Another Latin recension widely differing from this was published also by Tischendorf (as Transitus Mariæ, pp. 113-123) from three MSS. The same object as that aimed at in the work of Pseudo-Melito is that also of the Seminar i d'Assumption B. V. M. et Pandæm et Evætonum, attributed to St. Jerome (Hieron. Op. c. 1). The various circumstances in the life and passion of the apostle Melito betray, a Catholicizing recast of an heretical work. Whether the alleged disciple of the apostles, Lecius Charius, did, as "Melito" reports, compose the original work in his own name, or whether from the first it was entitled after the apostle St. John, can no longer be ascertained. The latter supposition is the more probable. This heretical Apocryphon is probably the same as that mentioned by Pseudo-Jerome, and in the Decretum Gelasianum. Various traces lead to the conjecture that it probably proceeded from the same Gnostic circles as the gospels of the infancy and the Gnostic Acta Apostololorum in some correct form. In a fragment of the second book of this work was published by Cureton in his Ancient Syriac Documents (p. 110 of the English translation). Related to this second recension, but also older and more original is the text (Syr. C) of the fragments also published by professor Wright in his Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, pp. 34-41. To these thesehms of recensions must finally be added the also fragmentary Oneesches of Mary (Wright, Contributions, pp. 42-51). The Arabic text published by Maximilian Eger (Joannis apostoli de Transitus Beatae Mariæ Virginis libri, 1854) is nearly related to Syr. B and C. A Sahidic version moreover exists of a text which appears to differ from all. It is called the 'third recension' of Zoroa. It has been published particularly in the Cod. Civid. Cap. Borgiae, p. 224, num. xvi. (comp. Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxvii.) There exists finally in Ethiopic a Vīnas Marīne Virginīs (Dillmann, Cod. p. 22) which is nearly related to the sixth book of the second Syriac recension. This second, namely, how many rests over the guidance of her divine son, visits the habitation of the blessed and of the lost. The same subject is also dealt with in several Greek MSS. of an Apocryphas Marīae (Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxvii. sq.). The original text of the Transitus Marīae, which seems to have been preserved (approximately) in the Greek text and those of the two Syriac recensions B and C, treated of the last events in the life of Mary—her last visit to the Holy Sepulchre, the Jewish plots against her, her prayers to be taken away from earth, her return to Bethlehem, the miraculous assemblage of the apostles in her chamber, her transport to Jerusalem and fresh miracles wrought after her death. The passion of Christ, at her dying bed, her death and burial. Her soul, according to the promise of her divine son, is received up into Heaven while her body is taken to Paradise. The miraculous resurrection of the Virgin's body is found only in later texts, the assumption into heaven is related only in the Latin copies. A comparison of the various texts proves that the original narrative was now abbreviated and new enlarged in manifold ways with all manner of foreign additions and strange ornaments. Especially remarkable in this respect is the Book of the Oneesches of Mary. It tells, for instance, of a strife taking place among the apostles (when assembled in Mary's presence) concerning the true gospel and of its being decided by Christ Himself in favour of St. Paul. It relates also how after the transport of Mary into Paradise, not she but the apostles visited the lower world.

The Kolonjon Mapsia in all the various forms in which we possess it professes, as that the original recension of this apocryphal was composed by St. John, can no longer be ascertained. The above supposition is the more probable. This heretical Apocryphon is probably the same as that mentioned by Pseudo-Jerome, and in the Decretum Gelasianum. Various traces lead to the conjecture that it probably proceeded from the same Gnostic circles as the gospels of the infancy and the Gnostic Acta Apostololorum. In some correct form. In a fragment of the second book of this work was published by Cureton in his Ancient Syriac Documents (p. 110 of the English translation). Related to this second recension, but also older and more original is the text (Syr. C) of the fragments also published by professor Wright in his Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, pp. 34-41. To these thesehms of recensions must finally be added the also fragmentary Oneesches of Mary (Wright, Contributions, pp. 42-51). The Arabic text published by Maximilian Eger (Joannis apostoli de Transitus Beatae Mariæ Virginis libri, 1854) is nearly related to Syr. B and C. A Sahidic version moreover exists of a text which appears to differ from all. It is called the 'third recension' of Zoroa. It has been published particularly in the Cod. Civid. Cap. Borgiae, p. 224, num. xvi. (comp. Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxvii.) There exists finally in Ethiopic a Vīnas Marīne Virginīs (Dillmann, Cod. p. 22) which is nearly related to the sixth book of the second Syriac recension. This second, namely, how many rests over the guidance of her divine son, visits the habitation of the blessed and of the lost. The same subject is also dealt with in several Greek MSS. of an Apocryphas Marīae (Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxvii. sq.). The original text of the Transitus Marīae, which seems to have been preserved (approximately) in the Greek text and those of the two Syriac recensions B and C, treated of the last events in the life of Mary—her last visit to the Holy Sepulchre, the Jewish plots against her, her prayers to be taken away from earth, her return to Bethlehem, the miraculous assemblage of the apostles in her chamber, her transport to Jerusalem and fresh miracles wrought after her death. The passion of Christ, at her dying bed, her death and burial. Her soul, according to the promise of her divine son, is received up into Heaven while her body is taken to Paradise. The miraculous resurrection of the Virgin's body is found only in later texts, the assumption into heaven is related only in the Latin copies. A comparison of the various texts proves that the original narrative was now abbreviated and new enlarged in manifold ways with all manner of foreign additions and strange ornaments. Especially remarkable in this respect is the Book of the Oneesches of Mary. It tells, for instance, of a very early, as we find from Tertullian (Apol. 21), that the procurator himself became a convert to Christianity. It was consequently assumed that his report to the emperor must have contained a witness, not only to the innocence of Jesus, but to His divine mission also, His miracles, and resurrection. From such conjectures to the evidence of various documents by Christian authors was a mere step. The oldest of these which has come down to us appears to be the Epistle of Pontius Pilate to the emperor Claudius, incorporated in the apocryphal Acts of St. Peter and St. Paul (Greek text in Tischendorf, Acts apost. apocr. p. 16 sq.), and also found in a Latin version both in Pseudo-Marcellus (i.e. the Latin version of the so-called Acta Marcelli), and the spurious Ἀναφορὰς λαοῦ at the end of the fifth book of Pseudo-Hegesippus de Excidio Hierosol., as well as in the so-called Evangelium Nicodemi (of which we shall have to speak hereafter), to which it is appended in several Latin MSS. (last reprint in Tischendorf, Evang. apocr. p. 413 sq., 2nd ed. p. 433 sq.). The mistaken address to the emperor Claudius is explained by reference to the primeval Ebionitic Acts of Peter, which formed the basis of the later Acts of Peter and Paul, and represented the prince of the apostles as having come to Rome under the emperor Claudius for the purpose of opposing the machinations of Simon Magus.
The epistle can, however, hardly have been preserved in its original form, and in the oldest text from which the Acts of Peter drew, was probably addressed to the emperor Tiberius.

Of much more recent origin is the Ἀναφορὰ Παλατίου which has come down to us in two reductions (both reprinted in Tischendorf, Evang. apocr. p. 418 sq., 2nd ed. p. 433 sq.). This work presupposes the existence of the Gesta Pilati, of which we shall have to speak presently, and cannot have been composed before the second half of the 5th century. In the MSS. which we possess, it forms one whole with the παράξενος Παλατίου, which contains the oldest form of the Pilate-legend. It relates how Pilate was by the emperor Claudius sent to Rome to settle the part which he had taken in the crucifixion of our Lord, how he was thereupon tried and beheaded, but at the same time was received by Christ Himself among the blessed for the sake of his penitent and faithful confession (ap.
Tischendorf, l. c. p. 426 sq. 2nd ed. p. 449 sq.).

A forgery of later origin is the Latin Epistola Pilati ad Tiberium (Tischendorf l. c. p. 411 sq.
2nd ed. p. 433 sq.).

The most important and most widely disseminated writing of this class—the Gesta or Acta Pilati—is better known under a title which it probably first obtained in the course of the middle age, that of the Gospel of Nicodemus. Its cor-correct designation is Προμηθεύς του Κεφος του Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ προμηθεύς του Παλατίου.

It has come down to us in two Greek recensions (Gr. A and Gr. B, Tischendorf, l. c. pp. 203–311, 2nd ed. p. 210 sqq. and p. 287 sqq.), and also in Latin under the title of Gesta Salvatoris; and from c. 12 onwards, likewise in two recensions (Tischendorf, l. c. pp. 312–410, 2nd ed. p. 333 sq., p. 389 sq. p. 417 sq.). Besides these there exists also a Coptic version published by Peyron.

Peyron's Latin translation of the Coptic text is also reprinted entire by Tischendorf in his notes (2nd ed.) to the Greek text. The work is divided into two parts, of which the former narrative, with apologetic purpose, and on the basis of our four canonical gospels, but with numerous apocryphal additions, the history of our Lord's trial, condemnation, and crucifixion, while the latter is intended to establish the truth of His resurrection by the testimonies of various eyewitnesses. Tertullian's opinion, wherein he has been followed by Rudolf Hofmann and others, these Acts of Pilate must have been already known to Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Eusebius. Further inquiry, however, leads to quite a different result. Even on the assumption that Justin Martyr did make use of a spurious document that announced itself as the official report of our Lord's trial, drawn up by or under the direction of Pilate, it certainly cannot have been identical with our Acts of Pilate, since the particulars which Justin is supposed to have derived therefrom are nowhere to be found in our Acts. Neither do Tertullian's statements (Apol. 21, cf. 5) as to the contents of the Tiberian Acts. These Tiberian Acts, according to Tertullian, contain anything which specially belongs to our Acts of Pilate, while referring to several particulars that were not to be found in them at all. Even Hilgenfeld's and Volkmar's opinion, that our Acts may be a recast of an older work which Justin and Tertullian made use of, is improbable. For it is incredible that the statements found in Justin and Tertullian, who had really been derived from the original groundwork of our present Acts, could have afterwards been so completely eliminated from them; and fully irreconcilable with the character and composition of the work before us is the further view maintained by both critics that all particulars derived from the Gospel of St. John which it now contains are insertions of a more recent interpolator. Finally, both Justin Martyr and Tertullian imply the existence of a document drawn up in the form of official An praecedentia; this is not applicable to our Acts of Pilate, which themselves indicate Nicodemus as their author. Supposing, then, these fathers really had the document to answer to the former, as it appears, in his hands, it must have borne a similar character to the already mentioned Epistola Pilati of Claudium, though, doubtless, with a correct address indicating it as a report made to the emperor Tiberius. We know for certain that in Tertullian's time (and it is possible that also in Justin Martyr's) a document of this kind was really in circulation among the Christians. The church-historian (Eusebius), moreover (H. E. i.
2), and a sermon attributed to Simon Cephas as preached in the city of Rome (ap. Curet., Ancient Syriac Documents, p. 35 sqq. of the English translation) mention indeed an official report as made by Pilate to Tiberius, but exhibit no acquaintance with our Acts. Eusebius seems rather to have derived the document from Tertullian, and the Syriac author his from the ancient Acta Petri. On the other hand Eusebius mentions (H. E. ix. 5 and 7; cf. i. 9 and 11) certain Acts of Pilate which he designates as pagan forgeries "full of every kind of blasphemy against Christ," composed in the time of the Galerian persecution and distributed by decree of the emperor Maximinus in every part of the empire, with orders that the children in the schools should be made to learn them by heart. These Acts were GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL

Therefore, composed between the years A.D. 307 and A.D. 315, and probably after the Tetrarchic Act of Galerius (A.D. 311) which Maximinus had refused to accept. The first trace of any reference to our present Acts will be found in the Encomium of Epiphanius (A.D. 370) who states that the Quartodecimans appealed to a statement in Acts 20:17 as the correct one of their determination of the day of the passion. The statement is actually found in our present Acts.

As to the composition of this work the first Greek recension (Gr. A) comprises in our present MSS. sixteen chapters, of which cc. 1-11 treat of the passion, cc. 12-16 of the resurrection of Jesus. The book has two different introductions. The first designates Aeneas, a contemporary of the emperor Theodosius II. and of Valentinian III., as translator of the following treatise from the Hebrew. The second begins with fixing the date of our Lord's death, and adds the statement that Nicodemus had written an account of the Hebrew language of the events which followed the crucifixion according to the passion of our Lord. The second Greek recension (Gr. B) —under the title of Διώγγειος περί τοῦ πάθους του Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ τῆς ἀγίας αὐτοῦ σαρκός—treats of the same subject; but adds eleven more chapters (cc. 17-27) at the end. These chapters contain an account of events dependent on the death of the two Gemini, this was very variously dated by later authors (compare Epiphanius, Hær. li. 23; Chron. Paschale, pp. 398, 391, ed. Bonn; Acta Barsimaei, ap. Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents, p. 72 of the English translation). The Gentile Acts of Pilate, on the other hand, know nothing as yet of the Eusebian chronology. This suffices to prove that our Christian Acts must, even as to their oldest text, be more recent than the Gentile ones, and that the latter could not have been written, as Tischendorf assumes, in order to supersede the former, but that the opposite assumption is the only one possible. The original text of our Acts must therefore have been written by the Roman ecclesiastical publication of Eusebius's Church History (A.D. 320) and perhaps some decades later still, in the time of the emperor Julian (A.D. 361-363). With this agrees a whole series of linguistic and other peculiarities which all indicate a time subsequent to that of Constantine the Great. (Compare Lipsius, Die Papyrusschriften, 1871.)

The next recension of the text is the Latin, the Collectio Christiani ad Inform. added since the year A.D. 425, must have been originally an independent work, and was probably of Gnostic origin. According to the text of Lat. B, the two resuscitated mortals who relate the deeds of Christ in the lower world bear the names of Leucius and Karinus. Behind these names lies hidden that of Lecinias Charinus, the well-known author of numerous Gnostic apocryphal writings. There are moreover several traces in the work itself of a Gnostic origin, which may, perhaps, be referred as far back as to the former half of the 3rd century; whereas the present text cannot certainly be older than the latter half of the 4th.

Among apocryphal gospels now lost or existing only in fragments, must be first considered those which once possessed more or less authority even in Catholic circles. These are four in number, the Gospel of the Hebrews, the Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of the Egyptians, and the Diatessaron of Tatian.

(1.) The Gospel of the Hebrews (Ἑβραϊκὸν κεφάλιον κατὰ Ἑβραίους, i.e. the Gospel used by the Hebrews or Jewish Christians of Palestine and Syria, to whom the Aramaic was their mother-tongue) was reckoned by many, according to Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25) among the Homologomena of the New Testament, but was placed among the Antilegomena, by Eusebius himself and in the stichometry of Nicephorus. It owes the high honour in which it was once held to the fact that it was almost universally regarded in the first centuries as the Hebrew original of our canonical Gospel of St. Matthew (Hieronym. tr. xii. 1; cf. Euseb. Hist. xiii. 11. and Porph. Cata. iv. illustr. 3). This opinion was transmitted by the Jewish Christians or Ebionites, among whom the gospel commonly went by the title of The Gospel of St. Matthew, to Catholic Christians, and was by these last in consequence interchangeably designated by both names. (Irenaeus, Haer. i. 26, 2; ii. 11, 7; Epiphanius, Haer. xxviii. 5; xxx. 3, 13, 14; Philaster, Haer. 38; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. ii. 1; comp. Eusebius, H. E. iii. 25, 27; Epiph. Haer. xxix. 9; xxx. 6, etc.) Papias is an early witness for St. Matthew having written in Hebrew (ap. Euseb. iii. 39) and the same tradition is repeated by Irenaeus (ibid.); and Tertullian (ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 10). Origen (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 25); Eusebius (H. E. iii. 24, and elsewhere); Jerome (in Matth. Proefat. et passim); Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. iv.). The existence of this Gospel of the Hebrews as a distinct work, differing from our canonical Gospel of St. Matthew, is first put on record by Clemens Alexandrinus Strom. ii. 8; p. 455 Potter) and by Origen who makes several citations from it (in Joann. tom. ii. 6; in Jerem. xv. 4; in Matth. tom. xv. 14). Hegesippus is also reported to have borrowed some things from the Gospel of the Hebrews (Euseb. H. E. iv. 22). According to Origen (Hom. i. in Luc.) and Jerome (in Acta Io. Apoc. 12, 10), it also bore among the Ebionites the title of Gospel according to the Apolutes. Jerome translated it into Greek and Latin from a copy found at Beroea (Vir. illustr. 2, 3; ad Mich. vii. 2; in Matth. xii. 13; contra Pelagiam. iii. 1). The distinction which Hilgenfeld has proposed to make between a Hebrew Gospel of the Nazarenes and a Greek Gospel of the Ebionites (vid. Nowum Testamentum extram. curiosi) rests from its being an error to regard only the Essene Jewish Christians as Ebionites, and to designate all the rest as Nazarenes, it is evident that Jerome knew nothing as yet of any such Greek Gospel, while, on the other hand, he makes the remark that the Hebrew or Aramaic text which he translated was in use both among Nazarenes and Ebionites (in Matth. xii. 13). And yet of this text Greek versions must have existed at a very early date; for not Epiphanius only but Eusebius also makes all his quotations from such a version. It is moreover highly probable that Jewish Christians themselves, if not resident in Palestine or Syria, read the gospel in Greek.

With regard to the form and structure of this Gospel of the Hebrews it is somewhat difficult to arrive at any judgment by means of the scattered fragments which alone have been preserved. One thing is certain, that at various times and in different circles it took very different shapes. According to Epiphanius (Haer. xxx. 13, 14) the gospel commenced thus:—"Εضلην αυτον εν ταυτη δαφθον ταυτης των ιουδαιων, ήλεγε τις λογοττις αληθες ουκατις Βασιλειων Βαστυνομια; metanolas ev tê gi' hodojv paraqem. From this it is evident that in the text which Epiphanius quotes from, and which was in use among gnosticizing Jewish Christians, the chapters relating to our Lord's genealogy, His birth, and childhood, must have been wanting. Other accounts inform us, however, that in the text used by Cerinthus and Carpocrates, while all reference to the genealogy is wanting, there is an account of a supernatural birth, the genealogy (Matt. i. 1–17) was given, concluding (we may conjecture) with the words, Ἰζεβελ ημετρεται τὸν Ἰωάννην (comp. Epiphanius, Haer. xxviii. 5; iii. 3, 14, with Hilgenfeld's remarks, l. c. p. 17). The history of our Lord's baptism in the Jordan was also differently related in different texts (Epiph. Haer. xxx. 13; cf. Hieron. c. Pelag. iii. 2; ad Jesai. xi. 1). These discrepancies prove the existence in early times, not indeed of different works bearing the same title, but of different redactions of one and the same original work. The fragments preserved in the Greek Epiphanius knew very carefully their dependence on our canonical gospels, though it is impossible, on the other hand, to prove that the Hebrew text was a translation back into Aramaic from the Greek. The Aramaic fragments also contain much that can be explained and understood only on the hypothesis that it is a recasting of the canonical text. It is moreover manifest that the recension used by these Jewish Christians who are called by Epiphanius "Ebionites" (and whom we may designate as "Gnostic" or, more properly, "Essene") Judaizers is the result of various alterations, all breathing more or less sectarian Essene spirit, e.g., the saying, "I am come to put an end to sacrifices, and if ye cause not to suffer them, lo! I will come from you." (Epiph. Haer. xxii. 16). Again: "Have I then desired to keep this passover with you by eating flesh?" (Epiph. Haer. xxx. 22). The working of the same spirit is manifested in the substitution of "ολοκλήρωσις" (ολοκλήρωσις) for the "λογοττα" (λογοττα) of Matt. iii. 4. The narrative of our Lord's baptism (Ippianus, Haer. xxx. 13), with its threefold voice from heaven, is also rare. Apart from recent collections of older texts, of which the first is found in the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke; the second in the text of the Cambridge Cod. Bezae at St. Luke iii. 22; in Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryphon, 88, 103), and Clemens Alexandrinus (Prolog. i. 6, p. 113, Potter); the third in our canonical Gospel of St. Matthew. And this very narrative can suffice to prove that the so-called "Hebrew" text preserved by St. Jerome is by no means preferable to that of our canonical Gospel of St. Matthew, and even less original than the Greek text quoted by Epiphanius. Instead of the voice from heaven we have here an address made to Christ by the Holy Spirit, and in the place of the descent in dove-like form the Holy Spirit upon Him a theological theory as to the Spirit's relation to the prophets and to Jesus. "It came to pass as the Lord ascended up out of the water, that the whole fountain of the Holy Spirit came down and rested upon Him, and said to Him: 'My son, in all the prophets I waited for Thee till Thou shouldst come, and I might rest upon Thee!' For Thou art My rest, Thou art my first-born son, who reignest for evermore.'" (Hieron. ad Jesai. xi. 1). With this should be compared the quotation in Origen (in Jesu, tom. ii, 6; Jerome, iv. 4), which is repeated also by St. Jerome (in Mich. vii, 6; in Jesu. xi 12); "Then laid hold of me my mother the Holy Spirit by one of my hairs and carried me up into the great mountain of Tabor."
GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL

This passage also presupposes a theological theory as to the relation of the Holy Spirit (The Divine Father) to the Person of the Messiah. Yet more decisively manifest is the reflex of a later time in the narrative of Jesus being driven by His mother, St. Mary, to baptism almost against His will. When His mother and brethren say to Him, "John the Baptist is baptizing for the forgiveness of sins," Christ says in reply,
"What sin have I committed that I should go to be baptized of him,—unless it be that this very word is a sin of ignorance on my part?"
This narrative discusses a problem as remote as possible from the simple sphere of thought in which the original gospel moves.

Other tokens may also be discovered that the Gospel of the Hebrews must have undergone numerous reconstructions of the original text.
Such, for instance, must have been the case with the narrative concerning the vocation of the twelve apostles. St. Matthew is introduced, speaking in the first person, and Jesus Himself as addressing him (Epiphani. Haer. xxx. 13); so also with the appeal made to Jesus by the man with the withered hand: "I was a stonemason, and sought to maintain myself by the work of my own hands. I pray thee, Jesus, heal me that I may not shamefully have to beg (Hieron. on Jn. i. 3). To this man Jesus was the ideal of the reading at Matt. xxii. 33. (Zachariah filius Jasina), which is based upon an erroneous correction. To the same category belong such narratives as these:—That on the death of Jesus Christ the upper lintel of the Temple ("super-luminare Tempi infinitae magnitudinis") was broken (Hieron. Haer. iv. 42; Matt. xxi. 42; Jn.
12. 20 et alibi), that the risen Jesus gave His linen grave-clothes to the servant of the high-priests, that James, the Lord's brother, bound himself with an oath at the last supper to eat not the smallest piece of bread henceforth till he had seen Jesus risen, and that the risen Lord had appeared to James the Just, His brother, and thus addressed him while offering him a portion of the broken bread: "My brother, eat thy bread, because the Son of Man is risen from among them that sleep" (Hieron. Vit. illust. 2).

In all these cases, and the number might be increased by further instances, it is evident that an older narrative has received apocryphal additions.

But hereby it is by no means proved that the Gospel of the Hebrews has in no case preserved what was strictly speaking original.
Apart from the numerous sayings which either literally, or almost literally, agree with those of our canonical St. Matthew (and the number of these was probably much greater than the fathers have reported), there are also various traces of very old traditions, among which must be reckoned that of the flame burning forth over the Jordan at our Lord's baptism (Epiphani.
Haer. xxx. 13; cf. Justin M. C. Tryph. 88; Orac.
Sibyll. vii. 81 sqq.; Prædic. Pauli ap. Pseudo-Cyprian. de Rebus dans.) the words of the second voice from heaven (comp. Psalm ii. 7), and a whole series of fragments, for most of which we have ancient testimonies, which exhibit a remarkable agreement with our Gospel of St. Luke. Such are the sayings about being reconciled with the adversary, and the seven-fold forgiveness of the erring brother (Carpon. ap. Hr. xio. 4; Epiph. Tryph.
xxx. 1; Hieron. c. Justin. iii. 2; comp. Luke xii.
58; xvii. 3, 4); the history of the woman accused of many 37 sqq.; the discourse with the two rich men (Origen in Matt. tom. xiv. 14), immediately followed by these saying about the children of 22; x. 25 sqq.; xvi. 19 sqq.; the parable of the three servants who each receive a talent, and the description of the prodigal (vii 18 sq.)), 30 (Euseb. Theophan. in Nicola Patr. Bibl. tom. iv.
Rom. 1447, p. 155), to which may be added the appearance of the risen Jesus to St. Peter, the invitation to touch and handle the Lord's body, the eating and drinking (comp. Luke xxiv.
34, 39 sqq.; Ignat. ad Smyrn. 3). The appearance of our Lord to James is, apart from the mention of it by St. Paul (1 Cor. iv. 7), recorded nowhere else but in the Gospel of the Hebrews. In the case of several of the Lord's sayings, such as the agreeing with the adversary, and of forgiveness, it seems natural to conjecture a combination of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and anyhow the concluding words of the second of these sayings—kyri oucoun eis tovs prwthsws in to the xronwn apostov en pneumatikin dyna koinwnta en apostov prwthsws in pneumatikin dyna koinwnta en apostov —may have preserved, at least in some respects, an older text than that of our synoptical gospels, and a like conjecture may perhaps be hazarded in reference to the history of the two rich men and some other sayings attributed to our Lord.

The various contradictory phenomena can only be explained by the supposition that our Gospel of the Hebrews in the form in which it was read by Epiphanius and Jerome, and even that in which Origen must have known it, was a re-cast of an older original that had passed through several hands. This original work was written in Hebrew, or, more correctly speaking, in Aramaic, and was nearly related on the one hand to the so-called Læva του κυρίου, which formed the basis of St. Matthew's Gospel, and on the other, to the Ebionitic writing made use of by St. Luke, which itself was only a later redaction of the Læva. The formation of this third recast, the same original, one might say a mid-position between the other two, must be sought, like that of the Ebionitic edition of the Læva, which we suppose to have been used In the form assumed by this gospel in the time of Origen, it already bears the character of a partisan work subservient to the dogmatic interest of a sect already separated from the Catholic Church. In the hands of the Christian Essenes it has undergone further alterations, some of which at least appear to indicate the existence of a Greek text at the time of their introduction.
Recent critics have been disposed to refer back to the Gospel of the Hébreos, a whole series of utterances attributed to our Lord, which either (like the oft-cited γενέθλιον δόκμων ἱστοριών) are not found in any one of our canonical gospels, or are perpetually and uniformly quoted by the authors of the 3rd and 4th centuries in a form different from that in which they are met with there. The former assumption is in many, if not in all, cases the most probable; to the latter may be opposed with equal right the possibility of different readings in the text of our gospels. Compare, for instance, the long most of the bearing on each other (Justin. Apol. i. 16; Clem. Hom. iii. 55; xix. 2; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 14, p. 707; vi. 11, p. 872; Potter) the injunction to the rich youth (Justin M. Dial. c. Tryph. 101; Marcossi ap. Iren. Haer. i. 20, 2; Naasseni ap. Pseudorig. Philos. v. 7, p. 102; Miller, Valentin. ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 20, p. 488, and again in 6 and 8, Procop. Strom. i. 13; xii. 1, 3); and, finally, the saying, No man hath known the Father but the Son &c. (Just. Apol. i. 63; Marcossi ap. Iren. Haer. i. 20, 3; Clem. Hom. xvii. 4; xvi. 4, 11, 13, 20; Marcion, in Dial. de recta Fide, sect. 1, in opp. Origen, ed. Lomn. xvi. 283; Justin M. Dial. 100; Tertull. adv. Marcion. cxxxi. 8; Clement in a later ecclesiastical Gospel, writers down to the beginning of the 3rd century made use of times of uncanonical gospels is now generally acknowledged. Justin Martyr, for instance, and the Clementine homilies certainly made use of one or more such along with the gospels of our canon. But the attempt to prove that the two writers had one such extraneous canonical common to them both, either in the Gospel of the Hébreos or in the Gospel of St. Peter (of which we shall speak presently) has altogether failed. It is only in the rarest cases that they literally agree in their deviations from the text of our gospels; they differ in their citations as much, for the most part, from the text of the synoptical evangelists, even in such cases when one or the other repeatedly quotes the same passage, and each time in the same words. Only in very few cases is the derivation from the Gospel of the Hébreos probable, as in the saying concerning the new birth (Justin M. Apol. i. 61; Clem. Homilies, xii. 26; Euseb. Eccl. vi. 9); in other cases where the text holds a mid-position between the Gospels of Matthew and Luke such derivation is at least possible; in most cases, however, it is quite enough to assume that the quotations were made from memory, and so account for the involuntary confusion of evangelistic texts.

(2) The Gospel of Peter (εὐαγγέλιον κατ' Ἐπιφανίου) is mentioned by Eusebius, who was bishop of Antiach at the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd century (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 12) and Origine (in Matt. tom. xvii. 10). The former relates that he had found this work in ecclesiastical use at Rhossus in Cilicia; that at first he had not made any objection to it, but had withdrawn on the advice of some of his bishops with its contents, forbidden its use; because, though for the most part orthodox, it yet favoured in some places the heretical views of the Docetae, whom he supposed to be in fact the followers of Marcion. This account makes it probable that this Gospel of Peter was a Gnostic recast of a canonical gospel. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25; comp. iii. 3) and after him Jerome (Vir. Illust. i.) and the Documenta Gelasii (c. 6) speak of it as an heretical work which no early teacher of the church had made use of. The statement of Theodotus (Mon. Eccl. ii. 21) that Origen had made use of this gospel rested probably on a mis-understanding. The passage moreover in Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. 106), in which some have thought to find mention of the Memoriae Peter, is very doubtful. Justin does indeed very frequently speak of the ἱστοριών τῆς Ἀρχαὶ and the way of knowing our Lord (ὁ γνωστὸς τοῦ Πέρου), and it is quite contrary to his practice to give any names to the evangelistic writings of which he makes use. In the passage in question the right reading is most probably not ἱστοριών τοῦ Πέρου (i.e. of Peter mentioned just before) but ἱστοριών τῆς Ἀρχαί (i.e. τῆς ἱστορίας as elsewhere). Herein fall to the lot of the Narrators. That Justin made the Gospel of Peter into an original work made use of by Justin Martyr, nigh related to the Gospel of the Hébreos, and either the Jewish-Christian basis of our canonical St. Mark, or, at any rate, the gospel of the Gnosticizing Ebionites. Neither does Origen’s statement that according to the Gospel of Jesus the Lord’s brethren were sons of Joseph by a former marriage well agree with the assumption of its Jewish-Christian character, as much as that statement presupposes not only the Lord’s supernatural birth (as actually received by some Ebionites in later times) but also the perpetual virginity of Mary. On this point the Gospel of Peter stood more probably in a near relation to the apocryphal gospels of the infancy.

(3) The Gospel of the Egyptians (Ἐκκλησίαι κατ' Ἐπιφανίου) was in special use in various heretical circles — e.g. among the Ebionites (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 9, p. 540 sq. Potter, 13 p. 553), Origen (Prolog. in Jo. Origen. p. 98, Miller) and the Sabellians (Epiph. Hist. xix. 2); but was also used without scruple in Catholic circles as authority for sayings attributed to our Lord, as for instance in the so-called second epistle of the Roman bishop Clement. It was already used, as we learn from Clemens Alex., by the Gnostic Julius Cassius, the head of the sect of so-called Ebionites, and is cited not only in the extracts from the writings of Theodotus found among the works of Clemens (c. 67, p. 985, Potter) but also in the Acts of Thomas (Wright, Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, p. 292 of the English translation) and by Pseudo-Linus de passione Petri et Pauli (Biblioth. Patr. Max. ii. p. 70 b). Origen (Hom. in Luc.) and Jerome (in Matt. praef.) mention it as an heretical writing. The fragments which have been preserved confirm this judgment. This gospel was a product of that pantheistic gnostics which we find among the Naassenes of the Philosophumena and some other kindred sects. According to this doctrine the soul is of pneumatic nature, but has sunk down into this lower world, the world of transient births, in which it undergoes the most manifold changes till finally redeemed and delivered by the gnostics. When a man has once obtained an insight into the unmanifesta character of all the distinctions which prevail among, and separate one from another, the things of this visible world, when he has learned to know that which is divided as one, and things separated as bound together, then has he become a partner of that gnostic which entitles him to enter into the kingdom of God or the upper spiritual world. In this sense must be understood the answer which Jesus makes in this gospel to the question as to when His kingdom will come: “When out of two has been made One, and the Outward has become as the Inward and the Male with the Female neither Male nor Female” (Clemens, ad Corinth. ii. c. 12, comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 13, p. 553; Massaer apud Pseudo-Orig. Philos. v. 7, p. 99, Miller; Acta Thomas, ap. Wright, l. c.). Similar to this is the saying preserved by Pseudo-Linus: “Unless ye make equal and alike the Right and the Left, the Left and the Right, Upper and Lower, Former and Hinder, ye cannot know ye face of God” (C. l. c. p. 70). Connected with this pantheistical mysticism is also a sort of practice which this gospel recommends. If the distinctions of sex are one day to cease, and the true gnostic imparts an insight into the vanity of such distinctions, the Encausite prohibition of marriage follows as a natural logical consequence. And so Christ is made to declare that it is the work of His mission to destroy the works of the female (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 9, p. 540). The words appear to have been taken from the discourse of Jesus with Salome, of which several other fragments have also been preserved. Salome asks: “How long shall Death reign?” and receives the answer: “So long as ye live, and the hither birth” she replies: “Then have I done well that I bare not,” and receives the further admonition: “Eat of every herb, but the bitter one eat not” (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 6, p. 532; iii. 9, p. 539, p. 541, ex Script. Theod. 67). If death is to last as long as child-bearing, it follows that the female nature must be destroyed, and it can be what is meant by eating the bitter herb. Jesus therefore is made to reply to a further question of Salome’s, the nature of which appears from the answer: “When ye tread under foot the covering of shame” (βαρν τὸ τίς αλεξίνης θέμα παντικού), i.e., when all distinctions of sex are done away. Whereupon followed the words already quoted: “When out of Two is made One,” &c. (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 13, p. 533).

There may be also other fragments of this Gospel of the Egyptian preserved in the second epistle of Clement and elsewhere. E.g. the saying: “Though ye be gathered in My bosom, if ye keep not My commandments I will cast you away, and make you workers of iniquity” (Clem. Ep. ii. c. 4), and the discourse with the disciples originally connected therewith (Clem. Ep. ii. c. 5), in which Jesus says, “Ye shall be as lambs in the midst of wolves.” Whereupon Peter answers Him: “But if the wolves should scatter the lambs” (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 13, p. 553; I. c. p. 532). “Jesus with Peter: The lambs after death need not fear the wolves.” (comp. Luke xii. 27, x. 3, and also Isa. xli. 11). By the lambs are meant (according to the mind of the Gnostic author) the Pneumatics, by the wolves, most probably, the Archontes (Rulers) of this present world.

The date at which this gospel was written cannot be fixed much later than about the middle of the 2nd century; the locality, as the name expresses, was most probably Egypt.

(4) The Gospel of Tatian, commonly called the Diatessaron (τὸ δια τεσσάρων) is mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 29), Epiphanius (Haer. xlvii.), and Theodoret (H. P. i. 20). They both have two had the book itself in their hands. Eusebius concludes, from the title Diatessaron (which in his time meant a harmony or synopsis of our four canonical gospels), that Tatian’s work must have been similar to a synoptical work of the Alexandrine Ammonius, Origen’s teacher, which Eusebius had himself criticized. Although he knew nothing further of the structure of this work, Eusebius remarks that it was still in his own time made use of by “some.” All that Epiphanius has to tell us is that τὸ δια τεσσάρων εὐγενεσικός was said to have been the work of Tatian, and that it was called by some the Gospel of Jesus and the Heavens (Euseb. vii. 3.3).

The first and at the same time the only writer to whom we are indebted for more exact information, is Theodoret. He likewise names Tatian as the author of the Diatessaron, and adds that he had omitted the genealogies and everything having reference to the human descent of Jesus from the house of David. The book then, according to Theodoret, was the work of only a few hands of heretics, but of some Catholics also, who, the historian informs us, had failed to discern the sinister purpose with which it had been put together, and used it in all simplicity as an abstract. Theodoret found over two hundred copies in his own diocese, which he took away, supplying their place with the four canonical gospels. A further testimony to the reception of the work in some parts of the Syrian church may be found in a statement of the Doctrina Addaci (ed. Phillips, London, 1876, p. 34 of the English translation), according to which the Diatessaron was publicly read in the church of Edessa. But Tatian’s name is not mentioned, and it would seem impossible that another synopsis of the four gospels may be thus referred to. If, finally, we could trust the statement of a Syrian writer of the latter half of the 12th century, Dionysius Bar-Salibi (Assemanni Bibl. Orient. i. 57; ii. 159 sq.), we might add that Tatian’s Diatessaron began with the first words of the prologue of St. John—in the beginning was the Word”—Dionysius adds that St. Ephrem had illustrated this harmony of the four gospels by a commentary. But the learned Gregory Bar Hebraeus, bishop of Tagrit, relates precisely the same of the Diatessaron of Ammonius (Assemanni B. O. i. 57 sq.), and Ebed Jesus († 1308) actually makes Ammonius and Tatian into the same person (Assemanni ii. 12). On this work St. Ephrem wrote his commentary cannot be decided till the Armenian translation of it has been published. All that can be drawn with any certainty from the contradictory statements of these later Syrian writers is that they drew their conclusions from the simple fact of the title Diatessaron being applied to the work of which they were authors.

A Harmony of the Gospels, which, after prefixing the prologue of St. Luke’s Gospel, commences with “In the beginning was the Word,” is still preserved both in the Latin and the Frankish languages. The Latin text has been several times reprinted, now under the name of Ammonius; now under that of Tatian; under the former name in the Editio princeps of Michael Membler, Mayence, 1594, under the latter, at first among the Orthodoxographi (Basil. 1598, tom. ii. pp. 629—661), and subsequently in the various Evangelii of the Frankish text, which dates from the 9th century, was published by Schmeller at Vienna in 1841. Victor of Capua (A.D. 546) supplied to this Gospel-Harmony the Ammonian sections as improved by Eusebius; the Latin text, which is that of the Vulgate, he found ready to his hand, and so designated by name as to any author. Victor hesitates whether to ascribe the work to Ammonius or to Tatian, but inclines towards the latter hypothesis, because, according to Eusebius (Ep. ad Carpian.), the synopsis of Ammonius followed exclusively the order of St. Matthew (comp. Victor’s Preface ap. Ranke, Codex Fuldensis, Marburg, 1868, pp. 1—5). Of the genuine parts of the Latin and Greek Tatian there can be no serious question; but the use of the names of Tatian and Ammonius in this connexion, is one among various proofs that those names have been applied to widely different gospel-harmonies.

The old dispute among critics whether Tatian really made use of our four Canonical Gospels, and especially whether he used the Gospel of St. John, or whether, in the place at least of this last he used an uncanonical gospel, such as the Gospel according to the Hebrews, is, in the absence of more exact information, difficult to decide. The possibility that the Gospel of St. John was one of the four worked up by Tatian into a new whole cannot be disputed, since he certainly made frequent use of it in his Apology (Orat. ad Gracc., c. 13, 19, comp. 4, 5), written about A.D. 170. That Tatian made use of the Gospel of the Hebrews along with the four canonical gospels, and perhaps regarded it even as his chief authority, has been inferred from the various Epiphanius that to our Latin text has actually regarded his work as identical with the Gospel of the Hebrews, and secondly from that of Victor, that it sometimes bore the title of Dispente. But the former statement may rest on some confusion; the latter is too feebly supported by other evidence. We fall back, therefore, on the meagre notices of Theodoret.

These prove so much as this: that Tatian’s work was sufficiently like our four gospels to be regarded and used by many Catholics without scruple as an abstract of them. Its heretical character must therefore have consisted not so much in foreign additions as in omissions with a special purpose. The omission of the genealogies, and of all notices relating to our Lord’s human descent, are indications of docetic opinions, and Tatian’s way of working up the gospel narratives so as to make them suit his special objects, reminds one of similar proceedings of Marcion, with whom he has otherwise much in common.

The last group of apocryphal gospels consists of those which were exclusively employed by heretics. Of most of these we know the names only. Of some, more or less important fragments have been preserved.

Some of these heretical gospels are identified with works that are otherwise known to us. Such, for instance, is the case with the gospels of Cerinthus and Carpocrates (Epiph. Har. loc., comp. xxvii. 5, xxx. 14). Neither of these wrote a gospel of his own, but both (as is evident from the account given us) used the Gospel of the Hebrews in that older form which contained the genealogy (St. Matt. 1. 1—17), but at the history of our Lord (St. Matt. 1. 18—ii. 23). Jerome accordingly reckons Cerinthus, and his successor Ebin, as well as Carpocrates, among those who have mutilated the holy gospels (Ado. Lucifer. Opp. iv. 2, p. 304, ad. Martinian). Of the Gospel of Bartholomew, which was also identified by some with that of the Hebrews, and the Gospel of Boustades, we shall speak further on.

Another section of these apocryphal gospels consisted (like the Gospel of Peter and the Did- testament of Gnostic corruptions of one or another of our canonical gospels. Among those of most interest and importance are—

(1) The Gospel of Marcion. The text of this work has been preserved with tolerable completeness in the notices contained in the fourth book of Tertullian against Marcion—and in Epiphanius (Har. loc.), to which may be added some accounts in Irenaeus, and in the Did. recta Fide. The first attempt to restore this text was made by Hahn (Königsegg, 1823, comp. Volkm. Evangelion Marcion, Leipsic, 1824, pp. 401—486); but a complete judgement on doubtful points respecting it has only been attained since special studies have led to a more correct appreciation of the purpose and objects of those champions of orthodoxy, and their peculiar methods of citation. The consequence is that few points in regard to Marcion’s text are now considered obscure or disputable (comp. Volkm. Evangelion Marcion, Leipsic, 1825, p. 150 sqq.). His gospel was in fact a Gnosticizing recast of that of St. Luke, which, without any direct interpolation of his peculiar views, excluded everything which, was inconsistent with them, appeared to Marcion to militate against the truth of the gospel. In particular it states the passion that to our Latin text, and explains the origin, to the authority of the Mosaic Law, of the prophets, or to the historical connexion of Christianity with the religion of the Old Testament was carefully eradicated. The whole of the early history was omitted, together with that of John the Baptist, and those of our Lord’s baptism and temptation in the wilderness.

The gospel began with Luke iii. 1, followed immediately by iv. 31, thus: ‘Εν την τεκνιανίαν της ἡμερας του Καριμπο’ και την τεκνιανίαν του Ποιμένος της λειψανος, καταλαβεί δ' ἡ Ἰουσου εις Καριμπο ουν τω την Γαλατακα. Then followed Luke iv. 31—37, and after that the story of our Lord’s appearance at Nazareth (Luke iv. 16 sqq.), with numerous omissions. Thus in verse 16 were omitted the words ἵνα τεθημενον, and again, οὗτο σαρκινών το οτινεστε σως in 20. In verse 21, he left out οτι σιμοερον—οτι ουν ως in verse 22, και ουςιον—ους θησκες; in verse 23, εν τωτε ως ἐν τω ἐνθαντ; the whole of verse 24, and, perhaps also verse 27. Among other omissions and alterations the following are noteworthy:—The omission of Luke viii. 19; xi. 29 (from ει μη το το νικι λει- to v. 32), again vv. 49—51, and xi. 5, 7; xiii. 1—10. The alteration of xiii. 28 (Φανερός τον δικαιον οτι του Αβρααμος—σποραν), and the omission of vv. 29, 30. The following passages were also struck out: xiii. 31-35, xv. 11-34, xviii. 19 (from λέγεται ὑπὸ Βούλθρα κάθεια; and xvi. 27, 29, 34, 38, 39, 41-43, 44; (from ὑπὸ διέρχομαι ὁ Παύλος; xxi. 11, 12, 21; xxi. 16-18, 26-30, 35-38, 49-51; xxii. 34, 43; xxiv. 27, 32 (from ὑπὸ διέρχομαι ὁ Παύλος; 44 (from δεῖ τελείωσιν ὁ Παύλος; 45, 46 (to γέγραπται καὶ σωτῆρας) 52, 53. Sometimes single words only are omitted, e.g. iv. 34, Nαυαροή; xii. 21, Παύλος; iii. 8, 9, τῶν άγγέλων, 32, ἄγαν, after ἄρα; xvi. 37, ὁ Ναυαροής; xix. 9, καθένα καὶ καθανεν ἀναθύμησα ἵνα σωτῆρας ἑτούς; xix. 19, τὸ Ναυαροής, and probably also xxiv. 47, ἀδρέςεως ἢ τοιοῦτον καὶ ἱεροκαλήμας, and 49, οὕτως δὲ καθίσατε... ἐλθόντες δέ τιμάσας. Actual alterations of the text, and additions to it, are rare. Yet at x. 21, Marcion read ὁ Ναυαροής τὸ κρυψότας... ἀνεπάλημφησιν, instead of ὁ οὕτως ταῦτα καὶ ένειδήλησα; xii. 42, κακίων instead of κρίσιν. xii. 12, ὁμέρον for ἕμων; xvi. 17, τῶν λόγων μου for τοῦ νόμου; xvi. 14, ἀνεπάλημφησιν τοὺς λόγους δέθεσθαι instead of ἰδίω—ἀνεπάλημφησι.
GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL

In xvii. 18, the words ἐ μὲν ὁ ἀλογοσύνης οὕτως ἐπερρέαζον, etc. are omitted, and their place, viz. (for the second time?) Luke iv. 27, καθάλαλεν · Πάπας. At xx. 35, Marcion read ὁ θεοῦ τοῦ άνέων ἐκεῖνων; xxii. 32, δ οῖροι, καὶ ὁ γενέων ἀστὴρ; xxix. 25, ἀλήθεις ἢμῶν instead of ἀλήθειαν ἢμων.

Nevertheless, by no means all Marcion's departures from our present text of St. Luke are to be laid to his account. Several of them he certainly found in the MS. which lay before him, and among them are some (not without support from other witnesses) where he has used an older and better text. Thus at xviii. 21, was inserted τοίς μου· ἢ μήτε καὶ οἱ δαύληως; (comp. Mark x. 33, Matt. xii. 48): at xx. 21, he read εὐφραντὸ καὶ εὐμολογοῦσιν; at xxii, αἵτες Ἱωάνας τούτον καὶ διότι εἰ μὴ δόος καὶ τί εἰσιν· δόει εἰ μὴ δόος καὶ διότι κατανημνήσομεν: xii. 38, τῆς θεοτοκίας· xvi. 2, εἰ μὴ εὐφράσθη· καὶ κατανημνήσομεν; xvi. 19, μὲ μὴ λαλήσα συν έρικαν τούτον εἰσιν; (τούτον). At xxiv. 2 were omitted (as still in our good MSS.) καὶ καταλύντω φόνων καὶ τοὺς προφητικοὺς καὶ αὐτοῖς πολλά καὶ γινώσκεται καὶ τὰ νόημα. Finally the variations at x. 14, τα τούτο· οἱ μαρτυρίαν οἱ οὗτοι, and vi. 17, το ἐνότοι are perfectly indifferent. With regard to some of these Marcion's reading we are not sufficiently informed, but apparent contradictions between Tertullian and Epiphanius disappear for the most part on a closer inquiry. The title of Marcion's gospel was simply ἐναγγελίαν τοῦ κυρίου. The date of composition is most probably assigned to the first period of Marcion's residence at Rome, i.e. about the year A.D. 145. We find, indeed, a statement of him in his own words, that he had composed the work himself, and that it was simply refuted by Volkmar and Hilgenfeld. The theory was abandoned for the main part by Baur himself, and completely given up by Bittel.}

Probably identical with Marcion's gospel is—

(2) The Gospel of Apelles. Apelles was a disciple of Marcion, Origines Origenis, and ad Amicos in Alex. in Libr. Apol. pro Orig., that he had subjected the Gospels and "the apostle" to a process of purification must probably be understood to mean that he made use of his teacher Marcion's canon (comp. also Epiph. Haer. xii. 4). Epiphanius, however, relates further (Haer. xii. 2), that Apelles had appealed to the saying, γίνεσθαι δόκιμος πραγματεύεται, as being one to be found εν τῇ εὐαγγελίῳ. But as this saying was not found in Marcion's gospel it would seem that Apelles could not have confined himself to that document.

St. Jerome, finally, attributes a similar mutilation of our canonical gospels to Saturninus and the Ophites (adem. Lucifer, l. c.), as well as to Basilides (Comm. in Th. prope). Of a Gospel composed by Saturninus nothing further is known. The Ophites, certainly along with the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, made use of several uncanonical gospels (Epiphanius, Haer. xxvii. 31, and Pseudo-Tertullian, Haer. 6; Pseudo-Origen, Philos. v. 6), of which, however, we cannot tell whether or how far they are to be placed in the category of re-casts of our canonical gospels.

(3) Of Basilides.—Origen (Hom. i. in Luc.) Jerome (proph. in Matth.) and St. Ambrose (proph. in Luc.) report that he wrote a gospel which they presumed to entitle after his own name. In another place, where Origen is speaking of facts of the gospel history of which our canonical books make no mention, he warns against a too hasty rejection of such narratives, adding the remark that much indeed of this kind is to be found in the fictitious compositions of heretics, such as the "Hypthianas" (Sethians) and Basilidians made use of (in Matth. Comm. series 28). If in this passage Origen was thinking of the writing of the Basilides, we might infer from his words that it must have been an entirely different work from our canonical gospels. We know moreover that the Basilidians made use of other apocryphal writings, such as the "Traditiones of Mathias." And we also learn from the testimony of Agridra Castor (cf. Eus. H. E. iv. 7) and Clemens Alexander (Strom. iv. 12, p. 599) that Basilides had composed a work in twenty-four books bearing the title άκρανθέα· τοῦ εὐαγγέλου. A fragment from this work is still preserved in the Acta disputationum I. gnost. et Manetis, c. 55 (Galland, Bibl. Patri. iii. 569 sqq.). It is an exposition of the parable of Dives and Lazarus. Clemens Alex. has also preserved another fragment from the 23rd book, which speaks of suffering as a consequence of the inbred sinful corruption of every man, with special reference to a passage concerning martyrdom (Luke xxii. 12 sqq.). In any case, the work must have been an exposition of some gospel, by whose authority Basilides endeavoured to establish his Gnostic doctrine. And it is anyhow most unlikely that he would have written a commentary on a gospel of his own composition. Of our canonical gospels those of Matthew, Luke, and John were used in his school, and the work is frequently referred to we may reasonably conclude that it was the Gospel of St. Luke on which he wrote his commentary. It is indeed quite possible that, like Marcion, he may have subjected this gospel to revision and alterations favourable to his special dogmatic purposes; but no certain conclusions can be arrived at on this point.

Numerous other apocryphal gospels in use among the Gnostics carried, like the Gospel of Peter, and the Childhood-Gospels of James, Matthew and Thomas, on their front the names of holy men. To such belong——

(4) The Gospel of Andrew mentioned in some texts of the Decretum Gelasii (vi. 12). The "apocryphal writings bearing the name of Andrew," mentioned by pope Innocent I. (Epist. 6, ad Eczerp.) and St. Augustine (c. adversar. leg. et prophet. 20), are probably the Gnostic περὶ ἀνθρώπων.

(5) The Gospel of Barnabas mentioned likewise in the Decretum Gelasii (vi. 10) and in the catalogue of Anastasius Sinaita (ap. Credner, Geschichte des Kanons, p. 241). A later legend relates that at the discovery of the relics of St. Barnabas in the island of Cyprus, a copy of the Gospel of St. Matthew, written with his own hand, was found lying on the saint's breast. (Thes. Ev. Apocr. Proleg. xxx. and Acta Barnabae, c. 22, ap. Tischendorf, l. c. p. 72.) Further, we must distinguish between the old Gnostic Gospel of St. Barnabas and a Mahometan fiction bearing the same name, which is still preserved in an Italian translation of the 15th century (Fabricius, Cod. Apocr. N. T. iii. pp. 373-394).

(6) The Gospel of Bartholomew (Hieron. prof. in Math.; Gelasii Decretum, vi. 12). According to some accounts this Gospel would be identical with the Gospel of the Hebrews. And indeed we read in Eusebius (H. E. v. 10, cf. Hieron. Vir. Illust. 36) that St. Bartholomew carried with him into India the Gospel of St. Matthew written in Hebrew characters, and that there it was afterwards found by Pantaenus, the teacher of Clemens Alexandrinus, on his missionary visit to that country. But Eusebius knows nothing of a Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew bearing also the name of Bartholomew; and Jerome speaks (in terms like those of the Gelasian Decree) of the Gospel of Bartholomew as of an independent work of heretical origin (St. Jerome and Gelasius) make mention of it in the same series with a number of Gnostic productions.

(7) The Gospel of Judas Iscariot in use among the Cainites (Irenaeus, Haer. i. 31, 1; Epiph. Haer. xxxviii. 1; Theodoret, R. F. i. 15). This work represented Judas's betrayal as a meritorious action, and the traitor himself as the perfect Gnostic who destroyed the dominion of the Demiurge by bringing about the crucifixion of our Lord.

(8) The Gospel of Matthias is mentioned by Origen (Hom. i. in Luc.), Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25), Jerome (prof. in Math.), Ambrose (in Luc. prof.), Innocent I. (Epist. 6 ad Eczerp.), the Decree of Gelasius (vi. 8), and the list in Anastasius Sinaita (Credner, p. 394). The work was a matter of conjecture, identical with the Παπάθεσις Μαρτίου, which were in high esteem in Gnostic circles, and especially among the Basilidians, being regarded by these latter as the chief source of their doctrine (Clemens Alex. Strom. vii. 17, p. 900 Potter, Pseudo-Orig. Philos. vii. 20, p. 250, Miller). According to Pseudo-Orig. the writing was composed in the form of apocryphal discourses, received by Matthias in secret instruction from our Lord. Some fragments of it have been preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus. The first runs thus:—"Behold with wonder the things present, for that is the first step towards a knowledge of the things beyond" (Strom. ii. 9, p. 452). A second:—"The flesh must be consumed with, and evil-entreated, and its unbribled lust must in no wise be yielded to, but the soul must be made to grow through faith and knowledge" (Strom. iii. 4, p. 523). A third saying:—"When the neighbour of an elect person falls into sin then the elect one sins himself; for had he so lived as the word enjoins, his neighbour out of reverence for his manner of life would not have sinned" (Strom. vii. 13, p. 892). The work commended itself by its severe ascetic principles to the school of Basilides; and from some indications in the Philosophumena, it would seem also to have favoured some of their Gnostic speculations.

(9) The Gospel of Philip was, according to Eusebius (Haer. xxvi. 15) in use among the members of a Gnostic sect allied to the Ophites, and alleged by them in justification of indulgence in unnatural lusts. The fragment, however, preserved, and quoted from it by the zealous opponent of heresy, contradicts his statement—"The Lord revealed to me what the soul ought to say when she mounts to heaven, and what answer she should give to each of the higher powers: 'I have known myself, and gathered myself together, and begotten no children for the Archon of this world, but have torn up his roots, and gathered the scattered members, and I know Thee, and who thou art! for I also am descended from the upper world.'" This gospel therefore inculcated, like the Gospel of the Egyptians, and the "traditions of Mathias," a severe asceticism. The prayers of the departing soul as she passes through the various heavens constitute indeed a favourite theme of various Gnostic writings. The Gospel of Philip was also in use among the Manicheans (comp. Fabricius, Cod. Apocr. i. 139-142).

Most of these pseudo-apocalyptic gospels, like the apocryphal acts of Apostles, were attributed to the authorship of Lucianus Charinus, when Catholic tradition has stamped as typical representative of the whole class of pseudo-epigraphical writings. So when the Decretum Gelasii, after recounting a whole series of apocryphal gospels, concludes with these words: Evangelia quae falsavint Lucianus apocrypha, Evangelia quae falsavint Iacius apocrypha (Credner, l. c. p. 216 sqq.), we may conjecture that beneath the names Lucianus and Iacius (Tisch, Eusei. Luci. Iac. Hycr. Hych. Ynus, &c.) may lurk the otherwise oft corrupted names of this Lucius. Rudolf Hoftreez is of opinion indeed that these two names may indicate two men who in early times made themselves noteworthy by labours expended on our canonical gospels, viz. Lucian, the presbyter of Antioch, and the Egyptian bishop Hychius. But in some texts of the Decretum Gelasii the added clause quae falsavint Lucaius is also found after the enumeration of other Gnostic gospels, such as those of Thaddaeus, Barnabas, Thomas, Bartholomew, Andrew, Peter, Matthew (Credner, l. c.). The name of Lucius was also borne by the Gnostic original of the book (already mentioned), De Insania Mariae et Salutoris (comp. the epistle of Pseudo-Jerome to Chromatius and Heliodorus, ap. Tischendorf. Evang. Apost. ed. ii. p. 33 sqq., and the note by Grabe to Iren. Haer. l. 17).

Beside these pseudo-apocalyptic gospels a number of other gospels are mentioned as used in various Gnostic schools.

(11) The Simonians are reported by a confessedly somewhat recent witness (Praef. Arch. in Const. Nicaen. ap. Fabrius. i. p. 377) to have had a gospel of their own, which bore title—Book of the Four Corners, and Hinges of the World—and was accordingly divided into four parts. But this title reminds one too strongly of the doctrinal proof alleged by Irenaeus for the fourth character of the church’s gospel (Iren. Haer. iii. 11, 8) not to awaken a suspicion of some confusion. To the scher-heric Simon himself is ascribed by the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 16) the authorship of various apocalyptic writings put forth in the names of Christ and His apostles. Of another work attributed to Simon, and entitled The Great Announcement (ἡ ἀνακοίνωσις ἡ μεγάλη), numerous fragments have been preserved by Pseudo-Origian (Philosop. vi. 1 sq.), but this was not a gospel at all.

(12) An apocalyptic gospel, in use among the Valentinians, is mentioned by Irenaeus (Haer. iii. 11, 9), and Pseudo-Tertullian (Haer. 12). According to Irenaeus, who probably knew it well, and declares it to be a pretty recent fiction, it bore the name of “The gospel of Truth” (Ἐван-γέλιον δωριτίου), and had nothing in common with our canonical gospels. It was probably rather a dogmatic exposition of the speculative tenets of Valentinus than an historical writing. But the Valentinians also used our canonical gospels, and in an unmutilated form (Iren. l. c.; Tertullian, Praes. 83). The Valentinian Heracleon (cir. a.d. 195) wrote a commentary of his own on the Gospel of St. John, of which numerous fragments have been preserved.

(13-16) The Gospel of Perfection (ἐγβαθύνων τελειωμένων), The Gospel of Eve, and the Great and Small Interrogations of Mary (ὁμωφύτως Μαρίας μενεδραΤ and μωμαί) are mentioned by Epiphanius as in use among the “Gnostics” or “Baborites” (Haer. xxvi. 2 sqq.), in a section of the Ophites, along with other apocalyptic writings which (like the Gospel of Philip) were current under apostolic names, and used by these Ophite Gnostics (Epiph. Haer. xxvi. 8). According to the Gospel of Eve she partook of the Tree of Knowledge in consequence of a revelation made to her by the Serpent. Epiphanius gives us the following fragment (Haer. xxvi. 3): “I stood on a high hill and saw a tall and dark column, and to have a voice as of thunder, and I drew near to hearken; and so spoke to me: ‘I am thou, and thou art I, and where thou art there am I also; and in all things am I sown. And from whencesoever thou garest me, in gathering me thou garest thyself.’” This fragment is enough to shew that the work was no gospel, but a Gnostic doctrinal treatise, though presented, it may be, in an historical form. This work, like the Gospel of Judas, appears to have been a favourite among the Ophites of the Cainite branch. Its pantheistic mysticism is declared by the severe Malleus Haereticorum to have an obscene meaning, and such, according to his statement (Epiph. Haer. xxvi. 8), seems really to have been the case with the other two works—The Interrogations of Mary.

(17 and 18) As Manichean works are mentioned—The Gospel of Life and The Gospel of Adda, called also The Bushel (μαζητής). The former of these, which is mentioned by Timotheus Presbyter Constantinopolitanus (De iis qui ad Eccles. accidunt, ed. Maurusius Varus dinum, p. 117), by Photius (Bibl. ord. 85), and in the Anapherastimaniae ruman (Cotelarius, Patr. Apost. i. p. 537), is said to have been written by the fabulous Scythianus, and to have described the Acts of Christ in an heretical spirit. To this same, beside the Gospel, are ascribed three other writings—the “Chapters” (or the “Vocation”), the “Mysteries,” and the “Treasury of Life” (Epiph. Haer. Ixxvi. 2; Cyril. Hieroc. Catech. vi. 22, p. 100, ed. Paris, Petrus Siculo, Hist. Manich. ed. Gieseler, Göttingen, 1846, p. 15; Photius, contra Manich. i. 37 sq.; cf. Fabric. Cod. Apost. i. p. 141).

The Bushel is said to be the production of a disciple of Menas named Adda (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 15). Diodorus, who wrote twenty-five years after the time of the Manichees, directed the first seven against the Gospel of Life, but herein, according to Photius, made a serious blunder, confounding the above-named gospel with that of Adda.

In some lists of Manichean writings mention is made of a Gospel of Philip and of a Gospel of Thomas, of which Mani’s disciple, bearing the same name, is said to have been the author. (Timotheus, presbyter, l. c.; Petrus Siculo, l. c. p. 22; Leontius, de Scotic, art. iii. p. 432; Anapherastimaniae, l. c. comp. Fabricius, l. p. 138, sq., 354 sq.) But these Gospels are probably meant the Gnostic Apocrypha, of which we have already spoken, and which were also read by Manicheans.

[BR. A. L.]

GOSSELINUS (GAUSOLINUS, AUSSOLINUS), several other forms of the name are given by Potthast. He was bishop of Metz about 409. His very existence was at first doubted by J. B. Solierius, who, however, afterwards found mention of him in a MS. Martyrology of the church of St. Peter at Metz. (Boll. Acta SS. 31 Jul. vii. 304.)

[R. T. S.] GOSSVINTHA, queen. [GOSVINTHA.]

GOSWINUS—May 22. A boy martyr at Rome in a.D. 176, supposed to have been of Teuton birth, led to Rome either through business or slavery. There is, however, in reality nothing known of him. (Ferrarii Cat. SS.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. v. 130.)

[G. T. S.]

GOTHARDUS (GODEARDUS, ROTHARDUS, BUDHARDUS), an early bishop of Mentz. He ruled for fifteen years, and was a successful missionary preacher. He built a church, afterwards dedicated to St. Nicomedes. By his place in the list his period would seem to belong to about a.D. 200. (Gall. Christ. v. 433.) [R. T. S.]
GOTHOBERTA, virgin, of Noyon. (Boll. Acta SS. 11 Apr. ii. 31 a.) [GODEBERTA.]

[. G.]

GOTHS, CONVERSION OF THE. The early Christianity of the Goths is a matter on which no very full light can be thrown. 1. The first conversions appear to have been made through the prisoners whom the Goths carried off with them from their invasions of Asia Minor. Philostorgius, who is the authority for this, says (ii. 5) that among the prisoners made in the region of Cappadocia were some clerics and that not a few conversions were made. He also adds that the ancestors of Ulphilas were of the number of the captives. This is very improbable. There seems little doubt that the invasions referred to took place about the middle of the 3rd century, that they were made by the Goths who lay to the north of the Euxine, and that these early Catholic conversions were made not in the district north of the Danube, where Ulphilas afterwards laboured, but much more probably in the Crimean Chersonese. Basil the Great, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, bears testimony that Dionysius, who was bishop of Rome, 259-269, had sent persons with a view of redeeming the prisoners taken from the Cappadocians. There is also a letter from Basil to Asclepias, bishop of Thessalonica, which confirms the belief that the Goths first received Christianity from Cappadocia, and makes it probable that a certain Eutyches was one of the prisoners who made converts among the Goths. (Ep. 70, § 164; Migne, xxxii. 435, 635.)

The account of Sozomen (ii. 6) is clearly inaccurate and gives no further certain information. At the council of Nice, more than half a century later, we have evidence of the orthodox Christian community of the Goths in the provinces of Thrace, Moesia, and Macedonia. (Procopius, De Bello Goth. iv. 4, ed. Bonn. vol. ii. p. 475.) From this time the Goths, who had settled in the district north of the Danube, were in contact with the barbarians, and it seems probable from an allusion to them in an earlier passage that he is certainly including the Goths (Athan. de Incarn. Verb. § 51; Migne, xxv. 187-190; Neander, Church History, Eng. transl. iii. 179). Further, Chrysostom in his fourteenth epistle speaks of an embassy which has come to him from the Goths to ask for a bishop in the place of Ulphilas, whom Chrysostom had himself consecrated (Migne, l. i. 618.). Procopius also, speaking of the Goths of the Crimean region, says that in the twenty-first year of Justinian's reign, they applied to the emperor for another bishop to replace their own, who had lately died (Procopius, de Bell. Goth. iv. 4, ed. Bonn. vol. ii. p. 475). It seems clear, therefore, on the whole that from the middle of the 3rd century there was a continuous tradition of orthodox Christianity among the Goths who bordered on the Euxine.

2. We turn now to the, historically, more important branch of the Goths who were settled further west. Before the time of Ulphilas we have no knowledge of any conversions to Christianity among the Goths to the north of the Danube. Ulphilas (born 314, died 381), on suffering severe persecution for his labours as a Christian missionary among his own people, was allowed by Constantius to enter the Roman dominions with his Arian converts, c. 348. These Goths — the "Gothi minores" — settled in the region of Moesia and Thrace. For the whole consideration of the life and writings of Ulphilas, his work among the Goths, and the nature of their Christianity see ULPHILAS.

3. There are indications of other preaching and of other conversions to Christianity among the Goths north of the Danube about the time of Ulphilas. We learn from Epiphanius, writing about the year 375, that a persecution had been carried on some years before against the followers of Audianus, who, after his banishment for heresy to Scythia, had laboured among the Goths and converted many. [AUDIUS, anthropomorphitas.]

Epiphanius speaks of Silvanus, a bishop, who had been ordained by Audianus, and of others also who were dead when he wrote (Migne, xxxii. 371). Of Catholic Goths also, and their persecution, probably about the same period, there is some evidence to be found in the Lives of the Saints [see NICETAS, SABA]. The leader of the persecution in these cases, as in that of Ulphilas, was probably Athanaric.

4. Nearly thirty years after the Goths of Ulphilas had entered the Roman provinces, the great martyr of the Visigoths, Alaric (A.D. 395), crossed across the Danube. Of the manner of their conversion to Arian Christianity we know absolutely nothing, nor of any certain link between them and Ulphilas. For the later history of the Christianity of the Goths, see SEVIRIUS, OSTROGOTHUS, VESPASIANUS.

(A. L. H. A.)

GOTSIPTAIA. [CUTZUPITAE (Vol. I. 733 a).]

GOTTESCHALK [GODESALVUS].

GOTUMAR (GOTUMARUS), bishop of Tri Flavia (Santiago), from about 637 till after 646. He signed the sixth and seventh councils of Toledo under Rintila and Kindisvirth, a.d. 637, 646. (Agustino-Catalanii, l. iii. 414, 423; Esp. Sopr. xix. 57. [ORTIZIUS].) [M. A. W.]

GOVEIN (COPEN, COVEN, GAWEN, COVEN, GOVERNINS), wife of Twärdag and mother of Meurig, kings of South Wales, an early Welsh saint [COPEN]. (Recs. Cambro-Briit. Saints, app. 14; Camb. Quart. Mag. v. 132; Notes and Queries, 2 ser. iii. 31, 77, 97; Williams, Iolo MS. 549, 558.) [C. W. B.]

GOVOR, GOWER, Welsh saint, who founded Llanover in Monmouthshire. There are six springs close to each other called Ffynon Otor. He was commemorated May 9. (R. Williams, Enwoegion Cymru, 1852, p. 178; Notes and Queries, 2 ser. iii. 31, 77, 97; Williams, Iolo MS. 549, 558.) [C. W. B.]

GOWIBALDUS, GOWIBOLT, bishop of Ratisbon. [GARIBALDUS (3)].

GRACCUS, a Roman patrician, who held the office of urban praetor towards the close of the 4th century. During his term of office he destroyed the cave of Mihra and other objects connected with the strange Oriental superstitions which had been introduced into Rome. This may have been done by the magistrates as a mere matter of police; but he afterwards received baptism. He was a neighbour of Tosto-ius and Lactantius (Ep. i. 9) and this is in a letter to Lactantius that his name is mentioned by St. Jerome. (Ep. civ. 2, ed. Vall.) Prudentius (Cont. Symm. lib. i. 1. 562) mentions the family of Gracchi as the zealous for the Christian religion.

[W. H. F.]

GRACE, ɣρας, in the sense first given to that word in the New Testament, viz., the favour or free gift of the Holy Ghost purchased for man by Christ, and poured out on man under the Gospel; inspiring individual souls with power from above to the regeneration and sanctification of their hearts and lives; and imparting vital efficacy to the sacraments and general work of the church. Grace, therefore, must in this sense be divided under two aspects: (1) grace to the individual—in later times called "gratia graminis faciens"—(2) grace to the church in general, "gratia gratia data." But the commoner name for this under latter aspect is charisms (Rom. i. 1; 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6), or charismata (1 Cor. xii. 9 and 31), under which term it has been treated elsewhere (Duct. or Crem. Act. i. 549): but briefly, for all the controversy that has been raised about it on that head are purely modern.

It was the inward, invisible, superhuman, and life-giving action of the Holy Ghost upon the soul of man, which Pelagius denied, and St. Augustine brought out so triumphantly as to have procured for himself in after ages the honourable distinction of "doctor of grace." It was he, likewise, who first laid bare the correlative doctrine to it on the part of man, viz., that of original sin. His opus classicum on the subject is divided into two books; the title given to the first being De Gratia Christi: to the second, De Peccato Originali. It was written A.D. 418, after Pelagius had been condemned by pope Zosimus and a general council of the African church in May of that year.

Pelagius had been brought to book at last, and all his subterfuges exposed. Denial of the grace of God, he had constantly said formed no part of his creed, yet now, in expounding what he held it to be, he struck at the roots of it in the same breath. "Nam gratiam Dei, et adjut- terium quo adjucamur ad non peccandum, aut in natura, aut liberum potest arbitrrio: aut in leges, aut in doc. doctrinis." (L. 3.) That is, he limited it to the natural gifts and powers with which every man is born, or the external help supplied to man in the books of the Old and New Testaments. The capabilities, therefore, with which every man finds himself endowed at his birth, constituted, according to Pelagius, all the inward assistance that men needed or received from God to enable them to do any good or escape condemnation to Him in this life, and be rewarded with heaven in the next. Neither their wills nor their actions wanted any renewing or strengthening from above to be what they ought. "Et ideo, aut non adjutat (Deus) ut velimus, non adjutat ut agamus: sed tantummodo adjutat ut velle et agere valeamus." (ib. c. v.) From this point of view there was, of course, no tint of nature for baptism to wash away, no gift of the Holy Ghost imparted in the new birth at the font. Adam's sin, St. Augustine rejoined, was simply left out in this estimate. As he had urged in an earlier work: "Natura quippe hominis primitus inculpata, et sine ullo vitio creata est: natura vero iusta non est, qua quibus quisque ex Adam nascedat, jure medico indiget quia sana non est. . . . Ac per hoc natura poenalis ad vindiciam justissimam pertinet. . . . Deus autem, qui dives est in misericordia, prop- ter multitum dilectionem, quae dilexit nos, et cum essemus mortui delictis, convirificavit nos Christo, Ouius gratia sumus salvi facti. Hac autem Christi gratia, sine quin nec infantes, nec etate grandes salvi fieri possunt, non meritis redditur, sed gratia datur, propter quod et gratia nominatur. "Justificati, inquit, gratia per sanningunm Ejus." (De Nat. et Grat. c. Fel. c. iii.) When and in what way was this grace bestowed? First at the font, on the recipients of baptism, infants and adults alike—"vitio in se qui non per illam liberatur, sive quia audire nondum potuerunt, sive quia obedere non ulerunt: sive etiam, cum per aetatem audire non posse, lavacrum regenerationis quod accipere possent, per quod salvi fierent, non acceserunt, justu utique damnantur, quia sine peccato non sunt, vel quod originaliter traxerunt, vel quod maiis moribus addiderunt." Omnes enim peccaverunt, sive in Adam, sive in se ipsis, et in gentem mundam Dei. (ib.) But was it merely the remission of sins in baptism, or something else, first bestowed then, over and above, that was denied by Pelagius? This was the crucial point which he could never face, "Quomodo igitur credi potest Pelagium Dei gratiam, quae neque natura est cum libero arbitrio: neque legis scientia, neque peccatorum remissio: sed quae in singula nes actionis est necessaria versus falsum confusorum," asks his opponent, in spite of all his admissions? That inward grace, which, first received at the font, becomes the operating and co-operating principle of a new life in every heart, where it is allowed free course, and not obstructed by the action of a perverse will. Faith, hope, and charity rank amongst its earliest creations; its most prized and lasting achievements. Absolute freedom from sin is not out of the question with such aid: which, however, is never irresistible, and might be withdrawn at any moment, on any wilful reaction from it in its recipient. Such grace was wholly gratuitous on the part of God, and undeserved by any preceding merit whatsoever on the part of man. At one time St. Augustine confesses he thought himself man could merit it by his faith. Afterwards, he became scripturally convinced that faith both originated with, and was increased by grace. "Fides ergo, et inchoata, et perfecta, donum Dei est," is the mature conclusion of his latest work. (De Prædest. c. viii.) "Our wills and our acts are our own," he says, "but our good wills and our good acts are received by God, and are accepted in us by Him with our concurrence." (De Grat. Christi, c. xxv.) In rewarding them, therefore, God does but literally crown his own gifts. (Ep. ccxxv. 19; ad Sist. Presb.) Or as he puts it elsewhere, "Intelligendum est igitur etiam hominis bona merita esset Dei munera, quibus cum vita aeterna redditor, quid nisi gratia pro gra tia redditur" (Enchirid. c. vii). Or as his faithful Interpreter, Prosper, beautifully puts it, "Duce Deo, venitur ad Deum" (de Vochat. i. 24).

Besides art. CHARMAN in the Dict. of Chr. Ant., and vol. xi. of the Ben. ed. of the works of St. Augustine generally, the following articles of this work must be consulted for special branches of the subject to avoid repetition:—Original Sin, Faith, Hope, Charity, Baptism, Enchirid, Ordination, or Holy Orders. Estius, in Sentent. ii. Dist. 26, is a storehouse of all the subtle points mooted or left in abeyance by St. Augustine, and discussed by others. For instance, whether grace is a habit, an act, a motion, or something intermediate; how it should be defined: whether it is distinct from, or the same with charity: whether it should be divided into created and increated, operating and co-operating, gratia gratis data, gratia gratum faciens, and so forth. But it was in the West almost wholly that they received any special treatment. Marschall’s Concord. Pat. continued by Schramm, and Fessler’s Inst. Patr., give the views incidentally expressed of other Fathers.

E. S. Ff.

GRACIANUS of Cagli. [GRATIANUS (3).]

GRACIANUS, martyr with the virgin Felicianus in the city of Falanis, being stoned and afterwards decapitated; commemorated Aug. 12 (Usuard. Mart.). Baronus (Itin. Mart. Aug. 12) gives the name of the city Faleria in Tuscany.

C. H.

GRADA, ST., the saint of a parish in the Lizard district in Cornwall. The parish feast is kept on the nearest Sunday to St. Luke’s Day.

C. W. B.

GRADESCUS, bishop of Sulmo (Salmona), c. A.D. 701. He appears to have succeeded St. Pamphilus, who was elected c. A.D. 682. (Ugelli, Ital. Sac. i. *253.)

R. S. G.

GRADUS, bishop. [GRATUS (5).]

GRÆEUS, bishop of Marseilles, succeeded Eustasius about 472. He is known to us only from Sidonius Apollinaris, who addresses him in laudatory terms (lib. vi. iii. vii. 2), but in vii. 7 confesses, with the high probability that he was instrumental in effecting a treaty, which was probably that between the emperor Neros and Euiic king of the Visigoths, the result of which was that while the Massilians were at peace the Arvernii were surrendered to the Goths and suffered terrible extremities. Sidonius roundly informs Graecus that this act placed him last instead of first among the bishops of the province, whence the Sammartinae infer that he had sought, through the favour of Euiic, to exercise the powers of metropolitan. He seems, however, afterwards to have been on good terms with Sidonius (Ep. vii. 11). (Gall. Christ. i. 635; Ceillier, Aut. ecc. x. 610.)

R. T. S.

GRAETIS, king of the Heruli. [GREPES.]

J. G.

GRAMMATICUS, addressed along with Gildas, Felix, and Eleusius, by Augustine, on the shamelessness with which the Donatists, though so often sentenced, persisted in their schism (August. ep. 43 al. 192. Opp. vol. 38. p. 422, ed. Gaubil). [C. H.]

GRAMMATIUS (1), bishop of Salerno (Salerno), probably e. A.D. 400, though some authorities place him much later. He is said to have succeeded Bonosius. (Boll. Acta SS. 11 Oct. v. 671; Ugelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 487.)

R. B. G.

GRAMMATIUS (2), ST., twenty-first bishop of Metz, between St. Phrornimus and Agatimber. He is said to have died in the fifteenth year of his episcopate (A.D. 512), on April 25, on which day he is commemorated at Metz. (Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 369; Gall. Chr. xvii. 587.)

S. A. B.

GRAMMATIUS (3), 4th bishop of Vindonissa (Windisch), from whence the see was soon afterwards transferred to Constance. He succeeded Bubulcus, and was followed by Maximus. He was present at three councils—that of Clermont in 533, the fourth of Orleans in 541, and the fifth in 549. (Mansi, viii. 863, ix. 120, 136; Gall. Christ. v. 892.)

S. A. B.

GRANIANUS, SERENIUS or SERENIUS, proconsul of Asia in the reign of Hadrian. He wrote to the emperor in the year 125 for instructions as to how Christians were to be dealt with, but the answer arrived to his successor Minutius Fundanus (Justin. Mart. Apol. i. 69; Euseb. H. E. iv. 9). In his Chronicle (sub ann. 125) Eusebius calls him Serenus Granianus, and states that he called Hadrian’s attention to the gross injustice of sacrificing the blood of innocent men to the clamours of the mob when they could be charged with so crime but that of belonging to a name and a sect.

GRANIANUS.

GAETUS, bishop of Marseilles, succeeded Eustasius about 472. He is known to us only from Sidonius Apollinaris, who addresses him in laudatory terms (lib. vi. 3, vii. 2), but in vii. 7 confesses, with the high probability that he was instrumental in effecting a treaty, which was probably that between the emperor Neros and Euiic king of the Visigoths, the result of which was that while the Massilians were at peace the Arvernii were surrendered to the Goths and suffered terrible extremities. Sidonius roundly informs Graecus that this act placed him last instead of first among the bishops of the province, whence the Sammartinae infer that he had sought, through the favour of Euiic, to exercise the powers of metropolitan. He seems, however, afterwards to have been on good terms with Sidonius (Ep. vii. 11). (Gall. Christ. i. 635; Ceillier, Aut. ecc. x. 610.)

R. T. S.

GRAETIS, king of the Heruli. [GREPES.]

J. G.

GRAMMATICUS, addressed along with Gildas, Felix, and Eleusius, by Augustine, on the shamelessness with which the Donatists, though so often sentenced, persisted in their schism (August. ep. 43 al. 192. Opp. vol. 38. p. 422, ed. Gaubil). [C. H.]

GRAMMATIUS (1), bishop of Salerno (Salerno), probably c. A.D. 400, though some authorities place him much later. He is said to have succeeded Bonosius. (Boll. Acta SS. 11 Oct. v. 671; Ugelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 487.)

R. B. G.

GRAMMATIUS (2), ST., twentieth bishop of Metz, between St. Phrornimus and Agatimber. He is said to have died in the fifteenth year of his episcopate (A.D. 512), on April 25, on which day he is commemorated at Metz. (Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 369; Gall. Chr. xvii. 587.)

S. A. B.

GRAMMATIUS (3), 4th bishop of Vindonissa (Windisch), from whence the see was soon afterwards transferred to Constance. He succeeded Bubulcus, and was followed by Maximus. He was present at three councils—that of Clermont in 533, the fourth of Orleans in 541, and the fifth in 549. (Mansi, viii. 863, ix. 120, 136; Gall. Christ. v. 892.)

S. A. B.

GRANIANUS, SERENIUS or SERENIUS, proconsul of Asia in the reign of Hadrian. He wrote to the emperor in the year 125 for instructions as to how Christians were to be dealt with, but the answer arrived to his successor Minutius Fundanus (Justin. Mart. Apol. i. 69; Euseb. H. E. iv. 9). In his Chronicle (sub ann. 125) Eusebius calls him Serenus Granianus, and states that he called Hadrian’s attention to the gross injustice of sacrificing the blood of innocent men to the clamours of the mob when they could be charged with so crime but that of belonging to a name and a sect.

GRANIANUS.

GAETUS, bishop of Marseilles, succeeded Eustasius about 472. He is known to us only from Sidonius Apollinaris, who addresses him in laudatory terms (lib. vi. 3, vii. 2), but in vii. 7 confesses, with the high probability that he was instrumental in effecting a treaty, which was probably that between the emperor Neros and Euiic king of the Visigoths, the result of which was that while the Massilians were at peace the Arvernii were surrendered to the Goths and suffered terrible extremities. Sidonius roundly informs Graecus that this act placed him last instead of first among the bishops of the province, whence the Sammartinae infer that he had sought, through the favour of Euiic, to exercise the powers of metropolitan. He seems, however, afterwards to have been on good terms with Sidonius (Ep. vii. 11). (Gall. Christ. i. 635; Ceillier, Aut. ecc. x. 610.)

R. T. S.

GRAETIS, king of the Heruli. [GREPES.]

J. G.

GRAMMATICUS, addressed along with Gildas, Felix, and Eleusius, by Augustine, on by the Bollandists contain a highly coloured tale of ignorant fanaticism and persecution, admiration at the Christians' constancy and consequent conversion, baptism by bishop Florentius, open profession, trial, torture, and death.

[J. G.]

GRATIANUS (2) (Gatianus), martyr at Amiens, not mentioned in Ado and Usuardus; but from a MS. martyrology preserved at Corbeil he found a place in the Asutorias to Usuardus. The date of the martyrdom is fixed between 283 and 287. The legend runs that in his last moments he fixed in the ground a hazel twig which he carried, and which immediately put forth leaves and blossoms; a miracle which the MS. declares to be repeated annually though the festival occurs so late in the season as the end of October (Boll. AA. SS. 23 Oct. x. 18).

[R. T. S.]

GRATIANUS (3) (Gregianus), the first known bishop of Callium (Cagli), present at the council held at Rimini, A.D. 359, protesting strongly against the Arian bishops and their doctrines. He is supposed to have also attended the council of Seleucia in the same year. (Hilar. Pictav. Pros. vii. al. viii. p. 685 in Patr. Lat. xi. 697 e.; Uebh. Itali. Soc. ii. 691; Cappelletti, La Chiese d'Ital. iii. 236.)

[R. S. G.]

GRATIANUS (4). Callidius Gratianus, the officer called Curator Beipublicae at Aptunga, at the time of the inquiry into the case of Felix bishop of Aptunga. [Petr (265)]. (Opt. i. 265.)

[H. W. P.]

GRATIANUS (5) (Flavius Gratianus Augustus), Christian emperor, eldest son of Valentinian I., born A.D. 359; named Augustus by his father, 367; succeeded to his father, Nov. 375; succeeded to his uncle Valens, 378; murdered, Aug. 25, 383.

[1. Authoritics. 2. Life. 3. Character. 4. Ecclesiastical Policy.]

1. Authorities.—Of the secular writers who treat of this period, the principal is the contemporary Ammianus Marcellinus (p. c.), books 37-91. His work finishes with the death of Valentian, and his next book (book 4), who lived in the middle of the 5th century, is the next in importance. Two of the orations of the younger Symmachus refer to Gratian; one delivered on his appointment as Augustus, when he was eight years old, the other on his accession, after Valentinian's death and the execution of Maximinus (Oratio pro patre, p. 44, ed. Mai, 1815). Themistius, the rhetorician of Constantinople, pronounced a curious address on the same occasion in the senate at Rome, viz. Θεμιστίου, § περὶ αὐτοῦ Βασίλειον (Orat. 13). The works of his tutor Ausonius contain several references to his royal pupil; the most important for his reign is the graecorum actio pro consulatu, an oration delivered at Treves in 379. Of the letters of Gratian, some are addressed to Gratian (lib. x. ep. 2; cp. i. 13), thanking him for making him his mouthpiece in the senate soon after his accession; another, the well-known relatio to Valentinian II. and Theodosius (ibid. ep. 61), gives some account of the proceedings with regard to the altar of Victory. In reply to this we have two letters of St. Ambrose, Nos. 17, 18, and the poem of Prodeius; but these really belong to another reign. St. Ambrose is the most important of ecclesiastical...
GRATIANUS, EMPEROR

case was apparently not unlike that of Constantius Chlorus and Helena, and the repudiation of Severa was followed by a match with Jovita, the widow of Magnentius—a beautiful and well-connected Sicilian lady, whose former marriage probably made her popular with many of the troops (Zos. iv. 19, 43; Amm. xxviii. 2, 10).

Hence it was not surprising that, when Valentinian died suddenly of apoplexy at Bregenz, on Lake Constance, in Nov. 375, the infant child of his second marriage (Valentinian II.) was proclaimed Augustus by his principal officers, headed by Merobaudes (Amm. xxx. 10). This bold act was done in reliance upon the youth and good nature of Gratian, who was at Treves at the time, and who recognised his young brother almost immediately. Richter interprets it as a scheme of Merobaudes to keep the crown in the family of Valentinian, as many of the soldiers were axious to make the heathen general Sebastianus emperor (pp. 283–286 and note). Jovita fixed her court at Sirmium, and the Western empire was perhaps nominally divided between the two brothers. Gratian having Gaul, Spain, and Britain, and Valentinian Italy, Ly- ricum, and Africa. The division must have been simply nominal, as Gratian constantly acted in the latter provinces (see Tillemont, Emp. v. p. 140, and cp. the laws quoted in § 4).

For the first years of his reign, till the death of Valens, Gratian resided chiefly at Treves, from whence most of his laws are dated. One of his first acts was to exempt Ancyra from tax, and by her advice he proceeded to punish some of the prominent instruments of the cruelties committed in the name of justice and discipline, which had disgraced his father's later years. He put to death the hated Maximinus, as well as his successors in power at Rome, Simplicius and Doryphorians (Amm. xxviii. 1, 57); and he issued an edict which exempted senators from trial before inferior judges, and gave them assurance of being heard before a court composed of men of their own rank (Cod. Theod. i. 1, 13). Tillemont concludes with great probability that this was the letter sent to Symmachus to read in the senate, of which he speaks in such grateful and flattering terms (Epist. x. 2, and i. 15; the latter is to Ausonius). Another and a more illustrious victim of the reaction was the Count Theodosius, who had suppressed the rebellions of Firmus in Africa with strenuous loyalty and great military skill, but with considerable harshness. He was executed at Carthage in a.d. 376, but whether the disgrace of this act should attach to Gratian or Valens is not quite certain. (Oros. vii. 35; cp. Socr. iv. 9, where the MSS. read, Θεοδοσίου ου Θεοδοσίου ηλικία τ&oacute;ν γενε&omicr&omicron;ς εκ τ&omicr&omicron; των εν αυτω ρω&omicr&omicron;τω τ&omicr&omicron; ιερασίων. Socrates connects his death with the supposed conspiracy against Valens, and the execution of many whose names began with the syllables Θεοδ.; cp. Amm. xxix. 1, 32.) Richter ascribes his death to the fear and jealousy of Merobaudes, but this is a pure conjecture (pp. 401, 402). This removal of a popular prince she was to be the instrument of the general relaxation of severity in all branches of the public service, especially in that of the foecit. Theismius, speaking in the Roman senate in praise of the young emperor, whom he had just visited, says: "Lamentations are banished from the court, and the instruments of torture are left to rust. The baneful accountants and criminal exactors of old and forgotten arrears have so disappeared that their names are no more remembered, and fire has destroyed all that remained of them." (Orat. 13, p. 175 c, Paris, 1864. Cp. the similar passage in Ausonius pro consulatis, towards the end.) This burning of the official records of public liabilities in the marketplace of each city was no doubt a great boon to the corporations, which had suffered much under Valentinian. But these popular concessions at starting did not ensure contentment on the part of the provinces or good government on that of the emperor.

Another act of Gratian's which it is natural to place at the beginning of his reign showed his determination to break with paganism more effectually than his predecessors had done. This was his refusal to the robe of pontifex maximus, when it was brought to him according to custom by the pontificates; thinking (as the heathen historian tells us) that it was unlawful for a Christian priest to wear it. The title appears indeed to some extent on coins and inscriptions, but it is not easy to fix the date of those monuments. One which is most frequently quoted, e.g. by Clinton, F. R. 2, p. 122 = Orell. 1118, at Emerita, is condemned by Hübner on other grounds. (Inscr. Bap. C. I. L. ii. 452a.) The inscription on the bridge of St. Bartholomew is of course not in point. More remarkable is the language of his tutor Ausonius, who, in his gratiarum actio pro consulatis addressed to Gratian in 379, seems to dwell upon this particular office with evident meaning and emphasis. In allusion to his different titles, he calls him, "Pietatique imperator, virtute victor, Augustus sanctitatis, pontificis religiosi, indulgentia patris," and suggests that the consular emilia be called Pontificialis, "Sic potius, sic victor, quae in Pontificis Maximus Deo participiatus habuit" (cf. "operto conclusiva tui non sanctior ara Vestalis, non Pontificis cubile catius, nec pulvinar Plaminis tam pudicum.

Begnet argues that Ausonius could not have used this language after Gratian's refusal of the office (Destruction du Paganisme en Occident, I, p. 354, where he erroneously puts the consularship of Ausonius in A.D. 382), but this seems doubtful. He might well, in this way, insinuate his wish that the emperor should not altogether break with the old religion to which previous Christian sovereigns had so far accommodated themselves. Such a feeling seems suitable to the character of a man like Ausonius, who was a Christian by profession, but was attached to the old way of thinking by many ties of literary sympathy and personal friendship.

The Eastern empire in the meantime was in great danger in the hands of the incompetent Valens. A large mass of Goths obtained leave to cross the Danube, being pressed southwards by the Huns, who now appear almost for the first time in history. The crossing and settlement of the new-comers was grossly managed by the officers of Valens; and from suppliants the Goths soon became dangerous enemies. Gratian sent a certain number of troops under Richomeres to aid his uncle, but the greater part of them deserted, it was said, on the advice of Merobaudes, who feared, not without reason, to leave Gaul undefended (Amm. xxxi, 7, 4). In 378 the Alamanni invaded the Rhine in great force and threatened the Western empire, but were heavily defeated by Gratian at Argentaria, near Colmar (ibid. xxxi. 10). This set him free to move towards the East; and he had reached Sirmium on his way thither when he heard of the great defeat suffered by his uncle, and of his ignoble death after the battle of Adrianople, Aug. 7 (Amm. xxxi, 11, 6; 12, 10).

The situation was extremely critical, especially for an emperor not yet twenty years of age. The barbarians were in motion on all the frontiers. The internal condition of the West was insecure, from the tacit antagonism between the two courts, and the East was now suddenly thrown upon his hands, as Valens had left no children. In this emergency Gratian showed his judgment by sending for the younger Theodosius, about thirteen years older than himself, who after his father's execution was living in retirement upon his estates in Spain (Victor, Epit. 72, 74, &c.; cp. Themist. Orat. 14, p. 183 a). The youth was loyally distressed for his father, and was at once entrusted with the command of the troops as magister militum. His successes over the barbarians (probably Sarmatians) encouraged Gratian to a more decided step, and he was appointed emperor of the East with general applause. (Theodorez, v. 5, 6, is the only writer who describes these successes of Theodosius before he became emperor, but they are evidently referred to by Themistius, Or. xiv. p. 182 c, and Pacatus, Paneg. Theodori, 10, 2; see Richter, p. 691, note 26.)

Gratian returned from Sirmium to the West by way of Aquileia and Milan, at which places he passed some parts of the months of July and August 379. Before his expedition he had been brought into contact with St. Ambrose, and had received from him the two first books of his treatise de Fide, intended specially to preserve him against Arianism. This teaching had its dual effect; and on his way back he addressed a letter to the bishop of Milan, which is given below (§ 4). St. Ambrose sent him two more books of his treatise, and probably had some other direct personal intercourse with him. Gratian then went on to his usual residence at Treves, and received in the autumn from his old tutor Ausonius a turbid panegyric consisting of congratulations on his victories and thanks for the consularship bestowed while he was at Sirmium. During the following years, however, the emperor resided much more frequently at Milan and in the neighbourhood, especially during the winter. He wished, no doubt, to be nearer the Eastern empire, and not less, perhaps, to enjoy the society of St. Ambrose, whose strength of character and experience as a civil officer (before he became bishop) fitted him particularly to be the director of an amiable and well-versed but somewhat indolent prince. The results which flowed from this intercourse in the confirmation of Gratian in the Catholic faith will be noticed below. There was, however, another side to this practical neglect of the Gallic provinces. The Western provincials—never very contented—felt, no doubt, rather keenly the absence of the imperial court. If Gratian had continued to reside at Treves, the rebellion of Magnus Maximus would perhaps never have taken place, and certainly would not have grown to such formidable dimensions.

The influence of St. Ambrose is shewn by the ecclesiastical laws, of which we shall speak in § 5. It is thus that Ambrose upheld the old religion in its stronghold. This was the famous removal of the altar of Victory from the senate-house at Rome in the year 381 (S. Ambros. Epist. 17, 5; Symm. Epist. 61, ad init. et ad finem). The heathen senators, though the minority in number, were accustomed to offer incense on this altar, and to touch it in taking solemn oaths (Ambr. Ep. 17, 9). It had been removed or covered over during the visit of Constantius, but was again restored under Julian, and Valentinian's policy had been against interference with such matters (Symm. l. c.). Its removal now caused great distress to the heathen party, who met in the senate-house and despatched a petition to Gratian for its restoration. The latter, who had absented himself from the curia on this occasion, met privately, and sent a counter-petition through pope Damasus to Ambrose, who of course presented it to the emperor (S. Ambr. Ep. 17, 9: "Nam et ante biniem ferme cum hoc petere tentaret, misit ad me s. Damasum ... libellum, quem Christiani Senatores dederunt, et quidem innumerum, postulantes nihil tene mandasse, non congruere gentilium istiusmodi petitionibus," &c.) The weight of this document enabled the advisers of Gratian to prevent his giving the heathen party a hearing. (Symm. l. c.: "Divi principis denegata est ab imprudens audientia"; and at the end, "Praestate etiam divi fratri vestro alieni consilio correctionem ... constat exclusam legationem ne ad eum iudicium publicum perveniret.") This blow was soon followed by another even more telling—the confiscation of the revenues of the temple of Victory, and the abolition of the privileges which belonged to the pontiffs and vestals, a measure which was extended to other heathen institutions. (S. Ambros. Ep. 17, 3-5, and 18, 11 foll.; Cod. Theod. xv. 10, 20. "omnia enim locorum sacrorum privativa, secum divi Gratiani constituta nostrae rei iustum sociari"—a law of Honorius in 415.)

These laws were followed by a famine in Italy and particularly in Rome, which the pagans naturally ascribed to sacrilege. (Symm. Ep. x. 61, "Secuta est fames publica et spem provinciarum omnium mensus segra decepta ... sacrilegii annus exauritus..."") The barbarian, moreover, was very unpopular and harsh measure was adopted of expelling all foreigners from Rome. (Symm. Ep. ii. 7, "defectum timentem annuana pulvis omnium quos exercito et pleno ubere Roma susceperrat ... Quanto nobis odio provinciarum constat illa securitas?"") It has been conjectured that this is the famine of which St. Ambrose speaks, during which he a. (ChroN.) prefect of the city called together the nobility, and prevented the carrying out of the proposal to expel strangers by raising a public subscription. (Ambros. de Officia Ministeriorum, iii. 7. This is the opinion of De Broglie (vol. vi. p. 43), and is suggested by Tillemont, Emp. Gratian, art. 16, p. 173, "cetait peutétre dans de cette année.") But a careful comparison of the passages of Cyprianus and St. Ambrose makes it probable that the action of the Christian prefect took place in a previous year, and that the order to expel strangers was actually carried out in 382. The city prefect in 382 was Anicius Achenius Basus (Cod. Theod. i. 6, 8). St. Ambrose in fact says that such a measure had not been seen at Rome in a long time. (L. c. § 49, "quanto hoc utilius quam illud quod proxime Roma factum est electos esse urbe amplissima," &c. This book was written probably about 390.)

A much more serious danger was the revolt of Magnus Maximus, a former comrade of Theodosius in Britain, who was probably jealous of his honours, and was now put forward as emperor by the soldiers [MAXIMUS]. This rising took place in the year 383 in Britain, where the usurper passed over to the mouth of the Rhine, gathering large bodies of men as he went. Gratian set out to meet him, with his two generals Balio and Merobaudes, the latter a Frank by birth. The two armies met near Paris, and Gratian was deserted by nearly all his troops (Zos. iv. 35; St. Ambros. in Ps. 61, 17). Only three hundred horse remained faithful. With these he fled at full speed, and succeeded in arriving at Lyons. The governor of the place, it would seem, received him with protestations of loyalty, and took a solemn oath on the Gospels not to hurt him. Gratian was deceived by his assurances, and took his place in his imperial robes at a feast, during or soon after which he was basely assassinated, on Aug. 25. The traitor even denied his holy burial. (S. Ambros. in Psalm. 61, §§ 17, 23 foll. Marcellinus sub anno: "Gratianus imp. Maximi tyranni dolo apud Lugdunum occussus est viol. Kal. Sep." Zosimus, iv. 35, puts the place of his death at Singidunum, Belgrade, in Moesia, οδρ ιεροτοδοσίας; but he probably means ιεροτοδοσία in one of his authorities: cp. Hieron. Epist. ad Hieroldorum de morte Nepotiani, p. 24. Gratianus exercuit suo proditos et ab omnibus urbis urbem receptuos, ludibrio hosti fuit; crucienteque manus vestigia paries sui Lugduni testantur; see also Rufin. ii. 14.) Greek writers ascribe his death to the stratagems of Andragathius, the master of the eunuchs who were in the palace, with the object of pursuing the emperor. Socrates relates that Andragathius concealed himself in a litter, in which it is said that Gratian's newly married wife, Laeta, was being carried, and that the emperor, hurring to open the litter, was thus surprised and slain (Soc. v. 11; cp. Zos. i. c.). S. Ambrose tells us that Gratian called upon him in his last moments—"Me inter tua pericula requirerbas, tu in tuis extremis me appellerbas, meum de te plus dolebas dolorum" (de obitu Valentiniani, 80).

His generals Balio and Merobaudes were pursued by the soldiers of Maximus, and perished miserably, perhaps by their own hands. (St. Ambr. Ep. 24, 11; Fac. Pusey. Theodoto, 28, ed. Migne, Patr. xiii. 16, p. 50.)

Gratian thus perished miserably at the age of 24. He was twice married—first (at the age of 16) to Constantia, only and posthumous child of Constantius II., three years younger than himself, who died before him (Amm. Marc. xxii. 15, 8; xiii. 6, 7); secondly, to Laeta, shortly before his death (Soc. vii. 13; Zos. v. 30), says that she and her mother, Pelagiana, were living in Rome in 392, during the siege by Alaric. He left no children.
GRATIANUS, EMPEROR

725

(Thedoret, v. 12), and any that he may have had by Constantia must have died in infancy. (S. Ambros. de Fide, i. 20, ad finem, "sint idem pignoris sui praeferat." It is now agreed that the right reading in S. Aug. de Civ. Dei, v. 15, is "cum parvulum haberet fratrem," not "et fratrem.")

3. Character.—Gratian's character is known to us from a good many sources, which agree in their general result. (S. Ambros. xxiii. 10, with the following references.) He was in many respects the exact opposite of his father, Valentinian. He was amiable and modest, in fact too modest to be a good governor in these rough times ("plus vereundus quam repetueuro intercett," Rufin. ii. 13). He was generous and kind-hearted, of an attractive disposition and beautiful person. (For the latter, see Themistius, ep. ad Euseb. Basiliensem; traces of his beauty are, however, hardly to be found on his coins.) His education had been carefully conducted, and his tutor Ausonius had taken pains to inspire him with tastes for rhetoric and versification. He was chaste and temperate, and careful in religious observances for the benefit of the State. (Ambros. de Obiiti Valent. 74, "fuit...declitis in Domino, pius atque mansuetus, puro corde. Fuit etiam castus corpore, qui prater coniugium nescerit feminae alius consuetudinem." His murderers calumniated him on this point, id. in Psalm. 61; so also the Arian Philostorgius, x. 5, compared him to Nero.) His great fault was a neglect of public business through an inordinate devotion to sport, especially to hunting wild beasts with bow and arrows in his parks and preserves (Amm. l. c.; Victor. Epit. 73). His skill in this exercise was comparable to that of Commodus; he once killed a lion with a single arrow (Aus. Epig. 6); and even St. Ambrose alludes to his prowess in the chase in the midst of his pathetic reminiscences, adopting the language of David's elegy over Jonathan.—"Gratiani regis castum esse scriptum est..." (de Obiiti Valent. 13; cp. the old Latin of 2 Sam. i. 22).

The character given by Victor is worth quoting. "Fuit autem Gratiatus litteris haud meliocritor institutus: carmen facere, ornare loci, explicare controversias rhetorum more... Parus ebi somneque... et vini ac libidinis victor; canensque fuisse plenus bonis, si ad magistros opera peripatetica gerenda scientiam minimum intendisset, a qua propere alienus, non modo voluntate sed etiam exercicio fuit." (Epit. 73.) This distaste for public business he seems to have carried even into military matters. He gained one great victory, but on other occasions he seemed rather to have shrunk from war. He is said to have alienated his army by the favours which he showed the Alans, whom he spent large sums, and in whose company he delighted so much as even to wear their dress, to the neglect of the Roman soldiery. (Victor. l. c.; Zos. iv. 35. For the Alans, see the description in Amm. xxxi. 2, 12 foll.)

4. Ecclesiastical Policy.—The ecclesiastical policy of Gratian was more important than his civil or military government. His reign, coinciding with that of Theodosius, saw orthodox Christianity for the first time dominant throughout the empire. Constantine had been too uninstructed to understand the full meaning of theological questions; and he was in his latter years under strong Arian influences. Under Constantius a form of semi-Arianism had been established with all the power of the state. Then came the reaction under Julian, which, though unsuccessful, had materially altered the relations of church and state. His orthodox successor Jovian had reigned but a few months, and Valentinian, though a Catholic, had aimed at a rather strict impartiality; while Valens was a thorough and a persecuting Arian. The reign of Gratian is therefore a noteworthy epoch in church history.

We have already mentioned the most important measures taken by Gratian with respect to the old religion—his refusal of the robe of pontifex maximus; his removal of the altar of Victory from the senate-house, and his confiscation of the temple revenues in Rome. We may here take occasion to refer to an act which was possibly connected with the first of these exhibitions of feeling on the part of the emperor, the destruction of the sanctuary of Mithra by Gracchus, who was prefect of the city in the second year of his reign (S. Hieronym. Epist. ad Lactam, 7, tom. i. p. 51 e, ed. Paris, 1643; Beugnot, Destruction du Panayismes, i. p. 366).

Yet this wonderful act, it is needless to say, went on, especially among certain families, for a considerable period longer.

The laws relating to the stage, particularly to actresses and dancers, are rather numerous, viz. seven in the years 376, 380, and 381 (C. Theod. xv. 7, 3—9). They showed a desire to reform the public spectacles, and grant Christian women the privilege of retiring from the stage. But they betray an evident caution in dealing with so popular an institution, and grate upon our more refined taste by taking for granted that the life of an actress must of necessity be vicious. A Christian woman of this kind, who has relapsed, is condemned to infamy without further reproof in the following ghastly terms: "retrecta in pulpitum, sine ipsis absolutione uulnus ibi non staying, permanent, donee absolutio... nec tune quidem absolutione... sed cum aliqui quam castis esse non possint." (Cod. Theod. xv. 7, 8, May 8, 381, from Aquileia).

We now pass to a series of measures more directly affecting the church, and some of them of very great importance.

It is to be regretted that Gratian's measures in behalf of the church were often tainted with injustice (as it appears to us) towards the sects. But it is probable that the laws were very imperfectly carried out (see Richter, p. 327).

His first general law against heretical sects is dated from Treves, May 1, 376, and speaks of a precious law of the same kind (Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 4); the previous law may, however, be one of Constantine's (Ambrosian) and not, as Richter thinks, of Gratian.

In 377, shortly before the death of Valens, he condemned re-baptism, and ordered that the Donatist churches should be restored to the Catholics, and that their private meeting-houses should be confiscated ("Ad Flavianum Vicarium Africam," himself a Donatist, Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 2. It is dated at Constantinople, but this can hardly be correct: see Tillemont, v. note 12, p. 714). The death of Valens was naturally the signal for the discipline of St. Ambrose to restore the Catholics of the East to their possessions. He recalled all those whom his uncle had banished, and further issued an edict of toleration for all Christian sects, except the Eunomians (extreme Arians, see Soz. vi. 26), Photinians, and Manichaeans. (Soc. v. 2; Soz. vii. 1.) Theodoret, v. 2, appears to confuse this with the later edict of Gratian and Theodosius. The condemnation of the Manichaeans was extended on the strong representations of Hacicus of Merida to the Priscillianists, an enthusiastic Maslenian, who had made much progress in Spain (Sulpicius Severus, Chron. ii. 47, 6). Some better terms were, however, afterwards procured from them through the interest of Macedonius, master of the offices, to whom they gave large bribes. This did not, however, amount to direct toleration (as Richter assumes, p. 524), but to the transference of their case to another court (Sulp. Serv. Chron. ii. 49). The date of this concession was probably quite late in the reign of Gratian.

On his return from Sirmium, Gratian wrote the following affectionate and interesting autograph (Anbr. Ep. 1, 3) letter to St. Ambrose, desiring him to come and meet him; "I desire much, my pious, my wise, my holier, my more holy friend, I am filled with recollection I carry with me, and with whom I am present in spirit. Therefore, hasten to me, religious priest of God, to teach me the doctrine of the true faith. Not that I am anxious for argument, or wish to know God in words rather than in spirit; but that my heart may be opened more fully to receive the abiding revelation of the divinity. For He teach me, whom I do not deny, whom I confess to be my God and my Lord, not raising as an objection against His divinity that He took upon Himself a created nature like my own [non ei obiciens, quam in me video, creaturam]. I confess that I can add nothing to the glory of Christ; but I should wish to commend myself to the Father in glorifying the Son. I will not fear a grudging spirit on the part of God. I shall not suppose myself such an encomiast as to increase His divinity by my praise. In my weakness and frailty I utter what I can, not what is adequate to His divinity. I desire you to send me a copy of the same treatise, which you sent before [de Rdo. i. ii.], enlarging it by a faithful dissertation on the Holy Spirit: prove that He is God by scripture and reason. May the Deity keep you for many years, my father, and worshipper of the eternal God, Jesus Christ, whom we worship." (This letter is prefixed to St. Ambrose's Epistles.) St. Ambrose replies,exclusive his non-attendance upon the emperor, praising the expressions of his faith, and sending two fresh books of his treatise. For the new books De Spiritu Sancto, he asks time, knowing (as he says) what a critic will read them. The subject was, we may remark, being at this moment largely discussed in the Eastern church. [See Council of Constantinople, in Dict. of Chr. Antiq. i. 437.]

It is assumed by De Broglie that the bishop and the emperor did not meet at this time, but St. Ambrose writes in a letter just quoted, § 7, "veniam plane et festinabo ut iubes," and two laws of Gratian's are dated from Milan in July and August 379 (Cod. Just. vi. 32, 4, July 29, and Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 5, August 3, to Hesperius Pr. Pract. de haereticis). The second of these is important, and may shew the influence of St. Ambrose. It forbids the heresies against which former imperial edicts had been directed, and especially that of re-baptism (the Donatists), and revokes the recent tolerant edict of Sirmium ("antiquato rescripto, quod apud Sirmium nuper emeritis, ea tantum super catholica observatione permaneant quae perennis recordationis pater noster et nos," &c.).

In a letter dated July 5, at Ariminum, he had exempted the clergy in Italy, Illyricum, and Gaul, whose incomes were below a certain sum, from payment of the chrysargyrum (Cod. Theod. xiii. 1, 11); and it is quite possible that St. Ambrose may have met him there, and travelled with him to Milan.

About this time must be dated the occurrences mentioned by St. Ambrose in his book De Spiritu Sancto, i. §§ 19-21. The empress Justina, who was an Arian, had obtained from Gratian a basilica for the worship of her sect, to the great distress of the Catholica. He restored it however, apparently of his own motion, to their equal surprise and delight, perhaps in the year 380 (cp. Richter, note 30, p. 692; De Spiritu Sancto, § 20, neque enim aliud est quis homini subito Basilicam reddidisti). St. Ambrose also obtained another victory over the Arians in 380 in his journey to Sirmium, where Justina apparently also went. In spite of her vehement opposition, he succeeded in consecrating an orthodox bishop to the metropolitan see of Illyria, and thus laid the foundation for the suppression of heresy in that quarter of the empire. (Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii, 11.)

We cannot doubt then that Gratian agreed, not only in name but in feeling, with the important edict issued by his colleague Theodosius on Feb. 27, 380, from Thessalonica and addressed to the people of Constantinople. This remarkable document declared the desire of the emperor that all their subjects should profess the religion given by St. Peter to the Romans, and now held by the pontiff Damascus, and Peter, bishop of Alexandria—that is to say, should confess the one deity and equal majesty of the three persons of the Blessed Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

This decree further declares that they also who hold this faith are to be called Catholics, and their places of meeting churches; while the rest are branded as heretics, and are threatened with an indefinite punishment (Cod. Theod. xvi. 1, 2; cp. the law of the next year, which mentions various Catholic bishops of the East, whose communion was to be the test of orthodoxy, including Nectarius of Constantinople—perhaps the reference to Damascus had given offence).

De Broglie says of these laws, "it was impossible to abjure more decidedly the pretension of dogmatizing from the elevation of the three, which had been since Constantine the means of all the emperors and the scourge of the empire" (vol. v. p. 365). But correct dogmatism is still dogmatism, and the definition of truth by edict emperors kept up the delusion that the right of perpetual interference with religion was inherent in their office.

We have said that Gratian resided more frequently at Milan during his later years that he had previously done, especially during the winter months. From this place he issued two of the laws we have mentioned with respect to the stage. In July 381, he ordered that criminals should be set at liberty at Easter, with the exception of greater offenders (Cod. Theod. x. 38, 6). In May 383, at Padua, he issued a penal law against apostates, and those who try to make others apostatize from Christianity. Whoever turns to heathenism, Judaism, or Manicheism, is to be deprived of the right of making a will. Those who have drawn them over are equally punished, and even heavier penalties may be inflicted by the judges.
GRATIANUS, EMPEROR

In citing these laws, we have anticipated a little the course of events. In 381 Gratian summoned the council of Aquileia (which met on Sept. 5) to decide the cases of the Illyrian bishops Palladius and Secundianus, who were accused of Arianism. Their condemnation put an end to the official life of Arianism in that important district (S. Ambros. Epist. 9). The records of this council are preserved in the works of St. Ambrose, who took the chief part in it, though he did not technically preside. (They follow his eighth epistle in the Benedictine edition.) The same council took up the case of pope Damasus and consulted the emperor to interfere against the partisans of the antipope Ursinus (S. Amb. Ep. 11). The relations of Gratian with the see of Rome are somewhat obscure, but it is pretty clear that some extension of its privileges and pretensions dates from this reign. According to the documents first published by Sirmond, a synod held in Rome soon after Gratian's accession made large demands for ecclesiastical jurisdiction and particularly asked that the bishop of Rome should only be judged by a council of bishops or by the emperor in person. Gratian in his rescript to Aquilinus the vicar (of Rome?) grants and confirms several privileges, but says nothing of the latter request. Some doubt hangs over the whole of these documents. (See Godefroy, Cod. Theod. vol. vi. appendix, pp. 17, 18; Baronius, Annu., sub anno 381, §§ 1, 2; Tillemont, Danus, arts. 10 and 11; Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, vol. i. pp. 239–242; Hefele, Concilia, § 91, does not even hint at the existence of these documents.)

In consequence of the success of the council of Aquileia St. Ambrose was anxious to call together an ocumenical assembly at Rome to settle the dispute between Nectarius and Maximus, who both claimed the see of Constantinople, and pressed the emperor Theodosius on the point (Epist. 13 and 14). Theodosius, however, naturally viewed this interference with coldness (Theodoret, v. 8, 9). A council, nevertheless, met at Rome, but without doing much beyond condemning the Apollinarians.

On his return to Milan St. Ambrose took leave of the young emperor for the last time. Their intercourse had been always tender and affectionate, and was (as we have seen) the last thought of the emperor's before his death. We may here mention an instance of St. Ambrose's conduct with respect to Gratian, which may have been at this or at any other period of their friendship (De Broglie, to make a point, puts it here, vol. vi. p. 45, but neither Paulinus, § 37, nor Sozomen, vii. 25, gives any hint of the date). A heathen of quality was condemned to death for abusing Gratian and calling him an unworthy son of Valentine. As he was being led to execution, Ambrose hurried to the palace to intercede for him. One Macedonian, master of the offices, it would seem ordered the servants to refuse him admittance, as Gratian was engaged in his favourite sport. Ambrose went round to the park gates, and entered unperceived amongst the huntsmen, and never left Gratian till he had pleaded his cause to a Council which those of his courtiers and obtained remission of the sentence. "The time will come," he said to Macedonus, "when you will fly for asylum to the church, but the church doors will be shut against you." (Paulinus, Vita S. Ambrosii, 37.)

The anecdote of the criminal is told by Sozomen, i. c.; the words to Macedonus are given by Paulinus. [J. W.]

GRATIANUS (6), made emperor by the soldiers in Britain in 407, as successor to Marcus. He retained power for four months, when he was put to death and succeeded by Constantine. (Soc. E. ix. 11; Zosim. vi. 2; Oros. vii. 4; Bede, i. 11; Olympiodorus, ad init.)

GRATIANUS (8) (Gratianus), bishop of Panormum (Palermo), c. 451. He was at the council of Chalcedon in that year. He is said to have been succeeded by Mamilianus. (Pirri, Scil. Sacr. i. 15.) [R. S. G.]

GRATIANUS (9), bishop of Toulon, said to have been martyred by Euric king of the Visigoths about the year 472 (Gall. Christ. i. 741). [R. T. S.]

GRATIANUS (10), eighth bishop of Orleans in the latter part of 5th century (Gall. Christ, viii. 1413). [R. T. S.]

GRATIANUS (11), second bishop of Dax, the first having been St. Vincent, though at what date is unknown. He was present at the council of Agde in a.d. 506. The authors of the Gallia Christiana quote from an old breviary of the church of Dax to the effect that when peace was at length restored to the church, and unbelievers banished or converted, he turned his whole attention to the restoration of the church of St. Vincent, which had been defiled by the superstition of the heathen, and restored it to the services of the true God. (Gall. Christ. i. 1038; Manet, viii. 337.) [S. A. B.]

GRATIANUS of Numentum. [Gratiosus (2).]

GRATIANUS (12), bishop of Novara, who signed the second epistle of pope Agatho in 680. (Manet, xi. 307; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRATIANUS (13), bishop of Velitri (Veltrui), c. A.D. 621, subscribed a decree of Paul I. (Manet, xii. 645; Patr. Lat. lxix. 1194; Casparelli, Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 460.) [R. S. G.]

GRATIDIUS (14), bishop of Cerasus, in Pontus, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Manet, vi. 571 e.). He signs the epistle of the Pontic bishop to the emperor Leo as Gratianus (Manet, vii. 605; Le Quien, O. C. i. 513.) [C. H.]
GRATIANUS—Aug. 12. Martyr in the Diocletian persecution with the virgin Felicissima at Faleone, a city of Piacenza, or according to Baronius at Falerium (Civita Castellana). Ferrarius (Cat. SS.) tells us that their bodies were preserved at Civita Castellana, and honoured there. Their acts are very corrupt and worthless in a historical point of view. (Mart. Usuard.; Acta SS. Boll. Aug. ii. 728.)

G. T. S.

G. T. S.

GRATIANUS, bishop of Egabro (Cabra), from a.d. 681 to 687, present at the thirteenth council of Toledo, a.d. 683. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 287; Exp. Supr. xlii. 30.) [Sinaguus.] [M. A. W.]

GRATIOSUS (1), thought to have been bishop of Numana or Umbrana (Umano), present at the council held at Rome by Gregory the Great, a.d. 595. (UgHELLi, Itali. Soc. i. 743; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iv. i. 79, 191.) But Numentum is the reading of the see in Mansi, x. 486. Vذ. following article. [R. S. G.]

GRATIOSUS (2) (GRATIANUS), bishop of Numentum (La Montana). Gregory the Great writes to him to unite with his see that of St. Anthemius in Curium Sabinorum territorio, on account of the desolation of the church and deficiency of inhabitants. (Lib. iii. indit. xi. Ep. 20.) He was present at the Roman synod of 595, which dealt with the service of the pope, the goods of the church, &c. Also at the synod of 601, which tended to free monasteries from episcopal control. These are separate synods, according to Hefele, § 288, § 289. According to Jaiffe, from a consideration of the signatures, there was only one synod in 595. (Mansi, x. 1292, x. 486; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital., i. 587, 598.)

G. A. H. D. A.

GRATIOSUS (3), according to the legendary history of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, was the fourth abbot of that house; succeeding Ruinanus in 628. He was, according to the same story, a Roman by birth, elected according to the command of Augustine from among the monks of the monastery, the licence having been previously obtained from King Eadbald, and received the benediction from archbishop Justus. He is said to have received Paulinus on his return from Northumbria with many honours, and to have died in 638. Elmham gives his epitaph. (Elham, ed. Hardwick, pp. 3, 4, 155, 173, 174; Thorn, Chr. ap. Twydon, cc. 1768, 1769; Mon. Angli. l. 120.) [S.]

G. A. H. D. A.

GIRATOSUS (4), bishop of Naples, succeeded Caesarius either a.d. 638 or 641, held the see for seven years, and was succeeded by Ensebbenus either a.d. 646 or 649. (UgHELLi, Itali. Soc. vi. 84; Chioccarelli, Antill. Neapol. Eccles. p. 65.) [R. S. G.]

G. A. H. D. A.

GRATIOSUS (5), bishop of Neapel. Present at the Lateran synod under Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 867; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (6), bishop of Parma, signed the second epistle of pope Agatho which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 315; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (7), bishop of Sutriam. He subscribed the synodal letter addressed to the council of Constantinople, a.d. 680, from Rome by Agatho. (Mansi, xi. 314; UgelLii, Itali. Soc. l. 1273; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vi. 225.) [T. S. G.]

GRATIOSUS II. [GAUDIOSUS (13)].

GRATIOSUS (8), bishop of Novara, c. 730. A petition by one Rodolaid (Dec. 730), living "in vico Gassino," to Gratiosus, twenty-sixth bishop of Novara, for the consecration upon altar, is given in the Historia Patris Monum. Turin. (Chartarum, vol. i. 18, 19. See also Troyes, Cod. Dipl. iii. p. 511.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (9), bishop of Velletri, subscribed to a letter of pope Paul I. in June, 761, to the abbot John about the privileges of the monastery of St. Stephen and St. Sylvester in Rome. (Mansi, xi. 649; Jaiffe, Regesta Pont. 195.) He was also present at the Roman synod under Zacharias in 745 for the condonation of the heretics, Adalbert and Clement, at the request of Boniface. (Mansi, xii. 380; Hefele, § 367.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (10), archbishop of Ravenna 785 or 786 to 788 or 789. Agnellus says that Charles the Great came to Ravenna in his time. If Charles came at all, it must have been on his return from Rome in 787, and this may account for his asking pope Hadrian for mosaics for marble from the palace of Ravenna (Codr Carolinici, Jaiffe, ep. 90, ann. 781-791). Gratiosus had been abbot of the monastery of St. Apollinaris and archdeacon. He was buried in the church of St. Apollinaris in Classis. (Agnell., Liber Pontificial. Eccl. Rav. 164-166 in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 383.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRATISMUS, bishop of Tridentum (Trent), c. a.d. 499 to 538. (Finizio, Chron. di Trent, p. 61.) [R. S. G.]

GRATISSIMUS, grand chamberlain under the emperor Leo I. He founded at Constantinople a church dedicated to St. Cyriacus, with a monastery attached to it, in which he himself became a monk (Theophan. Chronogr. sub ann. 469). He appears to have still retained his office of grand chamberlain (cf. Theod. Lact. H. E. lib. i. § 17, p. 567 in Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. pt. i. 174). [M. F. A.]

GRATUS (1), bishop of Carthage, a.d. 343-353, in which see he succeeded Rufus, the successor of Caecilian. He was present at the council of Carthage, a.d. 347, and was spoken of by Hosius, the president, in a manner which his subsequent conduct at the council of Carthage, a.d. 348 or 349, shows to have had a meaning beyond that of mere compliment. Tillemont suggests that he took advantage of his journey to Sardica to persuade the emperor Constant to send Paul and Macarius into Africa (vol. i. 883). The council of Carthage was summoned by Gratius, as primate of Africa, and was held to discuss chiefly the questions of Donatism in general, "tradition," and rebaptism, and as president he conducted the business with great judgment and prudence. He is styled satis by Ferrandus, and his name appears to have been commemorated in the African calendar on
GRATUS

May 5, but not expressly under the title of saint. (Bruno, Conc. i. 95; 111-117; Tillemont, 45, 51, vol. vi. pp. 110, 124-128, 714; Bingham, vol. i. p. 201; Morelli, Africa Christ. ii. 242-256; Ribbeck, Dom. und Aug. p. 146.)

[H. W. P.]

GRATUS (2), deacon of Forum Livii (Forlì), under its bishop, St. Mercurialis, who probably lived c. A.D. 359. He is said to have miraculously restored the sight of a certain Marcellus. (Boll. Acta SS. 20 Mar. iii. 85; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. II. 614.)

[R. S. G.]

GRATUS (3), bishop of Forum Popilii (Forlimpopoli). He is said to have succeeded the first bishop, St. Rufillus, c. A.D. 382. He was certainly living A.D. 409, about which time his church and people suffered greatly from the incursions of Alaric. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 642; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 440.)

[R. S. G.]

GRATUS (4), a presbyter who represented Eustathius, bishop of Aosta, in the council held under Eusebius of Milan in A.D. 451 (Leo Mag. ep. 98, p. 1083, in Patr. Lat. iv. 948 b). He was probably the successor of this Eustathius in the see of Aosta, and is also probably identical with the St. Gratus or St. Gradus, bishop of Aosta (q. v.).

[C. G.]

GRATUS (4), ST. (GRADUS), bishop of Augusta Presoria (Aosta), patron saint of the cathedral, where his relics are preserved, much venerated in that and neighbouring places. A decree of the bishop of Aosta in 1407 assigns special distinctions to the commemoration of his death on Sept. 7. For reputed miracles performed by his relics see Bolland Acta SS. Sept. 7, pp. 72 c, 73 a/c.

There exist Acta of this saint which make him contemporary with Charles the Great, but they are rejected on all hands as absolutely fabulous and unhistorical. Many authorities, however (recently Gams, Series Episc. p. 828), place him in the end of the 8th century. The Bollandists on the other hand (with Potthast and others) throw him back into the 5th century, and make him identical with Gratus presbyter (q. v.), whom they suppose to have succeeded Eustathius as bishop of Aosta. Some of the details in the fabulous Acta seem to tally with this view, as the mention of a council of Chalcedon, of a pope Leo (Leo III. the Acta say), and the finding of the head of John the Baptist (said to have occurred in 452). Moreover the Acta of SS. Mauritius and his comrades (the Thebaean Legion) record that a bishop Gratus of Aosta assisted at the translation of the relics of St. innocent, one of that band, the discovery of which is put by the Bollandists at the end of the 8th century. (See Bolland. Acta Sanct. September, iii. pp. 73-6; Gall. Chr. xii. 806.)

[C. G.]

GRATUS (5), a deacon of Provence, who composed a treatise (Scriptarum) on the nature of Christ, which he wrote in Greek, and which was not apparent. He sent it to Faustus, abbot of Lerins, for his opinion, who, in the sixth of his letters addressed to Gratus, severely criticizes it, and its author (Migne, Patr. Lat. Iviii. 853). The treatise itself has not come down to us, but the reply is mentioned by Gennadius, who speaks of Gratus as one who had separated from the Catholic faith and became a Nestorian. (De Viris Illust. lxxv. Migne, ut supr. lviii. 1108.)

[8. A. B.]

GRATUS (7), bishop of Oleron, attended the synod of Agde, an. 506 (Mansi, viii. 337 b), and is perhaps the same with St. Gratus commemorated as a martyr in the diocese of Redon. (Gall. Chr. i. 1263; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. 17 and Oct. 15.)

[R. T. B.]

GRATUS (8), ST., thirteenth bishop of Châlon-sur-Saône, succeeding Gellonius or Gederinus, and followed by Desideratus (Dido), was present at the council of Châlons, the date of which has been variously placed between 844 and 850. (Labbe, Sac. Conc. x. 1194, Flor. 1759-98.) This is really the only fact we know of him, as his life, written after the close of the 10th century, is plainly in great part, if not altogether, fabulous. It was published by Perry and Cusset, from an old Legendarium of the church of Châlons, and is to be found in Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iv. 296. The authors of the Acta Gelloniuy (v. 846) wish rather an attempt to separate the fact from the fable. It relates that upon the death of Gederinus, Gratus, being a man of high rank, was unanimously elected to the see, and consecrated by the archbishop of Lyons and his suffragans. Like his predecessors, he was, according to this author, unable to live in the city from fear of the heathen, and had his abode at a place called Martyrmouth, now the suburb of St. Lawrence, across the Saône, near which the church of St. Laurence had been lately constructed. But on the sabbath it was his wont to cross the stream and officiate in the great church of the city. On a certain Sunday it happened that he was much beset by worldly cares, and was crossing the bridge later than usual, and when in the middle of it he heard the words, "Io, missa est" as it were spoken by an angel. Terrified at the omen, and imputing his delay to sin, he drew the ring from his finger, and throwing it into the river, vowed that until the waters gave it up again he could not be called a true shepherd of his flock. Returning to the church of St. Laurence, he built a cell in which he lived seven years in watchful and supplication. A neighbouring hut was occupied by his mother Celsa. During all this time his prayers were so potent a safeguard of the city, that the Saône and its tributaries forbore to drown any one, none were devoured by wild beasts, and no criminal died without first repeating and receiving the visticum. At the end of the seventh year the ring was found in the belly of a fish by the clerk who tended him, and the people hearing of it assembled and dug out their bishop from his cell in spite of his reluctance. He did not, however, long survive his release, but died Oct. 8, on which day he is commemorated. He was buried in the church of St. Laurence, but at the close of the 10th or beginning of the 11th century, his remains were removed, with the consent of Hugo, the bishop, to a newly-built church at Paredum (Paray le Moineau) on May 13. Pope John VIII. canonized him.

[S. A. B.]

GREALLAN. [GRELLAN.]

GREALLLOG OE BLECH, Irish saint. [GRELLLOG OE BLECH.]
GRECIANUS

GRECIANUS of Callium. [GRATIANUS (3).]

GRECELIUS (GRECELIUS), bishop of Llandaff, in the time of Meurgi son of Ithael, king of Glamorgan, late in the seventh or early in the eighth century (Lob. Llandaf. 416-422, 626; Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 156; Godwin, de Praevul. Angl. 601). [J. G.]

GREDFIW, Welsh saint. [RHEDIW.]

GREDFIAEL, GREDIFEL, GREDIVEL (GREDIFIAEL, GREDEVEL), the founder of Penmynydd, in Anglesey. His festival is Nov. 15 (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 225). [G. W. B.]

GREGENTIUS, ST., bishop of Taphar in Arabia (of the Homeriatae). He is chiefly known as the supposed author of (o) the Leges Homeriatarum (see Patrol. Graeca, Ixxxvi. 568), and (o) the Disputatio cum Heribono Judaeo (621-784). According to the Greek menaees, Gregenti-us was born at Milan on December 18, in the second half of the 5th century (Gal-land. Ref. in Vet. Patr. Bibl. xi. 599); he lived for many years as an anchorite, and was finally sent by Proterius of Alexander as bishop of the Homeriatae. This account, which would date the episcopate of Gregenti-us from the middle of the 5th century, cannot naturally claim any strong historical weight. Little more can be said for the tradition which ascribes the two works above mentioned to him. Cellier pointed out several points of internal evidence which all attest against the genuineness, and, above all, the fact that the death and burial of Gregenti- us are narrated in the dialogue (Celli. xi. 379, and cf. Patr. Gr. Ixxxvi. 784). It is clear that great part must have been added by a later hand, if we reject Cellier's conclusion that the whole is the work of an anonymous writer. In the dialogue Gregenti-us finally convinces his opponent by a vision of Christ which appears in the midst of the result being the conversion and baptism of five millions of Jews. The Leges Homeriatarum deal mainly with crimes of violence and fornication, and are supposed to have been composed by Gregenti-us at the request of Abraham, king of the Homeriatae. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 663.) [J. de S.]

GREGORIA (1), 7th century, lady of the bedchamber to some Augusta who, from a comparison of dates (vid. Du Cange, Fam. Aug. 88), must have been the empress Constantina, otherwise Constantinia, wife of the emperor Maurice. She had enumerated all her sins with great humility to her confessor, but was afraid that God had not pardoned them. So she wrote to pope Gregory, saying that she would never cease to implore him till he had a revelation that her sins were forgiven. Gregory, whose letter is dated by Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 121) June 597, consoled her with the narrative of the woman who was a sinner, whom he seems to identify with Mary the sister of Martha, saying that believing her devotion to be not less than the love of that woman, he might fairly apply to her the same words, "Thy sins, which are many," &c. What she asked, however, he considered difficult and useless; on the one hand he was unworthy of a revelation, and on the other, she ought to lament her sins to the end of her life, rather than feel assured that they were forgiven. [Greg. Mag. Epist. vii. 25. Patrolo. Lat. lxxi. p. 877, § 868; Cellier, xl. 508.] [W. M. S.]

GREGORIUS (1), bishop of Agriumentum. That there was a Gregory in this see earlier than the more celebrated writer is generally agreed, but his exact period is doubtful. One account places him in the time of Valerian and Gallienus, cir. 260, making him figure in the martyrdom of St. Agrippina at Rome and afterwards at Agriumentum in the course of her translation (Cajetan, Viz. Sac. SS. i. 87). Pirri adopts this view and places him as second bishop, between Libanius and Potamio (Sac. SS. i. 692). Bolland in his notes upon Potamio discusses the question (Acta SS. 29 Jan. ii. 988). Another account makes him sent by Proterius bishop of Alexandria on a mission to Elesban king of Ethiopia, which would place him two centuries later. Perhaps this latter tradition is a confusion with that of Gregory II., who was known to have travelled in the East (see Patr. Gr. xviii. 549, note 59). [C. E.]

GREGORIUS (2), early bishop of Calaris (Cagliari) in Sardinia, probably between A.D. 253 and 303. (Cossus, Città di Cagliari, p. 56; Martini, Storia Eccles. di Sardigna, iii. 316; Cap- pelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 48.) [R. S. C.]

GREGORIUS (3), surnamed THAUMATURGUS, bishop of Neocaesarea in Pontus, cir. 233-270. He was born about 210 at Neocaesarea on the Lycus, the modern Niksar. He was the son of healthy parents, both of whom were both wealthy and noble. His early name was Theodorus, for which some explanation may be found in the fact that his father was scrupulously devoted to the worship of the pagan divinities. His son calls himself Theobalsamos (Migne, ed. Patr. Gr. vol. i.; Greg. Thaum. Orat. de Origene, c. 5). Christianity had made little progress in the neighbourhood of Neocaesarea even in the year of his birth. There is no incipient evidence that at that date there were only seventeen Christians to be found in the whole region (Greg. Nyss. Vita Thaum. Migne, Patr. Gr. xiv. 954). It was an unpromising field for the episcopal labours of the young missionary. Yet the extraordinary success of those labours, and the romantic details with which they were embellished by later hands secured for him the well-known title of Thaumaturgos. This epithet cannot be set down as exclusively due to the credulosity of the age, for as Lardner (Cred. ii. 42, § 5) remarked, such writers as Basil, Jerome, and Theodoret, to say nothing of Gregory of Nyssa, distinguished this particular bishop from all others as "a man of apostolic signs and wonders" (cf. Dr. J. H. Newman, Essays on Miracles, p. 233). No light is thrown upon his thaumaturgic renown by his extant writings, which are conspicuous for their philosophic tone, humility, self-distrust, and practical sense. He must have been a man of singular force of character and weighty judgment, or he would not have been credited with so much spurious literature. Heretics endeavoured to fast the section of his name upon their own speculations, thus indirectly revealing the confidence in which he was held by all parties.

Theodorus (Gregory) stated that when he was in his fourteenth year his father died, and that about that time he passed through a remarkable spiritual crisis. He attributed the change of sentiment which supervised to "the Divine Logos, the Angel of the counsel of God, and the common Saviour of all." He left it, however, as doubtful whether the change consisted of a bias mysteriously given to him towards Christianity, or whether it merely issued in the circumstances which brought him into the society of his friend and teacher Origen. It happened that his mother suggested the pursuit of the science and art of rhetoric, and he rapidly gave promise of oratorical success. He was advised with this end in view to make a special study of Roman law, and with this object to become an alumnus of a celebrated school of jurisprudence then flourishing at Berytus in Syria. At this juncture it appears that his sister needed an escort to Palestine to join her husband, who was occupying a high position under the Roman government in that region. The young Theodorus (Gregory) and his brother Athenodorus took advantage of this opportunity to travel. They passed numerous cities on their way from Pontus, amongst others, Berytus. "My guardian angel" (says he) "on our arrival at Caesarea handed us over to the care and tuition of Origen." For a while, like birds in a net, they struggled to escape from his influence, to return to their home, or to fulfill their intention of visiting the schools of Berytus; but the converse of this saintly man and illustrious scholar, who was then providentially resident at Caesarea, enthralled them. The personal spell of the teacher was cast over Theodorus and his brother. During five years, he says, that he was submitted to the potent sway of this master; and the mental processes by which he was led to Christ, throw considerable light on the mind of Origen and on the methods of Christian education pursued in the 3rd century. These details are preserved in a panegyric on Origen, which before leaving Caesarea the young student pronounced to a great assembly in the presence of the master. They differ in several particulars from the statements of Gregory of Nyssa (Vita Thaum. Greg. Nyss.; Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. xlii. pp. 893-958). This father, in a florid narrative, represents Gregory as being a student of philosophy at Alexandria, and as being advised by Firmilianus, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who was then visiting Alexandria, to make the acquaintance of Origen. The account of his stay lightly over his namesake's relations with Origen, and says nothing of his residence at Caesarea, but gives in considerable detail his life in Alexandria. Tillemont (Mémoires, iv. 320) admits that this is at variance with the express language of the "Panegyric," and suggests that Firmilianus, who had visited Origen in Caesarea during his young friends' residence there, and may thus have introduced them to Origen. Baronius follows Gregory of Nyssa's lead (Ann. 233, viii.), and assumes that the instruction received by Theodorus (Gregory) from Origen took place in Alexandria, that he then returned to Neocae- sarea, and that while there the remembrance of Origen and the advice of Firmilianus induced the young man to undertake a visit to Palestine in order to secure fresh direction from the great scholar (Ann. 233, xii.). All this is at variance with the express statements of the panegyric. This document has been preserved, and is an authentic and valuable memorial of the 3rd century. According to Gregory's own statements (Orat. de Orig. c. vi.), Origen enlaced his pupils first of all to the study of philosophy, which he recommended as a duty that we owe to the Lord of all, "since man alone of all creatures is deemed by his Creator as worthy to pursue it." "A thoughtful man, if pious, must philosophize," says he, so "at length, like some spark lighting on our soul, love was kindled and burst into flame within us, a love to the Holy Logos, the most lovely object of all, who attracts all to Himself by His unutterable beauty." "Only one object seemed worthy of pursuit, philosophy and the master of philosophy, this divine (θεός) man." His love to Origen was like the love of Jonathan to David, and without stint he poured forth at last in his presence his enthusiastic encomium. Gregory praises Origen for his Socratic simplicity, and for the art by which he made his teacher penetrate his inmost soul with questions, and pruned away his native wildness, and repressed his exuberance. He was taught to interrogate his consciousness, and critically to investigate reasonings and the meanings of words. First of all, Origen accustomed the young man to the study of the dialectic method of inquiry, and then, in Aristotelian fashion, led him to contemplate the "magnitude, the wondrouness, the magnificent, and absolutely wise construction of the world." He seems to have followed (strangely enough) the order of the sciences in Comte's classification of the branches of human knowledge. Thus, he began with "the immutable foundation of all, geometry, and then," (says Gregory) "by astronomy he lifted us up to the things highest above us." He reduced things to their "pristine elements," "going over the nature of the whole and of each several section," "he filled our minds with a rational, instead of an irrational, wonder at the sacred economy of the universe and the irreprovable constitution of all things." Those words and much more that might be quoted from the master from de Panegyric are a strange comment on the thetumaturgic actions which are freely attributed to Gregory. Morals followed physics, and emphasis is laid by Gregory on the practical experience by which Origen desired his pupils to verify all theories, "stimulating us by the deeds he did more than by the doctrines he taught." He urged upon them the study of Greco-philosophy for the sake of nearness to the master. The end of the entire discipline was "nothing but this: By the pure mind make myself like to God, that thou mayest draw near to Him and abide in Him." Origen advised Gregory to study all that was written by the philosophers and poets of old, with the exception of the Atheists, and gave reasons for a catholic and liberal ecclesiastic, and, with a modern spirit, disclaimed the force of prejudice and the misery of half-truths and of fixed ideas, and the advantage of "selecting all that was useful and true in all the various philosophies and putting aside all that was false." Gregory then utters high praise of the way in which his master interpreted the clear and luminous oracles of God, and this remarkable sentence occurs (c. 15): "That leader of all (ἀρχηγὸς πάνω) who speaks in undertones (σήματι) to God's dear prophets and suggests to them all their prophecy and their mystic and divine word, has so honoured this man Origen as a friend as to appoint him to be their interpreter." The idea seems to have been borne in upon Gregory that the gift of interpretation is as much a divine charisma as prophecy itself. So great were the joys thus placed within the reach of his pupil, that he adds with rapture, "He was truly a paradise to us, after the exile of the paradise of God." He regrets his departure from Caesarea, as Adam might bewail his expulsion from Eden, having to eat of the soil and to contend with thorns and thistles, and to dwell in darkness, with weeping and mourning. He says, "I go away of my own will, and not by constraint, and by my own act I am dispossessed, when it is in my option to remain." This is clear enough, but Jerome (de Viris illustris, c. 65) says that the two youths were sent off to their mother ("remittuntur ad matrem"), or as it may be taken, to their mother country.

The influence of Origen's teaching upon Gregory and Athenodorus is confirmed by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 30), who says that the great scholar "seeing them excessively rapt in the prosecution of the studies of the Greeks and Romans, infused into them the love of philosophy, and induced them to exchange their former zeal for the study of divine things. But after being with him five years, they made such improvement that both, though very young, were honoured with the episcopate in the churches of Pontus."

Gregory of Nyssa describes Gregory of Neocaesarea as spending much time in Alexandria, and says, that before his baptism, while resident there, he displayed a high tone of moral propriety; that he was able to resist the advances of an impure woman, and frustrate her accusations. She was paid the sum of money which she demanded as the price of her intimacy with Gregory, but no sooner had she received it, than she was seized with all the signs of a demoniacal possession, from which Gregory's intercession alone delivered her, thus demonstrating his innocence. Gregory makes no reference to this circumstance, which bears a suspicious resemblance to other like charges brought in Alexandria against distinguished bishops. A residence in Alexandria may have occurred in the course of the five years during which Gregory and his brother were travelling in the eastern provinces. These five years were in all probability interrupted by the persecution under Maximinus Thrax, who reigned from July 235 to May 238. The peculiarity of this persecution was, that it was aimed at the great men and leaders of the Church. Origen may then have gone into retirement and left his pupils at liberty to travel into Egypt. If the baptism of Gregory was deferred until Origen was at liberty to return to Caesarea, that ceremony must have been delayed until the close of his intercourse with the great scholar, as it could not have occurred until the death of Maximin and the accession of Gordian in 238. Beckoning towards the five years, Gregory did not reach Caesarea before 233, and probably later; and did not leave the "Paradise" until 238 at the earliest, when he pronounced his Panegyric. This document is of interest from the testimony it bears to the doctrine of the Trinity, and the light it throws upon the faith of Gregory. Bishop Bull, in his Œconomia, has laid great emphasis upon the passage (Orat. de Origine, cap. iv.) in which the pupil of Origen offers his praise to the Father, and then to "the Champion and Saviour of our souls, His first-born Word, the Creator and Governor of all things, ... being the truth, the wisdom, the power of the Father Himself of all things, and besides being both..." (Greek νόημα) the most perfect and living and animate word of the primal mind." Bishop Bull is right in calling attention to the praenicene character of these phrases, and yet to their substantial agreement with the deliverance of the Nicaean fathers (Def. Nic. Creed, vol. i. p. 331). They should be taken into account in estimating the authenticity and significance of other documents.

