous outlaw, who forsook his evil ways, joined himself to the company of St. Coemgen, and died in sanctity, being commemorated on the same day as his master, June 3. Colgan had a Life in preparation for that day. (Mart. Doney, by Todd and Reeves, 145; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 373.) [J. G.]

GLUVIAS (GLYTHIANUS OR GLYTHIACUS), ST., the saint of a parish which includes Fenny, in Falmouth harbour. It is possible that the name is connected with that of Glywys Cerniow in the 6th century (Rees's Welsh Saints, 114, 233, 268). [C. W. B.]

GLYCERIA—May 10. Virgin and martyr at Trajanopolis in Thrace, under Sabinus, the president in the time of Antoninus Pius, or of Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 138-180. She seems to have challenged the martyr's fate. When the president was sacrificing, she publicly reproved him, for which she was tortured and cast to the beasts. She converted her guard, Laodicia, who suffered with her. (Bas. Menol.; Surius Vitae SS. 10 Mai.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. iii. 189-192; Dodwell, Dissert. Cypriani. xi. de Paschit. Mart. sect. 53-57.) [G. T. S.]

GLYCERIA, martyr with Anna and Theodato; commemorated on Oct. 22. They embrace the Christian faith on witnessing the sufferings of bishop Alexander, and shared in his martyrdom. (Basil. Menol. i. 134.) [C. H.]

GLYCERIUS (2), Dec. 18. Presbyter and martyr under Maximianus. (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

GLYCERIUS (5), a deacon in Cappadocia, who caused Basil much annoyance by his extravagant and disorderly proceedings circ. 374. Glycerius being a vigorous young man, well fitted for the humbler offices of the church, requiring actual labour, and having adopted the ascetic life, was ordained deacon by Basil. The name of the church he served is doubtful. It is given in different MSS. as Veneta, Veneta, and Synnasa. His elevation turned the young man's head. He at once began to neglect the duties of his office, and gathered about him a number of young women, partly by persuasion, partly by force, of whom he took the direction, styling himself their patriarch, and adopting a dress and seeming with his followers. He was supported by the offerings of his female followers, and Basil charges him with adopting this spiritual directorship as a trade, that he might get his living without work. The wild and disorderly proceedings of Glycerius and his deluded adherents created great scandal in his own city as well as in the neighbourhood, where he was admonished by his own presbyter, his choric-scopus, and finally by Basil himself. Glycerius, however, turned a deaf ear to all, and having swelled his fanatical band by a number of young men, he one night hastily left the city with his whole troop, many of the girls being compelled to join him against their will. The scandal of such a band wandering about the country under pretence of religion, singing hymns, and leaping and dancing in a disorderly fashion, great it was, increased by the fact that a fair was going on at the time, so that the young women were exposed to the rude jests of the lowest rabble, who came from such disgrace were driven away by Glycerius with the utmost contumely, and he carried off his whole band to a neighbouring town, of which a certain Gregory was bishop; who this Gregory was is uncertain. Garnier is inclined to believe that it was Gregory Nazianzen (among the names lettres the correspondent foundering Glycerius is found, as well as in the letters of Basil), though he allows that there is much in favour of Gregory Nysen (Vita S. Basil. c. xxii. § 4). Gregory not only allowed Glycerius and his motley band to remain unchallenged, but appears to have been disposed to regard him with some degree of veneration. On this Basil wrote to his narrating the whole circumstances, and shewing how little Glycerius deserved any consideration. He requested him to order Glycerius to return at once with his whole band of virgins. If he did this, and brought commendatory letters from Gregory, he might depend upon lenient treatment; if he refused to obey, Basil begged Gregory to send back the virgins, or to enable those who desired it, to free themselves from Glycerius' spiritual tyranny. If Glycerius continued obstinate he threatened that he should be removed from the ministry (Ibid., Epist. 169 [312]). At the same time Basil wrote to Glycerius himself, promising to deal with matters that were towards him if he would return at once, and send to their homes the disciples whom he was leading not to God but to the abyss (Ibid. 170 [314]). Their return being still delayed, Basil wrote again to Gregory, hinting that his unwillingness to compel them to come back might be due to some desire to carry favour with others. To some who came to resist this himself, and begged him to put all such feelings aside and induce them to return without any apprehension. If they continued obstinate he washed his hands of them. (Ibid. 171 [313]). The future issue is now known. [K. V.]

GLYCERIUS (7), 2nd bishop of Cones, following St. Valerian and succeeded by Theodoreus, subscribed the council of Agde (A.D. 566), and is said to have died in 548. (Gall. Crist. i. 1125; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. viii. 337, Flor. 1759-98.) [S. A. B.]
GLYCERIUS (8), emperor of the West, afterwards bishop of Salona. In March 473, being at that time comes domestoricum, he asserted the imperial title at Ravenna in succession to Olybrius; but the emperor of the East, Leo I. the Thracian, set up Julius Nepos in opposition, who was proclaimed at Ravenna late in 473 or early in 474, marched against Glycerius and took him prisoner at Portus. (See art. Glycerius in the Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog.) It is the episcopate of Glycerius that claims the chief notice in this work. He has been reckoned bishop of Portus, of Milan, and of Salona. The Chronicon of Marcellinus Comes under the year 474, states that Glycerius "imperio expulsus, in porta urbis Romae ex Caesare episcopus ordinatus est, et obiit." (Patr. Lat. ii. 931); on the strength of which passage he has been named bishop of Portus, as by Paulus Diaconus, who writes: "Portuensis episcopus ordinatur." (Hist. Marc. lib. xv. in Patr. Lat. xxxv. 973 s). Ughelli (who) claims him Gucerius assigns him to that see between Petrus and Herennius, and Capelliti does the same (Ug. Ital. Sac. i. 111; Capt. Le Chiense d’Ital. i. 497). This conclusion from the doubtful language of Marcellinus might pass were there no other statements to be considered. Bagrius, for instance, relates (H. E. iii. 19) that Nepos appointed Glycerius, bishop of the Romans, to Thebais, scarcely however intending to say, as Canisius understands him, that Glycerius was made bishop of Rome. He must mean (writing as a Greek) that Glycerius was ordained bishop for Salona by the Roman ecclesiastical authorities, that his see belonged to the Roman eastern part of the empire and to the Roman patriarchate rather than the Byzantine. Jornandies likewise states that Nepos "Glycerium ab imperio expel- lus, in Salona Dalmatiae episcopum fecit." (Jorn. de Reg. Saco, in Muratori, Rer. Ital. Script. t. i. p. 239 b.) It is therefore best to understand with Canisius (note on the passage in his edition of Petr. Lat. xvii.) that Nepos appointed Glycerius to take place at Portus, where at the same time he was ordained to the see of Salona. So also Farlati understands (Myr. Sac. ii. 117-120). It should be remarked that the principality of Dalmatia belonged to Nepos independently of the imperial title. Thither he retired before his successful competitor Orestes, and then was brought into contact once more with Glycerius. Photius (Bibloth. cod. 78) mentions the now lost Byzantine History of Malchus the Sophist as stating that Nepos having divested Glycerius of his Caesarian authority and invaded the empire of the Romans, clericiated Glycerius, made him a bishop, and finally perished by his machinations (invidia petitus), not "assassinated" as stated by Gibbon. Farlati assigns six years to the episcopate of Glycerius, placing his death in 480. The supposition that the ex-emperor was bishop of Milan rests on very slender ground. Lanzian bishop of Pavia, who dedicates short poems to several successive bishops of Milan (carmin. 82, in Petr. Lat. xiii. 349); but there is nothing in the verses to identify him with the ex-emperor. Emodius likewise, in his Life of Euphrasius bishop of Pavia, mentions the emperor as shewing so much veneration for that saint as to accept his intercession for some people in the diocese of Pavia, who had incurred the imperial displeasure (Ennod. Vit. Epiph. in Patr. Lat. xiii. 219 A). These are the sole grounds on which Gibbon hazards, though doubtfully, the statement (Decl. and Fall, vol. iv. p. 265, ed. Smith) that Glycerius was banished to the Muses, and that Nepos detained Orestes from the see of Salona to the archbishopric of Milan in reward for his assassination of Nepos. [C. H.]

GLYCON, bishop of Caesarea, in Palestine. His name appears in the catalogue of bishops who accepted the decision of the council of Chalcedon. He signed through a representative, Sozimus or Zoilimus "episcopus Miniodennis" or "Edenensis." (Labbe, Concil. iv. 83, 788.) [E. V.]

GLYWYS (1) Cornw, son of Gwynhlyw-Filwr, and founder of a church at Coed Cornw, now Coedkernew, co. Monmouth, in the 6th century. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 114, 233.) [I. G.]

GLYWYS (2) (Gwilyw, Gwilyus, Glybesius, Gwilybus, Gwilyetus), ap Tegys ap Cadell (Rees, Welsh Saints, 114), was father of Gwynhlyw-Filwr [Gwynlyw (2)], and "nobilissimus rex Australiam Britonum" (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 145). He is supposed to have been chief-tain of a district called from him Glewysig, probably including parts of the present counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth; according to the legend, he married Gwladus, or Gladus, daughter of Brychan, and was father of seven sons, of whom Gwynhlyw was the eldest (Rees, s. 145, 309), and amongst whom his sovereignty was divided at his death. Williams (Emlyn, Welsh. 174) numbers him among the Welsh saints, and says he founded the church of Machen in the hundred of Wentlosg, Monmouthshire (Rees, i. 449 n.). [J. G.]

GNATHNAT (Gnatnad), called abeos of Kildare in Four Masters, and abbot by Tigernach, died a. D. 990. (Ann. Tig. cod. an.; For. Mustr. a. D. 687.) [J. G.]

GNAVAN, disciple of St. Cadoc, probably a Briton. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 326.) [J. G.]

GNOSIMACHI (Γνωσιμαχος). A sect who are said to have opposed all scientific theology (εστιν γνωριμις χρυσοτμωμον) on the plea that nothing more is required of Christians than a holy life. Damascene mentions it among those which arose after the emperor Marcian, a. d. 451-457. (J. Damasc. de Haeres. Ixxxviii.; Migne, Patr. Gr. xcv. 758; Nicef. Choniat. Theod. Orith. Migne. u. s. xxxix. 1085; Suicer, Theod. s. v.) [T. W. D.]

GNOSIS, one of the mythical beings who, in the Barbelle system described by Irenaeus (c. 29, p. 108), answer to the Valentinian Aeons. From her is represented to have sprung the "Tree," also called knowledge. With this is to be compared that part of the system of Justinus (Hippel. Ref. v. 26) which counts the trees of paradise as angels, and in particular the tree of knowledge, as the angel Naas. In Pistis Sophia also one order of celestial beings is designated as trees (pp. 18, 192). [G. S.] Gnosticism. The zeal with which a learner commences the study of ecclesiastical history is not unfrequently damped at an early stage, when he finds that, in order to know the history of religious thought in the 2nd century, he must make himself acquainted with speculations so wild and so baseless that it is irksome to read them and difficult to believe that time was when acquaintance with them was counted as what alone deserved the name of "knowledge." But it would be a mistake to think too disdainfully of those early heretics who go by the common name of Gnostics. In the first place, it may be said in their excuse that the problems which they undertook to solve were among the most difficult with which the human intellect has ever grappled; namely, to explain the origin of evil, and to make it conceivable how the multiplicity of finite existence can all have been derived from a single absolute unconditioned principle. And besides, these speculators only did what any theologian has constantly endeavoured to do; namely, combined the doctrines which they learned from revelation with the results of what they regarded as the best philosophy of their own day, so as to obtain what seemed to them the most satisfactory account and explanation of the facts of the universe. Without philosophy and religion is the marriage of a mortal with an immortal; the religion lives; the philosophy grows old and dies. When the philosophic element of a theological system becomes antiquated, its explanations which contented one age become unsatisfactory to the next, and there ensues what is spoken of as a conflict between religion and science; whereas, in reality, it is a conflict between the science of one generation and that of a succeeding one. If the religious speculations of the 2nd century appear to us peculiarly unreasonable, it is because the philosophy incorporated with them is completely alien to modern thought. That philosophy grew by . . . the narrow sense, but this is a matter on which controversy would be only verbal, Gnosticism not being a word which has in its own nature a definite meaning. If we speak, for instance, of the Clementine writings emanated, although some of the most fundamental points their doctrines are diametrically opposed to those commonly reckoned as Gnostic; and his work on Gnosticism includes a discussion of the doctrines of Jacob Boehme, Schelling, Schleiermacher, and Hegel. We conform to the usage of many modern writers by using the term "Gnostic" in a narrower sense, but this is a matter on which controversy would be only verbal, Gnosticism not being a word which has in its own nature a definite meaning. If we speak, for instance, of the Clementine writings emanated, although some of the most fundamental points their doctrines are diametrically opposed to those commonly reckoned as Gnostic; and his work on Gnosticism includes a discussion of the doctrines of Jacob Boehme, Schelling, Schleiermacher, and Hegel. We conform to the usage of many modern writers by } tory proof that their doctrines formed part of Christ's revelation, we might be forced to own that on this subject the difference between them and the church was not one of principle. They did profess to be able to trace their doctrine to the apostles. Basilides was said to have learned from a companion of St. Peter; gospels were in circulation among them which purported to have been written by Philip, Thomas, and other apostles; and they professed to be able to find their doctrines in the canonical scriptures by methods of allegorical interpretation which, however forced, could easily be paralleled in the procedure of orthodox writers. If we made our definition turn on the claim to the possession of Gnosis, and to the title of Gnostic, we should be forced to count Clement of Alexandria among the Gnostics and the First Epistle to Timothy among Gnostic writings; for the church writers refused to surrender these titles to the heretics and, claiming to be the true Gnostics, branded all Gnostics as "false so called." If we fix our attention on the predominance of the speculative over the practical in Gnosticism, which, as Baur truly remarks, led men to regard Christianity less as a means of salvation than as furnishing the principles of a philosophy of the universe, we must allow that the latter writings have not been published in the church which are open to the same criticism. We come very close to what we are in search of if we make the criterion of Gnosticism to be the establishment of a dualism between spirit and matter; and, springing out of this, the doctrine that the way of salvation was not to be found in the power of the Supreme God, yet we might not be able to establish that this characteristic belongs to every one of the sects which we count as Gnostic; and if we are asked why we do not count such sects as the Manicheans among the Gnostics, the best answer is that usage confines the word to those sects which took their origin in the heresy of Manichæism. By Gnostics, meaning by this the later writings have no reason to think that the earliest Gnostics intended to found sects separated from the church and called after their own names. Their disciples were to be Christians, only elevated above the rest as acquainted with deeper mysteries, and called ἡττητοὶ, because possessed of gnosis superior to the simple faith of the multitude. By the earliest instance of the use of the word is by Celsus, quoted by Origen, v. 61, where, speaking of the multiplicity of Christian sects, he says that there were some who professed to be Gnostics. There is no reason to suppose that Celsus would be careful that there should be no overlapping in his enumeration, and hence we infer that other sects are in the same context mentioned apparently as distinct, which we should now count as Gnostic, does not warrant us in inferring that the word was then used in a narrower sense. Irenæus (I. xxv. 5, p. 104), speaking of the Carpocratians and in particular of that school of them which Marcellinus established at Rome, says that they called themselves Gnostics. It is doubtless on the strength of this passage that Eusebius (H. E. iv. 7), quoting Irenæus in the same context, calls Carpocrates the father of the sect called that of the Gnostics. In the habitual use of the word by Irenæus himself it does not occur as limited to Carpocratians. Irenæus, in his first book, when he has gone through the sects called after the names of heretical teachers, gives in a kind of appendix an account of a number of sects, in their general characteristics Ophite, but he does not himself use that name. He calls them "multitudo Gnosticorum," tracing their origin to Simon Magus, and counting them as progenitors of the Valentinians. And constantly we have the expression Basilidian, Valentinians, &c., "et reliqui Gnostici," where, by the latter appellation, the Ophite sects are specially intended. The form of expression does not exclude from the title of Gnostic the sects named after their founders, and the doctrine of the Valentinians is all through the work of Irenæus a branch of "Gnosis falsely so called": yet it is usually spoken of less as Gnosticism than as a development of Gnosticism, and the Valentinians are described as more Gnostic than the Gnostics, meaning by this the latter writings have already mentioned. In the work of Hippolytus against heresies, the name is almost exclusively found in connection with the sect of the Naassenes or Ophites, and three or four times it is repeated (v. 2, p. 93; 4, p. 94; 11, p. 123) that these people called themselves Gnostics, making no claim to the title in the early sense. Though Hippolytus believes Naassenes to have been their older, Gnostics their later, name, the probability is all the other way. The value which they attached to knowledge appears from their saying (pp. 95, 132) that the beginning of perfection was the knowledge of man, and the knowledge of God was complete perfection; see also Hippolytus, v. 36, p. 258, and the statement of Irenæus [H. I. p. 188] that Nicolaitanism was a branch of Gnosis. Epiphanius divides this article into two, making the Gnostics a separate heresy (Haer. 28). He gives several alternative names for them, and from the doctrines and language which he attributes to them it is plain that he had in view one of the Ophite sects. Some later notices have naturally followed Epiphanius in counting one of the branches of the sects now commonly known as Gnostics as constituting a separate sect of "Gnostics." It is plain from this sketch that ancient usage leaves a good deal of latitude to modern writers in deciding which of the 2nd century sects they will count a Gnostic sect.

