NAARAH (1 '22), na'arah; B, a kewa a-tha^n, hoi kowai a-ta^n, A, Naara^a, Naara^ah; AV Na-arah: A town in the territory of Ephraim (Josh 16 7). It appears as "Naaran" in 1 Ch 7 28 (B, Naara^a, Naararn, A, Naara^, Naaran). Onom (s.v. "Naarah") places it 5 Rom miles from Jericho. The name has not been recovered, and no identification is certain. The position would agree with that of el-Ahijeh, about 5 miles N.E. of Jericho.

NAARAI, n'a-ar'i (1 '29), na'aray: Son of Ezba, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11 37). In the passage (2 S 23 35), he is called "Paaarai the Arbite." The true forms of the name and description are uncertain (see Biddle, Richter u. Samuel, and Curtis, Chronicles).

NAARAN, n'a-ar-an, NAARATH, n'a-ar-rath (1 '24; na'ar'da'n, 1 '22), na'Rar. See NAARAH.

NAASHON, na'a-sh'on, NAASON, na'a's-on, NAASSON, na'a's-on (Naarason, Naason): AV Gr form of "Naashon" (thus RV) (Mt 1 4; Lk 3 32).

NAATHUS, na'a-thus (Nâthes, Nathon): One of the sons of Addi who put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9 31). It apparently corresponds to "Adana" of Ezr 10 30, of which it is a transposition. B reads Addo^s, Lîthos, probably confusing A and Æ.

NABAL, n'a-bal (1 '27), nabal, "foolish" or "wicked": Na'â, Nabâl: A wealthy man of Maon in the highlands of Judah, not far from Hebron, owner of many sheep and goats which he pastured around Carmel in the same district. He was a churlish and wicked man (1 S 25 2 ff). When David was a fugitive from Saul, he and his followers sought refuge in the wilderness of Paran, near the possessions of Nabal, and protected the latter's flocks and herds from the marauding Bedouin. David felt that some compensation was due him for such services (vs 15 and 25), so, at the time of sheep-shearings—an occasion of great festivities among sheep masters—he sent 10 of his young men to Nabal to solict gifts of food for himself and his small band of warriors. Nabal not only refused any assistance, but denounced David, whereupon the latter, becoming very angry, determined upon the extermination of Nabal and his household and dispatched 400 men to execute his purpose. Abigail, Nabal's wife, a woman of wonderful sagacity and prudence as well as of great beauty, having learned of her husband's conduct and of David's intentions, hurriedly proceeded, with a large supply of provisions, dainties and wine, to meet David and to apologize for her husband's unkind words and niggardliness, and thus succeeded in thwarting the bloody and revengeful plans of Israel's future king. On her return home she found her husband in the midst of a great celebration ("like the feast of a king"), drunken with wine, too intoxicated to realize his narrow escape from the sword of David. On the following morning, when sober, having heard the report of his wife, he was so overcome with fear that he never recovered from the shock, but died 10 days later (vs 36-39). When David heard of his death, he sent for Abigail, who soon afterward became one of his wives. W. W. Davies

NABARIAS, nab-a-ri'as (Naapa^a, Nabarâs, B, Naapa^a, Nabaraleus): One of those who stood upon Ezra's left hand as he expounded the law (1 Esd 9 44). Encyclopaedia Brit. gives 6 noses whereas Nehemiah (8 4) gives 7. It is probable that the last (Messhulem) of Nehemiah's list is simply dropped and that Nabarias = Hashbaddanah; or it may possibly be a corruption of Zechariah in Nehemiah's list.

NABATEANS, nab-a-t'ez-an, NABATHAEANS, nab-a-th'e-anz (NaParatoi, Nabataloi; in 1 Mac 5 25 & reads these as plural of anabathoi hoi, V, 'A^n, the Nabataei, Anabathaeoi; AV Nabathites, more correctly "Nabateans"): A Sem (Arabian rather than Syrian) tribe whose home in early Hellenistic times was S.E. of Pal., where they had either supplanted or been mingled with the Edomites (cf Mal and Early 1 1-5). In Josephus' day they were History so numerous that the territory be- tween the Red Sea and the Euphrates was called Nabateene (Ant, I, xii, 4). They extended themselves along the E. of the Jordan with Petra as their capital (Strabo xvi, 779; Jos, Ant, XIV, i, 4; XVII, iii, 2; BJ, I, vi, 2, etc). Their earlier history is shrouded in obscurity. Jerome, Quest in Gen 25 13, following the hint of Jos (Ant, I, xii, 4), ascerts they were identical with the Ishmaelites, tribe of Naboth, which is probable, though Nebaioth is spelled with β and Nabataeans with θ. They were apparently the first allies of the Assyrians in their invasions of Edom (cf Mal 1 1 ff). They were later subdued by Aretas IV (Sayce, New Light from the Ancient Monuments, I, 430), but before long regained their independence and resisted Ashurbanipal (Rawlinson, note, ad loc.). According to Alexander Polyhistor (Fr. 18), they were included in the Macedonian army by David. Their history is more detailed from 312 BC (Diod. Sic. xix), when Antigonus I (Cyclops) sent his general Aetheneus with a force against them in Petra. After an initial advantage, the army of Aetheneus was almost annihilated. Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, was sent against them a few years later, with little success, though he arranged a friendship with them. The first prince mentioned is Aretas I, to whom the high priest Jason fled in 109 BC. They were friendly to the early Macce- beeers in the anti-Hellenistic struggle, to Judas in 164 BC (1 Macc 5 25) and to Jonathan in 160 BC (9 35).

Toward the end of the 2nd cent. BC on the fall of the Ptolemaic and Seleucid Kings, but still back insulating the Nabataeans under King Eutromus fell in.

2. A Strong a strong kingdom extending E. of the Kingdom Jordan (in 110 BC). Conscious now of their own strength, they resented the ambition of the Hasmonian Dynasty—their former allies—and opposed Alexander Jannaeus (96 BC) at the siege of Gaza (Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 3). A few years later (90 BC) Alexander retaliated by attacking Obadas I, king of the Nabataeans, but suffered a severe defeat E. of the Jordan (Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 3, 4). Antiochus IV and Seleucus IV of Coele-Syria next led an expedition against the Nabataeans, but was defeated and slain in the battle of Kana (Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 1-2; BJ, I, iv, 7-8). Consequently, Aretas III seized Coele-Syria and Damascus and gained another victory over Alex- ander Jannaeus at Adida in 85 BC. The Naba- taeanas, led by Aretas (III ?), espoused the cause of Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, be-

3. Conflicts sieged the latter in Jerusalem and provoked a reference of the Romans, by whom under Scærus they were defeated (Jos, Ant, XIV, i, 4; BJ, I, vi, 2). After the capture of Jerusalem, Pompey attacked Aretas, but was satisfied with a payment (Jos, ib), and Damascus was added to Syria, though later it appears as a territory possessed into the hands of Antiochus (2 Cor 11 32). In 55 BC Gabinius led another force against the Naba-
Nabatites, nab’a-thi: AV=RV “Nabataeans.”

Naboth, nā’both, nā’bōth (נַבֹּהֵת, nāḇōḥēṯ, from נָבָה, nāḇāh, “a sprout”); Naboukh, Naboukhād (נָבוּקָח, Naboukhād): The owner of a vineyard contiguous to the palace of King Ahab. The king desired, by purchase or exchange, to add the vineyard to his own grounds. Naboth, however, refused to part on any terms with his paternal inheritance. This refusal made Ahab “heavy and displeased” (1 K 21:4). Jezebel, the king’s wife, took the matter into her own hand, and by false accusation on an irrelevant charge procured the death of Naboth by stoning (1 K 21:7–14). As Ahab was on his way to take possession of the vineyard he met Elijah the prophet, who denounced him for his vile act and pronounced judgment on him and his royal house. A temporary respite was given to Ahab because of a repentant mood (1 K 21:27–29); but later the blow fell, first upon himself in a conflict with Syria (1 K 22:34–40); then upon his house through a conspiracy of Jehu, in which Jehoram, Ahab’s son, and Jezebel, his wife, were slain (2 K 9:25–26:30 cf). In both cases the circumstances recalled the foul treatment of Naboth.

Nabuchodonosor, nāb-u-kō-don’ōsor (נָבוּעוֹדָכְנואָסֶר, Naboukodesher): LXX and Vulg form of “Nebuchadnezzar” (“Nebuchadrezzar”) found in AV of the Apoc in 1 Esd 1:40. 41:45.48; 2 10, 5 7; 6 26; Ad Est 11 14; Bar 9:11.12. It is the form used in AV of the Apoc thorough. RV of 4th and Tob 14:15, the form “Nebuchadnezzar” is given.

Nacho, nāk’on, THE THRASHING FLOOR OF (נַחוֹךְ, nāḵōḵ; AV Nachon): The place where Uzzah was smitten for putting forth his hand to steady the ark, hence called afterward “Perezuzzzah” (2 S 6:8); in the | passage (1 Ch 13:9) we have תַּחְו, ṭāḥōn, and in Jos (Ant., VII, iv, 2) Χαζαρ, Χαζαιπν. In 1 S 23:23 the word nakhōn occurs, and is tr of a certainty, m “with the certainty” or “to a set place”; also in 1 S 24:4 it is tr of a certainty, m “to a set place.” It is uncertain whether 1 S 6:1 is a place-name at all, and no successful attempt has been made to identify either Nacon or Chidon; possibly they are both personal names.

Nachor, nākōr (Naṣṣ̂ūr, Nachōr) AV; Gr form of “Nahor” (thus RV). Grandfather of Abraham (Lev 3:34).

Nadab, nā’dab (נַדָּב, nāḏāḇ; “noble”; Naṣṣ̂ūb, Nadob; Nabōb):

(1) Aaron’s first-born son (Ex 6:23; Nu 3:2; 26:60; 1 Ch 6:3 [Heb 6:29]; 24:1). He was permitted with Moses, Aaron, the 70 elders, and his brother Abihu to ascend Mt. Sinai and behold the God of Israel (Ex 24:1,9). He was associated with his father and brothers in the priestly office (Ex 28:1). Along with Abihu he was guilty of offering “strange fire,” and both “died before Yahweh” (Lev 10:1,2). However, the LXX interprets this latter verse: “This is the sentence pronounced upon them—this is the sentence pronounced against them, and their destruction has gone far from clear. The word rendered ‘strange’ seems in this connection to mean no more than ‘unauthorized by the Law’” (see ἔξω, ἐξω, in BDB, and of Ex 30:9). The proximity of the prohibition of the offering to officiating priests (Lev 10:9) has given rise to the erroneous suggestion of the Midr. that the offence of the brothers was drunkenness.

(2) A descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2:28,30).

(3) A Gibeonite (1 Ch 8:30).

(4) Son of Jeroboam I, after him for two years king of Israel (1 K 14:20; 15:23). While Nadab was investing Gibbethon, a Philistine stronghold, Baasha, who probably was an officer in the army, as throne-robbbers were usually, conspired against him, slew him and seized the throne (1 K 15:18–31). With the assassination of Nadab the dynasty of Jeroboam was extinguished, as foretold by the prophet Ahijah (1 K 14). This event is typical of the entire history of the Northern Kingdom, characterized by revolutions and counter-revolutions.

Nadabath, nā’dā-bath (Naṣṣ̂ūbāth, Nadabáth; AV Nadabatha, na-dab’a-tha): A city E. of the Jordan from which the wedding party of Jambri and Zerubael were coming; then Jonathan and Simon attacked them and slew very many, designing to avenge the murder of their brother John (1 Mac 9:37 ff). Nebo and Nadabatha have been suggested as identical with Nadabath. Clermont-Ganneau would read rhabatha, and identify it with Rabbath-ammon. There is no certainty.

Naggai, nag’āi, nag’ā’t (Naṣṣ̂ûy, Naggaï; AV Naggai, Naggai): In Lk 3:25, the Gr form of the Heb name Noah (q.v.).

Nahalal, nā’hal-al (נָהֲלָל, naḥalal; B, Bat-pa’ar, Bat-anon, A, Naṣṣ̂al, Na’alol, and other forms): A city in the territory of Zebulun assigned with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites, out of which the Canaanite inhabitants were not driven (Josh 19:15, AV [incorrectly] “Nahallal”; 21:35; Jgs 1:30, “Nabalol”). In the Talm. Jesus (Meg., i,1) it is identified with Mahlu. This name might correspond either with ‘Aṣa Māḥel, or with Māḥal. The former lies about 3½ miles N.E. of Nazareth on a hill near the eastern boundary of Zebulun. The latter is situated about 8½ miles W. of Nazareth, near the southern border of Zebulun. The change of n to m is not unusual. W. Ewing

NAHALIEL, na-ha‘l-él, na-ha‘l-el (נַ֣הַלֵ֥ל, nahal'el, "torrent valley of God"); B. Manah, Manah, A. Naaliful, Naalif. A place where Israel encamped on the way from Armon to Parnaim, named with Mattsamah and Bameith (Nu 21 19). Onom places it near to the Armon. It is natural to seek for this "torrent valley" in one of the tributaries of the Armon. It may be Wady Wadel, which drains a wide area to the N.E. of the Armon; or perhaps Wady Zerka Ma'ta to farther to the N.

NAHAM, na‘ham (נָ֣הַם, naham, "comfort"): A Judahite chieftain, father of Keilah the Garmite (1 Ch 4 19); the passage is obscure.

NAHAMANI, nâ-ha-mâ‘nî, na-ham'ânî (נַ֣הַמָּנִי, nahamâni, "compassionate"): One of the twelve heralds who prophesied with Nahum ( Neh 7 17). The name is wanting in the list (Ezr 2 2). In 1 Esd 5 8 he is called "Eneneus" (RVn "Enenius").

NAHARAI, nâ-hâr-î (נַ֣הָרֵי, naharay), NAHARI, nâ-hâr-î (נַ֣הָרֵי, naharay): One of David's heroes, Josiah's armor-bearer ( 2 S 23 37, AV "Nahari"); 1 Ch 11 39).

NAHASH, na‘hash (נָ֣הַשׁ, nahash, "serpent"); Na‘o, Na‘o. (1) The father of Abigail and Zeruiah, the sisters of David (2 S 17 25; cf 1 Ch 2 16). The text in 2 S, where this reference is made, is hopelessly corrupt; for that reason there are various explanations. The rabbis maintain that Nahash is another name for Jesse, David's father. Others think that Nahash was the name of Jesse's wife; but it is not probable that Nahash could have been the name of a woman. Others explain the passage by making Nahash the first husband of Jesse's wife, so that Abigail and Zeruiah were half-sisters to King David. (2) A king of Ammon, who, at the very beginning of Saul's reign, attacked Jabesh-gilead so successfully, that the inhabitants sued for peace at almost any cost, for they were willing to pay tribute and serve the Ammonites (1 S 11 1). The heathen king, not satisfied with tribute and slavery, demanded in addition that the right eye of every man should be put out, as "a reproach upon Israel." They were given seven days to comply with these cruel terms. Before the expiration of this time, Saul, the newly anointed king, appeared on the scene with an army which utterly routed the Ammonites (1 S 11 1 f), and, according to Jos, killed King Nahash (Ant, VI, v, 3).

If the Nahash of 2 S 10 2 be the same as the king mentioned in 1 S 11, this statement of Jos cannot be true, for he lived till the early part of David's reign, 40 or more years later. It is, of course, possible that Nahash the father of Hanan, was a son or grandson of the king defeated at Jabesh-gilead by Saul. There is but little agreement among commentators in regard to this matter. Some writers go so far as to claim that "all passages in which this name [Nahash] is found refer to the same individual.

(3) A resident of Rabbath-ammon, the capital of Ammon (2 S 17 27). Perhaps the same as Nahash (2), which see. His son Shobi, with other trans-Jordanian chieftains, welcomed David at Mahanaim with sympathy and substantial gifts when the old king was fleeing before his rebel son Absalom. Some believe that Shobi was a brother of Hanun, king of Ammon (2 S 10 1).

W. W. Davies

NAHATH, nâ-hath (נָ֣הַת, nahath): (1) A grandson of Eun (Gen 36 13; 1 Ch 1 37). (2) A descendant of Levi and ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6 26); also called "Toah" (1 Ch 6 34) and "Tohu" (1 S 1 1). (3) A Levite who, in the time of Hozekiah, assisted in the oversight of "the oblations and the tithes and the dedicated things" (2 Ch 31 13).

NAHBI, nâ‘bi (נָ֣בִי, nabhî; in the NT NAβΩΡ, Nachôr): The representative of Naphthali among the 12 spies (Nu 13 14).

NAHOR, nâ hor (נָ֣חוֹר, nahôr; in the NT NAξΩΡ, Nachôr): (1) Son of Serug and grandfather of Abraham (Gen 11 22-25; 1 Ch 1 26). (2) Son of Terah and brother of Abraham (Gen 11 20-27-29; 22 20-25; 24 15-24.47; 29 5; Josh 24 2). A city of Nahor is mentioned in Gen 24 10; the God of Nahor in Gen 31 53. In AV Josh 24 2; Lk 3 34, the name is spelled "Nacher."

NAHSHON, nâ‘shôn (נַ֣שְׁוֹן, naßhôn; LXX and NT Ναασπός, Naaspos): A descendant of Judah; brother-in-law of Aaron and ancestor of David and of Jesus Christ (Ex 6 23; Nu 1 7; 1 Ch 2 10.11; Ruth 4 20; Mt 1 4; Lk 3 32).

NAHUM, nâ‘hum (נָ֣هوּמ, Na‘um; AV Naum): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk's genealogy, the 9th before Joseph, the husband of Mary (Lk 3 25).

Universality of Jehovah's Rule 4. The Messianic Outlook LITERATURE I. Authorship and Date.—The name Nahum (נָ֣هوּם, na‘hum; LXX and NT Ναασπός, Naaspos; Jos, Naaspos) occurs nowhere else in the OT; in the NT it is found in Lk 3 25. It is not uncommon in the Mish, and it has been discovered in Phoen inscriptions. It means "consolation," or "consoler," and is therefore, in a sense, symbolical of the message of the book, which is intended to comfort the oppressed and afflicted people of Judah.

Of the personal life of Nahum, practically nothing is known. In Lk 1 1 he is called "the Elkoshite," that is, an inhabitant of Elkosh. Un fortunately, the location of this place and home is not known. One tradition, which cannot be traced beyond the 16th cent. AD, identifies the home of Nahum with a modern village Elkosh, or Abosh, not far from the left bank of the Tigris, two days' journey N. of the site of ancient Nineveh. A second tradition, which is at least as old as the days of Jerome, the latter part of the 4th cent., locate Elkosh in Gallite, at a place identified by many with the modern Elkazel, near Ramieh. Others identify the home of the prophet with Capernaum, the name of which means "Village of Nahum." A fourth tradition, which is first found in a collection of traditions entitled "Lives of the Prophets," says "Nahum was from Elkosh, beyond Bet Gabre, of the tribe of Simeon." A place in the S. is more in harmony with the interest the prophet takes in the Southern kingdom, so that the last-mentioned tradition seems to have more of its favor, but absolute certainty is not attainable.

The Book of Nahum centers around the fall and destruction of Nineveh. Since the capture of the city is represented as still in the future, no certain evidence that the prophecies were delivered some time before 607–606 BC, the year in which the city was destroyed. Thus the latest possible date of Nahum's activity is fixed. The earliest possible date also is indicated by internal evidence. In 3.8 the prophet speaks of the capture and destruction of Nineveh, as an accomplished fact. The expedition of Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, against Egypt, which resulted in the fall of Thebes, occurred about 663 BC. Hence the activity of Nahum must be placed somewhere between 663 and 607.

As to the exact period between the two dates there is disagreement among scholars. One thing is made quite clear by the prophecy itself, namely, that at the time the prophecies were written or written, Nineveh was passing through some grave crisis. Now we know that during the second half of the 7th cent. BC Assyria was threatened three times: (1) the revolt of Shamash-shumukin of Babylon against his brother, the king of Assyria, 660-655 BC; (2) the invasion of Assyria and threatened attack upon Nineveh by some unknown foe, perhaps the Scythians, about 625 BC; (3) the final attack, which resulted in the fall and destruction of Nineveh in 607–606 BC.

The first crisis does not offer a suitable occasion for Nahum's prophecy, because at that time the city of Nineveh was not in any danger. Little is known concerning the second crisis, and it is not possible either to prove or to disprove that it gave rise to the book. On the other hand, the years immediately preceding the downfall of Nineveh offer a most suitable occasion. The struggle continued for about 2 years. The united forces of the Chaldean and Babylonian met determined resistance; at last a breach was made in the northeast corner of the wall, the city was taken, pillaged and burned. Judah had suffered much from the proud Assyrian, and it is not difficult to understand how, with the breach open, the Chaldean prophet-patriot might burst into shouts of exultation and triumph over the distress of the cruel foe. "If," says A. B. Davidson, "the distress of Nineveh referred to were the final one, the descriptions of the prophecy would acquire a reality and naturalness which they otherwise want, and the general characteristics of Heb prophecy would be more truly conserved." There seems to be good reason, therefore, for assigning Nahum's activity to a date between 610 and 607 BC.

II. The Book.—Nahum is the prophet of Nineveh's doom. Ch. 1 (+2 2) contains the decree of Nineveh's destruction. Jeh is a God of vengeance and of mercy (vs 2–3); he has no need to impress upon the inhabitants, in punishing iniquity, He will surely punish the sinner. No one can stand before Him in the day of judgment (vs 4–6). Jeh, faithful to those who rely upon Him (ver 7), will be terrible toward His enemies and toward the enemies of His people (vs 8). Nahum, though, when the present, enemy is doomed (vs 9–14), will mean the exultation of Judah (1 15; 2 2). The army appointed to execute the decree—approaching, ready for battle (2 1–4). All efforts to save the city are in vain; it falls (vs 5–6), the queen and her attendants are captured (ver 7), the inhabitants flee (ver 8), the city is sacked and left a desolation (vs 9–13). The destruction of the bloody city is imminent (3 1–3); the fate is well deserved and no one will bewail her (vs 4–7); natural strength and resources will avail nothing (vs 8–11); the city will be utterly cut off (vs 12–18); the whole earth will rejoice over the downfall of the cruel oppressor (ver 19).

Opinions concerning the religious significance of the Book of Nahum are different. The prevalent point of view is that the prophecies of the ancient Hebrews were impressed with the intense force and picturesque elements of his language and style. "Each prophet," says Kirkpatrick, "has his special gift for his particular work. Nahum bears the palm for poetic power. His short book is a Pindaric ode of triumph over the oppressor's fall." So also A. Smith: "The language is strong and brilliant; his rhythm numbers and wil, laps and flashes, like the horsemen and chariots he describes."

Until recently no doubts were expressed concerning the integrity of the book, but within recent years there is considered to be some question as to whether the prophecies are Nahum's own. It is possible that he could have compiled his book from other sources; also there is the possibility that the bulk of Nahum's prophecy dates from a time later than the prophet himself. The second view is not supported by any evidence. Nahum is a Seer of a very early date, the result of the evidence of style and the subject-matter is in harmony with the date of Nahum.

3. Integrity. The preserved contents of the book is a solid whole, with no free interpolation by Nahum himself. It is possible that Nahum introduced a new verse here and there, but the question of interpolation is a very difficult one. It is not possible to say that Nahum's prophecies have ever been altered or added to.

The artificial character of acrostic poetry is generally supposed to point to a late date. Hence those who believe that ch 1 was originally an alphabetic poem consider it an exilic or post-exilic production, which was at a still later date prefixed to the genuine prophecies of Nahum. This view is based on the fact that the alphabet was not used at this time in Hebrew poetry. The latest alphabetic examples are the psalms 111, 119, and 150. In support of the view it is pointed out that the prophecy in ch 1 is vague, while the utterances in chs 2 and 3 are definite. This is taken as evidence that the prophecy was composed as a general introduction to the more specific denunciation in chs 2 and 3. A detailed examination shows that this is not the case; the attack on Nineveh is much more general in ch 1 than later on.

The early alphabetic character of the book is given in the context of the context of the poem; the poem is a late addition. The evidence of style and the subject-matter is in harmony with the date of Nahum.

The problem of the date of the book remains to be solved. It is possible that Nahum's prophecies have been preserved for a long period of time. The book is generally considered to be a late work, and the evidence of style and the subject-matter is in harmony with the date of Nahum.

Hence those who believe that ch 1 was originally an alphabetic poem consider it an exilic or post-exilic production, which was at a still later date prefixed to the genuine prophecies of Nahum. This view is based on the fact that the alphabet was not used at this time in Hebrew poetry. The latest alphabetic examples are the psalms 111, 119, and 150. In support of the view it is pointed out that the prophecy in ch 1 is vague, while the utterances in chs 2 and 3 are definite. This is taken as evidence that the prophecy was composed as a general introduction to the more specific denunciation in chs 2 and 3. A detailed examination shows that this is not the case; the attack on Nineveh is much more general in ch 1 than later on.

The early alphabetic character of the book is given in the context of the context of the poem; the poem is a late addition. The evidence of style and the subject-matter is in harmony with the date of Nahum.

The problem of the date of the book remains to be solved. It is possible that Nahum's prophecies have been preserved for a long period of time. The book is generally considered to be a late work, and the evidence of style and the subject-matter is in harmony with the date of Nahum.
The fierceness of Nahum, and his glee at the thought of Nineveh’s ruin, may not be in accord with the injunction, “Love thine enemy”; but it should be borne in mind that it is not personal hatred that prompts the prophet; he is stirred by a righteous indignation over the outrages committed by Assyria. He considers the sin and overthrow of Nineveh, not merely in their bearing upon the fortunes of Judah, but in their relation to the moral government of the whole world; hence his voice gives utterance to the outraged conscience of humanity.

While Nahum’s message, in its direct teaching, appears to be less spiritual and ethical than that of his predecessors, it sets in a clear light Jech’s sway over the whole universe, and emphasizes the duty of nations as well as of individuals to own their sway and obey His will. This attitude alone will assure permanent peace and prosperity; on the other hand, disobedience to His purpose and disregard of His rule will surely bring calamity and distress. The emphasis of these ethical principles gives to the message of Nahum a unique significance for the present day and generation. Assyria in his hands, says Driver, is “an object lesson to the empires of the modern world, teaching, as an eternal principle of the Divine government of the world, the absolute necessity, for a nation’s continued vitality, of that righteousness, personal, civic, and national, which alone wills a nation’s welfare.”

3. Universality of Jehovah’s Rule

4. The Messianic Outlook

The downfall of Nineveh and Assyria prepares the way for the permanent redemption and exaltation of Zion: “the wicked one shall no more pass through thee.”

NAIDUS, na-dus (A, Ναυδος, Νάιδος, B, Ναδος, Νανδος): One of those who had taken “strong walled Ecd 9 31, apparently = Be-nainh” of Ezr 10 30, of which it is probably a corruption or the latter part.

NAIL, nāl: (1) As denoting the finger-nail, the Heb word is נָּלָן, נָלָן, נָלָן (Dt 21 12), the captiv- woman “shall shave her head, and pare her nails.” The latter was probably intended to prevent her from marring her beauty by scratching her face, an act of self-mutilation oriental women are repeatedly reported to have committed in the agony of their grief. Aram. ܢܠܐ, ܢܠܐ, ܢܠܐ (Dan 3 33), “his nails like birds’ claws”, (2) As pin in peg (for tents, or driven through walls). Jgs 4 21 RV “tent-pin”; in Isa 22 23, “a nail in a sure place” is a peg firmly driven into the wall on which something is to be hung (ver 24); of Ecd 12 11, where the word is מָשָׁמְרָה, cognate with מָשָׁמְרָה below. (3) For nails of iron (1 Ch 22 2) and gold (2 Ch 3 9), and in Isa 41 7 and Jer 10 4, the word is מָשָׁמְרָה, מָשָׁמְרָּה. (4) In the NT the word is φλος, ἅλος, used of the nails in Christ’s hands (Jn 20 25), and “to nail” in Col 2 14 (“nailing it to the cross”) is πλαστεῖν, πλαστεῖν.

In a figurative sense the word is used of the hard and engraving tool: “the sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point (lit. “claw,” “nail”) of a diamond: it is graven upon the tablet of their heart, and upon the horns of your altars” (Jer 17 1).

NAIN, nā’n (Naín, Nain): This town is mentioned in Scripture only in connection with the visit of Jesus and the miracle of raising the widow’s son from the dead (Lk 7 11). The name persists to this day, and in the form of Nain, is found in villages on the northeastern slope of Jebel ed-Dubay (“Hill of Moreh”), the mountain which, since the Middle Ages, has been known as Little Hermon. The modern name of the mountain is derived from Nebi Dubay, and the village nearby is identified with the town. There are many ancient remains, proving that the place was once of considerable size. It was never inclosed by a wall, as some have thought from the mention of “the gate.” This was probably the opening between the houses by which the road entered the town. Tristram thought he had found traces of an ancient city wall, but this proved to be incorrect. The ancient town perhaps stood somewhat higher on the hill than the present village. In the time of the E. are many tombs of antiquity. The site commands a beautiful and extensive view across the plain to Carmel, over the Nazareth hills, and away past Tabor to where the white peak of Hermon glister in the sun. To the S. are the heights of the uplands of Samaria. The village, once prosperous, has fallen on evil days. It is said that the villagers received such good prices for sinamnet that they cultivated it on a large scale. A sudden drop in the price brought them to ruin, from which, after many years, they have not yet fully recovered.

NAIOTH, nā’yo-th, nī’th (נַּאוֹת, נֹאֹת; B, Ναοθ, Ναώθ, Ναωθ): This is the name given to a place in Ramah to which David went with Samuel when he fled and escaped from Saul (1 S 19 18, etc.). The term has often been taken as meaning “houses” or “habitations”; but this cannot be justified. There is no certainty as to exactly what the word signified. Clearly, however, it attached to a particular locality in Ramah; and whatever its etymological significance, it denoted a place where the prophets dwelt together. On approaching it in pursuit of David, Saul was overcome by the Spirit of God, and conducted himself like one “possessed,” giving rise to the proverb, “As Saul among the prophets?”

NAKED, nak’d, NAKEDNESS, nāk’d-nes: “Naked” in the OT represents various derivatives of נָּכָר, נָכָר, נָכָר, נָכָר, נָכָר, נָכָר, נָכָר (Gen 2 21, 25; Job 38 4, 7; Eccl 7 9; Isr 22 15, etc.), and hept in Jgs 4 21 RV, “tent-pin”; in Isa 22 23, “a nail in a sure place” is a peg firmly driven into the wall on which something is to be hung (ver 24); of Ecd 12 11, where the word is מָשָׁמְרָה, cognate with מָשָׁמְרָה below. For nails of iron (1 Ch 22 2) and gold (2 Ch 3 9), and in Isa 41 7 and Jer 10 4, the word is מָשָׁמְרָה, מָשָׁמְרָּ. In the NT the word is φλος, ἅλος, used of the nails in Christ’s hands (Jn 20 25), and “to nail” in Col 2 14 (“nailing it to the cross”) is πλαστεῖν, πλαστεῖν.

In a figurative sense the word is used of the hard and engraving tool: “the sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point (lit. “claw,” “nail”) of a diamond: it is graven upon the tablet of their heart, and upon the horns of your altars” (Jer 17 1).
NAME, nâm (בָּם, shôn; ἄτωμα, ónoma; Lat nomem [2 Esd 4:1]; vbi, ὀνόμα, ónoma; Lot nominum [2 Esd 5:26]): A name is that by which a person, place, or thing is marked and known. In Scripture, names were generally descriptive of the person, his position, of some circumstance affecting him, hope entertained concerning him, etc., so that "the name" often came to stand for the person. In Acts 1:15; Rev 3:4, ónoma stands for "person"; cf Nu 26:53, 55.

I. OT Word and Use.—The word for "name" in the OT is also the name of one of the sons of Noah. The etymology is uncertain.

1. General, although it may be from šāmâh (obs.), "to set a mark"; shôn is the Aram. form. For the name as descriptive of the person see Names. Besides designating persons, the name also stands for fame, renown, reputation, character gained or expressed, etc (Gen 6:4; 2 S 7:9, 23; etc.); it might be an "evil name" (Dt 22:14,19); the "name" is also equivalent to a "people" or "race" which must be "blotted out," i.e., destroyed (Dt 7:21; etc); to speak or write "in the name" signified authority (Ex 5:23; 1 K 21:8, etc.); to "call one's name" over a place or people indicated possession or ownership (2 S 12:28; Am 9:12, etc.); to act "in the name" was to represent (Dt 26:6); to be called or known by "name" indicated special individual notice (Ex 31:2; Isa 43:1; 46:3,4). Gen 2:19,20 even displays a conception of identity between the name and the thing denoted.

"To name" is sometimes ṣāmar, "to say" (1 S 16:3); doḇbar, "to speak" (Gen 23:16); nāḇab, "to mark out" (Nu 1:17); bāḏar, "to call" (Gen 48:16; Isa 61:6).

2. The Divine Name of God (for the various divine names and their significance see God, Names of). He revealed Himself to Israel through Moses in a new name (which was at the same time the name of the God of their fathers)—Jehovah (n.φ.), (Yahweh)—the nature of which should be shown by His manifestations on their behalf (Ex 3:13-16; 13:18). The name of God was therefore not a mere word, but the whole of the Divine manifestation, the character of God as revealed in His relations to His people and in His dealings with them (Ex 9:16; Joel 4:13; Jer 4:15). The "name of Jehovah" was promised to Moses on Mt. Sinai. "Jeh, Jehovah, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abundant in lovingkindness and truth" (Ex 34:6-7). The name Jehovah (so revealed) was (Ex 3:15) His "memorial name" (so, often, in ARV, see Memorial). He made Jehovah the "name" which was the "man of the Lord" (Ex 3:5). The name Jehovah is the equivalent of the name that Dt 6:4 was termed the "Shinema" (from shēm, "shar," the first word in ver 4), the first article of Israel's faith, taught to all the children, written on the tablets, and still recited as the first act in public and private worship by every adult Jew. Where Jehovah is said to record His name, or to put His name in a place (or person), some special Divine manifestation of His was signified that He was "in" that place, or person, or was to be "found" or "sacred to Him" (Ex 20:24; 1 K 8:16). His "name" was in the angel of His Presence (Ex 23:20); what He does is "for His great name sake" in order to exalt and vindicate His revealed character and covenant relations. Jehovah's great name is a designation of Things. He should do would be "for a name" (Isa 55:13); He would give His people a new name, "an everlasting name" (Isa 56:5); to be "called" by the name of Jehovah is "to be his people" (2 Ch 7:14; Isa 43:7); it implies "protection" etc (Isa 65:19; Jer 14:8); a "honor" and a "claim" upon the "name of Jehovah" as (Gen 21:33; 26:25; etc.); "to confess" His name, to "acknowledge" it (1 K 8:16); to act in, etc., "the name," was to love, trust, etc. Jehovah (Ps 5:17; 17). Very frequently, esp. in the Ps and prophecies of Isaiah, Joel, etc. "the name of God" is used for "God himself"; to forget his name was "to depart from him" (Gen 23:16; 24:7); to manifest, exhibit, declare, etc., (in His name signified Divine appointment, inspiration, authority (Jer 11:1; 14:15, etc.); we have "swearing by" or "in the name of Jehovah (D 6:13); to take His name in vain was to swear falsely (Ex 20:7; Lev 19:12; etc.): to "bless," to "curse" (K 2:24). In Lev 24:11, we have the case of one who "blasphemed the Name, and cursed," the penalty here was death by stoning (Lev 24:16).

In later Jewish usage (of Wsd 14:21) the sacred name Jehovah was not pronounced in reference to the Jews, the name, Jehovah ("my lord") being substituted for it (the vowels belonging to Jehovah were written with the consonants of the same name), hence the frequent term "the Lord" in AV, for which ARV substitutes "Jeh."
claiming them for Christ and as their acknowledgment of Him or of faith in Him—becoming his disciple; similarly, baptism into (the) name of the Father, and of the Holy Spirit, represents "dedication to" God as He has been revealed in Christ.

"In the name of" means "as representing" (or as being), e.g., "in the name of a prophet," of "a righteous man," or of "a disciple" (Mt 10:41-42); to receive a little child "in Christ's name," i.e. as belonging to Him, is to receive Himself (Mt 18:5; Mk 10:37; ver 41 to disciples, RV "because ye are Christ's") or "as flying," as "in Christ," as "in Christ" (Lk 9:48; cf Mt 18:20; Mk 13:6, "Many shall come in my name"); Lk 21:8).

The significance of the name of Jesus in relation to prayer deserves special notice. To pray in the name of Jesus means to ask anything in His name; to ask in the name of Jesus, is to receive that for which it is asked.

2. In His name, according to His promises, to pray "whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, shall be done to you." (Jn 16:24, is merely to add to our prayers (as is so often unhindingly done): "we ask all in the name of Jesus," or "through Jesus Christ our Lord," etc., but to pray or ask as His representative, as His vicar, as His mouth and standard, in His spirit and with His aim; it implies union with Christ and abiding in Him, in us and in us. In the name of the phrase, as "being one with me even as I am revealed to you." Its two correlative are: (Jn 14:16; 14:20; Lk 12:33; cf 1 Jn 5:20), and the Pauline "in Christ" (Westcott, The Gospel according to St. John).

C. Lengthening of the Name: God is a name which not only exhibits the common archaism in the retention of the vowel i, but the name Eliahm also shows the characteristic lengthening of the second vowel in the form, so common in the name. The forms Eliphlet, Eliphelet, Eliphelet, Eliphelet, Elipheletelet, Elipheap, etc., meaning "God is deliverance." these varieties represent the vowels of the Hebrew, the vowels: and the vowel sh, and the vowel sh. In the beam the first long vowel is retained by a secondary accept, marked by methyq; kathayh and yeshayh, etc., Jephthah. Deuah shows the customary apocope of the imperfect of Lamedheh vbs.; the names of Persian origin, and a form of names, and not thus in these vbs. with a following element. The short vowel in the prefixed final closed syllable, or the final consonant is elided, if the final consonant is permitted to begin the syllable of the next element of the name, as Jearel, Egekezeh, Jearel, Egekelel, Egekel, Egekel, Egekel, etc. (see form of these names); but it is not elided in Ishmael, although the last consonant is attached to the last syllable, and elision is avoided, as in Jiphthah-el, by keeping the ultimate and penultimate syllables distinct. Deuah, a Hebrew imperfect, is formed by lengthening the vowel in the accentual final syllable, when the vb. is used as a personal name.

2. Vocalization

(1) A common noun used as a name undergoes a type of pronunciation due to the custom of lengthening a short vowel in praise and to the laws which control the pronunciation of consonants, liquids, and palatals. Thus the name Perez, "breach," which appears also as second person in AV of the OT, occurs in the Heb text in the four forms peres, pares, phares and pharse (Ruth 4:18; Neh 11:4-6). (2) In a name consisting of a phrase the normal advancement of the accent as usual causes the loss of a prothetic vowel, as is indicated by the suspended letter in Judah, "beloved of Jehovah," or Jeophthah, "he openeth." Occasionally the predicate contains an object of the vb., as Shecaliel, "I have asked God" (Ex 3 2), or a prepositional phrase, as Hephzibah, "my delight is in her" (2 K 1 1). The sentence-name is usually a declaration, but may be an exhortation or a prayer, as Jerubbab, "let Baal strive," and Hoshea, "sawel!" (Nu 13 16), or it may be a question, as Micahah, "who is like Jehovah?" All of the foregoing illustrations have been taken from the Books of Jgs and S, unless otherwise noted.

The proper name is treated as one word, whether on analysis it consists of a single word, a phrase, or a sentence; and as such it is subject to the laws of accent and conjugation, as well as to the Heb word. When the name was a sentence in Heb, its constituent parts could be transposed without changing the meaning. Thus the father of Bathsheba was called Ammiel, "a sitter in the Chaim is God," and Elum, "God is Constituent" (2 Chr 21:15; 1 Ch 5:9; 1 Ch 3:9).

Parts and similarly, in letters written from Pal to the king of Egypt in the 14th cent. BC, Hiimalki is also called Mikkili, the name in either form signifying "God is king." The name of Jehoschiah, king of Judah, is called Kassida as well as Jehoshah (2 K 24:1; 26:1), a legitimate transposition of the vb. and subject, and meaning in each case, "Jeh hath held hold." Not only did transposition take place, but the substitution of a cognate root and even the use of a different part of the vb. also occurred. Thus King Jehoshachin (2 K 24:6; Jer 52:31) was known also as Jeconiah (Jer 24:1; 28:4) and Coniah (22:24; 29:37). The two names Jehoschichon and Coniah have exactly the same meaning. The Divine name which begins Jehoschichon is transferred to the end in Coniah and Coniah; and the Hiipil imperfect of the vb. ka'n, which is seen in Jehoschichon, has been replaced by the Qal imperfect of the vb. kis'ah, Coniah, and by the construct infinitive of the same species in Coniah. Parallel cases occur in Assyri and Bab lit., among which the form corresponding to Coniah is: 1. Kish-shashu, and Zimmah-nadin-shum, exhibit both the transposition of constituent parts and an interchange of prototome and participle.

Twin forms like Abiner and Abner, Absalith and Absalom, Elizaphan and Eliphasan, are not the full name and its abbreviation by 4. Methods of syncopation, but are merely two of the abbreviations of a variant, equally legitimate, modes of viation combining the constituent parts. The common methods of shortening were: (1) contraction by the rejection of a weak consonant or omission of a final unaccented vowel, notably in the Divine title of Jehovah, and for the Divine messenger, yah dh and yah, at the beginning and ending of proper names: hence Jehovah became Josiah (2 K 12:1), and Amaziah became Amaziah (2 K 14:1; 1 Heb text, and S); (2) abbreviation of composite geographical names by the omission of the generic noun or its equivalent: Jerusalem, which to the Hebrews meant "foundation of peace," was shortened to Salem, "peace" (Ps 76:2); Kirjath-baal, "city of Baal" (2 K 15:6); Baal or Baasha (Josh 18:10; cf. 2 S 8:6), Bezech-baal, "house of Baal"; of Asphalt, to Asharoth; Beth-leboth, "house of sioness," to Lebooth; Beth-azmaveth to Azmavoth; Beth-rehab to Rehob; Beth-banot to Banoth; Beth-shan to Shanotte; and Beth-shemesh to Shemesh, all of which names were in the same custom existed among the Mosobites who spoke this town indifferently as Beth-shemesh and Beth-par (M S, I. 27; with Nu 21:19); Beth-baal-meshon to Baal-mesopot, etc. (M, S, II, 17), and the same custom existed among the Mosobites who spoke this town indifferently as Beth-baal-meshon and Baal-meshon (M, S, II, 9, 30); (3) abbreviation by the omission of the Divine name: thus the name of the idolater Micahah, which means, "who is like Jehovah?" (Jgs 17:14 [Heb]), was shortened to Micah, "who is like?" (vs 58); and similarly in the case of three other men, namely the prophet (Micah, Jer 26:18 ERV, and Micah, Mic 1:1), the Levite musician, and with 11:26, and the father of Abdon (2 K 22:22 with 2 Ch 34:20).

The king of Judah, Yahuhaaz, as he was known to the Assyrians, i.e. Jehoahaz, "Jeh hath hold laid hold," is called simply Abinahaz: "the thing that God hath done." The town of Jahneel, "God doth cause to be built," was shortened to Jahneel, "he doth cause to be built." (Josh 15:11; 21:16; 1 Mes 4:15). Jabez, "deliverer of the face of God," was curtailed to Palit, "deliverance." "Jehovah-tsiyah, "Jehovah holds," to Aid (2 Ch 30:1, with 2 K 18:23), and Banicked, "high places of Baal," to Banoth (Josh 13:17 with Nu 21:19). Ab had not a few other similar names which probably represent curtailment of this sort. The omission of the Divine title has parallels in Assyri and Bab lit., such as Nabonid-azi and Nabonidu-nahlum-uni were called Nadunnu and Shutum-uni respectively (Dynastic Tablet no. 2; col. iv, 4, S, with Bab Chron., col. 1, 10).

(1) Abbreviation by the elision of the initial consonant, yet so that the remainder is a synonymous name of complete grammatical form. The name of King Hezekiah was written by the Hebrews both yeqheni and chayyiqheni, and lkezih, which means, "Jeh is strength." The name was shortened many times in 2 Ch 29:23. Similarly, Jeconiah was shortened to Coniah, as has already been noticed, the name of the town Jekabzeel, "God bringeth together," to Abhore. (2) Gath, "God is together" (Neh 11:25 with Josh 15:21; 2 S 23:20), Meshelemiah, "Jeh is compensating," to Shelemiah, Jebs's compensating," to Shelumiel, "Jeh is compensating." (1 Ch 26:12 with ver 14). Meshullam, "compensated," to Shallum, "compensated." (1 Ch 9:11; Neh 11:1 with 1 Ch 6:12; Ezr 7:2).

II. The Range of Proper Names.—(1) Not exclusively descriptive.—Simonis in his Onomasticum, published in 1741, and Gesenius in his

1. Personal Thesaurus, issued during the years 1835 to 1853, endeavored to interpret the proper names as though they were ordinarily intended to characterize the person who bore them. Embarrassed by the theory, Gesenius took Malechi by "rex Dei, h. e. a Deo constitutus," and the name Kiriath-baal, "city of Baal," by "aazulium, i.e. auxiliaria salus regi patri praestitit." Amazjzabad was rendered by Gesenius "famulus largitoris, h. e. Jehovea," and by Simonis "populium (i.e. copiosissimam liberorum turbam) donavit." Gesenius translated Gedaliah, "quem Jehova educavit vel roboravit," Zerahiah, "qui Jehova ortum dedit," Jehozadak, "quem Jehova justus fecit," and Joel, "qui Jehova est Deus, i.e. cultor Jehovea." But Simonis rendered Joel by "Jehova (est) Deus . . . vel (cui) Jehovae Deus." Now Malachi means God's king, Malechi-sha, "the king, i.e. God is salvation" (cf Joshua). Amazjzabad, "the Kinsman hath endowed," Gedaliah "Jeh is great," Zerahiah, "Jeh hath risen in splendor," Jehozadak, "Jeh is righteous," and Joel, a compound name, "Jeh is God." A moment's reflection makes clear that these names do not describe the persons who bear them, but in every case speak of God. They emphasize the important facts that personal names might be, and oftentimes were, historical and doctrinal, and that personal names were a part of the ordinary speech of the people, full of meaning and intelligible to all, subject to the phonic laws of the Hebrews, and obedient to the rules of grammar.

(2) Drawn from a wide field.—Parents named their children, and contemporaries dubbed people, from physical and spiritual traits, whether a beauty or a blemish; thus Robni, "pertaining to the fist," Japhia, "gleaning," Ikkeveh, "pervasive," Ira, "watchful," Gareh, "rough-skinned," and Hiddai, "joyful." Children were called by the names of natural objects, as Peninnah, "coral," Rimmon, "pomegranate," Tamar, "palm tree," Nahash, "serpent," Edna, "heller," Aish, "bird of prey," and Laish, "lion," or after kinsfolk or remoter members of the clan, as Absalom, "father's beautiful sister," and as the parent Phinehas took his strange name from the noted Phinehas, who belonged to the same father's house in earlier days. Or the name given to the child furnished a memorial of events in the national history, like Ichabod, "the glory is not" (1 S 4:21), and probably Obed-edom, "Edom is serving" (I S 14:47; 21:7); or it told of circumstances attending the child's birth, as Saul, "asked," and Joab, "asked," and Simonis in his Malechah, "who?'s embodied an article of the parent's creed, as Joab and Abijah, "Jeh is a father," Joel, "Jeh is God"; or it expressed a hope concerning the child or bore witness to a prophecy, as Jelidiah, "beloved of Jeh," and Solomon, "peaceable." (2 S 12:35; 1 Ch
22) Sometimes the name of the tribe or race to which a man belonged became his popular designation, as Cushi, "Cushite." All of these examples have been cited from the records of one period of Israel's history, the times of Samuel and David.

2. The covenant relation with God, which Jeh entered into with Israel, made the name Jehovah, and that aspect of God's character which is denoted by this name, peculiarly precious to the people of God, and thenceforth the word Jehovah became a favorite element in the names of the Israelites. It is, of course, to the exclusion of the great name El, "God." (c) Among the kings in the line of David, the consciousness of their formal adoption by Jeh to be His viceroy on the throne of Israel (2 Sam 7:14) found expression in the royal names that by the God of Israel, was acknowledged in the personal name Abijah, borne by the son and successor of Rehoboam. But his was an isolated case, unless the name Asa is an abbreviated form. But with Jehoshaphat Abijah grew in importance. in the 9th cent., the custom became established. Henceforth it was conventional for the king of Judah to have for his name a sentence with Jeh as its subject. The only exceptions among the 16 successors of Asa on the throne were Manasseh and his son Amon, both of whom were notoriously apostate from Jeh. The full name of Ahaz was Jehoahaz. Josiah's son Shallum as king was known as Jehoahaz; and his brother Eliakim, when placed on the throne by Ahaz, took the name Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:30). (d) Akin to the influence exerted by the relation of the kings to the God of Israel, and manifesting almost equal power contemporaneously with it, was the influence of official connection with the sacredness of priestly office and the ever present hope that it served. It is evident that it was not confined to the kings, and it frequently led to the choice of an ecclesiastical name containing the word God or Jeh. During the five centuries and a half, beginning near the close of Solomon's reign and extending to the end of Nehemiah's administration, 22 high priests held office, so far as their names have been preserved in the records. Of these pontiffs 17 bear names which are sentences with Jeh as subject, and another is a sentence with El as subject. The materials for investigation of this latter class are complete, as they are in the case of the kings, and ratios derived from them are apt to be erroneous; but evidently the priests of Jeh's temple at Jerusalem not only recognized the appropriateness for themselves and their families of names possessing a general religious character, but came to favor such as expressly mentioned God, esp. those which mentioned God by His name of Jehovah.

4. Popularity of names: hard to determine.—Until abundant data come to light for all periods of society it is impossible to determine the relative popularity of the various kinds and types of names in any one generation, or to compare period with period with respect to the use or neglect of a particular class of names. For, first, in no period are the names which have been transmitted by the Heb records many as compared with the thousands in use at the time; and, secondly, the records deal with the historical event which was conspicuous at the moment, and rarely mention persons other than the actors in this event.

At one time men and women from the middle class of society are acquiring themselves the names of certain persons, and the personal names current in the families of farmers, shopkeepers, and soldiers obtained a place in the religious history of another time, when the activities of the court are of paramount importance, It is mainly names that were current in official circles which are recorded. in other periods, when the records do not reach the earlier periods of the national worship, we may often find the name of a soldier or a farmer in the written form of the name of a soldier or a farmer.

Very few names outside of the particular circle concerned are preserved in the records. It is unwaranted, therefore, to draw inferences regarding the relative use of particular names, secular names, for instance, at different periods of the history of Israel, by comparing the number of these names found in a record of official upheavals in the army with the number of similar names in the narrative of an episode which occurred at a later date and in which only priests took part. It is comparing things that differ. It is comparing the number of certain names current in mingled circles with the number of the same names among ecclesiastics, in order to learn whether these names were less common among the people as a whole in the one period than in another.

The brine of its waters led the ancient Hebrews to call the Dead Sea the Salt Sea. Bethsaida was "house of mercy," received its name from the belief in the healing virtue of its waters; Lebanon, "white," from the appearance of its snow-topped peaks; Sidon on the Mediterranean Sea and Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee, from their fisheries; Tyre, from the great rock in the sea on which it was built; the valley of Elah, from the terebinth tree; Lus, from the almond tree; and from the acacia groves of the eastern terrace of the Jordan valley; and Jericho, from the fragrance of its palms and balsams. The "erage of the wild goats" and En-gedi, "kid spring" (1 S 24:12), were in a deo-late, rocky region where the wild goats had their home; Aijalon signifies "place of harts," and Etam denotes a "place of beasts and birds of prey." The hopes of a people and pride in their town were expressed in names like Joppa, "beauty," Tirzah, "pleasance," and Ramah, "peace," and, the "silence," and Salem, "peace." The resemblance of the Sea of Galilee in shape to a harp secured for it its ancient name of Chinnereth. Poetic imagination saw in majestic Mt. Hermon likeness to a soldier's breastplate fortified, and the sea was called Serion and Senir. The sanctuary of a deity might give name to a town, hence Beth-dagon, Beth-shean, and Ashhtaroth. Sometimes the name of a place commemorated a victory, as rock Oreb, rock Zeboiim, and Eden-azer (Jgs 7:25; 1 S 7:12); or enshrined a religious transaction or experience, Beth-el and Berachah (Gen 28:17-19; 2 Ch 20:26); or told of a migration, as when colonists gave the name of their native town to their new settlement (Jgs 1:23-28); sometimes the name of a river or stream, of other famous inhabitant became attached to a town, and that for various reasons. It was often necessary to distinguish places of the same name from each other by this method; thus certain of the towns called Gibeah, Gibeah-samuel, Gibeah-gideon, and Gibeah-sparshieus. The Jehovah stronghold captured by David was named by him the city of David, and was known by this name, as a quarter of Jerusalem, for many generations (2 S 5:9; 2 K 15:20). The practice was common among the various names of towns contemporaries of Israel as it is to this day. Dar-shararoun, "Sargonsburg," and Kar-shalmanashardi, "Shalmaneser's fortress." A town might also be named after the tribe which inhabited it or after the ancestor of the tribe, as Dan (Jgs 18:29), and possibly under not a few geographical designations a tribal name is hidden, even when the fact has escaped the notice of the geographer. The names of the tribes under discussion, in the absence of the historical form of the name. In an inquiry after the origin of a geographical designation the first consideration is due to the cause known to be ordinarily at work in giving rise to names of the same aspect as the one under scrutiny; and only when they fail to yield a suitable explanation are less obvious causes worthy of serious attention.

III. Characteristics of Biblical References.—As a rule, Sem words clearly reveal their origin and etymology. The problem might, indeed, with rare exceptions be successfully solved if the text would lend itself to accurate transcription; but the letter w in the midst of the name Samuel would itself prevent the Semite from imagining such an etymology. The derivation and meaning of Samuel were not obscure. The name was common, and was especially connected with the peculiar idea of "face of God." (Gen. 32:30). Samuel means "name of God." (Gesenius). As Jacob, upon his return from Padan-aram, in fulfillment of his vow erected an altar at Beth-el as a memorial of God’s bestowment of the promise made and the protection conceded, "The God of Beth-el" (Gen. 35:1-3.7), so Hannah having by vow dedicated to Jeh the son for whose birth she was praying, now that her prayer has been answered and the son given, calls him "Jeh Shalom"; the narrator states the motive which led the mother to choose the name Samuel for her child. In this explanation no part of the name is used. Moreover, the slight assent between just and Shalom and sh’alim in 1 S. 1:20 was unsought, for these words were later interpolated in the LXX, and the emphasis is placed on the giving of the child. The history of the discussion concerning this name shows how far astray criticism has been led by the false theory that the purpose of the narrator was to analyze the names and declare their meaning.

Reuben affords evidence to the same effect. The name was known to the early Hebrews in this form exclusively. It is spelt by them not as R’abehn but as Reuben (Gen. 29:32; 50:14; Jps 5:15.16), by the LXX, by the Gr tr (A and B and Lucian), by the Tgs, and by the MS Heb. (Rev 17). Yet in the 1st cent. Jos. added name, which later termination, wrote Reubelos; and later the Syr version has the name Ruhbél and the Arabic version as Rúbel and Sibél. The late variations are reasonably explained as a softening of the pronunciation, which had come into vogue in the household of Rehoboam. In speaking particularly regarding Reuben, the liquids š and l sometimes interchanged, giving rise to two forms in a word in the same language or in kindred languages (Gesenius, Thesaurus, 727; Wright, Comp. Grammar, 67; Zimmermann, Vergleichende Grammatik, § 117). Notwithstanding the evidence furnished by the literature, the name is given to Reuel as the original form by which the "the only plausible explanation of the etymology," given in Gen. 29:32 is "It is based on the form R’abehn—R’ahb’al (Gesenius, Jps 386). An exhibition of the etymology was needless, however, and was not the end which the writer had in view. His purpose was to explain the etymology of the particular name upon the child; and in stating it he does not deal with the meaning of the word but with the meaning of the name Reuben. The name signifies either "vision of a son" or "eye of gold, y’al a son." In either case the emphatic word is "son." As Hannah, loaded with the burden of her barrenness, besought God to look upon her affliction and bestow a child which should be able to return to the name of the child. In the words of verse 27, the answer was given, "If the Lord will provide me a child." Good or bad, y’al a son. A male child was to be her proof of God’s regard for her marriage and a guaranty of the future love of her husband for her. Moreover, the name kept the thought constantly before the mind of her husband. Gesenius remarks that such names mean properly, ‘See how God has been good to me’ but the sacred writer in Gen. 32:32 explains it as for rabb’al (rab’hal). 'provided in my affliction' (Leroyen, Thesaurus). This was a serious piece of criticism may be regarded as an example of the reduction ad absurdum of the hypothesis that the Hebrew writers intended to give the derivation of the origin of the proper names. The result of endeavoring to force the derivation of one etymology into an intentional etymology compels the assumption that the Hebrew writer misunderstood some of the simplest phrases of his own language and proposed a construction impossible of itself and utterly foreign to the principles which underlie Hebrew speech.

Allusions to proper names are made for the purpose of stating the reason for the bestowal of the name, of pointing out a coincidence between the name and the character and name of the person. These are among the most technical and difficult problems connected with the study of the Bible. Names are variously connected with the experience of its bearer, or of attaching to the name an idea, or of linking the allusion with the name by employing the root that underlies the name, or a cognate root, or some other word that resembles the name in sound: (1) Statement of the reason for the choice of the name: In the case of Simeon, the root of the name is used (Gen 29 33). Words of this type are called 'Hebrewized' from nouns and vbs., and have the force of adjs., dimin-utives, or abstract nouns, and are sometimes used as concrete nouns (Stade, Lehrbuch der hebräischen Grammatik, § 296). The Israelites at once recognized the meaning of a form, for instance the name Simeon, which was a favorite with the Hebrews, and he knew that it could express the abstract idea of hearing. In Gen 29 33 the narrator is not seeking to impart etymological information; but it is clear that he includes the name within the reason for the choice of this particular name for Leah's second son: "[Leah] said, Because Jeh hath heard that I am hated, he hath therefore given me this son also; and she called his name Simeon." The root of the name is used as a vb. in the statement of the motive. It was conventional and natural to do so, since the vb. shama' was the proper word to express the idea and was one of the most common words in the language. There would be no reason to suppose that identity with the root of the name would indicate that the reason given by the narrator in the case of the other sons of Jacob to maintain a similar correspondence. Accordingly, that form of paronomasia is employed where a word is used that is one with the name in derivation, but differs in form and grammatically is a different part of speech.

In the case of Cain a cognate root is used. The name is a segolate noun from the root kân, which means "to form," and then specifically to form at the ear. This form may actually be the root noun and denote formation, or a concrete noun denoting a forged weapon, or the agent in the work, namely a smith. In stating the reason for giving this name to the child, it was not feasible to use the vb. kân, because of the technical meaning which had become attached to it. To avoid misunderstanding the cognate vb. kânâth is employed, which has radically the same significance, but is without the technical implications (Gen 4 1). The result is that kind of paronomasia which exists when the sound and cognate origin, but difference of meaning.

In the case of Noah a root unrelated to the name in origin, but containing a similar sound, is used. The Bib. name Noah is derived from Noah the son of Shem. The root shem is the transpersonation of a foreign word or is its tr into Heb; he merely declares that as given it expressed the father's high opinion of him because he saved his life from the ancient curse upon the ground. If the name is Heb., its root may be observed. At any rate it promptly suggested to the ear of the Hebrew the idea of rest. But the vb. nish is used in Heb., as is the corresponding vb. "rest" in Eng., to express the two ideas of relief and cessation. Lamech did not mean that his son would cause men to cease from work; but that he would secure for them complete relief from toil due to God's curse on account of sin (Gen 5 29, with a reference to 3 17-19). The writer does not use the ambiguous word.
To avoid ambiguity, yet with a view to preserving assistance with Noah, he employs the vb. shemâ, which has as one of its meanings the sense of comfort or relief.

(2) The indication of a coincidence between the character or experience of a person and his name; not returning to her home bereaved and in poverty, saw the contrast between her present condition and her name; and she played upon her name by using a word of opposite meaning, saying:
"Call me not Pleasant, call me Sadder; for the Lord hath made me very bitterly with me" (Ruth 1 20). In whatever sense Nabal's name may have been bestowed upon him originally, at any rate his wife saw the correspondence between his name in its ordinary meaning and his conduct toward David, and she played upon it, saying: 'Fool is his name, and folly is with him' (1 S 25 25). Likewise the agreement between Jacob's character and a meaning that his name has in Heb was seen, and called forth the bitter word-play: 'Is he not rightly named Heifer? for he is a herd of seven years; and these two times' (Gen 27 36). Isaac, so far as the formation is concerned, may be an abstract noun meaning "laughter," or a concrete noun, "laughing one," or a vb., in the imperfect, "he laughs" or "one that laughs" (cf. in the name Shams, "sun") (Stade, hebraischen Grammatik, § 295a). Whichever specific meaning may have been in the mind of Abraham when he gave the name to his son, yet by reason of its ever speaking of laughter the name was a constant reminder to the parents of the laughter of unfuss with which they had listened to the promise of his birth (Gen 17 17; 18 12). But in due time the child of promise has been born. His name, as determined upon, is Isaac, This Sarah knows (17 19; 21 3).
Accordingly, the theme with which she greets his advent is laid in her mouth. She plays upon the name Isaac, using the root of the word in various forms, first as a noun and then as a vb., and giving to the vb. a new subject and to the thought a new turn. Instead of laughter, unfuss, with which the promise was signed, "smile," she says, "I havepreparad for me laughter [of joy], everyone that heareth [of the event] will laugh [with joy] for me" (21 6; cf Ps 136 2).

(3) Attachment of a prophecy to a name. Paronomasia in this form is used for this purpose.
A meaning of the name, or a sound heard in it, or a contrast suggested by it may be played upon. In these several ways the prophet Micah plays upon successive names in one paragraph (Mic 1 10-18).
In answer to the question whether a promise is given concerning the lad, which is introduced by a play upon his name: "As for the boy [named] "God heareth," I have heard thee" (Gen
17 18-20). To Gad a prophecy is attached in Gen 49 19. Two cognate roots are employed: godhâkh, which underlies the word rendered troop or marauding band, and gâdâd, which means "to pass." In the use not only of the root of the name Gad, but of a different root also that is similar in sound, it is evident that the purpose is simply to play upon the name. The brief oracle is uttered almost exclusively by means of variations in the vocalization of the two roots, producing one of the most successful word-plays in Hebrew literature.

Juda is a noun corresponding to the Hophal imperfect, and means "bearing burdens," "offering praise." In bestowing this name upon her child the mother signifies that she will bear with struggle after she said: "Now will I praise Jeh." (Gen 29 35). In Gen 49 8 a prophecy is spoken concerning Judah. The same etymology and meaning are recognized as before, but the application is different. The birth of Judah had made God an object of praise, the great deeds of the tribe of Judah were destined to make that tribe an object of praise. To quote the oracle: "Object of praise," declares the Lord to His brother praise. In this difference of reference and in the repetition of the significant word constitutes the play upon the name.

Dan is played upon in much the same way. The name may be a participle, used as a noun, and be rendered judgment's"; but it is probably related to that numerous class in which the names are vbs. in the perfect, and signifies, "he hath judged." His adoptive mother had called his name Dan, because God had heard her complaint and decided the cause in her favor (Gen 30 6).
In attacking the prophecy the name is played upon by changing the subject and, in order to refer to the future, by substituting the imperfect for the perfect of the vb.: "He hath judged," shall judge the tribes of Israel" (Gen 49 16). See also God, Names of;

NANAA, na-na'a (Naval, Nano; AV Nanea): A female deity worshipped by the Assyrians, Babylonians and Persians and other Asiatic peoples, the Nana or Nanae of the Babylonians, as the "lady of the Babylon." The name means "the undied," and probably represented originally the productive powers of Nature (genetrix), and as such was the companion of the sun-god. She was identified with Ishtar in Assyria and Ashorth in Phoenicia by the Greeks as Aphrodite (Clem. Alex. Prodr., 19), but sometimes as Artemis the huntress (Paus. iii.16.8; Plut. Artax. xxvii). Strabo (xv. 733) identifies her with Anaitis (= Anahita), the Asian Artemis. She was the Venus, but sometimes the Diana, of the Romans. There are many variants of the name: Anaie (Strabo xvi.738), Aneisita (Plut. Artax. xxvii), Tanaia (Clem. Alex. loc. cit.), also Tanath, sometimes in Phoen inscriptions, Tanata, Anta (Egypt). In 2 Mac 1 13 ff, a fictitious account is given of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, in a temple of Nanaea in Persia, by the treachery of Nanaea's priests. The public treasury was often placed in Nanaea's temple; this, Epiphanes was anxious to secure under the pretext of marrying the goddess and receiving the money as a dowry. The priests threw down her real site, she "like thunderbolts" from above, killed the king and his suite and then cut off their heads. But 1 Mac 6 1 ff, which is more reliable, gives a different account of the death of Epiphanes after an attempt to rob a rich temple in Elymais. In the account of 2 Mac 1 13 ff must be more leged, as far as Epiphanes is concerned, but may have been suggested or colored by the story of the death of Antiochus the Great, who met his death while plundering a temple of Belus near Elymais (Strabo xvi.118; Diod. Sic. 573; Justin, xxiii.2). The temple of Nanaea referred to in 2 Mac 1 13 ff may be identified with that of Artemis (Polyb. xxxi.11; Jos, Ant. XII, ix, 1) or Aphrodite (Appian, Syr. 66; Rawlinson, Speaker's Comm.).

NAOMI, nā'ō-mī, nā'-ō-mī, nā'-ō-mī (נָּאֹמִי), no'omi, probably = "pleasantness"; LXX B, Ναο-μέι, Νοημέλην, A, Νοημέλην[u], Νοημελήν[n]: Wife of Elimelech and mother-in-law of Ruth (Ruth 1 2—4 17). She went with her husband to the land of Moab, and after his death returned to Bethlehem. When greeted on her return, she told the women of the town to call her, not no'omi ("pleasantness"), but nārāh ("bitterness"), "for," she said, "the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me." She advised Ruth in her dealings with Boaz, and assured her childless her child. The name may mean "my joy," "my bliss," but is perhaps better explained according to the traditional interpretation as "the pleasant one."

II. Tribe of Naphtali.—When the first census was taken in the wilderness, the tribe numbered 53,400 fighting men (Nu 1 43; 2 30).

1. Relative
2. Distribution
3. According to the Pseudojon, the people of the tribe in the desert was on the N. of the tabernacle with the standard of the camp of Dan, along with the tribe of Asher (Nu 2 25 ff). The standard, according to Jewish tradition, was a serpent, or basilisk, as the "legend, "Return of Jehovah to the many thousands of Israel" (Tg Pseudojon on Nu 2 25). When the host was on the march, this camp came in the rear (Nu 2 31). The prince of the tribe at Sinai was Ahira ben Enan (2 29).

Among the spies the tribe was represented by Nahbi ben Vophsi (13 14). Prince Pedahel ben Amniah was chosen from N., to assist in the division of the land (34 28). Toward the end of David's reign the ruler of the tribe was Jeromoth ben Aziel (1 Ch 27 19). Hiram the Tyrian artificer is described as the "son of a widow of the tribe of N." (1 K 7 14). But in 2 Ch 2 14 he is called the "son of a woman of the daughters of Dan." Jgs 6 15 does not definitely associate Barak with the tribe of Issachar; his residence was at Kedesh (Jgs 4 6); it is therefore possible that he belonged to the tribe of N.

In the allocation of the land, the lot of N. was the last but one to be drawn (Josh 19 32—39). The 3 boundaries are stated with great fulness. While it is yet impossible to in Palestine trace them with certainty, the identification of sites in recent years, for which we are mainly indebted to the late Col. Conder, makes possible an approximation. The territory was bounded on the E. by the Sea of Galilee and the upper reaches of the Jordan. Jos makes it extend to Damascus (Ant, IV, i, 22); but there is nothing to support this. The southern boundary probably ran from the point where Wady el-Birch enters the Jordan, northward along the northern side of the valley to Mt. Tabor. The western border may have gone up by way of Halittin (Zildam) and Yāḥkōk (Hukkok) to Kefr ‘Anān (Hammath), bending there to the W., including the land of er-Rameh (Ramah) until it reached the territory of Asher. Running northward again until nearly opposite Tyre, it bent eastward, and once more northward to the Litāyān (Leontes), taking in the larger part of what is called the Arabs Belad Beqārāh and Belad es-Shubkī. Nineteen cities in N. are named in Josh 19 52ff. Among them was the famous city of refuge, Kedesh-Naphtali (q.v.), on the heights to the W. of the Waters of Merom, where extensive ruins are still to be seen (20 7). It, along with Hammoth-Or and Kartan, was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (21 23; 1 Ch 6 76).

The land lying around the springs of the Jordan was included in the lot of N. It is clear that from this part, as well as from the cities named in Jgs 1 38, N. did not drive out the Canaanites. These the Danites found in possession at the time of their raid. There is no indication that N. resented in any way this incursion of their kindred tribe into their territory (Jgs 18).

The district thus indicated includes much excellent land, both pastoral and arable. There are the broad, rich terraces that rise away to the N. and N.W. of the Sea of Galilee. The mountains immediately N. of the sea are rocky and barren; but when this tract is passed, we enter the lofty and spacious lands of upper Galilee, which from time immemorial have been the joy of the peasant farmer. Great breadths there are which in season yield golden harvests. The rich diversified scenery, mountain, hill and valley, is marked by a finer growth of trees than is common in Pal. The terebinth and pine, the olive, mulberry, fig, pomegranate, orange, lemon and vine are cultivated, to good purpose. The grape is comparatively plentiful, supplied by many copious springs. It was one of the districts from which Solomon drew provisions, the officer in charge being the king’s son-in-law, Ahimaz (1 K 4 15).

The free life of these spacious uplands, which yielded so liberally to the toil of the hand of industry, developed a robust manhood and a wholesome spirit of independence among its inhabitants. According to Jos, who knew them well (Jud, III, iii, 2), the country never lacked multitudes of men of courage ready to give a good account of themselves on all occasions of war. Its history, as far as we know it, afforded ample opportunity for the development of warlike qualities. In the struggle with Sisera, N. was found on the high places of the field (Jgs 5 18). To David’s forces at Hebron, N. contributed a thousand captains “and with them with shield and spear thirty and seven thousand” (1 Ch 12 34). Their position exposed them to the first brunt of attack by enemies from the N.; and in the wars of the kings they bore an important part (1 K 16 20; 2 K 12 18; 13 22); and they were the first on the W. of the Jordan to be carried away captive (2 K 15 29). See GALILEE.

The largest town in Mt. Naphtali today is Safed, on the heights due N. of the Sea of Galilee, often spoken of as the “city set on a hill.” It is built in the form of a horsehoe, open to the N., round the Castle Hill, on which are the ruins of the old fortress of the Templars. This is a position of great strength, which could hardly fail.

5. Sites and to be occupied in ancient times. Inhabitants although, it cannot be identified with any ancient city. It contains between 20,000 and 30,000 inhabitants. Over against it to the N.W., beyond the deep gorge of Wādy Līmān, rises Jēbel Jermuk, the highest mountain in Pal proper (e. 4,000 ft.) which may be the scene of the Transfiguration (q.v.). The inhabitants of Safed were massacred by Sultan Bihara in 1296. The city suffered severely from earthquake in 1759; and it shared with Tiberias, also a city of N., the disaster wrought by the earthquake of 1857. It is one of the holy cities of the Jews.

In the land of N. Jesus spent a great part of his public life, the land of Jesus Gennesaret, Bethsaida, Capernaum and Chorazin all lying within its boundaries (cf Mt 4 15).

6. Labors of N. included in the New Testament. See the following.

NAPHTALI MOUNT (נַפְתָלִי מִנְתוֹן, har naphtalīh; in τοῦ ὅρα τῆς Ναφθαλί, en to őrei tēs Nēphtali), Mount Naphtali: This was the most northerly of the three divisions of the Western Range, which derived their names from those of the tribes holding chief sway over them—Mt. Judah, Mt. Ephraim, and Mt. Naphtali (Josh 20 7 AV, RV replaces "Mount" by "the hill country of").

NAPHTHIAH, na’thā’r (AV): RV “Naphthor.”

NAPHTHAIM, nap’tā’him (בַּנְתַּהִים, naphtāhim; LXX Ναφθαήμον, Ναφθαήμου): A son of Mizraim (Gen 10 13; 1 Ch 1 11); but, according to most modern authorities, a district or a dependency of Egypt. Among the many efforts at identification the following deserve notice: Napthaim = (1) Nephiha (Nepthá, Νεϕήθα), in the N.E. of Egypt; (2) Na‘ptaḥ, i.e. the people of Ptah, the dwellers in the neighborhood of Memphis; (3) Natha (according to Herodotus, Ναθα, Nathō), which occurs in Assurbanipal’s Annals as the name of a part of Lower Egypt; (4) Erman (ZATW, X, 118), the change of a letter, reads Penthaim, which signifies “The Northland”; (5) Spiegelberg sees in the word an old designation of the Delta, and would therefore render the name, “the people of the Delta” (cf Johns, HDB; Skinner and Holzinger on Gez).

NAPKIN, nap’kin (ῥοδάπον, rodāpon; Lat sudarium): In Lk 19 20, the cloth in which the “unprofitable servant” wrapped the money of his lord; cf Jn 11 44; 20 7; see Dress, 7; Hand-kerchief.

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

NARRISSLUS, nar-eis'us (Naporiosos, Narcissos): In Rom 15 11 St. Paul sends greetings to “them of the household of Narcissus, that are in the Lord.” “The last words may suggest that, though only the Christians in this household have a greeting sent to them, there were other members of it with whom the writer had relations?” (Dean).

Narcissus is a common name, esp. among freedmen and slaves. But, as in the case of Aristobulus, some famous person of this name must be meant. Conybeare and Howson mention two, one the well-known favorite of Claudius, the other a favorite of Nero. Both were put to death by Caligula (Dio Cass. Ixiv.3), they think to be the Narcissus meant here (St. Paul, ch xix).

On the other hand, Bishop Lightfoot (Phil, 175) holds that “the powerful freedman Narcissus, whose wealth was proverbial (Juv. Sat. xiv.329), whose influence with Caligula was unbounded, and who bore a chief part in the intrigues of this reign, alone satisfies this condition.” Shortly after the accession of Nero, he had been put to death by Agrippina (Tac. Ann. xix.44). I. 54 A.D. As this occurred three or four years before the Ep. to the Rom was written, some think another Narcissus is meant. However, as usual in such cases, his property would be confiscated, and his slaves, becoming the property of the emperor, would swell “Cæsar’s household” as Narcissus.

NASBAS, nas'bas (Naśbs, Nasbá, N, Naśbd, Nabbd, read by Fritzsche); A name otherwise unknown. It occurs only in Tob 11 18, “And Achicharsus, and Nasbas his brother’s son,” came to Tobit’s wedding. Opinions are divided as to whether he was “brother’s son” of Tobit or Achicharsus. AV gives the suggestion of Junius. “Achicharsus who is also called Nasbas,” thus identifying Nasbas with Achicharsus, which might gain support from 1 22 where Achicharsus is mentioned as “brother’s son” of Tobit. See ACHICHARSUS; AMAN. N reads “Achicharsus and Nabbad his brother’s son,” which is corrected by another hand to “brother’s son” (ἐξαδελφος, ecdelphos). The Itala gives “Nabba ancunus [“maternal uncle”] illius;” the Vulg “Nabath consobrinus [“cousins”] Tobiae;” Syr “Laban his master’s son is properly identical with the “Aman” of Tob 14 10 (see variety of readings under AMAN) and the nephew in Harris’ Story of Ahišar and His Nephew.

NASI, ná'si (B. Nasē, Nasēi, A. Nasēi, Nasith; AV Nasith): The head of one of the families which went up with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 32) = “Nehemiah” of Ezr 2 54; Neh 7 56.

NASOR, nā'sor. See HAZOR.

NATHAN, nā-than’ (navigation; “gift”); Našôw, Nathan): A court prophet in David’s reign and a supporter of Solomon at his accession. There are three main incidents in his career as depicted in the OT.

The two | narratives, 2 S 7 1-7 = 1 Ch 17 1-15, of which the former is the original, relate how David confided to Nathan his intention to build a house for Jeh’s ark and Temple-plans.

1. Nathan and David’s Nathan at first blesses the project, but that same night is given a Divine message, and returns to tell the king that instead of David building a house for Jeh, Jeh will build a house for David: “I will set up thy seed after thee, . . . . and I will establish his kingdom. . . . . I will be his father, and he shall be my son: if he commit iniquity, I will chasen him with the rod of men” (2 S 7 12-14). Ver 13 says that “He shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever,” but this disturbs the one great thought of the passage, which is that God will build a house for David, and which is also the thought in David’s prayer (vs 18-29).

The word “seed” in ver 12 is collective and so throughout the passage, so that the prophecy does not refer to one individual, but, like Dt 17, belongs to the group of generic prophecies. Nor is it Messianic, for ver 14 could not be reconciled with the ministrations of Agrippa to the infant Jesus (cf. Acts 4 27), nor with the greater grace of the ever-merciful providence of God in dealing with David’s family. See, however, A. Briggs, Messianic Prophecy, 126 ff.) Budge, who says that the section belongs to the 7th cent. and is certainly preexilic in the subject, in the prophecy something of the idealism of Amos and Hosea, for the prophet teaches that Jehovah’s throne shall be firm, and the assurance of Solomon’s Alexander’s parrhesia, and the application of it to David’s conduct. But several difficulties arise when we ask exactly what Nathan’s message to David was: vs 13 f represent the prophet as saying that God has forgiven David but that the child will die, while vs 10-12 speak of a heavy punishment that is to come upon David and his family, and ver 16 does not show any indication of a prophecy as to the child’s death. Commentators regard vs 1-15a as later in origin than chap 11, 12 in the main, and hold vs 10-12 to be still later than vs 1-15a. But there is no indication of the rest of the story as interrupting the connection between 11 27b and 12 15b, and therefore of later date.

1 K 1 is a part of “one of the best pieces of Heb narrative in all the apocalypse” (H. P. Smith, OT Hist, 153, n. 2). It narrates the part that Nathan played in the events that led to Solomon’s accession. David was getting old and feeble, and the succession Adonijah had not been settled. When Adonijah, who was probably the younger son living, gave a banquet to some of his father’s state officials, Nathan, who was one of those that had not been invited, inquired Bathsheba, Solomon’s mother, to remonstrate. David’s promise to her that Solomon should succeed to the throne. This she did, and in the middle of her audience with David, Nathan appears with the news of Adonijah’s feast and proclamation as king. Solomon is then appointed king by David’s command, Nathan being one of his chief supporters. It has been suggested that it is only Nathan who interprets Adonijah’s feast as a claim to the throne, but this contradicts vs 5. Yet, whereas in the two sections treated above Nathan is the prophet of Jeh, he is represented in 1 K as an intriguing court politician, planning very cleverly an opportunity to induce David’s presence at the very time that Bathsheba has an audience with the king. The | narrative of 1 Ch 28 makes no mention of Nathan, Solomon being there represented as Divinely elected to succeed David.

1 K 4 5 mentions a Nathan as father of Azariah and Zahah, two of the chief officers of Solomon. He is probably the same.

1 Ch 29 20; 2 Ch 9 29 refer to “the words” or rather “the acts of Nathan the prophet” as well as those NATHAN:
(1) A prophet (2 S 7; Ps 61, title). See preceding article.
(2) A son of King David (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 3 5; 1 Ch 8 32).
(3) Father of Igil, one of David’s heroes (2 S 23 36). In 1 Ch 11 38, we have “Joel the brother of Nathan”; LXX B has “soon” in this verse, but it is impossible to say whether Igil or Joel is the correct name. (4) A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 3 36), whose son is called Zabad, whom some suppose to be the same as Zabud (1 K 4 5). On this view Nathan is the same as the prophet (see 1, above).
(5) A companion of Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8 10 and 1 Esd 8 44).
(6) Nathans (1 Esd 9 34), one of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 39).
(7) Name of a family (Zec 12 12).

NATHANIEL, na-than’e-al (Nathanas, Nathanal):
(1) One of the “captains over thousands” who furnished the Levites with much cattle for Josiah’s Passover (1 Esd 1 9) = “Nethaniel” of 2 Ch 35 9. (2) When Peter, Nathanael, B A om); One of the priests who had married a “strange wife” (1 Esd 9 22 = “Nethaniel” of Ezr 10 22.
(3) An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).
(4) One of the Twelve Apostles. See next article.

NATHANIEL (Ναθανελ), n’th-an’el, “God has given”; Nathanael, Nathanael: Nathanael, who was probably a fisherman, belonged to Cana in Galilee (Jn 21 2). According to the “Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles” (cf Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 50), N. was the same as Simon, the son of Clopas, and was one of the Twelve. He was among those who met and conversed with Jesus during the preaching of John the Baptist at Bethany beyond Jordan (Jn 1 29). From the fact that he had been called by Philip (Jn 1 45), it is evident that N. was well versed in ancient Scripture, and that in him also the preaching of John had aroused a certain expectancy. His reply to Philip, “Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?” (Jn 1 46), was prompted, not by any ill repute of the place, but by its petty insignificant and familiarity in N.’s eyes. To this question Philip made no direct answer, but replied, “Come and see.” It was the answer best fitted to the man and the occasion; it appealed to N.’s fair-mindedness and sincerity of purpose. He responded nobly to the call, and on approaching Jesus was received with the words: “Beloved, an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile” (Jn 1 47). It was a tribute to that singleness of heart which enabled him to overcome his initial prejudice. The same candor and openness distinguished the after-interview of N. with Jesus, as is evident by his question, “Whence knowest thou me?” (Jn 1 48). The reply of Jesus removed the time he had spent under the fig tree, kneeling, no doubt, in silent prayer and communion with God, and brought to mind all the sacred hopes and aspirations of that hour. It taught him that here was One who read on the instant the innermost secrets of his heart, and was Himself the ideal for whom he was seeking; and it drew from him the confession, “Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art King of Israel” (Jn 1 49).

Although N. is mentioned by name only once again in the NT, where he is one of the seven who witnessed the appearance of the risen Jesus (in the Sea of Tiberias (Jn 21 2)), it is evident that the connection and companionship of N. with Jesus must be seen as the closest of the two incidents would lead us to suppose. Accordingly, attempts have been made to identify him with other NT characters, the most commonly accepted being Bartholomew (of Bartholomew). The principal arguments in support of this identification are: (1) N. is never mentioned by the synoptists, and Bartholomew is never mentioned by John, who further implies that N. was one of the twelve disciples (cf Matt 28 24-29; Mark 16 7); (2) in the Synoptists, Philip is closely connected with Bartholomew (notes of the apocrypha), and in John with N. (cf Jn 1 45ff); (3) the fact that most of the other apostles bear two names. Arguments are also adduced to identify him with Simon the Cananaean (of Syros). N. has also been identified with Matthew the tax-gatherer (based on the similarity of name; “Simon, son of Zechede, with Stephen, and even with Paul.”

NATURAL, n’a-tur-al, NATURE, n’a-tur’; leb’; ψυχικός, psuchikos, φυσικός, phusikos, φύσις, physis): “Natural” is the tr of leb’h, “freshness or vigor” (Dt 34 7). It is not as though his heart was no dim, nor his natural force abated.

1. As Used “Nature” in the sense of a system or order in which the world and men, each individual, were conceived as the direct creation of a supra-mundane God, and conserved by His power and Spirit. The later conception of “nature” came in with Greek thought.

In the Apoc, we find “nature” in the sense of innate character or constitution (Wis 7 20, “the natures [phusias] of living creatures”; 13 1, “Surely vain are all men by nature” [phaisel], 3 Mac 3 29, “mortal nature” [phusias]). In the NT “nature” (phusis) is frequently found in the latter sense (Rom 1 26, “against nature”; 2 14, “by nature”; 27; 11 24, also.

2. As Used “contrary to nature”; 1 Cor 11 14, in the NT “Doth not even nature itself teach you?” Gal 2 15; 4 8; Eph 2 3; in 2 Pet 1 4, we have “that ye might be partakers of the divine nature,” RVm “Gr nature,” also “mankind” (ver 7), RVm “Gr the human nature”—“Natural” (Rom 11 21-24) is the tr of kal’ phusis, “according to the nature” Paul in 1 Cor speaks of “the natural man” (2 14, ARVm “or unspiritual, Gr psychical”) and of a “natural body” (15 44 bis), the Gr word being psuchikos, “of the soul” (psuchh), the animal, natural, principle, as contrasted with that which he expected to be the principle of the spirit (pneuma). In 1 Cor 15 46 the contrast is expressed, “Howbeit that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural,” RVm “Gr psychical. The “natural man” is the man in whom the spirit is unquickened, the “natural body” is that corresponding to the psychic and soul-nature, the “spiritual body” corresponding to the Spirit
E. of the Jordan—Dead Sea—Arabah depression, to the whole of which the name Ghaur (Ghôr) is applied by the Arabs, is a great table-land sloping gradually to the E. from the sharp edge which overlooks the Ghaur. It has no conspicuous peaks. What appear to be peaks when viewed from the Ghaur are irregularities of its western contour, which are invisible or appear as slight mounds to the observer who looks westward from any point some miles to the E. Mt. Nebo, for instance, when seen from Medeba is not readily distinguishable. This is because it really does not rise above the general level of the table-land. The small annual rainfall on the heights near the Ghaur diminishes eastward, and the desert begins within from 20 to 40 miles.

Another term much used by OT writers is South or Negeb, which embraces the southernmost portion of the promised land, and was never effectively occupied by the Israelites. Its uttermost boundary was the “river of Egypt” (al-‘Arish), and coincides roughly with the present boundary between the Ottoman territory on the E. and the Anglo-Egypt territory of Sinai on the W.

The term slopes, ʿashdāhāt, AV “springs,” occurs in Josh 10 40, “so Joshua smote all the land, the hill-country . . . and the lowland, and the slopes, and all their kings”; and again in Josh 12 7 8. “And Joshua gave it . . . for a possession according to their divisions; in the hill-country, and in the lowland, and in the Arabah, and in the slopes, and in the wilderness, and in the South.” In the former passage, it seems to refer to the foothills which form the eastern or higher part of the lowland or Shephelah. In the latter passage, it might mean the same, or it might mean the descent from the Judean hills to the Ghaur. In Dv 3 17; 4 49; Josh 12 3; 13 20, we have “the slopes of Pisgah” (ʿashdāhāt ʿarabah), “spring of Piwhah,” which denotes the descent from the heights of Moab to the Ghaur. The same word occurs in the sing. in Nu 21 15, referring to the descent to the Arnon. “Slopes,” therefore, does not seem to be a term applied to any particular region.

The wilderness is usually the desert of the wandering, including the central part of the Sinaitic peninsula, but it is by no means always used in this sense, e.g. Josh 15 20 24, where it clearly refers to a region near Ai. “The wilderness” of Mt 4 1 is thought to be the barren portion of Judea between Jerus and the Jordan. NAUGHT, nà, NAUGHTY, nà'ti, NAUGHTINESS, -nes: In the sense of bad, worthless, weakness, the words in AV represent the Heb ʿārâ‘, ra‘, changed in RV to “bad” (2 K 2 19; Prov 20 14; Jer 24 2); ʿārâ‘, retained in AV “naughtiness” (1 S 17 25), ʿârâ‘, homework rendered in RV in Prov 11 6 “iniquity,” and in 17 4 “mischievous.” In Prov 6 12, “naughty person,” lit. “man of Belial,” is in RV “worthless person.” In the NT, “superfluity of naughtiness” in Jas 1 21 (for kaxía, kaxiā) becomes in RV “overflowing of wickedness,” in “malign,” and in Wsd 12 10 AV’s “naughty generation” (τὰμνοι, pontoro) is made into “by birth . . . evil.”

NAVE, nāv (1 K 7 33). See SEA, MOLTEN.

NAVE, nāv‘è (NAVY, NAUD): Gr form of the Heb proper name “Nun” (so RV), found only in AV of Sir 46 1.

NAVEL, nāv‘èl (ʿeww, shôr [LXX in Prov 3 8 suggests a different reading, viz. instead of ʿeww, shôrêkkáh, ʿeww, shôrêkkâh = ʿeww, shôrêkkâh, “thy flesh”]): The AV translates the Heb shôrir in the description of Behemoth (Job 40 16) by “navel,” where modern translators have substituted “muscles”; similarly in the tr of shôrir (Cant 7 2) it has been replaced by "body." There remain two passages of RV where "navel" is retained as the tr of shor. Thus we first find the word used, prep pro teto, for the whole being: "It [the four of Jeob] was the health of thy navel, and marrow to thy bones" (Prov 3 8). The uttermost neglect which a new-born babe can experience is expressed by Exekiel: "In the day thou wast born, thy navel [i.e. umbilical cord] was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to cleanse thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all" (Ezk 16 4).

NAZARENE, naz-a-rēn', naz'ə-rēn (Naẓārēn, Nazarēnēs; Nazaroilos in Mt, Jn, Acts and Lk). A derivative of Nazareth, the birthplace of Christ. In the NT it has a double meaning: it may be friendly and it may be inimical.

On the lips of Christ's friends and followers, it is an honorable name. Thus Matthew sees in it a full-filment of the old Israel prophecy (Isa 11 1 (Heb)): "That it might be "honorable Title" as was spoken through the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene" (Mt 2 23). According to an overwhelming array of testimony (see MEYER, Comm., in loc.), the name Nazareth is derived from the same root, the term being from Isa. 11. We have here undoubtedly to do with a permissible accommodation.

It is not quite certain that Matthew did not intend, by the use of this word, to refer to the picture of the Messiah given in Isa 11, on account of the low estate in which this place was held (Jn 4 46). Nor is it perfectly clear, has been done by Tertullian and Jerome, to substitute the word "Nazaria" for "Nazarene," which in every view of the case is contrary to the patent facts of the life of Saviour.

Says Meyer, "In giving this prophetic title to the Messiah he entirely disregards the historical meaning of the same (LXX Isa 11 1, anthsos), keeps by the relationship of the name Nazareth to the word nazar, and recognizes by virtue of the same, in that prophetic Messianic name nazar, the typical reference to this—that Jesus through His settlement in Nazareth was to become a 'Nazarōis,' a 'Naza'ren.'" This name clung to Jesus throughout His entire life. It became His name among the masses: "One of the chief is Nazareth" (Lk 4 7; Jn 6 49, 24 19). Perhaps Matthew, who wrote after the event, may have been influenced in his application of the Isaian prophecy by the very fact that Jesus was popularly thus known. Even in the realm of spirits He was known by this appellation. Evil spirits knew and feared Him, under this name (Mk 1 24; Lk 4 34), and the angels of the resurrection morning called Him thus (Mk 16 6), while Jesus applied the title to Himself (Acts 22 8). In the light of these facts we do not wonder that the disciples, in their later lives and work, also used it (Acts 2 22; 3 6; 10 38).

If His friends knew Him by this name, much more His enemies, and to them it was a title of scorn and derision. Their whole attitude was compressed in that one word of Nathanael, by which he voiced his doubt, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 4 46). In the name "Nazarene," the Jews, who opposed and rejected Christ, poured out all the vials of their antagonism, and the word became a Jewish heritage of bitterness. It is hard to tell whether the appellation, on the lips of evil spirits, signifies dread or hatred (Mk 1 24; Lk 4 34). With the gatekeepers of the house of the haben, it signifies unadulterated scorn (Mt 26 71; Mk 14 67). Even in His death the bitter hatred of the priests caused this name to accompany Jesus, for it was at their dictation written above His cross by Pilate (Jn 19 19). The entire Christian community was called by the leaders of the Nazarenes; thus, however, is based upon the fact of the Nazarenes" (Acts 24 5). If, on the one hand, therefore, the name stands for devotion and love, it is equally certain that on the other side it represented the bitter and undying hatred of His enemies.

NAZARETH, naz-ar-eth (Naζαρηθ, Nazarēth, Naζάρηθ, Nazareth, and other forms): A town in Galilee, the home of Joseph and the Virgin Mary, and for about 30 years Confined to the scene of the Saviour's life (Mt 2 the NT 23; Mk 1 9; Lk 2 39.51; 4 16, etc.). He was therefore called Jesus of Nazareth, although His birthplace was Bethlehem; and those who became His disciples were known as Nazarenes. This is the name, with slight modification, used to this day by Molemans for Christians, Naζαρηθ—the sing. being Naζαρηθ.

The town is not named in the OT, although the presence of a spring and the convenience of the site make it probable that there was a settlement here in old times. Quaresimus learned that the ancient name was Medina Abiat, in which we may recognize the Arab. el-Mednat el-balṭah, "the white town." Built of the white stone supplied by the limestone rocks around, the description is quite accurate. There is a reference in Mish (M'nā-khah, viii 6) to the "white house of the hill" whence wine for the drink offering was brought. An elegy for the 9th of Ab speaks of a "course of priests settled in Nazareth of the Jewish people at Jerus.," an ancient midh rash now lost (Neubauer, Glog. du Talm., 82, 85, 190; Delitzsch, Ein Tag in Capernaum, 142). But all this leaves us still in a state of uncertainty.

The ancient town is represented by the modern en-Nāṣirah, which is built mainly on the western and northwestern slopes of a hollow among the lower hills of Galilee, just before they sink into the plain of Edraison. It lies about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean at Haifa. The road to the plain and the coast goes over the southwestern "lip of the hollow; that to Tiberias and Damascas on the heights to the N. The valley gorge breaks down southward, issuing on the plain between two craggy hills. That to the W. is the traditional Hill of Precipitation (Lk 4 29). This, however, is too far from the city and does not have in the days of Christ. It is probable that the present town occupies pretty nearly the ancient site; and the scene of that attempt on Jesus' life may have been the cliff, many feet in height, not far from the old synagogue, traces of which are still seen in the western part of town. Thus the town, he town itself, bears the name of the Jn 4 46, the name of Jesus.

2. Position and Physical Features

The road to the coast, the main thoroughfare of the ancient town, runs from the Greek Orthodox church at the foot of the hill on the N. The water is led in a conduit to the fountain, whither the women and their children go as in old times, to carry home in their jars supplies for domestic use. There is also a tiny spring in the face of the western hill. To the N.W. rises the height on which stands the sanctuary, now in ruins, of Nebel Sa'in. From this point a most beautiful and extensive view is obtained, ranging on a clear day from the Mediterranean to the W. to the Mountain of Bashan on the E.; from Upper Galilee and Mt. Hermon on the N. to the uplands of Gilead and Samaria on the S. The whole extent of Esdraison is seen, that great battle-field, associated with so many heroic events in Israel's history, from Carmel and Megiddo to Tabor and Mt. Gilboa.
The Nazirite

There are now some 7,000 inhabitants, mainly Christian, of whom the Greek Orthodox church claims about 3,000. Moslem number about 1,600. There are no Jews. It is the chief market town for the pastoral and agricultural district that lies around it.

In Nazareth, Jesus preached His first recorded sermon (Lk 4:16 ff), when His plainness of speech aroused the homicidal fury of His hearers. "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief." (Mt 13:55). Finding no rest or security in Nazareth, He made His home in Capernaum. The reproach implied in Nathanael's question, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1:46), has led to much speculation.

By ingenious emendation of the text Cheyne would read, "Can the Holy One proceed from Nazareth?" (Ez, a.v.). Perhaps, however, we should see no more in this than the acquiescence of Nathanael's humble spirit in the lowly estimate of his native province entertained by the leaders of his people in Judaea.

Christians are said to have first settled here in the time of Constantine (Epiphanius), whose mother Helena built the Church of the Annunciation. In crusading times it was the seat of the bishop of Bethsean. It passed into Moslem hands after the disaster to the Crusaders at Hattin (1183). It was destroyed by Sultan Bishars in 1263. In 1620 the Franciscans rebuilt the Church of the Annunciation, and the town rose again from its ruins. Here in 1799 the French general Junot was assailed by the Turks. After his brilliant victory over the Turks at Tabor, Napoleon visited Nazareth. The place suffered some damage in the earthquake of 1837.

Protestant Missions are now represented in Nazareth by agents of the Church Missionary Society, and of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society.

The root-meaning of the word in Heb as well as the various Gr tr's indicates the Nazirite as "a consecrated one" or "a devotee." In the circumstances of an ordinary vow, men consecrated some mate-of Israel's ancient and simpler way of living, and as a protection against luxury in settling nomads. It is worthy that the Scented vine growing and wine-drinking have ever been considered foreign to their traditional nomadic mode of life. It was in this same protest that the Rechabites, who were at least akin to the Nazirites, went still farther in refusing even in Canaan to abandon the no-wine state. See Rechabites.

The Pent, then, makes provision for the Nazirite vow being taken by either men or women, though the OT does not record a single instance of a female Nazirite. Further, the vow is for a limited time, that is, for the case of the "Nazirite of days." No period of duration is mentioned in the OT, but the Mish., in dealing with the subject, prescribes a period of 30 days, while a double period of 60 or even a triple one of 100 days might be entered on. The conditions of Nazirismit entrailed: (1) the strictest abstinence from wine and from every product of the vine; (2) the keeping of the hair untorn and the beard untouched by a razor; (3) the prohibition to touch a dead body; and (4) prohibition of unclean food (Jgs 13:5-7; Nu 6).

The ceremonial of initiation is not recorded, the Pent treating it as well known. The Talm. tells us that the Nazirite waxed the head for one year to express the wish that he might be a Nazirite. A formal vow was, however, taken; and from the form of renewal of the vow, when by any means it was accidentally broken, we may judge that the head was shaved of its voluntary growth and the hair allowed to grow during the whole period of the vow.

The accidental violation of the vow just mentioned entailed upon the devotee the beginning of the whole matter anew and the serving of the whole period. This was entered on by the ceremonial of restoration, in the undertaking of which the Nazirite shaved his head, presented two turtle-doves or two young pigeons for sin and burnt offerings, and re-consecrated himself before the priest, further presenting a lamb for a trespass offering (Nu 6:9-12).

When the period of separation was complete, the ceremonial of release had to be gone through. This consisted of the presentation of burnt, sin and peace offerings with their accompaniments as detailed in Nu 6:13-21, the shaving of the head and the burning of the hair of the head of separation, after which the Nazirite returned to ordinary life.

The consecration of the Nazirite in some ways resembled that of the priests, and similar words are used of both in Lev 21:12 and Nu 6:17, the priest's vow being even designated נזר. It opened up the way for any Israelite to do special service on something like semi-sacerdotal lines. The priest, like the Nazirite, dared not come into contact with the dead (Lev 21:1), dared not touch wine during the period of service (Lev 10:9), and, further, long hair was an ancient priestly custom (Ezk 44:20).

The only "Nazirites for life" that we know by name are Samson, Samuel and John the Baptist, but to the Jewish tradition adds

7. Nazirites Absalom in virtue of his long hair. For Life We know of no one voluntarily taking the vow for life, all the cases recorded being those of parents dedicating their children. In rabbinical times, the father might vow for the child, and an interesting case of this kind is mentioned in the dedication of Rabbi Chanena by his father in the presence of Rabban Gamaliel (Nazar, 25b).

Samson is uniquely named a Nazirite in Jgs 13:7 and 15:17, but it has been objected that his case does not conform to the regulations in the Pent. It is said that he must have partaken of wine when he made his feast for his first feast for which does not follow and would not be so understood, say, in a Moslem country today. It is further urged that in connection with his fighting he must have come into contact with many dead men, and that he took honey from the carcass; so that one or both of these objections, rising on the seeming hypercritical. Fighting was specially implied in his vow (Jgs 13:5), and the remains of the lion would be but a dry skeleton and not even so demanding as the ass's jawbone, to which the critics do not object.

Samuel is nowhere in the OT called a Nazirite, the name being first applied to him in Sir 46:13 (Heb), but the restrictions of his dedication seem to imply that he was. Wellhausen denies that it is implied in 1 S 11:1 that he was either a Nazir. ("a gift, [one] 'given' unto Job"; cf Nu 3:9; 18:6) or a Nazirite. In the Heb text the mother's vow mentions only the uncut hair, and first in LXX is there added that he should not drink wine or strong drink, and the case of the Nazirite is given.

10. Token of Divine Favor

As was also evident in the dedication of James, the tokens of God's favor to Israel, and the tempting of them to break their vow by drinking wine was considered an aggravated sin (Am 2:11-12). At the time of the captivity they were looked upon as a vanished glory in Israel (Lam 4:7m), but they reappeared in later history.

So far as we can discover, there is no indication that they formed guilds or settled communities like the "Sons of the Prophets." In

11. Did Not some sense the Essenes may have conceived Form Com-...of the Weni...of the Nazirites, the immunities, the Lord's brother (Euseb., HE, 1, viii, 3, following Hegesippus), and also Banus, tutor of Jos (Vita, 2), who is probably the same as the Buni mentioned as a disciple of Jesus in Soph. 452, were devotees of a kind resembling Nazirites. Berecut's vow was also manifest that of the Nazirite (Jos, BJ, II, xv, 1). The case of John the Baptist is quite certain, and it was probably the means of introducing the custom among the early Christians. It was clearly a Nazir's vow which Paul Early took, "having shorn his head in Christians Cencreaus" (Acts 18:18), and which he completed at Jerusalem with other Christians similarly placed (Acts 21:23).

As the expenses of release were heavy for poor men, such were at times aided in this matter by their richer brethren. Thus Agrippa, on his return from Rome, assisted many Nazirites (Jos, Ant, XIX, vi, 1), and Paul was also at charges with others (Acts 21:23).

We come across something of the same kind in many countries, and we find special abstinence always emphasized. Thus we meet with a class of "votaries" as early as the days of Hammurabi, and his code dealt with quite a number of sections to them. Among others, it is said that they were prohibited from even entering a wineshop (Sect. 110).
Then we are familiar with the Hierodoulai of the Greeks, and the Vestal Virgins of the Romans.

The word παράξενον appears in Syr and was applied to the maidens devoted to the service of Belthias. In the text, it has always been used by individuals and societies of ascetics who were particularly Nazirites, and the modern dervish in nearly every way resembles him; while it is worthy of record in this connection that the Moslem (an abstainer by creed) while under the vow of pilgrimage neither cuts his hair nor pares his nails till the completion of his vow in Mecca.

NEAH, nē' (παράξενον, καραβήθ, "the nea!"; "Avvóv, Annów): A town in the lot of Zebulun (Josh 19 13), mentioned along with Gath-hepher and Rimmon. It is possibly identical with "Neiel" (ver 27). No name resembling either of these has yet been recovered, although the district in which the place must be sought is quite definitely localized. It may probably have lain to the N. of Rimmon (Rummaneh), about 4 miles N.E. of Sef práiräh.

NEAPOLIS, nē-ap'olís (Neapolis, Νεάπολις, WH, Νεάς Πόλις): A town on the northern shore of the Aegean, originally belonging to Thrace but later falling within the Rom province of Macedonia. It was the seaport of Philippi, and was the first point in Europe at which Paul and his companions landed; from Troas they had sailed direct to Samothrace, and on the next day reached Neapolis (Acts 16 11). Paul probably passed through the town again on his second visit to Macedonia (Acts 20 1), and he is likely to have marked there on his last journey from Philippi to Troas, which occupied 5 days (Acts 20 6). The position of Neapolis is a matter of dispute. Some writers have maintained that it lay on the site known as Eski Kavala (Cousinry, Mackindoe, 11, 109 ff), and that upon its destruction in the 6th or 7th cent. AD the inhabitants migrated to the place, about 10 miles to the E., called Christopoli in mediaeval and Kavala in modern times. But the general view, which is generally accepted, is that Neapolis was a separate settlement, which, by the evidence, both literary and archaeological, places Neapolis at Kavala, which lies on a rocky headland with a spacious harbor on its western side, in which the fleet of Brutus and Cassius was moored at the battle of the ships of Philippi (42 BC; Appian Bell. Civ. iv.106). The town lay some 10 Roman miles from Philippi, with which it was connected by a road leading over the mountain ridge named Symbolum, which separates the plain of Philippi from the sea.

The date of its foundation is uncertain, but it seems to have been a colony from the island of Thasos, which lay opposite to it (Dio Cassius xvi.65). It appears (under the name of Neapolis, which is also borne on its coin) as a member both of the first and of the second Athenian confederacy, and was highly commended by the Athenians in an extant decree for its loyalty during the Thaskan revolt of 411-408 BC (Inscr. Græc., 1, Suppl. 81). The chief cult of the day was that of "The Virgin," usually identified with the Gr Artemis. (See Leake, Travels in Northern Greece III, 1838; Courajod Voyage dans la Macédoine, II, 69 ff, 109 ff; Heusey and Daumont, Mission archéol. de Macédoine, 11 ff.)

NEAR, nēr, NIGH, ní (chiefly יָרָה, יָרִיק, "to draw near," יָרָה, יָרִיק; εἴγγα, εἴγγαι): Used of proximity in place (Gen 19 20; 46 10; Ex 13 17; Ps 22 11; Jn 3 23, etc), time (Jer 48 16; Ezek 7 7; 30; Mk 13 28), or kinship (Lev 21 2; Ruth 3 12), but also employed of moral nearness. Jews are "nigh" to them that are of a broken heart (Ps 34 13). God draws nigh to His people, and they to Him (Jas 4 8). The antithesis is God's "farness" from the wicked.

NEARIAS, nē-a-r'as (παράξενον, ἄργαθ): (1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 22 f). (2) A descendant of Simeon (1 Ch 4 42). In both instances LXX reads "Noadish."

NEBAIL, nē'bäl, nē'bāt, neb'āt (נְבָאִית, נְבָעִית): See Nebai.

NEBIOITH, nē-bi'yoth, nē-bi'yothe (נְבִי'יָהוֹת, נְבִי'יָיוֹת): LXX Nabàiôt, Nabàiôdút: Firstborn of Ishmael (Gen 25 13; 28 9; 36 3; 1 Ch 1 29). Isa 60 7 mentions the tribe Nebioith with Kedar, with an allusion to its pastoral nature: "the rams of Nebioith" are to serve the ideal Zion as sacrificial victims. Again associated with Kedar, the name occurs frequently in Assyr inscriptions. The tribe must have had a conspicuous place among the northern Arabs. Jos, followed by Jerome, regarded Nebioith as identical with the Nabataeans, the great trading community and capital of the northern desert, which was characterized by its network of cities, its great trading community and its capital and stronghold was Petra. This view is evidently accepted, but the name "Nabataean" is spelled with נ, and the interchange of נ and ת, although not unparalleled, is unusual. If the name is of Sem, it is probable a foreign name, and that could have no connection with the Nabataeans.

NEBAILAT, nē-ba'ilat (נְבָאָלָת, nûbaháth; Na-ba'llàt, Nabàlâtass): A town occupied by the Benja-tites after the exile, named along with Lod and Ono (Neh 11 34). It is represented by the modern Beit Nebâla, 4 miles N.E. of Lydda.

NEBÁT, nêbât (נֶבָט, nûbáth): Father of Jeroboam I (1 K 11 26, and frequently elsewhere). The name occurs only in the phrase "Jeroboam the son of Nebat," and is evidently intended to distinguish Jeroboam I from the later son of Joash. See JEROBOAM.

NEBO, nēbô (נְבּוֹ, nûbô; Assyr Nabû): The Bab god of literature and science. In the Bab mythology he is represented as the son and interpreter of Bel-merodach (cf Isa 46 1; Bel and Nebo there represent Babalon). His own special abode was "at Borsippa." His planet was Mercury. His name enters into Bib. names, as "Nebuchadnezzar," and perhaps "Abed-nego" (Dan 1 7, for "Abed-nebo, servant of Nebo"). See BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF.

NEBO (נְבּוֹ, nûbô; Na-bô, Nabô): (1) This town is named in Nu 32 3 between Sebam and Beon (which latter evidently represents Baal-meon of ver 35), after Heshbon and Elealeh, as among the cities assigned by Moses to Reuben. It was occupied by the Reubenite clan Bela (1 Ch 5 8). Here it is named between Aser and Baalmeon. In their denunciations of wrath against Moab, Isaiah names it along with Medeba (Isa 16 2) and Jeremiah with Kiriatiam (Jer 48 1), and again (ver 26) between Dibon and Beth-diblathaim. Meshha (Mi S) says that by command of Chemosh he went by night against the city, captured it after an assault that lasted from dawn till noon, and put all the inhabitants to death. He dedicated the place to Ashhtar-chemosh. Jerome (On Isa 15 2) tells us that at Nebo was the idol of Chemosh. The site which seems best to meet the requirements of the passages indicated is on the ridge of Jebel Nebâb to the S.W. of Hesbân, where ruins of an ancient town bearing the name of en-nebâb are found (Buhl, GIP, 266).
(2) (תֵּבֶּא, נַבֵּה; B, נָבָה, Nāḇā, A, נָבָא, Nabā, and other forms): Fifty-two descendants of the inhabitants of Nebo returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 29; Neh 7 35). The place was in Judah and is named after Bethel and Ai. There is nothing, however, to guide us to its exact position. It may be represented by either Beth Nebā, 12 miles N.W. of Jerus, or Nebā, which lies about 4 miles S.S.E of 'Id el-Mā’ (Adulium).

NEBO, MOUNT (אֶבֶּל, נָבָא, נָבָא, נָבָה): A mountain in the land of Moab which Moses ascended at the command of God in order that he might see the Land of Promise which he was never to enter. There also he was to die. From the following passages (viz. Nu 23 17; Dt 32 49; 34 1), we gather that it was not far from the plain of Moab in which Israel was encamped; that it was the height standing out to the W. of the mountains of Abarim; that it lay to the E. of Jericho; and that it was a spot from which a wide and comprehensive view of Pal could be obtained. None of these conditions are met by Jebel ‘Aṭṭārās, which is too far to the E., and is fully 15 miles S. of a line drawn eastward from Jericho. Jebel ‘Usha, again, in Mt. Gilgal, commands, indeed, an extensive view; but it lies too far to the N., being at least 15 miles N. of a line drawn eastward from Jericho. Both of these sites have had their advocates as claimants for the honor of representing the Bib. Nebo.

The ‘head’ or ‘top’ of Pisgah is evidently identical with Mt. Nebo (Dt 34 1). After Moses’ death he was buried ‘in the valley in the land of Moab,’ over against Beth-peor.

The name Nebā is found on a ridge which, some 5 miles S.W. of Heere and opposite the northern end of the Dead Sea, runs out to the W. from the known, but the discovery of Zophim [cf Nu 23 14] confirms the view now generally held, that it is but another title of the Nebo range.

Neither Mt. Hermon nor Dan (Tell el-Kady) is visible from the Nebo hilltop, and the Mediterranean is the hinder sea, it also is invisible. But, as Driver says (‘Dt. ’4,’ ICC, 419), the terms in Dt 34 1.3 are hyperbolic, and must be taken as including points in the imagination as well as the actually visible horizon (see Mr. Birch argues in favor of Tel ‘al el-Bedâ‘in, whence he believes Dan and Zoar to be visible, while he identifies ‘the hinder sea’ with the Dead Sea (PEFS, 1898, 110 ff).

NEBUCHADREZZAR, neb-ā-kad-nez’ar, NEBUCHADREZZAR, -re’zar: Nebuchadnezzar, the second king of Babylon of that name, is best known as the king who conquered Judah, destroyed Jerusalem, and carried the people of the Jews captive to Babylon. Of all the Hebrew monarchs mentioned by name in the Scriptures, N. is the most prominent and the most important. The prophecies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, and the last chs. of K and Ch centered about his life, and he stands preeminently, along with his oppression and the exodus, among the foci of the kingdom of God. The documents which have been discovered in Babylon and elsewhere within the last 75 years have added much to our knowledge of this monarch, and have in general confirmed the Bib. accounts concerning him.

His name is found in two forms in the Bible, Nebuchadnezzar and Nebuchadrezzar. In the LXX he is called Ν. Ναβουχοδόνος, and in the Vulg. Νεβουχόδωνος. This latter form is found also in the AV Apocalypse, Ezek, and Est and Bar, but not Jth or Tob. This change from r to s which is found in the two writings of the name in the Heb and the Aram. of the Scriptures is a not uncommon one in the Sem. languages, as in Burnabury Youth and Burrunaryush, Ben-badad and Bar-hadad (see Brockelman’s Comparative Grammar, 136, 175, 220). It is possible, however, that the form Nebuchadrezzar is the Aram. tr. of the Bab Nebuchadnezzar. If we take the name to be compounded of Nabu-kudurri-usur in the sense ‘O Nabu, protect thy servant’ the name-kudurri-usur would be the best tr possible in Aramaic. Such a tr of proper names are common in the old Vetus and Scriptures and elsewhere. For example, in WAT. V. 44, we find 4 columns of proper names of persons giving the Semitic originals and the Sem tr of the tên of Bar-hadad in Aram. for Bēn-badad. In early Aram. the š had not yet become t (see Cooke, Text-Book of North-Semitic Inscriptions, 185 f; so that for any person who thought that kudurri meant ‘servant’ N. would be a perfect tr into Aram. of Nebuchadrezzar.

The father of N. was Nabopolassar, probably a Chaldean prince. His mother is not known by name. The classical historians mention two wives: Amytis, the daughter of Astyages, and Nitoeris, the mother of Nabonaid. The monuments mention three sons: Evil-merodach who succeeded him, Nebuchadnezzar, and Marduk-nadin-ahī. A younger brother of N., called Nabu-shum-lishtir, is mentioned on a building-inscription tablet from the time of Nabopolassar.

The sources of our information as to the life of N. are about 500 contract tablets dated according to the days, months and years of his reign of 43 years; about 30 building and honorific inscriptions; one historical inscription; and in the books of Jer, Ezek, Bar, and Jth. Further, there are the Books of Ch, Ezr, and the fragments of Berosus, Maneder, Megasthenes, Abydenus, and Alexander Polyhistor, largely as cited by Jos and Eusebius.

From these sources we learn that N. succeeded his father on the throne of Babylon in 604 BC, and reigned till 561 BC. He probably commanded plateau of Moab, ‘sinking gradually: at first a broad brown field of arable land, then a flat crowned by a ruined cairn, then a narrower ridge ending in the summit called Siqāghah, whence the slopes fall steeply on all sides. The name Nebo or Nebā [the ‘knob’ or ‘tumulus’] applies to the flat top with the cairn, and the name ‘Tel ‘al es-Sufa’ to the ascent leading up to the ridge from the N. Thus we have three names which seem to connect the ridge with that whence Moses is related to have viewed the Promised Land, namely, first, Nebo, which is identically the same word as the modern Nebū, secondly, Siqāghah, which is radically identical with the Aram. ‘Se’āth, the word standing instead of Nebo in the Tf of Onkoles [Nu 32 3], where it is called the burial place of Moses; thirdly, ‘Tel ‘al es-Sufa’, which is radically identical with the Heb Zoph (זופֶּה), where Mizpah (מיזָפֶה) and Zophim (זופים). . . . The name Pisgah is not now the armies of Babylon from 609 BC. At any rate, he was at the head of the army which defeated Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish on the Euphrates in 605 BC (see 2 K 23 31; History 2 Ch 35 20 ff). Having driven Pharaoh-necho out of Asia and settled the affairs of Syria and Pal, he was suddenly recalled to Babylon by the death of his father. There he seems quietly to have ascended the throne. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim (or 3d according to the Bab manner of reckoning (Dnl 1 1)), he came up first against Jerus and carried away part of the vessels of the temple and a few captives of noble lineage. Again, in Jehoiakim’s 11th year, he captured Jerus, put Jehoiakim, its king, into chains, and probably killed him. His successor, Jehoiachin, after a three months’ reign, was besieged in Jerus, captured, deposed, and carried captive to Babylon, where he remained in captivity 37 years until he was set free by Evil-mérodach. In the 9th year of Zedekiah, N. made a 4th expedition against Jerus which he besieged, captured, and destroyed (see Jer 52). In addition to these wars with Judah, N. carried on a long siege of Tyre, lasting 13 years, from his 7th to his 20th year. He had at least three wars with Egypt. The first culminated in the defeat of Necoh at Carchemish; the second in the withdrawal of Hophra (Apries) from Pal in the 1st year of the siege of Jerus under Zedekiah; and the third saw the armies of N. entering Egypt in triumph and defeating Amasis in N.’s 37th year. In the numerous building and honorable inscriptions of N. he makes no mention by name of his father or of his battles; but he frequently speaks of foes that he had conquered and of many peoples whom he ruled. Of these peoples he mentions by name the Hittites and others (see Langdon, 148-51). In the W’s great inscriptions he speaks of a special conquest of Lebanon from some foreign foe who had seized it; but the name of the enemy is not given.

The monuments justify the boast of N.: “Is not this great Babylon that I have built?” (Dnl 4 30).

Among these buildings special emphasis is placed by N. upon his temples and shrines to the gods, particularly to Marduk, Nebu, and Zar-pi-nat, but also to Shamash, Sin, Guila, Ramman, Mah, and others. He constructed, also, a great new palace and rebuilt an old one of his father’s. Besides, he laid out and paved with bricks a great street for the procession of Marduk, and built a number of great walls with moats and moats-walls and gates. He dug several broad, deep canals, and made dams for flooding the country to the N. and S. of Babylonia, so as to protect it against the attack of its enemies. He made, also, great bronze bulls and serpents, and adorned his temples and palaces with cedars and gold. Not merely in Babylon itself, but in many of the cities of Babylonia as well, his building operations were carried on, esp. in the line of temples to the gods.

The inscriptions of N. show that he was a very religious man, probably excelling all who had preceded him in the building of temples.

6. Religion, in the institution of offerings, and the etc. observance of all the ceremonies connected with the worship of the gods. His larger inscriptions usually contain two hymns and always close with a prayer. Mention is frequently made of the offerings of precious metals, stones and woods, of game, fish, wine, fruit, grain, and other objects acceptable to the gods. It is worthy of note that these offerings differ in character and apparently in purpose from those in use among the Jews. For example, no mention is made in any one of N.’s inscriptions of the pouring out or sprinkling of blood, nor is any reference made to atonement, or to sin.

No reference is made in any of these inscriptions to N.’s insanity, but aside from the fact that we could scarcely expect a man to publish his own calamity, esp. madness, it should be noted that according to N. we have but three inscriptions of his written in the period from 580 to 567 BC. If his madness lasted for 7 years, it may have occurred between 580 and 567 BC, or it may have occurred between the campaign of 567 BC and his death in 561 BC. But, as it is more likely that the “7 times” mentioned in Dnl may have been months, the illness may have been in any year after 580 BC, or even before that for all we know.

No mention is made on the monuments (1) of the dream of N. recorded in Dnl 2, or (2) of the image of gold that he set up, or (3) of the fiery furnace. 7. Madness, from which the three children were delivered (Dnl 3).

Ascribed (Dnl 4) to N., it is said, however, that a belief in dreams was so universal among all the ancient peoples that a single instance of this kind may not have been considered as worthy of special mention. The annals of Ashur-bal-pal and Nebuchadnezzar and Xerxes give a number of instances of the importance attached to dreams and their interpretation. It is almost certain that N. believed in them. That the dream recorded in Dnl is not mentioned on the monuments seems less remarkable than that no record of his is recorded. As to (2), we know that N. made an image of his royal person (salam sharratun, Langdon, XIX. B. col. x. 6: of the image of the royal person of Nabopolassar, id. p. 51), and it is certain that the images of Nebuchadnezzar were venerated in a bark in the New Year’s procession (id. pp. 157, 159, 163, 165) and that there were images of the former at all the temples (id. pp. 157, 159). The image was not received before these images. That N. should have made

NEEDY, nē'dē (נְדֵי, 'ebḥyōn). See Poon.

NEESEING, nē'zing (Job 41 18, AV, ERV "by his neesings a light doth shine," ARV "sneezings"): "Neeze" in Elizabethan Eng. (through two distinct derivations) could mean either "sneeze" or "snort." In the former, he cannot be caught between two words, which sense was intended by the AV editors. The Heb is נְקָנָה, 'ătāḇah, a word found only here, but connected with a Sem 'y meaning "sneeze," or, perhaps, "snort." Job 41 18 is part of the description of the "levitathan" or crocodile. This animal has a habit of inflating himself, and after this he discharges through his nostrils, heated vapours, which sparkle in the sunlight. The act is neither a "sneeze" nor a "snort," but the latter word is sufficiently descriptive, There is no allusion to legendary "fire-sputing" monsters. Cf Job 39 20; Jer 8 16.

In the older edd of AV 'neeze'd is found in 2 K 4 35; "and the child nesed seven times" (later edd and RV "sneezed"). BURTON SCOTT EASRON

NE Geb, neg'eb (נֶגֶב, ha-negeb, "the negeb," or simply, נָגֶב, negeb, from a Sem 'y meaning "to be-dry," and therefore in the first instance among the "dry wastes," "parished regions," hence in LXX it is usually ἄνθρωπος, ἄρμος, "desert," also ἄνεβο, ἄνεβα): As the Negeb lay to the S. of Judah, the word came to be used in the sense of "the South," and is so used in a few passages (e.g Gen 13 14) and in such is τὴν ἔρημον, λίπης (see GEOGRAPHY).

The Eng. tr is unsuitable in several passages, and likely to lead to confusion. For example, in Gen 13 1 Abraham is represented as going "into the South" when journeying northward from Egypt toward Bethel, in Nu 13 22 the spies coming from the "wilderness of Ziatar" pitched camp "as far south as the South" although they were going north. The difficulty in these and many other passages is at once obviated if it is recognized that the Negeb was a geographical term for a definite geographical region, just as Shephelah, lit. "lowland," was the name of another district of Pal. In RV "Negeb" is given in m, but it would make for clearness if it were restored to the text.

This "parished" land is generally considered as beginning S. of ed Dhabayt—"the probable site of Deirib (q.v.)—and as stretching S.

2. Description in a series of rolling hills running in a general direction of E. to W. until the actual wilderness begins, a distance of perhaps 70 m. from the E. in is bounded by the Dead Sea and the southern Ghor, and to the W. there is no definite boundary before the Mediterranean. It is a land of sparse and scanty springs and small rainfall; in the character of its soil it is a transition from the fertility of Canaan to the wildness of the desert; it is essentially a pastoral land, where grazing is plentiful in the early months and where camels and goats can sustain life, even through the long summer drought. Today, as through most periods of history, it is a land for the nomad rather than the settled inhabitant, although abundant ruins in many spots testify to better physical conditions at some periods (see I, 5, below). The direction of the valleys E. or W., the general dryness, and the character of the inhabitants have always made it a more or less isolated region without thoroughfare. The great routes pass along the coast to the W. or up the Arabah to the E. It formed an additional barrier to the wilderness beyond it; against all who would lead an army from the S. this southern frontier of Judah was always secure. Israel could not reach the promised land by this route, through the land of the Amalekites (Nu 15 29; 14 43-45).

The Negeb was the scene of much of Abram's wanderings (Gen 12 9; 13 13; 20 1); it was in this district that Hagar met with the angel (Gen

16 7-14); Issac (Gen 24 62) and Jacob (Gen

37 1; 46 5) both dwelt there. Moses

4. Later History of the districts of these various clans (see separate arts. under these names). The Negeb, together with the "hilly country" and the "Shephelah" was according to the journals (17 26; 32 44; 33 13) to have renewed prosperity after the captivity of Judah was ended.

When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerus the Edomites side with the Babylonians (cf. Lam 4 211; Ezek 25 15-19) it was only recently that Herod Agrrippa withdrew himself (Jos. Ant, XVIII, vi, 2).

The palmy days of this district appear to have been during the Byzantine period: the existing ruins, so far as they can be dated at all, belong to this time. Beersheba was an important city with a bishop, and Elusa (mentioned by Ptolemy in the 3d cent.) was the seat of a bishop in the 4th, 5th and 6th cents. After the rise of Mohammedan the land appears to have lapsed into primitive conditions. Although lawlessness and want of any central control may account for much depression, yet it is probable that Professor Ellsworth Huntington (q.v.) is right in asserting that a change of climate has had much to do with the rise and fall of civilization and settled habitation in this district. The district has long been given over to the nomad, and it is only quite recently that the Turkish policy of planting

It is clear that in at least two historic periods the Negeb enjoyed a very considerable prosperity. What it may have been in the days of the Prosperity life similar to the Bedouin of today but with better pasturage. In the division of the land among the tribes mention is made of many cities of the Negeb, e.g., 29 (Josh 15 21; 32; 19 1-9; 1 Ch 4 28-33)—and the weight of cattle evidently was great (of 1 S 1 19; 27 9; 30 16; 2 Ch 14 14 f.). The condition of things must have been far different from that of recent times.

The extensive ruins at Bir es Seba (Beersheba) Khelasa (Elusa), Ruhebe (Rehoborit, q.v.), Aweh and other cities, together with the signs of orchards, vineyards and gardens scattered widely through these and other sites, show how comparatively well populated this area was in Byzantine times in particular. Professor Huntington (loc. cit.) concludes from these ruins that the population of the large towns of the Negeb alone at this period must have amounted to between 45,000 and 50,000.
The whole district does not support 1,000 souls today.

NEHELMITE, ne-hel'a-mit, THE ('1115755, ha-nebel'don): The designation of Shemariah, a false prophet who opposed Jeremiah (Jer 29 24.31.32). The word means “dweller of Nehemiah,” but no such place-name is found in the OT. Its etymology, however, suggests a connection with the Heb halam, “to dream,” and this has given rise to the rendering of AvVm “dreamer.”

LITERATURE.

Nehemiah, the son of Hacaliah, is the Jewish patriot whose life is recorded in the Bible, work named after him. All that we know about him from contemporary sources is found in this book; and so the readers of this article are referred to the Book of Neh for the best and fullest account of his words and deeds. See Ezra-Nehemiah.

All that is known of his family is that he was the son of Hacaliah (1 1) and that one of his brothers was Hanani (1 2; 7 2); family, the latter a man of sufficient character and importance to have been made a ruler of Jerus.

From Neh 10 1–8 some have inferred that he was a priest, since Nehemiah comes first in the list of names ending with the phrase, “those were the priests.” This view is supported by the Syr and Arab. VSS of 10 1, which read: “Nehemiah the elder, the son of Hacaliah the priest of the priests’; and by the Lat Vulg of 2 Mac 1 21, where he is called “Nehemiah the priest,” and possibly by 2 Mac 1 18, where it is said that Nehemiah offered sacrifices, after that he had builded the temple and the altar.

This argument based upon Neh 10 1–8 will fail to the ground if we change the pointing of the “serahiy of the 3d” word read “therein referring back to the princes of verse 1.” In this case, Nehemiah and Zechariah would be the princes; then would come the priests and then the Levites.

Some have thought that he was of the royal line of Judah, inasmuch as he refers to his fathers’ sepulchres at Jerus (2 9). This would be a good argument only if it could be shown that none but kings had sepulchres at Jerus. It has been argued again that he was of noble lineage because of his position as cupbearer to the king of Persia. To substantiate this argument, it would need to be shown that none but persons of noble birth could serve in this position; but this has not been shown, and cannot be shown.

From the fact that Nehemiah was so grieved at the desolation of the city and the sephures of his fathers and that he was so jealous for the laws of the God of Judah, we can infer that he was brought up by pious parents, who instructed him in the history and law of the Jewish people.

Doubtless because of his probity and ability, he was apparently at an early age appointed to the taxexeros, king of Persia, to the responsible position of cupbearer to the king.

There is now no possible doubt that this king was Artaxerxes, the first of that name, commonly called Longimanus, who ruled over Persia from 464 to 424 BC.

The mention of the sons of Sannballat, governor of Samaria, in a letter written to the priests of Jerus in 407 BC, among whom Johanan is esp. named, proves that Sannballat must have ruled in the time of Artaxerxes I rather than in that of Artaxerxes II.

The office of cupbearer was “one of no trifling honor” (Herod. iii.34). It was one of his chief duties to taste the wine for the king to see that it was not poisoned, and he was even admitted to the king while the queen was present (Neh 2 6). It was on account of this position of close intimacy with the king that Nehemiah was able to obtain his commission as governor of Judaea and the letters and edicts which enabled him to restore the walls of Jerus.

The occasion of this commission was as follows: Hanani, the brother of Nehemiah, and other men of Judah came to visit Nehemiah 4. Governor while he was in Susa in the 9th month of Judaea of the 20th year of Artaxerxes. They reported that the Jews in Jerus were in great afflication and that the wall thereof was broken down and its gates burned with fire. Thereupon he grieved and fasted and prayed to God that he might be granted favor by the king. Having appeared before the latter in the 1st month of the 21st year of Artaxerxes, 444 BC, he was granted permission to go to Jerus to build the city of his fathers' sepulchres, and was given letters to the governors of Syria and Pal and esp. to Asaph, the keeper of the king's forest, ordering him to supply timber for the wall, the fortress, and the temple. He was also appointed governor of the province of which Jerus was the capital.

Armed with these credentials and powers he repaired to Jerus and immediately set about the restoration of the walls, a work in which he was hindered and harassed by Sannballat, the governor of Samaria, and others, some of them Jews dwelling in Jerus. Notwithstanding, he succeeded in his attempt and eventually also in providing gates for the various entrances to the city.

Having accomplished these external renovations, he instituted a number of social reforms. He appointed the priests for better service, and a new manner was introduced into the sabbath service which would have made possible the offering of sacrifices to the heathen, to keep the Sabbath, and to contribute to the upkeep of the temple. To provide for the safety and prosperity of the city, one out of every ten of the people living outside Jerus was compelled to settle in the city. In all of these reforms he was assisted by Ezra, who had gone up to Jerus in the 7th year of Artaxerxes.

Once, or perhaps oftener, during his governorship Nehemiah returned to the king. Nothing is known as to when or where he died. It is certain, however, that he was no longer governor in 407 BC; for at that time according to the Aram. letter written from Elephantine to the priests of Jerus, Bagohi was occupying the position of governor over Judaea. One of the last acts of Nehemiah's government was the chasing away of one of the sons of Joidat, the son of Eliashib, because he had become the son-in-law to Sannballat, by Artaxerxes II. This Joidat was the father of Johanan (Neh 12 22) who, according to the Aram. papyrus, was high priest in 407 BC, and according to Jos (Ant, XI, viii.1) was high priest while Bagohi (Bogos) was general of Artaxerxes' army, it is certain that Nehemiah was at this time no longer in power. From

Needy:

Nehemiah
the 3d of the Sachea pappiri, it seems that Bagoji was already governor in 410 B.C.; and, that at the same time, the son of Sanballat, was gover in Samaria. More definite information on these points is not to be had at present.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF. See Ezra-Nehemiah.

NEHEMIAH, nê-hê-mîa's: Gr form of Heb Nehemiah. (1) Neîmâ, Neemâ, one of the leaders of the return under Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 8) "=Nehemiah" of Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7. (2) Neîmâ, Neîmâ, Nezôr, Neh, Neal, Naimas, B. Nezâr, Naimâs, the prophet Nehemiah (1 Esd 5 40 where AV reads "N. who also is Atharias"). Neither Nehemias nor Atharias is found in the Ezr 2 62; Neh 7 65, but סבַּיך, ha-tîrsha'dâh = Tirshatha, "the gover," by whom Zerubbabel must be intended. Thus the Heb word for "governor" has been converted into a proper name, and by some blunder the ame Nehemiah inserted, perhaps because he also was known by the title of "governor."

NEHILOTH, ne-hîl'oth, ne-hi-loth (Ps 8, title).
See Mtsc.

NEHUM, ne'hum (נְהֻם, nēhūm): One of the twelve heads of the people who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7 7). In the 1 passage (Ezr 2 2), the name appears as Râhum (q.v.), and in 1 Esd 5 8 as "Roîmus."

NEHUSHKA, neh-hush'ka (נְהֻשְׁקָה, nēhushqâ): Mother of King Jehoiachin (2 K 24 8). She was the daughter of Elatiathan of Jerus. After the fall of Jerusalem, she was carried with her son and his court
(2 K 24 12; Jer 29 2).

NEHUSHKAN, neh-hush'kan (נְהֻשְׁקָן, nēhushqân; cf נֵהָשֵׁק, nēhāshék, "brass," and נֵהוֹק, nēhōq, "serpent,"
"serpent": The word occurs but once, viz. in 2 K 18 4. In the account there given of the reforms carried out by Hezekiah, it is said that "he brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made; for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it;
and he called it Nehushkan." According to RVm the word means "a piece of brass." If this be correct, the sense of the passage is that Hezekiah not only breaks the brazen serpent in pieces but, suitting the word to the act, scornfully calls it "a [more] piece of brass." However, this takes his place as a true reformer, and as a champion of the purifaction of the religion of Israel. This is the traditional interpretation of the passage, and fairly represents the Heb text as it now stands.

There are at least three considerations, however, which throw doubt upon this interpretation. In the first place, the word N. is not a common noun, and cannot mean simply "a piece of brass." The point of the Bib. statement is entirely lost by such a construction. It is emphatically a proper noun, and is the special name given to this particular brazen serpent. It is further said to be dedicated to all worshippers of the brazen serpent, rather than from nēhōq, "brass," (1) because the Gr VSS, representing a form of the Heb text earlier than MT, suggest this in their transliteration of N.
(2, N. Neksaleti; A. Nehushta); (2) because the Heb offers a natural derivation of N. from nēhāq, "serpent;" and (3) because the name of the image would more probably be based on its form than on the material out of which it was made. In the third place, the reading, "and it was called," which appears in RVm, is decidedly preferable to that in the text. It not only represents the best reading of the Heb, but is confirmed by the similar reading, "and they called it," which appears in the Gr VS referred to above. These readings agree in their indication that N. was the name by which the serpent-image was generally known during the years it was worshipped, rather than an expression used for the first time by Hezekiah on the occasion of its destruction.

Whichever derivation be adopted, however, the word must be construed as a proper noun. If it be derived from "brass," then the tr must be, not "a piece of brass," but "The [great] Brass," giving the word a special sense by which it refers unequivocoally to the well-known image made of brass. If it be derived from "serpent," then the tr must be,
"The [great] Serpent," the word in this case refer-ing in a special sense to the well-known image in serpent form. But the significance of the word probably lies far back of any etymological explanation of it that can now be given. It is not a term that can be adequately explained by reference to verbal roots, but is rather an epitome of the reverence of those who, however mistakenly, looked upon the brazen serpent as a proper object of worship.

In view of the foregoing it may be concluded,
(1) that N. was the (sacred) name by which the brazen serpent was known during the years the children of Israel did burn incense to it; (2) that the word is derived from nēhāq, "serpent;" and
(3) that it was used in the sense of "The Serpent," par excellence. See IMAGES, 6, (2); SERPENT, FIERY.

NEIEL, ne'el (נֵיֵיל, nevél; B. 'îveh, Inad,
A. 'îbhâ, Anâd): A town on the boundary between Zebulun and Asher mentioned between Jiftah-îl and Cabul (Josh 19 27). It may be the same as Neâch (ver 13), but the place is not identified.

NEIGH, nā (נָה, nāh, "to cry aloud, " neigh"): Figuratively used to indicate lustful desire (Jer 5 8; cf 13 20).

NEIGHBOR, nôbër (נָבָר, nôḇâr, מָשָׁר, "friend," נָגָר, nôgâr, "near," nôgâr, ha-מַשָּׁר, getôn, "neighbor," [cf 2 Macro 6 8; 8 25], "inhabitant," described in Lev 19 9 as a "countrman," the OT 10 2, RVm "townman"). In the OT, the relationship of neighborhood involves moral and social obligations which are frequently emphasized. These are in the main described in negative rather than positive terms; e.g. there are special injunctions to kindness to false witness against a neighbor (Ex 20 16; Dt 5 20; Prov 25 18), or in any way to deal falsely with

NEHUM, Book of
him, defraud him, frame malicious devices or harbor evil thoughts against him (Ex 20 17; Lev 6 2; 19 13; Dt 23 24 f; Ps 16 3; 101 5; Prov 24 28; Jer 22 13; Zec 8 17), or to lead him into a larger moral conduct (Hab 2 13) or to wrong him by lying carnally with his wife (Lev 18 20). But the supreme law that underlies these negative injunctions is stated positively, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself” (Lev 19 18). In this verse the term “neighbor” is defined by the expression, “the children of thy people.” Here, and generally in the OT, the term implies more than mere proximity; it means one related by the bond of nationality, a fellow-countryman, kinsman. Jeh being regarded as a national God, there was no religious bond regulating the conduct of the Hebrews with other nations. Conduct which was prohibited between fellow-Jews was permitted toward a foreigner, e.g. the exactation of interest (Dt 23 19 20).

In the NT this limitation of moral obligation to fellow-countrymen is abolished. Christ gives a wider interpretation of the commandment in Lev 19 18, so as to include in it those outside the tie of nation or kins. This is definitively done in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10 25–37), where, in answer to the question, “Who is my neighbor?” Jesus shows that the relationship is a moral, not a physical one, based not on kinship but on the opportunity and capacity for mutual help. The word represents, not so much a rigid fact, but an ideal which one may or may not realize (ver 36, “Which of these three, thinkest thou, proved [lit. became, not was] neighbor,” etc.). This commendation follows naturally as a corollary to the doctrine of the universal Fatherhood of God. The commandment to love one’s neighbor as one’s self must not be interpreted as if it implied that we are to hate our enemies (an inference which the Jews were apt to make); human love should be like the Divine, impartial, having all men for its object (Mt 5 44 48). Love to one’s fellow-men in the broad sense is to be placed side by side with love to God as the essence and sum of human duty (Mt 22 36 40; Mk 12 28 31). Christ’s apostles follow His example in giving a central position to the injunction to love one’s neighbor as one’s self (Jan 2 8, where it is called the “royal law,” i.e. the supreme or governing law; Rom 13 9; Gal 5 14).

NEKEB, ne'keb: This name occurs only in combination with “Adam” (עְנֶקֶּב הָאָדָם, ha-nekeb, “Adam of the pass”); LXX reads the names of two places: καὶ Ἀπελ καὶ Ναμεφ, καὶ Ἀρνα καὶ Ναβοκ (B); καὶ Ἀραμ καὶ Ναχέ, καὶ Ἀρμα τοῦ Ναχ (Josh 19 33), so we should possibly read “Adam and Nekeb.” Neubauer says (Gogô, du Talm, 225) that later the name of Nekeb was Cydadatha. It may therefore be represented by the modern Syêdah, not far from ed-Dâmieh to the E. of Tabor, about 4 miles S.W. of Tiberias. The name of Nekeb, a town in Galilee, appears in the list of Thothamis III.

NEKODA, nê-kô'dá (נֵקֹדָּה, nê-kô'dâ): (1) Head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 50; cf 1 Esd 5 31). (2) Head of a family which failed to prove its Levitical descent (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62; cf 1 Esd 5 31 37). In the v of 1 Esd the names are given thus: Neoba and Nekodan (q.v.).

NEKODAN, nê-kô'dân (נֵקֹדַּם, nê-kô'dân; RVm “Nekodas”; AV Nekodan): (1) Head of a family which returned from exile, but “could not show their families nor their stock” (1 Esd 5 37) = “Nekodas” of Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62. (2) See Noeba.

NEMUEL, nem’ô-el, nê-mû’el (נֵמְעֻל, nôm’âl): (1) A Reubenite, brother of Dathan and Abiram (Nu 26 9). (2) A son of Simeon (Nu 26 12; 1 Ch 4 24). The name occurs also in the form “Jemuel” (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15). According to Gray (HPN), either form is etymologically obscure; but Nemuel is probably correct, for it is easier to account for its corruption into Jemuel than vice versa. The patronymic Nemuelites occurs once (Nu 26 12).

NEPHEG, nê’leg (נֶפֶהָג, nepheh, “sprout”); “shooit”. (1) Son of Ishah, and brother of Korah of the famous trio, Korah, Dathan and Abiram (Ex 6 21). (2) A son of David (2 S 5 15; 1 Ch 3 7; 14 6).

NEPHILIM, nêf’il-im (נְפִּילים, nêphîlim): This word, tr “giants” in AV, but retained in RV, is found in two passages of the OT—one in Gen 6 4, relating to the antediluvians; the other in Nu 13 33, relating to the sons of Anak in Canaan. In the former place the Nephihile are not necessarily to be identified with the children said to be borne by “the daughters of men” to “the sons of God” (vs 24); indeed, they seem to be distinguished from the latter as upon the earth before this unholy commingling took place (see Sons of God). But it is not easy to be certain as to the interpretation of this strange passage. In the second case they clearly represent men of gigantic stature, in comparison with whom the Israelites felt as if they were “grasshoppers.” This agrees with Gen 6 4, “the mighty men that were of old, the men of renown.” LXX, therefore, was warranted in translating by gigantes.

NEPHTHALI, nêf’tâ-li, nêf’tâlî. See Nephtah.

NEPHTHALIM, nêf’tâ-lîm (Mt 4 13): The Gr form of Naphtali (q.v.).

NEPHTHAR, nêf’târ (נֶפֶתָרָה, Nephtâr; A and Swete, Nephtâr, AV and Vulg Naphthe). NEPHTHAI (נֶפֶתָא, Nepftah, al. Nefau, Naphthai, Naphthaih, Naphtha, Vulg Nephté, AV and Vulg, following Old Lat, Nephe; Swete, following A, gives Nepthar twice): According to 2 Mace 1 19–36, at the time of the captivity the godly priests took of the altar fire of the temple and concealed it “privily in the hollow of a well that was without water,” unknown to all. “After many years’
(upon the Return), before offering the sacrifices, Nehemiah sent the descendants of the godly priests to the Temple. The priests reported that they could find no fire but only "thick water" (διόμω παχός, ἱδώρ παχῶ), which he commanded them to draw up and sprinkle upon the wood and the sacrifices. After an interval the sun shone forth from behind a cloud, and a sister of Psalms, the angelic servant of the sacrifices. Nehemiah then commanded them to pour (καταχείν, katabeíon, al. κατάχειν, katácheíon, and καταρείν, katareínei) the rest of the liquid upon great stones. Another flame sprang up which soon spent itself, "because the light from the altar shone still" (RVm, the exact meaning being doubtful). When the king of Persia investigated it, he inclosed the spot as sacred. Nehemiah and his friends called the thick liquid "Nepthar," which is by interpretation "cleansing." (kathaphereús, katharismós), "but most men call it Nepthai".

No satisfactory explanation is to hand of either name, one of which is probably a corruption of the other. And no word exists in the Heb like either of them with the meaning of "cleansing," "purification" and the name to the spot (hunc locum), not the thing. The story probably originated in Persia, where naphtha was abundant. The ignition of the liquid by the hot rays of the sun and the appearance of the words render it highly probable that it was the inflammable rock-oil of naphtha, the combustible properties of which were quite familiar to the ancients (Pliny, NH, ii. 100; Plutarch, Alex. 35; Diod. i. 101; Strabo, Geogr. xvi, 1, 15); the words then are probably corruptions of what the Greeks termed κάθαρα, nepthha. Ewald (Hist. V, 163) says: "This is but one of the many stories which sought in later times to enhance the very high sanctity of the Temple, with reference even to its origin." S. Angus Nephtoah, net-t'oah, net't'o-a (תֵּיתוֹא, nephto'a), occurs only in the expression תֵּיתוֹא נַפְפָּתָה, ma'yram me 'a, "the fountain of the waters of Nephtoah"; LXX πηγὴ ὑδάτων Naphtha, pòg húdatos Naphtho) This spring was on the border line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 9; 18 15). The place is usually identified with Lítfoa, a village about 2 miles N.W. of Jerus, on the east bank of the Wady biit Hanina. It is a village very conspicuous to the traveler along the high road from Jaffa as he approaches Jerusalem. There are ancientExcavations, a walk-cut tunnel and a copious spring which emps itself into a large masonry reservoir. The situation of Lítfoa seems to agree well with the most probable line of boundary between the two tribes; the spring as it today does not appear to be so abundant as to warrant such an expression as "spring of the waters," but it was, like many such sources, probably considerably more abundant in OT times.

Conder would identify Lítfoa with the ancient Eléph (q.v.) of Benjamin, and, on the ground that the Talm (see Talm Bah, Yom'd 310) identifies Nephtoah with Emál (q.v.), he would find the site of Nephtoah at 'Atîn 'Atîn, S. of Bethlehem. The Talm is not a sufficiently trustworthy guide when unsupported by other evidence, and the identification creates great difficulty with the boundary line. See PEF, II, 18, 43, Sh XVII.

Nereus, nē'rús, nēr'ē-us (Νερέως, Nereús): The name of a Rom Christian to whom with his sister St. Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 15). Nereus and the others saluted with him (ver 15) formed a small community or "house church." The name of the sister is not given, but the name Nereis is found on an inscription of this date containing names of the emperor's servants (Lightfoot, Phil. 176). Among the Acta Sanctorum connected with the early church in Rome are the "Acts of Nereus and Achilleus" which call them chamberlains of Domitilla, the niece of Vespasian, and relate their story over her in persuading her to remain a virgin.

Nerias, nē'rî-ās (Nērifēas, Nērefēias): The Gr form of Heb Neriah found only in Bar 1 1 as the father of Baruch = "Neriah" of Jer 32 12; 36 4 f; 43 3. To Baruch's brother, Seraiah, the same genealogy is ascribed in Jer 51 59.

Nero, nē'ro (Νερός, Nērō): I. Name, Parentage and Early Training II. Agripina's Ambition for Nero III. Nero's Reign IV. Downfall and Character V. "Nero Redivivus" VI. Nero and Christianity

The fifth Rom emperor, b. at Antium December 15, 37 AD, began to reign October 13, 54, d. June 9, 08.

I. Name, Parentage and Early Training.—His name was originally Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus.
but after his adoption into the Claudian gens by the emperor Claudius, he became Nero Claudius Britannicus. His father was Emperor Domitianus Athenobarbus ("Brazen-beard"), a man sprung from an illustrious family and of vicious character. His mother was Agrippina the younger, the daughter of Germanicus and the elder Agrippina, sister of the emperor Caligula (Caligua) and niece of the emperor Claudius. On the birth of the child, his father predicted, amid the congratulations of his friends, that any offspring of himself and Agrippina could only prove abominable and disastrous for the public (Suet. Nero vii: detectabile et malo publico). At the age of three the young Domitian lost his father and was robbed of his estates by the rapacity of Caius. In 39 his mother was banished for supposed complicity in a plot against Caius. N. was thus deprived of his mother and at the same time left almost penniless. His maternal uncle, Domitius Lepida, now undertook the care of the boy and placed him with two tutors, a dancer and a barber (Suet. vi). On the accession of Claudius, Agrippina was recalled, and N. was restored to his mother and his patrimony (40).

II. Agrippina's Ambition for Nero.—She cared little for her son's moral education, but began immediately to train him for high position. She aimed at nothing less than securing the empire for N. With a view to this she must gain influence over her uncle, the emperor Claudius, who was very susceptible to female charms. At first the path was by no means easy, while the licentious empress, Messalina, was in power. But on the fall and death of Messalina (48 AD)—for which Agrippina may have intrigued—the way seemed opened.

With the assistance of the emperor's freedman, Pallus, Agrippina proved the successful candidate for Claudius' affections. She now felt secure to carry out the plans for the elevation of her son:

(1) Her betrothal to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius, having previously, by the villainy of Vitellius, broken off the engagement between Octavia and Lucius Silanus (ib. xviiiii). Later, N. married this unfortunate lady. (2) Vitellius again obliged by securing a modification of Roman law so as to permit a marriage with a brother's (not sister's) daughter, and in 49 Agrippina became empress. (3) In the meantime she had caused Seneca to be recalled from banishment and had instilled to him the education of N. for imperial purposes. (4) The adoption of her son by Claudius (50 AD). (5) She next secured early honors and titles for N. in order to mark him out as Claudius' successor. (6) She caused Britannicus, Claudius' son, to be kept in the background and treated as a mere child, removing by exile or death suspected supporters of Britannicus. (7) Agrippina was far-sighted and anticipated a later secret of Roman imperial— the influence of the armies in the nomination of the successor. For this cause she took an active interest in military affairs and gave her name to a new colony on the Rhine (modern Cologne). But she did not forget the importance of securing the praetorian guard and Burrus the prefect. (8) She persuaded Claudius to restore his friends. All this was now ready. But Claudius did not like the idea of excluding his son Britannicus from power, and murmurs were heard among the senate and people. Delay might prove fatal to Agrippina's plans, so (9) Claudius must die. The notorious Locusta administered poison in a dish of mushrooms, and Xenophon, Agrippina's physician, thrust a poisoned feather down Claudius' throat on the pretence of helping him to vomit. Burrus then took N. forth and caused him to be proclaimed emperor by the praetorians.

III. Nero's Reign.—Nero's reign falls into three periods, the first of which is the celebrated quinquennium, or first 5 years, characterized by good government and general popularity with both senate and people. Agrippina, having seated her son on the throne, did not purpose to relinquish power herself; she intended to rule along with him. And at first N. was very devoted to her and had given as watchword to the guard, "the best of mothers!" (Tac. Ann. xiii.2; Suet. ix). This caused a sharp conflict with Seneca and Burrus, who could not tolerate Agrippina's arrogance and unbounded influence over her son. In order to drag him, with his mother encouraged him in an amour with a Gr. freedwoman, Acte (Tac. Ann. xiii.12).

This first blow to Agrippina's influence was soon followed by the dismissal from court of her chief protector Pallas. She then fell into the hands of Britannicus and present him as the rightful heir to the throne. This cost Britannicus his life, for N., feeling insecure while a son of Claudius lived, compassed his death at a banquet. A hot wine cup was offered Britannicus, and to cool it food was added which had been adulterated with a virulent poison. The victim succumbed immediately. All eyes fastened on N. in suspicion, but he boldly asserted that the death was due to a fit of epilepsy—a disease to which Britannicus had been subject from childhood. Such was the fate of Agrippina's first protégé. She next took up the cause of the despised and ill-treated Octavia, which so incensed her son that he deprived her of her guards and caused her to remove from the palace. Agrippina now disappears for the next few years to come into brief and tragic prominence later. Seneca and Burrus undertook the management of affairs, with results that justified the favorable impression which the first 5 years of N.'s reign made upon the Roman people. Many reforms were initiated, financial, social and legislative. These ministers treated N. to counsellors of moderation and justice, dictating a policy which left considerable liberty to the senate. But perceiving the depth of his evil nature, they allowed him to indulge in low pleasures and excesses with the most profligate companions, thinking, perhaps, that the young ruler would in this way prove less harmful to the public than that, after sowing his wild oats, he would return to the serious business of government. But in both ways they were sorely disappointed, for N., having surrendered himself to the basest appetites, continued to go from excess to excess. He surrounded himself with the most dissolute companions, conspicuous among whom were Salvius Otho and Claudius Senecio.

The former had a wife as ambitious as she was unprincipled, and, endowed, according to Tacitus, with every gift of nature except an "honorable mind." Already divorced before marrying Otho, she was minded to employ Otho merely as a tool to enable her to become N.'s consort. With the appearance of Poppea, Sabina for such was her name, opens the second period of N.'s reign. She proved his evil star. Under her influence he shook off all restraints, turned a deaf ear

Nero (Brit. Mus.).

1. Quinquennium Nerois

2. Poppea Sabina (58 AD)
to his best advisers and plunged deeper into immorality and crime. She allowed, if not persuaded, N. to give her husband a commission in the distant province of Lusitania. Her jealousy could tolerate no possible rival. She plotted the death of Agrippina to which she easily persuaded N. to consent. The plot was frustrated and N. was informed. Agrippina, with the greatest cunning, Anicetus, admiral of the fleet, undertook to construct a vessel that would sink to order. N. invited his mother to his villa at Baiae at the Quinquageneries celebration. After the banquet she revealed the scheme to Baiae by the vessel prepared. But the plan did not succeed, and Agrippina saved herself by swimming ashore. She pretended to treat the matter as an accident, sending a freedman to N. to inform him of her escape. Anicetus, however, relieved N. of the awkward position by pretending that Agrippina's freedman had dropped a dagger which was considered proof enough of her guilt. Deserted by her friends and slaves except one freedman, she was quickly dispatched by her murderers. N. gave out that she had died by suicide (Suet. xxxiv; Tac. Ann. cxi-cxviii).

N. no longer made any secret of taking Poppaea as his mistress, and, under her influence, bid defiance to the best Rom traditions and laws. As the result of intrigue, rumour, and jealousy, 62 AD matters grew much worse by the death of the praetorian prefect, Burrus. Seneca lost in him a powerful ally, and Poppaea gained in one of the new prefects, Sostratus Tigellinus, a powerful ally. She succeeded in causing Seneca to retire from the court. Next she determined to remove Octavia. A charge of adulterity was first tried, but as the evidence proved too weak, N. simply divorced her because of barrenness. Then anicetus was persuaded to confess adultery with her, and the innocent Octavia was banished to the island of Pandateria, where a little later she was executed at Poppaea's orders and her head brought to her rival (62 AD). Poppaea was now empress, and the next year bore a daughter to N., but the child died when only three months old. Two years later Poppaea herself died during pregnancy, of a cruel kick inflicted by N. in a fit of rage (65 AD). He pronounced a eulogy over her and took as his third wife, Statilia Messalina, of whom he had no issue.

N., having by his extravagance exhausted the well-filled treasury of Claudius (as Catus did that of Tiberius), was driven to fill his coffers by confiscations of the riches of rich nobles, against whom his creature Tigellinus could trump the slightest plausible charge. But even this did not prevent a financial crisis—the beginning of the bankruptcy of the later Rom empire. The provinces which at first enjoyed good government were now plundered; new and heavy taxes were imposed. Worst of all, the gold and silver coinage was depreciated, and the senate was deprived of the right of copper coinage.

This difficulty was much increased by the great fire which was not only destructive to both private and state property, but also necessitated the providing thousands of homeless with shelter, and lowering the price of corn. On July 18, 64, this great conflagration broke out in Circus Maximus. A high wind caused it to spread rapidly over a large portion of the city, sweeping before it ill-built streets of wooden houses. At the end of six days it was declared to have been extinguished for lack of material, when another conflagration started in a different quarter of the city. Various exaggerated accounts of the destruction are found in Roman historians: of the 14 city regions 7 were said to have been totally destroyed and 4 partially. N. was at Antium at the time. He hurried back to the city and apparently took every means of arresting the spread of the flames. He superintended in person the work of the fire brigades, often exposing himself to danger. After the fire he threw open his own gardens to the homeless. This act of humanity caused great consternation, and, for whatever reasons, suspicion seemed to fix upon N. Rumor had it that on hearing the Greek verse, "When I am dead let the earth be wrapped in fire," he interrupted, "Nay rather, when live" (Suet. xviii) that had often deplored the ugliness of the city wished an opportunity to rebuild it; that he purposely set it on fire in order to find room for his magnificent Domus Aurea ("Golden House"); that when the city was burning he gazed upon it from the tower of Maecenas delighted with what he termed "the beauty of the conflagration"; that he recited in actor's costume the sack of Troy (Suet. xxxviii; Tac. Ann. xv.38 ff.). In spite of all these reports N. must be absolved of the guilt of incendiarism.

Such pathological traits were attributed to the wrath of the gods. In the present case everything was done to appease the offended deity. Yet, in spite of all, suspicion still clung to N. "Wherefore in order to avert the anger of the gods against this guilty [subsidit reos], and afflicted with the most exquisite punishments those who were hated for their abominations [flagitia] and called Christians' by the populace, Christus, from whom the name was derived, was punished by the tribune of the Praetorian Pontius Pilatus in the reign of Tiberius. This noxious form of religion [exitiatia superstitionis], checked for a time, broke out again not only in Judaea its original home, but also throughout the empire as a result of which the abominations meet and find devotees. Therefore first of all those who confessed [i.e. to being Christians] were arrested, and then as a result of their information a large number [multitude ingens] were implicated [reading conincti, not convici], as much on the charge of incendiarism as for hatred of the human race. They died by methods of mockery; some were covered with the skins of wild beasts and then torn by dogs, some were crucified, some were burned as torches to give light at night . . . whence [after scenes of extreme cruelty] commiseration was excited for them, although guilty and deserving the worst penalties, for men felt that their destruction was not on account of the public welfare but to gratify the cruelty of a tyrant [Nero]" (Tac. Ann. xx.44). Such is the earliest account of the first heathen persecution (as well as the first record of the crucifixion by a heathen writer). Tacitus here clearly implies that the Christians were innocent [subsidit reos], and that N. employed them simply as scapegoats. Some regard the conclusion of the paragraph as a contradiction to this—"though guilty and deserving the severest punishment" (adversus santes et insansima exempla meritos). But Tacitus means by some that the Christians were "guilty" from the point of view of the populace, and that they merited extreme punishment also from his own standpoint for other causes, but not for arson. Fatebantur does not mean that they confessed to incendiarism, but to being Christians, and qui fatebantur means there were some who boldly confessed, while others tried to conceal or perhaps even denied their faith.

But why were the Christians selected as scapegoats? Why not the Jews, who were both numerous and had lately been driven from the Rom empire (falsely said to have been banished in great numbers)? Or why not the members of the oriental religions, which had proved more than once obnoxious (1 Psellos wrote of the Jews to Judaism and had certain influence over N.? to protect the Jews; she was regarded by them as a proselyte and is termed by Jos. (Ant. xx, viii, 33) theo-phoro, theoseba, "god-fearing." When the populace and the Senate were preparing for revolt against the Jews, they had been glad of the opportunity of putting forward the pretense that Galba had been embezzled in the fund, the Papppa.

Parrar (Early Days of Christianity, 1, ch iv) sees, "in the proselytism of Papppa, guided by Jewish nurse, and led to the cognition of the first Christian persecution." (2) Closely connected with this was the bewitchment by the Roman government that Christianity was an independent faction from Judaism.

This may first have been brought home to the authorities by the death of Panthos and later by Anthes (G. E., Expos, July, 1893). Judasim was a recognized and tolerated religion, a religio licita, and Christianity when denounced as Galba's crime (Galba and Christianitv isshable by the state, for Christianity first rose "under the shadow of licensed Judaism (Tert. adv. Judaicos Judaicerum religionis: Tert. Apol, xvi). (3) As Christianity formed a society apart from Roman society, all kinds of crimes were attributed to its followers. Thysseans, feasts, nightly orgies, hostility to temples and images. These fopit.must seemed summus in adum humani generis, "hatred for the human race." (4) They were easily selected as being so numerous and making most progress in a line opposed to Rom spirit: of easum multitudo (Tac. Ann, xvi, 44: Clemens Rom.

Cor 1, 6: saevius, saevo pilthe, of also "great multitude" of Rev 7: 9, 10). (5) No doubt, too, early Christian enthusiasm was unequivocal in its expressions, esp.

in its belief in gravitas or "death", and the world and its serene faith amid the despair of others.

In the meantime Tigellinus' tyranny and con-fiscations to meet N.'s expenses caused deep discontent among the nobles, which culminated in the famous conspiracy at

N.'s death (66 AD). Calpurnius

Piso. The plot was prematurely betrayed by Milichius. An inquisition followed in which the most illustrious victims perished were Seneca, the philosopher, Lucan the poet, Lucius' mother (his illegitimate sister of Sceca and father of Lucan, T. Petro-nious Arbiter, "the glass of fashion." Finally, "N.

having butchered so many illustrious men, at last desired to exterminate virtue itself by the death of

Having cleared every suspected person out of the way, he abandoned the government in Rome to a freedman Helius, and started on a long visit to Greece (66-67 AD), where he ran the usual contests and games, himself winning prizes from the obsequious Greeks, in return for which N. bestowed upon them "freedom." N.

was so un-Roman that he was perfectly at home in Greece, whereas he had been appreciated by cultured people. In the meantime the revolt of Vindex in Gaul commenced (68 AD), but it was soon quelled by Verginian Rufus on account of its national Gaulish character. Galba of Etrurian Spain next declared himself pretor of the senate and the

Rom people. N. was persuaded to return to Rome by Helius; he confiscated Galba's property, but his weakness and hesitancy greatly helped the cause of the latter.

Nymphidius Sabinus, one of the prefects, won over the guard for Galba, by persuading the irreso-lute emperor to withdraw from Rome

8. Death and then told the praetorians that N.

had deserted them. N. was a coward, both in life and in death. While he had the means to escape, he had been revolving plans of despair in his Servilian gardens, whether he should surrender himself to the mercies of the Parthians or to those of Galba; whether

Galba would allow him the province of Egypt;

what he would forgive him; and how he showed penitence enough. In his distraction a comforter asked him in the words of Virgil, "Is it then so wretched to die?" He could not summon the courage for suicide, nor could he find one to inflict the blow for him; "Have I then no friend nor foe?" Phan a freedman offered him the shelter of his villa a few miles from Rome. Here he prepared for suicide, but with great cowardice.

He kept exclaiming, "What an artist I am to perish!"

(Qualis artifex pereo, Suet. xlix). On learning that his schemes were condemned to a cruel death by the senate, he put the knife to his throat and was stabbed in the fatal blow by Epaphroditus his secretary.

A centurion entered pretending he had come to help;

"Too late--this is fideity," were Nero's last words.

His remains were laid in the family vault of the emperor Domitius by order of Domitius and his concubine Acte (Suet. I). Thus perished

on July 9, 68 AD the last of the line of Julius Caesar in his 31st year and in the 14th of his reign.

IV. Downfall and Character. --The causes of his downfall were:

1. Seven

Causes of Downfall

Nero ranks with Galba for folly and vice, while his cruelettes recall the worst years of Tiberius. Very offensive in his tastes, particular about the arrangement of his private rooms, his voice, his greatest fault was inordinate vanity which courted applause for performances on non-Rom lines. He neglected his high office and deprecated Rom granae by zeal for secondary pursuits. N., like his three predecessors, was very susceptible to female charms. He was licentious in the extreme, often to gull of that nameless vice of antiquity love of a male favorite. His desire that N. had not really died, but was living somewhere in retirement or had fled among the Parthians, and that he was destined in a short time to return and bring great calamity upon his enemies or the world (quo viscentis et brevi magni vii, 27) was a force among the Parthians who were ready to take up arms at the report of the return of the emperor.

In the confusion of the year of the four emperors,

N., and Asia were disturbed by the report of the advent of the Parthian (Tac. Hist. i, 45). The historian promises to mention the fortune and attempts of other pseudo-Neros. This was by no means the first attempt to gamitate with their legend of Antichrist. In Act Isra

(1st cent. AD), the Antichrist is clearly identified with the Parthian; and in the Apoc. (8, 3), the same idea is widely distributed, "the mark of wickedness, the matricide." It occurs again and again in both Jewish and Christian sects, from the Sib Or. (3 66, 4: 117, 5): Sib. Or. (10, 136, 2, 4).

How far N. was regarded by the Christians as the antichristian of the Jews. That the common belief of the revival of N. should influence the contemporary Christian thought, in the days of social and political turmoil highly probable.

Bousset (Comm.) regards the beast of Rev 13 as Rome, and the smitten head whose "deathstroke was hoisted" as N., and some scholars take Rev 17 10 f. as referring to N. The "scarlet, cet-color'd beast" of 17 3 may be intended either for Rome or for its "empire" N. in particular. That the number 666 (Rev 13 18) represents the sum of the ages of Neron Kesar is significant, for the Jewish Christians would be familiar with simphýiain (the numerical equivalent of "666") as in Neron Kesar's name, and also 852, as in Christ (see ch xxviii, sec. 5). In later times the idea of a twofold Antichrist was followed, and that of the Jew and Gentile being one for the Gentiles; cf. esp. Commodian, Carm. Apol. (920): "to us N. became Antichrist, to the Jews the other Antichrist, to the future coming of Christ. There was an alternate theory that N. had really been killed and thereby to rise again (8th Ob 5 216 f; Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xxix. 19; under Nero the house of dearest comes or resurrection et futurum Antichristus suscipiantur)."

VI. NERO AND CHRISTIANITY. — The name Nero does not occur in the NT; but he was the Caesar to whom Paul appealed (Ac 26 10). 1. Nero and the NT. — It is quite likely that N. heard Paul's case in person, for the emperor showed much interest in his principal predecessor, the earlier "golden quinquennium" of N.'s reign that Paul addressed his ep. to the Christians at Rome, and probably in the year N.'s reign (68 AD) Paul suffered death near the city, though Harnack (Christianity in the Oecumenical Period, 1918, 192. p. 292) represents the first Neronian persecution of 64. Although the NT gives no hint of a possible visit or sojourn of Peter in Rome, such a sojourn and subsequent martyrdom are highly probable and almost certain from the early persistent tradition in Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Papias, and later in Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and the Liber Pontificalis (catalogue of popes). His execution at Rome under Nero is practically certain.

2. The first persecution to which Christianity was subjected came from the Jews: the first heathen persecution took place under N. Up to this time the Roman government had been on friendly terms with Christianity, as Christianity was not an organized religion but any disturbance of society or was confounded by the Romans with Judaism (sub umbrae beatae Judaearum religiosarum: Pte. Apol., xxi). Paul, writing to the Christians of the capital, urged them to "be in subjection to the powers" as "ordained of God" (Rom 13 1 f), and his high estimation of the Roman government as power for good was probably strengthened by its mild captivity at Rome which permitted him to carry on his mission and to be ordained bishop on the first trial (accepting the view of a first acquittal and subsequent activity before condemnation). But soon after, because of the trial of Paul, a Roman citizen, at Rome (about 60), or of his growing holiness in the increasing numbers and the coming progress of the new religion, the distinction between Christianity and Judaism became apparent to the Roman authorities. If it had not yet been prescribed as a religio illicita ("unlicensed religion"), neither had it been admitted as a religio licita. Christianity was not in itself yet a crime: its adherents were not liable to persecution "for the name." According to one view the Neronian persecution was a sporadic act and an isolated incident in imperial policy: the Christians were on this occasion put forward merely to reassure the Neronian paranoia. They were not persecuted either as Christians or as incendiaries, but on account of flagitious practices, such as selling eggs. Oedipodan incest and nightiy orgies were attributed to them, and their withdrawal from society and exclusive manners were considered as the charge of "superstition for society." The evidence of Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) would bear out this view of the Neronian persecution as accidental, isolated, to satisfy the revenge of the mob, confined to Rome and of brief duration. The other view is, however, maintained by Church History (church History of the Roman Empire, ch xi) and E. G. Hardy (Studies in Roman Antiquities, 1897) and is that of the persecution of Christians as a permanent police regulation in a list of other seemingly permanent measures (Nero xxv. 1: "Roman christiani superstitionem nune quoque ad malfacta"), which is not inconsistent with the account of Tacitus. A change in the initial step determined the permanent result. The Christians by these trials, though not convicted of incendiarism, were subjected to considerable restraint; their social and exclusive manners, their withdrawal from the duties of the state, their active proselytism, together with the charges of immorality, thus born in them in Rome as the enemies of society. Christianity thus became a crime and was banned by the police authorities. Suetonius gives a detail which may be the historical foundation for the terrible principle into which N.'s action ultimately resolved itself. The Roman scholar Heiser says, but Hardy holds that henceforth the name itself—men superstitiosi, aunque that new word—thereafter is to be used. If the matter could be left with the prefect of the city. A trial must be held and the fugitive condemned before the prefect. Early Dogm. xxvii. 28 f. shows that Nero ordered it to suppose that the Neronian persecution of 64 extended beyond Rome to the provinces, though the present attitude of the Roman government has not had considerable influence with provincial officials. Paul seems to have gone unimpeached, or at least to have escaped obstacles, in his evangelization after his acquittal. The authorities for a general Neronian persecution and formal Roman law against Christianity are: Of course (Hist. vii. 7, "Nero was the first to put to death Christians at Rome and gave orders that they should be subjected to the same persecution throughout all the provinces")."
demanded their use, at least in the case of pigeons and doves, for sacrifice. In 29 18, Job cries,

"Then I said, I shall die in my nest, And I shall multiply my days as the sand." That is, he hoped in his days of prosperity to die in the house he had built for his wife and children. In Ps 84 3 David sings,

"Yea, the sparrow hath found her a house, And the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young. Even shine altars, O Jeh of hosts, My King, and my God."

These lines are rich and ripe with meaning, for in those days all the world protected a temple nest, even to the infliction of the death penalty on anyone interfering with it. This was because the bird was supposed to be claiming the protection of the gods. Hebrew, Arab and Egyptian guarded all nests on places of worship. Pagan Rome executed the shoemaker who killed a raven that built on a temple, and Athens took the same revenge on the man who destroyed the nest of a swallow. Isaiah compared the destruction of Assyria to the robbing of a bird's nest: "And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the peoples; and as one gathereth egrets that are forsaken, have I gathered all the earth: and there was none that moved the wing, or that opened the mouth, or chirped" (Isa 10 14; cf 16 2). Matthew quotes Jesus as having said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heaven have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." (Mt 8 20=Lk 9 58). GENE STRATTON-PORTER

NETAIM, nē'ta-im, nē'ta-im, nē-ta-im (נֵתַיָּם, nē타'aym; B, ἄντανι, Ántaní, A, Ἀντανί, Ἀτανί): In 1 Ch 4 23 AV reads "those that dwell among plants and hedges," RV "the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah." The latter may be taken as correct. Gederah was in the Judaean Shephelah. Here also we should seek for Netaim, but no likely identification has yet been suggested.

NETHANIEL, nē-tha'nē-el, nētha-n'e-l, (נְתַנְיָּאל, nē'tanyā'el; nethanniel, nēthan'iel), "God has given": (1) A chief or prince of Issachar (Nu 1 8; 2 5; 7 19; 23; 10 15). (2) The 4th son of Jesse (1 Ch 2 14). (3) One of the trumpet-blowers before the ark when it was brought up from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15 24). (4) A Levite scribe, the father of Shemariah (1 Ch 24 6). (5) The 5th son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 4). (6) One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17 7). (7) A Levite who gave cattle for Josiah's Passover (2 Ch 35 19). (8) One of the priests who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 22; cf 1 Esd 9 22). (9) A priest registered under the high priest Joakim (Neh 12 21). (10) A Levite musician who assisted at the dedication of the walls (Neh 12 36). JOHN A. LEES

NETHANIAH, nēth-a-ni'āh (נְתַנְיָּאָה, nēthanyā'āh; "Jeh has given"): (1) An Asaphite musician (1 Ch 25 21 22). (2) A Levite who accompanied the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17 8). (3) The father of Jehudi (Jer 36 14). (4) The father of Iahmud, the murderer of Gedaliah (Jer 40 8 14 15; 41, 11 12; 2 K 25 23 25). Some MSS of LXX read here Mathithiæus.

NETHINIIM, nēth'i-nim (נְתַנְיָּיִם, nēthi'nīm, "given"): (1) Nethinei, Nathaneim; AV Nethinim): A group of temple-servants (1 Ch 9 2). 1. Meaning 2 and 16t in Ezr and Neh. The word has always the article, and does not occur in the sing. The LXX translators usually translatate, but in one passage (1 Ch 9 2) they render, "the given ones" (hoi dedeménon). The Syr (Pesh) also, in Ezr, Neh, translatates the word, but in 1 Ch 9 2 renders it by a word meaning "sojourner" (simeôn, dôrêmod). The meaning is that of a state of servitude, and Jos seems to confirm the suggestion by calling the N. "temple-slaves" (hierôdoulois) (Ant, XI, v, 1). It should, however, be noted that another form of this word is employed in the directions regarding the Levites: "They shall give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons: they are wholly given unto him on behalf of the children of Israel" (Nu 3 9; cf also 8 16 19). Of the history of the N. in earlier times there are but few and uncertain traces. When Joshua discovered that he had been beguiled by the Gibeonites into a covenant to let them live, he reduced their tribe to servitude, and declared, "Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall never fail from you of young men, both hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God" (Josh 9 23 27). It is no doubt tempting to see in the Gibeonites the earliest N., but another tradition traces their origin to a god of Davi for the service of the Levites (Ezr 8 20). Their names, too, indicate diversity of origin; for besides being mostly un-Hebrew in aspect, some of them are found elsewhere in the OT as names of non-Israelish tribes. The Meminim, for example (Exr 2 50=Neh 7 52), are in all likelihood descended from the Moenites or Moaenites who are mentioned as harassing Israel (Jgs 10 12), as in conflict with the Simeonites (1 Ch 4 41), and as finally overcome by Uzziah (2 Ch 26 7). The next name in the lists is that of the children of Nephsim. These may be traced to the Hagrite clan of Naphish (Gen 25 15; 1 Ch 5 19). In both Ezr and Neh, the list is immediately followed by that of the servants of Solomon, whose duties were similar to, it may be even humbler than, those of the N. These servant-servants appear to be descendants of the Canaanites whom Solomon employed in the building of his temple (1 K 5 15). All these indications are perhaps slight; but they point in the same direction, and, in the assumption that the N. were originally foreign slaves, mostly prisoners of war, who had from time to time been given to the temple by the kings and princes of the nation, and that to them were assigned the lower menial duties of the house of God.

At the time of the return from the exile the N. had come to be regarded as important. Their number was considerable: 392 accompanied Zerubbabel at the first Return in 535 BC (Ezr 2 60=Neh 7 60). 3. Post-exilic History. When Ezra, some 50 years later, organized the second Return, he secured a contingent of N. numbering 220 (Ezr 8 20). In Jerusalem they enjoyed the same privileges and immunities as the other religious orders, being included by their letters of credence among those who should be exempt from toll, custom and tribute (Ezr 7 24). A part of the city in Ophel, opposite the Water-gate, was assigned them as an official residence (Neh 3 33 1), and the situation is certainly approximate if their duties at all resembled those of the Gibeonites (see Ryle, "Ezra and Nehemiah," in Cambridge Bible, Intro, 57). They were also organized into a kind of guild under their own leaders of the band.

The N. are not again mentioned in Scripture. It is probable that they, with the singers and porters, became gradually incorporated in the general body of Levites; their name passed ere long into a tradition, and became at a later time a butt for the scorn and bitterness of the Talmudic writers against everything that they regarded as un-Jewish.

Netophah, nê tôf'â (נְתוֹפָה); Lev. 23 28, 31; 25 28, 31; 26 12, 17; 28 17, 19, and creation); LXX Netophāt, Netophâth, Nehôphāth, Netophotâ, and other variants): The birthplace of two of David’s heroes, Mephibosheth and Helec (2 Sam 9 17, 20; 11 17, 23), and the son of Tanhumoth the Netophathite, one of the captives who came to offer allegiance to Gedaliah (2 K 25 23, Jer 40 8). “The villages of the Netophathites” are mentioned (1 Ch 12 19) as the dwellings of certain Levites and Neh 12 18, AV “Netophathi” of certain “sons of the singers.”

The first mention of the place itself is in Ezr 2 22; Neh 7 26; 1 Esd 5 18 (RV “Netophath”), where we have lists of the exiles returning from Babylon with Nehemiah. the place is mentioned between the Bethlem and Anathoth and in literary association with other cities in the mountains of Judah, e.g. Gibea, Kiriat-jeaum, Chephera and Beeroth. In this respect it is most plausible to identify it with the site of modern Jib, although the disappearance of a terminal gutteral in the latter creates a difficulty. Conder has suggested a site known as Kh. Umnu-Tuba, N.E. of Bethlem, an ancient site, but not apparently of great importance. Beit Netof, an important stage on a lofty ridge in the Shephelah near the “Valle of Elah,” also appears to have an echo of the name, and indeed may well be the Beth Netophath of the Mish (Sêbêrâthâ, ix 5; Neubauer, Geogr., 128), but the position does not seem to accord with all that of the OT Netophah. For Kh. Umnu-Tuba see PEF, III, 128; for Beit Netof, PEF, III, 24; RRB, II, 177; both Sh XVII.

Netophas, nê tôf'âs (B, Netôphas, Netôbas, A, Nerôphá, Netôpháth): A town named in 1 Esd 5 18, identical with “Netophah” of Ezr 2 22; Neh 7 26. NETOPHATHI, nê tôf'a-thî, NETOPHATHITES, nê tôf'a-thîths. See Netophah.

Nettles, net’tlz: (1) יָרְדִּים, hârîl (Job 30 7; Prov 24 31; Zeph 2 9 m, in all, “wild vetches”); the tr “nettles” is due to the supposed derivations of hârîl from an (obs.) יָרְדֵי, hârîl, meaning “to be sharp” or “stinging,” but a tr “thorns” (as in Vulg) would in that case do as well. LXX has ἄνθριξ ἄρπα, phrikânov dria, “wild broomwood,” in Job, and certainly the association with the “saltwort” and the reed, “broom,” in the passage would best be met by the supposition that it means the low thorny bushes plentiful in association with these plants. “Vetch” is suggested by the Aram., but is very uncertain. (2) כִּימְמָשׁ, kîmmôsh (Isa 34 13; Hos 9 6), and pl. כִּימְמָשִׁים, kîmmûshônîm (Prov 24 31), tr’l (EV) “thorns” because of the tr of hârîl as “nettles” in the same ver. From Isa 34 13 kîmmôsh is apparently distinct from thorns, and the tr “nettle” is very probable, as such neglected or deserted places as described in the three references really became overgrown with nettles in Pal. The common and characteristic Pal nettle is the Urtica pilulifera, so called from the globular heads of its flowers.

Network, net’wûr (נְטוּרִים, s’hôbhâkâh): RV in 2 K 26 17; 2 Ch 4 13 (also in pl., vs 12,13), for “wreathen work” and “wreath” in AV (of the adornment of the capitals of the pillars of Solomon’s temple; see Jachin and Boaz). “Networks” in Isa 19 9 is in RV correctly rendered “white cloth.” In ARV “network” is substituted for “pictures” in AV (Prov 25 11, “baskets” in ERV, m “filigree work.”

NEW, nô, NEWNESS, nû’înes (יוֹנֵי, hôdâdâh; kainôs, kainôs, vûos, nôos):

The word commonly tr’l “new” in the OT is hâdâdâh, “bright,” “fresh,” “new” (special interest was shown in, and importance attached to, fresh and new things and events); Ex 1 8; Dt 20 5; 25 8; 24 5; 1 S 6 7; 2 S 21 16; Ps 33 3, “a new song”; Jer 31 31, “new covenant”; Ezek 11 19, “a new spirit”; 19 31, “new heart”; 36 26, etc; hôdâdâh is “the new moon,” “the new-moon day” (the first of the lunar month, a festival, then “month” (Gen 29 14, “a month of days”); it occurs frequently, oft tr’l “month”; we have “new moon” (I S 20 5.15.24, etc); tôrsh is “new” (sweet) wine” (Neh 10 39; in Jer 1 5; 3 18, it is Isâ, RV “sweet wine”); in Jer 22 13, “new”.

Other words in the OT for “new” are kâthâh, Aram. (Ezr 6 4): tôrsh, “fresh” (Jgs 15 15, RV “a fresh jaw-bone of an ass”); tôrsh “a creation” (Nu 16 30, if tôrsh make a new thing, and tôrsh têshû’t, “to be first-fruits” (Ezk 47 12; so RV); tû’m “setting,” is têr “newly” (Jgs 10 19); also mi’kâthâh, “recently” (Dt 32 17, RV “of late”); news is shûma’t, “report,” “tidings” (Prov 25 25, “good news from a far country”.

In the NT “new” (mostly kainôs, “new,” “fresh,” “newly made”) is an important word. We have the title of the “New Testament” 2. In the NT, the word itself, rightly given by ARV as “New Covenant,” the designation of “the new dispensation” ushered in through Christ, the writings relating to which the volume contains. We have “new covenant” (kainôs) in Lk 22 20, “This cup is the new covenant in my blood” (ERV “testament”); in Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24, “new” is omitted in RV, but in Mt m many ancient authorities insert new,” and in Mk m (ancient authorities); 1 Cor 11 25, ERV “or testament”; 2 Cor 3 6, ERV “or testament”; He 8 8, ERV “or testament”; in ver 13, “covenant” is supplied (cf He 12 24, neos).

Corresponding to this, we have (2 Cor 5 17, AV and RV); “The old things have passed away; behold, they are become new”; ib. “If any man is in Christ, he is a new creature.” RV “If there is a new creation” Gal 6 15, “or “creation,” “new man” (Eph 2 15; 4 24; Col 3 10 [neos]; “new commandment” (Jn 13 34): “a new doctrine” (Acts 17 19); “new things” (21): “newness of life” (kainôs) (Rom 6 4): “newness of the spirit” (7 6; cf 2 Cor 5 17); “a new name” (Rev 2 17; 3 12); “new heavens and a new earth” (2 Pet 3 13); “new Jerusalem” (Rev 3 12; 21 2); “new song” (Rev 5 9); cf “new friend” and “new wine” (Sih 9 10); artikhêpòtis, “newborn” (1 Pet 2 2); prôskhôtis, “newly slain,” “new” (He 10 20, RV “a new and living way, through the veil that is to say the flesh” in Mk “open”; Jch 4 3); “new” is the tr of neos, “new,” “young” (1 Cor 5 7; Col 3 10, “new man” He 12 24, “new covenant”).

The difference in meaning between kainos and neos, is, in the main, that kainos denotes new in respect of quality, “the new as such, as different from that which has seen service, the outworn, the effete, or marred through age”; neos, “new” in [respect of time], that which has recently come into existence, e.g. kainôs minnèlôn, the “new tomb” in which Jesus was laid, was a work very recently made, but one in which no other dead had ever lain; the “new covenant,” the “new man,” etc, may be contemplated under both aspects of quality and of time (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, 209 f).

NEZIAH, nə-zı’ah (נְזוֹיאָה, nəzı’āh): The head of a family of Nethinim (Exz 2:54; Neh 7:56), called in 1 Esd 5:32, “Nasi” (AV and RVm “Nasith”).

NEZIB, nə-zib (נְזוּב, nəzib): B, Naacib, Naacibh, A, Nerb, Nettib: A town in the Judaean Shephelah, mentioned along with Keilah and Marashah (Josh 15:43). Onom places it 7 miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), on the road to Hebron. It is represented today by Beit Nasib, a village with ancient remains some 2 miles S.W. of Khirbet Kila (Keilah).

NIBHAZ, nib’haz (נִבְּחָז, nib’haz): Given as the name of an idol of the Avites, introduced by them into Samaria (2 K 17:31), but otherwise unknown. The text is supposed to be corrupt.

NIBSHAN, nib’shan (נִבְּשָן, ha-nibshōhan): B, Nadsen, Naphshazon, A, Nasan, Neban: A city in the Judaean wilderness named between Sechanah and the City of Salt (Josh 15:62). Onom knows the place but gives no clue to its identification. The site has not been recovered. Wellhausen suggests the emendation of nibshān to kibshān, “furnace” (Proedr, 344).

NICANOR, nı̄k-kən’or, nı̄k-kə-nor (ניקאש, Nı̄k-eš, Nı̄k-nor): The son of Patroclus and one of the king’s “chief friends” (2 Macc 8:9), a Syrian general under Antiochus Epiphanes and Demetrius Soter. After the defeat of Saron by Judas, Epiphanes intrusted his chancellor Lysias with the reduction of Judaea (1 Macc 3:34 ff). Nicanor was one of the three generals commissioned by Lysias—the others being Ptolemies, son of Dorymenes, and Gorgias (3:38). The campaign began in 166 BC; the Syrians were defeated at Emmaus (3:57 ff), while Gorgias at a later stage gained a victory at Jamnia over a body of Jews who disobeyed Judas (5:58). The account given in 2 Macc differs considerably, both in omissions and in additions (2 Macc 8:6 ff). There Nicanor, not Gorgias, is the chief in command. The battle of Emmaus is not mentioned, but “the thrice-accursed Nicanor,” having in overweening pride invited a thousand slave-dealers to accompany him to buy the Jewish captives, was humiliated, and his horse was destroyed, he himself escaping “like a fugitive slave” to Antioch (2 Macc 8:34 ff). After the death of Epiphanes, Eupator and Lysias (the last two at the hands of Demetrius 11 Macc 7:12-15), Nicanor appears again under King Demetrius in the struggle between Alcimus and Judas. Alcimus, having been seated in the priesthood by Demetrius’ officer Bacchides, could not hold it against Judas and the patriots. He appealed again to Demetrius, who this time selected Nicanor, now governor of Cyprus (2 Macc 12:2) and known for his deadly hatred of the Jews, to settle the dispute and slay Judas (14:12 ff; 1 Macc 7:26 ff). Nicanor was appointed governor of Judaea on this occasion. Again 1 and 2 Macc differ. According to 1 Macc, Nicanor sought in vain to seize Judas by treachery. Then followed the battle of Capharsalama (“village of peace”), in which the Syrians were defeated, though Jos (Ant, XII, x, 5) says Judas was defeated. Nicanor retired to Jerusalem, invited the priest and threatened the destruction of the temple unless they delivered up Judas. He then retired to Beth-horon to find Judas posted opposite him at Adasa (1 Macc 7:39 ff), 3/4 miles distant. Here on the 15th of the 12th month Adar (March), 161 BC, the Syrians sustained a crushing defeat, Nicanor himself being the first to fall. The Jews cut off his head and proud right hand and hanged them up beside Jesus. For a little while Adasa gave the land of Judah rest. The people ordained to keep this “day of great gladness” year by year—the 13th of Adar, “the day before the day of Mordecai” (Feast of Purim). 2 Macc mentions that Simon, Judas’ brother, was worsted in a first engagement (14:17), omits the battle of Capharsalama, and represents Nicanor, struck with the manliness of the Jews, as entering into friendly relations with Judas, urging him to marry and lead a quiet life, forgetful of the king’s command until Alcimus accused him to Demetrius. The latter peremptorily ordered Nicanor to bring Judas to hame as prisoner to Antioch (14:27). The scene of the final conflict (Adasa) is given only as “in the region of Samaria” (15:1). According to this account, it was Judas who ordered the mutilation of Nicanor and in a more gruesome fashion (15:20 ff). It is possible that the Nicanor, the Cypriarch or governor of Cyprus of 2 Macc 12:2, is a different person from Nicanor, the son of Patroclus—a view not accepted in the above account. S. ANOV

NICANOR (ניקאש, Nı̄k-eš, Nı̄k-nor): One of the “seven” chosen to superintend “the daily ministration” of the poor of the Christian community at Jerus (Acts 6:5). The name is Gr.

NICODEMUS, nik-od’-ə-mus (ניקודמוס, Nı̄kō-dē-mōs): A Pharisee and a “ruler of the Jews,” mentioned only by St. John. He (1) interviewed Christ at Jerus and was taught by Him the doctrine of the resurrection (Jn 3:1-5); (2) desired His body before the Sanhedrin (Jn 7:50-52); (3) assisted at His burial (Jn 19:39-42).

This meeting, which it has been surmised took place in the house of St. John (Jn 3:1-15), was one of the results of Our Lord’s ministry at Jerus during the Passover (Jn 3:22 with 7:23). Although N. had been thus won to believe in the Divine nature of Christ’s mission, his faith was yet very incomplete in that he believed Him to be inspired only after the fashion of the OT prophets. To this faint-hearted faith corresponded his timidity of action, which displayed itself in his coming to the city ‘by night,’ lest he should offend his colleagues in the Sanhedrin and the other hostile Jews (ver 2). In answer to the veiled question which the words of N. implied, and to convince him of the inadequacy of mere intellectual belief, Christ proclaimed to him the necessity for a spiritual regeneration: “Except one be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God” (ver 3). This was interpreted by N. only in its materialistic sense, and therefore caused him bewilderment and confusion (ver 4). But Christ, as on another occasion when dealing with His questioners on a similar point of doctrine (cf Jn 6 52, 53), answered his perplexity only by repeating His previous statement (ver 5). He then proceeded to give further explanation. The rebirth is not outward but inward, it is not of the body but of the soul (ver 6). Just as God is the real agent in the birth of the body, so also is He the Creator of the New Spirit; and just as no one knoweth whence cometh the wind, “whether it beeth” (ver 7), yet all can feel its effects who come under its influence, so is it with the rebirth. Only those who have experienced it as a change in themselves, wrought by the Divine Power, are qualified to judge either of its reality or its effects (ver 7, 8). But N., since such experience had not yet been his, remained still unenlightened (ver 9). Christ therefore condemned such blindness in one who yet professed to be a teacher of spiritual things (ver 10), and emphasized the reality in His own life of the truth which He had been proclaiming (ver 11). With this, Christ returned to the problem underlying the first statement of N. If N. cannot believe in “earthly things,” i.e. in the New Birth, which, though coming from above, is yet realized in this world, how can he hope to understand “heavenly things,” i.e. the deeper mysteries of God’s purpose in sending Christ into the world (ver 12), of Christ’s Divine sonship (ver 13), of His relationship to the atonement and the salvation of man (ver 14), and of His being made “the firstborn of those who are born of God” (ver 15). If N. cannot believe in the Divinity of God (ver 15; cf Jn 6 25–65),

The above interview, though apparently fruitless at the time, was not without its effect upon N. At the Feast of Tabernacles, when the Sanhedrin was proclaiming of Himself as the “living water” (Jn 7 37, 38), N. was emboldened to stand up in His defence. Yet here also he showed his natural timidity. He made no personal testimony of his faith in Christ, but sought rather to defend Him on a point of Jewish law (Jn 7 50–52; cf Ex 23 1; Dt 1 16, 17; 17 6; 19 15).

By this open act of reverence N. at last made public profession of his being the follower of Christ. His wealth enabled him to purchase the consecrated “aloes, about a hundred pounds,” with which the body of Jesus was embalmed (Jn 19 39 ff).

The Gospel of Nicodemus and other apocryphal works narrate that N. gave evidence in favor of Christ at the trial before Pilate, though he was deprived of office and banished from Jerusalem by the hostile Jews, and that he ministered to Jesus on Golgotha. His reminiscences were said to have been found in a common grave along with those of Gamaliel and st. Stephen.

Nicodemus is a type of the “well-instructed and thoughtful Jew who looked for the consummation of national hope to follow in the line along which he had himself gone, as being a continuation and not a new beginning” (Westcott). The manner in which the Gospel narrative traces the overcoming of his natural timidity and reluctant faith is in itself a beautiful illustration of the working of the Spirit, of how belief in the Son of Man is in truth a new birth, and the entrance into eternal life.

Nicolaïtans, nik-o-la’-tans (Nicolaïtar, Nikolaita). A sect or party of evil influence in early Christianity, esp. in the 7.

1. The Sect of Churches of Asia. Their doctrine was similar to that of Balas, “who taught Balak to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication” (Rev 2 14, 15). Their practices were strongly condemned by St. John, who praised the church in Ephesus for “having their works, (Rev 2 6), and blamed the church in Pergamum for accepting in some measure their teaching (Rev 2 15). Except that reference is probably made to their influence in the church at Thyatira also, where their leader was “the woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess” (Rev 2 20; cf 2 14), no further direct information regarding them is given in Scripture.

Reference to them is frequent in post-apostolic literature. According to Irenæus (Adv. Haer., i. 26, 3; iii, 10, 7), followed by Hippolytus (Philos., vi, 38), they were founded by St. Irenæus, the proconsul of Antioch, who was one of the seven chosen to serve at the tables (Acts 6 5). Irenæus, as also Clement of Alexandria (Strom., ii, 20), Tertullian and others, unite in condemning their practices in terms similar to those of St. John; and reference is also made to their gnostic tendencies. In explanation of the apparent incongruity of such an immoral sect being founded by one of “good report, full of the Spirit and of wisdom” (cf Acts 6 3), Simcox argues that their lapse may have been due to reaction from original principles of so too rigid asceticism. A theory, started in comparatively modern times, and based in part on the similarity of meaning of the Greek word on which they were founded, puts forward the view that the two sects referred to under these names were in reality identical. Yet though this were so, it would not have been necessary for St. John to designate them separately.

The problem underlying the Nicolaïtan controversy, though so little direct mention is made of it in Scripture, was in reality most important, and concerned the whole relation of Christianity to paganism and its usages. The Nicolaïtans disobeyed the command issued to the gentile churches, by the apostolic council held at Jerusalem in 49–50 AD, that they should refrain from the eating of “things sacrificed to idols” (Acts 15 29). Such a restriction, though seemingly hard, in that it prevented the Christians coming in contact with certain practices in public festivals, and so brought upon them suspicion and dislike, was yet necessary to prevent a return to a pagan laxity of morals. To this danger the Nicolaïtans were themselves a glaring witness, and therefore St. John was just in condemning them. In writing to the Corinthians, St. Paul gives warning against the same evil practices, basing his arguments on consideration for the weaker brethren (cf 1 Cor 8).

NICOLAUS, nik-0-i'/us (EV), NICOLAS, nik-0-las (Νικόλαος, Νικόλαος): One of the "seven" chosen by the Lord to have the "daily ministration" to the poor of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 6:5). He is called "a proselyte of Antioch"; the other 6 were therefore probably Jews by birth. This is the first recorded case of the admission of a proselyte into office in the Christian church. Some of the church Fathers (Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Pseudo- Tertullian) state that he was the founder of the sect called Nicolaitans (q.v.) (Rev 2:15). Other Fathers seem to suggest that this was a vain claim made by this sect in seeking apostolic authority for their opinions. It may be that the opinions of this sect were an antimonic exaggeration of the preaching of Nicolás.

NICOPOLIS, nik-op'o-lis (Νικόπολις, Νικόρο- λις): A city in Peloponnesus of ancient Greece, situated in the vicinity of Antioch of Nicopolis (Now Patras, in modern Greece). In the reign of Titus (A.D. 79-81), an ancient name, Nicopolis, was revived by Constantine, in memory of the victory gained over Maxentius (Jan. 1, A.D. 312) at the battle of the Milvian Bridge, near Rome, by which the Emperor Constantine was enabled to secure the succession of the empire to himself, and to impose the Christian religion upon the empire. The name is still used for the site of the modern town of Nicopolis, built by Constantine and dedicated to his mother, Constantia. The city was the seat of a bishop and of a Latin cathedral, and the site of a Latin church.

1. The Accepted Translation.—The term "night-monster" is a hypothetical transliteration of the Hebrew term לילית, used only once, in Isa 34:14. The word is tr4 in AV "sceech-owl," m "night-monster," RV "night-monster," m "Lilith." The term "night-monster" is also an interpretation, as inasmuch as it implies that the Hebrew word is a Babylon word, and that the reference indicates a survival of primitive folklore.

Concerning this weird superstition, and its strange, single appearance in the Book of Isa, Professor Rogers has this to say: "The Lilith, Professor or ghost, was a night-demon of terrible powers and baleful influence upon men, and Statement only to be cast out with many incantations. The Lilith was attended by a serving maid, the ašrat lilit ("maid of night"), which in the Sem period development was transferred into the fem. "Lilith." It is most curious and interesting to observe that this ghost-demon lived on through the history of the Bab religion, and was carried over into the Heb religion, there to find one single mention in the words of one of the Bab prophets ("Relf. of Assyria and Babylonia," 76, 77).

Exception is to be taken to this statement, admitting the etymological assumption upon which it rests, that "Lilith" is a word in mythology, on the ground that this conception of a night-demon has no place in the religion of the Hebrews as exhibited in the Scriptures. It is certainly worthy of more than passing notice that a conception which is so prominent in the Bab mythology, and is worked out with great fulness of doctrinal and ritualistic detail, has, among the Hebrews, so far receded into the background as to receive but one mention in the Bible, and that a bald citation without detail in a highly poetic passage.

The most that can possibly be said, with safety, is that if the passage in Isa is to be taken as a survival of folklore, it is analogous to those survivals of obsolete ideas still to be found in current speech, and in the lit. of the modern world (see LUNATIC). There is no evidence of active participation in this belief, or even of interest in it as such, on the part of the prophetical writer. On the contrary, the nature of the reference implies that the word was used simply to add a picturesque detail to a vivid, imaginative description. All possible evidence of Hebrew participation in this belief belongs to a later date (see Buxtorf's "Lex., s.v. "Talmud").

II. Folklore in the OT.—Attention has been called elsewhere to the meagerness, in the matter of detail, of OT demonology (see DEMON, DEMONOLOGY; COMPARISON WITH DEMONS). A kindred fact of great importance should be briefly noticed here, namely, that the traces of mythology and popular folklore in the Bible are surprisingly scant and indistinct. We have the following set of items in which such traces have been discovered: "Rahab" (דחוית), "rāḥāḥah, mentioned in Job 9:13; 26:12; Isa 51:9; "Tannin" (תָּנִינָא, תָּנִינא), Isa 27:1; "Leviathan" (תָּנִינא, לְוְיָתָן), Job 3:8; Ps 74:14; Isa 27:1; Ezek 29:3; Job 41:passim; the "serpent in the sea," in Am 9:3; "Seirin" (סְיִרֵין), 2 Chron 11:15; "Leviathan" (תָּנִינא, לְוְיָתָן), 2 Chron 11:5; Lev 17:7; 2 K 23:8; Isa 13:21; 34:14; "Alukah" (אלקות), "Alakah, Prov 30:15; "Azazel" (זָזָאצאל), Lev 16:8.10.26; "Lilith" (at sup.), Isa 34:14-15.

A review of these passages brings certain very interesting facts to light.

The references are few in number. Rahab is mentioned 3 times; Tanin (in this connection) once; Leviathan, 5 times; the serpent in the sea, once; "Seirin, 5 times (with reference to idols); Alukah, once; Azazel, 3-times in one ch and in the same connection; Lilith, once.

These references, with the single exception of Azazel to which we shall return a little later, are all in highly poetical passages. On general grounds of demonology, we should not ascribe conscious and deliberate mythology to writers or speakers of the Bible in passages marked by imaginative description and poetic imagery, any more than we should ascribe such beliefs to modern writers under like circumstances. Poetry is the realm of truth and not of matter of fact. In passages of this tenor, mythology may explain the word itself and justify its appropriateness, it does not explain the use of the term or disclose the personal view of the writer.

All these references are in the highest degree allusive. They exhibit no exercise of the mytho- logical fancy and have received no special attention. This is most significant. So far as our specific references are concerned, we are dealing with Petrified mythology, useful as literary embellishment, but no longer interesting in itself. Every one of these words is sufficiently obscure in origin and uncertain in meaning to admit the possibility of a non-mythological interpretation; indeed, in several of the parallels a non-mythological use is evident. Bible-Dictionary writers are apt to say (e.g. concerning Lilith) that there is no doubt concerning the mythological reference. The reader may discover for himself that the lexicographers are more cautious (see BDB, in loc.). The use of "Rahab" in Job 26:12 is not mythological for the simple reason that it is figurative; the use of "Leviathan" in Isa 27:1 and Ezek 29:3 comes under the same category. In Job 40 and 41, if the identification of behemoth and leviathan is correct, we have a simile and crocodile be allowed to stand and the mythological significance of the two be admitted, we have the stage where mythology has become a fixed and universal symbolism which can be used to convey truth apart from the reality which it stands for (see LEVIATHAN, Job, New CNT. Bible, 1955, p. 22; Meth. Rev., May, 1913, 429 f). The sea serpent of Am 9:3 is not necessarily the dragon or Tiamat, and the use of the term is merely suggestive. The term "he-goat" is in literal use for "he-goat" (Nu 15:24, et al.) and is doubtful throughout. Ewald translates it "he-goat" in Isa 34:14 and "Satyr" in 13:21. It means lit, "shaggy monster" (Vulg pilawus). We do not hesitate on the basis of the evidence to use "Alukah" (Prov 30:15, RV "high speech," by some tr4 "vampire") and "Azazel" (Lev 16:8, et al.) interpreted as "a demon of the desert," from the list of mythological words altogether. As ripe a scholar as Perowne ("Prov., Cambridge Bible") combats the idea of vampire, and Kellogg ("Lev., Expositor's Bible, in loc.) has simply put to rout the mytho- logical-demonic interpretation of Azazel. Even in the case of Lilith the derivation is obscure, and the objections urged against the demonic idea by Alexander have not altogether lost their force (see Comm., on Isa 51:18). The theme is expanded, balance of probabilities in one direction or the other.

One further fact with regard to lilith must be considered. The term occurs in a list of creatures, the greater part of which are matter-of-fact animals.
Night-Monster

A river of North Africa, the great river of Egypt. The name employed in the OT to designate the Nile is in the Heb נים, y'ör, Egypt dār, earlier, dâr, usually tr'd 'river,' also occasionally 'canals' (Ps 78:44; Ezek 29:3ff). In a general way it means all the water of Egypt. The Nile is also the principal river included in the phrase שֵׁלְחָן נִיָּמִים, nahar kōsh, 'rivers of Ethiopia' (Isa 18:1). Poetically the Nile is called יָם, yām, 'sea' (Job 41:31; Nah 3:8; probably Isa 18:2), but this is not a name of the river. נַחַר, shibōr, not always written fully, has also been interpreted in a mistaken way of the Nile (see Sumer). Likewise שֵׁלֶחַנְיָם, nahar meqrayitam, 'brook of Egypt,' a border stream in no way connected with the Nile, has sometimes been mistaken for that river. See River of Egypt.

I. The Nile in Physical Geography.—The Nile is formed by the junction of the White Nile and... the Blue Nile in lat. 15° 45' N. and long. 32° 45' E. The Blue N. rises in the highlands of Abyssinia, lat. 12° 30' N., long. 35° E., and flows 1. Description N.W. 550 miles to its junction with the White N. The White N., the principal branch of the Nile, rises in Victoria Nyanza, a great lake in Central Africa, a few miles N. of the equator, long. 33° E. (more exactly the N. may be said to rise at the headwaters of the Rurera River, a small stream on the other side of the lake, 3° S. of the equator), and flows N. in a tortuous channel, 1,400 miles to its junction with the Blue N. From this junction-point the N. flows N. through Nubia and Egypt 1,900 miles and empties into the Mediterranean Sea, in lat. 32° N., through 2 mouths, the Rosetta, E. of Alexandria, and the Damietta, W. of Port Said. There were formerly 7 mouths scattered along a coast-line of 140 miles.

The Nile originated in the Tertiary period and has continued from that time to this, though by the subsidence of the land 220 ft. along the Mediterranean shore in the Pluvial times, the river was very much shortened. Later in the Pluvial times the land rose again and is still rising slowly.

Cultivable Egypt is altogether the product of the N., every particle of the soil having been brought down by the river from the heart of the continent and deposited along the banks and in the delta at the mouth of the river. The banks have risen higher and higher and extended farther and farther back by the deposit of the sediment, until the valley of arable land varies in width in most parts from 3 or 4 miles to 9 or 10 miles.

2. Geologic Origin The mouth of the river, after the great elevation of the land in Pluvial times, was at first not far from the lat. of Cairo. From this point northward the river has built up a delta of 140 miles on each side, over which it spreads itself and empties into the sea through its many mouths.

The watering of Egypt by the inundation from the N. is the most striking feature of the physical character of that land, and one of the most interesting and remarkable physical phenomena in the world. The inundation is produced by the combination of an indirect and a direct cause. The indirect cause is the rain and melting snow on the equatorial mountains in Central Africa, which maintains a very great volume of water in the White N. The direct cause is torrential rains in the highlands of Abyssinia which send down the Blue N., a sudden great increase in the volume of water. The inundation has two periods each year. The first begins about July 15 and continues until near the end of September. After a slight recession, the river again rises early in October in the great inundation. High Nile is in October, 25 to 30 ft., low Nile in June, about 125 ft. The Nilometer for recording the height of the water of inundation dates from very early times. Old Nilometers are found still in situ at Edfu and Assuan. The watering and fertilizing of the land is the immediate effect of the inundation; its ultimate result is that making of Egypt which is still in progress. The settling of the sediment from the water upon the land has raised the surface of the valley about 1 ft. in 300 to 400 years, about 9 to 10 ft. near Cairo since the beginning of the early great temples. The deposit varies greatly at other places. As the deposit of sediment has been upon the bottom of the river, as well as upon the surface of the land, though more slowly, on account of the swiftness of the current, the river also has been lifted up, and thus the inundation has extended farther and farther to the E., and the W., as the level of the valley would permit, depositing the sediment and thus making the cultivable land wider, as well as the soil deeper, year by year. At Heliopolis, a little N. of Cairo, this extension to the E. has been 3 to 4 miles since the building of the great temple there.