Gregory had scarcely reached Neocaesarea when he received a letter from Origen (Philocalia, c. 13), revealing on the part of the teacher a most extraordinary regard for his pupil, whom he describes as "my most excellent lord and venerable son." Gregory is exhorbed to study all philosophies, as a preparation for Christianity and to aid the interpretation of Holy Scripture. He is thus to spoil the Egyptians of their fine gold, in order to make vessels for the sanctuary, and not idols of his own. He is then urged with some passion to study the Scriptures, and to seek from God by the light he needs. (Cf. Anti-Nic. Library, Origen's works, vol. i. 388-390, for a translation of this letter.)

Shortly after the return of Gregory to his native place, we are told by Eusebius that he became bishop of that city, and one of the most celebrated (Σαρδέβιος) bishops of the age (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 30, and vii. 14). The curious details of his ordination are referred to in Basil's Memoiricon Graecorum (17 Nov.), where it is stated that he was ordained by Phaedimus, bishop of Amasea. Called to this holy office from each other. We are indebted to Gregory of Nyssa for the romance of this and many other events in his subsequent career. Indeed, we have no other guide than the narrative of that father for the subsequent details of his life. Some of his most extraordinary statements are in a measure vouchsed for by Basil the Great, the brother of Gregory of Nyssa, and by Rufinus himself in the expansion of this narrative of Eusebius. The great historian himself revealed either his ignorance of the supposed facts, or his own good sense, by taking no notice of the bizarre and incredible stories with which the career of Gregory is overlaid. As the later father tells the story, the young and saintly student, on reaching his home, was entreated by the entire population to remain among them as their magistrate and legislator. Like Moses, he took counsel of God, and retired into the wilderness, but he excelled the man of God in this, that, unlike Moses, he married no wife, and had virtue only for his spouse. Then we are told that Phaedimus, bishop of Amasea, sought to lay surprise hands upon Gregory, and to consecrate him by guile, but failed, and adopted the expedient of electing and ordaining him by prayer when he was distant from him a journey of three days. We are not told how Gregory became acquainted with this act, but we are assured that it induced Gregory to yield to the summons, and to submit afterwards to the customary rites. At this time, about 240, there were, as we have said, not more than seventeen Christians in the city and in its circumjacent territory. Gregory only demanded time for meditation on the truths of the Christian faith before accepting the solemn commission. This meditation issued in the supposed divine revelations which are the most explicit formulae of the creed of the Church of the 3rd century. Gregory of Nyssa admits that the revelation was made to the young bishop in the dead of the night, “after he had been deeply considering the reason of the faith, and blotting out of all sorts.” He saw a vision of St. John and of the mother of the Lord, and we are gravely told that the latter commanded the former to lay before Gregory the true faith. Apart from this romance, the formula which is attributed to Gregory, is undoubtedly of high antiquity, and Lardner (Credibility, vol. ii. p. 29) does not argue with his wonted candour in his endeavour to fasten upon it signs of later origin. It is singularly free from the peculiar phrases which acquired technical significance in the 4th century, and yet it maintains a most uncompromising antagonism to Sabellian and Unitarian heresy. Moreover, Gregory of Nyssa asserts one fact of considerable importance, that when he uttered his encomium, the autograph MS. of this creed was in possession of the church at Nicaæa in the 4th century. He adds that the church had been continually initiated by means of this confession of faith. Basil, moreover, confirmed this statement (Ep. 204, Bas. Opp. Paris ed. t. iii. p. 303), saying that in his tender age, when residing in Nicaæa, he had been taught the words of Gregory by his sainted grandmother Macrina; and again (de Spir. Sancto, c. 29, ib. p. 82), he declared the tenantry with which the ways and words of Gregory had been preserved by that church, even to the mode of reciting the doctrine. Moreover, Basil attributed to his influence the orthodoxy of a whole succession of bishops from Gregory to the Musonius of his own day (Ep. 204). In addressing the Nicaæans (Ep. 207, ib. p. 311), he warns them against twisting the words of Gregory. The formula must be distinguished from the εἴδεις τῆς κατὰ μήνα πίστεως, which is now found among the dubious writings of Gregory, but which no less a scholar than Labbe has con- founded with it. Labbe says that Bellarmine and Petavius had doubted the authenticity of the εἴδεις τῆς πίστεως, but he is wrong, as their scepticism is entirely directed to the other letter and very questionable production (see Bull, S. Iii.). It has been doubted by sundry critics, but the reasons are not convincing. Sandius says that Eusebius, Jerome, and Sophronius were silent about it. The silence, however, of Eusebius proves nothing; and the consequent silence of Jerome and Sophronius may be only regarded as one negative testimony, as Jerome followed Eusebius, and Sophronius was translator into Greek of sundry works of Jerome. God and His Father introduced it into his translation of Eusebius. This formula is given at length in the Vita Thaum. of Gregory of Nyssa. It is found in the Latin psalter (written in golden letters), which Charlemagne gave to pope Adrian I., and it is cited as Gregory’s by the fathers of the second occumenical council held at Constantinople, A.D. 553, by St. Germanus patriarch of Constantinople, and by numerous later writers (Ceillier, Autels sacrés, St. Græg. le Thaum. vol. ii. pp. 441, 442). A very important sentence which has been variously attributed to the saint and his biographer, follows the formula as given in the life of the Thaumaturgos. Dr. Burton, the editor of Bull, referred it to a passage in Migne, often by call attention to the fact that Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. 10) refers to the closing sentences as the substance of the formula itself. It runs as follows: “There is therefore nothing created or servile in the Trinity; nor anything superincumbent, as though previously non-existing and introduced afterwards. Never therefore was the Son wanting to the Father, nor the Spirit to the Son; but there is ever the same Trinity, unchangeable and unalterable.” (cf. Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. x. p. 988.)

Great difference of opinion has prevailed among earlier and later scholars as to the genuineness of this document; thus Bingham, Bull, Cave, Tillemont (iv. 327), Ceillier, Hahn (cf. Dorner’s Person of Christ, A. II. 105), have defended it, and Lardner, Whiston, Münchener, Gieseler, Herzog (Altchr. der Kirchengesch. i. 122), contest it. Neander divided it into two parts, the one genuine revealing its Originensive source, and the other of later growth. Dr. Caspari has, in an appendix to his great work, Alte und neue Quellen zur Geschichte des Taufnamens der Griechen, 1879, defended it with great erudition and argument, and concludes that there is nothing in the formula incompatible with its being the production of a pupil of Origen. He shews, moreover, that it must have been produced between A.D. 260–265. Notwithstanding the Creed is as follows in Bull’s translation—

"There is one God, Father of Him who is the living Word, subsisting Wisdom and Power and Eternal lm press (εἴδεις τῆς πίστεως). Perfect Begotten of the Perfect, Father of the only begotten Son. There is one Lord, Alone of the One, God and of God only, ǀmpress and Image of the Godhead, the operative Word; Wisdom comprehensive of the system of the universe, and Power productive of the whole creation; true Son of true Father, Invisible, Invisiblable, and Incessorable, and Incessorable, and Immortal of Immortal, and Eternal of Eternal. And there is one Holy Ghost, who hath his being of God, who hath appeared (that is to mankind, εἴδεις τῆς πίστεως, a clause which Greg. of Nyssa gives, but which is not found in some of the codices) through the Son, Image of the Son, Perfect God, Life, the Cause of all that live; Holy Fountain, Holiness, the Bestower of sanctification, in whom is manifested God the Father, who is over all and in all, and God the Son, who is through all. A perfect Trinity, not divided nor alien in glory and eternity and divinity.*" withstanding the remarkable testimonies made by Basil to the orthodoxy of Gregory, and his reference to this creed, which his brother of Nyssa has preserved, an incisive remark by Basil in one of his letters (Ep. 75) to the Neocareanians, seems to admit that some of Greg-ory’s teaching was not so successful in vindicating Gregory from the incisive use of phrases which Arians might boastfully claim. But Lardner (Ibid.) goes far too far when he speaks of Basil as vilifying Gregory. Moreover, if the ἔκθεσις πίστεως is genuine, we have a high testimony to the ortho-dexy of Gregory. It is easy to call from the most Athanasian writers terms used of the humanized Son of God and to represent him the way applied by a particular author to the divinity of the Word. This is Basil’s excuse for Gregory. The doubtful phrases are said to have occurred in his discussions with Aeliam, a heathen, and may be accounted for, because the bishop was not then weighing his words dogmatically, but speaking in the heat of another controversy. It is, however, remarkable, that no extant document, genuine or doubtful, contains the inculpated phrases. They are not found in the πίστει καθά μετοχαί, which moreover is charged with unmistakable indications of its later date, and contains expressions which reveal the activity of the Nestorian and Apollinarian controversies. Another work, written we may suppose near the commencement of his episcopate, was the Meta-phrase of Ecclesiastes. This running commentary on the old book is mentioned with approval by Rufinus (vii. 25), and Jerome (de Viris Illus.
c. 65, and Comm. in Eccl. c. 4), and may still be read with advantage for its sound ethical wisdom. It has been attributed by some to Gregory of Nazianzus, but the style is less ornate and more abrupt than that of that father, while numerous turns of expression to be found in the Panegyric on Origen are to be met with in this singularly modest and sensible commentary. It is now without reserve inserted among the genuine remains of Gregory.

There can be little doubt that the missionary labour of Gregory was great and successful, and that his personal influence was extraordinary. The Panegyric bears in which that influence is arrayed a century later need not blind us to the force of character of which it is the symptom. A few of the marvellous occurrences detailed with ornate and extravagant eulogy by Gregory of Nyssa, are referred to by Basil, his brother and his contemporary, and they doubtless furnished Rufinus with the details which he introduced. Thus Basil tells us (de Socratis Concilio, c. 29, Paris ed. p. 62: “that Gregory was a great and conspicuous lamp, illuminating the Church of God, and that he possessed, from the co-operation of the Spirit, a formidable power against the demons; that he turned the course of rivers by giving them orders in the name of Christ; that he dried up a lake, which was the cause of strife to two brothers; and that his predictions of the future made him the equal of the other prophets . . . that by friends and enemies of the truth he was regarded, in virtue of his signs and prodigies, as another Moses.” But Gregory of Nyssa expands into voluminous legend the record of these deeds. It is to be noticed that, with the exception of the river, on the Calydonian, no reference is made, the panegyric of Gregory of Nyssa contains no verifying element. He does not favour his hearers with names, dates, or places for these astounding portents. They were, as Dr. Newman observes, wrought at such times and seasons as to lead to numerous conversions. They were described as well known facts in a hortatory address and in ecclesiastical gears. But they contrast very forcibly with the philosophical bias of Gregory’s mind, and they are not mentioned or referred to until a hundred years after their occurrence. Some of the more remarkable are as follows:—The bishop was driven by stress of weather into a heathen temple, and by spending the night in prayer he exercised a great power, so that the next morning were unable to obtain their customary responses. This so enraged them that Gregory was threatened by them with numerous calamities, unless he freed them from their spell. The bishop is then said to have written on a parchment, “Gregory to Satan, enter. Where upon the evil powers were once more at liberty to do their worst. But new applications were covered by the story, it would simply answer to the spiritualistic illusions and fraud with which we are now familiar, and the unwillingness of “spirits” to make their manifestations in pre-presence of hostile witnesses. Two things should be noticed; the narrative implies Gregory’s belief in the heathen divinities as powers to be propitiated, as living entities, and it reveals considerable weakness of mind in setting free for work a spirit whom he hailed as Satan, after having for a time at least bound him in a spell. The “miracle” is said to have led to numerous conversions, and to have been followed by further manifestations, such as his power in moving stones at his bidding. This story is still further exaggerated by transmission, until the stone becomes a mountain in the Dialogues of Gregory the Great. The idolatrous priest became Gregory’s deacon and, according to Rufinus, his successor. The astonishment of the people was augmented by the bishop’s indifference to their applause. A great outburst of healing powers is said to have led to the conversion of multitudes, and to the consequent erection of a Christian church. This during the reign of Philip, would not be remarkable, but according to Tillemont (Mém. vol. iv. 330), it was the first church of which we have express mention. It does not follow that it was the first consecrated, although few definite references can be found of earlier date to a similar proceeding. The destruction of the church at Nicomedia, referred to by la Gravière, t. 1, p. 336). Gregory of Nyssa declares that this church was standing in his day, and that it must have been spared in the persecutions under Di-

Hosted by Google
GREGORIUS THAUMATURGUS

celian. It is also added that when every house in the city was damaged by earthquake, this building was uninjured. A similar preservation was accorded to it in the year 499 or 503, when a second earthquake produced wide-spread ruin. The following passage is in the epitaph of Nyssa's glowing rhetoric which reflects so favourably on Gregory's missionary and pastoral zeal, that I venture to introduce it. "Early in the morning crowds gathered at his doors, men, women and children, with aged persons and those who suffered from the bodily affliction of demons, or any other chastisement. In their midst he himself, in exact accordance with the need of each of those who had assembled, preached, questioned, admonished, instructed, and healed. It was by means of this that he attracted the masses of men to the preaching of the gospel, namely that sight corresponded with hearing, and it was through both that the tokens of divine power shone forth upon him; for their hearing was everywhere in his discourse, and their sight by his miracles of healing the sick. The mourner was comforted, the young man was taught sobriety, and to the old, appropriate counsel was administered. Slaves were admonished to be dutiful to their masters; those who exercised authority to be kind to their inferiors. The poor were taught that virtue is the only wealth, and that rich they were but stewards of property, and not its owners."

The celebrated story of the drying up of a lake is thus amplified by Gregory of Nyssa: — "Two young brothers who shared between them their patrimony each laid claim to the possession of a lake. Instead of dividing the property between them they referred the dispute to Gregory, who exhorted them to be reconciled to one another. The young men were, however, exasperated and kindled into passion as their hopes of gain grew stronger." Then this led at length to the resolve upon a murderous struggle for the right of possession, "when the man of God, remaining on the banks of the lake and continuing throughout the night in watchfulness, stood upon the water like that of Moses ... for, by the power of prayer, he completely transformed the whole of it into dry land ... so that no drop of moisture was lingering even in the hollows! and having in this manner, by the power of God, decided the controversy, he returned home, while the quarrel between the young men was settled by the fiat of deeds." (Migne's ed. Greg. Nyss. Patr. Gr. xlvii. pp. 921 and 929.)

Basil also refers to another story which his brother presents in discursive fashion, how Gregory altered the course of the Armenian Lycus by planting his staff in the bed of the torrent, which said staff became a tree, and effected a perfect gift of benefit to the neighbourhood. This "miracle" is claimed by Dr. Newman as possessing some of the characteristics of a true miracle, inasmuch as the name of the river, the site of the portent, and the memorial of its occurrence were all appealed to. (Essays on Miracles, p. 267.)

One of the most interesting facts introduced by his panegyrist has reference to Gregory's selection of an obscure person, Alexander the charocal burner, for the office of bishop over the neighbouring city of Comana. He was preferred to men of elegance and station by reason of his humble self-consecration to God, and he was ordained with customary solemnities. This Alexander justified the choice thus made by reason of his excellent discourse, his holy living, and a martyr's death. He is honoured in the Roman calendar on August 11.

Gregory is also credited with miracles of destruction. A Jew once asked alms to bury his dead comrade, who lay on the ground feigning lifelessness. Gregory is said to have thrown his cloak over the prostrate man as his dole. When the saint had departed, the Jew, intending to make off with his prize, attempted to rouse his companion with cries and kicks, but he was found to be really dead. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 27) cites a similar miracle as wrought by Epiphanius, and in doing so refers to this ghastly narrative. The great missionary success of Gregory and the rapid growth of the Church must have preceded the outbreak of persecution under Decius, in the years 250 and 251. The edict of Decius was ferocious, and when the edicts in the hands of sympathetic governors, it was cruelly carried out. [DECIUS.] Gregory of Nyssa gives a withering account of the persecution and its effects. Our Gregory advised those who could do so to save themselves and their faith by flight and concealment. His enemies pursued him into his retreat, but his thaumaturgic force was now used by him to assist his retirement, and they found in place of Gregory and his deacon two trees. This "prodigy" differs so profoundly (as do others we have mentioned) from miracles narrated in the New Testament, both in character and motive, that they form an instructive hint as to the ethnic and imaginative source of the whole cycle.

In 258 he returned to Neocesarea, and when, in 258, peace was restored to the Church, Gregory ordered annual feasts in commemoration of the martyrs who had been faithful unto death. He is credited by his biographer with the devout and wise decision of hoping to secure the allegiance of those who had been in the habit of worshipping idols, by arranging ceremonial in honour of the martyrs resembling that to which they had been accustomed. This time-serving is an unfaavourable indication of character, and does something to explain the melancholy defection from moral uprightness and honour of many of his supposed converts. The conversion of the heathen is said to have been greatly quickened by the occurrence of a fearful plague which was partly, at least, due to Gregory's miraculous potency; the story as given by his panegyrist is sufficiently tragic, and though the narrative closes the panegyric, yet the event is said to have occurred early in his ministerial career. It is as follows:—

"I shall revert to and narrate the event that took place in the early part of his priestly career, which my discourse has omitted while it has hurried on to deal with the rest of his miraculous deeds. There was a public festival in the city, celebrated with certain ancestral rites, in honour of one of the local divinities.

* Gregory of Nyssa speaks of him as the first bishop of Comana. This is doubtful, as Eusebius (H. E. v. 14) speaks of one Zoicus of Comana as concerned in the Montanist controversy.
To this nearly the whole tribe flocked, while all the country kept festival as well as the city. The theatre was crowded with the concourse, and a great crowd of people streaming in everywhere surged over the seats. All were eagerly watching their gaze for every sight and sound, and the building was filled with uproar. The performers were unable to exhibit their marvels, while the confusion among the crowded sightseers not only interfered with the enjoyment of the music, but did not give the conjurors a chance of exhibiting their merits from this noise. After the mob broke forth a cry calling upon the god in whose honour they celebrated the festival, and imploring that he would create ample room for them. And as every man shouted this with his neighbour the cry was borne aloft, and the exclamations which conveyed this prayer to the divinity seemed to come from the whole city as from a single throat. And the prayer was—you could hear its very words—"Zeus, make room for us!" And when the great Gregory heard the shout of those who cried out to the name of the god from whom they desired a wide space to be created in the city, he sent to them one of those who stood by him and said, 'There shall be granted you larger room than you pray for or have, for had it been the will of God and Christ, like some grim utterance, were conveyed away to the crowd, a pestilence succeeded to that sacred public festival. At once lamentation was mingled with the dances, so that they found their mirth changed to sufferings and calamity. Instead of the music of the pipes, and the clashing of the cymbals, wailing dirges pervaded the city. When the disease had once attacked the population it passed through them faster than they anticipated, devouring their homes like fire. The temples were filled with those who were struck down by the plague, and had fled thither in hope of being healed. The springs, watercourses, and wells, were choked up with the bodies of men consumed with thirst in the agony of the disease. The disaster which produced a multitude of other calamities, yielded to the prayers of Gregory. This led to numerous conversions. The ravages of pestilence were not, however, confined to Pontus. Similar disasters affected Upper Egypt, as may be gathered from the letters of Dionysius of Alexandria. (Euseb. H. E. vili. 17; cf. Baron. Ann. 256. x.)

We are not surprised to hear that at the death of Gregory of Neoacaera, the number of heathen who now remained in his diocese had dwindled to seventeen, a number which exactly corresponded with the number of Christians to be found there, when Phaedimus consecrated him to the episcopal office. (Vit. Thaum. l.c. p. 954.) But the Christianity of the Neoacaeraeans must have been in many cases of a very imperfect kind, if we may judge from one of the most authentic documents which is referred to his pen, and entitled Epistola Canonica S. Gregorii ... de his qui in barbarorum incursione idololycy comederanter, et alia quaedam spectacì commissnerunt. Jerome and other writers speak of the "letters" of Gregory, and by the council in Trullo, A.D. 690, the document in question is cited by the above name. Theodorus Barison has appended to each of the eleven canons into which it was divided. Numerous authorities, Dodwell (Dissertationes in Oprium) , Ceillier (l. c. p. 444), question the genuineness of the last, the eleventh, of these canons, but the conviction widely prevails that the previous ten are genuine. They refer to the circumstances by which followed the ravages of the Goths and Borisdi, who ravaged Pontus and Asia Minor generally during the reign of Gallienus, and who committed gross indecency, and carried away Christian captives. Nicephorus (vili. c. 33; cf. Baron. Ann. 263, xxiii.) enlarges on the diffusion of the gospel consequent upon this holy war, and the conversions and discourse of the captives; be that as it may, the disorder which prevailed tempted numerous Christians in Pontus to flagrant acts of impiety and disloyalty. They took possession of the goods of those who had been dragged into bondage, and for selfish purposes actually restored to their captors those who had escaped their hands. Others identified themselves with the barbarians, making common cause with them, actually helping the heathen in their uttermost cruelty towards their brethren.

These facts are gathered from the "canons" in which Gregory denounced strenuously the commission of such crimes, and assigned to them their ecclesiastical penalty. The bishop shows his compassion upon these wretches, who gulled over the mere ceremonial uncleanness that might follow from enforced consumption of meat that had been offered to idols, and by exonerating from blame or any ecclesiastical anathema women who had, against their will, lost their chastity. He lays, however, great emphasis on the vices and greed of those who had violated Christian morality for the sake of gain and personal advantage. Different degrees of penality and exclusion from church privilege were assigned, and those were argued on ground of Scripture alone. The epistle containing these canons was addressed to an anonymous bishop of Pontus, who had asked his advice on the subject, about the year 258. It must have been written, therefore, towards the end of his episcopate. It reveals the importance and character of the whole series of conversions that had followed his remarkable ministry. The eleventh canon is not found in the edition of Zonaras, though Basilamon has commented upon it. The canon contains referents to four classes of penitents, with a technical detail, which, in the opinion of Catholic theologians, belongs to a later date.

Other works have been attributed to Gregory, but they have failed to make good their claim. Such, e.g., as ekdysis tis kata marios eisotinen, which Vossius published in Latin in 1629, among the works of Gregory, and which Cardinal Mai (Scip. Vet. vii. p. 170) has presented in Greek from the Codex Vaticanus. It is given by Migne (l. c. pp. 1103-1123). The best interpretation of the title is, "a creed not of all the dogmas of the Church, but only of that opposition to the heretics who deny them." (Athen. Nicene Library, vol. xx. p. 81). It differs from the former confession in its obvious and technical repetition of Arianism, and its distinct references to the later Nestorian, and Eutychian heresies. Dr. Caspari (ib. cit. pp. 65-146) has called for the first time attention to verbally accurate quotations drawn from it in Theodore's Enarrates (Eπαρατον μετα παλινουφορον), three dialogues between Enarrates and Orthodoxus, entitled severally ἐπιστολής Ἰωάννου, ἐπιστολής Ἐρώτημα, and ἐπιστολής (Thed. Opp. tom. iv. p. 76, pp. 170-174 ed. Schulz), and in his Demonstrations per Syllogismos. These quotations, however, were referred by Theodoret to Gregory but to a "little book concerning the faith," τε και προφανείας κάποιος, directly attributed by him to Athanasius. Varnings and corroboration of these quotations bestri. Thus the emperor Marcian (450-457) accuses the Eutychians and late Apollinarists of circulating the words of their founder under the pseudonym of the Fathers of the Church. Evagrius (H. E. iii. 31) mentions the same fact, distinctly specifying the names of Gregory of Neoceansa, Athanasius, and Julius of Rome, as being thus made use of. Caspari quotes several other testimonies to similar effect; and proves that the καὶ προφανείας κάποιος must have been written about the end of the fourth century, before the greatest Monophysite and Nestorian conflicts arose, when the strain of theological interest centred still around the doctrine of the Trinity. The recovery of the antithesis as a genuine exhibition of the thought of Apollinaris deserves attention. Caspari discusses the reason of Apollinaris in writing his "confession," the proofs of its unity, the grounds of its false attribution to Gregory. Other treatises and fragments given in the editions of his works, and also translated in the Ante-Nicene Library, are as follows:—Capitul dum de fide, with interpretation, attributed by Gretser to Gregory, ed. Ratisbon, 1741. Ad Titianum Deputatio de Animal, which must have been written by a mediaeval philosopher at a time when the philosophy of Aristotle was beginning to exert a new influence (Ceillier). Four Homilies, preserved by Vossius, on "the Annunciation to the Holy Virgin Mary," and on "Christ's Baptism," are totally unlike the genuine writings of Gregory, they are surcharged with the peculiar reverence paid to the Mother of our Lord after the controversy between Nestorius and Cyril, and they adopt the words of orthodoxy current in the Arian disputes. Two letters, with a commentary on them, are also preserved. One is a comment on Matt. vii. 22-29, from a Catenia, Cod. MS. and published by Galland, Vet. Patr. Bibl. xir. 119, and a discourse, in Omnes Sanctos, preserved with a long Epistola praeceps by Mingarelli.

The bishop of Neoceansa was present at the first council held at Antioch in A.D. 264 to consider the improprieties and errors of Paul of Samosata. His brother Athenodorus is also spoken of as accompanying him, and they are named among the most eminent members of the council. (Eusebius, H. E. vii. 28.) In consequence of the dissimilation of Paul, no sentence of deprivation was then passed. At the close of 269 a second council was held on the subject at Antioch, at which a Theodorus was present. If this name is used for Gregory, he may not have died before 270. There is nothing known positively about the date of his departure, but his panegyrist tells us that his closing words expressed his regret that seventeen heathen should still be remaining in his diocese, a deep anxiety for their conversion, and a solemn injunction that no land should be purchased as his place of sepulture. He wished to carry the law of poverty out to the extreme letter. He was, however, buried in the church which he had built in Neoceansa. He was commemorated on Nov. 17 (Cal. Hippop.) and Nov. 23 (Cal. Arm.).

Editions of his Works.—The most noted have been those of Gerard Vossius, 1640, in 4to, and in 1822, in folio. They had been published in the Bibl. Patr. Coloniae, in 1614. The Pamphlet on Origen by Sirmond 1605, 4to. De la Rue included it in his edition of Origens Opera, vol. iv. The various fragments attributed to Gregory are all published by Migne. (Patri. Gr. vol. i.)

GREGORIUS (4), bishop of Cimna, in the province of Galatia Prima. His signature appears in the Acts of the council of Neoceansa, A.D. 314 (Labbé and Corrard, ii. 1488), and in those of the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Labbé and Corrard, ii. 51; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 484.)

GREGORIUS (5), bishop of Portus August and member of the council of Arles, A.D. 314. (Routh, Relig. Sacr. iv. 95; Mon. Vet. Dom. p. 201, ed. Oberhür; Tillemont, 20, vol. vi. p. 47; Mansi, i. 477; Ugh. Ital. Sacr. i. 111; Cappelletti, La Chiese d'Italia, i. 496.)

GREGORIUS (6), bishop of Berytus. He was the successor of Eusebius of Nicomedia in that see, and is by some called in his letter to the Lycaonians in this prelate among the bishops who had been condemned by Alexander of Alexandria (Thed. H. E. i. 5). He attended the council of Nicaea in 325 (Labbé, Concil. ii. 51).

GREGORIUS (7), ST., THE ILLUMINATOR (Gregorου Ὑλαυρούσχος), "the sun of Armenia," the apostle and first patriarch of Armenia, cir. 302-331.

Of the life and times of the founder and patron saint of the Armenian church the best is not the only authorities are Agathangelos, who was secretary to Tiridates king of Armenia the persecutor and afterwards the convert of Gregory, and Simeon Metaphrastes. A French translation of his fragments was printed in the first volume of the Historien de l'Armenie, 1867, by Victor Langlois, who has shewn that the work in its present form is a second and later edition of the original history of the reign of Tiridates and of the preaching of St. Gregory. This is evident not only from the incredibility of some of the events recorded, but also from the mention of people, such as the emperor Marcian, who lived after the time of Agathangelos. This improved edition is nevertheless of very early date, as it alone was known to Moses of Khorene, the Herodotus of Armenia, who flourished in the 5th century. The life of St. Gregory by Metaphrastes (Migne, Patr. Græc. cv. 941-996) is evidently drawn from Agathangelos. The silence of all Greek writers about St. Gregory is remarkable, though perhaps it can be accounted for by the position of Armenia in a far-off corner of the civilized world. Sozomen (H. E. ii. c. 8) incidentally mentions the conversion of Tiridates, ascribing it to a miraculous occurrence, but he says nothing concerning the human agent. The Rev. S. C. Malan has presented the subject to English readers by publishing, along with two other monographs of interest on the life of St. Gregory of Armenia, his life and works, and his correspondence. The life of St. Gregory by Metaphrastes, by Sozomen, and the works of St. Gregory by Agathangelos, are by far the most important materials for the compilation of a work on the life of St. Gregory of Armenia. The first of these, the life of St. Gregory by Metaphrastes, is the work of a man of genius, of a man who was the first to write the life of St. Gregory, and of a man who was the first to write the life of St. Gregory in the Armenian language. The second of these, the life of St. Gregory by Sozomen, is the work of a man of genius, of a man who was the first to write the life of St. Gregory in the Greek language, and of a man who was the first to write the life of St. Gregory in the Greek language. The third of these, the works of St. Gregory by Agathangelos, is the work of a man of genius, of a man who was the first to write the works of St. Gregory, and of a man who was the first to write the works of St. Gregory.
Armenia and Armenian Christianity, a translation of the life and times of St. Gregory the Illuminator from the Armenian work of the Vartabed Matthew, which is the main source of the following sketch of the saint's life.

Gregory was born in or about 357 at the city of Vahramashat, capital of the province of Ararat in Armenia. His father Anak, or Anag, was a Parthian Arsacid, of the province of Balikh, who, cir. 258, at the instigation of the Sassanian Ardashir (as Agathangelos and Moses of Khorene say, but it must have been his son Sapor I. as stated in Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. art. Tiridates III.), murdered Choreses I. of Armenia. The dying king commanded the whole family of Anak to be slain, but an infant was saved, and being carried to the Cappadocian Caesarea was there brought up in the Christian faith, and received at baptism the name of Gregorius. Gregory, after a training in the fear of God, was married by his foster-mother Mary, a lady of high rank, rich, modest, and pious, who bore him four sons, Vartanes and Aristages (or Rosstaces), the latter of whom succeeded him as patriarch of Armenia. After three years Gregory and Mary separated by consent that they might give themselves more fully to the service of God.

Meanwhile Tiridates III., cir. 284, or a little later, had recovered the kingdom of his father Choreses, by the help of the emperor Diocletian, whose favour he had gained, and whose hatred of Christianity he had imbibed. Gregory attached himself to him as a servant, and soon so endeared himself that he was raised to the rank of a noble. In the first year of his reign Tiridates went to the town of Erez (Erzeng) in Higher Armenia, to make offerings to Anahid the patron-goddess of Armenia; but Gregory refused to take any part in this idolatry, endeavoured to turn the king from his idols and spoke to him of Christ as the judge of quick and dead. The king was enraged, and determined to compel Gregory to join in the idol feast. Then followed what are known as "the twelve tortures of St. Gregory," which, in the exaggerated accounts handed down to us, are valued at forty years of imprisonment, at the amputation of a limb on the one hand, and for unsurpassed fortitude, humility, and patience on the other. After two years Tiridates, who, it is said, had previously been ignorant of Gregory's parentage, ordered the saint to be thrown into a muddy pit infested with creeping creatures, into which malefactors were wont to be hurled, in the city of Oedrashat, and there he lived for fourteen years, being fed by a Christian woman named Anna. In the story of St. Gregory there are a few traces like this of Christianity having existed in Armenia at a period earlier than his episcopate.

It is related that a community of religious women having in or about the year A.D. 300 fled from the neighbourhood of Rome in order to save one of their number, Rhipisime, from the designs of the bishop of the city. They migrated to the city of Valarshab, and built a convent outside the city of Valarshab. Tiridates being struck by the ravishing beauty of Rhipisime, had her brought to the palace. She managed to escape, but was overtaken and murdered, along with three-and-thirty of her companions. St. Gagane, the head of the community, suffered the same fate. By the judgment of God Tiridates, as the story goes, was transformed into the appearance of a wild boar, and his people were plagued. At length it was revealed to the king's sister that as a condition of relief Gregory must be fetched from the pit. This was done, and afterwards the king had him brought to Caesarea, and Gregory then preached publicly for sixty days to instruct the people, and to prepare them for holy baptism. After sixty-five days he narrated to them "his great vision" of the descent of One from heaven, grave and majestic, whose presence was of Light, and of three peleustas surrounded by three crossers of light. Upon his return to his order the people built three churches, one at the place where Rhipisime was murdered, the others where Gagane and the sisters fell, and he called the place Echmiadzin (the descent of the Only Begotten). The churches have given to the spot the Turkish name of Ulchi-Kilise (Three Churches). Some time about 302 Gregory was consecrated the first Catholicos of Armenia by Leontius the bishop of Caesarea and Cappadocia [Armenians]. His cathedral was in the city of Valarshab on the spot on which he had named Echmiadzin. He destroyed the idol temples, conquering the devils who inhabited them, i.e. the priests and supporters of the old religion, and baptized the king and his court in the river Euphrates. This national conversion occurred several years before Constantine in Rome had established the Church in the Roman empire, and Armenia was thus the first kingdom in which Christianity was adopted as the religion of the state.

Gregory practised himself and urged on others the reading of the Holy Scripture, both of the Old and the New Testaments. He also wrote letters to St. James of Nisibis, requesting him to compose homilies on faith, love, and other virtues. After filling the country with churches and ministers, schools and convents, Gregory in 331 retired to lead a military life among the caves of Manyes in the province of Taran, having previously consecrated his son Arisades bishop in his stead. Gregory died in the wilderness, A.D. 332, and the shepherds, finding his dead body without knowing whose it was, erected over it a monument of stone. Gregory is said to have been summoned to the council of Nicaea, but being himself unable to go sent his son, who brought back the decree for the Armenian church. The venerable patriarch at Valarshab greatly rejoiced at reading them, and exclaimed, "Now let us praise Him who was before the worlds, worshiping the Holy Trinity and the Godhead of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, now and ever, world without end, Amen," which words are added to the Nicene Creed when said in the Armenian church (Malan, p. 327, note). He is also said to have visited Constantine along with his sovereign (Nicop. Callist. H. E. viii. 55 in Migne, P. G. cxvi. 609; Baron. 311, xii., i.), a tradition which is magnified in the popular version to a visitation of the Holy Trinity and the Godhead of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and reception by Constantine and pope Silvester (Moses of Khorene, cap. 89 in Lusignois, H. de l'Arménie, ii. 128). In the last paragraph of the work of Agathangelos the writer asserts that he was an eye-witness of the things that he narrates, but if it is admitted that the existing work is a later recension, this sentence must have been taken directly from the original. The Bol-landists have printed Agathangelos, and other lives of Gregory. (Acta SS. viii. Sept. pp. 295–413; Basil. Men. Sept. 30, in Migne, Patr. Græc. cviii.; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1355, 1371.) In honour of her founder the Armenian church afterwards bore the name of Armeno-Gregorian. Saint-Martin gives 278 for the date of his consecration (Mém. sur l'Arménie, i. 486), and Lancelot the same (Historiena, ii. 327). Saint-Martin also places the death of Choeceros by Anak in 198 (Mém. i. 412), a date which must be far wrong. His festivals are—in the Ethiopian Calendar Sept. 18; in the Byzantine, Sept. 30; in the Armeno-Gregorian, Mar. 25, June 8, June 22. [L. D.]

GREGORIUS (8), THE CAPPADOCIAN, appointed by Arianizing bishops at Antioch in the beginning of 340 (not, apparently, of 339, as the Festal Index says), to supersede Athanasius in the see of Alexandria, on the ground that Athanasius had uncanonically resumed his see without any session of a council compelling the vacant see to be occupied by the council of Tyre in 335. The appointment of Gregory is wrongly assigned by Socrates (ii. 20) to the Dedication Council, which did not meet until 341. He had been a student in the schools of Alexandria, and had there received kindness from Athanasius (Greg. Naz. Ornat. xxi. 15). He was now to be installed by military power, under orders from the emperor Constantius. The announcement being made by his countryman the prefect Philagrius, the Alexandrian church people protested to the other magistrates and to all their fellow citizens: Philagrius replied by encouraging a pagan rabble, in combination with Jews and with countrymen carrying clubs, to attack the church of St. Qurinius, and to perpetrate various profane outrages, four days before Gregory's arrival, which took place on March 23 (cf. Fest. Ind.), Athanasius having retired to a place of concealment. Socrates wrongly connects with Gregory's intrusion the night attack described in Athanas. de Fugâ 24, which took place after the appointment of George, in 336. That Gregory was the chief instigator of the lawless, from the circumstances of his appointment; and although it could not be said of him, as of Pistas, who had at first been thought of for the post, that he had been deposed for overt Arianism, yet, as Athanasius says in an encyclical letter written at this time, his sympathy with the heresy was proved by the fact that only its supporters had demanded him, and that he employed as secretary one Ammon, who had been long before excommunicated by bishop Alexander for his impiety (Encycl. c. 7). Athanasius tells us that on Good Friday, Gregory having entered a church, the people showed their abhorrence, wherenupon he caused Philagrius publicly to scourge thirty-four virgins and married women, as men of rank, and to imprison them. Others were imprisoned on Easter-day itself; Gregory employed Philagrius to use violence to captains of vessels, by way of compelling them to convey his letters of communion: he accused Catholics before the governor for praying apart in their houses, and hindered them from being visited by their clergy. After Athanasius fled to Rome, Gregory became still more bitter: he persecuted the rightful bishop's aunt, and when she died he tried to deprive her of burial; he seized the doles of widows; he caused the duke Balainus to spit upon a letter of remonstrance written to him by "Father Antony" (Athan. Hist. Art. 13). We hear of him as "oppressing the city," in 341 (Fest. Ind.). Auxentius, afterwards Arian bishop of Milan, was ordained priest by him (Hilar. in An. 8). The council of Sardica, at the end of A.D. 343, pronounced him never to have been, in the church's eyes, a bishop (Hist. Art. 17). He died, not by murder, as Theodoret says, ii. 4, through a confusion with George, but after a long illness (Fest. Ind.), about ten months after the exposure of the Arian plot against bishop Euprates, i.e. about February, A.D. 345. This date, gathered from Athanasius, Hist. Art. 31, is preferable to that of the Index, Epil. 2 = June 26, 346. [W. B.]

GREGORIUS (9) II., fourth patriarch of greater Armenia, grandson of Gregory the Illuminator, succeeding Verthanes and occupying the see for eleven years, c. A.D. 347–58. According to another account he was the fifth patriarch, having succeeded his brother Hosyrius or Josue. He is said to have carried the gospel to the Albanenses, a tribe on the Caspian sea, amongst whom he suffered martyrdom. (Galanus, Hist. Armenia, cap. 5; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1574.) [L. D.]

GREGORIUS (10), bishop of Cassena c. A.D. 361. He is said to have been a native of Ticinium (Pavia). He died as a martyr A.D. 361; probably in the persecution of Julian. (UgHELL, Ital. Sacr. ii. 453; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. Sacr., ii. 5236.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (11), bishop, an uncle of Ibas on the father's side. He exercised a pastoral care over Basil on the death of Basil's father, and Basil speaks of him with much affection. Gregory was present with other bishops of Cappadocia at Basil's consecration. About A.D. 371 an unhappy difference arose between Basil and his uncle, the circumstances of which, and Gregory Nysen's awkward and disingenuous attempts to heal the breach, are narrated elsewhere. [BASILIUS OF CESAERIA, Vol. I. p. 288.] (Basil. ep. 58, 59, 60, in Patr. Gr. xxxii. 408–410.) [F. V.]

GREGORIUS (12) BAETICUS, ST., bishop of Eliberi, Eivissa or Granada cir. 357–384. He is first mentioned as resisting the famous Hosius of Cordova, when under the persecution of Constantius Hosius gave way so far as to admit Arian bishops to communion with him. This must have been in or before A.D. 357, the year of Hosius's death.

At the council of Ariminum Gregory was one of the few bishops who adhered to the creed of Nicea, and refused to hold communion with the Arians Valens, Ursacius, and their followers. The authority for these statements is a letter to Gregory from Eusebius of Vercellae, from his exile in the Thebaid (printed among the works of St. Hilary of Poitiers, ii. 700, in Migne, Patr. Lat. x. 713). Eusebius there acknowledges letters he had received from Gregory, giving an account of his conduct, and commends him highly for having acted as became a bishop. He expels him to those who had fallen away, and to rebuke the unfaithful, without fearing the secular power, and asks him to write and tell him what success he had met with in his efforts to reform the bad, and what brethren he had either found faithful, or had brought back to the character and conduct of Gregory. He maintains that Gregory was one of the bishops who fell into heresy at Ariminum, and supports his opinion by the following reasons: (i) The letter of Eusebius cannot be considered a witness in favour of Gregoryus, as the only evidence he had before him when he wrote it was derived from Gregoryus's own letter of self-commendation. (ii) Concerning further in which the Libellus Precum, c. 10, states expressly that he never suffered. Gams further identifies him with the Gregoryus who was one of the deputation headed by Bessistus of Cartaghe, who were sent by the council to Constantinian, in A.D. 359, and held communion with the Anian's leaders, Valens, Ursacius, and others (St. Hilary of Poitiers, Ex Opere Historico Fragmentum 8, in Migne, Patr. Lat. x. 702). His grounds for this supposition are the rarity of the name Gregoryus in the West till the 4th and 5th centuries, only one bishop of the name, Gregoryus of Portus, who subscribed the canons of the council of Arles, A.D. 313, being found in western church history before Gregoryus Baeticus, and the fact that Gregoryus must have been a young man in A.D. 359, which agrees with the description given by Sulpicius Severus (Hist. Sac. ii. 45, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 152) of the deputation. (ii) The Syllenderino, who says "Gregetyus Baeticus, Eliberi Episcopus, usque ad extremam senectutem diversos mediocrem sermoct tractatus compreteguit, et de Fide elegantem librum, qui hodie superesse dictur." The last clause is generally considered to refer to Gregoryus himself, and to his book, and some MSS. omit the "qui," which would make this interpretation certain. In that case Gregoryus would have been alive in A.D. 370, the date of St. Jerome's treatise. Opinions have been much divided as to the book De Fide. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Ap. ii. 270) say "etiamnam latent." It was formerly supposed to be the De Trinitate already mentioned. Cellier (Auctores sacrés, iv. 348) and others consider it to be a treatise variously ascribed to St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Ambrose, or Vigilius of Thapsus, in which the previous attribution to Phoebeus, bishop of Agin (Histoire Littéraire de la France, i. pt. ii. 273–276), and is printed among his works by Migne (Patr. Lat. xx. 31). Finally, Game, p. 314, thinks that the above-mentioned treatise, De Trinitate, though really written by Faustinus, is the work to which St. Jerome alludes. He considers that St. Jerome was misled by Gregoryus claiming the book as his OWN, which, according to his notions, he had some right to do. The ideal of the early church, which Gregorius wished to restore, included the community of property, a system which of course extended to mental property, such as writings. He therefore, as head of the church, might assert a claim to the work composed by one of his followers.

It will be seen by the above account that the materials for a life of Gregorius are scanty, that the Liber Pontificalis, which mention him most frequently, is of very doubtful authority, and that widely different estimates have been formed of him. This article has endeavored to set out, as fairly as possible, the conclusions on both sides, with a sketch of the arguments by which they are supported. It should be remembered that Gams, from the favourable view he takes of Hosius, whom he does not consider to have fallen into heresy, is unfavourably predisposed to Gregorius, whom he regards as the author of what are, in his opinion, calumnies against Hosius. Had Gregorius really yielded at Nice or Ariminum, it seems improbable that the opponents of the Luciferians should never have used so telling a retort against them as he does in his letters. The two main charges of Arianism and Luciferianism appear to be mutually destructive. It may be further observed that it seems unlikely that so eminent a leader of the orthodox party as Eusebius, when he wrote to Gregorius, had no other information of the events that had happened at Sirmium and Ariminum, except that supplied by Gregorius's letter, or that the latter should have ventured to give an account of his behaviour, which was diametrically opposed to the truth, to a person who either knew already or soon would be informed of what had really occurred. Gregorius is commemorated on April 24.

[F. D.]

GREGORIUS I. L. bishop of Nazianzus in Cappadocia, father of Gregorius Nazianzenus [Guzzorius (14)]; originally a member of the sect of the Hysiptarini [Hysiptarini], who were numerous in Cappadocia, he was converted to the Catholic faith, married a lady of the name of Nonnus, and was soon afterwards chosen and consecrated bishop of Nazianzus, c. A.D. 328. He was a pillar of the orthodox party, though he was weak enough to sign the creed of Ariminum in deference to the emperor Constantius, A.D. 360. He took part in the ordination of Basil to the see of Caesarea [Basil, Vol. I. 287]; he opposed the attempts of the emperor Valens, A.D. 371, to overthrow the Catholic faith, yet he, as well as Basil, was spared the banishment that was inflicted on many of the bishops (Socr. iv. xii.). After an episcopate of forty-five years, he died A.D. 374. His son frequently mentions his good father, both in his sermons and his verses, and pronounced a funeral oration over him. (Gregorii Nazian. Oratio xviii. in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxx. 330; Le Quien, Orig. Chrest. i. 411.)

[L. D.]

GREGORIUS (14) NAZIANZENUS, bishop (370-390) of Asissa and of Constantinople. He has been fortunate in his biographers. He left them abundant materials in his works, especially in a large collection of letters, and an autobiographical poem extending to nearly two thousand lines. His life accordingly occupies a large space in all the chief histories of the church, and we have in addition the important monographs of the presbyter Gregory (13th century); vid. Greg. Thes. Opus. ed. Hildi, l. I. Gr. and Lat.; Surius, de Prod. Hod. S. Mai. p. 121, Lat.); of Baronius, with notes by P. Jebusch, in the Acta SS. 9 Mai. ii. 373; of Clemenschet prefixed to the Benedictine edition of the works; of Hermant (Paris, 1679); and in our own day those of Ullmann, and the Abbé Benoît. The aim of this article is to select from this mass of materials, and in particular from those which have come to us from St. Gregory himself, the facts which are of chief importance, and to present to the reader (a) an outline of the events of his life; (b) an account of his writings; (c) an estimate of his position as (i) a writer, and (ii) a theologian.

(a) St. Gregory takes his distinctive title from Nazianzus, a small town in the south-west of Cappadocia, which is not known to the early geographers, and owes its chief importance to its connexion with our author. The Romans gave to it, or a place in the immediate neighbourhood, the name of Dioceaseiri; but in the 4th century this name seems to have fallen into disuse, while Nazianzus, as the seat of the bishopric, became the chief. Close to Nazianzus, in a district known as the Tiberine [Ep. ii. Opera, ii. 2; S. Basil, Ep. iv.], was a village called Arianzus, where the father of Gregory possessed an estate, and where the son was born.

Both the parents of Gregory are known to us. His father bore the same name [Guzzorius (14)], and belonged in early life to the sect of the Hysiptarians [Orat. xviii. 5; Opera, l. 333]. The mother's name was Nonnus, a child of Christian parents [Philitius and Gorgonia], and herself praised by her son as a model of Christian virtues. To her life and her prayers he attributes the conversion of his father. A sister and brother are also known to us — Gregoria, probably older than Gregory, and the subject of one of the most touching of his funeral orations [Orat. viii.; Opera, l. 217-232]; and Constantia, who rose to eminence at the court of Constantine, and was in like manner the subject of an eulogy at his death [Orat. vii. Opera, l. 183-216].

The date of Gregory's birth is uncertain, as it depends chiefly on two vague references in his writings, which have been made to give more than one interpretation. He tells us, when speaking of Basil's quitting Athens—και γαϊς ἀκείμενος τον καταγόμενον θρόνον.

Ἡς τραπέζης μοι σχεδόν νοῦς ήτα. Εὐκλ. Carm. xi. de Vīsi Sūrī, 328, 9. Opera, l. 687. Gregory the priest, followed by Papebroch (Acta Sanct. ut sup., p. 380 A) and others, understand these words to refer to a period of thirty years spent in study; but this meaning could only have been extracted from the Greek, or held in opposition to the whole evidence furnished by the life of Gregory and his friend, in order to support the statement, already put forth by Suidas (Ephyrēs, tom. i. p. 497), that Gregory died at the age of ninety or more in the thirteenth year of Theodosius, i.e. about 392, and that his birth is therefore to be placed in the opening years of the 4th century. Taking the words in their almost certain meaning they fix... the departure of Basil from Athens in about the thirtieth year of Gregory’s life. Now we know that Basil left Athens [Basiliius, p. 283] about the year 355; we know also that Julian, who was with Gregory at Athens, was there in 355; and we get 325 as a proximate date of Gregory’s birth. He was a beardless youth when he went to Athens (Ἄγγελος παραδόθης, Or. viii. 112, Opera, ii. 650), and this would give a time, probable in the life of some ten or twelve years spent there.

In another passage he speaks of his father as trying to persuade him to become his coadjutor at Nazianzus, and saying,— οὕτω τοιοῦτον εὐσεβέστατος ζύγον δια θᾶλα καὶ τοιοῦτον ζύγον δια χρόνον.

Carm. xi. de Vida Sui, l. 512, 13, Opera, ii. 700.

The simple meaning of these words seems to be that the period of the son’s whole life was less than that which the father had lived as priest and bishop, but not much less; and the resort to any other meaning seems due only to the difficulty which some writers have felt in admitting that Gregory, and, if Gregory, Caesarius, for he was the brother, was also with him, was dead after the father’s ordination. Paproech (Acta Sanct. ut sup. p. 370 έ) would read ἄγνωστοι (trade-winds) for θυσίας, with the sense, “Your life is not as long as mine,” or, according to his later suggestion, as if feeling that this correction would not hold, Σίδη λόγος, meaning, “Your life is not half as long as mine.” Of both emendations it can only be said that they are absolutely without MS. authority, and that a theory which rests upon such support is practically groundless. Stilling (Dissert. de Tempore Natali S. Greg. Naz. p. vi. in Acta SS. Boll. Sep. iii.), seeing that θυσίας, the reading of all the MSS., could not be displaced, found an escape in the insertion of a stop at the close of the first line—”You have not yet measured to the full such a life. The time of sacrifice is wholly passed for me;” or, as others would render it, “Have you not yet measured such a life? What a long time it is that I have been offering sacrifices!” But to all such renderings there is the fatal objection that a polished Grecian such as Gregory would not have used τοσοῦτον and δεῖς in immediate proximity except as correlatives. Clemencet suggests that “victimas eas intellegeris quam quilibet Christianus ex corde porro offret,” and is content to say, with Prudentius Maran (Vit. Basil. p. 38, col. 2), “Satius est cum Tillimontio fateri legem ecclesiasticam de continenti episcoporum nundam in omnibus omnino ecclesiis viguisse quam apertissimum locum ejusmodi conjecturam attendere,” though he significantly adds, “Recte, si prius demonstravi quem legem illum in Capadocia non viguisse, quod quidem probare non facile fuerit” (Vit. S. Greg., Opera, i. pp. lxxxi. lxxiii.; cf. Tillemont, Monumenta, tom. ix. p. 695). But we do not seem necessarily driven either to an alteration of the text or to the conviction that Gregory was born during the episcopate of his father. The words would be literally fulfilled if he was born at any time after the father’s ordination, born the privata hominibus, and there seems good reason to believe that a considerable period intervened between the ordination and the consecration. Gregory himself tells us (Orat. xviii. 15; Opera, tom. i. p. 349) that some short time passed between the bapt-
the Xoles because they have such a protector in heaven.

At Caesarea probably was commenced the friendship with Basil [BASILIIUS, p. 288, col. 2], which, tried by many a shock, survived them all; and was the chieftain of which moulded the life of both friends, and certainly chief among the influences which has moulded the theology of the Christian church. Basil went from Caesarea to Constantinople; Gregory and his brother went to Caesarea in Palestine to pursue the study of oratory [Orat. vii. 6, Opera, ii. 201]. Another reason, read by the chieftain, was the existence of the Holy Sepulchre, which had been consecrated in Jerusalem, and the Asiatic bishops, their own father perhaps among them, had been present in large numbers [Benoit, Greg. de Naz. p. 33]. Pilgrimages were already frequent, and a fresh impulse to them had been given by the supposed discovery of the True Cross. Morosus was until the time of Cyril, who was to succeed him, must have been already a man of mark. At Caesarea the brothers separated; Caesarius departing to Alexandria, and Gregory remaining to study rhetoric in the school made famous by Origen and Pamphilus and Eusebius. At the time, Thessalonica was the greatest renown, and Eusebius was a fellow pupil with Gregory [Hierom. de Eccl. Script. cap. 113]. The latter has celebrated the fame of his teacher in an epitaph which makes Attica ask "Who now possesses the glory of my art?" [Ep. iv. Opera, ii. 1109]. From Palestine Gregory went to Alexandria, which he speaks of as "uniatos kal ἐπιδότος, καλός τε καὶ νῦν ἀφέσιν τε καὶ δοξολογίαν ἐργάσσιμον" [Orat. vii. 6, Opera, i. 200]. Here Didymus now filled the chair of Pantaenus and Clement and Origen, and counted among his pupils the first young thinkers of the Roman empire; and here Athanasius filled the episcopal throne. Gregory does not tell us that he met either the great teacher or the great bishop, yet the latter's letter was an exile at the time. He did not remain long in Alexandria, for already he was within reach of Athens, the centre of the young student's hopes. His eagerness was not checked by the storm of season—it was about November, the worst month of the year—and a ship of Aegina, among the crew of which there happened to be some of his friends, offered him the wishful for passage [Orat. xviii. 31, Opera, i. 351]. When off Cyprus a fierce storm struck the ship. The thunder, lightning, darkness (τὰ κατωτέρας ἀνάλογα), cracking of the yards, shaking of the masts, cries of the crew, appeals for help to Christ, even by those who before had not known (δὴ ἀπὸ φόβου δίκαιος καθαρισμός), all added to the terror of the scene. Wors of all the ship was left without fresh water. To die of thirst or hunger seemed the fate before them when the fury of the storm should abate; but a Phoenician vessel came to their rescue and supplied their need. Still the danger was not past; the storm continued for twenty-two days, during which they saw no chance of deliverance. Gregory's chief fear was not death, but death without having been baptized. In prayer he dedicated himself again to God (Ὑπὸ καὶ ἀλληλομεταρθοῦν τῷ ἀγώνῳ), and sought for help. The prayer was answered, and the whole crew so affected that they received spiritual as well as temporal salvation. Passing by Rhodes they came to Aegina, and thence he went to Athens—"εἰ ἢς τοῦτο καὶ ἐξελθεῖν (Carm. xi. de Vitæ sui, 130–212; Opera, ii. 682, 3; Carm. de Indus sui, 510–540). Gregory has given another account of this storm in the funeral oration for his father [Orat. xviii. 31, Opera, i. 351, 359], when he refers to the danger as having given him to God—"καθ αὐτῶν ὑπ’ αὐτὸν ῥά τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ διδαχόμενος ἐστιν ἡμῶν ἡμιόνοιο". The natural meaning of these words is that by their deliverance from the fear of dying unbaptized, seems to be that he and those with him then received the rite of baptism. So they have been understood by Baronius (Vit. § 17 in Acta SS. ut sup. 378 c), who is followed doubtfully by Clemens (Opera, i. lxxxviiii., and certainly by Benoît (S. Grégoire, p. 49). The priest Gregory states that the baptism took place and his return to Nazianzus (Opera, i. 133), and this is the view taken by Tillemont (Mémoires, ix. 334) and Hermant (Grégoire, i. 76). We have no data for determining more certainly whether the outward rite took place at this time or not; but that Gregory regarded it as the crisis of his life, being, and drew benefit from the rite to the God who had spared it, is beyond doubt.

Among the Athenian sophists of the day, none were more famous than Himerius and Proserenus, at whose feet Gregory continued the study of oratory. To the latter, who was a Christian, Gregory devoted an epitaph (Epit. v. Opera, ii. 1109), which bids youth flee from Athens, since great men were there no more; and Rome honoured him with a statue bearing the words "Regina Roma Regi cloqueintio" (Europia de Vit. Philosoph. et sohists); while Julian, also his pupil, would have exempted him alone from the proscription of Christian teachers, but that he refused to be exempted.

At Athens two arms of a river which had been diverted against the town met (Greg. and Basil), and now they were together again. What that meeting was to Gregory he himself has told us. Athens, with the party factions among the students of different nationalities, and theouting for fresh pupils on the part of every teacher's class, had proved little in accord with his gentler spirit. He had gone there to seek eloquence, and now found Basil; like Saul, who sought his father's asses and found a kingdom [Orat. xiiii. 14; Opera, i. 780]. He was able to render Basil various little friendly offices, which saved the freshman no small inconvenience. It was through his means that Basil was exempted from the rough practical joking which all who joined the Athenian classes had to pass through. [Basiliius, p. 283, col. 2] The Armenians, jealous of the new-comer, whose fame had preceded him, and with some of the old feeling of antagonism against Cappadocia, tried to entrap him in sophistical debates. When they were defeated Gregory felt that the honour of Athens was at stake, came to the rescue, but soon saw the real object they had in view, and left them to join his friend [Orat. xiii. 16, 17; ibid. 782, 783]. These things are trifles, but they had important effects.

The two friends, rendered obnoxious to their companions, were bound the more closely to each other. Their fellow-students, for various reasons, bore various names and surnames. They were, as it has been said, partial followers of this kind of things in common, and became as one mind possessing two bodies (Orat. iii. 20, 21; Íbid. 785, 786; Carm. x. 221-235; Opera, ii. 687).

Among other students who were at the university with Gregory, was Julian the Apostate. Gregory claims that he had even then discerned the character of the man, that he had read it in his very looks; and that their fellow-students would remember how he used to warn them that Rome was cherishing a serpent (σὺν κακῶ δὲ Ἡρακλείου θρίφει, Orat. v. 24, Opera, i. 162).

Gregory must have spent a long time at Athens, not less probably than ten years. He went there, as we have seen, a beardless youth; he left it a youth of thirty years. No decade of life is as important as the fourth in a man's career. The receptive faculties are still fresh; the active powers are strong with their first energy. To the effect upon Gregory of those years at Athens the matter and the form of his work alike bear witness. But they drew to a close. Basil had already left, and Gregory would have gone at the same time, but the earnest entreaties of strangers as well as friends, superiors as well as equals, prevailed upon him; for only the strength of an oak could have resisted their pleadings and tears (Carm. xi. 245-262, Opera, ii. 685-688).

They apparently wished to retain him at Athens as a teacher of rhetoric (ὅς δὲ λόγων διδάσκητε χέ ψῆφων ὑπέτο, Íbid. 256), or, as Clemensct interpreted the words (note in loco), were willing to give him the first place among the teachers. It does not seem necessary to understand more than that the students gave him the first rank among themselves.

Leaving Athens then, probably about the beginning of the year 356, Gregory went first to Constantinople, wishing to see the new Rome before his return to Asia. The fact is important, as bearing upon his later decision to enter upon his great work there. Here he unexpectedly met his brother Caesarius, who was journeying to Nazianzus from Alexandria, and determined to continue his journey in spite of the attempt to detain at court the young physician whose fame had preceded him (Orat. vii. 5-9, Opera, i. 200-203). The mother had longed to see both her sons return together, and Gregory has left a touching account of her mourning.

The time had now come for entering upon the duties of life. Nazianzus must have expected much from the foremost of Athenian students, and in the ordinary course a career of distinction and preeminent would have been open to Gregory as an advocate, or a teacher of rhetoric.

He did not refuse to give his friends some specimen of his oratorical power. He danced a little and then quitted the stage (Carm. xi.; De Vita sūd, 265-275; Opera, ii. 689). It is at this point that some of the biographers, as we have seen above, fix his baptism. Gregory himself tells us that he now laid down the plan of his life. Every power he possessed—even that of eloquence itself—was to be devoted to God; but the way thus chosen seemed divided into two, and he knew not which to take. Friends could not help him, for they, too, were divided.

Elias, the sons of Jonasb, the Baptist, were types of the life that attracted him; but, on the other hand was the study of the Scriptures, for which the desert offered no opportunities; and the advancement of his profession, which seemed to be imperative duties (Ibid. 300-337). He resolved to seek the good and avoid the evil of both the practical and the contemplative life. The true monastic life is one of habits, not one of physical conditions (τὰς τοιμαίς ἓλθες ἐν συνενοίωσι, Íbid. 329). He resolved to live the strictest life of an ascetic, and yet receive the blessings of society and perform its duties (Carm. i. de Rebus suis, l. 65 sq.; Opera, ii. 683). Not even the pleasure of music did he allow himself (οὐ μόνος ἐναλλάς ἐν κρυβώμαι ὑπὸ διαθήκη, Íbid. l. 69). He found, however, that the details of domestic duties were little in accord with the cast of his mind. "Many cares fretted his body and his heart. To govern an estate was a very important matter (σὲν ἐκλέγετο ἐξ ζητούν). Not to be led masters, and not obedient to good ones, they excited the anger of both much more than they supposed. Then to look after property, here the harsh demand of the tax-collectors, go to law-courts, where the richer man gains the day even if he is wrong—such things a man can no more do all this without being the worse for it than he can go too close to a house on fire without being singed by the flame or blackened by the smoke" (Íbid. 140-164).

In the midst of these trifling irritations, which went far to mar the life he had marked out for himself, Gregory heard from his old friend Basil, who had followed the example of his own sister and mother, and after visiting Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Mesopotamia to compare the rival systems, had resolved to found a coenobitic system in Pontus (Basil. p. 264, col. 2). While students at Athens the friends had formed some such plan of common life as this, and Basil now asked Gregory to join him. He answered that he had not kept the promise to live together and lead an ascetic life (συναγωγαὶ σοι καὶ κυνηγοδεσφαῖον, because the higher claim of filial duties overrode it, but proposed to Basil that he should join them at the Tiberine, where the ascetic life in common could be followed, and the duties of home performed (Ep. i., Opera, i. 1). Basil did visit Arianzus, but remained only a short time. From Cæsarea he again wrote to Gregory. The letter is lost, but we have the reply, fencing a playful rillay on Arianzus in the same style (Ep. ii., Opera, ii. 3). More letters of a like nature were exchanged (Ep. iv., Opera, ii. 5-5), and after one from Basil describing the beauties of the place, and another describing the nature of the life and work, Gregory set out for Pontus. He was no drone in the busy hive. First in intellectual study and spiritual exercise he was no less so in self-denial and in manual labour (Ep. vi., Opera, ii. 4). One substantial result of their joint labours is preserved to us in the Philocelia, a series of extracts from the exegetical works of Origen. Gregory himself speaks of this work, which he sent as a present to his friend Theodosius of Tyana (Ep. iv., Opera, ii. 160). We know from Gregory's own words also that he took part in composing the famous “Rules” of Basil (Basilii, p. 285, col. 1). It is not clear how long he remained in Pontus. Clemente thinks it was two or three years, and the supposition agrees with the general course of events, and with Gregory’s regret that he had not tasted enough of the life there to excite his longing for more (Orat. ii. 6, Opera, i. 14). The silence of Gregory with regard to his return may be due to another cause. Constantius had removed the bishops throughout the empire to accept the creed of Rimini (A.D. 358-60), and the bishop of Nazianzus, though bitherto faithful to the Nicene doctrine, did so. The monks of his diocese were devoted to Athanasius, and there followed a division in the church, which Gregory few could heal. To his father he was acceptable as a known theologian, and the father’s sin had indeed been one of ignorance rather than one of wilful heresy. To the monks he was acceptable as almost one of themselves. He induced the bishop to make a public confession of orthodoxy, and delivered a sermon on the occasion (Orat. vi., Opera, i. 179 seq.). If this division at Nazianzus occurred in A.D. 360, we have the account of Gregory’s second letter to Tillemon, Mémoires, ix. 345; Schoeck, Kirch. Gesch. xiii. 287; Ullmann, Gregorius von Nazianz. s. 41.) If with Clemente and others (Opera, i. pp. xiv. seq.) it is assigned to the year 363-4, under Julian or Jovian, rather than under Constantius, we must suppose that the return was due to the claim of titular duties which was again felt binding. In any case he came to Nazianzus, and received letters from Basil asking him to return to Pontus. Again there was an interchange of playful letters, followed by more serious ones. Gregory in reality depended on communion with Basil more than upon the air he breathed (Ep. vi. ad fin. Opera, ii. p. 6). His desire to return was soon to be fulfilled. The aged bishop felt the need of support and help, and no one could so fitly give it as his own son. He resolved therefore to overrule the scruples which made Gregory shrink from the responsibilities of the priesthood. We know that the ordination occurred on one of the high festivals, and it was probably at Christmas, A.D. 361 (Socrates, ii. 1021; Tillemon, Mémoires, ix. 352). Nicaeus assumes that the congregation was aware of the bishop’s intention, and that they compelled Gregory to accept ordination. Such forced ordinations were not unknown (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. iv. 2-5, and ix. 7, 1). Basil was in the same way made priest. But Gregory speaks of it in the calm of later years as tyranny, for he can give to it no other name—

(Carr. xii. 21, 2, 345-348; Opera, iii. 5.)

The father had known fully the wishes of the son, and the latter felt he could not bear the tyranny; but, as is so gored by some savages, fled from home and relatives, and went once more to Pontus to receive consolation from his friend (ibid. 350-356). But here once more the voice of duty is heard. It is no longer only the voice of a father speaking to his son, it is also that of a bishop speaking to a priest. Ordained at Christmas, he preached in the church at Nazianzus on Easter-day of the following year. The sermon was but a short address, in which he press the duty of mutual forgiveness as becoming the holy season. “The act was one of tyranny—he cannot forget that; but it was tyranny honourably exercised and honourably borne. There was a time for holding back as Moses and Jeremiah did; there was a time for coming forward as Aaron and Isaiah did. The reason the bishop built the magnificent temple in which they worshipped, and, like Abraham, offered his son to God. Let them all devote themselves to God that day” (Orat. i., Opera, i. 3-6). Gregory had expected that a crowded church would have welcomed his return and have applauded his first sermon; but though it was the festival of Easter, the church was almost deserted. At the time he bore this without complaint; but during the same festival he did not hesitate to express his disappointment and surprise. “Their conduct was like that of the guests invited to the marriage-supper (Matt. xxii. 2; Luke xiv. 16), and indeed worse, for they were neither strangers nor invited guests, but they had invited him to the church as the present worship to welcome their guest” (Orat. iii., Opera, i. 68-72). Gregory could not be ignorant of the cause of this estrangement. His flight from the work of the priesthood demanded an explanation before the church of Nazianzus, and before the wide circle of his friends. In proportion to the hopes of earlier years must have been their disappointment now. The question was of too great importance to be considered settled by the short sermon which he had preached at Easter; on all sides a full answer was expected, and Gregory determined to give an answer worthy of the question and of himself. It is contained in the second oration (Orat. ii. i. 65). In no part of his writings do we find proof of greater study. From its length and form we may feel sure that the biographers are right in thinking that it was never intended for, and never delivered from, the pulpit. It is practically a treatise on the pastoral office, and forms the foundation of Chrysostom’s de Sacramentis and of the Cura Pastoralis of Gregory the Great, while writers in all ages have directly or indirectly drawn largely from it.Benefits notes that Bossuet is much indebted to it for his celebrated pæneergic on St. Paul (Gree. de Naz. p. 138). It is formally divided into two parts, the earlier of which treats of the reasons for his flight, and the latter gives those which led him to return. “He fled because (1) he was wholly unprepared for the ordination, and it came like a sudden thunder-clap, which deprives men of their reason, upon a man who had always been of a retiring nature (Orat. ii. 6); (2) he had always been attracted by the monastic life, and in time of greatest danger had devoted himself to it (6b); (3) he was ashamed of the life and character of the mass of the clergy. There were some men who had called themselves to the holy office—Isaac Saul also among the prophets? (6b. 8); (4) he did not at that time, he did not now—and this reason weighed with him most of all—think himself fit to rule the flock of Christ and govern the minds of men” (6b. 9). From this fourth and chief reason he is led on to consider the duties and difficulties of the true pastor, and discusses them in forty sections of the discourse (10-49, pp. 17-58). "It is difficult to obey, much more difficult to rule, especially in the kingdom of God. The pastor's blemish is quickly, his virtue but slowly, communicated to his flock. It is too little that a shepherd should be free from positive sin; he ought not to be a man who is in honor, in the porch of the temple, who leads, if he is not a leader. To drive the flock is tyrannical, and that which is exacted by force is never lasting. Man is the most various and complex of beings; to govern him is the art of arts, and science of sciences. The medicine of souls is more subtle than that of bodies. The soul is joined to the body, (1) that, by wrestling with lower elements, it may gain the inheritance of glory, as gold is purified by fire; (2) that it may ennoble the body, and assimilate it to its own nature; that what God is to the soul, this the soul may become to the body. A physician takes note of localities, climates, age of his patient, and such like things. The spiritual physician must have a spiritual character, for they make the body become subject to the soul. The chief difficulties are that men are opposed to the healing of the soul, and seek to hide and excuse their sins, and turn a deaf ear to and hate their physician. Further, in spiritual diseases the diagnosis is more difficult, as none of the symptoms are patent. In spiritual and temporal alike, unpleasant medicines are often profitable. The end aimed at is to give life to the soul, and wean it from the world. The law tended to this, but Christ is the end of the law. For this reason God was joined to man by an intervening soul, and Christ took upon Him the whole nature, that He might heal the whole nature. The whole Incarnation is the medicine of the soul, and priests are the ministers of this medicine. Physicists never spare themselves, and they seek to prolong even useless lives. Pastors have a difficult task on account of the carelessness of those who need healing, and their varied states, habits, and positions; for men differ more in character than they do in form. Minds, then, like bodies, require individual treatment; some precept, some example; some the reign, some the spur; some to be encouraged by praise, some checked by blame, and correctly and carefully even in tristles, some must seem never to observe lest we drive them to despair. The same persons, again, require various medicines at various times; and these can only be known as the moment for their use occurs. The mind cannot frame them, nor discourse tell them. To the medical mind they will be plain. Great danger arises from want of moral skill in the pastor. His first duty is to preach the Word, and this is so difficult that to fulfill it ideally would require universal knowledge. Then, theological knowledge is absolutely necessary, especially of the doctrine of the Trinity, lest he fall into the Atheism of Sabellius, or the Judaism of Arius, or the Polytheism too common among the orthodox. It is necessary to hold to the truth that there is one God, and to confess that there are three persons, and attributes proper to each; but for this there is need of the Spirit's help. Much more is it difficult to extend it to a popular audience, both from the preacher's imperfection and the people's want of preparation. Zeal which is not according to knowledge leads men away from the truth. Then, there is the desire of vainglory, with an insipid, her constant attendant, rashness, inconstancy, based on ignorance of the Scripture; and a subjective eclecticism which ends in an uncertain creed, and leads men to doubt of truth, as if a blind or deaf man were to place the evil eyes, if not in his house, in the eye of Jesus, who leads, if he is not a leader. To drive the flock is tyrannical, and that which is exacted by force is never lasting. Man is the most various and complex of beings; to govern him is the art of arts, and science of sciences. The medicine of souls is more subtle than that of bodies. The soul is joined to the body, (1) that, by wrestling with lower elements, it may gain the inheritance of glory, as gold is purified by fire; (2) that it may ennoble the body, and assimilate it to its own nature; that what God is to the soul, this the soul may become to the body. A physician takes note of localities, climates, age of his patient, and such like things. The spiritual physician must have a spiritual character, for they make the body become subject to the soul. The chief difficulties are that men are opposed to the healing of the soul, and seek to hide and excuse their sins, and turn a deaf ear to and hate their physician. Further, in spiritual diseases the diagnosis is more difficult, as none of the symptoms are patent. In spiritual and temporal alike, unpleasant medicines are often profitable. The end aimed at is to give life to the soul, and wean it from the world. The law tended to this, but Christ is the end of the law. For this reason God was joined to man by an intervening soul, and Christ took upon Him the whole nature, that He might heal the whole nature. The whole Incarnation is the medicine of the soul, and priests are the ministers of this medicine. Physicists never spare themselves, and they seek to prolong even useless lives. Pastors have a difficult task on account of the carelessness of those who need healing, and their varied states, habits, and positions; for men differ more in character than they do in form. Minds, then, like bodies, require individual treatment; some precept, some example; some the reign, some the spur; some to be encouraged by praise, some checked by blame, and correctly and carefully even in tristles, some must seem never to observe lest we drive them to despair. The same persons, again, require various medicines at various times; and these can only be known as the moment for their use occurs. The mind cannot frame them, nor discourse tell them. To the medical mind they will be plain. Great danger arises from want of moral skill in the pastor. His first duty is to preach the Word, and this is so difficult that to fulfill it ideally would require universal knowledge. Then, theological knowledge is absolutely necessary, especially of the doctrine of the Trinity, lest he fall into the Atheism of Sabellius, or the Judaism of Arius, or the Polytheism too common among the orthodox. It is necessary to hold to the truth that there is one God, and to confess that there are three persons, and attributes proper to each; but for this there is need of the Spirit's help. Much more is it difficult to extend it to a popular audience, both from the preacher's imperfection and the people's want of preparation. Zeal which is not according to knowledge leads men away from the truth. Then, as a temple of the living God. He who has not learned to speak the hidden wisdom of God, and to bear the cross of Christ, should not enter upon the priesthood. For himself he would prefer a private life. A great man ought to undertake great things; a small man small things. Only that man can build the tower who has wherewith to build it. " Such are the reasons which Gregory gives for his flight. He adds those which led to his return. " (1) The longing which he had for them and which he saw that they had for him; (2) the white hairs and feeble limbs of his holy parents—the father who was to him as an angel, and the mother to whom he owed also his spiritual birth. There is a time for yielding as for everything else; (3) the example of the prophet Jonah—and this weighed most with him, for every letter of Scripture is inspired for our use—who deserved pardon, but he himself would not if he still refused. The denunciations of disobedience is Holy Scripture are no less severe than those against the unworthy pastor. On either side is danger. The middle is the only safe course—not to quit the priesthood, nor yet to refuse obedience. There is no merit in obedience, but for disobedience there is hardly any remedy. Some holy men are more, others less, forward to undertake rule. Neither are to be blamed."

The discourse ends with Gregory's own submission, with a prayer for his father's blessing, and an invocation of blessing upon the bishop and his church.

Such is in outline the famous "Ταύ Αὐτῶν Αὐτογραμμάτων." A full summary of it shews at once what was the discourse, and what the man who penned it. Did it alone remain to us, Gregory must still have been thought of as one of the four pillars of the Greek church, and we should still read the chief traits of his personal character. This sermon was written in A.D. 362. Julian the Apostle had entered Constantinople on Dec. 11, A.D. 361. His history is told elsewhere. [Julianus.] It concerns us here only as it crosses the life of Gregory. The first reference to it is in a letter to his brother Caesarius, who had been persuaded by Julian to remain at court, written early in A.D. 362. Gregory was at the time with Basil, who had indignantly rejected like advances, and he blushes that the son of a bishop should accept them. It made their father weary of life, and the fact had to be hidden from their mother (Ep. vili. Opera, ii. 7). What the effect of this letter was upon Caesarius we may judge from his declaration before Julian: "In a word, I am a Christian, and I mean to be one," and from the explanation of the son to the enraged and unhappy children!" (Orat. viii. 13, Opera, i. 206; cf. De Broglie, Constance, ii. 207). Gregory esteemed the victory of Caesarius as a more precious gift than the half of the empire (Orat. vii. 14, ad init.). Yet that letter was meant for no eye but the brother's. The agony of that Christian family as Nazianzus tells what influence that modifiers Gregory's character; his expression of it tells what was the character which was moulded. But Julian had bitterly revenge in store. He, the old fellow-student of Basil and Gregory, and pupil of Prooeresius, ordered that no Christian should teach profane literature. For Gregory this had the effect that he composed many of the poems which we now possess, and which were meant probably as reading-books for Christian schools. It helped to cause another effect. Towards the end of the year 363 or the beginning of 364, he wrote the two Invectives against Julian (κατά Τιμοθεοῦ Βασίλειου Σταυρούντως Γράφοι, Orat. iv., Opera, i. 78—147 ... Αὐτογραμμάτως, Orat. v.; Βιβλ. 147—175).

The emperor had fallen, pierced by an arrow, in the previous June. The orator intended by these philippics to hold him up to heaven and earth as the sum of all that was vile. In the first sentence he is called "the dragon, the apostate, the Assyrian, the common enemy, the great mind" (Is. x. 12, LXX); and this sentence is the keynote of the whole. Words which may well seem to us more than sufficient to picture in darkest colours any character, seem to the orator wholly inadequate to represent that of Julian. He longs for "the eloquence of Herodotus or Thucydides that he may hand down his iniquity to all future time." (Orat. iv. 92, Opera, i. 126 a.)

The discourses, which are regarded as two by the editors, form clearly but two parts of one whole. In the first is kept the life and character of Julian; in the later his death is set forth as an example of God's judgment upon sinners. By writers who regard Gregory as a saint, every sentence of these orations is justified, though they have considerable difficulty in extracting from some of them the odour of sanctity. Looked at dispassionately, they remind one rather of Demosthenes or Cicero than of a Christian bishop; and as we listen to the impetuous torrent of words which only stop in their course to call down fire from heaven, other words are suggested which still seem to say, "Ye know not what spirit ye are of." As orations they are worthy to stand by the side of any of either ancient or modern times, but even when we reflect that they were never intended for the pulpit, we feel that they have little right to stand by the side of the orations of Gregory the Divine. The worshippers of the saint find the invective against Julian much more easy to explain than the panegyric of the Arian Constantius, which these discourses contain. He is "the most divine and Christ-loving of emperors, and his great soul is summoned from heaven. The sin of his life was the human humanity (τὸ γὰρ τὸς ἀνθρώπου φιλεξωμένος) which spared Julian." (Orat. iv. 34 seq., Opera, i, 93 seq.). Gregory, indeed, speaks elsewhere of three things of which Constantius repented when dying: (1) the murder of his relations; (2) that he had named Julian Caesar; (3) that he had given himself to the world and the never sanctified (Orat. xxv. 26; Opera, i. 403 a). And yet he is conscious that the emperor gave his support to impiety, and framed laws against the orthodox doctrine (Orat. xxv. 9, Opera, i. 461 a); nor could he have been unconscious that it was at the hands of Eusebios that baptism was administered to the penitent. When the force of this explanation is admitted, the fact remains that the character of Constantius is an oratorical pendant to that of Julian; and that the one is simply a whitened background, on which the blackened blackness of the other may be seen.

While Gregory was thus employed at Nazianzus, Basil returned from Pontus to Cæsarea, where Eusebios had been made bishop, and was ordained against his will. He informed his friend of this, and Gregory replied in a letter which is important as marking his thoughts about the position in which both he and Basil had been placed. "Now the thing is done it is necessary to fulfill one's duty—such at least is the teaching of Nicene in the present distress, when many tongues of heretics are raised against us, and not to disappoint the hopes of those who have put their faith in us and in our past life" (Ep. viii., Opera, i. 8). A difference arose ere long between Eusebius and Basil. The grounds of it are not known to us, and Gregory thought it better that they should not be (Orat. xliii. 28, Opera, i. 792); and the difference itself claims notice at this place only because it introduces Gregory in the character of peacemaker. The warm friend of Basil, he was no less an admirer of the bishop, and an advocate for the rights of authority. Invited by the bishop to fill the place made vacant by the retirement of Basil to Pontus, he does not hesitate to answer that it was unjust, and to demand reconciliation with his friend as the price of his own influence (Epp. xvi.—xx., Opera, ii. 16). An indignant reply from Eusebius served only to call forth stronger letters from the same standpoint (Epp. xvii. and xviii., Opera, ii. 17, 18), and these are followed by an equally plain letter to Basil, telling him that Eusebius was disposed to be reconciled to him, and urging him to be first in the victory of submission (Ep. xix. ibid.). The result was that Basil returned to Caesarea, and gave his powerful aid to the bishop in the dangers which were threatening the church, or rather became bishop in reality, while Eusebius was still so in name—"the keeper of the lion, the leader of the leader" (Orat. xliii. 33, Opera, i. 786). When peace was thus established Gregory returned again to Nazianzus. Here new troubles awaited him. Caesarius had been chosen by Valens to be treasurer of Bithynia, and once more his brother was distressed at seeing him among the servants of an adversary of the true faith. On Oct. 11, 368, the city of Nicea was almost destroyed by an earthquake, and Gregory made this the occasion for a typical appeal to his friend to abandon his office (Ep. xx., Opera, ii. p. 19). He was on the point of yielding when he was cut off by sudden death. The funeral oration which was delivered by Gregory is placed by Jerome first in the list of the orator's celebrated works (Catal. Scrip. Eccles. 117). It narrates, in the language of fraternal love, the deeds of a noble life, and seeks in that of Christian submission to describe his patience and his friends' (Orat. viii., Opera, 198, et seq.). Sixteen epitaphs also remain to shew how often a brother's love mourned its loss (Epit. vi.—xxi., Opera, ii. 1111—1115). The death of Caesarius brought other troubles to Gregory, arising from the administration of his estate which had been left to the poor. Against extortioners who tried to seize it he was to the aid of his friend, and even of Sophronius, prefect to Nazianzus (Ep. xix., Opera, ii. 24); and his troubles gave occasion also to the kind offices of Basil. He himself tells us plaintively how he would gladly have fled these business worries, but that he felt it his duty to share the burden of them with his father (Carm. xi. 375—380, Opera, ii. 650). About the same time another shadow of darkness was cast upon the house at Nazianzus by the death of Gorgia, and once again the orator delivered a funeral discourse of most touching gracefulness (Orat. viii., Opera, i. 218 et seq.). These sorrows weighed heavily on the spirits of Gregory, and especially on that of his friend, and side by side with the public discourses in which he sought to console others, we have the private poems which show how hard he found it to console himself. "Already his whitening hairse shew his grief, and his stiffening limbs are inclining to the evening of a sad day" (Carm. de Rebus suis, i. 177—296, Opera, ii. 641 et seq.). In a.D. 370 Eusebius died in the arms of Basil, who at once invited Gregory to Caesarea on the plea that he was himself in extremis. The latter regarded the plea as a pretext, and in the tone of mingled affection and reproach declined to go until after the election of the archbishop (Ep. xi., Opera, ii. 54). The invitation to the bishop of Nazianzus to be present at the election was answered, and the whole assembly chose the archbishop by the hands of the son. He dwells upon the importance of the position and the special qualifications for it possessed by Basil, and promises his assistance if they propose to elect him (Ep. xlii., Opera, ii. 35). He wrote also to Eusebius of Samosata by the hands of the deacon Eustathius, urging him to go to Caesarea and promote Basil's election (Ep. xliii., Opera, ii. 37). Eusebius yielded to this request, but the vote of the aged bishop of Nazianzus was also needed. An illness from which he was suffering disappeared as soon as he started. The son thought it prudent to remain at home, but sent by his father's hands a letter to Eusebius, expressing his esteem and excusing his absence, and referring to the miracle of his father's restored health (Ep. xlvii., Opera, ii. 39). He did not go even after the election, but contented himself at first with writing letters which witness alike to his wisdom and his affection (Epp. xiv. and xlvii., Opera, ii. 40, 41). When the storm had subsided he went in person, but declined the position of first among the presbyters, or probably that of coadjutor bishop (καθετι της καθετης της, Orat. xliii. 39, Opera, i. 370), which was offered to him, and refused the position which he formally declined was in reality accepted. In the opposition caused by the malcontent bishops who were defeated in the election, and in the persecution organized by the prefect Modestius at the command of Valens, Gregory was foremost as a personal friend and as a defender of the faith (Socrat. iv. 11). In the year 370 Valens made a civil division of Cappadocia into six provinces, according to Anthimus, bishop of Tyana, claimed equal rights with the bishop of Caesarea, i.e. the rights of metropolitan of Cappadocia Secunda, of which Tyana was the capital. Basil resisted this claim, which was the more galling to him, as he himself had been the main cause that Tyana was chosen as the capital instead of Podanlus. In this difficulty Gregory, who had made the archbishop of Tyana, was offered, in a letter full of affectionate admiration (Ep. xlvii., Opera, ii. 40), to visit and support his friend, and went to Caesarea. After his arrival they proceeded together to the foot of Mount Taurus in Cappadocia Secunda, where was a chapel dedicated to St. Orestes, and where the people of those parts were accustomed to pay their titles in kind. On their return they found the mountain-passes at Sasina guarded by followers of Anthimus. A struggle took place, and Gregory implies that he was personally injured in it (Carm. xi. 453, Opera, ii. 699). He seems soon afterwards to have returned to Nazianzus, whether he was followed by Basil, who had resolved (and, unbeknown to Gregory) to make Sasina a bishopric, and Gregory the first bishop. In this plan he was aided by the elder Gregory, and the son yielded against his own will (Orat. ix., Opera, i. 234–8). At the last moment he sought refuge in flight, but was pursued by Basil, and at length consecrated (Orat. x., Opera, i. 239–41). But still he put off the duties of his see, until Basil sent Gregory of Nyssa to urge that he should enter upon them. He now attempted to do so, but Anthimus was again prepared to resist by an armed force, and Gregory finally abandoned duties which he had never willingly accepted. Basil wrote to him a letter of reproach, and he replied in the same tone. He was not fight with the warlike Anthimus, for he was himself quite experienced in war, and liable to be wounded, and one, moreover, who preferred repose. Why should he fight for sucking-pigs and chickens, which after all were not his own, as if it were a question of souls and of canons? And why should he rob the metropolis of the illustrious Sasina? (Ep. xlviii., Opera, ii. 44). The "Illustrous Sasina." must be described in the warmest terms. De Kidon et, "On a much frequented road of Cappadocia, at a point where it is divided into three, is a halting-place, where is neither water nor grass, nor any mark of civilisation. It is a frightful and detestable little village. Everywhere you meet nothing but dust, noises, waggoons, howls, groans, petty officials, instruments of torture, chains. The whole population consists of foreigners and travellers. Such was my church of Sasina." (Carm. xi. 439–446, Opera, ii. 696). Other letters were exchanged, but Gregory was convinced that the bishopric of Sasina was not the work to which he was called, and nothing could change his determination. Under the pressure of his father's wish and words he was at length prevailed upon to leave the hills and go down for refuge, and become coadjutor at Nazianzus. But this step did not deliver him from the quarrel between Basil and Anthimus, for Nazianzus was in the new province of Cappadocia Secunda, and the bishop of Tyana soon found it convenient to visit the Gregories, and seek to gain them to his cause. They were firm in their attachment to Basil, but Anthimus then asked the son to interpose between Basil and himself, and to seek a conference. The option of having one at all, the time and place if one was resolved upon, was all left to Basil's will, and yet he felt injured, and expressed his dissatisfaction at Gregory's conduct. The latter felt and said, in plain terms, that his friend was puffed up by his father, "it is not due to others. He had himself offended Anthimus by his firm Basilism (Basilismus). Was it just that Basil should be offended for the same reason?" (Ep. i., Opera, ii. 44). He soon gave further proof of affectation in the active part which he took in the election of Eulalius as bishop of Beira, and in a remonstrance on the subject of Basil's teaching, which he felt was due from his friendship. He had heard men cavil at Basil's orthodoxy, and assert that he did not hold the Divinity of the Third Person in the Trinity; and humbly asked him, for the sake of silencing his detractors—he himself had heard so often that there could not be room for doubt—to express in definite words what he held as the true doctrine (Ep. iviii., Opera, ii. 519). "I reply to him that he did not accept the friendly letter in the spirit which dictated it. Gregory saw from the reply, that it had given pain, in spite of his care. Yet he submits, and is willing to place himself entirely in Basil's hands (Ep. lixiv., Opera, ii. 53).
Gregorius Nazianzenus

The year 373 was an "annus mirabilis" for Nazianzus, which called forth two remarkable discourses from Gregory. An epidemic among their cattle, a season of drought, and a destructive tempest in harvest reduced the people to absolute poverty. They rushed in their need to the church, and compelled Gregory to address them. The discourse seemed to have been an impromptu. The preacher "regrets that he is the constrained speaker rather than his father—that the street-crier made to flow water from the fountain is dry—and then urges that divine punishments are all in mercy, and that human sins are the ordinary causes of public woes;" then plainly puts before his hearers special sins which belonged to their own city, and invites them to penitence and change of life (Orat. xvii., Opera, i. 289). The inability of the inhabitants to pay the ordinary imperial taxes led to an inscription in Nazianzus. At the approach of the prefect with a body of troops they took refuge in the church, and he himself consented to listen to the pleading of Gregory in their behalf. While the Invective against Julian reminds us of the Philippics or the De Corone, we have here an oration which has justly been placed, without injury in the comparison, by the side of the Pro Licinio or Pro Marcello. When Chrysostom's plea for Eutropius or Flavian (Benois, p. 355). The first part points the afflicted people to the true source of comfort; the second is addressed to princes and magistrates. "The prefect was subject to the authority of the teacher, which was higher than his own. Did he wield the sword? it was for Christ. Was he present at the altar first? it was equal to Christ. The most divine thing was to do good; let him not lose the opportunity. Did he see the white hair of the aged bishop, and think of his long unblemished priesthood, whom, it may be, the very angels found worthy of homage (Xarpelias), and did not that move him?" "I adjure you by the name of Christ, by Christ's emptying Himself for us, by the sufferings of Him who cannot suffer, by His cross, by the nails which have delivered me from sin, by His death and burial, resurrection and ascension; and lastly, by this common table where we sit together, and by these symbols of my salvation, which I conscribe with the same mouth that addresses to you this prayer—in the name, I say, of this sacred mystery which was due to others. He had himself offended Anthimus by his firm Basilism (Basilismus). Was it just that Basil should be offended for the same reason?" (Orat. xvii., Opera, i. 317 et seq.). At the commencement of the year 374 the elder Gregory died, and the son delivered a discourse, at which his mother Neona, and his friend Basil were present, and which was the eulogy at once of both his parents and of his friend (Orat. xviii., Opera, i. 327). Nonna survived her husband for a few months only, and died as she knelt beside the Holy Table. No less than thirty-five epitaphs were devoted by Gregory to her memory (Epist. lxxv.-c., Opera, ii. 1133–49). The brother and sister were already dead. The father and mother, though spared for a hundred years, were now dead. Gregory was left alone. His first care was to devote the whole of the large fortune which had come to him to the poor, keeping for himself only a small plot of land at Arianzus; and then to invite the bishop-elect to come to him. The fear that the church would be rent by heresy at length induced him to exercise the office temporarily. About the middle of the year 374 Eusebius of Samosata was banished to Thrace, and we learn from a letter from Gregory that he longed to see the exiled bishop on his way, but was prevented by illness, which confined him to his house (Ep. lxxv., Opera, ii. 58). During the same illness he wrote similar letters of affectionate consolation to the procopul Eutropius, who had incurred the displeasure of the emperor (Ep. lxxix., Opera, ii. 62–3). The illness did not last long, and after a visit to Tyana, whence he wrote to Julian, the newly-appointed bishop of Tralles, to ask that the clergy may be exempted (Ep. lxxvii., Opera, ii. 60); we find him again preaching at Nazianzus in the presence of Julian. The sermon is entitled εἰς τοὺς λόγους, καὶ εἰς τὸν Ἱσωτόνον Ἰωαννίδα (Orat. xix., Opera, i. 364 et seq.). For two reasons he had resolved not to preach at Nazianzus again—(1) That he may cause them to elect a successor to his father in the episcopacy; and (2) That by his silence he may check the mania for theological discussion, which was spreading through the Eastern church, and which was leading everybody to teach the things of the Spirit without the Spirit (βδόλα-κεινς τα καλαί τα τοῦ πνεύματος χωρὶς πνεύ-ματος, Εἰδ. 364 c). They demanded discourses from him as a tribute which he was not willing to pay, but now Julian, who had sought his counsels, joined in the demand, and made compliance a condition of exemptions being granted to the clergy. The demand could no longer be resisted, and it was met by a supreme effort of eloquence, which dwelt on “the vanity of all things earthly, and exhorted each man to devote to God whatever he possessed—wealth, poverty, the will to do good, the active or the contemplative life, discourse or silence, virginity, temperance, prayer, hymns, care for the poor. God accepts the least offering as the greatest, and it is the duty of each to offer what he has, for the disposition gives value to the offering.” He concludes by “presenting to Julian the poor, the priests, the monks, and exorts him and the people to mutual forbearance.” For the last time he appeared before them as temporary holder of the see.

Two years had passed since the bishop’s death, and in vain had Gregory pressed the election of a successor. His love of retirement was now, as all through life, a powerful influence, and it was strengthened by the difficulty of his position as practically occupying—though he had determined not to occupy—an important see, after he had refused to be bishop of Saisma. Towards the end of the year 375 he disappeared suddenly, and found refuge at Seleucia in Isauria, at a monastery devoted to the virgin Thecla (Carm. xi. 549, Opera, ii. 701). Here he passed three years of which we have no record. What they were a secret; but it was the hour when he did his later work at Constantinople. They were as the intervals of calm in every great life, when principles are formed and resolutions taken which become the hidden spring of noble deeds.

In the beginning of the year 379 Basil died, and we find Gregory writing to comfort his brother. He invites him to visit Basil in Isauria, to comfort him at his funeral, for he was himself dangerously ill at the time (Ep. lxvii., Opera, ii. 65), but his love found expression in twelve epitaphs. These are printed by the Benedictine editors under one number (Epist. cxxix., Opera, ii. 1155–9), but the points of division are clear, and the last lines are:

Γεραμόφυς βασίλει, της κοινής ἀνθρώπων τῶν ἐνημερώματι τετελεσθέντα.

A letter from Gregory to Eudocius the rhetorician, written soon afterwards, speaks of “the loss of all who were nearest to him, and of Basil, his spiritual brother, and of death as the only deliverance from the ills which weighed upon him.” (Ep. lxxviii., Opera, iii. 322.)

But the time was at hand which was to witness the chief work of his life. At the date of the Nicaean council Alexander was bishop of Constantinople, and signed the decree which condemned Arius. He was succeeded by Paul, who, in devotion to the true faith, was the rival of Athanasius himself, and suffered martyrdom in 355. For thirty years after the death of Paul, Constantinople was the battle-ground of a constant war with heresy. The followers of Manes and Novatians, Photinians and Marcians, Sabellians and Apollinaris, were to be found there in large numbers; and the adherents of the Nicene faith, few in number, humiliated, crushed, having neither church nor pastor, were obliged to conceal themselves in the remote quarters of the city (Bened. Græc. de Nax. p. 180). In this distress they applied to Gregory to help them, and many bishops urged their plea. For a long time he was unwilling to leave his retirement, but then came to him the old feeling that there was a time to yield and a time to resist, and the conviction that he dared not refuse this summons. The date of his arrival at Constantinople cannot be fixed with certainty, but it was probably before Easter. A.D. 379 (Thierry, Mémoires, ix. 799). A prayer, which took the form of a poem, indicates the spirit with which he entered upon his new work (Carm. iii., Opera ii. 867). In another poem he has left us his estimate of what that work in the new Rome was. “It had passed through the death of indolence; there was left but one last breath of life. He had come to this city to defend the faith. What they needed was solid teaching to deliver them from the spider-webs of subtleties in which they had been taken” (Carm. xi. 562–611, Opera, ii. 705, 6). In a private house, where he himself was lodged by relations, his work was begun. He speaks of this as “the new Shiloh, where the ark was fixed after its forty years of wandering in the desert (Orat. xliii. 26, Opera, i. 706), as the holy mountain where the ark of Noah rested.”
GREGORIUS NAZIANZENUS

(Garrn. xi. 1080–2, Opera, ii. 731). It was to him "an Anastasius, the scene of the resurrection of the faith" (Orat. xii. 26, Garrn. i. 1079, 3), for the house was too small for the multitudes that flocked to it, and a church was built in its place. Gregory's fame, as a theologian, rests on the analysis he delivered at the Anastasius. It will be convenient to examine them later, and to note them here only in relation with the incidents of his life. His first work was to gather the scattered members of the flock and instruct them in the practical duties of Christianity, and the danger of empty theological discussions, and the pre-requisite for any true knowledge of God (Garrn. xi. 1210–31, Opera, ii. 737–9). Again and again in the early discourses does he dwell on the truth that it is only through personal holiness that a man can grasp any idea of the Holy One (Orat. xx. and Orat. xxi., Opera, i. 378–384, and 581–603). While doing this work, Gregory exposed himself to the attacks of all parties. His origin, person, clothes, and objects of discourse were all unusual. They would have welcomed a polished orator with external graces; but his manner of life had made him prematurely old, and his gifts to the poor had made him in appearance and reality a poor man. From words they passed to deeds. One night, a mob led on by monks, broke into the place of meeting and profaned the altar and sacred elements. Gregory himself escaped, but was taken before the judges as a homicide; "but He who knew how to save from the lions was present to deliver him" (Garrn. xi. 685–78, Opera, ii. 709). "He cared not that they attacked him—the stones were his delight; he cared only for the flock who were thus injured" (ib. 725, et seq.). His chief sorrow was to come not from any outward opposition but from a division in the flock itself. This division started from the schism of Antioch, which had spread through the whole church; but the immediate question was one of competition for the bishopric. Gregory had kept aloof from this quarrel, but among some of his followers, led by one of his pupils, took an active part in it, and was forced to draw from him a decision for one or other of the rivals. Some seem to have taken the part of Paulinus, some that of Meletius. Gregory, therefore, taking occasion from the greeting, "Peace be with you," and "Peace be with thy spirit," preached a sermon on Peace (Orat. xxi., Opera, i. 414–425), dwelling "on its blessings, and the inconsistence of their faith, servants of the God of peace as they claimed to be, and their practice. Their duty was to remain united when the faith was not in question; to weaken the present struggle by keeping out of it, and thus to do the rivals a greater service than by fighting for them" (ib. 14, p. 423). Soon afterwards the news of the establishment of peace reached Constantinople, and was followed by peace in the little church of the Anastasius. Gregory, though ill, preached almost certainly on this occasion another sermon on peace (Orat. xxxiii., Opera, i. 425–34), thankfully celebrating its return, and urging those present who were divided from them by heresy "to be at peace with them by acceptance of the true faith. It was the work of the sacred Trinity to give the faithful "peace among themselves. The sacred Trinity would heal also this wider breach." At the close of this sermon he promises to deal more fully with the questions at issue between the followers of the Nicene faith and their opponents. This he did in the five theological discourses which soon followed (Orat. xxvii.–xxxi., Opera, i. 457–557; side infra, c. ii.). Other important discourses belong to the same period, of which the most remarkable are a second on the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, preached at Whitsuntide A.D. 381 (?) (Orat. xii., Opera, ii. 731–44), and one on Moderation in Discussions—a frequent subject with Gregory—in which heresy is traced to its absence, and on the fact that it is not given to every man or every time to reason about God (Orat. xxxix., Opera, ii. 378–401). About the same period, too, he delivered three (?) discourses of another kind, which gave signal opportunity for oratorical power, and have become models for the great preachers who have chosen as their themes the lives of saints. The subjects of Gregory's panegyrics were Cyprian, whose name was held in deserved honour in Constantinople (Orat. xxiiv., Opera, i. 437–50); Athanasius, who was especially dear to Gregory as the champion of Nicene orthodoxy, and who had died but a few years before (A.D. 373) (Orat. xxxi., Opera, i. 386–411); and the Maccabees (2) whose heroism might well have been specially intended for an example in the present struggle (Orat. xv., Opera, i. 287–298). Of the date of the last of these Clements says, "Quo anno quoque in loco habitis haec oratio certo definire non possimus" (ib. 286). He himself inclines to the period spent at Caesarea, but there seems no good reason for departing from the older opinion of Nicetas, which is here followed. The first of these discourses was hurriedly composed, as Gregory was in the country on the festival of St. Cyprian, and it had escaped his memory. The others, especially that on Athanasius, are considered by all judges, from the time of Jerome downwards, as among the orator's noblest works (Script. Ecol., 117).

Jerome himself became about this time a disciple of Gregory; and the pupil loved to tell how much he had learned from him, and how much he admired him of him "Exe magistri glorior et exulator"; "Gregorius, vir eloquentissimus, praebector meus a quo Scripturas explanans didici" (Ibid.); "Ante annos circiter triginta cum esset Constantinopolis, et apud virum eloquentissimum Gregorium Nazianzenum, tunc ejus urbis episcopum sanctum, Scripturarum studiosi eruditor" (Comm. in Isag., vi.). He has preserved for us Gregory's opinion of the way in which his congregation were led by mere words, and the way in which the teacher himself could playfully avoid a difficulty. Jerome asked him the meaning of the term "ἐν σωμάτω διευγενέστατω," in St. Luke vi. 1. He replied, "I will tell you from the pulpit, and all the people will applaud. And in spite of yourself you will have the blessing that as long as Jack are now ignorant; for if you alone do not applaud, they will look upon you as a dunce" (Hieron. Ep. ad Nepot. xxiii.).

There was another stranger who came to Constantinople, and professed himself a disciple of the now famous theologian. In the works of Gregory he is known to us as Hero, either because he bore two names, or, as Jerome, who had every opportunity of knowing, tells us, because Gregory did not wish the panegyric which he pronounced upon him to be handed down in connexion with the name Maximus.

"Quasi non licuerit eundem et laudare et vituperare pro tempore" (De Vir. Illust. 117).

The biography of this man will be given in its proper place [Maximus]. Here we have to deal only with the story which began not long after the latter arrived at Constantinople. He represented himself as descended from a line of martyrs, and as one who had suffered much through his adherence to the Nicene faith. He was an ardent adherent of Gregory's sermons (καὶ τῶν ἱματιῶν προφυλάσσων αὐτῆς λόγων, Carm. xi. 914, Opera, ii. 716). "No one was to him as Maximus, to whom he gave lodging and food and made him the sharer of his counsels" (ibid. 808–812). The man who admired Gregory's sermons so much heard one in which his own panegyric was pronounced (Orat. xxv., In Laudem Heronis Philosophi, Opera, i. 454); and the orator regarded it as a mark of a philosophic spirit that he could do so. Maximus had gained a rare distinction by the overthrow of his teacher, and hoped even to establish himself in the episcopal chair. He had two confederates, Gregory tells us. One was an angel who had become a Belial. The other is not known by name, but is described as barbarian in mind more even than by birth, and first among the presbyters (Carm. xi. 810–827).

He had still more important allies in Peter, bishop of Alexandria, who had recognised Gregory as practically bishop of the orthodox party in Constantinople (ibid. 858–931), but—whether from jealousy at the influence he had gained, or from difference of opinion in the Meletian schism, or that he too had been deceived by the craft of Maximus as Gregory had been—now joined in the plot against him. Seven sailors, whose names Gregory has recorded (ibid. 834), were engaged as spies and sent from Egypt to Constantinople. A party of Alexandrian clergy soon followed. At this time a priest from Thasos had come to Constantinople with a large sum of money to buy Proconesian marble for a church. He, too, was beguiled by the specious hope held out to him. Maximus and his confederates had the church in hand and the purchasing of the services of a mob, which was as forward to attack Gregory as it had been to praise him. It was night, and the bishop was ill in bed, when Maximus with his followers went to the church to be consecrated by five suffragans who had been sent from Alexandria for the purpose. Day began to dawn while they were still preparing for the consecration. They had but half-finished the tunic of the corymb philosopher, who wore the flowing hair common to his sect, when a mob, excited by the sudden news, rushed in upon them and drove them from the church. They retired to a flute-player's shop to complete their work, and Maximus, compelled to flee from Constantinople, went to Thessalonica with the hope of gaining over Theodosius himself. Repulsed by the clergy who declared that he could recognise in Constantinople no other bishop than Gregory, he returned to Alexandria and demanded from Peter that he would find him another bishopric or relinquish his own. He was silenced by the prelate, who banished him from Alexandria. Gregory devotes more than 200 lines of the poem De Vitæ et (Carm. xi. 807–1029, Opera, ii. 117–29) to this painful story, and his words of condemnation are bitter in proportion as the words of his panegyric were strong.

We must probably assign to a date later than the treachery of Maximus, Gregory's sermon on the arrival of the conspirators at Constantinople, (Opera, i. 619–627). It opens by a reference to the conquest of envy by a higher zeal; and then the preacher goes on to speak of his desire to "blot out the old calumny by new kindness" (ibid. § 5, p. 621). It is quite in keeping with the orator's character to find him welcoming these Egyptian sailors to his church, and regarding them as "one with himself since they are worshippers of the same Trinity," and even uttering words of highest praise for Peter, their bishop (ibid. § 3, p. 620).

In immediate connexion with the story of Maximus, Gregory tells us that he one day uttered the words, "My beloved children, keep intact this Trinity which I, your most happy father, have delivered and preserved as a memorial of my labours." One of the hearers saw the meaning, and "the whole congregation was in a turmoil as that of a hive of bees at the presence of smoke." People of all ages and conditions and ranks vied with each other in cries of affection for him and hatred for his foes (Carm. xi. 1057–1113, Opera, ii. 729–731).

We have no oration in which the name of Maximus occurs, but they are probably to be regarded as part of one, and to be placed in time soon after Gregory's recovery from the illness during which the plot of Maximus was carried out. His own words show how bitterly he felt that treachery; and bitterly did he feel also that his position was weakened by it. In spite of the cries of men, women, and children until nightfall, and the resolve that they would be buried in the temple rather than leave it until he had promised to remain with them, his determination was unchanged until one voice cried, "If you go you will banish the doctrine of the Trinity as well as yourself" (ibid. 1100). At this cry he yielded, and promised to remain until the arrival of some bishops who were expected at the council of Paphlagonia. By the church in hope—they, that their point had been carried; he, that his departure would not be long postponed. He did not, however, remain in the city. His health was shattered, and he retired for a while to the country to recruit it. On his return he commenced his first sermon with the words, "I kept longing for you, my children, and was persuaded that you in like manner kept longing for me" (Orat. xxvi., Opera, i. 471–485). This relation between the shepherd and the sheep is seen throughout the discourse, which is the loving outpouring and anxious questioning of the heart which knew their need, and knew that there were dangers without and within the flock. Near the end of the discourse (§ 15, p. 485) he refers to the bishopric of Constantinople, declaring that the love and affection of sense had ever longed much for it. For his own part he could wish that there was no primacy or precedence, and that one should be distinguished by virtue only.”

On Nov. 24, A.D. 380, Theodosius made his formal entry into Constantinople. One of his first cares was to restore to the orthodox the churches of which they had been deprived by the Arians. Demophilius and Lucius were both banished (Socrat. Hist. Eccles. v. 7); Gregory was summoned to the imperial presence. He could hardly believe that the words would ever be fulfilled, but early on the morning of Nov. 26, in the presence of an immense crowd, Theodosius and Gregory entered the church of the Holy Apostles. A thick fog enveloped the church, but at the first accents of the chant it was illumined by the rays of the sun, which fell upon the vestments of the priests and the swords of the soldiers, and brought to Gregory’s mind the glory of the Tabernacle of old. At the same time there arose a cry like thunder demanding that he should be bishop. “Silence, silence,” he cried: “This is the time to give thanks to God. It was not enough, hereafter, to name other things.” The service was continued and was ended without further interruption. Only one sword was drawn and that was put back unstained into its sheath (ibid. 1325-90). In no part of Gregory’s life is the true excellence of his character more clearly seen than in this; to his spirit of moderation and forgiveness is it to be attributed that his great religious revolution was effected without shedding one drop of blood. He has himself recorded an incident which exemplifies the spirit in which he returned the sanity of his foes. While he was ill in bed an assassin who had attempted his life, entered his room, and stung by conscience, fell weeping and speechless at his feet. When Gregory learned the fact he said to him, “May God preserve you! It is nothing wonderful that I whom He hath saved should be merciful to you. Your bold deed has made you mine. Take care to walk, henceforth, worthy of God and of me.” Gregory adds that the news of this deed spread through the city, which was softened towards him by it as iron is by fire (ibid. 1445-74).

\[\text{Γρεγοριους Ναζανεζος} \]

Theodosius intended to summon a general council, and soon after his entry into Constantinople he carried out his purpose. In May, A.D. 381, the synod of the 150 bishops who formed the second Oecumenical council was held in the capital of the East. Socrates tells us that the object of the council was to confirm the Nicene faith, and to appoint a bishop for Constantinople (Hist. Eccles. v. 8; cf. Sozom. vii. 7; Theodor. v 7; Mansi, Collect. Concil. iii. 525). No Western bishop is mentioned as having been present, and the attempt to show that Damasus of Rome was either consulted or represented is futile; but thirty-six bishops who were followers of Macedonius were present, and every effort was made to induce them to accept the Nicene faith. Meletius, the venerable bishop of Antioch, “honey-named and honey-natured.” (Carm. xi. 1551, Opera. ii. 754), was at first president. The principal question was the consecration of Maximus, which was at once pronounced void. Then followed, naturally, the question who should occupy the vacant seat. The wish of Theodosius that Gregory should be chosen was well known; and the only bishop who opposed it was Gregory himself. He was by force placed in the episcopal chair. But he had this hope—alas! a vain one—that, “as position gives influence, he should be able, like a choragus who leads two choirs, to produce harmony between opposing parties” (Carm. xi. 1525-45; ibid. ii. 755). The joy at the election of Gregory was soon followed by sorrow at the death of Meletius. The new archbishop, naturally, succeeded him as president of the council, but who should succeed him as bishop of Antioch? It is said that the two bishops, Meletius and Paulinus, had agreed that the survivor should be the successor of the deceased; the chief clergy and laity of both parties were sworn. Meletius himself expressed an earnest wish for it from his death-bed; but a strong party, both within and without the council, was soon organized against it. Gregory has given us in the poem De Vitâ sibi, a résumé of his own speech on the question (Carm. xi. 1591–1678, Opera, ii. 683–683). "It was no light matter; the universe which had received the blood of God Incarnate was troubled by it. Were the struggle between two angels rather than two men, they could not be worthy of it. But now God had given the means of peace; let them confirm Paulinus in the episcopal office, and when the two should pass away let them elect a new bishop. Let them see, that this would be a great conquest. For himself he sought their permission to resign the office which they had conferred upon him, and he would gladly retire to some desert far away from evil men. He cared not to live among men whom he could not convince, and whose opinions forsook him to accept." He could scarcely have expected that this address would be received with favour, for the Meletian party was overpoweringly strong in the synod, and Paulinus had not been invited; but he was not prepared for the storm which followed. "There arose a cry like that of a number of jackdaws, and the younger members attacked him like a swarm of wasps" (ibid. 1890–90). Elsewhere he compares them to "cranes and geese," and speaks of it as "a disgrace to sit among such buzzers of the faith" (Carm. xii. 154, Opera, ii. 787). He left the synod never to return to it. For a while illness was opportunely (καλὰ) the reason of his absence (ibid. 1745), but the council proceeded to name Flavian as successor of Meletius; and Gregory, finding that his opinion had little weight, withdrew altogether and left the official residence which was close to the church of the Holy Apostles (Carm. xi. 1778, Opera, ii. 769). This step led to earnest entreaties from the people that he would not desert his flock: "Who would nourish his children in the faith if he left them? Let him honour those labours which had ruined his health, and let that church be the place of departure at the end of life" (ibid. 1785–85). Moved for a while by these prayers, he was prevented in his determination, which was strengthened by the arrival of bishops from Egypt and Macedon. The East and the West were now opposed to each other, and "prepared for the battle like wild boars, sharpening their terrible tasks" (ibid. 1804). The new members of the synod did not object to Gregory personally; but among the questions brought to the front by another, rather than by reason, was that of his election, which afforded an obvious means of attack, and which was probably in itself obnoxious as an act of Meletius. It was clearly opposed, they urged, to the fifteenth canon of the Nicene council, which forbade any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, to pass from one city to another. By that canon, he might have been sent back, Gregory's party, on the other hand, urged that he was relieved from that obligation by the same authority which imposed it, when another general council elected him bishop of Constantinople; but it could not be expected that this plea would be accepted by bishops who were not a party to that act, nor is Gregory himself justified in speaking of the Nicene canons as obsolete: "

Nómenos στραβόντος τοὺς πέλαν γυναικῶν

Τὸν κλέοντα ἴδων καὶ σωμάτων ἔλεος.

Ibid. 1810, 11.

While they were thus discussing his election, his continued illness confirmed the conviction that it was his duty to resign his office. He appeared before the council, and exhorted them to think of higher things and mutual harmony. "He would be another Jonah to pacify the angry waves. Gladly would he find retirement and rest. He owed but one debt, the debt of death, and that was in God's hands. He had but one anxiety, and that was for his beloved church. He appeared before the Trinity (ch. 1898–55). He left the synod glad at the thought of rest from his labours; sorrowful as one who is robbed of his children. The synod received his resignation with satisfaction, for it removed a chief ground of dissension, and from many it removed, probably, a ground of jealousy (ch. 1869; Carm. xii. 145–5, Opera, ii. 787). Gregory went from the assembly to the emperor, "to demand from him no gifts; he left such demands to others; no—he was weary of the hatred even of his friends because he had sought God only, and all he asked was that the man who had conquered barbarians would seek a new triumph in putting an end to their strife, and would allow him to retire from an office to which, in spite of himself, he had been chosen" (Ibid. 1891–901). Theodorus could not refuse that which he unwillingly granted. Gregory's only remaining care was to reconcile those who had been opposed to him, and to bid farewell to his friends. He did this privately, but he felt also that there must be a public statement of his position and a public farewell to the council and his church. This he delivered towards the end of June, A.D. 381 (Carm. xii. 1753). The oration is entitled, Ξεπληρωμένος τῆς τῷ ἐκκλησίας παρουσίας, and was pronounced before the synod, in the presence of a congregation which filled every corner of the church, and among whom no eye was dry. "Was there need of proof of his right to the bishopric? He would render his accounts. Let his work answer. He found them a rude flock, without a pastor, scattered, persecuted, robbed. Let them look round and see the wretched which had been wretched—priests, deacons, readers, holy men and women. That wretched he had helped to weave. Was it a great thing to have established sound doctrine in a city which was the centre of the world? In that, too, he had done his part. Had he ever sought to promote his own interests? He could appeal like another Samuel. No; he had lived for God and the church, and kept the vows of his priesthood. All this he had done through the Holy Trinity and by the help of the Spirit. He would present to the synod his church at the most precious offering. The reward he asked was that they would appoint some one with pure hands and prudent tongue to watch over it; and that to the white hair and worn-out face of an old man, who could hardly then preach to..." them, they would allow the longed-for rest. Let them learn to prove these his last words—bishops to see the evil of the contentions which were among them; people to disregard externals, and love priests rather than orators, men who cared for their souls rather than rich men. The preacher then pronounces his lengthened farewell "to the beloved Anastasia, to the large temple, to the churches throughout the city, to the apostles who inhabit the temple, to the episcopal throne, to the clergy of all degrees, to all who helped at the holy table, to the choirs of Nazianzus, to the virgins, wives, widows, orphans, poor; to the hospitable houses, to the crowds of hearers; to prince and palace and their inhabitants; to the Christ-loving city, to Eastern and Western lands; above all, to angels, protectors of the church and of himself; to the Holy Trinity, his only thought and treasure."

With this pathetic climax, unsurpassed elsewhere even by Gregory himself, he concluded his last discourse in Constantinople. He left the city probably in the same month of June, A.D. 381, and returned to Nazianzus. Here he received a letter from Phileas, an old friend of Mesarchus and himself, commending upon him retirement. His answer breathes the same spirit which we find in the poem De Vita sua, and in the farewell sermon. "He was tired of fighting against envy and against venerable bishops, who destroyed the peace and put their personal squabbles before questions of faith." (Ep. Ixxxvii, Opera, ii. 79.) Among other letters belonging to this period, two addressed to Nectarius, who was chosen to succeed Gregory at Constantinople, deserve special note, as shewing that he cherished for him and the church nothing but the most entire good-will (Ep. Ixxxviii. and xci, Opera, ii. 77, 8).

Gregory's difficulties were not yet at an end. On his return to Nazianzus he found the church there in confusion, chiefly through the teaching of the Apollinarists (Carol., cxxii, Opera, ii. 870-7). Hesed was powerful in places where, hitherto, it had never entered. He tried to find a bishop who would stem the evil, but was thwarted in his plan by the presbyters, and by the desertion of seven bishops who had promised to appear on his side. His candidate had been hitherto engaged in secular affairs, but he still thought him the most promising. He seems after this to have succeeded in naming another bishop, and then to have retired to Arianus. But a short time passed before he was again urged to take the governance of the church at Nazianzus and check the Apollinarism which was rapidly spreading, and, in spite of his own strong disacclimation, he agreed to do so. He states in a letter to his friend Bosporius, bishop of Colonia in Cappadocia Secunda, that he was willing only on account of the imminent increase of adversaries (Ep. cxxviii, Opera, ii. 115). During this second administration of the diocese, Gregory was the means of delivering Nazianzus from impending danger. The prefect Olympus threatened to destroy the city in consequence of a seditious attack; and it was saved only by a pacific letter from the bishop, admitting that the offence was indeed grave, but that it was committed not by the city, but by the rashness of a few young men (Ep. cxxi, Opera, ii. 118-20). Other letters of the same kind show that Gregory was as the father of the city, watching over all its interests with loving care.

But Gregory felt that his constant illness unfitted him for his duties, and we even find him writing to the archbishop of Tyana, and in the most earnest tone beseeching him to take steps to appoint another bishop. "If this letter did not effect its purpose, he would publicly proclaim the bishopric vacant rather than that the church should longer suffer from his own infirmity" (Ep. cxxii, Opera, ii. 129). To such a supposition there could be but one answer, but the old opposition recurs when Gregory wished to vote in the election of his successor. It was again urged that if he were bishop of Nazianzus there would be no election; if he were not, he could have no claim to vote. They formally asserted their position, but then elected Eulalius, Gregory's colleague and relation, and the man of his choice. His satisfaction is expressed in a letter to Gregory of Nyssa, in which he also justifies his position on the ground that he was himself consecrated to Sasa and not to Nazianzus (Ep. cxxxi, Opera, ii. 148).

Eulalius entered upon his duties at Sasa, and in the Farewell address the end of the year 383. Gregory at once withdrew to Arianus, and spent in retirement the six remaining years of life. To this period belong certainly a large number of poems and letters; and, probably two discourses, one on the Festival of St. Mamas, which was kept with special honour in the neighbourhood of Nazianzus on the first Sunday after Easter (ενεργητής Κομανής), and one on the Holy Pasover (Οἰκουμ. xiv. and xlv, Opera, i. 834-868).

The place of Gregory's retirement was at first the little plot of ground at Arianus, which he had reserved to himself when all his other property was given to the poor. Here there was a shady walk with a fountain, which was his favourite resort (Carol. xiv. 1-24, Opera, ii. 915-17). But even this peaceful spot was to be denied him, and he was to be "driven forth without city, throne, or children, but always full of cares for them, as a wanderer upon the earth" (Carol. xlii. 1-12, Opera, 913-15). He found another temporary resting-place at a tomb consecrated to martyrs at a place called Carabals, of which nothing is known, and which the Bollandists indeed suppose (Mall. ii. 424 f) to be another name for the little plot at Arianus. But he was driven thence by a relative named Valentine, who settled near him with the female members of his family, as from another paradise by another Eve. Εἰκάουριος δὲ γυναικὶς αἰτία λυπημέροις, διανοθέτοις εὐπρόσωπως, ἐξερεύνησεν ἐνεργητής Κομανής (Ep. cxxii, Opera, ii. 169).

The poems and letters of this period speak of constant illness and suffering, from which he had but short intervals of relief after his retirement from Constantinople. A frame, never strong, had given way under the severe asceticism of the earlier, and was wholly unequal to bear the burden laid upon it by that of the later, life. "I suffer," he says in one of the letters, "and am content, not because I suffer, but because I am for others an example of patience. If I have no means to overcome any pain, I gain from it at least the power to bear it, and to be thankful as well in sorrowful circumstances as in joyous; for I am convinced that, although it seems to us contrary, there is in the eyes of the Sovereign..."
Reason nothing opposed to reason, in all which happens to us" (Ep. xxvi., Opera, ii. 32). These physical sufferings he could bear, but it was added to the bitterness of his lot to suffer intense spiritual agony, which at times took from him all hope either in this world or the next. In the thick of the spiritual combat did thus, as his greatest trial, learn the lessons it was to teach the world. At length the end came, but it found him, swan-like, continuing his song unto death. Jerome tells us in the de Script. Eccles.

"Decessit ante hoc ferme triumniun sub Theodosio Imperatore." The date of that work is the fourteenth year of the same emperor. Gregory's death, therefore, is to be assigned to about the eleventh year of Theodosius, i.e. a.d. 389 or 390.

(9) The Writings of Gregory.—The extant works are contained in two folio volumes of the Benedictine edition. Vol. i. consists of forty-five sermons, of which such an account is possible within our present limits is given elsewhere in this article. The contents of vol. ii. are more varied. It includes 243 letters, addressed to various persons, and on various subjects—theological, pastoral, domestic; the will of Gregory, taken from the archives of the church of Nazianzus, and signed and attested in legal form; the poems arranged in two books, of which a summary account must be given here. The first book (i.) is divided into two sections—(1) dogmatic and (2) moral. The poems of the second book (ii.) are historical, relating (1) to Gregory himself, or (2) to others, this last section including epitaphs and epigrams.

i. (1) The dogmatic poems are thirty-eight in number. Nos. 1-9 form one whole of 688 hexameter verses, with the addition of the sixth, which consists of 116 iambic verses, and is placed here with questionable editorship, because it treats of the same subject as the fifth (Providence). The poem is a brief exposition of the chief theological doctrines.

No. 10 (74 Iambics) is on the Incarnation, against Apollinaris.

No. 11 (16 hexameters and pentameters), is also on the Incarnation. Nos. 12-29 are Maenemonic verses on the facts of Holy Scripture, apparently meant for school use. The subjects are the books of Scripture, the sons of Jacob, the plagues of Egypt, the ten commandments, the miracles of Elijah and Elisha, with an epigram on a temple of Elijah, the double genealogy of Christ, the twelve apostles, the miracles and parables of Christ according to each evangelist, the parables of Christ according to all the evangelists, the stoning of the tempest.

Nos. 29-38 are prayers or hymns addressed to God.

(2) The moral poems are forty in number.

No. 1 (732 hexameters) is a eulogy of virginity. Nos. 2-7, in various metres, deal with kindred subjects, exhortations and counsels to virgins and monks, and the superiority of the spiritual life. Nos. 8-11 are on the secular and religious life, and exhortations to virtue. Nos. 12 and 13 on the fragility of human nature.

No. 14 is a meditation on human nature in 132 hexameters and pentameters. It ranks with No. 1 among the most beautiful of Gregory's poems.

The remainder of the poems in this section are on such subjects as the baseness of the outer man; the blessedness of the Christian life; the sin of frequent oaths and of anger; the loss of dear friends; the misery of false friends. Four of them are satires against a bad-mannered nobleman (26 and 27); miners (28); feminine luxury (29).

ii. (1) There are ninety-nine poems relating to his own life. One of them (No. xi. De Vita sua) is an autobiography extending to 1849 lines, which we have frequently referred to, and another (No. 12, De se impo et de episcopi) is an appendix to it of 836 lines more. There are 19 elegies, 15 meditations, 29 prayers, 3 satires, a defence of the author's poetry, a defence of the religious life. The others are shorter pieces.

(2) Of the historical poems which relate to others 7 (7-8) are epistles addressed (1) to Hellenius on behalf of the monks; (2) to the prefect Julian, asking for exemption for the poor; (3) to Vitalianus on behalf of his sea, from whom he had been pastored; (4) to Valbulus, pleading in the name of his son for means to enter a certain famous school; (5) to Nicobulus, the son, a reply in the name of the father; (6) to Olympias, a famous deaconess of the church of Constantinople excusing himself from her wedding, to which he had been invited, and giving her counsels for the married life; (7) to Nemesis, an eminent public man, baring him the errors of paganism, and urging him to accept Christianity. These poetic epistles are of considerable length, and are a witness to the varied interests and practical wisdom of the writer. (7-8 to Seleucus, vide infra.) There are 129 epitaphs, some of which have been noted above; and ninety-four epigrams, most of which are short poems, with little in them of the modern epigram, though some (e.g. 10-14, Els 'Aanayroutb), that the pen of Gregory could, when occasion required, be pointed with adamant. No less than 63 (31-94), belong probably to the writer's youth, are upon the spoliators of tombs. This résumé will give some idea of the extent and subject-matter of Gregory's poems; though if the statement of Jerome and Suidas, that he wrote 30,000 verses, is to be understood literally, more than a third of them are now unknown.

In addition to these writings, which may be taken as undoubted, the Benedictine editors have printed six pieces which are of questionable authority. Four of these, (1) an interpretation of Ezekiel i. 5 et seq., (2) a paraphrase of Ecclesiastes and (3) two short pieces De Fide Orthodoxa, are printed as an appendix to vol. i. (1) is judged by Tillemont to be unworthy of Gregory (Mémoires, ix. 464), and ought rather to be called "Breves et indigentiae annotationes in Ezexelium et acta quaeamadum Sacram in loco." This view is taken by the Colbertine Scholion and adopted by Billius. The piece is absent moreover from some of the best (e.g. the two Celsi) codices; (2) is by almost common consent to be ascribed to Gregory Thaumaturgus (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii. 25; Hieron. Script. Eccles. p. 121; Tillemont, Mémoires, ix. 464; Billius in loco). Clemencet, the editor of the first Benedictine volume, regards them to an appendix, because he found them in common editions, but did not judge them to belong to Gregory (Opera, i. 809 and 873). The two tractsates exist only in Latin, though it has been held that they show traces of a Greek original. Their ascription to Gregory is due to very doubtful inference from a passage in Augustine (Ep. clxviii.). Tillemont (Memoires, ii. 559) follows Quatremiure in ascribing them to Gregory Eliebertianus. Clemen- cet follows the author of the Galilia Letteraria in believing them to be the work of one Phaeba- dius. In any case they claim mention here only to be excluded from the works of Gregory, and the reader may be referred for further discussion of their authorship to Clemencet and Tillemont, in supra. The other two pieces are printed in the Benedictine vol. ii.; (1) a poetical epistle to Seleucus (No. viii. Opera, ii. 1089). Some of the older editors, especially Com- bebius, contend that it differs from the genuine writings of Gregory in the list of the canonical books, and, with the support of several MSS. ascribed to Gregory, endeavours to disprove the identity of Gregory, and the only difference in the canon is the addition of Esther and the Apo- calypse, which are not named by Gregory else- where. Billius, Caillau, and most modern editors, have claimed therefore with great probability, on internal grounds as well as with the support of the chief codices, that there is no sufficient reason for excluding an epistle which is entirely in the style of Gregory from the list of his works; (2) The Christus Patiens, a tragedy extending to 2601 lines, in which the personae are Christus, Thetokos, Joseph, Theologus, Magdala- nes, Nicodemus, Nuntius, Pilatus, Congregatio Pontificum, Orato Virginum, Semichorus, Advenementum. This poem, on the other hand, is relegated to an appendix as not the work of Gregory, in accord with the opinion of all the best authorities; though M. Villermain (Tableau, &c. p. 135) has assumed its genuineness without note or question. Reference may be made to Caillau’s Monilum in loco, Tillemont (Histoires, iii. 559), Dom Caillier, Hist. des Ant. eccl. de France, wherein he himself inclined to attribute it to a Gregory who became bishop of Antioch A.D. 572. Of the MSS. in which the works of Gregory have been preserved, and the printed editions, a full account is ready to hand in the prefaces of Cleomenet (Opera, i. pp. 1-6) and Caillau (Opera, ii. pp. 1-6); and in Fabricius, Bibloth. Graeca, ed. et seq. The earliest of the Greek editions is the Gregorii Nazianzeni Orationes Lectissimae XVI. Graecé ex editione M. Musuri; Venetiis in aedibus Aldi, 1516, in 8vo. The earliest of the Latin is Gregoryi Nazianzeni carmina, ad hanc beatique viuendam utilissima, Latiné ex editione Aldi Manutii Romani et Patrici Condadi Monachi; Venetiis, Aldo Manutius, in 4to, 1504. In 1569 there appeared at Paris Prima opera Grgori adornata a Jacobo Bilio Prunaco S. Michaelis in Erone Abbato editione suo interpretatione. It was accompanied by a new translation and by the commentaries of Nicetas, &c. In the same or the following year it appeared at Cologne, and has often been reprinted. Soon afterwards Leuvenklaes published an edition “Basilie anno 1571 ex Officina Bergrensis,” which bore on its first page the words “Ne cally, the severe charm of which seems to have anticipated the finest inspirations of our melancholy age, while it preserves the impress of a faith still fresh and honest, even in its trouble" (Tableau de l’Eloquence chrétienne au Quatorzième Siècle, p. 135). He then translates the greater part of the "De humana natura" (No. 90, Opera, ii. 468-77) and adds, "There is no doubt that in the mixture of ab-tract thoughts and emotions, in this contrast of the beauties of nature with the realities of a heart tormented by the enigma of existence, and seeking to rest in faith, it is not the poetry of Homer; it is another poetry which has its truth, its novelty, and thence its grandeur. I much prefer it to the artificial limitations in which Christian literature sought to write and impose upon religious subjects the form of the older idiom of the Muses" (ibid. p. 135). Again, he says, in words which exactly characterize the genius of Gregory’s poetry: "It was in the new form of a contemplative poetry, in this sadness of man received in a mystic, religious fashion, a little known to the ancient poets, that the Christian imagination was especially to enter the arena against them without disadvantage. There, this poetry which modern critics seek for, this poetry of reflection and reverie, which enters into the human heart, and describes its immemorial thoughts and vague desires, sprang up of itself." (ibid. p. 158). And at the end of a paragraph, when he is referring to Gregory, though he speaks of "the writings of the bishop of Caesarea," M. Villemain adds, "His funeral eulogies are hymns; his invective against Julian have something of the malice of the prophets. He has been called the ‘Theologian of the East.’ He ought to have been called rather ‘The Poet of Eastern Christendom’" (ibid.).

Hosted by Google

In both these critiques there is an element of truth, but neither in the pages of Dr. Ullmann nor in those of M. Villemain do we find the Gregory who is portrayed in his own works. Dr. Ullmann knows, but does not always bear in mind, Gregory’s own statement of the aim of his poetry. It must be admitted that "as soon as he falls, in the course of his longer didactic poems, into a sort of sentence or a discursive moralizing strain, all claims to poetry naturally disappear," but Gregory had a higher mission than that of a poet, and he is himself fully conscious that he is sacrificing form to substance, and beauty to necessity (Carm. xxxix. 64 τα Ἐπιμέρους). Nor does the critic remember how large a part of Gregory’s poems are neither dogmatic nor discursive. The criticism, indeed, could hardly have been written had the second volume of the Benedictine edition been already published.

M. Villemain, on the other hand, has seen with his usual keenness of perception, and expressed with his usual felicity of language, the characteristic beauties of these poems; but when in his admiration of the poet he extols him above the theologian, he fails to recognize the true value of the latter, and Gregory himself, who is a theologian. To the critic, who is himself a theologian, Gregory appears as a theologian rather than a poet; to the critic, who is himself a poet, Gregory appears as a poet rather than a theologian; to the careful reader of his own work, he appears as both, but no one who recorded the teaching of dogmatic truth, and the combinator of error, as the work of life to which all besides was made to give way.

(2) Gregory’s extant letters, though upon very various subjects, and written in many cases under the pressure of immediate necessity, are almost invariably finished compositions. In one of them we have his own views as to what a letter should be. "A letter must be a simple statement of facts, with a little in the way of ambiguity added; it must be written in a style suitable to the occasion. The oratorical style is to be avoided, the familiar style cultivated. The best letter is that in which in few words conveys a sense to the unlearned, and yet utters a fuller meaning to him who is in instructed. Another requisite in a good letter is that it should be graceful. It ought to contain nothing without meaning, and nothing without finish. Illustrations and proverbs are suitable to the epistolary style, and it is made pleasant by pleasant words. But here, too, there must be moderation. Such things are to style what the purple colour is to rainment, and are to be used with careful hand. So with figures of speech. They are to be admitted, but the careful balancing of antitheses and like phrases is to be kept to the Sophists, or used playfully rather than in earnest. A good letter is more beautiful than others, just as the eagle of the old story was more beautiful than all other birds, because no one remarked its beauty. The thing to be aimed at in a letter is the beauty which comes from being natural, and which needs no adornment." Gregory modestly concludes by excusing himself from the rules of good letter-writing, because he was oppressed by weightier cares (Ep. ii. Opera, ii. 46). The next letter (ibid. p. 48) accompanied a collection of epistles sent to Nicobulus as specimens for use, not for show, for to ask the writer for letters, seeing that he had long ago given up the culture of literature, was like gathering flowers from an autumnal field; and the next to this (ibid. p. 48) places the letters of Basil before his own. He is led to do this so less by truth than by friendship, though an impartial judgment may think that he was influenced by friendship rather than by truth.

(3) A higher place has been claimed in this article for Gregory’s letter-writing than for his poetry; and examples have been given which may be considered sufficient to justify the claim. The Roman Breviary (Die in Mali) speaks of him as having surpassed all other sacred orators in solidity, and a subsequent of opinions from the 4th century to our own day may be quoted as supporting this view. He is now held to be greater than Basil, or again, to have eclipsed Chrysostom himself, or again, to have combined "the invincible logic of Bolland; the talent, colour, and harmony of Mssillon; the flexibility, poetic grace, and vivacity of Finel; the force, grandeur, and sublimity of Bossuet..." The Eagle of Meaux has been especially inspired by him in his funeral orations; the Swan of Cambrai has followed his advice in his treatise on 'The Litanies of God' (Delarue, Gregory of Tours, p. 721). It will be well enough to refer to such opinions as are found in the prose of the Benedictine editors, or in any of the lives; for the present purpose they are important as placing Gregory in a position which, after making full allowance for the literary weakness of editors and biographers, must be admitted to be in the very first rank of Christian orators. He was indeed an orator by training and profession. For this he studied at Caesarea, Alexandria, and Athens, and was the acknowledged chief in the schools of the rhetoricians. He not unfrequently refers to the power of his own eloquence, and in a famous passage of the first twenty verses against Justin, who had boasted "ours is eloquence and the arts of Greece and the culture of the gods; yours is ignorance and boorishness" (Ammian Marcell. xxx. 4), he thus speaks of it, "I give up all besides; riches, nobility, glory, power, and all such earthly things. But I cling to eloquence alone; and I do not regret the labours by land and sea which I have undertaken to acquire it" (Orat. iv. 100, Opera, i. 132). The oratory of the Christian pulpit was the creation of Gregory and Basil. It was based on the ancient models, and was akin, therefore, to the speeches of Demosthenes and Cicero, rather than to the modern sermon. The exact orations of Gregory are extant, but it cannot be said that he has written, and are practically a volume of sermons for special occasions. Some of them were not delivered from the pulpit at all. Others were delivered to a multitude moved to tears as they thought of the death of some friend, or excited by the discussion of some burning question, and ready at any moment to burst forth in cries of sympathy, or kisses of dissent, or deafening cheers of approval. It has not unfrequently been a charge against the sermons of Gregory that they are not an exposition of Scripture. As compared with the Homilies of Chrysostom, for example, they certainly (with one exception, Orat. xxxvii., Opera, i. 525) are far behind in the matter of their close and intimate reference to the divine Word. It is impossible that they should be. But the answer to the charge, in the sense in which it is often made, is found in the discourses themselves. The margin of every page abounds with references to Scripture, and no reader can fail to see with Bosquet that "Gregory's whole discourse is nothing but a judicious weaving of Scripture, and a judicious unfolding of the mysteries of God. The reader cannot find acquaintance with it" (Défence de la Tradition, &c. iv. 2; Benoit, Grégoire, &c. 723).

ii. Great as was the position of Gregory as a writer, it is as a theologian that he has left his chief mark upon history. He alone beyond the apostolic circle has been thought worthy to bear the name "Theologus" which had been appropriated to St. John. In the story of his life, frequent allusion has been made to his teaching, and further reference may be made to the elaborate analysis of Ullmann (Gregorius, &c. ss. 209-352), who, following Chlumet (Opera, i. xliv.-xxxviii.), has arranged under their separate headings his views on the articles of faith. Within our present limits the chief of them only can be referred to, as they are contained in the five famous theological discourses delivered at Constantinople (Orat. xxvii.-xxxii., Opera, i. 487-579).

(1) The first is entitled Κατὰ Εὐχαριστίαν ἐνδοτική. It opens by showing "the evil of the desire for fine words," and comparing his "adversaries who left the practice of pietie for the discussion of theological questions to mountaineers who seek the applause of crowds. To discourse about God is a task of the greatest difficulty, not fitted for all times or all persons, nor to be undertaken in the presence of all persons. The heretics, having no strength in their own teaching, find it in the weakness of ours, as flies gather round wounds. We ought not to make our accusers our judges, nor in the presence of the foe draw the sword to our own destruction. The teacher of theology ought first to practise virtue. Thus he obtains for work to refute the older teaching of the pagan philosophers, or to discuss simpler questions of science and theology; but as to the nature of God our words should be few, for we can know but little in this life."

(2) Περὶ θεολογίας. Gregory reasserts here his favourite position, that "it is the pure mind only that can know God. Moses stands the mountain; Aaron is near; the elders are at a distance; the people are far away below; the beast on the mountain, incapable of thought and knowledge of God, is stoned. Heretics are like beasts on the mountain. The theologian beholds part of God, but the divine nature he can neither express in words nor comprehend in thought. He can only perceive the presence of angels even cannot know Him as He is. That there is a creating and preserving cause, we can know, as the sound of an instrument bears witness to its maker and player; that God is, we know, but what He is, and of what nature He is, and where He is, and where He was before the foundation of the world, we cannot know. The Infinite cannot be defined. We can only indicate negative attributes, for the nature of the divine essence is beyond all human conception. There may be various reasons why God cannot be known by man. Three are suggested: (c) we shall hereafter prize this knowledge the more; (d) we should have been in danger, had we the faculty of knowing He was not doing it out of pride, as Lucifer did; (e) they may have a rich reward, who have purged themselves from sin here, and have patiently waited for the fulfilment of their hope. The cause of our present inability is the union of the soul with the body, which prevents it from rising wholly above sensible objects. The mind is soon wearied in this state, and attempts to form ideas of things above. In the descent to our weakness, God is called in Holy Scripture by names drawn from sensible objects. The mind either forms from these ideas the many gods of idolatry, or uses them as stepping-stones to a knowledge of the true God. The mystery of the divine essence is natural, and is analogous to other mysteries which surround us. Man—the juncture of soul and body, the functions and powers of the mind and various organs of the body, the continuity of species and variety of individuals; the wonderful variety and powers of animals, fishes, birds, insects; the many kinds, utility, and beauty of plants, fruits, flowers; the phenomena of earth and sea and sky; the nature of angelic beings; all these are equally beyond human reason."

(3) Περὶ Μαυθ. The two previous discourses were introductory. He now passes to the next subject. "The three earliest opinions concerning God were anarchia, polycraria, and monarchia. The two former could not stand, as leading to confusion rather than the order of the universe. We hold that there is a Oneness, but that God is not limited to one person. If unity is divided, it becomes plurality. But if there is equal dignity of nature, and agreement of will, and identity of movement, and convergence to unity of those things which are of unity (and this cannot be the case in created things), there may be distinction in number without by any means involving distinction in essence and nature. Unity, therefore (μοναρχία), from the beginning going forth to duality (εἰς διδύμα), constituted a "Theologia". If the words fail to express the generation and procession, and it is better to keep to scriptural terms; but the writer has in his thoughts an overflowing of goodnes, and the Platonic simile of an overflowing cup applied to first and second causes. The generation and procession are eternal, and all questions as to time are inapplicable." Gregory then proceeds to state and answer the common objections of his adversaries.

"The Son and the Spirit can be co-eternal with the Father, and yet be born of and proceed from Him. Eternity does not imply self-originality, but an originality to which it may be referred: just as light proceeds from the sun, but is not later than the sun."

"This generation is free from all passion because it is incorporeal."

"The Father is properly Father because He is not also Son; the Son is properly Son because He is not also Father. Man is both father and son, and is properly neither."

"The Scriptures use the past tense in speaking of the generation of the Son, but every student of Scripture knows that the tenses of verbs are interchanged (e.g. Ps. ii. 1 and xxv. 6)."

"To ask whether the Father begat the Son voluntarily or involuntarily, is as absurd as it would be to ask whether He is God voluntarily or involuntarily."

"The generation of the Son is indeed incomprehensible; but that of every human being is also incomprehensible and yet true."

"The question whether the Son existed before He was begotten is absurd, when eternal generation is thought of. The Arian dilemma is met by another. Is time in time or not?"

"Begotten and not-begotten are not the same thing. Are the Father and the Son, then, the same thing? "The Father and the Son are the same in their essence and nature. These proceed from the divine essence any more than immortality, inoecence, immutability. Otherwise there would be several divine essences. That is the divine essence which belongs to God alone, but we cannot know that essence, as has been already shewn.""

"If the Son is of the same essence as the Father, and the Father is unbegotten (they say), the Son must be unbegotten." But God and "unbegotten" are not the same thing."

"Or, again, to say if God made not an end of begetting, the generation is imperfect; and if there is an end, there must have been a beginning," is to argue from corporeal to spiritual things. What would they say of the angelic or human spirits which have come into existence but will not cease to be."

"According as they say, called God equivocally, as a painting is called an animal, but is really and properly God."

After dealing with other paradoxisms, Gregory passes on to an examination of the passages in Scripture in which the divinity of the Son is expressed, and of the passages which speak of the humanity, and are quoted as opposed to the divinity by the Eunomians. "The Son was equal to the Father, and what He was He remained at the Incarnation; what He was not He assumed. God became man that we might become gods."

"The oration ends with an apology for dealing with such subtleties, which weaken the force of the truth. By this prayer that his adversaries may have faith, by which alone spiritual truth can be discerned."

