Mixture of national, or racial, characteristics was consummated, and thoughtful men, irrespective of race-origin, became persons to each other. A reorganization of standards of ethical judgment was thus rendered inevitable, and Judaism came to interfuse more freely with Gr philosophy as one consequence. While it is true that "reason" preserved its traditional supremacy as the means to solve all problems, the nature of the chief quest underwent transformation. The old association of man with Nature gave way to a dualism or opposition between the world-order and another existence lying behind it as its originator or sustainer. The system of Nature having disappointed expectation, thinkers asked how they could escape it, and assure themselves of definite relations with the Divine Being. They sought the desiderated connection within their own souls, but as a distant ideal. This was the problem that confronted Philo, who attacked it from the Jewish side. Now Judaism, like Gr thought, had also experienced a change of heart. Jeh had been the subject of an idealizing process, and tended, like the Stoic deity, to lose specific relation with the world and man. Accordingly, a new religious question was bringing the philosophy and the faith into closer contact. Could they join forces? Philo's consequent embarrassment rooted, not simply in this fresh problem, but in the difficulties inseparable from the adjustment of his available methods and materials. For, while the Jewish Messiah had passed over into the Gr Logos, the two systems preserved their separation in no small measure, Philo being the most conspicuous mediator. He was familiar with the mystic, transcendent concept of Deity extracted, thanks to long misinterpretation, from Plato's cosmogonic dialogue, Timæus. Here God was elevated above the world. His conception of the presence, or immanence, of the Deity in the world came from the Stoics. The Jewish religion gave him the doctrine of a righteous (pure) Deity, whose moral inwardness made relations with men possible. Moreover, contemporary angelology and demonology enabled him to devise a scheme whereby the pure Deity could be linked with the gross world, notwithstanding its ineradicable evil. Little wonder, then, that he compassed an amalgamation only, and this in consonance with the theosophical drift of the age. Nevertheless, he counteracted the deistic tendencies of rabbinical speculation by reference to Hellenistic pantheism, and, at the same time, counteracted this pantheism by the inward moralism of his national faith. The logical symmetry of the Gr mind was reinforced by Hebraic religious intuition. The consequence was a ferment rather than a system, but a ferment that cast up the clamant problem in unmistakable fashion. The erux was this: Man must surmount his own fragmentary experience and rise to an absolute Being; but, its absoluteness notwithstanding, this Being must be brought into direct contact with the finite. Philo was unable to reconcile the two demands, because he could not rise above them; but the effort after reconciliation controls all his thought. As a result, he concentrated upon three main subjects of inquiry: (1) the conception of God; (2) the manner of God's relation to the world; (3) human nature.

(1) Philo's doctrine of God, like that of the neo-Platonic school, which he heralded, is thoroughly dualistic. No doubt, it is determined largely by certain human analogies.

5. Three Subjects of Inquiry

For example, God's existence is necessary for the control of the world, just in the same way as man's mind must exist to furnish the principle of all human action; and, as matter is not self-determined, a principle, analogous to mind, is demanded, to be its first cause. Further, as the permanent soul remains unchanged throughout the vicissitudes of a human life, so, behind the ceaseless play of phenomena, there must reside a self-existent Being. Nevertheless, the human analogy never extends to God in His actual Being. No human traits can attach to the Deity. Language may indicate such parallelism, nay the Scriptures are full of instances, but we must view them as concessions to mortal weakness. These accommodations eliminated, it becomes evident that man can never know God positively. Any adjective used to describe Him can do no more than point the contrast between His relationless Being and the dependence of finite things. That God is, Philo is fully persuaded; what He is, no man can ever tell. He is one and immutable, simple and immeasurable and eternal, just as man is not. "For he is unchangeable, requiring nothing else at all, so that all things belong to Him, but He, speaking strictly, belongs to nothing." This doctrine of the transcendence of Deity was an essential postulate of Philonic thought. For, seeing that He expels all the imperfections of the world, God is precisely in that condition of Being for which the whole creation then yearned. In a word, the dualism, so far from being a bar to salvation, was rather a condition without which the problem of salvation could neither be stated nor solved. Men stood in necessary relation to this Being, but, as yet, He stood in no relation whatever to them. Yet, men must return to God, but He abides so remote, in the realm of pure contemplation and completion, that He cannot approach them. Philo's familiarity with logical Gr thought debarred him from surmounting the difficulty after the manner of Jewish religion. An otiose reference to "God's choice," as distinct from His nature, could not suffice a mind trained in Hellenic methods. The question therefore was, How could mediation be effected?

(2) God's relation to the world.—At this point Philo's thought assumes a phase of great interest to readers of the NT. God, being above created things, is incomprehensible and immaterial. Accordingly, He cannot be connected with the world directly. Therefore He created it and sustains it by intermediate powers. These agencies were suggested to Philo by the Platonic Ideas. But he personalized them more or less and, as a characteristic addition, included them in the Logos. He substituted the term "Logos" for the Platonic term "Idea" on the basis of the Scripture phrase, "Word of God." The conception was influenced further by his Hellenistic psychological notion, that a word is a "shadow" of a deed. Accordingly, the Logos is the "shadow of God"—God being the "deed" whereby the "shadow" is cast. As a direct issue, the Logos presents two aspects. On the one side it is internal and indwelling; on the other, it is external and mediating. The scope of this distinction is indicated very well by the epithets which Philo applies to each aspect respectively. The internal Logos is the "Firstborn," the "Second God," the "Mediator," the "Ransom," the "Image of God," "Member of the Trinity," "High Priest." The external Logos "abides in man," is the "Prophet," "Shepherd," "Ambassador," "Artist," "Elder," "Interpreter," "Shadow of God." The former represents Philo's conception of the unity of the Logos with God, the latter his provision for the manifestation of the Logos in created things. He thus tries to preserve the transcendence of God equally with His immanence. No doubt, in previous times, the mysteriousness of the Divine nature had impressed itself upon men with at least as much force as now. But with one of two consequences. Either the particular finites and the Deity were mixed in inextricable confusion, as by oriental pantheism, or God was banished from the world, as by the extreme developments within Gr dualism. Philo attempted to combine the two tendencies, and was able consequently to face the obvious contradiction between the idea of an absolute Being and the cloudy conception of a multiplicity of phenomena in which this Being ought to be present somehow, despite transcendence. He demands a God who, in His exaltation, shall be a worthy Deity; this is the Jew in him. But he also demands a definite relation between this God and His creation; this is the Greek and, in part, the Oriental, in him. Thanks to the former, he could not be satisfied with mere naturalism; thanks to the latter, no fable or picture could suffice. A real mediator was required, who would link the world and its heart's desire. But Philo could not surmount one difficulty peculiar to contemporary thought. He was unable to connect God directly with creation and preserve His purity unscathed. Hence the obscurity which surrounds his conception of the Logos, likewise his vacillation with respect to its personality. So we find the different intellectual forces which he inherited playing upon him—now one, now another. Sometimes the Platonic theory of Ideas dominates him; sometimes he leans to Stoicism, with its immanent world-reason; and here he even seems to foreshadow the doctrine of the Trinity; again, the ramifications of rabbinical lore cause him to bestow upon the Logos a priestly function or an atoning office. No single aspect achieves supremacy, although on the whole mystical Platonism may be said to predominate. Thus, "The world of Ideas has its place in the Divine Logos, just as the plan of a city is in the soul of the master-builder." Accordingly, God's thought may take its place in the world by being impressed upon things; yet, on account of its subjective nature, it must be apprehended subjectively, that is, by one who is capable of entering this sphere. The Logos thus seems to exist entirely in the same realm as Deity; thus it can mediate between Him and creation only if an element proper to Deity be discernible in mundane things. In other words, the Logos mediates between God and the world, but partakes of the Divine nature only. This, in any case, is the inner logic of Philo's view. It accounts for creation, but has no power to persuade man to overpass the limitations placed upon him by his bodily prison. Thus the question of the personality of the Logos is never cleared. In so far as Philo needs Logos to connect God with the world, he inclines to a doctrine of personality. In so far as he makes it the principle of all activities within the world, he inclines away from personality. In short, we have a "world-soul." And, as a consequence, there is an inherent tendency to reduce all finite being to illusion. Indeed, one might term the Logos a reply in some sort to Aristotle's question—which of the Platonic Ideas could connect the other Ideas with sensible things? Salvation is conceived as wrought out, not by a person, but by an abstract essence flowing from Deity, an essence that found due expression rather in the cosmic order than in a person. While, therefore, Philo thinks in a cultural perspective akin to that characteristic of the author of the Fourth Gospel, two vast differences sway his doctrine. On the one hand, it is speculative, not ethically personal. On the other hand, it fails completely to determine the nature of his mediator in itself, vacillating in a manner which shows how vague and fluid the conception really was.

(3) Doctrine of man.—This appears further in the doctrine of man. Following current interpretations of Plato, Philo makes man partake in the rational nature of God, but denies that he embodies the highest species of reason. That is, the ideal man and the man known to us in common experience are distinguished. The former is rational as God is. The latter is partly rational, partly irrational. The body vitiates the original angelic purity of the soul and, similarly, reason is alloyed. And yet, although the higher nature becomes more and more debased as the years lapse, a seed of Divinity is present, ready to burst forth. Thus man must crush the flesh and its desires. At this point we note the effect of the Stoic ideal of imperturbability. When he has attained this apathy, man can enjoy the life of contemplation. This, in its turn, culminates in ecstasy, when the human soul attains sudden and momentary union with the Divine. For a "fair moment" man escapes the thralldom of sense. Yet the doctrine remains intellectual even here. He "who escapes from his own mind flies to the mind of the universe, confessing that all the things of the human mind are vain and unreal, and attributing everything to God." Philo's anthropology therefore ends in contempt for this life, which is in no wise worth while, and in a counsel of perfection available only for a select élite. Accordingly, the conclusion of the whole matter is, that he never saw how the Divine and the human can be united, although he stated the factors of the problem with great clearness, and felt profoundly the urgency of a solution. His gospel was for the children of culture. He saw the eternal in the temporal, and hoped that good might lurk in evil. But he never understood that "love for a Divine Person" might be so diffused throughout a human soul as to render evil and unreality the means to the attainment of good and to the revelation of truth. The salvation he contemplated was from self, not in self. Hence, as he asserts himself, harmony with God "is an incomprehensible mystery to the multitude, and is to be imparted to the instructed only." Nor is this wonderful. For a God who is the reasonable "form" of the world; a "matter" which begins as an indistinguishable mass and ends as a "second principle"; and objects of sense rendered apparent by the operation of many curious intermediate forces, ranging from "angel-words" to the human soul, constitute a combination beyond the reach of any save the "initiate." More practicable is Philo's conception of the moral life—as a warfare of the soul against passion, pleasure and sensuality. Yet, even this contest is hopeless unless it be waged with the equipment of the "philosopher athlete." Escape from the "prison-house" of flesh would seem to be consequent only upon profound knowledge.

The probability is that Philo's works were written previous to his Rom embassy. They show how he tried to apply Gr philosophical conceptions to Jewish beliefs, history, and usages exclusively. The voluminous remains which have come down to us appear to belong to three commentaries on the Pent and the Mosaic Law.

In all likelihood, they are portions of Philo's popular presentation, written for the instruction and information of educated Hellenistic circles rather than for the trained "initiate." The treatises most important for Philo's religio-philosophical views are as follows: On the Creation of the World; On the Allegories of the Sacred Laws; On the Unchangeableness of God; On the Confusion of Languages; On the Migration of Abraham; On the Meeting for the Sake of Receiving Instruction; On the Life of the Wise Man Made Perfect by Instruction; The Unwritten Law; Abraham; On Special Laws; On Rewards and Punishments; That Every Man Who Is Virtuous Is Also Free; Concerning the World; and the Fragments. Some 8 works attributed to Philo are in dispute. Most conspicuous of these is Concerning the Contemplative Life, with its ascetic view of morality, and its description of the ideal community of the Therapeutæ.

PHILOLOGUS, φιλόλογος (Philólogos, Philólogos, "fond of learning," "learned"): The name of a Rom Christian to whom St. Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 15). His name is coupled with that of Julia, who was probably his wife or sister. Philologus and those united with him in this salutation formed by themselves one of the "house churches" or groups in the Christian community. The name is found in inscriptions connected with the imperial household, with reference to one of which Bishop Lightfoot has the following note: "It has been supposed that the name Philologus was given by the master to the freedman mentioned in this inscription, as being appropriate to his office [Friedländer I, 89, 160]. . . . If so, some light is thrown on the probable occupation of the Philologus of St. Paul" (Phil, 177, n. 1).

LITERATURE

Only found in Col 2 8; lit. the love and pursuit of wisdom and knowledge. In its technical sense, the term is now used for the conscious endeavor of thought, by speculative process, to interpret the whole of human experience, as a consistent and systematic unity, which would be the ultimate truth of all that may be known. The term is also used, in a wider sense, of all interpretations of experience, or parts of experience, however obtained, whether by revelation, intuition or unconscious speculation. No hard-and-fast line can be drawn between the two kinds of philosophy. Some of the ruling conceptions of speculation, such as God, spirit, order, causation, true and false, good and evil, were not discovered by reason, but given in experience.

(1) Intuitive philosophy is universal. The human mind has always and everywhere furnished itself with some kind of explanation of the universe. From the lowest animism and fetichism up to the higher religions, ideas are found which served men as explanations of those features of experience which attracted their attention. They were often regarded as given by vision, intuition or some other method of revelation. In the higher religions, the mind reflected upon these ideas, and elaborated them into systems of thought that bear some resemblance to the speculative theories of western thought. In China, both Confucianism and Taoism developed theories of human life and destiny that bear some resemblance to Stoicism. The religions of Assyria and Babylonia enshrined in their legends theories of the world and of man and his institutions. In India, men's belief in the Nature-gods gradually developed into pantheistic Brahmanism, which reduced the multiplicity of experience into one ultimate being, Brahma. But the desire for moral salvation and the sense of pain and evil produced a reaction, and led to the pessimistic and nihilistic philosophy of Buddhism. In Persia, the moral consciousness awoke earlier, and the attempt to systematize the multiplicity of polytheism issued in the dualistic philosophy of later Zoroastrianism. The whole realm of being was divided into two kingdoms, created and ruled by two lords: Ahura Mazda, the creator of light and life, law, order and goodness, and Anrō Mainyuš, the author of darkness, evil and death. Each was surrounded by a court of spiritual beings kindred to himself, his messengers and agents in the world (see PERSIAN RELIGION [ANCIENT]). Of all these religious philosophies, only those of Assyria and Babylonia, and of Persia, are likely to have come into any contact with Bib. thought. The former have some affinity with the accounts of creation and the flood in Gen; and the influence of the latter may be traced in the dualism and angelology and demonology of later Judaism, and again in the gnostic systems that grew up in the Christian church, and through both channels it was perpetuated, as a dualistic influence, in the lower strata of Christian thought down through the Middle Ages.

(2) Speculative philosophy belongs mainly to western thought. It arose in Greece about the beginning of the 6th cent. BC. It began with the problem of the general nature of being, or ontology. But it was soon forced to consider the conditions of knowing anything at all, or to epistemology. These two studies constitute metaphysics, a term often used as synonymous with philosophy in the stricter sense. Speculation about ideal truth again led to inquiries as to the ultimate nature of the kindred ideas of the good (ethics) and the beautiful (aesthetics). And as these ideas were related to society as well as to the individual, the Greeks developed theories of the ideal organization of society on the basis of the true, the good and the beautiful, or politics and pedagogy. The only branch of speculation to which the Greeks made no appreciable contribution was the philosophy of religion, which is a modern development.

The progress of philosophy in history divides itself naturally into three main periods: (a) ancient, from the 6th cent. BC to the 3d cent. AD, when it is almost exclusively Gr, with some practical adaptations of Gr thought by Rom writers; (b) medieval, from the 3d to the 16th cent., where some of the ruling conceptions of Gr thought were utilized for the systematization of Christian dogma, but speculation was mainly confined within the limits of ecclesiastical orthodoxy; there were, however, some independent Arabian and Jewish speculations; (c) modern, from the 16th cent. to the present time, in which thought becomes free again to speculate upon all the problems presented by experience, though it only realized its liberty fully in the hands of Locke, Hume and Kant.

Gr philosophy was the only speculative system that could have had any influence upon Bih. thought. Its main development was contemporaneous with the later OT writers, but the two peoples were in every way so remote from one another that no interchange of ideas was probable.

2. Greek Philosophy

During the last two centuries BC, Gr thought spread so widely that it came to dominate the cultured thought of the world into which Christianity entered, and it would have been strange if no trace of its influence were found in the NT. In the first stage of its development, from Thales to Socrates, it was concerned almost entirely with attempts to explain the nature of reality by reducing the phenomenal world into some one of its elements. Socrates changed its center of gravity, and definitely raised the problems of morality and knowledge to the position of first importance. His principles were developed by Plato into a complex and many-sided system which, more than any other, has influenced all subsequent thought. He united ultimate reality and the highest good into one supreme principle or idea which he called the Good, and also God. It was the essence, archetype and origin of all wisdom, goodness and beauty. It communicated itself as intermediary archetypal ideas to produce all individual things. So that the formative principles of all existence were moral and spiritual. But it had to make all things out of preëxisting matter, which is essentially evil, and which therefore was refractory and hostile to the Good. That is why it did not make a perfect world. Plato's system was therefore rent by an irreconcilable dualism of mind and body, spirit and matter, good and evil. And his mediating ideas could not bridge the gulf, because they belonged only to the side of the ideal. Aristotle was Plato's disciple, and he started from Plato's idealistic presuppositions, but endeavored to transcend his dualism. He thus applied himself to a closer and more accurate study of actual experience, and added much to the knowledge of the physical world. He organized and classified the methods and contents of knowledge and created the science of logic, which in the Christian Middle Ages became the chief instrument of the great systematic theologians of the church. He tried to bring Plato's ideas "down from heaven," and to represent them as the creative and formative principles within the world, which he conceived as a system of development, rising by spiritual gradations from the lower to the higher forms, and culminating in God, who is the uncaused cause of all things. But underneath all the forms still remained matter as an antithetical element, and Aristotle rather concealed than solved the dualism of Plato.

Meanwhile, the moral principles of Socrates were being developed with a more directly ethical interest, by the Cyrenaics and Epicureans, into a system of Hedonism, and, by the Cynics and Stoics, into a doctrine of intuitive right and duty, resting inconsistently upon a pantheistic and materialistic view of the universe. But the spiritual and ethical elements in Stoicism became only second to Platonism in the preparation of the Gr world for Christianity. During the last two and a half centuries BC, Gr philosophy showed signs of rapid decline. On the one hand, Pyrrho and his school propounded a thoroughgoing skepticism which denied the possibility of all knowledge whatsoever. On the other hand, the older schools, no longer served by creative minds, tended to merge their ideas into a common eclecticism which its teachers reduced into an empty and formal dogmatism. The most fruitful and fateful product of Gr thought in this period was its amalgamation with Jewish and oriental ideas in the great cosmopolitan centers of the Gr world. There are evidences that this process was going on in the cities of Asia, Syria and Egypt, but the only extensive account of it remaining is found in the works of Philo, the Jewish philosopher of Alexandria (see PHILO JUDÆUS). He tried to graft Plato's idealism upon Heb monotheism.

He starts with Plato's two principles, pure being or God, and preëxisting matter. In his endeavor to bridge the gulf between them, he interposed between God and the world the powers of God, goodness and justice; and to gather these into a final unity, he created his conception of the Logos of God. In the formation of this conception, he merged together the Platonic idea of the good, the Stoic world-reason, and a number of Jewish ideas, the glory, the word, the name, of God, the heavenly man and the great high priest, and personified the whole as the one mediator between God and the world. Christian thought laid hold of this idea, and employed it as its master-category for the interpretation of the person of Christ (see LOGOS).

There is no speculative philosophy in the OT nor any certain trace of its influence. Its writers and actors never set themselves to pursue knowledge in the abstract and for its own sake. They always wrought for in Judaism moral purposes. But moral activity proceeds on the intellectual presuppositions and interpretations of the experiences within which it acts. Hence we find in the OT accounts of the origin and course of nature, a philosophy of history and its institutions, and interpretations of men's moral and religious experiences. They all center in God, issue from His sovereign will, and express the realization of His purpose of righteousness in the world (see GOD).

(1) All nature originated in God's creative act (Gen 2) or word (Gen 1). In later literature the whole course and order of Nature, its beauty and bounty, as well as its wonders and terrors, are represented as the acts of God's will (Isa 40-45; Pss 8 19, 29, 50, 65, 68, 104, etc). But His action in Nature is always subordinated to His moral ends.

(2) Similarly, the course and events of the history of Israel and her neighbors are the acts of Jeh's will (Am 1; 2; Isa 41 2; 43 3; 45 9.10.14). In the historical books of S and K, and still more of Ch, all the events of history are represented as the acts of God's moral government. In a more general way, the whole of history is set forth as a series of covenants that God, of His free grace, made with man (see COVENANT). The Noachic covenant fixed the order of Nature. The covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob accounted for the origin and choice of Israel. The covenants with Moses and Aaron established the Law and the priesthood, and that with David, the kingship. And the hope of the future lies in the new covenant (Jer 31 31-35). God's covenants were all acts of His sovereign and gracious will.

(3) In post-exilic times, new experiences, and perhaps new intellectual influences, drove the Jews to probe deeper into the problem of existence. They adhered to the cardinal principle of Heb thought, that God's sovereign will, working out His purpose of righteousness, was the first cause of all things (see RIGHTEOUSNESS). But they found it difficult to coördinate this belief with their other ideas, in two ways. Ethical monotheism tended to become an abstract deism which removed God altogether out of the world. And the catastrophes that befell the nation, in the exile and after, raised the problem of suffering and evil over against God's goodness and righteousness. Therefore in the Wisdom lit. we find some conscious speculation on these subjects (see WISDOM).

(a) The Book of Job discusses the problem of evil, and repudiates the idea that life and history are the process of God's rewards and punishments. (b) Eccl comes to the conclusion that all phenomenal experience is vanity. Yet its ultimate philosophy is not pessimistic, for it finds an abiding reality and hope in the fear of God and in the moral life (12 13.14). The same type of thought appears in Ecclesi. Both books have been attributed to the circle of the Sadducees. Some would find in them traces of the influence of Epicureanism.

(c) In Prov a more optimistic side prevails. Wisdom is gathered up into a conception or personification which is at once God's friend, His agent in creation, His vicegerent in the world, and man's instructress and guide (ch 8). (d) The teaching of the Pharisees esp. reveals the tendency to dualism or deism in later Judaism; they interposed between God and the world various agents of mediation, the law, the word, the name, the glory of God and a host of angels, good and bad. They also fostered a new hope of the future, under the double form of the Messianic kingdom, and of resurrection and immortality. How far these tendencies were due to the influence of Pers dualism cannot here be considered. (e) Essenism represents another effort to get from the world to God by a crude kind of mysticism and asceticism, combined with an extensive angelology.

(4) Among the Hellenistic Jews in Alexandria, Aristobolus, the authors of Wisd and 4 Macc, and preëminently Philo, all deal with the two chief problems of Judaism, dualism and evil. But they approach them under the direct influence of Gr thought. The Heb idea of wisdom was merged into the Gr conception of the Logos, and so it becomes the mediator of God's thought and activity in the world.

Philosophy appears in the NT as intuitive, speculative and eclectic. (1) Jesus Christ came to fulfil the law and the prophets, and, out of

4. In the His filial consciousness of God, He NT pronounced answers to the practical demands of His time. His doctrine of God the Father was a philosophy of Nature and life which transcended all dualism. In the kingdom of heaven, the good would ultimately prevail over the evil. The law of love expressed the ideal of conduct for man as individual, and in his relation to society and to God, the supreme and ultimate reality. This teaching was given in the form of revelation, without any trace of speculation.

(2) The apostolic writings built upon the teaching and person of Jesus Christ. Their ruling ideas are the doctrines which He taught and embodied. In Paul and John, they are realized as mystical experiences which are expressed in doctrines of universal love. But we may also discover in the apostolic writings at least three strands of speculative philosophy. (a) Paul employed arguments from natural theology, similar to those of the Stoics (Acts 14 15-17; 17 22-31; Rom 1 19 ff), which involved the principles of the cosmological and teleological arguments. (b) John employs the Philonic term "Logos" to interpret the person of Christ in His universal relation to God, man and the world; and the main elements of Philo's scheme are clearly present in his doctrine, though here it is no abstract conception standing between God and man, but a living person uniting both (Jn 1 1-18). Although the term "Logos" is not mentioned, in this sense, in Paul or He, the Philonic conception has been employed by both writers (Rom 5 8; 8 29; 1 Cor 15 24.25; 2 Cor 5 18.19; Phil 2 6; Col 1 15-17; 2 9.10; He 1 1-3.5.6). Paul also expresses his conception of Christ as the manifestation of God under the category of wisdom (1 Cor 1 20; 2 7; Eph 1 8; Col 2 3). (c) Both in Paul and He appear original speculations designed to interpret individual experience and human history as they culminate in Christ. Paul's interpretation consists of a series of parallel antitheses, flesh and spirit, sin and righteousness, law and grace, works and faith, Adam and Christ. But the author of He adopts the Platonic view that the world of history and phenomena is but the shadow or suggestion of the spiritual and eternal reality which lies behind it, and which partially expresses itself through it.

(3) In the one place in which the term philosophy appears in the NT (Col 2 8), it seems to mean "subtle dialectics and profitless speculation . . . combined with a mystic cosmogony and angelology"

(Lightfoot, ad loc.), the first beginnings of Gnosticism in the Christian church. Paul warns his readers against it, as he also does the Corinthians against the "wisdom" of the Greeks (1 Cor 1 19 ff; 2 5.6). A similar tendency may be in view in the warning to Timothy against false doctrines (1 Tim 1 4; 4 3; 2 Tim 1 14.16 ff). But with the true spirit of philosophy, as the pursuit of truth, and the endeavor to express more fully and clearly the nature of reality, the spirit and work of the NT writers were in complete accord.

PHINEES, fin'è-es (Φινεές, Phineés, B [Swete], Φινεές, Phineés [1 Esd 8 2]):

(1) Phinehas, son of Eleazar, son of Aaron (1 Esd 5 5; 8 2.29; 2 Esd 1 2; 1 Macc 2 26; Sir 45 23).

(2) The father of Achias and son of Heli (Eli), a descendant of (1), and one of Ezra's progenitors (2 Esd 1 2); but this link is not found in Ezra's genealogy (1 Esd 8 1 f), nor in Ezr 7 1 ff; 1 Ch 6, and its insertion in 2 Esd 1 2 is a mistake, since Ezra's descent was from Eleazar, while this Phinees (Phinehas) was a descendant of Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron.

(3) A Levite, the father of Eleazar (1 Esd 8 63) = "Phinehas" of Ezr 8 33. But it is just possible that the well-known Eleazar (1) is referred to here, and so not another and different Phinees.

(4) AV=RV "Phinoe" (1 Esd 5 31).

PHINEHAS, fin'è-as, -az, fin'è-has, -haz (פִּינְחָס, pîn'hās, "mouth of brass"):

(1) Son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron (Ex 6 25; cf 1 Ch 6 4; Ezr 7 5, where he is seen to be an ancestor of Ezra). He took a leading part in cleansing Israel from whoredom at Shittim. He there punished the brazen licentiousness of Zimri, prince of Simeon, by slaying both him and the Midianite woman he had brought into camp (Nu 25 6-18). This incident is referred to in Ps 106 30.31 (cf 1 Macc 2 26.54; Sir 45 23.24). As priest he accompanied the expedition sent by Moses against Midian (Nu 31 6). He was chief of the Korahite Levites (1 Ch 9 20), and succeeded his father as high priest. While he was in that office the civil war with Benjamin occurred, and it was he who delivered the oracle's decision to fight Benjamin (Jgs 20 28 ff). His faithful services secured to his house the succession of the priesthood (Nu 25 11-13). He was sent as ambassador to inquire into the reported idolatry of Reuben, Gad and part of Manasseh (Josh 22 13 ff.30-32). According to LXX he was buried with his father in Ephraim on the hill Gibeah Phinehas (see Josh 24 33). His character was marked with strong moral indignation and fine integrity.

(2) The younger son of Eli (1 S 1 3; 2 Esd 1 2, "Phinees"). See HOPNI AND PHINEHAS.

(3) Father of a priest named Eleazar (Ezr 8 33; cf ver 2; 1 Esd 8 63, "Phinees"). HENRY WALLACE

PHINOE, fin'è-è (Φινός, Phinós; AV Phinees): Name of one of the families of temple-servants who went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 31) = "Paseah" of Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 51.

PHLEGON, flé'gon, fleg'on (Φλέγων, Phlégōn): The name of a Rom Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 14). Of him nothing is known.

PHOEBE, fē'bē (Φοίβη, Phoibē; AV Phebe): Described by St. Paul as (1) "our sister," (2) "who is a servant of the church that is at Cenchreae," (3) "a helper of many, and of mine own self" (Rom 16 1.2). (1) "Our [Christian] sister": Paul calls the believing husband and wife "the brother or the sister" (1 Cor 7 15), and also asks, "Have we no right to lead about a wife that is a sister?" (1 Cor 9 5 m). The church was a family. (2) The Gr word tr^d "servant" is diákonos. "Servant" is vague, and "deaconess" is too technical. In the later church there was an order of deaconesses for special work among women, owing to the peculiar circumstances of oriental life, but we have no reason to believe there was such an order at this early period. If Phoebe had voluntarily devoted herself "to minister unto the saints" by means of charity and hospitality, she would be called diakonos. (3) The Gr word prostátis tr^d "helper" is better "patroness." The masc. is "the title of a citizen in Athens who took charge of the interests of clients and persons without civic rights" (Denney). Many of the early Christian communities had the appearance of clients under a patron, and probably the community of Cenchreae met in the house of Phoebe. She also devoted her influence and means to the assistance of "brethren" landing at that port. Paul was among those whom she benefited. Gifford thinks some special occasion is meant, and that Paul refers to this in Acts 18 18. The vow "seems to point to a deliverance from danger or sickness" in which Phoebe may have attended on him.

It is generally assumed that this letter was taken to Rome by Phoebe, these verses introducing her to the Christian community. In commending her, Paul asks that the Rom Christians "receive her in the Lord," i.e. give her a Christian welcome, and that they "assist her in whatsoever matter she may have need" of them (Rom 16 1.2).

The term "Phoenicia" is Gr (Φοινίκη, Phoinikē, "land of dates, or palm trees," from phoinix, "the date-palm"). It occurs in the Bible

1. The Land only in Acts (11 19; 15 3; 21 2), the land being generally designated as the "coast" or "borders of Tyre and Sidon" (Mt 15 21; Mk 7 24.31; Lk 6 17). In the OT we find it included in the land belonging to the Canaanites or to Sidon (Gen 10 19; 49 13; Josh 11 8; 1 K 17 9). The limits of P. were indefinite also. It is sometimes used by classic writers as including the coast line from Mt. Cassius on the N. to Gaza or beyond on the S., a distance of some 380 miles, or about 400 miles if we include the sweep of indentations and bays and the outstretching of the promontories. But in the stricter sense, it did not extend beyond Gabala (modern Jebleh) on the N., and Mt. Carmel on the S., or some 150 miles. The name was probably first applied to the region opposite Cyprus, from Gabala to Aradus and Marathus, where the date-palm was observed, and then, as it was found in still greater abundance farther S., it was applied to that region also. The palm tree is common on the coins of both Aradus and Tyre, and it still grows on the coast, though not in great abundance. The width of the land also was indefinite, not extending inland beyond the crest of the two ranges of mountains, the Bargylus (Nusairi Mountains) and the Lebanon, which run parallel to the coast and leave but little space between them and the sea for the greater portion of their length. It is doubtful whether the Phoenicians occupied the mountain tracts, but they must have dominated them on the western slopes, since they derived from them timber for their ships and temples. The width of the country probably did not exceed 25 or 30 miles at the most, and in many places it was much less, a very small territory, in fact, but one that played a distinguished rôle in ancient times.

There are few harbors on the whole coast, none in the modern sense, since what few bays and inlets there are afford but slight shelter to modern ships, but those of the ancients found sufficient protection in a number of places, esp. by means of artificial harbors, and the facility with which they could be drawn out upon the sandy beach in winter when navigation was suspended. The promontories are few and do not project far into the sea, such as Theu-prosopon S. of Tripolis, Ras Beirût and the broad projection S. of Tyre including Ras el-'Abyadh and Ras en-Nakûra and Ras el-Musheirifeh (see LADDER OF TYRE). The promontory of Carmel is rather more marked than the others, and forms quite an extensive bay, which extends to Acre. The promontory rises to a height of 500 ft. or more near the sea and to more than double that elevation in its course to the S.E.

Mt. Lebanon, which forms the background of P. for about 100 miles, is a most striking feature of the landscape. It rises to a height of 10,200 ft. in the highest point, E. of Tripolis, and to 8,500 in Jebel Sunnin, E. of Beirût, and the average elevation is from 5,000 to 6,000 ft. It is rent by deep gorges where the numerous streams have cut their way to the sea, furnishing most varied and picturesque scenery. It was originally heavily wooded with cedar, oak, and pine trees, which are still found in considerable numbers, but by far the larger part of the mountain has been denuded of forests, and the slopes have been extensively terraced for the cultivation of vines and fruit trees and the mulberry for silk culture. The plains along the coast are not extensive, but generally very fertile and bear abundant crops of wheat, barley and other cereals, where not given to the culture of the mulberry, orange, lemon, fig, apricot and other small fruits. In its greatest extent P. included the broad plain of Sharon and that of Acre, between Carmel and that city, and a portion of the region watered by the Kishon, but the plains of P., strictly speaking, are much more restricted. They are: the plain of Tyre, long but narrow, extending from Ras el-'Abyadh to Sarepta; the plain of Sidon extending from Sarepta to the Bostrenus (Nahr el-'Auly); the plain of Beirût (Berytus) between the extensive sand dunes along the shore and the rocky cape on the W. and the foot of Lebanon, 10 or 12 miles long but only one or two wide, containing one of the largest olive groves in Syria; the very small plain of Tripolis, including that city and its port; and, the most extensive of all, the plain of Marathus, extending from Arka to Aradus or even beyond, including the river Eleutherus (Nahr el-Kebîr). These plains furnished only a portion of the food needed by the inhabitants who were more or less dependent on their neighbors for it (1 K 5 11; Acts 12 20).

The rivers of P. are comparatively short and small; the Litany rises in the Buka', between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and finds its way in a deep and narrow gorge between Lebanon and Mt. Hermon to the S., and finally turns westward and reaches the sea a few miles N. of Tyre, where it is called the Kasimiyeh. About 12 miles N. of Beirût is the Dog River (Lycus), a very short stream but noted for the famous pass at its mouth, where Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia engraved their monuments; and a few miles S. of Jebail (Gebal) is the Adonis (Nahr Ibrahim), which comes down from 'Afkā (Apheca = Aphek, Josh 13 4), noted for the rites of Venus and Adonis (see TAMMUZ); and the Eleutherus, already mentioned, which runs through the valley between Bargylus and Lebanon and provides the pass between these two mountains into the interior. The other rivers are very short, but furnish a perennial water-supply to the coast dwellers.

The products of the land, as well as the climate, are very varied on account of the difference in elevation of the tracts suitable to culture, ranging in temperature from the semi-tropical to Alpine. How far the ancients cultivated the mountain sides we do not know, but they certainly profited largely by the forests of cedar and pine, esp. the former, which was the most valuable for shipbuilding and architectural purposes, and was highly prized, not only by the Phoenicians, but by Egyptians, Assyrians and Babylonians, who transported it to their own countries for buildings. The mineral products are few, and the Phoenicians depended on their colonies and other lands for what they needed of these.

The narrowness of the land and the difficulty of expansion on account of the lofty mountain ranges and the hostility of the tribes of the interior led the Phoenicians to turn seaward for an outlet to their increasing population. We have only one instance of their attempt to colonize the hinterland, and that ended in disaster (Jgs 18). Hiram, king of Tyre, was not pleased with Solomon's gift of 20 cities in Galilee, probably not desiring to assume responsibility for their defence. The people early became mariners, and the dominion of the sea was more inviting to them, and they found room for expansion in the islands and on the coast of the Mediterranean, where they established colonies far and wide. Their first over-sea possessions were in Cyprus, the coasts of which they occupied in the 2d millennium BC, probably about 1500. On the southern coast they planted various colonies, such as Citium (Larnaca), Amathus, Curium and Paphos, and on the eastern, Salamis, Ammachosta and Soli, and, in the interior, Idalium and Golgi, besides other less important settlements. The evidences of the Phoenician occupation of Cyprus are numerous. The southern portion of Asia Minor also attracted them at an early date, esp. the rich plains of Cilicia, and Tarsus became the most important of their colonies there. Its coins bear Phoenician types and legends, among which Baal is conspicuous. Other points along the coast were occupied, and the island of Rhodes as well as certain ports on the south coast of Crete, and most of the islands of the Aegean. Their presence in Attica is vouched for by inscriptions, and legend connects Thebes with them in the person of Cadmus, the reputed son of Agenor, king of P. But it is doubtful whether they really colonized the mainland of Greece. They were more attracted by the lands farther to the W.

The greatest of their colonies was in Africa. They occupied Utica first, probably in the 12th cent. BC, and others in the same region until in the 9th cent. Great Carthage was founded, which was destined to become the richest and most powerful of all and the dreaded rival of Rome. All are familiar with the story of Elisa, or Dido, the reputed Tyrian queen who led her followers to the place and founded the city. The story is perhaps legendary, but that Carthage was a colony of Tyre there is no reason to doubt. Other colonists occupied portions of Sicily, such as Motya, Erix, Soli and Panormus (Palermo). They also crossed over to Sardinia and the Balearic Isles, and planted colonies on the south coast of Spain and the northwestern coast of Africa, within and beyond the straits of Gihraltar. Of their settlements in Spain Gades (Cades) and Tartessus were the most noted, the latter being probably the Tarshish of Scripture (1 K 10 22). Malaca (Malaga) and Abdera, within the straits, were likewise important settlements, and there were others of less note.

The colonial enterprise of the Phoenicians was remarkable for the age, and was only surpassed in ancient times by the Greeks who came later, the former being the pioneers. The energy and daring of the Phoenicians in pushing out into unknown seas, with the imperfect means at their disposal, is evidence of the enterprise of this people. Their chief object, however, was trade.

Their colonies were mostly factories for the exchange of their manufactured articles for the products of the lands they visited. They cared little about building up new states or for extending their civilization and molding barbarous tribes and imparting to them their culture. In this they were far surpassed by the Greeks whose colonies profoundly modified the peoples and lands with which they came in contact.

The Phoenicians were the same as the Canaanites, under which name they are known in the OT, as well as Sidonians (Gen 10 19; Nu 13 29). They were of Semitic stock, if we may judge by their language and characteristics. It is true that in

Gen 10 6 Canaan is called a son of Ham, but it is also true that the language of Canaan is identified with Heb (Isa 19 18). If the early Phoenicians spoke a different tongue, they entirely lost it before their contact with the Hebrews. Their writings and all the references to them in ancient authorities show that their language was purely Semitic. As to their origin and the time of their migration to the Syrian coast, it is more difficult to determine. Herodotus (i.2; vii.89) says that they lived at first on the Erythraean Sea, which is identified with the Persian Gulf, and modern authorities have not found evidence to refute the statement. It is quite certain that they were not the aborigines of the country, and must have come in with some of the various migrations from the E., which we know, from Egypt and Babylonia monuments, occurred in the 3d, perhaps in the 4th, millennium BC. Semites are found in Syria as early as the 14th Egyptian Dynasty, about 3000 BC, and we may fairly conjecture that the Canaanites were in possession of the seacoast as early as 2500 BC. It is possible that they were among the Hyksos invaders of Egypt (Paton, Syria and Pal, 67).

That the Phoenicians took to the sea at a very early date and became the most skillful mariners of the ancient world is certain. Their enterprise in this direction is attested by classic writers, and the references to it in the OT are numerous. This was coupled with great industry and skill in the manufacture of the various articles which furnished the materials of their extended commerce. They exhibited a boldness and audacity in braving the perils of the sea in their little ships, which, for the age, demands our admiration. They were the first who dared to push out of sight of land in their voyages and sail beyond the Pillars of Hercules into the ocean. But in their commercial dealings they were often unscrupulous, and their greed of gain often led them to take unfair advantage of the barbarous races with whom they came in contact. The purchase of the land on which the citadel of Carthage was built may illustrate the opinion of the ancients regarding them, but we ought to remember that trickery and deceit are charged against them by their enemies, who alone have handed down accounts of them. The Heb prophets speak of their pride and vanity (Ezk 28 17), and violence (ver 16), and Amos hints at a traffic in captives taken in war, but whether of Hebrews or not is not clear (Am 1 9). Slaves were among the articles of merchandise in which they traded (Ezk 27 13; Joel 3 6), but this could hardly be charged against them as a great sin when slavery was universal. The chief reason for their being denounced by the prophets was their corrupt practices in worship and the baleful influence of the Baal and Astarte cult introduced by them into Israel through Ahab's marriage with Jezebel (1 K 16 31-33). This evil influence was felt even after the captivity when the rites of the Phoenician Tammuz were practised in Jerus (Ezk 8 14). But the earlier relations of the Phoenicians with Israel in the days of David and Solomon were friendly and mutually beneficial. On the whole the judgment of history assigns to this people a high position for their enterprise and skill in carrying on their trade, and in being the pioneers of civilization in many of the Mediterranean lands, esp. by their introduction of alphabetical writing, which was by far the most valuable of all their contributions to the culture of the ancient world.

(1) The Phoenicians were celebrated for their textile fabrics of silk, wool, linen and cotton. The materials of the last three were obtained from Syria and Egypt, but the silk came from the Far East through Persia. The dyeing of these fabrics was by a process invented by the Phoenicians, and the luster and permanence of color were unequalled by the ancients and made the Tyrian purple famous throughout the world. The finer qualities of it were so precious that only the very wealthy, or kings and princes, could obtain it, and it became at last a synonym of royalty. This dye was obtained from the shell-fish which was abundant in the Mediterranean, esp. along the Phoen coast, species of the Murex and the Buccinum. The mode of manufacture is not definitely known and was probably kept a secret by the Phoenicians. At least they had a monopoly of the business.

4. Arts and Manufactures

(2) Glass was another well-known product of the country, and although not invented by the Phoenicians as formerly supposed, it was made in large quantities and exported to all countries about the sea. See GLASS.

(3) Pottery was also an article of manufacture and export, and some of the examples of their work found in Cyprus show considerable skill in the art of decoration as well as making. In this, however, they were far surpassed by the Greeks.

(4) Bronze was a specialty of the Phoenicians, and they were for centuries the leading producers, since they controlled the sources of supply of the copper and tin used in its manufacture. The remains of their bronze manufactures are numerous, such as arms for offence and defence, knives, toilet articles, axes, sickles, cups, paterae, and various other household utensils. Articles for artistic purposes are not of high value, although the pillars named Jachin and Boaz, the molten sea, the bases, lavens and other articles cast by Hiram of Tyre for the temple of Solomon must have exhibited considerable artistic merit. Their bronze was of good quality and was tempered so as to serve well for edged tools. The composition was about 9 parts copper to 1 of tin. They seem also to have made iron (2 Ch 2 14), and some specimens have come down to us, but we cannot judge from their scarcity as to the extent of their manufactures in this metal, since most of the articles have perished by corrosion.

Aesthetic art among the Phoenicians was of low grade, as it was among the Semites generally, and where we find some works of moderate merit they undoubtedly manifest the influence of Gr art, such as those found in Cyprus by General Di Cesnola and others. In Phoenicia proper very little of artistic value has come to light that can be ascribed to native artists. In sculpture the style is stiff and conventional, much of it exceedingly rude, and lacks expression. The animal forms are generally grotesque, often absurd, reminding one of children's attempts at plastic art. The anthropoid sarcophagi discovered at Sidon were modeled after the Egyp. and the magnificent ones, of different design, from the same place, now in the Museum of Constantinople, were certainly the work of Gr artists of the age of Alexander the Great.

The architecture of the Phoenicians was characterized by massiveness, rather than elegance. The substructures of some of their temples and castles are cyclopean, like those of the temple at Jerus (1 K 7 10), and other examples are found at Sidon, Gebal, Marathus and other places in Phoenicia itself. Their work seems lacking in symmetry and grace, showing a want of aesthetic taste.

Trade was the very life of Phoenicia. The contracted limits of the land forbade any extensive agriculture, and the people were forced to get their living by other means. They applied themselves to industrial arts, and this led them to seek the means for distributing their wares. Trade was essential to them, and they sought outlets for it by sea and land. Their position was esp. favorable for commerce. In the very center of the ancient world, with the great rich and populous nations of antiquity at their back and on either side, they faced the young, vigorous and growing nations of the West, and they served them all as carriers and producers. Their caravans threaded all the well-beaten routes of the East, the deserts of Arabia and the mountain defiles of Armenia and Asia Minor, and their ships pushed boldly out to sea and explored the Mediterranean and the Euxine and did not hesitate to brave the unknown dangers of the Atlantic and perhaps even penetrated to the Baltic, emulating the mariners of a later day in their zeal for discovery and search for new avenues of trade. Could we find a detailed account of their voyages and discoveries, it would be a most interesting document, but we have little except what others have written about them, which, however, gives us a pretty fair idea of the extent of their commercial enterprise. The prophet Ezekiel has given us a remarkable catalogue of the wares of Tyre and of the countries with which she traded (Ezk 27). There we have mention of nearly all the regions of Western Asia, Egypt, Greece and the islands, and Spain, indicated by the names of races, tribes and countries. The materials of their traffic include the most important known to the ancient world, the products of agriculture, such as wool, linen, oil, balm, spices, frankincense, wine, corn, etc.; of metals, such as gold, silver, copper (brass), tin, iron, lead, etc.; precious stones and the articles of manufacture, the "multitude of handiworks," which they were so skilful in producing. They traded in animals also, horses, mules, lambs, rams and goats, and, what is less to their credit, in the persons of men (ver 13). The range of their trade was much wider than is indicated by Ezekiel. We know they reached the Scilly Isles in Britain, and probably the Baltic, whither they went for amber, though this might have been brought overland to the Adriatic and received into their ships there. They passed along the western coast of Africa as far as Cape Non, and perhaps farther, for Herodotus tells us that Pharaoh-nech dispatched a crew of Phoen sailors to circumnavigate Africa, which they accomplished in 3 years.

5. Commerce and Trade

We know that they had a fleet in the Red Sea sailing from Elath or Ezion-geber (1 K 9 26,27), and it is quite possible that they were allowed by some of the kings of Egypt to avail themselves of ports on the other branch of the Red Sea. They must have visited the eastern shore of Africa and perhaps struck across the Indian Ocean, after skirting the coast of Arabia, and thus carried on trade with India. The Ophir mentioned in connection with these voyages has not been definitely located, but was perhaps in Southern Arabia, though possibly in Southeast Africa (see GOLD).

The ships in which the Phoenicians made these voyages were small as compared with the great vessels of the present day, but the largest known in their age, as we may infer from the long voyages they made. Their superiority is testified to by classical writers. In the famous expedition of Xerxes to Greece the Phoen ships excelled all others in speed, and the king chose one of them when he embarked upon the sea (Herod. vii.100). These ships were impelled both by sails and oars, as we know from illustrations upon the coins (see COINS).

The ancients attributed the invention of the alphabet to the Phoenicians. This is now regarded as doubtful, and there are no reliable data for determining what people first analyzed speech to its ultimate elements, but to the Phoenicians belongs the merit of bringing the invention to the knowledge of the western world. It is quite certain that the alphabets of Western Asia and those

6. Language of Europe were derived from the Phoenician characters. This is what we should have expected from their wide commercial relations. The alphabetic writing was in fact one of their exports and was by far the most important of them all. The world owes a great debt to this people for this invaluable aid to literature, science and culture (see ALPHABET).

The Phoen alphabet comprises 22 letters and is deficient in signs to indicate vowels, which were left to be supplied by the reader. This defect is common to the Sem alphabets, but was soon remedied when the Greeks adopted the Phoenician. Some of the letters have to serve for two sounds, such as the signs for s and sh, for p and ph, for t and th; besides, there is a redundant sign for the sound of s. Also the sounds of y and w are unrepresented.

The origin of the letters is probably to be found in the hieroglyphic signs for words and syllables used by the Egyptians and others, since the similarity of some of them to these signs is evident, but in some cases it is more likely that the Phoenicians adopted hieroglyphics of their own. Thus the first letter, 'aleph, which means "ox," was evidently derived from the picture of an ox's head and then reduced to a conventional form.

The Phoen alphabet and language were common to the Canaanitish tribes and the Hebrews, as we know from the many inscriptions found in Western Asia. The M S testifies to their use E. of the Jordan, and the Siloam Inscription likewise for Israel, and the same characters have been found in North Syria. This would be natural, for people of these regions had become largely Sem by the 9th cent. BC, when we suppose that the Phoen alphabet was in general use.

It is strange that the Phoenicians, who had an alphabet so early, and made it so widely known to the world, made so little use of it for literature. The remains of their language are very scanty, mostly inscriptions, and these generally very brief. The longest ones in Phoen proper are those from Sidon, the most famous of which is that of Esmunazer, king of Sidon, comprising 293 words. Some few others, pertaining to the same dynasty, have been discovered in tombs and on the walls of the temple of Asmun, and show the Phoen character and style in its best form. Only two works of any length are known to us by tr or references in Gr authors. The first is the Phoen History of Sanchoniathon, of Beirut, which Philo of Byblius claims to have tr^d from the Phoen original. This, however, is doubted, and both the author and the history are suspected to be mythical. The other work is genuine; the short account of the voyage of a Carthaginian king beyond the Pillars of Hercules, called the Periplus of Hanno, is not without merit as a narrative, and indicates that the Carthaginian branch of the Phoen race, at least, may have had a lit. of some value, but it is unfortunately lost. We cannot suppose, however, that it was very extensive or very important, as more of it would then have been preserved. The conclusion is natural that the Phoenicians were so absorbed in commercial enterprise and the pursuit of wealth that they neglected the nobler uses of the invaluable instrument of culture they had found in alphabetic writing.

A very prominent rôle was assigned to religion in the life of the Phoenicians. As a Sem people, such a characteristic was but natural and

7. Religion they seem to have possessed it in large measure. Their religious ideas are important on account of the influence they had on the Hebrews, which is so apparent in the OT. The worship of the Canaanitish Baal and Ashtoreth, or Astarte, led the Israelites astray and produced most disastrous results.

There can be little doubt that the chief deities of the Phoenicians, as well as the forms of their cult, were derived from Babylonia, brought with them probably when they migrated to the W., but afterward modified by contact with Egypt and Greece. Some regard the earliest conception of the deity among the Semites to have been monotheism, and we find traces of this in the attributes ascribed by the Phoenicians to their chief god. He is Baal,

"lord" or "master"; Baal-samin, "lord of heaven"; Eliun, "supreme," etc. These terms imply either one God or one who is supreme among the gods and their ruler. But this belief was changed before the Phoenicians came into contact with the Hebrews, and polytheism took its place, though their gods were less numerous than among most polytheistic races. One of the most corrupting tendencies we notice was the ascription of sexual characteristics to the chief deities of their pantheon, such as Baal and Ashtoreth, which led to licentious rites of the most abominable character.

Baal (Phoen בַּעַל, ba'al) was the chief deity and was universally worshipped, being usually designated by the locality in each place: Baal of Tyre or Baal-Tsur, Baal-Sidon, Baal-Tars (Tarsus), Baal-bek, etc. He was regarded as the god of the generative principle in Nature, and his statues were sometimes flanked by bulls. He was identified with Zeus, and he appears on the coins under the Gr type of Zeus, seated on a throne, holding an eagle in the outstretched right hand and a scepter in the left. Sometimes his head is encircled with rays showing him to be the sun-god.

Ashtoreth (Phoen אַשְׁתֹּרֶת, 'ashtōreth) was the great Nature-goddess, the Magna Mater, queen of heaven (Jer 7 18), and as Baal was the solar deity, so she was often represented under the lunar aspect, Ashteroth-karnaim, "Ashteroth of the two horns" (Gen 14 5). Sometimes she is represented holding the dove, the symbol of fecundity, of which she was the goddess. She was commonly identified with Aphrodite or Venus. She, like Baal, had temples everywhere, and kings were sometimes her high priests, and her worship was too often accompanied with orgies of the most corrupt kind, as at Apheca (see ASHTORETH; TAMMUZ).

Among the other gods we may mention: El, or Il (אֵל, 'ēl), originally the designation of the supreme God, but afterward a subordinate deity who became the special divinity of Byblus (Gebal), and was regarded by the Greeks as the same as Kronos. Melkarth (מַלְכָּרְתַּח, melkarth, "king of the city") originally was the same as Baal, representing one aspect of that god, but later a separate deity, the patron god of Tyre whose head appears on many of its coins, as well as his symbol, the club, since he was identified with Hercules. Herodotus describes his temple at Tyre to which he attributes great antiquity, 2,300 years before his time. Dagon (דַּגּוֹן, dāghōn) seems to have been the tutelary deity of Aradus, his head appearing on the early autonomous coins of that city. He seems to have been regarded as the god of agriculture by the Phoenicians, rather than of fishing as generally supposed. Adonis (אַדֹּנַיִם, 'adhōn, "lord") was regarded as the son of Cinyras, a mythic king of Gebal and the husband of Ashtoreth. The myth of his death by the wild boar led to the peculiar rites celebrating it, instituted by the women of Gebal at Apheca and on the river named after him (see TAMMUZ). Esmun (אַשְׁמוֹן, 'esmun) one of the sons of Siddik, the father of the Cabiri, was esp. honored at Sidon and Beirut. At Sidon a great temple was built in his honor, the ruins of which have been recently explored and various inscriptions found dedicating it to him. His name signifies "the eighth," i.e. the eighth son of Siddik, the others being the Cabiri, or Great Ones, who were regarded as presiding over ships and navigation, and as such were worshipped in many places, although their special seat was Beirut. Although they were called "Great" they are represented as dwarfs, and an image of one of them was placed on the prow, or stern, of each Phoen war galley. The goddess Tanith (תַּנִּיחַ, tanith) occupied a lofty place in the pantheon, since in inscriptions she takes the precedence over Baal when the two names occur together. She was esp. honored at Carthage and to her most exalted names are given, such as "the parent of all"; "the highest of the gods"; "the mistress of the elements," etc. Besides some other gods of less note originally worshipped by the Phoenicians, they introduced some foreign deities into their pantheon. Thus Poseidon appears frequently on the coins of Beirut and became its patron deity in Rom times; Isis and her temple at Gebal are likewise represented on its coins, the Dioscuri or their symbols on those of Tripolis and Beirut, etc.

The corrupt nature of the Phoen worship has been referred to. It was also cruel, the custom of human sacrifices being common and carried to an extent unheard of among other peoples, such as the horrible sacrifice of 200 noble youths at Carthage when besieged by Agathocles. The sacrifice was by burning, the victim being placed in the arms of the statue of the god, heated for the purpose. In P. this god was Melkarth, or Molech, and the custom is denounced in the OT (Lev 20 2-5), but other gods were also honored in this way. The religious feeling of the Phoenicians was undoubtedly deep, but sadly corrupt and depraved.

The political history of P. is that of the towns and cities belonging to it. The country as a whole had no centralized government, but the chief towns exercised a sort of hegemony, at times, over some of the lesser ones. This was esp. the case with Sidon and Tyre, but every city had its king and its local government. The land is never referred to in ancient documents, but the people are designated by their cities. Thus we find in Gen 10 17 f the mention of Sidon, the Arvadite, the Arkite, etc., and, in Josh 13 4, the Gebalites and the Sidonians in connection with the land of the Canaanites. In the same way the inscriptions of Egypt, Babylonia and Assyria refer to the people of the different cities, but not to the land as a political unit, which it never was.

The cities first come into notice in the period of the Egyp domination, beginning in the 16th cent. BC under Thothmes III. This king subdued most of the Phoen cities, or received their submission, in his numerous campaigns to Syria, and the Egyp rule continued with more or less interruption until the decline of Egypt under the XXth Dynasty, or about 300 years. During this time Arvad seems to have exercised the hegemony in the N., and Sidon in the S., with Gebal controlling the middle region. The Am Tab reveal many facts concerning the condition of things while the Egyp power was declining in the latter part of the XVIIIth Dynasty, esp. in the reign of Amenhotep IV (Ikhnaton). The rise of the Amorite and Hittite power in the N. threatened these cities, which were under Egyp governors, and they called upon their suzerain for aid, which was not given, and they fell, one after another, into the hands of the enemy. Rameses II restored Egyp rule, but his successors of the XXth Dynasty could not maintain it, and the invasion of tribes from the W. and N., called the Peleset, or Philis, by land and sea, though repelled by Rameses III, continued to increase until the Egyp domination was broken, and the coast towns resumed their independence about the middle of the 12th cent. BC. Sidon came to the front as the chief city of P., and it is referred to by Joshua as "Great Sidon" (Josh 11 8). Homer also mentions Sidon frequently, but makes no reference to Tyre. The latter city was certainly in existence in his day, but had not come to the front as the leading city in the mind of the Greeks. Yet it was a fortified city in the time of Joshua (19 29), and the king of Tyre is among the correspondents mentioned in the Am Tab. It seems to have taken precedence of Sidon when the latter was attacked by the Philis of Askelon, and the inhabitants were compelled to flee for safety to Tyre. At all events Tyre exercised the hegemony in P. by the time David came to the throne, and had probably obtained it a century or two before, and held it until P. became subject to Assyria in the 9th cent. BC. Asshur-nazir-pal first came into contact with P., which submitted to tribute, between 877 and 860 BC, and this subjection continued until the downfall of Assyria in the latter part of the 7th cent. BC. The subjection was nominal only for more than a century, the cities retaining their kings and managing their own affairs with no interference from the Assyrians as long as they paid the tribute. But with the advent of Tiglath-pileser in Syria, about 740 BC, conditions changed, and the Phoen towns were subjected to severe treatment, and some of the dynasts were driven from their cities and Assyrian governors appointed in their places. Their oppression caused revolts, and Elulæus of Tyre united Sidon and the cities to the S. in a league to resist the encroachments of Tiglath-pileser and his successor Shalmaneser IV, whom he successfully resisted, although the Assyrian gained over to his side Sidon, Acre, and some other towns and had the assistance of their fleets to make an attack upon the island city. The attack failed completely, and Shalmaneser left Elulæus to his independence, which he maintained for a quarter of a century, regaining control of the towns that had fallen away and also of Cyprus. Sargon (722-705 BC) let P. alone, but Sennacherib (705-681) determined to punish the king of Tyre and prepared an army of 200,000 men for the war with P. Elulæus was afraid and fled to Cyprus, but his towns dared to resist and Sennacherib had to reduce them one after another, but did not succeed in taking Tyre itself. He set over the conquered territory a certain Tubaal, probably a Phoen, who paid him tribute. He also took tribute from Gebal and Aradus, which indicates that all of P. was subject to him, as these two cities probably controlled all that was not under Tyre. In the reign of Esarhaddon (681-668) Sidon revolted under Abd-Melkarth, who was caught and beheaded, the city sacked, and the inhabitants either killed or carried into captivity, and it was re-peopled by captives from the E. At a later date (672), when Esarhaddon was preparing to invade Egypt, Baal, the vassal king of Tyre, revolted and refused to aid him, but afterward submitted either to Esarhaddon or to his son Asshur-bani-pal and assisted the latter in his invasion of Egypt, 668 BC. Four years later, however, we find the Assyrian king besieging Tyre and punishing Baal by making him give his daughter to be a member of the Assyrian's harem. Baal himself was left on his throne. The same fate was the lot of the king of Aradus, and Accho (Acre) was also punished.

The frequent rebellions of the Phoen towns show their love of independence and a sturdy resistance to oppression. They became freed from the yoke of Assyria probably about 630 BC, when the Medes attacked Nineveh and the Scythic hordes overran all Western Asia. The Phoen cities were fortified and did not suffer very much from the barbarian invasion, and, as Assyria was broken, they resumed their independence. In the struggle which followed between Egypt and Babylon for the mastery of Syria, P. fell, for a time, under the sway of Egypt, but was not oppressed, and her towns prospered, and it was in this period that Tyre attained great wealth and renown as reflected in the Book of Ezk. When Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to it, a resistance of 13 years showed its strength and resources, and although the town on the mainland was destroyed, it is doubtful whether the king of Babylon took the island city, but it must have submitted to pay tribute (585 BC). P. remained subject to Babylon until that empire fell into the hands of the Persians (538), and then accepted the yoke of the latter in the days of Cambyses, if not earlier, but the Pers king does not seem to have used force to gain the adherence of the Phoenicians. He needed their fleets to assist in the attack upon Egypt and secured them without difficulty. They aided him in the conquest of Egypt, but when he asked them to proceed against Carthage they refused, and he had to desist. The navy of P. was too necessary for him to run any risk of alienating it.

This navy was the strongest sea power of the Persians in all their coming wars with Greece. Without its assistance Darius and his successors could with difficulty have invaded that country or held in subjection the western coasts of Asia Minor. P. remained faithful to her Pers rulers about 150 years, but when the general revolt of the western satraps occurred in 362 BC, P. seems to have favored them, but no open rebellion broke out until 351, when Sidon, under her king Tabnit II (Tennes), boldly declared her independence and induced most of the Phoen cities to do the same. The Pers garrisons were massacred or driven out. Ochus, the king of Persia, marched with an army of 300,000 infantry and 30,000 horse to punish the rebels, and Tabnit, in cowardly alarm, betrayed Sidon into his hands, but the citizens set fire to the city and destroyed themselves rather than fall into the hands of Ochus, who, as treacherous as Tabnit, slew the traitor (see SPION). The other cities then submitted, and P. remained subject to Persia until the time of Alexander the Great. When this conqueror invaded the dominions of Persia and had defeated Darius at Issus, 333 BC, he demanded the submission of the Phoen towns, and all yielded save Tyre. Alexander was obliged to lay siege to it, which cost him 7 months of the severest labor, such was the valor and skill of the Tyrians. The capture of Tyre is reckoned as one of the greatest exploits of this mighty conqueror who stained his record by his cruel treatment of the brave defenders. He massacred the male prisoners and sold the remainder of the inhabitants, to the number of 30,000, into slavery (see TYRE). After the death of Alexander the Phoen cities were subject to the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria, the latter finally obtaining control of all by the victory of Antiochus III over Scopas in 198 BC. From this time on P. formed a part of the Seleucid kingdom until it passed, together with Syria and Pal, into the hands of the Romans. Its cities became the home of many Greeks and its language became largely Gr, as inscriptions and coins testify. The Romans had also much to do in modifying the character of the people, and some towns, Berytus, esp., became largely Roman. P. can hardly be said to have had a separate existence after the Gr invasion.

PHOENIX, fē'niks (Φοίνιξ, Phoînix; AV Phenice): A harbor in Crete (Acts 27 12). The Alexandrian corn ship carrying St. Paul and the author of Acts, after it left Myra in Lycia, was prevented by adverse winds from holding a straight course to Italy, and sailed under the lee of Crete, off the promontory of Salmone (κατὰ Σαλμώνην, katá Salmónēn). The ship was then able to make her way along the S. shore of Crete to a harbor called Fair Havens (Καλοὶ Λιμένες, Kaloi Liménes), near a city Lasea (Λασαία, Lasaia). Thence, in spite of St. Paul's advice to winter in Fair Havens, it was decided to sail to Phoenix (εἰς Φοίνικα, Liména τῆς Κρήτης) βλέποντα κατὰ λίβα καὶ κατὰ χώρον (εἰς Φοίνικα, liména tēs Krētēs) βλέποντα κατὰ λίβα καὶ κατὰ χῶρον, a description which has been tr^d in two ways: (1) "looking toward the S.W. wind and toward the N.W. wind, i.e. looking S.W. and N.W."; (2) "looking down the S.W. wind and down the N.W. wind, i.e. looking N.E. and S.E." On the way thither, they were struck by a wind from the N.E., called Euraquilo, and ran before it under the lee of an island, called Cauda or Clauda (Καῦδα, Kaída [Σ^o Β Ε], Κλαῦδα, Klaída [Σ^o Α, etc]) in Acts 27 7-17. It will be convenient to discuss those places together. The following account is based on Smith's elaborate study in his Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, which has been followed by all later writers.

The ship, when it left Myra, was obviously making for Italy (Puteoli or Ostia) by the shortest route, round Cape Malea, but off Cnidus it encountered a N.W. wind and had to sail for shelter under the lee of Crete. Salmone, now called Cape Sidero, was the promontory which forms the N.E. corner of the island. Thence along the S. shore of Crete, as far as Cape Matala, a sailing ship is sheltered by the mountains from the violence of the N.W. wind; W. of Cape Matala, where the coast turns toward the N.W., there is no such shelter. Fair Havens must therefore be looked for to the E. of Cape Matala, and there is a harbor, lying 6 miles E. of Cape Matala, which is called Fair Havens by the modern Greek inhabitants of the island. There is no doubt that this is the harbor in which the Alexandrian ship took shelter. It is sheltered only from the N. and N.W. winds.

The ruins of a city which has been identified with Lasea have been found 5 miles E. from Fair Havens, and 12 miles S. of the important city of Gortyna. It has been suggested that St. Paul's desire to winter at Fair Havens (Acts 27 10) may have been due to its proximity to Gortyna, and the opportunity which the latter city afforded for missionary work. There were many Jews in Gortyna. See CRETE.

From Fair Havens, against the advice of St. Paul, it was decided to sail to Phoenix, there to pass the winter. While the ship was on its way thither, it was struck by a violent N.E. wind from the mountains, called Euraquilo, and carried under the lee of an islet called Cauda or Clauda. When this happened, the ship was evidently crossing the Bay of Messariah, and from this point a N.E. wind must have carried her under the lee of an island now called Gaudho in Greek and Gozzo in Italian, situated about 23 miles S.W. of the center of the Gulf of Messariah. The modern name of the island shows that Cauda (Caudas in the Notitiae Episcopatum), and not Clauda is the true ancient form.

The writer of Acts never saw Phoenix, which must have been a good harbor, as the nautical experts decided to winter there (Acts 27 11). Now the only safe harbor on the S. coast of Crete in which a ship large enough to carry a cargo of corn and 268 souls could moor is the harbor beside Loutro, a village on the S. coast of Crete, directly N. of Canda. All the ancient authorities agree in placing Phoenix in this neighborhood. The harbor at Loutro affords shelter from all winds, and its identification with Phoenix seems certain. But a serious difficulty arises on this view. The words describing the harbor of Phoenix ordinarily mean "looking toward the S.W. and the N.W.," but the harbor beside Loutro looks eastward. This led Bishop Wordsworth to identify Phoenix with an open roadstead on the western side of the isthmus on which Loutro stands. But this roadstead is not a suitable place for wintering in, and it is better either to take the words to mean, in sailor's language, "looking down the S.W. and N.W. winds"—a description which exactly fits the harbor at Loutro—or to assume that the reporter of the discussion referred to in Acts 27 10-12 or the writer of Acts made a mistake in describing a place which he had never seen. An inscription belonging to the reign of Trajan found at Loutro shows that Egypt corn ships were wont to lie up there for the winter. W. M. CALDER

PHOROS, fō'ros (Φορός, Phorós, B [Swete], Φαρές, Pharés [1 Esd 8 30, where AV Pharez]): Name of one of the families, part of whom went up from the exile with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 9) and part with Ezra (8 30 RV) = "Parosh" of Ezr 2 3; 8 3, and some members of which had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 26).

PHURAI, frū'rī, frū'rā-i (Φουραί, Phourai; al. in S and A, Φρουραία, Phrouaia, and Φρουρίμ, Phourim; AV Phurim): In Ad Est 11 1, "the ep. of Phurai" means the preceding Book of Est. See PURIM.

PHRYGIA, frij'i-a (Φρυγία, Phrygia): A large ancient country of Central Asia Minor, very mountainous and with table-lands reaching 4,000 ft. in height. Its name is derived from Phryges, a tribe from Thrace, which in early times invaded the country and drove out or absorbed the earlier Asiatic inhabitants, among whom were the Hitites. Thus the Phrygians borrowed much of oriental civilization, esp. of art and mythology which they transferred to Europe. To define the boundaries of Phrygia would be exceedingly difficult, for as in the case of other Asia Minor countries, they were always vague and they shifted with nearly every age. The entire country abounds with ruins of former cities and with almost countless rock-hewn tombs, some of which are of very great antiquity. Among the most interesting of the rock sculptures are the beautiful tombs of the kings bearing the names Midas and Gordius, with which classical tradition has made us familiar. It seems that at one period the country may have extended to the Hellespont, even including Troy, but later the Phrygians were driven toward the interior. In Rom times, however, when Paul journeyed there, the country was divided into two parts, one of which was known as Galatian Phrygia, and the other as Asian Phrygia, because it was a part of the Rom province of Asia, but the line between them was never sharply drawn. The Asian Phrygia was the larger of the two divisions, including the greater part of the older country; Galatian Phrygia was small, extending along the Pisidian Mountains, but among its important cities were Antioch, Iconium and Apollonia. About 295 AD, when the province of Asia was no longer kept together, its different parts were known as Phrygia Prima and Phrygia Secunda. That part of Asia Minor is now ruled by a Turkish wali or governor whose residence is in Konia, the ancient Iconium. The population consists not only of Turks, but of Greeks, Armenians, Jews, Kurds and many small tribes of uncertain ancestry, and of peculiar customs and religious practices. The people live mostly in small villages which are scattered throughout the picturesque country. Sheep and goat raising are the leading industries; brigandage is common. According to Acts 2 10, Jews from Phrygia went to Jerus, and in Acts 18 23 we learn that many of them were influential and perhaps fanatical. According to Acts 16 6, Paul traversed the country while on his way from Lystra to Iconium and Antioch in Galatian Phrygia.

Twice he entered Phrygia in Asia, but on his 2d journey he was forbidden to preach there. Christianity was introduced into Phrygia by Paul and Barnabas, as we learn from Acts 13 4; 16 1-6; 18 23, yet it did not spread there rapidly. Churches were later founded, perhaps by Timothy or by John, at Colossae, Laodicea and Hierapolis.

PHYGELUS, fi-jē'lus (Φύγελλος, Phúgellos; Tischendorf and WH, with others, read Φύγελος, Phúgelos, Phygellus or Phygelus [2 Tim 1 15]; AV Phygellus, fi-jel'us): One of the Christians who deserted Paul at the time of his 2d imprisonment at Rome. Paul mentions him, along with Hermogenes, as being among those "that are in Asia," who turned away from him then. What is meant may be that Phygelus and Hermogenes, along with other native Christians from proconsular Asia, were in Rome when he was brought before the emperor's tribunal the second time, and that they had not merely taken no measures to stand by and support him, but that they had deserted him.

The meaning, however, may be that the turning away of Phygelus and Hermogenes from Paul took place, not in Rome, but in Asia itself.

The times during and immediately following the Neronic persecution were more dreadful than can easily be conceived, and the temptation was strong to forsake the Christian name, and to do so in a wholesale fashion. A great community like the Christian church in Ephesus or in Rome felt the terrible pressure of those times, when for a mere word—a word, however, denying the Lord who bought them—men were at once set free from persecution, from the loss of property or of home, and from death. 1 Pet records how the aftermath of the Neronic persecution had extended far indeed from Rome, where it had originated. Peter asks the Christians not to give way under "the fiery trial" which is trying them (1 Pet 4 12), and those whom he thus addresses were the members of the church throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia (1 Pet 1 1). The app. to the seven churches in Asia in the Apocalypse also show how sorely persecution had raged throughout that province. See PERSECUTION.

But in addition to the temptation to deny Christ's name and to go back to heathenism or to Judaism, there was also another which pressed upon some of the churches, the temptation to repudiate the authority of Paul. Many passages in the NT show how the name of Paul was sometimes very lightly esteemed, and how his authority was repudiated, e.g. by persons in Corinth, and in the churches of Galatia.

What is said here is, that among the Christians of proconsular Asia, i.e. of Ephesus and the churches in the valley of the Cayster, there was a widespread defection from that loyalty to Paul which was to be expected from those who owed to him all that they possessed of the knowledge of Christ's salvation. "All that are in Asia turned away from me; of whom are Phygelus and Hermogenes." On the whole, all the necessary conditions of these words are satisfied by a reference to Rome and to Paul's environment there, and perhaps this is the more probable meaning. See HERMOGENES.

PHYLACTERY, fi-lak'tēr-i (φυλακτήριον, phylaktērion, "guard"): This word is found only in Mt

23 5 in Our Lord's denunciation of the Pharisees, who, in order that their works might "be seen of men," and in their zeal for the forms of religion, "make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments." The corresponding word in the OT, לְפָתֵי טוֹ, lōphōth (Kennedy in HDB suggests pointing as the segholate fem. sing., tōtepheth), is found in three passages (Ex 13 16; Dt 6 8; 11 18), where it is trad "frontlets." This rendering, however, is not at all certain, and may have been read into the text from its later interpretation. In Ex 13 9 the corresponding word to the tōtāphōth of ver 16 is zikkārōn, "memorial" or "reminder"; and in the || clauses of both verses the corresponding word is 'ōth, "a sign" upon the hand, also used for the "sign" which Jeh appointed for Cain (Gen 4 15). It may be rendered then as a mark or ornament or jewel, and used figuratively of Jeh's Law as an ornament or jewel to the forehead of the Israelite, a reference to the charm or amulet worn by the pagan. The word used in the Talm for the phylactery is תפלה, ṭ-ḥillāh, "prayer," or "prayer-band" (pl. ṭ-ḥillān), indicating its use theoretically as a reminder of the Law, although practically it might be esteemed as an automatic and ever-present charm against evil: an aid within toward the keeping of the Law, a guard without against the approach of evil; a degradation of an OT figurative and idealistic phrase to the materialistic and superstitious practices of the pagans.

The phylactery was a leathern box, cube shaped, closed with an attached flap and bound to the person by a leather band. There were two kinds: (1) one to be bound to the inner side of the left arm, and near the elbow, so that with the bending of the arm it would rest over the heart, the knot fastening it to the arm being in the form of the letter yōdh (ד), and the end of the string, or band, finally wound around the middle finger of the hand, "a sign upon thy hand" (Dt 6 8). This box had one compartment containing one or all of the four passages given above. The writer in his youth found one of these in a comparatively remote locality, evidently lost by a Jewish peddler, which contained only the 2d text (Ex 13 11-16) in unpointed Heb. (2) Another was to be bound in the center of the forehead, "between thine eyes" (Dt 6 8), the knot of the band being in the form of the letter dāleth (ד), with the letter shīn (ש) upon each end of the box, which was divided into four compartments with one of the four passages in each. These two Heb letters, with the shīn of the arm-phylactery (see [1] above), formed the Divine name שדש, shadday, "Almighty." Quite elaborate ceremonial accompanied the "laying" on of the phylacteries, that of the arm being bound on first, and that of the head next, quotations from Scripture or Talm being repeated at each stage of the binding. They were to be worn by every male over 13 years old at the time of morning prayer, except on Sabbaths and festal days, such days being in themselves sufficient reminders of "the commandment, the statutes, and the ordinances" of Jeh (Dt 6 1).

The passages on which the wearing of the phylacteries is based are as follows: "It [i.e. the feast of unleavened bread] shall be for a sign unto thee upon thy hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes, that the law of Jeh may be in thy mouth" (Ex 13 9); "And it [i.e. sacrifice of the firstborn] shall be for a sign upon thy hand, and

3. Interpretation of OT 16); "thou shalt bind them [i.e. the Passages words of Jeh] for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes" (Dt 6 8); "therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul; and ye shall bind them for a sign upon your hand, and they shall be for frontlets between your eyes" (11 18). It is evident that the words in Ex are beyond all question used figuratively; a careful reading of the verses in Dt in close relation to their contexts, in which are other figures of speech not to be taken literally, is sufficient proof of their purely figurative intention also. Only the formalism of later ages could distort these figures into the gross and materialistic practice of the phylactery. Just when this practice began cannot accurately be determined. While the Talm attempts to trace it back to the primitive, even Mosaic, times, it probably did not long antedate the birth of Christ. In conservative Jewish circles it has been maintained through the centuries, and at present is faithfully followed by orthodox Judaism. Every male, who at the age of 13 becomes a "son of the Law" (bar miṣwāh), must wear the phylactery and perform the accompanying ceremonial.