3. The Making of Egypt

4. The Inundation

5. The N. percolating through the porous Infiltration soil. This percolation is called the infiltration of the N. It always extends as far on either side of the N. as the level of the water in the river at the time will permit. This infiltration, next to the inundation, is the most important physical phenomenon in Egypt. By means of it much of the irrigation of the land during the dry season is carried on from wells. It has had its influence also in the political and religious changes of the country (of below).

II. The Nile in History—Some of the early temples were located near the N., probably because of the delineation of the river. The rising of the surface of the land, and at the same time of the bed of the river, from the inundation, lifted both the N. and its great river, but left the temples down at the old level. In time the infiltration of the river from its new higher level reached farther and farther and rose to a higher level until the floor of these old temples was under water even at the time of lowest N., and then gods and goddesses, priests and ceremonial all were driven out. At least two of the greatest temples and most sacred places, Heliopolis and Memphis, had to be abandoned. Probably this fact had as much to do with the downfall of Egypt's religion, as its political disasters and the actual destruction of its temples by eastern invaders. Nature's God had driven out the gods of Nature.

Some prehistoric burials are found on the higher ground, as at Kefr'Amara. A thousand years of history would be quite sufficient to teach Egyptians that the N. was still making Egypt. Thenceforth, cemeteries were located at the mountains on the eastern and the western boundaries of the valley. Here they continue to this day, for the most part still entirely above the waters of the inundation—and usually above the reach of the infiltration.
The widening of the cultivable land by means of long canals which carried the water from far up the river to areas farther down the river was practised from very early times. The substitution of irrigation for modern engineering skill. Three great dams have been identified: the first a little N. of Cairo, the greatest at Assuan, and the last near Assut.

Famines in Egypt are always due to failure in the quantity of inundation of the Nile. Faminaces have not been frequent. The cause of the failure, in the water of inundation in Fertile, N. and S., but which were not so much a lack of the water of inundation from the Nile as the failure of the rains or of the change of the wind. In the great marsh land of the Sudan by the river, a kind of sedge, sometimes becoming such a tangled mass as to close the doors, tangles the channels so much that the volume of water so that the freshet in the Blue Nile causes little inundation at what is usual and during the rest of the year the Nile is so low from the same cause that good irrigation by canals and wells is impossible. A channel through the Sed is now kept open by the Egyptian government.

III. The Nile in Religion.—One of the gods of the Nile was Hapi, the Nile. In early times it divided the honors with Ra, the Sun, but that was so. If as a God the Egyptians set out to worship Nature-god's all, surely then the sun and the Nile first.

The origin of the Osirian myth is still a much discussed. Very much evidence, perhaps conclusive, can be adduced to prove that the Egyptian religion was profoundly influenced by it. The Egyptians' first notions in regard to the Nile, that in Osirian Myth Osiris was first of all the N., then the water of the N., the soul, the product of the waters of the N., and then Egypt, the same.

The Nile was the Egyptian's little world, and Egypt was the Nile. It was thus quite natural for the Egyptians in considering the celestial world to image it in likeness of their own world with a celestial Nile flowing through it. It is so represented in the mythology, but the conception of the heavens is vague.

NIMROD, nim'rod (נִירוֹד, nimrodh; Nī'rod, Nebrād): A descendant of Ham, mentioned in "the generations of the sons of Noah" (Gen 10: 1 Ch 1 10) as a son of Cush. He established his kingdom "in the land of Shinar," including the cities "Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh" (ver 10), of which only Babel, or Babylon, and Erech, or Ur, have been identified with certainty. "The land of Shinar" is the old name for Southern Babylonia, afterword called Chaldaea (erec kadim), and was probably more extensive in territory than the Sumer of the inscriptions in the ancient royal title, "King of Shumer and Accad," since Accad is included here in Shinar. Nimrod, like other great kings of Mesopotamian lands, was a mighty hunter, possibly the mightiest and the prototype of them all, since to his name had attached itself the proverb: "Like Nimrod a mighty hunter before Jeh" (ver 9). In the primitive days of Mesopotamia, as also in Pal, wild animals were so numerous that they became a menace to life and property (Ex 23 29; Lev 26 22); therefore the king as benefactor and protector of his people hunted these wild beasts. The early conquest of the cities of Babylonia, or their federation into one great kingdom, is here ascribed to Nimrod. Whether the founding and colonization of Assyria or their federation into one great kingdom, is here ascribed to Nimrod. V. NINEVEH THE LATER CAPITAL
V. LAST DAYS AND FALL OF NINEVEH

I. BEGINNINGS, NAME, POSITION.—The first Biblical mention of Nineveh is in Gen 10 11, where it is stated that Nimron (q.v.) or Assur went out into Assyria, and built N. Biblical and Rehoboth-ir, and Calah, and mention Resen between N. and Calah, with the addition, "the same is the great city."

Everything indicates that these statements are correct, for N. was certainly at one time under Bab rule, and was at first not governed by Assyrian kings, but by petty or viceroys of Assur, the old capital. To all appearance N. took its name from the Bab Nina near Lagas in South Babylonia, on the Euphrates, from which early foundation it was probably colonized. The native name appears as Nínua or Ninā (Yuānu), written with the character for "water enclosure" with that for "fish."

2. EYTOMOLOGY OF THE NAME
Bab Nina was a place where fish were very abundant, and Istār or Nina, the goddess of the city, was associated with Nin-mah, Merodach's spouse, as goddess of reproduction. Fish are also plentiful in the Tigris at Mosul, the modern town on the other side of the river, and this may have influenced the choice of the site by the Bab settlers, and the foundation there of the great temple of Istār or Nina. The date of this foundation is unknown, but it may have taken place about 3000 BC.

N. lay on the eastern bank of the Tigris, at the point where the Khosr falls into that stream. The outline of the wall is rectangular on the W., but of an irregular shape on the E. The western fortifications run from N.W. to S.E., following, roughly, the course of the river, which now flows about 1,500 yards from the walls, instead of close to them, as anciently.

II. NINEVEH AND ITS SURROUNDINGS.—According to the late G. Smith, the southwestern wall has a length of about 2½ miles, and is joined at its 1. Its Walls its western corner by the northwestern wall, which runs in a northeasterly direction for about 1½ miles. The northeastern wall, starting here, runs at first in a southeasterly direction, but turns southward, gradually approaching the southwestern wall, to which, at the end of about 3¼ miles, it is joined by a short wall, facing nearly S., rather more than half a mile long.

The principal mounds are Kouyunjik, a little N.E. of the village of Amuqish, and Nebī-Yunes, about 1,500 yards to the N.E. Both of these lie just within the S.W. wall.

2. Principal Mounds Extensive remains of buildings occupy and gateways the fortified area. Numerous openings occur in the walls, many of them ancient, though some seem to have been made after the abandonment of the site. The principal gate on the N.W. was guarded by winged bulls (see Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, 2d series, pl. 3; Nineveh and Babylon, 120). Other gates gave access to the northwestern roads of the country, west of the E. passing through the curved outworks and the double line of fortifications which protected the northeastern wall from attack on that side, where the Ninevites evidently considered that they had most to fear.

According to G. Smith, the circuit of the inner wall is about 8½ miles, and Captain Jones, who made a trigonometrical survey in 1854, estimated that, allotting to each inhabitant 50 sq. yards, the city may have contained 174,000 inhabitants. In the statement in Jon 4 11, that the city contained 120,000 persons who could not discern between their right hand and their left, intended to give the number of the city's children only, then the population must have numbered about 600,000, or that three cities of the same extent would have been needed to contain them. It has therefore been supposed—and that with great probability—that there was a large extension of the city outside its walls. This

Walls is not only indicated by Jon 3 3, where it is described as "an exceeding great city of three days' journey" to traverse, but also by the extant ruins, which stretch S.E. along the banks of the Tigris as far as Mount Cau (Koyunjik), while its northern extension may have been regarded as including Khorsabad.

Concerning the positions of two of the cities mentioned with N., namely, Calah and Resen, there can be no doubt, notwithstanding that Rehoboth or Resen is not mentioned by name in the Bible.

5. Calah, Resen and Calah is the modern Nimroud, and Resen Calah lay between that site and N. The name Resen-ir has not yet been found in the inscriptions, but Fried Deltzsch has suggested that it may be the rēẖēt Ninaš of the inscriptions, N.E. of N. If this be the case, the N. of Jonah contained within it all the places in Gen 10 11 12, and Khorsabad besides.

Taking the outlying ruins from N. to S., we begin with Khorsabad (Dur-Sarru-án or Dur-Sargina), 12 miles N.E. of Koyunjik, the great palace mound of N. proper. Khorsabad is a great enclosure about 2,000 yards square, with the remains of towers and gateways. The palace mound lies on its northwest corner, and consists of a platform with the remains of Sargon's palace and its temple, with a ziggurat or temple-tower similar to those at Babylon, Borsip, Calah and elsewhere. This last still shows traces of the tints symbolical of the 7 planets of which its stonework is partly, emblematic. The palace ruins show numerous halls, rooms and passages, many of which were faced with slabs of coarse alabaster, sculptured in relief with military operations, hunting-scenes, mythological figures, etc., while the principal entrances were flanked with the finest winged human-headed bulls which Assyrian art has so far revealed. The palace was built about 712 BC, and was probably destroyed by fire when N. fell in 606 BC, sharing the same fate. Some of the slabs and winged bulls are in the Louvre and the British Museum, but most of the antiquarian spoils were lost in the Tigris by the sinking of the rafts upon which they were loaded after being discovered.

Another outlying suburb was probably Tarbiṣū, now represented by the ruins at Khersan, about 3 miles N. of Koyunjik. In this lay a large palace, Sennacherib calls it—dedicated toermal. Anciently it may have been a place of some importance, as Esarhaddon seems to have built a palace there, as well as a "seat of justice" of his son Assur-bani-apli. The site of Resen, "between N. and Calah," is the southern roads through S. of N. and 3 miles N. of Nimroud (Calah). It is in the form of an irregular inclosure on a high mound overlooking the Tigris, with a surface of about 400 acres.
No remains of buildings, sculptures or inscriptions have, however, been found there.

After N. itself (Kouyunjik), the ruins known as Nimroud, 14 or 15 miles S.E., are the most important. They mark the site of the ancient Calah, and have already been described under that heading (see p. 539). As there stated, the stone-faced temple-tower seems to be referred to by Ovid, and is apparently also mentioned by Xenophon (see Resé). The general tendency of the accumulated references to these sites supports the theory that they were regarded as belonging to N., if not by the Assyrians themselves (who knew well the various municipal districts), at least by the foreigners who had either visited the city or had heard or read descriptions of it.

III. The Palaces at Nineveh Proper.—The palaces at N. were built upon extensive artificial platforms between 30 and 50 ft. high, either of sun-dried brick, as at Nimroud, or of earth and rubbish, as at Kouyunjik. It is thought that they were faced with masonry, and that access was gained to them by means of flights of deep steps, or sloping pathways. Naturally it is the plan of the basement floor alone that can at present be traced, any upper stories that may have existed having been dis- appeared. The halls and rooms discovered were faced with slabs of alabaster or other stone, often sculptured with bas-reliefs depicting warlike expeditions, the chase, religious ceremonies and divine figures. The depth of the accumulations over these varies from a few inches to about 30 ft., and if the amount in some cases would seem to be excessive, it is thought that this may have been due either to the existence of upper chambers, or to the extra height of the room. The chambers, which are grouped around courtyards, are long and narrow, with small square rooms at the ends. The partition walls vary from 6 to 15 ft. in thickness, and are of sun-dried brick, against which the stone paneling was fixed. As in the case of the Bab temples and palaces, the rooms and halls open into each other, so that, to gain access to those farthest from the courtyard entrance, one or more halls or chambers had to be traversed. No traces of windows have been discovered, and little can therefore be said as to the method of lighting, but the windows were either high up, or light was admitted through openings in the roof.

The palace of Sennacherib lay in the southeast corner of the platform, and consisted of a courtyard surrounded on all four sides by numerous long halls, and rooms, of Sennacherib being rendered private. It was in this palace that were found the reliefs depicting the siege of Lachish, with the representation of Sennacherib seated on his "standing" throne, while the captives and the spoil of the city passed before him. The grand entrance was flanked by winged bulls facing toward the spectator as he entered. They were in couples, back to back, on each side of the doorway, and between each pair the ancient Bab hero-giant, carrying in one hand the "boomerang," and holding tightly with his left arm a struggling lion (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, 1857) was represented, just as at his father Sargon's palace at Khorsabad. The upper part of these imposing figures had been destroyed, but they were so massive, that the distinguished explorer attributed their overthrow not to the act of man, but to some convulsion of Nature.

In the north of the mound are the ruins of the palace of Assur-bani-apli or Assur-bani-pal, discovered by Hormuzd Rassam. His latest plan (Assur and the Land of Palace of Nimrod, Cincinnati and New York, 1897, plate facing p. 36) does not give anli the whole of the structure, much of the building having been destroyed; but the general arrangement of the rooms was upon the traditional lines. The slabs with which they were paneled showed bas-reliefs illustrating the Assyrian campaigns against Babylonia, certain Arab tribes, and Elam. As far as they are preserved, the sculptures are wonderfully good, and the whole decorative scheme of the paneled walls, of which, probably, the greater part is forever lost, may be characterized, notwithstanding their defects of perspective and their mannerisms, as nothing less than magnificent. The lion-hunts of the great king, despite the curious treatment of the animals' manes (due to the sculptors' ignorance of the right way to represent hair) are admirable. It would be difficult to improve upon the expressions of fear, rage and suffering on the part of the animals there delineated. The small sculptures showing Assur-bani-apli hunting the goat and the wild ass are not less noteworthy, and are executed with great delicacy.

IV. Sennacherib's Description of Nineveh.—In all probability the best description of the city is that given by Sennacherib on the cylinder recording his expedition to Tarsus in Cilicia. From ancient times, he says, the circuit of the city had measured 9,300 cubits, and he makes the rather surprising statement that his predecessors had not built either the inner or the outer wall, which, if true, shows how confident they were of their security from attack. He claims to have enlarged the city by 12,515 cubita. The inner defensive wall which he built was called by the Sumerian name of Bad-imgalab-bi-bis, which he translates as "the wall whose glory overthrows the enemy." He made the brickwork 40 cubits thick, which would probably not greatly exceed the estimate of G. Smith, who reckoned it to have measured about 50 ft. The height of the wall he raised to 180 tipi, which, admitting the estimate of Diodorus, should amount to about 100 ft.

In this inclosing wall were 15 gates, which he enumerates in full. Three of these were situated in the short inner city wall—the gate of Hadad—the gate of Urg or Hadad of Tarbišu (Scherf Khan), and the gate of the moon-god Nannar, Sennacherib's own deity. The plans show five openings in the wall on this side, any of which may have been the gate used when going to Tarbišu, but that adorned with winged bulls probably furnished the shortest route.

2. The Gates—Northwest

The gates looking toward the S. and the E. were the Ašşur-gate (leading to the old capital); Sennacherib's Ḥalâḥ-gate; the gate of Samâd of Gagal, the gate of the god Enil of Kar-Ninil, and the "covered gate," which seems to have had the reputation of letting forth the fever-demon. After this are mentioned the Ślimaša-gate, and the gate of Halâh in Mesopotamia. This last must have been the extreme northeastern opening, now communicating with the road to Khorsabad, implying that Halâh lay in that direction.

The gates on the west or river-side of the city were the gate of Ea, director of my water-springs; the quay-gate, "bringer of the tribute of my peoples"; the gate of the land of Bari, within which the presents of the Sumerians entered (brought down by the Tigris from Babylonia, in all probability); the gate of the tribute-palace or armory; and the gate of the god Sar-ur—"altogether 5 gates in the direction of the W." There are about 9 wide openings in the wall on this side, 2 being on each side of the Kouyunjik mound, and 2 on each side of that called Nêbî-Yûnu. As openings at these points would have endangered the city's safety, these 4 have probably to be eliminated, leaving 2 N. of Nêbî-Yûnu, 2 between that and Kouyunjik, and one N. of Kouyunjik. Minor means of exit probably existed at all points where they were regarded as needful.

To the outer wall of the city Sennacherib gave a Sumerian name meaning "the wall which terrifies the enemy." At a depth of 54 gar, the underground water-level, its foundations were laid upon blocks of stone, the object of this great depth being to frustrate undermining. This wall was made "high like a mountain."

5. The Outer Wall: the Plantations

Above and to the E. of the city he laid out plantations, wherein all the sweet-smelling herbs of Heth (Pal and Phoenicia) grew, fruitful beyond those of their homeland. Among them were to be found every kind of mountain-vine, and the plants of all the nations around.

In connection with this, in all probability, he arranged the water-supply, conducting a distant water-course to N. by means of conduits. Being a successful venture, he seems to have watered therewith all the people's orchards, and in winter 1,000 corn fields above and below the city. The force of the increased current in the river Khosr was retarded by the creation of a swamp, and among the reeds which grew there were placed wild fowl, wild swine, and deer(?). Here he repeated his exotic plantations, including trees for wood, cotton (apparently) and seemingly the olive.

7. How the Bas-Reliefs on their sledges (shaped like boats or Illustrate Assy ships), and sometimes standing the King's and supported by scaffolding. The Description bridges rest upon rollers, and are dragged by armies of captives urged to action by taskmasters with whips. Others force the sledges forward from behind by means of enormous levers whose upper ends are held in position by guy-ropes. Each side has to pull with equal force, for if the higher end of the great lever fell, the side which had pulled too hard suffered in killed and crushed, or at least in bruised, workmen of their number. In the background are the soldiers of the guard, and behind them extensive wooded hills. In other bas-reliefs it is apparently the pleasure-groves of the palace which are seen. In these the background is an avenue of trees, alternately tall and short, on the banks of a river, whereon are boats, and men riding astride inflated skins, which are much used in those days, as now. On another slab, the great king himself, in his hand-chariot drawn by eunuchs, superintends the work.

How long N. had been the capital of Assyria is unknown. The original capital was Aššur, about 90 miles to the S., and probably this continued to be regarded as the religious and official capital of the country. Aššur-naṣir-apli seems to have had a greater liking for Calah (Nimroud), and Sargon for Khorsabad, where he had founded a splendid palace. These latter, however, probably never had the importance of N., and attained their position merely on account of the reigning king building a palace and residing there. The period of N.'s supremacy seems to have been from the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib to the end of that of Aššur-naṣir-apli, including, probably, the reigns of his successors likewise—a period of about 98 years (704-606 BC).

V. Last Days and Fall of Nineveh.—N., during the centuries of her existence, must have seen many stirring historical events; but the most noteworthy were probably Sennacherib’s triumphal entries, including that following the capture of Lachish, the murder of that city’s king, and by his son Sennacherib (recent theory that he was killed at Babylon needs confirmation), and the ceremonial triumphs of Assur-bani-apli—the great and noble Osnappar (Ezr 4 10). After the reign of Assur-bani-apli came his son Assur-ñillâni, who was succeeded by Sin-sarris-ikun (Saracoen), but the history of the country, and also of the city, is practically nonexistent during these last two reigns. The Assyrian and Bab records are silent with regard to the fall of the city, but Alexander Polykar, Abiylenus and Syncellus all speak of it. The best account, however, is that of Diodorus Siculus, who refers to a legend that the city could not be taken until the river became its enemy. Arbaces, the Scythian, besieged it, but could not make any impression on it for 2 years. In the 2d year, however, the river (according to Commander Jones, not the Tigris, but the Khois), being swollen by rains, and very rapid in its current, carried away a portion of the wall, and by this opening the besiegers gained an entrance. The King, recognizing in this the fulfilment of the oracle, gathered together his concubines and eunuchs, and, mounting a funeral pyre which he had caused to be constructed, perished in the flames. This catastrophe is supposed to be referred to in Nah 1 8: “With an over-running flood he [the Lord] will make a full end of her place [i.e. of N.],” and 2 6: “The gates of the rivers are opened, and the palace is dissolved.” The destruction of the city by fire is probably referred to in 2 13.15. The picture of the scenes in her streets—the noise of the whip, the rattling wheels, the prancing horses, the bounding chariots (3 2 ff), followed by a vivid description of the carnage of the battlefield—is exceedingly striking, and true to their records and their sculptures.

LITERATURE.—The standard books on the discovery and exploration of Nineveh are Layard, Nineveh and its Remains (two vols. 1849). Nineveh and Babylon (1853); Monuments of Nineveh, 1st and 2d series (plates) (1849 and 1853); and Hormuzd Rassam, Assyria and the Land of Niniveh (Cincinnati and New York 1887).

I. The Discovery.—In the spring of 1850, the workmen of Sir A. H. Layard at Nineveh made an important discovery. In the ruins of the palace of Assur-bani-pal they found a passage which opened into two small chambers leading one into the other. The doorway was guarded on either side by figures of Ea, the god of culture and the inventor of letters, in his robe of fishskin. The walls of the chambers had once been paneled with bas-reliefs, one of which represented a city standing on the shore of a sea that was covered with galleys. Up to the height of a foot or more the floor was puddled with clay tablets that had fallen from the shelves on which they had been arranged in order, and the larger number of them was consequently broken. Similar tablets, but in lesser number, were found in the adjoining chambers. After Layard’s departure, other tablets were discovered by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, and then the excavations ceased for many years. The discovery of the Bab version of the account of the Deluge, however, by Mr. George Smith in 1873 led the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph to send him to Nineveh in the hope that the missing portions of the story might be found. He had not been excavating there long before he came across a fragment of another version of the story, and then once more the excavations came to an end. Since then expeditions have been sent by the British Museum which have resulted in the recovery of further remains of the ancient library of Nineveh.

II. The Library.—The tablets formed a library in the true sense of the word. Libraries had existed in the cities of Babylonia from a remote date, and the Assyrians, whose civilization was derived from Babylonia, imitated the example of Babylonia in this as in other respects. The only true book-lover among them, however, was Assur-bani-pal. He was one of the most munificent royal patrons of learning the world has ever seen, and it was to him that the great library of Nineveh owed its existence. New editions were made of older works, and the public and private libraries of Babylonia were replete in search of literary treasures.

III. Writing-Materials.—Fortunately for us the ordinary writing-material of the Babylonians and Assyrians was clay. It was more easily procurable than papyrus or parchment, and was specially adapted for the reception of the cuneiform characters. Hence, while the greater part of the old Egyptian literature, which was upon papyrus, has perished that of Babylon and Assyria has been preserved. In Babylonia the tablets after being inscribed were often merely dried in the sun; in the damper climate of Assyria they were baked in a kiln. As a large amount of text had frequently to be compressed into a small space, the writing is sometimes so minute as to need the assistance of a magnifying glass before it can be read. It is not surprising, therefore, that in the library-chambers of Nineveh Layard found a magnifying lens of crystal, which had been turned on the lathe.
IV. Contents.—The subject-matter of the tablets included all the known branches of knowledge.

1. Philology logical works. The inventors of the cuneiform system of writing had spoken an agglutinative language, called Sumerian, similar to that of the Turks or Finns today, and a considerable part of the early lit. had been written in this language, which to the later Sem Babylonians and Assyrians was analogous to the European nations in the Middle Ages. Thesudent was therefore provided with grammars and dictionaries of the two languages, as well as with reading-books and interlinear tr to Assy of the chief Sumerian texts. Besides this, long lists of the cuneiform characters were drawn up with their phonetic and ideographic values, together with lists of Assyr definitions, by which, for example, all the equivalents are given of the word “to go.” The Assyri lexicographers at times attempted etymologies which are as wide of the mark as similar etymologies given by English lexicographers of a past generation. Sabattu, “Sabath,” for instance, is derived from the two Sumerian words, sa, “heart,” and bat, “to end,” and so is explained to mean “day of rest for the heart.” It is obvious that all this implies an advanced literary culture. People do not begin to compile grammars and dictionaries or to speculate on the origin of words until books and libraries abound and education is widespread.

Astronomy occupied a prominent place in Assyri lit., but it was largely mingled with astrology. The Babylonians were the founders of scientific astronomy; they were the first to calculate the dates of lunar and solar eclipses, and to give names to the signs of the Zodiac. Among the contents of the library of Nineveh are reports from the Royal Observatory, relating to the observation of eclipses and the like. A knowledge of astronomy was needed for the regulation of the calendar, and the calendar was the special care of the priests, as the

3. Religious festivals of the gods and the payment of tithe were dependent upon it. Most of the religious texts went back to the Sumer period and were accordingly provided with Assyri tr. Some of them were hymns to the gods, others were the rituals used in different temples. There was, moreover, a collection of psalms, as well as numerous mythological texts. The legal law books were in Sumerian, but the great code compiled by Hammurabi, the contemporary of Abraham, was in Sem Babylonian (see HAMMURABI). Like English law, ASSYR-BABYLONIAN law was case-made, and records of the cases decided from time to time by the judges are numerous. Among scientific works we may class the long lists of animals, birds, fishes, plants and stones, together with geographical treatises, and the personal records of events. Starting from the belief that where two events followed one another, the first was the cause of the second, an elaborate pseudo-science of augury had been built up, and an enormous lit. arose on the interpretation of dreams, the observation of the liver of animals, etc. Unfortunately Assur-bani-pal had a special predilection for the subject, and the consequence is that his library was filled with works which the Assyriologist would gladly exchange for documents of a more valuable character. Among the scientific works we may also include those on medicine, as well as numerous mathematical tables.

Literature was largely represented, mainly in the form of poems on mythological, religious or historical subjects. Among these the most famous is the epic of the hero Gilgames in twelve books, the Bab account of the Deluge being introduced as an episode in the eleventh book. Another epic was the story of the great battle between the god Merodach and Tiamat, the dragon of chaos and evil, which includes the story of the creation.

Historical records are very numerous, the Assyrians being distinguished among the nations of antiquity by their historical sense.

7. History In Assyria the royal palace took the place of the Bab or Egypt temple; Chronology and where the Babylonian or the Egyptian would begin from a religious record, the Assyrian adorned his walls with accounts of campaigns and the victories of their royal builders. The dates which are attached to each portion of the narrative, and the care with which the names of petty princes and states are transcribed, give a high idea of the historical precision at which the Assyrians aimed. The Assyrian monuments are alone sufficient to show that the historical sense was by no means unknown to the ancient peoples of the East, and when we remember how closely related the Assyrians were to the Hebrews in both race and language, the fact becomes important to the Bib. student. Besides historical texts the library contained also chronological tables and long lists of kings and dynasties with the number of years they reigned. In Babylon time was marked by officially naming each year after some event that had occurred in the course of it; the more historically-minded Assyrian named the year after a particular mighty deed, which he had appointed on each New Year’s Day. In Babylon the chronological system went back to a very remote date. The Babylonians were a commercial people, and for commercial purposes it was necessary to have an exact register of the time.

The library contained trading documents of various sorts, more esp. contracts, deeds of sale of property and the like. Now and then we meet with the plan of a building. Commerce There were also legal documents relating to the taxes paid by the cities and provinces of the empire to the imperial treasury.

One department of the library consisted of letters, some of them private, others addressed to the king or to the high officials. Nearly a thousand of these have already been published by Professor Harper.

The clay books, if need hardly be added, were all carefully numbered and catalogued, the Assyrian system of docketing and arranging the tablets being at once ingenious and simple. The librarians, consequently, had no difficulty in finding any tablet or series of tablets that might be asked for. We may gather from the inscription attached to the larger works of literature, as well as to other collections of tablets that the libraries was open to all “readers.”

A. H. SAYCE
NINEVITES, nîn-e-vîtes (Nînêvî, Ninewê [tû]) Only in Lk 11:30. The passage (Mt 12:41, with Lk 11:32), has the fuller form, "men of Nineveh," which gives the meaning.

NIPHIS, nîfîs (Nîfîhî, Niphîthî, A, Pînîs, Phînîs; AV Niphis): Given in 1 Esd 6:21 m as = "Magbish" of Ezra 2:30, whose sons are the same in number (106) as those of Niphis, but it would seem rather to be the equivalent of Nebo in ver 29.

NISAN, nîsûn (נִשְׁנָן, nîshôn): The first month of the Jewish year in which occurred the Passover and which corresponds to April. The month is the same also called, which occurs in the Pent. Nisan occurs in Neh 2:1 and Est 3:7. It denotes "the month of flowers." See Calendar.

NISROCH, nîs'rok, nîz'rok (נִשְׁרוֹך, nîsh'rôkh): The Assyrian god in whose temple Sennacherib was worshipping when put to death by his sons (2 K 19:37; Isa 37:35). The name is not found elsewhere. Some identify him with Asshur, the national deity. See BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA, Religion of.

NITRE, nî'țrî (נִיתָר, nî'țar; vîrîôn, nîtron): Nitre as used in AV does not correspond to the present use of that term. Nitre or niter is now applied to sodium or potassium nitrate. The writer has in his collection a specimen of sodium carbonate, called in Arab. nâtânîn, which was taken from the extensive deposits in Lower Egypt where it is found as a deposit underneath a layer of common salt. Similar deposits are found in Syria and Asia Minor. This is probably the "nitre" of the Bible. AV has rendered nitre "lyce" in Jer 2:22, and "soda" in Prov 25:20. Soda or lye has been used as a cleansing agent from earliest times. It effervesces energetically, when treated with an acid; hence the comparison in Prov 25:20 of the heavy-hearted man ruled by the sound of singing to the sizzling of soda on which vinegar has been poured. See VINEGAR.

NO, nô. See No-amon.

NOADIAH, nô-ā-dî'ô (נֹעֲדִיָּה, nô'ā'dîyô), "tryst of Jeh"; Noâdî, Noâdî: (1) Son of Binnui, one of the Levites to whom Ezra intrusted the gold and silver and sacred vessels which he brought up from Babylon (Ezr 8:28); also called Mozur (q.v.), son of Sabannus (1 Esd 8:63). (2) A prophetess associated with Tobiah and Sanballat in opposition to Nehemiah (Neh 6:14).

NOAH, nô'â (נֹאָה, nô'âh, "rest"); LXX Noê, Nôe; Jos, Nôêxos, Nôchos): The 10th in descent from Adam in the line of Seth (Gen 5:25-29). Lamech here seems to derive the word from the v כַּעַת, ya'am, "to comfort," but this is probably a mere play upon the name by Noah's father. The times in which Noah was born were degenerate, and this finds pathetic expression in Lamech's saying at the birth of Noah. "This same shall comfort us in our work and in the toil of our hands, which cometh because of the ground which Jeh hath cursed." Concerning the theory that Noah is the name of a dynasty, like Pharaoh or Caesar, rather than of a single individual, see Antediluvians. In his 600th year the degenerate races of mankind were cut off by the Deluge. But 120 years previously (Gen 6:3) he had been warned of the catastrophe, and according to the Pope 3:20 had been preparing for the event by building the ark (see Ark; Deluge). In the cuneiform inscriptions Noah corresponds to "Hasisadrî" (Xisuthrus). After the flood Noah celebrated his deliverance by building an altar and offering sacrifices to Jeh (Gen 8:20), and was sent forth with God's blessing to be "fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen 9:1), as Adam had been sent forth at the beginning (Gen 1:28). In token of the certainty of God's covenant not to destroy the race again by flood, a rainbow spanned the sky whose reappearance was ever after to be a token of peace. But Noah was not above temptation. In the prosperity which followed, he became drunken from the fruit of the vineyard he had planted. His son Ham irreverently exposed the nakedness of his father, while Shem and Japheth covered it from view (Gen 9:22-23). The curse upon Canaan the son of Ham was literally fulfilled in subsequent history when Israel took possession of Pal, when Pyre fell beneath the feet of Alexander, and Carthage surrendered to Rome.

NOAH, BOOK (APOCALYPSE) OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

NO-AMON, nô-ăm'ôn (נֹעֲדִיָּה, nô'ā'dîyô), Egypt nut, "a city," with the feminine ending t, and Amon, proper name of a god, City Amon, i.e. the "City, my god," of the god Amon; tôv in AV "populous No," following the Vulg in a misunderstanding of the word "amon"; RV "No-amon": Occurs in this form only in Nah 3:8, but nô'â-dîyô, "amon of No," "Amon of No," occurs in Jer 46:5. Or also Ezek 30:14-16, where nô'â, nô, is undoubtedly the same city.

The description of No-amon in Nah 3:8 seems to be that of a delta city, but ð, yâm, "sea," in that passage is used poetically for the Nile, as in Job 41:31 and in Isa 19:2. With this difficulty removed, the Egyptian etymology of the name leaves no doubt as to the correct identification of the place. The "City Amon" in the days of Nahum, Jeremiah and Ezekiel was Thebes (cf. art. "Thebes" in any general encyclopedia).

NOB, nob (נֹב, nôb; B, Nô'bâ, Nômbô, A, Nôbâ, Nobâ, and other forms): An ancient priestly town to which David came on his way 8, when he fled from Saul at Gibeon (1 S 21:1). Heep has turned refuge and succour with Ahimelech. This was observed by Doeg the Edomite, who informed the king, and afterward became the instrument of Saul's savage vengeance on the priests, and on all the inhabitants of the city (ch. 22). The name occurs in Neh 11:32 in a list of cities, immediately after Anathoth. In Isaiah's ideal account of the Assyrians' march against Jerusalem, Nob is clearly placed S. of Anathoth. Here, says the prophet, the Assyrian shall shake his hand at the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerusalem. It was a place, therefore, from which the Holy City and the temple were clearly visible.

The district in which the site must be sought is thus very definitely indicated; but within this district no name at all resembling No has been discovered, and so no sure identification is yet possible. 'Anâhâ (Anathoth) is 2 miles N.E. of Jerusalem. Nob therefore lay between that and the city, at a point where the city could be seen, apparently on the ancient road from Jerusalem to the Mount. Rather more than a mile N. of Jerusalem rises the ridge Râ's el-Meshâ'rif (2,655 ft.), over which the road from the N. passes; and here the traveler approaching from that direction of gaining his place of the city. It is fittingly named "the look-out." Col. site 11a states the case for identifying this height with Mt. Scopus where Titus established his camp at the siege of Jerus (PEFS, 1874, 111 ff.). Immediately S. of the ridge, to the E. of the road, there is a small plateau, S. of which there is a lower ridge, whence the slopes dip into Wady el-Joz. This plateau, on which Titus may have sat, is a very probable site for Nob. It quite suits the requirements of Isaiah's narrative, and not those of David's flight. Gid of the N. is near the N., and this lay in the most likely path to the S.

NOBACH, nōḇāh (נְבְּאָה, nōḇāḇ; B, Naḇāš, Naḇōth, Naḇāš, Naḇāš, Naḇāš, Naḇāš, Naḇāš, Naḇāš). 1. Noebah the Manasseite, who are told, "went and took Kenath, and the villages thereof, and called it Nobah, after his own name" (Nu 32 42). There can be little doubt that the ancient Kenath is represented by the modern Kanaanet, on the western slope of Jebel Drače, the ancient name having survived of that of Nob. (2) A city which marked the course of Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Jgs 8 11). It is possible that this may be identical with (1). Cheyne argues in favor of this (ED, a.v. "Gideon"). But the mention along with Dogbhabah points to a more southerly location. This may have been the original home of the clan Nobah. Some would read, following the Syr in Nu 31 30, "Nobah which is on the desert," instead of "Nophah which reacheth unto Medeba." No site with a name resembling this has yet been recovered. If it is to be distinguished from Kenath, then probably it will have to be sought somewhere to the N.E. of Rabbath-Ammon (Ammán). W. Ewino Nobelman is, in Lk 19 12, the tr of eugene antrôpous, "a man well-born," and in Jn 4 46.49 of basilikos, "kingly," "belonging to a king," a designation extended to the officers, courtiers, etc., of a king, RVM "king's officer." he was probably an officer, civil or military, of the Herod Antipas, who was styled "king's (basiological).

NOBAI, nōḇāʼi (נְבָאִי; nōḇāʻāy, or nōḇāḇāy): One of those who took part in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 19).

NOBLE, nōḇ’l, NOBLES, nōḇ’l-zi. NOBLEMANN, nōḇ’l-maan (נְבֶלֶם, nōḇelām, kōrdin, kōrdić), etc. (1) "nobles" (1 K 21 16; Neh 2 16; 6 17, etc); of addar, "begir'd," "mighty," "Illustrious" or "noble." Jgs 6 13; 2 Ch 20 20, etc. of addārkā, "liberal," "a noble" (Nu 21 18; Prov 1 16, etc.).

Other words are gābdāl, "great." (Jon 3 7); yakār; Aram. pāracious" (Ezr 4 10); nāghādāt, "a leader" (Job 29 10); partammām, "foremost ones" (Est 1 3; 6 9); dāvirā, "those near," "nobles" (Ex 24 11); bārī, "fugitive" (Isa 45 14); kāḇōkkāth, "weighty," "honored" (Ps 149 8). eugenēs, "well-born" (Acts 17 11; 1 Cor 2 6); krateō, "strongest," "most powerful" (Acts 24 3; 26 25). The Apoc. AV and RV, still further enlarges the list. In Is 1, we have megaptemes, "great ones" (1 Esd 1 38; 8 26, with kūrmes, "in honor") Isa 13 12). Otherwise RV's "uses of noble," and "nobility" are for words containing the κληνος and referring to birth (cf Wisd 8 3; 2 Mac 16 7; 22 12; 42 14 42 bis). AV's uses are wider (asjustify, etc.)

For "nobles" (Isa 43 14), AV "have brought down all their nobles," RV has "will bring down all them as fugitives." in or, and otherwise reads as their noble even." etc. for "uses" (Jer 30 21), "prince:" RV has "worthies" for "nobles." (Nah 3 18); RV has "the noble" for "princes" (Prov 17 26); "noble" for "princes" (Job 54 18; Dan 1 3); for "Nazarites" (Lam 4 7; m. "Nazarites"); "her nobles" for "his fugitives," etc. (Isa 15 5); AV has "noble" for "liberal" (Isa 32 5); for the nobles' hosts their peace," AVm. "The voice of the nobles was hushed." (Job 30 10); RV has "The voice of the nobles was hushed," m. "Heb hid"); for "most noble" (Acts 24 3; 28 23), "most excellent." W. L. Walker

NOD, nod (נֶדֶב, nāḏēḇ): The land of Eden, to which Cain migrated after the murder of his brother and his banishment by Jeth (Gen 4 16). Conjecture of the tribe is impossible. The ideas of China, India, etc., which some have entertained, are groundless. The territory was evidently at some distance, but where is now undiscoverable.

NOZABAM, nōzāḇām (נְזָבָאָם; nāzāḇām): A Hagrite clan which, along with Jetur and Naphish, suffered complete defeat at the hands of the trans-Jordanic Israelites (1 Ch 5 19). It has been suggested that Nozabam is a corruption of Nabadh or Nabadai, names which are associated with Jetur and Naphish in the lists of Ishmael's sons (Gen 25 15; 1 Ch 1 31), but it is difficult to see how even the most careless copyist could so blunder. There is a possible reminiscence of the name in Nūdbē, a village in the Hauran.

NOE, nōē (Nē, Nēb): AV of Mt 24 37,38; Lk 3 36; 17 26,27; Tob 4 12. Gr form of Noah (q.v.) (thus RV).

NOEBA, nọ̄ebā (Νοάβα, Nōeβā): Head of one of the families of temple-servants (1 Esd 6 30) = "Nekoda" of Ezr 2 48.

NOGAH, nọ̄gā (נוגה, nōghā, "splendor"): A son of David born at Jerus (1 Ch 3 7; 14 6). In the | list (2 S 14 15) this name is wanting. In its Gr form (Narrāi, Naggs) it occurs in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3 25).

NOHABA, nọ̄hāba (נוחבה, nōḥābā): The fourth son of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 2). It is probable that in Jgs 20 43, instead of "a resting-place" we should read "Nobah," which may have been the settlement of the family.

NOISE, noiz (נָזָע, nōzā; kəḇāl, kāḇālān, kāḇōk, kāḇōk; דַּ֖שָּׁר, Dāšār, kāḇōḵ; דַ֖שָּׁר, Dāšār, kāḇōḵ): "Noise" is most frequently the tr of kōl, "voice," "sound," in AV (Ex 20 18, "the noise of the trumpet," RV "voice"); 32 17 bis; Jgs 5 11, "[they that are delivered] from the noise of the archers," RV "far from the noise," etc. (as otherwise the voice of"); 1 S 4 6, etc.; "because of the voice of"; 1 S 4 8, etc.; "The noise of," "voice," "sound," "noise" (Isa 24 8; 26 9); "ruaḥā, the voice," "the voice," "voice," "voice," (Job 36 29); "Dāšār, the voice," "corony," "outcry" (Job 36 33); shāmān, "desolation," "noise" (Isa 24 8; 26 3); "ruaḥā, the voice," "the voice," "voice," "voice, etc (Josh 6 10; 1 Ch 15 28); phōnē, "sound," "voice," is tr "noise" (Rev 6 1, "I heard as it were the noise of thunder," RV "saying as with a voice of thunder"); ṭhuqādām, "with a hissing or rushing sound" (2 Pet 3 10, with a great noise"); ginetai phōnē (Acts 2 6, AV "when this was noise abroad," m. "when this voice was made," RV "when this sound was heard"); akōs, "to hear"; dalalē, "to talk or speak" throughout, are also tr "noised" (Mk 2 1; Lk 6 55). So RV of Jth 17 16, "noised among the tents"; Acts, thrōsos, "confused noise" (Wisd 1 10); bōt, "outcry" (Jth 17 19); echōs, "sound" (Wisd 17 18; of Sir 40 13); Lat nox, "voice" (2 Esd 5 7).

For "noise" (Ps 65 7 b), RV has "roaring," for "make a noise like the noise of the sea" (Isa. 17 12), "the uproar (in multitude)" of many peoples, that roar like the roaring of the seas; for "a voice of noise from the city" (Isa. 66 6), "a voice of tumult from the city;" for "noise" (Jer 10 22), "voice;" for "a noise" (1 Ch 15 28), "voices" (Ps 43 9); "every battle of the warrior is with confused noise" (Ps 46 12), "the warrior of the city in the tumult," "every boot of the booted warrior;" for "make a noise," "whoan," (Ps 6 2), "roar" (Isa. 17 12); for "make a loud noise" (Ps 88 4), "break forth;" for "moketh a noise" (Jer 4 19), "is disgusted;" for "the noise of his tabernacle" (Job 38 29), "the thunderings of his pavilion;" for "make any noise with your voice" (Josh 6 10), "let your voice be heard;" "joyful singing" (Isa 18 7). "The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than all the mighty waves of the sea" (Ps 93 4), "above the voices of many waters, the mighty breakers of the sea, Jehovah on high is mighty." W. L. Walker

NOISOME, noisome (יוֹנָם, no' nam), ra'; ἄσθμα, kakós, kakós): "Noisome" from "annoys (annoysome)" has in Bible Eng. the meaning of "evil," "hurtful," not of "offensive" or "loathsome." It is the tr of hawwah, "mischief," "calamity" (Ps 91 3), "noisome, a common TR for "evil" (Ezek 4.15). It occurs also in Job 31 20 AVm as the tr of b'hosh, "noisome weeds." AV and RV "rockle," m as AVm; of kakós, "evil," "bad." (Rev 15 5); of a common word for "evil" (Ezek 15:21). Noisome" beasts" (RV "evil"). It occurs also in Job 31 40 AVm as the tr of bo'shah, "noisome weeds," AV and RV "rockle," m as AVm; of kakós, "evil," "bad." (Rev 13 14); of a common word for "evil" (Ezek 15:21). Noisome" also occurs in Apc (see Rev 16:3) as the tr of barâ'ân, "to make heavy," "oppress," where it seems to have the meaning of "loathsome." W. L. Walker

NON, non (יוֹנָם, no' nam): 1 Ch 7 27 AV and RVm. See Nun.

NOOMA, nō'm-ah (Noumâ, Noomâ, B,'Qumâ, Oomt; AV Ethma): 1 Esd 9 35 = "Nebo" of Ezr 10 43, of which it is a corruption.

NOON, noun (יוֹנָן, noon): noon; nānāḏ (יוֹנָן, νανάν): "a feeding former" (ἐπί στέον ἄρθρον, μεσσίνια): the word means light, splendor, brightness, and hence the brightest part of the day (Gen 43 16:25; Acts 22 6). See also MIDDAY; DAY AND NIGHT; TIME.

NOPH, nof (נופ, "noph; in Hos 9 6 môph): A name for the Egyp city Memphis (so LXX); hence rendered in RV (Isa 19 13; Jer 2 16; 44 1; Ezek 30 13:16). See MEMPHIS.

NOPHIAH, no'fâ (נופי, nophâh; LXX does not transliterate): A city mentioned only in Nu 21 30 (see Nophar). LXX reads kai hai gunaikeis éis prosêkouan per epi Modob, "and the women besides [yet] kindled a fire at [against] Moab." The text has evidently suffered corruption.

NORTH, nôth, NORTH COUNTRY (יוֹנָן, נוֹר, נוֹר), gâphôn, from √ נוֹר, gâphan, "to hide," i.e. "the hidden," "the dark" [Gen.]; βοσάσ, boreas; βοσᾶς, boreas; [Ith 16 4]; setepentri (2 Esd 15 45); in addition to many other places where "north" occurs merely as a point of the compass, there are several passages in Jer, Ezek and Zeph, where it refers to a particular country, usually Assyria or Babylonia: Jer 3 18, "Shall they come together out of the land of the north to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers;" Jer 46 6, "In the north by the river Euphrates have they stumbed and fallen;" Ezek 26 7, "I will bring upon Tyre Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, king of kings, from the north;" Zeph 2 13, "He will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria, and will make Nineveh a desolation." While the site of Nineveh was N.E. of Jerus, and that of Babylon almost due E., it was not unnatural for them to be referred to as "the north," because the direct desert routes were impracticable, and the roads led first into Northern Syria and then eastward (cf however Gen 29 1, "Then Jacob went on his journey, and came to the land of the children of the east"). In Ezek 38 6, we have, "Gene, and all his hollands; his house of Togarmah in the uttermost parts of the north." It is uncertain what country is here referred to. Some have supposed Armenia (cf Gen 10 3; 1 Ch 1 6; Ezek 27 14).

The northern border of the promised land, as outlined in Nu 34 7-9 and Ezek 47 15-17, cannot be determined with any certainty, being a word, the meaning of which cannot be identified, but it was approximately the latitude of Mt. Hermon, not including Lebanon or Damascus. For north (עִבְרָם) see Astronomy.

ALFRED ELY DAY

NORTHEAST, SOUTHEAST: These words occur in Acts 27 12, "if by any means they could reach Phoenix, and winter there; which is a haven of Crete, looking north-east and south-east." RV has: "from the south-west, and down the north-west wind," which is a lit. tr. of the Gr; ἀνὰ Φαίαντα ἀπὸ τὸ βοῦλα τῆς νότου ἡ θὐθών τὴν ἀνατολὴν." The northeast wind, which does not appear to occur except here, is the corresponding Lat. wind, and was named cannot be identified, but it was approximately the latitude of Mt. Hermon, not including Lebanon or Damascus. For north (עִבְרָם) see Astronomy.

ALFRED ELY DAY

NOSE, nôs, NOSTRILS, nos'trils (יוֹנָן, ל'ק, "nose," ל'ק, ὁ πυρυγός, dual of ל'ק, ὁ πυρυγός), "nostrile"): The former expression (from "norph, like Arab. انف, 'onf) is often trs "face" (which see s.v.) in EV. It is frequently referred to as the organ of breathing, in other words, as the receptacle of the breath or spirit of God; "Jehovah breatheth into his nostrils the breath of life; and man breeathed a living soul into his nostrils;" "My life is yet whole in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils;" (Job 27 3). Therefore a life which depends on so slight a thing as a breath is considered as utterly frail and of no great consequence: "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of?" (Isa 2 22; cf Wisd 2 2).

In poetical language such a breath of life is ascribed even to God, esp. with regard to the mighty storm which is thought to proceed from his nostrils (Ex 16 5; Ps 68 8; Ezek 31 14). The phrase, "a smoke in my nose, a fire that burneth all the day" (Isa 65 5), is equivalent to a perpetual annoyance and cause of irritation. A cruel custom of war, in which the vanquished had their noses and ears cut off by their remorseless conquerors, is referred to in Ezek 23 25. As a wild animal is held in check by having his nose pierced and a hook or ring inserted in it (Job 40 24; 41 2 [Heb 40 26]), so this expression is used to indicate the humbling and taming of an obstinate person (2 K 19 23; Isa 37 29; cf Ezek 15 7; 34 4).

But men, and esp. women, had their noses pierced for the wearing of jewelry (Gen 24 47; Isa 3 21; Ezek 16 12). In one passage the meaning is not quite clear, viz. in the enumeration of blemishes which disable a "son of Aaron" from the execution of the priest’s office (Lev 21:18), where EV translates “flat [m. ‘slit’] nose.” The Heb word is רום, barum, which is a hapax legomenon. It corresponds, however, to the Arab. ُجرام, جرم, hence, حرم. The Israhelites were said to be "notable for gold and ornament" (cf Mal 4:5); “notable” occurs also in 2 Mac 3:26 (exprex.). 14:33, RV “for all to see”; 6:28 (genitatives), “a notable example,” RV "noble; notably, only in 2 Mac 14:31 (genitatives), "notably prevented,” RV “bravely,” m. “not.”

NOTE, nôt (יוֹנָה, "hannah; *hannah, *hannah; יַעֲנֹטָה; genitatives); "Nette" (v. b.) is the tr of ḥañah, to grave; "to inscribe," etc (Isa 30:8, note it in a book, RV "inscribe"); of rḤashem, to note down, etc (Dnl 10:21, RV "inscribed"); of sōnêôtô, "to cut a sign on" (2 Thess 3:14, "note that man"). "Note" (noun) is the tr of épìsémos, "marked upon," "distinguished" (Rom 16:7, who are of note among the apostles). "Notes" (musical) occurs in Wisd 19:18, "notes of a psaltery" (philhagôs).

NOTHING, nothing (נָהַר, לַא, נַעֲרֶנָה, נַעֲרֶנָה, "nôth, "nôth, "nôth, m. "nôth, m. "nôth, n. "nôth, n. "nôth, n.); nothing is represented by various words and phrases, often with lô, which is properly a suffix, with the meaning of "nothing." Most frequently we have מָדָאָה, "not anything" (Gen 40:15; Jgs 14:6).

Other forms are לָא, "nothing" (Gen 19:14); הַמַּעְלָה, "not at all," (Gen 1:26); הָעָלָה, "not at all," (Gen 1:26); הַמַּעְלָה, "nothing" not even one (Acts 5:30); apelegmón, "refutation" (Acts 19:27, RV "come into disrepute"); dōrēnā, "without payment" (2 Thess 3:8, RV "for nought"); erēmō, "to desolate" (Rev 18:17, RV "made desolate"); kolāthō, "to lose down" (Acts 5:38, RV "be overthrown"). In Apoc we have "set at nought" and "come to nought," etc (1 Pt 3:3; 2:2; 5:9).

For "nought" RV has "perish" (Dt 28:63); for "come to nought" (Job 8:22), "he no more"; "nought" for "notIGHT" (Ex 5:11), "for no might" (Dt 28:32); for "noughted" Isa (Isa 19:1); "brought to nought" ARV "bring to nought" (1 Cor 1:19) for "destruction" (KJV "destruction of projects"); "nought but terror" (Isa 28:19) for a "vexation only"; "brought to nought" (Isa 16:4) for "is at an end"; "come to nought for" "taken for nought" (Rom 6:20) for "set at nought" for "despise" (Rom 14:3).

NOURISH, nur'ish (γαστρεύω, gibdēl, ἐχαρίζω, ἡγοῦμαι, καταλέγω, ἱππάθω, ἐκτρέφω, ἐκτρέφω, ἐκτρέφω, ἐκτρέφω): While the word "nourish" was ordinarily an appropriate rendering in the time of the AV, the word has since become much less frequent, and some senses have largely passed out of ordinary use, so that the most common meaning is "to feed" and the possibility of this is suggested by some other word. Gibdēl means "to bring up," "rear [children]" (Isa 1:2, m "made great"); 23:4; Dnl 1:5); "cause [a tree] to grow" (Isa 44:14). ἡγοῦμαι means "to preserve alive," (with "giving of care") (2 S 12:3; Isa 7:21, ARV "keep alive"). Kαταλέγω means "to support," "maintain," "provide for" (esp. with food) (Gen 45:11; 47:12; 50:21). ἱππάθω means "to bring up," "rear [wheats]" in a figurative use (Ezk 10:2). ἐκτρέφω means "to feed" (transitive) (Acts 12:20, RV "feed"; Rev 12:14); "to fatten" (Jas 5:5, the context indicating an unfavorable meaning). ἐκτρέφω in "to bring up," "rear," like gibdēl (Acts 7:20:21); ektrēphos is "to take care of" (Eph 5:29); ektrēphos is "to bring up," "train in" (1 Tim 4:6).

NOVICE, nov'is (νέοφυτος, νεόφυος, "newly planted"): In this sense it is found in LXX of Job 14:9 and Isa 5:7. In the NT it occurs only once (1 Tim 2:6), where it means a person newly planted in the Christian faith, a neophyte, a new convert, one who has recently become a Christian. This term occurs in the list which Paul gives of the qualifications that a Christian bishop must possess. The apostle instructs Timothy, that if any man desires the office of a bishop, he must not be a "novice," must not be newly converted, or recently brought to the faith of Christ lest he be lifted up with pride, and fall into the condemnation of the devil.

This means that a recent convert runs the very serious risk of being wise in his own eyes, of despising those who are still on the level from which, by his conversion, he has been lifted; and so he becomes puffed up with high ideas of his own importance. He has not yet had time to discover his limitations, he is newly planted, he does not fully understand his true position in the Christian community, he overestimates himself and, for these reasons, he is peculiarly liable to instability, and to the other weaknesses and sins connected with an inflated opinion of himself. His pride is a premonition of a coming fall. A novice, therefore, must on no account be appointed to the office in question, for he would be sure to bring disgrace upon it.

LITERATURE

I. Number and Arithmetic.—The system of counting followed by the Hebrews and the Semites generally was the decimal system, which seems to have been suggested by the use of the ten fingers. The Heb had several words of different forms for the first few units and for ten and its multiples. Of the sexagesimal system, which seems to have been introduced into Babylonia by the Sumerians and which, through its development there, has influenced the measurement of time and space in the western civilized world even to the present day, there is no direct trace in the Bible, although, as will be shown later, there are some possible echoes. The highest number in the Bible described by a single word is 10,000 (rīḇbō or rīḇō, "multitudes"). The Egyptians, on the other hand, had separate words for 100,000, 1,000,000, 10,000,000, 100,000,000. The highest numbers referred to in any way in the Bible are: "a thousand thousand" (1 Ch 22:14; 2 Ch 14:9); thousands of thousands (Dan 4:27; Rev 5:11); "thousands of ten thousand" (Gen 24:60); "ten thousand times ten thousand" (Dnl 7:10; Rev 5:11); and twice that figure (Rev 9:16). The excessively high numbers met with in some oriental systems (cf. Lubbey System, Decimal Systems, 377) have no parallels in Heb. Fractions were not unknown. We find ½ (2 S 18:2, etc); ½ (Ex 25:10,17, etc); (1 S 9:8); ½ (Gen 47:24); ½ (Ex 18:6); ½ (Lev 23:13); ½ (Lev 14:10), and (2 S 11:1). These are less definitely expressed by ½ by "a double portion," lit. "a double mouthful" (Dt 21:17; 2 K 2:9; Zec 13:8); by "four parts" (Gen 47:24), and ½ by "nine parts" (Neh 11:1). Only the simplest rules of arithmetic can be illustrated from the OT. There are examples of addition (Gen 5:3–31; Nu 1:20–46); subtraction (Gen 18:28 ff); multiplication (Lev 25:8; Nu 3:46 ff), and division (Nu 31:27 ff). In Lev 25:50 ff is what has been said to imply a kind of rule-of-three sum. The Old Babylonians had tables of squares and cubes intended no doubt to facilitate the measurement of land (Sayce, Assyria, its Kings, Priests and People, 118; Bead, Ninive and Babylon, 90, 92); and it can now only be doubted that the same need led to similar results among the Israelites, but at present there is no evidence. Old Heb arithmetic and mathematics as known to us are of the most elementary kind (Nowack, H.A.1, 298).

II. Notation of Numbers.—No special signs for the expression of numbers in writing can be proved to have been in use among the Hebrews before the exile. The Sogdian Words, Inscription, which is probably the oldest specimen of Heb writing extant (with the exception of the ostraca of Samaria, and perhaps a seal or two and the obscure Gezer tablet), has the numbers written in full. The words used there for 3,200, 1,000 are written as words without any abbreviation. The earlier text of the M S which practically illustrates the Heb usage has the numbers 30, 40, 50, 100, 200, 7,000 written out in the same way.

After the exile some of the Jews at any rate employed signs such as were current among the Egyptians, the Phoenicians—an upright line for 1, two such lines for 2, three for 3, and so on, and special signs for 10, 20, 100. It had been conjectured that these or similar signs were known to the Jews, but actual proof was not forthcoming until the discovery of Jewish papyri at Assuan and Elephantine in 1904 and 1907. In these texts, ranging from 494 to c 400 BC, the dates and names of kings, coins, and other items are marked. We have therefore clear evidence that numerical signs were used by members of a Jewish colony in Upper Egypt in the 5th century BC. Now, as the existence of this colony can be traced before 525 BC and there is evidence that they used this method of notation also in the preceding century, conjecture indeed may go as far as its beginning, for it is known that there were Jews in Pathros, that is Upper Egypt, in the last days of Jeremiah (Jer 44:1). Some of the first Jewish settlers in Elephantine may have known the prophet and some of them may have come from Jesus, bringing these signs with them. At present, however, that is pure hypothesis.

In the notation of the chapters and verses of the Heb Bible and in the expression of dates in Heb books the consonants of the Heb alphabet are employed for figures, i.e. the first ten letters for 1–10, combinations of these for 11–99, the following eight for 20–99, and the remainder for the hundreds, at any rate from 100, 200, etc. The letters of the Gr alphabet were used in the same way. The antiquity of this kind of numerical notation cannot at present be ascertained. It is found on Jewish coins which have been dated in the reign of the Macabean Simon (143–135 BC), but some scholars refer them to a much later period. All students of the Talmud are familiar with this way of numbering the pages, or rather the leaves, but its use there is no proof of early date. The numerical use of the Gr letters and the alphabet in general, as Illustrated, it is met with in many Gr papyri, some of them from the 3rd cent. BC (Hibeh Papyri, nos. 40–43, etc) on several coins of Herod the Great, and in some MSS of the NT, for instance, a papyrus fragment of Mt (Oxyrhynchus Papy., 2) where 14 is three times represented by iota deriv with a line above the letters, and some codices of Rev at 13:18 where 666 is given by the three letters chi xi tau or (diapamma). It is possible that two of these methods may have been employed by scribes, as in the Punic Sacrificial Tablet of Marseilles, where (I. 6) 150 is expressed first in words, and then by figures.

III. Numbers in OT History.—Students of the historical books of the OT have long been perplexed by the high numbers which are made in many cases to refer to the Israelites at the Exodus (Ex 12:37; Nu 11:21), and on two occasions during the sojourn in the wilderness (Nu 1:26)—more than 600,000 adult males, which means a total of two or three millions; the result of David's census 1,300,000 men (2 S 24:9) or 1,570,000 (1 Ch 21:5), and the slaughter of half a million in a battle between Judah and Israel (2 Ch 13:17). There are many other illustrations in the Books of Ch and elsewhere. That such a figure is not within the range of reasonableness, and is not in the least surprising, for there is ample evidence that the numbers in ancient documents were exceptionally liable to corruption. One of the best known instances is the variation of 4,446 years between the Heb text and the LXX (text of B) as to the interval from the creation of Adam to the birth of Abram. Other striking cases are 1 S 6:19, where 50,070 ought probably to be 70 (Jos, Ant., VI, i, 4); 2 S 15:7, where 100,000 might be 40,000; or 4,000; or 276 in the MSS of Acts 27:37, and of 616 and 666 in those of Rev 13:18. Heb MSS furnish some instructive variations. One of them, no. 109 of Kennicott, reads (Nu 1:23) 1,050 for 50,000; 50 for 50,000 (2:6), and 100 for 100,000 (yer 16). It is easy to see how mistakes may have originated in many cases. The Heb numerals for 30, etc. are the plurals of the units, so that the former, as written, differ from the latter only by the addition of the two last letters, and numbers like 100, 300, etc., are described. Now as the mēn was often omitted, 3 and 30, 4 and 40, etc., could readily be confused. If signs or letters of the alphabet were made use of, instead of abbreviated words, there would be quite as much room for mistakes as on the part of copyists. The high numbers above referred to as found in Ex and Nu have been ingeniously accounted for by Professor Flinders Petrie (Researches in Sinai) in a wholly different way. By understanding 'kipper' not as 'thousand,' but as 'family' or 'tent,' he reduces the number to 5,550 for the first census, and 5,730 for the second. This figure, however, seems too low, and the method of interpretation, though not impossible, is open to criticism. It is generally admitted that the number as usually read is too high, but the original number has not yet been certainly discovered. When, however, full allowance has been made for the intrusion of numerical errors into the Heb text, it is difficult to resist the belief that, in the Books of Numbers, the authors made a little of money to exaggeration in this respect. The huge armies again and again ascribed to the little kingdoms of Judah and Israel cannot be reconciled with some of the facts revealed by recent research; with the following, for instance. The army which met the Assyrians at Karkar in 854 BC and which represented 11 states and tribes inclusive of Israel and the kingdom of Damascus, cannot have numbered at the most more than about 75,000 or 80,000 men (HDB, 4000, 630), as stated: It reckons the whole levy of his country at only 102,000 (Der alte Orient, XI, i, 14, note). In view of these figures it is not conceivable that the armies of Israel or Judah could number a million, or even half a million. The contingent from the larger kingdom contributed on the occasion mentioned above consisted of only 10,000 men and 2,000 chariots (HDB, ii). The safest conclusion, therefore, seems to be that, while many of the questionable numbers in the present text are genuine, there is a residuum which cannot be so accounted for.

IV. Round Numbers.—The use of definite numerical expressions in an indefinite sense, that is, as round numbers, which is met with in many languages, seems to have been very prevalent in Western Asia from early times to the present day. W. Ramsay (Thousand and One Churches, 6) remarks that the modern Turks have 4 typical numbers which are often used in proper names with little or no reference to their exact numerical force —3, 7, 40, 1,001. The Lycaonian district which gives the book its name is called Bin Bir Kilisse, "The Thousand and One Churches," although the actual number in the valley is only 28. The modern Persians use 40 in just the same way. "Forty years" and the like is frequently meant for "a very long time," or "the period of a scribe's life" (Brugsch, cited by König, Stilistik, 55). This lax use of numbers, as we think, was probably very frequent among the Israelis and their neighbors. The inscription on the M S supplies a very instructive example. The Israelites occupied the land by Medea by Omri and his son for half the reign of the latter is there reckoned (II 7 f) at 40 years. As, according to 1 K 18:29, the period extended to only 23 years at the most, the number 40 must have been used in the sense of the writer's scribe as a round number. It is probably often used in that way in the Bible where it is remarkably frequent, esp. in reference to periods of days or years. The 40 days of the Flood (Gen 7:4), the arrangement of the life of Moses in three periods of 40 years each (Acts 7:23; Ex 7:7; Dt 34:7), the 40 years' rule or reign of Moses (Ex 34:28); Edith (1 K 18:9), Jos, Ant. VI, xiv, 9), of David (1 K 2:11), of Solomon (1 K 11:42) and of Jeboasha (2 K 12:1), the 40 or 80 years of rest (Jgs 3:11.30; 5:31; 8:28), the 40 years of Philipp oppression (Jgs 13:1), the 40 days' challenge of Goliath (1 S 17:16), the 40 days' fast of Moses (Ex 34:28), Edith (1 K 18:9), and Jesus (Mt 4:2 and li), the 40 days before the destruction of Nineveh (Jon 3:4), and the 40 days before the Ascension (Acts 1:3), all suggest conventional use, or the influence of that use, for it can hardly be supposed that in each of these cases, and in others which might be mentioned, was exactly 40. How it came to be so used is not quite certain, but it may have originated, partly at any rate, in the idea that 40 years constituted a generation or the period at the end of which a man attains maturity, an idea common, it would seem, to the Greeks, the Israelites, and the Arabs. The period of 40 years in the wilderness is the course of which the old Israel died out and a new Israel took its place was generation (Nu 32:18, etc.). The rabbis long afterward regarded 40 years as the age of understanding, the age when a man reaches his intellectual prime (Ab, v, addendum). In the Koran (Sure 48) a man is said to attain his strength when he has passed the 40 years of that age, according to tradition, that Muhammad came forward as a prophet. In this way perhaps 40 came to be used as a round number for an indefinite period with a suggestion of completeness, and then was extended in course of time to things as well as seasons.

Other round numbers are: (1) some of the higher numbers; (2) several numerical phrases. Under (1) come the following numbers. One hundred, often of course to be understood literally, but evidently a round number in Gen 26:12; Lev 26:8; 2 S 24:3; Ecel 8:12; Mt 19:29 and ||. A thousand (thousands), very often a literal number, but in not a few cases indefinite, e.g. Ex 20:6 || Dt 5:10; 7:9; 1 S 15:7; Ps 50:10; 90:4; 105:8; Isa 60:22, etc. Ten thousand (Heb rabbō, rḇbḥō, ṭḥḇḥō); Gr μυρίοι, μυρίον is also used as a round number as in Lev 26:8; Dt 32:30; Cant 5:10; Mie 6:7. The yet higher figures, thousands of thousands, etc., are, in almost all cases, divisions by 10,000, of the rounder numbers; there are remarkable occurrences in the apocalyptic books (Dn 7:10; Rev 6:11, 9:16; Ethiopic En 40:1). (2) The second group, numerical phrases, consists of a number of expressions in which numbers are used roundly, in some cases to express the idea of fewness. One or two, etc. "a day or two" (Ex 21:21), "an heap, two heaps!" (Jgs 15:16 RVm), "one of a city, and two of a family" (Jer 3:14), "not one, nor twice,' that is 'several times' (2 K 6:10). Two or three: "two or three bershebas in the [topmost] hough" (Jsa 17:6; cf Hos 6:2), "Where two or three are gathered together in my name," etc (Mt 18:20). König refers to Assyr, Syr, and Arab. parallels. Three or four: the most noteworthy example is the formula which occurs 8 t in Am (1:3,6,11,18, 2:1,4,6), for "three transgressions, . . . yea for four." That the numbers here are round numbers is evident from the fact that the sins enumerated are in most cases neither 3 nor 4. In Prov 30 15. 18.21,29, or more than likely denote the three, or possibly the five, of the apocryphal mechanical device, climax ad majus, 4 is followed by four statements and is therefore to be taken literally. Again, König (ib) points to classical and Arab. parallels. Four or five: "Four or five in the outmost branches of a fruitful tree," or else: "They should not have smitten [Syria] five or six times" (2 K 13:19), an idiom met with also in Am Tab (König, ib). Six and seven: "He will deliver thee in six troubles; yea, in seven there shall he come to thee nothing," or else evil teaching (1 K 2:21), etc. "Seven shepherds, and eight principal men" (Mie 5:5), that is, "enough and more than enough" (Cheyne); "Give a portion to seven, yea, even unto eight" (Ecel 11:2). In one remarkable phrase which occurs (with slight variations of form) 24 t in the OT, two Hebrew words, meaning respectively "yesterday" and "third," are mostly used so as together to express the idea of vague reference to the past. RV renders in a variety of ways: "beforetime" (Gen 31:2, etc.), "aforetime" (Josh 4:18), "herefore," "therefore" (Ex 1:6), etc., of both of these, and in other words, was widespread in the ancient East, esp. in Babylonia and regions more or less influenced by Bab culture which, to a certain extent, included Canaan. It must also be remembered that the ancestors of the Israelites have been of Babylonian stock and may therefore have transmitted to their descendants the germs at least of numerical symbolism as developed in Babylonia in the age of Hammurabi. Be that as it may, the presence of this usage of numbers is a matter that can be reasonably doubted, although some writers have gone too far in their speculations on the subject. The numbers which are unmistakably used with more or less symbolic meaning are 7 and its multiples, and 3 and 4 and 7.

By far the most prominent of these is the number 7, which is referred to in one way or another in nearly 600 passages in the Bible, as well as in many passages in the Apoc and Its and the Pseudepigrapha, and later Jewish literature. Of course the number has its usual numerical force in many of these places, but even there not seldom with a glance at its symbolic significance For the determination of the latter we are not assigned to conjecture. There is clear evidence in the cuneiform texts, which are our earliest authorities, that the Babylonians regarded 7 as the number of totality, of completeness. The Sumerians, from whom the Sbibylarians have inherited the idea, equated 7 and "all." The 7-storied towers of Babylonia represented the universe. Seven was the expression of the highest power, the greatest conceivable fulness of force, and therefore was early pressed into the service of religion. It is found in reference to ritual in the age of Gudea, that is perhaps about the middle of the 3d millennium BC. "Seven gods" at the end of an enumeration meant "all the gods" (for these facts and the cuneiform evidence of Hehn, Stolenzahl und Sabbath bei den Babyloniern und im AT, 4 ff). How 7 came to be used in this way can only be glanced at here. The view connecting it with the gods of the 7 planets, which used to be in great favor and still has its advocates, must lack ancient proof. Hehn (op. cit., 44 ff) has shown that the number acquired its symbolic meaning long before the earliest time for which the reference can be demonstrated. As this sacred or symbolic use of 7 was not peculiar to the Babylonians and their teachers and neighbors to the East, but was known in a large area of Asia and China, in classical lands, and among the Celts and the Germans, it probably originated in some fact of common observation, perhaps in the four lunar phases each of which comprises 7 days and a fraction. Consider, Con 17:6, cf also Hehn, Stolenzahl und Sabbath bei den Babyloniern und im AT, 4 ff. How 7 came to be used in this way can only be glanced at here. be shown, also suggestive of completeness—3 and 4—may have been early noticed and taken into account. The Bib. use of 7 may be conveniently considered under 4 heads: (1) ritual use; (2) historical use; (3) didactic or literary use; (4) apocalyptic use.

(1) Ritual use of seven.—The number 7 plays a conspicuous part in a multitude of passages giving rules for worship or purification, or reciting ritual actions. The number 7 is particularly marked in the OT in the tabernacle, and especially the seven lamps or seven altars (Ex 25:31; 36:3). The seven years of leavened bread (Ex 12:18, etc.) and 7 days of unleavened bread (Lev 23:6, 8) allude to the seven days of the week. The 7th year was the sabbatical year (Ex 23:21, etc.). The Moabite Balak built Balaam on three occasions 7 altars and offered seven rams and seven heifers (Num 22:4). This 7 is repeated in the structure of sacred objects, for instance the candlestick or lamp-stand in the tabernacle and the shewbread table (Ex 25:31, Lev 24:9). The number 7 is also repeatedly mentioned in the rules for the purification of the leper and the leprous house (Lev 14:49). The leper was ordered to bathe 7 times in the Jordan (2 K 5:10). In the case of suspected uncleanness through leprosy, or the presence of a corpse, or for other reasons, 7 days' seclusion was necessary (Lev 12, etc.). Circumcision took place after 7 days (Gen 17:12). 7 days old before it could be offered in sacrifice (Ex 22:30). Three periods of 7 days each are mentioned in the rules for the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Lev 1:3, 9). This 7 was repeated in the first instance by 7 holy things (Gen 21:29 ff and Num 11:25). The 7 sons of Jesse were entered into the structure of sacred objects, for instance the candlestick or lamp-stand in the tabernacle and the shewbread table (1 Sam 16:11). Many other instances of the ritual use of 7 in the OT and many instructive parallels from Bab texts could be given.

(2) Historical use of seven.—The number 7 also figures prominently in a large number of passages which occur in historical narrative, in a way which reminds us of its symbolic significance. The following are some of the most remarkable:

(a) The birth and growth of King David: his 7th son was Bathsheba's son (2 S 5:14; cf. vs 27, 30), and his bowing down 7 times to Esa ù (Gen 35:3). David was born in the 7th year of Saul (1 Sm 16:1), and the 7th day of the week was dedicated to him. He was anointed king of Judah (2 S 16:1), the 7th son of Jesse (1 S 16:10), the 7th son of Saul (2 S 21:6), and the 7th son of Job (1 S 21:6; cf. 42:13), the 7th month of the 7 years of famine (Gen 41:33), and the 7th month of the 7 years of plenty (2 K 25:31). The 7th hour of the day was the hour of prayer (Acts 3:1). The 7th day of the week is the day of rest (Ex 20:11). The 7th hour of the night is the hour of prayer (Acts 3:1). The 7th day of the week is the day of rest (Ex 20:11). The 7th hour of the night is the hour of prayer (Acts 3:1). The 7th day of the week is the day of rest (Ex 20:11). The 7th hour of the night is the hour of prayer (Acts 3:1). The 7th day of the week is the day of rest (Ex 20:11). The 7th hour of the night is the hour of prayer (Acts 3:1).

(b) The number 7 is also used to denote the number of the months of the year (Gen 4:13; 5:3). In the case of the number 7 in the Bible, it is evident that it is used for a number of purposes which are not necessarily symbolic.

(c) The number 7 is also used to denote the number of the months of the year (Gen 4:13; 5:3). In the case of the number 7 in the Bible, it is evident that it is used for a number of purposes which are not necessarily symbolic.

(d) The number 7 is also used to denote the number of the months of the year (Gen 4:13; 5:3). In the case of the number 7 in the Bible, it is evident that it is used for a number of purposes which are not necessarily symbolic.

The significance of 7 extends to its multiples. Fourteen, or 14, is often thought of as symbolic in such cases. The stress laid in the OT on the 14th of the month as the day of the Passover (Ex 12:6 and 16 other places), and the regulation that 14 lamb were to be offered on each of the 7 days of the Feast of Unleavened Bread is an example of the intentional selection of the number, esp. in view of the fact that 7 and 14 occur repeatedly in cuneiform literature—in magical and liturgical texts, and in the formula so often used in the Am Tab: "7 and times at the foot of the king my lord, that I may prostrate myself." The arrangement of the generations from Abraham to Christ in three groups of 14 each (Mt 1:17) is probably intentional, so far as the number in each group is concerned. It is doubtful whether the number has any symbolic import in Acts 27:27, 2 Cor 12:2. 12 is a term of course, but it should be remembered that both the Heb and Gr words for 14 ('arkob 'ahrab, dekate'ssar) suggest that it is made up of 10 and 4, but constant use of 7 in the sense "to multiply by 7" has influenced the application of its double, at least in some cases.

Forty-nine, or 7 x 7, occurs in two regulations of the Law. The second of the three great festivals took place on the 50th day after one of the days of unleavened bread (Lev 23:15 ff), that is, after an interval of 49 days, which was called the "fiftieth day" or "seven times separated by 7 x 7 years (Lev 25:8 ff). The combination is met with also in one of the so-called Pentitential Psalms of Babylon: "Although my sins are 7 times 7, forgive me my sins."

Seven multiplied by ten, or 70, was a very strong expression of multitude which is met with in a large number of passages in the OT. It occurs of persons: the 70 descendants of Jacob (Ex 1 5; Dt 10 22); the 72 elders of Israel (Jgs 1 9; Neh 10 24 f); the 70 kings ill treated by Adonizek (Jgs 1 7); the 70 sons of Gideon (Jgs 8 30; 9 2); the 70 descendants of Abdon who rode on 70 ass-cots (Jgs 12 14); the 70 sons of Ahab (2 K 10 1 6); and the 70 Idolatrous elders seen by Ezekiel (Ezk 8 11). It is also used of periods: 70 days of Egypt mourning for Jacob (Gen 50 3); 70 years of trial (Isa 23 15 17; Jer 26 11 f; Dn 9 2). Zec 1 12; 7 5); the 70 weeks of Daniel (Dn 9 24); and the 70 years of human life (Ps 90 10). Other noticeable use of 70 and its powers of Elime (Ex 15 27 [Nu 33 9]); the offering of 70 bullcows in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 32), and the offering by the heads of the tribes of 12 silver bowls each of 70 shekels (Nu 7 13 ff). In the NT we have the 70 apostles (Lk 10 1 17), but the number is uncertain B, D and some VSS reading 72, which is the product, not of 7 and 10, but of 6 and 12. Significant seventies are also met with outside of the Bible. The most noteworthy are the Jewish belief that there are 70 languages in the world, including the dead languages, under the care of 70 angels, based perhaps on the list in Gen 10; the Sanhedrin of about 70 members; the 70 chapters of the Pentateuch (LXX), and the 70 members of a family in one of the 70 sons of Jacob. The abundant use of 70 must have been largely due to the fact that it was regarded as an intensified 7.

Seventy and seven, or 77, a combination found in the names of Lamech (Gen 4 24); the number of the Moabites and elders of Sodom (Gen 14 24 f); and the number of lambs in a memorable sacrificial (Esr 8 35), would appeal in the same way to the oriental fancy.

The product of seven and seventy (Gr habdomikontidaks kephtis) is met with once in the NT (Mt 18 22), and in the LXX of the above-quoted Gen 4 24. Moulton, however (Gram. of Gr NT Protopogema, 98), renders in both passages 70 7; contra, Allen, "Mt," ICC, 199. The number is clearly a forceful equivalent of "always."

Seven thousand in K 1 K 19 18 [Rom 11 4 may be a round number chosen on account of its embodiment of the number 7. In the M 8 the number of Israelites slain at the capture of the city of Neb by Cambyses (2 K 21 21; Neh 3 1); and the number of lambs in a memorable sacrifice (Esr 8 35), would appeal in the same way to the oriental fancy.

The half of seven seems sometimes to have been regarded as significant. In Dn 7 25; 9 27; 12 7; Lk 4 25; Jgs 5 17; Rev 11 2; 13 5 a period of distress is calculated at 31 years, that is, half the period of sacred completeness.

The number three seems early to have attracted attention as the number in which beginning, middle and end are most distinctly marked, and to have been therefore regarded as symbolic of a complete and ordered whole. Abundant illustration of its use in this way in Bab theology, ritual and magic is given from the cuneiform texts by Hohn (op. cit., 63 ff), and the hundreds of passages in the Bible in which the number occurs includes many where its special significance either lies on the surface or not far beneath it. This is owing in some degree perhaps to Bab influence, but will have been largely due to independent observation of common phenomena—the arithmetical fact more, 70 national groups of Bab Irans such as heaven, earth, and sea (or "the abyss") morning, noon and night; right, middle, and left, etc. In other words, 3 readily suggested completeness, and was often used with a glance at that meaning in daily life and daily speech. Only palm trees, etc. as examples can be given here. (1) Three is often found of persons and things sacred or secular, e.g. Noah's 3 sons (Gen 6 10); Job's 3 daughters (Job 1 2; 42 13) and 3 friends (Job 2 11); Abraham's 3 guests (Gen 18 19); Gen 18 21; 3 measures of meal (ver 6; cf Mt 13 33)); 3 in military tactics (Jgs 7 16 20; 9 43; 1 s 11 13; 17 Job 1 17); 3 great freshmen (Ex 33 14); the 3 daily prayers (Ps 55 17; Dn 6 10 13); the 3 might watches (Jgs 7 19); God's 3-fold call of Samuel (1 S 3 8); the 3 keepers of the temple threshold (Jer 52 24); the 3 presidents appointed by Darius (Dn 6 2); the 3 temptations (Mt 4 3, 4 4); the 3 prayers in Gethsemane (Mt 26 39 42 44); Peter's 3 denials (Mt 26 70 75); the Lord's 3-fold question and 3-fold charge (Jn 21 15 ff); and the 3-fold vision of the sheet (Acts 10 16). (2) In a very large number of passages 3 is used of periods of time: 3 days; 3 weeks; 3 months and 3 years. So in Gen 40 12 13 18; Ex 2 2; 20 21 2 24 13; Isa 20 3; Jon 1 17; Mt 16 32; Lk 2 46; 13 7; Acts 9 9; 2 Cor 12 8. The frequent reference to the resurrection "on the 3d day" or "after 3 days" (Mt 16 21; 27 63, etc) may at the same time have glanced at the symbolic use of 3 of the number 7, just as it is natural to the Jews and the Zoroastrians that a corpse was not recognizable after 3 days (for Jewish testimony of Jn 11 39; Yehudamah, xvi 3; Midr. Gen, ch c; Simakhot, viii; for Pers ideas of Ezov 7, 18; XVIII, 580). The abundance of such references to the 3-fold is a literary way, sometimes appearing only in the structure. Note as examples the 3-fold benediction of Israel (Nu 6 24 ff); the Three Holy of the seraphim (Isa 6 5); the 3-fold overturn (Ezk 21 27; Heb 3 11); the 3-fold covenant (Gen 18 2); and the 3-fold prayer as regarded one psalm (Ps 42 5 11; 43 5); the 3 names of God (the Mighty One, God, Jehovah, Jos 22 22; cf Ps 60 1); the 3 graces of Cor 13; the 3 witnesses (1 Jn 5 8); the frequent use of 3 and 3rd in Rev; the description of God as "who is and who was and who is to come" (Rev 1 4); and "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit" (Mt 28 19). In some of these cases 3-fold repetition is a mode of expressing the superlative, and others remind us of the remarkable association of 3 with deity alluded to by Plato and Philo, and illustrated by the triads of Egypt and Babylonia and the Far East. It cannot, however, be proved, or even made probable, that there is any direct connection between any of these triads and the Trinity. All that can be said is, that the same numerical symbolism may have been operative in both cases.

The 4 points of the compass and the 4 phases of the moon will have been early noticed, and the former at any rate will have suggested 4. The symbol of completeness of range, of Four comprehensive extent. As early as the 3rd millennium B.C. Bab rulers (followed long afterward by the Assyrians) assumed the title "king of the 4 quarters," meaning that their rule reached in all directions, and an early conqueror claimed to have subdued the 4 quarters. There are not a few illustrations of the use of 4 in some such way in the Bible. The 4 winds (referred to also in the cuneiform texts and the Book of the Dead) are mentioned again and again (Jer 49 36; Ezk 37 9), and the 4 quarters or corners of the world (Gen 11 12; Ezk 7 2). We read also of the 4 heads of the river of Eden (Gen 2 10 ff), of 4 horns, 4 smiths, 4 chariots, and horses of 4 colors in the visions of Zechariah (1 S LXX, 15 ff; 6 1 ff), the chariots being directly connected with the 4 winds; 4 punishments (Jer 16 8; Ezk 14 21), the latter with the parallel, the 4 kingdoms in Nebuchadnezzar's dream as interpreted (Dnl 2:37 ff) and Daniel's vision (7:3ff); the 4 living creatures in Ezek (1:5ff; cf. 10), each with 4 faces and 4 wings, and the 4 modeled after them (Rev 4:6, etc.). In most of these cases 4 is clearly symbolical, as in a number of passages in Apoc and Pseudepigrapha. Whether the frequent use of 1 in the structure of the tabernacle, Solomon's temple, and Ezekiel's temple has anything to do with the symbolic meaning is not clear, but the latter can probably be traced in proverbial and prophetic speech (Prov 30:15,18,21-22; 5:12; 12:27). The 4 latter represent full-scaled iniquity, and the 4-folding group in the former suggested the wide sweep of the classification. Perhaps it is fanciful to find the idea in the 4 sets of hearers of the gospel in the parable of the Sower (Mat 13:19-23). The rabbis almost certainly had it in mind in their 4-fold grouping of characters in six successive paragraphs (Ab, v:16-21) which, however, is of considerably later date.

As the basis of the decimal system, which probably originated in the counting with the fingers, 10 has been a significant number in all historical ages. The 10 antediluvian patriarchs (Gen 5; cf. the 10 Bab kings of Berosus, and 10 in early Iranian material, etc.) and the 10 righteous men who had saved Sodom (Gen 18:32); the 10 plagues of Egypt; the 10 commandments (Ex 20:2-17); Dt 5:21; the 10 commandments found by some in Ex 34:14-26 are not clearly made out); the 10 servants of Gideon (Jgs 6:27); the 10 elders who accompanied Boaz (Ruth 4:2); the 10 virgins of the parable (Mt 25:1); the 10 pieces of silver (Lk 15:8); the 10 servants instructed with 10 pounds (Lk 19:13 ff), the most capable of whom was to be given 10 cities (Lk 19:17); the 10 days' tribulation predicted for the church of Smyrna (Rev 2:10); the use of "10 times" in the sense of "many times" (Gen 31:7; Neh 4:12; Dnl 1:29, etc., an idiom met with repeatedly in Am Tsb); and the use of 10 in sacred measurements and in the widely diffused custom of tithe, and many other examples show plainly that 10 was a favorite symbolic number suggestive of a rounded total, large or small, according to circumstances. The 10 kings was a proverb referring to the Jewish life and thought. Ten times was the Tetragrammaton uttered by the high priest on the Day of Atonement; 10 persons must be present at a nuptial benediction; 10 constituted a congregation in Amos (Am 7:11); the number was in company at the paschal meal, and of a row of courtiers of the bereaved. The world was created, said the rabbis, by ten words, and Abraham was visited with 10 temptations (Ab, v:1 and 4; several other examples are found in the context).

The 12 months and the 12 signs of the zodiac probably suggested to the old Babylonians the use of 12 as a symbolic or semi-sacred number, but its frequent employment cannot at present be proved to have originated in that way, although the idea was favored by both Jos and Philo. So far as we know, Israelistic predilection for 12 was entirely due to the traditional belief that the nation consisted of 12 tribes, a belief, it is true, entertained also by the Arabs or some of them, but with much less intensity and persistence. In Israel the belief was universal and ineradicable. Hence the 12 pillars set up by Moses (Ex 24:4); the 12 jewels (Ex 28:22); the 12 cakes of shewbread (Lev 24:5); the 12 rods (Nu 17:2); the 12 spies (Nu 13); the 12 stones placed by Joshua in the bed of Jordan (Josh 4:9); the 12 officers of Solomon (1 K 4:7); the 12 stones of Elijah's altar (1 K 19:31); the 12 disciples or apostles (26 t); and several details of apocalyptic imagery (Rev 7:5ff; 12:1; 21:12,14,16,21; 22:2; cf. also Mt 14:20; 19:27; 25:53; Acts 26:7). The number point in the first 616 the completeness which had been sanctioned by Divine election, and it retained this significance when applied to the spiritual Israel. Philo indeed calls it a perfect number. Its double in Rev 4:4, etc., is probably also significant.

Five came brandishing into the mind as the half of 10. Hence perhaps its use in the parable of the Virgins (Mt 25:2). It was often employed in a typically parabolic sense, e.g., in the story of the two sons, etc., the part of the Hagiographa known as Ecclesiasticus, the Ethical Egyptian

It seems to have been occasionally suggestive of relative smallness, as in Lev 26:8, the 5 loaves (Mt 14:17), 1 Cor 14:10, and perhaps in Acts 2:32; and by Sir J. Hawkins, Eusebius Synagogae, 163 ff.

VI. Gematria (גמטראיה) — A pedagogical application of numbers which was in great vogue with the later Jews and some of the early Christians and is not absolutely unknown to the Bible, is Gematria, that is the use of the letters of a word so as by means of their combined numerical value to express a name, or a witty association of ideas. The term is usually explained as an adaptation of the Gr word geometria, that is, "geometry," but Dalm (Wörterbuch, s.v.) connects it in this application of it with grammatica. There is only one clear example in Scripture of the application of this term, which is the number of a man, six hundred sixty and six (Rev 13:18). If, as most scholars are inclined to believe, a name is intended, the numerical value of the letters composing which adds up to 666, and if it is assumed that the writer thought in Heb or Aram.

Nero Caesar writers with the name, rech = 200, vaq= 200, vav= 6, nun= 50, koph= 100, samekh= 60, resh= 200; total = 666, seems to be the best solution. Perhaps the idea suggested by Dr. Milligan that the 6-fold use of 6 which just falls short of 7, in the number of the so-called complete, and therefore a note of imperfection, may have been also in the writer's mind. Some modern scholars find a second instance in Gen 14:14 and 16:2. As the numerical value of the consonants which compose Eliezer in Heb add up to 318, it has been maintained that the number is not historical, but has been fancifully constructed by means of gematria out of the name. This strange idea is not new, for it is found in the Midrash on Gen (ch 43) in the name of a rabbI who lived c 200 AD, but its antiquity is its greatest merit.

LITERATURE.

I. Title and Contents.—Stylized in the Heb Bible וּבְנָדָר, "in the wilderness," from the 5th word in 1 1, probably because of recording the fortunes of Israel in the Sinaitic desert. The 4th book of the Pent (or of the Hex, according to criticism) was designated 'Aqbash, Arithmai, in LXX and 1 e to the 50th of the 2d month after the exodus, describing:

(1) Before leaving Sinai, 1-10 10 (a period of 10 days, from 1st to the 10th of the 2d month after the exodus), describing:
   a. The numbering and ordering of the people, chs 1-4.
   b. The cleaning and blessing of the congregation, ch 5.
   c. The princes' offerings and the dedication of the 63rd altar, ch 6.
   d. The observance of a second Passover, 9 1-14.
   e. The cloud and the trumpets for the march, 9 15-10 10.

(2) From Sinai to Kadesh, 10 11-14 45 (a period of 10 days, from the 20th to the 30th of the 2d month), narrating:
   a. The departure from Sinai, 10 11-35.
   b. The events at Taberah and Kibroth-hattaavah, ch 11.
   c. The rebellion of Miriam and Aaron, ch 12.
   d. The return of the spies, chs 13.
   e. The wanderings in the desert, chs 14-19 (a period of 37 years, from the end of the 2d to the beginning of the 4th year), recording:
      a. Sundry laws and the punishment of a Sabbath breaker, ch 15.
      b. The rebellion of Korah, ch 16.
      c. The budding of Aaron's rod, ch 17.
      d. The duties and revenues of the priests and Levites, chs 18.
      e. The water of separation for the unclean, ch 19.

(3) From Kadesh to Moab, chs 20, 21 (a period of 10 months, from the beginning of the 40th year), reciting:
   a. The story of Balaam, 22 2-24 25.
   c. The second census, 26 1-51.
   d. Directions for dividing the land, 26 52-27 11.
   e. Appointment of Moses' successor, 27 12-20.
   g. War with Midian, ch 31.
   h. Settlement of Reuben and Gad, ch 32.
   i. List of camping stations, 33 1-49.
   j. Canaan to be cleared of its inhabitants and divided, 33 50-34 29.
   k. Citizens refuse to be appointed, ch 35.
   l. The marriage of heiresses, ch 36.

II. Literary Structure.—According to modern criticism, the text of Nu, like that of the other books of the Pent (or Hex), instead of being regarded as substantially the work of one writer (whatever name has been his sources of information and whoever may have been its first or latest editor), should be distributed—not always in solid blocks of composition, but frequently in fragments, in sentences, clauses or words, so mysteriously put together that they cannot now with certainty be separated—among three writers, J, E, and P with another D (at least in one part)—these writers, individuals and not schools (Gunkel), belonging, respectively: J to the 9th cent. BC (c 830), E to the 8th cent. BC (c 750), P to the 5th cent. BC (c 644), and D to the 7th cent. BC (c 621).

The grounds upon which this distribution is made are principally these: (1) the supposed preferential use of the Divine names, of 1. Alleged Jeh (Lord) by J, and of Elohim (God) by E and P—a distinction in style of composition, which are not always obvious and which, even if they were, would not necessarily imply diversity of authorship unless every author's writing must be uniform and monotonous, whatever his subject may be; and (2) perhaps earlier or a pre-Mosaic theory of religious development in Israel, according to which the people in pre-Mosaic times were animists, totemists and polytheists; in Mosaic times and after, henotheists or worshippers of One God, while recognizing the existence of other gods; and latterly, in exilic and post-exilic times, monotheists or worshippers of the one living and true God—which theory, in order to vindicate its plausibility, required the reconstruction of Israel's religious documents in the way above described, but which is now rejected by archaeologists (Delitzsch and A. Jeremias) and by theologians (Orr, Baentsch [though accepting the analysis of other grounds and König] as not supported by facts.

Without denying that the text-analysis of criticism is on the first blush of it both plausible and attractive and has brought to light valuable information relative to Scripture, or without overlooking the fact that it has behind it the names of eminent scholars and is supported by not a few considerations of weight, one may fairly urge against it the following objections.

2. Objections to Same Hypotheses

(1) Hypothesis unproved.—At the best, the theory is an unproved and largely imaginary hypothesis, or series of hypotheses—"hypothesis built on hypothesis" (Orr); and nothing more strikingly reveals this than (a) the frequency with which in the text-analysis conjecture ("perhaps" and "probably") takes the place of reasoned proof;
(b) the arbitrary manner in which the supposed documents are constructed by the critics who, without reason given, and often in violation of their own rules and principles, lift out of J (for instance) every word or clause they consider should belong to E or P, and vice versa every word or clause out of E or P that might suggest that the passage should be assigned to J, at the same time explaining the presence of the inconvenient word or clause in a document to which it did not belong by the careless or deliberate action of a redactor; and (c) the failure even thus to construct the documents supposed (which is inevitable) that E and J cannot with confidence be separated from each other—Kuenen himself saying that "the at-tem to make out a Jehovistic and an Elohist writer or school of writers by means of the Divine names has not been achieved" (those of P substituted); and some even denying that P ever existed as a separate document at all, Eerdmans (St, 33, 82), in particular, maintaining, as the result of elaborate exegesis, that P could not have been constructed in the post-exilic times "as an introduction to a legal work."

(2) Written record not impossible.—It is impossible to demonstrate that the story of Israel's "wanderings" was not committed to writing by Moses, who certainly was not unacquainted with the art of writing, who had the ability, if any man had, to prepare such a writing, whose interest it was, as the leader of his people, to see that such writing, whether done by himself or by others under his supervision, were not under any circumstances besides had been commanded by God to write the journeyings of Israel (33:2). To suppose that for 500 years no reliable record of the fortunes of Israel existed, when during these years writing was practised in Israel, is quite natural; and the fact that written characters was only the tradition that had floated down for 5 cents. from mouth to mouth, is simply to say that little or no dependence can be placed upon the narrative, that there while there be at the bottom of it some grains of fact, the main body of it is fiction. This conclusion will not be readily admitted.

(3) No book constructed in this way.—No reliable evidence exists that any book either ancient or modern was ever constructed as, according to criticism, the Pent, and in particular Nu, was.
Volumes have indeed been composed by two or more authors, acting in concert, but their contributions have never been intermixed as those of J, E, D, and P are declared to have been; nor, when joint authorship has been acknowledged on the title-page, has it been possible for readers confidently to assign to each author his own contribution. And yet, modern criticism, dealing with documents more than 2,000 years old and in a language and a script foreign to our own, moreover, exist only in MSS not older than the 10th cent. AD (Buhl, Canon and Text of the OT, 28), and the text of which has been fixed not infallibly either as to consonant or vowel—claims that it can tell exactly (or nearly so) what parts, whether paragraphs, sentences, clauses or words, were supplied by J, E, P and D respectively. Credal Judaeus Apella!

(4) Inherent difficulties of analysis.—The critical theory, besides making of the text of Nu, as of the other books of the Pent, such a patchwork as is unthinkable in any document with ordinary pretension to historical veracity, is burdened with inherent difficulties which make it hard to credit, as the following examples, taken from Nu, will show.

(a) The story of the spies: Nu 13 and 14 are thus distributed by Cornill, Driver, Strack and E: JF, 13 170–20.22–24.266–31.326; 33; 14 3.4.8.9.11–

P, 13 1–17a; 21.25.36a (to Paran); 32a; 14 1.2 (in the main), 5; 7.10.26–38 (in the main).

Knaastz generally agrees; and Hartford-Batserry in HDB professes ability to divide between J and E.

(i) According to this analysis, however, up to the middle of the 5th cent. BC, either JE began at 13 17b, in which case it wanted both the introduction to search the land and the names of the searchers, both of which were subsequently added from P (assuming it to have been a separate document, which is doubtful); or if JE contained both the instruction and the names, these were supplied by 1–17a from P. As the former of these alteratives is hardly likely, one naturally asks why the opening verses of JE were removed and then, if they were removed, what has become of them? Does not the ocurrence of Jeh in 1–17a, on the critical principles of some, suggest that this section is the missing paragraph of JE?

(ii) If the JE passages furnish a nearly complete narrative (Driver), why should the late compiler or editor have deemed it necessary to insert two whole verses, 21 and 25, and two halves, 26a and 32e, if not because without these the original JE narrative would have been incomplete? Ver 21 states in general terms that the spies searched the whole land, proceeding as far N. as Hamath, after which ver 22 mentions that they entered the country from the S. and went up to Hebron and Eshcol, without at that time finding anything beyond what implying (Driver) that they traveled no farther N. —the reason for specifying the visit to Eshcol being the interesting fact that there the extraordinary cluster of grapes was obtained. Vs 25.26a relate quite naturally to the less generous crops of 26b, fresh after 40 days and reported what they had found to Moses and Aaron as well as to all the congregation. Without these verses the narrative would have stated neither how long the land had been searched nor whether Moses and Aaron had received any report from their messengers, although ver 26b implies that a report was given to some person or persons unnamed. That Moses and Aaron should not have been named in JE is exceedingly improbable. Ver 11 is in no way inconsistent with vs 26b–31, which state that the land was flowing with milk and honey. What ver 32a adds is an expression of the exaggerated fears of the spies, whose language could not mean that the land was so barren that they would die of starvation, a statement which would have expressly contradicted ver 27 (JE)—in which case why should it have been inserted?—but that, notwithstanding its fruitfulness, the population was continually being traversed by intermecne wars and the incursions of robbers and marauders. The starvation theory, how-over, is not supported by the texts (Lev 26:35; Ezk 36:13) usually quoted in its behalf.

(iii) To argue (Driver) for two documents because Joshua is not always mentioned along with Caleb is not strikingly convincing; while if Joshua is not included among the spies in J, that is obviously because the passages containing his name have been assigned beforehand to P. But if Joshua's name did not occur in J, why would it have been inserted in the story by a post-exilic writer, when even in Dt 1 30 Joshua is not mentioned among the spies of the previous generation? Again, the language in Dt 1 38 tacitly suggests that both Caleb and Joshua were among the searchers of the land, and that any partition of the text which conveys the impression that Joshua was not among the spies is wrong.

(iv) If the text-analysis is as the critics argue, how comes it that in J the name Jeh does not once occur, while all the verses containing it are allotted to P? 23

(5) The rebellion of Korah: Chs 16 and 17 are supposed to be the work of "two, if not three," contributors (Driver, Kautzsch)—the whole story being assigned to P (unnally or consciously to the experience.) (v) It does, as are not unanimous, with the exception of 16 15. 26. 12—15. 25. 26. 27—34, which are given to J, though variations are unavoidable.

It is admitted that the J verses, if read continuously, make out a story of Dathan and Abiram as distinguished from this company that the motives of Dathan and Abiram probably differed from those of Korah, and that Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up by an earthquake, while the 250 incense-offerers were destroyed by fire. To conclude from these three or even two narratives to have been intermixed is traveling beyond the premises.

(vi) If J contained more about the conspiracy of the Reubenites, Dathan and Abiram, than has been preserved in the verses assigned to I, what has become of the excited verses, if they are not those ascribed to P; and, if they are not, what evidence exists that P's verses are better than the lost verses of J? And how does it happen that the name used throughout, with one exception, ver. 22, is Jeh, while in J it occurs only 6 ? 24 (vi) J contains only the parts assigned to it and nothing more happened than the Reubenites' escape, why should the Korahite rebellion have been added to it 4 cents. later. If that rebellion never happened? J (vii) If the Korahite conspiracy did happen, why should it have been omitted in J. and nothing whispered about it till after the exile? (viii) If the two conspiracies, ecclesiastical (among the princes and civil (among the laymen), are so intermingled, and the conspirators made common cause with one another, in that there was nothing groundless of which the one apprised the other. But, as has been observed of the same type of chance, in expressing the sum of all the secular writers, it would be manifestly false. If in the face of these considerations, it is not too much to say that the evidence for more documents than one in this story is not convincing.

(c) The story of Balaam: Chs 22. 24 fare more leniently at the hands of analysis, being all left with J. Except 22. 20. which is generally handed down to P. Uncertainty, however, exists as to how to partition ch 22 between J and E. Whether all should be given to E because of the almost uniform use of Elohim rather than of Jeh, with the exception of vs 92, 25, 26, which are property of J, because of the use of Jeh (Driver, Kautzsch); or whether some additional verses should not be assigned to J (Cornell, HDB), critics are not agreed. As to chs 23 and 24, authorities hesitate whether to give both to J or to E, or ch 24 to E and ch 24. 25 to J, or both to a late redactor who had access to the two sources—surely an unsatisfactory demonstration in this case at least of the documentary hypothesis. Comment on the use of the Divine names in this story is reserved till later.

Yet, while declining to accept this hypothesis as proved, it is not contended that the material, or that the style of composition is throughout the same, or that the book as it stands has never been revised or edited, but is in every jot and tittle the same as when first constructed. In ch 7, e.g., the narrative goes back to the 1st day of the 1st month of the 2d year, and in ch 9 to the 1st month of the 2d year, though ch 6 begins with the 1st month of the 2d year. There are also legislative passages interspersed among the historical, and poetical among the prosaic, but diversity of authorship, as already suggested, cannot be inferred from either of these facts unless it is impossible for a writer to be sometimes the author of the arrangement of his materials; and for a lawyer to be also a historian, and for a prose writer occasionally to burst into song. Assertions like these, however, cannot be entertained. Hence any argument for plurality of documents founded on them must be set aside. Nor is it a fair conclusion against the literary unity of the book that its contents are varied in substance and form and have been subjected, as is probable, to revision and even to interpolations, and that the author's name and interpolations have not changed the meaning of the book. Whether, therefore, the Book of Nu has or has not been compiled from preexisting documents, it cannot be justly maintained that the text-analysis suggested by the critics has shown either that the literary unity of Nu has been disproved.

III. Historical Credibility.—Were the narrative in this book written down immediately or soon after the events it records, no reason would exist for challenging its authority, unless it could be shown either from the narrative itself or from extraneous sources that the events chronicled were internally improbable, incredible or false. Even should it be proved that the text consists of two or more preexisting documents interwoven with one another, this would not necessarily invalidate its truthfulness, if these documents were practically contemporaneous with the incidents they report, and were not combined in such a way as to distort and misrepresent the occurrences they related.

If, however, these preexisting documents were prepared 500 (JE) or 1,000 (P) years after the incidents they narrate, and were merely a fixing in written characters of traditions previously handed down (JE), or of a posterior version (P), founded upon a posterior one (im) it will not be easy to establish their historical validity. The credibility of this portion of the Pent has been assailed on the alleged ground that it contains chronological inaccuracies, statistical errors and physical impossibilities.

1. The Little Passover (9 1—6)—The critical argument is that a contemporary historian would naturally have placed this paragraph before 1 1. The answer is that the chronological order, which it manifestly was not (see chs 7 and 9), and that which the compiler of this book deemed necessary to state that the Israelites had celebrated a second Passover on the legally appointed day, the 14th day of the 1st month of the 2d year. This, however, he possibly at first assumed would be understood, and only afterward, when giving the reason for the supplementary Passover, realized that in after years readers might erroneously conclude that this was the Passover that had been kept in the 2d year. So to obviate any such mistaken inference, he prefixed to his account of the Little Passover, as it is sometimes called, a statement to the effect that the statutes of Passover, as given in the Law, had been observed at the usual time, in the usual way, and that, too, in obedience to the express commandment of Jeh.
(2) The thirty-seven years' chasm.—Whether 20 or 40 be considered the beginning of the 3rd or of the 40th year, the fitting reflection of 37 years is by no means a one case in almost unbroken silence: in the other with scarcely anything of moment recorded save Korah's rebellion. The repudiation of a family of levitical offerings to be made when the people reached the land of their habitation. To pronounce the whole book un historical, because of an absolute or comparative silence (see) is unreasonable. Most biblical books would be formed into the whole book. Besides, a historian might have reason to pass over as for recording the incidents of any period. And this might have been the case the author of Nu. From the moment sentence of death had been pronounced at Kadesh till the hour when the new generation started out for Canaan, he may have counted that Israel had prac ticed idolatry, and that perhaps that family of Levites formed no part of the history of Jehovah's kingdom; and it is noticeable that scarcely had the tribes resumed at Kadesh in preparation for their onward march than Miriam and Aaron, probably the last of the doomed generation, died. Accordingly, from this point on, the narrative is occupied with the fortunes of the new generation. Whether correct or not, this solution of 37 years' silence (Kurtz) is preferable to that which suggests (Ewald) that the late compiler, having found it impossible to locate all the tradition he had collected into the closing years of the wanderings, placed the rest of the story of the 40 years in a decade, and left the interval a blind spot, a solution which has not even the merit of being clever and explains nothing. It does not explain why, if the narrative was being written at the time, there would have been an interval at all. A romance would not have missed so splendid an opportunity for a coincident interval. It would have left at least a period of 30 years unlinked; but like the writers of the apocryphal Gospels would have crowded it with manufactured events.

On the better theory, not only is the silence explained, but the items inserted are accounted for as well. Though the unbelief of the generation had ceased to be the people of Jehovah, Aaron had not yet been sentenced to exclusion from the promised land (Num. 20:1-13), and was still one of the representa tives of the kingdom of Jehovah, and Korah's rebellion prac tically struck a blow at that kingdom. As such it was punished, and why, in view of its breaking of rank and super sion was recorded, as a matter of vitally concerned the state of the church of God. In the apocalyptic narrative sections were included in the narrative. They were Jehovah's acts and not the people's. They were statutes and ordinances for the new generation in the new land.

(3) The fortieth year.—The events recorded as having taken place between the 1st of the 5th month (the date of Aaron's death) and the 1st of the 11th month (the date of Moses' address) are so numerous and important as to render it impossible, it is said, to maintain the credibility of this portion of the narrative. But (a) it is certain that all the events in this section were fittingly recorded after Moses began his oration; neither (b) is it necessary to hold that they all occurred in succession; while (c) it is certain that events following each other as another is ascertained, it will not be possible to decide whether or not they could all have been begun and finished within a space of 6 months.

(1) Number of the fighting men.—This, which may be drawn down roughly at 600,000, has been chal lenged on two grounds: (a) that the
2. So-called number is too large, and (b) that the Statistical censuses at Sinai and in Moab are Errors too nearly equal.

The first of these objections will be considered in the following section when treating of the size of the congregation. The second will not appear formidable if it be remembered (a) that it is not incompatible with an unusual or population of a country to remain stationary for a long series of years; (b) that there was a special fitness in Israel's case that the doomed generation should be replaced by one as nearly as possible equal to that which had perished; (c) that had the narrative been written from the point of two such also would have been made either exactly equal or more widely divergent; and (d) that so many variations occurring in the strength of the tribes as numbered at Sinai and again in Moab, while probably not in reality constituting a watermark of truthfulness which should not be overlooked.

(2) The size of the congregation.—Taking the fighting men at 600,000, and the whole community at 41
times that number, or about 25 millions, several difficulties emerge which have led to the suggestion (Eerdmans, Conder, Wiener) that the 600, 000 should be reduced (to, say, 50,000), and the entire population to less than 30,000. The following alleged impossibilities are believed to justify the reduction: (a) that the 2.5 millions of Egyptian captives between the descent into, and the departure from Egypt; (b) that of 2.5 millions being led out of Egypt in one day; (c) that of obtaining support for so large a multitude with their flocks in the Sinai desert from either the Mount Sinai, or in the limited extent of Pal; and (e) that of the long time it took to conquer Pal if the army was 600,000 strong.

(a) Multiplication of people: As to the possi bility of 70 souls multiplying in the course of 215 years or 7 generations (to take the shorter interval rather than the longer of 430 years) into 2.5
millions of persons giving 600,000 fighting men, that need not be regarded as incredible till the rate of increase in each family is exactly known. Allowing for each of Jacob's sons who were married (say 51 out of 53), 4 male descendants (Colenos allows 41), these would in 7 generations—not in 4 (Colenos)—amount to 835,584, and with surviv fathers and grandfathers added might well reach 600,000. But even this was well over 425 years of age. But in point of fact, without definite knowledge of the number of generations, the rates of birth and of mortality in each generation, all calculations are at the best problematical. The most that can be done is to consider whether the narr ative mentions any circumstances fitted to explain this large number of fighting men and the great size of the congregation, and then whether the customary objections to the Bib. statement can be satisfactorily met.

As for confirmatory circumstances, the Bible expressly states that during the years of the oppression the Hebrews were extraordinarily fruitful, and that this was the reason why Pharaoh became alarmed and issued his edict for the destruction of the male children. The fruitfulness of the Hebrews, however, has been challenged (Eerdmans, Vorge schichte Israels, 78) on the ground that the births were so numerous as these presupposes, two midwives (Ex 1 20-21). The events following this, one another is ascertained, it will not be possible to decide whether or not they could all have been begun and finished within a space of 6 months.

(1) The number of the fighting men.—This, which may be drawn down roughly at 600,000, has been chal lenged on two grounds: (a) that the
2. So-called number is too large, and (b) that the Statistical censuses at Sinai and in Moab are Errors too nearly equal.

The first of these objections will be considered in the following section when treating of the size of the congregation. The second will not appear formidable if it be remembered (a) that it is not incompatible with an unusual or population of a country to remain stationary for a long series of years; (b) that there was a special fitness in Israel's case that the doomed generation should be replaced by one as nearly as possible equal to that which had perished; (c) that had the narrative
been written from the point of two such also would have been made either exactly equal or more widely divergent; and (d) that so many variations occurring in the strength of the tribes as numbered at Sinai and again in Moab, while probably not in reality constituting a watermark of truthfulness which should not be overlooked.

(2) The size of the congregation.—Taking the
fighting men at 600,000, and the whole community at 41
people thirsting for liberty and only waiting the signal to move, aware also of the hour at which that signal would be given, viz. at midnight, it does not appear so formidable a task as is imagined to get them all assembled in one day at a force estimated Israelites, more than likely to delay or linger in their movements. But how could there have been 2½ millions of fugitives, it is asked (Erdmans, Wiener), if Pharaoh deemed 600 chariots sufficient for pursuit? The answer is that Pharaoh did not reckon 600 chariots sufficient, but in addition to these, which were "chosen chariots," he took all the chariots of Egypt, his horses and his horsemen. (Ex 14:7,9), which were surely adequate to overcome a weaponless crowd, however big it might be. And that it was big, a vast horde indeed, Pharaoh's host implies.

(c) Support in wilderness: The supposed difficulty of obtaining support for 2½ millions of people with the flocks and herds in the Sinaic desert takes for granted that the desert was then as barren a region as it is now, which cannot be proved, and is as little likely to be correct as it would be to argue that Egypt, which was then the granary of the world, was no more fertile than it was 10 years ago, or that the regions in which Babylon and Assyria were subsequently settled there were rich. This supposition disregards the fact that Moses fed the flocks of Jethro for 40 years in that same region of Sinai; that when the Israelites passed through it, it was inhabited by several powerful tribes. (Deut 7:24). The flocks and herds of Israel were not necessarily all cooped up in one spot, but were most likely spread abroad in districts where water and vegetation could be found. And it ignores the statement in the narrative that the flocks and herds were not taken over by the produce of the desert, but had manna from heaven from the 1st day of the 2d month after leaving Egypt till they reached Canaan. Rationalistic expositors may relegate this statement to the limbo of fable, but unless the supernatural is to be eliminated altogether from the story, this statement must be accepted in its full weight. So must the two miraculous supplies of water at Horeb (Ex 17) and at Kadesh (Nu 20) be treated. It is sometimes argued that that which was supplied was not sufficient for 2½ millions of people with their flocks and herds; and that therefore the congregation could not have been so large. But the narrative in Nu states, and presumably it was the same in Ex, that the smitten rock was a means, but not the only one, for providing in abundance, continuously that "the people drank abundantly with their flocks." Wherefore no conclusion can be drawn from this against the reported size of the congregation.

(d) Room at Mt. Sinai: As to the impossibility of finding room for 2½ millions of people either before the Mount at Sinai or within the land of Canaan (Conder), few will regard this as self-evident. If the site of their encampment was the Ex-Rahal (Robinson, Staunton)—though the plain of Schabach, admittedly not so rocky, has been mentioned (Ritter, Kurtz, Knobel)—estimates differ as to the sufficiency of accommodation to be found there. Conder gives the dimensions of the plain as 4 sq. miles, which he deems insufficient, forgetting, perhaps, that "its extent is further increased by lateral valleys receding from the plain itself" (Forty Days in the Desert, 73; cf Keil on Ex 19,12). Kalsche, though putting the size of the plain at a smaller figure, adds that "it thus forms a large space, sufficient for the host of Israel"—a conclusion accepted by Ebers, Richet and others. In any case it seems driving literal interpretation to extreme lengths to hold that camping before the Mount necessarily meant that every member of the host required to be in full view of Sinai. As to not finding room in Canaan, it is doubtful if, after the conquest, the remnants of both peoples at any time numbered as many persons as dwelt in Pal during the most flourishing years of the kingdom; but it is possible that the population of Pal today amounts to only about 600,000 souls; but Pal today under Turkish rule is no proper gauge for judging of Pal under David or even under Joshua.

(e) Slow movement of Canaan: The long time it took to conquer Pal (Erdmans, Vorgeschichte Israels, 78) is no solid argument to prove the unreliable character of the statement about the size of the army, and therefore of the congregation. Every person knows that the great movement, viz. the Israelites, does not always go with the big battalions; and in this instance the desert-trained warriors allowed themselves to be seduced by the idolatries and immoralities of the Canaanites and forgot to execute the commandment given to them in the trusted, viz. to drive out the Canaanites from the land which had been promised to their fathers. Had they been faithful to Jehovah, they would not have taken so long completely to possess the land (Ps 20:14, 21). If instead of 600,000 Israelite soldiers they had only possessed 6,000, it is not difficult to see how they could not drive out the Canaanites. The difficulty is to perceive how they could have achieved as much as they did.

(f) The number of the firstborn.—That the 22,273 firstborn males (Nu 3:43) is out of all proportion to the 605,550 men of 20 years old and upward, being much too few, has frequently (Bleek, Bohlen, Colenso and others) been felt as a difficulty, since it practically involves the conclusion that for every firstborn there must have been roughly big, in each family. Various solutions of this difficulty have been offered, the prevalence of polygamy has been suggested (Michaels, Haenriek). The exclusion of firstborn sons who were married, the inclusion only of the mother's son, the great variability, the babies which have been called in to surmount the difficulty (Kurz). But perhaps the best explanation is that only those were counted who were born after the Law was given on the night of the departure from Egypt (Ex 12:29; Nu 3:13; 8:17) (Keil, Delitzsch, Gerlich). It may be urged, of course, that this would require an exceptionally large number of births in the 15 months; but in the exceptionally joyous circumstances of the emancipation this might not have been impossible. In any case, it does not seem that there is any explanation which might vanish were all the facts known, to impeach the historical accuracy of the narrative, even in this particular.

Note.—In Scotland, with a population of nearly double that of the Israelites, viz. 3,232,743, marriages in 1909 were 30,092, the lowest on record for 55 years. At the same time births in Scotland in the 12 months after the exodus might have been 15,046, assuming each marriage to have had issue. As this marriage rate, however, is excessively low for Scotland in normal years, the number of marriages and therefore of births in Israel in the first year after the exodus may well have been twice, if not 3 times, 15,046, i.e. 30,092, or 45,185. Reckoning the half of these as males, viz. 15,046 or 22,569, it does not appear as if the number of the firstborn in the text were quite impossible, on the supposition made.)

3. Alleged Levitical laws, Physical Impossibilities—fully minute observation, were they not only in Canaan. (b) In point of fact, as Moses afterward testified (Dt. 12:8), the Levitical laws were not scrupulously kept in the wilderness.

(c) There is no reason to suppose that the Passover of the 2d year was celebrated before it had been in Egypt before the exodus, the slaughtering of the lambs being performed by the heads of families. And (d) as the Levites were set apart to minister to the tabernacle (Nu 1:50), they would be in able many ways to assist the priests.
The assembling of the congregation.—The assembling of the congregation at the door of the tabernacle (10:3-4) has been added as another physical impossibility; and no doubt it was if every man, woman and child, or even only every man, was to be present. To the contrary, the congregation was ordinarily represented by its "renowned" or "called" men, princes of the tribes of their fathers, heads of thousands of Israel (1:16). To suppose that anything else was meant is surely not required. When Moses called all Israel and spake unto them (Dt 5:1; 29:2), no intelligent person understands that he personally addressed every individual, or spoke so as to be heard by every individual, though what he said was intended for all. An additional difficulty in the way of assembling the congregation, and by implication an argument against the size of the congregation, has been discovered in the two silver trumpets which, it is contended, were too few for summoning so vast a host as 231 millions of people. But it is not stated in the narrative either (a) that it was absolutely necessary that every individual in the camp should hear the sound of the trumpets any more than it was indispensable that Balaam's curse should fall without the presence of Israel (Nu 22:13), or that a public proclamation by a modern state, though prefixed by means of an "Oyez," should be heard by all within the state or even within its capital; or (b) if it was necessary that everyone should hear that the trumpeters could not move about through the camp but must remain stationary at the tabernacle door; or (c) that in the clear air of the desert the sound of the trumpets would not travel farther than in the noisy and murky atmosphere of modern cities; or (d) that should occasion arise for more trumpets than two, Moses and his successors were forbidden to make them.

The marching of the host.—The marching of the host in four main divisions of about half a million each (2:10-14-20) has also been pronounced a stumbling-block (Colenso, Eerdmans, Doughty), inasmuch as the procession formed (i.e. if no division began to fall into line till its predecessor completed (i.e. if no division began to fall into line till its predecessor completed the task of its predecessor in the camp, or is completed in the process it required the whole day for its completion, and would make a column of unprecedented length—of 22 miles (Colenso), of 600 miles (Doughty)—and would even on the most favorable hypothesis travel out of sight of one another even if the would require to reconstruct the camp. The simple statement of this shows its absurdity as an explanation of what actually took place on the march, and indirectly suggests that the narrative may be historical after all, as no numbers of a late age would have risked his reputation by laying down such directions for the march, if they were susceptible of no other explanation than the above. How precisely the march was conducted may be difficult or even impossible to describe in such a way as to obviate all objections. But some considerations may be advanced to show that the march through the desert was neither impossible nor incredible. (a) The deploying of the four main divisions into line may have gone on simultaneously, as they were widely apart from each other, on the E. (Judah), on the S. (Reuben), on the W. (Ephraim) and on the N. (Dan). (b) There is no ground for thinking that the march would be conducted, at least at first, with the precision of a modern army, or that each division would extend itself to the length of 22 miles. It is more than likely that they would follow their standards as best they could or with such order as could be arranged by their captains. (c) If the camps of Judah and Reuben started their preparations together, say at 6 o'clock in the morning (which might be possible), and occupied 4 hours in completing these, they might begin to advance at 10 o'clock and cover 10 miles in another 4 hours, thus bringing them on to 2 PM, after which 4 hours more would enable them to encamp themselves for the night. (d) If the march was not divided into two divisions falling into line, say at 2 o'clock, would arrive at 6 PM, and by 10 PM would be settled for the night. (d) It does not seem certain that every night upon the march they would arrange themselves into more or less mimetic, no doubt营, rather than quasi-prophetic, rout formations. It is, however, possible that these were used by the enemy. But rather it is reasonable to conclude that this would be done only when they had reached a spot where a halt was to be made for some time. (e) In any case, in the absence of more details as to how the march was conducted, arithmetical calculations are of little value and are not entitled to discredit the truthfulness of the narrative.

The victory over Midian.—This has been objected to on moral grounds which are not now referred to. It is the supposed impossibility of 12,000 Israelites slaying all the male Midianites, capturing all their women and children, including 32,000 virgins, seizing all their cattle and flocks, with all their goods, and burning all their cities and castles in the whole of Canaan without the presence of Israel (Nu 31:30-41). But what is the perplexity. Yet Scripture relates several victories of a similar description, as e.g. that of Abraham over the kings of the East (Gen 14:15), in which, so far as the record goes, no loss was incurred by the pursuing army: that of Gideon's 300 over the Midianites at a later date (Jgs 7:22), that of Samson single-handed over 1,000 Philis (Jgs 15:15); and that of Jehoshaphat at the battle of Tekoa (2 Ch 20:24), which was won without a blow—all more or less miraculous, no doubt. For in profane history, Tacitus (Ann. xiii.39) relates an instance in which the Romans slaughtered all their foes without losing a single man; and Strabo (xvi. 1128) mentions a battle in which 1,000 Arabs were slain by only 2 Romans; while the life of Saladin contains a like statement concerning the issue of a battle (Hävernack, Intro, 330). Hence Israel's victory over Midian does not afford sufficient ground for challenging its historic credibility.

Restricting attention to evidence from Nu itself, it may be remarked in a general way that the question of authorship is practically settled by what has been advanced on its literary structure and historical credibility. For the materials which went to make up the book were substantially the work of one pen (whoever may have been the first collector or last redactor), and if these materials are upon the whole trustworthy, there will be little room to doubt that the original pen was in the hand of a contemporary and eyewitness of the incidents narrated, and that the contemporary and eyewitness was Moses, who need not, however, have set down everything with his own hand, all that is necessary to justify the ascription of the writing to him being that it should have been composed by his authority and under his supervision. In this sense it is believed that indications are not wanting in the book both against and for the Mosan authorship; and these may now be considered. (1) The alternating use of Divine names.—This usage, after forming so characteristic a feature in Gen and largely disappearing in Ex, is Against and Lev, reasserts itself in Nu, and the Mosaic more particularly in the story of Authorship Balaam. If chs 23 and 24 can be regarded as written only by one hand, the documents pieced together, because of the use of "God" in chs 23 and of "Lord" in ch 24, then Moses was not their author. But if the varying use of the Divine names is susceptible of explanation on the assumption that the two chapters originally formed one document, then most distinctly the claim of Moses to authorship is not debarred. Now whether Balaam was a false or a true prophet, it is clear that he could hope to please Balak only by cursing Israel in the name of Jeh, the Elohim of Israel; and so it is always Jeh he consults or pretends to consult before the prophecy of Balaam comes.” And if Moses could thus have skillfully concealed times he did so (22 8.19; 23 3.15); and 3 it is Elohim who met him (22 9.20; 23 14), while every time it was Jeh who put the word in his mouth. Can any conclusion be fairer than that the historian regarded Elohim as the author of the Divine Teaching, and represented this as it were by a double emphasis, which showed (a) that the Jeh whom Balaam consulted was Elohim or the supreme God, and (b) that the God who met Balaam and supplied him with oracles was Israel’s Lord? Thus explained, the alternate use of the Divine names does not require the hypothesis of two single documents rolled into one; and indeed the argument from the use of the Divine names is now generally abandoned.

(2) Traces of late authorship. Traces of late authorship are believed to exist in several passages: (a) 15 32–36 seems to imply that the writer was no longer in the wilderness, which may well have been the case, if already he was in the land of Moab. (b) 20 5 suggests, it is said, that the people were there when the portico was erected. But the description of the impression that they were not yet come to Canaan; and in point of fact the people were at Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin. (c) In 24 14.15, 17.18.27–30, certain archaic songs are cited as if the people were familiar with them. But according to the Authorized Version, as it is mentioned as the border of Moab long before Israel reached the river. But that poets were among the people at the time of the Exodus and probably long before, the song of Moses (Ex 16) shows, and it was composed before the song of Balaam (Num 23.12). It is therefore a song that was begun to be composed soon after the defeat of Amalek is not an unreasonable hypothesis (Ex 17 14). As for the statement that “Aaron leant upon the borders of Moab,” that may have been superfluous as a matter of information to the contemporaries of Moses when they were about to cross the stream (Strack, Einl, 25), but it was quite within the scope of an old prophetic song, as showing that their present position had been long before anticipated by God. (d) 24 16, according to the Authorized Version, is not unreasonable, that which could not have been composed before the rise of the monarchy; and certainly it could not, if prediction of future events is impossible. But if reference to a coming king in Israel was put into Balaam’s mouth in Canaan, it was in so unexpected a manner that it could easily have been made before the monarchy; and so could (e) 24 17.18 have been written before the reign of David, though the contention of the Exonites only then began (25 5 14; 1 Ki 11 1; 1 Ch 18 12 13).

Examples such as these show that many, if not most, of the like objections against the Mosaic authorship of this book are capable of at least possible solution; and that Kuenen’s caution should not be forgotten: “He who relies upon the impression made by the whole, without interrogation of the parts one by one, repudiates the first principles of all scientific research, and pays homage to superficiality!” (Rdl. of Israel, I, 11).

(1) Certain passages have the appearance of having been written by Moses.—These are: (a) those which bear evidence of having been intended for a people not settled in cities but dwelling in tents and camps, as e.g. chs 1–4, describing the arrangements for the formation of the camp; 6 24–26, the high-priestly benediction; 10 35–36, the orders for the marching and the halting of the host; 10 1–9, the directions about the silver trumpets; ch 19, the legislation which obviously presupposes the wilderness as the place for its observance (vs 3.7.9.14). If criticism allows that these and other passages have descended from the Mosaic age, why should it be necessary to seek another author for them than Moses? And if Moses could thus skillfully conceal times he did so, the presumption at least is created that the whole book has proceeded from his pen. (b) The apocryphal songs taken from the Book of the Wars of the Lord (ch 21), which some critics (Cornill, Kautzsch and others) hold true, are by no means equally competent scholars (Bleek, De Wette, J. Meyer, König and others) recognized as parts of Israel’s heritage from the Mosaic age, whenever they were incorporated in the book (c) The list of camping stations (ch 33) is expressly assigned to Moses. Whether “by the commandment of the Lord” should be connected with the “journeys” (Köning) or the “writing” makes no difference as to the authorship of this chapter, at least in the sense that it is based on a Mosaic document (Strack). It is true that even if this chapter as it stands was prepared by Moses, that does not amount to conclusive evidence of the Mosaic authorship of the whole book. Yet it creates a presumption in its favor (Dreehals, Keil, Zahn). For why should Moses have been interested in a passage collected and arranged by the compiler of Deuteronomy, if it presupposes the amanuensis, and whether by express command or without it (not an unreasonable supposition), there was no particular need to record that this was so. If, however, Moses was not thinking of preserving an incident, but of the historical record of the covenant, that he desired that he should do so, then there was need for a special commandment to be given; and need it should be recorded to explain why Moses incorporated in his book a list of names that in most people’s judgment might have been omitted without impairing the value of the book. Looked at in this way, the order to prepare this itinerary rather strengthens the idea of the Mosaic authorship of the whole book.

(2) Acquisition of the part of the author with Egyptian manners and customs.—This points in the direction of Moses. (a) The trial by jealousy (5 11–31) may be compared with the tale of Setna, belonging probably to the 3d cent. B.C., but relating to the new knowledge of the Egyptian sun-god, Thoth, having found the book which the god Thoth wrote with his own hand, copied it on a piece of papyrus, dissolved the copy in water and drank the solution, with the result that he knew all the secrets contained in the book (RP, IV, 138). (b) The consecration of the Levites (8 7) resembled the abolutions of the Egyptian priests who shaved their heads and bodies every 5d day, bathed twice during the day and twice during the night, and performed a grand ceremony of purification, preparatory to their seasons of fasting, which sometimes lasted from 7 to 40 days and even more (WAE, I, 181). (c) Uncleanness with contact from the dead (19 11) was not unknown to the Egyptians, who required their priests to avoid graves, funerals and funeral feasts (Porphyry, De Abst. ii.50, quoted in Speaker’s Comm.). (d) The fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions and garlic referred to in 11 5 were articles of diet in Egypt (Herod. ii.83). (e) The antiquarian statement about the leek of Helbon (13 17), as if it were a new food, is more than a writer in Mosaic times. "A later writer could have had no authority for making the statement and no possible reason for inventing it" (Pulpit Comm. on Nu). On a candid review of all the arguments pro
mēnios): The son of Antiochus, and Antipater were the two ambassadors whom Jonathan sent to the Romans, "to the Spartans, and to other places," after his victory in the plain of Hazor (Galilee) over the princes of Demetrius (1 Macc. 12:18) about 144 BC. Their mission was to confirm and renew the friendship and treaty which had existed from the days of Judas (8 17 ff). They were well received and successful, both at Rome (12:3) and at Sparta (12:19 ff, 14:22). After the death of Jonathan, the victories of Simon and the establishment of peace, Simon sent Numenius on a second embassy to Rome (14:24), again to confirm the treaty and present a golden shield weighing 1,000 minae—apparently just before the popular decree by which Simon was created high priest, leader and captain "for ever" (1 Macc. 14:27 ff), September, 141 BC. The embassy returned in 139 BC, bearing letters from the son to the kings of Egypt, Syria and "all the countries," confirming the integritv of Jewish territory, and forbidding these kings to disturb the Jews, and requiring them also to surrender any deserters (14:15 ff). See also LUCIUS;

NŪN, nōn (נ, נ): The 14th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as n.
It came also to be used for the number 50.
For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

NUN, nun (᾿Ν, νῦν, "fish," derivative meaning "fecundity")—Father of Joshua (referred to thus 29 times) (Ex 33:11; Nu 11:28, etc; 1 Ch 7:27, מ "Non"); Sir 45:1, m "Nave").

NURSE, nūrs, NURSING, nūrs'ing: "Nurse" in AV represents two different Heb words: In 8 passages (Gen 24:59; 35:8; Ex 2:7 bis-9; 2 K 11:2; 2 Ch 22:11; Isa 49:23) the word nun or νηοη renders some form of the vb. νηοη, γανη, "to suck." The fem. causative part. of this vb is commonly used to denote nurse or foster-mother. According to Ex 2:7 Moses' mother—"a nurse of the Heb women"—became, at Pharaoh's daughter's request, the foster-mother of the foundling. Josiah, the son of Ahitub, was in charge of a nurse until he was 7 years old (2 K 11:2; 2 Ch 22:11). But it is obvious that the term was used in a more general way, e.g., of a lady's maid or nurse-woman.
Rebekkah was accompanied by her nurse when she left home to be married (Gen 24:59; 35:8). In 5 passages (Nu 11:12; Ruth 4:16; 2 S 4:4; Isa 49:23; 60:4 AV) "nurse" represents the Heb word νηοη, ἀμαμ, "to support," "be faithful," "nourish."
The part. of this vb. denoted a person who had eaten of the children—a guardian or woman of child. Naomi took charge of Ruth's child "and became nurse unto it" (Ruth 4:16). In Nu 11:12 Moses asks whether he has to take charge of the Israelites as a nursing-father care the sucking child. The same word is found in 2 K 10:15 (AV "they that brought up" i.e. guardians of the sons of Ahab) and in Est 2:7 (AV "and he brought up," i.e. he [Mordecai] adopted, his niece). Deutero-Isa uses both terms together (49:23) to describe the exalted position of Israel in the future when foreign kings and queens will offer their services and wait upon the chosen people.

In the solitary passage in the NT where "nurse" occurs, it renders the Gr word τητῆρας, τροφής.
In this case the word does not mean a hired nurse, but a mother who nurses her own children (1 Thess.
2:7). T. LEWIS

NURE, nūrē: The word occurs in AV in Eph
6:4 as the tr of παιδεία, παιδεία, but AV changes to "chastening," and NASB "nurture" (vb.) for AV "bring up" (τητῆρας, τροφής) in the first part of the verse. "Paideia has the idea of training and correction; in RV 2 Esd 8:12 for Lat. crutio; and of AV Wind 3:11; Sir 18:13 (paideíα), etc.

tains. In such situations it attains the height of from 60 to 90 ft. A grove of such trees affords the most delightful shade.

(2) (κοπρί), bokrot; τοπάθραβος, τερβίνθοι [Gen 43:11, m "pistachio nuts!"] The Heb is perhaps allied to the Arab. butiam, the "terebinth," which is closely allied to the Pistacia vera, N.O. Anacardioce, which produces pistachio nuts. These nuts, known in Arab. as fistal, are prime favorites with the people of Pal. They are oblong, ½ in. long, with green, oily coxyleons. They are eaten raw and are also made into various sweets and confectionery. They are a product of Pal, very likely to be sent as a present to Egypt (Gen. 43:11).

NYMPHAS, nim'fas (Νυμφᾶς, Nymphas; Lach-mann, Tregelles [m], WH read Νυμφᾶ, Νυμφα, the name of a woman [Col 4:15]: A Christian resident in Laodicea, to whom Paul sends salutations in the ep.
which he wrote from Rome to the church in Colosse, the latter city being only a very few miles distant from Laodicea. Indeed, so near were they, that Paul directs that the Ep. to the Col be read also in Laodicea. If Nymphas be read, then it is a Christian lady who is meant—was a person of outstanding worth and importance in the church of Laodicea, for he had granted the use of his dwelling-house for the ordinary weekly meetings of the church. The apostle's substitution is a 3-fold one—to the brethren that are in Laodicea, that is to the whole of the Christian community in that city, and to Nymphas, and to the church in his house.

1. A Christian in Laodicea

OAK, ὦξ: Several Heb words are so tr., but there has always been great doubt as to which words should be tr. "oak" and which "terebinth." This uncertainty appears in the LXX and all through EV; in recent revisions "terebinth" has been increasingly added in the m. All the Heb words are closely allied and may originally have had simply the meaning of "tree," but it is clear that, when the OT was written, they indicated some special kind of tree.

The words and references are as follows:

1. ἀλήθ (in LXX usually τερεβίνθος, terebinthos, in Vulg. terebinthus, or, more commonly, quercus)

2. Hebrew
   - 1. Hebrew 1 K 13:14; 1 Ch 10:12; Isa 1:30; Ezk 1:13; in Isa 13 (AV "tell tree") and Hos 4:13 (AV "els") the tr is "terebinth" because of the juxtaposition of ἀλήθ, tr, "oak.

3. "Yah of Eleah" (in "the Terebinth") is found in 1 S 17:21.9. The expression in Isa 1:30, "whose face fadeth," is more appropriate to the terebinth than the oak (see below).

2. ἀλήθ (terebinthos, quercus [Vulgate]), apparently a slightly variant for ἀλήθ only in Jos 24:26; Gen 30:4 (ἄληθ) and in Jgs 9:6 (ἄληθ).

3. דָּלָּם or דָּלָם, "elim, perhaps pl. of ἀλήθ, occurs in Isa 1:29 (m "terebinth"); 57:5, m "with idols"). "AV "allem"; m "oaks"; 61:3, "trees"; Ezk 31:14 (text very doubtful), "hight," AV "upon themselves"; הָלָּם, "N, in El-phan (LXX terebinthos) (Gen 14:6), probably means the "tree" or "terebinth" of Paran. Colossi (Hier. l,34 if) argues at length that the above words apply well to the Τατανίνα (q.v.) in all the passages in which they occur.

4. דָּלָּם (usually δέλας, δέλα, "oak"), in Gen 12:6; 15:13; 14:13; 18:1;Dt 11:30; Josh 19:33; Jgs 4:11; 9:6.37; 1:10 3 (AV "plain"); in all these references, δέλας has "oaks" or "terebinth," or "terebinths.

5. "Oak of Mezonemin" (in "the augurs' oak (or terebinth)" in Jgs 9:37.

6. "Yah of Eleah" (in "the Terebinth") is found in 1 S 17:21.9. The expression in Isa 1:30, "whose face fadeth," is more appropriate to the terebinth than the oak (see below).

If (1) (2) (3) refer cap. to the terebinth, then (4) and (5) are probably correctly tr."oak." If we may judge at all by present conditions, "oaks" of Bashan is far more correct than "terebinths" of Bashan.

This fact, that the church met there, also shows that Nymphas was a person of some means, for a very small house could not have been a suitable place for Christian men and women who gathered together on the first day of every week for the purposes of Christian worship, and which indicates that the church in Laodicea had a numerous membership, but also from what is said of it in Rev 3:17—AV—must have been large and influential: "Thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing." The house of Nymphas, therefore, must, have possessed a large room or saloon sufficiently commodious to allow the meeting of a numerous company. Nymphas would be a person both of Christian character and of generous feeling, and of some amount of wealth. Nothing more is known regarding him, as this is the only passage in which he is named.

JOHN RUTHERFORD

There are, according to Post (Flora of Palestine, 737-41), no less than 9 species of oak (N.O. Cupuliferae) in Syria, and he adds to these

2. Varieties 12 sub-varieties. Many of these have of Oak no interest except to the botanist. The following species are widespread and distinctive: (1) The "Turkey oak," Quercus cerris, known in Arab. as Balsam, as its name implies, occurs in other countries, too, and is common in Pal. Under favorable conditions it attains to great size, reaching as much as 60 ft. in height. It is distinguished by its large sessile acorns with hemispherical caps covered with long, narrow, almost bristle, scales, giving them a mossy aspect. The wood is hard and of fine grain. Galls are common upon its branches.

(2) Quercus lusitanica (or Ballota), also known in Arab. as Balsam, as the last is frequently found dispersed to a bush, but, when protected, attains a height of 30 ft. or more. The leaves are dentate or crenate or late late into the winter, but are shed before the new twigs are developed. The acorns are solitary or few in cluster, and the cupules are more or less smooth. Galls are common, and a variety of this species is often known as Q. inferna, on account of its liability to infection with galls.

(3) The Valonic oak (Q. acerolopha), known in Arab. as Balsam, has large oblong or ovate deciduous leaves, with deep serrations terminating in a point, and very large acorns, globular, thick cups covered with long reflexed scales. The cupules, known commercially as valoncia, furnish one of the richest of tanning materials.

The Evergreen oak is often classed under the general name “lex oak” or Holm (i.e. holly-like) oak. Several varieties are described as occurring in Pal. Q. \textit{tux} usually has rather a shrublike growth, with abundant glossy, dark-green leaves, oval in shape and more or less prickly at the margins, though sometimes entire. The cupules of the acorns are woolly. It shows a marked predilection for the neighborhood of the sea. The \textit{Q. cocccifera} (with var. \textit{Q. pseudococccifera}) is known in Arab. as \textit{Sindn}. The leaves, like the last, usually are prickly. The acorns are solitary or twin, and the hemispherical cupules are more or less velvety. On the \textit{Q. cocccifera} are found the insects which make the well-known Kermes dye. These evergreen oaks are the common trees at sacred tombs, and the once magnificent, but now dying, “Abraham’s oak” at Hebron is one of this species.

Oaks occur in all parts of Pal, in spite of the steady ruthless destruction which has been going on for centuries. All over Carmel, Tabor, around Banias and in the hills to the modern W. of Nazareth, to mention well-known localities, there are forests of oak; great tracts of country, esp. in Galilee and E. of the Jordan, are covered by a stunted brushwood which, were it not for the wood-cutter, would grow into noble trees. Solitary oaks of magnificent proportions occur in many parts of the land, esp. upon hilltops; such trees are saved from destruction because of their “sacred” character. To bury beneath such a tree has ever been a favorite custom (cf Gen 35:8; 1 Ch 10:12). Large trees like these, seen often from great distances, are frequent landmarks (Josh 19:33) or places of meeting (cf “Oak of Tabor,” 1 S 10:3). The custom of heathen worship beneath oaks or teebitha (Hos 4:13; Ezek 6:13, etc.) finds its modern counterpart in the cult of the Wely in Pal. The oak is sometimes connected with some historical event, e.g. Abraham’s oak of Guern now shown at Hebron, and “the oak of weeping,” \textit{Aliun bacak}, of Gen 35:8.

\textbf{OAK OF TABOR (עֵין תַּבְרֶה, el'ôn taborh):} Thus RV in 1 S 10:3 for AV “plain of Tabor” (RVm “teebinth”). Tabor was famous for its groves of oak, but what “oak” is meant here is not known. Ewald thinks that “Tabor” is a different pronunciation for “Deborah,” and connects with Gen 35:8; but this is not likely. See Oak, 3.

\textbf{OATH, 6th (עֵשֶׁב הַעֲבֵד, shebha'ah, probably from shebbah,' seven,” the sacred number, which occurs frequently in the ritual of ancestor worship, and the stronger word כָּלָּה, kaláh, by which a curse is actually invoked upon the oath-breaker (LXX \textit{aôd}, \textit{ard}): In Mt 26:70-74 Peter first denies his Lord simply, then with an oath (shebha'ah), then invokes a curse (kaláh), thus passing through every stage of asseveration. The oath is the invoking of a curse upon one’s self if one has not spoken the truth (Mt 26:74), or if one fails to keep a promise (1 S 19:1).}

1. Law Re-; 6:20: 19:21; 23:19. It guarded Oaths playing a very important part, not only in the laws, (Ex 28:27) and state affairs, (Am 7:11) but also in the dealings of everyday life (Gen 24:37; 50:5; Jgs 21:5; 1 K 18:10; Ezr 10:5). The Mosaic laws concerning oaths were not meant to limit the widespread custom of making oaths, so much as to impress upon the people the sacredness of an oath, forbidding on the one hand swearing falsely (Ex 20:7; Lev 19:22; Zec 8:17; etc.), and on the other swearing by false gods, which latter was considered to be a very dark sin (Jer 12:16; Am 8:14). In the Law only two \textit{kerekos}; of false swearing are mentioned: false swearing of a witness, and false asseveration upon oath regarding a thing found or received (Lev 5:1; 6:2; cf Prov 29:24). Both required a sin offering (Lev 5:1f). The Talm gives additional rules, and lays down certain punishments for false swearing; in the case of a thing found it states what the false swearer must pay (\textit{Makkot} 2:3; \textit{Shebha'ah} 8:3). The Jewish interpretation of the 3d commandment is that it is not concerned with oaths, but rather forbids the use of the name of Jeh in ordinary cases (so Dalman).

Swearing in the name of the Lord (Gen 11:22; Dt 6:13; Jgs 21:7; Ruth 1:17, etc.) was a sign of loyalty to Him (Dt 10:20; Isa 58:18). We know from the Old Testament that swearing by false gods was frequent, and we learn also from the newly discovered Elephantine papyri that the people not only swore by Jahu (=Jeh) or by the Lord of Heaven, but also among a certain class of other gods, e.g. by Hecubbeth, and by Isun. In ordinary intercourse it was customary to swear by the life of the person addressed (1 S 1:25; 20:5; 2 K 2:2); by the life of the king (1 S 17:55; 26:20; 2 S 11:11); by one’s own head (Mt 3:6); by the earth (Mt 7:33); by the heaven (Mt 5:34; 22:21); by the angels (Bf, II, xv, 4); by the temple (Mt 23:16), and by different parts of it (Mt 23:16); by Jesur (Mt 5:35); by \textit{sh'bhu'ah}. The oath “by heaven” (Mt 5:34; 22:21) is confirmed by Jesus as the oath in which God’s name is invoked. Jesus does not mean that God and heaven are identical, but He desires to rebuke those who palter with an oath by avoiding a direct mention of a name of God. He teaches that such an oath is a real oath and must be considered as sacredly binding.
Not much is told us as to the ceremonies observed in taking an oath. In patriarchal times he who took the oath put his hand under the thigh of him to whom the oath was rendered, and any false oath was treated as a crime against Jehovah (Gen. 43:33). The usual form was to hold up the hands to heaven (Gen. 41:22; Ex. 6:8; Deut. 32:40; Ezek. 20:5). The wife suspected of unfaithfulness, when brought before the priest, had to answer “Amen, Amen” to his adjuration, and this was considered to be an oath on her part (Num. 5:22). The usual form of an oath was either: “He that is witness betwixt me and thee” (Gen. 31:50), or more commonly: “As Jehovah [or God] liveth” (Jgs 8:19; Ruth 3:13; 2 Sam. 2:27; Jer. 38:16), or “Jehovah be a true and faithful witness amongst us” (Jer. 42:5). Usually the penalty invoked by the oath was only suggested: “Jehovah [or God] do so to me” (Ruth 1:17; 2 Sam. 3:35; 1 Kings 2:23; 2 Kings 6:31); in some cases the punishment was expressly mentioned (Jer. 29:22). Nowack suggests that in general the punishment was not expressly mentioned because of a superstitious fear that by mentioning it the thing might be drawn upon himself some of the punishment by merely mentioning it.

Philosophy expresses the desire (ii.194) that the practice of swearing should be discontinued, and the Egyptians used no oaths (B.j. 11, viii, 6; Ant., XV, x, 4).

That oaths are permissible to Christians is shown by the example of Our Lord (Mt. 26:63 f.), and of Paul (2 Cor. 1:23; Gal. 1:20) and Peter (Acts 26:27–28) (II. 18–19).

Permissibility. Consequently when Christ said, “Swear not at all” (Mt. 5:34), He was laying down the principle that the Christian must not have two standards of truth, but that his ordinary speech must be as absolutely true as his oath. In the kingdom of God, where that principle holds sway, oaths become unnecessary.

PAUL LEVYTOFF

OBAIDIAN, bê-hâ-dî’a (אֶבַדִּיה; עְבַדִּיה, “servant of Jehovah”):

1. The steward or prime minister of Ahab, who did best to protect the prophets of Jehovah against Jezebel. He must have held his office on his return from Zarephath, and bore to Ahab the news of Elijah’s reappearance (1 Kings 18:3–16).

2. The prophet (Ob.1). See OBADIAH, Book of.

3. (a) A descendant of David (1 Chron 3:21).

4. (a) A chief of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron 7:3).

5. (a) A descendant of Saul (1 Chron 8:38; 9:44).

6. A Levite descended from Jeduthun (1 Chron 9:16), identical with Abia (Neh. 11:17).

9. One of the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law in Judah (2 Chron 17:7).

10. A Merarite, enclosed by Jehovah to oversee the workmen in repairing the temple (2 Chron 34:12).

11. The head of a family who went up with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:9).

12. One of the men who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5).

13. A gate-keeper in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:25).

The name “Obadiah” was common in Israel from the days of David to the close of the OT. An ancient Heb seal bears the inscription “Obadiah the servant of the King.”

JOHN RICHARD SANPEY

Obadiah, Book of: Obadiah is the shortest book in the OT. The theme of the book is the destruction of Edom. Consequent upon the overthrow of Edom is the enlargement of the borders of Judah and the establishment of the kingship of Jeh. Thus far all scholars are agreed; but on questions of authorship and date there is wide divergence of opinion.

(1) Jeh summons the nations to the overthrow of proud Edom. The men of Edom will be brought down from their lofty strongholds;

1. Contents

1.1 Their hidden treasures will be rifled;

1.2 Their confederates will turn against them; nor will the wise and the mighty men be able to avert the coming calamity (vs. 1–9).

2. The overthrow of Edom is due to the violence and cruelty shown toward his brother Jacob. The prophet describes the cruelty and shameless gloating over a brother’s calamity, in the form of earnest appeals to Edom not to forget the selfish and heartless deeds of which he had been guilty when Jehu was sacked by foreign foes (vs. 10–14).

3. The day of the display of Jehu’s retributive righteousness upon the nations is near. Jehu shall complete completely his task, whom he has tried to uproot, while Israel’s captives shall return to possession of their own land and also to seize and rule the mount of Esau. Thus the kingship of Jehu shall be established (vs. 15–21).

The unity of Ob was first challenged by Eichhorn in 1824, vs. 17–18 being regarded by him as an appendix attached to the original exilic prophecy (of Jeremiah) of the time of Alexander the Great (323–30 BC). Ewald thought that an exilic prophet, to whom he ascribed vs. 11–14, 16–21, had made use of the exilic prophecy by Obadiah in vs. 1–10, and in vs. 15–18 of material from another older prophet who was contemporaneous, like Obadiah, with Isaiah. As the years went on, the material assigned to the older oracle was limited: 5.7.10.11.13.14.15.16, while all else was regarded as a later appendix of the composition of Ob. Ob is thus summed up by Bewer: “Vs. 1–6 are a prologue, of Ob that was assigned to Jeremiah, and redacted with additions (vs. 7–15) by another Obadiah in the early post-exilic days; vs. 16–21 in an appendix, probably from a Marcanite time” (ICC, 5). Bewer’s own view is closely akin to Barton’s. He thinks that Obadiah, writing in the 6th cent. B.C., “quoted vs. 1–4, almost, though not quite, literally, that he commented on the older oracle in vs. 5–7, partly in the words of the older prophet, partly in his own words, in order to show that it had been fulfilled in his own day; and that in vs. 8–9 he quoted once more vs. 4 of the older oracle without any show of literalness.” He ascribes to Obadiah vs. 10–14 and 15b. The appendix consists of two sections, vs. 15a and 15b, the latter being a fragment of a different author, 15b being a quotation from some older prophet. To the average student of the prophecy a five minute analysis of a brief prophecy must seem hypercritical. It will prefer to read the book as a unity: and in doing so get the essence of the message it has for the present day.

Certain preliminary problems require solution before the question of date can be settled.

1. Relation of Ob and Obadiah, Book of

(a) Did Obadiah quote from Jer? Pusey thus sets forth the impossibility of such a solution: “Out of 16 verses of which the prophecy of Jeremiah against Edom consists, four are identical with those of Obadiah; six are closely related; a fifth embarks on a verse of Obadiah which, while it contains the same themes, is an expansion of the preceding verse, and with which verse, the theme of the prophecy of Jeremiah, should have selected precisely those which contain none of Jeremiah’s characteristic expressions; whereas it perfectly fits in with the supposition that Jeremiah interwove verses of Obadiah with his own, so that the entire verse or verses so interwoven there is not one expression which occurs elsewhere in Jer.” (Minor Prophets, I, 347).

(b) Did Jeremiah quote from Ob? It is almost incredible that the vigorous and well-articulated prophecy in Ob could have been made by piecing together detached quotations from Jer; but Jeremiah may well have taken from Ob many expressions that fell in with his general purpose. There are differences of expression, however, between the two versions, but it has not been disproved by the arguments from meter advanced by Bewer and others. (d) Did both Obadiah and Jeremiah quote from an older oracle? This is the favorite solution among modern scholars, most of whom think that Obadiah preserves the vigor of the original, while Jeremiah quotes with more freedom; but Bewer in TIC, after a detailed comparison, thus sums up: "Our conclusion is that Obadiah quoted in vs 1-9 an older oracle, but in vs 10-14 a better preserved version of Jer 49." The student will do well to get his own first-hand impression from a careful comparison of the two passages. With Ob vs 1-4 cf Jer 49 14-16; with Ob vs 5.6 cf Jer 49 9.10s; with Ob ver 8 of Jer 49 7; with Ob vs 92 of Jer 49 22b. On the whole, the view that Jeremiah, who often quotes from earlier prophets, draws directly from Ob, with free working over of the older prophets, seems still tenable.

(2) Relation of Ob and Joel.—There seems to be in Joel 2 32 (Heb 3 5) a direct allusion to Ob ver 17. If Joel prophesied during the minority of the boy king Joash (c 830 BC), Obadiah would be, on this hypothesis, the earliest of the writing prophets.

(3) What capture of Jerus is described in Ob vs 10-14?—The disaster seems to have been great enough to be called "destruction" (Ob ver 12). Hence most scholars identify the calamity described by Ob with the later destruction and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldaeans in 587 BC. But it is remarkable, on this hypothesis, that no allusion is made either in Ob or Jer 49 7-22 to the Chaldaeans or to the destruction of the temple or to the wholesale transportation of the inhabitants of Jerusalem to Babylon. We know, however, from Ezek 36 1-15 and Ps 137 7 that Edom rejoiced over the final destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldaeans in 587 BC, and that they encamped the destroyers to blot out the holy city. Certain it is that the events of 587 accord remarkably with the language of Ob vs 10-14. Pusey indeed argues from the use of the form of the direct prohibition in Ob vs 12-14 that Edom had not yet committed the sins against which the prophet had warned and despatched the Chaldaeans by his efforts. But Obadiah wrote before 587, and may have prophesied in 597, and some others identify it with a Shaparda in Media, mentioned in the annals of Sargon (722-705 BC). Many think of Asia Minor, or a region in Asia Minor mentioned in Pers inscriptions, perhaps Bithynia or Galatia (Sayce). Some think that the mention of "the captives of this host of the children of Israel" and "the captives of Jerusalem" (ver 20) proves that both the Assyrian captivity and the Bab exile were already past. This argument has considerable force; but it is well to remember that in the first half of the 6th century BC Edom carried on extensive wars of aggression and that the prophecies of Obadiah, like those of the prophets of the northern kingdom of Israel, were written to defend the rights of the kingdom against its enemies, and were written to warn the inhabitants of Edom of their future destruction if they persisted in their hostility to Judah. Obadiah is a prophecy of the future, and not an interpretation of past events.

(4) The style of Ob.—Most early critics praise the style. Some of the more recent critics argue for different authors on the basis of a marked difference in style within the compass of the twenty-one verses in the little roll. Thus Babel writes in HDB: "There is a difference in style between the two halves of the book, the first being terse, animated, and full of striking figures, while the second is diffuse and marked by poverty of ideas and long-windedness. The criticism of the minor prophets and the book is somewhat exaggerated, though it may be freely granted that the first half is more original and vigorous. The Heb of the book is classic, with scarcely any admixture of Aram. words or constructions. The author may well have lived in the golden age of the Heb language and literature."

(5) Geographical and historical allusions.—The references to the different sections and cities in the land of Israel and in the land of Edom are quite intelligible. As to Sepharad (ver 20) there is considerable difference of opinion. Schrader and some others identify it with a Shaparda in Media, mentioned in the annals of Sargon (722-705 BC). Many think of Asia Minor, or a region in Asia Minor mentioned in Pers inscriptions, perhaps Bithynia or Galatia (Sayce). Some think that the mention of "the captives of this host of the children of Israel" and "the captives of Jerusalem" (ver 20) proves that both the Assyrian captivity and the Bab exile were already past. This argument has considerable force; but it is well to remember that in the first half of the 6th century BC Edom carried on extensive wars of aggression and that the prophecies of Obadiah, like those of the prophets of the northern kingdom of Israel, were written to defend the rights of the kingdom against its enemies, and were written to warn the inhabitants of Edom of their future destruction if they persisted in their hostility to Judah. Obadiah is a prophecy of the future, and not an interpretation of past events.

2174 4. Interpretation of the Book.—Ob is to be interpreted as prediction. In vers 1-14 there are elements of historic description, as vs 1-10 and 15-21 are predictive.

Obed, 6bed (עָבֶד, הָבֶּד, "worshipper"); in the NT 1ωβῆδα, 1ωβεδ:
1. Son of Boaz and Ruth and grandfather of David (Ruth 4 17.21.22; 1 Ch 2 12; Mt 1 5; Lk 3 24).
2. Son of Ephal and descendant of Sheshan, the Jerahmeelite, through his daughter who was married to Jarha, an Egyp servant of her father's (1 Ch 2 37.38).
3. Son of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11 47).
4. A Korhite doortkeeper, son of Semeah, and grandson of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 7).
5. Father of Azariah, one of the centurions that took part with Jehoiada in depositing Queen Athaliah and crowning Josiah (2 Ch 23 1; cf 2 K 11 1-16).

Obed-edom, 6bed-ed'm (עַבְד-אֵדֶם, הֵבָדֶד-אֵדֶם) [2 Ch 25 24]; [2 S 6 10; 1 Ch 13 13.14; 15 25], but elsewhere without hyphen, "Abiathar's" servant.
6. The Ark of Jehovah into his house when David brought it into Jerus-ehir-jearim. Because of the sudden death of Uzzah, David was unwilling to bring the ark to Jerusalem and it remained three months in the house of Obed-edom, "and Jeh blessed Obied-edom, and all his house" (2 S 6 11). According to 1 Ch 13 14 the Ark had a special "house" of its own within. There is probably the same as the Levite of 1 Ch 15 25. In 1 Ch 15 16-21 Obed-edom is a "singer," and in 1 Ch 15 24 a "doortkeeper," while according to 1 Ch 26 4-8 he is a Korhite doortkeeper, to whose house fell the overseership of the storeroom (ver 15). Obed-edom is sometimes mentioned as a "minister before the ark," a member of the house or perhaps a guild of Jeduthun (see 2 Ch 25 24).

Obed-edom is an illustration of the service rendered to Heb religion by foreigners, remining one of the Simeon of Cyrene who bore the cross of Jesus (Mt 27 32, etc). The Chronicler naturally desired to think that only Levites could discharge such duties as Obed-edom performed, and hence the references to him as a Levite.

Obedience, 6-bē' di-en, OBEY, 6-bā' (עָבֹד, shā'ma; ἀκοῦω, ἡκοπάω): In its simpler OT meaning the word signifies "to hear," "to listen." It carries with it, however, of Terms the ethical significance of hearing with reverence and obedience. In the OT a different origin is suggestive of "hearing under" or of subordinating one's self to the person or thing heard, hence, "to obey." There is another NT usage, however, indicating persuasion from, πείλομαι, πείλομα.

The relation expressed is twofold: first, human, as between master and servant, and particularly between parents and children. "If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, that will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and, though they chasten him, will not hearken unto them; then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place" (Dt 21 18.19; cf Prov 15 20); or between sovereign and subjects, "The sovereign shall not abdul him; he shall obey me; as soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me" (2 S 22 45; 1 Ch 29 23).

The highest significance of its usage, however, is that of the relation of man to God. Obedience is the supreme test of faith in God and reverence for Him. The OT conception of obedience was vital. It was the one important relationship which must not be broken. While sometimes this relation may have been formal and cold, it nevertheless was the one strong tie which held the people close to God. The significant spiritual relation is expressed as by Samuel when he asks the question, "Hath Jehovah as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of Jehovah? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 S 15 22). It was the condition without which no right relation might be sustained to Jehovah. This is most clearly stated in the relation between Abraham and Jehovah when he is assured "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice" (Gen 22 18).

In prophetic utterances, future blessing and prosperity were conditioned upon obedience: "If ye will be obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land" (Isa 1 9). After surveying the glories of the Messianic kingdom, the prophet assures the people that "this shall come to pass if ye will diligently obey the voice of Jehovah your God" (Zec 6 15). On the other hand misfortune, calamity, distress and famine are due to their disobedience and distrust of Jehovah. See Disobedience.

This obedience or disobedience was usually related to the specific commands of Jehovah as contained in the law, yet they conceived of God as giving commands by other means. Note esp. the rebuke of Samuel to Saul: "The voice of Jehovah is not heard, neither the voice of his servant Jehovah; but a voice of an ass is heard, and they obeyed not the voice of Jehovah." . . . therefore hath Jehovah done this thing unto thee this day" (1 S 28 18).

In the NT a higher spiritual and moral relation is sustained than in the OT. The importance of obedience is just as emphasized. Christ Himself is its one great Conception, illustration of obedience. He "humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 8). By obedience to Him we are through Him made partakers of His salvation (He 5 9). This act is a supreme test of faith in Christ. Indeed, it is so vitally related that they are in some cases almost synonymous. "Obedience of faith" is a combination used by Paul to express this idea (Rom 1 7). Peter designates believers in Christ as "children of obedience" (1 Pet 1 14). Thus it is seen that the test of fellowship with Jehovah in the OT is obedience. The bond of union with Christ in the NT is obedience through faith, by which they become identified and the believer becomes a disciple.

Obedience of Christ: The "obedience" (ἀκοῦω, ἡκοπάω) of Christ is directly mentioned but 3 in the NT, although many other passages describe or allude to it: "Through the obedience of the one shall the many be made righteous" (Rom 5 19); "He humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 8); "Though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered" (He 5 8). In 2 Co 10 5, the phrase signifies an attitude toward Christ: "every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ."

His submission to His parents (Lk 2 51) was a necessary manifestation of His loving and sinless character, and of His disposition and power to do the right in any situation.

1. As an Element of His obedience to the moral law in the Commandments and in the NT writers: "without sin" (He 4 15); Character "who knew no sin" (2 Co 5 21); noble, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners" (He 7 26), etc; and is affirmed by Himself: "Which of you convinceth me of sin? Obey God's command to be obedient and follow His lead always.

In the Bible, obedience is often equated with the concept of righteousness. It is the act of listening and following the guidance of one's superiors, as well as the divine authority represented by God. The Bible teaches that obedience is an essential part of the Christian faith and is a necessary component of spiritual growth.

Obedience is not merely a matter of following rules or laws, but it involves a deeper commitment. It requires a willingness to put aside personal desires and goals in favor of the purposes of God. This is often expressed through acts of sacrifice and submission to God's will. Obedience is a key aspect of the Christian life, as it allows individuals to align their actions with the will of God and experience the blessings and blessings that come from following His lead.

In summary, obedience is a crucial aspect of the Christian faith. It involves a deep commitment to following the guidance of God and placing His will above personal desires. Obedience is an essential part of spiritual growth and is necessary for individuals who seek to live a life that is pleasing to God. By choosing to be obedient, individuals can experience the blessings and benefits that come from aligning their actions with the purposes of God.

the kindred question whether it was not the spirit of obedience in the act of death, rather than the act itself, that furnished the value of His redemp-

OBELEISK, ob'ēlisk, ob'd-ēlisk: A sacred stone or maqēḇbōḥāh. For maqēḇbōḥāh RV has used "pillar" in the text, with "obelisk" in the margin in many instances (Ex 23 34; Lev 26 1; De 12 3; 1 K 14 23; Hos 3 4; 10 1,2, etc.), but not consistently (e.g. Gen 28 18). See pillar.

OBEΘ, ob'ēth (Oḇēṯ, Obēth, Oḇḕb, Oḇōbē): One of those who went up with Ezra (1 Esd 8 32) = "Ebed" of Ezr 8 6.

OBL, o'bil (ḇōḇ, 'obhīl, 'camel driver'): An Ishmaelite who was "over the camels" in David's palace (1 Ch 27 30).

OBJECT, ob'jēkt: Now used only in the sense "to make objection," but formerly in a variety of meanings derived from the literal sense "to throw against." So with the meaning "to charge with" (1 K 22 20) in Wisd 2 3.4, RV "the objectors to" or "the objectors" (as our translators use "transgressing of our education" (RV "layeth to our charge sins against our discipline")) or "to make charges against" in Acts 24 19, AV "who ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had ought against me" (RV "and to make accusation").

OBLATION, ob-lā'shun: In Lev and Nu, AV occasionally uses "oblation," but generally "offering," as a rendering of ḥōḇēṯ, ḥōḇōb, a general term for all kinds of offering, but used only in Ezek, Lev and Nu. RV renders consistently "oblation." In Ezek (also Isa 40 20), "oblation" renders ḥwēḇōb, trūmōb, generally tō 34 "heave offering." In some cases (e.g. Isa 1 13; Dn 9 21) "oblation" in AV corresponds to ḥōḇēṣ, Markup, the ordinary word for "gift," in P "grain offering." See Sacrifice.

OBOTH, o'both, o'bōth (ḇōḇ, "water-bags"): A desert camp of the Israelites, the 3d after leaving Mt. Hor and close to the borders of Moab (Nu 21 10.11; 33 43.44). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

OBSCURITY, ob-skū'ri-ti: In modern Eng. generally denotes a state of very faint but still perceptible illumination, and only when preceded by some such adj. as "total" does it imply the absence of all light. In Bib. Eng., however, only the latter meaning is found. So in Isa 29 18 (ḇōḇ, "ophel, "darkness"); 58 10; 69 9 (ḇōḇēḵ, "darkness"); Ad Est 11 8 (ḇōḇōph, ḥōḇōp, "darkness"). Cf Prov 20 20, AV "in obscure darkness," ERV "in the blackest darkness," ARV "in blackness of darkness."

OBSERVE, ob-zôr' (representing various words, but chiefly ḇōḇ, ẖāmār, "to keep," "to watch," etc.): Properly means "to take heed to," as in Isa 42 20, "Thou seest many things, but thou observest not," and from this sense all the usages of the word in Eng can be understood. Most of them, indeed, are quite good modern usage (as "observe a feast," Ex 12 17, etc.; "observe a law," Lev 19 37, etc.), but a few are archaic. So Gen 37 11, AV "His father observed the saying" (RV "kept the act in mind"); Hos 13 7, "As a leopard...will I observe them" (RV "watch"); Jon 2 8, "observe lying vanities" (RV "regard," but "give heed to" would be clearer; cf Ps 107 43). Still farther from modern usage is Hos 14 8, "I have heard him, and observed him" (RV "will regard; the meaning is "care for"); and Mk 6 20, "For Herod feared John . . . and observed him" (RV "kept him safe"). In the last case, the AV editors seem to have used "to observe" as meaning "to give reverence to." Observers 1720, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation" (malà waparòýòwos, metà paratérësēs). The meaning of the Eng. is, "so that it can be observed," but the exact force of the underlying Gr ("visibly") "so that it can be computed in advance" is a matter of extraordinary dispute at the present time. See Kingdom of God. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

OBSERVATION, ob-sër'

OBSERVANT, ob-sër-vant. See DIvinATION.

OBSINITY, ob-stîn-ût-ë. See HARDENING.

OCCASION, o-kâ'shûn: The uses in RV are all modern, but in Jer 2 4 "occasion" is employed (both in Heb and Eng.) as a euphemism for "time of conception of offspring." OCCUPY, ok'â-pë: Is in AV the tr of 7 different words: (1) ἔκατον, neðthan; (2) ἔκατον, sēbhar; (3) ἔκατον, ērakhk; (4) ἔκατον, ēsah, either with or without the added word, ἔκατον ἐκ ἐκ; (5) ἐκατάληθος, ἐκατάληθος; (6) παρατηρεῖν, παρατηρεῖν; (7) πραγματεύειν, pragmateuein. In almost every case the meanings of "to occupy" as used in AV in harmony with the common usage of the time have become obsolete. (1) In Ezk 27 16.22, nāthan meant "to trade," and RV reads "traded." (2) From sēbar, "to go about," was derived a designation of "merchants" (RV) (Ezk 27 21). (3) ērakh (Ezk 27 9) signifies "to exchange" (ERV and AV)B, but AV "deal in"). (4) ēsah (Ex 28 24) means simply "to use" (RV), and the same word in Jgs 16 11, with ἐκ ἐκ ἐκ ("work") added, signifies that work had been done (RV). (5) In 1 Cor 14 16, "occupy," the AV rendering of ἐκαταλέθησαν, would still be as intelligible to most as RV "fill"; (6) "Occupy" in Ho 13 9, in the sense of "being taken up with a thing," is the tr (both AV and RV) of periπατεῖν, lit. "to walk." Finally (7) pragmateuein (Lk 19 13) is rendered in AV "occupy" in its obsolete sense of "traded" (RV). OCCURRENCE, o-kur'ënt (AV, ERV, 1 K 5 4): An obsolete form of occurrence "(so ARV). OCCIDENT, ok'i-dënts (Oxîpulos, Ochêlos, B, 'Opîhlos, Oxivâ; AV Ochiel): One of the "captains over thousands" who furnished the Levites with much cattle for Josiah's Passover (1 Esd 1 9) = "Jeiel" of 2 Ch 35 9.

OCHEILUS, ok'i-lûs (Oxîpulos, Ochêlos, B, 'Oxivâ, Oxivâ; AV Ochiel): One of the "captains over thousands" who furnished the Levites with much cattle for Josiah's Passover (1 Esd 1 9) = "Jeiel" of 2 Ch 35 9.

OCHEL, ok'ral (Tiy, "ochêrla), from o'khôr, "trouble"; AV Ocran): The father of Pagiel, the prince of the tribe of Asher (Nu 1 13; 2 27; 7 72; 10 26).

OCHEL, ok'ral, RED (Isa 44 13, "He marketh it out with a pencil," m "red ochre," AV "lime"; Tiy, serôk, a word found only here, and of unknown etymology): Designates the implement used by the carpenter to mark the wood after measuring. "Red ochre" signifies this to have been a crayon (as does "pencil"), but a scratch-awl is quite as likely. Ochre is a clay colored by an iron compound.

OCIDELUS, os-i-del'us, os-i-del'us (A, 'Okeidélos, Okeidêlos, B and Swete, 'Okeilados, Oktalêdos, Fritzsche, 'Okeidélos, Oktalêdos; AV and Fritzsche Ocdelus): One of the priests who married a "strange wife" (1 Esd 3 29); it stands in the place of "Josabad" in Ezr 10 22 of which it is probably a corruption.

OCINA, os-'î-na, os-'î-na (Ocina, Ocin̄): A town on the Phoen coast of Syria, mentioned only in Jth 2 28, in the account of the campaign of Holofernes in Syria. The site is unknown, but from the mention of Sidon and Tyre immediately preceding and Jemmaan, Azotus and Ascalon following, it must have been S. of Tyre. One might conjecture that it was Sandallium (Is- kandera) or Umm al-'Awanid, but there is nothing in the name to suggest such an identification.

OCRAN, ok'ran. See Ochran.

ODED, o'ded ( DriverManager [2 Ch 15], DriverManager [elsewhere], o'dothêk, "restorer"): (1) According to 2 Ch 15 1, he was the father of Azariah who prophesied in the reign of Asa of Judah (c. 918-877), but ver 8 makes Oded himself the prophet. The two verses should agree, so we should probably read in ver 8, "the prophecy of Azariah, the son of Oded, the prophet," or else "the prophecy of Azariah the prophet." See AZARIAH. (2) A prophet of Samaria (2 Ch 28 9) who lived in the reigns of Pekah, king of the Northern Kingdom, and Ahaz, king of Judah. According to 2 Ch 28, Oded protested against the enslavement of the captives which Pekah had brought from Judah and Jerusalem; or on his return from the Syro-Ephraimite attack on the Northern Kingdom (735 BC). In this protest he was joined by some of the chiefs of Ephraim, and the captives were well treated. After those who were naked (i.e. those who had scanty clothing) and the meaning of the word "naked" (in Mk 14 51) had been supplied with clothing from the spoil, and the bruised anointed with oil, the prisoners were escorted to Jericho.

The narrative of ch 28 as a whole does not agree with that of 2 Chr 16 57; 17 14, where the allied armies of Rezin of Damascus and Pekah besieged Jerusalem, but failed to capture it (cf Isa 7 1-17; 8 5-82). As Curtis points out (Chron, 459, where he compares Ex 21 28; Lev 25 29-43; Dt 15 19-23), whereas enslavement of their fellow-countrymen was not allowed to them by the pivotals, and this fact the passage illustrates. It seems to be a fulfillment in spirit of Isa 61 1-2, a portion which Our Lord reads in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4 16-20).

ODES, o'dëz, OF SOLOMON. See APOCRYPHAL LITERATURE.

ODELLAM, o'd-ôl'am (Odelam, Odelam): The Gr form of ADELLAM (q.v.), found only in 2 Mace 12 38.

ODEM, o'd-em (Odomê, Odomê, B, Odamôpôs, Odamôpa, Iuda Odonâ; AV Odonarkes, m Odamarkos): It is not certain whether Odomera was an independent Bedouin chief, perhaps an ally of the Syrians, or an officer of Bacchides. He was defeated by Jonathan in his campaign against Bacchides (1 Mace 9 60) in 156 BC.

ODOR, o'dôr: In the OT the rendering of ἔμφυτος, besom, "fragrance" (2 Ch 16 14; Est 2 12; in Jsr 34 5, RV "burnings"), and of one or two other words; in the NT of ἀπέκτω, ἐσκαλάνω (Jn 12 3; Phil 4 18; Eph 5 2 RV); in Rev 6 8; 18 13, of ἄτυπακα, θηλαμάσα, where RV (with AV in former passage) has "incense." See also Savon.

Of, ov: (1) In Anglo-Saxon, had the meaning "from," "away from" (as the strengthened form "off" has still), and was not used for genitive or possessive relations being expressed by special case-forms. In the Norman period, however, "of" was taken to represent the French de (a use well developed by the time of Chaucer), and in the Elizabethan period both senses of "of" were in common use. But after about 1600 the later force of the word became predominant, and the old Crammer (which is now practically obsolete) it was replaced by other prepositions. In consequence AV (and in some cases RV) contains many uses of "of" that are no longer familiar—most of them, to be sure, causing no difficulty, but there still being a few responsible for real obscurities. (2) Of the uses where "of" signifies "from," the most common obscure passages are those where "of" follows a vb. of hearing. In modern Eng. "hear of" signifies "to hear about" or "to hear of" (cf AV Mk 7 25; Rom 10 11, etc). But more commonly this use of "of" in AV denotes the source from which the information is derived. So Jn 16 15, "all things that I have heard of My Father." Acts 28 22, "We desire to hear of thee." cf 1 These 2 13; 2 Tim 1 13; 2 2, etc (similarly Mt 11 29, "and learn of me"); cf Jn 6 45. All of these are ambiguous and in modern Eng. give a wrong meaning, so that in most cases (but not Mt 11 29 or Acts 28 22) RV substitutes "from." A different example of the same use of "of" is 2 Cor 5 1, "a building of God" (RV "from"). So Mk 9 21, "of a child," means "from childhood" ("from a child," RV, is dubious). A still more obscure passage is Mt 23 25, "full of extortion and excess." "Full of" elsewhere in AV (and even in the immediate context, Mt 23 27 28) refers to the contents, but here the "of" represents the Gr ἐκ, εκ, "out of," and denotes the source—"The contents of your cup and platter have been purchased from the gains of extortion and excess." RV again substitutes "from," with rather awkward results, but the Gr itself is unduly compressed. In Mk 11 8, one of the changes made after AV, RV substituted has related an obscurity for where the el of 1611 read "cut down branches of the trees," the modern edd have "off" (RV "from"). For clear examples of this use of "of," without the obscurities, of Jn 2 21, they went forth of Nineveh; 2 Mac 4 7, they went forth of the sanctuary; and, esp. Mt 21 25, "the baptism of John, whence was it from heaven, or of men?" Here "from" and "of" represent exactly the same Gr prep., and the change in Eng. is arbitrary (RV writes "from" in both cases). The second sense of this use of "of" as "from" was employed rather loosely to connect an act with its source or motive. Such uses are generally clear enough, but the Eng. today seems sometimes rather curious: Mt 13 13, "rejoiceth more of that sheep" (RV "over"); Ps 99 8, "vengeance of their inventions" (so AV); 1 Cor 7 4, "hath not power of her own body" (RV "over"), etc. (4) A very common use of "of" in AV is to designate the agent—a use complicated by the fact that "by" is also employed for the information about the two interchanged freely.

So in Lk 9 7, "all that was done by him . . . it was said of some . . . . . . the two words are used side by side for the same Gr prep. (RV replaces "of" by "by," but follows a different text in the first part of the verse). Again, most of the examples are clear enough, but there are some obscurities.
frequent in the Gospels (Mt 5 29, "if thy right eye offend thee"; 5 30; 16 6; 18 9, "whoso shall offend one of these little ones"; 13 41, 2. NT "all things that offend"; Lk 17 1, "It Usage is impossible but that offences will come," etc; Rom 14 21; 16 17, "Mark them whereof ... offended," 1 Cor 8 13 bis, "if meat make my brother to offend", etc). Skandalon is primarily "a trap-stick" "a bent-stick on which the bait is fastened which the animal strikes against and so springs the trap," hence it connects strongly "to stumble" or "to cause any one to stumble". Thus, it strikes against injuriously (it is LXX for μολέχτην, αὸς τοῦ γαίναι, "a noose" or "a snare", Josh 23 13; 1 S 18 21); "a stumbling-block" (LXX for μικαθήλα, see above). Lev 19 14). For skandalize, skandalon, tr in AV, "offend," "offence," RV gives "cause to stumble," "stumbling-block," etc; thus, Mt 5 29, "if thy right eye cause thee to stumble," i.e. "is an occasion for thy falling into sin"; Mt 16 23, "Thou art a stumbling-block unto me," an occasion of turning aside from the right path; Mt 26 31-33 bis, "offended" is retained, m 33 bis, "Gr caused to stumble" (same word in ver 31); Mk 9 42, "whosoever shall cause one of these little ones that believe on me to stumble," to fall away from the faith, or to fail to make a good showing in the faith; 17 1, "It is impossible but that occasions of stumbling should come; but woe unto him, through whom they come"; in Rom 14 21; 16 17; in 1 Cor 8, Paul's language has the same meaning, and we see how truly he had laid to heart the Saviour's earnest admonitions—"break brethren" with him answering to the master's "little ones who believe"; Rom 14 21. "It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor to do anything whereby thy brother stumbleth," i.e. "is led by your example to do that which he cannot do with a good conscience"; ver 20, "It is evil for that man who eateth with offence [did proskómmänatos], so as to place a stumbling-block before his brother, or, rather, "without the confidence that he is doing right," cf ver 23, "He that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith; and whatsoever is not of faith is sin"; so 1 Cor 8 13; Rom 16 17. "Mark them that are causing the divisions and occasions of stumbling, contrary to the doctrine, [whether they] are supposed to be learned. (Is not it necessary to "teach" of Christ Himself implied here?). Everything that would embolden another to do that which would be wrong for him, or that would turn anyone away from the faith, must be carefully avoided, so as not to put stumbling-blocks in the way of my brother, "for whom Christ died," "giving no occasion of stumbling [proskópeō] in anything" (2 Cor 6 3).

A πρόκλησις, "not causing to stumble," is τρι τι "void of offence" (Acts 5 10, "a conscience void of offence"; 1 Cor 10 32, RV "occasion of stumbling"; Phil 1 10, "void of offence"); ἑμαυτός, "to miss the mark," "to sin," "to err," is "offended" (Acts 2 22); ἐκαμάρτα, "sin," "error" (2 Cor 11 17, RV "Did I commit sin in being a sinner"); ἐντὸς, "to stumble," "fall" (Gen 2 25; 3 2 bis, 3 bis "offend," "offend"); ἐπέτυλος, "a falling aside or away," is "offence" (Rom 4 25; 5 13). In 16 17; in 20, in each case RV "trespass"; ἀδίκητος, "to be unrighteous" (Acts 31 11, RV "wrong-doer," AV "offender"). In Apoc we have "offence" (skandalon, Jth 12 2). RV "I will not cast thereof, lest there be occasion of stumbling," "offend" (Rom 1 1, RV "sinned") (2 Cor 11 15, RV "offended") (skandalize, 32 25, RV, "stumble").

OFFER, of'er, OFFERING, of'er-ing. See SACRIFICE.

OFFICE, of': In the OT the word is often used in periphrastic renderings, e.g. "minister ... in the priest's office," lit. act as priest (Ex 28 1, etc); "do the office of a midwife," lit. cause or help to give birth (Ex 1 16). But the word is also used as a rendering of different Heb words, e.g. גָּדוֹל, "pedestal," "place" (Gen 40 13, AV "place"); 41 13); חֲבֹד, "abhaddith, "labor," "work" (1 Ch 6 32); חֹשֵׁב, "think," "oversight," "charge" (Ps 109 8); תֹּמֶם, ma'ūmād, lit. "standing," e.g. waiting at table (1 Ch 23 28); דְּבַל, mish-mär, "charge," observance or service of the temple (Neh 13 14 AV).

Similarly in the NT the word the is used in periphrastic renderings, e.g. priest's office (Lk 1 8 9); office of a deacon (διακονία, διακονία, 1 Tim 3 10); office of a bishop (ἐπίσκοπος, εἰπισκόπος, 1 Tim 3 1); RV uses other renderings, e.g. "ministry" (Rom 11 13); "serve as deacons" (1 Tim 2 9). In Acts 20 12, RV has "office" (m "overseership") for AV "bishoprick." T. LEWIS

OFFICER, of'i-ser: In AV the term is employed to render different words denoting various officials, domestic, civil and military, such as, כְּנֶסֶת, "eunuch," "minister of state" (Gen 37 36); יֶעָן, "minister in charge," "overseer" (Gen 41 34); דָּבָא, דְבָא, "eunuch," "stationed," "garrison," "prefect" (1 K 4 19); נַשְׁרֵה, נַשְׂרֵה, "scribe" or "secretary" (perhaps arrange or organizer), then any official or overseers. In Est 9 3 for AV "officers" of the king, RV has "more literally" "they that did the king's business."

In the NT "officer" generally corresponds to the Gr word ἱπποτής, ὑπόπτης, "servant," or any person in the employ of another. In Mt 25 the term evidently means "bailiff" or exactor of the fine imposed by the magistrate, and corresponds to πρόκρισις, πρόκτηρ, used in Lk 12 58. T. LEWIS

OFFICES OF CHRIST. See Christ, OFFICES OF.

OFFSCOURING, of' skour-ing: This strong and expressive word occurs only once in the OT and once in the NT. The weeping prophet uses it as he looks upon his erstwhile fair and holy city, despoiled, defiled, derided by the profane, the enemies of God and of His people (Lam 3 45, ἄνθρωπος, ἄνθρωπος). The favored people, whose city lies in heaps and is patrolled by the heathen, are hailed and held up as the scrappings, the offscouring, the offal of the earth. They who were once exalted were cut down to the dust, carried away to be the slaves of licentious idolaters. The haughty, cruel, cutting boastfulness of the victors covered Israel with contumely.

In 1 Cor 4 13 the greatest of the apostles reminds the prosperous and self-satisfied Corinthians that they, the apostles, were "made as the filth of the world, the offscouring of all things". In such contempt were they held by the unbelieving world and by false apostles. The strange, strong word (πρόκλησις, πεπρόκλητος) should remind us what it cost in former times to be a true servant of Christ. G. H. GERBERING

OFFSPRING, of'spring. See CHILDREN.

OFTEN, of ten (πάντοπα, παύνον, "thick," "close"): An archaic usage for "frequent": "Thine often infirmities" (1 Tim 5 23); cf "by often rumination" (Shakespeare, As You Like It, IV, i, 18); "The often round" (Ben Jonson, The Forest, III); "Of wounds... a broken limb—an often chance" (Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette).

OG (אָג, ὄγ): King of Bashan, whose territory, embracing 60 cities, was conquered by Moses and the Israelites immediately after the conquest of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Nu 21

Oil, Oil

Oil, oil (έκρ, σκυμην; ἀλαος, ἀλαον): 1. Terms

2. Production and Storage

3. Uses

4. Figurative Uses

Shemen, lit. “fat,” corresponds to the common Arabic szemun of similar meaning, although now applied to boiled butter fat. Another

1. Terms

Heb word, sayith (זית), “olive,” occurs with shemen in several passages (Ex 27 20; 30 24; Lev 24 2). The corresponding Arab. zaat, a contraction of zayith, which is the name for the olive tree as well as the fruit, is now applied to oils in general, to distinguish them from solid fats. Zeit usually means olive oil, unless some qualifying name indicates another oil. A corresponding use was made of shemen, and the oil referred to so many times in the Bible was olive oil (except Est 2 13). Compare this with the Gr. ἀλαος (alaos), “oil,” a neuter noun from ἀλας, elas, “olive,” the origin of the Eng. word “oil.” ἀλαος, yishar, lit. “glistening,” which occurs less frequently, is used possibly because of the light-giving quality of olive oil, or it may have been used to indicate fresh oil, as the clean, newly pressed oil is bright. ἰσμα, ms'kah, a Chald word, occurs twice: Ezr 6 9; 7 22. ἀλαος, ἀλαον, is the NT term.

Olive oil has been obtained, from the earliest times, by pressing the fruit in such a way as to filter out the oil and other liquids from the residue. The Scripture references correspond so nearly to the methods practised in Syria up to the present time, and the presses uncovered by excavators at such sites as Gezer substantiate so well the similarity of these methods, that a description of the oil presses and modes of expression still being employed in Syria will be equally true of those in use in early Israelitish times.

The olives to yield the greatest amount of oil are allowed to ripen, although some oil is extracted from the green fruit. As the olive ripens it turns black. The fruit begins to fall from the trees in September, but the main crop is gathered after the first rains in November. The olives which have not fallen naturally or have not been blown off by the storms are beaten from the trees with long poles (cf Dt 24 20). The fruit is gathered from the ground into baskets and carried on the heads of the women, or on donkeys to the houses or oil presses. Those carried to the houses are preserved for eating. Those carried to the presses are piled in heaps until fermentation begins. This breaks down the oil cells and causes a more abundant flow of oil. The fruit thus softened may be trod out with the feet (Mic 6 15) which is now seldom practised or crushed in a handmill. Such a mill was uncovered at Gezer beside an oil press. Stone mortars with wooden pestles are also used. Any of these methods crushes the fruit, leaving only the stone unbroken, and yields a purer oil (Ex 27 20). The method now generally practised of crushing the fruit and kernels with an edgerunner mill probably dates from Rom times. These mills are of crude construction. The stones are cut from native limestone and are turned by horses or mules. Remains of huge stone of this type are found in old Rom presses in Mt. Lebanon and other districts.

The second step in the preparation of the oil is the expression. In districts where the olives are plentiful and there is no commercial demand for the oil, the householders crush the fruit in a mortar, mix the crushed mass with water, and after the solid portions have had time to settle, the pure sweet oil is skimmed from the surface of the water.

This method gives a delicious oil, but is wasteful. This is no doubt the beaten oil referred to in connection with religious ceremonies (Ex 27:22). Usually the crushed fruit is spread in portions on mats of reeds or goats’ hair, the corners of which are folded over the mass, and the packets thus formed are piled one upon another between upright supports. These supports were formerly two stone columns or the two sections of a split stone cylinder hollowed out within to receive the mats. Large hollow tree trunks are still similarly used in Syria. A flat stone is next placed on top, and then a heavy log is placed on the pile in such a manner that one end can be fitted into a socket made in a wall or rock in close proximity to the pile. This socket becomes the fulcrum of a large lever of the second class. The lever is worked in the same manner as that used in the wine presses (see WINE PRESS). These presses are now being almost wholly superseded by hydraulic presses. The juice which runs from the press, consisting of oil, extractive matter and water, is conducted to vats or run into jars and allowed to stand until the oil separates. The oil is then drawn off from the surface, or the watery fluid and sediment is drawn away through a hole near the bottom of the jar, leaving the oil in the container. (For the construction of the ancient oil presses see ECONOMIES OF GEN.) Macalister shows how this was done. The oil, after standing for some time to allow further sediment to settle, is stored either in huge earthenware jars holding 100 to 200 gallons, or in underground cisterns (cf 1 Ch 27:28) holding a much larger quantity. Some of these cisterns in Beirut hold several tons of oil each (2 Ch 11:11; 32:28; Neh 13:3; Prov 21:20). In the homes the oil is kept in small earthen jars of various shapes, usually having spouts by which the oil can be easily poured (1 K 17:13; 2 K 4:2). In 1 S 16:13; 1 K 1:39, horns of oil are mentioned.

(1) As a commodity of exchange.—Olive oil when properly made and stored will keep sweet for years, hence was a good form of merchandise to hold. Oil is still sometimes given in payment (1 K 5:11; Ezek 27:17; Hos 12:1; Lk 16:6; Rev 18:13).

(2) As a cosmetic.—From earliest times oil was used as a cosmetic, esp. for oiling the limbs and head. Oil used in this way was usually scented (see OINTMENT). Oil is still used in this manner by the Arabs, principally to keep the skin and scalp soft when traveling in dry desert regions where there is no opportunity to bathe. Sesame oil has replaced olive oil to some extent for this purpose. Homer, Pliny and other early writers mention its use for external application. The oil now used to protect the body against the cold. Many Bib. references indicate the use of oil as a cosmetic (Ex 25:6; Dt 28:40; Ruth 3:3; 2 S 12:20; 14:2; Est 2:12; Ps 23:5; 92:10; 104:15; 141:5; Ezek 16:9; Mic 6:15; Lk 7:46).

(3) As a medicine.—From early Egypt literature down to late Arab. medical works, oil is mentioned as a valuable remedy. Many queer prescriptions contain olive oil as one of their ingredients. The good Samaritan used olive oil mingled with wine to dress the wounds of the man who fell among robbers (Mk 6:13; Lk 10:34).

(4) As a food.—Olive oil replaces butter to a large extent in the diet of the people of the Mediterranean countries. In Bible lands food is fried in it, it is added to stews, and is poured over boiled vegetables, such as beans, peas and lentils, and over salads, sorb milk, cheese and other foods as a dressing. A cake is prepared from ordinary bread dough which is smeared with oil and sprinkled with herbs before baking (Lev 5:5). At times of fasting the Oriental Christians use only vegetable oil, especially olive oil, for cooking. For Bib. references to the use of oil as food see Nu 11:8; Dtt 7:13; 14:23; 32:13; 1 K 17:12-14; 2 K 4:267; 1 Ch 12:40; 2 Ch 2:10-15; Ez 3:7; Prov 21:17; Ezek 16:13-18; Hos 2:22; Hag 2:22: Rev 21:26.

(5) As an illuminant.—Olive oil until recent years was universally used for lighting purposes (see LAMP). In Pal are many houses where a most primitive form of lamp similar to those employed by the Israelites is still in use. The prejudice in favor of the exclusive use of olive oil for lighting holy places is disappearing. Formerly any other illuminant was forbidden (cf Ex 25:6; 27:20; 35:8-14:25; 39:37; Mt 26:3-4:8).

(6) In religious rites.—(a) Consecration of officials or sacred things (Gen 28:15; 35:14; Ex 29:21; Lev 21:1; Nu 4:9; 1 S 10:1; 16:13; 2 S 1:21; 1 K 1:39; 2 K 9:13; Ps 89:20). This was adopted by the early Christians in their ceremonies (Jas 5:11), and is still used in the consecration of crowned rulers and church dignitaries.

(b) Offerings, votive and otherwise: The custom of making offerings of oil to holy places still survives in oriental religions. One may see burning before the shrines along a Syrian roadside or in the churches, small lamps or oil jugs with the supply of oil and oil pious adherents. In Israelitish times oil was used in the meal offering, in the consecration offerings, offerings of purification from leprosy, etc. (Ex 29:2; 40:9ff; Lev 2:2ff; Nu 4:9ff; Dt 18:4; 1 Ch 9:29; 2 Ch 31:5; Neh 10:37-39; 13:5; 12:8; Ezek 18:12; 46:46; Mic 6:7). (c) In connection with the burial of the dead: Egyptians pray to mention this use. In the OT no direct mention is made of the custom. Jesus referred to it in connection with His own burial (Mt 26:12; Mk 14:8-9; Lk 23:56; Jn 12:3-8; 18:40).

Abundant oil was a figure of general prosperity (Dt 32:13; 33:21; 2 K 18:22; Job 29:6; Joel 2:19-21). LANQUISHING of the oil indicated general famine (Jn 2:10; 11:38). Oil is still used as a symbol of the oil of joy (Isa 61:3), or the oil of gladness (Ps 46:7; He 1:9). Ezekiel prophesies that the rivers shall run like oil, i.e. become viscous (Ezek 32:14). Words of deceit are softer than oil (Ps 55:21; 34:12). Cursing becomes a habit with the wicked as readily as oil seaks into stones (Ps 109:18). Excessive use of oil indicates wastefulness (Prov 21:17), while the saving of it is a characteristic of the wise (Prov 21:20). Oil was carried into Egypt, i.e. a treaty was made with that country (Hos 12 1).

OIL, ANOINTING (αἵματα ἄρα, shemen hamishkah): This holy oil, the composition of which is described in Ex 30 22-33, was designed for use in the anointing of the tabernacle, its furniture and vessels, the altar and laver, and the priest, that being thus consecrated, they might be "most holy." It was to be "a holy anointing oil" unto Jehovah throughout all generations (ver 31). On its uses, see Ex 37 29; Lev 8 12; 10 7; 21 10. The care of this holy oil was subsequently entrusted to Eleazar (Nu 4 16); in later times, it seems to have been prepared by the sons of the priests (1 Ch 9 30). There is a figurative allusion to the oil on Aaron's head in Ps 133 2. See OIL; ANOINTING.

OIL TREE, oil tre (αἵματα τοῦ φώκα, 'ēc shemen [Isa 41 19], m "oileaster," in Neh 8 15, tr"wild olive," AV "pine"; τοῦ φώκατοῦ, 'ēc shemen, in 1 K 6 33 31 32, tr"olive wood"): The name "oileaster" used to be applied to the wild olive, but now belongs to another plant, the silver-berry, Elaeagnus hortensis (N.O. Elaeagnaceae), known in Arabic as Zeraizan. It is a pretty shrub with sweet-smelling white flowers and silver-grey-green leaves. It is difficult to see how all three references can apply to this tree; it will suit the first two, but this small shrub would never supply wood for carpentry work such as that mentioned in 1 K, hence the tr"oil wood." On the other hand, in the reference in Neh 8 15, olive branches are mentioned just before, so the tr"wild olive" (the difference being too slight) is improbable. Post suggests the tr of φώκα as horlenesis by PINE (q.v.), which if accepted would suit all the requirements.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

OINTMENT, oint'ment: The present use of the word "ointment" is to designate a thick unguent of buttery or tallow-like consistency. AV in frequent instances translates shemen or mishkah (see Ex 30 25) "ointment" where a perfumed oil seemed to be indicated. ARV has consequently substituted the word "oil" in most of the passages. Mishkah is rendered "ointment" once in the OT (Job 41 31 [Heb 41 23]). The well-known power of oils and fats to absorb odors was made use of by the ancient perfumers. The composition of the holy anointing oil used in the tabernacle worship is mentioned in Ex 30 23-25. Olive oil formed the base. That was scented with "flowing myrrh ... sweet cinnamon ... sweet calamus and ... cassia." The oil was probably mixed with the above ingredients added in a powdered form and heated until the oil had absorbed their odors and then allowed to stand until the insoluble matter settled, when the oil could be decanted. Olive oil, being a non-drying oil which does not thicken readily, yielded an ointment of oily consistency. This is indicated by Ps 150 1, where it says that the precious oil ran down on Aaron's beard and on the collar of his outer garment. Anyone attempting to make the holy anointing oil would be cut off from his people (Ex 30 33). The scented oils or ointments were kept in jars or vials (not boxes) made of alabaster. These jars are frequently found as part of the equipment of ancient tombs.

The word tr"ointments" in the NT is ἀρθρον, muron, "myrrh." This would indicate that myrrh, an aromatic gum resin, was the substance commonly added to the oil to give it odor. In Lk 7 46 both kinds of oil are mentioned, and the verse might be paraphrased thus: My head with common oil didst not anoint; but she hath anointed my feet with costly scented oil.

OLD MAN (عالج, palatios, "old," "ancient"): A term thrice used by Paul (Ro 6 5; Eph 4 22; Col 3 9) to signify the unrenewed man, the natural man in the corruption of sin, i.e. sinful human nature before conversion and regeneration. It is theoretically synonymous with "flesh" (Rom 8 5-9), which means, not for bodily organism, but for the whole nature of man (body and soul) turned away from God and devoted to self and earthly things.

The old man is "in the flesh": the new man "in the Spirit." In the former "the works of the flesh" (Gal 5 19-21) are manifest; in the latter "the fruit of the Spirit" (vs 22-23). One is "corrupt according to the deceitful lusts"; the other "created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph 4 22-24 AV).

OLD PROPHET, THE (α'ευθύς ώς, nábáb' 'ēdah z̄êkâ, "an old prophet" [1 K 13 11], Nâbâb' ha-nâbâb' ha-z̄êkâ, "the old

1. The prophet" [ver 29]): The narrative of Narrative I K 13 11-32, in which the old prophet is mentioned, is part of a larger account telling of a visit paid by Bethel by "a man of God" from Judah. The Judaecon prophet uttered a curse upon the altar erected there by Jeroboam 1. When the king attempted to use force against him, the prophet was saved from the king's power by Elisha, and the king then invited him to receive royal hospitality, but he refused because of a command of God to him not to eat or drink there. The Judaecon then departed (vs 1-10). An old prophet who lived in Bethel heard of the stranger's words, and went after him and offered him hospitality. This offer too was refused. But when the old prophet resorted to falsehood and pleaded a Divine command on the subject, the Judaecon returned with him. While at table the old prophet is given a message to declare that death will follow the southerner's disobedience to the first command. A lion kills him on his way home. The old prophet hears of the death and explains it as due to disobedience to God; he then buries the dead body in his own grave and expresses a wish that he also at death should be buried in the same sepulcher.

There are several difficulties in the text. In ver 11, AV reads "his sons came" instead of "one of his sons came." And in tr ver 12o: "And his sons showed the way the man of God went." There is a gap in the MT after the word "tahal" in ver 20; and ver 24 should be tr"And it came to pass after he had eaten bread and drunk water, that he saddled for himself the ass, and departed from him (following LXX, B with W. B. Stevenson, H.D.B. III, 594a, n.).
Benzinger ("Die Bücher der Könige," Kurz. Hand-Komm. zum AT, 91) holds that we have here an example of a midrash, i.e. according to LOT, 529, "an imaginative development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, esp. a didactic or homiletic form or an exalting religious story." 2 Ch 24:27 refers to a "midrash of the book of the kings," and 2 Ch 13:22 to a "midrash of the prophet Iddo." In 2 Ch 9:29 we have a reference to "the visions of Iddo the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat." Jo 1:1 names the Judean prophet Jadon (Ant., VIII, viii, 5), and so some would trace this narrative to the midrash of Iddo, which would be a late Jewish work. There is a trace of late Heb in ver 3, and evidence in several places of a later editing of the original narrative. Kittel and Benzinger think it possible that the section may be based on a historical incident. If the narrative is historical in the main, the mention of Josiah by name in ver 2 may be a later insertion; if not historical, the prophecy there is ex eventu, and the whole section a midrash on 2 K 22:13-20.

(1) Several questions are suggested by the narrative, but in putting as well as in answering these questions, it must be remembered that the old prophet himself, as has been pointed out, is not the chief character of the piece. Hence it is a little pointless to ask what became of the old prophet, or whether he was not punished for his falsehood. The passage should be studied, like the parables of Jesus, with an eye on the great central truth, which is, here, that God punishes disobedience even in "a man of God." It is not inconsistent with this to regard the old prophet as an example of "Satan fashioning himself into an angel of light" (2 Cor 11:14), or of the beast which "had two heads like unto a lamb" (Rev 13:11).

(2) It must also be remembered that the false prophets of the OT are called prophets in spite of their false prophecies. So here the old prophet in spite of his former lie is given a Divine message to declare that death will follow the other's disobedience.

(3) One other question suggests itself, and demands an answer. Why did the old prophet make the request that at death he should be buried in the same grave as the Judean (ver 31)? The answer is implied in ver 32, and is more fully given below (2 K 23:15-20), where King Josiah defiles the graves of the prophets at Bethel. On seeing a "monumental stone by the face of the grave," he inquires what it is, and is told that it marks the grave of the prophet from Judah. Thereupon he orders that his be buried not disturbed. With these the bones of the old prophet escape. Perhaps no clearer instance of a certain kind of meanness exists in the OT. The very man who has been the cause of another's downfall and ruin is base enough to plan his own escape under cover of the virtues of his victim. And the parallels in modern life are many.

OLIVE TREE, ol'iv trē (G735, zāyith, a word occurring also in Aram., Ethiopic and Arab.; in the last it means "olive oil," and zādan, "the olive tree"). Aa'α, ol'ain): The olive tree has all through history been one of the most characteristic, most valued and most useful of trees in Pal. 1. The Olive Tree is the king of the trees (Job 9:8-9). When the children of Israel came to the land they acquired olive trees which they planted not (Dt 6:11; cf Josh 24:13). The cultivation of the olive goes back to the earliest times in Canaan. The frequent reference in the Bible to evidence (see 4 below) from archaeology and the important place the product of this tree has held in the economy of the inhabitants of Syria make it highly probable that this land is the actual home of the cultivated olive. The wild olive is indigenous there. The most fruitful trees are the product of bare and rocky ground (cf Dt 33:13) situated preferably at no great distance from the sea. The terraced hills of Pal, where the earth lies never many inches above the limestone rocks, the long rainless summer of unbroken sunshine, and the heavy "dews" of the autumn afford conditions which are extraordinarily favorable to at least the indigenous olive.

The olive, Olea Europaea (N.O. Oleaceae), is a slow-growing tree, requiring years of patient labor before reaching full fruitfulness. Its growth implies a certain degree of settlement and peace, for a hostile army can in a few days destroy the patient work of two generations. Possibly this may have something to do with its being the emblem of peace. Enemies of a village who for revenge may carry out revenge by cutting away a ring of bark from the trunks of the olives, thus killing the trees in a few months. The beauty of this tree is referred to in Jer 11:16; Hos 14:6, and its fruitfulness in Ps 128:3. The characteristic olive-green of its foliage, frosted silver below and the twisted and gnarled trunks—often hollow in the center—are some of the most picturesque and constant signs of settled habitations. In some parts of the land large plantations occur: the famous olive grove near Beirût is 6 miles square; there are also fine, ancient trees in great numbers near Bethlehem.

In starting an oliveyard the fellah not infrequently plants young wild olive trees which grow plentifully over many parts of the land, or he may grow from cuttings. When the young trees are 8 years old they are grafted from a choice stock and after another three or four years they may commence to bear fruit, but they take quite a decade more before reaching full fruitition. Much attention is, however, required. The soil around the trees must be frequently plowed and broken up; water must be conducted to the roots from the earliest rain, and the soil must be freely enriched with a kind of manure known in Arab. as khawdūrāh. If neglected, the older trees soon send up a great many shoots from the roots all around the parent stem (perhaps the idea in Ps 128 3); these must be pruned away, although, should the parent stem decay, some of these may be capable of taking its place. Being, however, from the root, below the original point of grafting, they are of the wild olive type—with smaller, stiffer leaves and prickly stem—and need grafting before they are of use. The olive tree furnishes a wood valuable for many forms of carpentry, and in modern Pal is extensively burnt as fuel.

The olive is in flower about May; it produces clusters of small white flowers, springing from the axile of the leaves, which fall as showers to the ground (Job 15 33).

2. The Fruit

The first olives mature as early as September in some places, but, in the mountain districts, the olive harvest is not till November or even December. Much of the earliest fruit falls to the ground and is left by the owner ungathered until the harvest. The trees are beaten with long sticks (Dt 24 20), the young folks often climbing into the branches to reach the highest fruit, while the women and older girls gather up the fruit from the ground. The immature fruit left after such an ingathering is described graphically in Isa 17 6: "There shall be left therein gleanings, as the shaking [in "beating"] of an olive-tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough, four or five in the outmost branches of a fruitful tree." Such gleanings belonged to the poor (Dt 24 20), as is the case today. Modern villages in Pal allow the poor of even humble homes to glean the olives. The yield of an olive tree is very uncertain; a year of great fruitfulness may be followed by a very scanty crop or by a succession of such.

The olive is an important article of diet in Pal. Some are gathered green and pickled in brine, after slight bruising, and others, the "black" olives, are gathered quite ripe and are either packed in salt or in brine. In both cases the salt modifies the bitter taste. They are eaten with bread.

More important commercially is the oil. This is sometimes extracted in a primitive way by crushing a few berries by hand in the hollow of a stone (cf Ex 27 20), from which a shallow channel runs for the oil. It is an old custom to tread them by foot (Mic 6 15). Oil is obtained

3. Olive Oil

Oil on a larger scale in one of the many varieties of oil mills. The berries are carried in baskets, by donkeys, to the mill, and they are crushed by heavy weights. A better class of oil can be obtained by collecting the first oil to come off separately, but not much attention is given to this in Pal, and usually the berries are crushed, stones and all, by a circular millstone revolving on an upright pivot. A plentiful harvest of oil was looked upon as one of God's blessings (Joc 2 24; 3 13). That the "labor of the olive" should fail was one of the trials to faith in Jch (Hab 3 17). Olive oil is extensively used as food, morsels of bread being dipped into it in eating; also medicinally (Lk 10 3; Jas 5 14). In ancient times it was greatly used for anointing the person (Ps 23 5; Mt 6 17). In Rome's days of luxury it was a common maxim that a long and pleasant life depended upon two fluids—"wine within and oil without." In modern times this use of oil for the person is replaced by the employment of soap, which in Pal is made from olive oil. In all ages this oil has been used for illumination (Mt 25 3).

Comparatively plentiful as olive trees are today in Pal, there is abundant evidence that the cultivation was once much more extensive.