Classification of Gnostic Sects.—For the same reason that we have thought ourselves able to decline controversy concerning the definition of Gnosticism, we have not found it necessary to make any classification of Gnostic sects beyond the alphabetic arrangement of them forced on us.
by the plan of this work. Some general principles of philosophic classification may be easily agreed on, but when they come to be applied, it is found that there are some sects to which it is not obvious where to assign a place, and that some sects are separated whose affinities are closer than those of others which are classed together. A further difficulty is the division is that made by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 5) into the ascetic and licentious sects: both parties agreeing in holding the essential evil of matter; the one endeavouring by rigorous abstinance to free as much as possible man's soul from the bondage to which it is subjected by union with his material part; and refusing to marry and so enthrall new souls in the prisons of bodies; the other abandoning as desperate any attempt to purify the hopelessly corrupt body, and teaching that the instructed soul ought to hold itself unaffected by the deeds of the body. All actions were to it indifferent, for the body; slavish were its works; God was a duty to set at nought; restrictions only imposed by the commands of that Being who did the evil work of shutting up men's souls in matter. The division of Neander is intended to embrace a wider range of sects than that just described. Taking the common doctrine of the Gnostic sects that the world is the creation by the most different kind from the supreme God, he distinguishes whether that Being was held to have acted in subordination to the Supreme, and on the whole to have carried out his intentions, or to have been absolutely hostile to the supreme God. Taking now into account the generally acknowledged position that the first 400 years of the world were the same as the God worshipped by the Jews, we see that Gnostics of the second class would be absolutely hostile to Judaism, which those of the former class might accept as one of the stages ordained by the Supreme in the enlightenment of the world. Thus Neander's division classifies sects as they are not unfriendly to Judaism or hostile to it; for the purpose of discovering the origin in those Alexandrian schools where the authority of such teachers as Philo had weight, the other among Christian converts from Oriental philosophy whose early education had given them no prejudices in favour of Judaism. Neander, with a good deal of ingenuity, deduces from the opposite decisions on his fundamental point of distinction the leading doctrines of the schools on both sides, though in each case it is easy to see that he has chiefly in view the opinions of one representative sect, and that his descriptions do not equally apply to all the sects which he has joined together. In fact, the sects which are joined together in this classification are not those which regard heathenism, but those which regard heathenism. All regarded Christianity as the absolutely true religion, but the point of difference was whether they represented it as absolutely hostile to the two other systems, or whether they would recognise seeds of religious truth in each of these dispensations. Thus then he divides into (1) sects which were willing to allow Christianity to look with a certain condescension on both Judaism and heathenism, (2) which made Christianity look with absolute hostility on both, (3) which identified Christianity with Judaism while placing both in opposition to heathenism. The last class embraceth the majority of the early Gnostic sects, according to the Clementines; and it may be suspected that it was only in order to maintain the symmetry of his classification that Baur was led to count these as Gnostic at all. Setting these aside, it is found that the result of Baur's method is to place the school of Marcion on one side and all other Gnostic sects on the other, a classification which really carries us but a little way. Gieseler divides into Alexandrian Gnostics, whose teaching was mainly influenced by the Platonico-philosophy, and Syrian strongly affected by Panism. In the former the emmanation doctrine was predominant, in the latter dualism. Undoubtedly the most astonishing of all the systems would be if it were possible, as Matter suggested, to have one founded on the history of the generation of the sects, distinguishing the school where Gnosticism had its beginning, and naming the schools which successively in different places altered in different directions the original scheme. But a god classification of the kind divides into two rival families; the former classed by the scantiness of our materials for the history of Gnosticism. Irenaeus is the first to give us all the full details, and he may be counted two generations later than Valentinus; for Marcus, the disciple of Valentinus, was resisted by one whose Irenaeus looked up to with respect as belonging to the same world as himself. On the other hand, the interval between Valentinus and Irenaeus has been already mentioned that we learn from Hippolytus that it was the boast of the members of the sect of the Neoplatonists that they alone "knew the depths." How we find that the same classing of the Neoplatonists as a sect of Gnostics was an idea suggested by the psychological nature of the older philosophy which was a watchword of the false teachers reprobated in the Apocalypse (Rev. ii. 24). We can hardly avoid the inference that the Neoplatonists of Hippolytus inherited a phrase continuously in use among heretical teachers since before the publication of the Revelation of St. John. Of the writers who would deny the pastoral epistles to be Paul's, a large proportion date the book of Revelation only two or three years after St. Paul's death; therefore, whether we suppose or not that it was Paul who wrote of the "falsely called knowledge," it remains probable that heretical pretenders to Gnosis had arisen in Paul's lifetime. If we find reason to place the beginnings of Gnosticism in the apostolic age, we shall be justified in supposing that the notices of its origin given by Irenaeus, who wrote more than a century afterwards, are so scanty; and that the teachers to whom its origin has been ascribed, Simon, Flavia,才会, Nicolaus, Cerinthus, remain to us shadowy or legendary characters. It follows that any conclusions we come to as to the order of succession of the early Gnostic sects and their obligations one to another, rest less on trustworthy historical evidence than on the critical sagacity of the modern enquirer, and consequently that such conclusions do not form a very secure basis of classification. Still, some general facts In the history of the evolution of Gnosticism may be considered as fairly certain; and accordingly we are well disposed to accept as a whole the classification of Lipsius, and with him to count three stages in the progress of Gnosticism, even though with regard to particular sects there may be room for dispute as to what place in the division this or that sect is to be assigned. The birthplace of the Gnostic mystery was in the Syrian desert, if we count that word as including Palestine and Samaria, where church tradition places the activity of those whom it regards as the founders of Gnosticism, Simon and Menander. It may also be inferred from the use made of the Old Testament and of Hebrew words that Gnosticism sprang out of Judaism. The false teaching combated in the Epistle to the Colossians, which has several Gnostic features, is also distinctly Jewish, insisting, as it did, on the observance of sabbaths and new moons. The Epistles to Timothy and Titus, which deal with a somewhat later development of Gnosticism, describe the false teaching as the “fables” of “Jewish fables.” The use of the word “circumcision” as “professing to be teachers of the law,” and as propounders of “Jewish fables” is not likely that what these epistles characterize as “profane and old wives’ fables” may be some of that Jewish Haggadah of which the early stages of Gnosticism are full. The story of Simon the Magician, as told by Irenæus (iii, 30), we hold to date from the very beginning of Gnosticism, if not in its present shape, at least in some rudimentary form, as may be inferred from the appearance of fragments of it in different Gnostic systems; in particular of the representation of the work of Creation as performed by an inferior being who still fully believed himself to be the Supreme, saying, “I am God, and there is none beside me,” until after this boast his ignorance was enlightened. The Jewish Cabala has been asserted to be the parent of Gnosticism; but besides that the records of Caballistic doctrine are quite modern, and that any attempt to pick out the really ancient parts must be attended with uncertainty, we find that there have led to the result (see Lipsius, p. 270, and Gritz, referred to by him) that the Cabala is certainly not older than Gnosticism, its relation to it being not that of a parent, but of a younger brother. If these be direct obligation, the Cabala is the borrower, but many of the common features are to be explained by regarding both as branches from the same root, and as alike springing from the contact of Judaism with the religious beliefs of the farther East. Jewish Essenes especially furnished a soil favourable to the growth of Gnosticism, with which it seems to have had in common the doctrine of the essential evil of matter, as appears from the denial by the Essenes of the possibility of the Deity being the author of evil. It may be added that the Ebionite sects which sprang out of Essenes, while they professed the strongest attachment to the Mosaic law, not only rejected the authority of the prophetic writings, but dealt in a very arbitrary manner with those parts of the Pentateuch which conflicted with their peculiar dogmas. We have parallels to this in theories of some of the early Gnostic sects which referred the Jewish prophetic book to the inspiration of Belial inferior to him by whom the law was given, as well as in the arbitrary modes of criticism applied by some of the later sects to the books of Scripture. What has been said as to the affinities of Essenes and Gnosticism sufficiently illustrates the growth of Gnosticism from Judaism when the latter was brought into contact with the mysteries of the Syrian desert, whether we suppose Essenes to have been a stage in the process of growth or whether we suppose both have been independent growths under similar circumstances of development. Lipsius notes as the characteristics of those sects which he counts as belonging to the first stage of Gnosticism that they still move almost or altogether within the circle of the Jewish religious history, and that the chief problem they set themselves is the defining the relation between Christianity and Judaism. The solutions of this problem at which they arrive are very various. Those Jewish sects whose Essenes passed into the Ebionism of the Gnostics resemble Christ and his Church essentially identical with Judaism, either religion being sufficient for salvation. These sects are quite orthodox in their theories as to the Creation, their utmost deviation (if it can be called so) from the received belief being the ascription of Creation to the immanent wisdom of God. Other Jewish sects accepted a lack of the formation of matter as accomplished by a subordinate Being, carrying out, it may be, the will of the Supreme, but owing to his finiteness and ignorance doing the work with many imperfections. Then came the theory that this subordinate Being was the God of the Jews, to which nation he had issued many commandments that were not good, though is mind by the Supreme so as to carry out his ends. Lastly came the theory of the Colunites and other extreme Ophite sects, which represented the God of the Jews as the determined enemy of the Supreme, and as whose commands it was the duty of every enlightened Gnostic to disobey. With all this variety of results, there is an agreement in the importance they ascribed to the problem of settling the true relations of Judaism to Christianity. They do make use of certain heathen principles of cosmogony, but such as already had become familiar to Syriac Judaism, and introduced not so much with the object of effecting a reconciliation between Christianity and heathenism as with the view of giving an explanation of the exact service rendered to the world by the publication of Christianity, the absolute religion. This is made mainly to consist in the seed given to the soul in its struggles to escape the bonds of finiteness and darkness, by making known to it the supernormal world and awakening to it to a sense of its spiritual origin. Regarding this knowledge as the common privilege of Christians, the first speculators would count their own possession of it as differing rather in degree than in kind from that of other Christians; and so it is not easy to draw a sharp line of distinction between their doctrine on the subject of Gnosis and that admitted as orthodox. Our Lord had described it as the privilege of His disciples to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; later when His followers learned to know the doctrine of a suffering Messiah, and of the fulfilment of the types and shadows of the Mosaic law in the person of Jesus, they felt that the veil which was spread over the Jewish mind in the reading of the law had been removed for them, and that they enjoyed a knowledge of the meaning of the Old Testament Scriptures to which their unlettersed brethren were strange.

This feeling pervades the Epistle to the Hebrews, and still more that of Barnabas. Another doctrine which Paul describes as a mystery formerly kept secret, but now revealed through his gospel, is the admission of the Gentiles on equal terms with the Jews to the inheritance of the kingdom of Christ. It was no part of orthodox Christian doctrine that all Christians possessed the knowledge here referred to in equal degree. It was owned that there were among the Christians some who required to be fed with milk, not with strong meat, and who had not their senses exercised by reason of use to discern between good and evil; and, in the 1st Epist. of Clement, the distinction made by Clement of Alexandria between faith and knowledge. We hesitate therefore to say that the earliest Gnostic doctrine concerning the relations between faith and knowledge was specifically different from that of the church, the difference, as we believe, mainly turning on the character of their received and accredited knowledge, much of the Gnostic so-called knowledge consisting in acquaintance with the names of a host of invisible Beings and with the formulae which were useful in gaining their favour.

Gnosticism, in its first state, did not proceed far outside the limits of Syria. What Lipsius counts as the second stage dates from the migration of Gnostic systems to Alexandria, where the myths of Syriac Gnosis came to be united to principles of Grecian philosophy. Different Gnostic systems resulted according as the principles of this or that Grecian school were adopted. Thus, in the system of Valentinus, the Platonic philosophy predominates, the Stoic in that of the Basilidians as presented by Hippolytus. In these systems, tinged with Hellenism, the problem of assigning the true place to Judaism in the history of the world's development drops into the background, the Jewish religion being not so much controverted or disparaged as ignored. The mythical personages among whom in the older Gnosis the work of creation was distributed are in these Hellenic systems replaced by a kind of abstract beings (of whom the Valentinian aeons may serve as an illustrative specimen) which personify the different stages of the process by which the One Infinite Spirit communicates and reveals the mysteries of existence. In these systems, again, the distinction between faith and knowledge, which in the older system had been one of degree, becomes sharpened, the persons to whom faith and knowledge respectively are to serve as guides being represented as essentially different in nature. The most obvious division of men into classes derived existences, but two classes: a kingdom of light, and a kingdom of darkness. Probably, the need of a third class may have first made itself felt from the necessity of finding a place for members of the Jewish religion, who stood on a level so far above heathenism, so far below Christianity. The Platonic *trichotomy of body, soul, and spirit, afforded a principle of threefold classification, and men are divided into earthly (διάφανος ουσίας), animal (ψυχικος), and spiritual (πνευματικος). In these Hellenic Gnostic systems, the second class represents not Jews but ordinary Christians, and the third class the Gnostics themselves (who are the spiritual) is made so to rest on an original difference of nature as to leave little room for human freewill. The mode of salvation by faith and corresponding works is disparaged as suitable only for the psychical, the better sort of whom may, by this means, be brought as high as possible in the order of the universe as their nature is capable of; but the really spiritual need not these lower methods of salvation. It suffices for them to have the knowledge of their true nature revealed to them, when they become certain of shaking off all imprisoning bonds and soaring to the highest region of all. It results from this that the Gnosis of the 1st Epist. of Clement, that Christianity runs the risk of meeting the same fate in the later Gnostic systems that befell Judaism in the earlier. The doctrines and facts of the religion are only valued so far as under their veil can be made to appear the peculiar notions of Gnosticism; and the method of allegorically interpreting the Scriptures leading to the New Testament as well as the Old that all the solid parts of the religion are in danger of being vapidly altered.

The natural consequence of this weakening of the historic side of Christianity was the removal of all sufficient barrier against the intrusion of heathen elements into the systems; while the moral teaching was injuriously affected by the doctrine that there were certain who were secure of salvation by necessity of their nature and irrespectively of their conduct. In the third stage of Gnosticism, it struggles in various ways to avoid these faults, and so again draws nearer to the teaching of the Catholic church. Thus the Docetist of Hippolytus no longer divide mankind into two or three great classes; but allows of immense variety corresponding to the diversity of the ideas derived from the world of seons, which each has received, while again they deny to none a share in our Lord's redemption, but own that members of different sects are enabled, each in his degree, to claim kinship with Jesus, and to obtain forgiveness of sins through him. So again in one of the latest of the Gnostic systems, that of Pistis Sophia, there is no assertion of an essential diversity of nature among men, but the immense development of ranks and degrees in the spiritual world, which the works referred to professors to realize, is used so as to provide for every man a place commensurate to his works. Once more, in the system of Marcion, the theory of essentially different classes of men is abandoned; the great boast of Christianity is made to be its universality; and the redemption which the Gospel brings is represented, not as the mere renewing of the pneumatic soul to consciousness of privileges, which as a fact it had all along possessed, but as the introduction into the world of a real principle of moral life through the rela-of a God of love forgiving sins through Christ.

In the account which we have just given we have closely followed Lipsius; but we shall now attempt to supply materials for constructing or testing any more general classification of Gnostic systems by giving under each head of doctrine, irrespective of any theory, a classified list of the tenets of each. We can only touch lightly, however, on the systems of Valentinus and Marcion, these being too important to admit of satisfactory treatment except in separate articles.

In connection with the First Principle, Irenaeus states that nearly all the heresies acknowledged the unity of God, and in almost identical words he describes several of the earliest of them as counting as the first principle one Father unknown to all; but their systems may be divided into (A) those which, as far as our knowledge of them reaches, do not proceed beyond the limits of the old Jewish monotheism; (B) those which contain some veneration of the Christian Logos doctrine, and personify immanent attributes of deity so as to make them distinct entities; (C) those which imply a knowledge of the Chaldean and Zoroastrian systems, and which represent Saturninus, as far as our scanty knowledge of him extends, Carpocrates, Cerinthus, and the Ebionites, Cerdo and Marcion. To class B we refer Simon and Menander, who, according to Irenaeus, agreed in teaching that angels and archangels were not produced directly by the Supreme, but by his right hand. The conception [Enoea] personified and regarded as a female originating principle. The account given by Hippolytus of the system of Simon more plainly brings it under this class; for Hippolytus himself remarks that the idea of the simulation doctrine concerning the six "roots" and the Valentinian theory of aeons, Basilides, according to the account of Irenaeus, belongs to the same class, interposing, as he does, between the unknown Father and the angels the abstractions Nous, Logos, Phrornesis, Dynamis, and Sophin. These do not appear in the account of Hippolytus (see Vol. I. p. 271). The Barbelite system described by Irenaeus (l. 29) contains a richer greater. It is a development of the method culminates in the soteriology of the Valentinian system. To class C we cannot help referring the Ophite system described by Irenaeus (I. 30). It is scarcely possible to account except through the influence of Christian doctrine for the representation in this system of the first principle as threefold, consisting of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, though the title of a feminine name is used for the last to denote the description of the third principle as female, on which was founded some revolting mythology. In the Basilidian system as described by Hippolytus, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit have an equally prominent part. The system of the Peratae, who believed in the distinct existence of the Ophites, retains the doctrine of two male and one female principle, but the last of those is changed, the three being now Father, Son, and Matter; and this is substantially also the teaching of Justinus. The Nanaeae, Sethites, and Docetae of Hippolytus, who all appear to be later than the Irenaean Ophites, agree in ascribing triplicity to the first principle.

In the Ophite system, both as described by Irenaeus and Hippolytus, the name Man is given to the first principle. This has been connected with the Adam Kadmon of the Cabballa; but it seems to us likely that this phraseology is borrowed from the title Son of Man which in the Gospels our Lord applies to Himself (see Irenaeus, i. 12, p. 59).