In the NT passage (Mt 23 5) Our Lord rebukes the Pharisees, who make more pronounced the un-Scriptural formalism and the crude literalism of the phylacteries by making them obtrusively large, as they also seek notoriety for their religiosity by the enlarged fringes, or "borders." See FRINGES; FRONTLETS; PHARISEES.

PHYLARCH, fi'lārĕk (φυλάρχης, phylārchēs): Given in AV of 2 Macc 8 32 as a proper name "Philarches," but in RV "the phylarch of Timotheus's forces"; "probably the captain of an irregular auxiliary force" (RVm), rather than a cavalry officer.

PHYLARCHES, fi-lār'kēz (AV Philarches). See PHYLARCH.

PHYSICIAN, fi-zish'an (סוֹדֵן, ṣōḥēn; iatrós, iatrós): To the pious Jew at all times God was the healer (Dt 32 39): "It was neither herb nor mollifying plaister that cured them, but thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things" (Wisd 16 12). The first physicians mentioned in Scripture are those of Egypt. Long before the sojourn of the Hebrews in that land, Egypt had a priestly class of physicians (snū) and a god of healing (Imhpt). From the ancient medical papyri which have been preserved, the largest of which is the Papyrus Ebers, we know that the medical knowledge of these physicians was purely empirical, largely magical and wholly unscientific. In spite of their ample opportunities they knew next to nothing of human anatomy, their descriptions of diseases are hopelessly crude, and three-fourths of the hundreds of prescriptions in the papyri are wholly inert. Even their art of embalming was so imperfect that few of their mummies would have remained in any other climate than that of Egypt. Physicians of this kind who were Joseph's servants embalmed Jacob (Gen 50 2) and Joseph (ver 26). It was not until the foundation of the School of Alexandria, which was purely Greek, that Egypt became a place of medical education and research.

There is no evidence that at any time the priests of Israel were reputed to be the possessors of medical knowledge or tradition. In the ceremonial law they had explicit instructions as to the isolation of those suffering from skin eruptions, so that they might recognize certain obstinate and infectious forms which caused ceremonial uncleanness, but with this duty as sanitary police their function ended, and they used no means to cure these diseases. There is, as far as I know, no record or tradition of a priest-physician in Bible times. The records of cure by the prophets, esp. Elisha, are mostly recorded as miracles, not as cures by treatment. The salt which cured the noxious water at Jericho and the meal by which the poisonous gourds were rendered innocuous, like the manipulation of the Shunammite's son, can scarcely be regarded as adequate remedies. There is an implied reference to a healer of wounds in Ex 21 19, as also in Isa 3 7, and it is recorded in Pesāhīm, iv.9 that there was in existence in the time of the monarchy a book of cures, šēpher r'phū'ōth, supposed to have been written by Solomon, but withdrawn from public use by Hezekiah. The first specific mention of Heb physicians is 2 Ch 16 12, but Asa is obviously regarded by the Chronicler as reprehensible in trusting to their skill. In 2 K 8 29 Joram, king of Israel, is said to have gone to Jezreel to be healed. Not far from this, across the Jordan, was Gilead, which possibly may also have been a place resorted to by those needing medical treatment, as indicated by Jeremiah's query: "Is there no balm in Gilead? is there no physician there?" (Jer 8 22). Job, irritated by the platitudes of his friends, calls them physicians of no value (13 4).

In the NT Our Lord's saying, "They that are whole have no need of a physician," etc, shows that there were physicians in Galilee (Mt 9 12; Mk 2 17; Lk 5 31), and in Nazareth He quotes what seems to have been a proverb: "Physician, heal thyself" (Lk 4 23). There were physicians in Galilee who received fees from the woman of Caesarea Philippi who had the issue of blood (Mk 5 26; Lk 8 43). Of her there is a curious story told in Eusebius (VII, 18).

There are several Talmudic references to physicians; in Shekālīm 5 1, it is said that there was a physician at the temple to attend to the priests. A physician was appointed in every city (Gittin 12b) who was required to have a license from the local authorities (Bābhā' Bathrā' 21a). The familiar passage in Eccles 38 1-15 RV in praise of the physician gives him but limited credit for his skill: "There is a time when in their very hands is the issue for good," and later, "He that sinneth before his Maker, Let him fall into the hands of the physician."

Luke, called "the beloved physician" in Col 4 14, is said by Eusebius to have been a native of Antioch and a physician by profession. According to Origen he was the unnamed "brother whose praise in the gospel is spread through all the churches" (2 Cor 8 18). There are evidences of his professional studies in the language of his writings, though of this probably more has been made by Hobart and others than it really merits. Had we not known of his profession it is doubtful whether it could have been conjectured from his choice of words. Sir W. Ramsay calls attention to the two words used of the healings at Melita in Acts 28 8-10: for the cure of Publius' father the word used is ūsato, but for the healing of those who came later it is etherapeuōnto, which he renders "received medical treatment." From this he infers that Luke helped Paul with these (Ramsay, Luke the Physician, 1908).

PI-BESETH, pī-bē'seth (פִּי־בִשֶׁת, pī-bhešet; LXX Βυβάστος, Bubastos; Egypt Pi-Basht, "the house of Basht," the cat-headed goddess; the Egypt form is usually Ha-Basht; it is doubtful if the form Pi-Basht has yet been found): A city of ancient Egypt. The only occurrence of the name of this place in the OT is in Ezk 30 17; where it is coupled with Aven, i.e. On (Heliopolis).

Pi-beseth was on the western bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, about 40 miles N. of Memphis, about 15 miles N.E. of On. Herodotus found the city of Bubastis very beautiful in his day. The annual festival of the goddess, Basht, was celebrated here with revolting license, similar to that of the festival of Syyid el-Bedawer now kept in Tanṭa.

Pi-beseth was explored by Professor Naville under the Egypt Exploration Society in 1887-90. There were uncovered ruins of Egypt from the IVth Dynasty of the Old Empire, from the Middle Empire, an important Hyksos settlement, and ruins from the New Empire down to the end, and even from Rom times. The most unique discovery at Pi-beseth, one of the most unique in all Egypt, is the cemetery of cats. These cats, the animal sacred to Basht, were mummified at other places in Egypt, but at Pi-beseth they were burned and the ashes and bones gathered and buried in great pits lined with brick or hardened clay. Bones of the ichneumon were also found mixed with those of the cats in these pits (Egypt Exploration Fund Report, 1891).

PICTURE, pik'tūr: This word (in the pl.) is found 3 t in AV, viz. Nu 33 52; Isa 2 16; Prov 25 11. In Nu and Prov "pictures" represents the Heb word מַשְׂכִּית, maskīth, "showpiece," "figure." The context in Nu suggests that the "pictures" or "carved figures" (RV "figured stones") which the Israelites were to destroy were symbols of Can. worship and therefore foreign to the religion of Jeh. In Prov for AV "pictures of silver," ERV has "baskets [ARV "network"] of silver," but a more probable tr is "carvings of silver." "Pictures" stands for a slightly different word (but from the same root) in Isa, viz. שְׂכִיּוֹת, s'khiyōth; RV renders "imagery" (RVm "watchtowers"). The prophet probably alludes to carved figures (of gods in animal or human shapes) on the prows of vessels.

PIECE, pēs: In AV the word (sing. and pl.) represents a large number of different Heb words, many of which have more or less the same significance, e.g. piece of meat or flesh (Gen 15 10; 2 S 6 19; Ezk 24 4); of bread or cake (1 S 2 36; 30 12; Jer 37 21); of ground or land (2 S 23 11); of wall (Neh 3 11.19 ff); of an ear (Am 3 12); of cloth or garment (1 K 11 30); of millstone (Jgs 9 53). It is used frequently in paraphrastic renderings of various Heb vbs.: "break," "tear," "cut," etc, in pieces (Gen 44 28, etc).

In the NT "piece" renders ἐπιβλημα, epiblēma, "piece" or "patch of cloth" (Mt 9 16; Mk 2 21; Lk 5 36). It is also found in paraphrastic renderings—broken in pieces (Mk 5 4), pulled in pieces (Acts 23 10).

T. LEWIS

PIECE OF GOLD: The word "pieces" is supplied in 2 K 5 5 (story of Naaman), "6,000 pieces of gold," where RVm more correctly suggests "shekels" (cf 1 K 10 16). See MONEY.

PIECE OF MONEY: Two words are thus rendered in AV (קֶשֶׁתִּיחַ, q'siṭāh; στατήρ, statēr). RV gives only the first this rendering (Job 42 11).

It is supposed to be from Arab. كَسَاط, kassat, "to divide equally by weight," and hence something weighed; a piece of silver weighed for money, and perhaps stamped with its weight. The stater is the well-known Gr weight and coin (Mt 17 27 AV, m stater, RV "shekel"). In gold it was equal to about a guinea or five dollars, but in silver only to about 66 cts.

PIECE OF SILVER: Two words are thus rendered in the OT (כֶּסֶף, raççê-khâseph, and כֶּסֶף, k'sîlâh) and two in the NT (ἀργύριον, argûrion, and δραχμή, drachmê). The first expression means pieces of silver broken off from bars or larger pieces (Ps 68 30). The second is used for money in Josh 24 32, and is so rendered in RV. The pieces were not coins, but perhaps bore a stamp. See MONEY. In other passages of the OT where pieces of silver are mentioned, the Heb has simply a numeral joined with keseph, "silver," as in the account of the selling of Joseph (Gen 37 28). In Isa 7 23 the word silverlings means small pieces of silver, and they were no doubt shekels. In the NT the Gr ἀργύρια, argûria (Mt 26 15; 27 3-9), is tr^d as pieces of silver, but probably means shekels. In Acts 19 19 the same word occurs, but in this case the reference is probably to the denarius or drachma (cf Lk 15 8 f). About the 30 pieces of Mt would be equal to about £4 or $20, and the 50,000 of Acts to about £2,000 or $10,000.

PIETY, pī'e-ti: Only in 1 Tim 5 4: "Let them learn first to show piety towards their own family," where "let them show piety" represents a single Gr vb. (εὐσεβέω, eusebēō), in its only other occurrence (Acts 17 23) being rendered "worship." In Elizabethan Eng. "piety" (like the Lat pietas) could be used of devotion to one's parents (as still in the phrase "filial piety"), as well as of devotion to God. Hence there is no explicit statement here that filial devotion is one form of Divine worship.

PIGEON, pij'un (יוֹנָה, yōnâh; περιστέρα, peristerá; Lat pipire): A bird of the family Columbidae. See DOVE. The Heb yōnâh seems to be tr^d either pigeon or dove, yet almost every reference made to these birds proves that there were distinct branches of the family recognized, and one or the other or both are designated. On the other hand, some of the tr^s read doves, where the remainder of the text makes it very clear that pigeons were the birds intended. The Lat pipire means "to cheep," and refers to the unusually clamorous young in the nest. The old birds coo, moan and wail as doves. The birds are almost 12 in. long, have full, plump bodies that are delicious food, and beautifully marked and shaded plumage. They feed principally on grain, seeds, small buds and fruit. Beyond question wild pigeons were the first birds domesticated and taught to home with man. They appeared in a state of such complete domestication, that they flew free, yet homed and bred in places provided by man at the time of the very first attempts at keeping records of history. At the time the earliest Bib. accounts were written, pigeons were so domesticated that in all known countries of the East they were reckoned when an estimate was made of a man's wealth.

Pigeons.

The rich provided large and expensive cotes of molded pottery for their birds, each section big enough for the home of one pair of birds, the regular rows of openings resembling lattice work, so that Isaiah refers to them as "windows" (60 8). LXX reads σὺν νεοσσῶσι, sún neossois, lit. "with young" or "fledglings" (see below). The middle classes modeled cotes of oven-baked clay, and the very poor cut holes in the walls, over the doors, and allowed the birds to enter and live with the family.

In wild estate, rock and wood pigeons swarmed in countless numbers through rocky caves and caverns and over the plains of Gennesaret, the forests of Gilead and the woody slopes of Carmel. They remained throughout the season, breeding at all times. The doves were migratory, and were kept in confinement only as caged pets or to be held for sale for sacrifice. For these purposes, it appears that the dove was slightly preferred. When only one bird was to be used, a dove is always specified; where two, almost in every case the dove is mentioned first. Where one or the other will suffice, the dove seems to have been given preference. This may have been because it required greater effort to procure a dove, and so it was considered a greater sacrifice. Everyone having a home of any sort had pigeons they could use, or they could be taken wild at any time. The dove is first mentioned in Gen 15 9: "And he said unto him, Take me a heifer three years old, and a she-goat three years old, and a ram three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon."

It will be observed that the dove is mentioned first, and it is specified that the pigeon was to be young. It is probable that the people protected their domesticated pigeons by using the wild for sacrifice, whenever possible. Young birds could be taken from a nest at almost any time. The old birds, among the wild, were shy creatures and far more difficult to capture in nets or snares than doves that came close to cities and villages to live, and exhibited much less fear of man than the wild pigeons. The next reference is in Lev 5 7: "And if his means suffice not for a lamb, then he shall bring his trespass-offering for that wherein he hath sinned, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, unto Jeh; one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering." Here two birds of each kind were to be offered, if the person making the sacrifice could not afford a lamb. Again in Lev 12 6: "And when the days of her purifying are fulfilled, for a son, or for a daughter, she shall bring a lamb a year old for a burnt-offering, and a young pigeon, or a turtle-dove, for a sin-offering, unto the door of the tent of meeting, unto the priest." Here is a rare instance where the text or the translators place the pigeon first.

"And on the eighth day he shall bring two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, to the priest, to the door of the tent of meeting" (Nu 6 10). In Cant 2 14:

"O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock,
In the covert of the steep place,
Let me see thy countenance,
Let me hear thy voice;
For sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely."

Here the text reads "dove," but the description of the location and the implication of the text prove the bird to have been a rock pigeon—a tender, loving thing, yet shy and timid, that peeps with eyes of bright concern over the rocks of its chosen home, down at the intruder. Isa 60 8: "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" Here is another place where the wrong bird is used. Doves were wild and migratory. They had no "windows." But the tile pots massed in one diamond-shaped cote appeared at a little distance, like latticed windows. This should read "pigeons" instead of "doves." For the same reason see Jer 48 28: "O ye inhabitants of Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock; and be like the dove that maketh her nest over the mouth of the abyss." Again the bird intended is the rock pigeon. Lk 2 24: "A sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons." This describes the sacrifice offered in the temple by Mary following the birth of Jesus. GENE STRATTON-PORTER

PI-HAHIROTH, pi-ha-hi'roth (פִּי הַחִירוֹת, pi-ha-hi'roth [Ex 14 2-9; Nu 33 7-8]): Nothing is known of the meaning of the name

1. Meaning Pi-H. Some attempts toward an of Name Egypt etymology for it have been made, but without much success.

Since the meaning of the name is unknown and no description of the place or its use is given, it is impossible to determine anything concerning the character of Pi-H., whether a city, a sanctuary, a fortress, or some natural feature of the landscape.

Neither Pi-H. nor any other place mentioned with it can be exactly located. A recent discovery of manuscripts in Egypt furnishes a

2. Location mention of this place, but affords very little assistance in locating it, nothing comparable to the account in the Bible itself. If any one of the places mentioned in connection with the crossing of the Red Sea could be located approximately, all the others could, also, be similarly located by the description given in the account in Ex. The route beyond the Sea has been made out with almost positive certainty. A journey along the way is so convincing that hardly anything can shake the conviction which it produces. This identification of the route of the exodus beyond the Sea requires the place of the crossing to be within 3 days' journey of Marah, which puts it somewhere near the modern Suez. It may be anywhere within 10 miles of that point. This approximately locates all the other places mentioned in connection with the crossing: Migdol must be Kas'Atakah, or some other high point in the mountains of the western deserts, where might be placed a watchtower. Pi-H. is between this point and the Sea and Baal-zephon near the opposite eastern shore. This puts Pi-H. at some point along the old shore line of the Sea within 10 miles of the site of modern Suez.

PILATE, ACTS OF. See following art., 4, and APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

PILATE, pi'lát, pi'lat, PONTIUS, pon'shi-us (Πιλάτος Πέιλᾶτος, Póntios Peilátos):

1. Name and Office
 2. Pilate's Procuratorship
 3. Pilate and Jesus Christ
 4. Pilate in Tradition and Legend
 5. Character of Pilate
- LITERATURE

The nomen Pontius indicates the stock from which Pilate was descended. It was one of the most famous of Samnite names; it was a

1. Name Pontius who inflicted on a Rom army and Office the disgrace of the Caudine Forks.

The name is often met with in Rom history after the Samnites were conquered and absorbed. Lucius Pontius Aquila was a friend of Cicero and one of the assassins of Julius Caesar. The cognomen Pilatus indicates the familia, or branch of the gens Pontius, to which Pilate belonged. It has been derived from pilleus, the cap worn by freedmen; this is improbable, as Pilate was of equestrian rank. It has also been derived from pilum, a spear. Probably the name was one that had descended to Pilate from his ancestors, and had long lost its meaning. The praenomen is nowhere mentioned. Pilate was 5th procurator of Judaea. The province of Judaea had formerly been the kingdom of Archelaus, and was formed when he was deposed (6 AD). Speaking roughly, it took in the southern half of Pal, including Samaria. Being an imperial province (i.e. under the direct control of the emperor), it was governed by a procurator (see PROCURATOR; PROVINCE). The procurator was the personal servant of the emperor, directly responsible to him, and was primarily concerned with finance. But the powers of procurators varied according to the appointment of the emperor. Pilate was a procurator cum potestate, i.e. he possessed civil, military, and criminal jurisdiction. The procurator of Judaea was in some way subordinate to the legate of Syria, but the exact character of the subordination is not known. As a rule a procurator must be of equestrian rank and a man of certain military experience. Under his rule, the Jews were allowed as much self-government as was consistent with the maintenance of imperial authority. The Sanhedrin was allowed to exercise judicial functions, but if they desired to inflict the penalty of death, the sentence had to be confirmed by the procurator.

We have no certain knowledge of Pilate except in connection with his time of rule in Judaea. We

2. Pilate's know nothing of his birth, his origin, or his earlier years. Tacitus, when speaking of the cruel punishments inflicted by Nero upon the Christians, tells us that Christ, from whom the name

Procurator-ship "Christian" was derived, was put to death when Tiberius was emperor by the procurator Pontius Pilate (Annals xv.44). Apart from this reference and what is told us in the NT, all our knowledge of him is derived from two Jewish writers, Jos the historian and Philo of Alexandria.

Pilate was procurator of Judaea, in succession to Gratus, and he held office for 10 years. Jos tells (Ant, XVIII, iv, 2) that he ruled for 10 years; that he was removed from office by Vitellius, the legate of Syria, and traveled in haste to Rome to defend himself before Tiberius against certain complaints. Before he reached Rome the emperor had passed away. Jos adds that Vitellius came in the year 36 AD to Judaea to be present at Jerus at the time of the Passover. It has been assumed by most authorities (so HDB and EB) that Pilate had departed before this visit of Vitellius. They accordingly date the procuratorship of Pilate as lasting from 26 to 36 AD. As against this view, von Dobschütz points out (RE s.v. "Pilate") that by this reckoning Pilate must have taken at least a year to get to Rome; for Tiberius died on March 16, 37 AD. Such delay is inconceivable in view of the circumstances; hence von Dobschütz rightly dates the period of his procuratorship 27-37 AD. The procurator of Judaea had no easy task, nor did Pilate make the task easier by his actions. He was not careful to conciliate the religious prejudices of the Jews, and at times this attitude of his led to violent collisions between ruler and ruled.

On one occasion, when the soldiers under his command came to Jerus, he caused them to bring with them their ensigns, upon which were the usual images of the emperor. The ensigns were brought in privily by night, but their presence was soon discovered. Immediately multitudes of excited Jews hastened to Caesarea to petition him for the removal of the obnoxious ensigns. For five days he refused to hear them, but on the sixth he took his place on the judgment seat, and when the Jews were admitted he had them surrounded with soldiers and threatened them with instant death unless they ceased to trouble him with the matter. The Jews thereupon flung themselves on the ground and bared their necks, declaring that they preferred death to the violation of their laws. Pilate, unwilling to slay so many, yielded the point and removed the ensigns (Jos, Ant, XVIII, iii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 2, 3).

At another time he used the sacred treasure of the temple, called corban (korban), to pay for bringing water into Jerus by an aqueduct. A crowd came together and clamored against him; but he had caused soldiers dressed as civilians to mingle with the multitude, and at a given signal they fell upon the rioters and beat them so severely with staves that the riot was quelled (Jos, Ant, XVIII, iii, 2; BJ, II, ix, 4).

Philo tells us (Legatio ad Caium, xxxviii) that on another occasion he dedicated some gilt shields in the palace of Herod in honor of the emperor. On these shields there was no representation of any forbidden thing, but simply an inscription of the name of the donor and of him in whose honor they were set up. The Jews petitioned him to have them removed; when he refused, they appealed to Tiberius, who sent an order that they should be removed to Caesarea.

Of the incident, mentioned in Lk 13 1, of the Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices, nothing further is known.

Jos (Ant, XVIII, iv, 1, 2) gives an account of the incident which led to Pilate's downfall. A religious pretender arose in Samaria who promised the Samaritans that if they would assemble at Mt. Gerizim, he would show them the sacred vessels which Moses had hidden there. A great multitude assembled in readiness to ascend the mountain, but before they could accomplish their aim they were attacked by Pilate's cavalry, and many of them were slain. The Samaritans thereupon sent an embassy to Vitellius, the legate of Syria, to accuse Pilate of the murder of those who had been slain. Vitellius, who desired to stand well with the Jews, deposed Pilate from office, appointed Marcellus in his place, and ordered Pilate to go to Rome and answer the charges made against him before the emperor. Pilate set out for Rome, but, before he could reach it, Tiberius had died; and it is probable that, in the confusion which followed, Pilate escaped the inquisition with which he was threatened. From this point onward history knows nothing more of Pilate.

The shortest and simplest account of Pilate's dealings with Jesus Christ is given in the Gospel of Mk.

There we are told that Jesus was delivered to Pilate; that Pilate asked Him if He was the king of the Jews, receiving an affirmative answer; that, to Pilate's surprise, Jesus answered nothing to the accusations of the chief priests; that Pilate tried to release Jesus according to an ancient custom; that the multitude, in spite of the protest of Pilate, demanded the release of Barabbas, and cried out that Jesus should be crucified; that Pilate scourged Jesus and delivered Him to be crucified; and that Jesus, when He had been scourged and mocked, was led away to be crucified. Mk tells further how Joseph of Arimathaea begged of Pilate the body of Jesus. Pilate was surprised that Jesus died so quickly, and questioned the centurion about it. Pilate's surprise and question are peculiar to Mk. Being satisfied on this point, Pilate granted the body to Joseph. Mt adds the dream and message of Pilate's wife (27 19); it also tells how Pilate washed his hands before the people, disclaiming responsibility for the death of Jesus, and how the people accepted the responsibility (27 24 f); also how Pilate granted a guard for the tomb (27 62-66). Lk alone narrates the sending of Jesus to Herod (23 6-12), and reports Pilate's three times repeated asseveration that he found no fault in Jesus (23 4, 14, 22). Jn gives by far the fullest narrative, which forms a framework into which the more fragmentary accounts of the Synoptics can be fitted with perfect ease. Some critics, holding that Mk alone is trustworthy, dismiss the additional incidents given in Mt and Lk as apologetic amplifications; and many dismiss the narrative of Jn as wholly unworthy of credence. Such theories are based on preconceived opinions as to the date, authorship and reliability of the various Gospels. The reader who holds all the Gospels to be, in the main, authentic and trustworthy narratives will have no difficulty in perceiving that all four narratives, when taken together, present a story consistent in all its details and free from all difficulty.

See GOSPELS. It should be noted that John evidently had special opportunities of obtaining exacter knowledge than that possessed by the others, as he was present at every stage of the trial; and that his narrative makes clear what is obscure in the accounts of the Synoptics.

The parts may be fitted together thus: Jesus is brought to Pilate (Mt 27 2; Mk 15 1; Lk 23 1; Jn 18 28). Pilate asks for a specific accusation (Jn 18 29-32). Pilate enters the praetorium, questions Jesus about His alleged kingship, and receives the answer that He rules over the kingdom of truth, and over the hearts of men who acknowledge the truth. Pilate asks: "What is truth?" (reported briefly in Mt 27 11; Mk 15 2; Lk 23 3, and with more detail in Lk 13 33-38). Pilate brings Him forth (this is the only detail that needs to be supplied in order to make the harmony complete, and in itself it is probable enough), and many accusations are made against Him, to which, to Pilate's surprise, He makes no reply (Mt 27 12-14; Mk 15 3-5). Pilate affirms His innocence, but the charges are repeated (Lk 23 4 f). Pilate sends Him to Herod, who in mockery clothes Him in shining raiment, and sends Him back (Lk 23 6-12). Pilate declares that neither Herod or himself can find any fault in Him, and offers to scourge Him and let Him go (Lk 23 13-16; Jn 18 38b). Pilate offers to release Jesus in accordance with an ancient custom (Mt 27 15-18; Mk 15 6-10; Jn 18 39). Pilate's wife sends him a message warning him not to harm Jesus because she has suffered many things in a dream because of Him (Mt 27 19). The people, persuaded thereto by the chief priests and elders, choose Barabbas, and, in spite of the repeated protests of Pilate, demand that Jesus shall be crucified (Mt 27 20-23; Mk 15 11-14; Lk 23 18-23; Jn 18 40). Pilate washes his hands before the people, and they take the guilt of the deed upon themselves and their children (Mt 27 24 f). Pilate releases Barabbas and orders Jesus to be scourged (Mt 27 26; Mk 15 15; Lk 23 24 f). Jesus is scourged and mocked, buffeted and spit upon (Mt 27 27-31a; Mk 15 16-20a; Jn 19 1-3). Pilate again declares the innocence of Jesus, brings Him out, and says: "Behold the man!" The chief priests and officers cry out: "Crucify him!" They accuse Him of making Himself the Son of God. Pilate, becoming more afraid at this saying, once more interviews the prisoner in the praetorium. He again tries to release Him, but is accused of treachery to the emperor. Overborne by this, Pilate sits on the judgment seat (see ГАВВАТНА), and says: "Behold, your King!" Again the cry goes up: "Away with him, crucify him!" Pilate says: "Shall I crucify your King?" The chief priests answered with a final renunciation of all that God had given them, saying: "We have no king but Caesar" (Jn 19 4-15). Pilate sentences Jesus and gives Him up to be crucified, and He is led away (Mt 27 31b; Mk 15 20b; Lk 23 26a; Jn 19 16). Pilate writes a title for the cross, and refuses to alter it (Jn 19 19-22). The Jews ask of Pilate that the legs of the three who were crucified might be broken (Jn 19 31). Joseph of Arimathaea begs the body of Jesus from Pilate (Mt 27 57, 58a; Mk 15 42 f; Lk 23 50-52; Jn 19 38a). Pilate is surprised that Jesus has died so soon, and questions the centurion (Mk 15 44). He gives up to Joseph the body of Jesus (Mt 27 58b; Mk 15 45; Jn 19 38b). The chief priests and the Pharisees obtain permission from Pilate to take precautions against any theft of the body of Jesus (Mt 27 62-66).

Pilate is mentioned three times in Acts: in a speech of Peter (3 13), in a thanksgiving of the church (4 27), and in a speech of Paul (13 28). He is also mentioned in 1 Tim (6 13) as the one before whom Christ Jesus witnessed the good confession.

Eusebius, who lived in the 4th cent., tells us (HE, II) on the authority of certain Gr historians that Pilate fell into such calamities

4. Pilate that he committed suicide. Various in Tradition apocryphal writings have come down and Legend to us, written from the 3d to the 5th cents., with others of a later date, in which legendary details are given about Pilate. In all these a favorable view is taken of his character; hence the Coptic church came to believe that he became a Christian, and enrolled him among the number of its saints. His wife, to whom tradition gives the name of Claudia Procula, or Procla, is said to have been a Jewish proselyte at the time of the death of Jesus, and afterward to have become a Christian. Her name is honored along with Pilate's in the Coptic church, and in the calendar of saints honored by the Gr church her name is found against the date October 27.

We find not unkindly references to Pilate in the recently discovered fragment of the Gospel of Peter, which was composed in the 2d cent. In the so-called Gospel of Nicodemus, which belongs to the 4th or 5th cent., we find in the first part, called the Acts of Pilate, a long account of the trial of Jesus. It tells how the standards in the hall of judgment bowed down before Jesus, in spite of the efforts of the standard-bearers, and others who attempted it, to hold them erect. It tells also how many of those who had been healed by Jesus bore testimony to Him at the trial (see APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS). There has also come down to us, in various forms (e.g. in the Acts of Peter and Paul), a letter, supposed to be the report of Pilate to Tiberius, narrating the proceedings of the trial, and speaking of Jesus in the highest terms of praise. Eusebius, when he mentions this letter, avers that Tiberius, on perusing it, was incensed against the Jews who had sought the death of Jesus (HE, II, 2). Elsewhere (HE, IX, 5) he recounts that under Maximin forged Acts of Pilate, containing blasphemies against Christ, were circulated with consent of the emperor. None of these, if they ever existed, have come down to us. In the Paradosis Pilati we read that Caesar, being angry with Pilate for what he had done, brought him to Rome as a prisoner, and examined him. When the Christ was named, all the gods in the senate-chamber fell down and were broken. Caesar ordered war to be made on the Jews, and Pilate, after praying to Jesus, was beheaded. The head was taken away by an angel, and Procla, seeing this, died of joy. Another narrative, of late date, recounts that Pilate, at his trial, wore the seamless robe of Jesus; for this reason Caesar, though filled with anger, could not so much as say a harsh word to Pilate; but when the robe was taken off, he condemned Pilate to death. On hearing this, Pilate committed suicide. The body was sunk in the Tiber, but such storms were raised by demons on account of this that it was taken up and sunk in the Rhone at Vienne. The same trouble recurred there, and the body was finally buried in the territory of Losania (Lausanne). Tradition connects Mt. Pilatus with his name, although it is probable that the derivation is from pilateus, i.e. the mountain with a cloud-cap.

Philo (Legatio ad Caium, xxxviii) speaks of Pilate in terms of the severest condemnation. According to him, Pilate was a man of a very inflexible disposition, and very merciless as well as obstinate. Philo calls him a man of most ferocious passions, and speaks of his corruption, his acts of insolence, his rapine, his habit of insulting people, his cruelty, his continual murders of people untried and uncondemned, and his never-ending and most grievous inhumanity. This is very highly colored and probably much exaggerated; certainly the instances given do not bear out this description of the man. Much of what he says of Pilate is in direct opposition to what we learn of him in the Gospels. There he appears to us as a man who, in spite of many undoubted faults, tries hard to conduct the trial with fairness. Pilate had the ethics of his class, and obviously tried to act up to the standard which he had formed. There was in him, however, no deep moral basis of character, as is shown by the utter skepticism of his question, "What is truth?" When he found that the doing of strict justice threatened to endanger his position, he reluctantly and with a great deal of shame gave way to the demands of the Jews. He sent Jesus to the cross, but not before he had exhausted every expedient for saving Him, except the simple and straightforward one of dismissing the case. He had the haughtiness of the dominant race, and a profound contempt for the people over which he ruled. This contempt, as we have seen, continually brought him into trouble. He felt deeply humiliated at having to give way to those whom he utterly despised, and, in the manner of a small mind, revenged himself on them by calling Christ their king, and by refusing to alter the mocking inscription on the cross. It is certain that Pilate, in condemning Jesus, acted, and knew that he acted against his conscience. He knew what was right, but for selfish and cowardly reasons refused to do it. He was faced by a great moral emergency, and he failed. We rest on the judgment of Our Lord, that he was guilty, but not so guilty as the leaders of the chosen people.

PILDASH, pil'dash (פִּלְדָּשׁ, pildāsh, "steely"): Nephew of Abram (Gen 22 22).

PILE, pil (מְדִינָה, m'dhūrāh, from dūr, "heap up"): Isa 30 33, "The pile thereof is fire and much wood"; Ezk 24 9.10, "I also will make the pile great. Heap on the wood, make the fire hot." Isa 30 33 may be paraphrased, 'the pyre thereof is of much wood, burning fiercely.' See TOPHETH.

PILEHA, pil'ë-hä, pi'lë-hä. See PILHA.

PILGRIM, pil'grim, PILGRIMAGE, pil'grim-āj; "Pilgrim" in EV for παρεπίδημος, parepídemos (He 11 13; 1 Pet 2 11). "Pilgrimage" for מְגִוָּר, māghōr (Gen 47 9 [RVm "sojournings"]; Ps 119 54; and [AV] Ex 6 4 [RV "sojournings"]). Both the Heb (see GER) and Gr words contain the idea of foreign residence, but it is the residence and not travel that is implied. Consequently "pilgrim" is a poor tr, and "sojourner," "sojourning" should have been used throughout. In the NT passages heaven is thought of as the contrasted permanent dwelling-place, while the OT usages seem to be without a contrast definitely in mind.

PILHA, pil'hä (פִּלְחָה, pilhā, "ploughman"; AV Pileha): One of those who signed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh 10 24).

PILL. See PEEL.

PILLAR, pil'ar (מַצֵּבָה, maṣṣēbhāh, עַמּוּד, am-mūdh; στήλος, stīlos): In a good many cases RV substitutes "pillars" for AV "images" (maṣṣēbhōth, Ex 34 13; Dt 7 5; 1 K 14 23, etc.). In Gen 19 26, where "pillar of salt" is given, the word is n'ṣibh; in 1 S 2 8 it is māṣūk; while in most other single uses RVm gives variant renderings, as in Jgs 9 6 (muṣṣābh), RVm "garrison"; in 1 K 10 12 (miṣ'ād), RVm "'a railing," Heb 'a prop'; in 2 K 18 16 ('ōm'nōth), RVm "doorposts." The maṣṣēbhōth were (1) memorial pillars, as in the "pillars" of Jacob at Bethel (Gen 28 18.22; cf 31 13; 35 14), in covenant with Laban (31 45 ff), at Rachel's grave (35 20); Absalom's pillar (2 S 18 18). Such pillars were legitimate (the theory of a fetishistic character is ungrounded); it is predicted in Isa 19 that such a pillar would be set up to Jeh at the border of Egypt. (2) Idolatrous pillars, in Canaanitish and other heathen worship. These were to be ruthlessly broken down (AV "images," see above; Ex 23 24; 34 13; Dt 7 5, etc; cf Lev 26 1). See IMAGES. The other word, 'ammūdh, is used of the pillar of cloud and fire (see below); of the pillars of the tabernacle and temple (see s.v.); of the two pillars JACHIN AND BOAZ (q.v.); poetically of the "pillars" of heaven, of earth (Job 9 6; 26 11; Ps 75 3; 99 7), etc. In the few instances of the word in the NT, the use is figurative. James, Cephas and John "were reputed to be pillars" of the church at Jerus (Gal 2 9); the church is "the pillar and ground of the truth" (1 Tim 3 15); he that overcomes is made "a pillar" in the temple of God (Rev 3 12); a strong angel had feet "as pillars of fire" (10 1).

Pillar of Cloud and Fire. The visible manifestation of the Divine presence in the journeyings of Israel at the time of the Exodus. Jeh, it is narrated, went before the people "by day in a pillar of cloud, to lead them the way, and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light. . . . The pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, departed not from before the people" (Ex 13 21,22; cf 14 19,24; Nu 14 14). When the congregation was at rest, the cloud abode over the tabernacle (Ex 40 36; Nu 9 17; 14 14). When Jeh wished to communicate His will to Moses, the pillar descended to the door of the Tent of Meeting (Ex 33 9-11; Nu 12 5; Dt 31 15). These descriptions are not to be rationalistically explained; what is depicted is a true theophany. Criticism has sought to establish discrepancies between the allusions to the cloud in the JE and the P parts of the narrative, but these are not made out without straining; e.g. it is not the case that JE alone represents Jeh as speaking with Moses in the cloud at the door of the tabernacle. The same representation is found in Ex 29 42,43, ascribed to P. An acute discussion of the alleged discrepancies may be seen in H. M. Wiener, Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, 82 ff.

PILTAL, pil'ti, pil-tā'i (פִּלְטָאִי, piltāy, probably "Jeh delivers"): One of the priests, described as "the chiefs of the fathers," in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12 17).

PIN (פִּי, yāthēdh, from yāthadh, "to drive in a peg" [?]): A cylindrical piece of wood or metal (e.g. brass, Ex 27 19) such as that used by weavers in beating up the woof in the loom (Jgs 16 14, where Delilah fastened Samson's hair with the "pin"); or as a peg for hanging (Ezk 15 3; cf Isa 22 23 f; Ezr 9 8); or as a tent-pin, such as those used in the tabernacle (Ex 27 19; 35 18; 38 20. 31; 39 40; Nu 3 37; 4 32; Jgs 4 21, where AV translates "nail," RV "tent-pin"; cf 5 26, where Heb has the same word, EV "nail"). The tent-pin, like that of today, was probably sharpened at one end (Jgs 4 21) and so shaped at the other as to permit the attaching of the cords so frequently mentioned in the same connection (Ex 35 18; 39 40; Nu 3 37; 4 32; cf Isa 33 20). From the acts of driving in the tent-pin (tāka') and pulling it out (nāsā') are derived the technical Heb terms for pitching a tent and for breaking camp. See also CRISPING PIN (Isa 3 22, RV "satchels"); STAKE.

PINE, pīn. See PINING SICKNESS.

PINE TREE, pīn trē: (1) פִּינָה עֵץ, 'ēṣ shemen, tr^d RV "wild olive," AV "pine" (Neh 8 15); RV "oil-tree," m "oleaster" (Isa 41 19); "olive-wood" (1 K 6 23,31-33). See OIL TREE. (2) תִּדְהָר, tīdhār (Isa 41 19, m "plane"; 60 13); πεύκη, peūkē, "fir." Lagarde, from similarity of tīdhār to the Syr deddar, usually the "elm," considers this the best tr. Symmachus also tr^d tīdhār (Isa 41 19) by πτελέα, ptelēa, the "elm." The elm, Ulmus campe- tris, is rare in Pal and the Lebanon, though it is found today N. of Aleppo. Post (HDB, III, 592-93) considers that (1) should be tr^d as "pine," which he describes as a "fat wood tree"; it is perhaps as probably a correct tr for (2), but great uncertainty remains. Two species of pine are plentiful in the Pine Forest at Beirut.

Lebanon and flourish in most parts of Pal when given a chance. These are the stone pine, Pinus pinca, and the Aleppo pine, P. halepensis; all the highlands looking toward the sea are suited to their growth. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

PINING, pīn'ing, SICKNESS, sik'nes: In the account of the epileptic boy in Mk 9 18 it is said that "he pineth away." The vb. used here (ξηραίνω, xērainō) means "to dry up," and is the same which is used of the withering of plants, but seldom used in this metaphorical sense. The Eng. word is from the AS pinian and is often found in the Elizabethan literature, occurring 13 t in Shakespeare. In the OT it is found in Lev 26 39 (bis) and in Ezk 24 23 and 33 10. In RV it replaces "consume" in Ezk 4 17. In all these passages it is the rendering of the Heb mākak, and means expressly being wasted on account of sin. In Lev 26 16 "pine away" is used in RV to replace "cause sorrow of heart," and is the tr of the Heb dūbh; and in Dt 28 65 "sorrow of mind" is also replaced in RV by "pining of soul," the word so rendered being d'ābhōn, which in these two passages is expressive of homesickness. In Isa 24 16 the reduplicated exclamation, "my leanness," of AV is changed into "I pine away," the word being rāzī. The starving people in Lam 4 9 are said to pine away, the word so tr^d being zūbh. All these Heb words have a general meaning of to dry or to waste or wear away, or to be exhausted by morbid discharges.

Pining sickness in Isa 38 12 AV is a mistranslation, the word so rendered, dallāh, meaning here the thrum by which the web is tied to the loom. The figure in the verse is that Hezekiah's life is being removed from the earth by his sickness as the web is removed from the loom by having the thrums cut, and being then rolled up. Both AVm and RVm have the correct reading, "from the thrum." LXX has ἐπιθου ἐργιζούσης ἐκτεμῆν, erithou eggizousēs ektemēn, and Vulg dum adhuc ordiret, succidit me. The other reading is due to another interpretation of the word which in a few passages, as Jer 52 15, like its √ dal, means something small, poor, and decaying or weak, such as the lean king of Pharaoh's dream (Gen 41 19).

ALEX. MACALISTER

PINION, pin'yun (פִּינְיוֹן, 'ebher, פִּינְיָה, 'ebhrāh): RV has tr^d these Heb words uniformly by "pinion," where AV uses either "wing" or "feathers," with which words they stand in parallelism in all passages. The shorter Heb word is found only once, in Jeh's parable to Ezekiel: "A great eagle with great wings and long pinions [AV 'longwinged'], full of feathers, which had divers colors, came unto Lebanon, and took the top of the cedar" (Ezk 17 3). The fem. form ('ebhrāh) is used of the wings of the dove (Ps 68 13), of the ostrich (Job 39 13) and of the eagle (Dt 32 11). Once (Ps 91 4) it stands in a figurative expression for the protective care of Jeh, which is bestowed on those that trust in Him.

H. L. E. LUERING

PINNACLE, pin'a-k'l (πτερύγιον, pterūgion [Mt 4 5; Lk 4 9, RVm "wing"]): "The pinnacle of the temple" is named as the place to which the devil took Jesus, and there tempted Him to cast Himself down. It is not known what precise elevated spot is meant, whether a part of the roof of the temple itself, or some high point in the adjacent buildings overlooking the deep ravine. It was more probably the latter.

PINON, pi'non (פִּינֹן, pīnōn, "darkness"): One of the "chiefs of Edom" (Gen 36 41; 1 Ch 1 52).

PIPE, pīp. See CANDLESTICK; LAMP; MUSIC.

PIRA, pi'ra (οἱ ἐκ Πειράς, hoi ek Peirás [1 Esd 5 19]): Thought to be a repetition of CAPHIRA (q.v.) earlier in the verse.

PIRAM, pi'ram (פִּירָם, pīrām, "indomitable"): King of Jarmuth, one of the five Amorite kings who leagued themselves against Joshua's invasion (Josh 10 3 ff).

PIRATHON, pir'a-thon, PIRATHONITE, pir'a-thon-it (פִּירָתוֹן, pīr'āthōn, פִּירָתוֹנִי, pīr'āthōnī; B, Φαραθῶμ, Pharaohōm, A, Φρααθῶμ, Phraathōm, Φαραθουετης, Pharaohuētēs): The home of Abdon the son of Hillel the Pirathonite (Jgs 12 13 ff AV), where also he was buried, "in the land of Ephraim in the mount of the Amalekites." The latter name may have clung to a district which at some former time had been held by the Amalekites. From this town also came Benaiah, one of David's chief captains (2 S 23 30; 1 Ch 11 31; 27 14). It is probably to be identified with Fer'atā, about 6 miles S.W. of Nāblus. A possible rival is Fir'on, 15 miles W. of Nāblus. G. A. Smith suggests a position at the head of Wādy Far'ah (HGHL, 355). Moore thinks it may have been in Benjamin, Abdon being a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8 23.30; 9 36). It is just possible that the place may be identical with Pharaohon, one of the towns fortified by Bacchides (1 Macc 9 50).

PISGAH, pi'ga (פִּזְגָּה, ha-piṣgāh; Φασγά, Phasgá, τὸ λελαξευμένον, τό λελαξευμένον, ἡ λαξευτή, hē laxeuētē): This name, which has always the definite art., appears only in combination either with rō'sh, "head," "top," or 'ashdōth, not tr^d in AV save in Dt 4 49, where it is rendered "springs." RV uniformly "slopes," RVm "springs."

Pisgah is identified with Nebo in Dt 34 1; cf 3 27. "The top of Pisgah, which looketh down upon the desert" marks a stage in the march of the host of Israel (Nu 21 20). Hither Balak brought Balaam to the field of Zophim (23 14). Here Moses obtained his view of the Promised Land, and died. See NEBO. Many scholars (e.g. Buhl, GAP, 122; Gray, "Numbers," ICC, 291) take Pisgah as the name applying to the mountain range in which the Moab plateau terminates to the W., the "top" or "head" of Pisgah being the point in which the ridge running out westward from the main mass culminates. The summit commands a wide view, and looks down upon the desert. The identification is made surer by the name Tal'at eš-Šufa found here, which seems to correspond with the field of Zophim.

'Ashdōth is the constr. pl. of 'ashēdhāh (sing. form not found), from 'eshedh, "foundation," "bottom," "lower part" (slope); cf Assy ishdu, "foundation." Some would derive it from Aram. 'ashadh, "to pour," whence "fall" or "slope" (OHL, s.v.). Ashdōth-pisgah overlooked the Dead Sea from the E. (Dt 3 17; 4 49; Josh 12 3; 13 20). There can be no reasonable doubt that Ashdōth-pisgah signifies the steep slopes of the mountain descending into the contiguous valleys.

It is worthy of note that LXX does not uniformly render Pisgah by a proper name, but sometimes by a derivative of laxeuō, "to hew" or "to dress stone" (Nu 21 20; 23 14; Dt 3 27; 4 49). Jerome (Onom, s.v. Asedoth) gives abscisum as the Lat equivalent of Fasga. He derives Pisgah from pāsagh, which, in new Heb, means "to split," "to cut off." This suggests a mountain the steep sides of which give it the appearance of having been "cut out." This description applies perfectly to Jebel Nebā as viewed from the Dead Sea.
W. EWING

PISHON, pi'shon (פִּישׁוֹן, pīshōn; AV Pison, pi'son): A river of EDEN (q.v.), said to compass the whole land of Havilah where there is gold, bdellium and onyx stone (Gen 2 11), most probably identified with the Karun River which comes down from the mountains of Media and formerly emptied into the Pers Gulf.

PISIDIA, pi-sid'i-a (τῆν Πισιδίαν, tēn Pisidian [Acts 14 24]; in Acts 13 14, Ἄντιόχειαν τὴν Πισιδίαν, Antiōcheian tēn Pisidian, "the Pisidian Antioch," the other MSS, Ἀντιόχειαν τῆς Πισιδίας, Antiōcheian tēs Pīsidias, "Antioch of Pisidia." The former, but not the latter, reading correctly describes the condition of affairs at the time when St. Paul traveled in the country; see below):

Pisidia, as a strict geographical term, was the name given to the huge block of mountain country stretching northward from the Taurus

1. Situation range where the latter overlooked the and History Pamphylian coast land, to the valleys which connected Apeamea with Antioch, and Antioch with Iconium. It was bounded by Lycia on the W., by the Phrygian country on the N., and by Isauria on the E.; but there is no natural boundary between Pisidia and Isauria, and the frontier was never strictly drawn. The name is used in its geographical sense in the Anabasis of Xenophon, who informs us that the Pisidians were independent of the king of Persia at the end of the 5th cent. BC. Alexander the Great had difficulty in reducing the Pisidian cities, and throughout ancient history we find the Pisidian mountains described as the home of a turbulent and warlike people, given to robbery and pillage. The task of subjugating them was intrusted by the Romans to the Galatian king Amyntas, and, at his death in 25 BC, Pisidia passed with the rest of his possessions into the Rom province Galatia. Augustus now took seriously in hand the pacification of Pisidia and the Isaurian mountains on the E. Five military colonies were founded in Pisidia and the eastern mountains—Cremna, Comama, Oibasa, Parlais and Lystra—and all were connected by military roads with the main garrison city Antioch, which lay in Galatian Phrygia, near the northern border of Pisidia. An inscription discovered in 1912 shows that Quirinius, who is mentioned in Lk 2 2 as governor of Syria in the year of Christ's birth, was an honorary magistrate of the colony of Antioch; his connection with Antioch dates from his campaign against the Homonades—who had resisted and killed Amyntas—about 8 BC (see Ramsay in Expos, November, 1912, 385 ff, 406). The military system set up in Pisidia was based on that of Antioch, and from this fact, and from its proximity to Pisidia, Antioch derived its title "the Pisidian," which served to distinguish it from the other cities called Antioch. It is by a mistake arising from confusion with a later political arrangement that Antioch is designated "of Pisidia" in the majority of the MSS.

Pisidia remained part of the province Galatia till 74 AD, when the greater (southern) part of it was assigned to the new double province Lycia-Pamphylia, and the cities in this portion of Pisidia now ranked as Pamphylian. The northern part of Pisidia continued to belong to Galatia, until, in the time of Diocletian, the southern part of the province Galatia (including the cities of Antioch and Iconium), with parts of Lyaonia and Asia, were formed into a province called Pisidia, with Antioch as capital. Antioch was now for the first time correctly described as a city "of Pisidia," although there is reason to believe that the term "Pisidia" had already been extended northward in popular usage to include part at least of the Phrygian region of Galatia. This perhaps explains the reading "Antioch of Pisidia" in the Codex Bezae, whose readings usually reflect the conditions of the 2d cent. of our era in Asia Minor. This use of the term was of course political and administrative; Antioch continued to be a city of Phrygia in the ethnical sense and a recently discovered inscription proves that the Phrygian language was spoken in the neighborhood of Antioch as late as the 3d cent. of our era (see also Calder in Journal of Rom Studies, 1912, 84).

St. Paul crossed Pisidia on the journey from Perga to Antioch referred to in Acts 13 14, and again on the return journey, Acts 14 24. Of 2. St. Paul those journeys no details are recorded in Acts, but it has been suggested by Conybeare and Howson that the "perils of rivers" and "perils of robbers" mentioned by St. Paul in 2 Cor 11 26 refer to his journeys across Pisidia, and Ramsay has pointed out in confirmation of this view that a considerable number of Pisidian inscriptions refer to the armed policemen and soldiers who kept the peace in this region, while others refer to a conflict with robbers, or to an escape from drowning in a river (The Church in the Rom Empire, 23 f; cf Journal of Rom Studies, 1912, 82 f). Adada, a city on St. Paul's route from Perga to Antioch, is called by the Turks Kara Baulo; "Baulo" is the Turkish pronunciation of "Paulos," and the name is doubtless reminiscent of an early tradition connecting the city with St. Paul. Pisidia had remained unaffected by Hellenic civilization, and the Rom occupation at the time of St. Paul was purely military. It is therefore unlikely that St. Paul preached in Pisidia. Except on the extreme N.W., none of the Christian inscriptions of Pisidia—in glaring contrast with those of Phrygia—date before the legal recognition of Christianity under Constantine.

PISON, pi'son. See PISHON.

PISPA, pi'spä (פִּסְפָּה, pispa', "dispersion," AV Pispah): A son of Jether, an Asherite (1 Ch 7 38).

PIT: The word translates different Heb words of which the most important are: (1) בֹּרַר, bōr, "pit" or "cistern," made by digging (Gen 37 20); hence "dungeon" (Jer 38 6, m "pit"); (2) בְּאֵר, bē'er, "pit" or "well" made by digging (Gen 21 25); (3) שְׂאֵל, sh'e'āl, generally rendered "hell" in AV (see HELL); (4) שְׁחַת, shahath, a pit in the ground to catch wild animals. (1), (2) and (4) above are used metaphorically of the pit of the "grave" or of "sheol" (Ps 28 1; 30 3; Job 33 24). AV sometimes incorrectly renders (4) by "corruption." (5) פְּהַת, pahath, "pit," literally (2 S 17 9), and figuratively (Jer 48 43). In the NT "pit" renders βόθυρος, bóthuros (Mt 15 14), which means any kind of hole in the ground. In the corresponding passage Lk (14 5 AV) has φρέαρ, phréar, "well," the same as (2) above. For "bottomless pit" (Rev 9 1, AV, etc) see ABYSS. T. LEWIS

PITCH, pich: The tr of the noun כִּפָּר, kōpher, and the vb. כִּפַּר, kāphar, in Gen 6 14 and of the noun זֶפֶת, zepheth, in Ex 2 3; Isa 34 9. In Gen 6 14 the words are the ordinary forms for "covering," "cover," so that the tr "pitch" is largely guesswork, aided by the LXX, which reads ἀσφαλτος, ásphaltos, "bitumen," here, and by the fact that pitch is a usual "covering" for vessels. The meaning of zepheth, however, is fixed by the obvious Dead Sea imagery of Isa 34 9-15—the streams and land of Edom are to become burning bitumen, like the sites of Sodom and Gomorrah. In Ex 2 3 zepheth is combined with hēmār, which also means bitumen (Gen 14 10; see SLIME), and the distinction between the words (different consistencies of the same substance?) is not clear. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

PITCHER, pich'ēr (קַדַּח, kadh; κεράμιον, kerámion): The word is found chiefly in the OT in the story of Rebekah in Gen 24 13 ff; but Gideon's men also had their lamps in pitchers (Jgs 7 16.19). Ecel speaks of the pitcher broken at the fountain (12 6). The single use in the NT is in Mk 14 13 || Lk 22 10. The pitcher was an earthenware vessel (cf Lam 4 2, nēbhel), with one or two handles, used for carrying water, and commonly borne upon the head or shoulder (cf Gen 24).

PITHOM, pi'thom (פִּתּוֹם, pithōm; Παιθώ, Peithō [Ex 1 11]): Champollion (Gesenius, Lex., s.v.) considered this name to mean "a narrow place" in Coptic, but it is generally of Name explained to be the Egyp Pa-tum, or "city of the setting sun." It was one of the cities built by the Hebrews (see RAAMES), and according to Wessel was the Thoum of the Antonine Itinerary.

Brugsch (Hist Egypt, 1879, II, 343) says that it was identical with "Heracleopolis Parva, the capital of the Sethroitic nome in the age of the Greeks and Romans . . . half-way on the great road from Pelusium to Tanis (Zeon), and this indication given on the authority of the itineraries furnishes the sole means of fixing its position." This is, however, disputed. Tum was worshipped at Thebes, at Zeon, and probably at Bubastis, while Heliopolis (Brugsch, Geogr., I, 254) was also called Pa-tum.

There were apparently several places of the name; and Herodotus (ii.158) says that the Canal of Darius began a little above Bubastis, "near the Arabian city Patoumos," and reached the Red Sea.

(1) Dr. Naville's theory.—In 1885 Dr. E. Naville discovered a Rom milestone of Maximian and Severus, proving that the site of Heroopolis was at Tell el Mahātah ("the walled mound") in Wady Tumeildt. The modern name he gives as Tell el

Maskhātah, which was not that heard by the present writer in 1882. This identification had long been supposed probable. Excavations at

2. Situation the site laid bare strong walls and texts showing the worship of Tum. None was found to be older than the time of Rameses II—who, however, is well known to have defaced older inscriptions, and to have substituted his own name for that of earlier builders. A statue of later date, bearing the title “Recorder of Pithom,” was also found at this same site. Dr. Naville concluded that this city must be the OT Pithom, and the region round it Succoth—the Egypt T-k-u (but see SUCCOTH). Brugsch, on the other hand, says that the old name of Heroopolis was Kes (see GOSHEN), which recalls the identification of the LXX (Gen 46 28); and elsewhere (following Lepsius) he regards the same site as being “the Pa-Khetam of Rameses II” (see ETHAM, which Lepsius believed to be the OT Rameses (see RAAMES) mentioned with Pithom (Brugsch, Geogr., I, 302, 262). St. Silvia in 385 AD was shown the site of Pithom near Heroopolis, but farther E., and she distinguishes the two; but in her time, though Heroopolis was a village, the site of Pithom was probably conjectural. In the time of Minepthah, son of Rameses II (Brugsch, Hist., II, 128), we have a report that certain nomads from Aduma (or Edom) passed through “the Khetam [or fort] of Minepthah-Hotephima, which is situated in T-k-u, to the lakes [or canals] of the city Pi-tum of Minepthah-Hotephima, which are situated in the land of T-k-u, in order to feed themselves and to feed their herds.”

(2) Patoumos of Herodotus.—These places seem to have been on the eastern border of Egypt, but may have been close to the Bitter Lakes or farther N. (see SUCCOTH), whereas Tell el Mahūtāh is about 12 miles W. of Ism'ailīeh, and of Lake Timsah. The definition of the Pithom thus noticed as being that of Minepthah suggests that there was more than one place so called, and the Patoumos of Herodotus seems to have been about 30 miles farther W. (near Zagazig and Bubastis) than the site of Heroopolis, which the LXX identifies with Goshen and not with Pithom. The latter is not noticed as on the route of the Exodus, and is not identified in the OT with Succoth. In the present state of our knowledge of Egypt topography, the popular impression that the Exodus must have happened in the time of Minepthah, because Pithom was at Heroopolis and was not built till the time of Rameses II, must be regarded as very hazardous. See EXODUS. The Patoumos of Herodotus may well have been the site, and may still be discovered near the head of Wādī Tumeilāt or near Bubastis.

PITHON, pī'thon (פִּיתוֹן, pīthōn): A grandson of Meribbaal, or Mephibosheth (1 Ch 8 35; 9 41).

PITIFUL, pit'i-fōōl: As found in Scripture, means “full of pity”; it is expressed by רַחֲמָנִי, rahāmānī, from rahāmīm (pl. of rahām), “bowels,” “compassion” (Lam 4 10 AV, its only occurrence in the OT), “The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children.” In Jas 5 11, we have the beautiful saying, “The Lord is very pitiful [RV “full of pity”] and of tender mercy,” where “very pitiful” is the tr of polüsplagechnos, lit. “of many bowels,” a word which does not occur elsewhere; it might be tr’d “large-hearted” or “tender-hearted.” In Ecclus 2 11, we have “The Lord is . . . very pitiful” (oiktürmōn); eüsplagechnos, “well-hearted,” “compassionate,” “full of pity,” occurs in 1 Pet 3 8, “Love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous,” RV “loving as brethren, tenderhearted, humble-minded.” The word is found in Pr Man 7; XII P, Zeb 8 2.

PITY, pit'i (חַמָּל, hāmāl, חַסָּד, hās; ἐλεέω, eleēō): “Pity,” probably contracted from “piety,” is a tender feeling for others in misery or distress. It is allied to compassion (q.v.), but differs in respect of the object that causes the distress (or feeling). The feeling of pity is excited chiefly by the weakness, miserable or degraded condition of the object; compassion by his uncontrollable and inevitable misfortunes: “We pity a man of weak understanding who exposes his weakness; we compassionate the man who is reduced to a state of beggary and want” (Crabb, English Synonymes). Pity often becomes allied to contempt; “a pity” is something to be regretted. See PITIFUL. In the OT “pity” is closely akin to “mercy.” It is most frequently the tr of hāmāl, “to pity,” “to spare,” e.g. in Nathan’s parable of the poor man’s one lamb, it is said that the rich man was worthy to die because he had “no pity” (2 S 12 6).

In Jer 13 14 we have, “I will not pity nor spare, nor have mercy,” RV “compassion”; cf 21 7; Lam 2 2; Ezk 5 11; 7 4, in all of which passages “pity” stands in a negative connection; we have it positively attributed to God in Ezk 36 21, “I had pity for mine holy name.” RV “regard”; Joel 2 18, hās, probably meaning, primarily, “to cover,” “protect”; hence “to pity, to spare, is tr’d “pity” (Dt 7 16; 13 8; Ezk 16 5, etc. all negative; Jon 4 10, positive: “Thou hast had pity on the gourd [RV “regard for”] and should not I spare [RV “have regard for”] Nineveh, etc.); hānan, “to incline toward,” “be gracious,” “pity,” is thrice rendered “pity” (Job 19 21, “Have pity upon me, have pity upon me”; Prov 19 17; 28 8, “he that hath pity upon the poor”); rahām, “to feel warm,” “to love,” twice (Ps 103 13, “like as a father pitieih his children”; Isa 13 18, “no pity”); once in pl. rahāmīm (Am 1 11); other words once so tr’d are hemlāl, “pity” (Isa 63 9); hesedh, “loving-kindness” (Job 6 14, RV “kindness”); māh-māl, “object of pity” (Ezk 24 21); nūdh, “to move,” “bemoan” (Ps 69 20). In the NT “pity” occurs once only as the tr of eleēō, “to be kind,” “tender” (Mt 18 33, RV “mercy”). In 2 Macc 3 21 we have (AV and RV) “pitied” in the obsolete sense of exciting pity, “Then it would have pitied [eleēōn] a man to see the multitude,” etc.

RV has “pity” for “mercy” (Prov 14 21); “have pity on” for “spare” (Ps 72 13); for “favour” (Ps 109 12; 102 13, 14), “Have pity upon her dust.” See MERCY; COMPASSION.

PLACE, plās: Normally for מְקוֹם, mākōm, OT, and τόπος, tōpos, NT, but in AV “place” represents a great number of Heb and Gr words, often used with no difference in force (e.g. 2 Ch 35 10, 15). RV has made few changes, but occasionally has attempted to specialize the meaning (Gen 40 13; Job 37 8; Acts 8 32; Jas 3 11, etc).

PLACE, BROAD; HIGH. See CITY, II, 3, 2; HIGH PLACE; OPEN PLACE.

PLAGUE, plāg (נֶגַף, neghā; מַכָּה, makkāh, מַגְפָּה, maggēphāh; μάστιξ, mástix, πλῆγη, plēgē): This word which occurs more than 120 t is applied, like pestilence, to such sudden outbursts of disease as are regarded in the light of Divine visitations. It is used in the description of leprosy about 60 t in Lev 13 and 14, as well as in Dt 24 8. In the poetical, prophetic and eschatological books it occurs about 20 t in the general sense of a punitive disaster. The Gospel references (Mk 3 10; 5 29, 34; Lk 7 21) use the word as a synonym for disease.

The specific disease now named “plague” has been from the earliest historic times a frequent visitant to Pal and Egypt. Indeed in the S.E. between Gaza and Bubastis it has occurred so frequently that it may almost be regarded as endemic. The suddenness of its attack, the shortness of its incubation period and the rapidity of its course give it the characters which of old have been associated with manifestations of Divine anger. In the early days of an epidemic it is no infrequent occurrence that 60 per cent of those attacked die within three days. I have seen a case in which death took place ten hours after the first symptoms. In the filthy and insanitary houses of eastern towns, the disease spreads rapidly. In a recent epidemic in one village of 534 inhabitants 311 died within 21 days, and I once crossed the track of a party of pilgrims to Mecca of whom two-thirds died of plague on the road. Even with modern sanitary activity, it is very difficult to root it out, as our recent experiences in Hong Kong and India have shown.

Of the Bib. outbreaks that were not improbably bubonic plague, the first recorded is the slaughter of the firstborn in Egypt—the 10th plague. We have too little information to identify it (Ex 11 1). The Philis, however, used the same name, negha', for the Egypt plagues (1 S 4 8) as is used in Ex. The next outbreak was at Kibroth-hataavah (Nu 11 33). This was synchronous with the phenomenal flight of quails, and if these were, as is probable, driven by the wind from the plague-stricken Serbonian region, they were equally probably the carriers of the infection. Experience in both India and China has shown that animals of very diverse kinds can carry germs of the disease. A third visitation fell on the spies who brought back an evil report (Nu 14 37). A fourth destroyed those who murmured at the destruction of Korah and his fellow-rebels (Nu 16 47). These may have been recrudescences of the infection brought by the quails. The fifth outbreak was that which followed the gross religious and moral defection at Baal-peor (Nu 25 8,9,18; 26 1; 31 16; Josh 22 17; Ps 106 29,30). Here the disease was probably conveyed by the Moabites.

A later epidemic, which was probably of bubonic plague, was that which avenged the capture of the ark (1 S 5 6). We read of the tumors which were probably the glandular enlargements characteristic of this disease; also that at the time there was a plague of rats (6 5)—"mice," in our version, but the word is also used as the name of the rat. The cattle seem to have carried the plague to Beth-shemesh, as has been observed in more than one place in China (6 19). Concerning the three days' pestilence that followed David's census (2 S 24 15; 1 Ch 21 12), see Jos, Ant., VII, xiii, 3. The destruction of the army of Sennacherib may have been a sudden outbreak of plague (2 K 19 35; Isa 37 36). It is perhaps worthy of note that in Herodotus' account of the destruction of this army (ii.141) he refers to the incursion of swarms of mice.

One of the latest prophetic mentions of plague is Hos 13 14, where the plague (debher, LXX dikē) of death and the destruction (kātabh, LXX kéntron) of the grave are mentioned. From this passage Paul quotes his apostrophe at the end of 1 Cor 15 55, but the apostle correlates the sting (kéntron) with death, and changes the dikē into nikos.

LITERATURE

The Heb words are so used as to give the name "plagues" to all the "wonders" God did against Pharaoh. Thus it appears that the Introduction language in the account in Ex puts forward the wondrous character of these dealings of Jeh with Pharaoh. The account of the plagues is found in Ex 7 8—12 31; Ps 78 42-51; 105 27-36. These poetical accounts of the plagues have a devotional purpose and do not give a full historical narrative. Ps 78 omits plagues 4, 6, 9; Ps 105 omits plagues 5 and 6. Both pss change the order of the plagues. Account of the preparation which led up to the plagues is found in the narrative of the burning bush (see BURNING BUSH), the meeting of Aaron with Moses, the gathering together of the elders of Israel for instruction and the preliminary wonders before Pharaoh (Ex 3, 4). This preparation contemplated two things important to be kept in view in considering the plagues, namely, that the consummation of plagues was contemplated from the beginning (Ex 4 22,23), and that the skepticism of Israel concerning Moses' authority and power was likewise anticipated (Ex 4 1). It was thus manifestly not an age of miracles when the Israelites were expecting such "wonders" and ready to receive anything marvelous as a Divine interposition. This skepticism of Israel is a valuable asset for the credibility of the account of the "wonders." The immediate occasion of the plagues was the refusal of Pharaoh to let the people have liberty for sacrifice, together with the consequent hardening of Pharaoh's heart. No indication of any localizing of the plagues is given except in Ps 78 12,43, where the "field of Zoan" is mentioned as the scene of the contest between Jeh and the Egyptians. But this is poetry, and the "field of Zoan" means simply the territory of the great capital Zoan. This expression might be localized in the Delta or it might extend to the whole of Egypt. Discussion of the plagues has brought out various classifications of them, some of which are philosophical, as that of Philo, others fanciful, as that of Origen. Arrangements of the order of the plagues for the purpose of moralizing are entirely useless for historical consideration of the plagues. The only order of any real value is the order of Nature, i.e. the order in which the plagues occurred, which will be found to be the order of the natural phenomena which were the embodiment of the plagues.

Much elaborate effort has been made to derive from the description of the plagues evidence for different documents in the narrative. It is pointed out that Moses (E) declared to Pharaoh that he would smite the waters (Ex 7 17), and then the account, as it proceeds, tells us that Aaron smote the waters (7 19,20). But this is quite in accord with the preceding statement (4 16) that Aaron was to be the spokesman. Moses was to deal with God, Aaron with Pharaoh. Again it is noticed that some of the plagues are ascribed to the immediate agency of Jeh, some are represented as coming through the mediation of Moses, and still others through the mediation of Moses and Aaron. Certainly this may be an exact statement of facts, and, if the facts were just so, the record of the facts affords no evidence of different documents.

An examination of the account of the plagues as it stands will bring them before us in a most graphic and connected story.

I. The Natural Phenomena.—All the "wonders" represented anywhere in Scripture as done by the power of God are intimately associated with natural phenomena, and necessarily so. Human beings have no other way of perceiving external events than through those senses which only deal with natural phenomena. Accordingly, all theophanies and miraculous doings are embodied in natural events.

The presence of Jeh with the sacrifice by Abraham was manifested by the passing of a "smoking furnace and a burning lamp" between the pieces of the offerings (Gen 15 17 AV). The majesty and power of God at Sinai were manifested in the "cloud" and the "brightness," the "voice" and the "sound of a trumpet," (He 12 19). The Holy Spirit descended "as a dove" (Mt 3 16). The Deity of Jesus was attested on the mountain by a "voice" (17 5). Jesus Himself was "God . . . manifest in the flesh" (1 Tim 3 16 AV). He was "found in fashion as a man" (Phil 2 8). And all the miracles of Jesus were coupled with sensible phenomena: He spoke to the sea and it was calm; He touched the leper and he was clean; He called to Lazarus and he came forth.

Yet in all these natural events, the miraculous working of God was as clearly seen as the natural phenomena. It is thus to be expected that the "wonders" of God in the land of Pharaoh should also be associated with natural events as well as manifest miraculous elements. The "blood" in the river, the "frogs" hopping about on the land, the "lice," the "flies," the "murrain," the "boils," the "hail," the "locusts," the "darkness," and the "pestilence" are all named as natural phenomena. Long familiarity with the land of Egypt has made it perfectly plain to many intelligent people, also, that nearly, if not quite, all the plagues of Egypt are still in that land as natural phenomena, and occur, when they do occur, very exactly in the order in which we find them recorded in the narrative in Ex. But natural events in the plagues as in other "wonders" of God embodied miraculous doings.

The first of the plagues (דָּם, dām, from אָדָם, ādham, "to be red" [Ex 7 19-25]) was brought about by the smiting of the water with

1. Water Turned to Blood the rod in the hand of Aaron, and it consisted in the defilement of the water so that it became as "blood." The waters were polluted and the fish died.

Even the water in vessels which had been taken from the river became corrupt. The people were forced to get water only from wells in which the river water was filtered through the sand. There are two Egypt seasons when, at times, the water resembles blood. At the full Nile the water is sometimes of a reddish color, but at that season the water is quite potable and the fish do not die. But a similar phenomenon is witnessed sometimes at the time of the lowest Nile just before the rise begins. Then also the water sometimes becomes defiled and very red, so polluted that the fish die (Bib. Sacra, 1905, 409). This latter time is evidently the time of the first plague. It would be some time in the month of May. The dreadful severity of the plague constituted the "wonder" in this first plague. The startling character of the plague is apparent when it is remembered that Egypt is the product of the Nile, the very soil being all brought down by it, and its irrigation being constantly dependent upon it. Because of this it became one of the earliest and greatest of the gods (Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Egypt, 3-47; "Hymn to the Nile," Records of the Past, New Series, III, 46-54). The magicians imitated this plague with their enchantments. Their success may have been by means of sleight of hand or other devices of magic, as may be seen in the East today, with claim of supernatural aid, and as used in western lands for entertainment, as mere cleverness. Or it may be, as has been suggested, that they counted upon the continuance of the plague for at least a time, and so took advantage of the materials the "wonder" had provided.

Frogs (צְבָרָדִים, ṣēphard'im, probably "marsh-leapers" [Ex 8 1-15]) are very abundant just after the high Nile when the waters begin to recede.

Spawn in the mud is hatched by the sun, and the marshes are filled with myriads of these creatures. The frog was the hieroglyph

2. The Plague of Frogs for myriads. The frogs usually remain in the marshes, but in this case they came forth to the horror and disgust of the people. "Frogs in the houses, frogs in the beds, frogs baked with the food in the ovens, frogs in the kneading troughs worked up with the flour; frogs with their monotonous croak, frogs with their cold slimy skins, everywhere—from morning to night, from night to morning—frogs." The frog was also associated with Divinity, was the symbol of Heqt, a form of Hathor, and seems also at times to have been worshipped as divinity. This plague created such horror that thus early Pharaoh came to an agreement (8 8-10). A time was set for the disappearance of the frogs that he might know that "there is none like unto Jeh our God," but when the frogs were dead, Pharaoh hardened his heart (8 15). In this plague "the magicians did in like manner with their enchantments" (8 7). Frogs were plentiful, and it would not seem to be difficult to claim to have produced some of them.

It is impossible to determine what particular troublesome insect pest of Egypt is meant by the 3d plague, whether body-lice or mos-

3. The Plague of Lice quitoes or sandflies or ticks or fleas (כִּנָּוִים, kinnavim, "gnats" [Ex 8 16]). Those who have experience of these pests in Egypt are quite ready to accept any of them as adequate for the plague. Lice seem rather to be ruled out, unless different kinds of lice were sent, as there is no one kind that torments both man and beast. All the other insect pests appear in incredible numbers out of the "dust" when the pools have dried up after the receding of the waters. The assertion that the account of this plague is not complete, because it is not recorded that Pharaoh asked its removal or that Moses secured it, is amazing. Perhaps Pharaoh did not, in fact, ask its removal. There seems also at this time some difficulty in Moses having access to Pharaoh after this plague (8 20). Perhaps the plague was not removed at all. The Egyptians are disposed to think it was not! Certainly that season of the year spent in Egypt, not in a dahabiyeh on the Nile, but in a native village, will furnish very satisfying evidence that stinging and biting insects are a very real plague in Egypt yet. The magicians failed with their enchantments and acknowledged that Divine power was at work, and seem to have acknowledged that Jeh was supreme (8 19), but Pharaoh would not heed them.

As the seasons pass on, after the recession of the waters, the flies (עֲרָבִים, ārōbh, "swarms," probably of flies [Ex 8 20-32]) become more

4. The Plague of Flies and more numerous until they are almost a plague every year. The increased severity of this plague, and the providential interference to separate between Israel and the Egyptians, drove Pharaoh and his people to such desperation that Pharaoh gave a half-promise of liberty for Israel to sacrifice "in the land." This called out the statement that they would sacrifice the "abomination of the Egyptians." This may have referred to the sacrifice of sheep, which were always held in more or less detestation by Egyptians, or it may have had reference to the sacrifice of heifers, the cow being the animal sacred to the goddess Hathor. The new element of separation between the Israelites and the Egyptians introduced into this plague was another step toward establishing the claims of Jeh to be the God of all the earth and to have taken Israel under His especial care.

In addition to the separation established between Israel and the Egyptians, a definite time is now set for the coming of the 5th plague. It is to be noticed also that diseases of cattle (בְּרִיחַ, deber, "destruction" [Ex 9 1-7]) and of men follow quickly after the plague of insects. This is in exact accord with the order of Nature as now thoroughly understood through the discovered relation of mosquitoes and flies to the spread of diseases. Rinderpest is still prevalent at times in Egypt, so that beef becomes very scarce in market and is sometimes almost impossible to obtain. It is a fact, also, that the prevalence of cattle plague, the presence of boils among men (see 6, below) and the appearance of bubonic plague are found to be closely associated together and in this order. The mention of camels as affected by this plague is interesting. It is doubtful if any clear indication of the presence of the camel in Egypt so early as this has yet been found among the monuments of Egypt. There is in the Louvre museum one small antiquity which seems to me to be intended for the camel. But Professor Maspero does not agree that it is so. It would seem likely that the Hyksos, who were Bedouin princes, princes of the desert, would have introduced the beasts of the desert into Egypt. If they did so, that may have been sufficient reason that the Egyptians would not picture it, as the Hyksos and all that was theirs were hated in Egypt.

In the plague of boils (שִׁחִיחַ, sh'ehin, and אֲבַחְבֵּלִיתָ, 'abha'bu'oth, "boils" [Ex 9 8-17]) ashes were used, probably in the same way and to the same end as the clay was used in opening the eyes of the blind man (Jn 9 6), i.e. to attract attention and to fasten the mind of the observer upon what the Lord was doing. This plague in the order of its coming, immediately after the murrain, and in the description given of it and in the significant warning of the "pestilence" yet to come (Ex 9 15), appears most likely to have been pestis minor, the milder form of bubonic plague. Virulent rinderpest among cattle in the East is regarded as the precursor of plague among men and is believed to be of the same nature. It may well be, as has been thought by some, that the great aversion of the ancient Egyptians to the contamination of the soil by decaying animals was from the danger thereby of starting an epidemic of plague among men (Dr. Merrins, Bib. Sacra, 1908, 422-23).