4. Greater Plenty of Olive Trees in Ancient Times

"The countless rock-cut oil-and wine-presses, both within and without the walls of the city [of Gezer], show that the cultivation of the olive and vine was of much greater importance than it is anywhere in Pal today. . . . Excessive taxation has made olive culture unprofitable" ("Gezer Mem," PEF, II, 23). A further evidence of this is seen today in many now deserted sites which are covered with wild olive trees, descendants of large plantations of the cultivated tree which have quite disappeared. Many of these spring from the ancient olive trees scattered over many parts of the land, esp. in Galilee, are sown by the birds. As a rule the wild olive is but a shrub, with small leaves, a stem more or less prickly, and a small, hard drupe without little or no oil. That a wild olive branch should be grafted into a fruitful tree would be a proceeding useless and contrary to Nature (Rom 11 1724). On the mention of "branches of wild olive" in Neh 8 15, see Oil Trees.

Literature

Olivet comes to us through the Vulg Olivetum, “an oliveyard.”

Jos frequently uses the expression “Mount of Olives” (e.g. Ant, VII, ix, 2; XX, viii, 6; BJ, V, ii, 3; xii, 2), but later Jewish

1. Names writings give the name בער, har ha-mischibbith, “Mount of Oil”; this occurs in some MSS in 2 K 23.13, and the common rendering בער, har ha-mischibbith, “Mount of Corruption,” in “destruction,” may possibly be a deliberate alteration (see below). In later ages the Mount was termed “the mountain of lights,” because here there used to be kindled at one time the first beacon light to announce throughout Jewry the appearance of the new moon.

To the natives of Pal today it is usually known as Jebel at Tur (“mount of the elevation,” or “tower”), or, less commonly, as Jebel Tur ez zoit (“mount of the elevation of oil”). The name Jebel ez-zoïtan (“Mount of Olives”) is also well known. Early Arab writers use the term תור Zeit, “Mount of Oil.”

The mountain ridge which lies E. of Jerus leaves the central range near the valley of Shā'phat and runs for about 2 miles due S. After 2. Situation culminating in the mountain mass on which lies the “Church of the Ascension,” it may be considered as giving off two branches: one lower one, which runs S.W., forming the southern side of the Kidron valley, terminating at the Rd of S. S. and another, higher one, which slopes eastward and terminates a little beyond el-Ma'zīleh (modern Bethany). The main ridge is considerably higher than the site of ancient Jerus, and still retains a thick cap of the soft chalky limestone, mixed with flint, known variously as נארי and Karāl, which has been entirely denuded over the Jerus site (see Jerusalem, II, 1). The flints were the cause of a large settlement of paleolithic man which occurred in prehistoric times on the northern end of the ridge, while the soft chalky stone breaks and forms a soil favorable for the cultivation of olives and other trees and shrubs.

The one drawback to arboriculture upon this ridge is the strong northwest wind which permanently bends most trees toward the S.E., but affords the strong olive less, since the quiver less, and the ripening pine. The eastern slopes are more sheltered. In respect of wind the Mount of Olives is far more exposed than the site of old Jerus.

The lofty ridge of Olivet is visible from far, a fact now emphasized by the high Russian tower which can be seen for many scores of miles on the E. of the Jordan. The range presents, from such a point of view particularly, a succession of summits. Taking as the northern limit the dip which is crossed by the ancient Anathoth (Kanád) road, the most northerly summit is that now crowned by the house and garden of Sir John Gray Hill, 2,690 ft. above sea level. This is sometimes incorrectly pointed out as Scopus, which lay farther to the N.W. A second sharp dip in the ridge separates this northern summit from the next, a broad plateau now occupied by the great Kaiserin Augusta Victoria Stiftung and gardens. The road makes a sharp descent into a valley which is traversed from W. to E. by an important and ancient road from Jerus, which runs eastward along the S.W. of the ridge, and this main dip lies the main mass of the mountain, that known characteristically as the Olivet of ecclesiastical tradition. This mass consists of two principal summits and two subsidiary spurs. The northern of the two main summits is that known as Karem es Salyûd, the vineyard of the hunter,” and also as “Galilee,” or, more correctly, as Viri Galilaei (see below, 7). It reaches a height of 2,793 ft. above the Mediterranean and is separated from the southern summit by a narrow neck traversed today by the carriage road. The southern summit, of practically the same elevation, is the traditional “Mount of the Ascension,” and for several years has been distinguished by a lofty, though somewhat imartistic, tower erected by the Russians. The two subsidiary spurs referred to are: (1) a somewhat indistinct ridge running S.E., upon which lies the squall village of el-'Azareyeh—Bethany; (2) a small spur running S., covered with grass, which is known as “the Prophets,” on account of a remarkable 4th-cent. Christian tomb found there, which is known as “the tomb of the Prophets”—a spot much venerated by modern Jews.

A further extension of the ridge as Batn el Hawa, “the belly of the wind,” or traditionally as “the Mount of Offence” (cf J 11 7; 2 K 23 13), is usually included in the Mount, but, its lower altitude—it is on a level with the temple-platform—and its position S. of the city mark it off as practically a distinct hill. Upon its lower slopes are clustered the houses of Silwan (Siloam).

The notices of the Mount of Olives in the OT are, considering its nearness to Jerus, remarkably scanty.

(1) David fleeing before his rebellious son Absalom (2 S 16 16) crossed the Kidron and “went up by the ascent of the mount of the house of Olives, and wept as he went up,” and Associations he had his head covered, and went barefoot: and all the people that were with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went (ver 30). . . . And it came to pass, that, when David was come to the top of the ascent, where he was wont to worship God, (m), behold, Hushai the Archite came to meet him with his coat rent, and earth upon his head (ver 32).

And when David was a little past the top of the ascent, behold, Ziba the servant of Mephibosheth met him, with a couple of asses saddled, and upon them two hundred loaves of bread, and a hundred clusters of raisins, and a hundred of summer fruits, and a bottle of wine” (16 1).

It is highly probable that David’s route to the wilderness was neither by the much-trodden Anathoth road nor over the summit of this Mount, but by the path running N.E. from the city, which runs between the Viri Galilaei hill and that supporting the German Sanatorium and descends into the wilderness by Wādy er Rândh. See BARURIM.

(2) Ezekiel in a vision (11 22) saw the glory of Jeh go up from the midst of the city and stand “upon the mountain which is on the east side of the city” (cf 43 2). In connection with this the Rabbi Janna records the tradition that the eḥkīnāh I stood 91 years upon Olivet, and preached, saying, “Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near”—a strange story to come from a Jewish source, suggesting some overt reference to Christ.

(3) In Zec 14 4 the prophet sees Jeh in that day stand upon the Mount of Olives, and the Mount of Olives shall be lifted up from the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south.”

In addition to these direct references, Jewish tradition associates with this mount—this “mount of Corruption”—the rite of the red heifer (Nu 19), and many authorities consider that this is also the mount referred to in Neh 8:15, whence the people are directed to fetch olive branches, branches of wild olive, myrtle branches, palm branches and branches of thick trees to make their booths.

It is hardly possible that a spot with such a wide outlook—e.g., the marvelous view of the Jordan valley and Dead Sea to the lands of Ammon and Moab—should have been neglected in the days when Sem religion crowned such spots with their sanctuaries. There is no evidence that there was a "high place" here. In the account of David's flight mention is made of the spot on the summit "where he was wont to worship God" (2 Sam 11:32). This is certainly a reference to a sanctuary, and there are strong reasons for believing that this place may have been Nob (q.v.) (see 1 Sam 21:2; 2 Sam 11:19, 20; Neh 11:32; but esp. Isa 10:32). This last reference seems to imply a site more commanding in its outlook over the ancient city than Ras el Musharif proposed by Driver, one at least as far S. as the Anathoth road, or even that from Wady el Raseebi. But besides this we have the definite statement (1 K 11:7): "Then did Solomon build a high place for Chemosh in the mount that is before [i.e. E. of] Jerusalem, and for Moloch the abomination of the children of Ammon," and the further account that the "high places that were before [E. of] Jerusalem, which were on the right hand [S.] of the mount of corruption [in "destruction"], which Solomon the king of Israel had built for Asherah the abomination of the Sidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of Moab, and for Milcom the abomination of the children of Ammon, did the king [Josiah] defile" (2 K 23:13).

That these high places were somewhere upon what is generally regarded as Mount Olives, seems clear, and the most probable site is the main mass where today the Christian sanctuaries, though Graets and Dean Stanley favor the summit known as Viri Galilaei. It is the recognition of this which has kept alive the Jewish name "Mount of Corruption" for this mount to the day. The term Mons Offensionis, given to the southeastern extension, S. of the city, is merely an ecclesiastical tradition going back to Aqureminius in the 17th cent., which is regarded by Burchard (q.v.) (17 AD).

More important to us are the NT associations of this sacred spot. In those days the mountain must have been far different from its condition today. Titus in his siege of Jerusalem destroyed all the timber and thorns there as elsewhere in the environs, but before this the hillsides must have been clothed with verdure—oliveyards, fig orchards and palm groves, with myrtle and other shrubs. Here in the fresh breezes and among the thick foliage, Jesus, the country-bred Galilean, must gladly have taken Himself from the noise and closeness of the overcrowded city. It is to the Passion Week, with the exception of Jn 8:1, that all the incidents belong which are not mentioned as occurring on the Mount of Olives; while there would be a special reason at this time in the densely packed city, it is probable that on other occasions also Our Lord preferred to stay outside the walls. Bethany would indeed appear to have been His home in Judea as Capernaum was in Galilee. Here we read of Him as staying with Mary and Martha (Lk 10:38-42); again He comes to Bethany from the wilderness road from Jericho for the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11), and later He is at a feast, six days before the Passover, that is, on the house of Simon (Mt 26:6-12; Mk 14:3-9; Jn 12:1-9). The Mount of Olives is expressly mentioned in many of the events of the Passion Week. He approached Jerusalem, "unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount of Olives" (Mk 11:1; Mt 21:1; Lk 19:29); over a shoulder of this mount—very probably by the route of the present Jericho carriage road—He made His triumphal entry to the city (Mt 21; Mk 11; Lk 19), and on this road, when probably the full night of the city first burst into view, He wept over Jerusalem (Lk 19:41). During all that week "every day he was teaching in the temple; and every night he went out, and lodged in the mount that is called Olivet" (Lk 21:37)—the special part of the mount being Bethany (Mt 21:17; Mk 11:11).

It was on the road from Bethany that He gave the sign of the withered fig tree (Lk 19:11-12; Mt 21:19; Mk 11:12-14); and "as he sat on the mount of Olives" (Mt 24:3; Mk 13:3) Jesus gave His memorable sermon with the doomed city lying below Him.

On the lower slopes of Olivet, in the Garden of Gethsemane (q.v.), Jesus endured His agony, the betrayal and arrest, while upon one of its higher points—not, as tradition has it, on the inhabited highest summit, but on the secluded eastern slopes "over against Bethany" (Lk 22:40-52)—He took leave of His disciples (Acts 1:12).

The view of Jesus from the Mount of Olives must ever be one of the most striking impressions which any visitor to Jerus carries away with him. It has been described countless times. It is today a view from Olivet and departed glory compared with that over which Jesus wept. A modern writer with historic imagination has thus graphically sketched the salient features of that sight:

"We are standing on the road from Bethany as it breaks round the Mount of Olives and on looking north-west this is what we see... There spreads a vast stone stage, almost continuous, some 400 yds. N. and S. by 300 E. and W., held up above the Kidron valley by a high and massive wall, from 60 to 150 ft. and more in height, according to the levels of the rock from which it rises. Deep cloisters surround this platform on the inside of the walls... Every gate has its watch and other guards patrol the courts. The crowds, which pour through the south gates upon the platform for the most part keep to the right; the exceptions, turning westward, are excommunicated or in mourning. But the crowd are not all Israelites. Numbers of Gentiles mingle with them; there are costumes and colors from all lands. In the cloisters sit teachers with groups of disciples about them. On the open pavement stand the booths of hawkers and money changers; and from the N. sheep and bullocks are being driven toward the Inner Sanctuary. This lies not in the center of the great platform, but in the northwest corner. It is a separate walled area, magnificent with their 9 gates rising from a narrow terrace at a slight elevation above the platform and the terrace encounpassed by a fence within which none but Israelites may pass, which rises a house like a lion broad in front and narrow behind; . . . From the open porch of this house stone steps descend to a great perpetually smoking and sacrificial altar. . . . Off the N.W. of the Outer Sanctuary a crest (the Augsburg) dominates the valley with lofty towers. Beyond . . . the Upper City rises in curved tiers like a theater, while all the lower slopes to the S. At a distance a few houses, girt by the central wall of the city. Against that crowded background the sanctuary with its high gable gleams white and fresh. But the front of the house, glittering with gold plates, is obscured by a column of smoke rising from the altar and the Feast of Pentecost. This altar is commemorated by the slatters and sacrifices—a splash of red, as our imagination takes it, in the center of the prevailing white. There are bursts of music; singing of psalms, the clash of cymbals and a great blare of trumpets, at which the people in their court in the Inner Sanctuary fall down and worship" (extracts from G. A. Smith's Jerusalem, 11, 518-20).

To the Bible student the NT is the best guide to Olivet; tradition and "sites" only bewilders him. Once the main hilltop was a mass of 7. Churches churches. There was the "Church of and Ecclesiastical the Ascension" to mark the spot whereby tradition (contrary to the Traditions direct statement of Luke) states that the Ascension occurred. Now the site is marked by a small octagonal chapel, built in 1834, which is in the hands of the Moslems. There a "footprint of Christ" is shown in the rock. A large basilica of Helena was built over the place where it was said that Christ taught His disciples. In 1869 the Princess de Latour d'Auvergne, learning that there was a Moslem tradition that this site was at a spot called el Battiiniah south of the summit, here erected a beautiful church known as the Church of the Dormition. And around the courtyard she had the Lord's Prayer inscribed in 32 languages. When the church was in course of erection certain fragments of old walls and mosaics were found, but, in 1911, as a result of a careful excavation of the site, the foundations of a more extensive mass of old buildings, with some beautiful mosaic in the baptism, were revealed in the neighborhood; there is little doubt but that these foundations belonged to the actual Basilica of Helena. It is proposed to rebuild the church.

Mention has been made of the name Viri Galilaei or Galilei as given to the northern summit of the main mass of Olivet. The name "Mount Galilei" appears to have been first given to this hill early in the Christian era. But a third century AD Epiphanius in his work explains the name by the statement that here was a khan where the Galileans lodged who came up to Jerus. In 1620 Quaresmius applies the names "Galilei" and Viri Galilaei to this site and the latter name may be due to its having been the spot where the two angels appeared and addressed the disciples as "Ye men of Galilea" (Acts 1 11). Attempts have been made, without much success, to maintain that this "Galilea" was the original form of the Lord's name of Jacob, for instance to indicate to His disciples as the place of meeting.

The Russian enclosure includes a chapel, a lofty tower—from which a magnificent view is obtainable—a hospice and a pleasant pine grove. Between the Russian buildings to the N. and the Church of the Ascension lies the sqal' village of et Tūr, inhabited by a peculiarly turbulent and rapacious crowd of Moslems, who prey upon the passing pilgrims and do much to spoil the sentiment of a visit to this sacred spot. It is possible it may have had its origin under the name of BETHPHAHAGA.

OLIVET, o'levet. See Olives, Mount of.

OLYMPAS, o'lim-pas ('Olympás, Olimpás): The name of a Rom Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 15). Olympas is an abbreviated form of Olympadouros. The joining in one salutation of the Christians mentioned in ver 15 suggests that they formed by themselves a small community in the earliest Rom Church.

OLYPIUS, o-lipi-us ('Oλυπίου, Olimpios): An epithet of Jupiter or Zeus (q.v.) from Mt. Olympus in Thessaly, where the gods held court presided over by Zeus. Antiochus Epiphanes, "who on God's altars danced," insulted the Jewish religion by dedicating the temple of Jerus to Jupiter Olympius, 108 BC (2 Macc 6 2; 1 Macc 1 54 ff).

OMARUS, o'ma-er-us: AV = RV "Ismaurus" (1 Esd 9 34).

OMAR, o'mar (أَمَارُ, o'mar, connected perhaps with 'umar, "speak"); LXX Ἰσμα'ουλ, Omen, or ὸμῆρος, Omito): Grandson of Esau and son of Eliphaz in Gen 36 11; Jer 1 56; given the title "duke" or "chief" in Gen 36 15.

OMEGA, o'me-ga, o-me'ga, o-me'ga. See ALPHA and OMEGA.

OMENS, o'menz. See AUGURY; DIVINATION.

OMER, o'mēr (אֵמֶרּ, o'mer): A dry measure, the tenth of an ephah, equal to about 73 pints. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

OMNIPOTENCE, om-nip'6-tens: The noun "omnipotence" is not found in the Eng. Bible, nor any noun exactly corresponding to it 1. Terms and Usage The adj. "omnipotent" occurs in Rev 19 6 AV; the Gr for this, παντοτέπτης, παντοκράτωρ, occurs also in 2 Cor 13 18; Rev 1 8; 4 8; 11 17; 15 3; 16 14; 19 13; 21 22 (in all of which AV and RV render "omnipotence"). It is also found frequently in LXX, esp. in the rendering of the Divine names θεόπαθείας and θεόπαθεία, "power", the element of "authority," "sovereignty," "side by side with that of power," makes itself more distinctly felt than it does to the modern meaning of "omnipotence" though it is means to be included in the latter also. Cf further ὁ δύναμεν, ho dunameon, in Lk 1 49.

The formal concept of omnipotence as worked out in theology does not occur in the OT. The substance of the idea is conveyed in 2. Inherent various indirect ways. The notion of strength is inherent in the OT conception of God from the beginning, being already represented in one of the two Divine names inherited by Israel from ancient Sem religion, the name El. According to one etymology it is also inherent in the other, the name Elohim, and in this case the pliform, by bringing out the fulness of God's power, would mark an approach to the idea of omnipotence. See God, NAMES OF.

In the patriarchal religion the conception of might occupies a prominent place, as is indicated by the name characteristic of this period, El Shadday, of Gen 7 1; 28 14; 31 11; 46 4; 48 24; Gen 3 24. Ex 3 3. This name, however, designates the Divine power as standing in the service of His covenant-related to the patriarchs, as transcending Nature and overpowering it in the interests of redemption.

Another Divine name which signifies this attribute is Jehovah, Jehovah. This name, characteristic
It is chiefly through its forms of manifestation that the distinctive quality of the Divine power which renders it omnipotent becomes

5. Forms of apparent. The Divine power operates not merely in single concrete acts, but is comprehensively and intimately to be world

Both in Nature and history, in creation and in redemption, it produces and controls and directs everything that comes to pass. Nothing in the realm of actual or conceivable things is withdrawn from it (Am 9:23; Dn 4:35); even to the minutest and most insignificant cause and effect it extends and masters all details of reality (Mt 10:30; Lk 12:7). There is no accident (1 S 6:9; cf with ver 12; Prov 16:33). It need not operate through second causes; it itself unifies all second causes and makes them what they are.

It is creative power producing its effect through a mere word (Gen 1:3 ff; Dt 8:3; Ps 33:9; Rom 4:17; He 1:3; 11:30). Among the prophets, esp. Isaiah emphasizes this manner of the working of the Divine power in its immediacy and suddenness (Isa 9:6; 17:13; 18:20; 26:14–20). The power of the Messiah is the outgrowth of the triumph of the cause of Jeh (Job 9:5 ff; 9:5 ff; cts 38 and 39; Isa 10:12 ff; 49:6, 7, 8). The power of Messiah is the outgrowth of the triumph of the cause of Jeh (Job 9:5 ff; 9:5 ff; cts 38 and 39; Isa 10:12 ff; 49:6, 7, 8). The power of Messiah is the outgrowth of the triumph of the cause of Jeh (Job 9:5 ff; 9:5 ff; cts 38 and 39; Isa 10:12 ff; 49:6, 7, 8).

The same is true of the processes of history. God sovereignly disposposes, not merely of Israel, but of all other nations, even of the most powerful, e.g., the Assyrians, as His instruments for the accomplishment of His purpose (Am 1–3 3; 9:7; Isa 10:5, 15; 28:2; 45:1; Jer 26:9; 27:6; 43:10). The prophet ascribes to Jeh not merely relatively greater power than to the gods of the nations, but His power extends into the sphere of the nations, and the heathen gods are ignored in the estimate put upon His might (Isa 31:3).

Even more than the sphere of Nature and history, that of redemption reveals the Divine omnipotence, from the point of view of the supernatural and miraculous. Thus Ex 15 celebrates the power of Jeh in the wonders of the exodus. It is God's exclusive prerogative to do wonders (Job 5:9; 9:7; Ps 72:18). All things can be "a new thing" (Nu 16:30; Isa 43:19; Jer 31:22). In the NT the great embodiment of this redemptive omnipotence is the resurrection of believers (Mt 28:29; Mk 16:16) and specifically the resurrection of Christ (Rom 4:14, 25:21:24; 15:20, 3; Is 1:19 ff); but it is evident in the whole process of redemption (Mt 19:26; Mk 10:27; Rom 8:31; Eph 3:7, 20; 1 Pet 5:1; Rev 11:17).

The significance of the idea may be traced along two distinct lines. On the one hand the Divine omnipotence appears as a support of faith. On the other hand it is productive of that specifically religious state of consciousness which Scripture calls "the fear of Jeh." Omnipotence in God is that to which human faith addresses itself. In it lies the ground for assurance that He is able to save, as in His love that He is willing to save (Ps 65:5, 6; 73:18; 118:14–16; Eph 3:20).

As to the other aspect of its significance, the Divine omnipotence in itself, and not merely for soteriological reasons, evokes a specific religious response. This is true, not only of the OT, where the element of the fear of God stands comparatively in the foreground, but remains true also of the NT. Even in Our Lord's teaching the prominence given to the fatherhood and love of God does not preclude that the transcendent majesty of the Divine nature, including omnipotence, is kept in full view and made a potent factor in the cultivation of the religious mind (Mt 6:1). The beauty of Jesus’ teaching on the nature of God consists in this, that He keeps nothing from us, that His loving condescension toward the creature in perfect equilibrium and makes them mutually fructified by each other. Religion is more than the inclusion of God in the general altruistic movement of the human mind; it is a devotion at every point colored by the consciousness of that Divine omnipresence in which God’s omnipresence occupies a foremost place.

GUERRARDUS V OS

OMNIPRESENCE, om-ni-pres’ens: Neither the noun “omnipresence” nor adj. “omnipresent” occurs in Scripture, but the idea that God is everywhere present is throughout presupposed and sometimes explicitly formulated. God’s omnipresence is closely related to His omnipotence and omniscience: that He is everywhere enables Him to act everywhere and to know all things, and, conversely, through omnipotent action and omniscient knowledge He has access to all places and all things. On the other hand, the necessary attribute is but the correlate of the monotheistic conception of God as the Infinite Creator, Preserver and Governor of the universe, immanent in His works as well as transcendent above them.

The philosophical idea of omnipresence is that of exemption from the limitations of space, subjectively as well as objectively; subjectively, in so far as space, which is a necessary form of all created consciousness, is not externally related to His omnipotence and omniscience: that He is everywhere present. Hence the actuality of space-relations in the created world imposes no limit upon the presence and operation of God. This metaphysical conception of transcendence above all space is, of course, foreign to the Bible, which in regard to this, as in regard to the other transcendent attributes, clothes the truth of revelation in the popular language of omnipotence: hence the exemption from the limitations of space in terms and figures derived from space itself. Thus the very term “omnipresence” in its two component parts “everywhere” and “present” contains a double inadequacy of expression, both the notion of “everywhere” and that of “presence” being special concepts. Another point, in regard to which the popular nature of the Scriptural teaching on this subject must be kept in mind, concerns the mode of the Divine omnipresence. In creating the concept philosophically, it is of importance to distinguish between its application to the essence, to the activity, and to the knowledge of God. The Bible does not draw these distinctions in the abstract. Although sometimes it speaks of God’s omnipresence with reference to the pervasive immannece of His being, it frequently contents itself with affirming the universal extent of God’s power and knowledge (Dt 4:39; 10:14; Ps 139:6–16; Prov 15:3; Jer 23:24, 27, Am 9:2).

This observation has given rise to the theories of a mere omnipresence of power or omnipresence by an act of will, as distinct from an omnipresence of presence, on the ground that in this antithetical form such a distinction is foreign to the intent of the biblical statement in question. The writers in these passages content themselves with describing the practical effects of the divine omnipresence, without reflecting upon the difference between this and its ontological aspect: the latter is neither affirmed nor denied. That no denial of the omnipresence of being is intended may be seen from Jer 23:24, where in the latter half of the verse 23 is expressed in terms of omnipresence, while in the latter half the idea finds ontological expression. Similarly, in Ps 139:7 the sense of the verse is the same. As here, so in other passages the presence of God with His being in the space is explained and confirmed (1 K 2:27; 2 Ch 6:6; Isa 66:1; Acts 17:28).

Omnipresence being the correlate of monothelism, the presence of this God in the earlier OT is denied by all those who assign the development of monothelism in the OT religion to a later stage than that of eidos monotheism. It is undoubtedly true that the last of the scribes and religious leaders excluded God’s relation to space: they describe Him as coming and going in this world as a human person. But it does not follow from this that the OT does not receive of God’s being as circumscribed by space. Where such forms of statement occur, not the presence of God in general, but His visible presence in theophany is referred to. If from the local element enters into the description of God, to the limitations of space referred, then one might with equal warrant, on the basis of the physical, sensual elements entering into the representation, impute to the writers the view that the Divine nature is corporeal.

The theophanic form of appearance does not disclose what God is ontologically in Himself, but merely how He chooses to appear as a way of bringing the redemption of His people. It establishes a redemptive and revelatory presence in definite localities, while concomitantly the mind of the writer, detract from the divine omnipresence, which is now confined to one place; the altars built in recognition of it are in patriarchal history erected in several places and considered as each and all offering access to the special presence of God. This is not the case. During the period already during the patriarchal time these theophanies and the altars connected with them are confined to the holy land. This shows that the idea embodied in them has nothing to do with a crude conception of the Deity as a deity remotely circumscribed, but marks the gradual restoration of the gracious presence of God to fallen humanity, the completion of which forms the goal of the whole prophetic and redemptive history. It must be observed that the tabernacle, on Mt. Zion (Nu 10:35; 2:8; 6:4; 2 K 2:15; Ps 3:4; 99:1); in the temple (1 K 8:4). Ps 26:8; 46:5; 46:2; Isa 8:18; Joel 3:16; Am 1:21; in the Holy Land (1 S 26:19; Hos 9:3); in Christ (Jn 1:14; 17:24); in the church (Eph 1:22). Rev 6:11. 1 Cor 3:16; 3:16. Eph 2:21. 21, 11:1. 2 Tim 3:15; He 10:21. 1 Pet 5:2); in the ecclesiastical assembly of His people (Rev 21:3). In the light of the same principle must be interpreted the presence of God in heaven. This also is not a manifestation of an ontological presence, but as a presence of specific redemptive manifestation (1 K 8:16–21; 2 Ch 6:22–46; 6:12). Ps 106:37. There is little to show that such a presence of God elsewhere may be seen from the fact that the two representations, that of God’s self-manifestation in heaven and in the earthly sanctuary, are merely parallel accounts of a comparatively late attainment in the religion of Israel, of which in the pre-prophetic period no trace can as yet be discovered (see Stade, Bibl. Thes. der AT, I, 103, 114). There are, however, a number of passages in the Pentateuch, bearing witness to the early existence of this belief (Gen 11:1–9; 19:24; 21:17; 28:11; 28:12). Jeh comes, according to the account of the period of the law, before the Tabernacle of the earlier period, with the clouds (Ex 14:19; 20:18–19; 23:14–15; Nu 11:23; 12:5). That even in the opinion of the people Jehu’s local presence in an earthly sanctuary need not have excluded Him from heaven follows also from the unhesitating belief in His simultaneous presence in a plurality of sanctuaries. It was nothing more than a circumscribed presence as between sanctuary and sanctuary, it necessary to be thought of as between earth and heaven (of Gunkel, Ges. 157).

Both from a generally religious and from a specifically soteriological point of view the omnipresence of God is of great practical importance.

Significance

SIGNIFICANCE

This concept of a God incomprehensible and unapproachable bears the guaranty that the actual nearness of God in communion with Him may be enjoyed everywhere, even apart from the places hallowed for such purpose by a specific gracious self-manifestation (Ps 139:5–10). In the other respect the Divine omnipresence assures the believer that God is at hand.
OMNISCIENCE, om-nish'ens: The term does not occur in Scripture, either in its nominal or in its adjectival form.

In the OT it is expressed in connection with such words as הָבוֹלָה (hôbôlôâh), את־הדוֹאָמ (ât-hôâôm), צֶבָּה (tsôbah, Job 9:39; also "seeing" and "hearing," "the eye" and "the ear" occur as figures of knowledge of God, as "arm," "hand," "finger," serve to express His power. In the NT are found γνῶσις, γνῶστο, γνῶσις, εἰδώλον, εἰδοκέν, with the same connections.

Scripture everywhere teaches the absolute universality of the Divine knowledge. In the historical books, although there is no abstract formula, and occasional allusions to the cognizance of the doings of man, about the hearing of prayer, the disclosing of the future (1 S 16 7; 23 9-12; 1 K 8 39; 2 Ch 16 9). Explicit affirmation of the principle is made in the Psalter, the Prophets, the hâbûlôh literature, and in the NT. This is due to the increased internalizing of religion, by which its hidden side, to which the Divine omniscience corresponds, receives greater emphasis (Job 26 6; 28 24; 34 22; Ps 139 12; 147 4; Prov 16 3 11; Isa 40 26; Acts 1 24; He 4 13; Rev 2 23).

This absolute universality is affirmed with reference to the various categories that comprise within themselves all that is possible or actual. It extends to God's own being, to all spheres in the created world. God has perfect possession in consciousness of His own being. The unconscious finds no place in Him (Acts 15 18; 1 Jn 1 5). Next to Himself God knows the world in its totality. All the knowledge extends to small as well as to great affairs (Mt 6 8 32; 10 30); to the hidden heart and mind of man as well as to that which is open and manifest (Job 11 11; 34 21; Ps 14 2; 17 26; 33 13-14; Isa 40 26; Acts 1 24; He 4 13; Rev 2 23). It extends to all the divisions of time, the past, present and future alike (Job 14 17; Ps 86 8; Isa 41 22-24; 44 6-8; Jer 1 5; Hos 13 12; Mal 3 16). It embraces that which is contingent from the human viewpoint as well as that which is certain (1 S 23 9-12; Mt 11 22-23).

Scripture brings God's knowledge into connection with His omnipresence, and the clearest expression of this. Omniscience is the MODE OF OMNIPRESENCe (Acts 23 25 f). It is also closely related to Knowledge God's eternity, for the latter makes Him in His knowledge independent of the limitations of time (Isa 40 8-12). God's creative relation to all that exists is represented as underlying His omniscience (Ps 33 15; 97 9; 139 13; Isa 29 15). His all-comprehensive purpose forms the basis of His knowledge of all events and developments (Acts 1 22-27; Am 3 7).

The omniscience of God, however, does not mean that God's knowledge of things is identical with His creation of them, as has been suggested by Augustine and others. The act of creation, while necessarily connected with the knowledge of that which is to be actual, is not identical with such knowledge or with the purpose on which such knowledge rests, for in God, as well as in man, the intellect and the will are distinct faculties. In the last analysis, God's knowledge of the world has its source in His self-knowledge. The world is a revelation of God that is actual or possible in it therefore is a reflection in created form of what exists uncreated in God, and thus the knowledge of the one becomes a reproduction of the knowledge of the other (Acts 17 27; Rom 1 20).

The Divine knowledge of the world also partakes of the quality of the Divine self-knowledge in this respect, that it is never dormant. God does not depend for embracing the multitude and complexity of the existing world on such mental processes as abstraction and generalization.

The Bible nowhere represents Him as attaining to knowledge by reasoning, but everywhere as simply knowing. From what has been said about the immanent sources of the Divine knowledge, it follows that the latter is not a posteriori derived from its objects, as all human knowledge based on experience is, but is exercised without receptivity or dependence. In knowing, as well as in all other activities of His nature, God is sovereign and self-sufficient. He needs not wait upon the things, but draws His knowledge directly from the basis of reality as it lies in Himself. While the two are thus closely connected it is nevertheless of importance to distinguish between God's knowledge of Himself and God's knowledge of the world, and also between His knowledge of the actual and His knowledge of the possible. These distinctions mark off the theistic conception of omniscience from the pantheistic idea regarding God's knowledge of all things as being His life with the world in such a sense as to have no scope of activity beyond it.

Since Scripture includes in the objects of the Divine knowledge also the issue of the exercise of freewill on the part of man, the problem arises, how the contingent character of such decisions and the certainty of the Divine knowledge can coexist. It is true that the knowledge of God and the purpose of the human heart are distinct, and that not the former but the latter determines the certainty of the outcome. Consequently the Divine omniscience in such cases adds or detracts nothing in regard to the certainty of God's foreknowledge. Isa 40 14-15; Jer 17 10; Am 4 13; Lk 16 15; Acts 1 24; 1 Thess 2 4; Rev 2 23. It extends to all the divisions of time, the past, present and future alike (Job 14 17; Ps 86 8; Isa 41 22-24; 44 6-8; Jer 1 5; Hos 13 12; Mal 3 16). It embraces that which is contingent from the human viewpoint as well as that which is certain (1 S 23 9-12; Mt 11 22-23).

The knowledge of the issue must have a fixed point of certainty to terminate upon, if it is to be knowledge at all. These who make the essence of freedom an absolute independence of the acts of man must, therefore, explain this class of events from the scope of the Divine omniscience. But this is contrary to all the testimony of Scripture, which distinctly makes God's absolute knowledge extend to such acts (Acts 2 23).

It has been attempted to construe a peculiar form of the Divine knowledge, which would relate to this class of acts specifically, the so-called scientia media, to be distinguished from the scientia necessaria, which has for its object God Himself, and the scientia libera which terminates upon the certainties of the world, independent of God's absolute omniscience. This scientia media would then be based on God's foresight of the outcome of the free choice of man. It would involve a knowledge of receptivity, a contribution to the sum total of what God knows derived from observation on His part of the world-process. That is to say, it would be knowledge a posteriori in essence, although not in point of fact. Certainly, however, during a knowledge can be possible in God, when the outcome is psychologically undetermined and undeniable. The knowledge could originate no sooner than the determination originates through the free decision of man. It would, therefore, necessarily become a posteriori knowledge in time as well as in essence. The appeal to God's eternity as bringing Him equally near to the future as to the present and enabling Him to see the future decisions of man's free will as though they were present cannot remove this difficulty, for when once the observation and knowledge of God are made dependent on any temporal issue, the Divine eternity itself is thereby virtually denied. Nothing remains but to recognize that God's eternal knowledge of the outcome of the free will choices of man implies that there enters into these choices, notwithstanding their free character, an element of predeterminedness, to which the knowledge of God can attach itself.

The Divine omniscience is most important for the religious life. The very essence of religion as communion with God depends on His

6. Religious all-comprehensive cognizance of the Importance life of man at every moment. Hence it is characteristic of the religions to deny the omniscience of God (Ps 10 11.12; 94 7-9; Isa 29 15; Jer 23 23; Ezek 18 12; 9 9). Esp. along three lines this fundamental religious importance reveals itself: (a) it lends support and comfort when the pious suffer from the misconception and misrepresentation of men; (b) it acts as a deterrent to those tempted by sin, esp. secret sin, and becomes a judging principle to all hypocrisy and false security; (c) it furnishes the source from which man's desire for self-knowledge can obtain satisfaction (Ps 19 12; 51 6; 139 23-24).

GEERHARDUS VOS

OMRI, omri ("ômër," omri; LXX 'AĂµpî; Amri; Assyр "Hûmîr" and "Humriya"):

(1) The 6th king of Northern Israel, and founder of the 11th Dynasty which reigned for nearly 50 years. Omri reigned 12 years, c. 857-876 BC. The historical sources of his reign are contained in 1 K 16 16-29; 2 K 13-15; 2 Sm 8-9; 12, 13-15; 2 Sm 12; and in the published accounts of recent excavations in Samaria. In spite of the brief passage given to Omri in the OT, he was one of the most important of the military kings of Northern Israel.

O. is first mentioned as an officer in the army of Elah, which was engaged in the siege of the Philistine city of Gibbethon. While O. was thus engaged, Zimri, another officer of Elah's army, conspired against the king, whom he assassinated in a drunken debauch, exterminating at the same time the remnant of the house of Baasha. The conspiracy evidently lacked the support of the people, for the report that Zimri had usurped the throne no sooner reached the army at Gibbethon, than the people proclaimed O., the more powerful military leader, king over Israel. O. lost not a moment, but leaving Gibbethon in the hands of the Philis, he marched to Tirzah, which he besieged and captured, while Zimri perished in the flames of the palace to which he had set fire with his own hands (1 K 16 18). O., however, had still another opponent in Tibni the son of Ginath, who laid claim to the throne, and who was supported in his claims by his brother Joram (1 K 16 22 LXX) and by a large number of the people. Civil war followed this rivalry for the throne, which seems to have lasted for a period of 7 years. It is only with vs 23 and 29, vs 23 and 29 before O. gained full control.

O.'s military ability is seen from his choice of Samaria as the royal residence and capital of the Northern Kingdom. This step may have been suggested to O. by his own easy conquest of Tirzah, the former capital. Accordingly, he purchased the hill Shomeron of Shemera for two talents of silver, about $4,352.00 in American money. The conical hill, which rose from the surrounding plain to the height of 400 ft., and on the top of which there was room for a large city, was capable of easy defense. The superior strategic importance of Samaria is evidenced by the sieges it endured repeatedly by the Syrians and Assyrians.

2. The siege was finally taken by Sargon in 722.

Founding: After the siege had lasted for 3 years, of Samaria That the Northern Kingdom endured as long as it did was due largely to the strength of its capital. With the fall of Samaria, the nation fell.

Recent excavations in Samaria under the direction of Harvard University throw new light upon the ancient capital of Israel. The first results were the uncovering of massive foundation walls of a large building, including a stairway 90 ft. wide. This building, which is Rom in architecture, is supposed to have been a temple, the work of Herod. Under this Rom building was recovered a part of a massive Heb structure, believed to be the palace of O. and Abah. During the year 1910 the excavations revealed a building covering 11 acres of ground. Four periods of construction were recognized, which, on archaeological grounds, were tentatively assigned to the reigns of O. and Abah. See SAMARIA and articles by David G. Lyon in Harvard Theological Review, IV, 1911; JBL, V, XXX, Part I, 1911; PEFS, 1911, 79-83.

Concerning O.'s foreign policy the OT is silent beyond a single hint contained in 1 K 20 34. Here we learn that he had to bow before the stronger power of Syria. It is probable that Ben-hadad I besieged Samaria shortly after it was built, for he forced O. to make "streets" in the city for the Syrians. It is probable, too, that at this time Ramoth-gilead was lost to the Syrians. Evidently O. was weakened in his foreign policy at the beginning of his reign by the civil conflict engendered by his accession. However, he showed strength of character in his dealings with foreign powers. At least he regained control over the northern province. Many as we learn from the M S. lines 4-8 tell us that "Omri was king of Israel and afflicted Moab many days because Chemosh was angry with his land. . . . . O. obtained possession of the land of Medeba and dwelt therein during his days and half the days of his son, forty years." O. was the first king of Israel to pay tribute to the Assyrians under their king Assurnasirpal III.
in 876 BC. From the days of Shalmaneser II (860 BC) down to the time of Sargon (722 BC), Northern Israel was known to the Assyrians as “the land of the house of Omri.” On Shalmaneser’s black obelisk, Jehu, who overthrew the dynasty of O., is called J*a*a*b*a*l Hw*m*r, “Jehu son of Omri.” O. entered into an alliance with the Phoenicians by the marriage of his son Ahab to Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians. This may have been done as protection against the powers from the East, and as such would have seemed to be a wise political move, but it was one fraught with evil for Israel.

Although O. laid the foundation of a strong kingdom, he failed to impart to it the vitalizing and rejuvenating force of a healthy spiritual religion. The testimony of 1 K 18:25-26, that he “dealt wickedly” coupled with the reference to “the statutes of Omri” in Mic 6:16, indicates that he may have had a share in substituting foreign religions for the worship of Jeh, and therefore the unfavorable light in which he is regarded is justified. Upon his death, O. was succeeded upon the throne by his son Ahab, to whom was left the task of shaking off the Syrian yoke, and who went beyond his father in making the Phoen influence along with Baalism of prime importance in Israel, thus leading the nation into the paths that hastened its downfall.

(2) A Benjamite, son of Becher (1 Ch 7:8).

(3) A Judahite, descendant of Perez, who lived at Jerus (1 Ch 9:4).

(4) A prince of Issachar in the time of David (1 Ch 27:18).

ON, on ( TREM, 'on; EGYPT ʿan, ʿanā, probably pronounced Aa only, as this is often all that is written, a “stone” or “stone pillars”): Later called Heliopolis. The name On occurs only in Gen 41:45; 50:20. It occurs in one other place in Ex XXI (Ex 11:1), where On is mentioned with Pithom and Raamses as strong cities which the Israelites built. Heb slaves may have worked upon fortifications here, but certainly did not build the city. On is possibly referred to as ʿayyin in Isa 19:18 (see RV, R.V., or “k ake-keaaas”). On may also be mentioned by Jeremiah (43:13) under the name Beth-shemesh. Ezekiel speaks of an Aven ( ת espresso, ʿaavan) (Exk 30:17), where it is mentioned with Babel (Babastis). Aven in this passage is almost certainly the same as On in Gen 41:45; 46:20, as the letters of both words are the same in the Heb. Only the placing of the vowel-points makes any difference. If there is a mistake, it is a mistake of the Massoretes, not of the Heb writer.

There were two Ons in Egypt: one in Upper Egypt, An-nes (Heracleopolis); the other in Lower Egypt, An-Meheet (Bruges, Geogr. On or Isischr., 254, 255, nos. 1217, a, b, 1218, and De- scription referred to in the Bible. It lay about 20 miles N. of the site of Old Memphis, about 10 miles E. of the location of modern Cairo. It has left until this time about 4 sq. miles of ruins within the old walls. Little or nothing remains outside the walls.

On was built at the edge of the desert which has now retrograded to the eastward, the result of the raising of the level of the Nile by sediment from the inundation, and the broadening of the area of infiltration which now carries the water of the Nile that much to the E. The land around On has risen about 10 ft., and the waters of infiltration at the time of lowest Nile are now about the floor-level of the temple.

The history of On is very obscure, yet its very great importance is in no doubt. No clear description of the ancient city or sanctuary has come down to us, but there are so many incidental references, and so much is implied in ancient records, that it stands out as of the very first importance, both as capital and sanctuary. The city comes from the 1st Dynasty, when it was the seat of government, and indeed must have been founded by the 1st Dynasty or have come down to it from pre-historic time. From the IIIId to the Vth Dynasty the seat of government was shifted from On to Memphis, and in the XIlth Dynasty to Diospolis. Throughout these changes On retained its religious importance. It had been the great sanctuary in the time of the Pyramid Texts, the oldest religious texts of Egypt, and judging from the evident great development of the temple of On at the time of the writing of the texts, the city must have antedated them by considerable time (Budge, Hist. of Egypt, II, 53, 54, 105; Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Egypt, chs. i, ii). The myth of Osiris makes even the charge against Set for the murder of Osiris to have been preferred at Heliopolis (Breasted, op. cit., 34). This certainly implies a very great age for the sanctuary at On. It contains a temple of the sun under the name Ra, the sun, and also Atum, the setting sun, or the sun of the Underworld. There was also a Phoenix Hall and a sacred object called a ben, probably a stone, and the origin of the name An, a “stone” or “pillar” (cf Breasted, op. cit., 76, 11, and 71). Though the XIlth Dynasty removed the capital to Diospolis, Useretao I (Scenwret) of that Dynasty erected a great obelisk at On in front of the entrance to the temple. The situation of this obelisk in the temple area indicates that the great temple was already more than a half-mile in length as early as the XIlth Dynasty. The mate of this obelisk on the opposite side of the entrance seems not to have been erected until the XVIIIth Dynasty. Its foundations were discovered in 1912 by Petrie. Some scraps of the granite of the obelisk bear inscriptions of Thothmes III. A great Hyksos wall, also discovered by Petrie in 1912, exactly similar to that of the fortified camp at Tel el-Yahudiyyeh, 4 miles N., makes it quite certain that these usurpers between the Old Empire and the New fortified On as the capital once more. The manifest subserviency of the priests of On in the story of Joseph makes it most probable that the old capital at On had already been subjugated in Joseph's time, and that within this old fortification still existing Joseph ruled as prime minister of Egypt. Merenptah in his 5th year began to fortify On. Sheshonk III called himself "divine prince of Amn," and seems to have made On one of the greatest sanctuaries of his long reign. On still figured in Egypt history in the rebellion against Asurbanipal. The city has been claimed since the Pers invasion of 525 BC. Tradition makes the dwelling-place of Joseph and Mary with the child Jesus, while in Egypt, to have been near Helopolis.

The exploration of On was attempted by Schiaparelli, but was not carried out, and his work has not been published. In 1912 Petrie began a systematic work of excavation which, it is expected, will continue until the whole city has been examined. The only great discovery of the first season was the Hyksos wall of fortification. Its full import can only be determined by the continuance of the exploration.

ON (TN, 'bn; As, Atn): A Reubenite, son of Peleth, who took part with Dathan and Abiram in their revolt against Moses (Nu 16 1).

ONAM, 0'nam (CN, 'dnm, "vigorous"); cf ONAN:
(1) "Son" of Shobal "son" of Seir the Horite (Gen 36 23; 1 Ch 1 40).
(2) "Son" of Jerahmeel by Atarah; perhaps the name is connected with Onan son of Judah (1 Ch 2 26 28).

ONAN, 6'nam (CN, 'dnm, "vigorous"); cf ONAM: A "son" of Judah (Gen 36 4 8 10; 46 12; Nu 26 19; 1 Ch 2 3). The story of the untimely death of Onan implies that two of the ancient clans of Judah early disappeared (Curtis, Chron, 84). See Skinner, Gen 452, where it is pointed out that in Gen 38 11 Judah plainly attributes the death of his sons in some way to Tamar herself. The name is allied to Onam.

ONE, wum. See NUMBER.

ONESIMUS, 6-nes-im-ob (O'nis'mos, Onisimos, lit. "profitable," "helpful" [Col 4 9; Philem ver 10]): Onesimus was a slave (Philem ver 16). 1. With belonging to Philemon who was a Paul in wealthy citizen of Colossae, and a prominent member of the church there. O. was still a heathen when he defrauded his master and ran off from Colossae. He found his way to Rome, where evil men tended to flock as to a common center, as Tacitus tells us they did at that period. In Rome he came into contact with Paul, who was then in his own hired house, in military curia, and died.

What brought him into contact with Paul we do not know. It may have been hunger; it may have been the pang of conscience. He could not forget that his master had been the house where the Christians met in their weekly assemblies for the worship of Christ. Neither could he forget how Philemon had many a time spoken of Paul, to whom he owed his conversion. Now that O. was in Rome—what a strange coincidence—Paul also was in Rome.

The result of their meeting was that O. was converted to Christ, through the instrumentality of the apostle. "Come and take place in the bond, Philem ver 10. His services had been very acceptable to Paul, who would gladly have kept O. with him; but as he could not do this without the knowledge and consent of Philemon, he sent O. back to Colossae to his master there.

At the same time Paul wrote his charge to the Ephesians on other matters, and he intrusted the Ep. to the Col to the joint care of Philemon.

2. Paul's letter to Philemon is addressed to "Theare to the brethren in Colossae, as a "faithful and beloved brother, and to who is one of you," and he goes on to say that Tychicus and O. will make known to them all things that have happened to Paul in Rome. Such a commutation would greatly facilitate O.'s return to Colossae.

But Paul does more. He furnishes O. with a letter written by himself to Philemon. Returning to a city where it was well known that he had been neither a Christian nor even an honest man, he needed someone to vouch for the reality of the change which had taken place in him. And Paul does this for him both in the Ep. to the Col and in that to Philemon.

With what exquisite delicacy is O. introduced! "Receive him, says the apostle, for he is my own very heart" (Philem ver 12). The man whom the Colossians had only known hitherto, if they knew him at all, as a worthless runaway slave, is thus commended to them, as no more a slave but a brother, no more dishonest and faithless but trustworthy; no more an object of contempt but of love" (Lichtfuss, Commentary on Col, 335).

(1) Onesimus profitable.—The apostle accordingly begets Philemon to give O. the same reception as he would rejoice to give to himself. The past history of O. had been such as to belie the meaning of his name. He had not been "profitable"—far from it. But already his consistent conduct in Rome and his willing service to Paul there have changed all that; he has been profitable to Paul, and he will be profitable to Philemon too.

(2) Paul guarantees.—O. had evidently stolen his master's goods before leaving Colossae, but in regard to him he says that if he has defrauded Philemon in anything, he becomes his surety. Philemon can regard Paul's handwriting as a bond guaranteeing payment: "Put that to mine account," are his words, "I will repay it." Had Philemon not been a Christian, and had Paul not written this most beautiful letter, O. might well have been afraid to return. In the Roman empire slaves were constantly crucified for smaller offences than those of which he had been guilty. A thief and a runaway had nothing but torture or death to expect.

(3) The change which Christ makes.—But now under the sway of Christ all is changed. The master who has been defrauded now owns allegiance to Jesus. The letter, which is delivered to him by his slave, is written by a bound "prisoner of Jesus Christ." The slave too is now a brother in Christ, beloved by Paul: surely he will be beloved by Philemon also. Then Paul intimates that he hopes soon to be set free, and then he will come and visit them at Colossae. Will Philemon receive him into his house as his guest?

(4) The result.—It cannot be imagined that this appeal in behalf of O. was in vain. Philemon would do more than Paul asked; and on the apostle's visit to Colossae he would find the warmest welcome, both from Philemon and from Onesimus.

JOHN RUTHERFORD
ONESIPHORUS, ôn-i-sif'ór-us (Ὅνησιφόρος, Onēsiphōros, lit. “profit bringer” [2 Tim 1:16; 4:19]). Onesiphorus was a friend of the apostle Paul, who mentions him twice when writing to Timothy. He was the former of the two passages where his name occurs, his conduct is contrasted with that of Phygellus and Hermogenes and others—all of whom, like O. himself, were of the province of Asia—from whom Paul might well have expected to receive sympathy and help. These persons had “turned away” from him. O. acted in a different way, for “he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; but, when he was in Rome, he sought me diligently, and found me.”

O. was one of the Christians of the church in Ephesus; and the second passage, where his name is found, merely sends a message of greeting from Paul, which Timothy in Ephesus is requested to deliver to “the household of O.” (AV).

O. then had come from Ephesus to Rome. It was to Paul that the church at Ephesus owed its origin, and it was to him therefore that Paul in Rome gratefully remembered these facts. But Paul himself, when arriving at Rome, and learned that Paul was in prison, “very diligently” sought the apostle. To do this, though it was only his duty, involved much personal danger at that particular time. For the persecution, instigated by Nero against the Christians, had raged bitterly; its fury was not yet abated, and this made the profession of the Christian name a matter which involved very great risk of persecution and of death.

Paul was not the man to think lightly of what his Ephesian friend had done. He remembered too, “in how many things he ministered at Ephesus.” And, writing to Timothy, he reminded him that O.'s kindly ministrations at Ephesus were already well known to him, from his residence in Ephesus, and from his position, as minister of the church there. It should be observed that the ministration of O. at Ephesus was not, as AV gives it, “to me,” that is, to Paul himself. “To me” is omitted in RV. What O. had done there was a wide Christian ministry. If kindness; it embraced many things which were too well known—for such is the force of the word—to Timothy to require repetition.

The visits which O. paid to Paul in his Roman prison were intensely “refreshing.” And it was not once or twice that he thus visited the chained prisoner, but he did so oftimes.

Though O. had come to Rome, his household had remained in Ephesus; and a last salutation is sent to them by Paul. He could not write again, as he was nowready to be offered. The Lord in that day, “To me,” it is not clear whether O. was living, or whether he had died, before Paul wrote this ep. Different opinions have been held on the subject.

The way in which Paul refers twice to “the household of O.” (RV “house”[s]) of Onesiphorus,” makes it possible that O. himself had died. If this is so—but certainty is impossible—the apostle’s words in regard to him would be a pious wish, which has nothing in common with the abuses which have gathered round the subject of prayers for the dead, a practice which has no foundation in Scripture.

ONIAES, ôn-i-as (Onias, Onias): There were 3 high priests of the name of Onias, and a 4th Onias who did not become a high priest but was known as the builder of the temple of Leontopolis (Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 3). Only two names of the Onias are mentioned in the Apoc—Onias I and Onias III.

(1) Onias I, according to Jos (Ant, XI, viii, 7), the son of Jaddua and father of Simon the Just (ib, XII, ii, 5; Sir 50), and, according to 1 Macc 12:7-20, a contemporary of Areus (Arius), king of Sparta, who reigned 300-265 BC (Diod. xx.29). This Onias was the recipient of a friendly letter from Areus of Sparta (1 Macc 12:7; see MSS readings here, and 12:20). Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 10) represents this letter as written to Onias III, which is an error, for only two Areus are known, and Areus II reigned about 255 BC and died a child of 8 years (Paus. iii.6.6). The letter—it genuine—exists in two copies (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10, and 1 Macc 12:20 ff) (see Schürer, Hist of the Jewish People, 4th ed., I, 182 and 237).

(2) Onias III, son of Simon II (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10), whom he succeeded, and a contemporary of Seleucus IV and Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc 1:1; 4:7). O. was the father of Onias IV. Onias III was prominent for his godliness and zeal for the law, yet was on such friendly terms with the Seleucids that Seleucus IV Philopator defrayed the cost of the “services of the sacrifices.” He quarreled with Simon the Benjamite, guardian of the temple, about the temple buildings (Gr ἀειδέα). Being unable to get the better of Onias and thirsting for revenge, Simon went to Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, and informed him of the “unvoluntary sums of money” lodged in the treasury of the temple. The governor told the king, and Seleucus dispatched his chancellor, Heliodorus, to remove the money. Onias remonstrated in vain, pleading for the “deposits of widows and orphans.” Heliodorus persisted in the object of his mission. The high priest and the people were in the greatest distress. But when Heliodorus had already entered the temple, “the Sovereign of spirits, and of all authority caused a great appallition,” a horse with a terrible rider accompanied by two strong men, and men who scourged and wounded Heliodorus. At the intercession of Onias, his life was spared. Heliodorus advised the king to send on the same errand any enemy or conspirator whom he wished punished. Simon then slandered Onias, and the jealousy having caused bloodshed between their followers, Onias decided to repair in person to the king to intercede for his country. Apparently before a decision was given, Seleucus was assassinated and Epiphanes succeeded (175 BC). Jason, the brother of Onias, having offered the king larger revenues, secured the priesthood, which he held until he himself was similarly supplanted by Menelaus, Simon’s brother (2 Macc 4:23; Jos, Ant, XII, v, 1, says Jason’s brother). Menelaus, having stolen golden vessels belonging to the temple to meet his promises made to the king, was sharply reproved by Onias. Menelaus took revenge by persecuting Andronicus, the king’s deputy, to entice Onias by false promises of friendship from his sanctuary at Daphne and there cruelly slew him—an act which caused indignation among both the Jews and the Greeks (2 Macc 4:34 ff). Jos (Ant, XII, v, 1) says that “on the death of Onias the high priest, Antiochus gave the high-priesthood to his brother Jesus [Jason],” but the account of 2 Macc given ONIONS, υπάκοα (πράκα, βγάλλειν, κρόμφονον, κρόμμιον), one of the delicacies of Egypt for which the children of Israel pined in the wilderness (Nu 11:5). The onion, Allium cepa (N.O. Liliaceae), is known in Arabic as būqāl and is cultivated all over Syria and Egypt; it appears to be as much a favorite in the Orient today as ever.

ONLY BEGOTTEN, בַּלִּי בָּגַּטְתָ‏ּ (μονογενὴς, μονογενός). Although the Eng. words are found only 6 t in the NT, the Gr word appears 9 t, and often in the LXX. It is used literally of an only child: "the only son of his mother" (Lk 7:12); "an only daughter" (8:42); "mine only child" (9:38); "Isaac . . . his only begotten" (He 11:17). In all other places in the NT it refers to Jesus Christ as "the only begotten Son of God" (Jn 1 14:18; 3:16; 1 Js 4 9). In these passages, too, it might be tā as "the only son of God"; for the emphasis seems to be on His uniqueness, rather than on His sonship, though both ideas are certainly present. He is the son of God in a sense in which no others are. "Monogenēs describes the absolutely unique relation of the Son to the Father in His Divine nature; whereas the term begotten describes the relation of the Risen Christ in His glorified humanity to man" (Westcott on He 1 6). Christ's uniqueness as it appears in the above passages consists of two things: (a) He reveals the Father: "No man hath seen God at any time; but the only begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him" (Jn 1 18). Men therefore behold His glory, "glory as of the only begotten from the Father" (1 14). (b) He is the mediator of salvation: God hath sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him (1 Jn 4 9; Jn 3 16); "He that believeth not [on him] hath been judged already" (Jn 3 18). Other elements in His uniqueness may be gathered from other passages, as His sinlessness, His authority to forgive sins, His unbroken communion with the Father, and His unique knowledge of Him. To say that it is a uniqueness of nature or essence carries thought no farther, for these terms still need definition, and can be defined only in terms of His nature. The term begotten, or begotten of God, and esp. of His intimate union as Son with the Father (see also Begotten; Person of Christ; Son of God).

The reading "God only begotten" in Jn 1 18 RVm, though it has strong textual support, is improbable, and can well be explained as due to orthodox zeal, in opposition to adoptionism. See Grimm-Thayer, Lexicon; Westcott, ad loc.

ONYX, oun's. See ONSO.

ONYCHA, on'-ka (πράκα, σκηνθῆ; cf Arab. ًل، subhāt, "filings," "husks"). "Onycha" is a transliteration of the LXX ὄνυχα, ὄνυχα, acc. of ὄνυξ, o'niks, which means "nail," "hoof," and also "onyx," of Semitic origin. The form "onycha" was perhaps chosen to avoid confusion with "onyx," the stone. The Heb sh'keleth occurs only in Ex 30 34 as an ingredient of the sacred incense. It is supposed to denote the horny operculum found in certain species of marine gastropods, the operculum. The operculum is a disk attached to the upper side of the hinder part of the "foot" of the mollusc. When the animal draws itself into its shell, the hinder part of the foot comes last, and the operculum blocks the exit of the shell. A substance of which may be horny or stony, is absent in some species. The horny opercula when burned emit a peculiar odor, and are still used in combination with other perfumes by the Arab women of Upper Egypt and Nubia. (See Sir S. Baker, The Tribes of Abyssinia, cited by E.B., s.v. "Onycha.")

ONYX, oun'sks, oun'sks. See STONES, Precious.

OPEN, oun'p'n: In the OT represents chiefly פֶּה, pē, "mouth," but also other words, as פַּתָּח, pātāh, "to uncover"; of the opening of the eyes in vision, etc (thus Balsam, Nu 22 31; 24 4; cf Job 33 16; 36 10; Ps 119 18; Jer 32 11 14). In the NT it is used with the usual meaning, e.g., (opening of mouth, eyes, heavens, doors, etc). A peculiar word, παραφίνω, παραθυρωται (lit. to have the neck bent, to be laid bare), is used for "laid open" before God in H 4 13.

OPEN PLACE: (1) The "open place" of Gen 38 14 AV, in which Tamar sat, has come from a misunderstanding of the Heb, the translators having taken בַּפַּתָּח, bāphath, to mean "in an opening publicly," instead of "in an opening [i.e., a gate] of Enaim" (cf Prov 1 21 in the Heb). RV has corrected; see Enaim. (2) In 1 K 22 10 [2 Ch 18 9 RV relates that Ahab and Jehoshaphat sat each on his throne, arrayed in their robes, in an open place in "Heb a threshold-floor," AV "a void place"] at the entrance of the gate of Samaria. The Heb here is awkward, and neither the LXX nor the Syr seems to have read the present text in 1 K 22 10, the former having "in arms," the latter "in all colored garments." Consequently various attempts have been made to emend the text, of which the simplest is the omission of בַּפַּתָּח, "in an open place." If, however, the text is right—as is not improbable—the opening-door floor close to the gate. See the commentaries.

OPERATION, op-ér-a'shun (ποίημα, ma'āshē, "work"); ἐνέργεια, ἐνέργεια, ἐνέργεια, ἐνέργεια, ἐνέργεια, "energy"). Twice used in the OT of God's creative work (Ps 28 4 5; Isa 5 12). The Holy Spirit's "working" and power are manifest in the bestowal of spiritual gifts on individuals and on the church (1 Cor 12 6 AV), and in the resurrection of Jesus Christ, through which energy or operation of God those dead in sins are, through faith, raised to newness of life (Col 2 12 AV).

OPEHLE, oun'fel (ποίημα, ha'-ophel [2 Ch 27 3; 33 14; Neh 3 26; 11 21; and without article, Isa 32 14 and Mic 4 8; also 2 K 5 24]): There has been considerable divergence of opinion with regard to the meaning of the Heb word, with the references given above with the art. 1. Meaning of Name. Opehle has simply "Ophel"; but Ophel is in m "the tower"; in Isa 32 14, "the hill" with m "Ophel," but AV "the fortress" in Mic 4 8; also in the "towers"; Mic 4 8; also in the "Heb" Opel, "but AV "the stronghold"; 2 K 5 24, "the hill," Three places are known to have received this name: (1) A certain place on the east hill of Jerus, S. of the temple; to this all the passages quoted above except one—ref. (2) The "Ophel," tr. "hill," situated apparently in Samaria (cf. 2 K 5 3), where Gehazi took his ill-gotten presents from the hands of the servants of Naaman the Syrian. The tr. "tower" would suit the sense at least as well. It was some point probably in the wall of Samaria, perhaps the citadel itself. (3) The third reference is not Bib., but on the M. S., an inscription ofMesh, king of Moab, contemporary with Omri. He says: "I built KIRIH [Karalah], the wall of y'arim, and the wall of 'Ophel and I built its gates and I built its towers." In comparing the references to (1) and (3), it is evident that if Ophel means a "hill," it certainly was a fortified hill, and it seems highly probable that it may have some official, in addition to its fortifications, e.g. a bulging or rounded keep or encine." (Burney, loc. cit.). Isa 32 14 reads, "The palace shall be forsaken; the populous city shall be desolated; the hill [Ophel] and the watch-tower shall be for duns for ever." Here we have palace, city, and watch-tower, all the handiwork of the builder. Does it not seem probable that the Ophel belongs to the same category?

The situation of the Ophel of Jerusalem is very definitely described. It was clearly, the reference shows that it was 3 26 7 3; 33 14), on the east hill S. of the temple. The Ophel of Jos states (BJ, V, iv, 2) that the Jerusalem eastern wall of the city ran from Siloam "and reaches as far as a certain place which they called Ophlas when it was joined to the eastern cloister of the temple." In BJ, V, vi, 1, it states that "John held the temple and the parts thereto adjoining, for a great way, as also Ophla," and the Valley called the "Valley of the Ophel," which are here identically with the "A dua" and "Lower City," which was called by Simon. There is not the slightest ground for applying the name Ophel, as has been so commonly done, to the whole southeastern hill. In the days of Josiah it was cut from the hill the temple walls, but the OT references suit a locality nearer the middle of the southeastern hill. In the art. Zion (q.v.) it is pointed out that that name does not occur (except in reference to the Jebusite city in the works of the Chronicler, but that the Ophel," which occurs almost alone in these works, is apparently used for it. Mic 4 8 m seems to confirm this view: "O tower of the flock, the Ophel of the daughter of Zion." Here the "tower of the flock" may well refer to the shepherd David's stronghold, and the second name appears to be a synonym for the same place.

Ophel then was probably the fortified site which in earlier days had been known as "Zion" or "the City of David." King Joatham "built much" "on the wall of Ophel" (2 Ch 27 3). King Manasseh fortified the city of David, on the west side of Gihon, in the valley, even to the entrance at the fish gate; and he compassed Ophel about with it, and raised it up to a very great height!" (2 Ch 33 14). It was clearly a fortified place of great importance, and its situation must have been so near that of the ancient "Zion," that scarcely any other theory is possible except that it occupied the site of that ancient fortress.

Ophir, OPHIR, OPHIR (Gen 10 10, 11, 22; [Gen 10 10, 11] [Gen 10 29], 22). The name in order of the sons of Joktan (Gen 10 29 = Ch 1. Scrip. 1 23). There is a clear reference also to the tribe Ophir (Gen 10 30). Ophir is the name of a land or city somewhere to the S. or S.E. of Pal for which Solomon's ships were charged to get out from Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Aka-bah, returning with great stores of gold, precious stones and "almug"-wood (1 K 9 28; 10 11; 2 Ch 9 10; 1 K 22 48; 2 Ch 8 18). We get a fuller list of the wares and also the time taken by the voyage if we assume that the same vessels were referred to in 1 K 10 22, "Once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks." The other products may not have been native to the land of Ophir, but it is certain that the gold at least was produced there. This gold was proverbial for its purity, as is witnessed by many references in the OT (Ps 45 9; Job 28 16; Isa 13 12; 1 Ch 29 4), and in Job 22 24, Ophir is used for fine gold itself. In 2 K 10 28 we are told that the name occurs also in two passages under the form "Uphaz" (Jer 10 9; Dn 10 5).

At all times the geographical position of Ophir has been a subject of dispute, the claims of three different regions being principally advanced, namely (1) India and the Indus, (2) Africa, (3) Arabia.

(1) India and the Far East.—All the wares mentioned are more or less appropriate to India, even including the fuller list of 1 K 10 22. "Almug"-wood is conjectured to be the Indian sandal-wood. Another argument is based on the resemblance between the LXX form of the word (Sopherd) and the Coptic name for India (Sophir). A closer identification is sought with Abhir, a people dwelling at the mouths of the Indus. Supara, an ancient city on the west coast of India near the modern Goa, is also suggested. Again, according to Wildman, the name denotes a vague extension eastward, perhaps as far as China. (2) Africa, day the greatest gold-producing region of the three. Sofala, a seaport near Mozambique on the east coast of Africa, has been advanced as the site of Ophir, both on linguistic grounds and from the nature of its products, for there are signs that the sea is divided. If 10 22 could be procured. But Gesenius shows that Sofala is merely the Arab. form of the Heb saphkâlath. Interest in this region as the land of Ophir was renewed, however, by Mauch's discovery at Zimbabve of great ruins and signs of old Phoen civilization and worked-out gold mines. According to Bruce (I, 440), a voyage from Sofala to Ezion-geber would have occupied quite three years owing to the monsoons.

(3) Arabia.—The claim of Southeastern Arabia as the land of Ophir has on the whole more to support it than that of India or of Africa. The Ophir of Gen 10 29 beyond doubt belonged to this region, and the search for Ophir in more distant lands can be made only on the precarious assumption that the Ophir of K is not the same as the Ophir of Gen 10. Of the Arabian products mentioned, the only one which from the OT notices can be regarded as clearly native to Ophir is the gold, and according to Pbny and Strabo the region of Southeastern Arabia bordering on the Persian Gulf was a famous gold-producing country. The other wares were not necessarily produced in Ophir, but were probably brought them from more distant lands, and thence conveyed by Solomon's merchants to Ezion-geber. If the duration of the voyage (3 years) be used as evidence, it favors this location of Ophir as much as that on the east coast of Africa. It seems therefore the least asssumable view that Ophir was on the Persian Gulf in South eastern Arabia and served in old time as an emporium of trade between the East and West.

OPHNI, of n (יִפּוֹן, hā-ophni; 'Aphni, Aphon): A place in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 23). It is mentioned again in 1 S 13 17. The Philistines came thence to ambush Saul without murdering bands, another eastward, down “the valley of Zeboim toward the wilderness”; the third “turned upon the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual.” The three must have advanced northward, as Saul commanded the passage to the S. Onam places it 5 Rom miles E. of Bethel. A site which comes near to fulfilling these conditions is et-Taybeh, which stands on a conical hill some 5 miles N. E. of Betha. This is possibly identical with “Ephron” (2 Ch 13 19), and “Ephraim” (Jn 11 54).

(2) A city in the tribal lot of Manasseh W. of Jordan. It is mentioned only in connection with Gideon, whose native place it was, and with his son Abimelech (Jgs 6 11, etc). It was, indeed, family property, belonging to Joash the Abiezerite, the father of Gideon. It was apparently not far from the plain of Esdraelon (vs 33 f), so that Gideon and his kinsmen snared under the near presence of the opposing Midianites. Manasseh, of course, as bordering on the southern edge of the plain, was in close touch with the invaders. At Ophrah, Gideon reared his altar to Jeth, and made thorough cleansing of the instruments of idolatry. After his great victory, he set up here the golden moon made from the spoils of the enemy, which proved a snare to himself and to his house (8 27). Here he was finally laid to rest. It was at Ophrah that Abimelech, aspiring to the kingdom, put to death upon one stone three score and ten of his brethren, as possible rivals, Jotham alone escapeing alive (9 5). Apparently the mother of Abimelech belonged to Shechem; this established a relationship with that town, his connection with which does not therefore mean that Ophrah was not it.

To cite satisfactory identification has yet been suggested. Conder (“PEFS, 1876, 197”) quotes the Samaritan Chronicle as identifying Ferata, which is 6 miles W. of Nablus, with an ancient Ophrah, “and the one that suggests itself as most probably identical is Ophrah of the Abiezerite.” But this seems too far to the S.

(3) A man of the tribe of Judah, son of Me onothai (1 Ch 4 14).

OPINION, of pîn’em (יִפּוֹן, dēs, יִפּוֹן, g’ippim): “Opinion” occurs only 5 x, thrice in Job (32 6 10, 17 as the tr of dēs), “knowledge,” “opinion” (in the address of Elihu), and once of g’ippim, from g’daph, “to divide or branch out,” hence division or party, unsettled opinion (in the memorable appeal of Elijah, “How long halt ye between two opinions?”)

1 K 18 21, ARV “How long go ye leaping between the two sides?”). In Ecclus 3 24, we have, “For many are deceived by their own vain opinion” (παραγωγή, “a taking up,” “a hasty judgment”), RV “The conceit of many hath led them astray.”

OPWAYSMUM, op-o-bal’sam-mum: RV in Ex 30 34. See STAGE.

OPPRESSION, o-presh’ən: Used in RV to translate a variety of Heb words, all of which, however, agree in the general sense of wrong done by violence or by law and custom. In some cases it is tantamount to the oppression of Israel by foreigners, as by their Egyptian masters (Ex 3 9; Dt 26 7), or by Syria (2 K 13 4), or by an unmentioned nation (Isa 30 20 AVm). In all these cases the Heb original is מְקוֹם, lāḥaq. But in the vast number of cases the reference is to social oppression of one kind or another within Israel’s own body. It is frequently the theme of psalmist and prophet and wise man. The poor and weak must have suffered greatly at the hands of the stronger and more fortunate. The word lāḥaq, various forms of the מְקוֹם, ʾashak, and other words are used by the writers of the LXX to express their sorrow and indignation over the wrongs of their afflicted brethren. In his own sorrow, Job remembers the suffering of the oppressed (Job 35 9; 36 15); it is a frequent subject of song in the Ps (Ps 12 5; 42 2; 43 2; 124 21; 83 3; 119 34); the preacher observes and reflects upon its prevalence (Eccl 4 1; 5 8; 7 7 AV); the prophets Amos (3 9), Isaiah (6 7; 59 13), Jeremiah (6 6; 22 17) and Ezekiel (22 7 29) thundered against it. It was exercised toward strangers and also toward the Israelites themselves, and was never wholly overcome. In Jas 2 6, “oppress” is the rendering of καταδυνάμεω, καταδύναμον, “to exercise harsh control over one,” “to use one’s power against one.”

WILLIAM JOSEPH McGLOTHLIN

OR, or: The word is used once for either (1 S 26 10), and is still in poetic use in this sense; as in, “Without or wave or wind” (Coleridge); “Or the bakke or some bone he brooketh in his southe” (Piers Plowman [B], VII, 93; cf Merchant of Venice, III ii, 65). It is also used with “or” before (Ps 99; 118 19 AV, etc) and ARV substitutes in Eccl 16 2 (cf vs 12); Cant 6 12; Dan 6 24.

ORACLE, or’ak’l: (1) A Divine utterance delivered to man, usually in answer to a request for guidance. So in 2 S 16 23 for יְבִאֳר, dāḥar (“word,” as in RVm). The use in this passage seems to indicate that at a period early oracular utterances were sought from Jeh by the Israelites, but the practice certainly fell into disuse at the rise of prophecy, and there are no illustrations of the means employed (1 S 13 18 19 36 42, etc, belong rather to divination [q.v.]). In RVm of such passages as Isa 13 1, “oracle” is used in the titles of certain special prophetic sources as a substitute for BUKEN (q.v.) (יִפּוֹן, moad), with considerable advantage (esp. in Lam 2 17 18); in later Jewish temples “oracle” was used for the chamber in which the utterances were delivered (naturally a most sacred part of the structure). This usage, coupled with a mistake in Heb philology (connecting יִפּוֹן, dāḥar, “hinder part,” with יִפּוֹן, “speech”), caused RV to give the title “oracle” to the Most Holy Place of the Temple, in 1 K 5 5, etc, following the example of Aquila, Symmachus and Vulg. But the title is very unfortunate, as the Most Holy Place had nothing to do with the delivery of oracles, and RV should have corrected (cf Ps 28 2).
(3) In the NT EV employs “oracle” as the tr of ἀπόστισις, ἀπώσις, “saying,” in four places. In all, Divine utterances more properly defined in Acts 7 38 as the Mosaic Law (“living oracles” as “commandments enforced by the living God”), in Rom 3 2 as the OT in general, and in He 5 12 as the revelations of Christianity (6 2 3). In 1 Pet 4 11 the meaning is debated, but probably the command is addressed to those favored by a supernatural “gift of speech.” Such men must keep their own personality in the background, adding nothing of their own to the inspired message as it comes to them.

Burton Scott Easton

ORACLES, SIBYLINE, sib’i-lin, -lin. See Apoc-alyptic Literature, V.

ORATOR, or’a-tér, ORATION, or’a-shun: The word “orator” occurs twice: (1) An AV rendering of הַלָּחָשׁ, lahash; only Isa 3 3, “the eloquent orator,” AVs “skilful of speech,” where RV rightly substitutes “the skilful enchanter.” The word lahash is probably a mimetic word meaning “a hiss,” “a whisper,” and is used in the sense of “incantation,” “charm.” (2) Heb לְדַנֵּגֹרֶה (לְדַנֵּגֹרֶה), “to speak in an assembly” (from dām, “people,” agoreuō, “to harangue”), is often found in classical Gr, generally in a bad sense (Lat concinari); here only in the NT.

D. Miall Edwards

ORTHED, or’ch-ərd: (1) ὀρθήδοξος, orĒ-thë-dôks, from Old Pers, “a walled-in enclosure”; ἀπαθέας, parasiteis, a word in classical Gr applied to the garden of Babylon (Diodorus Siculus xi.10) and to a game, “park”; Cant 4 13. (2) as an AV. (3) See Neh 3 5, “forbes,” “park”, Cant 4 13, “orchard,” and in “paradise” (of pomegranates); Ecc 2 5, “parks,” AV “orchards;” see Paradise. (2) κιθέρος, κιθέα, “garden” or “orchard”: AV “a white thorn in an orchard” (Bar 6 71).

ORDAIN, or’dàn, ORDINATION, or’di-na’shun (Lat ordinarium, “to set in order,” “to arrange); in post-Augustan Lat “to appoint to office;” from ordī, gen. ordinēs, “order,” “arrangement.” In Av the VT “to ordain” renders as many as 35 different words (11 Heb words in the OT, 21 Gr words in Apoc and the NT, and 3 Lat words in Apoc). This is due to the fact that the Eng. word has many shades of meaning (esp. as used in the tense AV was made), of which the following are the chief: (1) To set in order, arrange, prepare: “All things that we ordained festival. Turn from their office to black funeral.”—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, IV, v, 84.

This meaning is now obsolete. It is found in AV of Ps 133 17; Isa 50 33; He 9 6 (in each of which case RV or mss substitute “set apart for holiness” (RV “appoint?”); Ps 7 13 (RV “makest?”); Hab 1 12 also RV). (2) To establish, institute, bring into being: “When first this order [i.e. the Garter] was ordained, my Lord (Shakespeare, Son of M K 12 22, “should have been ordained in the month” (ver 33); Nu 28 6; Ps 8 3 23; Isa 26 12; 2 Esd 6 49 AV (RV “preserve”)); Sir 77 15; Gal 3 19. (3) To decree, give orders, prescribe: “And doth the power that man adores Ora(h)in their don’t?”—Byron. So Est 9 27, “The Jews ordained . . . that they would keep these two days according to the writing thereof!” 1 Esd 6 34; 2 Esd 7 17; 8 14 AV; Tob 1 6; 8 7 (RV “compassions”); 1 Mac 4 50; 7 49; Acts 16 4; Rom 7 10 AV; 1 Cor 2 7; 7 17; 9 14; Eph 2 10 AV. (4) To set apart for an office or duty, appoint, destine: “Being ordained his special governor” (Shakespeare). Frequent in EV. When AV has “ordain” in this sense, RV generally substitutes “appoint”; e.g. “He [Jesus] appointed [AV “ordained”] twelve, that they might be with him” (Mk 3 14). So 2 Ch 11 15; Jer 1 5; Dnt 2 24; 1 Esd 8 49; 1 Mac 3 55; 10 20; 15 16; 14 25; 1 Tim 2 7; Tit 1 8; Heb 1 1 3 83; RV substitutes “bestow” (Web 9 2, “recorded” in Sir 48 10, “become” in Acts 1 22, “written of” (in “set forth”) in Jude ver 4, but retains “ordain” in the sense of “appoint,” “set apart,” “ordain” (e.g. K 3 25 5; 1 Ch 27 22; 2 Esd 6 23; Ad Est 13 6; Sir 10 42; 3 13 87 17 31; Rom 13 1. (5) To appoint ceremonially to the ministerial or priestly office, to confer holy orders on. This later technical or ecclesiastical sense is never found in EV. The nearest approach is (4) above, but the idea of formal or ceremonial setting apart to office (prominent in its modern usage) is never implied in the word.

Ordination: The act of arranging in regular order, esp. the act of investing with ministerial or sacerdotal rank (ordō), the setting-apart for an office in the Christian ministry. The word does not occur in EV. The NT throws but little light on the origin of the later ecclesiastical rite of ordination. The 12 disciples were not set apart by any formal act on the part of Jesus. In Mk 3 14; Jn 15 16, the AV rendering “ordain” is, in view of its modern usage, misleading; nothing more is implied than an appointment or election. In Jn 20 21-23, we have indeed a symbolic act of consecration, but the brethren were already “ordained,” “Their act is described as one and not repeated. The gift was once for all, not to individuals but to the abiding body” (Westcott, ad loc.). In the Apostolic age there is no trace of the doctrine of an outward rite conferring inward grace, though the instances of the formal appointment or recognition of those who had already given proof of their spiritual qualification. (1) The Seven were chosen by the brethren as men already “full of the Spirit and of wisdom” and were then “appointed” by the Twelve, who prayed and laid their hands upon them (Acts 6 1-6). (2) The call of Barnabas and Saul came direct from God (Acts 13 2, “the work whereunto I have called them”; ver 4, they were “sent forth by the Holy Spirit”). Yet certain prophets and teachers were instructed by the Holy Spirit to “separate” them (i.e. publicly) for their work, which they did by fasting and praying and laying on of hands (ver 5). But it was utterly foreign to Paul’s point of view to regard the church’s act as constituting him an apostle (of Gal 1 1). (3) Barnabas and Paul are said to have “ordained,” RV “appointed” (χωροθαινεῖν, cheirotoniaste, “elect,” “appoint,” without indicating the particular act of ordination), elders, “priests in every city with prayers and fasting (Acts 14 23). So Titus was instructed by Paul to “appoint elders in every city" in Crete (Tit 1:5). (4) The gift of Timothy for evangelistic work seems to have been formally recognized in two ways: (a) by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery (1 Tim 4:14), (b) by the laying on of hands of Paul (2 Cor 13:12). The words "lay hands hastily on no man" (1 Tim 5:22) do not refer to an act of ordination, but probably to the restoration of the penitent. The reference in Heb 6:2 is not exclusively to ordination, but to all occasions of laying on of hands (see Hand, Imposition of). From the few instances mentioned above (the only ones found in the NT), we infer that it was regarded as advisable that persons holding high office in the church should be publicly recognized in some way, as by laying on of hands, fasting, and public prayer. But no great emphasis was laid on this rite, hence "it can hardly be likely that any essential principle was held to be involved in it." (Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, 216). It was regarded as an outward act of approval, a symbolic offering of intercessory prayer, and an emblem of the solidarity of the Christian community, rather than an indispensable channel of grace for the work of the ministry. (For the historical and theological doctrine of such see E. Dean, Hatch's valuable art. on "Ordination" in The Dict. Christian Antig.).

ORDER, or 7777, "arakh, "to arrange"; τάξις, τάξιν (>diatassōn, táxis, táymal): "Order," in LXX, phrases may indicate (1) arrangement in rows, (2) sequence in time, (3) classification and organization, (4) likeness or manner, (5) regulation, direction or command, or (6) the declaring of a will. In many passages it is difficult if not impossible to determine from the text which sense is next alone in which of these senses the word is used.

The fundamental idea suggested by the Heb, Gr, and Eng. words is that of arrangement in rows. Thus "order" is used in the Bible of arranging wood for an altar (Lev 1:7; 1 K 5:17) in 18:33; cf Heb Gen 22:9; Isa 30:33): Rows of laying out flax-stalks for drying (Josh 2:6); of preparing offerings (Lev 1:8:12; cf. 6:5); Jgs 6:26) of arranging lamps (Ex 27:21; 39:37; Lev 24:3:4); of Ps 19:17); of placing the shewbread on the table (Ex 24:43); Lev 6:12; 24:8; 2 Ch 13:11); of drawing up the battle array (1 Ch 12:38 [Heb 39, 'adhar]); and of arranging weapons in order for battle (Jer 46:3; ARV "prepare"). As "ord," "to order" in the older VSS usually has the obsolete sense "to arrange" and not the more usual Eng. meanings, "to demand" or "to direct." Thus: "In the tent of meeting shall Aaron order it" (Lev 24:4, ARV "keep in order"); "Order ye the buckler and shield" (Jer 46:3; cf. Ps 119:133; Job 24:3, ARV "set in order"); Jth 2:16; Wisd 8:1; 15:1; Ecclus 2:6). The Heb pa'am (lit. "hoof-beat, occurrence," repetition") in the plural conveys the idea of an architectural plan (Ezek 41:6). Another word, shālahh, lit. "to join," in connection with the tabernacle, has in some VSS been trasper as including the idea of orderly arrangement (Ex 26:17). The word "order" standing by itself may mean orderly or proper arrangement (1 Esd 1:10; Wisd 7:29; 1 Macc 6:40; Col 2:5). Akin to the idea of arranging things in a row is that of arranging words (Jb 33:5; 37:19; Ps 5:3), of recounting things in order (Isa 44:7; Lk 1:1 AV [diatassōn]; Lk 1:21; cf. Lev 26:1; Ps 50:21). From the idea of ranging in order for the purpose of comparison the Heb "arakh acquires the meaning "to compare" (Isa 40:18; Ps 89:7). This is clearly the meaning of " tipos Akhrakh (Ps 5:5[Heb 6:1)], where "they cannot be set in order unto the"

must be interpreted to mean "There is nothing that can be compared unto thee."

As the fundamental meaning of "arakh is arrangement in space, that of "sohar is order or sequence in time. (The LXX σύντονος, phýlogos) suggests, in the place of "sōhārām, a word for "light," possibly σωκραγισμόν. In the NT we find "order" used of time in connection with the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15:23 [tōgnws]; and of a succession of places visited (Acts 18:23 [katēkēs]. The phrase "in order unto" (Ps 119:35) expresses causal sequence and hence purpose.

The idea of classification is present in the Heb takahn, tr super "set in order," with reference to a collection of proverbs (Ecc 12:9). The same stem is used with reference to the fixation and arranging of singers before the altar Organize (Heb Eccles 47:9). The classification of priests according to their service and an idea of their order (1 Ch 24:3:19, Heb pāshād). Next to the high priests ranked priests of the second order (mishneh, 2 K 23:4; cf. 25:18 [v Jer 52:24). The related concept of organization is present where the Heb kîn (lit. "to establish") is used (Ps 119:17; cf. LXX, "a British" ARV; Ps 119:133; 2 Ch 29:35; cf. 1 Macc 16:14). A similar use of the term "order" is found in the NT in connection with the organization of the affairs of the church (1 Cor 16:1 [diatassēn]; Tit 1:5 [epiōdivthē; 1 Cor 13:11 [ord]). In the sense of likeness or manner, is used in the phrase "after the order of Melchisedek" to translate the Heb al dibbārōth, or rather the Heb, Gr, and Eng. words is that of arrangement in rows. Thus "order" is used in the Bible of arranging wood for an altar (Lev 1:7; 1 K 5:17; 1 Macc 6:40; Col 2:5). This well-known phrase is rendered in LXX kathō tōn tāξīn, a tr adopted in Heb 5:6:10; 6:20; 7:11:17, where the passage from Ps is made the basis of an extended argument, in the course of which "order" is taken in the sense of "likeness" (Heb 7:16).

In the sense of regulation, we find "order" as a tr of mishpār (which is lit. "the ruling of a shōphēh," whether as a judicial decree or legislative active act) in connection with the consecration of the Levites. As a vb. in Ex 23:17; 2 Ch 30:16; cf. Lk 1:8; Hand Ed 1:6), and with reference to the Nazarite regulations in the story of Samson (Jgs 13:12, RV "manner"), church services (1 Cor 14:40) and, in the older Eng. VSS, with reference to other ritual matters (1 Ch 15:13; 23:31; 2 Ch 8:14, ARV "ordinance"). The phrase "al yadh, lit. "according to the hand of," tr" in 2Ch 10:10; 1 Ch 25:25:3:6 bis in various ways, means "under the direction of," or "under the order of," as tr in the last instance. The modern sense of "command" is suggested here and in several other instances (1 Esd 8:10; 1 Macc 9:55). He "that ordereth his conversation aright" (sōn dērēkh, Ps 60:22) is probably one who chooses the right path and directs his steps along it. "Who shall order the battle?" (1 K 20:14) is corrected in ARV: "Who shall begin the battle?" (cf 2 Ch 13:3, Heb ṣagār, lit. "to bind," hence "to join" or "begin"; cf. paradigm containing fort) in many legal cases (Jgs 23:4; 13:18; cf. Ps 50:21). From the idea of ranging in order for the purpose of comparison the Heb "arakh acquires the meaning "to compare" (Isa 40:18; Ps 89:7). This is clearly the meaning of "tipos Akhrakh (Ps 5:5[Heb 6:1]), where "they cannot be set in order unto the..."
6. Declaring of Last Will

ORDINANCE, or'di-nans: This word generally represents שׁוֹכֶב, suchokhot, something prescribed, or required, usually with reference to matters of ritual. In AV the same word is frequently transliterated as "statute" or "statutes," which is rendering of a similar Heb word, viz. פֶּתַח, hōk. RV generally retains "ordinance," but sometimes substitutes "statute" (e.g. Ezk 18:20; Ps 99:7). In one instance RV renders "set portion" (Ex 45:14). The word generally has a religious or ceremonial significance. It is used for instance in connection with the Passover (Ex 12:43; Nu 9:14). According to Ex 12:14, the Passover was "an ordinance to ever," i.e. a permanent institution. In the pl. the word is often employed, along with such terms as commandments, laws, etc, with reference to the different prescriptions of the Deuteronomistic and Priestly codes (Dt 6:1; Lev 18:1). In 11 passages (Ex 15:25; Jos 24:25; 1 S 8:25; 2 K 17:34-37; 2 Ch 33:8-13; Ps 119:91; Isa 68:2; Eze 11:20) "ordinance" is the rendering of סְתַנּוֹת, mishketh, judgment, decision or sentence by a judge or ruler. In the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20:22-31; 31:33) the term "judgment" denotes civil, as contrasted with ritual, enactments. In 2 K 17:34 AV employs "manners" and "ordinances" as renderings of this word. In 3 passages (Lev 18:20; 22:9; Mal 3:14) "ordinance" is the tr. of סָתַן, mishmereth, "charge," which RV restores. In one instance (Neh 10:32) "ordinance" renders סֶתַן, mishpeth, "commandment," while in Ezk 3:10 AV the phrase "after the ordinance of David" represents a Heb phrase which lit. means "upon the hands of David," i.e. under the guidance or direction of David.

In the NT "ordinance" renders different Gr words, viz. (1) ἁρμαρία, diáthrōma, in Lk 1:6 and He 9:1-16. The word means lit. "anything declared right"; but in these passages ceremonial and religious regulation; (2) διάθησις, diáthesis, in Eph 2:15; Col 2:14. In the NT this word always means a decree or edict (Acts 17:7); (3) ταγνάθος, paradosis, in 1 Cor 11:2 AV, RV substitutes "traditions"; (4) κληρονομία, klinōnymia, "setting up," "institution," in 1 Pet 2:3. The term is used exclusively of the action of God. Peter implies that institutions, apparently human, such as the family and the state, are of Divine origin. The same doctrine is found in Rom 13:1. OREB, or'eb (אֹרֶב, אֵרוֹב; "raven," esp. "crow"), and ZEEB, ze'eb, zeb (ゼブ, ゼブ, "wolf") (Jgs 7:25; 8:3; Ps 83:11, and Isa 10:26 [Oreb only]). Mitzri inhabitants captured and besieged by the Ephraimites, who brought their heads to Gideon. As to the meaning of the two names, both words are found in Arabic. Robertson Smith, Kinship, etc (100 ff, 218 ff), says that the use of the names of animals as names of persons is a relic of totemism. But Nöldeke (ZDMG, XL, 160 ff) and

1. Meaning others hold that such use shows a desire that those so named should be detested or execrable to their enemies as the plant or animal which the name denoted. Some again (e.g. Stade, Geschichte, 189 ff) maintain that the two names here are borrowed from localities and not vice versa, as Jgs 7:25 implies. If so, we must take the names to be originally two places, apparently in Ephraim, for the words "beyond Jordan" in 7:25 contradict 8:4, where it is said that Gideon came to the Jordan and passed over. Moore (Jgs 214) suggests that the two localities were near the junction with the Jordan of the stream that comes from Wady Far'ah. The construction of the Heb allows of a tr "the rock [called] Oreb," and "the winepress [called] Zeeb."

The account of a battle here is corroborated by Isa 10:26, a verse which mentions the "rock of Oreb," and suggests that the great defeat of the Midianites took place there of Isa 9:4). The passage in Oreb Isa 10:24-26 is proverb, however, and is said to be late editing (see G. H. Box, Isa, 65). In Ps 83:11 (Heb 12) there is a prayer that God would make the "noble" among the Psalmist's enemies as Oreb and Zeeb.

OREB: In 2 Esd 2:33 AV for Mt. Horeb (q.v.; so RV).

OREN, or'en (אֹרֶן, אֵרֶן; 'Aḇĕrāh, Arāh, Alex. Ἀραν): "a son of Jerahmeel, the firstborn of Hezron (1 Ch 2:25)."

ORGAN, or'gân: See Music.

ORION, or'i-on: A brilliant constellation dedicated to Nimrod or Merodach. See Astronomy, 11, 11.

ORNAMENT, or'na-ment (Τέμ., ῥαθή, "ornament"): In common with all the Orientals, the Hebrews were very fond of wearing ornaments, and their tendency to extravagance of this kind was often met with stern prophetic rebuke (Isa 3:16-24; Ezk 13:18-20). On this subject, little is said in the NT apart from Jesus' (Lk 7:25; 12:23) and James' (2:2) invectives against meretricious estimates of man's character. Yet the employment of attractive attire receives sanction in the Divine example of Ezk 16:10-14. Ornaments in general would include finely embroidered or decorated fabrics, such as the priest's dress or the high-priestly attire, and the richly wrought veil, girdle and turban used by the wealthier class. But the term may be limited here to the various rings, bracelets and chains made of precious metals and more or less jeweled (cf Jer 2:32).

These latter, described in detail under their own particular name, may be summarized here as finger-rings, particularly prized as seal-rings (Gen 38:12-25; Jer 22:24); arm-rings or bracelets (Gen 24:22, 25:10); earrings (Gen 35:4; Ex 35:22); nose-rings (Gen 24:47; Ezk 16:12); anklets or anklet-chains (Isa 3:16,18); head-bands or fillets or crowns (referred to in Isa 318 only), and necklaces or neck-chains (Gen 41:42; Ezk 16:11).

Figurative: The universal devotion to ornament among the Orientals is the occasion for frequent Bib. allusions to the beauty and adornment of noble jewelry and attire. But everywhere, in Divine injunctions, the emphasis of value is placed upon the beauty of holiness as an inward grace rather than on the attractions of outward ornament (Job
Moreover, the ospray was not numerous as were other hawks and eagles. It was a bird that lived almost wholly on fish, and these were not plentiful in the waters of Pal. This would tend to make it a marked bird, so no doubt the tr is correct as it stands, as any hawk that lived on fish would have been barred as an article of diet (see Tristram, NAT. Hist. of the Bible, 182; also Studer, Birds of North America, p. and pl. 16).

skin or papyrus, and this discovery in Pal encourages the hope of further and more significant finds.

Gr ostraca in large quantities have been found in Egypt, preserving documents of many kinds, chiefly tax receipts. The texts of some 2,000 of these have been published, principally by Wilcken (Griechische Ostraka, 2 vols, 1899), and serve to illustrate in unexpected ways the everyday Gr speech of the common people of Egypt through the Ptolemaic, Rom and Byzantine periods. Like the papyri, they help to throw light on NT syntax and lexicography, as well as on ancient life in general.

It is said that Cleanthes the Stoic, being too poor to buy papyrus, used to write on ostraca, but no remains of classical lit. have been found on the ostraca thus far discovered. In some instances, however, Christian literary texts are preserved upon ostraca. Some years ago Bouriant bought in Upper Egypt 20 ostraca, probably of the 7th cent., inscribed with the Gr text of parts of the Gospels. The ostraca are of different sizes, and preserve among others one long continuous passage (Lk 22 40–71), which runs over 10 of the pieces. The ostraca contain from 2 to 9 verses each, and cover Mt 27 31-32; Mk 5 40-41; 9 3; 16 18-22; 16 21; Lk 12 13-16; 22 40-71; Jn 1 1-9; 1 14-17; 18 10-25; 19 15-17. The texts are in 3 different hands, and attest the interest of the poor in the gospel in the century of the Arab conquest. Another late ostraca has a rough drawing labeled "St. Peter the evangelist," perhaps in allusion to the Gospel of Peter.

Coptic ostraca, too, are numerous, esp. from the Byzantine period, and of even more interest for Christian history than the Greek. A Coptic ostraca on the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7 53–8 11), which is otherwise unattested in the Sa'idic NT. A Christian hymn to Mary, akin to the canticles of Luke, and some Christian letters have been found. The work of W. E. Crum on the Coptic ostraca is of especial importance.

OSTRICH, ostrich (עַרְיֵךְ עַרְיָךְ), anak; στρουθός, strouthos; Lat Struthio camelus: The largest bird now living. The Heb words yā'ānāh, which means "greediness," and both ha-yā'ānāh, "daughter of greediness," are made to refer to the indiscriminate diet of the ostrich, to which bird they apply; and again to the owl, with no applicability. The owl at times has a struggle to swallow whole prey it has taken, but the more fact that it is a night hunter forever shuts it from the class of greedy and promiscuous feeders. The bodies of owls are proverbially lean like eagles. Neither did the owl frequent several places where older versions of Jer and Isa place it; so the τρε is now correctly rendered "ostrich." These birds came into the Bible because of their desert life, the companions they lived among there, and because of their night cries that were guttural, terrifying groans, like the roaring of lions. The birds were brought into many pictures of desolation, because people dreaded their fearful voices. They homed on the trackless deserts that were dreaded by travelers, and when they came feeding on the fringe of the wilderness, they fell into company with vulture, eagle, lion, jackal and adder, and joined their voices with the night hawks and owls. For these reasons no birds were more suitable for drawing strong comparisons from.

They attained a height ranging from 6 to 8 ft., and weighed from 200 to 300 lbs. The head was small with large eyes having powerful vision, and protected by lashes. The Peculiarities neck was long, covered with down, and the windpipe showed, while large bites could be seen to slide down the gullet. The legs were bare, long, and the muscles like steel from the long distances covered in desert travel. The foot was much like the cloven hoof of a beast. The inner toe was 7 in. long, with a clawlike hoof, the outer, smaller with no claw. With its length and strength of leg and the weight of foot it could strike a blow that saved it from attack by beasts smaller than a leopard. The wings were small, the muscles soft and flabby. They would not bear the weight of the bird, but the habit of lifting and beating them proved that this assisted in attaining speed in running (cf Xen. Anab. 1.5.2, 3). The body was covered with soft flexible feathers, the wings and tail growing long plumes, for which the bird has been pursued since the beginning of time. These exquisite feathers were first used to decorate the headdress and shields of desert chieftains, then as decorations for royalty, and later for hat and hair ornaments. The badge of the Prince of Wales is three white ostrich plumes. The females are smaller, the colors gray and white, the males a glossy black, the wing and tail plumes white. The ostrich has three physical peculiarities that stagger scientists. It has eyelashes, developed no doubt to protect the eyes from the dust and sand of desert life. On the wings are two plumless shafts like large porcupine quills. These may be used in resisting attack. It also has a bladder like a mammal, that collects uric acid, the rarest organ ever developed in a feathered creature.

These birds hied on the deserts of Arabia and at the lower waters of the great Sina. Here the ostrich left her eggs on the earth and warmed them in the sand. That young was not hard harked was due to the fact that they were covered for protection during the day and brooded through the cooler nights. The eggs average 3 lbs. weight. They have been used for food in the haunts of the ostrich since the records of history began, and their stout shells for drinking-vessels. If the custom continues, one may reason a nest to take a long stick and draw out an egg. If incubation has advanced enough to spoil the eggs for use, the nest is carefully covered and left; if fresh, they are eaten, one egg being sufficient for a small family. No doubt these were the eggs to which Job referred as being tasteless without salt (Job 6:6). The number of eggs in the nest was due to the fact that the birds were polymonous, one male leading from 2 to 7 females, all of which deposited their eggs in a common nest. When several females wanted to use the nest at the same time, the first one to reach it deposited her egg in it, and the others on the sand close beside. This accounts for the careless habits of the ostrich as to her young. In the communal nest containing from 2 to 3 dozen eggs, it is impossible for the mother bird to know which of the young is hers. So all of them united in laying the eggs and allowing the father to look after the nest and the young. The bird first appears among the ruins in Lev 21:16 RV "owl"; Dt 14:16, RV "little owl"; AV "owl." This must have referred to the toughness of grown specimens, since there was nothing offensive in the bird's diet to taint its flesh and the young tender ones were delicious meat. In his agony, Job felt so much an outcast that he cried:

"I am a brother to jackals, And a companion to ostriches" (Job 30:29).

Again he records that the Almighty disconsolate to him of the ostrich in the following manner:

"The wings of the ostrich wave proudly: But are they the pinions and plumage of love?" (39:13-15).

The ostrich history previously given explains all this passage save the last two verses, the first of which is a reference to the fact that the Arabs thought the ostrich a stupid bird, because, when it traveled to exhaustion, it bid its head and thought its body safe, and because some of its eggs were found outside the nest. The second was due to a well-known fact that, given a straight course, the ostrich could outrun a horse. The birds could attain and keep up a speed of 60 miles an hour for the greater part of half a day and even longer, hence it was possible to take them only by a system of relay riders (Xen., op. cit.). When Isaiah predicted the fall of Babylon, he used these words: "But wild beasts of the desert shall be there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and ostriches shall dwell there, and wild goats shall dance there" (Isa 13:21).

Because this was to be the destruction of a great city, located on the Euphrates River and built by the fertility and prosperity of the country surrounding it, and the ruins those of homes, the bird indicated by every natural condition would be the owl. The wild goats clambering over the ruins would be natural companions and the sneaking wolves—but the big bird of the time tramp of the desert habitation, accustomed to constant pursuit for its plumage. Exactly the same argument applies to the next reference by the same writer (34:13). "And the wild beasts of the desert shall meet with the wolves, and the wild goat shall cry unto him for help; and the falcon shall dwell there, and shall find her a place of rest" (34:14).

"The beasts of the field shall honor me, the jackals and the ostriches; because I give waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert, to give drink to my people, to my chosen" (41:20). Homer and the ostrich in its natural location, surrounded by creatures that were its daily companions. The next reference also places the bird at home and in customary company: "Therefore the wild beasts of the desert shall dwell there, and the ostriches [AV "owls"] shall dwell there also; and it shall be no more inhabited forever; neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation" (Jer 50:39).

"Even the jackals draw out the breast, they give suck their young ones: The daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness" (Lam 4:3).

This reference is made to the supposed cruelty of the ostrich in not raising its young.

TRANSLATION

OSTHNI, oth'n, oth'n, oth'n, meaning unknown: A son of Shemariah, a Korahite Levite (1 Ch 26:7).

OTHENIEL, oth'n-el (ביתן), ʻothnēl: A hero in Israel, son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. He conquered Kiriath-sephon, later known as Debir, in the territory of Judah in the days of Joshua, and was given the daughter of Caleb, Achsah, as a reward (Josh 15:17; Jgs 1:13). He later smote Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, whom the children of Israel had served 8 years; and thus not only saved the Israelites, but by reviving national sentiment among them (cf. Am 2, V, iv, 3), and reestablishing government in the same quarter of those hero-rulers known as "judges." The effects of his victory lasted an entire generation (40 years, Jgs 3:9–11). He had a son named Hathath (1 Ch 4:13) and probably another named Meonothai (cf. reference Lucians of LXX, ad loc.). In the days of David we find a family bearing the name of Othniel, from which came Heldai the Metophathite, captain of the twelfth month (1 Ch 27:15).

OTHONIAS, oth-ō-nē-ás (Othoinas, Othoino): One of those who had taken "strange wives" (1 Ed 9:28) "Mattanib" of Ex 10:27.

OUCHES, out'ches, -iz (רעהש, miḥārərōth [Ex 28:13.14.16-18]; ARV "settings", but in Ex 39:13, "inclosing"): The secondary meaning of this now archaic word is the gold or silver setting of a precious stone. In Ex, where it occurs 8 t, it is clear that the gold settings of the engraved stones forming the breast-plate of the high priest are intended; the onyx stones forming the fibula or brooch for holding together the two sides of the breast-plate being said to be "inclosed in ouches [settings] of gold" (Ex 39:6). Not only are these two onyx or beryl stones set, but the 12 stones forming the front of the breast-plate were "inclosed in gold in their settings" (Ex 30:20). The same word occurs in Ps 45:13, where the king's daughter is said to have her clothing "inwrought with gold," i.e. embroidered with gold thread or wire. Ex 39:3 tells us how this wire was produced. From this fact it may be inferred that the settings of the breast-plate were not solid pieces of gold, but were formed of woven wire, wreathed round the stones, in a sort of filigree. See also STONES, PRECIOUS.

OUTCAST, out'kast: Represents some form of סִתָּה, dābāh, or נׇתָה, nābāh, both meaning "thrust OVERSEER, ő- vér-sè'ér, or -sèr'. One who overlooks, inspects; in the OT from יְסֵר, nāṣaq (2 Ch 21 18; in 2 Ch 34 13 RV changes to "set forward"); and פָּקָד, pāqad (Gen 39 4; 2 Ch 34 12.17; RV has this word for AV "officers" in Gen 42 34, and for "rulers" in 1 Ch 26 32); in the NT once for εἰργαστήριον, episkopos, in Acts 20 28, where RV has "bishops" (in "oversers"); cf 1 Pet 5 2). See Bishop.

OWL, owl (יוֹיָד הַזָּעַדְנוּ; beth ha-ya'ānāh; Lat Ulula); The name of every nocturnal bird of prey of the N.O. Striges. These birds range from the great horned owl of 2 ft. in length, through many subdivisions to the little screech-owl of 5 in. All are characterized by very large heads, many have ear tufts, all have large eyes surrounded by a disk of thin, stiff, radiating feathers. The remainder of the plumage has no aftertaste. So these birds make the softest flight of any creature traveling on wing. A volume could be written on the eye of the owl, perhaps its most wonderful feature being in the power of the bird to enlarge the iris if it wishes more distinct vision. There is material for another on the prominent and peculiar auditory parts. With almost all owls the feet are so arranged that two toes can be turned forward and two back, thus reinforcing the grip of the bird by an extra toe and giving it unusual strength of foot. All are night-hunters, taking prey to be found at that time, of size according to the strength. The owl was very numerous in the caves, ruined temples and cities, and even in the fertile valleys of Pal. It is given place in the Bible because it was considered unfit for food and because people dreaded the cries of every branch of the numerous family. It appeared often, as most birds, in the early VSS of the Bible; later translators seem to feel that it was used in several places where the ostrich really was intended (see Ostrich). It would appear to a natural historian that the right bird could be selected by the location, where the text is confusing. The ostrich had a voice that was even more terrifying, when raised in the night, than that of the owl. But it was a bird of the desert, of wide range and traveled only by day. This would confine its habitat to the desert and the greenery where it joined fertile land, but would not bring it in very close touch with civilization. The owl is a bird of out." In Jer 30 17 "outcast" means "thrust out of society" "degraded person" elsewhere it means "exile" (Ps 147 2; Isa 16 3 f; Jer 49 36).

OUTER, out'ër: This adj. is used 12 t by Ezekiel of the outside court of the temple. In Mt we find it 3 t (8 12; 22 13; 25 30) in "outer darkness" (vā ἀγνώριον τῆς ἐκκλησίας τῶν ἀχείρεσάν τοῦ ἐκκλησία τοῦ ἐξοχοῦ, which typifies the utter darkness of the doom of the lost.

OUTGOING, out'gō-ing: In Ps 65 8, "Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice," the Heb is יְרָכָה, yērāḵah. The word (from yādā, "to go forth") refers to the "going forth" of the sun, and so means "east" (as in Ps 76 6). The connection of yērāḵah with "evening" is therefore zeugmatic, but the meaning is clear and there are extra-Bib. parallels (cf. "the two Orientes"). In Josh 17 18, AV uses "outgoings" for the Heb רָכָה עַל רָכָה (also from yādā), where the meaning in "extremity" (RV "goings out," as in Nu 34 5, etc.). "Outwent" occurs in Mk 6 33.

OUTLANDISH, out-land'ish (Neh 13 26, AV "Him did outlandish women cause to sin"): "Outlandish" in modern Eng. is colloquial only and with the sense "utterly extraordinary," but AV uses it in the lit. meaning "out of the land," "foreign," ERV, "strange women," ARV "foreign women," Heb נָוְיָד, noyāḏ, "foreign." OUTRAGE, out'rej, OUTRAGEOUS, out-rā'jeas: The noun (from the Fr. outré-rage, "that which goes beyond") only in the heading to Ps 10 AV; the adj. in Prov 27 4, AV and ERV, for מַרְאֵה, merēwāh, "foul," "Anger is overwhelming" (ARV), is much better.

OUTROADS, out'rödz (ἐξωδέου, exoideō, "to go forth, to make a military expedition"); AV and RV in 1 Mac 15 41, "horsemen . . . . that they might make outroads upon the ways of Judah"; 1 Esd 4 23, RV "goeth forth to make outroads"); "Outroads" is obsolete, but its opposite, "inroads," is still good Eng.

OUTWARD, out'wərd, MAN (גָּאוֹן, ġāoḇn, "outside," "without," "out of doors"): The body, subject to decay and death, in distinction from the inner man, the imperishable spiritual life which "is renewed day by day" (2 Cor 4 16); also the body as the object of worldly thought and pride in external dress and adornment (1 Pet 3 3). See MAN, Natural; Man, New.

OVEN, uv"n. See Bread; Furnace.

OVERCHARGE, ő- vér-châr'jī: Lk 21 34, "lest haply your hearts be overcharged with drunkenness" (βασάνω, barānō, "burden," here with the force "be occupied with"); 2 Cor 2 5, AV "that I may not overcharge you" (ἐπιβαρήσω, epibarēwō, "overload"); RV "that I press not too heavily." See Charges.

OVERPASS, ő- vér-pas': A special tr. of the very common vb. יָבַש, 'āḇar, "to pass over," found in EV of Ps 57 1 and Isa 26 20 in the sense "to pass by," and in Jer 5 28 with the meaning "to over-flow."

OVERPLUS, ő-vér-plúss: Lev 25 27, for יָבַש, 'āḇarhaph, "excess."
ruins, that lay mostly in the heart of rich farming lands, where prosperous cities had been built and then destroyed by enemies. Near these locations the ostrich could be pursued for its plumage, and its nesting conditions did not prevail. The location was strictly the owl's chosen haunt, and it had the voice to fit all the requirements of the text. In the lists of abominations, the original Heb yashāph, derived from a root meaning twilight, is tr"great owl" (see Lev 11 17 and Dt 14 16). It is probable that this was a bird about 2 ft. in length, called the eagle-owl. In the same lists the word kōs (ves- τρεπατε, νυκτικοραξ) refers to ruins, and the bird indicated is specified as the "little owl," that is, smaller than the great owl—about the size of our barn owl. This bird is referred to as the "mother of ruins," and the tr that place it in deserted temples and cities are beyond all doubt correct. Kīppālī (κιππαλί, ecounter) occurs once (Isa 34 15), and is tr"great owl" in former versions; lately (in ARV) it is changed to "dart-snake!" (ERV "arrow-snake"). In this same description lithū (λιθοθραύσος, onakēntaurōle), "a specter of night," was formerly sereech-owl; now it reads "night monster," which is more confusing and less suggestive. The owls in the lists of abominations (Lev 11 17 18; Dt 14 16) are the little owl, the great owl and the horned owl. The only other owl of Scripture that produced such impressions of desolation in the Books of Isa, Jer, Job and Mic is referred to in Ps 102 6: "I am like a pelican of the wilderness: I am become as an owl of the waste places."

Here it would appear that the bird habitual to the wilderness and the waste places, that certainly would be desert, would be the ostrich—while in any quotation referring to ruins, the owl would be the bird indicated by natural conditions.

OWL, GREAT (יָשָׁפ, yashāph; LXX φαος, ἰθι, or ιθίος, εἶθι): A member of the Pal species of the family Strigidae. The great owl mentioned in the Bible was no doubt their largest specimen of the family, a bird fully 2 ft. in length, fully feathered, with unusually large head and long ear tufts. It was a formidable and noble-appearing bird, with resounding voice. It was abundant among the ruins of temples, the tombs of Carmel, the caves of Gennesaret, and among the ruined cities of Southern Judah. It is included in the abomination lists of Lev 11 17 and Dt 14 16. See OWL.

Gene Stratton-Porter

OWL, LITTLE (יִנִּית, ynīt; νυκτικόραξ, νυκτικόραξ; Lat Athene meridionalis): A night bird of prey distinguished by a round head, and extremely large eyes. The little owl is left in RV only in the lists of abominations (see Lev 11 17; Dt 14 16). See Owl.

OWL, SCREECH. See Night Monster.

OWNER, o'ei. See Ships and Boats, III, 2.

OX. See Antelope; Cattle; Wild Ox.

OX, oks (יָשָׁפ, yashāph; LXX *φαος, ἰθι, o'xm): One of the ancestors of Judah (Jth 8 1). The name is not Heb. Perhaps the Itala Ozi and the Syr Uz point to the Heb *Uzziz.

OZGOAD, oks'gōd. See Goad.

OZEM, o'zem (יָשָׁפ, *yashāph, o'zem, meaning unknown):

1. The 6th son of David (1 Ch 2 15). LXX (Ἀκο, ἀκόσ) and Vulg suggest that the name should be pointed iances, "great.

2. A "son" of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 25).

OZIAS, o'zi'as:

1. (Oţēs, Oţēs, Oţēs, Oţēs, Oţēs, B a b): The son of Micah, a Simeonite, one of the 3 rulers of Bethuliah in the days of Judah (Jth 6 15 16; 7 25; 8 9f; 10 6).

2. (Oţēs, Oţēs, B and Sweet; AV Ezias [1 Esd 8 2], following A, "Eźias, Ezias"): An ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd 8 2; 2 Esd 1 1)="Uzzi" of Ex 7 4; 1 Ch 6 51.

3. Head of a family of temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 31)="Uzza" of Ex 2 49; Neh 7 51.

PAARAL, pā'a-ri (Actualizar, "pa'arag, "devoee of Poor"): One of David's 37 valiant men (2 S 23 35). Doubtless the "Naarah" of 1 Ch 11 37.

PACATIANA, pāk-ka-ti'āna, paku-a'ta-na (Pakati'na, Pakatiana): About 295 AD, when the province of Asia was broken up, two new provinces were formed, Phrygia Prima (Pacatiana), of which Laodicea was the "chiefest city" (subscription to 1 Tim AV), and Phrygia Secunda (Satalitarsis). See Perga, and HDB, III, 865.

PACE, pās (πασ, "pāsh): A step in 2 S 6 13, hence about one yard.

PACHON, pāk'kon (Pāxōn, Pachōn): The name of a month mentioned in 3 Mac 6 38.

PADDAN, pad'an (Gen 48 7; AV Padan, pā-dan). See next article.

PADDAN-ARAM, pad'an-āram or p-āram (יָשָׁנ, yashān, pānā; LXX Μεσοπόταμια τῆς Συρίας, Mesopotamia tēs Suryas; AV Padan-aram): In Gen 46 7, Padan stands alone, but as the LXX, Sam, and Pesh read "Ar̄am" also, it must in this verse have dropped out of the MT. In the time of Abraham, pādanā occurred the Bab contract-tablets as a land measure, to which we may compare the Arab. faddān or "ox-gang." In the Assyrian syl­labaries it is the equivalent of ِكت "a field," so that Padan-aram would mean "the field of Ar̄am," and with this we may compare Hos 12 12 (Heb 12 13) and the use of the Heb ṣdlīk in connection with Moab and Edom (Jgs 5 4; Ruth 1 6).
Furthermore, padanu and harranu are given as synonyms with the meaning of "road."

Paddan-aram occurs only in the PC, but it corresponds to the "Haran" of the older documents. The versions agree in translating both as Mesopotamia, and identify with the home of the patriarchs, and the scene of the district of Haran to the E. of the Upper Euphrates valley. More in harmony with the length of Jacob's flight, as indicated by the time given (Gen 31 22; 25), is Harran-el-Awamid, an ancient site 10 miles to the E. of Damascus, which satisfies all the demands of history. See ARAM. W. M. CHRISTIE

PADON, pâ'dón (פָּדְון, pâdhôn, "redemption"): One of the Nethinim (see Nethinim) who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47), the "Phaleas" of 1 Esd 5 29 (m "Padon").

PAGIEL, pâ'gi-el, pâ'gil, pa-gîl (פַּגִּי-אֵל, Pagî'el, "God's intervention"): Son of Ocran, of the tribe of Asher, among those enrolled by Moses at the numbering of Israel (Nu 1 13; 2 27). When the tabernacle was set up, the heads of the families of Israel 'brought their offerings' in rotation and presented in the presence of his tribe, came on the 11th day (Nu 7 72). Nu 7 72-77 describes his offering. In the journeyings of Israel he was "over the host of the tribes of the children of Asher" (Nu 10 25), and possibly standard-bearer (cf Nu 10 14-22.25).

HENRY WALLACE

PAHATH-MOAB, pâ'hat-mô'ab (פַּחַת מֹאָב, pa-hath mo'ab), pa-hath mô'dbh, "sheek of Moab": in 1 Esd 5 11; 8 31, "Phaath Moab"): A Jewish clan probably named after an ancestor of the above title. Part of the clan returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 6; cf Neh 7 11) under two family names, Jeshua and Joab; and a part came back with Ezra (Ezr 8 4). Hashub, a "son of Pahath-moab," is named among the repairers of both the wall and the "tower of the furnaces" at Jerus (Neh 3 11). It is the name of one of the signatories "sealing" the "sure covenant" of Neh 9 38 (Neh 10 14). Some of the sons of this name had taken strange wives" (Ezr 10 30).

PAI, pâ'i (פַּי, pâ; פָּוֶפֶּה, Pophô): The royal city of Hadad or Hadar, king of Edom (1 Ch 1 50). The name is given as "Pau" (פָּו, pâ) in Gen 36 39. There is no indication of its position. It is not identified.

PAIN, pân (פָּן, bân, rân, ān, hêbbel, הָלָח, hâlah, halhâlah, כָּלָח, kalâch, כֹּלָה, kolâh, פָּאָר, pa'ar, כְּבָּר, kibhar, הַמָּכָה, mak'hah, הָמַּלְלָא, yâmâl, יָמָל, yâmâl, פָּאָר, Barakûz, bōzanîh, nöso, pânos, ööv, ödâs). These words signifying various forms of bodily or mental suffering are generally tr "pain": 28 out of the 34 passages in which the word is used are in the poetical or prophetic books and refer to conditions of mental disquiet or dismay due to the punishment of personal or national sin. In one instance only is the word used as a historic record of personal physical pain: the case of the wife of Phinehas (1 S 4 19), but the same word יָם (yâm) is used figuratively in Isa 13 8; 21 3; 30 16, and tr "pangs" or "sorrows." In other passages where we have the same comparison of consternation in the presence of God's judgments to the pangs of childbirth, the word used is הֶבֶל, as in Isa 66 7; Jer 13 21; 22 23; 49 24. In some of these and similar passages several synonyms are used in the one verse to intensify the impression, and are tr "pain," "pangs," and "sorrows," as in Isa 15 8.

The word most commonly used by the prophets is some form of בָּל (bâl), sometimes with the addition as of a wound infliction (Jer 20 8; 21 4; 25 17); Jer 6 34; 22 23; Mic 4 10. This pain is referred to the heart (Ps 11 9) or to the head (Job 30 16; Eccl 3 4). In Ezek 30 4, it is the penal affliction of Ethiopia, and in ver 16 AV "Sin [Tani] shall have great pain." (RV "anguish"). In Ez 33 5 Ezeckiel says great pain to the news of the fall of Tyre. Before the invading host of the Assyrians locute the cities of Syria with much joy, Pain in the sense of toil and trouble in Jer 12 13 is the tr of קָלָה, a word more frequently rendered grieving or sickness, as in 1 K 14 1; Ps 43 25; Cant 2 5; Jer 5 3. The reduplicated form קָלָה is esp. used of a twisting pain usually referred to the loins (Isa 21 3; Ezk 30 10).

Pain in the original meaning of the word (as it has come down to us through the Old Fr. from the Lat pœna as a penalty inflicted for personal sin is expressed by the words קָלָה or קָלָּה in Job 14 22; 15 20, and in the questioning complaint of the prophet (Jer 15 18). As a judgement on personal sin pain is also expressed by קָלָה in Job 32 19; Jer 51 8, but this word is used in the sense of infliction in Job 1 12 the reception language of "man of sorrows." The Psalms (Ps 25 18) praying for deliverance from this affliction is the afflicting hand of God, which rests on him in turn uses the word אָמַל, and this word which primarily means "toil" or "labor," as in Eccl 1 3, or "travail," as in Is 51 11, is tr "painful" in Ps 73 16, as expressing Asaph's disquiet due to his misunderstanding of the workings of Providence, of which the words, as in Ps 116 3 AV, which got hold of the Psalmist in his sickness, is the rendering of the word מָכַה: the same word is tr "distress" in Ps 116 6 AV. All these words have a primary meaning of physical twisting, constriction or restricting.

In the NT ὄδις is tr "pain" (of death, RV "pang") in Acts 2 24. This word is used to express any sort of pain, such as the pangs of childbirth (as in Aeschylus, Chœphori, 211) the pain of intense apprehension. The vb. from this, σκόννομαι, is used by the Rich Man in the parable to describe his torment (RV "anguish") (Lk 16 24). The related vb. σκόνναίομαι is used in Rom 8 22 and is tr "travailing in pain together." In much the same sense the word is used by Euripides (Helena, 727).

In Rev 12 2 the woman clothed with the sun (βασιλικότατα) was in pain to be delivered; the vb. (βασιλικότατα) which means "to torture" is used both in Mt 8 6 in the account of the grievously tortured centurion's servant, and in the description of the laboring of the apostles' boat on the stormy Sea of Galilee (Mt 14 24). This pain seems to have been a case of spinal meningitis. This vb. occurs in Thucydides vii.86 (viii.92), where it means "being put to torture." In the two passages in Rev where pain is mentioned the word is πόνος, the pain which affected those on whom the fifth vial was poured (16 10), and in the description of the City of God where there is no more pain (21 4). The primary meaning of this word seems to be "toil," as in Hind xxi.526, but it is used by Hippocrates to express disease (Ἀπαθείαν 44).

PAINFULNESS, pân'ful'-nes (πάθος, möchhòs): In the summary of his missionary labors in 2 Cor 11 27 AV, St. Paul uses this word. RV renders it "travail," which probably now expresses its meaning most closely, as in Rev 8 3; "painfulness" is usually restricted to the condition of actual soreness or suffering, although we still use "painstaking" in the sense of careful labor. The Gr word is used for toil or excessive anxiety, as in Euripides (Medea, 196), where it refers to that care for her children which she had lost in her madness. Tindale uses "painsfulness" in 1 Jn 4 18 as the tr of ἐρασις, ἐκλαιμις, which RV renders "tortment" and RV "punishment."

PAINT, pānt. (From Old Fr. peindre, frequentative of peindre, Lat. pingere, "to paint"; (1) From Heb. וְנַחֲשָׁב, māshēb, "to smear," "to anoint," "to paint," describing the painting of interiors with vermilion, perhaps resembling lacquer: "smiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion" (Jer 22 14). The shields of the Niniveite soldiers were red, presumably painted (Nah 2 3). (2) From noun פָּקָח, pākh, "paint," "anointy," "esthetic," "black mineral powder," used as a cosmetic, to lend artificial size and fancied beauty to the eye, always spoken of as a meretricious device, indicating light or unwholesome character. Jezebel "painted her eyes, and attired her head" (2 K 9 30), lit. "put pākh into her eyes." Toad of the Barton city Jesus, Jeremiah (4 30) says, "deceast thee . . . en-largest thine eyes with paint" (pākh). AV renders "rentest thy face," as if the stain were a cut, or the enlanging done by violence. (3) From Heb. כְּהָל, kāhal, "to smear," "to paint." Ezekiel says to Oholah-Oholibah (Judah-Israel),"didst wash thy self, paint [kāhal] thine eyes," as the adulteress prepares herself for her paramour (Ezk 23 40). The antimony, in an extremely fine powder (Arab. کُحْل, from kāhal), is placed in the eye by means of a very fine rod, bodkin, or probe, drawn between the edges of the eyelids. This distends the eye, and also increases its apparent size, the effect being increased by a line of stain drawn from the corner, and by a similar line prolonging the eyebrow. See EYE PAINT; COLORS. PAIR, pār: The m of Cant 4 2 (but not of the 16 6) reads, "which are all of them in pairs," while the text has, "whereof every one hath twain." The Heb. מַעָֽרָם, ma'aram, is from a וָרָם, "double," and is perhaps susceptible of either meaning. But the description is of sheep, and the m gives no comprehensible figure, while the text points to the exceedingly sleek and healthy appearance. "Pairs" seems to result from confusing the figure with the thing figured—the teeth, where each upper pair is paired with the corresponding lower pair.

PALACE, pal'ās: In Heb chiefly צְבָֽארָם, 'armôn, in RV text τυρ' in 1 K 16 18; 2 K 15 25; צְבָֽארָה, bārah, צְבָֽארָ, kāhal, the same word often rendering "court," "palace," "court," as in RV "court" (Mt 26 35; 58, 69; Mk 14 54; 66; Lk 11 21; Jn 18 15). On the other hand, "palace" takes the place in RV of AV "common hall" or "judgment hall" (πραξιδιον, Mt 27 27; Jn 18 28; 32; 19 9; Acts 23 35). See JUDGMENT, HALL OF. A description of Solomon's palace is given in 1 K 7 1-12 (see TEMPLE). Archaeology has brought to light the remains of great palaces in Egypt, Babylonia, Assyria (Sargon, Sennacherib, Assur- banipal, etc), Susa, etc. See HOUSE.

PALAESTRA, PALESTRA, pa-lees'tra. See GAMES, II, 3, (6).

PALAL, pālāl (פָֽלָל, pālāl, "judge"): Sea of Uzal, and one of the repairers of the wall (Neh 3 25).

PALANQUIN, pal-ān'kwın: In Cant 3 9 occurs צָכַרְיָון, appāryon, a word that has no Sem cognates and is of dubious meaning. In form, however, it resembles the Gr. παλαγιτ, and still more closely the Gr. φωκόν, phōkon, both of which mean "liter bed." Hence RV "palanquin" (ultimately derived from παραγόντα). The m "ear of state" and AV "chariot" are mere guesses.

PALESTINA, pal-es-tī'na (ΠΑΛΑΣΤΙΝΗ, plesheeth): Ex 15 14; Isa 14 29-31 AV; changed in RV to PHILISTIA (q.v.).

LITERATURE

The word properly means "Philistia," but appears to be first used in the extended sense, as meaning all the "Land of Israel" or "Holy Land" (Zec 2 12), by Philo and by Ovid and later Rom authors (Rendel, Pal Illustr., i, 38-42).

I. PHYSICAL CONDITIONS.—The Bible in general may be said to breathe the air of Pal; and it is here related to, and so important that, for general criticism, the consideration of its geography, and of the numerous incidental allusions to the natural features, fauna, flora, cultivation, and climate of the land in which most of the Bible books were written. With the later history and topography of Pal, after 70 AD, we are not here concerned, but a short account of its present physical and geological conditions is needed for our purpose.

Pal W. of the Jordan, between Dan and Beersheba, has an area of about 6,000 sq. miles, the length from Hermon southward being nearly 150 miles, and the width gradually increasing from 20 miles on the N. to 60 miles on the S. It is thus about the size of Wales, and the height of the Palestinian mountains is about the same as that of the Welsh. E. of the Jordan an area of about 4,000 sq. miles was included in the land of Israel. The general geographical features are familiar to all.

1. General miles, and the width gradually increasing from 20 miles on the N. to 60 miles on the S. It is thus about the size of Wales, and the height of the Palestinian mountains is about the same as that of the Welsh. E. of the Jordan an area of about 4,000 sq. miles was included in the land of Israel. The general geographical features are familiar to all.
bottom of the lake) is 2,600 ft. below the Mediterranean.

(2) W. of the valley the mountain range, which is a continuation of Lebanon, has very steep slopes on the E. ang to 3,800 ft. above sea-level at the foot of the hills (Heb sapheláh or "lowland") form a distinct district, widening gradually southward, while between this region and the sea the plains of Sharon and Philistia stretch to the sandhills and low cliffs of a barren coast.

(3) In Upper Galilee, on the N., the mountain range rises to 4,000 ft. above the Mediterranean. Lower Galilee, to the S., includes rounded hills less than 1,000 ft. above the sea, and the triangular plain of Esdraelon drained by the River Kishon between the Gibbon watershed on the E. and the long spur of Carmel on the W.

(4) In Samaria the mountains are extremely rugged, but a small plain near Dothan adjoins that of Edreanlon, and another stretches E. of Shechem, 2,500 ft. above the level of the Jordan valley. In Judaea the main ridge runs toward Hebron and then sinks to the level of the Beersheba plains about 1,000 ft. above the sea. The desert of Judah forms a plateau (500 ft. above sea-level), between this ridge and the Dead Sea, and is throughout barren and waterless; but the mountains—which average about 3,000 ft. above the sea—are full of good springs and suitable for the cultivation of the vine, fig and olive. The richest lands are found in the sh'pheldh, in Judæa (esp.), and in the corn plains of Edreanlon, Sharon, and Philistia.

(5) E. of the Jordan the plateau of Bashan (averaging 1,500 ft. above the sea) is also a fine corn country. S. of this, Galilea presents a mountain region rising to 3,000 ft. above sea-level at Jebel Osha', and sloping gently on the E. to the desert. The steep western slopes are watered by the Jabbok River, and by many perennial brooks. In North Gilead esp. the wooded hills present some of the most picturesque scenery of the Holy Land. S. of Gilead, the Moab plateau (about 2,700 ft. above sea-level) is now a desert, but is fitted for corn culture, and in places for the vine. A lower shelf or plateau (about 500 to 1,000 ft. above sea-level) intervenes between the main plateau and the Dead Sea cliffs, and answers to the Desert of Judah W. of the lake.

The water-supply of Pal is abundant, except in the desert regions above noticed, which include the Jordan valley area. The Jordan runs into the Dead Sea, which has no outlet and which maintains its level solely by evaporation, being consequently very salt; the surface is nearly 1,200 ft. below the Mediterranean, whereas the Sea of Galilee (580 ft. below sea-level) is sweet and full of fish. The Jordan is fed, not only by the snows of Hermon, but by many affluent streams from both sides. There are several streams also in Sharon, including the Crocodile River under Carmel. In the mountains, where the hard dolomite limestone is on the surface, perennial springs are numerous. In the lower hills, where this limestone is covered by a softer chalky stone, the supply depends on wells and cisterns. In the Beersheba plains the wadis, running under the surface, is reached by scooping shallow pits—esp. those near Gerar, to be noticed later.

The fertility and cultivation of any country depends mainly on its geological conditions. These are contrasted in Pal, and have undergone no change since the age when man first appeared, or since the days of the Hebrew patriarchs. The country was first upheaved from the ocean in the Eocene age of the Miocene, and sediment. In the Eocene age, the great crack in the earth's surface occurred, which formed a narrow gulf stretching from that of the 'Akabah on the S. almost to the foot of Hermon. Further upheaval, accompanied by volcanic outbreaks which covered the plateau of Gilead, Bashan, and the higher Galilean valleys with lava, cut off the Jordan valley from the Red Sea, and formed the long lake, the basin of which has been dammed by the S. to its present level during the Pleistocene and Pluvial periods, after which—its peculiar fauna, having developed meantime on the lake ground—was represented only, as it now is, by the swanly Hâlap, the pear-shaped Sea of Galilee, and the Dead Sea. These changes would have occurred long ages before the appearance of man. The beds upheaved include: (1) the Nubian Sandstone (of the Gresivand period), which was sheared along the line of the Jordan fault E. of the river, and which only appears on the western slopes of Hermon, Galilee, and Bashan; (2) the limestone (Miocene) of the former Tertiary age, including the hard dolomite, and softer beds full of characteristic fossils; (3) the soft Eocene limestone, which appears chiefly on the western spurts and in the foothills, the angle of upheaval being less steep than that of the older main formation. On the shores of the Mediterranean a yet later sandy limestone forms the low cliffs of Sharon. See Geology of Palestine.

As regards fauna, flora and cultivation, it is sufficient here to say that they are still practically the same as described throughout the Bible. The lion and the wild bull and Flora (Bos primigenius) were exterminated within historic times, but have left their bones in the Jordan gravel. The bear has gradually retreated to Hermon and Lebanon. The buffalo has been introduced since the Moslem conquest. Among trees the apple has fallen out of cultivation since the Middle Ages, and the cactus has been introduced to the fertile land of corn, wine and oil, and famous for its fruits. Its trees, shrubs and plants are those noticed in the Bible. Its woods have been thinned in Lower Galilee and Northern Sharon, but on the other hand the crops has often been plowed up or abandoned in former vineyards and villages, and there is no reason to think that any general desiccation has occurred within the last 40 centuries, such as would affect the rainfall.

The climate of Pal is similar to that of other Mediterranean lands, such as Cyprus, Sicily or Southern Italy; and, in spite of the fevers of mosquito districts in the plains, it is much better than that of the Delta in Egypt, or of Mesopotamia. The summer heat is oppressive only for a few days at a time, when (esp. in May) the dry wind—deficient in ozone—blows from the eastern desert. For most of the season a moisture-laden sea breeze, rising about 5 AM, blows to the west and fertilizes the fields all the western slopes of the mountains.

5. Climate

In the bare deserts the difference between 90° F. by day and 40° F. by night gives a refreshing cold. With the east wind the temperature rises to 105° F., and the nights are oppressive. The valley, in autumn, the shade temperature reaches 120° F. In this season mists cover the mountains and swell the grapes. In winter the snow sometimes lies for several days on the watershed ridge and on the Taurus mountains, but even Hermon is sometimes quite snowless at 9,000 ft. above the sea. There is perhaps no country in which such a range of climate can be found, from the Alpine to the tropical, and none in which the range of fruits and flora is consequently so large, from the European to the African.

The rainfall of Pal is between 20 and 30 in. annually, and the rainy season is the same as in other Mediterranean countries. The "former rains" begin with the thunderstorms of November, and the "latter rains" cease with April showers. From December to February—except in years of drought—the rains are heavy. In most years the supply is quite sufficient for purposes of cultivation, but falls begin in autumn, and the corn is rarely spoiled by storms in summer. The fruits ripen in autumn and suffer only from the occasional appearance of locust swarms. There appears to be no reason to suppose that rainfall has undergone any change since the times of the Bible; and a consideration of Bible allusions confirms this view.

Thus the occurrence of drought, and of consequent famine, is mentioned in the OT as occasional and excessive in all times (Gen 12:10; 26:2; 41:50; 7:1, 8:11; 28:20; 35:1; 1 K 8:35; and Isa 5:6; Jer 14:1; Joel 1:10-12; Hag 1:11; Zec 14:17), and droughts are also noticed in the Mish (Tal. 1, 4-7) as occurring even during the rainy season throughout the rainy season till spring. Good rains were a blessing from God, and drought was a sign of His displeasure, in Heb belief (Dt 11:14; Jer 5:24; Joel 2:23). A thunderstorm in harvest time (Nay) was most unusual (1 S 12:17,18), yet such a storm does still occur as a very exceptional phenomenon. By "snow in harvest" (Prov 25:13) we are not to understand a snowstorm, for it is likely to a "faithful messenger," and the reference is to the use of snow for cooling wine, which is still usual at Damascus. The notice of fever on the shores of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8:14) shows that this region was as unhealthy as it still is in summer. The decay of irrigation in Sharon may have rendered this region still healthier, but the identity of the Palestinian flora with that of the Bible indicates that the climate, generally speaking, is unchanged.

II. Palestine in the Pentateuch.—The Book of Gen is full of comments and traditions connected with the memory of the Heb patriarchs. In the time of

1. Places visited by Abraham

Abraham the population consisted of visited by tribes, mainly Sem, who came originally from Babylon, including Canaanites ("the Canaanites", between Sidon and Gaza, and in the Jordan valley, and Amorites ("highlanders") in the mountains (Gen 10:15-19; Nu 13:29). Their language was akin to Heb, and it is only in Egypt that we read of an interpreter being needed (Gen 42:23), while excavated remains of seal-cylinders, and other objects, show that the civilization of Pal was similar to that of Babylon.

(1) Shechem.—The first place noticed is the shrine or "temple (holy place)" of Shechem, with the Elon Moreh (LXX "high oak"), where Jacob afterward buried the idols of his wives, and where Joshua set up a stone by the "holy place" (Gen 12:6; 35:4; Josh 24:26). Sam tradition showed the site near the town of the "Shechem" in Sam. The "Canaanite was then in the land" (in Abraham's time), but was exterminated (Gen 34:25) by Jacob's sons. From Shechem Abraham journeyed southward and raised an altar between Bethel (Betlis) and Hai (Haydon), the name of which still survives hard by the spring of Loez (Gen 12:8; 13:3; 28:11; 36:2). (2) The Negeb.—But, on his return from Egypt with large flocks (12:10), he settled in the pastoral region, between Beersheba and the western Kadesh (13:1; 20:1), called in Heb the negeb, "dry" country, on the edge of the cultivated lands. From E. of Bethel there is a fine view of the lower Jordan valley, and here Lot "lifted up his eyes" (13:10), and chose the rich grass lands of that valley for his flocks. The "cities of the Plain" (zikhrar) were clearly in this valley, and Sodom must have been near the river, since Lot's journey to Zoar (19:22) occupied only an hour or two (vs 15:23) through the plain to the foot of the Moab mountains. These cities have been identified by some from near the Hebron; but, from the hilltop E. of the city, Abraham could have seen "the smoke of the land" (19:28) rising up. The first land owned by him was the garden of Mamre (13:18; 18:1; 23:19), with the cave tomb which tradition still points out under the floor of the Hebron mosque. His tent was spread under the "oaks of Mamre" (18:1), where his mysterious guests rested "under the tree" (ver 8). One aged oak still survives in the flat ground W. of the city, but this tree is not the "Tamar, The Samaria whose king blessed Abraham on his return was thought by the Samaritans, and by Jerome, to be the city near the Jordan valley afterward visited by Jacob (14:18; 33:18), but see Jerusalem.

When Jacob lived in the northern plains, and "sojourned in Gerar" (20:1), now Umm Jerrel, 7 miles S. of Gaza. The wells which he dug in this valley (26:15) were no doubt shallow excavations like those from which the Arabs still obtain the water now seen on the surface in the same vicinity (SWP, III, 390), though that at Beersheba (21:25-32), to which Isaac added another (26:23-25), may have been more permanent. Three masonry wells now exist at Bir es Seba', but the masonry is modern. The planting of a "banyan tree" at this place (21:33) is an interesting touch, since the tree is distinctive of the dry lowlands. From Beersheba Abraham journeyed to "the land of Moriah" (LXX "the high land") to sacrifice Isaac (22:2); and the mountain, according to Heb tradition (2 Ch 3:1), was at Jerus, but according to the Samaritans was Gerizim near the Elon Moreh—a summit which could certainly have been seen "far off" (ver 4) on "the third day to Isaac, Isaac's sheep, the sheep of his father's wilderness, at the western Kadesh (25:11) and at Gerar (26:2), suffered like his father in a year of drought, and had similar difficulties. From Beersheba (28:10) he slept at the "place" (or shrine) consecrated by Abraham's altar near Bethel, and—

(1) Haran to Succoth.—His return journey from Haran to Gilad (Gen 18), which he renewed twenty years later (35:14) when God appeared to him "again" (ver 9).

When Jacob fled to Haran from Beersheba (28:10) he slept at the "place" (or shrine) consecrated by Abraham's altar near Bethel, and—

3. Places visited by Isaac

(1) Haran to Succoth.—His return journey from Haran to Gilad raises an interesting question. The distance is about 350 miles from Haran to the Galed or "witness heap" (31:48) at Mizpah—probably Sāf in North Gilad. This distance Laban is said to have covered in 7 days (31:23), which would be possible for a force mounted on riding camels. Abraham was turned to the south when he reached Laban on the 3d day (ver 22), and some time would elapse before he could gather his "brethren." Jacob with his flocks and herds must have needed 3 weeks for the journey. It is remarkable that the vicinity of Mitzpah still presents ancient monuments like the "pillar" (ver 45) round which the "memorial cairn" (ḡhar-sâhâdâhâth) was formed. From this place Jacob journeyed to Mahamah (probably Arämah), 8 S. of the Jabbok river—a place which afterward became the capital of South Gilead (Gen 32 1 f.; 1 K 4 14); but, on hearing of the advance of Esau from Edom, he retreated across the river (Gen 32 22) and then reached Succoth (35 17), believed to be Tell Der'âlu, N. of the stream.

(2) From Jordan to Hebron.—Crossing the Jordan by one of several fords in this vicinity, Jacob approached Shechem by the perennial stream of Wâdy Fârâh, and camped at Shalem (Sâlim) on the east side of the fertile plain which stretches thence to Shechem, and here he bought land of the Hivites (33 18-20). We are not told that he dug a well, but the necessity for digging one in a region full of springs can only be explained by Hivite jealousy of water rights, and the well still exists E. of Shechem (cf Jn 4 5 f.), not far from the Ebron Moreh where were buried the târâfîm (Gen 35 4) or "spirits" (Assy r târu) from Haran (31 30) under the oak of Abraham. These no doubt were smaller than and more often unearthed in Pal. The further progress of Jacob led by Bethel and Bethelhem to Hebron (35 6 19.27), but some of his elder sons seem to have remained at Shechem. Thus Joseph was sent later from Hebron (37 14) to visit his brethren there, but found them at Dothan.

(3) Dothan (37 17) lay in a plain on the main trade route from Egypt to Damascus, which crossed the low watershed at this point and led down the valley to Jezreel and over Jordan to Bashan. The "water of Arâmah," probably Aram (Gen 11 169) is still shown at Tell Dothan, and the Ishmaelites, from Midian and Gilead, chose this easy caravan route (37 25.28) for camels laden with the Gilead balm and spices. The plain was fitted for feeding Jacob's flocks. The products of Pal then included also honey, pistachio nuts, and almonds (43 11); and a few centuries later we find notice in a text of Thothmes III of honey and balsam, with oil, wine, wheat, spelt, barley and fruits, as rations of the Egyptian troops in the Sinai (West Egypt) campaign (15.29.22).

The episode of Judah and Tamar is connected with a region in the Shērēthāh, or low hills of Judaea.

4. Mentioned in connection with this latter being in a pastoral valley where with Judah Judah met his "sheep shearsers," Tamar sat at "the entrance of Enaim" (of vs 14.22 ERV) or Enam (Josh 15 34), perhaps at Kefr 'Ana, 6 miles N.W. of Timoth. She was mistaken for a kebēthâhâ, or "virgin of Ashereth" (Gen 38 15.21), and we know from Hammurâbi's laws that such virgins were already recognized. The mention of Judah's signet and staff (ver 16) also reminds us of Bab customs as described by Herodotus (4 15.12), and "signet" and "staffs" of Bab style, and of early date, have been unearthed in Pal at Gezer and elsewhere (of the "Bab garment," Josh 7 21).

Generally speaking, the geography of Gen presents no difficulties, and shows an intimate knowledge of the country, while the allusions to natural products and to customs are in accord with the period. The Assy is easily understood, and one difficulty needs notice, where Atad is mentioned (15.24) on the way from Egypt to Hebron as described as "beyond the Jordan." In this case the Assy language perhaps helps us, for in that tongue "Atad" means "the cresses," and the reference may be to the Nile itself, which is called Yârî in Heb (yârî) and Assy r alike.

Ex is concerned with Egypt and the Sinaitic desert, though it may be observed that its simple agricultural laws (chs 21-23), which are so often recall those of Hammurâbi, and would have been found once on the conquest of Gilead and Bashan, before crossing the Jordan. In Lev (ch 11) we have a list of animals most of which belong to the desert—as for instance the "coney" or hyrax (Lev 11 5; Ps 104 18; Prov 30 20), but others—such as the swine (Lev 11 7), the stork and the heron (ver 19)—to the 'Ar'obah and the Jordan valley, while the hoopoe (AV "lapwing," ver 19) lives in Gilead and in Western Pal. In Dt (ch 14) the fallow deer and the roe (ver 5) are now inhabitants of Bashar and Gilead, but the "wild goat" (ibex), "wild ox" (bubal), "pygarg" (addax) and "chamois" (wild sheep), are found in the 'Ar'obah and in the deserts.

In Nu the conquest of Eastern Pal is described, and most of the towns mentioned are known (21 18-33); the notice of vineyards in 7. Numbers Moab (ver 22) agrees with the discovery of ancient rock-cut wine presses near Heshbon (SEP, I, 221). The view of Israel, in camp at Syria by Balak (22 41), standing on the top of Pisgah or Mt. Nebo, has been thought to be possible by the discovery of Gebel Neba, where also rude dolmens recalling Balak's altars have been found (SEP, I, 202). The plateau of Moab (32 5) is described as a "land for cattle," and still supports Arab flocks. Though Israel left their cattle, women and children during the wars, for 6 months, stretched (33 49) from Beth-jeshimoth (Swainheim), near the northeastern corner of the Dead Sea over Abîl-shittim ("the scacia measure,"—a name usual in Pal) is a plain watered by several brooks, and having good heritage in spring.

1. Physical allusions.—The description of the "good land" in Dt (8 7) applies in some details with special force to Mt. Gilead, which possesses more perennial streams than the regions in Western Pal throughout,—"a land of brooks of water, of fountains and springs, flowing forth in valleys and hills," a land also of "wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates, a land of olive-trees and honey" is found in Gilead and Bashan. Pal itself is not a mining country, but the words (ver 9) "a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose earth thou mayest dig copper," may be explained by the facts that iron mines existed near Beirût in the 10th cent. AD, and copper mines at Punon N. of Petra in the 4th cent. AD, as described by Jerome (Onom, s.v. "Phœnin"). In Dt also (11 29; cf 27 4; Josh 8 30) Ebal and Gerizim are first noticed, as beside the "oaks of Moreh." Ebal the mountain of curses (3,077 ft. above sea-level) and Gerizim the mountain of blessings (2,650 ft.) are the two highest tops in Samaria, and Shechem lies in a rich valley between them.

The first sacred center of Israel was thus established at the place where Abraham built his first altar and Jacob dug his well, where Joseph was buried and where Joshua recognized a holy place at the foot of Gerizim (Josh 24 26). The last chapters of Dt record the famous Persian view from Mt. Nebo (34 1-3), which answers in all respects to that from Gebel Neba, except as to Dan, and the utmost (or "western") sea, neither of which is visible. Here we should probably read "toward" rather than "toward," gene r there being no hills over the plains of Shittim whence a better view can be obtained of the Jordan valley, from Zoor to Jericho, of the watershed mountains as far N. as Gilba and Tabor, and of the slopes of Gilead.

allusions, the progress of exploration serves to illustrate the progress of Dt. Israel was commanded (12 3) to overthrow the Can. altars, to break the standing stones which were emblems of superstition, to burn the ḳāḥērāh poles (or artificial trees), and to hew down the graven images. That these commands were obeyed is clear. The rude altars and standing stones are now found only in Moab, and in remote parts of Gilead, Bashan, and Galilee, not reached by the power of reforming kings of Judah. The ḳāḥērāh poles have disappeared, the images are found, only deep under the sand. The three- or four-lettered tablets which remain at Damascus, and in Phoenicia and Syria, representing the gods of Canaan or of the Hittites, have no counterpart in the Holy Land. Again when we read of ancient landmarks (Dt 19 14; Prov 22 25; 23 10), we are not to understand a mere boundary stone, but rather one of those monuments common in Babylonia—as early at least as the 12th cent. BC—on which the boundaries of a field are minutely described, the history of its grant by the king, the case of any dispute in the matter, and the judgment pronounced against the man who should dare to remove the stone. (See illustration under Nebuchadnezzar.)

III. Palestine in the Historic Books of the OT.—

Josh is the great geographical book of the OT; and the large names of places, rivers and mountains of Joshua in Psalms mentioned in the Bible are to be found in this book.

1. Book of Joshua.—This book contains a full account of the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites under Joshua, and of the division of the land among the various tribes. The conquest was completed in 1194 BC, and the division was completed in 1193 BC. The book is divided into two parts: the first part (ch. 1-11) contains the account of the conquest; the second part (ch. 12-21) contains the account of the division of the land.

The conquest of Canaan was accomplished by the Israelites under Joshua, who was the commander-in-chief of the army. The conquest was completed in 1194 BC, and the division was completed in 1193 BC. The book is divided into two parts: the first part (ch. 1-11) contains the account of the conquest; the second part (ch. 12-21) contains the account of the division of the land.

The region left unconquered by Joshua (13 2-6) were those afterward conquered by David and Solomon, including the Philistines, and the Sidonian coast from Mount Carmel to Ashtoreth, which was the border of the Amorite country which lay S. of the 'land of the Hittites' (14). Southern Lebanon, from Gebal (Jubal) and the 'entering into Hamath' (the Eliphethus Valley) on the W. and the Bashan-gad (possibly at 'Ain Judeid) on the northwestern slope of the Kingdom) was also included in the 'land' by David (2 8 6-10). But the whole of Eastern Palestine (12 7-25), and of Western Palestine, excepting the shore foothills, was allotted to the tribes of Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh). The strongest, appear to have occupied the mountains and the ṣḥāphēlāh, as far N. as Lower Galilee, before the final allotment.

Thus the lot of Simeon was within that inherited by Joseph (11 17), and that of Dan partly taken from Ephraim, since Joseph's lot originally reached to Gezer (16: 3); but Benjamin appears to have received the land of the Canaanites (cf 15: 9–19; 18: 11–25).

This lot was larger than that of Ephraim, and Benjamin was not then the "smallest of the tribes" (cf 12: 7). Since the distribution of the tribes did not occur till after the death of Joshua and Eleazar (20: 28).

The twelve tribes were distributed in various regions which may here briefly be described. Reuben held the land of the Maonites (Wady el Arûb) on the south and the "river of Gad" (Wady Nabûr e) on the north, and the "Jordan valley" E. of the river was included in this lot. Manasseh held Bashan, but he did not complete his lot. Simeon had the negeb plateau N. of Beersheba. Judah occupied the mountains S. of the Jordan, with the "Naphtali tributaries" to their W., and claimed Philistia S. of Ekron. Benjamin had the Jericho plains and the mountains between Jerush and Bethel. The border ran S. of Jerush to Rachel's tomb (1 S 19: 2), and thence W. to Kirath-jeearim (Kirma) and Ekron. Dan occupied the lower hills W. of Benjamin and Ephraim, and claimed the plain from Ekron to Rakkon (Tell el Rakîkh) N. of Joppa. Manasseh had a large region, corresponding to Samaria, and laid claim also to the Negeb and half a dozen of the "mountains of Shechem," but this tribe occupied only the hills, and was unable to drive the Canaanites out of the plains (Josh 17: 11). Ephraim also complained of the smallness of its lot (ver 15), which lay in rugged country. Judeth and Simeon, however, the corn plateau E. of the latter city, Issachar the mountains of Gedor and Mahanaim, with a large district in the Jordan valley to the E., but soon became subject to the Canaanites. Zebulun had the hills of Lower Galilee, and mentioned only his "valley." Naphtali occupied the mountains of Upper Galilee, and the rich plateau between the Sea of Galilee and Asher. He had the lower hills W. of Naphtali, and the narrow shore plains from Acco to Tyre. Thus each tribe possessed a proportion of mountain land at suitable cultivation of fles, olives, and vines, and of arable land fit for corn. The areas selected by each tribe correspond with the present distribution of population that the various regions were fitted to support.

The Levitical cities were fixed in the various tribes as centers for the teaching of Israel (Dt 33: 10), but a Levite was not obliged to live in such a city, and was expected to go with his course annually to the sacred center, before they retreated to Jerush on the destruction of the kingdom (2 Ch 11: 14). The 48 cities (Josh 21: 13–42) include 13 in Judah and Benjamin for the priests, among which Beth-shemesh (1 S 6: 13–15) and Anatoth (1 K 2: 26) are expressly named a Levitical. The other tribes had 3 or 4 such cities each, divided among Kohathites (10), Gershonites (13), and Merarites (12). The six Cities of Refuge were included in the total, and were placed 3 each side of the Jordan: Gilead (Hebron), and Abel-meholah and in the plains, namely Hebron, Shechem and Kadish on the W., and Bezer (unknown), Ramoth (Reinon) and Joan (probably Sahem el Joulân) E. of the river. Another less perfect list of these cities, with 4 cities respectively to the tribes of S., is given in 1 Ch 6: 57–81. Each of these cities had "suburbs," or open spaces, extending (Nu 35: 4) about a quarter-mile beyond the wall, the fields, to about half a mile distant, also belonged to the Levites (2 Ch 23: 34).

1. Early wars.—In Jgs, the stories of the heroes who successively arose to save Israel from the heathen carry us to every part of the country. "After the death of Joshua" (Judges) the Canaanites appear to have recovered power, and to have rebuilt some of the cities which he had ruined. Judah fought the Perizzites ("villagers") at Berek (Beqheh) in the lower hills W. of Jerush, and even set fire to that city after a distant (Nu 21: 2–15), which is identified (of Josh 15: 15–19) as lying in a "dry" (AV "south") region, yet with springs not far away. The actual site (edh Dhibehârî) is a village with ancient tombs 12 miles S.W. of Hebron; it has no springs, but about 7 miles to the N.E. there is a mound still strong with "upper and lower springs." As regards the Philie cities (Jgs 1: 18), the LXX reading seems preferable; for the Gr says that Judah "did not take Gaza" nor Ashkelon nor Ekron, which agrees with the story of Rahab "lying in the "valley" (ver 19) due to the Canaanites having "chariots of iron." The Can. chariots are often mentioned about this time in the Am Tab and Egypt accounts speak of their being plated with metals. Manasses, Ephraim, Zebulun, Asher and Naphtali, were equally powerless against cities in the plains (vs 27–33); and Israel began to mingle with the Canaanites, while the tribe of Dan seems never to have really occupied its allotted region, and remained encamped in the borders of Judah till some, at least, of its wandering groups found a home under Hermon (1: 134; 18: 1–30) in the time of Jonathan, the grandson of Moses.

(2) Defeat of Sisera.—The oppression of Israel by Jabin II of Hazor, in Lower Galilee, appears to have occurred in the time of Rameses II, who, in his 8th year, conquered Shalem (Sâlam, N. of Tannach), Anem (A'sûn), Dapur (Delbârih, at the foot of Tabor), with Bethanath (Arûntah) in Upper Galilee (Brugæs, Hist Egypt, II, 64). Sisera may here have been an "Egypt" resident at the court of Jabin (Jgs 4: 2); his camps occurred near the foot of Tabor (ver 14) to which he advanced E. from Haroschet (al Harathîyeh) on the edge of the sea plain. His host "perished at Endor" (Ps 83: 9) and his chariots of iron were destroyed in the open plain of the Kedesh in "the plain of swamps" (4: 11) to which he fled is doubtful. Perhaps Kedesh of Issachar (1 Ch 6: 72) is intended at Tell Kades, 3 miles N. of Tannach, for the plain is here swampy in parts. The march of "some" of the army is thought from Tannach to Megiddo (6: 9), but the old identification of the latter city with the Rom town of Legio (Legiôn) was a mere guess which does not fit with Egypt accounts placing Megiddo near the Jordan. The large site at Mig’didâ, in the Valley of Jerceil seems to be more suitable for all the OT as well as for the Egypt accounts (SWP, II, 90–99).

3. Gideon's victory.—The subsequent oppression by Midianites and others would seem to have coincided with the troubles which occurred in the 8th year of Minepeth (see EXXOXS, Tuz). Gideon's home (Jgs 6: 11) at Ophrah, in Manasses, is placed by Sam tradition at Fer'ata, 6 miles W. of Shechem, but his victory was won in the Valley of Jerceil (7: 1–22), the sites of Beth-shittah (Shefoh) and Hazor (8: 4–11). As Gideon perished at the "raven's rock" and the "wolf's hollow" (7: 25), W. of the Jordan. It is remarkable (as pointed out by the present author in 1874) that, 3 miles N. of Jeriel, a sharp peak is now called "the raven's nest," and a ravine 4 miles farther north is named "the wolf's hollows." These sites are rather farther S. than might be expected, unless the two chiefs were separated from the fugitives, who followed Zebah and Zalmunna to Gilead. In this episode (Mt. Gilead) (7: 3) seems to be a clerical error for "Mt. Gilgoth," unless the name survives in corrupt form at Atû Jalûd ("Goliath's spring"), which is a large pool, usually supposed to be the spring of Harod (7: 1), where Gideon camped, E. of Jerceil.

The story of Abimelech takes us back to Shechem. He was made king by the "oak of the pillar" (9: 6), which was no doubt Abraham's oak already noticed; it seems also to be called "the enchanter's oak" (ver 57), probably from some superstition connected with the burial of the teraphim under it by Jacob. The place called Beer, to which Jotham fled from Abimelech (ver 21), may have been Beeroth (Birch) in the lot of Benjamin. Thebez, the town taken by the latter (ver 50), and where he met his death, is now the village Tubsa, 10 miles N.E. of Shechem.

The Ammonite oppression of Israel in Gilead occurred about 300 years after the Heb conquest (11 20), and Jephthah the deliverer returned to Beeroth (ver 29), which was probably the present village Saf (already noticed), from his exile in the "land of Tob" (vs 36). This may have been near Tayibeh, 9 miles S. of Gadara, in the extreme N. of Gilead—a place notable for its ancient dolmens and rude stone monuments. It occurs also at Mizpah. Jephthah's dispute with the men of Ephraim (12 1) indicates the northern position of Mizpah. Jero (11 33) is known, but lay near Rabbath-ammon (Josh 13 25; 2 S 54 5); it is to be distinguished from Jero (Ar'air) in the Arnon ravine, mentioned in Jgs 11 26.

The scene of Samson's exploits lies in the shireh -lah of Judah on the borders of Philistia. His home at Zorah (Sor'ah) was on the hills N. of the Valley of Sorek, and looked down on "the camp of Dan" (14 3), which is traditionally on the salt valley near Beth-shemesh. Eshtaol (Esho'ah) was less than 2 miles E. of Zorah on the same ridge. Timnah (14 1) was only 2 miles W. of Beth-shemesh, at the present ruin Tubnah. The region was one of vineyards, and the name Sorek (Sork) still survives at a ruin 2 miles W. of Zorah. Sorek signified a "choice vine," and a rock-cut wine press exists at the site (SWP, III, 126). These 5 places, all close together, were also close to the Philistian corn lands (15 5) in a region of vines and olives. Samson's place of refuge in the "left of the rock of Etam" (see 15 8) was probably at Bet 'Athph, only 5 miles E. of Zorah, but rising with a high knob above the southern precipices of the gorge which opens into the Valley of Sorek. In this knob, under the village, is a rock passage now called "the well of refuge" (Bit el Hassiath), which may have been the "left" into which Samson "went down." Lehi (ver 9) was apparently in the valley beneath, and the name ("the jaw") may refer to the narrow mouth of the gorge whence, after conference with the Philis, the men of Judah "went down" (ver 11) to the "left of the rock of Etam" (SWP, III, 83, 137), which was a passage 250 ft. long leading down, under the tower, to the river (S 77); and probably is still the way for a small quantity of wine; but has never been used to carry six measures of barley (ver 15). The courteous salutation of his reapers by Boaz (2 4) recalls the common Arab, greeting (Allah ma'kram), "God be with you." But the thin wine (ver 14) is the cup of the peasant, who only "dip" their bread in oil.

(1) Samuel.—The two Books of S present an equally valuable picture of life, and an equally real topography throughout. Samuel (1 S 1 2) was the founder of a pious Levite (1 S 6 27)—descended from Zuph who had lived at Ephrathah (Bethlehem; cf 1 S 9 45,5), had his house at Ramah (1 19) close to Gibeah, and this town (er -Rôm) was Samuel's home also (7 17; 25 1). The family is described as "Ramathites, Zuphites of Mt. Ephraim" (1 1), but the term "Mt. Ephraim" was not confined to the lot of Ephraim, since it included Bethel and Ramah, in the land of Benjamin (Jgs 4 5). As a Levite, Elkanah obeyed the law of making annual visits to the central shrine, though his family had not to be generally observed in an age when "every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Jgs 21 25). The central shrine had been removed from Joshua from Shechem to the remote site of Shiloh (Josh 18 1), perhaps near the temple (ver 19) was pitched (cf 1 S 2 22) and remained for 4 centuries till the death of...
of Eli. The great defeat of Israel, when the ark was captured by the Philis, took place not far from Mizpah (1 4). Jonathan, with the stone of help (Ehern-esh), which was in the mountains, so that its inhabitants “came down” from “the hill” (6 21; 7 1) to fetch the ark, which abode there for twenty years, till the beginning of Saul’s reign (14 18), when, after the war, it may have been removed to Ramah. But which place the latter was probably removed after Eli’s death, when Shiloh was deserted. The exact site of Nob is not known, but probably (cf Isa 10 22) it was close up to Mizpah, whence the first glimpse of Jerus is caught, and thus near Gibeah, where it was laid out close to the massacre of the priests (1 51 1; 22 0 18; 2 Ch 1 3), when the ark was again taken to Kirjath-jearim (2 6 2). Mizpah (Tell en-Nasheb) was the gathering-place of Israel under Samuel and the “stone of help” (Ehern-esh) employed, after his victory over the Philis, “between Mizpah and Shen” (1 7 12)—the latter place (see LXX) being probably the same as Jeshannah (‘Ain Sinai), 6 miles N of Mizpah which Samuel visited yearly as a judge (ver 16).

The journey of Saul, who, “seeking asses found a kingdom,” presents a topography which has often been misunderstood. He started (9 4) from Gibeath (Jebra) and went first to the land of Shalisha through Mt. Ephraim. Baal-shalisha (2 K 4 42) appears to have been the present Keft Thilth, 18 miles N of Lydda and 24 miles N W of Gibeath. Saul then searched the land of Shalim—probably that of Shuah (1 5 17), N E of Gibeath. Finally he went south beyond the border of Benjamin (10 2) to a city in the “land of Zuph,” which seems probably to have been Bethlem, whence (as above remarked) Samuel’s family—descendants of Zuph—came originally. If so, it is remarkable that Saul and David were reared in the same city, one which Samuel visited later (16 1 2 f) to sacrifice, just as he did when meeting Saul (9 12), who was probably known to him, since Gibeath and Ramah were only 2 miles apart. Saul’s journey home thus naturally lay on the border of Benjamin (1 2), and so along the Bethel road (10 2 3) to his home at Gibeath (v 5 10). It is impossible to suppose that Samuel met him at Ramah—a common mistake which creates great confusion in the topography.

Saul’s coronation and first campaign. The Lenten note—Saul concealed the fact of his anointing (10 16) till the lot fell upon him at Mizpah. This public choice by lot has been thought (Wellhausen, Hist Israel, 1885, 252) to indicate a double narrative, but to a Hebrew there would not appear to be any discrepancy, since “The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of Jehovah” (Prov 16 33). Even at Mizpah he was not fully accepted till his triumph over the Ammonites, when the kingdom was “renewed” at Gilgal (11 14). This campaign, 10 miles in length, and connecting the Jezreel and Jordan valleys, occupied only 7 days’ respite was allowed to the men of Jabez in Gilead (11 3), during which news was sent to Saul at Gibeath, and messengers dispatched “throughout the borders of Israel” (ver 7), while the host gathered at Beth-shemesh on the 7th or 8th day (v 8 10) at dawn. Bezeek appears to be a different place from that W of Jerus (Jgs 1 4) and to have been in the middle of Pal at Beth, 14 miles N. of Shechem, and 25 miles W. of Jabez, which probably lay in the upper part of Gilead, 20 miles distant for the messengers would not have exceeded 80 miles; and, allowing a day for the news to reach Saul and another for the march from Bezeek to Jabesh, there would have been just time for the gathering of Israel at this fairly central meeting-place.

The scene of the victory over the Philis at Michmash is equally real. They had a “post” in Geba (or Gibeath, 13 3), or a governor (of LXX), whom Jonathan slew. They came up to Michmash (Mochmids) to attack Jonathan’s force which held Gibeah, on the southern side of the Michmash valley, hard by. The northern cliff of the great gorge was called Bozez (“shining”) in contrast to the south (Gath), wherein the Philis were described as “star-nosed” or “thorn” (14 4). Jos (Jr, V, ii, 2) says that Gibeath of Saul was by “the valley of thorns,” and the ravine, flanked by the two precipitous cliffs E. of Michmash, is still called Wady es Suweinit, or “the valley of little thorn trees.” Jonathan climbed the steep slope that leads to a small flat top (1 14 14 AV), and surprised the Phili and their forces. The pursuit was by Bethel to the Valley of Ajalon, down the steep Beth-horon pass (v 23 31); but it should be noted that there was no “wood” (v 25 26) on this bare hilly ridge, and the word (of Cant 5 1) evidently means “honeycomb.” It is also possible that the altar raised by Saul, for fulfilment of the Law (Gen 9 4; Ex 20 25), was at Nob where the central shrine was then established.

David’s early life—Doe. The period of Saul’s reign, the wilderness below Bethlehem, where many a silent and dreadful “Valley of Shadows” (cf Ps 23 3) might make the stoutest heart fail. The lion crept up from the Jordan valley, and (on another occasion) the bear came up through the rugged moun- tain above (1 17 34). No bears are now known S. of Hermon, but the numerous references (2 K 2 21; Isa 59 11; Hos 13 8; Prov 17 12; 28 15) show that they must have been exterminated, like the lion, in comparatively late times. The victory over Goliath, described in the chapter containing this allusion, occurred in the Valley of Elah near Shocoth (Shuweteke); and this broad valley (Wady es Sulit) ran into the Phili plain at the probable site of Gath (Tell es Sib) to which the pursuit led (1 17 1 252). The watercourse still presents “smooth stones” (ver 40) fit for the sling, which is still used by Arab shepherds; and the valley still has in it fine “terebinth”-like trees from whose shades David took his support in his armor of the giant (v 5 6) indicates an early stage of culture, which is not contradicted by the mention of an iron spearhead (ver 7), since iron is found to have been in use in Pal long before David’s time. The narrative of Goliath being taken “to Jerus” is also capable of explanation. Jerus was not conquered till at least 10 years later, but it was a general practice (as late as the 7th cent. BC in Assyr) to preserve the heads of dead foes by salting them, and it was probably done in another case (2 K 10 7) when the heads of Ahab’s sons were sent from Samaria to Jezebel to be exposed at the gate.

David’s outlaw life began when he took refuge with Samuel at the “settlements” (Nadish) near Ramah, where the company of prophets lived. He easily met Jonathan near Gibeath, which was only 2 miles E.; and the “stone of departure” (“Ezel,” I S 20 19) may have marked the Levitical boundary of that town. Nob also (21 1) was, as we have seen, not far off, and reached Jabez on the 7th or 8th day (v 8 10) at dawn. Bezeek appears to be a different place from that W of Jerus (Jgs 1 4) and to have been in the middle of Pal at Betk, 14 miles N. of Shechem, and 25 miles W. of Jabez, which probably lay in the upper part of Gilead, 20 miles distant for the messengers would not have exceeded 80 miles; and, allowing a day for the news to reach Saul and another for the march from Bezeek to Jabesh, there would have been just time for the gathering of Israel at this fairly central meeting-place.

side of the same valley, 3 miles farther up; and Hereth (22 5) was also near, but "in Judah" (22 3), as at the passage Kerohai on a wooded spur 7 miles N.W. of Hebron, and then the "dovens" (ver 4) to Keilah 2 miles away to the W. As there was no safety for the outlaws, either in Philistia or in Judah, they had to retreat to the wilderness of Ziph (Tell ez Zif), 4 miles S.E. of Hebron. The word "wood" (háres) may more probably be a proper name, represented by the ruin of Khoreis, rather more than a mile S. of Ziph, while the hill Hachilah (ver 19) might be the long spur, over the Jeshimon or desert of Judah, 6 miles E. of Ziph, now called Maon (Mr. Maon) on the edge of the same desert still farther S., about 8 miles from Hebron. En-gedi (23 29; 24 1 2) was on the precipices by the Dead Sea. The "wild goats" (ibex) still exist here in large droves, and the caves of this desert are still used as wells for sheep in spring (ver 3). The villagers S. of Hebron are indeed remarkable for their large flocks—which by agreement with the nomads—are sent to pasture in the Jeshimon, like those of Nabal, the rich man of Carmel (Karmel). Maon of Maon (25 2), who refused the customary present to David's band which had protected his shepherds "in the fields" (ver 15) or pastures of the wilderness. In summer David would naturally return to the higher ridge of Hachilah (25 1) on the south side of which there is a large (impossible save by a long detour), across which he talked to Saul (ver 13), likening himself (ver 20) to the desert "partridge" still found in this region.

Defeat and Death of Saul.—The site of Ziklag is doubtful, but it evidently lay in the desert S. of Beer-sheba (Josh 16 31; 19 5; 1 Ch 4 30; 1 27 6 12), far from Gath, so that King Achish did not know whether David had railed the S. of Judah, or the tribes toward Shur. Saul's power in the mountains was irresistible; and it was for this reason perhaps that his fatal battle with the Philis occurred far N. in the plain near Jezreel. They camped (1 28 4) by the fine spring of Shunem (Šulam), and Saul on Gilboa to the S. The visit to Endor (Adufr) was thus a perilous adventure, as Saul must have been visited by night round the Phili host to visit this place N. of Shunem. He returned to the spur of Gilboa on which Jezreel stands (29 1), and this spring (now Jezreel) is a copious and only N. of the village Zeror (31 12) was at the mouth of the valley of Jezreel at Beisán, and here the bodies of Saul and his sons were burned by the men of Jabesh-gilead; but, as the bones were preserved (ver 13), 1 Ch 21 13), it is possible that the corpses were cremated in pottery jars afterward buried under the tree. Excavations in Pal and in Babylonia show that this was an early practice, not only in the case of infants (as at Gezer, and Taanach), but also of grown men. See PALESTINE (RECENT EXPLORATIONS). The list of cities to which David sent presents at the time of Saul's death (30 26 31) includes those near Ziklag and as far N. as Hebron, thus referring to "all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt.

(6) Wellhausen's theory of a double narrative.—The study of David's wanderings, it may be noted, and of the climatic conditions in the Jeshimon desert, does not serve to confirm Wellhausen's "theory of a double narrative, based on the secret sultan and public chieftain of Saul, and on the fact that the gloomy king had forgotten the name of David's father. The history is not a "pious make-up" without a "word of truth" (Wellhausen, Hist Israel, 429 430; and David as a "youth" of twenty years, may yet have been called a "man of war," while "transplanted" (p. 67) will hardly be recognized by the reader of this genuine chronicle. Nor was there any "Ašpek in Sharon" (p. 260), and David not "amused himself by going first toward the north" from Gilbeah (p. 267); his visit to Ramah does not appear to be a "worthless anachronistic anecdote" (p. 271); and no one who has written in the terrible Jeshimon could regard the meeting at Hachilah as a "jest" (p. 265). Nor did the hill ("the ducy top") "take its name from the "dovens" (p. 272)"—probably means the Sālāḥa-māḥikbākh ("cliff of slipping" or "of slipping away") near the valley of Maon (1 S 33 19 24 25), which lay farther S. than Zipp.

(7) Early years of David's reign.—David, till the 5th year of his reign, was king of Judah only. The first battle with Saul's son occurred at Gibeon (2 S 1 13), where the pool was very near the only N. of David's capital at Hebron. Nothing more is said about the Philis till David had captured Jerus, when they advanced on the new capital by the valley of Rehphaim (5 22), which apparently ran from S. of Jerus to join the valley of Elah. If David was then at Adullam ("the hold," ver 17 AV; of 1 S 22 5), it is easy to understand how he cut off the Philis retreat (2 S 25), and thus conquered all the hill country to Gezer (ver 7). After this campaign, brought from Baale-judah (Kiriath-jearim) to Jerus (6 2), and further wars were beyond the limits of Western Pal, in Moab (8 2) and in Syria (vs 3 12); but for "Syrians" (ver 13) the more correct reading appears to be the Eomites (1 Ch 12 21 and the "Valley of Salt" was probably S. of the Dead Sea. Another war with the Syrians, aided by Arameans from E. of the Euphrates, occurred E. of the Jordan (2 S 10 16 18), and was followed by the siege of the Mabhabh-замра ("Amman), the gateway where they have notice of the "city of waters" (12 27), or lower town by the stream, contrasted, it seems, with the citadel which was on the northern hill.

(8) Hebrew letter-writing.—In this connection we find the first notice of a "letter" (11 14) as written by David to Joab. Writing is of course noticed as early as the time of Moses when—as we now know—the Cananaeans wrote letters on clay tablets in cuneiform script. These, however, were penned by special scribes; and such a scribe is mentioned elsewhere (Jes 8 14). In addition, we have noticed these, where they have employed a professional writer (2 S 8 17), while Uriah, who carried his own letter in the letter, was probably unable to read. Even in Isaiah's time the art was not general (Isa 29 12), though Heb kings could not apparently write at all (Jer 17 18; 2 K 19 14); to the present day the accomplishment is not general in the East, even in the upper class. It should be noted that the first evidence of the use of an alphabet is found in the early alphabetic Ps and the oldest dated alphabetic text yet known is later than 900 BC. The script used in the time of Moses may have been cuneiform, which was still employed at Gezer for traders' tablets in 409 BC. The alphabet may have come into use first among Hebrews, through Phoen influence in the time of David; and so far no script except this and the cuneiform has been unearthed in Pal, unless it is to be recognized in signs of the Hitite syllabary at Lachish and Gezer. Another interesting point, is, that Hebrew civilization in David's time, is the first mention of "malchus" (2 S 13 20; 18 9; 1 K 3 33 38), which are unnoticed in the Pent. They are represented as pack animals on an Assyrian bas-relief; but, had they been known to Moses, they would probably have been condemned as unclean. The sons of David fed on mules from Baal-hazor (Tell jājār) to Eribhaim (now probably Tā'ā'ibeh), N. of Bethel, where Absalom murdered Amnon.
(9) Later Years of David's Reign.—On the rebellion of Absalom David retreated to Mahanaim, apparently by the road N. of the Mount of Olives, if the Tg. of Judith (14 15 5) is correct in placing Bahurim at Almon (‘Almût), N.E. of Jerus. It is not clear where the "woe of Ephraim," in which Absalom perished, may have been, but it was beyond Jordan in Gilead (17 22; 18 6); and oak woods are more common there than in Western Pal. The latest revolt, after Absalom's death, was in the extreme north at Abel (‘Abîth), in Upper Galilee (20 14), after which Joab's journey is the last incident to be studied in the Books of S. For census purposes he went S. of the Jordan to Arerō (perhaps the city on the Arnon), to the "river of Gad" (Wâdy Nâ'âdr) near Jazer, and through Gilead. Tahsim-hodshi (24 6) is believed (on the authority of three Gr MSS) to be a corruption of "the Hittites at Kadesh" (Kodesh), the great city on the Orontes (see Hittûttes), which lay on the northern boundary of David's dominions, S. of the kingdom of Hamath. Thence Joab returned to Zidôn and Tyre, and after visiting all Judah to Beersheba reached Jerus again within ten months. The acquisition of the temple-site then closes the book.

(1) Solomon's Provinces.—The Books of K contain also some interesting questions of geography. Solomon's twelve provinces appear to answer very closely to the lots of the twelve tribes described in Josh. They included (1 K 4 7 19) the following: (a) Ephraim, (b) Dan, (c) Southern Judah (see Josh 12 17), (d) Manasseh, (e) Issachar, (f) Northern Gilead and Bashan, (g) Southern Gilead, (h) Naphtali, (i) Asher, (j) part of Issachar and probably Zebulûn (the text is doubtful, for the order of ver 17 differs in LXX), (k) Benjamin, (l) Reuben. LXX renders the last clause (ver 18), "and one Naphsh [i.e. officiate] in the land of Judah, probably superior to the other twelve. Solomon's dominions included Philistia and Southern Syria, and stretched along the trade route by Tadmor (Palmyra) to Tishphah on the Euphrates (vs 21 24; of 9 18=Tamar; 2 Ch 8 4=Tadmor). Another Tishphah (now Tashkhar) lay 6 miles S.W. of Shechem (2 K 15 16). Gezer was presented to Solomon's wife by the Pharaoh (1 K 9 16).

(2) Geography of the Northern Kingdom.—Jero- boam was an Ephraimite from Zereda, probably within 4 miles N.M. of Bethel, but the LXX reads "Sarîna," which might be Sarro, 1½ miles E. of Shiloah. After the revolt of the ten tribes, "Shishak king of Egypt" (11 40; 14 25) sacked Jerus. His own record, though much damaged, shows that he not only invaded the mountains near Jerus, but that he even conquered part of Galilee. The border between Israel and Judah lay S. of Bethel, where Jeroboam's calf-temple was erected (12 28). Ramash (er-Râm) being a frontier town with Qina and Mizpah (16 17 23); but after the Syrian raid into Galilee (ver 20), the capital of Israel was fixed at Tirzah (ver 21), a place celebrated for its beauty (Cant 6 4), and perhaps to be placed at Tell Mâsir, about 11 miles N.E. of Shechem, in romantic scenery above the Jordan valley. Omri reigned here also for six years (16 23) before he built Samaria, which remained the capital till 722 BC. Samaria appears to have been a city at least as large as Jerus, a strong site 5 miles N.W. of Shechem, commanding the main road to its west. It resisted the Syrians for 3 years, and when it fell Sargon took away 27,290 captives. Excavations at the site will, it may be hoped, yield results of value not as yet published. See next article.

The wanderings of Elijah extended from Zarephath (Sourphûd), S. of Sidon, to Madânah. The position of the Brook Cherith (17 3) where—according to one reading—"the Arabs brought him bread and flesh" (17 6) is not known. The site of this great contest with the prophets of the Tyrian Baal is supposed to be at el Makrâkhah ("the place of burning") at the southeastern end of the Carmel ridge. Some early king of Israel perhaps, or one of the judges (of Dt 33 19), had built an altar to Jeh above the Kishôn (1 K 18 20 40) at Carmel; but, as the water (ver 35) probably came from the river, it is doubtful whether this altar was on the "top of Carmel," 1,500 ft. above, from which Elijah's servant had full view of the sea (vs 42 43). Elijah must have run before Ahab no less than 15 miles, from the nearest point on Carmel (ver 46) to Jezreel, and the journey of the Shumammite woman to find Elisha (2 K 4 25) was equally long. The vineyard of Naboth in Jezreel (1 K 21 1) was perhaps on the east of the city (now Zerûîn), where rock-cut wine presses exist. In the account of the ascension of Elijah, the expression "went down to Bethel" (2 K 2 2) is difficult, if he went "from Gilgal" (ver 1). The town intended might be Jîfîtlûn, on a high hill 7 miles N. of Bethel. LXX, however, reads "they came.

(3) Places connected with Elisha.—The home of Elisha was at Abel-meholah (1 K 19 16) in the Jordan valley (Jgs 7 22), probably at Arûn (Aroer), 10 miles S. of Beth-shan. If we suppose that Ophel (2 K 5 24 Rvr), where he lived, was the present "Afulâh, it is not only easy to understand that he would often "pass by" Shunem (which lay between Ophel and Abel-meholah), but also how Naaman might have gone from the palace of Jezreel to Ophel, and thence to the Jordan and back again to Ophel (vs 6 14 24), in the course of a single day in his chariot. The road down the valley of Jezreel was easy, and up it Jehu afterward drove furiously, coming from Ramoth in Gilead, and visible afar off from the wall of Jezreel (9 20). The "top of the asents" (ver 13), at Ramoth, refers no doubt to the high hill on which this city (now Reîmûâ) stood as a strong fortress on the border between Israel and the Syrians. The flight of Ahaziah of Judah, from Jezreel was apparently N. by Gur (Kûrân), 4 miles W. of Ibleam (Yebôn), on the road to "the garden house" (Beit Jeneû), and thence by Megiddo (Mu-ribûd) down to the Jordan valley to Jerus (9 27 28). Of the rebellion of Moab (2 K 1 1; 3 4) it is enough to point out here that King Mesha's account on the M S agrees with the OT, even in the minute detail that "men of Gad dwelt in Ataroth from old" (cf. Nu 32 34), though it lay in the lot of Reuben.

The topographical notices in the books written after the captivity require but short notice. The Benjamites built up Loed (Laud), Ozo (Kafir 'Anat) and Ader (Adar), which in the list of towns in the books of the Lists of Thothmes III, a century before the Heb conquest, on the shores of the Dead Sea (cf. access 8.5.13), is known to us from the first signs of the OT. His list of Rehoboth's fortresses (2 Ch 11 6-10) includes 14 towns, most of which were on the borders of the diminished kingdom of Judah, some being noticed (such as Ash and Mearah) in the lists of Edom. He speaks of the "valley of Ziphathiah" (14 10), now Wady Safah, which is otherwise unnoticed, and places it correctly at Mearah (Meara'ab) on the edge of the Philistian. He is equally clear about the topography in describing the attack on Jezreel by the Ammonites, Moabites and Edomites. They camped at En-gedi ('Atin Jidy), and marched W. toward Tokok (Edom) captivity and sanctuary, after the Heb victory, was in the valley of Beraea (2 Ch 30 20; 4.28), which retains its name as Beershe'l, 4 miles W. of Aijalon.

IV. Palestine in the Poetic Books of the OT.

In Job the scene is distinctly Edomite. Uz (Job 1:1; cf. Gen 22 21 ETV; Jer 25 20; of Job 46 11) are the Assygr Hezu and Bazu reached by Earhart in 1673 BC S. of Edom. Tema and Sheha (Job 6 19) are noticed yet earlier, by Tiglath-pileser III, and Sargon, who conquered the Thamudites and Nabataeans. We have to place the conquest of snow-capped mountains and ice (Job 6 16) with notice of the desert and the Arabah valley (24 5), which could hardly apply to any region except Edom. Again, we have a nomad population dwelling close to a city (29 4-7)—perhaps Yezre'l or E. There were mines, not in the Sinaitic desert, but at Punon in Northern Edom (cf. 28 2-11). The white broom (30 4) is distinctive of the deserts of Moab and Edom. The wild ass and the ostrich (33 13) are known only in the desert E. of Edom, while the stork (33 13 RVm) could have been found only in the Arabah, or in the Jordan valley. The wild ox (39 9 RV), or Bos primigenius, is now extinct (LXX "unicorn", Nu 23 25; Dt 33 17), though such bones occur in the 1.700 BC in Syria by Tiglath-pileser I (cf. Pss 29 6), and is mentioned as late as the time of Isaiah (34 7) in connection with Edom; its Heb name ("kayn") is often compared to the crocodile ("leviathan," 41 1), it was evidently well known to the writer, who refers to its strong, musky smell (ver 31), and it existed not only in Egypt but in Pal, and is still found in the Crocodile River, N. of Caesarea in Sharon. Beheroth (40 15), though commonly supposed to be the hippopotamus, is more probably the elephant (on account of its long tail, its trunk, and its habit of feeding in mountains, vs 17,20,24); and the elephant was known to the Assyrians in the 9th cent. BC, and was tamed in the upper Euphrates in the 16th cent. BC. The physical allusions in Job seem clearly, as a rule, to point to Edom, as do the geographical names; and though Jewish tradition in the 4th cent. (St.Silva, and W. Delitzsch) traced Uz in the LXX (42 18) defines it as lying "on the boundary of Edom and Arabia." None of these allusions serves to fix dates, nor do the peculiarities of the language, though they suggest Amarn. and Arab. influences. The mention of Babylonians (1 17) (Kadisz) as raiders may, however, point to about 600 BC, since they could not have reached Edom except from the N., and did not appear in Pal between the time of Amraphel (who only reached Kadesh-barnea) and of Nebuchadnezzer, at least clear (24 12-13) that this great poem was written in a time of general anarchy, and of Arab lawlessness.

In the Ps there are many allusions to the natural phenomena of Pal, but there is very little detailed topography. The Ps of David's conquest of Damascus (Ps 22 11, 13) refers to the time of Solomon, being the last in the original collection of "prayers of David" (ver 20). In Ps 24 we find a confederacy of Edom, Ishmael, Moab and the Hagarites (or "wanderers") E. of Pal; cf. Ps 1 19-22 with Gen (in Lebanon), Ammon, Amalek, and Tyre, all in alliance with Assyria—a condition which first existed in 732 BC, when Tiglath-pileser III conquered Damascus. "Edom is the hidden" (Ps 16 11; Isa 9 1) by Prov the allusions are more peaceful, but not geographical. "I only refer to Edom in Ps 8, 12, 13; 15 11, 13, to trade (7 16; 13 14); and to Edom and to Tyre (33 10, 15) as the inaccessible passage (38 6) reads literally, "As he that packs a stone into the stonecutter's manger, so is he that gathers". Jerome said that this referred to a superstitious custom: and the erection of stone heaps at graves, or round a funeral pyre (Gen 31 45,46), is a widely spread and very ancient custom (still preserved by Arabs), each stone being the memorial of a visitor to the spot, who thus honored either a local ghost or demon, or a dead man—a rite which was foolish in the eyes of a Hebrew of the age in which this verse was written (see Zep 1 18, 399, 524). The geography of Cant is specially important to a right understanding of this bridal ode of the Syrian princess who was Solomon's first bride.

4. Songs of Solomon (6:5-7:14). It is not confined, as many say it is, to the north, but includes the whole of Pal and Syria. The writer names Kedar in North Arabia (1 5) and Egypt, whence horses came in Solomon's time (1 9; 1 K 10 28,29). He knows the heena (Arv mphimos) and the vineyards of En-gedi (1 14), where vineyards still existed in the 12th cent. AD. He speaks of the "rose of Sharon (2 1), as well as of Lebanon, with Shenir (Assyr Sinor) and Hermion (4 8) above Damascus (7 4). He speaks of the slopes of Gilead (6 5), and the brown pool, full of small fish, in the brook below Heshbon (7 4), in Moab. The locks of the "peaceful one" (6 13, Vulg pacifici) are like the thick copes of Carmel; the king is in sight in the gallery (6 4). She is "beautiful as Tirzah (in Samaria), comely as Jezus, terrible to look at" (6 4 AV). She is a garden and a "paradise" ("orchard") of spices in Lebanon, some of which spices (calamus, cinnamom, frankincense and myrrh) have come from far lands (4 12-15). Solomon's vineyard—another emblem of the bride—(1 6; 8 11) was in Baal-hamon, which some suppose to be Baal-hermon, still famous for its vineyards. He comes to fetch her from the wilderness (3 6); and the dust raised by his followers, is like that of the wild ass, which stalk which over the dry plains of Bashan in summer. The single word "paradise" (4 13 m) is hardly enough to establish late date, since—though used in Pers—its etymology and origin are unknown. The word for "paradise" (Hb Hekhalot) is also not Pers (6 11), for the Arar, word שָׁם, jash, is Sem, and means a "pair," implying the walnut which abounds in Shechem. The "rose of Sharon" (2 1), according to the Tg, was the white "narcissus"; and the Heb word occurs also in Assyr (habal будал), as noted by Delitzsch (quoting WAF, V, 32, no. 4), referring to a white bulbous plant.
Sharon in spring is covered still with wild narcissi, Arab. būsel (cf Isa 35:1-2). There is perhaps no period when such a poem is more likely to have been written than in the time of Solomon, when Israel “dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree” (1 K 4:25); when the rose and the fallow deer (Cant 2:17; 1 K 4:25) abounded; and when merchants (Cant 3:6) brought “powders” from afar; when also the dominion included Damascus and Southern Lebanon, as well as Western Pal with Gilead and Moab. See also Song of Songs.

V. Palestine in the Prophets.—Isaiah (1-8) likens Zion, when the Assyrian armies were holding Samaria, Moab and Philistia, to “a booth in a vineyard, a lodge in a garden of cucumbers.” He refers no doubt to a “tower” (Mt 21:33), or platform, such as is to be found beside the rock-cut wine press in the deserted vineyards of Pal; and such is still built, for the watchman to stand on, in vineyards and vegetable gardens.

The chief topographical question (10:28-32) refers to the Assyrian advance from the north, when the outposts covered the march through Samaria (whether in 732, 722, or 702 BC) to Philistia. They extended on the left wing to Ai (Hajān), Michmash (Mukhmās), and Geba, S. of the Michmash valley (Jeho), leading to the flight of the villagers, from Ramah (er-Rám) and the region of Gebesh—which included Ramah, with Geba (1 S 22:6) and Migron (1 S 14:2) or “the precipice.” They were alarmed also at Gallim (Bait Jāla), and Anathoth (‘Anadā), near Jerus; yet the advance ceased at Nob (cf Neh 11:32) where, as before noted, the first glimpse of Zion would be caught if Nob was at or near Mizpah (Tell en-Nasbeh). The main north road leading W. of Ramah.

Another passage refers to the towns of Moab (Isa 15:1-6), and to Nimrin (Tell ‘Nīmīn) and Zoor (Tell esh-Shāghār) in the valley of Shittim. The ascent of Luhith (ver 5) is the present Ta‘al el-Heith, on the southern slope of Nebo (Jebel Neba). The curious term “a heifer of three years old” (cf Jer 48:34 m) is taken from LXX, but might better be rendered “a round place with a group of three” (see EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH). It is noticed with the “high places” of Moab (Isa 15:2; Jer 48:35), and probably refers to one of those large and ancient stone circles, surviving in the central group of three rude pillars, which still remain in Moab (SEP, I, 187, 203, 293) near Nebo and Zoor. Sīmāh—probably ostrich want of care for her young, because she endeavors (like other birds) to escape, and thus draws away the hunter from the nest. This verse should not be regarded as showing that the author knew that whales were mammals, since the word “sea-monsters” (AV) is more correctly rendered “jackals” (RV) or “wild beasts.”

In Ezek (ch 27), Tyre appears as a city with a very widespread trade extending from Asia Minor to Arabia and Egypt, and from Assyria to the isles (or “coasts”) of the Mediterranean. The “oaks of Bashan” (27:6; Isa 2:13; Zee 11:2) are still found in the S.W. of that region near Gilead. Judah and Israel then provided wheat, honey, oil and balm for export as in the time of Jacob. Damascus sent white wool and the wine of Helbon (Helbōn), 13 miles N., where fine vineyards still exist. The northern border described (47:15-18) is the same that marked that of the dominions of David, running along the Eleutherus River toward Zedad (Sīdād). It is described also in Nu 34:8-11 as passing Riblah (Riblōh) and including Ain (el ‘Ain), a village on the western slopes of the Anti-Lebanon, E. of Riblah. In this passage (as in Ezek 47:18) the Hazmon (or Bashan plain) is excluded from the land of Israel, the border following the Jordan valley, which seems to point to a date earlier than the time when the Havoth-jair (Nu 32:41; Dt 3:14; Josh...
13:30; Jgs 10:4; 1 K 4:13; 1 Ch 2:23), in Gilgal and Bashan, were conquered or built—possibly after the death of Joshua. The southern border of the land is described by Ezekiel (47:19) as running from Kadesh to Bethel. From Cederon (Køthah, 5 miles E. of Jamnia) southeast of the present village of el Mughir on the low hills with a sea view, 17 miles from Jerus and 6 miles south of Lydda, near Cedron (Okom s.v. "Modeim") places Modin. The first victory of Judas (3:24) was won at Beth-horon, and the second at Emmaus, "Caesarea", by the Greeks, the latter scene of Joshua's victories also.

The Green text attempted to reach Jerus from the S., and were again defeated at Beth-zur (4:29), now Beit-Sfir, on the wetside, 15 miles S. of Jerus, where the road runs through a pass. In the year 165 BC Judas was defeated at Bethsacharias (6:32), now Beit-shärâb, a mile S. of Jerus, but the cause was saved, and the whole of the kingdom was in the hands of the Jews. In the year 159 BC Judas was defeated at Kaphath-salama (perhaps Melkhat-salama) and penetrating to the Moab border, 36 miles S.E. of Beth-horon, in the year 153 BC, the battle in which Judas was killed (9:5:15) was fought also near Beth-horon. He came upon the Greeks from the east close by, and defeated the Greeks on his right, driving them to Mt. Aretus (or Beth-zetho, according to Jos. Ant. XII. 6:1), seven years later he won a final victory at Cedron (Køthah), near Jamnia (Yebrah), but was murdered at Dedor (16:15), near Jericho, which site was a small fort at Ain Dâbîk, a spring N. of the city.

The second book of Maccabees presents a contrast to the first in which, as we have seen, the geography is easily understood, and the site of Caphänit at the mouth of the river. It seems to be placed in Idumæa, and Charax Pericandus—still the usual names (Jerusalem (16:17). Ephrôn, W. of Asher-thor-Karnaim (26:27), is unknown; and Beth-shemesh is called by its later name Bethshan (14:27; Jgs 1:27) and in Jos (Ant. XII. viii. 5:6; vi. 1). A curious passage (Ant. XII. viii. 6) seems to refer to a certain tower (still used by Parsees), one of which appears to have existed at Berea (Aleppo), though this was a Greek custom.

VII. Palestine in the NT.—We are told that Our Lord was born in "Bethlehem of Judæa"; and the theory of Neubauer, adopted by 1. Synoptic Grits, that Bethlehem of Zebulun Gospels (Josh 19:15)—which was the present Beth, Lod, 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth—is to be understood, is based on a mistake. The Jews expected the Messiah to appear in the home of David (Mic 5:2); and the Northern Bethlehem was not called "of Nazareth," as asserted by Rix (Tent and Testament, 258); this was a conjectural reading by Neubauer (Geog. du Talm, 189), but the Talm (Talm Jerus, M’shālāh 11) calls the place Bethlehem-gīrād ("of balms"), no doubt from the storax-bush (Styrax officinalis) or stacte (Ex 30:34), the Arab, 'abbar, which still abounds in the oak wood close by.

(1) Galilean scenery.—The greater part of the life of Jesus was spent at Nazareth in Zebulun, and the ministry at Capernaum in Naphtali (of Mt 4:13-15; Is 9:1), with yearly visits to Jerusalem. The Gospel narratives and the symbolism of the parables constantly recall the characteristic features of Galilean scenery and nature, as they remain unchanged today. The "city set on a hill" (Mt 5:14) may be seen in any part of Pal; the lilies of the field grow in all its plains; the "foxes have holes" and the sparrows are still eaten; the vineyard with its tower; the good ploughland, amid stony and thorny places, are all still found throughout the Holy Land. But the deep lake surrounded by precipitous cliffs and subject to sudden storms, with its shoals of fish and its naked fishers; the east nets and drag nets and small heavy boats of the Sea of Galilee, are more distinctive of the Gospels, since the lake is but briefly noticed in the OT.

(2) Nazareth was a little village in a hill plateau N. of the plain of Esdraelon, and 1,000 ft. above it.

Traditional Mount of the Precipitation near Nazareth.

The name (Heb nāqārād) may mean "verdant," and it had a fine spring, but it is connected (Mt 2:23 in the Gospels with the prophecy of the "branch" (nēger, Is 11:1) of the house of David. Its population was Hebrew, for it possessed a synagogue (Lk 4:16). The "brow of the hill wherein their city was built" (4:29) is traditionally the "hill of the leap" (Jebel Kafṣa), 2 miles to the S. edge of the plain. Nazareth was not on any great highway; and so obscure was this village that it is unnoticed in the OT, or by Jos, while even a Galilean (Jn 1:40) could hardly believe that a prophet could come thence. Jerome (Onom. s.v.) calls it a "village"; but today it is a town with 4,000 Christians and 2,000 Moslems, the former taking their Arab name (Nāṣūrah) from the home of their Master.

(3) Capernaum (Mt 4:13; 9:1) lay on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, apparently (Mt 14:34; Jn 6:17) in the little plain of Gennesaret, which stretches for 3 miles on the northwest side of the lake, and which has a breadth of 2 miles. It may have been planted in the 4th cent. BC. It was identified doubtfully by the Sin. MS rendering of Mt 11:23—"Shalt thou be exalted unto heaven?"—and it was a military station where taxes were levied (9:9), and possessed a synagogue (Mk 1:21; Lk 4:33; Jn 6:58), Christian tradition, since the 4th cent. AD, has placed the site at Tell Hum, where ruins of a synagogue (probably, however, not older than the 2nd cent. AD) exist; but this site is not in the plain of Gennesaret, and is more probably Kfar 'Aḥim (Talm Bab, M’shālāh 80a). Jewish tradition (Gihon Tikkunoth, vii.20) connects Capernaum with Minim or "heretics"—that is to say Christians—whose name may yet linger at 'Ain Minyeh at the north end of the plain of Gennesaret. Jos states (2B, III, x, 8) that the spring of Capernaum watered this plain, and contained the carpos (coracinus) which is still found in 'Ain el Mudawwarah ("the round spring"), which is the principal source of water in the Gennesaret oasis.

(4) The site of Chorazin (Kerāzēh) has never been lost. The ruined village lies about 2 miles N. of Tell Hum and possesses a synagogue of similar character. Bethsaida ("the house of fishing") is once said to have been in Galilee (Jn 12:21), and Rehob (Pa‘l Il‘uṣur, II, 555-55) thought that there were two towns of the name. It is certain that the other notices refer to Bethsaida, called Julias by Herod Philip, which Jos (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; iv, 6; B, III, x, 7) and Pliny (NH, v.15) place E. of the Jordan, near the place where it enters the Sea of Galilee. The site may be at the ruin of Dikkēh ("the platform"), now 2 miles N. of the lake, but probably nearer of old, as the river deposit has increased southward. There are remains of a synagogue here also. The two miracles of feeding the 5,000 (Mt 14:13-21) and the 4,000 (Mk 8:19-21) as both done E. of the Jordan, the former (Lk 9:10) in the desert of Golon ("belonging to the city called Bethsaida") (AV). The words (Mk 6:45 AV), "to go to the other side before unto Bethsaida," may be rendered without any straining of grammar, "to go to side opposite to Bethsaida." For the disciples are not said to have reached that city; but, after a voyage of at least 3 or 4 miles (Jn 6:17,19), they arrived near Capernaum, and landed in Gennesaret (Mk 6:53), about 5 miles S.W. of the Jordan.

(5) The place where the swine rushed down a steep slope into the lake (Mt 8:32; Mk 5:1; Lk 8:26) was in the country of the Gerasenes (see Vat. Ms), probably at Keras on the eastern shore opposite Tiberias, where there is a steep slope to the water. It should be noted that this was in Decapolis (Mt 5:20), a region of "ten cities" which lay (except Seythopolis) in Southwest Bashan, where a large number of early Gr inscriptions have been found, some of which (e.g. Vogē-Waddington, nos. 2412, 2413) are as old as the 1st cent. BC. There was evidently a Gr population in this region in the time of Our Lord; and this accounts for the feeding of swine, otherwise distinctive of "a far country" (Lk 16:15-16); for, while no Hebrew would have tended swine, the uncircumcised of the North were swineherds from the time at least of Homer.

(6) The site of Magadan-Magdala (Mejdel) was... on the west shore at the S.W. end of the Genesaret plain (Mt 16:39). In Mk 8:10 we find Dalmanutha instead. Magdala was the Heb mgideh ("townhouse") which stands at the head of the stream (Mo-jackson) that runs thence to the sea N. of of Acts oppa, and it was thus a half-way station between Jerusalem and the seaside capital of Caesarea, and the lake, called el-Ain ("head of the spring"), and a cairn, built in the 12th cent., stands above the waters. The old Rom road runs close by (SWP, II, 258). Caesarea was a new town, founded by Herod the Great about 20 BC (SWP, II, 13-20). It was even larger than Caesarea on the older harbor. Thence we may leave Paul with Paul in 60 AD. The reader must judge whether this study of the country does not serve to vindicate the sincerity and authenticity of Bible narratives in the OT and the NT alike.

LITERATURE. Through the years the number of really original and scientific sources of knowledge is (as in other cases) not large. Besides the Biblical text, the Mishnah contains a great deal of valuable information as to the cultivation and civilization of Pal about the 1st and 2nd centuries AD. The following 20 works are of primary importance: The Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome shows intimate acquaintance with Pal in the 4th cent. AD, though the identification of Bible sites is as often wrong as right. The rabbinical geography is discussed by Leibniz, Neuland, Talmud, 1868), and the scattered notices by Gr and Rom writers were collected by H. R. Palmer, The termss or minimus eucteris itulatores, 2 vols, 1714). The first really scientific account of the country is that of Fr. J. Robinson Bib. Researches, 1836, and Later Bib. Researches, 1852; in 3 vols, 1856). The Survey of Western Pal (7 vols, 1853) includes the present writer's account of the natural features, topography and surface remains of all ages, written while in command (1872-78) of the 1-inch topographical survey. The Survey of Eastern Pal (1 vol, 1889) gives his account of Moab and Southern Gilead, as surveyed in 1881-82. The topographical history is to be studied in the same series, and in Canon Tristram's Natural History of the Bible, 1868. The geology is best given by L. Lartet (Essai sur la géologie de la Palestine) and in Professor Hall's Memoir on the Geol. and Geog. of Arabia Petraea, etc., 1886. The Archeological Researches of M. Clermont-Ganneau (2 vols, 1896) include his discoveries of Gezer and Adullam. Much information is scattered through the PEQ (1864-1910) and TDVP. G. Schumacher's Across the Jordan, 1885, Pella, 1885, and Northern 'Ajlun, 1890, give detailed information for Northeast Pal: and Lachish, by Professor Flinders Petrie, is the memoir of the excavations which he began at Tell el-Hesi (identified in 1874 by the present writer), the full account being in A Mound of Many Cities by P. E. Newberry, 1895-99. Other excavations, at Gaza, etc, are described in Excavations in the Delta (1895-1900), by F. J. Bliss, R. S. A. Macalister, and Professor W. M. R. Smith; and for the Mesopotamian excavations, that are not recently been published by Rev. W. M. R. Smith. For those who have access to these original sources, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land and Halbfass, A. Smith, 1889, and the essay (300 pp.) by Professor D. P. Duh (Geographie des alten Palastien, 1890) will be found useful. The best guide book to Pal is still that of Bieder, written by Dr. A. Sohn and published in 1876, 1912. This author had personal acquaintances with the principal routs of the country. Only standard works of reference have been here mentioned, with which French, German, American, and British explorers and scholars have alike contributed. See Jerusalem.

LITERATURE

Previous to the last century, almost the entire store of knowledge concerning ancient Pal, including its races, physical language, and the more modern history and manners, was obtained through discoveries of Palestine in other countries; but due in many cases to Bib. influence. All the most important Heb and Gr MSS and VSS of the Bible and most of the Jewish Talm and apocryphal and Wisdom books were found outside of Pal. The pictures of its population, cities, fortresses and armies give a color and perspective to its ancient history far more vivid than can be found on any of its own contemporary monuments. The records of Thothmes III (15th cent. BC) describing the capture of Megiddo in the plain of Esdraslon with its vast stores of "chariots wrought with gold," bronze armor, silver and ebony statues, ivory and ebony furniture, etc., and of his further capture of 118 other Can. towns, many of which are well known from the Bible, and from which he takes an enormous tribute of war materials, golden ornaments and golden dishes, "too many to be weighed," find no parallel in any indigenous record—such records even if written down have been destroyed or lost because of the soil, climate and character of the rocks W. of the Jordan. So c 1400 BC, the Am Tab (discovered in 1887) mention by name many Bib. cities, and give much direct information concerning the political and social conditions of Pal during the time of the Hebrews. (Breasted, Ancient Records, 1, 490). A few other Egypt visitors (1300-1000 BC) add little to our knowledge. The principal sources of historical information are the Old Heb. writings, which are the most important observations, although they can only humorously be called "immediate explorers." Some of Bunsen's list of cities and tribes, although their boundaries are correctly described (chs 13-21), are naturally excluded from this review.

The record of early Christian travel begins with the Itinerarium Peregrinorum (352 AD), and during the next two centuries scores of others write out their observations in the Holy Land, but for 1000 years there is scarcely a single visitor who looks at the country and pays attention to the eyes of the monks. A woman traveler of the 4th cent. reports some interesting facts about the early status of the Jerusalem church and the catechumen teaching, and surprises us by locating Pithom correctly (although the site was totally forgotten until one of the mariners in 1853), and the Epitome of Eusebius (5th cent.) gives a clear description of the holy places in Jerus.; but almost the only other significant sign that anyone at this era ever made serious observations of value comes from the very large, though false, description of the 5th cent. recently discovered at Magdala, which gives a good impression of ancient Jerus. with its buildings, and a careful bird's-eye view of the surrounding country. By the middle of the 6th cent. the old "Holy Places" were protected, and new churches, which turned on the marble, were built. Later discoveries, like the CH at Suss (1901), the Sendjirli and other Aram. texts from Northern Syria (1890, 1908), and the Elephantine papyri, some of which are addressed to the "sons of Sanballat" and describe a temple in Egypt erected to Yahu (Jehovah) in the 5th cent. BC, may not give direct information concerning Pal, but are important to present explorers because of the light thrown upon the laws of the land in patriarchal times, upon the thought and language of a neighboring Sem community at the time of the Monarchy; upon the religious ritual and festivals of Nehemiah's day, and upon the general wealth and culture of the Jews of the 3rd cent.; opening up also for the first time the intimate relations which existed between Jerus. and Samaria and the Jews of the Dispersion. So the vast amounts of Gr papyri found recently in the Fayum probably have only preserved the "Login" and "Lost Gospels" and fragments of Scripture texts, early Christian Egypt ritual, etc., but have been given to scholars for the first time contemporaneous examples of the colloquial language which the Jews of Pal were using in the 1st cent. AD, and in which they wrote the "memoirs" of the apostles and the Gospels of Jesus.