Creation and Cosmogony.—Philo (Op. Mundi.) had inferred from the expression, "Let us make man," of the Book of Genesis that God had used other beings as assistants in the creation of man, and he explains in this way why man is capable of vice as well as virtue, ascribing the origin of the latter to God, of the former to his helpers in the work of creation. The earliest Gnostic sects ascribe the work of creation to angels, some of whom making use of the same passage in the Book of Genesis (Justin. Dial. x. 29. c. Tryph. and Cres. 44), according to Irenaeus, represent the world as made by angels, but these angels not themselves the immediate work of God, but springing from his consort Enoea. Saturninus appears not to have used this refinement; his angels are represented as made by the unknown Father, and those who represent the conception [Enoea] personified and regarded as a female originating principle. The account given by Hippolytus of the system of Simon more plainly brings it under this class; for Hippolytus himself remarks the analogy between the Simonian doctrine concerning the six "roots" and the Valentinian theory of aeons. Basilides, according to the account of Irenaeus, belongs to the same class, interposing, as he does, between the unknown Father and the angels the abstractions Nous, Logos, Phrornesis, Dynamis, and Sophin. These do not appear in the account of Hippolytus (see Vol. I. p. 271). The Barbelite system described by Irenaeus (l. 29) contains a richer greater. It is a development of the method culminates in the soteriology of the Valentinian system. To class C we cannot help referring the Ophite system described by Irenaeus (I. 30). It is scarcely possible to account except through the influence of Christian doctrine for the representation in this system of the first principle as threefold, consisting of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, though the title of a feminine name is used for the last to denote the description of the third principle as female, on which was founded some revolting mythology. In the Basilidian system as described by Hippolytus, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit have an equally prominent part. The system of the Peratae, who believed in the distinct existence of the Ophites, retains the doctrine of two male and one female principle, but the last of those is changed, the three being now Father, Son, and Matter; and this is substantially also the teaching of Justinus. The Nanaeae, Sethites, and Docetae of Hippolytus, who all appear to be later than the Irenaean Ophites, agree in ascribing triplicity to the first principle.

In the Ophite system, both as described by Irenaeus and Hippolytus, the name Man is given to the first principle. This has been connected with the Adam Kadmon of the Cabballa; but it seems to us likely that this phraseology is borrowed from the title Son of Man which in the Gospels our Lord applies to Himself (see Irenaeus, i. 12, p. 59).

Creation and Cosmogony.—Philo (Op. Mundi.) had inferred from the expression, "Let us make man," of the Book of Genesis that God had used other beings as assistants in the creation of man, and he explains in this way why man is capable of vice as well as virtue, ascribing the origin of the latter to God, of the former to his helpers in the work of creation. The earliest Gnostic sects ascribe the work of creation to angels, some of whom making use of the same passage in the Book of Genesis (Justin. Dial. x. 29. c. Tryph. and Cres. 44), according to Irenaeus, represent the world as made by angels, but these angels not themselves the immediate work of God, but springing from his consort Enoea. Saturninus appears not to have used this refinement; his angels are represented as made by the unknown Father, and those who represent the conception [Enoea] personified and regarded as a female originating principle. Into these lower regions the second Sophia descends, prompted, according to one account, by a desire to find a consort, and thence is long unable to return, being detained by the waters which eagerly lay hold of the light which she brings with her (see also Hippol. v. 19, p. 139; viii. 39, p. 254). There she gives birth to a son, Pomet or Ialdabaoth, who in turn generates other angels, and who frames the lower world, all in ignorance of his mother, and unaware that he has any superior; for he cries "I am a jealous God and there is none other beside me." In this legend the story of the creation of man is told nearly in the same words as the doctrine of Saturnus, but with this difference, that the spark of light to animate the first formed man is given not by pity of the superior power, but by his father Ialdabaoth, Sophia having so contrived it, in order that Ialdabaoth may thus be emptied of the light which he had received from her. In accordance to it's myth the world's subsequent history is that of the plans by which Sophia contrives to recover from these lower regions the light which souls of men have inherited, and to effect its restoration to the apparently regions whence it came. Neander (Ch. Hist. ii. 146) sees in this story of Sophia a mythological expression of the way in which it was foreseen that there would be an animus mundi, the source of all spiritual life, which reabsorbs into itself all that has flowed out from it. This tale of a descent and recovery of Sophia early established itself as a part of divergent Gnostic systems. It is the principal subject of the book Pistis Sophia, and it is worked out in much detail in the system of Valentinus, who added certain explanations and developments, besides founding on it an explanation of the origin of matter, the pre-existence of which seems to have been assumed in the earlier systems. The Cosmogony of the Basilides of Hippolytus has been sufficiently detailed (Vol. i. pp. 271 seq.). To the indications noted p. 277, from which it is inferred that the system there described is later than the Valentinian, may be added the use of the text, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Hippol. vii. 26, p. 239; Clem. Strom. ii. 8, p. 448), which was employed by Valentinian with respect to the fear and conversion of Sophia (Hippol. vii. 32, p. 191); the use made of Ez. vi. 3, 3 (Hippol. ii. 56, p. 196; vii. 25, p. 235); the application of the title Demiurgos to the great Archon (vii. 23, p. 236); the use of the word τέρτος in reference to the Hebdomad (compare vii. 33, p. 191, vii. 24, p. 237, Excerpt. ex Script. Theod. 38), and the doctrine of the "Great Ignorance," which has a certain resemblance to the part ascribed to Horus in bringing different orders of beings to a state of contentment by making known to them the necessary limitations which separate them. Concerning each of the coincidences noted, however, the question arises whether Basilides borrowed from Valentinus or both adopted common elements from the earlier Gnosis. There are points of resemblance also which seem more than accidental between this Basilidian system and that of the Sibyls described in the fifth book of Hippolytus, for instance, the whole doctrine that the progress of the world's history is a resolution into its elements of what had been a confused mixture (Hippol. v. 21, vii. 27), the illustration that a young child possesses potentially the faculties which he afterwards brings into exercise (v. 19, vii. 227), and the use of the spreading of fragrance to illustrate the operation of the Spirit (v. 19, vii. 22). If there be obligation on other side it must be on the Basilidian, for the hypothesis of the Sethite system with the earlier Ophite systems is so much closer than with the Basilidian that we cannot conceive the last interposed between the former. We have noted under DOCTRINES the resemblances between the doctrines of that sect and of this Basilidian system.

DOCTRINE REJECTED TO JUDAISM.—The doctrine that the Creator of the world is not the supreme God leads at once to the question, what then is to be thought of the God of the Jews, who certainly claimed to have created the world? This question is most distinctly answered in the doctrine of the Ophite system (frem. i. 38). According to it, the power of the Sons of the Father, an angel the Son of God, acknowledging none other, was led by sheer ignorance to make a false pretension. He was in truth none other than the chief of the creative angels, holding but a subordinate place in the constitution of the universe. It was he who either Adam and Eve that knowledge by which they might be informed that they were superior to him, and who on their disobedience cast them out of paradise. It was he who brought a deluge on mankind, from jealousy that they did not pay him due honour, though baffled by a higher power in his attempt to destroy them. It was he who made a covenant with Abraham, that if his posterity would serve him they should possess the earth; he who inspired the old Law in Egypt, and gave them a law by Moses. It was he who inspired the Pentateuch and some other parts of the Old Testament; the rest of the volume was inspired by his subordinate angels; but yet his mother Sophia had provided that each of the writers should give intimations of these higher truths whereby the God of the Jews himself was to be substantiated. Accordingly, in some sense he used the Old Testament, but in a very arbitrary way, finding in it where they could confirmations of their theories, and rejecting without scruple whatever made against them. Yet all this polemic against Judaism has the marks of being addressed to men brought up to reverence the Old Testament, and who needed theories to make them feel themselves justified to disregard it in systems previously described by Irenaeus we feel traces of the same theory, though not so fully worked out. Their common statement, already quoted, that the Creative power was far below the supreme God, and ignorant of him, implies a rejection of the Old Testament doctrine, which plainly ascribes the work of creation to the Supreme, as well as a charge of ignorance against him who inspired the claim. It may be inferred also that the knowledge which they professed to communicate contained a revelation that higher power of which the Creator was ignorant. The doctrine ascribed by Irenaeus to Simon is in many points identical with that which he ascribes to Cerpercan. Simon is represented as teaching a transmigration of souls, and a consequent detention of souls in these lower regions until the place has learned to cast off the role of the angel and to imitate the wise one. It is these angels who inspired the teaching of the Jewish prophets which must be disregarded by enlightened men, who will live as they please, knowing that the actions which have the reputation of being righteous are not really so in their own nature, but only through the arbitrary appointment of these angels. This language would lead us to think of a rejection not of Jewish practices merely, but of the ordinary rules of morality; and accordingly church writers agree in accusing the followers of Simon of gross licentiousness of conduct. Besides this freedom of living, magical charms were the means by which they and the kindred sects hoped to bring under their power the makers of the world. The Ophite formules preserved by Origen (cont. Celts., vi. 31), and that of the Marcossians given by Irenaeus (i. 13), are specimens of the valuable secrets which this Gnosis had to communicate. Saturninus and Basilides are described by Irenaeus as agreeing in the doctrines that the God of the Jews was but one of the creative angels, and that the Old Testament owed its inspiration to different sources, as already related. The opposition to the God of the Jews reaches its extreme in the system of the Caineites, which glorified Cain, Esau, Korah, and the others who are described in the Old Testament as enemies to God. An specimen of this doctrine is to be found in the fragments of Peretic teaching preserved by Hippolytus (v. 16). The heroes of the Pereticæ are Cain, who refused to propitiate with a bloody sacrifice the God of this world, who delights in blood, Nimrod the mighty hunter, and Esau, who got no blessing from the blind old man, but whose face, notwithstanding Jacob saw, as though it had been the face of God. But in this system the place of honour is given to the serpent. In the system which we have so often referred to, described by Irenaeus (i. 30), though commonly called Ophite, the serpent is the father of the mundane demons, and the enemy of the human race, though sometimes subdued by this, while he is the minister of good. It is to be observed, however, that the name Nous is given to him, which is the title which in other Gnostic systems is given to one of the primal emanations of Deity. But in the Peretic system the serpent is identified with the Son, and is made the mediator between God and matter; it was he who gave the counsel to Eve; he was the serpent-rod by which means Moses performed his miracles; he was the brazen serpent who saved those who believed on him from being bitten by the serpents of the wilderness; it was he in whose likeness it was said the Son of man should be lifted up. They pointed out what a high place the serpent held among the constellations of heaven, and how the same form could be traced in the anatomy of the human frame. (See also v. 9, p. 119; 19, p. 142.)

The account of Valentinus given by Hippolytus (vi. 55, p. 194) would imply that he completely rejected the Old Testament, whose writers, inspired by the Demiurge, were as ignorant as himself, even as the Saviour said: "All who came before me are thieves and robbers." But from the account of Irenæus (l. 7) we learn that Valentinus made use of the earlier heretics, attaching part of it to Sophia herself, part to her spiritual seed, and only the remainder to the Demiurge. His system looks on the Jews as like the Demiurge, whose people they are, limited in knowledge, but not incapable of enlightenment and spiritual elevation.

Doctrine concerning the Nature of Man.—We have already given the story told by Saturninus of the animation of a previously lifeless man by a spark of light from above. With this myth he connected the doctrine, in which he was followed by almost all the Gnostic sects, that there would be a resurrection of the dead, a spark of light being taken back on death to the place whence it had come, and man's material part being resolved into its elements. Saturninus is said to have taught the doctrine, antagonistic to that of man's free will, that there were classes of men by nature essentially different, and of these he counted two—the good and the bad, the just and the unjust. The doctrine became common to many Gnostic systems that the human frame contained a heavenly element struggling to return to its native place. The Basilides of Hippolytus must be counted an exception, whose doctrine it is that things always tend upwards, and who therefore refuses to describe any of the heavenly elements as derived from human beings. The formule are set forth in a heavenly element from above. But he explains that things below can be affected by things above without any real contact, in the same way as Indian naphtha will light up while still at a considerable distance from the fire. This illustration was also employed by the Pereticæ (v. 17, p. 137), who also used the illustration that heavenly forms are imparted to material things in the same way that forms are transferred by a pointer to his canvas without his removing anything from the objects which he draws. And this seems also to have been the Docetic doctrine (viii. 9, p. 264). The Saturninian twofold division of man's nature was soon replaced by a threefold: the Irenæus, or the heavenly element is described as having (1) a body, before the fall, light and spiritual, but after his expulsion from paradise dark, gross, and sluggish; (2) a soul (mundialis insufflatio) inspired by Ialdaboath; and (3) the sweet savour of the sprinkling of light bestowed on them by the compassion of the mother Prunikos. The Naassenes (All. Hist. Hist. v. 6) divides man's nature into the parts ψυχή, φύσις, and χρόνος. The system of JUSTINUS relates that there have been implanted in man's body two mutually hostile principles, the soul, derived from Eden, the source of all man's errors and misery, and the spirit given by Iochi, destined one day to be liberated. Valentinus completely differed from the Docetic doctrine as formulated. He counted man's bodily part as twofold—a hylic or subtle body, such as Adam was first created with, and a choral or gross earthly body, the "coat of skin" (see Vol. 1. p. 313), with which he was arrayed after the fall; he besides ascribed to man the ψυχή derived from the Demiurge, and the λογική, derived from Achamoth, which, without the knowledge of the Demigrie, was through his instrumentality inspired into the spiritual seed. These "spiritual," however, are only an ἄνεμος from among men; they are certain of salvation, whatever be their actions, even as pure gold remains gold though it be rolled in the mine; next to them come the psychological, the use of whose free will will decide whether they will sit at the higher or sink to a lower lot, and who may accordingly be divided into two classes; last of all are the hylic, who are incapable of salvation. In the consummation all that is merely material will be burned up; the purified ψυχή will rise to the highest position below the Pleroma; the spiritual seed leaving their ψυχικόν outside shall enter, pure spirit, into the Pleroma, and there enjoy bridal union with the angels who there have their dwelling. Basilides appears to have agreed with Valentinus in making the difference between the elect and others to be one of nature (Strom. v. 1).

Redemption and Christology.—The Gnostic systems generally represent man's spirit as imprisoned by sin, and needing deliverance, which the majority of them recognize the coming of Christ in the days of Herod as a turning-point in human affairs, but if we ask in what way man's redemption is effected, the answers of almost all reduce the Redeemer's work to the impartation of knowledge and the disclosure of mysteries. With regard to the nature of Christ, we may quote the words of the new Redeemer, the system of Basilides, as described by Hippolytus, reduces redemption to a minimum, for it makes the progress of the world to its perfect state to be a natural process of evolution arising out of the properties which the seminal principles of things possessed from their first constitution. But yet it was the Saviour's necessary work to lift him or they into need for this development. This he did in the first place by the communication of knowledge. As the son of the great Archon caught the knowledge of supermundane things from the sonship above, and communicated it to his father, and likewise the son of the archon of the Hebdomad caught the like knowledge altogether, and so the Hebdomad with it, so the same light came down on Jesus, and enabled him to liberate the sonship entangled in the formlessness of this lower world, and to give it power to rest to that above. And in this system place is found for the work of the Saviour's Passion; for the most striking difference between the Basilides of Hippolytus and of Irenaeus is that the former acknowledges, the latter denies, the reality of the Passion. What was then accomplished is stated to have been the complete separation of the Saviour's component parts. His bodily frame, which belonged to the formlessness suffered, and there remained. Its psychical part was resuscitated, and restored to the Hebdomad in its form as it had come. So in like manner of that part of him which had been derived from the Ogdoad, and of that which had been derived from the liminary spirit, while the most subtle part of all passed into the supermundane regions. In this Jesus was the first fruits of creation, and it is by a separation such as this of the subtler from the grosser elements that the third sonship is enabled to ascend to its destined place.

Authorities.—The great work of Irenaeus against heresies is the chief storehouse whence writers, both ancient and modern, have drawn subordinate to the Supreme. The Irenaeus Ophites, for instance, agree with Cerinthus in distinguishing Christ from Jesus. Jesus is brother to Sophia, of higher nature than his sister. He descends for her rescue and restoration, passing on his way through the seven heavens, and emptying their rulers of their power (see vol. i. p. 125). Jesus is the higher or sith of the Virgin, divinely prepared beforehand as a pure vessel into which Christ might descend, purer, wiser, and more righteous than other men. At his baptism Christ united to Sophia descends into him, and enables him then to work miracles. At the crucifixion Christ departs, leaving Jesus alone to die, but afterwards raises him up again, at least as far as his psychic and pneumatic parts, for the gross earthly body was left to be resolved into its elements. Jesus remains on earth for eighteen mouths instructing his disciples, and after that ascends to sit on the right hand of his father Ialdabaoth, unperceived by whom he unites to himself all holy souls, thus preparing the consummation of all things beyond release. Ialdabaoth is completely exhausted of his light, and all has been collected and united by Christ. The Valentinian theory, of which we shall speak in full afterwards, agrees with that just described in making the rescue of Sophia the primary object of the descent of Christus, and in the complexity of nature, Christ is not the son of Sophia, but the Redeemer. The system of Basilides, as described by Hippolytus, reduces redemption to a minimum, for it makes the progress of the world to its perfect state to be a natural process of evolution arising out of the properties which the seminal principles of things possessed from their first constitution. But yet it was the Saviour's necessary work to lift him or they into need for this development. This he did in the first place by the communication of knowledge. their accounts of the Gnostic sects. It was primarily directed against the then most popular form of the heresy of Valentinus; and it has thence not unnaturally happened that this form of Gnosticism has thrown all others into the shade; and that many modern writers who profess to describe Gnosticism really describe Valentinianism. Irenaeus was largely copied by Tertullian, who, however, on Marcionism ranks as an independent authority; by Hippolytus, who in his newly-recovered work against heresies adds to what he has taken from Irenaeus large extracts from his independent reading of Gnostic works, and by Eiphphanes, who also gives a few valuable additions from other sources. The Stromates of Clement of Alexandria, though prolixly salutary and unsystematic, furnishes much valuable information about Gnosticism, which was still a living foe of the church when the work was written. The writings of Origen also yield much important information. The gleanings of matter not borrowed from Irenaeus to be had from heresiologists are scanty, and of doubtful value.