Hail (בָּרָד, baradh, "hail" [Ex 9 18-35]) is rare in Egypt, but is not unknown. The writer has himself seen a very little, and has known of one instance when a considerable quantity of hail as large as small marbles fell. Lightning, also, is not as frequent in Egypt as in many semi-tropical countries, yet great electric storms sometimes occur. This plague is quite accurately dated in the seasons of the year (9 31,32). As the first plague was just before the rising of the Nile, so this one is evidently about 9 months later, when the new crops after the inundation were beginning to mature, January-February. This plague also marks another great step forward in the revelation of Jeh to Israel and to the Egyptians. First only His power was shown, then His wisdom in the timing of the plagues, and now His mercy appears in the warning to all godly-disposed Egyptians to save themselves, their herds and their servants by keeping all indoors (9 19-21). Pharaoh also now distinctly acknowledged Jeh (9 27).

The plague of locusts (אַרְבֵּבָה, 'arbeh, "locust" [Ex 10 1-20]) was threatened, and so frightened were the servants of Pharaoh that they persuaded him to try to make some agreement with Moses, but the attempt of Pharaoh still to limit in some way the going of Israel thwarted the plan (Ex 10 7-10). Then devouring swarms of locusts came up over the land from the eastern desert between the Nile and the Red Sea. They devoured every green thing left by the hail. The desperate situation created by the locusts soon brought Pharaoh again to acknowledgment of Jeh (10 16). This was the greatest profession of repentance yet manifested by Pharaoh, but he soon showed that it was deceitful, and again he would not let the people go. When the wind had swept the locusts away, he hardened his heart once more.

The progress of the seasons has been quite marked from the first plague, just before the rising of the waters, on through the year until now the khamsin period (חֲמִשִּׁין, hoshesh, "darkness" from any cause [Ex 10 21-29]) has come. When this dreadful scourge comes with its hot sand-laden breath, more impenetrable than a London fog, it is in very truth a "darkness which may be felt." The dreadful horror of this monster from the desert can hardly be exaggerated. Once again Pharaoh said "Go," but this time he wished to retain the flocks and herds, a hostage for the return of the people (10 24). Upon Moses' refusal to accept this condition, he threatened his life. Why had he not done so ere this? Why, indeed, did he let this man Moses come and go with such freedom, defying him and his people in the very palace? Probably Moses' former career in Egypt explains this. If, as is most probable, he had grown up at court with this Merenptah, and had been known as "the son of Pharaoh's daughter," heir to the throne and successor to Rameses II, instead of Merenptah, then this refugee had undoubtedly many friends still in Egypt who would make his death a danger to the reigning Pharaoh.

No intimation is given of the exact character of the death inflicted on the firstborn (בְּכֹרִית, bekhor, "firstborn" "chief" or "best"; cf Job 18 13; Isa 14 30 [Ex 11-12 36]) of the by the angel of the Lord, or its appearance. But it is already foretold as the "pestilence" (9 15). The pestis major or virulent bubonic plague corresponds most nearly in its natural phenomena to this plague. It culminates in a sudden and overwhelming virulence, takes the strongest and best, and then subsides with startling suddenness.

Thus it appears that probably all the plagues were based upon natural phenomena which still exist in Egypt in the same order, and, when they do occur, find place somewhere during the course of one year.

II. Miraculous Use of the Phenomena.—The miraculous elements in the plagues are no less distinctly manifest than the natural phenomena themselves.

There was an intensification of the effect of the various plagues so much beyond all precedent as to impress everyone as being a special

1. Intensification—Divine manifestation, and it was so. There was national horror of the blood-like water, disgust at the frogs, intolerable torture by the stinging insects and flies, utter ruin of the farmers in the loss of the cattle, the beating down of the crops by the hail, and the devouring of every green thing by the locusts, the sufferings and dread of the inhabitants by reason of the boils, the frightful electric storm, the suffocating darkness and, finally, the crushing disaster of the death of the firstborn. All these calamities may be found in Egypt to the present day, but never any of them, not to say all of them, in such overwhelming severity. That all of them should come in one year and all with such devastation was plainly a Divine arrangement. Merely natural events do not arrange themselves so systematically. In this systematic severity were seen miracles of power.

The prediction of the plagues and the fulfilment of the prediction at the exact time to a day, sometimes to an hour (as the cessation of the thunder and lightning): There was first a general prediction (Ex 3 19.20; 7 3; 9 14.15) and an indication as the plagues went on that the climax would be pestilence (9 15). Then several of the plagues were specifically announced and a time was set for them; e.g. the flies (8 23), the murrain (9 5), the hail (9 18), the locusts (10 4), the death of the firstborn (11 4). In some cases a time for the removal of the plague was also specified: e.g. the frogs (8 10), the thunder and lightning (9 29). In every instance these predictions were exactly fulfilled. In some instances careful foresight might seem to supply in part this ability to predict. Perhaps it was by means of such foresight that the magicians "did so with their enchantments" for the first two plagues. The plague being in existence, foresight might safely predict that it would continue for a little time at least, so that, if the magicians sought for bloody water or called for frogs, they would seem to be successful. But the evidence which Jeh produced went beyond them, and, at the third plague, they were unable to do anything. These things postulate, on the part of Moses and Aaron, knowledge far beyond human ken. Not only magicians could not do so with their enchantments, but modern science and discoveries are no more able so to predict events. Even meteorological phenomena are only predicted within the limits of reasonable foresight. Such wonders as the plagues of Egypt can in no wise be explained as merely natural. The prediction was a miracle of knowledge.

The discrimination shown in the visitation by the plagues presents another miraculous element more significant and important than either the miracles of power or the miracles of knowledge. God put a difference between the Egyptians and the Israelites, beginning with the plague of flies and continuing, apparently, without exception, until the end. Such miracles of moral purpose admit of no possible explanation but the exercise of a holy will. Merely natural events make no such regular, systematic discriminations.

The orderliness and gradually increasing severity of the plagues with such arrangement as brought "judgment upon the gods of Egypt," vindicating Jeh as Ruler over all, and educating the people to know Jeh as Lord of all the earth, present an aspect of events distinctly non-natural. Such method reveals also a Divine mind at work.

Last of all and most important of all, the plagues were so arranged as to accomplish in particular a great Divine moral purpose in the revelation of God to the Israelites, to the Egyptians and to all the world. This is the distinctive mark of every real miracle. And this leads us directly to the consideration of the most important aspect of the plagues.

III. The Divine Moral Purpose.—This discrediting of the gods of Egypt is marked at every step of the progress of the plagues, and the accumulated effect of the repeated discrediting of the gods must have had, and, indeed, had, a great influence upon the Egyptians. The plagues did 'execute judgment against the gods of Egypt' (12 12), and

1. Discrediting of the Gods of Egypt—the people and princes brought great pressure to bear upon Pharaoh to let the people go (10 7). The magicians who claimed to represent the gods of Egypt were defeated, Pharaoh himself, who was accounted divine, was humbled, the great god, the Nile, was polluted, frogs defiled the temples and, at last, the sun, the greatest god of Egypt, was blotted out in darkness.

Pharaoh was made to know that Jeh is Lord, and acknowledged it (9 27; 10 16). To this end the issue was clearly drawn. Pharaoh challenged the right of Jeh to command him (5 2), and God required him then to "stand" to the trial until the evidence could be fully presented, in accordance with the fundamental principle that he who makes a charge is bound to stand to it until either he acknowledges its utter falsity or affords opportunity for full presentation of evidence. So we see God made Pharaoh to "stand" (9 16) (while the Bible, which speaks in the concrete language of life, calls it the hardening of Pharaoh's heart) until the case was tried out (cf Lamb, Miracle of Science, 126-49).

A more blessed and gracious moral purpose of the plagues was the revelation of God as the Saviour of the world. This began in the revelation at the burning bush, where God, in fire, appeared in the bush, yet the bush was not consumed, but saved. This revelation, thus given to the people, was further evidenced by the separation between Israel and the Egyptians; was made known even to the Egyptians by the warning before the plague of hail, that those Egyptians who had been impressed with the power of God might also learn that He is a God that will save those who give heed unto Him; and, at last, reached its startling climax when the angel of the Lord passed over the blood-marked door the night of the death of the firstborn and the institution of the Passover.

Last of all, the plagues had a great moral purpose in that they embodied the Divine use of evil in the experience of men in this world. As the experience of Job illustrates the use of evil in the life of the righteous, so the plagues of Egypt illustrate the same great problem of evil in the lot of the wicked. In the one case, as in the other, the wonders of God are so arranged as "to justify the ways of God to men."

The minutely accurate knowledge of life in Egypt displayed by this narrative in the Book of Ex is inconceivable in an age of so little and difficult intercommunication between nations, except by actual residence of the author in Egypt. This has an important bearing upon the time of the composition of this narrative, and so upon the question of its author.

LITERATURE.—The literature of this subject is almost endless. It will suffice to refer the reader to all the general comms., and the special comms. on Ex, for discussion of doctrinal and critical questions. Two admirable recent discussions of the plagues, in English, are Lamb, Miracle of Science, and Merrins, "The Plagues of Egypt," in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1908, July and October.

PLAIN, plān ([1] כִּיקָר, kikkār, "circle," "talent," or "round loaf"; [2] מִישׁוֹר, mishōr, from יָשַׁר, yāshar, "to be level"; cf Arab. مَيْسُور, maisūr, "that which is easy"; [3] בִּיקְעָה, bik'āh; cf Arab. بَقْعَة, baq'at, "a plot of ground," or "a wet meadow"; [4] עֲרָבָה, 'ārābhāh; [5] שֵׁפְלָה, shephēlāh; [6] τόπος πεδινός, tópos pedinós [Lk 6 17]; [7] אֵלֹן, 'elōn; cf אֵלָה, 'elāh, and אֵלֹן, 'allōn, "oak" [Gen 35 4.8, etc]; also אֵלָה, 'elāh, "Elah" [1 S 17 2]; [8] אֲבֵל, 'ābhēl): See NATURAL FEATURES.

(1) Kikkār, when meaning "plain" usually refers to the alluvial plain about Jericho near the north end of the Dead Sea: "Plain [RVm "circle"] of the Jordan" (Gen 13 10.11; 1 K 7 46; 2 Ch 4 17); "Plain of the valley of Jericho" (Dt 34 3); "cities of the Plain" (Gen 13 12; 19 29); "all the Plain" (Gen 19 17.25); "by the way of the Plain" (2 S 18 23); but "the plain round about Jerus" (Neh 12 28). See CICCAR; CIRCLE.

(2) Mīshōr, EV "plain," RVm usually "table-land," clearly refers in most places to the highlands of Gilead and Moab, E. of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; e.g. Josh 13 9, "the plain [RVm "table-land"] of Medeba."

(3) Bik'āh is more often tr^d "valley" (q.v.).

(4) 'Ārābhāh is in RV often tr^d "the Arabah," denoting the whole Jordan-Dead-Sea-Arabah depression = Arab. Ghaur (Ghōr). In Dt 11 30, AV has "champaign" (q.v.). The "plains of Moab" (Nu 22 1; 26 3.6.3; 31 12; 33 48.49.50; 35 1; 36 13; Dt 34 1.8; Josh 13 32) and "plains of Jericho" (Josh 4 13; 5 10; 2 K 25 5; Jer 39 5; 52 8) are the low plain or ghaur N. of the Dead Sea. 'Ārābhāh is here equivalent to kikkār (see above). Note the distinction between mīshōr used of the highlands, and kikkār and 'ārābhāh used of the ghaur. See ARABAH.

(5) Shephēlāh is by RV throughout tr^d "lowland" (q.v.), and includes the western slopes of the Judaeian hills and the maritime plain.

(6) Topos pedinos occurs only in Lk 6 17.

(7) 'Ēlōn is tr^d "plain" in AV: "plain of Moreh" (Gen 12 6; Dt 11 30); "plain [or plains] of Mamre" (Gen 13 18; 14 13; 18 1); "plain of Zaana'im" (Jgs 4 11); "plain of the pillar" (Jgs 9 6); "plain of Meonenim" (Jgs 9 37); "plain of Tabor" (1 S 10 3). RV has throughout "oak," RVm "terebinth"; cf "oak" (Gen 35 4.8, etc) and "vale of Elah" (1 S 17 2.19; 21 9).

(8) 'Ābhēl krāmim (Jgs 11 33) is in AV "the plain of the vineyards," RV "Abel-cheramim," RVm "the meadow of vineyards." Elsewhere in EV 'ābhēl is "Abel" or "Abel-." See ABEL-CHERAMIM; MEADOW. ALFRED ELY DAY

PLAIN, plān, PLAINLY, plān'li: In Gen 25 27, AV "plain" represents אֵרָ, tam. In a contrast between the vocations of Jacob and Esau is meant, RV ("quiet," m "harmless") may be right. But elsewhere (Job 1 1; Ps 37 37, etc) the word means "perfect," and so probably here; the failings of the great patriarch did not detract from the general estimate of him (Mt 8 11). In Ezr 4 18 "translated" (RVm) is better than "plainly read."

PLAIN, CITIES OF THE. See CITIES OF THE PLAIN.

PLAIN OF MOAB: In Dt 1 1; 2 8, "plain" is tr^d in RV "Arabah," and explained, "the deep valley running N. and S. of the Dead Sea." It was here that Moses delivered his last addresses. Usually the word is pl. (עֲרָבוֹת, 'arbhōth), the "plains" or steppes of Moab (Nu 22 1, etc; Dt 34 1.8). An interesting description is given in an article on "The Steppes of Moab" by Professor G. B. Gray in Expos, January, 1905. See MOAB.

PLAIN OF THE PILLAR (עֵלֹן מַצְבָּה, 'elōn maṣṣābh; B reads πρὸς τῇ βάλανῳ τῇ εὐρετῇ τῆς στασεως τῆς ἐν Σικίμοις, πρὸς τῇ βάλανῳ τῇ εὐρετῇ τῆς στάσεως τῆς ἐν Σικίμοις; A omits τῇ εὐρετῇ, and the second τῆς): With RVm we must read "terebinth of the pillar," the place where the men of Shechem and Beth-millo made Abimelech king (Jgs 9 6). This was one of the sacred trees of which there seem to have been several near Shechem. See MEONENIM, OAK OF. "The pillar" may possibly have been the great stone which Joshua set up "under the oak that was by the sanctuary of Jeh" (Josh 24 26). W. EWING

PLAIN OF THE VINEYARDS. See ABEL-CHERAMIM.

PLASTER, plās'tēr. See PLASTER.

PLAITING, plāt'ing, plat'ing (from OFr. pleit, from Lat plicatum, "fold"): An interweaving, braiding, knot; an elaborate gathering of the hair into knots; ἐμπλοκή, emplokē, "outward adorning of plaiting the hair" (1 Pet 3 3). Compare "platted" (crown of thorns) (Mt 27 29 || Mk 15 17; Jn 19 2). See BRAIDED, BRAIDING.

PLANE, plān (Isa 44 13). See TOOLS.

PLANE TREE, plān'trē (עֲרָמוֹן, 'armōn; πλάτανος, plátanos [Gen 30 37], ἐλάτη, elátē ["pine" or "fir"] [Ezk 31 8]; AV chestnut): 'Armōn is supposed to be derived from עָרַם, 'āram, meaning "to be bare" or "naked"; this is considered a suitable term for the plane, which sheds its bark annually. The chestnut of AV is not an indigenous tree, but the plane, Platanus orientalis, is one of the finest trees in Pal, flourishing esp. by water courses (cf Ecclus 24 14).

Plane (Platanus orientalis).

PLANETS, plan'ets (מַזְלֹת, mazzālōth). See ASTROLOGY, II, 3.

PLANK, plank: Thick beams or pieces of wood, for which several Heb words are used. RV changes "planks" (of fir) into "boards" in 1 K 6 15, and in a few instances substitutes "planks" where AV has "boards" (Ex 27 8; 38 7, the altar; Ezk 27 5). So in the NT in Acts 27 44, for σάνις, sanis. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (3).

PLANT, PLANTS. See BOTANY.

PLASTER, plās'tēr (שִׂיד, sīdh): In Egypt, now as anciently, the buildings are plastered inside and out. The poor quality of the stone commonly used makes this necessary if a smooth attractive surface is desired. Among the poorer classes, clay mixed with straw is used. In Pal and Syria, where there is a rainy season, the coating on the outside walls, if of clay, must be frequently renewed. In Egypt burnt gypsum, and in Pal and Syria burnt limestone (lime) are the commonest materials for making mortar. For the first coat of plastering the lime is mixed with "fat" red sand or with the ash from the bathhouse fires, and the finishing coat is composed of white sand and slaked lime with or without chopped flax straw. The plaster on some of the ancient Egypt ruins seems to indicate that milk or some similar substance was added to the mortar to give a better surface.

The ancients preferred plastered surfaces for decorating, and even the finest granite was covered with stucco on which to paint or carve the decorations (Dt 27 2; Dnl 5 5). Columns were often first stuccoed and then painted.

The Arab. word for mortar is ṭīn, which really means "clay." The Heb. שִׁיר, śīdh, lit. "to boil up," refers to the boiling of the water with which the lime is slaked, because of the heat generated during the slaking process. In Dnl 5 5 occurs גִּיר, gīr, i.e. "burned in a kiln," which might mean either lime or gypsum. In Lev 14 42 occurs טִיחַ, tūḥ, "to smear."

JAMES A. PATCH

PLASTER, plas'tēr (מָרָחַ, mārāḥ): Only used in Isa 38 21 of the application of the cake of figs to the boil from which Hezekiah suffered. In Papyrus Ebers, figs are used as the ingredient in a plaster (xxxv, lxxix, lxxxiii). Dioscorides also recommends figs with other substances as a poultice in some skin diseases.

PLASTERING, plas'tēr-ing. See CRAFTS, II, 15.

PLATE, plāt: A term seemingly not used in the Bible for a dish as it is so commonly used at present, but always for a tablet or sheet of metal. (1) צִיץ, ṣīṣ (Ex 28 36; 39 30; Lev 8 9), a plate of gold on the front of the mitre of the high priest. The name seems to have been given because of the radiance of the object. (2) פֶּתַח, paḥ (Ex 39 3; Nu 16 38), of plates or sheets of metal produced by hammering. (3) לִיחַ, lūḥ, used for tablets or tables of stone (Ex 24 12, etc), but in 1 K 7 36 for the metal plates on the bases of the lavers in the temple. The word שֶׁרֶן, šeren, is rendered "plate" in 1 K 7 30 AV, manifestly incorrectly, RV "axle."

WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

PLATTER, plat'ēr: (1) כֶּ'אַרָּה, k'ārāh, "a deep dish" (Nu 7 13 f.84.85). In AV and ERV "charger," ARV "platter" (cf Ex 25 29; 37 16); LXX τρυβλιον, trūblion, and in the NT rendered "dish" (Mt 26 23; Mk 14 20). In Ezr 1 9, ARV אֲגָרְטָל, 'āghartāl, rendered "platter," AV and ERV "chargers"; probably a deep dish or basin used in sacrificial slaughter. (2) παροψίς, paropsis, originally a side dish, for relishes, entrées, but of dishes for food, in general, esp. meats, fish, etc, used with ποτήριον, potērion, "cup" or "drinking vessel" (Mt 23 25 f); also πίναξ, pinax, originally a large wooden dish or plate (Lk 11 39); rendered "charger" in Mt 14 8.11 AV, and Mk 6 25.28 AV and ERV.

PLAY, plā. See GAMES.

PLEAD, plēd: In modern non-legal Eng. is a synonym of "pray" or "beseech," but in legal phraseology "plea," "plead," and "pleading" have a great variety of technical meanings, with "present a case before the court" as the idea common to all. All the uses of "plead" in EV are connected with this legal sense, so that outside of the set phrase "plead a cause" (1 S 24 15, etc) there is hardly a use of the word in AV, ERV, or ARV that is clear modern Eng. The most obscure instances are due to AV's employment of "plead" to translate the Niphal of שָׁפַח, shāphat. Shāphat means "judge," so its Niphal means "bring one's self into a case to be judged," "enter into controversy with," and so "plead" in the legal sense. Hence "None pleadeth in truth" (Isa 59 4) means "None of their lawsuits are honest." Accordingly, when God is said to "plead with" man (Isa 66 16 AV, ERV, etc), the meaning is that God states His side of the case and not at all that He supplicates man to repent. And this statement by God is a judicial act that of course admits of no reply. Hence RV has changed "plead with" into "enter into judgment with" in Jer 2 35, and ARV has carried this change into all the other passages (Jer 25 31; Ezk 17 20; 20 35.36; 38 22), with "execute judgment" in Isa 66 16; Joel 3 2. The same vb.-form occurs also in Isa 43 26: "Let us plead together," where "Let us present our arguments on both sides" would be a fair paraphrase. Otherwise "plead" usually represents רִבָּה, rībḥ, for which RV gives "strive" in place of "plead" in Ps 35 1, and "contend" in Job 13 19; 23 6 (ARV also in Jgs 6 31.32; Isa 3 13; Jer 2 9; 12 1; Hos 2 2, retaining "plead" only in Isa 1 17 and in the phrase "plead a cause"). יָאָחַח, yākhah, is rendered "plead" in Job 19 5 ("plead against me my reproach," where the meaning is "convict me of"), in Mic 6 2 AV and ERV (ARV "contend"), and Job 16 21 AV (RV "maintain the right"). "Plead" is used also for דִּין, dīn, in Jer 30 13 and Prov 31 9 AV (RV "minister justice to"), and Jer 5 28 RV (AV "judge"; cf 22 16, AV and RV "judge"). RV would have done vastly better if the use of "plead" had been avoided altogether.

Pleadings (i.e. "arguments") occurs in Job 13 6 (for rībḥ), and "plea" (dīn, in a specific legal sense) in Dt 17 8. AV uses "implead" in Acts 19 38 for ἐγκαλέω, egkalēō, RV "accuse," lit. "call into court"; cf also "pleaded the cause" in 2 Macc 4 44 (lit. "argued the case") and ver 47, RV "pleaded" (lit. "spoken," AV "told their cause").

PLEASURE, plezh'ūr (רִצּוֹן, hēpheg, רִצּוֹן, rāṣōn; εὐδοκία, eudokia, ἡδονή, hēdonē): "Pleasure" is the tr of various Heb words, chiefly of hēpheg, "inclination," hence "pleasure," "delight" (Job 21 21, "What pleasure hath he in his house?" ARV "what careth he for"; 22 3, "Is it any pleasure to the Almighty?"; Ps 111 2; Eccl 5 4; 12 1; in Isa 44 28; 46 10; 48 14; 53 10, it has the sense of will or purpose, "He shall perform all my pleasure," etc); of rāṣōn, "delight," "acceptance," "good will" (Ezr 10 11; Neh 9 37; Est 1 8; Ps 51 18; 103 21, etc); nepheh, "soul," "desire," is tr'd "pleasure" (Dt 23 24; Ps 105 22; Jer 34 16).

In the NT "pleasure" is the tr of eudokia, "good thought or will," "good pleasure" (Lk 2 14 RVm; Eph 1 5.9; Phil 2 13; 2 Thess 1 11, RV "every desire of goodness," m "Gr 'good pleasure of goodness.' Cf Rom 10 1").

"To take or have pleasure" is eudokēō (2 Cor 12 10; 2 Thess 2 12; He 10 6.8.38); eudokeō is once tr'd "good pleasure" (Lk 12 32, "It is your father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom"); the neuter participle of dokēō, "to think," etc—meaning "it seems good to me"—to dokouōn, is tr'd "pleasure" (He 12 10, "after their pleasure," RV "as seemed good to them"); hēdonē, "sweetness," "pleasure," occurs in Lk 8 14; Tit 3 3; 2 Pet 2 13 (referring to the lower pleasures of life); thēlēmā, "wish," "will" (Rev 4 11, RV "because of thy will"); chāris, "favor" (Acts 24 27; 25 9, RV "favor"); spatalāō, "to live voluptuously" (1 Tim 5 6, RV "she that giveth herself to pleasure"); suneudokēō, "to think well with," "to take pleasure with others" (Rom 1 32), RV "consent with"; truphāō, "to live luxuriously," (Jas 5 5, RV "lived delicately").

The vb. "to pleasure" occurs in 2 Macc 2 27 as the tr of eucharistia, RV "gratitude"; 12 11, ōphēlēsein, RV "to help."

PLEDGE, plej (vbs. תְּבַל, hābhal [10 t], עָרַב, 'arab [2 K 18 23=Isa 36 8]; nouns תְּבִילָה, hābhalāh [Ezk 18 12.16; 33 15], תְּבִילָה, hābhōlāh [Ezk 18 7], עֲרֻבָּה, 'arubbāh [1 S 17 18], עֲרֻבּוֹן, 'erabhōn [Gen 38 17.18.20]; also עֲבֹט, 'abhōt [Dt 24 10-13] and [RV only] עֲבֹטֵי, 'abhōtī [Hab 2 6]): All these words have about the same meaning. (1) The "pledge" is, as in modern Eng., security given for future payment (Gen 38 17-24) or conduct (Hab 2 6, where the conquered nations have given guaranties of their subserviency to the Chaldeans; AV's "thick clay" here rests on a misreading of the Heb). In 2 K 18 23 (=Isa 36 8) the "pledge" is a wager (so RVm). Rabshakeh mockingly dares Hezekiah to stake a "pledge" that he can produce 2,000 men for the defence of Jerus, although the mighty Assy host has that number of horses alone. The general point of the obscure passage Prov 20 16 (= 27 13) is that he who guarantees strangers needs a guaranty himself. 1 S 17 18 is uncertain and the text may be corrupt. If not, the "pledge" is some (prearranged?) token of the welfare of David's brethren. (2) Most of the occurrences of "pledge," however, deal with the debts of the very poor, who had no property that they could spare even temporarily. Consequently, the exaction of a pledge from such persons worked genuine hardship, and to take a pledge at all was a cruel act (Job 24 3), although of course the dishonesty of withholding a pledge (Ezk 18 7; 33 15) was worse. Lowest in the scale was the creditor who took the garment the borrower was wearing (Am 2 8; Job 22 6; 24 9 m), and special legislation controlled this practice. A garment (the outer "cloak"—see DRESS—not worn while doing manual labor) so taken must be restored at night (Ex 22 26; Dt 24 12.13, for it was the usual covering of the sleeper. (Apparently, though, the creditor regained custody of it in the daytime until the debt was paid.) A widow's clothing, however, was entirely exempt (Dt 24 17), as was the handmill used for bread-making (24 6). The lender had no right of entry into the borrower's house to obtain the pledge (24 10.11), but it is not said that he could not dictate what he would accept; indeed, the contrary is inconceivable. (3) ARV gives "pledge" for AV and ERV "faith" in 1 Tim 5 12. See also EARNEST.

PLOW, plou (פָּרוֹשׁ, hārash; ἀροτριώω, arotriōō): No implement of the Bible is more frequently illustrated today than the plow. This is partly because there is every reason to believe that the plows still used throughout Egypt, Pal, and Syria are counterparts of the ancient ones. The first plows were probably an adaptation of the ancient Egyp hoe, where the handle was lengthened in order that animals might be hitched to it. To make it easier to break up the ground, it was pointed, and handles were added by which it could be guided. The ancient plow probably varied in type in different sections of the country, as it does today. In one form a young tree of oak or other strong wood of a diameter of 3 or 4 in. is cut off just below a good-sized branch and again 15 or 20 in. above. The upper end of the severed trunk is pointed and forms the share. Between this and the side branch is fitted a brace. The branch is cut off 10 or 12 ft. from the trunk and forms the pole. A lighter stick, about 3 ft. long, projects upward from the share and forms the handle. The plow used in Syria is of slightly different construction. The handle and share are one continuous piece, so cut that there is a slight bend at the middle. The share is pointed and is used bare in the plains, or in more stony regions is shod with iron. The pole is of 2 pieces joined end to end. The thicker end of the pole is notched, so that it may be attached firmly to the share. The whole plow is so light that it can be easily carried on a man's shoulder. These plows literally scratch the soil, as the Heb word implies. They do not turn over the ground as the modern implement does. The plowman guides the plow with one hand, and with the other sometimes goads the oxen, and at other times with the chisel end of his goad breaks away the lumps of earth or other material which impedes the progress of his plow. See YOKE.

In addition to the words which are found above, the following terms occur: אָבָד, 'abhadh (lit. "to serve"), "worked" or "plowed" (Dt 21 4); פָּלַח, pālāh (lit. "to break open," Ps 141 7).

One special law is mentioned in connection with plowing, namely that an ox and an ass should not be yoked together (Dt 22 10), a prohibition which is utterly disregarded today. Principally oxen were used for plowing (Job 1 14). Often several yokes of oxen followed each other plowing parallel furrows across the field, a sight still common on the plains of Syria (1 K 19 19). Plowing was done by bond servants (Lk 17 7; cf 'abhadh, Dt 21 4). Plowing cannot be done before the rains (Jer 14 4); on the other hand the soil is too sticky to plow in the winter time (Prov 20 4). The law requiring one day of rest in every seven included plowing time (Ex 34 21).

Figurative: "The plowers plowed upon my back" typified deep affliction (Ps 129 3; cf 141 7). "Plow iniquity" is urged in the sense of "plant iniquity." Doing evil was sure to bring evil consequences (Job 4 8; cf Mic 3 12). As surely as planting comes after plowing, so surely will Jeh carry out His decree of destruction (Isa 28 23-25). "Judah shall plow," i.e. become enslaved (Hos 10 11); cf "Foreigners shall be your plowmen" (Isa 61 5). "Will one plow there with oxen?" (Am 6 12), "neither plowing nor harvest" (Gen 45 6) are figures of desolation. Zion plowed as a field, i.e. utterly destroyed (Jer 26 18). The plowman shall overtake the reaper, i.e. the soil shall be so fertile as to require no rest—typical of great abundance (Am 9 13). No opportunity to plow because of lack of rain is a desolate picture of drought (Jer 14 4). As the plowman expects to share in the fruits of the harvest, so might an apostle expect his temporal needs to be provided for (1 Cor 9 10). "If ye had not plowed with my heifer," i.e. used my wife, was Samson's reply to those who had secured the answer to his riddle from her (Jgs 14 18). "Beat their swords into plowshares" (or hoes) (Isa 2 4; Mic 4 3) typified peace; "beat your plowshares into swords"—war (Joel 3 10). "Having put his hand to the plow, and looking back," i.e. longing for evil things when one has set his face toward doing what is right, unfits a man for the kingdom of God (Lk 9 62; cf Gen 19 26; Phil 3 13).

The first word is a fem. participle Kal; cf kōheleth ("preacher"), the Heb title of the Book of Eccl. BDB suggests that the fem. is that of office. AV has "Pochereth of Zebaim" in Ezr, but Ryle (Cambridge Bible, 235) notes that "of" is not in the 1611 ed.

POET, pō'et (ποιητής, poiētēs, "a maker"): Occurs in this sense only in Acts 17 28, where St. Paul quotes from the general expression of Gr mythology. The quotation if intended to be exact is probably from Aratus, as the words of St. Paul in his speech at Athens precisely agree with the opening words of the Phaenomena by Aratus. A like but not identical expression is found in the Hymn to Zeus by Cleanthes. Aratus in his poem endeavors to posit Jupiter as the father and controller of all things, and worthy to be worshipped. In both his poem and that of Cleanthes, but esp. in the latter, there is a true and lofty note of spiritual devotion. St. Paul takes this praise and devotion offered by the Gr poets to their unknown or fictitious gods and bestows it upon the one true God whom he declared unto the people of Athens. C. E. SCHENK

By Heb poetry in the present article is meant that of the OT. There is practically no poetry in the NT, but in the OT Apoc Sir is largely poetical and Wisd only less so. Post-Bib. Heb poetry could not be discussed here.

I. Is There Poetry in the OT?—It is impossible to answer this question without first of all stating what poetry really is. The present writer submits the following as a correct definition: "Poetry is verbal composition, imaginative and concrete in matter, and emotional and rhythmic in form." This definition recognizes two aspects of poetry, the formal and the material. The substance of poetry must be concrete—it is philosophy that deals with the abstract; and it has to be the product more or less of the creative imagination. It is of the essence of poetry that, like music, it should be expressed in rhythmical but not necessarily in metrical form. Moreover, the language has to be such as will stir up the aesthetic emotions. Adopting this account of poetry as criticism, it may unhesitatingly be affirmed that the Heb Scriptures contain a goodly amount of genuine poetry; cf the Pss, Job, Cant, etc. It is strange but true that poetical is older than prose written composition. An examination of the literature of the ancient Indians, Babylonians, Hebrews, Greeks and Arabs makes this quite certain.

II. Neglect of Hebrew Poetry: Causes.—Notwithstanding the undoubted fact that poetry is largely represented in the Bible, it is noteworthy that this species of Bible literature was almost wholly ignored until the 18th cent. We may perhaps ascribe this fact mainly to two causes: (1) Since the Bible was regarded as preëminently, if not exclusively, a revelation of the Divine mind, attention was fixed upon what it contained, to the neglect of the literary form in which it was expressed. Indeed it was regarded as inconsistent with its lofty, Divine function to look upon it as literature at all, since in this last the appeal is made, at least to a large extent, to the aesthetic and therefore carnal man. The aim contemplated by Bible writers was practical—the communication of religious knowledge—not literary, and still less artistic. It was therefore regarded as inconsistent with such a high purpose that these writers should trouble themselves about literary embellishment or beautiful language, so long as the sense was clear and unambiguous. It was in this spirit and animated by this conception that toward the middle of the 19th cent. Isaac Taylor of Ongar (The Spirit of Heb Poetry, 1861, 56 ff) and Keil of Dorpat (Intro to the OT, 1881, I, 437) denied on a priori grounds the presence of epic and dramatic poetry in the Bible. How, they exclaimed, could God countenance the writing of fiction which is untruth—and the epic and the drama have both? Matthew Arnold rendered invaluable service to the cause of Bible science when he fulminated against theologians, Jewish and Christian, for making the Bible a mere collection of proof texts, an arsenal whence religious warriors might get weapons with which to belabor their opponents. "The language of the Bible is fluid . . . and literary, not rigid, fixed, scientific" (Preface to 1st ed of Literature and Dogma). The Bible contains literature, poetical and prose, equal as literature to the best, as Matthew Arnold, Carlyle, and Froude (on Job) held. The neglect of this aspect of the Scriptures made theologians blind to the presence and therefore ignorant of the character of Bible poetry. (2) Another factor which led to the neglect of the poetical element in the OT is the undoubted fact that Bib. Heb poets were less conscious as poets than western poets, and thought much less of the external form in which they expressed themselves. Bible poetry lacks therefore such close adherence to formal rules as characterizes Gr, Arab, or Eng. poetry. The authors wrote as they felt and because they felt, and their strong emotions dictated the forms their words took, and not any objective standards set up by the schools. Heb poetry is destitute of meter in the strict sense, and also of rhyme, though this last occurs in some isolated cases (see below, III, 1, [4], c and e). No wonder then that western scholars, missing these marks of the poetry which they knew best, failed for so long to note the poetry which the OT contains.

III. Characteristics of Hebrew Poetry: External and Internal.—The definition of poetry accepted in I, above, implies that there are marks by which poetry can be distinguished from prose. This is equally true of Heb poetry, though this last lacks some of the features of the poetry of western nations.

(1) Vocabulary.—There are several Heb words which occur most frequently and in some cases exclusively in poetry. In the following list the corresponding prose word is put in parenthesis: מילה, millāh, "word" (= דבר, dābhār); אָנוּשׁ, 'enōsh, "man" (= אִישׁ, 'ish); אָרָה, אָרָה, "way" (= דֶּרֶךְ, derekh); רָחֵם, hā-zāh, "to see" (= רָאָה, ra'āh); the prepositions אֲלֵי, 'elē, "to," עֲדֵי, 'ādē, "unto," עָלַי, 'ālē, "upon," and מִמֶּנִּי, minni, "from," instead of the shorter forms אֶל, 'el, עַד, 'adh, עַל, 'al, and מִן, min. The pronoun זֶ, zā, rare in prose, has in poetry the double function of a demonstrative and a relative pronoun in both genders. The negative בַּל, bal, is used for לֹא, lō'. For the inseparable prepositions b, k, l ("in," "as," "to") the separate forms be-mō, ke-mō and le-mō are employed.

1. External or Formal Characteristics

(2) Grammar.—(a) Accidence: The pronominal suffixes have peculiar forms in poetry. For m, ām, em ("their," "them") we find the longer forms mō, āmō, emō. For the pl. ending of nouns n (in) takes the place of m (im), as in Aram. (cf Job 4 2; 12 11), and frequently obsolete case endings are preserved, but their functions are wholly lost. Thus we have the old nominative ending ō in Ps 50 10, etc.; the old genitive ending i in Isa 1 21, and the accusative āh in Ps 3 3.

(b) Syntax: The article, relative pronoun, accusative sing. 'ēth and also the "waw-consecutive" are frequently omitted for the sake of the rhythm. There are several examples of the last in Ps 112 12 ff. The construct state which by rule immediately precedes nouns has often a preposition after it. The jussive sometimes takes the place of the indicative, and the pl. of nouns occurs for the singular.

(3) Rhythm.—Rhythm (from ῥυθμός, rhythmós) in literary composition denotes that recurrence of accented and unaccented syllables in a regular order which we have in poetry and rhetorical prose. Man is a rhythmic animal; he breathes rhythmically, and his blood circulates—outward and inward—rhythmically. It may be due to these reflex rhythms that the more men are swayed by feeling and the less by reflection and reasoning, the greater is the tendency to do things rhythmically. Man walks and dances and sings and poetizes by the repetition of what corresponds to metrical feet: action is followed by reaction. We meet with a kind of rhythm in elevated and passionate prose, like that of John Ruskin and other writers. Preachers when mastered by their theme unconsciously express themselves in what may be called rhythmic sentences. Though, however, rhythm may be present in prose, it is only in poetry as in music that it recurs at intervals more or less the same. In iambic poetry we get a repetition of a short and long syllable, as in the following lines:

"With ravished ears
The monarch hears,
Assumes the gods, Affects the nods."
—Dryden.

(4) Parallelism.—What is so called is a case of logical rhythm as distinguished from rhythm that is merely verbal. But as this forms so important a feature of Bible poetry, it must be somewhat fully discussed. What since Bishop Lowth's day has been called parallelism may be described as the recurring of symmetrically constructed sentences, the several members of which usually correspond to one another. Lowth (d. 1787), in his epoch-making work on Heb poetry (De Sacra poesi Hebraeorum prelectiones, ET by G. Gregory), deals with what he (following Jebb) calls Parallelismus membrorum (ch x). And this was the first serious attempt to expound the subject, though Rabbi Asariah (Middle Ages), Ibn Ezra (d. 1167 AD), D. Kimḥi (d. 1232) and A. de Rossi (1514-1578) called attention to it. Christian Schoettgen (d. 1751) (see Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae) anticipated much of what Lowth has written as to the nature, function and value of parallelism. The first to use the word itself in the technical sense was Jebb (Sacred Lit., 1820). For the same thing Ewald used the expression Sinnrhythmus, i.e. sense rhythm, a not unsuitable designation.

(a) Kinds of parallelism: Lowth distinguished three principal species of parallelism, which he called synonymous, antithetic and synthetic.

(i) The synonymous: In this the same thing is repeated in different words, e.g. Ps 36 5:

'Yahwe, (a) Thy lovingkindness [reaches] to the heavens,
(β) Thy faithfulness [reaches] to the clouds.'

Omitting "Yahwe," which belongs alike to both members, it will be seen that the rest of the two half-lines corresponds word for word: "thy loving-kindness" corresponding to "thy faithfulness," and "to the heavens" answering to "to the clouds" (cf Ps 15 1; 24 1-3; 25 5; 1 S 18 7; Isa 6 4; 13 7).

(ii) Antithetic parallelism: in which the second member of a line (or verse) gives the obverse side of the same thought, e.g. Prov 10 1:

'A wise son gladdens his father,
But a foolish son grieves his mother'

(see Prov 11 3; Ps 37 9; cf Prov 10 1 ff; Ps 20 8; 30 6; Isa 54 7 ff). Sometimes there are more than two corresponding elements in the two members of the verse, as in Prov 29 27; cf 10 5; 16 9; 27 2.

(iii) Synthetic parallelism: called also constructive and epithetic. In this the second member adds something fresh to the first, or else explains it, e.g. Ps 19 8 f:

'The precepts of Yahwe are right, rejoicing the heart:
The commandments of Yahwe are pure, enlightening the eyes.
The fear of Yahwe is clean, enduring for ever:
The judgments of Yahwe are true and righteous altogether.
More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold;
Sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb'

(see Prov 1 7; cf 3 5,7; Ps 1 3; 15 4). In addition to the three principal species of parallelism noticed above, other forms have been traced and described.

(iv) Introverted parallelism (Jebb, Sacred Lit., 53): in which the hemistichs of the parallel members are chiasmically arranged, as in the scheme ab ba. Thus Prov 23 15 f:

(a) 'My son, if thy heart be wise
(b) My heart shall be glad, even mine:
(b) Yea, my reins shall rejoice
(a) When thy lips speak right things'

(cf Prov 10 4,12; 13 24; 21 17; Ps 51 3).

(v) Palilogical parallelism: in which one or more words of the first member are repeated as an echo, or as the canon in music, in the second. Thus Nah 1 2:

'Yahwe is a jealous God and avenges:
Yahwe avenges and is full of wrath:
Yahwe takes vengeance on his adversaries,
And he reserves wrath for his enemies'

(cf Jgs 5 3,6 f.11 f.15 f.23,27; Ps 72 2,12,17; 121; 124; 126; Isa 2 7; 24 5; Hos 6 4).

(vi) Climactic or comprehensive parallelism: In this the second line completes the first. Thus Ps 29 1:

"Give unto Yahwe, O ye mighty ones, Give unto Yahwe glory and strength"

(see Ex 15 6; Ps 29 8).

(vii) Rhythmical parallelism (De Wette, Franz Delitzsch): thus Ps 138 4:

"All the kings of the earth shall give thee thanks . . .
For they have heard the words of thy mouth."

See Prov 15 3; cf 16 7,10; 17 13,15; 19 20; 21 23,25.

Perfect parallelism is that in which the number of words in each line is equal. When unequal, the parallelism is called imperfect. Ewald (see Die poetischen Bücher des alten Bundes, I, 57-92; Die Dichter des alten Bundes, I, 91 ff, 2d ed of the former) aimed at giving a complete list of the relations which can be expressed by parallelism, and he thought he had succeeded. But in fact every kind of relation which can be indicated in words may be expressed in two or more lines more or less parallel. On the alleged parallelism of strophes see below.

(b) Parallelism as an aid to exegesis and textual criticism: If in Lowth's words parallelism implies that "in two lines or members of the same period things for the most part shall answer to things, and words to words," we should expect obscure or unknown words to derive some light from words corresponding to them in parallel members or clauses. In not a few cases we are enabled by comparison of words to restore with considerable confidence an original reading now lost. The formula is in a general way as follows: ab: cx. We know what a, b and c mean, but are wholly in the dark as to the sense of x. The problem is to find out what x means. We have an illustration in Jgs 5 28, which may be thus literally translated:

"Through the window she looked,
And Sisera's mother x through the x."

Here we have two unknown, each, however, corresponding to known terms. The Heb vb. accompanying "Sisera's mother" is וַתִּבְטֹחַ, watt'yabbēbh, EV "and . . . cried." But no such vb. (yābhabh) is known, for the Talm. as usually, follows the traditional interpretation. We want a vb. with a meaning similar to "looked." If we read וַתִּבְטֹחַ, wattabbēt, we have a form which could easily be corrupted into the word in the MT, which gives a suitable sense and moreover has the support of the Tgs of Onkelos and Jonathan, and even of the LXX (A and Luc.). What about the other Heb word untranslated above (וַתִּבְטֹחַ, 'eshnābh)? This occurs in but one other passage (Prov 7 6), where it stands as in the present passage in parallelism with וַתִּבְטֹחַ, hallōn, "window" (probably Prov 7 6 is dependent). We get no help from etymology or in this case from the VSS, but parallelism had suggested to our translators the meaning "lattice," a kind of Eastern window, and something of the kind must be meant. The vb. shānābh, "to be cool," may possibly suggest the rendering "window," i.e. a hole in the wall to secure coolness in the house. Glass windows did not exist in Pal, and are rare even now. There are innumerable other examples in the OT of the use of parallelism in elucidating words which occur but once, or which are otherwise difficult to understand, and frequently a textual emendation is suggested which is otherwise supported.

(c) Prevalence and value of parallelism: Two statements aent parallelism in the OT may be safely made: (i) That it is not a characteristic of all OT poetry. Lowth who had so much to do with its discovery gave it naturally an exaggerated place in his scheme of Heb poetry, but it is lacking in the largest part of the poetry of the OT, and it is frequently met with in elevated and rhetorical prose. (ii) That it pervades other poetry than that of the OT. It occurs in Assyria (see A. Jeremias, Die bab-assyr. Vorstellung vom Leben nach dem Tode), in Egypt (Georg Ebers, Nord u. Süd, I), in Finnish, Ger. and Eng. Indeed, A. Wuttke (Der deutsche Volks-Aberglaube der Gegenwart, 1869, 157) and Eduard Norden (Die antike Kunstprosa, 1898, II, 813) maintain that parallelism is the most primitive form of the poetry of all nations. It must nevertheless be admitted that in the OT parallelism has in proportion a larger place than in any other literature and that the correspondence of the parts of the stichs or verses is closer.

(5) Other literary devices.—OT poetry has additional features which it shares with other oriental and with western poetry. Owing to lack of space these can be hardly more than enumerated.

(a) Alliteration: e.g. "Round and round the rugged rocks." We have good examples in the Heb of Ps 6 8 and 27 17. (b) Assonance: e.g. "dreamy seamy" (see for Bible examples the Heb of Gen 49 17; Ex 14 14; Dt 3 2). (c) Rhyme: There are so few examples of this in the Heb Scriptures that no one can regard it as a feature in Heb poetry, though in Arab. and even in post-Bib. Heb poetry it plays a great part. We have Bib. instances in the Heb text of Gen 4 23; Job 10 8-11; 16 12. (d) Acrostics: In some poems of the OT half-verses, verses, or groups of verses begin with the successive letters of the Heb alphabet. We have such alphabetical acrostics in Pss 9 f, 34, 37; Prov 31 10 ff; Lam 1-4; cf ch 5, where the number of verses agrees with that of the Heb alphabet, though the letters of that alphabet do not introduce the verses.

(e) Meter: The view of the present writer may be stated as follows: That the poetry of the Heb is not in the strict sense metrical, though the writers under the influence of strong emotion express themselves rhythmically, producing often the phenomena which came later to be codified under metrical rules. Thinking and reasoning and speaking preceded psychology, logic, and grammar, and similarly poetry preceded prosody. In the OT we are in the region of the fact, not of the law. Poets wrote under strong impulse, usually religious, and without recognizing any objective standard, though all the time they were supplying data for the rules of prosody. Those who think that OT poets had in their minds objective rules of meter have to make innumerable changes in the text. Instead of basing their theory on the original material, they bring their a priori theory and alter the text to suit it. It can be fearlessly said that there is not a single poem in the OT with the same number of syllables, or feet, or accents in the several stichs or hemistichs, unless we introduce violent changes into the MT, such as would be resented in classical and other ancient literature. It is important, before coming to any definite conclusion, to take into consideration the fact that the poetry of the OT belongs to periods separated by many centuries, from the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5), the earliest Heb poem, down to the last hymns in the Psalter. In the oldest specimens of Heb poetry there is a naive simplicity which excludes the idea of conscious art. In the latest the poet is much more conscious, and his poetry more artistic. It would be manifestly unfair to propound a theory of poetry based on the poetry of Keats and Tennyson and to apply it to the productions of Anglo-Saxon and Old Eng. poetry. Bound up in the one volume called the Bible there is a literature differing widely in age, aim and authorship, and it needs care in educing a conception of Heb poetry that will apply to all the examples in the OT. The later pss-acrostic, etc., many of them made up of bits of other pss, seem to have sprung from a more conscious effort at imitation. If, however, there were among the ancient Hebrews, as there was among the ancient Greeks, a code of prosody, it is strange that the Mish and G'mārā should be wholly silent about it. And if some one system underlies our Heb Bible, it is strange that so many systems have been proposed. It should be remembered too that the oldest poetry of every people is non-metrical.

The following is a brief statement of the views advocated:

(i) Philo and Josephus, under the influence of Gr models and desiring to show that Heb was not inferior to pagan literature, taught that Heb poetry had meter, but they make no attempt to show what kind of meter this poetry possesses.

(ii) Calmet, Lowth and Carpzov held that though in the poetry of the Heb Bible as originally written and read there must have been metrical rules which the authors were conscious of following, yet, through the corruption of the text and our ignorance of the sounds and accentuation of primitive Heb, it is now impossible to ascertain what these metrical rules were.

(iii) In their scheme of Heb meter Bickell and Merx reckon syllables as is done in classical poetry, and they adopt the Syr law of accentuation, placing the tone on the penultimate. These writers make drastic changes in the text in order to bolster up their theories.

(iv) The dominant and by far the least objectionable theory is that advocated by Ley, Briggs, Duhm, Buhl, Grimme, Sievers, Rothstein and most modern scholars, that in Heb prosody the accented syllables were alone counted. If this principle is applied to Job, it will be found that most of the Bib. verses are distichs having two stichs, each with three main accents. See, for an illustration, Job 12 16: עַמּוֹל עַל רוּחֹשֵׁיהֶּ: לֹא שָׁגַג רַמְשֵׁנָה ('immo '6z wethūshiyāh: lō shōghēph umashgeh): "Strength and effectual working belong to [lit. "are with"] him, he that errs and he that causes to err"). Man's rhythmical instincts are quite sufficient to account for this phenomenon without assuming that the poet had in mind an objective standard. Those who adopt this last view and apply it rigidly make numerous textual changes. For an examination of the metrical systems of Hubert Grimme, who takes account of quantity as well as accent, and of Eduard Sievers who, though no Heb scholar, came to the conclusion after examining small parts of the Heb

Bible that Heb poetry is normally anapaestic, see W. H. Cobb, Criticism of Systems of Heb Metre, 152 ff, 169 ff. Herder, De Wette, Hupfeld, Keil, Nowack, Budde, Döllér, and Toy reject all the systems of Heb meter hitherto proposed, though Budde has a leaning toward Ley's system.

(f) Budde's kinah measure: Though Budde takes up in general a negative position in regard to Heb meter, he pleads strenuously for the existence of one specific meter with which his name is associated. This is what he calls the kinah measure (from קִנָּה, kināh, "a lamentation"). In this each stich is said to consist of one hemistich with three beats or stress syllables and another having two such syllables, this being held to be the specific meter of the dirge (see Lam 1 1, etc). Ley and Briggs call it "pentameter" because it is made up of five (3+2) feet (a foot in Heb prosody being equal to an accented syllable and the unaccented syllables combined with it). See Budde's full treatment of the subject in ZATW, 60, 152, "Das heb. Klagelied." It must, however, be borne in mind that even Herder (d. 1803) describes the use in elegics of what he calls, anticipating Ley and Briggs, the "pentameter" (see Geist der ebräischen Poesie, 1782, I, 32 f, ET The Spirit of Heb Poetry, 1833, I, 40). But the present writer submits the following criticisms: (i) Budde is inconsistent in rejecting all existing theories of meter and yet in retaining one of his own, which is really but part of the system advocated by Bellermann, Ley and Briggs. (ii) He says, following Herder, that it is the measure adopted by mourning women (Jer 9 16), but we have extremely few examples of the latter, and his statement lacks proof. (iii) There are dirges in the OT not expressed in the kinah measure. David's lament over Saul and Jonathan is more hexametric and tetrametric than pentametric, unless we proceed to make a new text (2 S 1 19 ff). (iv) The kinah measure is employed by Heb poets where the theme is joyous or indifferent; see Ps 119, which is a didactic poem.

(6) Units of Hebrew poetry.—In western poetry the ultimate unit is usually the syllable, the foot (consisting of at least two syllables) coming next. Then we have the verse-line crowned by the stanza, and finally the poem.

According to the theory of Heb poetry adopted by the present writer, the following are the units, beginning with the simplest:

(a) The meter: This embraces the accented (tone) syllable together with the unaccented syllable preceding or succeeding it. This may be called a "rhythmic foot."

(b) The stich or verse: In Job and less regularly in Pss and Cant and in other parts of the OT (Nu 23 19-24) the stich or verse consists commonly of three toned syllables and therefore three meters (see above for sense of "meter"). It is important to distinguish between this poetical sense of "verse" and the ordinary meaning—the subdivision of a Bible chapter. The stich in this sense appears in a separate line in some old MSS.

(c) Combinations of stichs (verses): In Heb poetry a stich hardly ever stands alone. We have practically always a distich (couplet, Job 18 5), a tristich (triplet, Nu 6 24-26), a tetrastich (Gen 24 23), or the pentastich.

(d) Strophe: Kusters (Stud. Krit., 1831, 40-114, "Die Strophen," etc) maintained that all poems in the Heb Scriptures are naturally divisible into strophes (stanzas) of similar, if not equal, length. Thus Ps 119 is arranged in strophes named after the letters of the Heb alphabet, each one containing eight Scripture verses, or sixteen metrical verses or stichs, most of the stichs having three meters or rhythmical feet. But though several Bib. poems are composed in strophes, many are not.

(e) Song: This (שִׁירָה, shīrah) is made up of a series of verses and in some cases of strophes.

(f) Poem: We have examples of this (שִׁיר, shīr) in the books of Job and Cant which consist of a combination of the song.

(7) Classification of stichs or verses.—Stichs may be arranged as follows, according to the number of meters (or feet) which they contain: (a) the trimeter or tripod with three meters or feet; Bickell holds that in Job this measure is alone used; (b) the tetrameter or tetrapod, a stich with four meters or feet; (c) the pentameter or pentapod, which has five meters or feet: this is Budde's kinah measure (see III, 1, [4]); (d) the hexameter or hexapod: this consists of six meters or feet, and is often hard to distinguish from two separate trimeters (or tripods).

Our first and most original authority on the internal characteristics of Hebrew poetry is that great German theologian and man of letters, J. G. Herder, the pastor and friend of Goethe and Schiller at Weimar. In his Vom Geist der ebräischen Poesie, 1782 (The Spirit of Heb Poetry, tr'd by James Marsh, U.S.A., 1833), he discusses at length and with great freshness those internal aspects of the poetry of the OT (love of Nature, folklore, etc) which impressed him as a literary man. Reference may be made also to George Gillfillian's Bards of the Bible, 1851 (popular), and Isaac Taylor's Spirit of Heb Poetry. It is a strange but striking and significant coincidence that not one of these writers professed much if any knowledge of the Heb language. They studied the poetry of the OT mainly at least in translations, and were not therefore diverted from the literary and logical aspects of what is written by the minutiae of Heb grammar and textual criticism, though only a Heb scholar is able to enter into full possession of the rich treasures of Heb poetry.

(1) Themes of Hebrew poetry.—It is commonly said that the poetry of the ancient Hebrews is wholly religious. But this statement is not strictly correct. (a) The OT does not contain all the poetry composed or even written by the Hebrews in Bible times, but only such as the priests at the various sanctuaries preserved. We do not know of a literary caste among the Hebrews who concerned themselves with the preservation of the literature as such. (b) Within the Bible Canon itself there are numerous poems or snatches of poems reflecting the everyday life of the people. We have love songs (Cant), a wedding song (Ps 45), a harvest song (Ps 65), parts of ditties sung on discovering a new well (Nu 21 17 f), on drinking wine, and there are references to war songs (Nu 21 14; Josh 10 13; 2 S 1 18).

(2) Species of poetry.—Bib. poetry may be subsumed under the following heads: (a) folklore, (b) prophetic, (c) speculative, (d) lyrical.

(a) Folklore: "Poetry," said J. G. Hamann (d. 1788), "is the mother tongue of the human race." In both folk-music and folk-poetry, each the oldest of its class, the inspiration is immediate and spontaneous. We have examples of folk-songs in Gen 11 1-9; 19 24 f.

(b) Prophetic poetry: This poetry is the expression of the inspiration under which the seer wrote. One may compare the oracular utterances of diviners which are invariably poetical in form as well as in matter. But one has to bear in mind that the heathen diviner claimed to have his messages from jinns or other spirits, and the means he employed were as a rule omens of various kinds. The OT prophet professed to speak as he was immediately inspired by God (see DIVINATION, VIII). Duhm thinks that the genuine prophecies of Jeremiah are wholly poetical, the prose parts being interpolations. But the prophet is not merely or primarily a poet, though it cannot be doubted that a very large proportion of the prophecies of the OT are poetical in form and substance.

(c) Philosophical poetry: This expression is intended to include such poetry as is found in the Wisdom literature of the OT and the Apoc (see WISDOM LITERATURE). The so-called didactic poetry, that of the proverbs or parables (מִשְׁלָה, māshāl), also comes in here.

(d) Lyrical poetry: This includes the hymns of the Psalter, the love songs of Cant and the many other lyrics found in the historical and prophetic writings. In these lyrics all the emotions of the human soul are expressed.

Does the OT contain specimens of epic and dramatic poetry? The answer must depend on which definition of both is adopted.

(a) Epic poetry: The present writer would define an epic poem as a novel with its plot and development charged, however, with the passion and set out in the rhythmic form of poetry. There is no part of the OT which meets the requirements of this definition, certainly not the Creation, Fall and Deluge stories, which De Wette (Beiträge, 228 ff, Einleitung, 147) and R. G. Moulton (Literary Study of the Bible, ch ix) point to as true epics, and which Ewald (Dichter des alten Bundes, I, 87 ff) held rightly to have in them the stuff of epics, though not the form.

(b) Dramatic poetry: Defining dramatic poetry as that which can be acted on a stage, one may with confidence say that there is no example of this in the OT. Even the literary drama must have the general characteristics of that which is actable. Franz Delitzsch and other writers have pointed to Job and Cant as dramatic poems, but the definition adopted above excludes both.

IV. Poetical Writings of the OT.—According to the Massorettes or editors of our present Heb Bible, there are but three poetical books in the OT, Job, Prov, and Pss, known in Jewish circles by the mnemonic abbreviation מִשְׁלָה, 'emeth, the three consonants forming the initial letters of the Heb names of the above books. These three books have been supplied by the Massorettes with a special system of accents known as the poetical accents, and involving a method of intoning in the synagogue different from that followed when the prose books are read. But these accentual marks cannot be traced farther back than the 7th or 8th cent. of our era.

It is customary to divide the poetical books of the OT into two classes, each containing three books:

(1) those containing lyrical poetry
1. The Poetical Books in the Narrow Sense (שִׁיר, shīr, or שִׁירָה, shīrāh), i.e. Pss, Cant, Lam; (2) those containing for the most part didactic poetry (מִשְׁלָה, māshāl), i.e. Job, Prov, Ecl.

There is a large amount of poetry in the OT outside the books usually classed as poetical: (a) poetry in the prophetic books (see above, III, 2); (b) poetry in the historical books including the Pent (see Michael Heilprin, The Historical Poetry of the Hebrews, 2 vols, 1879-80).

2. Customary Division We have examples in Gen 4 23 f; 49; Ex 15; Nu 21 14 f.27-30 (JE); 23 f (Balaam's songs); Dt 32 f (song and blessing of Moses); Josh 10 12-14 (JE); Jgs 5 (Deborah's Song); 9 8-15; 1 S 2 1-10; 2 S 1; 3 33 f; 23 (=Ps 18), etc.

3. Poetry in Non-poetical Books LITERATURE.—The most important books and articles on the subject have been mentioned in the course of the foregoing article. There is a full list of works dealing with Heb meter in W. H. Cobb, Criticism of Systems of Heb Metre, 19 ff. The first edition of Ewald's still valuable "Essay on Heb Poetry" prefixed to his comm. on the Pss was published in Eng. in the Journal of Sacred Literature (1848), 74 ff, 295 ff. In 1909 J. W. Rothstein issued a suggestive treatise on Heb rhythm (Grundzüge des heb. Rhythmus . . . nebst lyrischen Texten mit kritischem Kommentar, Svo +vi +398), reviewed by the present writer in Review of Theol. and Philos. (Edinburgh), October, 1911. Early Religious Poetry of the Hebrews by E. G. King (Cambridge University Press) contains a good, brief, popular statement of the subject, though it makes no pretense to originality. In The Poets of the OT, 1912, Professor A. R. Gordon gives an excellent popular account of the poetry and poetical literature of the OT.

T. WITTON DAVIES

POETRY, NEW TESTAMENT: No one questions the presence of poetry of a high order in the OT. The study of the OT as the literature of the ancient Hebrews has been critically made, and the attention of even the ordinary reader of the Scriptures called to the beauty and wealth of its poetic passages. The message of the NT is so vitally spiritual and concerned with religion that but little attention has been paid to it as literature. Naturally it would be strange if the poetic inspiration which runs like a tide through the prophetic and post-exilic periods of the OT should altogether cease under the clearer spiritual dispensation of the NT. The fact is that it does not cease, but that under every fundamental rule for poetic utterance, save that of rhyme, the NT is seen to be rich in imaginative vision, in religion touched by emotion, and in poetic expression. The Gospels, the Pauline Epp., and the Ep. of Jas, all afford examples of lofty poetic utterance, while the message of Jesus is saturated with words which readily lend themselves to song. In fact it is thought by some that Jesus was no less careful of the form than of the content of His message, and that all the finer types of Heb poetry found in the OT can be matched from His sayings, even when tested by the same rules.

In the Gospels that of St. Luke gives us our best examples of poetry. "No sooner have we passed through the vestibule of his Gospel than we find ourselves within a circle of harmonies" (Burton, in Expositor's Bible). From the poetic utterances of Mary, Elisabeth, Zacharias, Simeon, and the Angels, the church gains her Magnificat, Beatitude, Benedictus, Nunc Dimittis and Glorias.

The utterances of John the Baptist are filled with a rugged desert vision and an expression which reveals a form of poesy in nowise to be mistaken for prose.

St. Paul presents many of his ideas in harmonious and beautiful forms. He knew the secular poets of his day, and has immortalized Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus (Acts 17 28). He also quotes from Epimenides and the Athenian dramatist Menander (1 Cor 15 33). St. Paul knew the poetry of the Hebrews, and enriches his own message with many quotations from it. He was acquainted with the Christian hymnology of his own times, as is seen in Eph 5 14 and 1 Tim 3 16. He offers also original flashes of poetic inspiration and utterance, a good example of which is found in Rom 8 31-37.

Who could doubt the poetic imagery of St. James? He might almost be called the poet of social justice and of patient waiting under affliction for the will of God to come to men.

When one comes to the words of Jesus he discovers that in a very true sense His speech answers to the requirements for Heb poetry. Examples of synonymous, antithetic, synthetic and causal parallelism are the rule rather than the exception in the utterances of Jesus. For the synonymous form see Mt 10 24; for the antithetic see Lk 6 41; for the synthetic and causal forms see Lk 9 23 and Mt 6 7. Not alone are these forms of Heb poetry found in the words of Jesus, but also the more involved and sustained poetic utterances (Lk 7 31-32).

No one can question the deep emotional quality, the vivid imagination and spiritual idealism of Jesus. That the form of His speech is adequately set to poetic inspiration and conforms to the laws for Heb poetry has not been so freely acknowledged. Independently of the theory advanced in Did Jesus Write His Own Gospel? (William Pitt MacVey), every student of the literature of the NT must be grateful for the chapter on "The Poems of Jesus."

Spirituality and poetry have a kinship, and the interpretation of any message is aided by the adequate knowledge of its form. When the NT has thus been carefully studied as literature, it will be seen, not only that Jesus was a poet, but that the entire NT, if not as rich as the OT in poetic passages, is sufficiently poetic to receive treatment as such in religious encyclopaedias. See also FAITHFUL SAYINGS; POETRY, HEBREW. C. E. SCHENK

POINTS, points: The word occurs in Eccl 5 16, "In all points [פְּנֵי, 'ummāh] as he came, so shall he go"—a man leaves the world in all regards as helpless as he entered it, no matter what he may have gained or accomplished during his life.

Also in He 4 15, "In all points [κατὰ πάντα, katà pánta, "in all things," as in His human nature (2 14), so in His human experience (cf 2 17.18)] tempted like as we are, yet without sin." He successfully resisted temptation at all points of His nature, in body, soul, and spirit. See TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. Westcott (in loc.) thinks that the reference is not so much to Christ issuing out of all His trials without the least stain of sin, as to "a limitation of His temptation. Man's temptations come in many cases from previous sin. Such temptations had necessarily no place in Christ. He was tempted as we are, sharing our nature, yet with this exception, that there was no sin in Him to become the spring of trial." Whichever interpretation is adopted there is profound insight into the things of the soul in joining sinlessness with fullness of experience of temptation. M. O. EVANS

POISON, poi'z'n (הַמָּוֶה, hēmāh, אֲשָׁר, rō'sh; θυμός, thumós, ἰός, íos): Residents in Pal must, from the first, have been acquainted with venomous serpents. Six species of these are widely diffused in the land, and at least three of them are fairly common in places. Besides, there are scorpions, centipedes and the large spider, which are as much dreaded by the fellahín as are the serpents, not to speak of the minor but very serious discomforts of mosquitoes, sandflies and ticks, some of which were credited with lethal powers. In Wisd 16 9 RV we read that "the bites of locusts and flies did slay, and there was not found a healing for their life." There are also many poisonous plants, such as belladonna, henbane, thorn apple, and the opium poppy. None of these is mentioned in the Bible; the only names found there are the hemlock (Conium maculatum) of Hos 10 4, the poisonous gourd (Citrullus colocynthis) of 2 K 4 39, and the grapes of gall, probably the fruit of Calotropis procera, the apples of Sodom of Jos (BJ, IV, viii, 4). Some, however, believe that these are poppyheads. Poisonous waters are referred to at Marah (Ex 15 23) and Jericho (2 K 2 19). There are no direct records of any person dying of poison except in 2 Mac 10 13, where the suicide of Ptolemy Macron is related. Our Lord's promise in the appendix to Mk 16 18 shows, however, that poisons were known and might be administered by way of ordeal, as was the unknown "water of jealousy" (Nu 5 17). In this connection the story in Eusebius (HE, III, 39) is interesting, that "Justus surnamed Barsabbas, though he drank a deadly poison, suffered no injury, through the grace of the Lord." The passages in which poisonous serpents are mentioned are Dt 32 24, where serpents (RV "crawling things") of the dust, probably Cerastes hasselquistii, the little horned vipers, are mentioned, and in ver 33: "poison of serpents, and the cruel venom of asps." The

asp may be the cobra Naja haje, not uncommon on the borders of the wilderness to the S. Ps 58 4 mentions the poison of serpents. Ps 140 3, "They have sharpened their tongue like a serpent; adders' poison is under their lips," indicates, what is still a common belief, that the forked tongue of the snake is the poison-bearer. This is referred to in Jas 3 8. That it was the fang and not the tongue which carried the poison was known to Pliny (xi.62). This verse of Ps 140 is given in St. Paul's composite quotation in Rom 3 13. There may be a reference to the giving of an intoxicant poison in Hab 2 15, where RV reads "that addest thy venom." The prophets speak in several places of God's wrath as a cup of trembling (RV "staggering"), e.g. Isa 51 17.22, probably suggested by the fact that hēmāh primarily means "fury" and is used in that sense in more than a hundred passages. In Zec 12 2 Jerus is to be such a "cup of reeling unto all the peoples round about."

The s'māmīth, "lizard" (AV "spider"), mentioned in Prov 30 28 (LXX kalabōtēs) was formerly regarded as poisonous and it is still much disliked by the fellahín, as they believe that it makes mocking gestures mimicking them at their prayers. They are really not poisonous. It is doubtful whether the lizard mentioned by Agur is really this stellion; the description better fits the gecko.

POLE, pōl: Nu 21 8.9 AV for סֹד, nēs, RV "standard."

POLICY, pol'i-si: Lit. "method of government," and so "ability to manage affairs." In a bad sense, "cunning," "craft," in Dnl 8 25 (לִבְיָשׁ, sekhel, "understanding"); in a good sense in 1 Macc 8 4 (βουλή, boulē, "counsel"); also in AV 2 Macc 13 18; 14 29.31 (μέθοδος, méthodos, στρατήγημα, stratēgēma, στρατηγέω, stratēgēō), where RV has "stratagem." Policies occurs in Jth 11 8 AV for πανούργημα, panourgēma, lit. "readiness for anything," here in a good sense; RV "subtil devices."

POLISHED, pol'isht. See CORNER-STONE, (2).

POLL, pōl: The word (on the derivation of which see Skeat, Concise Etym. Dict. of the Eng. Language, 360) has been eliminated as a vb. in ARV. In AV and ERV it represents the Heb vbs. קָשַׁם, kāšam, lit. "to shear" (Ezk 44 20), תִּיּוֹ, gāzaz, lit. "to pull out," "to uproot," thence "to shear the sheep," figuratively, "to destroy an enemy" (Mic 1 16), גָּלַח, gālah, in Piel, lit. "to make bald or round-headed" (2 S 14 26) and קָצַץ, kācaç, "to cut off" (Jer 9 26; 25 23; 49 32). The Heb noun is גֻּלְגֻלֶּת, gulgoleth. As will be seen from the above enumeration, the Heb vbs. differ considerably in etymology, while RV has not tried to distinguish. In Mic 1 16 we have a reference to the oriental custom of cutting or tearing one's hair as a sign of mourning for one's relatives. "Make thee bald, and cut off thy hair [AV and ERV "poll thee," Heb gāzaz] for the children of thy delight: enlarge thy baldness as the eagle [m "vulture"]; for they are gone into captivity from thee." The priests, the sons of Zadok, are instructed to abstain from outward resemblance to heathen patterns of priesthood: "Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only cut off the hair [AV and ERV "poll," Heb kāšam] of their heads" (Ezk 44 20). The Piel form of gālah is employed in the description of the annual hair-cutting of Absalom (2 S 14 26). Thrice we find the vb. "to poll" as the tr of Heb kācaç, where ARV materially improves the tr by adopting the marginal version of AV (Jer 9 26; 25 23; 49 32). See HAIR.

The noun (gulgoleth, lit. "head") is tr^d "poll" in the phrase "by the poll," "by their polls" (Nu 1. 2. 18.20.22; 3 47; 1 Ch 23 3.24). The expression has its origin in the numbering of persons by their heads, in the same way in which we speak of head-tax, etc.
H. L. E. LVERING

POLLUTION, po-lū'shun (פֹּלִיטָה, gā'al, "to pollute"; ἀλλογῆμα, allogēma, "contamination"): In Mal 1 7, "Ye offer polluted bread," i.e. not actually unclean, but worthless, common (cf Ezr 2 62), bread here being used metonymically for sacrificial offerings generally (cf Lev 21 6; Mt 6 11). The phrase in Acts 15 20, "the pollutions of idols," is explained in ver 29 by "things sacrificed [AV "meats offered"] to idols."

POLYGAMY, pō-lig'a-mi:

- | | |
|------------------------|-------------------------|
| 1. Meaning of the Term | 4. Polygamy Unnatural |
| 2. Origin of Polygamy | The Eunuch |
| 3. OT and Polygamy | 5. Weakness of Polygamy |

Polygamy has been and is the open blazon by the human race of sex vice. The very term is a misnomer. Since man became moralized he

1. Meaning of the Term has apprehended that the proper marriage relation between the sexes is monogamy. Whatever may have been the practice, since man could ask himself, What is right? he has known that ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ap' archēs ("from the beginning," Mt 19 4), au fond, at bottom, marriage is the choice of one man and one woman of each other for a life family relation. La Rochefoucauld said: "Hypocrisy is a sort of homage which vice pays to virtue." There is hypocrisy beneath the word polygamy. It is an attempt to cover up by the term "plural marriage" what is not marriage and cannot be marriage. There is no particular need of defining what the condition is, so long as we can look upon it as a violation and negation of the marriage relation. The very use of the term from any language covering a like condition is attempt—

"To steal the livery of the court of heaven
To serve the Devil in."

Polygamy is a general term and might mean a multiplicity of partners in the family relation by one of either sex. But it does not. Polygamy practically means exactly "polygyny" (γυνή, gunē), i.e. it describes a many-wived man. The correlative term "polyandry" describes the condition of a woman who has many men in family relation with herself. They are all husbands to her, as in polygamy all the women are wives to one man. But polyandry in historic times has had so little illustration that it may be dismissed as so exceptional as to be worthy of no further notice here.

Why polygamy has captured the whole position philologically covered by polygyny is readily apparent. The might of the physically strongest has dictated the situation. Man has on the average one-fourth more muscular force than woman. When it comes to wrong in sex relation, man has that advantage, and it has given him the field covered by the word "polygamy." There he is master and woman is the victim.

It is plainly evident that polygamy is primarily largely the outcome of tribal wars. When men had separated into clans and had taken up

2. Origin of different places of abode, collisions Polygamy would soon occur between them. What would happen in such cases would be what we know did happen in North America soon after its first settlement by Europeans, to wit, the destruction of the Hurons by the Iroquois. The great majority of the men were massacred; the women and children, driven to the abode of the conquerors, disappearing there mainly in concubinage and slavery. What shall be done with this surplus of women? Here again the might of the strongest comes to the front. The chief or the most heroic fighter would assert his right to choice of captives, and thus concubinage or what is the same thing—polygamy—would be set up. Successes in further wars come and add other women to be distributed. Of course to the sheik or king there soon comes the seraglio and the harem. Polygamous practices will come in in other ways. The prisoner of war becomes property and passes from hand to hand by gift or sale. So woman—the weaker party—endures what comes to her as slave, concubine. We have now no longer the "helpmeet" originally destined for man—"bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh"—for whom he would "leave his father and his mother" and to whose single self he would "cleave" for life (Gen 2 18.24; Mt 19 5.6). Monogamy, with its unity in labor, thought and feeling, with its immeasurable modifying influences of moral, ideal and spiritual cast, is gone. Woman is reduced to the position of ministrant to man's unmodified sensuality.

The complications introduced into morals by polygamy are not often considered. But the Bible sets them forth in plainness. The

3. The OT marriage of Abraham and Sarah seems and Polygamy to have been an original love match, and even to have preserved something of that character through life. Still we find Sarah under the influence of polygamous ideas, presenting Abraham with a concubine. Yet afterward, when she herself had a son, she induced Abraham to drive out into the wilderness this concubine and her son. Now Abraham was humane and kind, and it is said "The thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight" (Gen 21 11). But he was in the toils of polygamy, and it brought him pain and retribution. A Divine direction may be hard to bear.

The conditions of Jacob's marriages were such that it is hard to say whether any of his children were of any other than of polygamous origin (Gen 35 22-26). Where the family idea and affection went, in such mixed condition, is evidenced by the unblushing sale, for slavery in Egypt, of one of the brothers by the others (37 28).

David was a singer of sweet and noble songs and wanted to be a righteous man with his whole heart. Yet, probably in common with all the military leaders and kings of the earth of his day, he had a polygamous career. His retributions ran along an extended line. There was a case of incest and murder among his children (2 S 13). The son in whom he had most hope and pride organized treason against his throne, and lost his life in the attempt. David left his kingdom to Solomon, of whom much might be said, but of whom this can be said—evidently originally a man bright, keen-witted, wise, yet in his old age he went to pieces by the wiles of the women with whom he had loaded his harem. Partly by his extravagance in his polygamous life, and partly in attempt to build temples in distant places for the religions represented by the inmates of his harem, he bankrupted his nation. As a consequence his kingdom was divided at his death, and there was never again a united Israel (1 K 11 12). Polygamy may be justly charged with these untoward results.

It can be demonstrated scientifically, even mathematically, that polygamy is a moral wrong. Statistics show that births are substantially equally divided between the sexes. Excess seems slightly on the side of males. When this fact is considered and also the fact of the wide prevalence of polygamy, it would seem that polygamy 4. Polygamy (polygyny) is a greater crime against Unnatural Nature than polyandry. To put out of view for a moment the wrong to woman in denying to her the rights and privileges of monogamous marriage, the interference with the rights of man to such marriage looms up in vast proportion. Every harem is the denial to men of the right to seek among its inmates wives according to the dictates of their own hearts.