1. Early Christian period.—At this time, during the first three or four centuries the ancient sites and holy places were identified, giving some valuable information as to the topographical and historical map of the early church. By far the most valuable of these carefully prepared summaries of ancient Bible places, with their modern sites, and the distances between them, was the Onomasticon of Eusebius, as it was enlarged by Jerome, which attempts to seriously the identification of some 300 holy places, most of these being vitally important for the modern student of the Bible. While some of these identifications were "curiously incorrect" (Bliss) and the distances entirely too large, these few satisfactory additions were made to the list for 1,500 years; and it was certainly a splendid contribution to Palestinian topography, for the list as a whole has been confirmed by the scientific conclusions of recent investigators.

2. Period of curiosus observatio.—The earliest traveler who has left a record of his journey into Pal was Sinunhit, who, perhaps a century after Abraham, mentions a number of places known to us from the Bible and describes Canaan as a "land of figs and vines, . . . where wine is more pleasant than wine, and honey and oil in abundance . . . all kinds of fruit upon its trees, barley and spelt in the fields, and cattle beyond number on each day. . . . There is cornbread, wine, cooked flesh and roasted fowl . . . wild game from the hills and eels in the sweet English" (Breasted, Ancient Records, 1, 490). A few other Egypt visitors (1300-1000 BC) add little to our knowledge. The principal sources of historical information are the Old Heb. writings, which are the most important observations, although they can only humorously be called "immediate explorers." Some of Bunsen's list of cities and tribes, although their boundaries are correctly described (chs 13-21), are naturally excluded from this review.

gathered from the multitude of pilgrims between the 6th and 15th centuries. The text mentions Henry Thode, who noticed certain inscriptions and tombs, describes accuracies in the observation of sites, and discusses the importance of light. The text highlights the contributions of C. H. Rickman to the study of ancient sites and their identification. It also mentions the work of B. F. Lynch, who accurately identified and published important archaeological observations. The text notes the importance of the work of Lieutenant Lynch (1810-1875), who made accurate identifications and published important observations.

2. Era of Scientific Exploration.

(a) First Travelled Area. The scientific exploration opened with the excavation at Pal, in which men had to think of the human activities on the seacoast, and not as a short episode in a life devoted to more serious pursuits. The text mentions the work of Lieutenant F. F. Klein (1838-1852), who was able to set a large number of successful identifications of sites and contributing much to the general knowledge of Pal. The text also mentions the work of Theodor Koepcke (1838-1872), who popularized results and made a considerable number of discoveries. The text notes the work of C. H. Rickman (1800-1875) and B. F. Lynch (1810-1812) in Pal, who accurately identified and published important observations.

With the foundation of the Palestine Exploration Fund, it took on an entirely new phase, since in this case, 2. Scientific not a single individual, but a large cooperative company of specialists entered the Surface Exploration work, having behind them sufficient exploration funds for adequate investigation in each necessary line of research, and with the British War Office furnishing its expert Royal Engineers to assist the enterprise. Under the auspices of this society during the next 12 years, Jesus was explored as never before, and all Western Pal was topographically surveyed (see below); a geological survey (1883-1894) of Sinai, Wady Arabah and the Dead Sea, and later of Mt. Seir (1885) was accomplished. During this period of time, the natural history of the country was treated with great thoroughness by several specialists; Palmer and Drake in the desert of Syrain natives, without servants, risked the dangerous journey through the desert, guided by old Palestinian custom to the actual point of the route of the Exodus; Clemente-Guerino, who had previously made the discovery of the Jewish pilgrimage from the Temple, forbidding strangers to enter the sacred enclosure, added greatly to archaeological knowledge by gathering and deciphering many ancient inscriptions, uncovering buried cemeteries, rock-cut tombs and other monuments. He also laid down important criteria for the age of stone masonry (yet see PEFS, 1897, LXi); identified various sites including Adullam, found the "gate, the house," "Zoeth," etc., and made innumerable plans of churches, tombs, gates, etc., and did an incredible amount of other important work. Capt., afterward Col., C. R. Conder did an equally important work, and as the head of the archaeological party could finally report 10,000 palm-names and have gathered, and 172 new Bible sites successfully identified, while the boundaries of the tribes had been practically settled and many vitally important Bible locations for the first time fixed. The excavations in Jerus under the same auspices had meanwhile been carried out as planned. After an introductory examination by Sir Charles Wilson, including some little excavating, Sir Charles Warren (1867–70) and, later, Col. Conder (1872–75) made thorough excavations over a large area, sinking shafts and following ancient walls to a depth of 80–150 ft. They uncovered the Temple-area from its countless tons of débris and traced its approximate outline; examined underground rock chambers; opened ancient streets; discovered many thousands of pieces of pottery, glass, stone, etc., just to Jewish by Byzantine, and the region in the Tyropeon Valley, where Robinson's arch had rested, and also parts of the ancient bridge; traced the line of several important ancient walls, looking gates and towers, and fixed the date of one wall certainly as of the 8th cent. B.C, and probably of the age of Solomon (G. A. Smith), thus accomplishing an epoch-making work upon which all more recent explorers have safely rested—as Midday's (1875), in his masterly memoirs on the examination of the Temple area in Great Cafar and Guthrie (1881), who made fine additional discoveries at Ophel, as well as War and Conder in their work afterward (1884), when they published plans of the whole city with its streets, churches, mosques, etc., 25 in., to the mile, which in that direction remains a basis for all later work. See JERUSALEM.

Perhaps, however, the greatest work of all done by this society was the Topographical Survey (1881–86), accomplished for Jundia and Samaria by Col. Conder, and for Galilee by Lord Kitchener, resulting in a great map of Western Pal in 26 sheets, on a scale of an inch to the mile (with several abridged additions), showing all previous identifications of ancient places. These maps, with the seven magnificently engraved memoirs, furnish the strong scientific work done by the various parties, marked such an epoch-making advance in knowledge that it has been called "the most important contribution to illustrate the Bible since its translation into the vulgar tongue."

In addition to the above the Palestine Exploration Fund established a Quarterly Statement and Society of Biblical Archaeology from which subscribers could keep in touch with the latest Bib results, and published large quantities of tracts of ancient texts and travels and of books reporting discoveries as these were made. Altogether more advance was made during these 15 years from 1865 to 860 than in the 17 centuries before.

The next ten years (1890–90) did not furnish as much new material from Pal exploration, but in 1880 the Silasam Inscription (of 2 K 20 20; 2 Ch 32 30) was accidentally found in Jerus, showing the accuracy with which the engineers of Hezekiah's stone of Bethphage, which in the 18th cent. (1724), at least, occasionally, cut long tunnels through the rock (see also Clermont-Ganneau, Archaeological Research, 313); and in 1881–85 Conder and Schumacher attempted their difficult task of making a scientific topographical map of Eastern Pal. In 1881 H. Clay Trumbull rediscovered and properly described Kadesh-barnes, settling authoritatively its location and thus making it possible to fix previously obscure places mentioned in the account of the Exodus. The tombs, gates, etc., and many investigations in small districts not adequately described previously have taken place, new additions to the zoological, botanical, geological and meteorological knowledge of Pal have been frequent; studies of irrigation and the water-supply have been made, as well as investigations into the customs, proverbs, folklore, etc. of the Arabs; many districts of the Jordan and through Petra down into Sinai have yielded important results, and many discoveries of surface tombs, ossuaries, mosaic, seals and manuscripts have been made in many parts of Pal. This has been done perhaps chiefly by the Palestine Exploration Fund, but much by individuals and some by the newly organized excavation societies (see below). The most surprising discoveries made by this method of surface exploration (a method which can never become completely obsolete) have been the finding at different times of the four Boundary Stones of Gezer (1874, 1881, 1889) by Conder and company, and, in 1886, of the very large mosaic at Madaba by Father Cleopas, librarian of the Greek Patriarch.

The latter proved to be part of the pavement of a 6th-cent. basilica and is a "veritable map of Pal," showing its chief cities, the boundaries of the tribes, and, esp. the city of Jerus with its walls, gates, chief buildings, including the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and chief streets, notably one long straight street intersecting the city and lined with colonnades, and the foot of Mt. Nebo, it is thought the artist may have intended to represent ideally a modern (6th-cent.) vision of Moses. George Adam Smith (HGHL, 7th ed, 1901), Jerusalem (2 vols. 1910), and E. Huntington, Pal and its Transformation (1911), have given fine studies illustrating the supreme importance of accurate topographical knowledge in order to understand correctly the Bible narratives and the social life and politics of the Hebrews.

III. Era of Scientific Exploration. —(1) Tell el-Hes (Palestine Exploration Fund).—Expedi must always continue, but excavation

1. Southern is a vast advance. The modern era in Palestinian study begins with Petrie at LACHM (q.v.) in 1880. Though Renan was the first (1850) to put any study into the soil (1890), yet his results were practically confined to Phoenicia. From Renan's time to 1890 there had been no digging whatever, excepting some narrow but thorough work in Jerus, and a slight tickling of the ground at Jericho and around the so-called Tombs of the Kings. Nothing was more providential than this delay in beginning extensive excavations in Pal, such as had been previously so profitably conducted in Egypt and elsewhere. The results could not have been interpreted even two years earlier, and even when these excavations were commenced, the only man living who could have understood what he found was the man who had been selected to do the work. Nearly two centuries before, a traveler in Pal (Th. Shaw) had suggested the possibility of certain mounds ("tell") being artificial (of Josh 8 28; Jer 30 18); but not even Robinson or Guérin suspected that these were the necrophors of buried cities, but had believed them. The more natural and easy hour in the history of exploration in Pal, and perhaps in any land, was that in which on a day in April, 1890, W. M. Flinders Petrie climbed up the side of Tell el-Hes, situated on the edge of the Phil plain, c 30 miles SSW. of Jerus, and 17 miles
N.E. from Gaza, and by examining its strata, which had been exposed by the stream cutting down its side, determined before sunset the fact, found at el-Asnam, that the site had been marked a city covering 1,000 years of history, the limits of occupation being probably 1500 BC to 300 BC. This ability to date the several occupations of a site without any inscription to assist him was due to the chronological scale of styles of pottery which he had had the good fortune to able out positively for the Gr epochs at Nauctri a year or two before, and for the epochs preceding 1100 BC at Ilhban in the Fayyam only a month or two before. The potsherds were fortunately very numerous and several of them had, in six weeks' work he could date approximately some eight successive occupations of the city, each of these being mutually exclusive in certain important forms of pottery in common use. Given the surface date, depth of accumulation and rate of deposit as shown at Lachish, and a pretty sure estimate of the history of other sites was available. Not only was this pottery scale so brilliantly confirmed and elaborated at Tell el-Hes that all excavators have been forced to admit the last settlement on a mound almost by walking over it; but by observations of the methods of stone dressing he was able to rectify many former guesses as to the age of buildings and to establish some of the absolute ages of the objects. He proved that some of the walls at this site were built by "the same school of masons which built the Temple of Solomon," and also that the Ionic volute, which the Greeks borrowed from the Assyrians, was brought here well over 1000 years before the ionic, while one pilaster he found the architectural motif of the "ram's horn" (cf Ps 118 27). He also concluded, contrary to former belief, that this mound marked the site of Lachish (Josh 10 31; 2 K 18 14), as by a careful examination he found that no other ruins near could fill the known historic conditions of this city, and the inscription found by the next excavator and all more recent research make this conclusion practically sure. Lachish was a great fortress of the ancient world. The Pharaohs often mention it, and it is represented in a picture on an Assyrian monument, under which is written, "Sennacherib . . . receive the spoil of Lachish" (see 2 K 18 14). It was strategically a strong position rising some 50 ft. above the valley and the fortification which Sennacherib probably attacked being over 10 ft. thick. The debris lay from 50–70 ft. deep on top of the hill. Petrie fixed the directions of the various walls, and settled the approximate dates of each city and of the imported pottery found in several of these. One of the most unexpected things was an iron knife dug up from a stratum indicating a period not far from the time when Israel must have entered Canaan, and the earliest importation of iron weapons ever found up to this date (cf Josh 17 16).

The next two years of scientific digging (1891–92), admirably conducted by Dr. F. G. Bliss on this site, wholly confirmed Petrie's general inductions, though the limits of such occupation were more exactly fixed and the beginning of the oldest city was put back to 1700 BC. The work was conducted under the usual dangers, not only from the Bedawyn, but from excessive heat (104° in the shade), from malaria which at one time prostrated 8 of the party, and also from the great discipline of digging which had to be carried 6 miles, and from the sirocco (see my report, PEFS, XXI, 160–70 and Petrie's and Bliss's journal, XXI, 219–46; XXIII, 192, etc.). He excavated thoroughly one-third of the entire hill, moving nearly a million cubic feet of debris. The burnt base of the oldest city was nearly 30 ft. thick, that of the next city 17 ft. thick, while the latest wall was thin and weak. The oldest city covered a space 1,500 sq. ft., the latest only one-third of that. The pottery had a richer color and higher polish than the later, and this art was indigenous, for at this level no Phoen or Mycenaean styles were found. The late pre-Israelitic period (1550–500 BC) shows such importations and also local Cypriot influence. In the "Israel" period (800–300 BC) this influence is lost and the new styles are coarse and ungraceful, such degeneration not being connected with the entrance of Israel into Canaan, as many have supposed, but with a later period, most probably with the desolation which followed the exile of the ten tribes (Bliss and Petrie). In the pre-Israelite cities were found mighty towers, fine bronze implements, such as battle-axes, spearheads, bracelets, pins, needles, etc., a wine and tranch press, one very large building "beautifully symmetrical," a smelting furnace, and finally an inscribed tablet from Zimrida, known previously from the Am Tab to have been governor of Lachish, c 1400 BC. Many Jewish pt ovens were found in the later ruins and most of the houses, animal marks and others with inscriptions. Clay figures of Astarte, the goddess of fertility, were found in the various layers, one of these being of the unique Cypriote type, with large ears, and many Egyptian figures, symbols and animals forms. See also LACHISH.

(2) Excavations in Jerus.—During 1894–97, notwithstanding the previously good work done in Jerus (see above) and the peculiar embarrassments to which (one Bible) with the attempt to dig in a richly populated town, Dr. Bliss, assisted by an expert architect, succeeded in adding considerably to the sum of knowledge. He excavated over a large area, not only positively confirming former inductions, but discovering the remains of the wall of the empty Eudocia (650 AD), and under this the line of wall which Titus had destroyed, and at a deeper level the wall which surrounded the city in the Herodian age, and deeper yet that which must probably be dated to Hezekiah, and below this a construction "exquisitely dressed," with a gateway which must be either the remains of a wall of Solomon or some other pre-exilic fortification not later than the 8th cent. He found gates and ancient paved streets and manholes leading to ancient sewer systems, and many inscriptions, but esp. settled disputed questions concerning important walls and the levels of the ancient hills, thus fixing the exact topography of the ancient city. H. G. Mitchell and others have also carefully examined certain lines of wall, identifying Nehe- miah's Dung Gate, etc., and making a new survey of certain parts of underground Jerus, the results of the entire work being a modification of tradition in a few particulars, but confirmatory in most. The important springs and reservoirs, valleys and hills of the ancient Jerus have been certainly identified. It is now settled that modern Jerus "still sits virtually upon her ancient seat and at much the same slope," though not so large as the Jerus of the kings of Judah which certainly extended over the Southwestern Hill. Mt. Zion, contrary to tradition which located it on the Southwestern Hill where the citadel stands, probably lay on the Eastern Hill above the Virgin's Spring (Gihon). On this Eastern Hill at Ophel lay the Temple, and S. of the Temple on the same hill lay the old Jebusite stronghold (David's City). The ancient altar of burnt offering was almost surely at es-Sakhra. The evidence has not been conclusive as to the line of the second wall, so that the site of Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre cannot certainly

(3) Excavations in the Shephelah (Palestine Exploration Fund).—During 1898–1900 important work was done by Bliss and Macalister at 4 sites on the border land between Philistia and Judaea, where five or more small mounds were tunnelled, but without important results. The four chief sites were Tell Zakariya, lying about midway between Jerus and Tell el-Hesy; Tell es-Sâ'teh, 5 miles W. of Tell Zakariya, and Tell Sandahannah, about 10 miles S.; while Tell el-Judeidah lay between Tell Zakariya and Tell Sandahannah. As Tell el-Judeidah was only half-excavated and merely confirmed other results, not being remarkable except for the large quantity of jar inscriptions found (37), we omit further mention of it. (a) Tell Zakariya: From this height, 1,214 ft. above the sea, almost all Philistia could be seen. A pre-Israelithish town was found under some 20 ft. of débris, containing pre-Israelithish, Jewish and Seleucidan pottery. Many vaulted cisterns, partly hewn from the rock, were found in the lowest level, and later Jewish pit ovens were found and inscribed jar-handles with winged Egypt symbols, implements of bronze, iron, bone and stone, and Egypt images of Helios and the Horus eye, etc., besides a strange bronze figure of a woman with a fish's tail which seems to represent Atargatis of Ashkelon. The ancient rampart was strengthened, perhaps in Rehoboam's time, and towers were added in the Seleucidan era. Only half of this site was excavated. (b) Tell es-Sâ'teh. The camp was pitched near here in the Vale of Elah. From a depth of 21 ft. to the rock, the ancient town was excavated and was found the characteristic pre-Israelithish pottery and much imported pottery of the Mycenaean type. A high place was also found here, containing bones of camels, sheep, cows, etc., and several monoliths of soft limestone in situ, and near by a jar-burial. In an ancient rubbish heap many fragments of the goddess of fertility were found. Many old Egypt and later Gr relics were also found, and four Bab seals and the usual pottery of the pre-Seleucid and later periods. With strong probability this site was identified as Gath. (c) Tell Sandahannah: This was situated c. 1,100 ft. above sea-level. The town covered about 6 acres and was protected by an inner and outer wall and two smaller towers. The strongest wall averaged 30 ft. thick. The work done here was "unique in the history of Palestinian excavation" (Bliss). At Tell el-Hesy only one-third of each stratum was excavated; at Tell Zakariya only one-half; at Jerus the work was confined to the enclosures of the temple, a few city walls and a few churches, pools, streets, etc., but at *Tell Sandahannah" we recovered almost an entire town, probably the ancient Maresah (Josh 15 44), with its inner and outer walls, its gates and streets, the lowest mound being in mud with occasionally larger, harder stones chisel-picked. The town was roughly divided into blocks of streets, some of the streets being paved. The houses were lighted from the street and an open court yard was formed in the lowest perfectly rectangular house, while many were of awkward shape. Many closets were found and pit ovens and vaulted cisterns, reached by staircases, as also portions of the old drainage system. The cisterns had plastered floors, and sometimes two heavy coats of plaster on the walls; the houses occasionally had vaulted roofs but usually the ordinary roof of today, made of boards and rushes covered with clay. No religious building was found and no trace of a colonnade, except perhaps a few fragments of ornament. An enormous columbarium was uncovered (1906 niches). No less than 328 Gr inscriptions were found on the handles of imported wine jars. Under the Seleucidan town was a Jewish town built of rubble, the pottery of the usual kind including stamped jar-handles. An Astarte was found in the Jewish Gr stratum, as also various animal forms. The Astarte was very curious, about 11 in. high, hollow, wearing a long cloak, but with breasts, body and part of right leg bare, having for headress a closely fitting sunbonnet with a circular serrated top ornament in front and with seven stars in relief. A most striking find dating from about the 2d cent. AD was that of 16 little human figures bound in fetters of lead, iron, etc., un doubtfully representing "revenge dolls" through which the owners hoped to work magic on enemies, and 49 fragments of magical tablets inscribed in Gr on white limestone, with exorcisms, incantations and imprecations. It ought to be added that the four towns as a whole supplement each other, and positively confirm former results. No royal stamps were found at Tell el-Hesy, but 77 were found in these 4 sites, in connection with 2- or 4-winged symbols (Egypt scarabaeus or winged sun-disk). Writing-materials (stylis) were found in all the four towns, as well as iron, wine-pots, jars, vessels, etc. The remains were of the 2d, 1st half, 1st cent. BC, 2nd cent. AD, and many inscriptions dating from 1st cent. BC to 2d cent. AD were found in a small cabinet (Sp. 18). The inscriptions are in great variety, and are considered by some to be among the most important in the world. The inscriptions were mostly names of "Egyptian" type, and were found on pottery, jars, sailors, etc. A member of this town was buried with a sword and a necklace of precious stones. The town was destroyed by fire and then inhabited by Jewish and Roman settlers. The discovery of the town is of great importance to archaeologists, as it is the earliest town in the ancient world known to be inhabited by Jews.

Stamped Jar-Handles, Lamp and Iron Implements from Tombs at Beit Jibrin.

In 1902 John P. Peters and Hermann Thiersch discovered at Beit Jibrin (adjoining Tell Sandahannah) an example of sepulchral art totally different from any other ever found in Pal. It was a tomb containing several chambers built by a Sidonian, the walls being brilliantly painted, showing a bull, panther, serpent, ibex, crocodile with ibis (?) on its back, hunter on horseback, etc., with dated inscriptions, the earliest being 196 BC (see John P. Peters, Painted Tombs in Necropolis of Marissa, 1905). The writer (April 18, 1913) found another tomb here of similar character, decorated with grapes, birds, two cocks (life size), etc. Perhaps most conspicuous was a wreath of beautiful flowers with a cross & in its center. Nothing shows the interrelations of that age more than this Phoen colony, living in Pal, using the Gr language but employing Egyp and Libyan characters freely in their funeral art.

(1) Tell Ta’anek (Austrian government and Vienna Academy).—During short seasons of three years (1902–4) Professor Ernst Sellin made a rapid examination of this town (Bib. Taanach), situated in the plain of Esdraelon in Northern Pal, on the ancient road between Egypt and

2. Northern Palestine. Many of the discoveries at K Talmi, rock-hewn (1000–1400) altars, having no bottom but with holes in its sides, in which adorers would cast when fire was kindled below; in its ornamentation showing a mixture of Bab and Egyp motives, having on its right side winged animals with human heads, by the side of which is a man (or boy) struggling with a serpent the heads of which are widely distended in anger; at its top two ram’s (?) horns, and between them a sacrificial bowl in which to receive the “drink offering”; on its front a tree (of life), and on each side of it a rampant ibex. A bronze serpent was found near this altar, as also near the high place at Gezer. Continuous evidence of the gruesome practice of foundation sacrifices, mostly of little children, but in one case of an adult, was found between the 13th and 9th cents. BC, after which they seem to cease. In the house the skeletons of a lady and five children were found, the former with her rings and necklace of gold, five pearls, two scarabs, etc. Many jar-burials of new-born infants, 16 in one place, were found, and, close to this deposit, a rock-hewn altar with a jar of yellow incense (?). Egyp and Bab images were found of different eras and curious little human-looking amulets (as were also found at Lachish) in which the parental parts are prominent, which Sellin and Bliss believe to be “teraphim” (Gen 31:19,34; 1 Sam 6:22; Or. Research, 57 etc.), such as Rachel, being pregnant, took with her to protect her on the hard journey from Haran to Pal (Macalister).

The high place, with one or more steps leading up to it, suggesting “elevation, isolation and mystery” (Cicero, De leg. 4), was, like so many other Palestinian ruins, and the evidence shows that it continued long after the entrance of Israel into Canaan. When Israel entered Pal, no break occurred in the civilization, the art development continuing at about the same level; so probably the two races were at about the same culture-level, or else the Hebrew occupation of the land was very gradual. In the 8th cent. there seems to be an indication of the entrance of a different race, which doubled Pal. An interesting discovery was that of the dozen cuneiform tablets found in a terra cotta chest or jar (cf Jer 33:14) from the pre-Israelite city. These few letters cannot accurately be called “the first literary found daily”; but they show that there were there, since the personal and comparatively unimportant character of some of these notes and their easy and flowing style prove that literate hands and literary documents must have existed. These show that letter-writing was used not only in great questions of state between foreign countries, but in local matters between little contiguous towns, and while Pal at this period (c 1400 BC) was politically dependent on Egypt, yet Babylonia had maintained its old literary supremacy. One of these letters mentions “the finger of Ashirah,” this deity recalling the Asherah or sacred post of the OT (see Images); another note is written by Abi-Yawi, a name which corresponds to Heb Abiah, thus indicating that the form of the Divine name was then known in Canaan, though its meaning (i.e. the essential name, Ex 6:3; 34:6; Neh 1:9; Jer 44:26) may not have been known. Abi-Yawi invokes upon Tishar—washur the blessing of the “Lord of the Gods.”

On the same level with these letters were found two subterranean ovens with a platform in front and a rock-hewn altar above, and even the ancient drain which is supposed to have conveyed the blood from the altar into the “chamber of the dead” below. It may be added that Dr. Sellin thinks that the building of which the city is entirely harmonious with the Bible accounts of its history (Josh 12:21; 17:11; Jgs 1:27; 5:19–21; 1 K 4:12; 9:15; 1 Ch 7:29). So far as the ruins testify, there was no settled city life between c 600 BC and 900 AD, i.e. it became a desolation about the time of the Bab captivity. An Arab castle dates from about the 10th cent. AD.

(2) Tell el-Mutesellim (Megiddo, Josh 12 21; Jgs 5 19; 2 K 9 27).—This great commercial and military center of Northern Pal was opened to the world in 1905–6 by Dr. Andrae of the German expedition. The digging was conducted under the auspices of His Majesty the Kaiser and the Ger. Pal Society. The mound, about 5 miles N.W. from Ta'anach, stood prominently 120 ft. above the plain, the ruins reaching 1,405 ft. An average of 70 diggers were employed for the entire time. The debris was over 33 ft. deep, covering some eight mutually excluding populations. The surrounding wall, 30 x 35 ft. thick, confirmed itself to the contour of the town. The excavations reached the virgin rock only at one point; but the oldest stratum uncovered showed a people living in houses, having fire, cooking food and making sacrifices; the next city marked an advance, but the third city, proved by its Egyptian remains to go back as far as the 20th cent. BC, showed Hebrew habitation at a spot, indicating a surprising civilization, building magnificent city gates (57 x 36 ft.), large houses and tombs with vaulted roofs, and adorning their persons with fine scarabs of white and green steatite and other jewelry, bronze. It had very rich and colored pottery and little objects such as tools, seals, terra cotta figures and animals, including a bridled horse, and some worked iron is also said to have been found. In one pile of boulders were two children wearing beautiful bronze bracelets. The city lying above this begins as early as the 15th cent. BC, as is proved by a scarab of Thothmes III and by other signs, although the scarabs, while Egyptian in form, are often foreign in design and execution. Anyhow, bezel and other Egyptian features appear also 32 scarabs in one pot, much jewelry, including gold ornaments, and some very long, sharp bronze knives. One tomb contained 42 vessels, and one skeleton held 4 gold-mounted scarabs in its hand. One remarkable fragment of pottery contained a colored picture of pre-Israelite warriors with great black beards, carrying shields (?). A most interesting discovery was that of the little copper (bronze?) tripods supporting lamps, on one of which is the figure of a warrior, being stratigraphically similar to pictures of Delphic oracles and to representations lately found in Crete (MDPV, 1906, 46). This city was destroyed by a fearful conflagration, and is separated from the next by a heavy stratum of cinders and ashes. The fifth city is remarkable for a splendid palace with walls of stone from 3–5 ft. thick. This city, which probably begins as early as Solomon's time, shows the best masonry. An oval, highly polished seal of jasper on which is engraved a Heb name in script closely resembling the MS, suggests a date for the city, and casts an unexpected light upon the Heb culture of Pal in the days of the monarchy. The seal is equal to the best Egypt or Assyrian work, clearly and beautifully engraved, and showing a climax of art. In the center is the Lion (medjed), with wide open, tall erect, body tense. Upon the seal is carved: "To Shema, servant of Jeroboam." This name may possibly not refer to either of the Bib. kings (10th or 8th cent. BC), but the stratum favors this dating. The seal was evidently owned by a person of a prosperous period when the Jeroboam was in power, and so everything is in favor of this being a relic from the court of one of these kings, probably the latter (Kautzsch, M u. N, 1904, 81). We have here, in any case, one of the oldest Heb inscriptions known, and a most elegant one ever engraved (see MDPV, 1906, 33). After seeing it the Sultan took it from the museum into his own private collection.

A second seal of lapis lazuli, which Schuch- masher and Kautzsch date from about the 7th cent. BC, also contains in Old Heb the name "Asaph" (cf M u. N, 1906, 334; MDPV, 1904, 147). There are several other remarkable works of art, as e.g. a woman playing the tambourine, wearing an Egyptian headdress; a series of at least several Astartes, and esp. a series of six terra cotta heads, one with a prominent Sem nose, another with Egyptian characteristics, another quite un-Egypt, with regular features, vivacious eyes, curls falling to her shoulders in an area.

The sixth stratum might well be called the temple-city, for here were found the ruins of a sanctuary built of massive blocks in which remained much of the ceremonial furniture—sacrificial dishes, a beautiful basin set with three feet, a plate having a handle in the form of a flower, etc. Seemingly connected with the former town, this religious center was probably covered by a fourth, and one with a pyramidal top; so here several monotheists were found which would naturally be thought as religious monuments—though, since they have been touched with tools, this is perhaps doubtful (Ex 20 25).

One incense altar, carved out of gray stone, is so beautiful as to be worthy of a modern Gr cathedral. The upper dish rests on a base, and in some strata showing a surprising civilization, building magnificent city gates (57 x 36 ft.), large houses and tombs with vaulted roofs, and adorning their persons with fine scarabs of white and green steatite and other jewelry, bronze. It had very rich and colored pottery and little objects such as tools, seals, terra cotta figures and animals, including a bridled horse, and some worked iron is also said to have been found. After seeing it the Sultan took it from the museum into his own private col-

at the eastern gateway of Pal, with an unlimited water-supply in the 'Ain es-Sultan, having complete control of the great commercial highway across the Jordan and possessing natural provisions in its palm forest (Smith, H Gut). It was also set prominently on a hill rising some 40 ft. above the plain. The excavations proved that from the earliest historic time these natural advantages had been increased by every possible artifice known to ancient engineers, until it had become a veritable Gibraltar. The oldest city, which was in the form of an irregular ellipse, somewhat egg-shaped, with the point at the S.W., was first surrounded with a rampart following the contour of the hill, a rampart so powerful that it commands the admiration of all military experts who have examined it. The walls even in their ruins are some 28 ft. high. They were built in three sections: (a) a substratum of clay, gravel and small stones, making a deposit upon the rock about 3 or 4 ft. deep, somewhat analogous to modern concrete; (b) a rubble wall, 6 to 8 ft. thick, of large stones laid up to a height of 16 ft. upon this conglomerate, the lowest layers of the stone being enormously large; (c) upon all this a brick wall over 6 ft. thick, still remaining, in places, 8 ft. high. Not even Megiddo, famous as a military center throughout all the ancient world, shows such workmanship (cf Josh 2 1; Nu 13 28).

"These were masters in stonework and masonry" (The Builder): "Taken as a whole it may justly be regarded as a triumph of engineering skill which a modern nation, under the same conditions, could scarcely excel" (Langenegger); "It is as well done as a brilliant military engineer with the same materials and tools could do today" (Vincent). All the centuries were not able to produce a natural crevice in this fortification. At the N., which was the chief point of danger, and perhaps along other sections also, a second wall was built about 100 ft. inside the first, and almost as strong, while still another defense ("the citadel"), with 250 ft. of frontage, was protected not only by another mighty wall but by a well-constructed glacis. The old pre-Israelite culture in Jericho was exactly similar to that seen in the southern and northern cities, and the idolatry also. In its natural elements Can. civilization was probably superior to that of the Hebrews, but the repugnant and ever-present polytheism and fear of magic led naturally to brutal and impure manifestations. It cannot be doubted that, at least in some cases, the infants buried in jars under the floors represent foundation sacrifices. Some of the pottery is of great excellence, comparing favorably with almost the best examples from Egypt; a number of decorative figures of animals in relief are specially fine; the bronze utensils are also good; esp. notable are the 22 writing-tablets, all ready to be used but not inscribed. Somewhere near the 15th cent. the old fortifications were seriously damaged, but equally powerful ones replaced them. The German experts all believed that a break in the city's history was clearly shown with the tin and, when, according to the pottery, Israel ought to have captured the city, and it was confidently said that the distinctively Can. pottery ceased completely and permanently at this point; but further research has shown that at least a portion of the old town had a practically continuous existence (so Josh 16 7; Jgs 1 16; 3 13; 2 S 10 5). No complete Israelitish house was preserved, but the Israelitish quarter was located close to the spring and no little furniture of the usual kind was found, including dishes, pots, cornmills, lamps, etc., many iron instruments and terra cotta heads of men and animals. The pottery is quite unlike the old Canaanite, being closely allied to the Gr-Phoen ware of Cyprus. It is noticeable that, as in other Palestinian towns, in the 7th cent. little Roman influence is discernible; the Assyrians and Egypt influence is not as marked as in the cities dug up near the Mediterranean coast. One large edifice (60 by 80 ft.) is so like the dwellings of the 7th cent. But at Sendjirli that has "been copied from Syrian plantings" (Vincent). Absolutely unique was the series of 12 Rhodian jars handles stamped in Aram., "To Jehovah" (Yah, Yahu). Vincent has suggested that as during the monarchy (7th to 6th cent.) "To the King" meant probably "For His Majesty's Service," so in post-exile time the Divine name meant "For the Temple" (Rev. biblique). After the exile the city had about 3 centuries of prosperity; but disappears permanently in the Maccebean era (MNDPY, 1907; MDO, 1908-9; PEPS, 1910; Rev. biblique, 1907-9).

(1) Jerusalem.—See above, III, 1, (2).

(3) Samaria (Harvard Expedition).—Although the ancient capital of the Northern Kingdom, yet Samaria was centrally located, being 4. Central 20 miles from the Mediterranean coast and only about 30 miles N. of Jerus. Ancient Samaria was very famous in Israel for its frugality and wealth, special mention being made of its expenditure of gold on the Temple and the Temple of Baal and palace were constructions of Ahab (1 K 15 32; 22 39); it continued prosperity down to the Assyr exile, 722 BC (1 K 22 to 2 K 17); Sargon and Esarhaddon established a Bab colony and presumably fortified the town (720-670 BC); Alexander the Great captured it in 331 BC, and established there a Syrio-Maccabean colony; it was destroyed by John Hyrcanus in 109 BC, but rebuilt by Pompey in 60 BC, and again by Herod (30-1 BC). All of these periods are identified in the excavations, Herod's work being easily recognized, and Josephus' description of the town being found correct; the Gr work is equally well defined, so that the lower layers of masonry which contained the characteristic Jewish pottery, and which in every part of the ruins lay immediately under the Bab and Gr buildings, must necessarily be Heb, the relative order of underlying structures thus being "beyond dispute" (Reisner). During 1908-9 George Reisner with a staff of specialists, including David G. Lyon of the Harvard University Museum, G. Schumacher, and an expert architect, undertook systematically and thoroughly to excavate this large detached "tell" bying 350 ft. above the valley and 1,450 ft. above sea-level, its location as the only possible strategic stronghold proving it to be the ancient Samaria. This was a "gigantic enterprise" because of the large village of 800 population, to the Harvard Theological Review: An average of 285 diggers were employed the first season and from 280–60 the second. Hundreds of Arabian lamps, etc., were found close to the surface, and then nothing more until the Roman ruins. Many fine Roman columns still remained upright, upon the surface of the hill. The road of columns leading to the Forum and ornamental gate (oriented unlike the older gates), the great outer wall "20 stadii in circuit" (Jos), the hippodrome, etc., were all found with inscriptions or coins and pottery of the early Roman Empire. Even the old Rom chariot road leading into the Forum was identified. Adjoining the Forum and connected with it by a wide doorway was a basilica, consisting of a large open stone-paved court surrounded by a colonnade with a single floor. An altar, "an anchiravine in the courtyard dates this to 12–15 AD. The plan of the Herodian temple consisted of a stairway, a portico, a vestibule and a cela with a corridor on each side. The staircase was about 80 ft. wide, composed of 17 steps beautifully constructed, the steps being quite modern in style, each tread overlapping the next lower by several inches. The roof was arched and the walls very massive and covered with a heavy coat of plaster still retaining traces of color. Discovery of this temple was made close to the statue was a Rom altar (presumably Herodian) c 13 by 7 ft., rising in six courses of stone to a height of 6 ft. Beneath the Rom city was a Seleucid town (c 300–108 BC), with its fortifications, gates, streets, temples, public buildings and a complex of private houses, in connection with which was a large bath house, with mosaic floor, hot and cold baths, water closet, etc, which was heated by a furnace. Underneath the Gr walls, which were connected with the well-known red-figured Gr ware of c 400 BC, were brick structures and very thick fortress walls built in receding courses of small stones in the Bab style. In the filling of the construction trench of this Bab wall were found Israelite potsherds. A few Gr g seal with a cartouche of the cartouche of Osorkon II of Egypt (874–853 BC), Ahab's contemporary; and at the same level, about 75 fragments of pottery, not jar-handles but ostraca, inscribed with records or memorials in ancient Hebrew. The script is Phenomenal, and valuable to such experts as Lyon and Driver, practically identical with that of the Silean Inscription (c 700 BC) and M S (c 590 BC). "The inscriptions are written in ink with a reed pen in an easy flowing hand and show a pleasing contrast to the stiff forms of Phen inscriptions cut in stone. The graceful curves give evidence of a skill which comes only with long practice" (Lyon). The ink is well preserved, the writing is distinct, the words are divided by dots or strokes, and with two exceptions all the ostraca are dated, the reigning king probably being Ahab. The following samples represent the ordinary memoranda: "In the 11th year. From 'Abi-ezer. For'Assl, Akhelemu (and) Ba'ala; From 'Elathan (?), . . . In 9th yr. From Yasst. For 'Abino'am. A jar of old wine. . . . In 11th yr. For Hotyo. The vineyard of the Tell." Baal and El form a part of several of the proper names, as also the Heb Divine name, the latter occurring naturally not in its full form, YHWH, but as ordinarily in compounds. It is interesting to note the dates from 130–43; of Driver, PEFS, 1911, 79–83). In a list of 30 proper names all but three have Bib. equivalents. "They are the earliest specimens of Heb writing which have been found, and in amount they exceed by far all known ancient Heb inscrip ions; moreover, they are the first Palestinian records of this nature to be found" (see esp. Lyon, op. cit., I, 70–96; II, 102–13; III, 136–38; IV, 136–43; Reisner, ib, III, 246–63; also Theol. Literaturblatt, 1919, 126; Driver in MNOF, 1911, 23–27; Rev. biblique, VI, 435–45). (3) 'Ain Shems (Beth-shemes, 1 S 6 1–21; 2 K 14 11).—In a short but important campaign, during 1911–12, in which from 36 to 167 workmen were employed, Dr. D. Mackenzie uncovered a massive double gate and primitive walls 12–15 ft. high, with mighty bastions, and found in later deposits Egypt images, Syrian Astartes, imported Aegean vases and a remarkable series of inscribed royal jar-handles, the name of a "goe to the great archy" (Vincent), as also what seemed to be an ancient Sem tomb with façade entrance. The proved Cretan relations here are esp. important. The town was suddenly destroyed, probably in the era of Seti-marcher (PEFS, 1911, LAH, 1911, 12; 1911, XII, 145). (4) Gezer (Palestine Exploration Fund).—Tell el-Jezar occupies a conspicuous position, over 250 ft. above the plain, and 750 ft. over the sea, on a ridge of hills some 20 miles N.W. of Jerus, overlooking the plain toward Jaffa, which is 17 miles distant. It is in plain sight of the two chief trade caravans roads of Southern Pal which it controlled. The ancient Gezer was well known from many references to it in the text. The Egyptian gods Baal and Astarte, the two most powerful names here, are found in the names of several of the governors of Gezer being given in letters dating from c 1400 BC and Memphitis (c 1200 BC) calling himself "Binder of Gezer," etc. The discovery of the boundary stones of Gezer (see above) positively identified it. It was thoroughly excavated by R. A. Stewart Macalister in 1902–5, 1907–9, during which time 10,000 photographs were made of objects found. No explorations have been so long continued on one spot or have brought more unique discoveries. The discoveries have thrown much light upon the development of Palestinian culture and religion, and none have been reported as fully (Excavations of Gezer, 1912, 3 vols; Hist of Civilization in Pal, 1912). Ten periods are recognized as being distinctly marked in the history of the mound—which broadly speaking represents the development in all parts of Pal: (a) pre-Sem period (c. 3000–2500 BC), to the entrance of the first Semites; (b) first Sem city (c. 2500–1800 BC), to the end of the XIlth Egypt Dynasty; (c) second Sem city (c. 1800–1400 BC), to the end of the XVllth Egypt Dynasty; (d) third Sem city (c. 1400–1000 BC), to the beginning of the Hebrew monarchy; (e) fourth Sem city (c. 1000–550 BC), to the destruction of the monarchy and the Bab exile; (f) Pers and Hel period (550–100 BC), to the beginning of the Rom dominion; (g) Roman phase (100 BC–330 AD); (h) Byzantine (330–600 AD); (i) and (j) early and modern Arabian (350 AD to the present). The last four periods have left few important memorials and may be omitted from review.

(a) The aboriginal non-Sem inhabitants of Gezer were troglodytes (Gen 14:1) living in the cave one honeycomb this district (cf ZDPV, 1909, VI, 12), modifying the cave or hewing out cells for homes. This was not always the case, for a small race 5 ft. 4 in. to 5 ft. 7 in. in height, slender in form, with rather broad head and thick skulls, who built or hewed caves and huts of rock, dug wells, gathered fire and cooked food; possessed no metals, made by hand a porous and gritty soft-baked pottery which they decorated with simple lines and dots; and were capable of a certain art—the oldest in Pal—in which drawings of various kinds and in some cases pictures of animals (possibly phallic); they probably offered sacrifices; they certainly cremated their dead, depositing with the ashes in a square cell about 4 ft. long by 2 ft. wide, and in it the bodies were burned while still in an upright posture. This tiny cup mound in the rocks suggests possible religious rites; in close connection with these markings were certain remains, including bones of swine (cf Lev 11:7).

(b) The Semites who displaced this population were more highly organized, having their tools and potter's wheels, with finer and more varied pottery; they were a heavier race, being 5 ft. 7 in. to 5 ft. 11 in. in height, having broader and thicker skull faces. They did not burn but buried their dead carelessly, the natural deposits of the grave and the deposits are the same as before; occasionally some heads are found with the body. The former race had surrounded their settlement with a wall 6 ft. high and 5 ft. thick, mostly earth, though faced with selected stones; but this race built a wall of hammerd stones, though irregularly cut and laid, the wall being 10 ft. thick, and one gateway being 42 ft. wide, flanked by two towers. While flutes were always the common residences (as in later eras), yet some buildings of stone were erected toward the close of this period and one large palace was found, built of large-boned, thicker-skulled, adobes and stone blocks, with a central, and containing a complex of rooms, including one rectangular court surrounded by a row of columns, long by 24 ft. wide. Remarkable of all were their works of engineering. They hewed enormous cisterns, square, rectangular and circular, out of the soft chalk and limestone rocks, of which contained 60 chambers, one chamber being 42 ft. in one room, however, was a tunnel which was made c 2000 BC, passing out of use c 1450–1250 BC, and which shows the power of these early Pal architects. About 2500–1500 BC a roadway cut through the hill of rock some 47 ft. to an inclination of 50°, high and 10 in. in breadth, which led to a long sloping passage of equal dimensions, with the arch having a vaulted roof and the sides well plumb. This led into a bed of much harder rock, where dimensions were reduced and the workmanship was poorer, but ultimately reached, about 130 ft. below the present surface of the ground, an enormous living space of such depth that the excavators could not empty it of the soft mud with which it was filled. A well-cut but well-worn and battered stone staircase, over 12 ft. broad, connected the top of the passageway with a section of a tunnel 94 ft. above. Beyond the spring was a natural cave 80 by 25 ft. Dr. Macalister asks, "Did a Canaanite governor plan and Canaanite workmen execute this vast work? How did the ancient engineers discover the place to answer? Can we certainly say that the tunnel was designed to bring the entrance of the water passage within the courtyard protected by the palace walls?"

Another great reservoir, 57 by 40 ft., at another part of the city was squared in the rock to a depth of 29 ft. and below this another one of equal depth but not so large, and narrowing toward the bottom. These were once covered with layers of cement and surrounded by a wall; they would hold 60,000 gals.

(c) The second Sem city, built on the ruins of the first, was smaller. There were fewer buildings but larger rooms. The potter's wheel was used with the pottery becoming much finer, better styles and decoration reaching a climax of grace and refinement. Foreign trade begins in this period and almost or quite reaches its culmination. The Hyksos scarabs found here prove that under their rule (XVIIth and XVlth Dynasties) there was close intercourse with Pal, and many of Egypt articles show that this was also true before and after the Hyksos. The Cretan scarabs found and the Assyrian trade, e.g., show the introduction of new art ideas which soon brought local attempts at imitation. Scribers implement writing in wax and clay begin here and are found in all strata hereafter.

With the pottery is elaborately painted, it is but little molded. The "combed" pottery which is now rare disappears, while burnished ornament reaches high-water mark. As in other districts in Egypt the pottery is elaborately modeled and stuck on; but it is infantile art. Burials still occur in natural caves, but also in the rock itself; generally, the bodies were deposited on the floor without coffins, generally in a crouching position, and stones are laid around and over them without system. Drink offerings always and food offerings generally are placed with the dead. Scarabs are found with the skeletons and ornaments of bronze and silver, occasionally gold and beads, and sometimes with the disappearance. Lamps also begin to be deposited, but in small numbers.

(d) During this period Menephtah "spoiled Gezer," and Israel established itself in Canaan. The excavations have given no hint of Menephtah's raid, unless it is found in an ivory pectoral bearing his cartouche. About 1400 BC a great wall, 4 ft. thick, was built of large and well-shaped stones and protected later by particularly fine towers, perhaps, as Macalister suggests, by the Pharaoh who captured Gezer and gave it as a dowry to his daughter, wife of King Solomon. A curious fact, which seemingly illustrates Josh 10 16, is the large increase of the town shortly after the Hebron invasion. "The houses are smaller and more crowded and the sacred area of the high place is built over." There is no indication of an exclusively Israelite population around the city outside. (Macalister, v. Driver, Modern Research, 69). That land was taken for building purposes from the old sacred enclosure, and that new ideas in building plans and more heavily fortified buildings were now introduced have been thought to suggest the entrance among the ancient population of another element with different ideas. The finest palace of this period with very thick walls (3–9 ft.) carefully laid out at right angles, and certainly built near "the time of the Heb invasion," was perhaps the residence of Horam (Josh 10 33). At this period seals begin (10 being found here, as against 28 in the next period, and 31 in the Hellenistic) and also iron tools; the use of the carpenter's compass is proved, the bow drill was probably in use, bronze and iron nails appear (wrought iron being fairly common from c 1000 BC); a cooking-pot of bronze was found, and spoons of shell and bronze; modern methods of making buttons and button holes are used from this period.) The pottery buttons are being introduced in the next city. One interesting little reference to the alliance between Gezer and Lachish (Josh 10 33) finds unexpected illustration from the fact that a kind of pottery peculiar to Lachish, not having been found in any other of the Southern Palestinian towns, was found at Gezer. The pottery here in general shows the same method of construction as in the 3d stratum, but the decoration and shapes deteriorate, while there is practically no molding. It shows much the same foreign influence as before, the styles being affected from Egypt, Crete, the Aegean, and esp. Cyprus. From this period come 218 scarabs, 68 from the period previous and 93 from the period following. Ornamental colored specimens of imported Egypt glass also occur, clear glass not being found till the next period. Little intercourse is proved with Babylon at this era as against 16 Bab cylinders found in the previous period, only 4 were found in this and 15 in the next period. There is no marked change in the method of disposing of the dead, but the food vessels are of smaller size and are placed in the graves in greater numbers, most of these being broken either through the use of poor vessels because of economy or with the idea of liberating the spirit of the object that it might serve the deceased in the spirit world. Lamps are common now in every tomb but there was a marked decrease in the quantity and value of ornamental objects. Religious emblems occur but rarely. The worship of Astarte (see ASHTORETH), the female consort of Baal, is most popular at this era, terra cotta figures and plaques of this goddess being found in many tombs, and in large numbers. It is suggestive that these grow notably less in the next stratum. It is also notable that primitive idols are certainly often intentionally ugly (Vincent). So to this day Arab women court evil.

(c) This period, during which almost the entire prophetic lit. was produced, is of peculiar interest. Gezer at this time as at every other period was in general appearance like a modern Arab village, a huge mass of crooked, narrow, airless streets, shut inside a thick wall, with no trace of sanitary conveniences, with huge cisterns in which dead men could lie undetected for centuries, and with no sewers. Even in the Maccabean time the only sewer found ran, not into a cesspool, but into the ground, close to the governor's palace. The mortality was excessively high, few old men being found in the cemeteries, while curvature of the spine, syphilis, brain disease, and esp. broken, unset bones were common. Tweezers, pins, needles, mirrors, perfume boxes, scrapers (for baths) were common in this stratum and in all that follow it, while we have also here silver earrings, bracelets and other beautiful ornaments with the first sign of clear glass objects; tools also of many kinds of stone, bronze and iron, an iron hoe just like the modern one, and the first known pulley of bronze. The multitude of Heb weights found here have thrown much new light on the weight-standards of Pal (see esp. Macalister, Gezer, II, 287–91; E. J. Pilcher, PEFS, 1912; A. R. S. Kenyon, Expo T. XXIV).

The pottery was poor in quality, clumsy and coarse in shape and ornament, excepting as it was imported, the local Aegean imitations being unworthy. Combed ornament was not common, and the burnished as a rule was limited to random scratches. Multiple lamps became common, and a large variety of styles in small jugs was introduced. The motives of the last period survive, but in a degenerate form. The yellow friezes so characteristic of the 3d Sem period disappear. The scarab stamp goes out of use, but the impressions of other seals “now become fairly common as potter's marks.” These consist either of simple devices (stars, pentacles, etc.) or of names in Old Heb script. These Heb-inscribed stamps were found at many sites and consist of two classes,

(i) those containing personal names, such as Azariah, Haggai, Menahem, Shebannah, etc., (ii) those which are confined to four names, often repeated—Hebron, Socoh, Ziph, Mamsith—in connection with a reference to the king, e.g. “For [or Of] the king of Hebron.” These latter date, according to Dr. Macalister's final judgment, from the Pers period. He still thinks they represent the names of various potters' guilds in Pal (of 1 Ch 2, 4, 5, and see esp. Bible Side-Lights from Gezer, 150, etc), but others suppose these names to represent the local measures of capacity, which differed in these various districts; others that these names are prefixed to symbols which would be used and bought. At any rate, we certainly have here the work of the king's potters referred to in 1 Ch 4 23. Another very curious Heb tablet inscription is the so-called Zodiacal Tablet, on which the signs of the Zodiac are figured with certain other symbols which were at first supposed to express some esoteric magical or religious meaning, but which seem only to represent the ancient agricultural year with the proper months indicated for sowing and reaping—being the same as the modern seasons and crops excepting that flax was cultivated anciently. An even more important literary memorial from this period consists of two cuneiform tablets written about three-quarters of a century after the Ten Tribes had been carried to Assyria and foreign colonies had been thrown into Israelite territory. This collapse of the Northern Kingdom was not marked by any local catastrophe, so far as the ruins indicate, any more than by the kings of the time of the Assyrians, until after Israel entered Pal; but soon afterward we find an Assyrian colony settled in Gezer “using the Assyrian language and letters . . . . and carrying on business with Assyrian methods.” In one tablet (649 BC), which is a bill of sale for certain objects with a description of the same, appeared the name of the buyer, seal of seller and signature of 12 witnesses, one of whom is the Egyptian governor of the new town, another an Assyrian noble whose name precedes that of the governor, and still another a Western Asiatic, the others being Assyrian. It is a Hebrew “Nethaniah,” who the next year, as the other tablet shows, sells his field, his seal bearing upon it a lunar stellar emblem. Notwithstanding the acknowledged literary work of high quality produced in Pal during this period, no other hint of this is found clear down to the Gr period except in one neo-Bab tablet.

The burials in this period were much as previously, excepting that the caves were smaller and toward the end of the period shelves around the walls received the bodies. In one Sem tomb as many as 150 vessels were found. Quite the most astonishing discovery at this level was that of several tombs which scholars generally agree to be "Philistine." They were not native Canaanite, but certainly Aegean intruders with relations with Crete and Cyprus, such as we would expect the Philistines to have (see Philistines). The tombs were oblong or rectangular, covered with large horizontal slabs, each tomb containing but a single body, stretched out with the head to the E. or W. One tomb was that of a girl of 18 with articles of alabaster and silver about her, and wearing a Cretan silver mouth plate; another was a man of 40 with agate seal of Assyrian design, a two-handled glass vessel, etc.; another was a woman surrounded by handsome ornaments of bronze, lead, silver, and gold, with a basalt sarcab between her knees. The richest tomb was that of a girl whose head had been severed from the body; with her was a hemispherical bowl, ornamented with rosette and lotus pattern, and a hoard of beautiful things. The iron in these tombs was noticeable (cf 1 S 17 7), and in one tomb were found two ingots of gold, one of these being of the same weight almost to a fraction as that of Arhan (Josh 7 21). The most impressive discovery was the high place. This began as early as 2500-2000 BC, and grew by the addition of monoliths and surrounding buildings up to this era. The eight huge uncult pillars which were found standing in a row, with two others fallen (yet cf Benzinger, Heb Archaeology, 320), show us the actual appearance of this ancient worshipping-place so famous in the Bible (Dt 16 22; 2 K 17 9.11; 23 8). The top of one of these monoliths had been worn smooth by kisses; another was an importation, being possibly, as has been suggested, a captured "Aril"; another stone, near by, had a large cavity in its top, nearly 3 ft. long and 2 ft. broad and 1 ft. 2 in. deep, which is differently interpreted as being the block upon which the 'debaerah, so often mentioned in connection with the mention of the bebahoth, may have been erected, or as an altar, or perhaps a laver for ritual ablutions. Inside the sacred enclosure was found a small bronze cobra (2 K 18 4), and also the entrance to an ancient cave, where probably oracles were given, the excavators finding that this cave was connected with another by a small, secret passage—through which presumably the message was delivered. In the stratum underlying the high place was a cemetery of infants buried in large jars. "That the sacrificed infants were the firstborn, devoted in the temple, is indicated by the fact that none were over a week old" (Macalister). In all the Sem strata bones of children were also found in corners of the houses, the deposits being identical with infant burials in the high place; and examination showed that these were not stillborn children. At least some of the burials under the house thresholds and under the foundation of walls carry with them the mute proofs of this most gruesome practice. In one place the skeleton of an old woman was found in a corner where a hole had been left just large enough for this purpose. A youth of about 18 had been cut in two at the waist and only the upper part of his body deposited. Before the coming into Pal of the Israelites, a lamp began to be placed under the walls and foundations, probably symbolically to take the place of human sacrifice. A lamp and bowl deposit under the threshold, etc., begins in the 3d Sem period, but is rare till the middle of that period. In the 4th Sem period it is common, though not universal; in the Hellenic it almost disappears. Macalister suspects that these bowls held blood or grape juice. In one striking case a bronze figure was found in place of a body. Baskets full of phalli were carried away from the high place. Various types of the Astarte were found at Gezer. When we see the strength and popularity of this religion against which the prophets contended in Canaan, "we are amazed at the survival of this world-religion," and we now see "why Ezra and Nehemiah were forced to raise the 'fence of the law' against this heathenism, which did in fact overthrow all other Sem religions" (George Adam Smith, P.B.S., 1906, 288).

(1) During the Maccabean epoch the people of Gezer built reservoirs (one having a capacity of 4,000,000 gals.) used well-paved rooms, favored complex house plans with pillars, the courtyard becoming less important as compared with the rooms, though domestic fowls were now for the first time introduced. The architectural decorations have all been annihilated (as elsewhere in Pal) excepting a few molded stones and an Ionic volute from a palace, supposed to be that of Simon Maccabaeus because of the references in Jos and because of a scribbled imprecation found in the courtyard: "May fire overtake [?] Simon's palace." This is the only inscription from all these post-exilic centuries, to which so much of the beautiful Bible lit. is ascribed, excepting one grotesque animal figure on which is scrawled a name which looks a little like "Antiochus." Only a few scraps of Gr bowls, some Rhodian jar-handles, a few bronze and iron arrow heads, a few animal figures and a fragment of an Astarte, of doubtful chronology, remain from these four centuries. The potsherds prove that foreign imports continued and that the local potters followed classic models and did excellent work. The ware was always burnished hard; combed ornament and burnishing were out of style; molded ornament was usually confined to the rope design; painted decorations were rare; potter's marks were generally in Gr, though some were in Heb, the letters being of late form, and no names appearing similar to those found in Scripture. The tombs were well-cut square chambers, with shafts hewn in the rock for the bodies, usually nine to each tomb, which were run into them head foremost. The doorways were well cut, the covers almost always being movable flat slabs, though in one case a swinging stone door was found—circular rolling stones or the "false doors" so often found in the Jerus tombs being unknown here. Little shrines were erected above the forecourt or vestibule. When the body decayed, the bones in tombs having these akkhan, shafts, were collected into ossuaries, the inscriptions on these ossuaries showing clearly the transition from Old Hebr to the square character. After the Maccabean time the town was deserted, though a small Christian community lived here in the 4th cent. AD. See also Gezer.

PALLU, pal, pALLUtes, pal'-ties (ST 2, 18, 19).; distinguished): A son of Reuben (Gen 46 6 18; "Pallu").; Ex 5 14; Nu 26 5; 1 Ch 5 3).; Perhaps Peleth of Nu 16 1 is the same.

Pallutes, the patronymic, occurs in Nu 26 5.

Palm, pām (OF THE HAND) (nāph, kaph): The Heb word which is used in a variety of senses (see Hand; Paw) is usually t4 "hand" in EV, but the tr "palm" is found in 5 passages of the OT, in 3 of which the Heb text adds the word nāph, "hand," 1 S 5 4; 2 K 9 35; Dn 10 10. It would properly mean the "hollow hand" (root kāphāph, "to break to pieces," which receives or grasps things. It is therefore used in reference to filling the priest's hands with sacrificial portions (Lev 14 15).

The palms of the hands of Dagon are mentioned as cut off, when the idol was found mutilated in the presence of the ark of Jehovah (1 S 5 4), from which may be inferred that this Semitic deity was represented with hands spread out in blessing, as we find in numerous Bab representations of divinities.

In a beautiful metaphor God answers the repentant people of Jerus, who thought Jehovah had forgotten and forsaken them: "Behold, I have gaven thee upon the palms of my hands" (Isa 49 16; see also Eclesus 18 3). Daniel is touched upon the palms of his hands to wake him from sleep (Dn 10 10).

In the NT we find the phrase, "to smit with the palms of the hands," as a tr of the Gr vb. παλατίνος, rhaphanos (Mt 28 57), see also 5 39; 1 X X X Hos 11 4; 1 Ess 4 30), and, derived from the same vb., παλατίνη, rhaphismon, a blow of the palm on the cheek, etc (Mk 14 65; Jn 18 22; 19 3, where, however, in EV the word "palm" has not been given). The marginal tr "to smite or stroke with the palm" (Mt 28 57; Jn 18 22; 19 3) and "strokes of rods" (Mk 14 65 m) does not seem to be applicable to the Gr text of the OT and NT, while it is a frequent meaning of the words in classical language. It would therefore be better to eliminate these marginal additions.

Palm Tree, pām'trē (παλαιν, tāmār, same as the Aram. and Ethiopic, but in Arab. = "date"); φοινίκ, phoínix (Ex 16 27; Lev 23 40; Nu 33 9; Dt 34 3; Jgs 1 16; 3 13; 2 Ch 28 15; Neh 8 15; Ps 92 12; Cant 7 7; Joel 1 12); mārāh, tāmār, Deborah, "dwelt under the palm-tree" (Jgs 4 5); "they are like a palm-tree [in "pillar"], of turned work" (Jer 10 5); mārāh, tīmarāh [only in pl.], the palm tree as an architectural feature [1 K 6 29.32.35; 7 36; 2 Ch 3 5; Est 40 16]; Gr only Eclesus 50 12; Jn 12 13; Rev 7 9); The palm, Phoenix dactylifera (N.O. Palmen), Arab. nakhūl, is a tree which from the earliest times has been associated with the Sem peoples. In Arabia the very existence of man depends largely upon its presence, and many authorities consider this to have been its original habitat. It is only natural that such a tree should have been sacred both there and in Assyria in the earliest ages. In Pal the palm leaf appears as an ornament upon pottery as back as 1800 BC (cf PEF, Gezer Misc., 172). In Egypt the tall palm stem forms a constant feature in early architecture, and among the Hebrews it was extensively used as a decoration of the temple (1 K 6 29.32.35; 7 30; 2 Ch 3 5). It is a symbol of beauty (Cant 7 7) and of the righteous man: "The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree: He shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon. They are planted in the house of Jehovah; They shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall be full of sap and grace" (Ps 92 12-14).

The palm tree or branch is used extensively on Jewish coinage and most noticeably appears as a symbol of the land upon the celebrated Judaean Capta coins of Vespasian. A couple of centuries or so later it forms a prominent architectural feature in the ornamentation of the Galilean synagogues, e.g. at Tell Hosten (Caperneum). The method of artificial fertilization of the pistillate (female) flowers by means of the staminate (male) flowers appears to have been known in the earliest historic times. Winged figures are depicted on some of the early Assyrian sculptures shaking a bunch of the male flowers over the female for the same purpose as the people of modern Gaza ascend the tall trunks of the fruit-bearing palms and tie among the female flowers a bunch of the pollen-bearing male flowers.
In Pal today the palm is much neglected; there are few groves except along the coast, e.g. at the bay of Akka, Jaffa and Gaza; solitary palms occur all over the land in the ancient courtyards of mosques (cf Ps 92 13). Abundance and houses even in the mountains.

2. Their palms flourish upon the Mount of Olives (Neh 8 15), and Jericho was long known as the "city of palm-trees" (Dt 34 3; Jgs 1 16; 3 13; Jos B.I, IV, viii, 2-3), but today the only palms are scarce and small; under its name Hazazon-tamar (2 Ch 20 2) En-gedi would appear to have been as much a place of palms in ancient days as we know it was in later history. A city too, called Tammar ("date palm") appears to have been somewhere near the southwestern corner of the Dead Sea (Ezk 47 19; 48 28). Today the numerous salt-encrusted stumps of wild palm trees washed up all along the shores of the Dead Sea witness to the existence of these trees within recent times in some of the deep valleys around.

Branches of palms have been symbolically associated with several different ideas. A palm branch is used in Isa 9 14; 19 15 to signify the "head" or the highest of the people, as contrasted with the rush, the "tail," or humblest of the people. Palm branches appear from early times to have been associated with rejoicing. On the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles the Hebrews were commanded to take branches of palms, with other trees, and rejoice before God (Lev 23 40; cf Neh 8 15; 2 Macc 10 7). The palm branch still forms the chief feature of the lulabh carried daily by every pious Jew to the synagogue, during the feast. Later it was connected with the idea of triumph and victory. Simon Maccabaeus entered the Akra at Jerusalem after its capture, "with thanksgiving, and branches of palm trees, and with harps, and cymbals, and with violets and roses; because there was destroyed a great enemy out of Israel!" (1 Macc 13 51 AV; cf 2 Macc 10 7). The same idea comes out in the use of palm branches by the multitudes who escorted Jesus to Jerusalem (Jn 12 13) and also in the vision of the "great multitude, which no man could number ... standing before the ... Lamb, arrayed in white robes, and palms in their hands!" (Rev 7 9). Today palms are carried in every Moslem funeral procession and are laid on the new-made grave.

PALMER-WORM, pám'ér-wúrm (277, gizám; LXX kámpé, kämpté (Am 4 9; Joel 1 4; 2 25)): "Palm-worm" means "eaterpillar," but the insect meant is probably a kind of locust. See INSECT; LOCUST.

PALSY, pól'zi, PARALYSIS, pa-rál'í-sis (παραλίως, paráliaasia): The Eng. word "palsy" is derived from the Gr. "paralía" which in Middle Eng. was shortened into palese, the form in which it appears in Wyclif's version. In the 16th cent. it appears as "palsy," the form used in AV. This, however, is seldom used at the present day, the Latinized Gr. form "paralysis" being more frequently employed, both in modern literature and in colloquial Eng. "Sick of the palsy" is the tr either of the adj. para-

PAPYRUS, páp'ə-rus (παπύρος, pàpyroς, PAPYRUS, PAPYRUS): A country lying along the southern coast of Asia Minor, bounded on the N. by 1. Physical Pisidia, on the E. by Isauria, on the Features S. by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the W. by Lydia (Acts 2 10; 27 5). In the earliest time Pamphylia was but a narrow strip of low-lying land between the base of the mountains and the sea, scarcely more than 20 miles long and half as wide. A high and imposing range of the Taurus Mountains practically supports it upon three sides, and, jutting out into the sea, isolates it from the rest of Asia Minor. Its two rivers, the Cestrus and the Cataractas, are said by ancient writers to have been navigable for several miles inland, but now the greater part of their water is diverted to the river Lycus for navigational purposes, and the general surface of the country has been constantly changed by the many rapid mountain streams. The level fertile coast land is therefore well watered, and the moist air, which is excessively hot and evaporating, has always been laden with fever. Several roads leading from the coast up the steep mountain to the interior existed in ancient wiktos or of the part. of the vb. paralíaasia. The disease is one characterized by extreme loss of the power of motion dependent on the most delicate cells of the brain or of the spinal cord. It is always serious, usually intractable, and generally sudden in onset (1 Macc 9 55 f). Miraculous cures by Our Lord are related in general terms, as in Mt 4 24; Acts 8 7. Aeneas (Acts 9 33) was probably a paralytic eighty years bedridden. Though the Lord addressed the paralytic let down through the roof (Mt 9 6; Mk 2 3; Lk 5 18) as "son," it was not necessarily a proof that he was young, and though He procures the cure by declaring the forgiveness of sin, we need not infer that the disease was the result of an evil life, although it may have been. Bennett conjectures that the centurion's palsied servant grievously tormented was suffering from progressive paralysis with respiratory spasms (see PALM). The subst. paralía is only once used in the LXX in Ezk 21 10, but here it refers to the loosening of the sword, not to the disease.

PALTII, paľ'ti (παλτί, palêt, "Jeh delivers!"); (1) One of the "searchers" of Canaan sent by Moses (Nu 13 9), representing Benjamin in the expedition against Canaan.

(Paltiel, "Palmer-worm"); (2) The man to whom Saul gave Michal, David's wife, after the estrangement (1 S 25 44). He is "the captain of the people" of 2 Esd 6 16 ("Phaltiel," in "Psaltiel"). In 2 S 3 15, he is named ("Phaltiel") (AV), "Paltiel" (RV), and is there mentioned in connection with David's recovery of Michal.

PALTIEL, paľ'ti-el (παλτί-ελ, pal'ti-el, "God's deliverance"); (1) A prince of Issachar (Nu 34 26).

PALTITE, paľ'tit (παλτίτη, pal'tit [as Paltai]; LXX B, Káthal, Kôthal, A, Pálti, Pálti, Pálti): The description occurs but once in this form and is then applied to Helez, one of David's 30 valiant men (2 S 23 26). Helez' name, however, occurs in 1 Ch 11 27 and 27 10 as the "Pelonite." Doubtless there is some confusion of words. The word may be given as a patronymic of Palti, or it may designate a warrior of which there is none mentioned in Josh 15 27 and Neh 11 26 as being in Lower Judah. Helez, however, is described as "of the children of Ephraim" in 1 Ch 27 10.

PAMPHYLLIA, pam-fil'i-a (Παμφυλία, Pamphyli-a): A country lying along the southern coast of Asia Minor, bounded on the N. by 1. Physical Pisidia, on the E. by Isauria, on the Features S. by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the W. by Lydia (Acts 2 10; 27 5). In the earliest time Pamphylia was but a narrow strip of low-lying land between the base of the mountains and the sea, scarcely more than 20 miles long and half as wide. A high and imposing range of the Taurus Mountains practically surrounds it upon three sides, and, jutting out into the sea, isolates it from the rest of Asia Minor. Its two rivers, the Cestrus and the Cataractas, are said by ancient writers to have been navigable for several miles inland, but now the greater part of their water is diverted to the river Lycus for navigational purposes, and the general surface of the country has been constantly changed by the many rapid mountain streams. The level fertile coast land is therefore well watered, and the moist air, which is excessively hot and evaporating, has always been laden with fever. Several roads leading from the coast up the steep mountain to the interior existed in ancient times; one of them, called the Kimax or the Ladder, with its broad stair-like steps 2,000 ft. high, may still be seen ... land which was once called "Pisidia," but which the Romans, in 70 AD, made a part of Pamphylia.

Pamphylia, unless in pre-historic times, was never an independent kingdom; it was subject successively to Lydia, Persia, Macedon, Pergamos and Rome. Because of its comparatively isolated position, civilization there was less developed than in the neighboring countries, and the Asiatic influence was at most times stronger than the Gr. As early as the 5th cent. BC a Gr colony settled there, but the Gr language which was spoken in some of its cities soon became corrupt; the Gr inscriptions, appearing upon the coins of that age, were written in a peculiar character, and before the time of Alexander the Great, Gr ceased to be spoken. Perga then became an important city and the center of the Asiatic religion, of which the Artemis of Perga, locally known as Leto, was the goddess. Coins were struck also in that city. Somewhat later the Gr city of Attalia, which was founded by the Gr colonists in Pamphylia (159–188 BC), rose to importance, and until recent years has been the chief port of entry on the southern coast of Asia Minor. About the beginning of our era, Side became the chief city, and issued a long and beautiful series of coins, probably to facilitate trade with the pirates who found there a favorable market for their booty. Pamphylia is mentioned as one of the recipients of the "letters" of 1 Mac 15 23.

Christianity was first introduced into Pamphylia by Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13 13; 14 24), but because their stay in the country was

PAN: Name of a utensil used in the preparation or the serving of food, and representing several words in the original. Passing over the use of the word in connections like 1 Ch 9 31, "things baked in pans," where the Heb word hakkirim refers, not to the pan itself, but to the cakes baked in the flat pan or griddle which was called mahhath (Ex 27 3; 1 K 7 50, etc.), which seems to have been used to carry burning coals, we note the following words:

(1)  מָפָח, mahkhaḥ, "pan" AV, "baking-pan" RV, a dish of uncertain shape and size which was used in the preparation of the minhāḥ, or vegetable offering. See Lev 2 5; 6 21; 7 9; 1 Ch 23 29.

On the basis of Exk 4 3 it might be assumed that the pan was rectangular in shape and of good size.

(2)  מַפַּח, maḵāḥ, rendered "pan" in 1 S 2 14.

The same word is used in the phrase, "pan of fire" RV, "hearth of fire" AV (Zec 12 6); and it is also transliterated of the furnishing of tabernacle and temple (Ex 30 18; 1 K 7 20, etc.). As it held water and was used for boiling meat and the like, it must have been a kind of pot or kettle.

(3)  מַפְּחָה, masærāh (2 S 13 9). The connection gives no clue as to shape or size except that it must have been small enough to serve food in, and of the proper shape to hold a substance which could be poured out. Some authorities suggest a connection with the root מָפַח, māḵ, "leaven," and think that this pan was like the kneading-trough in shape.

(4)  מַפַּח, māḵ, rendered "pan" in Ex 27 3 AV, "pot" RV (see Port).

(5)  מַפָּר, pāṟār, "pan" in Nu 11 8 AV, "pot" RV (see Port).

(6)  דַּדְוֶח, ḏāḏhōk (2 Ch 35 13). Some kind of dish or pot. Slightly different forms of the same root are rendered "cruse" (Mark 7 27), "dish" (2 K 21 13 [gēlōdāḥ]), and also in RV in Prov 19 24; 26 15, instead of the probably incorrect "bosom" of AV.

(7)  מַפַּח, māḵ, rendered "pan" in 1 Esd 1 12 AV (RV "cauldron").

PANNAG, panicus (πᾶνναγ), panagh: καῖα, καισά; Ezk 27 17 m., "Perhaps a kind of confection": One of the articles of commerce of Judah and Israel. The καῖα of the LXX is said to be a similar shrub to the laurel. Nothing is known of the nature of pannag. Cheyne (EB, 3505) thinks the Heb letters have got misplaced and should be ἱδω, gopher, "vine," and he would join to it the מֶשֶׁר, mishār, "honey," which follows in the verse, giving a "grape honey," the ordinary dōba of Pal—an extremely likely article of commerce. See Honey.

PANOPLY, pan'ō-pli: 1 Mac 13 29 RVm. See Armor.

PAP (πᾶπ, shōdā, τῶ, shōdē), "breast" [Ezk 23 21; παρῶτας, mastōs, "the breast" [I K 11 27; 25 29; Rev 1 13]). The Eng, word, which goes back to Middle Eng. "pappe" (see Skeat, Concise Etymological Dict, of the Eng. Language, 527) and is now obsolete, has been replaced in RV by "breast." The Heb word signifies the "female breast"; the Gr word has a wider signification, including the male chest.

PAPER, păpēr. See Crafts, II, 13; Papirus; Reed; Writing.

PAPER REEDS, rēdās: In Isa 19 7 AV (RV "meadows").

PAPHOS, pa-fōs: The name of two towns, Old (πάφος Παλάτη, Palaīd Paphos), New (Πάφος, Paphos) and New Paphos (Nā Pāfōs), situated at the southwestern extremity of Cyprus. Considerable confusion is caused by the use of the single name Paphos in ancient writers to denote now one, now the other, of these cities. That referred to in Acts 13 6.13 is strictly called New Paphos (modern Buffo), and lay on the coast about a mile S. of the modern Ktima and some 10 miles N.W. of the old city. The latter (modern Koudia) is situated on an eminence more than a mile from the sea, on the left bank of the Dirirzo, probably the ancient Bocaros.

It was founded by Cinyras, the father of Adonis, or, according to another legend, by Acris, and was renowned for the capital of the most important kingdom in Cyprus except that of Old Salamis. Its territory embraced Paphos a considerable portion of Western Cyprus, extending northward to that of Soli, southward to that of the city of its eastern boundary to the range of Troodos. Among its last kings was Niccolas, who ruled shortly after the death of Alexander the Great. In 310 BC Nicocreon of Salamis, who had been set over the whole of Cyprus by...
Ptolemy I of Egypt, was forced to put an end to his life at Paphos for plotting with Antigonus ( Dio- dorus xx. 21, who wrongly gives the name as Nicae; see Cyrenae, 228) or Syracuse ( Diodorus, X.XII, 203 f.), and from that time Paphos remained under Egypt rule until the Rom annexation of Cyprus in 58 BC. The growth of New Paphos brought with it the decline of the old city, which was also ruined by successive earthquakes. Yet its temple still re- mained much of its old fame, and in 69 AD Titus, the future emperor of Rome, turned aside on his journey to Jerusalem, which he was to capture in the following year, to visit the sacred shrine and to inquire of the priests into the fortune which awaited them (Tacit. Hist. ii. 2-4; Suetonius Titus 5).

New Paphos, originally the seaport of the old town, was founded, according to tradition, by Agapenor of Arcadia (Hiald ii. 600; Strabo, v. 962). Its possession of a good harbor secured its prosperity, and it had several rich temples. According to Dio Cassius (iv. 23) it was restored by Augustus in 15 BC after a destructive earthquake and received the name Augustus (Or Septimius Severus) Felix, or the Roman emperor was the head of the admininistrative capital of the island and the seat of the governor. The extant remains all date from this period and include those of public buildings, private houses, city walls and the mole of the harbor.

The history of Paphos is the history of its temple. The source of its fame was the local cult, of which the kings and their descendants remained hereditary priests down to the Rom seisure of Cyprus. The goddess, identified with the ancient Cypr. Astarte, was said to have risen from the sea at Paphos, was in reality a Nature-goddess, closely resembling the Bab Ishtar and the Phoen Astarte, a native deity of Asia Minor and the Aegean Islands. Her cult can be traced back at Paphos to Homeric times (Odyssey vii. 362) and was repeatedly celebrated by Gr and Lat poets (Aeschylus Suppl. 555; Aristoph. Lys. 833; Virgil Aen. i. 415; Horace Odes i. 19 and 30; iii. 20; Statius Silvae i. 2, 101, etc.). The goddess was represented, not by a statue in human form, but by a white conical stone (Max. Tyr. vii. 8; Tacitus Hist. ii. 3; Servius Ad Aen. i. 724), of which models were on sale for the benefit of pilgrims (Athenaeus xlv. 18); her worship was especially popular among the sailors and she is referred to by Athanasius as the déification of lust (Contra Gentes 9).

Excavation has brought to light at Old Paphos a complex of buildings belonging to Rom times and consisting of an open court with chambers or colon- nades on three sides and an entrance on the E. only, the whole forming a quadrilateral enclosure with sides about 210 ft. long. In this court may have stood the altar, or altars, of incense (Homer speaks of a single altar, Virgil of "a hundred altars with incense burning"; no wood might be shed thereon, and although it stood in the open it was "wet by no rain" (Tacitus, 1.c.; Pliny, NH, ii. 210). On the south side are the ruins of another building, possibly an earlier temple, now almost destroyed save for the western wall (Journal of Hellenic Studies, IX., 193-224). But the fact that no remains or inscriptions have been found here earlier than the Rom occupation of Cyprus militates against the view that the sanctuary stood at this spot from prehistoric times. Its site may be sought at a distance to the N. of Kouklia (D. G. Hogarth, Times, August 5, 1910), or possibly on the plateau of Rhaniti, some 3 miles S.E. of the village, where numerous inscriptions in the old Cyprian syllabic script were found in the summer of 1910 (M. Olmefusl richer, Times, July 10, 1910).

After visiting Salamis and passing through the whole island, about 100 miles in length, Barnabas, Paul and Mark reached Paphos, the capital of the Roman province. The Apostle Sergius Paulus (for the title see visit Cyprus). Here too they would doubt- less begin by preaching in the syna- gogue, but the governor—who is probably the same Paulus whose name appears as procurator in an in- scription of Soli (D. G. Hogarth, Deva Cypria, 114)—hearing of their mission, sent for them and questioned them on the subject of their preaching. A Jew named Bar-Jesus or Elymas, who, as a Magian or Syriac, was called a "wicked man," presumably as a member of his suite, used all his powers of persuasion to prevent his patron from giving his adherence to the new faith, and was met by Paul (it is at this point that the name is first introduced) with a searing denunciation and a sentence of temporary loss of sight. The blindness which at once fell on him produced a deep impression on the mind of the procurator, who professed his belief in the apostle teaching. From Paphos, Paul and his companions sailed on an early direction to Corinth (Acts 15. 1-3).

Papyri

A marsh or water plant, abundant in Egypt in ancient times, serving many purposes in antiquity. The papyrus tuft was the emblem of the Northern kingdom in Egypt. Like the lotus, it suggested one of the favorite capitals of Egypt architecture. Ropes, sandals, and mats were made from its fibers (see Odyssey xxi. 391; Herod. ii. 37, 69), and bundles of the long, light stalks were bound together into light boats (Isa 18. 2; Breasted, Hist Egyptians, 91).

Most importantly, from it was made the tough and inexpensive paper which was used from very ancient times in Egypt and which became the common writing-material for the Egyptian scribe. The cellulair path of the long triangular papyrus stalk was stripped of its bark or skin and sliced into thin strips. Two layers of these strips were laid at right angles to each other, pasted together (Pliny, says with the aid of starch dried and smoothed). The sheets thus formed were posed one to another to form a roll of any length desired. The process and the product are described by Pliny the Elder (NH, xiii. 11-13).

Egypt papyrus rolls are in existence dating from the 27th cent. BC, and no doubt the manufacture of papyrus had been practised for centuries before. The Egypt rolls were sometimes of great length and were often beautifully decorated with colored vignettes (Book of the Dead). Egypt documents of great historical value have been preserved on these fragile rolls. The Papyrus Ebers of the 16th cent. BC sums up the medical lore of the Egyptians of the time of Amenhotep I. The Papyrus Harris, 138 ft. long, in 117 columns, dates from the middle of the 12th cent. BC and records the benefactions and achievements of Ramses III. For the XIXth, XXth and XXIst dynasties, indeed, papyri are relatively numerous, and their contribution important for Egyptian history, life and religion. By the year 1000 BC, papyrus had doubtless come to be used for writing far beyond the limits of Egypt. The Wenamon Papyrus (11th cent.) relates that 500 rolls of papyrus were among the gifts sent from the Delta to the Prince of Biblus, but except in the rarest instances papyri have escaped destruction only in Upper Egypt, where climatic conditions esp. favored their preservation.

In very recent years (1898, 1904, 1907) several Aram. papyri have been found on the island of Elephantine, just below the First Cataract, dating from 494 to 400 BC.

They show that between 470 and 408 BC a flourishing colony of Jews existed there, doing business under Pers. sway, and worshipping their god Yahw, not in a synagogue, but in a temple, in which they offered meal offerings, incense and burnt offerings. In 408, the Egyptians had destroyed their temple at Ye, and the Jews appealed for address to the Pers. governor. It is well known that some Jews had taken refuge in Egypt in 556 BC, taking the prophet Jeremiah with them, and with some such band of refugees the Yeh colony may have originated, although it may have been much older (cf Jer 44 1.15; 2 Kgs XXIX, 1907, 306 ff; XXXI, 448 ff; chief publications by Euting, Sayce and Cowley, and esp. Sachau, Drei aramaische Papyriwurkundsn aus Elephantine, 2d ed, 1908; Aramische Papyri aus Ostraka, 1911).

With Alexander’s conquest of Egypt (322 BC), and the subsequent Ptolemaic dynasty, Greeks came more than ever before into Egypt, and from Gr centers like Alexandria and Arsinoe in the Fayum the Gr language began to spread. Through the Ptolemaic (275-30 BC), Rom (30 BC-293/9 AD), and Byzantine periods (292/93-640 AD), that is, from the death of Alexander to the Arab conquest, Gr was much used in Upper and Lower Egypt, and Gr papyri from these times are now abundant. The 300 Aphrodisio Gr and Coptic papyri published by Bell and Crum (1910) date from 668-722 AD, and show how Gr persisted in the Arab period.

The first important discovery of Gr papyri made in modern times was among the ruins of Heracleanum, near Naples, where in 1752 the ruins of a house of a philosopher which had been destroyed and buried by volcanic ashes from Vauvius (79 AD) a whole library of papyrus rolls was found, quite charred by the heat. With the utmost pains many of these have been unrolled and deciphered, and the first part of them was published in 1793. They consist almost wholly of works of Epicurean philosophy. In 1778 the first discovery of Gr papyri in Egypt was made. In that year some Arabs found 40 or 50 papyrus rolls in an earthen pot, probably in the Fayum, where Philadelphus settled his Gr veterans. One was purchased by a dealer and found its way into the hands of Cardinal Stefano Borgia; the others were destroyed as of no worth. The Borgia Papyrus was published 10 years later. It was a document of little value, recording the forced labor of certain peasants upon the Nile embankment of a given year.

In 1820 another body of papyri was found by natives, buried, it was said, in an earthen pot, on the site of the Serapeum at Memphis, just above Cairo. These came from the most part from the 1st cent. BC. They fell into various hands, and are now in the museums of London, Paris, Leyden, Rome and Dresden. With them the stream of papyri began to flow steadily into the British and Continental museums. In 1821 an Englishman, Mr. W. J. Bankes, bought an Elephantine roll of the xxivth book of the Iliad, the first Gr literary papyrus to be derived from Egypt. The efforts of Mr. Harris and others in 1847-50 brought to England considerable parts of lost orations of Hyperides, new papyri of the xixth book of the Iliad, and parts of Iliad ii, iii, ix. In 1855 Mariette purchased a fragment of Aleman for the Louvre, and in 1856 Mr. Stobart obtained the funeral oration of Hyperides.

The present period of papyrus recovery dates from 1877, when an immense mass of Gr and other papyri, for the most part documentary, not literary, was found in the Fayum, on the site of the ancient Arsinoe. The bulk of this collection passed into the hands of Archduke Rainer of Vienna, and portions of it, being secured by the museums of Paris, London, Oxford and Berlin. These belong largely to the Byzantine period. Another great find was made in 1892 in the Fayum; most of these until the first of many important works in this field from his pen.

With Arthur S. Hunt, of Oxford, Mr. Grenfell excavated in 1896–97, at Bohness, the Rom Oxyrhynchos, and unearthed the greatest mass of Gr papyri of the Rom period thus far found. In 9 large quarto volumes, aggregating 3,000 pages, only a beginning has been made of publishing these Oxyrhynchos texts, which number thousands and are in many cases of great importance. The story of papyrus digging in Egypt since the great find of 1896–97 is largely the record of the work of Grenfell and Hunt. At Tebtunis, in the Fayum, in 1900, they found a great mass of Ptolemaic papyri, comp-

Timomethes Papyrus.

portible in importance with their great discovery at Oxyrhynchos. One of the most productive sources of papyri at Tebtunis was the crocodile cemetery, in which many mummies of the sacred crocodiles were found rolled in papyrus. Important Ptolemaic texts were found in 1902 at Hibeh, and a later visit to Oxyrhynchos in 1903 produced results almost as astonishing and quite as valuable as those of the first excavations there. The work of Rubensohn at Abusir in 1905 has exceptional interest, as it developed the first considerable body of Alexandrian papyri that has been found. The soil and climate of Alexandria are destructive to papyri, and only to the fact that these had anciently been carried off into the interior as rubbish is their preservation due. Hogarth, Jouquet, Wileken and other Continental scholars have excavated in Egypt for papyri with varying degrees of success. The papyri are found in graves a few feet below the surface, in house muns over which sand has drifted, or occasionally in cartumen pots buried in the ground. Despite government efforts to stop indiscriminate native digging, papyri in considerable quantities have continued to find their way into the hands of native dealers, and thence into English, Continental, and even American collections.

Thus far upward of 650 literary papyri, great and small, of works other than Bib. have been published. The fact that about one-third of these are Homeric attests the great popularity enjoyed by the Homeric poems in Gr-Rom times. These are now so abundant and extensive as to make an important contribution to the Homeric text. Rather less than one-third preserve works of other ancient writers which were already known to us through later copies, mediaeval or modern. Among these are works of Plato, Demosthenes, Isocrates, Thucydides, Euripides, Sophocles, Aeschines, Herodotus and others. Rather more than one-third preserve works or fragments of works, which have been either quite unknown or, oftener, regarded as lost. Such are portions of Alemann and Sappho, fragments of the comedies of Menander and the idamb of Callinachus, Mimes of Herodas, poems of Bacchylides, parts of the lost Antiope and Hypsippyle of Euripides, Aristotle On the Constitution of Athens, the Parva of Timotheus (in a papyrus of the 4th cent. BC, probably the oldest Gr book in the world), and six orations, one of them complete, of Herodides. In 1906 Grenfell and Hunt discovered at Oxyrhynchus the unique papyrus of the lost Paean of Pindar, in 380 fragments, besides the Helene of Theopompus (or Cratippus?), whose works were believed to have perished.

Of the Gr OT (LXX) more than 20 papyri have been discovered. Perhaps the most important of these is the Berlin Genesis (3d or 4th cent.) (1) in a cursive hand, purchased at Akhmim in 1906. Other papyri preserving parts of Gen among the Amherst (2), British Museum (3), and Oxyrhynchus (4), papyri date from the 3d or 4th cent. A Bodleian papyrus leaf (5) (7th or 8th cent.) preserves Cant 1.6-9. An Amherst papyrus (6) (9th cent.) contains Job 1.21f; 2.3. There are several papyri of parts of the Ps. An Amherst papyrus (7) (5th or 6th cent.) has Ps 5.6-12, etc.
These documents give especial interest to their readings.

Twenty-three papyri containing parts of the Gr NT have thus far been published, nearly half of them coming from Oxyrhynchus (O.P. 2, 208, 209, 402, 657, 1058, 1099, 1078, 1195, 1381, 1405, 1510, 1711). The individual pieces range in date from the 3d to the 6th cent.

Their locations, dates, and contents are:

   13-14 20 (O.P. 402).
2. London. 3d or 4th cent. Mt 11 2-15.
   12-19 their (O.P. Kiew. 1 1-5).
   Widely 1-5. Cent. Paris. NT Lk 1 14-20; 2 3-6. 4.
   Accounts, The 3d or 4th cent. Mt 1 23-31.33-41;
   20 11-17.19-25 (O.P. 208).
   St. Petersburg. 3d cent. Mt 11 45.
5. Cambridge, Mass. 4th or 5th cent. 1 Jo 11 12-17 (O.P. 402).
7. St. Petersburg. 5th cent. 1 Cor 1 17-20; 6 13.
8. Alexandria. 3d cent. He 1 1 11-15; 8 5-10.
15. Berlin Pap. 13,269 (7th cent.) is a liturgical paraphrase of the 3d cent.

Further details as to nos. 1-4 may be found in Gregory, P. 1096-92, and for nos. 1-25 in Kenyon, Handbook to Text. Crit., or Milligan, NT Documents, 249-54.

Among other theological papyri, the Oxyrhynchus Sayings of Jesus (O.P. 1,554), dating from the 2d and 3d cents., are probably the most widely known (see Logia). Other tological Oxyrhynchus pieces preserve parts of the Apocrypha of Baruch (chs 12-14; 4th or 5th cent.; O.P. 493); the Gospel according to the Hebrews (3d cent.; it appears in its last form, if at all: 3d cent.: O.P. 655); the Acts of John (4th cent.; O.P. 850, cf 851); the Shepherd of Hermes (3d or 4th cent.; O.P. 494); Irenaeus, Ad. Haer., iii.9 (3d cent.; O.P. 405). Other small fragments of the Shepherd and Irenaeus are among the Amherst and Berlin papyri. Early Christian hymns, prayers and letters of interest have also been found.

We have spoken thus far only of literary papyri, classical and theological. The overwhelming majority of the papyri found have of course been documentary—private letters, accounts, wills, receipts, contracts, leases, deeds, complaints, petitions, notices, invitations, etc. The value of these contemporary and original documents for the illumination of ancient life can hardly be overestimated. The life of Upper Egypt in Ptolemaic and Rom times is now probably better known to us than that of any other period of history down to recent times. Many papyri from these periods have no literary papyri at all, but are rich in documentary. Each year brings more of these to light and new volumes of them into print. All this vast and growing body of material contributes to our knowledge of Ptolemaic and imperial times, often in the most intimate ways. Among the most important of these documentary papyri from Ptolemaic times are the revenue laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus (250 BC) and the decrees of Ptolemy Euergetes II, 47 in number (118 BC, 140-130 BC). Very recently (1910 a Hamburg papyrus has supplied the Constitutio Antoniniana, by which the imperial powers were confered on the peregrini of the empire. The private documents in ways even more important illustrate the life of the common people under Ptolemaic and Rom rule.

It is not necessary to point out the value of all this for Bibl. and esp. NT study. The papyri have already made a valuable contribution to textual materials of both OT and NT. For

11. Contr. tuation to For other early Christian lit. their NT Study testimony has been of surprising interest (the Oxyrhynchus Logia and Gospel fragments). The discovery of a series of uncial MSS running through six centuries back of the Codex Vaticanus breaks the gap between what were our earliest uncial and the hand of the inscriptions, and puts us in a better position than ever before to fix the dates of uncial MSS. Minuencule or cursive hands, too, so common in NT MSS of the 10th and later cents., appear in a new light when it is seen that such writing was not a late invention arising out of the uncials but rather grew side by side with it from at least the 4th cent. BC, as the ordinary, as distinguished from the literary, or book, hand. See Wmmt. The lexical contribution of these documentary papyri, too, is already considerable, and is likely to be very great.

of the NT writings, they reflect the common as distinguished from the literary language of the times, and words which had appeared exceptional or unknown in Gr lit. are now shown to have been in common use. The problems of NT syntax are similarly illuminated. Speculative historical notices sometimes light up dark points in the NT, as in a British Museum decrees of Gaius Vibius Maximus, prefect of Egypt (104 AD), ordering all who are out of their districts to return to their own homes in view of the approaching census (cf Lk 2 1-3).

Most important of all is the contribution of the papyri to a sympathetic knowledge of ancient life. They constitute a veritable gallery of NT characters. The strong light sometimes thrown upon the social evil of the time, of which Philo speaks so sternly. The child, the prodigal, the thief, the host with his invitations, the steward with his accounts, the thrifty householder, the soldier on service receiving his viaticum, or retired as a veteran upon his farm, the Jewish merchantman, the husbandman, and the publican, besides people in every domestic relation, we meet at first hand in the papyri which they themselves in many cases have written. The worth of this for the historical interpretation of the NT is very great.

The principal collections of Gr papyri with their editors are Schor, Hericleanum Papyri; PeYron, Turin Papyri; Leemans, Leyden Papyri; Wessel, Rainer and Paris Papyri; Kenyon and Bell. British Museum Papyri; Mahabby and Smyly. Pietro Papyri; Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus. Amherst and Hilde Papyri (with Hogarth), Papyrus Papyri, and (with Smyly and Conze), Thebes Papyri, Hunt, Rhylanc Papyri; Nicola, Geneve Papyri; Krebs, Wicleen, Vereck, Schubars and others, Berlin Papyri; Meyer, Hamburg and Gissens Papyri, Deissman; Berlin Papyri; Vi-tell and Comparede, Florence Papyri; Mattils, Leipzig Papyri; Prisseau, Strassbourg Papyri; Metz, Nijnam, Papyri; Jouguet and Lesquier, Lille Papyri; Rubensohn, Elephantine Fragments; Masspero, Callo Papyri; Goodspeed, Callo and Chicago Papyri. The papyri have been described by Wicleen. Milligan's Gr Papyri. Ken-yon's Palaeography of Gr Papyri. Papyri from the Ancient East are useful introductions to the general subject. Mayer has prepared a Grammatik der Ptolemäischen Papyri.

Coptic, Arab., Heb and Demotic papyri are numeros; even Lat. papyri are found. The Coptic have already made important contributions to early Christian literature. A considerable 13. Coptic, Coptic fragment of the Acts of Paul, Arabic and a Coptic (Ahkâmî) codex of 1 St. Pappys, Clement, almost complete, have recently been published by Carl Schmidt. Another much mutilated papyrus of 1 Clement, with James, complete, is at Strassburg. A Coptic text of Prov has been brought to light from the same source which supplied the Coptic codex (the White Convent, near Akhmî); indeed, Bib. papyri in Coptic are fairly numerous, and patristic lit. is being rapidly enriched by such discoveries of Coptic papyri, e.g. the Di. Acts papyrus, 1912 (cf. Sahidic NT, Oxford, 1911).

Arab. papyri first began to appear from Egypt in 1825, when three Arab. pieces were brought to Paris and published by Silvestre de Sacy. Two others, from the 7th cent., were published by him in 1827. It was not until the great papyrus finds of 1877-78, however, that any considerable number of Arab. papyri found their way into Europe. The chief collections thus far formed are at Vienna (Rainer Collection), Berlin and Cairo. Becker has published Schott, the Arab. papyri at Heidelberg, and Karabacek has worked upon those at Vienna. They belong of course to the period after the Arab. conquest, 640 AD.

PARABLE, par'-a-b'l: 1. Name 2. Historical Data. 3. Christ's Use of Parables 4. Parables in Using Parables 5. Interpretation of the Parables 6. Doctrinal Value of the Parables ETYMOLOGICALLY THE WORD "PARABLE" (παράβολα, parâbolâ) signifies a placing of two or more objects together, usually for the purpose of a comparison. In this widest sense of the term there is practically no difference between parable and simile (see Thayer, Dict. of NT, Cr., s.v.). This is also what substantiates some of Christ's parables amount to, which consist of only one comparison and in a single verse (cf. Mt 13 33.44-46). In the more usual and technical sense of the word, "parable" ordinarily signifies an imaginary story, a parable, however, at its details may have actually transpired, the purpose of the story being to illustrate and inculcate some higher spiritual truth. These features differentiate it from other and similar figurative narratives as also from actual history. The similarity between the last-mentioned and a parable is sometimes so small that exegetes have differed in the interpretation of certain pericopes. A characteristic example of this uncertainty is the story of Dives and Lazarus in Lk 16 19-31. The problem is that as those who regard the actual history are compelled to interpret each and every statement, including too the close proximity of heaven and hell and the possibility of speaking from one place to the other, while those who regard it as a parable can restrict their interpretation to the features that constitute the substance of the story. It differs again from the fable, in so far as the latter is a story that could not actually have occurred (e.g. Jgs 8 8 ff; 2 K 14 9; Ex 27 21). The parable is often described as a "parable with a moral". The etymological features of the word, as well as the relation of parables to other and kindred devices of style, are discussed more fully by Ed. Koenig, in HDB, III, 660 ff. Although Christ employed the parable as a means of inculcating His message more extensively and more effectively than any other teacher, He did not invent the parable. It was His custom in general to take over from the religious and ethical traditions of His own day the materials that He employed to convey the higher and deeper truths of His gospel, giving them a world of meaning they never had before possessed. Thus e.g. every petition of the Lord's Prayer can be duplicated in the Jewish liturgies of the times, yet on Christ's lips these petitions have a significance they never had or could have for the Jews. The term "parable" for the second person in the Godhead is an adaptation from the Logos-idea in the preexistent religious thought, though not specifically of Philo's. Baptism, regeneration, and kindred expressions of fundamental thoughts in the Christian system, are terms not absolutely new (cf. Deutsch, art. "Talmud," Literature, Remains). The parable was employed both in the OT and in contemporaneous Jewish literature (cf. e.g. 2 S 12 1-4; Isa 5 1-6; 28 24-28, and for details see Koenig's art., i.e.). Jewish and other non-Bib. parables are discussed and illustrated in Lacht's Nude and the Parables of Our Lord, introd. essay, ch iv: "On Other Parables besides Those in the Scriptures." The one and only teacher of parables in the NT is Christ Himself. The Epp., although they often employ rhetorical allegories and similes, are not absolutely new and are, as so common in Christ's pedagogical methods, the distribution of these in the Canonical Gospels is unequal, and they are strictly confined to the three Synoptic Gospels. Mark again has only one peculiar to this book, namely, the Seed Growing in Secret (Mk 4 26), and he gives only three others that are found also in Mt and Lk, namely the Sower, the Mustard Seed, and the Wicked Husbandman, so that the bulk of the parables are found in the First and the Third Gospels. Two are common to Mt and Lk, namely the Leaven (Mt 13 33; Lk 13 21) and the Lost Sheep (Mt 18 12; Lk 15 3 ff). Of the remaining parables, 18 are found only in Lk and 10 only in Mt. Lk's 18 include some of the finest, viz. the Two Debtors, the Good Samaritan, the Friend at Midnight, the Rich Fool, the Watchful Servants, the Barren Fig Tree, the Chief Seats, the Great Supper, the Rash Builder, the Rash King, the Lost Coin, the Lost Sheep, the Unmerciful Servant, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Unprofitable Servants, the Unrighteous Judge, the Pharisee and Publican, and the Pounds. The 10 peculiar to Mt are the Tares, the Hidden Treasure, the Pearl of Great Price, the Draw Net, the Unmerciful Servant, the Laborers in the Vineyard, the Two Sons, the Marriage of the King's Son, the Ten Virgins, and the Talents. There is some uncertainty as to the exact number of parables we have from Christ, as the Marriage of the King's Son is sometimes regarded as a different recension of the Great Supper, and the Talents of the Pounds. Other numberings are suggested by Trench, Jülicher and others.

It is evident from such passages as Mt 13 10 ff (cf. Mk 4 10; Lk 8 9) that Christ did not in the beginning of His career employ the parable as a method of teaching, but introduced it later. This took place evidently during the 2d year of His public ministry, and is closely connected with the changes which about that time He made in His attitude toward the people in general. It evidently was Christ's purpose at the outset to win over, if possible, the nation as a whole to His cause and to the gospel, when it appeared that the leaders and the great bulk of the people would not accept Him for what He wanted to be and clung tenaciously to their carnal Messianic ideas and ideals. Christ, in return, ceased to appeal to the masses, and, by confining His instructions chiefly to His disciples and special friends, saw the necessity of organizing an ecclesia in ecclesia, which was eventually to develop into the world-conquering church. One part of this general withdrawal of Christ from a proclamation of His gospel to the whole nation was this change in His method of teaching and the adoption of the parable. On that subject He leaves no doubt, according to Mt 13 11 Lk 8 10. The purpose of the parable is both to reveal and to conceal the truth. It was to serve the first purpose in the case of the disciples, the second in the case of the underserving Jews. Psychologically this difference, notwithstanding the acknowledged inferiority in the training and education of the disciples, esp. as compared with the scribes and lawyers, is not hard to understand. A simple-minded Christian, who has some understanding of the truth, can readily understand figurative illustrations of this truth, which would be absolute enigmas even to an educated Hindu or Chinaman. The theological problem involved is more difficult. Yet it is evident that we are not dealing with those who have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, that is, who are no longer capable of a return to grace, according to He 6 4–10; 10 26 (cf Mt 12 31.32; Mk 3 28–30), and who accordingly could no longer be influenced by an appeal of the gospel, and we have rather before us that form of the Christian who had been led to wound the offer of redemption—whether temporarily or definitely and finally, remaining an open question—according to His policy of not casting pearls before the swine. The proper sense of these passages is therefore interpreted as we remember that in Mk 4 12 and Lk 8 10, the ἀποκράτιστος, need not express purpose, but that this particle is used here to express mere result only, as is clear too from the passage in Mt 13 18, where the ὅσον, ὅσί τις, is found. The word is to be withheld from these people, so that this preaching would not bring about the ordinary results of conversion and forgiveness of sins. Hence Christ now adopts a method of teaching that will hide the truth from all those who have not yet been imbued by it, and this new method is that of the parable.

5. Interpretation of the Parables, which are all intended primarily and in the first place for the disciples, are furnishing the key to the parable itself and by Christ’s own method of interpreting some of them. The first and foremost thing to be discovered is the scope or the particular spiritual truth which the parable is intended to convey. Just what this scope may be stated in so many words, as is done, e.g., by the introductory words to that of the Pharisees and the Publican. Again the scope may be learned from the conclusion of the parable, as the question of Peter in Mt 18 21 gives the scope of the following parable, and the real purpose of the Prodigal Son parable in Lk 15 11 ff is not the story of this young man himself, but is set over against the murmuring of the Pharisees because Christ received publicans and sinners, in vs 1 and 2, to exemplify the all-forgiving love of the Father. Not the Son but the Father is in the foreground in this parable, which fact is also the connecting link between the two parts. Sometimes the scope can be ascertained only from an examination of the details of the parable itself and then may be all the more uncertain.

A second principle of the interpretation of the parables is that a sharp distinction must be made between what the older interpreters called the body (corpus) and the soul (anima). The parable is to use other things in the universe as the analogy between the shell or bark (cortex) and the marrow (medulla). Whatever serves only the purpose of the story is the “ornamentation” of the parable, and does not belong to the substance. The former does not call for interpretation. One of the spiritual lessons; the latter does. This distinction between those parts of the parable that are intended to convey spiritual meanings and those which are to be ignored in the interpretation is based on Christ’s own interpretation of the so-called ψηφιακά parable—purpose of the parable. In Mt 13 18 ff, interprets the parable of the Sower, yet a number of data, such as the fact that there are four, and not more or fewer kinds of land, and others, are discarded in this explanation as without meaning. Again in His interpretation of the Tares among the Wheat in Mt 13 36 ff, a number of details of the original parable are discarded as meaningless.

Just which details are significant and which are meaningless in a parable is often hard, sometimes impossible to determine, as the history of their exegesis amply shows. In general it can be laid down as a rule, that those features which illustrate the scope of the parable belong to its substance, while those which are not so immediately related to that purpose, but even with this rule there remain many exegetical cruxes or difficulties. Certain, too, it is that not all of the details are capable of interpretation. Some are added of a nature that indeed illustrate the story as a story, but, from the standpoint of Christian morals, are more than objectionable. The Unjust Steward in using his authority to make the bills of the debtors of his master smaller may be a model, in the shrewd use of this world’s goods for his purposes, of the Christian who make use of his goods for his purposes, but the action of the steward itself is incapable of defence. Again, the man who finds in somebody else’s property a pearl of great price but conceals this fact from the owner of the land and quietly buys this ground may serve as an example to show how much the kingdom of God is worth, but from an ethical standpoint his action cannot be sanctioned. In general, the parable, like all other forms of figurative expression, has a meaning beyond tertium comparationis goes, that is, the third thing which is common to the two things compared. But all this still leaves a large debatable ground in many parables. In the Laborers in the Vineyard does the “loon” belong to the parable? The parable of the Good Samaritan is the same. The history of the debate on this subject is long. In the Prodigal Son do all the details of his sufferings, such as eating the husks intended for swine, have a spiritual meaning?

The interpretations of former generations laid down the rule, theologica parabolae non est argumentation, i.e., the parables, very rich in mission 6. Doctrinal thought, do not furnish a basis for the Value of the doctrinal argument. Like all figurative expressions and forms of thought, the parables too contain elements of doubt as far as their interpretation is concerned. They illustrate truth but they do not prove or demonstrate truth. Omnibus similibus claudscunt, “all comparisons limp,” is applicable here also. No point of doctrine can be established on figurative passages of Scripture, as then all elements of doubt would not be eliminated, this doubt being based on the nature of language itself. The argumentative and doctrinal value of parables is found in this, that they may, in accordance with the meaning of Scripture, illustrate truth already clearly expressed elsewhere. Cf esp. Trench, introd. essay, in Notes on the Parables of Our Lord, ch iii, 30–43; and Terry,
The word "Paraclete" occurs 5 times in the NT, all in the writings of John. Four instances are in the Gospel and one in the First Ep. of John. The Gospel passages are Jn 14:16; 16:26; 16:7; in the Ep., 2:1. "Paraclete" is simply the Gr word transferred into Eng. The tr of the word in EV is "Comforter" in the Gospel, and "Advocate" in the Ep. The Gr word is ἄναγκαιον, paraklidōs, the root applied to Christ in EV in the tr of the Gr word paraklētōs, in Jn 2:1. There is some question whether the tr "Comforter" in the passages of John's Gospel in AV and RV is warranted by the meaning of the word, determined then that the meaning "comforter" is not the primary significance, as we have seen. It is very probably, however, a secondary meaning of the word, and some of its cognates clearly convey the idea of comfort in certain connections, both in LXX and in the NT (Gen 37:35; Zec 1:13; Mt 5:4; 2 Cor 1:3-4). In the passage in 2 Cor the word in one form or another is used 5 times and in each means "comfort." In none of these instances, however, do we find the noun "Paraclete," which we are now considering.

Among Jewish writers the word "Paraclete" came to have a number of meanings. A good deed was called a paraclete or advocate, and a transgression was an accuser. Reconciliation and good works were called paraklētēs, the favors of benevolence and mercy done by the people of Israel in this world become agents of peace and intercessors [paracletes] between them and their Father in heaven. The sin offering is paraclete; the paraclete created by each good deed is called an angel (Jew Enc, IX, 514-15, art. "Paraclete").

Philo employs the word in several instances. Usually he does not use it in the legal, technical sense. Joseph is represented as bestowing forgiveness on his brethren who had wronged him and saying to them: "No one else is as paraclete," or intercessor (De Joseph c. 46). In his Life of Moses, III 14, is a remarkable passage which indicates Philo's spiritualizing methods of interpreting Scripture as well as reflects his philosophic tendency. At the close of a somewhat elaborate account of the emblematic significance of the vestments of the high priest and their jeweled decorations, his words are: "The twelve stones arranged on the breast in four rows of three stones each, namely, the loincloth, being also an emblem of that reason which holds together and constitutes the universe. For it was indispensable [ἀναγκαιόν, ἀναγκή] that the man who was consecrated to high office should, in his capacity as a paraclete, his son, the being most perfect in all virtue, to procure the forgiveness of sins, and a supply of all good things."

This is rather a patching together of a word or formal parallel to the statement in 1 Jn 2:1 where Christ says "Every one that has been born of God keeps his spirit, although once Philo's conception of the Divine "reason" and "son" are by no means the Christian conceptions.

If now we raise the question what is the best tr of the term "Paraclete" in the NT, we have a choice of several words. Let us glance at 5. The Best them in order. The tr "Comforter" Translation will convey an element of the sense of the word as employed in the Gospels, and harmonizes with the usage in connection with its cognates, but it is too narrow in meaning to be an adequate tr. Dr. J. Hastings in an otherwise excellent article on the Paraclete in HDB says that the Paraclete was not sent to comfort the disciples, since prior to His actual coming and after Christ's promise the disciples' sorrow was turned into joy. Dr. Hastings thinks the Paraclete was sent to cure the unbelief or half-belief of the disciples. This conceives the idea of comfort in too limited a way. No doubt in the mind of Jesus the comforting aspect of the Spirit's work applied to all their future sorrows and trials, and not merely to comfort for their personal loss in the going of Christ to the Father. Nevertheless there was more in the work of the Paraclete than comfort in sorrow. "Intercessor" comes nearer the root idea of the term and contains an essential part of the meaning. "Advocate" is a closely related word, and is also suggested by the work of the Paraclete. Perhaps the Eng. word broad enough to cover all the significance of the word "Paraclete" except the word "Helper." The Spirit helps the disciples in all the above-indicated ways. Of course the objection to this tr is that it is too indefinite. The specific Christian spirit and its work is lost in the comprehensiveness of the term. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the term "Paraclete" itself would perhaps be the best designation of the Spirit in the passage in John's Gospel. It would thus become a proper name for the Spirit and the various elements of meaning would come to be associated with the words which are found in the context of the Gospel.

Christianity introduced many new ideas into the world for which current terms were inadequate media of expression. In some cases it is best to adopt the Christian term itself, in our translations, and let the word slowly acquire its own proper significance in our thought and life. If, however, instead of translating we simply transfer the word "Paraclete" as a designation of the Holy Spirit in the Gospel passages, we would need then to translate it in the passage in the Ep. where it refers to Christ. But this would offer no serious difficulty. For fortunately in John 16:7 the word may very clearly be trd "Advocate" or "Intercessor." We look next at the contents of the words as employed by Jesus in reference to the Holy Spirit. In Jn 14:16 the Paraclete is promised as one who is to take the place of Jesus. It is declared elsewhere by Jesus that it is expedient that He go away, for unless He go away the Paraclete will not come (Jn 16:7). Is the Paraclete, then, the successor or the substitute for Christ as He is sometimes called? The answer is to be both and neither. He is the successor of Christ historically, but not in the sense that Christ ceases to act in the church. He is the substitute for Christ's physical presence, but only in order that He may make vital and actual Christ's spiritual presence. As we have seen, the Paraclete moves only in the range of truths conveyed in and through Christ as the historical manifestation of God. A "Kingdom of the Spirit," therefore, is impossible in the Christian sense, save as the historical Christ should Himself be the Spirit's action in history. The promise of Jesus in 14:18, "I come unto you," is parallel and equivalent in meaning with the preceding promise of the Paraclete. The following are given as the specific forms of activity of the Holy Spirit: (1) to show them the things of Christ, (2) to teach them things to come, (3) to teach them all things, (4) to quicken their memories for past teaching, (5) to bear witness to Christ, (6) to dwell in believers, (7) other things shown in the context such as "greater works" than those of Christ (see Jn 14 16, 17), (8) to convict of sin, of righteousness and judgment. It is possible to range the shades of meaning outlined above under these various forms of the Spirit's activity. As Comforter His work would come under (1), (2), (3) and (6); as Advocate and Intercessor under (6), (7), (8); as Helper and Teacher under (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), (6), (7), (8).

The manner of the sending of the Paraclete is of interest. In Jn 14 16 the Paraclete comes in answer to Christ's prayer. The Father will give the Spirit whom the world cannot receive. In 14 26 the Father will send the Spirit in Christ's name. Yet in 15 26 Christ says, "I will send [him] unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth," and in 16 7, "If I go, I will send him unto you." See Holy Spirit.

It remained to notice the passage in 1 Jn 2 1 where the term "Paraclete" is applied to Christ: "If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous"; ver 2 reads: "and he is Christ the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world." Here the meaning is quite clear and specific. Jesus Christ the righteous is represented as our Advocate or Intercessor with the Father. His righteousness is set over against our sin. Here, as well as in the basis of His propitiatory offering for the sins of men, intercedes for them with God and thus averts from them the penal consequences of their transgressions. The sense in which Paraclete is here applied to Christ is found nowhere in the passages we have cited from the Gospel. The Holy Spirit as Paraclete is Intercessor or Advocate, but not in the sense here indicated. The Spirit as Paraclete convicts the world of sin, of righteousness and judgment. Jesus Christ as Paraclete vindicates believers before God.

PARADISE, par-a'-deis (ὢθήν, παράδεισος, parádeisos): A word probably of Pers origin meaning a royal park. See Garden. The word occurs in the Heb Scriptures but 3 t: Cant 4 13, where it is tr"an orchard"; Neh 2 8, where it is tr"a forest" (RVm "park"); Ecc 2 5, where it is in the pl. number (AV 'orchards, RV "parks"). But it was early introduced into the Gr language, being made specially familiar by Xenophon upon his return from the expedition of Cyrus the Younger to Babylonia (see Arab. i.2, § 7; 4, § 9; Cyrop. 1.3, §14). In LXX the word is of frequent use for translating other terms of kindred significance. The Garden of Eden became "the paradise of pleasure or luxury" (Gen 2 15; 3 23; Joel 2 3). The valley of the Jordan became 'the paradise of God' (Gen 15 19). In Ezek 31 8,9, according to LXX, there is no tree in the 'paradise of Eden' but the prophet's vineyard symbolizes the glory of Assyria. The figures in the first 9 verses of this chapter may well have been suggested by what the prophet had himself seen of parks in the Pers empire.

In the apocryphal and pseudographical lit. the word is extensively used in a spiritual and symbolic sense, signifying the place of happiness to be inherited by the righteous in contrast to Gehenna, the place of punishment to which the wicked are assigned. The later Jewish lit. "Sheol" is represented as a place where preliminary rewards and punishments are bestowed previous to the final judgment (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT; and of 2 Esd 2 19; 13; De Anim. c. 55; Tertullian's treatise De Paradiso is lost). Clement of Alexandria (frag. 51), and John of Damascus (De Orthodox. Fid., ii, 11). In modern lit. the conception of Paradise is... effectually sublimated and spiritualized in Faber's familiar hymn:

"O Paradise, O Paradise,
I greatly long to see
The special place my dearest Lord
Is destined for me;
Where loyal hearts and true
Stand ever in the light,
All capture thro' and thro',
In God's most holy sight."

PARAH, pārā, pārā (παρα, ha-pardh; B, Φαρά, Phard, A, Α'Αφρ, Aphd): A city named as in the territory of Benjamin between Avim and Ophrah (Josh 15 23). It may with some confidence be identified with _Pārah_ on Wady Pārah, which runs into Wady Suweinīt, about 3 miles N.E. of _Anātā_.

PARALYSIS, pαραλίας, PARALYTIC, parali'ik. See _Falyt_.

PARAMOUR, para'mōr (πάρμος, pilleghesh, "a concubine," masc. or fem.): A term applied in Ezek 23 20 to the male lover, but elsewhere tr "concubine."

PARAN, pārān, EL-PARAN (παράν, pārān, παρ'αν, 'el-pardh; B, Φαραν, Pharins, Phrad):

(1) _El-paran_ (Gen 14 6) was the point farthest S. reached by the kings. LXX renders it by τερεβήνιος, τερεβίνθιος, and reads, "unto the terebinth of Paran." The evidence is slender, but it is not unreasonable to suppose that this is the place elsewhere (Dt 2 8; 1 K 9 26, etc) called Elath or Eloth (παρ'αν with fem. termination), a seaport town which gave its name to the Atlantic Gulf (modern Gulf of _Aqaba_), not far from the wilderness of Paran (2).

(2) Many places named in the narrative of the wanderings lay within the Wilderness of Paran (33 10; 13 21; 27 14; cf 13 3 26, etc). It is identified with the high limestone plateau of _El-Thā_, stretching from the S.W. of the Dead Sea to Sinai along the west side of the Arabah. This wilderness offered hospitality to Ishmael when driven from his father's tent (Gen 21 21). Hitherto also came David when bereaved of Samuel's protection (1 S 25 1).

(3) Mount Paran (Dt 33 2; Hab 3 3) may be either Jebel Mokar, 29 miles S. of _'Ain Kādis_ (Kadesh-baanea), and 130 miles N. of _Sinai_ (Palmer, _Desert of the Exodus_, 510); or the higher and more imposing range of mountains W. of the Gulf of _Aqaba_. This is the more probably if El paran is rightly identified with Elath.

(4) Some place named _Paran_ would seem to be referred to in Dt 1 1; but no trace of such a city has yet been found. Paran in 1 K 11 18 doubltless refers to the district W. of the Arabah.

PARBAR, pārbar (παρβάρ, parbar [1 Ch 26 18], and παρβαρ, παρβάραν, tr4 "precincts" [AV "suburbs" in 2 K 23 11]; LXX φαρούσα, _pharoureim_): In 1 Ch 26 18 reference is made to the position of the gatekeepers, "for Parbar westward, four at the causeway, and two at Parbar." The word is supposed to be of _Pers_ origin, connected with _Parvār_, meaning "possessing light," and hence the meaning has been suggested of "colonomade" or "portico;" some place open to the light. In the pl. form (2 K 23 11) the situation of the house of _"Nathan-meelah"_ is described, and the tr. in "the colonnades," should, if the above origin is accepted, be more than simply _EY_. It is difficult to understand the occurrence of a _Pers_ word at this time, and it has been suggested (EB, col 3585) that the word is a description of the office of _Nathan-meelah_, _ba-parvārān_ being a misreading for _ba-parvadhim_, meaning "who was over the walls.

PARCEL, pār'kal: Properly "a little part," in Elizabethan Eng. being used in almost any sense. In AV of Gen 33 19; Josh 24 32; Ruth 4 3; 1 Ch 11 13 14 it is the tr. of הַדָּבָּר, ḥalkāh; Ju 4 5 of _xoplar, chā'lon_—both the Gr and Heb words meaning a "piece of land.") RV writes "plot" in 1 Ch 11 13 14, but if the change was needed at all, it should have been made throughout.

הָרָך, ḥērāk, "roasted." This word is applied to corn or pulse. It is a common practice in Pal and Syria to roast the nearly ripe wheat for eating as a delicacy. A handful of heads of fully developed grain, with the stalks still attached, are gathered and bound together and then, holding the bunch by the lower ends of the stalks, the heads are toasted over a fire of brushwood or a burnt-out fire. Most of the sheaths are blackened the grain is toasted, and, after rubbing off the husks between the hands, is ready to eat (Lev 2 14). A form of pulse is toasted in the same way and is more sought after than the grain. In the larger towns and cities, vendors go about the streets selling bunches of toasted chick-peas. The Bible references, however, are probably to another form of roasted grain. The threshed wheat or pulse is roasted over a fire on an iron plate or on a flat stone, being kept in constant motion with a stirrer until the operation is finished. The grain thus prepared is a marketable article. Parched grain is not now so commonly met with as the pulse, which either rooted or un-rooted is called _ḥomos_ (from Arab, "to roast" or "parched"). Parched pulse is eaten not only plain, but is often made into confection by coating the seeds with sugar. In Bible times parched wheat or pulse was a common food, even taking the place of bread (Lev 23 14; Josh 9 14; Ruth 2 14). It was a useful food supply for armies, as it required no further cooking (1 S 17 17). It was frequently included in _γίτα_ or _hostages_ (1 S 26 18; 2 S 17 28).

(2) הָרָך, ḥārēk, "burned" or "parched" (of Arab. _ḥark, "burnt"_), is used in the sense of dried up or arid in Jer 17 6.

(3) הָרָך, ḥērēk, is used in Isa 5 13, AV "dried up," RV "parched"; סֵבִּיתָה, _seḇīthā_, in Ps 68 6, AV "dry," RV "parched."

(4) שָׁרָב, _shārab_, rendered "parched" in AV, is "glowing" in RV. The word implies the peculiar wavy effect of the air above parched ground, usually accompanied by mirages (cf Arab, _ṣarbāh, "mirage_") (Isa 35 7; 49 10). In predicting a happy future for Zion the prophet could have chosen no greater contrast than that the hot glowing sands which produce illusive water effects should be changed into real pools. See _Mirage_. James A. Patch

PARCHED, pār'kkht, CORN. See Food.

PARCHMENT, pār'kment (μπαρμαν, membrāna [2 Tim 4 13]): The word "parchment," which occurs only once (2 Tim 4 18), is the common form by that time _pergama_ (Gr _περγαμός_, Pergamos), i.e. pertaining to Pergamus, the name of an ancient city in Asia Minor where, it is believed, parchment was first used. Parchment is made from the skins of sheep, goats, or young calves. The hair and fleshy portions of the skin are removed as in tanning by first soaking in lime and then rubbing the skin repeatedly with water and washing. The skin is then stretched on a frame and treated with powdered chalk, or other absorptive agent, to remove the fatty substances, and is then dried. It is finally given a smooth surface by rubbing with powdered pumice. Parchment was extensively used at the time of the early Christians for scrolls, legal documents, etc., having replaced papyrus for that purpose. It was no doubt used at even a much earlier time. The roll mentioned in Jer 36 may have been of parchment. Scrolls were later replaced by codices of the same material. After the Arabs introduced paper, parchment was still used for centuries for the book bindings. Diplomas printed on "sheepskins," still issued by many universities, represent the survival of an ancient use of parchment. See following article.

JAMES A. PATCH

PARCHMENTS, parchments (μεμβράναι, membrānai, "membranes," "parchments," "vellum"): The skins, chiefly of sheep, lambs, goats and calves, prepared so as to be used for writing on (2 Tim 4 13).

In Gr and Rom times parchment was much employed as a writing material. "At Rome, in the 1st cent. BC, and the 1st and 2nd cents. AD, there is evidence of the use of vellum, but only for notebooks and rough drafts or inferior copies of literary works, . . . A fragment of a vellum MS, which may belong to this period, is preserved in Brit. Mus. Add. MS 34,473, consisting of two leaves of Demosthenes, De Pales. Leg., in a small hand, which appears to be of the 3d cent." (F. G. Kenyon in HDB, IV, 947).

Paul directs Timothy that, when he comes from Ephesus to Rome, he is to bring "the books, esp. the parchments." These, as well as the "clout," which is also mentioned, had evidently been "left at Troas with Carpus." What were these parchments? They are distinguished from "the books," which were probably a few choice volumes or rolls, some portions of the Scriptures of the OT, some volumes of the Law of Moses or of the Prophets or of the Ps. Among "the books" there might also be Jewish exegetical works, or heathen writings, with which, as is made evident by references in his Ep., Paul was well acquainted.

The parchments were different from these, and were perhaps notebooks, in which the apostle had, from time to time, written what he had observed and wished to preserve as specially worthy of remembrance, facts which he had gathered in his study of the OT or of other books. These notes may have been the result of many years reading and study, and he wished Timothy to bring them to him.

Various conjectures have been made in regard to the contents of the parchments. It has been suggested by Kenyon (HDB, III, 673) that they contained the OT in Gr; by Farrar, that the parchments were a diploma of Paul's Rom citizenship; by Bull, that they were his commonplace books; by Latham, that the parchments were a copy of the Grundherrn of the Gospels, a volume containing the all-important narrative of the Saviour's life and cross and resurrection. Workman (Persecution in the Early Church, 39) writes: "By tot membrawus I understand the proofs of his citizenship."

Whatever their contents may have been, they were of such nature as to make it unsafe to have them with him in his prison at Rome, so that, if life were spared for even a few weeks, he wished and parchments might be a hinge for reference. Perhaps in the fact that the books and the parchments and the cloak had been left at Troas with Carpus, there may be a hint that his final arrest by the Rom authorities took place at that city, and that it was the suddenness of his arrest that caused him to be unable to part with books and parchments and the cloak with him. "The police had not even allowed him time to find his overcoat or necessary documents" (Workman, op. cit., 39; see p. 1586, 14).

To this it may be, desired to have them now. His well-disciplined mind, even in the near prospect of death by public execution, could find the most joyous labor in the work of the gospel, wherever he is influence reached, and could also find relaxation among "the books, esp. the parchments."

PARDON, pār'dn, pār'dun. See FORGIVENESS.

PARE, pār (THE NAILS) (πάρ, "da'dh, "to fix," "manipulatio"): The word, which in Heb has a very wide range of application, and which is of very frequent occurrence in the Heb Bible, is found in the above meaning in but one passage of EV (Dt 21 12; see NnI). In a similar sense it is found in 2 S 19 24, where it is used to express the dressing of the foot and the trimming of the beard.

PARENT, pār'ent. See CHILDREN; CRIMES; EDUCATION; FAMILY; PUNISHMENTS.

PARK, pārk (יו, "parlē; LXX παράδεισος, paradeisos; cf. Arab. پاریش, farea): "I made me gardens and parks," AV "orchards" (Ecel 2 5); "Asaph the keeper of the king's forest," RVm "park" (Neh 2 8). The same word occurs in Cant 4 13, "Thy shoots are an orchard [RVm "paradise"] of pomegranates." According to Liddell and Scott, paradeisos occurs first in Xenophon, who always uses it of the parks of Pers kings and noblemen. Like many other quadriliterals the word is undoubtedly of eastern origin. It seems to connote an inclosure. It is used in LXX of the Garden of Eden. Cf Lk 23 43; 2 Cor 12 4; Rev 2 7. See PARADISE. ALFRED ELY DAY

PARLOR, pāl'lor: This word in AV, occurring in Jgs 3 20-25; 1 S 9 22; 1 Ch 28 11, is in every instance changed in RV: in Jgs into "uppper room," in 1 S into "guest-chamber," in 1 Ch into "chambers," representing as many Heb words. See HOUSE.

PARMASHA, pār-mash'ā (נַחרָשָׁה, par- māshāh; LXX Μαρμασία, Marmasimā, or Μαρμασίαδ, Marmasimād): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 9).

PARMENAS, pār'm-e-nas (Παρμενᾶς, Parmenās): A Gr name, an abbreviated form of Parmenedes. Parmenas was one of the "seven" chosen by the people and appointed by the apostles to superintend the daily distribution to the Christian poor of Jerus (Acts 6 5). Tradition states that he was martyred at Philippi, in the reign of Trajan, but his name does not appear again in Scripture.

PARNACH, pārn'āk (παρναχ, parnakh, "gifted"): Father of Elizaphan, the prince of Zebulun (Nu 34 25).

PAROSH, pār'osh (παροσ, parōsh, "flee" [leap]); A family that in part returned under Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 3; Neh 7 8); and in part under Ezra (Ezr 8 3); there spelt "Parosh, AV." Some of the families had foreign wives (Ezr 10 26). One descendant, Pedaiah (see PEDAIAH, [3]), helped to rebuild the city walls (Neh 3 25), and others were among those who "sealed" the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh 10 14). In 1 Esd 5 9; 8 30; 9 26, "Pharaoh."

1. The Apostolic Doctrines: —The Second Coming of Christ (a phrase not found in the Bible) is explained by the following terms:

1. Terms special terms: (1) "Parousia" (πα-ρωσία, parousia), a word fairly common in Gr, with the meaning "presence" (2 Cor 10 12; Phil 2 12). More esp. it may mean "presence after absence," "arrival" (but not "return," unless this is given by the context), as in 1 Cor 16 17; 2 Cor 7 6; Phil 1 26. And still more particularly it is applied to the Coming of Christ in 1 Cor 16 23; 1 Thess 2 13; 1 Thess 3 13; 1 Thess 4 13, 18; 2 Thess 2 3. "Here the word denotes the coming of Antichrist. This word for Christ's Second Coming passed into the early Patristic lit. (Diognetus, vii. 6, e.g.)" This sense is not invariable. For instance the word in Ignatius, Philadelphians, ix. 2, means the Incarnation. Or the Incarnation is called the first Parousia, as in Justin, Trypho, xiv. But in modern theology it means invariably the Second Coming. Recent archaeological discoveries have explained why the word received such general Christian use in the special sense. In Hellenistic Gr it was used for the arrival of a ruler at a place, as is evidenced by inscriptions in Egypt, Asia Minor, etc. Indeed, in an epidaurus inscription of the 3d cent. BC (Dittenberger, Sylloge, No. 803, 34), "Parousia" is applied to a manifestation of Asclepius. Consequently, the adoption by the Gr-speaking Christians of a word that already contained full regal and even Divine concepts was perfectly natural. (The evidence is well surveyed in Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 372-78, Ger. ed., 251-87.) (2) "Epiphany" (ἐπιφάνεια, epiphaneia), "manifestation," used of the Incarnation in 1 Cor 1 10, but of the Second Coming in 2 Thess 2 8; 1 Tim 3 16; 2 Tim 4 1 5; Tit 2 13. The word was used like Parousia in Hellenistic Gr to denote the ceremonial arrival of rulers; cf Deissmann, as above. (3) "Apolcalypse" (ἀποκάλυψις, apokalupsis), "revelation," denotes the Second Coming in 1 Cor 1 7; 2 Thess 1 7; 1 Pet 1 7, 13; 4 13. (4) "Day of the Lord," more or less modified, but referring to Christ in 1 Cor 1 5; 6 15; 2 Cor 1 14; Phil 1 6 10; 2 10; 1 Thess 5 2; 2 Thess 2 2. The phrase is used of the Father in the strict OT sense in Acts 2 20; 2 Pet 3 12; Rev 16 14, and probably in 2 Pet 3 10. Besides, as in the OT and the intermediate lit., "day of wrath," "last day," or simply "day" are used very frequently. See Day of the Lord.

Of the first three of the above terms, only Parousia is found in the eschatology (Matt 24, Acts 20 30; 2 Pet 3 12; Rev 16 14, and probably in 2 Pet 3 10). Besides, as in the OT and the intermediate lit., "day of wrath," "last day," or simply "day" are used very frequently. See Day of the Lord.

The last of the 4 terms above brings the apostolic doctrine of the Parousia into connection with the eschatology (Messianic or otherwise)

2. Data and of the OT and of the intermediate Sources writes. But the connection is far closer than that supplied by this single term only, for nearly every feature in the apostolic doctrine can be paralleled directly from the Jewish sources. The following summary does not begin to give complete references to even such Jewish material as is extant, but enough is presented to show how closely allied are the eschatologies of Judaism and of early Christianity.

The end is not to be expected instantly. There are still signs to come to pass (2 Thess 2 3), and it is special to a determined number of martyrs must be filled up (Rev 6 11; cf. 2 Esd 4 35.36). There is need of patience (Jer 5 7, etc.; cf. 2 Esd 4 34; Bar 83 4). But it is at hand (1 Pet 4 7; Rev 1 20; 2 10; cf. 2 Esd 14 17). "Yet a little while" (He 10 37,25), "The night is far spent" (Rom 13 12), "The Lord is at hand" is the beginning of "We that are alive" expect to see it (1 Thess 4 15; 1 Cor 15 51; cf. Bar 76 5); the time is shortened henceforth (1 Cor 7 29; cf. Bar 20 1; 2 Esd 4 26, and the comms. on 1 Cor). Indeed, there is hardly time for repentance even (Rev 22 11, ironical), certainly there is no time left for self-indulgence (1 Thess 5 3; 1 Pet 4 7; 2 Pet 3 11; Rev 3 5;cf. Bar 83 5), and watchfulness is urgently demanded (1 Thess 5 6; Rev 3 3).

An outpost of the apocalyptic of the end (Acts 2 17,18; cf. XII P, Test. Levi 18 11; Sib Or 4 46, always after the consummation in the Jewish sources). But the world is growing steadily worse, for the godly and intense trials are coming (passim), although the precise is spared suffering (Rev 3 10; cf. Bar 29 2). This is the beginning of Judgment (1 Pet 4 17; cf. En 99 10). Iniquity increases and false teachers are multiplied (Jude 18; 2 Pet 3 3; 2 Tim 3 5; esp. 19; cf. 2 Esd 30 7; Bar 70 5; 2 Esd 10 9). Above all there is to be an appearance of the Antichrist (1 Thess 2 8; 1 Tim 4 1; cf. 2 Thess 2 7). But the Antichrist in the Book of Revelation (1 Thess 2 8, Rev 19 19; cf. Bar 36 8-10, Sib Or 36-70, and see Antichrist), who will gather all nations to his ensign (Rev 19 19; 2 Thess 2 10 of 2 Esd 13 5; En 96). Plagues will fall upon men (Rev, passim; cf. esp. Philo, Eater), and natural portents occur (Acts 2 19,20; Rev; passim; cf. 2 Esd 5 4 3; En 80 5-8). But the conversion of the Jew (Rom 11 29) is brought about by these plagues (Rev 11 13; cf. the Jewish conversion of Gentiles, as in Sib Or 3 616-623; En 10 21). Then Christ is manifested and Antichrist is slain or captured (2 Thess 2 8; Rev 19 20; 2 Esd 13 10.11). In Rev 19 3 the Millennial follows (of 2 Esd 17 12; 34.56; cf. 2 Esd 17 12; and often in rabbinic lit.; the "millennium" in Slavonic, ch. 33, is of very dubious existence), but other traces of millennial doctrine in the NT are of the vaguest (cf. the comm. to 1 Cor 16 14, for instance, esp. Schmiedel, J. Weiss, and Lietzmann, and see Millennium). The general resurrection follows (see Resurrection for details).

The Father holds the Judgment in He 10 30; 12 23; 13 4; Jas 4 11.12; 1 Pet 1 17; Rev 14 7, 20 11, and probably in Jude vs 14-15. Christ is Judge in He 10 30; 12 23; 13 4; Heb 9 28; 20 11; and probably in Rom 2 6-8. The two concepts are interwoven in Rom 14 9.10. God mediates judgment through Christ in Acts 17 31; Rom 2 16, and probably in Rom 2 2-6; 3 6. In 2 Thess Christ appears as the executor of punishment. But familiar uncertainty is manifest in the Jewish schemes, cf, for instance, 2 Esd 7 33 and En 45 3. For the fate of the wicked see Eschatology; HELL; St. Paul, rather curiously, has very little to say about this (Rom 2 5; 1 Cor 3 17; 2 Thess 1 7,8). The NATURE is of God in En 45 4.5 or completely destroyed (1 Cor 7 31; Heb 12 27; Rev 21 1; cf. En 1 6; 2 Esd 7 30); by fire in 2 Pet 3 10 (cf. Sib Or 4 172-77), so as to leave only the eternal torments (He 12 27; cf. 2 Esd 7 30(?) or to be replaced with a new heaven and... a new earth (Rev 21 1; cf Slavie En 33 1-2). And the righteous receive the New Jerus (Gal 4 26; He 12 22; Rev 3 12; 21 2.10; cf Bar 4 2-6; 2 Esd 7 26).

It is of course possible, as in the older works on dogmatics, to reconcile the slight divergences of the above details and to fit them all into a single scheme. But the proximity of such an undertaking is more than dubious, for the traditional nature of these details is abundantly clear—a tradition that is not due solely to the fact that the Christian and the Jewish schemes have a common OT basis. That the Jewish writers realized that the eschatological details they used, already symbolized, is made obvious by the contradictions that every apocalypse contains—the contradictions that are the despair of the beginner in apocalyptic. No writer seems to have thought it worth while to reconcile his details, for they were merely figures of dimly comprehended forces. And the Christian symbolism must be interpreted on the same principle. No greater injustice, for instance, could be done St. Paul’s thought than to suppose he would have been little disturbed by St. John’s interpretation of the last supper. The writer of the Apocalypse was perfectly aware of the various ordinary human beings (1 Jn 2 18.19).

The symbolism, then, in which the Parousia is described was simply that held by the apostles in their pre-Christian days. This symbolism, to be sure, has been thoroughly purified from such puerilities as the feast of Leviathan and Behemoth of Bar 29, or the “thousand children” of En 10 17, and, all the more remarkable as 20th. Christianity has enough of this and to spare (e.g. Irenaeus, v.33). What is more important is that the symbolism of the Parousia is simply in the Jewish sources the symbolism of the coming of the Messiah (or of God in such schemes as we have none). Now it is to be observed that among the apostles the Kingdom of God is almost uniformly regarded as a future quantity (1 Cor 6 9.10; 15 50; Gal 5 21; Eph 5 5; 2 Tim 4 1.18; 2 Pet 1 11; Rev 11 15; 12 10), with a definitely present idea only in Col 1 13. Remembering that when the term “Messiah” means simply “the Bringer of the Kingdom,” the case becomes entirely clear.

No apostle, of course, ever thought of Christ as anything but the Messiah. But not one of the NT writers think of Christ’s messianic work as completed, or, if the problem of exact terminology be pressed, of the strict Messianic work as done at all. Even the Atonement belonged to the preliminary acts, viewed perhaps somewhat as En 33 6 views the preexistent Messiah’s residence among the “church expectant.” This could come to pass more readily as the traditions generally were silent as to what the Messiah was to do before He brought the Kingdom, while they all agreed that He was not to be created only at that moment. In the blank, esp. with the aid of Isa 63 et, Our Lord’s earthly life and Passion fitted naturally, leaving the fact of His Second Coming to be identified with the coming of the Messiah as originally conceived.

II. The Teaching of Jesus.—It will be found helpful, in studying the bitter controversies that have raged around Christ’s teaching about the future, to remember that the apologetic idea of the word “Messiah” is the opposite of that which it had, that, for instance, “Messiah” and “Saviour of the world” are not quite convertible terms, or that a redefinition of the Messiah as a moral teacher or an exponent of the will of God does not rest on a “spiritualizing” of the term, but on a destruction of it in favor of “prophet.” Now the three expressions, “Messianic work,” “coming of the Kingdom,” and “Parousia” are only three titles for one and the same thing, while the addition of “Son of Man” to them merely involves their having 7.39.21 as the most transparent form possible. In fact, this is the state of affairs found in the Synoptists. Christ predicts the coming of the Kingdom. He claims the title of its king (or Regent under the Father). The realization of this expectation He placed on the other side of the grave, i.e. in a glorified state. And in connection with this evidence we find His use of the title Son of Man. From all this the doctrine of the Parousia follows immediately, even apart from the passages in which the regular apocalyptic symbolism is used. The contention may be made that this symbolism in the Gospels has been drawn out of other sources by the evangelists (the so-called “Little Apocalypse” of Mk 13 2-9.11-20.24-27.30-31 is the usual point of attack), but even if the contention could be made out (and agreement in this regard is anything but attained), no really vital part of the case would be touched. Of course, it is possible to begin with the a priori assumption that “no sane man could conceive of himself as an apocalyptic king walking on earth in glory to later realization:” everything in the Gospels that contradicts this assumption. But then there are difficulties. The various concepts involved are mentioned directly or indirectly so often that the number of passages be multiplied the more so that the concepts interlock in such a way as to present a remarkably firm resistance to the critical knife; the picture is much too consistent for an artificial product. Thus there are a number of indirect references (the title of the Cross, the “Parousia” of the “Messianic Kingdom,” the fact of resurrection, etc.) that conflict a priori with the whole of Christ’s teaching. And, finally, the most unoffended critic finds himself confronted with a last stubborn difficulty, the unanswerable conviction of the earliest church that Christ made the eschatological claims. It is conceivable that the apostles may have misunderstood Christ in other matters, but an error in this central point of all (as the apostles appraised things) is hardly in the realms of critical possibility.

On the other hand, such an attempt to force the evidence of the documents would seem something surprisingly like the violence done to history by the most perverse of the older dogmatists.

The number of relevant passages involved is so large and their problems so complex that any detailed discussion is prohibited here.

2. Summary Moreover, the symbolism presents nothing novel to the student familiar with the usual schemes. Forces of evil increase in the world, the state of the righteous grows harder, distress and natural portents follow, at the climax Christ appears suddenly with His angels, bringing the Kingdom of God, gathering the elect into the Kingdom, and dismissing the wicked into outer darkness (or fire). The Father is the Judge in Mt 10 32.33, but the Son in the in Lk 12 8.9, and in Mt 13 41; 16 27; 25 32; probably in Mt 24 50 Lk 12 46; Mk 8 38 and its Lk 9 26 are uncertain. At all events, the eternal destiny of each man depends on Christ’s attitude, possibly with the Father’s (invariable) ratification considered.

How far Christ connected the Parousia and the fall of Jerusalem, it is not easy to say. Various sayings of Christ about the future were certainly famous before 70. John’s teaching that “the kingdom of God is at hand” (Mt 4 17) is a mixture of the teachings, and the words “must appear” (Mk 13 26) is almost a quotation from Dan 7 14. The sayings of Christ about the future were certainly taught by the apostles, and Mark’s version of the “fall of Jerusalem” (24 with Mk 13 and Lk 17 20-37; or Lk 17 31 with Mk 13 15.16 (noting the inappropriateness of Lk 17 31 in its present context). The critical discussions of Mk 13 are familiar and those of Lk 21 (a still more complex problem) only less so. Remembering what the fall of Jesus or its immediate prospect would have meant to the apostles, the tendency to group the statements of Christ will be resolved. Consequently, not too much stress should be laid on the connection of this with the Parousia, and in no case can the fall of Jesus be considered to exhaust the meaning of the Parousia. A second question is that of the time of the Parousia. Here Mk 13:30 | Lk 21:32 | Mt 24:34 place it within Christ's generation, Mt 10:23 before all the cities of Judaea are closed to Christ's apostles (cf. Acts 21:5). There is no reference to the fall of Jesus. Then there is 'ye shall see' of Mk 14:62; Lk 13:35 | Mt 23:39. Agreeing with this are the exhortations to watchfulness (Mk 13:35-37; Lk 12:40; Mt 24:44, etc., with many parables, such as the Ten Virgins). Now Mk 13:32 | Mt 26:36 do not quite contradict this, for knowledge of the generation is quite consistent with ignorance of the day and hour; 'It will be within your generation, but nothing more can be told you, so watch!' The real difficulty lies in Mk 13:10 | Mt 24:14, the necessity of all Gentiles hearing the gospel (Lk 21:24 is hardly relevant). To leave the question here, as most conservative scholars do, is unsatisfactory, for Mk 13:10 | Mt 24:14 has no clear purpose and this value is far outweighed by the real contradiction with the other passages. The key, probably, lies in Mt 10:18, from which Mk 13:10 differs only in insisting on all Gentiles, perhaps with the apostles thought of as worriers and 'Rome Empire' were practically coextensive. With this assumption the data yield a uniform result.

the Parousia would occur of so transcendent.

1. Solution a nature that it could be expressed of Problem only in the terms of the fullest eschatological symbol. St. John has a clear interpretation of this. In place of the long Parousia discourses in the Synoptics, we have, in the corresponding part of the Fourth Gospel, chs 13-17, dealing not only with the future in general but concretely with Christ's coming and the Judgment. Christ indeed came to His own (Jn 14:18), and not He only but the Spirit (Jn 14:16), and even the Father (Jn 14:23). When the disciples are so equipped, their presence in the world subjects the world to a continual sifting process of judgment (16:11). The fate of men by this process is to be eternally fixed (3:18), while the disciples newly made are assured that they have already entered into their eternal condition of blessedness (11:25-26; 5:24; 10:28; 17:23). Equally directly the presence of Christ is conceived in Rev 3:20. So in St. Paul, the glorified Christ has returned to His own to dwell in him (Rom 8:10, etc.), uniting them into a body vitally connected with Him (Col 1:18), so supernatural that it is the teacher of 'angels' (Eph 3:10), a body whose members are already in the Kingdom (Col 1:13), who even sit already in heavenly places (Eph 2:6). The same thought is found in such synoptic passages (Lk 7:28; Mt 11:11; Lk 17:21[?]; see Kingdom or Gon) as represent the Kingdom as present. Already the eschatological promises were realized in a small group of men, even though they were caught up in the transforming influence of the Spirit. Compare the continuous coming of Mt 26:64 (Lk 22:69).

It is on these lines of the church as a supernatural quantity (of course not to be confused with any particular denomination) that the immediate realization of the Parousia would occur of so transcendent.
the interference of the Parthians in the affairs of Judaea, once making it a vassal state.

Parthia proper was a small territory to the S.E. of the Caspian Sea, about 300 miles long by 120 wide, a fertile though mountainous region, bordering on the desert tract of Eastern Persia. The origin of the Parthians is rather uncertain, though the prevailing opinion is that they were of Scythic stock or of the great Tartar race. We have no reference to them earlier than the time of Darius the Great, but they were doubtless among the tribes subdued by Cyrus, as they are mentioned by Darius as being in revolt. They seem to have remained faithful to the Persians after that, and submitted to Alexander without resistance.

They next came under the rule of the Seleucid kings of Syria, but revolted about 250 BC, in the reign of Antiochus II (Theos), and gained their independence under the lead of Arses II who established the dynasty of the Arsacids, which continued for nearly 5 centuries. His capital was Hecatompyle, but his reign continued only about 3 years, and his brother Tirdates succeeded him as Arses II and he consolidated the kingdom. The war between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies freed him from interference from that quarter until 237 BC, when Seleucus II (Callinicus) marched against him, but was completely defeated, and Parthia independent remained. Arsanax I, who followed him, extended his dominions westward to the Zagros Mountains, but Antiochus III would not permit such an encroachment with impunity, and led an expedition against him, driving him back and even invading his ancestral dominion. But after a struggle of some years the Parthians remained still unsubdued, and the difficulties of the contest led Antiochus to conclude peace with him in which he acknowledged the independence of Parthia. For about a quarter of a century the king of Parthia remained quiet, but Phraates I (181–174 BC) re-commenced aggressions on the Seleucid empire which were continued by Mithridates I (174–187), who added to his dominions a part of Bactria, on the E., and Media, Persia and Babylonia on the W. This was a challenge to Demetrius II, of Syria, to whose empire the provinces belonged, and he marched against him with a large force, but was defeated and taken prisoner. He remained in Parthia some years, well treated by Phraates II, whose sister he married, and when Phraates wished to create a diversion against Antiochus Sidetes, he set Demetrius at liberty and sent him back to Syria. Antiochus was at first successful, as his force of 300,000 men far outnumbered the Parthians, but he was at last defeated and slain in 129 BC and his army destroyed. This was the last attempt of the Seleucid kings to subdue Parthia, and it was acknowledged as the dominant power in Western Asia. But Phraates fell in conflict with the Scythians, who turned him in aid him in his war with Sidetes, and his successor likewise, and it was only on the accession of Mithridates in 124 BC that these barbarians were checked. The king then turned his attention toward Armenia, which he probably brought under his control, but leaving Phraates restored its independence and even attacked the Parthians, and took from them two provinces in Mesopotamia.

Not long after, the power of Rome came into contact with Armenia and Parthia. In 66 BC when, after Pompey subduing Mithridates of Pontus, Pompey came into Syria, Phraates III made an alliance with him against Armenia, but was offended by the way in which he was treated and thought of turning against his ally, but refrained for the time being. It was only a question of time when the two powers would come to blows, for Parthia had become an empire and could ill brook the intrusion of Rome into Western Asia. It was the ambition and greed of Crassus that brought about the clash of Rome and Parthia. When he took the East as his share of the Roman world as apportioned among the triumvirs, he determined to rival Caesar in fame and wealth by subduing Parthia, and advanced across the Euphrates, subdued the Euphratians and obtained in 53 BC. The story of his defeat and death and the destruction of the army and loss of the Roman eagles is familiar to all readers of Roman history. It revealed Parthia to the world as the formidable rival of Rome, which it continued to be for nearly 3 centuries. After the death of Crassus, the Parthians crossed the Euphrates and ravaged Northern Syria, but retired the following year without securing any portion of the country, and thus ended the first war with Rome. In 40 BC, after the battle of Philippi, Parthia, who was then king, invaded Syria a second time and took possession of it together with all Pal, Tyre alone escaping subjection. He set Antigonus on the throne of Judaea, deposing Hyrcanus for the purpose. Syria and Pal remained in the hands of Parthia for 3 years, but the coming of Ventidius gave a new turn to affairs. He drove the Parthians out of Syria, and when they returned the following year, he defeated them again, and Parthia remained without. Parthia had to retire within her own borders and remain on the defensive. Antony’s attempt to subdue them proved abortive, and his struggle with Octavian compelled him to relinquish the project. The Parthians were unable to take advantage of the strife in the Roman empire on account of troubles at home. An insurrection led by Tirdates drove the king Phraates IV from the throne, but he recovered it by the aid of the Scythians, and Tirdates took refuge in Syria with the youngest son of the king. Augustus afterward restored him without ransom, and obtained the last standards of Crassus, and thus peace was established between the rival empires. Each had learned to respect the power of the other, and, although contention arose regarding the suzerainty of Armenia, peace was not seriously disturbed between them for about 130 years, or until the reign of Trajan. Parthia was not at peace with herself, however. Dynastic troubles were frequent, and the reigns of the kings short. Arshakun III, who reigned 122–37 AD, was expelled from his kingdom and twice recovered his throne. In his days occurred a terrible massacre of Jewish colonists in Mesopotamia, as narrated by Jos (Ant, XVIII, ix). The contest with Rome over Armenia was settled in the days of Nero in a manner satisfactory to both parties, so that peace was not broken for 50 years. The ambition of Trajan led him to disregard the policy inaugurated by Augustus, adhered to, for the most part, by his successors, not to extend the limits of the empire. After the conquest of Dacia he turned his attention to the East and resolved on the invasion of Parthia. The Parthian king, Chosroes, endeavored to placate Trajan by embassy bearing presents and proposals of peace, but Trajan rejected them and carried out his purpose. He subdued Armenia, took Upper Mesopotamia, Adiabène (Assyria), Ctesiphon, the capital, and reached thePers Gulf, but was obliged to turn back by revolts in his rear and famine in his camp. The Parthian conquered provinces were restored, however, by Hadrian, and the Parthians did not retaliate until the reign of Aurelius, when they overran Syria, and in 162 AD Lucius Verus was sent to punish them. In the following year he drove them back and advanced into the heart of the Parthian empire, inflicting the severest blow it had yet received. It was evident that the empire was on the decline, and the Romans did not meet with the resistance they had anticipated. Forthwith Caracalla both made expeditions into the country, and the latter took the capital and massacred the inhabitants, but after his assassination his successor, Macrinus, fought a three days' battle with the Parthians in which the Parthians, as was feared, left and was glad to conclude a peace by paying an indemnity of some £1,500,000 (217 AD).

But this was the last achievement of the Parthians. It is evident that Artabanus had suffered severely in his conflict with the Romans, and in the reign of Macrinus was unable to put down the revolt of the Persians under the lead of Artaxerxes, who overthrew the Parthian empire and established the dynasty of the Sassanides in its place (226 AD).

4. Fall of the Empire

The Parthians were not a cultured people, but displayed a rude magnificence, making use, to some extent, of remains of Gr culture which they found within the regions they seized from the empire of Alexander. They had no native lit., as far as known, but made use of Gr in writing and on their coins. They were familiar with Heb or Syro-Chaldaic, and the later kings had Sem legends on their coins. Jos is said to have written his history of the Jewish War in the Parthian language. In this method of government they seem to have left the different provinces pretty much to themselves, so long as they paid tribute and furnished the necessary contingents.

PARTITION, pär-tish'-ən, pär-tish'-ən, THE MIDDLE WALL OF (φῶς ἐπιστολής τοῦ φαραώ, τὸ μέσον τοῦ πληρόμενος ἡμῶν; Eph 2 14): What Paul here asserts is that Christ is our peace, the peace of both Jewish and Gentile believers. He has made them both to be one in Himself, and has broken down the wall which divided them from one another. Then the apostle regards Jew and Gentile as two, who by a fresh act of creation in Christ are made into one new man. The argument of these similes refers to an actual wall in the temple of Jerusalem, beyond which no one was allowed to pass unless he were a Jew, the balustrade or barrier which marked the limit up to which a Gentile might advance but no further. Curiously, this middle wall of partition had a great deal to do with both Philip's conversion and the Gentile mission, for the multitudes of the Jews became infuriated, not merely because of their general hostility to him as an apostle of Christ and a preacher of the gospel for the world, but specially because it was erroneously supposed that he had brought Tiberius and the Ephesian past this barrier into the temple (Acts 21 29), and that he had in this manner profaned the temple (24 6), as, it is put in 21 28, he had "brought Greeks into the temple and polluted this holy place." Severus, the procurator, had made Paul on his trial, and when he saw that they violently seized and dragged him out of the temple—dragged him outside the balustrade. The Levites at once shut the gates, to prevent the possibility of any further profanation, and Paul in a piece of infantile bravado put on his uniform and pretended that he was an army commander and his soldiers forcibly prevented.

In building the temple Herod the Great had included a large area to form the various courts. The temple proper consisted of the Holy Place, entered by the priests only, and the Holy of Holies, to which the high priest entered alone once every year. The outer court was called the Court of the Gentiles; its walls were the Court of the Women. The site of the temple itself and the space occupied by the various courts already mentioned formed a raised plateau or platform. "From it you descended at various points down 8 steps and through gates in a lofty way, to find yourself overlooking another huge court—the outer court to which Gentiles, who desired to see something of the glories of the temple and to offer gifts and sacrifices to the God of the Jews, were freely admitted. Further in than this court they were forbidden, on pain of death, to go. The actual boundary line was not the high wall with its gates, but a low stone barrier about 4 feet high. In height, it was the bottom of 14 more steps" (J. Armitage Robinson, D.D., Sir Johnstk's Commentary on the Epistle, see also Enderleiner, The Temple, Its Ministry and Services as They Were at the Time of Jesus Christ, 46).

The middle wall of partition was called sōdēgh, and was built of marble beautifully ornamented. The Court of the Gentiles formed the lowest and the outermost enclosure of all the courts of the sanctuary. It was paved with the finest variegated marble. Its name signified that it was open to all, Jews or Gentiles alike. It was very large, and is said by Jewish tradition to have formed a square of 750 ft.

It was in this court that the oxen and sheep and the doves for the sacrifices were sold as in the temple. It was in this court too that there were the tables of the money-changers, which Christ Himself overthrew when He drove out the sheep and oxen and them that bought and sold in His Father's house. The multitudes assembling in this court must have been greatly excited on occasions such as the Passover and Pentecost and at the other great feasts, and the din of voices must oftentimes have been almost deafening. And yet in this court no Gentile might go. See Temple.

In the year 70, while excavations were being made on the site of the temple by the Palestine Exploration Fund, M. Clermont-Ganneau discovered one of the pillars which have been described as standing on the very barrier or middle wall of partition, to which Paul refers. This pillar is now at Constantinople and is inscribed with a Gr inscription in capital or uncial letters, which is translated as follows: NO MAN OF ANOTHER NATION ENTER WITHIN THE FENCE AND TOUCH THE STONE ROUND ABOUT THE TEMPLE WHICH BELONGS TO THE LORD, AND WHOEVER IS CONDEMNED WILL HAVE HIMSELF TO BLAME THAT HIS DEATH ENDURE.
While Paul was writing the Ep. to the Eph at Rome, this barrier in the temple at Jerus was still standing, yet the chained prisoner of Jesus Christ was not afraid to write that Christ had broken down the middle wall of partition, and had thus admitted Gentiles who were far off, strangers and foreigners, to all the privileges of access to God anciently possessed by Israel alone; that separation between a Jew and Gentile was done away with forever in Christ.

If Paul wrote the Ep. to the Eph in 60 or 61 AD, then the actual barrier of stone remained in its position in the Court of the Gentiles not more than some 10 years.

4. The Throwing Down of the Barrier

For it was thrown down in the burning of the temple by the Rom army. And out of those ruins a fragment has been excavated in our own day, containing the very inscription threatening death to the gentile intruder, and reminding us that it is only in Christ Jesus that we now draw nigh unto God, and that we are thus one body in Christ, one new man. Christ has broken down the middle wall of partition, for He, in His own person, is our peace.

John Rutherfurd

PARTRIDGE, pär'traj (ܢѸܬ, kō rebate; Lat. perdix; LXX. Is 26. 20. νυκτικόρας, νυκτικόρας, "owl"; Jer 17:11. πατρίς, perdix): A bird of the family Tetraonidae. The Heb word for this bird, kōreb, means "a caller," and the Lat perdix is supposed to be an imitation of its cry, and as all other nations base their name for the bird on the Lat, it becomes quite evident that it was originally named in imitation of its call. The commonest partridge of Pal, very numerous in the wilderness and hill country, was a bird almost as large as a pheasant. It had a clear, exquisite cry that attracted attention, esp. in the mating season. The partridge of the wilderness was smaller and of beautifully marked plumage. It made its home around the Dead Sea, in the Wilderness of Judaea and in rocky caverns. Its eggs were creamy white; its cry very similar to its relatives'. The partridge and its eggs were used for food from time immemorial.

The first reference to it is found in 1 S 26:20: "Now therefore, let not my blood fall to the earth away from the presence of Jeh: for the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains." David in this dialogue with Saul clearly indicates that if he did not hunt the partridge himself, he knew how it was done. The birds were commonly chased up the mountains and stunned or killed with "throw sticks." David knew how deft these birds were at hiding beside logs and under dry leaves colored so like them as to afford splendid protection; how swiftly they could run; what expert dodgers they were; so he compared taking them with catching a flea. The other reference is found in Jer 17:11: "As the partridge that sitteth on eggs which she hath not laid, so is he that getteth riches, and not by right; in the midst of his days they shall leave him, and at his end he shall be a fool." If this reference is supposed to indicate that partridges are in the habit of brooding on the nest of their kind or of different birds, it fails wholly to take into consideration the history of the bird. Partridges select a location, carefully deposit an egg a day for from 10 to 15 days, sometimes 20, and then brood, so that all the young emerge at one time. But each bird knows and returns to its nest with unfailing regularity. It would require the proverbial "Philadelphia lawyer" to explain this reference to a "partridge sitting on eggs she had not laid." No ornithologist ever could reconcile it to the habits or characteristics of the birds. AV tr* these lines, "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not." This was easy to explain clearly. The eggs of the partridge were delicious food, and any brooding bird whose nest was discovered after only a few days of incubation did not hatch, because she lost her eggs. Also the eggs frequently fall prey to other birds or small animals. Again, they are at the mercy of the elements, sometimes being spoiled by extremely wet cold weather. Poultry fanciers assert that a heavy thunder storm will spoil chicken eggs when hatching-time is close; the same might be true with eggs of the wild. And almost any wild bird will desert its nest and make its former brooding useless, if the location is visited too frequently by man or beast.

There is also a partridge reference in the Book of Eclesus (11:29 ff RV): “Bring not every man into thine house; for many are the plots of the deceitful man. As a decoy partridge in a cage, so is the heart of a proud man; and as one that is a spy, he looketh upon thy falling. For he lieth in wait to turn things that are good into evil, and in things that are praiseworthy he will lay blame.” The reference is to confining a tame partridge in a hidden cage so that its calls would lure many of its family within range of arrows or “throw sticks” used by concealed hunters.

PARUAH, pa-roo’ah (ضارع, pārāḇāh, “blooming”): Father of Jehoshaphat, who was one of Solomon’s twelve victualers or providers, and had charge in Issachar of this function (1 K 4:17).

PARVAIM, pār-vā’îm (תמרע, par'awîm): The word occurs only in 2 Ch 3:6, as the place from which Solomon obtained gold for the decoration of his Temple. A derivation is given from the Sanskrit पर्व, “eastern,” so that the name might be a vague term for the East (Genesius, Thesaurus, 1125). Whether there was such a place in Arabia is doubtful. Farwa in Yemen has been suggested, and also Sak el Parvaïn in Yemenah. Some have considered the name a shortened form of סַפְרָוַיִם which occurs in the Syr and Tg Jonathan for the “Sephar” of Gen 10:30.

PAS-DAMMIM, pas-dam’îm. See Ephes-dammim.

PASEAH, pa-se’a, pas’-a (פשאות, pāṣēḇ, “divider”): Son of Japhlet, descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7:33).

PASSAGE, pas’aj. See PESAH, PESAHIM.

PASSAGING OF MARY, THE. See Apocryphal Gospels.

PASSION, pas’’un, PASSIONS, pas’’unz: “Passion” is derived from Lat passio, which in turn by the “house of Jehovah” in the “gate of Benjamin” (Jer 20:2). When released, Jeremiah prophesied Divine judgment on him and the people. Future captivity and an exile's death are promised to Pashur whose name he changed from its masterful significance to a covering one. “Terror on every side” (מְגֹיהַרָה, meger‘ah) is to take the place of “stable strength” (Jer 20:3 ff).

(2) Son of Melchiah, a prince of Judah, and one of the delegation sent by Zedekiah, the king, to consult Jeremiah (Jer 21:1). It looks like a larger and later delegation, similarly sent, to which this Pashur belongs, whose record is given in Jer 38:1-13. Accompanying them was one, Gedaliah, who was a son of (3).

(3) Another Pashur (Jer 38:1), who may be the person mentioned in 1 Ch 9:12; Neh 11:12.

(4) A priest, of those who “sealed” Nehemiah’s covenant (Neh 10:13), who may, however, be the same as (5).

(5) The chief of a priestly family called “sons of Pashur” (Ezr 2:8; 10:22; Neh 7:41; 1 Esd 5:25 [“Phassur,” m ?Pashhur”]; 9:22 [“Phair,” m “Parshur”]). Doubtless it is this Pashur, some of whose sons had “strange wives” (Ezr 10:22).

PASS, pas, PASSAGE, pas’aj, PASSENGER, pas’en-jîr: “To pass” bears different meanings and corresponds to various words in Heb and Gr. It occurs frequently in the phrase “pass, and something after” (lit. and it was). This is simply a Heb idiom linking together the different paragraphs of a continuous narrative. As a rule “pass” renders the Heb word צָאַר, ‘abar. This vb. has various meanings, e.g. “to pass over” a stream (Gen 31:21); “cross” a boundary (Nu 20:17); “to pass through,” or “traverse,” a country (Nu 21:22); “to pass on” (Gen 18:5); “to pass away,” “cease to exist” (Job 30:15). The word is used metaphorically, “to pass over,” “overstep,” “transgress” (Nu 14:41). In the causative form the vb. is used in the phrase “to cause to pass through fire” (Dt 18:10; 2 K 16:3). In AV “pass” sometimes has the force of “surpass,” “exceed,” e.g. 2 Ch 9:22, “King Solomon passed all the kings of the earth in riches and wisdom”; or, more literally, of also Eph 6:18, “the love of Christ which passeth knowledge,” and Phil 4:7, “the peace of God, which passeth all understanding.”

Passage in AV renders צָאַר, ma‘āḇār, or צָאָר, ma‘āḇārō. The former word denotes (1) the ford of a river (Gen 32:23 AV’m); (2) the pass of a mountain range, and (3) any other instance of the use of the shorter form (Isa 30:32 m), AV renders “where the grounded staff shall pass.” A more correct tr would be, “and every sweep of stroke of the appointed staff.” The longer form bears both meanings, viz. “ford” (e.g. Josh 2:7; Jgs 3:28, etc) and “pass” (1 S 14:4; 1 Sa 10:29). In Josh 22:11, the rendering “towards the region opposite the children of Israel” would be more correct than AV, “at the passage of the children of Israel.” In AV of Nu 20:21 “passage” seems to mean “right of way,” and renders the infinitive of the Heb vb. In Jer 22:20 AV the word rendered “passage” should be tr “from Abiram” (as in RV), a mountain range in Moab, N.E. of the Dead Sea.

PASSENGER in AV means a “passer-by.” In Ezk 39:11,14,15 where the word occurs 4 times in AV, RV translates “them that pass through.” T. Lewis

is derived from the vb. potior, with the √ pot. The Lat words are connected with the Gr √ παθ, path, which appears in a large number of derivatives. And Gr, the name of the festival (as well as many other languages in addition) words connected with this √ pot, path, are often susceptible of a great variety of meanings, for which the dictionary must be consulted. For "passion," however, as it appears in EV, only three of these meanings need be considered. (1) Close to what seems to be the primary force of the root is the meaning "suffer," and in this sense "passion" is used in Acts 1 3, "unto him whom he also showed himself alive after his passion." This is a paraphrase (Gr παθήσαντι, "suffered") due to the Vulg (post passionem suam), and in Eng. as old as Wycliff, whom the subsequent EV has followed. This is the only case in AV and RV where "passion" has this meaning, and it can be so used in modern Eng. only when referring (as here) to the sufferings of Christ (cf. "Passion play"). (2) "Suffering," when applied to the mind, came to denote the state that is controlled by some emotion, and so "passion" was applied to the emotion itself. This is the meaning of the word in Acts 14 15, "men of like passions," and Jas 5 17, "a man of like passions," Gr άνθρωπος, homoioptathēs; RVM "of like nature" gives the meaning exactly; "men with the same emotions as we." (3) From "emotion" a transition took place to "to have one's own emotion," and this is the normal force of "passion" in modern Eng. AV does not use this meaning, but in RV "passion" in this sense is the tr of παθός, pathos, in its three occurrences: Rom 1 20 (AV "affection"); Col 3 5 (AV "passion"); 1 Thess 4 5 (AV "lust"). It is used also for two occurrences of παθον, pathēma (closely allied to pathos) in Rom 7 5 (AV "motions," AVM "passions") and in Gal 5 24 (AV "affection"). The fixing of the exact force in any of these cases is a delicate problem fully discussed in the comments. In Col 3 5 only does "passion" stand as an isolated term. The context here perhaps gives the word a slight sexual reference, but this must not be overstressed; the warning probably includes any violent over-emotion that robs a man of his self-control. PASSOVER, pasôv-ver (πάσχα, pesah, from pâshâ, "to pass" or "spring over" or "to spare") (Ex 12 23; 23 27; cf. Is 31 5). Other conjectures connect the word with the "passing over" into a new year, with Asyry pâshû, meaning "to placate," with Heb pâshâ, meaning "to dance," and even with the skipping motions of a young lamb; Aram. נָפָח, pâshâ, whence Gr Ναράχ, Pâshâ; whence Eng. paschal. In early Christian centuries folklore mythology connected pâshà with Gr pâshâ, "to suffer" [see Passion], and the word was taken to refer to Good Friday rather than the Passover:

10. The Jewish Passover

The Passover was the annual Heb festival on the evening of the 14th day of the month of 'Abibh or Nisan, as it was called in later times. It was founded, it could be done only, a 7 day festival of mâcghôth, or unleavened bread, to which the name Passover was also applied by extension (Lev 23 5). Both were distinctly connected with the Exodus, which, according to tradition, they commemorate; the Passover being in the instruction of Egypt, eaten in preparation for the journey, while Jeh, passing over the houses of the Hebrews, was slaying the firstborn of Egypt (Ex 12 12; 13 2.12 ff); the mâcghôth festival being in memory of the first days of the journey during which this bread of haste was eaten (Ex 12 14–20).

The ordinance of pesah micrajym, the last meal in Egypt, included the following provisions: (1) the eating of a lamb, or lamb, and unleavened bread, for each household on the 10th of the month; (2) the killing of the lamb on the 14th at even; (3) the sprinkling of the blood on doorposts and lintels of the houses in which it was to be eaten; (4) the roasting of the lamb with fire, its head with its legs and inwards—the lamb was not to be eaten raw nor sodden (bâshâl) with water; (5) the eating of unleavened bread and bitter herbs; (6) eating in haste, with loins girded, shoes on the feet, andстал in hand; (7) and remaining in the house until the morning; (8) the burning of all that remained; the Passover could be eaten only during the night (Ex 12 1–23).

This service was to be observed as an ordinance forever (Ex 12 14,24), and the night was to be lēl shimmôrîm, "a night of vigils," or, at least, "to be much observed" of all the children of Israel throughout their generations (Ex 12 42). The details, however, of the pesah dôrôth, or later observances of the Passover, seem to have differed slightly from those of the Egypt Passover (Mish, P'gâbhîm, ix.5). Thus it is probable that the victim could be taken from the flock or from the herd (Dt 16 2; cf. Ex 4 11). The details, however, may be stated in an entirely different way, and judging from Dt 16 7, the prohibition against seething (Hb bâshâl) was not understood to apply (unless, indeed, the omission of the expression "with water" gives a more general sense to the Heb word bâshâl, making it include roasting). New details were also added; for example, that the Passover could be sacrificed only at the central sanctuary (Dt 16 5); that no alien or uncircumcised person, or unclean person, could partake (De 16 2; cf. Ex 4 11). The details, however, may be stated in an entirely different way, and judging from Dt 16 7, the prohibition against seething (Hb bâshâl) was not understood to apply (unless, indeed, the omission of the expression "with water" gives a more general sense to the Heb word bâshâl, making it include roasting). New details were also added; for example, that the Passover could be sacrificed only at the central sanctuary (Dt 16 5); that no alien or uncircumcised person, or unclean person, could partake (De 16 2; cf. Ex 4 11).
Though strictly the pilgrimage was connected with the Passover portion and the first day of the festival.

During the entire week, additional sacrifices were offered in the temple: an offering for the burnt offering, 2 young bullocks, 1 ram, 7 lambs of the first years, and various other offerings and drink offerings and a goat for a sin offering.

During the week of the Passover festival comes the beginning of the barley harvest in Pal (Mount of Olives) which lasts from the end of March to the beginning of May in the low Jordan valley to the beginning of the elevated portions.

The offering on the first day was the standing corn (Dt 16:9) and of bringing the sheaf of the peace offering is spoken of as the sacrifice after the Sabbath (Lev 23:15), that is, according to the Jewish tradition, the day after the first day, or rest-day, of the Passover (Neh. 69; My Tan’an; 1 Jos, Ant, III, x, 5), and according to Samaritan and Boethusian traditions and the modern Karites the Sunday after the Passover.

At this time a wave offering is made of a sheaf, followed by an offering with a meal and drink offering, and only thereafter might the new corn be eaten. From this day 7 weeks are counted to fix the date of Pentecost, the celebration connected with the wheat harvest. It is of course perfectly natural for the people to celebrate the turning-points of the agricultural year in connection with their traditional festivals. Indeed, the Jewish liturgy of today retains in the Passover service the prayer of Dew (al) which grew up in Pal on the basis of the needs of an agricultural people.

Many writers, however, eager to explain the entire festival or even all the agricultural calendar (presumably a Canaanite one, though there is not a shred of evidence that the Canaanites had such a festival), have seized upon the Pesah as the basis of the Pesah (festival), and have attempted to explain the Passover as bread hastily baked in the busy harvest times, or as bread quickly baked from the freshly exempted first-fruits. Wherein these theories are superior to the traditional explanation so consistently adhered to throughout the Pent it is difficult to see. In a similar vein, it has been attempted to connect the Passover with the sacrifice or redemption of the firstborn of man and beast (both institutions being traditionally traced to the judgment on the firstborn of Egypt: Ex 13:11-15; Ex 11:18; 12:31; 13:9, 10, 20), so as to characterize the Passover as a festival of redemption from the birth of the high-god, so venerated as very little that is positive has been added to our knowledge of the Passover by this theory.

The Pent speaks of the Passover in many contexts and naturally with constantly varying emphasis. Thus in the earlier literature of the Old Testament it is natural to expect fewer ritual details than in a manual of sacrificial service; according to the view here taken, we must distinguish between the pesah mitzrayim and the pesah derabim. Nevertheless, great stress is laid on the variations in the several accounts, by certain groups of critics, on the basis of which they seek to support their several theories of the composition of the Pent or Hev. Without entering into this controversy, it will be sufficient here to enumerate and classify all the discrepancies said to exist in the several Passover passages, together with such explanations as have been suggested. These discrepancies may be called, (1) mere omissions, (2) differences of emphasis, and (3) conflicting statements. The children of Israel began the keeping of the Passover in its due season according to all its ordinances in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 9:5). In the very beginning of their national life in Pal we find them celebrating the Passover under the leadership of Moses. Two later Passover celebrations are particularly noted (Josh 5 10). History records but few later celebrations in Pal, but there are enough intimations to indicate that it was frequently if not regularly observed. Thus Solomon offered sacrifices three times a year upon the altar which he had built to Jeh, at the appointed seasons, including the Feast of Unleavened Bread (1 K 8 13). The later prophets speak of appointed seasons for pilgrimages and sacrifices (cf Isa 1 12-14), and occasionally perhaps even the Passover celebration (cf Isa 30 29), bearing in mind that the Passover is the only night-feast of which we have any record. In Hezekiah's time the Passover had fallen into such a state of desuetude that neither the priests nor the people were prepared for the king's urgent appeal to observe it. Nevertheless, he was able to bring together a large concourse in Jerus during the 2d month and institute a more joyful observance than any other recorded since the days of the Judges. After the fall of Jerus, the priests, and the prophecies of Ezekiel's are also significant as another indication of the Passover. Ezekiel, however, there was celebrated the most memorable Passover, presumably in the matter of conformity to rule, since the days of the Judges (2 K 23 21; 2 Ch 35 1 ff). The continued observance of the Passover is best attested by Ezekiel's interest in it (Ezk 45 18). In post-exilic times it was probably observed more scrupulously than ever before (Ezr 6 19 ff).

Further evidence, if any were needed, of the importance of the Passover in the life of the Jews of the second temple is found in the Talmud, which devotes to this subject an entire tractate, Pesahim, on which NT Times.

At the Passover, the Jews placed the roasted lamb on the table in memory of the rite, and other articles symbolic of the Passover were also placed beside it: such as a roasted egg, said to be in memory of the free-will offering; a sauce called ḥaraveth, said to resemble the mortar of Egypt; salt water, for the symbolic dipping (cf Mt 26:23); the bitter herbs and the marzûq. The ṣēther (program) is as follows: sanctification; washing of the hands; dividing and dropping the parsley; breaking and setting aside a piece of marzûq to be distributed and eaten at the end of the supper; reading of the mōgadāh shel pe'aḥ, a poetic narrative in answer to the Ephesian and Colossian questions asked by the youngest child in compliance with the Biblical command found 3 t in Ex and once in Dt, “Thou shalt tell thy son on that day”; washing the hands for eating; grace before eating; tasting the marzûq; eating together; the meal; partaking of the marzûq that had been set aside as ḥpektómen or dessert; grace after meat; Hallel; request that the service be accepted. Thereafter folk-songs are changed to traditional melodies, and poems recited, many of which have allegorical meanings. A cup of wine is used at the sanctification and another at grace, in addition to which two other cups have been added, the 4 according to the Mish (Piqṭḥon x.1) symbolizing the 4 words employed in Ex 6:6-7 for the delivery of Israel from Egypt. Instead of eating in haste, as in the Egypt Passover, it is customary to recline or lean at this meal in token of Israel’s freedom. The prohibition against leaven is strictly observed. Thereafter, searching for hidden leaven on the evening before the Passover and its destruction in the morning have become formal ceremonies for which appropriate blessings and declarations have been included in the liturgy since the days when the Passover was celebrated in the wilderness. As in the case of other festivals, the Jews have doubled the days of holy convocation, and have added a semi-holiday after the last day, the so-called ṭṣur bugh, in token of their love for the ordained celebration and their loathsome to depart from it.

LITERATURE

The First and Second Epp. to Tim, and the Ep. to Tit form a distinct group among the letters written by Paul, and are now known as the pastoral Epp., because they were addressed to two Christian churches. When Timothy and Titus received these epp., they were not acting, as they had previously done, as missionaries or itinerant evangelists, but had been left by Paul in charge of churches; the former having the oversight of the church in Ephesus, and the latter having the care of the churches in the island of Crete. The Pastoral Epp. were written to guide them in the discharge of the duties devolving upon them as Christian pastors. Such is a general description of these epp. In each of them, however, there is a great deal more than is covered or implied by the designation “Pastoral”—much that is personal, and much also that is concerned with Christian faith and doctrine and practice generally.

I. Genuineness

In regard to the genuineness of the epp. there is abundant external attestation. Allusions to them are found in the 1. External writings of Clement and Polycarp.

In the middle of the 2nd cent. the epp. were recognized as Pauline in authorship, and were frequently among the list of apostolic books.

"Marcion indeed rejected them, and Tatian is supposed to have rejected them to Timothy. But, as Jerome states in the preface to his Comm. on Tit, these heretics rejected the epp. not on critical grounds, but merely because they disliked their teaching. He says they used no argument, but merely asserted, 'This is Paul’s. This is not Paul’s. It is obvious that men holding such opinions as Marcion and Tatian held, would not willingly ascribe authority to epp. which condemned asceticism. So far, then, as the early church can guarantee to us the authenticity of the writings ascribed to Paul, the Pastoral Epp. are guaranteed' (Marcus Dods, Intro to the NT, 167).

The external evidence is all in favor of the reception of these epp., which were known not only to Clement and Polycarp, but also to Irenæus, Tertullian, the author of the Ep. to the churches of Vienne and Lyons, and Theophilus of Antioch. The evidence of Polycarp, who died in 167 AD, is remarkably strong. He says, "The love of money is the beginning of all trouble, knowing . . . that we brought nothing into the world, neither can carry anything out" (cf 1 Tim 6:10). It would be difficult to overlook testimony of this character.

The decision of certain critics to reject the Pastoral Epp. as documents not from the hand of Paul, "is not reached on the external evidence, which is perhaps as early an attestation as can be reasonably expected. They are included in the Muratorian Canon, and quoted by Irenaeus and others as "Paul's" (A. S. Peake, A Critical Intro to the N.T. 190). This tradition is satisfactory. In recent times, however, the authenticity of these epp. has been called in question by certain scholars (Baur, Fleming, and many others). Baur asserted that they were written for the purpose of combating the Gnosticism of the time, and of defending the church from it by means of ecclesiastical organization, and that the date of their composition was the year 130.

II. Alleged Difficulties against Pauline Authorship.—Various difficulties have been alleged against the reception of the Pastoral Epp. as Pauline. The chief of these are: (1) the difficulty of finding any place for these letters in the life of Paul, as that is recorded in the Acts and in the Pauline Epp. written before the Pastorals; (2) the fact that there are said to be in them indications of an ecclesiastical organization, and of a development of doctrine, both orthodox and heretical, considerably in advance of the Pauline age; (3) that the language of the epp. is on the whole, quite different from that in the accepted epp.; (4) the "most decisive" of all the arguments against the Pauline authorship—so writes Dr. A. C. McGiffert (A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 402)—is that "the character of the author of the Pastoral Epp. is not the Christianity of Paul."

Where can a place be found for these epp. in, the life of Paul? The indications of the date of their composition given in the epp. themselves point to Paul's

1. Relative ages are these:

(1) Data in 1 Tim.—In 1 Tim 1 3 Experiences Paul had gone from Ephesus to Macedonia, and had left Timothy in Ephesus in charge of the church there. In the Pastoral Epp. in the penultimate written, it is impossible to find such events or such a state of matters as will satisfy these requirements. Paul had previously been in Ephesus, on several occasions. His 1st visit to that city is recorded in Acts 18 19-21. On that occasion he went from Ephesus, not into Macedonia, but into Syria. His 2d visit was his 3d years' residence in Ephesus, as narrated in Acts 19; and when he left the city, he had, previous to his own departure from it, already sent Timothy independence toward Macedonia (2 Cor 2). Paul was a man of no others exactly the reverse of that described in 1 Tim 1 3. Timothy soon rejoined Paul, and so far was he from being left in Ephesus then, that he was in Paul's company on the remainder of his journey toward Jerusalem (Acts 20 15; 21 17).

No place therefore in Paul's life, previous to his arrest in Jerusalem, and his first Rom imprisonment, can be found, which satisfies the requirements of the situation described in 1 Tim 1 3. "It is impossible, unless we assume a second Rom imprisonment, to reconcile the various historical notices which the epp. [2 Tim] contains" (McGiffert, op. cit., 407).

In addition to this, the language used by the apostle at Miletus, when he addressed the elders of the Ephesian church (Acts 20 30) about the men speaking perverse things, who should arise among them, showed that these false teachers had not made their appearance at that time. There is, for this reason alone, no place for the Pastoral Epp. in Paul's life, previous to his arrest in Jerusalem. But Paul's life can be dated at the termination of his first Rom imprisonment; and this one fact gives ample room to satisfy all the conditions, as these are found in the three Pastorals.

Those who deny the Pauline authorship of these epp. also deny that he was released from what, in this article, is termed his 1st Rom imprisonment. But a denial of this latter statement is an assumption quite unwarranted and unproved. It assumes that Paul was not set free, simply because there is no record of this in the Acts. But the Acts is, on the very face of it, an incomplete or unfinished record; that is, it brings the narrative to a certain point, and then breaks off, evidently for the reason which Sir W. M. Ramsay demonstrates, that Luke left the record unfinished. However, which he was unable, owing to some cause now unknown, to carry into execution. The purpose of the Acts, as Ramsay says (St. Paul the Traveller and the Rom Citizen, 25, 308), is to lead up to the release of Paul. And to show that the Christian faith was not a forbidden or illegal religion, but that the formal impeachment of the apostle before the supreme court of the empire ended in his being set at liberty, and thus there was established the fact that the faith of Jesus Christ was not, at that time, contrary to Rom law. "The Pauline authorship . . . can be maintained only on the basis of a hypothetical reconstruction, either of an entire period subsequent to the Rom imprisonment, or of the events within some period known to us" (McGiffert, op. cit., 410). The one fact that Paul was set free after his 1st Rom imprisonment gives the environment which fits exactly all the requirements of the Pastoral Epp.

Attention should be directed to the facts and to the conclusions stated in the art. PROFESSION (Q.V.), Mommers showing that the words, "My bonds became manifest in Christ throughout the whole pratorian guard" (Phil 1 13), mean that at the time when Paul wrote the Ep. to the Phil, the case against him was already come before the supreme court of appeal in Rome, that it had been partly heard, and that the impression made by the prisoner upon his judges was so favorable, that he expected soon to be set free.

The indications to be drawn from other expressions in three of the epp. of the Rom captivity—Phil, Col and Philem—are to the same effect. Thus, writing to the Philippians, he says that he hopes to send Timothy to them, so soon as he sees how matters go with him, and that he trusts in the Lord that he himself will visit them shortly. And again, writing to his friend Philemon in the city of Colossae, he asks him to prepare him a lodging, for he trusts that through the prayers of the Colossians, he will be granted to him.

These anticipations of acquittal and of departure from Rome are remarkable, and do not in any degree coincide with the idea that Paul was not set free but was condemned for a time to imprisonment. It is obvious that the importance of the trial is intelligible only if Paul was acquitted. That he was acquitted follows from the Pastoral Epp. with certainty for all who admit their genuineness; while even they who deny their Pauline origin must allow that they imply an early belief in historical details which are not consistent with Paul's journeys before his trial, and must either be pure inventions or events that occurred on later journeys. . . . If he was acquitted, the issue of the trial was a moral decision by the supreme court of the empire that it was permissible to preach Christianity; the trial, therefore, was really a charter of religious liberty, and therein lies its immense importance. It was indeed overturned by later decisions of the supreme court; but its existence was a highly important "fact for the Christians" (Ramsay, op. cit., 308).

"That he was acquitted is demanded both by the plan evident in Acts and by other reasons well stated by others" (ib, 360).

It should also be observed that there is the direct and corroborative evidence of Paul's release, afforded by such writers as Cyril of Jerusalem, Ephrem Syr., Chrysostom and Theodoret, all of whom speak of Paul's going to Spain. Jerome (Vir. Ill., 5) gives it as a matter of personal knowledge that Paul traveled as far as Spain. But there is more important evidence. In 1:37, the words are, "profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscens" ("the journey of Paul as he journeyed from Rome to Spain"). Clement also in the ep., from the church in Rome to the church in Corinth, which was written not later than the year 96 AD, says in reference to Paul, "Having taught righteousness to the whole world, and having gone to the extremity of the west [ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς διάσωσις θῆκον] and having borne witness before the rulers, so was he released from prison, but not to these, but being the greatest example of endurance," the words, "having gone to the extremity of the west," should be specially noticed. Clement was in Rome when he wrote this, and, accordingly, the natural import of the words is that Paul went to the limit of the western half of the then known world, or in other words, to the western boundary of the lands bordering the Mediterranean, that is, to Spain.

Now Paul never had been in Spain previous to his arrest in Jerusalem, but in Rom 15:24-28 he had twice expressed his intention to go there. These independent testimonies of Clement and of the Muratorian Canon, of the fact that after Paul's arrest in Jerusalem and carrying out his purpose to visit Spain, are entitled to great weight. They involve, of course, the fact that he was acquitted after his 1st Roman imprisonment.

Having been set free, Paul could not do otherwise than journey to Philippi, and himself also go there, as he had already promised when he wrote to the Philippian church (Philem. 21, 24). As a matter of course he would also resume his apostolic journeys for the purpose of proclaiming the gospel. There is now ample room in his life for the Pastoral Epp., and they give most interesting details of his further labors. The historical and geographical requirements in 1 Tim are, in this way, easily satisfied. It was no great distance to Ephesus from Philippi and Colossae, where he had promised that he would "come shorty." (2) Data in 2 Tim.—The requirements in 2 Tim. are (a) that Paul had recently been at Troas, at Corinth, and at Miletus, each of which he mentions (2 Tim 4); (b) that he was the writer of the epp. he was in Rome (1:17); (c) that he was a prisoner for the cause of the gospel (1:8; 2:9), and had once already appeared before the emperor's supreme court (4:16,17); (d) that he had then escaped but that he had good reason to believe that on the next hearing of his case the verdict would be given against him, and that he expected it could not be long till execution took place (4:6); (e) that he hoped that Timothy would be able to come from Ephesus to see him at Rome before the end (4:9,21). These requirements cannot be made to agree or coincide with the first Rom captivity, but they do agree perfectly with the facts of the apostle's release and subsequent imprisonment in that city.

(3) Data in Tit.—The data given in the Ep. to Tit are (a) that Paul had been in Crete, and that Titus had been with him there, and had been left behind in that island, when Paul sailed from its shores, Titus being charged with the oversight of the churches there (Tit 1:5); and (b) that Paul meant to spend the next winter at Nicopolis (3:12). It is simply impossible to locate these events in the recorded life of Paul, as that is found in the other epp. But they agree perfectly with his liberation after his first Roman imprisonment.

"As there is then no historical evidence that Paul did not survive the year 64, and as these Pastoral Epp. were recognized as Pauline in the immediately succeeding age, we may legitimately accept them as evidence that Paul did survive the year 64—that he was acquitted after his second imprisonment, was again arrested and brought to Rome, and from this second imprisonment wrote the Second Ep. to Titus—his last extant writing" (Dods, Intro to the NT, 172).

The second difficulty alleged against the acceptance of these epp. as Pauline is that there are said to exist in them indications of an ecclesiastical organization and of a doctrinal development, both orthodox (2 Tim. and Titus), and considerably later than those of the Pauline age.

(1) The first statement, that the epp. imply an ecclesiastical organization in advance of the time when Paul lived, is one which cannot be maintained in view of the facts disclosed in the epp. themselves. For directions are given to Timothy and to Titus in regard to the moral and other characteristics necessary in those who are to be ordained as bishops, elders, and deacons. In the 2d cent. the outstanding feature of ecclesiastical organization was the development of monarchical episcopacy, but the Pastoral Epp. show a presbyterial administration. The office held by Timothy in Ephesus and by Titus in Crete was, as the epp. themselves show, that of a temporary character, the directions which Paul gives to Timothy in regard to the ordaining of presbyters in every church are in agreement with similar notices found elsewhere in the NT, and do not coincide with the state of church organization as that existed in the 2d cent., the period when, objects to the genuineness of the epp. assert, they were composed.

"Everyone acquainted with ancient literature, particularly the literature of the ancient church, knows that a forger or fabulator of those times could not possibly have avoided anachronisms" (Zahn, Intro to the NT, II, 93). But the ecclesiastical arrangements in the Pastoral Epp. coincide in all points with the state of matters as it is found in the church in the time of the apostles, as that is described in the Acts and elsewhere in the NT.

It seems an error to suppose, as has often been done, that these epp. contain the germ of monarchical episcopacy; for the Christian church had already, from the day of Pentecost, existed as a society with special officers for the fundamental discipline and administration. The church in the Pastoral Epp. is a visible society, as it always was. Its organization therefore had come to be of the greatest importance, and epp. so in the matter of maintaining and handing down the truth of the church accordingly is described as "the pillar and stay of the truth" (1 Tim 3:15), that is, the immovable depository of the Divine revelation.

(2) The other statement, that the epp. show a doctrinal development out of harmony with the Pauline age is best viewed by an examination of what the epp. actually say.

In 1 Tim 6:20, Paul speaks of profane and vain babblings and oppositions of gnosis (RV "knowledge," AV "science") falsely so called. In Tit 3:9, he tells Titus to avoid foolish questions and genealogies and contentions and strivings about the law. These phrases have been held to be allusions to the tenets of Marcion, and to those of some of the gnostic sects. There are also other expressions such as fables and endless genealogies (1 Tim 1:3, 4; 6:3), words to no profit but the subverting of the hearer (2 Tim 2:14), foolish and unlearned questions which do gender strifes (2 Tim 2:23), questions and prolix words (1 Tim 6:4, 5), discussions which lead to nothing but law and profane babbling. Such are the expressions which Paul uses. These, taken with what is even more clearly stated in the Ep. to the Col., certainly point to an incipient Gnosticism. But had the writer of the Pastoral Epp. been combating the Gnosticism of the 2d century, or of the name of Paul, to stigmatize the gnostic systems, he would certainly have used much stronger expressions to describe their character and influence.

It should be observed that the false teachers described in 2 Tim 3 6–9.13, as well as in other places in these epp., were persons who taught that the Mosaic Law was binding upon all Christians. They laid stress upon rabbinic myths, upon investigations and disputations about genealogies and specific legal requirements of the OT. What they taught was a form of piously sounding doctrine assuming to be Christian, but which was really rabbinism.

"For a pseudo-Paul in the post-apostolic age—when Church had become more and more a legal and undenominational institution in the gentile Christian Church—have invented a description of and vigorously to have opposed the Paul. I did not exist for any of his own age or culture, for a religious system who were without parallel in the earlier epp. of Paul, which are themselves a 'diplome without apparent purpose or meaning' (Zahn, Intro., II. 117). "A comparison of the statements in these epp. about various kinds of false doctrine, and of those portions of the same that deal with the organization and officers of the conditions actually existing in the church, esp. the church of Asia Minor, at the beginning and during the course of the 2d cent., proves, just as clearly as do the external evidence, that they must have been written at least before the year 100. But this must not be considered as having been written during the first 20 or 30 years after Paul's death, because of the character of the references to persons, facts and conditions in Paul's life, and to his final history, and because of the impossibility on this assumption of discovering a plausible motive for their forgery. Consequently the claim that they are post-Pauline, and contain matter which is un-Pauline, is to be treated with the greatest suspicion" (Zahn, op. cit., I. 118).

The third difficulty alleged against the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epp. is the language employed, which is said to be, to a large extent, different from that in the accepted epp. The facts in regard to this matter are that in 1 Tim there are 82 words not found elsewhere in OT or NT, and in Tit there are 33. But, while the total of such words in both epp. is 165, the number, large though it appears, may be compared with the words used only once in the other epp., of Paul, of Rom, I Cor, 3 Cor. Gal 1, Phil 1, Col. Eph, 2 Thess. I Tim, 1, 2 Tim, 2 Pet. Out of 764 words of this description are 627 in number. So nothing can be made of it. The fact, therefore, that 100 of the 165 word, far outweighs the majority of the Pastoral Epp., that can safely he alleged as proof against their Pauline authorship. The special subjects treated in these epp. required adequate language, a requirement, and the claim which was not refused in the case of any ordinary author.

The objection to the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals, based upon the dissimilarity of diction in them and in Eph. Phil., etc., is, to exist when the theory is no longer persisted in, that the nucleus of the Pastoral Epp. was composed during the Roman impri:rr鹳, which, according to this theory, ended, not in the apostle's release, but in his execution. The fact that he was well known to be a devoted friend of the Roman government, and that on important matters which were troubling the church at this time, he made it essential that he should, to a large extent, use a different vocabulary.

The "most decisive" of all the arguments against the Pauline authorship is that "the Christianity of the Pastoral Epp. is not the Christ." (McGiffert, A History of Christianity, 402). "For the most part," Dr. McGiffert writes, "there is no trace whatever of the great fundamental truth of Paul's gospel death unto the flesh life in the Spirit." Now this is not so, for the passages which Dr. McGiffert himself gives in a footnote (2 Tim 1 9–11; 2 11 ff; Tit 3 4–7), as well as other references, do most certainly refer to this very respect of the Church. For example, "the visions in the Church" in 2 Tim 2 contains these words, "If we died with him [Christ], we shall also live with him." What is this but the great truth of the union of the Christian believer with Christ? The believer is one with Christ in His death, one with Him now as He lives and reigns. This section, therefore, which is "most decisive of all," is one which is not true in point of fact. Dr. McGiffert also charges the author of the Pastoral Epp. as being "one who understood by resurrection nothing else than the resurrection of the flesh and body" (p. 404). But Our Lord was raised from the dead, but how very unjust this accusation is, is evident from such a passage as 1 Tim 3 16, "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness—He who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached among the nations, believed on in the world, received up in glory.

Charges of this nature are unsupported by evidence, and are of the kind on which Dr. A. S. Peake (A Critical Intro to the NT, 71) bases his rejection of the Pauline authorship—except for a Pauline nucleus—that he "feels clear." More than an epigraph of this sort is needed.

The theory that the Pastoral Epp. are based upon genuine letters or notes of Paul to Timothy and Titus is thus advocated by Peake, McGiffert, Moffatt and many others. It bears very hard upon 1 Tim. "In 1 Tim not a single verse can be indicated which closely bears upon the "doctrine, legal and moral history, and because of the impossibility on this assumption of discovering a plausible motive for their forgery. Consequently the claim that they are post-Pauline, and contain matter which is un-Pauline, is to be treated with the greatest suspicion" (Zahn, op. cit., I. 118).

In regard to 1 Tim he writes, "It is very likely that there are scattered fragments of the original ep. in 1 Tim, as for instance in ver 23. But it is difficult to find anything which we can be confident was written in 2 Tim. This was so, if any kind of author or commentator.

The objections to the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals, based upon the dissimilarity of diction in them and in Eph. Phil., etc., is, to exist when the theory is no longer persisted in, that the nucleus of the Pastoral Epp. was composed during the Roman imprisonment, which, according to this theory, ended, not in the apostle's release, but in his execution. "For the most part," Dr. McGiffert writes, "there is no trace whatever of the great fundamental truth of Paul's gospel death unto the flesh life in the Spirit." Now this is not so, for the passages which Dr. McGiffert himself gives in a footnote (2 Tim 1 9–11; 2 11 ff; Tit 3 4–7), as well as other references, do most certainly refer to this very respect of the Church. This section, therefore, which is "most decisive of all," is one which is not true in point of fact. Dr. McGiffert also charges the author of the Pastoral Epp. as being "one who understood by resurrection nothing else than the resurrection of the flesh and body" (p. 404). But Our Lord was raised from the dead, but how very unjust this accusation is, is evident from such a passage as 1 Tim 3 16, "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness—He who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached among the nations, believed on in the world, received up in glory.

The theory that the Pastoral Epp. are based upon genuine letters or notes of Paul to Timothy and Titus is thus advocated by Peake, McGiffert, Moffatt and many others. It bears very hard upon 1 Tim. "In 1 Tim not a single verse can be indicated which closely bears upon the
do not suit the Apostolic age. These objections have been already referred to.

The real difficulty, as Dr. Peake (A Critical Intro., 68), is that "the old energy of thought and expression is gone, and the greater smoothness and continuity in the sentence of Christian men and the lack of grip and of continuity in the thought." Dr. Peake well and truly remarks that this does not admit of detailed proof; lack of grip and lack of continuity of thought are not the characteristics of such passages as 1 Tim 1 9–17, a passage which has been held to have nothing in it acknowledged Pauline Epp.; and there are many other similar passages, e.g. Tit 2 11–3 7.

What must be said of the dulness of the intelligence which has been made new for the Christian church as a whole, if they could thus let themselves be imposed upon by epp. which purported to be Paul's, but which were not written by him at all, but were the enlargement of a Pauline nucleus? Can it be believed that the church of the 20th cent., the church of the martyrs, was in such a state of mental decrepitude as to receive epp. which were spurious, so far as the greater portion of their contents is concerned? And can it be believed that this idea, so recently originated and so destitute of proof, is an adequate explanation of epp. which have been received as Pauline from the earliest times?

When placed side by side with sub-apostolic writings like the Didache, Clem. Rom., Polycarp and other fragments of early Church literature, it returns upon one with almost every sentence that the Pastors are astonishingly superior" (Moffatt, The Historical NT, 596). Godet, quoted by R. D. Shaw (The Pauline Epp., 441), writes, "When one has had enough of the numerous amplifications of Clement of Rome, of the ridiculous inanities of Barnabas, of the general oddities of Ignatius, of the well-meaning commonplace of Polycarp, of the intolerable verbiage of Hermas, and of the nameless pair of pseudo-apocryphal Didache, and has passed promptly, in the first decade of the 20th cent., reverts to our Pastoral Epp., one will measure the distance that separates the least striking products of the apostolic literature from what has been preserved to us as most eminent in the ancient patriarchic literature."

In the case of some modern critics, the interpolation hypothesis is "their first and last appeal, the easy solution of any difficulty that presents itself to their imaginations. Each writer feels free to give a kaleidoscope turn, and then records with blissful confidence what are called the latest results. . . . The whole method postulates that a writer must always preserve the same dull monotone or always confine himself to the same transcendental theme. He may get something at once; having had his vision and his dream, he must henceforth be like a star and dwell apart. . . . To be stereotyped is his only salvation. . . . On such principles there is not a writer of note, and there never has been a man in public life, or a student in the stream of a progressive science, large parts of whose sayings and doings could not be proved to be by some one else" (Shaw, The Pauline Epp., 48).

The Text and Order.—In regard to the date of these epp., external and internal evidence alike go to show that they belong to practically the same period. The dates of their The Epistles composition are separated from each other by not more than three or four years; and the dates of each and all of them must be close to the Neroic persecution (64 AD). If Paul was executed 67 AD (see Ramsay, St. Paul, 396), there is only a short interval of time between his execution and the writing of 67, that is, a period of some 5 or 6 years, during which his later travels took place, and when the Pastoral Epp. were written. "Between the three letters there is an affinity of language, a similarity of thought, and a likeness of errors combated, which prevents their referring any of them to a period much earlier than the others" (Zahn, Intro., II, 37).

The order in which they were written must have been 1 Tim, Tit, 2 Tim. It is universally acknowledged that 2 Tim is the very last of Paul's letters, and the internal evidence of the other two seems to point out 1 Tim as earlier than Tit.

To sum up, the evidence of the early reception of the Pastoral Epp, as Pauline is very strong. The confident denial of the genuineness of these letters— which has been made now for several generations more positively than in the case of any other Pauline epp.—has no support from tradition. . . . Traces of their circulation in the church before Marcion's time are clearer than those which can be found for Rom and 2 Cor [Zahn, op. cit., II, 52]. The internal evidence shows that all three are from the hand of one and the same writer, a writer who makes many personal allusions of a nature which it would be impossible for a forger to invent. It is generally allowed that the personal passages in 2 Tim 1 15–18; 4 9–22 are genuine. But if this is so, then it is not possible to cut and carve the epp. into fragments of this kind. Objectives dating only a century back are all too feeble to overturn the consistent and coherent thought which for four centuries has been corroborated as this by their reception in the church, dating from the very earliest period. The Pastoral Epp. may be used with the utmost confidence, as having genuinely come from the hand of Paul.

PATARA, pa'tär-a (τὰ Ἡλεῖα, τὰ Pátara): A coast city of ancient Lycia, from which, according to Acts 21 15, Paul said he was to sail. Because of its excellent harbor, many of the coast trading ships stopped at Patara, which therefore became an important and wealthy port of entry to the towns of the interior. As early as 440 BC autonomous coins were struck there; during the 4th and the 3d cents. the coinage was interrupted, but was again resumed in 168 BC when Patara joined the Lycian league. Ptolemy Philadelphus enlarged the city, and changed its name to Arsinóe in honor of his wife. The real trading center was called Patara, but esp. for its celebrated oracle of Apollo which is said to have spoken only during the six winter months of the year. Among the ruins there is still to be seen a deep pit with circular steps leading to a seat at the bottom; it is supposed that the pit is the place of the oracle. In the history of early Christianity, Patara took but little part, but it was the home of a bishop, and the birthplace of St. Nicholas, the patron saint of the sailors of the E. Though born at Patara, St. Nicholas was a bishop and saint of Myra, a neighboring Lycian city, and there he is said to have been buried. Gedimian is the modern name of the ruin. The walls of the ancient city may still be traced, and the foundations of the temple and castle and other Patmos, pattrhmos (ταυτομον, <παθομον, <μακροθυμια, makrothumia): "Patience" implies suffering, enduring or waiting, as a determination of the will and not simply under necessity. As such it is an essential Christian virtue to the exercise of which there are many exhortations. It is called "wait patiently" for God, to endure uncomplainingly the various forms of sufferings, wrongs and evils that we meet with, and to bear patiently injustices which we cannot remedy and provocations we cannot remove.

The word "patience" does not occur in the OT, but we have "patiently" in Ps 40 1 as the tr of hâdâd, "to wait," "to expect," which word frequently expresses the idea, esp. that of waiting on God; in Ps 37 7, 11, "patiently" (wait patiently) is the tr of hâdâd, one of the meanings of which is "to wait" or "to hope for" or "to expect" (cf Job 36 14); "patient" occurs (Eccl 7 8) as the tr of 'erekh râbâ, "long of spirit," and (Job 6 11) that I should be patient (ha'dîrakh nepheš). Cf "impatient" (Job 21 4).

"Patience" occurs frequently in the Apoc. esp. in Ecclus, e.g. 2 14; 16 13; 17 24; 41 2 (hupomone); 5 11 (makrothumia); 29 8 (makrothumêth, RV "long patience") in Wsd 2 19, the Gr word is anezêkakia.

Patience is often hard to gain and to maintain, but, in Rom 5 5, God is called "the God of patience" (ARV "steadfastness") as being able to grant that grace to those who look to Him and depend on Him for it. It is in reliance on God and acceptance of His will, with trust in His goodness, wisdom and faithfulness, that we are enabled to endure and to hope steadfastly. See also God.

Patmos, patmos (Πάτμος, Πάτμος: It was a small island between the Greek mainland and the eastern coast of Asia Minor, and was the scene of St. John's exile. The Greek name is transliterated as Patmos in the New Testament. The island was a well-known destination for exiles of the Roman Empire, and was often used as a place of refuge for those who were persecuted for their faith.

Patmos was a small island located in the Aegean Sea, between the coast of Asia Minor and the Greek mainland. It was a common destination for exiles and was famous for its landscape and seclusion. The island was also known for its connection to the Apostle John, who is believed to have written the Book of Revelation while on Patmos.

The Book of Revelation is a key text in interpreting Patmos, as it provides insight into the island's historical and cultural significance. In the book, John writes about his vision of the end of the world and the establishment of God's kingdom, and Patmos is mentioned as a place where the final judgment will occur.

Patmos is also associated with the archangel Michael, who is said to have appeared to John on the island. The island is remembered as a place of spiritual renewal and is celebrated as a site of Christian pilgrimage.