(4) Πελ Ταῖα. In this discourse the subject of the third is continued. Gregory has already answered the objection, that some passages of Scripture speak of the Son as human. He here enters upon an exhaustive examination, under ten objections, of the scriptural language applied to our Lord, and then passes to an exposition of the names which are (a) common to the Deity, (b) peculiar to the Son, (c) peculiar to the Son as man."

(5) Πελ τοῦ Ἀγίου Νυμφήσεως. Gregory commences this oration on the Holy Spirit by referring to the special difficulties arising from (a) the fact that many who admitted the divinity of the Son regarded the divinity of the Holy Ghost as a new doctrine not found in Holy Scripture; (b) that those defeated by his previous arguments had become the more determined to hold their ground here; (c) that he was himself worn out by the earlier discourses, and that his adversaries were wearied with them. He then expresses, in the strongest terms, his own belief in the divinity of the Third Person in the Trinity, no less than in that of the Father and the Son. "The Holy Spirit is holiness. Had the Spirit been wanting to the divine Trinity, the Father and the Son would have been imperfect."

Historically, it is true that the Sadducees did not believe in the Holy Spirit; neither did they in angels or a resurrection, but it is difficult to see how they avoided the explicit witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c.

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c.

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c.

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c.

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c.

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c."

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c."

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c."

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c."

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Not the divine essence is the subject of our anxious thought; but how they avoided the expression witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c."
Son, for nothing can be wanting to God, but on account of the difference of their manifestation and mutual relation. In the same way the Father is not called Son.

"The Spirit is of the same substance with the Father and the Son (δια μορφῶν). Again, we have a mystery beyond human thought, but in the generation of animals there are faint shadows which may help us. Adam was a creature of God, Eve a segment of the creature, Seth the offspring of both. Was the same thing creature and segment and offspring? And yet no similitude can fully represent the truth."

"If they ask who of ancient or modern times worshipped the Spirit, the answer is found in the words of Scripture (John iv. 24; Rom. viii. 26; 1 Cor. xiv. 15). It is true that St. John says of the Son, 'by Him were all things made that were made,' but this does not include the Spirit, for the evangelist does not say 'all things' simply."

"Their chief objection is that to acknowledge the Spirit is to adulterate the Son. Are they themselves then, seeing that they do acknowledge the divinity of the Son, Dithylets (Διθυλετα)? Do they assert that things which have the same substance are numbered together (κατὰ μορφὰς τὰ κατὰ μορφὰς), and that things which differ in substance are numbered separately? This is to forget that number refers to quantity, not to quality; to the quantity of the things contained under it, not to their nature. Three things may be called 'one, one, one,' though they are of the same substance; or 'three' though they are of different substances."

"Do they ask why Holy Scripture is not more express in its statements about the divinity of the Spirit? Let them observe the method of Scripture. Some things are spoken of which are not, e.g. as when God is said to sleep or to wake or be angry. Some things are not spoken of which are. Where do they derive the terms τὸ γενέσθαι, τὸ γεγονός, τὸ ἀδημονοῦντα? Some things are not, and are not spoken of: as an evil God, or a square circle. Some things are, and are spoken of: as God, man, angel, judgment. It is absurd then to render the question one word. The Scripture does not in so many words assert the divinity of the Holy Spirit, but it does in fact. Besides, why do the Arians make this an objection when the most express terms did not convince them of the divinity of the Son? God blesses men with, not against, their own will. Further, the revelation of Father (Old Testament), Son (New Testament), and Spirit (after the Ascension) is progressive. The human mind could not have grasped the full truth at once; it was to be expected therefore that the divinity of the Spirit, who was given after the ascension of the Son, should not be taught during the earlier manifestation. There are, moreover, in Holy Scripture a number of texts which do teach it."

These Gregory quotes and explains, and then passes on to sum up in a restatement of the doctrine of the Trinity.

"There are some faint resemblances which may in a degree help to give an idea of Trinity in Unity. The fountain, the stream, the river; the sun, the ray, the light; the ray falling upon the water and reflected by it. But there is a danger that these images should mislead rather than lead; and the only safe position is that of humble faith."

It has been said with truth that these discourses of Gregory would lose their chief charm in translation. No conception of their subtlety of thought or beauty of expression, can be given in an outline, where a few words often represent several pages. Critics have rivalled each other in the praises they have heaped upon them, but no praise is so high as that of the many theologians who have found in them their own best thoughts. A critic who cannot be accused of partiality towards Gregory has given in a few words perhaps the truest estimate of them. "A substance of thought, the concentration of all that is spread through the writings of Hilary, Basil, and Athanasius; a flow of softened eloquence which does not halt or lose itself for a moment; an argument nervous without dryness on the one hand, and without useless ornament on the other, give these five discourses a place to themselves among the monuments of this fine genre, who was not always in the same degree free from grandiloquence and affectation. In a few pages and in a few hours Gregory has summed up and closed the controversy of a whole century." (De Brolige, L'Eglise et l'Empire, v. 385; Benoit, Gregoire, &c. 435, 436).

Books.—Little is needed for the study of Gregory's life and works beyond the admirable Benedictine edition referred to above, and the Lives by Ullmann (Gregorios von Nazianzen der Theologe, 2. Aufl., Gotha, 1867; first part of earlier edition translated by Cox, Oxford, 1855) and Benoit (Saint Grégoire de Nazianze, Paris, 1876). A well-known comparison of Gregory and Basil will be found in Dr. Newman's Church of the Fathers, pp. 116-45, 551. See also a recent important work discussing some of the disputed questions in the life of Gregory by the Abbé Louis Montaut, Revue Critique de questions historiques se rapportant à St. Grégoire de Nazianze et à son siècle. [H. W. W.]" and we may reasonably conclude that he was brought up in the schools of his native city. That no very special pains had been devoted to his literary and intellectual instruction, we may gather from the words of his sister Macridora to him on her deathbed, in which she ascribed their propriety to the young pious and prudent bishops of his time to the prayers of his parents, since “he had little or no assistance towards it from home.”

A feeble constitution, subject to frequent illnesses, and a natural shyness disposed the young Gregory to a literary retirement in preference to the active walks of life. His intellectual powers were considerable, and had been improved by diligent private study; but he shrank from a public career, and appears after his father’s death to have lived upon his share of the paternal estate, without adopting any profession. That his religious instincts did not develop early appears from his account of his reluctant attendance at the religious ceremonial held by his mother, the widow of an honoured “martyr.” A day having been fixed for the translation of the relics of these sainted soldiers to a chapel erected for their reception, Emmelia summoned her son to Annesi to take part in the festival. The occasion was one in which a young layman like Gregory had but little sympathy, and he was immersed in occupations which he was unwilling to leave. He records the annoyance he felt at his mother’s having chosen a time for her function so inconvenient to him, and for compelling him to be present even before the ceremonies began. The service in honour of the martyrs was held in his mother’s garden, and lasted all through the night. But it had few attractions for the young student, who, wearied with his journey, threw himself down in an arbour and fell asleep. His mind, however, was not altogether at ease, and as he slept he seemed to be seeking to enter the garden, the approach to which was barred by the martyrs, who beat him with their rods, and would have excluded him altogether but for the intercession of one of their band. On awaking from his dream, full of remorse for the dishonour he had done them, and hastening to the tomb which enshrined their ashes and bedewed it with bitter tears, beseeching God to be propitious to him, and the sainted soldiers to forgive the slight he had shewn them (“Orat. in XL. Martyr., Opp. tom. ii. p. 212”). It is evident that this terrifying vision had a very powerful effect on the young Gregory’s mind, and under its influence he undertook the office of a “lector,” in pursuance of which the friar friend of Nazianzus, Gregory Nazianzen, reminds him, he read the Bible lections in the congregation (Greg. Naz. Ep. 43, tom. i. p. 804). He would seem, however, to have soon tired of his new vocation, which he deserted for that of a professor of rhetoric. This backsliding, caused great pain to Gregory’s friends, and gave occasion to the enemies of religion to suppose that his renunciation was the result of unfounded accusations against him. Gregory Nazianzen, whose affection for him was warm and sincere, addressed to him a very strong remonstrance, expressing the grief felt by himself and others at his gradual and stealthy falling away from his first love; his discarding the Holy Scriptures, so full of the streams of grace, for the brackish and arid channels of secular learning, and seeking for “inglorious glory.” He reproaches his friend for the “demonic ambition” which led him to covet the name of rhetorician rather than that of Christian, as well as for bringing discredit on his Christian profession by the public boasting of his gifts in the disputations and contests. He earnestly entreats him to return to a better mind, to make his apology to God, to the altar, and to the faithful, engaging to pay for his restoration to the God that quickens the dead (Greg. Naz. Ep. 43 [57], tom. i. p. 804). The date of this temporary desertion cannot be ascertained, but since during the short reign of Julian it was forbidden to Christians to act as public instructors we must place it either before 361 or after 363. At or about the same time we may place Gregory’s marriage. His wife was named Theosebeia, and from the description given of her by Gregory Nazianzen in the letter written to console his friend on her death, we may gather the character she bore upon her name. Gregory Nazianzen calls her “the Theosebeia,” conferring spiritual relationship stronger than that of nature. We do not know when her death occurred, but it was after Gregory had become a bishop, and, according to Tillemont, subsequently to the council of Constantinople, in 381. Expressions in Gregory Nazianzen’s letter would lead us to believe that both himself and his friend were somewhat advanced in life at that time; and from Theosebeia being styled Gregory Nyssen’s “sister” we may gather that they had ceased to cohabit, probably on his becoming a bishop. We do not hear of their having any offspring. (Greg. Naz. Ep. 85, tom. i. p. 840; Nis. H. E. xi. 19.)

Gregory did not long exercise his profession of a teacher of rhetoric. The urgent remonstrances of his friend Gregory Nazianzen would have an earnest supporter in his elder sister, the holy recluse Macrina, who would not fail to use the same powerful arguments with him which had proved effectual in inducing Basil to give up all prospect of military life for the service of Christ. It is probable also that the profession he had undertaken may have proved increasingly distasteful to one of Gregory’s sensitive and retiring disposition, and that the small results of his exertions to inspire a literary taste among the youth (who, as he complains in letters to his brother Basil’s tutor Libanius, written while practising his profession as a rhetorician (Greg. Nys. Ep. 43, 14.) Nazianzen much reproves ready to enter the army than to follow rhetorical studies), may have discouraged him from bestowing any further labour on so unproductive a soil. After some struggles he finally resolved to quit the world and its pursuits, and retired to a monastery in Pontus, which we cannot hesitate to identify with that on the river Iiris presided over by his brother Libanius, and by his own solicitation come to Annesi, where was the female convent of which his sister Macrina was the superior. In this conventual retreat he passed several years, devoting himself to the study of the Scriptures and the works of Christian commentators. Among these it is certain that Origen had a high place, the influence of his writings being evident in his own theological works. During his residence in Pontus, c. A.D. 371, he composed his work, De Virginitate, in which, while extolling the state of virginity as the highest perfection of Christian life, he laments most poignantly the fatal error by which, as by a wall or a gulf, he had separated himself from it, and rendered it impossible that he should ever attain that angelic virtue which seemed to have been his chief vocation (De Virg., lib. iii. tom. iii. pp. 116, sqq.). Towards the close of his residence in Pontus, A.D. 371, circumstances occurred displaying Gregory's goodness of heart together with his simplicity and complete want of judgment in a striking manner. From some unexplained cause an estrangement had arisen between Basil and his aged uncle, the bishop Gregory, whom the family deservedly regarded as their second father. The younger Gregory took on himself the office of mediator. Straight paths having failed to conduct to the desired end, he adopted crooked ones, and forged letters to his brother in their uncle's name seeding reconciliation. The result must have been expected. The letters were indignantly repudiated by the justly offended bishop; strong language was used on both sides, and reconciliation became increasingly hopeless. On the discovery of the deceit, Basil addressed a letter to his brother, which is a model of dignified rebuke. He first ridicules him with his simplicity, unworthy even of one of the lower animals, still more of a Christian, reproaches him for endeavouring to serve the cause of truth by deception, and upbraids him with his unbrotherly conduct in siding affliction to one already pressed out of measure (Basil. Ep. 58, [44]). From this calm retirement in A.D. 372 (the same year which saw the consecration of his friend Gregory Nazianzus to the see of Saisa, as well as that of one of the most widely venerated of the Western prelates, St. Martin of Tours) Gregory was reluctantly forced by his brother Basil to undertake the cares and labours of the episcopate. His unwillingness to exchange his life of studious leisure and religious contemplation for the heavy burden of temporal cares was so great that, as we learn from a letter of Basil's, he had to be used to compel him to allow the ordaining hands to be laid upon him (Basil. Ep. 225 [385]). The see selected for him by his brother was Nyssa, an obscure town of Cappadocia Prima, about ten miles from the capital, Caesarea. So inconspicuous was the place that their common friend, Eusebius of Samosata, wrote to Basil to remonstrate on his burying so distinguished a man in a see so unworthy of him. Basil replied that he had not done this through any want of appreciation of his brother's merits, which made him worthy to govern the whole church gathered into one, but from a desire that the see should be made famous by its bishop, not the bishop by his see (Greg. Th. 98 [259]). Basil's words contained an unconscious prophecy. Nyssa, which would otherwise have been utterly unknown, has gained universal celebrity from its bishop. It was not long after Gregory Nyssenus's ordination that his namesake of Nazianzus was also made to experience the irresistible power of Basil's will in his consecration to the bishopric of Saisa. The ceremony took place at Nazianzus. The future bishop was eagerly expecting the support of his friend Gregory Nyssenus's presence on the occasion. He did not, however, arrive till several days after the ceremony. It was a martyr's festival, and the new bishop was to preach. He devoted the exordium of his sermon to a studied eulogy on the two brothers, Gregory and Basil, whom he compared to Moses and Aaron, mingling with his eulogy covert reproaches, of the one for his absence at his ordination, of the other for forcing him into the episcopate against his will (Greg. Naz. Orat. 6, pp. 336 sqq.).

Basil had speedily fresh cause to complain of his brother's well-intentioned but blundering endeavours to befriend him. We are left in the dark as to the nature of the circumstances to which he refers in a letter to Eusebius of Samosata (Basil. Ep. 100 [256]), but the mention of synods collected by Gregory at Ancyra, and the plots against him caused by his simplicity, render it probable that a mistaken confidence in his powers of dealing with the world had resulted in the gathering of episcopal synods in the hope of rendering his brother effectual assistance, while he was really becoming a tool in the hands of clever and unscrupulous men of the world for his injury. So mistaken an estimate did Gregory entertain of his own powers that about this same time Basil had again to interpose his authority to prevent his brother being sent as his colleague of Dorotheus, the presbyter of Antioch, on his mission to Italy to solicit the intervention of Damasus and the Western bishops in the troubles of the East caused by the Melethian schism. In a letter to Dorotheus, Basil expresses his conviction of his excellent brother's complete unfitness for so delicate a negotiation, both on account of his truthfulness and honesty, and on account of his ecclesiastical matters, and because his simple-hearted goodness would be despised by a haughty character like Damasus, preferring flattery to truth (ibid. 215 [257]).

Gregory's episcopate fell in troublous times for the orthodox. Valent. a zealous Arian, was on the throne, and lost no opportunity of exciting his own party. The, he had scarcely entered into a theological controversy with Basil, would make him look on Gregory with no friendly eyes. [DEMOSTHENES.] After various petty acts of persecution, in which the semi-Arian prelates joined with high satisfaction, as a means of retaliating on Basil, a synod was summoned at Ancyra, at the close of A.D. 375, for the double purpose of examining some alleged canonical irregularities at Gregory's ordination to the episcopate, and of investigating a frivolous charge brought against him by a certain Philecharis, of having made away with some of the church funds left by his predecessor. A band of soldiers was sent to arrest Gregory and conduct him to the place of hearing. A chill on his journey brought on a pleurisie seizure, and aggravated a painful malady to which he was subject. His sufferings were so severe that he entreated his conductors to allow him to halt for medical treatment. But they were deaf to his entreaties and mercilessly hurried him on. In some unexplained way, however, he managed to elude their vigilance and escaped to some place of concealment where his maladies could be cared for without equal to the operation. Of course, he collected a synod of orthodox Cappadocian bishops, in whose name he addressed a dignified but courteous letter to Demosthenes, apologizing for his brother's non-appearance at Ancyra, and stating that the charge of embezzlement could be shown to be false by the books of the treasurers of the church; while, if any canonical defect in his ordination could be proved, the ordainers, not the ordained, were those who should be called to account, an account which they were ready to render (Ibid. 225 [385]). Basil wrote at the same time in his brother's behalf of a man of distinction named Aburgius, begging him to use his influence to save him from the misery of being dragged into court, and being implicated in the trial. For his part, Gregory's disposition shrank from Demosthenes A.D. 376, through the active instrumentality of Eustathius of Sebaste, for his own episcopal city of Nyssa. Still Gregory refused to appear. He was pronounced contumacious and deposed by the assembled bishops, of whom Anysius and Eudiccus of Parnasse were the leaders, and a successor was consecrated, spoken of with scorn by Basil as a miserable slave who could be bought for a few obols (Ibid. 237 [264], 239 [10]). Gregory's deposition was followed by his banishment by the emperor Valens (Greg. Nyss. de Vit. Macr. tom. ii. p. 192). These accumulated troubles proved utterly crushing to Gregory's gentle spirit. In his letters written at this period he bewails the cruel necessity which had compelled him to desert his spiritual children whom with so much pain he had brought forth, and driven him from his home and all that was dearest to him, his brethren, his kinsmen, his friends, to dwell among malicious enemies who scrutinized every look and gesture, and his every word and mood them in the ground of accusation. He dwells with tender recollection on the home of which he had been deprived,—his fireside, his table, his pantry, his bed, his bench, his sackcloth,—and contrasts it with the stifling hole in which he was forced to dwell, of which only furniture was strictness, darkness, and cold. His only consolation is in the assurance that his brethren would feed him in their prison. (Greg. Nyss. Epist. 18, 22.) His letters to his friend Gregory Nazianzen have unfortunately perished, but the deep despondency in which he was sunk is shown by the replies. After his expulsion from his see his nameakes wrote that, though prevented from gratifying his desire of accompanying him in his banishment, he went with him in spirit, and that he would not lose his brother's loss, for the storm would blow over, and that he would get the better of all his enemies, as a recompense for his strict orthodoxy (Greg. Naz. Epist. 142, tom. i. p. 866). Driven from place to place, to avoid the evil designs of his enemies, he had compared himself to a stick carried aimlessly hither and thither on the surface of a stream; his friend replies that his movements were rather like those of the sun, which brings life to all things, or of the planets, whose apparent irregularities are subject to a fixed law (Ibid. 34 [327], p. 798). Out of heart at the apparent triumph of Arianism, Gregory bids him be of good cheer, and not to censure his brother. If, like serpents, creeping from their holes in the sunshine of imperial favour, who, however alarming his hissing, would be driven back into the earth by time and truth. All would come right if they left all to God (Ibid. 35 [337], p. 799). This trust in God proved well-founded. On the death of Valens, in 378, the youthful Gratian recalled all the bishops and, to the joy of the faithful, Gregory was restored to his see of Nyssa. In one of his letters, not improbably written to his brother Basil, he describes with graphic power the circumstances of his return. The latter half of his journey, which lay through a chain of villages along the riverside, was a triumphal progress. The inhabitants met him, some on horseback, some on foot, escorting him along the road with acclamations and tears of joy. A heavy storm of rain a little before he got to Nyssa driving the inhabitants indoors caused him to enter the city unobserved; but no sooner were his chariot-wheels heard as the pavements than a great crowd collected that his further progress was impeded, and he was prevented alighting, and was near drowning. When he got near the church a river of fire seemed to be pouring into it, from the number of lighted tapers borne before him by the holy virgins who had come forth to welcome back their beloved bishop (Greg. Nyssen. Epist. 3, Zacagni; No. 6, Migne). The happiness of his return was, however, short-lived. Private sorrow soon succeeded to public distress. The first day of the following year, Jan. 1, A.D. 379, saw the death of Basil, whom he loved as a brother and revered as a spiritual father. If not present at his death, he certainly attended his funeral, on which occasion he delivered his funeral oration, to which we are indebted for many particulars of that father's life. In common with Gregory's compositions generally, it is marked by his discursive style, extreme language and turgid oratory (Greg. Nyss. in Laud. Patr. Bas. tom. iii. pp. 479 sq.). Gregory Nazianzen, who was prevented from being present at his friend's obsequies by disabling illness, wrote a consolatory letter, praising Gregory very highly, and saying that the chief comfort he now had was to see all Basil's virtues reflected in him, as in a mirror (Greg. Naz. Epist. 37 [35], p. 799). One sorrow trod close on the heels of another in Gregory's life. The confusion in the churches after the long Arian supremacy entailed severe labours and anxieties upon him, and he was sent hither and thither for the defence of the truth, and the reformation of the erring (De Vit. Macr. tom. ii. p. 192). He had scarcely recovered from the blow of Basil's loss before he had to face the conflict of his sister Macrina, to whose wise instructions and holy example both he and Basil owed so much. In September of this year, A.D. 378, he had taken part in the council held at Asiach for the double purpose of healing the Antiochenec schism (which it failed to effect) and of taking measures for securing victory to the church over the Arianism which had been lately
1 dominant (Labbe, Concil. ii. 910; Baluz. Not.
Concil. Coll. p. 78). On his way back to his diocese, Gregory visited the monastery at Aenea, over which his sister Macrina presided.
He found her suffering from a mortal illness from which she expired the evening of the next day. Her last hours, together with a detailed biography of her from her birth, and even before it, is given by him in a letter to the monk Olympius (de Vit. S. Macrinae Virgin. tom. ii. pp. 177 sq.).
In his treatise de Anima et Resurrectiones (entitled, in honour of his sister, vā Mauplōνa) we have another account of her death, in which he puts long speeches into her mouth, as part of a dialogue held with him on the proofs of the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body, the object of which was the mitigation of his grief for Basil's death (tom.
iii. pp. 181 sq.). [MACRINA THE YOUNGER.] After celebrating his sister's funeral, Gregory came into contact with some of the leaders of heresy, and on these occasions he complains to a brother bishop named John, who had been with him at Antioch (his letter to whom is our chief authority for this part of Gregory's history [Epist. xix.]), an unbroken series of calamities awaited him. The Galatians had been sowing their united heresies among his churches. The people at Ibarus on the borders of Pontus having lost their bishop by death availed themselves of Gregory's presence to superintend the election and take the votes, to elect him to the vacant see. This, in some unexplained way, became the cause of troubles calling for the intervention of the military, with the count at their head, "setting the troops of the commanding officer in motion against him." When these difficulties had been settled, he was compelled to set out on a long and toilsome journey, in fulfillment of a commission he had received from the council of Antioch, "to visit and reform the church of Arabia" (tom. iii. p. 653), by which, as we learn from the same letter, that of Babylon is intended. He found the state of the church there "lingering in the wretchedness which had been represented. The people had grown hardened in heresy and were as brutal and barbarous in their lives as in their tongue. They gloried in the heinousness of their evil deeds, and set such store by low cunning and violence that Sisyphus and Sciron would be far greater in their eyes than Archimedes. Lying was more natural to them than to speak the truth. We have no definite information as to the results of this mission; but from the despairing tone in which he speaks of it it is evident that he met with but little success. At the termination of this visit-tation he availed himself of his proximity to the Holy Land to visit the spots consecrated by the life and death of Christ. The journey was made easier by the facilities afforded by the emperor, who at the outset had put one of the public chariots at his disposal, which he records served him and his retinue "both for a monastery and a church"; fasting, psalmody, and the hours of prayer being kept up with the utmost regularity all through the journey (tom. iii. p. 658). He accomplished his object as far as seeing the sacred spots went. He visited Bethlehem, Golgotha, the Mount of Olives, and the Anastasis.
But the result of this pilgrimage was simple disappointment. His faith received no confirmation, and his religious sense was scandalized by the gross immorality he found prevailing in the Holy City itself, which he describes as a sink of all iniquity. The church of Jerusalem was in an almost equally unsatisfactory state. Cyril, after his repeated depredations by Arian influence, and finally rebuked, but not punished, by Constantine's last letter, was the scene of the dissensions of the Christians, or bring them back to unity of faith. Gregory's efforts were equally ineffectual, and he returned to Cappadocia depressed and saddened with the spectacle.
He poured forth the feelings of his heart in two letters, one to three ladies resident at Jerusalem, Eustathia, Ambrosia, and Basilissa (tom. iii.
p. 659 sq.), the other the celebrated one "de Eustathii Hierosolymo," in which he declares his conviction not of the uselessness only but of the evil of pilgrimages. "He urges the dangers and suspicions to which pious reclusees, especially women, would be subject, with male attendants, either strangers or friends, on a lonely road;
the dissolute, even wicked, who is inevitable in the inn;
the dangers of robbery and violence in the Holy Land itself, of the moral state of which he draws a fearful picture.
He asserts the religious superiority of Cappadocia, which had more churches than any part of the world, and enquires in plain terms whether a man will believe the virgin birth of Christ the more by seeing Bethlehem, or His resurrection by visiting His tomb, or His ascension by standing on the Mount of Olives." (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. chap. 11, vol. iii. p. 192, note.) His language is so unmeasured that it has led some Roman Catholic writers, especially Bellarmine (de Cultu Sacrorum, lib. iii. c. 8) and Gretzer, to call in question its authenticity.
It is, however, fully supported by Laurus and Tillemont, and there is no sufficient reason for questioning its genuineness. The next time we learn of Gregory is at the second general council, that of Constantinople, a.D. 381 (Labbe, Concil.
ii. 653), accompanied by his deacon Evangelus, in which he held a principal place as one of those who had studied and recognized the unorthodox theories of Eunomius, the great archenemies of Nicene orthodoxy, as his friend Gregory Nazianzen had at an earlier period termed him. That he was the author of the clauses then added to the Nicene symbol is an unverified assertion of Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. xii. 13). It is probable that it was on this occasion that he read to his friend Gregory Nazianzen and to Jerome his work against Eunomius, or at least the most important parts of it (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 123). Gregory Nazianzen having been reluctantly compelled to ascend the episcopal throne of Constantinople, Gregory Nyssa delivered an inaugural oration which has perished, and soon after a funeral oration on the venerable Meletius of Antioch, which has been preserved (Socr. H. E. iv. 26; 587 sq.). Before the close of the council the emperor Theodosius issued a decree from Hercles, July 30, a.D. 381, containing the names of the bishops who were to be regarded as centres of orthodox communion in their respective districts. Among these Gregory Nyssa appears in company with his metropolitan Callistus, Caesarea and Otireus of Melitene, for the diocese of Pontus (Cod. Theod. l. iii. "de Fide Rufinus, under the presidency of Nectarius, to decide between the rival claims of the bishopship of Bagadus and Agapius to the see of Bostra, in Arabia; a question really appertaining to the jurisdiction of the see of Antioch (Labbe, Cod. ii. 1151). It was on this occasion that at the request of Nectarius Gregory delivered the homily bearing the title of Latin name.

It is probable that he did not long survive this synod. The date of his death is uncertain, but it must be placed before the close of the century, perhaps in A.D. 395.

Writing, Gregory Nyssenus was a very copious writer, and the greater part of his recorded works have been preserved to us. His writings may be divided into five classes: I. Exegetical; II. Dogmatical; III. Ascetic; IV. Funeral Oration; and Panegyric Discourses; V. Letters.

I. Exegetical. — Gregory did not accomplish much for the exegesis of Holy Scripture, and what he has left is of no high value, his system of interpretation being almost entirely allegorical. To this class belong his works on the Creation, written chiefly to supplement and defend the great work of his brother Basil on The Hexameron. These are (1) Απολογίαν περὶ τῆς δαμασκήνης, dedicated to his youngest brother Peter, bishop of Sebaste. It takes its title "Apologiae" from its containing a defence of the actions of Moses, and also of some points in Basil's work which had been called in question. (2) Περὶ καταστασιν νεωτούρ, a treatise on the creation of man, written as a supplement to Basil's treatise (vol. i. p. 45; Soc. H. E. iv. 26). The fundamental idea of which is the unity of the human race—that humanity before God is to be considered as one man; also dedicated to his brother Peter. It is called by Basil, παρισματικός θανάτος. (3) Two homilies on the same subject (Gen. i. 26). These are frequently appended to Basil's Hexameron, and are erroneously assigned to him by Combes and others. There is also a discourse (tom. ii. pp. 22-34) on the meaning of the image and likeness of God in which man was created. (4) A treatise on the Life of Moses; and (5) A treatise on the Life of Moses; and (5) A treatise on the nature of a perfect Christian life; dedicated to Cassiarius. (6) Two books on the Superstitions of the Psalms. In this work he fruitlessly endeavours to show that the five books of the Psalter are intended to lead men upward, as by five steps, to moral perfection. The first book, in nine chapters, investigates the object of each of the five divisions of the Psalter. The second book is in sixteen chapters, and the third in nineteen. It is a treatise in detail, expounding them allegorically, without any critical insight into their real meaning; chapter 7 explains the word Allūrus; chapters 8 and 9 relate to the psalms that are destitute of superscriptions, giving enigmatic reasons for their absence where wanting both the Hebrew and the LXX, and ascribing their absence in the Hebrew text, when present in the LXX, to the blindness and impiety of the Jews. In chapter 10, he attempts an explanation of the dogmata, and in the remaining chapters he carries out in detail his principle of the progressive becloudery of verities, a tendency which he regards as due to the Holy Spirit, very briefly in the first eleven, and more fully in Ps. xi.–viii.

An explanation of the sixth Psalm concludes this work. (6) Eight homilies expository of Ecclesiastes, ending with ch. viii. 15, "less forced, more useful, and more natural." (Dupin.) (7) Five homilies on Canticles, ending with ch. vi. 9; dedicated to Olympia. (8) Five homilies on the Lord's Prayer, "lectu dignissimae" (Fabric.). (9) Eight homilies on the Beatitudes. (10) A discourse on 1 Cor. xv. 28, in which he combats the Arian perversion of the passage as to the subjection of the Son. (11) A short treatise on the witch of Endor, "Εγγυνωρπαθαντων, to prove that they were demons of the shape of Samuel; addressed to a bishop named Theodocius. II. Dogmatical. — Far more valuable than Gregory's attempts at exegesis are his dogmatical works. These are deservedly regarded as among the most important patristic contributions towards a true view of the mystery of the Trinity, hardly, if at all, inferior to the writings of his greater brother, Basil. (1) The chief of these, both in size and importance, is his great work against Eunomius, written subsequently to the death of Basil, to refute the apology put forth by Eunomius, in reply to Basil's attack upon his teaching, and to vindicate his brother from the calumnious charges brought against him by the adversary. We learn from the dedicatory epistle to his younger brother, Peter, bishop of Sebaste, and his reply, that the work was written at his request, after his return from Armenia. It is in twelve books, of which the last is the longest, being more than a quarter of the whole. (2) Almost equally important with this are the replies to Apollinarius and the exposition against Apollinaris. These treatises are not only valuable as giving the most weighty answer on the orthodox side to the erroneous views of these heretical leaders, but, from the large number of extracts from their writings contained in them, they are really the chief sources of our acquaintance with the real character of their doctrines. The same subjects are treated with great accuracy of thought and spiritual insight in (3) Sermo Catecheticus Magnus, a work divided into forty chapters, containing a systematized course of theological teaching for the use of catechists, proving, for the benefit of those who did not accept the authority of Holy Scripture, the harmony of the chief doctrines of the faith with the instincts of the human heart. This work contains passages asserting the annihilation of evil, the restitution of all things, and the final restoration of evil men and evil spirits to the blessedness of union with God, so that He may be "all in all," embracing all things endowed with sense and reason—doctrines derived by him from Origen. To save the credit of a doctor of the church of acknowledged orthodoxy, it has been asserted from the time of Germanus of Constantinople that these passages were foisted in by heretical writers (Phot. Cod. 233, pp. 904 sqq.). But there is no foundation for this hypothesis, and we may safely say that "the will is father to the thought," and that the simul substitution of all things was distinctly held and taught by him in his writings. The concluding section of the work, which speaks of the errors of Aelia Urbanus, a convert to Christianity, on the way to a new and evidently an addition of some blundering copyist. Other dogmatic treatises from Gregory's pen which deserve mention are, that addressed to Simplicianus, a military tribune, on Faith in the Trinity; another dedicated to Abalbus against Thecesian; one to his brother, Peter of Sebaste, on the difference between "essence," "deity," and "person," 3beritotan; and the Sermones adversus Arius et Sabellianum; and de Spiritu Sancto adversus Macedoniam, first printed by Mai in his Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio (tom. viii.), and in the Nov. Patr. Biblioth., tom. iv. Weighty as Gregory's utterances are on the doctrine of the Trinity and the union of the two natures in Christ, it must be admitted that the human desire to exalt the divine nature he came dangerously near the doctrines afterwards developed by Eutyches, and the Monothelites, if he did not actually enunciate them. While he rightly held that the infinite Logos was not imprisoned in Christ's human soul and body, any more than the light of a torch is confined to the wick, so that while the flame is indispensably limited to the brachamovos or substratum of the torch, the light is not therefore imprisoned in it (Cat. Magn. c. 10)—he cannot be said to have assigned the proper independence to the person of the human soul and will. When he discusses the question how far Christ can be said to have had a free human will, he assigns the passivity alone to the human will, the active agency being simply and solely divine. He views Christ's will as merely something spondos, possessing mutability, possibility, and a passive capability of development, without any power of self-determination (cf. Darby, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, div. ii. vol. i. pp. 16, 175, Eng. transl.). Hooker quotes some other words adversus apollinaris. These treatises are not only valuable as giving the most weighty answer on the orthodox side to the erroneous views of these heretical leaders, but, from the large number of extracts from their writings contained in them, they are really the chief sources of our acquaintance with the real character of their doctrines. The same subjects are treated with great accuracy of thought and spiritual insight in (3) Sermo Catecheticus Magnus, a work divided into forty chapters, containing a systematized course of theological teaching for the use of catechists, proving, for the benefit of those who did not accept the authority of Holy Scripture, the harmony of the chief doctrines of the faith with the instincts of the human heart. This work contains passages asserting the annihilation of evil, the restitution of all things, and the final restoration of evil men and evil spirits to the blessedness of union with God, so that He may be "all in all," embracing all things endowed with sense and reason—doctrines derived by him from Origen. To save the credit of a doctor of the church of acknowledged orthodoxy, it has been asserted from the time of Germanus of Constantinople that these passages were foisted in by heretical writers (Phot. Cod. 233, pp. 904 sqq.). But there is no foundation for this hypothesis, and we may safely say that "the will is father to the thought," and that the simul substitution of all things was distinctly held and taught by him in his writings. The concluding section of the work, which speaks of the errors of Aelia Urbanus, a convert to Christianity, on the way to a new and evidently an addition of some blundering copyist. Other dogmatic treatises from Gregory's pen which deserve mention are, that addressed to Simplicianus, a military tribune, on Faith in the Trinity; another dedicated to Abalbus against Thecesian; one to his brother, Peter of Sebaste, on the difference between "essence," "deity," and "person," 3beritotan; and the Sermones adversus Arius et Sabellianum; and de Spiritu Sancto adversus Macedoniam, first printed by Mai in his Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio (tom. viii.), and in the Nov. Patr. Biblioth., tom. iv. Weighty as Gregory's utterances are on the doctrine of the Trinity and the union of the two natures in Christ, it must be admitted that the human desire to exalt the divine nature he came dangerously near the doctrines afterwards developed by Eutyches, and the Monothelites, if he did not actually enunciate them. While he rightly held that the infinite Logos was not imprisoned in Christ's human soul and body, any more than the light of a torch is confined to the wick, so that while the flame is indispensably limited to the brachamovos or substratum of the torch, the light is not therefore imprisoned in it (Cat. Magn. c. 10)—he cannot be said to have assigned the proper independence to the person of the human soul and will. When he discusses the question how far Christ can be said to have had a free human will, he assigns the passivity alone to the human will, the active agency being simply and solely divine. He views Christ's will as merely something spondos, possessing mutability, possibility, and a passive capability of development, without any power of self-determination (cf. Darby, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, div. ii. vol. i. pp. 16, 175, Eng. transl.). Hooker quotes some other words adversus apollinaris. These treatises are not only valuable as giving the most weighty answer on the orthodox side to the erroneous views of these heretical leaders, but, from the large number of extracts from their writings contained in them, they are really the chief sources of our acquaintance with the real character of their doctrines. The same subjects are treated with great accuracy of thought and spiritual insight in (3) Sermo Catecheticus Magnus, a work divided into forty chapters, containing a systematized course of theological teaching for the use of catechists, proving, for the benefit of those who did not accept the authority of Holy Scripture, the harmony of the chief doctrines of the faith with the instincts of the human heart. This work contains passages asserting the annihilation of evil, the restitution of all things, and the final restoration of evil men and evil spirits to the blessedness of union with God, so that He may be "all in all," embracing all things endowed with sense and reason—doctrines derived by him from Origen. To save the credit of a doctor of the church of acknowledged orthodoxy, it has been asserted from the time of Germanus of Constantinople that these passages were foisted in by heretical writers (Phot. Cod. 233, pp. 904 sqq.). But there is no foundation for this hypothesis, and we may safely say that "the will is father to the thought," and that the simul substitution of all things was distinctly held and taught by him in his writings. The concluding section of the work, which speaks of the errors of Aelia Urbanus, a convert to Christianity, on the way to a new and evidently an addition of some blundering copyist. Other dogmatic treatises from Gregory's pen which deserve mention are, that addressed to Simplicianus, a military tribune, on Faith in the Trinity; another dedicated to Abalbus against Thecesian; one to his brother, Peter of Sebaste, on the difference between "essence," "deity," and "person," 3beritotan; and the Sermones adversus Arius et Sabellianum; and de Spiritu Sancto adversus Macedoniam, first printed by Mai in his Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio (tom. viii.), and in the Nov. Patr. Biblioth., tom. iv. Weighty as Gregory's utterances are on the doctrine of the Trinity and the union of the two natures in Christ, it must be admitted that the human desire to exalt the divine nature he came dangerously near the doctrines afterwards developed by Eutyches, and the Monothelites, if he did not actually enunciate them. While he rightly held that the infinite Logos was not imprisoned in Christ's human soul and body, any more than the light of a torch is confined to the wick, so that while the flame is indispensably limited to the brachamovos or substratum of the torch, the light is not therefore imprisoned in it (Cat. Magn. c. 10)—he cannot be said to have assigned the proper independence to the person of the human soul and will. When he discusses the question how far Christ can be said to have had a free human will, he assigns the passivity alone to the human will, the active agency being simply and solely divine. He views Christ's will as merely something spondos, possessing mutability, possibility, and a passive capability of development, without any power of self-determination (cf. Darby, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, div. ii. vol. i. pp. 16, 175, Eng. transl.). Hooker quotes some other words adversus apollinaris. These treatises are not only valuable as giving the most weighty answer on the orthodox side to the erroneous views of these heretical leaders, but, from the large number of extracts from their writings contained in them, they are really the chief sources of our acquaintance with the real character of their doctrines. The same subjects are treated with who harshly condemn others for sin, on Charity to the Poor, avoiding fornication, and the like; together with treatises on the chief festivals, Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Ascension Day, &c.

V. Epistles.—The number of Gregory’s letters preserved to us is not great. The chief are that to Flavian, complaining of his contumelious treatment by Helladius, and the two on Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Fourteen letters were published by Zacagni, librarian of the Vatican, died 1712) in his Collect. Mon. Vet. Eccl. Gracc. et Lat. pp. 354–400 (quarto, Rom. 1698), to which seven were added by J. B. Caraccioli from a Medicean MS. (Florence, 1781). The whole were transferred to Galland’s Isis. Vet. Patr. vol. vi. pp. 604, sqq. and Migne’s Patrologiae (vol. xlii. pp. 999 sqq.).

Editions.—Omitting the editions of separate treatises, the earliest publication of Gregory’s collected works was in a Latin translation issued from the press at Cologne in 1537. This was followed by one from the Basil Press, 1592, L. Sifanius being chiefly responsible for the version. It appeared again at Basel with additions in 1571, and at Paris in 1578, 16th ed. Paris, 1590. These editions were greatly surpassed in elegance and accuracy by that of Paris 1603, under the superintendence of Front du Duc.

Greek and Latin.—The first edition of the Greek text with a Latin translation appeared from Morel’s press at Paris in 1615 in two volumes folio, also edited by du Duc. To this an appendix was added in 1618 from materials supplied by Greuter. It issued again from the same press, but with a great falling off both in elegance and accuracy, in 1638, in three volumes folio. Other complete reprints, including his epistles and other additamenta, are those by Galland (Bibl. Vet. Patr. tom. vii.) and Migne (Patrologia, tom. xivii–xlv). A critical examination of the works of Gregory Nyssen is, however, much wanted. It is matter of surprise and regret that no duly qualified scholar has undertaken a task in which, to quote the Bibliotheca Graccorum of Fabriucius (ed. Harles, vol. i.) “amplissimus patet campus in quo vires ingenii, eruditionis, et difficilem, cae ma laude pariter ac utitale, posset exercere.” Two praiseworthy efforts have been commenced to supply this deficiency in the proposed editions of the Rev. G. H. Forbes, Burntisland, 140, 1855, and of Fr. Oehlens, Halis, 8vo, 1865 (in which last it is to be regretted that sufficient care has not been exercised in the use of the MSS.; neither of which has, we believe, gone beyond the first volume. Oehler has also edited a selection from the works of Gregory Nyssen, accompanied by a good German translation (Bibliothek der Kirchen-Väter, Band 1, 1838). The later editions of Galland and Migne include some very important additions to the original Monellian edition, first given to the world by Zacagni (Collect. Monum. Vet. Ecol. Gracc. Romae, 1698, 4to, tom. i.), and J. B. Caraccioli (Flor. 1731). Some valuable fragments from other sources are also published by Galland and by Mai (Nov. Collect. Vet. Script., tom. i.) The familiar letters published by Zacagni and Caraccioli are very helpful towards forming an estimate of Gregory’s character. They show us a man of great refinement, with a love for natural beauty and a lively appreciation of the picturesque in scenery and of elegance in architecture. Of the latter art the detailed description given in his letter to Amphibias (Epist. 25), of an octagonal “martyrium” surrounded by a conical spire, rising from a clerestory supported on eight columns, proves him to have possessed considerable technical knowledge. It is perhaps the clearest, and most detailed description of an ecclesiastical building of the 4th century remaining. Gregory to Adelphius (Epist. 20) furnishes a charming description of a country villa, and its groves and ornamental buildings, at Vanota in Galaat, on the banks of the Hellespont. He enlarges with evident delight on the vine-clad trellises laden with delicious grapes, the orchards of peaches and other fruits, the arbours bright with roses, the shrubberies vocal with the song of birds, and the stews filled with fish so tame that they came to be fed. Few passages of patristic literature will better repay perusal than this delightful letter, which makes us keenly regret the nearly total loss of his correspondence. He was commemorated in the Cat. Ethip. on Nov. 22.

GREGORIUS (18), Bishop of Merida from cir. 402. He is known to us only from the decretal of Innocent I. addressed ad universos episcopos in Toleso (should be ‘qui in Toleso congregati sunt’). (For a discussion of the mutilated and imperfect form in which this letter appears in the Spanish Codex Canonne, drawn up, according to the majority of authorities, before 633, and of the inferences to be drawn from its mutilation, see dispute between Fr. Manson, Gesch. der Quellen und der Lehrentes Kanonischen Recht, &c., and Gams, Tit. Theolog. Quartalschrift, 1857, 1–23, and Kirchengesch. ii. 2, 463.) Innocent’s letter (which Jaffé dates 404) is concerned partly with the schism of those bishops of Baetica and Cartaginensis who refused to acknowledge the authority of the council held at Toledo in a.d. 460, in which the once Priscillianist bishops, Symphonus and Dictinus, were readmitted to communion, partly with certain irregularities in the manner of ordination then prevalent in Spain. The pope lays down that although strictly speaking the illegal ordinations already made ought to be cancelled, yet, for the sake of peace and to avoid tumults, what is past is to be condoned. The number of canonically invalid ordinands, however, is so great that if all were to be inquired into, the existing confusion would be made worse instead of better.

“How many have been admitted to the priesthoad who, like Rufinus and Gregory, have after baptism practised in the law courts? How many soldiers who, in obedience to authority, have been obliged to execute harsh orders (severa praecepta)? How many curiales who, in obedience also, have done whatever was commanded them? How many who have given amusements and spectacles to the people (Magnae familiae populi celebrantur)? have become bishops? (See Gams's comments on Can. 2 of Council of Elberi. 1. 53.) "Quorum omnium neminem ne ad societatem quidem ordinis clericiorum, optuerant pervenire" (see Decret. cap. iv. Tejada y Ramiro; Cod. de Can. ii.). In cap. v. we have the second mention of Gregory, "Let the complaint, if any, of Gregory, bishop of Merida, ordained in place of Patrunius (who presided at C. Tol. 1.) be heard, and if he has suffered injury contra meriti sum, let those who are envious of another's office be punished, lest in the future the spirit of faction should again inconvenience good men."

From these notices it appears then that Gregory succeeded Patrunius in the metropolitan see of Merida shortly after the council of Toledo in 400, that in his youth and after baptism, he had practised as an advocate; that his election to the bishopric of Merida was therefore, strictly speaking, illegal, and that, either on this account or on some other, great opposition had been made to his appointment. The effect of Innocent's letter would naturally be to confirm him in his see and to discredit the party of opposition to him. In all probability, it was during Gregory's pontificate that the irrigation of Vandalia, Alauni, and Suevi into Spain took place (in the autumn of 409, Ida. apud Exp. Sarr. iv. 353), and those scenes of horror and cruelty took place of which Idasius has left us a vivid, though possibly exaggerated, picture. After a first period of indiscriminate devastation and plunder, "Barbari ad pacem inueniunt Domino miseram conversi, sorte ad habitandum sibi Provinciarum dividunt regiones" (Idast. l. c. aann. 411). In this division Lusitania and Carthaginensia fell to the Alani, themselves to be shortly destroyed by the Goths under Alaric (410), and Merida with its splendid buildings and its Roman prestige, together with all the other great cities of southern Spain, "Barbarorum per Provincias dominantium se subjicuit servituti."

Innocent's letter, in which the passages above quoted concerning Gregory occur, is extremely valuable for Spanish church history at the time. It is given in two forms by Tejada y Ramiro II.; in the incomplete and mutilated form in which it appears in the Spanish Cod. Canesum, and in the complete form containing all the names and historical matter, in which it appears in other collections. (Exp. Sarr. xiii. 163; Gams, Kirchengesch. l. i. 420.) [M. A. W.]

GREGORIUS (17), a bishop of Lydia. He was an adherent of Chrysostom, compelled to retire from his see to some place of concealment in his native country, where he was living in A.D. 408. (Pallad. Dial. 195.) [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (19), bishop of Cerusus, sup- Christ. Bioog.—Vol. II.

GREGORIUS—BISHOPS 769

peced to be Ciriandus in Puegas, at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1123 c. 1214 d.; Le Quen, Or. Conc. i. 515.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (20), a bishop of Lilibaum of uncertain date, but probably between A.D. 200 and 450. He suffered martyrdom, but at what time, and whether under some Roman emperor or from the Vandals, is uncertain. (Acta SS. Jun. 5; Firis, Sctt. Ecc. 482.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (21), bishop of Adriensiople, metropolitan of the province of Hasmimontus, at the council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451; one of the bishops who subscribed the synodal letter of that council to Leo I. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 98, 1304, Migne); present also at the council held at Constantinople under Gennadius against simony, about A.D. 459. (Harduin, Acta Concil. ii. 785.) He was also one of the metropolitans to whom the emperor Leo addressed his imperial letter in defence of the orthodox faith A.D. 457, on the occasion of the massacre of Proterius of Alexandria and the other excesses of the Egyptian Eutychians. No reply of Gregory is extant, as in the case of many other of the metropolitans to whom the emperor's letter was addressed. (Harduin, Acta Concil. ii. 698; Oriens Christ. i. 1173; Tillemont, xv. p. 758.) [C. G. G.]

GREGORIUS (22), bishop of Sebastopolis in Lesser Armenia; his name is appended to the letter of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vil. 589; Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 426.) [L. D.]

GREGORIUS (23), supposed Sicilian bishop. There is a great doubt who and what he was. Such a person is supposed to have been driven from Africa during the Vandal persecutions of the 5th century, and to have found refuge in Sicily, where he afterwards met with martyrdom at the hands of some of the remaining heathen inhabitants. (Acta SS. Jun. 18.) [L. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (24), bishop of Modena, mentioned in a minatory letter of pope Simplicius to John, archbishop of Ravenna, who had ordained Gregory, much against his will, bishop of Modena (Simplic. Pap. ep. 2 in Patr. Lat. 1vii. 35, dated at Jaffa May 30, 482, Reg. Pont. 50). Jaffe's date, if correct, must be the period of Gregory's consecration; but in the list of the bishops of Modena, according to Sillingardus (Catal. Episc. Mutinen. p. 14), Gregory sat from 477 to 501, coming between Theodorus and Bassianus. The same author details the circumstances under which Gregory was appointed. The see of Modena had been originally subject to Milan, but in 450 was transferred, along with Bologna, Reggio, Parma, and Placentia, to Ravenna by the emperor Valentinian III., who wished thereby to increase the dignity of his capital city. Accordingly John of Ravenna claimed to consecrate the bishop of Modena, and pope Simplicius was appealed to on behalf of the rights of Milan. [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (25), the name of two bishops who attended the synod of Jerusalem in 518, viz. of—

Metrocomins (Bacatha) in Palestine (Mansi, viii. 1073 b; Le Quen, Or. Conc. iii. 762)
GREGORIUS

Carolum à S. Paulo Fulensis, Geog. Soc. p. 316.
Eleutheropolis in Palestine (M. 1072 c).

GREGORIUS (20), bishop of Jericho at the council of Jerusalem, 536. (Mansi, viii. 1172; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 655.)

GREGORIUS (27), St., twelfth bishop of Auterre, between St. Theodoseus and St. Optatus, early in the 6th century. He is said to have occupied the see twelve years and six months, and upon his death, in his eighty-fifth year, to have been buried in the church of St.
Germanus. He is commemorated Dec. 19. (Goll.
Christ. xii. 266.)

GREGORIUS (28), fourth bishop of Saintes, between St. Ambrosius and Petrus I., at the beginning of the 8th century. All we know of him is from the Acta of St. Germanus, the scholar of whom was ordained deacon and deacon by him; but these Acta, which purport to be the work of Pseudo, a contemporary, are quite unnatrustworthy. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 592; Goll. Christ. ii. 1056; Gams, Series Episc. 625.)

GREGORIUS (29), St., sixteenth bishop of Langres, succeeding Albino. He belonged to one of the highest Gallic families, being related to Euphranius archbishop of Tours, and likewise great-grandfather of Gregory the historian, who wrote a short account of him. He was the uncle, too, of that Attalus who was one of the hostages given by Childebert to Theodoric and after his rescue from slavery by one of Gregory's servants became count of Autun. It was not till late in life that he dedicated himself to the church. For forty years he was count of Autun, and remarkable, for his inflexible justice. Upon the death of his wife, Armentaria, "he turned to the Lord," in Gregory's phrase, and was elected and con-corated bishop of Langres (A.D. 500). As bishop he was noted for his abstemious abstemious, and in his secret midnight devotions in the baptistery at Dijon, where he usually lived.
Numerous miracles also are recorded of him,
and especially the finding of the body of St.
Benignus, the martyr of Dijon (A.D. 178), which his biographer relates at length (De glor. Mort. ii.). It was Gregory who induced St. John, the founder of Iconium who had left his monastery and retired to Arabia, to return to his post and not abandon his undertaking (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 856). Gregory was at the council of Epaon in A.D. 517, and that of Clermont in 533, and was represented by Evantius a priest at the third of Orleans in 536.

He died of a fever caught in walking from Dijon to Langres to be present at the services of the Epiphany there on January 6, 509, and was buried, as he had desired, in a church within the walls of Dijon. His son and successor in the see, Tetricus, translated his remains into a more gorgeous tomb. He was commemorated Jan. 4.

A vapid epitaph was written on him by ii; Hist. Franc. iii. 13, 19, iv. 13, v. 5; De glor.

GREGORIUS THEOPOLITANUS

Jan. 1, 167; Mansi, viii. 564, 883, ix. 21; Gall.
Christ. iv. 517.)

GREGORIUS (30), thirteenth bishop of Geneva, between Fappolus I. and Nicetas, about the middle of the 6th century. (Goll. Christ.
vi. 381.)

GREGORIUS (31) THEOPOLITANUS, bishop of Antioch A.D. 569-594. In his earliest youth he devoted himself to a monastic life, and he became so celebrated for his austerities that when he became patriarch of Antioch, he was the superior of the Syrian laura of Pharon or Pharan (Moschos), called by Evagrius the monastery of the Byzantines. Moschos had the following anecdote relating to this period of his life from Sergius the Armenian in the monastery of the Eunuchs near the Jordan, and the occurrence is placed by the narrator six years before Gregory became patriarch (Moschos, as Antioch was then called. Sergius was earnestly importuned by Gregory to conduct him to his venerable master, another Sergius dwelling by the Dead Sea. When the latter Sergius saw Gregory approach he cordially saluted him, brought water, washed his feet, and conversed with him upon spiritual subjects the whole day. Sergius the disciplinarian reminded his master that he had never treated other visitors, although some of them had been bishops and presbyters, as he had treated father Gregory. "Who father Gregory may be," the old man replied, "I know not; but this I know, I have entertained a patriarch in my cave, and I have seen him carry the sacred pallium and the Gospel." (Joann. Mosch. Prot. Spiritual. cap. 136, 140, in Patr. Lat. Ixxiv. 189.) From Pharon Gregory was summoned by Justin II. to proside over the monastery of Mount Sinai.

During the period of his rule this monastery sustained a siege from the Arabs, which placed it in extreme danger (Evagrius. H. E. v. 6).

On the expulsion of Anastasius bishop of Antioch by Justin in 569, Gregory was appointed 206) does not mention his appointment at Mount Sinai, but makes him promoted from the first-named monastery. His administration is highly praised by the ecclesiastical historian Evagrius, who was then practising as an advocate at Antioch, and was fortunate enough to obtain the favour of the new patriarch.
Evagrius ascribes to Gregory almost every possible excellence, an imposing person and sweet address, quickness of perception and promptitude in execution, dauntless courage both in meeting danger and in confronting the secular power, and prudence in counsel both for himself and for others. Vehement in his indignation when occasion called for it, he was equally conspicuous for his gentleness and meekness.
Moschos describes him as famous for his sim.
his forgetfulness of injuries, and his tears of compassion for sinners. When Chosroes I. had again invaded the Roman territory, A.D. 572, Gregory, who was kept informed of the real state of affairs by his friend the bishop of Nisibis, which was then being besieged by the Roman forces, vainly endeavoured to rouse the feebly empress in his habitual solemnities and lethargy, by representations of the successs
GRE G R E G O R I U S  T H E O P O L I T U N A S

of the Persian forces and the incompetence of the imperial commanders. His letters were treated with contempt by Justin, who refused to believe in any serious danger, and during the intervals of the shocks of an earthquake which had thrown down a considerable portion of the city walls, and had compelled Gregory to take refuge in the church, the bishop had the mortification of witnessing Antioch occupied by the troops of A d o r n e n a s , the general of Chosroes (Evag. E. E. v. 9). The latter years of the Emperor were marked by his extreme unpopularity with his people, and embittered by a succession of grave accusations. Soon after the accession of Tiberius, an intimacy with the successful adventurer Anatolius, who was charged with sorcery and other abominable crimes, raised a violent popular suspicion against him, and though examination by torture failed to elicit anything from Anatolius to criminate the bishop, he was placed in extreme danger (ibid. c. 18). In the reign of Maurice, A.D. 588, a quarrel with Asterius, the popular Count of the East, again excited the passions of the excitable Anti Ch on es against their bishop. All charges, however, were withdrawn upon a confession, every complaint being declared he had suffered some injury from him. He could not appear in public without being openly reviled by the mob, and even the actors turned him into ridicule on the stage. On the removal of Asterius, his successor, John, was commissioned by the emperor to make formal enquiry into the charges against Gregory. Asterius was placed in the royal palace with his own sister, and he felt so little hope of justice at Antioch, John having openly sided with the popular feeling against him, that he applied to the emperor and claimed to be heard before a synod. He proceeded to Constantinople, accompanied by E v a g r i u s as his legal adviser, c. A.D. 589, and the charges having been investigated by a special commission, the bishop was acquitted by a triumphant acquittal, his accuser being condemned to be scourged through the city and banished (ibid. vi. 7). Gregory returned to Antioch to witness its almost total destruction by earthquake, A.D. 589, from which he barely escaped with his life (ibid. c. 9). The widespread discontent of the imperial forces, which was soon to issue in the deposition and murder of Maurice and the elevation of Phocas, having extended to Syria, the troops on the Persian frontier broke out into open mutiny. They drove away their general, Priscus, and refused to accept Philippicus, whom Maurice had sent to succeed him. In this emergency, Gregory, who by his largesses had made himself very popular with the troops, was despatched to bring them back to their allegiance. He was suffering so severely from gout that he had to be conveyed to the camp in a litter, from which he addressed the army with such moving eloquence that they at once consented to accept Philippicus as their commander. His barangue is preserved to us by his grateful friend Evagrius (ibid. c. 11-13). Soon after this his diplomatic skill caused him to be selected by the emperor Maurice as an ambassador to the younger Chosroes, when compelled by his disasters to take refuge in the imperial territory, A.D. 590 or 591, and his advice was instrumental in the recovery of his throne, for which the grateful monarch sent him some gold and jewelled crosses, and other valuable presents (ibid. c. 18-21). In spite of his age and infirmities, he conducted a visitation of the remoter portions of his patriarchate, which were much infected with the doctrines of Severus, and succeeded in bringing back whole tribes, as well as many separate villages and monasteries, into union with the catholic church (ibid. c. 22). After this he paid a visit to Simeon Stylistes the younger, who was suffering from a mortal disease, in the last moments of which he was disappointed (ibid. c. 23). Soon after he appears to have resigned his see into the hands of the deposed patriarch Anastasius, who resumed his patriarchal authority in 594. His own death very soon followed. He was poisoned by an excessive dose of the medicine administered to relieve his gout, A.D. 594 (ibid. c. 24). His extant works consist of a homily in M a l a r e s m u s m e t e r s , printed in Greek by Combes (Auctar. Nov. tom. i. p. 727). It is found in Galland (Bibl. Patr. xii. 289), and Migne (Patrol. lxxxviii. p. 1847). There are also two sermons by him on the Baptism of Christ, which have been incorrectly attributed to another, and are also attributed to him a volume of historical collections, now lost (Evagr. H. E. vi. 24). (Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. xi. 102; Cave, Hist. Lat. i. 534.)

GREGORIUS TURONENSI S

of Tours (cir. 573-594). 1. Authorities.—For the life of Gregory the principal historical sources are to be found in his own writings. The Vita S. Gregorii Episc. Turon. per Odilium Abbatem, generally published along with his works, is almost entirely based upon what Gregory says of himself. The Odo Abbes, to whom it is attributed in all the printed editions from that of 1511 downwards, is conjectured to have been St. Odo, abbot of Cluny (cir. 943), who wrote a life of Tours. There is another short life of Gregory by Joannes Egidius (Jean Gilles) of Tours; it is of the 16th century, and of small value. It is to be found in Bordier's edition of the Miraclula, &c. vol. iv. pp. 234-7. There are numerous allusions to Gregory in the poems of Venantius Fortunatus, a contemporary, but there are not many facts to be gleaned from them, nor from the Testimonia of other writers collected in the fourth volume of Guadet and Taranne's edition of Gregory's History.

Gregory himself gives a list of his works. At the end of his history he says, "Deceh libros historiarum, septem miraculorum, unum de vitis Patrum scripsit: in Paullatis tractatus librum unum commentatus sum : de cursibus etiam ecclesiasticis unum librum condidit." (Bk. x. ch. 31, sub fine). Of these all are except the commentary on the Psalms, of which only fragments exist, collected in the third volume of Bordier's edition, pp. 401 sqq. The treatise De Cursibus ecclesiasticis was supposed to be lost till Professor F. Haase of Breslau discovered what he believed to be it in a MS. in the library at Bamberg, and published it under the title of S. Georgii Florentii Gregorii Tur. Ep. Liber ineditus de Cursu stellarum, ratio quidquid ad officium impendium docet observari, sive de Cursibus Ecclesiasticis, Breslau, 1853. Professor Haase adds a short preface and a facsimile of a St. Martin, together with some of the Opuscula, had appeared in the previous year, edited by Clétoveus. The best text of the works, the standard of all subsequent editions, is that of Ruinart, published at Paris in 1689. A new text of the History, founded on a careful recension of all the extant MSS., has been promised for many years by B. Goeze; but the work has not yet been published. The History is to be found in the second volume of Bouquet, as also in the collections of La Bigne, Duchesne, and Migne. Of recent editions, the most complete are those of the Société de l'Histoire de France, with French translations and notes, viz. the Histoire ecclésiastique des Francs, edited by M. Guadalet et Taranne, (4 vols. 1838–9), and Les Livres des Miracles et autres Opuscula, including the Vita, extracts from Fortunatus, &c., by M. H. L. Bordier (4 vols. 1857–64). M. Bordier has published a separate translation of the History, founded upon that of M. Guadalet and Taranne (3 vols. Paris, Dilot, 1859–61). Of the numerous other French translations of the History the best known is that by M. Guise, originally published in his Collection des Mémoires relatifs à l'Histoire de France, 1823, and republished in 1861 (2 vols. Didier), edited by M. Alfred Jacobs, who has appended thereto his treatise on the Geography of Gregory of Tours, and other valuable matter. There is a German translation, with an admirable introduction by W. Giesebruch, in Pertz's Geschichtsrechercher der Deutschen Vorzeit, Lieferungen 12 and 16, or vi. Jahrhundert, Bde. 4 and 5.

Of the commentaries and works bearing on the life and writings of Gregory, the most important and thorough, besides the pseudo- prefixed, &c., of Ruinart, Bordier, Jacobs, and Giesebruch above referred to, are Lébél's Gregor von Tours und seine Zeit, 2nd edit. 1809, and Gabriel Monod's Études critiques sur l'Épître aux Macériens, pt. i. 1872, being Fascicule No. 9 of the Bibliothèque de l'École des hautes Études. Compare also Wattenbach's Deutschlands Geschichts- quellen, 3rd edit. 1873, and for the more detailed bibliography of the subject Monod, pp. 23–24; also Répertoire des Sources historiques du Moyen Âge, par Ulysse Chevalier, Paris, 1877–8, Pothast's Wegweiser, s. v., and Bordier, vi. M. Monod gives a critical list of the extant MSS. of Gregory (pp. 50–54), and examines in detail the textual objections brought against the authenticity of various parts of the history (chap. 3).

3. Life of Gregory.—Georgius Florentius (subsequently called Gregorius, after his great-grandfather St. Gregory, bishop of Langres), son of Florentius and Armentaria, of noble or senatorial family, was born on St. Andrew's day (Nov. 30) of the year 538. So Monod, p. 28, relying chiefly on the passage in the Mir. Mart. iii. 10. Previous authorities have generally placed his birth in the year 543, from the passage in the Vita which states that he was thirty years old at the time of his episcopal consecration, which took place in 573. Members of his father's and mother's families had held high office both in church and state, besides the History of Gregory) gives 522. But that is evidently a misprint, for the 'Privilegio du Roll' which is on the reverse of the same folio is dated 1811, and the separate colophon of the History gives 1812.
GREGORIUS TURONENSIS

His grandfather, Georgius, on the father's side, and his great-grandfather, Florentius, on the mother's side (V. P. 8, 1) had been senators at Clermont. Gallus, son of Georgius and uncle of Gregory, had become bishop of Avignon; another uncle, Nicetius or Nizier, bishop of Lyons (H. v. 5, V. P. 8); another, Gundulf, had risen to ducal rank (H. vi. 11). Gregory, bishop of Langres, and originally count of Autun, was his great-great-grandfather. All the bishops of Tours, except five, had been of his family (v. 50). It is with justifiable pride, therefore, that he asserts (V. P. 6) that none in Gaul could boast of purer and nobler blood than himself.

His father appears to have died early, and Gregory received most of his education from his uncle Gallus, bishop of Avignon. The history of his adopting the clerical profession is told by himself. Being sick of a fever in his youth, he found relief by visiting the shrine of St. Illidius, the patron saint of Clermont. The fever however returned, and Gregory's life was despaired of. Being again carried to St. Illidius' shrine he asked to be devoted to God to dedicate himself to the ministry if he recovered, nor would he quit the shrine till his prayer was granted (V. P. 2, 2).

Armentaria, Gregory's mother, returned to Burgundy, her native country, and Gregory apparently lived with Avitus, at first archdeacon, afterwards bishop of Avignon, who carried on the work of his education. Avitus directed his pupils rather to the study of ecclesiastical than of secular works. It is Avitus that Gregory looks upon as in the fullest sense his spiritual father. "It was his teaching and preaching," he says, "that, next to the Psalms of David, led me to recognise that Jesus Christ the Son of God had come into the world to save sinners, and caused me to reverence and honour those as the friends and disciples of Christ who take up his cross and follow in his steps." (V. P. 2, Intr.) By Avitus he was ordained deacon, probably about the year 563. (Monod, 29.)

Of Gregory's life before he became bishop of Tours few details are known. There are allusions to various journeys from Avignon to Burgundy to visit his mother (Mir. Mart. i. 96, iii. 41; Fl. Mart. 53; G. D. 1, 4, v. 4), whose affection and piety he on more than one occasion commemorates (Mir. Mart. iii. 10, V. P. v. 12, Monod, 28-29), and he appears to have been well known at Tours before he became bishop (Mir. Mart. i. 32, Vita, ch. ii.); for it was in consequence of the expressed wish of the whole people of Tours, clergy and laity, that Sigebert appointed him, in 573, to the see. He was consecrated by Egidius of Rheims.

He was known to and favoured by Radegund, the widow of Clothaire I, foundress of St. Cross at Poitiers, and according to Fortunatus her favour was of weight in bringing about his election to the bishopric of Tours.

Quam patris Egidii Domino manus alma sacravit
Ut populum recreet, quem Radegundis amant;
Et Sigebertum ovam favet et Brunochilus honorat.
Judice regis, nobis cumulam adeunt. (Carm. v. 2.)

The elevation of Gregory to the see of Tours was contemporary with the renewed outbreak of civil war between Sigebert and Chilperic, the former of whom had inherited the Austrasian, the latter the Neustrian, possessions of their father Clotaire I (died 541). Of the other sons of Clotaire, Guntram had obtained Burgundy with Orleans as his capital, and Charibert Aquitaine together with Toulouse and other territories. On Charibert's death in 587 (see G. Richter, Annalen d. deutschen Reichs, s. a.; in 570 according to Giesebrecht) his possessions were divided, each of the three sons obtaining one-third share in Paris, which thus became a kind of federal capital. The precious bishops under his share of Paris, only a few cities in Aquitaine (v. Charibert, Chilperic, and on these divisions Bonnell, Anfänge des Karol. Hauses, pp. 206-215). Chilperic seized upon Tours and Poitiers (H. iv. 46), but his son Clodius was expelled from thence by the united forces of Guntram and Sigebert under Mummolus. Again later (probably in 573-4, Richter, but the chronology is very obscure), Chilperic sent a plundering expedition into Touraine under his eldest son Theodebert (H. iv. 48). Fearful destruction was committed, and the lamentations of the church were worse than in the days of the persecution of Dioscorus." In the following year (575), however, Theodebert was defeated and slain by Guntram Boso and Godegisil, Sigebert's generals (iv. 51), and Touraine regained for Sigebert. Almost immediately afterwards Sigebert was assassinated at Fredegund's instigation, and Chilperic recovered Tours (v. 13, 14, 49), which remained in his possession till his death in 584.

The possession of the title of prince was thus in some sort the occasion of the war, and these countries suffered from the devastation and ravages of both parties. Gregory's sympathies were with Sigebert, from whom he had originally obtained his bishopric (Vita S. Gregor. § 11), and the people of Tours were generally (iv. 50), though not unanimously (iv. 49), on the Austrasian side. Cruel and pernicious as they were, though all the Merovingian princes appear to have been, Chilperic, according to Gregory, was conspicuously so; he was the "Novo et Heroe of his age" (vi. 49); he not only plundered and burned throughout the country, but he specially destroyed churches and monasteries, slew priests and monks, and paid no regard to the possessions of others.

Tours remained under the subjection of Chilperic till his death in 584, and some of the best traits in Gregory's character appear in the resistance which he made to the murderous violence of the king and the turbulent treachery of Fredegund. Thus he braved their wrath and refused to surrender his rebellious son Merovius (H. v. 14), and their enemy Guntram Boso who had defeated and killed Theodebert (v. 4), both of whom had taken sanctuary at the shrine of St. Martin; and Gregory alone of the bishops dared to rebuke Chilperic for his unjust conduct towards Praetextatus, and to protect Praetextatus from the vengeance of Fredegund (v. 12). So, too, when Chilperic wanted to force on his people his views of the doctrine of the Trinity, Gregory withstood him. Chilperic recited to Gregory what he had written on the subject, and added, "I will that such shall be your belief and that of all the other doctors of the church." "Do not deceive yourself, my lord king," Gregory replied, "you must follow in this matter the teaching of the apostles and doctors of the church, the teaching of Hilary and Eusebius, the confession that you made at baptism." "It appears then," angrily exclaimed the king, "that Hilary and Eusebius are my declared enemies in this matter." "No," said Gregory; "neither God nor His saints are your enemies," and he proceeded to expound to the king the orthodox doctrine concerning the Trinity. "Holy Father," said Chilperic, feeling very angry, "I shall set forth my ideas to those who are wiser than you, and they will approve of them." "Never," answered the bishop; "it would be no wise man, but a lunatic, that would adopt such views as yours." (v. 45.)

Gregory had a persistent and treacherous enemy in Leudastes, a man of low origin, who had risen to the rank of doctor Charibert to be count of Tours, and who held the same post under Chilperic (v. 49). When removed from office because of his misdeeds, he endeavoured to take revenge on Gregory by maligning him by false accusations to the king, that he was going to deliver over the city to Childebert, Sigebert’s son, and finally that Gregory had spread a report that Fredegund had committed adultery with another bishop. Whether there was any concerted scheme of Fredegund’s to bring about Gregory’s ruin is not clear. Anyhow the king was very angry, "beast and kicked" Leudastes severely, and cast him into prison. Leudastes appealed to the evidence of Riculfus, a clerk of Tours, and a declared enemy of Gregory. Chilperic summoned a council of the bishops of the kingdom at Braine, near Soissons, to investigate the charge. Popular sympathy was entirely on Gregory’s side, a woodcutter, Modestus, being unable to restrain his indignation, and suffering for his pains, and the people outside making an uproar during the council (v. 50). Gregory entirely denied the charge, he had neither heard of nor spoken of such a thing. It was found that the accusation rested solely on the evidence of Leudastes and Riculfus. All agreed that the witness of an inferior was not to be believed against a priest and his superior ("non potest persona inferior super sacerdotem credi"), and so Gregory was acquitted on condition of solemnly disclaiming on oath all cognizance of the charge. Leudastes was condemned to death; at Gregory’s intercession he was spared death, but not torture, which in the most horrible forms was inflicted on him (v. 48-50, Grégoire de Tours au Concile de Braine, par S. Prioux, Paris, 1847, is a mere réchauffe of Gregory’s own account of these proceedings, and of no independent critical value). The subsequent fate of Leudastes illustrates the best side of Gregory’s character. After being a fugitive in different parts of Gaul, Leudastes presented himself at Tours to have his excommunication removed with a view to marrying and settling there. For this end he brought letters from several bishops but none from queen Fredegund, his principal enemy, and when Gregory wrote to her, she replied by asking Gregory to postpone receiving back Leudastes into communion till further inquiry had been made. Gregory, suspicious of Fredegund’s design, warned Leudastes’ father-in-law, and besought him to induce Leudastes to keep quiet till Fredegund’s anger was appeased. “This advice,” says Gregory, “I gave sincerely, and for the love of God, but Leudastes suspected treachery and refused to take it: so the proverb was fulfilled which I once heard an old man tell, ‘Always give good counsel to both friend and foe; the friend will take it, the foe will despise it.’” Leudastes went to the king to get his pardon; Chilperic was willing, but warned him to be careful till the queen’s wrath was appeased. Leudastes merely tried to inveigle Fredegund into the queen. Fredegund was implacable and furious, and Leudastes was put to death with great cruelty. “He deserved his death,” says Gregory, “for he had ever led a wicked life” (vi. 32).

During the wars that followed the death of Chilperic of Tours and Poitou were again the subject of contention, and again suffered accordingly. Their desire was to be subject to Childebert, Sigebert’s son, that is, to resume their allegiance to the Austrasian king; but they were compelled to submit to Guntram, the king of Orleans and Burgundy (vii. 12, 13), and under his power they remained till the treaty of Andelot in 597, in conclusion which Gregory was one of the children of the Bertramish emperor, who were restored to Childebert (v. 29). Gregory appeared during this period at the courts of both sovereigns; at Guntram’s court at Orleans (viii. 2), and again at Coblenz with Childebert (viii. 13). Guntram was guardian of Childebert, and had adopted him as his heir, and one of the terms of the treaty of Andelot was that the survivor of the two should be the heir of him who died first. Guntram died in 593 and Childebert succeeded, and the latest notice in Gregory’s writings is the visit of Childebert to Orleans after Guntram’s death. (M. S. Martin, iv. 37.) The story in the Vita (c. 24) of Gregory’s visit to Rome is very improbable (Monod, p. 97). Gregory himself died on Nov. 17, 594.

Gregory’s activity was not confined to the general affairs of the kingdom. He was even more zealous for what concerned the welfare of his own and the neighbouring dioceses. He was much occupied in his later years with the disturbances caused by Chroichda on the nursery at Pottiers which had been founded by Gregory’s friend St. Riquemont. Gregory’s first interference was ineffectual (ix. 39 seq.), but the disturbance having increased, and having caused an émeute in the town, the two kings, Guntram and Childebert, appointed a joint commission of bishops to inquire into the matter. Gregory was one of Childebert’s commissioners, but he refused to enter upon the work until the civil disturbance had been actually repressed (x. 15, 16). So too he had a great deal of trouble with another rebellious nun, Bertheugenda (ix. 33, x. 12).

With the city of Tours itself his relations were peculiarly intimate. He not only magnifies his office as bishop, but he takes a kind of family pride in it, when he says that all previous bishops of Tours, with only five exceptions, were of his family (ff. v. 50; see above), and he magnifies the sanctity and power of Tours’ great patron St. Martin. He maintained the rights of sanctuary of the shrine in favour of the most powerful offenders, and in spite of the wrath of Chilperic and Fredegund (e.g. Merovens, Guntram Boso, Eburus, vii. 22, 29). He was a builder of churches in the city and see, and especially a rebuilding of the great shrine of St. Martin (x. 31). He did his best to arbitrate.
GREGORIUS TURONENSIS

in and appease the bloody feuds within the city, whether springing from private or political partition (vii. 47), and he was a rigorous and enfeebled defender of the exemption of the city from increased taxation (ix. 20). Evidently a man of unselfish earnestness and energy, he was popular in the city with all. It was to the popularity of his early years that he owed his election to the see (Vita, ch. 11); that his popuularity continued during life is manifested at the council of Braga and on many other occasions, and his sanctity at death is attested by his almost immediate generation as a saint. And his sanctity, his biographer (Vita, pref.) says, was manifested not so much by the working of miracles, as in being meek and lowly of heart, and so following in the footsteps of Christ.

4. The Writings of Gregory.—Gregory began to write first as bishop, and was induced to begin on the Miracles of St. Martin by the increasing wonders which had been wrought by the saint, since his life and miracles had been recorded by Paulinus and Severus, and by a vision of his own mother, who urged him to undertake the work (Mir. S. Martin. 1. pref.).

Giesebrecht (Pref. pp. 36, 27) concludes from the fact that Vitoria, in 578, alludes to the work of Gregory on the Miracles of St. Martin, that a first draft of at least a part of it, probably the first two books, must have been written by that time. These two books, however, were not completed till 583, the third book not before 587, and the fourth was still being added at the time of Gregory’s death. It is Contemporary with the writing of the Miracles of St. Martin was the composition of the Miracles of St. Julianus and the Glória Martyrum about the year 585. Gregory continued his labours in the same field in the Gloria Confessorum (completed 588) and the Vita Patrum, the latter of which was continued till the time of Gregory’s death, from internal evidence, that Gregory was in the habit of making from time to time improvements and additions to what he had written.

The history appears to have been written contemporaneously with the books of the Miracles of the Saints, and most probably in several divisions and at different times. Giesebrecht who has carefully investigated the internal evidence bearing on this subject comes to the following conclusions. The history was originally written at three separate periods, and it falls into three separate divisions. The first division, comprising Books i. — iv. and the first half of Book v., was probably composed about the year 577; the second division, from the middle of Book v. to the end of the 37th chapter of Book vii., in the years 584 and 585;
the remainder of the work in the years 590 and 591. The last chapter of the last book is an epilogue, separately composed; for the history as a history is unfinished. Had Gregory desired to bring it to completion he probably would have carried it on at least to the death of Gun-tram in March 593. As in the case of the books of the Miracles Gregory appears to have revised his History, and we find in the earlier books insertions, references to Gregory’s other works, and references to events of later date. This revision does not appear to have reached further than the end of the sixth book; hence it is that several MSS., and these the most ancient, contain only the first six books, and the authors of the Hist. Epit. and of the Gesta Reg. Franc. appear to have known only these first six books. The conclusions of Monod with regard to the dates of the composition of Gregory’s works are substantially the same as those of Giesebrecht.
In the History he also finds a threefold division, namely, Books i. to iv. composed about 576;
Books v. and vi., composed from 584 to 587;
Books vii. to x. in 590 and 591; and the Epilogue or last chapter in 592. (Monod, pp.
115–119.)

The difficulty, that if the composition of the books of the Miracles and of the History was contemporary, there would be allusions to the History in the books of the Miracles, as there are allusions to the books of the Miracles in the History, is got over by Giesebrecht by the conjecture that, as Gregory intended his History to be for the use of posterity (Hist. i. pref.), whilst the books of the Miracles were for the edification of contemporaries, he kept the History secret during his lifetime and did not publish it in any form (p. 31).

Gregory begins his History, like most chroniclers of that time, with the Creation, and his first book is founded on, and in many cases made up of extracts from, Eusebius, Jerome, and Oro-sius (Hist. i. Prior. sub fine, ch. 34, 37). In the second book, which treats of the Frankish conquests, he still owes much to Orisius and to the Lives of the Saints, and quotes from the works of placitas sermones Alexander, a writer of the 5th century, whose works are no longer extant. But from this point onwards he writes directly from oral tradition and unwritten authorities. The third and fourth books, dealing with events down to 575, two years after Gregory became bishop, are, compared with those which follow, much more probable, and we have in them evidence of Gregory’s knowledge of the events of his own time and country. From 575 the narrative becomes fuller and more systematic, the intervals of time being regularly marked. And as the writer becomes himself a more and more important personage in the state, so he is able to give more and more details about state affairs. (Giesebrecht, pp. 32–34.
Monod, in his 4th chapter, investigates the comparative value in different parts of the work of the documentary and oral sources of Gregory’s history.)

Gregory apologizes on more than one occasion for the rudeness of his style. He has had no practice, he says (Gloria Conf. sub fine), in letters, he cannot distinguish the true character and meaning of words, he mistakes masculine for feminine and feminine for masculine, &c. (ep.
Hist. pref., and Hist. book i. pref.). And doubless this rudeness to a certain degree produces obscenity, and has damaged his reputation in modern times, though Gregory (quoted by Monod, pp. 111) gives him the highest praise, “Gregorius Turonensis episcopus, via magnea nobilitatis et simplicitatis, scriptis multa simplici sermone.” But rough though his style might be, Gregory was far from being without learning or culture such as his age could afford Though ignorant of Greek, he had a fair acquaint-ANCE WITH LATIN AUTHORS, QUOTING OR REFERRING TO LIVY, PLINIUS, CICERO, AULIUS GELLIUS, &C. (MONOD, 112).

In the art of the historian as such, he is quite unskilled; that is to say, he does not attempt to make his history a consistent and well-balanced whole. He cannot subordinate that which is of local to that which is of general interest. The length and fulness of his recital of particular events depends not upon their intrinsic importance but upon the amount of information he has at his command. Hence the great detail in which he recites the quarrels of Ingeltruda and Berthegunda at Tours (H. ix. 33 sqq.) and of Choriledis at Poitiers, matters of merely local interest, but with which he had a very immediate connexion.

So too he follows the dramatic method of writing history, putting speeches into the mouths of individuals which are the composition of the author, not the authentic utterance of the individual. Again, he does not attempt to estimate the value of the evidence of his informants. He retails immediately and at first hand whatever is given to him without crediting it. As to his own words and works, he plainly gives us exactly what he himself has said and done. Never at any time does he repress his personal individuality.

Where, however, he depends upon written authorities he is, in detail, untrustworthy. Where he borrows from writers now extant, and can be compared with them, as in the first two books of the History, his inaccuracy is found to be considerable; he transcribes carelessly, and often instead of transcribing he cites from memory, giving the substance of that which he has read, and that not correctly (see instances ap. Monod, pp. 80 sqq.). It may be laid down generally that little confidence can be placed in his narrative of events outside of Gaul, and less confidence in proportion as the scene of action is farther removed from Gaul.

His authority as an historian, that is to say, his sincerity and impartiality, has been attacked in modern times on various grounds; that he unduly favours the church, or that he traduces the church in the recital he gives of the wickedness of the bishops of the time, or that he traduces the character of the Franks (Kries, DE GREGORII TURONENSIS EPISTOLAE VITAE ET SCRIPTORII, Breslau, 1859), whether from motives of race-jealousy or any other.

With regard to his ecclesiastical sympathies Gregory looks upon history as a struggle of the church against unbelief in the heathen and heretics, and against worldly-mindedness in professed Christians. In accordance with this view he begins his History with a confession of the orthodox faith (Scripturae bella Regnum cum gentibus adversis, Martyrum cum peganis, Ecclesiarum cum haereticis, prius fidein meman proferre capio, ut qui ligeret, me non dubitet esse catholicum.—HIST. I. PROL.). The epithet ecclesiastico applied to the History from Ruinart's time is a misnomer if used in the ordinary modern sense, for Gregory specially defends his method of mixing in his recital things secular and religious (mixte confusque tam virtutes sanctorurn, quam strages gentium memoramus.—HIST. II. PROL.). Of course with a man so passionate and impressionable as Gregory, the fact of his being a priest and the bishop of the see of St. Martin, the ecclesiastical and religious centre of Gaul, does influence his feelings and actions towards individuals. Hence to a certain degree it is that Guntram, the friend of the bishops and of Gregory, is the "good" king Guntram, and Chilperic, who delights in bitter raillery against bishops, is the "Nero Heartless" of his time, and even if ecclesiastical prejudices may have so far influenced Gregory's mode of speech, they did not prevent him reciting events as they were told to him, even though he might have to relate molestation of bishops on the part of Guntram, or deference to bishops, even to Gregory himself, on the part of Chilperic. His professional feelings, no doubt, affect the praise and blame which he assigns to individuals, and the reprobation with which he speaks of evil deeds, but the "impartiality of his narrative corrects the partiality of his judgment" (Monod, p. 134). And that in both directions, for although Gregory's patriotism was love of the church and not love of his country, he is not prevented thereby from recording evil deeds of good and evil priests, such as were the turbulent Salonius and Sagittarius (H. v. 21), the adulterous Dagulf (viii. 19), the immortal Palladius and Bertrand (viii. 7), the drunken Droctigisel (ix. 37, cp. x. 14).

On the much-disputed question of the relation of the Gallo-Roman subjects to the conquering Franks, Gregory gives no support to the theory that there was a continuous contest of races-going on in Gaul, still less that that was a vital political principle at the time. Gregory was himself, as he tells us, a Roman, and he speaks of the Franks often as barbarians, but barbarians in the ancient not in the modern sense of the word. He shews no rancour in treating of the Frankish conquerors, such as would be natural in the victim of an oppressed nation. Lüebel treats elaborately of the question of the distinction and jealousy of Romans and Teutons from the ethnographical point of view (pp. 57-83), and shews further that after the first days of the conquest there was no political subjection of Roman to Teuton as such, and that Romans were not excluded from offices and dignities because of their birth (pp. 101-118).

Whatever may be the defects of the history of Gregory, due generally to the character of the author and lying sufficiently on the surface, his work remains as the great and in many respects the only authority for the history of the 6th century. During that dark period, when the forces out of which the nations of Western Europe and European civilization were to arise, were still in conflict, Gregory's fresh and simple, though not unbiased, narrative is of the greatest value. He tells us exactly what the Franks were like, and what life in Gaul was like. He tells us, in so far as he knows them, all the facts, and he gives us his own judgment on them. We may agree with that judgment or not, but at any rate we are not kept in the dark as to the evidence upon which that judgment is based. [T. R. B.]

GREGORIUS (33) I, bishop of Agrigentum, in the 6th and 7th centuries. He was the author of an extant Greek commentary in ten books on Ecclesiastes. The latest edition (1740) of Cave's Hist. Lit. (i. 517) refers to this commentary as lost to view since 1681. In 1791 it was edited in folio at Venice by Morelli, with a Latin version and annotations, the life of Gregory by Leontius mentioned below accompanying it. In 1860 this edition was reprinted in the Patrologia Graeca (ccviii. 741), and in 1862 it was noticed by Cessilier (xl. 587), with a criticism of the style and a brief account of the author’s opinions, which were in accordance with the orthodoxy of his day. Morelli discusses the question of the biblical text made use of by Gregory, it being found frequently to vary from the Septuagint. He also seeks to account for the circumstance that a Sicilian of the 7th century wrote in the Greek language.
GREGORIUS AGRIGENT.

GREGORIUS AGRIGENT. 777

There is likewise extant a very full Life of Gregory of Aegregintum, under the name of Leontius abbat of St. Sabu at Rome, written not long after the bishop’s death. It is, however, so devoid of dates and all notes of time that nothing more than an inferential and approximate chronology of its events is possible. It is possible to locate the two Gregorys more accurately than near Jerusalem, and baptized by bishop Potamio, of whom no dates are known. At eighteen, being smitten with an ardent desire of seeing the sacred places of the Holy Land, he set sail for Carthage and thence proceeded to Palestine, where he passed some years among the various monastic communities, and especially those in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, by the patriarchate of which city, Macarius, he was ordained deacon. Thence he repaired to Antioch, where Eustathius was bishop, and after a year proceeded to Constantinople, where Justinian was reigning. He next visited Rome, for the sake of its sacred places, and while he was consecrated by the pope bishop of Agrigentum. He had scarcely entered upon his episcopal duties when a plot was contrived to blast his character, his enemies having early one morning, while he was at church, secretly introduced a strange female into his house. He was summoned to Rome to clear himself, was acquitted by the pope and restored to his flock, among whom he continued to labour until his death. The names above given are such as appear in the first edition of the chronology. Macarius of Jerusalem ruled between cir. 544 and 573, but not uninterruptedly (Clinton, F. R. ii. 537, 557, 558). No Eusta-thius of Antioch later than the Nicene period is otherwise known. Justinian reigned from 527 to 565. We have in addition a statement by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. xvii. 17), that Gregory was present at the fifth general council, 553. Taking this date for a departure, Cæsedit computes the year of Gregory’s birth to have been 524, and Pirri nearly agrees with him (Cajet. Vit. Sig. SS. i. animad. p. 167; Pirri, Sig. Soci. i. 693). But their calculation is perplexed by certain letters of Gregory the Great. Two of these (lib. i. ind. ex. ep. 72; lib. ii. ind. xi. ep. 12), edited by Jaffé (Elog. Pont. 97, 102), A.D. 591, 592, mention a Gregory bishop of Agrigentum. They are brief, and contain little direct information, but there are other letters which, without naming him, plainly allude to his case (lib. ii. ind. x. ep. 33; lib. v. ind. xiii. ep. 12; lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 23). From this group of epistles it is easy to discern that Gregory of Aegregintum is under accusation, that he is required at Rome with his accusers and the documents, that the see is under sequestration, and that he eventually returns to his church. In other words, here in pope Gregory’s correspondence is an incident disclosed accurately corresponding with that described by Leontius. But the date is inconveniently late for the other computations of Cæsedit and Pirri, who are therefore induced to conclude that there existed another Gregory of Aegregintum subsequent to theirs, labouring under a similar accusation. Him they call Gregory III. Morelli on the other hand, believing this solution unnatural and far-fetched, takes his departure from the papal epistles, and working backwards constructs a theoretical chronology of the life thus:—Birth, 558; ordination at Jerusalem, 579, under John III. and not Macarius; Antioch, 586; Constantinople, 588; consecration at Rome, 590; accusation, 591; restoration, 594; death, cir. 638. But Morelli, finding his scheme interfered with by the statement of Nicephorus, believes himself warranted in rejecting the “fifth synod”, and that of Constantinople, because the records of the council have no mention of the presence of a deacon or priest Gregory (vid. Mans, ix. 175 c, 391 D); secondly, because another writer, Nicetas Pectoratus (Contra Latinos, cap. 12 in Patr. Gr. exx. 1018), puts the council as the sixth, i.e. 688, a discrepancy which makes each writer discredit the other, as proving that neither had access to official documents. Morelli’s investigation is more searching than that of his predecessors, and his conclusion is supported, he thinks, by the internal evidence of the commentary. His Chronological scheme is the one adopted in the new edition of Cessilier.

A Latin version of Leontius is given by Cæsedit in his Lices of the Sicilian Saints (l. 188). The original Greek, with another Latin version, accompanies Morelli’s edition of the commentary as mentioned above. Morelli gives an account of every subsequent Life of Gregory founded on that of Leontius, and cites all the ancient authors by whom Gregory is mentioned. (See also Fabricius, B.D. Gr. viii. 332, x. 232, ed. Harsy. Found are the first part of the Liber de Simeon Metaphrases, the Latin of which may be seen in Suris (de Prob. Hist. SS. Nov. p. 487), Latin and Greek in Patr. Gr. cxxv. 189. The brief entry of Gregory under Nov. 23 in the Menologium Graecorum of Suriel (Canisius, Theaur. ii. 490), assigns his birth to the reign of Justinian; while the Menologium of Basil, Nov. 24, puts it under Justinianus Rhinometus, i.e. 685-711.

Finally it should be noticed that Pirri (at sup.) gives a Gregory IV. of Aegregintum, citing as his authority a note by Baronius under Nov. 23 of the Roman Martyrology edited by him in 1610. This note is to the effect that the signature of a Gregory of Aegregintum is attached to the synodal of pope Agatho at Rome in 680, and must belong to a bishop later than the commentator. But Morelli points out that Baronius here has simply misread his document, since the word in every copy, without a single various reading, is not Gregory but George (Giosforus (22)); (see Mans, i. 305 a). Gregory IV. of Aegregintum therefore disappears as well as Gregory III. [C. H.] GREGORIUS (34), bishop of Rhinocorura (Fairna) on the frontier of Egypt and Palestine. He is mentioned by Metaphrastes in his life of St. Joannes Eleemosynarius (cap. 1, Patr. Gr. cxix. 901), as being sent c. A.D. 610 by that patriarch to relieve and ransom the Christians who had been seized by the Persians in the invasion of Chersones. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 543.)

[J. de S.]

GREGORIUS (35), bishop of Osma, from a little before 610. He signs the acts of the so-called synod of Carthaginians bishops at Toledo, A.D. 610. [GUNTINAR.] (Aguirre-Catalani, ii. 322; Exp. Sapr. vii. 285.) [M. A. W.]

GREGORIUS (36) IV., supposed bishop of Agrigentum, in 680. [GREGORIUS (33), GEOBRIUS (22).]

GREGORIUS (37), bishop of Crete (nr. Almagon) from 681 to about 690. His signature is 15th among forty-eight at the 13th council of Toledo, 683. He also appeared at the fourteenth and fifteenth councils, A.D. 684-688. (Aguuir-Catalani, iv. 287, 304, 313; Exp. Sapr. vii. 271.) [AUDONIUS.] [M. A. W.]

GREGORIUS (38), the name of several bishops present at the councils of 680 and 692 at Constantinople, viz. of—

Arce in Lesser Armenia, 680 (Mansi, xi. 676; Le Quien, O. C. i. 448).

Azani in Phrygia, 682 (M. 1001; O. C. i. 800).

Caesarea in Asia, 692 (M. 994 a, Greek ἐναυσιν τής Παλατίνης πόλεως. Mansi suggests Σαλέντιον in the Hellespont).

Callo, in the valley of Castrum, 692 (M. 993 c; O. C. i. 725).

Cantanz in Crete, 680 (M. 317, 614 c; O. C. i. 274).

Evan or Theodosiopolis in Asia, 692 (M. 992 c; O. C. i. 313).

Julius in Caria, 692 (M. 995 b, Greek, Georgius in Latin).

Mitylene, 680 (M. 614 c, 693; O. C. i. 856).

Naxos, 680 (M. 615 d, Gregorius in the Latin, Georgius in Greek).

Talos or Galatia, 692 (M. 995 a; O. C. i. 474).

Triocla in Sicily, 680 (Pirri, Sicil. Soc. i. 490). Mansi has Georgius. [GEOBRIUS (23).]

GREGORIUS (29), bishop of Ostia c. 707. The date is fixed by a document containing a privilege granted by John VII. to the monastery of Subiaco. Besides his bishopric, he was “sanctae sedis bibliothecarius et cancellarius.” (Ugellii, Ital. Soc. i. 64; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Ital. i. 445.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (40), bishop of Pavia at the beginning of the 8th century. He is mentioned by Landulf (Muratori, Scriptores, iv. 76) in a complaint addressed to pope Constantine by Benedict, archbishop of Milan, on the subject of his right of consecration to the see of Pavia.

[A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (41), supposed bishop of Tergeste (Trieste) between 715 and 731. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Ital. viii. 681.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (42), bishop of Angri, present at the synod of Rome in 721, under Gregory II. (Mansi, xii. 265; Hefele, § 330.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (43), bishop of Porto, present at the Roman synods of 743 and 745. In 743 another Gregorius appears as Orberentanu. (Mansi, xiii. 363, 380; Hefele, §§ 384, 397.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (44), bishop of Silva Candida, present at the Lateran synod in 769 (Mansi, xii. 714; Hefele, § 343). He also signed a letter of pope Paul I. in June 761 to the abbot John, (Mansi, xiii. 649; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 195.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (45), St., archbishop of Salamis (Constantia) in the island of Cyprus, commemorated in the Menaea on March 5 (Basil. Men., in Migne, Patro. Graec. cxxvii.). He is perhaps to be identified with GEOBRIUS (30), bishop of the see, who was a strong opponent of the Iconoclastic emperor Constantine Cae- gnymus. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 594; Bull. Acta SS. Mart. i. 395.) [L. D.]

GREGORIUS of Praeneste. [GEOBRIUS (32).]

GREGORIUS (46), bishop of Pessinus, the metropolis of Galatia Secunda. He subscribed the condemnation of images by the council of Constantinople of A.D. 754. For this he was called to account at the council of Nicaea, A.D. 787, when he recanted, expressed his regret for what he had done, and subscribed the decrees of that assembly. (Mansi, xii. 729 a, 825 b, 731 b.)

[By E. D.]

GREGORIUS (47) II., bishop of Noecaenaeus, present at the council of Nicaea, 787, where is the sixth session he cites the acts of the Constantinopolitan council of 734 against image worship, Epiphanius the deacon refuting them by a clause through the session (Mansi, xiii. 207, 362 d; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 504). It is stated in the Acta Gratiani (xiii. 613) that Gregory of Noecaenaeus, theodosius of Ephesus, and Theodorus of Perga were the head of the bishops who met at Constantinople in 754. But this must be a mistake as regards Gregory. Theophanes mentions only Theodosius of Ephesus and Passilarius of Perga (Theoph. Chronog. a.C. 745, p. 355 in Patr. Gr. cxxvi. 892). The Acts of the council of 754 are lost, except in so far as they are cited in the sixth session of Nicaea as just stated, and in those proceedings Gregorius is always mentioned with the epithet θεοφιλής.

[C. H.]

GREGORIUS (48), the name of several bishops present at the third council of Nicaea in 787, viz. of—

Amastris (Sassamis) in Paphlagonia (Mansi, xii. 1099 c, xiii. 145 d; Le Quien, O. C. i. 563). He is thought to have been also called Georgius. [GEOBRIUS (4C).]

Basilinopolis (M. xiii. 146 a, Latin; Georgius in the Greek). [GEOBRIUS (29)].

Chibra in Caria (M. xii. 1106; O. C. i. 994), not Georgius of Libya as in the Latin of M. xii. 1105 b.

Delceu (Delcos, Deren) in Thrace (M. xii. 995, 1099 c; O. C. i. 1163).

Euchanias (Theodorolopis) in Thrace (M. xii. 1099 b; O. C. i. 1143).
GREGORIUS—BISHOPS

Gorgius (M. xii. 1102 d, Greek; Georgius in the Latin). [Georgiius (97)].
Hercules Latini in Caria (M. xii. 1106 c, xiii. 147 b; O. C. i. 906).
Mylassa in Caria (M. xii. 1006, xiii. 147 b; O. C. i. 922).
Nisa (M. xii. 1104 c, Latin; Georgius in Greek). [Georgiius (37)].
Palaepolis in Asia (M. xii. 1098 c; O. C. i. 731).
Sinope (M. xii. 145 c; O. C. i. 539).
Stratonicia (Hadrianopolis) in Caria (M. xii. 998, xiii. 148 b; O. C. i. 912).
Temenothyrae in Phrygia Pacatiana (M. xii. 1106 c, xiii. 147 c; O. C. i. 808).

[G. H.]

GREGORIUS II. OF OSTIA. [Georgiius (95)].

GREGORIUS OF AMIENS. [Georgiius (41)].

GREGORIUS (49), tenth bishop of Nismes, between Casatus and Cosatus and Vincterus, towards the close of the 9th century. His name is said to appear in an ancient breviary and other MSS. of that church. [Gall. Christ. vi. 450; Gams, S. Eccl. Episc. 586].

[S. A. B.]

GREGORIUS (50), created first bishop of Mantua by Leo III. c. 804 or 808, and succeeded by Eufulfus, 823. [Ugelli, Ital. Sac. i. 928; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xii. 18].

[R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (51) I. (called the Great), bishop of Rome from Sept. 3, A.D. 590, to March 12, A.D. 604, between thirteen and fourteen years. He was born at Rome, probably about the year 540, of a wealthy senatorial family, pope Felix II. (or III.) being said to have been his great-grandfather. The family was a religious one. His mother Silvia, and Turricula and Acemilia, the two sisters of his father Gordianus, have been canonized. Under such influences his education is spoken of by his biographer, John the deacon, as having been that of a saint among saints. His intellectual seems not to have fallen short of his moral and religious training. Gregory of Tours, his contemporary, says that in grammar, rhetoric, and logic, he was thought to be second to none in Rome. He was a man of rank and wealth, and prospects he studied law, distinguished himself in the senate, and at an early age (certainly before 573, when he would be little more than thirty years old) was recommended by the emperor Justin II. for the post of praetor urbis. The silk attire, the glittering gems, and the purple-striped robes, with which he walked at this period through the streets of Rome, recurred afterwards to the memory of observers, as in striking contrast to the ecclesiastical garb so soon assumed (Greg. Tur. b. 3). For after a public career of credit, it was not long before the religious ideas of his age, with which he was thoroughly imbued, suggested to him the pursuit of a higher vocation; and on his father's death he resolved to himself but a short time, that the wealth which came to him, employing the rest in charitable uses, and especially in founding monasteries, of which he endowed six in Sicily, and one, dedicated to St. Andrew, on the site of his own house, near the church of SS. John and Paul, at Rome. Here he himself became a monk. The date of this, his first retirement from the world, and its duration, are uncertain; as are also the exact dates of subsequent events previous to his ascension to the see of Rome. What appears to be the most probable order of events will be given. During his sojourn in the desert his asceticism is said to have been such as to endanger his life; had he not been prevailed on by friends to abate its rigour, and in may have partly laid the foundation of the bodily health from which he afterwards suffered. Gregory Turenensis at one time slept on his stomach at this time being so enwrapped by fast and vigil that he could hardly stand. His saintly aspirations were interrupted by the pope, Benedict IV., who, having ordained him as one of the seven deacons (regional) of Rome, sent him to his episcopalsee at Constantinople, being employed in the capacity of ambassador to Constantinople, being employed in the capacity of ambassador to the court of the emperor. He was consecrated as bishop of Constantinople. In the meantime Pope Benedict II. was succeeded by his successor, Pelagius II., who, having been consecrated before the customary confirmation of his election by the emperor had been obtained, sent a nuncio to Constantnople to excite the emperor's anger, and at the time to solicit aid against the Lombards. A letter from the pope is recorded three years after the death of the imperial city. Two noteworthy circumstances are recorded during this stay in Constantineopolis. The first is his controversy with Eutychius, the patriarch, about the nature of the body at the resurrection. Eutychius had written a book in which he maintained that the risen body would be of an immutable kind, subtle as air. Gregory opposed, urging the palpability of the risen body of Christ. The dispute was terminated by the intervention of the emperor Tiberius, who, having heard the two disputants, decided that Gregory had the best of the argument, and ordered the patriarch's trinity to be burnt (John. Dan. vii. 10). John the Deacon adds that the disputants were so enchanted by the long discussion that both had to take to their beds at its close.

The second memorable incident of this period was the commencement at the instigation of Leander, bishop of Seville, who was then at Constantinople, of the famous work called Magna Moralia, of which some account will be given afterwards. Recalled by Pope Benedict to Rome, he was allowed, at his own earnest request, to return to his monastery, where he hoped to pass the remainder of his days, but was still employed as the pope's secretary. During the period of his renewed monastic life, and in his capacity of abbot (to which office he was chosen on the appointment of the previous abbot Maximianus to the see of Syracuse, though whether before or after his stay at Constantinople is uncertain), he was distinguished alike for the strictness of his own life and for the rigour of his discipline. One story which he tells himself leaves the impression of zeal in this regard carried to the extent of almost inhuman hardship. A monk, Julius, who had been a physician, and who had attended Gregory himself, night and day, during a long illness, being himself dangerously ill, confided to a brother that, in violation of monastic rule, he had three pieces of gold concealed in his cell. This confession was overheard, the cell was searched, and the pieces found. Gregory, being made aware of the fact, forbade all to approach the offender, even in the agonies of death, and after death caused his body to be thrown on a dunghill, and with it the pieces of gold, the monks crying aloud, "Thy money perish with thee." (Greg. Dial. lib. iv. c. 55.)

On Feb. 8, 590, pope Pelagius died. The city of Rome was in great mourning at the time. Without the gates the Lombards ravaged the country and threatened the city, aid being craved in vain from the distant emperor; within famine and plague were raging. Such, at a time like this, was the general recognition of Gregory's merits that he was at once unanimously chosen by senate, clergy, and people to succeed Pelagius. To-day his election was distressing. He at once wrote to the emperor Mauricius (who had succeeded Tiberius in 582) imploring him not to confirm the election. His letter was intercepted by the praefect of Rome, and another sent in its place, in the name of the senate, clergy, and people, earnestly reiterating his objections. It was during the interval before the reply of the emperor reached Rome, that Gregory, in addition to his excitement of the people to repentance by his sermons, instituted the famous processional litany, called Litania septiformis, in connexion with which the story about the origin of the name of the castle of St. Angelo is told; viz. that as the monument of Hadrian was approached in a concluding processional peregrination of the city, Gregory saw on its summit an angel sheathing his sword in token that the plague was staid. At length an answer came from the emperor, confirming the election of Gregory. He still shrank from the proffered dignity, fled the city in disguise, escaping the guards set to watch the gates, and hid himself in a forest cave. Soon discovered, by means it was said of a supernatural light, he was brought back in triumph, conducted to the church of St. Peter, and immediately ordained on Sept. 3, 590, the see having been vacant since Feb. 8 in the same year (Anastas. Bibliothec. and Martyriol. Roman.). Though the sincerity of many others, in that age and afterwards, who, to avoid the temporal dignity by flight, may well be doubted, there is not the least reason for disputing the reality of the feeling in Gregory's case, arising from his devotion to the monastic life, and a fear (as he himself expresses it) lest "the worldly glory which he had cast away might creep on him under the colour of ecclesiastical government." Subsequently to his ordination he ceased not to lament in his letters and other writings the manifold burdens, anxieties, and temptations of his high office, and to look back with regret to the safer quiet of his former monastic life. (Cf. Ep. i. 5; Ep. ad Leandrum, Lib. de Cur. Pastor, &c.)

After his accession, he continued in heart a monk, surrounding himself with ecclesiastics instead of laymen, and living with them according to monastic rule. In accordance with this plan a synodal decree was made under him in 595, substituting clergy or monks for the boys and secular persons who had formerly waited on the pope in his chamber (Ep. iv. 44). Yet he rose at once to his new position. The period, as has been said, was a great one for him, as the times were the most disturbed and disorganized of the time. The fires of controversy that had for the last two centuries inflamed them were not yet extinct; they still raged in the East. In Istria and Gaul the schism consequent on the question of the three chapters continued. In Africa the Donasts had begun once more to oppress themselves aggressively against the Catholics. Spain had but just, and as yet imperfectly, been recovered from Ariusim. In Gaul the church was oppressed under its barbarian rulers. In Italy the ferocious Arian Lombards had destroyed churches and monasteries, slain ecclesiastics, violated consecrated virgins, and wasted the country. The clergy were in great danger. The demoralization of the ecclesiastics was in some sort the result of a declining civilization in the West. The monastic system which had taken such a wonderful hold on Christendom during the preceding age, was suffering the usual declension from the arduous of a first love, and was now notoriously corrupt. Literature and learning, crushed under the protracted struggle with barbarian hordes, had almost ceased with Boethius; and all such causes, combined with the temporal calamities and perils of the age, were such as to lead to a prevalent belief, which Gregory shared in and often expressed, that the end of all things was at hand. Nor was the position of the papacy encouraging to one who like Gregory took a high view of the prerogatives of St. Peter's chair. For since the re-conquest of Italy by Justinian (after the capture of Rome by Belisarius in 536) the popes had been far less independent than even under the Gothic kings. This prince had treated the bishops of Rome as his predecessors had long treated the Eastern patriarchs, regarding them as his creatures, to be appointed, summoned to court and deposed at his pleasure, and subject to the commands of his exarch at Ravenna; and no reigns of popes had been so inglorious as those of Gregory's immediate predecessors, Vigilius, Pelagius I, Benedict, and Pelagius II. His own description of the Roman church at this time was that it was "like an old and violently shattered ship, admitting the waters on all sides, its timbers rotten, shaken by daily storms, and surrounded by wrecks." (Athen. xil. 1.)

We may best obtain a view of the way in which this great pope acquitted himself as pilot of St. Peter's shattered bark, if we review his operations under separate heads, without strict regard to the chronological sequence of events. He will be regarded, first, as a spiritual ruler; secondly, as a temporal administrator and potentate; and lastly, as to his personal character, and as a doctor of the church.

I. Immediately after his accession he set, according to custom, a confession of his faith to the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, in which he declared his reception of the four first general councils, as of the four gospels, and his condemnation of the three chapters; i.e. the writings of three deposed prelates, Theodorus, Theodore, and Ibas, supposed to favour of heresy, and already condemned by the emperor Justinian, and by the fifth council called oecumenical. The strong language in which he exalts the authority of the four councils in this confession, as "the square stone on which rests the structure of the faith, the rule of every man's actions and life, which foundation, as it were, does not move from the ground of the building," is significant of his views on the authority of the church at large, while his recognition of the four patriarchs as co-ordinate potentates, to whom he sends an account of his own faith, expresses one aspect of the position in relation to the Eastern churches which then satisfied the Roman pontiffs.

He lost no time in taking measures for the restoration of discipline, the reform of abuses, the repression of heresy, and the establishment of the authority of the Roman see, both in his own metropolitan province, and wherever his influence or his definite jurisdiction belonged to the bishop of Rome since the political divisions of the Empire had been reproduced in the metropolitan constitution of the church was threefold; episcopal, metropolitan, and patriarchal. As bishop he had the oversight of the city of Rome; as metropolitan he had the superintendence of the seven suffragans, afterwards called cardinal, bishops of the Roman territory, those of Ostia, Portus, Silva Candida, Sabina, Praeneste, Tusculum, and Albanum; while his patriarchate seems to have originally extended (according to Rufinus, H. E. l. [x.] 6) over the suburban provinces which were under the civil jurisdiction of the vicarius, urbs, in civitate. This is especially true of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica. But being the only patriarch in the West, he had in fact claimed and exercised jurisdiction as such beyond these original limits, including in his sway all the four vicariates into which the praefecture of Italy was politically divided; not that of Rome only, but those also of northern Italy, with its centre at his capital, and in particular at Aquileia, Sirmium, and Western Africa, with its capital at Carthage. Further, before the time of Gregory's accession, a still wider authority had been claimed and in part acknowledged. As bishops of the old imperial city, with an acknowledged primacy of honour among the patriarchs, still more as occupants of St. Peter's chair and conservators of his documen, he continued to exercise a more or less defined jurisdiction over them all. The power of sending judges to hear on the spot the appeals of condemned bishops, which had been accorded to pope Julius by the Western council of Sardes in 343, had been claimed by his successors as perpetually belonging to the Roman see, and extended so as to involve the summoning of cases to be heard at Rome; and a law had been obtained by Leo I. from the emperor Valentinian (445) by which the pope was made supreme head of the whole Western church, with the power of summoning prelates from all provinces to abide his judgment. On the assumption of such authority Gregory acted, it being one of his fixed principles to abide none of the rights claimed by his predecessors, though scrupulous in respecting and maintaining the existing power of metropolitanos, and though in countries under barbarian rulers, when circumstances did not allow the full assertion of his claims, he was wary, and adroit in his proceedings. Of his relation to the Eastern church something will be said hereafter. Instances will first be given of his measures in the West.

In the year of his accession (590) he endeavoured, though without result, to bring over the I�rian bishops, who still refused to condemn the three chapters, and to whom, during the pontificate of Pelagius, in his name as his secretary, he had addressed letters on the subject. With this view he appointed a council to meet at Rome, and obtained an order from the emperor for the attendance of these bishops. They, however, petitioned for exemption, saying that their faith was the same that had been formerly taught them by pope Vigilius, protesting against submission to the bishop of Rome as their judge, and pleading the state of Italy as a reason for granting them. They disparaged the emperor, as in due time they were prepared to do, of the purity of their faith. The emperor countermanded the order, and Gregory acquiesced. (The letters are given by Baronius, ad ann. 590.) His acquiescence in this case is an early instance of what will appear more distinctly in other cases, his habit of submission to imperial authority, when remonstrance was unavailing.

In the following year (591) his orthodox zeal was directed with more success against the African Donatists. This sect, which had in former days been the object of much persecution, continued to flourish alongside with the Catholics, and lately without conflict or disturbance. It was the custom in those times for the bishops of North Africa to send to the emperor or bishop, whatever his see, to exercise metropolitan authority over the other bishops. Such senior now happened to be a Donatist, and he assumed the customary authority. Gregory therefore wrote to the Catholic bishops of Numidia, and to Genadius, exarch of Africa, urging them to resist and put an end to the assertion of such a claim, and the letter which in his latter (couched, as was Gregory's habit in addressing temporal potentates, in complimentary language) intimating pretty plainly his desire that active measures should be taken to suppress the Donatists (Ep. i. 74, 75). He succeeded so far as this, that the Donatist bishop was deposed from his assumed position, but the church itself, although Christianity. It may here be observed that this is not the only instance of Gregory, like others of his age, not being averse to persecution as a means of conversion. In Sicily he enjoined rigorous measures (summopere persequei) for the recovery of the Manichaean to the church (Ep. iv. 8); there, and in Corsica, Sardinia, and Campania, the heathen peasants and slaves on the papal estates were by his order compelled to conform, not only by exactions on such as refused, but also by the imprisonment of freemen, and the corporal castigation ("verbolus et cruciatus") of slaves (Ep. iii. 28; vii. Ind. 2, 67), and in France he exhorted Queen Brunichild to similar measures of coercion (Ep. vii. 5).

On the other hand, there are three letters of his, written in the same year with those about the African Donatists, which evince a spirit of unusual toleration towards the Jews. They are addressed to three bishops, Peter of Tarracina, Virgilius of Arles, and Theodorus of Marseilles, of whom the first had driven the Jews from their synagogues, and the two last had expelled a number of conversions by offering them the choice of baptism or exile. In these letters he strongly condemns such proceedings, "because conversions wrought by force are never sincere, and such as are thus converted seldom fail to return to their vomit when the force is removed." (Ep. i. 34, 45; cf. Ep. vii. ind.)
GREGORIUS I.—Pope

1, 26. vii. ind. 2, 5, vii. 2, 59.) Still, though in these instances adverse to forcing them into the fold by persecution, he had no objection to luring them by the prospect of advantage; for in a letter to a deacon Cyprian, who was steward of the papal patrimony in Sicily, he directs him to offer to the Jews a remission of one-third of the taxes due to the Roman church on condition of their becoming Christians, saying, in justification, that though the conversions thus effected might be insincere, yet the children of the converts would be brought up in the bosom of the church (Ep. iv. 6. cf. Ep. xii. 30). In such apparent inconsistencies we may detect the good sense and Christian benevolence of the man in conflict with the impulses of zeal and the notions of his age.

He was no less active, from the very beginning of his reign, in reforming the church itself than in labouring for the conversion of heretics, heathens, and Jews. Mention has already been made of the laxity at that time prevalent among the monks, of which the life of the contemporary Benedict, founded under the Benedictine order, affords ample evidence. [BENEDICT.] Several of Gregory's letters are addressed to monks who had left their monasteries for the conversion of heretics, heathens, and Jews. Mention has already been made of the laxity at that time prevalent among the monks, of which the life of the contemporary Benedict, founded under the Benedictine order, affords ample evidence. [BENEDICT.] Several of Gregory's letters are addressed to monks who had left their monasteries for the conversion of heretics, heathens, and Jews. Mention has already been made of the laxity at that time prevalent among the monks, of which the life of the contemporary Benedict, founded under the Benedictine order, affords ample evidence.

[Gregory also refers to the case of a certain nun named Augustine in banishing from their houses even such female relatives as the canons allow (Ep. vii. ind. 2, 39; xi. 42, 43). In Sicily the obligation to celibacy had, in the year 588, been extended to subdeacons. This rule he upheld by directing the bishops to require a vow of celibacy from all who should in future be ordained subdeacons, but acknowledging its hardship as such as to have made no such vow on their ordination, he contented himself with forbidding the advancement to the diaconate of existing subdeacons who had continued conjugal intercourse after the introduction of the rule (Ep. i. ind. ix. 42).]

He also set himself resolutely against the prevalent practice of simony, forbidding all bishops and clergy to exact or accept fee or reward for the functions of their office; and he set the example himself by refusing the annual presents which it had been customary for the bishops of Rome to receive from their suffragans, or payment for the pallium sent to metropolitanas. Acceptance of payment for the pallium was also forbidden to all future popes by a Roman synod in 595.

In the year 592 began a struggle in reference to discipline with certain bishops of Thessaly and Dalmatia, in the province of Illyricum, where, though dealing with a province long subjected to the jurisdiction of Rome, he encountered, in one instance, resistance, as some of his predecessors had done. Hadrianus of Thessalonica had been deposed by a provincial synod under his metropolitan the bishop of Larissa, and the sentence had been confirmed by John of Justinianus Prima, the primate of Illyricum, to whom the emperor Mauritius, appealed to by Hadrianus, had referred the matter. The deposed prelate now appealed to Gregory, who, after examining the whole case, declared the proceedings null, as being uncanonical, absolved the appellant, exempted him in future from the jurisdiction of his metropolitan, and, as to John the primate, ordered him to reinstate Hadrianus, at the same time communicating him for thirty days, and threatening severer measures in case of disobedience to the authority of the prince of the apostles (Ep. ii. ind. xi. 6, 7).
the same year (592) he ordered Natalis, bishop of Salona in Dalmatia, and metropolitan, under pain of excommunication and eventual deposition, to reinstate his archdeacon Honoratus whom he had deposed (Ep. ii. ind. x. 14, 15, 16). In both these instances he appears to have been obeyed. Not so, however, in the case of Maximus, who succeeded Natalis as bishop of Salona and metropolitan in the same year. Maximus had also been accused of oppressing the alms- for sale archdeacon Honoratus, who had been recommended by Gregory, was alleged to be a man of scandalous life, and to have obtained his election by bribes. Gregory accordingly disallowed it, and wrote at the same time to the clergy of Salona forbidding them to choose a bishop without the knowledge and consent of the apostolic see. In the meantime the emperor had confirmed the election. Learning this, Gregory wrote to suspend Maximus and his ordinaries till such time as he should be assured of the alleged imperial confirmation, and summoned him to Rome to give an account of himself. The suspension and summons were disregarded, and Maximus was empier who, instead of obeying the pope, gave no further trouble to the bishop of Salona. Gregory now wrote to the emperor in a tone of earnest remonstrance, though with his customary deference to imperial authority, saying that he would rather die than suffer any diminution of the authority of St. Peter's see through his own indecision or neglect. But his remonstrance proving vain, he acquiesced for the present. Soon after, he again summoned Maximus to Rome on the ground of new charges brought against him of simony, sacrilege, and other crimes. He wrote also to Constantinople, this time to the empress, informing her of the state of things in a long complaining letter. Maximus again treated the summons with contempt, alleging as before that, if his conduct called for inquiry, it was on the spot and not at Rome, where, according to the canons, the inquiry should be made, and forwarded to Constantinople counter accusations against Gregory, from which the latter wrote to justify himself. After protracted negotiations, the emperor, after eight years, of which seventeen letters were written by Greg- ory, the emperor finally committed the settlement of the dispute to Maximianus, bishop of Ravenna, and the result was that Maximus, having publicly begged pardon of the pope, and cleared himself from the charge of simony by an oath of purgation at the tomb of St. Apollinaris, was at last acknowledged as lawful bishop of Salona (Ep. iii. ind. xii. 15, 20; iv. ind. xii. 34; v. ind. xiv. 3; vi. ind. xv. 17; vii. ind. i. 1; vii. ind. ii. 81, 82, 83).

In countries of the West beyond the limits of the empire, no less than within those limits, he lost no opportunity of extending the influence of the Roman see, and of advancing and consolidating the church. Remember, the Visigothic king of Spain, having renounced Arianism for Catholicism at the council of Toledo in 589, the year before Gregory's accession, he received intelligence of this event from Leander, bishop of Seville, whose intimate acquaintance (as has been already said) he had made during his stay at Constantinople. There are three very affectionate letters from Gregory to this prelate, in which, from the midst of distracting cares of office, and of suffering from gout, to which it appears that Leander also had been a victim, he expresses unbounded joy, and exhorts his friend to watch over the royal convert. In one of these letters he replies to a question as to single or triple immersion in baptism. Three immersions were the practice of the Roman church, regarded as symbols (sacraments, according to the expression of Gregory) of the three days in the grave, or of the Trinity. The same had been the practice of the Arians in Spain, but not of the orthodox, who had hitherto immersed once only, by way of expressing the consubstantial unity of the Godhead. Gregory, with characteristic judgment, recommends, under the circumstances, the retention of single immersion, notwithstanding the difference of the Roman rite. He also sent Leander a pall, accompanied by the blessing of St. Peter, to be used at mass only. He wrote also to Reccared in a tone of warm congratulation, exhorting him to humility, chastity, and mercy; thanking for presents received, and sending in return a key from the house of St. Peter in which he himself had worn it on his neck. Gregory writes of iron from the chain that had bound him, and a cross containing a piece of the true cross, and some hairs of John the Baptist (Canones Eccles. Hispan.).

It is to be remarked that there is no distinct assumption in these letters of jurisdiction over the Spanish church, and that this was the only known instance of a pall having been sent to Spain previously to the Saracen invasion. The ancient Spanish church does not seem to have been noted for its dependence on the Roman see (see Geddes, Tracts, vol. ii. pp. 25, 49; Gieseler, Eccles. Hist., vol. ii. p. 188).

With the Frank rulers of Gaul he carefully cultivated friendly relations, and through them endeavoured to effect his purpose. In 595, at the request of king Childeric, he conferred the pall on Virgilius of Arles, the ancient metropolitan see, whose bishop pope Zosimus had confirmed in his metropolitan right, and made him vicar coaeval as early as 417. He wrote also to Vir- gilius, enjoining the repression of simony and other abuses, and to the empress, enjoining submission to their metropolitan (Ep. iv. indict. xiii. 51, 52). To Severus, bishop of Mar- seilles, he wrote an often quoted letter, blaming him for having destroyed church pictures in his indiscreet zeal against their abuse. "Pictures," said the pope on this occasion, anticipating the position taken by his successors in the subsequent iconoclastic controversy, "are to the unlearned what books are to the learned" (Ep. ii. ind. iii. 111). Not long after he began a correspondence with Queen Brunehild, in the course of which he again and again exhorts her to use her power for the correction of the vices of the clergy and the conversion of the heathen, writing in the complimentary style usual with him in addressing potentates, but which, in this case, jars strangely with the character of the lady addressed. Another royal female correspondent, cultivated and flattered with a similar purpose, and one more worthy of the praise conferred, was Theodelinda, the Lombard queen. To the year 599 is assigned the extensive conversion of the Lombards to Catholicism, brought about after the death of king Anthar through the marriage of this Theodelinda, his widow, with Agilulph, duke of Turin, and the consequent elevation of the latter to the throne. The queen, a daughter of Gisulf, king of the Bavarians, being a zealous Catholic, influenced her husband the Arian Franks and his court. It is said to have been followed by that of the majority of his subjects, by the rebuilding of churches and monasteries, and the restoration of Catholic bishops to their sees. With this pious lady Gregory kept up a highly complimentary correspondence, sending her on one occasion a copy of his homilies, together with some of his last acts to write to her from his death-bed on the occasion of the birth and baptism of her son Adalaoaldus, and in reference to a theological question on which she desired enlightenment.

Over the church in Ireland also, which in the time of Gregory was bound by no close tie of allegiance to the see of Rome, he endeavoured to extend his influence. In the year 592 he wrote a long letter to the bishops of that country in reply to one, no longer extant, which he had received from them, in which they appear to have spoken of some persecution under which they suffered, to have maintained against the pope their continued acceptance of the three chapters, and to have attributed the Lombard invaders to Jewish incitement rather than divine judgment, and finally sends them the letters which he had addressed to the bishops of Istria on the subject of the three chapters (Ep. ii. ind. x. 36). Though Baronius assumes that the Irish were thus reconciled to orthodoxy, the contrary appears from a letter of St. Columban to pope Boniface IV. in 614 (first published by Archbishop Usher), in which he strongly blames that pope for continuing to condemn the chapters, and, by an ironical vein, cautions him not to forget the claim, superciliously insisted on (as all knew) by the pope, to be the keepers of the keys of the kingdom of heaven. The same saint, writing from Burgundy, had previously defended the Irish computation of Easter with equal boldness, and in the same tone of irony that marks his letter to Boniface, against Gregory the Great himself, among other things telling him (in reference to the authority of previous popes being adduced in support of the Roman usage) that a living dog was better than a dead lion, and reminding him of the universal resistance of the Easterns to pope Victor on the earlier Easter question (see Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. div. ii. ch. vi. iii. § 126). There is also among the letters of Gregory a long one to Quiricus, and other Catholic bishops of Iberia, in reply to a request for advice, in which it is directed that Nestorian heretics having been baptized in the name of the Trinity are not to be rebaptized on their reception into the church, and the conditions of their reception are laid down (Epp. lib. ix. i. 4. iv. ep. 68).

Gregory was well acquainted with thus influencing, consolidating, and reforming the existing churches throughout the Western world; he was also a zealous missionary, and as such the founder of our English, as distinct from the more ancient British, Christianity. Before his accession to the popedom, some time during the reign of Pelagius, he incurred, according to the famous incident in the torun of Rome, which is thus related. Observing there one day some boys with fair skin, comely faces, and bright flowing hair, exposed for sale as slaves, he asked whence they came. Being told "from Britain," he inquired whether the inhabitants of that island were Christians or pagans. Learning that they were pagans, he showed them some of his written works, and told them that, if they repented, he would allow them to believe what they wished. One of them, a young chaste, asked, "Alas, that men of such local countenance should be possessed by the author of darkness, and that such grace of form should hide minds void of grace within?" Being told further in answer to his inquiries that they were called Angli, "Well so called," said he, "for they have angelic faces, and should be coheirs in heaven with angels." What is the name of the province from which they come?" Being told that they were called Deirii, "Right again," was his reply, "de ira Dei erutti, et ad misericordiam Christi vocati." Lastly, on hearing that the king of that province was called Aella, he exclaimed, "Alleluia! the praises of God the Creator must be sung in those parts." After this he had, we are told, set out in person, together with a few monks of his convent, in order to preach in Britain; but had been brought back to Rome, at the instance of the people, by order of the pope. It was not till the year 597, the eighth of his pontificate, that the thought so long entertained was carried into effect by the mission of Augustine. An account of this memorable mission will be found under Augustinian. Only such incidents will here be mentioned as serve to illustrate the character and policy of Gregory. Circumstances were now favourable. His previous intercourse with the ruling powers of Gaul favoured the speeding of the mission through that kingdom; and the recent marriage of Ethelbert king of Kent with Bertha daughter of King Chilperic of Paris, in which the exercise of her religion had been stipulated, and who had already her church and priest at Canterbury, afforded a home and centre for the mission, with the inestimable advantage (such as Gregory was always alive to) of the aid and influence of a Christian queen. Augustine and other monks of St. Andrew's monastery were accordingly sent in 597, Augustine being designed as bishop, should the mission succeed. Arrived in Gaul, they turned faint-hearted, and Augustine returned to Rome to beg exemption from the dangerous enterprise. Gregory required him to proceed, and sent him back with letters of encouragement to his fellow missionaries, and commendatory ones to Virgilius of Arles and other Gallican bishops, as well as to the kings Theodore and Theodobert of the Franks, contained in eleven letters in all. After the well-known successful issue of the mission in Kent, the baptism of King Ethelbert, and the consecration of Augustine (according to Gregory's original intention in the event of success) by the bishop of Arles, the cheering news was sent through Laurentius the presbyter and Peter the monk to Rome, and at the same time written letters requested to the bishops of Gaul regarding questions on points about which Augustine was in doubt. The replies sent by Gregory to these questions erinse great judgment and enlightenment. The following is an abstract of the most important. Celsibility and coenobitic life, though imposed on persons in holy orders, are not to be insisted on for other clerics; natives who before conversion had married brothers' wives, are not to be on that account to be debarred communion;
however sinful such connexions for persons already Christians; a variety of fancied causes of impurification; though the monks of St. Mary at Carmel had felt scruples, are not to be preclude people from church and communion, some being natural and unavoidable, others falling under no positive law of prohibition, though at the same time persons are not blamed who on such grounds, out of reverence, absent themselves from sacred rites; the presence of three bishops at the consecration of a new one, though proper and in all cases desirable, may be dispensed with where it cannot be had; all assumption of authority over the Gallican church, or interference with the ancient rights of the metropolitan of Arles, is forbidden, though over all bishops in British jurisdiction is assigned; and lastly, the usages of church and church discipline, there, though differing from those of the Roman church, are to be freely adopted if in themselves desirable, since (says this enlightened pope) things are to be loved for places, but places for the good things found in them. Gregory also wrote to the bishop of Arles, desiring him, if requested, to assist Augustine, and to the latter sent a new band of assistants, including Justus, Paulinus, and Rufinius, together with sacred vessels, vestments, ornaments for churches, relics, and books. He further fortified him in his authority by sending him the pallium, and sketched a plan for the organization of the English church, according to which there were to be two metropolitan sees, each with twelve suffragan bishops, at London and York, of which York was to be subject to London during Augustine's life, but independent after his death, while to him were also subjected all the existing British clergy, as well as such as should be ordained by him or his coadjutors. Afterwards to the abbott Mellitus, whom he had sent to Britain, he addressed a letter, in which he sets forth the importance of the heathen temples and heathen usages. Idols were to be destroyed, but temples preserved and devoted to Christian worship, that so the people might more willingly renounce their errors, res-sorting to the worship of the true God in their accustomed places. Similarly sacrificial feasts were to be changed into church festivals, holiday being still kept round the old fames, and the same banquets enjoyed as of old, only in honour of God instead of the service of demons. The introduction into the Mosaic ritual, and the consecration to God's service, of sacrifices to which the people had been used in Egypt, is adduced as a sanction for this system of accommodation to ancient prejudices. Another letter to Augustine himself lays claim to the greatest elation on the ground of the miracles wrought by him, the reality of which is not questioned. One to King Ethelbert exhorts him to perseverance in his new faith, and to exertions for the extirpation of heathenism, and tells him of the imminence of the end of the world, and of the importance of securing to himself the advantage of Augustine's prayers. In another to Bertha the queen, she is complimented on her own right faith and literary attainments, which she is exhorted to make available in behalf of the king. What has been related may suffice for shewing the unwavering zeal, the Christian temper, and the fine judgment with which Gregory instituted and superintended this important mission. Its final result was the Christianity of our English ancestors, and the eventual dependence of the whole church in these islands on the Bishop and clergy of Rome. As the British and Scottish clergy to the claims then made, owing perhaps in part to Augustine's deficiency in the tact and temper of his master, was for many years delayed. (Cf. Ep. v. indit. xiv.
53—59; ix. ind. iv. 48—60, 63, 71; Joann. Diacon.
2, 34; Bede, de Gentis Angl. i. 23, &c.)

The events so far referred to have shown Gregyory's attitude and conduct in spiritual matters throughout the West. Instances will now be given illustrating his relations with Constanti-ople and the Eastern church. The year 593 affords the first example. Having heard of two prebendaries, John of Chalcis and Anastasius of Aeauria, having been beaten with cudgels, after the convocation of bishops in Constantinople in the Faster, then patriarch of Constantinople, he wrote twice to the patriarch, reminding him for introducing into the church a new and uncannonical punishment, exhorting him to restore the two prebendaries or to judge them canonically, and expressing his own readiness to receive them should he be in Rome. What result was that, notwithstanding the patriarch's protest, the prebendaries withdrew to Rome, and were there received and absolved by Gregory after examination of their cause (Ep. ii. 52; v.
64). Though the tone of his letters on this occasion was one of brotherly remonstrance rather than of authority, yet his proceeding implied the right of removing errors that had been done at Constantinople, and a power of interference, such as he did undoubtedly claim,as his predecessors had done. For in other letters we find him saying, "With respect to the Con-stantinopolitan church, who doubts that it is subject to the apostolical see?" and "I know not what bishop is not subject to it, if fault is found in him." (Ep. v. 64, 65.) Among the most memorable incidents in this connexion are his remonstrances against the assumption by John the Faster of the title of ocumenical or universal bishop. They began in 592, being provoked by the repeated occurrence of the title in a judgment against an heretical prebendary, which had been sent to Rome. The title was not at that time new. Patriarchs had been so styled by the emperors Leo and Justinian, and it had been confirmed to John the Faster and his successors by a general Eastern synod held at Constantinople in 588, on which occasion pope Pelagius had protested against it. But the occasion now referred to seems to have been the first to excite the indignation of Gregory. He wrote to Sabinius, his friend at Constantinople, desiring him to use his utmost endeavours with the patriarch, the emperor, and the empress, to procure the renunciation of the title. When neither remonstrance nor the withdrawal of Sabinius from the patriarch's communion proved availaing, he wrote himself to patriarch, emperor, and empress in peculiarly strong language. The title he called foolish, proud, pestiferous, profane, wicked, a diabolical usurpation; the ambition of any who assumed it he compares to that of Lucifer; and intimates that its assumption was a sign of the approach of the end of times. We have already stated that his arguments are such as to preclude himself as well as others from assuming the title, though he implies that if any could claim it it would be St. Peter's successor. Peter, he says, was the first of the apostles, yet neither he nor any of the others would assume the title universal, being all members of the church under one bishop. Chalcedon (probably in error) that the title had been offered to the bishop of Rome at the council of Chalcedon, and refused. Failing entirely to make an impression at Constantinople, he addressed himself to the Eastern patriarchs. He wrote to Eulogius of Alexandria and Anastasius of Antioch, representing the purpose of their brother of Constantinople as being that of degrading them, and usurping to himself all ecclesiastical power. They, however, were not thus moved to action; they seem to have regarded the title as one of honour only, suitable to the patriarch of the imperial city; and one of them, Anastasius, wrote in reply that the matter seemed to him of little moment. The controversy continued after the death of John the Faster. Cyrilus having succeeded him in 596, Gregory instructed his aposcarius at Constantinople to demand from the new patriarch, as a condition of intercommunication, the renunciation of the proud and impious title which his predecessor had wickedly assumed. In vain did Cyrilus send a nuncio to Rome in the hope of arranging matters; Gregory was resolute, and in a letter on this occasion to the patriarch affirmed, "I confidently say that whosoever calls himself universal priest, or desires to be so called in his elation, is the forerunner of Antichrist." At this time he seems to have gained a support, if not to his protest, at any rate to the paramount dignity of his own see, in Eulogius of Alexandria, whom he had before addressed with effect. For in answer to the first letter received from that prelate, he acknowledges with approval the dignity assigned by him to the see of St. Peter, and expresses adroitly a curious view of his correspondent, as well as the patriarch of Antioch, being a sharer in it. "Who does not know," he says, "that the church was built and established on the firmness of the prince of the apostles, by whose very name is implied a rock? Hence, though there were several apostles, there is but one apostolic see, that of the prince of the apostles, which has acquired great authority; and that see is in three places, in Rome where he died, in Alexandria where it was founded by his disciple St. Mark, and in Antioch where he himself lived seven years. These three, therefore, are but one see, and on that one see sit three bishops, who are but one in Him who said, I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you." But when Eulogius in a second letter proceeded so far as to style the bishop of Rome universal pope, Gregory warmly rejected such a title, saying, "If you give more to me than is due to me, you rob yourself of what is due to you. Nothing can redound to my honour that springs from the depravity of my brethren. If you call me universal pope, you thereby own yourself to be no pope. Let no such titles be mentioned or ever heard among us." Gregory was obliged at last to acquiesce in the assumption of the obnoxious title by the Constantiopolitana patriarch; and it may have been by way of protest that he afterwards put himself in his own letters by the title since borne by the bishops of Rome, Servus servorum Dei. It is evident that Gregory and his opponents in this dispute took different views of the import of the title contended for. They represented it as one simply of honour and dignity, while he regarded it as involving the assumption of supreme authority over the church, and especially over the see of St. Peter, whence probably in a great measure the vehemence of his remonstrance. It may be observed further that in the different views taken appears the difference of principle on which pre-eminence was in that age thought assignable to sees in the East and West respectively. In the East the dignity of a see was regarded as an appanage of a city's civil importance, on which ground alone could any pre-eminence be claimed for Constantinople. In the West it was the apostolic origin of the see, and the purely ecclesiastical pre-eminence belonging to it from ancient times, to which especial regard was paid. Thus viewed, the struggle of Gregory for the dignity of his own see against that of Constantinople assumes more importance than might at first sight seem due to it, as being a protest against the Erastianism of the East. And it certainly would not have been well for the church had the spiritual authority of the bishops of Rome acceded to the subservient patriarchs of the Eastern capital.

If, as a temporal administrator and pontifex, he gave no less than a spiritual ruler, Gregory evinced great vigour, ability, and zeal, guided by address and judgment. The see of Rome at this time had large possessions, constituting what was called the patri-mony of St. Peter, not only in Italy, Sardinia, and Corsica, but also in more remote parts, including Dalmatia, Illyricum, Gaul, and even Africa and the East. Over all such property Gregory exercised a vigilant superintendence by means of officers called "rectores patrimoni," and "defensores," to whom his letters remain, prescribing minute regulations for the management of the lands, and guarding especially against any oppression of the peasants. The exact amounts of their payments were fixed, they were to be allowed to pay by instalments, assisted by advances from the church treasury; unfair weights and measures were to be destroyed, and new ones provided; the seigniorial payments on the marriage of serfs were lowered; and legal forms of security (securitatis libelli) were to be furnished to peasants, lest the old abuses should be revived. The families of farmers were also secured in their succession to tenancy, and their rights to water and pasture. The revenues accruing to the see, thus carefully secured, though with every possible regard to humanity and justice, were expended according to the fourfold division then prevalent in the West, viz. in equal parts for the bishop, for the clergy, for the fabric and services of the church, and for the poor. And to such distribution, publicly marked by the time-stamped year, Gregory gave his personal superintendence. His own charities were immense, a large portion of the population of Rome being dependent on them; every day, before he sat down to his meal, a portion was sent to the poor at his door; provision was made for searching out the sick and infirm in every street, and a large volume was kept containing the names, ages, and dwellings of the objects of his bounty.

A field for the exercise of his political abilities was afforded by his position as virtual ruler of Rome at that critical time. Before his accession the Lombards had conquered nearly all Italy, and the state of Rome was chaotic, and had committed ravages even there, no effectual aid against them being afforded by the emperor. In 594 the exarch Romanus, in violation of a treaty with Agilulph, the Lombard king, had seized an opportunity of invading his territory and carrying hisbooty to Ravenna. Agilulph in return invaded the exarchate, approaching the very gates of Rome, and remained there several months, laying the country waste with fire and sword. Gregory, whose letters and homilies at this time give a lamentable account of the miseries of the country, endeavoured to conclude a peace with Agilulph, who was himself disputing the terms. The emperor was frustrated by the opposition of Romanus, who represented Gregory to the emperor as having been overreached by the crafty enemy. The emperor believed his exarch, and wrote to Gregory in condemnation of his conduct. In vain did Gregory remonstrate in letters both to the emperor and to the empress Constantina, complaining of the ravages of the Lombards as of the cruelty and exactions of the imperial officers who had been sent to defend the country, but who had, on the contrary, burdened the people with intolerable taxes under pretence of raising funds for the war, in consequence of which the Coriscans especially had been compelled to sell their children, and had even over the sea sent the ravages of the Lombards as of the cruelty and exactions of the imperial officers who had been sent to defend the country, but who had, on the contrary, burdened the people with intolerable taxes under pretence of raising funds for the war, in consequence of which the Coriscans especially had been compelled to sell their children, and had even sold their island almost depopulated.

Further, he attributed the opposition raised to his own endeavours for peace to the fear lest, the war being ended, the excuse for such exactions should cease. At length, in 595, he obtained some relief through his pious friend Theodelinda, the Lombard queen, who, more amenable to influence than the emperor or empress, persuaded her husband to withdraw his troops (Ep. iv. 31, 33, 35, 38, 39; and Hom. 18 in Eucher.). This relief, however, was only temporary.

Towards the winter of 596, Agilulph, provoked by the exarch's continued resistance to all overtures for peace, again invaded the exarchate, and threatened to besiege Rome. Agilulph's letters give a deplorable picture of general distress, both within and without the city. But he did more than complain. From his own resources, and through the contributions of bishops and others, both in the West and East, whose sympathy he succeeded in exciting, he expended large sums in the redemption of captives and the relief of distress, and further allowed bishops to sell the sacred vessels of the churches for the same charitable purposes (Ep. v. 29; vi. 13, 21, 23; vii. indii. ii. 13, 14). For several years he continued, unaided, his negotiations with the Lombards, with more or less success. At length, in 600, though at the time he had been for two years confined to his bed by painful illness, he succeeded in concluding a truce from September to the following April. If the results of these protracted efforts were not in all but occasional truces with the enemy, and some mitigation of distress through charity, or through Christian influences brought to bear on the invaders, the blame for the smallness of success was entirely due to the emperor and his representatives, who would neither agree to peace nor assist effectually by arms, nor in any way back up the pope's patriotic labours. Whatever good was done was due to him, and to him alone.

In the year 601 an event occurred which shows Gregory in a less favourable light, with respect to his relations to the powers of the world, than anything else during his career. Phocas, a eunuch, was made emperor by the army. He secured his throne by the murder of Mauricius, whose six sons had been first cruelly executed before their father's eyes. He afterwards put to death the empress Constantina and her three daughters, who had been lured out of the asylum of a church under a promise of safety. Numerous persons of all ranks, and in various parts of the empire, were also subjected to similar treatment. No less than 400 were put to death with unusual cruelty. The new emperor is painted in very black colours by the historians of the age (Theophylact, Hist. viii. 104; Cedren. An. vii. 1. Phocas; Niceph. Hist. xviii. 404; Evagri. v. 23; Theophylact. Inst. Miscell. xvii. 40). Yet to him and to his consort Leontia, who is spoken of as little better than her husband, there were many letters in a style of flattery beyond even what was usual with him in addressing great potentates. He returns thanks to heaven, and calls on both heaven and earth to rejoice at their accession, viliifying at the same time the memory of the murdered Mauricius as a tyrant from whose yoke the church was now blissfully freed (Ep. xi. 18, and others). No doubtless, was in a great measure the hope of obtaining from the new powers the support which Mauricius had not accorded him in his still pending dispute with the Eastern patriarch. This motive appears plainly in one of his letters to Leontia, to whom, rather than to the emperor, with characteristic tact, he intimates his hopes of support to the church of St. Peter, endeavouring to work upon her religious fears.