We give the following list of modern works which have made valuable contributions to the knowledge of Gnosticism, omitting monographs on particular sects. Of the authors cited Neander, Baur, and Lipsius are those from whom we have benefited most. In the works of Mau's Irenaeus (1710), Beausobre, Manichaei (1759), Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. antea Constantini, 1753; Neander, Genetische Entwickelung, 1818; and Church History, vol. ii. 1825, and 2nd edition, 1845 (we refer to the latter work by the pages of the translation in Clarke's series); Matter, Histoire Critique du Gnosticisme, 1829, 2nd edition, 1843; Burton, Hampden Lectures, 1829; Baur, Christliche Gnosis, 1835; and Die christliche Kirche der drei ersten Jahrhunderte, 1833, 2nd edition, 1860; Müller, Kaeonologie, 1860; Lipsius, the article "Gnosticismus" in Ersch und Gruber, 1860; Quickenstedt der Epochen, 1875; out of which arose some interesting discussion between him and Harnack, 1873 and 1875; Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 1875.

We do not think it necessary to give cross references to articles on the names of Gnostic teachers, as these are likely to be known to the reader, and the majority of them have already been mentioned in this article. On the relations between Gnosticism and Neo-Platonism see Plotinus.

GOAUDUS. [GOAUDUS.]

GOAR, Irish saint. [QUARE]

GOAR, ST., a priest of Aquitaine, who settled on the Rhine, where the town now stands which bears his name, in the 6th century. His life, written, according to the common opinion, not long after his death, by an anonymous author, was first published by Mabillon (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. ii. 276-280, Paris, 1688-1701), and then by the Bollandists, with notes (Acta SS. Jul. ii. p. 333). Moved by the rudeness of the style and the command of his abbot, Wandelbert, a monk of Prüm (circ. A.D. 813-870), re-wrote and polished the old life, and added an account of the miracles performed by the relics of the saint under the first three abbeys of Prüm down to the year 808, and an account of the consolidation by Pipin of St. Goar's cell with the monastery of Prüm. Wandelbert's work was first published at Mainz, in 1489, then by Sauris (July vi.), and from another and fuller MS. by Mabillon. (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. ii. 281-299, Paris, 1688-1701). The second book containing the surrounding may also be found in Bull. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 337. Rotberg is probably correct in his surmise that neither of these lives are earlier than the 9th century. His view is that the account is a mere legend written with a purpose, that of vindicating the pleasures of the table against ill-natured ascetics. (Kirchen geschichte Deutschlands, l. 481-2.) However, the narrative teems with fable and chronological difficulties, and is, historically, almost valueless. The story is, that in the days of Childerbert, son of Clovis (511-558), there came from Aquitaine a man endowed with all the noblest qualities, named Goar, son of Georgius and Valeria, and took up his abode in the Rhine, between Oberwesel and Boppard, with the sanction of Felician, then bishop of Treves. (No bishop of this name is found in the records of the see.) Here he built a little church, and furnished it with relics of the Virgin and other saints. He passed his days in fasting, prayer and all good works, made converts among the surrounding heathen, and hospitably entertained passing strangers, his habit being, after celebrating religious service early in the morning, to eat with the traveller and the poor who came to him. But in the quaint language of his biographer, the devil, taking it hardly that a pearl of such price should be lost in the dust of a German town, stirred up the bishop of Treves, now Rusticus, to send messengers to spy out whether they could find any new or vain thing. Upon their sanguine report that he spent his days and nights in gluttony, they were sent back again to summon St. Goar to Treves. On his way, by a somewhat grotesque miracle, he delivers his enemies from death by hunger and thirst. Brought before the bishop, he is accused of eating and drinking in the early morning, and the bishop proposes to try him whether he is from God or the devil. The test proposed is that he should cause a foundling, three days old, to declare its parents. The child's mouth is opened, and it declares Rusticus to be his father. The bishop overawed with shame falls at the saint's feet, and confesses his sin. Goar exhoirs him to repentance, and imposes on himself seven years' vicarious penitence. Siegbert, king of the Franks, hearing of these things, summons him to his presence, and would put him in the place of Rusticus, but the saint refuses during the bishop's lifetime. With difficulty he obtains permission to his cell on the plea of reflection, where he remained for seven years. At the end of that time the king's messengers find him sick of a fever, and still firm in his refusal. He lived three years and three months longer, and was then carried off by fever at a good old age (according to Mabillon, circ. 649). He was buried where he died, and, as he had directed, by two priests named Agrippinus and Eusebius, together with a great company. He is commemorated July 6, on which day he is mentioned in the martyrologies of Wandalbert, Bede, Ursinus, and Adamnán; and notice of his feast occurs towards the close of the 8th century, when it was the subject of a contest between the abbots of Prum and the archbishop of Treves, which was finally composed by Charles the Great. The present church was built 1444–1468, and restored in 1843. In addition to the authorities cited above, see the Observations Praevisae in Boll. A. SS. Jul. 2, 327–332, the Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 501–2; v. 378; and Herzog sub nom. His life is included in Baille's collection. (Vie des Saints, Juillet 6, tom. v. 88.)

GOBALTUS (GEBOLDUS), twenty-eighth bishop of Soissons, succeeding Gellon, and followed by Hubertus or Gerbertus, probably a little before the middle of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 339; Gams, Series Episc. 633.)

[St. A. B.]

GOBBAN (GOBAIN, GOBAN, GUBAN), a common name among the ancient Irish, and a form evidently of the Irish Goban, a smith, and of Gobann, their Vulcan; or black-god (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 221, 4th ed.). Under this name there are eight commemorations in the Martyr-ology ofDonegal, and another Gobban was the most famous architect belonging to that early period in which he lived.

(2) Abbot of Nais, commemorated March 17. Colgan (Acta SS., March 17, p. 63) has compiled the acts of St. Gobban and his two brothers, mostly from the life of St. Carthach Mochuda (May 14). About or before the year 620, St. Carthach was for some time at Inisect (the name is now obso- lete, but the place was near Sherky Island or Inishowen, beside Cape Clear, off the coast of Cloyne; on the opposite side of the bay is Caher, the monastery of three brothers, Gobban, Graphan (or Straphan), and Lasran, under the charge of bishop Domaingen. Gobban afterwards became a bishop, but whether to succeed Domaingen at Inisect, or to serve elsewhere, is unknown. [DOMAINGEN.] (Laugan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 15.)

(2) Abbot of Ardime and Ard-Dairinensi, commemorated, March 26 and May 30. On these days the Mart. Doneg. commemorates severally the abbots of Ard-Dairinensi, and the abbots of Ardine, but they probably represent one and the same person. Colgan attempts a memoir at March 26, of the "Abbot of Ardine-Dairinensi," but it is doubt as to whether he was (a) the disciple of St. Alibhe, who became patron of the church of Kinsale, which after his death was founded to his honour, or (b) the friend of St. Laserian, the abbot of Killamery, and possibly the founder of the monastery at Leighlin or Old Leighlin, before St. Laserian came to settle there, and establish the see [GOBAINN]; he evidently leans to the latter, but probably with good reason, though we have as little authority for identifying him with the former. Kelly (Cant. Irish Saints, 105) places Airdine-Dairinensi "near Wexford, close to Beggary." (Colgan, Acta SS. 92, n. 7, 715, c. 7, 750; Ware, Ir. Ant. c. 29.)

(3) Finn, of Cill Lambraidhe and Tigh-da-gobhan, commemorated Dec. 6. Gobban Finn was son of Luighdeich, of the Ui Liathan, who were descended from Oiliill Olum. He is called "the father of a thousand monks," and is said to rest at Clenenagh, a townland near Mountnah, in Queen's County, but in the ancient calendar his name is placed in the latter part of the 10th century. In the monastery of Kilnaheen (now Killamery, co. Kilkenney) and Tigh-da-gobhan (now Seagoe, on the Bann, in the barony of Oneillend East, co. Armagh); or in the latter Dr. Reeves says, Seagoe, "Seasio Gobban," was anciently called "the house of Gobban" or "the house of the two Smiths." He died A.D. 638. He is by some identified with the Gobban of Ard-Dairinensi (March 26) and of Tasscof (May 23) [GOBBAW (2), and GOBAINN]. The people of the old tribe district of Uí Cethina, round Killamery, are said by Aengus to be in possession of several localities which they have themselves, their families, and fortunes under them, i.e. under his patronage and invocation. (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 107, 108, 317; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. iii. 360 n. iv. 253, 254, v. 211, n.; Joyce, Ir. Names of Places, 300, 3rd ed.; Mon. Hist. 22, 101.)

(4) Seairn. The personal history and lifeless descent of Gobban Seirn, the builder, are hid in the deepest obscurity, and his name so freely that some authors entirely ques-tion his ever having really existed or been other than a fancied embodiment and impersonation of ecclesiastical architecture as an art. Yet O'Curry, Petrie, Reeves, and other Irish authors, accept him as a real historical personage, and the architect of churches and city walls in the sixth and seventh centuries, the very legends being vouchers for a certain basis of truth. So famous did his name become, that when a building was afterwards found of more than ordinary beauty, extent, or delicacy of workmanship, it could be attributed to none but Gobban. In the present form of prophecy is likely to become true in fact, that "his fame as a builder in wood and stone will exist in Ireland to the end of time," or, at least, of Ireland as a nation. His father appears to have been called Tuirbhi Thagmac, i.e. Tuirbhi of the Strand (a place now known as the Strand of Turvey, on the coast of Dublin), but it is not known whether Gobban was native or come of foreign descent. O'Curry thinks he was descended from Teige or Tag, son of Cian, son of Oiliill Olum, but Petrie rather inclines to the opinion that, while he was born at Turvey, he did not belong to the Scottic race, but that the very curious account of him, in the Books of Lecan and Ballymote, had best be interpreted as meaning that he was either of foreign extraction, and thus the inheritor of a better skill and style of architecture, or belonged to the race of the Tuatha De Dananns, who preceded and were driven out by the Scotti, and were always referred to as superior to the Scotti in the knowledge and practice of the arts. The tradition in general reason, though, that he is the builder of the round towers of Antrim, Killala, and Kilmacduach, and in the legendary lives of the saints, like those of St. Maedhog (Jan. 31), St. Moling (June 17), and St. Ailbe (Sept. 12), he is often introduced as the church-builder: according to the Life of St. Macchog (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 247, 570) he owed his eminence, as an architect, entirely to the blessing of St. Macchog. According to the tradition in the country (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 404, n. 2) he was interred at Derry- sarsan, a townland in the parish of Grunysboune, barony of Currphen, wdc. among their praeceptors. In the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 47) she is entered at Feb. 11 as both Gobnat and Cognat. St. Gobnat was of the race of Conna, son of Modh-Lunna, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon; she was born at Boireann (called also Burness, Baile Mhuire, and now Balloodybury, in the barony of West Munster, co. Cork, and is said to have been made abbess of the monastery there by St. Ailbe (March 15): (for the remains, see Proc. Roy. Irish Acad. viii. 283.) She also had dedications at Ernáidhe (unidentified) and at Molannor, now perhaps Monamore, co. Clare, or more probably Molannor, near Mallow, as it is especially called in Mart. Munster, 276. "At M'lanor, in the south of Erin, is her church." She had also a dedication on Inshere, in Galway Bay, and seems to have flourished in the beginning of the 6th century, but her date is very uncertain. (Laniug, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 17, § 6; Colgan,Acts SS. 315, 714; Kelly, Cdl. Irr. iii. 73; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 47; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 462-70, giving a full account of St. Gobnate, her ancient and modern legends and antiquities.)

GOD, the first struggle in which Christians were engaged when they entered on the work of preaching the gospel to the "Gentiles," was that of maintaining the unity and power of God. We have abundant evidence of the character of this struggle in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the letters which St. Paul addressed to Gentile churches. He rejoiced in reminding the Thessalonians (1 Thess. 1. 9) "how they had turned to God from idols to serve a living and true God." At Lystra, he had urged those who would have done him sacrifice "to turn from these vanities unto the living God who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein;" and at Athens he spoke to his hearers of "God that made the world and all things that are therein," and described Him as "Lord of heaven and earth." This truth must, of necessity, have been grasped before the Greeks and Latins and the rest could enter into the mystery of the Incarnation, or have any appreciation of the work of the Son of God; and accordingly we find one great object of the Christian Apologists was to displace the current beliefs of the ordinary Greeks and Romans as to the members of their Pantheon, and lead them up to a belief in one God, the Creator and Governor of the world. It was this effort that met with the bitterest opposition, and brought on the Christians the worst of persecutions. Again and again do we read in the Acts of the Martyrs that this was the testing question: "Would they submit to serve the deities as all the nation did?"

GOD, 689

GOD, 689

GOD, 689

GOD, 689

GOD, 689
Again and again the reply was this: "There is one God who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things therein, and one Lord Jesus Christ, the only Son of God. I will not sacrifice to any man; I will not sacrifice to daemons." The anxiety of Tertullian to avoid himself of the name "daemons" is not less than Cyril's fear to use "Gnosticism". Yet if it can be proved that the underlying and the more open popular conception was the deeper belief that there is one God, to whom all power belongs, and to whose will all men look, it is evinced both in his Apology (§§ 17, 18) and The Testimony of the Soul. But the faith of the first Christians refused to attribute to any power, any will, to the objects of their neighbours' reverence; and because of this refusal they were tortured and put to death.

But the Christians had to meet, in connexion with this same subject of the creation, a difficulty from another quarter—the Gnostic heresies, whose origin was in the East. All these sects held that the world was not created by the supreme God, but was framed by inferior or hostile powers [see Demiurgus, Vol. I. p. 804, where the subject is discussed]. It was, undoubtedly, with reference to these divergent lines of thought—the imperfections of the Western philosophies, the vulgar conceptions of the Gnostics—that the article was embodied in the creeds of all the churches, East and West, that God is the Maker of Heaven and Earth.

But even the Christians who had been converted from Greek and Roman conceptions of the Deity, were now, in connexion with this, before their faith in God could be enlarged and purified from earlier mistakes. Thus we find Origen assuming that all Christians held that there is one God, who created and arranged all things, and called all things into existence; but yet he deemed it necessary to contend that God is immaterial and incorporeal. Says he, "We attempted to say, even twisting the declaration of our own Scriptures" (such as our God is a consuming fire, and God is spirit), that "He is a body." It is still one of the most difficult of problems to conceive incorporeal existence; but it is strange to find that a passage, which to us seems most distinctly to affirm such existence, was used in the 3rd century to support the opposite opinion. Origen's argument in support of the incorporeal nature of the Deity may be seen in the first chapter of his work De Principiis. He proceeds to uphold two further truths in regard to God which, to us, seem incontrovertible, but to which it thus appears that Christians were brought by pain and labour, viz. the singleness or simplicity of the Divine nature (nature sterile and perfect), and the impossibility of our measuring it. Again, God is incomprehensible atype inestimable.

Additional light is thrown on the history of the reception of these truer conceptions of God from the great and systematic work which Lactantius addressed to Constantine after his conversion. Lactantius takes up and reviews the chief arguments of his predecessors, combining them in one view. Thus he asserts that it is necessary that God is incorruptible, perfect, impassible, nulli rei subjectus. Neither is He subject to any necessity, for He is Governor of all things, less than Creator. A few years later, we come to the Creed of Nicea, embodying the article of the Creed of Caesarea: "We believe in one God, Father Almighty, the maker of all things, both visible and invisible." A few years later brings us down to another systematic treatise—the collection of lectures addressed by Cyril of Jerusalem to the catechumens. The fourth lecture contains brief teachings on God, on Christ, on the Birth from the Virgin, on the cross, &c. On God, the catechumens were taught that "He is one, alone uncreate, without beginning, incapable of change or mutability; not begotten by another, nor having any successor; not having commencement of life, in time, or a termination of life." Cyril speaks (to reject it) of the thought that the Author of our souls is different from the Creator of our bodies. He teaches that God is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (who is God of God); that He is not contained in any place; that He is in all things and out of all things. A few years later in the middle of the 4th century, everything was taught explicitly of God which the church has been permitted to attain to, viz. that He is uncreate, unmeasured, eternal, Almighty.

The relations between the three Persons in the Godhead will be treated in the article THE FATHER.