Patmos is a place of both historical and spiritual significance, and its connection to the Apostle John and the Book of Revelation makes it an important location in the study of Western literature. The island's natural beauty and isolation have made it a popular destination for both tourists and scholars, and it continues to play a role in the ongoing dialogue between the past and the present.
PATTERNS, pattern (πατέρος, ἀβαθῆς, "model," μορφή, "a vision" or "view"): The OT words trv "pattern" do not necessarily indicate a drawing such as a modern constructor begins with, or the patterns made from these drawings for the guidance of workmen. In Ex 25:9 the word "idea" or "suggestion" might possibly have indicated more distinctly than "pattern" what Moses received in regard to the building of the tabernacle, etc. It is doubtful if any architect's drawing was ever made for the temple. It is not the custom in Pal and Syria today to draw from any pattern more concrete than an idea. A man who wants a house calls the builder and says he wants to build so many rooms of such and such dimensions, for example, a court 10 draks (arm's lengths) wide and 15 draks long, made of sunshine and plastered inside and out. With these meager instructions the builder starts. The details are worked out as the building proceeds. When a piece of iron or brass work is to be made, the customer by gestures with his hands outlines the form the piece should take. "I want haik wo haik" ("thus and thus"), he says, and leaves the metal worker to conceive the exact form. It is probable that directions similar to these were given by David to Solomon. "Then David gave the charges to his son Solomon [his conception] of the porch of the temple," etc (1 Ch 22:11). The above does not apply to Gr and Rom work in Syria. Their workmen, probably mostly native, were trained to work from models. Williams in his "Architect, January, 1913, says of the works at Baalbek and Palmyra, "There is a machine-like resemblance betokening slavish copying." At the present time native workmen coming under the influence of foreigners are beginning to work from models and plans, but they show little tendency to create models of their own.

Three Gr words have been trv in the NT: τός, τίπος, "type," occurs in Tit 2:7 and He 8:5. In the first instance RV reads "ensample," ὄρθος, ὑποτάσσει, "outline," has been similarly trv in 1 Tim 1:16, but "pattern" in 2 Tim 1:13. In He 9:24 AV ἀντικόμιον, ἀντίλυπνος, is rendered "like in pattern." ἵδεοςώμα, ἡπόδειγμα, AV "pattern," is trv in AV "copy" (He 8:5), "copies" (He 9:23). At the time of the trv of AV the word "pattern" meant either the thing to be copied or the copy. JAMES A. PATCH

PATROCLUS, pa-tro'klus (Πατρόκλος, Πατροκλός): The father of the Syrian general Nicanor (2 Mace 8:9).

PATROBAS, pa-trō'bas (Πατρόβας, Πατρόβας): The name of a member of the Christian community at Rome to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16:14). The name is an abbreviation of "Patrobas." There was a wealthy freedman of Nero of the same name who was put to death by Galba (Tac. Hist. 1:49; 1:90). Patrobas of St. Paul may have been a dependent of his.

1. The Acts that the view of Sir W. M. Ramsay in general is accepted as to the trustworthiness of Luke, whose authorship of the Acts is accepted and proved by Harnack (Op. Cit. 1908; The Acts of the Apostles, tr by Wilkinson, 1909; Neue Untersuch. zur Ap., 1911; The Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels, tr by Wilkinson, 1911). The proof need not be given here. The same batting appears in the "we" sections and the rest of the book. Even Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 311) admits the Lukan authorship though dating it in 100 AD instead of 60-62 AD, against Harnack. The Acts is written independently of the Epp. of Paul, whether early or late, and supplements in a wonderful way the incidental references in the epp., though not without lacunae and difficulties.

2. Pauline authorship. See the articles on each epp. for detailed criticism. It is here assumed that the Ep. to the He was not written by Paul, though Pauline in point of view.

3. The Thirteen Epistles. One cannot stop to prove every statement in an article like this, else a large article would be needed. Criticism is not an infallible science. One can turn easily from the Hatch-Van Manen art. on "Paul" in E B (1902) to the Maclan art. on "Paul the Apostle" in the I Vol (1909). Van Manens part of the one denies all the thirteen, while Maclans says: We shall not hesitate to make the thirteen epp. as genuine. It is certain that Paul wrote more epp., or letters, as Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 225) insists on calling all of Pauls epp. Certainly Philem is a mere letter, but it is difficult to say as much about Rom. Deissmann (St. Paul, 22) admits that portions of Rom are like an epistolary letter. At any rate, when Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 64-82) carefully justifies the Pauline authorship of both 1 and 2 Thess, it is clear that the case against them cannot be very strong, esp. as Moffatt stands out against the genuineness of Eph. (op. cit., 333) and the Pastoral Epp. (p. 414).

Bartlel, who was once at a loss to know what to do with the Pastoral, on the theory that Paul was not released from the Roman imprisonment (Apostolic Age, 1899, 200), is now quite willing to face the new facts set forth by Lightfoot (Op. Cit. 146), even if it means the admission of a second Roman imprisonment, a view that Bartlel had opposed. He now makes for the "fresh approach" from the side of experience, by men who are in touch with the realities of human nature in all its aspects, from the study of the historical background of society in the early Roman empire, that has renovated the study of them and taken it out of the old rut of dry speculation, and has moved in the most part in modern times" (Epres, January, 1913, 29). Here Bartlel, again, now eloquently presents the view of common-sense criticism as seen by the practical missionary better than anyone else. The freshness of new approaches, the vitality and concentration of a professor's chair, though he passes to note as an exception Professor P. Gardin's The Religious Experience of St. Paul (1912), once more (Epres, January, 1913, 30): "In the recovery of a true point of view a vital element has been added, situated on the basis of a unique experience, but also of practical instinct, the outgrowth of sympathy with living men of other types of thinking. When the breeze has moved anew in the light of this idea, half their difficulties disappear." One cannot adopt this attempt to make the occasional emphasis on "letters" rather than "epistles," and his undue depreciation of Paul's intellectual caliber and culture as being mere Armo than Origen (Acts 12, 6), in order to see the force of this contention for proper understanding of the social environment of Paul. Against Van Manens "historical Paul" who wrote nothing, he pleads the "historic Paul" who possibly wrote all thirteen. There is really no trouble except with the letters to Timothy and Titus, and even there the difficulties are perhaps not quite so great as many of our specialists admit (St. Paul, Epistles). Deissmann demes sharply that Paul was an "obscurantist" who corrupted the gospel of Jesus, "the drops of doctrinal study of St. Paul, mostly in the tired brains of gifted amateurs" (p. 4). But A. Schweitzer boldly and boldly pleads the case for Paul against his Jesus. It is the "exclusively Jewish eschatological" which Paul and his interpreters, 1913, to conception that Christ's gospel that furnishes Schweitzer's silvered (The Quest of the Historical Jesus). Thus he will be able to explain the obliteration of the mission. Schweitzer has moved through Paul. To do that Schweitzer plows his way from Gregorii to Holtzmann and Farm, and all are afloat in the wilderness. He is positive that his eschatological discovery will rescue Paul and some of his epp. from the criticism and with an Menne, to whose arguments modern criticism has nothing solid to offer, and the myterion means for any of Schweitzer ought to be thankfully received (ib. 249).

(2) Lightfoot's Grouping of the Acts (cf. Hib. Essays, 224).—There is doubt as to the position of Gal. Some advocates of the South-Galatian theory make it the very earliest of Paul's Epp., even before the Jesus Conference in Acts 15. So Emmet, Comm. on Gal (1912), ix, who notes (Preface) that his comm. is the first to take this position. But the North-Galatian view still has the weight of authority in spite of Ramsey's powerful advocacy in his various books (see Hist. on Gal, 1911), by Lightfoot. Even Moffatt, Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 90 ff. Hence Lightfoot's grouping is still the best to use.

(a) First Group: 1 and 2 Thess. from Corinth, 52-53 AD. Harnack's view that 2 Thess is addressed to a Jewish Christian community in the form of a correction and while 1 Thess is addressed to a gentile church is accepted by Lake (Earlier Epp. of St. Paul, 1911, 83 ff), but Frame (ICC, 1912, 54) sees no need for this hypothesis. Milligan is clear that 1 Thess precedes 2 Thess (Comm., 1908, xxxix) and is the earliest of Paul's Epp. (p. xxxvi). The accent on eschatology is in accord with the position of the early disciples in the opening chapters of Acts. They belong to Paul's stay in Corinth recorded in Acts 18.

(b) Second Group: 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal, Rom, 55-55 AD. This is the great doctrinal group, the four chief epp. of Baur. They turn about the Judaizing controversy which furnishes the occasion for the expansion of the doctrine of justification by faith in opposition to the legalistic conception of Judaizing Christians from Jesus (Acts 15:1-3; Gal 2:1-10). The dates of these epp. are not perfectly clear. 1 Cor was written shortly before the close of Paul's 3 years' stay at Ephesus (Acts 20:16-11; 1 Cor 9:19, Acts 20:1, 2) a few months later while he was in Macedonia (2:13; 7:5:18; 16:24). Rom was written from Corinth (16:23; Acts 20:21) and sent by Phoebe of Cenchreae (Rom 16:1). The integrity of Rom is challenged by some who deny that it has moved from the part of the 16 belongs to the ep. (13:348).
gives an able, but unconvincing, presentation of the arguments for the addition of the chapter by a later hand. Deissmann (St. Paul, 19) calls Rom 16 ‘a little bit of a false addition.’ Von Soden (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 78) easily justifies the presence of Rom 16 in the Ep. to the Rom: ‘These greetings, moreover, were certainly intended by St. Paul to create bonds of friendship between the Roman Christians and the Rom community, and to show throughout that he had not written to them quite exclusively in his own name.’ A common-sense explanation of Paul’s personal ties in Rome is the fact that as the center of the world’s life the city drew people thither from all parts of the earth. So today many a man has friends in New York or London who has never been to either city. A much more serious controversy arises as to the integrity of 2 Cor. Semler took 2 Cor 10–13 to be a separate and later ep., because of its difference in tone from 2 Cor 1–8, but Hausrath put it earlier than chs 1–9, and made it the letter referred to in 2 4. He has been followed by many scholars like Schmiedel, Cone, McGiffert, Bacon, Moulton, Strong, Reuss, Weiss, Soden, Thiersch, Sabatier, and others. Weiss (Christian History, 1915, 121) accepts the partition-theory of 2 Cor heartily: ‘It may be shown with the highest degree of probability that this letter has come down to us in 2 Cor 10–13, and Paul by At. and Th. has restored the theory that the change in tone is a climax to the disobeient element of the church is still maintained with force and justice by Klopper, Zahn, Bachmann, Denney, Bernard, A. Robertson, Weiss, Menzies. The determination of Gal turns on its date. Lightfoot (loc. cit.) argues for Corinth, since it was probably written shortly before Rom. But Moffatt (Intro, 102) holds tentatively to Ephesus, soon after Paul’s arrival there from Galatia. So he gives the order: Ga. 1 and 2, Rom. In so much doubt it is well to follow Lightfoot’s logical argument. Gal leads naturally to Rom, the one hot and passionate, the other cold and contemplative, but both on the same general theme.

(c) Third group: Phil, Philem, Col, Eph. Date 61–63, unless Paul reached Rome several years earlier. This matter depends on the date of the coming of Festus to succeed Felix (Acts 24 27). It was once thought to be 60 AD beyond any doubt, but there are many doubts and uncertainties. See “Chronology,” III, 2, (2), below. At any rate these four epp. were written during the first Rom imprisonment, assuming that he was set free.

But it must be noted that quite a respectable group of scholars hold that one or all of these epp. were written from Caesarea (Schults, Thiersch, Meyer, Haurratz, Sabatier, Reuss, Weiss, Haupt, Spitta, McPherson, Hicks). But the arguments are more specious than convincing. See Hort, Rom and Eph, 101–109. There is a growing opinion that Philim. Col and Eph were written from Ephesus during a public imprisonment in Paul’s stay of 3 years there. So Deissmann (Light from the New East, 299; St. Paul, 107; St. Lisco (Vindola Sanctorum, 1906); M. Albertz (Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1910, 551 ff.); B. W. Bacon (Journal of Bib. Lit., 1910, 181 ff.). The strongest argument for this position is that Paul apparently did not know personally the receipt of Eph 11. But this objection need not apply if the so-called Epheisan Ep. was a circular letter and if Paul did not visit Colossae and Laodicea before his last letters at Ephesus. The theory is more attractive at first than on reflection. It throws this group before Rome—a difficult view to concede.

But even so, the order of these epp. is by no means clear that Col, Phil, Rom, and Eph were sent together. Tyndicus was the bearer of Col (4 7f) and Eph (6 21f). Onesimus bore Philem (vs 10 13) and was also the companion of Tyndicus to Colossae (Col 4 9). So these three epp. are from Rome, and it is commonly assumed that Phil was the last of the group of four, and hence later than the other three, because Paul is balancing life and death (Phil 1 21f) and is expecting to be set free (1 25), but he has the same expectation of freedom when he writes Philem (ver 22). The reference at Eph 1 1 (Phil 2 20) has to be explained on either hypothesis. Moffatt (Intro, 159) is dogmatic, ‘as Phil was certainly the last letter that he wrote,’ ruling out of court Eph, not to say the later Pastoral Epp. But this conclusion given Moffatt trouble with the Ep. to the Laodiceans (Col 4 16) which he can only call ‘the enigmatic reference’ and cannot follow Rutherford (St. Paul’s Epp. to Colossae and Laodicea, 1908) in identifying the Laodicean Ep. with Eph, as indeed Marcion seems to have done. But the notion that Phil. is the last of one church (hence without personalities) still holds the bulk of modern opinion.

Von Soden (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 294) is as dogmatic as Wrede or Van Manen: ‘All which has hitherto been the absence of Luke (Phil 2 20) has to be explained on either hypothesis. Moffatt (Intro, 159) is dogmatic, ‘as Phil was certainly the last letter that he wrote,’ ruling out of court Eph, not to say the later Pastoral Epp. But this conclusion given Moffatt trouble with the Ep. to the Laodiceans (Col 4 16) which he can only call ‘the enigmatic reference’ and cannot follow Rutherford (St. Paul’s Epp. to Colossae and Laodicea, 1908) in identifying the Laodicean Ep. with Eph, as indeed Marcion seems to have done. In addition to this, it is also possible that Paul had been in Rome. But he seems to have been there only briefly, and it is not clear what he accomplished. Some scholars argue that he was there to visit the Roman Christians, while others believe that he was there to prepare for his first imprisonment. However, the evidence for these two positions is not conclusive, and it is likely that Paul’s visit to Rome was a complex event with multiple purposes.

Moffatt (Intro, 102) holds tentatively to Ephesus, soon after Paul’s arrival there from Galatia. So he gives the order: Ga. 1 and 2, Rom. In so much doubt it is well to follow Lightfoot’s logical argument. Gal leads naturally to Rom, the one hot and passionate, the other cold and contemplative, but both on the same general theme.

(d) Fourth group: 1 Tim, Tit, 2 Tim The Pastoral Epp. are still hotly disputed, but there is a growing willingness in Britain and Germany to make a place for them in Paul’s life. Von Soden, though he doubts the authorship of the epp. as well, has suggested that they may have been written by St. Paul (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 310). He finds no room for the heresy here combated, or for the details in Paul’s life, or for the linguistic peculiarities in Paul’s style. But he sees a “literary fealty” in this group that binds them together and separates them from Paul. Thus tersely he puts the case against the Pauline authorship.

Moffatt argues for the sub-Pauline environment and sub-Pauline atmosphere of the epp. He places the epp. within an early ecclesiasticism (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 410 ff.). He thrusts aside the personal details and argues that the epp. give merely the tendency of early Christianity (Ueber Aufgabe und Methode der Sagen. NT Theologie, 1915, 557). The Hacht-Van Manen art. in EB admits only that “the Pastoral Epp. occupy themselves chiefly with the various affairs of the churches within ‘Pauline circles.’”

Moffatt has a vigorous attack on these letters in EB, but he almost entirely ignores the external evidence, while he has something to say to the internal evidence which immediately demands our attention” (Knowing, Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, 3d ed, 1911, 129). Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 414) holds that the Pastoral Epp. came from one pen, but the personality and motives are not the same. Many critics who reject the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epp. admit the personal details in 2 Tim 1 14–18; 4 9–22 are not on a par with those in The Acts of Paul and Thekla in the 2d cent. Many critics who reject the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epp. admit the personal details in 2 Tim, but it is just in such matters that Moffatt places the evidence. To admit these fragments is logically to admit the whole (Chs 1–11). As Moffatt sees (Intro, 414), however much he seeks to avoid the “pseudo-Pauline” name, he overdoes the thing. The Epistle against Simon Magus (Acts 8 9–24) is, Moffatt argues, “a Christian form of tarsusier,” and “a further effort to maintain the rigid opposition of the Magi and their devotional establishment, that prince who had sought to claim apostolic sanction for the expanding institutions and Doctrines of the early church” (ib. 415). The objection against these epp. is not new; it has been vigorously overdone. As a matter of fact, each of the other four groups of epp. has the same thing to say to it, and naturally so. Style is a function of the subject matter, and is as much a mark of the man, hence Mann, style changes with one’s youth. It would have been remarkable if all four groups had shown no change in vocabulary and style. The case of Shakespeare is quite pertinent, for the various groups of plays stand more or less apart. The Pauline Epistles to Philippi and Colossae juxtaposed present personal and ecclesiastical matters in a more or less reminiscence of vehemence than we meet with in the earlier epistles, but this situation is what one would reasonably expect. The "ecclesiastical organization" argument, as indicated by a maturing fact, "the organization in the Pastoral Epistles is not apparent, advanced beyond that of the church of the Philippian Christians in 16 AD" (Ramsay, *Expos. VII, viii, 17). The "gnosis" met by these epistles (1 Tim 6:20; Tit 1:14) developed types similar to the Ignatian Epistles of the 2nd cent. Indeed, Barist ("Historic Setting of the Pastoral Epistles," *Expos., January, 1913, 20) pointedly sees in these variations a Christian and "Christian Ecclesiology and Ramsay's "Historical Commentary on Titus," *Expos. VII, viii, 1) "one feels the subject has been lifted to a new level of reality and that much criticism between Bauer and Juliuscher is out of date and irrelevant." It is now shown that the Pastoral Epistles are not directed against Gnosticism of advanced type, but even of a more Jewish type (Tit 1:14) than that in Col. Ramsay (1 Tim 6:20, 1:263) sweeps this stock criticism aside as "from the wrong point of view." It fails to the ground, Lightfoot ("Note on the Heresy Committed in the Pastoral Epistles," *Bib. Essays, 415) had insisted on the Jesuit character of the Gnostic attack here. As a matter of fact, the main objection to these epistles is that they do not fit the Pauline type which breaks abruptly with Paul in Rome. But it is a false premise to assume that the Pastoral Epistles in Acts 26:20 predicted that he would never see the Epiphanes again and that he was urgent about his letters. Even in his Gospel before 2 Tim 4:21 (The Date of Acts and Synoptic Gospels), as late as 20, he may not have revisited Ephesus at all, but may have seen Timothy at Miletus also (1 Tim 1:3). Harnack frankly admits the acquisition and usefulness of Paul and thereby for the Pastoral Epistles. Blass (2d ed. of Apostolismus, 24) acknowledges the Pastoral Epistles as genuine. See further Pastoral Epistles.

(3) Paul's conception of his Epistles. — Assuming, therefore, the Pauline authorship of the thirteenth epw., it is the main character of the epistles, a contention which has 3dly emphasized. The epistles are the Church's and to are clearly intended. It is the Church's attempt to keep alive the distinctive character of a particular Christ and Christianity, his adaptation to varied situations. His grasp of world-problems and the eternal values of life. Paul wrote other epistles, as we know. In 1 Cor 15:10 on a clear point, and have now been known to us otherwise, earlier than 1 Cor. The use of "every epistle" in 2 Thess 3:17 naturally implies that Paul had written more than two epistles. It is not certain to what letter Paul refers in 2 Cor 4:2 most probably to one between 1 and 2 Cor., though, as already shown, some scholars find that letter in 2 Cor 10-13. More than one Paul (4:16) mentions an epistle addressed to the Church at Laodicea. This epistle is almost certainly that which we know as Eph. Indeed, at least two apocryphal epistles to the Laodiceans were written to supply this deficiency. As early as 2 Thess 2:2 forgery was at work to palm off, in Paul's name, "or by ep. as from us," to attack and pervert Paul's real views, whom Paul defends in the advanced epistle. This "inferior work" would be continued (Gregory, Canon and Text of the NT, 1907, 101), though, as Gregory argues, Paul's exposure here would have a tendency to put a stop to it and to put Christians on their guard to reject such apocryphal epistles as a mark of genuineness (2 Thess 3:17; 1 Cor 21:6; Gal 6:11; Col 4:18). This was all the more important since Paul evidently dictated his letters to amanuenses, as to Tertullus in the case of Rom 16:22. In the case of Philem (ver 19), Paul probably wrote the whole letter. We may be sure therefore that, if we had the other genuine letters of Paul, they would occupy the same general standpoint as the thirteenth now in our possession. The point to be noted, a matter of fact, "the organization in the Pastoral Epistles is not apparent, advanced beyond that of the church of the Philippian Christians in 16 AD" (Ramsay, *Expos. VII, viii, 17). The,epistles are directed against Gnosticism of advanced type, but even of a more Jewish type (Tit 1:14) than that in Col. Ramsay (1 Tim 6:20, 1:263) sweeps this stock criticism aside as "from the wrong point of view." It fails to the ground. Lightfoot ("Note on the Heresy Committed in the Pastoral Epistles," *Bib. Paul, the Apostle take to limit Paul's Epp. to the local and temporary sphere given them by Deismann.

(4) Development in Paul's Epp.—For Paul's gospel theology see last. Here we must stress the fact that all four groups of Paul's Epp. are legitimate developments from his fundamental experience of grace as conditioned by his previous training and later work. He met each new problem with the same basic truth that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, revealed to Paul on the way to Damascus. The reality of this great experience must here be assumed (see discussion later). It may be admitted that the Acts does not stand upon the same plane as the Pauline Epp. as a witness concerning Paul's conversion (Fletcher, The Conversion of St. Paul, 1910, 5). But even so, the Epp. amply confirm Luke's report of the essential fact that Jesus appeared to Paul in the same sense that He did to the apostles and 500 Christians (1 Cor 15 4-9). The revelation of Christ to Paul and in Paul (I,paul, en emoi, Gal 1 16) and the specific call connected therewith to preach to the Gentiles gave Paul a place independent of and on a par with the other apostles (1 16 ; 2 1-10). Paul's first preaching (Acts 9 20) "proclaimed Jesus as the Messiah, the Lord of God." This "primitive Paulinism" (Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, 1893, 113) lay at the heart of Paul's message in his sermons and speeches in Acts. Professor P. C. Crouse regards Luke as "careless" historian ("The Spirit's Instruct St. Paul in Acts," Cambridge Bib. Essays, 1909, 386), but he quite admits the central place of Paul's conversion, both in the Acts and the Epp. (ib; cf also The Religious Experience of St. Paul).

We cannot here trace in detail the growth of Paulinism. Let Wernle speak (Beginnings of Christianity, 1903, 1, 221) for us: "The decisive factor in the genius of St. Paul's theology was his personal experience, his conversion on the road to Damascus. This fact reappears in each of the groups of the Epp. It is the necessary implication in the apostolic authority claimed in 1 Thess 4 4-6; 2 Thess 1 2; 3 14. We might have claimed authority as apostles of Christ (1 Thess 2)."

For the second group we need only refer to 1 Cor 9 1 f and 15 1-11, where Paul justifies his gospel by the fact of having seen the risen Jesus. His self-deprecatio in ver 9 is amply balanced by the claims also to Cor 13 and Gal 1 1-2 for Paul's formal defense of his apostolic authority. The pleasantry in Rom 15 14 does not displace the claim in 15 16.23 f. In the third group note the great passage in Phil 3 12-14, where Paul pointedly alludes to his conversion: "I was laid hold of by Jesus Christ," as giving him the goal of his ambition, "that I may lay hold;" "I count not myself yet to have laid hold." This concentration of effort to come up to Christ's purpose in his life is the key to Paul's life and letters. "I press on," Phil 3 14. The dangers and difficulties were outlined in Eph 3 2-13: "How that by revelation was made known unto me the mystery, as I wrote before in few words, whereby, when ye read, ye can perceive my understanding in the mystery of Christ." In the fourth group he still recalls how Christ took pity on him, the blasphemer, the persecutor, the chief of sinners, and put him into the ministry, "that in me as chief might Jesus Christ show forth all his longsuffering, for an ensample of them that should hereafter believe on him unto eternal life." (1 Tim 1 16). He kept up the fight to the end (2 Tim 4 6 f), for the Lord Jesus stood by him (4 17), as on the road to Damascus. So the personal note of experience links all the epp. together. They were all preaching and world-to-wield Christ. Paul at the very start perceived that men are redeemed by faith in Jesus as the Saviour from sin through His atoning death, not by works of the Law (Acts 13 38 f). In the first group there are allusions to the "work of faith and labor of love and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 24) and Paul speaks of "election" (1 4) and "our gospel" (1 5) and the resurrection of Jesus (1 10). The Father, Son and Spirit cooperate in the work of salvation (2 Thess 2 13 f), which includes election, belief, sanctification, glorification. It is not necessary to stress the argument for the conception of salvation by faith in Christ, grace as opposed to works, in the second group. It is obviously present in the third and the fourth. We seem forced to the view that Paul's experience was revolutionary, not evolutionary. If we consider the whole history of Paul as it is disclosed to us in his letters, we are not forced to the conclusion that his was a catastrophic or explosive, rather than a slowly progressive personality." (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 1911, 32). "His gospel was included in his conversion, and it was meditation that made explicit what was thus implicit in his experience" (ib). This is not to say that there was no "spiritual development of St. Paul." (Matheson, 1890, 19). The growth of expression in the successive application of the fundamental Christian conception. The accent upon this or that phase of truth at different stages in Paul's career does not necessarily mean that the gospel is not his. The occasion has arisen for emphasis and elaboration.

In a broad generalization the first group of the epp. is eschatological, the second soteriological, the third Christological, and the fourth pastoral (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 22). But one must not get the notion that Paul did not have a full gospel of salvation in the first group, and did not come to the true motive of the person of Christ as Lord till the second, or understand the pastoral office till the fourth. See emphasis on Paul's work as pastor and preacher in 1 Thess 2 (first group), and the Lordship of Christ also (1 Thess 1 13 ; 2 Thess 1 1 ; 2 Thess 13 f), on a par with the Father.

There was a change of accent in each group on questions of eschatology, but in each one Paul cherishes the hope of the second coming of Christ up to the very end when he speaks of his own death. It is in his Lord's address to the Ephesians in all his epp., but he presses home the special phase of truth needed at the moment, always with proper balance and modification, though not in the form of a system of doctrine. In the first group he relieves the minds of the Thessalonian Christians from the misapprehension into which they had fallen concerning his position on the immediate coming of Christ. In the second group Paul vindicates the gospel of grace from the legalistic addition of Mithraism (as in Phil 3, where he quotes and deplores the saying of the Jews who sought to rob the Gentiles of their freedom by insisting that they become Jews as well as Christians. This ringing battle is echoed in Acts 15 and is the mightiest conflict of Paul's career. We hear echoes of it in Phil 3, but he had won his contention. In the third group the battle with error has shifted to the province of Asia, to the Lycus Valley, where a mystic mixture of Judaism (Essenism) and heathen mystery-religions and philosophies (incipient Gnosticism) was so rife in its appeal. This was the phase of the Gnosticism which combined with some aspects of Christianity. It is possible also that Mithraism was already a foe of Christianity. The central position and essential deity of Jesus Christ was challenged by these new cults and world-views, and Paul attacks them with marvelous skill in Col and Eph and works out in detail his teaching concerning the person of Christ.
with due emphasis on the soteriological aspects of Christ's work and on Christian life. Bruce (St. Paul's Contribution to Christianity) conceives that Paul gives us his entire conception of Christianity in the four great epp. of the second group, while B. Weiss (Bibl. Theol. of the NT) sees a more developed doctrine in the third group. He is in his prime in both groups. In the fourth group the same struggle lingers on with variations in Crete and even in Ephesus. The Jewish phase of the heresy is more decided (perhaps Pharisaiic), and recalls to some extent the Judaistic controversy in the second group. Paul's polemics against Judaism and Christianity has enemies within and without. He turns to young ministers as the hope of the future in the propagation of the gospel of the happy God. The fires have burned lower, and there is less passion and heat. The tone is now fiercer, now tender. The style is broken and reminiscent and personal, though not with the rush of torrential emotion in 2 Cor, nor the power of logic in Gal and Rom. Each ep. fits into its niche in the group. Each group falls into proper relation to the stage in Paul's life and justify reveals the changes of thought and feeling in the great apostle. It is essential that one study Paul's Epp. in their actual historical order if one wishes to understand the mind of Paul. Scholars are not agreed, to be sure on this point. They argue about anything for nothing. Three methods of presenting Paul's Epp. in Robertson, Chronological NT (1904), and Moffatt, Historical NT (1901).

1. Criticism and psychological method of study is just as liable to presupposition and prejudice as the older categories of scholastic and dogmatic theology.

   "The focus of the picture may be displaced and its colors falsified by philosophical no less than by ecclesiastical spectators" (ib). Deissmann (St. Paul, 4:1) sympathizes with this protest against the infallibility of modern subjective criticism: "That really and properly is the task of the modern student of St. Paul: to come back from the paper St. Paul of our western libraries, Germanized, dogmatized, modernized, to the historic St. Paul, to penetrate Paulunianity, the historic Paul, to the Paul of ancient reality." He admits the thoroughness and the magnitude of the work accomplished in the 19th cent. concerning the literary questions connected with Paul's letters, but it is a "doctrinal ascerten" of the modern Paulunianism and farther astray." Deissmann conceives of Paul as a "hero of piety first and foremost," not as a theologian. "As a religious genius St. Paul's outlook is forward into a future of universal history." In this position, Zahn, Deissmann, see us to the pre-Baur time. Deissmann would like to get past all the schools of criticism, back to Paul himself.

   Baur started the modern critical attitude by his Pastoralbriefe (1855, p. 79), in which he remarked that there were only four epp. of Paul (Gal and 2 Cor, which could be

   Theory (1845) he expounded this thesis. He also rejected the Acts. From the four great epp. and from the pseudo-Clementine literature of the 2d cent., Baur argued that Paul and Peter were bitter antagonists. Peter and the other apostles were held fast in the grip of the legalistic conception of Christianity, a sort of Christianized Judaism which whenever convenient had resorted violently against this view, and became the exponent of gentle freedom. Christianity was divided into two factions, Jewish Christians (Petrinists) and gentle Christians (Paulinists). With this key

   Baur ruled out the other Pauline epp. and Acts as spurious, because they did not show the bitterness of this controversy. He called them "tendency" writings, designed to cover up the strife and to show that peace reigned in the camp. This arbitrary theory cut a wide swath for 50 years, and became a fetch with many scholars, but it is now dead. "It has been seen that it is bad criticism to make a theory on insecure grounds, and then to reject all the literature which contradicts it" (Mac-

   Zahn, 1911, 1915) contends that the perpetuation of the Baur standpoint in Moffatt's Intro to the Lit. of the NT is an anachronism: "We are no longer in the 19th cent. with its negations, but in the 20th cent. with its growing power of insight and the power of belief that springs therefrom. in Acts as authoritative. But these give glimpses of the historical Jesus quite as truly as the Pauline Epp., and should therefor be regarded by advocates of the mythical Jesus. So the pendulum swings back and forth. One school destroys the other, but the fact of Paul's personality remains. "The new start is one of such importance that we must distinguish the pre-Pauline from the post-Pauline Christianity," C. Anderson. ("Jesus and Paul," Cambridge Bib. Essays, 365) admits that Paul has the same eschatological outlook as Jesus, but also the same ethical interest. It is not "either . . . or," but both in each case. See a complete bibliography of the "Jesus and Paul" controversy in T. J. G. Machens' "Jesus and Paul" in Bib. and Theol. Studies (1912, 547 f). As Ramsay insists, we are now in the 20th cent. of insight and sanity, and Paul has come to his own. Even Wenke (Beginnings of Christianity, i, 163) sees that Paul is not the creator of Christianity, but the "great exegete" (179). According to Wrede's view, Paul is one of the creators of "Christ" as distinct from the Jesus of history (cf "Jesus or Christ," HJ, suppl., January, 1906). Wrede's object is to overthrow the view predominant in modern theology, that Paul loyally and consistently expounded and developed the theology of Jesus" (J. Weiss, Paul and Jesus, 1909, 2). J. Weiss in this book makes a careful reply to Wrede as others have done; cf A. Meyer, Jesus or Paul (1909), who concludes (p. 134) dramatically: "Paul—just one who points the way to Jesus and to God! See also Jülicher, Paulus und Jesus (1907); Kaltner, Jesus und Paulus (1906); Kölling, Die geistige Einwirkung der Person Jesu und Paulus (1906). The best reply to Wrede's arguments about the mystery-religion is found in articles in the Zeitschr. für die neutest. Spr. and Zeitschr. für die kathol. Theologie, 1912-13 (now in book form) by H. A. A. Kennedy on "St. Paul's Antithesis of the Religious," and Clemen on "The Position of Wrede is carried to its logical conclusion by Drews (Die Christus-Mythe, 1909), who makes Paul the creator of Christianity. W. B. Smith (Der vorchristliche Jesus, 1906) tries to show that "Jesus was a pre-Paulian myth of God." Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 255) sums the matter up thus: "Drews' thesis is not merely a curiosity; it indicates the natural limit at which the hypothesis of Paul's the advocates of comparative religion, when left to its own momentum, finally comes to rest. Schweitzer himself may be accepted as the best exponent of the rigid application of this view to Paul (Paul and His Interpreters, 1912) that he made to Jesus (The Quest of the Historical Jesus, 1910). He calls the glories in the history to answer the interpretation absurdities of Steck, Loman, Van Manen and Drews by showing that the eschatological conceptions of Paul in his epp. are primitive, not late, and belong to the 1st cent., not to the 2d (Paul and His Interpreters, 249). He thus claims to be the true pupil of Baur, though reaching conclusions utterly different. There is undoubtedly an element of truth in this contention of Schweitzer, but he loses his case, when he insists that nothing but eschatology must be allowed to figure. "The edifice constructed by Baur has fallen," he proclaims (p. viii), but he demands that in its place we allow the "exclusively Jewish-eschatological" (p. ix) interpretation. There he slips, and his theory will go the way of all others. We are reaching the same point in the Palestinian sect and the world-religion!" (Werne, Beginnings of Christianity, i, 159).

In his Paulus (1904), Wrede finds the explanation of Paul's theology in late Jewish apocalyptic views and in the oriental mystery-religions. Myrrhe (Die Religion des Judentums in NT Zeitalter, 1903) seeks to find in the "late Jewish apocalyptic" "conceptions from the Bab and the Irano-Zarathushtrian religions" (Schweitzer, Paul and His Myth of God). According to Wrede's view, Paul is one of the creators of "Christ" as distinct from the Jesus of history (cf "Jesus or Christ," HJ, suppl., January, 1906). Wrede's object is to overthrow the view predominant in modern theology, that Paul loyally and consistently expounded and developed the theology of Jesus" (J. Weiss, Paul and Jesus, 1909, 2). J. III. Chronology of Paul's Career.—There is not a single date in the life of Paul that is beyond dispute, though several are narrowed.

1. Schemes to a fine point, and the general course and relative proportion of events are clear enough. Luke gave careful data for the time of the birth of Jesus (Lk 2:1 f), for the entrance of the Baptist on his ministry (3:1 f), and the age of Jesus when he began his work (3:23), but he takes no such pains in the history of chronology. But we are left with a number of incidentallusions and notes of time which call for some discussion. For fuller treatment see Chronology of the NT. Garvie (Life and Teaching of Paul, 1910, 181) gives a comparative table of the views of Harnack, Turner, Ramsay, and Lipscomb for the events from the crucifixion of Christ to the close of Acts. The general scheme is nearly the same, differing only from one to four years here and there. Shaw (The Pauline Epp., xi) gives a good chronological scheme. Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 62 f) gives the theories of 23 scholars:

Let us look at the dates given by ten of this list:
The table shows very well the present diversity of opinion on the main points in Paul's life. Before expressing an opinion on the points at issue it is best to examine a few details. Paul himself gives some notes of time. He gives "after 3 years" (Gal 1:18) as the period between his conversion and first visit to Jerusalem, though he does not necessarily mean 3 full years. In Gal 2:1, Paul speaks of another visit to Jerusalem "after the space of 14 years." Then again Luke quotes him as saying to the Ephesian elders at Miletus that he had spent "3 years" at Ephesus (Acts 20:31). Thus he came before Paul's last visit and arrest in Jerusalem, and they do not embrace all the time between his conversion and arrest. There is also another note of time in 2 Cor 12:2, where he speaks in an enigmatic way of experiences of his "14 years" ago from the writing of this ep. from Macedonia on the third tour. This will take him back to Tarus before coming to Antioch at the request of Barnabas, and so overlaps a bit the other "14" above, and includes the "3 years" at Ephesus. We cannot, therefore, add these figures together for the total. But some light may be obtained from further details from Acts and the Epp.

(1) The death of Stephen.—Saul is "a young man" (Acts 7:58) when this event occurs. Like other Roman governors, the succession of his life was "due to the interregnum," i.e., the period of Aretas the Arabion, and not the Roman, has now control when Paul is writing. The likelihood is that Aretas did not get possession of Damascus till 37 AD, when Tiberius died and was succeeded by Caligula. It is argued by some that the exact date is "3 years after the death of Stephen" and "the year after the death of Stephen." The evidence shows that the city was not under the control of Aretas, but was attacked by a Bedouin chiefman who lay in wait for Paul before the city. That to me seems forced. Jos (Ant, XVIII, v, 3; vi, 3) at any rate is silent concerning the authority of Aretas over Damascus from 35-37 AD, but no coins or inscriptions show Rom rule over the city between 35 and 62 AD. Ramsay, however ("The Pauline Chronology," Pauline and Other Studies, 364), accepts the view of Marquardt (Römische Staatsalterth., I, 404 f.) that it was possible for Aretas to have had possession of Damascus before 37 AD. The flight from Damascus is the same year as the visit to Jerusalem, Paul's first after his conversion (Acts 9:26; Gal 1:18). If we knew the precise year of this event, we could subtract two or three years and reach the date of his conversion. Lightfoot in his Comm. on Gal gives 38 as the date of this first visit to Jerusalem, and 36 as the date of the conversion, taking "after 3 years" as a free way, but in his Bib. Essays, 221, he puts the visit 37 as the conversion in 34, and says "after 3 years must mean three whole years, or substantially so." Thus we miss a sure date again.

(2) The flight from Damascus.—Paul locates this humiliating experience (2 Cor 11:32 f.) when "the governor under Aretas the king guarded the city of the Damascenes, the Arabions, and not the Roman, has now control when Paul is writing." The likelihood is that Aretas did not get possession of Damascus till 37 AD, when Tiberius died and was succeeded by Caligula. It is argued by some that the exact date is "3 years after the death of Stephen" and "the year after the death of Stephen." The evidence shows that the city was not under the control of Aretas, but was attacked by a Bedouin chiefman who lay in wait for Paul before the city. That to me seems forced. Jos (Ant, XVIII, v, 3; vi, 3) at any rate is silent concerning the authority of Aretas over Damascus from 35-37 AD, but no coins or inscriptions show Rom rule over the city between 35 and 62 AD. Ramsay, however ("The Pauline Chronology," Pauline and Other Studies, 364), accepts the view of Marquardt (Römische Staatsalterth., I, 404 f.) that it was possible for Aretas to have had possession of Damascus before 37 AD. The flight from Damascus is the same year as the visit to Jerusalem, Paul's first after his conversion (Acts 9:26; Gal 1:18). If we knew the precise year of this event, we could subtract two or three years and reach the date of his conversion. Lightfoot in his Comm. on Gal gives 38 as the date of this first visit to Jerusalem, and 36 as the date of the conversion, taking "after 3 years" as a free way, but in his Bib. Essays, 221, he puts the visit 37 as the conversion in 34, and says "after 3 years must mean three whole years, or substantially so." Thus we miss a sure date again.

(3) The death of Herod Agrippa I.—Here the point of contact between the Acts (12:1-4; 19:9-23) and Jos (Ant, XIX, viii) is beyond dispute, since both record and describe in somewhat similar vein the death of this king. Jos says that at the time of his death he had already completed the 3d year of his reign over Galilee (Ant, XIX, 2271). He received this dignity soon after Claudius began to reign in 41 AD, so that makes the date 44 AD. He died after thePassover in that year (44), for Peter was imprisoned by him during that feast and ultimately Luke sandwiches the narrative about Herod Agrippina between the visit of Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem (Acts 11:29 f.) and their return to Antioch (12:25). He does not say that the events here recorded were exactly synchronous with this visit, for he says merely "about that time." We are allowed therefore to place this visit before 44 AD or after, just as the facts require. The mention of "elders" in Acts 11:30 instead of apostles (cf both in 15:4) may mean that the apostles are absent when the visit is made. After the death of James (12:1 f.) and Aretas (XIX, 217) we note that Peter "went to another place" (12:17). But the apostles are back again in Jerusalem in 15:4 f. Lightfoot (Bib. Essays, 216) therefore places the visit "at the end of 44, or in 45." Once more we have a fact that may fix the end date of 45. We add this to Paul. It is disputed also whether this 2d visit to Jerusalem according to Acts (9:26; 11:29 f.) is the same as the "again" in Gal 2:1. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 59) identifies the visit in Gal 2:1 with that in Acts 11:29 f., but Lightfoot (op. cit., 221) holds that it "must be identified with the third of the Acts" (15: 4 f.). In Gal 1 and 2 Paul is not recording his visits to Jerusalem, but showing his independence of the apostles when he met them in Jerusalem. There is no record that he ever saw Agrippa the first time. The occasion of the visit in Acts 11:29 f. The point of Lightfoot is well taken, but we have no point of contact with the outside history for locating more precisely the date of the visit of Gal 2:1 and Acts 15:4 f., except that it was after the first missionary tour of Acts 13 and 14.

(4) The first missionary tour.—Sergius Paulus is proconsul of Cyprus when Barnabas and Saul visit the island (Acts 13:7). The proconsul Paulus is mentioned in a 2d book, in a manner which suggests that of Solus (Hogarth, in CIL, VI, 31, 545, but, as no mention of his being proconsul is here made, it is probably earlier than that time. The Soloi inscription bears the date 55 AD, but Sergius was proconsul of Cilicia only between 51 and 52. Hence he may have been proconsul in 50 or the early part of 51 AD. It could not be later and may have been earlier.

(5) The first visit to Corinth.—The point to note here is that Galio becomes proconsul of Achaea (Acts 18:12). Paul has been apparently in Corinth a year and six months when Galio appears on the scene (Acts 18:11). Aquila and Priscilla had "lately come from Italy" (18:2) when Paul arrived there. They had been expelled from Rome by the emperor Claudius (18:2). On the arrival of Galio the Jews at once accuse Paul before him; he refuses to interfere, and Paul stays on for a while and then leaves for Syria with Aquila and Priscilla (18:18). Deissmann (St. Paul, Appendix, 1, "The Proconsulate of L. Junius Gallo") has shown beyond reasonable doubt that Galio, the brother of Seneca, became proconsul of Achaea about July, 51 AD (or possibly 52). On a stone found at Delphi, Galio is mentioned as proconsul of Achaea according to the inscription, but the stone mentions the fact that Claudius had been acclaimed imperator 26 times. By means of another inscription we get the 27th proclamation as imperator in connection with the dedication of an aqueduct on August 1, 52 AD. So thus the 26th time is before this date, some time in the earlier part of the winter. The reference (Acts 20 23) to the date of Paul’s arrival at Corinth is the terminus ad quem for the close of Paul’s two years’ stay in Corinth would be the early autumn of 52 AD, and more probably 51 AD. Hence the 2 Thessalonian Epp. cannot be later than this date. Before the close of 52 AD, and after the 21st of May, Paul made the tours of Corinth, Athens, and Ephesus, and then Paulinism. This is the beginning of the 21 missionary tour, the conference at Jerusalem, the first missionary tour, etc. Deissmann is justified in his enthusiasm on this point. He is positive that 51 AD is the date of the arrival of Gallo.

(6) Paul at Troas according to Acts 20 6 f.—On this occasion Luke gives the days and the time of year (Passover). Ramsay figures (St. Paul the Traveller, 259 f) that Paul had his closing service at Troas on Sunday evening and the party left early Monday morning. Hence he argues back to the Passover at Philippippi and concludes that the days as given by Luke will not fit into 56, 58, or 59 AD, but will suit 57. If he is correct in this matter, then we should have a definite year for the last trip to Jerusalem. But insufficiency of 55 AD to the writer, reaches the same conclusion. The conclusion is logical if Luke is exact in his use of this day in his passage. Yet Lightfoot insists on 58 AD, and Ramsay has the opportunity on this point. See Pauline and Other Studies, 627 f.

(7) Festus succeeding Felix.—When was Felix recalled? He was appointed procurator in 52 AD (Schrader, Jewish People in the Time of Christ, I, ii, 174). He was already ruler “many years” (Acts 24 10) when Paul appears before him in Caesarea. He holds on “two years” when he is succeeded by Festus (Acts 24 27). But in the Chronicle of Eusebius (Armenian text) it is stated that the recall of Felix took place in the last year of Claudius, or 54 AD. But this is clearly an error, in spite of the support given to it by Harnack (Chronologie d. Paulus), since Jos puts most of the rule of Felix in the reign of Nero (Ant, XX, viii, 1-9; BJ, II, xii, 8-14), not to mention the “many years” of Paul in the ministry of Felix. But Felix’s “many years” has been explained by Erbes in his Todestag Paulus und Petri, and is made perfectly clear by Ramsay in Pauline and Other Studies, 349 f. Eusebius overlooked the interregnum of 6 years between the death of Herod Agrippa I in 44 AD, and the first year of Herod Agrippa II in 50 AD. Eusebius learned that Festus came in the 10th year of Herod Agrippa II. Counting from 50 AD, that gives us 59 AD as the date of the recall of Felix. This date harmonizes with all the known facts. The great majority of scholars accept the date 60 for Festus; but they confess that it is only an approximate date, and there is no decisive argument for it” (Ramsay, Pauline and Other Studies, 351). For minute discussion of the old arguments see Nash, art. “Paul” in new Sch-Heiz Enc: Schrader, Hist of the Jewish People, I, ii, 182 f. But if Erbes and Ramsay are correct, we have at last a date that will stand. So then Paul sails for Rome in the late summer of 59 AD and arrives at his destination in the early spring (third winter, 59-60, Acts 20 11) and the year of the Pauline Epp., Paul’s death would come within a month or thereabouts of his arrival (March). The year 59 is thus a probable one for Paul’s arrival. See also, Deissmann, op. cit., 467 f. We have seen that Gallo came to Corinth in the summer of 51 AD (or 52), and Paul had been there a year and a half (Acts 18 11), leaving ample time in either case for the journey to Corinth to attend the assembly of the Christians. Hence the Pauline Epp. of Paul’s second visit to 51 AD, which is the beginning of the 21st missionary tour (Acts 16 1-6) as it was understood. The Corinthian conference was probably the same year, and the first missionary tour would come in the two or (three) preceding years 47 and 48 (48-49). The stay at Antioch (Acts 14 25) may have been of some length. So we come back to the end of 44 or beginning of 45 for the visit to Jerusalem in Acts 13 29 f. Before that comes the year in Antioch with Barnabas (11 26), the years that Paul spent in Arabia (Gal 1 17 f), Paul’s first appearance at the death of Stephen (Acts 7 58). These early dates are more conjectural, but even so the facts seem to indicate Paul’s 3 visits to the capital city of the empire. The year of his birth would then be between 1 and 5 AD, probably nearer 1. If so, and if his death was in 67 or 68 AD, his age is well indicated. He was “Paul the Aged” (Philem ver 9) when he wrote to Philemon in 62 AD. Rome in 66 AD.

IV. His Equipment.—Ramsay chooses as the title of ch ii, in his St. Paul the Traveller, the words “The Origin of St. Paul!” It is not possible to explain the work and teaching of Paul without a just conception of the forces that entered into his life. Paul himself is still woefully misunderstood by some. Thus A. Meyer (Jesus or Paul, 1909, 119) says: “In spite of all that has been said, there is no doubt that St. Paul, with his peculiar personality, with his tendency to reconcile geotic speculation and the rabbinic argument, has heavily encouraged the cause of Christianity. For many simple souls, and for many natures that are otherwise constituted than himself, he has barred the way to the simple truth of the Gospels. That is a serious charge against the man who claimed to be more than all the other apostles, and rightly, so far as we can tell (1 Cor 15 10), and who claimed that his interpretation of Jesus was the only true one (Gal 1 7-9). D. Moir (Paul and Paulinism, 1910, 70) minimizes the effect of Paulinism: “The majority of Paul’s distinctive conceptions were either misunderstood, or dropped, or modified, as the case might be, in the course of a few decades.” “Paulinism as a whole stood almost as far apart from the Christianity that followed it as from that which preceded it” (ib, 73). “The aim of some scholars seems to be to rob every great thinker of his originality” (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 1). Ramsay (Pauline and Other Studies, 3 f) boldly challenges the modern prejudice of some scholars against Paul by asking, “Shall we hear evidence or not?”. Every successive age must study afresh the life and work of Paul (ib, 27) if it would understand him. Deissmann (St. Paul, 3 f) rightly says that “Paul was the great power of the apostolic age.” Hence “the history of the Church in the beginnings of Christianity, sees St. Paul as first after Jesus.” Feine (Jesus Christus und Paulus, 1902, 298) claims that Paul grasped the essence of the Gospel and preached it “auf das Tiefste.” I own myself a victim to “the peculiar Paulinism” to use Ramsay’s phrase (Pauline and Other Studies,
27. In seeking to study the "shaping influences" in Paul's career (Alexander, The Ethics of St. Paul, 1910, 27), we shall be in error if we seek to explain everything that was important and influential in his life. He is what he is because of original endowments, the world of his day, and his experience of Christ Jesus. He had both essential and accidental factors in his environment, as described in Religion and Theology, 1910, 469 f. Let us note the chief factors in his religious development.

Geography plays an important part in any life. John the Baptist spent his boyhood in the hill country of Judaea in a small town called Enon. The city of Tarsus Jesus spent His boyhood in the town of Nazareth and then the wilderness of Tarsus Jesus grew up in a great city and spent his life in the great cities of the Roman empire. He makes little use of the beauty of nature, but he has a keen knowledge of men (of Robertson, Epochs in the Life of Paul, 12). Paul was proud of his great city (Acts 21 39). He was not merely a "citizen" of that city but a distinguished citizen. This fact shows that Paul's family had not just migrated from Judaea to Tarsus a few years before his birth, but had been planted in Tarsus as part of a colony with full municipal rights (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 101). He has the citizenship of Cilicia, then a part of the province of Syria, but it had the title of metropolis and was a free city, urbs libera (Pliny, NH, v. 27). To the ancient Or the city was his "fatherland" (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 228). Tarsus was situated on the river Cydnus, and in a wide plain with the hill country behind and the snow-covered Taurus Mountains in the distance. It was subject to malaria. Ramsay (ib, 117 f) from Gen 16 4 f holds that the early inhabitants were Greeks mingled with Orientals. East and West flowed together here. It was a Rom town also with a Jewish colony (ib, 169 f), constituting a city tribe to which Paul's family belonged. So then Tarsus was a typical city of the Gr-Rom civilization.

The religions of the times all met there in this great mart of culture also. Strabo (xiv, 673) says that Tarsus surpassed all the universities, such as Alexandria and Athens, in the study of philosophy and educational literature in general. "The city itself is in this, that the men of learning here are all native." Accordingly, he and others have made up a list of the distinguished men who resided at Tarsus in the late autumn of Gr learning: philosophers—of the Academy, of the Epicurean and Stoic schools—poets, grammarians, physicians. At Tarsus, one might say, "you breathed the atmosphere of learning" (Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 205). But Ramsay (Cities of St. Paul, 311 f) cautions us not to misunderstand Strabo. It was not even one of the three great universities of the world in point of equipment, fame, students from abroad, or general standing. It was not on a par with Athens and Alexandria, excepting when the citizen rich in what constitutes the true excellence and strength of a university, intense enthusiasm and desire for knowledge among the students and great ability and experience among some at least of the teachers" (ib, 233). Strabo was very fond of Athenian culture. Now students from all over Europe come to Tarsus, but they went from Tarsus elsewhere. But Philostratus represents Apollonus of Tyana as disgusted with the university and the town, and St. Chrysostom describes Tarsus as an oriental and non-Hellenic town.

Ramsay speaks of Tarsus in the reign of Augustus as "the one example known in history of a state ruled by a university, working through a university, and its principal." "It is characteristic of the general tendency of university life in a prosperous and peaceful empire, that the rule of the Tarsian University was marked by a strong reaction toward oligarchy and a curtailment of democracy; that also belongs to the oriental spirit, which was so strong in the city. But the crowning glory of Tarsus, the reason for its undying interest to the whole world, is that it produced the apostle Paul; that it was the one city which was important and interesting in the Asiatic and the Western spirit to mold the character of the great Hellenist Jew; and that it nourished in him a strong source of loyalty and patriotism as the citizen of no mean city" (Ramsay, op. cit., 235). The city gave him a schooling in his social, political, intellectual, moral, and religious life, but in varying degrees, as we shall see. It was because Tarsus was a cosmopolitan city with "an amalgamated society" that it possessed the peculiar suitability to educate and mold the mind of him who would in due time make the religion of the Jewish race intelligible to the Gr-Rom world" (ib, 88). As a citizen of Tarsus Paul was a citizen of the whole world.

It was no idle boast with Paul when he said, "But I am a Roman born" (Acts 22 28). The chief captain might well be "afraid when he knew that he was a Roman, and by citizenship cause he had bound him" (22 29).

Likewise the magistrates at Philippi feared what the people might do when they heard Paul say, "fear not what man shall do to you" (Acts 16 39), and promptly released Paul and Silas and "asked them to go away from the city." "The Roman his citizenship was his passport in distant lands, his talisman in seasons of difficulties and danger. It made his appeal to the laws of municipal and the injustice of local magistrates" (Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 203). As a citizen of Rome, therefore, Paul stood above the common herd. He ranked with the aristocracy in any provincial town (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 10). He would naturally have a kindly feeling for the Rom government in return for this high privilege and protection. In its pessimism the Rom empire had come to be the world's hope, as seen in the Fourth Eucholog of Virgil (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 49). Paul would seize upon the Rom empire as a fit symbol of the kingdom of heaven. "Our citizenship is in heaven" (Phil 3 20); "Ye are no more strangers and sojourners, but ye are fellow-citizens with the saints" (Eph 2 19). So he interprets the church in terms of the body politic as well as in terms of the Israelite theocracy (Col 2 19)."All this shows the deep impression which the Rom institutions made on St. Paul" (Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 203). The word "Paulinism" (under the heading, "Paulinism in the Rom Empire" (Cities of St. Paul, 70 f) "A universal Paulinism and a universal Empire must either coalesce, or the one must destroy the other." It was Paul's knowledge of the Rom empire that gave him his imperialism and statesmanlike grasp of the problems of Christianity in relation to the Rom empire. Paul was a statesman of the highest type, as Ramsay has conclusively shown (Pauline and Other Studies, 49). "It is necessary to know something of the empire (ib, 66) does say: "His perspective was not imperialistic," but he shows thereby a curious inability to understand Paul. The vision of Paul saw that the regeneration of the empire could come only through Christianity. Ramsay strikingly shows how the emperor dreaded the spiritual upheaval in Paulinism and fought it steadily till the time of Constantine, when "an official Christianity was victorious, but Pauline Christianity had perished, and Paul was now a mere saint, no longer 'father, or teacher, but remembered as a sort of revivification of the old pagan gods" (Cities of St. Paul, 78). But, as Ramsay says, "it was not dead; it was only waiting its opportunity; it revived when freedom of thought and freedom of life began to stir in Europe; and it gathered round the Protestants of the Reformation."
Suffer Ramsay once more (Pauline and Other Studies, 100): "Barbarism proved too powerful for the Gr-Rom civilization unaided by the new religious bond; and every channel through which that civilization was preserved or interest in it maintained, either perished or became essentially part of its course Christian after the Pauline form." Paul would show the Rom genius for organizing the churches established by him. Many of his churches would be in Rom colonies (Antioch in Phidias, Phillipi, Corinth etc.), he would address his most studied ep. to the church in Rome, and Rome would be the goal of his ministry for many years (Findlay, HDB). He would show his conversion with Rom law, not merely in knowing how to take advantage of his rights as a citizen, but also in the use of legal terms like "adoption" (Gal 4 5 f.), where the adopted heir becomes son, and heir and son are interchangeable. This was the obsolete Rom law and the Gr law left in force in the provinces (cf Gal 3 15). But in Rom 8 15 ff the actual revolt. Rom law is referred to by which "heirship is now deduced from sonship, whereas in Gal sonship is deduced from heirship; for at Rome a son must be an heir, but an heir need not be a son (cf He 9 15 ff which presupposes Rom law and the right of primogeniture)" (Meyers in 1-vol HDB). So in Gal 3 24 the tutor or pedagogue presents a Gr custom preserved by the Romans. This personal guardian of the child (often a slave) led him to school, and was not the guardian of the child's person as Gal 4 shows. See Ramsay, Gal, 337-93; Ball, St. Paul and the Rom Law, 1901, for further discussion. As a Roman, Paul would have "nomen and praenomen, probably taken from the Rom officer who gave his family civitas; but Luke, a Greek, would have "nomen cognomen," not determined by his nomen; there is no reason to think he was an 'Ephesius' (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveler, 31). It is probable, though not certain, that Paul spoke Latin (see Souter, Epis, April, 1911). As a Rom citizen, according to tradition, he was beheaded with the sword and not subjected to crucifixion, the traditional fate of Simon Peter. He saw the true "pax Romana" to be the peace that passeth all understanding (Phil 4 7; cf Rostron, The Christology of St. Paul, 1912, 19).

It is not possible to specify all the influences that worked on Paul in his youth (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 79). We do not know all the factors which attended his development or constituted his education. He was master of all the education and the opportunities of his time. He turned to his profit and to the advancement of his great purpose the resources of civilization (Ramsay, Pauline and Other Studies, 285). Heartily agree with this conception of Paul's ability to assimilate the life of his time, but one must not be led astray so far as Schramm who, in 1710, wrote De stupenda eruditione Pauli ("On the Stupendous Erudition of Paul")! This is, of course, absurd, as Lightfoot shows (Bib. Essays, 206). But we must not forget Paul lived in a Gr city and possessed Gr citizenship also (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveler, 31). Certainly the Gr traits of adaptability, curiosity, alertness, the love of investigation were marked features of his character, and Tarsus afforded wide opportunity for the acquiring of these qualities (The Ethics of St. Paul, 39). He learned to speak the vernacular koine like a native and with the ease and familiarity displayed by no other NT writer save Luke and the author of He. He has a "poet's mastery of language," though with the passion of a soul on fire, rather than with the artificial rules of the rhetoricians of the day (Dissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 230 f.). Blass (Die Rhythm en der asiatischen und römischen Kunstprosa, 1905) holds that Paul wrote "rhythmically elaborated artistic prose—a singular instance of the great scholar's having gone astray" (Deissmann, Light, etc, 64). But there is evidence that Paul was familiar with the use of the distribut and other common rhetorical devices, though he was very far from being tinged with Atticism or Asinianism. It is certain that Paul did not attend any of the schools of rhetoric and did not write in the manner in Meyer's Krit. exkomm. commends that Paul's methods and expressions conform more nearly to the cynic and Stoic distribut than to the rabbinical dialectic; cf also Wendland and Kern, Philo u. d. jüdisch-röm. Rhetorik, 1911, Hocks, "Paul and Hellenism" in Stud. Bib., IV. How extensive was his acquaintance with Gr lit. is in doubt. Lightfoot says: "There is no ground for saying that St. Paul was a very erudite or highly-cultivated man. An obvious maxim of practical life from Menander (1 Cor 15 34), a resuscitate as the home of Athenian writers of antitype. Even so, there is no reason to say that he made his few quotations from hear-say and read no Gr books (cf Zahn, Intro to the NT, 52). Certainly he knew the Gr OT and the Jewish apocryphal and apocryphal literature. To admit that Paul had such knowledge of Gr lit. and philosophy as any Jew, living among Greeks, might pick up (Life and Teaching of Paul, 2), and charges Ramsay with "overrating the influence of the gentile environment on Paul's development" (Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 8). Ramsay holds that it is quite "possible that the philosophical school at Tarsus had exercised more influence on Paul than is commonly allowed" (St. Paul the Traveler, 34). A resuscitate as the home of Athenian authors. It was a stronghold of Stoic theology. "At least five of the most eminent teachers of that philosophy were in the university" (Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul, 47). It is not possible to say whether Paul attended these or any lectures at the university, though it is hard to conceive that a brilliant youth like Saul could grow up in Tarsus with no mental stimulus from such a university. Garvie (ib, 6) asks when Paul could have studied at the university of Tarsus. He was probably too young before he went to Jerusalem to study under Gamaliel. It is not probable that he remained in Jerusalem continuously after completing his studies till we see him at the death of Stephen (Acts 7 58). He may have returned to Tarsus meanwhile and taken such Another possibility is that he took advantage of the years in Tarsus after his conversion (Acts 9:30; Gal 1:21) to equip himself better for his mission to the non-Christian world. He does not appear to have learned any Aramaic or Hebrew, and he is not known to have studied the Old Testament. There is no real difficulty on the score of time. The world was saturated with Greek ideas, and Paul could not escape them. He could not escape it unless he was innocent of all culture. Ramsay sees in Paul a blend of truth and reality "wholly inconceivable in a more narrow Hebrew, and wholly inexplicable without an education in Greek philosophy." ("St. Paul and Hellenism," Cities of St. Paul, 34). Paul exhibited a freedom and universalism that he had thought of as the unique function of the Christ of God. It is not that the ancient world was at all decayed as some think. For the discussion between Garvie and Ramsay see Expos, April and December, 1911. Pfeiderer (Urchristentum, Vorwort, 174-78) finds a "double root" of Paulinism, a Christianized Hellenism and a Christianized Pharisaism. Harnack is more nearly correct in saying that "notwithstanding Paul's Greek culture, his conception of Christianity is, in its deepest ground, independent of Hellenism." The Hellenistic influence on Paul was relative and subordinate (Wendland, Die Weltanschauung der ersten Christen in der Zeit des Jüdischen Christenthums und Christentums, 3te Aufl, 1912, 245), but it was real, as Köhler shows (Zum Verständniss des Apostels Paulus, 9). He had a "Gr inheritance" beyond a doubt, and it was not all unconscious or superficial, as some claim. See the discussion of the "Hellenistic" character of Christianity by C. L. Lightfoot in his St. Paul's Age and Message (C. I. T. 17).

It is true that in Athens the Stoics and Epicureans ridiculed Paul as a "pick up of learning's erumbe"—Browning's rendering (An Epistle of σπορομάχου, σερμολογίου). Paul shows a fine scorn of the sophists and verbal pedantries of the ancient philosophers and orators in 1 Cor 1 and 2, but all the same he reveals a real apprehension of the true significance of knowledge and life. Dr. James Adam (The Religious Teachers of Greece, 260) shows instances of "the real kinship of thought between Plato and St. Paul." He does not undertake to say how it came about. He has a Platonic expression, τά διά τού σώματος, τα διά τού σώματος, in 2 Cor 6:10, and uses a Stoic and cynic word in 2 Cor 9:8, αὐθάραξεν, αυθαρείαν. Indeed, there are so many similarities between Paul and Seneca in language and thought that some scholars actually predicate an acquaintance or dependence of the one on the other. It is far more likely that Paul and Seneca discussed the same common problems of life than that Seneca had seen Paul's Epp. or knew him personally. Lightfoot has a classic discussion of the matter in his essay on "St. Paul and Seneca" in the Comm. on Phil (see also Carr, St. Paul's Attitude to Gr Philosophy, Expos, V. ix). Alexander finds four Stoic ideas (Divine Immanence, Wisdom, Freedom, Brotherhood) taken and glorified by Paul to do service for Christ (Ethics of St. Paul, 49-55). Often Paul uses a Stoic phrase with a Christian content. Lightfoot shows that some of the "Hellenistic" in the later Gr lit. was a fitter handmaid for the diffusion of the gospel than the earlier.

Paul as the apostle to the Gr-Rom world had to "understand the bearings of the moral and religious life of Greece as expressed in her literature, and this lesson he could learn more impartially and more fully at Tarsus in the days of her decline than at Athens in the freshness of her glory" (ib). Ramsay waxes bold enough to discuss "the Pauline philosophy of history" (Cities of St. Paul, 10-13). I confess I confess my sympathy with the notion and find all the Pauline epp., esp. in Rom, Moffatt (Paul and Paulinism, 66) finds "a religious philosophy of history" in Rom 9-11, throbbing with strong personal emotion. Paul rose to the height of the true Christian philosopher, though not a technical philosopher of the schools. Deissmann (St. Paul, 53) admits his language assigns him "to an elevated class," and yet he insists that he wrote "large letters" (Gal 6:11) because he had "the clumsy, awkward writing of a workman's hand," which had been calligraphied. He does not agree that here Deissmann understands Paul. He makes "the world of St. Paul" on too narrow a scale.

Was Paul influenced by Mishnaism? H. A. A. Kennedy has given the subject very careful and thorough treatment in a series of papers in Expos for 1912-13, already mentioned (see sec. 3, 4, above). His arguments are conclusive on the whole as he claims the wild notions of W. B. Smith, "Der vorchristliche Jesus; J. M. Robertson, Pagan Christ; A. Drews, Die Christus-Myth; and Lubiniski, Die Entstehung des Christentums aus der antiken Kultur. A magic papyrus about 300 AD has 'I adjure thee in the name of the Hebrew Jesus' (Il, 3019 f), but Deissmann, (Light from the Ancient East, 256) refuses to believe this line genuine: 'No Christian, still less a Jew, would have called Jesus 'the god of the Hebrews.'" Clemen (Der Ursprung der islamischen-Judischen Quellen, 1912, 336) has the same objection. It appears to me that in the 1st cent. AD "one cannot speak of non-Jewish influences on Christology." One may dismiss at once the notion that Paul "defied" Jesus into a god and made him Christ under the influence of pagans (Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, 170, p. 31). One can read Rom 1 and 2 and believe that Paul was carried away by the philosophy of vain deceit of his time. He does use the words "wisdom" and "mystery" often in 1 Cor, Col, and Eph. and in Phil 4 12, "I have learned the secret," he uses a word employed in the mystic cults of the time. It is quite possible that Paul took up some of the phrases of these mystery-religions and gave them a richer content for his own purposes, as he did with some of the gnostic phraseology (Pitrōma, "fulness," for instance). But Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 191 f) deals a fatal blow against the notion that the mystery-religions had a formative influence on Paul. He urges, with point, that it is only in the 2d cent. that these doctrines went so widely abroad. Appeal is made to the magical use of the name of Jesus by the strolling Jewish exorcists in Ephesus (Acts 18 15 ff). Kiesvogt Lake (Barler Epp. of St. Paul, 253) holds that at Corinth they all accepted Christianity as a mystery-religion and Jesus as "the Redeemer-God, who had passed through death to life, and offered participation in this new life to those who shared in the mysteries which He offered," viz. the "Christian baptism and the Lord's supper" (Epp. December, 1912, 545) easily shows how with Paul baptism and the Lord's Supper are not magical sacraments producing new life, but symbolic pictures of death to sin and new life in Christ which the believer has already experienced. The experience is still raging on the subject of the mystery-religions, but it is safe to say that so far nothing more than illustrative material has been shown to be true of Paul's teaching from this source.

There is nothing incongruous in the notion that Paul knew the magic arts of the Mysteries. Indeed the two things may have been to some extent combined in some places. A parallelism is long been drawn between "dwelling in the things which he hath seen," or (m) "taking him to ... occultations," etc. (cf. Westcott, Ramsay, etc.) suspected an early error in the text, but the same word, ἐμπνεύσωμαι, embatē̂sō, has been found by Sir W. M. Ramsay as a result of investigations by Dr. miracle, by the Jewish Imperial Museum, in the sanctuary of Apollo at Claros, a town on the Ionian coast. Some of the initiates here record the finding of a way that being initiated, having been initiated, they entered" (embatē̂sō). The word is thus understood to have been initiated initiators into the life of the initiate (cf. Independent, 1913, 376). Clearly, then, Paul used the word in this sense in Col 2:18.

For further discussion see Jacoby and W. M. Ramsay, Mysteriorenligionen; Glover, Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire; Reitzenstein, Die hellen. Mysteriorenligionen; Friedlander, Rom Life and Manners under the Early Empire; III: Thorburn, Jesus Christ, Historical or Mythical.

M. Brückner (Der sterbende und aufstehende Gotttheit in den orientalischen Religionen und ihr Verhältnis zum Christentum, 1908) says: "As in Christianity, so in many oriental religions, a belief in the resurrection of a Redeemer-God (sometimes as His Son) occupied a central place in the worship and cults." To this Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 193) replies: "What manipulations the myths and rites of the cults in question must have undergone before his general statement could become possible! Where is there anything about dying and resurrection in Midther? There we may leave the matter.

Paul was Gr and Rom, but not "pan-Bab," though he warned only all the winds of doctrine that blew about him, as we see.

But he was most of all the Jew, that is, before his conversion. He remained a Jew, even though he learned how to be all things to all men (1 Cor 9:22). Even though glorying in his mission as apostle to the Gentiles (Eph 3:8), he yet always put the Jew first in opportunity and peril (Rom 2:9). He loved the Jews almost to the point of death (Rom 9:3). He was proud of his Jewish lineage and boasted of it (2 Cor 11:16-22; Acts 22:3ff; 26:4ff; Phil 3:4-6). "His religious patriotism flickered up within his Christianity" (Moffatt, Paul and Paulinism, 60). Had he been a Roman citizen, he could not do more. His Gentile culture and his rich endowments of mind, he would probably not have been the "chosen vessel" for the work of Christ among the Gentiles (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 15). Had he not been the thorough Jew, he could not have meditated Christianity from Jew to Greek. "In the mind of Paul a universalized Hellenism coalesced with a universalized Hebraism" (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 43). Ramsay strongly opposes the notion of Harnack and others that Paul can be understood "as purely a Hebrew." So in Paul both Hebraism and Hellenism meet, though Hebraism is the main stock. He is a Jew in the Gr-Rom world and a part of it, not a mere spectator. He is the Hellenistic Jew, not the Aram. Jew of Paul (cf Simon Peter's vision on the house-top at Joppa, for instance). But Paul is not a Hellenizing Jew after the fashion of Jason and Menelaus in the beginning of the Maccabean conflict. Findlay (HDII) tersely says: "The Jew in him was the foundation of everything that he did." But it was this type of Judaism in spite of his persecution of the Christians. He belonged to the Judaism of the Dispersion. As a Roman citizen in a Gr city he had departed from the narrowest lines of his people (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 47). His Judaism was pure, in fact, as he gives it to us in Phil 3:5. He was a Jew of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin. He was a Hebrew, of the seed of Abraham (2 Cor 11:22). He shared in full all the covenant blessings and privileges the Israelites, as his true. But the type of Judaism, whose crowning glory was, that of them came Jesus the Messiah. He was proud of the piety of his ancestors (2 Tim 1:3), and made progress as a student of Judaism ahead of his fellows (Gal 1:14). His ancestry was pure, Hebrew of the Hebrews (Phil 3:5), and so his family preserved the native Palestinian traditions in Tarsus. His name Saul was a proof of loyalty to the tribe of Benjamin as his cognomen Paul was evidence of his Rom citizenship. In his home he would be taught the law by his mother (cf. Gal 1:14), as in the true of a mother's and grandmother (2 Tim 1:5). In Tarsus he would go to the synagogue also. We know little of his father, save that he was a Rom citizen and a man of position in Tarsus and possibly of some wealth; that he was a tent-maker and taught his son the same trade, as all Jewish fathers did, whatever their rank in life; that he was a Pharisee and brought up his son as a Pharisee (Acts 23:6), and that he sent the young Saul to Jerus to study at the school of Gamaliel. This Paul considered himself a Pharisee as distinct from the Sadducean scepticism (23:6). Many of the Pharisaic doctrines were identical with those of Christianity. That Paul did not consider himself a Pharisee in all respects is shown by his relations with the Pharisees (Gal 2; Acts 15; 2 Cor 10-13). Paul says that he was reared as a strict Pharisee (Acts 26:5), though the school of Gamaliel (grandson of Hillel) was not so hard and narrow as that of Shammai. But all Pharisism should be understood as the spiritual, not the legal. So Jesus played an important part in the training of Saul (Acts 22:3), as Paul recognized. He was known in Jerus as a student. He knew Aram. as well as Gr (and Lat.), and could speak in it as so to attract the attention of a Jewish audience (Acts 22:2). Paul was fortunate in his great teacher Gamaliel, who was liberal enough to encourage the study of Gr lit. But his liberality in defending the apostles against the Sadducees in Acts 5:34-39 must not be misinterpreted in comparison with the persecuting zeal of his brilliant pupil against Stephen (7:58). Stephen had opened war on the Pharisees themselves, and there is no evidence that Gamaliel made a defence of Stephen against the lawless rage of the Sanhedrin. Gr culture is common for pupils to go farther than their teachers, but not come to the rescue. Still Gamaliel helped Saul, who was undoubtedly his most brilliant pupil and probably the hope of his heart for the future of Judaism. Harnack (History of Dogma, I, 94) says: "Pharisaism had fulfilled its mission in the world when it produced this man." Unfortunately, Pharisaism did not die; in truth has never died, not even from Christianity. But young Saul was the crowning glory of Pharisaism. An effort has recently been made to restore Pharisaism to its former dignity. Herford (Pharisaism, Its Aim and Method, 1912) undertakes to show that the Gospels have slandered Pharisaism, that it was the one hope of the ancient world, etc. He has a chapter on "Pharisaism and Paul," in which he claims that Paul has not attacked the real Pharisaism, but has aimed his blows at an unreal creation of his own brain (p. 222). But, if Paul did not understand Pharisaism, he did not understand anything. He knew not merely the OT but the Hebraic. He quotes from both, though usually from the LXX, but he also knew the Jewish Apoc and apocalypses, as is shown in various ways in his writings (see arts on these subjects). Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters) carries too far his idea that Paul and Jesus merely moved in the circle of Jews eschatology. He makes it explain everything, and that it cannot do. But Paul does show acquaintance with some of these books. See Kennedy, St. Paul's Concept of the Last Things (1904), for a sane and adequate discussion of this phase of the subject. Pfeiderer pursues the subject in his Paulinism, as does Kabisch in his Eschatologie. So Sanday and Headlam use this method of approach, and so do most modern students of St. Paul. Paul knew Wisd, also, a book from the Jewish-Alexandrian theology with a tinge of Greek philosophy (see Goodrick, Book of Wisd, 398–403; cf. also Jowett's essay on "St. Paul and Philo" in his Epp. of St. Paul). Paul also knew to use allegory (Gal 4:24) in accord with the method of Philo. So he knew how to use the Stoic diatribe, the rabbinical diatribe and the Alexandrian allegory. "In his cosmology, angelology, and demonology, as well as eschatology, he remains essentially Jewish" (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 17). When he becomes a Christian he will change many of his views, for Christ must become central in his thinking, but his method learned in the rabbinical schools remains with him (Köhler, Zum Verständnis, etc., 7). Here, then, is a man with a wonderfully rounded culture. What of his mental gifts?

Much as we can learn about the times of Paul (cf Selden, In the Time of Paul, 1900, for a brief sketch of Paul's world), we know something about the personality and work of a man like Paul by his past and to refer with precision this or that trait to his Jewish or Greek training (Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul, 58). "We must allow something to remain in us as a sense of the children of the past, but some men have much more the spirit of creation than others. Paul is not mere "eclectic patchwork" (Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, 218). Even if Paul was acquainted with Philo, he may have had a tough constitution to have endured such hardship to a good age. He had one infirmity in particular that came upon him at Tarsus (2 Cor 12:1–9) in connection with the visions and revelations of the Lord and grace, but the point was not only his nervousness (Gal 4:14). He felt the frailty of his body as an earthen vessel (2 Cor 4:7) and as a tabernacle in which he groaned (6:4). But the effect of all this weakness was to give him a fresh sense of dependence on Christ and a new influx of Divine power (2 Cor 11:30; 12:9). But even if Paul was unprepossessing in appearance and weakened by illness, whether ophthamia, which is so common in the East (Gal 4:15), or malaria, or recurrent headache, or epilepsy, he must have had a tough constitution to have endured such hardship to a good age.

nor struggle with lust (Roman Catholic, stimulus carnis). Garvie (Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 65, 80) thinks it not unlikely that "it was the recurrence of an old violent temptation, rather than mere lust, that had driven him there. There is doubt be... that this form of temptation is more likely to assail the man of intense emotion and intense affection, as Paul was?" But enough of what can never be settled. "St. Paul's own scanty hints admonish to caution" (Deissmann, St. Paul, 63). It is a blessing for us not to know, since we can all cherish a close bond with Paul. Ramsey (St. Paul the Traveller, 37 ff) calls special attention to the look of Paul. He "fascinated his eyes on" the man (Acts 16: 10; 19: 14). He argues that Paul had a peculiar, trating, powerful gaze, and hence eye trouble. He calls attention also to gestures of Paul (Acts 20: 24; 26: 2). There were artists in marble and color at the court of Caesar, but no one of them could to preserve a likeness of the intensest preacher who turned out to be the chief man of the age (Deissmann, St. Paul, 58). "We are like the Christians of Colossae and Laodicea, who had not seen his face in the flesh" (Col 2 1).

1. His natural endowments. In respect to his moral nature he can do much better, for his epp. reveal the mind and soul of the man. He is difficult to comprehend, not because he conceals himself, but because he reveals so much of himself in his epp. He seems to some a man of contradictions. He had a many-sided nature, and his very humanness is in one sense the greatest thing about him. There are "great polar contradictions" in his nature. Deissmann (St. Paul, 62 ff) notes his silling body and his tremendous powers for work, his lack of self-confidence and his periods of depression and of intoxication with victory, his tenderness and his sternness; he was ardently loved and curiously hated; he was an ancient man of his time, but he is cosmopolitan and modern enough for today. Findlay (HBD) adds that he was a man possessed of dialectical power and religious inspiration. He was keenly intellectual and profoundly mystical (cf. Campbell, Paul the Mystic, 1907). He was a theologian and a man of affairs. He was a man of vision with a supreme task to which he held himself. He was a scholar, a sage, a statesman, a seer, a saint (Garvie, Studies in Paul and His Gospel, 68-84). He was a man of heart, of passion, of imagination, of sensibility, of will, of courage, of suddenness, of subtlety, of stamina, of endurance, of tact, of genius for organization, of power for command, of gift of expression, of leadership—"All these qualities and powers went to the making of Jesus Christ's apostle to the nations, the master-builder of the universal church and of Christian theology" (Findlay, HBD; see Lock, St. Paul the Master Builder, 1905; and M. Jones, St. Paul the Orator, 1910).

I cannot agree with Garvie's charge of cowardice (Love and Teaching of Paul, 175), in the matter of the mounting and the winding of the Sanhedrin (23: 6). The one was a mere matter of prudence; the other was a justifiable skill in resisting the attack of unscrupulous enemies. One does not understand Paul who does not understand his emotional nature. He was quick, impetuous, strenuous, impassioned" (Hevan, St. Paul in the Light of To-day, 192). But it is through his epp. he loves his converts like a mother or a lover (Findlay, HBD) rather than a pastor. We fed the burning emo-tibilities of Paul. One, 1 Cor. 10: 16, 17; Gal. 5: 19-23; Phil. 2: 1 Tim in particular. He had the spiritual temper-ament of genius; yet he felt in the world, and his personality was his momentary husky, his rhapsody. He has elasticity and rebound of spirit, and comes up with the joy of victory in Christ out of the seemingly worst situations. His temper was great, but it is to serve Christ his Lord. He is a man of faith and a man of prayer. For him prayer is not the burden for friendship and binds men (Acts 10: 9, 11; 18: 18) to the hands of steel—men like Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, Luke, Titus (Speer, The Man Paul, 1906, 111 ff). He is not afraid to oppose his friends when it is necessary for the sake of truth, as with Peter (Gal 2: 11 ff) and with Barnabas (Acts 15: 38 ff). While his nature was like that of the other apostles out of the clay whereof ordinary men are fashioned, you may say he was a man of infinite pains with his education" (Fairbairn, Studies in Religion and Theology, 471). If ever a man, full-blooded and and-eyed, wrenched the earth, it was Paul. It is impossible to answer the question whether Paul was married or not. He certainly was not married when he wrote the Epistles. But if he was a member of the Sanhedrin when he cast his vote against the disciples (Acts 26: 10), as his language naturally means, he was then married.

There is in Paul the gift of leadership in a marked degree. He, though young, is already at the head of the opposition to Stephen (Acts 7 58), and soon drives the disciples out of Jerusalem.

2. (3) His supernatural gifts. — He had his share of them. He had all the gifts that others could boast of at Corinth, and which he lightly esteemed except that of prophecy (1 Cor 14: 18-29). He had his visions and revelations, but would not tell what he had seen (2 Cor 12: 1-9). He did the signs of an apostle (2 Cor 12: 12-14). He had the power to work miracles (1 Cor 4: 19-21) and to exercise discipline (1 Cor 5: 4 ff; 2 Cor 13: 1-5). But what he cared for most of all was the fact that Jesus had appeared to him on the road to Damascus and had called him to work of preaching to the Gentiles (1 Cor 15: 8).

No other element in the equipment of Paul is comparable in importance to his conversion.

1. Preparatory. — It was sudden. It was without preparation. The event was the conversion of Saul. It happened. True, Saul was engaged in the very act of persecuting the believers in Jerusalem. His mind was flushed with the sense of victory. He was not conscious of any lingering doubts about the truth of his position and the justice of his conduct till Jesus suddenly told him that it was hard for him to kick against the goad (Acts 26: 14). It was suddenly brought to bay, the real truth would flash upon his mind. In later years he tells how he had struggled in vain against the curse of the Law (Rom 7: 7). It is probable, though not certain, that Paul here has in mind his experience before his conversion, though the latter part of the chapter may refer to a period later. There is difficulty in either view as to the "body of this death" that made him so wretched (Rom 7: 24). The Christian keeps up the fight against sin in spite of sin's temporary defeat (7: 25). Of course, he does not feel that he is "carnal, sold under sin" (7: 14). But when before his conversion did Paul have such intensity of conviction? We can only leave the problem unanswered. His reference to it at least harmonizes with what Jesus said about the goad. The words and death of Stephen and the other disciples may have left a deeper mark than he knew. The question might arise whether after all the Nazarenes were right. His plea for his conduct made in later years was that he was conscientious (Acts 26: 9) and that he did it ignorantly in unbelief (1 Tim 1: 13). He was not willfully sinning against the full light as he saw it. It will not do to say with Holsten that Saul was half-converted to join the disciples, and only needed a jolt to turn him over. He was "yet breathing threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord" (Acts 9: 1), and went to the high priest and asked for letters to Damascus demanding the arrest of the disciples there. He was but a stranger on the whole is distinctly hostile to Christ, and the reason why he opposed his course was in the subconscious mind. There a volcano had gathered ready to burst out.

It is proper to ask whether Paul had known Jesus in the flesh. It is not easy to give a categorical reply. It is possible that Paul may have known that Paul had come to Jesus to study when Jesus as a boy of 12 visited the temple. He may have been a doctor. That could be true only in case Paul was born 6 or 6 BC, which is quite unlikely. It is possible again that Paul may have remained in Jesus after leaving the school of Gamaliel and present to work. There is no express statement to this effect in the letters of Paul, when he shows undoubted knowledge of various events in the life of Christ (Wynne, Preliminary Records of Jesus of Nazareth, 1857). It is almost certain that the events (Acts 9 and 21, the First-hand account of the conversion of Saul is given in Acts 22). Paul refers to the Risen Jesus. The passage in 2 Cor 10-16 is argued both ways: Wherefore we answer no man at the flesh; even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him spiritually (v. 2). It may be the viewpoint of Christ and so of all men. Weiss pleads (ib. p. 40) at any rate, that we have no warrant for saying that "Paul had not seen Jesus in person." It may be left in abeyance as not vitally important. He certainly had not understood Jesus, if he knew Him.

(2) Experience. —Space does not permit a discussion of this great event of Paul’s conversion at all commensurate with its significance. A literature of its own has grown up round it. It has been keenly discussed in the lives and theologies of Paul (see e.g. Lord Lyttleton’s famous Observations on Saul’s Conversion, 1774; Fletcher’s A Study of the Conversion of St. Paul, 1910; Gardner, The Spiritual Life of the Apostle Paul, 1942; Magie, The Spiritual Experience of St. Paul). All sorts of theories have been advanced to explain on naturalistic grounds this great experience of Christ in the life of Paul. It has been urged that Paul had an epileptic fit, that he had a sunstroke, that he fell into a trance, that he was blinded by a flash of lightning, that he imagined that he saw Jesus as a result of his highly wrought nervous state, that he deliberately renounced Judaism because of the growing conviction that the disciples were right. But none of these explanations explains. Mere prejudice against the supernatural, such as is shown by Weinel in his Paulus, and by Holsten in his able book (Zum Evangelium d. Paulus und Petrus), cannot solve this problem. We must listen to the evidence. There were witnesses of the bright light (Acts 26:13) and of the sound (9:7) which only Paul understood (22:9), as he alone beheld Jesus. It is claimed by some that Paul had a true sense of the supernatural and did not see Jesus with his eyes. Deane (Standard Bible Dict.) replies that it is not a pertinent objection. Jesus (in 21:1) "manifested Himself" and Paul says that he "saw" Jesus (1 Cor 15:1), that Jesus "appeared" (1 Cor 15:8) to him. Hence it was both subjective and objective. But the reality of the event was as clear to Paul as his own existence. The account is given 3 t in Acts (chs 9, 25, 28) in substantial agreement, with a few varying details. In ch 9 the historical narrative occurs, in ch 22 Paul’s defense before the mob in Jerusalem is given, and in ch 26 we have the apology before Agrippa. There are no contradictions of moment, save that in ch 26 Jesus Himself is represented as giving directly to Paul the call to the Gentiles while in chs 9 and 22 it is conveyed through Ananias (the fuller and more accurate account). There is no need to notice the apparent contradiction between 9:7 and 22:9, for the difference in case in the Gr gives a difference in sense, hearing the sound, with the genitive, and not the same sense, with the accusative. Finlay (HBD) remarks that the conversion of Paul is a psychological and ethical problem which cannot be accounted for save by Paul’s own interpretation of the change wrought in him. He saw Jesus and surrendered to Him.

(3) Effect on Paul. —His surrender to Jesus was instantaneous and complete: “What shall I do, Lord?” (Acts 22:10). He could not see for the glory of that light (22:11), but he had already gained the light of Christ’s knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ” (2 Cor 4:6). The god of this world could blind him no longer. He had seen Jesus, and all else had lost charm for Paul. There is infinite pathos in the picture of the blind Saul led by the hand (Acts 9:8) into Damascus. All the pride of power is gone, all the lust for vengeance. The fierceness of the name of Saul is well shown in the dread that Ananias has and the protest that he makes to the Lord concerning him (9:10-14). Ananias does not think that the Lord had made a strange choice of a vessel to bear the message of Christ to the Gentiles, kings, and the children of Israel (9:15), but there was hope in the promise of chastisement to him (9:16). So he went, and called him “Brother Saul.” Saul was filled with the Holy Spirit, the scales fell from his eyes, he was baptized. And now what next? What did the world hold in store for the proud seion of Judaism who had renounced power, place, pride for the lowly Nazarene? He was not the man to go back to his old surroundings in Damascus would have none of him now. Would the disciples receive him? They did. “And he was certain days with the disciples that were at Damascus” (9:19). Ananias vouched for him by his vision (9:15), and Saul went boldly into the synagogues and proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God” (9:20). This was a public committal and a proclamation of his new creed. There was tremendous pith and point in this statement from Saul, who was so amazed (Acts 9:21). This is the core of Paul’s message as we see it in his later ministry (Acts 13:1, 17:3). It rests at bottom on Paul’s own experience of grace: “His whole theology is nothing but the explanation of his own conversion” (Stalker, Life of St. Paul, 45). We need not argue (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 51) that Paul understood at once the full content of the new message, but he had the heart of it right.

V. Work. —There was evidently a tumult in Paul’s soul. He had undergone a revolution, both intellectual and spiritual. Before he proceeded farther it was wise to think through the most important implications of the new doctrines. The epoch that he takes no account of this personal phase of Paul’s career, but he allows room for it between Acts 9:21 and 22. It is Paul who tells of his retirement to Arabia (Gal 1:171) to prove his independence of the apostles in Jesus. He did not go to them for instruction or for ecclesiastical authority. He did not adopt the merely traditional view of Jesus as the Messiah. He knew, of course, the Christian contention well enough, for he had answered it often enough. But his old arguments were gone and he must work his way round to the other side, and be able to put his new gospel with clearness and force. He was done with calling Jesus anathema (1 Cor 12:3). Henceforth to him Jesus is Lord. We know nothing of Paul’s life in Arabia nor in what part of Arabia he was. He may have gone to Mt. Sinai and thought out grace in the atmosphere of law, but that is not necessary. But it is clear that Paul grew in apprehension of the things of Christ during these years, and indeed after that until his death. But he did not grow away from the first clear vision of Christ. He claimed that God had revealed His Son in him that he might preach to the Gentiles (Gal 1:16). He claimed that he had been to each and to the very last. The undoubted devotions in Paul’s Epp. (see Matheson, Spiritual Development of St. Paul, and Sabatier, The Apostle Paul) is, however, not a changing view of Christ that nullifies Paul's "original Christian inheritance" (Köhler, Ztschr. f. ev. Dogm. 31, 17, 1908). Pfleiderer (Influence of the Apostle Paul on the Development of Christianity, 3d ed., 1897, 217) rejects Col because of the advanced Christology here found. But the Christology of Col is implicit in Paul's first sermon at Damascus. "It is impossible to escape the conclusion that the significance and value of the Cross became clear to him almost simultaneously with the certainty of the resurrection and of the Messiahship of Jesus" (Garvie, Studies, etc., 57). The narrow Jew has surrendered to Christ, who became the savior of the world. The universal gospel has taken hold of his mind and heart, and it will work out its logical consequences in Paul. The time in Arabia is not wasted. When he reappears in Damascus (Acts 9:22) he has "developed faith" (Findlay, HDB) and energy that bear instant fruit. He is now the slave of Christ. For him henceforth to live is Christ. He is crucified with Christ. He is in Christ. The union of Paul with Christ is the real key to his life. It is far more genuine a relationship than mere fellowship with Christ (Deissmann, St. Paul, 123). Thus it is that the man who probably never saw Christ in the flesh understands him best (Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, i, 135). It caused the immediate unfolding of the missionary strength, and confounded the Jews that dwelt in Damascus, proving that this is the Christ." (Acts 9:22)

2. Opposition (Acts 9:22). Now he not merely "proclaims" as before (9:20); he "proves." But he does it with that nervous skill that the Jews are first confounded, then enraged to the point of murder. Their former hero was now their foe. The disciples had learned to run from Saul. They now let him down in a basket through the wall by night and he is gone (Acts 9:23 f.). This then is the beginning of the active ministry of the man who was called to be a chosen vessel to Gentiles, kings, and Jews. There was no need to go back to the wilderness. He had gotten his bearings clearly now. He had his message and it had his whole heart. He had not avoided Jesus because he despised flesh and blood, but because he had no need of light from the apostles since "the Divine revelation as completely absorbed his interest and almost it absorbed itself" (Deissmann, Life of Paul, 162). No door was open as yet among the Gentiles. Sooner or later he must go to Jerusalem and confer with the leaders there if he was to cooperate with them in the evangelization of the world. Saul knew that he would be an object of suspicion to the disciples in Jerusalem. That was inevitable in view of the past. It was best to go, but he did not wish to ask any favors of the apostles. Indeed he went in particular "to visit Cephas" (in to "become acquainted with him") though he may have gone for other, perhaps, less noble, causes. But Saul comes now with the olive branch to his old enemy. He expressly explains (Gal 1:19) that he saw no other apostle. He did see James, the Lord's brother, who was not one of the Twelve. It seems that at first Peter and James were both afraid of Saul (Acts 9:26), "not believing that he was a disciple." If a report came 3 years before of the doings at Damascus, they had discounted it. All had been quiet, and now Saul suddenly appears in Jerusalem in a new rôle. It was, then, expected, then the doors of work opened. But for Barnabas, Saul might not have had that visit of 15 days with Peter. Barnabas was a Hellenist of Cyprus and believed Saul's story and stood by him. Thus he had his opportunity to preach the gospel in Jerusalem, perhaps in the very synagogues in which he had heard Stephen, and now he is taking Stephen's place and is disputing against the Grecian Jews (Acts 9:29). He had days of blessed fellowship (9:28) with the disciples, till the Grecian Jews sought to kill him as Saul had helped to do to Stephen (Acts 9:29). But Saul was more a man of Damascus, but Saul did not wish to run again so soon. He protested to the Lord Jesus, who spoke in a vision to him, and recalls the fate of Stephen, but Jesus bids him go ("For I will send thee forth (or hence unto the Gentiles") (Acts 9:12-21). One martyr like Stephen is enough. So the brethren took him down to Caesarea (Acts 9:30). It was an ominous beginning for a ministry with so clear a call. Where can he go now?

They "sent him forth to Tarsus" (Acts 9:30). Who would welcome him there? At Jerusalem he apparently avoided Gamaliel and the Sanhedrin. He was with the Christians and preached to the Hellenistic Jews. The Jews regarded him as a turncoat, a renegade Jew. There were apparently no Christians in Tarsus, unless some of the disciples driven from Jerusalem by Saul himself went that far, as they did go to Antioch (Acts 11:19 f.). But Saul was not idle, for he spoke to himself as he wandered through Syria and Cilicia during this "period of obscurity" (Denney, Standard Bible Dict.) as a thing known to the churches of Judaea (Gal 1:21 f.). He was not idle then. The way was not yet opened for formal Gentile ministration upon the "wilderness" of Tarsus, but Saul was not the man to do nothing at home because of that. If they would not hear him at Damascus and Jerusalem, they would in the regions of Syria and Cilicia, his home province. We are left in doubt as to whether he only goes among Jews or to Gentiles also. He had the specific call to preach to the Gentiles, and there is no reason why he should not have done so in this province, preaching to the Jews first as he did afterward. He did not have the persecutions of Simon Peter to overcome. When he appears at Antioch with Barnabas, he seems to take hold like an old hand at the business. It is quite probable, therefore, that this obscure ministry of some 8 or 10 years may have had more results than we know. Paul apparently felt that he had done his work in that region, for outside of Antioch he gives no time to it except that in starting out on the second tour from Antioch "he went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches" (Acts 15:41), with the promise of this early ministry and apparently containing Gentiles also. A letter from the Jerusalem conference was addressed to "the brethren who are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia" (Acts 15:23). Cilicia was now part of the Roman province of Syria. So then we conclude that Saul had a gentle ministry in this region. "Independently, under no human master, he learned his business as a missionary to the heathen" (Findlay, HDB). One can but wonder what this task would have been if Saul had kindly received at home by his father and mother. They had looked upon him with pride as the possible successor of Gamaliel, and now he is a follower of the despised Nazarene and a preacher of the Cross. It is possible that his own exhortations to fathers not to provoke their children to wrath (Eph 6:4) may imply that his own father had cast him out at that time. Findlay (HDB) argues that Saul would not have remained in this region so long if his home relations had been altogether hostile. It is a severe test of character whether one can close out one against the other. But Saul turned defeat to glorious gain.

Most scholars hold that the ecstatic experience told by Paul in 2 Cor 12:1-9 took place before he came to Antioch. If we count the years strictly, 14 from 36 AD would bring us to 42 AD. Paul had spent a year in Antioch before going up to Jerusalem.
4. Opportunity

Findlay (HDB) thinks that Paul had the visions before he received the call to come to Antioch. Garvie (Life and Teaching of Paul, 41) received the call first. “Such a mood of exaltation would account for the vision to which he refers in 2 Cor 12 1-4.” At any rate he had the vision with its exaltation and the thorn in the flesh with its humiliation before he came to Antioch, in response to the invitation of Barnabas. He had undoubtedly had a measure of success in his work in Cilicia and Syria. He had the seal of the Divine blessing on his work among the Gentiles. But there was a pang of disappointment over the arrest and return to Jerusalem. He had apparently left alone to his own resources. “Only such a feeling of disappointment can explain the tone of his references to his relations to the apostles (Gal 1 11-24)” (Garvie, Life and Teaching of Paul, 41). There is no bitterness in this tone—but puzzled surprise. It seems that the 12 apostles are more or less absent from Jerus during this period with James the brother of the Lord Jesus as chief elder. A narrow Pharisaic element in the church would be put to some such test of the church in its attitude toward the Gentiles.

This is clear in the treatment of Peter, when he returned to Jerus after the experience at Caesarea with Cornelius (Acts 11 1-18). There was acquiescence, but not without a notice of the church in its attitude toward the Gentiles. Now to see how they held the key of the Lord’s doing. They have shown concern over the spread of the gospel to the Greeks at Antioch, and send Barnabas to investigate and report (Acts 11 19-22). Barnabas was a Hellenist, and evidence does not show him to be a member of the Pharisaic party in the church at Jerus (11 2), for he was glad (11 23 f.) of the work in Antioch. Probably mindful of the discipline attempted on Simon Peter, he refrained from going back at once to Jerus. Moreover, he believed in Saul and his work, and thus he gave him his great opportunity at Antioch. They had there a year’s blessed work together (11 25 ff.). So great was the outcome that the disciples received a new name to distinguish them from the Gentiles and the Jews. But the term “Christian” did not become general for a long time. There was then a great Church at Antioch, possibly equal in size to the Jewish church in Jerus. The prophecy by Agabus of a famine gave Barnabas and Saul a good excuse for a missionary journey, and Saul was a ready man according to his ability”—from the Church for the relief of the poverty in the Jerus church. Barnabas had assisted generously in a similar strain in the beginning of the work there (Acts 4 36 f.), unless it was a different Barnabas, which is unlikely. This contribution would help the Jerus saints to understand now that the Greeks were really converted. It was apparently successful according to the record in Acts. The apostles seem to have been absent, since only “elders” are mentioned in 11 30.

5. The First Great Mission Campaign: individual in Cilicia. Now the Spirit specifically directs the separation of Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13 and 14, 1, 29 f. and 48 AD 13 2). They were to go together, and they had the sympathy and prayers of a great church. The endorsement was probably not “ordination” in the technical sense, but a farewell service and blessing. The missionaries went forth on the world-campaign (13 3). No such unanimous endorsement could have been obtained in Jerus to this great enterprise. It was momentous in its possibilities for Christianity.

The whole Gentile church at Antioch probably was moved to the same degree. The view of the church in the period Acts 11 19-22 was not to do an isolated work in Antioch, but to evangelize the whole island till Paphos is reached. There they met a man of great prominence and intelligence, Sergius Paulus, the Roman proconsul, who had been under the spell of a sorcerer named Bar-Nice (Acts 13 6 f.) of Peter’s encounter with Simon Magus in Samaria. In order to win and hold Sergius Paulus, who had become interested in Christianity, Paul has to punish Bar-jesus, who was probably a Judaizer (1 Cor 10 13, 13 10). He won Sergius Paulus, and this gave him cheer for his work. From now on it is Paul, not Saul, in the record of Luke, perhaps because of this incident, though both names probably belonged to him from the first. Now also Paul steps to the forefront ahead of Barnabas, and it is “Paul’s company” (13 13) that sets sail from Paphos for Pamphylia. There is no evidence here of resentment on the part of Barnabas at the leadership of Paul. The whole campaign may have been planned from the start by the Holy Spirit as the course now taken may have been due to Paul’s leadership. John Mark deserts at Perga and returns to Jerus (his home), not to Antioch (13 13). Paul and Barnabas push on to the territories of Paphos and Iconium. So thinks that Paul had malaria down at Perga and hence desired to get up higher land. That is possible. The places mentioned in the rest of the tour are Antioch in Pisidia (13 14), and Iconium (13 15). Lystra (14 8), and Derbe (14 20), cities of Lycaonia.
At Iconium. Mercury left to Paul and Barnabas. Paul, however, does not mention that name here only the popular designations. The work is wonderfully successful. In these cities, on one of the great Roman roads east and west, Paul is reaching the centers of provincial life as will be his custom. At Antioch Paul is invited to repeat his sermon on the next Sabbath (Acts 13:42), and Luke records at length the report of this discourse which has the characteristic notes of Paul's gospel as we see it in his epistles. Paul may have kept notes of the discourse. There were devout Gentiles at these services. These were the first to be won, and thus a wider circle of Gentiles could be reached. Paul and Barnabas were too successful at Antioch in Pisidia. The jealous Jews opposed, and Paul and Barnabas dramatically turned to the Gentiles (Acts 13:45 ff). But the Jews reached the city magistrate through the influential women, and Paul and Barnabas were ordered to leave (Acts 13:50 f). Similar success brings like results in Iconium. At Lystra, before the hostile Jews even Paul and Barnabas was driven out, because of the healing of the impotent man, they are taken as Mercury and Jupiter respectively, and worship is offered them. Paul's address in refusal is a fine plea on the grounds of natural theology. Acts 14:13-18. It was success such as this that came seemed successful. In the band of disciples that "stood round about him," there may have been Timothy, Paul's son in the gospel. From Derbe they retrace their steps to Perga, in order to start from there with a Christus and a ten Chrs (a Chrs for Seleucia and Antioch). They make their report to the church at Antioch. It is a wonderful story. The door of faith is now wide open for the Gentiles who have entered in great numbers (Acts 14:27). No report was sent to Jerusalem. What will the Pharisaic party do now?

The early date of Gal, addressed to these churches of Pisidia and Lycocna before the Conference in Jerusalem does not allow time for a second conference there (Gal 1:6; 3:1) in South Galatia. Gal 2, 49 AD Besides, there is less likelihood of a reference to this previous conference on the same subject is made in Acts 15, since Peter does refer to his experience at Caesarea (Gal 15:11) and since James in Acts 21:25 specifically ("we wrote") mentions the letter of Acts 15 in which full liberty was granted to the Gentiles. Once more, the attack on the position of Paul and Barnabas (Gal 1:14-17) and the requirement that Gentiles be circumcised and hence the sharp disension and tense feeling. The occasion for the sudden outbreak at Antioch on the part of the self-appointed (Acts 15:24) regulators of Paul and Barnabas lay in the reports that came to Jerusalem about the results of this campaign on a large scale among the Gentiles. There was peril to the supremacy of the Jewish element. They had assumed at first, as even Peter did who was not a Judaizer (Acts 10), that the Gentiles who became disciples would also become Jews. The decree prohibiting idolatry they had had thus to face the conduct of Peter at Caesarea (Acts 11:1 f) and had reluctantly acquiesced in the plain work of God (11:18). They had likewise yielded in the matter of the Greeks at Antioch (Acts 11:19 ff) by the help of Barnabas, but they had not agreed to a campaign to Hellenize Christianity. The matter had to stop. So the Judaizers came up to Antioch and laid down the law to Paul and Barnabas. They did not wait for them to come to them. The council met not only in Antioch (Acts 11:30), but Paul and Barnabas had not sought the controversy. They had both received specific instructions from the Holy Spirit to make this great campaign among the Gentiles. They would not stubbornly themselves, and destroy the liberty of the Gentiles in Christ by going back and having the Mosaic Law imposed on them by the ceremony of circumcision. They saw at once the gravity of the issue. The very essence of the gospel of grace was involved. Paul had turned away from this yoke of bondage, and Barnabas as well. If they go back to it nor would he impose it on his converts. The church at Antioch stood by Paul and Barnabas. Paul (Gal 2:2) says that he had a revelation to go to Jerusalem with the problem. Luke (Acts 15:3) says that the church sent them. Surely there is no inconsistency here. It is not difficult to combine the personal narrative in Gal 2 with the public meetings recorded in Acts 15. We have first, the general report by Paul and Barnabas to the church in Jerusalem: Acts 15:3-4. In so far as the matter is concerned by the Judaizing element. There seems to have come an adjournment to prepare for the conflict, since in ver 6 Luke says again that "the apostles and the elders were gathered together to consider this matter." After the adjournment we may place the private conference of Paul and Barnabas with Peter, John and James and other teachers (Gal 2:10-11). In this private conference some of the timid brethren wished to persuade Paul to have the Gentiles put on a yoke of bondage, a yoke that Paul had brought down from Antioch (a live specimen), offered as a sacrifice to the Judaizers ("false brethren") and circumcised. But Paul stood his ground for the truth of the gospel and was supported by Peter, John and James. They agreed all around for Paul and Barnabas to go on with their work to the Gentiles, and Peter, John and James would push the work among the Jews (a division in sphere of work, like home and foreign missions, not a denominational cleavage). Here, then, for the first time, Paul has had an opportunity to talk the matter over with the apostolic teachers, and they agree. The Judaizers will have no support from the apostles. The battle was really won in their private conference. The meeting was successful as all goes smoothly enough. Ample opportunity for free discussion is offered. Then Peter shows how God had used him to preach to the Romans, and how the Jews themselves had to believe on Christ in order to be saved. He opposed putting a yoke on the Gentiles that the Jews could not bear. There was a pause, and then Barnabas and Paul (note the order here: courtesy to Barnabas) spoke. The last of the conference, the brother of the Lord Jesus, and a stedfast Jew, spoke. He cited Am 9:11 to show that God had long ago promised a blessing to the Gentiles. He suggests liberty to the Gentiles with the prohibition of pollution of idols, of fornication, things strangled, and blood. His ideas are embodied in a unanimous decree which strongly commends "our beloved Barnabas and Paul," and disclaims responsibility for the visit of the Judaizers to Antioch. The Western text omits "things strangled" from the decree. If this is correct, the decree prohibits idolatry and human sacrifices (Wilson, Origin and Aim of the Acts of the Apostles, 1912, 55). At any rate, the decision is a tremendous victory for Paul and Barnabas. If the other reading is correct, Jewish feelings about things strangled and blood are respected. The decision was received with great joy in Antioch (Acts 15:30-35).
Some time later Peter appears at Antioch in the fullest fellowship with Paul and Barnabas in their work, and in free intercourse with the Gentiles, as he had timidly done in the home of Cornelius, till “certain came from James” (Gal 2 11 f), and probably threatened to have Peter up before the church again (Acts 11 2) on this matter, claiming that James agreed with them on the subject. This I do not believe was true in the light of Acts 15 24, where a similar false claim is discredited, since James had agreed with Paul in Jerusalem (Acts 15 19 ff; Gal 2 9 f). The new ground for complaint was the anxiety they felt about the question of social relations with the Gentiles in the Jerusalem conference and that Peter had exceeded the agreement there reached. Peter quailed before the accusation, “fearing that they were of the circumcision” (Gal 2 12). To make it worse, “even Barnabas was carried away with their dissimulation” (2 13). Under this specious plea Paul was about to lose the fruit of the victory already won, and charged Peter to his face with Judaizing hypocrisy (2 11–14). It was a serious crisis. Peter had not changed his convictions, but had once more cowered in an hour of peril. Paul won both Barnabas and Peter to his side and took occasion to show how useless the death of Christ was if men could be saved by mere legalism (2 21). But the Judaisers had renewed the threat, and the Church would keep it, and harry the work of Paul all over the world. Paul had the light of his life upon his hands.

The impulse to go out again from Paul. Despite the difference in Gal 2 13, he wished to go again with Barnabas (15 36), but Barnabas insisted on taking along Second Mark, which Paul was not willing Mission to do because of his failure to stick to the work at Perga. So they agreed. Acts 15 36

By this view Paul had not meant to stop in Galatia proper and did so only because of an attack of illness (Gal 4 13). It is possible that Luke may have come to his rescue here. At any rate, he finally pushes on opposite Myia and Bithynia, in the extreme north and was forbidden by the holy Spirit from going into Bithynia. So they came down to Troas (Acts 16 7) where Luke (“we,” 16 10) appears on the scene and the Macedonian call comes to Paul. Thus Paul is led out of Asia into Europe and carries the gospel far beyond the city of Galatia at Derbe and Lystra. The matter has many “ins” and “outs” and cannot be argued on the basis of a solution of the problem. Ramsey makes the narrative in ver 6 resumepart and takes us back to the stand-point of ver 1 when Paul writes to Thessalonica for a forecast was in ver 1, or at most before ver 4, which already seems to have been written. The speech of Iconium and Antioch in Pisidia: “and as they went on their way through the cities.” Besides, “the Phrygio-Galatian region” lay between Lystra and Asia, and, according to Ramsey, after the exorcism in Lystra, he went to Iconium. This is certainly very artificial and unlike the usual procedure. According to the other view, Paul had already visited the cities in Lycia and Pamphylia on a former visit. He wished to go on west and to go into Asia, probably to Ephesus, but was forbidden by the holy Spirit and as a result turned northward through Phrygia and the regions of Galatia, using both terms in the ethnographic sense. As Acts 16:19 shows, Paul came to Galatia at Derbe and Lystra. The matter has many “ins” and “outs” and cannot be argued in a solution of the problem. The present interpretation is in harmony with the narrative in Acts. See also GALATIA; GALATIANS, EPITHE.
was stirred over the idolatry before his eyes. He preaches in the synagogues and argues with the Stoics and Epicureans in the Agora who make light of his pretensions to philosophy as a "babbling" (Acts 17:17). Curiosity leads them to invite him to speak on the Areopagus. This notable address, all alive to his surroundings, was rather rudely cut short by their indifference and mockery, and Paul left Athens with small results for his work. He goes over to Corinth, the great commercial city of the province, rich and with bizarre notions of culture. Paul determined (1 Cor 2:1-5) to be true to the cross, even after his experience in Athens. He gave them, not the flashy philosophy of the sophists, but the true wisdom of God in simple words, the philosophy of the cross of Christ (1 Cor 1 17-3 4).

In Corinth Paul found fellow/helpers in Aquila and Priscilla, just expelled from Rome by Claudius. They have the same trade of tent-makers and live together (Acts 18:1-1), and Paul preached in the street (Acts 18:2). Curiosity leads them to invite him again and the coming of Timothy and Silas from Thessalonica (18:5) with supplies from Philippoi, as they had done while in Thessalonica (Phil 4:15f). This very success led to opposition, and Paul has to preach in the church of Titus (Titus 1:14). But the very people he goes on till Gallo comes and a renewed effort is made to have it stopped, but Gallo declines to interfere and thus practically makes Christianity a religion legal, since he treats it as a variety of Judaism. While there the apostle finds Timothy and Silas, Paul writes the two letters to Thessalonians, the first of his 13 epp. They are probably not very far apart in time, and deal chiefly with a grievous misunderstanding on their part concerning the connections placed by him in the Man of Sin and the Second Coming. Paul had felt the power of the empire, and his attention is sharply drawn to the coming conflict between the Rom empire and the kingdom of Christianity. He treats it in terms of apocalyptic eschatology. When he leaves Corinth, it is to go by Ephesus, with Aquila and Priscilla whom he leaves there with the promise to return. He goes down to Caesarea and "went up and saluted the church at Jerusalem" at Jerusalem (Acts 21:17), "and went down to Antioch." If he went to Jerusalem, it was probably incidental, and nothing of importance happened. He is back once again in Antioch after an absence of some 3 or 4 years.

The stay of Paul at Antioch is described as "some time" (Acts 18:23). Denney (Standard Bible Dict.) conjectures that Paul's brief stay at Jerusalem (see above) was due to the fact that he found that the Judaeizers had organized opposition there against him in the absence of the apostles, and it was so unpleasant that he did not stay. He suggests also that he departed there at Jerusalem (Acts 18:22), "and left them after his letter of commendation from the church for their episcopacy (2 Cor 3:1) to Corinth and Galatia, who were preaching "another Jesus" of nationalism and narrowness, whom Paul did not recognize (Gal 1:14). Both Denney and Findlay follow Næumer, Wieseler, and Sabatier in placing here, before Paul starts out again from Antioch, the visit of certain "from James" (Gal 2:12), who overpowered Peter for the moment. But I have put this incident as much before Paul's departure with Silas, Paulus over Mark, and as probably contributing to that breach at the beginning of the second tour. It is not necessary to suppose that the Judaeizers remained ascendant so long.

Paul seems to have set out on the third tour alone — unless Timothy came back with him, of which there is no evidence save that he is with Paul again in Ephesus (Acts 19:22). What became of Silas? Paul "went through the region of Galatia, and Phrygia, in order, establishing all the churches" (Acts 18:23). In order, according to the 6th, 14th, and 16th verse, through the region of Phrygia and Galatia. According to the North-Galatian view, here followed, he went through the northern part of the province, passing through Galatia proper and Phrygia on his way west to Ephesus. Luke adds, "Paul having passed through the upper country came to Ephesus" (19:1). The ministry of Apollos in Ephesus (Acts 18:24-28) had taken place before Paul arrived, though Aquila and Priscilla were still on hand. Apollos passed over to Corinth and incidentally became the occasion of such strife there (1 Cor 1:4) that he left and refused to return at Paul's request (1 Cor 16:12). Paul has a ministry of 3 years, in round numbers, in Ephesus, which is full of excitement and anxiety from the work there and in Corinth.

He finds on his arrival some ill-informed disciples of John the Baptist who are ignorant of the chief elements of John's teaching about repentance, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit (Acts 19:2-7), matters of which Apollos had knowledge, and the people of Ephesus. There is no evidence that he was rebaptized as was true of the 12 disciples of John (Robertson, John the Baptist, 290-303). The boldness of Paul in Ephesus led in 3 months to his departure from the synagogue. In the schoolhouse of Tyranus, where he preached for 2 years (Acts 19:8-10) with such power that "all they that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord. It is not strange later to find churches at Colossae and Laodicea in the Lycaean Valley (cf. Acts 14). Paul has a successful litigation with the strange Jewish exorcists that led to the burning of books of magic by the wholesale (19:11-20), another proof of the hold that magic and the mysteries had upon the Orient. Ephesus was the seat of the worship of Diana whose wonderful temple was their pride. A great business in the manufacture of shrines of Diana was carried on here by Demetrius, and "this Paul" had hurt his trade so much that he raised an insurrection under the guise of piety and patriotism and he might have killed Paul with the mob, if he could have got hold of him (19:23-41). It was with great difficulty that Paul was kept from going to the amphitheater, as it was. But here, as at Corinth, the Rom official (the town clerk) defended Paul from the rage of his enemies (the tradesmen, here the tradesmen whose business suffered). He was apparently very ill anyhow, and came near death (2 Cor 1:9). All this seems to have hastened his departure from Ephesus sooner than Panteost, as he had written to the Corinthians (1 Cor 16:8). His heart was in Corinth because of the discussions there over him and Apollos and Peter, by reason of the agitation of the Judaizers (1 Cor 1:10-17). The household of Chloe had brought word of this situation to Paul. He had written the church a letter now lost (1 Cor 5:9). They had written him a letter (1 Cor 7:1). They sent messengers to Paul (1 Cor 16:17). He had sent Timothy to them (1 Cor 4:17; 16:10), who seems not to have succeeded in quieting the trouble. Paul wrote 1 Cor (spring of 56), and then sent Titus, who was to meet him at Troas and report results (2 Cor 12:12). He may also have written another letter and sent it by Titus (2 Cor 2:3). The sudden departure from Ephesus by the Ephesians to Tarsus ahead of time, but he could not wait for Titus. He was pushed on with a heavy heart into Macedonia, where he met him, and he had good and bad news to tell (2 Cor 2:12 ff; 7:5-13). The effect on Paul was instantaneous. He rebounded to hope and joy (2 Cor 2:14 ff) in a glorious defence of the ministry of Jesus (cf Robertson, The Glory of the Ministry; Paul's Exultation in Preaching), with a message of cheer to the majority of the church that he had left in Ephesus (Acts 19 21). Timothy and Titus had been sent on ahead to Macedonia from Ephesus (Acts 19 22). Titus is personally green with Paul to the Corinthians in a letter (2 Cor) which Paul now forwards, possibly by Titus. The latter part of the ep. (chs 10-13) deals with the stubborn minority who still resist the authority of Paul as a direct charismatic representative of Christ, as opposed to the apostolic position. The first three chapters as a separate ep. see the earlier part of this art. Paul seems to wait a while before going on to Corinth. He wishes the opposition to have time to repent. During this period he probably went round about to Illyricum (Rom 15 19). He spent three months in Greece (Acts 20 2), probably the winter of 56 and 57.

We have placed Gal in the early part of this stay in Corinth, though it could have been written while at Ephesus. As a corollary to the Acts, the writer here, and they both treat the same general theme of justification by faith in Christ. James, February, 127-45, brought at last to the conclusion that Gal belongs to the date of Acts 15 1 f. He bases this conclusion chiefly on the absence of Gal's independence. This apostle, claimed in Gal 1 and 2, he holds, he would not have been content with the independence in 15, which "is a sacrifice of complete independence." This is a curious interpretation, for in Gal 2:1-10 Paul himself tells of his apostleship on terms of equality by Peter, John and James, and of his going to Jerus by "revelation," which was just as much "a sacrifice of complete independence" as we find in Acts 15. Besides, in 2 Cor 11 5 and 12 11 Paul expressly asserts his equality (with Paul) with the church at Jerus. Paul, in 1 to 15, 10 he claims in so many words to have wrought more than any apostle, for the particular mission he had there with the contributions from that region reported the havoc wrought there by the Judaisers. Gal is a tremendous plea for the spiritual nature of Christianity as opposed to Jewish ceremonialism.

Paul had long had it in mind to go to Rome. It was his plan to do so while at Ephesus (Acts 19 21) after he had gone to Jerus with the great collection from the churches of Asia, Galatia, Asiah, and Macedonia. He hoped that this collection would have a mollifying effect on the Jewish saints as that from Antioch had (Acts 11 29 f). He had changed some details in his plans, but not the purpose to go to Jerus and then to Rome (cf Phil 1 21). This lasted and important letter of all to the Romans, in which he gives a fuller statement of his gospel, because they had not heard him preach, save his various personal friends who had gone there from the east (ch 16). But already the shadow of Jesus is on his heart, and he asks their prayers in his behalf, as he faces his enemies in Jerus (Rom 15 30-32). He hopes also to go on to Spain (15 24), so as to carry the gospel to the farther west also. The statesmanship of Paul comes out now in great clearness. He has in his heart always anxiety for the churches that consumes him (2 Cor 11 28 f). He was careful to have a committee of the churches go with him to report the collection (2 Cor 8 19 f). Paul had planned to sail direct for Syria, but a plot on his life in Corinth led him to go by land via Macedonia with his companions (Acts 20 2-4). He tarried at Philippi while the rest went on to Troas. At Philippi Paul is joined again by Luke, who stays with him till Rome is reached. They celebrate the Pentecost (at Philippi) in Philippi (Acts 20 8). We cannot follow the details in Acts at Troas, the voyage through the beautiful Archipelago, to Miletus. There Paul took advantage of the stop to send for the elders of Ephesus to whom he gave a wonderful address (Acts 20 17-38). They change ships at Patura for Phoenicia and pass to the right of Cyprus with its memories of Barnabas and Sergius Paulus and stop at Tyre, where Paul is warned not to go on to Jerus. The hostility of the Jews to Paul is not in the least common everywhere. There is grave peril of a schism in Christianity over the question of gentile liberty, once settled in Jerus, but unsettled by the Judaisers. At Caesarea Paul is greeted by Philip the evangelist and his four daughters (prophetesses). At Caesarea Paul is warned in dramatic fashion by Agabus (of Acts 11 28) not to go on to Jerus (21 9 ff), but Paul is more determined than ever to go, even if he die (20 13). He had had three premonitions for long (20 22 ff), but he will finish his course, once he is confident of the providence of God. He finds a friend in Caesarea in Mnason of Cyprus, an early disciple, who was to be the host of Paul in Jerus (21 16).

Paul had hoped to reach Jerus by Pentecost (Acts 20 16). He seems to have done so. Luke gives the story of Paul in Jerus, Caesarea, and the voyage to Rome in much detail. He was with him and considered this period of his ministry very important. The welcome from the Christians in Jerus was cordial (Acts 17 17). On the very next day Paul and his party made a formal call on James and all the elders in Jerus (Acts 19 30). The next day Paul came into the synagogue of the brethren (Acts 19 35). On the 25th of the second month he and the elders of the church of Jerus had a meeting with Paul and the Gentiles. He presented the alms (collection) in due form (24 17), though some critics have actually suggested that Paul used it to defray the expenses of the appeal to Caesar. Rumor's prophecy that he might be delivered "to the people of my father's heir by now to his portion of his father's estate is quite probable. But the brethren wish to help Paul set himself right before the rank and file of the church in Jerus, who have been imposed upon by the Judaisers who have misrepresented Paul's real position by saying that he urged the Jewish Christians to give up the Mosaic customs (21 21). The elders understand Paul and recall the decision of the conference at which freedom was guaranteed to the Gentiles, and they have no wish to disturb that (21 25). They only wish Paul to show that he does not object to the Jewish Christians keeping up the Mosaic regulations. They propose that Paul offer sacrifice publicly in the temple and pay the vows of four men, as a sign of his freedom. Paul does not hesitate to do that (21 26 f). He had kept the Jewish feasts (of 20 6) as Jesus had done, and the early disciples in Jerus. He was a Jew. He may have had a vow at Corinth (18 18). He saw no inconsistency in a Jew doing thus after becoming a Christian, provided he did not make it obligatory on Gentiles. The real efficacy of the sacrifices lay in the death of Jesus for sin. Garvie (Life and Teaching of Paul, 173) calls this act of Paul "clear evidence of his courage as a man or his faith in God." I cannot see it in that light. It is a matter of practical wisdom, not of principle. To have refused would have been to say that the charge was true, and it was not. So far as the record goes, this act of Paul accomplished its purpose in setting Paul in a right light before the church in Jerus. It took away this argument from the Judaisers. The trouble that now comes to Paul does not come from the Judaisers, but from the "Jews from Asia" (21 27). If it be objected that the Jesu Christians in Jerusalem did not seem to have been taken in by the story of Paul's years of imprisonment, it can be said that there was little to be done in a legal way, as the matter was before the Rom courts very soon. The attack on Paul in the temple was while he was doing honor to the temple, engaged in actual offering sacrifices.
so that they imagined that he had Greeks with him in the Jewish court, because they had seen him one day with Trophimus in the city (21 27 ff). It is a splendid illustration of the blindness of prejudice and the way in which false charges, and the men who raised the hue and cry in the temple against Paul as the desecrator of the holy place and the Law and the people disappear, and are never heard of more (24 18 ff). But it will take Paul five years or more of the prime of his life to get himself out of the tangled web that will be woven about his head. Peril follows peril. He was almost mobbed, as often before, by the crowd that dragged him out of the temple (21 30 f). It would remind Paul of Stephen’s murder (Acts 7) in the Rom. capital restricted to him and had him bound with two chains as a dangerous bandit, and had him carried by the soldiers to save his life, the mob yelled “Away with him” (21 36 f), as they had done to Jesus. After the captain, astonished that “Paul the Egypt assassin” men speak Gr, grants him permission to stand on the steps of the tower of Antonia to speak to the mob that clamored for his blood, he held their rapt attention by an address in Aram. (22 2) in which he gave a defense of his whole career. All this he had previously spoken to the “Genosco” (21 7-20) of which they raged more violently than ever (22 21 ff). At this the captain has Paul tied with thongs, not understanding his Aram. speech, and is about to scourge him when Paul pleads his Rom citizenship, to the amazement of the Jews who spoke in Aram. of the Visigoths (22 24 ff). Almost in despair, the captain, wishing to know the charge of the Jews against Paul, brings him before the Sanhedrin. It is a familiar scene to Paul, and it is now their chance for settling old scores. Paul makes a sharp retort in anger to the high priest Ananias, for which he apologizes if he was so angry that he had not noticed, but he soon divides the Sanhedrin hopelessly on the subject of the resurrected Jesus, who they supposed to be in the temple itself. Thus, when Gamaliel scored the Sadducees in Acts 5, this was turning the tables on his enemies, and was justifiable as war. He claimed to be a Pharisee on this point, as he was still, as opposed to the Sadducees. The result was stand on the steps of the temple of Antonia, to speak to the mob that clamored for his blood, he held their rapt attention by an address in Aram. in which he gave a defense of his whole career. ### His Right to Roman Citizenship

Paul's right to Roman citizenship by appealing to Caesar (25 1-12). This way, though a long one, offered the only ray of hope. The appearance of Paul before Agrippa and Bernice was a trap set by Felix to relieve his guests of ennui, but Paul seized the opportunity to make a powerful appeal to Agrippa that put him in a corner logically, though he wriggled out and declined to endorse Christianity, though confirming Paul's innocence, which Felix also had admitted (25 13-36 32). Paul was fortunate in the centurion Julius who took him to Rome, for he was kindly disposed to him at the start, and so it was all the way through the most remarkable voyage on record. Luke has preserved his own notes in which he traces the voyage, stage by stage, with change of ship at Myra, delay at Fair Havens, Crete, and shipwreck on the island of Malta. More is learned about ancient seafaring from this chapter than from any other source (see art. Phoenix, and Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1886). In it all Paul is the hero, both on the ships and in Malta. In the early spring of 60 another ship takes Paul and the other prisoners to Puteoli. Thence they go to Rome by sea, and arrive at Anagnia, on the 16th of March (25 18). News of Paul's coming had gone on before (his ep. had come 3 years ago), and he had a hearty welcome. But he is now an imperial prisoner in the hands of Nero. He has more liberty in his own hired house than he had in the charges against him, as a soldier, though granted freedom to see his friends and to preach to the soldiers. Paul is anxious to remove any misapprehensions that the Jews in Rome may have about him, and tries to win them to Christ, and with partial success (25 18). Since Paul is a prisoner for 2 years more, probably because at this point he finishes the Book of Acts. But, as we have seen, during these years in Rome, Paul wrote Phil, Philem, Col., and Eph. He still has the churches on his heart. They send messengers to him, and he writes back to them. The incipient Gnosticism of the East has pressed upon the churches at Colossae and Laodicea, and a new peril confronts Christianity. The Judaizing controversy has died away with these years (of Phil 3 1 if for an echo of it), but the dignity and glory of Jesus are challenged. In the presence of the power of Rome Paul rises to a higher conception than that of the person of Christ and the glory of the church universal. In due time Paul's part is played, and he was disposed of to do his part. The Romans were proverbially dilatory. It is doubtful or his enemies ever appeared against him with formal charges. The genuineness of the Pastoral Epistles is here assumed. But for them we should know nothing further, save from a few fragments in the early Christian writings. As it is, some few who accept the Pastoral Epistles seek to place them before 64 AD, so as to allow for Paul's death in that year from the Nero persecution. In that case, he was not released. There is no space here to argue the question in detail. We can piece together the probable course of events. He had expected when in Corinth last to go on to Spain (Rom 15 28), but now in Rome his heart turns back to the east again. He, therefore, see the Philippians (1 23 ff) and hopes to see Philemon in Colossae (Philem ver 22). But he may have gone to Spain also, as of Cilicia (Acts 9 28). He may have been in Spain when Rome was burned July 19, 64 AD. There is no evidence that Paul went as far as Britain. On his return east he left Titus at Crete (Tit 1 5). He touched at Miletus when he left Trophimus sick (2 Tim 4 20) and when he may have met Timothy, if he did not go on to Ephesus (1 Tim 1.3). He stopped at Troas and apparently expected to come back here, as he left his cloak and books with Carpus (2 Cor 2.14; 1 Tim 1.3). He was therefore in Macedonia (1 Tim 1.3), whence he writes Timothy in 65-67 a letter full of love and counsel for the future. Paul is apprehensive of the grave perils now confronting Christianity. Besides the Judaizers, the Gnostics, the Jews and the Romans, he may have had dim visions of the conflict with the mystery-religions. It was a syncretistic age, and men had itching ears. But Paul is full of sympathy and tender solicitude for Timothy, who must push on the work and get ready for it. Paul expects to spend the winter in Rome (Acts 21.7, 10), but the apparently still in Macedonia when he writes to Titus a letter on lines similar to those in 1 Tim, only the note is sharper against Judaism of a certain type. We catch another glimpse of Apollos in 3.13. Paul hits off the Cretans in 1.10 with a quotation from Epimenides, one of their own poetic prophets. When Paul writes again to Timothy he has had a winter in prison, and has suffered greatly from the cold and does not wish to spend another (2 Tim 4.16). He is ready even for the prison (2 Tim 4.13.21). We do not know what the charges now are. They may have been connected with the burning of Rome. There were plenty of former charges against the Apostle (cf. 4.4.17). Only Luke, the beloved physician, is with Paul (4.11), and such faithful ones as live in Rome still in hiding (4.21). Paul hopes that Timothy may come and bring Mark also (4.11). Apparently Timothy did come and was put into prison (He 13.23). Paul is not afraid. He knows that he will die. He has escaped the mouth of the lion (2 Tim 4.17), but he will die (4.18). The Lord Jesus stood by him, perhaps in visible presence (4.17). The tradition is, for now Paul calls us, that Paul, as a Roman citizen, was beheaded on the Ostian Road just outside of Rome. Nero died June 68 AD, so that Paul was executed before that date, perhaps in the late spring of that year (or 67). Perhaps Luke and Theophilus did not add this detail, as he himself suggests, to let Paul's words in 2 Tim 6-8 serve for his own epitaph. He was ready to go to be with Jesus, as he had long wished to be (Phil 1.23).

10. Further Travels

VI. Gospel.—I had purposed to save adequate space for the discussion of Paul's theology, but that is not now possible. A bare sketch must suffice. Something was said (see above on his epp. and equipment) about the development in Paul's conception of Christ and his message about him. Paul had a gospel which Christianity must fully adopt, but he cannot agree with the words of Deissmann (St. Paul, 6): "St. Paul the theologian looks backward toward rabbinism. As a religious genius St. Paul's outlook is forward into a future of universal history." He did continue to use some rabbinical methods of argument, but his theology was not rabbinical. And he had a theology. He was the great apostle and missionary to the heathen. He was a Christian statesman with far-seeing vision. He was the loving pastor with the shepherd heart. He was the great missionary, but he was also the wonder preacher of Jesus. But he was also "Paul the theologian" (Garvie, Life and Teaching of Paul, ch v). There are two ways of studying his teaching. One is to take it by groups of the epp., the purely historical method, and that has some advantages (cf. Sahatier, The Apostle Paul). But at bottom only has the same message in each group, though with varying emphasis due to special exigencies. The same essential notes occur all through. The more common message is that Christ reconciling the world through his gospel, topically, using all the epp. for each topic. A measure of historical development may still be observed. Only the chief notes in Paul's gospel can be mentioned here. Even so, one must not turn to his epp. for a complete system of doctrine. The epp. are "occasional letters, pièces de circonstance" (Findlay, HDB), and they do not profess, not even Rom, to give a full summary of Christian doctrine. They are vital documents that throb with life. There is no theological manual in them. Paul's gospel is adequately stated repeatedly. Paul's message is Christocentric. Jesus as Messiah he preached at once on his conversion (Acts 9 20.22). He knew already the current Jewish Messianism to which Jesus did not correspond. The acceptance of Jesus as he was (the facts about Him and teachings) revolutionized his Messianic conceptions, his view of God, and his view of man. "When he takes and uses the Messianic phraseology of his day, he fills it with a meaning new and rich" (Rosen- thron, Christus, p. 7). From the Pauline point of view Christ is not merely a new creature himself, but he had a new outlook: "Wherefore we henceforth know no man after the flesh: even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more. Wherefore in Christ is a new creature: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new. But all things are of God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses, and having committed unto us the word of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5 16-19). Perhaps no single passage in Paul's Epp. tells us more than this one of the change in Paul's theological conceptions wrought by his conversion. His view of Christ as the revealer of God (God in Christ) and the manifestation of love for men (of God, who reconciled us to Himself, reconciling the world to himself and the means (through Christ) by whom God is able to forgive our sins ("not reckoning unto them their trespasses") on the basis of the atoning death of Christ ("wherefore"; for this see vs 14 if just before verse 18) with whom the believer has vital union ("in Christ") and who, as his Kiny, the only true object of the believer, is here thoroughly characteristic. Paul's passion is Christ (2 Cor 5 14; Phil 1 21). To gain Christ (3 8), to know Christ (3 10), to be found in Christ (3 9), to know Christ as the mystery of God (Col 2 2), to be hi with Christ in God (3 3)—this with the new Paul is worth while. Thus Paul interprets God and man, by his doctrine of Christ. To him Jesus is Christ and Christ is Jesus. He has no patience with the notion that sanctification is the final consummation of God's work in His people. But he is of the opinion that the denial of the human side of the doctrine of Christ is simply a way consonant with justice, in the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ His Son (Rom 3 21-31). The sinner comes into union with God in Christ by faith in Christ as Redeemer and Lord. He becomes Christ by the help of the Holy Spirit (Rom 8; Gal 5). Paul presents God as
Father of all in one sense (Eph 4: 6), but in a special sense of the believers in Christ (Rom 8: 15 f). Jesus Christ is the Incarnation of the Pre-incarnate Son of God (2 Cor 8: 9; Phil 2: 5-10), who is both God and man (1: 31). With Paul the agent and creation is Jesus (Col 1: 15 f), who is the head of the church universal (Col 1: 18; Eph 1: 22 f). In the work of Christ Paul gives the central place to the cross (1 Cor 1: 17 f; 2: 2; Col 2: 20; Eph 2: 17-20), its victory for God and humanity (Rom 1: 18-20), but the vicarious death of Christ makes redemption possible to all who believe (Rom 3: 21 f; Gal 3: 6-11). The redeemed constitute the kingdom of God or church universal, with Christ as head. Local bodies (churches) are the chief means for pushing the work of the kingdom. Paul knows two ordinances, both of which present in symbolic form the death of Christ for sin and the pledge of the believer to newness of life in Christ. These ordinances are baptism (Rom 6: 1-11) and the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11: 17-34). If he knew the mystery-religions, they may have helped him by way of illustration to present his conception of the mystic union with Christ. Paul is animated by the hope of the second coming of Christ, which will dissolve all problems of the present at once (2 Thess 1: 2), but was to be considered as always imminent (1 Thess 5: 2 ff). Meanwhile, death brings us to Christ, which is a glorious hope to Paul (2 Cor 5: 1-10; Phil 1: 21 ff; 2 Tim 4: 18). But, while Paul was a theologian in the highest and best sense of the term, the best interpreter of Christ to men, he was also an ethical teacher. He did not divorce ethics from religion. He insisted strongly on the spiritual experience of Christ as the beginning and foundation of all, as the model and criterion of all future spiritual ceremonies which had destroyed the life of Judaism. But all the more Paul demanded the proof of life as opposed to mere profession. See Rom 6-8 in particular. In most of the epp. the doctrinal section is followed by practical exhortations to holy living. Mystic as Paul was, the greatest of all mystics, he was the sanest of moralists and had no patience with hypocrites or licentious priests or idealists who allowed sentimentalism and emotionalism to take the place of righteousness. The notion of the righteousness demanded by God and given by God included both sanctification and justification. In the end, the sinner who for Christ's sake is created as righteous must be righteous. Thus the Gospel is Paul's regenerating work of the Spirit of God (2 Cor 3: 13). Paul sees God in the face of Christ (2 Cor 4: 6), and the vision of Christ brings God to all who see.

I. THE PREPARATION.—In order to understand the development of St. Paul's theological system, it is necessary to begin with his beliefs as a Pharisee. The full extent of these beliefs, to be sure, is not now ascertainable, for Pharisaism was a rule of conduct rather than a system of dogmas, and great diversity of opinion existed among Pharisaees. Yet there was general concurrence in certain broad principles, while some of St. Paul's own statements enable us to specify his beliefs still more closely.

Saul the Pharisee believed that God was One, the Creator of all things. In His relation to His world He was transcendent, and governed it by means of His angels. Certain of these angelic governors had been unfaithful to their trust and had wrought evil, although God still permitted them to bear rule for a time (Col 2 15; cf. Ex 69-65). And evil had come into humanity through the transgression of the first man (Rom 6 12; cf. 2 Esd 7-118). To lead men away from this evil God gave His Law, which was a perfect revelation of duty (Rom 7 12), and this Law was illumined by the traditions of the Fathers, which the Pharisees felt to be an integral part of the Law itself. God was merciful and would pardon the offender against the Law, if he completely amended his ways. But imperfect reformation brought no certain hope of pardon. To a few specially favored individuals God had given the help of His Spirit, but this was not for the ordinary individual. The great majority of mankind (cf. 2 Esd 7 49-57), including all Gentiles, had no hope of salvation. In a very short time the course of the world would be closed. With God, from before the beginning of creation, there was the Son of his heavenly being, the Son of man of Dnl 7 13, and He was about to be made manifest. (That Saul held the transcendentall Messianic doctrine is not to be doubted.) As the world was irredeemably bad, this Messiah would soon appear, cause the dead to rise, hold the Last Judgment and bring from heaven the “Jesus that is above” (Gal 4 20), in which the righteous would spend a blessed eternity. See Pharisees; Messiah; Parousia.

Rom 7 7 shows the influence of the OT on Saul's personal beliefs. The OT promised pardon to the sinner who amended his ways, but the 2. Saul had an acute moral sense of Saul taught him and Sin that he could never expect perfectly to amend his ways. The 10th Commandment was the stumbling-block. Sins of deed and of word might perhaps be overcome, but sins of evil desires stayed with him, despite his full knowledge of the Law that branded them as sinful. Indeed, they seemed stimulated rather than suppressed by the Divine presence to corrupt him. With the best will in the world, Saul's efforts toward perfect righteousness failed continually and gave no promise of ever succeeding. He found himself thwarted by something that he came to realize was ingrained in his very nature and from which he could never free himself. Human nature as it is, the flesh (not “the material of the body”), contains a taint that makes perfect reformation impossible (7 18; cf. 8 3, etc.). Therefore, as the Law knows no pardon after the imperfectly amended, so for his future to be absolutely black. What he longed for was a promise of pardon despite continued sin, and that the Law precluded. (Any feeling that the temple sacrifices would bring forgiveness had long since been obsolete in educated Judaism.)

There is everywhere in Paul's epistles to the congregations no promise of forgiveness that was not unique at this period. Much has been written in recent years about the Jews' confidence in God's mercy, and abundant quotations are brought from the Psalms in support of this. But the surviving portions of the literature of the Jewish-Aramaic period of the Pauline period give a different impression. It is predominantly a literature of penitential prayers and confessions of sin, of peneaton, regarding the world of which God had so much to be ashamed. In 2 Esd, in particular, Saul's experience is closely paralleled, and in 2 Esd 7 (of course not AT) is one of the best known, ever written on Rom 7.

Saul must have come in contact with Christianity very soon after Pentecost, at the latest. Some personal acquaintance with Christ is 3. Primitive in no way impossible, irrespective of Christianity the meaning of 2 Cor 5 18. But no one in Jesus, least of all a man like Saul, could have failed to learn very early that there was a new “party” in Judaism. To his eyes this “party” would have about the following appearance: Here was a hand of God through His angels, Messiah, whom all expected, would be the Jesus who had recently been crucified. Him the disciples were preaching as risen, ascended and sitting on God's right hand. They claimed that He had sent on all His followers the coveted gift of the Spirit, and they produced miracles in proof of their claim. A closer investigation would show that the death of Jesus was being interpreted in terms of Isa 53, as a ransom for the nation. The inquirer would learn also that Jesus had given teaching that found constant and relentless fault with the Pharisees. Moreover, He had swept aside the tradition of the Fathers as worthless and had given the Law a drastic reinterpretation on the basis of eternal spiritual facts.

This inwardness must have appealed to Saul and he must have envied the joyous enthusiasm of the disciples. But to him Pharisaism was Divine, and he was in a spiritual condition that admitted of no compromises. Moreover, the Law (Gal 3 13; of Dt 21 20), cursed anyone who had been hanged on a tree, and the new party was claiming celestial Messiahsip for a man who had met this fate. The system aroused Saul's burning hatred; he appointed himself (perhaps stimulated by his moral desperation) to exterminate the new religion, and in pursuit of his mission he started for Damascus.
Pauline Theology THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

Saul must have gained a reasonable knowledge of Christ's teachings in this period of antagonism. He certainly could not have begun to have the Spirit without learning what it was, and in the inevitable discussions with the primitive church and was the truth for which Christ had died (Mk 14:62). But it involved much. It made Christ the Son of God (Rom 8:32; Gal 4:4, etc.), "firstborn of [i.e. "earlier than"] all creation" (Col 1:15), "existing in the form of God" (Phil 2:6) and "rich" (2 Cor 8:9). In the Messiah are "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden" (Col 2:3), to be manifested at the end of time when the Messiah shall appear as the Judge of all (2 Cor 5:10, etc.), causing the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15:45, etc.). All this was given by St. Paul's former beliefs and had been claimed by Christ for Himself. That this Messiah had become man was a fact of the immediate past (the reality of the manhood was no problem at this period). As Messiah His sinlessness was sufficiently proved, and this proved His sinlessness also. His teaching was wholly binding (1 Cor 7:10.11.; that the writer of these words could have spared any effort to learn the teaching fully is out of the question). The conversion experience was proof of the sufficiency of the resurrection, although for missionary purposes St. Paul used other evidence as well (1 Cor 15:1-11).

Faith in this Messiah brought the unmistakable experience of the Holy Spirit (Rom 8:2; Gal 3:2, etc.; cf Acts 9:17), demonstrating Christ's Lordship (1 Cor 12:3; cf Acts 2:33). So "the head of every man is Christ" (1 Cor 11:3; cf Col 1:18; Eph 1:22; 4:15), with complete control of the future (1 Cor 29), and all righteous men are His servants ("slaves," Rom 1:1, etc.). To Him men may address their prayers (2 Cor 12:8; 1 Cor 1:2, etc.; cf Acts 14:23).

Further reflection added to the concepts. As the Lordship of Christ was absolute, the power of all heaven must have been brought also (Rom 1:38; Phil 2:9-11; Col 2:15; Eph 1:21-23, etc.). The Being who had such significance for the present and the future could not have been without significance for the past. "In all things" He must have "been before" (Col 1:18). It was He who ministered to the Israelites at the Exodus (1 Cor 10:4.9). In fact He was not only "before all things" (Col 1:17), but "all things have been created through him" (ver 16). Wisdom and Logos concepts may have helped St. Paul in reaching these conclusions, which in explicit statement are an advance on Christ's own words. But the conclusions were inevitable.

Fitting these data of religious fact into the metaphysical doctrine of God was a problem that occupied the church for the four following centuries. After endless experimenting the only conclusion was shown to be that already reached by St. Paul in Rom 9:5 (cf Tit 2:13, ERV, ARVm), that Christ is God. To be sure, St. Paul's terminology, carried over from his pre-Christian days, elsewhere elsewhere "God" for the Father (and cf 1 Cor 15:28). But the fact of this theology admits only of the conclusion that was duly drawn.

A second fact given directly by the conversion was the presence of the Spirit, where the actual experience transcended anything that had been dreamed of. Primarily the operation of the Spirit was recognized in vividly supernatural effects (Rom 15:19; 2 Cor 12:5-11; etc; cf 2 Cor 12:12; Acts 2:4), but St. Paul must at first have known the presence of the Spirit through the assurance of salvation given him, a concept that he never wearies of expressing (Rom 8:10.23; Gal 4:6, etc.). The work of the Spirit in producing genuine faith needs no comment (see Holy Spirit; Sanctification), but it is characteristic of St. Paul that it is on this part of the Spirit's activity, rather than on the miraculous effects, that he lays the emphasis. The fruitful use of the Spirit is joy, peace, etc. (Gal 5:22); the greatest miracles without love are more than useless (1 Cor 13:3); in such sayings St. Paul touched the depths of the purest teaching of Christ. To be sure, in the Synoptic Gospels the word "Spirit" is not often on Christ's lips, but there is the same conception of a life proceeding from a pure center (Mt 6:22; 7:17, etc) in entire dependence on God.

Further reflection and observation taught St. Paul something of the greatest importance for Christian theology. In prayer the Spirit appeared distinguished from the Father as well as from the Son (Rom 8:26; cf 1 Cor 2:10f.), giving three terms that together express the plenitude of the Deity (2 Cor 13:14; Eph 1 3:6,13, etc), with the fourth term ever similarly associated. See Trinity.

The indwelling of the Divine produced by the Spirit is spoken of indifferently as the indwelling of the Spirit, or of the Spirit of Christ, or of Christ Himself (all three terms in Unio Rom 8:9-11; cf 1 Cor 2:12; Gal Mystica 2:4; Eph 3:17, etc). The variations are in part due to the inadequacy of the old terminology (so 2 Cor 3:17), in part to the nature of the subject. Distinctions made between the operations of the persons of the Trinity on the soul can never be much more than verbal, and the terms are freely interchangeable. At all events, through the Spirit Christ is in the believer (Rom 8:10; Gal 2:20; 4:19; Eph 3:17), or, what is the same thing, the believer is in Christ (Rom 6:11; 8:1; 16:7, etc). "We have become united with him" (Rom 6:5, συνιστωθεν, "grown together with") in a union once and for all effected (Gal 3:27) and yet always to be made more intimate (Rom 13:14). The union once accomplished makes the man "a new creature" (2 Cor 5:17).

St. Paul now saw within himself a dual personality. His former nature, the old man, still persisted, with its impulses, liability 4. Salvation to death and corruption, and" (Col 1:13), the "real" still existing (Gal 5:17; Rom 8 12; 13:14; Eph 4:22; Phil 3:12, etc). On the other hand there was fighting in him against this former nature nothing less than the whole power of Christ, and its final victory could not be uncertain for a moment (Rom 6:12; 8:2:10; Gal 5:16, etc.). Indeed, it is possible to speak of the believer as entirely spiritual (Rom 6:11.22; 8:9, etc), as already in the kingdom (Col 1:13), as already existing in heavenly places (Eph 2:6), of course St. Paul had too keen an appreciation of the real to regard believers as utterly senseless (Phil 3:12, etc), and his pages abound in reproofs and exhortations. But the present existence of remnants of sin had no final terror, for the ultimate victory over sin was certain, if it was not complete until the last day when the power of God would reveal even the present physical frame (Rom 8:11; Phil 3:21, etc).

As the first man to belong to the higher order, and as the point from which the race could take a fresh start, Christ could bring to Adam what he termed the new man (Eph 3:5 45-49; cf Rom 5:12-21). If Cor 15:46 has any reference to the Pauline doctrine of the two Adams, it is a polemic against it. Such a polemic would not so unlikely.
mystery that God had revealed only in the last days (Col 1 26 f; Eph 3 3-6, etc). The struggles of the apostle in defence of this principle are the most familiar part of his career.

This consciousness of deliverance from the Law came to St. Paul in another way. The Law was meant for men in this world, but the

3. Redemption-union with Christ had raised him out of this world and so taken him away from the Law's control. In the Eph., this fact finds expression in an elaborately reasoned form. As Christ's nature is now a vital part of our nature, His death and resurrection are facts of our past as well. "Ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God" (Col 3 3). But "the law hath dominion over a man only "for so long time as he lived" (Rom 7 1). "Therefore, my brethren, ye also were made dead to the law through the body of Christ" (ver 4). Cf Col 2 11-13.20, where the same argument is used to show that ritual observance is no longer necessary. In Rom 6 1-14 this argument is made to issue in a practical exhortation. Through the death of Christ, which is our death (ver 4), we, like Him, are placed in a higher world (ver 5) where sin has lost its power (ver 7), a world in which we are no longer under Law (ver 14). Hence the strongest moral effort becomes our duty (ver 13; cf 2 Cor 5 14 f).

This release from the Law, however, does not solve the whole problem. Evil, present and past, is a fact, Law or no Law (on Rom 4 8). But the Law had its role in the redemption plan. St. Paul's avoidance of the Levitical terms except in Eph 6 2, yet they offered the only help possible for the treatment of this most complex of problems. The guilt of our sins is "covered" by the death of Christ (1 Cor 15 3, where this truth is among those which were delivered to converts "first of all"; Rom 3 25; 4 25; 5 6, etc). This part of his theology St. Paul leaves in an incomplete form. He was accustomed, like any other man of his day, whether Jew or Gentile, to think nature, "to worship" (ver 15, 16), and neither he nor his converts were conscious of any difficulty involved. Nor has theology since his time been able to contribute much toward advancing the solution of the problem. The fatal results of uncheckable, its involving the whole man, the guilty, and the value of vicarious suffering, are simple facts of our experience that defy our attempts to reduce them to intellectual formulas. In St. Paul's case it is to be noted that he views the in- cipient as coming from God (Rom 3 25; 5 8; 8 22, etc), because of His love toward man, so that a "gift-propitiation" of an angry deity is a theory the precise opposite of the Pauline. Moreover, Christ's death is not a mere fact of the past, but through the "mystic identification" is incorporated into the life of every believer.

Further developments of this doctrine about Christ's death find in it the complete destruction of whatever remained of the Law (Col 2 14), esp. as the barrier between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2 15 f.). The extenuation of the effects of the death to the unseen world (Col 2 15; cf Gal 4 9; Eph 4 8) was of course natural.

The death of Christ as producing a subjective moral power in the believer is appealed to fre- quently in the Pauline epistles (cf 2 Cor 1 5, 5; Phil 2 25; etc). While the idea Example is perhaps present to some degree even in Rom 3 26. From a different point of view, the Cross as teaching the vanity of worldly things is a favorite subject with St. Paul (1 Cor 1 22-25; 2 Cor 13 4; Gal 5 11; 6 14, etc. These aspects require no explanation.

There are, accordingly, in St. Paul’s view of the death of Christ, several “mysteries,” the “juridic,” and the “ethical.” But this distinction is largely only genetic and logical, and the lines tend to become indistinct in application. Consequently, it is frequently an impossible exegetical problem to determine which portion of the whole is prominent in any given passage (e.g. 2 Cor 15 4).

Regarding the Law a further question remained, which had great importance in St. Paul’s controversies. If the Law was useless for 6. Function salvation, why was it given at all? How could the Law of the Old Testament be so prominent in any given passage (e.g. 2 Cor 15 4)?

There was a desire to transcend it, but there was no power to help toward fulfillment. So the Law gave knowledge of sin (Rom 3 20; Gal 5 17); but still Paul had the purpose to gain righteousness one must desire it and this desire the Law taught (Rom 7 12-16; 2 18), even though it had no power to help toward fulfillment. Thus the Law gave knowledge of sin (Rom 3 20; Gal 5 17; cf. 1 Cor 15 56). Thus the Law became our παιδιστός “to bring us unto Christ” (Gal 3 24; see SCHOOLMASTER), and came in “besides” (Rom 4 15) of the Corinthian plan. Indeed, this could be shown from the Law itself, which proved that faith was the primary method of salvation (Rom 4; cf. Gal 3 17) and which actually prophesied its own repeal (Gal 4 21). With this conclusion, which must have required much time to work out, St. Paul’s reversal of his former Pharisaic position was complete.

IV. Special Topics.—As Christ is the central element in the life of the believer, all believers have this element in common and are so united with each other (Rom 12 5). This is the basis of the Pauline doctrine of the church. The use of the word “church” to denote the whole body of believers is not attained until the later part of the N.T. (Gal 4 26—8:18; cf. 1 Cor 7 17; Rom 16 16, etc.)—but the idea is present from the beginning. Indeed, the only terms in Judaism that were still applicable were those of the “nation” (Israel). Paul uses the latter term (Gal 6 16) and quite constantly employs it when referring at the same time to the Gentiles as the Holy Nation (e.g. cf. Eph 5 25 with Hos 2 19 f.). and time was needed in order to give ekklēsia (properly “calling”) the true content.

The church is composed of all who have professed faith and been united in the salvation of their Lord. But no matter how it is taken, it is evident that the church is not everywhere the same, or all have the same rights. The church is the body of Christ, which has been established in the whole world by Paul. The church is that which has come to Christ, have the same nature as the Lord Jesus Christ. The church is the body of Christ, the extension of His personality into the world (Eph 1 22-23; 2 20; 5 23). In the church we, with the Lord’s body, are subject to the same duty toward one another, but also the responsibility of carrying Christ’s message into the world (Phil 1 15, and presupposed everywhere), and the glory in the church and in Christ Jesus unto all generations for ever and ever” (Eph 3 21).

As the death of Christ is something more than a subjective impression made on the mind by the fact of that death of Christ, and the death of Christ with the death accomplished in baptism in Rom 6 1-7 and Col 2 11 it is not explained, but by supposing there to be a more dramatic ceremony. That St. Paul was greatly influenced by the mystery-religion concepts has not been made out. But his readers certainly so were influenced and tended to conceive very mystical and spiritualistic the death of Christ (Rom 10 6; 15 29). And historic exegesis is bound to construe St. Paul’s language in the way in which he knew his readers would understand it, and a literal gentile reader of St. Paul’s day would have seen a purely “symbolic” meaning in either of the baptismal passages. Philo would have done so, but not the class of men with whom St. Paul had to deal. Similarly, with regard to the Lord’s Supper, in 1 Cor 10 16 St. Paul teaches that through participation in a sacral meal it is possible to bring into objective relations with demons of whom one is wholly ignorant. In this light it is hard to avoid the conclusion that through participation in the Lord’s Supper the believer is objectively brought into communion with the Lord (1 Cor 10 16). A communion that will react for evil on the believer if he approach it in an unworthy manner (11 29-32): i.e., the union with Christ that is the center of St. Paul’s theology is being represented to be obtained by some sort of participation in the Lord’s Supper. And in the Lord’s Supper this union is further strengthened, so that faith on the part of the believer is an indispensable prerequisite for the efficacy of the sacrament. St. Paul’s presentation of the Lord’s Supper is a complete and precise, if not exhaustive, presentation of the Christian faith.

LITERATURE.—See under PAUL.

PAULUS, pól'ús, SERGIUS, síg'ús, Sêr'gios Paí'dòs, Sêr'gios Paúlòs): The Rom “proconsul” (RV) or “deputy” (AV) of Cyprus when Paul, along with Barnabas, visited that island on his first missionary journey (Acts 13 47). The official title of Sergius is more appropriately given to him, however, since he was originally an imperial province, but in 22 BC it was transferred by Augustus to the Senate, and was therefore placed under the administration of proconsuls, as is attested by extant Cyprian coins of the period.

When the two missionaries arrived at Paphos, Sergius, who was a “prudent man” (AV) or “man of understanding” (RV), i.e. a man of practical understanding, “sought to hear the word of God” (Acts 13 7). Bar-Jesus, or Elymas, a sorcerer in the name of Zeus, approached Sergius, fearing the influence of the apostles, sought, however, “to turn aside the proconsul from the faith,” but was struck with blindness (vs 8-11); and the deputy, “when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the teaching of the Lord” (ver 12). The narrative indicates that not only the proconsul, but also the whole nation of Cyprus, with which Sergius listened to the teaching of Paul (ver 7) conduced to his conversion (Bengel). Attempts have been made to trace some connection between the name Sergius Paulus and the fact that Saul is first called Paul in ver 9, but the joint occurrence of the two names is probably to be set down as only a coincidence.

PAVEMENT, pāv'ment: In the OT, with the exception of 2 K 16 17, the Heb word is רֶפַע, repah (2 Ch 7 3; Est 1 6; Ezk 40 17, etc.). In Sir 20 18 and Bel ver 19 the word is סָדָן, sedan; in Jn 19 13, the name “The Paving” (לְהָרָעָת, lēhārātā, “paved with stone”) is given to a place outside the Praetorium on which Pilate sat to give judgment upon Jesus; and to the Arab (Arabic) equivalent is declared to be GABBATHA (v. q.). The identification of the place is uncertain.

PAVILION, pa-vil'yan: a covered place, booth, tent, in which a person may be set aside in a hid or secret (סִוק, sōkh, Ps 27 5; סִוקָה, sōkāh—the same word in Ps 31 20), or otherwise be withdrawn from view.
The term is used with reference to God (2 S 22 12; Ps 18 11); to kings drinking in privacy (1 K 20 12; 27). AV gives "pavilion" for AV "tabernacle" in Job 36 29; Isa 4 6; while in Nu 26 8 it substitutes this word, with m "alocve," for AV "tent" (קֹבֶד, and Jer 43 10, for "royal pavilion" (שַׁפְרָה) reads in m "glittering pavilion."

PAW, pō (פֶּו, kaph, lit. "palm," "yāh, lit. "hand"): The former (kaph) is applied to the soft paws of animals in contradistinction to the hoofs (Lev 11 27); the latter is thrice used in 1 S 17 37: "Jeh that delivered me out of the paw (יָדָּה) of the lion (לֵו) and out of the bear (בֹּר) he will deliver me out of the hand (יָדָּה) of this Philistine." The vb. "to paw" (פָּה, pāh) is found in the description of the horse: "He paweth m ["they paw""] in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth out to meet the armed men ["the [wars]""] (Job 39 21). The word is usually tr 4 to "delive into," to "try into," to "explore."

PÈ, pÈ (פֶּ: The 17th letter of the Hebr alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as p.

PEACE, pēq (פֶׁ֖ו, shālôm; פֶּ֑: faith, trust, welfare); is a condition of freedom from disturbance, whether outwardly, as of a nation from war, or internally, as of the soul. The Hebr word is shālôm (both adj. and subst.), meaning, primarily, "southernness," "accommodating," but coming also to signify "prosperity," well-being in general, all good in relation to both man and God. In early times, to a people harassed by foes, peace was the primary blessing. In Ps 122 7, we have peace and prosperity, and in 36 7; 73 7, shālôm is tr 4 prosperity. In 2 S 11 7 AV, David asked of Uriah "how Joab did" (m "of the peace of Joabs"), and "how the people did [RV "fared," lit. "of the peace of the people"], and how the war prospered" (lit. "and of the peace [welfare] of the war.").

(1) Shālôm was the common friendly greeting, used in asking after the health of anyone; also in farewells (Gen 29 6, "Ja it well with him!" ["Is there peace to him?"]). 43 23, "Peace to you;" where Gal sketched the way of their welfare [of their peace];] Jps 6 23, "Jeh said unto him, Peace be unto thee;" 18 15 [AV "saluted him," ["He asked him of peace," RV "of his welfare;"] 19 20, etc]. See also GREETING. (2) Peace from enemies (implying prosperity) was the great desire of the nation and was the gift of God to the people if they walked in His ways (Lev 26 6; Nu 6 26, "Jeh lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace;" Ps 29 11; Isa 26 12, etc). To "die in peace" was greatly to be desired (Gen 27 32; 40 34, etc). (3) Inward peace was the portion of the righteous who trusted in God (Job 22 21, "Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace [שָׁלֹם; Ps 4 8; 85 8, "He will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints;" 119 365,; Prov 3 17, Isa 26 3, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace [Heb "peace, peace," whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee;" Mal 2 5]; also outward peace (Job 5 23 24; Prov 16 7, etc). (4) Peace was to be sought and followed by the righteous (Ps 34 14, "Seek peace, and pursue it;" 15 16, 18 19, "Love truth and peace"). (5) Peace should be a prominent feature of the Messianic times (Isa 2 4 6, "Prince of Peace;" 11 6; Ezek 34 25; Mic 4 2 4; Zec 9 10). In the NT, where eirēnē has much the same meaning and usage as shālôm (for which it is employed in the LXX; cf. Lk 19 42, RV "If thou hadst known . . . the things which belong unto peace"), we refer to it mostly through the coming of the Christ (Lk 21 1 7479; 12 51) and also its fulfilment in the higher spiritual sense.

(1) The gospel in Christ is a message of peace from God to men (Lk 2 14, Acts 10 36, "peace- ing . . . by Jesus Christ"). It is "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," in Rom 5 1; AV 10 15; peace between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2 14 15); an essential element in the spiritual kingdom of God (Rom 14 17). (2) It is to be cherished and followed by Christians. Jesus exhorted His disciples, "Have salt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another" (Mk 9 50; Paul exorts, "Live in peace: and the God of love and peace shall be with you" (2 Cor 13 11; of Rom 12 18; 1 Cor 7 15). (3) God is therefore "the God of peace," the Author and Giver of all good ("peace" including every blessing) very frequently (e.g. Rom 15 33; 16 20; 2 Thess 3 16, etc., "the Lord of peace"). "Peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" is a common apostolic wish or salutation (Col 1 3; 1 Cor 1 3; 2 Cor 13 10). (4) Christ is called "peace" as a greeting (Mt 10 13; Lk 10 5); "a son of peace" (10 6) is one worthy of it, in sympathy with it; the Lord's own greeting to His disciples was "Peace be unto you" (Lk 24 36; Jn 20 19 21). (5) In the NT, the word is almost as often used as "peacemaker." (6) The peace and Christ, brought by the gospel, is the Messianic spiritual peace from and with God, peace in the heart, peace as the disposition or spirit. He said that He did not come "to send peace on the earth, but a sword," referring to the searching nature of His call and the divisions and clearances it would create. But, of course, the spirit of the gospel and of the Christian is one of peace, and it is a Christian duty to seek to bring war and strife everywhere to an end. This is represented as the ultimate result of the gospel and Spirit of Christ; universal and permanent peace can come only as that Spirit rules in men's hearts.

"Peace" in the sense of silence, to hold one's peace, etc. is in the OT generally the tr of בָּשָׂך, "to be still," "to be silent" (Gen 18 25; 20 17; of "peace bringer of God" [ cf. Ps 44 2]); לִשְׁחוֹר, "to hush," "to be silent" (2 K 3 3; Ps 39 2); מָשַׁק, and of other verbs, in Job 29 30 ("The nobles held their peace," AV). It is also "voic."

In the NT we have σιγᾶ, "to be silent," "to cease speaking." Of S 1: 26 49, "to be silent," "not to speak" (Lk 20 26; Acts 12 17; ἠπειροάσθη, "to be quiet." Lk 14 4; Acts 11 18). φωνῆδω, "to muzzle or gag" (Mk 1 25; Lk 4 38). In Arabic eirēnē is frequent, mostly in the sense of peace, welfare (Tob 13 14; Jth 3 1; Ecc 13 15; 1 Mace 5 54; 6 49; 2 Mace 16 4; eirēnē = "tranquility").

RV gives "peace" for "tongue." (Est 7 4; Job 6 24; Am 6 10; Hab 1 13); "at peace with me" for "perfect." (Isa 42 18, "made perfect," or "recompensed") ("security" instead of "peaceable," and "peace" (10 15; 11 21); "came in peace to the city," for "came to Shalem, for we have till the earth." (Gen 33 18); peace also instead of "for peace" (Isa 38 17; "when they are in peace," for "and that should have been for their welfare" (Ps 49 22).

PEACEMAKER, pēmās-mē-ē: Occurs only in the pl. (Mt 5 9, "Blessed are the peacemakers [εἰρηνοτοιοι] for they shall be called sons of God" [who is the "God of peace"]). We have also what seems to be a reflection of this saying in Jas 3 18, "The fruit of righteousness is sown in peace for [εἰρηνοτοιοι] them that make peace" (εἰρηνοτοιοι). In classical Gr a "peacemaker" was an ambassador sent to treat of peace. The word in Mt 5 9 would, perhaps, be better rendered “peace-workers,” implying not merely making peace between those who are at variance, but actually producing that which is the will of the God of peace for men.

PEACOCK, pe’kôk (םֶפָּה, tuklêyîm [pl.]; Lat Pavo cristatus): A bird of the genus Pavo. Japan is the native home of the plainer peafowl; Siam, Ceylon and India produce the commonest and most gorgeous. The peacock has a bill of moderate size with an arched tip, its cheeks are bare, the eyes not large, but very luminous, a crest of 24 feathers 2 in. long, with naked shafts and broad tips of blue, glancing to green. The neck is not long but proudly arched, the breast full, prominent and of bright blue green, blue predominant. The wings are short and ineffectual, the feathers on them made up of a surprising array of colors. The tail consists of 18 short, stiff, grayish-brown feathers. Next is the lining of the train, of the same color. The glory of this glorious bird lies in its train. It begins on the bend between the wings in tiny feathers not over 6 in. in length, and extends backward. The quills hold a mass of purple, crimson, and gold feathers. The eye at the tip of each feather from one-half to 1 in. across, of a deep peculiar blue, surrounded at the lower part by two half-moon-shaped crescents of green. Whether the train lies naturally, or is spread in full glory, the whole shows encrusted with a marvel, the glancing shades of blue, gold, purple, blue and bronze. When this train is spread, it opens like a fan behind the head with its sparkling crest, and above the wondrous blue of the breast. The bird has the advantage to contract the music at the pleasure of the quills and play a peculiar sort of music with them. It loves high places and cries before a storm in notes that are starting to one not familiar with them. The bird can be domesticated and will become friendly enough to take food from the hand. The peahen is smaller than the cock, her neck green, her wings gray, tan and brown—but she has not the gorgeous train. She nests on earth and breeds with difficulty when imported, the young being delicate and tender. The grown birds are barely when acclimated, and live to old age. By some freak of nature, pure white peacocks are at times produced. Aristophanes mentioned peafowl in his Birds, ii. 102, 206. Alexander claimed that he brought them into Greece to contract the music at the pleasure of the quills and play a peculiar sort of music with them. It loves high places and cries before a storm in notes that are starting to one not familiar with them. The bird can be domesticated and will become friendly enough to take food from the hand.

PEDAHAL, ped’â-hel (πεδαχήλ, p’dehâ’hel, “whom God redeems”): A prince of Naphthali; one of the tribal chiefs who apportioned the land of Canaan (Nu 34 28; cf verse 17).

PEDAHZUR, ped’âzur (πεδάχυρ, p’dehâ’zur): Mentioned in Nu 1 10; 2 20; 7 54, 59; 10 23 as the father of Gamaliel, head of the tribe of Manasseh, at the time of the exodus. See Expos T, VIII, 555ff.

PEPDAH, ped’â-ya, ped’â’ya (πεπδα, p’dá’ya, “Jeh redeems”): (1) Father of Joel, who was ruler of Western Manasseh in David’s reign (1 Ch 27 20). Form πεπδάθ, p’dadhâ’th (see above).

PEDAHZUR, ped’â-za’ur (πεδαχυρ, p’dehâ’zur): (2) Pedahzur of Runah (2 K 23 36), father of Zezubah, Jehoakim’s mother.

PEDAHAI, ped’â’ya, ped’â’ya (πεπδα, p’dá’ya, “Jeh redeems”): (3) A son of Jecolah (1 Ch 3 18); in ver 19 the father of Zerubbabel. Pedahai’s brother, Shelahth, is also called father of Zerubbabel (Ezr 3 2; but in 1 Ch 3 17 AV spelled “Salathiel”). There may have been two cousins, or even different individuals, who are referred to under Shelahth and Salathiel respectively.

PEDAHAI, ped’â’ya, ped’â’ya (πεπδα, p’dá’ya, “Jeh redeems”): (4) Another who helped to repair the city wall (Neh 3 25), of the family of Pahoi (q.v.). Perhaps this is the man who stood by Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8 4; 1 Esd 9 44, called “Phadeus”).

5 “Levite,” appointed one of the treasurers over the “treasuries” of the Lord’s house (Neh 13: 13).

A Benjaminite, one of the rulers residing in Jerusalem under the “return” arrangements (Neh 11: 7).

PEDESTAL, ped’ē-s-tal (Τέμπες, kēn): In two places (1 K 7 29.31) RV gives this word for AV “base” (in Solomon’s “Sea”).

PEDIAS, ped’ē-as, pē-d’ē-as (Πεδίας, Pedias, A. Παδιέας, Pediais; AV by mistake Pelias): One of those who had taken “strange wives” (1 Esd 9 34) = “Bedethah” of Ezr 10 35.

PEDIGREE, ped’ē-grē (“Παρθενία, hēktyalēthē, “to show one’s birth”): The Eng. word “pedigree” occurs only once in the Bible, according to the concordance. In Nu 1 18, it is said: “They declared their pedigrees”; that is, they enrolled or registered themselves according to their family connections. The same idea is expressed frequently, employing a different term in the Heb, by the common phrase of Ch, Ezr and Neh, “to reckon by genealogy,” “to give genealogy,” etc (cf 1 Ch 7 5.9; Ezr 2 62 f; Neh 7 64). These last passages indicate the importance of the registered pedigree or genealogy of the priests in the post-exilic community, for the absence of the list of their pedigrees, or their genealogical records, was sufficient to cause the exclusion from the priesthood of certain enrolled priests.

WALTER R. BETTERRIDGE

PEEL, pēl, PILL, pil: “Fill” (Gen 30 37.38; Tob 11 13 [RV “scaled”]) and “peel” (Isa 18 2.7 [AV and RVm]; Ezk 29 18 [AV and RV]) are properly two different words, meaning “to remove the hair” (pine) and “to remove the skin” (pelle), but in Elizabethan Eng, the two were confused. In Isa 18 2.7, the former meaning is implied, as the Heb word here (חָרַד, mdrāt) is rendered “pluck off the hair” in Ezr 9 3; Neh 13 25; Isa 50 6. The word, however, may also mean “make smooth” (so RVm) or “bronzed.” This last, referring to the dark skins of the Ethiopians, is best here, but in any case AV and RVm are impossible. In the other cases, however, “remove the skin” (cf “scaled,” Tob 11 13 RV) is meant. So in Gen 30 37.38, Jacob “peeled” (so RV) off portions of the bark of his rod, so as to give alternating colors (cf ver 39). And in Ezk 29 18, the point is Nebuchadrezzar’s total failure in his siege of Tyre, although the soldiers had carried burdens until the skin was peeled from their shoulders (cf AV “worn.”)

BRUNO SCOTT EASTON

PEEP, pēp (πεπάν, ‘sphaph: AV Isa 8 19; 10 14 [RV “chirp!”]): In 10 14, the word describes the sound made by a nesting bird; in 8 19, the changed (ventrilocust?) voice of neccromancers uttering sounds that purported to come from the feebly dead. The modern use of “peep” as “look” is found in Sir 21 23, as the tr of παρακάτωσθαι, parakatāpō: “A foolish man peepeth in from the door of another man’s house.”

1. Accession Pekah murdered his predecessor, Pekahiah, and seized the reins of power (ver 25). His usurpation of the throne is said to have taken place in the 53rd year of Jotham, and his reign to have lasted for 20 years (ver 27). His accession, therefore, may be placed in 748 BC (other chronologies place it later, and make the reign last only a few years).

Pekah came to the throne with the resolution of assisting in forming a league to resist the westward advance of Assyria. The memory of defeat by Assyria at the battle of Karkar in 753, more than 100 years before, had never died out.

2. Attitude Tiglath-pileser III was now ruler of Assyria (Assyria/Walam in the list of nations since 745 had proved himself a resistless conqueror. His lust for battle was not yet satisfied, and the turn of Philiest and Syria was about to come. In 753, a coalition, of which Pekah was a prominent member, was being formed to check his advance. It comprised the princes of Comagene, Gebal, Hamath, Arvad, Ammon, Moab, Edom, Gaza, Samaria, Syria, and some minor potentates, the list being taken from a roll of the subject-princes who attended an anointing rite on the descending of Damascus. Ahaz likewise attended as a voluntary tributary to do homage to Tiglath-pileser (2 K 16 10).

While the plans of the allies were in course of formation, an obstacle was met with which proved insurmountable by the arts of diplomacy. This was the refusal of Ahaz, Recalciatrant then on the throne of David, to join the confederacy. Arguments and threats having failed to move him, resort was had to force, and the troops of Samaria, who had joined on Jerusalem (2 K 15 15). Great alarm was felt at the news of their approach, as seen in the 7th and 8th chapters of Isa. The allies had in view to dispossess Ahaz of his crown, and give it to one of their own number, who was named Tabeel. Isaiah himself was the mainstay of the opposition to their projects. The policy he advocated, by Divine direction, was that of complete neutrality. This he urged with passionate earnestness, but with only partial success. Isaiah (probably) had kept back Ahaz from joining the coalition, but could not prevent him from sending an embassy, laden with gifts to Tiglath-pileser, to secure his intervention. On the news arriving that the Assyrian was on the march, a hasty retreat was made from Jerusalem, and the blow soon after fell, where Isaiah had predicted, on Rezin and Pekah, and their kingdoms.

The severely concise manner in which the writer of K deals with the later soverigns of the Northern Kingdom is, in all probability, a supplementation in Ch by further facts as to this campaign of the allies. The Chronicler states that “a great multitude of captives” were taken to Damascus and many more. These would be countrymen and women from the outlying districts of Judah, which were ravaged. Those taken to Samaria were, however, returned, unmurt, to Jericho by the advice of the prophet Oded (2 Ch 28 5–15).

The messengers sent from Jerusalem to Nineveh appear to have arrived when the army of Tiglath-pileser was already prepared to march.

5. Fall of Damascus: expeditious, they fell upon Damascus before the junction of the allies as and Eastern accomplished. Rezin was defeated in a decisive battle, and took refuge in his capital, which was closely invested. Another part of the invading army descended on the upper districts of Syria and Samaria. Serious resistance to the veteran troops of the East could hardly be made, and city after city fell. A list of districts and cities that were overrun is given in 2 K 15 29. It comprises Galeah beyond Ebron—already enrolled (1 Ch 5 20: the tribal division of Naphtali, lying to the W. of the lakes of Galilee and Merom, and all Galilee, as far S. as the plain of Esdraelon and the Valley of Jezreel. Cities particularly mentioned are Jizon (now ‘Aynān), Abel-beth-maacah (now ‘Akh,) Janoah (now Yârôn), Kadesh (now Kadoa) and Hazor (now Hadirch). These places and territories were not merely attacked and plundered. Their inhabitants were removed, with indelible loss and banishment, and put to death in Assyria, and given as Halah, Habor, Hara, and both sides of the river Gozan, an affluent of the Euphrates. The transplantation of these tribes to a home beyond the great river was a new experiment in political geography, devised with the object of welding the whole of Western Asia into a single empire. It was work of immense difficulty and must have taxed the resources of even so great an organizer as Tiglath-pileser. The soldiers who had conquered in the field were, of course, employed to escort the many thousands of prisoners to their new locations. About two-thirds of the Sam kingdom, comprising the districts of Samaria, the two Galleries, and the trans-Jordanic region, was thus denuded of its inhabitants.

Left with but a third of his kingdom—humbled but still defiant—Pekah was necessarily unpopular with his subjects. In this extremity— the wave of invasion from the North, having spent itself—the usual solution occurred, and a plot was formed by which the assassination of Pekah should be secured, and the assassin should take his place as a satrap of Assyria. A tool was found in the person of Hoshea, whom Tiglath-pileser claimed to have appointed to the throne. The Bib. narrative does not do more than record the fact that "Hoshea the son of Elah made a conspiracy against Pekah the son of Remaliah, and smote him, and slew him, and reigned in his stead" (2 K 15 18). The date given to this act is the 20th year of Jotham. Pekahiah's reign lasted but 16 years, this number is evidently an error.

For the first time, the historian makes no reference to the religious cult of a king of Israel. The subject was beneath notice. The second section of Isaiah's prophecies in (7 1—10 4) belongs to the reign of Isaiah Ahaz and thus to the time of Pekah, both of whom are named. It is most probable that Pekah is named in 7 1, and is often, in this and the next chapter, referred to as "the son of Remaliah." His loss of the territorial divisions of Zebulun and Naphtali is referred to in 9 1, and is followed by a period of gloomy future glory. It is not known when this Pekah was removed, but it is suggested that his fall was in the year 738, the time of the accession of Tiglath-pileser II. This date is in harmony with the fact that it was written before the fall of Samaria, and that of 10 9-11 that Damascus and Samaria had both fallen and Judah was expected to follow. This section of Isaiah may thus be included in the literature of the time of Pekah.

PEKAHIAH, pê-kâ-êâ (פְּקָהֵיהָ, pîkahâh). "Jehah hath opened" [the eyes]. [2 K 15 23-26; Ëphsorîa, Ëphsicos, A. Ëfêsî.]

1. Accession as Phâxa'ea: Son of Menahem, and 17th king of Israel. He is said to have succeeded his father in the "50th year of Azariah" (or Uzziah), a synchronism not free from difficulty if his accession is placed in 750-749 (see MENAHEM; UZZIAH). Most date lower, after 738, when an Assyrian inscription makes Menahem pay tribute to Tiglath-pileser of 2 K 15 19-21.

Pekahiah came to the throne enveloped in the danger which always accompanies the successor of a exceptionally strong ruler, in a new country where there was no settled law of succession. Within two years of his accession he was finally murdered— the 7th king of Israel who had met his death by violence (the others were Naahal, Elah, Tiben, Jehoram, Zechariah and Shallum). The chief conspirator was Pekah, son of Remaliah, one of his captains, with whom, as agent in the crime, were associated 50 Gileadites. These penetrated into the palace (RV "castle") of the king's house, and put Pekahiah to death, his bodyguards Arab and Arieah, dying with him. The record, in its close adherence to fact, gives no reason for the king's removal, but it may reasonably be surmised that it was connected with a league which was at this time forming for opposing resistance to the power of Assyria. This league, Pekahiah, preferring his father's policy of tributary vassalage, may have refused to join. If so, the decision cost him his life. The act of treachery and violence is in accordance with all that Hosea tells us of the internal condition of Israel at this time: "They... devour their judges; all their kings are fallen" (Hos 7 7).

The narrative of Pekahiah's short reign contains but a brief notice of his personal character. Like his predecessors, Pekahiah did not depart from the system of worship introduced by Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, "who made Israel to sin." Despite the denunciations of the prophets of the Northern Kingdom (Am 5 21-27; Hos 8 1-6), the people and land of the calves remained, till the whole was swept away, a few years later, by the fall of the kingdom.

After Pekahiah's murder, the throne was seized by the regicide Pekah. W. SHAW CALDECOTT

PEKOD, pê-kôd (פְּקֹד, pîkôd). A name applied in Jer 50 21 and Ezk 23 23 to the Chaldaean. EVm in the former passage gives the meaning as "visitation."

PELALIAH, pê-lâ-lî-â (פֶלָלְיָה, plâ'îâh). (1) A son of Elioenai, of the royal house of Judah (1 Ch 3 24).

2. A Levite who assisted Ezra by expounding the Law (Neh 8 7), and was one of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10 10). He is called "Phalaias" in 1 Esd 9 48 (RV).

PELALIAH, pê-lâ-lî-â (פֶלָלְיָה, plîlâgh, "Jeh judges"). A priest, father of Jeroham, one of the "workers" in the Lord's house (Neh 11 12).

PELALIAH, pê-lâ-lî-â (פֶלָלְיָה, plîlâgh, "Jeh delivers") as a name recorded in the text is unknown.

(1) One who "sealed" the covenant (Neh 10 22).
(2) A descendant of Solomon, grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 21).
(3) A Simeonite, one of the captains who cleared out the Amalekites and dwelt on the captured land (1 Ch 4 42 43).

(4) A prince of the people whom Ezekiel (in Babylon) pictures as "deceiving mischief" and giving "wicked counsel" in Jerus. He is represented as falling dead while Ezekiel prophesies (Ezk 11 13. His name has the 7 sounds, ending ".

PELEG, pê-le'g (פֶלֵג, pîlēgh, "watercourse," "division"). A son of Eber, and brother of Joktan. The derivation of the name is given: "for in his days was the earth divided" (םָפִּיהָ) (Gen 10 25; cf. Lk 3 35; AV "Phalech"). This probably refers to the scattering of the world's population and the confounding of its language recorded in Gen 11 1-9. In Aram. plêgh and Arab. palaj mean "division"; in Heb pîlēgh means "watercourse." The name may equally be due to the occupation by this people of some well-watered (removed) district (e.g. in Babylonia), for these patronymes represent races, and the derivation in Gen 10 25 is a later editor's remark.

PELET, pel'ët (םלע, pelet, “deliverance”): (1) Son of Isaiah (1 Ch 2 47). (2) Son of Azmaveth, one of those who resorted to David at Ziklag while he was hiding from Saul (1 Ch 12 3).

PELETH, pel'ëth (םלע, pel eth, “swiftness”): (1) Father of On, one of the rebels against Moses and Aaron (Nu 16 1); probably same as PALLU (q.v.). (2) A descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 33).

PELETHITES, pel'ë-thëts, pel'ë-thët's (םלע, פלטית): A company of David’s bodyguard, like the CHESETHITES (q.v.) (2 S 8 18; 15 18); probably a corrupt form of “Philistines.”

PELIAS, pel'i-ás: AV = RV “Pedias.”

PELICAN, pel'i-kan (בלוקן, ša'ath; Lat Pelecanus onocrotalus [LXX reads ἀλεκάν, pelékan, in Lev and Ps, but has 3 other readings, that are rather confusing, in the other places]). Any bird of the genus Pelecanus. The Heb št means “to vomit.” The name was applied to the bird because it swallowed large quantities of fish and then disgorged them to its nestlings. In the performance of this act it pressed the large beak, in the white species, tipped with red, against the crop and slightly lifted the wings. In ancient times, people, seeing this, believed that the bird was puncturing its breast and feeding its young with its blood. From this idea arose the custom of using a pelican with lifted wings in heraldry or as a symbol of Christ and of charity. (See Fictitious Creatures in Art, 182–86, London, Chapman and Hall, 1906.) Pal knew a white and a brownish-gray bird, both close to 6 ft. long and having over a 12 ft. sweep of wing. They lived around the Dead Sea, fished beside the Jordan and abounded in greatest numbers in the wildernesses of the Mediterranean shore. The brown pelicans were larger than the white. Each of them had a long beak, peculiar throat pouch and webbed feet. They built large nests, 5 and 6 ft. across, from dead twigs of bushes, and laid two or three eggs. The brown birds deposited a creamy-white egg with a rosy flush; the white, a white egg with a bluish tint. The young were naked at first, then covered with down, and remained in the nest until full feathered and able to fly. This compelled the parent birds to feed them for a long time, and they carried such quantities of fish to a nest that the young could not consume all of them and many were dropped on the ground. The tropical sun soon made the location unbearable to mortals. Perching pelicans were the ugliest birds imaginable, but when their immense brown or white bodies swept in a 12 ft. spread across the land and over sea, they made an impressive picture. They are included, with good reason, in the list of abominations (see Lev 11 18; Dt 14 17). They are next mentioned in 2 S 103 6: “I am like a pelican of the wilderness; I become as an owl of the waste places.”

Here David from the depths of affliction likened himself to a pelican as it appears when it perches in the wilderness. See Isa 34 11: “But the pelican and the porcupine shall possess it, and the owl and the raven shall dwell therein: and he will stretch over it the line of confusion, and the plummet of emptiness.” Here the bird is used to complete the picture of desolation that was to prevail after the destruction of Edom. The other reference concerns the destruction of Nibhol and is found in Zeph 2 14: “And the birds of prey shall lodge in the capitals thereof; their voice shall sing in the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds: for he hath laid bare the cedar-wood.”

PELONITE, pel'o-nit, pel'o-nît, pë-li-'nit (פלונית; πλέοντι, a place-name): Two of David’s descendants are thus described: (1) “Helez the Pelonite” (1 Ch 11 27) (see PALTITE); and (2) “Ahijah the Pelonite” (1 Ch 11 36).

PEN, (贲, הָנָּה, heret; καλάμος, kalamos): The first writing was done on clay, wax, lead or stone tablets by scratching into the material with some hard pointed instrument. For this purpose bodkins of bronze, iron, bone or ivory were used (Job 19 24; Isa 8 1; Jer 17 1). In Jer 17 1 a diamond reed is cut diagonally with the penknife and the point thus formed is carefully shaved thin to make it flexible and the nib split as in the modern pen. The last operation is the clipping off of the very point so that it becomes a stub pen. The Arab scribe does this by resting the nib on his thumb nail while cutting, so that the nib will be clean and the pen will not scratch. The whole procedure requires considerable skill. The pupil in Heb or Arab, writing learns to make a pen as his first lesson. A scribe carries a sharp knife around with him for keeping his pen in good condition, hence the name penknife. The word used in 3 Jn ver 13 is kalamos, “reed,” indicating that the pen described above was used in John’s time (cf kalam, the common Arab. name for pen). See Ink; Ink-Horn; Writing.

Figuratively “Written with a pen of iron,” i.e. indelibly (Jer 17 1), “My words are the pen of a ready writer” (Ps 45 1; cf Jer 36 18). As the trained writer records a speech, so the Psalmist’s tongue impresses or engraves on his hearers’ minds what he has conceived.

comes a history of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the collateral lines of descendants being rapidly dismissed. The story of Joseph is told in detail, and Gen closes with his death. The rest of the Pent contains the story of the Israelites in Egypt, their exodus and wanderings, the conquest of the trans-Jordanic lands and the fortunes of the people to the death of Moses. The four concluding books contain masses of legislation mingled with the narrative (for special contents, see arts, on the several books).

II. Authorship, Composition, Date.—The view that Moses was the author of the Pent, with the exception of the concluding vs of Dt, was once held universally. It is still held by the greatest class of Jews, Critical and Christians, but in most universities of Northern Europe and North America other theories prevail. An application of what is called "higher" or "documentary criticism" (to distinguish it from lower or textual criticism) has led to the formation of a number of hypotheses. Some of these are very widely held, but unanimity has not been attained, and recent investigations have challenged even the conclusions that are most generally accepted. In England the vast majority of the critics would regard Driver's LOT and Carpenter and Harford-Batterby's Hexateuch as fairly representative of their position, but on the Continent of Europe the numerous school that holds such positions is developing rapidly.

The current school during recent years, however, has been the school that has been called by the terms "higher" and "critical." While even in Great Britain and America some of the ablest critics are beginning to show signs of being shaken in their allegiance to cardinal points of the higher-critical case. However, at the time of writing, the "higher-critical" school still has a majority, and controversy is beginning to find a new freshness of their views, and accordingly the general positions of the works named may be taken as representing with certain qualifications the general critical theory. Some of the chief stadia in the development of this may be mentioned.

After attention had been drawn by earlier writers to various signs of post-Mosaic date and extraordinary perplexities in the Pent, the first real step toward what its advocates have, till within the last few years, called "the modern position" was taken by J. Astruc (1753). He propounded what Astruc terms "the clue to the documents," i.e., the difference of the Divine appellations in Gen as a test of authorship. On this view the word "divine" (characteristic of two principal sects, and the Tetragrammaton, i.e., the Divine name YHVH represented by the "or the Lord") is a "God" to one and another. Despite occasional warning, this clue was followed in the main for 150 years. Eventually it was found that the whole current mass of critical development, but the most recent investigations have successfully proved that it is unreliable (see below, 3, [a]). Astruc was followed by Eichhorn (1790), who made a more thorough examination of Gen, indicating numerous differences of style, representation, etc.

Stede (1792) and Vater (1802-5) extended the method applied to Gen to the other books of the Pent. In 1819 Bingen distinguished two Elohist in Gen, but this view did not find followers for some time. The next step of importance was the assignment of the bulk of Dt to the 7th cent. BC. This was due to De Wette (1806). Hupfeld (1805) again distinguished a second portion of the book, and this has been adopted by the critics. Thus there are four main documents at least: D (the bulk of Dt), the Elohist (P) and E, and one document (c) that under the Tetragrammaton in Gen. From 1822 (Block) a series of writers maintained that the Book of Josiah was compounded from the same documents as the Pent (see Hexateuch).

Two other developments call for notice: (1) there has been a tendency to divide these documents further, regarding them as the work of schools rather than of individual writers; in this way, for instance, P is divided into different parts (P, etc.), and the notation of other writers J, Je, etc.; (2) a particular scheme of dating has found wide acceptance, and in the corresponding theories it was assumed that the principal Elohist (P) was the earliest document. A succession of writers of whose names we know, Graf, Kuenen, and Wellhausen are the most prominent, have, however, maintained that this is not the first hypothesis that put the problem, and should therefore be regarded as an earlier or later. On this view the theory is in outline as follows: J and E (so called from their respective Divine appellations)—on the relative dates of which opinions differ—were composed probably during the early monarchical and actually combined to form a single document JE. In the 7th cent. D, the bulk of Dt, was composed. It was placed in the year of Josiah's reign. Later it was combined with JE into JED by a redactor (R). P or PC, the last of all (originally the Priestly Elohist, modified by the Hellenistic School) is an earlier date of uncertain which consists mainly of Leviticus and Numbers. The Code of the Law of Holiness (H or Pa). P itself is largely post-exilic. Ultimately it was joined with JED by a priestly redactor (Reu) last substantially our present Pent. As already stated, the theory is subject to many minor variations. Moreover, it is admitted that not all its portions are equally well supported, and W. Jns is regarded as less certain than the separation of J and E. Again, there are many variations, differences of opinion as to the exact dating of the documents, and so forth. Yet the view just sketched has been held by a very numerous and influential school during recent years, nor is it altogether fair to lay stress, and J. H. Rowen's OT Intro may be regarded as a typical modern presentation of their view; the latter esp. by Robertson and Orr. The scheme put forward by the last named has found many adherents. He refuses to regard J and E as two separate documents, holding that they should rather think (as in the case of the Ld) of two revisions of one document marked by the use of different Divine appellations. The critical P he treats as the work of a supplement, and the title it gives to a dependence existed before he considers the whole Pent as early. He holds that the work was done by "original composers, working with a common aim, and toward a common end, in contrast with the idea of later irresponsible redactors, combining, altering, manipulating, enlarging at pleasure" (POT, 375).

While these were the views held among OT critics, a separate opposition had been growing up among archaeologists. This was of course utilized to the utmost by the conservatives of both schools, and in some ways archaeology undoubtedly has confirmed the traditional view as against the critical (see Archaeology and Criticism); but a candid survey leads to the belief that it has not yet dealt a mortal blow, and here again it must be remembered that the critics may justly plead that they must not be judged on mistakes that they made in their earlier investigations and that the more uncertain portions of their theory, but rather on the main completed result. It might be said that the conflicting views on certain topics to which archaeology can never supply any conclusive answer. If it be the case that the Pent contains hopelessly contradictory laws, no archaeological discovery can make them anything else; if the numbers of the Israelites are original and impossible, archaeology cannot make them possible. It is fair and right to lay stress on the instances in which archaeology has confirmed the Bible as against the critics; it is neither fair nor right to speak as if archaeology had done what it never purported to do and did not do.

The year 1908 saw the beginning of a new critical development which makes it very difficult to speak positively of modern critical views. Kuenen has been mentioned as one of the ablest and most eminent of those who brought the Graf-Wellhausen theory into prominence. In that year B. D. Eerdmans, his pupil and successor at Leyden, began the publication of a series of essays in which he renounces his allegiance to the line of critics that had extended from Astruc to the publications of our own day, and entered on a series of investigations that were intended to set forth a new critical view. As his labors are not yet complete, it is impossible to present any account of his scheme; but the volumes already published justify certain remarks. Eerdmans has perhaps not converted any member of the Wellhausen school, but he has made many realize that their own scheme is not the only one possible. Thus while a few years ago we were constantly assured that the "main results" of OT criticism were unalterable, it is now evident that the current writers adopt a very different tone: e.g. Sellin (1910) says, "We stand in a time of fermentation and transition, and in what follows we present our own opinion merely as the hypothesis which appears to us to be the best founded." (Erdberlg, 11 s.). By general consent Eerdmans' work contains a number of isolated shrewd remarks to which criticism will have to attend in the future; but it also contains many observations that are demonstrably unsound (Erbhega, 1910, 549-51). His own reconstruction is in many respects so faulty and blurred that it does not seem likely that it will ever secure a large following in its present form.

On the other hand he appears to have succeeded in inducing a large number of students in various parts of the world to think along new lines and in this way may exercise a very potent influence on the future course of OT study. His arguments show increasingly numerous signs of his having been influenced by the theories of R. Driver, and though he gives the names of certain problems and it seems certain that criticism will ultimately be driven to recognize the essential soundness of the conservative position. In 1912 Dahse (TMH, 1) began the publication of a series of volumes attacking the Graf-Wellhausen theory, and suggesting a new pericope hypothesis. In his view many phenomena are due to the influence of the pericopes of the synagogal service or the form of the text and not to the causes generally assigned.

The examination of the Graf-Wellhausen theory must now be undertaken, and attention must first be directed to the evidence which is 1. Evidence adduced in its support. Why should for Critical the Current Scheme and D? Why is it believed that these documents are of very late date, in one case subsequent to the exile?

(1) Astruc's clue.—It has been said above that Astruc provided us with a clue to the dissertation of that Book, this is based on Ex 8 8. And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac and unto Jacob, by the name of Shaddai, but by my name YWHW I was not known to them. In numerous places unprofitably settled, represented, written, known, e.g. 4 20, where we read of men beginning to call on it in the days of Knoeh. The discrepancy here is very obvious. The God of Israel left Kadesbarnea in the 3d year and never returned to it, while in Nu they apparently remain there till the journey to Mt. Hor, where Aaron dies in the 40th year. The Tent of Meeting perhaps provides some of the most perplexing of the discrepancies, for while according to the well-known scheme of Ex 25 ff and many other passages, it would appear very accommodating in the midst of the camp, Ex 33:7—11 provides us with another Tent of Meeting that stood outside the camp at a distance and could be carried by Moses alone. The vbs. used are frequentative, denoting a regular process; and it is impossible to suppose that after receiving the commands for the Tent of Meeting Moses could have instituted a quite different tent of the same name. Joseph again is sold, now by Ishmaelites (Gen 37:22,28; 39:1), anon by MT (25:26,30). Sometimes he is imprisoned in one place, sometimes apparently in another. The story of Korah, Dathan and Abiram in Nu 16 is equally full of difficulty. The enormous numbers of the Israelites given in Nu 1—4, etc., are in conflict with the passages that regard them as very few.

(4) Doubts.—Another portion of the critical argument is provided by doublets or duplicate narrations of the same event, e.g. Gen 16 and 21. These are particularly numerous in Gen, but are not confined to that book. “Twice do unjust circuits compass in their day the midst of the camp at 31:4—6.31 ff; Ex 16:13. Twice does Moses draw water from the rock, when the strife of Israel begets the name Meribah (‘strife’) (Ex 17:1—7; Nu 20:1—13).” (a) Carpenter, Hexateuch, I, 30.

Thus the best strategy is to proceed from the argument and their supposed historical setting. By far the most important portions of this are examined in Sanctuary and Priestly (q.v.). These subjects form the two main pillars of the Graf-Wellhausen theory, and as such they are the art, in question must be read as supplementing the present article. An illustration may be taken from the slavery laws. It is claimed that Ex 21:1—6; Dt 15:12 if permit a Hebrew to contract for life slavery after 6 years’ service, but that Lev 25:39—42 takes no notice of this law and enacts the totally different provision that Hebrews may remain in slavery only till the Year of Jubilee. While these different enactments might proceed from the same hand if properly coordinated, it is contended that this is not the case and that the legislator in Lev ignores the legislator in Ex and is in turn ignored by the legislator in Dt, who only knows the law of Ex.

(6) The argument from style.—The argument from style is frequently a very effective one, since it depends so largely on an immense mass of details. It is said that each of the sources has certain characteristic phrasings which either occur nowhere else or only with very much less frequency. For instance in Gen 1, where ’Ribkim is used throughout, we find the word “create,” but this is not employed in 2 4b ff, where the Tetragrammaton occurs. Hence it is argued that this word is peculiarly characteristic of P as contrasted with the other documents, and may be used to prove his presence in e.g. 5 11.

(7) Proofs of the development hypothesis.—While the main supports of the Graf-Wellhausen theory must be sought in the arts, to which reference has been made, it is necessary to mention briefly some other phenomena to which some weight is attached. Jer displays many close resemblances to Dt, and the framework of K is written in a style that has marked similarities to the same book. Ezek again has notable points of contact with P and esp. with H; either he was acquainted with the portion or else he must have exercised considerable influence on those who composed them. Lastly the Chronicon is obviously acquainted with the completed Pent. Accordingly, it is claimed that the literature provides a sort of external standard that confirms the historical stages which the different Pentateuchal sources are said to mark. Dt influences Jer and the subsequent literature. It is argued that it would equally have influenced the earlier books of the Pentateuch. Thus if completed Pent should have influenced K as it did Ch, if it had been in existence when the earlier history was composed.

(1) The veto of textual criticism.—The first great objection that may be made to the higher criticism is that it starts from the Massoretic text (MT) without investigation. This is not the only text that has come down to us, and in some instances it can be shown that alternative readings that have been preserved are superior to those of the MT. A convincing example occurs in Ex 18. According to the Heb, Jethro comes to Moses and says “I, thy father-in-law . . . am come,” and subsequently Moses goes out to meet his father-in-law. The critics here postulate different sources, but some of the best authorities have preserved a reading which (allowing for ancient differences of orthography) supposes an alteration of a single letter. According to this reading the text of the Heb would read “Behold thy father-in-law . . . is come.” As the result of this Moses went out and met Jethro. The vast improvement in the sense is self-evident. But in weighing the change other considerations must be borne in mind. Since this is the reading of some of the most ancient authorities, only two views are possible. Either the MT has undergone a corruption of a single letter, or else a redactor made a most improbable change to two or three letters which gave a narrative of the historical event. This is confirmed by the fact that this was followed by textual corruption of so happy a character as to remove the difficulty by the change of a single letter; and this corruption was so widespread that it was accepted as the genuine text by some of our best authorities. There is little doubt which of these two cases is the more credible, and with the recognition of the textual solution the particular bit of the analysis that depends on this corruption falls to the ground. This instance illustrates one branch of textual criticism; there are others. Sometimes the narrative shows with certainty that in the transmission of the text transactions have taken place; e.g. the identification of Kadesh shows that it was B, of Horah. The evidence is not always clear, and even the report of the sea to the Red Sea would not bring the Israelites to Horah. Here there is no reason to doubt that the events narrated are historically true, but there is grave reason to doubt that they happened in the present order of the narrative. Further, Dt gives an account that is parallel to certain passages of Nu; and it confirms those passages, but places the events in a different order. Such difficulties may often be solved by simple transpositions, and when transpositions in the text of Nu are in agreement with the order of Dt they have a very different probability from guesses that enjoy no such sanction. Another department of textual criticism deals with the removal of glosses, i.e. notes that have crept into the text. Here the ancient VSS often help us, one or other omitting some words which may be proved from other sources to be a later addition. Thus in Ex 17:7 the Vulg did not know the expression, “and Meribah” (one word in Heb), and calls the place “Massah.” The fact that Dt habitually calls the place Massah (6:16; 9:22; 33:8) the true Meribah was Kadesh (Nu 20) and a glossator has here added this by mistake (see further [4] below). Thus we can say that a scientific textual criticism often comes close to the highest critical analysis by showing that the arguments rest on late corruptions and by explaining the true origin of the difficulties on which the critics rely.

(2) Astrae’s clue tested.—Astrae’s clue must next be examined. The critical case breaks down with extraordinary frequency. No clean division can be effected here as in the MT. Gen makes P or E use the Tetragrammaton or ʾElōhīm. In some of these cases the critics can suggest no reason; in others they are compelled to assume that the MT is corrupt for no better reason than that it is in conflict with their theory. Again the theory frequently forces the analyst to sunder verbs or phrases that cannot be understood apart from their present contexts, e.g. in Gen 28 21 Carpenter assigns the words “and Jeh will be my God” to J while giving the beginning and end of the verse to E; in ch 31, ver 3 goes to a redecorator, though E actually refers to the statement of ver 3 in ver 5; in ch 32, ver 30 is torn from a J-context and given to E, thus leaving ver 31 (J) unintelligible. When textual criticism is applied, startling facts that entirely shatter the higher critical argument are suddenly revealed. The variants to the Divine appellations in Gen are very numerous, and in some instances the new readings are clearly superior to the MT, even when they substitute ʾElōhīm for the Tetragrammaton. Thus, in the version of the same Ishmael requires the word ʾElōhīm, as the name would otherwise have been Ishmayl, and one Heb MS, a recension of the LXX and the Old Lat do in fact preserve the reading ʾElōhīm. The full facts and arguments cannot be given here, but Professor Smith has made an exhaustive examination of the various texts from Gen 1 1 to Ex 3 12. Out of a total of 347 occurrences of one or both words in the MT of that passage, there are variants in 196 instances. A very important and detailed discussion, too long to be summarized here, will now be found in TSH, 1. Wellhausen himself has admitted that the textual evidence constitutes a sore point of the documentary theory (Expos T, XX, 563). Again in Ex 6 3, many of the best authorities read "I was not made known" instead of "I was not known"—a difference of a single letter in Heb. But if this be right, there is comparative evidence to suggest that to the early mind a revelation of his name by a deity meant a great deal more than a mere knowledge of the name, and involved rather a pledge of his power. Lastly the analysis may be tested in yet another way by inquiring whether it fits in with the other data, and when it is discovered (see below 4, [1]) that it involves ascribing, e.g. a passage that cannot be later than the time of Abraham to the period of the kingdom, it becomes certain that the clue and the method are alike misleading (see further EPC, ch 1; Expos T, XX, 578 f., 473–73, 563; TMH, 1, 85, 40–142, 190–197, 161, 164; *A. D. F. ʿAlāʾ and J. A. ʿAlāʾ, The Name of God, NKZ, XXIV [1913], 119–48; Expos, 1913).

(3) Narrative discrepancies and signs of post-Mosaic date.—Septuagintal MSS are providing very illuminating material for dealing with the chronological difficulties. It is well known that the LXX became corrupt and passed through various recensions (see Septuagint). The original text has not yet been reconstructed, but as the result of the great variety of recensions it happens that our various MSS present a wealth of alternative readings. Sometimes they are closer to the original than the corresponding readings of the MT. Take the case of Ishmael’s age. We have seen (above, 2, [3]) that although in Gen 21 14 he is a boy who can be carried by his mother even after the weaning of Isaac, his father, according to 15 6, 16, was 80 years old at the time of his birth, and, according to ch 17, 100 years old when Isaac was born. In 17 25 we find that Ishmael is already 13 a year before Isaac’s birth. Now we are familiar with marginal notes that set forth a system of chronology in many printed English Bibles. In Gen 17 25 the MSS variants suggest that something similar is responsible for the difficulty of our Heb. Two MSS, apparently representing a recension, omit the words, “after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan” in 16 3, and again, ver 16, while in 17 25 there is a variant making Ishmael only 3 years old. If these readings are correct it is easy to see how the difficulty arose. The narrative originally contained mere round numbers, like 100 years old, and these were not intended to be taken literally. A commentator constructed a scheme of chronology which was embodied in marginal notes. Then these crept into the text and such numbers as were in conflict with them were thought to be corrupt and underwent alteration. Thus the 3-year-old Ishmael became 13.

The same MSS that present us with the variants in Gen 16 have also preserved a suggestive reading in 35 28, one of the passages that are responsible for the inference that according to the text of Gen Isaac lay or was deathbed for 37 years (Gen 2, 23). According to this Isaak was not 180, but 150 years old when he died. It is easy to see that this is a round number, not to be taken literally, but this is not the only source of the difficulty. In 27 41, Esau, according to EV, states “The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob.” This is a perfectly possible rendering of the Heb, but the LXX is the text differently, and its rendering, while grammatically correct, has the double advantage of avoiding Isaac’s long lingering on a deathbed and of presenting Esau’s hatred and ferocity far more vividly. It renders, “May the days of mourning for my father approach that I may slay my brother Jacob.” Subsequent translators preferred the milder version, but doubtless the LXX has truly apprehended the real sense of the narrative. If we read the ch with this modification, we see Isaac as an old man, not knowing when he may die, performing the equivalent of making wills. It is not the least credible to suppose that he may have lived 20 or 30 years longer. Such episodes occur constantly in everyday experience. As to the calculations based on 25 29 and 36 40, the numbers used are 60 and 40, which is well known to have been employed by the ancient Hebrews, not as mathematical expressions, but simply to denote unknown or unspecified periods. See Numm.