"I should have entertained you," he says, "to take under your particular protection the hitherto afflicted church of St. Peter, but, as I know you love God, I need not ask you to do what you will do of your own accord, for the more you love God, the more you will love His apostle, to whom it was said, 'You are Peter,' &c.; I therefore, do not doubt that you will take care to oblige and bind him to you by whom you desire to be loosed from your sins." These motives, and the adulatory style then in vogue towards the emperors, account for, though they cannot be held to excuse, the conduct of Gregory in this, the most glaring instance of what was indeed his habit in other cases, that of propitiating the rulers of this world by flattering addresses, if so he might enlist them in what he believed to be the cause of God. That he rightly counted on the disposition of Phocas appears from his successor, Boniface III., having "obtained from the emperor Phocas that the Apo..." stolic see of St. Peter, that is the Roman church, should be the head of all churches, because the church of Constantinople wrote itself the first of all churches” (Anastas. Bibl. Vit. Pontif.). The statement, often made, that Boniface had conferred on him, and accepted, the title itself which Gennadius had so strongly repudiated for himself, is not supported by evidence, and is in itself improbable.

Gregory lived only sixteen months after the accession of Phocas. He died after protracted suffering from gout on the 12th of March, A.D. 604, and was buried in the basilica of St. Peter.

What occurred immediately after his death makes some of the reverence due to this prince of the people of his day. A famine ensued, which the starving multitude attributed to his prodigal expenditure. They were on the point of expressing their feeling towards their deceased benefactor by destroying his library, which was only saved by the interposition of the archdeacon Peter (his interlocutor in the Dialogues), who asserted that he lived in the form of a do. He hovered over his head as he wrote. Peter’s sudden death in the pulpit, as he was on the point of confirming this assertion with an oath, was curiously taken as a testimony to its truth, and the library was spared (Joann. Diacon. Vit. iv. 69). Hence Gregory is represented in art with a dove above his head.

III. The pontificate of Gregory the Great is rightly regarded as second to none in its influence on the future form of Western Christianity. He lived in the period of transition from Christendom under the imperial power to the mediæval papacy, and he laid or consolidated the foundation on which the latter was built. He advanced, indeed, no claims to authority beyond what had already been asserted by his predecessors; yet the consistency, firmness, conscientious zeal, as well as address and judgment, with which he maintained it, and, further, the peculiar circumstances of the time, when the waning of the power of the Eastern empire left him the virtual ruler of Rome, and the sole power to whom the Western church turned for support, and who the Christian barbarian founders of the new kingdom of Europe, regarded with reverence; such conduct and such circumstances paved the way to the system of papal absolutism that culminated under Gregory VII. and Innocent III. Nor, it may be remarked, were any of his measures in this regard more pregnant with consequences (probably far beyond his own anticipation) than those which he took for the consolidation of the church and of the authority of Rome in France and England.

Of the purity of his motives, and of the eminence of his character as a Christian, there can be no doubt. If his Christianity was that of a monk among monks, intensely ascetic, tinged with credulity and superstition, and not averse to persecution, it was of the type most highly regarded in his age, and thoroughly suited to the times. In some cases, as has been seen, he evinced moderation and tolerance beyond that of his age, and it is impossible to read his letters without recognising the tone and spirit of a genuine Christian. The least defensible part of his proceedings was his excommunication of Brunichild and Phocas, which cannot easily be justified, as has been attempted, by supposing ignorance of the true character of the potentates addressed. It is rather to be accounted for by his zeal for what was or seemed to him the cause of God, together with his peculiar turn for diplomacy, prevailing over complete sincerity, and perhaps in part his view (evident generally in his letters to potentates) of the reverence due to the power of God. A like politic insincerity is perceived by some in many of the narratives contained in his Book of Dialogues, sent as they were to confirm the faith of Theodelinda, the Lombard queen, though too puerile, it might be thought, for the credence of a man of his own intelligence and culture. It is more charitable to suppose this otherwise enlightened pope to have been himself deeply tinged with the superstitious credulity of his day.

As a writer he was intellectually eminent, and deserves the place assigned to him among the doctors of the church. His learning, indeed, and mental attitude, were again those of his age. As a critic, an expositor, an original thinker, he may be either Greek or Hebrew, and had no deep acquaintance with the Christian fathers; literature for its own sake he set little store by; classical literature, as being heathen, he repudiated. Though the story which we find told first by John of Salisbury in the 12th century (Polychron. i. 29) of his having purposely burnt the Palatine library is probably untrue, yet his familiarity with the classics is sufficiently evident from his sharp reproof of Desiderius, bishop of Viene, for reading the heathen poets with his pupils in grammar (Ep. ix. 48). Yet, notwithstanding all this, as a clear and powerful exponent of the received orthodox doctrine, especially in its practical aspect, as well as of the system of hagiology, demonology, and monastic asceticism, which then formed part of the religion of Christendom, he spoke with a loud and influential voice to many ages after his own, and contributed more than any one person that can be named to fix the form and tone of mediæval religious thought.

He was also influential as a preacher. A great part of his extant works are sermons, expository and hortatory; and we find him regretting that other duties interfered with more constant devotion to that of preaching.

He is no less famous for his influence on the music and liturgy of the church; hence called ‘magister cantemontium.’ For the cultivation of church singing he instituted a song-school in Rome, called Orpharamorphium, the name of which implies that it had also a charitable purpose. Of it, John the Deacon gives the following account, after speaking of the centre of antiphons which, like Solomon, he had carefully compiled: — ‘He founded a school of singers, endowed it with some farms, and built for it two habitations, one under the steps of the basilica of St. Peter the Apostle, the other under the houses of the Servite Friars. As far as he could, he brought to the present day his couch on which he used to recline when singing, and his whip with which he menaced the boys, together with his original antiphonary, are preserved with fitting reverence.’ (Vit. Gregor. ii. 6.) Cardinal Bona (de Red. Liturg. i. 23) gives proof of the existence of song-schools in Rome before the time of Gregory, hence concluding that his object was... the reform and improvement only of existing church music. The exact nature of his reforms cannot now be determined with certainty. It is generally alleged, in the first place that, whereas St. Ambrose had in the latter part of the 4th century introduced at Milan the four authentic modes or scales, called, after those in ancient Greek music that corresponded to them, Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, Mixolydian, St. Gregory added to them the four plagal, or subsidiary, modes called Hypodorian, Hypophrygian, Hypolydian, and Hypomixolydian, thus enlarging the allowed range of ecclesiastical melody. In explanation of these modes it may be observed in passing that the four so-called authentic ones were scales comprising eight notes of our modern diatonic scale, beginning respectively with the notes D, E, F, and G, which were also the finals of each, and having A, C, C, and D, for their dominant or reciting notes; and that the corresponding plagal modes, while retaining the same finals, began each a fourth lower than the authentic one to which it was subsidiary, and had different dominant or reciting notes, viz. F, A, A, and C. Mr. Chatfield, however, in his Ms. and Essays on the Church Music of the 4th Century, published by Mr. Musical Museum, 1834, does not think that the Hypomixolydian mode, as commonly understood, is the true Hypomixolydian, but a more modern hypothesis. Mr. Chatfield, however, in his Ms. and Essays on the Church Music of the 4th Century, published by Mr. Musical Museum, 1834, does not think that the Hypomixolydian mode, as commonly understood, is the true Hypomixolydian, but a more modern hypothesis.

History of Music, maintains that the ecclesiastical scales used above described "are not of the early date that has been supposed," and that "the two systems called Ambrosian and Gregorian did not exist at the time of their now supposed founders," adding that Ambrosian music and Gregorian music meant simply music according to the Church and the Church's liturgy, and that the so-called "real" and "natural" modes, as they are called, are rather than the less severe style of melodious singing which had become current in the West from Milan; and that there was the most essential difference between the "Cantus Gregorianus" and the "Cantus Ambrosianus." It is in accordance with this view that Gregory is said by subsequent writers to have banished all that was light or popular from the musical settings of the Liturgy and to have confined the singing to the choir, excluding the general congregation. (See on the whole subject Kranze der Liturgie; Martin Gerbert, de cantu et musica sacra; Bon, de rebus literariis; Chappell's Hist. of Music.)

His institution of the Sepulchrum litany immediately before his accession has been already referred to. He was so anxious to be sung by the inhabitants of Rome divided into seven companies, viz. of clergy, of laymen, of monks, of virgins, of matrons, of widows, and of poor people and children. These, starting from seven different churches, were to chant through the streets of Rome, and meet at last for common supplication in the church of the Blessed Virgin. He also appointed "the stations," churches at which were to be celebrated solemn services in Lent and at the four great festivals; at which seasons he visited the churches in person, being received there with stately ceremonial, and taking part in the services. Of the share he had in the composition or arrangement of the liturgy something will be said in the notice of his works, which follows.

His extant works of undoubted genuineness, are:—1. Expositio in sanctum Job, ser Moraviae libro xxxv. In this celebrated work (begun during his stay at Constantinople, before he was pope, and finished afterwards) the book of Job is expounded in a threefold manner, according to its historic, its moral and its allegorical meaning. For his exposition in the first of these senses his ignorance of any language but Latin, of ancient history, and of Eastern customs, rendered him quite unfit. The moral interpretation may still be read with profit, though rather for the loftiness and purity of its tone than for the justness of the exposition. Of the allegorical interpretation, according to which the book was conceived as containing latently in itself the whole theory of the Christian church and sacraments, and a condemnation of all heresies, it may be said that a similar treatment might deduce almost anything from any book that was ever written. Names of persons, numbers, words, even whole books, were, according to this kind of mystic treatments, given their own kind of mysterious meanings.

The above account of the work is extracted from Milman’s History of Latin Christianity.

2. Libri duo in Ecclesiæm: viz. 22 Homilies on Ezekiel, which, having been delivered at Rome in a time of distress during the siege of the city by Agilulf, were afterwards revised by himself, and addressed to a bishop Marianus.

3. Libri duo in Evangelia: viz. 40 Homilies on the gospels for the day, preached by himself at various times, and afterwards edited by himself and addressed to a bishop Secundinus. To these is appended a short sermon, called “Oratio ad plebeum de mortalitate,” delivered during the plague at Rome between his election and consecration. It included directions for the Septiform litany.

4. Liber Regulae Pastoralis, in 4 parts; a treatise on the duties and responsibilities of the pastoral office, addressed (as appears from the preface) to a bishop John with the purpose of explaining and justifying the writer’s former reluctance to undertake the burden of the papacy. This work was held in the highest esteem both at the time of its publication and for ages afterwards. Lenderof de Seville, to whom he sent it, circulated it in Spain; the emperor Mauricius had it translated into Greek; Alfred the Great had it translated into English; a succession of saints in Gaul enjoined a knowledge of it on all bishops; and Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, in the 9th century, says that a copy of it was delivered, together with the book of canons, to bishops at their ordination, with a charge to them to frame their lives according to its precepts (in Praefatione Opusculi 55 Capitulorum).

5. Dialogorum libri IV. de vita et miraculis patrum Italorum, et de aeternitati animae. The authenticity of this work has been doubted, but apparently without adequate grounds. It is written in the form of dialogues between the author and the archdeacon Peter, and contains accounts of a number of saintly persons, among whom a prominent place is given to Benedict of Nursia, the contemporary founder of the Benedictine order. It abounds in incredible marvels, and relates, among other things, visions of the state of departed souls, which have been a main support, if not the principal support of the medieval doctrine about purgatory. The Dialogues were translated into Anglo-Saxon by order of Alfred (Anser. Gest. Alf. in Mon. Hist. Brit. 486).

6. Registrum Epistolorum, in 14 books, of which the 13th is wanting; a collection of 838 letters to persons of all orders and degrees in various parts of the world, and on a great variety of subjects. Nothing that Gregory has left gives us so vivid an idea of his unwearying activity, the multifariousness of his engagements and interests, his address and judgment, and the versatility of his powers.

7. Liber Sacramentorum. This, the famous Gregorian Sacramentary, was an abbreviated arrangement in one volume, with some alterations and additions, of the previous sacramentary of pope Gelasius, which again had been founded on an older one attributed to pope Leo I. What John the deacon says of Gregory’s work is, “Sed et Gelasianum codicum, de Missarum solemnis multa subtrahens, paulo convertens, nonnulla supercificiens, in unius libelli volume coactavit” (Johann. disc. de Viti. Greg. lib. 2, c. 17; cf. Bede, Hist. Eccles. ii. 1). The changes made by Gregory were principally in the Missae, or variable offices for particular days; in the Ordo Missae itself only the two following alterations are spoken of as made by him. First, to the part of the canon beginning, “Hanc igitur obligationem,” he added the words, “Disque nostras in tua pace dispensas, atque ab aeterna damnatione eripi et in electorum tuorum juvenes grade numerari.” Secondly, he transferred the Lord’s Prayer from its former place, after the breaking of bread, to its present place in the canon (Ep. ad Joann. Synag. lib. ix. Ep. 12). Whatever uncertainty there may be as to the original text of Gregory’s Sacramentary as a whole, it is considered certain that the present Roman canon and, with the exception of certain subsequent additions, the ordinarium also are the same as what he left. [See art. SACRAMENTARY in Dict. Chr. Antiq.]

8. Liber Antiphonarius, a collection of antiphons for mass. To what extent this work was original, or founded on a previous collection, and how far it may have been altered or added to since Gregory’s time, are matters of some uncertainty.

Of the following works attributed to Gregory, the genuineness is doubtful:

1. Liber Benedictinum.
2. Liber Responsialis seu Antiphonarius.
4. Expositiones super Cantica Cantorum.
5. Expositio in septem Psalmos Paviniculitis.
6. Concordia quattuorcan testamentorum sacrae Scripturae.

There are also nine hymns attributed to him with probability.

Of Gregory’s personal appearance an idea may be formed from a description given by John the Deacon of a portrait preserved to his own day (9th century) in St. Andrew’s monastery, “in absidicula post fratribus cellarium”; which he concludes to have been painted during the pope’s life and by his order. There were in the atrium of the same monastery pictures of the father and mother of Gregory (see GORDIANUS), shown by the inscription on one of them to have been painted by his order; and that this was the case also with his own portrait is inferred from the head being surmounted, not by a corona, but by a tabula (“tabulæ similitudinem”), which John says is the mark of a living person, and by the appended inscription:

“Christe potens Domine, nostri largior honoris, Indulgentium officiis solita piate turbet gubernam.”

The portrait is thus described. The figure is of ordinary size, and well formed; the face a happy medium between the length of his father’s and the roundness of his mother’s—“most becomingly prolonged with a certain rotundity”; the head is, like his father’s, of moderate size, and somewhat tawny; in the middle of his otherwise bald forehead are two neat little curls twisting towards the right; the crown of the head is round and large; dark hair, decently curled, hangs under the middle of the ear; he has a fine forehead; his eyebrows are long and elevated, but slender; the pupils of the eyes are of a yellow tinge, not large, but open, and the under eyelids are full; the nose is slender as it curves down from the eyebrows, broader about the middle, then slightly curved, and expanding at the nostrils; the mouth is ruddy; the lips thick and surprised; the teeth regular ("lipsissime"); the chin rather prominent from the confines of the jaws; the complexion is described as "aquilinus et vividus" (al. "vividius"), not "cardinus," as it became afterwards. There is some uncertainty about the colours intended. "Aquilinus" may be equivalent to "aquilus" (scarcely), and "cardinus" may denote the colour consequent on stomach disease ("cardiacus morbus"); in which case, if we adopt the reading "vividius" for "lividus," the meaning would seem to be that he had a dark but fresh complexion when his picture was taken, though in later life it acquired an unhealthy hue. (See Du Cange for this sense of "lividus," and the word "latura." His countenance is mild; his hands good, with taper fingers, were well adapted for writing. His dress is a chestnut-coloured "planeta" over a "dalmatica," which is precisely the same dress as that in which his father is depicted, and therefore not in Gregory's time peculiarly sacerdotal costume. (See Gordinianus.) But he is distinguished from his son, and from them, by the unusual and accepted mode of wearing which are intimated by the description. It is brought from the left shoulder so as to hang carelessly under the breast, and, passing over the right shoulder, is deposited behind the back, the other end being carried straight behind the neck also to the right shoulder, from which it hangs down the side. In the left hand is a book, and the thumb, the palm down, is in the attitude of making the sign of the cross. (John, Disc. in Vit. S. Gregor. 1. 4, c. 83.) John the Deacon describes also his "pallium," woven of white linen and with no marks of the needle in it; his phylactery (or case for relics), of thin silver, and hung from the neck by erisson cloth, and his belt ("sathitius"), only a thumb's breadth wide—which, he says, were preserved and venerated on the saint's anniversary, and which he refers to as evidences of the monastic simplicity of Gregory's attire. (John, Disc. in Vit. S. Gregor. 1. 4, c. 8.)

"Our chief authorities for the life of Gregory are his own writings, especially his letters. Among ancient writers Gregory of Tours (his contemporary), Bede, Paul Warnefried (730), Ado Trivernensis (1070), Simeon Metaphrastes (1300), Isidorus Hispalensis, have detailed notices of him. Paul the deacon in the 8th century, and John the deacon, a monk of Cassino, in the 9th century, wrote lives of him (Greg. Op. ed. Benedict). The Benedictine edition of his works contains also a fuller life, supplemented from other sources. [J. B. y.]

GREGORIUS (52) II., bishop of Rome, after Constantine, from May 19, 715, to Feb. 10, 731, for fifteen years eight months and twenty days, during the reigns of the emperors Anastasius, Theodosius, and Leo the Isaurian.

He is said by Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Vit. Pontiff) to have been a Roman by birth, educated in the Lateran palace under pope Sergius, and a Benedictine monk; also to have accompanied his predecessor, pope Constantine, to Constantinople, where he evinced his learning and abilities by answering certain questions put to him by the emperor Justinian II., the purport of which is not told to the satisfaction of the latter. The same authority describes him as pure in life, learned in Holy Scripture, eloquent in speech, and of resolute will, of the last of which characteristic the events of his pontificate afford sufficient proof.

The most important incidents of his reign were, first, the conversion, and with it the submission to the Roman see, of the German races by the English missionary Boniface, and, secondly, the commencement of the Iconoclastic controversy, in which this pope was at issue with the emperor Leo Isauricus. The popes at this period were still subjects of the Eastern emperors, and required to be confirmed in office by the exarchs of Ravenna, though usually left to themselves to defend their Italian possessions against the neighbouring Lombards, who, having pillaged and invaded Italy, and having subsequently established the two powerful dukedoms of Spoleto and Benevento, had lately founded, under king Liutprand, a settled kingdom in the district hence called Lombardy. These long dreaded barbarians, though now professing Catholic Christianity, were still objects of fear and aversion; nor did the occasion of the new form of the pontifical tiara, with the pope or with the emperor prevent his watching for every opportunity that might occur for making himself master of the whole of Italy. In the first year of his pontificate Gregory, for security against his troublesome neighbours, began the restoration of the ruined walls of Rome, a work of which subsequent troubles prevented the completion. (731.) In the same year (731) he found himself in conflict with them. They had seized and kept possession of the fortress at Cumae (Cumumnum castrum). Gregory, having failed to obtain its cession by remonstrance, spiritual menace, and offers of money, had at length recourse to the arms of John, duke of Naples (still part of the imperial dominion), who was induced by a bribe of seventy pounds of gold to recapture and restore it to him. Before or after this event we read of Liutprand having shewn a more friendly disposition in restoring to the Roman see its patrimony in the Cottian Alps, which had been previously bestowed on it by the Lombard king Aribert (Paul. Diacon., Bede, Anastas. Bibli.);

The year 718 was marked by the accession of Leo III., called Isauricus, on the abdication of Theodosius; on which occasion the new emperor, far from showing signs of his future religious attitude, sent the pope a confession of his faith, the orthodoxy of which was also attested by the patriarch Germans; whereupon Gregory sent a cordial letter in reply, alluded to in his subsequent correspondence.

The year 718 was memorable for the first visit to Rome of the English Winihrith, better known as Boniface, who came with a commendatory letter from Daniel, bishop of Winchester, to seek the pope's authority and blessing for missionary work among the Germans, on which his heart had long been set. He had previously attempted a mission in Frisia without much success, having been thwarted by the pagan king Ratbod, who had at that time thrown off the dominion of the Franks, and devastated the churches already founded in his country. Boniface, therefore, set out for England, and arrived at the English monastery of Nursling, and after a stay there of two years, and refusal to fill the office of abbot, he repaired to Rome, arriving there in the autumn of 718. Gregory (says Boniface's biographer Willibald), on learning his purpose, looked at him "with blithe countenance and smiling eyes," and at length, after frequent colloquies, sent him forth with his blessing, and under the protection of St. Peter, in the May of the year 719, as a missionary at large to the German unbelievers. He carried with him a number of relics given him by the pope, and a letter addressed to himself, in which he was straitly charged to follow the directions of the Roman see, as a further commission, if required. (Othlon. in Vit. Bonif. 1. 12; Bonit. Ep. ii. Giles's ed.) Visiting the Lombard king Liutprand on his way, by whom he was honourably received, the missionary proceeded first to Thuringia, a country, it would seem, already in great measure Christianized, where he exerted himself to correct the heresies and irregularities that had crept in among the clergy. Thence he repaired to France, and, having heard of the death of Ratbod and the recovery of Frisia to the dominion of Charles Martel, he prosecuted a successful mission in that country in conjunction with archbishop Willibrord, of Utrecht, who was already at work there. Urged by him to accept the office of bishop, he steadfastly refused on the ground partly of unworthiness, but especially of the absence of any command or leave from Rome. Having at length obtained the old prelate's consent to his departure, he returned to Germany about the year 722, and after extraordinary success among the Hessians and Saxons, of whom he is said to have baptized thousands, he sent a messenger to apprise the pope and request instructions. The result was a summons to Rome, which he at once obeyed, arriving there accompanied by several Frank and Burgundian disciples in the year 723. It was now that Gregory, having previously demanded of him a confession of his faith, which because of his imperfect knowledge of Latin he requested him to prepare in writing, and, being satisfied therewith, ordained him bishop on St. Andrew's day, A.D. 723 i.e., a general missionary bishop, not one of any provincial see. It was on this occasion that the pope is generally said to have given him the name of Boniface, by which, rather than his original one Winfrith, he is best known. Lingard, however (Annt. Sax. Ch. ii. 338), gives reasons for supposing that he had assumed it previously. The memorable oath which he took on this occasion (Othlon. Vit. Bonif. 1. i. 14; Bonit. Ep. ii. 15), was: "I, Boniface by the grace of God, bishop, promise to thee the blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, and to thy vicar, the blessed pope Gregory and his successors, by the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the inseparable Trinity, and by this thy most sacred body, to maintain the purity of the holy Catholic faith, and by the help of God, persevere in the unity of the same; in no wise, through anyone's persuasion, to consent to anything against the unity of the common and universal church; but, as I have said, to evince in all respects my faith, and purity, and concurrence with thee, and the interests of thy church, to whom God hath given the power of binding and loosing, the power of the vicar and his successors. Whenever I find the conduct of the chief officers of the church contradictory to the ancient ordinances and decrees of the fathers, I will have no fellowship or connexion with them, but will prevent it if I can, or, if not, will at once report it faithfully to my apostolic lord. And should I ever in any way attempt to do anything contrary to the tenor of this my promise, may I be found guilty in the eternal judgment, and incur the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira, who presumed to commit fraud and to say what was false to thee." The taking of this oath, which was substantially the same as the Indiennus Episcopi then exacted by the pope from the bishop of the own patriarchate (Lob. diam. c. iii. tit. 8 and 9), was of great importance in the history of the church, as being exacted in this instance from the bishop of a German see, outside not only of the hitherto acknowledged patriarchate of Rome, but even of the Roman empire. It was taken afterwards by all bishops of sees constituted by Boniface, and laid in fact the foundation of the close dependence on Rome of the church of central Europe. It is interesting to trace back this result to the memorable mission of Augustine to England by Gregory the Great (597), the consequence of which had been the closer connexion with Rome of the English church than of any other in the north, attested among other ways by frequent pilgrimages and not unfrequent appeals to Rome, and resulting in that entire devotion to the apostolic see that marked and directed the career of the apostle of Germany, Boniface. He now resumed the labours of his mission, fortified by various letters from the pope. One addressed to Charles Martel announces the consecration of Boniface as bishop and missionary to the German races and others on the east coast of the Rhine, and states Charles' support and protection. Another, to bishops, clergy, dukes, earls, and Christians generally, commends the new bishop and his companions to their hospitality and support, promising in return, through the intercession of the two chief apostles, communion with the holy martyrs, and threatening such as should oppose them with anathema and damnation. In a third, the clergy and laity of Germany are assured of Charles' support and protection. Another, to bishops, clergy, dukes, earls, and Christians generally, commends the new bishop and his companions to their hospitality and support, promising in return, through the intercession of the two chief apostles, communion with the holy martyrs, and threatening such as should oppose them with anathema and damnation.
seventh, and tenth months, or at the beginning or middle of Lent, or "vesperae sabbato sacro" (i.e. Easter eve); and that, except in cases of danger of death, he should administer baptism only at Easter and Pentecost. Another letter, to the chiefs and others among the Thuringians who were Christians, praises them for steadfastness in the faith, exhorts them to prefer death to apostasy, and enjoins obedience to the new bishop. Two more letters, probably sent on this occasion, are addressed to the Thuringian Alt-Saxons, both Christian and not Christian. The Thuringians are exhorted to hearken to, and build a house and churches for, the holy bishop who had been sent among them for no earthly gain, but to win their souls, and lead them on the way to everlasting bliss. The letter addressed to the Alt-Saxons (as the Saxons on the Continent were called in distinction from the English Saxons) is mainly made up of quotations from the epistles of St. Paul. They are told, among other things, that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand, they are warned against any one seducing them "with excellence of speech" to the worship of idols in which the devils dwell, against being spurred on with empty spectacles, by the children of darkness, as are the children of light. They are finally warned to put no bar in the way of the conversion of any of their people, and to receive Boniface, whom he, Gregory, had sent, his brother and fellow bishop, to deliver them from the devil and number them among the children of God. (Bede, E. x. v. 8, 10, 11, 12, n. 6; J. a. d. 735.) The remaining career of Boniface brings him into no further connexion that is known of with Gregory II., except in respect to two subsequent letters, of which mention will be made in the final enumeration of the extant writings of this pope.

Mention may here be made of a visit of St. Corbinianus, bishop of Freising, to Rome in 724, to beg of Eugenius III. a return from him to Bavaria, which he had held for eight years, to a monastery, or to some desert. He was honourably received, and a synod was held in which the desired leave was refused. An account of this is given in the history of Aribro, the successor of St. Corbinianus. One of the noted pilgrimages from England to Rome was made in the next year, 725, when Iza, king of the West Saxons, after reigning thirty-seven years, renounced his kingdom, and visited the tombs of the apostles with Ethelburga his queen. Both spent the remainder of their days at Rome (Bede, H. E. v. 7). Bede speaks of this being at that time a common practice among the English, both noble and ignoble, laity and clergy, men and women. According to Matthew of Westminster, inscribed at the close of the Saxon school for such of his countrymen as might choose to be educated there, adding a church for their use; to support which, and to provide a subsistence for the English who should dwell there, he imposed a tribute of one penny on each family of his subjects, called Romanseot (Matth. de Westmonest. ann. 727). William of Malmesbury attributes the foundation of this school to king Offa, who died in 794. This has been supposed (Higden, Polydore Virg.), though without sufficient ground, to have been the origin of the Romanseot or Peter's penge, afterwards paid by way of tribute from England to Rome; which, however, Malmesbury attributes to King Ethelwulf.

In the year 726 was published the first edict against image-worship by the emperor Leo Isauricus. At this time the renovation of representations of Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and the saints, as well as of relics, had become ingrained in Christian devotion, both in the East and West. Not, however, without some protest, not only from Jews and Mahometans, who charged Christians with idolatry, but also from remonstrants within the church. By whatever influences moved, Leo, having reigned for ten years without signing any deposition to impose any religious matter, except in the way of persecuting Jews, suddenly set himself the hopeless task of eradicating the prevailing worship. There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of his objection to it, which he grounded on the scriptural prohibition of idolatry (Greg. II. Ep. 1), whatever may be thought of the wisdom or justifiableness of his high-handed procedure. His first edict, issued with the sanction of a senatus-consulturn, but without the concurrence of the patriarch, merely forbade the worship of images by genuflections, prostrations, and the like, and ordered them to be placed high on the walls of churches, so as to prevent such a deceitful abuse of them. It was not till 730, after a series of conflicts, that he issued a second edict requiring their absolute destruction. His first edict was enough to provoke the most violent resistance. The populace of Constantinople, among whom the women and monks are said to have been especially zealous, rose in insurrection, and had to be controlled by armed force. Similar insurrections ensued in the provinces. The inhabitants of the Cyclades went so far as to proclaim a rival emperor (one Cosmas, a zealous supporter of image-worship), and to equip a fleet with which they sailed for Constantinople with the view of deposing Leo. But they were successfully met, and their fleet destroyed. In Italy it was to be expected the sees of Rome and Milan would be violent. Leo had acquainted the pope with the purpose of his edict, and was by him strongly remonstrated with by letter. Notwithstanding this, the edict was sent to Scholasticus, exarch of Ravenna, to be published and enforced. The people of Ravenna rose in insurrection, and bloodshed ensued. Luitprand, the Lombard king, now seized the opportunity, such as he had long desired, of making himself master of Ravenna, and afterwards of all the Pentapolis, being received as a deliverer rather than an enemy; and he proceeded to form it into a duchy under his grandson Hildebrand. But the permanent loss of the exarchate to the empire, which did afterwards ensue, and which these iconoclastic measures of Leo certainly paved the way for, was deferred for the present. Urrac, duke of Venice, solicited by the pope, came to the aid of the exarch, and together they recovered the territory. The next few years in Italy were occupied by a course of insurrection and warfare, of which the following is a summary. Scholasticus the exarch, suspected by the emperor of connivance with the pope, was superseded in 728 by Paul the Patriarch, who marched to Rome in order to seize Gregory, but was prevented by a body of Lombards sent by Luitprand, who at this stage of affairs espoused his cause. Paul now, by the emperor's order, required the edict to be published at Rome, and in all the cities of Italy subject to the emperor. The pope excommunicated Paul; the Roman people rose, overpowered the imperial garrison, broke the statue of the emperor, and renounced their allegiance to him. The pope addressed a circular to the Italian cities, to the Lombards and Venetians, exhorting them to continue steadfast in their faith. All imagination of the emperor was now at an end. They renounced their allegiance, appointed magistrates of their own provisionally, and were only prevented from proclaiming a rival emperor by the remonstrances of Gregory. Paul, renewing his attempt to enforce the edict in Ravenna, was killed in an inscription. Exhilaratus also, duke of Naples, having in vain tried to enforce the edict there, and having, it is alleged, employed two persons to assassinate the pope, was torn in pieces by the multitude. The eunuch Eutychius, sent as exarch to Ravenna in the place of Paul, though received by the people there, failed in inducing them to accept the edict; and having, it was said, sent to Rome a letter from the emperor requiring the imperial officers there to assist in the great work of church and state, he was also excommunicated as his predecessor had been, and his messenger only saved from death by the pope's intervention. Eutychius now endeavoured to gain Luitprand to the emperor's side by promising him the cession of the cities that had been seized by him. Such overtures, however, were unavailing till the dukes of Spoleti and Benevento took the advantage of the disturbed state of things to assert their own independence; when Luitprand, having been assisted by the exarch in reducing them to obedience, proceeded with him to besiege Rome. At this crisis Gregory repaired in person to the camp of the Lombard king to implore mercy for the Roman people. The king, according to Anastasius Bibliothecarius, received him with the utmost deference, throwing himself at his feet, and divesting himself in the church of St. Peter of his arms, crown and royal mantle, which, with a silver cross, he placed upon the tomb of the apostle. But, though he granted the required amnesty, he required the pope and the Roman people to acknowledge the authority of the exarch. While the latter was still in Rome, the people of Tuscany proclaimed one Tibertius (who claimed imperial descent) emperor in the place of Leo. Gregory on this occasion supported the imperial authority, persuading the Romans to join the army of the exarch, who, thus aided, defeated the rebels, and sent the head of the usurper to Constantinople. The magnanimity of the pope in this instance is much lauded by his historians, and is an example of the course in all these transactions Baronisius, taking his facts from Anastasius, counts up six separate attempts on the life of the pope, authorized by the emperor or his officers; but the silence on this head of other early narrators, and of the pope himself in his subsequent letters to Leo, renders such allegations doubtful.

There seems, however, to be no doubt that attempts were made to seize the pope and carry him prisoner to Constantinople (this is all that he in his extant letters speaks of as attempted against himself), and on the other hand that the pope, in his resolute defence of the prevailing worship, and, indeed, of the freedom of the church from tyranny, fomented, directly or indirectly, insurrection, though not to the extent of sanctioning the proclamation of a rival emperor, or (as far as we know) encouraging violence.

In 730 was issued the second edict above referred to, after a great council assembled by Leo at Constantinople, in which the absolute destruction of all imagination of the emperor and the walls of churches, was ordered. This led to the resignation of the patriarch Germanus, and the appointment of Anastasius in his room. It led also to new and still more serious disturbances at Constantinople, especially in connexion with the destruction of an image of Christ called Antimachris (Saracens), which stood over the gate of the imperial palace called the Bronze Gate. On this occasion the people are said to have attacked the imperial officers, some of whom were killed, and the women especially to have pulled down the ladder on which a person employed to remove the image was placed, and to have murdered him after his fall; and also to have assaulted the new patriarch during divine service in the church in a furious language and with stones. Notwithstanding all resistance, the edict was enforced throughout the East, and sent to the exarch of Ravenna for publication in the West also. The emperor on this occasion wrote twice to the pope, whose replies are extant, though neither his former letters nor any of Leo's are. To the emperor's allegation of the Old Testament's prohibition of idolatry in the second commandment Gregory replies that this prohibition extended only to the images of animals and other creatures set up by the heathen in honour of the devil, not to images in honour of God; and he addsuce the works done in gold, silver, and brass by Bezekel and Aholiah, the tables of stone, the ark, the cherubim, and the pot of manna, as symbols of divine things. He states that pictures of Christ, of James the Lord's brother, of Stephen and other martyrs, had been taken by their contemporaries, and used from the first in the conversion of the heathen; he adduces as a fact the sending of his own portrait by Christ to Agabus, king of Edessa; and alleges that the six general councils had handed down the tradition of image-worship. On Leo, in reply, asking how it was that these councils had never mentioned the subject, Gregory rejoins that their silence was equivalent to approval, since the practice was known to have been prevalent at the time of the councils, and habitual to the fathers who composed them. Neither, says he, was anything said in these councils about images being the source of error or ought not to be eat and drink. Leo had referred to the destruction of the bruzy serpent by Uzziah (meaning Hezekiah) as justifying his own iconoclasm. Gregory, in replying, falls into the same mistake as to the king referred to, and speaks of his act as one of sacrilege. "Truly," he says, "Uzziah was thy brother, and had thy persuasion, and like thee he tyrannized over the priests of the Lord; he put the holy David's priest on the ark into the temple; and the anger of the image of he rejoins, as the usual assertion of the devotions they were the means of kindling, of the instruction they afforded especially to the young and ignorant, and of the real objects of all such worship being not the images themselves but the originals represented by them. The tone of the letters towards the emperor himself is contemptuous and insulting: he is addressed as insolent, proud, headstrong, unlearned, stupid, and with a deuce78 military intellect incapable of entering into spiritual things; he is bid to go to an elementary school, and announce himself as a destroyer and persecutor of images, when the children would at once throw their tablets at his head. The emperor's provocation and a general council to settle the matter of dispute Gregory replies, "Thou art a contumelious persecutor, enemy, and destroyer of images: leave off, and grant as the favour of thy silence, and then the world will enjoy peace, and scandals will cease. When is the Christ-loving and pious emperor to sit in council in the accustomed way, and reward those who speak aright, and dismiss those who babble contrary to the truth, when thou, the emperor, waverest and imitate barbarians? Only keep quiet, and there is no need of a council." Further, the emperor is reminded of the entire distinction between the functions of emperors and of bishops, and how the former have many honorary names, and the latter are in things proper to the latter. Lastly, significant warnings are given of the possible consequences of the emperor's persistence in his schemes. "I (to this effect writes the pope) have no fear of you. I have only to pass into Campania, and I shall be safe. The whole West venerates St. Peter as a terrestrial god. I purpose visiting the western regions of the West, where my missions have been requesting my aid in bringing princes to baptism. Naked and unarmed as we are, we call on Christ the prince of the supernal powers to send a demon upon you, as says the apostle, 'to deliver such a one to Satan,' &c. Consider what may ensue. Already, in the East, women have been found inflamed with zeal, and, emulous of the glorious exploits of their predecessors, when they had in vain implored your agent to spare the image of the Saviour, pulled away the ladder on which he stood, and killed him with clubs. Already your authority has been disowned, and your statues broken in Italy. Should you send your satellites to Rome to overthrow the image of St. Peter, the Westerns are ready to avenge the Easterns. See, we protest to thee, we are innocent of the blood which they will shed: back on thy neck and thy head will these things fall!" A synod afterwards held at Rome is alluded to by pope Hadrian (Ep. 1, ad Car. Magn.), in which, after a speech from the pope setting forth the usual arguments for image-worship, the retention of the practice was decreed, and its impugners condemned. In return the emperor is said to have confiscated the patrimonial estates in Sicily and Calabria, and subjected these provinces, as well as Eastern Illyricum, to Constantinople instead of Rome. But it is not certain whether the synod referred to was held under Gregory II. or his successor Gregory III., in whose reign the reprints of the emperor above mentioned seem to have taken place. The Greek historians, Théophanes, Colreneus, Zonarins, Nicephorus, followed by Baronius, by Bellarmine (de Pont. Rom. v. 8), and on the Protestant side by the Magdeburg Centuritars (Cent. viii.), assert that Gregory II. excommunicated the emperor himself as well as the patriarch Anastasius. But his excommunication of the emperor is not mentioned by Paulinus Diaconus, by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, nor by any other Latin writers, and is now generally discredited.

Gregory, besides his activities in the ways that have been detailed, was memorable for his restoration of churches ruined by the Lombard ravages, and his re-establishment of neglected monasteries. Among the churches restored by him are mentioned especially the basilica of St. Paul, and that of St. Lawrence without the walls, to which he also conveyed water by pipes. Among the monasteries restored by him, and replenished with monks, were those about the basilica of St. Paul, one called Gerontocomium, behind the apse of St. Mary ad Praesepum, and especially the original Benedictine monastery on Mount Cassino.

He died Feb. 10, 731. He appears as a saint in the Roman Calendar, his day being the 13th of the same month. The following letters of this pope are preserved:—

1. The fragment of one to Turpin, archbishop of Rheims, with respect to a bishop Rigobert, who had been uncanonicaly deposed by Charles Martel. (Char. Martel, 171.)

2. To Austroburt, archbishop of Vienne, commanding Boniface to him, dated prid. Cal. Sept. ann. 3. Leon. imp. (Baron. ad ann. 718.)

3. To Boniface himself (above referred to), giving him commission to preach to the heathen under the authority of, and in subjection to the apostolic see, dated ad Mai. am. ca. Leon. Imp. (Baron. ad ann. 719; Boniface. Epist.)

4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9. Six letters commentary of Boniface after his consecration, which have been specified above. (Baron. ad ann. 723; Boniface. Epist.)

10. To Boniface himself, mentioning among other things that the writer had sent a letter to Charles Martel exhorting him to take measures against a band of bandits who had deserted to evangelize the Germans, and also to Thuringians and Germans exhorting them to found sees and churches. (Baron. ad ann. 724; Boniface. Ep. 15 in Giles's edition.)

11. To Boniface in reply to various questions with respect to matters of discipline. In consideration of the barbarity of the people they may be allowed to marry after the fourth degree of consanguinity; a husband whose wife "intimata corrupra non valuerit debuit tori reddere" may be allowed to marry another, "because here great people are concerned," but must maintain his first wife; an accused presbyter, if the proofs against him are uncertain, may purge himself by his own oath: one cup only is to be used in the celebration of mass, in conformity with the original institution by Christ. St. Paul's rule about not eating things that had been sacrificed to idols is to be observed, even though the sign of the cross had been made over the meats, infants placed by their parents in monasteries are not to be released on coming to years of discretion; persons baptized by adulterous and unworthy priests, and without interrogation as to their faith, are not to be rebaptized if the right form had been observed; children taken from their parents, of whose baptism there is no proof, are to be baptized. No one once confirmed by a bishop is to be confirmed again; faithful lepers, though not to be allowed to eat with between Italy and Constantinople, together with renewed Lombard aggressions, consequent on the Iconoclastic controversy. It was further especially noteworthy for the first step taken towards the transference of Rome politically from the suzerainty of the Eastern emperors to that of the Frank rulers of the West.

Immediately after his accession this pope took up the cause of image-worship, in which his predecessor had been so zealous, sending a letter to Leo and to his son Constantius Copronymus (associated with him in the empire since 720), calling on them to renounce their errors. His messenger, Gregory, a Roman presbyter, having returned to Rome without having had the courage to deliver the letter, and having been again despatched, was arrested in Sicily by the emperor's order, and sent into exile. Gregory had convened a synod at Rome, attended by ninety-three bishops and the clergy generally, the laity being also present, in which image-worship was again established as agreeable to the practice of the Apostles, profaners and blasphemers of sacred images were mitigated, and a resolution was come to that a new attempt should be made to convert the emperor. Accordingly two more unsuccessful legations were sent to Constantinople. The first was headed by Constantine, defender of the Roman church, carrying a second letter from the pope; but he was stopped on his road and imprisoned for a year. The second (in 730), headed by Peter the Defender, was charged not only with letters from the pope both to the emperor and to the patriarch, but also with a memorial from the people of Italy, representing the disturbances which had arisen from the imperial edict against images, and their determination to oppose it. The members of this legation were arrested in Sicily by Sergius, the commander of the imperial troops there, and sent back to Rome. (Anastas. Biblioth.) Next year (734) the emperor sent a fleet under Manes, in the hope of reducing his Italian subjects to obedience. The fleet was wrecked by a storm in the Adriatic, after which all attempts on both sides ceased (Theophan. ad ann. Leon. 17).

The exarch remained powerless at Ravenna, unable even there to enforce the edict, and the Romans once more appointed magistrates of their own, forming a sort of independent republic, under the pope as their head. In the meantime Gregory is said to have expended large sums, amounting to seventy-three pounds weight of gold, and 376 of silver, in filling the churches at Rome with pictures and images, and in collecting relics from various quarters, for the keeping and veneration of which he founded an oratory with an establishment of monks. Peace continued till 740, when the Lombards became the authors of new disturbances. The two dukes of Spoleto and Benevento, who in the time of Gregory II. had rebelled against Luitprand, the Lombard king, and been by him reduced with the exarch's aid, again revolted. Defeated by Luitprand, they took refuge in Rome, where the pope protected them. In the spring of 741 Luitprand invaded and devastated the Roman territory, and having given up to plunder the church of St. Peter without the walls, laid siege to the city. Now it was that Gregory began the overtures to the Franks, which led eventually to such impor-tient results. Charles Martel had now for twenty-six years been the virtual ruler of the Franks, as mayor of the palace, and had a few years before won his memorable victory over the Saracens at Tours. To him, the most powerful magnate of the age, Gregory sent an embassy, carrying, among other valuable presents, keys of St. Peter’s tomb, and supposed filings from the chain with which the apostle had been bound in Rome; and imploring protection to the apostle, his patron. Upon this occasion a letter was sent, though it received the embassy with great respect, and bestowed presents in return, was unmoved by the request. Gregory now addressed to him a most pathetic letter, which is extant (Greg. iii. Ep. 5, Concil.; Baron ad ann. 749), in which he represents himself as overwhelmed with grief, tears streaming day and night from his eyes, on beholding the church of God abandoned by all her children, even by those in whom she had most reason to confide. He draws a most lamentable picture of the devastation and destitution caused by the Lombard invaders, and attributes their aggression, not to the protection required, but to the humiliation of the church, and the latter having refused to join Luitprand in making war on the church and people of God. Those, he says, who accuse these persecuted dukes of treason and rebellion are guilty of a lie. St. Peter, he declares, is able to defend his own house and people without the aid of mortal man, though, with some apparent inconsistence, he speaks of his whole kingdom and his dominions depending on Charles’s answer. He beseeches them to appeal by both his pride and his religious fears, as well as to his compassion and piety. “O that you could but hear the insulting and reproachful language with which they revile us, or rather you! Where is that mighty Charles, or they, whose protection you have implored? Where are those formidable Frank armies? Let them come to deliver you, if they dare, out of our hands!” And, appealing to his religious fears, he implores him, as he regards the salvation of his own soul, to hasten to the relief of St. Peter’s church, lest the apostle in his turn should shut the gates of heaven on him; and he, the pope, undertakes, if delivered from the present danger, to pray day and night before the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul for Charles and all his subjects. But neither this nor a second letter had the desired effect; and it was not till a substantial temporal equivalent for the aid demanded was offered that anything was done. Such an equivalent was offered, through a second embassy, by ordinary promise; and the business should altogether renounce their allegiance to the emperor, and put themselves under Charles as their protector, on whom the title of Patrician and Consul of Rome was to be conferred, he undertaking to protect them against the Lombards, and against the emperor in case of his molesting them. Charles now sent Griman, abbot of Korneuburg, as his emissaries to Rome. After their arrival the Lombards withdrew their troops and ceased from hostilities, retaining, however, four cities in the Roman territory which they had captured. The death of Charles Martel on Oct. 22 of the year of this treaty (741), and of Gregory on Nov. 27 of the same year, prevented any further immediate results. (On this whole
GREGORIUS—MONKS AND CLERGY

Danube, or elsewhere at the discretion of Boniface, and to receive him there with due honour, and accept from him the faith and order of the Roman Church, rejecting Britons and all false and heretical priests, as well as lingering rites of heathenism. 4. To Boniface himself in reply to an answer to have sent of his preaching. In Germany he had reported the conversion, with the aid of Charles Martel, of as many as one hundred thousand. In Bavaria, when he had found but one bishop, Vivilius, ordained not long before by the pope, he had announced his establishment, with the consent of duke Odilo, of the four new sees already mentioned. Of this measure the pope approves, urges him not to relax his endeavours to procure entire uniformity to the traditions of the Roman see, directs him to assemble a council on the banks of the Danube, and enjoin him not to stay in one place, but go and ordain bishops, and require uniformity with Rome wherever he can, regardless of difficulties. (Bonif. Ep. 43, 44, 45, 46, Giles's ed.)

It appears from the above summary that the establishment of Roman orthodoxy and order, and of Roman supremacy, was as difficult a part of the work of Boniface, and equally at the heart of his master, as the planting of the cross among unbelievers.

England was not overlooked by Gregory III, who, in 735, sent the pall to Eghbert bishop of York, who was the first, according to Bede, since Paulinus who had thus been constituted archbishop of that see (Bede, H. E. Contin.).

To this pope is attributed the institution of the feast of All Saints on Nov. 1, in place of that in honour of the blessed Virgin and all martyrs, which Boniface IV. had appointed for the 13th of May (Anastas. Bibloth.).

Besides the letters above referred to, an extant document is attributed to this pope Excerptum ex epist. dictis et canonum consentientibus, about sins and penances, for the use of confessors. Anastasius states that he also left a book of epistles no longer extant. He describes him as learned as well as mild, pious, and charitable, being versed in the Latin and Greek languages, and in holy writ, and mentions as a thing then new and unheard of that he knew all the Psalms by heart. He appears as a saint in the Roman calendar, his day being the 28th of November.

For the authorities for his life, see the list appended to the life of Gregory II. [J. B.—y.]

GREGORIUS (55), abbat, fl. 390. He migrated from Palestine to Cyprus. Epiphanius, afterwards bishop of Salamis, appears on arriving in Cyprus to have entered his monastery. In one of his letters Gregory calls Epiphanius his son, and exhorts him to greater austerities. The high esteem of the latter for his old abbat is evident from an epistle of Epiphanius addressed to John of Jerusalem, and translated into Latin by St. Jerome. Gregory died before or soon after Epiphanius. He was the author of a Syriac work of unknown title and contents; ten discourses to his monks; and three epistles, one addressed to his disciple Theodore, and two to Epiphanius. (Assem. Bibloth. Orient. i. 170.) [C. J. B.]

GREGORIUS (56), a deacon and monk of Nazianzen, formerly a slave of Gregory Nazianzen, but manumitted by him as a reward for the loyalty of his service. He was one of the executors of Gregory's will, together with Marcellus the deacon and monk, and Eustathius. Gregory made him universal legate of all his property both real and personal, to hold it for the benefit of the church of Nazianzen and its poor. As a personal legacy Gregory bequeathed him and Eustathius a farm at Anianzus, together with the live-stock, and fifty gold pieces. (Greg. Naz. Testam.) [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (57), a presbyter and abbot of a monastery near Jerusalem, or perhaps of Epiphanius's own house at Eleutheropolis, who was mixed up with the dispute between Epiphanius and John of Jerusalem, arising from the ordination of Jerome's brother Paulinian. John asserted that he had sent a message through Gregory to Epiphanius forbidding him to ordain any one, which was denied by Gregory (Hieron. Epist. i.; Rufin. Hist. E. c. ii. 157). [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (58), abbat of Zeugma on the Euphrates, contemporary with Theodoret in the 5th century. (Theodoret, Philoth. cap. 5.) [C. J. B.]

GREGORIUS (59), presbyter and archimandrite of the monastery of Cyprus, according to one place in the lists, and in the Latin only. [Georgius (48).] [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (60), St., a local saint of Alcalá del Río, on the Guadalquivir, near Seville. His relics were preserved there in a church built by Ferdinand and Isabella in his honour. The epitaph on the tomb in which they were found states that he lived about seventy years, and died in peace on the 9th of September, 542 of the era of the Goths, corresponding to A.D. 504. He is commemorated on the 9th of September. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 308.) [F. D.]

GREGORIUS (61), abbas, presbyter in the coenobium of Scholares, from whom John Moschus, while residing in Nuceis at Alexandria, heard a story about an aged brother of his society. The brother was of such extreme simplicity that he indifferently communicated in the Eucharist, wherever he chanced to be. One day an angel appeared to him and revealed to him how he would like to be buried after death, whether according to the manner of the Egyptian monks or the manner of the Jerusalem monks. The old man was unable to say, and the angel gave him three weeks to consider. He consulted one of the brethren as to the answer he should give. "Where do you receive the sacrament?" asked the brother. "Wherever I find it," was the old man's simple reply. "In future then," returned the brother, "never communicate out of the Catholic apostolic church, within which the four holy synods are recognised, the Nicene of 318 fathers, the Constantinopolitan of 150, the first Ephesian of 200, the Chalcedonian of 650. Tell the angel you wish to be buried as the monks of Jerusalem.” The angel returned and the old man replied accordingly. “Well, well,” said the angel, and the old man immediately died, being thus spared the disorder of having laboured in vain and being buried with heretics. (Ioann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 145, in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 209.)
GREGORIUS—MONKS AND CLERGY

GREGORIUS (62), archimandrite of the monastery of St. Theodosius in the wilderness of Jerusalem, who told John Moschus the story of GREGORIUS the Cappadocian (cf. No. 69).

GREGORIUS (63), the Cappadocian, an anchorite, regarding whom John Moschus was told the following story by GREGORIUS the archimandrite of the monastery of Theodosius in the wilderness of Jerusalem. Gregory the Cappadocian, a brother of this society, had his duties at Phaselis. On a certain baking day he had lit the fire, but when he came to clean out the oven the cloth was not to be found, for the brethren had hidden it in order to try his patience; so Gregory got into the oven, swept it out with his own coat, and came out uninjured by the fire. Another day he was feeding swine at Phaselis when two lions approached and tried to carry them off. Gregory took a switch and drove the lions down to the Jordan. (Ioann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 92, in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 165.)

GREGORIUS (64), abbas, anchorit, respecting whom John Moschus was informed by one of the anchorites of Theopoli near Mount Amanus. When Gregory, who wandered naked in the desert for thirty-five years, was in the mountains near the monastery of Theodosius in Scopus, the disciple by whom he was accompanied died. Gregory having no implements for digging a grave, descended to the shore, where he found a party of sailors just arrived and begged them to come and bury the holy. They did so, and one of them named Thalaeus remained to take the dead man’s place. After a year he found his frame wonderfully invigorated, but in two years and a half more Thalaeus, believing he was going to die, begged Gregory to go with him to Jerusalem, where he might adore the cross before his departure. Thither they went, and after visiting the sacred spots descended to the Jordan, where Thalaeus died and was buried in the monastery of Copratha. Here Gregory himself soon afterwards died and was buried. (Ioann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 91 in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 164.)

GREGORIUS (65) THE BYZANTINE, abbas, anchorit, respecting whom John Moschus was informed by the anchorites of Raithu, near the Red Sea. This Gregory took up his abode with another anchorit, his disciple, named GREGORIUS Pharonites, on a neighbouring island where he had to remain for a long time and was to be fetched from the mainland in a boat which they kept. One day they had moored the boat to a rock, and let her float, but a storm in the night broke the rope and wrecked the boat. After eight months some monks of Raithu landed on the island and found both of their brethren dead, and on the back of a turtle there was an inscription recording that Gregory Pharonites died after going without water twenty-eight days, and his master had lasted none for thirty-seven days. (Ioann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 121, in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 181.)

GREGORIUS (66), abbot of St. Theodore in the district of Palermo, who by his neglect had caused great harm to his monastery, and was not allowed by Gregory the Great to be restored till after long punishment. (Greg. Magn., Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. ep. 12; lib. v. indict. xiii. ep. 6; Migne, lxxi. 455, 727.)

GREGORIUS (67), surnamed BORMITANUS (ος ὑρρόμενος), a Serenerian of Alexandria in the 7th century. He held more than one public disputation in that city with Anastasius Sinaita, who in his Hodogus or Vase Dux speaks of him with little respect as in habit of mind a SyroEgyptian. (Anastas. Sinait. Vase Dux, cap. 10 in Migne, Patr. Græc. lxxix. 161, 169 n., 173, 181, 184.)

GREGORIUS (68), presbyter, messenger of pope Gregory III. (Gregorios (63), p. 796.) (Anastas. Bibliothec. de Vit. Rom. Pontif. s. 191, in Patr. Lat. cxviii. 1024, the readings vary between GREGORIUS and Georgius.)

GREGORIUS (69), Roman prebendaries present at Roman councils, and belonging to the following churches:
St. John and St. Paul, in 721 (Mansi, xi. 265), possibly the Georgius of 745 (M. 381). (Georgios (61).)
St. Clement in 745 (M. 385, 380).
St. Balbina in 745 (M. 381); at council of Paul I. in 761 (M. 649).
St. Anastasius, at council of 761 (M. 650).
Two prebendaries of churches unnamed at council of 743 (M. 367, 368).

GREGORIUS (70), ST., disciple of Boniface, abbot and administrator of the church of Ulricb (Trajectum). His life was written by his disciple St. Ludger, first bishop of Minster. He was born about A.D. 708, at Treves, of a noble Frank family, his father, Albricus, being a grandson of king Dagobert II. St. Boniface, on his way from Frisia to new labours among the Hunsians and Thuringians, rested by the way at the convent of Poly (Palatium), near Treves, of which Adala or Adela, the grandmother of Gregory, was abbess. The youth, who had just left school, and was fourteen or fifteen years of age, was sent for, at the suggestion of Boniface, to read the Scriptures for the edification of the company at the convent meals. He read well, but Boniface, by his questions, elicited that he did not understand what he had read, so as to render it into his own Teutonic language. Thereupon the saint expounded and commented on the passage so eloquently that the boy’s heart was touched, and he announced his intention of accompanying him on his mission. In vain his grandmother remonstrated. Gregory declared that if she would not provide him with a horse, he would go on foot, but go he would. Arrived in Thuringia they found the country desolated and impoverished by war. The labour of their hands provided them with the barest sustenance; and often some outbreak of the heathen compelled them to a hasty, though temporary, flight. But GREGORIUS—MONES and CLEI Gy

their labours were rewarded by the gradual conversion of the land.

In time St. Boniface became bishop of Mentz (743), and his disciples were appointed administrators of the neighbouring districts, and among them, St. Gregory of the church of Utrecht, where he was assisted by a coadjutor of English race, named Alubert. He never became bishop, though his biographer does not state it in so many words, it seems to have been the abbot of a monastery in that city, for in the Acta of St. Ludger (s. 8; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcl. 773), we read: "Friedlandus discipulus ei habitavit in monasterio in Uræthtum, when he became St. Gregory's disciple.

He accompanied St. Boniface on one of his journeys to Rome, and brought back many sacred volumes, and two boys of English race named Marchelinus and Marciuvinus, who became his disciples.

His biographer dwells on his contempt of money, the simplicity of his food and raiment, his sobriety, his gentleness to enemies and detractors, and his almsgiving. Two of his half-brothers, returning from France to their own country, were set upon and killed by robbers. The murderers, when captured, were brought to Gregory, that he might inflict upon them what death he chose. Disdaining all thought of vengeance, he loosed their bonds, and when they had been tended and fed, dismissed them with exhortations and words of charity.

His disciples were very numerous, and were drawn, we are told, from high-born Franks, the "religious gens" of the Angli, the newly converted Saxons and Saxons, and even from the Bavarians and Suevi. Many of them rose to high place in the church.

At the age of seventy he was stricken with paralysis of the left side, which for three years, until his death in A.D. 781, rendered him nearly helpless, so that at last he was carried about by his disciples. Feeling his end approaching, he had himself borne to the oratory of St. Salvador, where he breathed his last, and where he was probably buried. He is commemorated Aug. 25. A letter written to him in 752 by Lullius, bishop of Mainz, is extant (Migne, Patr. Lat. xxvi. 821). His successor at Uræthtum was a kinsman and adopted son named Albrigicus. (Vita S. Gregorii Abatæ, nec. Ludgeri in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcl. 732; Bull. Acta SS. Aug. v. 240; Mabillon, Acta SS. (éd. S. Bened. sec. iii. pars ii. 319 seqq., Paris, 1668-1701.)

GREGORIUS (71), the name of the following presbyters at the council of Nicaea in 787:—

Representing the bishop of Caphellenia (Mansi, xiii. 146 b, Latin; Georgius in the Greek).

Representing the bishop of Smyrna (M. xii. 1096 a).

Representing the bishop of Nicopolis (M. xii. 1096 e). [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (72), the name of the following bishop of Caphellenia in 787, viz. of Agaurus (Mansi, xiii. 151 a).

Callistratus (s. 151 b).

Ludgerus (s. 151 a).

Hynaihys (s. 151 n, xii. 1111 k).

Monagrus (xiii. 151 d).

GREGORIUS—LAYMAN

Pega (xii. 1112 n, Latin, Georgius in Greek).

[GREGORIUS (70).]

St. Clement (xiii. 156 e). [C. H.]

St. Theokotos (s. 158 d).

GREGORIUS (73), a soldier, who with two others, Theodosius and Leo, in the time of Constantius, took refuge from the Arian persepcution in the island of Cephalonia, where they lived in the ruins of a temple concealed by a thick wood. Their remains are said to have been miraculously revealed to Michael, a rich nobleman of the island, who was a leper, and who was cured by touching them. They are mentioned in the additions to Usuard's Martyrology in the Cologn edition of A.D. 1515 (in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxiv. 396). They are commemorated on August 24. (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 771.) [F. D.]

GREGORIUS (75), a governor of Capadocia, to whom shortly after his arrival Gregory Nazianzen wrote in behalf of his niece Alypiana, the widow of Nicobulus, and her children. The recent death of her husband had plunged Alypiana in such a sea of troubles that she and her children had no leisure even to bemoan their misery. Gregory earnestly commends the widow and orphans to Gregory's protection. (Greg. Naz. Epist. 44.) [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (76), prefect of Gaul, at the end of the reign of Gratian (Sulp. Sever. ii. 49). [Petrissianus.] [M. B. C.]

GREGORIUS (77), Patriarch of Africa, 465. He presided at the public disputation which was held in Africa that year between the abbat Maximus of Prague and the exile of Constantinople (Maxim. Dein. c. Pyrro, Migne, Patr. Gr. xci. 297-354). A.D. 647 he revolted, by the aid of the Saracenis, and was soon afterwards killed in battle by his allies (Theoph. Chron. s. a.). Joannes Moschus, who praises Gregory very highly, has a characteristic story about him. He also states that he was a native of the province of Apamene, Syria Secunda (Paul. Spirit. c. 196; Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxx. 83); Baromias, s. a. 645, i. iii. vi. xxv. s. a. 646, xxx. s. a. 647, i.; Pagi, s. a. 646). Maximus also calls him GREGORIUS (ep. 18, Migne, u. s. 585). [T. W. D.]

GREGORIUS (78), duke of Benerveto (752-758), nephew of Luitprand, by whom he was put into the duchy during the minority of Giululf, another nephew, son of the former duke of Romnald. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 55, 56; Cata

GREGORIUS (79), protopatriarch or commander of the imperial guard, martyr for image

Hosted by Google
GREGORIUS DECAPOLITES

worship, with Maria a patrician lady and others [Maria].

GREGORIUS (80) DECAPOLITES, lived under Leo V. the Armenian, A.D. 813-820. He took his surname from being born at one of the cities of the Isaurian Decapolis, named Irenopolis. Joseph the Hymnographer was a pupil of his, and was dispatched by him to Rome to appoint pope Leo III. with the unhappy state of the kingdom under the reigning emperor, who was an ardent adherent of the Iconoclasts, and cruelly persecuted those who took the opposite side. Gregory was a considerable traveller, and visited many foreign countries. On his return to Constantinople he had the grief of finding that Joseph had been apprehended by Leo, and carried prisoner to Crete, where he remained in confinement till the emperor's death in 820. Gregory found another confessor, named Simeon, at Constantinople, suffering on account of his resistance to the Iconoclasts, and visited and comforted him in his prison. He did not long survive the emperor, and Joseph, on his return from Crete, found his old master dead, and erected a monument to his body and that of his fellow pupil John. Gregory is commemorated in the Menonac on Nov. 20, though he is placed by some on April 18. We have extant a historical sermon of his, narrating the conversion of a Arab marauder named Ampelous, who was sacrilegiously profaning a church at the time of the celebration of the Eucharist, by the miraculous appearance of a living child to the pater and blood in the chalice. (Galland. Vit. Patr. B. vol. xiii. p. 13; Migne, Patrol. vol. c. p. 1199; Pagius, ad ann. 731, No. 2, ad ann. 817, No. 18.)

GREGORII (GALLAN, GREALLAN, GRIULAN, GRIULLAN), (1) the son of Rotan, commemorated April 15 (Mart. Donog.; Mart. Tall). He has been identified with one of the companions of St. Columba when he came from Ireland to Iona. Reeves and Fordun call him Grillan, and Leslieus and Bohius, Gallan, but all place him last in the list. On the authority of the last two authors, Dempster and Camerarius tell of Galliana's piety and labours in the conversion of the Picts and the establishment of a monastery in A.D. 584, and died in A.D. 606, and died in A.D. 623. He is named among the reputed authors of Acta S. Columbae, and also wrote Exhortatio ad munaches, lib. i., but if so, his writings are lost. Camerarius commemorates St. Gallanus, monachus et confessor, at Dec. 7, and Dempster at Sept. 11 (and Mem. Scot.). (Colgan, Tr. Thumun. 470, col. 2, 490 n. 70 et al.; Fordun, Scotich. i. c. 261; Reeves, St. Adamnan, 246; Bohius, Hist. Scot. i. 167; Leslieus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. 145; Dempster, Hist. Eo. Gent. Scot. 298; Tanner, Bibl. 307; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 201.)

(2) Of Craebh Greallaigh, and patron of the Hy-Many, commemorated Nov. 10. Of this saint there are Lives, written not on vellum but on paper, in one of the Brussels Irish MSS., and in the library of the Royal Irish Academy; extracts are given by Colgan (Tr. Thumun. 206-208), and in a much fuller form by O'Donovan from the Book of Lecan (Trises and Customs of the Hy-Many, 8-18, Dublin, 1843; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. iii. 485, vii. 372-73). His father was Cuillia or Callinus, son of Caidre Cristh. Bioch. — Vol. II.

GRIFFON, of Leinster, and his mother's name was Ethene or Ethene. According to the lives he was born in the time of St. Patrick, but this probably puts him too early; he is more likely to have been a pupil of St. Finian of Clonard. Yet in the lives he is represented as having obtained a place called Achadh Fionnabhrach from Duach Gallach, king of Connaught, where the saint built a church, before Maine Mor arrived in Connaught: this place was afterwards called Craeagh-Greallian, from the Irish Cnaobh, a branch, the symbol given to Grellan by St. Patrick and king Duach, in token of possession, and is said to have been in the east of Magh Luirc, now the plains of Boyle, co. Roscommon. He also erected a church at Coll-cluinna, now Kilclooney, near the town of Ballinasloe, in the barony of Clonmacowen, co. Galway. When Maine Mor came with the Cola-da-Chirici and displaced Cian with his Firbolgs, St. Grellan resigned the care of the conquerors, and put himself under heavy tribute in return for his support. His catabh or battle craszer, which was used as the standard of the tribe of the Hy-Mayne in the counties of Galway and Roscommon, and with which he is reported to have wrought a miracle by rescuscitating the infant Loghan Sricadh, was up to 1836 preserved in the family of the O'Ronchaille or Cronelly, the ancient comharbas or coars of the saint, but is now lost sight of. He probably lived about the end of the 6th century, if he be not regarded as a contemporary with the aged St. Patrick. (Colgan, Acta SS. 252, n. 14, 337, c. 7, 339, n. 24, 376, c. 28, 399, n. 14; Tr. and Cust. Hy-Mayne, by O'Donovan, ut supra, p. 81.)

GRELLOG OEBLECH (Gallan, Greallan, Grullan, Grullan), commemorated July 13. O'Clyr (Mart. Donug. by Todd and Reeves, 159) says Grellog Oeblock, of Tamlacht Charuna, in Ul Bresail-northir, "may be Grella, sister of Manchán of Lios, and of Grellabach; and Mella was the mother of all three." [Mangan.]

GRIEBERTUS of Geneva. [Guerburtus.]

GRICINIANUS, martyr. [Gratianus.]

GRICINUS (Cricinus), bishop of Verona, c. A.D. 356-360. He seems to have been the seventh bishop, and to have succeeded Lucillus and been followed by St. Zeno. (Ugheelli, Ital. Soc. v. 550; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Itali. x. 744; Biancelli, I vescovi di Verona, ii. p. 1.)

GRIFFO, son of Charles Martel. [Griffo.]

GRIFFO, bishop of Aosta. [Griffo.]

3 F
GRIMOALDUS (2), king of the Lombards, 662–673, youngest son of Gisulf the first duke of Friuli. When Gisulf lost his life in resisting an incursion of the Avars in his own dominions, he put his two young sons before the court of Arighis, duke of Benevento, a friend of their family; or, as Paulus Diaconus says, their former instructor. Arighis, on his death, not considering his own son Aio fit to succeed him, commended the two young sons of the duke of Friuli to his subjects. Aio, however, became duke, and was killed in a year’s time, c. 662, fighting against the Slaves. Radalod succeeded him, and on his death, c. 647, Grimald became duke of Benevento. For fourteen years we know nothing about him; but in 651, the Lombard kingdom having been divided between the two sons of Aripert, one of them, Godepert, sent to Grimald for help. Gurpal, duke of Turin, the royal messenger, intrigued with Grimald, who, having left his duchy in the hands of his son Romuald, marched northwards with a constantly growing army to take the kingdom. Ultimately, rightly suspecting treachery from Godepert, he killed him with his own hand at Pavia, and became king, and married Godepert’s sister. Upon this Godepert’s brother Persibari, who ruled in Milan, fled. In 663 Grimald was summoned to Beneventum by his son Romuald to help him against the emperor Constans, who had landed at Tarentum, and was besieging Beneventum. At the approach of Grimald, the emperor withdrew to Naples. On his return to the north Grimald carried matters with a high hand. Lupus, duke of Friuli, had been left in charge at Pavia; but, having betrayed his trust, Grimald’s return to Friuli, Grimald did not wish for civil war, and so called in the Avars to suppress power of the mayor of the palace with the regal title. Accordingly Grimald took possession of the infant king, cut off his long hair, the badge of royalty, and sent him away secretly by Dolo, or Dulo, bishop of Pavia, to a certain Cunigunde, his own son Childebert proclaimed king. The Franks, however, were not yet prepared for this revolution, and the Austrasian nobles rose in rebellion, and, capturing Grimald by stratagem, delivered him to Clovis king of Neustria, who imprisoned him at Paris, and put him to death with torture (a.d. 650). The annals of the time generally err in attributing the fall of the Austrasian authorities to Grimald’s life are, besides those mentioned above, the Chronicon in Bouquet, ii. 446, 552; iii. 304, 328, 343, 350–1; Frevigard, Chron. Ixxxv. Ixxxvii. Ixxviii.; Aimoin, iv. 38; Gesta Reg. Franc. cap. xliii. in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxvi. 1459; Vita S. Sigeberti, iv. 10–12, v. 14 in Bouquet, ii. 446–7; Audo. Chron. Migne, Patr. Lat. xxvi. 117; and for two letters to him from Desiderius (Didier), bishop of Cahors. See Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxxvii. 249, 251; Bouquet, iv. 37–8; cf. also Richter, Annales, 184–7. [S. A. B.]

GRIMOALDUS (1), son and successor of Pippin of Landen, mayor of the palace in Austrasia, who died 638. The office was not yet hereditary, and the claim of Grimaud, who was personally popular, to succeed his father was stoutly contested by Otto, who had been tutor to the young king Sigebert III., and seems to have had command of the influence of the court. Grimoald, aided by Cunibert archbishop of Cologne, the friend of his father, endeavoured for three years vainly to replace him in the palace. In 640 the rebellion of Radulphe Sigebert and his army into Thuringia. Grimoald was present among the generals at the defeat on the Unstrut, which resulted in the virtual independence of Thuringia. The ill-success of this expedition may possibly have contributed to discredit Otto. But Grimoald’s success was not complete till 642, when his rival was slain by Leutharius duke of the Alemanni and Grimoald became mayor of the palace without further opposition. His policy seems to have been principally directed towards securing the kingdom against external troubles, and strengthening the central authority; and, no doubt, to him must be ascribed the resolution of Sigebert which forbade the holding of episcopal synods without the king’s permission. See the letter to Desiderius of Cahors, Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxxvii. 264, and cf. Gerard, Hist. des Francs d’Austrasie, l. 359, Paris, 1866.) He does not appear, however, to have been an enemy of the church. When in 647, Sigebert, in his desire for an heir, as it was said, resolved to found twelve monasteries, Grimoald zealously cooperated in his design, and the charters of the two greatest foundations Stavelo and Malmandum, in the Ardennes speak of Grimoald as the builder (Bouquet, iv. 635). The precept, too, which installed St. Remaclus as first abbate of Casseneonguindinense (Cugnon) is addressed to Grimoald (ibid. 634; Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxxvii. 319), and Grimoald himself seems to have made a grant of Germigny to Stavelo (see Bouquet, iii. 635; Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxxvii. 325). For his efforts towards strengthening the position of the throne, see Pertz, Geschichte der Merowingischen Hausmeir, p. 43 seq., and Bonnell, Anfänge des Karol. Hauses, 110. On the death of Sigebert (a.d. 650) Grimoald attempted a measure which more than a century later, when the man of Charles the Great, carried out. Sigebert’s son, Dagobert, was but three years of age, and his opportunity seemed favourable for uniting the almost regal
GRIMOAULUS.

Lupus, and ultimately had some difficulty in getting rid of them. He caused the daughter of Lupus, Theuderada, to marry his son Romuald, duke of Beneventum. He married his own daughter to Thrasamund, formerly count of Capus, who had helped him to obtain the kingdom, and he made Thrasamund duke of Spoleto. He thus united the kingdom and the two great and independent houses in his family. In the early years of his reign he repelled an invasion of the Franks, and c. 675 he made a treaty with Dagobert. (Paulus Diaconus. v. 32, and note in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 155.) He entirely destroyed the town of Oderzo, where his elder brothers had been treacherously killed. He laid waste also the town of Fortipolopoli, whose inhabitants had impeded him on his way to and from Beneventum, and even slew the deacons who were baptizing children at the font. "Fuit autem," says Paulus Diaconus, "corpore pravissimae, audacia primus, calvo capite, barba prominente, non minus consilio quam viribus decoratus." If its later rulers had been as peaceable as the father of the Lombard kingdom might have been different. On his death Perthari succeeded to the kingdom, turning out Grimoald's young son Garibald, and the Lombard power was again divided. Grimoald was buried in the basilica of St. Ambrose at Pavia, which he built. He was the first king who added to the Edict of Rotharis. He added nine sections in the year 688, the most important of which dealt with the responsibility of masters for their servants' actions, the inheritance of grandchildren, and the protection of married women. (Monum. Germ. Legg. iv. p. 91, ed. Blume; Fontes Juris Italici Medii Aevi, Padelletti, 1877, i. p. 171.) The only authority of importance for the life of Grimoald is Paulus Diaconus, lib. iv. 39, 46, 51; lib. v. 1-33. [A. H. D. A.]

GRIPPO (GRIPPO, GRIPPO), third son of Charles Martel by Sonihilde or Swanhildis, the niece of Odilo, duke of Bavaria. Shortly before his death Charles called together his nobles and divided his whole principality between Carolman and Pippin, the elder half-brothers of Grippo. But at the last he was prevailed upon by Sonihilde to allot to her son, whose position seems to have been something between that of his two half-brothers and the sons of Charles' concubines, a portion in the centre of his possessions, comprising a part of Neustria, a part of Austrasia and a part of Burgundy. But this arrangement was upset almost immediately after his death (741). The Franks upon these severed portions of the kingdom resented the forcible transfer of their allegiance from those whom they regarded as the rightful heirs, and, rising in arms, put Carolman and Pippin at their head, and marched against Grippo. He took refuge with his mother and a few followers in Laon, but was soon compelled to surrender, and was placed by Carolman under guard at Neuähltel in the Ardennes, while Sonihilde was shut up in the monastery of Chelles (Calis). Grippo remained in this imprisonment till 747, when Pippin, moved by compassion, released and instilled him honourably in his own palace, and gave him a countship with considerable revenues. But Grippo was not long content. Conspiring with some of the younger nobility, he withdrew to the Saxons, the implacable foe of the Frank power. Pippin pursued with an army through Thuringia into Saxony, and found Grippo with his allies encamped on the river Oker, near where Brunswick now is. But the night before the battle distrust arose, and the Saxons, who seem to have been but half-hearted in his cause, dispersed homewards. Grippo took refuge in Bavaria, whither he was soon followed by Pippin and captured. No thoughts of revenge seem to have actuated the latter, and he gave him the city of Le Mans and twelve counties (749). But Grippo, who, claiming a kingdom, scorned a pension, soon resumed his plots, and secretly repaired to Waithus, duke of Aquitaine, the hereditary foe of Pippin. It seems that about this time the Lombard kingdom had been re-nounced by its king and entered an Italian monastery, had prevailed on Pope Zachary to use his good offices towards reconciling the brothers, as appears from a letter of the latter to the bishops of France (see Bouquet, iv. 98, and Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 933). Grippo could not hope to elude Pippin's pursuit long in Aquitaine, and accordingly resolved to seek Astolfus, or Haitsulfus, the king of Lombardy, and enemy of the papacy and Pippin. But on his way he was met, near Maurienne, by Theodowinus, or Theodonus, count of Vienne, who had been deputed to guard the passes of the Alps, and killed in the combat which ensued (751). There is extant a letter of Boniface to Grippo, in 749, conjuring him, if God should give him the power, to help the clergy in Turinlingia, and protect the monks and nuns there against the heathen (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 741; Bouquet, iv. 98). For the history of Grippo see the Annales Eibardi, Annales Mediolanenses and others in Pertz, i. 135, 137, 139, 327, 330-1, 10, 11, 115-16, and Bouquet, tom. v. v. Frederic. Cont. c. 117, 118; Simondi, Hist. des Francs, ii. 151, 161-4, 201. [S. A. B.]

GRIPPO (GRIPPO), twenty-third archbishop of Rouen, between St. Ambertus and Radulphus. He is probably the "Grippo episcopus" who subscribed the charter of Agirardus or Agerardus for the monastery of the Blessed Virgin on the Loire, though his name is not appended (A.D. 690). (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1228-31; Gall. Christ. xi. 17.) [S. A. B.]

GRIPPO, bishop of Vohore, c. 715. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 216; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1427.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRISTOLOUS, Welsh saint. [CRISTOLOUS.]

GRISUS, bishop of Trevi (between Spoleto and Foligno), present at the Roman synod under Zacharias in 743. (Manu, xii. 367; Hefele, § 364.) [A. H. D. A.]

GROD (Grod, Malal.; Topogas, Cedron.), king of the Huni who dwelt near the Cimmerian city of Bosporus. He came to Constantinople.

F 2
GROSSUS, bishop of Siena, present at the Roman synod under Zacharias in 743. (Mansi, xii. 396; Hefele, § 394.) [A. H. D. A.]

GROTALDUS, ST. (CROTOLDUS), fourth bishop of Worms, between Carolus and Amandus II. (circa. 500). The authors of the Gallia Christiana (v. 661) quote Demochares (De Die. Miss. Sacrif. c. 35), to the effect that he began to build at Worms a noble temple for twelve monks and an abbot, on the walls of which his picture still remained, and where it was believed that he was buried. Le Coïteux, quoting from Franciscus Irenicus, says that Grotaldus and his successors were for a time metropolitans of all Germany, until later that dignity was restored to Mentz. (Le Coïteux, Ann. Ecol. Franc. an. 503, n. iv. tom. i. p. 216.) [S. A. B.]

GRWST, ST. (GORUST, GORWST), the founder of Llanrwst, in Denbigh. His festival has been held on Dec. 1. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 295.) Grwst is the Welsh form of the Irish Drest and Scotch Drust and Drostan (Skene, Celt. Scit. i. 210). [C. W. B.]

GUADILA, bishop of Emporias. [GUNDILANUS.]

GUAGHINUS, bishop of Volterra, c. 706. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 216; UgHELLI, Ital. Socr. i. 1427.) [A. H. D. A.]

GUAIRE (GOAIR), bishop in Gobhail, is not commemorated in the Mart. Doneg., but in the Mart. Tallaghon on Jan. 25. Colgan (Vol. Thaum. 490, n. 45, 502) suggests that he may be a disciple of St. Columba, and the Saxon or Anglo-Saxon-baker at Hy who is mentioned by St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Columbae, iii. c. 10). [GENEÆRUS.] Gobball, Gobhal, Gowel, is a name of very extensive local use in every part of Ireland, so that we have no means of further identification. (O'Flahion, Irish Saints, 436; Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS., xiii.) [J. G.]

(2) Beg commemorated Jan. 9. As traced by Colgan (Acta SS. 223, c. 4) Guaire Beg (Little, in stature or reputation), was son of Lasren, son of Fergus, and in the fifth degree of descent from Colla Uais, monarch of Erin (A.D. 327-331). His church was at Aghadowey, a parish on the west of the Bann, co. Londonderry, and he apparently had a cell at Agivey in the same parish. If he lived in the 7th century, as is commonly said, some steps in his pedigree must have been omitted. (O’Flahion, Irish Saints, i. 148-50; Mart. Doneg., by Todd and Reeves, 11; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 330; Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, 133, n. ".) [J. G.]

(3) Mor, of Aghadowey—Jan. 22. Belonging to the same place and family as the preceding, Guaire Mor (Great) was son of Colman, son of Fuatgase, son of Fergus, and thus sixth in the line of pedigree from Colla Uais. (O’Flahion, Irish Saints, i. 400; Mart. Doneg., by Todd and Reeves, 25; alií ut supra.) [J. G.]

(4) Abbat of Glendaloch, co. Wicklow, died A.D. 810. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 805, i. 415; Ann. Ult. A.D. 809.) [J. G.]

(5) Ua Tibeirida, abbot of Clonfad, co. Westmeath, died 795. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 790; Ann. Ult. A.D. 794.) [J. G.]

QUALIPERUS was a bishop, or at least used the episcopal title; he accompanied St. Rumbold, the Irish-Scott, to Mechlin, and partook of his labours and martyrdom about A.D. 775, but his nationality is only inferred to have been Scotch or Scoito-Irish from that of his master. Dempster would of course regard him as an Albanic Scot. (Dempster, Hist. Ecl. Gent. Scot. i. 317; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 182, Oct. 29; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 15.) [J. G.]

QUALITARIUS (GUALTARIUS), bishop of Firmum (Fermo). A "Gualterius episcopus de Firmo" is mentioned as having been present with other bishops as an assessor at the tribunal of Hildebert, or Hildebrando, Duke of Spoleto, A.D. 777. (UgHELLI, Ital. Socr. ii. 735; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 591.) [R. S. G.]

QUALTERANUS. [GUINTERANUS.]

QUALTERNUS (WALTERNUS), bishop of Geneva, acceded c. A.D. 780, and died A.D. 816. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 590, n. 48; at the synod of bishops at Rome, at which Charlemagne was crowned emperor. (Mullinen, Histoire. Socr. p. 17; Besson, Dioc. de Genève, p. 7.) [R. S. G.]

GUANHUMARA, the wife of Arthur. Geoffry of Monmouth, ix. 8, says that after Arthur had restored the country to its former prosperity, he married Guanhumara, who was descended from the noble race of the Romans (vi. 5, there is a similar marriage of Constantine), and had been brought up by Cador duke of Cornwall; and later on that when Guanhumara heard that Modred had entered Winchester, she fled in despair from York to the city of Légies (Caerleon upon Usk), and in the church of Julius the Martyr resolved to become a nun. Her name does not occur in Gildas or Nennius. The Historia Britonum, attributed to Nennius, has been shown by Paulin Paris to represent the Breton form of the Celtic legends; and in its present shape it contains the results of several recensions, each of which added new matter to it, including legends of Germanus and Patrick, with genealogies and chronological data, and two-legends. The earliest part may date back nearly to the time of Gildas, the latest belongs to the 10th century. The Celtic imagination continually added fresh names and details from other stories; and Geoffry of Monmouth, whose real basis is Nennius, gives us a much enlarged form of the legend, nor did the assimilating process stop with that. It is curious that his work should have appeared in Henry I’s reign, just when Turpin’s Chronicle of Charlemagne appeared in France; these two famous legends influenced the spirit of the two great nations that were now forming, opposed in interest and glory to each other. Much of the detail in Gaffry is invented to account for facts and names which had no existence till long after the English settlement in Britain, and for feudal notions of a still later age; the manners are those of the feudal knights, while knight errantry is not at all a Cynric conception. William of Newburgh at once expressed his diabolism of Gaffry's story, as did Higden afterwards, but Higden's translator, Trevissa, defends it. The story of Arthur in Nennius, though not authentic history, is founded on the traditions of the streams from the proto-Celtic population of the British and the English invaders. That native chiefs who had married Roman wives should have taken the lead in the struggle is probable enough. The names of Arthur's first battles point to North England, where the Roman troops and colonists were settled more thickly along the Great Wall. "The first war was at the mouth of the Glein, the second, third, fourth and fifth on the Douglas in the region of Linnaus, the sixth on the river Bassas, the seventh in the wood of Celdion, the eighth near Castle Guininion (the name Castellum seems to point to a Roman station), the ninth at the city Leogis, called in British Caer Lion, the tenth on the shore of the river, the eleventh on the mountains of the moun tain Breguoin, the twelfth on mount Bedon; and in all these wars he was victorious, as were many other British warriors." So the text of the Vatican MS., written in the fifth year of king Edmund, A.D. 946, which Gunn edited, and which Mal reprinted in his "Appendix ad opera edita" (only issued in 1871), without being aware that it was the text of the book as commonly assigned to Nennius. But while the earlier battles seem to be in the north, some of the later may be assigned to Wessex, and we know that the earliest settlements of the Saxons were in the north and in Wessex. It is probable that, as usual in legend, the great name has swallowed up the little ones, and that under the name of Arthur is summed up the death of several chiefs "perplures militari Brittones" as the Vatican MS. says; in fact, in the poems attributed to the early Welsh bards the name of Arthur appears very seldom. Thus in Llywarch Hen's Elegy on Geraint ab Erbin, the Devon chief who was killed at the battle of Longborth, "at Longborth were slain to Arthur valiant men who hewed down with steel; he was the emperor and conductor of the toils of war," where it is worth noting that Arthur is called Amme he-rhawyr, i.e. imperator; as if, to shew his leadership of the Celtic tribes, he continued the old Roman title which Maximus and other British commanders of the legions had claimed. Dr. Guest would identify him with the son of Aurelius Ambrosius, one of the Roman or Romanised chiefs. The Mabinogion stories place Arthur's palace at Camelot or Gelligiv, both in Cornwall, just as his place of birth is at Tintagel (Stephens' Lit. of Kymry, 319); and put other equally eminent heroes by his side. Since the emigration to Brittany took place largely from Cornwall, this would account for Arthur assuming greater eminence in the Breton tradition, from which we conceived his legend back again in its expanded form. As the Celts recede before the invaders, they naturally took their legends with them, and relocalized the stories in their new homes. This accounts for the number of Arthurian localities in the various Celtic districts. Similarly in the Historia Britonum, which is the nucleus of Nennius, all the references to Gwreth-gren connect him with the Welsh king Mabon, the account of Germanus, which has been inserted at a later time, all the local allusions point to places in Wales. But the story of Arthur was not brought back to Wales till the 11th century. The Arthur of Romance is a creation of the Armoricans, and strange to say the Bretons have not preserved their own romance. It was natural that one form of the story should occur at Glastonbury, the first British church which the English spared. This "island of Avilion" is situated in the midst of peat swamps, extending to the Bristol Channel, from which a boat might even now come up to Glastonbury when the country is flooded with rain, and here in Henry II.'s time was found the tomb of Arthur and Guanahumara, and Giraldeus Cambrensis (de Jure Prae. pp. 191-93, Speculum Ecclesiae pp. 47-49) dwells on the fact that her hair crumbled into dust when it was exposed to the air. The amount of literature on Arthur is now so great that particular references in this place are hardly necessary. [C. W. B.]

GUARULPUS, twenty-fifth bishop of Noyon, between Gundulucius and Framengerus. He was present at the translation of St. Lambert, in A.D. 721. (Gall. Christ. ix. 993; Gall. Wars. Episc. 585.) [S. A. B.]

GUASACHT (Gusacchus), bishop, son of Maelchu, in Granard, commemorated Jan. 24. In the Lives of St. Patrick Guasacht is frequently spoken of. He was son of Maelchu or Miltch, whom St. Patrick in youth served as a swine herd. When St. Patrick returned to evangelize Ireland, Guasacht and his two sisters, both named Emedia, became disciples of their former companion, and renowned the world. (Elmham.) Guasacht became bishop at Granard, in the baronies of Araghd and Grannan, in Longford, and as such always finds his place in the Irish Kalendars. Beyond his being a contemporary of St. Patrick in the 5th century, we cannot fix a date. (Colgan, Acts SS. 378, n. 1, and Tr. Thom. pass.; O'Flahertie, Irish Saints, i. 428; Hany, Script. St. Patrick, 408; Lennon, Eccl. Hist. i. c. 5, §§ 1-3; O'Flahertie, Oyppiga, ii. pt. iii. c. 85; Ware, Bishops, by Harris, i. 13; Mart. Doneg. by Tod and Reeves, 27.) [J. G.]

GUBA, the seventh of the English abbots of Glastonbury, in the list drawn up by William of Malmesbury (ap. Gale, p. 328), who assigns him a period of two years, 743-44. No such name occurs in the ancient list in MS. Tiberius B. 5; and although William of Malmesbury's list is not a mere fabrication, it is too weak in authority to prove the existence of an abbot otherwise unknown. In another section of his work this writer states that in the year 760 Cynwulf, king of Wessex, gave Guba five hides of land at Sudeton, and that he received other benefactions for the abbey (7b. p. 314), but does not give copies of the charters on which the state

[5]
GUBERTUS

GUBERTUS (GILABERTUS, GILABERTUS GRIEBERTUS, POSTHERTUS), twenty-ninth bishop of Geneva, between Eucherius and Renenbertus in the second half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 384.) [S. A. B.]

GUDA, bishop of Tuccis (Martos) from about A.D. 634 to 646, subscribes the acts of the sixth Council of Toledo, A.D. 648. (Aguirre-Otaliani, ii. 413; Esp. Sagr. xii. 390.) [CAMERINUS.

[S. A. W.]

GUDA, a priest and abbot, who attests the charter of Othoiled to Barking, cir. 693 (Mon. Angl. i. 439; Kemble, C. D. 35): the same name with the title of presbyter appears among the attestations of a somewhat questionable charter of Ceawlinha of Wessex, dated 688 (Kemble, C. D. 994). As the former charter is genuine, the occurrence of the name of Guda in the latter may add somewhat to the probability of its genuineness; both are attested by Earconwald, Wilfrid, and Hadda. [S.]

GUDALUSA, mother of St. Cadocus: more properly called Gudadusa, Gladusa and Gwladus (Colgan, Acts SS. 160, c. 2). [GWLADUS.

[G. J.]

GUDDENE—July 18. Virgin and martyr at Carthage, A.D. 203. She suffered by command of the proconsul Rufinus. (Mart. Rom. V., Adon., Usuard.; Till. Mém. iii. 125.) Tilmont, t. c., thinks that Gaudens, or Gaudentius, martyr in Africa, commemorated by St. Augustine, Serm. 294, may be identical with Guddene. (Ruinart, p. 197.) [T. S.]

GUDELINA, queen of Theodosius or Theodotus king of Italy. Among the letters of Cassiodorus are some addressed by her, or in her name, to the emperor Justinian and the empress Theodora. (Casiod. Var. lib. x. opp. 20, 21, 23, 24, in Patr. Lat. lxxii. 811-814.) [G. H.]

GUEDEVALUS. [GUDWAL.

GUBIRANDUS, duke of Florence, the first certainly known, mentioned in a letter of Hadrian to Charles the Great, asking for the restoration of property to the monasteries of Galliana. (Codex Carolinus, infra, p. 90, 784-791; H. Pobel, Forschungen x. d. G. p. 483.) [A. H. D. A.

GUDILIAN, deacon of Toledo, bosom friend of Julian archbishop of Toledo. Their friendship is warmly described by Felix, bishop of Toledo, in his life of Julian, cap. 2. (Patr. Lat. xcvii. 415.) He died in 680. [C. H.]

GUDILIIVA, a Gothic noble mentioned in one of the best known of the Hispanic-Gothic inscriptions (Hübner, Inscrip. Hisp. Christ. 115). He is described as having built with his own workmen, and at his own cost, the churches of St. Stephen, St. John Baptist, and St. Vincent "in the Morva" during the reigns of Leovigild, Recared, and Witigis. "The inscription, evidently put up shortly before the consecration of the church of St. Stephen, by bishop Paulus of Acci (Guandix) under Witteric (603-610)"—says Dr. Mommse, in a note to one of the reports addressed by Hübner to the Berlin Academy—"mentions at the same time two other consecrations, that of the church of St. John in 577, and that of the church of St. Vincent in 594" (Monatsbericht Berl. Akad. 1861, p. 25). The stone bearing the inscription was found among the foundations of the church of Santa Maria del Alhambra at Granada, in the 16th century, and is now in the southern wall of that church. Nativola, therefore, was evidently the Roman name of Granada, or of a quarter of Granada; and Gama supposes—wrongly—that the name Granada is derived partly from Nata, the shortened form of Nativola (Kirchengeographie, ii. [2] 22; conf. however, Doxy, Recherches, l. c. 1. "Observations géographiques sur quelques anciennes localités de l'Andalousie," p. 336). Hübner thinks that Nativola belonged to the mountain diocese of Acci, and not to the bishopric of Elvira, which he supposes to have been confined to the valley of the Xénil (Monatsberichte Berl. Akad. l. c.). and this is no doubt the true explanation of the parts played in the different consecrations by the bishops Paulus and Lilibolus of Acci. Gama's contrary theory, that Nativola was a suburb of Illiberi, is grounded upon ignorance of the real position of Illiberi, which was placed about six miles to the north-west of Granada (Doxy, Recherches, l. c. p. 328). Who Gudiliva was is unknown. That portion of the stone which would probably have given us the name of his office or dignity is missing (Hübner, l. c. note). Prof. Doxy, however, quotes a passage from the Arabic chronicler Ibn-Al-Khatib which probably refers to Gudiliva. "The Christians of Granada had a celebrated church two arrow-flights from the town opposite the gate of Elvira. It had been built by a great seigneur of their religion, whom a certain prince placed at the head "d'une obscure armée de Roum," and it was unique in beauty of construction and ornament." The term Roum, which, according to Prof. Doxy, is only used by the Arabic authors when speaking of independent Spaniards, points back to a time before the Mussulman conquest, and he is therefore led to identify "the great noble of their religion" with Gudiliva (whom he calls Gudils, depending on Macene and Florez's uncorrected text of the Latin inscription). Who was the prince? One is led to suppose the date of the inscription—597, the eighth year of Leovigild. Was Gudiliva one of Leovigild's generals in the campaign of 592 against the imperialists (see art. LEOVIGILD), and was Nativola the "urbes et castella" then wrested from them by the great Gothic king? (Joannes Bicharaeus, Esp. Sagr. vi. p. 377.) [M. A. W.]

GUDINUS, archbishop of Lyons. [Gowinus.

GUDLOCUS has his history sketched by Camerarius (de Scot. Fort. 129, April 11), who, however, gives no authority for his statements, Son of Penuild and Teota, he became famous in the southern wall of the church of Merchia (Mene) for his piety and miracles; there, among the kindred of his parents, he lived fifteen years as a recluse, and was specially tempted by evil spirits, who transformed themselves into lions, bulls, bears, etc., before him. He died about A.D. 716, at the age of 45, and his name has become synonymous with the phrase "good luck." [G. G.]

GUDWAL, ST. (GUDWALUS, GUDWALUS, GUDPAL, GUDWALDUS, GUDWALUS), a saint whose name occurs in the Breton Litany of the 10th century in Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 82, 85, "Guoldwale" (see too i. 28, 31, 36, 161). For his life, written in the 12th century, see Acta Sanctorum June 6, i. 739-742; Hardy's Catalogue of Materials, i. 371-373. He was commemorated in Flanders, where he is said to have died, June 6, 403, and the feast of the translation of his body to the monastery of Ghent was celebrated on Dec. 3. A parish in Corwall, now called Gulval, on Mount's Bay, is dedicated to him, and there is a famous holy well there, but the old oratory has perished. [C. W. B.]

GUDWAL, bishop of St. Malo. [GURWALUS.]

GUEDNERITH, GUINERETH, king or chief of Glamorgan. [GWENEDERTHA.]

GUENEGANDUS, bishop. [GUENNOC.]

GUENGALOCUS, GUENNOLÉ, Armorican saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GUENNINUS (GUENNIUS, GINNINSUS), ST., an early bishop of Vannes, placed third in the list of the Gallia Christiana, succeeding St. Paternus II. or Mansuetus, if he is to be assigned to this diocese, and followed by St. modestus. Le Coîne believes that he was consecrated A.D. 618, but nothing trustworthy has come down on him. He is commemorated Aug. 18. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 916; Le Coîne, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 618; n. x. tom. ii. Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 662.) [S. A. B.]

GUENNOC (CONGANUS, GUENEGANDUS, SUCHUS, VENEGANDUS, VENERANDUS), ST., an early bishop of Quimper, succeeding St. choréntius, and, according to Gans, followed by Albinus. A Venerandus, or Varandus, whose see is not appended, was represented at the first council of Tours (A.D. 461) by Jucundinus, and may possibly be Guenoc. Others, however, identify him with the Albinus, the Latin version of Guenoc, who was present at the Council of Vannes (A.D. 462 or 463). A doubtful list of names is all that remains of his successors till Felix is reached in the 9th century. (Gall. Ch. xiv. 873; Mansi, viii. 947, 955.) [S. A. B.]

GUENOLLÉ, saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GUERICIUS (GOERRICUS), bishop of Ausa (Vich) from about A.D. 643 until after 653. His signature appears twenty-fifth among those of fifty-two bishops at the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448; Esp. Sagr. xxvii. 60.) [CINIDUS.] [M. A. W.]

GUERICKUS. [GOERRICUS.]

GUERIN. [GAIRINUS.]

GUERUR, ST., whose chapel in the parish of St. Neot, in Cornwall, is mentioned by Asser as the place where Alfred, while visiting it in a hunting expedition, was cured of his malady. See v. Guierus in Boll. Acta Sanctorum, 4 Apr. i. 377. [C. W. B.]

GUBERTUS I, seventh bishop of Rete, between Tewton and Iarnmunsio, i. c. A.D. 770. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 300.) [R. S. G.]

GUBERTUS II, eleventh bishop of Rete, between Sinumdus and Peter L., A.D. 778. The date is fixed by communions which he had with Hildebrand, duke of Spoleto. He held his see scarcely a year. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 304.) [R. S. G.]

GUBERTUS III, thirteenth bishop of Rete, between Peter L. and Alfedredus A.D. 780. His name and date are known from documents, in which Charlemagne and Hildebrand, duke of Spoleto, are mentioned. He seems to have sat less than two years. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 305.) [R. S. G.]

GUIDO (1) (Viro), bishop of Volterra (Volterra). He succeeded Martianus, c. A.D. 682, held the see sixteen years, and was succeeded by Petrus. (Ughelli, Ital. Enc. l. *533; Ammirato, Vescovi di Pisa, § 96, p. 66.) [R. S. G.]

GUIDO (2) (Viro), a count, at whose request Alcuin composed his treatise De Virtutibus et Vitiis. Engaged in war he had asked for a short manual of instruction, which Alcuin, as he says, gladly composed and divided into chapters for easier reference in his busy life (Migne, Patr. Lat. cl. 613). [S. A. B.]

GUIDULPHUS. [GUILLUS.]

GUERUS, Cornish saint. [GUEREDUS.]

GUIGNER, martyr in Cornwall. [FINIAL.]

GUIGNOLÉ, saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GUILAIN, abbot of St. Guidalin. [GUIGELAIN.]

GUILEMUS (WILLELMUS), ST., duke or count of Aquitaine, founder and monk of the monastery of Gellone, afterwards called St. Guillelmo-des-Desert. The story of his life is as follows: He was born in the time of Pippin, of aristocratic parents, Theodoric and Aldana. His father, who was a consil, according to his biographer, has been identified with the count of the same name whom Einhard speaks of as a relation of Charles the Great (Annales ad ann. 782, Pertz, i. 163), but others trace a relationship to that monarch through his mother. He was liberally educated in divinity and philosophy, as well as the martial exercises which belonged to his rank, and in due course was sent to court, where he gained the love of his peers and the respect and affection of Charles, who had now succeeded his father Pippin, and who often had recourse to him for counsel. It happened that the Saracens crossed the Pyrenees, and were devastating the south of France. Charles appointed Guilemous commander of the expedition sent against them, and created him duke of Aquitaine. Crossing the Rhone into Septimania he gave battle at Orange, where the enemy had established themselves, and recovered the city in a victorious engagement. He pursued his success until they were utterly routed and driven back again into Spain. He then set himself to repair their ravages in the province. The ruined churches were rebuilt and new ones erected. He restored justice, religion, and charity, and characterized his rule. Determining to be himself the founder of a monastery he sought a spot in the mountainous district of Lodève, where he reared his buildings and collected monks from the country round, especially from the foundation of St. Benedict of Aniane, about a league distant. To this monastery his own was, by his wish, subordinated. His sisters, Almuna and Bertania, desirous of taking the veil, applied to him to aid them, and he established them at the church of St. Bartholomew, not far from the monastery. He now returned to his worldly duties, but the desire of embracing the monastic life had also seized him and was daily increasing in strength, when he was summoned to court. Here he made his mind to become a monk. Charles consented, and he left for his new home, stopping at Brioude to offer his weapons at the shrine of St. Julian the martyr. Arrived at Gellone, he entered the monastery barefooted and clad in sackcloth, laid his gifts upon the altar, and announced his desire of joining the community (A.D. 806). His first work was with the aid of his sons, Bernard and Gauzelinus, or Gotelmus, to complete the building, and render it accessible by cutting a road up the rugged valley. Next he planted gardens and vineyards, and laid out the valley in orchards. Lobis, son of Charles, and king of Aquitaine, granted him a charter for his foundation. This he devoted himself to the routine of the monastic life. Of his own choice he discharged the meanest offices. At the desire of the monks he consented to abandon these servile tasks, and entered upon a life of meditation. The gift of prophecy was vouchsafed to him, and revealed the hour of his death. His end was signalized by an earthquake, which shook the country round (May 28).

The life, of which the foregoing is with slight additions an abridgment, was first published by Suger of St. Denis, in Augsburg in 1161, and may also be found in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti, sec. iv. pt. i. p. 70, Paris, 1668-1701, and in the Bollandists' Acta SS. Mai, vol. vi. 811. In the latter it is preceded by a short account of Guilemms, extracted from the life of St. Benedict of Aniane by his disciple Ardo (Feb. ii. 615), which differs but very slightly from the fuller account, and is followed by a separate account of his miracles. The date of this life is not known, but its style has impressed commentators with respect. It was, at least, written previously to the year 1066, since Ordericus Vitalis alludes to that year in his Ecclesiastical History (lib. vi.) that it had lately been shewn to him, and he gives a summary, which, in many cases, preserves the words and phrases of the life as we have it.

In his appendix to the Life (p. 83) Mabillon prints two instruments of gift of Guilemms, one resembling a will, and the above-mentioned charter of Louis dated in 808 (see also Migne, Patro. Lat. civ. 982).

The life of Louis the Pious states (Bouquet, vi. 88) that Guilemms succeeded Chorso in the dukedom, who was deposed for misconduct (A.D. 790), and successfully coped with a rising of which his predecessor was the cause. From the same source, and also from the charter or will above-mentioned, we learn something of his relatives, of whom the most famous was his son Bernard, who inherited his rank and married Dodana, whose manual, with an inscription to her son, Guilemms still survives (Migne, Patro. Lat. cxi. 109; cf. Rivet, Hist. Lit. de la France. v. 17). Cellier has a short account of his life, Hist. des Auteurs Sacer., xiii. 234. [S. A. B.]

GUILLEBRADUS (WILARDUS), bishop of Fistoria and Pratum (Piosteo and Prato), succeeded Joannes A.D. 801. He is mentioned as acting in various affairs in 806 and 812, under the authority of Charlemagne. (Ughelli, Itali. Sac. l. iii. 354; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvii. 81.) [B. S. G.]

GULLOBOLDUS (WILALDUS), twenty-ninth bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, between Ricarius and Bofo I., or Bono circ. 750. (Gall. Christ. ix. 863.) [S. A. B.]

GUIMILDUS (GUIMILUS). [GUIMILDER.]

GUINALUS, GUINALOE, GUINGALOIS, GUINGALOIS, Armenian saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GUINNINUS of Vannes. [GUINNINUS.]

GUINNIUS (GUINUINUS, GUINIBUS), accompanied St. Padarn from Armorica to Llanddaru (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 504 sq.), early in the 6th century. In the account of St. Ondocius's election to the see of Llandaff, "Guinins magister," called also Gunibus, and in the translation Cynfn, was one of the three clerical electors named, with the abbeys and laity, and was one of the three legates sent with the bishop-elect to Canterbury. (Lib. Landav. by Lers, 124, 372; Usher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. iv. c. 8, p. 324, a.) [J. G.]

GIRMINNUS, Irish saint, daughter of Conghallius. [GIRMIN.]

GUISLEIN, abbat. [GISELENUS.]

GUISO. [GISO.]

GUISTLIANUS. [GISTLIANUS.]
GUITELIN

GUITELIN stands in the lists of bishops at London and at Caer Leon, and Nennius numbers twelve years "a regno Guorthigerni usque ad discendiam Guiiolini et Ambroeli," if this be the same person as Guittel (Mon. Hist. Brit. i. p. ii. 77). Geoffrey Monmonier says he was sent to Armoricum for aid against the Saxons. (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 152, 154.) [GWYTHELIN.] [J. G.]

GULFARUS, "magister militum," probably in the district of Istria, where there was a severance from Rome on the subject of the "Three Chapters." Gregory the Great writes to commend him for his zeal in bringing back schismatics to the church. (Epist. lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 93; Migone, Ixvii. 1019.) [A. H. A. D.]

GULOSUS, bishop of Beneventum, in Proconsular Africa, was banished to Corsica by Hunicus after the convention at Carthage, A.D. 484. (Morelli, Afr. Christ. i. 100.) [R. S. G.]

GULOSUS, bishop of Pupit or Pudput, in Proconsular Africa, A.D. 646, is said, in the vacancy of the bishopric of Carthage, to have called together the synod held in that year at Carthage, and to have been the first to subscribe the letter against the Monothelites, addressed by the assembled bishops to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople. (Morelli, Afr. Christ. i. 236.) [R. S. G.]

GUMBERTUS (I), ninth bishop of Térouanne between Adelgerus and Aetherius, in the first half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. x. 1532.) [S. A. B.]

GUMBERTUS (II) (CUNIBERT), St., reputed founder and first abbot of the monastery of Ansbach, in Germany, in the 8th century. A life of him was published by the Bollandists from the parchment lectionary of the Franciscan fathers at Würzburg (Acta SS. Jul. iv. 69). At the time when St. Boniface was archbishop of Mentz (743-c. 754), an Englishman named Burchard came to him there, and after a short stay, went on to Rome. There pope Zachary consecrated him to the episcopate, and sent him back to Boniface, who escorted him to his diocese of Würzburg. The new bishop's name came to Gumbertus, who was a noble of Eastern France, and a soldier. Making his way to Würzburg, he submitted himself to the commands and instruction of Burchard. Part of his wealth he devoted to enriching the church of St. Kilian, the martyr. The rest he reserved, having it in his mind to found the monastery of Oonolbach, or Ansbach, in the diocese of Würzburg. He readily obtained authority from Charles the Great, then emperor, to build his monastery in any spot he chose. Accordingly, he founded the religious house of Ansbach. The rule of St. Benedict was established, and a large number of monks thronged thither. The monastery church was dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The remainder of his life was devoted to the government of his monks, and on his death (March 11), at an advanced age, he was buried in the church he had built. He is commemorated July 13.

A shorter but almost identical account is found in the life of Burchard by Egilward in the 12th century (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. vi. 588), and it seems not unlikely that the two writers were indebted to a common source.

GUMMARIUS, "auctor ecclesiasticus," second bishop of Maguelonne between Genesius and Vincentius. He was in possession of the see in 672 or 673. In the former year he joined in the revolt against Wamba king of the Visigoths, and when in the following year the forces of Wamba were closing in upon Maguelonne by sea and land, he fled to Nimes to join Paul, the leader of the rebellion. On the fall of the latter city, which was not long deferred, the bishop with the other rebels obtained their lives, but were subject to the indignity of being shaved and dragged barefoot and raged in the train of the conqueror, upon his triumphant entry into Toledo some months later. He was not liberated till the fourth year of Erigvius, Wamba's successor. His after history is unknown (S. Juliani, Hdb. Rebellionum Paul., xiii. seq. Migone, Pass. Lat. xvi. 774 sqq.; Gall. Christ. vi. 732). [S. A. H.]

Two early charters are extant for his monastery, one purporting to be granted by Charles the Great in 786, and the other by Louis the Pious in 837 (printed nos. 9 and 10 in Wurtemmann's Germania Sacra, tom. i.). In the former he is twice called episcopus, and for this, among other reasons, the document has been generally considered spurious. The whole story of Gumbertus rests upon the very slightest foundation. In addition to the above-mentioned accounts consult Retberg (Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 336-343) and the authorities there quoted as to his life and the two charters, and the Germania Sacra (tom. i. p. 429 sqq.) [S. A. B.]

GUMBERTUS, martyr [GONDELBERTUS]; bishop of Sens [GONDELBERTUS]; bishop of Reate [GUNDERTUS].

GUMMARIUS; bishop of Toledo. (Exp. Sacr. v. vi.)

GUMILUDUS (GIMELUDUS, GUIMILUS, WIXILUS), third bishop of Maguelonne between Genesius and Vincentius. He was in possession of the see in 672 or 673. In the former year he joined in the revolt against Wamba king of the Visigoths, and when in the following year the forces of Wamba were closing in upon Maguelonne by sea and land, he fled to Nimes to join Paul, the leader of the rebellion. On the fall of the latter city, which was not long deferred, the bishop with the other rebels obtained their lives, but were subject to the indignity of being shaved and dragged barefoot and raged in the train of the conqueror, upon his triumphant entry into Toledo some months later. He was not liberated till the fourth year of Erigvius, Wamba's successor. His after history is unknown (S. Juliani, Hdb. Rebellionum Paul., xiii. seq. Migone, Pass. Lat. xvi. 774 sqq.; Gall. Christ. vi. 732). [S. A. H.]

GUMMARIUS (GUMMARUS, GUMMARUS), St., founder of the monastery of Lis (Lire, Lier), near Malines in Belgium, in the latter part of the 8th century. According to the story which has come down, he was born at Embréheim, about a mile from Lira. Though his parents were of high rank, he was uneducated, and could not even read the Scriptures. But his natural disposition was good, and the practice of fasting and alms-giving was familiar to him even in early years. In opening manhood he was sent to Pippin's court, where he gained the affection of the king and his nobles, though only deference to the wishes of his parents reconciled him to the worldly life. He was soon honoured with high command, and sent on a distant military expedition. During his absence his home was left under the sole control of Gummaria, the wife whom he had married at Pippin's desire. Her one delight was in cruelty, and against the serfs and dependents of the house she raged, in the words of his biographer, "quidam bellumina fertate." After seven years, Gummarus returned from the wars, sternly rebuked his wife, and made amends to all who had been wronged. His thoughts were now bent on a monastic life, and on an island in the river Nethe (Nethe), which was called Nivesdum or Nivesdouch (the Bollandists suggest Nieuwendoch), he erected a church in honour of St. Peter. The remains of his life he passed between his house and the new monastery. St. Rumoldus, an Irishman, was at this time leading a life of devotion and solitude at Malines. The two were drawn to each other, and a meeting-place was found half-way between their houses by the citizens, which they resolved should be the scene of a yearly assembly and religious services for the country round. At length a mortal disease came upon him, and he died Oct. 11, the day of his commemoration, towards the close of the 8th century.

Hosted by Google

The foregoing account is from the life written by Theobald, a monk of Lira, and dedicated to Sigera, the abbot. It was first published by Surius (Oct. xi), but without the dedication, and in part abridged. Later, it was republished in full by the Hollandists (Acta SS. Oct. v. 682), together with an account of miracles performed by the saint's relics about 1475, related by an anonymous but contemporary author. The life itself was written about the middle of the 12th century, and what is said that the earliest mention of Gummarus is in the Gesta Pontificum, Cameracensium (ii. 48, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxlix. 142), written in the 11th century, it may be easily understood that authentic information about him is absolutely wanting. There is now at Lierre a church of St. Gommarius, begun in 1445 and completed in 1537. [S. A. B.]

GUMPERSGA, niece of king Luitprand and wife of Romsald, who was duke of Benevento in 706. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 50.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GUNDAMUND (Gentius, Gunthie-mund), king of the Vandals. He was the son of Genzo, the son of Genric, and succeeded his uncle Huneric as king, according to the Vandal law of succession (GENEERIC). Dec. 11, 484. He had numerous contests with the Moors, who had revolted in the reign of Huneric. According to Procopius (Bell. Vind. i. 8) and Theophanes (Chronog. A. M. 6026, p. 159) he cruelly persecuted the Catholics. According to Isiobre, however, de Rebus Gatharum (Isid. Opp. vii. 133 in Migne, Patr. Lat. Lxxiii. 1079), and the Chronicle of Victor Tununensis (in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 946), on his accession he restored peace to the church and recalled the Catholic exiles. The appendix to the Chronicle of Prosper (in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 606) appears to offer a means of reconciling these conflicting statements. It is there stated that Gundamund, in the third year of his reign, surrendered to the Catholics the cemetery of St. Agileus at Carthage, having already recalled St. Eugenius, bishop of Carthage, from exile. In the tenth year of his reign he opened the Catholic churches which had been closed for ten years and a half; and at the intercession of Eugenius recalled all the exiled bishops and priests. From this it appears that, though Gundamund showed some favour to the Catholics soon after his accession, the persecution did not wholly cease till the tenth year of his reign. Gundamund died Sept. 24, A.D. 496. (Ceillier, Autours sacrés, x. 464.) [F. D.]

GUNDEBALD, king. [GUNDEBALD.]

GUNDECAR, king. [GUNDICARIUS.]

GUNDEGESILUS, twelfth archbishop of Bordeaux. According to Gregory of Tours, Bertram, his predecessor, returning from the second council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) was seized with a fever. Summoning to his bedside a deacon, named Waldo, he nominated him, as far as he was able, as his successor. Upon his death, Waldo, with the consent of the citizens, who were ready to the king to obtain his sanction, but this was refused, and orders were given for the consecration of Gundegesilus, surnamed Dodo, a count of Saintes, which took place (Hist. Franc. viii. 22). He took the lead in attempting to quell the disturbances excited by Chroiseldis at the monastery of the Holy Cross at Poitiers [CUNDEHEL], and his life was endangered by the strength of cutthroat assembled in the church of St. Hilary. In the same connexion he was one of the subscribers of the letter addressed to the bishops, assembled by king Guntram at Poitiers in 590, the rescript to which is given by Gregory (Hist. Franc. ix. 41, x. 15, 16). There is a lacon of more than 200 years in the series of the Bordeaux archbishops after Gundegesilus. Sicharius is the name of the next known (Godd. Christ. ii. 795). [S. A. B.]

GUNDELBERTUS, ST., supposed archbishop of Sens, and founder and first abbot of the monastery of Senoniæ (Senone) in the Vesiges. His life, written after the middle of the 13th century by Richerius, a monk of that foundation, in the Chronicum Senoniense (iii.), may be found in the Spicilegium, ii. 604, and with previous observations in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedict. spec. iii. p. 468, Paris, 1668–1701. The story he relates is that Gundelbert, a Gaul of noble birth, in the year 720 was archbishop of Sens, and filled that office with great honour, but aiming at higher sanctity resolved to seek the desert. According to Gestas antiqua, relinquishing the wealth and honours of the archbishopric, but retaining the office, that he might be able to converse with churches and ordain ministers in the wilderness, he penetrated, with a few disciples, into the country of the Vesiges. His biographer describes the scene from personal acquaintance. It is a land full of lofty mountains crowded with savage rocks. The valleys between are profound, and renowned by dark and dreary gloom of their pine forests. Wild beasts abound, and men shun it as they would a leper, one of these valleys was the spot where St. Guendbert rested, selecting for his abode the most remote and uninviting part of it. A grant was readily obtained from Childeric, at whose court he had once been familiar. A church soon rose, and on the window of a vision was dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and close by he built his monastery in honour of St. Peter and the Apostle. The rule of St. Benedict was enacted, and under it his biographer was still living. The scene of his death and burial are alike unknown, though the former did not take place at the monastery. The difficulties in this story are very great. Mabillon (see the observations preceding) would reject the date of 720, and suggests the substitution of 670 for it. He considers that St. Guendbert must be placed earlier than Emma, the twenty-fifth archbishop of Sens who held the see from about 658 to 675. It seems clear that he must be distinguished from Gunzbertus, who, according to all the MSS. and authors (Godd. Xrist. xii. 14) was the thirty-fifth archbishop, and lived about 779-786. In short, it seems very doubtful whether he ever belonged to Samps at all. In the prooemium of Childefar A.D. 661 (Migne, Patr. Lat. Lxxxvi. 1287), and the privilegium of Otto (949) no see is appended to his name. And Mabillon himself in his Mon. tom. i. p. 462) seems to suggest that he was possibly a chœrubicus only. Gams omits him from his Series, recognising only the later Gumbertus (p. 629). It might easily happen that the connexion with Samps was suggested by the name of his monastery. His day of commemoration is Feb. 21. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. xii. 263.)
GUNDEMAR

[S. A. B.]

GUNDEMAR, king. [GODEMAR.]

GUNDEMAR, king. [GUNTHER.]

GUNDEMAR, bishop of Viseo (of Gothic descent apparently), signs the disputed Decretum Gundemari (A.D. 610 ?). [GUNTHER.] [Exp. Sgr. iv. 314; Aguirre-Catalani, ill. 324.] [REMISOL.] [M. A. W.]

GUNDERIC (1), son of Godegisilus king of the Vandals, succeeding him jointly with his illegitimate brother Genserics. According to Renatus, quoted by Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. ii. 61 (in Migne, Patr. Lat. Lxxvi. 205), Godegisilus was killed in a great battle by the Franks soon after the Vandals had crossed the Rhine, which occurred on the 31st Dec. A.D. 406 (Prosper, Chronicon, in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 590); but according to Procopius (de Bello Vandalico, i. 3) it was under his leadership that the Vandals invaded Spain, which took place in September or October, A.D. 409 (Ibidius, Chronicon, in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 876), and the expression of Isidore (Historia de Reibus Gothorum, Isidori Opera, vii. 131, in Migne, Patr. Lat. Lxxviii. 1099).

"Primo autem in Hispania Gunderics Rex, Vandarorum successit," appears to support the statement of Procopius. The first attacks of the Vandals, Alani, and Suevi were repulsed by two young men of high rank, named Dikyamus and Verinius, who armed their slaves, and occupied the passes of the Pyrenees. This obstacle was however removed by the usurper Constantine, who put these brothers to death, and the hosts of barbarians then poured into Spain, and ravaged the country cruelly. (Orosius, Hist. vii. 40, 577, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxi. 1166.)

About A.D. 411 however they became quieter, and made a kind of partition of Spain. Gallicia was occupied by the Suevi and the Vandals, Lusitania and the province of Carthagena by the Alans, and the tribe of the Vandals, known as Selingui, after ravaging the Baleric islands, took possession of the province of Baetica. In the language of Orosius (Hist. vii. 41, 579), they turned their swords into ploughshares, and treated the remnant of the Romans as their friends and allies. This calm however was but a short one. The Goths, under Wallia, invaded Spain in A.D. 416, and carried on war for two years against the Vandals and their allies. He destroyed the tribe of the Selingui, and defeated the Alans with great slaughter, their king Ataces being among the slain. The remnant of the Alans then united themselves with the Vandals of Gallicia under Gunderic, and they disappear from history as a separate tribe. In A.D. 418, after the retreat of Wallia into Gaul, a quarrel broke out between the Vandals and the Suevi, who were blockaded by the former in the mountains of Narbona, or Ebba, between Orondo and Leon. The blockade was however raised by Asturias, the capital of the Suevi, and the Vandals retired into Bactria, where they were attacked, in A.D. 421, by Castinus, who had been sent against them by the emperor Honorius. Castinus refused to allow count Bonifacius to join the expedition, and after reducing the Vandals to great straits by blockade, imprudently offered battle, was defeated, and obliged to fly to Tangier. The infuriated Vandals, in A.D. 424, ravaged the coasts of Mauritania and the Baleric Islands, and took and plundered Carthagena and Sevile, and devastated the whole of Spain. Gunderic died in A.D. 428. According to Isidore and Isidore, his death was a punishment for having put his hands against the church of St. Vincent at Seville. According to Procopius, however, his brother Genserics was the cause of his death. From the praises bestowed on him by the Catholic Draccontius, the statements of Isidore and Isidore that Genserics was originally a Catholic, and the language of Orosius, who says that the mercy of God was to be praised for having by the invasion of the barbarians led them to a knowledge of the true faith, it appears probable that Gunderic was, at least originally, a Catholic, and not an Arian. For an account of his character, and his relations with the poet Draccontius, see DRACCONTIUS. His name is variously spelt Gundericus, Gontharis, Gantharius, and Gantharius.

[GUNDERIC, king. [GUNDERICUS.]

GUNDERIC (2) (GANDICUS, GANDICUS), twenty-seventh archbishop of Tares, succeeding St. Magnericus and followed by St. Neundus, at the close of the 8th century. He was supposed by some to have been identical with Genserics of Cumbray, and to have been elevated from that diocese to the archiepiscopal see of Tares, but the theory appears to be without authority. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 172, 173; Toll. Christ. xiii. 384; Gams, Series Episc. 318.) [S. A. B.]

GUNDERIC, (3) bishop of Segobriga (Soguenza), from about A.D. 685 till after 693. He appears at the sixteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 693. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333; Esp. Sgr. viii. 126.) [PHOTOGENES.] [M. A. W.]

GUNDERIC (4), 38th bishop of Toledo and metropolitan, cir. 700-710. He is but briefly mentioned by Isidorus Pascensis (Chron. § 30, in Pat. Lat. xcvii. 1262 b), and Roderic of Toledo (De Reb. Hsp. lib. iii. cap. 15 in Lorenzana, Patron. Toledo, i. iii. p. 62), who record that he was a man of great sanctity and reputation. He is thought to have presided in the 15th council of Toledo, A.D. 701 (Mansi, xliii. 163; Florez, Esp. Sgr. v. 301; Baron. A. E. an. 701, xvi.).

[GUNDERICHUS (GUNDRECHUS, GUNDREICHUS, GUNDRECHUS; French, GUNDRECH, GUNDERICH), a king of the Burgundians, one of the two sons of Gundechus. According to Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 28), he was of the family of Athanaric, king of the Visigoths. This statement, if not an error, must probably refer to the fact that he had married the sister of Ricimer, the patrician, who was a grandchild, on the mother's side, of Wallia, king of the Visigoths. (Paulus Diaconus, Hist. Miscell. lib. xv.; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcv. 963; Moscuz, Hist. of the Ancient Germans, ii. 358.) He succeeded his father about 437 in the straitened territory, which the victories of Aetius and the Huns had left to the Burgundians. In A.D. 443 probably, Sabaudia, nearly coincident with the modern Savoy, was given up to him and his people. In 455, when Avitus in Gaul usurped the throne of the West, Gundeuchus, and his brother Chilperic, with the greater part of Gaul, declared for him, and joined the force of Theodoric, the Visigoth, which, at his desire, marched into Spain to quell the Suevi (Jornandes, c. xiii.) In the confusion of these events the Burgundians seem to have found an opportunity for extending their territory in Gaul, sharing the lands encroached upon with the resident Gallic senators (Marius Avent. Chron. Carol. 673; Varrase Cos. 456; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 793.) Patr. as a matter of necessity, to have embraced in this year the Prima Lugdunensis, the Maxima Sequanorum, the Vien-nensis, the Alpes Graiae et Penninae and the Provincia cis Drusi tenium (Baron. Pap. an. 456, n. xiii.) Lyons, however, seems to have been afterwards forcibly recovered by Majorian, who was too much occupied at first to resist these encroachments. (Chron. Apoll. Carm. v.; Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 675.) From a letter of pope Hilary to Leontius, archbishop of Arles, we learn that Gundeuchus held the rank of magister militum. (Ep. ix., Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 27; Bar. an. 463, n. iv.) And, from the terms of respect and affection in which he is spoken of in this letter, we may conclude that the family had not yet been perverted to Arianism. He left four sons, Gundobald, Godesegil, Chilperic and Godeumar (Greg. Tur. ut supr.) [S. A. B.]

GUNDICARIUS (Guntiarus, French, Gondicaire), the first of the Hengids, or chiefs, of the Burgundians who attained to royal power.

The Burgundians were one of the nations of Germany, though they themselves, like other races of a mixed origin, themselves of German extraction, suggested probably by their name, was that they were the descendants of the Roman soldiers of Tiberius and Drusus left to garrison the burg-festen on the German frontier (Orosius, vii. 32; Ammianus Marcellinus, xxviii. 5). Their name first occurs in Pliny, who treats them as one of the component races of the Vandals (Hist. Nat. iv. 28), and their original position seems to have been between the Oder and the Vistula (Procopius, de Bello Goth. i. 12). From scattered notices in Jornades, Zosimus, Claudius Mamertinus, Ammianus Marcellinus and Orosius, we learn that amid various vicissitudes, like the other German nations, they gravitated towards the Gallic border. At the earliest period of which we have information there were gauls who had been between, or chiefs, apparently elective, and liable to be deposed for failure in war, or even on account of a bad season. Their high priest, called Sinistus, on the other hand, was irresolvable from office (Ammianus Marcellinus, xxviii. 5). Although their warriors passed the Rhine before, it was not till 406 that they finally made good their footing in Gaul. In that year a part of the nation crossed the Rhine in company with Vandals, Suevi and Alani (Orosius, vii. 40; Hieronymi Epist. cxxii. § 16, Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 1057). Whether they had been converted to Christianity at this time is somewhat doubtful. If we may credit the account of Socrates (Hist. Eccl. vii. 30), they had been zealous Christians for some years. His story is that at some time, probably about 392, while they were still on the east of the Rhine, and, according to him, led a peaceful life, being for the most part artisans (trivores), they were harassed by the incursions of the Huns. Disturbing human aid, they resolved to put themselves under the protection of some god, and having reflected that the deity of the Romans was a God of might, they resolved to embrace the Christian faith. Accordingly they approached one of the Gallic cities (Treves is suggested), and asked the bishop to baptize them. This he did after first ordaining a fast of seven days and instructing them in the elements of the faith (The evangely), whereupon their converts marched against the Huns, whom they attacked the day after the death of their king Othar from surfeit, and defeated, 10,000 of the enemy falling before 3000 Burgundians. Henceforth they were zealous Christians (ευαγγελισθεν οι Βουργουνδοι εαυτους). On the other hand Orosius, writing in 417, says, "By the provisions of God all have lately become Christians and Catholics, thanks to the care of our clergy whom they have welcomed. They treat the Gauls as brothers in Christianity, and lead lawful and innocent lives." (Orosius, vii. c. 32.) Revillout (Du l'Arianisme des Peuples Germaniques, 65-6) thinks they were converted to Arianism by missionaries from the Visigoths, who appear under Euric to have subdued them (Chron. Sieg. Genblain, and Jornandes in Bouquet lii. 336, 884). But see Pigny (Etudes sur l'époque Mérovingienne, tom. ii. 50), who distrusts Orosius, and believes the Burgundians to have been Arians at the time they entered Gaul, though, unlike the Goths and Vandals, never propagandists or persecutors. In 413 Gundarr and his people espoused the cause of Jovinus the usurper. His purple was not long to last. At the battle of 411 (Olympiodorus, Bouquet, i. 600) Jovinus was killed in 413, but the emperor made peace with the Burgundians, and settled them on a portion of territory bordering on the Rhine, with Worms for its capital (Prosper. Chron. ad Lecian. Cons. Patr. Lat. li. 591; Cassiodorus, Chron. Patr. Lat. ixx. 1243; Richter, Annuen, p. 19). In 435 or 440 Gundicar revolted against the Roman power, but was defeated by Aetius, with the loss of 20,000 men, and compelled to sue for peace (Idatius, Chron. ad Ann. Valent. xii. 33; Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 880; Prosper. Chron. ad An. Theodos. xv., Valent. iv. Cos. (435) Patr. Lat. li. 596-7; Cassiodorus ad Ann. An. Patr. Lat. ixx. 1244). If we may believe the panegyric of Avitus by Sidonius Apollinaris (carm. vi. 280), or Hesychius, or chief apparent elective, and liable to be deposed for failure in war, or even on account of a bad season. Their high priest, called Sinistus, on the other hand, was irresolvable from office (Ammianus Marcellinus, xxviii. 5). Although their warriors passed the Rhine before, it was not till 406 that they finally made good their footing in Gaul. In that year a part of the nation crossed the Rhine in company with Vandals, Suevi and Alani (Orosius, vii. 40; Hieronymi Epist. cxxii. § 16, Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 1057). Whether they had been converted to Christianity at this time is somewhat doubtful. If we may credit the account of Socrates (Hist. Eccl. vii. 30), they had been zealous Christians for some years. His story is that at some time, probably about 392, while they were still on the east of the Rhine, and, according to him, led a peaceful life, being for the most part artisans (trivores), they were harassed by the incursions of the Huns. Disturbing human aid, they resolved to put themselves under the protection of some god, and having reflected that the deity of the Romans was a God of might, they resolved to embrace the Christian faith. Accordingly they approached one of the Gallic cities (Treves is suggested), and asked the bishop to baptize them. This he did after first ordaining a fast of seven days and instructing them in the elements of the faith (The evangely), whereupon their converts marched against the Huns, whom they attacked the day after the death of their king Othar from surfeit, and defeated, 10,000 of the enemy falling before 3000 Burgundians. Henceforth they were zealous Christians (ευαγγελισθεν οι Βουργουνδοι εαυτους). On the other hand Orosius, writing in 417, says, "By the provisions of God all have lately become Christians and Catholics, thanks to the care of our clergy whom they have welcomed. They treat the Gauls as brothers in Christianity, and lead lawful and innocent lives." (Orosius, vii. c. 32.) Revillout (Du l'Arianisme des Peuples Germaniques, 65-6) thinks they were converted to Arianism by missionaries from the Visigoths, who appear under Euric to have subdued them (Chron. Sieg. Genblain, and Jornandes in Bouquet lii. 336, 884). But see Pigny (Etudes sur l'époque Mérovingienne, tom. ii. 50), who distrusts Orosius, and believes the Burgundians to have been Arians at the time they entered Gaul, though, unlike the Goths and Vandals, never propagandists or persecutors. In 413 Gundarr and his people espoused the cause of Jovinus the usurper. His purple was not long to last. At the battle of 411 (Olympiodorus, Bouquet, i. 600) Jovinus was killed in 413, but the emperor made peace with the Burgundians, and settled them on a portion of territory bordering on the Rhine, with Worms for its capital (Prosper. Chron. ad Lecian. Cons. Patr. Lat. li. 591; Cassiodorus, Chron. Patr. Lat. ixx. 1243; Richter, Annuen, p. 19). In 435 or 440 Gundicar revolted against the Roman power, but was defeated by Aetius, with the loss of 20,000 men, and compelled to sue for peace (Idatius, Chron. ad Ann. Valent. xii. 33; Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 880; Prosper. Chron. ad An. Theodos. xv., Valent. iv. Cos. (435) Patr. Lat. li. 596-7; Cassiodorus ad Ann. An. Patr. Lat. ixx. 1244). If we may believe the panegyric of Avitus by Sidonius Apollinaris (carm. vi. 280), or Hesychius, or chief apparent elective, and liable to be deposed for failure in war, or even on account of a bad season. Their high priest, called Sinistus, on the other hand, was irresolvable from office (Ammianus Marcellinus, xxviii. 5). Although their warriors passed the Rhine before, it was not till 406 that they finally made good their footing in Gaul. In that year a part of the nation crossed GUNDILANUS (GUDILA), bishop of Emperor (Amphiar) before A.D. 683. "Segarius abbae" represents him at C. Tol. xiii, but he attended the fifteenth and sixteenth councils, 683, 685, in person. (Agurc.-Catalani, iv. 287, 313, 333; Excer. Supr. xii. 273.)

[M. A. W.]

GUNDIFERA, daughter of Theodelinda, queen of the Lombards, and her second husband Agilulf. She married Ariowel, who succeeded her brother Adalad as king in 626. (Fredeg. Chro. cap. 49; Migne, lxi. 637; Paulus Diaconus is wrong, cf. note Hist. Lang. in Munimenta Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1875, p. 136.) She was imprisoned for three years on false suspicion of crime by Ariowel, and ultimately reinstated. Fredeg. says that she afterwards married Rotharis, who became king in 636. She built the basilica of St. John the Baptist in Pavia. (Paulus Diacon. iv. 47; Fredeg. Chro. cap. 51; Migne, lxi. 638; Pabst, Forschungen c. d. G. ii. 428.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GUNDLEAUS, GUNDELEUS, GUNDLOU, Welsh king. [GWYNLLWY]

GUNDOALDUS, bishop. [GONDOALDUS.]

GUNDOBALD (GUNODRABUS, GUNODRADEUS), fourth king of the Burgundians. His father, Gondeuchus, died about 470, leaving four sons, Gundobald, Godegiselu, Chilpere and Godomar (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 28.) In 472, on the death of his uncle Ricemer, Olybrius created him patrician and magister militum (Paulus Diacon. Hist. Maccell. lib. xvi; Migne, Patr. Lat. x. 961). In the same year Olybrius died, and Gundobald took part with Glycerius, who assumed the purple at Ravenna (Casiodor. Chron., Migne, Patr. Lat. ix. 1246). According to Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 28) Gundobald murdered his brother Chilpere, the father of Clotild, and drowned his wife. But the statement is open to grave doubts; because solely on the authority of Gregory, who wrote about a century after the alleged murders, was a Catholic writing of an Arian, and who was the personal friend of Guntram, the French king who reigned over the territory usurped from the Burgundian kings. The Epitomata, xvii., the Gesta Regum Francorum, xi., the Chronicon of Ado (Bouquet, ii. 660), &c. are mere reproductions of Gregory on this point. On the other hand Avitus, archbishop of Vienne, could scarcely have written "Plebis quondam pietae inferius funera germanorum," &c. (Ep. v.; Patr. Lat. lxx. 223), if he was addressing the murdered one of those brothers. The manner and date of Chilpere's death, therefore, remain unknown, as also that of his brother Godomar, whom he is said to have burnt alive. About A.D. 492 Cloris was brought into close relation with the Burgundians by his marriage with Clotilda, Chilpere's daughter (Greg. Tur. ii. 28; Epitomata, xvii.; but the details of Cloris's betrothal are not historic, Richter, Annales, 35). At this time, Chilpere and Godomar being dead, the kingship of the Burgundians, which extended from the Vosges to the Durance and from the Alps to the Loire, was divided between the two surviving brothers, Gundobald and Godegiselu, seq.) This code may be found in Bouquet, iv. 257 seq., and Pertz, Leges, iii. 497 seq.

Though he professed Arianism, he did not persecute, but on the contrary secured the Catholics in the possession of their endowments. Avitus wrote to him, "In domo tua domus protesters, et omnes ecclesiæ nostræ, vestrum est, de substantia quam vel servasti hasten vel donasti." (Ep. xxxiii. Patr. Lat. lix. 256.) The circumstances relied on by Rebillout (De l'Arisonisme des Peuples Germaniques, 180, 181), who takes the opposite view, are trivial, compared with the testimony of Avitus and the silence of Gregory.

His whole correspondence with Avitus and the conference of Lyon demonstrate both the interest he took in religious subjects and his tolerance of orthodoxy. Several of the bishop's letters survive, addressed to him in answer to enquiries on various points of doctrine on which he had asked for explanations, for instance, on the Eutychian heresy (Ep. 3 and 4), repentance in articulo mortis (Ep. 30), and on the way by faith to Axigone (Ep. 5). Only one of Gundobald's remains (Ep. 19), asking an explanation of Isai. ii. 3, 4, 5, and Micah iv. 4. These letters may be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lix. 199, 202, 210, 219, 223, 238, 244, 255, and are commented on in Ceillier's Hist. générale des Acteurs sacrés, x. 554 seqq. He probably died an Ariam, but it is not quite certain. According to Gregory he was convinced and begged Avitus to baptize him in secret, fearing his subjects, but Avitus refused, and he perished in his heresy (Hist. Franc. ii. 34, cf. iii. prologue). On the other hand there are two passages in Avitus's letters, (Ep. v. sub fin. Patr. Lat. lix. 224, "unde cum iactatum—orbitatem," and Ep. ii. sub init. Patr. Lat. lix. 202, "Unicum simul—principaliter de tuenda catholicae partis veritate curritis") which seem almost to imply that he was then a Catholic. See too Gregory's story of the piety of his queen (De Mirac. St. Juliani, ii. 8). [S. A. B.]

GUNDOVALDUS, surnamed BALLOMER, or Pretender, was the son of a concubine of Clotaire I., though disowned by that monarch. By his mother's care he was well educated, and brought up in the little court, by the childless brother of Clotaire, and committed to his protection. Clotaire soon heard of it, and sent for him, but on his arrival vowed that he was no son of his, and ordered his flowing locks, the insignia of royalty among the Franks, to be cut off. Upon Clotaire's death (A.D. 561), his son Charibert received him, but another son, Sigebert, to whose court he was summoned, again cut off his hair, and sent him into exile at Cologne. He seems to have suffered considerable hardship, and at one time to have earned his living as a fresco painter (Greg. Tur. vii. 36). From Cologne he made his escape to Narses, then ruler of Italy. Here he married, and had children, and after the death of his wife migrated to Constantinople, where he was well received by the emperor Maurice, and lived prosperously for many years. But towards the close of 579 or beginning of 580, Guntram, brother of the Austrasian Franks, sought him out at Constantinople, and invited him to France, in the name of the nobles of Childerbert's kingdom, who, in their struggle against the power of the monarchy, probably expected assistance from a contest for the crown. Boso gave the most solemn assurances of the successful issue of the expedition. Accordingly, in 582, he landed at Marseilles, where the bishop Theodurus was favourable to the design, and furnished him with a body of cavalry. He landed at Axigone, where Mummolus, the eldest general of France, who had abandoned the service of king Guntram, and joined the conspiracy, was settled. But the sight of the great treasure with which the emperor had supplied Gundovald for the expedition soon excited the avarice of Guntram Boso, who stole as much of it as he could, and deserted Gundovald. This defection was so serious that Gundovald retired to an island, the name of which we are not told, to await the progress of events (583). The following year, however, he returned to Avignon, and with Mummolus, Desiderius, a duke of Chilperic's kingdom, Sagittarius, bishop of Gap, and a considerable body of followers, marched towards Limoges, and on the way works at Brittany (Gundobald 5).

GUNDOVALDUS, twenty-fourth bishop of GUNDIUSUS, twenty-fourth bishop of GUNDULFUS

Noyon, between Autigarius and Guenulfus, early in the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 985.) [S. A. B.]

GUNDULFUS, bishop. [GUDULPHUS.]

GUNDULFUS, sixteenth bishop of Noyon and Tournay, between Faustinus and Chresma-rus. (Gall. Christ. ix. 981.) [S. A. B.]

GUNDULPHUS, bishop of Lamego, from before A.D. 681 onwards. He appears at the twelfth and thirteenth councils of Toledo. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270, 287; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 125.) [SABINARIUS.] [M. A. W.]

GUNDVALDUS, son of Gariwald, duke of Bavaria, accompanied to Italy his sister Theo-delinda, who married first, king Autharius, and afterwards king Agilulf. He was made duke of Asti, and died c. 612 by an arrow from an unknown hand. His son Arigert became king of the Lombards in 653. (Origo Gentis, 6; Paulinus Diaconus, iii. 30; iv. 41, 48; Fredegar, Chronic. cap. 34; Migne, lxxi. 623.) [A. H. D. A.]

GUNIBALD, saint. [WINIBALD.]

GUNIFORT, martyr. [GUNIFALD.]

GUNLEUS, GUNLYN. [GWINLFYW.]

GUNNULUS, GUNBUL. [GUNNUS.]

GUNTASIO, Donatist bishop of Benevent, or Benaia, in proconsular Africa, present at the Maximian council of Carthage, A.D. 303. (Aug. En. in Ps. 36, 20.) [H. W. P.]

GUNBERTUS (GOMBERTUS), thirty-fifth archbishop of Sens, succeeding Godo-calculus and followed by Petrus I. (circ. 770-790). The authors of the Italia Christiana (xii. 14) quote a MS. of the monastery of St. Peter to the effect that he died in the seventh year of his episcopate, and was buried in the church of that foundation.
His day of commemoration is March 1. He is not to be confused with St. Gundelbertus, the reputed archbishop of Sens, who founded the monastery of Seinoni in the Vosges in the preceding century. [S. A. B.]

GUNBERTUS, martyr. [GONDEBERTUS.]

GUNTHRAMNUS. [GUNTRAMNUS.]

GUNTERANUS (or GUALTERANUS), c. 670, bishop of Siena. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Italia, xvii. 374; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iii. 558.) [A. H. D. A.]

GUNTFRIDUS (GOEPFRIDUS, GAUFREDUS), thirteenth bishop of Cambrai, between Trau-rardus, or Trawardus, and Albricus. He subscribed the charter of Etho bishop of Strasbourg, for the foundation of the monastery of Schwarzachum (Arnulfi-Anglia), in Lower Alsace (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1314). He is said to have translated the remains of St. Laudelius, founder of the monastery of Lobbes, on June 15, 770 (Usuard. Jun. xv. Auct. Molani, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 159; Bull. Acta SS. Jun. ii.
1062). He died probably soon after that date.
(Gesta Pontificum Cauconormann. Lib. i. 37;

GUNTHAMUND. [GUNNAVIND.]

GUNTHAMAR (GUNDMAR), king of Gothic Spain from Oct. 610 to Aug. 614. From the Hist. Gothorum only two facts are to be learnt of his short reign, that he carried through a successful expedition against the rebellious Vascones, and that he besieged—unsuccessfully?—some of the remaining Byzantine strongholds of the peninsula (“alia expedi-tione militem Romanum obsidit.”—Isid.). Besides these two statements of Isidore’s, however, we have various documents which relate to profets which he died, and which have been and are still disputed. It will be necessary to notice briefly: I. The letters of the comus Bulgarianus; II. The so-called synod of Car-thaginesian bishops held at Toledo in 610, and the Decretum Gundemari attached to it—two famous documents, upon which the much dis-put ed presence of Toledo was practically built up; III. The church laws which, in the 15th century, Alfonso of Castagena first attributed to Gunthamar.