Instances are so numerous in the Scriptures of the New Testament in which the same God, taken absolutely, is used of the Father, that we ought not to be surprised at finding that the same Name is also used of God of the church. "God so loved the world that He sent His only-begotten Son;" "God raised Him from the dead." "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God." Often, too, we find that this Name is supplemented by the addition "the Father"—i.e. as we find it in our Creeds. Thus "Paul an apostle—through the grace of Christ, and God the Father who raised Him from the dead... grace be to you, and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ." It was recognized that before all worlds, and when time was not, the Son was begotten of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God; and thus the Christian writers scrupled not to designate the Father at the origin ἐξ ἀρχῆς, the cause ὁ ἀρχηγός, the root and fountain ὁ Μητρός τοῦ Ἴδου and of the Holy Spirit. Thus, whilst they held most firmly the equality, or rather the unity, of substance, power, and eternity in the three Persons of the Trinity, they scrupled not to assert that this power, essence, and eternity was given by

* Bardeleanus, however, did not separate between the supreme God and the Creator of the world. On this ground Dean Mansel held that he must be considered an only partially a Gnostic. (Gnostic Heresies, p. 146.)

The creed of Caesarea had ὁ θεός ἐξ ἀρχηγοῦ ἐκείνου ἐκεῖνου ὁ ἀρχηγός, as well as ἐξ ἀρχῆς. I suppose that ὁ ἀρχηγός was deemed to be too wide; that it might even be quoted as including the Son and the Holy Spirit. The Nicene creed reads ἐξ ἀρχηγοῦ ἐκείνου.
the Father to the Son and Holy Spirit. So they interpreted the words, "As the Father hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself:" so they appealed to the words, "The living Father hath sent Me, and I live by the Father." Indeed some of the early writers understood thus the words of our Saviour, "My Father is greater than I"—greater, not in magnitude nor in time, but because the Son had His generation from the Father. Holding most firmly the unity of will, and the unity of essence, they felt no difficulty about our Lord's saying this, "The Son can do nothing of Himself." They adopted in its full meaning language such as this, "Whatever things the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son (Filioque) in like fashion." GODA, a deacon who attests the act of archbishop Wulfred dated at Canterbury, April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

GODALSADUS, thirty-eighth bishop of Chartres, succeeding Flavinius and followed by Beraulphus, perhaps towards the close of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1102.) [S. A. B.]

GODARDUS, bishop of Rouen. [GILDARDUS.]

GODEARDUS, bishop of Mainz. [GOTHARDES.]

GODEBERTA, virgin of Noyon; commemorated April 11. Vita S. Godebertae Virgin. sancto; ui radicis ecclesiae et parvae: in Trier, in Abbeville, in Koniewienis, in three chapters, with introductory notes and a short appendix of his translation, is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 11 Apr. ii. 31-8), and her dedication occurs in Molanus (Usuard. Auct. 11 Apr. Antw. 1567), Ussarudus (Mart. Auct. Apr. 11 and 13 ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 933, 931, 932), Wion (Lips. Vita S. Godebertis, i. 139), and Venet. Antw., 1565), and Menard (Mart. 11 et 27 Apr. pp. 31, 35, Par. 1629).

The Life, which is really part of a sermon, was probably preached on the saint's feast in the church of St. Godbertha, and is printed by Surixs (De Prob. Sact. Hist. 145-6, Cologne, 1819); the Bollandists say that a number of relics were preserved in her church, and especially a bell said to have been her own.

Her Life is of the usual type. She was born of noble and Christian parents at Amiens, and carefully educated. Refusing marriage, she was given by her parents to bishop Eligius at Noyon in the presence of king Clotaire, who presented her with his own palace and the chapel of St. George. There she lived and died, and her body was placed in her own church, which was afterwards dedicated to her memory. If she was contemporary with St. Eligius (bishop c. A.D. 640-659) this must have taken place in the time of the Frankish king Clotaire III. (A.D. 656-670), and the Bollandists say she flourished about A.D. 700. [J. G.]

GODEBERTUS of Chartres. [GAUSBERTUS.]

GODEBERTUS, king. [GODEBERTUS.]

GODEFRIDUS. [GONTFIRIDUS.]

GODEMAR, one of the four sons of Gundechus, the second king of the Burgundians who died about A.D. 470. If we may believe the unfriendly testimony of Gregory of Tours and other Catholic historians, two of his brothers, Clirif and Godomar, fought with the third, Gundobald [GUNSDOALD]. However that may be, in 494 Godegiselus was reigning over a part of the Burgundian territory, with Geneva for his capital, while Gundobald governed the remaining, and apparently the larger portion, from Lyons (Ennodius, Vita S. Epiphani, Acta c. 12.; Baldus, Acta c. 17.; John ii, 37). When Cloris declared war against Gundobald and invaded Burgundy, in 500, Godegiselus fought on his side at Dijon against his brother. As the reward for his treachery to the Burgundian cause he was to be made sole king of the nation under the supremacy of Cloris. But Gundobald, though defeated in that battle, soon recovered his strength, and turned his arms against Godegiselus, who had entered Vienne in triumph, and was supported there by 5000 Franks, whom Cloris had left on his departure northward. Though, like his brother, an Arius, he seems to have made an attempt at this time to conciliate the good-will of the Catholics by founding a monastery at Lyons. See a subsequent chapter of the twenty-sixth year of Guntram, in the Gallia Christiana (v. inscr. i), in which his name is written Gaudisellus, and cf. Binding, Das Burgundisch-Romische Königreich, i. 160. Gundobald's forces, however, succeeded in taking the city, and Godegiselus, who fled for shelter to an Arius church, was killed together with his bishop, as was said, by his brother's hand. The authorities for his life, besides those alluded to above, are Marius Avent. Chron. in Migne, Patr. Lat. ixii. 795-6; Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. i. 28, 32, 33, iii. prologus; Hist. Franc. Epitomata, xvii. xxii. xxiii. xiv.; and Hinmar, Vita S. Remegii, i. Patr. Lat. exxv. 1160. Implicit trust, however, must not be placed in Gregory's details, cf. Richter, Annalen, pp. 37-8. [S. A. B.]

GODEMAR (GODOMAR, French GONDEMAR), the younger son of Gundobald, and sixth and last king of the Burgundians. His elder brother, Sigismund, fell a victim to the hatred borne his race by Clotilda, who excited her son Chlodomer to invade Burgundy. Sigismund fell into his hands, and was soon afterwards murdered with his wife and children. Godemar escaped and was crowned king of the whole nation. A second campaign resulted in the death of Chlodomer at the battle of Vésérance between Vienne and Bellay. Accounts vary as to which army won the day, but whatever the issue of that battle may have been, Godemar soon possessed himself of the kingdom, and established himself on the GODEPERTUS, left in 681, on the death of his father king Aripert, to divide the Lombard kingdom with his brother, Perthari. He reigned at Milan, his brother at Pavia. A quarrel between them soon broke out, and Godepert sent Garipalp, duke of Turin, to get help from Grimaoald, the powerful governor of Benevento. Garipalp, enraged with Grimaoald, advised Godepert to kill Grimaoald as a traitor at their first interview, told Grimaoald to expect treachery, who, therefore, murdered Godepert with his own hand, c. 662. (Paulus Diaconus, iv. 51.) Godepert left a child, Ragipert, whose son, Aripert II, ultimately became king of the Lombards at the beginning of the 8th century. [A. H. D. A.]

GODESCALCUS (1), 34th archbishop of Sens, succeeding Wilharus and followed by St. Guntbertus (about A.D. 780). His place in the series and the fact that he was buried in the monastery of St. Pierre le Vif remains for us as we know of him. (Gall. Chal. xii. 14; Gams, Series Episc. 629.) [S. A. B.]

GODESCALCUS (2), deacon of Liége, who wrote the Life of St. Lambert, a former bishop of that see, at the request of his bishop, Agilfridus, the materials for which he derived in great measure from St. Theodore of Seville, who was St. Lambert’s disciple (s. 4). He added a small treatise on his miracles, and another, of which a fragment only survives, on the translation of his remains. These were published first by Canisius, then by Chapeville, and lastly by Mabillon. The date at which he wrote, as fixed by internal evidence, was probably A.D. 729 or 730. (Rivet, Hist. Litt. de la France, iv. 57; Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti, iii. 59-74, Paris, 1733.) [S. A. B.]

GODESCALCUS (3), bishop of Osnio from c. 657 to c. 678. Represents Egila at the eighth council of Toledo, and appears as bishop at the eleventh council, A.D. 675. (Aguirre-Canclani, iii. 448, and iv. 145; Exp. Sot. vii. 220.) [M. A. W.]

GODESCALCUS (4), duke of Benevento, 739-742. He followed Gregory, nephew of Luitprand in the duchy, and when Luitprand appeared in 742 with his young nephew, Gisulf, son of his former queen, Godescale prepared to fly to Constantinople, the natural refuge of all the enemies of the Lombards. He was however anticipated by the Beneventans and slain. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 56-57, Catalogus Regum Langob. et Ducum Ben. in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 494.) In February 742 he gave judgment in favour of Desiderius, abbot of St. John of Alife. His gifts to the monastery of St. Venantius, on the Volturnus, are mentioned in 766. (Troy, Cod. Dipl. nos. 548, 857, iv. 83, v. 364.) [A. H. D. A.]

GODESCALCUS (5), nephew of Agilulf, king of the Lombards (591-616). He was carried off by Parma with his wife by Callinicus, patrician and exarch, and taken prisoner to Constantinople. (Paulus Diaconus, iv. 20.) [A. H. D. A.]

GODESCALCUS, "dux Campaniae," receives a letter from Gregory the Great, asking his protection for a monastery. (Epist. lib. x. ind. iii. ep. 11.) [A. H. D. A.]

GODINUS, bishop of Lyons. [GODIVINAL]

GODIVINAL, queen. [GODIVINAL]

GODLAM, Welsh bard. [GOLYNDAW]

GODO (1), thirteenth bishop of Verus, between Hermentfredus and St. Paulus. According to Flojord, he was present at the council of Rheims, presided over by Sournius, about A.D. 625. (Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 5. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxv. 102; Mansi, x. 593; Gall. Christ. xiii. 1169.) [S. A. B.]

GODO (2), St., thirty-first bishop of Mz, between St. Goericus and St. Clodulfus. The name appears in a charter of King Sigebert II. for the construction of the monasterium Cassongudinem, though his see is not mentioned (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxvii. 319). The catalogues are said to assign ten years and two months as the duration of his episcopate, but another account limits it to eight years. He died about the year 650, and was buried in the church of St. Symphorian. He is commemorated in his diocese May 8. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. ii. 306; Jun. ii. 128, 129; Gall. Christ. xiii. 698.) [S. A. B.]

GODO (3), St., founder and first abbot of the monastery of St. Peter at Oye (Anglia), in late times called after him St. Godonis (St. Gaul), is the diocese of Troyes. A late and unsatisfactory life of him was published by the Bollandists from a MS. of Andrew du Chesne (Acta SS. Mai. vi. 444). A great part of it is occupied with the acts of St. Wandregisilus, and seems to have been compiled from the life of that saint written by a monk of Fontanne (cf. the Vita S. Wandregisilis, Boll. Acta SS. Jul. v. 276). God was a native of the district of Verdun, and a nephew of St. Wandregisilus, who was a cousin of king Pippin. In company with his uncle, he resolved to quit the world, and the two retired to a monastery. The elder by time precessed and precept, and the younger by zealous imitation vied in a life of devotion to God’s service, and the Divine favour was attested by a miraculous voice from heaven. Before long, St. Wandregisilus, yearning for a lessler habitations, obtained from a prefect named Echimond the gift of a retired spot, on which they founded the famous monastery of Fontanne, so called from its many streams. Close at hand they also built the four churches of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Lawrence and St. Pancratius, and God was despatched to Rome to obtain relics of these martyrs. He arrived there while Vitalis was GOEDICUS, twenty-eighth bishop of Sens, following St. Wulframanus, who resigned the see. He is said to have been the parents of St. Martin of Tours. In a.D. 696 he subscribed the charter which Agirardus, or Ageradus, bishop of Chartres, gave to the monastery of St. Mary on the Loire (Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxxviii. 1228; Mabillon, de Leovigild's eldest son by his first wife (see arts. LEOVIGILD AND INGUTHOS), she was received by her grandmother Goisvintha with great rejoicing.

"Who, however, did not suffer her to remain long in the Catholic religion, but began to persuade her with soft words to be rebaptized into the Ariano heresy." On the persistent refusal of the girl of twelve (Brunichild and Sigibert were married in 562) to return to the Catholic profession, Goisvintha is reported by Gregory to have proceeded to the utmost legitym of personal violence: "Hec illae audiae, incendiæ furore successae adpresaham per comas capitis puellam in terram collidit et din calices verberatam, ac sanguine crestantam, juxta epolari, et piacuas inmergi" (H. Fr. l.c.). The "piacuas inmergi" has been variously interpreted.

Waccher (art. INGUTHIS, Erich von Gruber) supposes that the whole story arose from an attempt on the part of Goisvintha to impose forcible baptism on her grand-daughter. In any case, it must be taken as a popular exaggeration of the actual discord which may very well have been in the Gothic royal family. It was discovered that the Catholic princess could not be induced to accept Arianism as Brunichild and Gallesvintha had accepted Catholicism, and that the marriage, instead of a source of strength to Leovigild's government, threatened to become—as through the conversion of Hermengild, it actually did become—in a social and danger of weakness. (Gregor, Kritische Untersuchungen über den Austrstand und das Martyrium des Westgotischen Königsohnes Hermengild, Zeitscr. für Hist. Theol. 1873, i. 8, has analysed the probable sources and foundations of the report. Vol. Dahn, König der Germanen, v. 157, und Heilberich, A. Entstehung und Geschichte des Westgotischen Rechts, p. 11.)

The only hint given us by the Spanish sources of this attitude of Goisvintha is contained in the ambiguous words in which Joannes Biscarins describes the outbreak of Hermengild's rebellion, "Nam eodem anno—Hermengildus, faciunt Goisvinthas Regnus tyrannidem assumere, cum Quirico et Guntothi, unless we give Goisvinthas an error for Gunthotha, as Dahn does but apparently without MS. authority, can only mean here, "owing to the factious conduct of queen Goisvintha," and refer to her position of hostility towards the newly married pair. (On this use of facto, cf. collection of instances made by Görres, I. c. note 45; Dahn, v. 137 note, and art. facto in DuCange.) We know nothing of Goisvintha's farther share, if any, in the circumstances attending this memorable revolt (see art. HERMENGLID). But that at Leovigild's death she was still a considerable power in the state is proved by Recared's conduct with regard to her at the beginning of his reign. "Recaredus initit a priori amicitia et a populo (Recaredus' loyalty and national attachment, Dahn, v. 159) cum Goisvintha relicta patris sui, samque ut mater spectat" (Greg. Tur. ix. 1). Her influence as the mother of Brunichild and grandmother of Childebert II. was especially important to the new king, who was anxious to make peace with the Franks, and it was his advice that hence he sent legations to Gunthram and Childebert immediately after his accession (I. c.), as it was also, no doubt, by her advice that his betrothal with Chlodovirtis, Inguthis's sister, was proposed as a lasting sign.
GOLEU, daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, and mother of St. Kedred, in Llinestyn (or Llineskin), is mentioned in the Pedigrees of Welsh Saints and in the Account of Brycham of Brycheiniog, but is identified with GOLLEUDDYD. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600, 604; Rees, Welsh Saints, 148.)

GOLLEUDDYD, daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, was at Llanhesgin (Llineskin, Llenestyn, Llanegyn) in Gwent, in the 5th century, and may be the same as Goleu, Gwawr, Gweddlydd, and Nefydd. (Myn. Arch. ii. 43; Rees, Welsh Saints, 148, 149; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 608.)

GOLGUS, monk and disciple of St. Columba, is thought to have ruled a monastery among the Picts, A.D. 606, and to have written Miraculis Columbae Magistri, lib. i. according to Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. 1. 31; Tanner, Bibl. 331). Camerarius (de Scot. Fort. 164, and Vol. July 17) calls him abbot. He is called the Coleg, Coleu, or Colucis, son of Colach, mentioned by St. Adamnan in Vita S. Columbae. (Coloa (3).)

GOLINDUCH (Golinduch, Golanduch), martyr in Persia in the reign of the emperor Maurice; commemorated on July 12 (Bous. Mon.).

GOLEU, a wife of one of the chief magi, and in her sleep had revealed to her the happy condition of the just, from which she found herself excluded for not being a Christian, and the lost state of idolaters. She at once received baptism, on account of which her husband and the king had her tortured and put to death (Basil. Mén. iii. 164). Her story is narrated by Theophylactus Simocatta (Hist. v. 12), who says that she was born at Babylon, her father being a magus and a satrap, and that after her marriage she resided at Hierapolis (which must be the Syrian city, five days from Antioch towards Mesopotamia). The vision occurred to her in a trance, which suddenly fell upon her while at table with her husband. Evagrius (H. E. vi. 29) briefly notices the story, and states that the life of Golinduch was written by the elder Stephanus, bishop of Hierapolis. Nicephorus Callistus, who likewise relates the story (H. E. xviii. 29), gives her father's name Asmoch, and her mother's Muxuch. [C. H.]

GOLVENAES, GOLVENES, is described by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 317) as a Scotch hermit who left his own country and devoted himself to a life of contemplation in Armoric. On the death of St. Paul, Bishop of Leon, he was appointed to the see about A.D. 600, and his feast was on June 23. He is said to have written Rituale Ecclesiae, lib. i. and Laudes Multorum Sancorum, lib. 1 (Tanner, Bibl. 332). But in the Gallieus Martyrology his feast is July 1, and he is said to have died at Rennes, and been buried in the monastery of St. Melanius (Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. xiv. 3). Like other ancient saints, he is said to have been endowed with miraculous power, and a curious story is told of his having changed into gold some earth which a pious farmer had given him, and made from the gold a chalice, three bells, and three crowns (Arch. Camb. 4. ser. ii. 272). In the Menologion Soticum, Dempster commemorates "Golvenaeus Leonensis episcopus," with the significant addition, "nonnulli Scotorum putati, sed ego delibero" (Bp. Forbes, Cat. Scott. Saints, 263, 264). In Bollandists' Acta SS. 1 Jul. i. 111-114, there is given Vida S. Golveni episcopi Leonensis, with a commentarius praenium relating to his country, acts, age, and cultus, with annotations and list of miracles. [J. G.]