The other chronological difficulty cited above (viz. that there is not room between the date of Aaron’s death and the address by Moses in the plains of Moab for all the events assigned to this period by Nu) is met partly by a reading preserved by the Pesh and partly by a series of transpositions. In Nu 33 38 Pesh reads “first” for “fifthik as the month of Aaron’s death, thus recognizing a longer period for the subsequent events. The transpositions, however, which are largely due to the evidence of Dt, solve the most formidable and varied difficulties; e.g. a southerly march from Kadesh no longer conduces the Israelites to Arad in the north, the name Hormah is no longer used (Nu 14 45) before it is explained (21 3), there is no longer an account directly contradicting Dt and making the Israelites spend 38 years at Kadesh immediately after receiving “Divine command tomorrow” (Nu 14 25). A full discussion is impossible here and will be found in EPC, 114–38. The order of the narrative that emerges as probably original is as follows: Nu 12, 20 114–21; 21 1–3; 15; 14; 16–18; 20 2–13.226; 21 46–9, then some missing vs, bringing the Israelites to the head of the Gulf of Akabah and narrating the turn northward from Elath and Ezion-geber, then 20:22-23; 21:4-5, and some lost words telling of the arrival at this point in the wilderness of Zin. The saying "云云" of cloud that is missing in Laga'der's LX.X, and vs 365-37a should probably come earlier in the chapter than they do at present.

Another example of transposition is afforded by Ex 33:7-11, the passage relating to the Tent of Meeting which is at present out of place (see above 2, [3]). It is supposed that this is E's idea of the Tabernacle, but that, unlike P, he places it outside the camp and makes Joshua its priest. This latter view is discussed and refuted in Punters, 3, where it is shown that Ex 33:7 should be rendered "And Moses used to take a [or, the] tent and pitch it for himself," etc. As to the theory that this is E's account of the Tabernacle, Ex 18 has been overlooked. This chapter belongs to the same E but refers to the end of the period spent at Horeb, i.e. it is later than 33:7-11. In vs 13-16 we find Moses sitting with all the people standing about him because they came to inquire of God; i.e. the business which according to ch 33 was transacted in solitude outside the camp was performed in the midst of the people at a later period. This agrees with P, e.g. Nu 27. If now we look at the other available clues, it appears that 33:11 seems to introduce Joshua for the first time. The passage should therefore precede 17:8-15; 24:13; 32:17, where he is already known. Again, if Ex 18 refers to the closing scenes at Horeb (as it clearly does), Ex 24:14 providing for the temporary transaction of judicial business reads very strangely. It ought to be preceded by some statement of the order of course in normal times when Moses was not absent from the camp. Ex 33:7 if provides such a statement. The only earlier place to which it can be assigned is after 13:22, but there it fits the context marvellously, for the statements as to the pillar of cloud in 33:9 f attach naturally to those in 13:21 f. With this change all the difficulties disappear.

Immediately after leaving Egypt Moses began the practice of carrying a tent outside the camp and trying to present before the court the cases of the people. "And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee" (Ex 25:22). After its erection the earlier tent was disused, and the court sat at the door of the Tabernacle in the center of the camp.

Some other points must be indicated more briefly. In Nu 16 important Septuagintal variants remove the main difficulties by substituting "company of Korah" for "dwelling of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram" in two vs (see EPC, 134-46). Similarly in the Joseph story the perplexities have arisen through corruptions of verses which may still be corrected by the versional evidence (PS, 29-48). There is evidence to show that the numbers of theIsraelites are probably due to textual corruption (EPC, 155-69). Further, there are numerous passages where careful examination has led critics themselves to hold that particular verses are later notes. In this way they dispose of Dt 10:6 f (Aaron's death, etc.), the references to the Israelites in a kingdom (Nu 36:31) and the Canaanites as being "thee" in the land (12:6; 13:7), the bedstead of Og (Dt 3:11) and other passages. In Gen 22, "the land of Moriah" is unknown to the VSS which present the most diverse readings, of which "the land of Moriah" is the most probable; while in v414 the LXX, reading the same Heb consonants as MT, translates "In the Mount the Lord was seen." This probably refers to a view that God manifested Himself, esp. in the mountains (cf 1 K 20:23:28) and has no reference whatever to the Temple Hill. The Massoretic pointing is presumably due to a desire to avoid what seemed to be an anthropomorphism (see further PS, 19-21). Again, in Nu 21:14, the LXX is known by having a "book of the Wars of Jehu" (see Field, Hebrews of Bible, ad loc.). It is difficult to tell what the original reading was, esp. as the succeeding words are corrupt in the Heb, but it appears that no genitive followed "wars" and it is doubtful if there was any reference to a "book of wars." (4) The argument from the doublets examined.—The foregoing sections show that the documentary theory often depends on phenomena that were absent from the original Pent. We are now to examine arguments that rest on other foundations. The doublets have been cited, but when we examine the instances more carefully, some curious facts emerge. Gen 16 and 21 are, to all appearances, narratives of different events; so are Ex 17:1-7 and Nu 20:1-13 (the drawing of water from rocks). In the latter case the critics after rejecting this divide the passages into 5 different stories, two going to J, two to E and one to P. If the latter also had a Rephidim-narrative (of Nu 35:14 P), there were 6 tales. In any case both J and E tell two stories each. It is impossible to convince the critics. We must assume that the author of the Pent could not have told two such narratives, if not merely the redactor of the Pent but also J and E could do so. The facts as to the marna stories are similar. As to the flights of quails, it is known that these do in fact occur every year, and the Pent places them at almost exactly a year's interval (see EPC, 104 f, 109 f).

(5) The critical argument from the laws.—The legal arguments are due to a variety of interpretations, the context of the passage, the background and the state of the text. Reference must be made to the separate articles (esp. Sanctuary; Priests). As the slave laws were cited, it may be explained that in ancient Israel as in other communities slavery could arise or slaves be acquired in many ways: e.g. birth, purchase (Gen 14:14; 17:12, etc.), gift (20:14), capture in war (14:21; 34:29), kidnapping (Joseph). The law of Ex and Dt applies only to Heb slaves acquired by purchase, not to slaves acquired on other grounds, e.g. of all to those who in the eye of the law were not true slaves. Lev 25 has nothing to do with Heb slaves. It is concerned merely with free Israelites who become insolvent. If "they are in the midst poor with the strangers ©" (ver 36) "it begins" (ver 39). Nobody who was already a slave could wax poor and sell himself. The law then provides that these insolvent freemen were not to be treated as slaves. In fact, they were a class of free bondmen, i.e. they were full citizens who were compelled to perform certain duties. A similar class of free bondmen existed in ancient Rome and were callednext. The Egyptians who sold themselves to Pharaoh and became serfs afford another though less apt parallel. In all ancient societies insolvency led to some limitations of freedom, but while in some full slavery ensued, in others a sharp distinction was drawn between the slave and the insolvent freeman (see further SBL, 5-11).

(6) The argument from style.—Just as this argument is too detailed to be set out in a work like the present, so the answer cannot be given with any degree of fulness. It may be said generally that the argument too frequently neglects differences of subject-matter, the varying number and kind of words (e.g. considerations of euphony and slight variations of meaning) which often provide far more natural reasons for the phenomena observed. Again, the VSS suggest that the Bib. text has been heavily glossed. Thus in many passages where the frequent recurrence of certain words and phrases... supposed to attest the presence of P, versional evidence seems to show that the expressions in question have been introduced by glossators, and when they are removed the narrative remains unaffected in form, order and sense. I.e. the P-word. The effect of rising anger is given to the dialogue by the repetition of "But take too much upon thee," followed by the repetition of "Is it a small thing that" (v 9.13). This must be the work of a single literary artist (see further SBL, 37 f).

(9) Supposed props of the development hypothesis.

When we turn to the supposed props of the development hypothesis we see that there is nothing conclusive in the critical argument. Jer and the subsequent lit., certainly exhibit the influence of Dt, but a Book of the Law was admittedly found in Josiah's reign and had lain unread for at any rate some considerable time. Some of its requirements had been in actual operation, e.g. in Naboth's case, while others had become a dead letter. The circumstances of its discovery, the belief in its undoubted Mosaic authenticity and the subsequent course of history led to its greatly influencing contemporary and later writers, but that really proves nothing. Ezek again was steeped in priestly ideas, but it is shown in Priestts, 50, how this may be explained. Lastly, Cm certainly knows the whole Pent, but as originally ministered. For the other hand the Pent itself always represents portions of the legislation as being intended to reach the people only through the priestly teaching, and this fully accounts for P's lack of influence on the later literature. The differences of style within the Pent itself, something is said in III, below. Hence this branch of the critical argument really proves nothing, for the phenomena are susceptible of more than one explanation.

In 2:14 we read of the Hiddekel (Tigris) as flowing E. of Assur, though there is an alternative reading "Assur on the E. coast" to correct, the passage must antedate the 13th cent. B.C., for Assur, the ancient capital, which was on the west bank of the Tigris, was abandoned at about that date for Kalkhon on the E.

(2) Archaeology and Genesis.—Closely connected with the foregoing are cases where Gen has preserved information that is true of a very early time only. Thus in 10:22 Elam figures as a son of Shem. The historical Elam was, however, an Aryan people. Recently inscriptions have been discovered which show that in the 5th or 6th cent. B.C. Elam was inhabited by Semites. "The fact," writes Driver, ad loc., "is not one which the writer of this verse is likely to have known." This contention falls to the ground when we find that only three verses off we have material that goes back at least as far as the time of Abraham. After all, the presumption is that the writer stated the fact because he knew it, not in spite of his not knowing it; and that knowledge must be due to the same cause as the note-takers in the age of ver 19, viz., tradition.

This is merely one example of the confirmations of little touches in Gen that are constantly being provided by archaeology. For the detailed facts see the separate arts., e.g. Amraphel; Jerusalem, and so forth.

From the point of view of the critical question we note (a) that such accuracy is a natural mark of authentic early documents, and (b) that in view of the arguments already adduced and of the legal evidence to be considered, the most reasonable explanation is to be found in a theory of contemporary authorship.

(3) The legal evidence of Genesis.—The legal evidence is perhaps more convincing, for here no theory of late authorship can be devised to evade the natural inference. Correct information as to early names, geography, etc., might be the result of researches by an exilic writer in a Bab library; but early customs that are confirmed by the universal experience of primitive societies, and that point to a stage of development which had long been passed in the Babylonia even of Abraham's day, can be due to but one cause—genuine early sources. The narratives of Gen are certainly not the work of comparative sociologists. Two instances may be cited. The law of the blood brother is one. The legal argument, which, as is known, is earlier than the stage attested by Ex 21:12 ff. In the story of Cain we have one stage; in Gen 9:6, which does not yet recognize any distinction between murder and other forms of homicide, we have the other.

Our other example shall be the unlimited power of life and death possessed by the head of the family (38:24; 42:37, etc.), which has not yet been limited in any way by the jurisdiction of the courts as in Ex. In both cases comparative historical jurisprudence confirms the Bible account against the critical, which would make e.g. Gen 9:6 post-exilic, while assigning Ex 21 to a much earlier period. (On the whole subject see further OP, 135 ff.)

"The professedly Mosaic character of the legislation.—Coming now to the four concluding books of the Pent, we must first observe that the legislation everywhere preserves to be Mosaic. Perhaps this is not always fully realized. In critical editions of the text the rubrics are occasionally assigned to redactors, but the representation of Mosaic date is far too closely interwoven with the matter to be removed by such devices. If e.g. we take such a section as Dt 12, we shall find it full of such phrases as "for ye are not as yet come to the rest and to the inheritance," i.e., "when ye go over Jordan," "the place which the Lord shall choose" (AV), etc. It is important to bear this in mind throughout the succeeding discussion.

(5) The historical situation required by P.—What do we find if we ignore the Mosaic dress and seek to fit P into any other set of conditions, particularly those of the post-exilic period? The general historical situation gives a clear answer. The Israelites are represented as being so closely concentrated that they will always be able to keep the three pilgrimages. One exception only is contemplated, viz., that ritual uncleanness or a journey may prevent an Israelite from keeping the Passover. Note that precisely for this reason it is required to keep it one month later (Nu 9:10 f.). How could this law have been enacted when the great majority of the people were in Babylonia, Egypt, etc., so that attendance at the temple was impossible for them on any occasion whatever? With this exception the entire PC always supposes that the whole people are at all times dwelling within easy reach of the religious center. How strongly this view is embedded in the code may be seen esp. from Lev 17, which makes it quite clear that no domestic animals to be slaughtered for food must be brought to the door of the Tent of Meeting. Are we to suppose that somebody deliberately intended such legislation to apply when the Jews were scattered all over the civilized world, or even all over the known universe? If so, it means a total prohibition of animal food for all save the inhabitants of the capital.

In post-exilic days there was no more pressing danger for the religious leaders to combat than intermarriage, but this code is supposed to have been written for the express purpose of bringing about their action, goes out of its way to give a fictitious account of a war and incidentally to legalize such unions (Nu 31:18). And this chapter also contains a law of booty. What could be more unsuitable? How and where were the Jews to make conquests and capture booty in the days of Ezra?

"Or again, pass to the last chapter of Nu and consider the historical setting. What is the complaint urged by the deportation that waits upon Moses? It is this: If heiresses 'be married to any of the sons of the other tribes of the children of Israel, then shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of our fathers, and shall be added unto the inheritance of the tribe wherunto they shall belong.' What a pressing grievance for a legislator to consider and redress when tribes and tribal lots had long since ceased to exist for ever!" (OP, 121 f.)

Perhaps the most important of all the discrepancies between P and the post-exilic age is one that explains the freedom of the prophets from its literary influence. According to the constant testimony of the Pent, including P, portions of the law were to reach the people only through priestly teaching (Lev 10:11; Dt 24:8; 33:10, etc.). Ezra, on the other hand read portions of P to the whole people.

(6) The hierarchical organization in P.—Much of what falls under this head is treated in Pent., 2, (a), (b), and need not be repeated here. The following may be added: "Urim and Thummim were not used after the Exile. In lieu of the simple conditions—a small number of priests and a body of Levites—we find a developed hierarchy, priests, Levites, and singers, as in Solomon's time. The code that ex hypothesi was forged to deal with this state of affairs has no acquaintance with them. The musical services of the temple are as much beyond its line of vision as the upkeep of the palace building, or the supervision, as that betrayed by the reference in 1 S 8:20 to the appointment by the high priest to positions carrying pecuniary emolument is far beyond the primitive simplicity of P" (OP, 122).

(7) The legal evidence of P.—As this subject is technical and unfamiliar to many readers, legal reasoning may be confusing. Legal rules may be such as to enable the historical inquirer to say definitely that they belong to an early stage of society. Thus if we find that the inheritance of a farmer who dies without leaving sons, we know that they cannot be long subsequent to the introduction of individual property in land, unless of course the law has been deliberately altered. It is an everyday occurrence for men to die without leaving sons, and the question what is to happen to their land in such cases must from the nature of the case be raised and settled before very long. When therefore we find such rules in Nu 27, etc., we know that they are either very old or else represent a deliberate change in the law. The latter is really out of the question, and we are driven back to their antiquity (see further OP, 124 ff). Again in Nu 35 we find an elaborate struggle to express a general principle which shall distinguish between two kinds of homicide. The earlier law had regarded all homicide as of equal value, for such a law, the human mind only reaches general principles through concrete cases, and other ancient legislations (e.g. the Icelandic) bear witness to the primitive character of the rules of Nu. Thus an expert like Darestes can say that those who are guilty are not extremely archaic (see further SBL and OP, passim).

(8) The evidence of D.—The following may be quoted: "Laws are never issued to regulate a state of things which has passed away ages before, and cannot therefore be revised." What are we to think, then, of a hypothesis which assigns the code of Dt to the reign of Josiah, or shortly before it, when its injunctions to exterminate the Canaanites (20 16-18) and the Amalekites (25 17-19), who had long since disappeared, would be as utterly out of date as a law in New Jersey at the present time offering a bounty for killing wolves and bears, or a royal proclamation in Great Britain ordering the expulsion of the Danes! A law contemplating foreign conquests (20 10-15) would have been absurd when the urgent question was whether Judah could maintain its own existence against the encroachments of Babylon and Egypt. A law discriminating against Ammon and Moab (23 3-4), in which no mention is made of a king up to the Mosaic period, but not in the time of the later kings. Jeremiah discriminates precisely the other way, promising a future restoration to Moab (48 47) and Ammon (49 6), which he denies to Edom (49 17-18), who is also to Joel (3 19), Ob, and Isa (53 1-6), the representative foe of the people of God.

. . . The allusions to Egypt imply familiarity with and recent residence in that land. . . . And how can a code belong to the time of Josiah, which, while it abrogates the principle of the identity of a king in the future (Dt 17 14 ff), nowhere implies an actual regal government, but vests the supreme central authority in a judge and the priesthood (17 8-12; 19 17), which lays special stress on the requirements that the king must be a native and not a foreigner (17 15), when the undisputed line of succession had for ages been fixed in the family of David, and that he must not 'cause the people to return to Egypt' (ver 18), as they seemed ready to do on every grievance in the days of Moses (Nu 14 4), but makes it perfectly plain that in the time of Josiah these were fairly established in Canaan?" (Green, Moses and the Prophets, 63 ff).

This too may be supplemented by legal evidence (e.g. 22 26 testifies to the undeveloped intellectual condition of the people). OP, 130ff.

Wellhausen (Prophetengedicht, 392 n.) now regards their main elements as pre-Mosaic Canaanitish law.

(9) Later allusions.—These are of two kinds. Sometimes we find them clearly of a later period than the Mosaic code, and in other cases we find that they were in operation.

(a) By postulating redactors evidence can be banished from the Bible. Accordingly, reference will only be made to some passages where this procedure is not followed. Ezek 22 20 clearly knows of a law that dealt with the subjects of P, used its very language (cf. Lev 10 10 i.), and like P was to be taught to the people by the priests. Hosea 6 6 also knows of some priestly teaching, which, however, is moral and may therefore be Lev 19; and ch 8 11-13 he speaks of 10,000 written precepts, and here the context points to ritual. The number and the subject-matter of these precepts alike make it certain that he knew a bulky written law which was not merely identical with Ex 21-23, and this passage cannot be met by Wellhausen who resorted to the device of translating it with the omission of the important word "write." (b) Again, in dealing with institutions the references can often be evaded. It is possible to say, "Yes, this passage knows such and such a law, but it really came into existence with D or P, but was an older law incorporated in these documents." That argument would apply, e.g. to the necessity for two witnesses in the case of Naboith. That is a law of D, but those who assert that the text reflects only assert that it is here merely incorporating older material. Again the allusions sometimes show something that differs in some way from the Pentateuch, and it is often impossible to prove that this was a development in the same sense, that it represents an earlier stage, and it frequently happens that the data are insufficient either to support or refute this view. "But fortunately there are in P certain institutions of which the critics definitely assert that they are late." Accordingly, references that prove the earlier existence of such institutions have a very different probative value. Thus it is alleged that before the exile there was but one national burnt offering and one national meal offering each day; whereas Nu 23 demands two. Now in 1 K 18 29.36, we find references to the offering of the evening oblation, but 2 K 3 20 speaks of "the time of offering the oblation" in connection with the morning. Therefore these two oblations were not concurrent in the days of the date assigned to P—who, on the critical theory, first introduced them. So 2 K 15 16 speaks of 'the morning burnt-offering, and the evening meal-offering . . . with the burnt-offering of all the people of the land, and their meal-offering.' This again gives us the two burnt offerings, though, on the hypothesis, they were unknown to preexilic custom. Similarly in other cases: Jer 32 shows us the land laws in actual operation; Ezekiel is familiar with the concept of a king in the future. Thus, though the critics allege that the date was first fixed in the Exile (OF, 132 ff).

(10) Other evidence.—We can call attention to certain other branches of evidence. There is the stylistic evidence of early date (see e.g. Lias, BS, 1910, 20-46, 299-334). Further, the minute accuracy of the narrative of Ex-Nu to local conditions, etc. (noticed below, IV, 5, 6), affords valuable testimony. It may be said, in the divergencies of the whole written law and narrative—mirrors early conditions, whether we regard intellectual, economic or purely legal development (see further below, IV, and OP, passim).

(1) Moral and psychological issues.—The great fundamental improbabilities of the critical view have hitherto been kept out of sight in order that the arguments for and against the detailed case might not be prejudiced by other considerations. We must now glance at some of the broader issues. The first question is: have any great frauds been perpetrated—in each case by men of the loftiest ethical principles. Dt was deliberately written in the form of Mosaic speeches by some person or persons whom we know little or nothing about. It is not Mosaic. P is a make-up—nothing more. All its references to the wilderness, the camp, the Tent of Meeting, the approach of Canaan, etc., are so many touches introduced for the purpose of deceiving. There can be no talk of literary convention, for no such convention existed in Israel. The prophets all spoke in their own names, not in the dress of Moses. David introduced a new law of booty in his own name; the Chronicler repeatedly refers to temple ordinances to David and Solomon; Samuel introduced a law of the kingdom in his own name. Yet we are asked to believe that these gigantic forgeries were perpetrated without reason or pretext. Is it credible? Consider the principles involved. Were the Deuteronomic denunciations of false prophets, the prohibition of adding aught to the law, the passionate injunctions to teach children. Can it be believed that men of such principles would have been guilty of such conduct? Nemo repente fit turpissimus, says the old maxim; can we suppose that the denunciations of those who prophesy falsely in the name of the Lord proceeded from the pen of one who was himself forging in that name? Or can it be that the great majority of Biblical readers knew so little of truth when they read it that they cannot detect the ring of unquestionable sincerity in the references of the Deuteronomist to the historical situation? Or can we really believe that documents that originated in such a fashion could have exercised the enormous force for righteousness in the world that these documents have exercised? Ex nihilo nihil. Are literary forgeries a suitable parentage for Gen 1 or Lev or Dt? Are the great monothetic ethical religions of the world today rooted in nothing better than folly and fraud?

(2) The historical improbability. A second fundamental consideration is the extraordinary historical improbability that these frauds could have been successfully perpetrated. The narrative in Dt does not give the impression that the king was regarded as an authentic work. King and people, priests and prophets must have been entirely deceived if the critical theory be true. It is surely possible that Huldah and Jeremiah were better judges than modern critics. Similarly in the case of P, if e.g. there had been no Levitical cities or no such laws as to tithes and firstlings as were here contemplated, but entirely different provisions on the subjects, how came the people to accept these forgeries so readily? (See further POT, 257 f., 291-97.) It is of course quite easy to carry this argument too far. It cannot be doubted that the exile had meant a considerable break in the historical continuity of the national development; but yet once the two views are understood the choice cannot be between the critical theory elaborated by Dr. literary forgeries were accepted as genuine ancient laws; on the conservative theory laws were accepted because they were in fact genuine, and interpreted as far as possible to meet the entirely different requirements of the period. This explains both the action of the people and the divergence between pre-exilic and post-exilic practice. The laws were the same but the interpretation was different.

(3) Divergence between the laws and post-exilic practice. Thirdly, the entire perversion of the true meaning of the laws in post-exilic times makes the critical theory incredible. Examples have been given (see above, 4, [5], [6], and PRIESTS, passim). It must now suffice to take just one instance to make the answer clear. We have seen (p. 10) that the author of P deliberately provided that if Levites approached the altar both they and the priests should die (Nu 18 3), because he really desired that they should approach the altar and perform certain services in the manner of ancient law. It seems that Ezra and the people on reading these provisions at once understood that the legislator meant the exact opposite of what he had said, and proceeded to act accordingly (1 Ch 23 31). This is only one little example. It is throughout P. Everybody understands that the Tabernacle is really the second Temple and wilderness conditions post-exilic, and everybody acts accordingly. Can it be contended that this view is credible?

(4) The testimony of tradition. Lastly the uniform testimony of tradition against Mosaic authenticity—the tradition of Jews, Samaritans and Christians alike. The national consciousness of a people, the convergent belief of Christendom for 18 centuries are not lightly to be put aside. And what is more against them, the testimony of the Christian church, with each fresh exponent, and that they start their case from textual corruption, develop through a confusion between an altar and a house, and end in misdating narratives and laws by 8 or 10 centuries! (see above 3 and 4; SANCTUARY, Priesthood). If anything at all emerges from the foregoing discussion, it is the impossibility of performing any such analytical feat as the critics attempt. No critical microscope can penetrate to the innermost degree of certainty the joints of various sources, even if such sources really exist, and when we find that laws and narratives are constantly misdated by 8 or 10 centuries, we can only admit that no progress at all is possible along the lines that have been followed. On the other hand, certain reasonable results do appear to have been secured, and there are indications of the direction in which we must look for further investigation.

First, then, the Pentateuch contains various notes by later hands. Sometimes the VSS enable us to detect and remove those notes, but many are pre-versional. Accordingly it is the impossible to estimate the date of the conjectures on which different minds may differ.

Secondly, we have, at least, the fact that we cannot determine the scope of these or the number and character of the sources employed, or of the extent of the author's work.

Thirdly, the whole body of the legislation (subject only to textual criticism) Mosaic. But the laws of Dt carry with them their framework, the speeches which cannot be severed from them (see SHEL H). This disregard. The speeches of Dt in turn carry with them large portions of the narrative of Ex-Nu which they presuppose. They do not necessarily carry with them such passages as Ex 35-39 or Nu 1-4, 7, 26, but Nu 1-4 contains internal evidence of Mosaic date.

At this point we learn to examine certain textual phenomena that throw light on our problem. It may be said that there is really there are occurrences that are due to textual corruption—that which is due to the ordinary processes of copying, perishing, annotating, etc., and that which is due to the conscious and deliberate attempts to produce, so far as possible, a correct standard text. This makes that which is due to the conscious effort of the Alexandrian critics on Homer. There is evidence that such revision could have been made by the Masoretes, and the important instance is to be found in the chronology of certain portions of Gen of which three different VSS survive. Massoretic, Samaritan, and Septuagint. Another instance of even greater consequence for the matter in hand is to be found in Ex 35-39. It is well known that the LXX preserves an entirely different edition from that of MT supported in the main by the Septuagint. Some other editions have been noticed incidentally in the preceding discussion; one other that may be proved by further research to possess some merit may be mentioned. It appears that in the law of the kingdom (Dt 17) and some other parts of the Old Testament the scribes expect a hereditary king. The LXX knew nothing of such a person (see further Ps 137-68). The superiority of the LXX text in this instance appears to be attested by 1 S, which is unaccompanied with any law of the kingdom.

This is not the case with the other editions. At least the other recensions, the M and the Sept. While there are many minor readings (in cases of variation through accidental corruption) in the text of each, the impression is that the LXX text is in a more advanced state. It is probably safe to say that in general the Sam belongs to the same family as the M, while the LXX in the crucial matters represents a different textual tradition from the other two (see Expos, September 1911, 200-219). How is this to be explained? According to the worthless story preserved in the letter of Aristaeus the LXX was translated from M39 brought from Jews at a date long subsequent to the Sam slavus. The fact that the LXX preserves a recension so different from both Sam and MT (the exact copy of pre-Mosaic sources in Gen, and of the 5th cent. BC and its lineal descendants) suggests that this part of the story must be rejected. If so, the LXX may perhaps represent the text of the Pentateuch in Egypt and descend from a Hcb that separated from the MT before the Sam slavus. At all events this point must be ruled out in the fact that in Jer the LXX differs from MT more widely than in any other Bib book, and this is the least likely, for it is evident that the divergence goes back to the times of Jeremiah, his work having been preserved in the LXX and MT (with its allies) not under any threat of the Jews having an edition ofJer; they also had an edition of that law to which Jer refers, and it is probable that the differences between LXX and MT (with its allies) are due to the two streams of tradition separating from the time of the exile—the Egypt and the Bab. The narrative of the finding of the Book of the Law in the days of Josiah (2 K 22), which probably refers to such a text as did that found in the Sam slavus, suggests that it was used at that time and is the original source of the story of the exile—The Egypt and the Bab. The narrative of the finding of the Book of the Law during the reign of Josiah (2 K 22), which probably refers to such a text as did that found in the Sam slavus, suggests that it was used at that time and is the original source of the story of the exile.

Thus the history of the Pent, so far as it can be traced, is briefly as follows: The backbone of the book consists of pre-Mosaic sources in Gen, and Mosaic narratives, speeches and legislation in Ex-Dt. To this, notes, archaeological, historical, explanatory, etc., were added by successive readers. The text at one time depended on a single MS which was lost or more attests were made to repair this damage by rearrangement of the matter. It may be that some of the narrative chapters, such as Nu 1-4, 7, 26, were added from a separate source and amplified or rewritten in the course of reduction, but in this branch nothing certain can be said. Within a period that is attested by the materials that survive, Ex 35-39 underwent one or more such reductions. Slighter reductions attested by Sam and LXX have affected the chronological order of the Books and some references to post-Mosaic historical events. Further than this it is impossible to go on our present materials.

III. Some Literary Points. No general estimate of the Pent is possible. Even the crudest attempt is difficult. Probably most readers are fully sensible to its literary beauties. Anybody who is not would do well to compare the chapter on Joseph in the Koran (12) with the Bib. narrative. A few words must be said of some of the less obvious matters that would naturally fall into a literary discussion, the aim being rather to draw the reader's attention to points that he might overlook.

Of the style of the legislation no sufficient estimate can be formed, for the first requisite of legal style is that it should be intelligible to contemporaries, and today no judgment can be offered on that head. There is, however, one feature that is of great interest even now, viz. the prevalence in the main of three different styles, each marked by its special adaptation to the end in view. These styles are

1. Style of Legislation
   (1) mnemononic, (2) oratorical, and (3) procedural.
   The first is familiar in other early legislations. It is lapidary, terse, and the extreme, pregnant, and from time to time marked by a rhythm that must have assisted the retention in the memory. Occasionally we meet with parallelism. This is the style of Ex 21 if and occasional later passages, such as the judgment in the case of the wife of Shelomith's son (1 K 20:6-10). Also doubt these laws were memorized by the elders.

   Secondly, the legislation of Dt forms part of a speech and was intended for public reading. Accordingly, the laws here take on a distinctly oratorical style. Thirdly, the bulk of the rest of the legislation was intended to remain primarily in the custody of the priests who could certainly write down (Nu 6:23). This was taken into account, and the style is not terse or oratorical, but reasonably full. It was probably very closely approximated to what the laws were meant. There are minor varieties of style but these are the most important. (On the whole subject see esp. Ps, 170-221.)

   What holds good of the laws is also true with certain modifications of the various works. The style varies with the nature of the subject.

2. The Narrative
   In Nu 33 is intentionally composed in a style which undoubtedly possesses peculiar qualities with anything for an appropriate tune. The census lists, etc., appear to be written in a formal official manner, and something similar is true of the lists of the spies in Nu 13. There is no ground for surprise in this. In the ancient world as we have come to know it the composition to a far greater extent than it does today.

   A literary form that is peculiar to the Pent deserves special notice, viz. the covenant document as a form of literature. Many peoples have had laws that were attributed to some deity, but it is only here that laws are presented in the form of sworn agreements entered into with certain formalities of the deity. God and man.

   It is that certain portions of the Pent are in the form of a sort of deed with properly articulated parts. This deed would have been ratified by oath if made between men, as was the covenant between Abraham and Lot, but in a case of God it is inapplicable, and the place of the jurat is in each case taken by a discourse setting forth the rewards and penalties attached by God to observance and breach of the covenant respectively.

   The covenant conception and the idea that the laws acquire force because they are terms in an agreement between God and people, and not merely because they were commanded by God, is one of extraordinary importance in the history of thought and in theology, but we must not through absorption in these aspects of the question fail to notice that the conception found expression in a literary form that is unknown elsewhere and that it provides the key to the comprehension of large sections of the Pent, including almost the whole of Dt (see in detail SBL, ch ii).

   Insufficient attention has been paid to order and rhythm generally. Two great principles must be borne in mind: (1) in really good ancient prose the artist appeals to the ear in many subtle ways, and (2) in all such prose, emphasis and meaning are brought out by the order of the words.

   The figures of the old Gr rhetoricians play a considerable part. Thus if the figure of the circle, "the circle," is sometimes used with great skill. In this the clause or sentence begins and ends with the same word, which denotes alike the sound and the thought. Probably the most effective instance—heightened by the meaning, the shortness and the heavy boom of the word—is to be found in Ex 16:27: "Would that we had died, yea, we had died with our "voice," — the emphasis conveyed by the sound being at least as marked as that conveyed by the sense. This is no isolated instance of the figure: cf. e.g. in Ex 3:8, "Tongue of fire." In Nm 20:8: "Evil befalls a misguided and a fugitive wanderer." 9:6: "Sing, O daughter of Zion, for your King is come, and he is triumphantly exalted in glory." 1 Kings 19:15: "$r$ 318 men shall smite thee, and $r$ only escape." The first principle of the creative use of the Pentateuch for historical purposes must be to take account of textual criticism.

Having discovered as nearly as may be what the author wrote, the next step is to consider what has been' done by R. Here, unfortunately, the modern inquirer is apt to neglect many important processes. It would be a truism, but for the fact that it is so often disregarded, to say that the whole process must be carefully read in order to ascertain the author's meaning; e.g. how often we hear that Gen 14 represents Abram as having inflicted a defeat on the enemy with only 318 men (v.14), whereas the text shows that the vast forces he actually faced were much larger (Gen 14:13). Sometimes the clue to the only instance in history of the methods of expression adopted cause trouble to the modern inquirer. There are many much-quoted passages where the expression is the same as that, times used in a way that apparently presents difficulties to the mind. Thus in Ex 9:6 it is possible to interpret "all" in the sense of 'spreading like a pestilence.' The rendering in vs. 19, 22, etc., which recognize that some cattle still existed. Or again the term may be regarded as limited by ver 3 to all the cattle in the field (see Acts 8:14).

At this point two further idiocynracies of the Semitic genius must be noted—the habits of personification and the genealogical tendency; e.g. in Nu 20:12-21, Edom and Israel are described as vanquished by a deity in the same terms as that, in Ex 15:10-19. Habits of personification and genealogical expression of relationships are greatly extended, e.g. "And Canaan begat Zidon his first-born," (10:15). Often this leads to no trouble, yet strangely enough men who will grasp these methods when dealing with ch 10 will claim that ch 14 cannot be historical because localities are there personified and used in relationships. Yet if we are to estimate the historical value of the narrative, we must surely be willing to apply the same methods to one chapter as to another if the sense appears to demand this. See, further, GENEALOGIES.

A further consideration that is not always heeded is the exigency of literary form; e.g. in Gen 24 there occurs a dialogue. Strangely enough, an author has been found who understands the literary character of Gen on this ground. It cannot be improved on. The easiest way, we think, to have here a literal report of what was said. This entirely ignores the practices of all literary artists. Such changes are to be expected in any presentation of what occurred; they convey a truer and more vivid and as it were natural face of the literal report of the mere words, divorced from the gestures, glances and modulations of the voice that play such an important part in conversation.

Another matter is the influence of the sacred numbers on the text; e.g. in Nu 33 the journeys seem designed to present 40 stations and must not be held to exclude camping at other stations not mentioned; Gen 10 probably contains 70 names in the original text. This is a technical consideration which must be borne in mind, and so, too, must the Heb habit of using certain round numbers to express an unspecified time. When, for instance, we read that somebody was 40 or 60 years old, we are not to take these words literally. "Forty years old" often seems to correspond to "after a man's estate" (see NUMBER).

Still more important is it to endeavor to appreciate the habits of thought of those for whom the Pentateuch was first intended, and to seek the Thought of the Pentateuch in the light of such habits.

6. Habits of text in the light of such habits.

Thought.
spoke Heb. The etymological key will not fit. Yet we must ask ourselves whether the narrator ever thought that it did. In times when names were supposed to have some mystic relation to their bearers they might be conceived as standing also in some mystic relation to events either present or future. It is therefore that the etymological meaning of the narratives was not to suggest this in literary form. How far the ancient Hebrews were from regarding names in the same light as we do may be seen from such passages as Ex 23:20,1; Isa 30:27; see further EPC, 47 ff.; see also Names, Proper.

The Pent is beyond all doubt an intensely national work. Its outlook is so essentially Israelitish that no reader could fail to notice the fact, the national and it is therefore unnecessary to cite instances. Doubtless this has in many instances led to its presenting a view of history with which the contemporary peoples would not have agreed. It is not to be supposed that the Exodus was an event of much significance in the Egypt of Moses, however important it may appear to the Egyptians of today; and this suggests two points. On the one hand we must admit that to most contemporaries the Pentateuchal narratives must have seemed out of all perspective; on the other the course of subsequent history has shown that the Mosaic sense of perspective was in reality the true one, however absurd it may have seemed to the nations of his own day. Consequently in using the Pent for historical purposes we must always apply two standards—the contemporary and the historical. In the days of Moses the narrative might often have looked to the outsider like the attempt of the frog in the fable to attain to the size of an ox; for us, with the light of history upon it, the two are very different. The national coloring, the medium through which the events are seen, has proved to be true, and the seemingly insignificant doings of unimportant people have turned out to be events of prime historical importance.

There is another aspect of the national coloring of the Pent to be borne in mind. If ever there was a book which revealed the immest soul of a people, that book is the Pent. This will be considered in W. We see in its present form an event concerned with its historical significance. In estimating actions, motives, laws, policy—all that goes to make history—character is necessarily a factor of the utmost consequence. Now here we have a book that at every point animal and human, is at the same time national character. Alike in content and in form the legislation is adapted with the utmost nicety to the nature of the people for which it was promulgated.

When due allowance has been made for all the various matters enumerated above, what can be said as to the trustworthiness of the Pentateuch? The answer is entirely favorable.

8. How Far the Pentateuch is Trustworthy

(1) Contemporary information. —The Pentateuch is the first place the discussion as to the dating of the Pent (above, II, 4) has shown that we have in it documents that are in many cases certainly contemporaneous with the matters to which they relate and have been preserved in a form that is substantially original. Thus we have seen that the wording of Gen 10 19 cannot be later than the age of Abraham and that the legislation of the last four books is Mosaic. Now contemporaneity is the first essential of credibility.

(2) Character of our informants. —Given the fact (guaranteed by the contemporaneity of the sources) that our informants had the means of providing accurate information if they so desired, we have to ask whether they were truthful and able. As to the ability no doubt is possible; genius is stamped on every page of the Pent. Similarly as to truthfulness. The conscience of the narrators is essentially ethical. This appears of course most clearly in the application of Lev 19 11 to the attribution of truthfulness to God (Ex 34 6), but it may readily be detected throughout; e.g. in Gen 20 12 the narrative clearly shows that truthfulness was esteemed as a virtue by the ancient Hebrews. Throughout, the faults of the dramatic personae are never minimized even when the narrator's sympathy is with them. Nor is there any attempt to belittle the opponents of Israel's heroes. Consider on the one hand the magnanimity of Essau's character and on the other the very glaring light that is thrown on the weaknesses of Jacob, Judah, Aaron. If we are taught to know the Moses who prays, "And if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written" (Ex 32 32), we are also shown his frequent complaints, and we make acquaintance with the hot-tempered manslayer and the lawyer who disobeyed his God.

(3) The historical genius of the people. —Strangely enough, those who desire to discuss the trustworthiness of the Pentateuch will go to the habit of other nations and, selecting according to their bias peoples that have a good or a bad reputation in the matter of historical tradition, proceed to argue for or against the Pentateuchal narrative on this basis. Such procedure is alike unjust and unscientific. It is unscientific because the object of the inquirer is to obtain knowledge as to the habits of this people, and in view of the great divergences that may be observed among different races the comparative method here is clearly inapplicable; it is unjust because this people is entitled to be judged on its own merits or defects, not on the merits or defects of others. Now it is a bare statement of fact that the Jews possess the historical sense to a preeminent degree. Nobody who surveys their long history and examines their customs and practices to this day can fairly doubt that fact. This is no recent development; it is most convincingly attested by the Pent itself, which here, as elsewhere, sets down the standard of the spirit of the race. What is the highest guaranty of truth, a guaranty to which unquestioning appeal may be made in the firm assurance that it will carry conviction to all who hear? "Remember the days of old, Consider the years of many generations, Ask thy father and he will tell thee; Thine elders, and they will tell thee" (Dt 31 2). "For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth," etc (Dt 4 32). Conversely, the due handing down of tradition is a religious duty: "And it shall come to pass, when your children shall ask unto you, What mean ye by this service? that ye shall say," etc (Ex 12 26). "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes saw, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life; but make them known unto thy children, and thy children's children" (Dt 4 9). It is needless to multiply quotations. Enough has been said to show clearly the attitude of this people toward history.

(4) The good faith of Deuteronomy. —Closely connected with the preceding is the argument from the very obvious good faith of the speeches in Dt. It is not possible to read the references to events in such a chapter as ch 4 without feeling that the speaker most fully believed the truth of his statements. The most unquestionable sincerity is impressed upon the chapter. The speaker is referring to what he believes with all the faith of which he is capable. Even for those who doubt the Mosaic authenticity of these speeches there can be no doubt as to the writer's unquestioning acceptance of the historical consciousness of the people. But once the Mosaic authenticity is established the argument becomes overwhelming. How could Moses have spoken to people of an event so impressive and unparalleled as having happened within their own recollection if it had not really occurred?

(5) Nature of the events recorded.—Another very important consideration arises from the nature of the events recorded. No nation, it has often been remarked, will invent a story of its enslavement to another. The extreme sobriety of the patriarchal narratives, the absence of miracle, the lack of any tendency to display the ancestors of the people as conquerors or great personages, are marks of credibility. Many of the episodes in the Mosaic age are extraordinarily probable. Take the stories of the rebelliousness of the people, of their complaints of the water, the food, and so on: what could be more in accordance with likelihood? On the other hand there is another group of narratives to which the converse argument applies. A Sinai cannot be made part of a nation's consciousness by a clever story-teller or a literary forger. The unparalleled nature of the events narrated was recognized quite as clearly by the ancient Hebrews as by the writers of De 4:32 (cf.). It is incredible that such a story could have been made up and successfully palmed off on the whole nation. A further point that may be mentioned in this connection is the witness of subsequent history to the truth of the narrative. Such a witness to the history as that of the Jews, such tremendous consequences as their religion has had on the fortunes of mankind, require for their explanation causal events of sufficient magnitude.

4) External corroboration.—All investigations of evidence depend on a single principle: "The coincidences of the truth are infinite." In other words, a false story will sooner or later become involved in conflict with ascertained facts. The Biblical narrative has been subjected to the most rigorous cross-examination from every point of view for more than a century. Time after time definite assertions have been made that its falsehood has been definitely proved, and in each case the Pent has more than once interpreted the test triumphantly. The details will for the most part be found enumerated or referred to under the separate articles. Here it must suffice just to refer to a few matters. It was said that the whole local coloring of the Egypt scenes was entirely false, e.g. that the vine did not grow in Egypt. Egyptology has in every instance vindicated the minute accuracy of the Pent, down to even the non-mention of earthenware (in which the discolored Nile waters can be kept clean) in Ex 7:19 and the very food of the lower classes in Nu 11:5. It was said that writing was unknown in the days of Moses, but Egyptology and Assyriology have utterly demolished this. The historical character of many of the names has been strengthened by recent discoveries (see e.g. Jerusalem; Amarna). The latter point of view modern observation of the habits of the quails has shown that the narrative of Nu is minutely accurate and must be the work of an eyewitness. From the ends of the earth there comes confirmation of the details of the law as depicted in the Pent. Finally it is worth noting that even the details of some of the covenants in Gen are confirmed by historical parallels (Churchman, 1908, 171).

It is often said that history in the true sense was invented by the Greeks and that the Heb genius was the more to be praised in the Divine guidance that it rejected secondary causes altogether. There is a large measure of truth in this view; but so far as the Pent is concerned it can be greatly overstated.

9. The Pentateuch as Reasoned History are given. A Thucydides would have stated the reasons that induced Pharaoh to persecute the Israelites, or Abraham and Lot to separate, or Korah, Dathan, and Abiram and their followers to rebel; but every reader would have known precisely what he was doing and many who can read the material passages of the Pent with delight would have been totally unable to grapple with his presentation of the narrative. The audience is here more unsophisticated and the material presented in more artistic form. In truth, any historian who sat down to compose a philosophical history of the period covered by the Pent would in many instances be surprised at the lavish material it offered to him. A second criticism is more obvious. The writer clearly had no knowledge of the other side of the case. For example, the secondary causes for the defeat near Hormah are plain enough so far as they are internal to the Israelites: lack of moral unity, lack of leadership, division of opinion, discouragement produced by the Divine disapproval testified by the absence from the army of Moses and the Ark, and the warnings of the former—but the secondary causes on the side of the Amalekites and Canaanites are entirely omitted. It thus generally happens that we do not get the same kind of view of the events as might be possible if we could have both sides.

Naturally this is largely the case with the work of every historian who tells the story from one side only and is not peculiar to the Pent. Thirdly, the object of the Pent is not merely to inform, but to persuade. It is primarily statesmanship, not literature, and its form is influenced by this fact. Seeking to sway conduct, not to provide a more philosophical exposition of history, it belongs to a different (and higher) category from the latter, and where it has occasion to use the same material puts it in a different way, e.g. by assigning as motives for obeying the commands reasons the historian would have advanced as causes for their enactment. To some extent, therefore, an attempt to criticize the Pent from the standpoint of philosophic history is an attempt to express it in terms of something to which it is incomparable.

V. Character of the Pentateuch.—The following sentences from Maine's Early Law and Custom form a suggestive introduction to any consideration of the character of the Pent:

"The theory upon which these schools of learned men worked, from the ancient, perhaps very ancient, Apane-tamba and Gautama to the late Manu and the still later Narada, is perhaps still held by some persons of earnest religious convictions, but in time now buried it amidst every walk of thought. The fundamental assumption is that a sacred or inspired lit is being once obtained to exist, all knowledge is contained in it. The Hindoos way of putting it is simply that the Scripture is true, but that everything which is true is contained in it. To be observed that such a theory, firmly held during the infancy of systematic thought, tends to work itself into fact. As the human mind advances, accumulating observation and accumulating reflection, nascent philosophy and nascent science are driven from sacred literature, while they are at the same time limited by the ruling ideas of its pious authors. But as the mass of this literature grows through time and is, by successive expositors, it gradually specializes itself, and subjects, which were at first mixed together, into the several conceptions, become separated from one another and isolated. In the history of law the most important of this already specialized division of science was that which we are inclined to de from what he ought to know. A great part of the religious literature, including the Creation of the Universe, the structure of Heaven, Hell, and the World or Worlds, and the nature of the Gods, falls under the last head, what a man ought to know. Law-books first appeared as a portion of the first book, what a man must do. Thus the most ancient books of this class are called "Pentateuch," as the Hindu who would lead a perfect life. They contain much more ritual than law, a great deal more about the iniquity causing things that crop up crime, a great deal more about penances than about punishments" (pp. 10-18).

It is impossible not to solve the resemblance of the Pentateuch to many sentences such as that in the Pentateuch is the commentary they provide on the attitude of Moses toward knowledge: "The secret things belong unto Jeh our God; but the things that are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this book to do them" (Deut. 29:29).

But if the Pentateuch has significant resemblances to other old law books, there are differences that are even more significant.

"By an act that is unparalleled in history a God took to himself a people by means of a sworn agreement. Some words that are fundamental for our understanding of the idea of God must be quoted from the other; "Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine; and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. The views here expressed dominate the legislation. Holiness—the correlative holiness to which the function befits because the the God holy—embraces much that is not germane to our subject, but it also covers the whole field of national and communal righteousness. The duty to God that is laid upon the Israelites in these words is a duty that has practical consequences in every phase of social life. I have already quoted a sentence from Sir Henry Maine in which he speaks of the uniformity with which religion and law are interwoven in archaic legislation. There is a stage in human development when the idea of a personal God is a stage in the history of the Pentateuch belongs. No other legislation so takes up one department of man's life after another and impresses upon all the relations of God to his people. Perhaps nothing will so clearly bring out my meaning as a passage of some of the more fundamental differences between the Pentateuchal legislation and the old Indian law-books which often provide excellent parallels to it. Those to which I desire to draw particular attention are as follows: The Indian law-books have no idea of national (as distinct from individual) righteousness—a conception that entered the world with the Mosaic legislation and has perhaps not made very much progress therein since. There is no personal God; hence His personal interest in righteousness is lacking; hence, too, there can be no relationship between local and personal and while there is a supernatural element in the contemplated results of human actions, there is nothing that can be in the slightest degree compared with the personal Divine intervention that is so often promissed in the Pentateuchal system. If, at home, the Hammurian law class system, leads to distinctions that are always inequitable. The conception of loving one's neighbour and oneself are not lacking. There is no national system which may not become a scandal. The systematic provisions for poor relief are absent, and the legislation is generally on a lower ethical and moral level, while some of the penalties are distinguished by the most perverted and barbarous cruelty. All these points are embraced in the special relationship of the One God and the peculiar treasure with its resulting need for national and individual holiness" (Ps. 33:1).

These sentences indicate some of the most interesting of the distinguishing features of the Pentateuch: its national character, its catholic view of holiness of life, its attitude toward the Divine, and some at any rate of its most peculiar teachings. It is worth noting that Judaism, the oldest of the great religions which has influenced, attaches particular importance to one chapter, Lev 19. The keynote of that chapter is the command: 'Holy shall ye be, for holy am I the Lord your God'—to preserve the order and emphasis of the original words. This has been called the Jew's "imperative of respect". When this is rejected, that the use of the word "imitation" is here inaccurate. Now this book with this teaching has exercised a unique influence on the world's history, for it must be remembered that Judaism, Christianity and Islam spring ultimately from its teaching, and it is impossible to sever it from the history of the "people of the book"—as Mohammed called them. It appears then that it possesses in some unique and powerful way an intensely universal character and a few words must be said as to this.

The great literary qualities of the work have undoubtedly been an important factor. All readers have felt the fascination of the stories. The Jew's character has also counted for much; so again have the moral and ethical doctrines, and the miraculous and unprecedented events of the nation. And yet there is much that might have been thought to militate against the book's obtaining any wide influence. Apart from some phrases about all the families of the earth being blessed (or blessing themselves) in the seed of Abraham, there is very little in its direct teaching to suggest that it was ever intended to be of universal application. Possibly these phrases only mean that other nations will use Israel as a typical example of greatness and happiness and pray that they may attain an equal degree of glory and prosperity. Moreover, the Pentateuch is a lens which has to exist, and a corpus of jural law that has not been adopted by other peoples. Of its most characteristic requirement—holiness—large elements are rejected by all save its own people. Wherein then lies its universal efficacy? How are the intensely national of books to exercise a world-wide and ever-growing influence? The reason lies in the very first sentence: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This doctrine of the unity of all God is the answer to our question. Teach that there is a God and One Only All-powerful God, and the book that tells of Him acquires a message to all His creatures.

Of the national character of the work something has already been said. It is remarkable that for its own people it has in very truth contained life and length of days, for it has been in and through that book that the Jews have maintained themselves throughout their universal history. If it be asked wherein the secret of this strength lies, the answer is in the combination of the national and the religious. The course of history must have been entirely different if the Pent had not been the book of the people long before the Jews became the possessors of the book.

LITERATURE.—The current critical view is set forth in vast numbers of books. The following may be mentioned: "LOT:" Cornell's "Intro to the Canonical Books of the OT"; Carpenter and Harford-Battersby's "Hexateuch" (a 2nd ed of the Intro without the text has been published as The Composition of the Hexateuch); the views of the ICC, Westminster Comm. and Century Bible. Slightly less thoroughgoing views are put forward in the Ger. Intros of König (1895), Baudissin (1910), Sellin (1910); and Gedén, "Outlines of Intro to the Hexateuch" (1909); Kittel, "Scientific Study of the OT" (1910); Erdtm. St. has entirely divergent critical views; "POT": TMH, I. and W. Moller, Are the Critics Right! and Wider der Gesandten der Quellenforschung der Gesandten der Quellenforschung, Early Religion of Israel; Van Hoonacker, Lieu du sable, and Sacredes Ususque as are the conservative and innovative and valuable. J. H. Raven, "OT Intro", gives a good presentation of the most conservative case. The views taken in this article are personal and an innovative and the Script. P. T. V. Targums and Chronicle

LXX with those in the Sam Pent and the MT. Epiphanius is aware that the Samaritans acknowledged the Pent alone as canonical. Cyril of Jerusalem notes agreement of LXX and Sam in Gen 4:8. These are the principal evidences of knowledge of this recension among the Gr Fathers. Jerome notes some omissions in the MT and supplies them from Sam. The Talm shows that the Jews retained a knowledge of the Sam Pent longer, and speaks contemptuously of the points in which it differs from the MT. Since the differences observed by the Fathers and the Talmudists are to be seen in the Sam Pent before us, they afford evidence of its authenticity.

After nearly a millennium of oblivion the Sam Pent was restored to the knowledge of Christendom by Pietro de la Valle who in 1616 published a revised copy from the Sam community in Nablus to which he had been a Protestant. He emphasized the difference between the MT and Sam Pent for argumentative reasons, in order to prove the necessity for the intervention of the church to set up a standard text. A fierce controversy resulted in which various divines, Protestant and Catholic, took part. Since then copies of this recension have multiplied in Europe and America. All of them may be regarded as copies ultimately of the Nablus roll. These copies are in the form, not of rolls, but of codices or bound volumes. They are usually written in two columns to the page, one being the Tg or interpretation and this is sometimes in Aramaic and sometimes in Arabic. Some codices show three columns with both Tgs. There are probably nearly 100 of these codices in various libraries in Europe and America. These are all written in the Sam script and differ only by scribal blunders.

II. Codices and Script.—The visitor to the Samaritans is usually shown an ancient roll, but only rarely is the most ancient exhibited, and when so exhibited still more rarely is it in circumstances in which it may be examined. Dr. Mills, who spent three months in the Sam community, was able to make a careful though interrupted study of it. His description (Nablus and the Modern Samaritans, 312) is that "the roll is of parchment, written in columns, 13 inches deep, and 7 inches wide. The writing is in neat characters, rather small; each column contains from 70 to 72 lines, and the whole roll contains 110 columns. The name of the scribe is written in a kind of acrostic, running through these columns, and is found in the Book of Dt. The roll has the appearance of very great antiquity, but is wonderfully well preserved, considering its venerable age. It is worn out and torn in many places and patched with re-written parchment; in many other places, where not even the writing is worn out, it seemed to me that about two-thirds of the original is still readable. The skins of which the roll is composed are of equal size and measure each 25 inches long by 15 inches wide." Dr. Rosen's account on the authority of Kraus (Zeitschr. der deutschen vergl. Gesellschaft, XVIII, 582) agrees with this, adding that the "breadth of the writing is a line and the space between is similar." Both observers have noted that the parchment has been written only on the 'hair' side. It is preserved in a silk covering inclosed in a silver case embossed with arabsche ornaments.

The reader on opening one of the codices of the Sam Pent recognizes at once the difference of the writing from the characters in an ordinary Heb Bible. The Jews admit that the character in which the Sam Pent is written is older than their square character. It is said in the Talm (Sanhedrin 21b): "The law at first was given to Israel in tshurit letters and in the holy tongue; after 20 years Ezra in the square ('ashurbith) character and the Aram. tongue. Israel chose for themselves the 'ashurbith character and the holy tongue; they left to the hekhayyoth ('uncultured') the 'tshurit character and the Aram. tongue—'the Carthaginians are the Aram.-yoth,'" said Rabbi Hasen. When Jewish hatred of the Samaritans, and the contempt of the Pharisees for them are remembered, this admission amounts to a demonstration. The Sam script resembles that on the Maccabean coins, but is not identical with it. It may be regarded as between the square character and the angular, the latter as is seen in the M S and the Siloam inscription. Another intermediate form, that found on the Assuan papyri, owes the differences it presents to having been written with a reed on papyrus. As the chronology of these scripts is of importance we subjoin those principally in question.

3. Peculiarities in Writing

In inscriptions the lapidary had no hesitation, irrespective of syllables, in completing in the next line any word which he had left incomplete in the preceding one. In the M S in the papyri the words are not divided, but the scribal was not particular about the ends of lines. He wrote the letters of each line closely together so that the first letter or couple of letters of each line are placed directly under the first letter or letters of the preceding line—and with the last letters—two or three—of the line, while the other words are spread out to fill up the space. The only exception to this is a paragraph ending. Words are separated from each other by dots; sentences by a sign like our colon. The Torah is divided into 906 kisw or paragraphs. The termination of these is shown by the colon having a dot added to it, thus . Sometimes this is reinforced by a line and an angle—<>. These kisw are often enumerated on the margin; sometimes, in later MS in Arab. numerals. A parenthesis sometimes separates one of these kisw from the next.

4. The Tarikh

When the scribe wished to inform the reader of his personality and the place where he had written the MS he made use of a peculiar device. In copying he left a space or an empty column. The space thus left is very now and then bridged by a single letter. These letters read down the column forming words and sentences which convey the information. In the case of the Nabûdûs roll this fact occurs in D and occupies three columns. In this it is said, "I Abunia, son of Pinhas [Pinheus], son of Eleazar, son of Akarun [Aarou] the priest, have written this holy book in the door of the tabernacle of the congregation in Mt. Gerizim in the 15th year of the rule of the children of Israel in the land of the Canans." Most of the codices in the libraries of Europe and America have like information given in a similar manner. This tarikh is usually Hebrew; but sometimes it is in Sam Aramaic. Falsification of the date merely is practically impossible; the forgery must be the work of the first scribe.

Not only has the difference of script to be considered, but also the different values assigned to the letters. The names given to the letters differ considerably from the Heb, as may be seen above. There are no vowel points or signs of reduplication. Only B and P of the Br-Gil Kaph letters are anaptyptic. The most singular peculiarity is that none of the gutturals is pronounced at all—peculiarly which explains some of the names given to the letters. This characteristic appears all the more striking when it is remembered how prominent gutturals are in Arab., the everyday language of the Samaritans. The first 5 verses of Gen are subjoined according to the Sam pronunciation, as taken down by Petermann (Versuch einer hebr. Formenlehre, 161). From the reading of Akarun the third priest: Emtarabhi tarabxw Btwem it asabhum xwita wawet. Woaez qata-te uhe wawesh al jani . . . tum uwo Btwem a mek, efd an al. Emem wawet ci tep wawet ci ke wawet ci ke wawet ci ke Btwem b a or b wawesh ayqib Btwem leb a om uwa wawesh kara liha. Uyo aros uyo xfo bar yom ahad.

There is no doubt that if the inscription given above is really in the MS it is a forgery written on the skin at the first. Of its falsity also there is no doubt. The Am Tab of the Nabûdûs sent from Caanaan and nearly contemporary with the Israelite conquest of the land were impressed with cuneiform characters and the language was Bab. Neglecting the tarikh, we may examine the matter independently and come to certain conclusions. If it is the original from which the other MS have been copied we are forced to assume a date earlier at least than the 10th cent. AD, which is the date of the earliest Heb MS. The script dates from the Hamanians. The reason of this mode of writing being perpetuated in copying the Law may be found in some special sanctity in the document from which the copies were made originally. Dr. Mills seems almost inclined to believe the authenticity of the tarikh. His reasons, however, have been rendered dubious by the evidence of Mr. Cowley, on the other hand, would date it somewhere about the 12th cent. AD, or from that to the 14th. With all the respect due to such a scholar we venture to think his view untenable. His hypothesis is that an old MS was found and the tarikh now seen.
in it was afterward added. That, however, is impossible unless a new skin—the newness of which would be obvious—had been written over and inserted. Even the comparatively slight change implied in turning Ishmael into Israel in the tarikh in the Nablus MSS. roll necessitates a great adjustment of lines, as the quarters of the tarikh in the Nablus MSS. roll were placed horizontally as well as perpendicularly. If that change were made, the date would then be approximately 650 AD, much older than Cowley's 12th cent. There is, however, nothing in this to explain the saw in the Nablus MSS. roll that the roll was saved from fire, that it leaped out of the fire in the presence of Nebuchadnezzar. If it were found unconsumed when the temple on Mt. Gerizim was burned by John Hyrcanus I, this would account for the veneration in which it is held. It would account also for the vorting reading of the script. The angular script prevailed until near the time of Alexander the Great. In it or in a script akin to it the copy of the Law must have been written which Manasseh, the son-in-law of Sanballat, brought to Samaria. The preparation of such a copy would be ascribed to miracle and the script consecrated.

III. Relation of the Samaritan Recension to the MT and LXX.—While the reader of the Samaritan MSS. cannot fail to perceive its practical identity with the MT, closer study to MT: reveals numerous, if minor, differences. These differences were classified by Gesenius. Besides being illogical and unclassifiable, the classification was founded on the assumption that the Sam Pent text is the later. The same may be said of Kohn's. We would venture on another classification of these variations, deriving the principle of division from their origin. These variations were due either to (1) accident or (2) intention.

1. Relation to MT:—

Classifications of Differences:—

(1) The first of these classes arose from the way in which books were multiplied in ancient days. Most commonly one read and a score of scribes, probably slaves, wrote to this dictation. Hence errors might arise (a) when from similarity of letters the reader mistook one word for another. (b) If the reader's pronunciation was not distinct the scribes might mis-hear and therefore write the word amiss. (c) Further, if the reader began a sentence which opened in a way that generally was followed by certain words or phrases, he might inadvertently conclude it, not in the way it was written before him, but in the customary phrase. In the same way the scribe through defective attention might also blunder. Thus the accidental variations may be regarded as due to mistakes of sight, hearing and attention. (2) Variations due to intention are either (a) grammatical, the removal of peculiarities and conforming them to usage, or (b) logical, as when a command having been given, the fulfillment is felt to follow as a logical necessity and so is narrated, or, if narrated, is omitted according to the ideas of the acent; (c) doctrinal changes introduced into the text to suit the doctrinal position of one side or other. Questions of propriety also lead to alterations—these may be regarded as quasi-doctrinal.

(1) Examples of accidental variations.—(a) Due to mistakes of sight: The cause of mistakes of sight is the likeness of differing letters. These, however, differ in different scripts, as may be proved by consideration of the table of alphabets. Of these these may find in connection with the Sam Pent appear to be mistakes due to the resemblance of letters in the Sam Pent. Most of these are obvious blunders; thus in Gen 19 32, we have the meaningless tâbânnu instead of tâbânaa, "our father," from the likeness of 'âl, to to 'âl, a. In Gen 25 29 we have gâzêd instead of gâzêd, "to seethe," because of the likeness of yâl, to yâl, or i. These, while in Blayney's transcription of Walton's text, are not in Petermann or the Sam MSS. The above examples are mistakes in Sam MSS, but there are mistakes also in the MT. In Gen 27 30 the branch break thou, thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck." This rendering does violence to the sense of both vs. and results in a tautology. In the Hiphil the first vb. râdâh ought to mean "to cause to wander," the second vb. râdâh means "to break," not "to shake off." The Sam has "When thou shalt be mighty, thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck." The MT mistake may be due to the confounding of 'âl, a, with 'âl, t, and the transposition of q, d, and b. The vb. akîbâh, "to be strong," is rare and poetic, and so unlikely to suggest itself to reader or scribe. The renderings of the LXX and Pesh indicate confusion. There are numerous cases, however, where the resembling letters are not in the Sam script, but sometimes in the square character and sometimes in the angular. Some characters resemble each other in both, but not in the Sam. In cases where there is only in letters in the square script may all be ascribed to variation in the MT. Cases involving the confusion of wâdâ and yâdâ are instances in point. It may be said that every one of the instances of variation which depends on confusion of these letters is due to a blunder of a Jewish scribe, e.g. Gen 25 13, where the Jewish scribe has written râbîth instead of râbîyoth (Nebirot) as usual; 36 5, where the Jewish scribe has yâdâ instead of yâdî (tâdî) as in the LXX and in the KJV. In writing râdîth instead of râdîth, the Jewish scribe in regard to the same letters has made a blunder which the Sam scribe has avoided. When d and r are confused, it must not be ascribed to the likeness in the square script, for those letters are alike in the angular also. As the square is admitted to be later than the date of the Sam script, these confusions point to a MS in angular. There are, however, confusions which apply only to letters alike in angular. Thus the acent bâna, invariable in the Hebrew of Benjamin, bâna'im, is written Benjamin; also in Ex 11 11 pîthim instead of pîthim, but m and n are alike only in the script of the Siloam inscription. In Dt 12 21, the Sam has zîwâ, tsâkhekkâm, as the MT has in 12 11, whereas the MT has tîwâ, lâsîm. A study of the alphabets on p. 2514 will show the close resemblance between wâdâ and kîpîf in the Siloam script, as well as the likeness above mentioned between m and n. This points to the fact that the MSS from which the MT and the Sam were transcribed in some period of their history were written in angular of the type of the Siloam inscription, that is to say of the age of Hezekiah.

(b) Variations due to mistakes of hearing: The great mass of these are due to one of two sources, either on the one hand the insertion or omission of words, so that the vowel is written plenum or the reverse, or, on the other hand, to the mistake of the gutturals. Of the former class are variations of the repetition or omission of a chapter. The latter also is fairly frequent, and is due doubtless to the fact that in the time when the originals of the present MSS were transcribed the pronunciation were not pronounced at all. Gen 27 36 shows and the interchanges of and . In Gen 49 7, and in Gen 23 18, in many Sam MSS, but the result is meaningless. This inability to pronounce the gutturals points to the fact considerably before the Arab domination. Possibly this avoidance of the gutturals because of the fashionable custom of the language of law was Lat., a language without gutturals. A parallel instance may be seen in Aquila, who does not transcribe any gutturals. These gutturals may be connected with the fact that in Assyrian kîpîf is practically the only guttural. The colonists from Assyria might not unlikely be unable to pronounce the gutturals.

(6) Changes due to deficient attention: Another cause of variances from the MT is due to the translator's carelessness or his desire to represent the text accurately. This is manifested occasionally in the substitution of a word in the MT for one in the LXX. For example, in Gen 26:31 the Sam has "fr ethical, "to his friend," instead of the MT 'fr ethical, "to his brother," and in Ex 20:27 Sam has ‘YHWH instead of the MT. In such cases it is impossible to determine which represents the original text. We may remark that the assumption of Germaine that the majority of such Jewish writers as Kohl that the MT is always correct is due to mere prejudice. More important changes occur in the case of a word for a word in the MT, as in Gen 3:24, where Sam has 'YHWH instead of the MT 'Elohim, as in Gen 4:4, where Sam has 'YHWH instead of the MT 'Elohim, and Gen 7:1 where it has 'Elohim and the MT has 'Elohim. This is a case in which the text of the MT is more singular, in that in the 9th verse of the same chapter the MT has 'Elohim and the Sam 'YHWH. Another class of instances which may be due to the same cause is the completion of a sentence by adding a clause or, it may be, dropping it from failure to observe to it in being directed. If the text, the Sam adds the clause "a little water from thy pitcher": if the Sam, then the MT has dropped it.

(2) Changes due to intention.-(a) Grammatical: Variations from the MT are frequently met with in reading the Sam Pent are those necessary to conform the language to the rules of ordinary grammar. In this the Sam frequently coincides with the K'rah of the MT. The K'rah of the MT has in most cases and is more singular, in that in the 9th verse of the same chapter the MT has 'Elohim and the Sam 'YHWH. Another class of instances which may be due to the same cause is the completion of a sentence by adding a clause or, it may be, dropping it from failure to observe to it in being directed. If the text, the Sam adds the clause "a little water from thy pitcher": if the Sam, then the MT has dropped it.

These variations are of unequal value as evidence of the relative date of the Sam recension of the Pent. The intention of the MT agree with this in which the text, the Sam adds the clause "a little water from thy pitcher": if the Sam, then the MT has dropped it.

(1) Statement of hypothesis.-The frequency with which the point in which the Sam Pent differs from the MT agree with this in which the text, the Sam adds the clause "a little water from thy pitcher": if the Sam, then the MT has dropped it.
The Samaritans had no independent tr, beyond the fact that five of the LXX were Samaritan. Had there been any excuse for asserting that the Samaritans were the first translators, that would not have dis- disposed of the tradition.

(2) Review of these hypotheses.—The above unsatisfactory explanations result from deficient observation and unwarranted assumption. That there are many cases where the Sam variations from the MT are identical with those of the LXX is indubitable. It has, however, not been observed by those Jewish scholars that the cases in which the Sam alone or LXX alone, one or other, agrees with the MT against the other, are equally numerous. Indeed, there are a few cases in which all three differ. It ought to be observed that the cases in which the LXX differs from the MT are much more numerous than those in which the Sam differs from it. One has only to compare the Sam, LXX and MT of any half a dozen consecutive chapters in the Pent to prove this. Thus neither is dependent on the others. Further, there is the unwarranted assumption that the MT represents the primitive text of the Law. If the MT is compared with the Vulg, it is found that the LXX, despite the marked effect of the Greek upon it, and the Palestinian text, differs in very many cases from the MT. Theodotion is nearer, but still differs in not a few cases. Jerome is nearer still, though even the text behind the Vulgate is not identical with the MT. It follows that the MT is the result of a process which stopped somewhere about the end of the 5th cent. AD. The origin of the MT appears to have been somewhat the result of accident. A MS which had acquired a special sanctity as belonging to a famous rabbi or group of rabbis has been copied with fastidious accuracy, so that even its blunders are perpetuated. This supplies the K'thbbh. Corrections are made from other MSS, and these form the Kyre. If our hypothesis as to the age of the Nahal roll is correct, it is older than the MT by more than a millennium, and the MS from which the LXX was tr was nearly a couple of centuries older still. So far from its being a reasonable assumption that the LXX and Sam differ from the MT only by blunders due to carelessness or unskill, it is much more probable that the converse is at least as probable. The conclusion then to which we are led is that of Kennicott (State of Heb Text Diss., II, 164) that the Sam and LXX being independent, "each copy is incomparably superior to the MS which is used in our English version, and attentive study." It further ought to be observed that though Dr. Kohn points to certain cases where the difference between the MT and the LXX is due to confusion of letters only possible in Sam character, this does not prove the LXX to have been tr from a Sam MS, but that the MSS of the MT used by the LXX were written in that script. Kohn also exhibits the relation of the Sam to the Pesh. While the Pesh sometimes agrees with the Sam where it differs from the MT, it more frequently supports the MT against the Sam.

IV. Bearing on the Pentateuchal Question.—Jos (Ant, XI, viii, 2) makes Sanballat contemporary with Alexander the Great, and states that his son-in-law Manasseh came to Samaria and became the head of the household. The story is assumed by Jos, it is assumed by critics that he brought the completed Torah with him. This Manasseh is according to Jos the grandson of Eliashib the high priest, the contemporary of Ezra and Nehemiah, and therefore mention of him with Artaxerxes I Longimanus and Nehemiah (13 28) mentions, without naming him, a grandson of Eliashib, who was son-in-law of Sanballat, whom he chased from him. It is clear that Jos had dropped a century out of his history, and that the migration of Manasseh is to be placed not c 335 BC, but c 435 BC. Ezra is reputed to be, if not the author of the PC in the Pent, at all events its introducer to the Samaritans, and to have edited the whole, so that it assumed the form in which we now have it. The claim of Manasseh, and had been, by his denunciation of foreign marriages, the cause of the banishment of Manasseh and his friends. Is it probable that he, Manasseh, would receive as Mosaic the enactments of Ezra, or would he have been the author of the introduction of P, the latest portion of the Law, must accordingly be put considerably earlier than it is placed at present. We have seen that there are visual blunders that can be explained only on the assumption that the MS from which a further Sam roll was copied was written in some variety of angular script. We have seen, further, that the peculiarities suit those of the Sikhon inscription executed in the reign of Hezekiah, therefore approximately contemporary with the present sent by Esarhaddon to Samaria to teach the people the "manner of the God of the land." As Amos and Hosea manifest a knowledge of the whole Pent before the captivity, it would seem that this "Book of the Law" must have been read [Am 4 5 LXX Without, which would be the sense "sent the priest sent from Assyria taught as above the "manner of the God of the land," would contain all the portions—P, E, D, and P—of the Law. If so, it did not contain the Book of Josh; notwithstanding the honor they give to the writer of Cu- naam, the Samaritans have not retained the book which relates his exploits. This is confirmed by the fact that the archaism in the MT of the Pent are not found in Jos. It is singular, if the Prophets were before the Law; for if so there should be archaism which are not found in the Prophets. From the way the Divine names are interchanged, as we saw, sometimes Elig7m in the Sam represents YHWH in the MT, sometimes vice versa, it becomes obviously impossible to lay any stress on this. This conclusion is confirmed by the yet greater frequency with which this interchange occurs in the LXX. The result of investi- gation of the Sam Pent is to throw very considerable doubt on the possibility of identifying the versions as to the date, origin and structure of the Pent.

V. Targums and chronicle.—As above noted, there are two Tgs or interpretations of the Sam Pent, an Aramaic and an Arabic. The Aramaic is called "Western Aram.;" in which the Jewish Tgs were written, was written, sometimes called "Adjicous" verse, some strange words, some of which may be due to the language of the Assyrians, but many are the result of blunders of the scribes ignorant of the language, and not to the original and is little given to paraphrase. Much the same may be said of the Arab. Tg. It is usually attributed to Abu Said of the 12th cent., but according to Dr. Cowley only revived by him from the Tg of Abulhassan of the 11th cent. There is evidence occasionally in the Fathers to a Samaritan which has been taken to mean a Gr version. No indubitable quotations from it survive—what seems to be so blemishes tr of the text of the Sara recension. There is in Arabic, a wordy chronicled called "The Book of Josh," it has been edited by Jaybanyi. It may be dated in the 13th cent. More recently a "Book of Joshua" in Heb and written in Sam characters was alleged to be discovered. But it is a manifest forgery; the characters in which it is written is very late, is partly because of Josh, and partly from the older Sam Book of Joshua with famous additions. The Chronicle of Abulpharagia is a tolerable aggregate account of the history of the Samaritans after Alexander the Great to the 4th cent. AD.

LITERATURE.—The text in the Sam script is found in the papyri—Paris and London. Walton's text in the London Polyglot is transcribed in square characters by Dr. Layton, Oxford, 1704. Longeneck's text of recent times are Mills, Noahs and the Samaritans, London, 1864; Nutt, Dram from the Sam Text, London, 1874; Montgomery, The Samaritans, Philadelphia, 1907 this has a very full bibliography which includes articles in periodicals. The old Jewish festival obtained a new significance, for the Christian church, by the promised outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Jn 16 7.13). The incidents of that memorable day, in the history of Christianity, are vivid and dramatic in the Acts of the Apostles. The old rendering of sumplesoirakshai (Acts 2 1) by "was fully come" was taken by Lightfoot (Hor. Heb.) to signify that the Christian Pentecost did not coincide with the Jewish, just as Christ's Last Supper was not held on Passover, but on Thursday. RV translates the obnoxious word simply "was now come." Meyer, in his commentary on the Acts, treats this question at length. The tradition of the ancient church placed the first Christian Pentecost on a Sunday. According to John, the Passover year occurred on Friday, Nisan 14 (18 28). But according to Mt, Mk and Lk, the Passover year occurred on Thursday, Nisan 14, and hence Pentecost fell on Saturday. The K AuthService explained the shabbath of Lev 23 15 as pointing to the Sabbath of the paschal week and therefore not the Pentecost. But it is very uncertain whether the custom existed in Christ's day, and moreover it would be impossible to prove that the disciples followed this custom, if it could be proved to have existed. Meyer follows the Johannine reckoning and openly states that the other evangelists made a mistake in their reckoning. No offhand decision is possible, and it is but candid to admit that here we are confronted with one of the knottiest problems in the harmonizing of the Gospels. See Chronology of the NT.

The occurrences of the first pentecostal day after the resurrection of Christ set it apart as a Christian festival and invested it, together with the commemoration of the resurrection, with a new meaning. We will not enter here upon a discussion of the significance of the events of the pentecostal day described in Acts 2. That is discussed in the article under Tongues (q.v.). The Lutherans, in their endeavor to prove the inherent power of the Word, claim that "the effects then exhibited were due to the power inherent in the words of Christ; and that they had resisted that power up to the day of Pentecost and then yielded to its influence." This is well described as "an incredible hypothesis" (Hodge, Systematic Theol., III, 484). The Holy Spirit descended in order to make explicit the promise of the glorified Lord, and the disciples had been prayerfully waiting for its fulfillment (Acts 1 4.14). The Spirit came upon them as "a power from on high." The holy Spirit proved on Pentecost His personal existence, and the intelligents, the hearts, the lives of the apostles were on that day miraculously changed. By that day they were fitted for the arduous work that lay before them. There is some difference of opinion as to what is the significance of Pentecost for the church as an institution. The almost universal opinion of theologians and exegetes is this: that Pentecost marks the founding of the Christian church as an institution. This day is said to mark the dividing line between the ministry of the Lord and the ministry of the Spirit. This later doctrine has advanced the idea that the origin of the church, as an institution, is to be found in the establishment of the apostolate, in the selection of the Twelve. Dr. A. Kuyper holds that the church as an institution was founded when the Twelve was elected the Twelve, and that these men were "qualified for their calling by the power of the Holy Spirit." He distinguishes between the institution and the constitution of the church. Dr. H. Bavinck says: “Christ gathers a church about Himself, rules it directly so long as He is on the earth, and appoints twelve apostles who later on will be His witnesses. The institution of the apostolate is an esp. strong proof of the institutional character which Christ gave to His church on the earth” (Geref. Dogm., IV, 64).

Whatever we may think of this matter, the fact remains that Pentecost completely changed the apostles, and fitted them with the Holy Spirit enabled them to become witnesses of the resurrection of Christ as the fundamental fact in historic Christianity, and to extend the church according to Christ’s commandment. Jerome has an esp. elegant passage in which Pentecost is compared with the beginning of the Jewish national life on Mt. Sinai (Ad Tabor, § 7): “There is Sinai, here Sion; there the trembling mountain, here the trembling house; there the flaming mountain, here the flaming tongues; there the noisy thunderings, here the sounds of many tongues; there the clanger of the ramshorn, here the notes of the gospel-trumpet.” This vivid passage shows the close analogy between the Jewish and Christian Pentecost.

In the post-apostolic Christian church Pentecost belonged to the so-called “Semester Domini,” but is distinct from the “Semestre Ecclesiæ.”

3. Later Christian Observance
As yet there was no trace of Christmas, Penitential period, closed the “Quadragesima,” or “Lent,” the entire period of which has been marked by self-denial and humiliation. On the contrary, the entire pentecostal period, the so-called “Quinquagesima,” was marked by joyfulness, daily communion, absence of fasts, standing in prayer, etc. Ascension Day, the 40th day of the period, ushered in the climax of this joyfulness, which burst forth in its fullest volume on Pentecost. It was highly esteemed by the Fathers. Chrysostom calls it “the metropolis of the festivals” (De Pentec., Hom. ii); Gregory of Nazianzen calls it “the day of the Spirit” (De Pentec., Orat. 44). All the Fathers sound its praises. For they fully understood, with the church of the ages, that on that day the dispensation of salvation was begun as dispensation of greater privileges and of a broader horizon and of greater power than had hitherto been vouchsafed to the church of the living God. The festival “Octaves,” which, in accordance with the Jewish custom, desquamated the whole week to the celebration of the festival, from the 8th cent., gave place to a two days’ festival, a custom still preserved by the Roman church and such Protestant bodies as follow the ecclesiastical year. The habit of dressing in white and of seeking baptism on Pentecost gave it the name “Whitsunday,” by which it is popularly known all over the world. HENRY E. DOKSER

PENUEL, pen‘-yôl, pen‘-yôl. See Peniel.

PENURY, pen‘-ûr-i (παριστη, pa-re‘tis, παριστημενον, pa-re‘tis-me-ne‘n). In Prov 14 23, with sense of “poverty,” “want”; “The talk of the lips tendeth only to penury.” In the NT the word in Lk 21 4 (kurtépuma, kurtépêma) is in RV tr“want” (of the widow’s mites).

PEOPLE, pe‘-pul. In EV represents something over a dozen Heb and Gr words. Of these, in the OT, דֹּם, dom, is overwhelmingly the most common (some 2,000 t.), with נֶפֶשׁ, ne‘pes, and גּוֹי, go‘y, next in order; but the various Heb words are used with very little or no difference in force (e.g. Prov 14 28; but, on the other hand, in Ps 44 contrast vs 12 and 14). Of the changes introduced by RV the only one of significance (cited above in the Preface to ERV) is the frequent use of the pl. “peoples” (strangely avoided in AV except Rev 10 11, 17 16), where the sing. esp. preponderates. So, for instance, in Ps 67 4; Isa 55 4; 60 2, with the contrast marked in Ps 33 10 and 12; Ps 77 14 and 15, etc. In the NT, λαός, lâos, is the most common word, with ἕλεος, ἔλεος, used almost as often in AV. But in RV the latter word is almost always rendered as “thou art being pitied,” “people” being as often as in AV. But in RV the latter word is almost always rendered as “thou art being pitied,” “people” being as often as in AV.

PEOR, pe‘ôr (יוֹנָה, jo‘ôa, פּוֹר, Phôgor): (1) A mountain in the land of Moab, the last of the three heights to which Balaam was guided by Balak, in order that he might curse Israel (Nu 22 7). It is placed by Onom on the way between Livias and Heshbon, 7 25 miles from the latter. From here it is identified with Jebel el-Masahkjar, on which are the ruins of an old town, between Wady A‘yân Misa and Wady Heshbon.

(2) A town in the Judaean uplands added by LXX (Phôgor, Phôgor) to the list in Josh 18 9. It may be identical with Khirbet Phagâr to the S. of Bethlehem.

(3) Peor, in Nu 25 18; 31 16; Josh 22 17, is a Divine name standing for “Baal-peor.”

(4) In Gen 36 39, LXX reads Phôgor for “Pau” (MT), which in 1 Ch 1 50 appears as “Pai.”

PERAEA, pe‘-rē-a (περαε, he Peraios, Περαιας, Peraios, Περαιατας, Peraiatal, Peraiates): This is not a Scriptural name, but the term used by Jos to denote the district to which the rabbinic country, probably refers as “the land beyond Jordan.” This corresponds to the NT phrase περαν του Ιωδαναω (Mt 4 15; 19 1, etc.). The boundaries of the province are given by Jos (BJ, III, iii, 3). In length it reached from Pella in the N. to Machaerus in the S., and in breadth from the Jordan on the W. to the desert on the E. We may take it that the southern boundary was the Arnon. The natural boundary on the N. would be the great gorge of the Yarmuk. Gadara, Jos tells us (BJ, IV, vi, 3, 6), was capital of the Peraea. But the famous city on the Yarmuk was a member of the Decapolis, and so could hardly take that position. More probably Jos referred to a city the ruins of which are found at Jedur—a reminiscence of the ancient name—not far from Ras-Sialt. The northern Gerasa held the land on the southern bank of the Yarmuk, the northern boundary of the Peraea would run, as Jos says, from Pella eastward. For the description of the country thus indicated see GILEAD, 2.

In the time of the Macedeans the province was mainly Gentile, and Judaism, if necessary to remove to Judaea the scattered handful of Jews to secure their safety (1 Mac 5.45). Possibly under Hyrcanus Jewish influence began to preval and before the death of Antripus (Ant, XVII, vii, 1). The tetrach built a city on the site of the ancient Beth-haram (Josh 13:27) and called it Julias in honor of the emperor's wife (Ant, XVIII, i, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1). Here Simon made his abortive rising (Ant, XVII, x, 6; BJ, II, iv, 2). Claudius placed it under the government of Felix (BJ, II, xii, 8). It was finally added to the Roman dominions by Phædeus (BJ, IV, vii, 3-6). Under the Moslems it became part of the province of Damascus.

Perea, "the land beyond Jordan," ranked along with Judaea and Galilee as a province of the land of Israel. The people were under the same laws as regarded tithes, marriage and property.
Perea lay between two gentle provinces on the E., as Samaria between two Jewish provinces on the W. of the Jordan. The fords below Besidai and other favorable communications with Galilee and Judaea respectively. Perea thus formed a link connecting the Jewish provinces, so that the pilgrims from any part might go to Jerusalem and return without setting foot on gentile soil. And what of equal importance, they could avoid peril of hurt or indignity which the Samaritans loved to inflict on Jews passing through Samaria (Lk 9:52; Ant, XX, vi, 1; Vita, 52).

It seems probable that Jesus was baptized within the territory of Perea; and either He came from the turmoil of Jesus at the Feast of the Dedication (Jn 10:40). It was the scene of much quiet and profitable intercourse with His disciples (Mt 19; Mk 10:1-31; Lk 18:15-30). These passages are by many thought to refer to the period after His retirement to Ephraim (Jn 11:54). It was from Perea that He was summoned by the sisters at Bethany (ver.3).
Perea furnished in Niger one of the bravest men who fought against the Romans (BJ, II, xx, 4; IV, vi, 1). From Bethzeb, a village of Perea, came Mary, whose story is one of the most appalling among the terrible tales of the siege of Jerus (BJ, VI, iii, 4). Jos mentions Perea for the last time, as its echo of the deeds of groans andoutingsthat accompanied the destruction of Jerusalem.

PERAZIM, per'a-zim, pe-ráz-im, MOUNT (περαζῆ, bab-prá'tim); "Jehovah will rise up as in mount Perazim" (Isa 29 21). It is usually considered to be identical with BaaL-perazim (q.v.), where David obtained a victory over the Philis (2 S 5 20; 1 Ch 14 11).

PERDITION, per di'sh'un, apó-leia, ru'in or "loss," physical or eternal: The word "perdition" occurs in the Eng. Bible 8 t (Jn 17:12; Phil 1:29; 2 Thes 2:3; 1 Tim 6:9; He 10 39; 2 Pet 3 7; Rev 17 11.18). In each of these cases it denotes the final state of ruin and punishment which forms the opposite to salvation. The vb. apó-lei'ain, from which the word is derived, has two meanings: (1) to lose; (2) to destroy. Both of these pass over to the noun, so that apó-leia comes to signify: (1) loss; (2) ruin, destruction. The former occurs in Mt 26 8; Mk 14 4, the latter in the passages cited above. Both meanings had been adopted into the religious terminology of the LXX, in such an easy as the LXX. "To be lost" in the religious sense may mean "to be missing" and "to be ruined." The former meaning attaches to it in the teaching of Jesus, who compares the lost sinner to the missing coin, the missing sheep, and makes him the object of a seeking activity (Mt 18 12; Lk 15 10,11,32; Lk 15 11). "To be lost" here signifies to have become estranged from God, to miss realizing the relations which man normally sustains toward Him. It is equivalent to what is theologically called "spiritual death." This conception of "loss" enters also into the description of the eschatological fate of the sinner as assigned in the judgment (Lk 9 24; 17 33), which is a loss of life. The other meaning of "ruin" and "destruction" describes the same thing from a different point of view. Apó-leia being the opposite of sotéria, and sotéria in its technical usage denoting the reclaiming from death unto life, apó-leia also acquires the specific sense of such ruin and destruction as involves an eternal loss of life (Phil 1 28; He 10 39). Perdition in this latter sense is equivalent to what theology calls "eternal death." When in Rev 17 5.11 it is predicated of "the beast," one of the forms of the world-power, this must be understood on the basis of the OT prophetic representation according to which the coming judgment deals with powers rather than persons.

The Son of Perdition is a name given to Judas (Jn 17 12) and to the Antichrist (2 Thes 2 3). This is the well-known Heb idiom by which a person typically embodying a certain trait or character or destiny is called the son of that thing. The name therefore represents Judas and the Antichrist (see MAN OF SIN) as most irrecoverably and completely devoted to the final apó-leia. GEBHARDUS VOS

PEREZ, pe'rez. PHAREZ, fa'rez (פֶּרֶץ, perec, "breach"): One of the twins born to Judah by Tamar, Zerah's brother (Gen 38 29.30). In the OT the word "perfection, "finished," OT "whole," "complete," used (except in Dt 17 15, "perfect weight") of persons, e.g. a "perfect heart," i.e. wholly or completely devoted to Jehovah (1 K 2 6.11, etc.; 1 Ch 12 38; Is 38 3, etc.); tomar, "complete," "perfect," "sound or unblemished," is also used of persons and of God; His way and law ("Noah was a just man and perfect.") Perfection is the tr of katartikē, "thorough adjustment," "fitness" (2 Cor 13 9, RV "perfected"); of teleōsis (He 7 11); of teleōtās (He 6 1), "RV full-grown"); it is thr "perfection" (Col 3 14); "perfection" in Lk 8 14 is the tr of telephoró, "to bear on to completion or perfection." In Apoc. "perfect," "perfection," etc, are for the most part the tr of words from this, "the completion" (Ecc 3 17), "so...sustained...full end"; 24 28; 50 11. RV has for the "upright" (2 S 22 24 16); for the "saints" (Ps 119 80, for "perfect" (Phil 3 5); for the "unmarried" (Ps 119 1, m "upright in way"); for the "righteous" (Ez 7 27, "perfect and so forth"); for "He maketh my way perfect" (2 S 22 33), "He guideth the perfect in his way," m "a...another reading...guideth my way in perfection...shall himself perfect...in...restore...for..." (He 12 2); "perfectly" is omitted in RV (Mt 14 36), "so your hope perfectly on...RV "hope to end" (1 Pet 1 19). Perfection is the Christian ideal and aim, but inasmuch as that which God has set before us is infinite—Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect (Mt 5 48)—absolute perfection must be forever beyond, not only any human, but any finite, being; it is a Divine ideal forever shining before us, calling us upward, and making endless progression possible. As noted above, the perfect man, in the OT phrase, was the man whose heart was taken for wholly dedicated to God. Christian perfection must also have its seat in such a heart, but it implies the whole conduct and the whole man, conformed thereto as knowledge grows and opportunity arises, or might be found. There may be, of course, the relative perfection of e.g., a child as a child compared with that of the man. The Christian ought to be continually moving onward toward perfection, looking to Him who is able to "make you perfect in every good thing (or work) to do his will, working in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be the glory for ever and ever. Amen." (He 13 21).

PERFORM, pér-form (He, paroimia, "to furnish completely," "to complete," "finish entirely"). In modern Eng., through a mistaken connection with "form," "perform" usually suggests an act in its continuity, while the word properly should emphasize only the completion of the act. AV seems to have used the word in only one sense (cf Rom 15 28; 2 Cor 8 11, Phil 1 6, where RV has respectively "accomplish," "complete," "perfect," but especially with so little justification in the Heb or Gr that "do" would have represented the original even better. RV has rarely changed the word in the OT, and such changes as have been made (Dt 23 23; Est 1 15, etc) seen on no particular principle. In the NT the word has been kept only in Mt 5 33 and Rom 12 17, but in the other verses RV has rendered the completion of the act, in the former case apologia, lit. "to give back," in the latter paroimia, "to make," "to do," being used.

Performance is found in AV Sir 19 20 (RV "doing"); 2 Mace 11 17 (inserted needlessly and omitted by RV); Lk 4 13, RV "fulfillment"); 2 Cor 8 11 (RV "completion").

PERFUME, pér-fum, pér-fum, PERFUMER (περφύμ, πέρφυμ, καλαρτίσματα, κατάρτισμα, lit. "incense"). The ancients were fond of sweet perfumes of all kinds and that characteristic is still esp. true of the people of Bible lands. Perfumed oils were rubbed on the body and feet. At a feast in ancient Egypt a guest was anointed with scented oils, and a sweet-smelling water lily was placed in his hand or suspended on his forehead. In their religious worship the Egyptians were lavish with their incense. Small pellets of dried mixed spices and resins or resiny woods were burned in special censers. In the preparation of bodies for burial, perfumed oils and spices were used. Many Bib. references indicate the widespread use of perfumes. Cant 7 8 suggests that the breath was purposely scented; clothing as well as the body was perfumed (Ps 45 8; Cant 3 6; 4 11); couches and beds were sprinkled with savory scents (Ps 27 9); incense could be used in the last rites in honor of the dead (2 Ch 16 14; Lk 24 1; Jn 19 39). The writer in his collection a lump of prepared spices and resins taken from a tomb dating from the 1st or 2nd cent. AD, which was apparently fused and run into the thoracic cavity, since an impression of the ribs has been made on the perfume. Its odor is similar to that of the incense used today, and it perfumes the whole case where it is kept. The above collection also contains a small glass vial in which is a bronze spoon firmly held in some solidified ointment, probably formerly perfumed oil. Perfumes were commonly kept in sealed alabaster jars or cruces (Lk 7 38). Thousands of these cruces have been unearthed in Pal and Syria. Perfumes were mixed by persons skilled in the art. In AV these are called "apothecaries" (περφυμοι, ἀποθήκη). The RV "perfumer" is probably a more correct rendering, as the one who did the compounding was not an apothecary in the same sense as the person now so designated (Ex 30 25 35; 37 29; Eccl 3 1)

Today incense is used in connection with all religious services of the oriental Christian churches. Although there is no direct mention of the uses of incense in the NT, such allusions as Paul’s "a sac-
Perga, Par'ga (Πέργα, Perga): An important city of the ancient province of Pamphylia, situated on the river Cestris, 12 miles N.E. of 1. Location Attalia. According to Acts 13 13, and History Paul, Barnabas and John Mark visited Perga on their first missionary journey, and 2 years later, according to Acts 14 24-25, they may have reached there. Though the water of the river Cestris has now been diverted to the fields for irrigating purposes, in ancient times the stream was navigable, and from it a harbour on the sea might reach the city. It is uncertain how ancient Perga is; its walls, still standing, seem to come from the Seleucid period or from the 3d cent. BC. It remained in the possession of the Seleucid kings until 189 BC, when Rom influence became strong in Asia Minor. A long series of coins, beginning in the 2d cent. BC, continued until 286 AD, and upon them Perga is mentioned as a metropolis. Though the city had a strong hold of Christianity, it was the bishopric of Western Pamphylia, and several of the early Christians were martyred there. During the 8th cent. under Byzantine rule the city declined; in 1084 Attalia became the metropolis, and Perga rapidly fell to decay. While Attalia was the chief Gr and Christian city of Pamphylia, Perga was the seat of the local Asiatic goddess, who corresponded to Artemis or Diana of the Ephesians, and was locally known as Leto, or the queen of Perga. It is highly probable that the coins on the coins as a huntress, with a bow in her hand, and with sphinxes or stags at her side. The ruins of Perga are now called Murtana. The walls, which are flanked with towers, show the city to have been quadrangular in shape. Very broad streets, lined with porticoes, divided the town, and intersecting each other, divided the city into quarters. The sides of the streets were covered with porticoes, and along their centers were water channels in which a stream was always flowing. They were crossed at short intervals by bridges. Upon the higher ground was the aeroplos, where the earliest city was built, but in later times the city extended to the S. of the hill, where one may see the greater part of the ruins. On the aeroplos is the platform of a large structure with fragments of several granite columns, probably representing the temple of the goddess Leto; others regard it as the ruin of an early church. At the base of the aeroplos are the ruins of an immense theater which seated 13,000 people, the agora, the baths and the stadium. Without the walls many tombs are to be seen. E. J. Banks

PERGAMOS, Par'ga-mos; or PERGAMUM, Par'ga-um (Perlamos, hē Pergamos, or Ἱλίας Ἡ Πέργαμον): Pergamos, to which the ancient writers also gave the neuter form of the name, was a city of Mysia of the ancient Roman province of Asia, in the Cæles valley, 3 miles from the river, and about 15 miles from the sea. The river navigable at Pergamos was navigable by large craft. Two of the tributaries of the Cæles were the Selinus and the Kteios. The former of these rivers flowed through the city; the latter ran along its walls. On the hill between these two streams the first city stood, and there also stood the acropolis, the chief temples, and the theaters of the later city. The early people of the town were descendants of Gr colonists, and as early as 420 BC they struck coins of their own. Later the people of the town, deposited there 9,000 talents of gold. Upon his death, Philateus (283-263 BC) used this wealth to found the independent Gr dynasty of the Attalid kings. The first of this dynasty to bear the title of king was Attalus I (241-197 BC), a nephew of Philateus, and not only did he adorn the city with beautiful buildings until it became the most wonderful city of the East, but he added to his kingdom the countries of Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Pamphylia and Phrygia. Eumenes II (197-159 BC) extended its fame and power, and the Romans built on it the dynasty, and during his reign the city reached its greatest height. Art and literature were encouraged, and in the city was a library of 200,000 volumes which later Antony gave to Cleopatra. The baths, with colonnades, were the first used; hence the name "parchment," which is derived from the name of the town P. Of the structures which adorned the city, the most renowned was the altar of Zeus, which was 30 ft. in height, and also one of the wonders of the ancient world. When in 133 BC Attalus III, the last king of the dynasty, died, he gave his kingdom to the Rom government. His son, Aristonicus, however, attempted to use it for himself, but in 129 he was defeated, and the Rom province of Asia was formed, and P. was made its capital. The term Asia, as here employed, should not be confused with the continent of Asia, nor with Asia Minor. It applied simply to that part of Asia Minor which was then in the possession of the Romans, and from which the province of which P. was the capital. Upon the establishment of the province of Asia there began a new series of coins struck at P., which continued into the present cent. AD. The magnificence of the city continued.

There were beautiful temples to the four great gods Zeus, Dionysus, Athena and Asklepios. To the temple of the latter, invalids from 2. Religions all parts of Asia flocked, and there, basking in the sunshine of the god revealed to the priests and physicians by means of dreams the remedies which were necessary to heal their maladies. Thus opportunities of deception were numerous. There was a school of medicine in connection with the temple. P. was chiefly a religious center of the province. A title which it bore was "Thrice Neokoros," meaning that in the city 3 temples had been built to the Rom emperors, in which the emperors were worshipped as gods. Smyrna, a rival city, was a commercial center, and as it increased in wealth, it gradually became the political center. Later, when it became the capital, P. remained the religious center. As in many of the towns of Asia Minor, there were at P. many Jews, and in 130 BC the people of the city passed a decree in their favor. Many of the Jews were more or less assimilated with the Greeks, even to the extent of bearing Gr names.

Christianity reached P. early, for there one of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev stood, and there, according to Rev 2 1-3, Antipas was martyred; he was the first Christian to be put to death by the Rom state. The same passage speaks... of P. as the place “where Satan's throne is,” probably referring to the temples in which the Rom emperors were worshiped. During the Byzantine times P. still continued as a religious center, for there a bishop lived. However, the town fell into the hands of the Seljukus in 1304, and in 1336 it was taken by Suleiman, the son of Orkhan, and became Turkish.

The modern name of the town, which is of considerable size, possessing 15 mosques, is Bergama, the Turkish corruption of the ancient name. One of its mosques is the early Byzantine church of St. Sophia. The modern town is built among the ruins of the ancient city, but is far less in extent. From 1870 to 1886 excavations among the ruins were conducted by Herr Humann at the expense of the German government. Among them are still to be seen the base of the altar of Zeus, the frizies of which are now in the Pergamon Museum, Berlin; the theater, the agora, the gymnasium, and several temples. In ancient times the city was noted for its ointments, pottery and parchment; at present the chief articles of trade are cotton, wool, opium, valonia, and leather.

PERIDA, pē-rī'dā (.Names, pērīdah, “recluse”): A family of “Solomon’s servants” (Neh 13:7). In Ex 2 25, a difference in the Hebrew spelling gives “Peruda” for the same person, who is also called “The Pharida” of 1 Esd 5 33.

PERIZZITE, per-i-zīt, peri-zi’t (NASB, Perizz, Peraizes): Signifies “a villager,” and so corresponds with the Egypt fellah. Hence the Perizzite is not included among the sons of Canaan in Gen 10, and is also coupled with the Canaanite (Gen 13:7; 34:30; Jgs 1:4). We hear, accordingly, of “Canaanites and Perizzites” at Shechem (Gen 34:30), at Bezek in Judah (Jgs 1:4) and, according to the reading of LXX, at Gezer (Jsh 16:10). In Dt 3 3 and Is 6 18, where AV has “unwalled towns” and “country villages,” LXX has “Perizzites,” the lit. tr. of the Heb. “cities of the Perizite” or “villager” and “village of the Perizzite.” The same expression occurs in Est 9 19, where it is used of the Jews in Elam. In Jsh 17 15.18, where the Manassites are instructed to take possession of the forest land of Carmel, “Perizites and Rephaim” are given as the equivalent of “Canaanite.” A. H. Sayce

PERPETUAL, pēr-pē’tū-əl, perpetually, pēr-pē’tū-əl-i, PERPETUITY, pēr-pē’tū-ə-tē (PERP), ‘dām, ‘dām, nāçōh, ‘tāBINDH, tābindh): Perpetual is usually the tr. of ‘dām, properly, “a wrapping up” or “hiding,” used often of time indefinitely long, and of eternity when applied to God; hence we have, “for perpetual generations” (Gen 9:12); “the priesthood by a perpetual statute” (Ex 29:9; cf. 31:16; Lev 3:17; 24:9, etc.); “placed the sand for the bound of the sea, by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it” (Jer 5:22, RVn “an everlasting ordinance which it cannot pass”); “sleep a perpetual sleep” (Jer 61:39,57); “Mosab shall be a perpetual possession” (Zeph 2:9, etc.; nāçōh, “preeminence,” “perpetuity,” “eternity” (often tr. “for ever,” Ps 9:6), is tr. “perpetual” (Ps 74:3; Jer 15:18); nāçōh (part.) (Jer 8:5); tābindh, “continuance,” generally rendered “continually,” but sometimes “perpetual” or “perpetually” (Ex 30:8; Lev 6:20).

Perpetually is the rendering of ‘adh, properly “progress,” “duration,” hence long or indefinite time, eternity (usually in RV rendered “for ever”), in Am 1:11, “His angel did fear perpetually”; and of kōl ha-yādim, “all the days” (K. J. 9:3; 2 Chr 7:16, “my heart shall be there perpetually”; of Mt 28:20, “pānūs tis heméras, lit. “all the days”).

Perpetuity is repeated in RV of Lev 25:33, “The land shall not be sold in perpetuity,” “The house . . . shall be made sure perpetually.”

Perpetual is frequent in Apoc, most often as the tr. of ἀβατόν and kindred words, e.g. Jth 13:20, “a perpetual praise”; Wind. 1:14, “perpetual glory,” RV “eternal”; Rev 11:33, “a perpetual blot,” RV “blame for ever.”

“Persecution” is a term coupled with “perpetual” in 2 Mac 6:8, as “perpetual name,” RV “everlasting...”; ἀνάμνησις, “ever-flowing death” occurs in Wind 11:6 (so RV); endechōs, “constant” (Rev 15:4, “perpetual reproach”).

The importance of this subject may be indicated by the fact of the frequency of its occurrence, both in the OT and NT, where in AV the words “persecute,” “persecuted,” “persecuting” are found more than 150 times, “persecution” 44 times, and “persecutor” 9 times.

It must not be thought that persecution existed only in NT times. In the days of the OT it existed too. In what Jesus said to the Pharisees, He especially referred to the innocent blood which had been shed in those times, and told them that they were showing themselves heirs—to use a legal phrase—to their fathers who had persecuted the righteous, “from the blood of Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah” (Mt 23:35).

In the period between the close of the OT and the coming of Christ, there was much and protracted suffering endured by the Jews, because of their refusal to embrace idolatry, and of their fidelity to the Mosaic Law and the worship of God. During that time there were many patriots who were true martyrs, and those heroes of faith, the Macabees, were among those who “know their God . . . and do exploits” (Dtn 11:32). “We have no need of human help,” said Jonathan the Jewish high priest, “having for our comfort the sacred Scriptures which are in our hands” (1 Mac 12:9).

In the Ep. to the He, persecution in the days of the OT is summed up in these words: “Others had
After Our Lord’s resurrection the first attacks against His disciples came from the high priest and his party. The high-priesthood was then in the hands of the Sadducees, and one reason which moved them to take action of this kind was their ‘sore enemies,’ because the apostles “proclaimed in Jesus the resurrection from the dead!” (Acts 4:2; 5:17). The gospel based upon the resurrection of Christ was evidence of the untruth of the chief doctrines held by the Sadducees, for which they had them tried and condemned. But instead of yielding to the evidence of the fact that the resurrection had taken place, they opposed and denied it, and persecuted His disciples. For a time the Pharisees were more moderate in their attitude toward the Christian faith, as is shown in the case of Gamaliel (Acts 5:34); and on one occasion they were willing even to defend the apostle Paul (Acts 23:9) on the doctrine of the resurrection. But gradually the whole of the Jewish people became bitter persecutors of the Christians. Thus in the earliest of the Pauline Epistles it is said, “Ye also suffered the same things of your own countrymen, even as they [in Judea] did of the Jews; who both killed the Lord Jesus and the prophets, and drove us out, and sold us up to be numbered, and are contrary to all men” (1 Thess. 2:14, 15).

Serious persecution of the Christian church began with the case of Stephen (Acts 7:1–60); and his lawless execution was followed by “a great persecution” directed against the Christians in Jerusalem. This “great persecution” (Acts 8:1) scattered the members of the church, who fled in order to avoid bonds and imprisonment and death. At this time Saul signalized himself by his great activity, persecuting “this Way” (Acts 9:2–4), and going into prisons both men and women” (Acts 22:4).

By and by one of the apostles was put to death—the first to suffer of “the glorious company of the apostles”—James the brother of John, who was slain with the sword by Herod Agrippa (Acts 12:2). Peter also was imprisoned, and was delivered only by an angel (13:7–11).

During the period covered by the Acts there was not much purely gentle persecution; at that time the persecution suffered by the Christian church was chiefly Jewish. There were, however, great dangers and risks of persecution encountered by the apostles and by all who proclaimed the gospel then. Thus, at Philip, Paul and Silas were most cruelly persecuted (Acts 16:19–40); and, even before that time, Paul and Barnabas had suffered much at Iconium and at Lystra (Acts 14:29). On the whole, the Roman authorities were not actively hostile during the greater part of Paul’s lifetime. Gallio, for instance, the deputy of Achaia, declined to come into the charge brought by the Jews at Corinth against Paul (Acts 18:14; Acts 15:16). And when Paul had pleaded in his own defence before King Herod Agrippa and the Roman governor Festus, these two judges were agreed in the opinion, “This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds” (Acts 26:31).

Indeed it is evident (see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Rom Citizen, 308) that the purpose of Paul’s trial being recorded at length in the Acts is to establish the fact that the gospel was not forbidden by the laws of the Roman empire, but that Christianity was a religio licita, a lawful religion.

Christianity, at first, not a forbidden religion.—This legality of the Christian faith was illustrated and enforced by the fact that when Paul’s case was decided by the supreme court of appeal at Rome, he was set free and resumed his missionary labors, as these are recorded or referred to in the Pastoral Ep. "One thing is certain, however; never from a comparison of Phil with 2 Tim. There had been in the interval a complete change in the policy toward Christianity of the Rom. government. The change was due to the great fire of Rome (July, 64). As part of the persecution which then broke out, orders were given for the imprisonment of Christians. But the Jewish friends were not likely to forget the prisoner of the same name when at Rome, was away from Rome, but steps were taken for his arrest. The apostle was brought back to the city in the autumn of the same year. From what he had to say at all, in view of the summary punishment of his brethren, witnesses to this, can only be accounted for by a certain show of legality in the persecution of the leader." (Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, 38). See Pastoral Ep. 1 Tim. 5 and 2 Tim. 4:11.

The legal decisions which were favorable to the Christian faith were soon overturned on the occasion of the great fire in Rome, which

12. The occurred in July, 64. The public Neronic feeling of resentment broke out against Persecution the emperor to such a degree that, to avoid the stigma, just or unjust, of being himself guilty of setting the city on fire, he made the Christians the scapegoats which he thought he needed. Tacitus (Annals xv.44) relates all that occurred at that time, and what he says is nothing less than a very early record of notices found in any profane author, both of the Christian faith, and of Christ Himself.

(1) Testimony of Tacitus.—What Tacitus says is that nothing that Nero could do, either in the way of gifts to the populace or in that of sacrifice to the Rom. deities, could make the people believe that he was innocent of causing the fire. He goes on to say that Neronic relatives, hence to relieve himself of this infamy he falsely accused the Christians of being guilty of the crime of setting the city on fire. This charge is the strangest assumption that persons commonly called Christians who were hated for their faith, but it is an instance of the saying, "in all manner of evil against them falsely, for Christ's sake." The Christians, whose lives were pure and virtuous and beneficent, were spoken of as being the����es of the earth.

(2) References in 1 Pet.—The First Ep. of Peter is one of the parts of the NT which seem to make direct reference to the Neronic persecution, and he uses words (1 Pet. 4:12ff) which may be compared with the narrative of Tacitus: "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial among you, which cometh upon you, though such thing as ye are partners of Christ's sufferings, so that at the last ye may rejoice, to the end that his glory may be revealed... As ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, comfort ye one another with these words." Then, to confirm this, he goes on to say that "if ye suffer for righteousness, blessed are ye; for the Spirit of glory and of God rests upon you." The whole of this may be referred to the persecution of Nero, as this was the last persecution before let them also that suffer according to the will of God commit their souls in well-doing unto a faithful Creator." (Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, 38).

(3) References in 2 Pet.—How absolutely apostate and suitable was this comforting exhortation to the case of those who suffered in the Neronic persecution. The description which Tacitus gives is as follows: "Christians, the founder of that name, was put to death as a criminal by Pontius Pilate, procurator in the reign of Tiberius. But the pernicious superstition, repressed for a time, broke out again not only through Judaea, where the mischief originated, but through the city of Rome also, which all things horrible and disgraceful flowed from all quarters in a common sink, and for many years were encouraged. Accordingly, first, those were seized who confessed they were Christians; next, on their information, as fast multitudes were convicted, not so much on the charge of setting the city on fire, as of having the human race with the beasts and were treated to be killed by dogs, or nailed to crosses, and were burned to serve for nocturnal lights. Nero offered his own gardens for the spectacle; and in his chariot he played the judge. Christians were indiscriminately mingling with the common people, dressed as charioteer, or else standing in his chariot. They were then laden with chains, and on the public tribunal were treated with inhumanity, even worse than guilty and deserving to be made examples by capital punishment, because they seemed not to be cut off for the public good, but to be visious to the futility of one man." (See Nero).

The abiding impression made by these times of persecution of the mind of John is also seen in the defense of the world found throughout his First Ep. (2 17; 5 19), and in the rejoicing over the fall of Babylon, the great persecution center. The fall is described in such passages as Rev 14 8; 16 2 3; 17 14; 18 24.

Following immediately upon the close of the NT, there is another remarkable witness to the continuance of the Roman persecution against the Christian church. This is Pliny, proconsul of Bithynia.

In 111 or 112 AD, he writes to the emperor Trajan a letter in which he beseeches the government to cease the worship of the Christians. He goes on to say that "many of both sexes are being called into danger, and will continue to be so. In fact the contumacy of the accusers, who did not confine their testimony to the cities only, but has spread to the villages and country districts, has reached such a degree that we cannot believe many professing Christians. That is to say, he had used persecuting measures, and had succeeded in forcing some of the accused to testify against the others in their stead. He tells the methods he had used. "The method I have observed to prove them is this: first; I have brought before me as Christians this. I asked them whether they were Christians. If they admitted it, I repeated the question a second time, and a third, and threatened them with punishment if they persisted. If they persisted, I ordered them to be punished, and to subscribe to a letter of allegiance, of the nature of which they confessed might be, that a contaminating and infamous obstinacy ought to be punished. There were others also, possessed with the same infatuation, whom, because they were Roman citizens, I ordered to be sent to Rome. But they could not be persuaded to accede to the state, which I had ordered to be brought in for this very purpose, along with the statutes of the gods, and they even reviled the name of Christ; whereas there is no forcing. It is said, those who are really Christians into our hands, and I thought it proper to give them a chance in which to repent of their error. Those who were accused by a witness at first confessed themselves Christians, but afterward denied it. Some owned that they had been Christians formerly, but had now, some for several years, and a very few for only two or three years, given up the profession entirely. I judged it to be so much the more necessary to endeavor to extort the real truth by putting to the torture two female slaves who were accused deacons, yet I found in them nothing but an absurd and extravagant superstition."

To Pliny, who asked, "Then the Christians ought not to be searched for. If they are brought before you and convicted, they should be punished, but this should be done in such a way, that he who denies that he is a Christian, and when his statement is proved by his invoking our deities, such a person, although suspected for past conduct, must nevertheless be forgiven, because of his repentance."

These letters of Pliny and Trajan treat state-persecution as the standing procedure—and this not a generation after the death of the apostle John. The sufferings and tribulation predicted in Rev 2 10, and in many other passages, had indeed come to pass. Some of the Christians had denied the name of Christ and had worshiped the images of the emperor and of the idols, but multitudes of them had held fast the faith and maintained it.

Speaking generally, persecution of greater or less severity was the normal method employed by the Roman empire against the Christian church during the 2d and 3d centuries. It may be said to have come to an end only about the end of the 3d or the beginning of the 4th cent., when the empire became nominally Christian.

When the apostolic period is left, persecution becomes almost the normal state in which the church is found. And persecution, instead of abolishing the name of Christ, as the persecutors vainly imagined they had succeeded in doing, became the badge of the Christian church, and the test of its purity. Both of these important ends, and others too, were secured by the severity of the means employed by the persecuting power of the Roman empire.

Under Trajan's successor, the emperor Hadrian, the lot of the Christians was full of uncertainty; persecution might break out at any moment. At the best Hadrian's regime was only that of unauthorized toleration.

With the exception of such instances as those of Nero and Domitian, there is the surprising fact to notice, that it was not the worst emperors, but the best, who became the most violent persecutors. One reason probably was that the ability of those emperors led them to see that the persecution religion of Christ is really a divisive factor in any kingdom in which civil government and pagan religion are indissolubly bound up together. The more that such a ruler could inflame the religious passions of his subjects the more would he persecute the Christian faith. Hence among the rulers who were persecutors, there are the names of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius the philosopher-emperor, and Septimius Severus (died at York, 211 AD).

Persecution was no accident, which chanced to happen, but which might not have occurred at all. It was the necessary consequence of the principles embodied in the heathen Roman government, when these came into contact with the Christian faith. The essential principles of the Christian faith. The reasons for the persecution of the Christian church by the Roman empire were (1) political; (2) on account of the claim which the Christian faith makes, and which it cannot help making, to the exclusive allegiance of the heart and of the life. That loyalty to Christ which the martyrs displayed was believed by the authorities in the state to be incompatible with the duties of a Roman citizen. Patriotism could never be united in the worship of the emperor, but Christians refused to take part in this worship on any terms, and so continually lived under the shadow of a great hatred, which always slumbered, and might break out at any time. Christianity made the Christian faith to the absolute and exclusive loyalty of all who obeyed Christ was such that it admitted of no compromise with heathenism. To receive Christ into the pantheon as another divinity, as one of several—this was not the Christian faith. To every loyal follower of Christ compromise with other faiths was an impossibility. An accommodated Christianity would itself have been false to the only true God and Jesus Christ whom He had sent, and would have conquered the world. To the heathen there were lords many and gods many, but to the Christians there was but one God the Father and one Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world (1 Cor 8 5 6). The essential absoluteness of the Christian faith was its strength, but this was also the cause of its being hated.

"By a correct instinct paranosias of all sorts descended in the infant church their only rival. So while the new Hercules was yet in the cradle, they sent their snakes to kill him. But Hercules lived to oust the Augean stables" (Workman, op. cit., 88). For 200 years, to be persecuted meant the great renunciation, the joining a despised and persecut, the swimming against the tide of popular prejudice, the coming under the ban of the State, the committing at any moment of imprisonment and death under its... most fearful forms. For 200 years he that would follow Christ must bear the cost, and be prepared to pay the same with his liberty and life. For 200 years the more preponderant of Christianity was itself a crime, "Christianization with almost the one plea for which there was another, the want of an idea, an idea which was necessary as a 'title' on the back of the condemned. He who made it was allowed neither to present an apology, nor to seek a good议论. But the editor of a Christian text writes Tertullian, "asks but one thing, and that not by the persecution of the Christian soldier who refused compliance with the idolatrous ceremonies in which the army engaged, whether those ceremonies were concerned with the worship of the Roman deities of which that of Isis was an invincible savour," as Mithra was called, had become, at the time when Tertullian and Origen wrote, the special deity of soldiers. Shrines in honor of Mithra were erected through the entire breadth of the Roman empire's Parnassus, the Cherub Hills in Britain. And went to the soldier who refused compliance with the religious sacrifices to which the legions gave their adhesion! The Christians in the Roman legions formed no considerable proportion of "the noble army of martyrs," it being easier for the persecuting authorities to detect a Christian in the ranks of the army than elsewhere.

In the 2d and 3d cents. Christians were to be found everywhere, for Tertullian, in an oftentimes quoted verse of his Apologies, "We live beside you in the world, making use of the same laws, the same courts, the same inn, and all other places of trade. We sail with you, fight shoulder to shoulder, sell all the soil, and traffic with you; yet the very existence of Christian faith, and its profession, continued to bring the greatest risks. But the public will in their world, they remained a peculiar people, who must be prepared at any moment to meet the storm of hatred." (Apol. II. 15.) For this it returned that in this way or another, hatred on the part of the world inevitably fell to the lot of the footsteps of the Master: "All that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (2 Tim 3. 12).

"Every persecution of the Third Race," probably invented by the heathen, but willingly accepted by the Christians without demur, shows itself as what a bitter hatred the faith of Christ. "The first race" was indifferently called the Greek, or Gentile; "the second race", was the Jews; while "the third race" was the Christian. The cry in the council of Carthage was (Apol. 9. 8.) "Quae greges tertiarii? How long must we endure this third race?"

But one of the most powerful causes of the hatred entertained by the heathen against the Christians was, that though there were no citizens so loyal as they, yet in every case which the laws and customs of the empire came into conflict with the will of God, their supreme rule was loyalty to Christ, they must obey God rather than man. To worship Caesar, to offer even one grain of incense on the shrine of Diana, no Christian would ever consent, not even when this minimum of compliance would save life itself.

The Roman empire claimed to be a kingdom of universal sway, not only over the bodies and the property of all its subjects, but over their souls and consciences. It demanded absolute obedience to its supreme lord, that is, to Caesar. This obedience the Christian could not render, for unlimited obedience of body, soul and spirit is due to God alone, the only Lord of the conscience. Hence it was that there arose the antagonism of the government to Christianity, with persecution as the inevitable result.

These results, hatred and persecution, were, in such circumstances, a natural outcome. But still, in the beginning, fundamental tenet of primitive Christianity, that the Christian could not bow to human power, that this was his own old environment, ceased to hold his old connections with the state; in everything he became the bond-servant of Jesus Christ, who was in the world, not of the world, and fealty to the new empire and the Crucified Head. We engage to explain Tertullian, "as men whose very lives are not our own. We have no master but God." (Workman, 195.)

The persecution inaugurated by the emperor Decius in 250 AD was particularly severe. There was hardly a province in the empire where there were no martyrs; but there were also many who abandoned their faith and rushed to the magistrates to obtain their libelli, or certificates that they had offered heathen sacrifice. When the death of persecution were over, these persons usually came with cagerness to seek readmission to the church. It was in the Decian persecution that the great theologian Origen, who was then in his 69th year, suffered the cruel torture of the rack, and from the effects of what he then suffered he died at Tyre in 254.

Many libelli have been discovered.p. in recent excavations in Egypt. In the Expos T for January, 1909, Dr. George A. Plummer, in an example, and prints the Gr text of one of these recently discovered Egypt libelli. These libelli are most interesting, illustrating as they do the account which Cyprian gives of the way in which some faint-hearted Christians during the Decian persecution obtained certificates—some of these certificates being true to fact, and others false— to the effect that they had sacrificed in the heathen manner. The one which Dr. Milligan gives is as follows: To those who, consent to superstitious sacrifices, the village of Alexander Island, from Aurelius Diogenes, the son of Satabus, of the village of Alexander Island, being about 72 years old, ap. 258, to the governor, of the last names, have made this request. (1st Hand). "Aurelius Syrus, as a participant, have certified Diogenes as sacrificing along with us." (1st Hand) "The first year of the Emperor Caesar Galus Mostoeus Pius Felix Augustus, Ephip. 3rd" (= June 25, 250 AD).

Under Valerian the persecution was again very severe, but his successor, Gallienus, issued an edict of toleration, in which he guaranteed freedom of worship to all Christians. The Christians did not, they definitely became a religio licita, a lawful religion. This freedom from persecution continued until the reign of Diocletian.

The persecution of the Christian church by the empire of Rome came to an end in March, 313 AD, when Constantine issued the document known as the "Edict of Milan," which assured to each individual freedom of religious belief. This document marks an era of the utmost importance in the history of the world. Official Roman persecution had done its worst, and had failed; it was ended now; the Galilean had conquered.

The results of persecution were: (1) It raised up witnesses, true witnesses, for the Christian faith. Men and women, children and even children of the martyrs whom no cruelties, however refined and protracted, could terrify into denial of their Lord. It is to a large extent owing to persecution that the Christian faith obtained the victory. The noble Roman, like Quadratus and Tertullian and Origen and Cyprian and many, many more, like those who are the Christian faith in an external and formal manner only generally went back from their profession, the true Christian, as with the Romans, who could not be made to do this. The same stroke which crushed the straw—such is a saying of Augustine—separated the pure grain which the Lord had chosen.
(2) Persecution showed that the Christian faith is immortal even in this world. Of Christ's kingdom there shall be no end, and, while hands, yea, hammers break, God's altar stands. "Pagan Rome, Babylon, and Persia were called to the apostle John in the Apocalypse, tried hard to destroy the church of Christ: Babylon was drunk with the blood of the saints. God's temple is to exist for ever, and the blood of His children was shed like water. Why was it not more to have been terrible and extended far longer an experience of suffering? It was in order to convince the world that though the kings of the earth gather against the Lord and His Christ, yet all that they can do is vain. God is in the midst of His children; and shall help and protect them. The Christian church, as it suspended between heaven and earth, had no need of other help than that of the unsearchable judgments which at every moment held it up and kept it from falling. Never was the church more free, nor stronger in the power of preserving it more extensive in its growth, than in the days of persecution.

And what became of the great persecuting power, the tormentors, the cruel, the tyrannical, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cruel, the cru and of among other passages Rom 8 31–37; 1 Pet 1 8.9). On the other hand, we find frequent and urgent warnings and cautions (see e.g. 1 Cor 8 11; 9 27). The teacher dealing with actual cases, as in pastoral work, should be ready to adopt both classes of utterances, each with its proper application; applying the first, e.g. to the true but timid disciple, the latter to the self-confident. Meanwhile Scripture on the whole, by the manner and weight of its positive statements, favors a humble belief of the permanence, in the plan of God, of the once-given new life. It is as if it laid down “perseverance” as the Divine rule for the Christian, while the negative passages came in to caution the man not to deceive himself with appearances, nor to let any belief whatever palliate the guilt and minimize the danger of sin. In the biographies of Scripture, it is noteworthy that no person appears who, at one time certainly a saint, was later certainly a castaway. The awful words of He 6 4–6; 10 20.27 appear to deal with cases (such as Balaam’s) of much light but no loving life, and so are not precisely in point. Upon the whole subject, it is important to make “the Perseverance of the Saviour” our watchword rather than “the Perseverance of the saint.”

Persia, pūr’sha, žha (C) Fr, pāraš; Përš, Persis; in Assyri Paras, Paraša; in Achaemen Pers Parsa, modern Fars): In the Bible (2 Ch 36 20.22.23; Est 1 1.8; Est 1 3.14.18; 10 2; Ezk 27 10; 38 5; Dnl 8 20; 10 1; 11 2) the name denotes properly the modern province of Fars, not the whole Pers empire. The latter was by its people called Aryan, the present Irān (from the Skt. word dyaña, “noble’’); and even now the Persians never call their country anything but Irān, never “Persia.” The province of Persia lay to the E. of Elam (Susiana), and stretched from the Pers Gulf to the Great Salt Desert, having Carmania on the S.E. Its chief cities were Persopolis and Pasargadae. Along the Pers Gulf the land is low, hot and unhealthy, but it soon begins to rise as one travels inland. Most of the province consists of high and steep mountains and plateaus, with fertile valleys. The table-lands in which lie the modern city of Shirāz and the ruins of Persepolis and Pasargadae are well watered and productive. Nearer the desert, howev- ever, cultivation grows scanty for want of water. Persis was doubtless in early times included in Elam, and its population was then either Semitic or allied to the Accadians, who founded more than one state in the Bab plain. The Aryan Persians seem to have occupied the country in the 8th or 9th cent. BC.

VII. Comparison

I. Language (Introdutory).—The Persiolanguage, ancient and modern alike, is an Aryan tongue. In its ancient forms it is more closely connected with Vedic Sanskrit than with any other language except Armenian. Most of its roots are to be found also in Slavonic, Gr, Lat and other tongues of the same stock.

There were two main dialects in the ancient language of Irān (Aryānem), (1) that of the Persians proper, and (2) that of the Medes.

Dialects. The former is known to us from the inscriptions of the Achaemenian kings, the latter from the Avesta, and a few Median words preserved for us by Herodotus and other Gr writers.

II. Old Persian Inscriptions.—These fall between 550 and 350 BC, and contain about 1,000 lines and 400 words. They are carved upon the rocks in a cuneiform character, simplified from that of the neo-Susian, which again comes from the neo-Bab syllabary. In Old Pers inscriptions only 44 characters are employed, of which 7 are ideographs or contractions. The remaining 37 phonetic signs are syllabic, each consisting of an open syllable and not merely of a single letter, except in case of separate vowels. The syllabary, though much simpler than any other cuneiform system, does not quite attain therefore to being an alphabet. It was written from left to right, like the other cuneiform syllabaries. Of Cyrus the Great only one Pers sentence has been found: Adam Kurruh Khshayathiyu Hakhāmānisti, “I am Cyrus the King, the Achaemenian.” Darius I has left us long inscriptions, at Behistān (Besitūn), Mt. Alvand, Persepolis, Naqš-i Rustam, etc., and one at Suez, the latter mentioning his conquest of Egypt and the construction of the first (?) Suez canal:

Adam niyāskāyam imām yawpām kātanaḫi haca Pirāva nāma rauša luya Mūdrayati danaunaxi ubi daraya luya haca Parsa sità

(“I commanded to dig this canal from the river named the Nile, which flows through Egypt, to the sea which comes from Persia.”)

We have also inscriptions of Xerxes at Persepolis and many short ones of Artaxerxes I, Artaxerxes Mnāmôn, and Artaxerxes Oxhus. From them all taken together we learn much concerning the history and the religion of the Achaemenian period.
It is from Achaemenid or Old Pers, and not from the Medes or Avestics, that modern Pers has sprung through Pahlavi and Dari as intermediate stages. This is probably due to the political supremacy which the Persians under the Achaemenides gained over the Medes. The few words in the inscriptions which have been doubted can be understood through comparison with Armenian and even with the modern Pers, e.g. yavšva in the above inscription is the modern vulgar Pers šōb.

III. Medico-Dialect.—The Medico dialect is represented in literature by the Avesta or sacred books of the Zoroastrians (Pādrā). The word Avesta does not occur in the book itself and is of uncertain meaning and signification. It is probably the Aēstāhāb of Beh, Insc., IV, 64, and means either (1) an interview, meeting (Sk. avastāhā, "appearance before a judge"); Av. awa-ēstā, "to stand near"), or (2) a petition (Pahl. apaštān, "petition"); Arm. apāstān, "refuge," "asylum"), in either case deriving its name from Zoroaster's drawing near to Ahura Mazda in worship.

Yezdikhast.

This dialect represents a much greater decadence in grammar and vocabulary than does the Old Pers. Many of its consonants and most of its vowels are weakened; its verbs have almost entirely lost the augment; its declensional system shows extreme confusion. It stands to Old Pers grammatically somewhat as Eng. does to Oer. Its alphabet, consisting of 43 letters, is derived from the Byr (probably the Evangōli), and is written from right to left. As a specimen of the language of most of the Avesta we give the following extract (Yasna LXIV, 19611):

Dādī tāt, yē gām tashah apasa avenanda
Aminātād, hauvātād, Spandād Mānīna Mazda, Tuxāth, uavštīyād, Manahā Vēhā, sīkēh.

("Give me, O thou who didst make the bull [earth], and the waters and the plants, immortality, health—O most Bountiful Spirit, Mazda—strength, might, through Vēhā Manahā, I say.")

There is a sub-dialect of Medico (Avestic) known as the Gāthā-dialect, from the fact that the Gāthās, or "Hymns," (e.g. Yasna XXVIII-XXXIV, XLI-L), and also the prayers (Yathā Aša Vairiyā, Aham Verē, Aham Yēhā, Aham Tashō, and originally Yēhā Hātām, and a few scattered passages elsewhere) are composed in it. This represents, speaking generally, an older form of the Avestic; it is probably the old language of Bactria or of Margiana. Gatha 1. 2. runs thus:

Yē sē, Mazda Ahūrā, pārīrajnā Vēhā Manahā,
Mātēyav dāvāi ašah (aivtatacasa hāypha manhā)
Aumātā Ashā hāc, vātīrapih darvīh hāṭhrāh, (=mēy Vicubah Manahā, who taught you two through Vēhā Manahā, grant the benefits from Asha, [these] of both worlds [worlds] and of that which is of the spirit, through [which] [benefits] may [Asha] place in glory those who please him.)

The form of the Gāthās, like that of the other Avestic poems, is based on the number of syllables in a line, with due regard to the caesura. But the condition of the text is such that there is great difficulty in recovering the original reading with sufficient accuracy to enable us to lay down rules on the subject with any certainty.

The first Gāthā is composed of strophes of 3 lines each (as above). Each line contains 16 syllables, with a caesura after the 7th foot.

IV. Zoroaster.—Many of the Gāthās are generally ascribed to Zoroaster himself, the rest to his disciples. The 1. His Date, etc. is now becoming a matter of very great probability that Zoroaster lived at earliest in the middle of the 7th cent. BC, more probably a century later. The poems of Zoroaster himself are represented pure for 300 years, and connects its corruption with the alleged destruction of much of the Avesta in the palace burned by Alexander at Persepolis, 324 BC. This traditional indication of date is confirmed by other evidence. Zoroaster's prince Vishtāspa (in Gr Hodašdēs) bears the same name as the father of Darius I, and was probably the same person. Vishtāspa's queen Hutaosa, who also protected and favored Zoroaster, bears the same name (in Gr Adasa) as Cambyses' sister who afterward married Darius, and probably belonged to the same family. Zoroastrianism comes to the fore under Darius, whereas Cyrus in his inscriptions speaks as a decided polytheist. Hence we conclude that the earliest part of the Avesta belongs to c. 500 BC. Zoroaster himself we learn much from the Avesta, which traces his genealogy back for 10 generations. It mentions his wife's name (Hyōvi), and tells of his 3 sons and 3 daughters. His first disciple was Frashoastra, his wife's natural uncle. His own name means "Owner of the yellow camel," and has none of the higher meanings sometimes assigned to it by those who would deny his existence. Tradition says he was born at Rusa (Rapa, Rai), about 51 miles S. of the present Tehran, though some think his native place was Western Atropatene (Arzubeyān). Rejected by his own tribe, the Magi, he went to Vishštāspa's court in Bactria, the faith which he taught spread to the Pers court (very naturally, if Vishtāspa was identical with Darius' father) and thence throughout the country. Tradition (Yasht XIX, 2, etc) says that the Avesta was revealed to Zoroaster on Mt. Ushi-darena ("intellect-holding") in Sistan. But it is not the composition of one man or of one generation.

Herodotus makes no mention of Zoroaster, but speaks of the Magi (whom he calls a Median tribe [i.101]) as already performing priestly functions. His description of their repetition of charms and theological compositions (i.129) shows very well with recitation of the Gāthās and Yasna. Mention of controversies with Gautama, Buddha's disciples (Yasht XIII, 16) who probably reached Persia in the 2d cent. BC, is another indication of date. The fact that in both the Yasna and the Vendīdād heretics (zādā) are mentioned who preferred the comm. (zād) to the Avesta to the Avesta itself, is a sign of late date. Names of certain persons found in the Avesta (e.g. Atare-pātā, a Dastur who lived under Hormoud I, 273 AD, and Rātastā Yaghehtī, whom the Dinkard identifies with the chief Mobed of Sapor II, 300-379 AD, Adērqār Mārsapand, and who, according to the Pattī, § 28, "purified" the revelation made to Zoroaster, i.e. revised the text of the earlier parts of the Avesta) enable us to prove that certain portions of the works in question were composed as late as near the end of the 4th cent. of our era. It is said that the text was in confusion in the time of Vologases I (51-78 [AD]).

The final recension thus began, and continued with much zeal by Sardār Pāpākān, 229-40 AD. According to Geldner (Prolegomena, xlii) the final recension took place some considerable time after Yezygird III (overthrown 642 AD). In the times
PERSIAN RELIGION (ANCIENT):

1. Before Zoroaster.—There are clear indications in the Avesta that the religion of the Medes and Persians before Zoroaster’s time agreed in most respects with that of the Indian Aryans, and in a less degree with the beliefs of the Aryans in general.

All the Aryan tribes in very ancient times showed great respect for the dead, though they carefully distinguished them from the gods (of Rig-Veda X, 96, 4). The latter were principally the powers of Nature, the wind, fire, water, the sky, the sun, the earth, and a host of personifications. The procreative powers in Nature, animate and inanimate, seeming to be the source of animal and vegetable life, received adoration, which ultimately led to unacceptable corruption. Herodotus tells us that the Persians in his time worshipped the sun, moon, sky, earth, fire, wind, and water (i.131). Offerings to the gods were laid on a mass of pomegranate twigs (barunsam, Skt. bhrks), and the flesh of victims was boiled, not eaten. Libations of haoma-juice were poured out, just as in India the soma was the drink of both gods and their worshippers.

A comparison between the spiritual beings mentioned in the Avesta and those spoken of in the Rig-Veda is most instructive in two ways. It shows that the original religion of the Iranians and of the Indian Veda Aryans agreed very closely; and it also enables us to realize the immensity of the reformation wrought by Zoroaster. Many of the names of supernatural beings are practically the same; e.g. Indra (Indra, Andra), Mitra (Mithra), Aryaman (Aryaman), Ashra (Ahuja), Apam Napat (Apam Napat), Tvashti (Tishtrya), Rama (Raman), Varuna (Vayu), Vatra (Vatra). So are many words of religious import, as Soma (Haoma), Mantra (Mithra), Hota (Zaotar). The Yama of India is the Yima of Persia, and the father of the one is Vivasvat and that of the other Vivahhat, which is the same word with dialectic change. The holy river of the Avesta, Ariavarta, the Unstained (Anahita), is represented by the Sarasvati, the Gangā (Ganges) and other sacred streams worshipped in India. Persia Ahr (or Fire) is a son of Ahura Mazda (Yasna LXIV, 46-53), as Agni (= Iignis) is of Tvaṣṭṛi in the Rig-Veda. Armaiti is Ahura Mazda’s daughter, as Sarayu in the Rig-

W. ST. CLAIR TISDALL
Veda is the daughter of Tvashtri, the "Creator." The use of góméz (bois urino) for purification is common to both India and Persia. Though the soma-plant is not now the same as the háoma, the words are the same, and no doubt they at one time denoted one and the same plant. Many of the myths of the Avesta have a great resemblance to those of the Veda. This comparison might be extended almost indefinitely.

In another respect also there is an important agreement between the two. Though some 33 deities are adored in the Vedic Hymns, yet, in spite of polytheism and low ideas of the Divine, traces of some higher may be found. Varuna, for instance, represents a lofty conception. In the closest connection with him stands Azura, who is a being of great eminence, and whose sons are the gods, e.g. the Ádityas.

Tvashtri again is creator of heaven and earth and of all beings, though his worship was ultimately in Vedic times displaced by that of Indra.

3. The Creator

It is clear then that the Indian Aryans were worshippers of the Creator and that they knew something of Him long before they sank into polytheism. In the Avesta and in the hubul form inscriptions alike, Ahura Mazda occupies much the same position as Varúna, Azura (the same word as Ahura), or Tvashtri in the Rig-Veda, or rather in the ancient belief of which traces are retained in the latter work. Hence, in the Avesta teaches, Zoroaster was not for the first time preaching the existence of Ahura Mazda, but he was rather endeavoring to recall his people to the belief of their ancestors, the doctrine which Ahura Mazda had taught Yima in primeval time in his first revelation (Yendólit: II., 1-16, 42). The great truth of the existence of the Creator, testified to by tradition, reason and conscience, undoubtedly contributed largely to Zoroaster's success, just as a similar proclamation of the God Most High (Allāh Tā'ālī), worshipped by their ancestors, helped the thoughtful among the Arabs in later years to accept Muhammad's teaching. The consciousness in each case that the doctrine was not new but very ancient, materially helped men to believe it true.

II. Zoroastrianism—The reformation wrought by Zoroaster was a great one. He recognized—as Eruripides in Greece did later—that Principle "if the gods do aught shameful, they are not gods." Hence he perceived that the many of the deities worshipped in Iran were unworthy of adoration, being evil in character, hostile to all good and therefore to the "All-Wise" Spirit (Ahura Mazda) and to men. Hence his system of dualism, dividing all beings, spiritual or material, into two classes, the creatures of Ahura Mazda and those of the "Destroying Mind" (Ārō Mauiyū). So many of the popular deities were evil that Zoroaster used the word dātrā (the same as deu, deus, and Aram. dēš) to denote hitherto an evil spirit, just as Christianity turned the Gr. daimonios and daimión (words used in a good sense in classical authors) into "demons." Instead of this now degraded word dātē, he employed bāga (Old Pers.; Av. bagha, Vedic bhaga, "distribution," "patron," "lord") for the "God." But it must here be remembered that Zoroaster did not teach monotheism. Darius says that "Auramazda and the other gods that there are" brought him aid (Beh. Inser., IV, 60-63), and both he and Xerxes speak of Auramazda as "the greatest of the gods." So, even in the first Ghādz, Zoroaster himself invokes Asha, Vohu-Maō, Armaiti, Sauasha, and even Gōis-urvan ("the Soul of the Bull"), as well as Ahura Mazda.

(1) Darius and Xerxes.—Darius mentions the "clan-gods," but does not name any of them. He and Xerxes use the creation of heaven and earth to Auramazda, and say that the latter, "Who made this earth, who made yon sky, who made man, who made happiness for man," has appointed each of them king. It is "by the grace of Auramazda" (the king of Creation) that Darius conquers his enemies. But both Artaxerxes Mūsēmān and Artaxerxes Ochus couple Mithra and Anāhita (Anahita) with Auramazda (Ahura Mazda) in praying for the protection of the empire.

Ahura Mazda.

(2) Ahura Mazda.—In the Avesta, Ahura Mazda is one of the seven Amesha Spéistas or "Bountiful Immortals." Mazda is the father of one of them, Spēitas Armaiti, who is also his spouse. He is prima inter pares among them, their chief, but no manus the only god. Monotheism is distinctly taught in later Zoroastrian works, for instance, in the Zardishth-Nāmāh, composed 1278 AD, but it is due to Christian and Islamic influence.

The modern Zoroastrian view, clearly stated in the Dasātri i Âsūndā and elsewhere, that all the good creatures of Omazd (Ahura Mazda) are entitled to adoration, undoubtedly of Worship rests upon the Avesta. There we find, in the first place, the Amesha Spéitas, who occupy in regard to Mazda the same position as do the Vedic Ádityas toward Varúna, though not one of the Ádityas is identical with any of the Amesha Spéitas.

The names of these are: (1) Ahura Mazda (otherwise called Spēitas Mainyu or "Bountiful Mind"); (2) Vohu Mano ("Good Mind"); (3) Asha Vahista ("Best Righteousness"); (4) Khshathra Vairya ("Excellence Enter"); (5) Spēita Armaiti ("Bounteous Piety"); (6) Haurvatât ("Health"); (7) Amešârât ("Immortality"). Each has a special province: thus Armaiti is the general spirit of earth and presides over its fruitfulness. She is the patroness of virtuous maenons. Khshathra is the guardian of metals. Vohu Mano guards sheep and cattle and introduces to Ahura Mazda the spirits of the just. In rank come the Yazatas ("Worshipful Ones"), of whom there are a large number. Three of them, Mithra, Rashnu and Saosha, preside at the judgment of the dead on the 4th day from death. Rashnu holds the scales in which man's deeds are weighed. Saosha guards the soul during the first three nights after death. Aryanman Isyya (the longed-for comrade) is the protector of mankind, the bestower of peace and happiness. On one occasion (Yend., Pars. XXI, 23-25) Ahura Mazda sends his messenger Nairyō Sāhha ("male instructor") to ask for food and water, and gives his help. The rāma, king of the earth, is the friend of Mithra, presides over the atmosphere and also gives its taste to food. Mithra is the "master of truth" (the Darius of his reign), and riding in a single-wheeled chariot (the sun), with the sun shining golden darts and driving fiery steeds, invades the Aaśya, the bosom friend of Mithra, presides over the atmosphere and also gives its taste to food. Mithra is the "master of truth" (the Darius of his reign), and riding in a single-wheeled chariot (the sun), with the sun shining golden darts and driving fiery steeds, invades the Aaśya, the bosom friend of Mithra, presides over the atmosphere and also gives its taste to food. Ostā and Dānā ("Knowledge" and "Religion"), who are others of the Yazatas. All these are entitled to worshipship at the hands of the true adorer of Mazda (Mazda ysa, opposed to Daēvas, or worshippers of the demons).

In opposition to the creatures of Ahura Mazda are those of Ahrō Maniゅ, who is the source of all moral and material evil. The first chapter of the Vendidad tells how he created something bad in opposition and His to everything good made by Ahura Creatures Mazda.

A demon is the adversary of each Amesha Spēta: Aka Mano ("Evil Mind") that of Vohu Mano, and so in order: Indra (or Andra, "deion of untruthfulness"), Sauvy ("Evil government"), Nābhaithya ("discontent"), Tāurai ("who poisons water") and Zāri ("poison"), being antagonistic to the other Bountiful Immortals. Aēsma-Daeva ("Demon of Wrath")—the Asmodeus of Tob S—is the special foe of Saosna, the genius of obedience. Apana, demon of drought, is the enemy of Tishtrya. Bûta (or Bûdi) teaches men to worship idols, and also causes death. Daēvyâsta (or of evil) is the demon of sloth. Yathātar or Astuvindhotā causes death by destroying the body. Other evil beings, Drujes, Patríaes, Jānines, Yatus, are so numerous in the later parts of the Avesta that a pious Zoroastrian must have lived in continual dread of their assaults. He had even to conceal the parts of his body lest they should be used as darts to his injury by these his spiritual foes.

Fertility.—Ahura Mazda and his assistants promote life, fertility in man, beast and plant, agriculture, increase; while Ahrō Mainiゅus and his creatures cause destruction and death, Ater ("Fire"), also Aēzpān Naŋpat ("Offspring of the Waters"), is the vital principle and the source of chaos in the world. Anēha, Anēha is the female. As a river the latter flows from Mt. Hukairya, a peak in the Elburz Range (Yavas X, XIV), into the Caspian Sea (Yasna X), of which grows the tree Nāhpa ("well watered"), which bears the seeds of all plants. Anēha means "mixed," but it is applied to purity of conscience: to dole out any of the four "elements" was, for later Zoroastrians, a grievous sin. In it he put to any moral purity. Her association with Mitra is close, even in Herodotus' time, for he falls into the mistake of saying (1.151) that the Persians speak of Mitra-Mithra, as if he should have said Aōn-pâta (Anāhita). Though god of truth and righteousness Mitra is not associated with moral purity (chastity). On the contrary, he was said to fertilize the earth with his rays, as sun-god, and Anāhita as goddess of fruitfulness represented the female principle in conjunction with him. The vileness which led to the identification of Anāhita with the Bab Mīlīta was doubtless of later date than Zoroaster's time, yet there was little or nothing in Zoroastrianism to check it. Something similar asserts itself in Armenia, as well as in Iran, and in fact in all Nature-worship everywhere. Associated with this was the form of incest known as next-o'kin marriage (Av. Hāmb, Hāmbēkās), which permitted and encouraged marriages between brothers and sisters.

According to later Zoroastrian belief, the contest between Ormazd (Ahura Mazda) and Ahriman (Ahrō Maniゅü), after continuing for 6,000 years, is to be decided in favor between Ormazd and Ahriman (Bând, I). Both came into existence independently in limitless time (Av. Zrānā Arkaran; Vend., Parg. XIX, 13; Pahl. Damān 1 Akanabakhmān, Bând, I), which, personified in the Vendâd, is called "Self-created," and is the one by Ahura Mazda's command invoked by Zoroaster in conjunction with Vāyu, the Air, the Winds, "the bountiful, beauteous daughter of Ahura Mazda" (Armaity), the Earth, and other objects of worship (loc. cit.). No creature of Ahriman is to be worshipped; hence Indra, though in later Vedic times rising in India to a leading position in the Pantheon, is in the Avesta accounted a fiend, the very impersonal of the Lie which the Avesta so firmly denounces and which Darius mentions as one of all the rebellions, which produced so much bloodshed in his time. No virtue was valued so highly as truth in ancient Iran, as Herodetus agrees with the Avesta in testifying.

Avestic morality encouanges the destruction of all hurtful beings, as being of Ahrō Maniゅü's creation, and the propagation of everything good thing. Hence agriculture is esp. commended, together with the rearing of cattle and sheep. Somewhat later the whole duty of man was said to consist in good thoughts, good words, good deeds. Fierce opposition to every other religion was enjoined as a religious duty, and, under the Sasanides esp., this led to fearful and repeated persecutions of Christians throughout the empire.

The Sacred Thread (Av. Aīvyāsphakhā; Skt. Upavita, etc., now by the Parsees styled the Kushti) plays as important a part in Zoroastrianism as in Hindûsm. So do charms, nātha (Skt. mantra), congregating in v. 6.7.6 and 13.9.2, are condemned by Ahrō Mainiゅü (in a later version, by Mithra). His spirit (Gēās Uraŋ) went to heaven and became the guardian of cattle.

Holiness does not enter into Zoroaster's conception of the Divine nature. This is a point to which attention has not yet been properly directed, though its importance can hardly be exaggerated. The epithet ṣpērā, often applied to Ahura Mazda and making him "Holy," is by the Zoroastrians themselves in Pahlavi rendered əsrānīk, i.e., "that causes increase." Its ṣ par or əspān=Skt. ṣā, "to swell," "to grow," "to increase." The opposite to this is the term ahrō (ahro, from ḍaŋ; cf. Ger. eng, "narrow") applied to the Evil Spirit, and denoting "narrowing," "decreasing," "destroying." Hence, as the Destroyer, he is styled pūrurukha, "full of death."
The first man was Gayā-maretan ("Mortal Life"); hence the phrase Haca Gaqatā Mardehāt ā Soosh-yanat, from Gayā-maretan (Gayomard, Kayomard) to Saoshyant (Yasna XXVII, 10; Yasht XIII, 145), means "from the beginning to the end of the world." From the Airyana Vaējā ("Aryan germ"), the first home of the Iranians, men were compelled to migrate because Ahrō Mainyōs so altered the climate that the winter became ten months long and the summer only two. Yima Khshathra ("Yima the Brilliant," Pers Jamsht, son of Vīvaihāt, though he twice refused Ahura Mazda's commission to guard his creatures, and though by three lies he lost the "Royal Light" (Hvarōn Kāwōm) which he originally possessed, was yet directed to prepare a very extensive inclosure (Vāra), in which he preserved "the seeds of sheep and cattle, of men, of dogs, of birds, and of red, glowing fires" from some terribly severe winters which came upon the earth (Vendōlād 11; Yastī XIX). The Būstānī-Khōnī tale of a flood differs from this, preserving an independent narrative. Ahura Mazda's law was preached to men within Yima's inclosure.

The earth consists of seven divisions, called Karsara (cf. Yastī, 119). One of these, Hvārînatha, is inhabited by men; the others are separated from it by impassable abysses. Sun, moon, and stars revolve round Mt. Tēvrā, a peak in the Elburz mountains (Demēntiān). A later legend says that the Elburz Range surrounds the earth.

Each god and man possesses a fravashī, which has been compared to a guardian spirit and seems to differ from the soul (herōn). After Zoroastrianism permits no idol-worship and no temples, fire-altars only being used. These were served by Atharvatans or fire-priests, who fed the fire with costly wood and poured into it libations of homa-juice, taking care to cover their mouths with a cloth (patti-đōna) to keep the sacred fire from being polluted by their breath. Sacrifices were often offered on the tops of the highest mountains under the open sky (Herod. 1.132; Xen. Cyrop. viii).

The Magi doubtless owed the monopoly of priestly functions to their being Zoroaster's own tribe. They are not mentioned as priests in the Pers canoneform inscriptions. Only once does the word "Magus" occur in the Avesta, and then in composition (Maguha-bish, a Magus-hater, Yasna LXV, 7). It is not necessary to trace to Bab influence the decay of Zoroastrianism and its degradation in late Achaemenian times. This was at least in large measure due to a secession of the ideas and practices forbidden by Zoroaster, which reassert themselves in some parts of the Avesta, and which afterward gave rise to Mithraism.

The Avesta states that, 1,000 years after Zoroaster's death, a prophet named Ukhshydration-cresta will arise from his seed to restore his religion. After another 1,000 years another, Ukhshydration-nemâin, will appear for the same purpose. The end of the world will come 1,000 years later. A third prophet, Saoshyant, will be born, and will usher in the Restoration (frashōh-herad) of the world to its primitive happiness and freedom from the evil creatures of Ahrō Mainyōs. This process will be completed in 1,000 years, during which various seers will perform in the other 6 Karsaarae the work which will here be accomplished by Saoshyant. But mention of this Restoration occurs only in very late parts of the Avesta (e.g. Vend., Farg. XVIII, 51). It does not mean Resurrection, as De Harlez has shown. Later still, something of the kind was believed, and in the Būndīhāshkhīn (ch v) and the Patît (§ 2S) we have the word rīstākhzh (from Av. irahta, "departed," and hāx, "to rise"), which does mean "rising of the dead." But it can hardly be doubted that the doctrine is due to Hēb and Christian influence, esp. when we consider the late and uncertain date of the books in which the idea occurs. Israelites settled in Media in large numbers in or about 730-728 BC under Sargon (2 K 17 6), long before Zoroaster's birth. It is possible that his reformation may have owed much therefore to Heb influence. See, further, ZOROASTRIANISM.

The idea of virgin birth has been asserted to occur in Zoroastrianism, both with reference to Zoroaster himself and to the last three great prophets of whom mention has been made. This is no error. The Avesta and all later Zoroastrian books speak of Zoroaster's birth as Fire Altars.

Persians, pūr'shanz, -šzan (Persian), Pārs, also s Persia, Persis [q.v.]; adj. Pers, Pārs, Pāš, Persian, Persian (modern Fārs), including probably part of Elam.

The Avesta shows that the Medo-Persian community was divided into 3 classes (zāsāva): the Āthāvāna or fire-priests, the Rathēs or charioters, and the Vāsya-Rṣaks or cattle-rearers (of the three original Hindu castes, the Brāhmaṇs, the Kshatriyas and the Vaiṣayas). A 4th class, the artisans or Ḥūdāt, came later. But these were classes, not castes.

They were also divided into tribes, clans (Achaem. viṭī; Av. viś; cf. vicus) and families or households (Achaem. taumā; Av. vidana). Herodotus (1.125) mentions ten Pers tribes, and the chief being the Pasargadac, to which belonged the Achaemenian clan (σπαρτης, πρηθρέτες) which included the royal family. This dynasty traced its origin to Achaemenes (Hākūhmānšāh) according to Durrius and Herodotus. The following scheme will serve to show the descent of the line of Pers kings mentioned in the Bible and in secular history up to the time of the fall of the dynasty in 331 BC.

II. Civilization.—The Persians had indulged less in luxury than the Medes, until their conquest of Media and other lands under Cyrus.

1. Writing. The Persians, especially in the 5th century BC, were making progress towards a convenient alphabetical writing, which they used for business purposes. They did not adopt it for religious purposes, however, until the 4th century BC, when it was modified and became the Pahlavi alphabet. The Achaemenian script was probably still used for religious purposes until the 4th century BC.

2. Institutions and Customs. The Achaemenian kings probably borrowed from Babylon and further developed their system of royal posts (Est 8:14) or messengers.
(1) The king was an arbitrary ruler with unlimited power, the council of seven princes who stood nearest to the throne (Est 1:14; cf. Herod. iii. 70-84) having no share in the government.

(2) The army.—As soldiers, the Persians were famous as archers and javelin-throwers; they were also skilled in the use of the sling, and above all in riding. Boys were taken from the women's into the men's part of the house at the age of 5, and were there trained in "riding, archery and speaking the truth" until 20 years old. In Darius' inscriptions, as well as in the Avesta, lyng is regarded as a great crime.

(3) Marriage.—The Persians practised polygamy, and marriages between those next of kin were approved of. Pride and garrulity are mentioned as distinctive of the Persians character.

III. History.—Persian history, as known to us, begins with Cyrus the Great. His ancestors, for at least some generations, seem to have been priests or "kings" of Anshan, a district in Persia or Elam. Cyrus himself (WAf, V, plate 35) gives his genealogy up to and including Téspés, entitling all his ancestors whom he mentions, kings of Anshan. Phraorîta, king of the Medes, is said to have first subjugated the Persians to that kingdom about 97 years before Cyrus (Herod. i. 102). Cyrus himself headed his countrymen's revolt against Astyages, who advanced to attack Persia (549 BC). His army mutinied and surrendered him to Cyrus, whom the Greeks held to be his grandson on the mother's side. Cyrus, becoming supreme ruler of both Medes and Persians, advanced to the conquest of Lydia. He defeated and captured Croesus, overran Lydia, and compelled the Greek colonies in Asia Minor to pay tribute (547 BC). He overthrew the Sute (Bedawin) across the Tigris the following year, and was then invited by a large party in Babylonia to come to their help against the usurper Nabu of Babylon, nišîḫ, whose religious zeal had led him to collect as many as possible of the idols from other parts of Babylonia and remove them to Babylon, thereby increasing the sacredness and magnificence of that city but inflicting injury on neighboring and more ancient sanctuaries. Defeating Nabûnišîḫ's army and capturing the king, Cyrus sent his own forces under Gûryaš (Gubaru, Gauraruva) to take possession of Babylon. This he did in June, 538, "without opposition and without a battle." The citadel, however, where Belshazzar "the king's son" was in command, held out for some months, and was then taken in a night attack in which "the king's son" was slain. Cyrus made Gûryaš vicereign of Chaldæa, and he appointed governors in Babylonia" (Cyrus' "Annalistic Tablet"). When Gûryaš died within the year, Cyrus' son Cambyses was made vicereign of the country, now become a province of the Persian empire. Cyrus restored the gods to their sanctuaries, and this doubtless led to permission being given to the Jews to return to Jerus, taking with them their sacred vessels, and to rebuild their temple. Cyrus was killed in battle against some frontier tribe (accounts differ where) in 529 BC. His tomb at Murgháb, near the ruins of Pasargadæ, is still standing.

Cyrus' son and successor, Cambyses, invaded Egypt and conquered it after a great battle near Pelusium (525 BC). During his absence, a Magian, Gaumâta, who pretended to be Smerdis (Bardiya), Cambyses' murdered brother, seized the throne. Marching against him, Cambyses committed suicide. After a reign of 7 months, the usurper was overthrown and slain by Darius and his 6 brother Nobles (their names in Herod. iii 70 are confirmed with one exception in Darius' Besîtin Inscription, col. iv. 80-86). Darius became king as the heir of Cambyses (521 BC). But in nearly every part of the empire, he was confronted by real or pretended descendants of the ancient kings of each country. After at least 3 years' struggle Darius' authority was firmly established everywhere. He then divided the empire into satrapies, or provinces (dahyâta), of which there were at first 23 (Beh. Inscription, col. i. 13-17), and ultimately at least 20 (Naqsh-i Rustam Inscription, 22-30). Over these he placed satraps of noble Pers or Median descent, instead of representatives of their ancient kings. His empire extended from the Indus to the Black Sea, from the Jaxartes to beyond the Nile.

Darius united the latter river with the Red Sea by a canal, the partly obliterated inscription commemorating which may perhaps be thus restored and rendered: "I am a Persian; with Persia's (6) Darius' Suez I seized Egypt. I commanded to dig this canal from the river named the Nile [Prâva], which flows through Egypt, to this sea which comes from Persia. Then this canal was dug, according as I commanded. And I said, 'Come ye from the Nile through this canal to Persia.'"

Darius' expedition into Scythia, his success in subduing the rebellion among the Asiatic Greeks, his attempts to conquer Greece itself and his overthrow at Marathon (499-490 BC) are part of the history of Greece. A rebellion in Egypt had not been repressed when Darius died in 483 BC.

Xerxes I, who succeeded his father, regained Egypt, but his failure in his attempts to conquer Greece largely exhausted his empire.

7. Xerxes I In 464 BC he was murdered. His son Artaxerxes I, summoned "the long-armed," succeeded him, being himself succeeded in 421 BC by his son Xerxes II, who was murdered the following year. This ended the legitimate Achaemenid line, the next king, Darius II (styled Nothos, or "bastard", as well as Artaxerxes I illegitimate sons (we pass over Sogdianus' brief reign). Artaxerxes II, Mnémón, succeeded his father and left the throne to his son Artaxerxes III, Ochon. The latter was murdered with all his sons but the two youngest, Arses, by an Egyp eunuch Bagôs, probably in revenge for Artaxerxes' conduct in Egypt (333 BC). Arses was murdered by Bagôs 3 years later, when Darius III, Codomannus, the son of Sisygambis, daughter of Artaxerxes II, and her husband, a Pers noble, ascended the throne. Durins was completely overthrown by Alexander the Great in the battle of Gaugamela or Arbela, 331 BC, and shortly after fell by an assassin's hand. This ended the P ers empire of the Achaemenides, the whole of the lands composing it becoming part of the empire of Macedonia.

IV. First Mention in Inscriptions.—Persis (Par sia) first met mention in an inscription of Rammân on Nîrîr III (WAI, 1, plate 35, no. 1, l. 8), who boasts of having conquered it and other lands (he reigned from 812 to 783 or from 810 to 781 BC).

W. ST. CLAIR TISDALE

PERSIS, pûr'sis (Iaspís, Persis): The name of a female member of the Christian community at Rome, to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16.12). The name is for "the beloved, who waited much in the Lord." The name is not found in inscriptions of the imperial household, but it occurs as a name of a freedwoman (CIL, VI, 23, 959).

PERSON, pûr'sun, pûrs'h, PERSONALITY, pûrs'un-al'î-ti (πσων, nêphês, ἴθ, ἴς, ῶθαμ, ἴπιμ, προσωπον, προσώπον, προστάσιον, λύπο stasis): The most frequent word for "person" in the OT is nêphês, "son." (Gen 14, 21, "Give me the persons, and take the goods"); 36, 6, AV "all the persons"; Nu 5, 6, AV "that person," etc; "îth, "that person"; Arsat, "threesome and ten persons"); 11, 16, 18, "a comely person"; etc; "îbâm, "a man," "an animal," "a human being." (Nu 31, 28, "of the persons, and of the oxen"); Prov 6, 12, "a worthless person," etc); "îbôm, "a man," "a weak, mortal man," occurs twice (lgs 9, 4, AV "vain and light persons"); Zeph 3, 4); bâ'al, "owner," "lord," is once têb "person" (Prov 24, 8, AV "a mischievous person"); and mîthôm, "men," once (Ps 56, 4, AV "vain persons"); pûrnâm, "face," is frequently têb "person," and when it refers to the external appearance, as of persons in high places, rich persons who could favor or bribe, etc, chiefly in the phrases "regarding the person," "accepting the person" (Dt 10, 17; Mal 1, 8).

In the NT prosôpôn, "face," "countenance," stands in the same connexion (Mt, 22, 16, "Thou regardest not the person of men"); Gal 2, 6, "God accepteth not man's person"; Acts 10, 34, "God is no respecter of persons"; Rom 2, 11, "there is no respect of persons with God"; Eph 6, 9; Col 3, 22). In the NT, this word is used as a person (prosôpôn), also, as in the later Gr, the gift bestowed . . . by many persons," the only occurrence in the NT; in 2, 10 prosôpôn may stand for "presence," as RV "in the presence of Christ," but it might mean "as representing Christ." No H 1, 3, AV Hupostasis, "that which lies under," subst. stratum, is rendered "person," "the express image of his person," i.e. of God, which RV renders "the very image of his substance," in "the impress of his substance." In the Hupostasis of the invisible God and Father. "Person" is also frequently supplied as the substantive implied in various adj., etc., e.g. profane, perjured, vile.

In the Apoc we have prosôpon têr "person" (Jth 7, 15, RV "face"); Ecclus 120, 5; the "accepting of persons" is condemned (Wis 6, 7; Ecclus 4, 22, 27; 7, 6; 20, 22, RV "by a foolish countenance"); 36, 13; 42, 11; "With him [God] is no respect of persons," Ecclus 36, 12.

RV has "soul" for "person" (Nu 5, 6), "face" (Jer 52, 25), "man" (Mt 27, 43); "reprobate" for "vile person" (Ps 15, 4); ARV, ERUV, "fool" (Isa 52, 5); AV "men of falsehood," ARV "vain persons." RV has an evil thing (Ps 10, 4), "back to thee in his own person" (aut. different text) for "again thou therefore receive him" (Philem ver. 2), "take away life for respect any person" (2, 8, 14, 14) with seven others for "the eight person" (2, 8); "false witnesses" for "seven thousand persons" for "of men seven thousand." (Rev 11, 14).

PERSONALITY is that which constitutes and characterizes a person. The word "person" (Lat persona) is derived from the mask through which an actor spoke his part (per-sona). "From being applied to the mask, it came next to be applied to the actor, then to the character acted, then to any assumed character, then to anyone having a particular station; lastly, it came to mean an individual, a feeling, thinking and acting being. For full personality there must be self-consciousness, with the capability of free thought and action—self-determination—hence we speak of personal character, personal action, etc. A person is thus a responsible being, while an animal is not. Personality is distinctive of man. The personality is the unit of the entire rational being, perhaps most clearly represented by "the will"; it is that which is deepest in man, belonging, of course, not to the realm of space or the region of the visible, but existing as a spiritual reality in time, with a destiny beyond it. It is the substance (hupostasis) of the being, that which underlies all its manifestations; hence the rendering "the express image of his person" in He 1, 3 AV. Hupostasis was employed by the early Gr Fathers to express what the Latins Intended by persona; afterward prosôpon was introduced.

Recent psychological thought has introduced prominence elements in the subconscious realm, the relation of which to the personality is obscure. There seems to be more in each individual than is normally expressed in the personal consciousness and action. The real responsible personality, however, is something which is always being formed. The phenomenon of double personality is pathological, as truly the result of brain disease as insanity.

In the Bible man is throughout regarded as personal, although it were certain that the full importance of the individual as distinct from the nation was realized. The use of prosôpon for "person" indicates also a more external conception of personality than the modern. With the Hebrews the nêphês was the seat of the soul, e.g. "Thou wilt not leave my soul [nêphês] to Sheol" (Ps 16, 10); "Thou hast brought up my soul from Sheol" (Ps 30, 3), God is also always regarded as personal (who has created man in His own image), and although the representations sometimes are anthropomorphic so much as the Divine personality could only be conceived after the analogy of the human, as far as it could be definitely conceived at all; but God was regarded as transcend-ing, not only the whole of Nature, but all that is human, etc. "Moses could not look abroad" (Nu 23, 19; 1, 15, 29); "Canst thou by searching find out God?’ (Job 11:7; Isa 40:28; cf Ecles 3:11, 8, 17 etc.) In the NT the personality of God is, on the warrant of Jesus Himself, conceived after the analogies of fatherhood, yet as transcending all our human conceptions: ‘How much more’? (Mt 7:11); ‘Who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?’ (Rom 11:34). Man is body, soul and spirit, but God in Himself is Spirit, infinite, perfect, ethereal Spirit (Mt 5:48; 1 Cor 15:44). He is forever more than all that is created, ‘For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things’ (Rom 11:36). The human personality, being spiritual, survives bodily dissolution and in Christ becomes clothed again with a spiritual body (Phil 3:21; 1 Cor 15:44).

8. Formulation of the Doctrine Literature

It is the purpose of this article to make as clear as possible the conception of the Person of Christ, in the technical sense of that term, which lies on-the-Article so, beneath—the pages of the NT. Were it its purpose to trace out the process by which this great mystery has been revealed to men, a beginning would need to be taken from the intimations as to the nature of the person of the Messiah in OT prophecy, and an attempt would require to be made to discriminate the exact contribution of each organ of revelation to our knowledge. And were there added to this a desire to ascertain the progress of the apprehension of this mystery by men, there would be demanded a further inquiry into the exact degree of understanding which was brought to the truth revealed at each stage of its revelation. The magnitudes with which such investigations deal, however, are very minute; and difficulty to be derived from them is not, in a case like this present, very great. It is, of course, of importance to know how the person of the Messiah was represented in the predictions of the OT; and it is a matter at least of interest to note, for example, the difficulty experienced by Our Lord’s immediate disciples in comprehending all that was involved in His manifestation. But, after all, the constitution of Our Lord’s person is a matter of revelation, not of human thought; and it is preeminently a revelation of the NT, not of the OT. And the NT is the product of a single movement, at a single stage of its development, and therefore presents in its fundamental teaching a common character. The whole of the NT was written within the life of about half a century; or, if we except the writings of John, within the narrow bounds of a couple of decades; and the entire body of writings which enter into it are so much of a piece that it may be plausibly represented that they all bear the stamp of its fundamental teaching. The NT lends itself, therefore, more readily to what is called dogmatic than to what is called genetic treatment; and we shall penetrate most surely into its essential meaning if we take our start from its clearest and fullest statements, and permit their drive to be thrown upon its more incidental allusions. This is peculiarly the case with such a matter as the person of Christ, which is dealt with chiefly incidentally, as a thing already understood, and needing only to be alluded to rather than formally expounded. That we may interpret these allusions aright, it is requisite that we should recover from the first the common conception which underlies them all.

1. The Teaching of Paul:—
(I) General drift of passage.—With Phil, then, with the most didactic of the NT writers, the apostle Paul, and especially with those passages in which he most fully intimates his conception of the person of his Lord, Phil 2 3-9. Even here, however, Paul is not formally expounding the doctrine of the Person of Christ; he is only alluding to certain facts concerning His person and action perfectly well known to his readers, in order that he may give point to an adduction of Christ’s example. If he is in exhorting his readers to unselfishness, such unselfishness as esteems others better than ourselves, and looks not only on our own things but also on those of others. Precisely this unselfishness, he declares, was exemplified by Our Lord. He did not look upon His own things but the things of others; that is to say, He did not stand upon His rights, but was willing to forego all that He might justly have claimed for Himself for the good of others. For, says Paul, though, as we all know, in His intrinsic nature He was nothing other than God, yet He did not, as we all know right well, look greedily on His condition of equality with God, but made no account of Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and, having found that condition as a man, humbled Himself, becoming obedient to death, even death of the cross. The statement is thrown into historical form; it tells the story of Christ’s life on earth. But it presents His life on earth as a life in all its elements alien to His intrinsic nature, and assumed only in the performance of an unselfish purpose. On earth He lived as a man, and subjected Himself to the common lot of men. But He was not by nature a man, nor was He in His own nature subject to the fortunes of human life. By nature He was God; and He would have naturally lived as became God—on an equality with God. He became man by a voluntary act, ‘taking no account of Himself,’ and, having become man, He voluntarily lived out His human life under the conditions which the fulness of His unselfish purpose imposed on Him.

(2) Our Lord’s intrinsic Deity.—The terms in which these great affirmations are made deserve the most careful attention. The language in which Our Lord’s intrinsic Deity is expressed, for example, is probably as strong as any that could be, Our Lord does not say simply, ‘He was God.’ He says, ‘He was in the form of God,’ employing a turn of speech which throws emphasis upon Our Lord’s possession of the specific quality of God. ‘Form’ is a term which expresses the sum of those char-Actorizing qualities which make a thing the precise thing that it is. Thus, the "form" of a sword (in this case mostly matters of external configuration) is all that makes a given piece of metal specifically a sword, rather than, say, a spade. And "the form of God" is the sum of the characteristics which make the being we call "God," specifically God, rather than some other being, an angel, say, or a man. When Our Lord is said to be in "the form of God," therefore, He is declared, in the most express manner possible, to be all that God is, to possess the whole fulness of attributes which make God God. Paul chooses the manner expressed here, not instinctively, because, in adducing Our Lord as our example of self-abnegation, his mind is naturally resting, not on the bare fact that He is God, but on the richness and fulness of His being as God. He was all this, yet He did not look on His own things but on those of others. It should be carefully observed also that in making this great affirmation concerning Our Lord, Paul does not throw it distinctively into the past, as if he were speaking of a merely former mode of Our Lord's, indeed, but no longer His because of the action by which He became our example of unselfishness. Our Lord, he says, "being," "existing," "subsisting" in the form of God"—as it is variously rendered—"is forever," i.e., "being originally," while right in substance, is somewhat misleading. The vb. employed means "strictly 'to be beforehand,' 'to be already' so and so" (Blass, Grammar of NT Greek, ET, 244). "to be always" and intimates the existing circumstances, disposition of mind, or, as here, mode of subsistence in which the action to be described takes place. It contains no intimation, however, of the cessation of these circumstances or disposition, or mode of subsistence; and that, the less in a case like this the present case, where it is cast in a tense (the imperfect) which in no way suggests that the mode of subsistence intimated came to an end in the action described by the succeeding vb. (cf. the "in's, Lk 16 14 23; 22 50; Acts 2 30; 3 2; 2 Cor 8 17; 12 16; Gal 1 14). Paul is not telling us here, then, what Our Lord was once, but rather what He already was, or, better, what in His intrinsic nature He is; he is not describing a past mode of existence of Our Lord, before the action by which He becomes what He is, and which is at the present time; although, had the mode of existence he describes was Our Lord's mode of existence before this action—so much as painting in the background upon which the action adduced may be thrown up into prominence. He is telling us who and what He is who did these things for us, that we may appreciate how great the things He did for us are.

(3) No exanimation.—And here it is important to observe that the whole of the action adduced is thrown up thus against this background—not in its negative description to the effect that Our Lord (although all that God is) did not look greedily on His (consequent) being on an equality with God; but its positive description as well, introduced by the "but . . ." and that in both of its elements, not merely in the effect (ver 7) that 'he look no account of himself' (rendered not badly by AV, He "made himself of no reputation"; but quite misleading by RV, He "emptied himself"), but equally that to the effect (ver 8) that "he humbled himself." It is the whole of what St. Paul says, and av 6-8, that He is described as doing despite His "subsistence in the form of God." So far is Paul from intimating, therefore, that Our Lord laid aside His Deity in entering upon His life on earth, that he rather asserts that He retained His Deity throughout His life on earth, and in the whole course of His humiliation, up to death itself, was consciously ever exercising self-abnegation, living a life which did not by nature belong to Him, which stood in fact in direct contradiction to the life which was naturally His. It is this underlying implication which determines the whole choice of the language in which Our Lord's earthly life is described. It is because it is kept in mind that He still was "in the form of God," that is, that He still had in possession all that body of characterizing qualities by which God is made God, for example, that He is said to have been made, not man, but "in the likeness of man," to have been found, not man, but "in a fashion as a man," and that the mark of servanthood and obedience, the mark of servant-ship, is thought of as so great. Though He was truly man, He was much more than man; and Paul would not have his readers imagine that He had become merely man. In other words, Paul does not teach that Our Lord was once God but had become instead man; he teaches that though He was God, He had become also man.

An impression that Paul means to imply, that in entering upon His life on earth, Our Lord had laid aside His Deity, may be created by a very prevalent misinterpretation of the central clause of his statement—a misinterpretation unfortunately given currency by the rendering of ERV: "counted it not a prize to be made gain by being originally," varied without improvement in ARV to: "counted not the being on an equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself." The former (negative) member of this clause means just: He did not look greedily on His being on an equality with God; did not "set supreme store" by it (see Lightfoot on the clause). The latter (positive) member of it, however, cannot mean in antithesis to this, that He therefore "emptied himself," divested Himself of this, His being on an equality with God, much less that He "emptied himself," divested Himself of His Deity ("form of God") itself, of which His being on an equality with God is the manifested consequence. The vb. here rendered "emptied" is in constant use in a metaphorical sense (so only in the NT: Rom 4 14; 1 Cor 1 17; 9 15; 2 Cor 9 3) and cannot here be taken literally. This is already apparent from the definition of the manner in which the "emptying" is said to have been accomplished, supplied by the modal clause with which it is at once connected: "by becoming a servant." You cannot "empty" by "taking"—adding. It is equally apparent, however, from the strength of the emphasis which, by its position, is thrown upon the "himself." We may speak of Our Lord as "emptied Him of" something absolutely, with this strength of emphasis, of His "emptying Himself" of something else. This emphatic "Himself," interposed between the preceding clause and the vb. rendered "emptied," builds a barrier over which we cannot go back in search of that of which Our Lord emptied Himself. The whole thought is necessarily contained in the two words, "emptied himself," in which the word "emptied" must therefore be taken in a sense analogous to that which it bears in the other passages in the NT where it occurs. Paul, in a word, says here nothing more than that Our Lord, who did not look with greedy eyes upon His estate of equality with God, emptied Himself, if the language may be pardoned, of Himself; that is to say, Our Lord is divested, as it were, of the exhortation for the enhancement of which His example is adduced, that He did not look on His own things. "He made no account of Himself," we may fairly paraphrase the clause; and thus all question of what He emptied Himself of is solved. That Our Lord actually did, according to Paul, is expressed in the following clauses; those now before us express more the moral character of his act. He took "the form of a servant," and so was "made in the likeness of men." but his doing this showed that he did not set overwaving store by his state of being, for he might have "magnified himself" with the sufficient object of all the efforts. He was not self-regarding; he had regard for others. Thus he becomes our supreme example of self-abnegating conduct. See also kenosis.

Paul brought closer to the precise nature of the act by which the change was wrought by such a passage as Gal 4 4. We read that "when the fulness of the time came, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law, which were referred to the father in fulfillment of his eternal plan of redemption, and it is described specifically as an incarnation: the Son of God is born of a woman—He who is in his own nature the Son of God, abiding with God, is sent forth from God in such a manner as to be born a human being, subject to law. The primary implications are that this was not the beginning of his being; but that before this he was neither a man nor subject to law. But this means that on his part he was not subject to law, he ceased to be the Son of God or lost anything intimated by that high designation. The uniqueness of his relation to God as his Son is emphasized in a kindred passage (Rom 8 3) by the heightening of the phrase "the first man..." his "own son," and his distinction from other men is intimated in the same passage by the declaration that God sent him, not in sinful flesh, but only "in the likeness of sinful flesh." The reality of our Lord's flesh is brought out in this turn of speech, but his freedom from the sin which is associated with flesh as it exists in lost humanity is asserted (cf 2 Cor 5 21). Though true man, therefore (1 Cor 15 21; Rom 5 21; Acts 17 31), he is not without differences from other men; and these differences do not concern merely the condition (as sinful) in which men presently find themselves; but also their very origin: they are from below, he from above—the first man from the earth, earthy; the second man is from heaven' (1 Cor 15 47). This is his peculiarity: he was born of a woman like other men; yet he descended from heaven (cf Eph 4 9; Jn 3 13). It is not meant, of course, that already in heaven he was a man; what is meant is that on becoming a man he loses his origin in an exceptional sense from heaven. Paul describes what he was in heaven (but not alone in heaven)—that is to say before he was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh (though not alone before this)—in the great terms of "God's Son," "God's own Son," "the form of God," or yet again in words whose import cannot be mistaken, 'God over all' (Rom 9 5). In the last cited passage, together with its parallel earlier in the same ep. (Rom 1 3), the first man and the second man are brought into collocation after a fashion that can leave no doubt of Paul's conception of His twofold nature. In the earlier of these passages he tells us that Jesus Christ was born, indeed, of the seed of David according to the flesh, that is, so far as the human side of his being is concerned, but was powerfully marked out as the Son of God according to the Spirit of holiness, that is, with respect to his higher nature, by the resurrection of the dead, which in a true sense began in his own rising from the dead. In the later one, he tells us that on becoming a man indeed, as concerns the flesh, that is on the human side of his being, from Israel, but that, despite this earthly origin of his human nature, he Yet is and abides (present participle) nothing less than the supreme God, 'God over all [emphatic], blessed forever.' The Paul teaches us that by his coming

The elements of Paul's conception of the person of Christ are brought before us in this suggestive passage with unwonted fulness. But they all receive endless illustration from his occasional allusions to them, Pauline Passages one or another, throughout his Epp. The leading motive of this passage, for example, reappears quite perfectly in 2 Cor 8, where we are referred to the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who became for our sakes (emphatic) poor—He who was (again an imperfect participle, and therefore without suggestion of the cessation of the condition described) rich—that we might become (very emphatic) rich. Here the change in our Lord's condition at a point of time perfectly understood between the writer and his readers is adverted to and assigned to its motive, but no further definition is given of the nature of either condition referred to. We are therefore led to the precise nature of the act by which the change was wrought by such a passage as Gal 4 4. We read that "when the fulness of the time came, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law, which were referred to the Father in fulfillment of his eternal plan of redemption, and it is described specifically as an incarnation: the Son of God is born of a woman—He who is in his own nature the Son of God, abiding with God, is sent forth from God in such a manner as to be born a human being, subject to law. The primary implications are that this was not the beginning of his being; but that before this he was neither a man nor subject to law. But this means that on his part he was not subject to law, he ceased to be the Son of God or lost anything intimated by that high designation. The uniqueness of his relation to God as his Son is emphasized in a kindred passage (Rom 8 3) by the heightening of the phrase "the first man..." his "own son," and his distinction from other men is intimated in the same passage by the declaration that God sent him, not in sinful flesh, but only "in the likeness of sinful flesh." The reality of our Lord's flesh is brought out in this turn of speech, but his freedom from the sin which is associated with flesh as it exists in lost humanity is asserted (cf 2 Cor 5 21). Though true man, therefore (1 Cor 15 21; Rom 5 21; Acts 17 31), he is not without differences from other men; and these differences do not concern merely the condition (as sinful) in which men presently find themselves; but also their very origin: they are from below, he from above—the first man from the earth, earthy; the second man is from heaven' (1 Cor 15 47). This is his peculiarity: he was born of a woman like other men; yet he descended from heaven (cf Eph 4 9; Jn 3 13). It is not meant, of course, that already in heaven he was a man; what is meant is that on becoming a man he loses his origin in an exceptional sense from heaven. Paul describes what he was in heaven (but not alone in heaven)—that is to say before he was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh (though not alone before this)—in the great terms of "God's Son," "God's own Son," "the form of God," or yet again in words whose import cannot be mistaken, 'God over all' (Rom 9 5). In the last cited passage, together with its parallel earlier in the same ep. (Rom 1 3), the first man and the second man are brought into collocation after a fashion that can leave no doubt of Paul's conception of His twofold nature. In the earlier of these passages he tells us that Jesus Christ was born, indeed, of the seed of David according to the flesh, that is, so far as the human side of his being is concerned, but was powerfully marked out as the Son of God according to the Spirit of holiness, that is, with respect to his higher nature, by the resurrection of the dead, which in a true sense began in his own rising from the dead. In the later one, he tells us that on becoming a man indeed, as concerns the flesh, that is on the human side of his being, from Israel, but that, despite this earthly origin of his human nature, he Yet is and abides (present participle) nothing less than the supreme God, 'God over all [emphatic], blessed forever.' The Paul teaches us that by his coming forth from God to be born of woman, Our Lord, assuming a human nature to Himself, has, while remaining the Supreme God, become also true and perfect man, and by His grace the resources of language are strained to the utmost to make the exaltation of Our Lord's being clear— in which He is described as the image of the invisible God, whose being antedates all that is created, in whom, through whom and to whom all things have been created, and in whom they all subsist—we are told not only that (naturally) in Him all the fulness dwells (Col 1 19), but, with complete explanation, that “all the fulness of the Godhead dwells in Him bodily” (Col 2 2); that is to say, the very Deity of God, in all its completeness, has its permanent home in Our Lord, and that in a “bodily fashion,” that is, is in Him clothed with a body. He who looks upon Jesus Christ sees, no doubt, a body and a man; but as he sees the man clothed with the body, so he sees God Himself, in all the fulness of His Deity, clothed with the humanity. Jesus Christ is therefore God “manifested in the flesh” (1 Tim 3 16), and His appearance on earth is an “epiphany” (2 Tim 1 10), which is the “appearance of the image of the invisible God” (Col 1 15). Though truly man, He is nevertheless also our “great God” (Tit 2 13).

II. Teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews. —
The conception of the person of Christ which underlies and finds expression in the Ep. to the Hebrews is indistinguishable from that which governs all the allusions to Our Lord in the Epp. of Paul. To the author of this ep. Our Lord is above all else the Son of God in the most eminent sense of that word; and it is the Divine dignity and majesty belonging to Him from His very nature which forms the fundamental feature of the image of Christ which stands before his mind. And yet it is this author who, perhaps above all others of the NT writers, emphasizes the truth of the humanity of Christ, and dwells with most particularity upon the elements of His human nature and experience.

(1) Background of express Deity. —The great Christological passage which fills ch 2 of the Ep. to the Hebrews in its richness and fulness of detail, and its breadth of implication, that of Phil 2. It is thrown up against the background of the remarkable exposition of the Divine dignity of the Son which occupies chs. 1 and 3 of the Epistle to the Hebrews. There the Son had been declared to be “the effulgence of his (God's) glory, and the very image of his substance,” through whom the universe has been created and by the word of whose power all things are held in being; and His exaltation above the angels, by means of whom the Old Covenant had been inaugurated, is measured by the difference between the designations “ministering spirits” proper to the one, and the Son of God, nay, God itself (1 8,9), proper to the other. The purpose of the whole passage is to enhance in the thought of the Jewish readers of the ep. the value of the salvation wrought by this Divine Saviour; by removing from their minds the offence they were in danger of taking at His lowly life and shameful death on earth. This earthly humiliation finds its abundant justification, we are told, in the greatness of the end which it sought and attained. By it Our Lord has, with His strong feet, broken out a pathway along which, in Him, sinful man may at length climb up to the high destiny of which he was destined; He should have dominion over all creation. Jesus Christ stooped only to conquer, and He stooped to conquer not for Himself (for He was in His own person no less than God), but for us.

(2) Completeness of humanity. —The language in which the humiliation of the Son of God is in the first instance described is derived from the context. The establishment of His Divine majesty in ch 1 had taken the form of an exposition of His infinite exaltation above the highest and highest of exaltations. His humiliation is described here therefore as being "made a little lower than the angels" (2 9).

What is meant is simply that He became man; the phraseology is derived from Ps 8 AV, from which had just been cited the declaration that God had made man (despite his insignificance) "but a little lower than the angels," thus crowning him with glory and honor. The adoption of the language of the psalm to describe Our Lord's humiliation has the secondary effect, accordingly, of greatly enlarging the reader's actual appreciation of the humiliation of the Son of God in becoming man: He descended an infinite distance to reach man's highest conceivable exaltation. As, however, the primary purpose of the adoption of the language is merely to declare that the Son of God became man, so it is shortly afterward explained (2 14) as an entering into participation in the blood and flesh which are common to men: "Since then the children are sharers in flesh and blood, he also himself in like manner partook of the same," the, of the reality, the completeness of the assumption of humanity by the Son of God, are all here emphasized.

The proximate end of Our Lord's assumption of humanity is declared to be that He might die; He was "made a little lower than the angels . . . because of the suffering of death" (2 9); He took part in blood and flesh in order "that through death . . ." (2 14). The Son of God as such could not die; but His death was by nature and by will, (7 16 m). If He was to die, therefore, He must take to Himself another nature to which the experience of death was not impossible (2 17). Of course it is not meant that death was desired by Him for its own sake. The purpose of the passage is to save its Jewish readers from the offence of the death of Christ. What they are bidden to observe is, therefore, Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels because of the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that by the grace of God the bitterness of death which he tasted might redound to the benefit of every man" (2 9), and the argument is immediately pressed home that it was eminently suitable for God Almighty, in bringing many sons to glory, to make the appointment of their salvation perfect (as a Saviour) by means of suffering. The meaning is that it was only through suffering that these men, being sinners, could be brought into glory. And therefore in the plainer statement of ver 14 we read that Our Lord took part in flesh and blood in order "that through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage;" and, in keeping with the argument of ver 17 that the ultimate object of His assimilation to man was that He might "make propitiation for the sins of the people." It is for the salvation of sinners that Our Lord has come into the world; but, as that salvation can be wrought only by suffering and death, the proximate end of His assumption of humanity remains that He might die; whatever is more than this gathers around this.

The completeness of Our Lord's assumption of human- ity and of His humanity is perhaps nowhere more strongly emphasized in this passage. He took part in the flesh and blood which is the common heritage of men, and after the same fashion that others have in it (2 14); and, having thus become a man among men, He shared with other men the trials, the sufferings, and fortunes of life, "in all things" (2 17). The stress is laid on trials, sufferings, death; but this is due to the actual course in which His life ran, and that it might run in which He became man—and is not exclusive of other real exaltations of ch. 1. The glory of this became truly a man, and lived a truly human life, subject to all the experiences natural to a man in the particular circumstances in which He lived.

(3) Continued possession of Deity.—It is not implied, however, that during this human life—"the days of his flesh" (6 7)—He had ceased to be God, or to have at His disposal the attributes which belonged to Him as God. That is already excluded by the representations of ch. 1. The glory of this dispensation consists precisely in the bringing of its revelations directly by the Divine Son rather than by mere prophets (1 1), and it was as the effulgence of God's glory and the express image of His substance, upholding the universe by the word of His power, that this Son made purification of sins (i 3).

Indeed, we are expressly told that even in the days of the flesh, He continued still a Son (6 8), and that it was precisely in this that the wonder lay: that the Son of God became a man, lived, died, and was raised again, as an ordinary man, and that He was in every sense a real and true partaker of humanity, being born of a woman, and even in the form of that likeness, but without sin, to His Father (6 14). Indeed, we are expressly told that even in the days of the flesh, He continued still a Son (6 8), and that it was precisely in this that the wonder lay: that the Son of God became a man, lived, died, and was raised again, as an ordinary man, and that He was in every sense a real and true partaker of humanity, being born of a woman, and even in the form of that likeness, but without sin, to His Father (6 14).

Thus, we see that the glory of this Son God-man consisted in His being the eternal Son of God, expressively or visibly represented in the likeness of men, yet remaining essentially God, and retaining His divine attributes, but in such a way as to be without sin, to be formed a vessel to receive the image of His Father, and to be a living representation of Him in the likeness of men (6 14), and in such a way as to retain His original glory, and to be possessed of power to express it, to express it.

2. Prologue to the Gospel

(a) The Being who was incarnated.—John here calls the person who became incarnate by a name peculiar to himself in the NT—the Logos or Word. According to the predicates which he here applies to Him, he can mean by the "Word" nothing else but God, "considered in His creative, operative, self-revealing, and communicating character," the sum total of what is Divine (C. F. Schmid). In three crisp sentences he declares at the outset His eternal subsistence, His eternal intercommunion with God, His eternal identity with God: 'In the beginning the Word was with God, and the Word was God' (Jn 1 1). "In the beginning," at that point of time when things first began to be (Gen 1 1), the Word already "was." He antedates the beginning of all things. And He not merely antedates them, but is immediately added that He is the Father's Son, the very Word of God who was made by him, and apart from him was not made one thing that hath been made' (1 3). Thus He is taken out of the category of creatures altogether. Accordingly, what is said of Him is not that He was the first of existences to come into being, but that 'in the beginning when things began to come into being, He already was.' It is express eternity of being that is asserted: "the imperfect sense of the original suggests in this relation, as far as human language can do so, the notion of absolute, supra-temporal existence" (Westcott). This, His eternal subsistence, was not, however, in isolation: "And the Word was with God." The language is pregnant. It is not merely existence with God that is asserted, as of two beings standing side by side, united in a local relation, or even in a common conception. What is suggested is an active relation of intercourse. The distinct personality of the Word is distinctly implied. From all eternity the Word has been with God as a fellow: He who in the very beginning already "was," "was" also in communion with God. Though He was thus in some sense a second along with God, He was not merely not a separate being from God: “And the Word was God” (1 Jn 1:1). In some sense distinguishable from God, He was in an equally true sense identical with God. There is but one eternal God; this eternal God, the Word is; in whatever sense we may distinguish Him from the God whom He is “with.” He is yet not another than this God, but Himself is this God. The predicate “God” occupies the position of emphasis in this great declaration, and is so placed in the sentence as to be thrown up in sharp contrast with the phrase “with God.” This prevents immediate inductive inferences as to the nature of the Word being drawn even momentarily from that phrase. John would have us realize that what the Word was in eternity was not merely God’s coeternal fellow, but the eternal God’s self.

(2) The incarnation.—Now, John tells us that it was this Word, eternal in His subsistence, God’s eternal fellow, the eternal God’s self, that, as “come in the flesh,” was Jesus Christ (1 Jn 4:2). And the Word became flesh” (Jn 1:14), he says, “and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father.” The terms he employs here are not terms of substance, but of personality. The meaning is not that the substance of God was transmuted into that substance which we call “flesh.” The Word is a personal name, declares John, an appellation of designation of humanity in its entirety, with the implications of dependence and weakness. The meaning, then, is simply that He who had just been described as the eternal God, became by a voluntary act in time. The exact nature of the act by which He “became” man lies outside the statement; it was matter of common knowledge between the writer and the reader. The language employed intimates merely that it was a definite act, and that it involved a change in the manifestation of the eternal God, here designated “the Word.” The whole emphasis falls on the nature of this change in His life-history. He became flesh. That is to say, He entered upon a mode of existence in which the experiences that belong to human beings would also be His. The dependence, the weakness, which constitute the very idea of flesh, in contrast with God, would now enter into His personal experience. And it is precisely because these are the connotations of the term “flesh” that the term has here, in the place of the more simply denotative term “man.” What he means is merely that the eternal God became man. But he elects to say this in the language which throws but few to view what it is to become man. The contrast between the Word and the human nature which He assumed as flesh, is the hinge of the statement. Had the evangelist said (as he does in 1 Jn 4:2) that the Word “came in flesh,” it would have been the continuity through the change which would have been most emphasized. When he says rather that the Word became flesh, while the continuity of the personal subject is, of course, intimated, it is the reality and the completeness of the humanity assumed which is made most prominent.

(3) The incarnate person.—That in becoming flesh the Word did not cease to be what He was before entering upon this new sphere of experiences, the evangelist does not leave, however, to mere suggestion. The glory of the Word was so far from dimmed by His becoming flesh, that he gives us at once to understand that it was rather “trailing clouds of glory” that He came. “And the Word became flesh,” he says, and immediately adds: “and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth)” (1:14). The language is colored by reminiscences from the Tabernacle, in which the Glory of God, the Shekinah, dwelt. The flesh of Our Lord, because, on its assumption by the Word, the Temple of God on earth (cf. 2:19) and the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord. John tells us expressly that this glory was visible, that it was precisely what was appropriate to the Son of God as such. “And we beheld his glory,” he says; not divined, or inferred, but perceived it. It was open to sight, and the actual object of observation. Jesus Christ was obviously more than man; He was obviously God. His actually observed glory, John tells us further, was a “glory as of the only begotten of the Father.” It was unique, nothing like it was ever seen in another. And its uniqueness consisted precisely in its consonance with what the unique Son of God, sent forth from the Father, would naturally have; men recognized and could not but recognize in Jesus Christ the unique Son of God. When this unique Son of God is further described as “full of grace and truth,” the elements of His manifested glory are not to be supposed to be exhausted by this description alone. Certain items of it only are brought out for particular mention. The visible glory of the incarnated Word was such a glory as the unique Son of God, sent forth from the Father, who was full of grace and truth, would naturally manifest.

That nothing at all less than the preservation of the continuity of all that belongs to the Word as such into this new sphere of existence, and its full manifestation through the veil of His flesh, John adds at the close of his exposition the remarkable sentence: “As no man has ever had seen him; God only begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father—he hath declared him” (1:18 m). It is the incarnate Word which is here called ‘only begotten God.’ The absence of the article with this designation is doubtless due to its parallelism with the word “God” which stands at the head of the corresponding clause. The effect of its absence is to throw up into emphasis the quality rather than the mere individuality of the person so designated. The adj. “only begotten” conveys the idea, not of derivation and subordination, but of uniqueness and consubstantiality: Jesus is all that God is, and He alone is this. Of this “only begotten God” it is now declared that He “is”—not “was,” the state is not a past thing, the fact being revealed in the present realization of the continuity of the Word with the Father—“in the bosom of the Father—that is to say, He continues in the most intimate and complete communion with the Father. The Word became flesh” (1 Jn 4:2) “in the full sense of the external relation intimated in 1:1. This being true, He has much more than seen God, and is fully able to “interpret” God to men. Though no one has ever yet seen God, yet he who has seen Jesus Christ, “God only begotten,” has seen the Father (cf. 14:9, 12 45). In this remarkable sentence there is asserted in the most direct manner the full Deity of the incarnate Word, and the continuity of His life as such in His incarnate life; thus He is fitted to be the absolute revelation of God to man. 3. The Gospel. The Gospel is written from the point of view of its prologue. Its object is to present Jesus Christ in His historical manifestation, as obviously the Son of God in flesh. These are written,” the Gospel testifies, “that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that your faith may be established on this sure foundation, that Jesus which is made man (1 30) was thoroughly known in His human origin (7 27), confessed Himself man (8 40), and died as a man dies.
(19 5), was, nevertheless, not only the Messiah, the Son of God, the fulfller of all the Divine promises of redemption, but also the very Son of God, that God only begotten, who, abiding in the bosom of the Father, is without beginning or end. For when he says, when the beginning of the Gospel onward, this purpose is pursued: Jesus is pictured as ever, while truly man, yet manifesting Himself as equally truly God, until the veil which covered the eyes of His followers was wholly lifted, and He is greeted as both Lord and God (20 28). But though it is the prime purpose of this Gospel to exhibit the Divinity of the man Jesus, no obscuration of His manhood is involved. It is the Deity of the man Jesus which is insisted on, but the true manhood of Jesus is as prominent in the representation as in any other portion of the NT. Nor is any effacement of the humiliation of His earthly life involved. For the Son of man to come from heaven was a descent (3 13), and the mission which He came to fulfil was a mission of contest and conflict, of suffering and death. He brought His glory with Him (1 14), but the glory that was His on earth (17 22) was not all the glory which He had had with the Father before the world was, no more, than after Christ was done, He should return (17 5). Here too the glory of the celestial is one and the glory of the terrestrial is another. In any event, John has no difficulty in presenting the life of Our Lord on earth as the life of a body, in the sense that He is on the ground that belongs to Him as God and on the humiliation which is brought to Him by the flesh. It is distinctly a duplex life which He ascribes to Christ, and it attributes to Him without embarrassment all the powers of setting the one hand to Deity and on the other to sinless (Jn 8 46; cf 14 30; 1 Jn 3 5) human nature. In a true sense his portrait of Our Lord is a dramatization of the God-man which he presents to our contemplation in his prologue.

V. Teaching of the Synoptic Gospels.—The same may be said of the other Gospels. They are all dramatizations of the God-man set forth in thetical exposition in the prologue to John's Gospel. The Gospel of Luke, written by a known companion of Paul, gives us in a living narrative the same Jesus who is presupposed in all Paul's allusions to Him. That of Mark, who was also a companion of Paul, as also of Peter, is, as truly as the Gospel of John itself, the prologue to Paul's own preaching; and a view to making it plain that this was the life of no mere man, human as it was, but of the Son of God Himself. Matthew's Gospel differs from its fellows mainly in the greater richness of Jesus' own testimony to His Deity which it records. What is characteristic of all three is the inextricable interlacing in their narratives of the human and Divine traits which alike marked the life they are depicting. It is possible, by neglecting one series of their representations, to end up by sifting out from them at will the portrait of either a purely Divine or a purely human Jesus. It is impossible to derive from them the portrait of any other than a Divine-human Jesus if we surrender ourselves to their guidance and take off of their pages the portrait they have endeavored to draw. As in their narratives they cursorily suggest now the fulness of His Deity and now the completeness of His humanity and everywhere the unity of His person, they present as real and as forcible a temptation to the constitution of Our Lord's person as uniting in one personal life a truly Divine and a truly human nature, as if they announced this fact in analytical statement. Only on the assumption of this conception of Our Lord's person as underlying all description of Him, can we be even to their representations; while, on this supposition, all their representations fall into their places as elements in one consistent whole. Within the limits of their common presupposition, each Gospel has no doubt its own peculiar emphasis. Mark lays particular stress on the Divine power of the man Jesus, as evidence of His supernatural being; and on the irresistible impression of a veritable Son of God, a Divine being walking the earth as a man, which He made upon all with whom He came into contact. Luke places His Gospel by the side of the Ep. to the He in the prominence it gives to the human development of the Divine being whose life on earth it is depicting and to the range of temptation to which He was subjected. This is especially true in the case of the heights of the Divine self-consciousness which it uncovers in its report of the words of Him whom it represents as nevertheless the Son of David, the Son of Abraham; heights of Divine self-consciousness which fall in nothing short of those attained in the great utterances preserved for us by John. But amid whatever variety there may exist in the aspects on which each lays his particular emphasis, it is the same Jesus Christ which all three have taught us to regard as both Christ and man and one individual person. If that be not recognized, the whole narrative of the Synoptic Gospels is thrown into confusion; their portrait of Christ becomes an insoluble puzzle; and the mass of material about his earthly experiences is transmuted into a mere set of cas contradictions. See also Gospels, THE SYNOPTIC.

VI. Teaching of Jesus.—The Gospel narratives not only present us, however, with dramatizations of the life of Jesus, according to their authors' conception of His composite 1. The Johanneine person. They preserve for us also a Jesus considerable body of the utterances of Jesus Himself, and this enables us to observe the conception of His person which underlay and found expression in Our Lord's own teaching. The discourses of Our Lord which have been selected for record by John have been chosen (among other reasons) expressly for the reason that they bear witness to His essential Deity. They are accordingly peculiarly rich in material for forming a judgment of Our Lord's conception of His higher nature. This conception, it is needless to say, is precisely that which John, taught by it, has announced in the Gospel, and had itself, as we have seen, been fashioned from the Gospel itself, compacted as it is of these discourses. It will not be necessary to present the evidence for this in its fulness. It will be enough to point to a few characteristic passages, in which Our Lord's conception of His higher nature finds esp. clear expression.

(1) His higher nature.—That He was of higher than earthly origin and nature, He repeatedly asserts: "Ye are from beneath," he says to the crowd (8 19), "and I am not of this world!" (20 19) Therefore, He taught that He, the Son of Man, had "descended out of heaven" (8 13), where was His true abode. This carried with it, of course, an assertion of preexistence; and this preexistence is explicitly affirmed: "What thou seest me do in the body, that shall also do the Son of Man also (8 20)"; and again, as the most impressive language possible, He declares (8 58 AV): "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am," where He claims for Himself the timeless present of eternity as His mode of existence. In the former of these two last cited passages, the character of His preexistent life is intimated; in it He shared the Father's glory from all eternity ("before the world was"); He stood by the Father's side as a companion in His glory, when He descended to earth, therefore, not from heaven only, but from the very side of God (8 42; 17 8). Even this, however, does not express the whole truth; He came forth not only from the Father's side where He had shared in the Father's glory; He came forth out of the Father's very being—"I came out from the Father, and am come into the world" (16 28; cf 8 42). "The connection described is inherent and essential, and not that of presence or external fellowship." (Westcott). This prepares us for the great assertion: "I and the Father are one" (10 30), from which it is a mere corollary that "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (14 9; cf 8 19; 12 45).

(2) His humiliation.—In all these declarations the subject of the affirmation is the actual person speaking: it is of Himself who stood before men and spoke to them that Our Lord makes these immense assertions. Accordingly, when He majestically declared, "I and the Father are one" (plurality of persons) "gece" (neuter singular, and accordingly singleness of being) of Himself from the very nature, the "he" of the sentence, is making Himself, the person then speaking to them, God (10 33; cf 6 18; 19 7). The continued sameness of the person who has been, from all eternity down to this hour, one with God, is therefore fully safeguarded. His earthly life is, however, distinctly represented as a humiliation. Though even on earth He is one with the Father, yet He "descended" to earth; He had come out from the Father and out of God; a glory had been left behind which was yet to be returned to, and His sojourn on earth was therefore to that extent an obscuration of His proper glory. There was a sense, then, in which, because He had "descended," He was no longer equal with the Father. It was in order to justify an assertion of equality with the Father, in power (10 25 29) that He was led to declare: "I and my Father are one" (10 30). But He can also declare "The Father is greater than I" (14 28). Obviously this means that there was a humbled, in a certain sense, He. It was to be returned to, and His sojourn on earth was therefore to that extent an obscuration of His proper glory. In it He was a "man": a man who hath told you the truth, which I have heard from God' (8 40), where the contrast with "God" throws the assertion of humanity into emphasis (cf 10 33). The truth of His human nature is, therefore, everywhere assumed and endlessly illustrated, rather than explicitly asserted. He possessed a human soul (12 27) and bodily parts (flesh and blood, 6 33ff; hands and side, 20 27); and was subject alike to physical affections (weariness, 4 6, and thirst, 19 28, suffering and death), and to all the common human emotions—not merely the love of compassion (13 34; 14 21; 15 8 13), but the love of simple affection which we pour out on "friends" (11 11; cf 11 15, 14), indignation (11 33 38) and joy (15 11; 17 13). He was in the participation produced by strong ex- citement (11 33; 12 27; 13 21), the sympathy with suffering which shows itself in tears (11 33), the thankfulness which fills the grateful heart (6 11 23; 11 41; 16 27). On the one hand, with the Father, He was without sin: "the prince of the world," He declared, "hath nothing in me" (14 30; cf 8 46). Clearly Our Lord, as reported by John, knew Himself to be true God and true man in one indivisible person, the common subject of the qualities which belong to each.

(1) His Deity.—(a) Mk 13 32: The same is true of His self-consciousness as revealed in His sayings recorded by the synoptists.

2. The Synoptic Jesus

2.1. The remarkable declaration recorded in Mk 13 32 (of Mt 24 36): 'But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, nor yet the Son, but the Father.' Here Jesus places Himself, in an ascending scale of being, above "the angels in heaven," that is to say, the highest of all creatures, significantly marked here as supramundane. Accordingly, He presents Himself elsewhere as the Lord of the angels, whose behests they obey (Weiss). He is of man so high sent forth His angels, and they shall gather together His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." (Mt 24 31; cf 13 49; 25 31; Mk 8 38). Thus the "angels of God" (Lk 12 8 9; 15 10) Christ designates as His angels, the "kingdom of God" (Mt 12 28; 19 24; 21 31 44; Mk and Lk offer it as His Father's). Mk 13 20; Lk 18 7; cf Rom 8 33; Col 3 12; Tit 1 1) as His elect. He is obviously speaking in Mk 13 22 outside a Divine self-consciousness: "Only a Divine being can be exalted above angels" (B. Weiss). He therefore designates Himself by His Divine name, "the Son," that is to say, the unique Son of God (9 7; 11 1), to claim to be whom would for a man be blasphemy (Mk 14 61 64). But though He designates Himself by this Divine name, He is not speaking of what we mean by the term "the Son." He is: the action of the vb. is present, "knoweth." He is claiming, in other words, the supreme designation of "the Son," with all that is involved in it, for His present self, as He moved among men: He is, not merely was, "the Son." Nevertheless, what He affirms of Himself cannot be affirmed of Himself distinctively as "the Son." For what He affirms of Himself is ignorance—not even the Son" knows it; and ignorance does not belong to a Divine nature. This is the term "the Son" should mean. An extreme appearance of contradiction accordingly arises from the use of this terminology, just as it arises when Paul says that the Jews "crucified the Lord of glory" (1 Cor 2 8). Christ's statement is that He can and should feed the general hunger of man for "food of God which he purchased with his own blood" (Acts 20 28m); or John kelehi praises Our Lord for "the blood of souls by Thee redeemed." It was not the Lord of Glory as such who was nailed to the tree, nor have either "God" or "souls" blood to shed.