The eunuch.—But we are not done with the crime against man. Given a harem, and he who set it up has made, or there brought, the eunuch. The lord of the harem must be served by emasculated men. A search in history will reveal an amount of this wickedness that is past belief. The eunuch has been everywhere among all nations and peoples and tongues. They have not only been servitors to women in harems, but they have acquired such influence with their masters that they have sometimes even dictated the policy of government. They have been the secret cabinet that has had the last word in public affairs. They have sometimes held public positions and shown therein astonishing ability. Witness Narses, the brilliant general of the emperor Justinian. See EUNUCH.

Gibbon noticed the fact that nations began to decline in power when their policies were dictated and managed by eunuchs. But that is taking a symptom for the disease. There are weaknesses behind that weakness. We have found woman in muscular strength equal to three-fourths of a man. If we claim nothing more for woman than that ratio through the whole scale of her potencies, what would be thought of a nation that should try to reduce that three-fourths of potency as nearly to zero as it could? This is what polygamy has done—reduced woman as nearly to a cipher as it could in all the departments of her being. She has been held to the lowest and most primitive industrial pursuits. She has been deprived of intellectual development. She has been debarred from society, permitted to look at it only through a home lattice, or, if abroad, through a swathed face. The harem of sheik or sultan has fixed the condition of woman in province or nation—set the bounds to her life. The highest office assigned her has been breeder of children, and for one-half of them—the daughters—she could have no possible hope or ambition (see WOMAN).

5. Weakness of Polygamy Where in such degradation is the "helpmeet" for man in all his problems? This condition is reflected back over man. What possible appeal can there be to him for thought and energy except to repeat the same dull round exhibited in his daily life? Polygamous nations have never been industrial inventors, have contributed little to science. They have usually ruined the fertility of the lands they have occupied. They have been heavily weighted with the lethargy of a system that appeals to nothing but the most primitive instincts and vices of man.

The monogamous have been the forceful nations. Rome conquered the world while she was monogamous, and lost control of it when she dropped to the moral level of the sex corruption of the peoples she had conquered. The Teuton trundled into and over Europe in ox-carts mounted on solid wood trucks. But his cart carried one wife, and now all polygamy is held under the trained guns of the Teuton.

There may seem to be two exceptions—the establishment of the Mogul empire in India and the subjugation of Western Asia and Eastern Europe by the Turk. That in both cases there was great success in war is granted. They were authorized by their religion to exhibit the frenzy of bloodshed and indulge in lust. Indeed, enjoyment of the latter was a bright hope for the life to come. But when they had possession of a country, and massacres and ravishing were over, what then? For what is mankind indebted to them?

A lyric.—A lyric has been put in the hand of the present writer by a friend who wrote it at the last date of the title. It is one of the lyrics of the centuries in its synthesis of history and in its insight into the forces physical, moral and immoral at work in the Mogul empire of India. Notice the dates. The text will show what took place between.

THE MOGUL 1525-1857

A war steed coursed out the wind-swept north,
Jarring the crags with hoofs of fire,
Snuffing far battle with nostril wide,
Neighing the joy of fierce desire.

The crisping herbage of arid plains
Had toughened his sinews like bands of steel;
The snow-fed waters of Zarafshan
Had nerved the might of a northern will.

The war steed grazed in the fertile meads,
Drinking the waters of indolent streams:
He rested at eve on bloom-dight beds,
Toyed with by maidens in the goldening gleams.

They charmed his ear with dalliant song:
They closed his eyes in witchery's glee:
They fed him the vineyards' wildering draught—
He slept in the breath of the lotus tree.

White bones lie strewn on the flowering mead,
In flesh-rank grass grown high and dark.
The carrion bird hath flown—hath died—
Riseth the war-horse? Neigheth? Hark!
—JOSEPH TORREY READE, Amherst, 1856.

The above lyric may be taken as the epitaph of any polygamous nation. The last words are significant—"Neigheth? Hark!" Would the old war steed arise? "Hark!" The Sepoy rebellion was on! We "harkened," but the rebellion went to pieces and an end was put to the Mogul empire. We have listened for half a century and heard no sound. We hear mutterings now, but the end will be as before—even if the "war-horse" riseth and is victorious. He will then again lie down in "flesh-rank grass grown high and dark," and the "carrion bird" will fly from his "white bones." Streams cannot rise higher than their fountains. The causes remaining, the same effects will follow. See DIVORCE; FAMILY; MARRIAGE.

POMEGRANATE, pom'gran-ât, pom-gran'ât, pum'gran-ât (רִמּוֹן, rimmôn [tree and fruit]; the

Heb name is similar to the Arab., 1. A Tree Aram. and Ethiopic; ῥόα, rhóa): One times. The spies brought specimens of figs and pomegranates, along with grapes, from the Vale of Eschol (Nu 13 23). Vines, figs and pomegranates are mentioned (Nu 20 5) as fruits the Israelites missed in the wilderness; the promised land was to be one "of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates" (Dt 8 8), a promise renewed in Hag 2 19. In the lamentation in Joel 1 11,12 we have the pomegranate, the palm tree and the apple tree represented as withered, "for joy is withered away from the sons of men."

The pomegranate tree, Punica granatum (N.O. Granateae) occurs usually as a shrub or small tree 10-15 ft. high, and is distinguished by its fresh green, oval leaves, which fall in winter, and its brilliant scarlet blossoms (cf Cant 7 12). The beauty of an orchard of pomegranates is referred to in Cant 4 13. The fruit which is ripe about September is apple-shaped, yellow-brown with a blush of red, and is surmounted by a crown-like hard calyx; on breaking the hard rind, the white or pinkish, translucent fruits are seen tightly packed together inside. The juicy seeds are sometimes sweet and sometimes somewhat acid, and need sugar for eating. The juice expressed from the seeds is made into a kind of syrup for flavoring drinks, and in ancient days was made into wine: "I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine, of the juice [m "sweet wine"] of my pomegranate" (Cant 8 2). The beauty of a cut section of pomegranate—or one burst open naturally, when fully ripe—may have given rise to the comparison in Cant 4 3; 6 7: "Thy temples are like a piece of a pomegranate." The rind of the pomegranate contains a very high percentage of tannic acid, and is employed both as a medicine and for tanning, particularly in making genuine morocco leather.

Whether the pomegranate tree in Migron under which Saul is said (1 S 14 2) to have abode with his 600 men was really a tree or a place, Rimmon, is doubtful. See RIMMON.

A large number of references to the pomegranate are to the use of the form of the fruit in ornamentation, in which respect it appears among the Hebrews to have something of the position of the lotus bud as a decorative motive in Egypt. It was embroidered in many colors on the skirts of Aaron's garments, together with golden bells (Ex 28 33 f; 39 24-26; cf Eccles 45 9). Hiram of Tyre introduced the pomegranate into his brass work ornamentation in the temple: "So he made the pillars; and there were two rows round about upon the one network, to cover the capitals that were upon the top of the pillars" (m "So the Syr. The Heb has 'pomegranates'") (1 K 7 18). "And the pomegranates were two hundred, in rows round about upon the other capital" (ver 20; cf also ver 42; 2 K 25 17; 2 Ch 3 16; 4 13).

POMMEL, pum'el (2 Ch 4 12.13): RV reads "bowl" (q.v.).

POND. See CISTERN; POOL.

PONDER, pon'dēr: Occurs in AV 5 t in the Book of Prov and nowhere else in the OT. In each case it means "to consider carefully," "to weigh mentally." In Prov 4 26 and 5 21, RV substitutes "make level." In Prov 5 6, it drops out entirely in RV. In Prov 21 2 and 24 12, "weigh" is substituted for "ponder." The one NT passage is Lk 2 19; here RV has "pondering" where AV has "and pondered."

PONTIUS, pon'shi-us, pon'ti-us. See PILATE.

PONTUS, pon'tus (Πόντος, Póntos): Was an important province in the northeastern part of Asia Minor, lying along the south shore of the Black Sea. The name was geographical, not ethnical, in origin, and was first used to designate that part of Cappadocia which bordered on the "Pontus," as the Euxine was often termed. Pontus proper extended from the Halys River on the W. to the borders of Colchis on the E., its interior boundaries meeting those of Galatia, Cappadocia and Armenia. The chief rivers besides the Halys were the Iris, Lycus and Thermodon. The configuration of the country included a beautiful but narrow, riparian margin, backed by a noble range of mountains parallel to the coast, while these in turn were broken by the streams that forced their way from the interior plains down to the sea; the valleys, narrower or wider, were fertile and productive, as were the wide plains of the interior such as the Chilikomon and Phanarocia. The mountain slopes were originally clothed with heavy forests of beech, pine and oak of different species, and when the country was well afforested, the rainfall must have been better adequate than now to the needs of a luxuriant vegetation.

The first points in the earliest history of Pontus emerge from obscurity, much as the mountain peaks of its own noble ranges lift their heads above a fog bank. Thus we catch glimpses of Assyr culture at Sinope and Amisus, probably as far back as the 3d millennium BC. The period of Hittite domination in Asia Minor followed hard after, and there is increasing reason to suppose that the Hittites occupied certain leading city sites in Pontus, constructed the artificial mounds or tumuli that frequently meet the eyes of modern travelers, hewed out the rock tombs, and stamped their character upon the early conditions. The home of the Amazons, those warrior priestesses of the Hittites, was located on the banks of the Thermodon, and the mountains rising behind Terme are still called the "Amazon Range"; and the old legends live still in stories about the superior prowess of the modern women living there. See ARCHAEOLOGY OF ASIA MINOR.

As the Hittite power shrunk in extent and force, by the year 1000 BC bands of hardy Gr adventurers appeared from the W. sailing along the Euxine main in quest of lands to exploit and conquer and colonize. Cape Jason, which divides the modern mission fields of Trebizond and Marsovan, preserves the memory of the Argonauts and the Golden Fleece. Miletus, "greatest of the Ionic towns," sent out its colonists, swarm after swarm, up through the Bosphorus, and along the southern shore of the Black Sea. They occupied Sinope, the northernmost point of the peninsula with the best harbor and the most commanding situation. Sinope was in Paphlagonia, but politically as well as commercially enjoyed intimate relations with the Pontic cities. Settlers from Sinope, reinforced by others from Athens direct, pressed on and founded Amisus, the modern Samsoun, always an important commercial city. Another colony from Sinope founded Trebizond, near which Xenophon and the Ten Thousand reached the sea again after they had sounded the power of Persia and found it hollow at Cunaxa. Among the cities of the interior, picturesque Amasia in the gorge of the Iris River witnessed the birth of Strabo in the 1st cent. BC, and to the geographer Strabo, more than to any other man, is due our knowledge of Pontus in its early days. Zille, "built upon the mound of Semiramis," contained the sanctuary of Anaitis, where sacrifices were performed with more pomp than in any other place. Comana, near the modern Tokat, was a city famous for the worship of the great god Ma. Gr culture by degrees took root along the coast; it mixed with, and in turn was modified by, the character of the older native inhabitants.

When the Persians established their supremacy in Asia Minor with the overthrow of Lydia, 546 BC, Pontus was loosely joined to the great empire and was ruled by Pers satraps. Ariobarzanes, Mithradates and Pharnaces are the recurring names in this dynasty of satraps which acquired independence about 363 and maintained it during the Macedonian period. The man that first made Pontus famous in history was Mithradates VI, surnamed Eupator. Mithradates was a typical oriental despot, gifted, unscrupulous, commanding. Born at Sinope 136 BC and king at Amasia at the age of twelve, Mithradates was regarded by the Romans as "the most formidable enemy the Republic ever had to contend with." By conquest or alliance he widely extended his power, his chief ally being his son-in-law Dikran, or Tigranes, of Armenia, and then prepared for the impending struggle with Rome. The republic had acquired Pergamum in 133 BC and assumed control of Western Asia Minor. There were three Rom armies in different parts of the peninsula when war broke out, 88 BC. Mithradates attacked them separately and overthrew them all. He then planned and executed a general massacre of all the Romans in Asia Minor, and 80,000 persons were cut down. Sulla by patient effort restored the fortunes of Rome, and the first war ended in a drawn game; each party had taken the measure of its antagonist, but neither had been able to oust the other. The second war began in the year 74, with Lucullus as the Rom general. Lucullus took Amisus by siege, chased Mithradates to Cabira, modern Niksar, scattered his army and drove the oriental sultan out of his country. Subsequently on his return to Rome, Lucullus carried from Kerasoun the first cherries known to the western world. In the third war the hero on the Rom side was the masterful Pompey, appointed in 66 BC. As a result of this war, Mithradates was completely vanquished. His dominions were finally and permanently incorporated in the territories of the Rom republic. The aged king, breathing out wrath and forming impossible plans against his lifelong enemies, died in exile in the Crimea from poison administered by his own hand.

Most of Pontus was for administrative purposes united by the Romans with the province of Bithynia, though the eastern part subsisted as a separate kingdom under Polemon and his house, 36 BC to 63 AD, and the southwestern portion was incorporated with the province of Galatia.

It was during the Rom period that Christianity entered this province. There were Jews dwelling in Pontus, devout representatives of whom were in Jerus on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2 9). Paul's associates, Aquila and Priscilla, were originally from here (Acts 18 2). The sojourners of the Dispersion are included in the address of the first Ep. of Peter together with the people of four other provinces in Asia Minor (1 Pet 1 1). Local traditions connect the apostles Andrew and Thaddeus with evangelistic labors in this region. They are said to have followed the great artery of travel leading from Caesarea Mazaca to Sinope. Pliny, governor of Bithynia and Pontus 111-13 AD, found Christians under his authority in great numbers (see BITHYNIA), and Professor Ramsay argues that Pliny's famous letters, Nos. 96 and 97, written to the emperor Trajan on the subject of the treatment of Christians under his government (see PERSECUTION), were composed in view of conditions in Amisus (Church in Rom Empire, 224, 225).

The Rom empire in the East was gradually merged into the Byzantine, which is still known to the local inhabitants as the empire of "Roum," i.e. Rome. Pontus shared the vicissitudes of this rather unfortunate government until, in 1204, a branch of the Byzantine imperial family established in Pontus a separate small state with its capital at Trebizond. Here the house of the Grand Comneni, sheltered between the sea and the mountain ranges, maintained its tinsel sovereignty to and beyond the fall of Constantinople. In 1461 Trebizond was taken by Mohammed the Conqueror, since which date Pontus, with its conglomerate population of Turks, Armenians, Greeks and fragments of other races, has been a part of the Ottoman empire. "to dive"): LAKES (q.v.) are very rare in Syria and Pal, but the dry climate, which is one reason for the fewness of lakes, impels the inhabitants to make artificial pools or reservoirs to collect the water of the rain or of springs for irrigation and also for drinking. The largest of these are made by damming water courses, in which water flows during the winter or at least after showers of rain. These may be enlarged or deepened by excavation. Good examples of this are found at Dibān and Mādeba in Moab. Smaller pools of rectangular shape and usually much wider than deep, having no connection with water courses, are built in towns to receive rain from the roofs or from the surface of the ground. These may be for common use like several large ones in Jerus, or may belong to particular houses. These are commonly excavated to some depth in the soil or rock, though the walls are likely to rise above the surface. Between these and cylindrical pits or cisterns no sharp line can be drawn.

The water of springs may be collected in large or small pools of masonry, as the pool of Siloam (Jn 9 7). This is commonly done for irrigation when the spring is so small that the water would be lost by absorption or evaporation if it were attempted to convey it continuously to the fields. The pool (Arab. birkat) receives the trickle of water until it is full. The water is then let out in a large stream and conducted where it is needed. (In this way by patient labor a small trickling spring may support much vegetation.)

'Āgham does not seem to be used of artificial pools, but rather of natural or accidental depressions containing water, as pools by the Nile (Ex 7 19; 8 5), or in the wilderness (Ps 107 35; 114 8; Isa 14 23; 35 7; 41 18; 42 15). In Isa 19 10 the rendering of AV, "all that make sluices and ponds for fish," would be an exception to this statement, but RV has "all they that work for hire shall be grieved in soul." Mikweh occurs with 'āgham in Ex 7 19 of the ponds and pools by the Nile. B'rēkhāh is used of "the pool of Gibeon" (2 S 2 13), "the pool in Hebron" (2 S 4 12), "the pool of Samaria" (1 K 22 38), "the pools in Heshbon" (Cant 7 4), "the pool of Shelah," AV "Shiloah" (Neh 3 15); cf "the waters of Shiloah" (Isa 8 6). We read in Eccl 2 6, "I made me pools of water, to water therefrom the forest where trees were reared." There is mention of "the upper pool" (2 K 18 17; Isa 7 3; 36 2), "the lower pool" (Isa 22 9), "the king's pool" (Neh 2 14). Isa 22 11 has, "Ye made also a reservoir [mikwāh] between the two walls for the water of the old pool [b'rēkhāh]." Kolum-bēthra is used of the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5 2.4.7) and of the pool of Siloam (Jn 9 7.11). POOLS, pōōlz, OF SOLOMON. See CISTERN; POOL.

POOR, pōōr (עָבְיֹן, 'ebhyōn, דָּל, dal, עָנִי, 'anī, רָשָׁע, rūsh; πτωχός, ptōchós):

I. In the OT.—The poor have great prominence in the Bible; it is said, indeed, that there should be no poor among the Hebrews because Jeh should so greatly bless them (Dt 15 4 RV and AVm); but this was only to be realized on certain conditions of obedience (ver 5), and in ver 11 it is said, "The poor will never cease out of the land"; but they were to see to it that none was left in destitution. The very foundation of the Heb religion was God's pity on a poor and oppressed people.

The words for "poor" are chiefly 'ebhyōn, "desirous," "needy," "poor" (Ex 23 6, etc.); dal, "moving," "swaying," hence, weak, poor, lowly (Ex 23 3, etc.); aallāh, "poverty," "weakness" (2 K 25 12, etc.); rūsh, perhaps "to shake," "tremble," "to be poor." Employed "impoverished" (1 S 18 23, etc.); 'anī, also 'anāw, "poor," "oppressed," from 'anāh, "to bend" or "bow down" (Ex 22 25, etc.); 'anēh, Aram. (Dnl 4 27), hēlēkhāh, "wretchedness," (Ps 10 8.14 AV); yārash, "to make poor" (1 S 2 7); maḥsōr, "want" (Prov 21 17); miškēn, "a needy one" (Eccl 4 13; 9 15bis.16).

(1) Generally.—God (Jeh and 'Ēlōhīm) is represented as having a special care for "the poor," which was illustrated in the deliverance of the nation from Egypt poverty and bondage and was never to be forgotten by them (Dt 24 22); as punishing the oppressors of the poor and rewarding those who were kind to them; God Himself was the Protector and Saviour of the poor (Ex 22 23): "If thou afflict them at all, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; and my wrath shall wax hot," etc (Dt 15 9; 24 15; 1 S 2 8; Job 31 16; Ps 9 18; 12 5; Prov 19 17; Isa 25 4; Eccl 5 8, "one higher than the high regardeth," etc).

(2) Liberality to the poor is specially enjoined (Dt 15 7 f), and they were to beware of self-deception and grudging in this (vs 9.10).

(3) Special provisions were made on behalf of the poor: (a) Every third year a tithe was to be given "unto the Levite, to the sojourner, to the fatherless and to the widow" that Jeh might bless them (Dt 14 28.29; 26 12 f); (b) the poor were to have the free use of all that grew spontaneously in field or vineyard during the Sabbatic year (Ex 23 10 f; Lev 25 5.6); (c) each year the gleanings of the fields and vineyards should belong to the poor, the corners of fields were to be left for them, and if a sheaf was forgotten it should remain (Lev 19 9.10; 23 22; Dt 24 19); (d) fruit and ripe grain in a field might be eaten by any hungry person, but none should be carried away (Dt 23 24.25); (e) in the Feast of Weeks the poor were to participate (Dt 16 9-12); (f) every seventh year there should be a "release" of debts (Dt 15 1 f); in the seventh year of servitude the Heb bond-servant should go free (Ex 21 2), or in the Jubilee, if that came first, on which occasion—the fiftieth year—property that had been sold returned to its owner or his family (Lev 25 8-17); (g) they were to lend readily to the poor, and no interest or increase was to be taken from their brethren (Ex 22 25; Lev 25 35-37; Dt 15 7 f); in Lev 25 39, no poor Hebrew was to be made a bond-servant, and, if a hired servant, he was not to be ruled with rigor (ver 43); his hire was to be given him daily (Lev 19 13; Dt 24 15); no widow's raiment was to be taken in pledge (Dt 24 17), nor the handmill, nor the upper millstone so essential for daily life (ver 6), a man's garment should be returned to him before sundown, and no house should be entered to seize or fetch any pledge (vs 10-13); breach of these laws should be sin and their observance righteousness (Dt 24 13.15, etc; see ALMS, ALMSGIVING); (h) justice was to be done to the poor (Ex 23 6; Dt 27 19, "Cursed be he that wresteth the justice due to the sojourner, fatherless, and widow"); (i) offerings were graduated according to means (Lev 5 7; 12 8).

(4) Definite penalties were not always attached to those laws, and the prophets and psalmists have many complaints of the unjust treatment and oppression of the poor, contrary to the will of God, and frequent exhortations to justice and a due regard for them (Ps 10 2.9; 12 5; 14 6, etc; Isa 3 14.15; Jer 2 34; Ezk 16 49, "the iniquity of . . . Sodom"; 18 12.17; 22 29; Am 2 7; 4 1; Hab 3 14; cf Job 20 19; 24 9.14, etc; Prov 14 31).

(5) The duty of caring for the poor is frequently and strongly set forth and Divine promises attached to its fulfilment (Ps 41 1; 72 12 ff; Prov 17 5; 22 9; 28 3.27; Isa 58 7; Jer 22 16; Ezk 18 17; Dnl 4 27; Zec 7 10, etc; cf Job 29 12.16; 30 25; 31 19; Ps 112 9).

(6) The day of the Divine manifestation, the times of the Messiah, should bring deliverance and rejoicing to the poor (Ps 72 12-15; Isa 11 4, "With righteousness shall he judge the poor," etc; 14 30; 29 19; 61 1 RVm).

(7) The equality of rich and poor before God and the superiority of the righteous poor to the ungodly rich, etc, are maintained (Prov 19 1.22; 22 1.2; Eccl 4 13).

(8) Ways in which men can wilfully make themselves poor are mentioned (Prov 6 11; 10 4; 12 24; 13 4.18; 14 23; 20 13; 21 5.17; 23 21; 28 19).

The chief words given above all mean poor, literally, but 'anī (rendered also "afflicted") may also denote Israel as a nation in its afflictions and low estate, e.g. Ps 68 Godly Poor 10; Isa 41 17; 49 13; 51 21; 54 11; in Zeph 3 12, it is "the ideal Israel of the future." Dr. Driver remarks (art. "Poor," HDB) that such passages show that 'anī (as also its frequent parallel 'ebhyōn, and, though somewhat less distinctly, dal) came gradually "to denote the godly poor, the suffering righteous, the persons who, whether 'bowed down' or 'needy' or 'reduced,' were the godly servants of Jeh." The humble poor became in fact distinguished as the line in which faithfulness to Jeh was maintained and spiritual religion developed. The less frequent word 'ānāw, often tr^d "meek," "humble," is regarded (see Driver in loc.) as having from the first a moral and religious significance. It is used of Moses (Nu 12 3) and occurs in Ps 10 12.17; 22 26; 25 9, etc; Prov 3 34; 16 19; Isa 29 19; 32 7; 61 1; Am 2 7; Zeph 2 3.

II. In the NT.—In the NT ptōchos, "trembling," "poor," "beggar," is almost exclusively the word tr^d "poor." It does not occur very frequently, but we see the same regard for the poor maintained as we have in the OT; besides, the new principle of love and the example of Him who "though he was rich, yet for your sakes . . . became poor" (ptōcheiō, 2 Cor 8 9) necessarily carry in them this regard even more fully than in the OT. Jesus announced His mission (Lk 4 18) by quoting Isa 61 1, "to preach good tidings [AV "the gospel"] to the poor" (or meek or humble); He gave as a proof of His Messiahship the fact that "the poor have the gospel [or good news of the Kingdom] preached to them" (Mt 11 5; Lk 7 22); according to Lk 6 20, He pronounced a beatitude on the pious "poor" because the kingdom of God was theirs; in Mt 5 3 it is "the poor in spirit" (the humble); we have the injunction to "give to the poor" (Mt 19 21; Mk 10 21; Lk 18 22) who are "always with you" (Mt 26 11; Mk 14 7; Jn 12 8), which does not mean that there must always be "the poor," but that, in contrast with Himself who was soon to leave them, the poor should remain and kindness could be shown to them at any time, which was His own practice (Jn 13 29); we are enjoined to call not the rich or well-to-do to our entertainments, but the poor (Lk 14 13; cf ver 21); Zacchaeus cited in his favor the fact that he gave "half of his goods to the poor" (Lk 19 8); special notice was taken by Jesus of the poor widow's contribution (Lk 21 3). The first church showed its regard for the poor in the distribution of goods "according as any man had need" (Acts 2 45; 4 32; 6 1); when the council at Jerus freed the Gentiles from the yoke of Judaism, they made it a condition, Paul says, "that we should remember the poor; which very thing I was also zealous to do" (Gal 2 10); contributions were accordingly made "for the poor among the saints that are at Jerus" (Rom 15 26), and it was in conveying such contributions that Paul got into the circumstances that led to his arrest. God's ability and will to provide for those who give to the poor is quoted from Ps 112 9 (2 Cor 9 9); James specially rebukes certain Christians of his day for their partiality for the rich and their dishonor of the poor (Jas 2 5-9), and John asks how, in the man who "hath the world's goods, and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him," the love of God can dwell (1 Jn 3 17. 18).

ptōchos is tr^d "beggar" (Lk 16 20.22) and "beggarly" (Gal 4 9); penēs, "one who works for his daily bread," "a poor man," is the word in 2 Cor 9 9; the poor widow of Mk 12 42 is described in Lk 21 2 as penichrōs, "very poor."

III. In the Apocrypha.—In the Apoc the poor are often mentioned; God's regard for them (Ecclus 21 5 [ptōchos]; 35 12.13); their oppression and wrongs (Wisd 2 10 [penēs]; Ecclus 13 3.19.23 [ptōchos]; Bar 6 28); the duty of care for and of giving to the poor (Tob 4 7 [ptōchos]; Ecclus 29 8 [apeinōs].9 [penēs]; 34 20-22); of justice and kindness to such (Ecclus 4 1.5.8; 7 32; 10 23 [ptōchos]); "poor" in the sense of pitiable occurs in 2 Macc 4 47 (alalipōros), RV "hapless."

IV. RV Changes.—For "the poor of this world" (Jas 2 5) RV has "them that are poor as to the world"; for "The poor . . . shall trust in it" (Isa 14 32), "In her shall the afflicted . . . take refuge"; instead of "Whereas also he that is born in his kingdom becometh poor" (Eccl 4 14), "Yea, even in his kingdom he was born poor"; "poor" for "humble" (Ps 9 12; 10 12, m "meek"), for "lowly" (Prov 16 19, m "meek").

POPLAR, pop'lār (לְבָנֹת, libneh, "whiteness"; στυράκιος, sturákinos, "storax" [Gen 30 37], λεύκη, leúkē, "poplar" [Hos 4 13] [libneh is so similar to the Arab. libna, the storax, that the latter certainly has the first claim to be the true tr]) : "Jacob took him rods of fresh poplar," m "storax tree" (Gen 30 37). "They . . . burn incense upon the hills, under oaks and poplars and terebinths, because the shadow thereof is good" (Hos 4 13). In the latter reference the conjunction of the shrub, storax, with two great trees like the oak and terebinth—even though they all grow in the mountains—is strange. The storax cannot give a shade comparable with these trees. Had we other evidence of the storax being a sacred tree among the Hebrews, it might explain the difficulty.

The storax, Styrax officinalis (N.O. Styracae), is a very common shrub in Pal which occasionally attains the height of 20 feet. The under surfaces of its oval leaves are covered with whitish hairs, and it has many beautiful pure-white flowers like orange blossoms—hence its name "whiteness."

The poplar, the traditional tr in Hos 4 13, flourishes in many parts of Pal. The white poplar, Populus alba, Arab. Haur, is common everywhere; Euphratica occurs esp. in the Jordan valley; the black poplar, P. nigra, and the Lombardy poplar, P. pyramidalis—probably an importation—are both plentiful in the plain of Coele-Syria, around Damascus and along the river banks of Syria.

PORATHA, pō-rā'tha, por'a-tha (פַּרְתָּה, pārā-thā): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 8). The etymology is uncertain; perhaps from the Pers purdata, "given by fate."

PORCH, pōrch: Chiefly in the OT אֹרְלָם, 'ulām, used of the temples of Solomon and Ezekiel (see TEMPLE); once mišd'rōn, a "vestibule," in Jgs 3 23. In the NT, the word occurs in connection with the high priest's palace (Mt 26 71, pulōn; Mk 14 68, proaülion), and as the rendering of στοά, stoá, a "portico," in Jn 5 2 (pool of Bethesda); and Jn 10 23; Acts 3 11; 5 12. See PORCH, PORTICO, SOLOMON'S.

PORCH, PORTICO, pōr'ti-kō, SOLOMON'S (ἡ στοά ἢ καλουμένη Σολομώντος, hē stoá hē kalouménē Solomōntos): This important element of Herod's temple, preserving in its name a traditional connection with Solomon, is thrice referred to in the NT, viz. in Jn 10 23; Acts 3 11, "the porch that is called Solomon's"; and Acts 5 12. In these passages the Gr word stoá is tr^d "porch," but in RVm of Acts 3 11 more correctly "portico." In architecture a "porch" is strictly an exterior structure forming a covered approach to the entrance of a building; a "portico" is an ambulatory, consisting of a roof supported by columns placed at regular intervals—a roofed colonnade. The portico bearing Solomon's name was that running along the eastern wall in the Court of the Gentiles of Herod's temple. It had double columns, while that on the S. known as the Royal Portico had four rows (cf Jos, Ant, XV, xi, 3; BJ, V, v, and see TEMPLE, HEROD'S). The portico was the scene of Christ's teaching at the Feast of the Dedication (Jn 10 23), and was flocked to by the multitude after the healing of the lame man (Acts 3 11). There the apostles preached and wrought other miracles (Acts 5 12).

PORCUPINE, pōr'kū-pin (כִּיפּוֹדִי, kippōdh [Isa 14 23; 34 11; Zeph 2 14], AV "bittern," RV "porcupine"; LXX ἐχίνος, echinos, "hedgehog"; קִפּוֹז, kippōz [Isa 34 15], AV "great owl," ERV "arrow-snake," ARV "dart-snake"; LXX echinos; cf Arab. قنفذ, kunfud, قنفذ, kunfudh, "hedgehog" or "porcupine." קפדה, kippādāh, is referred to √ קפד, kāphādāh, "to draw one's self together" or "to roll one's self up," while קפז is referred to √ קפז, kāphaz, and √ קפח, kāphaç, "to draw together in order to spring." The resemblance between all these words, including the Arab. قنفذ, is obvious, and it is to be noted that LXX has echinos in all the places cited):

The Gr echinos is the hedgehog. The Arab. kunfudh is used in some localities for the hedgehog and in others for the porcupine, which is also called nīs. The hedgehog is also called kibbābat-ush-shauk, or "ball of spines." These two animals are both found in Syria and Pal, and, while both have spines, they are very different animals, though often confounded. The hedgehog, Erinaceus europæus, is one of the Insectivora. It eats not only insects but also snakes and other small animals, as well as fruits and roots. It is about 10 in. long, covered with short spines, and rolls itself into a ball when attacked. It inhabits the countries bordering the Mediterranean. The porcupine, Hystrix cristata, is a rodent, about 26 in. long, having long spines. It is herbivorous. It backs rapidly at its foes, thrusting its sharp spines into their flesh, not shooting its spines, as is often stated. It inhabits most of Europe and Asia. It is very different from the Canadian porcupine, Erethizon dorsatus, as well as from the tree porcupines of Mexico and Central and South America.

As to the rendering "bittern" for kippōdāh (Isa 14 23; 34 15; Zeph 2 14), while the etymology favors "hedgehog," the context favors a bird, esp. in Isa 34 11, though it cannot be said that in any of the passages the context makes "hedgehog" an impossible rendering.

In Isa 34 15, for kippōz, most modern authorities (cf RV) have some sort of serpent, referring to the Arab. √ kafaz, "to spring." (See notes above on kāphaz and kāphaç.) In this passage also the context is not unfavorable to a bird (cf AV "great owl"). See BITTERN; OWL; SERPENT.

ALFRED ELY DAY

PORPHYRY, pōr'fī-ri (in Est 1 6, RVm has "porphyry" [AVm "porphyre"] for בַּהַל, bahāl, EV "red [marble]"; LXX has σμαραγδίνης, smaragdīnēs, which was a green stone): Porphyry is an igneous rock containing distinct crystals of feldspar in a feldspathic matrix. It may be purple or of other colors, as green. "Porphyry" is from πορφύρεος, porphūreos, "purple."

PORPOISE, pōr'pus (RVm has "porpoise-skin" for עֹר תַּהַשׁ, ōr tahash, RV "sealskin," AV "badgers' skins" [Ex 25 5; 26 14; 35 7.23; 36 19; 39 34; Nu 4 6.8.10.11.12.14.25; Ezk 16 10]): The word denotes leather used in the furnishings of the tabernacle (for shoes in Ezk 16 10), and was probably the skin of the dugong, Halichore dugong, Arab. نُخَس, tukhas, which is found in the Red Sea. See BANGER.

PORT, pōrt, PORTER, pōr'tēr: "Port" in the sense of "gate" (of a city or building) is obsolete in modern Eng., and even in the AV is found only in Neh 2 13. "Porter," as "gate-keeper," however, is still in some use, but "porter" now (but never in EV) generally means a burden-carrier. In the OT, except in 2 S 18 26; 2 K 7 10.11, the porter (שַׂרְעָר, shō'ēr) is a sacred officer of the temple or tabernacle, belonging to a particular family of the Levites, with a share in the sacred dues (Neh 13 5; 12 47). The "porters" are mentioned only in Ch, Ezr and Neh, and Ch has an especial interest in them, relating that their duties were settled as far back as the time of David (1 Ch 26 1-19), and that the office extended further to the first settlement of Pal and even to Moses' day (1 Ch 9 17-26). The office was evidently one of some dignity, and the "chief-porters" (1 Ch 9 26) were important persons. For some inscrutable reason RV renders shō'ēr by "doorkeeper" in 1 Ch 15-26, but not elsewhere. See DOORKEEPER.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

PORTION, pōr'shun, PART: As far as a distinction between these words is possible in Eng., it lies in the fact that a "portion" is a "part" about whose destiny something is implied (Ps 142 5, etc). The Heb has no two synonyms similarly related, and in consequence the use of the words in EV is settled either by rather arbitrary considerations (מַנְהָ, m'nāh, is always "portion" in RV, but is "part" in AV, Ex 29 26; Lev 7 33; 8 29) or by the context, irrespective of the Heb word used. So "part" and "portion" both represent דָּבָר, dābhār, 1 K 6 38; Neh 12 47; פֶּה, peh, Zec 13 8; Dt 21 17; הֶבְהֵל, hebbhel, Josh 17 5 (RV); Ezk 47 13; μέρος, méros, Lk 11 36; 12 46. And in the vast majority of cases in the OT both words represent simply some derivative of הָלַק, hālāk, normally the noun הֶלֶק, hēlek.

POSIDONIUS, pos-i-dō'ni-us (Ποσιδώνιος, Pōsidōnīos, al. Ποσιδόνιος, Posidōnīos and Ποσειδών, Poseidōn): One of the three envoys sent by the Syrian general Nicanor to treat with the Jews under Judas during his invasion of Judaea, 161 BC (2 Macc 14 19). In 1 Macc 7 27 ff, proposals are sent by Nicanor to Judas, but no envoys are named, and it is there asserted in contradiction to 2 Macc that Judas broke off the negotiation because of the treacherous designs of Nicanor.

POSSESS, po-zes', POSSESSION, po-zesh'un: "Possess" in modern Eng. means normally only "keep in one's possession." But in Elizabethan Eng. it means also "take into possession," and, in fact, the word in the OT always represents Heb vbs. with the latter as their primary meaning (יָרַשׁ, yārash, in nearly all cases, otherwise יָחַל, nāhal, קָנָה, kānāh, אָחַז, 'āhaz; Aram. חָסַן, hāṣan). Consequently, in almost every case "take possession of" could be substituted advantageously for "possess," but RV has not thought the change worth carrying through. In the Apoc and NT, however, the distinction has been made, AV's "possess" being retained for κατέχω, katéchō, in 1 Cor 7 30; 2 Cor 6 10, but the same tr for κτάομαι, ktáomai, is changed into "take us for a possession" (Jth 8 22), "get" (Lk 18 12), "win" (Lk 21 19), and "possess himself of" (1 Thess 4 4, a very obscure passage). In the noun possession, on the other hand, no such ambiguity exists, and attention need be called only to the following passages. In Dt 11 6, AV has, "all the substance that was in their possession," Heb "all that subsisted at their feet," RV "every living thing that followed them." AV uses "possession" loosely in Acts 28 7 for χωρion, chōrion, RV "lands." περιποίησις, peripoiēsis, from peripoiēō, "cause to remain over," "gain," is rendered "God's own possession" in Eph 1 14 RV (AV "possession") and 1 Pet 2 9 (AV "peculiar," AVm "purchased"). "God's own" is a gloss but is implied in the context.

POSSESSION, DEMONIAL, dē-mō-nī'a-kal (Mt 4 24; 8 16, etc). See DEMON, DEMONIAL, DEMONOLOGY.

POST, pōst (רָצַץ, rūṣ, "to run," רָצִים, rāṣīm, "runners"): The "runners" formed the royal guard (1 S 22 17; 1 K 14 27; 2 K 11 4.13; see GUARD). From them were chosen the couriers who carried royal letters and dispatches throughout the kingdom (2 Ch 30 6.10; Est 3 13.15; Jer 51 31). In the Pers service they were mounted on the swiftest horses (Est 8 10.14; cf Xenophon, Cyrop. viii.6.17; Herodotus viii.98). They had the right to command the service of either men or animals in order to expedite their progress (cf Mt 5 41; Mk 15 21, "compel," "impress").

Used in Job 9 25 and AV Wisd 5 9 (ἀγγελία, aggelía, RV "message") of the swift passage of time. See also HOUSE, II, 1, (4), (7). M. O. EVANS

POT, pot: A term used as the tr of a number of Heb and Gr words whose fundamental meaning seems to describe them as intended for the most part to hold liquid or semi-liquid substances, but the pots of Ex 27 3 are intended to hold ashes. (1) כֶּרֶס, ḵrṣ, the most common word for "pot." It designates most frequently some household utensil, probably a pot or kettle for boiling. So 2 K 4 38 ff; Ex 16 3; Jer 1 13 AV; Ezk 11 3.7.11, "cal-dron"; 24 3.6 AV; Mic 3 3; Zec 14 21, etc. It is also used as the name of some vessel of the sanctuary. So Ex 27 3, where the context shows it was intended to hold ashes; 1 K 7 45; 2 Ch 4 16; 2 K 25 14. In Ps 60 8; 108 9, it is a pot for washing. (2) פָּרִיר, pārūr (Nu 11 8; 1 S 2 14), a vessel for boiling; in Jgs 6 19, a vessel for holding broth. (3) דָּוָד, dūdāh, rendered "pot" in Ps 81 6 in AV, "basket" in RV; "pot" both AV and RV in Job 41 20. (4) צִנְצִנֶּת, ṣinṣeneth (Ex 16 33), the jar in which the manna was placed. This jar or pot is mentioned in He 9 4 under the name στάμνος, stámnos. (5) אֶסְדֵן, 'āsōn (2 K 4 2), some kind of jar for holding oil. (6) ξέστης, xéstēs (Mk 7 4), some kind of household utensil. Mention may also be made of the word rendered "pot" in Lev 6 28 AV, where RV renders more correctly by the general term "vessel"; for AV "pots" (Ps 68 13) RV substitutes "sheepfolds." The root is uncertain. Those who render "sheepfolds" connect with the related root in Gen 49 14; Jgs 5 16. Others render "fireplaces" or "ash heaps." See also "range for pots" in Lev 11 35; "pots," Jer 35 5 AV, correctly "bowls" RV; "refining pots" in Prov 17 3; 27 21. See also FOOD.

WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

POTENTATE, pō'ten-tāt (δυναστής, dunástēs, "mighty one," from δύναμαι, dúnamai, "to be able"): A person who possesses great power and authority. Only in 1 Tim 6 15, "the blessed and only Potentate" (=God). The same Gr word is used of Zeus in Sophocles (Ant. 608), and of God in Apoc (e.g. Sir 46 5; 2 Macc 15 3.23). It is used of men in Lk 1 52 (AV "the mighty," RV "princes") and Acts 8 27 ("of great authority").

POTIPHAR, pot'i-far (פּוֹטִיפָר, pōṭīphar; cf Egyp Potiphara [Gen 39 1 f]): A high Egyp official who became the master of Joseph. It is particularly mentioned that he was an Egyptian, i.e. one of the native Egyp officials at the Hyksos court.

POTI-PHERA, po-tif'e-ra (פּוֹטִי פֶרָא, pōṭī phera; Egyp Padipara, "the [one] given of the sun-god"; cf Heb Nathaniel, "the gift of God," Gen 41 45.50; 46 20): There is no certain evidence from Egypt that this name was in existence until the XXII^d Dynasty, about 950 BC. But names of the Hyksos period, and, indeed, any kind of Hyksos inscriptions, are so scarce on account of the destruction of Hyksos monuments by the Egyptians of later times that the absence of such names is really no evidence on the subject. The fact that this name has not been discovered earlier than 950 BC does not give any warrant for the claim that the narrative is of a late date. M. G. KYLE POTSHERD, pot'shúrd (שֶׁרֶד, heres): A piece of earthenware (Job 2 8; Ps 22 15; Isa 45 9). RV renders the word in Prov 26 23, "an earthen vessel," and in Job 41 30 substitutes "sharp potsherd" for "sharp stones." Sir 22 7 refers to the art of "gluing a potsherd [στρακον, ostrakon] together." See HARSITH; OSTRACA.

- LITERATURE

(1) Prehistoric.—The making of pottery ranks among the very oldest of the crafts. On the rocky plateaus of Upper Egypt, overlooking the Nile valley, are found the polished red earthenware pots of the pre-historic Egyptians. These are buried in shallow oval graves along with the cramped-up bodies of the dead and their chipped flint weapons and tools. These jars are the oldest examples of the potter's art. It is inconceivable that in the country of Babel, Egypt's great rival in civilization, the ceramic arts were less developed at the same period, but the difference in the nature of the country where the first Mesopotamian settlement probably existed makes it unlikely that relics of the prehistoric dwellers of that country will ever be recovered from under the débris of demolished cities and the underlying deposits of clay and silt.

(2) Babylonia.—The oldest examples of Bab ceramics date from the historical period, and consist of baked clay record tablets, bricks, drainage pipes, household shrines, as well as vessels for holding liquids, fruits and other stores. (See Perrot and Chipiez, History of Art in Chaldaea and Assyria, I, figs. 159, 160, II, figs. 163, 168.) Examples of pottery of this early period are shown in the accompanying figures. By the 9th to the 7th cent. BC the shaping of vessels of clay had become well developed. Fragments of pottery bearing the name of Esarhaddon establish the above dates.

(3) Egypt.—With the close of the neolithic period in Egypt and the beginning of the historical or dynastic period (4500–4000 BC) there was a decline in the pottery art. The workmanship and forms both became bad, and not until the IVth Dynasty was there any improvement. In the meantime the process of glazing had been discovered and the art of making beautiful glazed faience became one of the most noted of the ancient Egyp crafts. The potter's wheel too was probably an invention of this date.

(4) Palestine.—The making of pottery in the land which later became the home of the children of Israel began long before this people possessed the land and even before the Phoenicians of the coast cities had extended their trade inland and brought the earthenware vessels of the Tyrian or Sidonian potters. As in Egypt and Babylonia, the first examples were hand-made without the aid of the wheel.

It is probable that Jewish potters learned their art from the Phoenicians. They at least copied Phoen and Mycenaean forms. During their wanderings the children of Israel were not likely to make much use of earthenware vessels, any more than the Arabs do today. Skins, gourds, wooden and metal vessels were less easily broken.

To illustrate this, a party, of which the writer was a member, took on a desert trip the earthenware water jars specially made for travel, preferring them to the skin bottles such as the Arab guides carried, for the bottles taint the water. At the end of six days only one out of eight earthenware jars was left. One accident or another had broken all the others.

When the Israelites became settled in their new surroundings they were probably not slow in adopting earthenware vessels, because of their advantages, and their pottery gradually developed distinctive though decadent types known as Jewish.

Toward the close of the Heb monarchy the pottery of the land again showed the effect of outside influences. The red and black figured ware of the Greeks was introduced, and still later the less artistic Rom types, and following these by several centuries came the crude glazed vessels of the Arab, or Saracenic period—forms which still persist.

It is not within the limits of this article to describe in detail the characteristics of the pottery of the various periods. The accompanying illustrations taken from photographs of pottery in the Archaeological Museum of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut, give a general idea of the forms. Any attempt at classification of Palestinian pottery must be considered more or less provisional, due to the uncertainty of origin of many forms. The classification of pre-Rom pottery here used is that adopted by Bliss and Macalister and based upon Dr. Petrie's studies.

(1) Early pre-Israelite, called also "Amorite" (before 1500 BC).—Most of the vessels of this period are hand-made and often irregular in shape. A coarse clay, turning red or black when burned, characterizes many specimens. Some are brick red. Specimens with a polished or burnished surface are also found.

(2) Late pre-Israelite or Phoenician (1500-1000 BC).—From this period on, the pottery is all wheel-turned. The clay is of a finer quality and burned to a brown or red. The ware is thin and light. Water jars with pointed instead of flat bases appear. Some are decorated with bands or lines of different colored meshes. Cypriote ware with its incised decorations was a like development of the period.

(3) Jewish (1000-300 BC).—Foreign influence is lost. The types which survive degenerate. New forms are introduced. Ordinary coarse clay burning red is used. Cooking pots are most characteristic. Many examples bear Heb stamps, the exact meaning of which is uncertain.

(4) Seleucidan.—Foreign influence again appears. Gr and other types are imported and copied. Ribbed surfaces are introduced. The old type of burnishing disappears.

(5) Roman and Saracenic.—Degenerate forms persisting till the present time.

(6) Present-day pottery.

The clay as found in the ground is not suitable for use. It is dug out and brought to the vicinity of the pottery (the "potter's field," Mt 3. Methods 27 7) and allowed to weather for weeks. The dry material is then dumped into a cement-lined tank or wooden trough and covered with water. When the lumps have softened they are stirred in the water until all have disintegrated and a thin slimy mud or "slip" has been formed. In coast cities the potteries are all near the sea, as the seawater is considered better for the "slipping" process. The slip is drawn off into settling tanks. All stones and lumps remain behind. When the clay has settled, the water is drawn off and the plastic material is worked by treading with the feet (cf Isa 41 25; Wisd 15 7). The clay used on the Syrian coast is usually a mixture of several earths, which the potters have learned by experience gives the right consistency. The prepared clay is finally packed away and allowed to stand another six months before using, during which time the quality, esp. the plasticity, is believed to improve.

Before the invention of the potter's wheel the clay was shaped into vessels by hand. In all of the countries previously mentioned the specimens rep-wheel-shaped objects. In a Mt. Lebanon village which is noted for its pottery the jars are still made by hand. Throughout the country the clay stoves are shaped by hand out of clay mixed with straw.

The shaping of vessels is now done on wheels, the use of which dates back to earliest history. Probably the Egyptians were the first to use such a machine (IVth Dynasty). In their original form they were stone disks arranged to be turned by hand on a vertical axis. The wheel stood only a few inches above the ground, and the potter sat or squatted down on the ground before it as he shaped his object (see Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, II, fig. 397). The wheels used in Pal and Syria today probably differ in no respect from those used in the potter's house visited by Jeremiah (Jer 18 1-6). The wheel or, to be more exact, wheels (cf Jer 18 3) are fitted on a square wooden or iron shaft about 3 ft. long. The lower disk is about 20 in. in diameter, and the upper one 8 in. or 12 in. The dross, which comes from the parting of silver, for glazing their jars (cf Prov 26 23).

In firing pottery there are always some jars which come out imperfect. In unpacking the kiln and storing the product others get broken. As a consequence the ground in the vicinity of a pottery is always strewn with potsherds (see also separate article). The ancient potteries can frequently be located by these sherds. The potter's field mentioned in Mt 27 7.10 was probably a field near a pottery strewn with potsherds, thus making it useless for cultivation although useful to the potter as a place in which to weather his clay or to dry his pots before firing.

Pottery was used anciently for storing liquids, such as wine or oil, fruits, grains, etc. The blackened bot-lower end of the shaft is pointed and fits into a stone socket or bearing in which it rotates. A second bearing just below the upper disk is so arranged that the shaft inclines slightly away from the potter. The potter leans against a slanting seat, bracing himself with one foot so that he will not slide off, and with the sole of his other foot he kicks the upper face of the lower wheel, thus making the whole machine rotate. The lower wheel is often of stone to give greater momentum. With a marvelous dexterity, which a novice tries in vain to imitate, he gives the pieces of clay any shape he desires.

After the vessel is shaped it is dried and finally fired in a furnace or kiln. The ancient Egypt kiln was much smaller than the one used today (Wilkinson, II, 192). Most of the kilns are of the crudest form of the "up-draught" variety, i.e. a large chamber with perforated bottom and a fireplace beneath. The fire passes up through the holes, around the jars packed in tiers in the chamber, and goes out at the top. An interesting survival of an early Gr form is still used in Rachiyet-el-Fakhar in Syria. In this same village the potters also use the lead toms of pots of the Jewish period show that they were used for cooking. Earthenware dishes were also used for boiling clothes. Every one of these

4. Uses uses still continues. To one living in Bible lands today it seems inconceivable that the Hebrews did not readily adopt, as some writers disclaim, the porous earthen water jars which they found already in use in their new country. Such jars were used for carrying live coals to start a fire, and not only for drawing water, as they are today, but for cooling it (Isa 30 14). The evaporation of the water which oozes through the porous material cools down the contents of a jar, whereas a metal or leathern vessel would leave it tepid or tainted. They were also used for holding shoemaker's glue or wax; for filling up the cracks of a wall before plastering; ground up they are used as sand in mortar.

Only a few of the Heb words for vessels of different sorts, which in all probability were made of pottery, have been tried by terms which indicate that Palestinian city crumbled, they buried, often intact, the earthenware vessels of the period. In the course of time, perhaps after decades or centuries, another city was built on the débris of the former. The brick walls required no digging for foundations, and so the substrata were left undisturbed. After long periods of time the destruction, by conquering armies or by neglect, of succeeding cities, produced mounds rising above the surrounding country, sometimes to a height of 60 or 100 ft. A typical example of such a mound is Tell el-Hesi (? Laehish). Dr. Flinders Petrie, as a result of the study of the various strata of this mound, has formed the basis of a classification of Palestinian pottery (see 2, above). With a knowledge of the forms of pottery of each period, the excavator has a guide, though not infallible, to the date of the ruins he finds. See also CRAFTS, II, 4.

litra; Lat libra): Pound does not correctly represent the Heb māneh, which was more than a pound (see MANEH). The litra of Jn 12 3 and 19 39 is the Rom pound (libra) of 4,950 grains, which is less than a pound troy, being about 10½ oz. In a monetary sense (its use in Lk 19 13-25) it is the mina, or māneh, which was either of silver or gold, the former, which is probably the one referred to by Luke, being equal to £6.17, or about $33; the latter £102.10 or $510. H. PORTER POVERTY, pov'ér-ti: This word, found but once in the OT (Gen 45 11) outside of the Book of Prov in which it occurs 11 t (6 11; 10 15;

1. OT 11 24 AV; 13 18; 20 13; 23 21; 24 References 34; 28 19.22 AV; 30 8; 31 7), is a tr of יִרְשָׁ, yiwwārēsh, "to be poor," "to come to poverty" (Gen 45 11). Four different Heb words are used in the 11 references in Prov, all bearing the idea of being in need of the necessities of life, although a distinction is made between being in want and being in extreme want. Prov 13 23 well illustrates the general meaning of "poverty" as found in this book: "The poor [רִשָׁ, rūsh, "to be impoverished," "destitute"] useth entreaties; but the rich answereth roughly."

"Poverty" occurs 3 t in the NT (2 Cor 8 2.9; Rev 2 9) and is the tr of πτωχία, plōcheía, "to be reduced to a state of beggary or pauperism."

The teaching of the Bible on this subject would, however, be incomplete unless all the references to the "poor" were considered in this connection. Indeed the word for "poverty" has its root in the word for "poor" (πτωχός, plōchós; פֶּנִי, 'ānī, or דָּל, dal). See POOR.

At least two degrees of poverty are recognized. The OT does not distinguish between them as clearly as does the NT. The NT, for

3. Two Degrees of Poverty example, by its use of two words for "poor" sets forth this distinction. In 2 Cor 9 9, "he hath given to the poor," the word used is πένης, pēnēs, which does not indicate extreme poverty, but simply a condition of living from hand to mouth, a bare and scant livelihood, such as that made by the widow who cast her two mites into the treasury (Lk 21 2); while in such passages as 2 Cor 6 10: "As poor, yet making many rich," and Lk 6 20: "Blessed are ye poor" (πτωχοί, plōchoí), a condition is indicated of abject beggary, pauperism, such as that in which we find Lazarus who was laid at the gate of the rich man's palace, begging even the crumbs which fell from the table of the rich man (Lk 16 20. 21). It was into this latter condition that Christ voluntarily entered for our sakes: "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor [a mendicant, a beggar], that ye through his poverty might become rich" (2 Cor 8 9). Between 30 and 40 t in the NT this latter word is used.

The causes of poverty are failure of harvest and poor crops (Neh 5 1-3); devastation caused by enemies sweeping through the land; the oppression of the people by their own rulers (Isa 5 8); excessive interest, usury (Neh 5 1-5); persecution because of the faith (2 Cor 6 8). Widows and orphans by reason of their desolate condition were in a special sense subject to poverty. Gluttony brings poverty (Prov 23 21), as does indolence (28 19).

God commanded His people to care for the poor. The exhortations to relieve poverty are numerous, esp. in the Pent. Those in poverty must be treated with kindness (Dt 15 7-11); must be allowed to glean in the vineyards (Lev 19 10); to reap the harvest (23 22; cf Ruth 2 14-16); must not be neglected (Prov 28 27); nor dealt with harshly (Am 8 4-6); must be treated as equal before God (Prov 22 2); are to share in our hospitality (Lk 14 13.21). Indeed, the truth or falsity of a man's religion is to be tested, in some sense at least, by his relation to those in need (Jas 1 27). The year of Jubilee was intended to be of great benefit to the poor by restoring to them any possessions which they, by reason of their poverty, had been compelled to deed over to their creditors (Lev 25 25-54; Dt 15 12-15). God required certain tithes from His people which were to be devoted to the helping of the poor and needy (Dt 14 28; 26 12.13). So in the NT the apostles lay special emphasis upon remembering the poor in the matter of offerings. Paul, esp., inculcated this duty upon the churches which he had founded (Rom 15 26; Gal 2 10). The attitude of the early Christian church toward its poor is amply illustrated in that first attempt at communism in Acts 2, 4. James, in his Ep., stingingly reminds his readers of the fact that they had grossly neglected the important matter of caring for the poor (ch 2). Indeed, so strong is he in his plea for the care of the poor that he claims that the man who wilfully neglects the needy thereby proves that the love of God has no place in his heart, and that he has consequently no real faith in God (vs 14-26). Christians are exhorted to abound in the grace of hospitality, which, of course, is nothing less than kindness to those in need (Rom 12 13; 1 Tim 6 18; 1 Jn 3 17). See POOR.

The happiest mother and the noblest and holiest son that ever lived were among the poor. Jesus was born of poor parents, and had not where to lay His head (Mt 8 20), no money with which to pay tribute (Mt 17 27), no home to call His own (Jn

7 53; cf 8 1), and was buried in a borrowed grave (Mt 27 57-61).

Figurative: Of course there is also a spiritual poverty indicated by the use of this word—a poverty in spiritual things: "Blessed are the poor in spirit." By this is meant, Blessed are they who feel that they have no self-righteousness, no worth of their own to present to Christ as a ground of their salvation, who feel their utter bankruptcy of spirit, who say "Nothing in my hand I bring." It is to this state of spirit that Christ refers in Rev 3 17: "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and have gotten riches, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art the wretched one and miserably and poor and blind and naked." WILLIAM EVANS

POWDERS, pou'dērz (אֲבֻקָּה רִבְּבִיל, 'abh'kath rōkhēl): The "powders of the merchant" in Cant 3 6 were probably perfumes, as they are associated with myrrh and frankincense in the account of the festal procession of the litter of Solomon. They may have been some sweet-scented wood in powder, or else some form of incense.

POWER, pou'ēr: This word, indicative of might, strength, force, is used in the OT to render very many Heb terms, the tr in numerous instances being varied in RV to words like "valor," "rule," "strength," "might," "dominion." The principal words for "power" in the NT are δύναμις, dýnamis, and ἐξουσία, exousía. In the latter case RV frequently changes to "authority" (Mk 3 15; 6 7; Eph 1 21, etc) or "right" (Rom 9 21; 1 Cor 9 6; 2 Thess 3 9, etc). Power is attributed pre-eminently to God (1 Ch 29 11; Job 26 14; Ps 66 7; 145 11; Rev 7 12, etc). On this attribute of power of God, see OMNIPOTENCE. The supreme manifestation of the power, as of the wisdom and love of God, is in redemption (1 Cor 1 18.24). The preaching of the gospel is accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 2 4; 1 Thess 1 5, etc). Miracles, as "mighty works," are denoted by the term "powers" (so Mt 11 21.23 RVm, etc). The end of all time's developments is that God takes to Him His great power and reigns (Rev 11 17). JAMES ORR

POWER OF KEYS. See KEYS, POWER OF.

PRÆTORIAN, prē-tō'ri-an, GUARD: "My bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places" (Phil 1 13 AV). This verse is tr'd in RV, "My bonds became manifest in Christ throughout the whole prætorian guard, and to all the rest," and is noteworthy.

It has been usual to connect the words, "the soldier that guarded him," Acts 28 16, with this statement in Phil 1 13, that the apostle's bonds were manifest in the whole prætorium, and to understand that the former was the cause of the latter; that the result of Paul's making the gospel known in his own hired house to those soldiers to one of whom he was chained by the wrist day and night, was that it became known in all the prætorian regiment that his bonds were endured for Christ's sake, that it was for conscience' sake that he was suffering wrongfully, that he was no wrong-doer but a prisoner of Jesus Christ. In this way the gospel would spread through the whole of the prætorian guard in that regiment's headquarters which were situated in a permanent camp established by Tiberius in Rome, outside the Colline Gate, at the N.E. of the city. This verse would also mean that the gospel had been proclaimed in the same way to those members of the prætorian guard who were on duty as the bodyguard of the emperor and who were lodged in one of the buildings which adjoined the emperor's palace on the Palatine Hill.

Thus Lightfoot, discussing the meaning of the phrase "in the whole prætorium" (Comm. on Phil. 99 ff), reviews the different interpretations which have been given of the word, and shows (1) that no instance is to be found of its signifying Nero's palace on the Palatine Hill; (2) that there is no authority for the interpretation which would make it mean the prætorian barracks on the Palatine; (3) that neither is there any authority for making it mean the prætorian camp outside the walls of Rome. In Lightfoot's words (op. cit., 101), "All attempts to give a local sense to 'prætorium' thus fail for want of evidence." Lightfoot accordingly defends the interpretation, "the prætorian guard," and RV, above cited, follows him in this.

One of the meanings of "prætorium" is a council of war, the officers who met in the general's tent (see PRÆTORIUM). Lightfoot is very decided in interpreting "prætorium" to mean the prætorian regiment, the imperial guards, and he adds, "in this sense and in this alone can it be safely affirmed that the apostle would hear the word prætorium used daily," and that this sense is in all respects appropriate. But the other meaning, though not appropriate here, viz. a council of war composed of the officers and their general, is much nearer to that which is now accepted by such authorities as Mommsen and Sir W. M. Ramsay, who hold that in this passage "prætorium" means a council, not of war, however, but the council of judgment, the emperor's court of appeal in which he was assisted by his legal assessors (see Mommsen, Berlin Akad. Sitzungsber., 1895, 501; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Rom Citizen, 357; Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, 35). Over this court there presided the emperor or his delegate, the prefect of the prætorian guard, and associated with him were twenty assessors selected from the senators. Formerly their votes were taken by ballot, but Nero preferred to receive from each a written opinion and on the next day to deliver his judgment in person. Such, it is now believed, is the prætorium to which Paul refers.

The meaning, therefore, of the words, "My bonds in Christ are manifest in the whole prætorium," will be that when Paul wrote the Ep. to the Phil his first Rom trial was already so far advanced that he had been able to impress upon his judges, the twenty assessors and their president, the fact that he was no evildoer, but that the sole cause of his imprisonment was his loyalty to Christ. It was manifest to all the members of the emperor's court of appeal that Paul was enduring his long imprisonment, suffering wrongfully, but only for the sake of Jesus Christ.

The important bearing will be seen which this signification of "prætorium" in this passage has on the question of the order in which Eph, Phil, Col and Philem—the epp. of Paul's captivity in Rome—were written. On subjective evidence Lightfoot concludes that Phil is the earliest of them, having his opinion largely on the resemblance which exists in many particulars between the thoughts and expressions in Phil and in the Ep. to the Rom, making Phil, as it were, a connecting link between Paul's earlier and his later epp. See Lightfoot, Philippians, 42 f; he writes: "These resemblances suggest as early a date for the Ep. to the Phil as circumstances will allow," earlier, that is, than Col and Eph. But Lightfoot's argument is set aside by the new light which has been thrown upon the real meaning of "prætorium." Sir W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 357) writes: "The trial seems to have occurred toward the end of AD 61. Its earliest stages were over before Paul wrote to the Philippians, for he says, 'The things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the progress of the Good News; so that my bonds became manifest in Christ in the whole Prætorium, and to all the rest; and that most of the Brethren in the Lord, being confident in my bonds, are more abundantly hold to speak the word of God without fear.' This passage has been generally misconceived and connected with the period of imprisonment; and here again we are indebted to Mommsen for the proper interpretation. The Prætorium is the whole body of persons connected with the sitting in judgment, the supreme Imperial Court, doubtless in this case the Prefect or both Prefects of the Prætorian Guard, representing the emperor in his capacity as the fountain of justice, together with the assessors and high officers of the court. The expression of the chapter as a whole shows that the trial is partly finished, and the issue as yet is so favorable that the Brethren are emboldened by the success of Paul's courageous and free-spoken defence and the strong impression which he evidently produced on the court; but he himself, being entirely occupied with the trial, is for the moment prevented from preaching as he had been doing when he wrote to the Colossians and the Asian churches generally."

Thus the correct meaning of "prætorium" enables us to fix the date of the Ep. to the Phil as having been written close to the end of Paul's first Rom imprisonment. That this inference is correct is confirmed by various other facts, such as his promise to visit that city, and the fact that in Phil 2 20 f AV he says regarding Timothy, "I have no man like-minded who will naturally care for your state. For all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's." We could not conceive of Paul writing like this if Mark, Tychicus, Aristarchus, and esp. if Luke had been with him then, and yet we know (Col 4 7, 10, 14) that each and all of these companions of the apostle were with him in Rome when he wrote the Ep. to the Col. They had evidently, along with others, been sent on missions to Asia or other places, so that Paul now had only Timothy "likeminded" when he wrote to Philippi. See PAUL THE APOSTLE; PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

All these facts and considerations confirm us in accepting the signification of "prætorium" as the emperor's supreme court of appeal, before which Paul when he wrote the Ep. to the Phil had so conducted his defence as to produce a most favorable impression, from which he inferred that he might soon be liberated from imprisonment. And his liberation, as the event proved, soon followed.

JOHN RUTHERFURD

PRÆTORIUM, præ-tō'ri-um (πραιτώριον, praitōrion, Mt 27 27 [AV "common hall"]; Mk 15 16; Jn 18 28, 33; 19 9 [in all m "palace," and in the last three AV "judgment hall"]; Acts 23 35, [Herod's] "palace," m "Prætorium," AV "judgment hall"; Phil 1 13, "prætorian guard" [m "Gr 'in the whole Prætorium,' " AV "palace," m "Cæsar's court"]):

The Prætorium was originally the headquarters of a Rom camp, but in the provinces the name became attached to the governor's official residence. In order to provide residences for their provincial governors, the Romans were accustomed to seize and appropriate the palaces which were formerly the homes of the princes or kings in conquered countries. Such a residence might sometimes be in a royal palace, as was probably the case in Caesarea, where the procurator used Herod's palace (Acts 23 35).

The Prætorium where Jesus was brought to trial has been traditionally located in the neighborhood of the present Turkish barracks where once stood the Antonia and where was stationed a large garrison (cf Acts 21 32-35), but the statements of Jos make it almost certain that the headquarters of the procurator were at Herod's palace. This was a building whose magnificence Jos can hardly sufficiently appraise (Wars, I, xxi, 1; V, iv, 4). It was in this palace that "Florus, the procurator took up his quarters, and having placed his tribunal in front of it, held his sessions and the chief priests, influential persons and notables of the city appeared before the tribunal" (Wars, II, xiv, 8). Later on, "Florus . . . brought such as were with him out of the king's palace, and would have compelled them to get as far as the citadel [Antonia]; but his attempt failed" (II, xv, 5). The word tr^d "palace" here is aulē, the same word as is tr^d "court" in Mk 15 16, "the soldiers led him away within the court [aulē], which is the Prætorium." There is no need to suppose that Herod Antipas was in the same palace (Lk 23 4 ff); it is more probable he went to the palace of the Hasmonæans which lay lower down on the eastern slope of this southwest hill, where at a later time Jos expressly states that Herod Agrippa II and his sister Bernice were living (Wars, II, xvi, 3).

to all the rest; and that most of the Brethren in the Lord, being confident in my bonds, are more abundantly hold to speak the word of God without fear.' This passage has been generally misconceived and connected with the period of imprisonment; and here again we are indebted to Mommsen for the proper interpretation. The Prætorium is the whole body of persons connected with the sitting in judgment, the supreme Imperial Court, doubtless in this case the Prefect or both Prefects of the Prætorian Guard, representing the emperor in his capacity as the fountain of justice, together with the assessors and high officers of the court. The expression of the chapter as a whole shows that the trial is partly finished, and the issue as yet is so favorable that the Brethren are emboldened by the success of Paul's courageous and free-spoken defence and the strong impression which he evidently produced on the court; but he himself, being entirely occupied with the trial, is for the moment prevented from preaching as he had been doing when he wrote to the Colossians and the Asian churches generally."

The palace of Herod occupied the highest part of the southwest hill near the northwest angle of the ancient city, now traditionally called Zion, and the actual site of the Prætorium cannot have been far removed from the Turkish barracks near the so-called "Tower of David." It is interesting to note that the two stations of the Turkish garrison of Jerus today occupy the same spots as did the Rom garrison of Christ's time. It is needless to point out how greatly this view of the situation of the Prætorium must modify the traditional claims of the "Via Dolorosa," the whole course of which depends on the theory that the "Way of Sorrow" began at the Antonia, the Prætorium of late ecclesiastical tradition. See also GABBATHA.

With regard to the expression ἐν ὄλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ, ἐν ἡλόθ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ, in Phil 1 13, there is now a general consensus of opinion that "Prætorium" here means, not a place, but the imperial prætorian guard, ten thousand in number, which was instituted by Augustus. St. Paul was allowed to reside in his private house in the custody of a prætorian soldier. As these were doubtless constantly changed, it must have become "manifest" to the whole guard that his bonds were for the sake of Christ. See also preceding article.

PRAISE, prāz (תְּהִלָּה, t'hillāh, "psalm," "praise," תְּדָבָר, tōdhāh, "confession," "thanksgiving," שִׁבְחָה, shābhāh, "to praise," "glorify," זָמַר, zāmar, תָּדַבֵּר, yādhāh, "to stretch out the hand," "confess"; ἀλνέω, ainēō, ἐπαίνέω, epainēō, ἐπαῖνος, epainos):

The word comes from the Lat pretium, "price," or "value," and may be defined generally as an ascription of value or worth. Praise may be bestowed upon unworthy objects or from improper motives, but true praise consists in a sincere acknowledgment of a real conviction of worth. Its type may be seen in the representation given in the Apocalypse of the adoration of God and of the Lamb, which is inspired by a sense of their worthiness to be adored (Rev 4 11; 5 12).

Man may be the object of praise, and may receive it either from God or from his fellow-men. In the former case (Rom 2 29; 1 Cor 4 5)

2. With Man as Its Object the praise is inevitably just, as resting on a Divine estimate of worth; in the latter case its value depends upon the grounds and motives that lie behind it. There is a praise which is itself a condemnation (Lk 6 26), an honor which seals the eyes in unbelief (Jn 5 44), a careless use of the epithet "good" which is dishonoring to God (Lk 18 19). This is the "praise of men" which Jesus warned His followers to shun as being incompatible with the "praise of God" (Mt 6 1-4; cf Jn 12 43; Gal 1 10; 1 Thess 2 6). On the other hand, there is a praise that is the instinctive homage of the soul to righteousness (Lk 23 47), the acknowledgment given to well-doing by just government (Rom 13 3; 1 Pet 2 14), the tribute of the churches to distinguished Christian service (2 Cor 8 18). Such praise, so far from being incompatible with the praise of God, is a reflection of it in human consciousness; and so Paul associates praise with virtue as an aid and incentive to holy living on which the mind should dwell (Phil 4 8).

In the Bible it is God who is esp. brought before us as the object of praise. His whole creation praises Him, from the angels of heaven (Ps 103 20; Rev 5 11) to those lower existences that are unconscious or even inanimate (Ps 19 1-4; 148 1-10; Rev 5 13). But it is with the praises offered to God by man, and with the human duty of praising God, that the Scriptures are principally concerned. In regard to this subject the following points may be noticed:

(1) The grounds of praise.—Sometimes God is praised for His inherent qualities. His majesty (Ps 104 1) or holiness (Isa 6 3) fills the mind, and He is "glorified as God" (Rom 1 21) in view of what He essentially is. More frequently He is praised for His works in creation, providence, and redemption. References may be dispensed with here, for the evidence meets us on almost every page of the sacred literature from Gen to Rev, and the Book of Ps in particular, from beginning to end, is occupied with these themes. When God's operations under these aspects present themselves, not simply as general effects of His power and wisdom, but as expressions of His personal love to the individual, the nation, the church, His works become benefits, and praise passes into blessing and thanksgiving (Pss 34, 103; Eph 1 3; 1 Pet 1 3).

(2) The modes of praise.—True praise of God, as distinguished from false praise (Isa 29 13; Mt 15 8), is first of all an inward emotion—a gladness and rejoicing of the heart (Ps 4 7; 33 21), a music of the soul and spirit (Ps 103 1; Lk 1 46 f) which no language can adequately express (Ps 106 2; 2 Cor 9 15). But utterance is natural to strong emotion, and the mouth instinctively strives to express the praises of the heart (Ps 51 15 and passim). Many of the most moving passages in Scripture come from the inspiration of the spirit of praise awakened by the contemplation of the Divine majesty or power or wisdom or kindness, but above all by the revelation of redeeming love. Again, the spirit of praise is a social spirit calling for social utterance. The man who praises God desires to praise Him in the hearing of other men (Ps 40 10), and desires also that their praises should be joined with his own (34 3). Further, the spirit of praise is a spirit of song. It may find expression in other ways—in sacrifice (Lev 7 13), or testimony (Ps 66 16), or prayer (Col 1 3); but it finds its most natural and its fullest utterance in lyrical and musical forms. When God fills the heart with praise He puts a new song into the mouth (Ps 40 3). The Book of Ps is the proof of this for the OT. And when we pass to the NT we find that, alike for angels and men, for the church on earth and the church in heaven, the higher moods of praise express themselves in bursts of song (Lk 2 14; Eph 5 19; Col 3 16; Rev 5 9; 14 3; 15 3). Finally, both in the OT and NT, the spirit of song gives birth to ordered modes of public praise. In their earlier expressions the praises of Israel were joyful outbursts in which song was mingled with shouting and dancing to a rude accompaniment of timbrels and trumpets (Ex 15 20 ff; 2 S 6 5.14 ff). In later times Israel had its sacred Psalter, its guilds of trained singers (Ezr 2 41; Neh 7 44), its skilled musicians (Pss 42, 49, etc); and the praise that waited for God in Zion was full of the solemn beauty of holiness (Ps 29 2; 96 9). In the NT the Psalter is still a manual of social praise. The "hymn" which Jesus sang with His disciples after the Last Supper (Mt 26 30) would be a Hebrew psalm, probably from the Hallel (Pss 113-118) which was used at the Passover service, and various references in the Epp. point to the continued employment of the ancient psalms in Christian worship (1 Cor 14 26; Eph 5 19; Col 3 16; Jas 5 13). But the Psalter of the Jewish church could not suffice to express the distinctive moods of Christian feeling. Original utterance of the spirit of Christian song was one of the manifestations of the gift of tongues (1 Cor 14 15-17). Paul distinguishes hymns and spiritual songs from psalms (Eph 5 19; Col 3 16); and it was hymns that he and Silas sang at midnight in the prison of Philippi (Acts 16 25 RV). But from hymns and songs that were the spontaneous utterance of individual feeling the development was natural, in NT as in OT times, to hymns that were sung in unison by a whole congregation; and in rhythmic passages like 1 Tim 3 16; Rev 15 3 f, we seem to have fragments of a primitive Christian hymnology, such as Pliny bears witness to for the early years of the 2d cent., when he informs Trajan that the Christians of Bithynia at their morning meetings sang a hymn in alternate strains to Christ as God (Epp. x.97). See PERSECUTION.

(3) The duty of praise.—Praise is everywhere represented in the Bible as a duty no less than a natural impulse and a delight. To fail in this duty is to withhold from God a glory that belongs to Him (Ps 50 23; Rom 1 20 f); it is to shut one's eyes to the signs of His presence (Isa 40 26 ff), to be forgetful of His mercies (Dt 6 12), and unthankful for His kindness (Lk 6 35). If we are not to fall into these sins, but are to give to God the honor and glory and gratitude we owe Him, we must earnestly cultivate the spirit and habit of praise. From holy men of old we learn that this may be done by arousing the soul from its slothfulness and sluggishness (Ps 57 8; 103 1), by fixing the heart upon God (57 7; 108 1), by meditation on His works and ways (77 11 ff), by recounting His benefits (103 2), above all, for those to whom He has spoken in His Son, by dwelling upon His unspeakable gift (2 Cor 9 15; cf Rom 8 31 ff; 1 Jn 3 1). See also WORSHIP.

PRAYER, prár (δέησις, déēsis, προσευχή, proseuchē, ἐντευξις, enteuēxis; for an excellent discussion of the meaning of these see Thayer's Lexicon, p. 126, s.v. δέησις; the chief vbs. are εὔχομαι, eúchomai, προσεύχομαι, proseúchomai, and δέομαι, déomai, esp. in Lk and Acts; αἰτέω, aítēō, "to ask a favor," distinguished from ἐρωτάω, erotáō, "to ask a question," is found occasionally): In the Bible "prayer" is used in a simpler and a more complex, a narrower and a wider signification. In the former case it is supplication for benefits either for one's self (petition) or for others (intercession). In the latter it is an act of worship which covers all the attitudes of the soul in its approach to God. Supplication is at the heart of it, for prayer always springs out of a sense of need and a belief that God is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him (He 11 6). But adoration and confession and thanksgiving also find a place, so that the suppliant becomes a worshipper. It is unnecessary to distinguish all the various terms for prayer that are employed in the OT and the NT. But the fact should be noticed that in the Heb and Gr alike there are on the one hand words for prayer that denote a direct petition or short, sharp cry of the heart in its distress (Ps 30 2; 2 Cor 12 8), and on the other "prayers" like that of Hannah (1 S 2 1-10), which is in reality a song of thanksgiving, or that of Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ, in which intercession is mingled with doxology (Eph 3 14-21).