I. Three out of the seven letters of the Comus Bulgara or Bulgarum were published for the first time in the excellent Valencian edition of Mariana’s Historiae, 1792, vol. ii. app. On more, a letter of consecration to Gunthamar, and similar to the death of his king, Hidaiaa, was partially ly, printed by Flocruz in his Regum de Espaia, vol. i.
Three others— one addressed “Domino san to ar Beatinusino et Apostolicae meritis equando, nesque semper praefecto Dumo Agapio episc pal Bulgar.”
the second, “ejus suprema ar cumdum de Gallia” the third, “quidam ad Aquam,” which may not, of course, be a letter of the comus, and still remain unpublished. They are extant in the 10th century copy taken by Morales, and now in the Madrid Library, of the famous Codex Oviedo (see art. FLORES (3), note). Morales speaks of another still older MS. of them at Alcalá (Hist. de España, vi.), of which, however, so far as we know, no modern mention has been made. On the strength of the three barbarous and all but unintelligible letters published in the appendix to Mariana, and well known in MS. to earlier scholars, it was commonly asserted by older authors—Morales, Mariana and Ferreras, for instance—that Gunthamar had paid tribute to Theuderic of Burgundy, the son of Childerict II. and grandson of Brunichild, possibly in return for services rendered him by Theuderic in the palace revolution which overthrew his prede-sessor Witteric (Mariana, lib. vi. cap. ii.) a tory still further developed by Hefler, who regards the revolution as a church conspiracy, and Gunthamar as the clerical and Frankish instrument (Entstehung und Geschichte des Westgots-Rechts, p. 50). Dahn already refuted the tribute theory; but his explanation of the real bearing of the letters is still somewhat incomplete (Könige der Germanen, v. 176).
A careful examination of them gives the following results. In the year 611, when the final successful campaign of Brunichild and Theuderic against Theudibert of Austrasia (Fredigar, cap. 37, 38) was about to begin, it was rumoured in Gothic Gaul, of which Burgundy was the governor (conf. "in hac provinci—ad ordinansionem nostram pertinente," ep. ii.), that Brunichild and her grandson were exciting the heathen Avars against Theudibert. Bulgara writes for information to a bishop of Theudibert's kingdom (Theudibert is spoken of in the second letter as "filius vester Dominus Theudibertos," and again as "gloriosissimi Thuderic") promising that "a report ... hateful to Catholic souls" would turn out to be true, solemn fasts and prayers shall be held throughout Septimania for the success of the "orthodox prince" Theudibert against so disgraceful a conspiracy. At the same time the comes refers (ep. i.) to negotiations already going on between Theudibert and Gunthimar, and asks the bishop for news as to whether the letters sent have reached Theudibert, and whether the Missi have returned "[ut] certius aiciamus—quomodo aut ubi, pecunia praepareatur." In the second letter ("cujus supra ad episcopum Franciae directa") reference is again made, not only to Theudibert's present negotiations with the Goths, but to his relations with past Gothic princes ("decidentibis principibus")—an evident allusion to the alliance between Wittéric, Theudibert, and the Lombard Agilulf against Theuderic—Dahn, l. c. 174), and it is explained that Theudibert had promised to furnish Gunthimar with troops ("numerum gentia Francorum—impertire") in return for a sum of money ("merito pecuniae"). The bishop is implored to further the execution of this compact, and is, moreover, again asked for news as to Theudibert's war with the Avars. Evidently Bulgara and Gunthimar are mainly anxious about this latter matter because it may prevent the performance of Theudibert's promise. What the Frankish troops were wanted for is of course unknown to us, unless we may suppose that they were to be used in the expedition against the Vascons of which Isidore speaks. Whether they ever left Burgundy, or whether they even reached their destination, Bulgara's third letter ("detectissimo atque in Christo reverendissimi. Patri Epo. Bulg,)—which may be dated 612 with great probability—is one of angry remonstrance addressed to a bishop, not of Theudibert's kingdom, but of Theuderic's (conf. "cartas gloriosissimorum Regum—vestrorum Brunichildis Regine et Theuderic Regis"). The comes complains that noble Gothic legates, Totila and Gunthimar by name, have been unjustly captured by the bishop's sovereign, imprisoned by the bishop, and made to suffer the disgrace of exile together with the shame of destitution." On account of these proceedings the king and people of the Goths have a large money claim against the bishop's masters ("non exigua sed magna pecuniae repetitio") and unless the legates are released, Bulgara refers to allow Frankish legates permission to enter Spain, or to give up to Brunichild the towns of Lubiniunum (Juvignac) and Cornelianum (Cornelianum), which she claimed as a cession from Recared, but which the comes declared were only ceded by Recared for the confirmation of that peace between the Goths and Franks which she and Theuderic have now broken.

It appears tolerably clear then that the money sent to Theudibert by the Goths was captured by his cousin and rival Theuderic in the same year which saw the downfall of the former at the hands of the latter; that Gunthimar did not reverse, but rather carried out, the Frankish policy of his predecessor, Wittéric; that therefore there is no ground for supporting a combination of Gunthimar and the Franks against Wittéric for which an alliance between Gunthimar and Theuderic, not between Gunthimar and Theudibert, would be necessary; that the absence of any church action in the matter, and the tributary story, on which Helserich builds so much, is quite untenable.

In the fourth letter of the comes (unpublished), addressed to the bishop Agapius, and probably written after the death of Gunthimar, he describes his sufferings at the hands of one Atebo, or Asebo, whom he calls "tyrant," and who seems to have been the head of some revolt at Narbonne. He was released from the prison into which he had been thrown, he tells his correspondent, by the good offices of the metropolitan Sergius of Narbonne. We shall find the mention of this bishop's name of importance in the investigation of our second point.

II. The so-called synod of 610, and the Decretum Gundemarii. The Constitution Carthaginensis Biscodatun and the Decretum Gundemarii were first published by Lozya in 1590. Since then they have been generally treated as at least open to question by the various council editors (conf. Mansi, x. 511; Harduin, iii. 546), and of late the German scholar Dahn has pronounced decisively against them (Könige der Germanen, vi. 439). They are found in only three out of the nine council MSS, used by the latest editors of the Spanish Codex Carolinianus, and two of these at least, the Codex Aesilinianus and the Codex Vigilanus, rank as the best and fullest of the extant MSS. (see description of them in Florer, ili. app., and Tedaja y Ramiro, Cod. de Can. i. c. i. pref.). The Decretum and the Constitutio follow immediately after the name of the one of the bishops of Toledo, held under Encio (q. w.), in which the famous sixth canon secures to the king and the metropolitan of Toledo the right of appointment to bishops all over Spain. After this canon, which raised the bishop of Toledo to the position of primate of Spain, the earlier decrements, which conferred upon Toledo the metropolitan authority over the whole of Carthaginensis, seem to have been added, honestly or dishonestly, as tending to illustrate the history and enhance the dignity of the royal see. The Constitutio which is signed by fifteen bishops of Carthaginensis confesses that the see of Toledo has metropolitan authority ("metropolitani nominis habere auctoritatem"), and that it precedes the other churches of Carthaginensis, "et honoris potestate et meritis," Nor are its honours in any way of any creation of the see or other the "syonal sententiam antiquorum patrum" in the council held under bishop Montanus (A.D. 527; Montanus), and are now reiterated lest at any future time any of the comprovincial bishops should venture to despise the primacy of the Toledan church, and to appoint bishops without regard to the rights of the Toledan see ("res hapax sedis potestate") as had been hitherto done. Deposition and excommunication are threatened in case of any such presumption in future. The synod is dated the 23rd of October in the first year of the most pious and glorious Gundemar era, 648 (A.D. 610). The fifteen signatures, headed by that of Progenes of Ségontia (Sigguenza), follow.
GUNTHERM

The Decretum Gundemari, which, although it precedes the synod in the MSS., has always been considered as confirmatory of the synodal acts (Duhm, l. c.; Heilicher, l. c. p. 52; Esp. Segr. vi. 158), is an extremely curious and interesting document, whether forged or genuine. It is addressed to "our venerable fathers the bishops of Carthaginensis," and announces at the outset the king's desire to glorify his reign not only by due care for and arrangement of secular matters, but also of matters pertaining to divinity and religion. The passage which follows is almost unintelligible. "Nonnulnum enim in disciplinis ecclesiasticis contra canonum auctoritatem per meras praecedentium [Florez has "noves procedentium," vi. 333] temporum licentiam sibi de usurpatione praesterti principes [Florez, "praesterti Principis"] fecerunt: its ut quidam episcoporum Carthaginensis Provinciae non reverentiam, sed saepe necesse, per quasdam fratris afflatum, in persecutione et persecutionis exsperiatum vitae omnes (? homines) episcopali officio preversi atque hanc ipsum praefatae ecclesiae dignitatem imperii nostri solio sublimatam conterremeri." As to the historical meaning of these sentences, we shall have a few words of suggestion to offer when going on to declare that nothing of this kind is to be allowed in future, but that the honour of the primacy over all the churches of Carthaginensis is to be conceded to the church of Toledo, which excels the rest in dignity of name and office. Nor is it to be suffered that the province of Carthaginensis should be split up into two parts with two different metropolitans, which may lead to schism, to the overthrow of faith, and the destruction of unity. As for the signature of the venerable bishop Euphemius in the general synod of the Toladan council (C. Tol. III. A.D. 589; EUPHEMIIUS), where he calls himself metropolitan of the province of Carpentania, the king corrects, "ejusdem ignorante sectentiam," since the "regio" of Carpentania is not a province, but part of the province of Carthaginensis, as ancient documents declare. As Baetica, Lusitania, and Tarraconensis are separate provinces with separate metropolitans, So Carthaginensis is one province, and must obey one primate. Let not the bishops then venture to do again such presumptuous things as have been done. Indulgence is to be accorded to past transgressions, but if any disobey in the future, they are to be visited with degradation, excommunication and "nostre severitatis censuram." The king signs first, "propria manu." Then follow Isidore of Seville: "dum in urbe Tolentam pro occure ns Regio adventisse agnitus his communicatis regio, Rasonacum suo compositaque subscriptus..." Innocenti merita, id.; Eusebius of Tarraco, Sergius of Narbonne, and, among the suffragans, the two historians Joannes of Gerona [JOANNES BICALAESI] and MAXIMUS of Saragossa, and Isidore's brother, Fulgentius of Astigi. There are twenty-six signatures, of which four are metropolitans.

CHRIST. DIOR.—VOL. II.

Arguments for and against the Synod and Decretum.—Duhn's objections, based wholly on internal evidence, are—(1) the unusually good Latin of the documents, especially of the Constitutio, compared with that of other contemporary specimens, with the acts of C. Hisp. II. for instance, which we know to have been drawn up by Isidore himself; (2) the use of the title "majestas nostra," which we find nowhere else applied to a Gothic king, and of the word fratrises, also unknown according to Duhn to the laws of that time and country; (3) the sharp definitions of the words regio and provincia, the meaning of which varied greatly in official and public use; and (4) the absence of the name of the bishop of Toledo from the list of signatures (Könige der Germanen, vi. 430).

To these objections of detail we may add the generally suspicious character of these documents relating to metropolitan privileges (conf. the acts of the so-called council of Oviedo, in 811, and the supposed councils of Lugo, Esp. Segr. iv. 141 and xxxvii. app.); and we may point to the averted connexion between these documents and the synod of Montanus, another doubtful matter in the eyes of some scholars, though the grounds for rejecting it are as yet far from convincing (MONTANUS).

On the other hand, it may be urged—(1) that the Latin of the Constitutio is no better than, if as good as, the Latin of the second synod of Barcelona, held in 599, the acts of which were possibly drawn up by the historian Joannes Bicalaensis. The king went on to declare that nothing of this kind is to be allowed in future, but that the honour of the primacy over all the churches of Carthaginensis is to be conceded to the church of Toledo, which excels the rest in dignity of name and office. Nor is it to be suffered that the province of Carthaginensis should be split up into two parts with two different metropolitans, which may lead to schism, to the overthrow of faith, and the destruction of unity. As for the signature of the venerable bishop Euphemius in the general synod of the Toladan council (C. Tol. III. A.D. 589; EUPHEMIIUS), where he calls himself metropolitan of the province of Carpentania, the king corrects, "ejusdem ignorante sectentium," since the "regio" of Carpentania is not a province, but part of the province of Carthaginensis, as ancient documents declare. As Baetica, Lusitania, and Tarraconensis are separate provinces with separate metropolitans, so Carthaginensis is one province, and must obey one primate. Let not the bishops then venture to do again such presumptuous things as have been done. Indulgence is to be accorded to past transgressions, but if any disobey in the future, they are to be visited with degradation, excommunication and "nostre severitatis censuram." The king signs first, "propria manu." Then follow Isidore of Seville: "dum in urbe Tolentam pro occure ns Regio adventisse agnitus his communicatis regio, Rasonacum suo compositaque subscriptus..." Innocenti merita, id.; Eusebius of Tarraco, Sergius of Narbonne, and, among the suffragans, the two historians Joannes of Gerona [JOANNES BICALAESI] and MAXIMUS of Saragossa, and Isidore's brother, Fulgentius of Astigi. There are twenty-six signatures, of which four are metropolitans.

GUNTHERM

Arguments for and against the Synod and Decretum.—Duhn's objections, based wholly on internal evidence, are—(1) the unusually good Latin of the documents, especially of the Constitutio, compared with that of other contemporary specimens, with the acts of C. Hisp. II. for instance, which we know to have been drawn up by Isidore himself; (2) the use of the title "majestas nostra," which we find nowhere else applied to a Gothic king, and of the word fratrises, also unknown according to Duhn to the laws of that time and country; (3) the sharp definitions of the words regio and provincia, the meaning of which varied greatly in official and public use; and (4) the absence of the name of the bishop of Toledo from the list of signatures (Könige der Germanen, vi. 430).

To these objections of detail we may add the generally suspicious character of these documents relating to metropolitan privileges (conf. the acts of the so-called council of Oviedo, in 811, and the supposed councils of Lugo, Esp. Segr. iv. 141 and xxxvii. app.); and we may point to the averted connexion between these documents and the synod of Montanus, another doubtful matter in the eyes of some scholars, though the grounds for rejecting it are as yet far from convincing (MONTANUS).

On the other hand, it may be urged—(1) that the Latin of the Constitutio is no better than, if as good as, the Latin of the second synod of Barcelona, held in 599, the acts of which were possibly drawn up by the historian Joannes Bicalaensis. The king went on to declare that nothing of this kind is to be allowed in future, but that the honour of the primacy over all the churches of Carthaginensis is to be conceded to the church of Toledo, which excels the rest in dignity of name and office. Nor is it to be suffered that the province of Carthaginensis should be split up into two parts with two different metropolitans, which may lead to schism, to the overthrow of faith, and the destruction of unity. As for the signature of the venerable bishop Euphemius in the general synod of the Toladan council (C. Tol. III. A.D. 589; EUPHEMIIUS), where he calls himself metropolitan of the province of Carpentania, the king corrects, "ejusdem ignorante sectentium," since the "regio" of Carpentania is not a province, but part of the province of Carthaginensis, as ancient documents declare. As Baetica, Lusitania, and Tarraconensis are separate provinces with separate metropolitans, so Carthaginensis is one province, and must obey one primate. Let not the bishops then venture to do again such presumptuous things as have been done. Indulgence is to be accorded to past transgressions, but if any disobey in the future, they are to be visited with degradation, excommunication and "nostre severitatis censuram." The king signs first, "propria manu." Then follow Isidore of Seville: "dum in urbe Tolentam pro occure ns Regio adventisse agnitus his communicatis regio, Rasonacum suo compositaque subscriptus..." Innocenti merita, id.; Eusebius of Tarraco, Sergius of Narbonne, and, among the suffragans, the two historians Joannes of Gerona [JOANNES BICALAESI] and MAXIMUS of Saragossa, and Isidore's brother, Fulgentius of Astigi. There are twenty-six signatures, of which four are metropolitans.
the Constitution." "The signature of Venerius," says Helfferich, "speaks very much in favour of the Decretum—a forger would hardly have taken notice of such a point." Among the whole forty-one signatures to the documents, there is not one against which a charge of anachronism or impossibility can be made, while several are unexpectedly illustrated by contemporary documents. For instance, Sergius of Narbonne is known to us from the synods of Toledo, 589, and Narbonne, in the same year, only as Sergius of Carcassonne, but the fourth letter of Bulgaranus (unpublished; see above) shews him to us as advanced to the metropolitan see of Narbonne; Innocentius of Merida does not appear in any other synod of the time, but his life among the biographies of the bishops of Merida, current under the name of Paulus Emanetiana (a work of the first half of the 7th century), proves that an Innocentius was bishop of Merida just at this date. Eusebius of Tarraco is known to us from a letter of Braulio to Isidore (Pat. v. 933; S. Greg. xxi. 336) and from the well-known letter addressed to him by king Sisebut [EUSEBIUS (85)], and he may possibly be identified with the Eusebius signing the council of Egara in 614. In general it may be said that we are able to identify most of the bishops signing the Decretum, who belong to the provinces of Tarraconensis, Narbonensis, and Baetica. This is only because we have synods in 589, 592, 599, and 619 hold in these provinces. There is no Gallican or Lusitanian synod between the third and fourth councils of Toledo, and also no synod beside the synod of Gunthimar in which the names of Carthaginanian bishops appear, between 589 or 597, if we accept the doubtful synod of Recared (Gams, K.-G. ii. 2, 25; Exp. Sagra. vi. 154) and 633. This explains how it is that only one of the Lusitanian, none of the Gallican, and very few of the Carthaginian names can be substantiated from outside, but as the names that can be checked are right, it is at least probable that those which cannot are also so.

One of two alternatives, therefore, must be the case, either the documents are genuine, or they are the work of an extremely clever forger extending back as far as 610 and 619 a very small part of the history of the time. On the latter supposition, three separate suggestions may be made: (i.) that they are connected with the synod of Montanus, that both are forgeries of the time of Eugenius II., and that Ilefonson conscienciously or unconsciously made use of the deception; (ii.) that the Constitution and Decretum are forgeries of the time of the ambitious Julian, to whose initiative Pope G. Tol. I. and during whose episcopate the see of Toledo assumed a position it had never attained before, and never equaled again until the time of archbishop Bernard and Alfonso VI. (conf. Gams, K.-G. ii. [2] 210); (iii.) that the forgeries of these Toledan documents is connected with the efforts of Orihlo in the 10th and 11th centuries to obtain metropolitan rank, and to play the part of the heir of Toledo in things ecclesiastical as it had become the heir of the Gothic capital in civil status. This latter suggestion would require a careful re-examination and comparison of MSS. before it could be proved or finally refuted. Comparison could be brought made of Toledan supremacy over Carthaginensis in the acts of the so-called council of Orihlo in 811 (Exp. Sagra. xxxvii. app.).

On the other hand, if the documents are genuine, we are in possession of the key to the ecclesiastical history of Carthaginensis in the first half of the 7th century. Between the modest signatures of Euphemius in 589 as "metropolitan of Carpetania" and the glorification of the see of Toledo as the illustrious and privileged head of Carthaginensis which we find in Ilefonson (conf. de Vir. Ill. passim, but especially the preface), and see realized in Julian's career [JULIAN], the synod and Decretum would then occupy a middle and explanatory place. Such is the case in 614. It throws some light on such an ecclesiastical attempt as these documents, if authentic, represent. In 589, many of the older bishops, certainly most of the maritime bishops of Carthaginensis and Baetica were in the hands of the Byzantines. The sees of Cartagena, Malaga, Urci, and Assidonia as least were in their possession, and possibly, as Gams suggests, Ilici, Dianum, and Sasae. The two bishops of Gregory the Great to the Defensor Ioannes (Epist. i. 13, ep. 45, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxvii.) imply the existence of a considerable but indefinite number of bishoprics within the Byzantine boundaries.

Euphemius then, at a time when several of the suffragan bishoprics of Carthaginensis, including Cartagena itself, up to 429 at least— as we can scarcely doubt notwithstanding the scanty nature of the evidence—not only the ancient civil but the undisputed ecclesiastical head of the province, were in the possession of the Eastern empire, could not truthfully assume the title of metropolitan of Carthaginensis, even if such a rank had formerly at any time belonged undisputedly to Toledo. And it was possible and it is now the moment the synod of 619 had been later, for the bishop of Toledo to assume the title without possessing the reality because of the existence of the distinguished Lician of Cartagena, the friend of Gregory the Great, who undoubtedly, as his letters show, possessed and exercised metropolitan powers either over the whole of the Spanish territory within the Greek borders, together with the Balearic islands, or over a portion of it (Ep. i. 9, ad S. Greg. Pap. and ii. ad Vincentium Ep. Eobotaniae Inclusae; Exp. Sagra. v. 421, 425).

But after the death of Lician of Cartagena (about A.D. 600), to whom we know of no successor, although he may have had one, and after the reigns of Recared and Witteric, during which the Gothic power was steadily increasing and the Visigothic-Roman power steadily decreasing (as is shown by the rapid successes of Sisebert and Suintila), the condition of things changed. In 610 Toledo was not yet even the civil head of the whole of Carthaginensis (the final renunciations of territory on the part of the Greeks were made in 615 and 625), but an energetic bishop such as we know Aur cursius to have been (ibid.

\textit{Vir. Illustr.} cap. \textit{v.}) with some plausibility have claimed the ecclesiastical headship. In or about 615 Cartagena itself was destroyed (conf.

\textit{Friedeberger. Chron.} c. 33 with \textit{Etymolog.} \textit{xv.} \textit{i.} \textit{67}), and no possible rival remained to dispute the pretensions of the \textit{urba regia}. At a time, therefore, when the Gothic power was rapidly advancing towards this conclusion, Aur cursius may have made his attempt, just as Montanus may have made an earlier attempt in the same direction, when Cartagena, the ancient civil and ecclesiastical metropolis [see art. \textit{Hilarus}], was still suffering from the ruin and destruction wrought by the Vandals in 425 (frat. ad an.), and before her restoration by the imperialists. (The Byzantines entered Spain in 554 at the invitation of \textit{Athanasig.) \textit{A}}fter Toledo became under Leo Vivid the seat of the Gothic government, the aggrandisement of the see was assured. If the synod and \textit{Decretum Gundemari} are genuine, then we are in possession of the steps which led from the position of \textit{Euphemius} to the position of \textit{Julian}. If not, we are in the dark.

Among the exciting causes of the synod and \textit{Decretum} may very well have been the obscure proceedings in the south-eastern corner of Spain revealed to us by Gregory's letters to the Defender Johannes, and by the \textit{sentensoria} or judgment of Johannes upon the causes he was sent to investigate. The words in the \textit{Decretum}, \textit{licentiam sibi de usurpatione praestet rit principis securum}, refer possibly not to Witteric, as Dahn supposes, but to Justinian or Maurice, and allude to the split of some bishops within the Greek borders from the rest of Carthaginensis, perhaps to the doubtful cases where part of the bishopric had fallen into Byzantine hands, and the bishop had taken advantage of the fact to separate himself from the Carthaginensis synod. Space fails us to dwell on the question, but the more those letters are studied, the more probable will it appear that the synod and \textit{Decretum} of Gunthamar were in great measure an answer to the papal proceeding represented by them. The pope says that one of the bishops—of unknown secular status—was required to be tried by a synod and not be a metropolitan or patriarch. Therefore Rome takes up the matter and the Defender Johannes is sent out. Toledo replies about six years later by claiming the whole of Carthaginensis, and sharply denouncing those who had tampered with her metropolitan privileges in the matter of appointment to bishoprics. Marked jealousy of the claims of Rome is shown by Toledo throughout the 7th century. (See art. \textit{Julian}; \textit{Gams, K.-G.} ii. [2] 222-238.) The synod and \textit{Decretum} of Gunthamar are not improbably one of the first symptoms of it.

III. On the subject of the supposed church laws of Gunthamar, see \textit{Helfirsch} (\textit{Westphalischen\textit{Eckrich}, p. 59), who supposes that the four anony-

\textit{mous} laws on the right of asylum in the \textit{Lex \textit{Visigothica}} ii. 3, may with some probability be traced back to Gunthamar. Dahn, however, is of a contrary opinion (\textit{Könige der Germanen}, v. 175, n. 6).

\textit{(Exp. Surrañëa}, vi. 158, 330; v. 162; \textit{Agüere-Catalani}, \textit{Collectio Maxima Conc. Hisp.} iii. 392, 554; \textit{Tejeda y Ramiro}, \textit{Colles. de Conc.} ii. 403.)

\textit{M. A. W.}
a life of rapine, for the most part hidden in the earth to provide against all contingencies, was forfeited to the crown.

Gregory's estimate of him is curious evidence of the desperate lawlessness of the times. Though himself the chronicler of all his crimes, it is his perjuring only which impressed him, and those apart, he admits that Guntram had good qualities (aliae sane bonus), though avaricious and greedy of others' goods. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. vii. 14, 26; v. 6.) In 584 the bishops of Aix and Arles (vii. 14, 32, 36; viii. 21, ix. 8, 10, 23; De Mirac. S. Martini, ii. 17; Epitomata, lxxx.; FREDEG. Chron. viii.; THIERRY, Récits des Temps mérovingiens, iii. iv.)

[S. A. B.]

GUNTRAMNUS (3) (GUNTCHRAMNUS, GUNTTRAMNUS, GUNTRAN), ST., king of Burgundy, son of Clotaire I., and Ingundis (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 5). Upon his father's death in 561, Guntram's half-brother Chilperic seized the royal treasure at Braine, and entering Paris with the Franks, whose support it enabled him to purchase, endeavoured to usurp the government of the whole kingdom. Thereupon Guntram, Sigebert and Charibert, having united their forces, drove him out, and proceeded to make a judgment of the kingdom by lot. The lot fell to Guntram, who had been the share of his uncle Chlodomer, viz., the kingdom of Burgundy, which at this time extended from the Vosges to the Durance, and from the Alps to the Loire. (For the territories of the sons of Clotaire, see Bünne, Die Anfänge des Karoli- nischen Hauses, sub fn.) Orleans was his nominal capital, but in fact he made his ordinary residence at Clion-sur-Saône (iv. 21, 22). The external history of his reign, owing to his pacific and enterprising disposition, is uneventful. His wars were almost all defensive, and on one occasion only did he take the field in person. Upon Chilperic's death, about A.D. 567, his kingdom was distributed between the three surviving brothers, the city of Paris with its territory being divided equally among them, and a compact was entered into to the effect that entry into the city by any of them should be followed by the forfeiture of the offender's share, an agreement under which Guntram later on claimed his two brothers' portions (vii. 6, 14). Sigebert soon broke the peace by endeavouring to deprive Guntram of Arles, but his expedition was defeated and he lost Avignon to Guntram's generals, though it was restored to him again out of good faith (iv. 37). In 571, and the following year, the Lombards broke into France from Italy. On the former occasion Guntram's general, Amatus, was defeated and slain with a terrible massacre of his Burgundian army, but on their return the superior generalship of Mummolus triumphed, and the Lombards were annihilated or driven back across the Alps (iv. 42). About this time began the conflict between Sigebert and Chilperic, which only ended with the former's murder in 575. Guntram at first joined Sigebert, and through Mummolus recovered for him Tours and Poitiers, which Chilperic had wrongfully usurped (iv. 46). But he would gladly have held aloof altogether, and in 573 he assembled all the bishops of his realm at Paris, that they might decide upon the pretensions of the two brothers, but without avail, for they refused to listen (iv. 48). In 577, all his four sons having died he solemnly adopted Childebert, the infant son of Sigebert, and declared him his heir (v. 18). In 584 Chilperic was murdered, and at Fredegund's request Guntram went with a force to Paris, and protected her and her infant son, Clotaire II., against the nobles of Childerich's kingdom (vii. 5). Here too he undid some of the wrongs committed by Chilperic, restoring the property which his followers had taken, and reviving the wills of pious donors which had been annulled. In 585 he voluntarily relinquished Marseilles (vi. 46); he upheld his title, in spite of the remonstrances of Childerich, and the Austrasian nobles, to the part of Charibert's territory which had been inherited by Sigebert and Chilperic, on the ground that they had forfeited their shares by entering Paris (vii. 6, 12, 13, 14). In 584 Tours and Poitiers, which had formerly belonged to Sigebert, reverted from Guntram to Childebert, the former's son, but were speedily subdued, their territories being devastated by fire and sword (vii. 12, 13). In 585 Poitiers revolted again, and Guntram in person led an army against it, which pillaged, burned and murdered in the surrounding country till the city submitted. His soldiers afterwards pillaged Toulouse, though loyal (vii. 24). In 582 there had also been at Marseilles a pretender to a share in the kingdom of the Franks, in the person of Gundoald, a son of one of Clotaire's concubines, but disavowed by Clotaire himself. Induced by Guntram Beo and Mummolus, who had for some reason deserted Guntram, to leave Constantinople, where he had hitherto lived, on the solemn assurance that the nobles of Childerich's kingdom were eager to espouse his cause, he found himself, after a time, betrayed and plundered by those who had invited him, and after a hopeless struggle was treacherously murdered at Comminges in a.d. 585 (vii. 14, 28, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38). At this time, induced perhaps by the need of an ally against Gundoald, Guntram restored to Childebert the territory he held which had formerly belonged to Sigebert, and again solemnly made him his heir (viii. 33). In 586 he sent an army against the Visigoths in Septimania, to avenge the injuries of Ingundis, his niece, and the death of her husband, St. Hermenegild, but the expedition, accompanied by more than the usual devastation and sacrilege, broke up and failed. Reprisals followed almost immediately in the invasion of the territory of Toulouse and Arles by Richardus Labeque, while Sigebert's son Chartrres was assigned to Guntram, while Massa., Sensalis, Tours, Poitiers, Arrancches, Aire, Conseans, Bayonne, and Albi were given to Childebert. In the event of either dying without leaving a son, the other was to take the whole. As to the towns which had belonged to Galampha as a son or morgengabe, viz., Bordeaux, Limoges, his own seat at Tarbes, they were to be held by Guntram for life, and then belong to Brunehilda, except Cahors, which should become hers at once (ix. 20). About the same time he became involved in a war with Breton war on his borders, which though settled for the time broke out again later (ix. 18; x. 9). In 589 he sustained a severe defeat from the Goths at Campania, losing 5000 men (ix. 31). In 591, at Fredegund's request, he was present at the baptism of her son Clotaire II, and received him from the font. He died in 593, in the thirty-third year of his reign, on the 28th March, on which day the church commemorates him as a saint, and was buried in the monastery church of St. Marcellus, where the deacon had enjoined silence for the mass, Guntram turned to the people, and said, "I beseech you, men and women who are present, do not break your faith to me, but forbear to kill me as you killed my brothers. At least, let me live three years, that I may rear up the nephews whom I have adopted, lest mayhap, which God forbid, you perish together with those little ones when I am dead, and there is no strong man of our race to defend you" (vii. 8, cf. Michelet, Hist. de France, i. 231, "Ce bon homme semble chargé de la partie comique dans le drame terrible de l'histoire mérovingienne").

But on one occasion, at least, he had not the excuse of either rage or fear for his cruelty. His wife, Austrechilde, on her death-bed, expressed a wish that her two physicians should die with her, and though they were in no way responsible for her death, Guntram commanded their execution as she desired (v. 30).

On the other hand, the mere absence from wanton wrong-doing and aggression must be counted for a virtue in his family and age. For the crown ofOLUTE of the repugnance in favour of Austrechilde (Greg. Tur. iv. 25, v. 17). Upon Charibert's death he entertained the proposals of marriage made to him by his widow, Theudechilde. "Let her come without fear," said he, "and bring her treasure with her." But no sooner was she in his power than he appropriated her riches, and shut her up in a monastery at Arles, where she soon after died (iv. 26).

In the absence of provocation or panic he was mild, and even merciful, in temper, but on occasion he readily committed the barbarities of his age. The two brothers of the forsaken Marcarudis, who, in resentiment at their sister's injuries, spoke against her successor, were put to death, and their goods confiscated (v. 17). He did not hesitate to beat, imprison and torture the ambassadors of Gundovald, though one of them was an abbot, and Mummolus and the rest of the pretender's generals were put to death in breach of the condition of their surrender (vii. 25, 32, 38). His chamberlain, Chundo, being accused of killing a wild bull in one of the royal forests, was sentenced, despite his protestations of innocence, to the ordeal by combat, and when his champion fell at the same moment with his opponent, was tied to a stake, and stoned to death (x. 10).

The merest suspicion or accusation connected with his personal safety was sufficient to throw him into a panic, when torture was freely applied to obtain confessions. Assassination was the haunting fear of his life, and to guard against it he always wore a sword, and continually strengthened the escort by which he was attended everywhere, except in church (vii. 8, 14, viii. 11, 44). The murder of Chilpéric made a deep impression on him, and when Fredegund denounced Eberulfus as the assassin, he swore before his nobles that he would kill not only him but his posterity to the ninth generation, to stay this "appalling pest of killing princes" (vii. 21). Childerich's ambassadors played upon this fear, when they assured him to his face that "the axe which had dashed out his brother's brains had not lost its edge" (vii. 14).

His apprehension at times took an almost comic aspect. Gregory tells us that one Sunday at church in Paris, when the deacon had enjoined silence for the mass, Guntram turned to the people, and said, "I beseech you, men and women who are present, do not break your faith to me, but forbear to kill me as you killed my brothers. At least, let me live three years, that I may rear up the nephews whom I have adopted, lest mayhap, which God forbid, you perish together with those little ones when I am dead, and there is no strong man of our race to defend you" (vii. 8, cf. Michelet, Hist. de France, i. 231, "Ce bon homme semble chargé de la partie comique dans le drame terrible de l'histoire mérovingienne").

But on one occasion, at least, he had not the excuse of either rage or fear for his cruelty. His wife, Austrechilde, on her death-bed, expressed a wish that her two physicians should die with her, and though they were in no way responsible for her death, Guntram commanded their execution as she desired (v. 30).

On the other hand, the mere absence from wanton wrong-doing and aggression must be counted for a virtue in his family and age. For the crown of OLUTE of the repugnance in favour of Austrechilde (Greg. Tur. iv. 25, v. 17). Upon Charibert's death he entertained the proposals of marriage made to him by his widow, Theudechilde. "Let her come without fear," said he, "and bring her treasure with her." But no sooner was she in his power than he appropriated her riches, and shut her up in a monastery at Arles, where she soon after died (iv. 26).

In the absence of provocation or panic he was mild, and even merciful, in temper, but on occasion he readily committed the barbarities of his age. The two brothers of the forsaken Marcarudis, who, in resentiment at their sister's injuries, spoke against her successor, were put to death, and their goods confiscated (v. 17). He did not hesitate to beat, imprison and torture the ambassadors of Gundovald, though one of them was an abbot, and Mummolus and the rest of the pretender's generals were put to death in breach of the condition of their surrender (vii. 25, 32, 38). His chamberlain, Chundo, being accused of killing a wild bull in one of the royal forests, was sentenced, despite his protestations of innocence, to the ordeal by combat, and when his champion fell at the same moment with his opponent, was tied to a stake, and stoned to death (x. 10).
his attendance at all religious services, and especially by the freedom and condescension with which he ate, drank and conversed with them (vii 29; viii. 1-7, 9, 10; ix. 3, 20, 21; x. 29).

Gregory says, "You would have thought him a priest as well as a king" (ix. 21). "With priests he was like a priest," says Ps. 136:25 (Chron. i.), and "he showed himself humble to the priests of Christ," says Aminon (Hist. Franc. iii. 81, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 751). Chilperic once intercepted the letter of a bishop, in which it was written that the transition from Guntram's sway to his was like passing from paradise to hell (Greg. Tur. vi. 22).

In estimating Guntram's character, therefore, it must always be borne in mind that the authors on whom we depend for our information belong to this favoured class. Especially is this true in the case of Gregory of Tours, who was on very friendly terms with him (viii. 2-7, 13; ix. 20, 21) and goes so far as to ascribe miracles to his sanctity during his lifetime (ix. 21; cf. too Paulus Diaconus, de Gest. Langob. iii. 39, Migne, Patr. Lat. xcv. 535, and Aminon. iii. 3, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 683).

There is extant an edict of Guntram addressed to the bishops and judges of his realm, commanding the observance of the Sabbath and holy days, in conformity with the canon of the second council of Mâcon. It is dated Nov. 10, 585, and is to be found in Mansi ix. 592, and in Boll. Acts SS. Max. iii. 720; cf. Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 369, seq.

Several authors relate of Guntram the following story, which Valesius (Gest. Vct. Fr. lib. xv. 452) takes pains seriously to refute. One day, weary with hunting, he was resting on the bosom of his esquire by the bank of a rivulet, and the esquire saw a little reptile issue from his mouth and vainly attempt to cross the water. The esquire held his sword across, and the creature passed over upon it, returned and re-entered the king's mouth. Guntram awoke in agitation, and said he had been dreaming that he had crossed a great river by an iron bridge, and in a cavern beneath a mountain discovered a vast treasure. Advancing beyond the stream he came to the treasure, which he devoted to the service of the church. (Paul. Diacon. Gest. Langob. lib. iv. cap. 33; Almain, Monach. Floriac. lib. iii. cap. 2; Sigebert, Chron. ann. 585; Regino, Chron. in Pat. Lat. cxxxii. 31; Wendover, tom. i. p. 93, ed. Coke.)

[S. A. B.]

GUNTRAMNUS (2) (Guntharius), seventeenth archbishop of Tours following St. Baldus or Beudinus, and succeeded by St. Erminonius. Gregory says that he was a disciple of the monastery of St. Venantius in the same city, whence he was raised to the episcopate. Before his elevation he was a man of wisdom, and a trusted ambassador of the French kings, but after he became addicted to wine to such an extent that he grew stupid, and was unable to recognise his fellow-revelers, whom he cursed with abuse. He sat two years, ten months, and twenty-two days, circ. A.D. 552-554, and on his death was buried in the church of St. Martin. Gregory also relates the miraculous refusal of the bishop's horse to pass an oratory of St. Martin, where as a protomartyr he had been wont to pray, until the duty had been performed.

(Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 4, 11. x. 31; De Glor. Confess. cap. viii.)

[S. A. B.]

GUNTRAMNUS (4) (Guntharius), 36th archbishop of Tours, succeeded Ido and followed by Ido. According to the Chronicon Taurinense Magnus (Salmon, Recueil de Chroniques de Tauraine, pp. 91-2), he sat from 730 to 743. He may be the bishop who is mentioned in the archbishopric of St. Martin's (Gall. Christ. xix. 32, 160).

[S. A. B.]

GUNTRUTA, daughter of Telepert, duke of the Bavarians, became the wife of Luitpold, king of the Lombards (713-744). Paulus Diaconus, vi. 43.

[A. H. D. A.]

GUNWALLUS, saint. [WINWALLUS]

GUODLOIUS, GUODOLIUS, suffragan bishop of Llandaff. [GWODELOW and GWYDDOLN]

GUOZBERTUS of Poitiers. [GAUBERTUS]

GURAM, the first of the race of the Bagratiad kings who ascended the throne of Georgia towards the end of the 6th century of our era. He was the adopted son of Stephen, last Georgian king of the house of the Sassanides. The dynasty of the Bagratiad kings is said to have been descended from David king of Israel, emblazoning on their arms the slings that served to kill Goliath. David's harp, a pair of scales as emblem of Solomon's wisdom, a crown which rested Solomon's head, our Lord's coat, and St. George slaying the dragon. All round this device were the verses: "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David: he will not turn from it: of the fruit of thy belly will I set upon thy throne" (Ps. xxxii. 11). Constantine Porphyrogenitus (de Administr. imp. cap. 45) tells us that the kings of Georgia are descended from the prophet David, and that they quitted Jerusalem about the year 500 of the Christian era. (Makan, Hist. of Georgian Church, p. 15.)

[G. T. S.]

GUREBERTUS of Reate. [GUERIBERTUS]

GURGEN king of Georgia, about the time of the emperor Justinian. He was persecuted by the Persians on account of his faith. (Mialis, Hist. of Georgian Ch. p. 81.)

[G. T. S.]

GURHEI, Welsh saint. [GWRHAL]

GURIAS, Nov. 15 (Cal. Byz.); in the Armenian Calendar, Nov. 14; presbyter and martyr with another presbyter, Samonas or Shamuna, in the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 306, at the city of Bodessa, where a magnificent church was raised to their memory, which the Mahometans afterwards turned into a mosque. Their acts were written by Arcatus, bishop of Cäsarea in the 6th century. The deacon Habubius is usually joined with them in commemoration, but he suffered some years after under Liciinian. (B. Menol.; Assesar. Mart. Orient. i. 226; Cureton, Anct. Syriac Docum. p. 72; Wright's Sgr. Mart.) [G. T. S.]

GURMAET, ST., a companion of St. Teilo after his return from Brittany to Wales, and the saint of a church corresponding to Llandeily Fan, in Brecknock, which was bestowed by Rhysderch, king of Wales, on the bishopric of Llandaff. It is called Langurueset in the great.
GURNERTH (C. W. B.)

GURNERTH [Gurneth]

GURNIN (Gurnin), virgin daughter of Cughneala or Conghil, is commemorated in Mart. Domus. and Mart. Tall. on Feb. 22, and is given as Gurninna among the Præternomina of the Bollandists. (Acta SS. 22 Feb. iii. 280; O’Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 670.) [J. G.]

GURNEUE (Gurnue, Gurnue), bishop of Menevia about the beginning of the 9th century. (Giraldus Cambr. H. Kambri. ii. c. i. wks. vi. 105; Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 155; Godwin, de Praecl. Angl. 692.) [J. G.]

GURON, ST., a hermit, probably Irish, who had settled at Bodmin, in Cornwall, before the arrival of St. Petrock from Ireland. (Leland, Collect. i. 75.) William of Worcester (p. 107) says, “St. Woronus confessor die 7 Aprilis.” A chapel is dedicated to him in St. John’s parish on the part of Cornwall which projects out into Plymouth Sound. The parish of Gorran is on Menagissey Bay further west, and the episcopal estate there is called Polgarran. See Dugdale’s Monasticon, i. 213. [C. W. B.]

GURYVALUS (Gudval, Gurrval), ST., said to have been one of the early bishops of St. Malo in the first half of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 995.) [S. A. B.]

GURVAN, bishop of Menevia. [Gurnue.]

GUTARD (Guttardus), the thirteenth abbot of St. Augustine’s, Canterbury, who ruled according to the Chronologia Augustinensis, from 787 to 803. (Elmham, pp. 12, 13, 335, 340.) According to the Canterbury historians, he was blessed by archbishop Jaemberth. (Thorn, c. 1. 75; Elmham. p. 335.) Although he was abbot during a most stirring period of Kentish history, nothing is recorded of his acts. [S.]

GUTHAGHON, commemorated July 3; according to tradition a Scott-Irish prince, who was the brother of Magra, and his servant on occasion Ghillo [Ghillo], into Flanders, and, after a life of penitence and piety at Oosterkerk, near Bruges, died there in the year 299, aged fifty-one, according to Dempster. (Usher, Brit. Ecl. Anc. c. 16, wks. vi. 314–16; Dempster, Hist. Ecl. Gent. Scot. i. 314–15; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, July 3, p. 97; Butler, Lives of the Saints, July 3, Bp. Forbes, Kgl. Scott. Saints, 204, 213.) [J. G.]

GUTHLAG, ST., presbyter and hermit of Crowland or Croyland (609–714). He is known through a Latin Life by Felix, whose information was derived from the saint’s intimate associates, the abbot Wilfrid and the presbyters Cissa (§ 2) and Bettelin (§ 35). It has been printed with notes and comments by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 11 Apr. ii. 37) and by Mabillon (Acta SS. 2, B. iii. 256 or 263). A free Anglo-Saxon version from the Latin was made at some period unknown, and manuscript executed, it is believed, soon after the conquest. This version was edited in 1848 with an English translation by Mr. C. W. Goodwin.

Felix must have written about thirty-four years after Guthlac’s death, since he dedicated his Life of Ethelwald king of the East-Anges (747–749). The work is thus of much interest, as it carries on Anglo-Saxon historical literature a step in immediate succession to Bede. Bede’s Life of Cuthbert, Felix’s Life of Guthlac, were long regarded as companion memoirs of early English saints. In one respect Felix’s memoir is even of more interest than Bede’s, as containing much less of the marvellous in its details, and giving more reality to the saint. It is not known who Felix was. Of course he could not have been the bishop of Dunwich, which some have called him. He says of himself that he is a domestic (vernacularus) of a “catholic congregation,” the latter phrase apparently indicating a monastery which adhered to Roman usage in a period when Roman and Celtic rivalries were yet in memory and possibly still alive. “Vernacularus” might further import that he was bred on the estate of the monastery, like Bede at Jarrow, or was of foster child of the monks, and perhaps his Latin name from the monks. An unsupported reading in one manuscript makes him a monk of Jarrow. The objection to assigning him to Crowland is that Ethelwald was his lord and Crowland was a Mercian house. It is more natural to suppose that he was a monk somewhere in East Anglia, in which kingdom there had then been founded the monasteries of Coberhure, Betrichesworth, Soham, and Ely.

Guthlac’s father Penwall or Penwald, who resided among the Middle Angles, was descended from the Icings, a noble race of Mercia, and belonged to the tribe of the Guthlacings, after whom the son was called (§ 8). His mother Tecta or Tetta also belonged to a family of rank. The birth of their son is not dated. Felix interprets the name Guthlac as meaning bello-souvere, an augury of the reward he was to obtain for contending against evil. A later interpretation (Capgrave’s) is bello-bonnin in the sense of bonum donum. Godlac has been suggested as the modern representative of the name, Guthlac was located in Julian Abbey. His early life, however, was in a series of adventures, with the ambition of rivaling the heroes of ancient story, and taking up the profession of arms he collected a band of followers, at whose head he “wreaked his grudges on his enemies, burned their city, ravaged their towns, and wildly through the land made much slaughter, and took from men their goods” (Godlac. p. 15). The biographer seems to exaggerate the exploits, but he evidently does not regard Guthlac as a brigand, for he notes that “by a divine admonition” he restored to the vanquished one-third of the spoil. In another place (Felix, § 20) it is incidentally stated that Guthlac had once lived in exile among the Britons, and had learned their tongue. His enemies were called his persecutors. It may be supposed then that his hostilities were undertaken against the hereditary British foe, from whom the lands of his family or tribe had received special wrong. The case of Hereric appears to have been somewhat parallel. After eight or nine years thus spent, Guthlac suddenly one night, in a fit of reflection, and apparently with a presentiment that his life would not prove a long one, resolved to devote the rest of his days to religion. Promptly in the morning, having signed himself with the cross, he bade adieu to his comrades and repaired to the monastery of Repton in the Middle Angles. The little that is known of Repton during the heptarchal period is almost all contained in the pages of Felix. It is in Guthlac's Life we become aware of the existence of the house, and learn the names of two of its abbesses (Mont. Angl. vi. 429). The burial of the etheling Cynehard at Repton in 755 rests solely upon the statement of Rudborne (Angl. Soc. i. 198) against every other authority. The lady presiding over Repton was Eolfried or Ecildyrhynna [Erfrieda (1)], and under her Guthlac receives St. Peter's tonsure. Repton was a "Catholic congregation," as Felix elsewhere (§ 15) expressly calls it. Guthlac was then in his twenty-fourth year (§ 11 fin.). Florence of Worcester (in M. H. B. 539 n) records the date as 697, so that 674 is the computed year of Guthlac's birth. This is the year before Ethelred became king of Mercia, whereas Felix in opening his story within the reign of Ethelred appears to contradict him. Felix, however, knew that the time was ignorant of the precise time, or he would have recorded it; for when he thought he knew a date, that of his saint's death, he gave it; the period of his birth he wraps up in vague and general language. The discipline of Repton under abbess Erfrieda is illustrated by the unpopularity which Guthlac incurred by abstaining from strong drink (§ 12). After a time, however, his worth was discerned, and he became a favourite. He was then in his manly prime, tall and handsome, modest, patient, wise, chaste, and "with divine love burning in his soul" (§ 12). The lives of early solitaries were recited at Repton, and they made Guthlac ardent for a new adventure in imitation of them. Guthbert's life at Farne island (civ. 679-688) might have helped to kindle the enthusiasm, though Bede's account of it was not then written, Bede being a young man of Guthlac's own age. In two years he had learnt the psalms, canticles, hymns, and prayers after the ecclesiastical order, and thus spiritually equipped, with the sanction of the elders he departed from Repton (§ 13). The one spot named from which his route can be ascertained is Grunte, Granta, or Grantchester (§ 13, 21, 22). The Remonstrance of the Roman road from Repton, then Watling Street, and Icknield Street, would have brought him into that neighbourhood. At Grantchester he found himself near the border of the great fen country, which Felix describes as stretching far to the north, with a black pool of water, now foul running streams, many islands also, and reeds, and hillocks, and thickets, with manifold windings and lanes. The inhabitants of Grantchester, Guthlac heard of Crowland, the most desolate island of the waste, and known to very few besides Tatwine himself. Crowland therefore he resolved to reach, with Tatwine for a guide. We know that they embarked in a fishing skiff, but again the route is left to conjecture. They could, however, have dropped down the Cam in the direction of Ely monastery, then up the Ouse to Ely, then up the Erse to Crowland, and at the threshold of a long northerly stretch of true fen occupying east Huntingdonshire. Pursuing that direction, and thus skirting the western edge of the great marsh land, they could doubtless have threaded their way through streams and pools and meres up to Medeshamstead (Peterborough), and then gain the Nene, which would carry them to Crowland in the extreme south of Lincolnshire. The charter of the foundation of Crowland abbey dated 710 (Hist. Angl. Gale, i. 5; Kemble, C. D. 86; Gough, Hist. Croyl. 1783, p. 4, app. p. 1) is authentic, but its delimitation of the ground used not be rejected. Here we find the island extending four "leucas" by three and bounded by the Shephees on the east, the Nene on the west, Asendyke on the north, Southoe on the south. These waters but partially survive in the modern map of the locality. Gough, who describes (at sight) the original estate of Crowland Abbey as extending about 8 "miliaria" by 5, places Asendyke on the east, and calls it a fossa, an artificial work, which indeed its name implies. Roman engineers had by no means in their day neglected the drainage and embankment of the fen country. Guthlac's Crowland must have been a wilder one than that of Camden's days, when it was described as lying in the midst of pools and waters stagnating off muddy lands, so shut in and environed as to be inaccessible on all sides except the north and east, and that only by narrow causeways (Camd. Brit. ed. Gough, ii. 224). Guthlac certainly found no causeway; the spot was accessible by water only, and the language of Felix, "umbrosa nemora" (§ 14), "infer nobilissos locus" (§ 15), suggest nothing better than a marsh jungle. A few days were spent in examining the capabilities of the spot, and Guthlac then went back to take final leave of Repton. In ninety days he returned, bringing with him two youths as servants, and arrived once more at Crowland on Aug. 24, the day of St. Bartholomew, Guthlac's chosen saint (§ 15).

For a Christian station Crowland was an advanced post into an unoccupied tract. Its monastic neighbour was Medeshamstead, about twelve miles in the west, while southwards, nearer to him, on the spot where Thorney Abbey afterwards rose, was Ancarig, a hermit settlement like his own, planted by Medeshamste (Mont. Angl. ii. 595); but neither Medeshamste nor Ancarig, nor yet Ely, are named by Felix. As he looked northwards into Lincolnshire Guthlac, the Roman road parallel to Lincoln, upon which line there lay Bardney and Partney eastward towards the sea. Beyond Lincoln there was only Barwe, somewhere by the Humber. It has been conjectured, however, with much plausibility (M. H. B. 1000; C. H. Pearson, Hist Maps of Engl. p. 69), that the minster built by St. Botolph in 654 (A. S. C. a. n.) was Boston or Botolphstone, as this minster was said to have been, as far as can now be known, Guthlac's nearest neighbour in Lincolnshire.

In a cistern-like hollow (§ 16), upon the slope of a hillock thrown up in earlier times by diggers for hidden treasure, as Felix supposed, but more probably one of those ancient British barrows which are not uncommon in those parts (cf. Stukeley, Azim Caries. p. 5, ed. 1776). Guthlac made a dell illing half a mile long, and with the skins, and at sunset he took his single daily meal of barley-bread and water (§ 16). A man of his energy and resource would soon have made this spot habitable and productive. The worst hardships of his lot were those horrors which solitary everywhere have experienced—temptations, the consciousness of sin, and an imagination haunted by demons. His temptations were to an excessive rigour. Stings of conscience, which had not driven him into solitude, came to him there (§ 17). But his fame more particularly rested on his conflict with demon powers, which caused him to be represented in medievial art in the form of a monk wielding a scourge with a dragon or evil spirit at his feet (Parker, Angl. Ch. Cat. p. 242, engrav.). Felix describes how in the stillness of the night his tormentors would flock about him, with their great heads, long necks, loose vales, squint eyes, round ears, ugly faces, horse teeth, grating voices, crooked shanks, big knees (§ 19). One night he heard the accursed host speaking in the British tongue, for, adds Felix, many were the conflicts between the British and Mercians in those days when Coenred was king (§ 20). Was it that Guthlac's memory was haunted with the British and his warlike days? Or were the fens themselves held by a British remnant reduced by malaria to types of demonical ugliness? The devils of Crowland, as they have been called, were misshapen humanity to the view, wild cattle to the ear, and the natural tenants of those desolate swamps could not dispel his imagination with both. That he once, after a night's hard conflict with the enemy of mankind, had a waking view in the morning watch of St. Bartholomew in his celestial splendour, is one of the embellishments of Felix's story. The relief he really found was described by himself in his last illness, when Beccel begged to know who that invisible being was that had been his master, conversing every night and morning. "The second year after I dwelt in this wilderness," replied Guthlac, "at even and at daybreak God himself sent His angel of my comfort to me, who opened to me the heavenly mysteries which it is not lawful for man to tell, and the hardness of my conflict he quite softened with heavenly angelic help." (§ 35). This may be taken as a description of his daily devotional hours and the alleviation he found in them. But in addition to solitary prayer there before long commenced an intercourse with the outer world (§ 31), which must have rendered life more interesting to him and more tolerable. Guthlac was not one of the class that sought absolute isolation. A distinction has been drawn between an anchorite who lived so and a hermit, according to which view Guthlac was a hermit. Felix uses this word of him (§ 17; cap. 2, heading); but he also calls Guthlac's companion Egbert an anchoret (§ 35, p. 49 e). Some later writers call Guthlac hermit (Hen. Hunt, Matt. West, Jo. Timnouth in Smith's Catalogue at infra); the Anglo-Saxon uses the word "ereman" (Goodw. 87); others style him anchoret (Orderic, Flor. Wig., Sim. Dun, Higden). Whether hermit or anchoret, Guthlac was none the less a missionary; but instead of itinerating to seek a flock, he attracted one to his own ground and taught them there, for prophets of the desert have always drawn out crowds. Guthlac's domain was ample for their entertainment, and an incidental mention of "harvest" implies that he and his two Repont servants, and Tatwine, and Beccel, and Cissa, and Egbert, as they successively joined him, were no idlers. Occupying their several cots, they gave the island a home-like and a farm-like appearance, and became the pioneers of a larger settlement. The island had its one entrance from the river, and its stated landing-place, where a recognised signal-sound brought Guthlac down to receive his visitors (§§ 26, 27). These visitors were "men of divers conditions, nobles, bishops, abbots, poor, rich, from Mercia and all Britain" (Goodw. 67). Among the visitors came his bishop, Hedda of Lichfield, and accompanying him was Wigfrith, a man of books and learning. Wigfrith had "long dwelt among the Scyths," and had his doubts whether Guthlac were a true man of God or a pretender. While they were conversing together, Guthlac shewed himself so mighty in the Scriptures that the bishop urged him to accept of holy orders, and Guthlac was ordained a priest. The year of this occurrence is not mentioned, but it was five days before St. Bartholomew's day. "The hallowing of the island of Crowland and also of the blessed man Guthlac took place at harvest time" (§ 32; Goodw. 75). Crowland, which had always been shunned as demon-haunted (§ 14), had now its priest, its chapel and its altar (§ 35); the bad spell was broken, the island was under the church's wing, and Guthlac's cell was the meeting place of men not only. Instead of demonical human shapes were flocks of human pilgrims, and the demons were dispossessed (§ 27); instead of demon sounds distracting his devotions were swallows singing on his shoulders or nestling in his bosom as he turned the page of holy writ. "Who hath led his life after God's will," remarked Guthlac to one of his visitors, "the wild beasts and wild birds have become more intimate with him, and the man who will pass his life apart from worldly men, to him the angels approach nearer" (§ 25; Goodw. 53). The visitor to whom this was said was the abbot Wilfrid, "a venerable brother, who had been of old united with him in spiritual friendship" (§§ 2, 23), and Holy Scripture is mentioned in the context (Goodw. 87) of their conversation (§ 29). Of what monastery Wilfrid was abbot Felix does not say. His Hollinder edition suggests Medeshemestede or Bardney. Their intimacy was evidently close and of long standing. It was from Wilfrid that Felix obtained material for his memoir. Wilfrid introduced another important visitor, Ethelbald the exiled heir of Mercia. This nobleman, then persecuted and hunted by king Coeled (§ 34), frequently retired to Crowland, where he found both security and sympathy. Guthlac predicted his ultimate succession, and one of Ethelbald's earliest acts after becoming king was the foundation of the monastery at Crowland. The supposed gift of prophecy gained Guthlac much credit; and he was thought besides to have the faculty of revealing the secret. It was in vain that two brethren "from a certain monastery" had hidden their flasks under the turf before landing on the island (§ 30) and two others who had been carousing at a widow's house found themselves in confusion before him (§ 29). Guthlac's connexion with Repton was never completely broken until his death, and hardly even then. Another abbes, Eggburgh [Eadburga (3)], daughter of king Aldulf, sent him a leaden sarcophagus and a linen winding-sheet, requesting to know whom he should designate as his suc-
GUTHLAC, ST.

GUTHMUND, a Kentish priest, who attests a charter of Archbishop Wulfred, dated April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 193.)

GUTTARDUS, abbat. [GUTTARD.]

GUTHAARD, a Mercian abbot who attests a charter of 777 granted by Offa to Abred the waldorman of the Hwiccii (Kemble, C. D. 131; Mon. Angl. l. 587). The same charter is printed by Hickes, Thesaurus, i. 171, with the date 775. Kemble's date, however, is right. It is just possible, supposing the chronology of the abbots of St. Augustine's to be erroneous, that, as Kest had fallen under the rule of Offa in 774, the person here denoted may be identical with Guttard, abbot of St. Augustine's. [GUTTARD.]

GUYNLEEU, Welsh saint. [GWYNLEEU.]

GUYNNAUC, GWYNNAUW, Welsh saint. [GWYNNAUW.]

GWAEDNERTH (GUAEDNERTH, GULDNERT), called king, in reality prince or chieftain, of Glamorgan, in the 7th century. He killed his brother Merchon in a contest for the chieftaincy, and was excommunicated for three years by bishop Oudocers of Llandaff; in addition he was directed to go on pilgrimage for a year to the archbishop of Cornouaille, Britany, who was also a Welshman. But as Gwaednerth returned within the year, Berthgwyn, who had succeeded Oudocers, refused absolution. On the earliest extant history, however, of kings of Mercant and Gwaednerth with many elders, and a solemn promise by the latter that he would make satisfaction with alms, fasting, and prayers, he was duly absolved, and gave to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff, as satisfaction for his sin, Llan Catgulas or Llangadwaladr, now Bishton or Bishopston, near Caerleon, co. Monmouth. (Wilkins, Cosali, l. 18; Lodo. Brit. by Rees, 450—2.) [G.]

GWALCHES, named with Barrow, Barrow, or Barroccus, as accompanying St. Cadoc from the island of Echii, now the Holmes, to the island of Barry; he was buried on the island of Echii, and the stone found in Flatholme, off the coast of Glamorgan, in the Bristol Channel, and marked with a plain cross, may perhaps have marked his grave. [BARCHUS. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. 357; Cressey, Ch. Hist. Brit. xxi. c. 18; New, Welsh Saints, 304.)

GWALCHMAI, son of Gwyar, one of the heroes of the Arthurian cycle, better known under the name of Gawaine, which comes from the Latinized forms Galvagius and Walwyn. He is called one of the four sons of King Lot of Lothian and of Orkney, and of Morgaw, Arthur's sister, and is the type of courtesy, just as Arthur was the type of valour. The name is William of Malmesbury (iii. § 287) says that in 1086 the tomb of Walwyo was discovered on the sea-shore in a certain province of Wales called Ross; still known by the same name in Pembroke, where there is a district called in GWALLONIR

Welsh Castell Gwalchmai, and in English Wallwyn's Castle. The pedigree runs thus:

Cynwarth, son of Maelchon

Augwaelus | Urtan | Lot

Gwen | Gwalw

See Geoffrey of Monmouth, ix. 9, 11, xi. 1, and Guest's Moningion, ii. 122. Geoffrey says "Wall-wynus filius Lot duodecim annorum juvenis, obsequio Sulpicii papae ab avunculo traditus, a quo arma recepta." By Sulpicius may be meant Simplicius. [C. W. B.]

GWALLONIR, clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff, Trychyn and Cadwared being the bishops. (Llib. Landav. by Rees, 455-66.) [I. G.]

GWARDOGWY (Gwroddogwy) (1), disciple of St. Dubricius, and clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishops Dubricius and Teilo (Llib. Landav. by Rees, 318 sq. 359-9).

(2) Abbatt of Llandedu. [Gwroddog (1).] [I. G.]

GWARAFEU. [Gwrefawy.]

GWAROG, saint. [Winwallus.]

GWARTHAN, Welsh saint, son of Dunawd. Dunawd or Dinawd assisted in establishing the famous monastery or college at Bangor Iscoed, Flintshire, in the 6th century. [Dinuth.] (Rees, Welsh Saints, 103, 206, 260.) [I. G.]

GWABR, daughter or granddaughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, wife of Elidyr Lydianw, and mother of the celebrated bard, Llywarch Hen; she is classed among the Welsh saints of the 5th century, and Rees (Cambro-Brit. Saints, 605 sq.) suggests that she may be the same as Gwendiwyd and Goleuuddyd. (Myv. Arch. ii. 43; Rees, Welsh Saints, 147; Camb. Quart. Mag. iv. 368, n.1; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600, 605 sq.) [I. G.]

GWAREDDYDD (Gwendiwyd), daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog in the fifth century, wife of Cadell Deyrallug, and ancestor of many Welsh saints; she was buried at Towy or Tywyn, co. Merioneth. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 137, 148, 161; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600; Williams, Ewain. Welsh. 191.) [I. G.]

GWDDIDIN, Welsh saint of the fifth century, patron of Llanwddyn, on the borders of Montgomeryshire and Denbighshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 145, 339.) [I. G.]

GWEITH, clerical witness to the grant of Treliech, Monmouthshire, to bishop Trychyn and the see of Llandaff, about the beginning of the 7th century. (Llib. Landav. by Rees, 452, 453.) [I. G.]

GWELVARCH. [Gweddarch.]

GWEN (1), wife of Brychan, Brachan, or Frachan, and mother of St. Winwaleo, in Armorica where she and her husband went from Wales, and were accounted saints. Malebrancha (Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. ii. c. 10) translates her name Alba. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 606.) [I. G.]

GWEN (2), ST., granddaughter of Brychan, in the 5th century. "She founded the church of Talgarth, in Brecon, where she is said to have been murdered by the pagan Saxons. She is also called Gwendeline. (Myv. Arch. ii. 44; Rees, Welsh Saints, 150; Williams, Loso JINS. 320.) [C. W. B.]

GWEN (4), Welsh saint. [Gwenghroban.]

GWENAFWY (Gwennawy), Welsh saint, daughter of Carw, but without church dedication. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 260.) [J. G.]

GWENAN, Welsh saint. [Gwinygo.]

GWENASETH, Welsh saint, daughter of Rhunob ab Cunedda Wledig, and wife of Pabo Post Prydain. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 111, 186 sq. 265.)

GWENODYDD, Welsh saint, supposed to be the same as Gwarodydd (Rees, Welsh Saints, 149). [Gwendiwyd.] [J. G.]

GWENDIDELINE, Welsh saint. [Gwen (2).]

GWENDOLEU (Gwendolau), son of Ceidio ab Garthwy, was educated with his brothers, Cor and Nudd, at St. Illtyd's College, Llantwit Major, and the three are numbered with the Welsh saints. He was a distinguished chieftain of North Britain, and in the Trials is called one of the "bulls of battle of the island of Prydain;" he was patron of the bard Myrddin the Caledonian, and fell in the battle of Arthrydd, A.D. 577. (Myv. Arch. 4, 7, 60, 70; Rees, Welsh Saints, 103, 206.) [J. U.]

GWENFAEN, ST., a daughter of Paul Hen, in the 6th century. She was the foundress of Rhoscyn in Anglesey, anciently called Llanwvymyn. Her festival is Nov. 5. (T. Rees, Welsh Saints, 237.) [C. W. B.]

GWENFREWI, Welsh saint. [Winfrew.]

GWENFYL, ST., a daughter or descendant of Brychan in the sixth century. She founded a chapel called Capel Gwennyl, now extinct, subject to Llundedd Brefi, in Cardigan. Her feast day is Nov. 1. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 153.)

GWENGAD is associated with bishop Odocus, the abbots of Llanercha, Docnani or Docnani, and Llanllyfyr, and other clerics, as witnesses to the restoration of Lannamorgau (now Bishopston or Llan-dello-Vernalt, co. Glamorgan), by Morgan, king of Glamorgan, to the see of Llandaff, and to the grant of Llewes, to king Meurig to bishop Odocus and the same see. He is in the first called "prince of Lancynuwr" (now Llangunnor, co. Carmarthen), and in the second "prince of Penaly" (now Penally, co. Pembroke). As distinct from abbat he must have been corb or eirenach, and he flourished in the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 387, 388, 392, 393.) [J. G.]

GWENGALEU, clerical witness to a grant by king Rhys ab Ithel to bishop Cadwared (Catgware) and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 465.) [J. G.] GWENABWY, disciple of St. Dubricius, and clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishops Dubricius and Comerog; but it was probably another Gwenabwy who was witness in the time of bishop Cadwar (Catgwar). (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 321, 324, 411-12, 460.)

GWERYDD, ST., a Welsh saint of the 6th century, who founded the church of Llannerwyd in Glamorgan, which is now called St. Doas. (R. Williams, Emwolion Cyrmru, 195.)

GWESLAN, Welsh bishop. [GENTILANUS.]

GWHARAFEU (GWRAFEU), clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaf, under bishops Trychan and Cadwar (Catgwar), or more probably different persons under the two prelates. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 455, 463.)

GWINEAR, ST. [FINGAR.]

GWINOCUS, Welsh saint. [GWYNOGL.]

GWILADUS (GWILADIS, GWILDAUS, GWILDA, GWILADUS), called daughter, but more probably granddaughter of Brychan, of Brycheiniog, if not the daughter of another Brychan, who went to Armorica, and was father of St. Winwale. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 606.) She was wife of Gwyllwyn Filwr, mother of St. Cadoc (Cattwg), and flourished about the middle of the 6th century. (Myr. Arch. ii. 43; Rees, Welsh Saints, 157, 146, 170.)

GWLECED, clerical witness to grant of Merthyr Tyced (probably Llandegwedd, co. Monmouth) to bishop Trychan and the see of Llandaff, about the beginning of the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 452.)

GWYMN, disciple of St. Dubricius at Hatland, co. Hereford, in the study of divine and human wisdom. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 324.)

GWYNFYW (GWYNFYW), reader, clerical witness to grants to bishop Berthwyn and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 430-2, 438.)

GWYNNOG, Welsh saint. [GWYNOGL.]

GWYNNFYW, reader. [GWYNYW.]

GWYODLOEW, GWYODLOHW (GWOLDO, GWODOLIN, GWYDDOLIN), son of Gwyddyn Ceri ab Gwyddyn Filwr, was first a teacher at St. Cadoc's school at Llanlcarvan, and then becomes suffragan bishop of Llandaff, standing in the deeds of grants as Gwyddyn. With Gwyddyn, his father, he founded Coedkernew, co. Monmouth, and flourished in the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 415, 623; Godwin, de Præsenul. Angl. 923; Stubbs, Reg. Sacer. Angl. 158.) But Rees (Welsh Saints, 114, 208) is of opinion that Gudofin, bishop of Llandaff, must have lived at an age too late for being the son of Gwyddyn Ceri, and perhaps belonged to the end of the 8th century.

GWORAFWY. [GWRIAFWY.]

GWORDOG (GWROG, GWRODDGW, GWRODDGWY). (I) Abbot of Llantwni (now Dewstow, near Chepstow) and witness to several grants made to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishops
GWRODG

GWRODG (2), Disciple of St. Dubricius. [GWRODGOWY (1).]

GWORFAN (GORFAN), disciple of St. Dubricius, and clerical witness to grant to St. Dubricius and the see of Landaff in the 5th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 314 sqq., 324.)

GWORGAELD, clerical witness to grant to bishop Trychyan and the see of Llandaff early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 454, 455.)

GWORGENEU, clerical witness to the grant of Llewes, co. Radnor, to bishop Oudocesus and the see of Llandaff in the 5th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 392, 393.)

GWORGYFIETH, clerical witness to the grant of some villages to bishop Trychyan, and the see of Llandaff early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 456.)

GWORMOI, clerical witness to the grant of Llan Garth by king Iddon to bishop Teilo and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 358, 359.)

GWORFYDD, clerical witness to grant of Meithyr Cittawg (now Codicor, co. Hereford) to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff by Ithel, son of Morgan, king of Gweysig, with the consent and approbation of his heirs and heirs' heirs, all named. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 446-448.)

GWRAFUE, GWRAFWY. [GWRAWFY.

GWRCIEWID, clerical witness to grant to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 435, 436.)

GWRRDELW, GWRRDDLY, Welsh saint, son of Caw, flourished early in the 6th century, and is said to have had a church at Caerleon upon Usk. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 231; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 198.) There is no feast day assigned to him.

GWRFARWY, of Lennineison, clerical witness to grants of a number of churches by king Athwys to bishop Comereg and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 411, 412.)

GWRFOWD, clerical witness to grants to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 428, 442.)

GWRFWY, clerical witness to the grant of Porthcasseg, near Chepstow, to bishop Oudocesus and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 393-4.)

GWRFYW (GORFTW, GORYTYW, GRYTVW), Welsh saint of the 6th century, son of Pasgen ab Urian Eheged, seems to have had a church dedicated to him in Anglesey, and a "cafel Gorfwy" in Bangor uchw Conwy, co. Carnarvon. (Myth. Arch. ii. 45; Rees, Welsh Saints, 103, 280.) His feast day is not mentioned.

GWROGI (1), clerical witness to a grant of the village of Bertus by Ithel, king of Gweysig, to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 440, 441.)

GWROGI (2) Gwrgi and Peredur, sons of Elifer Gosgorddawr, were trained at St. Illtyd's college, but in the Welsh Triads appear as warriors, being at the head of one of the "three disloyal households" of the "island of Prydain," the last to desert their leaders; that of Gwrgi and Peredur, on the eve of the battle with the Saxon Ida at Caer Grau, did so, and allowed them both to be slain, a.d. 584. (Myth. Arch. ii. 13, 70, 80; Rees, Welsh Saints, 103; Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, ii. 455; E. Williams, Iolo MSS. 390, 654; R. Williams, Emin. Welsh, 199.)

GWROGON, daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, and wife of Cadoc Cadchwydd, who flourished about a.d. 430. (Myth. Arch. ii. 44; Rees, Welsh Saints, 147.) She was also called Gwrgon Godden, and was abused by Trawed Faglaw, a chief of one of the "three strong-crowned ones of the island of Prydain." (Myth. Arch. ii. 5; Skene, Coll. Scot. i. 160, n.)

GWROGYNUF, clerical witness to grant of In-pan by Gwchein ab Gwywyn to Gwyddela (Gwenloch) and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 415.)

GWROHAEBEU, clerical witness to grant to bishop Trychyan and the see of Llandaff in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 453, 454.)

GWROHAFAFL, GWROHAFARN, abbot of Llanilltyd (Llaethit Majoor, co. Glamorgan) and witness to many grants to the see of Llandaff during the episcopate of Oudocus, Trychyan, and Berthgwyn (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 347, 348 et al. ad p. 450). Another Gwrohafl appears as clerical witness in the time of bishop Cadwrod (64, 465).

GWROHAFWY (GWROHAFAF, GWROHAFWY, GWROHAFUW), clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff under bishops Trychyan and Cadwrod (Caergwent). (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 451-463.)

GWROHAI (1) (GWRIHEL, GWREHII), Welsh saint early in the 6th century, son of Caw, and founder of the church of Perynystawd in Arwysili, Montgomeryshire. (Myth. Arch. ii. 29, 43; Rees, Welsh Saints, 231; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 597, 598; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 199, adding that he was a member of the college of Deiniol.)

GWROHAI (2), son of Clywys and uncle of St. Cadoc. He ruled over Gurild or Gorwennwy, a district probably co-extensive with the deanery of Gromesh, Glamorganshire (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 310, and notes), and was witness to a grant to bishop Arwysili and the see of Llandaff (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 413.)

GWROHAL, clerical witness to grant of Llan Garth (probably Llanarth, co. Monmouth), by king Iddon to bishop Teilo and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 358-9.)

GWREHEL, Welsh saint. [GWRAWEL.]
GWRHIR, the bard of St. Tello, was a saint of the college of St. Cattwg (Cadoc), who lived in the 6th century. He founded the church of Llŷnysfaen, in Glamorgan. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 251.)

[C. W. B.]

GWRHYDPENNI, clerical witness to grants to bishop Comereg and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 411–12.)

[J. G.]

GWRIN, Welsh saint, founder of Llanwri, co. Montgomery; he was son of Cynddilig ab Nwython ab Gildas, and belongs to the 6th century (Williams, Emin. Welsh, 200) or more probably to the middle of the 7th, if he is to be accounted third in the line of descent from Gildas.

[J. G.]

GWRMAEL, Welsh saint of 4th century, son of Cadfwrod ab Cadfan. His feast day is unknown, and no church is known to have been dedicated to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 89, 102; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 200.)

[J. G.]

GWRMAET, disciple of SS. Dubricius and Tello. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 351, 352.) Languruet in Brecon belonged to the see of Llandaff. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 248.)

[J. G.]

GWRNERTH, ST., a Welsh saint of the 6th century. A religious dialogue, in verse, between him and his father, Llewellyn of Welshpool, said to be by St. Tysilio, is preserved. His day is April 7. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 279.)

[C. W. B.]

GWRON, clerical witness to grant by Ffernwael, king of Glamorgan, “before the seniors of Gwent and Ergyny,” to bishop Trychan and the see of Llandaff, early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 451, 452.)

[G. J.]

GWRTHAFAR, abbat of Llanillydd (Llanwit Major, Glamorganshire), and witness to grant of Llan Oudocoi (Llandogo, co. Monmouth?) by Morgan, king of Glevysig, to bishop Oudocoeus and the see of Llandaff, in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 400.)

[G. J.]

GWRTHHEVYR (surnamed Vendigaid, the blessed) better known as Vortimer, son of Vogrtim, who for a short time headed the Britons on the deposition of Vortigern, but was poisoned by his Saxon stepmother Rhonwen about A.D. 465. In the Triads he is called one of the “three canonized kings of Britain,” and, as he was not an ecclesiastic, he was honoured with this title, it is thought by Rees, for his care in restoring the churches which had been destroyed by the Saxons, and likewise for the respect which he paid to men of religion. (Williams, Emin. Welsh, 201; Camb. Quart. Mag. 1. 578 sq.; Rees, Welsh Saints, 134.)

[G. J.]

GWRTHWLI, ST., the saint of Llanwrthwl, in Brecknock, and Maeslanwrthwl, in Carmarth, then. The saint’s day is March 2. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 308.)

[C. W. B.]

GWRTRI, clerical witness to grant by king Rhys ab Ithel of Glamorgan to bishop Cadwared (Catwgware) and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 406.)

[G. J.]

GWRWAN (Gyraw). (1) Bishop of Llandaff or local suffragan at Ystradyw, excommunicated Tewdwr ab Rhun, king of Dyfed, for the perfidious murder of Elgystyl ab Awt, king of Brecknock, and as an atonement from Tewdwr, received Llanmihangel Tref Ceriau, probably Llanmihangel on St. Michael’s mount, co. Brecknock. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 413–15, 625.) He is not given by Stubbs (Reg. Sacer. Angl.), and in Godwin’s list of prelates at Llandaff (de Præs. Angl. 622) is called Gyrawan.

(G) GWRWAN Hermit. Two brothers, Lybiaw and Gyrawan, and their sister’s son, Cynrr, some time after the death of St. Clydog, came from Glamorganshire and lived as hermits at the place of his martyrdom, Merthyr Cittawg, now Glockow, co. Hereford. With the advice and assistance of the bishop of Llandaff, probably Berthwgyw, they built a new and better church, and king Penbarw and Pennargart endowed it with lands along both sides of the Mywyw, with all privileges and immunity from perpetuity. There the two brothers remained till death, and it was probably this endowment which “Ithael ab Morgan, king of Glevysig, with the approbation of his sons and heirs, Ffernwaed and Mearig, and with the consent of their heirs, Ithael and Firewddyr, sacrificed to God and to St. Dubricius, St. Tello, and St. Oudocoeus, and Clydawg the martyr, and bishop Berthwgyw,” etc. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 446–48.)

[J. G.]

GWRWAREU, pupil of Gwawr (abbat of Lannarthbenni), was clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff under bishops Aidan and Lunepeus in the 5th or 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 408–410.)

[J. G.]

GWRWEITH, GWRWEITH, clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff under bishops Berthwgyw and Trychan, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 437, 436, 435, 452.)

[J. G.]

GWTFL, Welsh saint. [TANGLWST.]

G Wyoming, Welsh saint of the 7th century, son of Helig Foel, and brother of two other Welsh saints, Brenda and Euryr. No feast-day is assigned to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 302; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 213.)

[J. G.]

Gwyddelan, tre, the saint of Llanwydelan in Montgomery, and of Dolwydelan in Carnarvon in the 7th century. The saint’s day is Aug. 22. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 308.)

[C. W. B.]

Gwyddlew, Welsh saint. [Gwyddlew.]

Gwyddfarch. [Gwyddfarch.]

Gwyddlew (Gwyddlew), Welsh saint of the 5th or 6th century, son of Gwynyllu Flwyr of Gwyllwlg, and brother of St. Cadoc or Cattwg. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 114, 293.) No feast day or church dedication is recorded of him.

[G. J.]

Gwyddlon, bishop. [Gwodlow.]

Gwyddolon, clerical witness to the grant of Cilpdeoc (now Kilpeck, Herefordshire) by Flaw, son of Benjamin, to bishop Grecielis and the see GWYDDUARCH, a member of the college of St. Cybi at Caergybi, in Anglesey, and son of Llywelw of Welshpool (Williams, Emlyn, Welsh, 204), but is not given by Prof. Rees (Welsh Saints).

GWYDDYL, clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishop Cadwared, probably in the beginning of the 9th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 463–5.)

GWYLERION, clerical witness to the grant of the village of Bertais by Isdael, king of Glamorgan, to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 440, 441.)

GWYNDAF HEN, the father of St. Meugan. He was said to have been a confesser in Llwyd's monastery, and afterwards superior of the college of Dubricius, at Caerleon, and to have retired in his old age to Bardsey island, near the north point of Cardigan bay, where he died. He may be deemed the founder of Llanwada, in Carnarvon, and of another church of that name in Pembroke. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 164, 219.)

[GWYN (1), Welsh saint of the 6th century, one of five sons of Cyneir Fardredw, viz. Gwyn, Gwynno, Gwynoro, Celynin, and Ceitho, who were also the patrons of Llanpumsaint, in the parish of Abergwili, and of Pumsaint, in the parish of Conwil Cayo, or Cynwyd Gai, Carmarthenshire. He was commemorated on Nov. 1. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 52, 111, 213, 329.)]

[GWYN (2) Son of Helig ab Glanawg, and buried, with Boda, his brother, at Dwygyfylchi, now Dwy-Cyrchli, Carnarvonshire (Camb. Quart. Mag. iii. 45). He is probably Rees’s Gwynin.]

GWYNN, classed as a son, but probably only a deacon of Brychan of Brycheiniog; he was brother of Gwynnau, but had no church dedication or feast. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 153; Camb. Reg. iii. 219.)

GWYNAW, GWYNAWG, GWYNNAWG, Welsh saint. [GWYNNOG.]

GWYNYFWY, called Master, was clerical witness with three Welsh abbots and others to a grant made by Mecrig, king of Glamorgan, to bishop Odocenus and the see of Llandaff in the end of the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 381–3.)

GWYNGAD, son of Caw (Jones, Welsh Bard, ii. 22), but not classed by Rees among the Welsh saints, as he followed a different list of Caw's descendants. (Lady Ch. Guest, Mabonion, i. 297, 335, London, 1849; Williams, Emlyn, Welsh, 205.) He may be the same as Gwynnar.

GWYNAR, GWYNGAW, son of Gildas ab Caw, and brother of SS. Gwynog, Noethan, and Tydecho. (Myvyr. Arch. ii. 44; Camb. Quart. Mag. i. 30.) “Guennan a Noethon Melbyon Gildas M. Kudwy,” in the Bendis S. Ffyn.
HABERILLA

GWYTHIANUS, ST., gives name to a parish on the north coast of Cornwall. He was one of the Irish saints who came over with St. Breesca (Vol. I. p. 359), and his oratory is buried in the sand, like the more famous oratory at Perran Zabuloe, the sand having very much encroached all along this coast, possibly in the 12th century. The parish feast is on the nearest Sunday to Nov. 1. The name Guidiane occurs in the Breton Litanu of the 10th century in Haddan and Stubbs ii. 82.

[ C. W. B.]

GYBRIAN. [GIBRIANUS.]

GYMNASIUS, a bishop who at the council of the Oak was the first to propose the deposition of Chrysostom. ( Photius, Cod. 69, p. 69.)

[ G. S.]

GYMPONOPDAE, the name given by "Prædestinatus" (68) to the Excalciati of Philaster.

[ E. V.]

GYNARWY, Welsh saint. [CYNPARWY.]

GYNYR, of Caer Gwawch, originally chieftain of Pebbidiog, or Dewsland, Pembrokehire, and afterwards enrolled among the saints of the Welsh church, which he enriched by his possessions, when he embraced the religious life. He first married Mechell daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, and then Anna daughter of Gorthefy Fendigaid or Voritimer; by the latter he had Gislius, bishop of Mevania, Non mother of St. David, and Gwen mother of St. Cybi. He endowed the see of Mevania with his lands, to which the cathedral was transferred, and where the see of St. David's now has its episcopal seat, in Giraldus's Vailis Bosina 'DAVID (5). ( Rees, Welsh Saints, 162, 163; Williams, Eunnu, Welsh, 207; Leland, Collect. iii. 103.)

[ J. G.]

[ S. A. B.]

H

*Note.—Reference should be made to the unspirited form of any name which the reader may fail to find under this letter.

HABALAHHA, the name of one of the thirteen presbyters and confessors of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and likewise of a deacon and confessor in Persia, mentioned in the Syriac Martyrology (Wright's translation, Journ. Soc. Lit. 1886, 439).

[ G. T. S.]

HABERRILLA (HABRILLA), Jan. 30, virgin honoured at Augia near Bregenz, on the lake of Constance. According to the Chronicon Constantinense quoted by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1035), she was a recluse, whom St. Gall consecrated as abbess of the cell of Bregen, of the order of St. Benedict. But nothing trustworthy is known of her. Her tomb in the

[ C. W. B.]

Gwynefn, son of Cyfr Farfáriwch. [GWYN (1).]

GWYNNOC. [GWYNNAOC, GWYNAWG, GWYNAGHW, GWYNAWG, GWYNNOGW, GWYNNOGW, GWYNNOGW, and latinized GWYNOCUS, GWYNOCUS), Welsh saint of the 6th century, son of Gildas ab Caw, and member of the society of St. Catwg or Cadog; commemorated Oct. 26. He was patron of Y Vaenor, Brecknockshire, is said to have assisted St. Illtyd and St. Tyfodwg in founding Lantryisant, Glamorganshire, under which there was a chapel called Llanwynno dedicated to him; he also founded Llanywnno or Llanwng Montgomeryshire, where in a painted glass window of the 14th century he is represented in episcopal habits, with mitre and crozier, and underneath in old black characters is the inscription, "Sanctus Gwionocus, cujus animae propitiatur Deus. Amen." (Camb. Quart. Mag. i. 30-1, from a Parochial History of Llan-Wynn, in Montgomeryshire, by Gwiler Mechan; Rees, Welsh Saints, 180, 257; Myr. Arch. ii. 25, 44, where in Benedictant Ynys Prydain he appears to be called Guenan; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 597; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, Oct. 26, p. 646, calling him son of Anuria, also called Gildas.

[ G. J.]

GWYNORO, Welsh saint. [GWYN (1)].

GWYNOGL, ST. (GUYNODDD, GWYNOEDHEL), Welsh saint of the 6th century, the founder of Llangwyddl, in Carnarvon. His festival is Jan. 1. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 238.)

GWYNOGW, Welsh saint. [GWYNNOGW].

GWYNWS, ST., the saint of Llannwys in Cardigan in the 5th century. His festival and that of his brother Gwynau is Dec. 13. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 155.)

[ C. W. B.]

GWYRAWM, clerical witness to grant by king Athwys of Glamorgan, to bishop Cadwared (Catgwared), and the see of Llandaff (Lch. Llandav. by Rees, 464). [G. J.]

GWYTHELIN. [GITEYLEN.]

GWYTHENOC. [WINOC.]

GWYTHERRIN, ST., Welsh saint of the 6th century, the founder of a church called Gwytherin, in Denbigh, at which St. Winifred was afterwards buried. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 275.) No feast day is assigned to him. [C. W. B.]

Note.—Reference should be made to the unspirited form of any name which the reader may fail to find under this letter.

HABERILLA, Jan. 30, virgin honoured at Augia near Bregenz, on the lake of Constance. According to the Chronicon Constantinense quoted by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1035), she was a recluse, whom St. Gall consecrated as abbess of the cell of Bregen, of the order of St. Benedict. But nothing trustworthy is known of her. Her tomb in the HABETDEUS, bishop of Carthage, who appears to have been employed by Primianus, his bishop, at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, especially on the first day, to recognize and identify the bishops of his party as they appeared before the president, and sometimes to account for their absence. The part which he took in discharge of this duty excited the indignation of Fortunatianus, bishop of Sicca Veneria [Fortunatus], who complained that as a deacon he was overstepping his position, and taking on himself duties which belonged to a bishop; but the president overruled the objection, pointing out that in doing this he was acting only as a witness, and not as a member of the assembly. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 405, 406, 422, ed. Oestherth; Gest. Coll. Carth. p. 270 in Pat. Lat. xi.)

HABETDEUS (3), bishop of Marsazana, Marazania, or Maraziana, a town of Byzacene, between Sufes and Aquis Regius (Haouch Sultani) (Ant. Rin. 47, 4), who at the Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, when Eunomius the Catholic bishop asserted that there were no Donatists in Marazana, replied by complaining that both his own predecessor and the Donatist congregation there had been expelled by force, and that he himself had been forcibly prevented from entering the place. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 213; Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 415, 416, ed. Oestherth; Gest. Coll. Carth. p. 270 in Pat. Lat. xi. 1305 A.)

HABETDEUS (4), bishop of Theudal, in Proconsular Africa, banished by Genseric c. A.D. 457. He has been supposed to have retired to Italy, and to have been identified with Habetdeus bishop of Luna. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 313.)

HABETDEUS (5), supposed bishop of Luna (Luna) in Eturuia in the 5th century. It is said that, during the Vandal persecution in Africa, having strongly opposed Arianism, he was banished, then recalled and forcibly re baptized in the Arian manner, and afterwards put to death, in consequence of his continued resistance. It is much more probable, however, that he was an African bishop, who suffered martyrdom either in Africa from the Vandals, or, as a refugee in Italy, from the Roman Goths. (Boll. Acta SS. 17 Feb., iii. 15; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 834; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 427.)

HABETDEUS (6), bishop of Tamalluna in Byzacene, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484, having previously suffered much persecution...
HABRILIA, virgin. [HABERILLA.]

HACCA. (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. 58.) [ACCA.]

HACONA, abbat. [HAGONA.]

HADALINUS, Feb. 3, confessor, a.D. 690
A monk and missionary from Aquitaine, who preached and founded a monastery in Belgium.

HADDA, a Mercian abbat who attests the forged charter of Medeshamstede, purporting to be granted by Ceddweniga, Sighera, Sibeheard, Wifried and Ethelred. (Kemble, C. D. 40; Mon. Angl. i. 384.) [S]

HADDE, a West Saxon abbat, whose name is appended as a witness to the charter of Coirend of Wessex to the Tisbury charter in 759. (Kemble, C. D. 104.) [S]

HADDI (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. 48, a.D. 701), bishop. [HEDDA (I).] [C. H.]

HADECERDITAE. [ADECERDITAE.]

HADELOGA (ADALOGA), ST., said to have been the first abbes of the nunnery of Kissingen in the 8th century. According to an anonymous life published by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. i. 306), and attributed to the 12th century, she was the daughter of Charles Martel and Kunehildis. So renowned were her beauty and virtue that kings, princes and nobles came to woo her from Britain, Panonius and Greece. But from her earliest years she had resolved to consecrate her virginity to God, and, in spite of her father's anger, rejected all her suitor's. Her meekness under persecution enlisted the sympathy of all the court, and especially of one of the royal chaplains. Accused to the king by malicious tongues of shameless commerce with him, she was expelled in his company from the court. The chaplain, who was possessed of some wealth, built a nunnery and bought some land for its endowment. Here he collected a few nuns, over whom he set Hadeloga as abbess, and instituted the rule of St. Benedict. The place was called Kittingen, or Kissingen, from Kuccingus, a shepherd. In time, the king, hearing of the sanctity of her life, and filled with compunction for his unjust suspicion, visited her, and enriched the foundation with lands and property. The nuns became numerous, and a congregation of monks was instituted hard by. She ruled her nunnery prosperously for many years, and at last, worn out with self-inflicted privation, died Feb. 2, the day of her commemoration, and was buried at Kissingen before the altar of St. Mary amid universal grief.

The credibility of this somewhat late history is affected by the statement in Otholous's Vita Bonifacii (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxixx. 646-7), to the effect that Bouiface established St. Tecla, or Thecla, at Kissingen. Attempts have been made to reconcile the two accounts. Some have supposed the two names to have denoted the same person, others, as the later Bollandists (Oct. vii. 62), that Hadeloga was the first and Tecla the second abbess, but no satisfactory explanation has been given (cf. Rethberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 334–5).
HADES

The Bollandists also publish from two MSS. of the Cartusian foundation at Würzburg an Edictum of emperor Adrian, addressed to the nunnery of Kissingen (Acta SS. Feb. i. 944–58). [S. A. B.]

HADES. [DEATH AND THE DEAD, ESCHATOLOGY.]

HADO (ADO), thirty-sixth archbishop of Chartres, between Leobertus and Flavinus, in the first half of the 8th century. He is said to have instituted canons in the place of monks in the cathedral church (Gall. Christ. viii. 1102). [S. A. B.]

HADOINUS (HADINUS, CHAUDINUS, CADINUS, CHIDAENUS, HARDINUS, CLODAENUS) ST., thirteenth bishop of Le Mans, St. Bertrannus, and St. Berarius, was present at the council summoned by Sonnatus at Rheims in A.D. 625, and was represented by Chapoaldeus, an abbot, at that of Chilons held about 650. His name is contained in many documents admitted to be forgeries. His will, however, is genuine. It is to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixx. 567, Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1142, Vetera Anaelota, p. 267, and Bar. Annales, an. 652, n. xiv. It was dictated to his deacon Cadulphus, in the fifth year of the reign of Clivius II. (A.D. 643). He makes the church of Le Mans his heir, and leaves to it the dispensation of his other bequests to churches and monasteries. In 630 he had founded the monastery of Ebrenium (Notre Dame d'Evron). His death is placed about the year 652, and he was commemorated Jan. 20. The Bollandists publish his Gesta from an old MS. (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1140), but they are historically worthless. (Floidoard, Hist. Ecc. Rem. ii. 5.; Patr. Lat. cxxxv. 102; Mansi, Conc. x. 1194; Gall. Christ. xiv. 349; Gesta Fonslucum Conclipium Conveniens, p. 264; Mabill. Vetera Anaelota, p. 284, Paris, 1723.) [S. A. B.]

HADRIANISTAE. The title ADRIANISTAE occurs in an enumeration by Theodoret (Haer. Phot. Feb. i. 1) of short-lived heretical sects, the origin of which he ascribes to Simon Magus; and in the preface to his second book, Theodoret includes in a list of heretics Adrianus, no doubt the supposed founder of this sect. But Valois has pointed out that Theodoret got the name from a corrupt reading in his copy of Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22). In an enumeration of heretical sects there quoted from Hegesippus, the followers of Menaikon are mentioned as τῶν Ἀδριανίστων. Nicephorus (H. E. iv. 7) reproduces the passage with the reading Ἰωάννης τῶν Ἀδριανίστων, and the reading Adrianistae is still found in several MSS. of Eusebius. There can be no doubt that Theodoret so read, and that thus he obtained the name. [G. S.]

HADRIANUS (1), PUBLIUS AElius (117–137). The early life and the general policy of this emperor may be compressed for our present purpose within comparatively narrow limits. Born in A.D. 76, and placed at the age of ten, on his father's death, under the guardianship of his cousin, Ulpius Trajanus, afterwards emperor, he was conspicuous in his youth for his study of Greek literature, and entered on his career as military tribune in Lower Moesia in A.D. 95. On the death of Nerva in A.D. 97, Trajan, whom he had adopted, became emperor, and Hadrian, on whom he bestowed such favours that men looked forward to his adoption, served in various capacities in the wars with the Dacians, Pannomians, Sarmatians, and Parthians. During the campaign against the last-named enemy, Trajan, leaving him in command of the army and of the province of Syria, started for Rome, but died at Scilinus in Cilicia in A.D. 117. Hadrian, on hearing of his death, had himself proclaimed emperor by the army, communicated the election to the senate, and in due course received their formal sanction.

The external policy of Hadrian was marked by the abandonment of any idea of extending the eastern frontier of the empire. The Euphrates was recognised as a natural boundary in that direction, and the emperor, after suppressing a real or alleged conspiracy at Rome by the execution of four men of consular rank, and gaining popular favour by gladiatorial games, large donations, and the remission of fifteen years' arrears of taxes due to the state, devoted himself in A.D. 120 to a personal inspection of the provinces of the empire, which was prolonged for several years. In that and the following year he visited Gaul, Germany, Britain, and the Euphrates, erecting fortresses and strengthening the defences of the frontiers. The Roman wall carried from the Solway to the mouth of the Tyne remains as a memorial of his activity in the last-named province. Possibly also we may find traces of the eclectic tendency of his mind and his readiness to adopt foreign forms of worship in the altars dedicated to Mithras, and to an otherwise unknown goddess named Brenna or Corentina or Convintia, which have recently been found in the neighbourhood of one of the stations near the Wall not far from Hexham. In A.D. 122 he came to Athens, and found the eager speculative activity of the place so congenial to his taste that it was henceforth his favourite residence, and his love for making experiments, as it were, in different forms of worship led him to seek information in the Eleusinian mysteries (A.D. 125). The next four or five years were spent in the same restless travelling and insatiable desire to see all remarkable places. He ascended Aetna, he returned to Athens, he went up the Nile. The death, probably the self-sought death, of his favourite Antinous, a Bithynian page of great beauty and genius, in the last-named journey plunged him into deep grief as his nature was capable of, and he sought to... console himself by surrounding the memory of his union with the divine honours which had been paid to emperors. Constellations were named after him in the heavens, cities dedicated to him on earth. Incense was to be burnt in his honour, and the art market was flooded with statues and busts representing his exceeding beauty. The new form of worship thus introduced probably did much to alienate the better class of minds that were halting between two opinions. The apotheosis of such an one as Antinous was the reducito at once ad absurdam and ad horribile of the decayed and putrefac pant polytheism of the empire. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 5; Justin, Apol. i. 39.) Shortly afterwards the state of affairs in Palestine called for the emperor's serious attention, and, as connected with the history both of the Jewish and the Christian churches, may be dealt with here with somewhat greater fulness than his general administration of the empire. Disturbances which had threatened the tranquillity of Judaea at the beginning of his reign had been repressed by Martius Turbo, and for fifteen years they were not heard of; and the words bore the inscription of "Telus stabilita." In A.D. 131, however, the emperor began to execute the plan, conceived earlier in his reign, of transforming Jerusalem into a Roman colony, and rebuilding it under the title of Aelia Capitolina, the first word commemorating the gens to which the emperor belonged, the second its consecration to the Capitolian Jupiter. At first the proposal was received tranquilly. The work of rebuilding was placed in the hands of a Jew, Aquila of Pontus (the reader will note the coincidence of name and country with those of the preacher of Acts xviii. 2); the great rabbi Akiba was on friendly terms with Rufus, the emperor's representative, and the Jews even ventured to petition for permission to rebuild their Temple. They were met with what must have seemed to them a studied indignity, and a plough was drawn over the site of the sacred place in token of its desecration. The city was filled with Roman emigrants, and Jews were forbidden to enter the city of their fathers, with the solitary exception, granted as if in bitter irony, that they might on the anniversary of the capture of the city by Titus come to bewail their fate within its gates. On one of the gates of the new Aelia the figure of the uncanny beast in marble sent a shudder through any Jew who approached the walls. The feelings of Christians were in like manner outraged by seeing a statue of Jupiter on the site of the Resurrection and one of Venus on that of the Crucifixion. Trees and statues were placed on the platform of the Temple, and a grove in honour of Adonis was planted near the cave of the Nativity at Bethlehem. The persistent defiance of national feeling thus displayed roused a wide-spreading indignation, which, after amoudering for a time, burst out under a leader whom we know only by his assumed name of Bar-Cochba, the son of a star. The choice of the name was probably determined by the imagery of the prophecy of Balsam in Num. xxiv. 17, possibly also by the recollection of the "star in the east." of Matt. ii. 2. The man himself is described by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 3) as being of the Barab'bas type, a murderer and a robber (ψευδός καὶ ἄρρητος), but he was recognised by Akiba, the leading rabbi of the time, as the Messiah, obtained possession of fifty fortresses and 985 villages, and established himself in the stronghold of Bethera, between Caesarea and the old town of Lydda, which, like Jerusalem, had been rebuilt and renamed by Hadrian as Diospolis. The Christians of Palestine, true to the apostolic precept of submission to the powers that be, took no part in the insurrection, and were accordingly persecuted by the rebel leader, and offered the alternative of denying the Messiahship of Jesus or the penalty of torture and of death (Euseb. H. E. iv. 8). Severus was recalled from Britain, the rebellion was suppressed with a strong hand, and edicts of extremest stringency were issued against the Jews, forbidding them to circumcise their children, to keep the Sabbath or to educate their youth in the study of the law. Akiba died in tortures under the hands of the executioner, and the prohibition of instruction in the law led to the formation of a secret school, continuing the rabbinic traditions, at Lydda. (Jost, Judentrüm, ii. 7) To the Christian church in Judaea, the suppression of the Bar-Cochba revolt and the generally tolerant spirit of the emperor brought a relief by which they were glad to profit. They left Pella, where they had taken refuge during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and returned to the holy city under its new name. Their return was marked by a change in the character of the community. The succession of fifteen bishops, all Hebrews, and belonging to the church of the circumcision, came to an end, and the mother-church of the world found itself under the care of a gentile bishop. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 5.)

In his general treatment of the Christians of the empire, Hadrian followed in the footsteps of Trajan. The more cultivated members of the church felt in addressing the tolerant, eclectic, enquiring emperor, "curiositatem omnium explorator," as Tertullian calls him (Apol. c. 5), that they had a chance of a favourable

---

*e The death of Antinous was enveloped in a mysterious darkness. According to some accounts he was drowned accidentally. Other rumours reported that he had sought a voluntary death in order to avoid and prevent disaster from his master; or that Hadrian had sacrificed him, with his own consent, in order that he might practise the form of augury known as extispicum (the scrutiny of the viscera of the victim), and so penetrate the secrets of the future. It is not necessary to examine here the evidence in favour of these conflicting statements. The fact that the last gained currency is, however, characteristic of the popular belief as to Hadrian's restless and feverish superstition. See an elaborate discussion of the whole question in these two articles (1879), by Mr. J. A. Symonds, in the Cornhill Magazine for February 1879. The practice of extispicium appears again, it may be noted, among the enormities of Elagabalus.

---

*d So Julian describes him in his survey of the charac- ter of the Caesarea, αἰεν πολυχρυσομοῦν τα ἀπόφραμα. The rest of the picture is worth quoting as showing what the philosopher-apostle thought of his predecessor. He is described as bustling and pretentious (μεμορίζομεν), wearing a long beard, occupied in many studies, and especially in music, prying into hidden mysteries (νυών). Silenus, as Hadrian comes into the presence of the gods, asks what is this "Egyptian devia- tion?" and gives orders, "Tell him that the youth is not here, and stop his garrulous chattering." (Julian, Caesareae, p. 29, ed. 1863.)
HADRIANUS—EMPEROR

hearing, and the age of apologists began. Quadratus, according to one tradition [but see Quadratus], bishop of Athens in A.D. 126, and famed as possessing prophetic gifts (Euseb. H. E. iii. 37, iv. 3), presented his Apologia, laying stress on the publicity of the works of Christ, and appealing to the testimony of eye-witnesses who were even then surviving. Aristides, a philosopher of the same city, followed, and addressed (A.D. 135) a treatise to the emperor, which was extant and admired in the time of Justinian. It was in favour of the Christians, and it was said even to have been admitted to a personal hearing. [ARISTIDES] Early in his reign, but probably after receiving these apologies, an Asiatic official of high character, Serenus Granianus, applied to him for instructions as to the treatment of the Christians of that province, complaining that their enemies expected him to condemn them without even the formality of a trial. The result was that the emperor addressed an official letter to Minucius Fundanus, proconaul of Asia, regulating the mode of procedure against the persecuted sect. No encouragement was to be given to common informers (συνομοδέρας) or to popular clamour. If the official persons of the district (διαχρηστοί) were confident that they could sustain a persecution, the matter was to be investigated in due course. Offenders against the laws were to be punished according to the measure of their guilt; but, above all things, the trade of the informer was to be checked (Euseb. H. E. iv. 8, 9). The character of Hadrian's mind may be inferred from what has been stated as to the policy of his government. He had not the zeal of a persecutor, he was not influenced by the fear that leads to cruelty. His philosophy and his religion did not keep him from the infamy of an impure passion of the basest type. He adapted himself without difficulty to the worship and the thoughts of the place in which he found himself. At Rome he maintained the traditional sacred rites which had had their origin under the republic, and posed as the patron of Epicurus and the Stoicism which was identified with his name. At Athens he was initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries, and rose to the dignity of an Eoptes in the order, as brought within the circle of its most esoteric teaching. He became an expert in the secrets of magic and astrology. To him, as he says in his letter to Servianus, describing the character of his Egyptian subjects, the worshippers of Serapis and of Christ stood on the same footing. Rulers of synagogues, Christian bishops, Samaritan teachers, were all alike trading on the credulity of the multitude (Flavius Vopiscus, Saturn. c. 7, 8). According to the statement of Lampridius, one of the later writers of the history of the emperors (in Alexsand. Sever. c. 43), the wide eclecticism of his nature led him at one time to erect temples without statues, which were intended to have been dedicated to Christ. He was restrained, it was reported, by oracles, which declared that, if this were done, all other temples would be deserted, and the religion of the empire subverted. The testimony of Lampridius as to the fact that temples such as he describes, known as Hadrian's, existed in his time may be received without much hesitation, but the absence of contemporary evidence of such an intention, on which it would have been natural for the Christian apologists of his own reign, or those of his successors, to lay stress, compels us to reject his explanation of the fact as an unauthenticated conjecture. The more probable solution of the problem is that adopted by Casaubon (Annot. in Lamprid. c. 43), that the temples in question were built by Hadrian, but not formally dedicated, and that they were intended ultimately to be consecrated to himself. So the imperial Sophist—the term is used of Hadrian by Julian (ut supra)—passed through life, "holding no form of creed and contemplating all," and the well-known lines—

- "Animula, vagula, blandula, Hoesper, comasque corporis,
  Quae nunc abibis in loco,
  Pallidula, rigidâ, nudula?
  Nec ut soles, dabis iocis."

show that the same dilettante spirit was with him to the last.

It lay in the nature of the case that a reign like that of Hadrian was on the whole favourable to the growth of the Christian church. The popular cry, "Christianos ad leones," was not crushed, and no organized persecution took its place. The appearance of an apologetic literature was a sign that the disciples of Jesus made their appeal with confidence to the intellect and judgment of mankind. The frivolous eclecticism of the emperor and yet more his dedication of Antinous were enough to shake the allegiance of all serious minds to the older system. The succession of bishops in all the great centres of the church's life went on without the interruption of martyrdom or imprisonment. The tolerance, which was favourable to the growth of the good seed was also, however, equally favourable to that of the tares; and it is to the reign of Hadrian that we have to trace the rise and growth of the chief Gnostic sects of the 2nd century, the followers of Nataulus in Syria, of Baridas, Carpophates, and Valentinus in Egypt, of Marcion in Pontus (Euseb. H. E. iv. 7, 8). (Compare, in addition to the authorities cited, Gibbon, Decline and Fall, chaps. iii.; Milman, History of Christianity, b. ii. c. vi.; Lardner, Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, chap. xi.) [K. H. P.]

HADRIANUS (2), servant of Hilarion the hermit. He brought to his master, then in the oasis west of Egypt, the news of the death of Julian; but he afterwards proved unfaithful, and is recorded to have died of the Morsus Reginus. (Jerome, Vit. Hilar. § 34, Opp. vol. ii. p. 34, ed. Vall.) [H. W. F.]

HADRIANUS (3), rector patroniunii under Gregory the Great in Sicily. He is generally addressed as "notarius;" he is once spoken of as "chartularius." When he was at Palermo,

* Prior's version is familiar to most readers. The following is from a less-known writer:

"Poor soul of mine, who cannot rest,
Flitting still within my breast;
Of the body mate and guest,
Whither bound art thou?"

"Fled, bare, and shivering left,
Of thy wonted mirth bereft,
Jests are done with now."
Gregory wrote to him that the husband of a certain Agathos, who had become a monk, was to be restored to her even if he had received the tonsure, for no man may leave his wife without her consent, except for the cause of fornication. In another letter, Gregory praised him "quia quodam incunctatores et sortilegos fueris insanui-tus." Hadrian was transferred from the estates of Palermo to be rector patrimonii of those of Syracuse. For the papal estates in Sicily, and the system of papal officials, see Carl Hegel, Städteverfassung von Italien, i. 162. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xi. indict. iv. 50. 53. lib. xiii. indict. vi. 11, in Migne. Pat. Lat. lxviii. 1169-1171, 1278.) [A. H. D. A.]

HADRIANUS (4), bishop of Thebae Phthioticæ in Thessaly on the Pelagia gulf, whose condemnation both by John of Justiniiana Prima on a charge of peculation, and by John of Larissa his metropolitan, on a criminal charge, gave an opportunity to pope Sylvester I. to interfere. When Hadrian appealed, the matter was carried to Rome, and Gregory revoked the sentence of deprivation from the priesthood pronounced against him, and ordered John of Larissa if he had any suit against Hadrian, either to conduct it before the pope's agents (responseals) at Constantinople, or to bring it to Rome (Ep. iii. 6 and 7). The emperor Maurice, a.d. 582-602, ignored the interference of Gregory, and directed Hadrian's appeal to be heard by the bishop of Corinth, by whose efforts a reconciliation was effected between Hadrian and his metropolitan. Gregory sent a deacon to watch the proceedings, lest, he said, there be any pecuniary corruption between the two parties. (Epist. iii. 39; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 121.) [L. D. H.

HADRIANUS (5), bishop of Reggio Lempidi, (Reggio in Lombardy), between Donoues and Benoavus, his period being a.d. 600, judging from his place on the list. (Ugh. Ital. Soc. ii. 243; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 361, 397.) [C. H.]

HADRIANUS (6), bishop of Rieti, signing the epistle of pope Agatho in 680. (Mansi. x. 303; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.

HADRIANUS (7), second bishop of Numana, Numana, or Umana, signing the epistle of pope Agatho in 680. (Ugh. Ital. Soc. i. 743; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 79, 191.) [C. H.]

HADRIANUS (8), L. bishop of Rome from Feb. 3, 772, to Dec. 25, 785, during twenty-three years, ten months, and seventeen days. He is said by Anastasius to have been a Roman of noble race, son of one Theodorus, and of "elegant" personal appearance. Left an orphan early in life, he had been educated under the care of Theodorus (or Theodulus), a distinguished Roman, and had shewn signs of precocious piety, had been noticed on this account, and ordained subdeacon, by Gregory. Pope Gelasius I. had joined him in Italy, and had been enthusiastically received. Anastasius (Vit. Hadr.) gives a long account of the proceedings. Hadrian, on hearing of his unexpected approach, caused all the judges of Rome to meet him nearly thirty miles from the city; and at a mile's distance he was received and escorted by the Romanmilitia, and children carrying olive branches, and singing in his praise. Early next day, which was Easter eve, he conducted the pope to be received him in St. Peter's. On reaching the steps leading up the church the king knelt and kissed each step as he ascended. At the door of the church the two potentates embraced, and proceeded hand in hand, while the choir sung "Beneficent qui venit in nomine Domini," to the tomb of St. Peter, where they prostrated themselves together, and returned thanks. After solemn services in various churches during the Easter festival, and suitable entertainments, it was on Wednesday in Easter week, in the church of St. Peter, that the memorable event of this visit of Charlemagne to Rome took place. In the presence of the clergy and notables of Rome, Hadrian reminded the king of the donation of his father Pippin to St. Peter and his vicars for ever, the promise of which had been assented to by himself and his vicars before Carassus at Carasaum (Chieri), and admonished him to confirm it; whereupon the king, having caused the engagement entered into at Chieri to be read, ordered a new instrument of donation to be written, which he signed, and placed, first on the altar, and then on the tomb of St. Peter, having sworn to observe its conditions. The exact extent of territory assigned to the pope by this memorable donation, as well as that of the donation of Pippin, is uncertain, the original documents having perished, and contemporary writers giving us no certain information. Anastasius (in Vit. Hadr.) speaks of large additions to the exarchate of Ravenna, granted previously by Pippin, including Corcis, Istria, Venetia, and the dukedoms of Beneventum and Spoleto. It may be that the evidence in this respect is conflicting and contradictory, and others are partly due to a confusion between the "patrimony of St. Peter" in various countries and temporal dominion over them. The dukedoms of Spoleto is indeed spoken of in one of Hadrian's letters (Cod. Carol. Ep. 58) as specifically made over to him, and, as has been seen, Anastasius tells us of its having already submitted to him. But, with this exception, and perhaps some other subsequent concessions, it was certainly the Greek exarchate, not the Lombard kingdom, of which a donation was made. Charles ever after styled himself "rex Francorum et Longobardorum," and was absolute in Northern Italy. The nature of the pope's temporal authority over the lands of the donation is also open to dispute. He assumed certainly all the rights of a former exarch, and Hadrian, writing to Charles, speaks as possessing sovereign power in his own domains (Cod. Carol. Ep. 85); but Charles was still "patriicus Romanorum," whatever the title implied, the pope claiming in distinction the "patriicus b. Petri" (Cod. Carol. Ep. 85); Charles on being crowned emperor by Leo III. was adored by the pope and Roman people, as the Greek emperors had been by their subjects; Rome remained an imperial city (see Charles's will, in Vit. Car. M. per Einhard, c. 33); the popes afterwards had to swear fidelity to the Frank emperor; and it was not till the time of Innocent III. (1198) that the pope exacted from the praefectus Urbis the oath of allegiance formerly taken to the emperor.

In a subsequent letter from Hadrian to Charles (A.D. 777), an innovation has been proposed: (the son Desiderius, who had escaped to Constantinople, to attack Rome with Greek aid, and restore the kingdom of the Lombards. He repeatedly implores Charles to come again into Italy (Cod. Carol. Ep. 54, 58, 59). But the latter, engaged in his Saxon wars, contented himself with sending emissaries till, when in 775 he crossed the Alps and put down the rebellion, but did not on this occasion visit Rome (Annals nostris S. Dei Ecclesiae, i.e. b. Petri apostoli, germinet atque exsultet:—quia ecce novus christianissimus Dei Constantinus imperator, hic tempus sui. But the allusion appears to be only to some fabulous acts of St. Sylvester, referred to by Hadrian also in his letter to the second Nicene council (Concil. Nicen. ii. n. ii.), though the language may have suggested the late forgeries.

---

During the disputes about investiture it was maintained by the imperial party that, Charlemagne having returned to Rome after the reduction of Pavia, a synod was held in which Hadrian granted him the powers contended for. Thus in the Collecta Cann. tripartita, written in the time of Urban II., and in Ino's decree (in Perti, Monum. iv. li. 160, note), "Carolo Romam reversus, constituit ibi synodum cum Adriano paep. Adriano autem popa cum universo synodo tradiderunt Carlo jus et potestates eligendi pontificem et ordinandi apostolicam sedem, dignitatem quoque patriasticum eis conces-serunt. Insper archiepiscopos, episcos per singulas provincias ab eo investiturum accepere dividuerunt, et usi, nisi a rege laudetur et investitare episcopos, a nomine consecutur. Et quiunque contra hoc decretum esse, anathema maturi est, qui de consilio hominum seque et consilii secreto, bona ejus publicari praecipuerunt." The same account was inserted (Pagi, Crit. iii. 343, shows it to be an interpolation) in the Actaurium Aquenense of the Chronicle of Siegert of Gombrich, a.d. 1113 (Pertz, Monum. vi. 393).

It appears, too, in different words in a treatise composed a.d. 1109 at Naumburg by bishop Wultram or the abbot Conrad. But there is no early notice of any such synod, and Charles appears evidently to have gone straight to France from Pavia without returning to Rome:—"postquam vostra excellencia civitates Pavia in partibus Franciae removeris" (Ep. Hadr. ad Carol. M. Cod. Carol. Ep. 52). The fact, doubtless, was that Charles exercised the same rights in ecclesiastical affairs as he always had in the Frankish church, and that it was not till a later age that the pope's concession of such rights was conceived as necessary (see Gieseler, Ehr. Hist. div. i. pt. ii. ch. ii. § 5 and § 6, and note).

Charles having left Italy after his capture of Pavia and complete subjugation of Lombardy, and having taken Desiderius with him into France, Hadrian did not all at once enjoy his donation in peace. There are a number of letters addressed to him by Charles, in which he complains of Leo, archbishop of Ravenna, retaining cities in the exarchate on the plea that they had been granted to him by Charles; of the arrogance of Hildebrand, duke of Spoleto; and in one letter of the latter being engaged in a conspiracy with the dukes of Beneventum, Chusium (Choise), Forum Jolii (Privuli), and ambassador from King Desiderius (the son Desiderius who had escaped to Constantinople), to attack Rome with Greek aid, and restore the kingdom of the Lombards. He repeatedly notwithstanding this occasion visit Rome (Annals.

---

HADRIANUS—Pope

Lauriss. ann. 775, 776). After this the pope continued to send letters of complaint; in one he complains of the duke of Chiuse, who had seized the patrimony of St. Peter in his dukedom, and frequently of the archbishop of Ravenna, whom he describes as defying St. Peter and himself in retaining territory included in the donation; and he repeatedly urges Charles to come to the rescue (Cod. Carol. Epp. 53, 60). At length, the Saxons being subdued and multitudes of them having been obliged to accept baptism, Charles, in 786, found leisure again to visit Italy, and stopped for about a year in Pavia. He reserved his second visit to Rome for the Easter of 781, taking with him his queen Hildegard and two of his sons by her, Carloman and Lewis, with the intention that Carloman, born in 776, whose baptism had been deferred that he might receive it from the pope, should receive it on Easter Eve. On his baptism he received the name of Pippin. Two of his children were also anointed and crowned by Haddrian, Pippin, the elder, as “rex in Italian,” Lewis as “rex in Aquitaniam” (Annal. Lauriss. et Einhardi). The pope's difficulties with regard to his temporal claims appear to have been settled during this visit; and in return he concurred with Charles, before the latter left Rome, in appointing two episcopal legates to act with those of the king in a mission to Tassilo, duke of Bavaria, who was waver ing in his allegiance sworn to Pippin and his successors. The mission, thus strengthened by spiritual authority, is said to have resulted in temporary success. (Annal. Lauriss. et Einhardi)

At the close of the year 786 Charles again crossed the Alps, and, spending Christmas in Florence, repaired without delay to Rome to take counsel with Hadrian. The purpose of this expedition was to crush a rebellion concocted by Archis, duke of Beneventum, who, surprised by the sudden invasion, sent at once his eldest son, Romald, to Rome with rich presents, professing submission. But Charles, advised by the pope not to trust the duke, proceeded with his forces to Capua; on which Archis, having left Beneventum, was taken to Tarsius, who fled to Bavaria. Charles, sent again to sue for mercy, offering both his sons, with others, as hostages. Charles, having accepted his submission, returned to Rome, where he again kept Easter (787) with his friend Hadrian joyfully. While he was still at Rome, the pope again endeavoured to aid his benefactor in differences that had again arisen between him and Tassilo of Bavaria. Ambassadors arrived from this duke to beg the pope's good offices with a view to peace. He accordingly interceded with the king, who expressed himself ready to come to terms; but, when the ambassadors pleaded want of authority for ratifying any terms proposed, Hadrian, moved to anger and convinced of their duplicity, brought forth his spiritual weapons, laying their master and his followers under excommunication, and rendered full obedience to Charles and his sons, and declaring the latter free from all guilt for the calamities of war that might ensue. The anathema however failed of its intended effect; for it was not till Charles had coerced him by war that Tassilo made the required submission, and was secluded in a monastery (Annal. Lauriss. et Einhardi. et Vita Car. M. per Einhardi).
that his acceptance of him as patriarch would depend on his zeal and success in getting image-worship restored. In both letters he sets forth more than once the strong personal and spiritual affection which he entertained towards the emperor as to accept the council held under his auspices. At the beginning of his letter he had shewn similar uneasiness by disclaiming with an ‘abint’ the intention of defending any man whatever (quemlibet hominem) in replying to the Caroline books, and before concluding he says in effect, ‘If the council having rightly received its image-worship, I could not refuse to accord it, lest the Easterns should return to their heresy. But I have not yet written to the emperor on the subject. I am still much dissatisfied with him for not yet restoring portions of the patrimony of St. Peter which had been alienated by the Iconoclasts; and, if your God-protected royal excellence approves, I will admonish him to restore them, and, on this account, though not on the other, declare him a heretic if he refuses’ (Epp. Hadr. ad Car. M. de imaginibus, post Act. Concil. Nicon. ii. Labbe). Neither the arguments nor the authority of Hadrian converted Charlemagne and his divines. In the year 794 was held the council of Frankfort, at which the pope was represented by two legates, Theophylact and Stephen, and his own primacy by him. His own primacy was to condemn Adoptionism, i.e. the doctrine that Christ in His Divinity was the natural Son of God, but in His humanity the adopted Son. It had been taught in Spain by Elipand, archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, bishop of Urgel, and had penetrated into France. Felix had been made to recant before a synod at Ratisbon (792), and then before Hadrian at Rome, to whom he had been sent by Charles. Elipand having complained to Charles, the latter called the Frankfort synod, at which Adoptionism was unanimously condemned, a letter from the pope to the Spanish bishops on the subject having been read. The question of the second Nicene council was then introduced, and the result was that all adoration of the images of saints, such as that council had enjoined, was repudiated and condemned. The legates of Hadrian are not said to have disented from this canon, or he himself, notwithstanding his strong language on the subject at issue as against the Greeks, to have condemned the Franks. Image-worship continued to be rejected in the Frank empire through the 9th century without denunciation from Rome, and a synod at Paris (923) expressly condemned pope Hadrian himself for his action in the matter, saying among other

---

"Aliata est in medium quas et de nova Graecorum synodo, quam de adorandis imaginibus Constantinopolis fecerunt, in quas scriptum habebatur ut qui imaginibus sanctorum, ha ut deificae Trinitatis, servium aut adorationem non impendere, anathema judicarentur. Qui supra sanctissimi patres fecerunt, cum deimage-worship restored. In both letters he sets forth more than once the strong personal and spiritual affection which he entertained towards the emperor as to accept the council held under his auspices. At the beginning of his letter he had shewn similar uneasiness by disclaiming with an ‘abint’ the intention of defending any man whatever (quemlibet hominem) in replying to the Caroline books, and before concluding he says in effect, ‘If the council having rightly received its image-worship, I could not refuse to accord it, lest the Easterns should return to their heresy. But I have not yet written to the emperor on the subject. I am still much dissatisfied with him for not yet restoring portions of the patrimony of St. Peter which had been alienated by the Iconoclasts; and, if your God-protected royal excellence approves, I will admonish him to restore them, and, on this account, though not on the other, declare him a heretic if he refuses’ (Epp. Hadr. ad Car. M. de imaginibus, post Act. Concil. Nicon. ii. Labbe). Neither the arguments nor the authority of Hadrian converted Charlemagne and his divines. In the year 794 was held the council of Frankfort, at which the pope was represented by two legates, Theophylact and Stephen, and his own primacy by him. His own primacy was to condemn Adoptionism, i.e. the doctrine that Christ in His Divinity was the natural Son of God, but in His humanity the adopted Son. It had been taught in Spain by Elipand, archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, bishop of Urgel, and had penetrated into France. Felix had been made to recant before a synod at Ratisbon (792), and then before Hadrian at Rome, to whom he had been sent by Charles. Elipand having complained to Charles, the latter called the Frankfort synod, at which Adoptionism was unanimously condemned, a letter from the pope to the Spanish bishops on the subject having been read. The question of the second Nicene council was then introduced, and the result was that all adoration of the images of saints, such as that council had enjoined, was repudiated and condemned. The legates of Hadrian are not said to have disented from this canon, or he himself, notwithstanding his strong language on the subject at issue as against the Greeks, to have condemned the Franks. Image-worship continued to be rejected in the Frank empire through the 9th century without denunciation from Rome, and a synod at Paris (923) expressly condemned pope Hadrian himself for his action in the matter, saying among other

---

"Aliata est in medium quas et de nova Graecorum synodo, quam de adorandis imaginibus Constantinopolis fecerunt, in quas scriptum habebatur ut qui imaginibus sanctorum, ha ut deificae Trinitatis, servium aut adorationem non impendere, anathema judicarentur. Qui supra sanctissimi patres fecerunt, cum deimage-worship restored. In both letters he sets forth more than once the strong personal and spiritual affection which he entertained towards the emperor as to accept the council held under his auspices. At the beginning of his letter he had shewn similar uneasiness by disclaiming with an ‘abint’ the intention of defending any man whatever (quemlibet hominem) in replying to the Caroline books, and before concluding he says in effect, ‘If the council having rightly received its image-worship, I could not refuse to accord it, lest the Easterns should return to their heresy. But I have not yet written to the emperor on the subject. I am still much dissatisfied with him for not yet restoring portions of the patrimony of St. Peter which had been alienated by the Iconoclasts; and, if your God-protected royal excellence approves, I will admonish him to restore them, and, on this account, though not on the other, declare him a heretic if he refuses’ (Epp. Hadr. ad Car. M. de imaginibus, post Act. Concil. Nicon. ii. Labbe). Neither the arguments nor the authority of Hadrian converted Charlemagne and his divines. In the year 794 was held the council of Frankfort, at which the pope was represented by two legates, Theophylact and Stephen, and his own primacy by him. His own primacy was to condemn Adoptionism, i.e. the doctrine that Christ in His Divinity was the natural Son of God, but in His humanity the adopted Son. It had been taught in Spain by Elipand, archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, bishop of Urgel, and had penetrated into France. Felix had been made to recant before a synod at Ratisbon (792), and then before Hadrian at Rome, to whom he had been sent by Charles. Elipand having complained to Charles, the latter called the Frankfort synod, at which Adoptionism was unanimously condemned, a letter from the pope to the Spanish bishops on the subject having been read. The question of the second Nicene council was then introduced, and the result was that all adoration of the images of saints, such as that council had enjoined, was repudiated and condemned. The legates of Hadrian are not said to have disented from this canon, or he himself, notwithstanding his strong language on the subject at issue as against the Greeks, to have condemned the Franks. Image-worship continued to be rejected in the Frank empire through the 9th century without denunciation from Rome, and a synod at Paris (923) expressly condemned pope Hadrian himself for his action in the matter, saying among other things as well might be said) that his letter to Irene and Constantine contained things "valde absona, et ad rem de qua ageatur minus pertinueta" (Manzi, Concil. xiv. 421D, who is the first to include this in his collection of councils).

Thus the old cordiality between Charles and Hadrian had not been interrupted would appear from Einhard's account of the king's sorrow when he heard of the pope's death ("the decease of the Roman pontiff being announced to him, whom he held chief among his friends, he wept as if he had lost a son or a very dear brother") and also from the epistle in Latin elegies, full of affection and respect, which Charles wrote, and had inscribed upon Hadrian's tomb. They were always fast allies and friends, and there were several reasons for their being so.

In addition to personal regard and mutual respect, there was the deep religious reverence undoubtedly felt by Charles for the Roman see, which Hadrian lost no opportunity of fostering; and the two were allies in this which was retained in their close alliance. To Charles it was of importance to have so great a spiritual potentate, owed to temporalities to himself, for an ally in Italy, while Hadrian clearly saw that from no earthly power could he get so much reverence, immunity, and temporal sway as from the generous and religious Charles. Zeal and pertinacity in contending for the temporal claims of St. Peter's see; and by the assertion of spiritual prerogative invoking temporal aid for their enforcement, are leading characteristics of Hadrian, as shown by his letters. As has been intimated, he does not shine in the field of controversy; but there is no reason to doubt the account of him by Anastasius, confirmed by Charles's epistle, that he was sincerely devout, and very liberal in his gifts for charitable and ecclesiastical purposes. Anastasius, in his life of him, goes at great length into his expenditure on churches and other works in Rome, in which undertakings he was aided by Charles, who, as his biographer Einhard tells us, sent him large gifts, gold, silver, and gems, for such purposes, having nothing more at heart than that the city of Rome might be strewed with the edifices of her ancient dignity, and the Church of St. Peter should be not only defended by him, but also adorned and enriched beyond all others.

There is extant a large collection of letters from Hadrian to Charlemagne preserved in the Codex Carolinus, some of which have been referred to above. A large proportion refer to political events in Italy, complaining of wrongs done to St. Peter's see, or of machinations against Charles, and often begging him to come to the rescue. In others he congratulates Charles on the subjugation and forced conversion of the Saxons; orders at his request litanies to be sung in celebration of these successes; directs how to deal with Saxons renegades from the faith; sends palls, and confirms the political privileges of the bishops of Rheims and of Bourges in Aquitania; grants a bishop of their own to the abbat and monks of St. Denys; undertakes, having been complained of to Charles, to control the irregularities of Lombard bishops, and to suppress simony; courteously denies Charles's claim to intervene through his legates in the election of archbishops of Ravenna; on one occasion thanks for the present of a cross; on another gives Charles marbles and mosaics from Ravenna, and on another the dead body of a martyr.

On the occasion of one of the visits of Charles to Rome (probably the first, A.D. 773) Hadrian gave him a collection of the canons of the church for his guidance in his own country, to which was prefixed an epistle in Latin verse (if verse it can be called) of which the first letters of the lines form the sentence, "Domino eccle. filio Carolo regi Hadrianus papa" (Labbe, viii. 583). Also, when Charles was at Rome (Easter, 787), he is said to have taken home with him, as a gift from the pope, the Antiphonary of St. Gregory, with musical notes inserted by the pope himself, together with two singing-masters, learned in Gregorian music, in order that the corrupt method of singing then prevalent in France might be reformed according to the ancient Gregorian use, which was retained at Rome. There had been, we are told, contentions between the French and Roman singers during the Easter services, the former saying that their own singing was the sweetest and the best, the latter defending their own style as orthodox Gregorianism. Charles, being referred to, decided in favour of the Roman use on the ground that the fountain must be purer than its stream, and accordingly took measures for having it taught and maintained in France, founding schools for the purpose with the assistance of the two Roman teachers, who also taught organ-playing (artem organandi). (Annot. Lauri.)

The authorities for this life are Anastasius Biblioth. in Vita Hadr.; Codex Carolinus (collection of letters from popes to Charles, &c., contained in Muratori, Script. rerum Italic. in Cajet. Cenni, Monumenta Domina. Pontific. and in Jaffé's Regesta); Monumenta Carolina, ed. Jaffé; Annales Lauriscenses, Annales Einhardi, &c., and Vita Caroli M. per Einhard. (in Pertz, Monumenta Germanica, Histor. Scriptores); the Standard Collection of Councils, &c.

J. B.—Y.

HADUFRITH, priest. [HATHUFRITH.]

HADUINDUS, bishop of Le Mans. [HAUINDUS.]

HADULAC, bishop of Elmhamb. [HEATHOLAC.]

HADULUS, St., eleventh bishop of Cambrai and Arras, between Hunaudus and Truvardus. He was, according to some, a son of St. Ragnulfus the martyr. He is said to have entered the monastery of St. Vasat (Vedasti) in early youth, and risen to be first prior and then abbat, in which office he succeeded St. Hatta, the first of the series. He died in the year 728 or 729, after ruling the monastery for nineteen years and the see for twelve. His tomb in the church of St. Peter, near the walls of his monastery, became famous from the numerous miracles said to have been worked there, and in the 10th century his remains were exhumed and elevated by one of his successors in the see named Enguerranus, or Engranus. His epitaph of four Latin lines in the church of St. Peter is preserved. He is commemorated May 10 and Aug. 31 (Gesta Pontificum Cambresacensium, 34, 35, Migne, Patr.
HADUMARUS, bishop. [HATHUMARUS]

HADWALD, a servant of Elfeda abbess of Whity, cir. A.D. 685. He was killed by a fall from a tree, and St. Cuthbert is said to have seen angels bearing his soul to heaven at the very time of the accident. Cuthbert mentioned the circumstance to Elfeda, and on the following day the news of Hadwald's death was brought to her (Bed. Vita Cuth. c. 34).

HADWIN, a bishop, consecrated in 768 to the see of Machui, or Mayo of the Saxons, on the west coast of Ireland. (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 685; Hoved. Chron. Ann. 768; tom. i. p. 9, ed. Stubbs.) He died in 773, when his successor Leufeth was consecrated (c. 684).

HAEDDI, bishop of Wessex. [HEDDA (1)]

HAEGA, an abbat who attests the charter of Ine to Malmesbury dated May 26, 704. (Kemble, C. D. 50; W. Malmesb. G. P. lib. v. ed. Hamilton, p. 389; Ang. Soc. ii. 22.) Although the charter is a forgery, several of the abbats whose names are attached to it are historical persons, such as Witrada, Bearwald, and Aldhelm, so that Haega also may be a real name.

HAELRIC, an abbat who attests a grant of Ethelred king of Mercia to Worcester, in 692. (Kemble, C. D. 34.)

HAEMATITAE (Almuaretal). An early heretical sect mentioned by Clement of Alexandria as deriving their name, like the Docetae, from the opinions which they held (Strom. vii. 17). What those opinions were, however, he does not say.

HAEGMILLS, a monk mentioned by Bede. (H. E. v. 12.) He lived in the neighbourhood of the solitary Drythelm, probably at Melrose, and was a priest. At the time Bede closed his history, he was living as an anchorite in Ireland, and subsisting on bread and water. It was Haegmills who reported the visions of Drythelm to Bede. His name appears among the anchorites in the Liber Vitae Dulcmbraisi, p. 6. [S.]

HAEMGILLS, abbat of Glastonbury. [HEMGILLS.] [S.]

HAEMORRhOISSA [VERONICA.]

HAERES (HERES) (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 631; Fabricius, Bibl. Med. et Inf. Lat. lib. i. vol. i. p. 134, ed. 1754; Velser, Rec. Boic. p. 308, making haeres the Latin equivalent of the old German Arobo or Erbo), monk. [CYRINUS (2)]. [C. H.]

HAERHUNEN (HAERNUNEN), bishop of Menevia in the 8th century. (Stubbs, Reg. Scir. Angl. 134; Godwin, de Frang. Angl. 601.)

HAESITANTES, the current rendering of θεσσιτάντες (Phot. cod. 24; Valcuscio, note 79 on Theodor. Lect., E. H. ii. 28, p. 578; Asseman, Bibl. Or. ii. § 4), those who held aloof from the council of Chalcedon. Timotheus the presbyter reckons up twelve various sects of these separatists, as Eutychianists, Acrophili, Julianists, Menandrians, Gnostic, &c. (Timoth. Presb. de Recept. Haerit. p. 405, Migone, Patr. Gr. Ixxvi. 51; Leont. Hist. Synod. act. vi. § 1, act. ix. Migone, n. s. 1234 B, 1259.)

HAGISOAUSTAE. The opponents of image-worship were so called. They were anathematized under that name by a synod convened at Jerusalem by Theodorus the patriarch, A.D. 738 (ἱπποκρίσις ὕπερ, Liber. Synod. ap. Mansi, xii. 273; Hefele, Concilienesch. iii. 374).

HAGONA (HAGUNA, HUGON, HACONA), an abbot whose name appears among the signatures of charters of the last decade of the 7th century. He attests the grant of Oehthred to Barking (Kemble, C. D. 35; Mon. Angl. i. 439), the grant of Earconwald (Mon. Angl. i. 439), that of Ine to Malmesbury (spurious, K. C. D. 50), that of Caedwalla to Winchester (K. C. D. 894), and one of Nothelm of Sussex to Selsey (K. C. D. 932). Although most, if not all, of them are forgeries, the coincidence of the name seems to imply that some such person was known to tradition in the 10th century, and the charter of Oehthred may be genuine.

HAIARNGEN (HAERNGEN), clerical witness to the grant of the church of Ma Mouriace, that is, Laun Vulen, to bishop Cadware (Cadwar) and the see of Llandaff. (Llib. Landan. in Hees, 460.)

HAICO (NAICO), twenty-second bishop of Nantes, between Taurinus and Salutius, towards the middle of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 801.)

HAIDO, bishop of Hude. [HATTO.]

HAIMO, ST. [HAYMO.]

HAINMARUS (AYMAR), twenty-sixth bishop of Anzeria, succeeding Savinianus. According to the annals of the see, he was of noble birth, and of possessions so extended that he became duke of nearly the whole of Burgundy. He followed Pippin upon two campaigns, first against Aino king of Burgund, when, bringing up his forces after the battle had commenced, he decided the event for Pippin with great slaughter of the Saracens. In the second expedition, he assisted Pippin against Eudo duke of Aquitaine, who, from an ally on the former occasion, had been changed into a foe. The Aquitains were defeated, but Eudo escaped, and it was suggested to Pippin by the bishop's enemies that it was not without his connivance. He was accordingly imprisoned at Bastogne (Bastonia villa) in the Ardennes. After a few days, he escaped on horseback by the aid of a nephew, but was pursued and overtaken at Lifol in the district of Toul. Despairing of escape, he spread out his arms in the form of a cross, and, raising his eyes to heaven, was pierced by the lances of his pursuers. He was supposed to have been buried on the same spot (circ. A.D. 736). This account, however, can only be brought into harmony with history by substituting the name of Charles Martel for that of Pippin, and that of Waifarius... for Euso, and putting the events in 765, as does Le Coite. Hainmarus has been counted among the number of martyrs. He was succeeded, after an episcopate of fifteen years, by Theodranus, whom he had associated in the bishopric during his lifetime, that the diocese might not suffer from his secular occupations. (Gesta Austriacodizensium, Bouquet, v. 434; Gall. Christ. xii. 270; Le Coite, Anna. Ecl. Franc. 765, n. xlviii. tom. v. 677-8; Fisquet, Le Franc. Pontificale, Diocese d'Autunne, p. 232.) [S. A. B.]

HAITO, bishop of Basle. [Hetto.]

HALACHAE. [TALMUD.]

HALANUS (Alanus), sixth abbat of the monastery of St. Mary at Fafra, a Saline town in the Roman states, upon the Fafra, a tributary of the Tiber, about twenty miles north of Rome. The Historiae Forfenses (in Pertz, Scriptores, xi. 528) represent him as a man deeply versed in spiritual philosophy and sacred wisdom. Being a monk of Fafra, under the abbacy of Wandelbert, he retired for greater privacy to a spot near the oratory of St. Martin, in the mountain Motilla overhanging the monastery, and it is in that seclusion he may have composed the work which is attributed to him. On the death of Wandelbert, at the close of 759, the whole fraternity of St. Mary's came out to request Halanus to take his place. He complied, and presided nine years, until his death on March 3, 769, nominating as his successor a monk of English birth named Wigbert. Another authority (Catalogus Abbatum Forfense, in Pertz, xi. 585) dates his accession 761, and places him between Wandelbert or Guandelpert and Probatus. The work attributed to him is a Homiliarium, the prologue of which is given in Pex (Theaur. Anecd. vi. 83). This prologue describes the plan of the work as a series of discourses appropriate to the leading seasons of the church year, commencing with the eve of the Nativity. (Cellier, xii. 145.) [C. H.]

HALMUND, an abbat who attests a grant made by Cuthred, king of Kent, to archbishop Wulfred in a synod at Acle, in Aug. 805. (Hasdian and Stubbs, iii. 559, from MS. Lambeth, 1212; cf. Remble, C. D. 190.)

HANANIAS (Hanina in Syr. Mart.), a priest and martyr with another priest named Abdecalees and Simeon Barsaboe archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, the primates of the Persian church, in the persecution begun by Sapor II. in a.D. 345. A decree having been issued by Sapor for the execution of the clergy of the three first grades, and the demolition of the churches, Simeon and two attendant presbyters were conveyed in chains to Ledan, a city in the province of Huizitis, where Sapor then resided. Being required by Sapor to do homage to the sun, and being assured that upon their compliance depended the safety of themselves and of the Christians at large, they refused, and were condemned to be executed with one hundred others of the clerical order, upon the day which the Persian Christians had consecrated to the memory of Christ's passion. Simeon and his two companions were reserved till the last, the emperor designing to shake their constancy by the sight of so much bloodshed. Simeon, however, confirmed the band of confessors by his exhortations, and at last died himself with his two companions. It happened that Hananias, when it was his turn to strip himself and be bound in order to receive the stroke of the axe, was suddenly seized by the natural fear of death, and trembled through his whole frame; the flesh only, however, being weak, while the spirit was strong as before. When this was observed by Phusus, an officer of rank, superintendent of all the workmen in the palace, who was himself a Christian, he said to the martyr, "Take courage, shut your eyes for a moment, you will soon see the light of Jesus Christ." For this speech he and his daughter, who was a consecrated virgin, were seized, cruelly tortured, and executed. (Sozomen, H. E. i. ii. c. 8-11; Assemani, Acta Mart. Orient. t. i. pp. 10-42; Wright, Syr. Mart. in Jour. Soc. Lit. for 1865, p. 45, and 1866, p. 423.) [G. T. S.]

HANNO, c. 758, bishop of Verona. (Cappelletti, Le Citea d'Italia, z. 751.)

HANNO, HANNUS, alleged bishop of Constantia, also called JOANNES II. (Gall. Chr. v. 894.) [C. H.]

HANTO (Hatto), fourteenth bishop of Augsburg (809-815), between St. Sinibert and St. Nitger. He was at the same time abbot of Neustadt, where he succeeded Waldéricus. Eckhart suggests that he may have been the son of that Hatto from whom St. Megingandus acquired the site of Neustadt, then called Rorich. On two occasions he was commissioned by Charles the Great to settle disturbances in monasteries, first when the territory of Benedictoburium (Benedictheurn) was invaded by wrongdoers (Nichelbeck, Chron. Benedictobur. p. 21), secondly, in 812, when he was sent with the bishops of Mainz, Worms and Würzburg, to compose the disturbances which had arisen between Ratgarius abbass of Fulda and his monks (Annal. Lauriss. Min. 812, Pertz, Scriptores, i. 121). In 815, the year of his death, he is said to have assisted his brother Raptardus in building a church on the site where afterwards stood the monastery of Diesen in Bavaria (De Fundatoribus Mon. Diesa, Pertz, Scriptores, xvii. 329). For Hante, see also Eckhart, Franc. Orient. i. 139, 473; Retzberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 152. [S. A. B.]

HANUS (1), presbyter and martyr in Persia under Sapor II. in the month of May, A.D. 375. He suffered with forty others, including two bishops, sixteen priests, nine deacons, six monks, and seven consecrated virgins. (Assemani, Mart. Orient. i. 144.) [G. T. S.]

HANUS (2), deacon and martyr on the same occasion as the preceding, A.D. 375. (Assemani, Mart. Orient. i. 144.) [G. T. S.]

HARDUINUS, bishop of Le Mans. [Hay

HARDUINUS, a presbyter and recluse at the monastery of Fontenelle. For the sake of more undisturbed contemplation he inhabited the cell of St. Saturninus, built by the abbat Wandregillus, near Fontenelle, and there gave HARIBERTUS [Arretbertus], fourth abbot of the monastery of Murbach (Morbacum, Murbacum) in the diocese of Basle, succeeding Baldebertus in A.D. 783 (Annales in Pertz, Scriptores, i. 28, 29). Soon afterwards we find him at Rome, where he returned when he was entrusted with a letter from the pope, Paul I., to king Pippin (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxix. 1144). Upon Paul's death in 767, he was sent to Rome a second time by Pippin (Annales, Pertz, i. 31). Several documents relating to him are preserved, a letter of a matron named Herchiniida to him in A.D. 768, a deed of grant from one Ustericus in the same year, a charter of immunity from public burdens granted to his monastery by Charles the Great in A.D. 772, and a gift of land from one Willarius to the foundation in 774 (Schoepflin, Alsatia Diplomatica, i. 40, 44, 47). In this last year Haribert died, and was succeeded by Amicho (Annales, Pertz, i. 40; Gall. Christ. xv. 537). [S. A. B.]

HARIFEUS of Besançon. [Hervar].