GOLYDDAN (Gaulan, Golyddian), called bard of Cadwaladr, and his date A.D. 560-600. The historical poem Armes Prydein Evar (Myn. Arch. i. 156; Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, i. 436, ii. 123) is usually attributed to him, yet without assured authority, and Turner (Vind. Anc. Brit. Poems, 269) refers to it in the 8th century. It is the earliest Welsh composition which mentions miracles devoted to the aid of a saint. Another poem is given him by Dr. Owen Pughe (Welsh Dict.; Skene, i. 490 sq. 294 sq. 450), but on what authority does not appear. His death, according to the Welsh Triads, was caused by one of the "three atrocious axes-strokes of the island of Prydain." (Rees, Welsh Saints, 68, 72; Myn. Arch. i. 16, 22, 25; Stephen, Lit. Gymry, 207 sq. 197; Tanner, Bibl. 332.)

GOMA, bishop of Lisbon. His signature is GOMARELLUS. Among the subscriptions to the council of Egar, A.D. 614, is found the name of Fructuosus, a deacon who signed as the representative of a bishop Gomarellus. The subscriptions do not express the sees of the subscribers, and the see of Gomarellus is therefore uncertain. It is however conjectured that he was bishop of Lerida, as it is supposed that the deacon Fructuosus is the same person as the bishop of Lerida of that name, who subscribes the act of the fourth council of Toledo in A.D. 633, and that he succeeded Gomarellus. (Esp. Sagra. xlv. 104. Tejeda y Ramiro, ii. 702.) [F. D.]

GOMBERTUS of Sens. [Guntbertus.]

GOMIDAS, patriarch of Armenia (617-625), between John (called by Le Quien John the Orthodox, and by Saint-Martin John III.) and Christopher III. He was born at Aghtais, in the canton of Arakadzoin, and was bishop of the see of the Maminianus before his call to the patriarchate (Saint-Martin, Memoirs sur l'Arménie, i. 438). The Armenian historian, John the Maminianus, states that for eight years he administered the monastery of St. John the Precursor, and was sent by the patriarch Abraham (594-600) to the Georgians or Iberians with the object of promoting a union with them (Langlois, Histoire de l'Arménie, i. 361). He composed some beautiful hymns to St. Rhinosime, which Langlois says have been translated into Italian by Luigi Carrer, Venice, 1842 (Langlois, Armenian Monast. of St. Lazaro, p. 78). Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1386) writes the name Chomitas, and makes him succeed Abraham, but gives no dates. [Armenians.] [C. H.]

GOMMARIUS. [Gummarus.]

GONDEBALT. [Gundobald.]

GONDEBERTUS (Guntbertus, Gomber- tus), ST., and martyr in the latter half of the 7th century. The earliest account of him is from Flodoard, who wrote in the 10th century. He was a noble, reared at court, and brother of St. Nivardus, the twenty-fifth archbishop of Rheims, who lived in the reign of Childeric II. (660-673). He was married to St. Berta, as his second wife, who also suffered martyrdom, though upon another occasion. The most authentic testimony of him was a deed with his signature, still preserved in the archives at Rheims in Flodoard's time, which recited a dispute between Gondebert and Reclus (St. Riez), the successor of Nivardus, as to some property left by the latter. The archbishop asserted that it had all been given to religious foundations, for the salvation of the donor's soul, while Gondebert claimed it by virtue of relationship. It was settled by arbitration, on the terms of Gondebert retaining the property beyond the Loire, which had belonged to his mother Emma, and the church keeping the rest. It would seem, however, that he did not desire it for selfish uses, as we find him, with his wife, making gifts to the church of Timotheus and Apollinaris, the martyrs of Rheims, building, as was said, the religious house for nuns, dedicated to St. Peter, at one of the gates of the city, and founding with his own and others' contributions, the neighbouring monastery of Avennacum. Not content, however, with these good works, he left his wife, and went on a mission to the parts beside the sea (loca maritimae), and there at a fixed spot, was, according to the barbarians, his widow, Berta, built a convent at Avennacum, a fitting spot being pointed out to her by an angel. But by an unfortunate oversight there was no supply of water within a distance of two miles, which rendered a fresh miracle necessary. At length she suffered martyrdom at the hands of the children of Gondebert's former wife. The crime was miraculously discovered and punished, and the penance imposed upon a niece of Gondebert, called Meaia, who had been privy to it, was the task of transporting his body from the scene of his martyrdom to the grave of his widow. (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. i. 4; ii. 10; iii. 27; iv. 46, 47; Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxv. 35, 111, 252, 350.) The Bollandists publish a life of Gondebert, which they describe as extracted "ex antiquis officii proprii lectionibus," (Acta SS. Apr. i. 620) but except that it defines the object of his mission as the people living round the "urae Althiassii." (Oldenbourg, Acta SS. Apr. ii. 540) adds nothing to Gondebert's account but verbiage. Gondebert's day of commemoration is April 29. [S. A. B.]

GONDEBERTUS, king of the Lombards. [Godepert.]

GONDEMAE, king of the Burgundians. [Gode-mar.]

GONDICAIRE, king of the Burgundians. [Gundicarius.]

GONDIUC, king of the Burgundians. [Gundichus.]

GONDOALDUS, eighth bishop of Meaux, following Baudowaldus and succeeded by St. Faro, or, according to one account by Waldbert (Vita S. Furonis, 1x.; Acta S. Benedict, i. 816). It was he who at the instance of St. Eustace, the abbot of Luxeuil, conferred the veil upon St. Faro or Burgundofara, and established her in a convent (circ. A.D. 614). He was present at the council of Rheims (A.D. 625 or 630), and probably died shortly afterwards. (Vita S. Eustasii, 2; Vita S. Furonis, lviii.; Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 117, 615, Paris, 1668-1701; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. x. 594, Florence, 1759-1798; Gall. Christ. viii. 1596.) [S. A. B.]

GONDOALDUS (Gundoldus, Gundobaldus), thirteenth bishop of Strasbourg, succeeding Labeobus, and followed by Aludus, or according to Wimpeling, by Gaislo (Gall. Christ. vi. 780; Wimpel. Cist. Episc. Argent. 18.) He seems to belong to the second half of the 8th century. [S. A. B.]

GONDFULUS, third bishop of Lyon, between Latro and Elinandus I. about the middle of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 510.) [S. A. B.]

GONDULPHUS, twenty-third bishop of Maastricht, succeeding St. Monulfus and fol-assent, was escorted to Carthage, and there received the title of Africanus. Letters were despatched by him to the senate at Rome, submitting his election to their approval. Their assent was given readily. Gordianus and his son were proclaimed as Augusti. Maximinus was declared a public enemy, his statues were thrown down, and his name ordered to be erased from all public monuments. The hopes of a reign of equity and peace were soon dashed to the ground.

Capellius, the procurator of Numidia, refused to acknowledge the new emperors, and led his disciplined legions against the unwarlike crowd of their adherents at Carthage. The younger Gordianus perished in the field, his father, on hearing of his death, died by his own hands. The whole tragedy of their brief reign lies between January and April, of A.D. 238. The third emperor of the name, the son either of Gordianus II. or of a daughter of Gordianus I., was a boy of fifteen at the time of their death. The senate, on hearing what had passed at Carthage, determined to persevere in their resistance to Maximinus, and appointed Decimus Ceilius Balbinus, and Marcus Claudius Pupienus Maximus, both of whom had been consuls, as joint emperors. The people, however, clung to the Gordian family, and the boy, who was at Rome, was proclaimed as Caesar. After the defeat and death of Maximinus at Aquileia at the hands of Pupienus in May, the conqueror returned to Rome. The praetorians and the troops generally, however, submitted reluctantly to rulers who had been chosen by the senate. They attacked the palace and murdered the two emperors, and both troops and senate were in accepting the young Gordianus as Augustus.

The short reign, which so far opened brilliantly, was soon clouded by disaster. The power of Sapor was threatening the safety of the Roman provinces on the Gordian frontier, and the emperor, after marrying Sobrina Tranquillina, the daughter of Mithiheus, went accompanied by his father-in-law, as prefect of the praetorian, to command the troops in person. The temple of Janus was thrown open with the usual ceremonies, and Gordianus preceded through Moesia and Thrace, and Asia Minor. Sapor was defeated in several engagements, and compelled to evacuate Mesopotamia. The death of Mithiheus, however, deprived the emperor of his only trustworthy counsellor. Philip the Arabian, who succeeded him in the emperor's favour, fomented the jealousy and discontent of the troops by secret artifices. They broke out in open revolt. The last of the Gordian house was put to death, and Philip was proclaimed as emperor. The popularity of the new emperor was shown in the fact that the senate decreed divine honours to his memory, and that a tomb with a polyglot inscription, in Greek, Latin, Persian, and Egyptian, was erected over his grave at Circeium. (Capitol. Gordiant; Herodian. viii. viii.; Victor. de Caes. xxi. xvii.; Epit. xxi. xvii.; Entrop. ix. 2; Amm. Marcell. xxiii. 5; Zosim. i. 14. 18; Eckhel, viii. p. 209; Gibbon, i. vii.)
GORDIANUS (3)—May 10. Martyr with Epimachus at Rome, on the Latin Way, in the time of Julian. He was a vicarius, or vice-prefect, to whose care an aged presbyter, Januarius, was entrusted, and by whom he was converted. Remaining steadfast in the faith, he was executed. His acts are given at length in Mart. Adon., but are very obscure. For instance, they represent Silvia as the patroness of Julian as present at Rome when emperor and persecutor of the Christians, whereas he never was there after he had declared war against the church. (Mart. Vet. Rom., Adon., Usuard., Wandalbert.; Kal. Allat.; Kal. Front.; Sacra-mentar., Greg. Mag.; Till. Mém. vii. 722; Ceillier, iii. 413.)

[C. H.]

GORDIANUS (4), grandfather of Fulgentius bishop of Ruspe. He was a senator of Carthage, and on the invasion of the Vandals under Genseric, A.D. 429, fled into Italy with his family and there died. (Vit. Fulgent. cap. l. § 1, in Patr. Lat. lxxv. 119.)

[C. H.]

[C. H.]

GORDIANUS (8), a Roman disciple of St. Benedict, afterwards a companion of St. Placidus, living under his rule at Messana. In 589 Placidus was taken captive by Mammmus the general of Abdallah, king of the Saracens. Gordinian ministered to him in prison, and buried him after his martyrdom. The next year Gordinian escaped to Constantinople, where he long lived, and by order of the emperor Justinian composed a Greek account of the martyrdom of St. Placidus and his companions. He afterwards returned to Sicily and there died. There is a statue of his name in Lat. Vivi et Passo, S. Placi. Martyris (Mabill. Acta SS. O.S.B. i. 42; Surius, de Prob. Hist. SS. t. iv. 5 Oct. p. 65; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 114). Ceillier observes that this story is now universally rejected, and that the life of Placidus betrays itself as a fabrication of a later date by reckoning forty-nine popes after Vigilius, which makes the Pseudo-Gratian live in the pontificate of John VIII. (ob. 882). Cave accepts the genuineness of the work as a whole, regarding it as largely interpolated. (Celi. xi. 349; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 523.)

[C. H.]

GORDIANUS (7), father of pope Gregory the Great, was a noble Roman of senatorial rank, and descended from a pope Felix. (Joann. Diacon. in Vit. S. Gregori.; Greg. Dialog. l. 4, c. 16.) John the Deacon says that Felix IV. (Acc. A.D. 523) was his ancestor; but this pope being described as a Samnite, whereas Gregory is always understood to be a Roman, it is more probable that Gordinianus is the father only by having the pallium over it, to mark his ecclesiastical rank. (J. B.—y.)

GORDIANUS (8). There exists a letter purporting to be written by pope Deusdeitl to a bishop of this name. The old reading of the address of the letter was "Gordiani episcopi," which caused its authenticity to be doubted, as Deusdeitis was pope from A.D. 615 to A.D. 618, and St. Isidore was bishop of Seville from A.D. 599 to A.D. 636. However, there is a various reading, "Hispaniarum ecclesiae coepiscopus," guided by which Migne GORDIANUS, to whom Gregory addressed a poem, which does not present a favourable light. (Greg.
Naz. Carmin. 41, p. 121.) This conjecture is refuted by Tillmont (note xv.). According to Elias Cretensis (notas, p. 610), Gorgonia and her husband resided at Jerusalem, and had two sons, who became bishops. This is very doubtful.
It is, however, certain that Gorgonia was the mother of three daughters, Alypiana, Eugenia, and (after her maternal grandmother) N.
Gorgonia was not baptized till a short time before her death, but previous to her last illness (Greg. Naz. Orat. 11, p. 188) she had the happy ness of seeing her husband and children and grandchildren also admitted to the church by the same sacrament (ibd. pp. 190, 186). Her daughter Alypiana was married to a distinguished military officer named Nicobulus, and became the mother of several children, in whom Gregory took great delight. [NICOBULUS.] Gorgonia died in middle life, not long after her brother Caesarius, previous to the year 573 (Greg. Naz.
Carm. ii. pp. 453, 353), leaving her aged parents who, as well as the other members of her family, were present at her decease, inconsolable for their loss (Greg. Naz. Orat. p. 188; Orat.
19, p. 316). Her brother Gregory pronounced her funeral oration, in which he draws a very highly coloured portrait of her (Orat. 11). The Roman church has placed Gorgonia on the roll of saints, and commemorates her on Dec. 8.

GORGONIUS (2) Sept. 9. A chamberlain in the court of Diocletian, who was hanged at Nicomedea, with Dorotheus, at the beginning of the persecution, when all the imperial household were called upon to sacrifice in order to clear themselves from suspicion about the burning of the palace. (Mart. Rom. V. c.; Mart.
Adon., Usuard., Notker, Waldalbert.; Eusebi
E. H. lib. viii. cap. 6; Ruinart, Acta Sancra,
p. 317; Till. Menon. v. 180.) Wright's Syrian Martirology (Journ. Soc. Litt. 1809, 425) gives a martyr of this name at Nicomedia under Mar. 11, and another, Mar. 14, both at the beginning of the persecution, the two martyrs may be identical. [G. T. S.]

GORGONIUS (3), martyr with Indes and Petrus in the reign of Maximian; commemorated on Dec. 28. They were seized as they stood beyond the burning pile on which the alleged 20,000 martyrs were consumed, and were drowned in the sea with stones fastened round their necks (Basil. Menol. ii. 65). [C. H.]

GORGONIUS of Ciana. [GREGORIUS (4).]

GORGONIUS (3), bishop of Apollonia (Lopadum), in Bitinia, one of the Nicene fathers, a.d. 329. (Manei, ii. 696; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 613). [L. D.]

GORGONIUS (4), eleventh bishop of Nala. He succeeded St. Priscus c. a.d. 328, and in 360 was succeeded by Quadruvstis. (Remondini, Novella Eccles. Storia, i. 637.) [R. S. G.]

GORGONIUS (5), bishop of Liberalia in Numidia, deprived of his church by the Donastata, but present at Carth. Conf. 411, though not at its commencement. (Mon. Vatic. Don. 133.)

[H. W. P.]
GORGONIUS (6), bishop of Germanicia in Comagene, a Confessor, who, according to some MSS. of Jerome's Chronicle, assisted Lucifer of Cagliari, together with Cynatius of Pultus, or perhaps of Gabala, in Syria Prima, in his ill-advised consecration of Paulinus to the bishopric of Antioch, A.D. 382. (Hieron. Chron. p. 255 in Patr. Lat. viii. 893.)

GORGONIUS (7), bishop of Vasada, in Lycaonia; his name is found subscribed to the document of the synod of Constantineople to the Saracens. John concerning the condemnation of treachery of the Antiochs, and his party, A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1050; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1077.)

GORMAN, Celtic form of Germanus.

(2) Coarb of St. Mochta at Louth, and father of Torbach, coarb of St. Patrick [at Armagh] (Four Mast. A.D. 753). It is added in Ann. Tig. A.D. 758 that he abode for a year at the entrance to St. Fingen's well at Clonmacnois, died in his pilgrimage, and was buried there (O'Conor, Rec. Hibern. Scrip. ii. 254; Colgan, Acta SS. 736, c. 5; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 270).

GORMHAIL appears to have been an intruding bishop or abbot at Armagh, as the Four Mast. A.D. 794, say he succeeded Faileidelach, and we know that at that time there was a struggle for the primacy, Dubhnoelte being the acknowledged successor (Stewart, Armagh, 94). The Ann. Inisf., A.D. 793, call him "mac Dindathigh."

GORMLAITH, daughter of Flathnathach, abbess of Clonbroney, co. Longford, died A.D. 815 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 810, i. 423).

GORNIS, called also GORMAS and GURNAS, and said to have baptized St. Patrick. He was a priest and blind, but received his sight by ablution in the baptismal water. (Colgan, Tr. Thamn. 11 c. 3, 16 n. 6, 21 c. 3, 65 c. 2, 118 c. 4; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, iii. 481.)

GORTHENI (Τοποθέτης), a sect mentioned by Hegesippus (Euseb. H. E. iv. 22), called Τοποθετής by Epiphanius (Ancyritis, 12), and likewise Τοποθέτης by Epiphanius (Pamartion, i. 12), and Theodoret (Hær. bab. i. 1). Epiphanius classes them among the Samaritans, and Theodoret derives them from Simon Magus. They were so called from their founder Gortheus.