The history of prayer as it meets us here reflects various stages of experience and revelation. In the patriarchal period, when 'men began to call upon the name of the Lord' (Gen 4 26; cf 12 8; 21 33), prayer is naïve, familiar and direct (15 2 ff; 17 18; 18 23 ff; 24 12). It is evidently associated with sacrifice (12 8; 13 4; 26 25), the underlying idea probably being that the gift or offering would help to elicit the desired response. Analogous to this is Jacob's vow, itself a species of prayer, in which the granting of desired benefits becomes the condition of promised service and fidelity (28 20 ff). In the preëxilic history of Israel prayer still retains many of the primitive features of the patriarchal type (Ex 3 4; Nu 11 11-15; Jgs 6 13 ff; 11 30 f; 1 S 1 11; 2 S 15 8; Ps 66 13 f). The Law has remarkably little to say on the subject, differing here from the later Judaism (see Schürer, HJP, II, i, 290, index-vol, p. 93; and cf Mt 6 5 ff; 23 14; Acts 3 1; 16 13); while it confirms the association of prayer with sacrifices, which now appear, however, not as gifts in anticipation of benefits to follow, but as expiations of guilt (Dt 21 1-9) or thank offerings for past mercies (26 1-11). Moreover, the free, frank access of the private individual to God is more and more giving place to the mediation of the priest (21 5; 26 3), the intercession of the prophet (Ex 32 11-13; 1 S 7 5-13; 12 23), the ordered approach of tabernacle and temple services (Ex 40; 1 K 8). The prophet, it is true, approaches God immediately and freely—Moses (Ex 34 34; Dt 34 10) and David (2 S 7 27) are to be numbered among the prophets—but he does so in virtue of his office, and on the ground esp. of his possession of the Spirit and his intercessory function (cf Ezk 2 2; Jer 14 15).

A new epoch in the history of prayer in Israel was brought about by the experiences of the Exile. Chastisement drove the nation to seek God more earnestly than before, and as the way of approach through the external forms of the temple and its sacrifices was now closed, the spiritual path of prayer was frequented with a new assiduity. The devotional habits of Ezra (Ezr 7 27; 8 23), Nehemiah (Neh 2 4; 4 4.9, etc) and Daniel (Dnl 6 10) prove how large a place prayer came to hold in the individual life; while the utterances recorded in Ezr 9 6-15; Neh 1 5-11; 9 5-38; Dnl 9 4-19; Isa 63 7-64 12 serve as illustrations of the language and spirit of the prayers of the Exile, and show esp. the prominence now given to confession of sin. In any survey of the OT teaching the Psalms occupy a place by themselves, both on account of the large period they cover in the history and because we are ignorant in most cases as to the particular circumstances of their origin. But speaking generally it may be said that here we see the loftiest flights attained by the spirit of prayer under the old dispensation—the intensest craving for pardon, purity and other spiritual blessings (51, 130), the most heartfelt longing for a living communion with God Himself (42 2; 63 1; 84 2).

Here it will be convenient to deal separately with the material furnished by the Gospel narratives of the life and teaching of Christ and that found in the remaining books.

2. In the NT The distinctively Christian view of prayer comes to us from the Christ of the Gospels. We have to notice His own habits in the matter (Lk 3 21; 6 12; 9 16.29; 22 32.39-46; 23 34-46; Mt 27 46; Jn 17), which for all who accept Him as the revealer of the Father and the final authority in religion immediately dissipate all theoretical objections to the value and efficacy of prayer. Next we have His general teaching on the subject in parables (Lk 11 5-9; 18 1-14) and incidental sayings (Mt 5 44; 6 5-8; 7 7-11; 9 38; 17 21; 18 19; 21 22; 24 20; 26 41 and ||'s), which presents prayer, not as a mere energizing of the religious soul that is followed by beneficial spiritual reactions, but as the request of a child to a father (6 8; 7 11), subject, indeed, to the father's will (7 11; cf 6 10; 26 39,42; 1 Jn 5 14), but secure always of loving attention and response (Mt 7 7-11; 21 22). In thus teaching us to approach God as our Father, Jesus raised prayer to its highest plane, making it not less reverent than it was at its best in OT times, while far more intimate and trustful. In the LORD'S PRAYER (q.v.) He summed up His ordinary teaching on the subject in a concrete example which serves as a model and breviary of prayer (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 2-4). But according to the Fourth Gospel, this was not His final word upon the subject. On the night of the betrayal, and in full view of His death and resurrection and ascension to God's right hand, He told His disciples that prayer was henceforth to be addressed to the Father in the name of the Son, and that prayer thus offered was sure to be granted (Jn 16 23,24,26). The differentia of Christian prayer thus consists in its being offered in the name of Christ; while the secret of its success lies on the one hand in the new access to the Father which Christ has secured for His people (17 19; cf He 4 14-16; 10 19-22), and on the other in the fact that prayer offered in the name of Christ will be prayer in harmony with the Father's will (15 7; cf 1 Jn 3 22f; 5 13 f).

In the Acts and Epp. we see the apostolic church giving effect to Christ's teaching on prayer. It was in a praying atmosphere that the church was born (Acts 1 14; cf 2 1); and throughout its early history prayer continued to be its vital breath and native air (2 42; 3 1; 6 4.6 and passim). The Epp. abound in references to prayer. Those of Paul in particular contain frequent allusions to his own personal practice in the matter (Rom 1 9; Eph 1 16; Phil 1 9; 1 Thess 1 2, etc), and many exhortations to his readers to cultivate the praying habit (Rom 12 12; Eph 6 18; Phil 4 6; 1 Thess 5 17, etc). But the new and characteristic thing about Christian prayer as it meets us now is its connection with the Spirit. It has become a spiritual gift (1 Cor 14 14-16); and even those who have not this gift in the exceptional charismatic sense may "pray in the Spirit" whenever they come to the throne of grace (Eph 6 18; Jude ver 20). The gift of the Spirit, promised by Christ (Jn 14 16 ff, etc), has raised prayer to its highest power by securing for it a Divine coöperation (Rom 8 15,26; Gal 4 6). Thus Christian prayer in its full NT meaning is prayer addressed to God as Father, in the name of Christ as Mediator, and through the enabling grace of the indwelling Spirit. See PRAYERS OF JESUS. J. PRAYERS, prârz, OF JESUS:

1. The Lord's Prayer
2. Christ's Doctrine of Prayer
Sacredness, Importunity, Conditions
3. Prayers Offered by Christ
 - (1) The High-priestly Prayer
 - (2) The Prayer in Gethsemane
 - (3) The Prayers on the Cross
 - (4) Prayer after the Resurrection
 - (5) General Conclusions

In the history and doctrine of prayer, nothing is more important than the light shed upon the subject by the prayers of Jesus. These are to be studied in connection with His teaching concerning prayer found in the model of the Lord's Prayer, and general statements and hints to His disciples.

This model of prayer is given in two forms (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 2-4). The differences of form show that exactness of similarity in words is not essential. The prayer includes adoration, supplication for the Kingdom, for personal needs, for forgiveness, for deliverance from temptation and the ascription of glory. It is at once individual and universal; it sets the recognition of Divine things first, and yet clearly asserts the ethical and social relations of life. See LORD'S PRAYER, THE.

That men should pray is taken for granted (Mt 6 5). Its sacredness is involved in the command for privacy (Mt 6 6); its importunity (Lk 11 5-9; 18 1-8); its necessary Doctrine of conditions of humility, absence of self-righteousness (Lk 18 9-14), of display and repetition (Mt 6 7); necessity of faith and a forgiving spirit (Mk 11 24-26); of agreement in social prayer (Mt 18 19); submission to the will of Christ, "in my name" (Jn 14 13).

In Mt 11 25,26 AV, Christ thanks God: "Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes."

3. Prayers Offered by Christ Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight." This language shows the essence of prayer to be not the mere expression of need and request for what is required, but resort to God. The prayer gives us insight into the deeper experience of the Son with the Father, and His perfect submission to the Father's will, with thanksgiving even for what might seem inexplicable. It thus illustrates the truth that the highest form of prayer is found in the serenity of the soul.

Mt 14 23 narrates the retirement of the Lord to a "mountain apart to pray." No word of what the prayer was is given, but the record is suggestive. Following a day of severe toil and probably excitement, Jesus betakes Himself to prayer. The reality, the true humanity of the Christ, are here revealed. The former prayer may almost be regarded as that of the Son of God addressed to the Father in the sublime communion of the Godhead. This passage emphatically is a prayer-scene of the Son of Man. The association of this incident of prayer in Christ's life with the miracle of walking on the sea (an example of miracle in the person of the Lord Himself, and not performed on another) opens up an interesting question of the relation of the supernatural and the natural. Here perhaps lies an explanation of the true significance of the miraculous. The communion of the Lord with a supreme Father had filled the physical nature of Jesus with spiritual forces which extended the power of the spirit over the material world beyond the limits by which man is bound in his normal and sinful condition (see Lange, Comm. on Mt; Mt 15 36; cf 14 19). Christ's recognition of God as the Giver of food, in thanks at the meal, or "asking a blessing," should be noted as an example which in modern times is largely ignored or followed as a mere formality. But it is significant; it expresses that intense and all-compelling sense of the Divine which ever dwelt in Him; of which prayer is an expression, and which is evoked so naturally and becomingly at a social meal. In Mt 17 21, Our Lord's reference to prayer as a necessary condition of miraculous power, in the light of Mk 7 34, where "looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him [the deaf man], Ephphatha," may imply His own prayer in connection with the exercise of miraculous energy. This is apparently indicated in Jn 11 41,42, although, as above, it is the expression of the intimate relation between Christ and the Father, which is the essence of prayer, and in which relation He ever exercised the fullest power of God Himself. Mt 19 13 records that little children were brought to Him that He should put His hands on them and pray. That He prayed is not related, but ver 15 relates that He laid His hands on them and, presumably, with the imposition, prayed. The scene is most suggestive, in the light of Our Lord's words. In ver 14 and in Mt 26 26 Our Lord blesses the bread or gives thanks at the institution of the Supper, and has set the mode of celebration universally adopted, even giving the term Eucharist ("giving of thanks") to the service.

(1) The high-priestly prayer.—This prayer (Jn 17) is the special prayer of the Lord, and may be regarded as the sole example furnished by the evangelists of Our Lord's method of prayer. The thanksgiving in Mt 11 25 is the only other instance of any extent in the report of the prayers of Jesus, but even that is brief compared to what is here furnished. The fulness of this prayer clearly shows that it was uttered in the hearing of the disciples. Their relation to it is remarkable. Auditors, they yet could not share in it. At the same time, it was a profound revelation to them both of the relation of the Master to God, and the character of the work which He had come to perform, and the part which they were to take in it. John gives us no hint as to the place in which it was spoken; 14 31 indicates a departure from the upper room. But apparently the prayer was offered where the discourses of chs 15 and 16 were delivered. It has been suggested by Westcott that some spot in the temple courts was the scene of chs 15, 16 and 17. It has been generally supposed that the ornament of the Golden Vine would naturally suggest the figure of the Vine and Branches which Our Lord employs. Jn 18 1 shows that the prayer was offered before the Lord and His disciples had passed over the brook Kidron. The determination of the exact spot is certainly impossible, except the probability that the words were spoken in the vicinity of the temple.

The first part of the prayer (Jn 17 1-5) is an expression of profound communion between the Son and the Father, and the prayer that the Father should glorify the Son, but with the supreme end of the Father's own glory. The absolutely unique character of Christ's relation to God is the calm assertion of ver 4. His consciousness of completeness in the work which He had received from God, impossible for the children of men, marks the supreme nature of the Son of God.

In the second part of the prayer (Jn 17 6-19), Our Lord prays for His disciples, to whom He has revealed Himself and His relation to God (vs 7,8). He prays that they may be kept by the Father, and for their unity. Their separation from the world is declared (ver 14), and Our Lord prays that they may be kept from the evil that is in the world, which is alien from them as it is from Him.

In the third portion of the prayer Christ's relation to His ultimate followers is referred to. Their unity is sought, not an external unity, but the deep, spiritual unity found by the indwelling of Christ in them and God in Christ. The prayer closes by the declaration that Christ's knowledge of the Father is revealed to His people, and the end and crown of all is to be the indwelling of God's love in man by the dwelling of Christ in him.

This prayer is unique, not merely among the prayers of Our Lord, but also among the prayers of humanity. While it is distinctly a petition, it is at the same time a communion. In one or two places Our Lord expresses His will, thus setting Himself upon a level with God. The fact of this prayer of triumph in which every petition is virtually a declaration of the absolute certainty of its realization, immediately preceding the prayer of Gethsemane, is both difficult and suggestive. The anomaly is a powerful argument for the historic reality. The explanation of these contrasted moods is to be found in the depth of Our Lord's nature, and esp. in the complete consistency of His dual nature with the spheres to which each nature belongs. He is most Divine; He is most human. In the fulness of the reach of the prayer and its calm confidence, the believer may find a ceaseless and inexhaustible source of comfort and encouragement. Attention might be called to the remarkable forecast of the history and experience of the church which the prayer furnishes.

(2) The prayer in Gethsemane.—This is recorded by the three Synoptics (Mt 26 36-44; Mk 14 22-40; Lk 22 39-46), and is probably referred to in He 5 7. Brief though the prayer is, it exhibits most clearly recognition of God's infinite power, a clear object sought by the prayer, and perfect submission to God's will. All the elements of prayer, as it can be offered by man, are here except the prayer for forgiveness. It is to be noted that the prayer was three times repeated. This is not to be regarded as inconsistent with Our Lord's prohibition of repetition. It was vain repetition which was forbidden. The intensity of the prayer is expressed by its threefold utterance (cf Paul's prayer in regard to the thorn in 2 Cor 12 8).

(3) The prayers on the cross.—In Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34, Christ uses the prayer of Ps 22 1. In the moment of complete desolation, the Sufferer claimed His unbroken relationship with God. This is the victory of the atoning sacrifice. Lk 23 34 records the prayer of intercession for those who crucified Him; in ver 46 is the calm committal of His spirit to the Father. Prayer here again assumes its highest form in the expression of recognition and trust. Thus the three prayers on the cross not only reveal the intimate relation of Our Lord to the Father, but they also illustrate prayer such as man may offer. They represent supplication, intercession, communion. Prayer thus expresses our relation to God, to others, to ourselves; our trust, our love, our need. In all things He was made like unto His brethren, except without sin (see POINTS). His prayers on the cross illustrate His high-priestly office. It rises at that intense crisis to its supreme manifestation and activity.

(4) Prayer after the resurrection.—It is to be observed that after His resurrection there is no record of any prayer offered by Christ. In the supper at Emmaus He "blessed" the bread (Lk 24 30); and the ascension took place in the midst of blessing (Lk 24 51), suggestive of the course of the church as ever beneath the benediction of the Lord, to be ended only at the final consummation. The act of eating the fish and honeycomb (Lk 24 43) seems to have been unaccompanied by any act of specifically religious form. Mk, with characteristic regard to details, records Christ's "looking up to heaven" (Mk 6 41; 7 34); Jn 11 41 refers to a similar act, and adds the Lord's words of thanksgiving that God had heard Him (see also Jn 17 1). The gesture was usual in association with Christ's prayers; it is appropriate and suggestive. Lk narrates that Christ prayed at His baptism (Lk 3 21); that He spent a night in prayer before choosing the Twelve (Lk 6 12,13); that the transfiguration was preceded by prayer (Lk 9 29); and records the prayer in the garden (Lk 22 41-45). The third evangelist thus in addition to the notes of Our Lord's prayers in retirement, which the other evangelists record, adds these instances of the special relation of prayer to events of critical importance.

(5) General conclusions.—The following conclusions as to prayer may be drawn from the records of Christ's prayers: (1) Prayer is the highest exercise of man's spiritual nature. (2) It is natural to the soul even in perfect accord with God. (3) It is not only the expression of need, the supply of which is sought of God, but by the example of Christ it is the highest expression of trust, submission and union with God. (4) It is to be used both in solitude and in society; it is personal and intercessory. (5) It may be accompanied by the plea of Christ's name, and for Christ's sake. These are the laws which should direct it; that is to say, it should be based upon the merit and the intercession of Christ, and should be addressed to God under the limitations of the Kingdom of the Lord and His purposes for good, both for the interest of the suppliant and others, under the conditions of the interest of the whole Kingdom.

In the NT sense a preacher is a man who has the inner call from the Holy Ghost and the external call from the church, the witnessing body

1. Definition of Christ on earth, and has been duly set apart as an accredited and qualified teacher of the Christian religion. His vocation is that of addressing the popular mind and heart on religious truth, as that truth is set forth in the sacred Scripture, for the spiritual profit of the hearer as its end. The preacher, recognized as such by the church, speaks as a personal witness of God's saving truth, explaining it and applying it as the circumstances of the people and the time may require. The gravity and importance of this vocation, as set forth in the sacred Scriptures and amply illustrated in the history of the church, surpass those of any other calling among men. Luther said, "The devil does not mind the written word, but he is put to flight whenever it is preached aloud."

The preacher, in the sense indicated above, is with all other Christians a sharer in the freedom that is in Christ. But as a recognized

2. The Preacher's Limitations teacher and leader of the church, he is not an unattached and entirely unrestricted teacher. He is not to speak as his own, but as the mouthpiece of the church whose apprehension of the gospel he has voluntarily confessed. The faith of the church is, by his own assent, his faith, and her doctrine is his doctrine. He is not expected to give his own, as distinct from or opposed to the faith of the church in whose name he has been set apart to proclaim the gospel. Both the personal and the representative or official are united in him and his preaching.

His work is always to be related to the OT and NT. His sermon is under the creed of his church as the creed is under the word. The preacher is a man with a message, and the preacher who has no message of the particular kind indicated above is in no true sense a preacher. It has been well expressed in one of the valuable Yale series of lectures on the subject, "Every living preacher must receive his communication direct from God, and the constant purpose of his life must be to receive it uncorrupted and to deliver it without addition or subtraction." When he presents the message of his Divinely appointed ambassadorship in its integrity, he speaks with that peculiar kind of "authority" which has been pronounced "the first and indispensable requisite" in giving a message from God. He manifests thereby a "high celestial dogmatism," and "human weakness becomes immortal strength." The true preacher preaches from a Divine impulsion. He says with Paul, "Necessity is laid upon me; for woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel" (1 Cor 9 16; cf Jer 20 9). He says with Peter, "Whether it is right in the sight of God to hearken unto you rather than unto God, judge ye: for we cannot but speak the things which we saw and heard" (Acts 4 19,20). The message of the preacher is greater than the man, because it is from God. It largely makes the man who preaches it in its fulness and power. Whatever be his own gifts or whatever the alleged gift conferred in the laying on of hands, without the sense of the message he is not chosen of God to proclaim His word. Destitute of that, he does not have the sustaining impulse of his vocation to enlist his entire personality in his work and give him mastery over the minds and hearts of men.

No agency of religion is older than preaching. It is as old as the Bible itself (2 Pet 2 5). It is a necessary adjunct of a religion that is communicated to man by means of an objective and authoritative revelation, such as we have in the sacred Scriptures. It is an entirely natural agency of the forms of religion revealed in the OT and NT. It is strictly in harmony with those ideas that obtain in both testaments regarding the method of propagating the faith, set forth through the agency of holy men who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. That faith is disseminated by means of teaching through argument, explanation, motive and exhortation. The agency for the spread of a religion of persuasion must be preaching.

In the Bib. usage of the terms which have reference to the subject, preaching means the proclamation of religious truth. It is that

5. Biblical Terms and Their Meanings continuous and public testimony which the church is always giving, through discourses, by men set apart for such work, to her own living faith as that faith is rooted in and sustained by the written word of God. In this sense "to call," "proclaim," "cry aloud" are used frequently of the prophetic message under the various aspects of denunciation, as in Jon 1 2; of the relation of the Divine, as in Jer 11 6, and of Messianic promise, as in Isa 61 1. The term for "preaching" is also used to designate a political propagandism set forth by the prophet (Neh 6 7). In two passages (Ps 68 11, "publish"; Isa 61 1) another word for preaching means "to declare good news." In the case of Jonah's preaching at Nineveh, the word used to designate what it means strictly "proclamation" and corresponds to the NT word used to define Our Lord's "proclamation" as a herald of the advent of the Kingdom of God (Mt 4 17), which in its initial stages particularly was closely associated with the preaching of John the Baptist (Mt 3 1.2).

Thus while preaching belongs esp. to Christianity, it has well-defined antecedents in the OT. Under both the old and the new dispensations the subject takes the church for granted and utters the testimony, not simply of a solitary believer, but of a Divinely founded society, whether it be of Jews or Christians.

6. The Hebrew Prophets

The older books in the Canon have in them the beginnings and some of the features of the preacher's office and of the high function of preaching. In them we find a special class of men set apart and separated unto that particular work, as we find in the Christian church, from its beginnings, the same Divinely instituted office. The Heb prophet had a message direct from God, which frequently came with supernatural knowledge in the power of prediction. The mission of the prophet, however, was not simply or chiefly to forecast the future, but to declare a present message from the Lord to the people. The prophet of the OT was the forerunner in office and the prototype of the ambassador of Christ. With the development of the synagogue as the center of Heb worship, application as well as interpretation of the Law became essential.

Moses, the most commanding figure in Heb history, was a prophet, and no messages in the OT are more imbued with power, sublimity and pathos than those uttered by the great lawgiver. He became the guide of Israel, not so much by his rod as by the word he delivered to the people. There are numerous indications that after Moses there was a continuous class of religious teachers whose work it was to instruct men and inspire the people, as is indicated in the cases of Joshua, in the history of Deborah and Barak, and in the days of solemn assembly which are inconceivable without men who spoke and other men who listened. In the time of Samuel there was a distinct advance made in the work of the prophets, and the prophetic office had become a fixed institution. There were schools of the prophets at Bethel, Jericho and Gilgal, the very seats of heathen idolatry. Under the OT dispensation the whole course of progress was toward presenting Divine truth in its simplicity and power, by bringing it to bear upon the popular mind and heart. One of the marks of the new era beginning with John the Baptist was a revival of prophetic preaching (Mt 11 9), which again resumed its old character and meaning. See PROPHECY AND PROPHETS.

The words meaning "to proclaim as a herald" and "preaching," are frequent in the NT. The mission of Our Lord was essentially cerning the Kingdom of God (Mt 4 17). He at once, on His entrance upon His ministry, gave to preaching a spiritual depth and practical range which it never had before. At that time preaching had manifestly become a fixed part of the synagogue worship, and was made one of the chief instruments in the spread of the gospel. Our Lord constantly taught in the synagogue (Mt 4 23; Mk 1 21; Ju 6 59). He thus read and interpreted and applied the Law and the Prophets (Mk 1 39; Lk 4 16). Christ's testimony about Himself was that He came "to bear witness to the truth." The spoken word became His great power in His life and ministry. Throughout His life Jesus was above all things a preacher of the truths of His kingdom. Telling men what He was in Himself, what in His relation to man and his salvation and what to God the Father, formed a large part of His public work.

7. Christ as a Preacher

The preaching of the apostles was essentially prophetic in character, and bore testimony concerning the resurrection of Jesus and His early return to judgment (Acts 2 24.32.36; 1 Cor 15 15). The sermons of the apostles which are reported with much fullness are those of Peter on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2), his address in the house of Cornelius at Caesarea (Acts 10), and the counsels of James to the brethren at Jerus, as to what ordinances should be imposed on gentile Christians. In the early church preachers were first of all witnesses to what Jesus had said and done, and to the significance to be attached to the great facts of the redemptive history. With the spread of the gospel and the passing of time, this office was taken up by others, esp. such as were endued with "the word of wisdom" and "of knowledge" (1 Cor 12 8).

Upon the basis of what is taught in the word of God there are two fundamentally important postulates concerning preaching and the

9. Fundamental Postulates

(1) Preach the word.—The first note of preaching is that it be the word of God (2 Tim 4 2). Out of the Bible must the life of every generation of Christians be fed. To Holy Scripture, therefore, ought the pulpit to abide faithful, for out of its treasures the preacher fulfils his double office of edifying believers and subjugating the world to Christ. There must always be an organic connection between the word in the text and the sermon.

(2) "We are ambassadors."—The work of preaching is the fulfilment of a Divinely instituted ambassadorship (2 Cor 5 20). The gospel is put into the hands of men for a distinct purpose, and is to be administered in accordance with the plan of its author. The preacher is in a very distinct sense a trustee. "But even as we have been approved of God to be intrusted with the gospel, so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God who proveth our hearts" (1 Thess 2 4). Those who have accepted the responsibility imposed upon them by this Divine commission are enjoined to exercise their office so as to warrant the approbation of Him who has appointed them to a specific work. The homiletic practice of taking the theme of every sermon from a passage of Holy Writ has been an almost invariable rule in the history of the church. It is the business of the preacher to present the truth embodied in the text in its integrity. In the exercise of his Divinely appointed ambassadorship he is to administer God's word revealed to Christian faith, not human opinions or speculations. DAVID H. BAUSLIN

PRECEPT, prĕ'sept: A commandment, an authoritative rule for action; in the Scriptures generally a Divine injunction in which man's obligation is set forth (Lat praeceptum, fr. praecipere, "to instruct").

Four words are so rendered in AV: (1) מִצְוָה, mic-wāh, very frequently (168 t) trd "commandment," but 4 t "precept" (in RV only Jer 35 18; Dnl 9 5); (2) from the same root is צַו, śāw, or צָו, śaw (Isa 28 10.13); (3) פִּקְדֻנִים, pikḳūdhim, only in the Pss (21 t in Ps 119, e.g. vs 4.15.27; also RV Ps 19 8; 103 18; 111 7); (4) in the NT, ἐπιτολή, entolē, generally in AV trd "commandment" (68 t), but twice "precept" (Mk 10 5; He 9 19; in both cases RV substitutes "commandment"). See COMMANDMENT.

D. MIALL EDWARDS

PRECIOUS, prĕsh'us (stands for 17 different words, chief of which are יָקָר, yāqār; τίμιος, timios): (1) Generally in the literal sense, "of great price," "costly," "expensive," of material things (e.g. Prov 1 13; Jer 20 5; Mk 14 3 AV), esp. of precious stones (2 S 12 30; 2 Ch 3 6; 1 Cor 3 12 AV, etc.). (2) Sometimes "of great moral [non-material] value." "Precious in the sight of Jeh is the death of his saints" (Ps 116 15); "his precious and exceeding great promises" (2 Pet 1 4); cf Ps 139 17; 2 Pet 1 1. The literal and the moral senses are both involved in the expression, "knowing that ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things, . . . but with precious blood" (1 Pet 1 18.19). "Preciousness" (τιμή, timē) occurs in 1 Pet 2 7 ARV, ERV, for AV "precious."

LITERATURE

Predestination can be, and has sometimes been, regarded as a philosophical question rather than a Biblical one. It is with predestination as a Biblical question, however, that we are here mainly concerned.

1. As a Biblical Question It is possible to urge, and it has been urged, that the philosophical question —whether all that occurs is foreordained—is not discussed and decided by Scripture. Theology, starting from God in its interpretation of all things, has arrived at universal foreordination by a species of deductive reasoning. But we must not argue the matter from any abstract principles, but deal with the actual facts as set forth in Scripture and as found, inductively, in the experience of man.

It must first be asserted, however, in view of much loose modern thinking, that predestination is a category of religious thought of fundamental importance. No category of religious thought could go deeper, for it reaches down to the Infinite Will in relation to the universe of finite wills, and lays stress on will as the core of reality. The philosophy of our time may be said to have received, from the time of Schopenhauer, an impact toward will-emphasis, alike in respect of will in the universe and in man. But the relation of the Absolute Will to the universe, and to mankind, is precisely that with which we are concerned in predestination.

Predestination is that aspect of foreordination whereby the salvation of the believer is taken to be effected in accordance with the will of God, who has called and elected him, in Christ, unto life eternal. The Divine plan of salvation must certainly be conceived under this aspect of individual reference. To understand and set forth the nature, and ethically justifiable character, of such a foreordaining to life eternal, is our purpose. For the doctrine has need to be purged of the historic inconsistencies, and fatal illogicalities, with which, in its older forms of presentation, it was often infected. This, esp., in order that the doctrine may appear as grounded in reason and righteousness, not in arbitrariness and almighty caprice.

To begin with, it must be said that there seems to be no evading the doctrine of an election by grace, as found both in the letter and the spirit of Scripture. The idea of predestination is set forth, with great power and clearness, in Rom 8 29.30, and with its elements or parts articulated in natural and striking form. The idea recurs in Eph 1, where it is finely said (vs 4.5) that God

4. The Doctrine in Scripture predestination is set forth, with great power and clearness, in Rom 8 29.30, and with its elements or parts articulated in natural and striking form. The idea recurs in Eph 1, where it is finely said (vs 4.5) that God hath chosen us in Christ "before the foundation of the world," having predestinated or "foreordained us unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ"; and where it is said, further, that our salvation imports "the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure" (ver 9), which He purposed in Christ. This "eternal purpose" to save men through Christ is again referred to in Eph 3 11. This helpful mode of viewing predestination as in Christ, and never outside Him, had a place in religious thought at the Reformation time, as the famous "Formula of Concord," to be referred to below, shows. The predestined certainty of God's gracious work in Christ was not meant to perplex men, but to encourage and reassure all who trust in His grace. In Rom 9 14-25, the absolute sovereignty of God is put in a form whereby election is made to originate in the Divine will apart from all human merit, whether actual or foreseen. But from this assertion of God's free supremacy we can derive no concrete theodicy, or do more than infer that God is just and wise in His exercise of free grace, even when His doings are most perplexing to us.

The needful thing is to understand, so far as may be, the nature of the coöperation that takes place between the Divine and the human factors or elements, which latter factors include natural capacity, disposition and development, working under the grace. It must be carefully observed that nothing in Scripture points to any personal and inexorable predestination to reprobation, in any sense corresponding to the personal election to salvation just spoken of. A non-election there may be, of course, but not in any sense that annuls full personal responsibility for coming short of life everlasting. The appeal of Scripture from first to last is to men as free. Calvin's strange way of putting the matter was, "Man therefore falls, God's Providence so ordaining, but he falls by his own fault." This idea of reprobation was first introduced by Gottschalk, a monk of the 9th cent., long after the predestination doctrine had received its first full and positive exposition by Augustine. Augustine, following upon the indecision shown by the fathers in the first three centuries of the church, made the doctrine of a special predestination his foundation for special grace, in opposition to Pelagius. Augustine gave new prominence in his theory to the absolute will of God: he made Divine grace the only ground of man's salvation; it was to him the irresistible power working faith within the heart, and bringing freedom as its result. It was to him God's absolute predestination that determined who were believers. But Augustine held predestination as an inference from his conception of the Fall and of grace, rather than as a metaphysical principle.

In the Middle Ages, Anselm, Peter Lombard, and Aquinas, followed the Augustinian views only to a certain extent. Aquinas admits that predestination implies a relation to grace, but holds that grace is not of the essence of predestination. Predestination is, to Aquinas, a part of Providence, and it presupposes election in the order of reason. Though Divine goodness in general be without election, Aquinas thinks the communication of a particular good cannot be without election. Predestination has, for him, its foundation in the goodness of God, which is its reason. Aquinas thinks predestination most surely takes effect, but not as from necessity; the effect takes place under the working of contingency. From such views we are recalled to the idea of a rigorous predestination, by Thomas Bradwardine

Predestination has, for him, its foundation in the goodness of God, which is its reason. Aquinas thinks predestination most surely takes effect, but not as from necessity; the effect takes place under the working of contingency. From such views we are recalled to the idea of a rigorous predestination, by Thomas Bradwardine and John Wyclif, in pre-Reformation times. We are thus brought up to the decretal system—so called from Calvin's making predestination consist of the eternal decree of God—which became, in its metaphysical principle, the fundamental position of the whole Reformed theology after the Reformation.

The theology of the Reformed church adopted the Calvinistic doctrine of the decree of predestination and election. Calvin, however,

7. Predestination in the Reformed Theology simply carried the Augustinian theory to its logical and necessary conclusion, and he was the first to adopt the doctrine as the cardinal point or primordial principle of a theological system. Zwingli, it must be remembered, was, even before Calvin, of consistent deterministic leanings, as part of his large speculative views, which were not without a tendency to universalism. Salvation was, to Calvin, the execution of a Divine decree, which was supposed to fix the extent and conditions of such salvation.

(1) Calvin's definition.—Reprobation was, for Calvin, involved in election, and Divine foreknowledge and foreordination were taken to be identical. Calvin's mode of defining predestination was as the eternal decree of God, by which He has decided with Himself what is to become of each and every individual. For all, he maintains, are not created in like condition; but eternal life is fore-ordained for some, eternal condemnation for others. Calvin confesses that this is a "horrible decree," and it is not surprising to find competent theologians in our time denying such a form of predestinarianism any place in the teachings of St. Paul, who never speaks of reprobation.

(2) Theology advanced by Calvin.—It is generally overlooked, however, that the theological advance registered by Calvin is to be seen by study of the views of the Middle Ages, and on to the Reformation, not by viewing Calvinism in our post-Reformation lights. It was love—"the fatherly love of God," as he terms it—the efficiency of saving love—which Calvin insisted upon, above all, in his teaching about God. But Calvin also heightened men's ideas as to the certitude of personal salvation. It is but fair to Calvin to remember—for superficial acquaintance with his teachings is far from rare—that he, in the strongest manner, maintained Divine sovereignty to be that of Divine wisdom, righteousness, and love, and expressly rejected the notion of absolute power as, in this connection, a heathenish idea. The Calvinistic doctrine was not absolute, but mediated in Christ, and conditioned upon faith.

Luther and the Lutheran church at first shared the doctrine of predestination and election, Luther in his treatment of free will repro-

8. Predestination in the Lutheran-ism ducing the Augustinian form of the doctrine in a strict manner. The predestination of Luther and Melancthon proceeded, not from their conception of God, but rather from the doctrine of sin and grace. Melancthon was less disposed than Luther to press the doctrine of absolute predestination, and, in his "synergistic" tendencies, laid increasing stress on human freedom, until he at length rejected the doctrine of absolute predestination. He was blamed by strict Lutheranism for yielding too much to Pelagianism. But the Lutheran "Formula of Concord," prepared in 1577, was not a very logical and consistent presentation of the case, for, opposed at points to Augustinianism, it fell back, in the end, on election in the Augustinian spirit. Or, to put the matter in another form, the "Formula of Concord" may be said to have held with Augustinianism, but to have differed by maintaining a universal call along with a particular election, and it rejected the decree of reprobation. Later Lutheranism adopted a moderate form of the doctrine, wherein predestination was often identified with prescience. But Lutheranism ought not, in strictness, to be identified, as is sometimes done, with the Arminian theory. The Lutheran doctrine of predestination was further developed by Schleiermacher, who emphasized the efficiency of grace, while adopting its universality in the Lutheran sense.

Arminianism, in its earliest assertion, maintained simply universal grace and conditional election. But in the five Articles it

9. The Arminian View formulated its opposition to Calvinism, although Arminius does not appear to have been more than moderately Calvinistic, as we would account it. Arminius gave grace supreme place, and made it, when welcome, pass into saving grace. He made election depend on faith, which latter is the condition of universal grace. Arminianism rejects the so-called common grace of the predestination theory, and its effectual grace for the elect, for, in the Arminian view, saving grace can in no case be missed save by resistance or neglect. Arminianism holds the awakened human will to cooperate with Divine grace, in such wise that it rests with the human will whether the Divine grace is really accepted or rejected. It is the claim of Arminianism to do more justice than Calvinism to faith and repentance, as conditions of personal salvation, and precedent thereto. The Arminian standpoint admits the foreknowledge of God, but denies foreordination, though it must seem difficult to reduce the foreknowledge of God to such a bare knowledge of the future. But it is, of course, freely to be granted that foreknowledge in God, simply as knowledge, does not carry any causal energy or efficiency with it. But it may still be doubted whether the prescience of God can be nothing more fruitful and creative than such a position implies, and whether its relation to predestination may not be a more necessary one. The theory seems to fail of giving satisfactory account of the Divine activity in its relation to human activity, in the sphere of grace. The shortcoming of Arminianism lies in its failing also to do justice to the spirit of Scripture with its emphatic assertion of the doctrine of God as the one absolute will, which, in its expression, is the sole originative power of the universe. See also PROVIDENCE.

Wesleyanism, or Methodist Arminianism, maintains, like Calvinism, the will of God to be supreme.

But it distinguishes between the desires 10. Wesleyanism on Predestination and the determinations of God. It takes Divine foreknowledge to precede the Divine volitions. It makes God's prescience purely intuitional, and regards that which He knows as nowise necessitated by such knowledge, a conception of God which differentiates the Wesleyan type of thought from Calvinism. God is held to have left events in the moral sphere contingent, in an important sense, upon the human will. Hence human probation is based upon this position, as to man's free choice. Influence of God upon man's will is postulated, for its right guidance and direction, but not in any coercive sense, as Augustinianism seems to Wesleyanism to imply. Thus it is hoped to preserve just balance, and maintain proper responsibility, between the Divine and the human factors in this spiritual coöperation.

When we come to the present needs and values of the predestination doctrine, we have to remark the primal need of a thoroughly ethicized conception of God. The past few decades have witnessed a lessened interest in this doctrine, largely because of the increasingly ethical conceptions of Deity.

That is to say, the doctrine of the sovereignty of God's will has ceased to be taken, as often in the older presentations, as mere almightiness, or arbitrary and resistless will. Calvin expressly taught that no cause or ground but God's unconditioned will was to be sought; but he feebly tried to save Divine will from sheer omnipotence by saying that God is law to Himself; and the notion of sovereignty continued to be presented in ways quite absolute and irresponsible. But God we now regard as the absolute and eternal reason, no less than the supreme will, and as both of these in the one indivisible and absolute personality. We have passed from an abstract predestinationism to maintain God in living and ethical relations to the world and to man. Such an ethical sovereignty we hold to be necessary, over against that lax humanitarian spirit, which, in its recoil from the older Calvinism, invests the Deity with no greater powers of moral determination than may be implied in His love, when viewed as a mere golden haze of good will. PREËMINENCE, præ-em'i-nens: Superiority, esp. in noble or excellent qualities. The word stands for: (1) מוֹתָר, mōthār, "what is over and above," "excellence"; "Man hath no preëminence above the beasts" (Eccl 3 19); (2) πρωτεύω, prōteúō, "to be first"; "That in all things he [= Christ] might have the preëminence" (Col 1 18); (3) ὁ φιλοπρωτεύων, ho philoprōteúōn, is tr^d "who loveth to have the preëminence," lit. "who loveth to be first" (of Diotrophes, 3 Jn ver 9).

PREFER, præ-fūr': Does not always have the general meaning "to choose before another." In Ps 137 6, it does have this sense and the two VSS agree; in Est 2 9, RV has "removed" where AV has "preferred"; in Dnl 6 3, "distinguished" takes its place; in Jn 1 15.30, "become" is substituted for "preferred"; in ver 27, "preferred" drops out entirely; in Rom 12 10, the VSS agree.

PREPARATION, prep-a-rā'shun: The concordances indicate that the word "preparation" occurs only twice in the OT, once in 1 Ch 22 5, where it is used in the ordinary sense "to make preparation," and once in Nah 2 3, "in the day of his preparation," both of them translating the same Heb root and requiring no special elucidation. In Eph 6 15 the apostle speaks of the equipment of the Christian as including the "feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace," which means, according to Thayer, "with the promptitude and alacrity which the gospel produces."

The word occurs with technical significance ("the Preparation") in the gospel narratives of the crucifixion, translating the Gr παρασκευή, paraskeuē (Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 14.31.42). It is used as a technical term indicating the day of the preparation for the Sabbath, that is, the evening of Friday. This is its use in Jos, Ant, XVI, vi, 2, and presumably in the Synoptics. Later its use seems to have been extended to denote regularly the 6th day (Friday) of each week. So in Did., vii and the Martyrdom of Polycarp, vii.

The addition of the phrase τοῦ πάσχα, toû páscha, "of the passover," in Jn 19 14, and of the phrase "for the day of that sabbath was a high day," in 19 31, seems to indicate that the author of the Fourth Gospel regarded the Passover as occurring on the Sabbath in the year of the crucifixion. This is clearly the natural interpretation of the words of John's Gospel, and if it were not for the seeming contradiction to the narrative of the Synoptics it is very doubtful whether any other interpretation would ever have been put upon them. This question is discussed in the articles on the date of the crucifixion and the Lord's Supper, and it will be necessary only to allude to it here.

It is possible that the phrase the "Preparation of the passover" in Jn 19 14 may mean it was the preparation day (Friday) of the Passover week (see Andrews, Life of Our Lord, 451 ff; and most recently Zahn, Das Evangelium des Johannes, 1908, 637 ff). This method of harmonizing seems to the present writer to be forced, and it therefore seems wiser to give to the words of Jn 19 14 their natural interpretation, and to maintain that, according to the author of the Fourth Gospel, the Passover had not been celebrated at the time of the crucifixion. There seems to be reason to believe that the ordinary view that the Lord's Supper was instituted in connection with the Passover, based upon the narrative in Mark (14 12 ff), does not have the unanimous support of the Synoptic Gospels.

PRESBYTER, prez'bi-tēr, pres'bi-tēr (πρεσβύτερος, presbūteros), PRESBYTERY, prez'bi-ter-ipres'bi-ter-i (πρεσβυτήριον, presbūterion): This latter word occurs in the NT once (1 Tim 4 14), so rendered in both AV and RV. But the original Gr occurs also in Lk 22 66, in RV tr^d

"the assembly of the elders," in AV simply "the elders"; and in Acts 22 5, tr^d in EV "the estate of the elders"; in both of which occurrences the word might more accurately be tr^d "the presbytery," just as it is in 1 Tim 4 14. Besides these three occurrences of the neuter sing. presbūterion, the masc. pl. presbūteroi, always tr^d "elders," is often used to indicate the same organization or court as the former, being applied earlier in NT history to the Jewish Sanhedrin (Mt 27 1; 28 12; Lk 9 22; Acts 4 5.8), and later in the development of the church to its governing body, either in general (Acts 15 2.4.6.22 ff), or locally (Acts 14 23; 16 4; 20 17; 1 Tim 5 17; Tit 1 5, etc.). It is sometimes used of the body, or succession, of religious teachers and leaders of the nation's past (Mt 15 2; He 11 2). The word "presbyter" has been contracted by later ecclesiastical usage into the title "priest," although in the NT they are by no means identical, but on the contrary are often explicitly distinguished (Mk 14 43; Acts 23 14).

The local synagogue of the Jewish church was under the care and control of a body of representative men called "the elders" (Lk 7 3).

2. Based Naturally the Christian church, before Synagogues were formed at Jerus and formed on the Plan lines of the synagogue, took over the eldership into its own organization (Acts 11 30; 15 2; 1 Pet 5 1, etc.); so also in all the cities in which the missionary activities of the apostles made church organization necessary, the local synagogues readily suggested and supplied a feasible plan for such organization (Acts 14 23; Tit 1 5). The mother-church at Jerus, formed after the pattern of the synagogue, might well have offered to the churches formed elsewhere under apostolic preaching the only conceivable plan. We do not know from the NT passages how these elders were selected; we must infer that they were elected by the membership of the churches, as under the synagogue plan; they were then installed into their office by apostles (Acts 14 23), or by apostolic helpers (Tit 1 5), or by "the presbytery" (1 Tim 4 14), or by both together (2 Tim 1 6; cf 1 Tim 4 14). So early as the Pauline letters the office of presbyter seems already to have borne the distinction of two functions: teaching and ruling (1 Tim 5 17; cf Acts 20 17,28; 1 Thess 5 12,13; 1 Pet 5 2).

In the NT history and epp. it does not appear that the various churches of a district were already organized into an ecclesiastical body

3. Principle known as "the presbytery," having Found in some basis of representation from the the NT constituent churches. But the absence of such mention is far from being final proof that such district organizations did not exist; little dependence can be placed on mere negative arguments. Moreover, the council of apostles and elders in Jerus, to which Paul and Barnabas appealed (Acts 15), is positive evidence of the principle of representation and central authority. The various district organizations would quickly follow as administrative and judicial needs demanded; such development came early in the growth of the church, so early that it is unmistakably present in the post-apostolic age.

In Rev the 24 elders occupy a conspicuous place in the ideal church (Rev 4 4,10; 5 6, etc), sitting for those they represent, as an exalted presbytery, close to the throne of the Eternal One. "The four and twenty elders occupying thrones (not seats) around the throne are to be regarded as representatives of the glorified church; and the number, twice twelve, seems to be obtained by combining the number of the patriarchs of the OT with that of the apostles of the NT" (Milligan on Rev 4 4 in Expositor's Bible).

Presbytery is the court, or representative body, in the Presbyterian Church next above the Session of the local church. The Session is composed of the ruling elders, elected by the membership of a particular church, with the minister as moderator or presiding officer. The 4. In the Presby- Presbytery is composed of all the ordained terian Church ministers, or teaching elders, and one ruling elder from the Session of each church in a given district or community. To it now, as in NT times (1 Tim 4 14), is committed the power of ordination; as also of installation and removal of ministers. It has supervision of the affairs which are general to the churches in its jurisdiction, and the power of review in all matters concerning the local churches (see Form of Gov., Presb. Church in U.S.A., ch x). The Presbytery elects the representatives composing the General Assembly, which is the highest court of the Presbyterian Church.

In ecclesiastical architecture the presbytery is that part of the church structure which is set apart for the clergy, usually the space between altar and apse; sometimes used of the whole choir space, but ordinarily the word is more restricted in its meaning. PRESENCE, prez'ens: In the OT nearly always the rendition of פָּנִים, pānim, "face" (Gen 3 8; Ex 33 14f; Ps 95 2; Isa 63 9, etc); occasionally of עַיִן, 'ayin, "eye" (Gen 23 11; Dt 25 9; Jer 28 1,11, etc); and in 1 K 8 22; Prov 14 7, "the presence of" represents the prep. נֶגְדָה, neghadh, "before"; cf also Aram. כֹּדְחָם, kōdhām, in Dnl 2 27 AV (RV "before"). In Gr, "presence" has an exact equivalent in παρουσία, parousia, but this word is rendered "presence" only in 2 Cor 10 10; Phil 2 12; RV Phil 1 26 (AV "coming"). Elsewhere parousia is rendered "coming," but always with "presence" in the m. Otherwise in the NT "presence" represents no particular word but is introduced where it seems to suit the context (cf e.g. Acts 3 13 AV and 3 19). See PAROUSIA.

PRESENT, prez'ent. See GIFT.

PRESENTLY, prez'ent-li: The strict meaning is of course "at the present moment," "instantly," and the modern force "after a short interval" is due simply to the procrastinating habits of mankind; hence RV modifications of the AV use of the word into "immediately" (Mt 21 19), "even now" (Mt 26 53), and "forthwith" (Phil 2 23). In Prov 12 16, the uncertainty of the meaning (m "openly," Heb "in the day") has led to the retention of the AV word.

PRESIDENT, prez'i-dent (פָּרָשׁ, šārahk): Used only in Dnl 6 2-7. Probably a Pers derivative from sar, "head," and the Aram. equivalent for Heb shōṭēr. The meaning is self-evident and refers to the appointment of Daniel by Darius to be one of the three princes who had rule over the satraps of the empire.

PRESS, pres: As a vb. is used in RV as a tr of no less than 13 Gr and Heb words (rather more in AV). All the RV uses are modern. In AV may be noted Wisd 17 11, "pressed with conscience" (RV "pressed hard by"); 2 Macc 14 9, "pressed on every side" (RV "surrounded by foes"); Acts 18 5, "pressed in the spirit" (RV "constrained by"). As a noun, AV uses "press" in Mk 2 4 for δῆλος, ōchlos, "crowd" (so RV). For wine press see WINE; WINE.

PRESSFAT, prez'fat (Hag 2 16 AV, ERV "wine-fat," ARV "winevat"). See WINE.

PRESUME, prē-zūm', PRESUMPTUOUS, prē-zump'tū-us, PRESUMPTUOUSLY, prē-zump'tū-us-li: "To presume" ("to take or go beforehand") is to speak or act without warrant or proudly. In the OT the words are for the most part the tr of זָדָה, zādih, and זָדָה, zādih, "to boil up" (as water), and derivatives; hence to act proudly, to speak unauthorizedly, etc (Dt 18 20,22, of the prophet; Ex 21 14; Dt 1 43; 17 12,13; Ps 19 13, "presumptuous sins" [zēdh, "proud"]; cf Ps 86 14; 119 21, etc; Prov 21 24, etc). Other words are mālē, "to fill," "to be full" (Est 7 5, "presume"); āphal, "to lift oneself up" (Nu 14 44); br'yadh rāmāh, "with a high hand" (Nu 15 30, RV "with a high hand"); in 2 Pet 2 10 tolmētēs, "bold," "daring," is tr^d "presumptuous," RV "daring"; in 2 Macc 3 24; 5 15 we have katatolmāō; thrasūs, is rendered "presumption" in 2 Macc 5 18, RV "daring deed." W. L. WALKER

PREVENT, prē-vent' (קָדַח, kādham; προφθάνω, prophthānō, phthānō): "Prevent" occurs in AV in the literal but obsolete sense of "to come or go before," "to anticipate," not in the sense of "to hinder." It is the tr of kādham, "to be sharp," "to be in front," "to be beforehand" (2 S 22 6,19, RV "came upon"; Job 3 12, RV "receive"; 30 27, "are come upon"; 41 11, "first given"; Ps 18 5,18, "came upon"; 21 3, ARV "meetest"; 59 10, ARV "meet"; 79 8, ARV "meet"; 88 13, "come before"; 119 147,148, ARV "anticipated"; Isa 21 14, "did meet"; Am 9 10, ARV "meet"). In the NT prophthānō, with same meaning, is tr^d "prevent" (Mt 17 25, "Jesus prevented him," RV "spake first to him"); phthānō (1 Thess 4 15, "shall not prevent," RV "shall in no wise precede"). "Prevent" in the above sense occurs in Wisd 6 13, RV

"forestallesh" (phthanō); 16 28, "we must prevent the sun to give thee thanks," RV "rise before."

PREY, prā (בַּז, baz, טְרֵף, tereph, שְׁלָל, shālāl): "Prey" is frequent in the OT, chiefly as the tr of baz, "spoil," "plunder" (Nu 14 3.31; Dt 1 39; Isa 10 6, etc); of tereph, "prey of wild beasts," "torn thing" (Gen 49 9; Nu 23 24; Job 4 11, etc); of malkōh, "a taking" (Nu 31 11, etc; Isa 49 24.25); of shālāl, "spoil" or "booty" (Jgs 5 30 bis; 8 24.25; Isa 10 2, etc). Mahēr-shālāl-hāsh-baz (RVM "The spoil speedeth, the prey hasteth") was the symbolical name given to a son of Isaiah (Isa 8 1.3). "Prey" does not occur in the NT, but is found in the Apoc: 1 Esd 8 77, "for our sins . . . were given up . . . for a prey" (pronomē); Jth 9 4; 16 5; 1 Macc 7 47; Ecclus 27 10 (thēra); Jth 5 24 (katābrōma).

In RV shālāl is generally tr^d "spoil" (Jgs 5 30; 8 24.25; Isa 10 2, etc), while, conversely, "prey" (noun and vb.) is occasionally substituted for "spoil," "booty" (Nu 31 32, etc). See BOOTY; SPOIL.

PRICE, pris: Represents various words in the OT; τιμή, timē, is the usual Gr word for "price" in the NT. "Of great price" is πολύτιμος, polūtīmos, in Mt 13 46, and πολυτελής, poluteleēs, in 1 Pet 3 4. The vb. occurs in Zec 11 13 AV and ERV as "prised." The spelling "prized" in ARV and some edd of AV is due to a confusion with "prize." For "price of a dog" (Dt 23 18 AV) see DOG.

PRICK, prik: As a noun (=any slender pointed thing, a thorn, a sting) it translates two words: (1) שֵׁךְ, sēkh, a "thorn" or "prickle." Only in Nu 33 55, "those that ye let remain of them be as pricks in your eyes," i.e. "shall be a source of painful trouble to you." (2) κέντρον, kéntron, "an iron goad" for urging on oxen and other beasts of burden: "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (AV of Acts 9 5, where RV omits the whole phrase, following the best MSS, including SABCE; AV of Acts 26 14, where RV has "goad," m "Gr 'goads'"), i.e. to offer vain and perilous resistance. See GOAD. As a vb. (= "to pierce with something sharply pointed," "to sting"), it occurs once in its literal sense: "a pricking brier" (Ezk 28 24); and twice in a figurative sense: "I was pricked in my heart" (Ps 73 21); "They were pricked in their heart" (Acts 2 37, κατανύσσω, katanyssō, Vulg compungo; cf Eng. word "compunction"). LITERATURE

A priest is one who is duly authorized to minister in sacred things, particularly to offer sacrifices at the altar, and who acts as mediator between men and God. In the NT the term is applied to priests of the Gentiles (Acts 14 13), to those of the Jews (Mt 8 4), to Christ (He 5 5.6), and to Christians

(1 Pet 2 9; Rev 1 6). The office of priest in Israel was of supreme importance and of high rank. The high priest stood next the monarch in influence and dignity. Aaron, the head of the priestly order, was closely associated with the great lawgiver, Moses, and shared with him in the government and guidance of the nation. It was in virtue of the priestly functions that the chosen people were brought into near relations with God and kept therein. Through the ministrations of the priesthood the people of Israel were instructed in the doctrine of sin and its expiation, in forgiveness and worship. In short, the priest was the indispensable source of religious knowledge for the people, and the channel through which spiritual life was communicated.

I. Nature of the Priestly Office.—The Scriptures furnish information touching this point. To them we at once turn. Priesthood implies

1. Implies choice. Not only was the office of Divine Divine institution, but the priest himself was Divine Divinely appointed thereto. "For every high priest, being taken from among men, is appointed for men in things pertaining to God. . . . And no man taketh the honor unto himself, but when he is called of God, even as was Aaron" (He 5 1.4). The priest was not elected by the people, much less was he self-appointed. Divine selection severed him from those for whom he was to act. Even our Great High Priest, Jesus Christ, came not into the world unscathed. He received His commission and His authority from the fountain of all sovereignty. At the opening of His earthly ministry He said, "He anointed me. . . . He hath sent me" (Lk 4 18). He came bearing heavenly credentials.

It implies the principle of representation. The institution of the office was God's gracious provision for a people at a distance from 2. Implies Him, who needed one to appear in the Representation Divine presence in their behalf. The high priest was to act for men in things pertaining to God, "to make propitiation for the sins of the people" (He 2 17). He was the mediator who ministered for the guilty. "The high priest represented the whole people. All Israelites were reckoned as being in him. The prerogative held by him belonged to the whole of them (Ex 19 6), but on this account it was transferred to him because it was impossible that all Israelites should keep themselves holy as became the priests of Jeh" (Vitringa). That the high priest did represent the whole congregation appears, first, from his bearing the tribal names on his shoulders in the onyx stones, and, second, in the tribal names engraved in the twelve gems of the breastplate. The Divine explanation of this double representation of Israel in the dress of the high priest is, he "shall bear their names before Jeh upon his two shoulders for a memorial" (Ex 28 12.19). Moreover, his committing heinous sin involved the people in his guilt: "If the anointed priest shall sin so as to bring guilt on the people" (Lev 4 3). The LXX reads, "If the anointed priest shall sin so as to make the people sin." The anointed priest, of course, is the high priest. When he sinned the people sinned. His official action was reckoned as their action. The whole nation shared in the trespass of their representative. The converse appears to be just as true. What he did in his official capacity, as prescribed by the Lord, was reckoned as done by the whole congregation: "Every high priest . . . is appointed for men" (He 5 1).

It implies the offering of sacrifice. Nothing is clearer in Scripture than this priestly function. It was the chief duty of a priest to reconcile men to God by making atonement for their sins; and this he effected by means of sacrifice, blood-shedding (He 5 1; 8 3). He would be no priest who should have nothing to offer. It was the high priest who carried the blood of the sin offering into the Most Holy Place and who sprinkled it seven times on and before the mercy-seat, thus symbolically covering the sins of the people from the eyes of the Lord who dwelt between the cherubim (Ps 80 1). It was he also who marked the same blood on the horns of the altar of burnt offering in the Court of the Tabernacle, and on those of the golden altar, that the red sign of propitiation might thus be lifted up in the sight of Jeh, the righteous Judge and Redeemer.

It implies intercession. In the priestly ministry of Aaron and his sons this function is not so expressly set forth as are some of their other duties, but it is certainly included. For intercession is grounded in atonement. There can be no effective advocacy on behalf of the guilty until their guilt is righteously expiated. The sprinkling of the blood on the mercy-seat served to cover the guilt from the face of God, and at the same time it was an appeal to Him to pardon and accept His people. So we read that after Aaron had sprinkled the blood he came forth from the sanctuary and blessed Israel (Lev 9 22-24; Nu 6 22-27).

4. Implies Intercession

II. The Two Great Priests of the OT.

These were Melchizedek and Aaron.

Melchizedek and Aaron No others that ever bore the name or discharged the office rank with these, save, of course, the Lord Jesus Christ, of whom they were distinguished types. Of the two, Melchizedek was the greater. There are two reasons why they are to be considered chiefs: first, because they are first in their respective orders. Melchizedek was not only the head of his order, but he had no successor. The office began and terminated with him (He 7 3). The ordinary priests and the Levites depended for their official existence on Aaron. Apart from him they would not be priests. Second, the priesthood of Christ was typified by both. The office is summed up and completed in Him. They were called and consecrated that they might be prophecies of Him who was to come and in whom all priesthood and offering and intercession would find its ample fulfilment. In the Ep. to the He the priesthood of both these men is combined and consummated in Christ. But let it be noted that while He is of the order of Melchizedek He exercises the office after the pattern of Aaron. He perfects all that Aaron did typically, because He is the true and the real Priest, while Aaron is but a figure.

III. Priestly Functions and Character.—These are minutely prescribed in the Law. In the institution of the office the Lord's words to Moses were, "Take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office" (Ex 28 1 AV). Their duties were strictly religious. They had no political power conferred upon them. Their services, their dependant position, and the way in which they were sustained, i.e. by the free gifts of the people, precluded them from exercising any undue influence in the affairs of the nation. It is true that in process of time the high office degenerated, and became a thing of barter and sale in the hands of unscrupulous and corrupt men, but as originally appointed the priesthood in Israel was not a caste, nor a hierarchy, nor a political factor, but a Divinely appointed medium of communication between God and the people.

Most Holy Place and to sprinkle the blood of the sin offering on the mercy-seat. To him alone it pertained to represent the congregation before the Lord as mediator, and to receive the Divine communications. He was to be ceremonially pure and holy. He must be physically perfect. Any defect or deformity disqualified a member of the priestly family from performing the duties of the office (Lev 21 17-21). The Law spoke with the utmost precision as to the domestic relations of the high priest. He could marry neither a widow, nor a divorced woman, nor one polluted, nor a harlot; only a virgin of his own people, a Hebrew of pure extraction, could become his wife (Lev 21 14,15). Nor was he to come in contact with death. He must not rend his clothes, nor defile himself, even for his father or his mother (Lev 21 10,11). His sons might defile themselves for their kin, but the high priest must not. For he was the representative of life. Death did not exist for him, in so far as he was a priest. God is the Ever-Living, the Life-Giving; and His priest, who had "the crown of the anointing oil of his God upon him," had to do with life alone.

Adolph Saphir believes there is deep significance in the miracle of Aaron's rod that budded and bare almonds (Nu 17). It was a visible

4. Symbol- sign of the legitimacy of Aaron's ism of priesthood and a confirmation of it, Aaron's Rod and a symbol of its vitality and fruitfulness. The twelve rods of the tribes were dead sticks of wood, and remained dead; Aaron's alone had life and produced blossoms and fruit. It was the emblem of his office which correlated itself with life, and had nothing to do with death.

IV. Consecration of Aaron and His Sons (Ex 29; Lev 8).—The process of the consecration is minutely described and is worthy of a more detailed and careful study than can here be given it. Only the more prominent features are noticed.

(1) Both the high priest and his sons were together washed with water (Ex 29 4). But when this was done, the high priest parted company with his sons. (2) Next, Aaron was arrayed in the holy and beautiful garments, with the breastplate over his heart, and the holy crown on his head, the mitre, or turban, with its golden plate bearing the significant inscription, "Holy to Jehovah." This was Aaron's investiture of the high office. (3) He was then anointed with the precious oil. It is noteworthy that Moses poured the oil on his head. When he anointed the tabernacle and its furniture he sprinkled the oil, but in Aaron's case there was a profusion, an abundance in the anointing (Ps 133 2). (4) After the anointing of the high priest the appointed sacrifices were offered (Ex 29 10 ff). Up to this point in the ceremony Aaron was the principal figure, the sons having no part save in the bathing. But after the offerings had been made the sons became prominent participants in the ceremonies, sharing equally with the high priest therein.

(5) The blood of the offering was applied to the person of father and sons alike (Ex 29 20,21). On the tip of the right ear, on the thumb of the right hand, and on the great toe of the right foot was the consecration

The significance of this action should not escape the reader. The whole person and career of the priest were thus brought under power of the blood. He had a blood-stained ear that he might hear and obey the Divine injunctions, that he might understand the word of Jeh and interpret it to the people. His will was brought into subjection to the will of His Lord that he might be a faithful minister in things pertaining to God. He had a blood-stained hand that he might execute, rightly and efficiently, the services of the sanctuary and the duties of his great office. He had likewise a blood-stained foot that he might walk in the statutes and commandments of the Lord blameless, and tread the courts of the Lord's house as the obedient servant of the Most High. Sacrificial blood, the blood of atonement, is here, as everywhere else, the foundation for saints and sinners, for priests and ministers alike, in all their relations with God.

The priests of Israel were but dim shadows, obscure sketches and drafts of the one Great Priest of God, the Lord Jesus Christ. Without drawing out at length the parallelism between the type and the archetype, we may sum up in a few brief sentences the perfection found in the priestly character of Christ: (1) Christ as Priest is appointed of God (He 5 5). (2) He is consecrated with an oath (He 7 20-22). (3) He is sinless (He 7 26). (4) His priesthood is unchangeable (He 7 23,24). (5) His offering is perfect and final (He 9 25-28; 10 12). (6) His intercession is all-prevailing (He 7 25). (7)

LITERATURE

I. Institution of the High-Priesthood.—Temples with an elaborate ritual, a priesthood and a high priest were familiar to Moses. For a millennium or two before his time these had flourished in Egypt. Each temple had its priest or two before his time these had flourished in Egypt. Each temple had its priest or two before his time these had flourished in Egypt. Each temple had its priest or two before his time these had flourished in Egypt. For centuries the high priest of Amon at Thebes stood next to the king in power and influence. Many other high-priesthoods of less importance existed. Moses' father-in-law was priest of Midian, doubtless the chief or high priest. In founding a nation and establishing an ecclesiastical system, nothing would be more natural and proper for him than to institute a priestly system with a high priest at the head. The records give a fairly full account of the institution of the high-priesthood.

High Priest (Egyptian).

Aaron, the brother of Moses, was chosen first to fill the office. He was called "the priest" (ha-kōhēn) (Ex 31 10). As the office was to be hereditary and to be preserved in perpetuity in the family of Aaron (Ex 29 9,29), he is succeeded by his son Eleazar (Nu 20 28; Dt 10 6), and he in turn by his son Phinehas (Nu 25 11). In his time the succession was fixed (Nu 25 12,13). In Lev 4 3.5.16; 6 22 he is called "the anointed priest." Three times in the Pent he is spoken of as "great priest" or "high priest" (Lev 21 10; Nu 35 25,28). The first of these passages identifies him with the anointed priest.

1. The Family

The ceremonies by which he was installed in his office are recorded in Ex 29 29 ff. Seven days of special solemnities were spent. The first consecration was by Moses; it is not said who performed the others. There was special washing and anointing with oil (Ps 133 2). Each new high priest must wear the holy garments, as well as be specially anointed (Lev 21 10). Every day a bullock for a sin offering must be offered for atonement; the altar also must be cleansed, atoned for,

2. The Consecration and anointed, the high priest offering a sacrifice or min-hah for himself (Lev 6 24 ff).

Besides the regularly prescribed dress of the priests, the high priest must wear the robe of the ephod, the ephod, the breastplate and the mitre or headdress (Lev 8 7-9). The robe of the ephod seems to have been a sleeveless tunic, made of blue, fringed with alternate bells and pomegranates (Ex 28 31-35; 39 22-26). The ephod seemed to be a variegated dress of the four colors of the sanctuary, blue, purple, scarlet and fine linen interwoven with gold (Ex 28 6-8; 39 2-5). This distinguishing ephod of the high priest was fastened at the shoulders by two clasps of shoham stone, upon each of which was engraved the names of six tribes of Israel (Ex 28 9-14; 39 6,7). Over the ephod and upon his breast he wore the breastplate, a four-cornered hoshen suspended by little chains. Set in this in four rows were twelve precious stones, having engraved upon them the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. This breastplate must have contained a pocket of some kind inside, for in it were deposited the Urim and Thummim, which seemed to be tangible objects of some kind (Ex 28 15-30; 39 8-21). The mitre or headdress was of fine linen, the plate of the crown of pure gold, and inscribed upon it the words, "Holy to Jehovah" (Ex 28 36-38; 39 30,31). When entering the Holy of Holies he must be dressed wholly in linen, but in his ordinary duties in the dress of the priests; only when acting as high priest he must wear his special robes. See PRIEST.

3. The Dress

In addition to his regular duties as a priest, the high priest was to enter the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16 3.15,33.34). He must also officiate at the ceremony of the two goats, when one is sent into the wilderness to Azazel, and the other slain to make atonement for the sanctuary (Ex 30 10; Lev 16 8-10). He alone could make atonement for the sins of the people, the priests and his own house (Lev 4 3 ff; 9 8 ff; 16 6; Nu 15 25). He must offer the regular meal offering (Lev 6 14,15). He must share with the priests in the caring for the lamp that burned continually (Ex 27 21). He must assist in arranging the shewbread (Ex 25 30). When he carried the breastplate with the names of the tribes inscribed thereon he acted as mediator between Israel and God (Ex 28 29). He alone could consult the Urim and Thummim before Jeh, and according to his decision Israel must obey (Nu 27 21).

An office so important required certain special regulations. He must be free from every bodily defect (Lev 21 16-23). He must marry only a virgin of Israel, not a widow, nor a divorced woman, nor a profane one (Lev 21 14). He must not observe the external signs of mourning for any person, and not leave the sanctuary when news came of the death of even a father or mother (vs 10-12). He must not defile himself by contact with any dead body, even father or mother (ver 11); and is forbidden to let his hair grow long or rend his clothes as a sign of mourning (ver 10). If he should bring guilt upon the people, he must present a special offering (Lev 4 3 ff). Sins affecting the priesthood in general must be expiated by the other priests as well as himself (Nu 18 1). He must eat nothing that died of itself or was torn by beasts (Lev 22 8). He must wash his feet and hands when he went to the tabernacle of the congregation and when he came near to the altar to minister (Ex 30 19-21). At first Aaron was to burn incense on the golden altar every morning when he dressed the lamps and every evening when he lighted them (Ex 27 21), but in later times the common priests performed this duty. He must abstain from holy things during his uncleanness (Lev 22 1-3), or if he should become leprous (vs 4,7). He was to eat the people's meat offering with the inferior priests in the holy place (Lev 6 16). He must assist in judging the leprosy in the human body and garments (Lev 13 2-59), and in adjudicating legal questions (Dt 17 12). When there was no Divinely inspired leader, the high priest was the chief ruler till the time of David and again after the captivity. See PRIEST; PRIESTHOOD.

4. Duties of the High-Priesthood

The emoluments were not much greater than those of the priests in general. He received no more inheritance among the tribes than any other Levite, but he and his family were maintained upon certain fees, dues and perquisites which they enjoyed from the common fund. In Nu 18 28 the priests were to receive a tithe of the tithe paid in to the Levites. Jos says this was a common fund (Ant, IV, iv, 4), but the high priest was probably charged with the duty of distributing it. In general the family of the high priest was well-to-do, and in the later period became very wealthy. The high priest and his family were among the richest people of the land in the time of Christ, making enormous profits out of the sacrifices and temple business.

The importance of the high priest's office was manifest from the first. The high priest Eleazar is named in the first rank with Joshua, the prince of the tribes and successor of Moses (Nu 34 17 f; Josh 14 1). He with others officiated in the distribution of the spoils of the Midianites (Nu 31 21,26). His sins were regarded as belonging to the people (Lev 4 3,22). He acted with Moses in important matters (Nu 26 1; 31 29). The whole congregation must go or come according to his word (Nu 27 20 ff). His death was a national event, for then the manslayer was free to leave the City of Refuge (Nu 35 25,28). He had no secular authority, but was regarded generally as the leading religious authority. Later, he became also the leading secular as well as religious authority.

7. Importance of the Office

II. History of the High-Priesthood in Israel.— In general the present writer accepts the historical records of the OT as true and rejects the critical views of a fictitious or falsified history. Such views have only subjective reasons to support them and are based upon a naturalistic evolutionary view of the development of Israel's religion. As Moses was the founder of the high-priesthood in Israel he anticipated a perpetuation of the office throughout the history (Dt 26 3). The high priest appears frequently. Eleazar officiated with Joshua in the division of the land among the twelve tribes (Josh 14 1). The law of the manslayer shows that he was an important personage in the life of Israel (Josh 20 6). He seemed to have the power to distribute the offices of the priests to those whom he would, and poor priests would appeal to him for positions (1 S 2 36). The office seems to have remained in the family of Eleazar until the days of Eli, when, because of the wickedness of his sons, the family was destroyed and the position passed into the family of Ithamar (1 S 2 31-36). A descendant of that family officiated at Nob in the times of Saul, whose name was Ahimelech (1 S 21 2; 22 11). His son, Abiathar, escaped from the slaughter, and later seems to have succeeded his father and to have been chief priest throughout David's reign (1 S 22 20-23; 23 9; 30 7). Zadok seems to have had almost equal privilege (2 S 8 17; 1 Ch 18 16; 24 6 almost certainly by copyist's error, transpose Abiathar and Ahimelech; Mk 2 26 may be based on this reading. See ABIATHAR, etc). Because he joined the party of Adonijah rather than that of Solomon, Abiathar was deposed and banished to Anathoth, where he spent the rest of his days (1 K 2 26,27). Zadok was put in his place (ver 35). He seems to have been a descendant of Eleazar. Under Jehoshaphat, Amariah was high priest (2 Ch 19 11) and was the leading authority in all religious matters. In the time of Athaliah, during the minority of Joash and almost his entire reign Jehoiada was high priest and chief adviser. He seems to have been the most influential man in the kingdom for more than half a century (2 K 11 4 ff; 12 2-16; 2 Ch 24 passim). Azariah officiated in the days of Uzziah and Hezekiah (2 Ch 26 20; 31 10); Urijah in the reign of Ahaz (2 K 16 10-16), and the latter priest seems to have been a friend of Isaiah (Isa 8 2). Hilkiah held the office in the days of Josiah when the Book of the Law

See ABIATHAR, etc). Because he joined the party of Adonijah rather than that of Solomon, Abiathar was deposed and banished to Anathoth, where he spent the rest of his days (1 K 2 26,27). Zadok was put in his place (ver 35). He seems to have been a descendant of Eleazar. Under Jehoshaphat, Amariah was high priest (2 Ch 19 11) and was the leading authority in all religious matters. In the time of Athaliah, during the minority of Joash and almost his entire reign Jehoiada was high priest and chief adviser. He seems to have been the most influential man in the kingdom for more than half a century (2 K 11 4 ff; 12 2-16; 2 Ch 24 passim). Azariah officiated in the days of Uzziah and Hezekiah (2 Ch 26 20; 31 10); Urijah in the reign of Ahaz (2 K 16 10-16), and the latter priest seems to have been a friend of Isaiah (Isa 8 2). Hilkiah held the office in the days of Josiah when the Book of the Law was discovered (2 K 22 4f; 23 4; 2 Ch 34 9); Zephaniah in the time of Jeremiah (Jer 29 25f); Seraiah in the days of Zedekiah, who was put to death at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25 18f; Jer 52 24). At the time, mention is made of a priest of the second rank (2 K 23 4; 25 18) and Zephaniah fills that office (Jer 52 24). It is doubtful whether this is the same Zephaniah mentioned in Jer 29 25. This "second priest" was doubtless a deputy, appointed to take the high priest's place in case anything should prevent his performing the duties of the office. Lists of high priests are given in 1 Ch 6 1-15; 6 50-53. The first of these gives the line from Levi to Jehozadak who was carried away in the captivity under Nebuchadnezzar. The second traces the line from Aaron to Ahimaaz, and is identical so far with the first list.

There could have been no place for the functions of the high priest during the captivity, but the family line was preserved and Joshua the son of Jehozadak was among those who first returned (Ezr 3 2). From this time the high priest becomes more prominent. The monarchy is gone, the civil authority is in the hands of the Persians, the Jews are no longer independent, and hence the chief power tends to center in the high-priesthood. Joshua appears to stand equal with Zerubbabel (Hag 1 1.12.14; 2 2.4; Zec 3 1.8; 4 14; 6 11-13).

He is distinctly known as high priest (ha-kōhēn ha-gādōh). He takes a leading part in establishing the ecclesiastico-civil system, particularly the building of the temple. In the vision of Zechariah (Zec 3 1-5) Satan accuses the high priest who is here the representative proper of the nation. The consummation of the Messianic age cannot be completed without the co-operation of the high priest who is crowned with Zerubbabel, and sits with him on the throne (Zec 6 13). The prophet also describes Joshua and his friends as "men of the sign," alluding to the coming Messiah under whom the sin of the land was to be taken away in one day (Zec 3 9f). The promise is made to Joshua that if he will walk in Jeh's ways and keep His house, he shall judge Jeh's house, i.e. Israel, keep His court and have a place to walk among those who stand before Jeh (3 7). He is anointed equally with the prince of the royal line, for the two sons of oil (4 14) almost certainly refer to the royal Zerubbabel and priestly Joshua who are to be joint inspirers of Israel in rebuilding the temple.

This exaltation of the high priest is very different from the state of things pictured by Ezekiel (Ezk 40-42). In that picture no place is left for a high priest; the prince seemed to be the chief personage in the ecclesiastical system. Ezekiel's vision was ideal, the actual restoration was very different, and the institutions and conditions of the past were carried out rather than the visions of the prophet. In the time of Nehemiah, Eliashib was high priest (Neh 3 1.20). For abusing his office by using a temple chamber in the interests of his family he was reprimanded (13 4-9). The list of high priests from Jeshua to Jaddua is given in Neh 12 10. According to Jos (Ant, XI, viii, 5) Jaddua was priest at the time of Alexander the Great (332 BC), but it is practically certain that it was Jaddua's grandson, Simon, who was then priest (see W. J. Beecher, Reasonable Bib. Criticism, ch xviii). Thus is preserved the unbroken line from Aaron to Jaddua, the office still being hereditary. No essential change can be found since the days of Ezra. The Book of Ch, compiled some time during this period, uses the three names, ha-kōhēn, ha-kōhēn hā-rō'sh, ha-kōhēn ha-gādōh. The word nāghdōh ("prince") is also used, and he is called "the ruler of the house of God" (1 Ch 9 11). This seems to imply considerable power invested in him. Usually the Chronicler in both Ch and Neh uses the term "the priest."