HARIMARUS, bishop. [Huthmar].

HARIOLEUS, thirty-fourth bishop of Langres, between his brother Erlolus and Waldricus. He was founder and first abbot of Ellwangen, in Württemberg, on the river Jast, in the 8th century. He is said to have been of noble family, and not undistinguished while still a layman. In later life he was much loved by Charles the Great, who habitually addressed him as his father. His life was written by Ermeric, a monk of the same foundation, between A.D. 845 and 855. It is in the form of a dialogue between the author and one Mahlotus, and contains but little information, being principally occupied with his miracles. His choice of the spot for his monastery at Ellwangen, according to this narrative, was determined by a vision. His brother, the bishop of Langres, assisted him in constructing the monastery, and under his influence Harioleus adopted the monastic garb and became abbot. The relics of the martyrs St. Sulpicius and St. Servilius, which Erlolus had received from pope Adrian, were translated to Ellwangen. The date of the foundation is given in A.D. 784. His later life in the diocese of Langres is unknown to us, but he appears to have returned to Ellwangen to die. In the list of the Gallia Christiana (iv. 526) he is confused with his brother Erlolus, who preceded him in the see, and was present at the Lateran council in A.D. 768 (Manisi, vii. 719). The day of his death is given as August 15, but the year is unknown. An epitaph, discovered on an old parchment MS. in the monastery, is printed by Pertz at the end of the Life. (Scriptores, x. 11-14, Annales Eclanumenses, Chronicon Eclanum, Pertz, ibid. 18, 35; Retzbach, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 160.) [S. A. B.]

HARMACARUS (Harmacatus), fifth bishop of Utrecht, between Theodardus and Richiridus or Rixfridus. He is said to have been a Frisian by birth, and a canon of Utrecht before his elevation to the episcopate. He sat about thirteen years, from 791 to 804, and was buried in the church of St. Saviour at Utrecht. (Van Heussen, Hist. Episcopat. Federal. Belg. i. 6; Retzbach, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 353.) [S. A. B.]

HARMASUS, a Eucharistic and Monothelite of Alexandria, contemporary with Sophronius bishop of Jerusalem, c. A.D. 636. He is mentioned by that writer in a letter to a singular and unique paragraph of his celebrated synodical which is published by Coteler, as "qui Alexandrinæ adhuc Seraphitarum Hagios Harmonius pateat haereticus esse." (Exct. Gr. Monmm. i. 790). The authenticity of the paragraph, however, is questioned by Coteler (u. s.), and also by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. ed. Harles, x. 45); but it is admitted by Le Quien (Prose. in Jo. Damasc. de duch. Vohunt. Migne, Patr. Gr. ecv. 129). Anastasius Sinaita mentions the Harmasitae, who would seem to have been followers of Harmasus (Usag. c. 13, Migne, vii. lxxix. 225; Petavius, de Theol. Dogm. v. 43). [T. W. D.]

HARMATIUS (1), a pagan, whose son was converted to Christianity. Basil writing to Harmatius, styling him to be a man to be respected for his son's conscientious convictions, and suggested that he should rather admire the young man's nobility of soul in professing the heavenly relationship to the earthly. (Basil. ep. 276, p. 420, in Pat. Or. xxxii. 1011.) [U. H.]

HARMATIUS (2), a gentleman, the possessor of property at Cucumar, to whom Chrysostom wrote a playful letter, A.D. 404, telling him how much better pleased he should be if, instead of bidding his people supply all his bodily wants, which were none at all, he would spend a little paper and ink in informing him how he and his family found themselves. What he should like best would be a visit from him; but the fear of the Iasurian banditti forbade all hope of that. (Chrys. Epist. 75.) [E. V.]

HARMATIUS (3), bishop of Misthium in Lycaonia, subscribed to the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by Onesiphorus of Iconium. (Manisi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Orient. Christ. i. 1087.) [L. D.]

HARMOGEN. [Armoghen, Armagil].

HARMONIUS (1), son of Bardesan (Bar-daisan) of Edessa, A.D. 190. He is said to have studied at Athens, where he became familiar with the language and philosophy of Greece. He wrote much in Greek and in Syriac. With his father's peculiar tenets he combined others

HARMONIUS (2).
HARMONIUS

drawn from Greek sources, relating to the origin of the soul, the decay of the body, and transmigration (ζωογραφεία). He sought to popularize his doctrines by presenting them in the form of hymns to be sung on the feasts of the martyrs. He was the first componist in Syria, doubtless in imitation of Greek models. Later onwards, in the 4th century, St. Ephrem wrote hymns in the same metre and to the same airs as those of Harmonius, in order to supplant the heterodox originals. (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 26, p. 1008; Id. Haeret. Fidel. Compend. i. 22, p. 313; Id. ep. 145, p. 1248; Mansi, Concil. xi. 499 E.; Cass. Hist. Liti. i. 86; Collilius, i. 496; Tullemont, Mém. hist. eccl. ii. 457.) (Barth., B.D. p. 252, col. 1.) [C. J. B.]

HARMONIUS (2), apparently a disciple to whom Gregory Nyssen dedicated his treatise De Professione Christiana (Greg. Nyssen. Opp. in Pat. Gr. xli. 228.) [E. V.]

HARMONIUS (3), bishop of Lamprocus, on the Asiatic coast of the Hellespont, signed the synodal letter of the Cyzicene province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 587; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 773.) [L. D.]

HARMONIUS (4), bishop of Callipolis (Gallopil) on the Hellespont at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 879; Le Quien, Ori. Christ. i. 1123.) [J. de S.]

HARPOCRAS (1), one of the seven emissaries of Peter of Alexandria, probably bishops, sent by him to Constantinople, A.D. 380, as spies, to prepare the ground for the clandestine ordination of Maximus the Cynic as bishop of Constantinople (Greg. Naz. Caron. i. p. 14.) [E. V.]

HARPOCRAS (2) (APPOCRAS), one of the orthodox Egyptian bishops who, with some Alexandrian clerics, fled to Constantinople, in A.D. 437, to escape the persecution of Timothius Aelurus and the Eutychians. His name appears in their petition to the emperor Leo (Harduin, Concilia, ii. 896; Labbe, iv. 891), and at the head of the letter addressed to them by the pope Leo (Leo Mag. Ep. clx. 1336). He appears also in the list of bishops subscribing the encyclical letter of the council held at Constantinople in 459, under Gennadius, against simony (Harduin, ii. 783). In the petition to the emperor he appears as “Episcopus Gavaesium” (Tavoerum), among the subscribers to the decree of the council as “Episc. Tavoe.” His see was probably Tavoa, in the province of Aegyptas Prima (Oriens Christ. ii. 526.) [C. G.]

HARPOCRATIANS. Celsius, quoted by Origen (Adv. Cel. v. 82), mentions a heretical sect “κραταρικατος και Ταυερομος.” It is natural to conjecture that Harpocratians are intended, and though we have no independent testimony that this sect professed to have derived traditions from Salome, we know that she is frequently mentioned in apocryphal gospels (Propt. Soc. 19, 20; Clem. Al. Strom. iii. 6, 13; Pistis Sophia, p. 102.) [G. S.]

HARPOCRACTON (1), bishop of Cypopolis in Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile. He was present at the first general council at Nicea, A.D. 325, according to the statement of Socrates (Hist. Eccl. i. 13; Le Quien, Ori. Christ. ii. 591). The list of the Nicene fathers in Mansi (ii. 692 b) names him Alphocration and Arrapocration, bishop of Nauchraetis (see also Le Quien, ii. 523). A bishop of the same name was present at the synod of Tyre, A.D. 335, but his see is not mentioned. (Mansi, ii. 1143 C; Athanas. Apol. Patr. Gr. xxv. 392.) [J. de S.]

HARPOCRATION (2), bishop of Bubastus (Basta) in Egypt. He was one of the bishops consecrated by Melchius, according to the Breviary given to Alexander. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arians, in Patr. Gr. xxv. 376; Le Quien, Ori. Christ. ii. 561.) [J. de S.]

HARUCHUS (HARRUCHE, HARRUTH), third bishop of Verden, between Tanko and Haligad, 808–830 (Potthast, Bibl. Suppl. p. 435). He was of Irish birth, and before his elevation to the episcopate held the post of abbat in the monastery of Amarbaracum, which was usually supposed to be in Ireland, but according to Eckhart and later critics was in Germany, not far from Fulda, with which Ireland maintained friendly relations. (Francon. Orient. i. 700, ii. 23; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, c. xx. vol. iii. 221.) According to the Chronicle of Verden he was a man of great excellence, and after his death wonderful cures were reported to have been performed at his tomb. Eckhart quotes from the Noveologium of Fulda to the effect that he died in the year 829, and that his remains, together with those of the first bishop, Spatello, and the dalmatic of Tanko the second bishop, were carried back to Verden, from which he infers that these three bishops may have governed the see by chorepiscopi (Francon. Orient. ibid.). Though he finds a place in some hagiologies, principally the Irish, on July 15, Haruchus is omitted by the Bollandists. For their reasons see the Acta SS. Jul. iv. 3. [S. A. B.]

HASSEA, Irish saint. [HEISE.]

HASTULPHUS. [HEISTULPHER.]

HATES, virgin and martyr in Persia under Sapor II. A.D. 443. She is noted in Rom. Mart. on Oct. 17; in Bas. Men. on Oct. 5. In the former she is commemorated under the name of Manemla, and we are told that she was converted from idolatry by an angelic voice, stoned by the heathen and drowned in a lake. (Assenmai, Mart. Orient. i. 96–101.) [G. T. S.]

HATHELAC, bishop. [HEATHELAC.]

HATHOBERHT (Keblem, Cod. Dipl. 175, A.D. 788), bishop. [HEATHOBERHT.][C. H.]

HATHOBERHT (Keblem, Cod. Dipl. 116, A.D. 767), bishop, the same as Eadbert bishop of Leicester. [EADBERT (9).] [C. H.]

HATHORED, bishop. [HEATHORED.]

HATHOWARD, a priest of Worcester, who attests an act of bishop Deoneberht in or about the year 802. (Keblem, C. D. 181.) [S.]

HATHUBERT, bishop. [HEATHOBERHT.]
HATHUFRITH

HATHUFRITH (Hadufrith), a priest who was present at Ripon in A.D. 799 when Wilfrid gave his last instructions to the clergy, and he was also one of those deputed by that prelate to return from Mercia to tell them who was to be their abbot (Eddi, cap. 63). [J. R.]

HATHUMARUS (Hadumarus, Harumarus), first bishop of Paderborn in Westphalia. This district was previously under the care of the bishop of Würzburg, but had become neglected on account of its distance from that place. According to Ido, who wrote the history of the translation of St. Liborius, Hathumarus was a Saxon, who when a boy had been given to Charles the Great as a hostage, and was sent by him to reside at Würzburg. Here he was educated, and in time took the tonsure, and devoted himself to study. He was afterwards consecrated first bishop of Paderborn by command Charles. The year is usually given as A.D. 795, but this seems too early a date to harmonize with Ido’s narrative. He was alive in the year 815, as we find Louis the Pious, when asked for a charter for the foundation of the monastery of Corvey, summoning Hathumarus as the bishop of the diocese in which the proposed site lay, that the step might not be taken without his sanction (Hist. Transl. S. Vita, vii., Pertz, Scriptores, ii. 579). He was succeeded by Baduradus. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. v. 415, 417.) His day of consecration was Aug. 9. (Schäfer, Annalium Paderbornensis, tom. i. p. 29 sqq.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. ii. 448; Retberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 440–1.) [S. A. B.]

Hatto, eighth bishop of Passau (A.D. 807–818), between Urrolf and Reginald or Reginarius, is said to have obtained the see through the influence of Arno of Salzburg. Probably out of gratitude for his elevation he made no claim to the pallium, which at this time had gone to the see of Salzburg. He was present at two councils, that of Salzburg, in 807, and another at Regensburg, the date of which is not known. His name also occurs in some charters of Louis the Pious for the church of Passau (Auctor, Cronicon sancti Austriacii, 807, 818, Pertz, Scriptores, ix. 551, 559; Hanslitzius, Germania Sacra, i. 152–4; Retberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 251; Potthast, Biblioth. Suppl. p. 381.) [S. A. B.]

Hatto, bishop of Augsburg. [Hatto.]

Hatto, bishop of Basle. [Hetto.]

HAWYSTIL, St., a daughter of Brychan, in the 5th century, who founded the church of Dlanhawystil, supposed to be Awest in Gloucestershire (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 152). [C. W. B.]

HAYMO, St. (Haino), flourished towards the end of the 5th century. He and his brother Veremundus while hunting near Milan were pursued by bears, both of which by way of a vex which they made in the hour of danger, founded a monastery at Meda, a village mid-way between Milan and Como. They were commemorated on Feb. 13. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 705; Mabill. Acta SS. O. S. B. sacred. iii. ii. 380.) [I. G. S.]

HAYNIUS, thirty-second bishop of Chartres, between Berthegnannus and Agirarius. He is said to have been in occupation of the see in A.D. 696. But the history of the diocese of Chartres at this time is involved in the greatest obscurity. (Gall. Chr. viii. 1101.) [S. A. B.]

HEABERT, king of Kent. [EADBERHT.]

HEABERT (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 162, spurious charter of Offa king of Mercia, A.D. 793), bishop; perhaps Heathberht bishop of London. [C. H.]

HEABURGA, abbess of Minster. [EADBURGA (2).]

HEADHERT (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 1029, A.D. 799), bishop. [HEATHOBERT.]

HEADDA (Headdi), bishop of Winchester. [HEDDA (3).]

HEADDA (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 36, A.D. 693; 52, A.D. 704), bishop of Liechfield. [HEDDA (2).] [C. H.]

HEADDA (1), a priest of the diocese of Worcester, who attains an act of Eanberht, Uhtred and Aldred, ealdormen or underkings of the Hwiccio, to Worcester in 757. (Kemble, C. D. 102.) He is probably the same person as the following. [S.]

HEADDA (2), priest and abbot of the diocese of Worcester; kinsman of bishop Heathored, to whom in 759 the three Hwiccio ealdormen granted lands at Osnaford (Kemble, C. D. 105). and who some years later left his hereditary estates to the monastery at Worcester (6, 189). The condition of the bequest is curious: the estates are to be held by the abbot's heirs so long as there can be found in the family one who is sitted to rule a religious house, and they are never to come into lay hands. The date of the bequest falls between 781 and 798. [S.]

HEADDA, the eighth bishop of Hereford, (M. H. B. 621, v. l.) [CEADDA.]

HEADRED, bishops. [HEARDRED.]

HEABHERRT, a priest of the diocese of Rochester, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547.) [S.]

HEABERT, abbot of Reculver, to whom Eardulf, king of Kent, made a grant of land at Perhamstead. (Dugdale, Moni. i. 435, from the Canterbury Cartulary in the Bodleian.) He is called Eadberht in Kemble’s recension of the charter, which is extant, but would fall about 747. (Kemble, C. D. 1004.) [S.]

HEAHSTAN, a priest of the diocese of London, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547.) He may possibly be identical with the person who behest bishop of Sherborne in 824, and survived until 867; but this is scarcely likely. [S.]
HEAMUND, a Kentish priest, who attested the act of archbishop Wulfred, dated April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.)

HEAN, the founder of the monastery of Abingdon. In the chronicles of that abbey he is represented as nephew of Cissa, the ealdorman of Wiltshire under Kentwin and Ceadwalha successively kings of the West Saxons. Cissa is called by William of Malmsbury (G. F. ed. Hamilton, 191, 354), father of king Ine; this, however, is not the case, being son of Ceard; and the relationship here asserted being part of a notion, common to the Malmsbury traditions, which was intended to make the family of Ine a nucleus of monastic sanctity. But this mistake as to the father of Ine need not invalidate the testimony of the Abingdon writers with respect to the relationship of Hean and Cissa. (Hist. Abingdon, ed. Stevenson, ii. 263.)

Ceslawtha, or Cilla, the foundress of Helenastow nunnery, is on the same authority said to have been Hean's sister. According to this tradition, which in this point again has something in common with the Malmsbury and Glastonbury legends, Abingdon (which was no doubt named from some ancient Saxon Abba who has left other traces of his occupation of the upland country (see Stevenson, Hist. Abingdon. vol. ii. pref. p. r.) had been the home of an Irish anchorite named Abbennus or Awen in the 5th century. (Chr. Abingdon. i. 2, 3; ii. 268.)

The name of Scevakesham was also ascribed to Abingdon before the foundation of the monastery by Hean. It was in the reign of Kentwin that the foundation was first contemplated: Hean about the year 675 obtained from Cissa, a place for his monastery, and devoted his own inheritance to the endowment. Under Ceadwalha the successor of Kentwin, the work which, according to the legend, had been begun upon the hill of Abbennus, and been stopped by miraculous agency, which every night threw down what had been built during the day, was removed to the plain by the Thames, where a furrow had been cut by supernatural means to mark the place for the foundation, and where a hermit of Cumnor had directed Hean to build. About this time Ciss died, and was buried first on the hill, then translated to the church on the plain. Hean here completed his work, and obtained charters for his monastery from Ceadwalha, and, after his death, from Ine, who had at first shown himself unfriendly, but was soon reconciled. He was made first abbot and ruled his monks until the reign of Ethelheard, Ine's successor, when he died, and was succeeded by Conan. (Chron. Abingdon. ii. 268-272.)

The chronicle gives a detailed description of Hean's monastic buildings. Unfortunately the whole story rests upon very untrustworthy authority, and accordingly the charters, which are added in the account, a portion of forgery over and above the internal evidence of spuriousness. Of these, however, the most important are the will of Hean (Kemble, C. D. 998; Chron. Abingdon. i. 13), in which as abbé he provides for the disposition of his property at Bradosfeld, Escedune and Earmundes, by his sister Cilla, with reversion to his monastery; this is confirmed by Ine and the bishop Daniel, and must be dated therefore after the year 705: a fragment of a charter of Ceadwalha (Chr. Abingdon. p. 8): a charter of Ine restoring to Hean 273 casates or hides of land granted to him and Cilla by king Cissa, which Kemble condemns as a clumsy forgery, but which, as far as its material portions go, is defended by Stevenson (ib. 9, Kemble, C. D. 46); another grant by Ine of some of the lands mentioned in Hean's will (Chr. Abingdon. i. 11; K. C. D. 45), which is rejected on account of the false date (A.D. 687), which may have been a late addition; and a charter by the same king to Hean and Cesso, confirming an earlier grant by Eodfrith, son of Iddi, of lands in Bradfield, Bestlesford and Streltech; this last, although rejected by Kemble, may be genuine. (Chr. Abingdon. i. 12; Kemble, C. D. 31.)

The main features of the tradition must have been current before the days of William of Malmsbury, who without, however, mentioning Hean, calls Cissa, the father of Ine, the founder. When in the reign of Eadred, St. Ethelwald settled a monastery at Abingdon, he found there the remains of a small monastery, possessing forty manse, and claiming a larger territory which was in the hands of the king (Alfric, Life of Ethelward, Chr. Abingdon. ii. 257; Welstan, v. Ethelw. ap. Mab. A.A. SS. O. S. B. saec. v. p. 500); the extent of the territory was thus attested by evidence of the age of Dunstan. But it must be feared that as Bede, the chronicles, Asser and Ethelward are silent as to the traditions, they were either invented or developed from the genuine portions of the charters, in the reign of Edgar. See besides the chronicles of Abingdon, edited by Mr. Stevenson, the extracts from the Abingdon copy of Peculiarities of Worcester, Ang. Soc. i. 183; Mon. Angl. i. 505-526; W. Malmsby. Gesta Pontificalium, lib. ii. § 88; Ralph de Diceto, ii. 211; Harpsfield, Hist. Angl. Ecol. p. 78.

HEANBALD (Gaimar, Estoriç, v. 2199, in M. H. B. 780), archbishop of York. [EANBALD II]

HEANFLET (Gaimar, Estoriç, v. 1196, in M. H. B. 779), daughter of Edwin king of Northumbria. [EANFLET (2)]

HEANFRID (Gaimar, Estoriç, v. 1258, in M. H. B. 780), king of Northumbria. [EANFRID]

HEARDBERHT, brother of Ethelward king of Mercia, c. a.d. 736. (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. 80, 83.) [C. H.]

HEARDRED (HEARDREAD, HEARDRED), the seventh bishop of Dunwich after the division of the East Anglian sees. (M. H. B. 618.) His name occurs in the act of Heathore at the council of Brentford in 781 (Kemble, C. D. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 439), and under the corrupt form Harchelus among the attestations of the acts of the added council of 787. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 461.) He is also in the charter granted by Ófrí to the gesith Oesht in the council of Æłcylith in 788 (K. C. D. 153), and in other documents dated at a similar assembly at the same place in 789. (K. C. D. 155, 156, 157.) The latter year seems to be the last of Heardred's pontificate, as his successor Aelfhaun [ALHUN] appears in 790. If these dates are correct, Heardred would be one of the bishops transferred from the province of Canterbury to that of Lichfield, supposing the account given by the later writers of the arrangement, and made in 787 to be trustworthy. [HUBERT.]
HEARDRED

HEARDRED (HEARDRED), bishop of Hexham. [EADRED (2).] [S.]

HEARED, a deacon of the diocese of Rochester, who attended the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 547.) [S.]

HEATHOBALD, a deacon of the diocese of Hereford, who attended the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

HEATHOBERT (HATHUBERT), the thirteenth bishop of London. (M. H. B. 617.) His name is attached to charters of 798 and 799. He attests a grant of Kenulf of Mercia, confirmed in synod in 798 apparently at Clovesho (Kemble, C. D. 175; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 514), and an act of Withenagemot at Tamworth (K. C. D. 1020) in 798, where his name appears as Headbert. There is likewise a document of the year 801, in which Heathobert appears as a witness. (K. C. D. 414, 418; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 531.) Such being the evidence of charters to Heathobert's data, it is satisfactory to find his death noted under the year 801 by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 672), and, as no intervening name occurs, he probably succeeded Eadbald, who left England in the year of Offa's death, 796. [EADBILD (3).] It is, however, to be observed, that in a remarkable charter, purporting to be granted by Offa to Canterbury in a council at London in 799, no name of a bishop of London is found. (K. C. D. 159; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 485, 486.) Simeon records that shortly after Heathobert's death great part of London was burnt. (M. H. B. 672.) [S.]

HEATHOLAC (HADULAC, HATHIELAC; ETELATUS, ANG. SAC. I. 404), the third bishop of Elmham after the division of the East Anglian sees (M. H. B. 618). He was bishop at the time Bede closed his history (H. E. v. 25), and must have attained that dignity after the year 716, in which his predecessor, Nothhelm, was living. (Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 300.) His successor, Ethelfrith, was consecrated by archbishop Nothhelm in or about 736. (ANG. SAC. I. 404.) [S.]

HEATHORED (1), 8th bishop of Worcester (M. H. B. 623). According to Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 545, 546) he succeeded bishop Tilhere in 781, and died in 798; and these dates are amply borne out by the evidence of charters, from which also we learn more of Heathored than we know of most of the contemporary bishops. In 781 we find him at the council of Brentford, making an agreement with Offa by which the monastery of Worcester resigned to the king its rights at Bath, on condition of retaining lands at Stratford, Sture in Usmere, Bredon, and Hontume. (Kemble, C. D. 149; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 438, 439.) The same year he attests some questionable charters of Offa (K. C. D. 141, 142), and in 785, the fabricated grant of that king to Westminster. (F. C. 149; MON. ANGL. I. 201.) In 787, under the name "Adoredus," he appears at the legislative council. (Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 401.) In 789 Heathored was engaged in litigation with Wulfheard, the son of Cosa, touching the inheritance of Hemehe. (Kemble, C. D. 154; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 465; MON. ANGL. I. 587.) This cause was tried in the council of Acre in that year, and it was then decided that Wulfheard should retain the property for life; the matter was again brought forward after Heathored's death in the council of Clovesho in 805. (K. C. D. 183.) The division of the province of Canterbury in 787 or 788 would have the effect of making Heathored's see subject to Lichfield. His name, however, appears in the list of bishops who attended with Ethelheard at London in 795 (K. C. D. 159; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 485, 486). In 794 at a council at Clovesho, attended by both archbishops, he recovered an estate at Ause from Byna, a "guesth" of Offa (K. C. D. 184). He continues to attest Mercian charters of Offa and Egfrith, and appears as signing a grant of Kenulf to the ealdorman Oswulf in the synod of 798. (K. C. D. 175.) Besides occurring in genuine charters his name is found in the spurious grants of Offa to St. Alban's (K. C. D. 161, 162) and Westminster (K. C. D. 365, 366). His last act of importance is as charter of Kenulf to Christ Church, Canterbury, of the year 799. (Kemble, C. D. 1020.) If this charter is genuine, the date given by Florence for Heathored's death will require the common rectification by two years, and belong to the year 800. (Thomas, Suryce of Worcesters, pp. 19-22; Bemig, Ciuatuory of Worcesters, ed. Hearne, passim; ANG. SAC. I. 471.) [S.]

HEATHORED (2), bishop of Lindsey, properly the 13th in succession, but omitted in the ancient list (M. H. B. 620), and inserted among the bishops of Whithern (Bod.). Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 547, 548) gives the date of his promotion to Lindsey as 619, and dates his death in 629; in the margin of the MS of Simeon of Durham, he is dated, by mistake, 611 (ib. p. 685). The latter author, in his History of the Church of Durham, recognizes Heathored as bishop of Lindsey, assigning him an episcopate of nine years between Egbert and Egred (LIB. II. c. 5; AP. TWYDEN, p. 13), which probably signifies from A.D. 821 to 830, as in the latter year the accession of Egred is noted (M. H. B. 673). Of Heathored as bishop of Whithern nothing is known, but he may have taken charge of that diocese after the death of Badwulf. [S.]

HEATHORED (3), a priest of the diocese of Sinderacre, who attests the act of Clovesho in 803. (K. C. D. 1024; Haddon and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

HEATHORED (4) (HETHERED), an undated abbot of Malmsbury, whose name occurs twelfth in the list in the Cotton MS, Vitellius, A. 10. (Birch, ABOBTS OF MALMSBURY, p. 7.) [S.]

HEBDOMAS. All the early Gnostics of whose opinions Irenaeus gives an account, in a section (I. 23 sqq.) probably translated in England by a writer, agree in the doctrine that the world was made by the instrumentality of angels. The brief account given of the teaching of the first two in the list, Simon and Menander, does not state whether or not they defined the number of these angels; but it is expressly told of the third, Saturninus (ca. 24), that he counted them as seven. At the end of the first book of Irenaeus is a section to all appearance derived from a source different from that just referred to. He here (c. 29) relates the opinions of heretics to whom he himself gives no title, but whom his copist Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 14) calls Ophites. We have noted (Vol. I. pp. 382, 426) coincidences between this chapter and the former chapter on Saturninus, which have led us to the conclusion that in both chapters the doctrines of the same school are described. The former chapter might be regarded as an abstract derived from a previous treatise on heresies; the fuller details of the latter might have been obtained by Irenaeus himself from a work of the school written when the system had received some development. In any case the Ophite teaching may be used to illustrate that of Saturninus, and to throw some light upon his doctrine than with any other. It would have been natural to think that the number of seven angels was suggested to Saturninus by astronomical considerations; and this supposition is verified by the statement in the later chapter (c. 30, p. 111) that the holy Hebdomas are the seven stars called planets. In fact, the sphere of the seven stars, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the Sun, Venus, Mercury, and the Moon, were supposed to be presided over by a different angel. Their names are differently given; Irenaeus (c. 30) giving them, Ialdaboth, the chief, Isao, Sabboth, Adonaeus, Eloeeus, Oreus, and Astaphes. With this closely agrees Origen, who, writing of the Ophites (Adv. Cels. vi. 31, 32), gives the names Ialdabooth, Isao, Sabboth, Adonueus, Astaphueus, Elooeus, Horaeus. Epiphanius (Haer. 26, p. 91), relating the opinions of what was clearly a branch of the same school, places in the highest heaven Ialdaboth or, according to others, Sabboth; in the next, Eliinaeus according to one version, Ialdaboth according to the other; in the next Adonaeus and Eloaeus; beneath these Dades, Seth, and Sochua; lowest of all Isao. It was thought that each of the Jewish prophets was sent by a different angel to announce some special secret that the glory that prophet was to declare. Thus (Ireneus, i. 30, 109) the first angel sent Moses, Joshua, Amos, and Habakkuk; the second Samuel, Nathan, Jonath, and Micah; the third Elijah, Joel, and Zechariah; the fourth Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and Daniel; the fifth Tobit and Haggait; the sixth Micah (q. m. Malachi?) and Nahum; the seventh Ezra and Zephaniah. The ancient astrologers thought that seven above the seven planetary spheres was an eighth, the sphere of the fixed stars (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 25, xxxv. p. 638; see also his quotation, v. 11, p. 692, of a mention of the fifth heaven in apocryphal writings ascribed to Zephaniah). In the eighth sphere, these Gnostics taught, dwelt the mother to whom all these angels owed their origin, Sophia or Pandora. According to the version of Irenaeus, Barbelo according to that of Epiphanius. In the language of these sects the word hebdomad not only denotes the seven angels, but is also a name of place, denoting the heavenly regions over which the seven archons presided; while Ogdoad denotes the supercelestial regions which lay above their control.

Again, beside the higher hebdomad of the seven angels, the Ophite system told of a lower hebdomad. After the serpent in punishment for having taught our first parents to transgress the commands of Ialdaboth was cast down into this lower world, he begat himself six sons, who, with him himself form a hebdomad, the counterpart of that of which his father Ialdaboth is chief. These are the seven demons, the scene of whose activity is the lower earth, not the heavens; and who delight in injuring the human race on whose account their father had been cast down. Origen (Adv. Cels. 30) gives their names and forms from an Ophite diagram; Michael in form as a lion, Suriel as an ox, Raphael as a dragon, Gabriel as an eagle, Thuthabathoth as a bear, Erathanoth as a dog, Onoeel or Tartharaoth as an ass.

It does not appear that the Oriental philosophy, or the earliest Gnostic systems, recognized any place higher than the eighth sphere; and it is here that the account of Epiphanius (Haer. 26, p. 91) dwelt Barbelo the mother of all. But Grecian philosophy came to teach that above the sensible world there lay a still higher, and Clem. Alex. (I. c.) speaks of the eighth sphere as lying nearest τῇ νεκτῷ κόσμῳ. Accordingly, those Gnostic systems which are tinctured by Grecian philosophy, while leaving untouched the doctrine of seven or eight material spheres, develop in various ways the theory of the region above them. In the system of Basilides, as reported by Hippolytus (vii. 20 sqq.), Ogdoad and Hebdomad are merely names of place. In that system the universe is divided into the Kosmos and the hypercosmical region. At the highest point of the Kosmos presides the great Archon, ruling over the Ogdoad, or otherwise region, which is described as reaching down to the moon. Beneath the Ogdoad is the Hebdomad presided over by its own Archon. In one place (p. 238) the names Ogdoad and Hebdomad seem to be given to the archons themselves. In any case the names shew marks of having been derived from a previous system, for the system of Basilides itself gives no account of the numbers seven or eight; and the number of heavens is not mentioned. In Iren. i. 24, 25, the number is 365 being counted. In the latest form of Basilidianism, that contained in P Tatia Sophia, the doctrine of the higher regions receives such enormous development that the seven planetary spheres are thought of as contemptibly low; and laldaboth, once their ruler, in this book sinks to a demon.

In the system of Valentinus again the names Ogdoad and Hebdomad occur in the same signification. Above this lower world are the seven heavens, where dwells their maker the Demiurge himself also, on that account, called Hebdomas (Iren. i. v. p. 24). Of those seven heavens Marcus taught in more detail (Iren. i. xiv. 7, p. 72). Above these heavens is the Ogdoad, also called ἡ μεθεοτότης, and Jerusalem above, the abode of Achamoth, who, some thought, was the mother of Irenaeus, Barbelo according to that of Epiphanius. In the language of these sects the word hebdomad not only denotes the seven angels, but is also a name of place, denoting the heavenly regions over which the seven archons presided; while Ogdoad denotes the supercelestial regions which lay above their control.
HEBREW LEARNING

different sense in the system of Valentinus himself, whose Ogdoad within the Pleroma was probably intended to answer to the Ogdoad outside. Irenaeus (ii. 107) argues from what is told of Paul's ascent to the third heaven against the low place assigned to the heavens in the Valentinian scheme.

The word Hebdomad occurs also in the Clementine Homilies, but its use there is quite unconnected with the teaching hitherto described. The mystery of the Hebdomad there unfolded (Hom. iv. 10) is an independent position of the six days' work of creation, and the seventh day's rest; illustrated by the six directions, into which infinite space extends, viz. up, down, right, left, backward, forward, together with the central point considered as making a seventh.

The mysteries of the number seven are treated of by Clem. Alex. (Strom. vi. 18), and in the source whence he borrowed (Philo, de Op. Mundi. and Leg. Allegor., where the theme is enlarged on, χαίρε ἡ φωνή ἡ βούλανσα). See also Hippol. Ref. iv. 51; Routh, Rel. Sac. i. 416. On the Jewish theory of seven heavens, see ISRAEL, ASCENSION OF.

[O. S.]

HEBREW LEARNING AMONG THE FATHERS. Judging from a priori grounds it would not be unreasonable to expect that we should find evidence in the works of the earliest Christian writers of some acquaintance with the Old Testament Scriptures in their original tongue. The facts that Christianity has its roots firmly planted in Judaism,—that the writers of the New Testament uniformly appeal to the words of Moses and of the prophets,—that the new law went forth from Jerusalem,—and that its first preachers and converts were Jews,—naturally suggest the probability that we should find in the writings of the early fathers indications of their habitual use of the Old Testament Scriptures in the original tongue. It is well known to every ecclesiastical student that the fathers use very little, but very little labour has been hitherto bestowed (especially in this country) upon any attempt to ascertain the extent to which the study of Hebrew was cultivated within the first few centuries of the existence of the Christian church.

It is not difficult to trace the chief causes of the neglect of this study. Jerusalem soon ceased to be the centre from which the new faith was propagated, and Judaism soon ceased to supply its ablest expositors and apologists. Moreover, whilst the use which was made of the LXX version by the writers of the New Testament sufficed to establish its authority amongst Christians, the prevailing use of the Greek language accounts for the general adoption of that version, both for the instruction of converts and for the contention of adversaries. And further, whilst the bitter animosity which existed on the part of the Jews towards Christianity may have so far reacted upon Christians as to create within them a prejudice against the Hebrew language, there existed a strong reluctance, and in some places a strict prohibition against the imparting of a knowledge of Hebrew by Jews to those whom they regarded as enemies alike to their country and to their religion.

These considerations may serve in some measure to account both for the prevalent neglect of the Hebrew language, and also, to a certain extent, for the disposition on the part of those who possessed some acquaintance with it to restrict their statements on the authority of Jews rather than to advance them on their own responsibility. In confirmation of this view the following extract may be adduced from the Apologia adversus Rufinum of St. Jerome. "Iose Origines et Clementis et Eusebios atque alii complures, quando de Scripturis aliquis disputant, et volunt apparebunt quid dicant, sic solent scribere: Referat mihi Hebraeus, et audiri ab Hebraeo, et Hebraeorum ista sententia est. Certe etiam Origines patriarcharum Huilium, qui temporibus ejus fuit, nominat, et tristesimum tomum in Esaiam, in cujus fine dedisserit Vasi tibi ... illius expositione conclusit" (tom. iii. p. 91, Basil. 1516).

JUSTIN MARTYR.—The controversy of Justin with Trypho deserves notice in connexion with this subject on several grounds. Justin Martyr was a native of Samaria. He was born at Flavia Neapolis, a town which occupied the place of Sichem, the old capital of Samaria, and which was colonized with Greeks by the emperor Vespasian. He dialogues with Trypho, and esteems one of the most learned Jews of his time, was held at Ephesus about the year a.d. 148. We have here the case of one who, though born and brought up in the land of Palestine, was not only ignorant of the vernacular language of that country at the time of his conversion to Christianity, but who appears to have been insensible of the great disadvantage under which, by reason of this ignorance, he engaged in controversy with a Jew; and who, as far as we know, never subsequently applied himself to the study of those Scriptures in their original tongue from which the arguments which he urges against Trypho are mainly derived.

The indications which Justin gives of his entire ignorance of the Greek version (or versions) of the Old Testament, and of his ignorance of a Hebrew text, are of a very marked and conclusive character. The following will suffice by way of illustration.

(1) In c. 49 Justin's argument based upon Ex. xxvii. 16, "A hand upon the throne (or, as some read, 'upon the banner') of the Lord," is derived from the LXX, who appear to have had a reading entirely different from the present Hebrew text, and one which is unsupported by the other versions, viz. ἐν χειρὶ αὐτοῦ, "with a hidden hand."

(2) Although Justin's quotation, in c. 50, from Is. xxxix. 8 to xi. 18, presents several verbal variations from the LXX, he agrees with the LXX and with the Vulgate, and differs not only from the Hebrew, but also from the other Greek versions, in adopting the masculine instead of the feminine gender in ver. 9, δὲ ἐγγενεῖς ἦσαν, "thou that bringest good tidings."

(3) In c. 113, Justin prefers it as an accusation against the Jews that, whilst taking no account of the change of Oshea into Joshua, they made it a theological question why ας was added to the name of Abraham (Ἀβραάμ for ᾼβραάμ) and a second ς inserted in that of Sarah (Σαρά for Σάρα). It is difficult to imagine that this "vulgar mistake of the Greeks," as it is described by bishop Pearson,* could have been made by any one who knew that the real change was the addition of the letter Λ (Λ) in the name of Abraham (i.e. Abraham for Abram), and the change of Λ(Ξ) into Λ (Λ) in that of Sarah (i.e. Sarah for Sareh). It is remarkable, however, that Trypho who is described by Eusebius (Hist. iv. c. 18) as “the most distinguished of the Hebrews of his time,” instead of insisting upon the production of direct evidence of so grave an accusation, contented himself with remarking that “the thing appears incredible.” Upon the whole it seems not unreasonable to conclude that neither Justin nor Trypho was able to refer to the Hebrew text.

Whist, however, Justin shews his entire ignorance of the Hebrew language, he gives evidence of some familiarity with the Jewish traditional interpretation of many passages of the Old Testament. Thus, e.g., in his Dialogue with Trypho (c. xx.), he adopts the same view of the meaning of Genesis xxvi. 29, which is found in the Midrash on Ps. cxlvi. 7, viz. that whereas only the flesh of some animals was allowed as food by the Mosaic laws, the flesh of all animals, without restriction, was granted to Noah and to his sons. In c. xxi. of the Dialogue Justin refers to the Jewish interpretation of Daniel’s “time,” 71 (xii. 25), as denoting a hundred years. Again, in c. xi. of the same Dialogue Justin, by the use of the word γίνομαι, as applied to the two goats, of which one was killed and the other sent into the wilderness on the day of Atonement, shews his acquaintance with the in-junctions of the Mishnah (treatise Yomah) respecting the exact resemblance of the two goats, on which, indeed, though nowhere prescribed in the law of Moses, it makes the validity of the enjoined rites to depend. In c. xxii. of the Dialogue he shews his acquaintance with the Jewish traditional interpretation of Gen. xxi. 15, where mention is made of female camels only, not males, and of the number of measures of fine flour, and of oil in the appointed offerings. And once more, in c. xxiii., Justin refers to the interpretation of Deut. viii. 4, which appears to have been more generally received by his Jewish contemporaries, viz. that the clothing of the children of the Israelites, during their wanderings in the wilderness, increased in size in proportion to the growth of the wearers. (Cf. Justinus Martyr and die Agada, von Dr. Alex. Heinrich Goldfahn, Breslau.)

TERTULLIAN, QUANTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENS, the earliest of the Latin fathers of the church. The precise date of his birth is uncertain. It was probably between A.D. 145 and A.D. 150. There are passages in his writings which lead to the inference that he was brought up as a heathen, but Jerome, in his Catalogus Scriptrorum Ecclesiasticorum, gives no information on this point. There can be little doubt (notwithstanding the adhesion of some Roman writers) that, although a married man, Tertullian was a presbyter, either of the church of Rome, or of

---

* Note on Art. II. p. 113, Qz. 1977.

† It is obvious, however, that in some places either the text which Justin used differed from any which is now known, or that Justin did not strictly adhere to it. Thus, in the quotation from Is. lv. which occurs in c. 13, we observe that whereas the LXX omit two negatives which are found in the Hebrew in ver. 4, and insert two negatives which are not found in the Hebrew in ver. 6, Justin follows the Greek text in the former case and the Hebrew text in the latter. We may observe also that in the quotation in c. xiii. from Is. lii. 12, where the version of the LXX is ψεύδοται γὰρ ψεύδοτας ἡμῖν, Justin, in accordance with the Hebrew, which has δὲ γὰρ ἡγήσασθαι, i.e. before your face, reads ψεύδοται γὰρ ψεύδοτας ἡμῖν. Justin refers particularly to Is. vii. where he says (cf. c. 11 and c. 84) that the Jews presumed to corrupt the translation made by the LXX and to substitute γίνομαι for ἔγινομαι.
that of Carthage. He appears to have been acquainted with all those branches of science and of literature which were studied in his time; and he sometimes speaks, as bishop Kaye has observed in his Ecclesiastical History of the Second and Third Centuries, illustrated from the writings of Tertullian (p. 66, foot-note, 1839), as if he was acquainted with Hebrew. Thus, e.g., in his Five Books against Marcion (iv. 39), we find him giving the correct meaning of the name Israel, viz. one who peregrini with God (in martyr's name cum Deo praestans, i.e. pretatio Israelis). This is the more remarkable when we remember that Jerome, in his treatise on proper names, as well as Origen, adopts the interpretation of the name then commonly received, viz. one seeing God, and that the former afterwards assigned as his reason for so doing the names of great weight by which that interpretation was supported (see under Jerome in this article). Again, in his work Against Praxea (c. 5), Tertullian says, "There are some who allege that even Genesis opens thus in Hebrew,—"In the beginning God made for Himself a Son" ("in principio Deus fecit sibi filium"), on which statement Tertullian observes, "Hoc ut firmum non sit, alia me arguments dedecundam est in omne Genesim in Hebraico. The remark of Jerome refers to these words of Tertullian, and having first observed that the Hebrew is יִהְיֶה וּלְךָ and not יִהְיֶה וּלָךָ, which latter reading would mean that God created the heaven and the earth by the Son, Jerome remarks that the reference to Christ must be understood rather according to the sense than according to the letter. The remarks of Tertullian do not appear to justify the inference that he rejected the statement to which he refers from a personal examination of the original. It is quite possible that the evidence of the version or versions which he used may have satisfied him of its incorrectness.

In his treatise Against Marcion (iii. 22) Tertullian quotes Ezekiel ix. 4 thus, "Fertranii in medio portae, in media Hierusalem, et da signum, et proficiscant hujus viri vnum." He goes on to observe that the Greek letter Τυα and the Roman letter T have the form of the cross, but he does not appear to have been aware that in the old characters which Jerome says the Samaritans used in his time, the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet has the form of the cross. Tertullian quotes the passage from Ezekiel again at greater length in his treatise Ad. Judaeos (c. 11), but in this place the MS. which Oehler usually follows omits the word Tυα after signum. Now insomuch as the Greek version of the LXX has simply σημειον both in v. 4 and in v. 6, in both of which the Hebrew has the word הָיָה, it is possible that Tertullian may have derived his version from the original Hebrew; on the other hand it seems more probable that the old Latin version or versions, which are thought to have existed in the time of Tertullian, had the Tυα as the present Vulgate has it.

It may be observed here that the Tυα is found in the version of the Theodotion, according to Origen and Jerome, and also in the versions of Aquila according to Origen; but independently of the question whether these versions, especially that of Theodotion, could have been known to Tertullian, there appears no evidence of his use of them.

In his treatise Adversus Judaeos (c. 9), Tertullian refers to the meaning of the word Ιησοῦς in the Hebrew: "Soros enim Hebraicus, quod est Ιησοῦς, id est nobiscum Deus, suae gentis est." These words, however, like those to which reference has already been made, do not warrant the inference that Tertullian was capable of referring to the Hebrew text; and the wide deviation of his quotations from it, even when arguing against the Jews, affords presumptive evidence that he was unable to do so. Amongst many incidental indications that such was the case reference may be made to the following: (1) In common with many of the early Christian writers, Tertullian quotes the words "from the tree" (indisputably transferred it may be, in the first instance, from Acts xiii. 29 to Ps. cxvi.), as if they occurred in Ps. cxvi. 10 (Ado. Jud. c. x). (2) When quoting Is. xiv. 1, Tertullian either read Κυρίῳ for Κύριος or quotes from some old Latin version which was based upon that reading: "Sic dixit Dominus Deus Chris tus, qui erat Deus omnis gentium et deo omnium (i.e. quod est oblatum, the reading is obvious to any one who refers to the LXX, but such a rendering would have been impossible if reference had been made to the Hebrew, which has Σωτήρ, "to Cyrus." (3) Tertullian’s quotation from Micah v. i. (δ. c. xiii.) agrees more closely with the Greek of St. Matthew ii. 3–6, than with the Hebrew or the LXX. (4) Tertullian’s rendering of Ps. xxii. 17 is "exterminaverunt meus mea et pedes." (5) Tertullian follows the LXX in his version of Jer. xvii. 9, and c. xiv. "homo est et quis cognoscet illum," where the Hebrew word שָׁכֵן which is taken in the Vulg. and in the LXX as an adjective, or past participle from שָׁכֵן to be sicken, is read by the LXX as the Aramaic סָכַי, or the Hebrew סָכַי, סָכַי. The above instances of Tertullian’s mode of quotation, which it would be useless to multiply, appear to prove the conclusion that there is no sufficient evidence of Tertullian’s knowledge of Hebrew, and that when his quotations are not made from memory, “Tertullian,” as bishop Kaye has observed, “in quoting the Old Testament, appears either himself to have translated from the Greek, or to have used a Latin version made from the Greek, not from the Hebrew” (Eccles. Hist. of the Second Century, p. 310).

IRENAEUS.—Very little is known of the early history of Irenaeus. He was probably born in Syria, and his great work, Against Heresies, appears to have been written towards the close of the 2nd century, during the episcopate of Eleutherus, who was succeeded as bishop of Rome about the year a.d. 190. This work was composed in Greek, but the greater portion of the original has been lost, and the portion which remains has been preserved in quotations made by different authors. An ancient Latin translation, however, has been preserved. Irenaeus believed in the miraculous composition, and consequently in the inspiration, of the Septuagint versions which he commonly follows, although, in common with other early writers, his quotations are frequently made from memory. He was aware of the existence of the versions of Aquila and Theodotion, and refers to their incorrect translation of Is. vii. 14 (iii. 21, 1).

In his reference to the appearance of the Son of man in Dan. vii. 13 in the LXX translation, he seems to allude to the commonly accepted meaning of the name Jesus as a man seeing God. In the same chapter he says that our Lord was foretold by Moses, in a figurative manner, "by the name given to the passerover," in reference, apparently (to Tertullian and other early writers), to the etymology which connects πάσχα (Heb. פֵּ֣שָׁ֔א) with πάσχω, to suffer. In his quotation from Ps. xi. 7 (iv. 17), if the old Latin translation may be trusted, Ireneaus follows the version of the Vulgate "aures autem perfecisti mihi"; which, if we may read perfestis for perfecisti, agrees with the Hebrew, whilst the LXX read σάμα τὸ κατηργήσας μου. But whilst this correspondence affords no evidence of the ability of Ireneaus to consult the original Hebrew, there is strong presumptive evidence to the contrary, as, e.g., in iv. 18, where he not only adopts the Septuagint version of Gen. iv. 7, but dwells with particular emphasis upon the word ἁρκάσαρος, which is found in some copies of the LXX, but which has no warrant whatsoever in the original Hebrew. The quotation from Dan. xii. 3 gives rise to an interesting inquiry respecting the Greek version then in use in the churches. The words of Ireneaus, as they are found in the Latin, are "a multis justis," which correspond with the version of Theodotion ἄνω τῶν δικαίων τῶν πολλῶν, but which accord neither with the Hebrew (unless the οὗ of the Hiphil particle בְּמַ֣מְתָּם were read as the preposition ב (mīn, from), and the absolute form of the word were read in place of the construction), nor with the Greek of the LXX as it is found in the edition of Daniel, published at Rome in 1772. It has been thought remarkable that Ireneaus should have seen the version of his contemporary Theodotion. It is still more remarkable that one holding the view which Ireneaus did of the authority of the LXX should have followed any other. Upon the whole there does not appear any ground for the supposition that Ireneaus made use of the Old Testament Scriptures in their original language.

THEOPHILUS.—Theophas is said by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 20) to have been the sixth bishop of Antioch in Syria, and to have been appointed to that bishopric in the eighth year of Marcus Aurelius, that is A.D. 185.

The following remarks refer to the three books which he addressed to his friend Autolycus.

(1) In book i. c. 12, Theophas says "that which among the Hebrews is called the Sabbath is when translated into Greek ἑβδομάς." It is obvious that Theophas has here fallen into the error of supposing that the word Sabbath is connected with some form of the numeral πλ, sheba, seven, rather than with the verb πλασμα, skodath, which denotes rest, and from which the noun πλ, skodath, is derived.

(2) In book i. c. 15, Theophas follows the LXX version of Gen. ii. 2, where the sixth day is substituted for the seventh.

(3) In book i. c. 24, Theophas observes rightly that in Hebrew the word Eden (ܐܝܕܢ) signifies delight. This information, however, he may reasonably be supposed to have derived from others, as also the interpretation which he gives in book iii. c. 19, respecting the meaning of the name Noah, which he says in Hebrew signifies rest.

(4) In book ii. c. 10, Theophas writes thus: "First he named the 'beginning' and 'creation,' then he thus introduced God." This observation may imply that the writer was aware of the order observed in the Hebrew קָדָשָׁא יִשְׁרָאֵל. It is not conclusive proof, however, that such was the case, inasmuch as the order of the Greek is the same as that of the Hebrew.

(5) In book ii. c. 21, Theophas follows the LXX version of Gen. iii. 15, in reading σατανάς instead of σατινα. Upon the whole there seems no evidence that Theophas was acquainted with Hebrew.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.—Clement of Alexandria was born about A.D. 150-160, but the place of his birth is uncertain, and his early history is involved in obscurity. Eusebius says that he became the scholar of Pantaenus (Eclog. Hist. book v. c. 11), who was the chief of the catechetical school at Alexandria, and that Origen was numbered amongst his scholars (ib. book vi. c. 8). He withdrew from Alexandria at the time of the persecution under Severus, A.D. 202-203, and it is thought that he visited Syria.

His quotations, both from the Old and New Testaments, appear to have been commonly made from memory, but it is evident that he used the version of the LXX, as, indeed, it would have been reasonable to anticipate from his residence at Alexandria. It will suffice, in proof of this statement, to refer to the following instances from the Exhortation to the Hebrews, in the early chapters of which the citations from Scripture are not numerous.

(1) "For it was before the morning star," which is evidently taken from Ps. cx. 3, where the LXX read χὶς ῥωσάμων ἐξενηπνεύθη αὐτῷ (c. 1).

(2) In his quotation from Is. i. 1, although evidently made from memory, Clement follows the LXX in the latter part of the verse verbally (c. 1).

(3) In c. iv. Clement quotes Ps. xxxiii. 6 and Ps. viii. 4, almost verbatim from the LXX.

(4) In c. vi. Clement quotes Deut. xv. 13 almost verbatim from the LXX.

In the eighth chapter the quotations from the Prophets are numerous, and they adhere for the most part very closely to the version of the LXX, whilst, at the same time, the blending of different quotations, and the ascription of the words of Amos to Hosea, shew that Clement was quoting, for the most part, from memory. Amongst other proofs that Clement did not refer to the

---

The reading of the LXX in the Roman edition is καὶ οἱ καταχώρισται τούτος λόγος μου, κινούμενος;
HEBREW LEARNING

Hebrew, the citation in this chapter from Ps. ii. 12, Ἀληθείας τὰς σκότης, may be added, as also that in c. vi. 17, where instead of "their righteousness is of (or from) Me," the LXX read καὶ ἀληθείαν Ἰσραήλ μοι δόθησαν.

The following instances shew that, although brought into contact with at least one, if not more, of the Hebrew race (Miscellanea, book i. c. 1), Clement did not possess any knowledge of the Hebrew language.

(1) In the epigramma (i. c. 7) he says that Jesus was called Israel "because he saw God the Lord," with evident allusion to the prevalent etymology of the word נָעַם, Israel, as if derived from שָׁם, a man, מִן, he saw, and ב, God. He refers to the same etymology in c. 9 of the same book, where he says "Israel means he that sees God." And again in the Miscellanea (book i. c. 5), he says that he who is "really endowed with the power of seeing is called Israel."

(2) In the place last quoted, Clement adopts Philo's etymology of the word Isaac as meaning self-taught; of Jacob as meaning exerciser; and of Joseph denoting patience.

(3) In book i. c. 21 of the Stromateis, Clement represents the prophet Issias as the son of the prophet Amos, not being aware that the name of the father of Issias was Amos, whilst the name of the prophet was Amos, Amos.

(4) In the same chapter he identifies מְלָל, Jehoakim, with מְלָל, Jehoash, and represents the latter as the namesake of the former.

(5) In the Stromateis (book v. c. 5) Clement explains the word כָּרְבֻּן as meaning much knowledge; and the word מָבָדָת (which not being aware, as it should seem, of the distinction between the Hebrew מָבָדָת and the Chaldaic מָבָדָת, or מָבָדָת, he says is derived from the Hebrew word מָבָדָת, as signifying לֵאָבָד מָבָדָת תְּפָנָא.

It would be superfluous to adduce further evidence in support of the position that Clement was altogether ignorant of the Hebrew language.

ORIGEN.—Origen, who was born about the year A.D. 185, was remarkable in his early youth for his acquaintance with Holy Scripture, and his anxiety to attain to its inner meaning. His father Leonidas fell a victim to the persecution of the Christians which broke out at the beginning of the 3rd century. Whilst still a layman and very young, Origen was appointed by Demetrius, the bishop of Alexandria, as the successor of Clement in the catechetical school of that city; and from this time he devoted his energies to the investigation and elucidation of the Scriptures. With a view to accomplish these objects more thoroughly, he is said to have engaged upon the study of the Hebrew language—an undertaking which, as is implied in the terms in which it is mentioned by Eusebius and by Jerome (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi. c. 16; Hieron. CataI. Script. Eccles.; and Ep. ad Paulum super Obita Blesilae) was almost unknown in those times. Origen diligently pursued his biblical researches for some years in Palestine, whither he repaired for safety during the persecution which was then raised against the Christians in Alexandria on the occasion of the visit of the emperor Carus in the year A.D. 216; and his studies were renewed at a later period of his life with fresh vigour both at Caesarea in Palestine and at Cassareon in Cappadocia, after he had been degraded by the Arian bishops from the order of the priesthood into which he had been admitted by Theocletus, bishop of Cassareon. It was at Caesarea in Cappadocia that Origen appears to have come into possession of some of the MSS. which had formerly belonged to Symmachus, the Ebonite translator of the Old Testament, but it is a matter of some uncertainty at what time he commenced his magnum opus, the Hexapla, or how many years were occupied in its completion. The work itself may be briefly described as follows. It consisted of six columns, whence was derived the name of Hexapla. The first of these contained the Hebrew text in Hebrew characters; the second, the Hebrew text in Greek characters; the third, the text of Aquila, probably, as being the most literal version of the Hebrew; the fourth, that of Symmachus; the fifth, the Septuagint version; and the sixth, that of Theodotion. Two other anonymous versions called the fifth and the sixth, the extent of which is uncertain, were added to this work, and hence its name of Octapla; whilst, on the other hand, the four Greek versions already mentioned constituted the Tetrapla, to which reference is made by Eusebius as a separate work.1

The critical value of this work, as it proceeded from the pen of Origen, consisted in the emendation of the Greek text of the Septuagint by the aid of the other versions. This was effected in the following manner. When Origen observed any omission in the text of the Septuagint, he supplied it, marking the place with an asterisk, and adding the initial letter of the translator from whose version the omission was supplied. When he observed any redundancy in the text of the Septuagint, he marked it by prefixing to it an obelus. He added two points (,) in order to mark how far either an insertion or an omission extended. He also made use of some other signs by which appears to have been to show the extent of the coincidences between the version of the LXX and that of Theodotion, though epithet gives a different and fanciful interpretation of them based upon the fabulous account of the composition of the Septuagint which was current in his time. It is reasonable to suppose that the extreme jealousy which the Jews displayed towards the Christians, in regard to the acquisition of the Hebrew language in the time of Jerome was equally strong, and perhaps even stronger, in the time of Origen. His writings, however, afford evidence that he did not fail to avail himself of such opportunities as were afforded him of obtaining assistance from Jewish sources, as—e. g., when he observes, in regard to the dimensions of the ark (in Gen. Haei. ii. 2), that he had obtained

1 Such is the account of Epiphanius (De Mss. Script. Funderis), but others make mention of three anonymous Greek versions.

1 The term is probably used by Eusebius in a different sense from that in which it is used by Origen himself. The latter appears to have used it simply as descriptive of the four Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion. Cf. Sozomen in General, p. 136.
HEBREW LEARNING

information on that subject from one of those who were held in repute among the Hebrews. Again, in his commentary on Psal. iii. 7, in reference to the insertion of the word μηδίνειον by the LXX, and the omission of any equivalent for בָּלַע, lesi, cheek-bone, Origen observes that certain Jews said that the ancient copies differed from those which were then received; whilst his references to one of their number, whom he describes as δρόπασοι, are frequent; but if we may judge from this Jew's interpretation of 1 Kings ii. 6, which he appears to have read without the word πυξίδα, lo, not, the information which Origen derived from these sources, if correctly represented, appears to have been of very unequal value.

Although Origen acquired a high reputation as a scholar amongst his own contemporaries, and was held in equally high estimation by later writers, especially by Jerome, it needs but a slight acquaintance with his works to perceive that his Hebrew scholarship was rather of a theoretical than of a critical character; and that he was indebted for the criticisms which he introduced into his writings rather to the information of others than to any original research. This conclusion appears to be justified by the following considerations:—

1. The language employed by Origen when he had occasion to refer to persons who were conversant with the Hebrew language favours the inference that he did not reckon himself amongst that number. Thus e.g. if we may rely on the Latin version of the Fourthteenth Homily on the book of Numbers, Origen says that the name of God is said to be differently written in Hebrew when the true God is denoted, and when a false god is intended; that when the tetragrammaton is found the reference is undoubtedly to the true God, but that in other places the reference is uncertain. He then proceeds to comment thus upon Numbers xxi. 12:—"Alium ergo, qui hēbraicas litteras legunt, in hoc loco Deus, non sub sigmo tetragrammati esse positum, de quo qui prolekt, requirat" (tom. vi. p. 393; Wicburgi, 1753).

We meet with a similar passage in Origen's answer to Celsus (p. 27, cont. 1077), in which he alleges that the word מְלֶאכָּה, a servant, occurs in Deut. xxi. 23, Διακονος, in which place, and indeed throughout the whole of the Pentateuch, if we except Gen. xiv. 43, and Ex. ii. 8, unless the copies extant in the time of Origen differed from the present Masoretic text, the word is not found, and consequently, Origen's informers must have misled him. It cannot but excite surprise in any case that in the interpretation of so important a passage as Isa. vii. 14, Origen should not have referred to Deut. xxi. 23 for himself, rather than have relied on the information of others. It is important to add that מְלֶאכָה does not appear to have been found in the text of Deut. xxii. 23 in the time of Jerome, who, in his commentary on Isa. vii. 14, observes, in reference to this passage, "Sub puellae et adolescentiae nomine virgo intelligentia."

It can hardly be supposed that in thus writing upon a passage, which, as he informs us, he had carefully examined, Origen would have failed to refer to the Hebrew text, had he been accustomed so to do. It is equally difficult, on the supposition that he did consult the Hebrew text, to account for the language which he here employs, if his words were correctly represented in the Latin version which is now extant.

Another illustration of Origen's neglect, or inability to consult the Hebrew text, occurs in the same treatise (i. 55), where he appeals, in support of the Messianic reference of Isaiah liii., to the LXX rendering of v. 8, where they read מָלֵאךְ, to death, instead of מִלֶּאךְ upon Him, or upon them.

Again, in his Twelfth Homily on Genesis, when explaining the supposed etymology of the name Esaü, he acknowledges that his information was borrowed from others: "Ut hoc Dei cognomen understandatur;" and again: "Ut alius visum est." Moreover, if the Latin version can be trusted, he gives a very confused account of the information which he had received, inasmuch as he assigns as one etymology of Esaü that of Edom, viz. "vel a rubore, vel a terra," whilst he assigns as the other, "factura dictus videtur"—an etymology which connects וּסָעוּ, Esaü, with עָשַׂ, asah, fece. It is probable that Origen derived this information from one of the Onomastica which are still extant both in Greek and Latin. One of the latter gives rubens (ruddy) as one of the meanings of Esaü, but it is probable that this meaning has arisen out of a confusion of Esaü with Edom. Jerome says (Quaest. Heb. in Gen.), "Et dixit Esaü Jacob, da mihi gustum de coctione rubae isha, quasi dico: proprieta vocatum est nomen ejus Edom."

On the other hand, it is due to Origen to state that in his Sixth Homily on Exodus (tom. v. p. 400) he gives, according to the Latin version, ferreus as the interpretation of Edom. We have a similar instance of this confusion of etymologies, whether arising from ignorance or from carelessness, in Origen's explanation of the meaning of Syria, which he appears to confound with Arum, and explains as meaning lofty. (Select. in Gen. tom. v. p. 96.) It is unsafe, especially in regard to the works of writers of the — Genseni, in his Commentary on Isaiah, remarks that both Symmachus and Theodotion read מָלֵאכָה, and he observes that the reason why neither Origen nor Celsus referred to the difference between the reading of the Hebrew text and that adopted by the LXX was, without doubt, that the Alexandrian Jew understood as little Hebrew as Origen. "Allein der Grund liegt ohne Zweifel darin, dass dieser alexandrinische Jude so wenig hebräisch verstand als Origenes, wie dieses der ala. Juden gewisslich der Fall war, und von Origenes hochst wahrscheinlich ist." Commentar. über den Jesaja, ii. 184, Leipzig, 1821. Cf. Genseni, Geschichtc der heb. Sprache p. 91, Leipzig, 1816. In exact accordance with the judgment of Genseni, is that of Redepenning, who writes as follows: "Obige Origenes die strenge Unterscheidung des Hebräischen oder nur oberflächlich unternichtet war, darüber hat eine fruhere Zeit ganz anders entschieden als fast einstimmig die unerreichte." (Origenes, Eine Darstellung seines Lebens und seiner Lehre, i. 367, Bonn, 1841.)

first four centuries, to attach too much importance to etymological errors. The following instances, however, when due allowance has been made for the misconceptions and misrepresentations of the editors of his works, will suffice to show that Origen's Hebrew scholarship was of a very defective nature. In his Selecta in Genesis he explains מִלְשָׁן, Keturah, as meaning "smaller," i.e. he confounds it apparently with מִלְשֶׁנַּה, Ketannah, although elsewhere he explains both words correctly. Again, he adopts Philo's explanation of γυναῖς, Eve, as meaning "thy favour" (Die hebräischen Worterklärungen des Philo, von Dr. Carl Siegfried, p. 18, Magdeburg, 1863), and he explains עַבְדָּה, Abbáh, as meaning the height of my father. He adopts Philo's derivation of אֶרֶץ, a derivation accepted at one time, though afterwards rejected by Jerome, as if from וְיָשֶׁר, as, וֶיהָ, וְיָד, and וּנְסֶה (ibid. p. 24); and he gives an interpretation of the name Samuel, as if it were derived from סֵמֶך, shem, שֵׁמֶךָ, שֵׁם, and וּנְסֶה, En Enc. II. Other indications are not wanting of Origen's lack of a critical acquaintance with the Hebrew language. Thus e.g. in his Selecta in Genesis, he endeavours to explain the "solecism" which he finds in the Greek version of Gen. i. 11, ἐπὶ ὄντων χρόνων σείρην σφήμα, κατά γένος, by suggesting the insertion of a stop after χρόνων, and by continuing thus, κατά γένος σείρην σφήμα, a rendering which it is almost superfluous to observe that no one who had consulted the original would have thought of proposing.

Again, in his Commentary on Ps. ix., Origen follows Philo and the Greek interpreters in supposing that the change made in the name of Sarai consisted in the addition of a second ρ, i.e. in the change of סָפָה into סָפְּה. It is true, indeed, that according to the Latin version of his sixth Homily on Genesis, he says, "Puto ergo Saram, quae interpretrat principes vel principatum agens, formam tenere sperga," but when the whole of his fanciful exposition of Gen. xxvi. 7 is taken into account it may well be doubted whether Origen was not one of those to whom St. Augustine referred when he wrote the following words: "Sic autem qui scripserant interpretationes nomine Hebraeoaram, quise litteris sacris continentur, Sarai (or, as some editions read, Sara), interpretatur princes nesci, Sara (or, as some editions read, Sarra), autem, virtus" (De Civitate Dei, lib. xvi. c. 28).

III. The opinion which has been here expressed as to the small amount of Hebrew scholarship possessed by Origen is confirmed by his servile adherence to the Greek versions, especially the Septuagint, when they widely differ from the Hebrew text. It is true, indeed, that Jerome draws a distinction between Origen's Homilies in which he follows the Greek text, and his more elaborate and scholarly works in which he is said to follow the Hebrew. Moreover, Origen appears to have shared, to a certain extent, the opinion which prevailed during the early ages of the Christian church as to the co-ordinate authority of the Septuagint version, as e.g. in his commentary on the second Psalm, where his remarks upon the tenes employed in the prophecies of the Old Testament by the Holy Spirit appear to refer to the Greek version rather than to the Hebrew original. Independently, however, of the consideration that it was the object of Origen's great work, not to restore the text of the LXX to its original form, but rather to show where, and how, it differed from the Hebrew, and by the aid of other versions to make it more conformable to it, it is almost impossible to suppose that anyone who recognised the authority of the Hebrew text, to the extent to which it is recognised by Origen in his letter to Africanus, in which he speaks of doing away with the Greek version then used in the churches, and procuring a genuine text from the Jews (tom. iv. p. 298), should, except from necessity, not only adopt the LXX as the basis of his commentaries, but should pass over in silence the most palpable divergences of the Greek versions from the Hebrew original, and, in regard to doubtful and obscure passages, should fail to have recourse to the latter for their true interpretation.

The following instances will suffice to illustrate what has been here advanced:—

(1) In his exposition of Gen. ii. 2 (tom. v. p. 70, Wircburgii, 1783), Origen adopts the reading of the LXX, "the sixth day," without any reference to the Hebrew, which has "the seventh day;" and inasmuch as he adopts the same reading in two places when arguing against Celsius (lib. v. c. 59, and lib. vi. c. 61), it is obvious that the adoption of that reading was not the result of a conciseness on the part of Origen to the version commonly used by his hearers.

(2) In his homily on Exodus xi, and in his De Principiis, l. 5. 2, Origen adopts the reading of the LXX in his allusion to Deut. xxii. 8, "according to the number of the angels of God," instead of the hebrew "according to the number of the children of Israel," and he grounds the remarks which he makes on the passage upon the Greek version without reference to the Hebrew. This is the more remarkable, inasmuch as Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho (c. xxii.), takes notice of the difference between the Hebrew text and the version of the LXX.

(3) In his Commentary upon Numbers xxiv. 17 (tom. vi. p. 449), he adduces, in proof of the proper humanity of Christ, the reading of the LXX, "And there shall arise a man," (καὶ ἐρχόμενος), an argument which it is scarcely probable that he would have used, especially if the passage be viewed in connection with the context, in which he refers to the rejection of Christ by the Jews, had he been aware that the Hebrew here "and there shall arise a sceptre" (καὶ ἐρχόμενος, shall).

(4) In Origen's Commentary on Jeremiah xi. 19 (tom. ix. p. 480), which appears to have been written subsequently to the year a.d. 245, he adopts as the basis of his remarks the rendering of the LXX, καὶ ἐκδόθη τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἄνοιξιν εἰς τὸν ἄνθρωπον αἰώνοις, "let us cast wood into his bread," and takes no notice of the entire discrepancy of this rendering from the Hebrew text, יָנָעֲדָה.
HEBREW LEARNING

585
HEBREW LEARNING

In his Commentary on St. Matt. cap. xii., Origens follows the version of the LXX in his quotation from Ps. cxvii. 7, al χειρος αυτου εν τω κομμων νοελαςων, where it is obvious that the LXX read του δυνατου instead of του δυνατου. It is wortby of observation that whereas in his version of the Psalms according to the LXX, Jerome renders the passage "manus ejus in soiphino servierunt," in his version according to the Hebrew he renders it "manus ejus a soiphino recerperunt."

Once more, when discussing at some length the difference between the Greek and Latin renderings of Gen. xliv. 27 (om. v. p. 266), it does not seem to have occurred to Origens to refer to the Hebrew text in order to ascertain which of the two versions more nearly accorded with it, whilst in one of the earlier Homilies on the same book, "On the Circumcision of Abraham" (tom. v. 179), where he has occasion, in combating the Ebionites, to compare the text used in the church with the Hebrew text which they (the Ebionites) said to be more correct ("quae veriora dictis exemplaria"), he alleges that certain words occur in Exodus which are not really found in the parallel passage in Exodus vi. 30.

Other indications of the same character, and leading to the same conclusion, are not wanting. The following is an extract from Origens's Commentary on Ezekiel ix. 2-7, a work which, according to Eusebius (lib. vii. c. 32), was composed during his residence at Cesarea in Palestine, and was finished at Athens, i.e., between A.D. 215 and A.D. 240. "The Seventy say that the man who was clothed with a long robe was commanded to put a sign (σημειω) upon the foreheads of those who groaned and were in pain. But Aquila and Theodotion say that the mark of the letter Θau was placed upon their foreheads." Origens then proceeds to give the explanation of the import of this mark as he had received it from the seventy, the last of whom, one who had been converted to Christianity, said that "in the old alphabet the letter Θau resembled the figure of the cross" (tom. i. p. 282).

Two observations naturally suggest themselves in connexion with this passage. (1) The rendering of Aquila and Theodotion, καὶ σημειώσεις τοῦ Θαυ, is nothing but a simple transliteration of the Hebrew text הכנפים, שׁחיתיא תאו, and had not referred to the Hebrew text he would hardly have quoted the version of Aquila and Theodotion. And (2) it is somewhat remarkable that Origens, who, in his Commentary on Ps. ii., refers to the change of Hebrew characters which is said to have been made by Ezra during the captivity (tom. vii. p. 226), should have been unacquainted with the well-known fact that the letter θau or θau bore the shape of a cross in the old Hebrew, as well as in other ancient alphabets. Again, in Origens's letter to Africanus, in defence of the canonicality of the Story of Susanna, he refers to the authority of Aquila, not to the original text itself, in support of the assertion that the words, "Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was astonied and rose up in haste," etc., are found in Daniel iii. 24 (tom. iv. p. 295), whilst, in the same letter, he affirms that the words "From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it" (Job i. 7), are not found in the Hebrew copies of the book of Job, an assertion which, unless the text used by Origens greatly differed from the present Masoretic text, is utterly without foundation. Moreover, when in doubt as to the Hebrew equivalents of the Greek verbs σχισαν and παρεκακαν, both of which occur in the LXX (the former frequently), Origens speaks of consulting "not a few Jews," in order to obtain the information which he needed, but it does not seem to have occurred to him to have recourse to the Hebrew Bible, with a view to ascertain the point for himself; whilst the simplicity with which he relates the answer which he received from his Hebrew friends to a similar inquiry respecting the Hebrew equivalents of the trees, σχειδω and πρωζης, viz., that if Origens could tell them where those words were to be found in the Greek version of the Old Testament they could tell him of what Hebrew words they were the representatives, still further confirms the impression that it had not entered into Origens's head to make an examination for himself, or that he was conscious of his own inability to do so. One more specimen of Origens's critical skill, which is found in this letter, is too significant to be overlooked. One of the arguments justly urged by Africanus in proof that the story of Susanna and the Elders had no Hebrew original is the play upon the Greek words just mentioned, viz., σχισαν and σχισαν and παρεκακαν and παρεκακαν. Origens's answer to this argument is that the translators, either found this play upon the Hebrew words, which he vainly endeavoured to ascertain from his Jewish authorities, or that being unable to represent in Greek the play upon words which they found in the Hebrew, they adopted one nearly resembling it. He then illustrates his position by reference to Gen. ii. 23, which, in the Greek version, reads ταυτα ετελειον του θαυ συμπληρων ανημ. "She shall be called woman because she was taken out of man." He observes upon this passage that the Jews say that a woman is called ἐσσα, παν, ʾisštah. He then says: that this word ἐσσα (we presume he means a word pronounced in the same manner), means I tob, ἱκαβον, in proof of which he refers to Ps. cxvi. 13, which, in the Hebrew, reads thus, יִבְשָׂם, יִבְשָׂם, יִבְשָׂם, יִבְשָׂם, יִבְשָׂם, יִבְשָׂם. It is easy to multiply indications of Origens's habitual disregard of the Hebrew text, of his constant recurrence to Jewish authority upon points on which it is difficult to account for such recurrence on the supposition that he was capable of pronouncing an independent opinion, and of the singular errors into which he has fallen when he ventures into the domain of Hebrew criticism.

Jerome says that Aquila and Symmachus as well as the LXX have σημειω, and that Theodotion only has the Θαυ.

Theodotion appears to have adopted the same etymology of the word; "assumptio quia ex viro sumpta est." (Hieron. Quest. In Gen.).

It may, indeed, be justly urged in opposition to the view here expressed of the extent of Origen's Hebrew scholarship that it is absolutely impossible that the blunders thus ascribed to him could have been committed by anyone who was capable of accomplishing the herculean task of copying out the whole of the Hebrew Bible, or transliterating the same into Greek characters, and reproducing the whole of the transcribed Greek version, clause by clause, with the original and with the three (or five) other Greek translations. The force of this argument cannot be resisted if the premises are allowed. But if, after due allowance has been made for the errors which may have crept into the Greek text of Origen's writings, and after still greater allowance has been made for those of the Latin translator, there appears conclusive evidence that Origen's scholarship was utterly inadequate to the task of a just discrimination between a true and a false rendering of the Hebrew text, we are reduced to the consideration of the plausibility of any theory upon which we can account for the execution of a work involving such prodigious labour, and apparently executed with a considerable amount of learning as well as with an almost incredible amount of industry, by one who does not appear to have possessed the requirements necessary for such an undertaking. Now the number and the nature of the allusions made by Origen to his Jewish instructors seem to justify the conclusion that he was more largely indebted to their aid than has been commonly supposed. There is no difficulty in the supposition that the first two columns of the Hexapla, containing the Hebrew text and the transliteration of the same in Greek characters may have been the exclusive work of Origen's Jewish amanuenses. Nor is there any insuperable difficulty, as it should seem, in the supposition that an extremely small amount of Hebrew scholarship may have sufficed for Origen's share in the correction of the text of the Septuagint at the aid of the other versions. An accomplished Hebrew scholar may well be supposed to have rendered the Hebrew text literally into Greek, whilst Origen compared the version of the LXX with that rendering, marking with the obelius those passages which had no corresponding words in the original, and in the case of omissions, inserting from one or other of the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, the words which most nearly corresponded with the original version of the Jew. Some such theory as this appears to offer the most probable solution of the problem how a work of such immense labour and importance, as the Hexapla undoubtedly was, could have been the production of one whose critical scholarship appears to have been so unequal to the task.

This theory receives some confirmation from the fact that we have no sufficient evidence of the Hebrew scholarship of Lucian, a presbyter of Antioch, or of Hesychius, the Egyptian bishop, both of whom undertook to amend the text of the Septuagint about the beginning of the 4th century, and whose recensions are mentioned by Jerome in his second book against Rufinus, as being in common use in the countries to which they respectively belonged (iii. p. 102).

The Clementine Writings. — The arguments which have been adduced in support of the Eastern origin of the document to which the Clementine writings owe their existence entitle these works to a short notice in the present article. At the same time the uncertainty which exists as to their authorship, and as to the date of the composition of their respective portions, detracts in some measure from the value of the results of any minute examination of their contents with a view to ascertain whether the writers did, or did not, possess any acquaintance with the Hebrew language.

The Clementine Homilies. — (1) In Hom. iii. c. xxv., we read that "Cain is interpreted both possession and entry." The reason assigned for the name in Gen. iv. 1 connects its etymology with the verb נִדֵה, קְנָה, which means to acquire or possess. The alternative etymology (which is adopted in c. xvi.) connects it with נָקָה, קנה, which in the Psalm signifies to be ever so jealous.

(2) In Hom. iii. c. xvi. it is said that "without any ambiguity Abel is translated grief." It is obvious that the writer, if acquainted with Hebrew at all, identified נִדֵה with נָעַה, and transferred to the former of these words the meaning which belongs to the latter.

(3) In Hom. iii. c. 45, the meaning of the phrase בָּניָהוּ הַיָּוָהוּ, בָּניָהוּ הַיָּוָהוּ (Num. xii. 34), is explained to be בָּנוֹבֶית אֶרֶבֶן, to which explanation, if designed as a literal rendering, exception may be taken on the ground that the Hebrew word for graves is in the plural number, and the Hebrew word denoting head is in the singular number.

(4) In Hom. iii. c. 47, the LXX version of Deut. xxxiv. 6, γῆς ἄνων γῆς, is adopted.

(5) In Hom. iii. c. 48, the LXX version of Gen. xix. 10 is for the most part followed, but instead of εἰς ἥσσωτος εἰρητικὴ, we find εἰς ἡσσων as the rendering of יָהָשָׂה, שדוק, as if equivalent to יָהָשָׂה.

(6) In Hom. viii. c. 5, the LXX version of Exodus xix. 9 is adopted almost verbatim.

(7) The quotation from Exodus xxii. 28, in Hom. xvi. c. 6, follows the LXX almost verbatim, but in the quotation from Deut. iv. 33 in the same chapter, the word φέρεσ κκαὶ φέρεσ is inserted before θέλος and reasoned on by Simon, and the insertion is not noticed in the following chapter by Peter. There does not appear to be sufficient evidence that the writers of this work or of the Recognitions possessed any acquaintance with Hebrew.

EUSEBIUS, the father of Ecclesiastical History, was born in Palestine about a.d. 264, and became bishop of Caesarea a.d. 315. It might be anticipated from the country in which he lived, and from the subjects on which he wrote, as well as from his admiration of the learning of Origen, and his frequent references to the Ἐσχέρης, that he would have acquired some acquaintance with Hebrew. A very slight examination of his writings, however, will suffice to shew that, in this respect, he was not in advance of the age in which he lived.

If, e. g., we refer to his Praeparatio Evangelica (lib. xi. c. 6), we shall find an explanation of the meaning of many Hebrew words and proper names, from which we select the following particulars:—

(1) The Hebrew word סגנה, esnōw, man, as distinguished from שגר, adam, man, is said to mean forgetful, and reference is made to Ps. viii. 4, by way of proof. "What is man סגנה that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man שגר that thou visitest him?"

(2) Eusebius says that Moses rightly called heaven סתרפיא, firmament, because it was a solid (סתרפיא) body, and one perceptible to the senses. How utterly remote the Hebrew word יheten, expanse, is from the notion of solidity, is well known to everyone who is acquainted with its etymology.

(3) He explains Israel in common with Philo, Origen, Lactantius, and (at one time) Jerome, as one who sees God, i.e. as if derived from ישת butorieh, רוז, and רוז (cf. lib. v. c. i 1); Demonstr. Evangel. lib. vi. c. 15.

Again, the remarks of Eusebius upon Habakkuk iii. 2 are scarcely reconcilable with the supposition that he was able to read the Hebrew text. Having first given the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, all of whom appear to have translated from the present Masoretic text, he proceeds, apparently without being conscious that the LXX took the word רוזיכל, shanim, years, for the numeral שמות, ש, and that they read the following word, יherent, as if some form of the noun יherent, life or beast, to explain the passage in accordance with the version of the LXX (אכד, דכו שומם), as having references to the divine and human natures of Christ. In the same chapter Eusebius explains the proper name יherent, תמא, as meaning consumption, סתרפיא, as though derived from סתרפיא; and once more, in the 18th chapter of the same work, he explains the meaning of the proper name יherent, אزال (Zech. xiv. 5), as understood by the Hebrews, to be the work of God, ברי, דכו שומם תמן אתראים פּוֹרְפַּר פּוֹרְפַּר חָזְקָנוּ, פּוֹרְפַּר חָזְקָנוּ. It is true, as Eusebius observes, that the form of the word adopted by the LXX is יאשר, which, according to the sound, would naturally suggest to the mind of anyone acquainted with Hebrew the two words יherent, fecl, and יherent, Deus, and it is easy to imagine that, when thus pronounced, Eusebius may have received from a Jew the etymology which he has here recorded. It is difficult, however, to suppose that anyone who had consulted the Hebrew text, and who possessed a competent knowledge of the language, could have accepted such an explanation.

We will now adduce some other instances of the imperfect Hebrew scholarship of Eusebius, as we find them in his Demonstratio Evangelica (Parisii, fol. 1629).

(1) In book viii. c. 2, in common with other early writers, Eusebius not only confounds Nazarēnec with Nažirīl, but relying on the LXX version of Lev. xxi. 12, he takes הָלִיך, nēzer, Ps. i. 2.

(2) In chap. i. of the same work, he confounds the word יַלֵּש, Shiloah (Gen. xlix. 10.) with יַלָּש (or יַלָּש), Shiloah (Is. viii. 6), and he does so, notwithstanding that he gives the correct meaning of the latter word, viz. sent, whilst he quotes the LXX version of the former, viz. יַלְשֵׁנֶר, he for whom it is sent.

(3) In his exposition of Jer. xxxi. 5 (lib. vii. c. 3), he transliterates the Hebrew words יַלָּש and יַלָּש by יַלָּש, and explains the meaning to be יַלָּש יַלָּש הָלִיך, יַלָּש יַלָּש, the righteous ones of God.

(4) When referring to the words of Ps. xxii. 1, as uttered by our Lord upon the cross, Eusebius speaks of them twice as if they were the very words of the Psalmist, not the Syro-Byzantine version of them (lib. x. c. 6). It is remarkable that such an error should be committed by a resident in Palestine.

(5) At the end of the 8th book of the Demonstratio Evangelica, Eusebius has occasion to cite Is. xix. 20. Having quoted the version of the LXX דיקי יַלָּש, אַלַּש, קְוֹמֵי אַשָּׁרָה גֵּרֵי עֵמֶלְוּ, and אַלָּש, אַלָּש, כֹּּוּרֵי הָלִיך, he fails to notice in this rendering of יַלָּש, יַלָּש, the rendering not of יַלָּש, but of יַלָּש.

It would be easy to multiply illustrations of the imperfect Hebrew scholarship of Eusebius. It is due, however, to so eminent a man and so voluminous a writer, to notice the aid which his writings afford in the recovery of a portion of the great work of Origen, as will at once appear, even on the most cursory reference to Dr. Field's edition of the remains of the Hexapla.

Ephraim the Syrian, or Ephrem Syrus (as he is commonly called), is said to have been born at Nisibis early in the 4th century, and he died about the year A.D. 370. He was born of Christian parents, and, according to some accounts, was instructed in Christianity by James, the bishop of Nisibis. He was ordained as a deacon by Basil the Great at Caesarea, but the greater part of his life was spent at Edessa, where he expounded the scriptures to a large number of scholars. He is commonly thought to have remained in desec's orders throughout life, but he speaks of himself as having hidden the talent of the priesthood in the earth through idleness (tom. iii. p. 467; Assemanni, Rom. 1732), and his refusal of the episcopate confirms his own statement that he had been admitted into the order of the priesthood. His works occupy six folio volumes, three of which contain his Syriac writings, and the remaining three the Greek writings commonly ascribed to him, and which are supposed to consist of translations from the Syriac. The former of these appear to have been considerably interpolated; and there is much doubt as to the genuineness of some of the latter, although we are told by Sozomen that some of the writings of Ephraim were translated into
HEBREW LEARNING

Greek during the lifetime of the author, and we find references to them in the works of Chrysostom and other contemporary writers.

If any inference respecting Ephrem's knowledge of Hebrew may be drawn from the Greek works which are ascribed to him, that inference would be of an unfavourable character, as will appear from the following instances, taken from his Paranaessis, which might be indefinitely multiplied:—

(1) Ephrem adopts the reading of the LXX in
Gen. vi. 22, "three hundred" where the Hebrew and the Syriac Peschito read "three hundred" (Parsenasis xi. p. 341; Ox. 1709).

(2) In his reference to Gen. xxi. 13, although Ephrem does not quote the words of the LXX, viz. κατοικήματος ἐν φυγή ζαβίκ, he was evidently as much perplexed as to the meaning of the Hebrew word יַבֵּית אֱלֹהִים as were the LXX, and he appears to have regarded it as the name of some particular tree or shrub, Ἰδού κράτει ἐν ητό φυγή τοῦ σαβίκ (In Abraham et

(3) In the twenty-ninth Paranaessis (ib. p.
295), Ephrem, in opposition to the present punctuation and division of the Hebrew verses, and to the Peschito version, connects the word Jerusalem with v. 1 of Ps. cxvi., instead of v. 2, and associates it with sábáh.

(4) In his quotation from Prov. ii. 13, in Paranaessis xi. (ib. p. 315), Ephrem departs both from the Hebrew and the Syriac, and adheres nearly to the LXX.

(5) In his quotation from Prov. xviii. 1, Ephrem adds the words ἐν τῇ αὐτῷ πολιᾷ παροιμία, which are not found in the Hebrew, the Syriac, or the LXX, and which appear to be a free rendering of the Vulgate, “abique terrorre eirit.” (Paranaessis xviii.; ib. p. 339.)

(6) In the fifteenth Paranaessis Ephrem adopts the LXX rendering of Isaiah xxxii. 9: Μαθαύρος ἐν ἔχει ἐν ζωοί σφέρῳ καὶ οἰκίον ἐν ἱερουsαλήμ (ib. p. 276), a rendering which entirely differs from the Hebrew and the Syriac, and concerning which Jerome writes thus: “Sic in Galli scriptura posuit ut dicam præsentis loci sensui convenire.”

(7) When quoting from Isaiah li. 8 in his forty-first Paranaessis (ib. p. 310), Ephrem follows the LXX, who seem to have read the word ἡμᾶς time instead of ἡμᾶς mort, where again he has no support from the Syriac.

(8) In his quotation from Habakkuk iii. 2, (Paranaessis xiii.; ib. p. 328), where the LXX follow an entirely different reading from that of the present Masoretic text, Ephrem adopts the rendering of the LXX. The Peschito version in this place does not entirely follow the Masoretic text, but agrees much more closely with it than does that of the LXX.

(9) In the quotation in the same Paranaessis, from the 16th verse of the same chapter of Habakkuk, where, as Jerome observes, all the versions differ widely from the Hebrew, Ephrem follows the LXX (ib.).

He does not, however, invariably follow the LXX in his Greek writings, or rather in those works which now exist in Greek, as e.g. in his sermon on “The life-giving Cross of the Lord,” where he adopts the interpolated words from the tree, which have the support neither of the Syriac nor of the LXX. On the other hand, in a quotation from Ps. xxxix. 4, Ephrem adopts the rendering of the Syriac, “‘If there is craft, in my tongue,” where the Hebrew has only רֵאשָׁה word, and where the LXX have δέος ἢ μεταο.

It may fairly, however, be questioned whether the evidence here adduced does not point to the inaccuracy of the translation of Ephrem's Syriac works into Greek, inasmuch as it is, in the highest degree, improbable that Ephrem should habitually have followed the LXX, where that version differs as much from the Syriac as from the Hebrew.

The instances which follow are taken, for the most part, from his Rhythms (portions of which have been translated from the Syriac by Mr.
Morris, and published at Oxford in 1847), and will suffice to shew that Ephrem in his Syriac works quotes habitually from the Peschito version, and that he does not appear to have made much use of the original Hebrew.

(1) In his quotation from Ps. lxxii. 17, Ephrem, in common with the Syriac and the Chaldean versions, regards the second member of the first clause of the verse as having reference to the past, and reads, “His name was before the sun,” instead of reading, according to the present Masoretic text and the version of the LXX, “His name shall continue (or be continued) as long as (or before) the sun.”

(2) In his quotation from Gen. xlix. 10, 11 (Rhythm against the Jews, c. 18), Ephrem follows the Syriac in rendering窠็บינא, lawyer (or staff of the ruler), by expositor or interpreter, but in the following verse he does not follow the Syriac and the LXX in regarding קינא as a form of the construct-state of the noun, but translates it (perhaps accidentally) as if it were taken directly from the Hebrew אָנָשׁ זַן; whilst, on the other hand, in the twenty-seventh chapter of the same Rhythm he renders the same words, “the man’s soul.”

(3) In his quotation from Amos vii. 7 (ib. v. 19) Ephrem follows the Syriac and the LXX in rendering נדנמ, not the adverbial.

(4) In his paraphrase of Is. xliii. 14, 15.
(ii. c. 20) Ephrem follows the LXX and the Hebrew and the Syriac in making the walls the subject of the verb: “I have gra\n
(5) In his fifty-third Rhythm Ephrem, with evident allusion to Deut. xxxii. 26, speaks of the words of chaste women as being placed in the ark. It is evident that he has here followed the Syriac version, which has “in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord,” instead of the Hebrew, which has “in the ark of the ark,” and with which the LXX and the Chaldee agree.

(6) In his Commentary on 2 Kings ii. 9, Ephrem adopts the Peschito text, which does not retain (as the LXX has) the same rendering of the Hebrew ואֹמָה, which is found in the Syriac version of Deut. xxiii. 17, and consequently overlooks the obvious reference to the elder son’s portion of his father’s goods, which is there denoted.

(7) A yet stronger proof of Ephrem’s ignorance

*The introduction of the past tense instead of the future in the Syriac and Chaldee versions probably arose (as Mr. Morris suggests in his translation of the select works of Ephrem, p. 67, note) from the fact that some of the Jews regarded the word כָּל or פֶּן as a proper name. "Before the sun His name was opotetem."
or neglect of the Hebrew text is found in the argument which he derives from the alleged use of the plural verb in Gen. xi. 7, where the Syriac and the Chaldee have "Come ye," but where the Hebrew has the singular 7277. The LXX 5634 cannot be alleged on either side, inasmuch as it is used in conjunction both with singular and with plural verbs. It is possible, indeed, inasmuch as Ephrem occasionally refers to readings found in the Hebrew, that there may have been a different reading in this case, but no other reading is now known to exist.

One may make the deduction from the unprinted MS, containing Ephrem's Commentary on Jonah, Assemani gives the following: "Jonah began to enter into Nineveh a journey of three days, and he preached and said, 'Within, or yet, forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.' The Greek reads, 'There are yet three days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.'" Ephrem endeavours to reconcile the discrepancy thus: "Now both of them limit not only the preaching of Jonah, but also the period of reprieve as assigned to the Ninevites to three days, the whole of this Metrical Homily on the Repentance of Nineveh, which has been translated, with an introduction and notes, by Dr. Burgess, proceeds on the view commonly entertained by the Syrians, in accordance with the Hebrew text, that the period of reprieve was not three but forty days. The object, however, for which the quotation from Ephrem's Commentary is here adduced is to show that unless the Hebrew text of Jonah iii. 4, to which Ephrem refers, differed from the present Masoretic text, either Ephrem had never consulted it, or he was unable to comprehend it.

Upon the whole, it is clear that if Ephrem was able to consult the Hebrew text, he made the best possible use of the knowledge which he possessed, and that he relied mainly on the Peshito in his Syriac writings; and that the version of the LXX is, for the most part, adopted in those of his writings which are now extant only in Greek. Mr. Morris, indeed, refers, as a proof of Ephrem's acquaintance with the Hebrew, to the fact that he notices the various reading in 2 Kings viii. 10, וַיָּתָר, to him instead of וַיָּתָר not, as in the Masoretic text. The various reading is here obviously the correct one, and is adopted by the Vulgate, the Syriac, and the Chaldee, but Ephrem probably obtained his information from Jewish sources.

Cyril of Jerusalem.—Amongst those early fathers of the church who might reasonably be expected to have been acquainted with Hebrew

we must include Cyril, who was born about A.D. 315, probably in, or near Jerusalem, and who was bishop of that city about thirty-five years. We should the rather have expected to find indications of such knowledge in the writings of Cyril because, whilst they do not afford evidence of any great amount of ability or eloquence, they contain ample proof of the intimate acquaintance of the writer with the books both of the Old and of the New Testament.

We should not be justified in inferring that Cyril was altogether ignorant of Hebrew from the fact of his adherence to the Greek version of the Old Testament, even in passages in which it fails to represent the true meaning of the original, (1) because in many cases these variations do not materially affect the general scope of the passage, or the argument of the writer, and therefore the version in common use amongst his hearers may have been employed just as the A.V. is by ourselves, even when the rendering is known to be not strictly accurate; and (2) because it appears from Lecture IV. c. 34, that Cyril was one of those who ascribed divine authority to the Septuagint version. His opinion on this point deserves notice. Having first related the traditional account of the verbal agreement of the translations independently made, as alleged, by the 72 interpreters, he continues thus: "For the matter was not one of witty invention, or a contrivance of man's cunning devices; but the interpretation of the divine Scriptures, spoken by the Holy Ghost, was, of the Holy Ghost, accomplished." (Library of the Fathers, ii. p. 50, Oxford, 1839.)

Independently, however, of the numerous citations which Cyril makes from the LXX,* in which that version differs very materially from the Hebrew, the following instances will suffice to show that he did not possess even a superficial acquaintance with the Hebrew language.

(1) In Lecture I. 14, Cyril writes thus: "That Samuel may come, and thy barren soul may hear the salvation of God who hears prayer; for this is the meaning of the word Samuel." Now it is quite true that different opinions exist as to the true derivation of the name Samuel; some deriving it from דָּמָה, Shem Eli, name of God, others from יִשָּׁמָה יִשָּׁמָה, Shaul me-Eli, asked of God (Josephus renders it by the Greek name Thecetetus, Θεατήτες), and others again, and, as we think, correctly from דָּמָה, Shammah Eli, heard by (or of) God; but, unless Cyril has very imperfectly expressed his meaning, he has assigned to the name a derivation of which it is altogether inapplicable.

(2) In Lecture II. 9, Cyril writes thus in

* The following instances, which might be almost indefinitely multiplied, will suffice by way of illustration:—

(1) Ps. xxxii. 1, as quoted in Lect. I. c. 16.
(2) Prov. xxiv. 32, " II. c. 18.
(3) Ps. lxxv. 15, " II. c. 16.
(4) Ps. xlv. 6, " VII. c. 16.
(5) Job xi. 14, " VIII. c. 4.
(6) Hag. ii. 8, " VIII. c. 6.
(7) Is. xiv. 14, 16, " XI. c. 16.
(8) etc. etc.

* In his quotation from Micah v. 2, Cyril does not follow the Hebrew or the LXX, nor does he adopt the ὀφθαλμόν of St. Matt. ii. 6, but inserts µ before ἀπόφθαλμον.
HEBREW LEARNING

reference to Rahab: “And if thou wouldst receive a written witness that she was saved, thou hast it recorded in the Psalms, ‘I will think upon Rahab and Babylon,’ but with this added, ‘with them that know me.’” On men therefore, and likewise on women, is salvation, viz. that which is secured to us through repentance.” 13 (p. 18.)

The Hebrew scholar will perceive that Cyril has been misled by the Greek version, which reads “Padb in Josh. 11 and Ps. xxviii. 4, whereas the name of Rahab the harlot is in Hebrew ⃞, rahab, i.e. wide, whilst the allegorical name of Egypt, in its subsequent allusion to Isaiah (cf. xxxvii. 7), is ה, rahab, i.e. tumultuous violence, a word different in orthography as well as in meaning from the former.

(3) In Lecture X. c. 4 we read thus: “Fifty is He called Jesus deriving His name from His salutary medicine.” This remark refers to the Greek word, Ἰησοῦς, and to its supposed derivation from ἱδωμαι, as Cyril says in c. 13.

“Jesus then means among the Hebrews ‘a Server’; in the Greek Torah ‘a Healer’ (ὁ λυσσαμένος).” The fact that Cyril should seriously imagine that there is any connexion between Ἰησοῦς and ἱδωμαι is somewhat remarkable.

But, further, in the 11th chapter of the same Lecture we read thus: “And He has two names, Jesus Christ; Jesus because He saves, Christ because of His priesthood. And, knowing this, the inspired prophet Moses conferred these two titles on two men. The first being the name of his own successor in the government, Ahas, to Jesus, and surmising his own brother Aaron, Christ, that by two special men he might represent at once the high-priesthood and the kingdom of Him who was to come, the One Jesus Christ.” (ib. p. 104.) The origin of the statement respecting Aaron is, we presume, the Greek rendering of Lev. iv. 6, where the Hebrew is יִהְיֶה הָאָן הַקֹדֶשׁ, the anointed priest, and the Greek ἐσπερῆς ἦς ἤραος. It is obvious that had Cyril been capable of referring to the Hebrew text he would not have made this singular statement.

(4) In Lecture X. c. 16, Cyril writes thus: “Your name was ‘Jews’ and ‘Israelites’ in the time of Moses and the other prophets, and after the return from Babylon, and up to the present time.” This statement indicates something more than the lack of Hebrew knowledge on the part of Cyril. It is quite true that there are passages in the book of Jeremiah, as well as in the later books of the Old Testament, in which the word “Jews” may be understood as comprising more than the subjects of the kingdom of Judah. But when Cyril speaks of the name “Jews” as being used in the days of Moses, he betrays not only ignorance of the use of the Hebrew word יִשְׂרָאֵל (Yishwah), but also of that of its Greek equivalent, Ἰσραήλ.

* The editor of the Oxford translation, in a footnote, vindicates Cyril’s faithful reasoning in the following words: “As what is said of Hagur in Gen. xxii. 18 is meant of Jerusalem, so Rahab may really be named in this Psalm yet Egypt meant as its scope.” This note has obviously escaped the eye of the learned Regius Professor of Hebrew whose name stands first amongst the editors of the Library of the Fathers.

† Thus, e. g. in Jer. xxxiv. 9, יִשְׂרָאֵל Hebrew, and Ἰσραήλ appear to be used as synonymous words.

(5) In Lecture XIII. c. 9, Cyril says that “Judas” means “confession.” Now it is quite true that the Hebrew word נָדַע (Yadah) from which Judas = Judah is derived, bears the meaning to confess, as well as to praise. There are two passages in Genesis in which reference is made to the meaning of the name, viz. chap. xxix. 35 and chap. xlix. 8. In the latter of these passages we read thus: “Judas, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise” where the LXX has αἰνεῖσαι or (according to another reading) αἰνεῖσαν. Cyril does not appear to have had this passage in his mind, but to have ground his observation upon the LXX version of Gen. xxix. 35, where, instead of rendering the Hebrew word by αἰνεῖσαι, as in xlix. 8, the LXX substitute εὐλογοῦσαι; and whereas we rightly read in the A.V. “Now will I praise the Lord,” they read, Νῦν ἐτῶτι εὐλογοῦσαι Κυρίος. It is possible indeed that this instance ought to be addeduce, not so much as a proof of Cyril’s ignorance of Hebrew, as of his blind adherence to the LXX. We think however, that it may fairly be alleged as one amongst many proofs that Cyril derived his knowledge of the Old Testament solely from the Greek, inasmuch as the rendering of the LXX in this place can scarcely be regarded, in any just sense of the word, as a translation of the original.

(6) In Lecture XIII. c. 11, Cyril expends some labour on the attempt to prove that there is no discrepancy between the account contained in Zech. xi. 13, where, as he alleges, the prophet states that the thirty pieces of silver were cast into “the refining house,” and that contained in St. Matthew xxvii. 7, which speaks of “the potter’s field.” It will be obvious (1) that Cyril does not touch upon the real difficulty involved in the interpretation of the words of Zechariah (xi. 13); and (2) that Cyril’s difficulty is altogether out of his ignorance that “the refining house” (τὸ χαρακτήριον) is not found in the Hebrew, which has, as the A.V. has rendered it, “to the potter” (ץ וְאֶפֶן). It is worthy of observation that Jerome remarks upon the discrepancy between the translation of the LXX and the words of the Evangelist. He adds, however, “Sed et in Hebraeo sum sensus idem sit, verba praepostero sunt, et pene diversa” (Ep. ad Pamphilium, iii. p. 167).

(7) In Lecture XIII. c. 27, Cyril writes thus: “Essais saith, ‘Who is this that cometh from Edom? the redness of His garments is from Bosor,’ who is this who for a diaphora weareth purple? for Bosor hath in Hebrew this meaning.” The only key which we can discover to this extraordinary statement is that in Micah ii. 12, the LXX appear to have read הַנַעָם לוֹ (hō nephēs) instead of הַנַעָם. Jerome in his Commentary on Micah explains the word in the same way, “in tribulation.” Jerome’s alternative explanation of the meaning of the word, viz. İşch, arises out of his view of the interchangeableness of the sibilants 5 and 6.

EPHIPHANUS.—Ephiphanius, bishop of Constantia, the ancient Salamis of Cyprus, was born in the early part of the 4th century at Besan dus, a village of Palestine, not far from Eleutheropolis, and was brought up by the monks of Palestine. He is said to have been of Jewish extraction, and to have been acquainted with the Hebrew, the Egyptian, the Greek, and to some extent, the Latin languages, in addition to his native tongue, the Syriac. The writings of Epiphanius bear witness to a certain amount of familiarity with the Hebrew language, as will appear from the following instances.

* He rightly renders the Hebrew words יִשְׂרָאֵל and "ad substantiam."

When speaking of the different names given to the Christians, he distinguishes between Nazarenes and Nazivites; i.e., between a word derived probably from נצר, ntsr, a shoot, and a word derived from נזר, nazar, to separate; and he observes that our Lord was called a Nazarene after the name of the city Nazareth, in which he was brought up; whereas he explains Nazivites as persons sanctified or dedicated to God, as was Samson. (Adversus Haereses, lib. 1, tom. ii. c. 5. Haer. 29, tom. i. p. 121, fol. Colon. 1882.) It deserves notice that when speaking of the tenets of the heretical sect who assumed the name of Nazarenes, he says that they were admirably skilled in the Hebrew language, and that the books of the Old Testament were read by them in Hebrew as by the Jews. (ib. p. 123.)

Again, when Epiphanius has occasion to refer to the words uttered by our Lord upon the cross, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani," he lays great stress upon the fact that this quotation from Ps. xxii. 1 does not accord with the Hebrew original, but that having pronounced the words "Eli, Eli," our Lord uttered the words which follow in the Syriac tongue (ib. p. 792). Now this statement is not entirely correct, insomuch as the word lama (or as it is printed in Petavius's edition of Epiphanius, λαμα) does not accord with the Syriac lemma, but with the Hebrew lama. The verb, however, is, as Epiphanius observes, not the Hebrew word azabthani, but the Aramaic word shebethani.

Again, when Epiphanius quotes the first verse of Psalm cxlii, he does not adhere to the Hebrew, but, as if quoting from memory, he substitutes ירוש for ירוא: if he inserts the words לatron, let God hear, which do not occur in the original, and he substitutes for ירא the words יברוק, let him have regard to the voice (tom. ii. p. 163). Other explanations may be given of these variations, but they are, at least, consistent with the theory that Epiphanius was familiar with Hebrew as a spoken language, and that, in quoting from memory, he readily substituted one form of expression for another, and whilst deviating whether by insertion or by omission from the original, preserved the general sense of the passage which he designed to reproduce.

Once more, when referring to the words of Jacob, Gen. xii. 3, Epiphanius points out the departure of the LXX from the Hebrew in rendering ידוע µη deēψε, and he observes that the Hebrew words may be rendered µη διακανείς (Β. ii. p. 100), oµ διακανείς, oµ δηθείς.

But whilst thus displaying a certain familiarity with Hebrew as a language which has many points of affinity to his native Syriac, Epiphanius, in common with the other early fathers who possessed some slight knowledge of Hebrew, shows that his knowledge was not of a critical character.

Thus, e.g., whilst rightly explaining דוע, Elom, as meaning God always, or for ever, supposing probably that it was equivalent to עלוג, El olam, 'the everlasting God' (Gen. xxi. 33), (p. 792).

Again he explains יושב, Israel, as meaning God; ימד, Jacob, as meaning Lord, Kôrús; ימ, Adam, as de uKôrús; ימך יאכ, Yaqob, as de יאכ kal kavai kal ësi ëv (tom. i. p. 296).

It is difficult to account for three out of these four explanations.

As another instance of false etymology we may refer to the derivation of כיסר, a measure, from קוס, to cover, and the somewhat forced and unwarranted indication of this etymology in the words קפרים רחמה ד מי ובו הכיסר בה, instead of כיסר, following the Hebrew, which has the seventh day (tom. ii. p. 179).

JEROME,—Eusebius Hieronymus Sophronius, the son of Eusebius, a Christian, was born at Stridon in Dalmatia, as some say about the year A.D. 329, but, as seems more probable, about the year 344, and he died at Bethlehem on Sept. 30, A.D. 420. He was sent to Rome at the age of eighteen, and after a residence of some years in that city, during which he studied under the grammarian Donatus, he travelled in the East and in the West. In the desert of Chalæs, near Antioch, about the year A.D. 374, he devoted himself to the study of Hebrew. In A.D. 383 he returned to Rome, and after the death of Pope Damasus he retired to Bethlehem (about A.D. 387), where he remained until his death, pursuing the study of Hebrew with renewed ardour. Up to this time Jerome's work in respect to biblical revision had been chiefly restricted to corrections of the old Latin version by the aid of the Greek. About A.D. 390 he began his new translations from the Hebrew, a work which appears to have extended over a period of about fifteen years, and, notwithstanding the numerous defects which exist in the version of Jerome, of some of which he was himself fully conscious, and which were almost inseparable from the imperfect scholarship of his age and the haste with which some portions of the work were executed, his maxim opus, commonly known as the Vulgate, will ever remain a noble and unique monument of the linguistic skill, as well as of the indomitable courage and perseverance of its highly-gifted author. Whatever opinion may be formed of the philological accuracy of Jerome's Hebrew scholarship, his superiority in this respect to all the ecclesiastical writers who preceded him, and to all who for many centuries followed him, will be universally allowed. At the same time it is a task of considerable difficulty to determine the precise nature and extent of Jerome’s obligations to his Hebrew teachers (Baraibausai and others), and thus to discriminate accurately between those criticisms which were original, and those for which he was indebted to his Jewish instructors. Some idea of the extent to which Jerome was indebted to Jewish sources of information may be gathered from the comparison instituted by Rahmer, in his “Die hebräischen Traditionen in den Werken des Hieronymus, of the Quaestiones in Genesis, with the Hebrew traditions preserved in the Talmud and other Jewish writings. The following instances will suffice by way of example:
HEBREW LEARNING

1) In Gen. ii. 8, where the A.V. reads “And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden,” Jerome’s translation is “Plantaverat autem Dominus Deus paradisum in Eden, a principio.” This interpretation of the Hebrew word וַיִּבְנָה is found in the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and in two of the Talmudic treatises (Pessachim, 54, a; Nedarim, 39). The Greek versions of Symmachus and Theodotion, moreover, appear to favour it in the renderings ἐν πρώτοις and ἐν πρώτων.

2) Jerome’s explanation of Gen. vi. 3, “Yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years,” is: “Hoc est, habebunt centum viginti annos ad agendum poenitentiam. Non igitur humana vita, ut multi errant, in centum viginti annos contracta est.” The Targum of Onkelos renders the passage thus: “A term will I give them, an hundred and twenty years, if they may be converted.” In like manner the Targum of Jonathan: “Behold I will give them a prologue; in a hundred and twenty years I will bring them to repentance, and not perish.” The Midrash on Genesis explains the passage in the same manner.

3) In his explanation of Gen. xi. 28, Jerome, in common with the Midrash and the Jerusalem Targum, explains the Hebrew word הַמֵּדָר, which in the A.V. is regarded as a proper name, Ur, as denoting the furnace in which Haran was consumed, and from which Abraham was delivered. It is true, indeed, that Jerome speaks of the Jewish account as a fable (juduluro), but when explaining the apparent discrepancy between the age of Abraham when he left Charran, viz. 75, and the statement that this event took place after the death of Terah who, if only seventy years of age at Abraham’s birth, must have lived sixty years after his departure, Jerome refers to the Hebrew tradition as true, and explains the age of Abraham as dating not from his natural birth, but from the time of his renunciation of the idolatry of the Chaldeans.

4) Jerome’s explanation of Gen. xix. 14 appears to be borrowed from Jewish sources. He does not, indeed, accept the whole of the explanation which is found in the Midrash on that place, viz., that Lot had four daughters, of whom two were already married, and two were about to be married. But he adopts the Jewish interpretation of the words כָּל כָּלָה כָּלָה,为其 acceptiur erant filias ejus, who were about to take his daughters in marriage, and rejects that of the LXX, τοὺς λαμώνας τούς θυγατέρας αὐτοῦ, who had married his daughters.”

(3) In his explanation of Gen. xxi. 14 Jerome remarks upon the difficulty of supposing that Ishmael at eighteen years of age should have been placed upon Hagar’s shoulder. Accordingly he rejects the version of the LXX, καὶ ἠδενεῖτο τῷ δόμῳ αὐτῆς τῷ ναῷ, “and he placed the child upon her shoulder,” and instead of connecting the words ἀπέδενετο, “and the child,” with ἔτοιμος, ἵνα “he placed upon her shoulder,” he connects them with the preceding verb ἀπέδενετο “and he gave,” and in conformity with the views of some of the old Jewish commentators, he explains the passage thus: “Et hoc facto, dedit puerum materi: hoc est, in manus ejus tradidit, commendavit, et eum emissit domo.”

The following criticism, for which it can scarcely be doubted that Jerome was indebted to his Jewish teachers,* exemplifies not only the extent to which he was in the habit of borrowing from others, but also the readiness with which he received and transmitted statements without investigation. In his Commentary on Galatians i. (tom. i. p. 80) he states that when the Hebrew word בְּנֵי, sons, occurs with the letter צו occurs it means “son’s son, but that when it occurs without the letter צов it means the fifth year, or year of jubilees, in support of which latter statement he refers to Exodus xxix. 6, where the word is written without צו, and also to Deut. xxxii. 4, where the צו is inserted.

Our next inquiry must be into the direct evidence which exists respecting the amount of Hebrew scholarship possessed by Jerome. On this subject he sometimes speaks with much diffidence; and when we contrast with this diffidence the very different language in which Jerome, not only in other places, but even in his very same treatises, adopts in reference to his other qualifications, it is reasonable to conclude that the language which he employs was not altogether the result of a præmonio under rate his own acquirements. Thus e.g. in his Apologia aduersus Rufinam he writes thus: “Nos non solum quia Hebrewam linguam usque ad heliades habemus scientiam ... et de aliquo magno passuum judicare, et e quae ipsi intelligimus in nostrâ lingua exprime” (tom. iii. p. 103 b, Basil, 1516). And, again, in the same treatise, when speaking of his familiarity with the Latin grammarians, rhetoricians, and philosophers, he observes, “et Hebræam sermonem ex parte didi culsum” (ib. p. 103 a). And, once more, in his Epistulam Paulam matris he says: “Hebraearum linguam, quam ego ab adolescentia, multo labore ac audore ex parte didici, ... discere volui” (tom. i. p. 86). On the other hand it must not be overlooked that in this same treatise Jerome describes himself as “trilinguis,” i.e. “Hebraeus, Graecus, Latinus,” and that in his Preface to the Apocryphal Book of Tobit, he says that in one day he translated into Latin the version which

* Amongst other similar acknowledgments of this indebtedness, we find the following statement in a letter addressed to St. Augustine (I, p. 286, Clariæ edition).

It would have been but fair to have given me credit for the same fidelity (i.e. as that which he had shown in the revision of the translation of the New Testament) in the Old Testament; for I have not followed my own imagination, but have rendered the divine words as I found them understood by those who speak the Hebrew language. If you have any doubt of this in any passage, seek the Jews what is the meaning of the original.”

3 E
was made for him viā vocē out of the Chaldee into Hebrew by one who was acquainted both with the Hebrew and Chaldee languages.

The following examples, which might be almost indefinitely multiplied, will suffice to afford some idea of the deficiency of Jerome’s critical scholarship, when tried by a standard applicable to that of the present day.

We shall refer, in the first instance, to his treatise on Hebrew proper names, one of the earliest of his productions, but one in the face of which he observes that he had undertaken it at the request of those who thought that he had acquired some proficiency in the Hebrew language, "quī me putat aequid in Hebræis linguae noticīa profecisse" (tom. iv. p. 136 d).

(1) Jerome regards the Hebrew gutturals נ, ז, and ה as interchangeable. Thus, in his explanation of the name Abel, בַּלֵּא, he assigns it as one of its meanings tucūs, grief, identifying בַּלֵּא with בַּל. He assigns as one explanation of the proper name בֵּרֶא, בְּרֶא, creature, creature, thus identifying בֵּרֶא with בְּרֶא. He identifies בֵּרֶא, בֵּרֶא, with בַּרְשָׁא, בַּרְשָׁא, and gives as an explanation of the former name בֵּרֶא, בֵּרֶא, as an explanation of the latter בֵּרֶא, בֵּרֶא, he confounds בֵּרֶא, בֵּרֶא, drought or desolation, Zeph. ii. 14, with בֵּרֶא, בֵּרֶא, and renders the word by corvis, venem. He explains בר, בר, as meaning ignis, ut lumen, thus identifying בר with בר. Again, after giving happy (beatus) as the explanation of the meaning of the proper name אֵשָׁר, אֵשָׁר, he observes that if written by ו and י instead of ו and י it means a corner, וּל, latus, atrium. In his Questions Hebraicae in Genesis he regards ו and י as interchangeable words; and whilst assigning the meaning happy to Asher, the son of Jacob and Leah, he observes, “Aser ergo non divinae, sed beatus dictum, duntaxat in prae senti loco. Nam in alios secundum ambiguitatem verbi possunt et divinae sic vocari.” And, again, in his remarks upon Gen. iii. 14, in the Questions Hebraicae, he regards ו as dux, as convertible with ו, ashes, and observes that the former word is rendered רות, once more, in his able and elaborate commentary upon Isaiah he regards the word רות as interchangeable with רות (Is. vii. 12), and observes that the meaning may be either temp or exalt.

The uncertainty which attaches to any attempt to determine the amount of scholarship possessed by early writers from their etymological conceits is increased in the case of Jerome by the undue deference which he attached to the views of his predecessors in this field of inquiry.

Thus e.g. in his treatise on proper names he writes thus: “Israēl est videre deum, sive vir, aut mens videns Deum,” while in his Quaest. Heb. in Genesis (ib. p. 100) he says that when he gave the explanation of the name Israēl as if derived from ו, ו, and ל, he did so under the influence of names of great weight and authority, and instead of adhering to that view, he explains the meaning of the word, in accordance with the obvious import of Gen. xxiii. 28, as principe cum Deo, or princeps Dei, i.e. as derived from ו and ו (or ו and ו). Moreover in his later etymology of the word Israel, he seems to regard ו and ו as a noun, and he transliterates it siri, and explains it thus, principem sani; whilst, in allusion, as it should seem, to yet another etymology, he adds: “sive directus Dei, hoc est eisverbos Ως.”

(2) After making ample allowance, however, for Jerome’s undue respect for the opinions of earlier writers, and also for the wide field for speculation which is opened in all etymological researches, it is difficult for Hebrew scholars of the present time to understand how Jerome could have been satisfied with etymologies of which the following will suffice as specimens:—He explains the meaning of the word Adullamite, גִּלְגָּל, (Gen. xxxviii. 1) as the testimony of water, testimonium aquae, as if it were derived from ו and ו. Again, he explains the word Amraphel, ארמִפּאל, thus: dizit ut caderet, as if derived from ו and ו. He explains Hadoram הָדוֹרָמִי (Gen. x. 27), by generatio exsulta, as if derived from ו and ו; Arphaxad, אַרְפָּחָד, by sanam de populosam, apparently as if derived from ו and ו; and פֹּלָה, פֹּלָה, by cadentiae, (as if from ו ו), or ruinā poculi, or cadentiae potionēs, apparently as if from ו and a form of ו; and Ramoth, Heb. רָמוֹת, as visio mortis, as if from ו and ו. Jerome’s attempts to determine the Egyptian source of a Hebrew word are of a somewhat singular character. Thus e.g. he explains the meaning of Pharaoh, Heb. פַּרְו, dissipans sive discoperiens eum, as if derived from the Hebrew word פַּרְו; that of the word Abroch (Gen. xii. 43), as tender or delicate father, as if derived from ו and ו. Here, however, as in other instances, Jerome appears to have followed the guidance of earlier writers, for whereas in his Questions in Genesis he considers the word ואֵשֶׁר, (Gen. xii. 2) as a Hebrew word, and explains it by palus, in his Commentary on Isaiah xix. 7, he says that he was told by the learned that in the Egyptian tongue everything green which grows in marshes is called by this name. One more example of Jerome’s etymological conceits may be cited from his opinion of Ps. cxvi. 21, in his Quaestiones de Studio Scripturae, in which he assigns iniquitas as the meaning of the proper name Haman.

We shall now adduce a few illustrations of the lack of critical accuracy and discernment which pervades the writings of Jerome.

(1) In his remarks on Gen. iii. 17 in his Quaest. Heb. he translates and observes as follows: “Maledicta terra in operibus suis. Opera hic non ruris coelesti, ut plerique putant, sed peco..."
HEBREW LEARNING 867

significant; ut in Hebraeo habetur. Et Aquila non discordat dicens: Maledicta humus proper te, Et Theodoto, Maledicta adama in transgressione tua."

We remark here (1) that Jerome appears to have read לְּעָרְבִּים; or some other form of רָעָבָּב, operatus est, instead of רָעָבָּב; and (2) that he does not appear to have observed that Aquila read in accordance with the present Hebrew text לְּעָרְבִּים, or that Theodotion appears to have read לְּעָרְבִּים or some other nominal form of רָעָבָּב, transgressus est.

(3) Jerome’s rendering of the LXX version of Gen. iv. 7, in which the words “thou shalt rule over him” are made to refer, as in the English version, to Abel, not to sin, is that in Greek the word ἁμαρτία, sin, is of the feminine gender, whereas in Hebrew the word נחמה is masculine. The inaccuracy of the explanation is obvious, even had Jerome’s statement as to the gender of נחמה been correct; but it seems to have escaped his notice (1) that the word ἁμαρτία is not found in the LXX in this verse; and (2) that in every other place in which נחמה occurs it is of the feminine gender.

Amongst other indications either of an imperfect acquaintance with Hebrew or of great carelessness, we may notice the following:

(1) Jerome’s rendering of בִּלּוּל, minnegeb, in Gen. xlii. 3, by the words per anum. It may perhaps be inferred from this rendering that Jerome was not aware of the fact that The South, or The Negeb, was the name of a district of Judaea, and consequently that there was no difficulty in understanding the meaning of verse 1, in which it is stated that Abraham came up "out of Egypt into the south." This ignorance, however, furnishes no sufficient justification for rendering בִּלּוּל minnegeb "through the South."

(2) Jerome’s rendering of מֵאָסֵל, מֵאָסֵל, Gen. xxxix. 26, in justior est ista quom ego. Not content, however, with this rendering, which is a correct version of the Hebrew, he proceeds to observe, "In Hebraeo habet justiuota est ex me" (Quast. Heb. 101 a).

(3) Jerome renders הרויה תַּנֵּבֵי, Gen. xlix. 18, saleotarem tuum excitabo. The rendering is the more reasonable, inasmuch as that of the LXX is Θεωτρείας ταῦτα ἐνεργευόμενοι.

(4) Jerome appears to have been unable to give any account of the Septuagint version of Gen. xxvi. 32, where the Greek translators evidently read נַו not for נַי to him (Quast. Heb. in Gen. p. 98 a).

(5) When noticing the obvious play upon the words מָשָׂא הַדָּאָה and מָשָׂא הַדָּאָה, and upon נַו וּבֵדָא וּבֵדָא in Is. v. 7, Jerome says, "volumus latinis insinuare suribus quod ad hebraeos diciscimus"; and he then proceeds to give the meaning of each word, and to show the difference which was caused in each case by the change of a single letter. It may, perhaps, be thought by some that Jerome wished to avoid the comparison implicit in his remarks by the statement that he was indebted for them to Jewish sources. It is scarcely probable, however, that a Hebrew scholar would have deemed it necessary to ascribe to his Jewish teachers information of so obvious a nature, and of which it is difficult to understand how any one who was tolerably versed in the Hebrew language could have been ignorant.

(6) Jerome’s remarks on the word נַעְלָה, afflicted, of the Niph. part. of the verb נַעְלָה, its constr. form, which he renders by the Latin word nuper, arv: "Sciimus in Hebraeo ipsum Latinum esse sermonem et propter eam nobis lax in Hebraeo erat positum; ut nuce possemus linguam, Hebraicism omnium linguarum esse mistricem." (Comment. in Zeph. iii. 18.)

(7) In his commentary on Is. ii. 16, Jerome gives it as the opinion of the Jews that שֶׁמֶרֶן, Tarshish, is the Hebrew word for the sea, and that ד’ is a Syriac word.

(8) In his commentary on Habakkuk iii. 5, he renders נִפְרוֹר blifrite, or persicentilia feter, by diabolus.

(9) Jerome’s opinion that a portion of the book of Job was written in hexameters shows to how great an extent he relied upon the authority of Philo, Josephus, Origen, and Eusebius, not one of whom appears to have been competent to form any opinion upon the question, and either how little he relied upon his own judgment, or how incompetent he was to arrive at any independent conclusion on such a subject. In his treatise on proper names Jerome observes upon the words Hiram, Ira, Ishtob, and Ishboeth as follows:—"Idcirco cum aspirazione haec nomina posuimus, quia et apud Graecos et apud Hebrews per diphthongum scribuntur." It will suffice here (1) to call attention to the reason fallaciously assigned for the aspiration of these names, that they begin with a dipthong; and (2) to present to the eye of the reader the four names in their Hebrew and in their Greek form:

1. דִּיֵּר, דִּיֵּר, Hiram.
2. דִּיֵּר, דִּיֵּר, Ira.
3. דִּיֵּר, דִּיֵּר, Ishtob.
4. דִּיֵּר, דִּיֵּר, Ishboetha.

It would be an easy task to multiply to an almost indefinite extent the indications afforded in the writings of Jerome of his imperfect scholarship, of his unseemly haste," and of his reliance upon sources of information which were not unfrequently fallacious. It is a more agreeable task, however, to direct attention to the very great value which his writings, especially his commentaries, possess (1) as laying the foundation, however imperfectly, of a sounder method of biblical exegesis than is to be found in the writings of any of his predecessors or contemporaries; (2) as preserving so much of the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion which would otherwise have been lost;

* E.g. in his preface to the book of Proverbs, Solomon’s Song and Ecclesiastes, Jerome writes thus: "Quae longa segetationis et fructus, ne penitus hoc anno reiteremus, et apud nos cumus omen, erat et quae nominis versus conseravi, interpretationem videlicet tristium Solomontus voluminius " (om. iv. p. 10, 2). And again, at the end of his commentary on Obadiah, he excuses himself thus, "Aliud est, mi Pamphlici, saepe siltum vertere, et quae memorabilis signum scribere. Aliud notarium est, praepratiris pueros reticienti dictare quodcunque in buccam teneris." He adds, "In hoc precepto et adolescunti tulli usum et senes praecumposimus." and (3) as pointing out, in many instances, the superiority of those versions over that of the LXX, which was commonly regarded as an inspired work, and to which Jerome himself at times was led to assign an authority which at other times he refused to recognize, and also over the old Latin version which was based upon it, and which, notwithstanding all the opposition which it had to encounter, the great work of Jerome ultimately superseded.

The most cursory comparison of the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, first with the version of the LXX, and then with that of Jerome, will suffice to establish the vast superiority of the latter over the former. A few instances taken from the first chapter of the Book of Amos will serve by way of illustration.

(1) In v. 1 the LXX treat δύσης, herdersmen, as a proper name, Ακακίον; they represent the words of the prophet as being uttered in that place, not the prophet himself as being in it, although the verb ἄναβει is in the singular number; and they translate the word Ἰσραήλ, Israel, by Jerusalem, thus misrepresenting, in a very important point, the main drift of the prophecy. Well might Jerome say in his preface to this book, “Septuaginta autem, necio quasi subtili et discreti sunt. Amos qui facti sunt in Acharim de Thecanae quos vidit pro Hierusaleme.” On the other hand, Jerome renders the verse thus from the Hebrew: “Vereba Amos qui fuit in pastorilibus (or pastoribus) Thecanae quae vidit super Israel.”

(2) In vv. 6 and 9, where the adjective μάλα, whole or entire, occurs as qualifying the captivity spoken of, the LXX renders it as a proper name, αἰγανασία τοῦ Ζαλαμώδους, whilst Jerome renders it correctly as an adjective, “captivitas perfecta.”

(3) In v. 11, whilst the LXX render ἔρρινα σπείρας, a net, by καὶ ἐκμεγυνοί μεγίστοι τινες γιγάντες and assign to the word the abstract meaning of ἔρρινα, μαρτυρον, witness, Jerome rightly renders the former phrase, “vulvateris meriorum ejus,” and ἔρρινα, usque in finem.”

It would be easy to multiply illustrations in proof of the superiority of Jerome’s work over the LXX, but any elaborate comparison of the two versions would unduly increase the length of the present article.

It will be obvious from what has been here alleged that it is by no means an easy task either, in the first instance, to form a correct judgment of the extent of Jerome’s Hebrew scholarship, or, when such judgment has been formed, to convey to readers of the 19th century a just estimate of the excellence and the defects of that scholar.

ship as compared with the more critical and exact scholarship of the present day. If any credence is to be given to words which breathe no spirit of arrogance or of intentional exaggeration, it will follow from Jerome’s account of his version of the book of Tobit, to which allusion has already been made, that however defective may have been the amount of his critical scholarship, Jerome must have acquired a very considerable amount of practical acquaintance with the Hebrew language, and a generally correct apprehension of the signification of Hebrew words and phrases. The same conclusion may be gathered from the success which crowned his labours as a teacher, as may be seen by reference to letters which he addressed to Paula and to Eustochium, her daughter (see p. 155, Gotha, 1865), who appear to have acquired by his aid a sufficient amount of acquaintance with Hebrew to enable them to have recourse to it for the better understanding of the Old Testament Scriptures.

THEODORET.—Theodoret was born at Antioch towards the close of the 4th century, and was made bishop of Cyprus, a small town of Syria, near the Euphrates, about the year A.D. 420, from which office he was deposed in the year A.D. 449, as a partisan of Nestorius. In addition to his History of the Church, and several controversial treatises, he has left behind him commentaries on a large portion of the Old Testament and on the Epistles of St. Paul.

These writings prove that Theodoret possessed a certain amount of acquaintance with Hebrew as well as with Syriac; and he appears to have had also the advantage of personal intercourse with learned Jews. Thus, e.g., in his Questions in Ezechias (Inter. xxv.), he observes that the Samaritans pronounced the sacred tetragrammaton as Ἰαβ (Yahweh), but the Jews as Ἰαχ. His remarks under the Hebrew language (Ezechias, in Gen. Inter. i.) are of a somewhat singular character. He observes, in proof that Hebrew is a sacred language and the direct gift of God, that whereas children commonly speak the language of the nation to which they belong, the children of Jews do not at once speak Hebrew, but the language of those amongst whom they are born; and he appeals to Ps. lix. 5, as it is rendered by the LXX, ἡ δυναμική πατρίδος ἡ Ἰουδαΐα, and ἡ ἑπαρκής ἡ Ἰουδαΐα. He proceeds to state his own views as to the derivation of the word Hebrew. After noticing the opinions of those who derive it from ἔβαρ, which he rejects, he expresses his belief that it is derived from the circumstance that Abraham crossed (יוֹפָד) the Euphrates. He observes that the Syriac for יָפָד, which is used by the LXX in Gen. xiv. 13, as the equivalent of יָפָד, Hebrew, is Hebri, and that he himself found that in the Hebrew the word was Hebri, and that the Greek word corresponding to the Hebrew Hebri is Ἐβραῖος, in support of which assertion he appeals to Gen. xxxix. 14, where the LXX have Εβραῖος as the equivalent of Ἰουδαΐα.

Again, in his Commentary on Ps. xciv. 20, where the LXX render the Hebrew יִבָּד by σώκρονιος, Theodoret observes that Symmachus renders it more clearly by consgregari (congregari, in his Commentary on Ps. lixii. 15), he notices the fact that Symmachus renders יִבָּד by אֲלֵי.
the Greek versions is found in his Commentary on 1 Kings i. 33, where David commands Solomon to be taken to Giloh. Theodoret observes upon this passage that the Nile is called Giloh; and he refers to Jer. ii. 18, where the LXX read Γάλι εἰς the equivalent of Νεῖλος, Siloh.

The use of a converse appears to have been unknown to Theodoret, for he observes on Ps. cxxi. 11, where the LXX has Καὶ ὁ Θεός αὐτὸν as the rendering of דאדרי, thus Symmachus, Theodotus, and the Hebrew itself, have אתֹּם, thus shewing that Theodoret regarded it as equivalent to אֲבֹהַה. Again, Theodoret’s remarks upon the derivation of the proper name אֶלֶוֹ, Jedidiah, 2 Sam. xxii. 25 (Quast. in II. Reg. Int. 26), seem to denote that he did not rightly understand the derivation of the word, or perceive the drift of the comments of Aquila and of Symmachus. The version of the LXX is as follows. Καὶ ἦλθεν τὸ βοῦς αὐτὸν, and which οὖν ἐρώτησεν, on which Theodoret observes, “Aquila interpreted the word ἔρωτην ἐρώτησεν on account of the Lord, but Symmachus εἰς βασιλείαν διήρισεν, set apart as a king.”

Once more, while Theodoret appears to have diligently compared the versions of Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotus with that of the LXX, and has recorded the variations in many instances, he does not appear to have been fully sensible of the linguistic grounds on which these variations rested, or he did not consider that they would be appreciated by those for whom he wrote. Thus e.g. in his Commentary on Ps. xxvii. 11, he observes, that, whereas the LXX render γνώσθησαν me, teach me, Aquila* and Theodotus render the same word enlighten me, φῶτον, but he does not allude to the fact that these interpreters, in common with the LXX in another place (e.g. 2 Kings xii. 3), confounded the Hiphil form of the verb γνώσθη and of the verb φῶτον, i.e. γνώσθη and φωτίζω.

And once more in his Commentary on Ps. x. 14, 15, when pointing out in support of his statement that the time denoted in the verse has been changed in the LXX, he appeals only to the versions of Aquila and the other Greek interpreters by whom the words ὡσαύτης, safely us, and ὡσαύτης, made us glad, are correctly rendered in the imperative mood, and not in the past tense as by the LXX and in the Vulgate.

Upon the whole, whilst the writings of Theodoret display a considerable amount of careful research, and have preserved many of the readings of the Greek interpreters, it seems that his acquaintance with Hebrew was rather such a superficial acquaintance as one living in Syria would have acquired by intercourse with those who spoke a cognate language, than such a grammatical acquaintance with it as would have qualified him for the task of an original interpreter or commentator.

There are other writers, as e.g. Lucian a disciple of Macarius of Eledess, about the end of the 3rd century, and Derothaeus, a presbyter of Tyre or of Antioc, and a contemporary of Eusebius of Caesarea, who are said to have possessed some

---

Zoor with Bela, בָּלָה, its former name (Gen. xiv. 2).

Another indication of Theodoret’s reliance upon the Hebrew text is found in his Commentary on 1 Kings i. 33, where David commands Solomon to be taken to Giloh. Theodoret observes upon this passage that the Nile is called Giloh; and he refers to Jer. ii. 18, where the LXX read Γάλι εἰς the equivalent of Νεῖλος, Siloh.

The use of a converse appears to have been unknown to Theodoret, for he observes on Ps. cxxi. 11, where the LXX has Καὶ ὁ Θεός αὐτὸν as the rendering of דאדרי, thus Symmachus, Theodotus, and the Hebrew itself, have אתֹּם, thus shewing that Theodoret regarded it as equivalent to אֲבֹהַה. Again, Theodoret’s remarks upon the derivation of the proper name אֶלֶוֹ, Jedidiah, 2 Sam. xxii. 25 (Quast. in II. Reg. Int. 26), seem to denote that he did not rightly understand the derivation of the word, or perceive the drift of the comments of Aquila and of Symmachus. The version of the LXX is as follows. Καὶ ἦλθεν τὸ βοῦς αὐτὸν, and which οὖν ἐρώτησεν, on which Theodoret observes, “Aquila interpreted the word ἔρωτην ἐρώτησεν on account of the Lord, but Symmachus εἰς βασιλείαν διήρισεν, set apart as a king.”

Once more, while Theodoret appears to have diligently compared the versions of Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotus with that of the LXX, and has recorded the variations in many instances, he does not appear to have been fully sensible of the linguistic grounds on which these variations rested, or he did not consider that they would be appreciated by those for whom he wrote. Thus e.g. in his Commentary on Ps. xxvii. 11, he observes, that, whereas the LXX render γνώσθησαν me, teach me, Aquila* and Theodotus render the same word enlighten me, φῶτον, but he does not allude to the fact that these interpreters, in common with the LXX in another place (e.g. 2 Kings xii. 3), confounded the Hiphil form of the verb γνώσθη and of the verb φῶτον, i.e. γνώσθη and φωτίζω.

And once more in his Commentary on Ps. x. 14, 15, when pointing out in support of his statement that the time denoted in the verse has been changed in the LXX, he appeals only to the versions of Aquila and the other Greek interpreters by whom the words ὡσαύτης, safely us, and ὡσαύτης, made us glad, are correctly rendered in the imperative mood, and not in the past tense as by the LXX and in the Vulgate.

Upon the whole, whilst the writings of Theodoret display a considerable amount of careful research, and have preserved many of the readings of the Greek interpreters, it seems that his acquaintance with Hebrew was rather such a superficial acquaintance as one living in Syria would have acquired by intercourse with those who spoke a cognate language, than such a grammatical acquaintance with it as would have qualified him for the task of an original interpreter or commentator.

There are other writers, as e.g. Lucian a disciple of Macarius of Eledess, about the end of the 3rd century, and Derothaeus, a presbyter of Tyre or of Antioc, and a contemporary of Eusebius of Caesarea, who are said to have possessed some

---

Zoor with Bela, בָּלָה, its former name (Gen. xiv. 2).

Another indication of Theodoret’s reliance upon the Hebrew text is found in his Commentary on 1 Kings i. 33, where David commands Solomon to be taken to Giloh. Theodoret observes upon this passage that the Nile is called Giloh; and he refers to Jer. ii. 18, where the LXX read Γάλι εἰς the equivalent of Νεῖλος, Siloh.

The use of a converse appears to have been unknown to Theodoret, for he observes on Ps. cxxi. 11, where the LXX has Καὶ ὁ Θεός αὐτὸν as the rendering of דאדרי, thus Symmachus, Theodotus, and the Hebrew itself, have אתֹּם, thus shewing that Theodoret regarded it as equivalent to אֲבֹהַה. Again, Theodoret’s remarks upon the derivation of the proper name אֶלֶוֹ, Jedidiah, 2 Sam. xxii. 25 (Quast. in II. Reg. Int. 26), seem to denote that he did not rightly understand the derivation of the word, or perceive the drift of the comments of Aquila and of Symmachus. The version of the LXX is as follows. Καὶ ἦλθεν τὸ βοῦς αὐτὸν, and which οὖν ἐρώτησεν, on which Theodoret observes, “Aquila interpreted the word ἔρωτην ἐρώτησεν on account of the Lord, but Symmachus εἰς βασιλείαν διήρισεν, set apart as a king.”

Once more, while Theodoret appears to have diligently compared the versions of Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotus with that of the LXX, and has recorded the variations in many instances, he does not appear to have been fully sensible of the linguistic grounds on which these variations rested, or he did not consider that they would be appreciated by those for whom he wrote. Thus e.g. in his Commentary on Ps. xxvii. 11, he observes, that, whereas the LXX render γνώσθησαν me, teach me, Aquila* and Theodotus render the same word enlighten me, φῶτον, but he does not allude to the fact that these interpreters, in common with the LXX in another place (e.g. 2 Kings xii. 3), confounded the Hiphil form of the verb γνώσθη and of the verb φῶτον, i.e. γνώσθη and φωτίζω.

And once more in his Commentary on Ps. x. 14, 15, when pointing out in support of his statement that the time denoted in the verse has been changed in the LXX, he appeals only to the versions of Aquila and the other Greek interpreters by whom the words ὡσαύτης, safely us, and ὡσαύτης, made us glad, are correctly rendered in the imperative mood, and not in the past tense as by the LXX and in the Vulgate.

Upon the whole, whilst the writings of Theodoret display a considerable amount of careful research, and have preserved many of the readings of the Greek interpreters, it seems that his acquaintance with Hebrew was rather such a superficial acquaintance as one living in Syria would have acquired by intercourse with those who spoke a cognate language, than such a grammatical acquaintance with it as would have qualified him for the task of an original interpreter or commentator.

There are other writers, as e.g. Lucian a disciple of Macarius of Eledess, about the end of the 3rd century, and Derothaeus, a presbyter of Tyre or of Antioc, and a contemporary of Eusebius of Caesarea, who are said to have possessed some knowledge of Hebrew. Eusebius says that Dorotheus was "devoted to the study of Hebrew, and that he read the Hebrew Scriptures with great facility." (Hist. Ecles. vii. 32). Eusebius of Emessa, moreover, if the works ascribed to him be genuine, seems to have used the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, as well as the Peshito version, in the commentaries which bear his name, on Genesis and on some of the Psalms. Little, however, remains of the genuine writings of these and of similar authors who lived in the first half of the Christian era, and in the few references to their reputed works there is an unduly length of the present article. We have already briefly examined the works of the most distinguished writers of the church of the first four centuries who possessed, or who might reasonably be supposed to have possessed, any acquaintance with the Hebrew language. It would be a useless task to examine at length the works of those writers who neither possessed, nor professed to have, any knowledge of Hebrew. A few references, however, to the works of St. Chrysostom and of St. Augustine will not be devoid of interest as illustrating the general neglect of Hebrew which prevailed alike in the East and in the West.

The most cursory examination of the writings of Chrysostom will suffice to show his ignorance of Hebrew. Thus, e.g., in his Fourth Homily on Genesis i. he tells his hearers that those who are well skilled in Hebrew (οἱ τῶν γλώττων διατηροῦν ἀρετῆς ἁρματον) say that in that language the word denoting heaves is of the plural number, and he informs them that further that it is the custom of the Hebrew language to use the plural number to denote a single object. He not only adopts the LXX version as the groundwork of his commentary, but he reasons from the use of the same Greek words in different places, without regard to the fact that the corresponding Hebrew words are different; e.g. ἔστασις, which answers to the Hebrew verb סנה, as in Gen. i. 17, compared with Gen. ii. 2, where the same verb corresponds with the verb דָּשָׁה, sum, whilst Chrysostom affirms that "sacred Scripture uses the same word in both places." Again, Chrysostom comments on Gen. ii. 2 in apparent ignorance that the Hebrew has "the seventh day," where the Greek has "the sixth." When explaining the meaning of the name Abraham in the Thirty-ninth homily on Genesis, Chrysostom adopts the erroneous etymology which connects it with עַבְרָהָם, transcrib., and observes that "they know this who are skilled in the Hebrew tongue;" whilst in the following homily he adopts the common error of supposing that the change in the name of Sarah consisted in the addition of a second ד, (ך) i.e. in the change from זָבָה to זָבַה, as he found the words transiterated in the Greek version.

In regard to the writings of St. Augustine we find several allusions to his own ignorance of that language, of which the following will suffice. In the 11th book of his Confessions Augustine writes thus: "Et si Hebraeæ voce loqueretur, frustra pulsaret sensum meum . . . . si autem Latine, scirem quid dicercet" (xv. 3.) And again, in his De Doctrina Christianâ (ii. c. 16) he not only implies his own ignorance of Hebrew, but also the prevailing neglect of that language, when he expresses his conviction that "if any one could interpret the meaning of the Hebrew names, he would be of great value and service in solving the enigmas of Scripture." It would obviously be useless to multiply proofs of the truth of Augustine's statement in regard to his own acquirements. It will serve, however, to illustrate still further the prevailing ignorance of Hebrew in his days if we refer to the eleventh chapter of his own treatise on doctrine, where he adds the two "Hebrew" words ῥαχα and ἡξανα as instances of words which cannot be translated into another language. It will suffice to observe that the former of these words is Aramaic or Syro-Chaldaic, not Hebrew, and although some difference of opinion exists as to the precise import of this word, which is one of common occurrence in post-Biblical Hebrew, it is difficult to understand how it was that those who were not only able (to use Augustine's words) "to mark and to ask about them," but who had access to the Greek and Latin versions of Ps. cxvi. 25, ἐκείνος ὁ δόξα τιμή μηδεμιον, O Domine salutem me fecit, should not have obtained from those versions some idea of the meaning of the word ἡξανα. b Socrates. His Ecclesiastical History (vii. 409), makes mention of one George, a presbyter belonging to the Arian fashion, who devoted himself to the study of the Sacred Scriptures, and who "evinced in his public expositions of the Old Testament no inaccessible acquaintance with the Hebrew language."