GOSACHUS of Grabard. [Guascacht.]

GOSBERTUS, thirty-second bishop of Graena, between Lutiberu and Walturnus, or Guaturna. From a letter of pope Stephen III. written A.D. 770, to Charles and Carloman, it appears that a bishop Gausbertus had headed an embassy to be sent from those princes. (Migne, Patr. Lat. xviii. 245.) This Gausbertus may be identical with Gausbertus of Geneva. He cannot at any rate be, as has been suggested, Gausbertus of Chartres, whose date is fixed by the charters he subscribed a century earlier [Gausbertus]. The author of the Gallia Christiana (xvi. 384) quotes the Inca San-Petrinus to the effect that his episcopate lasted sixteen years. [S. A. B.]

GOSCENINUS. [Gauzilomendu.

GOSOLDUS of Padua. [Gonsoldus.]

GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL. Besides our four canonical Gospels a large number of other writings circulated in early times containing either complete narratives of our Lord's life on earth or particular sections of the history. The great majority of these literary products was either interpolated editions and re-castings of our canonical Gospels or additions and appendices to them. The former class is not for the most part the party objects of various horticultural sects which had separated from the Church, the latter were largely in use among Catholic Christians, though these also, in part at least, originated in heretical circles. Many of these writings reach as far back as the 2nd and 3rd centuries; and some of them, for instance the Gospel of the Hebrews, are of no little importance for the investigation of the origins of our New Testament Canon. Alas! scarcely the tenth part of this once extensive literature has come down to us; we possess complete texts only of some Gospels of the Childhood, and of the so-called Acts of Pilate, and even these no longer in their original form.

The Catholic Church, while making most extensive use of the apocryphal Acts of Apostles, was much more reserved in relation to the apocryphal Gospels. Narratives of the deeds and sufferings of the apostles, after being purified so far as possible from heretical ingredients afforded welcome nourishment for pious curiosity; but apocryphal enlargements of the historical details contained in our gospels were long regarded with great distrust, and were adopted only so far as they referred to the Protoevangelium, the histories of Joseph and Mary, our Lord's nativity, and the occurrence of His childhood. And in this case even narratives concerning the child Jesus, which early found acceptance in Gnostic circles, were, till after the 4th century, regarded with great suspicion by the church, and then found only a hesitating reception. More favourable judgments were passed, on the other hand, upon histories of the Passion, harmonized from our four gospels with various apocryphal additions, and narratives of miracles said to have been wrought after the resurrection. Of extracanonical narratives concerning the time of our Lord's public ministry only fragments, more or LES GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL les numerose, have been preserved in patristic controversial writings or in occasional citations by the Fathers. These citations may here and there add to our knowledge of the words of Jesus, but by far the greater number of these extracanonical utterances of the Lord are either later than many of the traditions found in the canonical gospels or manifest inventions with a purpose which in almost all cases is not far to seek. Many a genuine Saying of our Lord, though once committed to writing, has been either entirely lost or no longer preserved in its original form. Yet may we safely assume that for the greater part of genuine traditions which circulated among the oldest Christian communities have passed into our canonical gospels, though it may be, in many cases through a second or third hand. All reliable tradition must have ceased about the middle of the 2nd century. The earlier authorities employed by such and such a writer as Plutarch (except so far as portions of them had been taken up into our synoptical gospels), or else had been disfigured beyond power of recognition by changes made to suit the taste of various heretical parties. While the text of our canonical gospels became gradually fixed, these extracanonical stories were still continued to be subject to perpetual changes and recastings, by which the traces existing in them of older traditions were gradually effaced. The little that has come down to our own times is found in large citations from Jewish-Christian and Catholic writers of the 2nd century, who besides our canonical gospels made use of other sources.

The remains of extracanonical narratives of the time of Christ’s public ministry are yet scantier than those of extracanonical utterances attributed to Him. Almost all the fragments that have come down to us are borrowed from the Gospel of the Hebrews; but this work had already undergone an early and extensive process of condensation, being composed of a section respectively of the 2nd century, very considerable alterations. The specimens of it, given us in later times by Jerome and Ephraimi prove only that the older tradition was as ruthlessly tampered with by Jewish-Christian as by the various Gnostic sects. This notwithstanding, the loss of most of the gospels once used by heretical sects and parties is much to be regretted. The specimens given us by Catholic doctors do not enable us to form any complete notion of what these gospels really were, but rather lead us to suspect that the pious zeal and prejudice of our authorities induced them to select such passages only as would prove offensive to Catholic ears. When we come to the genuine Nazarenes, written in the Hebrew language, was, in fact, the Hebrew original of our Gospel of St. Matthew, and are told of writings like the Gospel of St. Peter or the Diatessaron of Tatian being publicly read in Catholic communities of the 4th century without objection or offense, it can hardly be denied that some, at least, of such writings must have been, with whatever peculiarities of their own, nearly related to our canonical gospels. If we could but follow the gradual development and alteration of the Gospel of the Hebrews from the time of its first appearance to the end of the 4th century, we should probably obtain much surprising information as to the history and developments of the whole literature. Still greater, doubtless, would have been the gain for our knowledge of the history of the Church and sects of the 2nd and 3rd centuries, if some of these gospels had been preserved entire. Those, for instance, containing the so-called Acts served not only the numerous apocryphal Acts of Apostles, to satisfy the claims of a pious curiosity but also and specially to recommend certain doctrines and customs, traditionally handed down in Gnostic schools. The main purpose of these works was to represent the opinions peculiar to the Gnostics as deduced from the original teaching of Christ and His Apostles. But inasmuch as from the middle of the 2nd century and onwards the Gnostics certainly made use of our canonical gospels, we must assume that those of their own invention were in part at least imitations of the former. The fragments which remain to us of many Gnostic fictions are indeed evidently based on the canonical narratives; but our knowledge of the different sections of Gnosticism is at the same time so imperfect that we cannot but deplore the loss of these writings.

The few remains of this once extensive literature, which remain, form a sort of a loose Catholic form, relate as already observed almost exclusively to the earliest portions of our Lord’s life. We still possess a series of so-called Gospels of the Infancy which on closer inspection may be traced back to three or four distinct writings of the 2nd century.

The narratives concerning Mary and the child Jesus, ending with the slaughter of the Innocents and the Flight into Egypt are contained in three works derived from kindred sources; those of our Lord’s miracles from His fifth to His twelfth year, are preserved in a single writing, of which however several recent editions, differing considerably from one another, have been published. Besides these, there are various compilations containing narratives of the whole period of our Lord’s childhood; among them one which fills up the interval between the flight into Egypt and the return to Galilee with an account of various Egyptian miracles; for this section an original authority, now lost, has been employed, while for all that precedes and all that follows it essentially the same sources appear to have been made use of as in the other Gospels of the Infancy. The Gospels of the Childhood still existing are as follows:

(1) The so-called Protevangelion of James, or according to its title in the manuscripts, The History of James concerning the Birth of Mary (5 Isaiah); this is included in the Eusebian Canon (i.e., Eusebius) also in the Codex Vaticanus. It was first published in the Latin version of William Postellus by Theodore Bibliander (1552), then in Greek by Michael Neander (1564), and frequently since; and finally, after fresh collations of numerous MSS., by Thilo (Codex apocryphus Novi Testamenti, tom. 1., 1692, pp. 106-273) and Tischendorf (Codex apocrypha, 1851, pp. 1-49; 2nd ed. 1876, pp. 1-50). There is also a separate edition of this gospel by Stickow (Breclau, 1840), which is critically of small value. The text, as handed down in all MSS. hitherto discovered, presents but few discrepancies. The best MS. is the Cod. Paris., of the 10th century (A. ap.
Thilo, C. op. Tischendorf), which Thilo followed in constructing his text. The fragment of a Syriac translation has been published with an English version by Prof. Wright (Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the New Testament; London, 1865, pp. 1–5). The Syriac MS., which is the present form begins with ch. 17 dates from the second half of the 6th century; the text, apart from a few abbreviations, agrees literally with that of the Greek original. The narrative contained in this Protevangelium extends from the birth of the Virgin Mary to the slaughter of the Innocents at Bethlehem and the murder of Zadok. (2) The Gospel of (Pseudo) Matthew concerning the Childhood of Mary and of Christ our Saviour (Liber de Infan tia Mariae et Christi Savoris). This book exists in Latin only, and professes to be a translation made from the Hebrew by St. Jerome. Some MSS. James is named as the author. It is in fact derived from the same original source as the above-mentioned Historia Jacobi, going over the same ground but extending the account of our Lord's history to the flight into Egypt. The text was first edited by Thilo from a Paris MS. (Cod. apocryph. N. T. pp. 357–409), and more recently by Oscar Schade from a MS. in the Stuttgart (Liber de Infantia Mariae et Christi Savoris, Halle, 1869); Tischendorf's edition (Evangel. apoc. pp. 50–105, 2nd ed. pp. 51–112), which announces itself as the first complete one of the Pseudo-Matthew, is based on a text which the apocryphal Gospel of Matthew is combined so as to form one whole with the hereafter to be mentioned Gospel of the Passion of Zacharias. The text contains a correspondence between bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus on the one hand, and St. Jerome on the other, which is prefixed to the work, betrays the fact (against the will of the forger himself) that his alleged translation from a Hebrew original is nothing but a Catholic recast of an old Gnostic writing, which, in compliance with traditional custom, is ascribed by the stemmata. This recast cannot be assigned an earlier date than the second half of the 5th century. It reappears in yet another form, in (3) The Evangelium de Nativitate Mariae, first published among the works of St. Jerome, then reprinted by Fabricius, Jones, and Schmidt in their collections of New Testament Apocrypha, and finally by Thilo (L. c. pp. 217–336) and Tischendorf (L. c. pp. 106–114, 2nd ed. pp. 113–121). The narrative, from which has been carefully expunged everything that could give offence to the strictest Catholic orthodoxy, reaches only to the birth of Christ at Bethlehem. This recast, which must be considerably younger than its prototype, is a Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew—found, however, in a MS. as early as the 10th century, in the Laurentian Library (cf. Schade, l. c. p. 5). To it belongs a second spurious epistle, attributed to St. Jerome, which, in the printed editions, follows the correspondence already referred to between that father and the bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus. The author of this second epistle makes express reference to the former correspondence, which, however, he misunderstands, and is misled thereby to suppose the writing which actually lies before him (our Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew) to have been written by the so-called heretical author "Selenium" (Leucius). (Compare Tischendorf, L. c. Proleg. p. xxxii. sq. 2nd ed. p. xxviii. sq. ; Schade l. c.) This recast announces itself expressly as a paraphrase, which gives the sense but not the exact words of the original writer. The first of these writing the so-called Protevangelium is generally regarded as the eldest of the three. Hilgenfeld (Evangel. Johne, p. 153), whose proofs were adopted by Tischendorf (Evang. apoc. p. xxviii. sq. 2nd ed. p. xxvii. sq. ; and the tract, Wann wurden wop. etc. verfaßt ? 4th ed. p. 76 sq.), has collected a series of correspondences between the writings of Justin Martyr and the Protevangelium and Tischendorf drew the conclusion that this apocryphal gospel must have existed in its present form even before the time of Justin, and consequently in the first half of the 2nd century. Hilgenfeld, however, in reply called attention to the fact that the Protevangelium in its present form is not a homogeneous work, while Schade has disputed the cogency of the proofs drawn from the alleged citations of the Protevangelium by Justin. (Die ältesten Zeugnisse betreffend die Schriften des N. T.; Bremen, 1867, p. 155 sq.) A closer inspection of the present text of the Protevangelium brings in fact to light numerous traces of later handiwork, and there are points that are most conspicuous in ch. 18. Whereas James of Jerusalem, i.e. the Alcibiades, names himself as the author of the whole work, we see St. Joseph suddenly coming forward in this chapter as the narrator, and that in a passage with an unmistakable Gnostic coloring. Joseph relates how at the birth of Christ all motions were suspended and a correspondence between heaven and earth. To exclude the whole chapter as an interpolation (see Hofmann, Das Leben Jesu nach den Apostroph., p. 110) is impossible, inasmuch as Joseph still continues the narration in the chapter following. We cannot therefore fail to recognize here an unsuccessful recast of some older document. Other observations lead to the conclusion that the Leucius character of the narrative and frequent reference to things previously related which are no longer found in the context, the abrupt conclusion of the whole, and, at the any rate, partially more original form of the narrations in the Gospel of the Pseudo-Matthew. To which we may add that various citations in the early Fathers appear to be made from an essentially different text from that which now lies before us in our Protevangelium. Origen, for instance, while citing the Book of James (In Matt. tom. x. 17), relates quite differently from our present text the history of the martyrdom of Zacharias between temple and altar (In Matt. tract 23). There is, indeed, no clear warrant for the existence of our present text of the Protevangelium before the time of Peter of Alexandria (+ 311). None of the points of contact which have been pointed out between our Protevangelium and the writings of Justin Martyr can be regarded as decisive for our present form of it. The narrative of our Lord's birth in a cave (Dial. c. Tryph. 78), for instance, rests on a local tradition (De Orig. c. Cels. 1. 51), which is probably older than the Protevangelium in its earliest form. It is not only found in all Gospels of the infancy, even those which borrowed nothing else from the Protevangelium, but is constantly referred to...
GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL

by the Fathers, and does not pretend to be a correction, but only an addition to the narrative in St. Luke (ii. 7–12).

The combination, moreover, of the angel's words to Mary in St. Luke—καὶ παλαίστες τὸ δεσπόζων Ἰωάννην (l. 31)—with those in St. Matthew (l. 21)—ἀμώστηξα καὶ πεθαίνει τὸν λαόν αὐτοῦ καὶ τὰς λαβαδίας αὐτοῦ—which is found both in Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 33) and the Protevangelium, is simply explained by the fact that St. Matthew himself has already so combined them.

The third and most probable "concordance" between Justin and the Protevangelium are the words καὶ χειρὶς λαβαδίαν Μαρίας ἐπαθεὶς (Justin, Dial. c. Tryph. 101) compared with χειρὶς τῆς λαβαδίας Μαρίας (Protev. c. 12). But here the connexion of the words in Justin with the angelic salutation is more natural than that in the Protevangelium with the address of the priest to Mary in the Temple. Justin is therefore probably quoting the original document, entirely lost to us, except in St. Matthew's Protevangelium. The same original document is probably that referred to by Clemens Alex. (Strom. viii. 16, p. 889 Potter), Origen (i. c.), and Gregory of Nyssa (Oratio in d. natal. Christi, Opp. iii. 546, ed. Paris.). Traces of a Gnostic writing concerning the Nativity of Mary are found as late as IV. N. T., cap. 26; 2 Bar. v. 12; 2 Enoch, xxii. 9; August. c. Faust. xxii. 9; Gelasii Decret. vii. 9, 16). The Protev-Matthew has drawn directly from it. The narratives, for example, contained in the last chapters, which are wholly wanting in the Protevangelium, and more particularly the miracles wrought on the infant Jesus in this narrative, could not possibly be a Gnostic character (cc. 18–24). This notwithstanding, it seems very unlikely that the Gnostic writing concerning the Nativity of Mary was made use of by Origen. The account of the martyrdom of Zacharias which Epiphanius (l. c.) tells in the Gnostic book differs as much from that given by Origen as from that contained in the Protevangelium. The best account of the Gospel may be due to a later reviser of the Gnostic writing, but that found in Origen has no Gnostic features whatever, but is evidently derived from some Jewish-Christian source. To which must be added that while the Gnostic writing expressly named Jesus as its author, that used by Origen, like our Protevangelium, gave this position to St. James.

A closer inspection of the Protevangelium makes evident that its text must have undergone repeated revisions and recastings before it assumed its present form. Side by side with various traditional affinities, and especially ch. 18), there are also numerous features indicating a Jewish-Christian writer or at any rate betraying an intimate acquaintance with Jewish customs. Take, for example, the forty days fasting, the grief of parents who are denied the blessing of children and their suffering contempt as an account, the vow of Anna like her Old Testament mother to devote her child when born to the Lord, the high priest's petalon, the 12 bells on his robe, the veil of the Temple woven by Jewish maidens, the water of curzing, the oracle of the staves, the registers of the twelve tribes, and the many Old Testament types. To explain this twofold character of the book by the hypothesis of a "Gnostic-Ebionite" author is, however, inadmissible, if only because so much is found, notwithstanding, which is in direct antagonism with Jewish thought and custom, e.g. the refusal of Joachim and his sacrifice, the bringing up of Mary in the Temple, the application of the water of curzing to Joseph, and the legendary ornamental development of the oracle of the staves. This curious admixture of intimate knowledge and gross ignorance of Jewish thought and custom compels us to assume and distinguish between an original Jewish-Christian writing and a Gnostic recast of it. The former is to a great extent preserved in the Protevangelium Jacob, but still more fully and faithfully in the Gospel of the Pseudo-Matthew.

In both writings, moreover, we discern the employment and combination of various other original sources. This is evident, for instance, in the twofold account of Mary's Annunciation (Protevangelium, 1, Pseudo-Matthew, 2). In the Protevangelium the angel appears to her at the well, in the Pseudo-Matthew in her chamber as she is working the veil of the Temple. The second account is probably the only one found in the older writing.