The line of Eleazar doubtless continued until the time of the Maccabees, when a decided change took place. The Syrian Antiochus deposed Onias

III and put his brother Jason in his place (174 BC), who was soon displaced by Menelaus. About 153 BC Jonathan the Hasmonean was appointed by King Alexander, and thus the high-priesthood passed to the priestly family of Joiarib (1 Macc 10 18-21). Whether the family of Joiarib was a branch of the Zadokites or not cannot be determined. After the appointment of Jonathan, the office became hereditary in the Hasmonean line, and continued thus until the time of Herod the Great. The latter set up and deposed high priests at his pleasure. The Romans did the same, and changed so frequently that the position became almost an annual appointment. Though many changes were thus made, the high priest was always chosen from certain priestly families. From this group of deposed priests arose a class known as "chief priests." The anointing prescribed in the law of Moses was not always carried out in later times, and in fact was generally omitted. The Mish speaks of high priests who were installed in office simply by clothing them with their special robes (Schürer, II, i, p. 217, note 24).

In NT times the high priest was the chief civil and ecclesiastical dignitary among the Jews. He was chairman of the Sanhedrin, and

2. In the head of the political relations with the NT Rom government. It is not clear just how far he participated in the ceremonies of the temple. No doubt he alone entered the Holy of Holies once a year on the Day of Atonement, and also offered the daily offerings during that week. What other part he took in the work was according to his pleasure. Jos says that he officiated at the Sabbath, the New Moon and yearly festivals. The daily minhāh (Lev 6 12 ff) which he was required to offer was not always offered by the high priest in person, but he was required to defray the expense of it. This was a duty which, according to Ezekiel's vision, was to be performed by the prince. The Jews had many contentions with the Romans as to who should keep the garments of the high priest. When Jerus fell into the hands of the Romans, the robe of state also fell into their hands.

In the time of Christ, Annas and Caiaphas were high priests (Lk 3 2), though, as appears later in the Gospel, Caiaphas alone acted as such. Annas had probably been deposed, yet retained much of his influence among the priestly families. For particulars see ANNAS; CAIAPHAS; JESUS CHRIST. These two were also the chief conspirators against Jesus. As president of the council Caiaphas deliberately advised them to put Jesus to death to save the nation (Jn 11 51). He was also chairman of the council which tried and condemned Jesus (Mt 26 57.58.63.65; Mk 14 53.60.61.63; Lk 22 54; Jn 18 12-14.19.24.28). They were also leaders in the persecution of the apostles and disciples after Pentecost (Acts 4 6; 5 17.21); Saul sought letters from the high priest to Damascus to give him authority to bring any Christians he might find there bound to Jerus (Acts 9 2). He presided at the council which tried Paul (Acts 22 5; 23 4). See PAUL, THE APOSTLE.

In the Ep. to the He the doctrine of the priesthood of Jesus is fully and carefully elaborated. Jesus is here called the great High Priest, as well as priest. The opening words of the Ep. contain the essential thought: "when he had made purification of sins" (1 3). The title of high priest is first introduced in 2 17: "a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God"; also in 3 1, "the Apostle and High Priest of our confession." Having thus fairly introduced his great theme, the writer strikes the keynote of his great argument: "Having then a great high priest," etc (4 14.15). From 4 14 to 7 28 the argument deals with the high-priestly work of Jesus. His qualifications are not only those which distinguish all priesthood, but they are also unique. He is named after the order of Melchizedek. The general qualifications are: (1) He is appointed by God to His office (5 1). (2) He is well fitted for the office by His experiences and participation in human temptations (5 2-6; 2 18). (3) He undergoes a Divine preparation (5 8.9). The special qualifications of His priesthood are: It is after the order of Melchizedek (5 10). This is an eternal one (6 20); royal or kingly (7 1-3); independent of birth or family (ver 3); it is timeless (ver 8); superior to that of Levi (vs 4-10); new and different from that of Aaron (vs 11,12). It is also indissoluble (ver 16); immutable (ver 21); inviolable (ver 24). Thus with all these general and special qualifications He is completely fitted for His work (7 26). That work consists in offering up Himself as a sacrifice for the sins of the people (ver 27); entering within the veil as a forerunner (8 20); presenting the sacrificial blood in heaven itself (6 3; 9 7,24); thus obtaining eternal redemption (9 12); ratifying the new covenant (vs 15-22). The result of this high-priestly work is a cleansing from all sin (9 23); a possibility of full consecration to God and His service (10 10); an ultimate perfection (10 14); and full access to the throne of grace (10 21,22). PRIESTHOOD, prĕst'hood:

1. Priesthood an Office
2. In the OT
3. Hereditary Priesthood
4. In the NT
5. Conclusions

LITERATURE

All worship is based on priesthood, for the priestly office is an essential part of salvation. Christianity itself has its glorious Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ, and it is through His one supreme offering that we are brought into saved relations with God and enjoy fellowship with Him. The priesthood of Christ and its mighty effects in sacrifice and intercession on behalf of the people of God are the chief and fundamental theme of the Ep. to the He.

Priesthood is a real office, definite and specific. It is needful to insist on this fact, for the noble word "priest" has been misappropriated and misapplied,

1. Priesthood an Office so that its intrinsic import has been impaired. There is a certain literary slang indulged in by some who talk of the "priests of science," "priests of art," and similar absurdities. The idea of priesthood, if priesthood is to have any definite meaning, can have no place in literature or science or art or in anything of the kind. For it belongs to the realm of grace, presupposing as it does sin and the Divine purpose to remove it. Hugh Martin writes that he "would as soon think of transferring the language of geometry and of algebra to botany and talk of the hypotenuse of a flower and the square root of a tree, or the differential coefficient of a convolvulus, as to speak of the priesthood of nature or letters." Priesthood is an office, embracing very specific duties and functions.

Priesthood in some form appears to have existed from the earliest times, even from the beginning of the history of our race. In patriarchal times the office was held and its duties were discharged by those who occupied some sort of headship, and particularly by the father or the chief of the family and of the tribe. Thus Noah in his capacity of priest and in behalf of his household "builded an altar unto Jeh, and took of every clean beast, and of every clean bird, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar" (Gen 8 20). Abraham offered the ram "for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son" (Gen 22 13). In like manner Job offered burnt offerings for his children, and likewise by Divine direction for the three "comforters" when the great trial had passed (Job 1 5; 42 8). In these and the like instances there was priestly action no less certainly than in that of Aaron or of any regularly appointed priest in Israel. Melchizedek was "priest of God Most High" (Gen 14 18). Isaac "builded an altar there and called upon the name of Jeh" (Gen 26 25), as did Jacob (Gen 33 20). In these cases priestly acts were performed by the patriarchs in their capacity as fathers of the family or heads of clans. From the beginning, priesthood with its acts of expiation and of worship was thus recognized as a Divinely instituted office. But in pre-Mosaic times there was no special class of priests recognized.

Regular priestly succession in a single family was established by Moses (Ex 28 1-3). From this point of time onward the priesthood in Israel was confined to the family of Aaron. No hereditary priesthood seems to have prevailed in patriarchal times. According to the Ep. to the He, Melchizedek, a priest of the highest rank, had neither predecessor nor successor in his great office. By Divine direction Moses designated the Aaronic family as the priestly family in Israel, and he prescribed the garments they should wear, the sacrifices they should offer both for themselves and for the congregation, their maintenance, their domestic relations, and their conduct toward their fellow-Hebrews.

In the appointment of the priesthood there is no trace of Egypt influence. Yet we know that Joseph married the daughter of the priest of On (Gen 41 50). But this fact had no bearing on the selection of Israel's priestly family. The Aaronic priesthood had nothing in common with that of Egypt; it claimed to be of Divine origin, and its duties, functions and powers in no way contradict the claim. The witness of an Egypt archaeologist (Dr. M. G. Kyle) may be here introduced touching one essential element in the duties of the priestly office, viz. sacrifice: "The entire absence from the offerings of old Egypt religion of any of the great Pentateuchal ideas of sacrifice, substitution, atonement, dedication, fellowship, and indeed of almost every essential idea of real sacrifice, as clearly established by recent very exhaustive examination of the offering scenes, makes for the element of revelation in the Mosaic system by delimiting the field of rationalistic speculation on the Egypt side. Egypt gave nothing to that system, for it had nothing to give." As much may be said respecting the priesthood; Israel took little or nothing of its powers and functions from Egypt sources.

Although the office was limited to the Aaronic family, nevertheless in certain exigencies and emergencies others beside the regular priest offered sacrifices to the Lord and were accepted by Him. Thus did Gideon in a time of great straits in Israel (Jgs 6 24,26); thus the men of Beth-shemesh (1 S 6 14,15); the prophet Samuel (1 S 7 9); David (2 S 6 13,17); Elijah (1 K 18 23,32-38), etc. The chosen people appear to have felt free to offer sacrifices and to engage in priestly functions when occasion required, until the central sanctuary was established on Mt. Moriah. When the Temple was built and dedicated, priestly action was confined to Jerus and to the regular priestly household. When Pharisaism, with its rigid legalism, with its intolerable burdens, became dominant, all liberty of worship and spontaneous service largely disappeared. The religious life of Israel stiffened into a dreadful monotony.

All priesthood reaches its climax in that of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is because of the perfection of His priesthood that the office as represented

4. In the NT by Melchizedek and Aaron was effective, and fulfilled the end for which it was appointed. The one answers to the other as type and antitype, as prediction and fulfillment. Christ's priesthood is opened to us in the Ep. to the He (2 14-18; 4 14-16; 5 1-10; 7 9,10,18). Two fundamental truths touching His priesthood are made very prominent in the Ep. to the He. These are its order and its duties. By the order is meant the rank or grade of the Priest, and by the duties the various functions of His ministry. Christ's order as Priest is that of Melchizedek, not at all that of Aaron; He 7 makes this fact perfectly clear. Like Melchizedek, and infinitely above Melchizedek, He is Priest, having no predecessor in the great office, and no successor; herein He stands absolutely alone, peerless and perfect forever. He executes the duties or functions of it after the pattern of Aaron, as He 9 clearly exhibits. These two priesthoods, Melchizedek's and Aaron's, are gloriously accomplished in the person and work of Jesus Christ.

The point is raised and discussed with some keenness in our day, Did Christ execute the office of priest during His sojourn on earth, or does He exercise the office only in heaven? A full discussion of this interesting subject would be inappropriate. However, let it be noted (1) that the Lord Jesus was appointed a Priest no less certainly than was Aaron (He 5 4.5). In the words, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," there appears to be a reference both to His incarnation (Lk 1 32; He 1 5) and also to His resurrection (Acts 13 33). In He 2 17 we are told that it "behooved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren, that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make propitiation for the sins of the people." The assumption of human nature was needful that He might be such a priest. John the Baptist saw this truth, and said, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (Jn 1 29).

There was certainly priestly action in His death. Twice we are told that He "offered up himself" (He 7 27). "For this he did once for all, when he offered up himself." This strong term, "offered," is sacrificial and points to His death as an offering made for the sins of the people. His own action in it must not be overlooked; it was He Himself who presented the offering; He was not, therefore, a struggling victim, a martyr, who could not escape the doom that came upon Him—He voluntarily offered Himself.

In He 9 14 we find these significant words: "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God, cleanse your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" It was as Priest that He made this stupendous offering, and this He did when still on earth. He was at once both sacrifice and priest. Never was He more active than when He offered Himself to God.

It is worth while to remind ourselves that the words employed in Scripture to express the act of His dying are never used to denote the death of a creature, a man. Matthew has, He "yielded up [dismissed] his spirit" (Mt 27 50). John has, He "gave up his spirit" (Jn 19 30); Mk 15 37 and Lk 23 46 both have the same words: He "gave up the ghost." He died, not because He was mortal as we are, nor because He could not deliver Himself, but because He gave Himself for our sins that we might be forgiven and saved (Jn 10 17.18). The voluntariness of His offering is the very essence of His priestly atonement. See CHRIST, OFFICES OF, V; PRIESTHOOD IN THE NT.

Priesthood springs out of the deepest need of the human soul. Men universally feel that somehow they have offended the Power to whom they are responsible, to whom they

5. Con- they must give account of their deeds.
clusions They long to appease their offended Lord, and they believe that one who is authorized and qualified to act in their behalf may secure for them the abrogation of penalty and the pardon they seek. Hence priesthood connects itself most closely with sin, with guilt and its removal. The heart craves the intervention and intercession on their behalf of one who has liberty of access to God, and whose ministry is acceptable. In short, the priest is the representative of the sinner in things pertaining to God. He is the mediator whose office it is to meet and satisfy the claims of God upon those for whom he acts, and who secures the pardon and the favor which the offender must have, if he is to enjoy fellowship with God. And this, and more than this, we have in our Great High Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ.

PRIESTHOOD IN THE NT:

1. The Jewish Priesthood
2. The Priesthood and High-Priesthood of Jesus Christ
3. The Priesthood of Believers

In the NT ιερέυμα, hieráteuma (1 Pet 2 5.9), "priesthood," is not found with reference to the Jewish priesthood, but ιερέυς, hiereús, and ἀρχιερέυς, archiereús, "high priest," frequently occur. As until the fall of Jerus the activities of the

1. The priests were carried on in careful accordance with the prescriptions of the Jewish Priesthood OT, there naturally is nothing new or striking in the numerous NT references to their work. Perhaps the information of the greatest interest is found in Lk 1 5-9 to the effect that Zacharias was of the course of Abijah, the 8th of the 24 courses into which the priests were divided (cf 1 Ch 24 7-18), and that in these courses the priests divided their work by lot. In the Gospels the archiereis are mentioned oftener than are the hiereis, the power of the priesthood seeming to have been absorbed by a sort of priestly aristocracy. As under the political pressure of that time the office of high priest could seldom be retained until the death of the holder, there might even be several living at the same time who had for a longer or shorter time held this office which made a man the head of the nation, not only ritually, but also politically, since the high priest was ex officio presiding officer of the Sanhedrin. Not only would these ex-high priests naturally retain the title belonging to their former dignity, but probably the name had come to include as well other members of the same families or of families of equal position, so that it seems that "chief priests" is a more exact tr of archiereis than high priests. In the sing., however, the reference of archiereus is usually, if not invariably, to the individual who at the time given was holding the unique office of high priest. The word hiereus is of course employed in its ordinary signification on the rare occasions when reference is made in the NT to corresponding ministers of other religions, as to the priest of Zeus (Acts 14 13) and also to Melchizedek (He 7 1).

Only in He is the activity of Jesus set forth as priestly and high-priestly, but in this Ep. great emphasis is laid on these aspects of His work.

2. The Priesthood and High-Priesthood of Jesus Christ. Interpreters seldom distinguish between these two aspects of His work, and it is plain that sometimes at least the author himself made no effort sharply to distinguish them. But certain considerations make it probable that they were not really confused or combined in the mind of the author himself. For example, it is to be noted that the priesthood of Jesus is declared to be after the order of Melchizedek, and consequently radically unlike that of the Levitical priests. On the other hand, the Aaronic high-priesthood is regarded as having been analogous to that of Jesus, so that in spite of its inferiority, comparison is frequently made with it. It is readily seen that the work of the high priest, both because of his entry into the Most Holy Place and because he bore the names of the children of Israel in the breastplate of judgment for a memorial before Jeh continually, far more suitably than that of the ordinary priests typified the atoning and intercessory work of Jesus (Ex 28 12.15).

Attempting then to treat separately the priestly and high-priestly functions of Jesus, we note that most of what is said of the priestly functions is involved in the declaration that He is a priest after the order of Melchizedek, and this thought is handled in He 7 in such a way as to make plain the superiority of a priesthood after the order of Melchizedek, and thus to confirm the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, the great theme of the book. Historically the blessing bestowed upon Abraham and the reception of tithes from him prove the superiority of Melchizedek to Levi, and still more to the priestly descendants of Levi (7 4-10).

Further, Jesus became priest not on the ground of a "carnal commandment," i.e. in an order based on descent and inheritance, but by "the power of an endless life" (7 16), of which fact Melchizedek reminds us, since Scripture is silent alike as to his birth and his death. Again, unlike the Levitical priests, Christ is inducted into His office by the oath of God (7 20,21; cf Ps 110 4). Finally, while the priests of the Levitical line were hindered from permanence in office by their death, Jesus holds His priesthood untransmitted and untransmissible (7 23,24). This discussion of the priesthood of Christ "after the order of Melchizedek" occupies almost all of ch 7, but at ver 26 His high-priesthood is suddenly introduced, and after that point, while His work is more than once contrasted with that of the temple priests (8 4,5; 9 6; 10 11 f), no further reference is in any way made to Melchizedek.

After having twice merely given the title of high priest to Jesus (2 17; 3 1), the writer of the Ep. to the He at 4 14 begins a statement of the resemblance between Jesus and the Jewish high priest, such "as was Aaron," finding the resemblance to reside (1) in His Divine appointment to His work (5 4,5), (2) in His experience of suffering (5 7,8; cf 4 15; 5 2), and (3) in His saving work suggested by the sacrificial activity of the ordinary high priest (5 9), which, however, it far transcends in value and effect. But (4) later the work of the high priest and that of Jesus are contrasted as to place where done, the high priest going into the second tabernacle, i.e. the Holy of Holies (9 7), while Christ passes through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, "heaven itself" (9 11,24). A similar contrast is (5) drawn between the sacrifices respectively offered, the ancient sacrifices being the blood of goats and calves (9 12), Christ's being "himself" (9 14), "his own blood" (9 12), "the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God" (9 14). The author also accepts and urges without argument or even explanation (6) the truly sacrificial character of this self-immolation of Jesus. Nor is this fact nullified by the emphasis which once is laid on doing God's will in an antithesis copied from the Ps (10 5-9; cf Ps 40 6 ff), for here the contrast drawn is not between sacrifice on one side and obedience on the other, but rather between the sacrifice of animals dying involuntarily and wholly unconscious of the sacrificial significance of their death, and the offering of Himself on the part of Jesus in intelligent purpose to carry out the will of God, by which will the body of Jesus Christ is the only acceptable offering (10 10). Further the author urges (7) the actual effectiveness of Christ's work, his argument being that it would already have been repeatedly performed if this single offering had not been sufficient for all time, "once for all" (7 27; 9 26). Finally is asserted (8) the intercessory work of Christ, which, though not explained, seems to be a figurative presentation of his idea that men are blessed because Christ died, i.e. that this was an indispensable condition of God's manifestation of His merciful love, and that the grace consequent on the death of Christ does not merely grow out of a fact, but that the Divine love and providence for believers are exercised, neither automatically or impersonally, but in virtue of a constant personal sympathy for varying temptations and needs, a sympathy intensified by the earthly experience, temptation, suffering of Him who had been and is, not only the Divine Son, but also the Son of Man. Thus the salvation of the believer is certain and complete, and the priestly and high-priestly work of Jesus reaches its consummation.

The priesthood of believers is an idea which finds formal expression less frequently in the NT than has been the case in Protestant theology. But it does not follow that there has been a corresponding divergence from the thought of the

3. The apostles. It only shows that a thought Priesthood which according to apostolic concepof Believers tion was one of the invariable privileges of every Christian, and which found, if not constant, yet sufficiently clear expression in this figurative fashion, has come, in consequence of errors which have developed, to receive in the controversies of later centuries stronger emphasis than it did at first. It may well be noted first that this conception of the priesthood of believers, standing by itself, is in no way related to the various priestly activities which are also figuratively attributed to them. The writer of the Ep. to the He, who does not speak of the priesthood of believers, knowing no Christian priesthood but that of Jesus Himself, yet calls "praise," "to do good and to communicate," sacrifices (13 15,16). So Paul bids the Romans present their bodies "a living sacrifice" (Rom 12 1), and Peter calls Christians "a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices" (1 Pet 2 5). But this figurative usage is entirely distinct from the subject of the present paragraph. Also the conception of the Christian priesthood never in the NT attaches itself merely to the ministry of the Christian church, whatever may be held as to its orders or tasks. In no sense has the church or any church an official priesthood.
Nor is it any part of the NT conception of the priesthood of believers that any individual should act in any respect for any other. Though the intercessory supplication of believers in behalf of other persons has of late often been represented as a priestly act, as being, indeed, that activity which is essential to any real priesthood of believers, the NT thought is quite different, and is to be thus conceived: In ancient times it was held that men in general could not have direct access to God, that any approach to Him must be mediated by some member of the class of priests, who alone could approach God, and who must accordingly be employed by other men to represent them before Him.
This whole conception vanishes in the light of Christianity. By virtue of their relation to Christ all believers have direct approach to God, and consequently, as this right of approach was formerly a priestly privilege, priesthood may now be predicated of every Christian. That none needs another to intervene between his soul and God; that none can thus intervene for another; that every soul may and must stand for itself in personal relation with God—such are the simple elements of the NT doctrine of the priesthood of all believers. (Consult treatises on NT theology, and comms. on the Ep.
to the Hebrews.)

In some Minaean inscriptions found at El-'Olá, dating back about 1200-800 BC (Hommel in Hilprecht, Explorations in Bible Lands, 719), certain "priests and priestesses of the god Wadd are designated by the term lawi, fem. lawi'at" (op. cit., 749). It is not known whether this is due to Israelitic influence.

1. Different Views of the History.—There are great divergences of opinion among modern writers as to the true course of history and the dating of the different documents. It will therefore be best to sketch these views in rough outline, and then give the evidence of the various authorities, together with the reasons that in each case arise naturally from the consideration of that evidence.

The old belief was that the whole of the Pentateuchal laws were the work of Moses, that the account of the subsequent history given in the Books of Ch was correct, that Ezekiel's vision, if taken literally, could not be reconciled with the other known facts and was inexplicable, and that in the case of all other discrepancies harmonistic explanations should be adopted.

The modern critical school have traversed every one of these doctrines. The Chronicler is declared to be in constant and irreconcilable conflict with the older authorities, harmonistic explanations are uniformly rejected, the Pent is denied to Moses and split up into a variety of sources of different ages, and Ezk gains a place of honor as representing a stage in a continuous and normal development. The subject is thus inextricably linked with the Pentateuchal problem, and reference must be made to the art. PENTATEUCH for an explanation of the supposed documents and a consideration of the analysis with its nomenclature. On the other hand the present article and the art. SANCTUARY (q.v.) explain and discuss the most widely held theory of the historical development into which the history of the supposed Pentateuchal sources has been fitted.

The dominant theory is that of Wellhausen. According to this, "Levite" was originally a term denoting professional skill, and the early Levites were not members of the tribe of Levi, but professional priests. Anybody could sacrifice. "For a simple altar no priest was required, but only for a house which contained a sacred image; this demanded watching and attendance" (Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 130). The whole Levitical Law was unknown and the distinction between priests and Levites unheard of. There were a few great sanctuaries and one influential priesthood, that of Shiloh (afterward at Nob). With the monarchy the priesthood became more important. The royal priests at Jerus grew in consequence and influence until they overshadowed all the others. Dt recognized the equal priestly right of all Levites, and Josiah's reformation placed the sons of Zadok, who were the priests of Jerus and not descendants of Aaron, in a position of decisive superiority. Then Ezk drew a new and previously unknown distinction between "the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok" who are "keepers of the charge of the altar," and the other Levites who were made "keepers of the charge of the house" as a punishment for having ministered in the high places. The PC takes up this distinction and represents it as being of Mosaic origin, making of the sons of Zadok "sons of Aaron." "In this way arose as an illegal consequence of Josiah's reformation, the distinction between priests and Levites. With Ezk this distinction is still an innovation requiring justification and sanction; with the PC it is a 'statute forever,' although even yet not absolutely undisputed, as appears from the priestly version of the story of Korah's company. For all Judaism subsequent to Ezra, and so for Christian tradition, the PC in this matter also has been authoritative. Instead of the Deuteronomic formula 'the priests the Levites,' we henceforward have 'the priests and the Levites,' particularly in Ch" (op. cit., 147). From that time onward the priests and Levites are two sharply distinguished classes. It is an essential part of this theory that the Chronicler meant his work to be taken as literal history, correctly representing the true meaning of the completed law. See CRITICISM.

There have been various attempts to construct less thoroughgoing theories on the same data. As a rule these views accept in some form the documentary theory of the Pent and seek to modify the Wellhausen theory in two directions, either by attributing earlier dates to one or more of the Pentateuchal documents—esp. to the PC—or else by assigning more weight to some of the statements of Ch (interpreted literally). Sometimes both these tendencies are combined. None of these views has met with any great measure of success in the attempt to make headway against the dominant Wellhausen theory, and it will be seen later that all alike make shipwreck on certain portions of the evidence.

The independent investigations on which the present article is based have led the writer to a view that diverges in important particulars from any of these, and it is necessary to state it briefly before proceeding to the evidence. In one respect it differs from all the rival schemes, not merely in result, but also in method, for it takes account of versional evidence as to the state of the texts. Subject to this it accepts the Mosaic authenticity of all the Pentateuchal legislation and the clear and consistent testimony of the Law and the Prophets (i.e. of the two earlier and more authoritative portions of the Heb Canon), while regarding Ch as representing a later interpretation, not merely of the history, but also of the legal provisions. In outline the story of the priesthood is then as follows: Moses consecrated Aaron and his sons as the priests of the desert tabernacle. He purified the rest of the tribe of Levi as a body of sacred porters for the period of wanderings, but in the legislation of Nu he made no provision whatever for their performing any duties after the sanctuary obtained a permanent location. At the same time he gave a body of priestly teaching requiring for its administration in settled conditions a numerous and scattered body of priests, such as the house of Aaron alone could not have provided immediately after the entry into Canaan. To meet this, Dt—the last legislative work of Moses—contains provisions enlarging the rights and duties of the Levites and conferring on them a priestly position. The earlier distinction was thus largely obliterated, though the high-priestly dignity remained in the house of Aaron till the time of Solomon, when it was transferred from the house of Eli to that of Zadok, who, according to Ezekiel's testimony, was a Levite (but see below, IV, 1). So matters remained till the exile, when Ezekiel put forward a scheme which together with many ideal elements proposed reforms to insure the better application of the Mosaic principle of the distinction between holy and profane to greatly altered circumstances. Taking his inspiration from the wilderness legislation, he instituted a fresh division in the tribe of Levi, giving to the sons of Zadok a position similar to that once held by the sons of Aaron, and degrading all other Levites from the priesthood conferred on them by Dt to a lower rank. The duties now assigned to this class of "keepers of the charge of the house" were never even contemplated by Moses, but Ezekiel applies to them the old phrases of the Pent which he invests with a new significance. As a result of his influence, the distinction between priests and Levites makes its appearance in post-exilic times, though it had been unknown to all the writers of the second division of the Heb Canon. At the same time a meaning was read into the provisions of the Law which their original author could not have contemplated, and it was this interpretation which is presented (at any rate to some extent) in Ch, and has given us the current tradition. Many of the Chronicler's statements are, however, not meant to be taken literally, and could not have been so taken by his original public.

II. The Data of P in the Pentateuch.—To arrive at an objective conclusion it is necessary, in the first instance, to examine the facts without such bias as any view put forward by any other author, ancient or modern, sacred or profane, might impart. Every legislator is entitled to be judged on his own language, and where he has, so to speak, made his own dictionary, we are compelled to read his meaning into the terms used. The very first of the material references to the Levites drives this truth home. "But appoint thou the Levites over the tabernacle of the testimony, and over all the furniture thereof" (Nu 1 50). It is necessary to consider whether such expressions are to be read in a wide or a narrow sense. We learn from 18 3 that death would be the result of a Levite's touching any of these vessels, and it therefore appears that these words are meant to be construed narrowly. "They shall bear the tabernacle, and all the furniture thereof; and they shall minister unto it," are the next words (1 50); but yet we read later of the Kohathites who were to bear it that "they shall not touch the sanctuary, lest they die" (4 15). This shows that the service in question is strictly limited to a service of portage after the articles have been wrapped up by Aaron and his sons. By no possibility could it include such a task as cleaning the vessels. It is then further directed that the Levites are to take down and set up the dwelling and camp round about it. All these are desert services and desert services only. Then we read that "the Levites shall keep the charge of the tabernacle [dwelling] of the testimony." This concludes the first material passage (Nu 1 50-53). The other passages of Nu only amplify these directions; they never change them. But some phrases are used which must be more particularly considered.

(1) Technical phrases.—We hear that the Levites are "to serve the service of the tent of meeting," and this looks as if it might refer to some general duties, but the context and the kindred passages always forbid this interpretation. Nu 7 5 ff is an admirable instance. Six wagons are there assigned to the Levites for this service, two to the Gershonites and four to the Merarites. "But unto the sons of Kohath he gave none, because the service of the sanctuary belonged unto them; they bare it upon their shoulders." Here service is transport and nothing else. Again we read of the charge of the Levites in the tent of meeting, e.g. 4 25 f. If we look to see what this was, we find that it consisted of transporting portions of the tent that had been packed up. The "in" of EV does not represent the meaning of the Hebrew fairly; for the context makes it clear that the legislator means "in respect to." "But they shall not go in to see the sanctuary even for a moment, lest they die" (4 20). In Eng. idiom we cannot speak of the transport of portions of a dismantled tent as service in that tent. One other expression requires notice, the phrase "keep the charge" which is distinguished in 8 26 from "doing service." The exact meaning cannot be determined. It appears to denote something kindred to service, but of a less exacting nature, perhaps the camping round the tent and the guardianship of the articles on the march. We shall see hereafter by comparison with other books that in P it does not bear the same meaning as elsewhere.

(2) Other legal provisions.—The Levites were to act under the orders of Aaron and his sons, who were to assign to each man his individual functions (Nu 3, 4, etc). They were to undergo a special rite of purification (Nu 8), but not of consecration. They were taken in place of the firstborn (Nu 3). The age for beginning service is given in ch 4 as 30 years, but in 8 24 as 25, if the text be sound. The age for ceasing to serve was 50. In many passages the VSS suggest that a good many phrases are textually doubtful, and it is probable that when a critical text of the Pent is formed on scientific principles, a good many superfluous expressions will be found not to be original; but there is no reason to suppose that any real difference in the meaning of the passages would be revealed by such a text.

The story of Korah is easily misunderstood. It appears from Nu 16 3 that his real object was to put himself on an equality with Moses and Aaron, and this is the "priesthood" referred to in ver 10. Nu 18 reinforces the earlier passages. It is noteworthy as showing that in the conception of the legislator the Levites were not to come near the vessels or the altar (ver 3). The penalty is death for both Levites and priests.

(3) Contrast with Ezk and Ch.—The impression as to the meaning of P which may be gathered from an examination of its statements is powerfully reinforced when they are tested by reference to Ezk and Ch. Ezk 44 9-14 seems to demand of the Levites some service as gatekeepers, the slaying of burnt offering and sacrifice for the people and a keeping of "the charge of the house, for all the service thereof," which in the light of vs 7 f appears to mean in his terminology, not a service of transport, but an entry into the house and the performance of certain duties there. P, on the contrary, knows nothing of gatekeepers, regards the slaying of the burnt offering and sacrifice as the duty of the individual sacrificant (Lev 1, 3), and—if, as Wellhausen thinks, it refers to the temple—it would have visited with death a Levite who was present in the places in which Ezk requires him to minister. Similarly with the Chronicler. For instance, he speaks of the Levites being "for the service of the house . . . in the courts and over the chambers, and over the cleansing of every holy thing" (1 Ch 23 23), but P knows nothing of any chambers, would not have allowed the Levites to touch (much less clean) many of the holy things, and regarded service simply as portage. In 1 Ch 23 31 the Levites are to offer burnt offerings on certain occasions; in P their approach to the altar would have meant death both to themselves and the priests (Nu 18 3). Other instances will be found in PS, 238 f.

(4) What the foregoing proves.—In view of these facts it is impossible to hold that the Levites in P represent a projection of the Levites of the second temple or any post-Mosaic age into the desert period. To P they are a body of sacred porters. The temple of course could not be carried about, and it cannot be held that in this respect the legislation mirrors later circumstances. "Secondly, the net result of such a scheme would be to create a body of Levites for use during the period of wanderings and never thereafter. As soon as the desert age was over the whole tribe would find their occupation gone. How can we conceive that any legislator deliberately sat down and invented such a scheme centuries after the epoch to which it relates, well knowing that in so far as his scheme purported to be a narrative of events it was fictitious from beginning to end, and in so far as it might be regarded as a legislation applicable to his own or any future day, there was not a line in it that could conceivably be put into practice? If any theorist can be conceived as acting in this way, how are we to suppose that his work would meet with acceptance? . . . Thirdly, P neither embodies the views of Ezk nor finds an accurate reflection in Ch. The facts are such as to enable us to say definitely that P is not in line with them. It is impossible to assume that he appointed the death penalty for certain acts if performed by Levites because he really wished the Levites to perform those acts" (PS, 241 f).

P also speaks of Aaron the priest and the sons of Aaron the priest. It is doubtful whether the expression "the sons of Aaron the priests," which occurs frequently in the MT, is ever original; the Massoretic expression is nowhere supported by all the authorities. "The phrase 'Aaron the high priest' is entirely unknown to P. Where the high priest's name is given the only qualifying apposition possible in his usage is 'the priest.'" Aaron and his sons, unlike the Levites, were consecrated, not merely purified.

At this point two features only of the legislation need be noticed: the inadequacy of the staff to post-conquest conditions and the signs of date. For example, the leprosy laws (Lev 13 f) postulate the presence of priests to inspect and isolate the patient. "Remembering that on the critical theory P assumes the capital at Jerus as self-evident, we must ask how such provisions were to work after the conquest. During the desert period nothing could have been simpler, but what was to happen when the Israelites dwelt all over Canaan from Beersheba to Dan?" (PS, 246). The difficulty is immensely increased if we postulate an exilic or post-exilic date, when the Jewish center of gravity was in Babylonia and there were large colonies in Egypt and elsewhere. And "What are we to say when we read of leprosy garments (Lev 13 47 ff)? Was a man to make the pilgrimage from Babylonia to Jerus to consult a priest about a doubtful garment? And what about the leper's offerings in ch 14? Could they conceivably have been meant to apply to such circumstances?" (PS, 247). The case is no better with the law of leprosy houses, which is expressed to apply to the post-conquest period (Lev 14 33-53). The notification to the priest and his inspections require a priesthood scattered all over the country, i.e. a body far more numerous than the house of Aaron at the date of the conquest. Such instances could easily be multiplied from the legislation; one more only will be cited on account of its importance to the history of the priesthood. According to Lev, the individual sacrificant is to kill the victims and flay the burnt offerings. How could such procedure be applied to such sacrifices as those of Solomon (1 K 8 63)? With the growth of luxury the sacrifices would necessarily become too large for such a ritual, and the wealthy would grow in refinement and object to performing such tasks personally. This suggests the reason for later abuses and for the modifications of Ezk and the representations of the Chronicler.

Result of the evidence.—Thus the evidence of P is unfavorable alike to the Wellhausen and the mediating views. The indications of date are consistently Mosaic, and it seems impossible to fit the laws into the framework of any other age without reading them in a sense that the legislator can be shown not to have contemplated. On the other hand P is a torso. It provides a large body of Levites who would have nothing to do after the conquest, and a corpus of legislation that could not have been administered in settled conditions by the house of Aaron alone.

III. The Other Portions of the Pentateuch.—In Ex 19 22.24 we read of priests, but a note has come down to us that in the first of those verses Aquila had "elders," not "priests," and this appears to be the correct reading in both places, as is shown by the prominence of the elders in the early part of the chapter. In Hebrew the words differ by only two letters. It is said by Wellhausen that in Ex 33 7-11 (E) Joshua has charge of the ark. This rests on a mistranslation of Ex 33 7, which should be rendered (correcting EV), "And Moses used to take a [or the] tent and pitch it for himself without the camp." It is inconceivable that Moses should have taken the tent of the ark and removed it to a distance from the camp for his private use, leaving the ark bared and unguarded. Moreover, if he had done so, Joshua could not have been in charge of the ark, seeing that he was in this tent while the ark (ex hypothesi) remained in the camp. Nor had the ark yet been constructed. Nor was Joshua in fact a priest or the guardian of the ark in E: (1) in the Book of Josh E knows of priests who carry the ark and are quite distinct from Joshua (3 ff); (2) in Dt 31 14 (E) Joshua is not resident in the tent of meeting; (3) in E Aaron and Eleazar are priests (Dt 10 6), and the Levitical priesthood is the only one recognized (Dt 33 10); (4) there is no hint anywhere of Joshua's discharging any priestly duty whatsoever. The whole case rests on his presence in the tent in Ex 33 7-11, and, as shown in the art. PENTATEUCH (q.v.), this passage should stand after Ex 13 22.

Then it is said that in Ex 4 14; Jgs 17 7, "Levite" denotes profession, not ancestry. In the latter passage the youth whom Micah made a priest was of Levitical descent, being the grandson of Moses (Jgs 17 13), and the case rests on the phrase, "of the family of Judah." Neither of the Septuagintal translations had this text (Field, Hexapla, ad loc.), which therefore cannot be supported, since it cannot be suggested that Moses belonged to the tribe of Judah. As to Ex 4 14, the phrase "Aaron thy brother the Levite" is merely an adaptation of the more usual, "Aaron, son of Amram, the Levite," rendered necessary by the fact that his brother Moses is the person addressed. The Wellhausen theory here is shown to be untenable in PS, 250 and RE³, XI, 418.

Ex 32 26-29 foreshadows the sacred character of Levi, and Dt 10 6 (E) knows the hereditary Aaronic priesthood. In D the most important passage is Dt 18 6-8. In ver 7 three Septuagintal MSS omit the words "the Levites," and if this be a gloss, the whole historic sense of the passage is changed. It now contains an enactment that any Levite coming to the religious capital may minister there "as all his brethren do, who stand there," etc, i.e. like the descendants of Aaron. "The Levites" will then be the explanation of a glossator who was imbued with the latest post-exilic ideas, and thought that "his brethren" must mean those of his fellow-Levites who were not descended from Aaron. The passage is supplemented by 21 5, giving to the Levites judicial rights, and 24 8 assigning to them the duty of teaching the leprosy regulations. Together with 33 10 (E), "they shall teach thy judgments to Jacob and thy law to Israel: they shall put incense in thy nostrils and whole burnt-offering on thine altar," these passages complete the provisions of P in giving to the Levites an occupation in place of their transport duties, and providing the necessary staff for administering the legislation when the Israelites were no longer massed together in a single camp, but scattered over the country. We shall see in the next section that this view of the meaning of the Law was taken by every writer of the second part of the Canon who touches on the subject. Everywhere we are confronted with the legitimacy of a Levitical priesthood; nowhere is there any mention of an exclusive Aaronic right. Smaller points which cannot be discussed here are examined in PS. It only remains to notice that these provisions fully explain the frequent Deuteronomical locution, "the priests the Levites." One other remark must be made. Though it is not expressly stated, we may assume that consecration would be necessary in the case of any Levite acting on the provisions of Dt 18 6-8, and was not mentioned because in Heb antiquity it went without saying that every priest must be consecrated (cf Jgs 17).

IV. From Moses to Malachi.—Josh adds but little to our information. In 18 7 the priesthood is called the inheritance of the Levites, and it is singular that the Wellhausen critics attribute this to a priestly redactor, though such a writer should ex hypothesi have been jealous to withhold the priesthood from the Levites. It is very interesting to find that in Josh 3, 4, all the different critical documents speak in exactly the same terms of "the priests that bare the ark." The priestly writer ought, on the Wellhausen theory, to have said "the Levites." The expression "the priests the Levites" is found alternating with the expression "the priests." All this points to the construction put upon the provisions of the Law in the preceding section, and finds fresh confirmation in Jgs, where we see Micah rejoicing at having a Levite as a priest (17 13), thus showing that the sacred character of the tribe was recognized in the earliest post-Mosaic times. The lay sacrifices in 2 and the following books are explained under SANCTUARY; SACRIFICE (q.v.).

1. The Sources Other than Ezekiel

The period of the early kings shows us kings blessing the people (e.g. 2 S 6 18). It is claimed that this is the priestly blessing, but without evidence, and there seems no more reason to see special priestly rights here than in David's blessing his household (2 S 6 20), or the frequent blessings of the Bible (e.g. Gen passim, esp. "in thee will Israel bless" Gen 48 20), while in 1 K 8 55 ff we actually have the words of the blessing delivered on one of these occasions by Solomon, and it is quite unlike the blessing of the priests (Nu 6 22 ff).

Textual criticism disposes of the supposed priesthood of certain non-Levitical persons. In 2 S 8 18 the MT makes David's sons "priests," but this reading was unknown to the LXX, Symmachus and Theodotion (Field, ad loc.). The LXX has "aularchs," i.e. chamberlains. That this represents a different Hebrew word is proved by the Septuagint list of 3 K 2 46 (not extant in Heb), where we read that Benaiah, son of Jehoiada, was "over the aularchy and over the brick-making." It cannot be suggested that this represents an original Heb "over the priesthood and over the brick-making," and accordingly we must concede the existence of some secular court office which was rendered by this Gr phrase. Hitzig and Cheyne conjecture that סכנים, sōkhenim, should be read for כהנים, kōhānīm. This word gives the sense required (see Isa 22 15, RVm "steward"). In 2 S 20 26 we read that Ira, וְיִצְחָק, ha yā'irī ("the Jairite"), was a priest, but the Syr supported by Lucian and 23 38 reads וְיִצְחָק, ha-yatirī ("the Jattirite"). Jattir was a priestly city. In 1 K 4 5 Nathan's son is described as "priest friend of the king," but LXX reads only "friend of the king" (cf esp. 1 Ch 27 33 f; 2 S 15 32), and at another period Nathan's son held the kindred secular office of king's counsellor (LXX 3 K 2 46, a fact that is certainly unfavorable to the view that he ever held priestly office). There can therefore be no doubt that the word "priest," כהן, kōhēn, has arisen through dittography of the preceding word נתן, nāthān, Nathan.

Various dealings with the ark in the age of Samuel require notice. As a boy Samuel himself is given into the service of Eli. It has been argued that he really officiated as a priest, though probably (if the Chronicler's data be rejected) not of Levitical descent. The answer is to be found in his age. Weaning sometimes took place at as late an age as three, and accordingly the boy may have been as much as four years old when he was taken to Shiloh (1 S 1 24). His mother used to bring him a little cloak (1 S 2 19) every year, and this notice also shows his extreme youth. In view of this it cannot seriously be contended that he performed any priestly service. He must have been a sort of page, and he performed some duties of a porter, opening the door-valves of the temple at Shiloh (1 S 3 15).

(1) The custody of the ark.—When the ark was captured by the Philis, it was in the charge of priests. When David brought it to Jerus, it was again placed in priestly custody, but there is an interregnum of some 20 years (1 S 7 2).

It must be remembered that whatever may have happened during this period of great national confusion, the practice of all the rest of history, extending over some 600 or 700 years, is uniform and would far outweigh any irregularities during so short and troubled a period.

(2) On its return from the Philistines.—The first difficulty arises on 1 S 6 14.15. In the second of these verses the Levites come up after the Beth-shemites have finished, and, in Wellhausen's words, "proceed as if nothing had happened, lift the ark from the now no longer existent cart, and set it upon the stone on which the sacrifice is already burning" (Prolegomena, 128). It is therefore suggested that ver 15 is a gloss. But there is difficulty in ver 14 which tells of the breaking up of the cart, etc, without explaining what happened to the ark. The trouble may be met by a slight transposition thus: 14a And the cart came into the field, . . . and stood there, and there was there a great stone: 15a and the Levites took down the ark, etc, and put them on the great stone: 14b and clave the wood of the cart, etc, followed by 15b. This makes perfect sense.

(3) In Abinadab's house.—The second difficulty is made by 1 S 7 1, where we read that the ark was brought to the house of Abinadab and Eleazar his son they sanctified to guard" it. Its old abode, the house at Shiloh, had apparently been destroyed (Jer 7 12.14; 26 6.9). There it enjoyed considerable importance, for Poels is unquestionably right in identifying the Gibeah of God (1 S 10 5) with the Gibeah (hill) of the ark. Thus there was a high place there and a Philii garrison (cf 1 S 13 3, where LXX and Tg have "Gibeah"). There remains the difficulty caused by the guardianship of Eleazar. Poels may be right in reading וְאֵלְעָזָר, we'el'āzār, "and the sons of Eleazar," for וְאֵלְעָזָר בֶּן־בְּנֵי, we'el'āzār benō, "and Eleazar his son": but in the entire absence of information, alike as to Eleazar's functions and as to his tribe, nothing definite can be said. The narratives of the slaughter among the Beth-shemites and the fate of Uzzah make it certain that Eleazar's custody of the ark kept him at a respectful distance from it.

When David at the end of this period removed the ark, it was first taken in a cart. This proved fatal to Uzzah, and the ark was deposited in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite. The text of 8 knows nothing of any guardianship of the ark by Obed-edom. Probably he took very good care not to go near it in view of Uzzah's fate. Then it was transported to Jerus by bearers (2 S 6 13)—presumably of Levitical descent. No further irregularities are urged.

More important is the change of priesthood; 1 S 2 27-36 clearly threatens Eli, whose house had been chosen in Egypt, with a transference of the high-priesthood to another line. Careful comparison with 1 K 2 27 makes it certain that the prophecy was fulfilled when Zadok was placed by Solomon in the place of Abiathar. Who was Zadok? According to Ch (1 Ch 6 8.53; 24 3; 27 17) he was descended from Aaron through Eleazar, and this is accepted by Orr, Van Hoonacker and many others, who take Ch in a literal sense. According to Ezk he was a Levite (40 46, etc). It is noteworthy that throughout the prophetic books we always hear of the Levitical priesthood, not the Aaronic (see esp. 1 K 12 31; Jer 33 18-22; Mal 2), and the "father's house" of 1 S 2 27-36 that was chosen in Egypt could only be the house of Aaron, not of Ithamar, if the passage is to be taken in its natural sense. On this view Zadok's appointment could only have fulfilled the prophecy if it terminated the Aaronic succession. It would seem therefore that the high-priesthood was transferred to a family of non-Aaronic Levites. For the alternative view see ZADOK.

The prophet's speech in 1 S 2 27-36 is also important for the light it throws on the organization of the priesthood. The high priest has in his gift a number of priestly offices with pecuniary and other emoluments. This postulates a far more advanced hierarchy than that of P.

The reference to "the priests and the Levites" in 1 K 8 4 was unknown to the LXX, but in other passages the Books of K show further advances in hierarchical organization. There is not merely the high priest—generally like Aaron in P called "the priest," but sometimes the high priest—but also the second priest (2 K 25 18; Jer 52 24; 2 K 23 4, according to the Tg), three keepers of the threshold (ubi supra, and 2 K 12 10) and "elders of the priests" (2 K 19 2; Isa 37 2; perhaps also Jer 19 1). See also Jer 20 1 f; 29 26 for priestly organization and jurisdiction in the temple precincts. All this contrasts strikingly with the simplicity of the Pentateuchal organization.

Ezekiel is entirely in line with the other sources for this period, but he seeks to institute certain reforms. He writes, "Her priests

2. Ezekiel have done violence to my law, and have profaned my holy things: they have made no distinction between the holy and the common, neither have they caused men to discern between the unclean and the clean," etc (Ezk 22 26). If these words have any meaning they signify that he was acquainted with a law which followed the very words of Lev 10 and other passages of P, and was intended to reach the people through the teaching of the priests. In chs 40-48, there is a vision of the future which stands in the closest relation to the Pent. Three views have been held of this. The old view was that Ezk could not be reconciled with the Pent at all, and that the difficulties presented were insoluble. Wellhausen and his followers maintain that the prophet is prior to P, and here introduces the distinction between priests and Levites for the first time. The third alternative is to hold that Ezekiel was familiar with P and drew from it the inspiration to make a fresh division among the Levites, giving the sons of Zadok a position similar to that occupied by the sons of Aaron in the wilderness period, and re-enacting with slight modifications the legislation applicable to the sons of Aaron, this time applying it to the sons of Zadok. The crucial passage is 44 6-16, from which it clearly appears that in Solomon's temple aliens had performed sundry tasks that should have been executed by more holy persons, and that Ezekiel proposes to degrade Levites who are not descended from Zadok to perform such tasks in the future as a punishment for their ministrations to idols in high places. Either of the two latter views would explain the close connection that evidently exists between the concluding chapters of Ezk and P, and, accordingly, in choosing between them, the reader must consider four main points: (1) Is P shown on the internal evidence to be early or late? Is it desert legislation, or is it accurately reflected in Ch? This point has already been discussed in part and is further treated in PENTATEUCH (q.v.). (2) Is the theory of the late composition of P psychologically and morally probable? On this see PENTATEUCH and POT, 292-99. (3) Is it the case that the earlier history attests the existence of institutions of P that are held by Wellhausen and his followers to be late—e.g. more national offerings than the critics allow? On this see EPC, 200 ff, and passim; POT, 305-15, and passim; SBL and OP passim, and art. PENTATEUCH. (4) Does Ezekiel himself show acquaintance with P (e.g. in 22 26), or not? On this too see SBL, 96; PS, 281 f.

With regard to the non-mention of the high-priesthood and certain other institutions in Ezekiel's vision, the natural explanation is that in the case of these the prophet did not desire to institute any changes. It is to be noted that Ezekiel does not codify and consolidate all existing law. On the contrary, he is rather supplementing and reforming. In his ideal temple the prince is to provide the statutory national offerings (45 17), i.e. those of Nu 28, 29. Apparently the king had provided these earlier (2 K 16 13). But in addition to these there had grown up a "king's offering," and it is probably to this only that 45 22 ff; 46 2-15 relate. In 46 13 LXX, Syr, Vulg, and some Heb MSS preserve the reading "he" for "thou."

V. Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles.—Whatever the course of the earlier history, there is general agreement that in these books a distinction between priests and Levites is established (see e.g. Neh 10 37 f [38 f]; 12 1 f). We also find singers and porters (Neh 13 5, etc), Nethinim and the sons of Solomon's servants (Ezr 7 7, 24; 10 23 f; Neh 10 28 [29]; 11 3, etc). It must not be assumed that these classes were new. The story of the Gibeonites (Josh 9) gives us the origin of some of these grades, and the non-mention of them in many of the earlier books is easily explained by the character of those books. We know from such passages as Am 5 23 that there were musical services in far earlier times (cf Neh 12 42).

Ch presents an account of the earlier history of the priests and Levites that in many respects does not tally with the older sources. Many modern writers think that the author's views of the past were colored by the circumstances of his own day, and that he had a tendency to carry back later conditions to an earlier period. On the other hand it is impossible to deny fairly that he used some sources which have not been preserved to us elsewhere. Again, there is evidence to show that his work was not intended to be taken for history and would not have been so regarded by his contemporaries. Talmudical authorities held some such view as this. The historical value of his work has yet to be appraised in a more critical and impartial spirit than is exhibited in any of the current discussions. For the present purpose it is only possible to notice the effect of some of his statements, if interpreted literally. As there are passages where he has clearly substituted Levites for the less holy personages of the older sources (contrast e.g. 2 K 11 4-12 with 2 Ch 23 1-11), it may be that Levites have also been substituted by him for other persons in notices of which no other version has survived.

David and Solomon recognized the hierarchy. The former king instituted the musical services (1 Ch 6 3 ff; 16 4 ff; 25). The Levites were divided into courses (1 Ch 23 6) and were rendered liable to service from the age of twenty by his enactment (ver 27). There were also 24 courses or divisions of priests, 16 of the sons of Eleazar and 8 of the sons of Ithamar (ch 24). The courses were divided by lot. In Neh 12 1-7 we read of "chiefs of the priests," but these are only 22 in number, while vs 12-21 give us 21 in the time of Joiakim (ver 26). But not much importance can be attached to such lists, as names could easily fall out in transmission. According to 1 Ch 9 26 the four chief porters were Levites, and Levites were also over the things baked in pans and the shewbread (vs 31 f). This of course is not in accordance with the Law, but is found elsewhere in Ch. In 1 Ch 23 the Levites from 30 years old and upward number 38,000, of whom 24,000 oversee the work of the house of the Lord, 6,000 were officers and judges, 4,000 were doorkeepers and 4,000 were musicians. David altered the age of beginning service to 20, and an account of their functions is given in 1 Ch 23 27-32 (see, further, MUSIC). All these arrangements were confirmed and enforced by Solomon (2 Ch 8 14 ff). There is often uncertainty as to whether the Chronicler identifies priests and Levites in particular cases or not, e.g. in 2 Ch 30 27, "the priests the Levites" bless the people according to the ordinary text, but many authorities read "the priests and the Levites." Hezekiah appears to have undertaken some reorganization (2 Ch 29-31), but the details are not clear. Jehoshaphat established in Jerus a court composed partly of Levites and priests (19 8-11). Previously he had sent priests and Levites and others to teach the Law in Judah (ch 17). In 29 34 it is clearly the duty of the priests to flay burnt offerings (contrast Lev 1). It is impossible to draw any consistent picture from the Chronicler because he gives different data for different periods; it is doubtful whether he meant his statements to be taken as historical, e.g. in 1 Ch 25 we find Levites whose names Giddalti ("I have magnified"), etc., are really words forming part of a prayer, and it is difficult to believe that either the Chronicler or his public intended this chapter to be interpreted in any but a spiritual sense (see PS, 284-86).

In Ezr 2 40 the number of Levites who returned with Zerubbabel is given as 74, as against 973 priests (ver 36), 128 singers (ver 41), 139 children of the porters (ver 42), 392 Nethinim and children of Solomon's servants (ver 58), and the figures are the same in Neh 7, except that there the singers number 148 (ver 44) and the porters 138 (ver 45). When Ezra went up, he was at first joined by no Levites (8 15), but subsequently gathered 38 Levites and 220 Nethinim (vs 18-20). We get glimpses of the organization in Neh 12 44-47 and 13 10 ff. It appears that in this period genealogies were carefully scrutinized in the case of doubtful claims to priestly descent (Ezr 2 61 ff; Neh 7 63 ff). In Ezr 6 19 ff the Levites are represented as killing the Passover.

Of these books no satisfactory account can be given in the present state of textual criticism and Bib. science generally. Some writers, e.g., hold that the Chronicler had before him a source to which the Levites were entirely unknown, others that he invented freely, others again that he reproduces trustworthy preëxilic information. The student has only an assortment of theories from which to choose. The bedrock fact is that the statements of these books, if taken in their natural meaning, convey an entirely different impression from the statements of the earlier books construed similarly. Modern research has not yet been seriously addressed to the question whether all the statements were really intended to be interpreted as mere history.

VI. Legal Provisions.—Aaron and his sons underwent consecration to fit them for their duties. Ex 28 f prescribes their garments and consecration (see DRESS; BREADPLATE; EPHOD; ROBE; COAT; MITRE; GIRDLE; URIM AND THUMMIM), and the account of the latter may be read in Lev 8 f. In individual sacrifices brought to the religious capital the priests performed the part of the ritual which related to the altar (sprinkling, burning, etc) (Lev 1-4). See SACRIFICE. A principal function was the duty of teaching the people the law of God (Lev 10 11; 14 54-57; Dt 24 8; 33 10; cf Ezk 44 23; Hos 4 1-6; Hag 2 11 ff, and many passages in the Prophets).

The priests were subject to special laws designed to maintain their purity (Lev 21 f; cf Ezk 44). The rules aim at preventing defilement through mourning (save in the case of ordinary priests for a near relation) and at preventing those who were physically unfitted from performing certain functions, and those who were for any reason unclean from approaching the holy things. See further STRANGER. They performed several semi-judicial functions (Nu 5 5 ff, 11 ff, etc; see JUDGE). They also blessed the people (Nu 6 22; cf Dt 10 8, etc). See BLESSING. On their dues see SACRIFICE; TITHES; FIRSTLINGS; FIRST-FRUITS; LEVITICAL CITIES; AGRARIAN LAWS; see further CHEMARIM; NETHINIM; SONS OF SOLOMON'S SERVANTS; SINGERS; DOORKEEPERS; SERVING-WOMEN; JUDGE.

PRIMOGENITURE, pri-mô-jen'i-tûr (בְּכֹרֶה, b'khôrâh, from b'khôr, "firstborn," from bâkhar, "to act early"; πρωτοτόκια, prôtotokia);

1. Recog- tokia: The right of the firstborn to nition of inherit the headship of the family, Doctrine carrying with it certain property rights and usually such titles as those of the high-priesthood or kingship. The writings of the Hebrews take for granted the recognition of a doctrine of primogeniture from the earliest times. In the most ancient genealogies a distinction is drawn between the firstborn and the other son (Gen 10 15; 22 21; 25 13; 35 23; 36 15). In the bestowal of parental blessings in patriarchal times great importance was attached to preferring the firstborn (Gen 25 31; 27 29; 48 13; 49 3). The feud between Jacob and Esau (Gen 27 1-28 21) grew out of the stealing of the firstborn's blessing by the younger brother. Joseph was displaced when, in his blessing, Jacob seemed to prefer Ephraim to Manasseh, his firstborn (Gen 48 13). The father in such cases seems to have had the right to transfer the birthright from one son to another, from the days of Abraham in the case of Ishmael and Isaac, through those of Jacob in the matter of Reuben and Joseph and in the matter of Ephraim and Manasseh, down to the days of David in the selection of a successor to the kingship. Nevertheless the Mosaic code, which declared (rather than enacted) the law of primogeniture, prohibited the abuse of this parental privilege in the case of a younger son by a favorite wife (Dt 21 16 f).

The manner of acknowledging the firstborn incidentally referred to in Dt is "by giving him a double portion of all that he hath" (Dt 21 17), that is to say, double the share of each of the other brothers. Jewish tradition (B'khô. 46a, 47b, 51a, 51b; Bâbhâ' Bathrâ' 122a, 122b, 123a, 124a, 142b) accepts and elaborates on this right of the firstborn son. Thus, it applies only to the firstborn and not the eldest surviving son; it does not apply to daughters; it has reference only to the paternal estate, and not to the inheritance left by a mother or other relative, nor to improvements or accessions made to an estate after the death of the father.

The object of the doctrine may be that the eldest son might be enabled to preside over the affairs of family with proper dignity, or that

3. Reasons he might assume additional responsibilities, such as the support of unmarried sisters. Hence one's birthright could be waived or sold (Gen 25 31.

34). On the other hand it may be based in the ultimate analysis on the primitive feeling of favoritism for the firstborn reflected in the disappointment of Jacob, when he speaks of Reuben as his firstborn, his might, and the beginning of his strength (re'shūth 'ōn, Gen 49 3; cf Dt 21 17). This theory would be in accord with the right of the parent to transfer the right to a younger son. The suggestion of favoritism conveyed by the Heb b'khōr is manifested in its figurative use: of Israel (Ex 4 22), of Ephraim (Jer 31 9), of one dearly beloved (Zec 12 10); (cf figurative usage in the NT: Rom 8 29; He 12 23; 1 6; Rev 1 5).

Light is thrown on the attitude of the ancient world toward the firstborn, and hence on the history of primogeniture, by the language used in connection with the plague of the firstborn: "from the first-born of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne, even unto the first-born of the maid-servant that is behind the mill" or "the captive that was in the dungeon."

4. The Firstborn in Ancient Society; Sacrifice and Redemption Apparently no more dreadful catastrophe for all classes of society could be thought of than this slaying of the firstborn (Ex 11 5; 12 29). The misguided fervor of the ancient Semites who offered their firstborn as the thing most dearly beloved as a sacrifice to their gods must be considered in this light, whether it appears among the Moabites, the Phoenicians or the Hebrews themselves (Jer 32 35; Ezk 20 26. 31; 2 Ch 28 3). It is difficult to predicate a connection between the basis of the doctrine of primogeniture and that of the Redemption of the Firstborn, other than that both are ultimately based on the importance of a firstborn son and the fondness of his parents for him. It is interesting to note, however, that the tradition of redemption and the law of primogeniture are kept so distinct that, while the latter has reference only to the firstborn of a father, the former has reference only to the firstborn of a mother (B'khō, viii.1, 46a; cf petēr rehem, "whatsoever openeth the womb," Ex 13 2). In a polygamous society such as that presupposed in Dt 21 it is natural to suppose that the distinction between paternal and maternal primogeniture would be clearly before the minds of the people. See BIRTHRIGHT; FIRSTBORN.

NATHAN ISAACS

PRINCE, prinis: This word occurs quite frequently in our Eng. Bible, mostly in the OT. While it is never used to denote royal parentage (cf 1 Ch 29 24), it often indicates actual royal or ruling power, together with royal dignity and authority. As a rule, the name is given to human beings; in a few instances it is applied to God and Christ, the angels and the devil.

In Mt 2 6 the word rendered "princes" might be tr'd "princely cities"; at least, this seems to be implied. Here the term ἡγεμών, hēgemōn, "leader," "ruler," "prince," is used, undoubtedly to hint at the fact that Bethlehem was the native city of a great prince. In the other NT passages the word ἀρχων, archōn, "a potentate," "a person in authority," "a magistrate," occurs most frequently (cf Mt 9 34; 12 24; 20 25 [RV "ruler"]; Mk 3 22; Jn 12 31; 14 30; 16 11; 1 Cor 2 6.8 AV; Eph 2 2; Rev 1 5 [RV "ruler"]). In most of these instances the term "prince" refers to the devil.

In Acts 3 15; 5 31, the word ἀρχηγός, archēgós,

"leader," is employed referring to Christ as the author of life and salvation (cf He 12 2, where the term archēgos is rendered "author" [RV] or "captain" [RVm]).

The OT contains a number of different words mostly rendered "prince" or "princes" in the EV.

(1) שָׂר, sar: In Josh 5 14 the mysterious armed stranger seen by Joshua near Jericho calls himself the "prince of the host of Jeh": a high military title applied to a superhuman being. In Isa 9 6, the name is given to the child representing the future Messiah. The term "Prince of Peace" denotes the eminent position and the peaceful reign of the Messianic king: the highest human title in its most ideal sense. Dnl 8 11: here, again, as in Josh 5 14, occurs the phrase "prince of the host." In Dnl 8 25 "the prince of princes" refers to God Himself: the highest human title in its absolute sense applied to God. Dnl 10 21: "Michael your prince." Michael the archangel is here called the prince of the Jewish people. He is the princely representative of God's people in the sight of God, a royal title suggesting high power and alliance with God in the great struggle going on between Him and the powers of darkness. Dnl 12 1: here Michael is called "the great prince" who standeth for the children of Israel; supplementing Dnl 10 21. In Dnl 10 13: "the prince of the kingdom of Persia" (cf ver 20, "the prince of Persia," "the prince of Greece"); the expression is used in the same general sense as in Dnl 10 21. Each individual nation is represented as guided by a spiritual being that may or may not be an ally of God in His combat with the devil. In the majority of cases, though, the term sar is applied (a) to men exercising royal or ruling power: Prov 8 16: "By me princes [m "or rulers"] rule"; Isa 32 1: "Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in justice." Judicial power is included (cf Ex 2 14: "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?" and Ps 148 11: "princes and all judges of the earth"). In some passages the word sar, having been rendered "prince," stands for "chief"; so Jgs 7 25: "They took the two princes of Midian" (cf Jgs 8 14; 1 S 29 4; 2 S 10 3, etc). (b) To royal officers of a high rank: Gen 12 15: "the princes of Pharaoh" (cf 2 K 24 14: "Jerus and all the princes"; 1 Ch 29 24; 2 Ch 24 23; Jer 36 21; 52 10; Hos 5 10, etc). "Ambassadors" (Jer 36 14); "governors" (1 K 20 14: "By the young men [m "or, servants"] of the princes of the provinces"; cf Est 1 3.14, "the seven princes"); "the chief of the eunuchs" (Dnl 1 7); a "quartermaster" (Jer 51 59: "Seraiah was chief chamberlain" [m "or, quartermaster"]). AV renders it "a quiet prince," i.e. a prince having rest, instead of procuring rest (שָׂר מְנוּחָה, sar m'nūhāh, "a sar of rest"). In post-exilic times: Ezr 9 1: "The princes drew near unto me." They were the political leaders of the people (cf Ezr 10 8: "the princes and the elders"; Neh 9 38: "our princes, our Levites, and our priests"; Neh 11 1: "The princes of the people dwelt in Jerus"; Neh 12 31: "the princes of Judah"). Of course, they were all subject to the authority of the Pers kings. (c) To the priesthood: 1 Ch 24 5: "princes of the sanctuary, and princes of God" (cf Isa 43 28). (d) On account of great achievements: 2 S 3 38: "Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?"—an honorary title. Generally speaking, a prince is a wealthy man (cf Job 34 19: "That respecteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor"), and he is a prominent man embodying true, although mortal, manhood (cf Ps 82 7: "Nevertheless ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes).

(2) נָסִי' nāsī': usually derived from נָשָׂא, nāsā', "to lift," hence "exalted"; otherwise: a "speaker." (a) An honorary title (cf Gen 23 6: "Thou art a prince of God among us." The distinction is conferred upon Abraham by the children of Heth). (b) A name given to the heads of the Israelitic tribes, families and fathers' houses: Nu 3 24: "the prince of the fathers' house of the Gershonites" (cf vs 30, 35); 3 32: "Eleazar . . . shall be prince of the princes of the Levites, and have the oversight of them that keep the charge of the sanctuary"; Nu 4 34: "the princes of the congregation." They seem to be identical with the "rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens" (cf Ex 18 21; Nu 16 2). Nu 7 2: "the princes of Israel, the heads of their fathers' houses . . . the princes of the tribes" (cf 17 2,6; 34 18; Josh 22 14; 1 Ch 4 38). (c) Equivalent to chief or king: Gen 17 20: "Twelve princes shall he beget" (cf 25 16); Gen 34 2: "Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, the prince of the land"; Nu 25 18: "Cozbi, the daughter of the prince of Midian" (cf Josh 13 21); 1 K 11 34: "I will make him prince all the days of his life." This was said of Solomon, which shows the term equivalent to king. Of special interest is the use of the word nāsī' in Ezk. The name is given to the Jewish king (cf 12 10: "This burden concerneth the prince in Jerus"). Then, again, it is applied to the future theocratic king (cf 34 24; 37 25, etc, and esp. chs 45, 46). It is also used of foreign potentates and high officers (cf 25 16: "the princes of the sea"; 28 2: "the prince of Tyre"; 30 13: "a prince from the land of Egypt"; 32 29: "Edom, her kings and all her princes"; and, likewise, of high Jewish officers (21 12). (d) A title bestowed upon Sheshbazzar (Ezr 1 8).

(3) נָדִיב, nādībh: 1 S 2 8: "To make them sit with princes" (cf Ps 113 8). The original meaning of the term is willing or obliging; then generous ("liberal"; cf Prov 19 6: "Many will entreat the favor of the liberal man"; yet, it might safely be rendered here "prince" [m] or noble-minded; a gentleman, a nobleman, a person of rank, a prince. Job 12 21: "He poureth contempt upon princes" (cf Ps 107 40); Job 21 28: "Where is the house of the prince? And where is the tent wherein the wicked dwelt?" The context here suggests the thought of a wicked prince, a tyrant. Ps 47 9: "The princes of the peoples are gathered together" (cf Ps 118 9; 146 3; Prov 17 7; 25 7; Cant 7 1).

(4) נָבִי, nābhī: According to Gesenius, this term denotes originally either a high-minded person (cf the preceding word, nādībh) or a speaker, a spokesman; then a prince, a king. 1 S 13 14: "Jeh hath appointed him to be prince over his people" (cf 2 S 5 2: "Thou shalt be prince [RVm "leader"] over Israel"; 6 21; 7 8; 1 K 1 35; 14 7; 16 2; Job 29 9; 31 37; Ps 76 12; Prov 28 16; Ezk 28 2: "prince of Tyre"; Dnl 9 25: "the anointed one, the prince," AV the "Messiah the Prince"; Dnl 9 26: "the prince that shall come" [the Rom emperor?]; 11 22: "the prince of the covenant" [either a high priest or some Egypt king, Ptolemaeus Philometor?]).

(5), (6) רָזֹן, rāzōn, and רָזֵן, rōzēn, "a high official," "a prince," usually associated with the word "king" or "judge." Prov 14 28: "In the multitude of people is the king's glory; but in the want of people is the destruction of the prince" (rāzōn); Jgs 5 3: "Hear, O ye kings; give ear, O ye princes" (rōz'nīm); Prov 8 15: "By me kings reign, and princes [rōz'nīm] decree justice" (cf 31 4; Hab 1 10); Isa 40 23: "that bringeth princes [rōz'nīm] to nothing; that maketh the judges of the earth as vanity."

(7) נָשָׂא, nāsākh, derived from נָשָׂא, nāsākh, "to install a king" (cf Ps 2 6); hence a prince: Josh 13 21: "the princes of Sihon" (cf Ps 83 11); Ezk 32 30: "the princes of the north"; Mic 5 5: RV "principal men," RVm "princes among men"; Dnl 11 8: RV "molten images," RVm "princes."

(8) קָצִין, kāzīn, "a judge," "a military leader," "a prince"; Dnl 11 18: "A prince [RVm "captain"] shall cause the reproach . . . to cease" (probably a Rom consul; a Rom general?).

(9) שְׁלִישׁ, shālīsh: The usual explanation, "one of the three men on a war-chariot" is highly improbable; Gesenius suggests that it is a loan-word, and renders it "hero." Ezk 23 15: "All of them princes to look upon" ("picked men," Gesenius).

(10) הַשְּׂמַנִּים, hashmannīm: Ps 68 31: "Princes shall come out of Egypt." LXX renders it πρόβεις, prébeis, "ambassadors," Vulg legati. But the meaning is uncertain. See also GOVERNOR, 1, (8).

PRINCES, prin'sez, -siz, THE SEVEN. See PRINCE, (1), (6).

PRINCESS, prin'ses: The Heb term is שָׂרָה, sārāh (cf sar, prince, and "Sarah"); it means (1) a queen (Isa 49 23, AV and RV both "queen"); (2) the consort of a king contrasted with his concubines (1 K 11 3, "He had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines"); (3) the wife of a prince (Est 1 18: the "princesses of Persia and Media"); (4) it is metaphorically used of the city of Jerus (Lam 1 1).

PRINCIPAL, prin'si-pal: Appears in AV as a tr of nine Heb words (fewer in RV), in one case (Isa 28 25) being used quite wrongly and in 2 K 25 19 (Jer 52 25); 1 Ch 24 31 gives a wrong sense (all corrected in RV). In 1 K 4 5, "principal officer" (ARV "chief minister") is an arbitrary tr of kōhēn to avoid "priest" (so ERV; cf 2 S 8 18).

PRINCIPALITY, prin-si-pal'i-ti: In the OT the word occurs but once (Jer 13 18, "your principalities shall come down"). Here AVm "head tires" is properly preferred by RV for מַרְאֲשֵׁי תֵּיבֵי, m'ra'āshōth (from ראש, rō'sh, "head"), "head-parts."

In the NT "principality" occurs for ἀρχή, archē, "rule," generally in the pl., referring (a) to men in authority (Tit 3 1, "Put them in mind to be subject [AV; "in subjection," RV] to principalities [AV; "rulers," RV], and powers" [AV; "to authorities," RV]); (b) to superhuman agencies, angelic or demonic (Rom 8 38; Eph 3 10; 6 12; Col 1 16; 2 10,15). Paul was keenly sensible of the dualism of mind and body and of the law in his members warring against the law of his mind (Rom 7 23), and of the temporary victory of the evil, residing in the flesh, over the good of the spirit (vs 14 ff). This dualism was objectified in Zoroastrianism, and among the Babylonians the several heavenly bodies were regarded as ruled by spirits, some good, some evil. The same belief, appropriated by the Jews during the captivity, appears also in Gr thought, as e.g. in Plato and later in the Stoics. The higher spheres, which hold the even tenor of their way, were in general regarded as ruled by good spirits; but in the sublunar sphere, to which the earth belongs, ill-regulated motions prevail, which must be due to evil spirits. The perversities of human conduct, in particular, thwarting, as was thought, the simple, intelligible Divine plan, were held to be subject to rebellious powers offering defiance to God. While Paul clearly recognized a hierarchy of such powers (Col 1 16, "thrones or dominions or principalities or powers"), it is not certain that he had elaborated a system of aeons to serve the purposes of metaphysical theology and ethics, such as appears among the Gnostics, although they evidently believed they were developing his thought. In I Cor 2 6 he repudiates the wisdom of this world (aiōn) and of the rulers of this world (aiōn), and declares (Eph 6 12) that the Christian has to contend with "the world-rulers of this darkness," and proclaims the triumph of Christ over "the principalities and the powers" in the forgiveness of sins (Col 2 15). The same personification of such agencies or powers appears also in another passage, where the rendering of EV obscures it (Eph 1 20.21: "when he raised him [Christ] from the dead, and made him to sit at his right hand in the heavenly places, far above all [read "every"] rule [RV; "principalities," AV], and authority, and power, and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world [aiōn], but also in that which is to come"). Not the least interesting passage is Eph 3 10, where the church is said to be the means of revealing to "the principalities and the powers in the heavenly places" "the manifold wisdom of God." One naturally inquires what was the purpose of this revelation. Was it to effect a redemption and reconciliation of these demonic powers to God? To this question Paul supplies no answer. See ANGEL; SATAN. WILLIAM ARTHUR HEIDEL

PRINCIPLES, prin'si-p'lz: Found twice (He 5 12; 6 1). The Gr word (στοιχείον, stoiceion) is also tr^d in AV as "elements" and "rudiments." As rendered in He, its meaning is clearly related to the elementary knowledge of Christian truth or doctrine. See ELEMENTS; RUDIMENTS.

PRINT, print, PRINTING, prin'ting, PRINTED, prin'ted: Printing is the art of multiplying records —the "art of writing with many pens" (Jew Enc, XI, 295), or wholesale writing.

The art of making original records is writing. This, however, is a slow process. It involves tracing each letter and part of a letter through from beginning to end by the moving point of chisel, pen, or other instrument, and this process must be repeated with every copy. As soon, therefore, as occasion arose for frequently repeating the record, many ways were devised to save the labor of forming each symbol separately. All these ways involve making a character or a series of characters on a single surface and transferring as a whole to another surface. Neither "pressure," as some say, nor "ink," as others, is essential to the process, for printing from a photographic negative takes no pressure, and printing for the blind takes no ink. Any process which transfers a whole surface is printing.

The earliest use of printing seems to have been for painting the face or body with ownership, tribal, trophy, or ceremonial marks for worship, war, mourning, etc. This paint might be temporary or pricked in by the tattoo process. Tattooing itself is rather a writing than a printing process, but may be either, according as the color is laid on by drawing or by the "pintadera." The "pintadera" or "stamp used to impress patterns upon the skin" is best known from the Mexican and South American examples, but in recent years it has been found in deposits all over the Mediterranean region (North Italy, Austria, Hungary, Mycenae, Crete, Egypt) and in Borneo at least. Many of these specimens are from the Neolithic or Copper age. Both in South America and in Neolithic Liguria, some of these stamps were cylindrical and "were used like a printer's roller" (Mosso, The Dawn of Mediterranean Civilization, 254-61, with many illustrations, and Frobenius, Childhood of Man, fig. 31, "Dayak block for painting the body").

The injunction of Lev 19 28, which is tr^d "print," is commonly, and probably rightly, in view of the Heb word, supposed to refer to the permanent marks of tattooing which may or may not have been made by this printing process. Job 13 27 AV, which speaks of printing upon the heels or soles of the feet, has been quite changed in RV, and, if the idea is one of printing at all, it refers rather to branding than stamping with color.

The use of the inkhorn in setting the mark upon the forehead (Ezk 9 3.4.6) certainly points to marking with color rather than branding. See INKHORN. This may, of course, have been drawing rather than printing, but, on the other hand, the sealing of the servants of God on their foreheads (Rev 7 4; 9 4) necessarily means printing rather than drawing, and probably printing rather than branding, for the use of the seal with color had long been common. The marks of the beast upon the forehead and upon the hand in Rev 13, 14, 15, 16, 19 and 20, more likely refer to branding, as the Gr word points more or less in this direction, while the stigmata of Gal 6 17 may also point to branding. Branding was at all events also a common method of printing characters on the flesh in Bib. times (Isa 3 24; perhaps Ex 21 25; a branding on the forehead, CH § 127; branding of a slave §§ 226, 227). The reference in Jn 20 25 is, of course, to the clearly visible marks or scars left by the nails in the hands. See MARK.

The use of seals is a true printing process, whether they are used with color, as they were both in Crete and Egypt almost from the beginning of history, or impressed on clay, wax, or other plastic substances. Mention of seals is frequent in the Bible (see SEAL). A new interest has been given to this aspect of the matter by the sealings discovered in Ahab's palace and other excavations throughout Pal, which are forming one of the most useful classes of modern inscriptions.