It deserves notice that Gildas, in the preface to his declaratory Epistle, refers to the fact that the fourfold Lamentations of Jeremiah are written in alphabetic order. It is indeed possible that this information was not given by Gildas as the result of his own examination of the Hebrew text. It is, however, quite correct; for whilst the first four chapters of the Lamentations are written in alphabetic order, the first, second, and fourth chapters, consisting of twenty-two or b One amongst numerous illustrations of the extent to which the value of the original text of the Old Testament was disregarded and the study of literal Hebrew neglected. In the time of St. Augustine, occurs in a letter addressed to St. Jerome (i. p. 282, Clarke's edition), in which he urges the following considerations in favour of a translation into Latin from the LXX rather than from the Hebrew: "For if your translation begins to be more generally read in many churches, it will be a grievous thing that, in the reading of Scripture, differences must arise between the Latin churches and the Greek churches, especially seeing that the discrepancy is easily condemned in a Latin version by the production of the original in Greek, which is the language very widely known both in society and the Church, if any one has been disturbed by the occurrence of something to which he was not accustomed in the translation taken from the Hebrew, and alleges that the new translation is wrong, it will be found difficult, if not impossible, to get the Hebrew documents, by referring the objection to exception which is taken may be defended. And when they are obtained, who will submit to have so many Latin and Greek authorities pronounced to be in the wrong?" Besides all this, Jews, if consulted as to the meaning of the Hebrew text, may be engaged to open from yours: in which case it will seem as if your presence were indispensable, as being the only one who could refute their view; and it would be a miracle if one could be found capable of acting as arbiter between you and them." verses each, alphabetically arranged, and the third chapter of sixty-six verses (three verses consecutively beginning with the same letter), the fifth chapter is not composed in alphabetic order.

Fabricius, one of the biographers of Aldehelm, bishop of Sherborn, who died about A.D. 709, speaks thus of his familiarity with the Hebrew language: Prophecatae exempla, Davidis Psalmos, Salomonis tria volumina, Hebraici litteris bene novit, et legem Mosaicam." (Ald. Opp. ed. Giles, p. 357.)

There is one writer, however, of the Western church, whose works, though belonging to a later period, seem to demand a special notice, viz. the Venerable Bede.

Beda, or Venerable Bede, as he is commonly designated, was born between the years A.D. 672 and A.D. 674, in the immediate neighbourhood of the twin monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow. He was educated at one or both of these places under the care of Abbat Benedict, and was instructed in the Holy Scriptures, as he tells us in his Ecclesiastical History (iv. 4), by Trumbert, a monk who had been educated under Ceddus, bishop of Lichfield. Bede possessed considerable knowledge of Greek as well as of Latin, and appears to have had some acquaintance with Hebrew, as may be gathered from his commentaries, which were confessedly, for the most part, compilations from earlier works, particularly from those of Basil, Ambrose, and Augustine, none of whom appear to have been acquainted with the Old Testament in its original tongue.

It is quite clear, indeed, that Bede, in common with other early expositors of the Old Testament, was indebted for some of his Hebrew criticisms to the learning of others. There is undoubted evidence that the works of Jerome were familiar to him. At the same time, when the state of learning in the age and country in which Bede lived is taken into account, there is less probability than in the case of most of his predecessors that he was able to have recourse for aid to those who were familiar with the Hebrew language, and consequently in those cases in which his information does not appear to have been derived from Jerome, there is the greater probability that he was in the habit of consulting the Hebrew Scriptures for himself.

The following instances from the Commentary on Genesis, in which Bede generally adopts the Vulgate as the basis of his remarks, but occasionally refers to an older translation, will suffice as illustrations of Bede's mode of reference to the Hebrew.

(1) In his notice of the account of the second day's work of creation, Bede observes that in this case only the words are not added, "And God saw that it was good." Now, when it is remembered that these words are found in the LXX, it is improbable that Bede would have made this statement on the authority of the Vulgate without reference to the original.1

(2) In his Commentary on Gen. ii. 2, Bede notices the variation of the Vulgate from the LXX, which latter version reads "sixth" instead of "seventh," and observes concerning the Latin version "quae de Hebraicis veritate fonte descendit" (ib. vii. p. 29).

(3) In his Commentary on Gen. ii. 8, Bede notices the difference between the Greek and the Latin renderings of δακτυλος, which is rendered in the LXX κερατος ουρανος, as orintum, and in the Latin, a principio, and he remarks concerning the latter version "quae de Hebraicis veritate translatat est." It is deserving of notice that Bede alludes to the opinion of certain persons that the site of the garden of Eden was far removed from all the regions of the earth which were inhabited by the human race, and that the waters of the flood which covered the surface of our world could not reach it. "Unde nec aquae diluvii, quae totem nostris orbis superficiem altissime cooperuerunt, ad eum pervenire potuerunt" (ib. p. 42).

(4) In his Commentary on Gen. ii. 19, Bede observes in proof that Hebrew was the original language of the whole human race, that all the names which are found in the Book of Genesis up to the division of tongues, appear to belong to it (ib. p. 51).

(5) In his Commentary on Gen. iv. 5, Bede observes in proof that Hebrew was the original language of the whole human race, that all the names which are found in the Book of Genesis up to the division of tongues, appear to belong to it (ib. p. 51).

(6) Bede's Commentary on Gen. iv. 7 is as follows, "Justa idiomata linguae Hebraicae indicativum modum pro imperativo posuit, quia habes innumera." Now although it is evident that Bede had the Quaestiones in Genesis before him, and that he adopted some of the very words of Jerome (as e.g. "quia liberis arbitrii es, moneo", nevertheless these words show that Bede was capable of examining the Hebrew text for himself. It is true that Jerome uses the words "esse dominium dominium," but it is extremely improbable that Bede should, on the strength of these words, have inferred that here, as elsewhere (e.g. in the Decalogue to which he here refers) the future tense is used in the Hebrew, not the imperative mood. On the other hand it is strange that Bede should insert in the text, and comment upon the words, "Egrediamur in agrum," corresponding to the Greek Διαφεύγων εκ τος χελεως, and to the Vulgate, "egrediamur foras," without noticing the fact that they are an interpolation, a fact, however, of which he could not have been ignorant, if the Quaestiones of Jerome were before him, inasmuch as the following words occur there: "Superfluum ergo est quod in Samaritanorum, et nostros volumine reperitur; transanes in campum." It should be observed that Bede repeats these words in the same context in both direct and indirect, of the use which Bede made of the writings of Jerome, he appears to have exercised his own judgment upon the information thus derived. Thus, e.g. in his Commentary on Gen. iv. 16, where Jerome, in his Quaestiones in Genesis, rejects altogether the view that Noah was the name of a country, and understands the word as denoting the wandering

---

1 Venerabilis Bedae opera quae supersunt omnia, vii. p. 11.
HEBELENIUS

very superficial it was sufficient to enable him to consult the original text of the Old Testament for himself, and to appreciate, at least, the value of the researches of his predecessors.

The results of this inquiry may be summed up in a few words. With the exception of Jerome, and perhaps of Origen, none of the early Christian writers appear to have possessed any knowledge of Hebrew which was worthy of the name. The knowledge possessed by Eusebius, to whom we may perhaps add Eusebius and Theodoret, was of an extremely superficial character, and served only, if indeed it extended so far, as to enable them to appreciate the value of the great work of Origen. Origen's scholarship was also very rude and elementary; and it yet remains to be ascertained to what extent the Hexapla represented the fruit of his own investigations, or the results of his wise and laborious appreciation of the knowledge of others. The name of Jerome stands out conspicuously above the roll of his predecessors and of his successors until the time of the Reformation as far as the most distinguished, perhaps the only Christian writer of antiquity who was qualified to make an independent use of his Hebrew acquirements, and to whom the whole Christian church will ever owe an estimable debt of gratitude for the preservation of so large a portion of the results of Origen's labours, and still more for that unrivalled and imperishable work which has been not inaptly described as having "remained for eight centuries the bulwark of Western Christianity" (see Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, art. "The Vulgate," ill. p. 1701).

[CR. J. E.]

HEGA, bishop of Duawich. [ETTL.]

HECATE, in the system of PISTIS SOPHIA, one of the five great archons presiding over the punishments of the "middle region." She has three faces, and has under her twenty-seven demons, which entering into men cause them to lie, perjure themselves, and covet what is not theirs. Such guilty souls are delivered over to her demons to be tormented by the dark smoke and wicked heat for 115 years, after which they are cast back into the sphere. (Plato Sophia, p. 368.)

[G. S.]

HECBURCH (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1372, in M. H. R. 781), king of Kent, son of Herewerg. [EGERTH (1).]

[Ch.]

HECCA (ECCA, ACOA), the seventh bishop of Hereford. (M. H. B. 621.) His name once occurs in a charter (Kemble, C. D. 183) which belongs to the year 758, and contains a grant of Cynewulf, king of Wessex, to the monastery of Bath. His predecessor Fodda appears last in 747, and his successor Ceadda possibly in 770; his date cannot be more nearly approximated to. (Will. Malmes. G. F. ed. Hamilton, p. 288.)

The interpolated dates assigned in one MS. of Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 546, 545, v. 786 and 826, are arbitrary inventions. [S.]

HECCCE (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1461, in M. H. B. 782), bishop of Lindsey. [EADRED.]

[Ch.]

HECIDIUS, son of Avitus. [Eccl. 5.]

HEBELENIUS or HECEBOLUS, a rhetor in the reigns of the emperors Con-life of Cain, Bede writes thus, "Nay autem in profugum, sive, ut in libro Hebræorum nomine sives, instalibem motum et fluctuationem vertiur, quod nonnulli, quibus et Josephus conceptam locum esse, in quo habitaverit Cain, autamatur" (ib. p. 78).

(7) In his Commentary on Gen. iv. 18 and iv. 23, Bede shews that he was acquainted with the Jewish tradition respecting the death of Cain at the hands of Lamech, but not, as it should seem, through Jewish sources, but from the writings of Jerome: "sicuct Hieronymus in quodam Hebraeo volumine scriptum esse testatur" (ib. p. 82).1

(8) In his Commentary upon Gen. v. 3, Bede gives a full account of the discrepancies between the Hebrew text and the version of the LXX.

(9) In his Commentary on Gen. vi. 4, Bede refers, by way of illustration, to Ps. xii. 6, where the LXX have δε γεγαρ, and the Vulgate "ut gigas." He is, aware, however, of the fact that the Hebrew word there used is "תִּהְוָה"; and he writes thus: "Quasvim in Hebraico veritate memoratus paeni vsicula its scripta siti: exaltata iuvenis et currendum vir" (ib. p. 83).

(10) In his Commentary on Habakkuk, Bede follows one of the ancient Latin versions, probably the Balsa, which agrees for the most part with the LXX, but differs greatly from the Hebrew and the Vulgate. He is not, however, altogether unmindful of the Hebrew original. Thus, e.g., whilst adopting as the rendering of the beginning of v. 3, Deus a Libsao veniet, where the LXX read ο τ Θεός δ τ Θεός ηθερ, and the Vulgate has, Deus ab Austron veniet, Bede remarks as follows: "Notandum autem quod ille versus in Hebraico veritate ita habetur, Deus a Thaeman, id est, ab austro veniet" (tom. ix. p. 408).

(11) Lastly, in regard to Bede's stigmata of proper names, we may observe that they are for the most part adopted verbatim, or with slight alteration from Jerome's Quaestiones in Genesim, or from his Treatise on Proper Names and Places.

Thus, e.g., whereas Jerome gives Audito Dei as the meaning of Ishmael, Bede gives Exaudito Dei as its rightful interpretation (Comment in Gen. xvi. ib. p. 184). His explanation of the meaning of the change from Sarai to Sarah is almost identical with that of Jerome in his Quaestiones (ib. p. 191). His explanation of the meaning of Bélá is the same as that of Jerome, devoratio. Bede's explanation of the meaning of Καδήθ is Sancta, sive Communata (ib. p. 213), the former of which is that of Jerome. And lastly, his interpretation of the meaning of Μαρκιας is Ἰησοῦς Dei, sive Nomen ejus Dei, the latter of which is that of Jerome in his De Nominibus Hebraiciis; and his Interpretation of Jonathan is Columbae dominus (ib. tom. viii. p. 51), which is derived from the same source. Upon the whole, the inference from the above premises seems to be that whilst Bede's knowledge of Hebrew was 1 Hieronymus Damaso, tom. iv. p. 142, Basil. 1616.

2 Allegorica Expositio in Lib. 1 Sam. cap. 1 (ib. p. 119).
HECFFERD

stantius, Julian, and Jovian. Under Constantius he practised at Constantinople, and professed himself to be a "fervent" Christian (δικτάρεω κριτικής [κριτικής]) on which account he was selected by that emperor as one of the teachers of the Julian, he being afraid that, if the young prince came under the influence of a pagan, he might be seduced to heathenism.

(Socrates, iii, 1, 13.) After the death of Constantius, however, he followed the example of his former pupil, and became a "fierce pagan" (γυρρόνος ΟΛίγος; Soc. a. d. 115.) He was in great favour with Julian, and appears to have been one of his familiar correspondents. (Julian, Ep. 19, ed. Heyler, p. 23; Επιστολάς.) Under that emperor, Hecebolius also seems to have had some civil office at Edessa. The Arians of that city, "in the insolence of wealth," had violently attacked the Valentinians there. Julian wrote to Hecebolius to say, "since they had done a what could not be allowed in any well-governed city," "in order to help the men more easily to enter the kingdom of heaven as it was prescribed," by their "most wonderful law, he had commanded all moneys to be taken away from the church of the Edesenes, that they might be distributed among the soldiers, and that its property should be confiscated to his prince as was good, so that he might become wise and not lose the kingdom of heaven which they hoped for." (Julian, Ep. 43,
ed. Heyler, p. 82; Baronius, a. d. 362, xiii.; Soz.
v. i. 1.) Such appropriation of church property was one of the great crimes of which Julian was Ost. iii.) The emperor adds that he had charged the inhabitants of Edessa to abstain from "riot and strife," lest "they themselves" should suffer "the sword, exile, and fire." The last sentence in the letter appears to intimate that he would hold Hecebolius personally responsible for the future good conduct of the city.
After the death of Julian, and the reversal of the imperial policy, which immediately followed, Hecebolius ostentatiously professed extreme penitence for his apostasy, and on one occasion prostrated himself at the church door, and cried to all that entered, "Trample upon me—the salt that has lost its savour" (σωτηρέω με... το δόσι το κάτωστον; Socrates, iii, 13; Baronius,
a. d. Matt. v, 13.) Baronius assumes the identity of the magistrate of Edessa with the "riector" of Constantinople (a. d. 362, xiii. xiv.)
but Tillemont regards them as different persons (Mon. vii. 321, 322). Libanius also mentions a Hecebolius, but gives us no clue to his history.
(Ep. 309.)

HECFFERD (Gaimar, Estoric, v. 1466, in M.
H. B. 782), king of Northumbria, son of Oswy.
[SOPHRID (1.3).]

Sopsrail (1.)

HECHBERACTUS, April 24, an English saint supposed by the Bollandist (Acta SS. April, iii. 291) to have been the same as Hechbertus or Egbert, archbishop of York.
[EGBERT (6).]

[O. T. S.]

HECHERIUS, eleventh bishop of Nevers, between Leodebonus and St. Deodatus, in the lists of the Gallia Christiana and Gams, but omitted altogether from Coquille's series. He subscribed the charter of Emmo, archbishop of Sens, for the monastery of St. Peter in that diocese (St. Pierre le viif) in a.d. 659. As his pro-decessor subcribed a procopium of Emmo dated in the same year, Hecherus's episcopate must have commenced, but passed over, an doubt in consequence of the difficulties of the times.
(Mich. Patr. Lat. lxxxvi. 1171-4; Coquille, Hist. du Nouveau, sub fin. Paris, 1612; Gall. Chr. xii. 627; Gams, Series Episc. 584.)

HECHTACH, virgin. [ECHTACH.]

HECTOR, as bishop of Cartagena, subscribes the acts of the council of Tarragona, a.d. 516 (Coleccion de Canones de la Iglesia Espanola, ii.
115; Gams, Kirchengeschichte, ii. 444.)

HEED ABBUS. [EWAEN.

HEDDA (1) (Haddi, Heddi, see AETLA), fifth bishop of the Gewioci, or West Saxons (M.
H. B. 619). He was appointed, according to Bede, to succeed Letherius, during the time of the West Saxons anarchy, in or about 676, and was consecrated at London (H. E. iv. 12). If he was identical with the pupil of St. Hilda, whom Bede calls Aetla, and makes bishop of Dorchester (H.
E. iv. 23), he must from the beginning have had the two sees of Dorchester and Winchester as his predisposition to hold them; if they were different persons, Aetla must be supposed to have had but a short tenure of Dorchester, and then to have made room for Hedd. One of the most important acts of his administration must have been the final fixing of his see at Winchester, a measure which was completed by the translation of the body of St. Birinus (Bede, H. E. ii. 7).
This event is placed in the Winchester Annals in the year 683 (Ang. Soc. i. 189), but the authority is slight, and the chronological signs discordant.
Rudburn, the later Winchester nunuid, has preserved a curious fragment of archbishop Theo-dore's legislation, which helps, if genuine, to show that Hedd was opposed to the subdivision of the West-Saxon diocese, which was thus deterred until after his death. The subdivision of dioces has generally been mooted at the synod of Hertford in 674, but there is no doubt in consequence of the difficulties of the times (Bede, H. E. iv. 5). Letherius was then bishop of Wessex, and Bede mentions, as something special, that he held the two sees by synodal decree. The attempt was renewed by Theodore in 679, when he succeeded in dividing the Mercian diocese, and may have so far succeeded in Wes-sex as to appoint Aetla to Dorchester. According to the decree preserved by Rudburn (Ang.
Soc. i. 193; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 126, 127), the archbishop determined that as Hedd had by the translation of St. Birinus, at the command of pope Agatho, added so greatly to the honours of Winchester, his diocese should not be diminished so long as he lived. Nothing certain, however, can be affirmed about this transaction.
Hedd's opposition to the division of dioceses continued as long as he lived. In the year 704, a synod was held in which the West Saxons were excluded from communion unless they would obey archbishop Britwald's injunction, "in ordinance episcoporum." They were still contumacious in 705; but the measure was adopted as soon as Hedd died. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 269, 275.) More satisfactory is the evidence of Bede as to this prelate's character; HEDDA

"he was a good man and just, and practised the life and learning of a bishop rather by the instruction of his own innate love of virtue than by lessons (lectionibus)"; from which we may infer that he was not a great scholar, another point in which a distinction between him and Aetla, the pupil of St. Hilda, might be discerned (H. E. v. 18). He was a close ally of Theodore; and the verses found at the end of Theodore's Penitential shew that he had influence with him. They are supposed to be written by a transcriber, but might be translated so as to appear the words of Theodore himself:

"Te nunc sancte spectulum
Verbi Deiigne dator
Haezdia pie praesul pater, Posticulum ditem decor,
Pro me peregrino,
Preces funde Theodooro."— Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 293.

With Ine also Heddá was closely associated, and his name appears in the preamble of the laws of that king as one of the counsellors and advisers by whose help he was legislating; (Thorpe, Ancient Laws, p. 45; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 214, 218.)

It can hardly be questioned, the inference from Bede's words being so clear, and the coincidence in time being significant, that Heddá opposed the division of Wessex into dioceses. The reason for this must be sought in the distracted condition in which he found the kingdom at the beginning of his episcopate. In 676 Wessex was divided among its eldersmen; that year Centwine succeeded in establishing his power, but on no very certain basis; he reigned until 685, when Caedwalla took the kingdom; his whole reign was devoted to war; Ine succeeded in 688; but by that time it was tolerably clear that if the West Saxons were to remain one kingdom, they must remain one diocese; after fifteen years of good government it was different, and a subdivision impossible in 679 was quite practicable in 705. Wessex was passing, moreover, through the first stage of monastic and missionary foundation. The institution of Westminster, of Malmesbury, Glastonbury, and Abingdon, with other smaller houses, such as those at Tisbury and Nursling, no doubt dates from the episcopate of Heddá. Hence his name frequently appears in charters, whether spurious or genuine. Thus in 680 he attests a grant of Caedwalla (whose proper reign began in 685) to Wilfrid (Kemble, C. D. 18); the same year he himself appears as granting three caskets at Lontoclo to Heminga, abbat of Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 19; Mon. Angl. i. 47), in 681 he consents to a grant by a king Baudred to Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 20; Mon. Angl. i. 48); in 682 he attests a grant of Caedwalla to Malmesbury (Kemble, C. D. 24; Mon. Angl. i. 258); in 688, a grant of Baudred to Malmesbury (Kemble, C. D. 29; Wilfrid, C. D. iii. 693); in 692 to the abbot of St. Ethelred, abbot of Oshtilred to Barking (Kemble, C. D. 35), and in 695 a grant of Erkenwald to the same house (Kemble, C. D. 38); in 701 he attests Ina's charter to Malmesbury (Kemble, C. D. 48; Ang. Sac. ii. 12); in 702 a grant to Glastonbury (ib. 49; Mon. Angl. i. 48). Bede places the death of Heddá at the beginning of the reign of Osred of Northumbria, whose reign commenced in 705: his memory was observed on the 30th of July. (Smith's note on Bede, H. E. v. 18.)

The venerable historian had heard from Peccheim, who served St. Aldhelm as deacon, that miracles were wrought at his grave; and that a deep ditch was made in the place by the practice of visitors carrying off portions of the dust, which possessed miraculous powers of healing.

William of Malmesbury (G. P. lib. ii. § 75) adds some particulars to Bede's account; asserting that Heddá, before he was bishop, had been a monk and abbot; and his name as abbot is appended to a charter of Leutharius (spurious), K. C. D. 11; the abbacy is generally supposed to have been Whitby (Rudburn, Ang. Sacra. i. 192), but this seems to depend on the identification with Aetla; and Whitby was properly ruled by an abbes. William of Malmesbury also asserts that he had read letters of Heddá to Aldhelm, "non nimis inducere compositas," and therefore doubts Edius's assertion about his bishop; however, preserved no letter of Heddá, although (G. P. lib. v, § 195) he gives a letter of Aldhelm to him, in which he gives an account of his studies (Aldh. Opp. ed. Giles, Ep. 5, p. 96; Mon. Mogunt. edit. Jafé, p. 32). The same historian found his name on one of the ancient illegible 'pyramids' at Glastonbury (Anct. Glast. ed. Gile, p. 300).

HEDDA (3), eighth bishop of the Mercians, holding a see at Lichfield (M. H. B. 623). Very little is known about Heddá, except that he fills a place among the bishops of Mercia, which would otherwise be vacant. We learn from Edius (V. Wilfr. c. 44, ed. Gale, p. 75) that when Wilfrid in 692 was driven by king Aldfrith into Mercia, he found that Saxulf, who was bishop there, was lately dead, and undertook the administration of his see. Saxulf appears to have united the dioceses of Leicester and Lichfield after the death of Cuthwin; and on his death Wilfrid is enumerated among the bishops of Leicester, Heddá taking the same place among those of Lichfield. (M. H. B. 623, 624; Will. Malmesb. G. P. lib. iv. § 172, ed. Hamilton, p. 307.) When Wilfrid returned to Northumbria, Heddá renewed the episcopal see at Lindisfarne (ibid.). Although this evidence is comparatively late, it rests on the foundation of the ancient lists, and has some confirmation from charters and tradition. According to the Lichfield History (Anglia Sacra, i. 428), Heddá built the church of Lichfield, which was dedicated Dec. 31 (or 24) 700; and translated the bones of St. Chad; dying in the year 721. His name appears among the attestations to the act of the Synod of Clavesho in 716 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300) in company with that of his successor Wor, a difficulty which may be explained by supposing one to have sat at Leicester and the other at Lichfield. In some other documents there is a difficulty in distinguishing the signature of Heddá of Lichfield from those of his contemporary and namesake Heddá of the greater part of Northumbria, but the following probably belong to the former: a charter of Ethelred of Mercia to bishop Offor of Worcester in 691 or 692 (Kemble, C. D. 32; Mon. Angl. i. 584), two spurious charters granted to Worcester by the same king (K. C. D. 33, 34), a charter of Osberhe (K. C. D. 36; Mon. Angl. i. 585), a grant of Suebried of Essex to Walhere bishop of London, dated June 13, 704 (Kemble, C. D. 52). As all these fall between 676 and 705, they may possibly belong to the West Saxon bishop, but as they are connected more or less closely with Mercian, it seems more natural to refer them to the bishop of Lichfield. The Heuda who attests the charter of Osric in 676 (K. C. D. 12) is not Heuda of Winchester, for Leuthgiris also signs: Hedda and Saxulf sign together, so that if the charter be genuine, Heuda must have been already consecrated. (Cason. Lich. Ang. Soc. i. 427, 428.) It is curious that this prelate is not even mentioned by Bede.
HEDDE

A story is told in the life of St. Guthlac (Mab. Acta SS. O. S. B. sac. iii. p. 1, p. 270) in which bishop Hedda is mentioned. The bishop was on his way to visit Guthlac; his attendants were discussing the stories of his sanctity; one of them, Wigferth or Wilferth, declared that he could distinguish by certain signs between a true and a false anchorite. On arriving at Crowland Hedda prevailed on Guthlac to be ordained priest, and to accept an invitation to dine. At dinner Guthlac looked at Wigferth, and asked him what he thought of the clerk whom he had undertaken to judge. Mabillon supposes this Heuda to be the bishop of Winchester, but it is much more reasonable to refer the story to the bishop of Lichfield, in whose diocese Crowland would probably be at the time.

HEDDE (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. 1009, charter of Osmund king of Sussex, A.D. 770; c. 1018, spurious charter of archbishop Ethelward, A.D. 789), bishop; perhaps Geada bishop of Hereford, as suggested by Stubbs, Regist. Sac. p. 7.

HEDDIUS, historian. [EDITUS.

HEDDO, bishop of Strasburg. [ETHRO.

HEDESIUS, martyr. [AEDESIA.

HEDIBIA (Edina), a lady in Gaul, who corresponded with St. Jerome (then at Bethlehem) about A.D. 405. She was of a remarkable family, descended from the Druids, and held the hereditary office of priests of Belen, who was identified with Apollo, at Bayeux. Her grandfather and father (if majoris is to be taken strictly) Patera and D pylus (the names being in each case derived from their office) were remarkable men. Of Patera, Jerome says in his Chronicle, at the year 339, "Patera rhetor Romae gloriosissime doctus." D pylus was a writer in prose and verse, and also a celebrated advocate, as we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus (xviii. 1), who tells a story of his pleading before the emperor Julian. They each in turn became professors at Bordeaux, and as such are celebrated by Ausonius (Carmen, Prof. Burd. iv. and v.) in two short poems, from which the details above given are derived. The wife and daughter of D pylus became entangled in the Zoroastrian teaching of Priscillian, and suffered death in the persecution of his followers (Sulp. Sert. Hist. Sac. ii. 63, 64; Prosper Aquit. Chron.; Auson. Carmen, v.).

Hedibius was a diligent student of Scripture, and, finding no one in her neighbourhood who could assist her, she sent, by the hand of her friend Apodemus, a list of questions to Jerome, begging him to answer them. He did so in a long letter (ep. 120, ed. Vall.). We hear of her again as a friend of Artema, wife of Rusticius, (c. 40), on whose account she again wrote to Jerome (ep. 122, ed. Vall.).

[H. W. F.]

HEDILBURGA (Kemble, C. D. 359), abbess of Beddanhium. [ETHILBURGA (39).]

[H. T. S.]

HEDISTUS (1), Nov. 13, martyr at a place called Perinthius or Pulinthius (Wright, Syn. Mart. in Jour. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 431).

[H. T. S.]

HEDISTUS (2), bishop of Cues in Bitinia, at the synod of Constantinople under Menas, A.D. 356. (Mansi, viii. 1143; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 633.)

[H. D.]

HEDONE, an Aecon in the system of Valentinus, the consort of Antiphanes, according to the account of Ireneus (i. p. 6; ii. xiv. p. 135), but of Acinetus according to that of Epiphanius (Haer. 31, p. 169). Some light is thrown on the introduction of the name into the system by the phrase in the Valentinian fragment, Epiph. Haer. 31, p. 170: ἡ Ὑβόνοι σῶσθαι μετὰ ἡδονῆς γεγονότος καὶ ἄφθερος μείνας. (G. S. Y.)

HEGEMONIUS, a writer said by Photius (cod. 85) to have written out (ἀργολόφωνος, perseript) the disputation of Archelaus against Manes. Ceiller (ii. 455) thinks that Hegemonius may have translated Archelaus's work into Greek, or have re-edited it with additions.

[C. H.]

HEGESIPPUS (1), commonly known as the father of Church history, although his works, with the exception of a few fragments which will be found collected in Bouth (cit. Naur. I. pp. 207-219), and in Grueh (Neposlogia, ii. 203-214), have perished. Nothing positive is known of his birth or of the early circumstances of his life. From his use of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, written in the Tyro-Chaldaic language of Palestine, his name in his history of words in the Hebrew dialect, and his mention of unwritten traditions of the Jews, Eusebius infers that he was by birth a Hebrew (E. H. iv. 22). The inference appears to be correct, although it is possible, as conjectured by Weissacher (Hergott, Acyco. v. 647), that Eusebius, by the mention of these particulars, may only intend to confirm a fact which he had ascertained from other sources. The Jewish birth of Hegesippus, however, and his conversion from Judaism to Christianity afford no sufficient ground for the conclusion that he belonged in after life to the Judaizing rather than the Catholic section of the Christian church. Many Christians, Jews by birth, were in the second century entirely free from Judaizing tendencies. We owe whatever information we possess as to the time in which Hegesippus flourished to a statement of his own preserved by Eusebius (iv. 22), who quotes him as saying that he made a voyage to Rome, spending many happy days at Corinth by the way. Hegesippus then adds, γενέσθαι δίκ ν Ἐλευθέρου, which is understood to mean that when at Rome he compiled a succession of the bishops of the Roman see to the time of Anictus, whose deacon was Eleutherus. After this statement Hegesippus is represented as adding, "and to Anictus succeeds Soter, after whom Eleutherus." Much as the meaning of these words, in their connection with those preceding them, has been disputed, it does not seem difficult to gather the sense. Hegesippus means that the list of bishops compiled by him at Rome was drawn from the authentic records of the church there. That list closed with Anictus. He was afterwards able, either from his own knowledge, or from the information gained from other sources, to add the names of Soter and Eleutherus. It appears that he was at Rome in the days of Anictus, and that he made his inquiries then, although he did not publish them till a considerably later date. But Anictus, according to the careful calculations of Lipsius (Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe), was bishop of Rome from A.D. 156 to A.D. 167. Eleutherus again presided over the see from A.D. 175 to A.D. 189. We are thus furnished with two dates on which it seems possible to rely. Hegesippus had written much of his history previous to A.D. 167. He published it in the time of Eleutherus, and perhaps early in his episcopate. Any difficulty in accepting these dates has been occasioned by the rendering given to another passage of Eusebius (iv. 8), where he again quotes Hegesippus as speaking of certain games (ἄγων) instituted in honour of Antinous, a slave of the emperor Hadrian, of which he says ἄγων ἱμάτια γεγομένα (a better established reading than γυναικέας). But the meaning of these words seems simply to be that the games referred to had been instituted in his own time, thus illustrating the ἡ τέσσαρα ἀποκαθήμενα of the preceding sentence. Hadrian possessed the throne from A.D. 117 to A.D. 138, so that if Hegesippus published about A.D. 180, being then well advanced in life, he might well remember the times of that emperor. What has been said derives confirmation from a statement of Jerome, generally regarded as somewhat extravagant, that the life of Hegesippus had bordered on the apostolic age (vicius universae ecclesiasticae, c. 24). But there is no extravagance in the remark. If Hegesippus was born about A.D. 120, and he might have been born considerably earlier without being too old to publish in A.D. 180, he may well be described as having lived near the times of St. John, to whose death, close upon the end of the first century, the apostolic age continued. It appears then that all our information hangs well together, and that we shall not be far wrong, if we fix the bloom of Hegesippus's life about the middle of the 2nd century. The work of which we have spoken as containing the list of the Roman bishops was by no means confined to this, or to particulars connected with it. It was entitled πίνακας ἐκκλησιατικῶν πράξεως, and it embraced, so far as we may judge from its fragments, numerous miscellaneous observations, traditions, arranged without any regard to order, and jotted down just as they might have occurred to its author, or come under his notice during his travels. This must be the meaning of Jerome when he tells us that the work contained the events of the church from Palestine to Rome, and from the death of Christ to the writer's own day. Anything like a regular history of the church is not to be thought of. Weitzacker well remarking that, in that case, the story of James the Just ought to have been found in the first book, not in the last.

The general style of the work was thought plain and unpretending, sermo simplici, says Jerome, ut quorum vitam sectatatur dicendi quoque expireret charactere. With this description what remains of it sufficiently agrees. The question as to its trustworthiness is of greater moment, for the account given in it of James's death is in conflicting hands, and we must, according to the degree of credibility we attach to it, greatly affect our view both of that distinguished man and of the relations subsisting between Judaism and Christianity in the period immediately following the crucifixion of our Lord. That account has led to many charges against Hegesippus as not having been careful enough to prove what he relates, and as having followed too readily the wonderful stories which could not fail to spring up and circulate in the infant church with regard to its apostles and martyrs. In particular it has been thought to be contradicted by Josephus, who tells us that "Ananus, the high-priest, assembled the Sanhedrin of judges, and brought before them the brother of Jesus who was called Christ, whose name was James, and some others. And, when he had formed an accusation against them, he delivered them to be stoned." (Antiq. x. 9, 1.) We may be permitted to doubt, however, whether the sentence thus referred to was carried out, for not only was it unlawful for the Sanhedrin to inflict the punishment of death without consent of the Roman authorities, but Josephus informs us in the immediately following portion of his narrative that, when the most equitable of the citizens complained to the procurator of what had been done, their charge against Ananus was, that it was not lawful for him to assemble a Sanhedrin without the procurator's assent. Nothing is said of the stoning to death. When we add both that Eusebius, who has preserved the narrative, together with the other events that he alludes to, appear to have placed in it implicit confidence, and that there is nothing improbable in most, if not even in all, of the particulars mentioned, we may be permitted to doubt whether the charges against Hegesippus founded upon this passage are substantiated. In no other passage of our author's writings that has come down to us is there any evidence of a too easy credibility, or of a love of the marvellous that might throw suspicion upon the general accuracy of his statements. It is clear that Eusebius had a high opinion of him. He both speaks of him in the most commendatory terms, and quotes him on numerous occasions (see E. H. ii. 23; iii. 11, 16, 20, 32; iv. 8, 11, 22), illustrating his own words in iv. 8, πλεῖστα περιπλακατούμενα. Such confidence appears to have been deserved. Hegesippus was possessed of an interesting mind, and as we have already seen he travelled much; he endeavoured in the course of his journeys to learn all that he could both of the past and present state of the churches that he visited; at Corinth the first epistle of Clement excited his curiosity; at Rome the history of its early bishops. Combine with all this his unpretending and unexaggerated style, and we are entitled to inferred that he was very far indeed from being either a hasty observer or a credulous chronicler.

An important question relative to Hegesippus remains to be considered. What were his views of Christian truth? Was he of the Judaizing Christian party, or was he not? The question bears closely upon the estimate to be formed by us of the prevailing element in the Christian church of the first half of the 2nd century.

Baur has expressed himself strongly upon this point, looking upon Hegesippus as a representative of the narrowest section of the Jewish Christians of his time, even of the sects of the Jewish declared enemies of the apostle Paul, and describing him as travelling like a commissioned agent in the interest of the Judaizers. (K. G. i. p. 84.) The same view has been advocated by Schwager (Nachap. Zeit, i. p. 342, &c.). It is founded mainly upon an extract from his works, preserved in Photius (see in Routh, R. S. i. p. 219), in which he speaks in a language of the first quotation in the form in which they appear in 1 Cor. ii. 9, wherein indeed of "the just" we have them "that love Him." The substitution of the one expression for the other suggests at once that Gnostic arrogance which so often sought satisfaction in titles of that kind.

(2) The inference now drawn as to the object of the first quotation is rendered still more probable by the fact that it is impossible to apply to St. Paul the second quotation in the second of the extracts above. To describe that apostle as hiding himself in a hole of darkness is to present him in a light the very opposite of that which is most prominent in his whole character and life and labours. (3) The probability that Hegesippus had Gnostics and not St. Paul in view, is still further increased when we consider that Eusebius, who had his whole work before him, speaks in decided language of his soundness in the faith, and of his having recorded the pure tradition of apostolic preaching (iv. 8), language that he would certainly not have used had he not had ample evidence that the opinions of his author were in accordance with catholic truth. Besides this, he tells us that Hegesippus had in his work given the "greatest testimony as to his own opinions" (E. H. iv. 22). He was not, therefore, judging hastily. (4) Hegesippus himself, when relating what he had found in each succession of bishops examined and in each city visited by him, declares that he found all things in a condition conformable to what was required by "the law and the prophets and the Lord," authorities which Ritschel (n. a. p. 208) has shown to be precisely those of the Catholic church of the time, to which it made its appeal, and in which it instructed its catechumens. (5) If Neander be right in thinking (Ch. Hist. ii. p. 464, T. and T. Clark) that the mode in which Hegesippus speaks of the first epistle of Clement shows that he believed himself to find in it the pure doctrine of Christ, the conclusion to which all these remarks lead may be considered uncontroversial for the Pauline. The propriety of Clement's epistle is denied by no one. (6) It may still further be noticed, as not without a bearing upon the point before us, that Hegesippus, who approved of the epistle of Clement, must have known that this father quotes in Ch. xxiv., for a purpose precisely similar to that of the apostle, the very passage in question, though with a slight variation in the words, which, however, was not possible, but should hold the very contrary opinion as to the use made of it by St. Paul? It is obviously a particular application of the passage, different from that of the apostle, that he has in view.

In the light of all these considerations it is not too much to say that Hegesippus appears to have been not a Judaizing but a Catholic Christian, and, if so, he becomes a witness not only for that use of the Gnostic Christian church of the 2nd century, but for the extent to which Catholic truth prevailed in it, and for the hold which that truth had acquired over the minds of its members. It ought not to be forgotten throughout this whole controversy that, whatever Hegesippus witnesses for, his evidence has reference to the condition of the church upon a large scale. It is of no small corner that he speaks, but of a very large, and that probably the most active, portion of it. Either, therefore, over this wide extent the church was marked by a narrow Judaic spirit, with some members perhaps, yet not worthy of mention, of a freer and a better one, or over the same wide extent the church was catholic in spirit, with heretical sects struggling to corrupt its faith. Which of the two views is most in correspondence with all that we know of the first half of the 2nd century, the reader may be safe left to say. If it be verdict in favour of the latter, it becomes impossible to look at Hegesippus in the light in which he has been presented by the Tubingen school. We must regard him as a Catholic, not as a Judaizing Christian, and his statements as to the condition of the church in his day become a powerful argument against, rather than in favour of, the conclusions of that school.

[W. M.]

HEGESIPPUS (3) (EGESIPPUS), the alleged author of a work of which a translation from Greek into Latin, or what purported to be such, appeared somewhere about a.d. 400, and is commonly referred to under one of the titles De Belo Judaico, De Excidio Urbis Hierosolymitanae. The work is in five books, the first four of which are taken from the corresponding ones of the Wars of Josephus; and the fifth in great part from the sixth and seventh books of the same. It is not a translation, properly so called. The translator freely adds to his author, sometimes from the later books of the Antiquitates of Josephus, sometimes from the Roman historians and other sources. He also freely composes speeches for the actors in the scenes which he narrates.

It is clear that the author was a Christian, from the language in which he speaks of the death of our Lord and the subsequent persecution of His disciples by the Jews (ii. 12, p. 151); of Simon, and of the apostles Peter and Paul (iii. 2, pp. 170-173); and of Judaism (iv. 5, p. 230). The entire work indeed is that of one who was an earnest defender of the Christian faith. An approximation to his work is supplied by several passages; as when he speaks of Constantine having long become the second city of the Roman empire (iii. 5, p. 179), and of Ancyra, once the metropolis of the Persians, being in his time the defence of the Byzantines against that people. He also speaks of the triumphs of the Romans in “Scotia” and in “Saxon,” using language strikingly similar to that of Claudian (c. A.D. 398) on the subject (v. 18, p. 299; Claud. De in. Conc. Honor. 31-34).

The work early acquired a considerable reputation. It may possibly be referred to by Cassiodorus towards the close of the 5th century, who, when speaking of the writings of Josephus, says that their translation has been attributed to Jerome, to Ambrose, and to Rufinus (Cassiod. de nat. Litterar. in Migne, Patrol. Lat. ixx. 1192). It was certainly made use of by Isidore of Seville (599-636), whose language in reference to the Dead Sea, the lake of Gennesaret, the Orontes, and other subjects, is often a literal translation from Hegesippus.

A MS. of the work ascribed to Hegesippus, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and of about the 7th century, has at the close of the first book “Egesipp liber primus explicit,” and at the commencement of the second “Ambrosius Episcopus ita codicem instigavit ut in his praebat” (Mabillon, Mus. Ital. p. 13). Other manuscripts likewise ascribed the translation to Ambrose, while some attribute the original itself to that father; and these are followed by the editor princes (Jodoc. Ascens. Paris, 1511). The Benedictines, however, strongly reject the Ambrosian authorship, asserting that the work contains nothing written in Ambrose’s lifetime; while Galland earnestly contends for it, and reprints an elaborate dissertation of Mazochius, which he regards as conclusive (Galland. Biblioth. Patr. vii. prolegom. p. xxix.). The editors of the Patrologia incline to the condition of the Benedictines, but print the work among the writings of Ambrose (xv. 1865). The latest and most correct edition (Marburg, 1856, 1864, 4to) is that which was commenced by professor C. F. Weber of Marburg, and completed after his death by professor Julius Caesar, who has elaborately discussed the question of the authorship and date (pp. 389-399). It is at least possible that Hegesippus was a misreading of an early copyist, who had before him Ex Joossip (Gronov. Observationes in Script. Exot. Monobiblos. 1651, 1-20). This work has been frequently translated into Italian by P. Lauro, a.d. 1544, into French by J. Millet, a.d. 1556, into Dutch anonymously a.d. 1711, and a.d. 1722.

[ T. W. D.]

HEIMARMENÉ, elapromy. According to the account given in PISTIS SOPHIA of the constitution of the universe, above this world lies the firmament (arpolamios); above that the first sphere, that of the Zodiac, and above that again the second sphere, elapromy, the light of which is forty-nine times greater than that of the first sphere, and whose archons rule the earthly world. They again are subject to the twelve aeons who dwell in the next highest region. Seen from the sphere elapromy this world appears but as a speck of dust, and its light as utterly dark, but is equally insignificant in the appearance of the sphere elapromy as seen from the region of the twelve aeons. (Pistis Sophia, pp. 22, 184.)

[G. S.]

HEINIF, clerical witness to the grant of the village of Bertus by king Ithael of Glamorgaon to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lob. Lond. by Rees, 181, 441.)

[ J. G.]

HEINYN, bard of Maegwn and Gwynedd and belonging to the college of Llanelithyn, nourished between a.d. 530 and 560. In the Myn. Archæology of Wales (i. 592) there is printed a prediction of his addressed to Maelgwn, according to the Chweddeu y Ddoothos his characteristic saying was, “The brave are never cruel.” (E. Williams, Iolo MSS. 252; R. Williams, Emin. Welsmyn. 213.)

[ J. G.]

HEIRA, sister of pope Damasus. (Boll. Acta SS. 21 Feb. ii. 244–5.) [IRENE.

[ J. G.]

HEISE (HASEEA), of Airidh-foda, commemorated Feb. 24. Her place was perhaps Ard-foadh, a fort on a hill near Ballymaggerty, in the barony of Tirhugh, co. Donegal. (Martyr Denog. by Todd and Reeves, 57; Four Most. by O'Donovan, i. 256, n. *; O'Halton, Irish Saints, ii. 633.) Mart. Tall., Feb. 24 (in Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. xvi.), has a mangled reading, "Ciaran b-messa, I. Airdfota," and the Bollandists (Acta SS. 24 Feb. iii. 435) mention Hassese among their pretermissi. [J. G.]

HEISTULFUS (ASTULFUS, HASTULFUS), apparently a Lombard, to whom Paulinus, patriarch of Aquileia, wrote a letter from Frankfort, A.D. 794, severely reprimanding him for his barbarous treatment of his wife, whom he had murdered, on a probably false charge of infidelity which had been brought against her by one person only, a man of most disreputable character. Paulinus offered him the choice of retirement to a monastery, or a lifetime of penitential discipline, which he describes at some length. The letter early passed into the Canon Law, circ. A.D. 866. Wulfadus archbishop of Bourges prayed Hinencmar archbishop of Rheims, the great canonist of his age, to send him a copy of it, as he needed its guidance in a similar case, which appears to have arisen in his own jurisdiction. Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 21, in Patrolog. Lat. cxxxv. 204). In the early part of the 11th century Burchardus bishop of Worms adopted it as authoritative in his Decreta (vi. 40, Ep. Paulin., ... ad Heistulf., in Patr. Lat. cxl. 774). Towards the close of that century Ivo bishop of Chartres similarly adopted it both in his Decretum and his Panormia. He, however, ascribes the letter to pope Stephen V. A.D. 816-817 (Decr. viii. 126, Hastulpho, in Patr. Lat. clxv. 610, Panormiv. vii. 16, Astulfio in Patr. Lat. o. 1283). Gratian also adopts it in his Decretum, but like Ivo ascribes it to Stephen V. (excxi. ii. c. 8, Hastulpho in Patr. Lat. clxxviii. 1512). Labbe published the letter from a Rheims MS., which seems to confirm Burchardus both as to the orthography of the inscription and as to the authorship of the letter (Concil. vii. 1064; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcir. 186). [T. W. D.]

HELEO, bishop of Baale. [HERETO.]

HEIU, a Northumbrian lady, the first person in that province who took the veil, which she received at the hands of bishop Aidan. She founded a nunnery at Heretoe, or Hartlepool, in the county of Durham, over which Hilda subsequently presided. The burial-ground of this ancient house of religion was discovered in 1838, and some remarkable slabs were found bearing crosses and inscriptions in Latin or Runic. After a short residence at Hartlepool Heiu retired to Calcaria, where she established another house of devotion. The Roman Calcaria is the English Kaelcascaster, and is generally considered to be the modern Tadcaster, a small town country about six miles to the south-west of York. It is possible that the neighbouring village of Heanlung means Heiu's heog, or lee, and that her residence was there. In the cemetery of that place Mr. D. H. Haigh detected an ancient grave-stone bearing Heiu's name. The sole authority for the events of Heiu's life is Bede, H. E. iv. 23.

The author of The Life and Miracles of St. Beda, who wrote in the 12th century, identified her with Heiu, making her reside on the Cum-
HELENAN

HELENAND, alternative name of ELDAD.

HELDALDOUS of MAEBUS. [ELOLDUS.]

HELEBICIANUS. [ELLEBICIANUS (2).]

HELENA (1), said to have been the companion of SIMON MAGUS. According to Justin Martyr (Apoll. 1. 28) and Ireneus (i. 23, p. 99), who possibly makes use of a lost work of Justin’s, she is said to have been the prostitute to whom Simon had sold her from a brothel at Tyre, and whom he led about with him, holding her up to the veneration of his disciples. Giving himself out to be the Supreme Power and the Father above all, he taught, says Ireneus, that “she was the first conception of his mind, the mother of all things, by whom in the beginning he conceived the thought of making the angels and archangels; for that this conception [ENNOUA] proceeded forth from him and, knowing her father’s wishes, descended to the lower world, and produced the angels and powers, by whom also he said that this world was made. But after she had produced them, she was detained by them through envy, since they were unwilling to be considered the offspring of any other being; for he himself was entirely unknown by them: but his conception was detained by those powers and angels which were put forth from her, and suffered every insult from them that she might not return upward to her father; and this went so far that she was even confined in a human body, and for ages passed into other female bodies, as if from one vessel into another. He said, also, that she was Helen on account of whom the Trojan war was fought; for reviling of whom by his verses, Steichorucus was struck blind, and afterwards, on account of his penitence and malindore, restored to sight; that after passing from one body to another, and constantly meeting with insult, at last she became a public prostitute, and that she was ‘the lost sheep.’ On this account he had come that he might first of all reclaim her and free her from her chains, and then give salvation to men through the knowledge of himself.” The same story is told by Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 19, p. 174); Tertullian (de Anima, 34); Epiphanius (Haer. 21); Philaster (Haecr. 29); Theodoret (Haecr. Fob. i. 1). Tertullian evidently knows no more than he read in Ireneus, but Hippolytus, who himself read the Megadn, Ἀμφίδρωτος, gives some additional particulars, as for instance, that Simon allegorized the story of the wooden horse and of Helen and her torch. The wooden horse must also have been mentioned in the earlier treatise against heresies, used by Epiphanius and Philaster, both of whom state that Simon expounded it as representing the ignorance of the nations. Epiphanius, then, it may be believed, did not invent some other particulars, in which he differs from or goes beyond Ireneus. He states that Simon gave to this Ennoea of his, the names Prunicus and Holy Spirit; and he gives a different account, in some respects, of the reasons for her descent into the lower world. According to this account, she was sent in order to rob the Archons, the framers of this world, of their power, by enticing them to desire her beauty, and setting them in hostility to one another.

The honour paid to Helena by the followers of Simon was known to Celcus, who tells (v. 62) that certain of the Simonians were also called Heleniani, from Helena, or else from a teacher Helenus. We are told, in addition, by Ireneus and Hippolytus, that the Simonians had an image of Simon in the form of Jupiter, and of Helen in that of Minerva, and that they honoured them, calling the former lord, the latter lady. This adaptation of the myth of Athene springing from the head of Zeus to the form of Ennoea to the first Father, is of a piece with the appropriation of other Grecian myths by these heretics.

The doctrine attributed to Simon in these representations, has close affinity with that of other Gnostic systems, more especially with the Ophite system, described at the end of the first book of Irenaeus, except that in the Gnostic system, one female personage fills parts which in other systems are distributed among more than one. But in several systems we have the association with the First Cause of a female principle, his thought or conception; and we have (see, for instance, PISTIS SOPHIA) the myth of the descent of a Sophia into the lower material regions, her subjection of the powers who rule there, her struggle with them, and her ultimate redemption. What is peculiar to Simon is his doctrine of the transmigration of souls, and his identification, by means of it, of himself and his female companion with the two principal personages of the Gnostic mythology. The fictions that have been invented concerning other founders of heresies do not at all resemble this story, for Simon persuaded his followers not only to concede his connexion with a degraded person, but to accept the fact of her degradation fully admitted as only a greater proof of his redemptive power. And we find it easier to believe, therefore, that the story had a foundation in fact, than that it was imagined without any. On the other hand, it does not seem likely that the hero of the Gnostic story was a follower of Simon. The Gnostic, it being more credible that he turned to his account a mythology already current, than that he could have obtained acceptance for his tale of Ennoea, if invented for the first time for his own justification.

Baur has suggested (Christliche Gnosis, p. 308) that Justin in his account of the honours paid at Samaria to Simon and Helena may have been misled by the honours paid to the Phœnicians sun and moon deities of similar names. On this and other questions connected with the subject of this article, see Simon. Suffice it here to say that one strong fact in support of his theory, viz. that in the Clementine Recognitions (ii. 14, preserved in the Latin of Rufinus) the companion of Simon is called Luna, may possibly have originated in an early error of transcription. She is Helena in the corresponding passage of the Clementine Homilies, ii. 23; and we find elsewhere the false reading Selene for Helene, as for instance in Augustine (de Haecr. 1). We attach little weight in this argument to the statement of the Clementine Homilist already quoted under DOSTHEUS, Vol. i. p. 902, that as Jesus, the Sun, had twelve apostles corresponding to the twelve months of the year, so John the Baptist, the Moon, corresponding to the twenty-nine and a half days.
HELENA

of the month, had in his circle twenty-nine men and this woman.

[ős.]

HELENA (2), St., or FLAVIA JULIA HELENA AUGUSTA, first wife of Constantius Chlorus, and mother of Constantine the Great, born about A.D. 248, died about 327.

1. Life.

2. Invention of the Cross.

1. Life.

Little is known of the life of St. Helena. Little beyond the two facts that she was mother of Constantine the Great and that at the age of about eighty years she undertook a royal and holy pilgrimage to Palestine, which resulted in the adornment and increased veneration of the holy places in that country.

The date of her birth is only arrived at by inference from her age at the time when she undertook this pilgrimage. The place where she was born is also doubtful; but the most probable of those which are mentioned is Drepanum in Bithynia, whence she is said to have called Heleneopolis in her honour (Procopius, de Aedificiis, v. 2, vol. iii. p. 311, ed. Bonn; Chron. Pasch.). The story that she was daughter of a British prince, Coel, and born at York, Colchester or London, is merely a portion of the legend which afterwards arose connecting the origin of her famous son with Britain. [Constantine the Great, Vol. I. p. 625.]

She was doubtless of humble parentage, being, according to one story, the daughter of an innkeeper (Anon. Valesi 2, 2, "matre vilissima.", St. Ambros. de Obitu Theodos., § 42, p. 295, "Stabularism hanc primo fuisse aedidit, cific cognitam Constantio seniori, qui postea regnum adeptus est. Bona stabularia quae tam dilligenter praesepe Domini requisitum," etc.). Constantius at the time when he made his acquaintance was a young officer in the army, of good family and position, nearly related, by the female line, to the emperor Claudius, and he appears to have at first united her to himself by the looser tie which was then customary between persons of such different conditions (St. Hieron. Chron. anno 2322; Orosius, vii. 25; Chron. Pasch. A.D. 304, vol. iii. p. 517, ed. Bonn; Zon. ii. 6). The relation of "concubinatus" might be a life-long one, and did not necessarily imply anything of immorality. In outward appearance it differed nothing from the ordinary civil marriage by mutual consent of the parties to live together, and was sometimes called "conjugeum inaquale."

Her son Constantine, who was also apparently her only child, was born probably in the year 274, at Naisus in Dardania, the country where his father's family had for some time been settled (Nish, recently acquired by Servia). After his birth it is probable that Constantius advanced Helena to the position of a lawful wife.

That she had this position is expressly stated by some of our authorities, but the very emphasis of their assertion implies that there was something peculiar about the case (Hist. H. E. vii. 13, 12, "verum pergam . . . extra communem et inscriptionem Salerno given below."). Respect for Constantius would naturally prevent the writers who lived in his reign from stating the circumstances in detail. It may be conjectured, however, that the law to legitimate the children of a concubine "per subsequens matrimoniium" was suggested to that emperor by his mother's experience. After living with Constantius some twenty years Helena was divorced by him on the occasion of his elevation to the dignity of Caesar in 292. The Augustus Maximian, in choosing him for his colleague, required him to take this step, as a matter of policy, in order that he might marry his own step-daughter, Theodora, and Galerius was obliged to do the like by Diocletian (Cons. Bren. ix. 22; Victor, de Caesaribus, 39; Epitome, 54). Such a proceeding has its parallels, especially in Roman history, e.g. Valentinian similarly repudiated Marina Severa, the mother of Gratian. The looseness of the marriage tie among the Romans is quite adequate for the explanation of these acts, without supposing any offence or misconduct on the part of the wife, or any special heartlessness on that of the husband. We know nothing of her life during the remainder of her husband's reign. When Constantine succeeded him in 306, it would seem probable that he recalled his mother to the court, but direct evidence on this point is wanting. We have a coin stamped HELENANEP.E. i.e. nobilitas femina, with a head on one side and a star in a laurel crown upon the other, which may have been struck in her honour whilst Constantine was still Caesar. The statement of Eusebius that Constantine paid his mother great honours, and caused her to be proclaimed Augusta to all the troops, and struck her image on gold coins, is no doubt generally quite correct, but it is unfortunately unaccompanied by any details (Vita Const., col. 47). Silver and copper coins are found with the name Flavia Helena Augusta, struck in her lifetime. Others with the remarkable epigram Fl. Jul. Helenae Aug. were struck at Constantinople and Treves as memorials after her death, and at the same time Theodora was commemorated in like manner, to mark the reconcilia-

See Cod. Just. v. 27, 5. and Godedro's note Cod. Theod. iv. 6. 1. It seems likely that Constantine's abridgment of the rights of inheritance possessed by natural children was intended to induce their parents to marry.

* Eichholz, vol. viii. pp. 143, 145, conjectures it to belong to a wife of Crespius, cf. p. 102, and so does Sandurs. But Helena, wife of Crespius, is lost in the Roman law, a conjecture from the law of Constantine, Cod. Theod. ix. 30, 1, addressed to Maximus, prefect in Rome in 322, "propter Crispi atque Helenae partum omniu... indigentiam prater venenosis, homicidias, adulterias..." and Godedro very plausibly seems to introduce a "apparatum" or "apparatus," and refers it to a journey to Rome. The late Count J. F. W. de Salls was of opinion that there was no evidence from the history of the existence of such a person as Helena, wife of Crespius, see Constitutiones Rex GREAT, Vol. I. p. 649, and the following article. 3 L tion of the two branches of the family. But as yet none of gold have come to light. She is also styled Augusta in inscriptions, but in none I believe necessarily earlier than 320. (Mommsen, Inscr. Nova P. 106, given below: Inscri. Urbis Romae, C. I. L. vol. v. 1134–1136.)

Eusebius also tells us that it was through Constantine that she became a Christian (V. C. iii. 57). His authority on such a point is good, and it is supported (whatever the support may be worth) by the probably spurious letters preserved in the acts of St. Silvester (see CONSTANTINE, p. 646). We must therefore reject the other story which ascribes his conversion to his mother’s influence (Theodoret. i. 18, τὴν τῆς εὐφρασίας ἀνόητα προσωνομάξειν τρόφῃ, and the late and fabulous Eutychius Alexandrinus, pp. 408, 456, ed. Oxon.).

In the year 322, according to Godefroy’s probable emendation of the law in the Theodosian code, Constantine granted a release of prisoners on account of a journey of Crispus and Helena to Rome (Cod. Theod. ix. 38, 1). This is one of several indications of the close tie existing between the aged empress and her eldest grandson, with whom she naturally took part rather than with the child of Fausta, her half-sister of her rival Theodora. The following inscription from Salerno belongs to one of the next years and marks the power of Helena in her son’s court. It must have been set up after the younger Constantius was appointed Caesar, Nov. 8, 323, and before the death of Crispus, whose name was afterwards erased (Mommsen, Inschr. Napol. 106, Orell. 1074, Willmams 1079).

i.e. “To our sovereign lady Flavia Augusta Helena, the most chaste wife of the divine Constantius, the mother of our Lord Constantine, the greatest, most pious and victorious Augustus, the grandmother of our Lord Crispus and Constantine, the most blessed and fortunate Caesars, this is erected by Alpinius Magnus, vir clarissimus, corrector of Lucania and Bruttii, devoted to her excellence and piety.”

In the year 326 Crispus was put to death on an obscure charge by his father’s orders [see CONSTANTINE, p. 630]. Tradition connects this dark act with the name of Fausta; and Helena’s bitter complaints about her grandson’s death are said to have irritated Constantine to execute his wife by way of retribution (Victor, Epit. 41, Fausta coniugis ut putant suggesta Crispum filium necari insuit. Dehinc uxorem suam Faustum in balnes ardentes concepit interm., cum sum mater Helena dolore nimio nepotis increparet).

We may fairly suppose that it was as much distress and penitence for these tragic and cruel acts, as thankfulness for the success of the Nicene council, that roused Constantine to found and endow a number of churches at this time, and to give other material advantages to the Christian church. Helena no doubt shared in her degree in the same feelings, and made a vow to undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land (Eus. V. C. iii. 42).

The details of her journey, as regards the holy places, are given in the next section. Eusebius speaks strongly of her youthful spirit, notwithstanding her great age, nearly eighty years (V. C. iii. 42, ἦ γὰρ δὴ συνεδροῦσα ἄνωθεν ἢ πρὸς ἑαυτὴν, ἤδη τριῶν χρόνων). She received a limited supply of money from her son and spent it in royal charities to the poor and bounties to the soldiers; as well as using her power to free prisoners and criminals condemned to the mines and to recall persons from exile (36). She was a frequent attendant at the church services, and adorned the buildings with costly offerings (36, 45). The date of the death of the emperor is uncertain, but it cannot have been earlier than 327, because she did not take her journey to Palestine until after the death of Crispus. Tillemont therefore puts it in 328, and it may have been later. (See further in Clinton, F. R. ii. 80, 81.) Her body was carried with great pomp to ‘the imperial city,’ that is probably to Constantinople (Eus. V. C. iii. 47; Sozomen, i. 17, thus glosses the phrase—τὴν τακτικὴν περί Παλαιμπτήσας: see CONSTANTINE, p. 632). It was believed however in the Western church that she was buried at Rome, and there is a tradition that in the year 480 her body was stolen from thence by a monk Theoguis and brought to Hautvilliers, in the diocese of Rheims. Others say that it is still in the porphyry vase in the church of Ara Coeli (Tillemont, Mem. Hist. Eccl. tom. vii. note 7).

The place too of her death is strangely uncertain. Eusebius’s silence would lead us to conclude that she died in Palestine; but if the traditions of her bounty to the people and church of Cyprus on her way home are of any value it must have been somewhere nearer Rome or Constantinople. These traditions may be seen in M. de P. Lettre’s Histoire de l’Eglise de Chypre sous les Lusignans, Paris, 1852–1861; Church Quarterly Review, vol. vii. p. 186 foll.

J. W.

Invention of the Cross.—It is in connexion with this famous story that the name of Helena is especially interesting to the student of church history. Its truth has been much discussed, and in order to enable the reader to form a definite judgment the following account will be summarized briefly the evidence of our ancient authorities, noticing the points on which they agree and those on which they differ.

1. In the very interesting itinerary of the anonymous Pilgrim from Bordeaux to Jerusalem, which is generally referred to the year 333, seven years after the date assigned to the finding of the cross (Migne, Patr. xlvi. 771), we have a description of the main sites and events both in the Old and New Testament are mentioned. Among these are the house of Caiaphas, with the pillar at which our Lord was scourged, the praetorium of Pontius Pilate, the little hill (monticulus) of Golgotha, and, a stone’s throw from it, the cave of the Resurrection. On the latter spot a beautiful basilica erected by Constantine is noticed, as also on Mount Olevit and at Bethlehem. Yet there is no allusion to the cross or any part of it, nor is the name of Helena once mentioned.

2. Our second authority is Eusebius, whose Life of Constantine was written probably in 356, five years after the visit of the pilgrims. He records the visit of Helena to Jerusalem, but does not connect her name in any way with the place of Crucifixion, nor with the Holy Sepulchre.

He tells us that Constantine built a house of prayer on the site of the Resurrection, and that he also beautified the two other caves connected respectively with our Lord's Birth and His Ascension, and that he did so in honour of his mother's memory, who went to Palestine and built two churches, one at Bethlehem, the other on the Mount of Ascension. We therefore have this remarkable fact, that, of the three famous caves, Eusebius connects Helena not with that of the Resurrection, but only with the other two. It is true that the name Cyril is mentioned, but it is hardly conceivable that he should have left the one on the site of the Resurrection unspecified.

The original motive of her journey, he says, was to return thanks to God for His peculiar mercies to her family, and to enquire as to the welfare of the people of the country. His account of the discovery of the tomb by Constantine is not free from difficulty. It is not easy to say whether he represents the discovery of the sepulchre as being before or after the death of Helena. His language is quite general, but the presumption, as has been said, is that, if it had been before it, her name would have been connected with the event.

He does not imply that any difficulty was experienced in finding the site of the tomb, but there is nothing as to the cross. All the words which he uses in his minute description bear upon the Resurrection, not the Passion, of our Lord. But in Constantine's letter to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, which he inserts, there are one or two expressions of which the same cannot be said. Allowing for the excesses of hyperbolical language, it still has to be remembered that the words that, "when the cave was opened, the sight which met the eyes excelled all possible eulogy, as much as heavenly things excel earthly," unless some kind of memorial other than the tomb itself was discovered; and immediately afterwards we have two expressions referring definitely to our Lord's passion. The first is, τὸ γὰρ ναὸν τοῦ σωτῆρος τοῦ κόσμου, τὸν κτίσας τὸν πάντων, ἀτιμία τὴν πάλαι κρίστιμον, and the second, ἀγίου σαρκοῦ τὸν πάντων πίστις ἀπό σώσεις και ἀπὸ τῆς πορείας και τῆς τελειωμένης. At the same time it is difficult to believe that, had the cross or any part of it been discovered, it should not have been more exactly described, and the most probable explanation is that ναός is used to describe the whole scene of Redemption, of which the Resurrection was a part (Chro. Pagi. Const. iii. 26–42, Patr. Gr. x. 1086). The fact that the place very soon came to be venerated is proved by Eusebius's own statement in his Commentary on Ps. xxvii. 18, that marvels (θαύματα) were even then wrought at the tomb of Christ.

3. Our next authority is St. Cyril of Jerusalem, whose catachetical lectures were delivered, he says, upon the very spot where our Lord was crucified, and, as we know from other sources, not more than twenty years after the alleged discovery (viz. in 340). In these there are three allusions to the wood of the cross (iv. 10, x. 19, xiii. 10). The last one, in book iv., dedicated to the Bishop of Auxerre, he describes it as "until to-day visible amongst us" (μέχρι οὖν τοῦ ουρανοῦ), and now filling nearly the whole world by means of those who in faith take from it." In his letter to Constantius, which, however, is of doubtful authenticity [Cyril], it is distinctly stated that the cross was discovered in the reign of Constantine (Cap. 3). The first quotations are quite sufficient to prove the existence of a belief in his day that the real wood of our Lord's cross had been discovered, but they do no more than this. They do not give us the grounds of the belief. We know how credulous many were in the matter of relics, and there is nothing to shew us that St. Cyril was more discriminating than his contemporaries, and we are bound to regard the name of Cyril as not free from another matter from the suspicion of insincerity and unscrupulousness in the use of means to attain what he regarded as a good end. [Cyril.] Nor, though he speaks of the cross, does he connect it with the name of Helena. The context certainly does not require it, since the fact of the discovery, and not the author of it, is what he is insisting upon. Still, as regards Helena herself, it remains true that none of our three earliest authorities speak of her as the discoverer.

4. St. Chrysostom, writing probably before the year 387, speaks of the wood of the true cross and of the anxiety felt by many to procure a piece of it (Quod Christus et Deus, cap. x., Patr. Gr. xvii. 820).

5. Sulpicius Severus, who must probably have been next in order (circa 395), tells us that Helena built three basilicas (not two as in Eusebius), one on each of the great sites of the Passion, Resurrection, and Ascension. No other writer, except Paulinus, mentions separate churches of the Passion and Resurrection. The site of the passion, he says, was discovered by Helena, but he does not add that it was by supernatural means. At the Mount of Olives he found the footsteps of Christ, and the ground by its hardness resisted all attempts to pave it. Three crosses were discovered, and the right one ascertained by the miraculous restoration to life of a dead body. (Hist. Sacr. i. 33, Patr. Gr. x. 148.)

6. St. Ambrose, writing in 395, agrees with Eusebius that the main object of Helena's visit was to procure for the prosperity of her land, that adds that on her arrival she was inspired by the Spirit with the desire to search for the cross, that she distinguished the true cross by its title (thus differing from Sulpicius and all later writers), that two of the nails were used by the emperor, one being fixed in his crown and the other employed as a bit for his bridle (de Obit. Theod. cap. xiv., Patr. Gr. xii. 572). St. Ambrose begins a year later, but he is referring to the first of February, 393, when he heard the footsteps of Christ, and the ground by its hardness resisted all attempts to pave it. Three crosses were discovered, and the right one ascertained by the miraculous restoration to life of a dead body. (Hist. Sacr. i. 33, Patr. Gr. x. 148.)

7. Rufinus (writing in 400, according to the Life in Migne's edition) tells us further that not only was the journey inspired by God, but that the place of the Passion was miraculously revealed; that the three crosses were found "confuso ordine," and the title separately; that the true cross was discovered by the miraculous healing of a sick lady (not the revival of a corpse, as above); that part of the wood was sent to Constantine, and part left at Jerusalem in a silver casket (cf. μετὰ σήμερον τοῦ παιινοῦ in Cyril's description above). (Hist. Eccles. i. 7, 9, Patr. Gr. xxi. 475.)

5. St. Jerome, in his Commentary on Zech. xiv. 20 (Patr. xxv. 1546), which probably was written in 387, mentions of the nail wall at the cross which was used for the emperor's bridle, according to the story which we find in many other writers, and also in Ep. lviii. (Patr. xxii. 581), speaks of the image of Jove which stood until the time of Constantine on the site of the Resurrection, and that of Venus on the site of the Passion.

10. St. Cyril of Alexandria (about 420), mentions as a report (σημεῖο) that the wood of the cross had been found at different times (καὶ κατολόοι) with the nails still fixed in it (Comm. on Zech. xiv. 20, Patr. Gr. lxxii. 271).

11. Socrates (about 430) informs us that Helena was told in a night vision to go to Jerusalem; that she found the site of the Passion with difficulty, though he alludes to no supernatural aid; that many suggested the means of distinguishing the true cross, viz. by applying it to a woman on the point of death; that the emperor erected "new Jerusalem" on the site (a phrase evidently taken from Eusebius); and that of the nails was put by the emperor on his statue at Constantinople, a fact witnessed to by many inhabitants (Hist. Eccles. i. 17, Patr. Gr. lxvii. 118).

12. Sozomen, on the same date, claims good authority for his account, and states that Constantine, in gratitude for the council of Nicaea, wished to build a church on Golgotha; that Helena about the same time went to Palestine to pray and to look for the sacred sites. He does not, however, mention any divine impulse. The difficulty of discovering was caused, he says, by the Greeks, who had defiled them, in order to put a stop to the growing ἁθροῖα; the site of the sepulchre was made known, as some say, by a Hebrew living in the East, from documentary evidence, but more probably by signs and dreams from God. He says further that the crosses were found near the same spot (τῇ τοῦ άμβού τῶν τάφων) as they had been left by the soldiers, and therefore naturally in confused order, and that the tablet had its inscription until it had been removed. He enumerates the miracles: the healing of a woman with an incurable disease, the other the raising of a corpse, combining the other accounts; adding that the greater part of the cross was still preserved at Jerusalem. (Hist. Eccles. ii. 1, 2, Patr. Gr. lxvii. 929.)

13. Theodoret (about 448) inserts the letter of Constantine to Macarius, and follows the order of Eusebius, representing, however, Helena's journey more definitely than Eusebius does, as consequent upon the finding of the sepulchre by Constantine. Yet immediately afterwards he speaks of her as bringing the spot to light; so that his account seems inconsistent with itself. The crosses, he says, were found near the Lord's tomb—σαρώτα το μυθήμα το άνιστατός (Hist. Eccles. i. 16, 17, Patr. Gr. lxxix. 555).

14. St. Leo (454), in writing to Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, speaks of the constant witness borne at Jerusalem to the reality of Christ's Passion by the existence of the cross (Ep. cxxix. 2, Patr. liv. 1106).

15. St. Gregory of Tours (died 595) adds the following details: that the date of the discovery was May 3, 320; that during a great storm which occurred soon after Helena put one of the nails into the sea, the nail was at once calmed so that two more were used for the emperor's bridle, and the fourth placed on the head of his statue; that the lance, crown of thorns, and pillar of scourging were also preserved, and were effectual in working miracles (Liber Mirac. i. 5, Patr. lxxi. 709); and that the cross was found by the aid of a Jew, afterwards baptized as Quiricinus (Hist. Franc. i. 34, Patr. lxxi. 179).

So much then for our authorities. We observe that no detailed story is found until nearly seventy years after the event, and then not in the East, but in the West. The vagueness of tone in St. Cyril of Alexandria is particularly observable. Small differences of detail have been noticed, and the last author cited adds several particulars not included in the other accounts. There are some features in the story which look like invention or exaggeration, e.g. the fact that in the process of discovering the true cross the other two are almost invariably said to have been first applied in vain, just such a detail as is added in a fable to give it completeness. On the whole, considering what has been already noticed, that our earliest authorities do not represent Helena as the discoverer, and that the story gradually grows as time goes on, it seems most probable that she had no part in the discovery at all, even if it took place, which itself seems exceedingly doubtful. That the site of the Holy Sepulchre was discovered, or supposed to be discovered, in the reign of Constantine, there seems every reason to believe; and considering the temper of the times, it is easy to understand how marvels would grow up around it. One of the objections to the story is the vagueness of the topographical touches. The Bordeaux Pilgrim alone is definite, describing the tomb as a stone's throw from Calvary. Most of the other writers confound the two, the crosses being represented as found in the tomb and yet in confused order just as they fell. It may easily have happened that, after the discovery of the tomb, some devout person may have fancied that he had found a portion of the cross, and persuaded others to believe it too; and when once this had been done, the assigning, as time went on, of the discovery to the royal pilgrim Helena.
is perfectly natural, and an instance of an exceedingly common tendency. [M. F. A.]

HELENA (3) CRISPI. A Helena, wife of Crispus eldest son of Constantine the Great, has been imagined by some historians on account of the following text of the Theodosian Code, ix. 38, 1:—"Imp. Constantianus A. ad Maximum / fratricem / [rectum] / [fratricem] / Proper Crispi atque Helena partum omnibus indulgentia, praeter veneficos, homicidas, adulatoros . . . [rectum] / in hal. Nov. Romeae Praebito et Juliano cost." (322). Godfrey, in his commentary on this passage, emends "propter Crispi atque Heleneae partum" or "apparatum," that is to say, "preparations for their journey to Rome," the persons being in that case Crispus and his grandmother, not Crispus and his wife. This seems more probable than that there should be an utterly unknown Helena, mentioned in this public manner, especially as nothing is elsewhere recorded of Crispus's children. Banduri assigns to this supposed Helena the coin with the epigraph Helena [obolissima] / [femina]. And Eckhel is inclined to follow him (Doc. Num. Vetus. viii. pp. 142-145). But this is probably an early coin of the mother of Constantine; see the preceding article.

Constantine's daughter Helena was born perhaps about the date of this law (see next article); but even if partus Heleneae could mean the "birth of Helena," Crispi partus is inexorable. [J. W.]

HELENA (4) JULIANI, daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta. Historians sometimes give Constantine three daughters: Constantia, wife in turn of Hannibalian and Gallus; Constantia, a virgin and a saint; and Helena. But Tilmont has shown that the second of these is probably a legendary person (Empire, vol. iv. p. 624, note 18 to Constantine). Constantia was called Augusta by her father, according to Philostorgius, iii. 22, 28, and so we may probably suppose was Helena (Eckhel, Dict. Num. Vetus. viii. pp. 137-145). She was thirty-one or thirty-two years old, according to the account of Duscanus, when she was married by his brother Constantius (on the advice of his wife Eusebia) to her cousin Julian, in Nov. 355; but it is not easy to discover the authority for this statement of her age, which may merely be a hazardous inference from the Theodosian Code quoted in the preceding article (Empire, loc. cit., p. 51). If this date however is correct, she must have been born about the year 323, and her husband was about eight years younger than herself. It is not improbable that he cared very little about her, viewing her rather as part of the family compact which he made with her brother. He refers to her several times, but without expressing any feeling of attachment or dislike, whereas he speaks with great regard of Eusebia, his cousin's wife (ad Ath. p. 248 b; cp. Or. iii. Laudes Eusebiae, p. 123 D, esp. the phrase, δε μη διε προς το βασιλει τω γαμεν ημων [Eusebia], as if the marriage was merely a matter of policy).

Julian and Helena had one child born in Gaul, but it died directly after birth, through the unskilfulness or malice of the midwife. Ammianus, who reports this fact, tells us further that Helena was afterwards taken by Eusebia with her to Rome, under the pretext of affection, and there given poison by her sister-in-law to cause her miscarriage. (Amm. xvi. 10, 18; cp. Orosius, vol. i. p. 529 ed. Lum, who says of Eusebia, της γαμενων δε τοις ομολογησας τοις υπερερ ομολογησας.) The motive of this cruel act is supposed to have been jealousy, as Eusebia herself was barren; but it is not necessary to believe the story, which is just the kind of scandal that is capable neither of proof nor disproof. Ammianus, it may be remarked, says nothing of it in his laudatory character of Eusebia in recording her death (xvii. 6, 4).

The date of Helena's journey to Rome may have been 356, when we know that Eusebia visited Rome, whilst her husband was engaged with the barbarians from beyond the Rhine (Jul. Orig. iii. p. 129 a, c; cp. Amm. xvii. 13, 16; Clinton, F. R. i. p. 407). Or it may have been in the following year, 357, when Constantius and his wife spent the month of May in the city, and this is what we should, gather from Ammianus as most probable (Amm. xvi. 10, 13 b; cp. Clinton, F. R. i. p. 454).

Helena was still alive when Julian was proclaimed Augustus by the troops at Paris in the spring of 360 (Jul. ad Ath. p. 248 a). She died in the autumn of the same year, just about the time when her husband was celebrating his quinquennalia, the fifth anniversary of his appointment as Caesar and their marriage. Julia sent her body to Rome to be buried beside her sister's—"in suburbo vico Nomentanae condenda, ubi uxor quaque Galli quondam, soror eius, sepulta est Constantia." (Amm. xxi. 1, 5).

We know nothing whatever of her character, which is remarkable considering her connexion with Julian, of whom we know so much.

Some antiquaries suppose that this Helena appears as Augusta on coins, but this cannot be considered as by any means proved, and was denied by the late Count J. F. W. de Salis, whose authority is entitled to great weight (cp. Eckhel, Dict. Num. Vetus. viii. pp. 142-145).

More difficult is the question of the coins with the epigraph Inci Paria. It is discussed in the article on Julius, in the section on the coins. Whether they refer to her or not, it is probable that they were struck after her death. [J. W.]

HELENA (6), virgin of Auzerre, commemo-rated May 22. She is named in the acts of St. Amator as having been present at his death, witnessing the miracles which attended the event. St. Amator died in 418; how long afterwards Helena may have survived is uncertain. (Boll. Acta SS Mai. v. 152). [R. T. S.]

HELENA (6), virgin of Troyes, commemo-rated May 4. The inhabitants of Troyes in the 13th century believed that they possessed the undecayed remains of Helena a Corinthian martyr, which had been brought from Greece by a warrior who had taken part in the fourth crusade. Some held that she was Helena, the mother of Constantine. (Boll. Acta SS Mai. i. 530). [R. T. S.]

HELENIANII, followers of Simon Magnus. [HELENA (1).]
HELENUS (1) (Elenus), bishop of Alexandria (Soudarea, Iskenderum) in Cilicia, mentioned in the Menologium Graecorum Dec. 24, (Canisius, Thesaur. Monum. iii. 498), as having baptized the martyr Eugenia in the reign of Commodus. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 903.)

[3. de S.]

HELENUS (2), bishop of Heliopolis in Egypt. He is mentioned in the Martyrologies (cf. Lipomani de Vitis SS. ed. Surius, December 25) as the companion of St. Eugenia. But so many inconsistencies appear in the narrative that Le Quien seems fully justified in regarding it as almost wholly mythical. (Or. Christ. ii. 583.)

[3. de S.]

HELENUS (3), bishop of Tarsus and metropolitian. He was involved in the controversy as to rebaptism, and we learn from a letter of Dionysius of Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vii. 5. 7) that, during the dispute between Cyprian and Stephen of Rome, A.D. 256, Stephen renounced communion with him and Firmilian, together with the bishops of Cilicia, Cappadocia, and Galatia, because they insisted on rebaptizing those who had been baptized by heretics. He attended the two synods held at Antioch on the historical views of Paul of Samosata, A.D. 265 and 272. Before the opening of the former synod, Helenus, with the other leading bishops, wrote to request the venerable Dionysius of Alexandria to give them the benefit of his theological learning and practical wisdom. The advanced age of Dionysius prevented him from complying with the request, but he wrote a letter giving his judgment on the points in controversy (Euseb. H. E. vi. 46, vii. 27, 28). On the assembling of the second synod in 272, Firmilian of the Cappadocian Caesarea, the former president, being dead, Helenus presided over the meeting, which is expressly termed in the Libellus Synodicus Synodus Heleni " (Labbe, Concil. i. 883, 901; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 870.)

[E. V.]

[G. T. S.]

HELI, martyr with Zotiens and Lucianus in Scythia, in the reign of Licianus; commemorated on Sept. 13. (Basil. Menol. i. 55.)

[C. H.]

HELIADES, bishop of Zegnus on the Ephrates, in the province of Commagene, one of the Easterns who accompanied John of Antioch to the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, where he signed the letters and decrees of the rival council of John, and was consequently cut off from the communion of the orthodox (Mansi, iv. 1270, 1426, v. 776). It appears that Heliaedes did not remain in his obstinate, as his name is not found in the list of fourteen bishops who were ultimately ejected from their sees. (Mansi, v. 965; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 942.)

[L. D.]

HELIANUS (1) (Elianus), one of the forty martyrs of Sebaste. His relics were said to have been transferred to Beneventum in 763. (Borgia, Mem. Istor. della Pontif. Civ. di Benevento, i. 199.) [FORTY MARTYRS.] [C. H.]

HELIANUS (2), a bishop in Palestine, one of those to whom the letter of Theophilus patriarch of Alexandria, in condemnation of Origen in the year 400, was addressed. (Jerome, ep. 92, ed. Vall.)

[W. H. P.]

HELIAS (Elias), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, deposed by the emperor Anastasius I. before 512. On the accession of Justin I., Hormisdas bishop of Rome pleaded with him for the restoration of Elias to his see, which had long being occupied by Soterichus. At the same time he wrote to the empress Euphemia, to Justinian, whose influence with his uncle was already paramount, to Germanus, a Vir Illustriissimus, to his own legates Germanus bishop of Capua and Blandus a presbyter, to solicit their intercession in his behalf, and to Helias, and two of his fellow sufferers, to inform them of what he had done (Hormisd. Pap. Ep. 57–60; in Pat. Lat. xliii. p. 480; Mansi, v. 471; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. pp. 68, 69). He only succeeded, however, in obtaining a promise that on the death of Soterichus Helias should be his successor. Soterichus was still bishop A.D. 536 (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 377), and it may be inferred that Helias died before him. The letters of Hormisdas are not dated, but as the reply of Justinian was written on June 7 in the consulum of Vitalian, i.e. A.D. 550 (Chron. Pasch. O. eccxv.) they must have been sent from Rome A.D. 519 (Baronius, ann. 519, cccxv.)

[T. W. D.]

HELIO, ST., one of the children assigned to king Brychan of Brecknock. He is said to have settled on the Cornish coast, giving his name to the parish of Eglos-hayle (William of Worce. B. H. 130). Cornwall, Devon, and the opposite coast of Wales seem to have been under the same rulers of the old Celtic race even after Caewlin's victories had severed the connexion by land, which led the way to the occupation of Bristol, perhaps in the time of Ethelbald of Mercia (Rees, Welsh Saints, 160; Kerlake, St. Ewen, Bristol, and the Welsh Border, 1874; Freeman on King Ine, pp. 47, 53).

[C. W. B.]

HELICON, a sophist or professor of rhetoric at Constantinople, who composed in ten books an Abstract of Chronology and History from Adam to the reign of Theodosius the Great, taking it down to 395 (Suidas, s. v.). Simlerus and Vossius state that the work still exists in manuscript in Italy. (Simlerus, Biblioth. p. 270; Vossius, de Historia Graec. ii. 19, p. 255; Hiera, Bibl. Gr. v. 90; vii. 446; viii. 82; xi. 633; Ceillier, vi. 290.)

[W. M. S.]

HELICONIA (Bas. Men.), HELICONIS (Rom. Mart.)—May 28. A native of Thessalonica martyred at Corinth, under the proconsul Perennius, during the reign of Gordian and Philip, A.D. 243. His name is preserved in the Roman and Latin with a pretended edict of Gordian for a general persecution. (Dodwell, Dissert. Cypriani xi.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. vi. 736–744.)

[G. T. S.]

HELIG FOEL, Welsh saint, without any known church dedication, descended from Caradog Frichfras. He owned a low-lying tract of land on the coast of Carnarvonshire, which became HELIGWYDD

submerged in the 7th century, and now forms the Llanc Sands in Beaumaris Bay. In the Cornwall Quarterly Magazine (iii. 39-48) there is a translation of the Hanes of Heig ab Glan-seug, with an account of his lands which were lost, his sons who were saints, and his other desendants. (Myv. Arch. ii. 45; Rees, Welsh Saints, 298, 301-2; Williams, Emlyn. Welshm.
213.)

[J. G.]

HELIODORUS

HELIGWYDD (HELIGUDD), clerical witness to a grant of Ithac ab Morgan king of Glamorgan, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Ll. Landau. by Rees, 186, 448-8.)

[J. G.]

HELMENAS (HELENAE, ELIMENES), presbybyter and martyr with the presbystres Parmenius and Chrysostes, at Cordula; commemorated on Wand., Notker.)

[G. H.]

HELINGAUSD. [HELMGAUSD.]

HELO (1) ('Halaw), a civil officer of high rank under the emperor Theodosius II. It was by him that Theodosius sent the diadem to his nephew Valentinian, a.d. 424. Helo was then patricius and magister officiorum (Olympiodor. ap. Phot.
380 c, in the Latin version Helicon; Socr.
H. E. vii. 24). Some years afterwards he was sent by Theodosius to conclude a peace with the Persians, one result of which was that the persecution, which the Christians of that country had long suffered, ceased (Socr. H. E. vii. 20; Theophanes, Chron. s. a. 421, Migne, Patr. Gr. eviii. 234).

[T. W. D.]

HELO (2), addressed by Firmus bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who expresses his delight in writing to him, and his desire that he will return the favour (Firm. Epist. 28).

[ E. V.]

HELIODORUS (1), bishop of Laodicea (La-akeh) in Syria. The only mention of his name is by Dionysius of Alexandria, who relates that he 5; Le Quen, Oriens. Chr. ii. 791.)

[J. de S.]

HELIODORUS (2), bishop of Zabulon in Palestine, present at the first general council at Nices, a.d. 325. (Mansi. ii. 693; Le Quen, Or. Christ. iii. 678.)

[J. de S.]

HELIODORUS (3), bishop of Nicopolis, the metropolis of Vetus Epirus, subscribed the council of Sardica, a.d. 347. (Mansi, i. 39; Le Quen, Oriens. Christ. ii. 133.)

[L. D.]

HELIODORUS (4), Arian bishop of Soraey in Libya Prima, on the coast of the Mediterranean.
He signed the declarations of the Selucian council, a.d. 359. He was deposed, together with other semi-Arian bishops, in the following year. (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. ii. 28; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 617.)

[J. de S.]

HELIODORUS (5)—April 9. Martyr at the banks of Sapor II. king of the Persians. He was bishop of Bezabde, a town on the banks of the Tigris. In 362 Sapor invaded Mesopotamia and swayed away a vast number of exiles, including Heliodorus, who fell sick after his capture and died. Before his death he consecrated as bishop a young priest named Qualis, and delivered to him the portable altar which Eastern bishops when travelling conveyed with them. (Asc. Mart. auct. i. 134; Basil.

Men. iii. 49, in Migne, Patr. Gr. cxvi.; Sirleit's

[G. T. S.]

HELIODORUS (6), bishop of Tricea in Thessaly. He introduced into Thessaly the custom of episcopal marriage, and was the author of several erotic books called Aethiopica (Socrates, H. E. v. 22). Though these works were written in his youth, yet so great was the scandal caused by them that Heliodorus was deprived of his bishopric by the provincial syndes (Nicomachus Callist. H. E. xii. 34). He must have lived before the 5th century. (Le Quen, Orient. Chr. ii. 117; Migne, Patr. Gr.
cxv. 296.) Photius, who describes the Aethiopica (cod. 75), states that the author was of Phoeceiian origin, and was said to have become a bishop.
Valentian disbelieved in the author being the bishop of Tricea, while the modern writer by the signature of Heliodorus of Jerome's epistles.

(Vales. and Varior. notes on Soc.)

[L. D.]

HELIODORUS (7), bishop of Altinum near Aquileia, cir. 400. He served originally as a soldier (derelicti militiae—Jerome, ep. xiv. 6, ed. Vall.), but had left that calling and been ordained before the time when we first hear of him. He formed one of the band of friends who were drawn together at Aquileia, about the year 372, for the study of Scripture and the practice of asceticism, which included St. Jerome, Evagrius afterwards bishop of Antioch, Rufinus, Bonosus, and Chromatius afterwards bishop of Aquileia. The passion for asceticism and the troubles which arose about Jerome made the companions resolve, under the guidance of Evagrius, to go to Syria. They went by land, probably passing through Constantinople and Asia Minor to Antioch (Jerome, ep. iii.
3. ed. Vall.). There they stayed some time.
Heliodorus went to Jerusalem, where he enjoyed the hospitality of Florentius, who, having devoted himself to the ascetic life, employed his wealth in the entertainment of pilgrims (Jerome, ep.
iv. ed. Vall.). He there heard that Rufinus had arrived in Egypt with Melania (Jer. ep. iii. 2).
Returning to Antioch he found Jerome, who had been ill, resolved to go into the solitude of the desert of Chalcis. But he determined not to go with him. He was himself a presbyter and had a call for the pastoral life, and he had a sister and a nephew, who were dependent on him (Jerome, ep. ix. 9, ed. Vall.). He therefore determined, with regret, to return to his native place, Aquileia, holding out to his friends the hope that he might rejoin him one day in the desert (ibid.). Jerome wrote to him on his return to Italy (ep. 14) a letter which afterwards had a great effect in furthering the cause of asceticism, and became so celebrated that a Roman lady, Fabiola, knew it by heart (Jerome, ep. ixvii. 8, ed. Vall.). It was a remonstrance to Heliodorus on his having gone back from that whichelope Jerome believed at that time to be the way of the perfect life, and it reproached him with turning his back upon the higher service of Christ, and bade him think of the account he must render for this at the day of judgment (ep. xiv. 11). At other times Jerome charged himself with having by his sins driven his friend away (ep. vi.). But their friendship was never broken. Heliodyrus continued in the pastoral office, and not long afterwards became bishop of Altinum. His nephew Nepotianus, like himself, was brought up for a military career, but was afterwards ordained; and Jerome, writing to him in the year 396 (ep. lvi.), bids him take his uncle as a model of a Christian pastor. Heliodyrus was present in 381 as a bishop at the council of Aquileia. In after years he was closely allied with Chromatius bishop of Aquileia, and in common with him kept up a communication with their former friend Jerome, then residing at Bethlehem. On the death of Nepotianus in 396, Jerome wrote to Heliodyrus a letter of condolence, in which all the affection of the friend is expressed. Heliodyrus on his side took a warm interest in Jerome's translation of the Scriptures. He, with Chromatius, frequently wrote to him, exhorting him to complete the work, which was for a long time delayed. They supported amusements habit of mind; and by the grateful mention of their aid in the prefaces to the books last translated, their names are for ever associated with the great work of the Vulgate. ("Preface to the Books of Solomon and Tobit," Jerome's Works, vol. i. 1305, x. 26; Migne's edition of Vallarsi's Jerome). Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Italia, v. 516, 610) reckons his successor in the see of Altinum to have been Ambrosius, A.D. 407.

[W. H. F.]

HELIODORUS, bishop of Amathus in Cyprus, subscribed the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by Soter bishop of Theodosiana. (Mansi, vii. 160; Le Quen, Or. Chr. ii. 1064.)

[L. D.]

HELIODORUS, bishop of Pinares in Lycia. His name was subscribed to the synodal letter of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458, by archdeacon Nicolaus, where Narenis is an evident error for Pinaris. (Mansi, vii. 580; Le Quen, Oriens Christian. i. 975.)

[L. D.]

HELIODORUS (9), bishop of Cufruta in Byzacena, banished by Huneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. p. 68; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 147.)

[R. S. G.]

HELIODORUS (11), 12th bishop of Sedumum (Sion), between Agricola and Honorius, represented at the second council of Magon in A.D. 585 (Mansi, ix. 958; Gall. Christ. xii. 735).

[S. A. B.]

[E. V.]

HELIODORUS (13), presbyter, a friend of St. Hilary of Poitiers. It appears that Hilary was in the habit of seeking from Heliodyrus explanations of those points which he could not understand in Origen's commentaries. (Hieron. ep. 34, al. 141, ad Marcellanum, 13. 23.)

[J. C. C.]

HELIODORUS (14), presbyter, commemorated by Gennadius. He wrote a work against the Manichaeans, entitled, De Natura Rerum Exor- dicium, proving that the universe and all things in it had one only Creator, and refuting the idea of a coeternal power who was the author of evil. (Gennad. de Scriptor. c. 6; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 206.)

[E. V.]

HELIODORUS (15), presbyter of Antioch c. 440, who is mentioned by Gennadius as the author of an excellent treatise De Virginitate, well furnished with Scripture proofs. (Gennad. de Scriptor. c. 29; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 430.)

[E. V.]

HELIODORUS (16), a monk addressed by Nilus, who cautions him that his temperament being of so warm a nature in respect of the female sex, his only safe course is to avoid all converse with women, never even to behold them without absolute necessity, whether they be living under monastic rule or otherwise. (Nil. Epp. lib. ii. ep. 46, p. 138, in Patr. Gr. ixix. 208.)

[C. H.]

HELIODORUS (17), martyr with Dosa, perhaps under Constantine Copronymus; commemorated by the Greeks on Aug. 20. (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 96.)

[C. H.]

HELIODORUS (18), martyr at Antioch in Pisidia with Marcus, Sico, Neo, and others, under Diocletian; commemorated on Sept. 23. (Bos. Men. i. 74.)

[C. H.]

HELOGABALUS. [ELAGABALUS]

HELIOTROPTAIE (Ἄλειστροπταί), according to Joannes Damascenus, a heretical sect who worshipped the planet heliotrope, which they conceived to turn round towards the sun in virtue of a divine power which dwelt in it. Damascenus speaks of the Heliotroptae as having arisen between the reigns of the emperors Mar- cian and Heruchius (Jo. Damas. de Haeres. cap. iv. § 89, p. 108 in Migne, Patr. Gr. xiv. 738, 758, 785).

[T. W. D.]

HELIUS, a deacon, present at the time when Silvanus committed the act of tradition of which he was afterwards convicted. (Sil- vanus.) (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 170, ed. Oertelhürt.)

[H. W. P.]

HELIX (HELICO), a heretic, the evidence for whose existence consists in the fact that Anastasius in the 7th century gives passages which purport to be extracts from a work of Hippolytus against Beron and Helix. In the article HIPPOLYTUS the reasons are given for thinking this tract not to be a work of that father; and if it be a forgery of the time of the Monophysite controversies, Beron and Helix, who are heard of nowhere else, are likely to be imaginary personages. Fabricius gives, rid of the name Helix, better, conjecturing, but apparently without sufficient reason, that the true reading was καὶ δύο ἡμέρας καὶ ἄραντ ἀπετείχαν. (G. S.]

HELLADIUS (1) (ELLADIUS), 4th bishop of Auxerre, between Valerianus and Amator. He was present at the synod of Valence, 374, died HELLADIUS (3), a Cappadocian bishop addressed by Gregory Nazianzen, perhaps to be distinguished from Helladius of Caesarea, the subject of the preceding article. Gregory wrote him his thanks after Easter, 382, for a paschal present and letter. Gregory wishes Helladius a long life, but for himself a speedy death; Helladius could confer on him no greater boon than that he was a layman which he wished to be accepted a bishop to Nazianzus. (Greg. Naz. Epist. 173 in Patr. Gr. xxxviii. 289; Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. ix. "Grég. de Naz." note lvi.)

HELLADIUS (4), bishop of Tarsus c. 430. He was a disciple of St. Theodosius of Antioch, and after his death (c. A.D. 412) presided over the monastery he had founded near Rhousus in Cilicia. Having spent sixty years in monastic life, he was raised to the episcopate as successor to Marianus bishop of the metropolitan see of Tarsus (Theod. Vit. Jur. c. 10). His episcopate illustrates the stormy period of the church of Ephesus. He was one of those who protested against commencing the council before the arrival of John of Antioch and the oriental bishops (Baluz. Nov. Concil. Coll. p. 697), and he joined the opposition council, conciliabulum, presided over by John upon his arrival. He supported the counter-remonstrances addressed to the emperor Constantine (ibid. by Nestorius). He appended his name to the synodal letter to the clergy and laity of Hierapolis (ibid. 705), and to that to John of Antioch and Theodoret and the other members of the Oriental deputation to Theodosius (ibid. 725). Helladius steadily ignored the deposition of Nestorius, and withheld all recognition of Maximian as his successor. John of Antioch wrote, commending him for what he had done (ibid. 752, c. 48).

When the leaders of the rival parties were taking steps for the restoration of peace, Helladius kept aloof, and on the receipt of the six articles drawn up by John at a council held at Antioch, which ultimately opened the way for reconciliation, he united with Alexander of Hierapolis in the profession of faith against Nestorius (ibid. 790). Gregory Nazianzen, however, on more than one occasion, had recourse to his good offices in behalf of his relatives, Nicobulus, and his son Nicobulus the younger (ibid. 218). Helladius got considerable discredit by ordaining (Soz. vii. 6) Gerontius bishop of Nicomedia, in return, it was said, for his good offices in obtaining by his court influence a high military office for his son. [GERONTIUS (7).] He attended the ecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, and was declared by the emperor, together with Otreius of Melitene and Gregory Nyssen, a centre of Catholic communion for Pontus and Bithynia (Theod. H. E. v. 8; Soc. H. E. vii. 9; Soc. v. 8; Labbe, Concil. ii. 956; Mansi, iii. 569). He was again at Constantinople in 384, at the synod held at the time of the consecration of Boniface's church, to decide the rival claims of Apagynus and Bagadicius to the see of Beroea (Labbe, ii. 1151, Palladius being a manifest error for Helladius). A biography of his great predecessor Basil is erroneously ascribed to Helladius by Johannes Damascenus (de Imagin. lib. i. p. 59). (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 373; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 287; Fabric. Biblioth. Gracc. vol. iv. p. 293.)
Maximian, were ordered to accept the concordat or resign their see. All eventually yielded but the stubborn old bishop of Hierapolis. The questor Domitian, who was entrusted with the execution of the imperial decree, exhorted Helladius to consult the peace of the church, and resume communion with John and consequently with Cyril. Theodoret also wrote to his old friend, telling him that he said John had found Cyril’s letter orthodox, entrusting him not by his obstinacy to destroy his flock (ibid. 859, c. 160). The path was much cleared by the death of Maximian, April 12, 434, and the succession of the sainely Proclus (Socr. H. E. viii. 41). The orthodoxy of the new bishop of Constantinople was readily acknowledged by Helladius, who was evidently glad to be helped out of his dilemma by the removal of the first intrusive occupant of Nestorius’s see (ibid. 850, c. 149). Having determined on yielding, Helladius wrote to Alexander to explain his conduct. The bishops of Bilicica Secundus had resumed communion with John and Cyril, and he was compelled by the urgency of the bishops and clergy of his own province to follow their example to avoid worse evils (ibid. 862, c. 164). Alexander bitterly reproached Helladius with his weakness (ibid. 863, c. 164). Helladius, however, lost no time inコンvoxing the bishops of his province, whose synodal letters were drawn up and despatched to Theodosiius, declaring in the most decided language their complete acceptance of all that was required of them: admission of the decrees of the council of Ephesus, communion with Cyril, the ratification of Nestorius’s sentence of deposition, and the anathematization of him and his adherents (ibid. 887, c. 199). Helladius had saved himself from deposition and exile at the expense of consistency. He had now to justify his conduct to Nestorius, whom he had repeatedly promised never to forsake. The task was no easy one; nor can we say that he fulfilled it with any honour to himself. He wrote Nestorius a short letter to the effect that though he had met with every evil from beginning to end had turned out directly contrary to his prayers, his feeling towards him remained unchanged, and that as he knew he was still struggling for true piety, he believed that he would joyfully endure all that was laid upon him, and that he hoped he might be reckoned with him at the last judgment, when his soul, tried by so many and great temptations, would shine forth. He excuses himself for joining Theodoret and those who with him had accepted the concordat, on the ground that the letters produced from Cyril were in perfect harmony with apostolical traditions (ibid. 888, c. 193). At this period Helladius passes off the stage, and we know no more of him. The letters are printed by Chr. Lupus in his Epistulae Ephesinae. No. 68, 111, 114, 144, 154, 193. They are also given by Balaure, Concil. Nov. Collect. in the Tragodia Irenaei, c. 68, 111, 114, 117, 130, 164, 192, 193. (Tillemont, Mem. Écclés. tom. xiv. Le Quen, Or. Christ. tom. ii. p. 874; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 418.)

HELLADIUS (6), a bishop identified by Muratori with the bishop of Tarsus of this name. Firmus de Casarea wrote to warn him of a woman who having devoted herself to a religious life, had fallen into gross licentiousness, and with the aid of her parents plundered another lady of her property, and carried off her slaves, and had fled to the city of which Helladius was bishop. Firmus desires Helladius to punish her as she deserves, and pronounce excommunication upon her, if not perpetual, at least until she repents and reforms (Firm. Ep. 41, and Muratori’s note).
HELLADIUS (18), pagan grammarian, a priest of Jupiter. He was distinguished as a professor at Alexandria until A.D. 389, when the demolition of pagan temples under Theodosius made him retire to Constantinople, and there Socrates the historian, then a very young man, received instructions from him. (Soc. H. E. v. 16.) In 425 Theodosius II., by an edict conferred upon him and other public professors at Constantinople the rank enjoyed by ex-ricarii (Cod. Theod. VI. xxii.) Besides other works Helladius compiled a Greek lexicon described by Photius as λέξεως παντοτε χρήσις κατά στοιχείων (cod. 1653), and τῶν λέξεως συλλογή (cod. 158, sub fin.), to which work Suidas was indebted, as appears from the mention of Helladius among the authors at the commencement of his Lexicon. See also the Index Scriptorum de quibus Suidas (Migne, Pat. Gr. cxvii. 1269). [T. W. D.]

HELLADIUS (18), a Lucarian, interlocutor with "Orthodoxus" in Jerome's Dialogue com. "De fide et amor."

HELLADIUS (17), a layman of rank, occupying a high official position at Caesarea in Cappadocia, addressed by Firmus, who congratulated him on having escaped the dangers of a tempestuous voyage and reached Caesarea in safety, begging him to do what he could to relieve the famine under which the city was labouring, and lessen the burdens caused by the presence of the troops and their frequent transit. In a second letter Firmus thanks him for the proofs of his friendship and promise him his prayers. (Firm. ep. 12, 26.) [E. V.]

HELLADIUS (19), one of the friends made by Chrysostom during his stay at Caesarea on his way to Cucusus, to whom he wrote on his arrival, acquainting him with his comfortable condition, and begging him to write to him often. (Chrys. Epist. 172.) [E. V.]

HELLADIUS (20), an anchorite, afterwards bishop, to whom Cassian addressed the first ten books of his Colossians or treatises on the monastic life, about the year A.D. 423. (Jo. Cassian. Colat. praecl., in Patr. Lat. alii. 478, 479.) [I. G. S.]

HELLADIUS (21), a presbyter, who with his son Lucianus restored the walls of Asses in Mysia. Their names are recorded in an inscription on the walls of the city copied by Boeckh (Corp. Inscrip. iv. 8835), who fixes the date about the time of Justinian, and by Eusebius (Aria Minor, p. 20). To his exertions it may be due that the wall is still perfect on the west side, and that, as Lekke observes (Aria Minor, p. 129), the whole gives the most perfect idea of a Greek city which anywhere exists. [U. T. S.]

HELMENIUS, surveyor of customs at Naxianzus, the confidential friend both of Basil and Gregory Naxianzus. He was an Armenian by birth, was married and the father of a family, and, together with his brother, who, like himself, had acquired reputation by his eloquence, was employed in the administration of justice (Greg. Naz. carm. 47, Opp. ii. p. 105, ed. Bill., or in Migne, Pat. Gr. cxvii. 1451, Carm. lib. ii. s. c. 2, p. 993). We find him in 371 conveying a letter from Gregory to Basil (Basil. Epist. 71 [33]), and in 372 a message from the bishops of Lesser Armenia (ibid. 98 [259]). Having asked Gregory to send him a homily, he received in 372 the above poem instead, in praise of the sollicitude of his district. [H. E.]

HELMINGAUDUS (Ellmgaudus, Hellingaudus, Helmknauous, the spelling is very uncertain) was an officer (comes) of Charlemagne sent on an embassy along with the bishop of Amiens to the court of the Greek emperor in 802. (Einhardi Annales sub anno; Monum. Carol. ed. Jafke; pp. 309-312, 813.) [R. B.]

HELOGARUS, fifth bishop of St. Malo, succeeding St. Armaulos, and followed by Emmorus, was abbot of St. Mevennius (Mén) at the same time, as we learn from a charter of Louis the Pious, dated in 817, which confirms concessions granted to that monastery by Charles the Great (Migne, Patr. Lat. civ. 1042; Gall. Christ. xiv. 997). [S. A. B.]

HELPIDIUS. See also ELPIDIUS.

HELPIDIUS (D), Donatist bishop of the place whose name is variously written Thudræs, Tukdræs, Tuderæs, Tyrdræs, and later, Turdæs, and perhaps Dydris, a town of Byzacene, about thirty-two miles equidistant from Leptis Minor and Uaala [El Jama] (Ant. Rost. 59, 1; Hist. Bel. Afr. 76; Shaw, p. 157), present at the Maximianist council of Carthasius, a.d. 384; Aug. En. in Ps. xxvi. 30; Mos. civ. Dom. p. 258, ed. Oberthur). [H. W. P.]
HELPIDIUS (2), a bishop of Cyprus at the close of the 4th century. To him and the other suffragans of Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, the letter condemning Origen was addressed by Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, in the year 400. The letter was translated by Jerome. ([Ep. 92, ed. Vall.] [W. H. F.])

HELPIUS, wife of Boethius. (Elpis [2].)

HELVAEUS, HELVACUS (Elveus, Elvius), bishop of Menev. [AELFW.]. His name is inserted in the second edition of Wilson's English Martyrology, and in the Sarum Brev. at March 1. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 27 Feb. iii. 678) identify him with the Munster bishop Helvacus, who in Vict. S. Davidis, baptized St. David, and is probably St. Alibhe. (O'Halton, Irish Saints, iii. 9, 10.) [J. G.]

HELVE, FORM OF ALIBHE.

HELVIANDUS. [ELVIANUS.]

HELVIDIUS, alphabetically, though not chronologically, the first of those westerns who, like Novatian and Pelagius, Jovinian and Vigilantius, put forward opinions on anthropological subjects opposed to the generally received teaching of the church in their day, that have nevertheless been revived in modern times. In the East, where the interest for pure theology has never cooled, any serious discussion of such questions is still all but unknown.

The only contemporary notice preserved of Helvidius is the short tract against him by St. Jerome (Opp. ii. p. 293-30, ed. Vallars), written when they were both at Rome, while pope Damasus was alive, as we learn from the latter. It appeared, according to Vallarius, a. D. 385. St. Jerome put off answering him, who was also, for some time: "ne respondendo dignum fieret, qui vinceretur;" and he describes him throughout as "hominem rusticannum, et vix primis quoque imbutum literis" (§ 1); besides being wholly unknown to him: "Ego ipse, qui contra te scribebo, quum in eadem urbe consistam, albus, ut aiunt, atrevus suis, nescio." St. Jerome speaks of his own work in writing to Pammachius as "librum contra Helvidium de ecclesiis mari sumus virginitate perpetua" (ep. lviii. § 17), this being what his opponent had denied in the first instance, though the outcome of his opinions had been to rank virginity below matrimony. Helvidius sought countenance for his first point in the writings of Tertullian and Victorinus. St. Jerome shews (§ 17) he had misrepresented the latter; of Tertullian, whose writings may still speak "Ecclesiae hominem non suisse." But, in any case, he retorts with much force: what avail straggling opinions against primitive truth? "Num quid non possum tibi totam veterem scriptorum seriem commovere: Ignatium, Polycarponum, Irenaeum, Justinum Martyrem, multoque alios apotosticos et eloquentes viros, qui adversus Eblionem, et Theodotum Bryantium, haec eadem sentientes, plena sapientiae volumina conscriberunt. Quae si legis esse aliquando, plus sapere." This argument is just as suitable to our own, as it was to patristic times, never losing anything by repetition. What had Helvidius to oppose to it in this case? Nothing, unless his adversary misrepresents him, but novel interpretations of Scripture by himself. St. Jerome therefore refutes him only so far as to point out, that there is no necessity for understanding any of the passages adduced by him otherwise than the church had understood them hitherto; but that, in any case, the interpretations of them offered by Helvidius are delusive. One specimen must suffice. Πρωτόκος is a term which is applied to our Lord by St. Matthew and St. Luke conjointly with marked emphasis. And St. Luke further deposes to its being applied to him in a strict legal sense. Helvidius, heedless of this, drew his own inference: "Nilitatur probare primogenitum non posse dici, nisi eum qui habet et fraternos: sicut unigenitus ille vocatur qui parentibus solus sit filius" (§ 10). But the fact of the matter was, this word, legally construed, had exclusive reference to two things: first, the act of the mother; and secondly, the sex of the child. The first born of a woman was not a legal first-born, unless it was a male; and the first born in wedlock was not a legal first-born, unless it was the first born of the woman. But these conditions having been fulfilled in any given case, the son was a first-born in the eyes of the law from that time forth, whether any subsequent issue followed or not; and such Jesus was decided to have been when He was presented in the temple: "Omnis unigenitus est primum: non omnis primumgenitus est unigenitus," as it has been tersely put. The "sisters" attributed to Him in two Gospels, and the "brethren" in all four, St. Jerome further shews are no proof of any subsequent issue by His virgin-mother, for either they may have been half-brothers and sisters—children of St. Joseph by a former marriage—or else, simply first-cousins, children of the sister of the Virgin, married to a pagan, to whom she was, as in both cases, Hebrew usage would justify the application to them of the closer tie. St. Jerome winds up his argument in these words: "Natum Deum esse de virgine credimus, quia legisimus: Mariam nupisse post partum, non credimus, quia non legisimus. Nec hoc ideo dicimus, quo nuptiis confinuimus, ipsa quippe virginissima fructus est nuptiarum; sed quod nobis a sancta viria tempore estematur nihil illatis" (§ 19). In what follows he admits being ever rhetorical and declamatory. Still as, even in this, he nowhere charges Helvidius with having been "a disciple of Auxentius," the Arian bishop of Milan; or "an imitator of Symmachus," the champion of idolatry, we may well ask with Vallarius where Gennadius, who wrote more than a century later, got authority for such statements (de script. Excit. c. 32), which Cave repeats in part (Hist. lit. i. 278). Neither St. Ambrose nor St. Augustine mention him in their treatises on Virginitatis, where they make common cause with St. Jerome in condemning his views. His followers, indeed, constitute the eightieth-fourth of the heroes enumerated by the latter. ([E. S. R.]}

HEMEL, HEMELI. The eleventh bishop
HEMELIN, CONFESSION. [HIMELINUS.]

HEMERIUS (Hæmærius, HEMERIUS), a civil catholicos (see Dic. Chr. Antiq.). According to Athanasius he was enjoining by the emperor Constantine to have a church erected for the prebyster Ischyros. Athanasius has preserved a letter of Himerius addressed to the exactor of Martyrius, one of his subordinates, giving instructions relating to the work in question. (Athanas. Apol. cont. Aris. 35, in Pat. Gr. xxxv. 402.) Wernsdorff mentions him among the Himerius in his life of Himerius the sophist prefixed to his edition of that author's works (p. xxxv.).

HREMETHIERUS, one of the twelve sons of the centurion Marcellus, martyred with him in Spain under the prelates Agricolus, A.D. 298. (Baron. Annal. ann. 298, ix.)

HEMGISLUS, HEMGISSEL (Hæmgisla), abbot of Glastonbury. In the ancient list preserved in the Cotton MS. Tiberus B. 5, Haemgis appears as the first English abbot. William of Malmsbury assigns the first place to Beorwald, who was afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (693), and places Hemsigel second. As there is no probability that archbishop Berwald was ever abbot of Glastonbury, the place remains open for Haemgis. According to William of Malmsbury (Ant. Hist. ap. Gule, p. 308) Haemgisel became abbot in 675 and held office for 25 years; in another place he gives the date 680 to 705 (6. 329). It may be inferred that he was the chief agent of Ine and Hædæli in the restoration of the abbey, although the record of his acts and the charters which bear his name cannot stand critical investigation. He is the recipient of the grant of Luntocal, made by bishop Hædæli, July 6, 680 (K. C. D. 19; Mon. Angli. i. 47); in 681 a king, Baldred, with the consent of Kentwin, gives him land at Pennard (K. C. D. 20; Mon. Angli. i. 48; Malms. Antq. Hist. p. 403); in 704 Inæ bestowed large immunities on the abbey, which was still under Haemgelis (K. C. D. 22); and in 723, Hæmgiselle, abbot of Glastonbury gives an account of a charter of Kentwin dated 679, in which he states that, with the consent of Hædæli and at the petition of the monks, he has made Hæmgiselle abbot and gives him lands on Quatock, Caric, and Crucan (Antq. Hist. p. 308), but the original charter, which might possibly be the foundation charter of Glastonbury, is apparently not forthcoming. According to the same authority Haemgelis died and was buried in the old church of Glastonbury in 705. His tomb seems to have been regarded with special honour, and to have been in the wooden church (K. C. D. 93). The Cotton MS. names as his successors Wellitho, Coeniga, Beorthwyld, Caduling, and Muns; the last of whom was present at the council of Clowesæ in 803 (K. C. D. 1024); William of Malmsbury gives instead Beorthwald, 705-712; Aldberht, 712-719; Atfrith, 719-729; Hemsigel 729; and six obscure abbots between Hemsigel and Munc, to whom he assigns the years 803-824. Of these Walthan (754-786) may represent Caduling; Beorthwald is known as a contemporary of the early days of Boniface (Mon. Mon. p. 439); and see Beorthwald 710-716 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 295, 296); and Coenilis is the recipient of a letter preserved among those of St. Boniface, but without trustworthy mark of date (Mon. Mon. p. 129). Whilst none of these lists can be regarded as satisfactory, the more ancient one is more in agreement with other data, and was probably manipulated by William of Malmsbury to agree with spurious charters. (See Memorials of Dunstan, prep. p. lxxxiii; Mon. Angli. i. 5.)

HEMIAREIANS (Hæmiareiæ, Hæmiareiæ, in iii. 500; Hæmiariæio, Jo. Dan. de Haeres, num. 72). [SEMIRARIANS.]

HENANUS (Enannus), hermit in the diocese of Meath, given by the Bollandists among their prætextermisia at Sept. 18, perhaps Eunan of Drumrath. [Enan (3)] (Acta SS. 18 Sept. v. 758 n.)

HENEN, HENENN, HENENNEKEN, Welsh saint. [HYWYN.]

HENOC, BOOK OF. [HENOCH, BOOK OF.]

HENOSIS, in the system of Valentinus, or Aeon, the consort of Agarnous. (Irenæus, I. ii. p. 6; ii. iv. p. 133; Epiph. Hier. 31, p. 109.)

HENOTICON, THE, or "INSTRUMENT OF UNION," a document owing its existence to Acacius, the patriarch of Constantinople, and probably the production of his pen, put forth by the emperor Zeno, A.D. 482, on his restoration to the throne, after the discomfiture of the usurper Basiliscus, with the view of putting an end to the dissensions caused by what Gibbon designates "the obstinate and sanguinary zeal of the Monophysites." The attempt was well meant, and we may accept that historian's verdict, that it is "in ecclesiastical history that Zeno appears least contemptible." But like every endeavour to cover radical differences by a vague comprehensiveness, it contained in itself the seeds of dissolution, and became eventually the fruitful source of still fiercer enmities between those who had been forced by it into a fictitious agreement. Not only did the "Henoticum" fail in securing the union which was its professed object, and aggravate the divisions it was intended to cure, but it created a schism which divided the churches of the East and West for nearly forty years, lasting down to the reign of Justinian and the popehood of Hormisdas.
The immediate cause of the issuing of the "Henoticon" was the dissension between the rival occupants of the patriarchal see of Alexandria. On the death of Timotheus Salaphiocianus in A.D. 482, John Talaias, the eunucos of the Alexandrian church, was elected by the orthodox party. He at once, according to custom, despatched synodal letters to the chief bishops of Christendom, to notify his election. Those addressed to Simplicius of Rome and Calandion of Antioch were duly received; but the letters intended for Acacius and Zeno were sent under cover to Illy, the "magister officiorum," whom it was rumoured he had made his friend by large bribes from the treasures of the church, requesting him to present the documents to the emperor and patriarch, and use his influence to secure their favourable reception. Unluckily, Illy was at Antioch on important business when the messenger arrived; and before the parcel of papers reached him and the letters could be placed in his hands, Zeno had ventured upon the unplanned enterprise. Acacius had heard of John's appointment from another quarter. Fired by a neglect which he deemed a studied insult, Acacius resolved to get rid of the man who had so slighted him. It happened that Gennadius, bishop of Hermopolis Minor, a relation of Timotheus Salaphiocianus, and "apocrisarius" or legate of the see of Alexandria, was then at Constantinople. He conceived that he too had been slighted by the new patriarch, and gladly united with Acacius in compassing his overthrow. They represented to Zeno that Talaias was unworthy of the patriarchate, both as having replaced the name of Dioscorus on the diptychs, and as having perjured himself by accepting the see of Alexandria, after having, as was asserted, taken an oath that he would not seek it. Zeno readily gave credence to these charges, and when it was further represented that, if he recognised Peter Mongus, the deposed patriarch, who, by his agents, had been practising on Acacius, peace would be restored, he wrote to Simplicius, stating his grounds for hesitating to sanction the appointment of John, and urging that the restoration of Peter Mongus would put an end to the dissension. Acacius then caused the document to be revealed, June A.D. 482, that, though he had been on the point of recognising John as patriarch, he delayed doing so until the grave charges brought by Zeno could be investigated. At the same time he utterly refused to allow the elevation of a convicted heretic, such as Peter Mongus, to the patriarchal see. His return to the true faith might restore him to the communion of the church, but he could not render him worthy to be one of its chief rulers (Liberat. Dial. Brevar. cc. 16, 17; Evagr. H. E. ii. 12). This opposition to his wishes roused the indignation of Zeno, who, without delay, issued imperative commands to Pergamius, the new prefect of Egypt, then about to sail for Alexandria, and to Apollonius the governor, to expel John Talaias and seat Peter Mongus in his place. This was the time chosen by Apollonius to proclaim himself to the world in the novel character of an expounder of the faith of the Catholic church. Peter Mongus had agents at Constantinople, of whom an abbot named Ammon was the leader, actively working for his restoration under colour of seeking the peace of the church. Their strong representations that nothing would be so effectual for this end as the recognition of Mongus, were only too readily credited. The "Henoticon" was drawn up, which, since, as will be seen, it did not directly mention the council of Chalcedon, and the hypothetical allusion contained in it was capable of being construed in a depreciatory sense, might be accepted by those who, like Mongus, had hitherto rejected its decrees. Ammon and his companions engaged for Mongus that he would adopt this instrument of union; and on their word he was recognised by Zeno and Acacius as the canonical patriarch and his name inserted in the diptychs. This "Henoticon" was directed to the bishops and people in Alexandria, Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; but, as Tillemont has remarked (Mémo. Éccl. xvi. 327), it was really addressed only to those who had separated themselves from the church, i.e. to the Monophysites or semi-Eutychians. The original document is given by Evagrius, who renders a Latin translation by Liberatus (Brevar. c. 18; Labbe, Concil. v. 767). It commences by stating that "certain abbas, hermits, and other reverend persons, had presented to the emperor a petition, supplicating him to restore the unity of the churches, and enlarging on the lamentable results of the late divisions, which had caused vast numbers to depart this life destitute of the sacred laver and of Holy Communion, and produced such countless acts of homicide that not the earth only, but the air, reeked with blood." On this account, and knowing also that the strength and shield of the empire rested in the one true faith declared by the holy fathers gathered at Nicaea, and confirmed by those who met at Constantinople, and followed by those who had condemned Nestorius at the council of Ephesus, the emperor declares that "the creed so made and confirmed is the one only symbol of faith, and that he has held, holds, and will hold no other, and will regard all who hold another as aliens, and that in this alone those who desire saving baptism must be baptized." All who hold other views he anathematizes, and recognises the twelve chapters of Cyril as a symbolic book. The document then proposes the following formula of the holy vif. "that our Lord Jesus Christ is the only begotten Son of God, and Himself God, incarnate, consubstantial with the Father according to His Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to His manhood, that He came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, Mother of God, and that He is One Son, not two." That "it was this One and the same Son of God, written as type and endured the sufferings which he underwent voluntarily in His flesh." Those "who divide or confound the natures, or admit only a phantastical incarnation," are to be rejected, "since the incarnation without sin of the Mother of God did not cause the addition of a Son, for the Trinity remained even when one Person of the Trinity, God the Word, became incarnate." It asserts the fitness to pressume of the Word, and anathematizes all who have ever thought, or do think, "anything to the contrary, either now or at any other time, either at Chalcedon or in any other synod, especially Nestorius and Eutyches and their followers. The document closes with an earnest appeal to all to unite themselves to the church which, "as a loving mother, opens her long arms to receive them."

Such was the document which was to "combine all the churches in one harmonious confederation." It was "a work of some skill, of some cunning, of some public spirit, involving evading difficulties; it is subtle to escape subtleties" (Milman, Hist. of Lat. Christ. bk. iii. ch. i. vol. i. p. 248). The crucial test of the unity or duality of the natures of the Incarnate Word is cleverly avoided; this being treated as an open question, on which a difference of opinion might be lawfully permitted. Gibbon's verdict is by no means an unfair one, that "it accurately represents the Catholic faith of the incarnation without adopting or disclaiming the peculiar terms of the hostile sects" (vol. vi. p. 44, ch. xlvii). But its fatal error was its feebleness. Zeno and Acacius, the promulgators of the "Henoticum," lacked the vigorous intolerance with which Cyril of Alexandria and the Emperor were prepared to substitute for real, even though unwilling and enforced, unity of doctrine, a fictitious cohesion of discordant elements. Each was left to hold his own views undisputed, provided that he would not disturb others, and refrained from stigmatizing their opinions as heretical. The Monophysites who subscribed the instrument were to be admitted into the communion of the church, without being required to give up their distinctive doctrines, while their opponents, the so-called Catholic party, were left free to maintain the authority of the decrees of Chalcedon, and the tome of Leo. The peace resulting from such a concordat was naturally more apparent than real, and satisfied no one. The Catholic party, jealous in their advocacy of the council of Chalcedon, had no liking for a document which disparaged its authority, and suggested the possible erroneousness of its decisions. The Monophysites, on the other hand, complained that it did not go far enough, and clamoured for a more definite condemnation of a council which they regarded as heretical. The strength of the contents lay on one side with the high Chalcedonian party, chiefly consisting of the monastic orders, who condemned the "Henoticum" as tainted with Eutychianism, and on the other with the Eutychians or Monophysites, who, indignant with Mongus for turning traitor to their cause, separated themselves, and, forming a distinct body without any chief leader, and not holding communion with the patriarch, were designated "the houndless sect," "Acæphii." A third body of dissent was formed by the high ecclesiastical party, who were offended at the presumption of the emperor in assuming a right to issue decrees and spiritual matters, "a right," writes Milman (u. s. p. 235), "complacently admitted when ratifying or compulsorily enforcing ecclesiastical decrees, and usually adopted without scruple on other occasions by the party who affected the court, hastened to rejoice." To these three parties, fourth, when added, the party of the centre or the moderates, who, without very strong feelings either in the Nestorian or Eutychian direction, were weary of strife, or, as loyal subjects, were disposed to accept without much question the imperial decrees on subjects involved in so much mystery, together with those who were too cowardly to resist the power which held the sword. This party of the centre was in communion with Peter Mongus, who had once signed the "Henoticum," and given it all the weight of his authority to secure its general reception. Immediately after it had reached Alexandria, he took advantage of a public council held in church, and openly commenced it to the adoption of the faithful. The "Henoticum" was singularly unfortunate in its chief patron. Mongus was a thoroughly bad man. Violence and falsehood characterized all his conduct. As soon as he felt himself safe in his seat, his overbearing temper knew no bounds. He at once removed from the diptychs the names of Proterius and Timotheus Salpachicius, distastarng the remains of the latter, and casting them out of the church, and inserted those of Dioscorus and Timotheus Aelurus, and anathematized the council of Chalcedon and the tome of Leo. When called to account by Acacius, he coolly denied the anathemas, and professed his adherence to the faith as a member of the Chalcedon. He wrote to the same effect to Simplicius, expressing a desire to be received into communion by him. (Evagri. Hist. iii. 17; Liberat. Breviar. c. 18.) Such disgraceful double-dealing estranged a considerable number of his own party, and the discussions of which the unhappy "instrument of union" was the parent were still further aggravated by the cruel persecution of the orthodox, carried on not in Alexandria alone, but through the whole of Egypt by the new patriarch. In bold defiance of the prohibitions of the emperor, conveyed by officials despatched on purpose, all, whether clerics, monks, or laymen, who refused to accept the "Henoticum," were subjected to expulsion and serious maltreatment (Evagri. Hist. iii. 22). At this crisis Simplicius died, A.D. 464. The first act of his successor, Felix II., was an indignant rejection of the "Henoticum," as an insult to the council of Chalcedon, and an audacious act of the emperor Zeno, who dared to dictate articles of faith, and as a sced-pilot of simony. (Theod. Lact. ap. Milman, u. s. p. 236.) He also anathematized all the bishops who had subscribed this edict. This anathema included nearly all the bishops of the East, for though the "Henoticum" was originally addressed to the church of Egypt alone, it was imposed by Zeno and by his successor Anastasius, on all, under penalty of deposition and exile. A strong admonitory letter was addressed by Felix to Acacius, and another in milder terms to Zeno, the authors of the "Henoticum." All remonstrance proving vain, Felix fulminated an anathema against Acacius, depositing and excommuni- cating him, July 28, A.D. 464. (Liberat. c. 18; Labbe, Concil. iv. 1072.) This anathema severed the whole of the Eastern church from the West for nearly forty years. [ACACIUS.] Neither emperor nor patriarch took much heed of the condemnation of the Roman see, and continued to press the "Henoticum" everywhere, ejecting the bishops who withheld their signatures, and referring to communists with Petronian threats. (Theoph. p. 114; Liberat. c. 18; Victor. Tunn. Chron. ; Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. xvi. p. 168; Auce, Art. xcv.) Calandariu, the patriarch of Antioch, was deposed, and Peter the Fuller reinstated. Thus the three chief sees of the East were in constrained communion, and nearly the whole of the suffrangent bishops had been either silenced or deposed. Zeno and Anastasius had "made a solitude and called it peace." It would be tedious to narrate in detail the subsequent issues of this unhappy attempt to fold the discordant elements into external union, continued under Anastasius's successors in the see of Constantinople, and the emperor Anastasius. Anastasius, in his earnest desire for peace, required toleration of the bishops of the empire, who were forbidden to force the decrees of Chalcedon on a reluctant diocese, or to compel one which had accepted that council to abandon it. No change was to be introduced in either direction, and those who violated this truce of toleration were deposed with impartial severity. (Evagr. H. E. iii. 30.)

Euphemius was deposed from Constantinople A.D. 495. Macedonius, his successor, began by subscribing the "Henoticum," but overawed by the obstinate opposition of the "Acceomitae" and the other monastic bodies of Constantinople, whom he had endeavoured to reconcile to that instrument, he became an ardent partisan of the council of Chalcedon, and, after having headed the religious tumults in the city, which at one time threatened Anastasius's throne, was, in his turn deposed, and was succeeded by Timotheus, A.D. 511. The new patriarch not only signed the "Henoticum," but pronounced an anathema on the council of Chalcedon. Flavianus, accused of being a concealed Nestorian, was ejected from Antioch in A.D. 512, where the Monophysite Severus, who had raised religious riots in the streets of Alexandria and Constantinople, reigned supreme. Elias of Jerusalem, in spite of his large concessions to the Catholic party, refusing to go all lengths with them, was deposed the next year. "Throughout Asiatic Christendom it was the same wild struggle. Bishops deposed quietly, or, where resistance was made, the two factious fighting in the streets, in the churches. Cities, even the holiest places, ran with blood." (Milman, i. s. p. 245.)

The "Henoticum," having proved so fruitful a source of dissension in the East, was destined to become the watchword of rival parties in the West. Gelasius, the successor of Anastasius II., had sought to re-unite the churches by the proposal, which was also made by the "Henoticum," that Acacius's name, which Gelasius had proposed to expunge, should be quietly left on the dipluchs, and that no more should be said on the subject—a crime against rigid orthodoxy for which Dante consigns him to eternal torments. On his death, in A.D. 498, a contested election ensued, which was exasperated by differences of opinion on the "Henoticum" and the schisms in the East. Two rival pontiffs were consecrated on the same day, Dec. 22, A.D. 499, Laurentius and Symmachus. The former was the advocate of union, the latter its uncompromising opponent. Theodoric, to whom the claims of the rival pontiffs were submitted, decided in favour of Symmachus, who had received the largest number of votes. This choice was fatal to the restoration of peace in the East on the terms of the "Henoticum." The pope and the emperor hurled at one another charges of heresy and messages of defiance. The turbulent orthodox party at Constantinople was supported by representatives of the emperor by the Roman sea. The rebellion of Vitalian, characterized by Gibbon as "the first of the religious wars," whose battle-cry was the council of Chalcedon, was not obscurely censured by Symmachus's still more haughty successor, Hormisdas, who reaped the fruits of the humiliation of the aged Anastasius, and became "the dictator of the religion of the empire."

The final repudiation of Hormisdas of the public anathematization of the authors and maintainers of the "Henoticum" was indignantly rejected by Anastasius. But far from retracting, the pontiff rose in his demands. Anastasius, however, to his honour, though enfeebled by age and calamity, stood firm. He refused to anathematize the memory of Acacius, whose only crime had been that of carrying out measures of toleration with a view to union, and he broke off all communication with Hormisdas. The conflict only ended with the life of Anastasius, who died worn out by strife at the age of nearly ninety years, A.D. 518. His successor, Justin, was an unlettered soldier of unbending orthodoxy. The new patriarch, John of Capadocia, "a man of servile mind though unmeasured ambition," was prepared to adopt any course which would secure his power. He had seconded all the measures of Anastasius, but at the demand of the mob he now hastily assembled a synod of forty bishops, by which anathemas were passed on all upholders of the "Henoticum," the banished bishops were recalled, and the so-called usurpers deposed. All heretics, i.e. those who refused the council of Chalcedon, were made incapable of civil or military office. Hormisdas profited by the favourable opportunity to press his demands, which were admitted without question. The names of the patriarchs Acacius, Fravitta, Euphemius, and Macedonius, together with those of the emperor Zeno and Anastasius, were erased from the dipluchs, and Acacius was branded with a special anathema. The acknowledged orthodoxy of the two last-named patriarchs, though not conspicuous in the "Henoticum," the successor could not outweigh the damming crime of their having dared to recognise Acacius as a legitimate bishop. Fresh disturbances were created by this rigour, especially when it was found that Hormisdas demanded the condemnation of all who had communicated with Acacius, and turned a deaf ear to the repeated applications both of the emperor and the patriarch for some relaxation of these terms. (Evagr. H. E. iv. 4; Labbe, Concil. iv. 1542; Natal. Alexand. Hist. Eccl. tom. ii. p. 448.) Hormisdas at last consented that Epiphanius, John's successor, should act for him in receiving churches into communion. Some honoured names were allowed to remain on the dipluchs, and eventually Euphemius and Macedonius, with Flavian of Antioch, and Elias of Jerusalem, and some others who had died during the separation, were admitted to the Roman Calendars (Tillern. Mon. Eccl. tom. xvi. p. 697; Bolland 25 Apr. p. 373).

Thus ended the unhappy schism which had separated the East and West for nearly forty years. The "Henoticum," the parent of all these divisions, without being formally repealed, was allowed to sink into oblivion. The four eccumenical councils, including that of Chalcedon, were everywhere received, save in Egypt, and one common thread expressed the religious faith of the Christian world.

HENRIUS, sixth bishop of Vicenza (Vicenzi), circ. 580, between Apollonius and Horotius. He refused to hold communion with his metropolitan, Elias patriarch of Aquileia, and to obey any citation to his synods, lest he should seem to countenance his errors. [Elias (19)].

(Ughell. Ital. Sac. v. 1031; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 821, 954.)

HENWYN, HENY. [HYWYN.]

HEORDWALD, bishop. [HEREWALD.]

HEORTASIUS (HEORTICUS, EORTASUS), bishop of Sardis, who signed the synodal letter issued by the council of Ancyr, 358 (Epiph. Haer. lxxii. 11, p. 859; Manili, iii. 287, where the name is given HEORTICUS). He was deposed by the Acacian council of Constantinople 360, as having been ordained metropolitan without the consent of the bishops of the province (Sozomen, iv. 24). He was present, however, and active in the council of Lampacus, A.D. 364 or 365 (Manili, iii. 213, 377), where he united with a number of other Macedonian bishops in sending a legate to Liberus bishop of Rimous with a libella formally declaring their submission (Socrates, iv. 12), and Liberus wrote them a congratulatory letter in reply. The "letter" is not dated, but Liberus died in the September of A.D. 366. (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. Rom. p. 17.) (Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 861; Ceillier, iv. 578.) He is sometimes called EORTASUS.

[7. W. D.]

HEORTICUS, bishop of Metropolis in the province of Pisidia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. In the subscriptions he is called bishop of Nicopolis Metropolis. (Manili, viii. 159, 407; Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 1057.)

HEORTIS, bishop, an old and attached friend of Chrysostom, who wrote to him from Cucurna, A.D. 404, begging him to cheer his extreme solitude, many trials, and constant dread of banditti, by frequent letters. (Chrys. Epist. 30.)

[6. V.]

HEPHAESTIUS, bishop of Commacum in Pamphylia, who signed the letter of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Manili, viii. 576; Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 1025.)

HERACLITUS, patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 233-249. He was the brother of the martyr Philarutus, one of Origen's converts (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 3), and from being a pupil he became an assistant in teaching to Origen, who left the school to him when he retired from Alexandria to Caesarea (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 15, 20). Heraclea returned the school but a short time, for on the death of Demetrius, he was elected to the archiepiscopal see. Though a disciple of Origen Heraclea did not adopt any of his peculiar views, but voted for his deprivation both from his office as teacher and from his orders, and for his excommunication at the two synods held by Demetrius, nor when elected bishop did he make any attempt to rescind these sentences. Heraclea seems to have been a man of ability, from the fact that he was Origen's successor in the catechetical school. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 31) narrates a visit paid Heraclea by Africanus the amanuensis on the report of his great learning, as also (H. E. vii. 7) on the authority of his successor Dionysius the rule which he followed respecting the treatment of heretics. (Le Quen, Oriens Christ. ii. 392; Photius, Cod. 118; Acta SS. Bell. Jul. iii. 945-7. He was commemorated on Dec. 4 (Cal. Aethiop.). [L. D.]

HERACLEIDAS. [HERACLEIDES.]

HERACLEON (1), a Gaetic described by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 9, p. 585) as the most esteemed (bokwérare) of the school of Valentinus; and, according to Origen (Comm. in S. Joh. p. 2, § 8; Opp. tom. iv. p. 86), said to have been in personal contact (páraisous) with Valentinus himself. He is barely mentioned by Ireneaeus (ii. 41) and by Tertullian (Adv. Val. 4). The common source of Philaster and Pseudo-Tertullian (i.e. probably the earlier treatise of Hippolytus) contained an article on Heracleon between those on Polteraeanus and Secundus, and on Marcus and Colarbasus. Lipsius has conjectured that the sketch of Valentinianism, given in the later treatise of Hippolytus (book 8), is derived from a work of Heracleon, the reason for his guess being that Hippolytus, in the preface to this section, promises to give an account, amongst others, of the doctrines of Heracleon, and that this promise remains unfilled, unless we assume that the general account of the teachings of Valentinus really represents that of Heracleon. But a closer examination of the method of Hippolytus shows that this argument has no force. Hippolytus in his preface follows the order of the earlier treatise, and proposes to treat of the doctrines of Valentinus, of those of Secundus, Polteraeanus and Heracleon, of those of Marcus and Colarbasus. The theory of Lipsius requires Hippolytus to treat separately of each of these heretics, yet it makes him depart from this programme at first starting; for if the section on Valentinus be taken as the fulfilment of the promise to detail the opinions of Valentinus, what becomes of the promise to detail the opinions of Valentinus? It is in any case plain that Hippolytus does not treat separately of Colarbasus. Actually this part of the work diverges itself, in continuity with its preface, into three sections. In the first, which is the only original section, he gives a general account of Valentinianism, and tries to show that it is derived from the heathen philosophy of Pythagoras. Hippolytus (vi. 42, p. 203) appears to claim to have a direct knowledge of the writings of Valentinus; but if we allow that he may have here taken for his guide a treatise, not by Valentinus himself, but by one of his followers, we have no special reason to think of Heracleon. Hippolytus then copies with abridgment what Irenaeus had said about Secundus, Ptolemaeus, and certain unnamed members of the school; and then what Irenaeus had said about Marcus. There is every reason to think that Hippolytus identified with Heracleon one of the unnamed heretics of the second section, having possibly been taught to do so by Irenaeus in his voce lectures at Rome. For Irenaeus in the passage in question names it as a sect which divided the Valentinians, that some of them commenced their apologetics with a dyad, consisting of a male and female principle, others with a monad, or single principle without consort. Now, Philaster and Pseudo-Tertullian agree in specifying it as the distinctive feature of the teaching of Heracleon, that he commenced with a single principle; though their accounts differ in this, that the former would lead us to think that the original principle, together with its first emanation, formed the first pair of seons; whereas the latter, and probably more correctly, would make the original principle give being to a pair, and would not include itself in the system of pairs of seons. Hippolytus (vi. 55, p. 195) mentions another subject of dispute which divided the Valentinians; the submitters, the Italians, asserting our Lord's body to have been animal (ψωμίου); the other, or Eastern school, maintaining it to have been spiritual. Heracleon and Ptolemaeus are mentioned by Hippolytus as belonging to the first school, Axionicus and Ardesianes (BARDEIANES) to the second. Lipsius has analysed the section in Epiphanius on Heracleon (Haer. 30) and shown that it possesses no independent authority. It is almost all made up by putting together notices in Irenaeus of different unnamed Valentinians. On the whole, it seems to us that the best way of reconciling the celebrity of Heracleon with the small space given to him by writers against Valentinianism is to suppose that he was not the author of any formal exposition of Valentinian doctrine, but only of exegetical works in which the principles of Valentinianism were assumed. At all events it is only of such works of his that we have any express knowledge.

In fact, the chief interest that now attaches to Heracleon is that he is the earliest commentator on the New Testament of whom we have knowledge. Origen, in the still extant portion of his commentary on St. John, quotes Heracleon nearly fifty times, usually controverting, occasionally defending, him. We thus recover large sections of Heracleon's commentary on the 1st, 2nd, 4th, and 8th of John. We have no doubt lost many extracts, owing to the mutilated condition in which Origen's commentary on St. John has come down to us; and the phrase used by Origen, ἐν δὲ καταλαλοστιν ἐξομιλήσεως, suggests that Heracleon's commentary on St. John was written in a like condition of mutilation. Photius (134, Ep. ad Daphn. p. 178; Amphiloch. 246), speaking on the text John i. 17 repels the idea that the words, "grace and truth came by Jesus Christ," were spoken in disparagement of the law which "was given by Moses," remarking, "Heracleon might say this, and the disciples of Heracleon." He probably refers to an extract from Heracleon contained in one of the lost sections of Origen's work; for Origen is the only father who quotes Heracleon's commentary, which is not likely to have survived to the time of Photius. There is reason to think that Heracleon wrote commentaries on St. Luke as well as on St. John. He is twice quoted by Clement of Alexandria: in one of the places (Strom. iv. 9) Clement expressly says that his citation is from Heracleon's exposition of Luke xii. 8; in the other (Eclog. ex Script. Proph. p. 995), Clement's quotation is in a commentary on the verses Luke iii. 16, 17, so that it seems probable that it is from an exposition by Heracleon of these verses. The fragments of Heracleon were collected by Grabe (Sporileg. ii. 85, &c.), and reprinted as an appendix to Massuet's, Stieren's, and Migne's editions of Irenaeus. Three short notices may be mentioned in addition; De la Rue, iv. 117, 140, 226; the second recording that Heracleon in John i. 29 read Bethany, not Bethabara; the third referring to the use made by Heracleon of the "preaching of Peter."

The first of the passages quoted by Clement bears on an accusation brought against more than one of the Gnostic sects, that they taught that it was no sin to avoid martyrdom by denying the faith. No exception can be taken to what Heracleon says in this respect. Possibly his judgment might have been different from that of the orthodox as to the occasions when "reason would require" public confession before the magistrates; but his words do not go beyond a perhaps necessary protest against the exaggerated veneration given at the time to such confession. He says, "Men mistake in thinking that the only confession is that made with the voice before the magistrates; there is another confession made in the life and conversation, by faith and works corresponding to the faith. The first confession may be made by a hypocrite; and it is one not required of all; there are many who have never been called on to make it, as for instance Matthew, Philip, Thomas, Levi [Lebbæus]; the other confession must be made by all. He who is conscious of having sinned in his disposition of heart will confess with the voice also when need shall arise and reason require. Well did Christ use concerning confession the phrase 'in me' (ἐν με) or ἐν ἐμοί), concerning denial the phrase 'me.' A man may confess 'Him' with the voice who really denies Him, if he does not confess Him also in action; but those only confess 'in Him' who live in the confession and in corresponding actions. Nay, it is he himself whom they embrace and who dwells in them who makes confession 'in them'; for 'He cannot deny Himself.' But concerning denial, He did not say whosoever shall deny 'in me,' but whosoever shall deny 'me;' for no one that is 'in Him' can deny Him. And the words 'before men' do not mean before unbelievers only, but before Christians and unbelievers alike; before the one by their life and conversation, before the others in words."