We may then distinguish the following strata in the histories of St. Mary and the child Jesus down to the flight into Egypt as preserved to us in these documents: (a) The Jewish-Christian work attributed to James, and already extant in the time of Justin Martyr. (b) A Gnostic recension of the same work which usually bears the name of Joseph, though occasionally also that of James, and which is attributed to Leucius Charinus (cf. the interrelated correspondence between St. Jerome and the bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus prefixed to our Pseudo-Matthew). This work may date from about the middle of the 3rd century. (c) Various Catholic productions reduced by piecing together in different ways the two ancient texts. The best account of the Protevangelium, which may have appeared in its present form as early as the latter part of the 3rd century; the Latin Pseudo-Mattheus is a later work, but derived independently of the Protevangelium from the same sources; a still later recast of the Pseudo-Mattheus is the Latin Evangelium de Nativitate Marci, preserved among the works of St. Jerome.

The remaining Gospels of the Childhood which are still preserved are the Gospel of Thomas, the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, and the Arabic History of Joseph.

4. The Gospel of St. Thomas, or the Acts of the lord's wife, and a legend called the Gospel of Thomas. This was originally a Gnostic work, and seems to have been written about the second half of the 2nd century. It was made use of not only by Marcians and Nannasenes (comp. Pseudo-Origen, Philosophum. v. 7, p. 101, ed. Ozen., with Iren. Haer. i. 20), and in later times by Nicanarchs, but is frequently cited from Origen downwards (Hom. i. in Luc.), by fathers of the church. (Compare Thilo, l. c. p. lixix. sqq. and Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxxii. sqq. 2nd ed. p. xxxvi. sqq.). Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25) reckons it among spurious writings (vita). Cyril of Jerusalem and later writers assign its authorship to a Thomas, disciple of Man. But the Israelite Thomas who introduces himself in the beginning of the work as the author is evidently meant to be the apostle St. Thomas whose purpose is to announce "the child-deeds of the Lord" to the brethren among the Gentiles. The present text is a revised text of the angelic manuscript which of the Catholic reviser has eliminated all the heretical portions. The narrative, which treats of the miracles performed by the child Jesus begins with His fifth year, and concludes with His appearance among the doctors in the temple when twelve years old. The Greek text has come down to us primarily, one of which (α) was published by Cotelier from a Paris fragment in an edition of the Apocryphal Contestants (vol. 17), and after him by Fabricius; then in a more complete form from a Venet MS. by Mingarilli (Mvtn. Eoibnt. d'Opign. Nasci. e Sidon. 1704, p. 73-152); and, finally with Thilo's
ed. (c. p. 134-144, 2nd ed. pp. 140-157). The second and more fragmentary text (β) was published from a Sinaitic MS. by Tischendorf (Weiser Jacob. 1845, Apoc. p. 51, sqq., and Of Latin translations of this narrative which have not been printed but known to exist in a Venetian manuscript of the 5th century (Tisch. Pellegrin. ed. p. xii. 2nd ed. p. xiv. sqq.), two others have quite independently been published; both by Tischendorf. The former of these in the Vatican MS. discovered by Tischendorf bears like the Greek original, the name of Thomas
The latter, printed also by Tischendorf from a Vatican MS. (Cod. A), is improperly alleged by him to the Pseudo-Mattheus, and regarded as the second part of the History of the Infancy of Mary and the Saviour (c. p. 87-105, 2nd ed.
pp. 93-112). A mixed text formed from both these translations is found in a Parker MS. (Cod.
1652) of the 11th century (D op. Thilis); from which Thilo was the first to give some extracts (c. p. viii. sqq.). This Paris MS. contains, in the first instance (like the Vatican Cod. A), the histories of the childhood as given by the Pseudo-Mattheus (cc. 1-24), and then the histories contained in the Gospel of St.
Thomas, partly from the text of Tischendorf's Thomas Latina (cc. 25-40, 42, 48); partly from the second Latin translation of Cod. A misattributed by Tischendorf to the Pseudo-Mattheus (cc. 43-47); and, finally, in part,
(c. 41), from a third reception. The Lauretine of Ambrosius MS. moreover (Tischendorf's Cod. 99), contains super-added, in the margin, values, exhibiting in those portions, which are peculiar to it, the character of a later text.
To all these helps and sources most fully be added the Syriac translation published by Wright (c. with English version, pp. 6-11), and commencing with the second chapter of our Gospel. The text exhibited by this Syriac version occupies a middle place between that of the Greek reception A and that of the two Latin versions. In both those versions the Gospel of Thomas is preceded by histories of our Lord's residence in Egypt and of miracles there performed. The text represented by what Tischendorf calls Cod. Thomas Latina peoples the events of the period from the flight into Egypt to the return of the Holy Family to Nazareth, but merely in the form of a somewhat abrupt introduction which occupies the time first chapters; but that this did not originally form part of the Evangelion Thomas is clear from the fact that the original text of Cod. A reads: "Gloriosum est narrare Thomam Israelitam et Apostolum Domini et de operibus Jesu postea esse est de Aegypto in Nazaret. Intellige omnes, frater carissimi, quae secut Domini Jesus quando fuit in civitate Nazaret; quod in primo capitolo." The story is continued in the Gospel of St. Thomas, we are given in the different texts a curiously varied form, some of them recurring even in the same MSS. in different reception.
The history of the master who has to teach the child Jesus the letters of the alphabet, may serve as an example (Comp. Iren. Her. I. 20).
The story is continued in the Acts of Thomas.
His master as to the mysterious significance of the characters before him, although we possess it in five different forms, is so thoroughly ruined, that its restoration must be despised of.
A series of these miracle-narratives are in the various texts located now in Egypt and now in Galilee. Such is the case with the story of the priesthood of Jesus, which is punished for the Greek text, and according to one class of narratives is the son of Hanno, and to another, the son of an idol-priest in Egypt. The scene, moreover, of the Galilean boy-deeds of Jesus is not unanimously laid by all the texts in Nazareth.
Some make the Holy Family remove at once from Egypt to Capernaum, and another who has a tell of various places of residence now at Nazareth, now at Capernum, and now at Bethleheh, distributes the miracle-narratives among them.
The arrangement and selection of the various texts differ widely in the several texts. One series of sections is only found in one other of the Latin versions, and others only in the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy of which we shall have to speak further on. Still less agreement will be found between the various documents as to single features of the narratives, the persons named, and the words attributed to them, etc. A great part of the miracles aaged to the child Jesus is borrowed from New Testament narratives, or at least from them, and likewise, many sayings attributed are undetermined as of well-known utterances in the prophetic ages; c. e. the answer given by Jesus to His master: "Thou knowest not the nature of A and wilt thou teach others B? Then evil-critic I teach thee first what A is, and then will ye believe thee in respect to B." As to the child-life of Jesus, a small portion of them are miracles of healing, the greater number stroke of magic or miraculous inflictions of crueal punishment. Jesus makes arrows out cloth, and sets them fly away alive, brings to life a dried fish, dyes cloth, stretches out a belated, passes through the Jordan, carries water home in his trough, but with special frequency
He revenges Himself on those who mock or insult Him, smiting them with blindness or striking to the earth, causing them to wither or slaying them outright. The boy Jesus is almost everywhere a terror to those about Him. He is even occasionally banished with his parents from the house of the city, or rebuked by Joseph for his wanton cruelty, whereupon He immediately repairs the mischief by a fresh miracle.

The great acceptance of the book in various Gnostic circles is explained by its original Doctism, all traces of which the Catholic editors or revisers of the present text were unable to eradicate. The numerous miracles related of our Lord have all one tendency—to assign to the child Jesus as He was divine, omnipotence and omniscience, and reducing all human development to mere appearance. The child Jesus knows Himself already to have been born of God. The Rädrig of St. Joseph's, and Siche's Latin version was printed by Fabricius (Cod. apocr. N. T. l. pp. 188-211), and after him by Jones and Schmidt. Thilo (l. c. pp. 63-138) republished the Arabic and Latin texts with corrections (pp. 171-202, 2nd ed. pp. 181-209) the Latin text only, with corrections here and there by Fleischer. The book announces itself as a composition derived from older sources (cc. 1, 25, 55) and is divided into two parts. The first part (cc. 1-25) is a recension of the Evangelium Infantis attributed to the high priest Joseph of Edessa (Thilo, l. c. pp. 25-55) and is probably the same as the Gnostic work made use of in the Proteranganism, and which bore the name of Joseph (not Caiphas, of course, but the husband of Mary). The original work appears to have been nearly related, for the first three or four chapters, to the Proteranganism of St. James, and the latter two, to the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew. It contained also the miracles attributed to the child Jesus during the residence in Egypt. The second part (cc. 26-55) is derived from a recension of the Gospel of St. Thomas, which seems to have differed in various particulars from the other texts which we possess, and, in some places, to have approached more to the original (Gnostic) work. Some of these narratives are given here (as is the case with the Greek and Latin MSS.) in a double form (comp. c. 36 with cc. 46, 47, and cc. 41, 42 with c. 43). The process of Catholicizing has, on the other hand, introduced some minor modifications or in the connexion of parts. The miraculous narratives are, according to resemblances in their contents, arranged in pairs; several particulars appear to have been derived from oral tradition (comp. c. 5), and the compiler seems to have taken a special delight in references to transactions and persons mentioned in the canonical gospels. The child Jesus, they maintain, must certainly have worked some miracles in order to rebuke the Gnostic error, which made the Christ to descend upon Him for the first time at His baptism. In this way is explained how, notwithstanding the opposition to which we have referred, these facts of the childhood also find nevertheless find approval and acceptance among Catholic readers. The Gnostic book of St. Thomas was accordingly dressed up for the use and benefit of the Catholic people by careful revision of all manifestly heretical passages, and various extracts and abridgements were also put in circulation, so that the attractive miracle legends were carefully preserved. Compared with the original compass of the work which, according to the stichometry of Nicephorus (see Credner, Geschichte des Kanons, p. 122 sq.), contained 1300 stichoi, the existing remains of the Gospel of St. Thomas must be regarded as mere fragments.

GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL 705

S. The Arabic Gospel of the Childhood (Evangelium Infantis Arabicum) is a Catholic recension of all the stories of the childhood from the birth of Jesus till His twelfth year. It is a special favourite with the Nestorians of Syria. The Arabic text is a translation from the Syriac, and the existing MSS. of the Syriac text have not been edited. The book was first published in Arabic and Latin, with copious notes by Heinrich Sike (Utrecht, 1697). Sike's Latin version was republished by Fabricius (Cod. apocr. N. T. l. pp. 188-211), and after him by Jones and Schmidt. Thilo (l. c. pp. 63-138) republished the Arabic and Latin texts with corrections (pp. 171-202, 2nd ed. pp. 181-209) the Latin text only, with corrections here and there by Fleischer. The book announces itself as a composition derived from older sources (cc. 1, 25, 55) and is divided into two parts. The first part (cc. 1-25) is a recension of the Evangelium Infantis attributed to the high priest Joseph of Edessa (Thilo, l. c. pp. 25-55) and is probably the same as the Gnostic work made use of in the Proteranganism, and which bore the name of Joseph (not Caiphas, of course, but the husband of Mary). The original work appears to have been nearly related, for the first three or four chapters, to the Proteranganism of St. James, and the latter two, to the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew. It contained also the miracles attributed to the child Jesus during the residence in Egypt. The second part (cc. 26-55) is derived from a recension of the Gospel of St. Thomas, which seems to have differed in various particulars from the other texts which we possess, and, in some places, to have approached more to the original (Gnostic) work. Some of these narratives are given here (as is the case with the Greek and Latin MSS.) in a double form (comp. c. 36 with cc. 46, 47, and cc. 41, 42 with c. 43). The process of Catholicizing has, on the other hand, introduced some minor modifications or in the connexion of parts. The miraculous narratives are, according to resemblances in their contents, arranged in pairs; several particulars appear to have been derived from oral tradition (comp. c. 5), and the compiler seems to have taken a special delight in references to transactions and persons mentioned in the canonical gospels. The child Jesus, they maintain, must certainly have worked some miracles in order to rebuke the Gnostic error, which made the Christ to descend upon Him for the first time at His baptism. In this way is explained how, notwithstanding the opposition to which we have referred, these facts of the childhood also find nevertheless find approval and acceptance among Catholic readers. The Gnostic book of St. Thomas was accordingly dressed up for the use and benefit of the Catholic people by careful revision of all manifestly heretical passages, and various extracts and abridgements were also put in circulation, so that the attractive miracle legends were carefully preserved. Compared 197). In contrast with those of the Gospel of St. Thomas, these Egyptian miracles are chiefly characterized as works of healing wrought by water in which the child Jesus had been washed, or by articles of His clothing, from which we may infer that they were not originally connected with the former, but derived from some independent source. This must also have originated in Gnostic circles, though it is to be remarked that the Arabic gospel lays special emphasis on the true humanity of Jesus (c. 30).

Its date of composition is comparatively late, being placed in the 2nd century after the Martyrdom of St. Thomas. The statement (c. 7) that Zachariathas had foretold the coming of the Messiah seems to imply the continued maintenance of the Persian religion and worship (comp. Schade, I. c. p. 5).

The reckoning of dates by the era of Alexander (c. 2) held its ground among the Syrians till late in the middle age, and cannot, therefore, be used here as a determinate chronology. The book bears the character of a factual lection for St. Joseph’s day (cf. cc. 26, 30 and Thilo, p. xx sq.) and is a recast made from older sources. It narrates the history of Joseph, who appears at once as a priest and a descendant from David, till his death, which is said to have taken place in the 13th year of the reign of Tiberius. The name of our Lord’s month, which is represented as having imparted it to His disciples on the Mount of Olives. At the opening and conclusion of the whole work the disciples appear as narrators. The section which treats of Joseph’s betrothal with Mary, the birth of Jesus, and the pursuit of the child by Herod (cc. 3-9) is nearly related to the Procopioyan, but appears not to have been borrowed from it. That the Gospel of Thomas was also used is evident from c. 17 where there is an allusion to the narrative in Ec. Thomae, 4, 5 (cf. 16). The histories of Joseph are also preserved in the Coptic Language, and in both dialects, Sahidic and Mophitic. The extracts and fragments communicated by Zoega and Dulauger from the yet untranslated MSS. (op. Thilo, p. xxii. sq. Thienedorf’s notes under the text) prove that the Arabic text was a recension of the Coptic. The latter exhibits traces of a Gnostic origin. The use made of the Gospel of Thomas is here still more evident: Joseph remembers with sorrow that he had once pulled the child Jesus by the ear; the Arabic history holding this for unseemly softens it down into a seizing of his hand. Of special interest is the description in the Coptic text of the departure of Joseph’s soul, of which the Arabic gives only a meagre abstract (cc. 21-23). The Coptic here describes the approach of death, Orcus, and the devil, with innumerable aëons, to take possession of the departing soul, the driving away of these fearful beings by Jesus, the descent at His intercession of Michael and Gabriel with the choir of archangels, who receive the parting soul and conduct it safely through the seven aëons of darkness. This narrative appears to have formed the living nucleus of the original faith. Its Gnostic character cannot be doubted.

Whether the narratives in the first chapters of our Arabic text, which conduct the history of Joseph down to his dying hour, existed in its original work, can be determined after a complete publication of the Coptic manuscripts. According to Zoega’s extracts, the Coptic text appears to begin at the fourteenth chapter, and at exactly this point the Arabic exhibits distinct traces of the manipulation of an older document. Although in preceding and following passages Jesus is the central personage of the narrative (cf. Thilo, p. xx sq.), its original work goes as far back as the 3rd century.

A quite peculiar position is assumed by 7. The Departure of Mary (κολασθείς ης Ἐλασίου τις Μαδαλάζδις ιναις, Τρανσίτις Μαρίας) a work attributed to the apostle St. John and handed down in various forms—Arabic, Coptic, Sahidic, and Sahidic. The Greek text was first published by Tischendorf (Apocryphes apocryphi, pp. 95-112) from several manuscripts. Of the same work exist still in MS. two later recensions in Greek: one entitled Ἐγκύκλιοι τῆς κοιλασθείης τῆς Παραγγελίας τοῦ θεουργοῦ, by the patriarch Euthymius of Jerusalem (beginning of 7th century); comp. Photius Biblioth. cod. 273, the other the Λόγος τῆς κοιλασθείης τῆς Παραγγελίας Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν of archbishop John of Thessalonica (end of 7th century, comp. Tischendorf, I. c. p. xxxviii. sq.). This work of the late 7th century bears, like the former, in several MSS. the name of the apostle, but is rightly distinguished from it by the monk Epiphanius of Salamis, who lived in the 10th century (Epiphanius Monach. ed. Dressel, p. 14). The narrative contained in the Greek Apocrypha and found up in various ways form the groundwork of the festive homilies of St. John Damascene, Germanus Constantinopolitanus, Andreas Cretensis, and others (Thilo, Prolegom. ad Acta Thomae, p. 195). Latin texts were known as early as the 9th century. Pope Gelasius in his Dicta Johni libris recipiendis, reckons the “liber qui appellatur Transitus Mariae apocryphus” among those which are rejected by the church. One of the late Latin recensions which still exist bears its title from the name of bishop Melito of Sardis, the same who is also named as the alleged author of the apocryphal Acts Johannis. The title which takes the form of a letter addressed by Melito to the church of Laodicea, defines the object of the work to be to counteract a certain orthodox narrative derived by oral tradition from the apostle St. John the influence of an heretical book bearing the same title, whose author Leucius claims also to be a disciple of the apostles. The text was published in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima Lugdunensis (i. 2. pp. 212-216) and elsewhere, and finally by Tischendorf from a Venetian MS. (L. c. pp. 124-136, Transitus Mariae B) which however does not contain the epistle of the pseudo-Melito.