We know how this apparently contradictory mode of speech has arisen in Keble's case. He is speaking of men who are composite beings, consisting of souls and bodies, and these men come to be designated for the element of their composite personalities, though what is affirmed by them belongs rather to the other; we may speak, therefore, of the "blood of souls" meaning that these "souls," while not having blood as such, yet designate persons who have bodies and therefore die. We know equally how to account for Paul's apparent contradictions. We know that Our Lord as a composite person, uniting in Himself a Divine and a human nature. In Paul's view, therefore, though God as such has no blood, yet Jesus Christ, who has blood because He is also man. He can justly speak, therefore, when speaking of Jesus Christ as "the blood of God." When precisely the same phe- nomenon meets us in Our Lord's speech of Himself, we are more presumptuous to characterize the same state of things. When He speaks of "the Son" (who is God) as ignorant, we are designating Himself as "the Son" because of His higher nature, and yet has in mind the ignorance of His lower nature. He means that He is designated "the Son" ignorant, that is to say with respect to the human nature which is as intimate an element of His person as is His Deity.
When Our Lord says, then, "the Son knows not," He becomes as express a witness to the two natures which constitute His person as Paul is when he speaks of Moses and Jesus as "the two lights of the same lamp" (2 Cor 4:6), and of the Son of Man as "a lamp that is not put under a bushel" (Lk 8:16). For in the first sentence, thus, Our Lord bears witness to His Divine nature, with its supremacy above all creatures, to His human nature with its Creation and, added to the unity of the subject possessed of these two natures.

(b) Other passages: Son of Man and Son of God: All these elements of His personality find several repeated assertions in other utterances of Our Lord recorded in the Synoptics. There is no need to insist here on the elevation of Himself above the kings and prophets of the Old Covenant (Mt 12 41 ff.), above the temple itself (Mt 12 6), and the ordinances of the Divine Law (Mt 12 8); or on His accent of authority in both His teaching and action, His great "I say unto you" (Mt 5 21 22), "I will be cleansed" (Mt 1 41; 5 19; Lk 7 14); or on His separation of Himself from men in His relation to God, never including them with Himself in an "Our Father," but consistently speaking distinctively of "my Father" (Lk 11 2, and other passages, Mk 3 31 ff.; e.g. Mt 5 16); or on His intimation that He is not merely David's Son but David's Lord, and that a Lord sitting on the right hand of God (Mt 22 44); or on His parabolic discrimination of Himself a Son of Man (Mk 14 62; Lk 17 20; Mt 20 19); even on His ascription to Himself of the purely Divine functions of the forgiveness of sins (Mk 2 5) and judgment of the world (Mt 25 31), or of the purely Divine powers of reading the heart (Mt 22 28); Lk 8 17) or of intercession (Mt 14 62); and omnipresence (Mt 18 20; 28 10). These things illustrate His constant assumption of the possession of Divine dignity and attributes; the claim itself is more directly made in the two great designations with the name of the Son of God (Mk 1 1 11; Mt 3 17; Mk 14 62; Lk 1:32-33). It is a designation, thus, which implies at once a heavenly preexistence, a present humiliation, and a future glory; and He proclaims Himself in this future glory no less than the universal King seated on the throne of His Father (Mt 28 19; Lk 22 28-30), or interceding (Mk 14 62). The implication of Deity imbedded in the designation, Son of Man, is perhaps more plainly spoken out in the companion designation, Son of God, of which Our Lord not only accepts at the hands of others, accepting with it the implication of blasphemy in permitting its application to Himself (Mt 26 63 65; Mk 14 61 64; Lk 22 28 30), but persistently claims for Himself both, in His constant designation of God as His Father in a distinctive sense, and in His less frequent but more pregnant designation of Himself as, by way of eminence, "the Son." That His consciousness of the peculiar relation to God expressed by this designation was not an attainment of His mature spiritual development, but was part of His most intimate consciousness from the beginning, is suggested by the sole glimpse which is given us into His mind as a child (Lk 2 49). The high significance which the designation bore to Him is thus not lost: it is preserved in twined respects, the one by both Matthew (11 27 ff.) and Luke (10 22 ff.), and the other by Matthew (28 19).

(*) Mt 11 27; 28 19: In the former of these utterances, Our Lord, speaking in the most solemn manner, not only presents Himself as the Son, as the sole source of knowledge of God and of blessedness for men, but places Himself in a position, not of equality merely, but of absolute reciprocity and interpenetration of knowledge with the Father. "No one," He says, "knoweth the Son, save the Father." For neither doth any know the Father, save the Son . . ." varied in Luke so as to read: "No one knoweth who the Son is, save the Father; and who the Father is, save the Son . . ." as if the being of the Son was so remote from the mind of man that he could know it thoroughly: and the knowledge of the Son was so unlimited that He could know God to perfection. The peculiarly pregnant employment here of the terms "Son" and "Father" over against one another is explained to us in the other utterance (Mt 28 19). It is the resurrected Lord's commission to His disciples. Claiming for Himself all authority in heaven and on earth—which implies the possession of omnipotence—and promising to be with His followers 'always, even to the end of the world'—He appears in the presence of and on the face of His disciples in the form of the heavenly Son of Man. For there were three beings enumerated, each with its distinguishing name. Nor yet: 'In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost,' as if there were one person, going by a threefold name. It reads: 'In the name (singular) of the Father, and of the article repeated Son, and of the article repeated Holy Ghost,' carefully distinguishing three persons, though uniting them all under one name. The name of God was to the Jews Je'h, and to name the name of the Son as the Son of God. The name of the Holy Ghost was, He says, "the Holy Ghost." What Jesus did in this great injunction was to command His followers to name the name of God upon their converts, and to announce the name of God which is to be named on their converts in the threecold enumeration of the "Father" and "the Son" and 'the Holy Ghost.' As it is unquestionable that He intended Himself by "the Son," He here places Himself by the side of the Father and the Spirit, as together with them constituting the one God. It is, therefore, not without significance that He commanding them to baptize into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. This is what Jesus, as reported by the Synoptics, understood Himself to be. See Trinitry. (2) His Nature in the Old Testament: Jesus is to be God, however, Jesus does not deny that He is man also. If all His speech of Himself rests on His consciousness of a Divine nature, no less does all His speech manifest His consciousness of a human nature. He easily identifies Himself with men (Mt 4 4; Lk 4 4), and receives without protest the imputation of humanity (Mt 11 19; Lk 7 34). He speaks familiarly of His body (Mt 26 12 26; Mk 14 8; 14 22; Lk 22 19), and of His bodily parts—His feet and hands (Lk 24 39), His head and feet (Lk 7 44 46), His flesh and bones (Lk 24 39), His blood (Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24; Lk 22 20). We chance to be given indeed a very express affirmation in His part of the reality of His bodily nature; when His disciples were terrified at His appearing before them after His resurrection, supposing Him to be a spirit, He reassures them with the direct declaration: "See my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see me having" (Lk 24 39). His testimony to His human nature is just as express: "My soul," says He, "is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death" (Mt 26 38; Mk 14 34). He speaks of the human dread with which He looked forward to His approaching death (Lk 12:50), and expresses in a poignant cry His sense of desolation on the cross (Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34). He speaks also, of His pity for the weary and hungry ones to whom He ministered (Mt 11:28-30). He expresses also His human desire which He felt (Lk 22:15). Nothing that is human is alien to Him except sin. He never ascribes imperfection to Himself and never betrays consciousness of sin. He recognizes the evil of those about Him (Lk 11:19; Mt 7:11; Lk 3:34, 39; Lk 11:29), but never identifies Himself with it. It is those who do the will of God with whom He feels kinship (Mt 12:50), and He offers Himself to the morally sick as a physician (Mt 9:12). He pronounces Him an example of the highest personal achievement (Mt 11:28 ff) and pronounces him blessed who shall find no occasion of stumbling in Him (Mt 11:6).

(5) Unity of the Person.—These manifestations of a human and Divine consciousness simply stand side by side in the records of Our Lord's self-expression. Neither is suppressed or even qualified by the other. If we attend only to the one class we might suppose Him to proclaim Himself wholly Divine; if only to the other we might equally easily conclude Him to be Himself wholly human. With both together before us we perceive Him alternately speaking out of a Divine and out of a human consciousness; manifesting Himself as all that God is and as all that man is, yet making the expressions of each consistent. If, as God, He, the one Jesus Christ, was to His own apprehension true God and complete man in a unitary personal life.

VII. The Two Natures Everywhere Presupposed.

There are thus, in the literature of the NT a single, unvarying conception of the constitution of Our Lord's person. From Mt where He is presented as one of the persons of the Holy Trinity (28:19)—or if we prefer the chronological order of books, from the Ep. of Jas where He is spoken of as the Glory of God, the Shekinah (2:1)—to the Apocalypse where He is represented as declaring that He is the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End (1:8,17; 21:13), He is consistently thought of as in His fundamental being just God. At the same time from the Synoptic Gospels, in which He is dramatized as a man walking among men, His human descent carefully recorded, and His sense of dependence on God so emphasized that the characteristic thought of His movement, characteristic of Him, to the Epp. of John in which it is made the note of a Christian that He confesses that Jesus Christ has come in flesh (1 Jn 4:2) and the Apocalypse in which His birth in the tribe of Judah and the house of David (5:5; 22:16), His exemplary life of conflict and victory (3:21), His death on the cross (11:8) are noted, He is equally consistently thought of as true man. Nevertheless, from the beginning to the end of the whole series of books, while first and last, but not the only, aspect of His two natures comes into repeated prominence, there is never a question of conflict between the two, never any confusion in their relations, never any schism in His human personal action; but He is obviously considered and presented as one, composite indeed, but undivided personality. In this state of the case not only may evidence of the constitution of Our Lord's person properly be drawn indifferently from every part of the NT, and passage justly be cited to support and explain passage without reference to our partition of the NT in which it is found, but we should be without justification if we did not employ this common presupposition of the whole body of this literature to illustrate and explain the varied representations which meet us cursorily in its pages, representations which might easily be made to appear mutually contradictory were they not brought into harmony by their relation as natural component parts of this one unitary conception which underlies and gives consistency to them all. There can scarcely be imagined a better proof of the canon of inspiration than the power completely to harmonize a multitude of statements which without it would present to our view only a mass of confused inconsistencies. A key which perfectly fits a lock of very complicated wards can scarcely fail to be the true key, can make harmless the single personality remain an unplumbed mystery, and give rise to paradoxical modes of speech which would be misleading, were not their source in our duplex nature well understood. We may read, in careful writers, of souls being left dead on battle-fields, and of everybody's immortality. The mysteries of the relations in which the constituent elements in the more complex personality of Our Lord stand to one another are immeasurably greater than in our common life. We can comprehend how the infinite God and a finite humanity can be united in a single person; and it is very easy to go fatally astray in attempting to explain the interactions in the unitary person of two natures. But the matter is not so pressing, therefore, that so soon as serious efforts began to be made to give systematic explanations of the Bib. facts as to Our Lord's person, many one-sided and incomplete statements were formulated which required and were supplemented or at least at the expense of a mode of statement was devised which did full justice to the Bib. data. It was accordingly only after more than a century of controversy, during which nearly every conceivable method of construing and misconstruing the Bib. facts had been proposed and tested, that a formula was framed which successfully guarded the essential data supplied by the Scriptures from destructive misconception. This formula, put together by the Council of Chalcedon, 451 AD, declares it to have the form of the doctrine of the Church, derived from the Scriptures and Our Lord Himself, that Our Lord Jesus Christ is "truly God and truly man, of a reasonable soul and body; and so the Father Godhead and consubstantial with us according to the manhood; in all things like unto us, without sin; begotten before all ages of the Father according to the Godhead, and in these latter days, for us and for our salvation, born of the Virgin Mary, the Mother of God, according to the manhood; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, to be acknowledged in two natures, undivided and undivisible, incapable of a separation, and of the property of each nature being preserved, and concouring in one Person and one subsistence, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son, and Only-begotten, God, the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ." There is nothing here but a careful statement in systematic form of the pure teaching of the Scriptures; and therefore this statement has stood ever since as the norm of thought and teaching as to the person of the Lord. As such, it has been incorporated, in one form or another, into the creed of all the great branches of the church; it underlies and gives its form to all the allusions to Christ in the great mass of preaching and song which has accumulated during the centuries; and it has supplied the background of the conceptions of the untold multitudes who through the Christian ages have been worshippers of Christ.

NOTE.—In this art, the author has usually given his own translation of quotations from Scripture, and not that of any particular version.

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD

PERSONALITY. See Person.

PERSUADE, πέρεσώ, PERSUASION, περσώ-ζην: (1) in the older Eng. "persuade" need not mean "convinces" (although it is this usual sense in the AV: Mt 27 20, etc), but may mean only "attempt to convince," "argue with." This is well brought out in Acts 26 28, where the Gr is lit. "in little thou 'persuaded' [πεπέθηκα, πεπέθητα] to make me Christ." (2) "He took πεθιείς 'convinced' (almost thou persuadest me ...), but this is impossible, and so the AV rendered πεθηκα by "thou wouldst fail." To keep something of the language of AV, "persuasion" was supplied after "little," but it should be italicized, for it is merely conjectural, as ARVm recognizes by giving "time" as an alternative for "persuasion." The text of the passage, however, is suspected. See ALSO.

Similarly in Acts 13 43, RV replaces "persuade" by "had some change," and had have been made also in 2 K 13 18 and Xs (3). (2) The "popular persuasions" of 1 Esd 5 73 are "efforts to persuade the people" (uncertain text, however). Acts 19 8 AV writes "persuading the things" (RV "as to the things") for "present the things persuasively." And in Gal 1 10 (ERV and AV, not in ARV) and 2 Cor 5 11, there is a half-ironic force in the word: St. Paul's enemies have accused him of using unworthy persuasion in making his conversions.

PERVERSE, περασων: The group "perverse-ly, -ness," "act perversely" in AV represents nearly 20 Heb words, of which, however, most are derivatives of the stems πασιον, πασαον, πασαον, πασαον. RV has made many changes. In Job 36 8, RV "mischievous" is better for the taste of a thing, and in Isa 50 3 greater emphasis is gained by RV "wickedness." In Ezk 9 9, "wresting of judgment" is perhaps too concrete, and "perverseness" is kept in the m (inverted in AV). RVm "headlong" in Nu 22 23 is over-literal, and in 23 21 ARVm's "trouble" is a distinct improvement.

PESTILENCE, ρέστιλες (ρέστιλη, debyr; λαομε, loimods): Any sudden fatal epidemic is designated by this word, and in his Bib. use it generally indicates that these are Divine visitations, the word is most frequently used in the prophetic books, and it occurs 25 in Jer and Ezek, always associated with the sword and famine. In 4 other passages it is combined with noisome or evil beasts, or war. In Am 4 10 this judgment is compared with the plagues of Egypt, and in Hab 3 5 is a concomitant of the judgments of God from the Arabian mountain. There is the same judicial character associated with pestilence in Ex 5 3; 9 15; Lev 26 25, Nu 14 12; Dt 28 21; 2 S 24 1; 1 Ch 21 12; Ezk 14 19.21. In the dedication prayer of Solomon, a special value is bequeathed for such petitions as may be presented toward the temple (2 Ch 6 28). Such a deliverance is promised to those who put their trust in God (Ps 91 6). Here the pestilence is called noisome, a shortened form of "annoysome," used in the sense of "hateful" or that which causes trouble or distress. In modern Eng. it has acquired the sense of loathsome. "Noisome" is used by Tindale where AV and RV have "hateful" in 1 Tim 6 9.

The Lat word pestilentia is connected with pestis, "the plague," but pestilence is used of any visitation and is not the name of any special disease: debber is applied to diseases of cattle and is tr' "murrain."

In the NT pestilence is mentioned in Our Lord's eschatological discourse (Mt 24 7 AV; Lk 21 11) coupled with famine. The assonance of loimods and linds in these passages (linois is omitted in the RV passage for Mt) occurs in several classical passages, e.g. Heroiotus vii.171. The pestilence is said to walk in darkness (Ps 91 6) on account of its sudden onset out of obscurity unassociated with any apparent cause.

ALEX. MACALISTER

PESTLE, πεστα (πεστα, πεστα): A rounded implement of wood or stone used for pounding, bruising, or powdering grains in a mortar. Used only in Prov 22 27. See MORTAR.

LITERATURE. The data for this article are found chiefly in the four Gospels; in Acts, chs 1-16; in Gal 1 and 2; and in the two Epistles of Peter.

Simon (or Simeon) was the original name of Peter, the son of Jonas (or John), and brother of Andrew, a disciple of John the Baptist, as Peter also may have been. A fisherman by occupation, he was an inhabitant of Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee, though subsequently he dwelt with his family at Capernaum (Mt 4 18; 8 14; 10 2; 16 17; 17 27; Mk 1 16.29.30.36; Lk 5 3.4. 5.8.10; 22 31; 24 34; Jn 1 40-44.)

His first appearance in Gospel history is in Jn 1 35-42, when Andrew, having discovered Jesus to be the Messiah, "first findeth his own brother Simon," and "brought him unto Jesus"; on which occasion it was that the latter, beholding him, said, "Thou shalt be called Cephas," an Aram. surname whose Gr synonym is Petros, or Peter, meaning "a rock" or "stone." At this time he also received the name Peter, the disciple of Jesus, although, in common with that of other names of the Twelve, this call was twice repeated. See Mt 4 19; Mk 1 17; Mk 5 3 for the second call, and Mt 10 2; Mk 3 14.16; Lk 6 13.14 for the third.

Some interpret the second as that when he was chosen to be a constant companion of Jesus, and the third when he was at length selected as an apostle.
The life-story of Peter falls into two parts: first, from his call to the ascension of Christ; secondly, from that event to the close of his earthly career. (1) The first period again may be conveniently divided into the events prior to the Passion of Christ and those following. There are about ten of the former: the healing of his wife's mother-in-law (Mt 8 14 ff); the great draught of fishes, and its effect in his self-abasement and surrender of his all to Jesus (Lk 5 1-11); his call to the apostolic office and his spiritual equipment therefor (Mt 10 2); his attachment to the Lord and his own inconstant desire to walk upon the waves (Mt 14 28); the same attachment as shown at a certain crisis, in his inquiry "Lord, to whom shall we go?" (Jn 6 68); his noble confession of Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God, and, alas, the rebuke that followed it (Mt 16 15-23); the exalted privileges he enjoyed with James and John as witness of the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5 37 and the transfiguration of his Lord (Mt 17 1-5); and finally, the incident of the tribute money scene in Mt 17 24.

The events beginning at the Passion are more easily recalled, because to so large an extent are they found in all the Gospels and about in the same order. They commence with the washing of his feet by the Master at the time of the last Passover, and the two mistakes he made in his thought concerning the event (Jn 13 1-10); the first of his presumptuous boasting as to the strength of his devotion to his Master, and the warning of the latter as to Satan's prospective assault upon him (Lk 22 51-34), twice repeated before the betrayal; in Gethsemane (Mt 26 31-50); the admission to the garden to behold the Saviour's deepest distress, the charge to watch and pray, and the failure to do so through sleepiness (Mt 26 36-46); the mistaken courage in severing the ear of Malchus (Jn 18 10-12); the forsaking of his Lord while the latter was being led away as a prisoner, his following Him afar off, his admission into the high priest's palace, his denial "before them all," his confirmation of it by an oath, his remembrance of the warning when "the Lord turned and looked upon Peter," and his tears of bitterness as he went out (Mt 26 66-58; Mk 14 66-72; Lk 22 54-62; Jn 18 15-27).

It will be seen that the story of Peter's fall is thus related by all the four Evangelists, together with the account of the resurrection, in the words of the angel (Mt 16 7); and on the same day he sees Jesus alive before any of the rest of the Twelve (Lk 24 34; 1 Cor 15 5). Subsequently, at the Sea of Tiberias, Peter is given an opportunity for a threshold confession of Jesus whom he had three times denied, and more assigned to the apostolic office; a prediction follows as to the kind of death he should die, and also a command to follow his Lord (Jn 21).

(2) The second period, from the ascension of Christ to the conversion of Paul, is more briefly sketched. After the ascension, of which Peter was doubtless a witness, he "stood up in the midst of the brethren" in the upper room in Jerusalem to counsel the choice of a successor to Judas (Acts 1 15-26). On the day of Pentecost he preaches the first gospel sermon (Acts 2), and later, in company with John, instrumentally heals the lame man, addresses the people in the Temple, is arrested, defends himself before the Sanhedrin and returns to his "own company" (Acts 4, 8). He is in arrest and beaten (ch 6); after a time he is sent by the church at Jerusalem to communicate the Holy Ghost to the disciples at Samaria (ch 8). Returning to Jerusalem (where presumably Paul visits him, Gal 1 18), he afterward journeys "throughout all parts," heals Aeneas at Lydda, raises Dorcas from the dead at Joppa, sees a vision upon the house-top which influences him to preach the gospel to the gentle centurion at Caesarea, and explains this action to the other apostles and the brethren that were in Judea (9 32-41; ch 11).

After a while another persecution arose against the church, and Herod Agrippa, having put James to death, imprisons Peter with the thought of executing him also. Prayer is made by the church on his behalf, however, and miraculous deliverance is given him (ch 12). Retiring for a while from public attention, he once more comes before us in the church council at Jerusalem, when the question is to be settled as to whether the works of salvation, adding his testimony to that of Paul, are "the cup of salvation" in favor of justification by faith only (ch 15).

Subsequently he is found at Antioch, and having fellowship with gentle Christians until "that certain came from James," when he drew back and attempted to separate himself from the support of the Gentile church (Acts 15 36). The second council was held to settle this question and a dispute that arose concerning Gentiles with respect to circumcision, for which resembling Paul "resisted him to the face, because he stood condemned" (Gal 2 11-14).

Little more is authentically known of Peter, except that he traveled more or less extensively, being accompanied by his wife (1 Cor 9 5), and that he wrote two epistles, the second of which was penned as he approached the end of his life (2 Pet 1 12-15).

The tradition is that he died a martyr at Rome about 67 AD, when about 75 years of age. His Lord and Master had predicted a violent death for him (Jn 21 18,19), which it is thought came to pass by crucifixion under Nero. It is said that at his own desire he was crucified head downward, feeling himself unworthy to resemble his Master in his death.

It should be observed, however, that the tradition that he visited Rome is only tradition and nothing more, resting as it does partly upon a miscalculation of some of the early Fathers, "who assumed that Peter went to Rome immediately after his deliverance from prison" (cf Acts 12 17). Schaff says this "is irreconcilable with the silence of Scripture, and even with the mere fact of Paul's Ep. to the Rom, written in 68, since the latter says not a word of Peter's previous labors in that city, and he himself never built on other men's foundations" (Rom 16 20; 2 Cor 10 15,16).

The character of Peter is transparent and easily analyzed, and it is doubtless true that no other "in history, men have ever written more clearly or strongly." He has been styled the prince of the apostles, and, indeed, seems to have been their leader on every occasion. He is always named first in every list of them, and was their common spokesman. He was hopeful, bold, confident, courageous, frank, impulsive, energetic, vigorous, strong, and loving, and faithful to his Master notwithstanding his defection prior to the crucifixion. It is true that he was not always consistent, and because of his peculiar temperament he sometimes appeared forward and rash. Yet, as another says, "His virtues and faults had their common root in his enthusiastic disposition," and the latter were at length overruled by Divine grace into the most beautiful humility and meekness, as evinced in his two Epistles.
The leadership referred to, however, should not lead to the supposition that he possessed any supremacy over the other apostles, of which there is no proof. Such supremacy was never conferred upon him by his Master, it was never claimed by himself, and it is not yet conceded by his associates. See in this connection Mt 23 8–12; Acts 15 13-14; 2 Cor 12 11; Gal 2 11.

It is true that when Christ referred to the meaning of his name (Mt 16 18), He said, “Upon this rock I will build my church,” but He did not intend to teach that His church would be built upon Peter, but upon Himself as confessed by Peter in ver 16 of the same chapter. Peter is careful to affirm this in the first of his two Ep. (2 4–9). Moreover, when Christ said, “I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven,” etc (Mt 16 19), He invested him with no power not possessed in common with his brethren, since they also afterward received the same commission (Mt 18 18; Jn 20 23). A key is a badge of power or authority, and, as many Protestant commentators have pointed out, to quote the language of one of them, “the apostolic history explains and limits this trust, for it was Peter who opened the door of the gospel to Israel and Gentile alike; on him follows Saul the Jew and the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius (Acts 10 34–46).” Some, however, regard this authority as identical with the great commission (Mt 28 19). See KEYS, Power of the.

The two Epistles of Peter were written presumably late in life, as appears esp. of the Second (1 12–15).

Both were addressed to the same class of persons, chiefly Jewish Christians scattered abroad in the different provinces of Asia Minor, among whom Paul and his associates had planted the gospel (1 Pet 1 1-2; 2 Pet 3 1). The First was written at Babylon (1 Pet 5 13), doubtless the famous Babylon on the Euphrates, which, though destroyed as a great capital, was still inhabited by a small colony of people, principally Jews (see Weiss, INT, II, 150; but see also Peter, First Epistle of).

(1) First Epistle.—The theme of the First Ep. seems to be the living hope to which the Christian beneficiaries are exhorted to set their hearts and their minds. The living hope is expounded in the earlier part of the first chapter down to ver 13, where the obligations begin to be stated, the first group including hope, godly fear, love to the brethren, and praise of God (1 13–13).

The writer drops his pen at this point, to take it up again to address those who were suffering persecution for righteousness sake, upon whom two more obligations are impressed, submission to authority, and testimony to Christ (2 11–4 6). The third group which concludes the book begins here, dealing with such themes as spiritual hospitality in the use of heaven gifts, patience in suffering, fidelity in service, and humility in ministry. The power and majesty of the unseen powers of God are emphasized, the blessings of the NT are promised. The living hope is expounded in the earlier part of the first chapter down to ver 13, where the obligations begin to be stated, the first group including hope, godly fear, love to the brethren, and praise of God (1 13–13).

The genuineness of this First Ep. has never been doubted, except of course by those who in these latter days have doubted everything, but the same cannot be said of the Second. It is not known to whom the latter was addressed; as a matter of fact it is not known even whether the epistle consisted of one or two letters, or whether the epistle contained the NY book of Baruch. The first church employing it was at Alexandria, but subsequently the church at large became satisfied from internal evidence of its genuineness and inspiration, and when the Canon was pronounced complete in the 4th cent., it was without hesitancy received.

(2) Second Epistle.—The Second Ep. claims to have been written by Peter (1 1; 3 1,2), to doubt which would start more serious difficulties than can be alleged against its genuineness, rather because of its late admission to the Canon or its supposed diversity of style from Peter’s early writing. See Peter, Second Epistle of.

His object is the same in both Ep., to “stir up your sincere mind by putting you in remembrance” (3 1). Like Paul in his Second Ep. to Titus, he foresees the apostasy in which the professing church will end, the difference being that Paul speaks of it in its last stage when the laity have become infected (2 Tim 3 1–5; 4 3,4), while Peter sees it in its origin as accessible to false teachers (2 Pet 2 1–3.15–19). As in the First Ep. he wrote to exhort and to testify, so here it is rather to caution and warn. This warning was, as a whole, against falling from grace (3 17,18), the enforcement of which warning is contained in 1 2–11, the ground of it in 1 12–21, and the occasion of it in the last two chapters. To speak only of the occasion: This, as was stated, was the presence of false teachers (2 1), whose eminent success is predicted (2 2), whose punishment is certain and dreadful (2 3–5), and whose desertion of the faith is expected. The threat of their false teaching (ch 3) forms one of the most interesting and important features of the Ep., focusing as it does on the Second Coming of Christ.

The theology of Peter offers an interesting field of study because of what may be styled its freshness and variety in comparison with 6. Theology that of Paul and John, who are the great theologians of the NT.

(1) Messianic teaching.—In the first place, Peter is unique in his Messianic teaching as indicated in the first part of the Acts, where he is the chief personage, and where for the most part his ministry is confined to Jesus and the Jews. The latter, already in covenant relations with Jeh, had sinned in rejecting Jesus as the Messiah, and Peter’s preaching was directed to that point, demanding repentance or a change of mind about Him. The apparent failure of the OT promises concerning the Davidic kingdom (Isa 11 10–12; Jer 23 5–8; Ezk 37 21–28), Peter was explaining by the prophecy of the NT to his readers. The living hope is expounded in the earlier part of the first chapter down to ver 13, where the obligations begin to be stated, the first group including hope, godly fear, love to the brethren, and praise of God (1 13–13).

The writer drops his pen at this point, to take it up again to address those who were suffering persecution for righteousness sake, upon whom two more obligations are impressed, submission to authority, and testimony to Christ (2 11–4 6). The third group which concludes the book begins here, dealing with such themes as spiritual hospitality in the use of heaven gifts, patience in suffering, fidelity in service, and humility in ministry. The power and majesty of the unseen powers of God are emphasized, the blessings of the NT are promised. The living hope is expounded in the earlier part of the first chapter down to ver 13, where the obligations begin to be stated, the first group including hope, godly fear, love to the brethren, and praise of God (1 13–13).

The genuineness of this First Ep. has never been doubted, except of course by those who in these latter days have doubted everything, but the same cannot be said of the Second. It is not known to whom the latter was addressed; as a matter of fact it is not known even whether the epistle consisted of one or two letters, or whether the epistle contained the NY book of Baruch. The first church employing it was at Alexandria, but subsequently the church at large became satisfied from internal evidence of its genuineness and inspiration, and when the Canon was pronounced complete in the 4th cent., it was without hesitancy received.

(2) Justification.—But Peter’s special ministry to the circumcision is by no means in conflict with that of Paul to the Gentiles, as demonstrated at the point of transition in Acts 10. Up until this time the gospel had been offered to the Jews only, but now they have rejected it in the national sense, and “the normal order for the present Christian age” is reached (Acts 13 44–48). Accordingly, we find Peter, side by side with Paul, affirming the great doctrine of justification by faith only, in the words, “We believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we [Jews] shall be saved, even as they [Gentiles]” (Acts 16 11 AV). Moreover, it is clear from Peter’s Second Ep. (1 1) that his conception of justification from the Divine as well as from the human side is identical with that of Paul, since he speaks of justifying faith as terminating on the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ. As we understand it, this is not the righteousness which God demanded in the Law, but the righteousness which God gives (cf Rom 1 16,17; 3 21–25; 2 Cor 5 20,21).

(3) Redemption.—Passing from his oral to his written utterances, Peter is particularly rich in his allusions to the redemptive work of Christ. Limiting ourselves to his First Ep., the election of the individual believer is seen to be the result of the sprinkling of Christ’s blood (1 1); his obedience and godly fear are inspired by the sacrifice of the “lamb without blemish and without spot: Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world (1 17–20 AV). But most interesting are the manner and the connection in which these sublime truths are sometimes set before the reader. For example, an exhortation to submission on the part of household slaves is the occasion for perhaps the most concise and yet the most comprehensive interpretation of Christ’s vicarious sufferings anywhere in the NT (2 18–25, esp. the last two verses; cf. also in its context 3 18–22).

(4) Future Life.—Next to the redemptive work of Christ, the Petrine teaching about the future life claims attention. The believer has been begotten again unto a "lively [or living] hope" (1 Pet 1 3), which is an "inheritance" reserved in heaven (1 4); and associated with "praise, and glory and honor at the revelation [Second Coming] of Jesus Christ" (1 7 13; 4 13; 5 4 10; 2 Pet 1 11 16; 3 13, etc.). This "hope" or "inheritance" is so real and so precious as to cause rejoicing even in times of heaviness and trial (1 Pet 1 6); to stimulate to holiness (1 13); to give patience in persecution (4 12 13); fidelity in service (5 1 4); steadfastness against temptation (5 6–10); and growth in grace (2 Pet 1 10 11). It is a further peculiarity that the apostle always throws the thought of the resurrection forward into the light of the future glory. It is not as though there were merely an allotment of suffering here, and an allotment of glory by and by, with no relation or connection between the two, but the one is seen to be incident to the other (2 Pet 1 4 5); 2 Pet 3 12 13). It is this circumstance, added to others, that gives Peter the title of the apostle of hope, as Paul has been called the apostle of faith, and John the apostle of love.

(5) Holy Scripture.—Considering their limitations as to space, Peter’s Ep, are notable for the emphasis they lay upon the character and authority of the Holy Scriptures. 1 Pet 1 10–12 teaches a threefold relation of the Holy Spirit to the Holy Word as its Author, its Revealer, and its Teacher or Preacher. The same chapter (vs 22–25) speaks of its life-giving and purifying power as well as its eternal duration. Ch 2 opens with a declaration of its vital relation to the Christian’s spiritual growth. In 4 11, it is found to be the staple of the Christian’s’s daily discipline. Practically the whole of the Second Ep. is taken up with the subject. Through the "exceeding great and precious promises" of that Word, Christians become "partakers of the divine nature" (1 4 AV); that they may be kept "always in remembrance" is Peter’s object in writing (vs 12– 15 AV); the facts of that Word rest on the testimony of eyewitnesses (vs 16–18); its origin is altogether Divine (vs 20 21); which is as true of the NT as of the OT (3 2); including the Ep of Paul (vs 15 16).

(6) Apostasy and judgment.—This appreciation of the living Word of God finds an antithesis in the solemn warning against apostate teachers and teaching forming the substance of 2 Pet 2 and 3. The theology here is of judgment. It is swift and "in-genthe world (2 1–3); the Judge is He who "spared not" in olden time (vs 4–7); His delay expresses mercy, but He "will come as a thief" (3 9 10); the heavens "shall pass away," the earth and its works shall be burned up (ver 10); "What the heavens and the earth shall become" yet to be "when all living and godliness" (ver 11).

(7) Second Coming of Christ.—Peter’s theology concerning judgment is a further illustration of the Messianic character of his instruction. For example, the Second Coming of Christ of which he speaks in the closing chapter of the Second Ep. is not that of aspect it is associated with the translation of His church, and of which Paul treats (1 Thess 4 13–18), but that pertaining to Israel and the day of which spoken of by the OT prophets (Isa 2 22–22; Rev 19 11–21, etc.).

He occupied a distinguished place among the Lord’s disciples. In the four lists of the apostles found in the NT his name must occur (Mt 10 2–4; Mt 3 16–19; Lk 6 14–16; Acts 1 13). He is the chief figure in the first ten chapters of the Acts. It is Peter that preaches the Christian sermon (Acts 2), he opens the door of the gospel to the gentile world in the house of the madman, Cornelia, and has the exquisite delight of witnessing scenes closely akin to those of Pentecost at Jerus (Acts 10 44–47). It was given him to pronounce the pardon of sentences on the guilty pair, Ananias and Sapphira, and to rebuke in the power of the Spirit the presbyter Simon Magus (Acts 8 19–20). In these and the like instances Peter exhibited the authority with which Christ had invested him (Mt 16 19)—an authority bestowed upon all his disciples (20 22).—see Peter, Epp. of Second.

doubt and uncertainty have existed from the early ages to the present. The genuineness and authenticitish receive graduate, or a reversion.

1. Canonicy of 1 Peter.—The internal and external evidence to its authority as an apostolic document is abundant. Polycarp, the disciple of the apostle John, martyred in 156 AD at 86 or more years of age, refers to the Ep. in unmistakable terms. Irenæus, a man who may well be said to represent both the East and the West, who was a contemporary of Polycarp, quotes it copiously, and the Clement of Alexandria, born c 150 AD, died c 216 AD, cites it many times in his Stromata, one passage (4 8) being quoted five times by actual count. "The testimony of the early church is summed up by Eusebius (UE, III, xxiii, 3). He places it among those writings about which no question was ever raised, no doubt ever entertained by any portion of the catholic church." (Professor Lumby in Biblical Comm.).

The internal evidence in favor of the Ep. is as conclusive as the external. The writer is well acquainted with Our Lord's teaching, and he makes use of it to illustrate and enforce his own. The references he quotes are such as are found in the New Testament only; and they include the four Gospels. He is familiar likewise with the Epp., particularly Jas, Rom, and Eph. But what is esp. noteworthy is the fact that 1 Pet in thought and language stands in close relation with the other epistles as recorded in Acts. By comparing 1 Pet 1 17 with Acts 10 34; 1 21 with 2 32-36 and 10 40-41; 7 8 with 4 10-11; 2 17 with 10 28, and 3 18 with 3 14, one will perceive how close the parallel between the two is. The inference from these facts appears legitimate, viz. 1 Pet in diction and thought belongs to the same period of time and moves in the same circle of truth as do the other writings of the NT. The writer was an apostle, and he was Simon Peter.

II. The Address.—Peter writes to the "elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion." James employs the term "Dispersion" to designate believing Hebrews of the Twelve Tribes who lived outside the land (1 1). The Jews included in it the whole body of Israel, that is, including among them the gentile nations (Jn 7 55). But we must not conclude from this that the Ep. is directed to Christian Jews alone. Gentile believers are by no means excluded, as 1 14; 18; 20; 2 10; 2 6; 4 8. Since anciently all races were included, the idea of churches of Asia Minor largely predominated at the time. The term "sojourners" represents a people away from home, strangers in a strange land; the word is the "pilgrims" in 2 11 and He 11 13. An appropriate name for these who confess that they have here no continuing city, but who seek one to come. While no doubt Peter had believing Israelites in mind when he wrote, for he never forgot that his ministry belonged primarily to the circumcision (Gal 2 7-8), he did not neglect the more numerous gentile converts, and to these he speaks as earnestly as to the others; and these also were "sojourners."

Three of the four provinces Peter mentions, viz. Pontus, Cappadocia, and Asia, had representatives at the memorable Pentecost in Jesus (Acts 2 9; 1 Pet 1 1). Many of these "sojourners of the Dispersion" may have believed the message of the apostle and accepted salvation through Jesus Christ, and returned home to tell the good news to their neighbors. This would form a close bond of union between them and Peter, and would open the way for him to address them in the familiar and tender manner of the Ep. Silvanus appears to have been the bearer of the letter to the Christians of Asia Minor, and our faithful brother, as I account him, I have written unto him, that so he may shew you the same things, and the like matters as are written in this epistle. But while I would not neglect the occurrence of these words that Silvanus was employed in the composition of the Epistle, I yet think it more likely that this "follower of Christ" was the writer or the secretary. Silvanus was Paul's companion in the ministry to the Thessalonians, and while we do not know of him as going with Paul to Jerusalem or to Rome, it is probable he returned from Corinth finally to Aisa Minor, and labored there with Peter and Paul. Peter met, where no one knows, though not a few think in Rome; as likely a guess perhaps in his Ep. in Col. At any rate, Silvanus, or the "sojourner" as Peter designates him in 2 Pet, was an acquaintance of the apostle. This seems to account more fitly for the phrase, "our faithful brother. I have written unto you," as if he had some share in furnishing the contents of the Ep.

III. Place and Time of Composition.—According to 5 13 the Ep. was written in Babylon. But what is the place meant? Two cities having this name were in apostolic times.

Which? One was in Egypt, probably on or near the present site of Cairo, and we are told that it was the place in which the "Tend Babylonian" Epiphanius calls it "great Babylon" (Zahn). The absence, however, of all tradition that would tend to identify this place with the Babylon of the Ep. seems to shut it out of the question. Babylon on the Euphrates was the place meanly and contemptuously designated. Jews in considerable numbers still dwelt in Babylon, notwithstanding the massacre of thousands in the reign of Claudius, and the flight of multitudes into other countries. There is much to be said for the view that Peter wrote the Ep. at Babylon, and that the absence of tradition in its support is a very serious difficulty. A third view regards it as symbolic of Rome. Roman Catholics thus interpret it, and not a few Protestants so understand it. Tradition which does not rank very high in the 2d cent. appears to favor it, though much uncertainty and obscurity still surround the earliest ages of our era, in spite of the unwaried researches of modern scholars. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, who lived in the first half of the 2d cent., appears to have had no doubt that Peter was martyred in Rome, and that the Babylon of the Ep. designates the Imperial City. There are very serious objections to this interpretation. One is, that it is quite totally out of harmony with the rest of the writing. Preeminently he is direct and matter-of-fact in his style. The metaphorical language he employs is mostly drawn from the OT, or, if from himself, it is so common of use as to be well understood by all readers. It is altogether him that this man, plain of speech almost to bluntness, should interject in the midst of his personal explanations and final salutations such a mystical epitaph with no hint of what he means by it, or why he employs such a mode of speech.

Besides, there is no evidence that Rome was called Babylon by the Christians until the Book of Rev was published, i.e. c 90-96 AD. But Peter's need was not dependent on the Apocalypse for this name of Babylon as Rome. Peter could not not use it, for he was alive more than a decade before that date. The Ep. was written about 64 AD, at the time when Nero was under the infamous Nero were raging, at which time also the apostle himself bore his witness and went to his heavenly home. Even as his Nazarenes had foretold before this time (John 12), while not unthinkable of the great difficulties that beset the view, nevertheless we are inclined to the opinion that the Babylon of 5 13 is the ancient city on the Euphrates. See Peter (Simon).

IV. Design.—The apostle had more than one object in view when he addressed the "elect" in Asia Minor. First and foremost he desired that they "be strengthened in the grace which is in Christ Jesus." "Feed my lambs!"—"Tend my sheep."—"Feed my sheep" (Jn 21 15-17). His two Epp. certify how faithfully he obeyed the charge. With loving and tender hand he feeds the lambs and tends the whole flock, warns against foes, guards from danger, and leads them into green pastures and beside still waters. He reminds them of the glorious inheritances they share, exalts to walk in the footsteps of the uncomplaining Christ (2:20–25); be compassionate, loving, tender-hearted, humble-minded, and circumspect in their passage through this unfriendly world (3:8–12). He sums up the main duties of Christian life in the short but pregnant sentences, "Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor the king" (2:17). But his supreme object is to comfort and encourage them amid the persecutions and the sufferings to which they were unjustly subjected, and to fortify them against the heavier trials that were impending.

From the beginning the Christian church was the object of suspicion and of hatred, and many of its adherents had suffered even unto death at the hands of both hostile cution Jews and fanatical Gentiles. But these affections were generally local and sporadic. There were churches of large membership and wide influence which were unmolested (1 Cor 4:10–13); and while the Christian church was not to get fair treatment in heathen courts (1 Cor 6:1–6). But the condition brought to view in 1 Pet is altogether different. Trials and afflictions of the sort that assailed them, and an enmity and hostility, bent on their destruction, pursed them with tireless energy. The whole Christian body shared in the persecutions (5:9). The trial was a surprise (4:12), both in its intensity, for Peter calls it "fiery," and for its unexpectedness. The apostle represents it as the very heart of persecution, the roaring lion, prowling about them to seize and devour (5:8,9). A variety of charges were brought against the Christians, but they were calumnies and slanders, without any foundation in fact. They were spoken against as evil-doers (2:12; kairopoiōth, maleficē, Tacitus calls them). Their adversaries railed against them (3:9); reviled them (3:16); spake evil of them (4:4); reproached them for the name of Christ (4:14). They were "ugly calumniators," or "false accusers," or "false witnesses," to be classed with thieves and murderers and meddlers in other men's matters (4:14–16), as they were accused of being and doing, we could understand the fierce opposition which assailed them and the savage purpose to suppress them altogether, but the only ground for the enmity felt against them was the refusal of the Christians to join their heathen neighbors in their idolatries, their feasts, winebibbings, revelings, carousings, lasciviousness and lusts in which once they freely shared (4:2–4). The Asian saints had renounced all such wicked practices, had separated themselves from their old companions in riotous living and revolting debaucheries; they were witnesses against their immoralities, and hence became the objects of intense dislike and persecuting animosity. Peter bears testimony to the high character, the purity of life and the self-sacrificing devotion of these believers. In all Asia Minor no better company of men and women could be found than their own. Their record spoke for admission to constituted authority, none more ready to help their fellow-men in their distress and trouble. The head and front of their offending was their separation from the ungodly world about them, and their solemn witness against the awful sins done daily before their eyes.

How mightily does the apostle minister to his suffering friends! He bids them remember the uncomplaining Christ when he was unjustly afflicted by cruel men (2:19–25). He exhorts them to put to silence their accusers, and refute the calumnies and the slanders that are so cruelly circulated against them, namely, by living such pure and godly lives, by being so meek, docile, patient, meekfast, true, faithful to God, that you can credit the false accusations (2:1–5; 3:13–17; 3:9.13–17; 5:6–11).

There is little or no evidence in the Ep. that the persecutions were inflicted by imperial authority or that the state was dealing with the Christians as enemies who were dangerous to the peace of society. In the province to which the letter was sent there seems to have been complete absence of formal trial and punishment through the regular channels. Peter proceeds to State the reason that the apostle in 64 AD—the date of the Ep.—the government formally denounced Christians and determined to annihilate them.

Peter exhorts his fellow-believers to silence their persecutors by their upright conduct (2:15); they are thus to put to them that shame which falsely accuse them (3:16); and they are not to combat evil with evil nor answer reproofing or reproving triavvisre with blessing (3:9). The antagonism here indicated obviously springs from the heathen populace; there is no hint of arraignment before magistrates or subjection to legal proceedings. It is unbelievers who revile and denounce the people of God in the provinces.

Everything in the Ep. points to the time of Nero, 64 AD, and not to the time of Domitian or Trajan, or even Titus. In Rome vast multitudes of Christians were put to death in the most brutal fashion, so Tacitus relates, but the historian asserts that there was a minister report to the effect that Nero himself instigated the burning of the city (July 19, 64), and "he [Nero] falsely diverted the charge on to the Christians" (Hist. X.15.4). The name of the Christians (of Christians), and who were detested for the abominations which they perpetrated." Nero andcleOPHIS AcTIFS The facts are well established, viz. that at the time the Christians were well known as a peculiar evil-doing sect, and that the government of Nero attached the dreadful sufferings inflicted upon them because they were Christians; and the persecutions at the time were instigated by the fear and hatred of the Christian sect. Peter likewise recognizes the fact that believers were disliked and calumniated by their heathen neighbors for the same reason—they were Christians: "If ye are reproached for the name of Christ, blessed are ye" (4:14); "But if a man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God in this name" (4:16). But the imperial government at the time does not appear to have taken formal action for the overthrow of Christianity as a system imminent to the empire. Of course, where direct charges of a criminal character were brought against Christians, judicial inquiry into them would be instituted. But in the Ep. what believers had to endure and suffer were the detractio, the vituperation, the opprobrium and the vile and malignant slanders with which the heathen assailed them.

V. Characteristic Features of the Epistle.—It has certain very distinct marks, some of which may be noticed.

It does not observe a close logical sequence in its structure, as those of Paul so prominently display.

There is truth in Dean Alford's statement that the letter pushes it rather far: "The link between one idea Structure and another is found, not in any progress of unfolding thought or argument, but in the last word of the foregoing sentence which is taken up, if not followed out, in the next" (1 Pet 5:6.7.9.10, etc). This peculiarity, however, does... not interfere with the unity of the ep., it rather adds to it, and it gives to it a vividness which it otherwise might not possess.

It is the ep. of hope. How much it makes of this prime grace! Peter seems never to grow weary of describing it and exalting its radiant beauty and desirability. He calls it a living hope (1:3). It is born by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, and it calmly awaits the glorious inheritance that soon will be enjoyed. It is a hope that will be perfected at the advent of Christ (1:13), and it is set on God, hence cannot fail (1:21).

With sickly, dying hope we are left more faithful. The device which a certain state (South Carolina) has inscribed on its Great Seal is, dom spiro spiro (“while I live I hope”). Such a hope may serve for a commonwealth whose existence is limited to this world, but a man needs something more enduring, something imperishable. “It is a fearful thing when a man and his hopes die together” (Leighton). A Christian can confidently write, “when I am dying I hope,” for his is a living hope that fills and thrills the future with a blessed reality.

The Christian’s glorious inheritance (1:3-5) is depicted in one of the most comprehensive and suggestive descriptions of the believer’s heritage found in the Bible. It is described to be old in the times of God’s first appearing and the word points to its substance. It is imperishable. In it there is no element of decay. It holds in its heart no germ of death. Like its author, the living God, it is unchangeable and eternal. It is “not stained by sin nor polluted by crime, either in its acquisition or its possession. Human heritages generally are marred by human wrongs. There is hardly an acre of soil that is not tainted by fraud or violence. The coin that passes from hand to hand is in many instances soiled by guilt. But this of Peter is absolutely pure and holy. It ‘faileth not away.’ It never withers. Ages do not impair its beauty or dim its luster. Its bloom will remain fresh, its fragrance undiminished, forever. Thus our inheritance is ‘glorious in these respects: it is in its substance, incorruptible: in its purity, undefiled: in beauty, unfading’ (Alford).

4. Testimony of Prophets. —

7. The session, that ye may show forth the Christian excellencies of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light.

The brotherhood is the new Israel. The apostle describes it in terms which were applied to the old Israel, but which include more than the ancient Israel ever realized. The exalted conception is by one who was a strict Jew, the apostle of the circumcision, and who held somewhat closely to the Mosaic institutions to the end of his life. All the more significant on this account is his testimony. The descriptive titles which he here gathers together and places on the brow of the Christian brotherhood are not the dream of an illusory prince, a man, a noble, a general, a statesman, will sometimes appear in public with his breast covered with resplendent decorations which mark his rank or his achievements. But such distinctions sink into insignificance in the light of the immortal bliss. This is the heavenly nobility, the royal family of the Lord of glory, decorated with badges brighter far than ever glittered on the breast of king or emperor. But even in this instance Peter reminds Christians of the glorious destiny awaiting them that they may be strengthened and stimulated to steadfastness and loyalty in the midst of the trials and afflictions to which they are subjected (2:11-12).

A study of 1 Pet. 3:18-20—"preached unto the spirits in prison"—should here follow in the present cursory review of the characteristic features of the Ep., but anything like an adequate examination of this difficult passage would require more space than could be given in a Supplement. We quote a section from Professor Zahn (N.T. II, 289) with which the writer agrees: “That interpretation of 1 Pet 3:19 is in all probability correct, according to which a preaching of Christ at the time of the Flood is referred to, i.e. the preaching of Noah. It is not Noah here represented as a preacher of righteousness, as in 2 Pet 2:5.” See PRISON, SPIRITS IN.
VI. Analysis.—A very general analysis of the Ep. is the following:

(1) Christian privileges, 1—2 10.
(2) Christian duties, 2 11—4 11.
(3) Persecutions and trials, 4 15—5 11.
(4) Personal matters and salutations, 5 12—14.

The chief doctrines of Christianity are found in 1 Pet. The vicarious suffering and death of the Lord Jesus Christ (2 24; 3 18); the new birth (1 3, 23); redemption by the blood of Christ (1 18, 19), faith, hope, patient endurance under unjust suffering, and holiness of life, are all pressed upon Christians with great earnestness and force.

The Second Ep. of Peter comes to us with less historical support of its genuineness than any other book of the NT. In consequence, its right to a place in the Canon is seriously doubted by some and denied by others. There are those who confidently assign it to the Apostolic age and to the apostle whose name it bears in the NT, while there are those who as confidently assign it to post-apostolic times, and repudiate its Petrine authorship. It is not the aim of this article to trace the history of these two opinions. It is not the purpose of this article to trace the history of these two opinions. It is not the purpose of this article to trace the history of these two opinions. It is not the purpose of this article to trace the history of these two opinions. It is not the purpose of this article to trace the history of these two opinions.

What is here attempted is to point out as briefly as may be some of the reasons for doubting its canonicity, on the one hand, and those in its support, on the other.

I. External Evidence in Favor of Its Apostolic Authority.—It must be admitted at the very outset that the evidence is meager. The ancient authorities differ. Thus, for instance, the name of ancient opinion Origen (c 240 AD). In his homily on Josh, he speaks of the two Epp. of Peter. In another place he quotes 2 Pet 1 4: “partakers of the divine nature,” and gives it the name of Scripture. But Origen is careful to say that his authority was questioned: “Peter has left one acknowledged Ep., and perhaps a second, for this is contested.” Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, regarded it with as much suspicion as did Origen, and accordingly he placed it among the apocryphal books. Jerome knew the scruples which many entertained touching the Ep., but notwithstanding, he included it in his Vulg. Version. The main reason for Jerome’s uncertainty about it states he states to be “difference of style from 1 Pet.” He accounts for the difference by supposing that the apostle “made use of two different interpreters.” As great teachers and scholars as Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome, e.g. Athanasius, Augustine, Epiphanius, Iulianus and Cyril, received it as genuine. At the Reformers’ Conference, Erasmus admitted 2 Pet; Luther seems to have had no doubt of its genuineness; while Calvin felt some hesitancy because of the “discrepancies between it and the First.” In the 4th cent., two church councils (Laodicea, 341; and Carthage, 397) formally recognized it and placed it in the canon, on an equal basis with the other books of the NT.

The opinion of modern scholars as to references in post-apostolic literature to 2 Pet is not only divided, but in many instances antagonistic. Salmon, Warfield, Zahn and Opinion others strongly hold that such references are to be found in the writings of the 2d cent., perhaps in one or two documents of the 1st. They insist with abundant proof in support of their contention that Justin Martyr, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Didache, and Clement of Rome, were all acquainted with the Ep. and made allusions to it in their writings. Weighing as honestly and as thoroughly as one can the evidence made from that literature, one is strongly disposed to accept the evidence as legitimate and conclusive.

On the other side, Professor Chase (HDB) has subjected all such references and allusions in the writings of the 1st century to searching criticism, and it must be frankly confessed that he has reduced the Ep. to a forgery, a pseudonymous and pseudograph, with no more right to be in the NT than has the Apocalypse of Peter or the romance of the Shepherd of Hermas.

II. Internal Evidence in Support of Its Apostolic Authority.—At first sight, this seems to be not altogether reassuring, but looking deeper

1. Style and Diction
   1. In the letter itself we arrive at a conclusion of an authoritative character. It is the style of the two Epp. attributed to Peter is given as one prominent reason for questioning the validity of the Second. It is mainly if not entirely on this ground that Jerome, Calvin and others hesitated to receive it. It is noteworthy that in the earlier times objections were not urged because of its relation to Jude—its borrowing from Jude, as is often charged in our days. Its alleged dissimilarity to 1 Pet in diction, structure, and measurably in its contents, explains why it was discredited. Admitting that there is substantial ground for this criticism, nevertheless there are not a few instances in which words rarely found in the other Bibles are common to the two Epp.
   Some examples are given in proof: “precious” (1 Pet
   1 7, 19; 2 Pet 1 1); “virtue” (1 Pet 2 9 AVm; 2 Pet
   1 3), found elsewhere only in Phil 4 8; “supply” (1 Pet 4 11; 2 Pet 1 5), rare in other books; “love of brethren” (1 Pet 1 22; 2 Pet 1 7b), only in the spiritual, “servant” (1 Pet
   1 2; 2 Pet 1 12; 3 2); “verbal form” (2 Pet 1 16) (eyewitnesses), not found elsewhere in the NT; “without blemish,” “without spot” (1 Pet 1 19; 2 Pet 3 14) (order of words revered); also positive side (2 Pet 2 13), “spots and blemishes”; the words do not occur elsewhere; “ungodly” (1 Pet 4 18; 2 Pet 2 5; 3 7) occurs in but three other places, except Jude, which has it twice.

Besides, there are many striking similarities in thought and diction in the two Epp. Two instances are given. In the First the saved are described as the “elect” (1 1), and as the “servant” (2 11). In the Second, the two great truths are brought together (10). Likewise, in both stress is laid upon prophecy (1 Pet 1 10–12; 2 Pet 1 19–21). Now, all this tends to prove that the writer of the First Ep. was well acquainted with the peculiarity of diction employed in the First, and that he made use purposely of its uncommon terms, or, if the Second was written by another than the apostle, he succeeded surprisingly well in imitating his style. The latter alternative does not merit discussion. The differences arise mainly out of the subjects treated in the two, and the design which the writer seems to have kept constantly in view. In the First, he sought to comfort, strengthen and sustain his readers. In the Second, he is anxious to warn and to shield those whom he addresses as to impending dangers more disastrous and more to be feared than the sufferings inflicted by a hostile world. In the First, he begins at the house of God (4 17, 18), and believers are to arm, not to resist their persecutors, but for martyrdom (4 1). But in the Second, a very different condition of things is brought to view. Ungodly men holding degrading principles and practicing shocking immoralities, are threatening to invade the Christian brotherhood. Evil of a most vicious sort was detected by the watchful eye of the writer, and he knew full well that if suffered to continue and grow, as assuredly it would, utter ruin for the cause he loved would ensue. Therefore he forewarns and denounces the tendency with the spirit and energy of a prophet of Jehovah.

2 Pet opens with the positive statement of Peter’s authorship: “Simon Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ.” The claim to Petrine Authorship is supplied by the opening words, “Simon Peter” (Simon = who has earned). The letter is written to “servant” (2 11). The claim to Petrine Authorship is supplied by the opening words, “Simon Peter” (Simon = who has earned). The letter is written to “servant” (2 11). The real problem of this particular letter is to be found in the variety of its character. It is a letter almost certainly by copying the First Ep. and simply writing, “Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ.” It is probable that Peter may have begun his letter in the Second Ep., but is absent from the First. He designates himself as a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ. “Simon” (Simon = who has earned). The letter is written to “servant” (2 11). But in the Second, a very different condition of things is brought to view. Ungodly men holding degrading principles and practicing shocking immoralities, are threatening to invade the Christian brotherhood. Evil of a most vicious sort was detected by the watchful eye of the writer, and he knew full well that if suffered to continue and grow, as assuredly it would, utter ruin for the cause he loved would ensue. Therefore he forewarns and denounces the tendency with the spirit and energy of a prophet of Jehovah.

8. Doctrinal Teachings of the Epistle—Only some of the more important features of the Ep. are here noticed. If all were treated as they deserve to be, this article would expand into the proportions of a commentary.

The key-word of 1 Pet is Hope; of 2 Pet Knowledge.
The apostle gives to this gift of grace a prominent place (1:2-3:5; 8; 2:20; 3:18). The term he uses is largely in the intensified form, viz., "full knowledge;" that is, knowledge that rests on fact, knowledge that comes to the believer as something supernatural, as being communicated by the Spirit of God, and therefore is true and complete.
The grasping way of grace Peter, for the same reason, should issue in the knowledge of God and of Jesus Our Lord, who has granted unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness through the knowledge of Him. (1:3)

(1) The basis of saving knowledge rests on the "exceeding great and precious promises" which He has made us, and which become ours by faith in Him. It leads us into acquaintance with the righteousness of God.

(2) The growth in true knowledge (1:5-11): "In your faith supply virtue," etc. He does not ask that faith be supplied, that believers already have faith but that faith be strengthened. All the other excellencies and virtues be richly and abundantly furnished. The original word for "supply" is derived from the Gr "chorus," in behalf of the members of the church who supplied all the equipments needed. Peter approving that fact urges Christians to give all diligence to furnish themselves with the gifts and grace he mentions, which are far more needful to the Christian than were the equipments for the ancient circus. See Sence.

What a magnificent cluster Peter here gives! Each springs out of the other: each is strengthened by the other.

(3) Inerrancy of the sources of saving knowledge (1:16-21). The apostle rests his teaching on two trustworthy facts: (a) the fact and meaning of the Saviour's Transfiguration; (b) the fact of the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Taken together these two facts invest his teaching with infallible certainty. "For we did not follow cunningly devised fables, when we were made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eyewitnesses of his majesty." Pagans mythology, so widely prevailing at the time in Asia Minor, indeed over the whole heathen world, was composed of "myths" (Peter's word) skilfully framed and poet embellished. Jewish cabalism, and the wild vagaries springing up in the Christian brotherhood itself had no place in the gospel message nor in apostolic teaching. What Peter and his fellow-disciples taught was the very truth of God, for at the Transfiguration they saw the Deity, the Son of God, they heard the Divine Voice, they beheld the two visitants from the unseen world, Moses and Elijah. Of the majestic scene they were eyewitnesses. Peter adds, "And we have the word of prophecy made sure." The Transfiguration had made the word of prophecy inspired, the prophet's prophecy true in the sense that the future and God's purpose to fill the earth with His glory; every word He has spoken is to be made good.

Moreover, the apostle appeals to the inspiration of the prophets in confirmation of his position. No prophecy of scripture is of private interpretation. For no prophecy of scripture is come by the will of man: but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Spirit. He recognizes this as primary truth, that prophecy is not of one's own invention, nor is it the outpouring of the spirit of the prophet. The prophecy was brought to him, as it is brought to us. Peter and his fellow-believers did not follow "what was said by the prophet for the time being by the Holy Spirit," but "what the Holy Spirit said by the mouth of all the prophets.

Of course in 3 5-13, where the three worlds are spoken of, three globes are not meant, but three vast epochs, three enormous periods in the earth's history. The apostle divides its history into three clearly defined sections, and mentions some of the characteristic features of each.

(1) The old world.—"The world that then was" (3:6): this is his first world. It is the antediluvian world that is meant, the world which the Flood overwhelmed. Scoffers in Peter's time asked, no doubt with a sneer, "Where is the promise of his coming? for, from the day that the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the world." (3:4). This is a surprisingly modern inquiry. The Bible appeals to the continuity of natural processes, and to the inviolability of Nature's laws. Nature keeps her track with unwavering precision. There is no sign of any change; no catastrophe is likely, is possible. The promise of His coming is a hope.

(2) The present world.—Peter's second world is "the heavens that now are, and the earth" (3:7). It is the present order of things in sky and earth that is meant. He asserts that this world is "stored up for fire, being reserved against the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men." The margin reads, "stored with fire," i.e., it contains within itself the agency by which it may be consumed. The world that now is, is held in strict custody, reserved, not for a second deluge, but for fire. The advent of Christ and the judgment are associated in Scripture with fire: "Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him, and shall be very tempestuous round about him." (Ps 50 3 AV; 1sa 66 15.) In the "First Fruits" of Peter's Good Spirit the NT silent on this point: "the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with the angels of his power in flaming fire" (2 Thess 1 7).

Ample materials are stored up in the earth for its consumption by fire. The oil and the gasses so inflammable and destructive in their energy can, when it may please God to release these forces, specially reduce the present order of things to ashes. Peter's language does not signify earth's annihilation, nor its dissolution as an organic body, nor the end of time. He speaks of colossal convulsions and physical revolution of the whole sky and earth, such as shall transform the planet into something glorious and beautiful.

(3) The new world.—The third world is this: "But, according to his promise, we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." (3:13). This is Paradise restored. We have sure ground for the expectation; the last two chapters of Rev contain the prophetic fulfilment: "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea; and the sea is no more." The accomplishment of these sublime predictions will involve a fundamental change in the constitution of the globe. Life would be impossible if the sea was no more. But He who can suspend and control the scheme of things is able to transplant every vestige of sin and misery and imperfection, fitting it for the dwelling of perfect beings and of PETHAHIAH, pē-thā-hi-ə (פֶתֶחִיאָה, pēthah'yāh), “Jehi opens up”:
(1) Chief of the 19th course of priests (1 Ch 24:16).
(2) One of the Levites having “foreign wives” (Ezr 10:23; Neh 9:5; “Patheus” in 1 Esd 8:23).
(3) Son of Meshezabel, descendant of Judah, who was “at the king’s hand in all concerns concerning the people” (Neh 11:24).

PETE, pē-thēr (פֵטֶר, pēthr; Phaetho, Phathoïra, Phathoïra, Bathyora): The dwelling-place of the Israelites situated on “the river” (the Jordan) in the land of Edom.

PETHEOR, pē-thērōr (פֵטֶהוֹר, pēthōr; Phathor, Phathor): Identified with the Pedru(i) of the geographical list of Thanesre III (c. 1300 BC) as the Pithor (Pitru) of the Assyrian kings Shalmaneser II, who states that in his 3rd year (857 BC) he took the city Ana-Assur-u-abat (meaning “I founded [it] anew for Assur”), which the Hittite (Hittites) called Pitu. He says that it lay on the farthest (western) bank of the Euphrates, by the Saqarru or Saqura River, the modern Suqar. The importance of Pitru is indicated by the fact that he received there the tribute of the kings of Carthage, Canaan, Moab, and other districts.

PETHUEL, pē-thū'ēl (פֶתֶוֹל, pēthū'ēl; Petha'il, “God’s opening”): Father of Joel the prophet (Jal 1:1).

PETITION, pē-tish'ōn: Used in EV only as a noun, usually as representing the Heb נאしてください (nā ḫādākāh) (Ps 20:5; נאしてください, mishākādākāh), from the common vb. נא, ḥādāk, “to ask.” The noun, consequently, has no technical meaning, and may be used indiscriminately in the active (Ezr 7:2) or passive (1 S 1:27) sense, or for a petition addressed to either God (1 S 1:17) or man (1 K 2:16), while in Jgs 8:24; Job 6:8; Ps 106:15, it is rendered simply “request.” Otherwise “petition” represents the Aram. נא (be'ā) (Arab. ṣāʾ), Elsewhere מילקת, נא (1 Macc 7:37, ṣāʾ, “supplication”), and the Lat. oratio (2 Esd 8:24). - Burton Scott Easton

PETER, pē'ter. See SOLA.

PEULTHAI, pē-ul'the, PEULLETHAI, pē-ul'the (פֵאלֵת, pē'ul'the, “Jeh’s seed”): One of the “porters,” 5th son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26:5).

PHAATH MOAB, Pāth Moab, Phath Moab, B followed by Swete, Fāth Mūba, Phāthalimōb (1 Esd 5:11); 1 Esd 8:31 [AV “Phath Moab”]. B followed by Swete reads Māthaμōb, Māthāmōb; Fritzsche in both places reads Fāth Moab). One of the families, part of which, consisting of the sons of Jesus and Job 2:512, went up out of captivity with Zerubbabel and Joshua (1 Esd 5:11), and part of which, viz., “Elasians the son of Zarahais and with him 200 men,” went up with Ezra (1 Esd 8:31 = “Phath-moab” of Ezr 2:6; 8:4; [10:30]; and Neh 7:11 [3:11; 10:14]). As the name of a Jewish clan or family the name Phaath or Phath Moab presents difficulties of which explanations are offered, though none is convincing. It is generally taken as “ruler of Moab,” which may refer to the Israelite conquest of Moab in which this family may have distinguished itself, or it may have arisen from the settlement and incorporation of a Moabite family in Heb territory, or from the settlement of an Israelite family in Moabite territory (c. 1 Ch 4:22); or it may be the corruption of some unknown word or name. Instances of such corruption are quite common in these apocryphal Heb proper names. See PATAH-MOAB.

PHACARETH, fak'a-reth (פָקָרֶת, Phakaret), Paharketh, B followed by Swete correctly reads Fāk'-ērēth, Sabēz, together, as a name. A followed by AV reading “sons of Sabæe,” as a distinct family, 1 Esd 5:34: The same as “Pochereth-hazzebahim” of Ezr 2:57.

PHAIRUS, pā'i-rūs, fā'ir-ūr (B, Fawtōp, Phainoor, A, Fawo, Phainoos, Phainoos): Head of one of the families of priests some of whom had taken “strange wives” (1 Esd 9:22) = “Paabher” of Esr 10:22; styled “Phassurus” in 1 Esd 5:25.

PHALEC, fā'lek (Fālēk, Phallek, W, Fālak, Phallek): AV, Gr form of Peleg (thus RV) (Lk 3:35).

PHALLU, fālōō ( פָלַלּוּ, pāllōō): See PALLU.

PHALTIEL, fāl'tēl (פָלַתְיֶל, pāl'tēl). See PALTIT.

PHANUEL, fān'ō-ēl, fan'-ō-ēl (פָנָא-עַל, pān'ā-ō'ēl), “vision of God”; [Fawo, Phanuël]: Parent of Anna (Lk 2:36). See PENIEL.
PHARAKIM, far-a-kim (فاراکیم, Pharakim, Pharakéim, فاراقیم, Pharakim; AV Pharaccim): One of the families of temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 31; not found in Ezra or Neh.).

PHARAOH, far-ō, far-ā-d (فارا‌ه, parōh; פaraoh, Pharaoh; Egyp per aa, "great house"): Many and strange differences of opinion have been expressed concerning the use of this name in Egypt and elsewhere, because of its importance in critical discussions (see below). EB says "a name given to all Egypt kings in the Bible"; it also claims that the name could not have been received by the Hebrews before 1000 BC. HDB (III, 819) says that a letter was addressed to Amenhotep as 'Pharaoh, lord of,' etc. According to Winckler's theory of a North Arabian Musri, it was the Hebrews alone in ancient times who adopted the term Pharaoh from the Egyptians, the name being a combination of Zedekiah even in the Am Tab or anywhere else in cuneiform literature for the king of Egypt. Such a result is obtained according to Winckler's theory by referring every reference in cuneiform to "Fir'u, king of Musri" to the North Arabian country. Egypt inscriptions the term "Pharaoh" occurs from the Pyramid inscriptions onward. At first it is used with distinct reference to its etymology and not clearly as an independent title. Pharaoh, "great house," like Sublime Porte, was applied first as a metaphor to mean the government. But in such an absolute monarchy as Egypt the king was the government, Pharaoh was, by a figure of speech, put for the king. To use Egypt clearly as a title denoting the ruler, whoever he might be, as Caesar among the Romans, Shah among Persians, and Czar among Russians, belongs to a few dynasties probably beginning with the XVIIIth, and certainly ending not later than the XXIst, when we read of Pharaoh Sheshonk, but the Bible does not speak so, but calls him "Shishak king of Egypt" (I K 14 25). This new custom in the use of the title Pharaoh does not appear in the Bible until we have "Pharaoh-nechoh." Pharaoh is certainly in the time of Rameses II, in the "Tale of Two Brothers" (Records of the Past, 1st series, II, 137; Recueil de Travaux, XXI, 13, 1 1). It appears from the preceding that Bib. writers use this word with historical accuracy for the various periods to which it refers, not only for the time of Nechoh and Hophra, but for the time of Rameses II, and use the style of the time of Rameses II for the time of Abraham and Joseph, concerning which we have not certain knowledge of its use in Egypt. It is strongly urged that writers of the 7th or 5th cent. BC would not have been able to make such historical use of this name, while, to a writer at the time of the Exodus, it would have been perfectly natural to use Pharaoh for the king without any further name; and historical writers in the time of the prophets in Pal would likewise have used Pharaoh-nechoh and Pharaoh Hophra. This evidence is not absolutely conclusive for an early authorship of the Pent and historical books, but it is very difficult to give a late authorship (cf. Gen 12 14-29; 41 14; Ex 11 1; 3 11; 1 K 3 1; 14 25; 2 K 23 29; Jer 44 30; also 1 K 11 19; 2 K 18 21; 1 Ch 4 18).

PHARAOH HOPHRA, hóf'ra-hô'á-fra; Osbaat Hophra: He is so called in Scripture (Jer 44 30). He is known on the monuments as Ush'ab'Br 'ra. He was the son of Psammetichus II, whose Gr mercenaries have left inscriptions upon the rocks of Abu-Sim-bel, and in other places. He reigned alone from 589 BC to 570 BC, and jointly, by compulsion of his people, with his son-in-law Aahmes (Gr Amasis) for some years longer. No sooner had he mounted the throne than he was dethroned by the Egyptians in a fierce war and fled to the city of Shechem, which is the capital of Judah, where he was murdered by the captivity of Egypt, they might have killed him and much people, Zedekiah had entered into the intrigue against the advice of Jeremiah, and it proved fatal to Zedekiah and the kingdom. Nebuchadrezzar was not slow to punish the disloyalty of his vassal, and in a brief space his armies were beleaguer ing Jerusalem. The Egyptians did indeed march to the relief of their allies, and the Chaldeans drew off their forces from Jerusalem to meet them. But the Egyptians returned without attempting to meet the Chaldeans in a pitched battle, and Jerusalem was taken, the walls broken down and the temple burnt up with fire.

When Jerusalem fell, and Nebuchadrezzar's governor, Ogad, had been assassinated, the dispirited remnant of Judah, against the advice of Jeremiah, fled into Egypt, carrying the prophet with them. They settled at Tahpanhes, then Daphnae (modern Tell Deir el-Derek), now identified with a mound bearing the significant name of Kot Bint el Yahudi, "the palace of the Jew's daughter." Here Pharaoh had a palace, for Jeremiah took great stores and hid them in mortar in the brickwork which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house at Tahpanhes, and prophesied that Nebuchadrezzar would spread his royal pavilion over them (Jer 43 8-13). The Pharaoh of that day was Hophra, and when the fortress of Tahpanhes was discovered and cleared in 1886, the open-air platform before the entrance was found. "Here the ceremony described by Jeremiah took place before the chief of the fugitives assembled on the platform, and here Nebuchadrezzar spread his royal pavilion. The very nature of the site is precisely applicable to all the events" (Flinders Petrie, Nebuchadnezzar and Deir el-Derek, 51). It was in 586 BC that the prophecy was fulfilled when Nebuchadrezzar marched into the Delta.

More recently, in 1909, in the course of excavations carried on by the British School of Archaeology in Egypt, the palace of King Nebuchadrezzar was discovered on the site of Memphis, the ancient capital of Egypt, which is now the grey mud hill, close to the squalid Arab village. of Mitrokhenni, which every tourist passes on the way to Sakkara, had lain for centuries Hophra's magnificent palace, 400 ft. long by 200 ft., with a splendid pylon, an immense court, and stone-lined halls, of which seven have been found intact. With many other objects of value there was found a fitting of a palanquin of solid silver, decorated with a bust of Hathor with a gold face. It is said to be of the finest workmanship of the time of Apries, a relic of the fire, which, Jeremiah predicted at Tahpanhes, the Lord of Hosts was to kindle "in the houses of the gods of Egypt." (Jer 43 12).

Pharaoh Hophra, as Jeremiah prophesied (44 29 f), became the victim of a revolt and was finally slain.

PHARAOH-NECOH, nɛ'kɔ (723-722), par'oh rekho, also νέκων, Nekos (2 K 23 29). He is commonly represented as a Pharaoh of the 22nd dynasty. His calendar year 233 is the 2 Ch 35 22; 36 4, AV Necho, 1. Pharaoh-Necho, NECO; 2 K 23 29, 2 Ch 35 22; 36 4, AV Necoh, 610-600 BC. No monuments—Gr Nekos—was the 24th king of the XXVth dynasty, being the son of Psammetichus I, famous in Gr contemporary history as the 21st king. After his death, many monuments in the Lower and Upper Egypt (Herod. ii.153, 158, 169). The great event of his reign (610-594 BC) was his expedition across Syria to secure for himself a share in the decaying empire of Assyria. In the days of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, Egypt had been tributary to Assyria, and, when it began to break up, Egypt and other subject kingdoms saw their opportunity to throw off its yoke. Psammetichus had turned back the Syrian hordes which had reached his border on their western march, and now his son Necoh was to make a bold stroke for empire.

On his expedition toward the East, he had to pass through the territory of Judah, and he desired to have Josiah as his ally. 2. Battle of Megiddo. Whatever may have been his reasons, Josiah remained loyal to his Assyrian overlord, 608 BC. The last mark of respect, he showed towards the army of Egypt, the Pharaoh was wounded and soon after died amid the lamentations of his people. Necoh marched northward, captured Kadesh, and pressed on to the Egyptian fortifications. Not having met an enemy there, he seems to have turned back and established himself for a time at Riblah in Syria. To Riblah he summoned Jehoahaz whom the people had anointed king in room of his father Josiah, deposed him after a brief reign of 3 months, and set his brother Jehoiakim on the throne as vassal of Egypt. Jehoiakim paid up the tribute of a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold which Necoh had imposed upon the land, but he recovered it by exactions which he made from the people (2 K 23 35).

That expedition which still keeps some hold upon Syria, and his presence there had attracted the attention of the newly established Pharaoh-necoh at Carcchemish, under Nebuchadrezzar set out for the 604 BC. Euphrates, and, meeting the army of Pharaoh-necoh at Carcchemish, invaded upon him a signal defeat. The Chaldeans were now undisputed masters of Western Asia, and the sacred historian relates that "the king of Egypt came not again any more out of his land; for the king of Babylon had taken, from the brook of Egypt unto the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt" (2 K 24 7).

While Pharaoh-necoh II was ambitious to extend his empire, he was bent also upon the commercial development of Egypt. For this he had commercial De- two fleets built, composed of triremes, velvement one of them to navigate the Mediter- ranean, the other to navigate the Red Sea. In order to secure a combination of his fleets, he conceived the idea of reopening the canal between the Nile and the Red Sea which had been originally constructed by Seti I and Rameses II, two Pharaohs of the days of the Israel- ite oppression, but had become silted up by desert sands. He excavated this old canal, following the line of the former cutting, and widening it so that two triremes might meet and pass each other in it. According to Herodotus he was obliged to desist from the undertaking in consequence of the mortality among the laborers, and it was left to Darius to complete. He also resolved to try whether it was possible to circumnavigate Africa, and, marching his ships with Phoenician sailors, he sent them forth with instructions to keep the coast of Africa on their right and to return to Egypt by way of the Mediterranean. They succeeded in the "Pharaoh's harbor" of Cape Good Hope from the East, anticipated by two millenniums the feat which Vasco da Gama accomplished from the West. The enterprise took more than two years, and the result of it was no practical value. Herodotus, the "Pharaoh" of 450 BC, saw still remaining the docks which Necoch had built for the accommodation of his fleet.

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER (υμής, bath- par'oh): The princess who rescued Moses (Ex 2 5-10; He 11 24). This is probably a title as well as an appellation, indicating not only one of the daughters of a Pharaoh, but also some very distinguished rank, thought to be most probably that of the heir to the throne by birth; though she was debarred from reigning by reason of sex, she still possessed the right to entail the scepter and crown to her oldest son. Positive identification of the "daughter of Pharaoh" mentioned in the Bible is not possible yet. All attempts toward identification are, of course, guided by the particular theory of the oppressor accepted. If the Pharaoh of the Oppression was Rameses II, as is most likely, then Pharaoh's daughter was probably the daughter of Seti I, an older sister of Rameses II. If, as many think, the Pharaoh of the Oppression was Thothmes III, then Pharaoh's daughter was some unknown princess. Some have thought she was Hatashep, the "Queen Elizabeth of Egypt." M. G. Kjel

PHARATHON, far'-a-thon (Φαράθων, Pharathon): One of the strong cities of Judaea fortified by Bac- chides during the Maccabean war (1 Macc 9 50). LXX reads "Thamatha-pharathon" as the name of one city. Jos, however (Ant, XIII, i, 3), and Syr supply the "and" between them. The name represents a Heb pārāthôn. It is not if it was taken strictly as in Judaean territory, it cannot be identified with Pharathon (q.v.) of Jgs 18 15. In that case we should probably seek for it Smith in some fortress covering the top of Wady Farah. W. Ewing

PHARIDA, פַּרְיָדָא (חאַרְיָדָא, PHAREIDÁ, A, פָּרְיָדָא, PHARIDÁ; AV Pharira): The clan name of one of the families of "the servants of Solomon" who came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 30) as "Peruda" of Ex 2 25 = "Perida" of Neh 7 57.

PHARIRA, פַּרְיָרָא: AV=RV PHARIDA (q.v.).

In considering the characteristics and doctrines of the Pharisees we are in some difficulty from the nature of our authorities. The writers
2. Authorities of the NT assume generally that the character and tenets of the Pharisees are well known to their readers, and only lay stress on the points in which they were in antagonism to Our Lord and his followers. The evidence of Jos, a contemporary and himself a Pharisee, is lessened in value by the fact that he modified his account of his people to suit the taste of his Roman masters. The Pharisees, with him, are a philosophic sect, and not an association of priests whose Messianic hopes are not so much as mentioned. Although the Talm was written, both Mish and Gemara, by the descendants of the Pharisees, the fact that the Gemara, from which most of our information is derived, is so late renders the evidence deduced from Talmudic statements of little value. Even the Mish, which came into being only a century after the fall of the Jewish state, shows traces of exaggeration and modification of facts. Still, taking these differences into consideration, we may make a fairly consistent picture of the sect. The name means "separatists," from פָּרָשָׁה, pârashah, "to separate"—those who carefully kept themselves from any legal contamination, distinguishing themselves by their care in such matters from the common people, the 'am ha-arets, who had fewer scruples. Like the Puritans in England during the 17th cent., and the Presbyterians in Scotland during the same period, the Pharisees, although primarily a religious party, became ere long energetically political. They were a closely organized society, all the members of which called each other ḥîbbêrim, "neighbors," this added to the power they had through their influence with the people.

I. History of the Sect.—The Assidæans (ḥâsg-dhim) were at first the most active supporters of Judas Maccabæus in his struggle for religious freedom. A portion of them rather than the latter retired to the desert to escape the tyranny of Epiphanes (1 Macc 2 27 i). The followers of these in later days became the Essenes. When Judas Maccabæus cleansed the temple and rededicated it with many sacrifices, it is not expressly said, either in the Books of Macc or by Jos, that he acted as high priest, but the probability is that he did so. This would be a shock to the Assidæan purists, as Judas, though a priest, was not a Zedókité; but his actions would be tolerated at that time on account of the imminent necessity for the work of reorganization and the eminent services of Judas himself and his family.

When Baccæus appeared against Jesus with Alcimus in his camp, this feeling against Judas took shape in receiving the treacherous Alcimus into Jesus and acknowledging him as high priest, a line of action which soon showed that it was fraught with disaster, as Alcimus murdered many of the people and became the head of the sect of the Pharisees, Sadducæans and Essenes, therefore implying that then and in connection with this they had been prominent, although no notice of any of these parties is to be found that confirms this view. Later (II Macc 12), the Pharisees are represented as envious of the success of John Hyrcanus; Eleazar, one of them, insults him at his own table. From the fact that earlier in the history the Assidæans occupy a similar place to that occupied later by the Pharisees, it may be deduced that the two parties are in a measure one. See HASMONEANS; ASSONEANS. It would seem that not only the Pharisees, but also the Essenes, were derived from the Assidæans or ḥîbbêrim.

In considering the characteristics and doctrines of the Pharisees we are in some difficulty from the nature of our authorities. The writers
2. Authorities of the NT assume generally that the character and tenets of the Pharisees are well known to their readers, and only lay stress on the points in which they were in antagonism to Our Lord and his followers. The evidence of Jos, a contemporary and himself a Pharisee, is lessened in value by the fact that he modified his account of his people to suit the taste of his Roman masters. The Pharisees, with him, are a philosophic sect, and not an association of priests whose Messianic hopes are not so much as mentioned. Although the Talm was written, both Mish and Gemara, by the

The Puritans of the 17th cent. became in the 19th
"Non-conformists." The earliest instance of the Pharisees' intervening in history is that of
2. Change of Name where Eleazar, a Pharisee, demanded that John Hyrcanus should lay down the high-priesthood because his mother had been a captive, thus insinuating that he—Hyrcanus—was no true son of Aaron, but the bastard of some ameless heathen to whom his mother had surrendered herself. This unforgivable insult to himself and to the memory of his mother led Hyrcanus to break with the Pharisaic party definitely. He seems to have left them severely thenceforth.
The sons of Hyrcanus, esp. Alexander Janneaus, expressed their hostility in a more active way.
3. Later Fortunes of the Sect seems to intimate overt acts of hostility on their part which prompted this action. His whole policy was the aggrandizement of the Jewish state, but his ambition was greater than his military abilities. His repeated failures and defeats confirmed the Pharisees in their conception of him on religious grounds.
They scandalized them by calling himself king, although not of the Davidic line, and further still by adopting the heathen name "Alexander," and having it stamped in Gr characters on his coins. Although a high priest he was forbidden to marry a woman, he married the widow of his brother. Still further, he incurred their opposition by abandoning the Pharisaic tradition as to the way in which the libation water was poured out. They retaliated by rousing his people against him and conspiring with the Syrian king.
On his deathbed he advised his wife, Alexandra Salome, who succeeded him on the throne, to make peace with the Pharisees. This she did by throwing herself entirely into their hands. On her death a struggle for the possession of the throne and the high-priesthood began between her two sons, John Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II. The latter, the more able and energetic, had the support of the Sadducees; the former, the elder of the two brothers, had that of the Pharisees. In the first phase of the conflict, Hyrcanus was defeated and compelled to make a disadvantageous peace with his brother, but, urged by Antipater, the Idumean, he called in Aretas, who inclined the balance at once to the Pharisees. The Jews, however, were apathetic, and they also, moved partly by the astuteness of Antipater, favored Hyrcanus. All this resulted ultimately in the supremacy of the Herodians, who through their subservience to Rome became incidental to the Pharisees and rivals of the Sadducees.

When the NT records open, the Pharisees, who have supreme influence among the people, are also strong, though not predominant, in the Sanhedrin. The Herodians and Sadducees, the one by their alliance with the Rom authorities, and the other by their inherited skill in political intrigue, held the reins of government. If we might believe the Talmudic representation, the Pharisees were in the immense majority in the Sanhedrin; the jubel, or president, and the 'abh-beth-din, or vice-president, both were Pharisees. This, however, is to be put to the credit of Talmudic imagination, the relation of which to facts is of the most distant kind.

Recently Böchler ('Das grosse Synodenum in Jesus') has attempted to harmonize those Talmudic fables with the aspect of things appearing in the NT and Jos. He assumes that two heathen philosophers had to do with matters of government, in which the Sadducees were overwhelmingly predominant, and the other sect, in which the Pharisees were equally predominant—the one the Senate of the nation, like the Senate of the United States, the other the Senate of a university. Both say of Jesus that he was rejected by Rabbi Lauterbach in the Jew Enc, this attempt cannot be regarded as successful. There is no evidence for this dualism in the NT or Jos, on the one hand, or in the Talm on the other.

Outside the Sanhedrin the Pharisees are ubiquitous, in Jerusalem, in Galilee, in Perea and in the Decapolis, always coming in contact with Jesus.

He was in contact with certain of the Pharisaic writers to exonerate them from the guilt of the condemnation of our Lord has no foundation; it is contricted by the NT records, and the attitude of the Talm to Jesus.
The Pharisees appear in the Book of Acts to be in a latent way favorers of the apostles as against the high-priestly party. The personal influence of Gamaliel, which seems commanding, was exercised in their favor. The anti-Christian seal of Saul the Tarsian, though a Pharisee, may have been to some extent the result of the personal feelings which led him to perpetuate the relations of the earlier period when the two sects were united in common antagonism to the teaching of Christ.
He, a Pharisee, offered himself to be employed by the Sadducean high priest (Acts 9 1 2) to carry on the work of persecution in Damascus. In this action Saul appears to have been in opposition to a large section of the Pharisaic party. The bitter disputes which he and the other Pharisees had had carried on with Stephen had possibly influcenced him.

When Paul, the Christian apostle, was brought before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem, the Pharisaic party were numerous in the Synagogue, but 5. In Post-

aphoric Times did not even form the majority, and apostolic they readily became his defenders against the Sadducees.

From Jos we learn that with the outbreak of the war with the Romans the Pharisees were thrust into the background by the more fanatical Zealots, Simon ben Gioras and John of Gischala (BJ, v, i). The truth behind the Talmudic statements that Gamaliel removed the Sanhedrin to Jabneh and that Johanan ben Zakkai successfully entreated Vespasian to spare the scholars of that city is that the Pharisees in considerable numbers made peace with the Romans. In the Mish we have the evidence of their later labors when the Sanhedrin was removed from Jabneh, called Tiberias, to Galilee. There under the guidance of Jehuda ha-Kadhosh ("the Holy") the Mish was reduced to writing. It may thus be said that Judaism became Pharisaic, and the history of the Jews became that of the Pharisees. In a later period the opposition to Christianity sprang up anew and became embittered, as may be seen in the Talmudic fables concerning Jesus.

II. Doctrines of the Pharisees.—The account given of the doctrines of the Pharisees by Jos is clearly influenced by his desire to parallel the Jewish sects with the Gr philosophical schools. He directs especial attention to the Pharisaic ideas colored by opinion as to fate and free will, since on this point the Stoic and Epicurean sects differed very emphatically. He regards the Pharisaic position as midway between that of the Sadducees, who denied fate altogether and made human freedom absolute, and that of the Stoics that "all things are in the hand of God." He says "The Pharisees ascribe all things to fate and God, yet allow that to do what is right or the contrary is principally in man's own power." He further says that "civil, holy, or Pharisaic, the Pharisees were equally predominant—"the one, the Senate of the nation. Like the fatum, "something decreed," than in relation to the impersonal moira, or heimarmene, of the Greeks. As Jos wrote in Gr and used only the second of these terms, he had no philological inducement to make the identification; the reason must have been the matter of fact. In other words, he shows that the Pharisees believed in a personal God whose will was provided. In connection with this was their doctrine of a future life of rewards and punishments. The phrase which Jos uses is a peculiar one: "They think that every soul is immortal; only the souls of good men will pass into another body, but the souls of the evil shall suffer everlasting punishment" (aidía tímória kaló̂deẑhetai). From this it has been deduced that the Pharisees held the transmigration of souls. In our opinion this is a mistake. We believe that really it is an attempt of Jos to state the doctrine of the resurrection of the body in a way that would not shock Hellenic ideas. The Gr contempt for the body made the idea of the resurrection abhorrent, and in this, as in most philosophical matters, the Romans followed the Greeks. It would seem that Jos regarded the Pharisees as maintaining that this resurrection applied only to the righteous. Still even this restriction, though certainly the natural interpretation, is not absolutely necessary. This is confirmed by the section in Josephus Antiquities (XVIII, i, 3): "They also believe . . . that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life, and the latter are to be destined in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again." Jos also declares the Pharisees to be very attentive students of the law of God: "they interpret the law with careful exactitude."

Nothing in the Gospels or the Acts at all militates against any part of this representation, but there is much to fill it out. They believed in

3. NT Presentment of angels and spirits (Acts 23 8). From the connection it is probable that the present activity of such beings was the question in the mind of the writer. In that same sentence belief in the resurrection is ascribed to the Pharisees.

Another point is that to the bare letter of the Law they added traditions. While the existence of these traditions is admitted to in the Gospels, too little is said to enable us to form a just estimate of them.

4. Traditions Added to their nature and extent (Mt. to the Law 16 2 ff.; 16 5 ff.; Mk 7 1-23). The evangelists only recorded these traditional glosses when they conflicted with the teaching of Christ and were therefore denounced by Him. We find them exemplified in the Mish. The Pharisaic theory of tradition was that these additions to the written law and interpretations of it had been given by Moses to the elders and by them had been transmitted orally down through the ages. The classical passage in the Mish is to be found in Pirke 'Abhùth: "Moses received the [oral] Law from Sinai and delivered it to Joshua and Josua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets and the prophets to the men of the congregation." Additions to these traditions were made by prophets by direct inspiration, or by interpretation of the words of the written Law. All this mass, as related above, was reduced to writing by Jehuda ha-Kadîshoh in Tébaris, probably about the end of the 2d cent. AD. Jehuda was born, it is said, 135 AD, and died somewhere about 220 AD.

The related doctrines of the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and the final judgment with its consequent eternal rewards and punishments formed a portion and a valuable portion of this tradition.

5. Traditions—Less valuable, at times burdensome and burdensome to the Pharisees, was the precept of the Law by the Law. Sometimes the ingenuity of the Pharisaic doctors directed the Pharisees was the precept of the Law by the Pharisees, when they were led to regard the Sabbath. Thus a person was permitted to go much farther than a Sabbath-day's journey if at some time previous he had departed within the prescribed journey of the place he wished to reach, bread and water being included. This person was now to count the days of his house, and consequently from this all distances were to be ceremonially reckoned (Jens Ene. a. w. 'Erub"). The great doctors of the Pharisaic school, like Gau-los, make the whole of their system purely external. An act was right or wrong according to some external condition was present or absent; thus there was a difference in bestowing aims on the Sabbath whether the beggar put his hand within the door of the donor or the donor stretched his hand beyond his own threshold, as may be seen in the first Mish in the Talmud. Thus the Pharisaic theory of almsgiving: A man who has an alms-rest of his ass, though he rode on it, and hence did not break the Sabbath law, but if he carried a switch with which to expedite the pace of the beast he was guilty, because he had laid a burden upon it.

Along with these traditions and traditional interpretations, the Pharisees were close students of the sacred text. On the turn of a sentence they suspended many decisions. So much so, that it is said of them that they suspended mountains from their hair.

6. Close Students of the Text of Scripture. The Pharisees were the chief expositors of the Law. A specimen of Pharisaic exegesis which Paul turns against his followers as an argumentum e contrario may be seen in Gal 3 16: "He saith not, And to seeds, as of one, but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."

(1) Messianic hopes.—It is also to be said for them, that they maintained the Messianic hopes of the nation when their rivals were ready to sacrifice everything to the Romans, in order to gain greater political influence for themselves. Their imagination ran riot in the pictures they drew of these future times, but still they aided the faith of the people who were thus in a position to listen to the claims of Christ. They were led by Rabbi Aqeb in the reign of Hadrian to accept Bar-Cocbaeh about a century after they had rejected Jesus. They were fanatical in their obedience to the Law as they understood it, and died under untold tortures rather than transgress.

(2) Almsgiving.—They elevated almsgiving into an equivalent for righteousness. This gave poverty a very different place from what it had in Greece or among the Romans. Learning was honored, although its possessors might be very poor. The early life of Hillel brings this out. He is represented as being so poor as to be unable sometimes to pay the small daily fee which admitted pupils to the rabbinic school, and when this happened, in his eagerness for the Law, he is reported to have listened on the roof to the words of the teachers. This is probably not historically true, but it exhibits the Pharisaic ideal.

III. Organization of the Pharisaic Party.—We have no distinct account of this organization, either in the Gospels or in Jos. But the close relationship which the members of the sect sustained to each other, their habit of united action as exhibited in the narratives of the NT and of Jos are thus most naturally explained. The Talmudic account of the "Héheru" affords representation of this kind. These were persons who primarily associated for the study of the Law and for the better observance of its precepts. No one was admitted to these hâ-bôhêrth without taking an oath of fidelity to the society and a promise of strict observance of Levitical precepts.

One of the elements of their promise has to be noted. Theôbôhêrth (Pharisee) is not to pay money, "tithe," or trûmâh, "heave offering," to a priest who does not belong to their community. They were only permitted to take this oath when their associates in the brotherhood certified to their right of including the candidate. He had to pass through a period of probation of 30 days, according to later "house of Shammai," of a year, according to the "house of Shammah." This latter element, being quite more Talmudic, may be regarded as doubtful. Further exclusion of a person not belonging to the Pharisaic society was put under numerous restrictions. It is at least not improbable that when the lawyer in Lk 10:29 demanded "Who is my neighbor?" he was muted to restrict the instances of the command in Lev 19:18 to those who, like himself, Pharisees, a society which thus had brotherhoods all over Pal and was separated from the rest of the community would naturally wield formidable power when their claims were supported by the esteem of the people at large. It is to be observed that to be a bôhêrth was a purely personal thing, not heritable like priesthood, and women as well as men might be members. In this the Pharisees were like the Christians in another matter also there was a resemblance between them and the followers of Jesus; they, unlike the Moslems, were more eager to receive proselytes. Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte! (Mt 23:15). Many members of Rom society, esp. women, were received as, for instance, Poppaea Sabina.

IV. Character of the Pharisees.—Because the ideal of the Pharisees was high, and because they reverenced learning and character above wealth and civil rank, they had a tendency to despise those who did not agree with them. We see traces of this in the Gospels; thus Jn 7:49: "This multitude that knoweth not the law are accursed." The distinction between the Pharisees, the Puritans and the 'am hâ-ârêc, "the people of the land," was one of the oldest, that had to be kept between the Jews and the Gentiles who had entered the land as colonists or intruders. These would, during the Bab captivity, almost certainly speak Western Aram., and would certainly be heathen and indulge in heathen practices. They were "the people of the land" whom the returning exiles found in possession of Judaea.

Mingled with them were the few Jews that had neither been killed nor deported by the Babylonians, nor carried down into Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, the sons of Kareth. All they had confounded in a large measure to the habits of their heathen neighbours and intermarried with them, the stricter Jews, as Ezra and Nehemiah, regarded them as under the same condemnation as the heathen, and shrank from association with them. During the time of our Lord's life on earth the name was practically restricted to the ignorant Jews whose conformity to the law was on a broader scale than that of the Pharisees. Some have, however, dated the invention of the name later in the days of the Maccabean struggle, when the ceremonial precepts of the Law could with difficulty be observed. Those who were less careful of these were regarded as 'am hâ-ârêc.

The distinction as exhibited in the Talm shows an arrogance on the part of the Pharisaic bôhêrth that must have been galling to those who, though Jews as much as the Pharisees, were not Puritans like them. The people of the land, a bôhêrth, might not eat at the table of a man whose wife was of the 'am hâ-ârêc, even though her husband might be a Pharisee. If he would be a full bôhêrth, a Pharisee must not sell to any of the 'am hâ-ârêc and this would probably be true of all religion. If a woman of the 'am hâ-ârêc was left alone in a room, all that she could touch without moving from her place was unclean. We must, however, bear in mind that the evidence for this is Talmudic, and therefore of but limited historical value.

(1) Their scrupulosity.—We find traces of this scrupulosity in the Gospels. The special way in which the ceremonial sanctity of the Temple is kept in the New Testament is a reflection of the Pharisaic scrupulosity.

4. The NT. Pharisees exhibited itself was in tithing, hence the reference to their tithing and the phrase "sadducean and hypocrite" (Mt 23:3). In the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, one of the things that the Pharisee prides himself on is that he gives tithes of all that he possesses (Lk 18:12). He is an example of the Pharisaic arrogance of those "who trusted they were righteous and despised others at nought." Their claiming the first seats in feasts and synagogues (Mt 23:6) was an evidence of the same spirit.

(2) Their hypocrisy.—Closely akin to this is the hypocrisy of which the Pharisees were accused by Our Lord. When we call them "hypocrites," we must go back to the primary meaning of the word. They were essentially "actors," poseurs. Good men, whose character and spiritual force have impressed themselves on their generation, have often peculiarities of manner and tone which are easily imitated. In the case of the Pharisees, those who are held by their disciples leads those who respect them to adopt unconsciously their mannerisms of voice and deportment. A later generation unconsciously imitates, "acts the part." In a time when religion is persecuted, as in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, or despised as it was in the Hellenizing times which preceded and succeeded, it would be the duty of religious men not to hide their convictions. The tendency to carry on this public manifestation of religious acts after it had ceased to be protest would be necessarily great. The fact that they gained credit by praying at street corners when the hour of prayer came, and would have lost credit with the people had they not done so, was not recognized by them as lessening the moral worth of the act. Those who, having lived in the period of persecution and contempt, survived in that when religion was held in respect would maintain their earlier practice without any arrière-pensée. The succeeding generation, in continuing the practice, conscientiously, as it were, "went in his steps." They have hypocrisy was none the less real that it was reached by unconscious stages. Hypocrisy was a new sin, a sin only possible in a spiritual religion, a religion in which morality and worship were closely related. Heathenism, which lay in sacrifice, through which the gods could be bribed, or cajoled into favors, had a purely casual connection with morality; its worship was entirely a thing of externals, of acting, "posing." Consequently, a man did not by the most careful attention to the ceremonies of religion produce any presumption in favor of his trustworthiness. There was thus no sinister motive to prompt to religion. The prophets had denounced the insincerity of worship, but even they did not pronounce a condemnation. They fixed a term of reproach or dishonesty. Religion had become more spiritual, the connection between morality and worship more intimate by reason of the persecution of the Seleucids.

The Talm to some extent confirms the representation of the Gospel. There were said to be seven classes of Pharisees: (1) the "shoulder" Pharisee, who wears his good deeds on his shoulders; (2) the "preceptor" Pharisee who places the precepts of the Law, using his own principle, but not expediency; (2) the "reader" or "scribe" Pharisees who read time in order to perform a meritorious action; (3) the "bleeding" Pharisee, who does not stop to examine himself, but a woman shuts his eyes and so bruises himself to bleeding by stumbling against a wall; (4) the "painted" Pharisee, who adorns his holiness, but any one should touch him so that he should be defiled: (5) the "reckoning" Pharisee, who is always saying "What duty must I do to balance any unpleasant duty which I have neglected?:" (6) the "fearing" Pharisee, whose relative to God is one merely of trembling awe: (7) the Pharisee from "love," but the last there was an element of "acting," of hypocrisy. Its author, who, according to Josephus, said that the Talmud denounced ostentation; but unconsciously that cost of the Maccabees to its adherents: it commands a avoidance of ostentation which involves equal "posing."

V. Our Lord's Relationship to the Pharisees.—The attitude of the Pharisees to Jesus, to begin with, was* not that of the people, as had been their attitude towards John, critical. They sent representatives to watch His doings and His efforts to sayings and report. They seem to have regarded it as possible that He might unite Himself with them, although, as we think, His affinities rather lay with the Essenes. Gradually their criticisms became opposition. This opposition grew in intensity as He disregarded their interpretations of the Subhatic law, ridiculed their refinements of the law of tithes and the distinctions they introduced into the validity of oaths, and denounced their insincere posing. At first there seems to have been an effort to cajole Him into compliance with their demands of the Pharisaic temple. Not to 1. Pharisees try to use language which would compromise Him with the people or with the Rom authorities, others invited Him to their tables, which was going far upon the part of a Pharisee toward one not a hābber. Even when He hung on the cross, the taunt with which they greeted Him may have had something of longing, lingering hope in it: "If he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him" (Mt 27 42 AV). If He would only give them that sign, then they would acknowledge Him to be the Messiah.

The opposition of the Pharisees to Jesus was intensified by another reason. They were the democratic party; their whole power lay in the reputation they had with the people for piety. Our Lord denounced them as hypocrites; moreover He had secured a deeper popularity than theirs.

At length when cajolery failed to win Him and susto question failed to destroy His popularity and with their opponents, the Sadducees, against Him as against a common enemy.

On the other hand, Jesus denounced the Pharisees more than He denounced any other class of the people. This seems strange when we remember that the majority of the religious people, those who looked for the Messiah, belonged to the Pharisees, and His teaching and theirs had a strong external resemblance. It was this external resemblance, united as it was with a profound spiritual difference, which made it incumbent on Jesus to mark Himself off from them. All righteousness with them was external, it lay in meats and drinks and divers washings, in tithing of light, anise and cummin. He placed religion in a different footing, removed it into another region. With Him it was the heart that must be right with God, not merely the external actions; not only the outside of the cup and platter was to be cleansed, but the inside first of all. It is observed above, the Pharisees were less antagonistic to the apostles when their Lord had left them. The after-history of Pharisaism has justified Our Lord's condemnation.

(3) Father of Joiada (AV "Jehozada"), the repairer of the "old gate" in Jer 3 6).

PHASELIS, fa-sē'lis (Φασσίλης, Phaselis): A city of Lycia in Southern Asia Minor, on the seacoast, near the boundary of Pamphylia, to which country some ancient writers have assigned it. Situated on the extreme end of a promontory which projects into the sea, and with high mountains in the rear, it was separated both politically and geographically from the rest of Lycia. Hence it may be understood how it early became the favorite haunt of pirates probably already in the 6th cent. BC, when trade was carried on with Egypt, the city struck coins of its own; upon them the prow and the stern of a war galley were commonly represented. The coined ceased in 466 BC, but it was resumed about 400 BC when the city again became politically independent. For some time Phaselis was under the control of the Seleucid kings of Syria, but in 190 BC it again regained its independence or continued as a member of the league of Lycian cities (1 Mac 15 23). Before the beginning of the Christian era it had lost considerably of its earlier importance, yet it was still famed for its temple of Athene in which it was said that the sword of Achilles was preserved, and also for the altar of roses which was produced. It figures little in early Christian history, yet in Byzantine times it was the residence of a bishop. Its site, now marked by the ruins of the stadium, temples and theater, bears the Turkish name of Tekir Ova. See also LYCIA.

PHASIRON, fas'ir-on (A, φασιρών, Phasirôn, B, Φασιρῶν, Phasirōn, V, φασιρῶν, Pharison): The name of an unknown Arab tribe whom Jonathan overcame in the wilderness near Bethshean, or possibly the name of an Arab chief (1 Mac 9 66).

PHICOL, φικόλ (Phicol, Phikol). AV Phichol: The captain of the host of the Phil king Abimelech of Gerar (Gen 21:22; 25:26).

PHILADELPHIA, φιλαδελφία (Philadelphia). A city of ancient Lydia in Asia Minor. It was 105 miles from Smyrna. It stood upon a terrace 650 ft. above the sea. Behind it are the volcanic cliffs to which the Turks have given the name of Devitt, or "inkwelle"; on the other side of the city the land is exceedingly fertile, and there was produced a wine of whose excellence the celebrated Rom poet Virgil wrote. Philadelphia is not so ancient as many of the other cities of Asia Minor, for it was founded after 189 BC on one of the highways which led to the interior. Its name was given to it in honor of Attalus II, because of his loyalty to his elder brother, Eumenes II, king of Lydia. Still another name of the city was Decapolis, because it was considered as one of the ten cities of the plain. A third name which it bore during the 1st cent. AD was Neo-kaisaria; it appears upon the coins struck during that period. During the reign of Vespasian, it was called Flavia. Its modern name, Alad-hehir, is considered by some to be a corruption of the Turkish words Allah-hehir, "the city of God," but more likely it is a name given it from the reddish color of the soil. In addition to all these names it sometimes bore the title of "Little Athens" because of the magnificence of the temples and other public buildings which adorned it. Philadelphia quickly became an important and wealthy trade center, for as the coast cities declined, it grew in power, and retained its importance even until late Byzantine times. One of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev 3:7. It was there in the seal as the seat of a bishop. As in most Asia Minor cities, many Jews lived there, and they possessed a synagogue. During the reign of Tiberius the city was destroyed by an earthquake, yet it was quickly rebuilt. Frederick Barbarossa entered it while on his crusade in 1190. Twice, in 1206 and 1224, it was besieged by the Seljuk Turks, but it retained its independence until after 1390, when it was captured by the combined forces of the Turks and Byzantines. In 1403 Tamerlane captured it, and it is said, built about it a wall of the corpses of his prisoners. Alad-hehir is still a Christian town; one-fourth of its modern population is Greek, and a Gr bishop still makes his home there. One of the chief modern industries is a liquorice factory; in the fields about the city the natives dig for the roots. On the terrace upon which the ancient city stood, the ruins of the castle and the walls may still be seen, and among them is pointed out the foundation of the early church. The place may now best be reached by rail from Smyrna. E. J. BANKS

PHILARES, φιλαρές. See PHYLARES.

PHILEMON, φίλεμων, φιλέμων (Philémon, Philemon): Among the converts of St. Paul, perhaps while at Ephesus, was one whom he calls a "fellow-worker," Philemon (Phil 1:2). He was probably a man of some means, was celebrated for his hospitality (vs 5, 7) and of considerable importance in the ecclesia at Colossae. It was at his house (ver 2) that the Colossian Christians met as a center. It is more than probable that this was a group of the Colossian church rather than the entire ecclesia. His wife was named Apphia (ver 2); and Archippus (ver 2) was no doubt his son. From Col 4:17 we learn that Archippus held an office of some importance in Colossae, whether he was a presbyter (Abbott, ICC), or an evangelist, or perhaps the reader (Zahn), we cannot tell. He is called here (ver 2) St. Paul's "fellow-soldier." The relationship between the Colossians and Philemon was so close and intimate that St. Paul does not hesitate to press him, on the basis of it, to forgive his slave, Onesimus, for stealing and for running away. See PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.

Tradition makes Philemon the bishop of Colossae (Apos Const, vii, 46), and the Gr Martyrology (Menae) for November 22 tells us that he together with his wife and son and Onesimus were martyred by stoning before Androcles, the governor, in the days of Nerva, Wied a writer of a treatise on martyrs agrees (of Lightfoot, St. Ignatius, III, 535). This evidence, however, is unsatisfactory and cannot be trusted as giving unquestionable facts as to Philemon. The only sure information is that in the ep. bearing his name.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO: This most beautiful of all St. Paul's Ep., and the most intensely human, is one of the so-called Captivity Epp. of which Eph, Col, and Phil are the others. Of these four Phils (qv.) stand apart, and was written more probably after the other three. These are mutually interdependent, sent by the same bearer to churches of the same district, and under similar conditions. There is some diversity of opinion as to the place from which the apostle wrote the letter. Certain scholars (Reuss, Schenkel, Weiss, 1. Place of Holtzmann, Hülgenfeld, Hausrat and Meyer) have urged Caesarea in opposition to the traditional place, Rome. The arguments advanced are first that Onesimus would have been more likely to have escaped to Caesarea than to Rome, as it is nearer Colossae than Rome is, to which we may reply that, though Caesarea is nearer, his chance of escape would have been far greater in the capital than in the provincial city. Again it is said that as Onesimus is not commended in Eph, he had already been left behind at Colossae; against which there are advanced the precarious value of an argument from silence, and the fact that this argument assumes a particular course which the bearers of the letters would follow, viz. through Colossae to Ephesus. A more forcible argument is that which is based on the apostle's expected visit. In Phil 24 we read that he expected to go to Macedonia, and in Phil 22 ver 22 we find that he expected to go to Colossae. On the basis of this latter reference it is assumed that he was to the south of Colossae when writing and so at Caesarea. But it is quite as probable that he would go to Colossae through Philippi as the reverse; and it is quite possible that even if he had intended to go direct to Colossae when he wrote to Philemon, events may have come about to cause him to change his plans. The last argument, based on the omission of any reference to the earthquake which Tacitus (Ann. xiv.27) and Eusebius (Chron., i. 207) write, is of force as opposed to the Rom origin of the letter only on the assumption that these writers both refer to the same event (by no means sure) and that the event was written after that event, and that it would be necessary that St. Paul should have mentioned it. If the early chronology be accepted it falls entirely, as Tacitus' earlier date would be after the epistle was written. In addition we have the further facts, favorable to Rome, that St. Paul had no such freedom in Caesarea as he is represented in these epistles as enjoying; that no mention is made of Philip who was in Caesarea, and a most important member of that community (Acts 21, 8), and finally that there is no probability that so large a body of disciples and companions could have gathered about the apostle in his earlier and more strict imprisonment, at Caesarea. We may therefore conclude that the Captivity Ep. was written from Rome, and not from Caesarea.

The value for the epistle is less extensive than that of some of the other epistles, but it is abundantly strong. The play on the word

(Philem 11) is found in Ignat., Ep. to Polyc. This may not mean necessarily a literary connection, but it suggests this.

The epistle is known to Tertullian, and through him we know that Marcion accepted it (Adv. Marc., v.21). It is in the list in the Muratorian Fragment (p. 106, 1. 27), and is quoted by Origen as early as St. Jer. (Hom. in Ps. 109, 19) and placed by Eusebius (HE, III, xxv) among the acknowledged books.

It has twice been the object of attack. In the 4th and 5th cents. it was opposed as unworthy of St. Paul's mind and as of no value for edification. This attack was met successfully by Jerome (Comm., in Phil., praef.), Chrysostom (Argum. in Phil.) and Theodore of Mopsuestia (Spicil., in Solemn., i. 139), and the epistle was finally established in its earlier firm position. The later attack by Baur was inspired by his desire to break down the corroboration of Philo's other Captivity Ep., and has been criticized by Weiss as one of Baur's worst blunders. The suggestions that it is interpolated (Holtzmann), or allegorical (Weisseker and Phileldeph), or based on Philo (Ep. IX, 21) to Sabinus (Stock), are interesting examples of the vagaries of their authors, because only to be mentioned (2 Cor. 8). In its language, style and argument the letter is clearly Pauline.

The date will, as is the case with the other Captivity Ep., depend on the chronology. If the earlier scheme be followed it may be dated about 58, if the later about 63, or 64.

The apostle writes in his own and Timothy's name to his friend Philemon (q.v.) in behalf of Onesimus, a runaway slave of the latter. Beginning with his usual thanksgiving, here awakened by the report of Philemon's hospitality, he intercedes for his 'son begotten in his bonds' (ver. 10), Onesimus, who though he is Philemon's runaway slave is 'as my brother.' In this way the apostle pleads, urging his own age, and friendship for Philemon, and his present bonds. He pleads, however, without belittling Onesimus' wrongdoing, but assuming himself the financial responsibility for the amount of his theft. The ease with which Paul, so often quietly refers to what Philemon really owes him as his father in Christ, and begs that he will not disappoint him in his expectation. He closes with the suggestion that he hopes soon to visit him, and with greetings from his companions in Rome.

The charm and beauty of this epistle have been universally recognized. Its value to us as giving a glimpse of St. Paul's attitude toward slavery and his intimacy with a man like Philemon cannot be over-estimated. One of the chief elements of value in it is the picture it gives us of a Christian home in the apostolic days; the father and mother well known for their hospitality, the son, a man of position and importance in the church, the necessary and going of the Christian brethren, and the life of the brotherhood centering about this household.

PHILETUS, fil'i-tus, fil'i-tus (Phil'etos, Philatos) [2 Tim 2:17]: This person is mentioned by Paul, who warns Timothy against him as well as against his associate in error,

1. The Nature of Hymenaeus. The apostle speaks of His Error Hymenaeus and Philetus as instances of men who were doing more serious injury to the church by their teaching and by the views that teaching resulted in, both in faith and morals. The specific error of these men was that they denied that there would be any bodily resurrection. They treated all scriptural references to such a state, as figurative or metaphorical. They spiritualized, and held that the resurrection was a thing of the past. No resurrection was possible, so they taught, except from ignorance to knowledge, from sin to righteousness. There would be no day when the dead would hear the voice of Christ and come forth out of the grave. The Christian, knowing that Christ was raised from the dead, looked forward to the day when his body should be raised in the likeness of Christ's resurrection. But this faith was utterly denied by the teaching of Hymenaeus and Philetus.

2. How It Overthrew This teaching of theirs, Paul tells us, faith had overthrown the faith of some. It would also overthrow Christian faith altogether, for if the dead are not raised, neither is Christ risen from the dead, and "ye are yet in your sins" (1 Cor 15:17).

The denial of the resurrection of the body, whether of mankind generally or of Christ, is the foundation of ungodliness and every unrighteous desire. It leads to no living Christ, who saves and leads and comforts His people. The apostle proceeds to say that teaching of this kind "eats as doth a gangrene," and that it increases unto more ungodliness. As a leper or gangrenous eat away the flesh, so does such teaching eat away Christian faith. Paul is careful to say, more than once, that the teaching which denies that there will be a resurrection of the dead leads inevitably to "ungodliness" and to "iniquity." See HYMENAEUS.

JOHN RUTHERFORD

PHILIP, fil'ip (Phil'etos, Philippos, 'lover of horses')

(1) The father of Alexander the Great (1 Mac 1:1; 6:2), king of Macedonia in 359-356 BC. His influence for peace and wisdom in hastening the decadence of the Gr. city-state and in the preparations he left to Alexander for the diffusion throughout the world of the varied phases of Gr. intellectual life.

(2) A Phrygian left by Antiochus Epiphanes as governor at Jesus (c. 170 BC) and described in 2 Mac 6:22 as 'more barbarous' than Antiochus himself, burning fugitive Jews who had assembled in caves near by "to keep the sabbath day secretly" (2 Mac 6:11) and taking special measures to check the opposition of Judas Maccabeus (2 Mac 5:8). There is some ground for identifying him with—
PHILIP (Φιλίππος, Philippo): One of the Twelve Apostles. Philip belonged to Bethsaida of Galilee (Jn 1:44; 12:21). Along with Andrew and Nathanael, he was a follower of John the Baptist. He is mentioned as having brought up the son of Antiochus, a present of Antiochus from his youth, and on the death of his father set him up as king under the name of Eupator. The accounts of the rivalries of the regents and of the fate of Philip as recorded in 1 Macc 6:50; 2 Macc 9:29; Jos, Ant, XII, ix, 7, are not easily reconciled.

(4) Philip V, king of Macedonia in 220–179 BC. He is mentioned in 1 Macc 8:5 as an example of the great power of the Romans with whom Judas Maccabaeus made a league on conditions described (op. cit.). The conflict of Philip with the Romans coincided in time with that of Hannibal, after whose defeat at Zama the Romans were able to give undivided attention to the affairs of Macedonia. Philip was defeated by the Romans under Flaminius, at Cynoscephalae (197 BC), and compelled to accept the terms of the conquerors. He died in 179, and was succeeded by his son Perseus, last king of Macedonia, who lost his crown in his contest with the Romans. See Perseus. J. Hutchison

PHILIP, THE EVANGELIST: One of the "seven" chosen to have the oversight of "the daily ministration" of the poor of the Christian community in Jerusalem (Acts 6:5). Whether Philip, bearing a Gr name, was a Hellenist, is not known, but his missionary work reveals to us one free from the religious prejudices of the strict Hebrew.

The martyrdom of Stephen was the beginning of a systematic persecution of the church in Jerusalem, and all except the apostles were scattered to Judaea and Samaria (Acts 8:1), and even as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus and Antioch (11:19). Thus the influence of the new teaching was extended, and a beginning made to the missionary movement. The story of Philip's missionary labors is told in Acts 8:5 ff. He went to the chief city of Samaria, called Sebaste in honor of Augustus (Gr Sebastos). The Samaritans, of mixed Israelitish and gentile blood, had, in consequence of their being rigidly excluded from the Jewish church since the return from exile, built on Mt. Gerizim a rival sanctuary to the temple. To them Philip proclaimed the Christ and wrought signs, with the result that multitudes gave heed, and "were baptized, both men and women." They had been under the influence of a certain Simon, who himself also believed and was baptized, moved, as the sequel proved, by the desire to learn the secret of Philip's ability to perform miracles (see Simon Magus). The apostles (Acts 8:14) at Jerusalem notified this to Philip, and he went thence and preached the gospel at Gaza and Philis and other places, and sought to win the hearts of all, both Jews and Gentiles, to the salvation of Christ.

PHILIPPI, by-lip'i (Φιλίππος, Philippoi, ethnic Φιλιππαῖος, Philippes), Philippi, Phil 4:15): A city of Macedonia, situated in 41° 5’ N.

1. Position. Int. and Name. Egnatian Road, 33 Rom miles from Amphipolis and 21 from Acastis, in a plain bounded on the E. and N. by the mountains which lie between the rivers Zygactes and Nestus, on the W. by Mt. Pangaeus, on the S. by the ridge called in antiquity Symbolon, over which ran the road connecting the city with its seaport, Neapolis (q.v.), 9 miles distant. This plain, a considerable part of which is marshy in modern, as in ancient, times, is connected with the basin of the Strymon by the valley of the Angites (Herodotus vii.113), which also bore the names Gangas or Ganges (Appian, Bell. Civ. iv.105; Stephanus Byz. s.v.), so called after the springs which feed the river and the marsh; but it was refounded by Philip II of Macedon, the father of Alexander the Great, and received his name.

Appian (Bell. Civ. iv.105) andHorace say that Crenides was afterward called Dation, and that this name was changed to Philippi, but this statement is open to question, since Dation, which became proverbial among the Greeks for good fortune, possessed, as Strabo tells us (vii.331 fr. 36), “admirably fertile territory, a lake, rivers, dockyards and productive grounds.” Philippi was perhaps only a plain, as we have seen, some 9 miles inland. Many modern authorities, therefore, have placed Dation on the coast at or near the site of Neapolis. On the whole, it seems best to adopt the view of Heuzey (Mission archéologique, 3.22 ff.) that Philippi was not originally a city, but the whole district which lay immediately to the E. of Mt. Pangaeus, including the Philippian plain and the seacoast about Neapolis. On the site of the old foundation of Crenides, from which the Or settlers had perhaps been driven out by the Thracians about a century previously, the Thasians in 369 BC founded their colony of Dation with the aid of the exiled Athenian statesman Callistratus, in order to exploit the wealth, both agricultural and mineral, of the region. Philip II, who had ascended the Macedonian throne in 359 BC, possessed this spot seemed of the utmost importance. Not only is the plain itself well watered and of extraordinary fertility, but a strongly fortified post planted here would secure the natural land-route from Europe to Asia and protect the eastern frontier of Macedonia against Thracian inroads. Above all, the mines of the district might meet his most pressing need, that of an abundant supply of gold. The city was subsequently seized in 358, the city was enlarged, strongly fortified, and renamed, the Thasian settlers either driven out or reformed, and the mines, worked with characteristic energy, produced over 1,000 talents a year (Diodorus xvi.8) and enabled Philip to issue a gold coinage both in the West and in his Persian dominions (G. F. Hill, Historical Greek Coins, 80 ff.). The revenue thus obtained was of inestimable value to Philip, who not only used it for the development of the Macedonian army, but also proved himself a master of the art of bribery. His contemporaries were well known that no fortress was impregnable to whose walls an ass laden with gold could be driven. Of the history of Philippi during the next 3 centuries we know practically nothing. Together with the rest of Macedonia, it passed into the Roman hands after the battle of Pydna (168 BC), and fell in the first of the four regions into which the country was then divided (Livy xlv.29). In 146 the whole of Macedonia was formed into a single Roman province. But the mines seem to have been almost, if not quite, exhausted by this time, and Strabo (vii.331 fr. 41) speaks of Philippi as having sunk by the time of Caesar to a “small settlement” (καρυόπολις μικρόν, kataolkia melēr). In the autumn of 42 BC it witnessed the death-struggle of the Roman republic. Brutus and Cassius, the leaders of the band of conspirators who had assassinated Julius Caesar, were faced by Octavian, who 15 years later became the Emperor Augustus, and Antony. In the first engagement that followed the news of Caesar’s death reached Oenone, after Antony’s forces were victorious over those of Cassius, who in despair put an end to his life. Three weeks later the second and decisive conflict took place. Brutus was compelled by his impatient soldiers to give battle, his troops were routed and he himself fell on his own sword. Soon afterward Philippi was made a Roman colony with the title Colonia Julia Philippensia. After the battle of Actium (31 BC) the colony was reinforced, largely by Ital parcels of land, and was permitted in order to afford allotments for Octavian’s veterans (Dio Cassius li.4), and its name was changed to Colonia Augusta Julia (Victoris) Philippensium. It received the much-coveted ius Italicum (Digest L. 15, 8, 8), which involved numerous privileges, the chief of which was the immunity of its territory from taxation.

In the course of his second missionary journey Paul set sail from Troas, accompanied by Silas (who bears his full name Silvanus in 1 Cor 1:17; 2 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess First Visit 1), Timothy and Luke, and on the following day reached Neapolis (Acts 16.11). Thence he journeyed by road to Philippi, first crossing the pass some 1,600 ft. high which leads over the mountain range called Symbolon and afterward traveling the Philippian plain. Of his experiences there we have in Acts 16.12-40 a singularly full and graphic account. On the Sabbath, presumably the first Sabbath after their arrival, the apostle and his companions went out to the bank of the Agiotes, and there spoke to the women, some of the Pharisees, who had come together for purposes of worship.

One of those was named Lydia, a Gr proserbete from Thyatira, a city of Lydia in Asia Minor, to the church of which she had been conversed. She is described as a "seller of purple" (Acts 16:14), that is, of woolen fabrics dyed purple, for the manufacture of which Thyatira was famous. Whether she was the agent in Philippi of some firm in Thyatira or whether she was carrying on her trade independently, we cannot say: her name suggests the possibility that she was a freedwoman, while from the fact that we hear of her house and her house (ver 15; cf ver 40), though no mention is made of her husband, it has been conjectured that she was a widow of some property. She accepted the apostolic message and was baptized with her household (ver 15), and insisted that Paul and his companions should accept her hospitality during the rest of their stay in the city (see further Lydia).

All seemed to be going well when opposition arose from an unexpected quarter. There was in the town a girl, in all probability a slave, who was reputed to have the power of oracular utterance. In Acts xiii.11 (of an oracle of Dionysus situated among the Thracian tribe of the Satræ, probably not far from Philippi; but there is no reason to connect the soothsaying of this girl with that worship. In any case, her masters resented a rich revenue from this lucrative business, and Paul, troubled by her repeatedly following him and those with him crying, "These men are bond servants of the Most High God, who proclaim unto you a way of salvation" (Acts 16:17 m), turned and commanded the spirit in Christ's name to come out of her. The immediate restoration of the girl to a sane and normal condition convinced her masters that all prospect of further gain was gone, and they therefore seized Paul and Silas and dragged them into the forum before the magistrates, probably the δομοφόρος who stood at the head of the colony. They accused the apostles of creating disturbance in the city and of advocating customs, the reception and practice of which were illegal for Rom citizens. The rabble of the market-place joined in the attack (ver 22), whereupon the magistrates, accepting without question the accusers' statement that Paul and Silas were Jews (ver 20) and forgetting or ignoring the possibility of their possessing Roman citizenship, dragged them to the meeting of the attendant lidtiri and afterward to be imprisoned. In the prison they were treated with the utmost rigor; they were confined in the innermost ward, and their feet put in the stocks. About midnight, as they were engaged in praying and singing hymns, while the other prisoners were listening to them, the building was shaken by a severe earthquake which threw open the prison doors. The jailer, who was on the point of taking his own life, reassured by Paul reminding him of the power of God and the respect in which the apostles were held, set free Paul and Silas and his house where he tended their wounds, set food before them, and, after hearing the gospel, was baptized together with his whole household (vs 23-34).

On the morrow the magistrates, thinking that by dumpsters from the town those who had been the cause of the previous day's disturbance they could best secure themselves against any repetition of the disorder, sent the lictors to the jailer with orders to release them. Paul refused to accept a dismissal of their case on the ground of the slave girl's legal immunity from scourging, which was regarded as a degradation (1 Thess 2 2), and the wrong was aggravated by the publicity of the punishment, the absence of a proper trial, and the imprisonment which followed (Acts 16:17). Demetrius, a member of the city council, and his citizenship when the scourging was inflicted, but in the confusion and excitement of the moment his protest had been unheard or unheeded. Now, however, it produced a deep impression on the magistrates, who came in person to ask Paul and Silas to leave the city, and their hosts and encouraging the convicts to remain firm in their new faith, set out by the Egnatian Road for Thessalonica (vs 38-40). How long they had stayed in Philippi we are not told, but the fact that the formations of a church had been laid and the phrase "for many days" (ver 18) lead us to believe that the time must have been a longer one than appears at first sight.

Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 226) thinks that Paul left Thessalonica in October, 50 AD, and stayed at Philippi until nearly the end of the year; but this chronology cannot be regarded as certain. Several points in the narrative of these incidents call for fuller consideration. (1) We may notice, first, the very small part played by Jews and Judaism at Philippi.

There was no synagogue here, as at Samaline in Cyprus (Acts 13:5), Antioch in Pisidia (13:14, 43), Iconium (Acts 14:1), Ephesus (18:10, 26), 18:11; Philo, Theophr. Baroco (17, 10). Athens (17:17) and Corinth (18:4). The number of resident Jews was small, their meetings for prayer or services on the Sabbath. The former were mostly or wholly women (16:13), and among them some, perhaps a majority of the Jewish converts, did not hear nothing, nor is there any word of Jews as either inquiring or joining the mob which draged Paul and Silas to the forum. The whole tone of the ep. to this church seems to prove that this at least of this possibility teaching was not being undermined by Judaism. True, there is one passage (Phil 3 2-7) in which Paul denounces "the conclusion," those who had "confidence in the flesh" but it seems "that in this warning he was thinking of Romans more than of Philippi; and that his indignation was aroused by the very word (πάθος) by which there thuram his daily work, than by any actual errors already determining the faith of his distant converts" (Lightfoot). (2) Even more striking is the prominence of the Rom element in the narrative. We are here not in a Gr or Jewish city, but in one of those Rom colonies which Aulus Celsius describes as "miniatures and pictures of the Rom people" (Noctes Atticae, xiv.13).

In the center of the city is the forum (συγγείο, agorê, ver 19), and the general term "magistrates" (ἀστερεῖον, ἀστερῆς, ἀστερικός, ἀστατικός) is exchanged for the specific title of praetors (ἀρχιπρατηρ, ἀρχιπρατεῖον, ἀρχιπρατικός), vs 20. 22:35.36.38); these officers are attended by lictors (λίκτορας) and by ἐρωμένος, ἐρωμένον, ἐρωμένως, which means that they were the city's only important officials. Of the many offices and customs applicable to the Rome law (vs 20.21), and Paul's appeal to his Roman citizenship (ver 22) was once inspired by his fear for the consequences of their action and made them conciliatory and apologetic (vs 38.39). The title of praetor borne by these officials has caused some difficulty. The supreme magistrates of Rom colonies, two in number, were called duumvirs or duumviri (duo trans), and that this title was in use at Philippi is proved by three inscriptions (Orelli, No. 3746; Hessey, Mission archéologique, 15, 127). The most probable explanation of the discrepancy is that these magistrates assumed the title of praetor, or that it was commonly applied to them, as was certainly the case in some parts of the Rom world (Cicero De lege agraria H.34; Horace Sat. 1. 5, 34; Orelli, No. 3739).

(3) Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 200 ff) has brought forward the attractive suggestion that Luke was himself a Philippian, and that he was the "man of Macedonia" who appeared to Paul at Troas with the invitation to enter Macedonia (Acts 16:9).

In any case, the change from the 5th to the 1st person in ver 10 marks the point at which Luke comes in as the apostle, and the same criterion leads to the conclusion that Luke remained with Silas while Paul set out for Philippi and his third visit to the city (see below). Ramsay's hypothesis would explain (a) the fulness and vividness of the narrative (Acts 16.17) and (b) the concentration on the importance of Silus (ver 12); and the fact that Paul recognized Silus in the man whom he saw in his vision, although there is no hint in the text that the language, features or dress of Macedonians to mark them out from other Greeks. Yet Luke was clearly not a householder at Philippi (ver 15), and early tradition refers to him as an Antiochene (see, however, Ramsey, op. cit. 380 f.).

(4) Much discussion has centered round the description of Philip given in Acts 16 12. The reading of ἸΣΑϹ ΡΩΜΑΙΩΝ, (E.S.V., R.V., etc., is, τῆς ἐν τῷ τέμνε τοὺς αἰγυπτιακοῖς τῶν κοινωνίων. Μετὰ ἐντὸς τῆς μετὰς Μακεδονίας πώλει κολονία. But it is doubtful whether Macedonias is to be taken with the words which precede or with that which follows, and further the sense derived from the phrase is unsatisfactory. For πῶλει must mean either (1) first in political importance and rank, and to which the apostle paid a second visit. But the capital of the province was Thessalia, and if he paid the second visit to the capital, most of the 4 districts into which Macedonia had been divided in 168 BC (though there is no evidence that that division survived at this time), Amphipolis was its capital and was apparently its most important city, though destined to be outstripped by Philippi somewhat later. Nor is the other rendering of πῶλει (adopted, e.g., by Lightfoot) more natural. It supposes that Luke reckons Amphipolis as the boundary of Macedonia as lying between Philippi and its seaport: moreover, the remark is singularly pointless; the use of εἰς rather than ἐν is against this view, nor is πῶλει found in this sense without any qualifying phrase. Lastly the πῶλει in this position suggests natural B and it is placed after, instead of before, μετὰ, while D (which is in accordance with B) reads εἰς τῆς μετὰς Μακεδονίας, κεῖται πώλει τῆς Μακεδονίας. Of the emendations which have been suggested, we may notice three: (a) for μετὰς Μακεδονίας "a chief city of Pierian Macedonia"; (b) for πῶλει τῇς we may read πῶλει, "which has a seaport, city of Macedonia"; (c) πῶλει may be regarded as a later insertion and struck out of the text, in which case the whole phrase will mean, "which has a seaport, city of Macedonia of first rank" (though not necessarily the first city).

Paul and Silas, then, probably accompanied by Timothy (who, however, is not expressly mentioned in Acts between 16 1 and 17 14), left Philippi for Thessalonica, but Luke Later Visits Macedonia (Acts 17 2, 14) then remained behind, for the "see" of Acts 16 19-17 16 does not appear again until 20 5, when Paul is once more leaving Philippi on his last journey to Jerusalem. The presence of the evangelist during the intervening 5 years may have had much to do with the strength of the Philippian church and its steadfastness in persecution (2 Cor 8 2; Phil 1 29.30). Paul himself did not revisit the city until, in the course of his third missionary journey, he returned to Macedonia, preceded by Timothy and Erastus (after a stay of over 2 years) (Acts 19 22). Acts 19 20. Here we do not definitely know that he visited Philippi on this occasion, but of the fact there can be little doubt, and it was probably there that he awaited the coming of Titus (2 Cor 2 13; 7 5.6) and wrote his 2 Cor. Philippi, while he was staying in Thessalonica, spending 3 months in Greece, whence he intended to return by sea to Syria, he was led by a plot against his life to change his plans and return through Macedonia (Acts 20 5). The last place at which he stopped before crossing to Asia was Philippi, where he spent the days of unleavened bread, and from (the seaport of) which he sailed in company with Luke to Troas, where seven of his companions were awaiting him (20 4.6). It seems unlikely that Paul paid at least one further visit to Philippi in the interval between his first and second imprisonments. That he hoped to do so, he himself tells us (Phil 2 24), and the journey to Macedonia mentioned in 1 Tim 1 3 would probably include a visit to Philippi, while if, as many authorities hold, 2 Tim 4 13 refers to a later stay at Troas, it may well be connected with a further and final tour in Macedonia. But the intercourse between the apostle and this church of his founding was not limited to these rare visits. During Paul's first stay at Philippi he had already written to them on two occasions from the Philippian Christians (Phil 4 16), and their kindness had been repeated after he left Macedonia for Greece (2 Cor 11 9; Phil 4 15). Again, during his first imprisonment at Rome the Philippians sent a gift by the hand of one of their number, Epaphroditus (Phil 2 25; 4 10.14-19), who remained for some time with the apostle, and finally, after a serious illness which nearly proved fatal (2 27), returned home bearing the letter of thanks which has survived, addressed to the Philippian converts by Paul and Timothy (1 1). The latter intended to visit the church shortly afterward in order to bring back to the imprisoned apostle an account of its welfare (2 19.23), but we do not know what actually was carried out or not. We cannot, however, doubt that other letters passed between Paul and this church besides the one which is extant, though the only reference to them is a disputed passage of Poly-carp's Epistle to the Philippians (iii.2), where he speaks of "letters" (ἐπιστολάς) as written to them by Paul (but see Lightfoot's note on Phil 3 1).

After the death of Paul we hear but little of the church or of the town of Philippi. Early in the 2d cent. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, was

5. Later History of the Church condeemed as a Christian and was taken to Rome to be thrown to the wild beasts. After passing through Philadelphia, Smyrna and Troas, he reached Philippi. The Bishop of Macedonia then asked him every mark of affection and respect, and after his departure wrote a letter of sympathy to the Antiochene church and another to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, requesting him to send them copies of any letters of Ignatius which he possessed. This request Polycarp fulfilled, and at the same time sent a letter to the Philippians full of encouragement, advice and warning. From it we judge that the condition of the church as a whole was satisfactory, though a certain presbyter, Valens, and others were severely censured for their avarice which belied their Christian profession. We have a few records of bishops of Philippi, whose names are attached to the decisions of the councils held at Sardica (344 AD), Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451), and the see appears to have outlived the city itself and to have lasted down to modern times (Le Quien, Oriens Christ., I, 70; Neale, Holy Eastern Church, I, 92). Of the destruction of Philippi no account was given by Dio. The city appears to have been buried in that of the Turkish hamlet Filiobajik, but the site is now uninhabited, the nearest village being that of Rakhtcha among the hills immediately to the N. of the ancient acropolis. This latter and the plain around it (737-2-3) have been the subject of systematic excavation has yet been undertaken. Of the extent remains the most striking areas are portions of the Hellenic and Hellenistic fortification, the scanty vestiges of the theatre, the ruin known among the Turks as Derelid, the "columns," which perhaps represents the ancient thermae, traces of a temple of Silvanus with numerous rock-cut reliefs and inscriptions, and the remains of a triumphal arch (Kiemer).

I. PAUL AND THE CHURCH AT PHILIPPI.—Paul was on his second missionary journey in the year 52 AD. It is believed that he first visited Philippi shortly after his missionary journeys had been delayed in Galatia. The Spirit would not permit him to preach in Asia, and when he essayed to enter Bithynia the Spirit again would not suffer it. Baffled and perplexed, the apostle with his two companions, Silas and Timothy, went on to the second and stopped in Troas. Here at last his leading became clear. A vision of a man from Macedonia convinced him that it was the will of God that he should preach in the western continent of Europe. The way was open to them, and in three days they came to Philippi, a journey of some 8 miles. There was no Jewish congregation in Philippi, and the little company of Jews gathered for Sabbath worship at “a place of prayer” (προσευχῆ, θητεία, Acts 16:13), about a mile to the W. of the city gate on the shore of the river Gangites (see PROSEUCHA). Paul and his companions addressed the women gathered there, and Lydia was converted. Later, a maid with the spirit of divination was exercised. Paul and Silas were scourged and thrown into prison, an earthquake set them free, the jailer became a believer, the magistrates repented their treatment of men who were Roman citizens and besought them to leave the city (Acts 16:6-40). Paul had had his first experience of a Roman scourging and of lying in the stocks of a Roman prison at Philippi, yet went on his way rejoicing, for a company of disciples had been formed, and he had won the devotion of loyal and loving hearts for himself and his Master (see PHILIPPI). That was worth all the persecution and the pain. The Church at Philippi seemed to have been Paul’s favorites among all his converts. He never lost any opportunity of visiting them and refreshing his spirit with their presence in the after-years. Six years later he was resident in Ephesus, and writing to Corinth, he sent a letter to the Corinthians and being in doubt as to the spirit in which it would be received, he appointed a meeting with Titius in Macedonia, and probably spent the anxious days of his waiting at Philippi. If he met Titius there, he may have written 2 Cor in that city (2 Cor 2:13; 7:6). Paul returned to Ephesus, and after the riot in that city he went over again into Macedonia and made his third visit to Philippi. He probably promised the Philippians at this time that he would return to Philippi to celebrate the Easter week with his beloved converts there. He went on into Greece, but in 3 months he was back again, at the festival of the resurrection in the year 58 AD (Acts 20:2.6). We read in 1 Tim 1:3 that Paul visited Macedonia after the Rom imprisonment. He enjoyed himself among the Philippians. They were Christians after his own heart. He thanks God for their fellowship from the first day until now (Phil 1:3). He declares that they are his beloved who have always obeyed, not in his presence, but in his absence (1 Cor 16:15). With fond repetition he addresses them as his brethren, beloved and longed for, his joy and crown, his beloved (4:1). This was Paul’s favorite church, and we can gather from the ep. good reason for this fact.

II. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE CHURCH AT PHILIPPI.—
(1) It seems to be the least Jewish of all the Pauline churches. There were few Jews in Philippi. No Heb names are found in the list of converts in this church mentioned in the NT. The Jewish opponents of Paul seem never to have established themselves in the community. (2) Women seem to be unusually prominent in the history of this church, and this is consistent with what we know concerning the position accorded to woman in Macedonian society. Lydia brings her whole family into the Christian faith, and she is a very influential woman, and her own fervor and devotion and generosity and hospitality seem to have been contagious and to have become characteristic of the whole Christian community. Euodia and Syntyche are mentioned in the ep. to two women who held fellow-laborers with Paul in the gospel, for both of whom he has great respect, of both of whom he is sure that their names are written in the book of life, but who seem to have differed with each other in some matter. Paul complains to them that their quarrel was of the same mind in the Lord (4:2). The prominence of women in the congregation at Philippi or the dominance of Lydia’s influence among them may account for the fact that they seem to have been the more minded to set up their own tables, and in some of the other communities, they raised money for Paul’s support and forwarded it to him again and again. They were anxious that he should have all that was needful. They were willing to give of their time and their money to the work of the Christian church, and there had been no theological differences in their company. That may testify to the fact that the most of them were women. (3) There were splendid men in the church membership too. Some of them were Macedonians and some of them were Rom veterans.

Haugerth declares that the Macedonians represented the “nobest and soundest part of the ancient world.” Here was none of the shuffling and the indecision of the Aristocrats of the Jerseys or the vanity and the uncertain levity of the Greek communities. They were men of sterner mold than could be found in Asia Minor or languorous Syria. The material was harder to work in, and offered more stubborn resistance; but the work, once done, endured. A new Macedonian phalanx was formed here, a phalanx of Pauline Christians.

III. ADDRESS TO THE ROMAN CONGREGATION.—The historical and theological, local and general, have been considered. What shall we say of the spiritual in Philippi? Two characteristics are apparent. First, the Christian church in Philippi are, like the Romans themselves, firm in their faith. The individual members are firm and the church itself is firm. We find the Christian church in Philippi firm in its faith. (1) It adheres firmly to the apostles’ teaching and the tradition of the church. (2) It adheres firmly to the apostles’ teaching and the tradition of the church. (3) It adheres firmly to the apostles’ teaching and the tradition of the church.

sacrifice and service of their faith (2:17). He calls Epaphroditus not only his fellow-worker but his fellow-soldier (2:25). He likens the Christian life to a race in which they would enter before they die (3:14). He asks the Philippians to keep even, solidly step by step with him in the Christian walk (3:16). These metaphors have been adopted by an athletic and military race, and they bear their testimony to the high regard which Paul has for the Philippian Christianity and the great honor in which he lives it was displayed. We do not know the names of many of these men, for only Clement and Epaphroditus mention that we gather them together by their spirit from this ep., and we are as sure as Paul himself that their names are all written in the book of life (4:3).

(1) If the constituent elements of the church at Philippi fairly represented the various elements of the population of the city, they must have been cosmopolitan in character. Philippi was an old Macedonian city which had been turned into a Rom colony. It was both Gr and Rom in its characteristics. Christianity had been introduced here by two Jews, who were Rom citizens, and a Jewish son of a gentle father. In the account given of the founding of the church in Acts 16 three converts are mentioned, and one of these is a Jewess, another a Jew, one a native Greek, and one a Rom official. The later converts doubtless represented the same diversity of nationality and the same differences in social position. Yet, apart from those two good women, Euodia and Syntyche, there were all of our mind in the Lord. It is a remarkable proof of the fact that in Christ all racial and social conditions may be brought into harmony and made to live together in peace. (5) They were a very liberal people. They devoted themselves to the Lord and to Paul (2 Cor 8:5), and whenever they could help Paul or further the work of the gospel they gave gladly and willingly and up to the limit of their resources, and then they hypothecated their credit and gave beyond their power (2 Cor 8:5). Every time Paul was astonished at their giving. He declares that they gave out of much affliction and deep poverty, that they abounded in their bounty, and that they were rich only in their liberahty (2 Cor 8:2).

Surely these are unusual encomiums. The Philippians must have been a very unusual people. If the depth of one's consecration and the reality of one's religion are to be measured by the amount to which they affect the position of one's material possessions, if one measure of Christianity in Christ's coming, that is, if all the Philippians may well stand supreme among the saints in the Pauline churches, Paul seems to have loved them and blessed them enough to follow them in his contribution toward his support. Elsewhere he refused and held aloof and stoutly refrained to his own end of self-support while he was preaching the gospel. He made the single exception in the case of the Philippians. He must have been sure of their affection and of their confidence. Four times they gave Paul pecuniary aid. Twice they sent him their contributions just after he had left them and gone on to Thessalonica (4:15,16). When Paul had proceeded to Corinth and was in want during his ministry there his heart was gladdened by the visitation of brethren from Philippi, who supplied the measure of his want (2 Cor 11:8,9). It was not a first enthusiasm, forgotten as soon as the engaging personality of the apostle was removed from their sight. It was a special attachment that prompted their gifts. They gave to their own dear apostle, but only that he might minister to others as he had ministered to them. He was their living link with the work in the mission field.

Eleven years passed by, and the Philippians heard that Paul was in prison at Rome and again in need of their help. Eleven years are enough to make quite radical changes in a church membership, but the Philippians had not. They continued, just as they had in the time of the mission, to maintain the support of the apostle and the liberty of the Philippian church in that time. The Philippians hastened to send Epaphroditus to Rome with their contributions and their greetings. It was like a bouquet of fresh flowers in the prison cell. Paul writes this ep. to thank them that their thought for him had blossomed afresh at the first opportunity they had had (4:10). No wonder that Paul loved them and was proud of them and made their earnestness and sincerity and affection the subject of comparison with the love of others (2 Cor 8:8).

III. Characteristics of the Epistle.—It is a letter. It is not a treatise, as Rom, He, and 1 Jn are. It is not an encyclical full of general observations and exhortations capable of application at any time and anywhere, as the Ep. to the Eph and the Ep. of James and the Epp. of Peter are. It is a simple letter to personal friends. It has no theological discussions and no rigid outline and no formal style. It rambles along just as any real letter would with personal news and personal feelings and outbursts of personal affection before tried friends. It is the most spontaneous and unaffected of the Pauline Epps. It is a personal letter rather than any of the others addressed to the churches.

It is a letter of love. All of the other epp. have mixed feelings manifest in them. Sometimes a feeling of grief and of indignation is dominant, as in 2 Cor. Sometimes the predominant desire of Paul in his writing is to be the establishment of the truth against the assault of its foes, as in Gal and Rom. Always more or less fault is suggested in the recipients of the warnings and the exhortations Paul feels compelled to write to them. But here there is no fault to be found. The only suggestion of such a thing is in the reference to the difference of opinion between Euodia and Syntyche, and while Paul thinks this ought to be harmonized, he does not seem to consider it any very serious menace to the peace of the church. Aside from this Paul has nothing but praise for his beloved brethren and prayer that their love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and all discernment (4:9). He is full of thankfulness upon all his remembrance of them (1:3). He rejoices in the privilege of being offered upon the sacrifice and service of their faith (2:17). The church at Philippi may not have been conspicuous in charisms as the church at Corinth was, but it had the fruits of the Spirit in rich measure. Paul seems to think that it needed only to rejoice in its spiritual possessions and to grow in grace and in the mind of Christ. His heart is full of gratitude and love as he writes. He rejoices as he thinks of them. His pen is triumphant over present affliction and the prospect of persecution and death. If this is his last will and testament to his beloved church, as Holtzmann calls it, he has nothing to bequeath them but his unqualified, unclouded, and unqualified hope. He has removed from the first, he loves them to the end.

It is a letter of joy. It was Bengel who said, Summa epistolae; gaudeo, gaudeo, "The sum of the ep. is, I rejoice; rejoice ye." Paul was a man whose spirits were un- joy daunted in any circumstances. He might be scourged in one city and stoned in another and imprisoned in a third and left for dead in a fourth, but as long as he retained consciousness and as soon as he regained consciousness he rejoiced. Nothing could dampen his arder. Nothing could disturb his peace. In Philippi he had been scourged and cast into the inner prison and his feet had been made fast in the stocks, but at midnight he and Silas were singing hymns of praise to God. He is in prison now in Rome, but he is still rejoicing. Some men would have been discouraged in such circumstances. Wherever Paul had gone his preaching had been despised, and he had been persecuted. The Jews had slandered him and harassed him, and some Gentile people had been fickle and false. The years had gone by and the breach between him and his brethren had widened.
rather than lessened, and at last they had succeeded in getting him into prison and keeping him there for years. Perhaps Kneucker, Hultig, Hengel, and Frenzel were right, and it was far less so in that ancient day than it is now.

Paul was such an ardent spirit. It was more difficult for him to be confined than it would be for a more indolent man. He was a world-missionary, a restless cosmopolite ranging up and down through the continents with the message of the Christ. It was like putting an elephant in a cage. Many expected hope and die in imprisonment. Paul was not moping. He was writing this Ep. to the Phil and saying to them, "The eye of the Lord is on them, that they may be accounted unto a people." For an Englishman, who was free to do and to say what they pleased, and they were making the most of the opportunity. He could no longer thwart or hinder them. Some men would have broken out into loud lamentations and complaints. Some men would have become nervous about the outcome of the cause. The faith of even John the Baptist failed in prison. He could not believe that things were going right if he were not there to attend to them. Paul's faith never wavered. His hope never waned. His joy was lost, but his hope was not.

It is of great importance theologically. It is one of the paradoxes to which this passage has given rise. Paul's writings that simplest of his letters, most epistolary and most personal in form, should yet contain the fullest and most important putting of the theology shaped in the experience and education that came from his pen. He has only a practical end in view. He is exhorting the Philippians to humility, and he says to them, "Have this mind which was in Christ which emptied himself and then was exalted" (2:5-11). It is the most theological passage in the ep. It is one of the most doctrinally important in the NT. It is Paul's final contribution to the solution of the great mystery of the coming of the Saviour and the economy of salvation. It is his last word, at any length, on this subject. He states plainly the fact of the kingdom, the miracle of the redemption, the certainty of the exaltation, and the sure hope of the universal adoration in the end. The most vital and most important teaching of Christianity is definitely formulated for all time. Jesus was a real man, a man of the commonwealth, of the common life, in whom would be inconsistent with real and true humanity, but in whole-hearted surrender of sacrifice submitting to The Father, the Son of Man, which was more necessary to the very life of the human incarnate conditions. He was equal with God, but He emptied Himself of the omnipotence and the omnipresence and the omniscience and the omnibenevolence of the Divine. He was found in form as a man, a genuine man obedient to God in all His life. He always maintained that attitude toward God which we ought to maintain and which we can maintain in our humanity, in which He was on an equal footing. We ought to have the mind which was in Christ. He humbled Himself and became obedient. He was obedient through life and obedient unto death, yea, even unto the death of the cross. It is a great passage, setting forth profoundest truths in the tersest manner. It is the crowning revelation concerning Jesus in the Pauline Epistles. It represents Paul's most mature thought on the subject of Christ and the kingdom.

IV. Genuineness of the Epistle.—The genuineness of the ep. is generally admitted today. It was in the Codex Vaticanus, a manuscript of the 4th century, and a Muratorian Fragment. It is found in both the Pesh and Syriac versions. It was quoted by Irenaeus, Hippolytus, quoted in the letter of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, in the Ep. of Diognetus, and in the writings of Tertullian and Clement. Paul's signature was a determining factor upon its authenticity. He declared that it was not dictated by another, and that he had written it himself (1 Cor. 15:32), and that it was full of shallow imitations of these. He said it had no apparent motive and no connected argument and only a loose chain of thought (Phil. 4:9-10). In these Epistles, some of the historical data and suspected gnostic influence in certain places, an entirely different character. They are partly derived from a perverted interpretation of certain passages in the ep.; they partly rested upon arbitrary harmonizations; and they were so weak that it hard to believe that he could have attached any importance to them himself. It is not surprising that few critics have been found willing to follow Baur's leadership at this point. Biederman, Jülicher, Holzmann, Tischendorf, etc., have not mentioned among them. The genuineness of the ep. has been defended by Weissacker, Schenkel, Schiel, Hengel, Harnack, Holtzmann, Mangold, Lipsius, Renan, Godet, Zahn, Davidson, Lightfoot, Parzer, Farrar, and all of the English writers on the subject. Weissacker says that the reasons for attributing the ep. to the apostle Paul are "very strong." It is not in the least surprising that anyone else would or could have produced this name a large amount of material, or ecclesiastical motive can be discovered, and in which the personal element so largely predominates and the manner of its composition is so highly consistent with great vividness and fidelity. The ep. deserves to rank alongside of the other great epistles, and Romans, Colossians, and Thessalonians, and as a coordinate standard by which to test the genuineness of other and less certain writings.

The Place, Date and Occasion of Writing.—This is one of the prison ep. (see PHILEMON). Paul makes frequent reference to his bonds (L 7.13.14.17). He was for 2 years a prisoner in Caesarea (Acts 24:27). Paul and others have been imprisonment under the name of "the prisoner" (Paul or Peter was written during this imprisonment; but the references to the prætorian guard and the members of Caesar's household have led most critics to conclude that the Rom imprisonment was the one to which the ep. refers. Philem, Col and Eph were also written during the Rom imprisonment, and these three form a group by themselves. Paul is evidently separated from them by some interval. Was it written earlier or later than they? Bleek, Lightfoot, Sanday, Hort, Beet and others think that the ep. to the Phil was written prior to the ep. to the Col. Others agree with Zahn, Ramsay, Findlay, Shaw, Vincent, Jülicher, Holtzmann, Weiss, Godet, and others, who argue for the writing of Paul toward the close of the Rom imprisonment.

Their reasons are as follows: (1) We know that some considerable time must have elapsed after Paul's arrival at Rome before he could have written this ep.; for the news of his arrival had been carried to Philippi and a contribution to his needs had been raised among his friends there, and Epaphroditus had carried it to Rome. In Rome, Epaphroditus had become seriously sick, and the news of this sickness had been carried back to Philip- pi and the Philippians had sent back a message of sympathy to him. At least four trips between Rome and Philippi are thus indicated, and there are intervals of 2 years or greater or less. It was stated by Herod that the distance between the two cities was some 700 miles. Communication was entirely by sea, the most usual route between Rome and Brundusium and across the narrow straits there to the Egyptian Way, which led directly to Philippi. There were many more necessary to the visitor; one would occupy a month at least, and the four journeys suggested in the ep. were not in direct succession. (2) Paul says that the Rom imprisonment had been known throughout the whole prætorian guard (1:13). It must have taken some time for this to become possible. The conditions outside the prison, where Christ was being preached, by some in a spirit of love, and by others in a spirit of faction, cannot be located in the earliest months of Paul's sojourn in Rome (1:15-17). They must belong to a time when Christianity had developed in the city and parties had been formed in the church. (4) Luke was well known at Philippi. Yet he sends no dedication to the Philippians in this ep. He would surely have done so if he had been with Paul at the time of its writing. It is difficult to believe that Paul wrote the ep. to the Colossians, and so was Demas (Col 4:14). In this ep. Paul promises to send Timothy to Philippi, and says, "I have no one like you, the only helper, my heart's desire, the one who owns your state" (2:20). This must mean that Arístarchus, Demas and Luke were all gone. They had all been with him when he wrote the other ep. (5) His condition as a prisoner seems to have changed for the worse. He had enjoyed complete freedom (Phil. 4:2). He did not have a case of imprisonment at Rome, living in his own hired house and accessible to all persons (Phil. 1:19-20). The prison has now been removed, possibly to the guardroom of the praetorium of Caesarea. Here he was in more rigorous confinement, in want and in bonds. (6) Paul mentions some incident which would be decided soon (23:24). He seems to be facing a martyr's death, but he expressed himself and then to be at liberty to do further missionary work. This was not in harmony with what we find in the other ep., and therefore they would seem to be earlier
Christ, and chooses the lesser blessings in pure unselfishness in the sense that the spiritual lives of their choice are radically different; and Paul lives with rejoicing while Hamlet lives in despair and in shame. The apostle was a soldier, but he would rather live than die before his work was done.

(4) His example (vs 27-30): Paul was a Roman citizen and so were they. He tried to live worthy of his citizenship and was worthy of it. He had a higher ambition, that he and they might live as citizens worthy of the gospel of Christ. He fought as a good soldier. He stood fast in the faith. He was in nothing asparted by the adversaries. Let them follow his example. They were engaged in the same conflict. To them he said, "Beloved, see that, whether you believe and suffer in the behalf of Christ. Their faith was not of themselves; it was the gift of God. Their suffering was not self-chosen; it too was a gift of God. (4) Exhortation to follow the example of Christ (2: 1-18): Let them, Paul said, "know the mind and spirit of Jesus, and Paul will rejoice to pour out his life as a libation upon the sacrifice and service of their faith. (5) Reasons for sending Timothy and Epaphroditus to them (2: 19-30). (6) Paul's example (3: 1-21): (a) in the repudiation of all confidence in the flesh (vs 1-7): There are certain things that Paul did not belong to the old Jewish persuasion who gloried in the flesh. Paul does not impugn the confidence of the Corinthians of their perfection. He longs for them and prays that they have confidence in the Lord. They may be wise to discriminate among the most excellent things and that they may be able to choose the very best, until they are filled with the fruits of righteousness. Paul calls them the enemies of Christ, unto the glory and the praise of God. (3) Information concerning his own experience (1: 12-30): (a) His evangelism (vs 12-14): Everything had turned out well. Paul is in prison, but he has been enabled by his evangelism. He has been chained as a soldier, but that has given him many opportunities for personal and private and prolonged conversation. When the people have gathered to hear the guard has listened perforce; and when the crowd was gone, more than once the soldier has seemed curious and interested and they have talked on about the Christ. Paul has told his experience over and over to these men, and his story has been carried through the entire camp. (9) His tolerance (vs 15-18): Not only has the gospel found unexpected havoc evil work in the past, but it has gone through the whole city the brethren have been emboldened by Paul's success to preach Christ, some through faction and envy and strife, and some through love. Paul rejoices that Christ is preached, whether by his enemies or by his friends. He would much prefer to have the gospel presented as he himself preached it, but he was great-souled and broad-minded enough to tolerate differences of opinion and method among brethren in Christ. "In every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice." (2: 18). This is one of the noblest utterances of one of the greatest of men. Paul is sorry that everybody does not see things just as he does, but he rejoices if they glorify Christ and would not put the least hindrance in their way. (c) His readiness for life or death (vs 19-26): Paul says, Give me liberty or give me death; it will be Christ either way. To live is to work for Christ; to die is to be with Christ. "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." Here is Paul's answer to the secret of possible martyrdom or further missionary labors.

We are reminded of Hamlet's soliloquy in Shakespeare. "To be or not to be"—that is the question with both Hamlet and Paul. Hamlet weighs evils against evils and chooses the lesser evils in sheer cowardice in the end. Paul weighs blessings against blessings, the blessings of life for Christ and the blessings of death with Manichean or neo-Platonic heresy that matter was evil and the body vile. Plotinus blushed that he had a body. The Church, Paul says, should honor the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit. It was the vehicle of the incarnation, and he honors it for that. Yet the body prepared for Jesus was the body of His humification. It bound Him to the earth. It weakened when He was on the cross, He says, and He needed strength. Paul says that our bodies are like the body of Jesus of Nazareth now, and they shall be like the body of Christ when He appears in due time.

(7) A series of short exhortations (4 1-9): This series ends with the command, "The things which ye both learned and received and heard and saw in me, these things do: and the God of peace shall be with you." All these exhortations, then, are based upon his own conduct and experience and example. They had seen the embodiment of these things in him. They were to be imitators of him in their obedience to them. Therefore as we read them we have sidelights thrown upon the character of the apostle who had taught and preached and practised these things.

That do they tell us concerning the apostle Paul? (a) His steadfastness and his love for his friends (ver 1): He had a genius for friendship. He bound his friends to him with cords of steel. They were rare in their ability to sacrifice anything for him. The reason for that was that he sacrificed everything for them, and that he had such an overwhelming love for them that his friends began to love them. They could depend upon him. (b) His sympathy for men and all good women and his desire that they live in peace (ver 23): The true yoke-fellow mentioned here cannot be identified now. He has been variously identified by that of the Epaphras, Barnabas, Luke, Silas, Timothy, Peter, and Christ. There was a strong, according to the translators, of either Gen- silus or Syzygus. We are wholly ignorant as to whom Paul meant. (c) His constant rejoicing in the Lord (ver 4). (d) His sweet reasonableness ("moderation.") AV, RV "forbearance," ver 5: So Matthew Arnold translates the phrase in the O.F. He called it "courtesy." It is a combination of forbearance and graciousness, of modesty and courtesy, of consideration and esteem such as was characteristic of Paul. Paul had it. There was a sweet reasonableness about him that made his personality unique and attractive, as (e) His freedom from anxiety (ver 6.7): Paul's fearless confidence was born on the one hand from his assurance that the Lord was near, and on the other from his faith in prayer. It passed all understanding how Paul was kept from all anxiety. It was the power of prayer that did it. It was the peace of God that did it. It was the Lord at hand who did it. (f) His habitual high thinking (ver 8): All that was worthy in the ideals of the Greco philosophers Paul made the staple of his thought. He delighted in them as something admirable and just and pure and lovely and of good report. He knew that virtue was in these things and that all praise belonged to them. He had lived by it and the whole mind was filled with these things he lived in serenity and peace.

(8) Thanks for their gift (4 10-20). (9) Salutations (4 21.22). (10) Benediction (4 23). This is not a theological ep. and therefore it is not an esp. Christological one. Yet we count the number of chapters in Paul's first letter, and the pronouns referring to Him are many more. Paul cannot write anything without writing about Christ. He ends: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit." The spirit of Christ and the grace of Christ are in the entire ep.

PHILISTIA, fli-sists'ia:-The country is referred to under various designations in the OT: viz. מֹלֶשֶׂה (Philistia) (Ps 60 8 [Heb 10]; 87 4), פֶּלֶשׁיתִים, 'ereq p'lishthim, "land of the Philistines" (Gen 21 32.34), פִּלְשִׁיתִים (Heb 19 9), פֵּלֶשֶׂה pa'lishth; LXV get ton Philistian, "the regions of the Philistines" (Josh 13 2). The Egypt monuments have Pithathu, Pulsath (Buqei), Pleset (Breasted), and Patast (Hegg), according to the different vowelings of the radicals; the Assyr form is Palastu or Pilita, which corresponds very closely to the Egypt and the Heb. The extent of the land is indicated in Josh 13 2 as being from the Shihor, or Brook of Egypt (RV), to the border of Ekron, and from the borders of Egypt in the south to the Philistian border on the line of Beth-shemesh (1 S 6 9) with the sea on the W. It was a very small country, from 25 to 30 miles in length and with an average width of about half the length, but it was fertile, being an extension of the plain of Sharon, except that along the coast high sand dunes encroached upon the cultivated tracts. It contained many towns and villages, the most important being the five so often mentioned in Scripture: Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron. The population must have been large for the territory, which enabled them to contend successfully with the Israelites, notwithstanding the superiority of position in the hills to the advantage of the latter. side by side with Mongols (see Hittites) at least as early as the time of Moses. It is very likely therefore that this reading is correct.

According to the OT and monuments alike, the Philistines were a Sem people, who worshipped two god, Dagon (1 S 5 2) and Ashitaroth (30 10), and were conquered by the very early Israelites (Judg 1), Babylonians, both, however, having names of Akkadian and not of Sem origin. In Sem speech 1 and 2; for this reason so understood stood in the time of Philo of Gebla, a Gr-Phoen writer who attributed the origin of the name of these god, the original name was Dagon, and in Akkadian de la "the upper part of a man," and gula (Turkish goda) means "the large fish." The name Dagon was well known to the Assyrians, and is represented in cuneiform by: with Sennacherib's worship of Ea, the sea-god, when he embarked on the Pera Gulf. Thus Dagon was probably a title of Ea ("the water spirit"), called by Herodotus "Acheron, lord of the fish," and said to have issued from this same Gulf. We consequently read that when the statue of Dagon at Asdod fell (1 S 4 4), its head and hands were broken off, and only "the great fish" was left. In 1574 the present writer found a seal near Asdod representing a bearded god (as in Babylonians) with a fish tail (see Dagon). As to Ash- toretah, who was adored in Philistia itself, her name is derived probably from the Akkadian ister ("light maker") a name for the moon-goddess and—later—for the planet Venus (see Astarte).

The Philistines had reached Gerar by the time of Abraham, and it was only in the age of the Hyksos ruled by the Delta, Can, tribes, who could be described as akin, not only to the individual Babylonians, but also to certain tribes Philistines in Egypt, a circumstance which favors the antiquity of the ethnic chapter, commerce, and even of the cities of Philistia. We have 9 Philis names in the OT, all of which seem to be Sem, including Abimelech—"Moloch is my father"—(Gen 20 18; 28 22 26; 5 11) at Gerar, S.E. of Gaza, Ahaziah ("possession," Gen 20 26), and Phicol of Cush ("delight", with Dagon). Igs 16 4, Goliath, (probably the Bab gula, "great"), and Saph (2 S 21 18), perhaps meaning "increase." These two brothers were sons of Pharaoh ("the tall") but Ishi-benob (ver 16), another of the families, perhaps only means "the dweller in Nob" (Beit Nabi, N. of Gezer). The king of Gath in David's time was Achish ("the gift" in Bab), who (1 S 27 2) was the son of Maouch, "the oppressor." According to LXX, Jonathan killed an Philis (1 S 13 34, where AV reads "a garrison"). If this is correct the name (meaning "pillar") would also be Sem.

Besides these personal names, and those of the cities of Philistia which are all Sem, we have the title given to Philis lords, goren, which LXX renders "Lord" and "ruler" and which probably comes from a Sem Circum- scision meaning "to command." It con- stantly applies to the rulers of Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath and Ekron, the 5 chief cities of Philistia. The fact that the Philis were unincoruscenced does not prove that they were not a Sem people. Herodotus (ii.104) says that the Phoenicians acknowledged that they took this custom from the Egyptians, and the Arabs according to the passage of Eusebios, or is it known that this was a custom of the Babylonians and Assyrians. The LXX translators of the Pent always render the name Philistiaem, and this also is found in 8 passages of Josh and Jgs, but in the later books the name is t4 as meaning "strangers" throughout, because they were not the first inhabitants of Philistia.

The Philis conquered the "downs" (gitalah, Joel 3 4) near the seacoast, and were so powerful at the time of the Heb conquest that none of their great towns would be taken. While the Bible of the time of Samson (about 1158 BC) they appear as oppressors of Israel for 40 years (Jgs 13 1; 15 20), having encroached from their plains into the Shphelah (or low hills) of Judah, at the foot of the mountains. The mountain of the Philis 5. History was woman, living in the valley of Sorek, in the OT close to Samson's home. In the last to Death year of Eli (1 S 4 1) we find the Philis Saul attacking the mountains near Mizpeh, where they captured the Ark. Samuel drove them back and placed his monument of victory between Mizpeh and Jeshanah (Shen; see LXX; 1 S 7 12) on the mountain ridge of Benjamin. He even regained towns in the Shphelah as far as Ekron and Gath (ver 14), but at the opening of Saul's reign (10 5) the Philis were under the Gibeon—or a chief named Hasib according to LXX. They raided from this center (13 17-23) in all directions, and prevented the Hebrews from arming themselves, till Jonathan drove them from Michmas (14 1-47). David's victory (17 2) was won in the Valley of Elah E. of Gath, and the pursuit (ver 52) was as far as Ekron. We here read that the Philis champion wore armor of bronze (vs 4-7), his spear head being of iron. They still invaded the Shphelah after this defeat, ravaging the threesholds of Keilah (23 1) near Adullam at the foot of the Hebron Mountains (see 23 27 34 1). David's band of outlaws gradually increasing from 400 to 600 men (22 2 27 2), being driven from the Jeb lands, accomplished him to the plain of Philis (?) where he placed at Tell es-Sâfi, at the point where the Valley of Elah extends toward the Philis plain. It appears that Achish, king of Gath, then ruled as far as Ziklag (Josh 10 31; 1 S 27 6) in the Beerseba plains; but he was not aware of the Philis raids at this distance. Achish supposed David to be committed to his cause (27 12), but the Philis lords suspected him and his Jeb followers (29 3) when going up to Jearas.

After they had killed Saul, we hear no more of them till the 5th year of David, when, after taking Jerus, he apparently went down to Adullam (2 S 17) and fell upon them in their rear as they advanced to the mountains. Deliah was a Philis woman, whom the Philis smote as far as Gaza (2 K 18 8) before 702 BC, in which year (accord- ing to the Taylor cylinder) Sennacherib made Hez- kiah deliver up Padi, king of Ekron, who had been carried prisoner, "The accounts it Ch refer to David's taking Gath (1 Ch 18 1), which was recovered later, and again taken by Uzziiah (2 Ch 26 6). The Philis sent gifts to Jehoshaphat (17 11), but invaded the Shphelah (28 18) in the time of Ahaz.

In this age the "lords" of the 5 cities of Philistia are called "kings," both in the Bible and on Assyrian monuments. Isaiah (2 6) speaks of the Philis superstitions, Ezekiel (25 15 16) connects them with the Cherehthim on the seacoast. They still held Gath in the time of Amos (6 2), and Gaza, Ashdod and Ekron in that of Zephaniah (2 5), who again mentions the Cherehthim with Philis, as inhabitants of Canaan or the "land of the Philis." The last notice (Zec 9 6) still speaks of kings in Askelon, Gaza, Ekron and Ashdod at a time when the Ionians had become known in Judah (ver 13); but the Philis are unnoticed by Ezra or Nehemiah, unless we suppose that the "speech of Ashdod" (Ezra 4 11) and their "land of the Canaanites in general in earlier times—to have resembled that of the Babylonians and Assyrians, and to have thus differed—though Sem—from the Hebrews.

Their further history is embraced in that of the various cities to which reference can be made under the articles pertaining to them.

II. Monumental Notices.—These are of great importance, because they confirm the OT statements from a time at least as early as that of Moses, and down to 670 BC. Recent excavations at Gezer show the early presence of two races at this Philistia, one being Sem, the other probably Egypt. Scarabs as old as the XIIth Dynasty were found, and in the 15th cent. BC Gezer was held by Amenophis III. At Lachish also seals of this kind and his queen have been found, with a cuneiform letter to Zimridi, who was ruler of the city under the same Pharaoh. At Gaza a temple was built by Amenophis II. The names of places in Philistia noticed yet earlier by Thothmes III are all Sem, including Joppa, Saphir, Gerar, Gezer, etc. In the Am Tab we have also (about 1450 BC) letters from chiefs subject to Amenophis III at Joppa, Ashkelon, Gezer, Lachish and Rosh which show us a Sem population, not only by the language of these letters, but also by the names of the writers.

In the case of Ashkelon esp. the Sem rulers are found to have worshipped Dagon; and, though the name was not Sem. Aryan—invaders of the country, arriving about 1200 BC, they appear not only to contradict the Bible, but also to contra-we have seen, placed Caphtor in Cappadocia. The Cherethites and the Gittites (1 S 14) as a people of Philistia (ver 16), near Ziklag, and their name probably survives at the present town called Keratyhe in the Philin plain.

Yet, many theories are founded on this old idea about the Choridites. Some suppose that Tachitus confused the Jews with the Philistians, whereas the name comes from Crete; but what he actually says (Hist. v.11) is that "the Jews ran away from the Philistians and took "the inhabitants of Diadi from Mt. Ida, which, with a barbarous augment, becomes the name of the Jeadan." This absurd derision shows at least that Tachitus does not mean the Philis. Stephen of Byzantium said that the god Marnu and his shrine were called Kret, and their tradition was that they had seen the huge statue of a seated Jove found near Gaza, and now at Constantinople, but this is late Gr work, and the name Kret is Sem. Stephanus thought that Minuee—the port of Gaza—was named from the Cretan Minus, though it is an Arab, word Minueh, for "harbor," still applying to the same place.

No critical student is likely to prefer these later speculations to our present monumental information, even without reference to the contradiction of the Bible. Yet these theories that, in later times the supposed Caphtor of Homer's Iliad, with islanders of the "green sea," who may have lived in Arvad or in Cyprus; but there is no evidence in any written statement that they were Cretans, though a figure at Knossos in Cret seems somewhat resembles them. There are many indications that this figure—painted on the wall of the later palace—is not older than about 500 BC, and the Sidonians had colonies in Crete, where also potters have been known, and marked by a Phoen inscription in Cyprus. The Kefau youths bring vases as presents, and these—in all their details—are exactly the same as those represented in another picture of the time of Thothmes III, the bearers in this case being Harri from North Syria, represented with black beards and Sem features. Moreover, on the bilingual inscription called the Decree of Canopus (238 BC), the Kef region is said to be "Phoeinica," and the Gr translator naturally knew what was written by the Ecphraxes of Kef in Sem. In fact it is the Sem word for "palm," occurring in Heb (Isa 9 14; 19 15), and thus applicable to the "palm" land, Phoeinicia. Thus, even if Kef were related to Caphtor, the evidence would place the Phili home on the Phoeinician coast. The Kef الأوكة had indeed no evidence that any European race settled near the coasts of Pal before about 600 BC, when Esharhadon speaks of Gr kings in Cyprus. The Cretan theory of Michælis was a literary conjecture, which has been disproved by the results of exploration in Asia.

IV. David's Guards.—Another strange theory, equally old, represents David as being surrounded with foreign mercenaries—Philis and Canaries or Carian mercenaries. The suggestion that the Cherethites were of this race is scarcely worth notice, since the Heb ḫaph is not represented by žg in Egypt. David's band of Hebrew exiles, 400 in number, followed him to Gath where 200 Gittites joined him (2 S 16 18). In later times his army consisted of "the Cherethi (khrethi, in sing) and "the Peleti (pirēthi), commanded by the latter Jehodea (2 S 18 15; 18 7; 1 K 1 35 44), together with the Gittites under Itai of Gath. These guards are never said to have been Philis, but "the Cherethi" is supposed to design the Cherethites tribe, and "the Peleti" to be another name for the Phelites. In 2 S 23 29, where the Gittites, the fact that they came from Gath does not prove that they were Philis, any more than was David himself because he came back from this city. David calls Itai an "enemy" and an "exile," but it is probable that he was the same hero, named (2 S 23 29), who was the son of Ribai from Gibeah of Benjamin. He had himself not long joined David, being no doubt in exile at Gath, and his tribe at first opposed David, taking the side of Eshbuh. When Itai was joined the Cherethi and Peleti against Absalom, they were naturally suspected; for David still had enemies (2 S 15 5—13) among Benjamites of Saul's house. It is also surely impossible to suppose that David would have left the ark in charge of a Philis; and Obad-edom the Gittite (2 S 6 10) was a Levite, according to a later account (1 Ch 15 18), hearing a Heb name, meaning perhaps "servant of men," or "humble worshipper." It seems equally unlikely that, in later times, a pious priest like Jehodea (2 K 11 4) would have admitted foreign mercenaries into the temple. In this passage they are called כַּרִית, as also in 2 S 20 23, where LXX has Chereethi. The suggestion of Wellhausen that they were of Carians does not seem probable, and Carians had not even reached Egypt before about 600 BC.

The real explanation of these various words for soldiers seems simple; and David—being a very powerful king—was not likely to have needed foreign mercenaries; while the of These Philis, whom he had so repeatedly Terms smitten, were very unlikely to have formed trusty guards. The word "Chereethi" (k'rethi, or k'rethi) is formed from the place name. It is passed to "pelerithi" (pirēthi) means "a swift one" or "pursuer." In the time of Josiah the temple-guards are called כַּרִית (2 K 11 4-19, Carites), which LXX treats as either sing. or pl., and ṭוּרֶם or "runners" (see 1 S 22 17; 1 K 14 27: 22; 2 K 10 25), these two bodies perhaps answering to the Cherethi and Peleti of David's time; for כַּרִית means "stammerer." The term ṭוּרֶם, or "runners," is however of general application, since Jehu also had troops so called (2 K 10 25). We have seen that these were not a body of troops—as among the Romans—the heavier regiment of "destroyers," or "stammers," being armed with swords, daggers or spears; while the "swift ones" or "runners" pursued the defeated foe. Thus in Egypt the same name, the runners, are mentioned by the bow-man in regular regiments; and in Assyria the spear-man with heavy shields defending the bow-man. We have also a picture of the time of Tighlath-pileser III representing an Assyrian soldier on a camel. The Peleti or "pursuers" may have been "runners" on foot, but perhaps more probably mounted on camels, or on horses like the later Assyrians; for in the time of Solomon (1 K 4 28) horses and riding camels were in use—the former for chariots. It is clear that David's band, leaving the vicinity of Jered (1 S 29 1; 30 1), could not have reached Ziklag "on the third day" (a distance of 120 miles) on foot; so that the camel corps must have existed even before the death of Saul.

These considerations seem to make it evident that David's guards were native Hebrews, who had been with him as exiles and outlaws at 3. Native Hebrews Adullam and Gath, and that the Cherethi or "destroyer" only acquired this title through the Philistines of "destroyers" or Cherethim, who were not Cre-than, it would seem, any more than the "stammers" were Carians.

The general result of our inquiry is, that all monumental notices of the Philis agree with the statements, which make them to be a Sem people who had already migrated to Philistia by the time of Abraham, while the supposed discrepancies are caused by the mistakes made by a commentator of the 18th cent., and by archaeologists of later times.

LITERATURE

Born probably in the first decade of Augustus Caesar, who became emperor in 27 BC. He died possibly in the last years of Claudius (41-54 AD), more likely in the early years of Nero (54-65 AD). We have no exact information about either date. He was a native of Alexandria, Egypt. His relatives were wealthy and prominent, possibly sacerdotal, Jews. He received the best Jewish education, and was trained also in gentle learning—grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, geometry, poetry, music. Enjoying ample means, he was enabled to devote his career to scholarship. The Alexandrian Jews wielded great influence in the contemporary Rom empire, and the prominence of Philo's family is attested by the fact that his brother, Alexander Lyonsachus, was Alabarch of Alexandria. The single date in Philo's life which we know accurately is connected with their leadership. In the winter of 39-40 AD, he was spokesman of the deputation sent to Rome to protest against imposition of emperor-worship upon fellow-citizens of his faith. The mission failed, Philo, with his two colleagues, meeting rebuff, even insult. It was little likely that Caligula would heed grievances which included specifically dissent from worship of himself. Philo records his distaste for political activity, and, so far as we know, the Rom incident excepted, he devoted himself principally to letters. As a young man probably, he had undertaken a journey to Jerusalem, almost in the nature of a pilgrimage to the ancient shrine of his religion. He paid a second visit to Rome possibly after 50 AD, at all events, in the reign of Claudius. For the rest, our knowledge of his life is scanty and, sometimes, legendary.

The period covered by his career coincides with one of the most momentous epochs in history. For it witnesses, not only the foundation of the Rom imperial system, but also the beginning of the end of ancient classical civilization in its dominant ideas, and the plantation of Christianity. Prominently an era of transition, it was marked by significant displacements in culture, the effect of which was to weaken the old and even yet. Minor phenomena aside, three principal movements characterized the time: the Pagan reaction, or reversion to forms of religion that had sufficed the peoples of the Rom empire hitherto—this manifested itself strongly with Augustus, and entered its decline perhaps with the death of Plutarch (c 120 AD); the appearance of Christianity; and what is known as Syncretism, or interfusion between the conceptions of different races, esp. in religion, philosophy and material circumstances which circumscribed the fortunes of Christianity deeply, found its chief exponent in Philo, and maintained itself for several centuries in the theosophical systems of the Gnostics and neo-Platonists. Thus, to understand Philo, and to realize his importance, it is necessary to interpret the inner spirit of his age. The "universalism" of the Rom empire has been so named because, within the political framework, various peoples and divergent civilizations mingled and came eventually to share something of a common spirit, even of a common language. Philo's prominence, as a figure in the world of thought, and as an authority for the general culture of NT times, is out of all proportion to the fragmentary information available about his external career. Contemporary currents, subtle as they were, permeating cultures which otherwise were so far apart, met and fused in his person. Hence his value as an index to the temperament of the period cannot well be overrated.

A Jew by nature and nurture, an oriental mystic by accident of residence, Gr philosopher by higher education and professional study, an ally of the Rom governing classes, familiar with their intellectual perspectives, Philo is at once rich in suggestion and blurred in outline. Moreover, he addressed himself to two tasks, difficult to weld into a flawless unity. On the one hand, he wrote for educated men in Gr-Rom society, attempting to explain, often to justify, his racial religion before them. On the other, he was a man fallen upon iniquity, he enjoyed unusual opportunity to point the merits of the Jewish faith as the "desire of all nations," the panacea of which the need was everywhere felt. On the other hand, he had to confront his "orthodox" coreligionists, with their separatist traditions and their contempt for paganism in all its works. He tried to persuade them that, after all, Gr thought was not inimical to their cherished doctrines, but, on the contrary, involved similar almost identical. He thus represented an eclectic standpoint, one in which Gr philosophy blended with historical and dogmatic deductions from the Jewish Scriptures. The result was Philo's peculiar type of theosophy—we cannot call it a system. Taking the OT for text, he applied the "allegorical" method, with curious consequences. He taught that the Scriptures contain two meanings: a "lower" meaning, obvious in the literal statements of the text; and a "higher," or hidden meaning, perceptible to the "initiate" alone. In this way he found it possible to reconcile Gr intellectualism with Jewish belief. Greek thought exhibits the "hidden" meaning; it turns out to be the elucidation of the "allegory" which runs through the OT like a vein of gold. Moses, and the rest, are not merely historical figures, the subjects of such and such events and tudes, but representative types of reason, righteousness, the virtues, and so forth. The tendency to fusion of this kind was no new thing. It is traceable for some three centuries before Philo, who may be said to complete the process. It had been familiar to the rabbis, and to the Hellenistic philosophers, particularly the Stoics, who applied this method to the Gr poietic myths. Philo reduces it to an expert art, and uses it as an instrument to dissipate all difficulties. He believed it to be thoroughly true to the OT. But, thanks to his method, he rendered it malleable, and could thus adjust its interpretation to what he considered to be the intellectual necessities of his generation. Nay more, he felt that, when at his best in this process, he became a vehicle of Divine possession. He says, "Through the influence of Divine inspiration I have become excited profoundly . . . . then I have been conscious of a richness of interpretation, an enjoyment of the spiritual reality, a most manifest energy in all that was to be done." Again, "I am irradiated with the light of wisdom," and, "all intellect is a Divine inspiration." Little wonder, then, that we have a strange mixture of philosophy and theology in his mind, in the midst of Gr intellectualism with hazy oriental mysticism. Hence, too, the philosophy of Philo is subordinate to his explanation of the Scriptures, and compromise, rather than logical thinking, marks his leading positions.

After the death of Cicero (43 BC) a change, long preparing, asserted itself in ancient thought.

4. Changes and New Problems

A reorganization of standards of ethical judgment was thus rendered inevitable, and Judaism came to intermingle more freely with Gr philosophy as one consequence. While it is true that "reason penetrated intellectual supers" to solve all problems, the nature of the chief quest underwent transformation. The old association of man with Nature gave way to a dualism or opposition between the world-order and another existence lying behind it as its originator or sustainer. The system of Nature having disappointed expectation, thinkers asked how they could escape it, and assure themselves of definite relations with the Divine Being. They sought the desired connection with God's laws, but as a distant ideal. This was the problem that confronted Philo, who attacked it from the Jewish side. Now Judaism, like Gr thought, had also experienced a change of heart. Jeh had been the subject of an idealizing process, and tended, like the Stoic deity, to lose specific relation with the world and man. Accordingly, a new religious question was bringing the philosophy and the faith into closer contact. Could they join forces? Philo's consequent embarrassment rooted, not simply in his fresh pedagogical difficulties inseparable from the adjustment of his available methods and materials. For, while the Jewish Messiah had passed over into the Gr Logos, the two systems preserved their separation in no small measure, Philo believed the immeasurable. He was familiar with the mystic, transcendent concept of Deity extracted, thanks to long misinterpretation, from Plato's cosmogonic dialogue, Timaeus. Here God was elevated above the world. His conception of the presence, or immanence, of the Deity in the world came from the Stoics. The Jewish religion gave him the doctrine of a righteous (pure) Deity, whose moral inwardness made relations with men possible. Moreover, contemporary angelology and demonology enabled him to devise a scheme whereby the pure Deity could be linked with the gross world, notwithstanding its ineradicable evil. Little wonder, then, that he compassed an amalgamation only, and this in consonance with the theosophical drift of the age. Nevertheless, he counteracted the distant tendencies of rational speculation by reference to Hellenistic pantheism, and, at the same time, counteracted this pantheism by the inward moralism of his national faith. The logical symmetry of the Gr mind was reinforced by Hebraic religious factors: and this was done not as a system, but a ferment that cast up the clamant problem in unmistakable fashion. The crux was this: Man must surmount his own fragmentary experience and rise to an absolute Being; but, its absoluteness notwithstanding, this Being must be brought into direct contact with the finite. Philo was unable to reconcile the two demands, because he could not rise above them; but the effort after reconciliation controls all his thought.

3. Subjects of Inquiry

Philosophy's three main subjects of inquiry are: (1) the conception of God; (2) the manner of God's relation to the world; (3) human nature.

(1) Philo's doctrine of God, like that of the neo-Platonic school, is hazy, yet dualistic. No doubt, it is determined largely by certain human analogies.

(2) God's relation to the world—At this point Philo's thought assumes a phase of great interest. A relation to the NT. It would seem that Philo's thought was influenced by the Hellenistic psychological notion, that a word was a "shadow" or "image" of a thing. Thus the Logos was called the "shadow of God."—God being the "deed" whereby the "shadow" is cast. As a direct issue, the Logos presents two aspects. On the one side it is internal and indwelling; on the other, it is external and mediating. The scope of this distinction is indicated very well by the epithets which Philo applies to each aspect respectively. The internal Logos is the "Word of God," "Wisdom of God," "Mediator," the "Ransom," the "Image of God," "Member of the Trinity," "High Priest." The external Logos "abides in man," is the "Prophet," "Shepherd," "Ambassador," "Artist," "Elder," "Interpreter," "Manifestation of God." The former represents Philo's conception of the unity of the Logos with God, the latter his provision for the manifestation of the Logos in created things. He thus tries to preserve the transcendence of God equally with His immanence. No doubt, in previous times, the mysteriousness of the Divine nature had impressed itself upon men with at least as much force as now. But with one of two consequences. Either the particular finites and the Deity were mixed in inextricable confusion, as by oriental pantheism, or God was banished from the world, as by the extreme developments within G r dualism. Philo attempted to combine the two tendencies, and was able consequently to face the obvious contradiction between the idea of a material mediator and the Logos as a perfect type of multiplicity of phenomena in which this Being ought to be present somehow, despite transcendence. He demands a God who, in His exaltation, shall be a worthy Deity; this is the Jew in his highest development. But the Logos embraces everything between this God and His creation; this is the Greek and, in part, the Oriental, in him. Thanks to the former, he could not be satisfied with mere naturalism; thanks to the latter, no fable or picture could sufficiently realize the idea of the soul, who would link the world and its heart's desire. But Philo could not surmount one difficulty peculiar to contemporary thought. He was unable to connect God directly with creation and preserve its purity unalloyed. Hence the obscurity which surrounds his conception of the Logos, likewise his vacillation with respect to its personality. So we find the different intellectual forces which he inherited playing upon him—now one, now another. Sometimes the Platonic theory of Ideas dominates him; sometimes he leans to Stoicism, with its immanent world-reason; and here he even seems to foreshadow the doctrine of the Trinity; again, the ramifications of rabbinical lore cause him to bestow upon the Logos a humanity never cleared. In so far as Philo needs the Logos to connect God with the world, he inclines only if an element proper to Deity be discernible in mundane things. In other words, the Logos mediates between God and the world, but partakes of the Divine nature only. This, in any case, is the inner logic of Philo's view. It accounts for creation, but has no power to persuade man to overpass the limitations placed upon him by his bodily prison. Thus the question of the personality of the Logos is never cleared. In so far as Philo needs Logos to connect God with the world, he inclines to a doctrine of personality. In so far as he makes it the principle of all activities within the world, he inclines away from personality. In short, we have an "intelligible world," as a concept, there is an inherent tendency to reduce all finite being to illusion. Indeed, one might term the Logos a reply in some sort to Aristotle's question—which of the Platonic Ideas could connect the other Ideas with sensible things? Salvation is conceived as wrought out, not by the Logos flowing from Deity, an essence that found due expression rather in the cosmic order than in a person. While, therefore, Philo thinks in a cultural perspective akin to that characteristic of the author of the Fourth Gospel, two vast differences away his doctrine. On the one hand, it is speculative, not ethically personal. On the other hand, it fails completely to determine the nature of his mediator in itself, vacillating in a manner which shows how vague and fluid the conception really was.

(3) Doctrine of man.—This appears further in the doctrine of man. Following current interpretations of Plato, Philo makes man partake in the rational nature of God, but denies that he embodies the highest species of reason. That is, the ideal man and the man known to us in common experience are distinguished. The former is rational as God is. The latter is partly rational, partly irrational. The body vitiates the original angelic purity of the soul and, as the only medium for its action, is debased as the years lapse, a seed of Divinity is present, ready to burst forth. Thus man must crush the flesh and its desires. At this point we must note the effect of the Stoic idea. When he has attained this apathy, man can enjoy the life of contemplation. This, in its turn, culminates in ecstasy, when the human soul attains sudden and momentary union with the Divine. For the "fair man" is "given" the throne of God. Yet the doctrine remains intellectual even here. He "who escapes from his own mind flies to the mind of the universe, confessing that all the things of the human mind are vain and unreal, and attributing everything to God." Philo's anthropology therefore ends in contempt for this life, which is in no wise worth while, and in a counsel of perfection available only for a select élite. Accordingly, the conclusion of the whole matter is, that he never saw how the Divine and the human can be united, although he stated the factors of the problem with great clearness, and felt profoundly the urgency of a solution. His gospel was for the children of culture. He saw the eternal in the temporal, and comprehended the meaning of the word "Divine." He understood that "love for a Divine Person" might be so diffused throughout a Human soul as to render evil and unreality the means to the attainment of good and to the revelation of truth. The salvation he contemplated was from self, not in self; hence, as he asserts himself, harmony with God "is an incomprehensible mystery to the multitude, and is to be imparted to the instructed only." Nor is this wonderful. For a God who is the reasonable "form" of the world, reason is a "manifestation of a second principle"; and objects of sense rendered apparent by the operation of many curious intermediate forces, ranging from "angel-words" to the human soul, constitute a combination beyond the reach of any save the "initiate." More practicable is Philo's conception of the moral life—as a conflict of external against passion, pleasure and sensuality. Yet, even this contest is hopeless unless it be waged with the equipment of the "philosopher athlete." Escape from the "prison-house" of flesh would seem to be consequent only upon profound knowledge.

The probability is that Philo's works were written previous to his Roman embassy. They show how he tried to apply for philosophical conceptions to Jewish beliefs, history, and usages exclusively. The voluminous re-PHILOLOGUS, βιολογός (Φιλολόγος, Philo-logos, "fond of learning," "learned") was the name of a Roman Christian to whom St. Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 15). His name is coupled with that of Julia, who was probably his wife or sister. Philologus and those united with him in this salutation formed by themselves one of the "Christian oracles," groups or circles in the Christian community. The name is found in inscriptions connected with the imperial house, with reference to one of which Bishop Lightfoot has the following note: It has been suggested that Philologus was given by the master to the freedman mentioned in this inscription, as being appropriate to his office [Friedländer I, 89, 160]. . . . If, so, some light is thrown on the probable occupation of the Philologus of St. Paul!" (Phil, 177, n. 1).

LITERATURE

Only found in Col 2 8; lit. the love and pursuit of knowledge. In its technical sense, the term is now used for the conscious process, to interpret the whole of human experience, as a consistent and systematic unity, which would be the ultimate truth of all that may be known.

The term is also applied to a wish for experience, or parts of experience, however obtained, whether by revelation, intuition or unconscious speculation. No hard-and-fast line can be drawn between the two kinds of philosophy. Some of the most ancient speculations, as God, spirit, order, causation, true and false, good and evil, were not discovered by reason, but given in experience.

(1) Intuitive philosophy is universal. The human mind has always and everywhere furnished itself with some kind of speculation. From the lowest animism and fetichism up to the higher religions, ideas are found which served men as explanations of those features of experience which attracted their attention. They were often regarded as given by vision or by some method of revelation. In the higher religions, the mind reflected upon these ideas, and elaborated them into systems of thought that bear some resemblance to the speculative theories of western thought. In China, both Confucianism and Taoism developed theories of human life and destiny that bear some resemblance to Stoicism. The religions of Assyria and Babylonia enshrined in their legends theories of the world and of man and his institutions.
In India, both the Vedanta and the school of Mysticism developed into pantheistic Brahmanism, which reduced the multiplicity of experience into one ultimate being, Brahma. But the desire for moral salvation and the sense of pain and evil produced reaction, and led to the pessimistic and nihilistic philosophy of Buddhism. In Persia, when Zoroastrian consciousness awoke earlier, and the attempt to systematize the multiplicity of polytheism issued in the dualistic philosophy of later Zoroastranism.
The whole range of natural and supernatural kingdoms, created and ruled by two lords: Ahura Mazda, the creator of light and life, law, order and goodness, and Anrō Mainyūs, the author of darkness, evil and death. Each was surrounded by a court of spiritual beings kindred to himself, his messengers and agents in the world (see PERSIAN RELIGION [ANCIENT]). Of all these religious philosophies, only those of Assyria and Babylonia, and of Persia, are likely to have come into any contact with Biblical thought. The former have some affinity with the accounts of creation and the flood in Gen; and the influence of the latter may be traced in the dualism and angelology and demonology of later Judaism, and again in the gnostic systems that grew up in the Christian church, and through both channels it was perpetuated, as a dualistic influence, in the strata of Christian thought down through the Middle Ages.

(2) Speculative philosophy belongs mainly to western thought. It arose in Greece about the beginning of the 6th cent. BC. It began with the problem of the general nature of being, or ontology. But it was soon forced to consider the conditions of knowing anything at all, or epistemology. These two studies constitute metaphysics, a term often used as synonymous with philosophy in the stricter sense. Speculation about ideal truth again led to inquiries as to the ultimate nature of the kindred ideas of the good (ethics) and the beautiful (aesthetics). And as these ideas were related to society as well as to the individual, the Greeks developed theories of the ideal organization of society, of the true, the good and the beautiful, or politics and pedagogy. The early branch of speculation to which the Greeks made no unappreciable contribution was the philosophy of religion, which is a modern development.

The progressive growth of philosophy is something itself naturally into three main periods: (a) ancient, from the 6th cent. BC to the 3rd cent. AD. In this period the influence of Greek thought on the Western world is manifest. From the 16th cent. onward, some of the ruling conceptions of Greek thought were utilized for the systematization of Christianity, or modified, however, some independent Arabian and Jewish speculations;
(b) medieval, from the 3rd to the 16th cent.; and
(c) modern, from the 16th cent. to the present time, in which thought becomes free again to speculate on all the problems presented by experience, though it only realized its liberty fully in the hands of Locke, Hume and Kant.
Greek philosophy was the only speculative system that could have been influenced by OT thought. Its main development was contemporaneous with the later OT writers, but the two were essentially alike in being rooted in one another and no interchange of ideas was possible.

During the last two centuries BC, Gr thought spread so widely that it came to dominate the cultured thought of the world into which Christianity entered, and it would have been strange if no trace of its influence were found in the NT. In the first stage of its development, from Thales to Sokrates, it was potentially a great new philosophy, and attempts to explain the nature of reality by reducing the phenomenal world into some one of its elements. Sokrates changed its center of gravity, and definitely raised the problems of morality and knowledge to the position of first importance. His principles were developed by Plato into a complex and many-sided system which, more than any other, has influenced all subsequent thought. He united ultimate reality and the highest good into one supreme principle or idea which he called the Good, and also God. It was the essence, archetype and origin of all wisdom, goodness and beauty. It communicated itself as intermediary archetypal ideas to produce all individual things. So that the formative principles of morality and knowledge. But he had to make all things out of preexisting matter, which is essentially evil, and which therefore was refractory and hostile to the Good. That is why it did not make a perfect world. Plato's system was marred by an irreconcilable dualism of mind and body, spirit and matter, good and evil. And his mediating ideas could not bridge the gulf, because they belonged only to the side of the ideal. Aristotle was Plato's disciple, and he started from Plato's ideas, with presuppositions, but endeavored to transcend his dualism. He thus applied himself to a closer and more accurate study of actual experience, and added much to the knowledge of the physical world. He organized and classified the methods and contents of knowledge and created the science of logic, which in the Christian Middle Ages became the chief instrument of the great systematic theologians of the church. He tried to bring Plato's ideas "down from heaven," and to represent them as the creative and formative principles within the world, which is viewed as a system of development, rising by spiritual gradations from the lower to the higher forms, and culminating in God, who is the uncaused cause of all things. But underneath all the forms still remained matter as an antithetical element and Aristotle rather concealed than solved the dualism of Plato.

Meanwhile, the moral principles of Socrates were being developed with a more directly ethical interest, by the Cyreniaces and Epicureans, into a system of Hedonism, and, by the Cynics and Stoics, into a doctrine of intuitive right and duty, resting consistently upon a pantheistic and materialistic view of the universe. But the spiritual and ethical elements in Stoicism became only second to Platonism in the preparation of the Gr world for Christianity. During the last two and a half centuries BC, Gr philosophy showed signs of rapid decline. On the one hand, Pyrrho and his school propounded a thoroughgoing skepticism which denied the possibility of all knowledge whatsoever. On the other hand, the older schools, no longer served by creative minds, tended to merge their ideas into a common eclecticism which its teachers reduced into an empty and formal dogmatism. The most fruitful and fateful product of Greek thought in this period was its small group with Jewish and oriental ideas in the great cosmopolitan centers of the Gr world. There are evidences that this process was going on in the cities of Asia, Syria and Egypt, but the only extensive account of it remaining is found in the works of Philo, the Jewish philosopher of Alexandria (see PHILO JUDEUS). He tried to graft Plato's ideals upon Heb monotheism.

He starts with Plato's two principles, pure being or God, and protoexisting matter. In his endeavor to bridge the gulf between them, he interposed between God and the world the powers of God, goodness and justice; and to gather those into a final unity, he created his conception of the Logos of God. In the formation of this conception, he merged together the Platonic idea of the good, the Stoic idea of justice, and a number of mythological stories of the Bible: the story of Creation, the word, the name, of God, the heavenly man and the heavenly virgin, the Logos, the one mediator between God and the world. Christian thought laid hold of this idea, and employed it as its master-category for the interpretation of the person of Christ (see LOGOS).

There is no speculative philosophy in the OT nor any certain trace of its influence. Its writers and actors never set themselves to pursue knowledge in the abstract and for its own sake. They always wrought for and in Judaism moral purposes. But moral activity proceeds on the intellectual presuppositions and interpretations of the experiences within which it acts. Hence we find in the OT accounts of the origin of the course of moral and religious ideas, and interpretations of men's moral and religious experiences. They all center in God, issue from His sovereign will, and express the realization of His purpose of righteousness in the world (see God).

(1) All nature originated in God's creative act (Gen 2) or word (Gen 1). In later literature the whole course and order of Nature, its beauty and bounty, as well as its wonders and terrors, are represented as the acts of God's creative word (Ps 19, 29, 50, 65, 68, 104, etc.). But His action in Nature is always subordinated to His moral ends.

(2) Similarly, the course and events of the history of Israel and her neighbors are the acts of Jeh's will (Am 1; 2; Isa 41, 42; 45 3; 46 9.10.14). In the historical books of S and K, and still more of Ch, all the events of history are represented as the acts of God's moral government. In a more general way, the whole of history is set forth as a series of covenants that of God, of His free grace, made with man (see COVENANT), which show the progress of the Noahist covenant fixed by the order of Nature. The covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob accounted for the origin and choice of Israel. The covenants with Moses and Aaron established the Law and the priesthood, and that with David the kingship, which in the future lies in the new covenant (Jer 31, 35). God's covenants were all acts of His sovereign and gracious will.

(3) In post-exilic times, new experiences, and perhaps new intellectual influences, drew the Jews to probe deeper into the problem of existence. They adhered to the cardinal principle of Heb thought, that God's sovereign will, working out His purpose of righteousness, was the first cause of all things (see RIGHTEOUSNESS). But they found it difficult to coordinate this belief with their other ideas, in two ways. Ethical monotheism tended to become an abstract deism which removed God altogether out of the world. And the catastrophes that befell the nation, in the exile and after, raised the problem of evil and evil over against God's goodness and righteousness. Therefore in the Wisdom lit, we find some conscious speculation on these subjects (see WISDOM).

(a) The Book of Job discusses the problem of evil, and repudiates the idea that life and history are the processes of God's goodwill and purpose (see ECOLOGY), to the conclusion that all phenomenal existence is vanity. Yet ultimate philosophy is not pessimistic for it finds an abiding reality and hope in the fear of God and in the moral life (12 13-14). The same type of thought, however, is not absent. "The Mace, seems (1), 51. He Ch He series 2; A 6; God Esd He later Col whom the 20; Paul 15-17; the 8 Cor Rom of combined works "subtle philosophy, through theming in the world, and man's in the... ingenious. (ch 8). (d) The teaching of the Pharisees esp. reveals the tendency to twist or deform in later Judaism; they interposed between God and the world various... they name the glory of God and a host of angels, good and bad. They also fostered a new hope of the future, under the double form of the kingdom of God, and resurrection and immortality. How far these tendencies were due to the dualistic insights of the sages is a question for future research. (e) Esseneism represents another effort to get from the world to God by a crude kind of mysticism and asceticism, in contrast with both Judaism, dualism and evil. But they approach them under the direct influence of Gr thought. The Heb idea of wisdom was merged into the Gr conception of the Logos, and so it becomes the mediator of God's thought and activity in the world.

Philosophy appears in the NT as intuitive, speculative and eclectic. (1) Jesus Christ came to fulfill the law and the prophets, and, out of His filial consciousness of God, He 4. In the NT propounded answers to the practical demands of His time. (a) His doctrine of God the Father was a philosophy of Nature and life which transcended all dualism. In the kingdom of heaven, the good would ultimately prevail over the evil. The law of love expressed the ideal of conduct for man, as individual, and in his relation to society and to God, the supreme and ultimate reality. This teaching was given in the form of revelation, without any trace of speculation. (b) The apostolic writings built upon the teaching and person of Jesus Christ. Their ruling ideas are the doctrines which He taught and embodied. In Paul and John, they are realized as mystical experiences which are expressed in doctrines of universal love. But we may also discover in the apostolic writings at least three strands of speculative philosophy. (a) Paul employed arguments from natural theology, similar to those of the Stoics (Acts 14 15-17; 17 22-23; Rom 1 19 ff), which involved the principles of the cosmological and teleological arguments. (b) John employs the Philonic term "Logos" to interpret the person of Christ in His universal relation to God, man and the world; and the main elements of Philo's scheme are clearly present in his doctrine, though here it is no abstract conception standing between God and man, but a living person uniting the ideas of the Logos (1 Jn 1 18-19). Although the term "Logos" is not mentioned, in this sense, in Paul or He, the Philonic concept has been employed by both writers (Rom 5 8; 8 29; 1 Cor 16 24.25; 2 Cor 5 18.19; Phil 2 6; Col 1 15-17; 2 10; He 1 1-3,5,6. Paul also expresses his conception of Christ as the manifestation of God under the category of wisdom (1 Cor 1 20; 2 7; Eph 1 8; Col 2 3). (c) Both in Paul and He appear original speculations designed to interpret individual experience and human history as they exist in Christ. Each of Paul's interpretations consists of a series of parallel antitheses, flesh and spirit, sin and righteousness, law and grace, works and faith, Adam and Christ. But the author of He adopts the Platonic view that the world of history and phenomena is but the shadow of the spiritual and eternal reality which lies behind it, and which partially expresses itself through it. (3) In the one place in which the term philosophy appears in the NT (Col 2 8), it seems to mean "subtle dialectics and profuse speculation, ... combined with a mystic cosmogony and angelology" (Lightfoot, ad loc.), the first beginnings of Gnosticism in the Christian church. Paul warns his readers against it, as he also does the Corinthians against the Gnosticism of the Gnostics (1 Cor 1 24; 2 5.6). A similar tendency may be in view in the warning to Timothy against false doctrines (1 Tim 1 4; 4 3; 2 Tim 1 14.16 ff). But with the true spirit of philosophy, as the pursuit of truth, and the endeavor to the name of Jesus Christ clearly and clearly the nature of reality, the spirit and work of the NT writers were in complete accord.

PHINEES, 1Phineias (9Phineas, 1Phinees, 1Phineas [1 Esd 8 31]):
(1) Phineas, son of Eleazar, son of Aaron (1 Esd 5 5; 8 2 29; 2 Esd 1 2; 1 Mac 2 26; Sir 46 23).
(2) The father of Achias and son of Heli (El), a descendant of (1), and one of Ezra's progenitors (2 Esd 1 2); but this link is not found in Ezra's genealogy (cf. Ezra 3 1); neither is it found in Ezr Ch 6, and its insertion in 2 Esd 1 2 is a mistake, while Ezra's descent was from Eleazer, while this Phineas (Phinehas) was a descendant of Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron.
(3) A Levite, the father of Eleazar (1 Esd 8 63) = "Phinehas" of Ezr 8 33. But it is just possible that the well-known Eleazar (1) is referred to, and so not another and different Phinees.
(4) AV = RV "Phineas" (1 Esd 8 31).