Both stamp and seal were used throughout the Middle Ages, the latter abundantly, and the stamp at least occasionally, for stamping the capital letters in Bib. and other MSS, as well as for various other purposes.

Modern printing begins with the carving of whole pages and books on blocks of wood (xylography), or metal plates for printing (chalcography). This method was quite early practised by the Chinese, and began to be common in Europe in the early 15th cent., most of the books printed by it having to do with Bib. topics (Biblia pauperum, etc).

It was only with the invention of movable type about the middle of the 15th cent. that the multiplying of books by writing began to come to an end. The printing with movable type is also closely associated with Bib. study, the Gutenberg Psalter and the Gutenberg Bible standing with most for the very beginning of modern printing.

For the printed edd of the Heb and Gr originals, and the various VSS, see arts. on TEXTUAL CRITICISM and allied topics in this encyclopaedia, with their literature. The art. on "Typography" in Jew Enc is of unusual excellence, and the general literature of printing given in Enc Brit, at the end of the first part of the art. on "Typography," is full and good. PRISON, priz'n, PRISONER, priz'n-ēr, priz'nēr (there are various Heb words which are rendered "prison" in AV, among them:

1. Hebrew Words [1] שֹׁהַר, šōhar, "round house," "fortress" [8 t in Gen], [2] כֶּלֶא, kele', "restraint," "confinement" [12 t: in historic books, Isa, Jer, with "house"], [3] מַטְרָאָה, maṭṭārāh, "guard," "sentry" [13 t in Jer and Neh], [4] מַהֲפֶקֶת, mah^aphekheth, "distorting," i.e. stocks or pillory [4 t], [5] אֵשֶׁר, 'ēšūr, "bond," "fetters" [Ecl 4 14; Jer 37 15]; "ward" in AV is usually the rendering for מִשְׁמָר, mishmār):

The earliest occurrence of the word "prison" in AV is found in the narrative of Joseph's life in Egypt (J). The term used, viz.

2. In Early Times šōhar, means perhaps "round house" or "tower." It seems probable that among the Hebrews there were no special buildings erected as "jails" in the pre-monarchical period, and perhaps not before the post-exilic period, when the adoption of the civic institutions and customs of surrounding nations prevailed. In Egypt and Assyria, on the contrary, there were probably public buildings corresponding to our modern jails. Among the Hebrews, rooms in connection with the royal palace or the residence of prominent court officials would be used for the purpose.

According to one narrative (J) in Gen the prison in which Joseph was confined had a "keeper," while according to another narrative (E)

3. Joseph in Egypt the offending members of the royal household, viz. the royal butler and the royal baker, were placed "in ward" with the "captain of the guard" in charge, i.e. in some part of the royal palace. This is still more probable if, instead of "captain of the guard," we should translate "chief of the cooks," i.e. superintendent of the royal kitchen.

It was often necessary to restrict the liberty of individuals who for various causes were a menace to those in authority, without inflicting any corporal punishment, e.g.

4. Causes of Imprisonment Joseph's brethren were kept "in ward" three days (Gen 42 19); Shimei was forbidden to pass beyond the boundary of Jerus (1 K 2 36); the person who was caught gathering sticks on the Sabbath was put "in ward" pending his trial (Nu 15 34). In the monarchical period, prophets who criticized the throne were put in prison, e.g. Micaiiah by Ahab (1 K 22 27), Hanani by Asa (2 Ch 16 10). Hoshea, after his abortive effort to institute an alliance with So or Seve, king of Egypt, was shut up in prison by Shalmaneser (2 K 17 4); cf also 2 K 25 27 (Jehoiachin in Babylon); Jer 52 11 (Zedekiah in Babylon).

The Book of Jer throws considerable light on the prison system of Jerus in the later monarchical period. The prophet was put "in

5. Under the Monarchy the stocks that were in the upper gate the of Jehu" (20 2). Mere imprisonment was not adequate punishment for the prophet's announcement of Judah's doom; it was necessary to have recourse to the pillory. During the siege of Jerus Jeremiah was confined in the "court of the guard, which was in the king of Judah's house" (32 2, etc). The "court of the guard" was evidently the quarters of the sentry who guarded the royal palace. According to the narrative of ch 37, the prophet was arrested on a charge of treachery and put in prison "in the house of Jonathan the scribe" (37 15). This verse does not necessarily mean that a private house was used as a prison. The words are capable of another interpretation, viz. that a building known as the "house of Jonathan the scribe" had been taken over by the authorities and converted into a jail. We read in the following verse that the house had a "dungeon" (lit. "house of the pit") and "cabins" or "cells."

The data are not sufficient to enable us to give any detailed description of the treatment of prisoners. This treatment varied accord-

6. The Treatment of Prisoners ing to the character of the offence which led to incarceration. Samson of Prisoners during the period of his imprisonment was compelled to do hard labor (Jgs 16 21). Grinding was the occupation of women, and marked the depth of Samson's humiliation. Dangerous persons were subjected to various kinds of physical mutilation, e.g. Samson was deprived of his sight. This was a common practice in Assyria (2 K 25 7). The thumbs and great toes of Adonibezek were cut off to render him incapable of further resistance (Jgs 1 6).

Various forms of torture were in vogue. Hanani the seer was put into the pillory by Asa (for "in a prison house" we should render "in the stocks"; see RVm). In Jer 29 26 for "prison," we should render "stocks" (so RV) or "pillory," and for "stocks," "collar" (as in RVm). AV renders a different Heb word by "stocks" in Job (13 27; 33 11). There was a special prison diet (1 K 22 27), as well as a prison garb (2 K 25 29).

There are other Heb words rendered "prison" (sometimes incorrectly) in AV. In Ps 142 7, the word which is tr'd "prison" means a "place of execution,"

7. Other Hebrew Words and is derived from a root which denotes, for instance, the isolation of the leper (Lev 13 5; cf Isa 24 22; 42 7). In Isa 53 8 "oppression" not "prison" is the correct tr, while in Isa 61 1 the Heb denotes "opening of the eyes," rather than "opening of the prison." Prisoners are promised "light after darkness, gleam after gloom."

In the NT "prison" generally occurs for the Gr word φυλακή, phulakē, which corresponds to the

Heb word מִשְׁמָר, mishmār, referred to above (Mt 5 25; Mk 6 17; Lk 3 20; Acts 5 19; 1 Pet 3 19). In Rev 18

8. In the NT 2, AV renders this word by two different words, viz. "hold" and "cage"; RV employs "hold" in each case (RVm "prison"). In one passage "ward" is the rendering in AV (Acts 12 10). In connection with the imprisonment of John the term used is δεσμωτήριον, desmōtērion, "place of bonds" or "fetters" (Mt 11 2); the same word is used in the case of Peter and John (Acts 5 21,23), and of Paul and Silas (Acts 16 26). But the more common term is also found in these narratives. In Acts 12 17 "prison" renders a Gr word which means "dwelling." In Acts 5 18 AV, "prison" is the rendering for another Gr word, viz. τήρησις, tērēsis, "watching" or "ward" (RV "ward"). In Acts 4 3, AV employs "hold" as the rendering for the same word. This would correspond to the modern "police station" or "lockup." See also PUNISHMENTS. T. LEWIS PRISON GARMENTS. See preceding article.

PRISON, SPIRITS IN: The phrase occurs in the much-disputed passage, 1 Pet 3 18-20, where the apostle, exhorting Christians to endurance under suffering for well-doing, says: "Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but made alive in the spirit; in which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, that aforetime were disobedient, when the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls, were saved through water." It is plain that in this context "the spirits in prison" (τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν, tois en phulakē pneūmasin) denote the generation who were disobedient in the days of Noah, while the words "spirits" and "in prison" refer to their present disembodied condition in a place of judgment in the unseen world (cf 2 Pet 2 4-9). The crucial point in the passage lies in what is said of Christ's preaching to these spirits in prison. The interpretation which strikes one most naturally is that Christ, put to death in the flesh, and made alive again in the spirit, went in this spiritual (disembodied) state, and preached to these spirits, who once had been disobedient, but are viewed as now possibly receptive of His message. This is the idea of the passage taken by the majority of modern exegetes, and it finds support in what is said in 1 Pet 4 6, "For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead, that they might be judged indeed according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit." On this basis is now often reared a mass of doctrine or conjecture respecting "second probation," "restoration," etc.—in part going back to patristic times—for which the passage, even so taken, affords a very narrow foundation (see on this view, Plumtre, The Spirits in Prison; Dorner, System of Christian Doctrine, IV, 130-32; E. White, Life in Christ, ch xxii). It must be admitted, however, that, on closer examination, the above plausible explanation is compassed with many difficulties. A preaching of Christ in Hades is referred to in no other passage of Scripture, while Peter appears to be speaking to his readers of something with which they are familiar; it seems strange that these antediluvians should be singled out as the sole objects of this preaching in the spiritual world; the word "made alive" does not exegetically refer to a disembodied state, but to the resurrection of Christ in the body, etc. Another line of interpretation is therefore preferred by many, who take the words "in which also he went," to refer, not to a disembodied manifestation, but to the historical preaching to the antediluvian generation through Noah while they yet lived. In favor of this view is the fact that the apostle in 1 11 regards the earlier prophetic preaching as a testifying of "the Spirit of Christ," that God's long-suffering with Noah's generation is described in Gen 6 5, which Peter has doubtless in his mind, as a striving of God's Spirit, and that in 2 Pet 2 5 there is another allusion to these events, and Noah is described as "a preacher of righteousness." The passage, 1 Pet 4 6, may have the more general meaning that Christians who have died are at no disadvantage in the judgment as compared with those who shall be alive at the Parousia (cf 1 Thess 4 15-18). (For an exposition of this view, with a full account of the interpretations and literature on the subject, cf Salmond's Christian Doctrine of Immortality, 4th ed, 364-87.) See also ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT. JAMES ORR

PRIVY, priv'i, PRIVILY, priv'i-li: These words are obsolete in modern Eng. and are replaced by "secret," "secretly," rather than by the cognates "private," "privately." RV usually has not altered AV's use of the word, but in Ps 11 2 has substituted "in darkness" and in Jgs 9 31 uses "craftily" m "in Tormah" (see TORMAH). In Ezk 21 14, AV "entereth into their privy chambers," "privy" is a gloss, omitted in RV. "To be privy to a thing" (1 K 2 44; Acts 5 2) is simply "to know" it; in Wisd 8 4, RV has changed the phrase into "be initiated into."

PRIZE, priz: Two Gr words are so rendered in EV: (1) βραβείον, brabeion, the award to the victor in the Gr games, consisting of a garland of bay, olive, or pine; so called because it was given by the βραβεύς, brabeus, the adjudicator who assigned the prize at the games (Vulg bravium, from which may be derived the Eng. "brave" = originally gaily dressed, handsome). Used lit. in 1 Cor 9 24, and figuratively of the heavenly reward for Christian character in Phil 3 14. (2) ἀρπαγμός, harpagmós, in ERV of Phil 2 6, "counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God." The termination -μος, -mos, would lead us to expect the active sense: "an act of grasping," "plundering" (AV "robbery"), which would imply that Christ did not deem it an act of usurpation to claim equality with God, for such equality was His inherent right. But the context demands a reference "not to the right which He claimed, but to the dignity which He renounced" (Lightfoot); hence the majority of modern expositors take the word in a passive sense (= ἄρπαγμα, harpagma): "a thing to be seized, prized, retained at all costs as a booty" (ERV "a prize," ARV "a thing to be grasped"), implying that Christ did not regard equality with God as a thing to be clutched greedily, but waived His rights (see Lightfoot on Phil 2 6). The vb. "to prize" occurs only in Zec 11 13. See GRASP; HUMILIATION OF CHRIST; KENOSIS. D. MIAL EDWARDS

PROBATION, pró-bā'shun, SECOND, sek'und. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

PROCHORUS, prok'ō-rus (Πρόχορος, Próchoros): One of "the seven" chosen by the Christian community in Jerus to superintend the dispensing of charity to the widows and other poor (Acts 6 5). The name is Gr, and he may have been a Hellenist. According to tradition he became bishop of Nicomedia and died a martyr at Antioch.

PROCONSUL, pró-kon'sul (ἀνθύπατος, anthūpatos) [Acts 13 7; 18 12]; AV deputy). See PROVINCE.

PROCURATOR, prok'ū-rā-tēr (ἐπίτροπος, epitropos): This word signified in a general sense a steward or bailiff of a private estate, or a financial agent with power of attorney, and the development of the special usage of the word to denote an imperial functionary or official is characteristic of the origin of many departments of administration under the Roman Empire which sprang from the emperor's household. At the time of Augustus, when the domestic quality of these offices had not been entirely lost, the procurators were mostly imperial freedmen. But after the systematic organization of the administration in the 2d cent., the title of procurator was reserved for functionaries of the equestrian class. In fact, the term is so intimately connected with the sphere of official activity of the Rom knights that the expressions "procuratorial career" and "equestrian career" are used synonymously (cf Hirschfeld, Die kaiserlichen Verwaltungsbeamten bis auf Diocletian, 410-65).

During the last century of the Republic, the class of knights (equites) embraced in general all citizens of wealth who were not magistrates or members of the senate. The Roscian Law (67 BC) established 400,000 sesterces (about $18,000 or £3,600) as the minimum census rating for membership in this class. The gold ring, tunic with narrow purple border, and privilege of sitting in the first 14 rows at the theater were the tokens of knighthood. Augustus added to these the public horse which was conferred henceforth by the emperor and recalled the original military significance of the order. From the time of Augustus the first three decuriae of jurors (judices), each containing 1,000 persons, were filled with knights.

Under the Republic the influence of the equestrian class was chiefly exerted in the financial transactions of the companies which farmed the variable revenues. The importance of the publicani was greatly reduced under the Empire, but the emperors recompensed the knights for this loss of opportunity by intrusting them with a great variety of administrative functions. Military service as prefect or tribune was the preliminary step in the official equestrian career. The highest positions held by members of the equestrian class were called prefectures, and included the prefecture of the guard, of Egypt, of the grain-supply, of the watchmen in Rome, and of the fleet. But between these extremes the title procurator was applied generally to the functionaries whose positions were of imperial origin.

The administration of the fiscus or imperial treasury at Rome and of the finances in the imperial provinces, as well as the collection of fiscal revenues in the senatorial provinces, was in the hands of procurators. They occupied many positions which, on account of their intimate relationship with the person of the monarch, could be safely intrusted only to those whose limited prestige precluded inordinate ambition (Friedlaender, Sittengeschichte Roms, 7th ed, Part I, 132-43). Finally, several provinces, where the conditions were unfavorable to the introduction of the ordinary administrative system and Rom public law, were governed as imperial domains by officials of the equestrian class as the emperor's representatives. In Egypt the title prefect (praefectus) was employed permanently as the appellation of the viceroy, and while the same term may have been used originally to denote the governors of this class generally, when their military outweighed their civil functions, yet the designation procurator became at an early date the term of common usage to designate them (Hirschfeld, 382).

Mauretania, Rhaetia, Noricum, Thrace, Cappadocia, Judaea and some smaller districts were all, for a time at least, governed by procurators (Tacitus Hist. i.11; Dio Cassius lvii.17).

The question concerning the original title of the Rom governors of Judaea has arisen because the NT employs the word hēgemōn (Mt 27 2.11.14.15. 21.27; 28 14; Lk 3 1; 20 20; Acts 23 24; 24 1; 26 30), which corresponds with the Lat term praeses, which might be considered synonymous with either procurator or praefectus (Hirschfeld, 384). There is no inscriptional evidence to establish the nomenclature of the rulers of Pal before the time of Vespasian, and Hirschfeld is of the opinion that a certain passage in Tacitus (Ann. xv.44) where Pilate is called procurator is not sufficient proof in view of this writer's carelessness in details of this sort. Josephus (Ant. XX, i, 2), however, employs epitropos (procurator) for the time of Claudius, and it is convenient to follow common usage and assume that this title was current from the first.

It was evidently the intention of Augustus that membership in the equestrian class should be a necessary qualification for the procurators who were appointed to govern provinces. But Claudius appointed a freedman, Antonius Felix, brother of the famous minister of finance, Pallas, as procurator of Judaea (Suetonius Claud. xxviii; Tacitus Hist. v.9). This remained, however, an isolated instance in the annals of Pal (Hirschfeld, 380), and it is probable, moreover, that Felix was raised to equestrian rank before the governorship was conferred upon him.

The following list of the procurators of Judaea is based on Marquardt (Römische Staatsverwaltung, I, 409, 412) and Schürer (*Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes*⁴, I, 485-585):

- Coponius (6 AD to c 10 AD)
- M. Ambibulus (c 10-13)
- Annius Rufus (c 13-15)
- Valerius Gratus (c 15-26)
- Pentius Pilatus (26-35)
- Marcellus (probably 35-38)
- Maryllus (38-44)
- C. Cuspius Fadus (44-46)
- Tiberius Alexander (46-48)
- Ventidius Cumanus (48-52)
- M. Antonius Felix (52-60 or 61)

NOTE.—Marquardt gives his name as Claudius Felix, supposing that he was a freedman of Claudius and therefore took his nomen (Suetonius Claud. xxviii; Victor, epitome iv, 8); but there is stronger evidence in support of the belief that Felix was a freedman of Antonia, Claudius' mother, like his brother Pallas (Tacitus Ann. xii.54; Jos. Ant. XVIII, vi, 4; XX, vii, 1, 2; XX, viii, 9; B.J. II, xii, 8), and accordingly had received the praenomen and nomen of Antonia's father (Jos. Ant. XVIII, vi, 6).

- Portius Festus (61)
- Alhinus (62-64)
- Gessius Florus (65-66)

PROFANE, prō-fān' (vb. חָלַל, hālāl, adj. חָלָל, hālāl, חָלָל, hāl; βεβηλωσ, bebēlōō, βέβηλος, bebēlos): From profanus, "before [i.e. outside] the temple," therefore unholy, polluted, secular, is of frequent occurrence (vb. and adj.) in both the OT and the NT. It occurs as the tr of hōl in AV only in Ezk (22 26, RV "common"; 42 20; 44 23; 48 15, RV "for common use"); as the tr of hālāl in Lev 21 7.14, RVM "polluted"; and Ezk 21 25, where, for AV "thou profane wicked prince of Israel," RV has "thou, O deadly wounded wicked one, the prince of Israel." "To profane" (hālāl) is seen in Lev 18 21; 19 8; Neh 13 17.18; Ps 89 39; Isa 43 28; Ezk 22 8.26, etc. "Profaneness" in Jer 23 15 (hānuppāh) is in ARV "ungodliness." In the NT "profane" occurs in the sense of unholy, godless, regardless of God and Divine things (1 Tim 1 9; 4 7; 6 20; 2 Tim 2 16; He 12 16), and "to profane," or violate, in Mt 12 5; Acts 24 6. The vb. is frequent in Apoc in 1 Macc (1 43.45.63; 2 34, etc; also in 2 Macc 8 2; 10 5; cf 2 Esd 15 8; Jth 4 3.12; 1 Macc 1 43; 2 Macc 4 13). In numerous cases RV substitutes "profane" for other words and phrases in AV, as for "to prostitute" (Lev 19 29), "an hypocrite" (Isa 9 17), "pollute" (Nu 18 32; Ezk 7 21), etc. W. L. WALKER

PROFESS, prō-fes', PROFESSION, prō-fesh'un (נָחַדַּח, nāghadh; ὁμολογέω, homologēō, ὁμολογία, homologia): "Profess" means lit. "to own before," hence to make open or public announcement; it occurs only once in the OT as the tr of nāghadh, "to put before," often "to tell," "to show," "to declare" (Dt 26 3); in the NT it is the tr of homologēō, "to speak or say together in common," "to assent," "to confess publicly" (Mt 7 23, "Then will I profess unto them, I never knew you"; 1 Tim 6 12, RV "didst confess the good confession"; Tit 1 16, "They profess that they know God"); of epaggēlōmai, "to announce one's self," "to make profession" (1 Tim 2 10; 6 21); of phāskō, "to say," "to assert" (Rom 1 22). "Profession" is the tr of homologia (2 Cor 9 13; 1 Tim 6 12; He 3 1, AV "the High Priest of our profession" [of our professed faith]; 4 14; 10 23; in each instance RV has "confession"). "Profess" occurs in AV of Ecclus 3 25, but the verse is omitted by RV; m "Most authorities omit verse 25."

PROGNOSTICATORS, prog-nos'ti-kā-tērz, MONTHLY. See ASTROLOGY, 6.

PROLOGUE, prō'log, prol'og (πρόλογος, prólogos, "foreword," "preface," "introduction"): The word occurs in the preface to Ecclus (Sir), and is commonly applied to Jn 1 1-18. See ECCLESIASTICUS; JOHN, GOSPEL of.

PROLONG, prō-long' (אָרַךְ, 'ārakh, אָשַׁף, māshakh): "Prolong," "prolonged" are the tr of 'ārakh, "to stretch," "to make long" (Dt 4 26, and frequently, "prolong days"; 4 40, etc; Job 6 11 AV; Prov 28 16; Eccl 7 15; 8 13; Isa 53 10); of māshakh, "to draw out" (Isa 13 22; Ezk 12 25.28 AV); of yāshaph, "to add," "to increase" (Ps 61 6; Prov 10 27); of nātāh, "to stretch out," "to incline to" (Job 15 29, "neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth," ARV "neither shall their possessions be extended on the earth," m "their produce bend to the earth"; ERV reverses text and margin); of 'arakhāh (Aram.) (Dnl 7 12, "Yet their lives were prolonged," AVm "A prolonging in life was given them"). "Prolong" occurs in Eccles 29 5, "prolong the time" (parelkūō); 38 14, "prolong life," RV "maintenance of life" (embīōsis); 30 22, "prolongeth his days," RV "length of days" (makroēmēreusis); 37 31, RV "shall prolong" (prostithēmi).

PROMISE, prom'is (most frequently in the OT דָּבַר, dābhār, "speaking," "speech," and דָּבַר, dābhar, "to speak," also אָמַר, 'amar, "to say," once in Ps 77 8, 'ōmer, "speech"; in the NT ἐπαγγελία, epaggelia, and the vbs. ἐπαγγέλλομαι, epaggellomai, and compounds): Promise holds an important place in the Scriptures and in the development of the religion that culminated in Christ. The Bible is indeed full of 'precious and exceeding great promises' (2 Pet 1 4), although the word "promise" is not always used in connection with them. Of the more outstanding promises of the OT may be mentioned: (1) the proto-evangelium (Gen 3 15); (2) the promise to Noah no more to curse the ground, etc (Gen 8 21.22; 9 1-17); (3) most influential, the promise to Abraham to make of him a great nation in whom all families of the earth should be blessed, to give to him and his seed the land of Canaan (Gen 12 2.7, etc), often referred to in the OT (Ex 12 25; Dt 1 8.11; 6 3; 9 28, etc); (4) the promise to David to continue his house on the throne (2 S 7 12.13.28; 1 K 2 24, etc); (5) the promise of restoration of Israel, of the Messiah, of the new and everlasting kingdom, of the new covenant and outpouring of the Spirit (Isa 2 2-5; 4 2; 55 5; 66 13; Jer 31 31-34; 32 37-42; in the NT these promises are founded on, and regarded as having their true fulfilment in, Christ and those who are His (2 Cor 1 20; Eph 3 6). The promise of the Spirit is spoken of by Jesus as "the promise of my Father" (Lk 24 49; Acts 1 4), and this was regarded as fulfilled at Pentecost. The promise of a Saviour of the seed of David is regarded as fulfilled in Christ (Acts 13 23. 32, 26 6; Rom 1 2; 4 13; 9 4). Paul argues that the promise to Abraham that he should be "heir of the world," made to him before circumcision, is not confined to Israel, but is open to all who are children of Abraham by faith (Rom 4 13-16; cf Gal 3 16. 19.29). In like manner the writer to the Hebrews goes back to the original promises, giving them a spiritual and eternal significance (4 1; 6 17; 11 9, etc). The NT promises include manifold blessings and hopes, among them "life," "eternal life" (1 Tim 4 8; 6 19; 2 Tim 1 1; Jas 1 12), the "kingdom" (Jas 2 5), Christ's "coming" (2 Pet 3 9, etc), "new heavens and a new earth" (2 Pet 3 13), etc. For "promise" and "promised" in AV, RV has frequently other terms, as "word" (Ps 105 42), "spake," "spoken" (Dt 10 9; Josh 9 21; 22 4; 23 5.15, etc), "consented" (Lk 22 6), etc. References to the promises occur repeatedly in the Apoc (Bar 2 34; 2 Macc 2 18; Wisd 12 21; cf 2 Esd 3 15; 5 29).

PROPER, prop'ēr: For AV "proper" (child), in He 11 23, RV substitutes "goodly"; in 1 Ch 29 3; 1 Cor 7 7, RV "own" is employed, and for the too emphatic "their proper tongue" in Acts 1 19 "their language" is written. But none of the AV forms are really obsolete.

LITERATURE

I. The Idea of Biblical Prophecy.—According to the uniform teaching of the Bible the prophet is a speaker of or for God. His words are

1. The Seer not the production of his own spirit, and Speak- but come from a higher source. For er of God he is at the same time, also, a seer, who sees things that do not lie in the domain of natural sight, or who hears things which human ears do not ordinarily receive; cf 1 S 9 9, where nābhī, "speaker," and rō'ch, "seer," are used as synonymous terms. Jer 23 16 and Ezk 13 2 f are particularly instructive in this regard. In these passages a sharp distinction is made between those persons who only claim to be prophets but who prophesy "out of their own heart," and the true prophets who declare the word which the Lord has spoken to them. In the latter case the contents of the prophecy have not originated in their own reflection or calculation; and just as little is this prophecy the product of their own feelings, fears or hopes, but, as something extraneous to man and independent of him, it has with a Divine certainty entered the soul of the prophet. The prophet has seen that which he prophesies, although he need not have seen it in the form of a real vision. He can also "see" words with his inner eyes (Isa 2 1, and often). It is only another expression for this when it is frequently said that God has spoken to the prophet. In this case too it is not necessary that there must have been a voice which he could hear phonetically through his natural ear. The main thing is that he must have been able sharply to distinguish the contents of this voice from his own heart, i.e. from his personal consciousness. Only in this way is he capable of speaking to the people in the name of God and able to publish his word as that of Jeh. In this case he is the speaker of Jeh (nābhī'), or the mouth of the Lord (cf Ezk 7 1 with 4 16). Under these conditions he then regards it as absolute compulsion to speak, just as a person must be filled with fear when he hears a lion roar nearby (Am 3 8). The words burn in his soul until he utters them (Jer 20 7.9).

The Divine power, which comes over a human being and compels him to see or to hear things which otherwise would be hidden from him, is called by various terms expressive of inspiration. It is said that the Spirit of God has come over someone (Nu 24 2); or has fallen upon him (Ezk 11 5); or that the hand of Jeh has come over him and laid hold of him (2 K 3 15; Ezk 1 3; 3 14.22, and often); or that the Holy Spirit has been put on him as a garment, i.e. has been incorporated in him (1 Ch 12 18; 2 Ch 24 20); or that the Spirit of revelation has permanently descended upon him (Nu 11 25 f; 2 K 2 15; Isa 11 2; 61 1); or that God has given this Spirit of His (Nu 11 29; Isa 42 1); or pours Him out upon man (Joel 2 28 f [Heb 3 1 f]). But this inspiration is not such that it suppresses the human consciousness of the recipient, so that he would receive the word of God in the state of sleep or trance. But rather the recipient is in possession of his full consciousness, and is able afterward to give a clear account of what happened. Nor is the individuality of the prophet eliminated by this Divine inspiration; unconsciously this individuality coöperates in the formal shaping of that which has been seen and heard. In accordance with the natural peculiarity of the prophet and with the contents of the message, the psychological condition of the recipient may be that of intense excitement or of calmness. As a rule the inspiration that takes possession of the prophets is evidenced also by an exalted and poetical language, which assumes a certain rhythmical character, but is not bound to a narrow and mechanical meter. It is, however, also possible that prophetic utterances find their expression in plain prose. The individual peculiarity of the prophet is a prime factor also in the form in which the revelation comes to him. In the one prophet we find a preponderance of visions; another prophet has no visions. But the visions of the future which he sees are given in the forms and the color which have been furnished by his own consciousness. All the more the form in which the prophet gives expression to his word of God is determined by his personal talents and gifts as also by his experiences.

In a certain respect the dream can be cited as an analogous phenomenon, in which also the ideas that are slumbering in the soul uninvited put in their appearance without being controlled by consciousness and reason.

3. The Dream On the other hand, prophecy differs specifically from dreams, first, because the genuine prophetic utterance is received when the prophet is clearly conscious, and, secondly, because such an utterance brings with it a much greater degree of certainty and a greater guaranty of its higher origin than is done even by a dream that seems to be prophetic. In Jer 23 25 ff it is declared that these two are entirely dissimilar, and the relation between the two is compared to straw and wheat. The Moslem Arabs also put a much lower estimate on the visionary dream than on the prophetic vision in a waking condition.

Because this Spirit of God acts with full freedom, He can select His organs at will from among every station, age or sex. The Spirit is not

4. Freedom of Inspiration confined to any priestly class or organization. It indeed was the case at times that a prophet gathered disciples around himself, who could themselves in turn also be seized by his spirit, although the transmission of this spirit was a difficult matter (2 K 2 10). Yet genuine prophecies continued to be at all times a free gift of the sovereign God. Amos (7 14 f) appeals expressly to this fact, that he did not himself choose the prophet's calling nor was the pupil of a prophetic school, but that he had been directly called by Jeh from his daily occupation as a shepherd and workman. In the same way we indeed find prophets who belonged to the priestly order (Jeremiah, Ezekiel and others), but equally great is the number of those who certainly did not so belong. Further, age made no difference in the call to the prophetic office. Even in his earliest youth Samuel was called to be a prophet (1 S 3 1 ff), and it did not avail Jeremiah anything when he excused himself because of his youth (Jer 1 6). Then, too, a woman could be seized by this Spirit. From time to time prophetesses appeared, although the female sex is by no means so prominent here as it is in the sorcery of the heathen. See PROPHETESS. As an exceptional case the Spirit of God could lay hold even of a person who inwardly was entirely estranged from Him and could make an utterance through him (cf Saul, 1 S 10 11; 19 24; Balaam, Nu 23 f; Caiaphas, Jn 11 51). As a rule, however, God has selected such prophetic organs for a longer service. These persons are called and dedicated for this purpose by Him through a special act (cf Moses Ex 3 1 ff; 1 K 19 16.19 ff; Isa 6; Jer 1; Ezk 1). This moment was decisive for their whole lives and constituted their authorization as far as they themselves and others were concerned. Yet for each prophetic appearance these men receive a special enlightenment. The prophet does not at all times speak in an inspired state; cf Nathan (2 S 7 3 ff), who afterward was compelled to take back a word which he had spoken on his own authority. Characteristic data on the mental state of the prophets in the reception and in the declaration of the Divine word are found in Jer 15 16 f; 20 7 ff. Originally Jeremiah felt it as a joy that Jeh spoke to him (cf Ezk 3 3), but then he lost all pleasure in life and would have preferred not to have uttered this word, but he could not do as he desired.

The attempt has often been made to explain prophecy as a natural product of purely human factors. Rationalistic theologians regarded the prophets as enthusiastic teachers of religion and morals, as warm patriots and politicians, to whom they ascribed nothing but a certain ability of guessing the future. But this was no explanation of the facts in the case. The prophets were themselves conscious of this, that they were not the intellectual authors of their higher knowledge. This consciousness is justified by the fact that they were in a condition to make known things which lay beyond their natural horizon and which were contrary to all probability. Those cases are particularly instructive in this respect which beyond a doubt were recorded by the prophets themselves. Ezekiel could indeed, on the basis of moral and religious reflections, reach the conviction that Zedekiah of Jerus would not escape his punishment for his political treachery and for his disobedience to the word of Jeh; but he could never from this source have reached the certainty that this king, as the prophet describes the case in 12 8 ff, was to be taken captive while trying to escape from the besieged city and was then to be blinded and taken to Babylon. Just as little could he in Babylon know the exact day when the siege of Jerus began (24 2). If this prophet had learned of these things in a natural way and had afterward clothed them in the form of prophecy, he would have been guilty of a deception, something unthinkable in the case of so conscientious a preacher of morality. But such cases are frequently met with. Jeremiah predicts to Hananiah that he would die during the year (23 16), but it is not only such matters of detail that presuppose an extraordinary vision of the prophet. The whole way also in which Jeremiah predicts the destruction of Jerus as inevitable, in direct contrast to the hopes of the Jerusalemites and to the desires of his own heart, shows that he was speaking under Divine compulsion, which was more powerful than his own reflections and sympathies. On any other presupposition his conduct would have been reprehensible cowardice. The case of Isaiah is exactly the same. When he gives to Ahaz the word of God as a guaranty that the Syrians and the Ephraimites would not capture Jerus (7 4 ff), and when he promises Hezekiah that the Assyrians would not shoot an arrow into the city, but would return without having accomplished their purpose (37 22-33), these things were so much in contradiction to all the probabilities of the course events would take that he would have been a frivolous adventurer had he not received his information from higher sources. Doubtless it was just these predictions which established and upheld the influence of the prophets. Thus in the case of Amos it was his prediction of a great earthquake, which did occur two years later (1 1); in the case of Elijah, the prediction of the long dearth (1 K 17 1); in the case of Elisha, the undertakings of the enemies (2 K 6 12), and in other cases. It is indeed true that the contents of the prophetic discourses are not at all confined to the future. Everything that God has to announce to mankind, revelations concerning His will, admonitions, warnings, He is able to announce through the mouth of the prophet. But His determinations with reference to the future as a rule are connected with prophetic utterances of the latter kind. The prophets are watchmen, guardians of the people, who are to warn the nation, because they see the dangers and the judgments approaching, which must put in their appearance if the Divine will is disregarded. The prophets interpret also for the people that which is happening and that which has occurred, e.g. the defeats which they have suffered at the hands of their enemies, or the grasshopper plague (Joel), or a famine. They lay bare the inner reason for external occurrences and explain such events in their connection with the providential government of God. This gives to prophecy a powerful inner unity, notwithstanding the great differences of times and surrounding circumstances. It is prophecy which the Heb people must thank for their higher conception of history. This people know of a Highest Author of all things and of a positive end, which all things that transpire must serve. God's plan has for its purpose to bring about the complete supremacy of His will among the children of men.

In genuine prophecy, according to Bib. conceptions, the fulfilment constitutes an integral part.

This is set up by Dt 18 21 f as a proof of the genuineness of a prophetic utterance. The prophetic word "falls to the ground" (1 S 3 19) if it is not more rarely find מִלֵּא, millē, but regularly in the NT πληροῦσθαι, plērousthai, "being fulfilled") by the course of events. It would remain an empty word if it did not attain to its full content through its realization. In fact, in the word spoken by the prophet itself there dwells a Divine power, so that at the moment when he speaks the event takes place, even if it is not yet visible to man. This realization is also not infrequently represented symbolically by the prophet in confirmation of his prediction. Thus in a certain sense it is the prophet himself who through his word builds up and pulls down, plants and roots out (Jer 1 10; 25 15 ff). But the fulfilment can be judged by the contemporaries in the sense of Dt 18 22 only when this fulfilment refers to the near future and when special emphasis is laid on external events. In these cases the prediction of certain events assumes the significance of a "sign" (cf Jer 23 16; Isa 8 1 ff; 37 30, and elsewhere). In other cases it is only later generations who can judge of the correctness of a prediction or of a threat. In this way in Zec 1 6 the fulfilment of a threat is declared, and in the NT often the fulfilment of a promise is after a long time pointed out. But it is not the case that a genuine prophecy must be fulfilled like an edict of fate. Such prophecy is not an inevitable decree of fate, but is a word of the living God to mankind, and therefore conditioned ethically, and God can, if repentance has followed, withdraw a threat (Jer 18 2 ff; case of Jonah), or the punishment can be mitigated (1 K 21 29). A prediction, too, Jeh can recall if the people prove unworthy (Jer 13 9 f). A favorable or an unfavorable prediction can also be postponed, as far as its realization is concerned, to later times, if it belongs to the ultimate counsels of God, as e.g. the final judgment and deliverance on the last day. This counsel also may be realized successively. In this case the prophet already collects into one picture what is realized gradually in a longer historical development. The prophet in general spoke to his hearers in such a way as could be understood by them and could be impressed on them. It is therefore not correct to demand a fulfilment pedantically exact in the form of the historical garb of the prophecy. The main thing is that the Divine thought contained in the prophecy be entirely and completely realized. But not unfrequently the finger of God can be seen in the entirely literal fulfilment of certain prophecies. This is esp. the case in the NT in the appearance of the Son of Man, in whom all the rays of OT prophecy have found their common center.

"raised up" (רָאָה, hē'ām, "fulfil," for which we

II. Historical Development of the Prophetic Office.—It is a characteristic peculiarity of the religion of the OT that its very elementary beginnings are of a prophetic nature. The fathers, above all Abraham, but also Isaac and Jacob, are the recipients of visions and of Divine revelations. Esp. is this true of Abraham, who appeared to the foreigners, to whom he was neither kith or kin, to be indeed a prophet (nābhī) (Gen 20 7; cf Ps 105 15), although in his case the command to preach the word was yet absent. Above all, the creative founder of the Israelitish national religion, Moses, is a prophet in the eminent sense of the word. His influence among the people is owing neither to his official position, nor to any military prowess, but solely and alone to the one circumstance, that since his call at the burning bush God has spoken to him. This intercourse between God and Moses was ever of a particularly intimate character. While other men of God received certain individual messages only from time to time and through the mediation of dreams and visions, Jeh spoke directly and "face to face" with Moses (Nu 12 6 ff; Dt 34 10; cf Ex 33 11). Moses was the permanent organ through whom Jeh brought about the Egypt plagues and through whom He explained what these meant to His people, as also through whom He led and ruled them. The voice of Moses too had to explain to them the Divine signs in the desert and communicate to them the commandments of God. The legislation of Moses shows that he was not only filled with the Spirit of God occasionally, but that he abode with God for longer periods of time and produced something that is a well-ordered whole. A production such as the Law is the result of a continuous association with God.

Since that time revelation through prophecy was probably never entirely wanting in Israel (Dt 18 15). But this fountain did not always flow with the same fullness or clearness. 3. Period of the Judges During the period of the Judges the Spirit of God urged the heroes who served Jeh rather to deeds than to words. Yet Deborah enjoyed a high rank as a prophetess, and for a long time pronounced decisions of justice in the name of the Lord before she, through her prophetic utterances, aroused the people to rise up against their oppressors. What is said in 1 S 3 1 concerning the times of Eli can be applied to this whole period, namely that the word and vision of the prophet had become rare in the land. All the more epoch-making was the activity of Samuel, who while yet a boy received Divine revelations (1 S 3 1 ff). He was by the whole people regarded as a "seer" whose prophecies were always fulfilled (3 19 f). The passage 9 6 ff shows that the people expected of such a man of God that he should also as a clairvoyant come to the assistance of the people in the troubles of life. Such a professional clairvoyant, indeed, Samuel was not, as he was devoted entirely to the service of his God and of his people and obeyed the Divine Spirit, even in those cases when he was compelled to act contrary to his personal inclinations, as was the case when the kingdom was established in Israel (8 6 ff).

Since the days of Samuel we hear of schools of prophets, or "sons of prophets." These associations probably originated in this way, 4. Schools of Prophets that an experienced prophet attracted to himself bands of youths, who sought to receive a measure of his spirit.

These disciples of the prophets, together with their families, lived in colonies around the master. Possibly Samuel was the first who founded such a school of prophets. For in or near the city of Ramah we first find nayôth, or colonies of such disciples (1 S 19 18 f; 20 1). Among these pupils is found to a much greater extent than among the teachers a certain ecstatic feature. They arouse their feelings through music and induce a frantic condition which also affects others in the same way, in which state they "prophecy" and, throwing off their garments, fall to the ground. In later times too we find traces of such ecstatic phenomena. Thus e.g. in Zec 13 6; 1 K 20 37,38, the "wounds" on the breast or on the forehead recall the self-mutilation of the priests of Baal (1 K 18 28). The deeds, suggestive of what the dervishes of our own day do, probably were phenomena quite similar to the action of the prophets of the surrounding tribes. But that prophecy in Israel was not, as is now not infrequently claimed, merely a less crude form of the heathen prophetic institution, is proved by such men as Moses and Samuel, who even in their times represent something much higher. Also in the colonies of prophets there was assuredly not to be found merely an enthusiasm without the Spirit of God. Proof for this is Samuel, the spiritual father of this colony, as Elijah was for the later colonies of this kind. These places were rather the centers of a religious life, where communion with God was sought by prayer and meditation, and where the recollection of the great deeds of God in the past seemed to prepare for the reception of new revelations. From such centers of theocratic ideas and ideals without a doubt there came forth also corresponding influences that affected the people. Perhaps not only was sacred music cultivated at these places but also sacred traditions, which were handed down orally and in writing. Certain it is that at these colonies the religion of Jeh prevailed.

During the period of the kings prophetically inspired men frequently appeared, who demanded even of the kings that they should

5. Period of the Kings submit to their Divinely inspired word. Saul, who refused such submission, perished as the result of this conflict. David owed much to the support of the prophets Samuel, Nathan, Gad (1 S 16 1 ff; 2 S 7; 2 Ch 29 25, and elsewhere). But David also bowed in submission when these prophets rebuked him because of his transgression of the Divine commands (2 S 12, 24). His son Solomon was educated by the prophet Nathan. But the destruction of his kingdom was predicted by the prophet Abijah, the Shilonite (1 K 11 29 ff). Since Jeh, as the supreme Sovereign, has the right to enthronate or to dethrone kings, this is often done through the mouths of the prophets (cf 1 K 14 7 ff; 16 1 ff). After the division of the kingdom we find Shemaiah forbidding Rehoboam to begin a war with his brethren of Israel (1 K 12 21; cf 2 Ch 11 2 ff; cf another mission of the same prophet, 2 Ch 12 5 ff). On the other hand in the Northern Kingdom the prophetic word is soon turned against the untheocratic rule of Jeroboam (1 K 13, 14). It is in this very same Northern Kingdom that the prophets unfolded their full activity and generally in opposition to the secular rulers, although there was no lack of accommodating "prophets," who were willing to sanction everything that the king wanted. The opposition of the true prophets to these false representatives of prophecy is illustrated in the story of Micahiah, the son of Imlah (1 K 22). But a still higher type of prophecy above the ordinary is found in Elijah, whose historic mission it was to fight to the finish the battle between the followers of Jeh and the worship of the Tyrian Baal. He was entirely a man of action; every one of his words is a deed on a grand scale (cf concerning Elijah and Elisha the art. RELIGION OF ISRAEL). His successor Elisha inherited from him not only his mantle, but also a double measure of his spiritual gifts. He exhibits the prophetic office more from its loving side. He is accustomed to visit the schools of prophets found scattered throughout the land, calls the faithful together around himself on the Sabbaths and the new moons (2 K 4 23), and in this way establishes centers of a more spiritual culture than was common elsewhere among the people. We read that first-fruits were brought to him as to the priests (2 K 4 42). But while the activity of Elijah was entirely in antagonism to the ruling house in the kingdom, this feature is not entirely lacking in the work of Elisha also. He has even been charged with wicked conspiracies against the dynasty of Omri and the king of Syria (2 K 8, 9). His conduct in connection with these events can be excused only on the ground that he was really acting in the name of a higher Master. But in general it was possible for Elisha, after the radical change in public sentiment that had followed upon the work of Elijah, in later time to assume a more friendly attitude toward the government and the people. He often assisted the kings in their arduous contests with the Syrians (cf 6 8 ff; 13 14 ff). His deeds are generally of a benevolent character. In connection with these he exhibits to a remarkable degree the gift of prophetic foresight (2 K 4 16; 5 26; 6 8 ff; 7 1 ff; 8 10.12; 9 6 ff; 13 19). Jonah, too, the son of Amittai, had at that time a favorable message for the Northern Kingdom (2 K 14 25).

However, the flourishing condition of the kingdom under Jeroboam II had an unfavorable influence on its spiritual development.

6. Amos, Hosea and the Literary Prophets Soon Amos and Hosea were compelled to announce to this kingdom its impending destruction through a great world-power. These two prophets have left us books. To put prophetic utterances into written form had already been introduced before this. At any rate, many scholars are of the conviction that the prophecies of Obadiah and Joel belong to an earlier period, although others place them in the post-exilic period. In any case, the expectation of a day of settlement by Jeh with His people was already in the days of Amos common and current (5 13 ff). As the writing of individual prophecies (Isa 8 1 f; 30 8; Hab 2 2 f) had for its purpose the preserving of these words in permanent authentic form and later to convince the reader of their wonderful fulfillment, thus too the writing down of larger collections of prophecies had for its purpose to intensify the power of the prophetic word and to secure this as a permanent possession of the people (Jer 30 2; 36 1 ff). Pupils of the prophets assisted them in this writing and in preserving their books (cf Jer 36 4; Isa 8 16).

It is to this custom that we owe our knowledge of the very words of the utterances of many of the prophets of a later period. In addition to the larger books of Isa, Jer, Ezk, we have a number of smaller prophetic books, which have been united into the Book of the Twelve Prophets. These utterances as a rule exhibited an elevated form of language and are more or less poetical. However, in modern times some scholars are inclined to go too far in claiming that these addresses are given in a carefully systematized metrical form. Hebrew meter as such is a freer form of expression than is Arabic or Sanskrit meter, and this is all the more the case with the discourses of the prophets, which were not intended for musical rendering, and which are expressed in a rhythmically constructed rhetoric, which appears now in one and then in another form of melody, and often changes into prose.

In the kingdom of Judah the status of the prophets was somewhat more favorable than it was in Ephraim. They were indeed forced in Jerus also to contend against the injustice on the part of the ruling classes and against immorality of all kinds. But in this kingdom there were at any rate from time to time found kings who walked more in the footsteps of David. Thus Asa followed the directions of the prophet Azariah (2 Ch 15 1 ff). It is true that the prophet Hanani censured this king, but it was done for a different reason. Jehoshaphat also regularly consulted the prophets. Among those who had dealings with him Elisha is also mentioned (2 K 3 14), as also some other prophets (cf 2 Ch 19 2; 20 14-37). The greatest among the prophets during the period of the Assyrian invasions was Isaiah, who performed the duties of his office for more than 40 years, and under the kings Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, and possibly too under Manasseh, through his word exercised a powerful influence upon the king and the nation. Although a preacher of judgments, he at critical times appeared also as a prophet of consolation.

7. Poetical Form of Prophecy These utterances as a rule exhibited an elevated form of language and are more or less poetical. However, in modern times some scholars are inclined to go too far in claiming that these addresses are given in a carefully systematized metrical form. Hebrew meter as such is a freer form of expression than is Arabic or Sanskrit meter, and this is all the more the case with the discourses of the prophets, which were not intended for musical rendering, and which are expressed in a rhythmically constructed rhetoric, which appears now in one and then in another form of melody, and often changes into prose.

Malachi is regarded by the Jews as the last really canonical prophet. While doubtless there was not a total lack of prophetically endowed seers and speakers of God also in the closing centuries of the pre-Christian era, nevertheless the general conviction prevailed that the Spirit of God was no longer present, e.g. in the times of the Maccabees (cf 1 Macc 4 46; 9 27; 14 41). It is true that certain modern critics ascribe some large sections of the Book of Isa, as well as of other prophets, even to a period as late as the Gr. But this is refuted by the fact mentioned in Eccles (beginning of the 2d cent. BC) that in the writer's time the prophetic Canon appeared already as a closed collection. Dnl is not found in this collection, but the Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets is. It was Nor did he despise external evidences of his prophetic office (cf 7 11; 38 22.8). His contemporary Micah is in full agreement with him, although he was not called to deal with the great of the land, with kings, or statesmen, as was the mission of Isaiah. Nahum, Zephaniah and Habakkuk belong rather to the period of transition from the Assyrian to the Chaldaean periods. In the days of Josiah the prophetess Huldah had great influence in Jerus (2 K 22 14). Much more important under this same king was the prophet Jeremiah, who was called by God for a great mission. This prophet during the siege and destruction of Jerus and after that time spoke as an unyielding yet deeply feeling exponent of God, and was compelled again and again to dash to the ground the false hopes of the patriots, whenever these arose. Not so firm was his contemporary and fellow-sufferer Uriah (Jer 26 20).

In the time of the exile itself we find the period of the activity of Ezekiel. It was significant that this prophet became the recipient of Di-

9. In the Exile vine revelations while on Bab territory. His work was, in accordance with the condition of affairs, more that of a pastor and literary man. He seems also to have been a bodily sufferer. His abnormal conditions became symbolical signs of that which he had to proclaim. Deutero-Isaiah, too (Isa 40 ff), spoke during the Bab period, namely at its close, and prepared for the return. The peculiar prophecies of Daniel are also accorded to a prophet living during the exile, who occupied a distinguished position at the court of the heathen rulers, and whose apocalyptic utterances are of a kind different from the discourses of the other prophets, as they deal more with the political condition of the world and the drama of history, in so far as this tends toward the establishment of the supremacy of Jeh. These prophecies were collected in later times and did not receive their final and present form until the Gr period at the beginning of the 2d cent. BC.

After the return from Babylon the Jews were exhorted by Haggai and Zechariah to rebuild their temple (about 520 BC). At that time there were still to be found prophets who took a hostile attitude to the men of God. Thus Nehemiah (Neh 6 6-14) was opposed by hostile prophets as also by a prophetess, Noadiah. In contrast with these, Malachi is at all times in accord with the canonical prophets, as he was an ardent advocate for the temple cultus of Jeh, not in the sense of a spiritless and senseless external worship, but as against the current indifference to Jeh. His style and his language, too, evidence a late age. The lyrical form has given way to the didactic. This is also probably the time when the present Book of Jonah was written, a didactic work treating of an older tradition.

Malachi is regarded by the Jews as the last really canonical prophet. While doubtless there was not a total lack of prophetically endowed

11. Cessa-tion of Prophecy seers and speakers of God also in the closing centuries of the pre-Christian era, nevertheless the general conviction prevailed that the Spirit of God was no longer present, e.g. in the times of the Maccabees (cf 1 Macc 4 46; 9 27; 14 41). It is true that certain modern critics ascribe some large sections of the Book of Isa, as well as of other prophets, even to a period as late as the Gr. But this is refuted by the fact mentioned in Eccles (beginning of the 2d cent. BC) that in the writer's time the prophetic Canon appeared already as a closed collection. Dnl is not found in this collection, but the Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets is. It was during this period that apocalyptic literature began to flourish, many specimens of which are found among the Apoc and the Pseudepigrapha. These books consist of eschatological speculations, not the product of original inspiration, but emanating from the study of the prophetic word. The very name Pseudepigrapha shows that the author issued his work, not under his own name, but under the pseudonym of some man of God from older times, such as Enoch, Ezra, Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Baruch, and others. This fact alone proves the secondary character of this class of literature. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

Malachi finds a successor in John the Baptist, whose coming the former had predicted. John is the greatest of the prophets, because

12. Prophecy in the NT he could directly point to Him who completed the old covenant and fulfilled its promises. All that we know in addition concerning the times of Jesus shows that the prophetic gift was yet thought of as possibly dwelling in many, but that prophecy was no longer the chief spiritual guide of the people (cf e.g. Jos, Ant, XIII, xi, 2; XV, x, 5, among the Essenes, or in the case of Hyrcanus, op. cit., XIII, x, 7). Jos himself claims to have had prophetic gifts at times (cf BJ, III, viii, 9). He is thinking in this connection chiefly of the prediction of some details. Such "prophets" and "prophetesses" are reported also in the NT. In Jesus Christ Himself the prophetic office reached its highest stage of development, as He stood in a more intimate relation than any other being to His Heavenly Father and spoke His word entirely and at all times. In the Christian congregation the office of prophecy is again found, differing from the proclamation of the gospel by the apostles, evangelists, and teachers. In the NT the terms προφήτης, προφήτης, προφητεία, προφήτεία, προφητεύω, προφήτειν, signify speaking under the extraordinary influence of the Holy Ghost. Thus in Acts 11 27 f (prophecy of a famine by Agabus); 21 10 f (prediction of the sufferings of Paul); 13 1 f (exhortation to mission work); 21 9 ff (prophetic gift of the daughters of Philip). Paul himself also had this gift (Acts 16 6 ff; 18 9; 22 17 ff; 27 23 f). In the public services of the church, prophecy occupied a prominent position (see esp. I Cor 14). A prophetic book in a special sense is the Apocalypse of St. John. The gift of prophecy was claimed by many also in later times. But this gift ceased more and more, as the Christian church more and more developed on the historical basis of revelation as completed in Christ. Esp. in spiritually aroused eras in the history of the church, prophecy again puts in its appearance. It has never ceased altogether, but on account of its frequent misuse the gift has become discredited. Jesus Himself warned against false prophets, and during the apostolic times it was often found necessary to urge the importance of trying spirits (1 Jn 4 1; 1 Cor 12 10; 14 29).

III. Historical Development of Prophecy.—The contents of prophecy are by no means merely predictions concerning the future. That 1. Contents which is given by the Spirit to the of Prophecy prophet can refer to the past and to the present as well as to the future. However, that which is revealed to the prophet finds its inner unity in this, that it all aims to establish the supremacy of Jeh. Prophecy views also the detailed events in their relation to the Divine plan, and this latter has for its purpose the absolute establishment of the supremacy of Jeh in Israel and eventually on the entire earth. We are accustomed to call those utterances that predict this final purpose the Messianic prophecies. However, not only those that speak of the person of the Messiah belong to this class, but all that treat of the coming of the kingdom of God.

The beginnings of the religion of Israel, as also the chief epoch in its development, emanated from prophetic revelations. The prophet

2. The Idea Moses elevated the tribal religion into of the a national religion, and at the same Messiah time taught the people to regard the religion of the fathers more ethically, spiritually and vitally. Samuel crowned the earthly form of the concrete theocracy by introducing an "Anointed of Jeh" in whom the covenant relation between Jeh and Israel was concentrated personally. The Anointed of the Lord entered into a much more intimate relationship to Jeh as His Son or Servant than it was possible for the whole people of Israel to do, although as a people they were also called the servant or the son of God (cf Ps 2 7 f; 110). The Pss of David are a proof of this, that this high destiny of the kingdom was recognized. David himself became a prophet in those hymns in which he describes his own unique relation to Jeh. But the actual kings of history as a rule corresponded too imperfectly to this idea. For this reason the word "prophetic" already in David's time directs to the future, when this relationship shall be more perfectly realized (2 S 7 12 ff; cf David's own words, 2 S 23 4 ff). See MESSIAH.

Solomon completed the external equipment of the theocracy by the erection of the temple. But it was just his reign that constituted

3. Before the Exile the turning-point, from which time on the prophets begin to emphasize the judgment to come, i.e. the dissolution of the external existence of the kingdom of Jeh. Yet prophecy at all times does this in such a manner, that a kernel of the Divine establishment on Zion remains intact. The Divine establishment of the sanctuary and the kingdom cannot be destroyed; all that is necessary is that they be restored in greater purity and dignity. This can be seen also in Amos, who predicts that the fallen tabernacle of David shall be raised up again (Am 9 11 ff), which shall then be followed by a condition of undisturbed blessing. The same is found in Hosea, who sees how all Israel is again united under "David" the king of the last times, when between God and the people, between heaven and earth, an unbroken covenant of love shall be made (Hos 2 1 f.18 ff); and also in Isaiah, who predicts that during the time of the conquest and subjection of the country by the Gentiles a Son of David shall be born in a miraculous manner and attain supremacy (Isa 7 14; 9 2 ff; 11 1 ff), and who speaks constantly of that Divine establishment on Zion (cf the quiet waters of Shiloah, 8 6), the foundation stone that has been laid by Jeh (28 16, etc). Micah, his contemporary, does the same, and in an entirely similar manner predicts that the radical judgment of destruction which shall come over the temple and the royal palace shall be followed by the wondrous King of Peace from Bethlehem (6 1 ff). Possibly even at a somewhat earlier date Zec 9 9 described this future ruler in similar terms. In general it is not probable that Isaiah and Micah were the first to speak so personally of this King. They seem to presuppose that their contemporaries were acquainted with this idea.

In recent times scholars have pointed to the fact that in the old Orient, among the Egyptians, the Babylonians and elsewhere, the expectation of a miraculously born King

4. Analogous Ideas among Heathen Peoples of the future, who was to bring to His own people and to all nations salvation and peace, was entertained at an early period. Yet so much is certain, that

Isaiah and Micah did not base their hopes on the vague dreams of the gentile world, but upon the prophetic establishment of a Divine sanctuary and kingdom of Zion. The personal figure of this Son of David is not so much in the foreground in the other prophets down to the period of the exile. These prophets mention only casually the Good Shepherd, as e.g. Jer 23 1 ff; 33 12 ff; Ezk 34 23 f. But after that time this Messianic expectation became a permanent element in the hopes of Israel.

In the meanwhile, prophecy had thrown much light on the ways of God, which prepare for His kingdom on earth. Even long before Amos (5 18 ff) the idea of a "day of Jeh," which was to be a day of revelation, on which God makes a settlement with the nations, must have been generally known, since Amos is already compelled to protest against the abuse of this expectation. But hand in hand with this settlement we find also and at all times the expectation of the exaltation and of the salvation of Israel. Yet the prophets have all emphasized that Israel and Judah must first be thoroughly purified by a judgment, before the land could, through God's grace, be glorified and richly blessed. The judgment which the præilic prophets are continually predicting is, however, only a means to an end. This judgment is not the final word of the Lord, as Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah and Habakkuk constantly teach. They announce that return to Jeh and obedience to His commandments is the way to salvation (Hos 6 1; Isa 1 18; Jer 4 1, and often). However, the prophets know that the people will not turn again to God, but that first the Jewish state must be entirely overthrown (Isa 6). It is particularly deserving of notice, that believing trust in Jeh is regarded as the positive means for deliverance (Isa 7 9; 30 15; Hab 2 4). It is through this that the "remnant" of the faithful, "the kernel" of the people, is saved. Also in the case of Jeremiah, whose work it was to predict the immediate destruction of Judah, there is not absent a kind of an esoteric book of consolation. His battle cry for the future is "Jeh our righteousness" (23 6; 33 16). In his case we find a rich spiritualization of religion. The external customs, circumcision and the like, he declares, do no good, if the true state of the heart is lacking. Even the ark of the covenant is unnecessary and is discarded in the enlargement of the sanctuary. Ezekiel, who lays more stress on the external ordinances, nevertheless agrees with Jeremiah in this, that Jerus together with the temple must fall. Only after this destruction the prophet in his spirit builds the sanctuary again; notwithstanding the external character of his restoration, there is yet found in his picture a further development of its spiritual character. The ethical rights and the responsibility of the individual are strongly emphasized (chs 18, 33). The land becomes transformed; the Gentiles are received into the covenant of God.

Deutero-Isa (Isa 40-66), during the time of the Bab captivity, enriches prophecy in an extraordinary manner, through the figure of the true "Servant of Jeh," who in a peaceful way, through his words of instruction and esp. through his innocent sufferings and his vicarious deeds, converts Israel, the undeserving servant, and also wins over the gentile world to Jeh. It was not possible that the picture of a suffering man of God, who through his death as a martyr attains to exaltation, should be suggested to the Jews by the altogether different figure of a death and resurrection of a Bab god (Thammuz-Adonis!). Since the unjust persecutions of Joseph and David they were acquainted with the sufferings of the just, and Jeremiah's life as a prophet was a continuous martyrdom. But the writer of the second part of Isaiah had before his eyes a vision that far excelled all of these types in purity and in greatness to such a degree as did David's Son in Isa and Mic surpass His great ancestor. He brings to a completion the kingdom of God through teaching, suffering and death, and attains to the glory of rulership. In this way He unites the offices of prophet, priest and king.

After the exile prophecy continues its work. The Messianic expectations, too, are developed further by Haggai, and still more by Zechariah. Malachi announces the advent of the Day of Jeh, but expects before this a complete purification of the people of God. God Himself will come, and His angel will prepare the way for Him. The visions of Daniel picture the transformation of the world into a kingdom of God. The latter will mark the end of the history of the world. It comes from above; the earthly kingdoms are from below, and are pictured as beasts; the Ruler of the kingdom of God is a Son of man. The latter comes with the clouds of the heaven to take possession of His kingdom (Dnl 7 13 ff). Then the judgment of the world will take place and include also each human being, who before this will bodily arise from the dead, in order to enter upon blessedness or condemnation. Here we find indicated a universal expansion of the kingdom of God extending over the whole world and all mankind.

If we survey this prophecy of the kingdom of God and its Divinely blessed Ruler, the Messiah, from a Christian standpoint, we find that a grand Divine unity connects its different elements. The form of this prophecy is indeed conditioned by the views and ideas of the time of utterance. The prophets were compelled to speak so that their hearers could understand them. Only gradually these limitations and forms become spiritualized, e.g. the kingdom of God is still pictured by the prophets as established around the local center of Zion. Mt. Zion is in a concrete manner exalted, in order to give expression to its importance, etc. It is the NT fulfilment that for the first time gives adequate form to Divine revelation. At least in the person of Jesus Christ this perfection is given, although the full unfolding of this kingdom is yet a matter of the future.

A second characteristic feature of prophecy is the partial nature of the individual prophetic utterances and prophetic pictures. One picture must be supplemented by the others, in order not to be misunderstood. Thus, e.g. according to Isa 11 14; Zec 9 13 ff, we might expect that the kingdom of God was to be established by force of arms. But the same prophets show in other utterances (Isa 9 6 f; Zec 9 9 f) that these warlike expressions are to be understood figuratively, since the Messianic King is more than all others a Prince of Peace.

A third feature that deserves attention is the perspective character of prophecy. The prophet sees together and at once upon the surface of the pictures things which are to be fulfilled only successively and gradually. Thus, e.g. Deutero-Isa sees in the near future the return from captivity, and directly connected with this a miraculous glorification of the city of God. The return did as a matter of fact take place soon afterward, but the glorification of the city in which Jeh Himself had promised to dwell was yet in the distant future. The succeeding prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, predict that this consummation shall take place in the future.

Also in the predictions concerning the future made by Jesus and in the Apocalypse of St. John, these characteristics of prophecy, its contemporaneous and perspective and at times symbolical features, are not disregarded. The firm prophetic word is intended to give the congregation certain directive lines and distinctive work. But an adequate idea of what is to come the Christian church will become compelled to form for itself, when the fulfilment and completion shall have taken place.

IV. Analogous Phenomena among Gentiles.—

The uniqueness of Bib. prophecy is grasped fully only when we try to find analogies among the gentile peoples. Here we find everywhere indeed the art of sooth-

1. Necromancy and Technical Witchcraft among the gentile peoples. Here we find everywhere indeed the art of soothsaying, the headquarters for which was Babylon. But with this art the prophecy of the OT stands out in bold contrast (cf the prohibitions in Lev 19 26.31; 20 6.27; Dt 18 10ff, prohibitions that refer to necromancy for the purpose of discovering the future). This art was practised through a medium, a person who had an 'ōbh (Bab ubi), i.e. a spirit that brought forth the dead in order to question them. The spirits were thought to speak in murmurings or piping sounds (Isa 8 19), which could be imitated by the medium (ventriloquist). According to the Law, which forbade this under penalty of death, Saul had tried to destroy those who practised incantations, who generally were women (1 S 28 9). This practice, however, continued to flourish. In addition, the Babylonians and other peoples had also a developed art of interpretation in order to find omens for the future. Esp. was the examination of intestines practised by them. The liver of sacrificial animals particularly was carefully examined, and, from this, predictions, good or bad, were inferred (cf Ezk 21 21). See DIVINATION. This art passed over from the Babylonians to the seafaring Etruscans, and through these came to the Romans. But other phenomena also were by the different nations interpreted as prophetically significant and were by those skilled in this art interpreted accordingly. Among these were miscarriages by human beings and animals, the actions of hens, horses, the flight of birds, earthquakes, forms of the clouds, lightning, and the like. Further, mechanical contrivances were used, such as casting of lots, stones, sticks, etc.

More spiritual and popular was the interpretation of dreams. It also was the case that mediums intentionally would convert themselves into a semi-waking trance. In this way the suitable mediums attained to a certain kind of clairvoyance, found among various peoples. This approaches the condition of an ecstatically aroused pseudo-prophet, of whom mention is made above. In Greece, too, oracles were pronounced by the Pythian prophetess, who by vapors and the like was aroused to a practice of the mantic art. In Dodona it was the voice of the divinity in Nature, which they sought to read in the rustling of the trees and the murmuring of the water. How uncertain these sources were was well known to heathen antiquity. The ancients complain of the enigmatical character of the Sibylline utterances and the doubtful nature of what was said. See GREECE, RELIGION OF. In contrast to this, Israel knows that it possesses in prophecy a clear word (Nu 23 23).

But the contents also of the Bib. prophecies are unique through their spiritual uniformity and greatness. The oracle at Delphi, too, at times showed a certain moral elevation and could be regarded as the conscience of the nation. But how insignificant and meager was that which it offered to those who questioned it, in comparison with the spontaneous utterances of the prophets of Israel! Also what has in recent times been said concerning the "prophetic texts" from ancient Egypt (Gressmann, Texte und Bilder, I, 20 ff) may indeed show some external similarity to the prophecies of Israel; but they lack the spiritual and religious depth and the strictly ethical dignity of the prophets of the Scriptures, as also the consistency with which these from century to century reveal the thoughts of God and make known with constantly increasing clearness their purposes and goal.

PROPHECY, GIFT OF. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

PROPHECYINGS, prof'ē-si-ingz, FALSE: The distinction between the true and the false prophecy and prophets is very difficult to state. Broadly speaking, the false prophesying related itself to the national ideal independently of any spiritual quality, while the true prophesying ever kept uppermost the spiritual conception of the national life. Among those given to false prophesying were the ones who spoke after "the deceit of their own heart" (Jer 14 13.14); those who without real prophetic gift borrowed a message and assumed the speech of prophecy (Jer 23 28.31); and those who sought the prophet's rôle in order to gain the material gifts which came from the people to their prophets (Mic 3 5). These, when discovered, were counted worthy of punishment and even death. There were, however, false prophesyings from men who honestly believed themselves to have a message from Jeh. These prophecies from self-deceived prophets often led the people astray. The dream of national greatness was substituted for the voice of Jeh. It was against such prophesying that the true prophets had to contend. The only test here was the spiritual character of the utterance, and this test demanded a certain moral or spiritual sense which the people did not always possess. Consequently, in times of moral darkness the false prophets, predicting smooth things for the nation, independent of repentance, consecration and the pursuit of spiritual ideals, were honored above the true prophets who emphasized the moral greatness of Jeh and the necessity of righteousness for the nation. In NT times false prophesying did much injury in the church. See PROPHECY.

3. Contents of Extra-Biblical Oracles times showed a certain moral elevation and could be regarded as the conscience of the nation. But how insignificant and meager was that which it offered to those who questioned it, in comparison with the spontaneous utterances of

NT. It should be noted, however, that women like Miriam (Ex 15 20), Deborah (Jgs 4 4) and Huldah (2 K 22 14) were not credited with the seer's insight into the future, but were called "prophetesses" because of the poetical inspiration of their speech. Among others mentioned as having the prophetic gift we find Hannah (1 S 2 1), Anna (Lk 2 36) and the four daughters of Philip (Acts 21 8.9). See PROPHET. C. E. SCHENK

PROPI TIATION, pro-pish-i-ā'shun: The word is Lat and brings into its Eng. use the atmosphere of heathen rites for winning the favor, or averting the anger, of the gods. In the OT it represents a number of Heb words—ten, including derivatives—which are sufficiently discussed under ATONEMENT (q.v.), of which propitiation is one aspect. It represents in LXX the Gr stems ἱλασκ-, hilask- (ἱλε-, hile-), and καταλλάγ-, katallag-, with derivatives; in the NT only the latter, and is rarely used. Propitiation needs to be studied in connection with reconciliation, which is used frequently in some of the most strategic sentences of the NT, esp. in the newer VSS. In He 2 17, ERV and ARV have both changed "reconciliation" of AV to "propitiation," to make it correspond with the OT use in connection with the sacrifice on the DAY of ATONEMENT (q.v.). Lk 18 13 ("God, be thou merciful [m "be propitiated"] to me the sinner" [ARVm]); He 8 12 (quoted from LXX); and Mt 16 22 (an idiomatic asseveration like Eng. "mercy on us") will help in getting at the usage in the NT. In LXX hilastērion is the term for the "mercy-seat" or "lid of the ark" of the covenant which was sprinkled with blood on the Day of Atonement. It is employed in exactly this sense in He 9 5, where later VSS have in m "the propitiatory."

Elsewhere in the NT this form is found only in Rom 3 25, and it is here that difficulty and difference are found extensively in interpreting. Greek fathers generally and prominent modern scholars understand Paul here to say that God appointed Christ Jesus to be the "mercy-seat" for sinners. The reference, while primarily to the Jewish ceremonial in tabernacle and temple, would not depend upon this reference for its comprehension, for the idea was general in religious thought, that some place and means had to be provided for securing friendly meeting with the Deity, offended by man's sin. In He particularly, as elsewhere generally, Jesus Christ is presented as priest and sacrifice. Many modern writers (cf Sanday and Headlam), therefore, object that to make Him the "mercy-seat" here complicates the figure still further, and so would understand hilastērion as "expiatory sacrifice." While this is not impossible, it is better to take the word in the usual sense of "mercy-seat." It is not necessary to complicate the illustration by bringing in the idea of priest at all here, since Paul does not do so; mercy-seat and sacrifice are both in Christ. ἱλασμός, hilasmós, is found in the NT only in 1 Jn 2 2; 4 10. Here the idea is active grace, or mercy, or friendliness. The teaching corresponds exactly with that in Rom. "Jesus Christ the righteous" is our "Advocate [m "Helper"] with the Father," because He is active mercy concerning (περὶ, peri) our sins and those of the whole world. Or (4 10), God "loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for [active mercy concerning] our sins." This last passage is parallel with Rom 3 25, the one dealing with the abstract theory, and so Christ is set forward as a "mercy-seat," the other dealing with experience of grace, and so Christ is the mercy of God in concrete expression.

The basal idea in Heb terms is that of covering what is offensive, so restoring friendship, or causing to be kindly disposed. The Gr terms lack the physical reference to covering but introduce the idea of friendliness where antagonism

2. Theological Implication would be natural; hence graciousness. Naturally, therefore, the idea of expiation entered into the concept. It is esp. to be noted that all provisions for this friendly relation as between God and offending man find their initiation and provision in God and are under His direction, but involve the active response of man. All heathen and unworthy conceptions are removed from the Christian notion of propitiation by the fact that God Himself proposed, or "set forth," Christ as the "mercy-seat," and that this is the supreme expression of ultimate love. God had all the while been merciful, friendly, "passing over" man's sins with no apparently adequate, or just, ground for doing so. Now in the blood of Christ sin is condemned and expiated, and God is able to establish and maintain His character for righteousness, while He continues and extends His dealing in gracious love with sinners who exercise faith in Jesus. The propitiation originates with God, not to appease Himself, but to justify Himself in His uniform kindness to men deserving harshness. Cf also as to reconciliation, as in Rom 5 1-11; 2 Cor 5 18 ff. See also JOHANNINE THEOLOGY, V, 2.

PROPORTION, prō-pōr'shun: Occurs once in the sense of "space" as the tr of מַעַר, ma'ar, "void or open space" (1 K 7 36, AVm "Heb 'nakedness,'" RV "space"); once in the obsolete sense of "form" as the tr of עֲרֵכָה, "array," or "row" (Job 41 12, RV "frame"); and once in the sense of "measure" as the tr of ἀναλογία, "proportion," "equality" (Rom 12 6, "the proportion of faith," RV "the proportion of our faith"). "Proportionally" occurs in Wisd 13 5, analogōs, RV "in like proportion," m "correspondently."

PROSELYTE, pros'ē-lit (προσήλυτος, proshēlytos, from prosērchomai, "I approach"): Found 4 t in the NT. In the LXX it often occurs as the tr of גֵּר, gēr. The Heb vb. gūr means "to sojourn"; gēr accordingly means a stranger who has come to settle in the land, as distinguished on the one hand from עֲזָרָה, "a homeborn" or "native," and on the other from נֹכְחִי or בֶּן-נֹכְחָר, which means a stranger who is only passing through the country. Yet it is to be noted that in 2 Ch 2 17 those of the native tribes still living in the land as Amorites, Hittites, etc. are also called gērīm. In two places (Ex 12 19; Isa 14 1) LXX uses gleiōdras, which is derived from giyōr, the Aram. equivalent for gēr. LXX uses pároikos (the Gr equivalent for Heb תֹּשָׁבֵת, "a settler") for gēr when Israel or the patriarchs are indicated (Gen 15 13; 23 4; Ex 2 22; 18 3; Dt 23 7; 1 Ch 29 15; Ps 39 12; 119 19; Jer 14 8), and in a few other cases. In Talmudical lit. gēr always stands for proselyte in the NT sense, i.e. a Gentile who has been converted to Judaism. Onkelos, who was himself a proselyte, always translates the word in this way.

No difficulties were put in the way of those strangers who wished to settle down in the land of Israel. All strangers, the third gen-

1. Gēr in the OT eration of Egyptians and Edomites included, and only Ammonites and Moabites excluded, could enter "the congregation of God" without circumcision and without the obligation to keep the ceremonial law.

'The stranger within the gate' was free to eat meat which was prohibited to the Israelite (Dt 14 21). If, however, the stranger wished to take part in the Passover, a feast permeated with national ideals, he must be circumcised. The keeping of the Sabbath and other feasts was regarded rather as a privilege than as a duty (Ex 23 12; Dt 16 11.14); but according to Lev 16 29 the gēr was obliged to keep the fast of Atonement. He was forbidden on pain of death to blaspheme (Lev 24 16) or to offer children to Molech (Lev 20 2). If he desired to bring a burnt offering, the same law applied to him as to the Israelites (Lev 17 8; 22 18). Though the law of circumcision was not forced upon the gēr, it seems that the Mosaic Law endeavored to bring him nearer to the cult of Israel, not from any proselytizing motives, but in order to preserve the theocracy from admixture of foreign elements, which would speedily have proved fatal to its existence.

Though the God of Israel, when He is thought of only as such, ceases to be God; though Israel was chosen before all nations for all nations; though Israel had been again and again reminded that the Messiah would bring a blessing to all nations; and though there were instances of pagans coming to believe in Jeh, yet it did not belong to the economy of OT religion to spread the knowledge of God directly among the Gentiles (the Book of Jon is an exception to this). There was certainly no active propagandism. Though we read in Neh 10 28 of those who "separated themselves from the peoples of the lands unto the law of God" (cf Isa 56 3, "the foreigner, that hath joined himself to Jeh"—the only and exact description of a proselyte proper in the OT), the spirit of exclusiveness prevailed; the doubtful elements were separated (Ezr 4 3); mixed marriages were prohibited by the chiefs, and were afterward disapproved of by the people (Ezr 9, 10; Neh 13 23 ff). Direct proselytism did not begin till about a century later.

The preaching of the gospel was preceded and prepared for by the dispersion of the Jews, and a world-wide propagandism of Judaism.