The reader must be struck with the manner in which this exposition assumes the significance of every word in the sacred text commented on; and this characteristic runs equally through the fragments of Heracleon's commentary on St. John, prevailing alike whether the words commented on be our Lord's own or only those of the Evangelist. Thus he calls attention to the facts that in the opening statement of the gospel "all things were made by him," the preposition used is διά, that Jesus is said to have gone down to Capernaum and gone up to Jerusalem; that he was born and not but born to the οίκος, not to θύρα, that he said salvation is of the Jews not in them, and again (iv. 40) that our Lord tarried with the Samaritans, not in them; notice is taken of this in our Lord's discourse with the woman of Samaria, where he first emphasizes his assertion with "Woman believe me"; and though Origen occasionally accuses Heracleon of deficient accuracy, for instance in taking the prophet (ii. 21) as meaning no more than a prophet, "in three days" (li. 19) as meaning no more than "on the third day," yet on the whole the minuteness of Heracleon's examination of the words on which he comments, could not be exceeded by the strongest believer in verbal-inspiration at the present day. He attempts to reconcile the differences between the Evangelists, as for instance our Lord's ascription to the Baptist of the titles "Elias" and "prophet," with John's own disclaimer of these titles. He finds mysteries in the numbers which occur in the narrative, in the forty and six years which the temple was in building, in the six husbands of the woman of Samaria (for such was his reading), in the two days which our Lord abode with the people of the city, in the seventh hour at which the nobleman's son healed. He thinks it necessary to reconcile his own doctrine with that of the sacred writer, even at the cost of some violence of interpretation. Thus he declares that the Evangelist's assertion that all things were made by the Logos must be understood only of the things of the visible creation, his own doctrine being that the higher or second world was not so made, but that the lower creation was made by the Logos through the instrumentality of the Demiurge. Instances of this kind where the interpreter is forced to reject the most obvious meaning of the text are sufficiently numerous to shew that the gospel was not written in the interests of Valentinianism; but it is a book which Heracleon evidently recognized as of such authority, that he must perforce have it on his side.

When striving to find Valentinianism in the Gospel, the instrument he usually employs is the method of spiritual interpretation. Thus the nobleman (Basaλιγδος, iv. 47) is the Demiurge, a petty prince, his kingdom being limited and temporary, the servants are his angels, the son is the man who beholds the Demiurge. As he finds the φύσις represented in the nobleman's son, so again he finds the φύσις οριστή in the woman of Samaria. The water of Jacob's well which she rejected is Judaism; the husband whom she is to call is no earthly husband, but her spiritual bridegroom from the Pleneros; the other husbands with whom she previously had committed fornication, represent the matter with which the spiritual have been entangled; that she is no longer to worship either in "this mountain" or in "Jerusalem," means that she is not, like the world, a demigod, the Hyle, or kingdom of the devil, nor like the Jews to worship the creator or Demiurge; her watering-pot is her good disposition for receiving life from the Saviour. It must be observed that, though the results of Heracleon's method are heretical, the method itself is commonly used by orthodox fathers. They do not merely find spiritual interpretations for the details of parables, but they do not find it inconsistent with their full faith in the literal truth of the scripture histories, to trace a spiritual significance in many of the things recorded.

Heracleon's doctrine is not orthodox, but his principles of interpretation cannot be said to differ essentially from those of Origen himself.

Many other parallels between instances adduced to Heracleon's exposition, that the cords with which our Lord drove out the traffickers from the temple, represent the power of the Holy Spirit; and the wood to which he assumes they were attached, the wood of the cross; and in the same context, Origen gives explanations of the colt and ass on which our Lord rode into Jerusalem, of the village in which He found them, the branches cut from the trees, the crowds that accompanied Him, and so forth.

Origen even occasionally blames Heracleon for being too easily content with more obvious interpretations. Heracleon, for instance, at first is satisfied to take "whosoever catcheth I am not worthy to loose," as meaning no more than "for whom I am not worthy to perform menial offices," and he has to admit Origen's objection when he tries, however unsuccessfully, to investigate what the shoe represented. Heracleon understands the Jew's question "will he kill himself?" (viii. 22), as most readers do now; Origen observes that the Jews could not rationally have supposed Jesus to mean that he was going to a place worse than that reserved for them; they must have had a traditional knowledge that the Saviour was not to have His life taken from Him, but to yield it of Himself; and they must have supposed Him to mean to claim the power of doing this, and so of ascending to a place which they could not attain. It does not appear to us that Heracleon used his method of interpretation controversially to establish Valentinian doctrine, but rather that being a Valentinian of the second generation, thoroughly imbued with a belief of the truth of the familiar doctrines of that sect, he found those doctrines indicated in the passages on which he commented, precisely in the same way that orthodox commentators have found the doctrines which they believed to be true.

One other of Heracleon's interpretations deserves to be mentioned. The meaning which the Greek fathers, John vii. 44, most naturally convey, is that of the pro-Hieronymian translation "mendax est sicut et pater ejus," and so they are generally understood by Greek fathers, though in various ways they escape attributing a father to the devil. Origen here makes το φάσεστε the nominative to Λαοδ, and understands it to mean any lying spirit: Epiphanius (Haer. xi. 6, p. 287; lxxvi. 64, p. 677) makes Judas the liar and Cain the father; Cyril. Alex. in loc. refutes the opinion of some of his predecessors, who inferred from the text that the chief and father of the devils had been in our Lord's time already consigned to the abyss, and that it was a subordinate devil who tempted the Jews. His own opinion is that the father of the Jews is Cain, and his father the devil. We learn from a catena that this was also the interpretation of Ammonius. Philebus (Quoted. Amphil. lib. iii. ch. 88) says that the speaker of the lie is the Jew, and his father the devil. Hilgenfeld and Volkmar consider that the Evangelist shews that he embraced the opinion of the Valentinians and some earlier Gnostic sects that the father of the devil was the Demiurge or God of the Jews. But this idea was unknown to Heracleon, who here interprets the father of the devil, that is, the chief and father of a civil nature or spiritual. Origen objects that if the devil be evil by the necessity of his nature, he ought rather to be pitied than blamed.
HERACLEON

To judge from the fragments that remain, Heracleon's bent was rather practical than speculative. He says nothing of the Gnostic theories as to stages in the origin of the universe; the prologue of St. John does not tempt him into mention of the Valentinian Aenology. Indeed it is to be noted that he does not use the word aëon in the sense employed by other Valentinian writers, but rather where according to their use we should expect the word Pleroma; and this last word he uses in a special sense, describing the spiritual husband of the Samaritan woman as her Pleroma, that is to say the complement, or supply of what was lacking to perfection. We find in his system only two beings unknown to orthodox theology, the Demiurge, and apparently a second Son of Man; for on John iv. 37 he distinguishes a higher Son of Man who sows from the Saviour who reaps. Heracleon gives as great prominence as any orthodox writer to Christ and to His redeeming work. But all mankind are not alike in a condition to profit by His redemption. The church is the new order of creatures; first the Hylie or material, formed of the Æm, which is the substance of the devil, incapable of immortality. Secondly, the psychic or animal belonging to the kingdom of the Demiurge; their ψυχή is naturally mortal, but capable of being clothed with immortality, and it depends on their disposition (θέωσ) whether they become sons of God, or children of the devil; and, thirdly, the pneuma or spiritual, who are by nature of the divine essence, though entangled with matter and needing redemption to be delivered from it. These are the special creation of the Logos; they live in Him, and become one with Him. In the second class Heracleon seems to have had the Jews specially in his mind, and to have regarded them with a good deal of tenderness. They are the children of Abraham, who if they do not love God, at least do not hate Him. Their king, the Demiurge, is represented as not hostile to the supreme, and though shortsighted and ignorant, yet as well disposed to faith and ready to implore the Saviour's help for his subjects whom he had not himself been able to deliver. When his ignorance has been removed, he and his redeemed subjects will enjoy immortality in a place raised above the material world.

Besides the passages on which he comments Heracleon refers to the Epistles to the Corinthians. He is of that opinion that a typographical error has caused the text to be translated, and what he means is to demonstrate from the whole of the narrative how the Savior's help for his subjects whom he had not himself been able to deliver. When his ignorance has been removed, he and his redeemed subjects will enjoy immortality in a place raised above the material world.

The story Pseudo-Epiphanius tells is that the heresy of Heracleon consisted in his teaching that a baptized person cannot be affected by sin, no matter what actions he may commit; that as snow melts when brought into contact with fire, so the quality of sin disappears out of all his actions. He tells that certain Sicilian bishops assembled a synod against him, which drew up a letter to Alexander (bishop of Rome about a.d. 115), begging him to send some one to confute Heracleon; that Alexander accordingly both wrote a book against him and sent a presbyter, Sabinianus, who confuted the heretic so effectually that he took ship by night and fled no one knew whither. Sbarrales, quoted by De Rossi (Rom. Sott. ii. 207), and after him by Lipaius (Chron. der röm. Emp. 125), states that some strange account may have originated in a distortion of the story of the anti-pope Heraclius, who "vetuit lapsos peocata dolore," and who possibly may, like his competitor Eusebius, have been banished to Sicily. But it seems to us rather too complimentary to "Pseudo-Epiphanius" to assume that a story peculiar to him has been built on any substratum of fact.

Considerable interest attaches to the determination of the date of Heracleon on account of his use of St. John's Gospel, which clearly had attained so high an authority when he wrote that it must then have been a work of considerable standing. It seems to us, however, that the mere fact that a book was held in equal honour by the Valentinians and the orthodox proves that it must have attained its position before the separation of the Valentinians from the church; and, therefore, that as far as the controversy concerning the Fourth Gospel is concerned, it is of less importance to determine the exact date of Heracleon. To us it seems that the decade 170-180 may probably be fixed for the centre of his activity. This would not be inconsistent with the truth of the report that he had been person-

Possibly this may have been the earlier use of the word; see in the manner in which the phrase "incorruptible Aeon" is used (Irenæus, i. 30).

4 Heinrich refers to Irenæus, i. xii. 4, but the question there discussed is quite different, viz. whether the title Son of Man has reference to the Aeon Anthropos or to the first Principle, which in the older Gnostic systems was given the title Man.
HERACLEON

ally instructed by Valentinus, who continued to teach as late as 180. And it would allow time for Heracleon to have gained celebrity before Clement wrote, one of whose references to Heracleon is in what was probably one of his earliest works. He had evidently long passed from the scene when Origen wrote. Concerning Heracleon may be consulted Neander (Gen. Entwick., 143, and Gesch. Hist. ii. 135); Heinrici (Val. Gnom., 127); Westcott (N. T. Com., 299).

HERACLEON (2) (TRACLEON), bishop of Tralles (Evanthia), in the plain of the Maeander in the ecclesiastical province of Asia, present at the council of Ephesus, 431. (Mansi, vi. 586 c; 613; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 996.) [L. D.]

HERACLEONAS, FLAVIUS (also called Heracleius by Niceph. C. and Suidas), emperor, A.D. 641, son of the emperor Heracleus and his second wife Martina. Many particulars of his short reign are given by Nicephorus patriarch of Constantinople in his Breviarium, and a few circumstances are given by Theophanes. He was born in the province of Lazica in Colchis, which his father was traversing, accompanied by Martina, in his expedition against Persia (Brev. p. 17, ed. Petav. in Patr. Gr. tom. c. p. 899). This was the first expedition of Heracleus into the east, and Petavius fixes 622 as the year, while others give 626. In 631 Heracleonas was created Caesar by his father (Br. 26); about 632 he was crowned (ib. 30), and soon afterwards named consul (ib. 31). On his father's death Heracleonas and his half-brother Constantinus reigned jointly for one hundred and three days (Br. 33), from March 11 to June 23, 641, as Petavius reckons, until the death of Constantius, after which Heracleonas shared the throne with his mother. One of the first acts of Heracleonas was to dedicate to God in the great church his father's crown, valued at seventy pounds of gold. It had been buried with Heracleus, but was afterwards removed from the church by Constantinus. He also restored Cyrus patriarch of Alexandria to his see. But acts of tyranny against the nobility and the ministers of the crown brought the emperor very near to a civil war, and the troops under command of Valentius took up a hostile position at Chaledon. Martina and her son, as well as the patriarch Pyrrhus, were accused of plotting against the life of young Heracleus Constans the orphan son of Constantius. In vain Heracleonas stood sponsor for the infant at the font and crowned him with the diadem of his great father, and made every ostensible profession of affection and goodwill before the people. The patriarch was expelled in a riot, Martina and her son were banished, she suffering the loss of her tongue and he of his nose. Valentius also, who had come to terms with the court, seems to have been implicated in the same charge, as he shared in the sentence of exile. Theophanes states that Heracleonas reigned six months after Constantius, and Petavius computes the expulsion to have occurred in Dec. 641, though some assign the event to Jan. 642. Heracleonas was succeeded by his nephew Heracleus Constantus already mentioned. (Theoph. Chron. A.C. 632, p. 253; Du Cange, Fam. August. 101.) [C. H.]

HERACLIANUS (1), bishop of Pismirus (Pessinus), c. A.D. 347. He was a disciple of St. Severus archbishop of Ravenna, who appointed him bishop of Pismirus. He was present at the council of Sardica. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 948; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 341.) [R. S. C.]

HERACLIANUS (3), sixth bishop of Sens. [ERACLAINUS.]

HERACLIANUS (4), seventh in the series of the bishops of Toulouse, his predecessors for nearly a century being unknown. He was present at the council of Agde, in A.D. 506, and was succeeded by St. Germanus not many years afterwards (Gall. Christ. xiii. 7; Mansi, viii. 337). [S. A. B.]

HERACLIANUS (5) (HERACLIUS), count of Africa, succeeding Bathanarius. In the opinion of some he was the husband of Thermantia, niece of the emperor Theodosius (Du Cange, Fam. August. p. 61). In the reign of Honorius, A.D. 415, he revolted, and his brief usurpation seems to have brought a temporary triumph to the Donatists (Hieron. Dial. adv. Pelag. lib. iii. cap. 19, p. 804, Patr. Lat. xxii. 588 c). Passing over with a fleet to Italy he was defeated at Uricium by count Maruinus, and returning to Carthage was beheaded. Jerome in his commentary on Ezekiel refers to him as an illustration of Ps. ixxiii. 7, "Ye are gold," &c., as one of the highest rank forfeiting his honour and his life (Comment. in Ezek. lib. ix. cap. 28, p. 329, in Patr. Lat. xcvii. 268 a). [C. H.]

HERACLIANUS (6), bishop of Chaledon, a vigorous opponent of the Manicheans. (Phot. Bibl. cod. 231, p. 287.) Photius (cod. 85) describes his work Adversus Manichaeos in twenty books, as composed in a clever and dignified style, refuting the Erosionomia, the Liber Giganteus, and the Theauri of the Manicheans. Heracleianus reviews the authors who preceded him in writing against this sect, such as Hegemonius, Titus, George of Laodicea, Serapion, Diodorus, briefly supplying their omissions and citing in full their best arguments with comments of his own. A fragment of his letter to a certain Achiilus, to whom his work appears to have been addressed, has been preserved by Maximus the Confessor. (Maxim. Confess. Opusc. Thed. p. 65, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xcii. 125 c; and also in Cave, i. 551.) [C. H.]

HERACLIDAS (1), Manichean. [APHRODITUS, HIERACAS.]

HERACLIDAS (2), steward (procurator) of the imperial revenues in Africa, to whom reference was to be made in case of necessity, in order to provide money sufficient to pay the clergy to the Catholic clergy, at the command of Constantine, A.D. 312 (Euseb. H. E. x. 6). [H. W. P.]

HERACLIDAS (3), a young friend of Amphilochius, with whom he denounced the profession of a barrister, and devoted himself to an ascetic life. Having passed through Caesarea on his way to join his friend, he was detained by Basil, whom he had visited for the purpose of receiving his instructions, and lodged by him in the hospital he had recently erected, c. 373. Basil wrote a long letter to Amphilochius in the name of Heraclides, containing instructions as to a religious life, and begging him to come and share with him the benefit of his instructions. (Bas. Epist. 150 [392].) [E. V.]

HERACLIDAS (4), bishop of Nyssa about 440, wrote two epitaphs in imitation of a Messalian book, using language which in the judgment of Photius (Cod. 52) furnished a proof of the antiquity of the veneration of images. [G. S.]

HERACLIDAS (2). In the subscriptions to the creed of the first Constantinopolitan council, A.D. 381, is found Heracleides Cituaneus, in the margin Ptoymenas (Mansi, iii. 570). Heraclides is supposed to have been bishop of Petneasus on the river Eurymedon in Blemmyca, or of Tyrus (Tyrnæum) in Pisdia. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1023, 1047; Gams, Series Episc. 450, 451.) [L. D.]

HERACLIDAS (3), bishop of Oxyrhynchus in the Heptanomus, in Lower Egypt. He succeeded the heretical bishop Theodorus, c. 384, and is possibly referred to by Rufinus. (Ruf. Hist. Monach. cap. 5, in Patrolog. Lat. xxi. 408; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 578.) [J. de S.]

HERACLIDAS (4), a bishop in Cyprus in the end of the 4th century; one of those to whom the letter of Theophilus of Alexandria in condemnation of Origen was addressed, A.D. 400. (Jerome, ep. 92, ed. Vall.) [W. H. F.]

HERACLIDAS (5) CYPRUS, bishop of Ephesus; a native of Cyprus, who had received a liberal education, was versed in the Scriptures, and had served in some years in the desert of Scetis under Evagrius. He then became deacon to Chrysostom, and was in immediate attendance on him. On the deprivation of Antoninus bishop of Ephesus, A.D. 401, there being a deadlock in the election through the number of rival candidates and the violence of the opposing factions, Chrysostom brought Heraclides forward, and he was elected by the votes of seventy bishops to the vacant see. The election at first only increased the disturbance, and loud complaints were made of the unfitness of Heraclides for the office, which detained Chrysostom in Asia. (Socr. H. E. vi. 11; Soc. H. E. viii. 6; Pallad. p. 138.) At the assembling of the synod of the Oak, A.D. 403, Heraclides was summoned to answer certain specified charges brought against him by Macarius, bishop of Magnesia, a bishop named Isaac, and a monk named John. Among these charges were those of having stolen a deacon's clothes at Caesarea, and of having unjustly scourged some persons at Ephesus and dragged them in chains through the city, and of entertaining Origениzeng tenets.

The urgency with which the condemnation of Chrysostom was pressed forward retarded the suit against Heraclides, which had come to no issue at the time of his great master's deposition and banishment. The sudden recall of Chrysostom did not at once free Heraclides from the machinations of his persecutors. According to Socrates and Sozomen, whose account, however, is called in question by Tillemont (vol. xi. 599, "Chrysost." note lxiii), fresh accusations were brought against him after Chrysostom's return. His friends and those of Chrysostom protested against the illegality of taking proceedings against him in his absence, and the matter was expounded so warmly by the populace that singular frays took place in the streets between the people of Constantinople, who were ardently attached to the cause of Chrysostom, and the Alexandrian sailors at the beck of Theophilus. The quarrel became at last so serious that Theophilus and those who thought with him consulted their safety by flight (Socr. H. E. vi. 17; Soc. H. E. viii. 19; Phot. Cod. 59). After Chrysostom's second and final exile in 404 Heraclides was his fellow sufferer. He was deposed by the party in power, and put in prison at Nicomedia, where, when Palladius wrote, he had been already languishing four years. A eunuch who, according to Palladius, was stained with the grossest vices, was consecrated bishop of Ephesus in his room (Pallad. Dial. ed. Bigot, p. 139). Olympias informed Chrysostom, at Heraclides' request, of the miseries of which he was involved. He replied that, much as he desired to help him, he could do nothing for him but acquaint Pentadis with his case, and beg her to do what she could to relieve him (Chrys. Epist. 14, p. 600).

On the subscription to this Heraclides of the Jeanic History of Palladius, under the name of Paradosus Heraclides, see article PALLADIUS; also Fabricius, Dih. Grec. x. 117; Cellarius, vii. 487. [E. V.]

HERACLIDAS (6), bishop of Thyinis or Potolémais in the Thebaid, present at the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1128; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 605.) [J. de S.]

HERACLIDAS (7), bishop of Heraclea Superior in the Heptanomus. He was present at the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Mansi, iv. 1128, 1221), and is possibly the same bishop Heraclides to whom Isidore of Pelusium addressed several epitaphs. (Isidor. Epist. lib. i. 19, 182, 183; lib. ii. 74, 220, 241, 242; ill. io; Patrof. Grac. xivii. 195 seq.) [J. de S.]

HERACLIDIANUS, bishop of Settae (Satta, Sitiae), in the province of Lydia, signed the synodal letter of the province of Lydia to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 378, where "Sena" is for Settenus; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 880.) [L. D.]

HERACLITAE (Pseudo-Hieron. Indic. de Haeres. cap. 24 in Oehler, Corp. Haeres. i. 293), heretics, properly Hiericitae. Catelius observes
HERACLITUS

HERACLITUS (1) (Ὑδακλείς, Euseb.; Ὡδακής, HERACLITUS Al. HERACLITUS, Jerom.), author of Comentarii in Apostolum, not extant, in the period of Commodus and Severus. (Euseb. H. E. v. 27; Jerom. de Vir. Ill. cap. 46; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 95; Cellier, i. 537.) [C. H.]

HERACLITUS (2), bishop of Tamiathis, present at the council of Ephesus, 431 (Mansi, iv. 1129). Le Quen (Or. Chr. ii. 589) doubts whether the city is to be identified with Damietta, and places it in the Heptanomus. In this uncertainty Gams puts the bishop of Tamiathis in both localities (S. Epc. 461). Both Le Quen and Gams write the bishop's name Heraclius. [C. H.]

HERACLITUS (3), bishop of Arca or Arca in Phoenicia, between Tripolis and Antioch. He is stated in some of the Latin codices to have been present at the fourth general council, A.D. 451, where Photius of Tyre signed in his name (Mansi, vii. 436; Le Quen, Or. Chr. i. 826). He also signed the synodical epistle of his province addressed to the emperor Leo, assenting to the decrees of Chalcedon, and describing the recent murder of Proterius. [J. de S.]

HERACLITUS. [ERACLITUS.]

HERACLITUS (1), bishop of Amastris on the coast of Paphlagonia, mentioned in the Menaeus as contemporary with the childhood of St. Hyacinth, c. A.D. 300. (Basil. Menal. Jul. 18; Le Quen, Or. Chr. i. 861.) [L. D.]

HERACLITUS (2), anti pope. [EUSEBIUS (1), p. 304.]

HERACLITUS (3), the first known bishop of Zela. He subscribed the canons of the councils of Ankyra and Neocesarea in 314. (Mansi, ii. 534, 548.) The subscriptions in Manzi represent the see as belonging to Armenia Major. Le Quen (Or. Chr. i. 541) places it in the ecclesiastical province of Helenopontus. The next known occupant of this see is Atticus. [F. A.]

HERACLITUS (4), bishop of Baris in Pisidia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 695; Le Quen, Or. Chr. i. 1049.) [L. D.]

HERACLITUS (5), fourth bishop of Troyes in the 4th cent. (Gall. Christ. xii. 484.) [R. T. S.]

HERACLITUS (6), bishop of Cidissus in Phrygia Pacatiana. His name was subscribed to the faith of Chalcedon in his absence by Nunechius of Laodicea, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quen, Or. Chr. i. 801.) [L. D.]

HERACLITUS (7), bishop of Azotus. He took part in the "Latriocium" at Ephesus, A.D. 449, but retracted at Chalcedon. (Mansi, vi. 850, 918; vii. 440; Le Quen, Or. Chr. iii. 661.) [J. de S.]

HERACLITUS, bishop of Tamiathis. [HERACLITUS (2).]

HERACLITUS (8), bishop of Comana, in the province of Armenia Secunda; present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. He subscribed the condemnation of Dionysus at the third session of the council (Hard. Concil. ii. 304 A), and the synodical letter of the council to Leo the Great (Leo Mag. Ep. 98, p. 1104; Oriens Christ. i. 443.) [C. T.]

HERACLITUS (9), fourteenth bishop of Sais, c. 496, was present at Rheims when Chas was baptized. He erected a convent for nuns (or, according to the Bollandists, a monastery for men) at Sais, and was there buried. His acts are lost, having been burnt. He was commemorated on June 8. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 78; Gallia Christ. xii. 5; Gams, S. Epc. 629.) [R. T. S.]

HERACLITUS (10) (ERACLITUS), bishop of Chalcedon in Bithynia c. A.D. 500, a strong opponent both of the Monophysites, and of the Manichees; fragments exist of his books against Soterichus of the Cappadocian Caesares, the friend of Gelasius of Antioch; Photius (Bib. Cod. 85, 251) high praises his works against the Manichees. (Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 602; Migne, Patr. Gr. cii.) [L. D.]

HERACLITUS (11), fifteenth archbishop of Paris, between Astdemus and Probaus. He was present at the first council of Orleans in 511, and is addressed, together with two other prelates, in a letter of St. Remigius, archbishop of Rheims (Migne, Patr. Lat. ixv. 996; cf. Cellier, xi. 80; Manzi, viii. 356; Gall. Christ. vii. 16.) [S. A. B.]

HERACLITUS (12), twelfth bishop of St. Paul de Trois-Chateaux, between Floriacus and Victor, was present at the council of Carpentras held in A.D. 527, the second of Orange and the third of Vaison in 529, and the fourth of Orleans in 541. It has been conjectured that the Heraclius, to whom Avitus, archbishop of Vienna, addressed his forty-seventh letter, was identical with this bishop. He praises him for his defence of the catholic faith before the Arian Gundobald, and prophecies his ascension to the episcopate. The answer of Heraclius is also in existence (Lubbe, Sac. Conc. viii. 708, 718, 728, ix. 120, Florence, 1739-98; Migne, Patr. Lat. ii. 924 n. 265; Cellier, x. 562; Gall. Christ. i. 707; Hist. Lit. de la Fr. iii. 187.) [S. A. B.]

HERACLITUS (13), 9th bishop of Saintes. When the bishops assembled at the council of Saintes deposed Emerius from that see, they put in his place Heraclius a priest of Bordeaux (562 or 563). But Emerius was immediately restored by Charibert, in defiance of the sentence of the council [EMERITES]. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 26; Gall. Christ. ii. 1057.) [S. A. B.]

HERACLITUS (14), 8th bishop of Digne, succeeding Hilarius, and followed by Agapius and Bebe, present at the fourth council of Paris, A.D. 573, the first of Magon about 581 and the second of Magon in 593 (Mansi, i. 998, 916, 997; Gall. Christ. iii. 1115.) [S. A. B.]

HERACLITUS (15) (ERACLITUS), eighth bishop of Angoulême, between Frontenius and Nicatius. He had been employed as ambassador by Childebert I., and was consecrated about 577. He suffered much from the persecution of Natusius, count of Angoulême, who accused him of harboring the murderers of his uncle Marcellinus, and took away by force from the church of Angoulême, the lands which his uncle had bequeathed to it. Heracleius died about A.D. 580. [Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 37; Gall. Christ. ii. 980.]
HERACLUS

[SA. B.]

HERACLUS (16), ST., eighth archbishop of Tarentaise, succeeding Martinus, and followed by Firminus or Firmius, towards the close of the sixth century. [Gall. Christ. xii. 703.]

[SA. B.]

HERACLUS (17), bishop of Samos at the Nicene council of 787; his name is found at the beginning of the seventh session. (Mansi, xiii. 373; Le Quien, Oeces. Christ. i. 931.) [L.D.]

HERACLUS (18), bishop of Junopolis (Abonotichus) on the coast of Phaphagonia, present at the Nicene council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 369; Le Quien, Oeces. Chr. i. 556.) [L.D.]

HERACLUS (19)—May 4. Martyr with Justus and Maurus at Fulginiun in Umbria. He was converted by Felicianus the apostle of Umbria in the 3rd century. He was arrested by the president Aurelius during the Decian persecution, and beheaded outside the city at the first milestone on the Roman road. [FELICIANUS (1).] (Ugell. Ital. Sacr. i. 688 B.; Acta SS. Bell. Mai. i. 452.) [G.T.S.]

HERACLUS (20)—March 9, martyr. [FORTY MARTYRS.]

HERACLUS (21), count mentioned by Athenasius as inciting the populace to persecute the Catholic congregations. (Athenas. Opp. i. 298; Baron. A. E. ann. 342, xia.) [C.H.]

HERACLUS (22), a native of Tyre, who had been priest of Hercules in that city. To avoid the charge of sorcery he fled to Cyzicus, where he preserved himself a convert and received baptism from the bishop Eleusius, by whom he was also admitted to the diocese without due investigation. When apprised of the charges against him, Eleusius refused to degrade and excommunicate him. This was made one of the grounds of Eleusius's deposition by the council at Constantinople, A.D. 360 (Socr. H. E. ii. 42; Soz. H. E. iv. 24). [E.V.]

HERACLUS (23), a deacon of Pannonia at the end of the 4th century, the bearer of letters to St. Jerome, then at Bethlehem. He was sent (A.D. 397) by Castrutius (q. v.), who had intended to go to Bethlehem, but through old age and blindness could get no further than Cissa; and also by his bishop, Amabilis, who after urging Jerome many times by letters to interpret for him the visions of Isaias, and receiving no reply, applied to him, in person, for a personal agency of Heraclius. Jerome replied to Castrutius (ep. 68, ed. Vall.), and also wrote the commentary, which, thirteen years afterwards, he incorporated as the fifth book in his Commentary on Isaias (Pref. to Comm. on Is. Jerome, vol. iv. 168, ed. Vall.). Heraclius seems to have endeared himself to Jerome, who exacted from him a promise to return, which he performed in the following year (398), when he brought with him the letter of Vitalis (q. v. ep. 72, ed. Vall.). [W. H. F.]

HERACLUS (24)—May 17. Martyr with Paulinus Aquilinus and two others at Nividunum or Novidunum (Nyons), on the Lake of Geneva. (Mort. Usuard.) [G.T.S.]

HERACLUS (25), a deacon of Theopolis (as Antioch was then called) representing Ephraim, his metropolitan at the council of Constantinople in 536 (Mansi, viii. 880, 920, 928, 938, 949, 977). [T. W. D.]

HERACLUS (26), emperor A.D. 610-641. He was son of an archax of Africa of the same name, who had distinguished himself in the wars against Persia under Maurice, A.D. 586 (Le Beau, x. 245), and to whom the inhabitants of Constantinople, oppressed by the tyranny of Phocas, emperor A.D. 602-610, appealed for deliverance. He was in turn probably a descendant of an Heraclius, a consul and native of Edessa, who had distinguished himself under the emperor Leo, and had been sent by him against the Vandals, A.D. 471 (Theoph. Chron. p. 181, ed. Bohn). The elder Heraclius handed over the conduct of the expedition which he fitted out in response to this invitation to his son, aided by his cousin Nicephorus. After a reign now so fruitful for the rise within sight of the imperial palace, and the execution of Phocas, Heraclius mounted the imperial throne and established a dynasty which arrested for a time the decay of the Roman empire, and survived directly throughout the 7th century, and indirectly through the iconoclastic emperors, for well-nigh two centuries. [LEO III.; IRENE; PHOCAS.] A man whose reign was so fruitful in practical results, being "one of the most remarkable epochs, both in the history of the empire and in the annals of mankind" (Finlay, Hist. of Greece, i. 313), is well worthy of careful attention. The history of his wars with the Persians and other barbarian nations will be found in detail in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, and in the authorities there quoted. Here we shall deal with his life solely in its religious aspects, referring the reader for fuller details to the article on MONOTHEISM, the origin of which is due to his efforts after ecclesiastical comprehension. Three points are specially worthy of notice under this head: (1) his attitude towards the Jews; (2) his celebrated Ethesia, which originated Monothelism, A.D. 638; (3) the policy which he pursued in the eastern provinces of Europe. (1) His attitude towards the Jews.—In the beginning of the 7th century the Jews had vastly increased in numbers and importance in Greece, Africa, Spain, Georgia, and Arabia. This increase of their numbers and wealth soon roused the bigotry and jealousy of the Christians, while the deplorable condition of the Roman empire, and of the Christian population in the East, inspired the Jews with expectations of re-establishing their national independence, under the long-expected Messiah (Milman, Lat. Christ. tom. ii. p. 183, ed. 1807; Finlay, L. c. p. 325). (GURAM.) This feeling had already found vent under Phocas in an active persecution of the Jews, but it was carried out more rigorously under Heraclius, who attempted, by enforcing compulsory baptism, to bring them over to the church.
[GEORGIUS (73).] Heracleius not only practised every cruelty to effect this object within the Roman empire, but also induced the Gothic sovereigns of Spain to second his exertions in this direction, though, to their credit be it said, even then some Christians were found enlightened enough to disapprove of such violent conversions. (Isidor. Hisp. Chron. Goth., where speaking of king Sisebut, with whom Heracleius concluded a treaty with such a provision, he says, "Aemulationem quidem Dei habitae sed non secundum scientiam. Potestas enim compellat quos provocare dei ratione oportuit"; cf. Neander, Th., ed. v. 203.) A prophecy, said to have been current about this time, which declared that the Roman empire would be overthrown by a circumcised people, may have helped to intensify the persecution.

(2) Heracleius's efforts after ecclesiastical comprehension found a vent in the celebrated Ἀθέσεως τῆς πίστεως, published towards the close of 633, and again, according to Clark's ed. v. 203. The history of this celebrated document will be further discussed and illustrated in the article MONOTHEISM. The causes which led up to its issue were briefly the following. Mono-physitism had broken up the unity of the empire. Egypt and Syria had been alienated from Constantinople by ecclesiastical disputes which Heracleius, in view of the attacks of the Persians on the one hand and of the Saracens on the other, strove to compose by an imperial edict. But instead of composing the dissensions, this edict served only to intensify fresh life into them. (See the articles CYRUS OF Alexandria, HONORIUS of Rome, SOPHONIUS of Jerusalem, SIGEOS of Constantinople, MAXIMUS Abbot, THEODORUS of Pharan, MONOTHEISM; Neander, H. E. v. 116, 239-254, ed. Bohn; Gieseler, H. E. ii. 172, ed. Clark; Ceillier, x. 760; Mansi, x. 992; Hefele, Concil. iv. 48, ed. Paris, 1870; Ersch und Gruber, Encyklop. lxxxiv. 160; Herzog, Real Encyklop. v.)

(3) The establishment of the people now constituting the principality of Servia, which has exerted such an important influence on Eastern Europe, is originally due to Heracleus. He formed a permanent barrier in Europe against the encroachments of the Avars and Slavonians. The imperial armies which, in the time of the emperor Maurice, had waged an active war in Illyricum and Thrace, and frequently invaded the territories of the Avars, had melted away during the reign of Phocas. The only feasible plan then was the establishment of powerful colonies of tribes hostile to the Avars and their Slavonian allies, in the deserted provinces of Dalmatia and Illyricum. To accomplish this object, Heracleus induced the Serbs or Western Slavonians, who occupied the country about the Carpathian mountains, and who had successfully opposed the extension of the Avar empire in that direction, to abandon their ancient seats, and move down to the south into the region of the Huns, that is to say, into the Adriatic. The Slavonian people of Illyricum and Dalmatia long regarded themselves as bound to pay a certain degree of territorial allegiance to the eastern empire (Constant. Porphyry. de Administ. Imp. cc. 31-36). A careful study of the original settlement under Heracleus would perhaps throw considerable light upon the long history of the eastern question, and even upon its present position (cf. Evagri. H. E. v. 1; Finlay's Hist. of Greece, ii. 331).

Among the other notable events of his reign was the capture of Jerusalem and of the supposed true cross by the Persians in the earlier years of his reign, and the great victory by Heracleus in 628, and its solemn restoration in 629. His latter days were rendered miserable by the invasions of the Saracens, combined as it would seem with most distressing neuralgia in the head, the result, perhaps, of consequent mental anxiety. The Arab historians tell us that in exchange for a splendid ransom which Heracleus sent in present to the Caliph Omar, he returned him a miraculous cap, which, so long as he wore it, gave him relief from his pain. On this they ground a tale of his conversion to the religion of Islam. The same writers represent him however as practically holding his throne by the pleasure of the caliph, which is clearly contrary to fact (Neale, Book of the Rise and Progress, i. 65; Finlay, Hist. of Greece, chronol. table prefixed to tom. i.).

Heracleius was twice married; first to Eudokia, daughter of Bogatus an African nobleman; secondly, to his niece Martina, a union which was looked upon as incestuous, and from which the patriarch Sergius in vain endeavored to dissuade him. (Theophan. Chronog. p. 459. ed. Bonn; Le Beau, Le Bas-Empire, tom. xi. c. 56, 57, 58, ed. Saint-Martin; Gibbon, cap. xlvii.; Du Cange, Fam. August. p. 100.)

HERACLONAS, emperor. [HERACLIDIANAE.]

HERAIS—June 28, martyr at Alexandria, a disciple in the school of Origen. While yct a catechumen she received, as Origen expressed it, "baptism by fire." (Chrys. H. E. vi. 4; Mart. Vet. Rom.; Mart. Usuard.) [Q. T. S.]

HERASMUS, martyr. [EMMANUEL (C.).]

HERASTUS, martyr at Philippi, commemorated on July 26; supposed to have been the Erastus of Acts xix. 22. (Usuard.) [C. H.]

HERBALDUS, bishop. [GAMALDULUS.]

HERBERT (HERBERET, HERBERT), a priest, and one of St. Cuthbert's oldest and most attached friends. He lived as a hermit on the beautiful isle on Derwentwater which bears his name. It was his custom to pay a yearly visit to Cuthbert, for his spiritual advice and help. They met together in Carlisle, Cuthbert's own city, in A.D. 686. "Ask me, brother Herbert," said the saint, "whatever thou art in need of, for after we have parted asunder we shall never in this world look into each other's face." The listener threw himself at Cuthbert's feet, and implored him with tears, in the Lord's name, to bear his faithful comrade in his mind, and to ask of God that they might serve Him at the same time in the same place, and cleave to each other. The saint sought the boon in prayer, and told his companion that it should be vouchsafed to him. They separated and died apart, but on the same day, the 20th of March, 686-7, Herbert suffering heavily from sickness before his end (Bell. H. E. iv. 29; Vita S. Cuth. c. 28; Anon. Vita S. Cuth. p. 280). "Those holy HERCULES, bishop of Narnia (Narni). A.D. 455-470. He was a son of his predecessor, Pancratius I., and brother of his successor, Pancratius II. The father and the two sons were buried in one tomb. (Ugelli, Ital. Socr. i. 1084; Cappelletti, Ital. Socr. iv. 544.) [R. S. G.]

HERCULANUS (HERCULLANUS, Ruinart, Acta Sanc. 596), soldier martyr at Antioch. [JOVIANUS.] [C. H.]

HERCULANUS, bishop of Perusia, martyr. [HERCULANUS (2).]

HERCULIUS (1), a person of rank, to whom Chrysostom wrote from Cucusus, expressing the confidence he felt in his deep affection which no silence could lessen, but entitling him to write often. (Chrys. Epist. 201.) [E. V.]

HERCULIUS (2), first recorded bishop of Otriculum (Oricia, Otricoli), present at the council of Rome under Felix, A.D. 487 (Manz. vii. 1171 p; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iv. 573, 579).

HERCUMBERTUS. [HERCUMBERTUS.] [C. H.]

HERDULF, bishop. [EARDULF (3).]

HEREBALD, a young scholar under the charge of St. John of Beverley, with whom he was a great favourite. On one occasion, when the master and his pupils were riding out, the young lads reached a level bit of ground, and got John's permission to run races. Herebald, however, was not to go with them. The youth, disappointed at being left behind, stole off, and was thrown violently from his horse, which stumbled at a stile. The lad's skull was fractured. A very interesting account is given of his curse, which is said to have been effected chiefly by John himself. In Herebald's great peril John rehabilitated him, having discovered by inquiry that the rite had been insufficiently administered at the first. Herebald recovered, and told the tale to Bede with his own lips, being at that time the abbot of a monastery at the mouth of the Tyne, the predecessor of the modern Tynemouth (Bede, H. E. v. 6; Folcard, Vita S. Joh. c. 8). According to Symeon of Durham, "Herebalb abbas" died in A.D. 745. (Chron. Regum, ed. Surtees Soc. 18.) [J. R.]

HEREBERHT, HEREBERHT, HEREBERT, priest and anchorite. [HERBERT.]

HEREBERGIS, HEREBURGIS, abbes. [HEREBURG.] [HEREBURG.]

HEREBERHT (1), a Kentish abbot, whose name is attached to a charter of Sigirael king of Kent, granted to Rochester in the time of archbishop Bregwin, 759-765. (Kemble, C. D. 114; Mon. Angl. i. 163.) [S.]

HEREBERHT (2), a priest of the diocese of Sidnaecaster, who attests the act of the synod of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haldan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

Nov. 26, we are told that Alexander suffered on Sept. 21, and that his relics were translated by pope Damasus on Nov. 26, which he ordained as his festival. [G. T. S.]

HERC, Welsh saint. [ENC.]

HERCAITH, disciple of St. Patrick. (Todd, S. Patrick, 510.) [J. G.]

HERCHERNRADUS. [ESCHERNRADUS.]

HERC-NASCA. [ENC (3).]

HERCONWALD (Kemble, Cod. Diploma. 994, A.D. 689), bishop. [ERKENWALD.] [C. H.]

HERCUANUS (2) I., bishop of Perusia (Perrugia) c. 290-310. Ugelli makes him to have been the first bishop, to have lived A.D. 57-90, and to have been put to death under Domitian, but this is in all probability erroneous. His life and actions have been much confused with those of Herculanus II., his successor in the see c. A.D. 534. (Ugelli, Ital. Socr. i. 70; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iv. 459.) [R. S. G.]

HERCUANUS (3), bishop of Brescia, c. 553. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 562; Acta SS. Boll. 12 Aug. ii. 731.) [A. H. D. A.]

HERCUANUS (4) II.—Nov. 7. Bishop of Perugia, where he was beheaded by the soldiers of Tottila. St. Gregory assures us that his body was found with his head joined to the body as perfectly as if no sword had ever touched it. (Murt. Rom. Vet., Adon, Usuard.; Sigebert. Gempl. Ann. 544, in Patr. Lat. clx. 105; Gregor. Dialog. lib. iii. cap. 13; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. i. 51, Jul. i. 33; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. Ben. secn. i. p. 109.) [G. T. S.]

HERCUANUS (6)—Sept. 27. A martyr at Rome mentioned in the acts of a certain bishop Alexander, whose see is unknown (Murt. Adon., Usuard.). In Mart. Rom. Vet., under date of HERECA, a West Saxon abbot, probably of Malmsbury. He is mentioned in a letter written by an unnamed monk to Lullus of Mainz (Mon. Mogunt. ed. Jaëf, pp. 289, 300), in which the writer reminds the bishop of their ancient friendship in the town of Malmsbury under abbot Eaba. The writer, who is probably Hereca himself or his secretary, sends to Lullus the kind remembrances of the convent over which he presides, and Hereca places his sign at the close of the letter. It is not quite clear from this over what monastery Hereca ruled, and the name does not occur in William of Malmesbury's list of the abbots of that abbey. Hereca appears as a witness to two charters which have some claim to authenticity; one in which Ethelbald of Mercia grants lands to abbay Eanberht (Kemble, C. D. 100), and another in which Cynewulf of Wessex grants lands to Malmsbury (K. C. D. 103). In both these Hereca is associated with West Saxon bishops, and the date of both is 758 or thereabout. [S.]

HEREDNAT, Irish saint. [EREÑAT.]

HEREFERTHIUS (Wend. Flor. Hist. ann. 712, ed. Coxo), bishop of Worcester between Tilhere and "Deberty." He is therefore the same as Heathore. [C. H.]

HEREFRITH (1), the familiar priest and friend of St. Cuthbert, to whom we are indebted for many valuable reminiscences of his life. He gave Bede an account of Cuthbert's serious bodily infirmity after he was attacked by the plague in A.D. 661 (Bede, V. S. Cuth. c. 8). In A.D. 686-7, when Cuthbert died on Farne Island, Herefrith was abbatt of Lindisfarne, and had the privilege of attending his master in his last illness, hearing his last request and command, closing his eyes, and afterwards interring his remains. He gave to Bede a description of the scene, which for pathos and simple beauty cannot be surpassed. (Ld. cc. 37-40; Symeon, Hist. Ecol. Dun. 57.) When Bede wrote the Life of Cuthbert, the MS. was frequently submitted to Herefrith's critical eye when he visited the historian at Jarrow. (Preface to Life of Cuthbert.) He is there styled Herefrith the priest, having probably resigned his office of abbott, and sought, after his old master's fashion, a more ascetic life. The name of "Herefrith presbyter" occurs in the Liber Vitæ at Durham among the abbots of the priestly grade (p. 6). There is a letter from Boniface to Herefrith presbyter, but he can scarcely be identified with Cuthbert's friend. Boniface died in A.D. 754. [J. R.]

HEREFRITH (2), a priest to whom St. Boniface wrote, about the year 746, requesting him to urge Ethelbald of Mercia to comply with the advice given him to reform. (Monum. Mogunt. ed. Jaëf, p. 177; Haddan and Stubbe, iii. 357, 358.) He can scarcely be identified with the abbott of Lindisfarne, but may be the person whose death is recorded under 747 by the continuator of Bede as "Herefrith the man of God." (M. H. B. 288.) [S.]

HEREMIUS (EREHNUS), bishop of Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedon, present at the council of Ariminum, A.D. 359, after which he was banished and most cruelly treated in order to make him renounce communion with Athanasius. (Athen. Apol. od Const. 827, p. 247; Migne, Pat. Gr. xxv. 630 b; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 29.) [L. H.]

HEREMOD, a Kentish priest, who attests an act of archbishop Wulfred, dated April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

HERENA, Mart. Cæth. A.D. 250. (See ARISTO.) [E. W. B.]

HERENAT, virgin. [EREÑAT.]

HERENNUS (2), the 7th recorded bishop of Portus Romanus, next to Glycerius and preceding Castus. He occurs among the bishops present at the third council of Rome held by bishop Felix III. A.D. 487. (Mansi, Cons. vii. 1171; Ugellh, Ital. Sacr. i. 111.) [C. H.]

HERENNUS, bishop of Jerusalem. [ANTEIUS, EREHNUIUS.]

HERENUS, Mart. Cæth. A.D. 250. (See ARISTO.) [E. W. B.]

HEREFRIK, son of Edfrith, and a nephew of Edwin, king of Northumbria, who was baptized with him by Paulinus on York on Easter Sunday, A.D. 627. He continued a Christian, and was the father of Hilda, abbess of Whitby, and of the abbess Hesiread. He was poisoned whilst in exile under Ceolwulf, a British king. His wife's name was Bregusuid (Bede, H. E. iv. 26). [J. K.]

HERESIOLOGY. For a defintion of heresy, as the term was understood in the early church, the reader is referred to the article HERESY in the Dict. of Christ. Antiq. We shall here limit ourselves to some brief notice of those writers who have treated the subject of heresies generally; referring for fuller information to the articles under their several names. The earliest known heresiologist is JUSTIN MARTYR (c. 103-166), in his Σταυρομαχία κατά τῶν γεγονόσιν ἀληθείας, of which we know nothing but the title and the fact that it was written before the author's first Apology (Apol. i. 26). The earliest enumeration of heresies and heretics is one that occurs in a fragment of the Πρώτος βιογραφίας ἤρωων τῆς εἰρηνικῆς (c. 129-185), preserved in Eusebius, and it men-the works of Clement of Alexandria had appeared, whose Protrepticos and Summaries from Theodotus, if indeed this last is the same (c. 216), have greatly added to our knowledge of the earlier heresies. To Clement also we are indebted for several fragments of the earlier heretical writings: e.g., those of Basilides (Str. iv. 12), Cassianus (Str. i. 21, iii. 13), Epiphanes (Str. iii. 2), Heracleon (Str. iv. 9), Isidorus (Str. ii. 20, iii. 1, vi. 6), Tattian (Str. iii. 12), and Valentinus (Str. ii. 8, 20, iii. 7, iv. 12).

Towards the commencement of the 3rd century Hippolytus Romanus published his Treatise (ὁ Ἐλγύς) against all Heresies (Hipp. Refut. Omn. Haer. ed. Duncker, 1859). Some time previously he had published a shorter Treatise (σρωτγα) against the Thirty-two Heresies, commencing with the Mithraeans and ending with Noetus and the Noetians (Phot. Biblioth. cxxx.). The Σρωτγα is unhappily lost; but Hippolytus endeavoured to restore it by means of the use made of it by Epiphanius and Philastrius (Quellenkritik der Epiphanius). The ὁ Ἐλγύς is a much more extensive work and contains numerous quotations from Irenaeus, as well as several fragments of heretical writings, e.g., Echesaites, Nasses, Peratic, and Sethian, and besides those of Basilides and Valentinus, fragments also of the works of Justinus, Marcus, Monomithus, and Saturninus. The first heresy treated of by Hippolytus in his surviving work is that of the Arians, and the last that of the Elchasaites. There are also ascribed to him special treatises on the heresy of Noetus and on that of Beron and Helix.

In the last quarter of the 4th century Epiphanius published two works on the subject of heresies, the Akhpopahds and the Pasphov. The heresies of the first are treated of in the same as the latter, but the Pasphov is much the fuller and the more complete. It commences with twenty heresies which existed in the time of our Lord. Then follow sixty heresies which had arisen since the time of our Lord, among which are the Cebonians and the Gnostics of Hegesippus. The first mentioned are then the last; and the last the Marcionian. Epiphanius also made use of Irenaeus, from whom he quotes largely. Each section of the Pasphov has a summary prefixed. These summaries appear to have been early collected and circulated as a separate work. A considerable fragment of another epistle has recently been brought to light, and is published by Dindorf in his edition of Epiphanius. It contains the sixty-four heresies mentioned heresies of the Pasphov, and ends with the Marcelli.

About the same date, Philastrius bishop of Brixia (A.D. 378–387), published his Liber de Haeresibus. The first twenty-eight chapters are occupied with pre-Christian heresies, commencing with the Ophites, and ending with the Herodian. Philastrius assigns the Caunian (c. 2), the Sethians (c. 3), and the Nazarens (c. 8) to this class. He also speaks of Basilides as "Judaeus generis" (c. 4). In the remainder of his work, c. 29–156 (ed. Ohler, al. 150), he treats of the heresies which had arisen since the time of our Lord. A number of the heresies in both classes are not named, so that many of his chapters treat only of heretical opinions, and among those which he has named are several which do not occur in his great contemporary, who also supplies several which are frequently of some historical and dogmatic interest. The edition of Philastrius published in the Patrologia is enriched with very valuable notes. That of Ohler, in his Corpus Haeresiologicum, has critical notes, and also the learned commentaries of J. A. Fabricius.

In 397, Jerome, writing to Magnus, a Roman orate, enumerates some forty-four writers, the greater number of whom had written against one or more of the heresies of their times. The earliest named is Cyprian, and the latest his own contemporary, Amphilocius of Iconium.

Some years later Augustine published his De Haeresibus Liber, limited to heresies that had arisen in Christian times. He notices eighty-eight, the first being the Simonians and the last the Pelagians. Among them are ten to which he assigns no name, nine of these being also unnamed in Philastrius, and the tenth, number 68, named by Philastrius as that of the Excalceati. The Luciferians (clxxxi.), for whose omission by Epiphanius and Philastrius he accounts by the supposition that they believed them to be schismatic only and not heretics, the HERESIOLOGY

Jovianists, the Arabic, the Hebridiani, whom he supposes to be the Antidicomarianists of Epiphanius, the Paterniani, the Tertullianiists, the Abeloni, and, as might be expected, the Pelagianists, Nesterians for the first time. His Friscoliastae are the unnamed heretics of Philastrius, number 84. At the close of the Liber, Augustine tells his friend he has heard that Jerome has written on heresies, but he knows from whence to procure the book.

The Τριγόνος τοῦ Ἰς of Josephus is placed about this time by Cave and Galland. Fabricius places the 10th and 11th books beyond our limits; but on the hypothesis of the earlier date we proceed to remark that four chapters of this work are devoted to the subject of heresies: one of which is entitled Πάσα αἱ ἀριστεία κατὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίαστατίκης πίστεως ἑνανκενήτων. In this Josephus gives brief notices of sixty-two heresies, which he enumerates in a different order from his predecessors, and mentions some by names that do not occur elsewhere: e.g. Berylliani and Marianites. The first is that of the Herodiani, which Epiphanius notices among those of the Jews, the second that of the Theodiani, which Josephus says arose in Egypt, and the last that of the "Anthropomorphita, which arose in the region of Eleutheropolis," (Socrates, H. E. vi. 7; Sozomen. H. E. vii. 11; Cyril. Alex. adv. Anthropomorph. Migne, Patr. Gr. Ixxi. 1068). Josephus explains the origin of the name Erebion as πτωχοί ἐρημωμέναι διὰ τὸ περί τῆς πίστεως των ἐρημώτων, and makes the Nazoreiæ to be an Ebonite sect. In noticing the heresy of Origen of Alexandria, he says that that teacher "brought thirty heresies into the church."

MARIUS MERCATOR (A.D. 418-450), published his Commentarium de Caesario Imperatori oblatum, his Liber Substitutionum in corba Juliani, and his collections relating to the Nestorian controversy, which, with the admirable Dissertations of Garnier in the edition of these treatises reprinted in the Patrologia, leave little to be desired on the subject of the two great heresies which arose in the first half of the 5th century.

Towards the commencement of the second half of the 5th century, THEODORET bishop of Cyrus published his Liber omnium Nesticorum et Eutychianorum, which is not only valuable for these particular heresies, but also for the information which it contains as to the numerous sects to which they gave rise. In the first chapter he enumerates the authorities upon which he relies. The Ecclesiastis Historia to which he refers is the Historia Tripartita compiled at the request of Cassiodorus (Hist. Trip. prael., Patr. Ixx. 879). Liberatus also made use of the Breveolis Historiarum Eutychianistorum, c. A.D. 484, which is ascribed to Gelasius III., bishop of Rome A.D. 492-494 (Labbe et Cossart, iv. 1079).

Somehow about A.D. 500, GENNADIS, a presbyter of Mediolani, published a continuation of the De Viris Illustribus of Jerome, at the end of which he says he has written eight books against all heresies, six against Nestorians, three against Pelagians, and that he has sent Gelasius bishop of Rome an epistle concerning his faith. The epistle still survives under the title of Liber de Ecclesiastis Doctrinibus, and may not be overlooked in this article, as it covers the whole field of heresy from the commencement of the Christian era down to the time at which it was written. Oehler has republished it with the valuable notes of Geeverhart Elmenhorst (u. s. i. 336-400).

About the same time appeared the Origines et Etnymologiae of Iordanis bishop of Seville a.D. 599-636. Two chapters of the eighth book are devoted to the subject of heresies, the one entitled, De Haeresibus Judorcrum, which it treats of in ten sections, and the other De Haeresibus Christianorum, in seventy-one sections. This last is copied by Gratian, in his Concordia Discordantium Canonom (c. xxiv. q. iii. c. 39). It is mainly an abridgment of Augustine de Haeresibus, with the addition of Nectarios, Eutychians, Aaphalii, Theodosiani and Gaianitae, and Agnoitae and Trithitae.

About the year 600, Leontius, a scholar of Byzantium, compiled his Σχολα ἀπὸ φωνῆς Θεοδοροῦ τοῦ Θεοφιλοστάτου Ἀββᾶ, more generally known by the title of De Sectis (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. viii. 310). The work is divided into ten books, of which the last two, Leontius treats of the heresy of the Gaianites. It is especially valuable for the history and doctrines of the numerous sects which arose after the council of Chaledon, a.D. 451. On some of these still further light is shed by his Κατά Νεωτομάριαν καὶ Εὐτύχιανων καὶ Κατὰ ἄραρτοτοκίων.

During the first quarter of the 7th century, Timotheus, a presbyter of the great church of Constantinople, published his important work entitled, Περὶ τῶν προσεχρηστῶν τῆς ἁγίας ἐκκλησίας, which is generally quoted as De recipienda haeretica. As the title suggests, it is a manual of ecclesiastical discipline with regard to heretics, and accordingly treats of three classes of them, such as need baptism, such as only need the chiasm, and such as need neither. Of those who belong to the first class, the first mentioned are the Tascodrugi, and the last the followers of Pelagius and Coelestius, to whom he adds the Melchisedeciani, who, in his day, were known as Ἀθμιγαζου. The first mentioned in the second class are Tessaerescaecatitae, and the last the Apollinaristae; the first mentioned in the third class are the Melitiani, and the last the Eutychianistae. On this follows a tract entitled, Περὶ τῶν αὐτοχριστῶν, an exposition of the doctrine of the Apostles, a treatise on the Marcianists, in which by whom he means the Messalitani, and another on the twelve sects of the Διακρινόμενα, those who withheld subscription to the council of Chaledon, a.D. 451. This last is especially valuable as a guide to unravel what otherwise might well appear to be an almost hopeless complication. (Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvi. pt. i. 54 et seq.)

About the same time also Antioccius, a monk of the monastery of St. Saba, published his Ομολογία, in one of which, No. 139, he gives a long list of the heretics and heresies which had arisen up to his time. The first sixty-one are taken from Epiphanius, then follow Evagrius and Didymus, Origenistae, Theodorus of Mopsuestia, Didymus, Nectarius, Marsæ the Persian, Dioscorus, Theodosius, Gaius, Timotheus Alerius, Petrus Fullo, Petrus Mongus, Soterichus, Severus, Philoxenus Hieropolitanus, Jacobus Syrus, and Julianus of Halicarnassus, of all of whom he says οὐ διώκω τοῖς Χριστιανοῖς καλεῖντα. The homily is addressed to Eustathius, abbot of the monastery of Atalina or Ancyra in Galatia.

Somewhat later, c. 636, Sophronius bishop of Jerusalem, issued a synodal letter, which was read at the council of Constantinope, a.D. 680 (actio xi. Mansi, xi. 462 ; Photius, Bibl. cod. 231). This merely names some hundred and twenty heresiarchs, beginning with Simon Magnus and ending with Menas the Gauinite bishop of Alexandria, and thirty-three heresies, beginning with the Nicolaitae and ending with the Trithiteae. Among the heresies named are several which are not mentioned elsewhere, and some of the designations given to heresies are given only there. Catelerius, in the notes to his Monumenta Ecclesiae Graecae (i. 790), published another paragraph of this letter, which mentions eleven other heresies after Menas; Cyrus of Alexandria, Theodorus of Pharan, Sergius of Constantineopol, and Honorius bishop of Rome, leaders of the heretics of whom are anathematized accordingly; Pyrrhus, Paulus, Petrus of Constantineopol, Macarius of Antioc, and his master Stephanus, Polychronius, of whom Sophronius speaks as then living at Alexandria, and Harmasius. The Harmasii [Harmasius] also appear in the σχῆμα on the Ὀθόγοι of Anastasius. Fabricius and Hardouin question the authenticity of this paragraph; Le Quien, however, accepts it as genuine. (Io. Damasc. Op. Migne, Patrol. Gr. xct. 129.)

Theodorus, a monk of the monastery of Rhaithu in Palestine, also belongs to the middle of the 7th century. His work, commonly known as De Incororatione, is of some value for heretical Christology. The first heresy of which it treats is that of Menas, and the last of Julianus of Halicarnassus. The Indeicillus de Haeresibus, first published by Menard, a.D. 1617, and ascribed by him to Jerome, is a work of certainly not earlier than towards the latter half of the 7th century, as the writer clearly made use of Isidore, e.g. his article "Hemerobaptista" is taken verbatim from the Etnymologiae. Many passages are taken from the De Virtus Lusit. of Jerome. The latest heresies which the author mentions are the Agnoitae and the Trithiteae (Oehler, u. s. i. xii. 283-400).

The 'Oθόγοι, otherwise called Vice Deus adversus Apehala, of Anastasius, a monk of Sinai, bears internal evidence of belonging to the same period. It is chiefly valuable for the materials which it furnishes for the history of the Monophysites.

Germanius, patriarch of Constantinopol, a.D. 715-730, in his Narratio de Synodis, devotes the first thirty sections to an account of the heresies which had arisen before the council of Chaledon, 451, and of the writers by whom they were severely opposed. Then follow twenty sections which more fully notice the Monophysites, the Monothelites, the Iconoclasts, and the Maronite controversies. These last especially are of great interest and value. The work appeared first in Mai's Spicilegum Romanum, and afterwards in Migne's Patrologia Graeca, t. xlviii.

The latest heresiologist of the period to which this article is limited is Ioannes Damascenus, whose Περὶ αὐτοσεϊν ἐν συνώσει theon ἐγεραυο monastic life, was desirous of going to Gaul, where her sister Hereswita, the mother of King Aldulf, in the monastery of Chelles near Paris was "expecting her crown." This language seems to imply that Aldulf was rigorously devoted to Hereswita near the end of her life, but the chronology shows that it was before she became a queen and a widow. Bede in referring to Aldulf as king must have been assuring his anticipated.

[C. H.]

HERESWYTHA, a Kentish abbess between A.D. 696 and 716, whose name is attached to the privilege of Wiltred. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 240.)

[C. H.]

HEREWALD (HEORDWALD, HEREWARD) the third bishop of Sherborne (M. H. B. 620). He succeeded bishop Forthere when the latter went to Rome in 737, having been consecrated by archbishop Nofhelm before Forthere's departure, if the charter in (K. C. D. 82), which the attestations of the two bishops appear, be genuine. Any how he was consecrated by Nofhelm in or about 736 (Sim., M. H. B. 629). He succeeded the council held by archbishop Cuthbert at Clovesho in 747 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360, 362). In charters his name occurs with that of Forthere in 738, at a synod held by Nofhelm (Kemble, C. D. 82; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 337, 338), in a grant of Hilla in 744 to Glastonbury, where his confirmation is specially mentioned (D. 92; Mon. Angl. i. 47); in another Glastonbury charter of the same date, granted by Cuthred (K. C. D. 93); in the grant of Ethelbald to Eambridge, attested by Cynewulf and the West Saxon Witun, 755 to 757 (K. C. D. 100); in the grant of Cynewulf to Malmesbury in 758 (K. C. D. 103); in the charter of Tisbury of 759 (ib. 104); and for the last time in the charter of Cynewulf to Wells, dated 766 (K. C. D. 116, Mon. Angl. ii. 295). After this date West Saxon charters are rare, and as Ethelred appears as bishop in 774, Herewald's death must be fixed between that year and 766.

[S.]

HEREWARD, the name of a bishop attached to a doubtful charter of a king Cyneulf, whom Kemble (C. D. 193) wrongly identifies with Kenulf of Mercia, dated 808. The charter really belongs to the year 758 and to Cynewulf of Wessex, and Hereward is identical with Hereward bishop of Sherborne.

[S.]

HERGUST, a bishop of the Scottish Picts (Ware, JR. Hist. c. 4), but in reality Fergusius. [FERGUSTUS.]

[3. G.]

HERIBURG (HERBURGES, HERBURGO), the abbess of a Yorkshire nunnery called Vedatun (Watten, E. R. Y.). When John was bishop of York (A.D. 705-15) he cured one of her nuns, and gave Heriburg some useful advice about surgery. The story is in Bede, H. E. v. 3; and in Felcand's Life of St. John, of Beverley, § 12.

[J. R.]

HERICERUS, reputed eleventh bishop of Mainz before the 4th century; ruled for eight years, and was martyred. (Gal. Christ. v. 134 Pothstatus, Bibl. Suppl. p. 353.) [R. T. S.]

HERIMBERTUS. [HERIMBERTUS.]
HERLUNDIS (HARLINDIS), ST., abbas of Eike, near Massacum, in Belgium, together with her sister St. Renildis or Reinius, about the middle of the 8th century. They were the daughters of pious and wealthy parents, Adalhardus and Guinmarus, and were variously brought up in the monastery of Valenciennes. Their parents having built the monastery of Eike near the river Mos (Meuse), died and were buried there, leaving their property, including Eike, to Herlindis and Reinius. The sisters were now consecrated abbesses by the bishops Willibrordus and Bonifacius, and took twelve other virgins into their convent, where they passed their time in good works. Herlindis is said to have written out and illuminated the four gospels and a psalter. She died on Oct. 12, her sister surviving many years; both are commemorated on March 22. (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 385; Mabill. Acta SS. Octob. sac. iii. l. 607.)

T. W. D.

HERLINGUS, twenty-first bishop of Meaux, succeeding St. Hildevertus and followed by St. Paternus, towards the close of the 7th century. He may be identical with a Herlingus episcopus, who subscribed a charter of Agilbertus of Meaux for the monastery of St. Mary, in the eleventh year of Theodoric's reign. (Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxxvii. 1241 n.; Gall. Christ. viii. 1601.)

[S. A. B.]

HERMAEI (Epaenaeus). A Valentinian sect, called from their leader HERMAEUS, and said to have borne anything but a good character (Timoth. Presb. de Recipiendi. Lactert.; Migne, Patr. Gr. ixxxvi. 17). According to Nice they were also called Basilidae (Ex Niceonis Pundecte, lib. 70).

T. W. D.

HERMAEON (1), bishop of Saia (Saú) on the Nile Delta; mentioned in the Brevarium of Melitius as one of the bishops consecrated by him. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arianos, Patrol. Graec. xxv. 376; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 519.)

[J. de S.]

HERMAEON (2), bishop of Cynopogeton Inferior (or Cynum), in the Egyptian Delta. He is mentioned in the Brevarium of Melitius as one of the bishops consecrated by him prior to the council of Nicaea. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arianos, Patrol. Graec. xxv. 376; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 567.)

[J. de S.]

HERMAEUS, bishop of Balbara, in the ecclesiastical province of Lycia, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 987; Mansi, iii. 571.)

[L. D.]

HERMAGORAS—July 12. Reputed to have been a martyr at Aquileia under Nero. He is said to have been appointed bishop of that see by St. Mark the Evangelist, and to have suffered death with Fortunatus, his archdeacon. [FORTUNATUS.] The reputed acts of the martyr are worthless. Attributing to such an early age the ecclesiastical ideas and arrangements of later times, they demonstrate their own falsity. They profess to have been written by a certain Gregory, out of whom Hermagoras cast a devil. (Mart. Vot. Rom., Adon., Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

HERMAannon, a bishop of some part of Egypt. Letters to him "and the brethren in Egypt" from Dionysius of Alexandria, are mentioned or quoted in Eusebius, vii. 1, 10, 23. They treat of the affairs of the emperors Gallus, Valerian, and Gallienus. (Tillemont, iv. pp. 276, 277.)

[J. W. S.]

HERMANFROIZ (Chron. S. Denys. v. 24 in Bouquet, iii. 306 d). [EREMENFRIDUS (2).]

[C. H.]

HERMANNUS (HERMANES, HERMANUS, HERHANNEUS) said by Dempster (Hist. Ecc. Gent. Scot. ii. 351) to have been one of the presbyters addressed by pope John [ERAN (8)]. There is ascribed to him an Epistola ad Hilarionum de Pelagiana haeresi (Tanner, Bibl. 398; Spotswood, Hist. Ch. Scot. 13; Sp. Forbes, Ital. Scot. Saints, 196, April 2).

[J. G.]

HERMAS (1), bishop of Philippopolis in Thrace, reputed to have been the Hermas mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 14. (See Basili. Menolog. Nov. 4.)

[J. de S.]

HERMAS (3). In the latter half of the 2nd century there was in circulation a book of visions and allegories, purporting to be written by one Hermas, and which was commonly known as The Shepherd. This book was treated with respect bordering on that paid to the canonical Scriptures of the New Testament, and came into the public reading of different churches. A passage from it is quoted by Ireneus (iv. 20, p. 253) with the words, "Well said the Scripture," a fact taken notice of by Eusebius (H. E. v. 8). We may with probability infer that in the time of Ireneus the work was publicly read in the Gallican churches, for if Ireneus were not quoting a well-known text, he would be likely to have named the source of his quotation; but that he did not place the book on a level with the canonical Scriptures may be inferred from his having quoted it but once, not appealing to it in his discussion of Scripture testimonies in his third book. The multifaceted tomemementon of the Stromaticis of Clement of Alexandria opens in the middle of a quotation from The Shepherd, and about ten times elsewhere he cites the book, always with a complete acceptance of the reality and divine character of the revelations made to Hermas, but without any explanation of his opinion who Hermas was or when he lived. In the next generation Origen, who frequently cites the book, says (in Rom. xvi. 14, vol. iv. p. 663) that it seems to him very useful, and he gives it as his iadi-vidual opinion that it was divinely inspired. He further makes a guess, which was repeated by others after him, but which appears to rest on no earlier authority, that it was written by the Hermeneutics that he was a disciple of the Romans. His other quotations show that less favourable views of the book were current in his time. His quotations from The Shepherd are carefully separated from those from the canonical books; he generally adds to a quotation from The Shepherd a saving clause, giving the reader permission to reject it; he speaks of its use in the church, writing: "The teaching of the apostles," as not canonical, but useful to be employed in catechetical instruction. The Shepherd is found in the Sinaitic MS following the Epistle of Barnabas, as an appendix to the books of the New Testament. After the 4th century the book rapidly passed out of ecclesiastical use in the East.
HERMAS

HERMAS 913

The Western writer to whom the book deserves more attention, as internal evidence shows Rome to have been its place of composition. Foremost comes the writer of the Muratorian Fragment on the canon, who tells us that the book had been written during the episcopate of Pius by Hermas, a brother of that bishop, a period which the writer speaks of as within then living memory. He concludes that the book ought to be read, but not to be publicly used in the church among the prophetic writings, the number of which was complete, nor among the apostolic. The statement that the book not only might but ought to be read is a high recognition of the value attributed to it by the writer, and we may gather that at least in some places the church use of the book at the time had been such as to cause danger of its being set on a level with the canonical Scriptures. Tertullian, in one of his earliest treatises, De Oratione, disputes against a practice of sitting down immediately after prayer, for which he knows no other reason assigned than that in The Shepherd Hermas is said, on prayer ended, to have sat upon the bed. He points out the unreasonable- ness of converting a narrative statement into a rule of discipline, and remarks that, if it were so regarded, the precept of sitting on a bed would not be satisfied by sitting on a bench or chair. A book which could so influence the prac- tice of churches must evidently have enjoyed high authority at the time, an authority which Tertullian's argument does not dispute. It had probably been translated into Latin, and was used in church reading. That Tertullian read it in a Latin translation may be inferred from his describing it by the Latin title Pastor, and not by a Greek title, as he usually does when he refers to Greek writings. Very different is Tertullian's treatment of the book some ten years later in his Epistle to the Hermeneutics. Montanius. When the authority of The Shepherd is urged in behalf of readmitting adherents to communion, he rejects the book as not one of the works of being included in the canon, but placed by every council of the churches, even of the Catholic party, among false and apocryphal writings (De Pudic. cap. 10). Quoting the Ephesus, he says that this is at least more received than that apocryphal Shepherd of the adulterers (cap. 20). The phrase "more received" warns us to take cum grano Tertullian's assertion as to the universal rejection of The Shepherd; but we may well believe that the line of distinction between apostolic and later writings was then being drawn more sharply than it had been before, and that in the interval between Tertullian's two writings The Shepherd was excluded from the public reading of many churches which before had admitted it. Possibly to this result may have contributed the publication by the Muratorian writer of the strongest testimony in which he included Hermas from apostolic times. The statement of this writer is repeated in an entry in the Liberian papal catalogue, that under the episco- pate of Pius his brother Hermas wrote a book in which the commands and precepts were contained which the angel gave him when he came to him in the habit of a shepherd. It has been thought, with high probability, that this entry was derived from the catalogue of Hippolytus, which is the basis of the Liberian catalogue. [CHRONICON CANDIANUM.] It will be observed that, while refusing to assign the book to apostolic times, it makes no doubt of the reality of the angelic appearance to Hermas. Later biographical notices of papa undertake to tell what the message given to Hermas was, namely, that Easter should always be observed on a Sunday. This notice clearly is the offspring of a time when all knowledge of the book of Hermas had been lost, and when it was attempted to supply by invention the imperfection of the earlier entry. This story of a revelation to Hermas about Easter celebration is amplified a little in the forged decreal letter of Pius I (Mansi, Concil. i. 872). The later papal catalogues make Pius the brother of Pastor, and another spurious letter of Pius tells of a contemporary presbyter Pastor. The poem of the Pseudo-Tertullian against Marcion had described the brother of Pius as "angeli- cus Pastor." A confusion between the name of Hermas and that of his book would imply that the book was not at the time in use. Jerome, when copying what Eusebius had said about the book (De Vir. Illust. v. 10, vol. ii. p. 843) adds that among the Latinos it was almost unknown. He himself speaks contemptuously of it (in Hieroc. i. 14, vol. vi. p. 604), for it seems to us certain that the book of Hermas is what he here refers to. It is marked in the Gelasian decree as apocryphal. Notwithstanding, there are several traces that some use of the book con- tinued in the West, one decisive fact being that there still exist some twenty MSS. of the Latin version. In the African church of the 4th century we find from the list in the Codex Claromontanus (Westcott, Canon N. T. p. 537) that it was placed with the Acts of Paul and the Revelation of St. Peter as an appendix to the New Testament books; and it occupies a similar place in the Sinaitic MS., the only Greek Bible known to have contained it. But in some of the existing Latin MSS. it is placed with the apocryphal books of the Old Testament, a position no doubt assigned to it in conformity with the opinion of Athanasius already quoted, which was known through Rufinus in the West.

CHRIST. NOGIM.—VOL. 11.

Turning now from the external history of the book to the book itself, we find it divides itself into three parts. The first part consists of visions. It opens with what reads like the narration of a real dream. Hermas tells that he who had brought him up had sold him to Rome to a lady named Rhoda, that after a considerable time he renewed his acquaintance with her and began to love her as a sister; that she saw her one day bathing in the Tiber and assisted her out of the water; that admiring her beauty he thought within himself how happy he should be if he had a wife like her in person and disposition. Further than this his thought did not go. But a little time after he had a vision. He fell asleep, and in his dream he was walking and struggling in ground so rugged and broken that it was impossible to pass. At length he succeeded in crossing the water by which his path had been washed away, and coming into smooth ground knelt to confess his sins to God. Then the heavens were opened, and he saw Rhoda saluting him from the sky. On his asking her what she did there, she told him that she had been taken up to accuse him, because God was angry with him for having sinned in thought against her. Then Hermas was overwhelmed with horror and fear, not knowing how he could abide the severity of God’s judgment, if such a thought as his was marked as sin. Rhoda now passes out of his dream, and he sees a venerable aged lady clad in shite garments sitting in a folding chair and holding a book in her hand. She asks him why he, usually so cheerful, is now so sad. On telling her, she owns what a sin any impure thought would be in one so chaste, so singleminded and so innocent as he; but she tells him that this is not why God is displeased with him, but because of the sins of his children, whom he, through false indulgence, had allowed to corrupt themselves. At this point the vision was open if he would warn them. Then she reads to him out of her book, but of all she reads he can remember nothing save the last sentence, save that this alone was comforting, and all which preceded was terrible and threatening. She parted from him with the words, “Play the man, Hermas.” After reading of the admiration of Hermas for Rhoda, one discovers with interest that in his time he is an elderly man with a grown-up family, and that his former mistress Rhoda must have been at least as old as himself. If the tale is an invented one, this is certainly an incongruity; but if it be a true story, it is quite conceivable that the thought may have occurred to Hermas, who seems to have been not happy in his family relations, how much happier it would have been for him if Rhoda had been his wife; and that afterwards, in a dream, this thought may have recurred to his memory as a sin to be repented of. To us, the vision, as he tells it, presents all the characteristics of a real dream; the want of logical connexion between the parts, the changes of scene, the fading out of Rhoda as principal figure and the appearance of the aged lady in her room, and in like manner the substitution of quite a different offence for the sinful thought which weighed on his conscience at the beginning; the physical distress in his dream of being first presenting the idea of walking on and on without being able to find an outlet, afterwards of mental grief at words spoken to him; the long reading which leaves no trace on the memory save of the words spoken immediately before awaking—all these marks indicate that we are reading not a literary invention like the dream of Pilgrim’s Progress, but a dream of a little dressed up it may be, of a dream which the narrator really had had. In another vision, a year after, he saw again the lady and her book, and received the book to copy, but still it conveyed no idea to his mind. Then he set himself by fasting and prayer to learn the meaning of it, and after about a fortnight was gratified. He learns, too, that the lady whom he had seen is not, as he had imagined, the sibyl, but the church, and that she appeared as old because she was created first of all, and for her sake the world was made. On this discourse of the pre-existence of the church, see ECCLESIA. The Epistle to the Ephesians, which probably suggested it, is one of the New Testament books of whose use by Hermas there are clear traces.

In subsequent visions we have a different account of the matter; he sees in each a woman more and more youthful in appearance, whom he is taught to identify with the church of his former vision; and it is explained that he saw her at first because the spirit of Christians had been broken by infirmity and doubt, and afterwards more youthful as by the revelations made him their spirit had been renewed. After his vision of the two right wings of the church, Hermas eagerly for new revelations, and set himself to obtain them by fasting and prayer. In those later visions, while the pictures presented to his mind are such as we can without difficulty believe to have been dream representations, the explanations given of them have a coherence only to be found in the thoughts of a waking man. This is still more true of the second and third parts of the work. At the end of the first part he has the vision in which he sees him who gives the name which in strictness only belongs to these two latter parts of the work, a man dressed like a shepherd, who tells him that he is the angel of repentance, who has come to dwell with him, being the guardian to whose care he had been entrusted. From this shepherd he receives, for the instruction of himself and on time at the “Similitudes,” which form the second, and the “Similitudes,” which form the third, part of the work. The Shepherd has been compared to the Pilgrim’s Progress, and it is in the last part, the “Similitudes,” that the likeness is greatest; but these do not form one continued allegory like Bunyan’s, but rather resemble the detached emblematic representations exhibited in the Interpreter's House. The Similitudes of Hermas, we may well believe, were suggested by the parables of the New Testament, though it need hardly be said how infinitely below these are the latter cases. Hannel, in which the central thought is usually overlaid by uninteresting details.

But the judgment we may form on the literary merits of the work of Hermas is of little importance compared with that of deciding rightly the fundamental question, our determination of which must rule our decision as to the date of the compositions, and also, as far as possible, to determine, namely, whether the book does not claim to be an inspired document, the writer of which aspires to no literary merit, save that of faithfully recording the revelations made him. When Bunyan says that in a certain place he fell asleep and dreamed a dream, we do not believe, and we do not suppose that he intended us to believe, that all the stories which he proceeds to relate actually was presented to his mind in the form of a dream. Are we to suppose that, in like manner, Hermas wished his readers to understand that in relating his visions he intended no more than to present edifying lessons in an allegorical form, and are we to suppose that this was merely in the light of an instructive fiction that the book was regarded when it was introduced into the public reading of the church? As a specimen of the way in which these questions may be answered, we quote Donaldson's argument. He says:—"If the book be not inspired, then either the writer fancied he had seen these visions, or tried to make other people fancy this, or he clothed the work in a fictitious form designedly and undisguisedly. If he did the first, he must have been silly. If he did the second, he must have been an impostor." But as he believes the author to have been "an honest, upright, and thoughtful man," he concludes that he did the third, "as multitudes of others have done after him, with John Bunyan at their head." From this view it follows that we can lay no stress on anything the author tells us about himself and his family. All these details are as likely to be fictitious as the angels, the towers, and the beasts of the visions. We cannot even assume that the writer's name was Hermas, for the narrator of the visions, who bears this name, may have been an imaginary personage. For ourselves, we feel ourselves bound to reject this as altogether mistaken criticism, and as an application to the 2nd century of the standards of the 19th. To us it seems plain that, whatever the author intended, the first readers of Hermas did not receive the book as mere allegorical fiction. Bunsen (Hippolytus and his Age, I, 315) tells us that Niebuhr used to pity the Athenian (sic. Qu. Roman?) Christians for being obliged to listen at their meetings to this "good but dull novel." If the authorities of the church looked on it merely as a novel, would they have insinced the reading of it on other people? At the end of the century, Clement and others show no doubt of the reality of the visions. Were the men who lived a couple of generations earlier likely to have been more severe in their judgments, and would an angelic appearance seem to them a thing so incredible that one who had related it would be regarded by them as the narrator of a fiction that he did not intend should be believed? The book itself contains directions to the rulers of the Roman church to send the volume to foreign churches. If we suppose that it really was sent to them, and that the writer of the authority of the Roman church, we have an explanation of the consideration, only second to that of the canonical Scriptures, which the book enjoyed in so many distant churches. If the work were supposed to be only an edifying allegory, the place which it occupied in church reading would be quite inexplicable. We must hold then that, of all the disputations by which the Church has tried to determine that which has been adopted is infinitely the least probable, namely, that the book is undisguised fiction, written without any intention to deceive. A man at the present day might publish a story of visions, and be persuaded that his readers would not take him seriously, but no one in the 2nd century would be entitled to hold such a persuasion, and if the book of Hermas was accepted as inspired, the writer cannot be acquitted of the responsibility of having foreseen and intended this result. Dismissing then Donaldson's third supposition, we fall back on the other two, that the writer was either a fool or an impostor. This is the only alternative considered by Mosheim, de Rebus Christianis, Const. 163, 166, who holds that the writer must either have been "mente captus et fanaticus," or else that he "scientem volentemse felfellisse," the latter being the opinion to which he inclines, believing that the lawfulness of pious frauds was a fixed opinion with many Christians at the date of the composition we are discussing. We must maintain, however, that it is quite possible to disbelieve in the inspiration of Hermas without imputing folly either to him who made the claim or to those who admitted it. We do not count a young man a fool because he has not learned the lessons which only experience can teach. We must not regard the men of the 2nd century as fools because their views as to God's manner of governing His Church were different from those which the experience of so many following centuries has taught us. A Christian cannot regard them as fools for believing that in the time of our Lord and His apostles a great manifestation of the supernatural was made to the world. How long, and to what extent similar manifestations would present themselves in the ordinary life of the church, only experience could show, and they are not to be scorned though their expectations have not been borne out by the facts. In particular, if we are to set down as fools all who have believed that supernatural intimations may be given in dreams, our list would be a long one, and would include many eminent names. And as for those abnormal mental states which are called not dreams but visions, though modern science may regard them as phenomena admitting a natural explanation, it is not reasonable to expect such a view from the science of the 2nd century. Things impress different minds differently, but to us what Hermas tells of his personal history, and of the times and circumstances of his visions, conveys the impression of artless truth. His information about himself is against the incident is mentioned, which it is not very easy to piece together; and we cannot think that the author of a fictitious narrative would have conveyed so obscurely what he has to tell about the hero of his story. He would be likely also to have made this hero a man of some eminence, holding high church office, whereas the Hermas of this book always speaks of the presbyters as if he were not one of them; and he could have had no motive for representing this hero as one who had been engaged in trade which he had carried on unsuccessfully and not very honestly, and as an elderly married man with a termagant wife and ill-behaved children. When this book, if the thing be true history, it is very much to the point that Hermas should get a revelation, directing his wife to keep her tongue in better order, and his children to pay more respect to their parents; nor need we suppose Hermas guilty of any dishonesty in thus turning his gift of prophecy to the advantage of his family comfort; for nothing can be more natural than that the talk of the family should be turned to such a topic. If Hermas, in his waking moments should present himself to him again in his visions. We have already said that there is nothing incredible in the supposition that the pictures of the first vision did present themselves to the mind of Hermas as he relates them. They must have been very vivid, and have impressed him strongly. Still it is a year before he has another vision. Then he sees the lady and her chair again. After this he begins to fast and pray and look out eagerly for more revelations, and it is not wonderful to read that he soon has more visions on the subjects which have now come completely to occupy his mind. Finally he comes to believe himself to be under the constant guardianship of the shepherd angel of repentance, and he ascribes all the lessons he desires to teach to the inspiration of this heavenly monitor. This is the part of his work which it is hardest to clear from the charge of conscious deception, and probably he cannot be completely cleared. But perhaps his language expresses no more than his belief in the divine inspiration under which he wrote, for elsewhere he states that he does not regard the personages of his visions as his own invention, but that they are similar to and in the earlier part are represented as spoken to him by the Church are afterwards said to have been spoken by God's Spirit under the form of the Church. That he sincerely believed himself to be the bearer of a divine message appears to us to be the case. In fact, we might give a summary of his convictions which would serve also for those of a man in many respects very unlike, Savonarola. (c) that the church of his time had corrupted itself, and had become deeply tainted with worldliness; (d) that a time of great tribulation was at hand, in which the cross should be purged away; (e) that there was still an intervening time, during which repentance was possible, and would be accepted; (f) that he was himself divinely commissioned to be a preacher of that repentance.

We have nothing to discuss the date and authorship of the book, concerning which antiquity furnishes authority for three suppositions: (a) the author was the Hermas to whom a salutation is sent at the end of the Epistle to the Romans; (b) he was brother to Pius who was bishop of Rome at the middle of the 2nd century; (c) he was contemporary with Clement who was bishop at the very beginning of the century or at the end of the preceding. The first may be set aside as a mere guess of Origen's, and a highly improbable one. It has been conjectured, however (as, for instance, by Hilgenfeld), that the author wished his book to pass for the work of this Hermas, and Lipsius has combined this with supposition (b), holding that the author really was Hermas, the brother of Pius, but that he wished to pass for the apostolic Hermas. This may be pronounced a most improbable combination. A man forgoing all the book, in which he wished to pass as the work of a former age does not usually put his own name to it. When this Hermas published his work, he either let his contemporaries know who wrote it or he did not. If he did not, the tradition that he was brother of Pius is worth nothing; if he did, he could not expect to be taken for a contemporary of the apostles. The book itself shews no trace that the author had any such pretension to be regarded as an apostle or not of Hermas. In fact, he distinctly speaks of the apostles as in his time all dead. A forger could easily have found many names better suited to his purpose than Hermas, one of the least prominent of Scripture names, and of which, except in connexion with this book, there is no trace in ecclesiastical tradition. If the view taken in the preceding paragraphs be correct, the author had no motive for antedating his work. His prophecy announced tribulation close at hand, and only a short intervening period for repentance. To represent such a prophecy as being at the time fifty or one hundred years old would be to represent it as having failed, and in fact The Shepherd did lose its credit when it had been so long in existence. Hermas seems to have thought that, if the worldliness of the church could be repented of and reformed, it would be possible to keep it pure during the brief remainder of its existence. He announced therefore forgiveness on repentance for sins of old Christians prior to the date of his revelation, but none for those of new converts, or for sins subsequent to his revelation. It is inconceivable he could be so stupid as to defeat his own purpose by antedating his book. If the latter part of the work of Elcesar or of the Clementine homilies put the natural question, Why did we never hear of these things before? these books had provided an answer in the fiction that the alleged authors had only communicated them under a pledge of strict secrecy; in this book, on the contrary, Hermas is directed (Vit. iii. 8) to go after three days and speak in the hearing of all the saint who were at all the saints he had heard; he is in the strictest vision. Elsewhere he enables us to understand how this direction could be carried out. We learn (Mand. 11) that certain persons were then recognised in the church as having prophetic gifts, and that at the Christian meetings for worship, if after prayer ended one of them were filled with the Holy Spirit, he might speak unto the people as the Lord willed. It seems to us then that the simplest explanation how the Roman church came to believe in the inspiration of Peter, who had already admitted the inspiration of its author, that he held the position of a recognized prophet as in the East did Quadratus and Ammia of Philadelphia (Euseb. H. E. v. 16), and that he really did publicly deliver in the church assembly the message with which he states he was commissioned. As to the 2nd century, which went on, the public exercise of prophetic power in the church seems to have ceased, and when it was revived by Montanus and his followers, it had to encounter much opposition. The controversy that ensued induced the church to insist more strongly on the distinction between the inspiration of the writers of the canonical books of Scripture and that of holy men of later times, and the Muratorian fragment exhibits the feeling entertained towards the end of the century that the list of prophetic writings had been closed, and that no production of the then later years of the church could be admitted into it.

Having arrived at the conclusion that the Hermas of The Shepherd is not a fictitious character but a known person in the church of Rome in the 2nd century, we have next to settle the question, Are we to place him in the middle of the century under Pius or at the very beginning under Clement? First, we would remark that this is a question on which arguments drawn from the doctrinal characteristics of the book can yield only precarious conclusions. We have no independent trustworthy source of information as to the development of doctrine and ritual in the Roman church during the first half of the 2nd century; so that, if we choose to say that it is credible that this or that development should be found in the year 140, and not credible that it had existed in 110, such an assertion must rest solely on our subjective theories, and not on scientific knowledge. Thus Westcott (N. T. Canon, p. 190) has given as a proof of late date the mention of the “stations” (Sim. v.). We must ask what knowledge is possible to us of the date when weekly fasts were instituted in the Roman church, or when the name “stations” was given to them. Corresponding questions might be asked with reference to all the other indications noted by Westcott in the same place, or by others. And in particular the same objection may be urged if conclusions as to the date of The Shepherd are drawn from the state of church government indicated by it. For ourselves, although the impression which the book makes on us is in favour of an early date, yet, if any good external evidence could be produced that the book is as late as 150 or as early as 100, there is nothing in the teaching of the book which would entitle us to reject it, knowing so little as we do of the progress of doctrine during the interval. Turning, then, to the external evidence, the highest respect is due to the fact that at Rome, where a true tradition was most likely to be found, it was believed at the beginning of the 3rd century that Hermas was the bishop of Rome. This belief, however, may have been ultimately derived from the statement of the Muratorian writer. The credit to which a witness is entitled is proportionate to the amount of care he habitually takes to make a statement without sufficient evidence. In the case of an anonymous letter, however, by which a single fragment, we have no means of estimating what this amount may be; and therefore the provisional assent we give to him is liable to be withdrawn when we find good reason to believe him to be in error. Such reason is in this case afforded by the statement of the book itself, that Hermas was instructed, as the revelation should be completed, to send two copies of them, one to Clement for transmission to foreign churches, the other to Grotte to be used in admonishing the widows and orphans. Notwithstanding the respect with which the idea is entertained by Westcott (Canon, p. 190), we cannot seriously discuss Origen’s suggestion (Philocal. l. 11) that these names are only intended to have a mystical meaning. Origen finds that Grotto and Clement denote the literal and spiritual methods of interpretation. Only a few degrees less improbable is the supposition of Donaldson and Harnack that Clement is a real person, but not the Clement who wrote the Epistle to the Corinthians. It is no doubt possible, but it is extremely unlikely. In fact, no one who has followed the writing of that letter should be another Clement whose function it also was to communicate on behalf of the church of Rome with foreign churches, but who has left in ecclesiastical history no trace of his existence. We conclude then that the Clement in question is he who was counted one of the first bishops of Rome, and then it must follow that, if Hermas was a real man at all, he must have been his contemporary. It is immaterial whether we can maintain the perfect veracity of Hermas, or whether we are bound to take his words that he received a divine message for Clement, or that he delivered it to him; still, if the book did not drop down from the clouds, but was communicated to the church of Rome by a real man, who told his countrymen what he had been instructed to communicate his vision to Clement, we must suppose him to be mad or them to be fools, if we put his date so late that Clement must have died before he was born or while he was a child. On these grounds we hold that even the respectably attested tradition about Pius must be rejected if it is inconsistent with allowing Hermas to have been contemporary with Clement. It is not absolutely impossible to combine the two suppositions if we assume that Hermas was considerably older than Pius, and published his visions not during his brother’s episcopate, but twenty years earlier or more, and perhaps also if we place the death of Clement somewhat later than in the common reckoning. But, as after every allowance made, this puts a strain on the chronology, we prefer to believe that Pius really had an eminent brother named Pastor, whose identification with the Shepherd of Hermas was a rash combination of the Muratorian writer. Zahn, whom we follow in relying more on the connexion with Clement than on that with Pius, places The Shepherd about A.D. 97; but it seems to us that if we assign that date to the end of the 1st century, Pius has our few years for that letter to have obtained the celebrity and success which the notice in Hermas...
HERMAS

implies. That notice need not necessarily have been published in the lifetime of Clement, for Hermas is not instructed to deliver his message immediately, but only after the completion of his revelations, and this may be supposed to have been after Clement's death.

We may next examine whether any of the indications of date to be found in the book are inconsistent with the early date we have assigned, only premising that, as Lippius, who holds fast to the Pius tradition, still feels himself obliged to place The Shepherd in the very first years of Pius (i.e. the accession of Pius at earliest 139, The Shepherd about 143), so we may expect that, when the Pius tradition is discarded, a still earlier date may be found admissible.

(a) The Mention of Gropte.—This mention would have been unmeaning unless she were known to have been a contemporary of Clement; but however well known such a woman might be in her lifetime, her reputation would not be likely to survive her death.

(b) Montanism.—There is much affinity between the leading ideas of Montanism and of the book of Hermas. In both the difficulties were strongly felt that arose from the facts that the church, which was in its ideal an assembly of holy men, actually included many unworthy of the name of saints, and that many who had been baptized for the remission of sins had stained with blood because they had come to a knowledge of the truth. The question was asked, Was it possible to renew such again to repentance? In both our Lord's second coming was eagerly looked forward to, and in both a knowledge of God's coming dealings with His church was sought for from visions and revelations. But it did not need that a century should pass since Christ's death before the pressure made itself felt of the difficulties we have referred to; and on examination we find that the answers given by Hermas are quite independent of Montanism, and have all the marks of being earlier. We have already remarked on the much greater willingness in the church to accept prophetic pretensions in the time of Hermas than in the age of Montanism. The Montanists refused recognition to gross mistakes; Hermas held complete removal to be had, however, only one for the worst of sins. He will not allow the husband of an adulteress to marry again, because she might repent; in that case she ought to be taken back. To abstain from a second marriage was a duty with the Montanists; with Hermas it was a counsel of perfection—meritorious if followed, but which might be disregarded without sin. The Montanists added to the facts of the Gospels of Hermas no mark lying a matter of obligation, and he insists on the spirit in which it shall be observed, directing that it shall not be mere self-discipline, but made useful to others by giving in charity the cost of the meal saved by abstinence. In these and in other respects the teaching of Hermas is less rigorous than the Montanistic, and all that is special to Montanism is unknown to him.

(c) Church Government.—Nothing interferes more with the historical use of early writers than reading them in the light of modern controversies of which these writers were not thinking. It is natural to think that, if parity of presbyters was the church's original rule, the government of a single head could not have been established without some resistance on the part of those who were dispossessed of their equal authority. An exception to the almost total silence of church history as to such resistance has been supposed to be found in the language in which Hermas rebukes the presbyters among Christians, (Viz. iii. 9; Mand. ix.; Sim. viii. 7.) Although it might be supposed that, if the Muratorian writer could truly speak of the episcopate of Pius as his own time, he would be less likely to mistake as to the constitution of the church at that time, than as to the date of the publication of a work supposed to have appeared at the beginning of that episcopate, the same persons who take the word of the fragmentist that Hermas rebukes the presbyters for his assertion that Pius then occupied the chair of the Roman church. Their theory is that, up to that time, parity of presbyters had prevailed, that Pius was but a leading presbyter, whose attempts to fix himself in a position of permanent precedence called forth resistance from the other presbyters, and gave occasion for the rebukes of his own brother. All this theory seems to me quite chimerical. The language does not make efforts almost exclusively to combating the relaxation of morality in the church; he scarcely notices doctrinal errors. The only thing to be found in his book which seems to refer to a point of Gnostic teaching is that it would appear from Sim. v. 7, which ought to be compared with a passage probably derived from it (2 Clem. 9), that there were some who took licence to misuse the flesh on account of a denial of the resurrection of the body. But the false teachers noticed by Hermas seem to have been all in the church, not separate from it. In the passage which seems most distinctly to refer to Gnostics (Sim. ix. 22), they are described as "wishing to know everything and knowing nothing," as "praising themselves that they have understanding, and wishing to be teachers, though they were really fools." Yet he adds, "to these repentance is open, for they were not wicked, but rather silly and without understanding." We have reason to believe that the seeds of Gnosticism had begun to spring up even in apostolic times; but we cannot think that Hermas would have written as he did after Gnosticism had become a dangerous enemy to the Roman church. Irenaeus (iii. 4) dates the coming of Valentine and Cerdo to Rome in the episcopate of Hyginus, the bishop before Pius, about A.D. 135. It is therefore reasonable to believe that the work of Hermas was earlier. We might also argue, from the language of Hermas concerning the pre-existence of the church, that he must have been ignorant of the Aeons of Valentineus. We have used this argument (Vol. I. p. 558) to infer that the so-called second epistle of Clement was anterior to Valentineus. We shall argue a fortiori for the antiquity of Hermas if we could rely on some indications that the Clementine author was acquainted with the work of Hermas, but we cannot venture to lay stress on this argument.

Hosted by Google
duction. He appears to use the word ἐνθυσμὸς as synonymous with προφητεία, and he always speaks of the government of the church as in the hands of the elders, without giving any hint that one elder enjoyed authority over the others. The only thing looking that way is that Clement is recognised as the organ by which the church of Rome communicated with foreign churches; but whether this implied a like pre-emminence in domestic rule, we are not told. Similarly, though we infer that the presbyters had seats of honour in the church assemblies, we are not told that they had a seat higher than the rest. Either it was not the case or it was too much a matter of course to be mentioned. But a message on the subject of dissensions is sent τοῖς προφητείοις τῆς ἐκκλησίας καὶ τοῖς προφητείοις. It is a very forced explanation of the last plural noun to suppose it means some one of the προφητείων who desired to make himself the first, nor have we any reason to think that the word implies any sarcasm. It is more natural to understand that besides the presbyters there were others who in church assemblies were given seats of honour. Who these were, we may gather from other passages. We find (Mand. xi.) that one who claims to be a prophet is represented as sitting on a “cathedra,” while the hearers sit before him on a “subcellum.” Again, in the first vision the church, when she reads her book, sits on a cathedra. We may infer that such a seat was the prerogative of teachers. We find also from Mand. xi. that prophets were allowed to speak in the church assemblies; and the direction to Hermas himself to read his book with the presbyters, seems plain, so when to a public reading in the presence of the congregation. We are thus led to the conclusion that, besides the presbyters there were lay preachers, who, as having a gift of prophecy, were allowed to address the church assemblies, and in that capacity were given seats of honour. But as held no permanent official position, their claims would probably be ill-defined, and disputes on the subject were very likely to arise. This was a question in which Hermas was personally far more interested than in disputes concerning priority among presbyters. We may gather from his discovery (Vis. iii. 10, 13), that a subcellium is a firmer and better seat than a cathedra, that his own claim to a cathedra had not been admitted; and the authorities of the Roman church may reasonably have hesitated to place in the teacher’s chair a pious visionary, neither well read in Scripture nor accurately instructed in doctrines.

* The perverse ingenuity of commentators has also extracted the sentiments of Hermas about episcopacy and about the propriety of paying the clergy from a passage, intelligible enough in its obvious meaning, in which he contrasts the false prophet and the true. “The false prophet sets up as a soothsayer, receives persons who consult him in private, undertakes to answer their questions, and takes money for doing so. Sometimes his answers are correct, for he is enabled to use his instrument to deceive the righteous. He abuses the public assemblies of the righteous for prayer; there his earthly spirit deserts him, and he is unable to speak when not questioned. Not so the true prophet, who speaks at God’s bidding, and little wishes him to speak, but in the public assemblies, when the angel of the prophetic spirit moves him to speak. The true prophet is meek and humble, and simple in his manner of life; not ambitious of the first place, impatient, talkative, and for the most part, like the false prophet.” Compare Euseb. H. E. v. 18.
Christian venturing past the lions at the gate of the House Beautiful. The doctrine of Hermas concerning the person and work of the Son of God is entirely Christian. The Son of God is older than all creation, and was a fellow counsellor with the Father in the work of creation. He is the rock on which the church is built, His name the only gate by which any can enter into the kingdom of God. Even the most glorious angels cannot enter unto God apart from Him. (Sim. ix. 12.) It has indeed been contended that, because Hermas speaks of six chief angels, and the Ebonite systems of seven, Hermas means that the Son of God should be thought of as an angel, the chief over the six. But this combination is altogether unwarranted, and depends on the quite groundless assumption that Hermas has any affinity with Ebonism. The number seven is nowhere employed in the imagery of Hermas; on the contrary, the angels are twelve, consisting of six principal and six subordinate. Hermas tells of the toil and suffering which the Son of God underwent for the sake of the children of His people, and of the reward which He receives in the exaltation of His human nature and in His joy at receiving His purified people into union with Himself. It has been questioned whether Hermas distinguishes the personality of the Holy Spirit from that of the pre-existent Son of God. We ourselves are disposed to agree with Zahn (p. 201) that he does; but there is room for doubt, arising from the fact that in the Similitudes of Hermas, as well as in other parables, there may be a difference of opinion what things belong to the framework of the parable and what are intended to be symbolical. Bull (Def. Fid. No. 1, 2), vindicates the language of Hermas, but if it should appear that Hermas had not made the doctrine in question the subject of scientific thought, we have only another proof of the early date of his work.

The only express quotation in Hermas is from the lost apocryphal book of Eldad and Modad. Of his Old Testament allusions, we have spoken already. His use of either Old or New Testament not being indicated by formal quotation, but only by coincidences of language or thought, there is room for difference of opinion as to his use of particular books. Some of the allusions of the Epistle of James and of that to the Ephesians seem to us absolutely decisive. Only a little less strong are the proofs of the use of the First Epistle of Peter and of the First to the Corinthians. There are other New Testament books of his use of which we are ourselves persuaded, though we admit that the evidence is not conclusive. Among these we mention in particular the use of the Gospel of St. John. We believe also that the knowledge of sayings of our Lord which Hermas unmistakably exhibits was obtained from our synoptic Gospels, the coincidences with St. Mark (see Zahn, p. 457) being most striking.

Where Hermas had lived before he was sold to Rome is a point on which we can only conjecture. According to a reading which there seems no good ground for disbelieving, he supposed himself in one of his visions to have been transported to Arcadia, and Mr. Mahaffy reports (Rambles in Greece, p. 330, 2nd ed.), that the scenery that he describes is such as may be witnessed in Arcadia, and is not to be seen in the neigh-

(p. 133) that Hermas was one of those victims of the tyranny of Domitian to whom, as Dion Cassius tells (68, 2), Nerva made restitution by giving land instead of the goods of which they had been deposed.

If the view taken in this article be correct, that we have in the work of Hermas an authentic specimen of the teaching of one of those who were recognised in the Christian church as prophets at the beginning of the 2nd century, it is disappointing to be obliged to add that the book is not one which an ordinary Christian of the present day would much care to read either for amusement or edification, and that the historical student finds much less light thrown by it than might have been expected on the questions in which he is interested. Hermas himself is altogether absorbed in trying to bring about a practical reform; he shews much less interest in questions of doctrine, in which possibly as a layman he might not have been accurately instructed; he never quotes the Scriptures en masse, not even when his subject is his language much influenced by Scripture phraseology, and there are those who would describe Hermas as having preached not the Gospel, but a "fusionless screech of dry morality." The inference was natural, if Pauline Christianity is so much in the background in Hermas, he must have been an anti-Pauline Jewish Christian; and this inference may seem to be confirmed by the fact that the New Testament book which has most stamped itself on the mind of Hermas is the Epistle of St. James. Yet a closer examination finds no real trace of Judaism in Hermas. It is scarcely credible that one who had been brought up a Jew should seem so unfamiliar with the Old Testament. The Jewish nation and its privileges are not even mentioned; there is nothing about the distinction between Jew and gentile, and in fact a reader of Hermas would not discover that the Jewish nation had ever existed. Michael is not the guardian angel of that nation, but of the Christian church. Once where the phrase "twelve tribes" occurs, it turns out to mean not the Jewish tribes, but twelve nations into which the whole human race is classified; as for imposing on gentile Christians and other books that he did not have any knowledge that such a thing had ever been thought of: Indeed, the morality of Hermas is singularly free from formalism. For the new forgiveness of sins which he announces, he requires as conditions no ceremonial washings as in the book of Elchessai, no penances, no increased rigour of fasting, no formal abstinence, nothing but repentance and reformation. Baptism is the only church rite on which he insists; that he counts so essential that he believes that the holy men of the old dispensation received baptism from the apostles in the under world; fasting he uses, but attributes to it no exaggerated value; he does not even cross himself when venturing to pass the terrible beast in a scene like that of * The contrast is striking if we compare the fulness of Old Testament quotation in Clement's epistle with the scantiness in Hermas. Harnack gives a list of seven passages which seem to show acquaintance with the Old Testament. Four of these relate to passages quoted in New Testament books which seem to have been read by Hermas; the other three are doubtful.

bourhood of Rome. Zahn found a conjecture that Hermas was born in Egypt on the resemblance between the architectural character of the tower of Hermas's visions, and the description given by Plutarch of the Jewish temple in the Egyptian Helopolis.

Translations. We have already spoken of the probability that a Latin translation of The Shepherd existed in the time of Tertullian. Harnack is of opinion that the present received Latin translation dates from the middle of the 2nd century, relying amongst other arguments on the fact that in one place amongst where we have diereza in the Greek, the Latin has "episcopi id est praesides ecclesiarum," an explanation which would not be required except at a very early date. It has been questioned whether our Greek text is not a translation from the Latin. No argument in support of this opinion can be founded on the Latinisms in the Greek text, since they are sufficiently accounted for by the fact that the author lived at Rome. The hypothesis of a double original seems not unworthy of consideration. Hermas was directed to make two copies of his book. That the one which was to be sent to foreign churches must have been written in Greek may be taken for granted; in what language was that written which Graape was to read to the widows and orphans at Rome? A second Latin translation, clearly different from the Vulgate text, was published by Dresel from a Codex Palatinus. Harnack (p. 1xv) produces proof of the use of this version in the 6th century. How much earlier it was cannot be determined; but it is generally agreed that it is later than the Vulgate, and Harnack is of opinion that the older version was employed in making the new translation. More recently an Ethiopic version has been discovered, which was published in 1860. The transcriber has a note maintaining that the author of The Shepherd was the apostle Paul. He relies on Acts xiv. 12, which he quotes in the form that the Lyconianis called "Sias" Zeus, and Paul Hermes. Until quite modern times, The Shepherd was only known to the West by the Latin translation. In 1856 the first edition of the Greek text was printed by Anger and Dindorf. It was founded ultimately on a MS. found at Mount Athos, of which Simonides brought three leaves to Leipzig, and a transcript of the rest; but this edition was spoiled by the bad faith of Simonides, who at first sold a copy which he had corrupted by a number of emendations of his own. An independent source for the Greek text has been obtained in the Sinaiitic MS., which, as has been said, includes the work of Hermas. Besides these there have been employed the quotations of Clement of Alexendria, copious unacknowledged quotations by Pseudo-Athanasius (Doc. ad Antioch. Migne, Pat. Gr. xxviii. 555), separately published by Dindorf, Leipzig, 1857; and similar quotations by Antiochus Monachus, a writer of the 7th century (Pat. Gr. ixxx. 1415, concerning whom see Fabri, Bibl. Gr. Harles, x. 500). From these sources Hermas has been edited by Hilgenfeld (Nov. Test. ext. Can. Rec. 1866), and by Gebhardt and Harnack (Patres Apostolici, 1877). The latter edition we count so indispensable to the student that, as it contains a full list of editions, and as it is a fairer treating of Hermas, we think it needless to transcribe what the reader will have in his hands. Only we mention Zahn, Der Hirt des Hermas, 1868, as the work from which we have learned most. Since Gebhardt's edition Hermas has been edited by Funk (Pat. Apost. Tübingen, 1878). Some later and more detailed discussion is also to be found in the reviews of Gebhardt's edition, among which we mention that by Overbeck (Schirer, Theol. Literaturzeitung, 1878), by Donaldson in Theological Review, 1878, and by Zahn, Göttingen gelehrte Anzeigen, 1878.

HERMAS (3) (Hermes), confessor at Nicibia, commemorated on Friday after Easter week, the local feast of commemoration of all the confessors. (Wright's Spr. Mart. in Jour. Soc. Lit. 1866, p. 485.)

HERMAS (4), a Messalina, condemned at Antioch. (Theodoret, E. H. iv. 10; Id. Haer. Fab. iv. 11.) [EUCHEIΣ.] [G. S.]

HERMEAS (Eucles), one of the three principal disciples of Manes, the other two being Addas and Thomas. Hermas was sent by Manes before his death to propagate his doctrines in Egypt, where he prevailed on many to become Manicheans (Epiph. Haer. 1xv. 5, 12, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xili. 37, 47). Epiphanius heard of him from many who had come in contact with him there. [T. W. D.]

HERMELANDUS (Usuard, Mart. Mar. 25), abbat. [HERMELANDUS.] [C. H.]

HERMELLUS (Hermillus, Hermoldus), martyr, commemorated at Constantinople on Aug. 3. (Usuard, Bull. Acta AX, Aug. 1, 212.) [C. H.]

HERMENARIUS, archbishop of Bourges. [HERMENARIUS.]

HERMENARIUS, bishop of Autun. [HERMENARIUS (2).]

HERMENFREDUS (Hermonfredus), 12th bishop of Verdun, succeeding Charrinera, and followed by Gode, or, according to the Vite S. Pauli Episc. Verdunensis (Bouquet, iii. 515), by St. Paulus. He was born near Strasbourg of noble parents, and educated at the court of Childerbert II. king of Austrasia, with Theoderic and Theodebert his sons. Upon Childerbert's death (A.D. 556) he was left to himself. Theoderic, whose kingdom comprised Burgundy, but retired after a time to the monastery of Luxeuil, of which Columbanus was then abbot, and from thence he was chosen to fill the see of Verdun. He is said to have died Dec. 8, A.D. 621, after an episcopate of nine or ten years, and in some martyrologies he appears as a saint. (Gulf. Christ. xiii. 1188.) [S. A. B.]

HERMENGILD (Ermengild), ST., Visi-goth catholic prince in Spain, son of the Arian king Leovigild.

Hermenigild and Recared were the sons of Leovigild's first wife (Joh. Bl. apud Exp. SSgr. vi. 378), who was already dead in 569, in which year the king married Gisvintha, the widow of his predecessor Athanagild. The dates of the princes' births are unknown (? 560-62), but it is plain from Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. v. 39, that Her- menigild was the elder of the two brothers. In 575, immediately after the conquest of Sar- aces in Leovigild's first campaign, both sons were made "consortes regni" (Joh. Bl. l. c. For remarks on the circumstances and meaning of this step, see art. LEOVIGILD). Thenceforward, up to 579, the Spanish sources give no information of Hermengild. Between the two dates of 573 and 579, however, most probably between 573 and 575 (conf. Greg. Tur. iv. 38), Hermengild was betrothed to Inguthis, the daughter of Sigibert of Rheims and Brunhild, and grand-daughter, therefore, of Brunhild's mother, Gisvintha (q. v.), Leovi- gild's second wife and Hermengild's step-mother. In 579 (Joh. Bl. l. c. 381), Inguthis, then twelve years old, reached Spain, and in the same year, owing to dissensions between the Catholic Frankish princess and her Arian grandmother (see art. INGUTHIS), Leovigild sent the newly married pair to a distance, assigning to Hermen- gild the government of Baetica, or a portion of it, with Seville for a capital (Jo. Bl. l. c.). Here later in the same year (conf. Gürres, Kritische Untersuch. über den Aufstand und das Martyr- um des Westgoten Königsohnes Hermengild, in Zeitschrift für Hist. Theol. 1875, i. note 83; Dahn, Künst. der Germ. v. 137, gives 580 as the year), Hermengild renounced Arianism, was confirmed in the Catholic faith by Leander the Catholic metropolitan of Seville, and took the name of Joannes (Greg. Tur. v. 39; Greg. Magn. Dif. iii. 31; Paul. Dif. iii. 21). This important step was immediately followed by the rebellion of Hermengild (Joh. Bl. l. c.), who shortly afterwards formed a close alliance with the Byzantines in the south, and with the recently catholicized Suevi in the north, i.e. with the two most formidable enemies of his father's state and church. Nothing (conf. Dahn, p. 138). Thus the struggle shaped itself as a conflict of confessions and nationalities, of Arianism and Catholicism, of Goth and Roman, although Leovigild had adherents among the provincials, and Hermen- gild counted some Gothic partisans. (Dahn, v. 140.)

From 580 to 583 Leovigild was occupied in various measures of precaution and preparation. From a later date (late 582) it was the end of 582 that he felt himself strong enough to attack his son. Late in 582 or early in 583, Merida, which we may suppose to have been the most northerly of Hermengild's towns, was conquered (Greg. Tur. vi. 18), and the siege of Seville followed immediately. Towards the end of 583 or the beginning of 584, Hermengild escaped from the beleaguered city (possibly at the same time Leovigild was about to seek help from Constantine; see art. LEANDER) and took refuge with the Byzantines at Cordova, which, after having been subdued by Leovigild in 572, had declared for Hermengild, and invited a Greek garrison. Seville fell in 584 (Joh. Bl. l. c. p. 383), and shortly afterwards Hermengild was captured in or near Cordova, the Basilians effect having been bribed to give up both the town and the fugitive to the father (Greg. Tur. v. 39, vi. 43; Joh. Bl. p. 383). He was deprived of the government of Basetica, and, in all probability, of his claim to the succession (Joh. Bl. c. regno privatru appears to cover both penalties), and was sent an exile to Valencia. In the following year (585), "Hermengildus in Urbe Tarracoensis adhibeit interfectur" (Joh. Bl. D. 384). This is all the notice that the abbat of Bicalo, our best source, gives to the fact. Isidore does not mention the death of Hermengild at all. Gregory of Tours mentions it drily in passing as one of the causes of Guntharinnus's attack upon Septimania (Hist. Fr. viii. 28; "Leuvichildus vero Herm. filium suum—morti tradidit").

Upon the account given by Gregory the Great alone, therefore (Dipl. iii. 31), rests the claim of Hermengild to be considered not as a rebel suffering the too harsh penalty of a political crime, but as a martyr for the Catholic faith. According to the pope, Hermengild, after a painful imprisonment, "in cilio vivaculculo jacens," was beheaded on the night of Easter Sunday, by his father's "apparitores," because he had refused to receive the sacraments from the hands of an Arian bishop, "atque per hoc patria gratiam redire merebatur." After the execution, miracles were not wanting to substan- tiate the martyr's claim to veneration: "For in the silence of the night, the sound of psalmsody began to be heard around the body of the king and martyr, truly king because truly martyr." His body, therefore, "ut videlicet martyris, jure cunctis fidibus venerari debuit." In his grave, also, according to Gregory, were laid the foundations of Visigothic Catholicism. For after Leovigild's death, his son Recared "non patrem perfidum sed fratre martyrum sequens" was converted by Leander and led over the whole people of the Visigoths to the true faith. Nor was it wonderful that he should become a preacher of the true faith, since he was the brother of a martyr, whose merits helped him in his task of leading back so many souls to the bosom of the Church. But that the Visigoths could have been if Hermengild had not died. Thus, one of the Visigothic race died that many might live, and while one grain of wheat had fallen to the ground, "seges multa surrexit".

In the face of this apparent conflict between Gregory's testimony and the silence of the Spanish source, modern opinion has always been much divided as to Hermengild's martyrdom. It is plain that neither to Joh. Bichareses, his contemporaries nor to Isidore, Leander's younger brother, nor even to Gregory of Tours, did Her- menigild appear in the light of a martyr for Catholicism. "Tyranus" and "rebellis" are the words used of him by Joannes; Isidore follows the same line: "deinde filium suum tyranni- zantiem imperii sui obsessum experspertavit," and again in the Hist. Suev. "rebelliam filium." Another Spanish poet, Gregory of Tours, says that upon his return from Paris to Merida, a writer of the 7th century (Ma- billon, Ann. Ord. Sancti Bened. l. 72, dates the De Vit. et Mir. Patrum Emeritensium about 833), whose record of the bishops of Merida was avowedly suggested by the Dialogues of Gregory the Great, thus transforms the passage from the Dialogus, already quoted:
HERMENIGILD

Greg. M. Dial. 3. 31.

"Post ejus (Leovigild) mortem Recaredus rex non patrem perdum sed pro-tres martyres sequens, ab Arianae haeresis pravitate convertus est."

This writer's fanatical hatred of Leovigild is visible in every page of his life of bishop Masons (q. c.). Had Hermengild really died a martyr's death, what motive could have induced us assailant of his Arian father to thus implicitly deny a fact so useful to one of his main purposes?
To these passages from the Spanish sources we have also to add the striking and often quoted words of Gregory of Tours, whose sympathy with the Catholicks of Hermengild and Inguthis is, of course, beyond question: "Hermenigildus—patrisque ejus ex arcebro, cognovit, consiliumque inuit, qualiter venientem aut repelleret aut necaret, necesse misit, judicium sibi imminere dicitum, qui contra genitorem quamlibet haereticum talia cogitaret."

We are naturally led in this state of the evidence to examine more closely the genesis and character of St. Gregory's narrative. The Dialogue in question was written about 594 (Görres, L. c. p. 13, note 38). The sources of it appear to have been—for the fact and immediate causes of the conversion, the testimony of Leander received at Constantinople, between the year 583 and 586 [see art. LEANDER]—for Hermengild's death on the other hand, the witness of unnamed Spanish emigrants, in all probability exiles belonging to the political party of Hermengild (sicut multorum, qui ab Hispaniarum partibus veniunt relationes cognovimus, & c.).
The account entirely passes over the political circumstances under which Hermengild met his death. There is no mention whatever of war or rebellion. No names of localities or persons beyond those of Leander and the father and sons are given, and immediately upon the conversion, the new imprisonment and death.
Whereas we know that between the conversion and Hermengild's capture at Cordova five years elapsed of incessant military or diplomatic action upon the part both of father and son. The miracles following the martyrdom, and the extremely improbable story of Leovigild's remorse and repentant recommendation of Leander to Recared [see art. LEAOVID] increase the unhistorical aspect of the whole. Nevertheless in the course of time Gregory's narrative won complete ascendancy, and upon it was founded the canonization, which a thousand years later was accorded to the tyrannus and rebellis of the Spanish sources.

Various explanations have been offered of the attitude of the Spanish reporters towards Hermengild. Aguirre declare the positively that the narrations in question had been mutilated by Arians (Conc. Hosp. Coll. Max. i. 422), an opinion shared by the Spanish antiquary Joseph Perez [see quotation in Arevalo, Isid. Op. i. 422].
Arevalo, however (l. c.), has long ago disposed of these assertions, as of certain other explanations and harmonizations put forward by Nicolas Antonio (Bibl. Vetus, lib. v. cap. 4, 134). The editor of Ibsen suggested in his turn that Joannes and Isidoro writing under Recared dared not favour the cause of Hermengild, because his young son Athanagild was still living, and might have been a dangerous weapon in the hands of Inguthis's Frankish brother and uncle.
The argument against this position rests in fact by Görres (l. c. p. 80). Another and more-plausible theory refers to Hermengild's alliance with the Byzantines, which, after Recared's reign, during which such great strides were made towards the fusion of the Goths and Romans, and the formation of a Spanish nationality, must have appeared as an act of unpardonable treachery to every loyal subject of the Gothic state—to the writer of Roman descent like Isidore, as well as to a writer of Gothic descent such as the abbot of Bicalo. Gams has put this explanation as strongly as it admits of being put (Kirchengesch. von Spanien ii. 2) 5, and it does no doubt explain the disapproval of the revolt shewn by Isidore and Joannes. It is difficult, however, to believe that had Hermengild really met his death as a martyr for the orthodox belief, such a consideration would have altogether prevented them from mentioning the fact. Both—Isidore more especially—write as accusers of Leovigild, while with such an act in itself both must of course have been in full sympathy. And in any case the theory leaves Gregory of Tours' blame and silence unexplained.

Such are some of the difficulties of this famous story. "A close examination of all the sources," says Görres (in 1873, l. c.), "has led me to the conclusion that the supposed martyrdom of Hermengild cannot be substantiated." While the most recent ultra-Catholic view is that of Gams: "On the one hand, therefore, stands Gregory I, who represents him as a martyr and a saint, on the other the Spanish sources, who represent him as a rebel. I believe the explanation lies in the practice and teaching of the church, according to which martyrdom, as a baptism of blood (via Martyrdom), offers all previous faults.

Growth of the Hermengild cultus.—The first mention of Hermengild as a martyr, after Gregory I, occurs in the De rebus sanctorum sanctorum of 24, the greatest and most useful biography of the 7th century, Fructuoso, written towards the end of the 7th century, where, among a list of royal martyrs, appears Regum Gothorum Ermenegildii (Esp.

Sagr. xvi. 373). In the Mozarabic liturgy, the work of the 7th century Spanish churchmen, Hermengild has no place, nor does he appear in the 9th century Memoriales Sacerdotum of Eulogius (Schott, Histor. iii. p. 223). Beda's Martyrology makes no mention of him, nor up to the 9th century does any single author beside Gregory I, Paulus Diaconus following him (Hist.
Langob. iii. 31), and Valerius—speak of Hermen-gild as a martyr. In the 9th century, however, his name was generally admitted into the Martyrologies (Ap. 13 ; Ado, Usuardus, Notker, Wandelinus ; all basing on Gregory's Dialogus [conf. Ado, "ut scribit beatus Papa Gregorius"]); while the 13th-century Spanish historians, entirely reversing the judgment of their predecessors, even made additions to Gregory's narative (conf. Lucas Tud. "Alix sanum nefasid rutilis communare nolentem diversa tormenta prorsus excruciatum, interfeceris justit?" ; and Rod.
Tol. de Rebus Hisp. ii. 14, both apud Schott, HERMENILDUS

HISP. Ill. iv. ii.; Cronica General [Estoria de España], part ii. cap. 39). Thenceforward the cultus grew rapidly, and found its natural issue in 1585, when Sixtus V., urged by Philip II., issued an apostolic brief, instituting the cult of Hermingildus in Galicia, which became a sure sign of the deaths of father and son, and the first of which we know to have been largely caused by the impression made on Gunthramm by the news of Hermingildus's death. We are therefore obliged to fall back upon Easter Day, 585. This would give March 24–25 for Hermingildus's death, and would also necessitate the conclusion that Leovigild's seventhenth year began before March 24, 585. Again, we are still to find a place for the important Suevian campaign against Audika in the same year before Hermingildus's death, we may conjecture with some probability that the year in question began in January or February 585. An interesting reflection here suggests itself, supposing the date just arrived at established. If Leovigild were engaged during the early months of 585 in subduing and annexing the Suevi in the extreme north-west of the peninsula, how could he have played the direct personal part in the death of Hermingildus at Tarraco, i.e. the extreme north-east of Spain on March 24 of the same year which St. Gregory assigns to him?

For the well-known inscription at Alcalá de Guadaira, dating from the rebellion period, "In nomine domini anno feliciter secundo [581] regni domini nostri Ermingildi regis, quern preaequitur genetor sus domus (sic) Liuwigildus rex in civitate Hispaniae, ducti Aione," see Hübner's Inscr. Hisp. Christ. p. 22, No. 76, and for coins struck by Hermingildus, Flores's Medallas sec. iii. and the admirable recent work of M. Heiss, Description générale des monnaies des rois Visigoth d'Espagne par Alouise Heiss, Paris, 1872. For general references see list given under Leovigild. [M. A. W.]

HERMENILDA (Kemble, C. D. 44), abbess. [EREMENILDA.] [O. H.]

HERMENLANDUS or HERMENLANDUS (ST.), abbot of Antrim (Aindre) at the beginning of the 8th century, was born of noble parents at Noviomagus (Nimwegen) in Holland, and was when very young sent as a page to the court of king Clothaire, where he was brought up. When come to years of maturity he refused marriage, and in spite of all opposition entered on a monastic life, first as a novice, and was afterwards consecrated priest in the monastery of Fontanella under St. Landbertus, by whom he was soon sent to Nannetum (Nantes) at the request of Passquarius, bishop of that diocese, for the purpose of founding a monastery. On his arrival Hermenlandus was cordially received by the bishop, and after surveying the island of Antrim on the Ligeris or Loire in Armorica (Brittany), he chose that for the site of the new monastery, which he at once proceeded to build. On its completion he became abbat, and presided over it for many years. Before his death he appointed Donatus as his successor. Miracles are said to have been worked at his tomb, and he is commemorated on March 25. (Marti. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Marth. 574; Mabill. Acta SS. O.S.B. spec. iii. i. 365.) [O. S.]
HERMIONIC. [HERMIC.]

HERMIONTAE, HERMORTAE, HERMEOITAE (Phil. de Haeq. lvi.), a heretical sect. [HERMIA (1).] [T. W. D.]

HERMIC and HERMIGAR, joint kings (?) of the Suevi in Spain (409-440). In the autumn of 409 (between Sept. 28 and Oct. 13, Dahn, Königre der Germanen, vi. 559) a Suevic tribe accompanied the Vandals and Alani into Spain, and the land was parcelled out among the invaders by lot. (See the famous passage in Istius [see Corpus Ins. Arch. ii. final map].) In entry into the peninsula, apud Exp. Saur. iv. 353, 354.) To the Suevi and a section of the Vandals fell (A.D. 411) the extreme north-west of Spain, practically the Roman province of Gallicia ("Gallaeciam situm in extremate oceani maris occiduum," Idat. l. c.). In 417 the Suevi, together with the Vandals and Alani, concluded a treaty with Honorius, by which they engaged to defend Spain for the empire against other barbarians. In 418 Walja, the Gothic king, acting for the empire, "Romani nominis causa" (Idat. l. c.), destroyed the Alani, and the Suevi were relieved from their supremacy, to which they had been for a time forced to submit. They were thus, however, brought face to face with the Vandals, who appear to have been greatly their equals in point of numbers, and in 419 we find the Suevi, under their king HERMIC, shut up in the "Montes Nerviai" (between Leon and Oriedo, Dica. Geogr. de la España Antig. Cortez y Lopez, iii. 220) by the Vandals (Idat. l. c.). The voluntary retreat of the Vandals southward (HERMIC) relieved the Suevi, and soon encouraged them to follow on the track of their retiring rivals in the hope of appropriating the country left vacant by them. In 429 Genseric was already on the sea-coast planning the migration to Africa, when he heard of the Suevian advance upon Lusitania, and promptly retraced his steps to meet them. A battle followed at Merida (A.D. 429) in which the Suevians were heavily defeated, while their leader Hermigar was drowned in the Guadiana during their flight. Who Hermigar was is doubtful. Istius does not speak of him as rex, but only as Sueus. Possibly he was Heremic's dux only, but possibly also his brother and under-king (cf. Dahn, l. c. note 8). Upon this overthrow by the Vandals, followed hostilities on the part of the inland provincials of Gallicia acting from the towns and strong places, who inflicted heavy damage on the weakened Suevi and compelled the restoration of all prisoners, as the price of peace. In the following year however (436) Istius himself, the faithful historian of the time and bishop of the Gallician see of Aquae Flaviae (Claviae), was sent by the Gallician provincials to Aetius in Gaul to report a breach of the just concluded peace by Hermic and to ask for help against the Suevi. Just at this time, as Dahn points out (l. c. 561), the Suevi were for more than thirty years practically masters of the peninsula. From 429 to Euric's accession in 466, 482, 489, with but one or two interludes, we find them for the conquest and colonisation of the country, goes far towards proving their small numbers" (Dahn, l. c.).

From 433 to 440 Hermic was obliged by illness ("diurno morbo additus per annos septem," Idat.) to maintain a more peaceful attitude. He made peace with the Gallician provincials, "sub intervinta episcopali" (Idat.), and appointed his son Rekill co-regent. Between 437 and 439 Rekill won important successes over the Romans on the Xeull and Guadiana. Merida was once more captured, and a Roman comes with legati were forced to give themselves up at Myrtillas (Mertola on the Guadiana; see Corpus Ins. Arch. ii. final map). In 440 Hermic died and was succeeded by Rekill, under whom, as under his grandson Rekbar, the Suevian power in Spain reached its highest point. Of all this complicated and tumultuous time from the entry of the barbarians to the beginning of the reign of Euric, the contemporary chronicle of Istius is an invaluable report. (Dahn, Königre der Germanen, l. c.; Ferreras, ed. D'Hermilly, ii. 44, 47, 55; Idat. Chron. l. c.; Isid. Hist. Suev. apud Exp. Saur. v. 503.) [M. A. W.]

HERMIS. See also HERMAS.

HERMES (1) TRISMEGISTUS. Under this title have come down to us a variety of writings of uncertain date and unknown authorship. There is no uncertainty, however, as to the country where they were produced; from external and internal evidence it is alike plain that this was Egypt. It is probably superfluous to remark that the name "Hermes Trismegistus" never belonged to any single writer. What, then, will be asked, is the meaning of it, and why is it attached to these works? This question will be answered for us by Jamblichus, who at the beginning of his treatise De Mystikè tells us that "Hermes, who presides over speech, is, according to ancient tradition, common to all priests; he is who exists in all of them. That is why our ancestors attributed all discoveries to him, and composed their works under the name of Hermes." There was, in fact, a long-continued series of books called "hermetic," extending in their production over several centuries. Hermetic books are mentioned by Plutarch (de Iside, c. 61), Galen (de Simplic. Med. vi. 1), and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 4, p. 457), and hence it is apparent that some of them date from a period not later than the 2nd century after Christ. But the books described by Clement would seem to have been for the most part of a distinctly sacerdotal and even technical cast; it would not appear that they were of wide or deep philosophical or spiritual import. Tertullian, however (cont. Valentin. c. 15), speaks of Hermes Trismegistus as a master in philosophy; and the extant hermetic books show us from their date, philosophical and spiritual relations of a very interesting kind. They belong, as is now generally agreed, to the Neoplatonic school; and while far from powerful or original books, they shew much reflective appreciation of what is truly powerful and original, and gather up in a synthesis, the artificiality of which is not at first sight apparent, large elements of all the different factors of religious belief in the Roman world of the second and third centuries. The two principal of these works are the
(the "Shepherd of men"), and the Ἀδείς τῆλες (or "discourse of initiation"), otherwise called "Asclepius." These two works, together with a variety of fragments, have been translated into French by M. Louis Ménard (Paris, 1867), and accompanied with a preliminary essay of much interest on the hermetic writings and their affinities generally. The most important fragments translated by M. Ménard are taken from a work entitled Κόρα κόσμων (the "Virgin of the World"), which consists of a dialogue between Isis and her son Horus on the origin of nature and of all existing beings. Other less noticeable works attributed to Hermes Trismegistus will be found named in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography (art. "Hermes Trismegistus").

But we must recur to the two first-named works, the Ποιμάδης (Poemander) and the Ἀδείς τῆλες (Asclepius). It is not to be assumed that these two works are by the same author; but from the great similarity of tone and thought between them, this will appear an improbably hypothesis. Both works are quoted by Lactantius (who ascribed to them the same fabulous antiquity and high authority which the early fathers were accustomed to attribute to the Sibylline books); and as Lactantius died about A.D. 350, this fixes a point before which the works of Hermes and the Asclepius must have been written. If the Latin translation of the Asclepius (the Greek original, except in the quotations by Lactantius, has been lost) were correctly attributed to Apuleius of Madaura, then this work must have been composed at latest in the 2nd century; but the attribution is now considered an error; and the historical allusions in the work distinctly point to a time when heathenism was about to perish before the increasing power of Christianity. Hence we may, with much probability conclude that both these works were written towards the close of the 3rd century. Some, however, have brought the Poemander into connexion with the Pastor of Hermas, and have even assigned it to the same author; this, however, is not probable.

Three motives (if we may so speak) are discernible in the tendency to take an intellectual survey of the whole spiritual universe, without marking any points where the understanding of man fails and has to retire unsatisfied; this is a disposition which, under different forms and at different times, has been called Pantheism or Gnosticism (though the Gnostic idea of an evil element in creation nowhere appears in these treatises). The ideas of the author on these points are presented under the form of a gorgeous material imagery; and, speaking generally, he regards the material world as interpenetrated by the spiritual, and almost identified with it. The power and divine character which he attributes to the sun and other heavenly bodies is peculiarly Egyptian, though this also brings him into affinity with Stoic, and even with Platonic, views. There is much more of symbol and imagery than of elaborately constructed theories in these representations. Secondly, the Pantheism or Gnosticism above described is modified by moral and religious elements which certainly might to some degree be paralleled in Plato, but to which it is difficult to avoid ascribing a Jewish and even a Christian origin. Great stress is laid on the unity, the creative power, the fatherhood and goodness of God. So, too, the argument from design appears. "No one pretends that a statue or picture can exist without a sculptor or painter, and can this creation be without a creator?" (Poemander, c. 5.) Even the well-known terms of baptism and regeneration occur, though in different connexions, and the former in a metaphorical sense. One of the chapters of the Poemander is entitled "The Secret Sermon on the Mountain." The future punishments for wrongdoing are described with emphasis. Many of these affinities have been collected by Baumgarten-Crusius (in the essay mentioned below). At the same time there is no moral teaching in detail. But, thirdly, these respectively intellectual and religious elements are associated with a third of a very rare and noticeable character. The Asclepius contains a passionate and vigorous defence of the heathen religion, including idol worship, and a prophecy of the evils which will come on the earth from the loss of piety. In fact, this is the only part of the treatises which go by the name of Hermes Trismegistus in which something like powerful sentiment appears; sentiment, it is true, on behalf of a system wholly wrapped up in unreality, but still not unintelligible nor wholly condemnable to one who regards the long ages, the countless memories, with which the worship of Zeus and Athene, of Ares and Aphrodite, was then associated. It may be worth while to quote (with abbreviations) part of this passage. "Knowest thou not, Asclepius, that Egypt is the image of heaven, the representation on earth of every celestial ordinance? Our land is the temple of the world. Yet, as the wise ought to foresee everything, one thing you must know: the time will come when it will appear that the Egyptians have in vain observed the worship of the gods with so much piety, and that all their sacred prayers have been barren and unheard. The divinity will leave the earth. Religion, piety, the worship of the gods will be proscribed and punished by the laws. This land, sanctified by so many shrines and temples, will be covered with tombs of Egyptians; and of thy sacred things nothing will remain save words graven on the stones that record thy pious deeds. The Scythian or Indian, or some other barbarian, will inhabit Egypt. Thou wepest, Asclepius? Still worse will happen. Egypt herself will be tamed and seduced. She, once the holy land, the most faithful lover of the gods, will be the perverter of saints, the school of impiety, the example of all violence. Then, full of loathing, man will change the world neither admiration nor love. He will turn away from that perfect work. In weariness of soul, he will but disdain this vast universe, this changeless work of God, where the will of God has gathered all together in harmonious synthesis, worthy for ever of veneration, praise, and love. ... Then will evil angels mingle with miserable humanity, and push it on to crimes, wars, rapine, falsehood. The sea will be no more navigable, the stars will change their courses, the fruits of the earth will be corrupted. Such will be the old age of the world, irreligion, anarchy, confusion of all law and of all good. When this shall have happened,
O Asclepius, then God, the Lord and Father, seeing the seeds of men, will correct these evils by an act of His will and divine goodness; to put an end to this corruption, He will drown the world by a deluge, or consume it by fire, or destroy it by war and pestilence, and will restore its first beauty to the world, that the world may seem again worthy to be admired and adored, and that praise may again be given to God, who has created and restored so beautiful a work. This second birth of the world will take place after the period fixed by the divine and eternal will.” Such is the only extant lamentation of expressing heathenism; perhaps one may say that there were even elements of preciosity in the forecast; certainly it is not without pathos. But for the most part the style of these works is hierocratic, pretentious, and diffused.

Those who wish to know more about Hermes Trismegistus may consult (besides the work of M. Ménard above referred to) Fabric. Bibl. Graec, vol. i. pp. 46–94; and Baumgarten Crusi, de Liberalium Hermeticon Origen atque Iorole, Jena, 1827. Vacherot gives a short disquisition on the hermetic works, and Zeller notices them slightly.

[3. R. M.]

HERMES (8), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, supposed to be the Hermes mentioned by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 14), to have succeeded Titus as bishop of Dalmatia, and to have suffered martyrdom. (See the Menæa and the Monologium Basilianum for Nov. 4, Migne, Patr. Gr. cxxii. 149; also Farlati, Hyligic. Sacr. i. 393–404.)

[4. D.]

HERMES (9)—Aug. 28. A prefect of the city of Rome, who is mentioned in the apocryphal acts of pope Alexander I. A.D. 180, by whom he, his wife, his children, and his sister Theodora are said to have been converted and baptized. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adom., Usuard.; Kal. Front.; Tillemont, Mémo. i. 238, 590; Baron. Annal. A.D. 182, num. i.)

[5. T. S.]

[6. B.]

HERMES (6)—March 1. Martyr with Adrian at Marseilles. (Mart. Usuard.)

[6. G. T. S.]

HERMES (6), archdeacon of Narbonne not earlier than 445, bearer of a letter from St. Leo to Rusticus, bishop of that place. About 460 Hermes was consecrated by Rusticus to the see of Beziers, but the inhabitants rejected him, as of unworthy life. On the death of Rusticus he assumed the bishopric of Narbonne without due election, and pope Hilary (epis. 7 and 8) permitted him to retain the office, but without the privilege of ordaining (Lev. Ep. 167, p. 1416).

[7. T. S.]

[8. G. T. S.]
&c. all agree in nothing but repelling and refuting one another. Who the author was seems to have baffled all enquiries. Some would identify him with Hermias Sozomen the ecclesiastical historian. Even the martyr of May 31 has been suggested (Cell. ut infr.). Cave, who discusses the subject at some length (i. 81) attributes this work to the 2nd century. As it was plainly written when bestiery was triumphant, Cellier (vi. 332) fixes its publication under Julian. Neander (H. E. ii. 429, ed. Bohn) regards Hermias as "one of those bitter enemies of the Greek philosophy whom Clement of Alexandria thought it necessary to censure, and who, following the idle Jewish legend, pretended that the Greek philosophy had been derived from fallen angels. In the title of his book he is called the philosopher: perhaps he wore the philosopher's mantle before his conversion, and after it passed at once from an enthusiastic admiration of the Greek philosophy to extreme abhorrence of it." (Du Pin, H. E. t. i. p. 69, ed. 1723.)

HERMIAS (8) SOZOMEN. [SOZOMEN.]

HERMIAS (7), presbyter, to whom Cyril of Alexandria addressed his Dialogues on the Trinity. (Patr. Gr. ixv. 659.) He has been suggested (Cell. vi. 332), as possibly the author of the Irrissio. [HERMIAS (8)]. [C. H.]

HERMIAS (8), bishop of Abydos on the Hellestom, was present at the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451, and signed the synodal letter of the Cyzicene province to the emperor Leo concerning the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 587; Le Quien, Orient Christ. i. 773.) [L. D.]

HERMIAS (9), a Syrian, the father of Felix presbyter of Nola. A brother of Felix was also named Hermias. (Paulin. Nol. poem. xv. vv. 76, 79, p. 30 in Patr. Lat. ixi. 470 A, B.) [C. H.]

HERMIGAR. [HERMERIC.]

HERMINARDUS (HERMINARIUS), thirty-seventh archbishop of Bourges, succeeding Landoarius, and followed by Deodatus, was present at the Lateran council convoked by pope Stephen III. in A.D. 769. He is said to have died in 774. (Mansi, xii. 715; Gall. Christ. ii. 19.) [S. A. B.]

HERMINARIUS. [ERMINARIUS (2)].

HERMINGILD, prince. [HERMENIGILD.]

HERMINUS (HERMIMUS), count, a correspondent of Isidore of Pelusium, of whose letters forty-three are addressed to him. The most interesting are the following: bk. i. ep. 18, on the perpetual virginity of the blessed Virgin Mary; i. 136, on the episcopacy office; i. 187, Isidore mentions a lost work, λόγος κατά Ὕψυχας, in which he defends Christianity from certain accusations; iii. 195, on infant baptism; iii. 285, Isidore mentions a book, also lost, against fate, πρὶς τοῦ λοι Μιχαύλε τοῦ σταυρικοῦ; v. 276, on the prevalence of simony. (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxviii. 191 sqq.; Cellier, viii. 479-487.) [J. W. S.]

HERMION, bishop of Tanis, in the Delta. He was present at the synod of Alexandria, A.D. 382, and signed the epistle addressed to the church of Antioch. (Mansi, iii. 345; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 535.) [J. de S.]

HERMIONE (1)—Sept. 4, daughter of Philip the apostle, according to Bas. Men. probably the deacon being meant (Acts xxi. 9). She lived at Ephesus until Trajan's time with a sister named Eutycha. The emperor, making an expedition against the Persians, came to Ephesus, where, hearing of her fame as a Christian prophetess, he tortured her, but released her when she predicted his triumph over the Persians. She is said to have been martyred under Adrian. The whole story is devoid of any really ancient authority. Cf. however a learned note on the subject of the residence of the apostle Philip in Asia Minor, in Dr. Lightfoot's Commentary on the Colossians, p. 45. See also articles on "Philip the Apostle" and "Philip the Evangelist" in Dictionary of the Bible. (Bas. Men.; Acta SS. Bell. Sept. ii. 185; Dodwell, Dissert. Cyprian. xi. 17-28.)

HERMIONE (2), virgins in Elouериopolis (Freistadt), commended by Marcellinus and Faustinus, priests who were attached to the schism of Ursinus and Lucifer in the 4th century. (Faustinum et Marcellini Ep. Precum ad Imperatores, c. 29; Migne, Patr. Lat. xii. 109; Cellier, Histoire des Auteurs Ecclés. v. 154.) [I. G. S.]

HERMONITAE, heretics. [HERMIS (1)].

HERMOCRATES, martyr. [HERMIPPUS]