PHINEHAS, fin'ê-as, -as, fin'ê-has, -has (a'fi, e'fi, pin'häa, "mouth of brass"): (1) Son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron (Ex 6 25; cf 1 Ch 6 4; Ezr 7 5, where he is seen to be an ancestor of Ezra). He took a leading part in cleansing Israel from worship at Shittim. He there punished the brazen calf worship, and slew a Midianite woman he had brought into camp (Nu 25 6-18). This incident is referred to in Ps 106 30.31 (cf 1 Mac 2 26.54; Sir 46 23.24). As priest he accompanied the new ships of the Greek navy (2 Mace 6). He was chief of the Korahite Levites (1 Ch 9 20), and succeeded his father as high priest. While he was in that office the civil war with Benjamin occurred, and it was he who delivered the oracle's decision to fight Benjamin (Jos 20 28 ff). His faithful services secured to his house the succession of the priesthood (Nu 25 11-13). He was sent as ambassador to inquire into the reported idolatry of Reuben, Gad and part of Manasseh (Josh 22 13 ff 30-32). According to LXX he was buried with his father in Ephraim on the hill Gibeah Phinehas (see Jos 24 33). His character was marked with strong moral indignation and fine integrity.

(2) The younger son of Eli (1 1 3; 2 Esd 1 2, "Phineas"). See HOPNI AND PHINEHAS.
(3) Father of a priest named Eleazar (Ezr 8 33; cf ver 2; 1 Esd 8 63, "Phinehas"). HENRY WALLACE

PHINEOB, fin'ê-b (9Phineas, 9Phineus; AV Phinehas): Name of one of the families of temple-servants who went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 31) = "Paseah" of Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 51.

PHLEGON, fê'gôn, fêk'ôn (phê'gon, Phêgon): The name of a Roman Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16.14). Of him nothing is known.

PHOEBE, ἤπειρος (Φοίβη, Φωβή; AV Phoebe): Described by St. Paul as (1) "our sister," (2) "who is a servant of the church that is at Cenchreae," (3) "a helper of many, and of mine own self" (Rom 16.1.2). (1) "Our [Christian] sister": Paul calls the believing husband and wife "the brother or the sister" (1 Cor 7.15), and also says, "Have we no right to lead about a wife that is a sister?" (1 Cor 9.5 m.). The church was a family. (2) The Gr word τητρας "servant is διάκονος. "Servant" is vague, and "deaconess" is too general. In the later church there was an order of deaconesses for special work among women, owing to the peculiar circumstances of oriental life, but we have no reason to believe there was such an order at this early period. If Phoebe had voluntarily devoted herself "to minister unto the saints" by means of charity and hospitality, she would be called διάκονος. (3) The Gr word προστίθησις τητρας "helper" is better "patroness." The msc. is "the title of a citizen in Athens who took charge of the interests of clients and persons who took up residence there. She was a very popular figure among the early Christian communities had the appearance of clients under a patron, and probably the community of Cenchreae met in the house of Phoebe. She also devoted her influence and means to the assistance of the poor. The ancient name of Phoebe is works. Phoibe; thus, not only was Phoebe a Christian, but she was one of those who benefitted. Gifford thinks some special occasion is meant, and that Paul refers to this in Acts 18.18. The vow "seems to point to a deliverance from danger or sickness" in which Phoebe had participated on behalf of herself and others. It is generally assumed that this letter was taken to Rome by Phoebe, these verses introducing her to the Christian community. In commending her, Paul asks that the Rom Christians "receive her in the Lord," i.e. give her a Christian welcome, and that they "assist her in whatsoever matter she may have need of" them (Rom 16.1.2).

PHOENICE, φοινίκα (Φόινιξ, Φωινίξ). See PHOENIX.

The term "Phoenicia" is Gr (φοινικίτης, Φωινικίτης, "land of dates, or palm trees," from φοινίξ, "the date-palm")). It occurs in the Bible only in Acts (11.19; 15.3; 21.2), the Land land being generally designated as the "coast" or "borders of Tyre and Sidon" (Mt 15.21; Mk 7.24-31; Lk 6.17). In the OT we find it included in the land belonging to the Cannanites or to Sidon (Gen 10.19; 49.13; Josh 11.8; 1 K 19.7). The limits of P. were indefinite almost throughout its history. It is described by chronic writers including the coast line from Mt. Cassius on the N. to Gaza or beyond on the S., a distance of some 380 miles, or about 400 miles if we include the sweep of indentations and bays and the outstretching of the promontories. But in the stricter sense, it did not extend beyond Cabalas (Cabalas, Cabala) on the N., and Mt. Carmel on the S., or some 150 miles. The name was probably first applied to the region opposite Cyprus, from Gabala to Aradus and Marathus, where the date-palm was observed, and there were still groves farther S., it was applied to that region also. The palm tree is common on the coins of both Aradus and Tyre, and it still grows on the coast, though not in great abundance. The width of the land also was indefinite, not extending inland beyond the crest of the two ranges of mountains, the Baryulus (Nusairi Mountains) and the Lebanon, which run parallel to the coast and leave but little space between them and the sea for the greater portion of their length. It is doubtful whether the Phoenicians occupied the mountain tracts, but they must have dominated them on the western slopes, since they derived from them timber for their ships and temples. The width of the country probably did not exceed 25 or 30 miles at the most, and in many places it was much less, a very small territory, in fact, but one that played a distinguished rôle in ancient times.

There are few harbors on the whole coast, none in the modern sense, since what few bays and inlets there are afford but slight shelter to modern ships, but those of the ancients found sufficient protection in a number of places, esp. by means of artificial harbors, and the facility with which they could be drawn upon at the sandy beach in winter when navigation was suspended. The promontories are few and do not mark the edges of the coast but rather more marked the entrance of the harbors; the coast, forming quite an extensive bay, which extends to Acre. The promontory rises to a height of 500 ft. or more near the sea and to more than double that elevation in its course to the S.E.

Mt. Lebanon which forms the background of P. for about 100 miles, is a most striking feature of the landscape. It rises to a height of 10,200 ft. in the highest point, E. of Tripolis, and to 8,500 in Jebel Sannin, E. of Beirut, and the average elevation is from 5,000 to 6,000 ft. It is rent by deep gorges where the numerous streams have cut their way to the sea, furnishing most varied and picturesque scenery. It was originally heavily wooded with cedar, oak, and pine trees, which are still found in considerable numbers, but by far the larger part of the mountain has been denuded of forests, and the slopes have been extensively terraced for the cultivation of vines and fruit trees and the mulberry for silk culture. The plains along the coast are not extensive, but generally very fertile and bear abundant crops of wheat, barley and other cereals, where not given to the culture of the mulberry, orange, lemon, fig, apricot and other small fruits. In its greatest extent P. included the broad plain of Sharon and that of Acre, between Carmel and that city and a portion of the region watered by the Kishon, but the plains of P., strictly speaking, are much more restricted. They are: the plain of Tyre, long but narrow, extending from Ras el-Abiyadh to Sarepta; the plain of Sidon extending from Sarepta to the Bostraeus (Nahr el-Abiyadh); the plain of Beirut (Berytus) between the extensive sand dunes along the shore and the rocky cape on the W. and the foot of Lebanon, 10 or 12 miles long but only one or two wide, containing one of the largest olive groves in Syria; the very small plain of Tripolis, including that city and its port; and, the most extensive of all, the plain of Marathus, extending from Arka to Arados or even beyond, including the river Leuktherus (Nahr el-Khabir). These plains furnished only a portion of the food needed by the inhabitants who were more or less dependent on their neighbors for it (1 K 5.11; Acts 12.20).

The rivers of P. are comparatively short and small; the Litani rises in the Dakeb, between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and finds its way in a deep and narrow gorge between Lebanon and Mt. Hermon to the S. and finally turns westward and reaches the sea a few miles N. of Tyre, where it is called the Kašmatiyeh. About 12 miles N. of Beirut is the Dog River (Lycus), a very short stream but noted for the famous pass at its mouth, where Egypt, Assyry and Bab kings engraved their monuments; and the Nahr Ibrahim (Gehlaweh), which comes down from 'Ajjeh (Ahecheh, Josh 13 4), noted for the rites of Venus and Adonis (see TAMMUZ); and the Elus- therus, already mentioned, which runs through the valley between Bargylus and Lebanon and provides the sea with two mouths into the interior. The other rivers are very short, but furnish a perennial water-supply to the coast dwellers.

The products of the land, as well as the climate, are very varied on account of the difference in elevation of the tracts suitable to culture, ranging in temperature from the semi-tropical to Alpine. How far the ancients cultivated the mountain sides we do not know, but they certainly profited largely by the forests of cedars and pine, esp. the former, which were fit for shipbuilding and architectural purposes, and was highly prized, not only by the Phoenicians, but also by Egyptians, Assyrians and Babylonians, who transported it to their own countries for buildings. The mineral products are few, and the independent character of their colonies and other lands for what they needed of these.

The narrowness of the land and the difficulty of access on account of the lofty mountain ranges and the banks and shores of the interior led the Phoenicians to turn seaward for an outlet to their increasing population. We have only one instance of their attempt to colonize the Hinterland, and that ended in disaster (1 Kgs 18). But the Phoenicians, was not displeased with Solomon's gift of 20 cities in Galilee, probably not desiring to assume responsibility for their defense. The Phoenicians became traders, and the possession of the sea was more inviting to them, and they found room for expansion in the islands and on the coast of the Mediterranean, where they established colonies far and wide. Their first over-sea possessions were in Cyprus, the coast of which they occupied in the 2d millennium BC, probably about 1500. On the southern coast they planted various colonies, such as Citium (Larnaca), Amathus, Curium and Paphos, and on the eastern, Salamis, Ammochostos and Sal; and, in the interior, Isauria, Salamis, Limassos and Salamis, besides other less important settlements. The evidences of the Phoenician occupation of the island abound. The southern portions of Minor also attracted them at an early date, esp. the rich plains of Cilicia, and Tarus became the most important of its towns. Its coins bear Phoenian type legends, among which Baal is conspicuous. Other points along the coast were occupied by them, and the island of Crete as well, perhaps certain ports on the south coast of Crete, and most of the islands of the Aegean. Their presence is noted on the Attic coins, and at various places, and in the legends of Diod, the reputed son of Ugarit, king of P. F. But it is doubtful whether they really colonized the mainland of Greece. They were more attracted by the lands farther to the W.

The colonies of the Phoenicians were mostly factories for the exchange of their manufactured articles for the products of the lands they visited. They cared little about building up new states or for extending their discipline among barbarous tribes and imparting to them their culture. In this they were far surpassing the Phoenicians, who profoundly modified the peoples and lands with which they came in contact.

The Phoenicians were the same as the Canaanites, under which name they are known in the OT, as also called Sidonian (Gen 10 19; Nu 21 1).

3. The Colonies

Their colonies were very many, and if we may judge by their language and characteristics. It is true that, in Gen 10 6 Canaan is called a son of Ham, but it is also true that the language of Canaan is identified with Heb (Is 19 18). If the early Phoenicians spoke a different tongue, they entirely lost it before their contact with the Hebrews. Their writings and all the references to them in ancient authorities show that their language was purely Sem. As to their origin and the time of their migration to the Syrian coast, it is more difficult to determine. Herodotus (1:2; vii.89) says that they lived at first on the Erythraean Sea, which is identified with the Pers Gulf, and modern authorities have not found evidence to support this statement. Certain it is that they were not the aborigines of the country, and must have come in with some of the various migrations from the E., which we know, from Egypt and Bab monuments, occurred in the 3d, perhaps in the 4th, millennium BC. Some of these are found in Sidon as early as the IVth Egypt Dynasty, about 3000 BC, and we may fairly conjecture that the Canaanites were in possession of the seacoast as early as 2500 BC. It is possible that they were among the Hyksos invaders of Palestine before the 11th century BC.

That the Phoenicians took to the sea at a very early date and became the most skillful mariners of the ancient world is certain. Their enterprise in this direction is attested by classic writers, and the references to it in the OT are numerous. This was coupled with great industry and skill in the manufacture of the various articles which furnished the materials of their extended commerce. They exhibited a boldness and audacity in braving the perils of the sea in their little ships, which, for the age, demands our admiration. They were the first who dared to sail out of sight of land, and to explore the deeps of the earth. It is not incredible that they crossed the line of the Pillar of Hercules into the ocean. But in their commercial dealings they were often unscrupulous, and their greed of gain often led them to take unfair advantage of the barbarous tribes with whom they traded. The wealth of their enterprise, which is not confined to commerce, but extends to colonies in other countries, is well illustrated by the story of the Increase of the oxen, which are so often spoken of in the OT. The Phoenicians were the first to introduce the art of navigation amongst the nations of the world, and their trading in the far-off islands and countries is a remarkable testimony to their enterprise and their skill. Their chief object, however, was trade.
position for their enterprise and skill in carrying on their trade, and in being the pioneers of civilization in many of the Mediterranean lands, esp. by their introduction of alphabetical writing, which was incapable of being falsified. It helped them for the contributions to the culture of the ancient world.

(1) The Phoenicians were celebrated for their textile fabrics of silk, wool, linen and cotton. The materials of the last three were obtained from Syria and Egypt, but the silk came from the East, and the Phoenicians and their hunder and permanence of color were unequalled by the ancients and made the Tyrian purple famous throughout the world. For all, the finer qualities of the Phoenician fabrics were so precious that only the very wealthy, or kings and princes, could obtain it, and it became at last a synonym of royalty. This dye was obtained from the shell-fish which was abundant in the Mediterranean, esp. along the Phoenian coast, species of the Murex and the Bucinum. The mode of manufacture is not definitely known and was probably kept a secret by the Phoenicians. At least they had a monopoly of the Murex, from which it was obtained.

(2) Glass was another well-known product of the country, and although not invented by the Phoenicians as formerly supposed, it was made in large quantities and exported to all countries about the shores of the Mediterranean, and those of the Near East.

(3) Pottery was also an article of manufacture and export, and some of the examples of their work found in Cyprus show considerable skill in the art of decoration as well as making. In this, however, they were far surpassed by the Greeks.

(4) Bronze was a speciality of the Phoenicians, and they were for centuries the leading copper-workers, since they controlled the sources of supply of the copper and tin used in its manufacture. The remains of their bronze manufactures are numerous, such as arms for offence and defence, knives, toilet articles, axes, sickles, cups, patens, and various other household utensils. Articles for artistic purposes are not of high value, although the pillars named Jachin and Boaz, the molten sea, the bases, lavers and other articles cast by Hiram of Tyre for the temple of the Lord in Jerusalem, have exhibited considerable artistic merit. Their bronze was of good quality and was tempered so as to serve well for edged tools. The composition was about 9 parts copper to 1 of tin. They seem also to have made iron (2 Ch 2:14), though in very small quantities, which we cannot judge from their scarcity as to the extent of their manufactures in this metal, since most of the articles have perished by corrosion.

Aesthetic art among the Phoenicians was of low grade, as it was among the Semites generally, and where we find some works of moderate merit they undoubtedly manifest the influence of Græt art, such as those found in Cyprus by General Di Cesnola and others. In Phoenicia proper there was no great art with a culture, as in ancient Egypt, and the Phoenician artists were not original in their work. The Phoenicians were skilful in making glass, bronze and later in iron. They were also skilful mariners and producers. Their caravans travelled the well-beaten routes of the East, the deserts of Arabia and the mountain defiles of Armenia and Asia Minor, and their ships pushed boldly out to sea and explored the Mediterranean and the Euxine and did not hesitate to brave the unknown dangers of the Atlantic and perhaps even penetrated to the Baltic, emulating the mariners of a later day in their zeal for discovery and search for new avenues of trade. Could we find a detailed account of their voyages and discoveries, it would be a most interesting document, but we have little except what others have written about them, which, however, gives us a pretty fair idea of the extent of their commercial enterprises. The Phoenicians have given us a remarkable catalogue of the wares of Tyre and of the countries with which she traded (Ezk 27). There we have mention of nearly all the regions of Western Asia, Egypt, Greece and the islands, and Spain, indicated by the names of races, tribes and countries. The materials of their traffic include the most important known to the ancient world, the products of agriculture, such as wool, linen, oil, balm, spices, frankincense, wine, corn, etc.; of metals, such as gold, silver, copper, brass, tin, lead, etc.; precious stones and the articles of manufacture, the "multitude of handiworks," which they were so skilful in producing. They traded in animals also, horses, mules, lambs, rams and goats, and, what is less to their credit, in the persons of men (ver 13). The range of their trade was much wider than is indicated by Ezekiel. We know they reached the Scilly Isles in Britain, and probably the Baltic, whither they went for amber, though this might have been brought overland to the Adriatic and received into the ships there. They also went to the west coast of Africa as far as Cape Non, and perhaps farther, for Herodotus tells us that Pharaoh-nechoh dispatched a crew of Phoenician sailors to circumnavigate Africa, which they accomplished in 3 years.

We know that they had been in India, sailing from Elath or Eacon-gard (1 K 4:26,27), and it is quite possible that they were allowed by some of the kings of Egypt to avail themselves of ports on the other branch of the Red Sea. They must have visited the eastern shore of Africa and perhaps struck across the Indian Ocean, after skirting the coast of Arabia, and thus carried on trade with India. The Ophir mentioned in connection with these voyages has not been definitely located, but it was perhaps in southern Arabia, though possibly in Southeast Africa (see Gold and Silver). The ships in which the Phoenicians made these voyages were small as compared with the great vessels of the present day, but the largest known in their age, as we may infer from the long voyages they made. Their superiority is testified to by classical writers. In the famous condition of Xerxes to Greece the Phoenian ships exceeded all others in size, speed, and the sea. They were used to sail again and again, and when they left the land together, when they embarked upon the sea (Herod. vii.100).

The ships of the Phoenicians were large and fast. The Phoenicians knew how to use the sails, both on the open sea and in the Mediter- ranean, and the Phoenician sailors, particularly those who served in the Phoenician navy, were the best in the world. The elegance and grace of their ships was known throughout the Mediterranean.

Trade was the very life of Phoenicia. The contracted limits of the land forbade any extensive agriculture, and the people were forced to get their living by other means. They applied themselves to industrial arts, and this led them to seek the means for distributing their wares. Trade was essential to them, and they sought to carry it through all parts of the world. They had a great position esp. favorable for commerce. In the very center of the ancient world, with the great rich and populous nations of antiquity at their back and on either side, they faced the young, vigorous and growing nations of the West, and they harbored the merchants and producers. Their caravans traveled the well-beaten routes of the East, the deserts of Arabia and the mountain defiles of Armenia and Asia Minor, and their ships pushed boldly out to sea and explored the Mediterranean and the Euxine and did not hesitate to brave the unknown dangers of the Atlantic and perhaps even penetrated to the Baltic, emulating the mariners of a later day in their zeal for discovery and search for new avenues of trade. Trade was the very life of Phoenicia. The contracted limits of the land forbade any extensive agriculture, and the people were forced to get their the merit of bringing the invention to the knowledge of the western world. It is quite certain that the alphabets of Western Asia, and those of Europe were derived from the Phoenicians. This is what we should have expected from their wide commercial relations. The alphabetic writing was in fact one of their chief and most important contributions to the knowledge of the world. The Phoenicians were a great debt to this people for this invaluable aid to literary, scientific and religious progress.

The Phoenician alphabet comprises 22 letters and is deficient in consonant vowels, which were left to be supplied by the reader. This defect is common to all alphabets, and was soon remedied when the Greeks adopted the Phoenician. Some of the letters have to serve for two sounds, such as the sign for $s$ and $h$, for example, th, and a redundant sign for the sound of $w$. Also the sounds of $v$ and $y$ are unrepresented.

Phoenicians, however, adopted hieroglyphic signs for words and syllables used by the Egyptians, and are not altogether to be regarded as having merely preserved the memory of their own. Thus the first letter, $a$, which makes the"ox," was evidently derived from the picture of an ox's head and then reduced to a conventional form.

Phoenician letters are probably to be found in the hieroglyphic signs for words and syllables used by the Egyptians, and are not altogether to be regarded as having merely preserved the memory of their own. Thus the first letter, $a$, which makes the "ox," was evidently derived from the picture of an ox's head and then reduced to a conventional form.

The Phoenician alphabet and language were common to the Canaanitish tribes and the Hebrews, as we learn from the Bible. They had many productions found in Western Asia. The M S testifies to their use in the Jordan, and the Siloam Inscription likewise for Israel, and the same characters have been found in North Syria. This would be natural, for people of these regions had become largely Sem by the 9th cent. B.C., when we suppose that the Phoenician alphabet was in general use.

It is strange to the Phoenicians, who had an alphabet so early, and made it so widely known to the world, that they found it for little words, and the remains of their language are very scanty, mostly inscriptions, and these generally very brief. The longest inscription in Phoenician is on a sarcophagus in Egypt, which Philo of Byblos claims to have treasured from the Phoenician original. This, however, is doubted, and both the ancient and modern conceptions of thePhoenician alphabet are mythical.

The other work is genuine: the short account of the voyage of the Phoenician king beyond the Pillars of Hercules, called the Periplus of Hanno, is not without merit as a narrative, and indicates that the Carthaginian king had a sea beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and his lands were long as alive, but it is unfortunately lost. It is not, however, that it was very extensive or very important, as such a work of it would then have been preserved. The conclusion is natural that the Phoenicians were so absorbed in commercial enterprises and the pursuit of wealth that they neglected the nobler uses of the invaluable instrument of culture they had found in alphabetic writing.

A very prominent rôle was assigned to religion in the life of the Phoenicians. As a Sem people, such a characteristic was but natural and Religion they seem to have possessed it in large measure. Their religious ideas are important account of the influence they had on the Hebrews, which is so apparent in the OT. The worship of the Canaanitish Baal and Ashthoreth, or Astarte, led the Israelites astray and produced most disastrous results.

There can be little doubt that the chief deities of the Phoenicians, as well as the forms of their cult, were derived from Babylonia, brought with them probably when they migrated to the W., but afterward modified by contact with Egypt and Greece. Some regard the earliest conception of the deity among them as a result of the Semitism, and we find traces of this in the attributes ascribed by the Phoenicians to their chief god. He is Baal, the chief deity of Phoenicia, and was usually worshiped, being usually designated by the identity in each place: Baal of Tyre or Baal-Taur, Baal-Sidon, Baal-Tars (Tarsus), Baal-bek, etc. He was regarded as the god of the generative principle in Nature, and his statues were sometimes flanked by bulls. He was identified with Zeus, and appears on the coins under the Greek type of Zeus, seated on a throne, holding an eagle in the outstretched right hand and a scepter in the left. Sometimes his head is encircled with rays showing him to be the sun-god.

Ashthoreth (Phoen שׁתרת, 'ashthòrëth) was the great Nature-goddess, the Magna Mater, queen of heaven (Jer 7:18), and was associated with Baal in Sidon, so she was often represented under the lunar aspect, Ashthoreth-karnain, "Ashthoreth of the two horns" (Gen 14:5). Sometimes she is represented holding the dove, the symbol of fecundity, of which she was the goddess. She was commonly identified with Aphrodite or Venus. She, like Baal, had temples everywhere, and kings were sometimes her high priests, and her worship was too often accompanied with orgies of the most corrupt kind, as at Aphaca (see Ashtoreth).

Among the other gods we may mention: El, or El ( אלי, 'el), originally the designation of the supreme God, but afterward a subordinate deity who became the special divinity of Byblos (Gebal), and was regarded by the Greeks as the same as Kronos.

Melkarth (Phoen מלקתר, melkarth, "king of the city") originally was the same as Baal, representing one aspect of that god, but later a separate deity, the patron god of Tyre. He was worshipped on many of its coins, as well as his symbol, the club, since he was identified with Hercules. Herodotus describes his temple at Tyre to which he attributes great antiquity, 2,900 years before his time. Dagon ( דגון, dāgôn) seems to have been the tutelary deity of Arvadus, his head appearing on the early autonomous coins of that city. He seems to have been regarded as the god of agriculture by the Phoenicians, rather than of fishing as generally supposed.

Adonis ( אדוניס, 'ădônîs, "lord") was regarded as the son of Cinyras, a mythic king of Gebal and the husband of Ashthoreth. The myth of his death by the wild boar led to the peculiar rites of celebrating it, instituted by the women of Gebal at Aphaca and on the river named after him (see Tamuz).

Esmun ( אסמע, 'esmûn) one of the sons of Siddik, the father of the Cabiri, was esp. honored at Sidon and Beirut. At Sidon a great temple was built in his honor, the ruins of which have been recently explored and various inscriptions found dedicating it to him. His name signifies "the eighth," i.e. the eighth son of Siddik, the others being the Cabiri, or Great Ones, who were regarded as presiding over ships and navigation, and as such were worshipped in many places, although their special seat was Beirut. Although they were called "Great" they are represented as dwarfs, and an image of one of them was placed on the prow, or
The goddess Tanith (Τάνθι) occupied a lofty place in the pantheon, since in inscriptions she takes the precedence over Baal when the two names occur together. She is esp. honored at Carthage and to her name is attributed the excised mark given, such as "the highest of all"; "the mistress of the elements," etc. Besides some other gods of less note originally worshipped by the Phoenicians, they introduced some foreign deities into their pantheon. Thus Poseidon appears frequently in the coins of Beirut and became its patron deity in Rom times; Isis and her temple at Gebal are likewise represented on its coins, the Dioscuri or their symbols on those of Tripolis and Beirut, etc.

The corrupt nature of the Phoen worship has been referred to. It was also cruel, the custom of human sacrifices being common and carried to an extent unheard of among other peoples, such as the horrible sacrifice of 200 noble youths at Carthage when besieged by Agathocles. The sacrifice was by burning, the victim being placed in the arms of the statue of the god, heated for the purpose. In P., this god was Melkarth, or Melech, and the custom is denounced in the OT (Lev 20:2–5), but other gods went along with this vice. The Phoenician temples, like the Phoenicians, were undoubtedly deep, but sadly corrupt and depraved.

The political history of P. is that of the towns and cities belonging to it. The country as a whole had no centralized government, but in 874 BC under Thothmes III. This king subdued most of the Phoen cities, or received their submission, in his numerous campaigns to Syria, and the Egypt rule continued with more or less interruption until the fall of the kingdom under the XXth Dynasty, or about 300 years. During this time Arvad seems to have exercised the hegemony in the N., and Sidon in the S., with Gebal controlling the middle region.

The Am Tab reveals many facts concerning the condition of things while the Egypt power was declining in the latter part of the XVIIIth Dynasty, esp. in the reign of Amenhotep IV (Ikhnaton). The rise of the Amorite and Hittite power in the N. threatened these cities, which were under Egypt governors, and they were called upon to succor for aid, which was not given, and they fell, one after another, into the hands of the enemy. Rameses II restored Egypt rule, but his successors of the XXth Dynasty could not maintain it, and the invasion of tribes from the W. and N., called the Pelaet, or Philis, by land and sea, though repelled by Rameses III, continued to increase until the Egypt domination was broken, and the coast towns resumed their independence about the middle of the 13th BC. Sidon came to the present city of P., which is referred to by Joshua as "Great Sidon" (Jos 11:18). Homer also mentions Sidon frequently, but makes no reference to Tyre. The latter city was certainly in existence in his day, but had not come to the front as the leading city in the mind of the Greeks. Yet it was a fortified city in the time of Joshua (19:29), and the king of Tyre is among the correspondents mentioned in the Am Tab. It seems to have taken precedence of Sidon when the latter was attacked by the Philis of Askelon, and the inhabitants were expelled from their city, called by the Philis, "the highest of the gods"; "the mistress of the elements," etc. Besides some other gods of less note originally worshipped by the Phoenicians, they introduced some foreign deities into their pantheon. The Phoenician temples, like the Phoenicians, were undoubtedly deep, but sadly corrupt and depraved.
although the town on the mainland was destroyed, it is doubtful whether the king of Babylon took the island itself. Yet it must be attributed (585 BC). P. remained subject to Babylon until that empire fell into the hands of the Persians (538), and then accepted the yoke of the latter in the days of Cambyses, if not earlier, but the Pers kings does Eff not seem to have used force to gain the adherence of the Phoenicians. He needed their fleets to assist in the attack upon Egypt and secured them without difficulty. They aided him in the conquest of Egypt, but when he asked to proceed against Carthage they refused, and he had to desert the scheme. It was too necessary for him to run any risk of alienating it.

This navy was the strongest sea power of the Persians in all their coming wars with Greece. Without its assistance Darius and his successors could with difficulty have invaded that country or held in subjection the western coast of Asia Minor. P. remained faithful to her Persian rulers about 150 years, but when the general revolt of the western satrapies occurred in 302 BC, P. seems to have favored them, but no open rebellion broke out until 351, when Sidon and Tyre were succeeded by Taphron (Tobron), who declared her independence and induced most of the Phoen cities to do the same. The Pers garrisons were massacred or driven out. Ocyus, the king of Persia, marched with an army of 300,000 infantry and 3000 chariots against Tyre and Sidon; but the citizens, in cowardly alarm, betrayed Sidon into his hands, but the citizens set fire to the city and destroyed themselves rather than fall into the hands of Ocyus, who, as treacherous as Taphron, slew the traitor (see Sidon). The other cities were subjugated, and P. remained subject to Persia until the time of Alexander the Great. When this conqueror invaded the dominions of Persia and had defeated Darius at Issus, 333 BC, he demanded the submission of the Phoen cities, and all yielded save Tyre. Alexander was obliged to lay siege to it, which cost him 7 months of the severest labor, such was the valor and skill of the Tyrians. The capture of Tyre is reckoned as one of the greatest exploits of this mighty conqueror who stained his record by his cruel treatment of the brave defenders. He massacred the male prisoners and sold the remainder of the inhabitants, to the number of 30,000, into slavery (see Tyre). After the death of Alexander the Tyrians were subject to Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria, the latter finally obtaining control of all by the victory of Antiochus III over Scopas in 198 BC. From this time on P. formed a part of the Seleucid kingdom until it passed, together with Syria and Pal., into the hands of the Romans. Its cities became the home of many Greeks and its language became largely Gr., as inscriptions and coins testify. The Romans had also much to do in modifying the character of the people, and some towns, Berytus, esp., became largely Roman. P. can hardly be said to have had a separate existence after the Gr. invasion.

PHOENIC, fēnik ( פּוֹאִינִיק, Phōniiks, AV Phoenice); a harbor on Crete. Acts 27:12. W. the ancient name of a ship carrying St. Paul and the author of Acts, after it left Myra in Lycia, was prevented by adverse winds from holding a straight course to Italy, and sailed under the lee of Crete, off the promontory of Salmoniæ, kátath Salménaion; the ship was then able to make her way along the S. shore of Crete to a harbor called Fair Havens (Καλός Αυτέρ, Kalós Æterne), near a city Lasea (Lassia, Lassotia). Thence, in spite of St. Paul's desire to winter in Fair Havens, it was decided to sail to Phoenix (πεινίκία, Phōnikē; τῇ Κρήτῃ βῆμαντα κατά Χάρω καὶ κατά Χάρων (τοις Φωνίκης, limēna τῆς Κρήτης) βῇμαντα κατά Λίβα κατά καθόρων, a description which has been translated by two ways: (1) "looking toward the S.W. wind and toward the N.W. wind, i.e. looking S.W. and N.W."; (2) "looking down the S.W. wind and down the N.W. wind, i.e. looking N.E. and S.E." On the way thither, they were struck by a wind from the N.E., called Euraquilo, and ran before it under the lee of an island, called Cauda or Claudia (Kláúa, Káuda [N-B-E], Kláusa, Klaída [N-A] etc.) in Acts 27:7-17. It will be convenient to discuss those places together. The following account is based on Smith's elaborate study in his Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, which has been followed by all later writers.

The ship, when it left Myra, was obviously making for Italy (Puteoli or Ostia) by the shortest route, round Cape Malea, but off Chiusus it encountered a strong N.W. wind and had to pass the lee of Crete. Salamine, now called Cape Sidero, was the promontory which forms the N.E. corner of the island. Thence along the S. shore of Crete, as far as Cae Matala, a sailing ship is sheltered by the mountains and the violence of the N.W. wind. At Cape Matala, where the coast turns toward the N.W., there is no such shelter. Fair Havens must therefore be looked for to the E. of Cape Matala, and there is a harbor, lying 6 miles E. of Cape Matala, which is called Fair Havens by the modern Greek inhabitants of the island. There is no doubt that this is the harbor in which the Alexandrian ship took shelter. It is sheltered only from the N. and N.W. winds.

The ruins of a city which has been identified with Lasea have been found 5 miles E. from Fair Havens, and 12 miles S. of the important city of Gortyna. It has been suggested that St. Paul's desire to winter at Fair Havens (Acts 27:10) may have been due to its proximity to Gortyna, and the opportunity which the latter city afforded for missionary work. There were many Jews in Gortyna. See CRETE.

From Fair Havens, against the advice of St. Paul, it was decided to sail to Phoenix, there to pass the winter. While the ship was on its way thither, it was struck by a storm. N.E. winds from the Scylla of Scopas, called Euraquilo, and carried under the lee of an islet called Cauda or Claudia. When this happened, the ship was evidently crossing the Bay of Messaria, and from this point a N.E. wind must have carried her under the lee of an island now called Caudino in Greek and Goziano in Italian, situated about 23 miles S.W. of the center of the Gulf of Messaria. The modern name of the island shows that Cauda (Caudus in the Nōsitēs Episcopqum), and not Claudia is the true ancient name.

The writer of Acts never saw Phoenix, which must have been a good harbor, as the nautical experts decided to winter there (Acts 27:11). Now the only safe harbor on the S. coast of Crete in which a ship large enough to carry a cargo of corn and 280 souls could moor is the harbor beside Loutro, a village on the S. coast of Crete, directly N. of Cauda. All the ancient authorities agree in placing Phoenix in this neighborhood. The harbor at Loutro affords shelter for a large ship, and a road runs from Phoenix seems certain. But a serious difficulty arises on this view. The words describing the harbor of Phoenix ordinarily mean "looking toward the S.W. and the N.W.", but the harbor beside Loutro looks eastward. Bishop_wordsworth to identify Phoenix with an open roadstead on the western side of the isthmus on which Loutro stands. But this roadstead is not a suitable place for wintering in, and it is better either to take the words to mean, in sailor's language, "looking down the S.W. and N.W. winds"—a description which exactly fits the harbor at Loutro—or to assume that the reporter of the discussion referred to in Acts 27 10–12 or the writer of Acts made a mistake in describing a place which he had never seen. An inscription belonging to the reign of Trajan found at Egypt shows that Egyptian writers were wont to lie up there for the winter.

PHOROS, fôrôs (Φόρος, Phorós, B. Swete), fôrôs, Phorês [1 Esd 8 30, where AV Pharez]; Name of one of the families, part of whom went up from the exile with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 8 9) and part with Ezra (8 30 RV) = “Parosh” of Ezr 2 3; 8 3, and some members of which had taken “strange wives” (1 Esd 9 20).

PHURAI, frû'ti, frû'ti'rî (Φούραι, Phorrai; al. in Ν and A. Φορραία, Phorrraia, and Φορρύπι, Phorroupi; AV Phurrim): In Ad Est 11 1, “the ep. of Phurrai” means the preceding Book of Est. See Pehem. 1

PHRYGIA, frîj'i-a (Φρυγία, Prugia): A large ancient country of Central Asia Minor, very mountainous and with table-lands reaching 4,000 ft. in height. It is derived from the Indo-European name of Thrace, which in early times invaded the country and drove out or absorbed the earlier Asiatic inhabitants, among whom were the Hitites. Thus the Phrygians borrowed much of oriental civilization, esp. of art and mythology which they transferred to Europe. To define the boundaries of Phrygia would be exceedingly difficult, for as in the case of other Asia Minor countries, they were always vague and they shifted with nearly every age. The entire country abounds with ruins of former cities and with almost countless rock-hewn tombs, some of which are of very great antiquity. Among the most interesting of the rock sculptures are the beautiful tombs of the kings bearing the name Midas and Gordius, with which classical tradition has made us familiar. It seems that at one period the country may have extended to the Hellespont, even including Troy, but later the Phrygians were driven toward the interior. In Rom times, however, when Paul was there, the country was divided into two parts, one of which was known as Galatian Phrygia, and the other as Asian Phrygia, because it was a part of the Roman province of Asia, but the line between them was never sharply drawn. The Asian Phrygia was the larger of the two divisions, including the greater part of the older country; Galatian Phrygia was small, extending along the Pisdian Mountains, but among its important cities were Antioch, Iconium and Apollonia. And the 20 AD city of Hierapolis, in Galatian Phrygia, was no longer kept together, its different parts were known as Phrygna Prima and Phrygna Secunda. That part of Asia Minor is now ruled by a Turkish wali or governor whose residence is in Konia, the ancient Iconium. The population consists not only of Turks, but of Greeks, Armenians, Jews, Kurds and many small tribes of uncertain ancestry, and of peculiar customs and religious practices. The people live mostly in small villages which are scattered throughout the picturesque country. Silk and goat raising are the leading industries; brigandage is common. According to Acts 2 10, Jews from Phrygia went to Jerusalem, and in Acts 18 23 we learn that many of them were influential and perhaps fanatical. According to Acts 18 6, Paul traveled while on his second journey from Lystra, to Iconium and Antioch in Galatian Phrygia.

Twice he entered Phrygia in Asia, but on his 2d journey he was forbidden to preach there. Christianity was introduced into Phrygia by Paul and Barnabas, Acts 14 7. Among the inhabitants were the Jews of Antioch on the Euormus, Acts 18 23, yet it did not spread there rapidly. Churches were later founded, perhaps by Timothy or by John, at Colossae, Laodicea and Hierapolis.

PHURAH, fû'râ (Φούρα, Phurah, "branch"). See Phurah.

PHUT, fut (Phuth, pît). See Puth.

PHUVAH, fu'va. See Phurah.

PHYGELUS, fi-jè'lus (Φυγέλους, Phygelus; Tischendorf and WH, with others, read Φυγέλος, Phygelos, Phygelus or Phygelus [2 Tim 1 15]; AV Phygelus, fi-jel'us): One of the Christians who deserted Paul at the time of his 2d imprisonment at Rome. Paul mentions him, along with Hymenaeus and Philetus, as being among those “that are in Asia,” who turned away from him then. What is meant may be that Phygelus and Hymenaeus, along with other native Christians from Asia, were in Rome when he was brought before the emperor's tribunal the second time, and that they had not merely taken no measures to stand by and support him, but that they had deserted him.

The meaning, however, may be that the turning away of Phygelus and Hymenaeus from Paul took place not in Rome, but in Asia itself.

The times during and immediately following the Neronic persecution were more dreadful than can easily be conceived, especially with the Christian foreboding for the Christian name, and to do so in a wholesale fashion. A great community like the Christian church in Ephesus or in Rome was the terrible promise of those times, when for a mere word—a word, however, denying the Lord that bought them—men were once set free under persecution, from the loss of property or of home, and from death. I Pet records how the aftermath of the Neronic persecution had extended far indeed from Rome, where it had originated. Peter asks the Christians not to give way under "the fiery trial" which is trying them (1 Pet 4 12), and those whom he thus addresses were the members of the church throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia (1 Pet 1 1). The epistle to the seven churches in Asia in the Apocalypse also show how sore persecution had raged throughout that province. See Persecution. But in addition to the temptation to deny Christ's name and to be afraid to hear him or to judge him, there was also another which pressed upon some of the churches, the temptation to repudiate the authority of Paul. Many passages in the NT bear witness to the fact that Paul was sometimes very lightly esteemed, and how his authority was repudiated, e.g. by persons in Corinth, and in the churches of Galatia.

What is said here is, that among the Christians of proconsular Asia, i.e. of Ephesus and the churches in the valley of the Cayster, there was a widespread defection from that loyalty to Paul which was to be expected from those who owed to him all that they possessed of the knowledge of Christ's salvation. "All that are in Asia turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes." On the whole, all the necessary conditions of these words are satisfied by a reference to Rome and to Paul's environment there, and perhaps this is the more probable meaning. See Hermogenes.

PHYLACTERY, fi-la-ktek'-ré (φυλακτήριον, phylaktērion, "guard"): This word is found only in Mt 23 5 in Our Lord's denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees, who, in order that their references works might be "seen of men," and in their zeal for the forms of religion, "make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments." The corresponding word in the OT, יָּפֵלָה (yappâh or kempâh) (Kemay in HDB) suggests pointing as the segolate fem. sing, fastening it to the arm being in the form of the letter γέθ (γ), and the end of the string, or band, finally wound around the middle finger of the hand, "a sign upon thy hand" (Dt 6:8). This box had one compartment containing one or all of the four passages given above. The writer in his youth found one of these in a comparatively remote locality, evidently lost by a Jewish peddler, which contained only the 24th text (Ex 13:11-16) in unpointed Heb. (2) Another was to be bound in the center of the forehead, "between thine eyes" (Dt 6:8), the knot of the band being in the form of the letter דילך (ד), with the letter שׁלא (שׁ) upon each end of the box, which was divided into four compartments with one of the four passages in each. These two Heb letters, with the ס of the arm-phylactery (see 1 above), formed the Divine name נָנָה, shadday, "Almighty." Quite elaborate ceremonial accompanied the "laying on" of the phylacteries, that of the arm being bound on first, and that of the head next, quotations from Scripture or Talm being repeated at each stage of the binding. They were to be worn by every male over 13 years old at the time of morning prayer, except on Sabbaths and festival days, such days being in themselves sufficient reminders of "the commandment, the statutes, and the ordinances" of Jehovah (Dt 6:1).

The passages on which the wearing of the phylacteries is based are as follows: "It [i.e. the feast of unleavened bread] shall be for a sign unto thee upon thy hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes, that the law of Jehovah may be in thy mouth" (Ex 13:9); "And it [i.e. sacrifice of the firstborn] shall be for a sign upon thy hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes" (Ex 13:9). "And Jehovah's name shall be 8. 1. Interprete frontibus timentem Deo (Dt 31:16; n. translation of OT 10): "thou shalt bind them i.e. the words passages of Jehovah for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes" (Dt 6:8); "therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul; and ye shall bind them for a sign upon your hand, and they shall be for frontlets between your eyes" (11:18). It is evident that the words in Ex are beyond all question used figuratively; a careful reading of the verses in Dt in close relation to their contexts, in which are other figures of speech not to be taken literally, is sufficient proof of their purely figurative intention also. Only the formalism of later ages could distort these figures into the gross and materialistic practice of the phylactery. Just when this practice began cannot accurately be determined. While the Talm attempts to trace it back to the primitive, even Mosaic, times, it probably did not long anticipate the birth of Christ. In conservative Jewish circles it has been maintained that the custom became, and at present is faithfully followed by orthodox Judaism. Every male, who at the age of 13 becomes a "son of the Law" (bar mitzvah), must wear the phylactery and perform the accompanying ceremony.

In the NT passage (Mt 23:5) Our Lord rebukes the Pharisees, who make more pronounced the un-Scriptural formalism and the crude literalism of the phylacteries by making them obtrusively large, as they also seek notoriety for their ostentation, by the enlarged fringes, or "borders." PHYLARCH, φιλάρχος (phularches), Phularches: Given in AV of 2 Mac 8:32 as a proper name "Phylarchus" but in RV the phylarch of Timotheus's force; "probably the captain of an irregular auxiliary force" (RVm), rather than a cavalry officer.

PHYLARCHEES, φιλάρχες (AV Philarches). See PHYLARCHES.

PHYSICIAN, φισίσχιαν (φισίσχιαν), raphht; latrēs, iatrōs: To the pious Jew at all times God was the healer (Dt 32:39): "It was neither herb nor mollifying plaster that cured them, but thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things" (Wisd 16:12). The first physicians mentioned in Scripture are those of Egypt. Long before the sojourn of the Hebrews in that land, Egypt had a priestly class of physicians (eus) and a class of healers (iowtēs). From the ancient medical papyri which have been preserved, the largest of which is the Papyrus Ebers, we know that the medical knowledge of these physicians was purely empirical, largely magical and wholly unscientific. In spite of their ample opportunities they knew next to nothing of human anatomy, their descriptions of diseases are hopelessly crude, and three-fourths of the hundreds of prescriptions in the papyri are wholly inert. Even their art of embalming was so imperfect that few of their mummiied corpses have remained in any other climate than that of Egypt. Physicians of this kind who were Joseph's servants embalmed Jacob (Gen 50:2) and Joseph (ver 20). It was not until the foundation of the School of Alexandria, which was purely Greek, that Egypt became a place of medical education and research.
There is no evidence that at any time the priests of Israel were reputed to be the possessors of medical knowledge or tradition. In the ceremonial law they had explicit instructions as to the isolation of those suffering from skin eruptions, so that they might recognize certain obnoxious and infectious forms when such persons came near, but with this duty as sanitary police their function ended, and they used no means to cure these diseases.

There is, as far as I know, no record or tradition of a priest-physician in Bible times. The records of cure by the prophets, esp. Elisha, are mostly recorded as miracles, not as curative treatment. The salt which cured the noxious water at Jericho and the meal by which the poisonous gourds were rendered innocuous, like the manipulation of the Shunammite’s son, can scarcely be regarded as adequate remedies. There is an implied reference to a healer of wounds in Ex 21:19, as also in Isa 3:7, and it is recorded in Pātāhāv, iv.9 that there was in existence in the time of the monarchy a book of cures, sēpher ṭēphēʾīṯ, supposed to have been written by Solomon, but withdrawn from public use by Asa. The function of Herod’s physicians is 2Ch 15:13, but Asa is obviously regarded by the Chronicler as prepossessing in trusting to their skill. In 2K 8:20 Joram, king of Israel, is said to have gone to Jezebel to be healed. Not, I imagine, by any of the above, but by some at Gilead, which possibly may also have been a place resorted to by those needing medical treatment, as indicated by Jeremiah’s query: “Is there no balm in Gilead? is there no physician there?” (Jer 8:22). Job, irritated by the claims of his friends, calls them physicians of no value (13:4).

In the NT Our Lord’s saying, “They that are whole have no need of a physician,” etc., shows that there were physicians in Galilee (Mt 9:12; Mk 2:17; Lk 5:31), and in Nazareth He quotes what seems to have been a proverb: “Physician, heal thyself” (Lk 4:23). There were physicians in Galilee who received fees from the woman of Canaarea (Philippi who had the issue of blood (Mt 5:36; Lk 8:45). Of her there is a curious story told in Eusebius (VII.18).

There are several Talmudic references to physicians; in Sīḥāṭim 5:1, it is said that there was a physician at the temple to attend to the priests. A physician was appointed in every city (Gittha 12), and was supposed to have a house from the local authorities (Bāḥbah Ḳaṭrā 21a). The familiar passage in Eccles 38:1–15 RV in praise of the physician gives him but limited credit for his skill: “There is a time when in their very hands is the issue for good” and later, “He that sinneth before his Maker, Let him fall into the hands of the physician.”

Luke, called “the beloved physician” in Col 4:14, is said by Eusebius to have been a native of Antioch and a physician by profession. According to Origen he was the unnamed “brother whose praise in the gospel is spread through all the churches” (2 Cor 8:18). There are evidences of his professional studies in the language of his writings, though of this probably more has been made by Hobart and others than it really merits. Had we not known of his profession it is doubtful whether it could have been conjectured from his choice of words. Sir W. Ramsay calls attention to the two words used by Melita in Acts 28:8–9: for the cure of Publius’ father the word used is ἰέσας, but for the healing of those who came later it is ἑθέρωνιαν, which he renders “received medical treatment.” From this he infers that Luke helped Paul with these (Ramsay, Luke the Physician, 1908).

PI-BeSeth, pl-bē’seth (ךְִּבְּסֶת, pl-bhēseth; LXX Βυβάςτος, Bubástos; Eng Py-BAsh, “the house of Baarth,” the cat-headed goddess; the Egyptian form is usually Ha-BAsh: it is doubtful if the form Pi-BAsh has yet been found): A city of ancient Egypt. The only occurrence of the name of this place in the OT is in Ezek 30:17: where it is coupled with Aven, i.e. On (Heliopeis). Pi-beshet was on the western bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, about 40 miles N. of Memphis, about 15 miles N.E. of On. Herod. otus found the city of Bubastis very beautiful as his day. The annual festival of the goddess, Baarth, was celebrated here with revolting license, similar to that of the festival of Syr禹 ol-Bedawer now kept in Tauna.

Pi-beshet was explored by Professor Naville under the Egypt Exploration Society in 1887–89. There were uncovered ruins of Egypt from Egyptian Dynasty of the Old Empire, from the Middle Empire, an important Hyksos settlement, and ruins from the New Empire down to the end, and even from Rom times. The first structure of which the remains are the most complete, and of the most unique in all Egypt, is the cemetery of cats. These cats, the animal sacred to Baarth, were mummified at other places in Egypt, but at Pi-beshet they were burned and the ashes and bones gathered and buried in great pits lined with brick or hard clay. Bones of the ichneumon were also found mixed with those of the cats in these pits (Egypt Exploration Fund Report, 1891).

PICTURE, pik’är: This word (in the pl.) is found 3 t in AV, viz. Nu 33:52; Isa 2:16; Prov 25:11. In Nu and Prov “pictures” represents the Hebrew word רֵעוֹז, maskith, “showpiece,” “figure.” The context in Nu suggests that the “pictures” or “carved figures” (RV “figured stones”) which the Israelites were to destroy were symbols of Canaan worship and therefore foreign to the religion of Jeh. In Prov for “pictures of silver,” ERV has “baskets [AV ‘network’] of silver,” but a more probable tr is “carvings of silver.” “Pictures” stands for a slightly different word (but from the same root) in Gen, viz. קָסָם, kēsām: RV renders “imagination.” There is a watchword in the rabbinic proverb: “If a picture (of gods) in animal or human shapes) on the prows of vessels.”

T. Lewis

PIECE, pēs: In AV the word (sing. and pl.) represents a large number of different Heb words, many of which have more or less the same significance, e.g. piece of meat or flesh (Gen 16:10; 2 S 6:10; Ezek 24:4); of bread or cake (1 S 2:36; 30:12; Jer 37:21); of ground or land (2 S 23:11); of wall (Neh 3:11.9.5); of an ear (Am 3:12); of cloth or garment (1 K 11:39); of mullenstone (Jgs 9:53). It is used frequently in paraphrastic renderings of various Heb vbs.: “break,” “tear,” “cut,” etc, in pieces (Gen 44:28, etc.).

In the NT “piece” renders κομμένα, εἴδικμά, “piece” or “a piece of cloth” (Mt 9:16; Mk 2:21; Lk 5:36). It is also found in paraphrastic renderings—broken in pieces (Mk 5:4), pulled in pieces (Acts 23:10). T. Lewis

PIECE OF MONEY: Two words are thus rendered in AV (ךְִּשַּׁהל, k-siḥeh; στατήρ, statēr). RV gives only the first this rendering (Job 42:11).
PIECE OF SILVER: Two words are thus rendered in the OT (יָם הָבֵּשׁ, raqê-khâsheph, and וְקַרְשׁ, k'tâshîh) and two in the NT (ἀγγυρία, argyria (Mt 26 15; 27 3-9), is τραγή as pieces of silver, but probably means shekels. In Acts 19 19 the same word occurs, but in this case the reference is probably to the denarius or drachma (cf Lk 18 5 f). Thus the 30 pieces of Mt would be equal to about £4 or $20, and the 50,000 of Acts to about £2,000 or $10,000.

PIETY, πτει:—Only in 1 Tim 5 4: “Let them learn first to show piety towards their own family,” where “let them show piety” represents a single Gr vb, ἐπιτείνεται, in its only other occurrence (Acts 7 20) being rendered “worship.” In Egyptian hieroglyph “piety” (like the Lat pieta) could be used of devotion to one’s parents (as still in the phrase “filial piety”), as well as of devotion to God. Hence there is no explicit statement here that filial devotion is one form of Divine worship.

PIGEON, пi'vn (πῖς), yânâh; πεταύρια, peris- tēr: Lat pipâre: A bird of the family Columbidae. See Dove. The Heb yânâh seems to be τρα, either pigeon or dove, yet almost every reference made to these birds pictures that there were distinct branches of the family recognized, and one or the other or both are designated. On the other hand, some of the τρα read doves, where the remainder of the text makes it very clear that pigeons were the birds intended. The Lat pipâr means “to be cheap,” and refers to the unusually clumsy young in the nest. The old birds coo, moan and wail as doves. The birds are almost 12 in. long, have full, plump bodies that are delicious food, and beautifully marked and shaded plumage. They feed principally on grain, seeds, small buds and fruit. Beyond question wild pigeons were the first birds domesticated and taught to home with man. They appeared in the OT much complete domestication, that they flew free, yet hobbled and bred in places provided by man at the time of the very first attempts at keeping records of history. At the time the earliest Bib. accounts were written, pigeons were so domesticated that in all known countries of the East they were regarded when an estimate was made of a man’s wealth.

The rich provided large and expensive cotes of moulded pottery for their birds, each section big enough for a pair. The right and left rows of openings resembling lattice work, so that Isaiah refers to them as “windows” (60 8). LXX reads σῶν νασσόν, σῶν νασσοῖς, lit. “with young” or “fledglings” (see below). The middle classes modeled cotes of oven-baked clay, and the very poor cut holes in the walls, the “doors,” and allowed the birds to enter and live with the family.

In wild estate, rock and wood pigeons swarmed in countless numbers through rocky caverns and ravens, and over the plains of Gennesaret, the forests of Gilad, and the woods of Lebanon. They remained throughout the season, breeding at all times. The doves were migratory, and were kept in confinement only as caged pets or to be held for sale for sacrifice. For these purposes, it appears that the dove was slightly preferred. When only one bird was to be used, a dove is always specified; where two, almost in every case the dove is mentioned first. Where one or the other will suffice, the dove seems to have been given preference. This may have been because it required only to procure a dove, and so it was considered a greater sacrifice. Everyone having a home of any sort had pigeons they could use, or they could be taken wild at any time. The dove is first mentioned in Gen 15 9: “And he said unto his servant a three years old, and a she-goat three years old, and a ram three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon.”

It will be observed that the dove is mentioned first, and it is specified that only one pigeon was required. It seems probable that the people protected their domesticated pigeons by using the wild for sacrifice, whenever possible. Young birds could be taken from a nest at almost any time. The old birds, among the wild, were shy creatures and more difficult to capture in nets or snares than doves that came close to cities and villages to live, and exhibited much less fear of man than the wild pigeons. The next reference is in Lev 5 7: “And if his means suffice not for a lamb, then shall he bring his trespass-offering for that wherein he hath sinned, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, unto Jeh: one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering.” Here two birds of each kind were to be offered, if the person making the sacrifice could not afford a lamb. Again in Lev 12 6: “And when the days of her purification are fulfilled, for a son, or for a daughter, she shall bring a lamb a year old for a burnt-offering, and a young pigeon, or a turtle-dove, for a sin-offering, unto the door of the tent of meeting, unto the priest.” Here is a rare instance where the text or the translators place the pigeon first.

“And on the eighth day he shall bring two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, to the priest, to the door of the tent of meeting” (Nu 6 10). In Cant 2 14:

“O my dove, that art in the couch of the feck, in the covert of the steep place. Let me see thy comeliness, let me hear thy voice; For sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely.”

Here the text reads “dove,” but the description of the location and the implication of the text prove the bird to have been a rock pigeon—a tender, loving thing, yet shy and timid, that peeps with eyes of bright concern over the rocks of its chosen home, down on the mountain-tops, and among branches that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?” Here is another place where the wrong bird is used. Doves were wild and migratory. They had no “windows.” But the tile pots massed in stone diamond-studded coves were cut at a little distance, like latticed windows. This should read “pigeons” instead of “doves.” For the same reason see Jer 48 28: “O ye inhabitants of Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock; and be like the dove that maketh her nest over the mouth of the abyss.” Again the bird specified is the rock pigeon. Lk 2 24: “A sacrifice according to that
PI-HAIROTH, pi'-ha-hi'roth (πι'νεός ἢ ἄρος, πι'-ha-hi'roth) [Ex 14 2-9; Nu 33 7-8]: Nothing is known of the meaning of the name

1. Meaning Pi-H. Some attempts toward an etymology for it have been made, but without much success. Since the meaning of the name is unknown and no description of the place or its use is given, it is impossible to determine anything concerning the character of Pi-H., whether a city, a sanctuary, a fortress, or some natural feature of the landscape.

Neither Pi-H. nor any other place mentioned with it can be exactly located. A recent discovery of manuscripts in Egypt furnishes a nothing comparable to the account in the Bible itself. If any one of the places mentioned in connection with the crossing of the Red Sea could be located approximately, all the others could, also, be similarly located by the description given in the account in Ex. The route beyond the Sea has heretofore been treated with almost positive certainty. A journey along the way is so convincing that hardly anything can shake the conviction which it produces. This identification of the route of the exodus beyond the Sea required that place of the crossing to be within 3 days' journey of Marah, which puts it somewhere near the modern Suez. It may be anywhere within 10 miles of that point. This approximately locates all the other places mentioned in connection with the crossing. Migdol must be Ras 'Alak, or some other high point in the mountains of the western deserts, where might be placed a watch-tower.

Pi-H. is between this point and the Sea and Baal-zephon near the opposite eastern shore. This puts Pi-H. at some point along the old shore line of the Sea within 10 miles of the site of modern Suez.

LITERATURE

The names Pontius indicates the stock from which Pilate was descended. It was one of the most famous of Samnite names; it was a name as often mentioned in Roman history after the Samnites were conquered and absorbed. Lucius Pontius Aquila was a friend of Cicero and one of the assassins of Julius Caesar. The cognomen Pilatus indicates the familia, or branch of the gens Pontius, to which Pilate belonged. It has been derived from pilum, the javelin worn by freedmen; this is improbable, as Pilate was of equestrian rank. It has also been derived from pilum, a spear. Probably the name was one that had descended to Pilate from his ancestors, and its origin is nowhere mentioned. Pilate was 5th procurator of Judaea. The province of Judaea had formerly been the kingdom of Arachdus, and was formed when he was deposed (3 AD). Speaking roughly, it took in the southern half of Pal, including Sa-Pilate tells us (Lk 23:2) that on another occasion he dedicated some gilt shields in the palace of Herod in honor of the emperor; but there was no representation of any forbidden thing, but simply a shield, the name of the donor and of him in whose honor they were set up. The Jews petitioned him to have them removed; when he refused, they appealed to Pilate, who sent an order that they should be removed to Caesarea.

Of the incident, mentioned in Lk 13:1, of the Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices, nothing further is known.

Jos (Ant., XVIII, iv, 1, 2) gives an account of the incident which led to the name of the donor and of him in whose honor they were set up. The pretender arose in Samaria who promised the Samaritans that if they would assemble at Mt. Gerizim, he would show them the sacred vessels which Moses had hidden there. A great multitude assembled in readiness to ascend the mountain, but before they could accomplish their aim they were attacked by Pilate's cavalry, and many of them were slain. The Samaritans thereupon sent an embassy to Vitellius, the legate of Syria, to accuse Pilate of the murder of those who had been slain. Vitellius, who desired to stand well with the Jews, deposed Pilate and appointed Marcianus in his place, and ordered Pilate to go to Rome and answer the charges made against him before the emperor. Pilate set out for Rome, but, before he could reach it, Tiberius had died; and it is probable that, in the meantime when he was there, Pilate escaped the inquisition with which he was threatened. From this point onward history knows nothing more of Pilate.

The shortest and simplest account of Pilate's dealings with Jesus Christ is given in the Gospel of Mk. There we are told that Pilate asked Jesus if he was the king of the Jews, received an affirmative answer; that, to Pilate's surprise, Jesus answered nothing to the accusations of the chief priests; that Pilate tried to release Jesus according to an ancient custom; that the multitude, in spite of the protest of Pilate, demanded the release of Barabbas, and cried out that Jesus should be crucified; that Pilate, notwithstanding the express wish of the people, delivered him to be crucified; and that Jesus, when he had been scourged and mocked, was led away to be crucified. Mk tells further how Joseph of Arimathea begged of Pilate the body of Jesus. Pilate was surprised that Jesus died so quickly, and quizzed him about it. In Pilate's surprise and question are peculiar to Mk. Being satisfied on this point, Pilate granted the body to Joseph. Mt adds the dream and message of Pilate's wife (Mt 27:19); it also tells how Pilate washed his hands before the people, disclaiming responsibility for the death of Jesus, and how the people accepted the responsibility (Mt 27:24); also how Pilate granted a guard for the tomb (Mt 27:62-66).

Lk alone narrates the sending of Jesus to Herod (Lk 23:6-12), and reports Pilate's three times repeated assertion that he found no fault in Jesus (Lk 23:4.14.22). Jn gives by far the fullest narrative, which forms a framework into which the more fragmentary accounts of the Synoptics can be fitted with perfect ease. Some critics, holding that Mk alone is trustworthy, deny the name of the donor and dates given in Mt and Lk as apologetic amplifications; and many dismiss the narrative of Jn as wholly unworthy of credence. Such theories are based on preconceived opinions as to the date, authorship and reliability of the various Gospels. The one who holds all the Gospels to be, in the main, authentic and trustworthy narratives will have no difficulty in perceiving that all four narratives, when taken together, present a story consistent in all its details and free from all difficulty.

See Gospels. It should be noted that John evidently had special opportunities of obtaining exacter knowledge than that possessed by the others, as he was present at every stage of the trial; and that his narrative makes clear what is obscure in the accounts of the Synoptics.

The parts may be fitted together thus: Jesus is brought to Pilate (Mt 27:2; Mk 15:1; Lk 23:1; Jn 18:28). Pilate asks Jesus a specific accusation (Mt 27:1-2; Mk 15:1-2; Lk 23:1-2). Pilate enters the praetorium, questions Jesus about His alleged kingship, and receives the answer that He rules over the kingdom of truth, and, perceiving that men acknowledge the truth, Pilate asks: "What is truth?" (reported in identical form in Mt 27:4-6; Mk 15:2; Lk 23:3-4; and with more detail Jn 18:38-39). Pilate brings Him forth (this is the only detail that needs to be supplied in order to complete the harmony of the Gospels, and in itself is probably enough), and many accusations are made against Him, to which, to Pilate's surprise, He makes reply (Mt 27:11-14; Mk 15:2-5; Lk 23:3-5). His innocence, but the charges are repeated (Lk 23:4). Pilate sends Him to Herod, who in mockery clothes Him in shining raiment, and sends Him back (Lk 23:6-12). Pilate declares that neither Herod nor himself can find any fault in Him, and orders to scourge and let Him go (Lk 23:13-16; Jn 19:38). Pilate offers to release Jesus upon a compliance with certain demands (Mt 27:15-18; Mk 15:6-10; Jn 19:39). Pilate's wife sends him a message warning him not to harm Jesus because Jesus is a holy man (Lk 22:13). The people, persuaded thereto by the chief priests, ask Herod to release Jesus (Mt 27:19). In spite of the repeated protests of Pilate, demand that Jesus shall be crucified (Mt 27:20-23; Mk 15:11-14; Lk 23:18-23; Jn 18:38). Pilate orders the sentence to be carried out, and before the people, and they take the guilt of the deed upon themselves. Pilate then frees Barabbas and orders Jesus to be scourged (Mt 27:26; Mk 15:15; Lk 23:24). Jesus is scourged and mocked, and the crowd stoned and spat upon (Mt 27:27; Mk 15:19; Lk 23:29). Pilate again declares the innocence of Jesus, and brings Him out to the people, saying, "Behold the man!" The chief priests and officers cry out: "Crucify him!" They accuse Him of making Himself the Son of God, and say He claims to be the King (Mt 27:39). He is brought before Herod, who, hearing of the saying, once more interviews the prisoner in the praetorium. He tries to release Jesus, but his efforts to reconcile the people of Judaea with the emperor are frustrated. Pilate gives up the body of Jesus (Mt 27:50; Mk 15:45; Jn 19:38). Pilate obtains permission from Pilate to take precautions against any theft of the body of Jesus (Mt 27:62-66).

Pilate is mentioned three times in Acts: in a passage of Peter (Acts 13:27), in a thanksgiving of the church (4:27), and in a speech of Paul (Acts 28). He is also mentioned in 1 Tim (6:13) as the one before whom Christ Jesus witnessed the good confession.

Eusebius, who lived in the 4th cent., tells us (HE, II) on the authority of certain Or historians that Pilate fell into such misfortunes that he committed suicide. Various in tradition apocryphal writings have come down and Legend to us, written from the 3d to the 5th cent., with others of a later date, in which legends and details are given, in which in all these a favorable view is taken of his character; hence the Coptic church came to believe that he became a Christian, and enrolled him among the number of its saints. His wife, to whom tradition gives the name of Claudia, is said to have been a Jewish proselyte at the time of the death of Jesus, and afterward to have become a Christian. Her name is honored along with Pilate's in the Coptic church, and in the calendar of saints honored by the Or church her name is found on the date October 27.
We find no unhistorical references to Pilate in the recently discovered fragment of the Gospel of Peter, which was discovered in the 20th cent. as the so-called Gospel of Nicodemus, which belongs to the 1st or 2nd cent. We find, in the first part, called the Acts of Pilate, a long account of the trial of Jesus from the standpoint of the standard-bearers of the Jesus movement. There is no mention of the trial in the hall of judgment bowed down before Jesus, in spite of the efforts of the standard-bearers, and others who supported them. The standard-bearers of the Jesus movement were often the leaders of the movement. There is also a reference to the Jewish standards of the Jews. The text of the gospel of Nicodemus and the gospel of Peter gives a great mass of material to the subject, but there is no text for a monograph on Pontius Pilate. In Germany there is no A. Müller. "pillars" of heaven, of earth (Job 9:6; 36:11; Ps 75:3; 99:7), etc. In the few instances of the word in the NT, the use is figurative. James, Cephas and John "were reputed to be pillars" of the church at Jerusalem (Gal 2:9); the church is "the pillar and ground of the truth" (1 Tim 3:15); he that overcomes is made "a pillar" in the temple of God (Rev 3:12); a strong angel had feet "as pillars of fire" (10:1).

PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE: The visible manifestation of the Divine presence on the journeyings of Israel in the wilderness at the time of the Exodus. Jehovah was, in fact, present before the people "by day in a pillar of cloud, to lead them the way"; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light. The pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, depending on the needs of the people" (Ex 13:21-22; cf 14:19-24; Nu 14:14). When the congregation was at rest, the cloud abode over the tabernacle (Ex 40:36; Nu 9:17; 14:14). When Jehovah wished to communicate His will to Moses, the pillar descended to the door of the Tent of Meeting (Ex 33:9-11; Nu 12:5; Dt 31:15). These descriptions are not to be ratiocinatively explained; what is depicted is a true theophany. Criticism has sought to establish discrepancies between the allusions to the cloud in the JE and the P parts of the narrative, but these are not made without strain; e.g. it is not the case that JE alone represents Jehovah as speaking with Moses in the cloud at the door of the tabernacle. The same representation is found in Ex 29:42-43, ascribed to P. An acute discussion of the alleged discrepancies may be seen in H. M. Wiener, Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, 82ff.

PILYAI, pi'li'ai (πυλάι), probably "Jehove's deliverer": One of the priests, described as "the chief of the fathers," in the days of Joakim (Neh 12:17).

PIN (פִּין), "yāḥādōh, from yāḥād, "to drive in a peg"[?]": A cylindrical piece of wood or metal (e.g. brass, Ex 27:19) such as that used by weavers in beating up the wool in the loom (Jgs 16:14, where Delilah fastened Samson's hair with the "pin"); or as a peg for hanging (Ex 16:3; cf Isa 22:23; Ezr 9:8); or as a tent-pin, such as those used in the tabernacle (Ex 27:19; 35:18; 38:20; 31; 39:40; Nu 3:37; 4:32; Jgs 4:21, where AV translates "nail," RV "tent-pin"); cf 5:26, where Jehovah has the same word, RV "nail"). The tent-pin, like that of today, was probably sharpened at one end (Jgs 4:21) and shaped at the other as to permit the attaching of the cords so frequently mentioned in the same connection (Ex 38:18; 39:40; Nu 3:57; 4:32; cf Is 33:20). From the acts of driving in the tent-pin (.publish) and pulling it out (nādāh) are derived the technical Heb terms for pitching a tent and for breaking camp. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

PINING, pin'ing, SICKNESS, sick'ness: In the account of the epileptic boy in Mk 9:18 it is said that "he pineth away." The vb. used here (συκαίνω, συκαίνων) means "to dry up," and is the same which is used of the withering of plants, but seldom used in this metaphorical sense. The Eng. word is from the AS pīnian and is often found in the Elizabethan literature, occurring 13 t in Shakespeare. In the OT it is found in Lev 26:39 (biśr) and in Ezk 24:23 and 35:10. In RV it replaces "consumed" in Ezk 4:17. In all these passages it is the rendering of the Heb mōkkāk, and means expressly being wasted on account of sin. In Lev 26:16 "pine away" is used in RV to replace "cause sorrow of heart," and is the tr of the Heb dāḇāh; and in Dt 28:65 "sorrow of mind" is also replaced in RV by "pinning of soul," the word so rendered being dāḇhōn, which in these two passages is expressive of homesickness. In Is 24:16 the reduplicated exclamation, "my leanness," of AV is changed into "i pine away," the word being rāzāh. The starving people in Lam 4:9 are said to pine away, the word so tr being zōāh. All these Heb words have a general meaning of to dry or to waste or wear away, or to be exhausted by morbid discharge.

Pining sickness in Isa 38:12 AV is a mistranslation, the word so rendered, dalālūth, meaning here the thurm by which the web is tied to the loom. The figure in the verse is that of Hezekiah's life being removed from the earth by his sickness as the web is removed from the loom by having the thurms cut, and being then rolled up. Both AVm and RVm have the correct reading, "from the thurm." LXX has ἐπίθου ἐγκαίνων ἐκτενεῖ, crithou egekainōn ektenēin, and Vulg damn adhibet ordinem, sutcidii me. The other reading is due to another interpretation of the word which in a few passages, as Jer 65:15, like its śād, means something small, poor, and decaying or weak, such as the lean kine of Pharaoh's dream (Gen 41:19).

ALEX. MACALISTER
PINION, pī'yon (πηγή, ἐβήρ, πηγήσ, ἐβήραθ): RV has `tr` these Heb words uniformly by "pinion," where AV uses either "wing" or "feathers," with which words they stand in parallelism in all passages. The shorter Heb word is found only once, in Jeh's parable to Ezekiel: "A great eagle with great wings and long pinions (AV "longwinged"), full of feathers, which had divers colors, came unto Lebanon, and took the top of the cedar" (Ezk 17:3). The term, (ἐβήραθ) is used of the wings of the dove (Ps 68:13), of the ostrich (Job 39:13) and of the eagle (Dt 32:11). Once (Ps 91:4) it stands in a figurative expression for the protective care of Jeh, which is bestowed on those that trust in Him.

PINCALLE, pin'a-kāl (πινακᾶς, πινακάς, "darkness"): One of the "chiefs of Edom" (Gen 36:41; 1 Ch 1:52).

PIPE, pip. See Candlestick; Lamp; Music.

PIRA, pī'ra (οἱ ἐκ Πειρᾶ, οἱ εἰκ Πειρᾶς [1 Ead 5:19]): Thought to be a repetition of CAPHIRAH (q.v.) earlier in the verse.

PIRAM, pī'ram (πυραμ, pī'rām, "indomitable"): King of Jarmuth, one of the five Amorite kings who leagued themselves against Joshua's invasion (Josh 10:8 ff).

PIRATHON, pī'rā-thon, PIRATHONITE, pī'rā-thōn-īt (πηραθων, πηραθωνῖς, πηραθονίτης; B. Pārāthōn, Pharaohm, Α. Pārāthōn, Pharaohm, Faraonitis, Pharaohonitis): The home of Abdon the son of Hillel the Pirathonite (1 Jgs 13:18 AV), where also he was buried, "in the land of Ephraim in the mount of the Amelekites." To the latter name may have clung to a district which at some former time had been held by the Amelekites. From this town also came Benahaz, one of David's chief captains (2 S 23:30; 1 Ch 11:31; 27:14). It is probable to be identified with Per'ath, about 6 miles W. of Nahal. A possible rival is Fer'ion, 15 miles W. of Nahalot. G. A. Smith suggests a position at the head of Wady Per'ah (HGL, 555). Moore thinks it may have been in Benjamin, Abdon being a Benjaminite family (1 Ch 8:25:30; 9:36). It is just possible that the place may be identical with Pharet, one of the towns fortified by Baecides (1 Macc 9:50).

PISGAH, pis'ga (πισγά, ha-pisqah; פִּסְגָּה, Phisag, πῆσγα, τοῦ λαζέζουνόν, α΄ λαζέζουνόν, δέ λαζεζουνό, ἕλαζεζουν): This name, which has always the definite art., appears only in combination either with ṣō'šh, "head," "top," or ḥṣḏōth, not tr in AV save in Dt 4:49, where it is rendered "springs," RV uniformly "slopes," RVIN "springs." Pisgah is identified with Nebi in Dt 34:1; cf 3:27. "The top of Pisgah, which looketh down upon the desert" marks a stage in the march of the host of Israel (Nu 21:20). Hither Balak brought Balaam to the field of Zophim (23:14). Here Moses received the blessing of God, as Edom, had been, and died. See NEBO. Many scholars (e.g. Buhl, GAP, 122; Gray, "Numbers," ICC, 291) take Pisgah as the name applying to the mountain range in which the Moab plateau terminates to the W., the "top" or "head" of Pisgah being the point in which the ridge running out westward from the main mass culminates. The summit commands a wide view, and looks down upon the desert. The identification is made sure by the name 'Tāl'at ez-Za'fūm found here, which seems to correspond with the field of Zophim.

Ash'doth is the constr. pl. of 'ašēdāh (sing. form not found), from 'ēshedh, "foundation," "bottom," "lower part" (slope); of Assyр 'īṣud, "foundation." Some would derive it from Aram. One, "fall" or "slope" (OH, s.v.); Ashdod-pisgah overlooked the Dead Sea from the E. (Dt 3:17; 4:49; Josh 12:3; 13:20). There can be no reasonable doubt that Ashdod-pisgah signifies the steep slopes of the mountain descending into the contiguous valleys.

It is worthy of note that LXX does not uniformly render Pisgah by a proper name, but sometimes by a derivative of λαζέζω, "to hew," or "to dress stone" (Nu 21:20; 23:14; Dt 3:27; 4:49). Jerome (Onom, s.v. Ashdoth) gives a translation as the Latin equivalent of Fasga. He derives Pisgah from πασγα, which, in new Heb, means "to split," "to cut off." This suggests a mountain the steep sides of which give it the appearance of having been "cut out." This description which applies perfectly to Jēhū Nīḇād as viewed from the Dead Sea.

PISHON, pī'shon (πησόν, pī'shōn; AV Pison, pī'son): A river of Eden (q.v.), said to compass the whole land of Havilah where there is gold, bdellium and the crystal stone (Gen 2:11), most probably identified with the Kunur River which comes down from the mountains of Media and formally emptied into the Pers Gulf.

PISIDIA, pī-sī'di-a (ἡ Πισιδία, ἑν Πισιδιαίν [Acts 14:24]); in Acts 13:14, NABC give "Ἀντιοχειαν ἑν Πισιδιαίν, "the Pisidian Antioch," the other MSS, "Ἀντιοχειαν ἑν Πισιδίασ, Antiocheian ēn Pisidias," "Antioch of Pisidia." The former, but not the latter, reading correctly describes the condition of affairs at the time when St. Paul traveled in the country; see below.

Pisidia, as a strict geographical term, was the name given to the huge block of mountain country stretching northward from the Taurus 1. Situation range where the latter overlooked the land and History Pamphylia coast land, to the valleys of the and Asia Minor mountains, and thence to the line of Apamea with Antioch, and Antioch with Iconium. It was bounded by Lydia on the W., by the Phrygian country on the N., and by Isauria on the E.; but there is no natural boundary between Pisidia and Isauria, and the frontier was never strictly drawn. The name is used in its geographical sense in the Analecta of Xenophon, who informs us that the Pisidians were independent of the king of Persia at the end of the 5th cent. BC. Alexander the Great had difficulty in reducing the Pisidian cities, and throughout ancient history we find the Pisidian mountains described as the home of a turbulent and warlike people, given to robbery and pillage. The task of subjugating them was intrusted by the Romans to the Galatian king Amyntas, and, at his death in 25 BC, Pisidia passed with the rest of his kingdom into the Rom province Galatia. Augustus now took seriously in hand the pacification of Pisidia and the Isaurian mountains on the E. Five military colonies were founded in Pisidia and the eastern mountain ranges—Comana, Comana, Olbas, Parlas and Lystra—and all were connected by military roads with the main garrison city Antioch, which lay in Galatian Phrygia, near the northern border of the Euphrates.
Pisidia. An inscription discovered in 1912 shows that Quirinus, who is mentioned in Lk 2 2 as governor of Syria under Nero, was a Pisidian, and a religious ceremony of the colony of Antioch, and his connection with Antioch dates from his campaign against the nomads—who had resisted and killed Antymas—about 8 BC (see Ramsay in Expos., November, 1912, 385 ff, 406). The military system set up by Antiochus, and based on that of Antioch, and from this fact, and from its proximity to Pisidia, Antioch claimed the title "the Pisidian," which served to distinguish it from the other cities called Antioch. It is by a mistake arising from confusion with a later political arrangement that Antioch is designated "of Pisidia" in the majority of the MSS.

Pisidia remained part of the province Galatia till 74 AD, when the greater (southern) part of it was assigned to the new double province Lycaonia-Pamphylia, and the cities in this portion of Pisidia now ranked as Pamphylia. The northern part of Pisidia continued to belong to Galatia, until, in the time of Dioecletian, the southern part of the province Galatia (including the cities of Antioch and Iconium), with parts of Lycaonia and Asia, were formed into a province called Pisidia, with Antiochus as capital. For the first time correctly described as a city "of Pisidia," although there is reason to believe that the term "Pisidia" had already been extended northward in popular usage to include part at least of the Phrygian region of Galatia. This perhaps explains the reading "Antioch of Pisidia" in the Codex Bezae, whose readings usually reflect the conditions of the 2nd cent. of our era in Asia Minor. This use of the term was of course political and administrative; Antioch continued to be a city of Phrygia in the ethnical sense and a recently discovered inscription proves that the Phrygian language was spoken in the neighborhood of Antioch as late as the 3rd cent. of our era (see also Calder in Journal of Rom Studies, 1912, 84).

St. Paul crossed Pisidia on the journey from Perga to Antioch referred to in Acts 13 14, and again on the return journey, Acts 14 24. Of 2 st Paul those journeys no details are recorded in Pisidia in Acts, but it has been suggested by Harnack and Howson that the "perils of rivers" and "perils of robbers" mentioned by St. Paul in 2 Cor 11 26 refer to his journeys across Pisidia, and Ramsay has pointed out in confirmation of this view that a considerable number of Pisidians in Carmel, the nearest city of the variegated settlements of Pisidians, inscribed polished stones and soldiers who kept the peace in this region, while others refer to a conflict with robbers, or to an escape from drowning in a river (The Church in the Rom Empire, 22 f; cf Journal of Rom Studies, 1912, 82 f). Adana, a city on St. Paul's route from Perga to Antioch, is called by the Turks Kora Bawo; "Bawo" is the Turkish pronunciation of "Paulos," and the name is doubtless reminiscent of an early tradition connecting the city with St. Paul. Pisidia had remained unaffected by Hellenic civilization, and the Roman occupation at the time of St. Paul was purely military. It is therefore unlikely that St. Paul preached in Pisidia. Except on the extreme N.W., none of the Christian inscriptions of Pisidia—in glaring contrast with those of Phrygia—date before the legal recognition of Christianity under Constantine.

PISMA, pispa (NzSE, pispa, 'dispersion.' AV Pispah): A son of Jether, an Asherite (1 Ch 7 38).

PIT: The word translates different Heb words of which the most important are: (1) yà, bôr, "pit" or "cistern," made by digging (Gen 37 20); hence "dungeon" (Jer 38 6, m. "pit"); (2) Sn, bâr, bîr, "pit" or "well" made by digging (Gen 21 25); (3) Sn, shôl, generally rendered "hell" in AV (Heb.); (4) gâgâh, shabath, a pit in the ground to catch wild animals. (1), (2) and (4) above are used metaphorically of the pit of the "grave" or of "sheol" (Ps 113 4; 30 3; Job 30 24). AV sometimes incorrectly renders (4) by "corruption," (5) gâbâh, pethah, "pit," literally (2 S 17 9), and figuratively (Jer 48 43). In the NT "pit" renders bôthôw, bôthônos (Mt 16 14), which means any kind of hole in the ground. In the corresponding passage of Luke (Lk 14 24 AV) has pit, same as (2) above. For "bottomless pit" (Rev 9 1, AV, etc) see Abyss.

PITCH, peh: The tr of the noun Pîs, kophér, and the vb. Pîsâr, kâphar, in Gen 16 14 and of the noun Pîpeth, zepheth, in Ex 2 3; Isa 9 17. In Gen 16 14 the words are the ordinaries for "covering," "cover," so that the tr "pitch" is largely guesswork, aided by the LXX, which reads apistaios, aisthastos, "bitumen," here, and by the fact that pitch is a usual "covering" for vessels. The meaning of zepheth, however, is fixed by the obvious Dead Sea imagery of Isa 34 9—15—the streams and land of Edom are to become burning bitumen, like the sites of Sodom and Gomorrah. In Ex 2 3 zepheth is combined with hêmr, which also means bitumen (Gen 14 10; see Salamis), and the distinction between the words (different consistencies of the same substance?) is not clear. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

PITCHER, pihcher (Pîs, kôdhas; kôpalos, krmion): The word is found chiefly in the OT in the reference to the vessels of Nebuchadnezzar. The vessels of Nebuchadnezzar are also called their lamps in pitchers (Jgs 7 16.19). Eccl speaks of the pitcher broken at the fountain (13 6). The single use in the NT is in Mk 14 13 | Lk 22 10. The pitcher was an earthenware vessel (cf Lam 4 18 (LXX), with one or two handles, used for carrying water, and commonly borne upon the head or shoulder (cf Gen 24).

PITHOM, pithom (Pîsâh, pithom; Pîthô, Peithô [Ex 1 11]): Champollion (Gesenius, Lex. s.v.) considered this name to mean "a broad mouth.

1. Meaning. "Place" in Coptic, but it is generally of Name explained to be the Egyptian Pa-tum, or "city of the setting sun." It was one of the cities built by the Hebrews (see Ramesses), and according to Wessel was the Thoum of the Antonine Itinerary.

Brugsch (Hist Egypt., 1879, II, 343) says that it was identical with Heracleopolis Parva, the capital of the Sesostritic nome in the age of the Greeks and Romans—half-way on the great road from Pelusium to Tanis (Zoea), and this indication given on the authority of the inscriptions furnishes the sole means of fixing its position. This is, however, disputed. Tomb was discovered at Tanis, at Zaxoer, and at Philae (Brugsch, Geogr. L., 354) was also called Pa-tum.

There were apparently several places of the name; and Herodotus (I, 158) says that the Cadus of Darius began a little above Bubastis, "near the Arabian city Patomus," and reached the Red Sea.

(1) Dr. Naville's theory. In 1885 Dr. E. Naville discovered a Rom milestone of Maximian and Constantini, proving that the name of the town was Told el Mabûd ("the walled mound") in Wady Tumulât. The modern name he gives as Tell el Mabûd.*
PITY, pit' i (יִצְאַס, kāmāl, כָּמָל, ħāṣ; ḥātō, cēdō): "Pity," probably contracted from "piety," is a tender feeling for others in misery or distress. It is allied to compassion (q.v.), but differs in respect of the object the thing of which Pity is excited. None was found to be older than the time of Rameses II—who, however, is well known to have defaced older inscriptions, and to have substituted his own name for that of earlier builders. A statue of later date, bearing the title "Recorder of Pithom," was also found at this same site. Dr. Naville concluded that this city must be the OT Pithom, and the region round it Succoth—the Egypt T-k-u (but see Succoth). Brugsch, on the other hand, says that the old name of Heroopolis is Kēs (see Goshen), which recalls the identification of the LXX (Gen 46:28); and elsewhere (following Lepsius) he regards the same site as being "the Pa-Khetam of Rameses II" (see Eratost), which Lepsius believed to be the OT Ramesses (see Ramses) mentioned with Pithom (Brugsch, Geography, I, 302, 262). St. Silvia in 389 AD was shown the site of Pithom near Heroopolis, but farther E., and she distinguishes the two; but in her time, though Heroopolis was a village, the site of Pithom was probably unenclazed. In the time of Rameses, son of Ramesses I (Brugsch, Hist., II, 125), we have a report that certain nomads from Aduma (or Edom) passed through "the Khetam [or fort] of Minephthah-Hotepheim, which is called the city T-k-y, to the border [or canals] of the city Pi-tum of Minephthah-Hotepheim, which are situated in the land of T-k-s, in order to feed themselves and to feed their herds."

(2) Patumos of Herodotus.—These places seem to have been on the eastern border of Egypt, but may have been close to the Bitter Lakes or farther N. (see Succoth), whereas Tell el-Mabkhah is about 12 miles W. of Isna'adīkh, and of Lake Timāsh. The definition of the Pithom thus noticed as being that of Minephthah suggests that there was no more than one place so called, and the Patumos of Herodotus seems to have been about 30 miles farther W. (near Zagazig and Bubastis) than the site of Heroopolis, which the LXX identifies with Goshen and not with Pithom. The latter is not noticed as an object of the Exodus, and is not identified in the OT with Succoth. In the present state of our knowledge of Egyptian topography, the popular impression that the Exodus must have happened in the time of Minephthah, because Pithom was at Heroopolis and was not a city, is not very probable. The time of Ramesses II, not however, should be regarded as very hazardous. See Exodus. The Patumos of Herodotus may well have been the site, and may still be discovered near the head of Wady Tumādāl or near Bubastis.

PITHON, pit' thon (Πήθων, pithōn): A grandson of Meribbaal, or Mephibosheth (1 Chr 35; 941).

PITIFUL, pit'i-fūl: As found in Scripture, means "full of pity;" it is expressed by נָדָע, nādāʿ, from רָדָע (pl. rādāʿam), "bowels," "compassion" (Lam 4:10 AV, its only occurrence in the OT), the "hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children." In Isa 5:11, we have the beautiful saying, "The Lord is very pitiful [RV "full of pity"] and of tender mercy," where "very pitiful" is the tr of πολισθυόμενος, lit. "of many bowels," a word which does not occur elsewhere, it might be tr "large-hearted" or "tender-hearted." In Exod 2, 2, the Lord's bowels were pitiful (αιτειμένος) εἰσπλαγχος, "well-hearted." "compassionate," "full of pity," occurs in 1 Pet 3:8, "Love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous," RV "loving as brethren, tender-hearted, humble-minded." The word is found in Fr Man 7; XII P, Zeb 8 2.

PLACE, pālē: Normally for פָּלֵג, mākōn, OT, and παλαιος, παλαιος, NT, but in AV "place" represents a great number of Heb and Gr words, often used with no difference in force (e.g. 2 Chr 35:10, 15). RV has made few changes, but occasionally has attempted to specialize the object; (Gen 40:13; Job 37:8; Acts 8:22; Jas 1:11). See PLACE, BROAD; HIGH. See City, II, 3, 2; High Place; Open Place.

PLAGUE, plāg (πάγω, nephā, נַפָּה, makkāb, מַמְּכָב, ἀντίφορός, mātirē, μάτίρη, plāgō): This word which occurs more than 120 t is applied, like pestilence, to such sudden outbursts of disease as are regarded in the light of Divine visitations. It is used in the description of leprosy about 90 t in Lev 13 and 14, as well as in Dt 24:8. In the poetical, prophetic, and eschatological books it occurs about 20 t in the general sense of a punitive disaster. The Gospel references (Mt 3:10; 5:29:34; Lk 7:21) use the word as a synonym for disease.

The specific disease now named "plague" has been from the earliest historic times a frequent visitant to Pal and Egypt. Indeed in the S.E. between Gaza and Bubastis it has occurred so frequently that it may almost be regarded as endemic. The suddenness of its attack, the promptness of its incubation period and the rapidity of its course give it the characters which of old have been associated with manifestations of Divine anger. In the early days of an epidemic it is an infrequent occurrence that 00 per cent of those attacked die within three days. I have seen a case in which death took place ten hours after the first symptoms. In the filthy and insanitary houses of eastern towns, the disease spreads rapidly. In a recent epidemic in one village of 534 inhabitants 311 died within 21 days, and I once crossed the track of a party of pilgrims to Mecca of whom two-thirds died of plague on the road. Even with modern sanitary activity, it is very difficult to root it out, as our recent experiences in Hong Kong and India have shown.

Of the Bib. outbreaks that were not improbably bubonic plague, the first recorded is the slaughter of the firstborn of Egypt (Ex 10:6)—the 10th plague. The only other plague we have too little information to identify it. (Ex 11 1). The Philis, however, used the same name, negha', for the Egypt plagues (1 S 4 8) as is used in Ex. The next outbreak was at Kibroth-haathanah (Nu 13 23). This was synchronous with the phenomenon of quails, and if these were, as is probable, driven by the wind from the plague-stricken Syrian region, they were equally probable the carriers of the infection. Experience in both India and China indicates that animals of very diverse kinds can carry germs of the disease. A third visitation fell on the spies who brought back an evil report (Nu 14 37). A fourth destroyed those who murmured at the destruction of Korah and his fellow-rebellious (Nu 16 47). These may have been reoccurrences of the infection brought by the quails. The fifth outbreak was that which followed the gross religious and moral defection at Baal-peor (Nu 25 8.9.18; 26 1; 31 16; Josh 22 17; Ps 106 29.30). Here the disease was probably conveyed by the Moabites.

A later epidemic, which was probably of bubonic plague, was that which avenged the capture of the ark (1 S 5 6). We read of the tumors which were probably the bubo swellings, and also that at the time there was a plague of rats (6 5) — 'mice,' in the version, but the word is also used as the name of the rat. The castle seem to have carried the plague to Beth-shemesh, as has been observed in more than one place (Ps 22 19). Consider the two days' pestilence that followed David's census (2 S 24 15; 1 Ch 21 12), see Jos, An, VII, xiii, 3. The destruction of the army of Sennacherib may have been a sudden outbreak of plague (2 K 19 35; Isa 37 36). It is perhaps worthy of note that in Herodotus' account of the destruction of this army (iii.144) he refers to the incursion of swarms of mice.

One of the latest prophetic mentions of plague is Hos 13 14, where the plague (debker, LXX dikê) of death and the destruction (kalath, LXX kéntron) of the grave are mentioned. From this passage Paul quotes his apostrophe at the end of 1 Cor 15 55, but the apostle correlates the sting (kéntron) with death, and changes the dikê into nikos.

LITERATURE

The Heb words are so used as to give the name "plagues" to what the "wonders" God did against Pharaoh. Thus it appears that the introduction language in the account in Ex puts forward the wondrous character of these dealings of Jeh with Pharaoh. The account of the plagues is found in Ex 7 8—12 31; Ps 78 42—51; 105 27—31. The plagues have a devotional purpose and do not give a full historical narrative. Ps 78 omits plagues 4, 6, 9; Ps 105 omits plagues 5 and 6. Both pass change the order of the plagues. Account of the preparation which led up to the plagues is found in the narrative of the burning bush (see BURNING BUSH), the meeting of Aaron with Moses, the gathering together of the elders of Israel for instruction and the preliminary wonders before Pharaoh (Ex 3 4). This preparation contemplated two things important to be kept in view in considering the plagues, namely, that the consumption of plagues was contemplated from the beginning (Ex 4 22.23), and that the skepticism of Israel concerning Moses' authority and power was likewise anticipated (Ex 4 1). It was thus manifestly not an age of miracles when the Israelites were expecting such "wonders" and ready to receive anything marvelous as a Divine interposition. This skepticism of Israel is a valuable and the credibility of the account of the "wonders." The immediate occasion of the plagues was the refusal of Pharaoh to let the people have liberty for sacrifice, together with the consequent hardening of Pharaoh's heart. No indication of any localizing of the plagues is given except in Ps 78 12.13, where the "field of Zoan" is mentioned as the scene of the contest between Jeh and the Egyptians. But this is poetry, and the "field of Zoan" means simply the territory of the great capital Zoan. This expression might be localised in the Delta or it might extend to the whole of Egypt. Discussion of the plagues has brought out various classifications of them, some of which are philosophical, as that of Philo, others fanciful, as that of Origen. The order of the plagues for the purpose of moralizing are entirely useless for historical consideration of the plagues. The only order of any real value is the order of Nature, i.e. the order in which the plagues occurred, which will be found to be the order of the natural phenomena which were the embodiment of the plagues.

Much elaborate effort has been made to derive from the description of the plagues evidence for different documents in the narrative. It is pointed out that Moses (E) declared to Pharaoh that he would smite the waters (Ex 7 17), and then the account, our present text, tells us that Aaron smote the waters (7 19.20). But this is quite in accord with the preceding statement (4 16) that Aaron was to be the spokesman to deal with God, Aaron with Pharaoh. Again it is noticed that some of the plagues are ascribed to the immediate agency of Jeh, some are presented as coming through the mediation of Moses, and still others through the mediation of Moses and Aaron. This may be an exact statement of facts, and, if the facts were just so, the record of the facts affords no evidence of different documents.

An examination of the account of the plagues as it stands will bring them before us in a most graphic and connected story.

I. THE NATURAL PHENOMENA.—All the "wonders" represented anywhere in Scripture as done by the power of God are intimately associated with natural phenomena. The power necessarily has a physical basis, in human beings have no other way of perceiving external events than through those senses which only deal with natural phenomena. Accordingly, all theophanies and miraculous doings are embodied in natural events.

The presence of Jeh with the sacrifice by Abraham was marked by the passing of a "burning furnace and a burning lamp" between the pieces of the offerings (Gen 15 17 AV). The majesty and power of God at Sinai were manifested in the "cloud" and the "brightness of the "voice" and the "sound of a trumpet" (Ex 19 16). The Deity of Jesus was attested on the mountain by a "voice" (Mt 16 3). Jesus Himself was "God...manifest in the flesh" (1 Tim 3 16 AV). He was "3 sound in fashion as a man" (Phil 2 8). And all the miracles of Jesus are "a sensible phenomenon: He sent the waters to the sea and it was calm; He touched the leper and he was clean; He called to Lazarus and he came forth."

Yet in all these natural events, the miraculous working of God was as clearly seen as the natural phenomena. It is thus to be expected that the "wonders" of God in the land of Pharaoh should also be associated with natural events as well as manifest miraculous elements. The "blood" in the river, the "frogs", hopping about on the land, the "lives," the "flies," the "murrain," the "hail," the "locusts," the "darkness," and the "pestilence" are all named as natural phenomena. Long familiarity with the land of Egypt has made it perfectly plain to many intelligent people, also, that, if not quite, all the plagues of Egypt are still in that land as natural phenomena, and occur, when they do occur, very exactly in the order in which we find them recorded in the narrative in Ex. But natural events in the plagues as in other "wooded miracles" are doings done.

The first of the plagues (אָדַם, dām, from אָדָן, 'adān, "to be red" [Ex 7 19-25]) was brought about by the smiting of the water with the rod in the hand of Aaron, and it consisted in the delamination of the water so that it became as blood. The waters were polluted and the fish died. Even the water in vessels which had been taken from the river became corrupt. The people were forced to get water only from wells in which the river water was filtered through the sand. There are two Egypt seasons when, at times, the water resembles blood. At the full Nile the water is sometimes of a reddish color, but at that season the water is quite potable and the fish do not die. But at the very lowest season, the water is withal all the time of the lowest Nile just before the rise begins. Then also the water sometimes becomes defiled and very red, so polluted that the fish die (Bib. Sacra, 1905, 409). This latter time is evidently the time of the plague. It was in the same month in the month of May. The dreadful severity of the plague constituted the "wonder" in this first plague. The startling character of the plague is apparent when it is remembered that Egypt is the product of the Nile, the very soil being all brought down by it, and its irrigation being constantly dependent upon it. Because of this it became one of the earliest and greatest of the gods (Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Egypt, 3-47; "Hymn to the Nile," Records of the Past, New Series, 11, 46-54). The magicians imitated this plague with their enchantments. Their success may have been by means of sleight of hand or other devices of magic, as may be seen in the East today, with claim of supernatural aid, and as used in western lands for enchantments. It was a phenomenon, however, if it may be, as has been suggested, that they counted upon the continuance of the plague for at least a time, and so took advantage of the materials the "wonder" had prov'd of (Ex 8 18-20). Frogs (Egyptian, σαμφρακτάμ, probably "marsh-leapers" [Ex 8 1-15]) are very abundant just after the high Nile when the waters begin to recede. Spawn in the mud is hatched by the sun, and the marshes are filled with myriads of these creatures. The frog was the hieroglyph for the "wonders." The "frogs" are greenish in the marshes, but in this case they came forth to the horror and disgust of the people. "Frogs in the houses, frogs in the beds, frogs baked with the food in the oven, frogs in the kneading troughs worked up with the flour; frogs with their monotonous croak, frogs with their cold slimy skins, everywhere—from morning to night, from night to morning—frogs." The frog was also associated with Divinity, was the symbol of Heq, a form of Hator, and seems also at times to have been worshiped as such.

Plague of Frogs

This plague created such horror that thus early Pharaoh came to an agreement (8 8-10). A time was set for the disappearance of the frogs that he might know that "there is none like unto Jeh our God," but when the frogs were dead, Pharaoh hardened his heart (8 15). In this plague "the magicians did in like manner with their enchantments" (8 7). Frogs were plentiful, and it would not seem to be difficult to claim to have produced some of them.

It is impossible to determine what the true troublemaking pest of Egypt is meant by the 4th plague, whether body-lie or mosquitos or sandflies or ticks or fleas or other insects. The repetition of the term "wonders," etc., in the context, and the theophanies immediately following (Ex 8 19), do not seem to indicate the presence of any inferior insect that had been series of plagues. The 5th plague, "wild beasts" (Ex 9 1-7), could have been a series of storms and tempests, a vast inundation of water, a thunderstorm, etc.

Plague of Lice

Those who have experience of these pests in Egypt are quite ready to accept any of them as adequate for the plague. Lice seem rather to be ruled out, unless different kinds of lice were sent, as there is no one kind that torments both man and beast. All the other insect pests appear in incredible numbers but of the "abomination" when the pools have dried up after the receding of the waters. The assertion that the account of this plague is not complete, because it is not recorded that Pharaoh asked its removal or that Moses secured it, is amazing. Perhaps Pharaoh did not, in fact, ask its removal. There seems also at this time some difficulty in Moses having access to Pharaoh after this plague (8 20). Perhaps the Egyptians were not removed at all. The Egyptians are disposed to think it was not! Certainly that reason of the Jews spent in Egypt, not on the banks of the Nile, but in a native village, will furnish very satisfying evidence that stinging and biting insects are a very real plague in Egypt yet. The magicians failed with their enchantments and acknowledged that Divine power was at work, and seem to have acknowledged that Jeh was the only one (8 19), but Pharaoh would not heed them.

As the seasons pass on, after the recession of the waters, the flies (אָדָן, dān, "swarms," probably of flies [Ex 8 20-32]) become more and more numerous and they are almost a plague every year. The insects increased severity of this plague, and the providential interference to separate between Israel and the Egyptians, drove Pharaoh and his people to such desperation that Pharaoh gave a half-promise of liberty for Israel on his sacrifice "of the land." The Israelites were told that if they should sacrifice the "abomination of the Egyptians." This may have referred to the sacrifice of sheep, which were always held in more or less detestation by Egyptians, or it may have referred to the sacrifice of the first-born, the cow being the animal sacred to the goddess Hator. The new element of separation between the Israelites and the Egyptians introduced into this plague was another step toward establishing the claims of Jeh to be the God of all the earth and to have taken Israel under His especial care.
In addition to the separation established between Israel and the Egyptians, a definite time is now set for the coming of the 5th plague. It is to be noticed also that diseases of cattle, like leprosy, have been known for many centuries, as Egypt has always been a land of swarms of locusts. The plague of swarms of locusts (Ex 10:7) and of cattle 4 days after the plague of insects is in exact accord with the order of Nature as now thoroughly understood through the discovered relation of mosquitoes and flies to the spread of diseases. The plague of insects was at times in Egypt, so that beef becomes very scarce on the market and is sometimes almost impossible to obtain. It is a fact, also, that the prevalence of cattle plague, the presence of boils among men (see 6, below) and the appearance of bubonic plague are found to be closely associated together and in this order. The mention of camels as affected by this plague is interesting. It is doubtful if any clear indication of the presence of the camel in Egypt so early as this has yet been found among the monuments of Egypt. There is in the Louvre museum one small antiquity which seems to me to be intended for the camel. But Professor Maspero does not agree that it is so. It would seem likely that the Hyksos, who were Bedouin princes, princes of the desert, would have introduced the beasts of the desert into Egypt if they did so, that may have been sufficient reason that the Egyptians would not picture it, as the Hyksos and all that was theirs were hated in Egypt.

In the plague of boils (בָּעַל, בָּעַל, מִנְסָרֶת, "boils") [Ex 9:8–17] ashes were used, probably in the same way and to the same end as the clay was used in opening the eyes of the blind man (Jn 9:6), i.e. to attract attention and to fasten the mind of the observer upon what the Lord was doing. This plague in the order of its coming, immediately after the murrain, and in the description given of it and in the significant warning of the "pestilence" yet to come (Ex 9:15), appears most likely to have been pestis minor, the milder form of bubonic plague. Virulent rinderpest among cattle in the East is regarded as the precursor of plague among men and is believed to be of the same nature. It may well be, as has been thought by some, that the great aversion of the ancient Egyptians to the contamination of the soil by decaying animal flesh was from the danger inherent in starting an epidemic of plague among men (Dr. Merrins, Bib. Sacra, 1908, 422–23).

Hail (בָּעַל, בָּרַד, "hail") [Ex 18:18–35] is rare in Egypt, but it is not unknown. The writer himself seems to have seen a very little, and has known of one instance when a considerable quantity of hail as large as small marbles fell. Lightning, also, is not as frequent in Egypt as in many semi-tropical countries, yet great electric storms sometimes occur. This plague is quite accurately dated in the seasons of the year (9:31). As the first plague was just before the rising of the Nile, so this one is evidently about 9 months later, when the new crops after the inundation were beginning to mature, January–February. This plague also marks another great step forward in the revelation of Jehovah to Israel and to the Egyptians. First only His power was shown, then His wisdom in the timing of the plagues, and now His mercy appears in the warning to all godly-disposed Egyptians to save themselves, those before the plagues by protecting all indoors (9:19–21). Pharaoh also now distinctly acknowledged Jehovah (9:27).

The plague of locusts (גְּזָרָה, גְּזָרָה, "locust") [Ex 10:1–20] was threatened, and so frightened were the servants of Pharaoh that they persuaded him to try to make some agreement with Moses, but the attempt of Pharaoh still to limit in some way the going of Israel thwarted the plan (Ex 10:7–10). Then devouring swarms of locusts came up over the land of Egypt and over the land of Canaan; they devoured everything before them. They also devoured the Nile and the Red Sea. They devoured every green thing left by the hail. The desperate situation created by the locusts soon brought Pharaoh again to acknowledgment of Jehovah (10:16). There was not the least doubt, but it is evidence of the impatience yet manifested by Pharaoh, but he soon showed that it was deceitful, and again he would not let the people go. When the wind had swept the locusts away, he hardened his heart once more.

The progress of the season has been quite marked from the first plague, just before the rising of the waters, on through the year until now 21–29). has come. When this dreadful scourge comes with its hot sand-laden breath more unendurable than a London fog, it is in very truth a "darkness of very great intensity" (Ex 10:29). The dreadful horror of this monster from the desert can hardly be exaggerated. Once again Pharaoh said "Go," but this time he wished to retain the flocks and herds, a hedge for the return of the people (10:24). Upon Moses' refusal to accept this condition, he threatened his life. Why had he not done so ere this? Why, indeed, did he let this man Moses come and go with such freedom, defying him and the people in the very palace? Possibly Moses' former career in Egypt explains this. As is most probable, he had grown up at court with this Merenptah, and had been known as "the son of Pharaoh's daughter," heir to the throne and successor to Ramses II, instigator of Merenptah, then this refuge had undoubtedly many friends still in Egypt who would make his death a danger to the reigning Pharaoh.

No intimation is given of the exact character of the death inflicted on the firstborn (בָּרַד, בָּרַד, "firstborn," "chief" or "best") of the Firstborn by the angel of the Lord, or its appearance. But it is already foretold as the "pestilence" (9:15). The pestis major or virulent bubonic plague corresponds most nearly in its natural phenomena to this plague. It culminates in the most shocking and overwhelming violence, takes the strongest and bost, and then subsides with startling suddenness.

Thus it appears that probably all the plagues were based upon natural phenomena which still exist in Egypt in the same order, and, when they do occur, find place somewhere during the course of one year.

II. Miraculous Use of the Phenomena.—The miraculous elements in the plagues are no less distinctly manifest than the natural phenomena themselves.

There was an intimation of the effect of the various plagues so much beyond all precedent as to impress everyone as being a special Divine manifestation, and it was so.

1. Intensification There was national horror of the blood-like water, disgust at the frogs, intolerable torture by the stinging insects and flies, utter ruin of the farmers in the loss of the cattle, the beating down of the crops with the hail, and the devouring of every green thing by the locusts, the sufferings and dread of the inhabitants by reason of the boils, the frightful electric storm, the suffocating darkness and, finally, the crushing disaster of the death of the firstborn. All these calamities may be found in Egypt to the present day, but never any of them, not to say all of them, in such overwhelming severity. That all of them should come in one year and all with such devastation was plainly a Divine arrangement. Merely natural events do not arise in such systematic and systematic fashion. In this systematic severity were seen miracles of power.

The prediction of the plagues and the fulfilment of the prediction at the exact time to a day, sometimes to an hour, is the cessation of the thunder and lightning): There was first a general prediction (Ex 3 19,20; 7 3; 9 14,15) and an indication as the plagues went on that the climax would be pestilence (9 15). Then several of the plagues were specifically announced and a time was set for them; e.g. the flies (8 23), the murrain (9 5), the hail (9 18), the locusts (10 4), the death of the firstborn (11 4). In some cases a time for the removal of the plague was also specified: e.g. the frogs (8 10), the thunder and lightning (9 20). In every instance these predictions were exactly fulfilled. In some instances careful foresight might seem to supply in part this ability to predict. Perhaps it was the mean of such foresight that magicians "did mimic with their enchantments" for the first two plagues. The plague being in existence, foresight might safely predict that it would continue for a little time at least, so that, if the magicians sought for the bloody was or called for frogs, they would seem to be successful. But the evidence which Jeh produced went beyond them, and, at the third plague, they were unable to do anything. These things postulate, on the part of Moses and Aaron, knowledge far beyond human ken. Not only magicians could not do so with their enchantments, but modern science and discoveries are no more able so to predict events. Even meteorological phenomena are only predicted within the limits of reasonable foresight. Such wonders as the plagues of Egypt can in no wise be explained as merely natural. The prediction was a miracle of knowledge.

The discrimination shown in the visitation by the plagues presents another miraculous element more significant and important than either the miracles of power or the miracles of knowledge. God put a difference between the Egyptians and the Israelites, beginning the plagues of hand continuing, apparently, without exception, until the end. Such miracles of moral purpose admit of no possible explanation but the exercise of a holy will. Merely natural events make no such regular, systematic discriminations.

The orderliness and gradually increasing severity of the plagues with such arrangement as brought "judgment upon the gods of Egypt," vindicating Jeh as Ruler over all, and educating the people to know Jeh as Lord of all the earth, present an aspect of events distinctly non-natural. Such method reveals also a Divine mind at work.

Last of all and most important of all, the plagues were so arranged as to accomplish in particular a great Divine moral purpose in the revelation of God to the Israelites, to the Egyptians and to all the world.

5. Moral Purpose

This is the distinctive mark of every real miracle. And this leads us directly to the consideration of the most important aspect of the plagues.

III. The Divine Moral Purpose.—This discriminating of the gods of Egypt is marked at every step of the progress of the plagues, and the accumulated effect of the repeated discriminating of the gods must have had, and, indeed, had, a great influence upon the Egyptians. The plagues did 'execute judgment against the gods of Egypt' (12 12), and the people and princes brought great pressure to bear upon Pharaoh to let them be rid of the plagues. The Egyptians, who claimed to represent the gods of Egypt were defeated, Pharaoh himself, who was accounted divine, was humbled, the great god, the Nile, was polluted, frogs defiled the temples, and, at last, the sun, the greatest god of Egypt, was blotted out in darkness.

Pharaoh was made to know that Jeh is Lord, and acknowledged it (9 27; 10 16). To this end the issue was clearly drawn. Pharaoh challenged the right of Jeh to command him (5 2), and God required him then to "stand" to the trial until the evidence could be fully presented, in accordance with the fundamental principle that he who makes a charge is bound to stand to it until either he acknowledges its utter falsity or affords opportunity for full presentation of evidence. So we see God made Pharaoh to "stand" (9 16) (while the Bible, which speaks in the concrete language of life, calls it the hardening of Pharaoh's heart) until the case was tried out (cf. Lamb, Miracle of Science, 126-49).

A more blessed and gracious moral purpose of the plagues was the revelation of God as the Saviour of the world. This began in the revelation of the burning bush, where God, in fire, appeared in the bush, yet the bush was not consumed, but saved. This revelation, thus given to the people, was further evidenced by the separation between Israel and the Egyptians; was made known even to the Egyptians by the warning before the plague of hail, that those Egyptians who had been impressed with the power of God might also learn that He is a God that will save those who give heed unto Him; and, at last, reached its startling climax when the angel of the Lord passed over the blood-marked door the night of the death of the firstborn and the institution of the Passover.

Last of all, the plagues had a great moral purpose in that they led the Divine to life in the experience of men in this world. As experience of Job illustrates the Use of Evil in the life of the righteous, so the plagues of Egypt illustrate the same great pattern of evil in this world. In the one case, as in the other, the wonders of God are so arranged as "to justify the ways of God to men."

The minutely accurate knowledge of life in Egypt displayed by this narrative in the Book of Ex is inconceivable in an age of so little and difficult intercommunication between nations, except by actual residence of the author in Egypt. This has an important bearing upon the time of the composition of this narrative, and upon the question of its author.

LITURGICAL.—The liturgy of this subject is almost endless. It will suffice to refer the reader to all the general commentaries and the special comments on discussion of doctrinal and critical questions. Two admirable recent discussions of the plagues, in English, are Lamb, Miracle of Science, and Merry, The Plagues of Egypt, in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1908, July and October.

PLAIN, plán, pîn ([1] פין, kikkâr, "circle," "circular," or "round loaf"; [2] פין, mishâr, from פין, yâshâr, "to be level"; cf. Arab. ميشر, muisâr, "that which is easy"; [3] פינא, bikhâh; of Arab. בקח, baḵât, "a plot of ground," or "a wet

(1) Kikkār, when meaning "plain" usually refers to the alluvial plain about Jericho near the north end of the Dead Sea; "Plain [RVm "circle"] of the Jordan" (Gen 13 10:11; 1 K 7 40; 2 Ch 4 17); "Plain of the valley of Jericho" (Dt 34 3); "cities of the Plain" (Gen 13 12; 19 29); "all the Plain" (Gen 19 17:25); "by the way of the Plain" (2 S 18 23); but "the plain round about jerus" (Neh 12 28). See GIZAHAH; CIRCLE.

(2) Mishāh, EV "plain," RVm usually "table-land," clearly refers in most places to the highlands of Gilead and Moab, E. of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; e.g. Josh 13 9, "the plain [RVm "table-land"] of Medeba."

(3) Bītâk is more often trd "valley" (q.v.).

(4) "Arabah in RV often trd "the Arabah," denoting the whole Jordan-Dead-Sea-Arabah depression=Arab. Ghawr (Ghôr). In Dt 11 30, AV has "champaign" (q.v.). The "plains of Moab" (Nu 22 1; 26 3:6; 31 12; 33 49.49:50; 36 1; 36 13; 34 14; Josh 13 32) and "plains of Jericho" (Josh 1 4: 10:2 K 25 3; Jer 35 5; 52 8) are the low plain or ghawr N. of the Dead Sea. "Arabah is here equivalent to kikkâr (see above). Note the distinction between mishâh used of the highlands, and kikkâr and "Arabah used of the gallery. See ARABAH.

(5) Skrpheílákh is by RV throughout trd "lowland" (q.v.), and includes the western slopes of the Judeaean hills and the maritime plain.

(6) Topos petínou occurs only in Lk 6 17.

(7) ἄμμος is trd "plain" in AV: "plain of Moreh" (Gen 12 6; Dt 11 30); "plain [or plains] of Mamre" (Gen 13 18; 14 13; 18 1); "plain of Zaanaim" (Jgs 4 11); "plain of the pillar" (Jgs 9 6); "plain of Moenemim" (Jgs 9 37); "plain of Tabor" (1 S 10 3). RV has throughout "oak," RVm "terebinthus", cf "oak" (Gen 35 4, 8, etc) and "oak of Elaphah" [1 S 17 23, 19]; "oak of Beeronah" [1 S 17 40]; "oak (q.v.)

(8) "Abhēth kermim (Jgs 11 33) is in AV "the plain of the vineyards," RV "Abel-cheramim," RVm "the meadow of vineyards." Elsewhere in EV "abhēth is "Abel" or "Abel." See ABEL-CHERAMIM; MEADOW. ALFRED ELY DAY

PLAIN, plain, PLAINLY, planii: In Gen 25 27, AV "plain" represents דֵּין, tam. If a contrast between the vocations of Jacob and Esau is meant, RV ("quiet," "harmless") may be right. But elsewhere (Job 1: 1; Ps 37 37, etc) the word means "perfect," and so probably here; the failings of the great patriarch did not detract from the general estimate of him (Mt 8 11). In Ezr 4 18 "translated" (RVm) is better than "plainly read."

PLAIN, CITIES OF THE. See CITIES OF THE PLAIN.

PLAIN OF MOAB: In Dt 1 1; 2 8, "plain" is trd in RV "Arabah," and explained, "the deep valley running N. and S. of the Dead Sea." It was here that Moses delivered his last addresses. Usually the word is pl. (De 1 29; 34 13), "steps of Moab" (Nu 22 1, etc; Dt 34 13). An interesting description is given in an article on "The Steppes of Moab" by Professor G. B. Gray in Expos, January, 1905. See MOAB.

PLAIN OF THE PILLAR (בֵּין הַרְבּוֹת, 'élón muq- ḁab; B reads prós 'élón qâlaq 'éveret 'l ṣàr- àwos 'l śâ'âwos, prós 'eḇalāw té heureót 'l šā'āwos té 'elów qâlaq 'éveret, and the second יָהוָא): With RVm we must read "terebinth of the pillar," the place where the men of Shechem and Beth-millo made Abimelech king (Jgs 9 6). This was one of the sacred trees of which there seem to have been several near Shechem. See MEON- ENIM, OAK OF. "The pillar" may possibly have been the great stone which Joshua set up "under the oak that was by the sanctuary of Jeh" (Josh 24 26).

PLAIN OF THE VINEYARDS. See ABEL-CHERAMIM.

PLAISTER, plâst'êr. See PLASTER.

PLAITING, plaits'ing, plaits'ing (from OFr. pleit, from Lat placatum, "fold"): An interweaving, braiding, knot; an elaborate gathering of the hair into knots; χωροσ, emplokhé, "outer adorning of plaits of the hair" (1 Pet 3 3). Compare "plaited" (q.v. of thorns) (Mt 27 29; Mk 15 17; Jn 19 2). See Braid, Braiding.

PLANE, plan (Isa 44 13). See TOOLS.

PLANE TREE, plan'tre (יוֹפָע, 'armôn; śk-lâ- vâves, platanus [Gen 30 37], δάμας, δάδατ ["pine" or "fir"] [Ezk 31 8]; AV chestnut): "Armôn is supposed to be derived from יִפְע, 'armâm, meaning "to be bare, to be naked." This is considered a suitable term for the plane, which sheds its bark annually. The chestnut of AV is not an indigenous tree, but the planâ, Planâs orientâlis, is one of the finest trees in Pal, flourishing esp. by water courses (cf Eccles 24 14).

PLANETS, planets (יוֹפָע, nazzâlōth). See ASTROLOGY, II, 3.

PLANK, plank: Thick beams or pieces of wood, for which several Heb words are used. RV changes "planks" (of fir) into "boards" in 1 K 6 15, and in a few instances substitutes "planks" where AV has "boards" (Ex 27 8; 38 7, the altar; Ezk 27 5). So in the NT in Acts 27 44, for σκόπας, skopas. See SHIPS AND BoATS, II, 2, (3).

PLANT, PLANTS. See BOTANY.

PLASTER, plaits'êr (יוֹפָע, śîdâh): In Egypt, now as anciently, the buildings are plastered inside and out. The poor quality of the stone commonly used makes this necessary if a smooth attractive surface is desired. Among the poorer classes, clay mixed with straw is used. In Pal and Syria, where there is a rainy season, the coating on the outside walls, if of clay, must be frequently renewed. In Egypt burnt gypsum, and in Pal and Syria burnt limestone (lime) are the commonest materials for making mortar. For the first coat of plastering the lime is mixed with "fat" red sand or with the ash from the bathhouse fires, and the finishing coat is composed of white sand and slaked lime with or without chopped flax straw. The plaster on some of the ancient Egyptian ruins seems to indicate that milk or some similar substance was added to the mortar to give a better surface.

The ancient plastered surfaces for decorating, and even the finest granite was covered with sloping process to create the desired effects (Dt 27:2; Dnl 6:5). Columns were often first stuccoed and then painted.

The Aramaic word for mortar is ḥbn, which really means "clay." The Heb יִשְׂרֵאֶל, šēhāḏ, lit, "to boil up," refers to the boiling of the water with which the lime is mixed, because of the heat generated during the process. In Dnl 5:5, occurs יֵקִיע, īqīḵ, i.e. "burned in a kiln," which might mean either lime or gypsum. In Lev 14:42 occurs יִשְׁדַע, ūšēḏ, "to smell."

JAMES A. PATCH

PLASTER, plas' tér (יוּתֶר, mōrāh): Only used in Isa 38:21 of the application of the cake of figs to the boil from which Hezekiah suffered. In Papyri Ebers, figs are used as the ingredient in a plaster (xxv, lxxix, lxxxii). Dioscorides also recommends figs with other substances as a poultice in some skin diseases.

PLASTERING, plas'-ter-ing. See CHAPTS, II, 15.

PLATE, plät: A term seemingly not used in the Bible for a dish as it is so commonly used at present, but always for a tablet or sheet of metal. (1) יִשְׁלֹחַ, gîš (Ex 28:36; 39:30; Lev 8:9), a plate of gold on the front of the mitre of the high priest. The name seems to have been given because of the radiance of the object. (2) יִשְׁלֹח, gîb (Ex 33:3; Nu 18:35), of plates or sheets of metal produced by hammering. (3) יִשְׁלֹח, lhîḥ, used for tablets or tables of stone (Ex 24:12, etc), but in 1 K 7:36 for the metal plates on the bases of the lavers in the temple. The word יִשְׁלֹח, sêrên, is rendered "plate" in 1 K 7:30 AV, manifestly incorrectly, RV "axle." WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

PLATTER, plät'ër: (1) יִשְׁלֹח, kîshāḏ, "a deep dish" (Nu 7:13 f.84.85). In AV and ERV "charger," ARV "platter" (cf Ex 25:29; 37:16); LXX ἀποθέσαν, triblion, and in the NT rendered "dish" (Mt 26:23; Mk 14:20). In Ex 9:9, ARV יִשְׁלֹח, ἄμφανταλ, rendered "platter," AV and ERV "chargers," probably a deep dish or basin used in sacred feasts, intended originally a side dish, for relishes, entrées, but of dishes for food, in general, esp. meats, fish, etc, used with יָפַר, πόλεμιον, "cup" or "drinking vessel" (Mt 25:51); also מָשָׁא, pinax, originally a large wooden dish or plate (Lk 11:39; rendered "charger") in Mt 14:8.11 AV, and Mk 6:25.28 AV and ERV. EDWARD BAGBY POUILLARD

PLAY, plää. See GAMES.

PLEAD, plëd: In modern non-legal Eng. is a synonym of "pray" or "beseech," but in legal phraseology "plea," "plead," and "pleading" have a great variety of technical meanings, with "present a case before the court" as the idea common to all. All the uses of "plead" in ERV are connected with this legal sense, so that outside of the set phrase "plead a cause" (1 S 24:15, etc) there is hardly a use of the word in AV, ERV, or ARV that is clear modern Eng. The most obscure instances are due to AV's employment of "plead" to translate the Niphal of פַּלֶל, hâphâl, חַפֶל means "judge," so its Niphal means "bring one's self into a case to be judged," "enter into controversy with," and so "plead" in the legal sense. Hence "none pleadeth in truth" (Isa 66:4) means "none of their lawsuits are honest." Accordingly, when God is said to "plead with" man (Isa 66:16 AV, ERV, etc), the meaning is that God states His side of the case and not at all that He supplants man to repent. And this statement by God is a judicial act that of course admits of no reply. Hence RV has changed "plead" into "enter into judgment with" the judgments of God. In Dnl 5:5 occurs יֵקִיע, i.e. "burned in a kiln," which might mean either lime or gypsum. In Lev 14:42 occurs יִשְׁדַע, to smell.

PLEDGE, plej (vbs. בָּבָד, hâbadh [10], יָבָד, yôbadh [2 K 18:23 = Isa 36:8]; nouns בָּבָד, hâbadh [Ezk 18:12,16; 33:15], יָבָד, hâbadh [Ezk 18:17], יָבָד, yôbadh [1 S 18:17], יָבָד, yôbadh [Gen 38:17,18,20]; also יָבָד, 'abhâd [Dt 24:10–13] and [RV only] יָבָד, 'abhâd [Hab 2:6]). All these words have about the same meaning. (1) The "pledge" is, as in modern Eng., security given for future payment (Gen 38:17–24) or conduct (Hab 2:6), where the conquered nations have given guaranties of their subsericivency to the Chaldaean; AV's "thick clay" here rests on a misreading of the Heb.). In 2 K 18:23 (= Isa 36:8) the "pledge" is a wager (so RY) Rasheshke mockinglv dares Hezekiah to stake a "pledge" that he can produce 200 oxen for the defence of Jerusalem, although the mighty Assyrv host has that number of horses alone. The general point of the obscure passage Prov 20:16 (= 27:13) is that he who guarantees strangers needs a guaranty himself. 1 S 17:18 is uncertain and the text may be corrupt. If not, the "pledge" is some (preserved?) token of the welfare of David's brethren. (2) Most of the occurrences of "pledge," however, deal with the debts of the very poor, who had no property that they could spare even temporarily. Consequently, the exaction of a pledge from such persons worked genuine ship, and to take a pledge at all was a cruel act (Job 24:3), although of course the dishonesty of withholding a pledge (Ezk 18:7; 35:15) was worse. In contrast was the creditor who took the garment the borrower was wearing (Am 2:8; Job 22:6; 24:9 m), and special legislation controlled this practice. A garment (the outer "cloak"—see Dress—not worn while doing manual labor) so that the "CHRORO." and "neighbor" (Ezk 22:26; Dt 24:12:13), for it was the usual covering of the sleeper. (Apparently, though, the creditor regained custody of it in the daytime until the debt was paid.) A widow's clothing, however, was entirely exempt (Dt 24:7). The "pledge" was the item sold for loans (24:6). The lender had no right of entry into the borrower's house to obtain the pledge (24:10,11), but it is not said that he could not dictate what he would accept; indeed, the contrary is inconceivable. (3) AV gives "pledge" for AV and ERV "faith" in 1 Tim 5:12. See also EAR- NEST. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

PLOW, plou (377, hārash; ἀπορίσω, arōrtāvō): No implement of the Bible is more frequently illustrated today because there is every reason to believe that the plows still used throughout Egypt, Pal, and Syria are counterparts of the ancient ones. The first plows were probably an adaptation of the ancient Egypt hoz, where the handle was lengthened in order that animals might be hitched to it. To make it easier to break up the ground, it was pointed, and handles were added by which it could be guided. The ancient plow probably varied in type in different sections of the country, as it does today. In one form a young tree of oak or other strong wood of a diameter of 3 or 4 in. is cut off just below a good-sized branch and again 15 or 20 in. above. The upper end of the severed trunk is pointed and forms the share. Between this and the side branch cut at right angles to the stem is cut off 10 or 12 ft. from the trunk and forms the pole. A lighter stick, about 3 ft. long, projects upward from the share and forms the handle. The plow used in Syria is of slightly different construction. The handle and share are one continuous piece. It can be said that there is a slight bend at the middle. Theshare is pointed and is used bare in the plains, or in more stony regions is shod with iron. The pole is of 2 pieces joined end to end. The thicker end of the pole is notched, so that it may be attached firmly to the share. The whole plow is so light that it can be easily carried on a man's shoulder. These plows literally scratch the soil, as the Heb word implies. They do not turn over the ground as the modern implement does. The plowman guides the plow with one hand, and with the other sometimes goads the oxen, and at other times with the chisel end of his goad breaks away the lumps of earth or other material which impedes the progress of his plow. See YOKE.

In addition to the words which are found above, the following terms are also used: ἱαῖνα, "to serve," "walked," or "plowed" (Dt 21:4); ἀπόρισσο, "to open," Ps 141:7).

One special law is mentioned in connection with plowing, namely that an ox and an ass should not be yoked together (Dt 22:10), a prohibition which is utterly disregarded today. Principally oxen were used for plowing (Job 1:14). Often several yokes of oxen followed each other plowing parallel furrows across the field, a sight still common on the plains of Syria (1 K 19:19). Plowing was done by bond servants (Lk 17:7; cf ἄδρωκη, Dt 21:4). Plowing cannot be done before the rains (Jer 14:4); on the other hand the soil is too sticky to plow in the winter time (Prov 20:4). The law requiring one day of rest in every seven included plowing time (Ex 34:21).

Figurative: "The plowers plowed upon my back," typified deep affliction (Ps 129:3; cf 141:7). "Plow iniquity," is urged in the sense of "plant iniquity." Doing evil was sure to bring evil consequences (Job 4:8; cf 6:10), and this is particularly true when the evil comes after plowing, so surely will Jehovah carry out His decree of destruction (Isa 28:23–25). "Jehovah shall plow," i.e. become enslaved (Hos 10:11); cf "Foreigners shall be your plowmen" (Isa 61:5). "Will one plow there with oxen?" (Am 6:13), "neither plowing nor harrowing" (Gen 46:6) are figures of desolation. Zion plowed as a field, i.e. utterly destroyed (Jer 26:18). The plowman shall overtake the reaper, i.e. the soil shall be so fertile as to require no rest—typical of great abundance (Am 9:13). No opportunity to plow because of lack of rain is a desolate picture of drought (Jer 14:4). As the plowman expects to share in the fruits of the harvest, so might an apostle expect his temporal needs to be provided for (1 Cor 9:10). "If ye had not plowed with my heifer," i.e. used my wife, was Samson's reply to those who had secured the answer to his riddle from her (Jgs 14:18). "Beat their swords into plowshares" (or hoes) (Isa 2:4; Mic 4:3) typified peace; "beat your plowshares into swords"—war (Jed 3:10). "Having put his hand to the plow, and looking back," i.e. longing for evil things when one has set his face toward doing what is right, unfits a man for the kingdom of God (Lk 9:62; cf Gen 19:26; Phil 3:19).

POCHERET-HAZZEBAIM, pok'ér-réth, po'ké-réth, po-ké-réth, ha-chaz-bé'im (הכזרב'ים, הָכוֹרֶת הָשֶׁבִּיִם, po-khereth ha-shébá'îyim) [Ex 2 57], or, הָכִרֶת הָשֶׁבִּיִּים, p. hâ-chirâ'îm [Neh 7 59], "binder [fem.] of the gazelles": Name of the head of a post-exilic family. The first word is a fem. participle Kal; cf kôleth ("preacher"), the Heb title of the Book of Ezech. The name Pochereth has been regarded as the suggested that the gloss states that "of" is not in the 1611 ed.

POET, po'ët (σάπετης, poíte's, "a maker"): Occurs in this sense only in Acts 17 28, where St. Paul quotes from the general expression of Gr mythology. The quotation if intended to be exact is probably from Aratus, as the words of St. Paul in his speech at Athens precisely agree with the opening words of the Phaenomena by Aratus. A like but not identical expression is found in the Hymn to Zeus by Cleanthes. Aratus in his poem endeavors to present Jupiter as the father and controller of all things, and worthy to be worshipped. In his poem and that of Cleanthes, but esp. in the latter, there is a true and lofty note of spiritual devotion. St. Paul takes this praise and devotion offered by the Gr poets to their unknown or fictitious gods and bestows it upon the one true God whom he declared unto the people of Athens.

LITERATURE

By Heb poetry in the present article is meant that of the OT. There is practically no poetry in the NT, but in the OT Apoc. Sir is largely poetical and Wisd only less so. Post-Bib. Heb poetry could not be dismissed here.

I. IS THERE POETRY IN THE OT?—It is impossible to answer this question without first of all stating what poetry really is. The present writer submits the following as a correct definition: "Poetry is verbal composition, imaginative and concrete in matter, and emotional and rhythmic in form." This definition recognizes two aspects of poetry, the formal and the material. The substance of poetry must be concrete—it is philosophy that deals with the abstract; and it has to be the product more or less of the creative imagination. It is one of the essence of poetry that, like music, it should be expressed in rhythmical but not necessarily in metrical form. Moreover, the language has to be such as will stir up the aesthetic emotions.

This account of poetry as criticism, it may unhesitatingly be affirmed that the Heb Scriptures contain a goodly amount of genuine poetry; of the Ps. Job, Cant., etc. It is strange but true that poetical is older than prose written composition. An examination of the literature of the ancient Indians, Babylarians, Hebrews, Greeks and Arabs makes this quite certain.

II. NEGLECT OF HEBREW POETRY: CAUSES.—Notwithstanding the undoubted fact that poetry is largely represented in the Bible, it is noteworthy that this species of Biblical literature was almost wholly ignored until the 17th cent. We can thereby see this fact mainly to two causes: (1) Since the Bible was regarded as preeminently, if not exclusively, a revelation of the Divine mind, attention was fixed upon what it contained, to the neglect of the literary form in which it was expressed. Indeed, as is was regarded as inconsistent with its lofty, Divine function to look upon it as literature at all, since in this last the appeal is made, at least to a large extent, to the aesthetic and therefore carnal man. The aim contemplated by Bible writers was practical, the communication of religious knowledge—not literary, and still less artistic. It was therefore regarded as inconsistent with such a high purpose that these writers should trouble themselves about literary embellishment or beauty of language, even as the sense was clear and unambiguous. It was in this spirit and animated by this conception that the Christian Church, under the influence of the Church of the East, decided on a priori grounds the presence of epic and dramatic poetry in the Bible. How, they exclaimed, could God countenance the writing of fiction which is untruth—and the epic and the drama have both? Matthew Arnold, who rendered invaluable service to cause of Bible science when he refuted against theologists, Jewish and Christian, for making the Bible a mere collection of proof texts, an arsenal whence religious warriors might get weapons with which to belabor their opponents. "The language of the Bible is fluid ... and literary, not rigid, fixed, scientific" (Preface to 1st ed. Literature and Dogma). The Bible contains literature, poetical and prose, equal as literature to the best, as Matthew Arnold, Carlyle and Froude have well shown. The neglect of this aspect of the Scriptures made theologians blind to the presence and therefore ignorant of the character of Bible poetry. (2) Another factor which led to the neglect of the poetical element in the Heb Scriptures is the undoubted fact that Bib. Heb poets were less conscious as poets than western poets, and thought much less of the external form in which they expressed themselves. Biblical poetry lacks therefore such close adherence to formal rules as characterizes Gr. Arab. or Eng. poetry. The authors wrote as they felt and because they felt, and their strong emotions dictated the forms their words took, and not any objective standards set up by the schools. Bib. poetry is destitute of meter in the strict sense, and also of rhyme, though this last occurs in some isolated cases (see below, III, 1, 4, c and e). No wonder then that Western scholars, missing these marks of the poetry which they knew best, failed for so long to note the poetry which the OT contains.

III. CHARACTERISTICS OF HEBREW POETRY: EXTERNAL AND INTERNAL.—The definition of poetry accepted in I, above, implies that there are marks by which poetry can be distinguished from prose. This is equally true of Heb poetry, though this last lacks some of the features of the poetry of western nations. (1) Vocabulary.—There are several Heb words which occur most frequently and in some cases exclusively in poetry. In the following list the corresponding prose Omitting “Yahwe,” which belongs alike to both members, it will be seen that the rest of the two half-lines corresponds word for word: “thy loving-kindness” corresponding to “thy faithfulness,” and “to the heavens” answering to “to the clouds” (cf Ps 15 1; 24 1–3; 25 5; 1 S 18 17; Isa 6 4; 13 7).

(ii) Antithetic parallelism: in which the second member of a line (or verse) gives the obverse side of the same thought, e.g. Prov 10 1:

'A wise son gladdens his father,
But a foolish son grieves his mother' (see Prov 11 3; Ps 37 9; cf Prov 10 1 ff; Ps 20 3; 30 6; Isa 64 7 ff). Sometimes there are more than two corresponding elements in the two members of the verse, as in Prov 29 27; cf 10 5; 16 9; 27 2.

(iii) Synthetic parallelism: called also constructive and pathetic. In this the second member adds something fresh to the first, or else explains it, e.g. Ps 19 5 ff.

The precepts of Yahweh are right, rejoicing the heart: The commandments of Yahweh are pure, enlightening the eyes.

The fear of Yahweh is clean, enduring for ever:
The judgments of Yahweh are true and righteous altogether.

More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; Sweeter also than the honeycomb and the honeycombs' (see Prov 1 7; cf 3 5 ff; Ps 1 3; 15 4). In addition to the three principal species of parallelism noticed above, other forms have been traced and described.

(iv) Introtroversial parallelism (Jebb, Sacred Lit., 53) in which the hemes of the parallel members are chiastically arranged, as in the scheme ab.

Thus Prov 23 15:

(a) 'My son, if thy heart be wise
(b) My heart shall be glad, even mine;
(c) Yea, my reins shall rejoice
(d) When thy lips speak right things'

(cf Prov 10 4; 12; 13 24; 21 17; Ps 51 3).

(v) Palillogrammatic parallelism: in which one or more words of the first member are repeated as an echo, or as the canon in music, in the second. Thus Nah 1 2:

'Yahwe is a jealous God and avenges;
Yahwe avenges and is full of wrath;
Yahwe takes vengeance on his adversaries; And reserves wrath for his enemies.'

(cf Jgs 5 3.6.11 f.15 f.23.27; Ps 2 7.12.17; 121; 124; 126; Isa 2 7; 24 5; Hos 6 4).

(vi) Climatic or comprehensive parallelism: In this the second line completes the first. Thus Ps 29 1:

"Give unto Yahwe, O ye mighty ones, Give unto Yahwe glory and strength" (see Ex 15 6; Ps 29 8).

(vii) Rhetorical parallelism (De Wette, Franz Delitzsch): thus Ps 138 4:

"All the kings of the earth shall give thee thanks .
For they have heard the words of thy mouth.
"See Prov 15 3; cf 16 7.10; 17 13.15; 19 20; 21 23.25.

Perfect parallelism is that in which the number of words in each line is equal. When unequal, the parallelism is called imperfect. Ewald (see Die poetischen Bücher des alten Bundes, 1, 57–92; Die Dichter des alten Bundes, 1, 91 ff, 2d ed of the former), aimed at giving a complete list of the relations and values which can be expressed by parallelism, and he thought he had succeeded. But in fact every kind of relation which can be indicated in words may be expressed in two or more lines more or less parallel. On the alleged parallelism of strophes see below.
(b) Parallelism as an aid to exegesis and textual criticism: If in Lowth's words parallelism implies that "in two lines or members of the same period things for the most part have similar meanings, and words to words, we should expect obscure or unknown words to derive some light from words corresponding to them in parallel members or clauses. Not a few cases are enabled to us by comparison of words to restore with considerable confidence different words to different contexts in a general way as follows: ab: cd. We know what a, b and c mean, but are wholly in the dark as to the sense of d. That by the aid of parallelism we have an illustration in Jgs 5:28, which may be thus literally translated: "Through the window she looked," and (iii) Sisera's mother "through the a." Here we see that the use of parallelism is considerable, corresponding to known terms. The Heb vb. accompanying "through a window," wattp, is EV. "and cried." But no such vb. (ghaddab) is known for the Talm, as usually, follows the traditional interpretation. We want a vb. with a meaning similar to "looked." If we read בפל, wattp, we have a form which could easily be corrupted into the word in the MT, which gives a suitable sense and moreover has the support of the Tgs of Onkelos and Jonathan, and even of the LXX (A and Luc). What about the other Heb word untranslated in the Talm, which translates "looking," "to face" (probably Prov 7:6 is dependent). We get no help from etymology or in this case from the VSS, but parallelism had suggested to our translators the meaning "through the window," and the rendering of "window," Wattp, and the hole in the wall to secure coolness in the house. Glass windows did not exist in Pal, and are rare even now. There are innumerable other examples in the OT of the use of parallelism in elucidating words which occur but once, of which we are otherwise unable to understand, and frequently a textual emendation is suggested which is otherwise supported.

(c) Prevalence and value of parallelism: Two statements areent parallelism in the OT may be safely regarded as characteristic of all OT poetry. Lowth had so much to do with its discovery and gave it naturally an exaggerated place in his scheme of Heb poetry, but it is lacking in the largest part of the poetry of the OT, and it is frequently met with in elevated and rhetorical prose. (i) That it pervades other poetry than that of the OT. It occurs in Assyria (see A. Jeremiahis, Die babylon. Vorstellung vom Leben nach dem Tod), in Egypt (Georg Ehlers, Nord u. Süd, 1), in Finnish (Gefährter, Die deutschen Volks-Aberglaube der Gegenwart, 1869, 157) and Eduard Norden (Die antike Kunstprosa, 1898, II, 813) maintain that parallelism is the primitive form of the poetry of all nations. It must necessarily be that in OT parallelism is held in proportion a larger place than in any other literature and that the correspondence of the parts of the stichs or verses is closer.

(5) Other literary devices.—OT poetry has additional features which it shares with other oriental and with western poetry. Owing to lack of space these can be hardly be more than enumerated.

(a) Alliteration: e.g. "Round and round the rugged rocks." We have good examples in the Heb of Ps 6:8 and 27:7. (b) Assonance, or the use of many (see for Bible examples the Heb of Gen 49:17; Ex 14:14; De 32:1) rhyme. There are so few examples of this in the Heb Scriptures that one can regard it as a feature in Heb poetry, though in Arab, and even in the Gk, there are examples. Two Hebrew stichs in the Heb text of Genesis 4:23: Job 10: 8: "The case of the wise is: In the days of the ancient kings in the days of four generation, there are few examples of this in the Heb text. The cases of the ancient kings. (c) Rhyme: There are so few examples of this in the Heb Scriptures that one can regard it as a feature in Heb poetry, though in Arab, and even in the Gk, there are examples. In the days of the ancient kings there are few examples. (d) Assonance and effactual working belong to it, "are with (lit. "are with") his err, and that err that he causes to err." Man's rhetorical instincts are quite sufficient to account for this phenomenon without assuming that in Heb poetry there is an objective standard. Those who adopt this last view and reject the idea that man's intuition is a help to his poetry are indeed correct. For an examination of the metrical systems of Hubert Grümme, who takes account of quantity as well as accent, and of Eduard Sievers, who holds that the versification of the Heb

Man's rhetorical instincts are quite sufficient to account for this phenomenon without assuming that in Heb poetry there is an objective standard. Those who adopt this last view and reject the idea that man's intuition is a help to his poetry are indeed correct. For an examination of the metrical systems of Hubert Grümme, who takes account of quantity as well as accent, and of Eduard Sievers, who holds that the versification of the Heb
Bible that Heb poetry is normally anapaestic, see W. H. Gubb, Criticism of Systems of Heb Meter, 152 ff., 169 ff. Herder, K. J. Budde, F. R. Eckardt, B. Dölle, and Toy reject all the systems of Heb meter hitherto proposed, though Budde has a leaning toward Ley's system.

(f) Budde's kinah measure: Though Budde takes up in general a negative position in regard to Heb meter, he pleads strenuously for the existence of one specific meter with which his name is associated. This is the "kinah measure" (from הַכָּנָה, kinnedah, "a lamentation"). In this each stich is said to consist of one hemistich with three beats or stress syllables and another having two such syllables, this being held to be the specific meter of the dirge (see Lam 1:1, etc.). Ley and Briggs call it "pentameter" because it is made up of five (3 + 2) feet (a foot in Heb prosody being equal to an accented syllable and the unaccented syllables combined with it). See Budde's full treatment of the subject in ZATW, 60, 152, "Das heb. Klagegedicht." It must, however, be borne in mind that even Herder (d. 1805) describes the use in elegies of what he calls, anticipating Ley and Briggs, the "pentameter" (see Geist der ebräischen Poesie, 1782, I, 321, ET The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1833, I, 40). But the present writer submits the following criticisms:

(i) Budde is inconsistent in rejecting all other theories of meter and yet in retaining one of his own, which is really but part of the system advocated by Bellermann, Ley and Briggs. (ii) He says, following Herder, that it is the measure adopted by mourning women (Jer 9:16), but we have extremely few examples of the latter, and his statement lacks proof. (iii) There are dirges in the OT not expressed in the kinah measure. David's lament over Saul and Jonathan is more hexameter and tetrameter than pentameter, unless we proceed to make a new text (2 S 1 19 ff). (iv) The kinah measure is employed by Heb poets where the theme is joyous or indifferent; see Ps 119, which is a didactic poem.

(6) Units of Hebrew poetry.—In western poetry the ultimate unit is usually the syllable, the foot (consisting of at least two syllables) coming next. Then we have the verse-line crowned by the stanza, and finally the poem. According to the theory of Heb poetry adopted by the present writer, the following are the units, beginning with the simplest:

(a) The meter: This embraces the accented (tone) syllable together with the unaccented syllable preceding or succeeding it. This may be called a rhythmic foot.

(b) The stich or verse: In Job and less regularly in Ps and Cant and in other parts of the OT (Nu 23 19-24) the stich or verse consists commonly of three toned syllables and therefore three meters (see above for sense of "meter"). It is important to distinguish between this poetic sense of "verses" and the ordinary meaning—the subdivision of a Bible chapter. The stich in this sense appears in a separate line in some old MSS.

(c) Series of stichs (verses): In Heb poetry a stich hardly ever stands alone. We have practically always a distich (couplet, Job 18:5), a tristich (triple, Nu 6 24-26), a tetristich (Gen 44 23), or the pentastich.

(d) Strophes or strophers (Stud. Krü., 1831, 40-114, "Die Strophen," etc) maintained that all poems in the Heb Scriptures are naturally divisible into strophes (stanzas) of similar, if not equal, length. Thus Ps 119 is arranged in strophes named after the letters of the Heb alphabet, each stich containing eight verses, or sixteen metrical verses or stichs, most of the stichs having three meters or rhythmic feet. But though several Bib. poems are composed in strophes, many are not.

(e) Song: This (םירָד, síhráh) is made up of a series of verses and in some cases of strophes.

(f) Poem: We have examples of such strophes in the books of Job and Cant which consist of a combination of the song.

(7) Classification of stichs or verses.—Stichs may be arranged as follows, according to the number of meters (or feet) which they contain: (a) the trimeter or trisyllabic, with three meters or feet; (b) the tetrameter, with a stich four meters or feet; (c) the pentameter or pentasyllabic, which has five meters or feet: this is Budde's "kinah measure" (see Lam 1:1, etc.). Though this consists of six meters or feet, and is often used to distinguish from two separate trimeters or tripods.

Our first and most original authority on the internal characteristics of Heb poetry is that great German theologian and man of letters, J. G. Herder, the pastor and friend of Goethe and schiller at Weimar. In his Vom Geist der ebräischen Poesie, 1784, he discussed at length and with great freshness these internal aspects of the poetry of the OT (down to Nature, Budde, etc.) which impressed him as a literary man. Reference may be made also to Goethe's Theory of the Poem, 1821 (popular), and Isaac Taylor's Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1834, it is a strange but striking and significant coincidence that these two poets and much if any knowledge of the Heb language. They studied the poetry of the ancient Hebrews only extensively. They do not, however, the Hebrews who concerned themselves with the preservation of the literature as such. (b) Within the Bible Canon itself there are numerous poems or snatches of poems reflecting the everyday life of the people. (c) We have love songs (Ps 45), a wedding song (Ps 66), parts of ditties sung on discovering a new well (Nu 21 17 f), on drinking wine, and there are references to war songs (Nu 21 14; Josh 10 13; 2 S 1 18).

(2) Species of poetry.—Bib. poetry may be subsumed under the following headings: (a) folkore, prophetic, (b) poetical, (c) speculative, (d) lyrical.

(a) Folklore: "Poetry," said J. G. Hamann (d. 1788), "is the mother tongue of the human race." In both folk-music and folk-poetry, each the oldest of its class, the inspiration is immediate and spontaneous. We have examples of folk-songs in Gen 11 1-9; 19 24 f.

(b) Prophetic poetry: This is the expression of the inspiration under which the seer wrote. One may compare the oracular utterances of diviners and prophets, and invariably poetical in form as well as in matter. But one has to bear in mind that the heathen diviner claimed to have his messages from jinns or other spirits, and the means he employed were as a rule a means of various kinds. The OT prophet professed to speak directly and partially inspired by God (see Divination, VIII). Duhm thinks that the genuine prophecies of Jeremiah are wholly poetical, the prose parts being interpolations. But the prophet is not merely or primarily a poet, though it cannot be doubted that a very large proportion of the prophecies of the OT are poetical in form and substance.

(c) Philosophical poetry: This expression is intended to include such poetry as is found in the Wisdom literature of the OT and the Apoc (see Wisdom Literature). The so-called didactic poetry, that of the proverb or parable (דָּבֶר, māshāḥ), also comes in here.

(c) Lyrical poetry: This includes the hymns of the Psalter, the songs of Cant and the many other lyrics found in the historical and prophetical writings. In these lyrics all the emotions of the human soul are expressed.

Does the OT contain specimen of epic and dramatic poetry? The answer must depend on what definition of both is adopted.

(a) Epic poetry: The present writer would define an epic poem as a novel with its plot and development charged, however, with the passion and set out in the rhythmic form of poetry. There is no part of the OT which meets the requirements of this definition, certainly not the Creation, Fall and Deluge stories, which De Wette (Beiträge, 228 ff., Einleitung, 147) and R. G. Moulton (Literary Study of the Bible, ch. ix) point to as true epics, and which Ewald (Dichter des alten Bundes, i, 87 ff.) held rightly to have in them the stuff of epics, though not the form.

(b) Dramatic poetry: Defining dramatic poetry as that which can be acted on a stage, one may with confidence say that there is no example of this in the OT. Even the literary drama must have the general characteristics of that which is acceptable. Franz Delitzsch and other writers have pointed to Job and Cant as dramatic poems, but the definition adopted above excludes both.

IV. Poetical Writings of the OT.—According to the Massoretes or editors of our present Heb Bible, there are but three poetical books in the OT, Job, Prov, and Ps, known in Jewish circles by the mnemonic abbreviation גָּמֶל, Ṣemeth, the three consonants forming the initial letters of the Heb names of the above books. These three books have been supplied by the Massoretes with a special system of accent marks known as the poetic accents, and involving a method of intoning in the synagogue different from that followed when the prose books are read. But these accentual marks cannot be traced farther back than the 7th or 8th cent. of our era.

It is customary to divide the poetical books of the OT into two classes, each containing three books: (1) those containing lyrical poetry (יָשָׁר, ašhr, or יָשָׁרָה, shirāh), i.e. Ps, Cant, Lam; (2) those containing for the most part didactic poetry (דָּבֶר, māshāḥ), i.e. Job, Prov, Eccl.

There is a large amount of poetry in the OT outside the books usually classed as poetical: (a) poetry in the prophetic books (see above, III, 2); (b) poetry in the historical books including the Pent (see Michael Hengelr, The Historical Poetry of the Hebrews, 2, 1879-80).

We have examples in Gen 4 23 f.; 49; Ex 15; Nu 21 14 f.27-30 (JE); 23 f (Balaam’s songs); Dt 321 (song and blessing of Moses); Josh 10 12-14 (JE); Jos 8 (Deborah’s Song); 9 8-15; 1 S 2 1-10; 2 S8; 13 39 f; 23 (= Ps 18), etc.

LITERATURE.—The most important books and articles on the subject have been mentioned in the course of the foregoing article. Here are a full list of works dealing with Heb meter in W. H. Cobb, Criticism of Systems of Heb Metre (1907). The first edition of the world’s still usable "Essay on Hebrew Poetry" prefixed to his comm. on the Ps was published in Eng. in the Journal of Sacred Literature (1854), 74 ff. In 1905 J. W. Rothstein issued a suggestive treatise on Heb rhythm (Grundzüge der hebräischen Rhythmik mit kritischem Kommentar, Halle, 5ff), reviewed by the present writer in Review of Theol. and Philos. (Edinburgh, 1905). Early Religious Poetry of the Hebrews by E. G. King (Cambridge University Press) contains a good, brief, popular statement of the subject, though it makes no pretense to originality. In The Poets of the OT, 1912, Professor A. R. Gordon gives an excellent popular account of the poetry and poetical literature of the OT.

POETRY, NEW TESTAMENT: No one questions the presence of poetry of high order in the NT. The study of the OT as the literature of the ancient Hebrews has been critically made, and the attention of even the ordinary reader of the Scriptures called to the beauty and wealth of its poetical passages. The messages of the NT are vitally spiritual and concerned with religion that but little attention has been paid to it as literature. Naturally it would be strange if the poetic inspiration which runs like a tide through the prophetic and post-exilic periods of the OT should altogether cease under the clearer spiritual dispensation of the NT. The fact is that it does not cease, but that under every fundamental rule for poetic utterance, save that of rhyme, the NT is seen to be rich in imaginative vision, in religion founded by revelation, and in poetic expression. The Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and the Ep. of Jas, all afford examples of lofty poetic utterance, while the message of Jesus is saturated with words which readily lend themselves to song. In fact it is thought by Delitzsch that Jesus was no less careful of the form than of the content of His message, and that all the finer types of Heb poetry found in the OT can be matched from His sayings, even when tested by the same rules.

In the Gospels that of St. Luke gives us our best examples of poetry. "No sooner have we passed through the vestibule of His Gospel than we find ourselves within a circle of harmonies" (Burton, in Expositor’s Bible). From the poetic utterances of Mary, Elisabeth, Zacharias, Simeon, and the Angels, the church gains her Magnificat, Beatitude, Benedictus, Nunc Dimittis and Gloriae.

The utterances of John the Baptist are filled with a rugged desert vision and an expression which reveals a form of poesy in novicew to be mistaken for prose.

St. Paul presents many of his ideas in harmonious and beautiful forms. He knew the secular poets of his day, and has immortalized Cleanthes’ Hymn to Zeus (Acts 17 28). He also quotes from Epicenides and the Athenian dramatist Menander in 1 Cor 15 32. St. Paul knew the genius of the Hebrews, and enriches his own message with many quotations from it. He was acquainted with the Christian hymnology of his own times, as is seen in Eph 5 14 and 1 Tim 3 16. He offers also original flashes of poetic inspiration and grace; a good example of which is found in Rom 8 31-37.

Who could doubt the poetic imagery of St. James? He might almost be called the poet of social justice and of patient waiting under affliction for the will of God to come to men.

When one comes to the words of Jesus he discovers that in a very true sense His speech answers to the requirements for Heb poetry. Examples of synonymous, antithetic, synthetic and causal parallelism are the rule rather than the exception in the utterances of Jesus. For the NT see the Exegesis of the Prophetic form see Mt 10 24; for the antithetic see Lk 6 41; for the synthetic and causal forms see Lk 9 23 and Mt 6 7. Not alone are these forms of Heb poetry found in the words of Jesus, but also the more involved and sustained poetic utterances (Lk 7 31-32).

No one can question the deep emotional quality, the vivid imagination and spiritual idealism of Jesus. That the form of His speech is adequately set to poetic expression and that the qualities of Heb poetry have not been so freely acknowledged. Independently of the theory advanced in Did Jesus Write His Own Gospel? (William Pitt MacVey), every student of the literature of the NT must be grateful for the chapter on “The Poems of Jesus.”

Spirituality and poetry have a kinship, and the interpretation of any message is aided by the adequate knowledge of its context. When a text has been carefully studied as literature, it will be seen, not only that Jesus was a poet, but that the entire NT, if not as rich as the OT in poetic passages, is sufficiently poetic to receive treatment as such in religious encyclopaedias. POINTS, points: The word occurs in Ecc 5 16, “In all points (ggΟνη, ummah`) as he came, so shall he go”—a man leaves the world in all regards as helpless as he entered it, no matter what he may have accomplished during his life.

Also in He 4 15. “In all points (κατά ποινά, katê poínta, “in all things,” as in His human nature (2 14), so in His human experience (cf 2 17 18)!” tempted like as we are, yet without sin.” He successfully resisted temptation at all points of His nature, in body, soul, and spirit. They are too replete for us to summarize here. The temptations of Christ were, as He afterwards said, “as many against me as against you” (John 14 29). Such temptations had necessarily no place in Christ. He was tempted as we are, sharing our nature, yet with this exception, that there was no sin in Him to become the spring of trial.” Whichever interpretation is adopted there is profound insight into the things of the soul in joining sinlessness with fulness of experience of temptation.

POISON, poi`zn (γάλακτος, hemah`, γάλακτος, rôsh`; σουλόδος, thumôs, lôs, lûs): Residents in Pil must, from the first, have been acquainted with venomous serpents. Six species of these are widely diffused in the land, and at least three of them are fairly common in places. Besides, there are scorpions, centipedes and the large spider, which are as much dreaded by the fellahin as any of the reptiles, not to speak of the mice, but very serious discomforts of mosquitoes, sandflies and ticks, some of which were credited with lethal powers. In Wisi 16 9 RV we read that “the bites of locusts and flies did slay, and there was not found a healing for their bite” (44 20). These and other poisonous plants, such as belladonna, henbane, thorn apple, and the opium poppy. None of these is mentioned in the Bible; the only names found there are the hemlock (Conium maculatum) of Hos 10 4, the poisonous gourd (Citrusulus colocynthis) of 2 K 4 39, and the grapes of gall, probably the fruit of Colotropis procera, the apples of Solom of Jos (BJ IV, viii, 4). Some, however, believe that these are poppyheads. Poisonous waters are referred to at Marah (Ex 15 20) and Jericho (2 K 2 19). There is no direct record of any person dying of poison except in 2 Mac 10 13, where the suicide of Ptolemy Macron is recorded. Our Lord’s promise in the appendix to Mk 16 18, however, that poisons were known and might be administered by way of healing was in the unknown “water of jealousy” (Nu 5 17). In connection this story in Eusebius (HE, III, 39) is interesting, that “Justus surnamed Barsabas, though he drank a deadly poison, suffered no injury, through the grace of the Lord.” Other passages which mention the word are Dt 32 4, where serpents (RV “crawling things”) of the dust, probably Ceraastes hasselquisti, the little horned vipers, are mentioned, and in ver 33: “poison of serpents, and the cruel venom of asps.” The asp may be the eobra Naia haje, not uncommon on the borders of the wilderness to the S. Ps 58 4 mentions the poison of serpents. Ps 140 3, “They have sharpened their tongue like a serpent; adders’ poison is under their lips,” indicates, what is still a common belief, that when poison (the forked tongue of the serpent) is the poison-bearer. This is referred to in Jus 3 8. That it was the fang and not the tongue which carried the poison was known to Phiny (xlii.62). This verse of Ps 140 is given in St. Paul’s composite quotation in Rom 3 13. There may be a reference to the giving of an intoxicant poison in Hab 2 15, where RV reads “that addeth thy venom.” The prophets speak in several places of God’s wrath as a cup of trembling (RV “staggering”), e.g. Isa 51 17 22, probably suggested by the fact that this primarily means “fury” and is used in that sense in more than a hundred passages. In Zec 12 2 Jesus is to be such a “cup of reeling unto all the peoples round about.”

The ἑμαθή, “lizard” (AV “spider”), mentioned in Prov 30 25 (LXX kolobôth) was formerly regarded as poisonous and it is still much disliked by the fellahin, as they believe that it makes mocking gestures mimicking them at their prayers. They are really not poisonous. It is doubtful whether the lizard mentioned by Agur is really this scorpion; the description better fits the gecko.

POLE, pôl: Nu 21 8. AV for POL, nēg, RV “standard.”

POLICY, pol`i-see: Lit. “method of government,” and so “ability to manage affairs.” In a bad sense, “cunning,” “craft,” in Dal 8 25 (γάρδας, sekel, “understanding”); in a good sense in 1 Mac 8 4 (πολιτική, boulê, “counsel”); also in AV 2 Mac 13 18, 14 29 31 (μεθόδοι, méthodos, στρατηγική, stratėgenê, stratē̇genês, stratîgenos, stratîgėnês), where RV has “strategy.”

Policies occurs in Jer 11 8 AV for πανοπλισμος, πανοπλίσμον, “readiness,” in a good sense; RV “subtil devices.”

POLISHED, pol`isht. See CORNER-STONE, (2).

POLL, pôl: The word (on the derivation of which see Skeat, Concise Etym. Dict. of the Eng. Language, 360) has been eliminated as a vb in ARV. In AV and ERV it represents the Heb vb. טַעַשׁ, ṭoash, “to sharpen,” “to sharpen a sword,” “to sharpen out,” “to uproot,” thence “to shear the sheep,” figuratively, “to destroy an enemy” (Mic 1 16), γαλάκτω, γαλακτω, in Piel, lit. “to make bald orround-headed” (2 S 14 26) and γαλάκτω, γαλακτω, “to cut off” (Jer 9 26; 25 23; 49 32). The Heb noun is γαλακτος, galaktos. As will be seen from the above enumeration, the Heb. vb. differ considerably in etymology, while RV has not tried to distinguish. In Mic 1 16 we have a reference to the oriental custom of cutting or tearing one’s hair as a sign of mourning for one’s relatives. “Make thee bald, and cut off thy hair [AV and ERV “poll thee.” Heb ᵃḇbᵉzath for the children of thy delight: enlarge thy baldness as the eagle [in “vulture”]; for they are gone into captivity from thee.” The priests, the sons of Zadok, are instructed to abstain from outward resemblance to heathen patterns of priesthood: “Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only cut off the hair [AV and ERV “poll”]. Heb ᶻḇague] of their heads” (Ezk 44 20). The Piel form of galaktô is employed in the description of the annual hair-cutting of Absalom (2 S 14 26). Thrice we find the vb. “to poll” as the tr of Heb ṣe’ar, where ARV materially imiproves the tr by adopting the marginal version of AV (Jer 9 36; 25 23; 49 32). See Hair.

The noun (gubôlêth, lit. “head”) is tr’ “poll” in the phrase “by the poll,” “by their polls” (Nu 1 2, 18, 20, 22; 3 47; 1 Ch 23 8, 24). The expression has polygamy in the numbering of persons by their heads, in the same way in which we speak of head-tax, etc.

H. L. E. LERING

POLULLION, po-lis’shun (κόπας, gôtal, “to pollute”; ἀληγρώμα, ἀληγανία, “contamination”): In Mt 1 7, “Ye offer polluted bread,” i.e. not actually unclean, but worthless, common (cf Ex 2 62), bread here being used metonymically for sacrificial offerings generally (cf Lev 21 6; Mt 6 11). The phrase in Acts 15 20, “the pollutions of idols,” is explained in ver 29 by “things sacrificed [AV “meats offered’] to idols.”

1. Meaning of the Term
2. Origin of Polygamy

4. Polygamy Unnatural
5. Weakness of Polygamy

Polygamy has been and is the open blazon by the human race of sex vice. The very term is a misnomer. Since man became moralized he has apprehended that the proper mar-

The complications introduced into morals by polygamy are not often considered. But the Bible sets them forth in plainness. The marriage of Abraham and Sarah seems to have been an original love match, and even to have preserved something of that character through life. Still we find Sarah under the influence of polygamous ideas, previous to Abraham's marriage. Afterward, when she herself had a son, she induced Abraham to drive out into the wilderness this concubine and her son. Now Abraham was humane and kind, and it is said “The thing was very grievous in Abraham’s sight” (Gen 21 11). But he was in the toils of polygamy, and it brought him pain and retribution. A Divine direction may be hard to hear.

The conditions of Jacob's marriages were such that it is hard to say whether his children were of any other than of polygamous origin (Gen 35 22-26). Where the family idea and affection went, in such mixed condition, is evidenced by the unblishing sale, for slavery in Egypt, of one of the brothers by a polygamous father.

David was a singer of sweet and noble songs and wanted to be a righteous man with his whole heart. Yet, probably common in all the military leaders and kings of the earth of his day, he had a polygamous career. His retributions ran along an extended line. There was a case of incest and murder among his children (2 S 13). The son in whom he had most hope and pride organized treason against his throne, and lost his life in the attempt.

David left his kingdom to Solomon, of whom much might be said, but of whom this can be said—undeniably originally a man bright, keen-witted, wise, yet in his old age he went to pieces by the wiles of the women with whom he had loaded his harem.

Partly by his extravagance in his polygamous life, and partly in attempt to build temples in distant places for the religions represented by the inmates of his harem, he bankrupted his nation. As a consequence his kingdom was divided at his death, and there was never again a united Israel (1 K 11 12). Polygamy must be justly charged with these untoward results.

It can be demonstrated scientifically, even mathematically, that polygamy is a moral wrong. Statistics show that births are substantially equally divided between the sexes. Excess seems slightly on the side of males. When this fact is considered and also the fact of the wide prevalence of polygamy, it would seem that polygamy is a greater crime against Unnatural Nature than polyandry. To put out of view for a moment the wrong to a woman in denying to her the rights and privileges of monogamous marriage, the interference with the rights of many women who constituted a large up in vast proportion. Every harem is the denial to men of the right to seek among its inmates wives according to the dictates of their own hearts.

The eunuch,—but we are not done with the crime against man. Given a harem, he who set it up has made, or there brought, the eunuch. The lord of the harem must be served by emasculated men. A search in history will reveal an amount of this wickedness that is past belief. The eunuch has been fixed the condition of woman in provinces and tongues. They have not only been servants to women in harems, but they have acquired such influence with their masters that they have sometimes even dictated the policy of government. They have been in some cases the last word in public affairs. They have sometimes held public positions and shown therein astonishing ability. Witness Nares, the brilliant general of the emperor Justinian. See EUNUCH.

Gibbon noticed the fact that nations began to decline in power when their policies were dictated by eunuchs. But that is taking a symptom for the disease. There are weaknesses behind that weakness. We have found woman in muscular strength equal to three-fourths of a man. If we claim nothing more for woman than that ratio through the whole scale of her endowments, what would be thought of a nation that should try to reduce that three-fourths of potency as nearly to zero as it could? This is what polygamy has done.—reduced woman as nearly to a cipher as it could in all the departments of her being. She has been held to the lowest and most primitive industrial pursuits. She has been deprived of intellectual development. She has been debarred from society, permitted to look at it only through a bared lattice, or, if abroad, through a wathed face. The harem of shell or sultan has fixed the condition of woman in provinces or nation,—set the bounds to her life. The highest office assigned her has been breeder of children, and for one-half of them,—the daughters,—she could have no possible hope or ambition (see WOMAN).

Where is such degradation is the "helpmeet" for man in all his problems? This condition is reflected back over man. What possible appeal can there be to vast for thought and energy except to repeat the same dull round exhibited in his daily life? Polygamous nations have never been industrial inventors, have contributed little to science. They have usually ruined the fertility of the lands they have occupied. They have been heavily weighed with the lethargy of a system that appeals to nothing but the most primitive instincts and vices of man.

The monogamous have been the forceful nations. Rome conquered the world while she was monogamous; and lost control of it when she dropped to the moral level of the sex corruption of the peoples she had conquered. The Teuton tramped into and over Europe in earthen mounted on solid wood trucks. But his cart carried one wife, and now all polygamy is held under the trained guns of the Teuton.

There may seem to be two exceptions—the establishment of the Mogul empire in India and the subjugation of Western Asia and Eastern Europe by the Turk. That in both cases there was great success in war is granted. They were authorized by their religion to exhibit the frenzy of bloodshed and indulge in lust. Indeed, enjoyment of the latter was a bright hope for the life to come. But when they had possession of a country, and massacres and ravishing were over, what then? For what is mankind indebted to them?

A lyric.—A lyric has been put in the hand of the present writer by a friend who wrote it the last date of the title. It is one of the lyrics of the centuries in its synthesis of history and in its insight into the forces physical, moral, and mental, that were at work in the Mogul empire of India. Notice the dates. The text will show what took place between.

The Mogul 1525-1857

A war steed coursed out the wind-swept north,
Snuffling his teeth with hooves of fire,
Neighing the joy of heroic desire.

The circling herbage of arid plains
Had touched his hooves like bands of steel:
The snow-fed waters of Zarafshan
Had nerved the might of a northern will.
The war steed grazed in the fertile meads,
Drinking the waters of indolent streams:
He rested at eve on bloom-dight beds,
Toied by with maidens in the goldening gleams.
They charmed his ear with dajiant song:
Many closed his eyes in witchery's glow;
They fed him the vineyards' wildering draught—
He slept in the breath of the lotus tree.

White bones lie strewn on the flowering mead,
The flowered grass grows green:
The carrion bird hath flown—hath died—
Riseloth the war-horse? Neigheth? Hark!

The above lyric may be taken as the epitaph of any polygamous nation. The last words are significant—"Neigheth? Hark!" Would the old war steed arise? "Hark!" The Sepoy rebellion was on! We "harkened," but the rebellion went to pieces and an end was put to the Mogul empire. We have listened for half a century and heard no sound. We hear mutterings now, but the end will be as before—even if the "war-horse" riseth and is victorious. He will then again lie down in "Beast-rank grass grown high and dark," and the "carrion bird" will fly from his "white bones." Streams cannot rise higher than their fountains. The causes remaining, the same effects will follow. See Divorce; Family; Marriage.

POMEGRANATE, pom'gran-át, pom-gran'at, pun'gran-áṭ (יוֹרָם, ṭū机动车 [tree and fruit]; the Heb name is similar to the Arab., Arum, and Ethiop.; θησος, rhos): One of the most attractive and most characteristic of the fruit trees of Syria, Palestine probably indigenous to Persia, Afghanistan and the neighborhood of the Caucasus, but introduced to 9 in very ancient times. The spies brought specimens of figs and pomegranates, along with grapes, from the Vale of Eschol (Nu 13:23). Vines, figs and pomegranates are mentioned (Nu 20:5) as fruits the Israelites missed in the wilderness; this garden land was to be one "of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates" (Dt 8:8), a promise renewed in Hag 2:19. In the lamentation in Joel 1:11-12 we have the pomegranate, the palm tree and the apple tree represented as withered, “for joy has vanished from the sons of men.”

The pomegranate tree, Punica granatum (N.O. Granateae) occurs usually as a shrub or small tree 10-15 ft. high, and is distinguished by its fresh green, oval leaves, which fall in winter, and its brilliant scarlet blossoms (cf Cant 7:12). The beauty of an orchard of pomegranates is referred to in Cant 4:13. The fruit which is ripe about September is apple-shaped, yellow-brown with a blush of red, and is surrounded by a crown-like cardylus. On breaking the hard rind, the white or pinkish, translucent fruits are seen tightly packed together inside. The juicy seeds are sometimes sweet and sometimes somewhat acid, and need sugar for eating. The juice expressed from the seeds is made into a kind of syrup for flavoring drinks, and in ancient days was made into wine: “I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine, of the juice (m. “sweet wine”) of my pomegranate” (Cant 5:2). The beauty of a cut section of pomegranate—or one burst open naturally—when fully ripe—may have given rise to the comparison in Cant 4:3; 6:7: “Thy temples are like a piece of a pomegranate.” The rind of the pomegranate contains a very high percentage of tannic acid, and is employed both as a medicine and for tanning, particularly in making genuine morocco leather.

Whether the pomegranate tree in Migron under which Saul is said (1 Sam 14:2) to have abode with his men is really a tree or a place, Rimmon, is doubtful. See Rimmon.

A large number of references to the pomegranate are to the use of the fruit in ornamentation, in which respect it appears among the Hebrews to have something of the position of the lotus bud as a decorative motive in Egypt. It was embrodered in many colors on the skirts of Aaron’s garments, together with golden bells (Ex 28:33; 39:24-26; cf Exclus 45:9). Hiram of Tyre introduced the pomegranate into his brass work ornamentation in the temple: “So he made the pillars; and there were two rows round about upon the one network, to cover the capitals that were upon the tops of the pillars” (2 Sam 5:17; 2 Ch 3:16; 4:13). See S. W. G. Masterman.

POMMEL, pun’el (2 Ch 4:12.13): RV reads “bowl” (q.v.).

POND. See CISTERN; POOL.

PONDER, pun’der: Occurs in AV 5 t in the Book of Prov and nowhere else in the OT. In each case it means “to consider carefully,” “to weigh mentally.” In Prov 4:26 and 5:21, RV substitutes “make level.” In Prov 5:6, it drops out entirely in RV. In Prov 21:2 and 24:12, “weigh” is substituted for “ponder.” The one NT passage is Lk 2:19; here RV has “pondering” where AV has “and pondered.”

PONTIUS, pon’shiy-uh, pon’ti-uh. See PILATE.

PONTUS, pon’tus (Πόντος, Pontos): Was an important province in the northeastern part of Asia Minor, lying along the south shore of the Black Sea. It is the name of geographical, not ethnical, origin, and was first used to designate that part of Cappadocia which bordered on the “Pontus,” as the Euxine was often termed. Pontus proper extended from the Halys River on the W. to the borders of Colchis on the E., its interior boundaries meeting those of Galatia, Cappadocia and Armenia. The chief rivers besides the Halys were the Iris, Lyceus and Thermodon. The configuration of the country included a beautiful but narrow, riparian margin, backed by a noble range of mountains parallel to the coast; these in turn were broken by the streams that forced their way from the interior plains down to the sea; the valleys, narrower or wider, were fertile and productive, as were the wide plains of the interior such as the Chilikomon and Phanaraeus. The mountain slopes were originally clothed with heavy forests of beech, pine and oak of different species, and when the country was well wooded, the rainfall must have been better adequate than now to the needs of a luxuriant vegetation.

The first points in the earliest history of Pontus emerge from obscurity, much as the mountain peaks of its own noble ranges lift their heads above a fog bank. Thus we catch glimpses of Assyr culture at Sinope and Amias, probably as far back as the 3d millennium BC. The period of Hittite domination in Asia Minor followed hard after, and there is increasing reason to suppose that the Hittites occupied certain leading city sites in Pontus, constructed the artificial mounds or tumuli that frequently meet the eyes of modern travelers, hewed out the rock tombs, and stamped their character upon the early conditions. The home of the Amazons, those warrior priestesses of the Hittites, was located on the banks of the Thermodon, and the mountains rising behind Termes are still called the “Amazon Range”; and the old legends live still in stories about the superior prowess of the modern women living there. See ARCHAEOLOGY OF ASIA MINOR.

As the Hittite power shrunk in extent and force, by the year 1000 BC bands of hardy Gr adventurers appeared from the W. sailing along the Euxine main in quest of lands to exploit and conquer and colonize. Cape Jason, which divides the modern mission fields of Trebizond and Marsovan, preserves the memory of the Argonauts and the Golden Fleece. Miletus, “greatest of the Ionic towns,” sent out its colonists, swim after swim, up through the Bosphorus, and along the southern shore of the Black Sea. They occupied Sinope, the northernmost point of the peninsula with the best harbor and the most commanding situation. Sinope was in Paphlagonia, but politically as well as commercially enjoyed intimate relations with the Pontic cities. Settlers from Sinope, reinforced by others from Athens direct, pressed on and founded Amisos, the modern Samsoun, always an important commercial city. Another colony from Sinope founded Trebizond, near which Xenophon and the Ten Thousand reached the sea again after they had sounded the power of Persia and found it hollow at Cunaxa. Among the cities of the interior, picturesque Amasia in the region of Old Pontus, and its twin town of Strabo in the 1st cent. BC, and to the geographer Strabo, more than to any other man, is due our knowledge of Pontus in its early days. Zilde, 'built upon the mound of Semiramis,' contained the same name as Semiramis, where sacrifices were performed with more pomp than in any other place. Comana, near the modern Tokat, was a city famous for the worship of the great god Ma. Gr culture by degrees took root along the coast; it mixed with, and in turn was modified by, the character of the older native inhabitants.

When the Persians established their supremacy in Asia Minor with the overthrow of Lydia, 546 BC, Pontus was loosely joined to the great empire and was ruled by Pers satraps. Arzibauros and Mithradates and Pharnaces are the recurring names in this dynasty of satraps which acquired independence about 333 and maintained it during the Macedonian period. The man that first made Pontus famous in history was Mithradates VI, strong-minded Mithradates was a typical oriental despot, gifted, unscrupulous, commanding. Born at Sinope 136 BC and king at Amasia at the age of twelve, Mithradates was regarded by the Romans as "the most formidable enemy the Republic ever had to contend with." By conquest or alliance he widely extended his power, his chief ally being his son-in-law Dikran, or Tigranes, of Armenia, and then prepared for the impending struggle with Rome. The republic had acquired Pergamum in 133 BC and assumed control of Western Asia Minor. There were three Rom armies in different parts of the peninsula when war broke out, 88 BC. Mithradates attacked them separately and overthrew them all. He then planned and executed a general massacre of all the Romans in Asia Minor, and 80,000 persons were cut down. Sulla by patient effort restored the fortunes of Rome, and the first war ended in a drawn game; each party had taken the measure of its antagonist, but neither had been able to out the other completely. Western Asia Minor. Middle East.

The second war began in the year 74, with Lucullus as the Roman general. Lucullus took Amisus by siege, chased Mithradates to Cabira, modern Noksa, scattered his army and drove the oriental sultan out of his country. Subsequently, Lucullus cut his way from Kerasoun the first cherris known to the western world. In the third war the hero on the Rom side was the masterful Pompey, appointed in 66 BC. As a result of this war, Mithradates was completely vanquished. His dominions were finally and permanently incorporated in the territories of the Rom republic. The aged king, breathing out wrath and forming impossible plans against his lifelong enemies, died in exile in the Crimea from poison administered by his own hand. Most of Pontus was for administrative purposes united by the Romans with the province of Bithynia, though the eastern part subsisted as a separate kingdom under Polemon and his house, 36 BC to 63 AD, and the southwestern portion was incorporated with Galatia.

It was during the Rom period that Christianity entered this province. There were Jews dwelling in Pontus, devout representatives of whom were in Jerus on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2 9). Paul's associates, Aquila and Priscilla, were here (Acts 18 2). The sojourners of the Dispersion are included in the address of the first Ep. of Peter together with the people of four other provinces in Asia Minor (1 Pet 1 1). Local traditions connect the apostles Andrew and Thaddaeus with evangelistic labors in this region. They are said to have followed the great artery of travel leading from Caesarea Mazaca to Sinope. Pliny, governor of Bithynia and Pontus 111–13 AD, found Christians in the bird of Pontus, Trebizond, preparing for the year of Sossus (see BITHYNIA), and Professor Ramsay argues that Pliny's famous letters, Nos. 96 and 97, written to the emperor Trajan on the subject of the treatment of Christians under his government (see PERSECUTION,), were composed in view of conditions in Amisus (Church in Rom Empire, 224, 225).

The Rom empire in the East was gradually merged into the Byzantine, which is still known to the local inhabitants as the empire of "Room," i.e. Rome. Pontos shared the vicissitudes of this rather unfortunate government until, in 1204, a branch of the Byzantine imperial family established in Pontus a separate small state with its capital at Trebizond. Here the house of the Grand Comneni, sheltered between the sea and the mountain ranges, subsisted for a time, and beyond the fall of Constantinople. In 1401 Trebizond was taken by Mohammed the Conqueror, since which date Pontus, with its conglomerate population of Turks, Armenians, Greeks and fragments of other races, has been a part of the Ottoman empire.

[5] קְוּמְבַּד, kolumbâd, "pool," lit. "a place of diving," from בֹּקָעָב, kolubâv, "kolumbâ, "to dive"); LAKES (q.v.) are very rare in Syria and Pal, but the dry climate, which is one reason for the fewness of lakes, impels the inhabit ants to make artificial pools or reservoirs to collect the water of the rain or of springs for irrigation and also for drinking. The largest of these are made by damming water courses, in which water flows during the winter or at least after showers of rain. These may be enlarged or deepened by excavation. Good examples of this are found at Dibân and Mâdeba in Moab. Smaller pools of rectangular shape and usually much wider than deep, having no connection with water courses, are built in towns to receive rains from the roofs or from the surface of the ground. These may be for common use like several large ones in Jerus, or may belong to particular houses. These are commonly excavated to some depth in the soil or rock, though the walls are likely to rise above the surface. Between these and cylindrical pits or cisterns no sharp line can be drawn.

The water of springs may be collected in large or small pools of masonry, as the pool of Siloam (Jn 9 7). This is commonly done for irrigation when the spring is so small that the water would be lost by absorption or evaporation if it were attempted to convey it continuously to the fields. The pool (Arab. birkat) receives the trickle of water until it is full. The water is then let out in a large stream and conducted where it is needed. (In this way by POOR, poor (אָפָה, ἐβογνός, 77, dal, ἄνι, וָפָה, ἐβόγνωσις, πληθός): 1. In the OT.—The poor have great prominence in the Bible. Indeed, there should be no poor among the Hebrews because Jeh is to bless. This was to be only to be realized on certain conditions of obedience (ver 5), and in ver 11 it is said, ‘The poor will never cease out of the land’; but they were to see to it that none was left in destitution. The very foundation of the Heb religion was God’s pity on a poor and oppressed people.

The words for ‘poor’ are chiefly ἐβογνός, ‘desirous,’ ἐβογνωσις, ‘needy,’ ἐβογνωσις, ‘moving,’ ‘swaying,’ hence, weak, poor, lowly (Ex 23 3, etc.; ἐβογνωσις, poverty, ‘weakness’ (2 K 12, etc.; ἐβογνωσις, perhaps, ‘to shake,’ ‘tremble,’ ‘to be poor, helpless,’ ἐβογνωσις, ‘homeless,’ etc.; ἐβογνωσις also, ‘poor,’ ‘oppressed’ from ἐβογνωσις, ‘to bend’ or ‘bow down’ (Ex 22 25, etc.; ἐβογνωσις, lowly, ἐβογνωσις, ‘weak, meek’ (Ps 10 8,14, AV; ἐβογνωσις, to make poor’ (1 S 2 7); ἐβογνωσις, ‘want’ (21 17); ἐβογνωσις, ‘a needy one’ (Ecc 4 13; 9 15,15,16). (1) Generally.—God (Jeh and Ἐλθός) is represented as having a special care for the poor,” which was illustrated in the deliverance of the nation from Egypt poverty and bondage and was never to be forgotten by them (Dt 24 22); as punishing the oppressors of the poor and rewarding those who were kind to them; God Himself was the Protector and Saviour of the poor (Ex 22 23): ‘If there be a poor man among you, and veny try to at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; and my wrath shall wax hot, etc (Dt 16 9; 24 15; 1 S 2 8; Job 31 16; Ps 9 18; 12 5; Prov 19 17; Isa 26 4; Ecc 5 5, ‘one higher than the high regardeth, etc). (2) Liberty to the poor was especially enjoined (Dt 16 7 1), and they were to be free of self-deception and grudging in this (vs 9 10). (3) Special provisions were made on behalf of the poor: (a) Every third year a tithe was to be given ‘unto the Levite, to the sojourner, to the fatherless and to the widow’ that the poor might have them (Dt 14 28 29; 26 12); (b) the poor were to have the free use of all that grew spontaneously in field or vineyard during the Sabbatical year (Ex 23 10 16; Lev 25 5 6); (c) each year the gleanings of the fields and vineyards should belong to the poor, the corners of fields were to be left for them, and if a sheaf was forgotten it should remain (Lev 19 9 10; 23 22; Dt 24 19); (d) fruit and ripe grain in a field might be eaten by any hungry person, but they should be carried away (Dt 23 24 25); (e) in the Feast of Weeks the poor were to participate (Dt 15 9 12); (f) every seventh year there should be a release of debts (Dt 15 1); in the seventh year of servitude the Heb bond-servant should go free (Ex 21 2 3). (6) At the Jubilee, property which had been sold returned to its owner or his family (Lev 25 8 17); (g) they were to lend readily to the poor, and no interest or increase was to be taken from their brethren (Ex 22 25; Lev 25 35 37; Dt 15 7); in Lev 25 39, no poor Hebrew was to be made a bond-servant, and, if a hired servant, he was not to be ruled with rigor (ver 43); his hire was to be given him daily (Lev 19 13; Dt 15 15); no widow’s raiment should be taken in pledge (Dt 14 17), nor the handmill, nor the upper millstone so essential for daily life (ver 6), a man’s garment should be returned to him before sundown, and no house should be entered to seize or fetch any thing (vs 10 15); a poor man should be sin and their observance righteousness (Dt 24 13 15, etc; see ALMS, ALMSGIVING); (h) justice was to be done to the poor (Ex 23 6; Dt 27 19), ‘Cursed be he that wresteth the justice due to the stranger, fatherless and widow’; (i) offerings were graduated according to means (Lev 5 7 12 8). (4) Definite penalties were not always attached to those laws, and the prophets and psalmists have many complaints of the unjust treatment and oppression of the poor, contrary to the will of God, and frequent exhortations to justice and a due regard for them (Ps 10 2 9; 12 5, 14 6; etc.; Isa 3 14 15, Jer 2 34; Ezek 16 49, ‘the iniquity of the Heb people’). (6) The day of the Messiah, the times of the Messiah, shall bring deliverance and rejoicing to the poor (Ps 72 12 15; Isa 11 4, ‘With righteousness shall be he judge the poor,” etc; 11 30; 29 19; 61 1 RVm). (7) The equality of rich and poor before God and the superiority of the righteous poor to the ungodly rich, etc are maintained (Prov 19 12 22 12, Ecc 4 13). (5) Ways in which men can willfully make themselves poor are mentioned (Prov 6 11 10 4 12 24; 13 4 18; 14 23; 20 13; 21 5 17; 23 21; 28 19). The chief words given above all mean poor, literally, but its rendered also ‘afflicted,’ ‘afflicted’ also denote Israel as a nation in its 3. the afflictions and low estate, e.g. Ps 68 Godly Poor 10; Isa 41 17; 49 13; 51 21; 54 11; in Zeph 5 12, ‘is the ideal Israel of the future’ Dr. Driver remarks, the Poor, HDR) that such passages was taken ‘also its frequent parallel e’bebgon, and, though somewhat less distinctly, dal) came gradually ‘to denote the godly poor, the suffering righteous, the persons who, whether bowed down or needy or reduced, were the godly servants of Jeh.’ The humble poor became in fact distinguished as the line in which faithfulness to Jeh was maintained and spiritual religion developed. The less frequent word 'ēnâsē, often tr "meek," "humble," is regarded (see Driver in loc.) as having from the first a moral and religious significance. It is used of Moses (Nu 12 3) and occurs in Ps 34 6; 16 9; 33 17; etc. I Sam 3 34; 16 19; I saa 29 19; 32 7; 61 1; Am 2 7; Zeph 2 3.

II. In the NT.—In the NT pōchôs, "trembling," "poor," "beggar," is almost exclusively the word used to render "poor." It does not occur very frequently, but we see the same regard for the poor maintained as we have in the OT; besides, the new principle of love and the example of Him who "though he was rich, yet for your sakes became poor" (pōchōthē, 2 Cor 8 9) necessarily carries in them regard even more fully than in the OT. Jesus announced His mission (Lk 4 18) by quoting Isa 61 1, "to preach good tidings [AV "the gospel"] to the poor" (or meek or humble); He gave as a proof of His Messiahship the fact that "the poor have the gospel [or good news of the Kingdom] preached to them" (Mt 11 5; Lk 7 22); according to Lk 6 20, He pronounced a benediction on the pious "poor" because the kingdom of God was theirs; in Mt 6 3 it is "the poor in spirit" (the humble); we have the injunctions to care for "the poor" (pōchōthē, Mt 10 7; Lk 18 22) who are "always with you" (Mt 26 11; Mk 14 7; Jn 12 8), which does not mean that they must always be "the poor," but that, in contrast with Himself who was soon to leave them, the poor should remain and kindness could be shown to them at any time, which was His own practice (Jn 13 29); we are enjoined to call not the rich or well-to-do to our entertainments, but the poor (Lk 14 13; ef ver 21); Zacchaeus cited in his favor the fact that he gave half of his goods to the poor (Lk 19 8); special notice was taken by Jesus of the poor widow's contribution (Lk 21 3). The first church showed its regard for the poor in the distribution of goods "according as any man had need" (Acts 2 45; 4 32; 6 1); when the council at Jerusalem the Gentiles from the yoke of Judaism, they made it a condition, Paul says, "that we should remember the poor; which very thing I was also zealous to do" (Gal 2 10); contributions were accordingly made "for the poor among the saints" (Gal 2 10), and it was in conveying such contributions that Paul got into the circumstances that led to his arrest. God's ability and will to provide for those who give to the poor is quoted from Ps 12 9 (2 Cor 9 9); James specifies that Christians of His day for their partiality for the rich and their disfavour of the poor (Jas 2 5–9), and John asks how, in the man who "hath the world's goods, and beheldeth his brother in need, and shuttest up his compassion from him," the love of God can dwell (1 Jn 3 17, 18).

Pōchôs is tr "beggar" (Lk 16 20 22) and "beggarly" (Gal 4 9); pēnâs, "one who works for his daily bread," "a poor man," is the word in 2 Cor 9 9; the poor widow of Mk 12 42 is described in Lk 21 2 as pēnâschor, "very poor."
pine"; LXX ἱχνος, echinos, "hedgehog"; ἅπαξ, kippās [Isa 34 15], AV "great owl," ERV "arrow-snake," ARV "dart-snake;" LXX echinos; cf Arab. ١٠٣. "Cor always 6, Dt 24; kaphadh, "to draw one's self together" or "to roll one's self up," while ἁρφ is referred to Ἴἀπ, kaphar, and Ἴἀπ, kaphar, "to draw together in order to spring." The resemblance between all these words, including the Arab. ١١٣، is obvious, and it is to be noted that LXX has echinos in all the places cited:

The Gr echinos is the hedgehog. The Arab. kunfud is used in some localities for the hedgehog and in others for the porcupine, which is also called nis. The hedgehog is also called khabbat-ush-shaḳ, or "ball of spines." These two animals are both found in Syria and Pal, and, while both have spines, they are very different animals, though often confused. The hedgehog, Erinaceus europeus, is one of the Insectivora; it is a small insect-eating mammal, and is about 10 in. long, covered with short, soft, brown fur, and with a hump on the back between the ears. It is found in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America; it is a very common animal in the woods of Europe and Asia; it is also found in the Woods of Mexico and Central and South America.

As to the rendering "bittern" for kippās [Isa 14 33; 34 15; Zeph 2 14], while the etymology favors "hedgehog," the context favors a bird, esp in Isa 34 15, though it cannot be said that in any of the passages the context makes "hedgehog" an impossible rendering. In Isa 34 15, for kippās, most modern authorities (cf RV) have some sort of serpent, referring to the Arab. ١٢٣, kafṣ, "to spring." (See notes above on kāḥrah and kāḥrah.) In this passage also the context is not unfavorable to a bird (cf AV "great owl"). See Bittern; Owl; Serpent.

PORPHYRY, pórfrī (in Eng. RV), has "porphyry" [AV "porphyre" for ἰλλίς, ἰλλίς, δόραμα, RV "sealskin." AV "badgers' skin"] [Ec 25 5; 26 14; 35 7; 36 19; 39 34; Nu 4 6; 10.11; 12.14.25; Ezk 16 10]: The word denotes leather used in the furnishings of the tabernacle (for shoes in Ezk 15 10), and was probably the skin of the duongog, Halocereus dougou, Arab. ٢٠٣، tukhas, which is found in the Red Sea. See Badger.

PORT, pôt, PORTER, pôr'ter: "Port" in the sense of "gate" (of a city or building) is obsolete in modern Eng, and even in the AV is found only in Neh 1 13. Porter, as "gate-keeper," however, is still in use in Eng, and is still in use in Eng (AV has never in EV) generally means a burden-carrier. In the OT, except in 2 S 18 26; 2 Kr 7 10.11, the porter (אֹר, shōbār) is a sacred officer of the temple or tabernacle, belonging to a particular family of the Levites, with a share in the sacred dues (Neh 13 5; 12 47). The "porters" are mentioned only in Ch, Ezr and Neh, and Ch has an especial interest in them, relating that their duties were settled as far back as the time of David (1 Ch 26 1–19), and that the office extended further to the first settlement of Pal and even to Moses' day (1 Ch 9 17–26). The office was evidently one of some dignity, and the 'chief porters' (1 Ch 26 24) were personages of some importance. For some inscrutable reason RV renders shōʿēr by "doorkeeper" in 1 Ch 15 26, but not elsewhere. See Doorkeeper.

PORTION, pór'shūn, PART: As far as a distinction between these words is possible in English, it lies in the fact that a "portion" is a "part" about whose destiny something is implied (Ps 142 5, etc). The Heb has no two synonyms similarly related, and in consequence the use of the words in EV is settled either by rather arbitrary considerations (יוֹצֵל, m’nāh, is always "portion" in RV, but is "part" in AV, Ex 32 26; Lev 7 33; 8 29) or by the context, irrespective of the Heb word used. So "part" and "portion" both represent לְשָׁה, dabhar, 1 K 6 38; Neh 12 47; יָשָׁה, peh, Zea 13 8; Dt 21 17; יָשָׁה, hebel, Josh 17 5 (RV); Ezk 47 13; μέρος, méros, Lk 11 36; 13 46. And in the vast majority of cases in the OT both words represent simply some derivative of לְשָׁה, halak, normally the noun לְשָׁה, ḥekāl.

POSIDONIUS, pos'-i-dō'-ni-us (Ποσιδώνιος, Posiđōnios, al. Ποσιδώνιος, Posidōnios and Ποσιδιάν, Possidón). One of the three envoys sent by the Syrian general Nicanor to treat with the Jews under Judas during his invasion of Judea, 161 BC (2 Mace 14 19). In 1 Mace 7 27 ff, they are proposed as sent by Nicanor to Judas, but no envoys are named, and it is there asserted in contradiction to 2 Mace that Judas broke off the negotiation because of the treacherous designs of Nicanor.

POSSESS, po-zaz', POSSESSION, po-zesh'um: "Possess" in modern Eng, means normally only "keep in one's possession." But in Elizabethan Eng it means also "take into possession," and, in fact, the word in the OT always represents Heb וָנָשֶׁה, which with its dative as the matter in which it is possessed of, under the noun possession, in the on the other hand, no such ambiguity exists, and attention need be called only to the following passages. InDt 11 6, AV has, "all the substance that was in their possession," Heb "all that subsisted at their feet," RV "everything living thing that flowed them." AV use "possessing" "loosely in Acts 28 7 for χρυσόν, chōrin, RV "lands," πορτοφαίους, periportelōs, from periporto, "cause to remain over," "gain," is rendered "God's own possession" in Eph 1 14 RV ("possession") and 1 Pet 2 9 (AV "peculiar goods, AVm "purchased"). "God's own" is a gloss but is implied in the context.

POSSESSION, DEMONICAL, de-mō-nil'-a-kal (Mt 4 24; 8 16, etc). See Demon, Demonic, Demonology.
POST, post (πόστ, πόστος, “to run,” ἀπόστος, “runner”): The “runners” formed the royal guard (1 8 22 17; 1 K 14 27; 2 K 11 4 13; see Guard). From them were chosen the couriers who carried royal letters and dispatches throughout the kingdom (2 Ch 30 6 10; Est 3 13 17; Jer 51 31). In the Pers service they were mounted on the swiftest horses (Est 8 10 14; cf Xenophon, Cyrop. vii.6.17; Herodotus viii.98). They had the right to command the service of either men or animals in order to expedite their progress (cf Mt 5 15; Mk 15 21; “compelled”)

Used in Job 9 25 and AV Wisi 5 9 (ἀγγέλα, RV “message”) of the swift passage of time. See also Hosea, 1 1, 4 (7), M. O. Evans

POT, pot: A term used as the tr. of a number of Heb and Gr words whose fundamental meaning seems to describe them as intended for the most part to hold liquid or semi-liquid substances, but the pots of Ex 27 3 are intended to hold ashes. (1) πότα, the most common word for “pot.” It designates with the highest frequency the veloped (Gen 14 14; 51 15) probably a pot or kettle for boiling. So 2 K 4 38 ff; Ex 18 3; Jer 1 13 AV; Ezek 11 3 7 11, “caldron”; 24 3 6 AV; Mic 3 36; Zec 14 21, etc. It is also used as the name of some vessel of the same general shape (Gen 27 3), where the context shows that it was intended to hold ashes: 1 K 7 45; 2 Ch 4 16; 2 K 25 14. In Ps 60 8; 108 9, it is a pot for washing. (2) ἀράμ, πάραρ (Nu 11 8; 1 S 2 14), a vessel for boiling; in Jgs 6 19, a vessel for holding brot. (3) τέρα, ἀτερα, rendered “pot” in Ps 21 6 in AV, “basin” in RV; “pot” both AV and RV in Job 41 20. (4) γίννηθεν, γίνεθεν (Ex 16 33), the jar in which the manna was placed. This jar or pot is mentioned in He 9 4 under the name στάφύλι, στάπηνος. (5) τὸς, ἀπόθος (2 K 4 2), some kind of jar for holding oil. (6) στέρνη, στέστες (Mk 7 4), some kind of household utensil. Mention may also be made of the word rendered “pot” in Lev 6 28 AV, where RV renders more correctly by the general term “vessel”; for AV “pots” (Ps 68 13) RV substitutes “sheepfolds.” The root is uncertain. Those who render “sheepfolds” connect this root with the subsequently some household utensil. Others render “fireplaces” or “ash heaps.” See also “range for pots” in Lev 11 35; “pots,” Jer 36 5 AV, correctly “bowls” RV; “refining pots” in Prov 17 3; 27 21. See also Food.

POTENTATE, po'ten-tate (σωτάρτης, σωτάττσ, “mighty one,” from σωτάρι, σωτάτται, “to be able”: A person who possesses great power and authority. Only in 1 Tim 6 15, “the blessed and only Potentate” (= God). The same Gr word is used of Zeus in Sophocles (Ant. 608), and of God in Apoc (e.g. Sir 46 5; 2 Mac 15 3 23). It is used of men in Lk 1 52 (AV “the mighty,” RV “princes”) and Acts 8 27 (“of great authority”).

POTIPHAR, po-ti-far (ποτιφήρ, pōtīphēr; cf Egypt Potiphera [Gen 39 1 f]): A high Egypt official who became the master of Joseph. It is particularly mentioned that he was an Egyptian, i.e. one of the native Egypt officials at the Hyskos court.

POTIPHERA, po-ti-fer-a (ποτιφηρα, pōtīphēra; Egypt Podipera, “the [one] given of the sun-god”; cf Heb Nathaniel, “the gift of God,” Gen 41 45 50; 46 20): There is no certain evidence from Egypt that this name was in existence until the XXIII Dynasty, about 950 BC. But names of the Hyskos period, and, indeed, any kind of Hyskos inscriptions, are so scarce on account of the destruction of Hyskos monuments by the Egyptians of later times that the absence of such names is really no evidence on the subject. The fact that this name has not been discovered earlier than 950 BC does not give any warrant for the claim that the narrative is of a late date.

POTSHerd, pot'shurd (πουρῆς, heres): A piece of earthenware (Job 2 8; Ps 22 15; Isa 45 9). RV renders the word in Prov 26 23, “an earthen vessel,” and in Job 41 30 substitutes “sharp potsherd” for “sharp stones.” Sir 22 7 refers to the art of “fusing a potsherd [φέρομαι, ἱδρωκεῖν] together.” See HARSith; Ostraca.

LITERATURE

(1) Prehistoric.—The making of pottery ranks among the very oldest of the crafts. On the rocky slopes of Upper Egypt, overlooking the Nile valley, are found the polished red earthenware pots of the pre-development historic Egyptians. These are buried in shallow oval graves along with the cramped-up bodies of the dead and their chipped flint weapons and tools. These jars are the oldest examples of the potter’s art. It is inconceivable that in the country of Babel, Egypt’s great rival in civilization, the ceramic arts were less developed at the same period, but the difference in the nature of the country where the first Mesopotamian settlement probably existed makes it unlikely that relics of the prehistoric dwellers of that country will ever be recovered from under the débris of demolished cities and the underlying deposits of clay and silt. (2) Babylonia.—The oldest examples of Bab ceramics date from the historical period, and consist of baked clay record tablets, bricks, drainage pipes, household shrines, as well as vessels for holding liquids, fruits and other stores. (See Perrot and Chipiez, History of Art in Ch, vol. I, figs. 159, 160, II, figs. 163, 168.) Examples of pottery of this early period are shown in the accompanying figures. By the 9th to the 7th cent. BC the shaping of vessels of clay had become well developed. Fragments of pottery bearing the name of Esarhaddon establish the above dates.

(3) Egypt.—With the close of the neolithic period in Egypt and the beginning of the historical or dynastic period (4500–4000 BC) there was a decline in the pottery art. The workmanship and forms both became bad, and not until the IVth Dynasty was there any improvement. In the meantime the process of glazing had been discovered and the art of making beautiful glazed faience became one of the most noted of the ancient Egypt crafts. The potter’s wheel too was probably an invention of this date.

(4) Palestine.—The making of pottery in the land which later became the home of the children of Israel began long before this people possessed the land and even before the Phoenicians of the coast cities had extended their trade inland and brought the earthenware vessels of the Tyrian or Sidonian potters. As in Egypt and Babylonia, the first examples were hand-made without the aid of the wheel.
It is probable that Jewish potters learned their art from the Phoenicians. They at least copied Phoenian and Mycenaean forms. During their wanderings the children of Israel were not likely to make much use of earthenware vessels, any more than the Arabs do today. Skins, gourds, wooden and metal vessels were less easily broken.

To illustrate this, a party, of which the writer was a member, took on a desert trip the earthenware water jars specially made for travel, preferring them to the skin bottles such as the Arab guides carried, for the bottles took the water. At the end of six days only one out of eight earthenware jars was left. One accident or some other reason befall all the others.

When the Israelites became settled in their new surroundings they were probably not slow in adopting earthenware vessels, because of their advantages, and their pottery gradually developed distinctive though decadent types known as Jewish.

Toward the close of the Hebrew monarchy the pottery of the land again showed the effect of outside influences. The red and black figured ware of the Greeks was introduced, and still later the less artistic Roman types, and following these by several centuries came the crude glazed vessels of the Arab or Saracenic period—forms which still persist.

It is not within the limits of this article to describe in detail the characteristics of the pottery of the various periods. The accompanying illustrations taken from photographs of pottery in the Archaeological Museum of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut, give a general idea of the forms. Any attempt at classification of Palestinian pottery must be considered more or less provisional, due to the uncertainty of origin of many forms. The classification of pottery here used is that adopted by Bliss and Macalister and based upon Dr. Petrie's studies.

(1) Early pre-Israelite, called also “Amorites” (before 1800 B.C.).—Most of the vessels of this period are handmade and often irregular in shape. A coarse clay, turning red or black when burned, characterizes many specimens. Some are brick red. Specimens with a previously burnished surface are also found.

(2) Late pre-Israelite or Phoenician (1000-1800 B.C.).—From this period on, the pottery is all wheel-turned. The clay is of a finer quality and burned to a brown or red. The ware is thin and light. Water jars with pointed instead of flat bases appear. Some are decorated with bands or lines of different colored meshes. Cypriote ware with its incised decorations was a like development of the period.

(3) Jewish (1000-300 B.C.).—Foreign influence is lost. The types which survive degenerate. New forms are introduced. Ordinary coarse clay burning red is used. Cooking pots are most characteristic. Many examples bear Hebrew stamps, the exact meaning of which is uncertain.

(4) Seleucid.—Foreign influence again appears. Grey and other pottery is imported and copied. Ribbed surfaces are introduced. The old type of burnishing disappears.

(5) Roman and Saracenic.—Degenerate forms persisting till the present time.

(6) Present-day pottery.

The clay as found in the ground is not suitable for use. It is dug out and brought to the vicinity of the pottery (the "potter's field," Mt 27:7) and allowed to weather for weeks. The dry material is then ground and dashed into a cement-lined tank or wooden trough and covered with water. When the lumps have softened they are stirred in the water until all have disintegrated and a thin slaty mud or "slip" has formed. In coast cities the potteries are all near the sea, as the seawater is considered better for the "slipping" process. The slip is drawn off into settling tanks. All stones and lumps remain behind. When the clay has settled, the water is drawn off and the plastic material is worked by treading with the feet (Isa 41:25; Wisd 15:7). The clay used on the Syrian coast is usually a mixture of several earths, which the potters have learned by experience gives the right consistency. The prepared clay is finally packed away and allowed to stand another six months before using, during which time the quality, esp. the plasticity, is believed to improve.

Before the invention of the potter's wheel the clay was shaped into vessels by hand. In all of the countries previously mentioned the specimens representing the oldest work are all hand-made. Chopped straw was usually added to the clay of these early specimens. This material is omitted in the wheel-shaped objects. In a Mt. Lebanon village which is noted for its pottery the jars are still made by hand. To an extent the clay stoves are shaped by hand out of clay mixed with straw.
ANCIENT POTTERY

Selotician Period, 300 BC
Note appearance of "combing."

Cypriot Pottery
1, 2 and 3, incurved ware of pre-bronze period before 2000 BC
4 and 5, of Phoenician Period, 1200 BC

Greco-Roman Period
1, red and black figured, before 350 BC
2 and 3, Cyprian of 350 BC
4, 5 and 6, Roman pottery from Beirut
Note characteristic "combing."

Jewish Period
Blackening on 3 due to use over fire

Pre-Isrealite Period
1, hand-made throughout
2, 3 and 4, of early period or Amorite
5, 6 and 7, of late period or Phoenician
6, 8 and 9 are burnished
The shaping of vessels is now done on wheels, the use of which dates back to earliest history. Probably the Egyptians were the first to use such a machine (IVth Dynasty). In their original form they were stone disks arranged to be turned by hand on a vertical axis. The wheel stood only a few inches above the ground, and the potter sat or squatted down on the ground before it as he shaped his object (see Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, II, fig. 307). The wheels used in Pal and Syria today probably differ in no respect from those used in the potter's house visited by Jeremiah (Jer 18:1–5). The wheel or, to be more exact, wheels (cf Jer 18:3) are fitted on a square wooden or iron shaft about 3 ft. long. The lower disk is about 20 in. in diameter, and the upper one 8 in. or 12 in. The lower end of the shaft is pointed and fits into a stone socket or bearing in which it rotates. A second bearing just below the upper disk is so arranged that the shaft inclines slightly away from the potter. The potter leans against a slanting seat, bracing himself with one foot so that he will not slide off, and with the sole of his other foot he kicks the upper face of the lower wheel, thus making the whole machine rotate. The lower wheel is often of stone to give greater momentum. With a marvelous dexterity, which a novice tries in vain to imitate, he gives the pieces of clay any shape he desires.