2. Prose-lytizing In the 5th cent. BC the Jews had a temple of their own at Syene. Alexander the Great settled 8,000 Jews in the Thebais, and Jews formed a third of the population of Alexandria. Large numbers were brought from Pal by Ptolemy I (320 BC), and they gradually spread from Egypt along the whole Mediterranean coast of Africa. After the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (170 BC) they scattered themselves in every direction, and, in the words of the Sibylline Oracles (c 160 BC), "crowded with their numbers every ocean and country." There was hardly a seaport or a commercial center in Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece, or the Islands of the Ægean, in which Jewish communities were not to be found. Jos (Ant, XIV, vii, 2) quotes Strabo as saying: "It is hard to find a place in the habitable earth that hath not admitted this tribe of men, and is not possessed by them." Thus, in spite of the hatred and contempt which Judaism everywhere excited, its lofty, austere and spiritual religious aspirations and conceptions became known to the pagan world and exercised a profound attraction upon many souls that were deeply dissatisfied with contemporary religions. Judaism was at that period filled with missionary zeal and aspired to world-mastery. Many books on Judaism (e.g. the Sibylline Oracles) were written anonymously by Jews in order to influence pagan readers. The synagogue, which had become the center of Jewish worship, now opened its doors widely to the pagan world (cf Acts 15 21), and many of the sermons delivered there were directly aimed at the conversion of pagans. The Jews began to feel that they were "a guide of the blind, a light of them that are in darkness" (Rom 2 19).

Not only Jos (Cap, II; BJ, VII, iii, 3), but also Seneca (Apud Aug. De Civit. Dei vi.11), Dio Cassius (xxxvii.17), Tacitus (Ann. ii.85; Hist. v.5), Horace (Sat. i.4, 142), Juvenal (Sat. xiv.96 ff), and other Gr and Rom writers testify to the widespread effects of the proselytizing propaganda of the Jews.

Many gladly frequented the synagogues and kept some of the Jewish laws and customs. Among those were to be found the "men who feared God," spoken of in Acts. They were so called to distinguish them from full proselytes; and it was probably for this class that tablets of warning in the temple were inscribed in Gr and Lat.

Another class kept practically all the Jewish laws and customs, but were not circumcised. Some again, though not circumcised, had their children circumcised (Juvenal Sat. xiv.96 ff). Such Jewish customs as fasting, cleansings, abstaining from pork, lighting the candles on Friday evening, and keeping the Sabbath (Jos, Cap, II, 29, etc) were observed by these gentile sympathizers. Schürer holds that there were congregations of Greeks and Romans in Asia Minor, and probably in Rome, which, though they had no connection with the synagogue, formed themselves into gatherings after the pattern of the synagogue, and observed some of the Jewish customs.

Among the converts to Judaism there were probably few who were circumcised, and most of those who were circumcised submitted to the rite in order to marry Jewesses, or to enjoy the rights and privileges granted to the Jews by Syrian, Egypt and Rom rulers (Jos, Ant, XIV, vii, 2; XX, vii, 1; cf XVI, vii, 6). It would appear from Christ's words (Mt 23 15, "one proselyte") that the number of full proselytes was not large. Hyrcanus forced the Edomites to adopt Judaism by circumcision (129 BC); and on other occasions the same policy of propagandism by force was followed. Jos tells an interesting story (Ant, XX, ii, 1) of the conversion of Queen Helena of Adiabene and her two sons. The conversion of the sons was due to the teaching of a merchant called Ananias, who did not insist on circumcision. Later, another Jew, Eliezer of Galilee, told the young princes that it was not enough to read the Law, but that they must keep it too, with the result that both were circumcised. From this it is evident that Jewish teachers of the gentile converts varied in the strictness of their teaching.

The word "proselyte" occurs 4 t in the NT; once in Mt (23 15), where Our Lord refers to the proselytizing zeal of the Pharisees, and

3. Prose-lytes in the NT exerted on their converts; and 3 t in Acts. Proselytes were present at Pentecost (Acts 2 10); Nicolas, one of the deacons appointed by the primitive church at Jerus, was a proselyte (6 5); and after Paul had spoken in the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia, many devout proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas (13 43). It is to be noted in this last case that the proselytes are called sebōmenoi, a word generally reserved for another class. Certain people are spoken of in Acts as phoboumenoi tōn theōn, "fearing God" (10 2.22.35; 13 16.26), and as sebōmenoi tōn theōn, "reverencing God," or simply sebōmenoi (13 50; 16 14; 17 4.17; 18 7). These seem (as against Bertholet and EB) to have been sympathizers with Judaism, who attended the worship of the synagogue, but were not circumcised. It was among this class that the gospel made its first converts among the Gentiles. Those who were fully proselytes were probably as fanatical opponents of Christianity as were the Jews.

From the old strict Pharisaic-Palestinian point of view, circumcision, with the addition of baptism and the offering of sacrifice, was indispensable (so to Paul every circumcised person was a Jew; cf Gal 5 3); and thus their converts had to submit to the whole burden of the Mosaic and traditional Law. The rabbinic distinction between gēr tōshābh, "a settler," and gēr ḥedhek, "a proselyte of righteousness," is, according to Schürer, only theoretical, and arose at a later date (Bābhā' M'ḥī'ā' 5 6.9.12; Makkōth 2 3; N'ghā'im 3 1, et al.).

While the gēr ḥedhek (or gēr ha-brith, "proselyte of the covenant") was considered as being in every respect a "perfect Israelite," the gēr tōshābh (or gēr sha'ar, "proselyte of the gate"; cf Ex 20 10) only professed his faith in the God of Israel, and bound himself to the observance of the 7 Noachic precepts, abstinence from blasphemy, idolatry, homicide, fornication, robbery, eating the flesh of an animal that had died a natural death, and disobedience to (Jewish) authority (Sanh. 56a; cf Acts 15 20.29; 21 25). He was considered more of a Gentile than a Jew.

Three things were required for the admission of a proselyte, circumcision, baptism, and the offering of sacrifice (B'r. 47b; Y'bhām. 45b, 46a, 48b, 76a; 'Ābhōth 57a, et al.). In the case of women only baptism and the offering of sacrifice were required; for that reason there were more women converts than men. Jos (BJ, II, xx, 2) tells how most of the women of Damascus were addicted to the Jewish religion. Doubt has been expressed as to the necessity of proselytes being baptized, since there is no mention of it by Paul or Philo or Jos, but it is probable that a Gentile, who was unclean, would not be admitted to the temple without being cleansed.

The proselyte was received in the following manner. He was first asked his reason for wishing to embrace Judaism. He was told that Israel was in a state of affliction; if he replied that he was aware of the fact and felt himself unworthy to share these afflictions, he was admitted. Then he received instruction in some of the "light" and "heavy" commandments, the rules concerning gleanings and tithes, and the penalties attached to the breach of the commandments. If he was willing to submit to all this, he was circumcised, and after his recovery he was immersed without delay. At this latter ceremony two "disciples of the wise" stood by to tell him more of the "light" and "heavy" commandments. When he came up after the immersion, those assembled addressed him saying: "Unto whom hast thou given thyself? Blessed art thou, thou hast given thyself to God; the world was created for the sake of Israel, and only Israelites are called the children of God. The afflictions, of which we spoke, we mentioned only to make thy reward the greater." After his baptism he was considered to be a new man, "a little child newly born" (Y'bhām. 22a, 47a, 48b, 97b); a new name was given him; either he was named "Abraham the son of Abraham," or the Scriptures were opened at hazard, and the first name that was read was given to him. Thenceforth he had to put behind him all his past; even his marriage ties and those of kinship no longer held good (cf Y'bhām. 22a; Sanh. 58b).

Although he was thus juridically considered a new man, and one whose praises were sung in the Talmudical literature, he was yet on the whole looked down on as inferior to a born Jew (Kidd. 4 7; Sh'bhū'ōth 10 9, et al.). Rabbi Chelbo said: "Proselytes are as injurious to Israel as a scab" (Y'bhām. 47b; Kidd. 70b; cf Phil 3 5). See also STRANGER.

PROVE, prōōv (בָּחַן, bāhan, נָסָה, nāsāh; δοκιμάζω, dokimázō, πειράζω, peirázō): Means (1) to test or try; (2) to establish, demonstrate; (3) to find by experience. It is for the most part in the first (original) sense that the word is found in Scripture. In the OT it is most frequently the tr of nāsāh, primarily "to lift" hence to weigh (Gen 42 15.16, etc.). God is said to "prove" His people, i.e. to test or try them for their good (Gen 22 1; Ex 15 25; Dt 8 16, etc.). The Psalmist prays that God may prove him (Ps 26 2). The word is frequently rendered "tempt." See TEMPT. The word bāhan, primarily "to try by heat," has a similar meaning (Ps 17 3, the heart, like metal, purified from dross; cf Job 23 10; Ps 7 9; Mal 3 2, etc.). In the NT the word most frequently rendered "prove" (sometimes "try") is dokimázō (Lk 14 19; Rom 12 2; 2 Cor 8 8.22; 13 5; Eph 5 10; 1 Thess 5 21). Peirázō, "to tempt," "to prove," used in both a good and a bad sense, frequently tr'd "tempt" (q.v.), is rendered "prove" in Jn 6 6, "This he said to prove him." Both Gr words occur frequently in Apoc (Wisd and Ecclus). RV has "prove" for "tempt" (Gen 22 1); for "make" (Job 24 25; Gal 2 18); for "manifest" (Eccl 3 18); for "examine" (1 Cor 11 28); for "try" (1 Cor 3 13; 1 Jn 4 1), etc.

By this term mainly, but sometimes by the term "parable" (e.g. Nu 23 7.18; 24 3.15; Job 27 1; 29 1), is tr'd the Heb word māshāl (משל), which designates the formal unit or vehicle of didactic discourse. The māshāl was an enunciation of truth, self-evident and self-illustrative, in some pointed or concentrated form adapted to arrest attention, awaken responsive thought, and remain fixed in memory. Its scope was broader than that of our word "proverb," taking in subject-matter as well as form. The māshāl broadened indeed in the course of its history, until it became the characteristic idiom of Heb philosophy, as distinguished from the dialectic method of the Greeks. The Heb mind was not inductive but intuitive; it saw and asserted; and the word māshāl is the generic term for the form in which its assertion was embodied.

I. Folk Meaning and Use.—The māshāl, nearly in our sense of proverb, traces back to the heart and life of the common folk; it is a native

1. The Primitive Sense form reflecting in a peculiarly intimate way the distinctive genius of the Heb people. As to the primitive sense of the word, it is usually traced to a root meaning "likeness," or "comparison," as if the first sense of it were of the principle of analogy underlying it; but this derivation is a guess. The word is just as likely to be connected with the vb. māshal, "to rule" or "master"; so by a natural secondary meaning to denote that statement which gives the decisive or final verdict, says the master word. The idea of how the thing is said, or by what phrasing, would be a later differentiation, coming in with literary refinement.

The earliest cited proverb (1 S 10 12, repeated with varied occasion, 1 S 19 24) seems to have risen spontaneously from the people's

2. The Communal Origin observation. That Saul the son of Kish, whose very different temperament everybody knew, should be susceptible to the wild ecstasy of strolling prophets was an astonishing thing, as it were a discovery in psychology; "Therefore it became a proverb, Is Saul also among the prophets?" A few years later David, explaining his clemency in sparing the life of the king who has become his deadly foe, quotes from a folk fund of proverbs: 1 S 24 13, "As saith the proverb of the ancients, Out of the wicked cometh forth wickedness; but my hand shall not be upon thee." The prophet Ezekiel quotes a proverb which evidently embodies a popular belief: "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth"; which he corrects to, "The days are at hand, and the fulfilment of every vision" (Ezk 12 22.23). Both Ezekiel and Jeremiah (Ezk 18 2; Jer 31 29) quote the same current proverb, "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge," in order to announce that the time has come for its discontinuance. These last two examples are very instructive. They show how the body of the people put the inwardness of their history into proverb form, as it were a portable lesson for the times; they show also how the prophets availed themselves of these floating sayings to point their own message. Ezekiel seems indeed to recognize the facility with which a situation may bring forth a proverb: Ezk 16 44, "Every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb against thee [lit. every one that māshals shall māshal against thee], saying, As is the mother, so is her daughter."

One element of the proverb, which a wide-awake people like the Hebrews would soon discover, was its adaptability for personal portrayal

3. Animus of Proverbs or satire, like a home thrust. Hence the popular use of the name māshāl came to connote its animus, generally of sarcasm or scorn. The taunting verse raised against Heshbon, Nu 21 27-30, is attributed to them "that speak in proverbs" (m'shālīm); and Isaiah's taunt in his burden of Babylon (Isa 14 4-20) is composed in the proverb measure: "Thou shalt take up this parable [māshāl, AV "proverb"] against the king of Babylon." Answering to this prevailing animus of proverbs was a corresponding susceptibility to their sting and rankle; they were the kind of utterance that most surely found the national and individual self-consciousness. To be a proverb—to be in everybody's mouth as a subject of laughter, or as a synonym for some awful atrocity—was about the most dreadful thing that could befall them. To be "a reproach and a proverb, a taunt and a curse" (Jer 24 9) was all one. That this should be the nation's fate was held as a threat over them by lawgiver and prophet (Dt 28 37; 1 K 9 7); and in adversities of experience, both individual and collective, the thing that was most keenly felt was to have become a byword (māshāl) (Ps 44 14; 69 11).

II. Literary Development of the Proverb.—The rank of proverb was by no means attributed to

1. Discovery of Literary Value every popular saying, however the people might set store by it. If its application was merely local (e.g. 2 S 20 18; Gen 22 14) or temporary (note how Jeremiah and Ezekiel announce popular sayings as obsolete), it remained in its place and time. About the proverb, on the other hand, there was the sense of a value universal and permanent, fitting it for literary immortality. Nor was the proverb itself a run-wild thing, at the shaping of the crowd; from the beginning it was in the hands of "those who speak in m'shālīm," whose business it was to put it into skilful wording. The popular proverb, however, and the literary proverb were and continued two different things. There came a time, in the literary development of Israel, when the value of the māshāl as a vehicle of instruction came to be recognized; from which time a systematic cultivation of this type of discourse began. That time, as seems most probable, was the reign of King Solomon, when in a special degree the people awoke to the life and industry and intercourse and wealth of the world around them. The king himself was 'large hearted' (1 K 4 29), versatile, with literary tastes; "spake three thousand proverbs; and his songs were a thousand and five"; and his whole generation, both in Israel and surrounding nations, was engaged in a vigorous movement of thought and "wisdom" (see the whole passage, 1 K 4 29-34). For the unit and vehicle of this new thought the old native form of the māshāl or proverb was chosen; it became the recognized medium of popular education and counsel, esp. of the young; and the māshāl itself was molded to the classic form, condensed, pointed, aphoristic, which we see best exemplified in the Book of Prov 10-22 16—probably the earliest collection of this kind of literature. In this body of proverbs we see also that instead of retaining the unbalanced single assertion of the popular proverb, as it appears in 1 S 10 12; 24 13, these composers of literary proverbs borrowed the poetic parallelism, or couplet, which in two lines sets two statements over against each other by antithesis or repetition, and cultivated this to its most condensed and epigrammatic construction. Thus the māshāl took to itself a literary self-consciousness and became a work of art.

Up to the time of this literary development a proverb was recognized simply as a proverb, with little sense of its various phases, except

2. The Differentiation—that there was a strong popular tendency to identify it with satire, and with less thought of the elements of its life and power. With the refinement of form, however, came a recognition of its inwardness. Under the generic term māshāl, certain elements were differentiated; not, however, as we are wont to distinguish—parable, fable, apologue, allegory—these remained undifferentiated. The most fundamental distinction of classes, perhaps, is given in Prov 1 6: "To understand a proverb, and a figure, the words of the wise, and their dark sayings." Here it seems the word "proverb" (māshāl) and "words of the wise," paired off with each other, are the generic terms; the other two, the differentiating terms, name respectively the two fundamental directions of the māshāl, toward the clear and toward the enigmatic. Both are essential elements. The word tr^d "figure" (מְלִיצָה, m'liṣāh) is rather "interpretation," and seems to refer to the illuminative element of the māshāl, and this was mainly analogy. Natural objects, phases of experience, contrasts were drawn into the māshāl to furnish analogies for life; Solomon's use of plants and animals in his discourses (1 K 4 33) was not by way of natural history, but as analogies to illustrate his m'shālīm. The word tr^d "dark sayings" (חֵידוֹת, h'hdōth) is the word elsewhere tr^d "riddle" (Samson's riddle, for instance, was a h'hdāh, Jgs 14 13,14), and refers to that quality of the proverb which, by challenging the hearer's acumen, gives it zest; it is due to an association of things so indirectly related that one must supply intermediate thoughts to resolve them. All of this of course goes to justify the proverb as a capital vehicle for instruction and counsel; it has the elements that appeal to attention, responsive thought, and memory, while on the other hand its basis of analogy makes it illuminative.

III. As Unit of a Strain of Literature.—Until it reached its classic perfection of phrasing, say during the time from Solomon to

1. From Detachment to Continuity—Hezekiah, the formal development of the proverb was concentrative; the single utterance disposed of its whole subject, as in a capsule. But the development of the māshāl form from the antithetic to the synonymous couplet gave rise to a proverb in which the explanatory member did not fully close the case; the subject craved further elucidation, and so a group of several couplets was sometimes necessary to present a case (cf. g. about the sluggard, Prov 26 13-16). From this group of proverbs the transition was easy to a continuous passage, in which the snappy parallelism of the proverb yields to the flow of poetry; see e.g. Prov 27 23-27. This is due evidently to a more penetrative and analytic mode of thinking, which can no longer satisfy its statement of truth in a single illustration or maxim.

As the store of detached utterances on various phases of practical life accumulated and the task of collecting them was undertaken, it

2. The Conception of Wisdom—was seen that they had a common suffusion and bearing, that in fact they constituted a distinctive strain of literature. The field of this literature was broad, and recognized (see Prov 1 1-5) as promotive of many intellectual virtues; but the inclusive name under which it was gathered was Wisdom (חֵכְמָה, hokhmāh). Wisdom, deduced thus from a fund of maxims and analogies, became the Heb equivalent for philosophy. With the further history of it this article is not concerned, except to note that the māshāl or proverb form held itself free to expand into a continuous and extended discourse, or to hold itself in to the couplet form. As to illustrative quality, too, its scope was liberal enough to include a fully developed parable; see for instance Ezk 17 1-10, where the prophet is bidden to "put forth a riddle, and speak a parable [lit. māshal a māshāl] unto the house of Israel."

The existence of so considerable a body of proverbs is a testimony to the Heb genius for sententious and weighty expression, a virtue of speech which was held in special esteem. From the uses of practical wisdom the māshāl form was borrowed by the later scribes and doctors of the law; we see it for instance in loose and artificial use in such books as Pirkē 'Ābhōth, which gives the impression that the utterance so grandly represented in the Solomonic proverbs had become decadent. It is in another direction rather that the virtues of the māshāl reach their culmination. In the phrasal felicity and illustrative lucidity of Our Lord's discourses, and not less in His parables, employed that the multitude "may see and yet not see" (Mk 4 12), we have the values of the ancient māshāl in their perfection, in a literary form so true to its object that we do not think of its artistry at all. The Scripture book which in both the Heb and the Gr arrangements of the OT Canon immediately succeeds the Ps. In the Heb Canon it stands second in the final or supplementary division called kt'ūbhīm (LXX Παροιμίαι, Paroimiai), "writings"; placed there probably because it would be most natural to begin this section with standard collections nearest at hand, which of course would be psalms and proverbs. This book is an anthology of sayings or lessons of the sages on life, character, conduct; and as such embodies the distinctively educative strain of Heb literature.

I. The Book's Account of Itself.—At the beginning, intended apparently to cover the whole work, stands the title: "The proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Israel." It seemed good to the compilers, however, to repeat, or perhaps retain an older heading, "The proverbs of Solomon" at ch 10, as if in some special sense the collection there beginning deserved it; and at ch 25 still another heading occurs: "These also are proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out." All these ascribe the proverbs to Solomon; but the heading (30 1), "The words of Agur the son of Jakeh; the oracle," and the heading (31 1), "The words of king Lemuel; the oracle which his mother taught him," indicate that authorship other than that of Solomon is represented; while the mention of "the words of the wise" (1 6; 22 17), as also the definite heading, "These also are sayings of the wise" (24 23), ascribe parts of the book to the sages in general. The book is confessedly a series of compilations made at different times; confessedly, also, to a considerable extent at least, the work of a number, perhaps a whole guild, of writers.

It is hazardous to argue either for or against a specific authorship; nor is it my intention to do so.

2. Authorship or Literary Species?

The question naturally arises, however, in what sense this book, with its composite structure so outspoken, can lay claim to being the work of Solomon. Does the title refer to actual personal authorship, or does it name a species and type of literature of which Solomon was the originator and inspirer—as if it meant to say "the Solomonic proverbs"? We may work toward the answer of this question by noting some literary facts.

Outside of the prophets only three of the OT books are provided in the original text with titles; and these three are all associated with Solomon—two of them, Prov and the Song of Songs, directly; the third, Eccl, by an assumed name, which, however, personates Solomon. This would seem to indicate in the composition of these books an unusual degree of literary finish and self-consciousness, a sense on the part of writers or compilers that literature as an art has its claims upon them. The subject-matter of the books, too, bears this out; they are, relatively speaking, the secular books of the Bible and do not assume Divine origin, as do law and prophecy. For the original impulse to such literary culture the history directs us to the reign of King Solomon; see 1 K 4 29-34, where is portrayed, on the part of king and court, an intense intellectual activity for its own sake, the like of which occurs nowhere else in Scripture. The forms then esp. impressed upon the literature were the māshāl (proverb) and the song, in both of which the versatile young king was proficient; cf 1 K 4 32. For the cultivation of the māshāl these men of letters availed themselves of a favorite native form, the popular proverb; but they gave to it a literary mold and finish which would thenceforth distinguish it as the Solomonic māshāl (see PROVERB). This then was the literary form in which from the time of Solomon onward the sages of the nation put their counsels of life, character, conduct; it became as distinctively the mold for this didactic strain of literature as was the heroic couplet for a similar strain in the age of Dryden and Pope.

It is reasonable therefore to understand this title of the Book of Prov as designating rather a literary species than a personal authorship; it names this anthology of Wisdom in its classically determined phrasing, and for age and authorship leaves a field spacious enough to cover the centuries of its currency. Perhaps also the proverb of this type was by the term "of Solomon" differentiated from māshāls of other types, as for instance those of Balaam and Job and Koheleth.

II. The Successive Compilations.—That the Book of Prov is composed of several collections made at different times is a fact that lies

1. The Introductory Section at the surface; as many as eight of these are clearly marked, and perhaps subdivisions might be made. The book was not originally conceived as the development of a theme, or even as a unity; whatever unity it has was an afterthought. That it did come to stand, however, for one homogeneous body of truth, and to receive a name and a degree of articulation as such, will be maintained in a later section (see III, below). Meanwhile, we will take the sections in order and note some of the salient characteristics of each. The introductory section, chs 1-9, has the marks of having been added later than most of the rest; and is introductory in the sense of concentrating the thought to the concept of Wisdom, and of recommending the spiritual attitude in which it is to be received. Its style—and in this it is distinguished from the rest of the book —is hortatory; it is addressed to "my son" (1 8 and often) or "my sons" (4 1; 5 7; 7 24; 8 32), in the tone of a father or a sage, bringing stores of wisdom and experience to the young. The first six verses are prefatory, giving the purpose and use of the whole book. Then ver 7 lays down as the initial point, or spiritual bedrock of Wisdom, the fear of Jeh, a principle repeated toward the end of this introductory section (9 10), and evidently regarded as very vital to the whole Wisdom system; cf Job 28 28; Ps 111 10; Sir 1 14. The effect of this prefatory and theme-propounding matter is to launch the collection of proverbs much after the manner of modern literary works, and the rest of the section bears this out fairly well. The most striking feature of the section, besides its general homiletic tone, is its personification of Wisdom. She is represented as calling to the sons of men and commending to them her ways (1 20-33; 8 1-21, 32-36); she condescends, for right and purity's sake, to enter into rivalry with the "strange woman," the temptress, not in secret, but in open and fearless dealing (7 6-8 9; 9 1-6, 13-18); and, in a supremely poetic passage (8 22-31), she describes her relation from the beginning with God and with the sons of men. It represents the value that the Heb mind came to set upon the human endowment of Wisdom. The Heb philosopher thought not in terms of logic and dialectics, but in symbol and personality; and to this high rank, almost like that of a goddess, his imagination has exalted the intellectual and spiritual powers of man. See WISDOM.

The section 10 1-22 16, with the repeated heading "The proverbs of Solomon," seems to have been the original nucleus of the whole collection. All the proverbs in this, Classic Nucleus the longest section of the book, are molded strictly to the couplet form (the one triplet, 19 7, being only an apparent exception, due probably to the loss of a line), each proverb a parallelism in condensed phrasing, in which the second line gives either some contrast to or some amplification of the first. This was doubtless the classic art norm of the Solomonic māshāl.

The section seems to contain the product of that period of proverb-culture during which the sense of the model was a little rigid and severe, not venturing yet to lurch up the form. Signs of a greater freedom, however, begin to appear, and possibly two strata of compilation are represented. In chs 10-15 the prevailing couplet is antithetic, which embodies the most self-closed circuit of the thought. Out of 184 proverbs only 19 do not contain some form of contrast, and 10 of these are in ch 15. In 16-22 16, on the other hand, the prevailing form is the so-called synonymous or amplified couplet, which leaves the thought-circuit more open to illustrative additions. Out of 191 proverbs only 18 are antithetic, and these contain contrasts of a more subtle and hidden suggestion. As to subject-matter, the whole section is miscellaneous; in the first half, however, where the antithesis prevails, are the great elemental distinctions of life, wisdom and folly, righteousness and wickedness, industry and laziness, wise speech and reticence, and the like; while in the second half there is a decided tendency to go farther afield for subtler and less obvious distinctions. In this way they seem to reflect a growing and refining literary development, the gradual shaping and accumulation of materials for a philosophy of life; as yet, however, not articulated or reduced to unity of principle.

In the short section 22 17-24 22, the proverb literature seems for the first time to have become as

3. A Body of Solicited Counsel it were self-conscious—to regard itself as a strain of wise counsel to be reckoned with for its educative value. The section is introduced by a preface (22 17-21), in which these "words of the wise" are recommended to some person or delegation, "that thou mayest carry back words of truth to them that send thee" (22 21). The counsels seem intended for persons in responsible position, perhaps attached to the court (cf 23 1-3), who, as they are to deal officially with men and affairs, need the prudence, purity, and temperance which will fit them for their duties. As to form, the detached couplet appears only occasionally; the favorite form is the quatrain; but proverbs of a greater number of lines are freely used, and one, the counsel on wine drinking (23 29-35), runs to 17 lines. In tone and specific counsel the section has many resemblances to the introductory section (chs 1-9), and provokes the conjecture that this latter section, as the introduction to a compiled body of Wisdom, was composed not long after it.

The little appendix (24 23-34) is headed, "These also are sayings of the wise." They refer to wise intercourse and ordered industry.

4. Some Left-over Precepts The little poem on the sluggard (24 30-34), with its refrain (vs 33,34), is noteworthy as being apparently one stanza of a poem which is completed with the same refrain in the introductory section (6 6-11). The stanzas are of the same length and structure; and it would seem the latter named was either discovered later or composed as a supplement to the one in this section.

The long section (chs 25-29) is headed, "These also are proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out."

5. The Hezekian Collection The collection claims to be only a compilation; but if, as already suggested, we understand the term "proverbs of Solomon" as equivalent to "Solomonic proverbs," referring rather to species than personal authorship, the compilation may have been made not merely from antiquity, but from the archives of the Wisdom guilds. If so, we have a clue to the state of the Wisdom literature in Hezekiah's time. The collection as a whole, unlike secs. 3 and 4, returns predominantly to the classic form of the couplet, but with a less degree of compression and epigram. There is a tendency to group numbers of proverbs on like subjects; note for instance the group on the king (25 2-7). The most striking feature of the collection is the prevalence of simile and analogy, and in general the strong figurative coloring, esp. in chs 25-27; it reads like a new species of proverb when we note that in all the earlier Solomonic sections there are only two clearly defined similes (10 26; 11 22). In chs 25-27 are several proverbs of three, four, or five lines, and at the end (27 23-27) a charming little poem of ten lines on husbandry. Chs 28, 29 are entirely of couplets, and the antithetic proverb reappears in a considerable number. As to subject-matter, the thought of this section makes a rather greater demand on the reader's culture and thinking powers, the analogies being less obvious, more subtle. It is decidedly the reflection of a more literary age than that of sec. 2.

Ch 30 is taken up with "the words of Agur the son of Jakeh," a person otherwise unknown, who disclaims expert knowledge of Wisdom

6. Words of Agur (30 3), and avows an agnostic attitude toward theological speculations, yet shows a tender reverence before the name and unplumbed mystery of Jeh (vs 6.9.32). His words amount to a plea against a too adventurous, not to say presumptuous, spirit in the supposed findings of human Wisdom, and as such supply a useful makeweight to the mounting pride of the scholar. Yet over this peculiar plea is placed the word "Massa" (מַסָּא, ha-massā), "burden" or "oracle," the term used for prophetic disclosures; and the word for "said" ("the man said," נָאֵם הַגִּבּוֹר, n'um ha-gebher) is the word elsewhere used for mystic or Divine utterance. This seems to mark a stage in the self-consciousness of Wisdom when it was felt that its utterances could be ranked by the side of prophecy as a revelation of truth (cf what Wisdom says of herself, 8 14), and could claim the authoritative term "oracle." For the rest, apart from the humble reverence with which they are imbued, these words of Agur do not rise to a high level of spiritual thinking; they tend rather to the riddling element, or "dark sayings" (cf 1 6). The form of his proverbs is peculiar, verging indeed on the artificial; he deals mostly in the so-called numerical proverb ("three things . . . yea, four"), a style of utterance paralleled elsewhere only in 6 16-19, but something of a favorite in the later cryptic sayings of the scribes, as may be seen in Pirkē 'Abhōih.

31 1-9 (possibly the whole chapter should be included) is headed, "The words of king Lemuel; the oracle which his mother taught

7. Words of King Lemuel him." Here occurs again the mysterious word "oracle," which would seem to be open to the same interpretation as the one given in the previous paragraph, though some would make this otherwise unknown monarch a king of Massa, and refer to the name of one of the descendants of Ishmael (Gen 25 14), presumably a tribal designation. The Heb sages from the beginning were in rivalry and fellowship with the sages of other nations (cf 1 K 4 30.31); and in the Book of Job, the supreme reach of Wisdom utterance, all of the sages, Job included, are from countries outside of Pal. King Lemuel, if an actual personage, was not a Jew; and probably Agur was not. The words of Lemuel are a mother's plea to her royal son for chastity, temperance and justice, the kingly virtues. The form is the simple Heb parallelism, not detached couplets, but continuous.

The Book of Prov ends in a manner eminently worthy of its high standard of sanity and wisdom.

8. An Acrostic Eulogy of Woman Without any heading (it may possibly belong to the "oracle" that the mother of Lemuel taught her son) the last 22 verses (31 10-31) constitute a single poem in praise of a worthy woman, extolling esp. her household virtues.

In form these verses begin in the original with the successive 22 letters of the Heb alphabet; a favorite form of Heb verse, as may be seen (in the original) in several of the pss, notably Ps 119, and in chs 1-4 of the Book of Lam.

III. Movement toward a Philosophy.—It has been much the fashion with modern critics to deny to the Hebrews a truly philosophic mind; this they say was rather the distinctive gift of the Greeks; while for their solution of the problem of life the Hebrews depended on direct revelation from above, which precluded that quasi-abeyance of concepts, that weighing of cosmic and human elements, involved in the commonly received notion of philosophy. This criticism takes account of only one side of the Heb mind. It is true they believed their life to be in direct contact with the will and word of Jeh, revealed to them in terms which could not be questioned; but in the findings and deliverance of their own intellectual powers, too, they had a reliance and confidence which merits the name of an authentic philosophy. But theirs was a philosophy not of speculative world-making, but of conduct and the practical management of life; and it was intuitive and analogical, not the result of dialectical reasoning. Hence its name wisdom, the solution itself, rather than philosophy, the love of wisdom, the search for solution. This Book of Prov, beginning with detached maxims on the elements of conduct, reveals in many suggestive ways the gradual emergence of a philosophy, a comprehensive wisdom, as it were, in the making; it is thus the pioneer book of that Heb Wisdom which we see developed to maturer things in the books of Job and Eccl. Some of its salient stages may here be traced.

We may first note it, or the literary preparation for it, in the opening up of the māshāl, or proverb unit, toward added elements of illustration, explanation, amplitude, a development that begins to appear, in the oldest section (the classic nucleus, sec. 2) at about ch 16. The primitive antithetic māshāl contrasted two aspects of truth in such a way as to leave the case closed; there was nothing for it but to go on to a new subject. This had the good effect of setting over against each other the great elemental antagonisms of life: righteousness and wickedness, obedience and lawlessness, teachableness and perversity, industry and laziness, prudence and presumption, reticence and prating, etc. and so far forth it was a masterly analysis of the essentials of individual and social conduct. As soon, however, as the synonymous and illustrative māshāl prevails, we are conscious of a limbering up and greater penetrativeness of the range of thought; it is open to subtler distinctions and remoter discoveries, and the analogies tend to employ the less direct relationships of cause and effect. This is increased as we go on, esp. by the greater call upon the imagination in the figurative tissue of the Hezekian section, and by the decidedly greater tendency to the riddling and paradox element. The māshāl increases in length and amplitude, both by the grouping of similar subjects and by the enlargement from the couplet to the quatrain and the developed poem. All this, while not yet a self-conscious philosophy, is a step on the way thereto.

One solid presupposition of the sages, like an axiom, was never called in question: namely, that righteousness and wisdom are identical, that wickedness of any sort is folly.

2. Emergence of Basal Principles This imparts at once a kind of prophetic coloring to the Wisdom precepts, well represented by the opening proverb in the original section (after the prefatory one about the wise son), "Treasures of wickedness profit nothing; but righteousness delivereth from death" (Prov 10 2). Thus from the outset is furnished an uncompromising background on which the fascinating allurements of vice, the crooked ways of injustice and dishonesty, the sober habits of goodness and right dealing, show for what they are and what they tend to. The sages thus put themselves, too, in entire harmony with what is taught by priests and prophets; there is no quarrel with the law or the word; they simply supply the third strand in the threefold cord of instruction (cf Jer 18 18). From this basal presumption other principles, scarcely less axiomatic, come in view: that the fount and spring of wise living is reverence, the fear of Jeh; that the ensuring frame of mind is teachableness, the precluding attitude perverseness; that it is the mark of wisdom, or righteousness, to be fearless and above board, of wickedness, which is folly, to be crooked and secretive. These principles recur constantly, not as a system, but in numerous aspects and applications in the practical business of life. For their sanctions they refer naively to the Heb ideal of rewards on the one hand—wealth, honor, long life, family (cf Prov 11 31)—and of shame and loss and destruction on the other; but these are emphasized not as direct bestowments or inflictions from a personal Deity, rather as in the law of human nature. The law that evil works its own destruction, good brings its own reward, is forming itself in men's reason as one of the fundamental concepts out of which grew the Wisdom philosophy.

From times long before Solomon sagacity in counsel, and skill to put such counsel into maxim or parable, gave their possessor, whether man or woman, a natural leadership and repute in the local communities (cf 2 S 14 2; 20 16); and Solomon's exceptional endowment showed itself not merely in his literary tastes, but in his ability, much esteemed among Orientals, to determine the merits of cases brought before him for judgment (1 K 3 16-28), and to answer puzzling

3. The questions (1 K 10 1.6.7). It was from Conception such estimate of men's intellectual of Wisdom powers, from the recognition of mental alertness, sagacity, grasp, in their application to the practical issues of life (cf Prov 1 1-5), that the conception of Wisdom in its larger sense arose. As, however, the cultivation of such sagacity of utterance passed beyond the pastime of a royal court (cf 1 K 4 29-34) into the hands of city elders and sages, it attained to greatly enhanced value; note how the influence of such a sage is idealized (Job 29 7-25). The sages had a definite calling and mission of their own, more potent perhaps than belonged to priests and prophets; the frequent reference to the young and the "simple" or immature in the Book of Prov would indicate that they were virtually the schoolmasters and educators of the nation. As such, working as they did in a fellowship and collaboration with each other, the subject-matter with which they dealt would not remain as casual and miscellaneous maxims, but work toward a center and system of doctrine which could claim the distinction of an articulated philosophy of life, and all the more since it was so identified with the great Heb ideal of righteousness and truth. We have already noted how this sense of the dignity and value of their calling manifested itself in the body of precepts sent in response to solicitation (3 above), with its appendix (4 above) (Prov 22 17-24 34). It was not long after this stage of Wisdom-culture, I think, that a very significant new word came into their vocabulary, the word tūshiyāh (תִּישְׁיָה), a puzzle to the translators, variously rendered "sound wisdom," "effectual working," and called by the lexicographers "a technical term of the Wisdom literature," BDB, s.v.). Its earliest appearance, and the only one except in the introductory section (Prov 18 1), is where the man who separates himself from others' opinions and seeks his own desire is said to quarrel with all tūshiyāh. The word seems to designate Wisdom in its subjective aspect, as an authentic insight or intuition of truth, the human power to rise into the region of true revelation from below, as distinguished from the prophetic or legal word spoken directly from above. Outside of Prov and Job the word occurs only twice: once in Mic 6 9, and once in Isa 28 29, in which latter case the prophet has deliberately composed a passage (vs 23-29) in the characteristic māshāl idiom, and attributed that strain of insight to Jeh. Evidently there came a time in the culture of Wisdom when its utterances attained in men's estimate to a parity with utterances direct from the unseen; perhaps this explains why Agur's and Lemuel's words could be boldly ranked as oracles (see above, 6 and 7). At any rate, such a high distinction, an authority derived from intimacy with the creative work of Jeh (8 30.31), is ascribed to Wisdom (hokhmāh, הַכְּמָה) in the introductory section; "counsel is mine," Wisdom is made to say, "and tūshiyāh" (8 14). Thus the Book of Prov reveals to us a philosophy, as it were, in the making and from scattered counsels attaining gradually to the summit where the human intellect could place its findings by the side of Divine oracles.

IV. Considerations of Age and Literary Kinship.—To get at the history of the Book of Prov, several inquiries must be raised. When were the proverbs composed? The book, like the Book of Ps, is confessedly an anthology, containing various accumulations, and both by style and maturing thought bearing the marks of different ages. When were the successive compilations made? And, finally, when did the strain of literature here represented reach that point of self-conscious unity and coordination which justified its being reckoned with as a strain by itself and choosing the comprehensive name Wisdom? What makes these inquiries hard to answer is the fact that these proverbs are precepts for the common people, relating to ordinary affairs of the village, the market, and the field, and move in lines remote from politics and dynastic vicissitudes and wars. They are, to an extent far more penetrative and pervasive than law or prophecy, the educative literature on which the sturdy rank and file of the nation was nourished. 'Where there is no vision, the people let loose,' says a Hezekian proverb (Prov 29 18); but so they are also when there is no abiding tonic of social convention and principle. Precisely this latter it is which this Book of Prov in a large degree reveals; and in course of time its value was so felt that, as we have seen, it could rank itself as an asset of life by the side of vision. It represents, in a word, the human movement toward self-directiveness and self-reliance, without supine dependence on ruler or public sentiment (cf Prov 29 25, 26). When and how was this sane and wholesome communal fiber developed?

When Solomon and his court made the māshāl an elegant fad, they builded better than they knew.

They gave to the old native form of the proverb and parable, as reduced to the epigrammatic mold and polish, the éclat of a popular literature. This was done orally at first (Solomon spoke his proverbs, 1 K 4 32, 33); but the recording of such carefully expressed utterances could not be long delayed; perhaps this brief style coupé was the most natural early exercise in the new transition from the unwieldy cuneiform to the use of papyrus and a more flexible alphabet, which probably came in with the monarchy. At any rate, here was the medium for a practical didactic literature, applied to the matters of daily life and intercourse to which in Solomon's time the nation was enthusiastically awake. There is no valid reason for denying to Solomon, or at least to his time, the initiation of the Solomonic māshāl; and if, as has been suggested, the name "proverbs of Solomon" designates rather literary species than personal authorship, the title of the whole book (1 1), as well as the headings of sections (10 1; 25 1), may be given in entire good faith, whatever the specific time or personal authorship of the utterances. Nor is there anything either in recorded history or the likelihood of the case to make improbable that the activity of the "men of Hezekiah" means just what is said; these men of letters were adding this supplementary collection (Prov 25-29) to a body of proverbs that already existed and were recognized as Solomon's. This would put the composition of the main body of the proverbs (chs 10-29) prior to the reign of Hezekiah. They represent therefore the chief literary instruction available to the people in the long period of the Kings from Solomon onward, a period which otherwise was very meagerly supplied. The Mosaic Law, as we gather from the finding of the Law in the time of Josiah (2 K 22), was at best a sequestered thing in the keeping—or neglect—of priests and judges; the prophetic word was a specific message for great national emergencies; the accumulations of sacred song were the property of the temple and the cultus; what then was there for the education of the people? There were indeed the folk-tales and catechetical legends of their heroic history; but there were also, most influential of all, these wise sayings of the sages, growing bodies of precept and parable, preserved in village centers, published in the open places by the gate (cf Job 29 7), embodying the elements of a common-sense religion and citizenship, and representing views of life which were not only Hebrew, but to a great extent international among the neighbor kingdoms. Understood so, these Solomonic proverbs furnish incomparably the best reflection we have of the religious and social standards of the common people, during a period otherwise meagerly portrayed. And from it we can understand what a sterling fiber of character existed after all, and how well worth preserving for a unique mission in the world, in spite of the idolatrous corruptions that invaded the sanctuaries, the self-pleasing unconcern of the rulers and the pessimistic denunciations of the prophets.

For the point in the Heb literary history when these scattered Solomonic proverbs were recognized as a homogeneous strain of thought and the compilations were made and recommended as Wisdom we can do no better, I think, than to name the age of Israel's literary prime, the age of Hezekiah. The "men of Hezekiah" did more than append their supplementary section (chs 25-29); the words "these also" (גַּם אֵלֶּיךָ, gam 'elleh) in their heading imply it (see HEZEKIAH, THE MEN OF).

I apprehend the order and nature of their work somewhat thus: Beginning with the classic nucleus (10-22 16) (see above, II, 2), which may have come to them in two subsections (chs 10-15; 16-22 16), they put these together as the proverbs most closely associated with Solomon, without much attempt at systematizing, substantially as these had accumulated through the ages in the rough order of their developing form and thought; compiling thus, in their zeal for the literary treasures of the past, the body of educational literature which lay nearest at hand, a body adapted especially, though not exclusively, to the instruction of the young and immature. This done, there next came to their knowledge a remarkable body of "words of the wise" (22 17-24 22), which had evidently been put together by request as a vade mecum for some persons in responsible position, and which were prefaced by a recommendation of them as "words of truth" designed to promote "trust in Jeh" (22 19-21)—which latter, as we know from Isaiah, was the great civic issue of Hezekiah's time. With this section naturally goes the little appendix of "sayings of the wise" (24 23-34), added probably at about the same time. These two sections, which seem to open the collection to matter beyond the distinctive Solomonic māshāl, are, beyond the rest of the book, in the tone of the introductory section (chs 1-9), which latter, along with the Hezekian appendix (chs 25-29), was added, partly as a new composition, partly as incorporating some additional findings (cf for instance the completion of the poem on the sluggard, 6 6-11). Thus, by the addition of this introductory section, the Book of Prov was recognized as a unity, provided with a preface and initial proposition (1 1-6, 7), and launched with such hortatory material as had already, on a smaller scale, introduced the third section. This part not only contains the praise of Wisdom as a human endowment, sharing in the mind and purpose of the Divine (8 22-31), but it has become aware also of the revelatory value of tūshiyāh (2 7; 3 21; 8 14), or chastened intuition (see above, III, 3), and dares to aspire, in its righteous teachableness, to the intimacy or secret friendship of Jeh (סֵדֶרֶךָ, sōdhrō, 3 32). All this indicates the holy self-consciousness to which Wisdom has attained.

I see no cogent reason for postponing the substantial completion of the Book of Prov beyond the time of Hezekiah. The words of Agur and of King Lemuel, with the final acrostic poem, may be later additions; but their difference in tone and workmanship is just as likely to be due to the fact that they are admitted, in the liberal spirit of the compilers, from foreign stores of wisdom. For spiritual clarity and intensity they do not rise to the height of the native Heb consciousness; and they incline to an artificial structure which suggests that the writer's interest is divided between sincere tūshiyāh and literary skill. For the sake of like-minded neighbors, however, something may be forgiven.

It is too early in the history of Wisdom to regard this Book of Prov as an articulated and coordinated system. It is merely what it purports to be, a collected body of literature having a common bearing and purpose; a literature of reverent and intelligent self-culture, moving among the ordinary relations of life, and not assuming to embody any mystic disclosures of truth beyond the reach of human reason. As such, it has a vocabulary and range of ideas of its own, which distinguishes it from other strains of literature. This is seen in those passages outside of the Book of Prov which deliberately assume, for some specific purpose, the Wisdom dialect. In Isa 28 23-29, the prophet, whom the perverse rulers have taunted with baby-talk (vs 9.10), appeals to them with the characteristic Wisdom call to attention (ver 23), and in illustrations drawn from husbandry proves to them that this also is from Jeh of hosts, 'who is transcendent in counsel, preëminent in tūshīyāh' (ver 29)—teaching them thus in their own vaunted idiom. In Mic 6 9-15, similarly, calling in tūshīyāh to corroborate prophecy ("the voice of Jeh," קול יהוה, kōl Yahweh, רְחִישֵׁיָהּ, wehūshīyāh, 6 9), the prophet speaks of the natural disasters that men ought to deduce from their abuse of trade relations, evidently appealing to them in their own favorite strain of thinking. Both these passages seem to reflect a time when the Wisdom dialect was prevalent and popular, and both are concerned to call in sound human intuition as an ally of prophecy. At the same time, as prophets have the right to do, they labor to give revelation the casting vote; the authentic disclosure of truth from Jeh is their objective, not the mere luxury of making clever observations on practical life. All this coincides, in the Wisdom sphere, with what in Isaiah's and Micah's time was the supreme issue of state, namely trust in Jeh, rather than in crooked human devices (cf Isa 28 16; 29 15); and it is noteworthy that this is the venture of Wisdom urged by the editors of Prov in their introductory exhortations (cf 22 19; 3 5-8). In other words, these editors are concerned with inducing a spiritual attitude; and so in their literary strain they make their book an adjunct in the movement toward spirituality which Isaiah is laboring to promote. As yet, however, its findings are still in the peremptory stage, stated as absolute and unqualified truths; it has not reached the sober testing of fact and interrogation of motive which it must encounter in order to become a seasoned philosophy of life. Its main pervading thesis—that righteousness in the fear of God is wisdom and bound for success, that wickedness is fatuity and bound for destruction—is eternally sound; but it must make itself good in a world where so many of the enterprises of life seem to come out the other way, and where there is so little appreciation of spiritual values. Nor is the time of skepticism and rigid test long in coming. Two psalms of this period (as I apprehend) (Pss 73 and 49) concern themselves with the anomaly of the success of the wicked and the trials of the righteous; the latter pointedly adopting the Wisdom or māshāl style of utterance (Ps 49 3.4), both laboring to induce a more inward and spiritual attitude toward the problem. It remains, however, for the Book of Job to take the momentous forward step of setting wisdom on the unshakable foundation of spiritual integrity, which it does by subjecting its findings to the rigid test of fact and its motives to a drastic Satanic sifting. It is thus in the Book of Job, followed later by the Book of Eccl, that the Wisdom strain of literature, initiated by the Proverbs of Solomon, finds its OT culmination.

LITERATURE

I. Providence Defined.—The word "provide" (from Lat providere) means etymologically "to foresee." The corresponding Gr word, πρόνοια, prōnoia, means "forethought." Forethought and foresight imply a future end, a goal, and a definite purpose and plan for attaining that end. The doctrine of final ends is a doctrine of final causes, and means that that which is last in realization and attainment is first in mind and thought. The most essential attribute of rational beings is that they act with reference to an end; that they act not only with thought but with forethought. As, therefore, it is characteristic of rational beings to make preparation for every event that is foreseen or anticipated, the word "providence" has come to be used less in its original etymological meaning of foresight than to signify that preparation, care and supervision which are necessary to secure a desired future result. While all rational beings exercise a providence proportioned to their powers, yet it is only when the word is used with reference to the Divine Being who is possessed of infinite knowledge and power that it takes on its real and true significance. The doctrine of Divine providence, therefore, has reference to that preservation, care and government which God exercises over all things that He has created, in order that they may accomplish the ends for which they were created.

"Providence is the most comprehensive term in the language of theology. It is the background of all the several departments of religious truth, a background mysterious in its commingled brightness and darkness. It penetrates and fills the whole compass of the relations of man with his Maker. It connects the unseen God with the visible creation, and the visible creation with the work of redemption, and redemption with personal salvation, and personal salvation with the end of all things. It carries our thoughts back to the supreme purpose which was in the beginning with God, and forward to the foreseen end and consummation of all things, while it includes between these the whole infinite variety of the dealings of God with man" (W. B. Pope, Compendium of Christian Theology, I, 456).

II. Different Spheres of Providential Activity Distinguished.—The created universe may be conveniently divided, with reference to Divine providence, into three departments: first, the inanimate or physical universe, which is conserved or governed by God according to certain uniform principles called the laws of Nature; secondly, animate existence, embracing the vegetable and animal world, over which God exercises that providential care which is necessary to sustain the life that He created; and thirdly, the rational world, composed of beings who, in addition to animate life, are possessed of reason and moral free agency, and are governed by God, not necessitatively, but through an appeal to reason, they having the power to obey or disobey the laws of God according to the decision of their own free wills. This widespread care and supervision which God exercises over His created universe is commonly designated as His general providence, which embraces alike the evil and the good, in addition to which there is a more special and particular providence which He exercises over and in behalf of the good, those whose wills are in harmony with the Divine will.

III. Biblical Presentation of the Doctrine of Providence.—The word "providence" is used only once in the Scriptures (Acts 24 2), and here it refers, not to God, but to the forethought and work of man, in which sense it is now seldom used. (See also Rom 13 14, where the same Gr word is tr^d "provision.") While, however, the Bib. use of the word calls for little consideration, the doctrine indicated by the term "providence" is one of the most significant in the Christian system, and is either distinctly stated or plainly assumed by every Bib. writer. The OT Scriptures are best understood when interpreted as a progressive revelation of God's providential purpose for Israel and the world. Messianic expectations pervade the entire life and lit. of the Heb people, and the entire OT dispensation may not improperly be regarded as the moral training and providential preparation of the world, and esp. of the chosen people, for the coming Messiah. In the apocryphal "Book of Wisdom" the word "providence" is twice used (14 3; 17 2) in reference to God's government of the world. Rabbinical Judaism, according to Jos, was much occupied with discussing the relation of Divine providence to human free will. The Sadducees, he tells us, held an extreme view of human freedom, while the Essenes were believers in absolute fate; the Pharisees, avoiding these extremes, believed in both the overruling providence of God and in the freedom and responsibility of man (Ant, XIII, v, 9; XVIII, i, 3; BJ, II, viii, 14). See PHARISEES. The NT begins with the announcement that the "kingdom of heaven is at hand," which declaration carries along with it the idea of a providential purpose and design running through the preceding dispensation that prepared for the Messiah's coming. But the work of Christ is set forth in the NT, not only as the culmination of a Divine providence that preceded it, but as the beginning of a new providential order, a definite and far-reaching plan, for the redemption of the world, a forethought and plan so comprehensive that it gives to the very idea of Divine providence a new, larger and richer meaning, both intensively and extensively, than it ever had before. The minutest want of the humblest individual and the largest interests of the world-wide kingdom of God are alike embraced within the scope of Divine providence as it is set forth by Christ and the apostles.

(1) Providence in the Pentateuch.—The opening sentence of the Scriptures, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," is

1. Divine Providence in the OT Scriptures a noble and majestic affirmation of God's essential relationship to the origin of all things. It is followed by numerous utterances scattered throughout the sacred volume that declare that

He who created also preserves and governs all that He created. But the Israelitish nation was from the beginning of its history, in the Heb conception, the special object of God's providence and care, though it was declared that Jeh's lordship and government extended over all the earth (Ex 3 22). The Deuteronomist (10 14) uses language which implies that Divine possession of all things in heaven and earth carries along with it the idea of Divine providence and control; and he also regards Israel as Jeh's peculiar possession and special care (32 8).

This special providence that was over the elect nation as a whole was also minute and particular, in that special individuals were chosen to serve a providential purpose in the making of the nation, and were Divinely guided in the accomplishment of their providential mission. Thus Abraham's providential place in history is set forth in Neh 9 7,8. Jacob acknowledges the same providential hand in his life (Gen 31 42; 48 15). The life of Joseph abounds in evidences of a Divine providence (Gen 45 5,7; 50 20). The whole life-history of Moses as it is found in the Pent is a study in the doctrine of Divine providence. Other lives as set forth in these early narratives may be less notable, but they are not less indebted to Divine providence for what they are and for what they accomplish for others. Indeed, as Professor Oehler remarks, "The whole Pentateuchal history of revelation is nothing but the activity of that Divine providence which, in order to the realization of the Divine aim, is at once directed to the whole, and at the same time proves itself efficacious in the direction of the life of separate men, and in the guiding of all circumstances" (OT Theology).

(2) The historical books of the OT.—In a sense all the books of the OT are historical in that they furnish material for writing a history of the people of Israel. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE. The Pent, the Poetical Books, the Wisdom Lit., the Prophets, all furnish material for writing OT history; but there is still left a body of literature, including the books from Josh to Est, that may with peculiar fitness be designated as historical. These books are all, in an important sense, an interpretation and presentation of the facts of Heb history in their relation to Divine providence. The sacred historians undertake to give something of a Divine philosophy of history, to interpret in a religious way the facts of history, to point out the evils of individual and national sin and the rewards and blessings of righteousness, and to show God's ever-present and ever-guiding hand in human history—that He is not a silent spectator of human affairs, but the supreme moral Governor of the universe, to whom individuals and nations alike owe allegiance. To the Heb historian every event in the life of the nation has a moral significance, both because of its relation to God and because of its bearing on the providential mission and testing of Israel as the people of God. The Book of Jgs, which covers the "dark ages" of Bible history, and is an enigma to many in the study of God's hand in history, shows how far God must needs condescend at times in His use of imperfect and even sensual men through whom to reveal His will and accomplish His work in the world. While therefore He condescends to use as instruments of His providence such men as Samson and Jephthah, it is never through these that He does His greatest work, but through an Abraham, a Joseph, a Moses, an Isaiah, through men of lofty moral character. And this is one of the most notable lessons of OT history if it be studied as a revelation of God's providential methods and instrumentalities. Among these historical writers none has given clearer and stronger expression to God's providential relation to the physical world as its preserver and to the moral world as its Divine Governor than the author of Nehemiah. "Thou, even thou, art Lord alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things that are therein, the seas, and all that is therein, and thou preservest them all. . . . Yet thou in thy manifold mercies forsookest them not in the wilderness: the pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither the pillar of fire by night, to shew them light, and the way wherein they should go. Thou gavest also thy good spirit to instruct them" (9 6.19.20 AV). His words reflect the views that were entertained by all the OT historians as to God's hand in the government and guidance of the nation. Heb history, because of the Divine promises and Divine providence, is ever moving forward toward the Messianic goal.

(3) The Psalms.—The poets are among the world's greatest religious teachers, and the theology of the best poets generally represents the highest and purest faith that is found among a people. Applying this truth to the Heb race, we may say that in the Pss and the Book of Job we reach the high-water mark of the OT revelation as to the doctrine of Divine providence. The Psalmist's God is not only the Creator and Preserver of all things, but is a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God, a Being so full of tender mercy and loving-kindness that we cannot fail to identify Him with the God whom Christ taught us to call "our Father." Nowhere else in the entire Scriptures, except in the Sermon on the Mount, can we find such a full and clear exhibition of the minute and special providence of God over His faithful and believing children as in the Pss—notably such as Pss 91, 103, 104 and 139. Ps 105 traces God's hand in providential and gracious guidance through every stage of Israel's wondrous history. Thanksgiving and praise for providential mercies and blessings abound in Pss 44, 66, 78, 85, 135. While the relation of God's power and providence to the physical universe and to the material and temporal blessings of life is constantly asserted in the Pss, yet it is the connection of God's providence with man's ethical and spiritual nature, with righteousness and faith and love, that marks the highest characteristic of the Psalmist's revelation of the doctrine of providence. That righteousness and obedience are necessary conditions and accompaniments of Divine providence in its moral aspects and results is evidenced by numerous declarations of the psalmists (1 6; 31 19.20; 74 12; 84 11; 91 1; 125 2). This thought finds happiest expression in Ps 37 23 AV: "The steps of a good man are ordered of the Lord, and he delighteth in his way." The inspired poets make it plain that the purpose of Divine providence is not merely to meet temporal wants and bring earthly blessings, but to secure the moral good of individuals and nations.

(4) The Wisdom Literature.—The doctrine of providence finds ample and varied expression in the Wisdom Lit. of the OT, notably in the Book of Prov. The power that preserves and governs and guides is always recognized as inseparable from the power that creates and commands (Prov 3 21-26; 16 4). Divine providence does not work independently of man's free will; providential blessings are conditioned on character and conduct (Prov 26

10 AV; 2 7.8; 12 2.21). There cannot be, in OT terms of faith, any stronger statement of the doctrine of Divine providence than that given by the Wise Men of Israel in the following utterances recorded in the Book of Prov: "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths" (3 6); "A man's heart deviseth his way, but Jeh directeth his steps" (16 9); "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of Jeh" (16 33); "A man's goings are of Jeh" (20 24); "The king's heart is in the hand of Jeh as the watercourses: He turneth it whithersoever he will" (21 1); "The horse is prepared against the day of battle; but victory is of Jeh" (21 31). See also 3 21-26; 12 2.21. The conception of providence that is presented in the Book of Eccl seems to reflect the views of one who had had experience in sin and had come into close contact with many of life's ills. All things have their appointed time, but the realization of the providential purposes and ends of creaturely existence is, wherever human free agency is involved, always conditioned upon man's exercise of his free will. The God of providence rules and overrules, but He does not by His omnipotence overpower and override and destroy man's true freedom. Things that are do not reflect God's perfect providence, but rather His providence as affected by human free agency and as marred by man's sin (Eccl 3 1-11). "I know that there is nothing better for them, than to rejoice, and to do good so long as they live. And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy good in all his labor, is the gift of God" (vs 12.13; see also ver 14); "The righteous, and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God" (9 1); "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong" (9 11). The same conclusion that the author of Eccl reached as to how human life is affected by Divine providence and man's sin has found expression in the oft-quoted lines of the great poet:

"There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

(5) The Book of Job.—The greatest of all the inspired contributions to the Wisdom Lit. of the OT, the Book of Job, demands special consideration. It is the one book in the Bible that is devoted wholly to a discussion of Divine providence. The perplexities of a thoughtful mind on the subject of Divine providence and its relation to human suffering have nowhere in the literature of the world found stronger and clearer expression than in this inspired drama which bears the name of its unique and marvelous hero, Job. Job represents not only a great sufferer, but an honest doubter: he dared to doubt the theology of his day, a theology which he had himself doubtless believed until experience, the best of all teachers, taught him its utter inadequacy to explain the deepest problems of human life and of Divine providence. The purpose of this book in the inspired volume seems to be to correct the prevailing theology of the day with regard to the subject of sin and suffering in their relation to Divine providence. There is no more deplorable and hurtful error than a false theology could teach than that all suffering in this world is a proof of sin and a measure of one's guilt (see AFFLICTION). It is hard enough for the innocent to suffer. To add to their suffering by teaching them that it is all because they are awful sinners, even though their hearts assure them that they are not, is to lay upon the innocent a burden too grievous to be borne. The value in the inspired Canon of a book written to reveal the error of such a misleading doctrine as this cannot easily be overestimated. The invaluable contribution which this book makes to the Bib. doctrine of providence is to be found, not in individual and detached sayings, striking and suggestive as some of these may be, but rather in the book as a whole. Statements concerning God's general providence abound in this inspired drama—such as these, for example: "Who knoweth not in all these, that the hand of Jeh hath wrought this, in whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind?" (Job 12 9.10); "Who hath given him a charge over the earth? or who hath disposed the whole world? . . . He shall break in pieces mighty men without number, and set others in their stead" (34 13.24 AV).

But the special contribution of the Book of Job to the doctrine of Divine providence, as already indicated, is to set forth its connection with the fact of sin and suffering. Perplexed souls in all ages have been asking: If God be all-powerful and all-good, why should there be any suffering in a world which He created and over which He rules? If He cannot prevent suffering, is He omnipotent? If He can, but will not prevent suffering, is He infinitely good? Does the book solve the mystery? We cannot claim that it does. But it does vindicate the character of God, the Creator, and of Job, the moral free agent under trial. It does show the place of suffering in a moral world where free agents are forming character; it does show that perfect moral character is made, not by Divine omnipotence, but by trial, and that physical suffering serves a moral end in God's providential government of men and nations. While the book does not clear the problem of mystery, it does show how on the dark background of a suffering world the luminous holiness of Divine and human character may be revealed. The picture of this suffering man of Uz, racked with bodily pains and irritated by the ill-spoken words of well-meaning friends, planting himself on the solid rock of his own conscious rectitude, and defying earth and hell to prove him guilty of wrong, and knowing that his Vindicator liveth and would come to his rescue—that is an inspired picture that will make every innocent sufferer who reads it stronger until the end of time. (6) The prophetic writings.—Nowhere in all literature is the existence and supremacy of a moral and providential order in the world more clearly recognized than in the writings of the OT prophets. These writings are best understood when interpreted as the moral messages and passionate appeals of men who were not only prophets and preachers of righteousness to their own times, but students and teachers of the moral philosophy of history for all time, seers, men of vision, who interpreted all events in the light of their bearing on this moral and providential order, in which Divine order the Israelitish nation had no small part, and over which Israel's God was sovereign, doing "according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of earth." While each prophetic message takes its coloring from the political, social and moral conditions that called it forth, and therefore differs from every other message, the prophets are all one in their insistence upon the supremacy and Divine authority of this moral order, and in their looking forward to the coming of the Messiah and the setting up of the Messianic kingdom as the providential goal and consummation of the moral order. They all describe in varying degrees of light and shade a coming time when One born of their own oppressed and down-trodden race should come in power and glory, and set up a kingdom of righteousness and love in the earth, into which kingdom all nations shall be ultimately gathered; and of His kingdom there shall be no end. God's providential government of the nation was always and everywhere directed toward this Messianic goal. The language which an inspired writer puts into the mouth of Nebuchadnezzar, the heathen king, is an expression, not so much of the gentile conception of God and His government, as it is of the faith of a Heb prophet concerning God's relationship to men and nations: "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" (Dnl 4 35). The providential blessings which the prophets promise to the people, whether to individuals or to the nation, are never a matter of mere omnipotence or favoritism, but are inseparably connected with righteous conduct and holy character. The blessings promised are mainly spiritual, but whether spiritual or material, they are always conditioned on righteousness. The Book of Isa is esp. rich in passages that emphasize the place of moral conduct and character in God's providential government of the world, the supreme purpose and end of which are to establish a kingdom of righteousness in the earth (Isa 33 13-16; 35 8-10; 43 2; 46 4; 54 14-17). Divine providence is both personal and national, and of each it is declared in varying terms of assurance that "Jeh will go before you; and the God of Israel will be your rearward" (52 12). Each of the major and minor prophets confirms and reinforces the teachings of this greatest and most truly representative of all the OT prophets.

(1) The Synoptic Gospels.—The Synoptic Gospels furnish the richest possible material for a study of the doctrine of Divine providence.

2. Divine Providence in the NT They recognize in the advent of Christ the fulfilment of a long line of Messianic prophecies and the culmination of providential purposes and plans that had been in the Divine mind from the beginning and awaited the fulness of time for their revelation in the Incarnation (Mt 1 22; 2 5.15; 3 3). In His private and personal life of service and prayer Christ is a model of filial trust in the providence of the heavenly Father (Mt 11 25; 26 39; Mk 1 35; 6 46; Lk 3 21; 11 1). His private and public utterances abound in declarations concerning God's ever-watchful and loving care for all His creatures, but above all for those creatures who bear His own image; while His teachings concerning the Kingdom of God reveal a Divine providential plan for the world's redemption and education extending of necessity far into the future; and still beyond that, in His vision of Divine providence, comes a day of final judgment, of retribution and reward, followed by a new and eternal order of things, in which the destiny of every man will be determined by his conduct and character in this present life (see Our Lord's parables concerning the Kingdom: Mt 13 24-50; Mk 4 26 ff; Lk 14 16 ff; also Mt 24 and 25). The many familiar utterances of Our Lord, found in the Synoptic Gospels, contain the most essential and precious of all the NT revelations concerning the providence of the heavenly Father (Mt 5 45; 6 26-34; 10 29-31; Lk 21 16-18).

(2) The Johannine writings.—St. John's Gospel differs from the Synoptic Gospels in its mode of presenting the doctrine of providence chiefly in that it goes back to the mind and purpose of God in the very beginning (Jn 1 1-5), whereas the Synoptic Gospels simply go back to the Messianic prophecies of the OT. Both the Gospel and the Epp. of John in their presentation of Divine providence place the greatest possible emphasis on Divine love and filial trust, the latter rising in many places to the point of positive assurance. The Book of Rev is a prophetic vision, in apocalyptic form, of God's providential purpose for the future, dealing not so much with individuals as with nations and with the far-reaching movements of history extending through the centuries. God is revealed in St. John's writings, not as an omnipotent and arbitrary Sovereign, but as an all-loving Father, who not only cares for His children in this life but is building for them in the world to come a house of many mansions (Jn 14 1-20).

(3) The Book of Acts and other NT history.—The historical portions of the NT, as contained in the Acts, and elsewhere, while not eliminating or depreciating the element of human freedom in individuals and nations, yet recognize in human life and history the ever-present and all-controlling mind of that God in whom, it is declared, "we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts 17 28). The career of the first distinctive NT character begins with these words: "There came a man, sent from God, whose name was John" (Jn 1 6). But not only John, the forerunner, but every other individual, according to the NT conceptions, is a man "sent from God." The apostles conceive themselves to be such; Stephen, the martyr, was such; Paul was such (Acts 22 21). NT biography is a study in providentially guided lives, not omitting references to those who refuse to be so guided—for such is the power of human free agency, many who are "sent from God" refuse to go upon their Divinely appointed mission. The Day of Pentecost is the revelation of a new power in history—a revelation of the place and power which the Divine-human Christ and the Holy Spirit are to have henceforth in making history—in making the character of the men and the nations whose deeds are to make history. The most potent moral force in history is to be, from the day of Pentecost on, the ascended incarnate Christ, and He is to be all the more influential in the world after His ascension, when His work shall be done through the Holy Spirit. This is the historical view of providence as connected with the person of Christ, which the NT historians present, and which we, after 19 centuries of Christian history, are warranted in holding more confidently and firmly even than the Christians of the 1st cent. could hold it; for the Christian centuries have proved it true. What God is in Nature Christ is in history. All history is becoming Christian history, thus realizing the NT conception of Divine providence in and through Christ.

(4) The Pauline writings.—No character of whom we have any account in Christian literature was providentially prepared for his life-work and providentially guided in accomplishing that life-work more truly than was the apostle Paul. We find, therefore, as we would antecedently expect, that Paul's speeches and writings abound in proofs of his absolute faith in the overruling providence of an all-wise God. His doctrine of predestination and foreordination is best understood when interpreted, not as a Divine power predetermining human destiny and nullifying the human will, but as a conception of Divine providence as the eternal purpose of God to accomplish an end contemplated and foreseen from the beginning, viz. the redemption of the world and the creation in and through Christ of a new and holy humanity. Every one of the Pauline Epp. bears witness to the author's faith in a Divine providence that overrules and guides the life of every soul that works in harmony with the Divine will; but this providence is working to secure as its chief end, not material and temporal blessings, but the moral and spiritual good of those concerned. Paul's teachings concerning Divine providence as it concerns individuals and is conditioned on character may be found summed up in what is perhaps the most comprehensive single sentence concerning providence that was ever written: "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose" (Rom 8 28 AV). Any true exposition of the NT doctrine of Divine providence that may be given can only be an unfolding of the content of this brief but comprehensive statement. The greatest of the Pauline Epp., that to the Rom, is a study in the divine philosophy of history, a revelation of God's providential purpose and plan concerning the salvation, not merely of individuals, but of the nations. These purposes, as Paul views them, whether they concern individuals or the entire race, are always associated with the mediatorial ministry of Christ: "For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things. To him be the glory for ever" (Rom 11 36).

(5) The Petrine Epp. and other NT writings.—The Epp. of Peter, James, and Jude, and the Ep. to the He, are all in entire accord with the teachings of the other NT writings already considered. St. Peter, who at first found it so hard to see how God's providential purpose in and for the Messiah could be realized if Christ should suffer and die, came later to see that the power and the glory of Christ and His all-conquering gospel are inseparably connected with the sufferings and death of the Messiah (1 Pet 1 11.12). No statement concerning God's providence over the righteous can be clearer or stronger than the following utterance of Peter: "The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, And his ears unto their supplication: But the face of the Lord is upon them that do evil. And who is he that will harm you, if ye be zealous of that which is good?" (1 Pet 3 12.13). The purpose and end of Divine providence as viewed in the Ep. of Jas are always ethical: as conduct and character are the end and crown of Christian effort, so they are the end and aim of Divine providence as it cooperates with men to make them perfect (Jas 1 5. 17.27; 2 5; 5 7). The apologetic value of the Ep. to the He grows out of the strong proof it presents that Christ is the fulfilment, not only of the Messianic prophecies and expectations of Israel, but of the providential purposes and plans of that God who at sundry times and in divers manners had spoken in times past unto the fathers by a long line of prophets (He 1 1.2; 11 7-40; 13 20.21). It would be difficult to crowd into one short chapter a more comprehensive study of the lessons of history that illustrate the workings and the retributions of the moral law under Divine providence than is found in the Ep. of Jude (see esp. vs 5.7.11. 14.15.24).

From this brief survey of the teachings of the OT and NT Scriptures concerning the doctrine of Divine providence, it will be seen that, while the NT reaffirms in most particulars the doctrine of Divine providence as set forth in the OT Scriptures, there are three particulars in which the points of emphasis are changed, and by which new and changed emphasis the doctrine is greatly enriched in the NT.

(1) The fatherhood and love of God in providence.—The God of providence in the OT is regarded as a Sovereign whose will is to be obeyed, and His leading attributes are omnipotence and holiness, whereas in the NT God is revealed as the heavenly Father, and His providence is set forth as the forethought and care of a father for his children. His leading attributes here are love and holiness—His very omnipotence is the omnipotence of love. To teach that God is not only a righteous Ruler to be feared and adored, but a tender and loving Father who is ever thinking of and caring for His children, is to make God lovable and turn His providence into an administration of Almighty love.

(2) The place of Christ and the Holy Spirit in providence.—The doctrine of providence in the NT is connected with the person of Christ and the administration of the Holy Spirit, in a manner that distinguishes it from the OT presentation of providence as the work of the one God who was there revealed in the simple unity of His nature without distinction of persons. If it be true, as some theologians have taught, that "God the Father plans, God the Son executes, and God the Holy Ghost applies," then it would follow that providence is the work exclusively of Christ and the Holy Spirit; but this theological formula, while it has suggestive value, cannot be accepted as an accurate statement of Bib. doctrine with reference to Divine providence. Christ constantly refers creation and providence to the Father. But He also said, "My Father worketh even until now, and I work" (Jn 5 17), and the NT writers attribute to Christ the work both of creation and providence. Thus Paul: "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist" (Col 1 16,17 AV). Although this and other passages refer to Christ's relation to general providence, including the government of the physical universe, yet it is only when the Divine government is concerned with the redemption of a lost world and the establishment of the Kingdom of God in the hearts and lives of men, that the full extent of Christ's part in Divine providence can be realized. The saving and perfecting of men is the supreme purpose of providence, if it be viewed from the NT standpoint, which is that of Christ's mediatorial ministry.

(3) The new emphasis upon moral and spiritual blessings.—The NT not only subordinates the material and temporal aspects of providence to the spiritual and eternal more than does the OT, but Christ and the apostles, to an extent that finds no parallel in the OT, place the emphasis of their teaching concerning providence upon man's moral needs and eternal interests, and upon the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, the establishment of which in the hearts and lives of men is the one great object for which both the heavenly Father and His children are ceaselessly working. To be free from sin, to be holy in heart and useful in life, to love and obey God as a Father, to love and serve men as brothers—this is the ideal and the end for which, according to the NT, men should work and pray, and this is the end toward which God is working by His ceaseless cooperative providence.

IV. Discussion of the Contents of the Biblical Doctrine.

There are four distinct conceptions of providence as it concerns God's relation to the ongoing of the world and Views of man, the rational and moral free agent whom He has placed upon it, Providence viz. the atheistic, the deistic, the pantheistic, and the theistic or Bib. view. See also God, I, 4. The last named view can best be understood only when stated in comparison and contrast with these opposing views.

(1) Atheism, or materialism, stands at one extreme, affirming that there is no God, that the material universe is eternal, and that from material atoms, eternally endowed with certain properties, there have come, by a process of evolution, all existing forms of vegetable, animal and rational life. As materialism denies the existence of a personal Creator, it of course denies any and every doctrine of Divine providence.

(2) Pantheism stands at the other extreme from atheism, teaching that God is everything and everything is God. The created universe is "the living garment" of God—God is the soul of the world, the universe His existence form. But God is an infinite It, not a personal Being who can express His existence in terms of self-consciousness—I, Thou, He. Providence, according to pantheism, is simply the evolution of impersonal deity, differing from materialism only in the name which it gives to the infinite substance from which all things flow.

(3) Deism teaches that there is a God, and that He created the world, but created things do not need His presence and the exercise of His power in order to continue in existence and fulfil their functions. The material world is placed under immutable law; while man, the rational and moral free agent, is left to do as he wills. God sustains, according to deism, very much the same relation to the universe that the clock-maker does to his timepiece. Having made his clock, and wound it up, he does not interfere with it, and the longer it can run without the maker's intervention the greater the evidence of wisdom and skill on the part of the maker. God according to deism has never wrought a miracle nor made a supernatural revelation to man. The only religion that is possible to man is natural religion; he may reason from Nature up to Nature's God. The only value of prayer is its subjective influence; it helps us to answer our own prayers, to become and be what we are praying to be. If the Divine Being is a prayer-hearing God, He is at least not a prayer-answering God. The laws of Nature constitute God's general providence; but there is no other personal and special providence than this, according to deism. God, the deists affirm, is too great, too distant, too transcendent a Being to concern Himself with the details of creaturely existence.

(4) The theistic or Biblical conception of providence teaches that God is not only the Creator but the Preserver of the universe, and that the preservation of the universe, no less than its creation, implies and necessitates at every moment of time an omnipotent and omnipresent personal Being. This world is not "governed by the laws of Nature," as deism teaches, but it is "governed by God, according to the laws of Nature." "Law," in itself, is an impotent thing, except as it is the expression of a free will or person back of it; "the laws of Nature" are meaningless and impotent, except as they are an expression of the uniform mode, according to which God preserves and governs the world. It is customary to speak of the laws of Nature as if they were certain self-existent forces or powers governing the world. But shall we not rather say that there is no real cause except personal will—either the Divine will or created will? If this be true, then it is inconsistent to say that God has committed the government of the physical universe to "secondary causes"—that is, to the laws of Nature—and that these laws are not immediately dependent upon Him for their efficiency. The omnipresent and ever-active God is the only real force and power and cause in the universe, except as created wills may be true and real causes within their limited bounds. This view of God's relation to the created universe serves to distinguish the Bib. doctrine of Divine providence from the teachings of materialists and deists, who eliminate entirely the Divine hand from the ongoing of the universe, and in its stead make a god of the "laws of Nature," and hence have no need for a Divine preserver. Bib. theism makes ample room for the presence of the supernatural and miraculous, but we must not be blind to a danger here, in that it is possible to make so much of the presence of God in the supernatural (revelation, inspiration, and miracle) as to overlook entirely His equally important and necessary presence in the natural—which would be to encourage a deistical conception of God's relation to the world by exaggerating His transcendence at the expense of His immanence. That is the true theistic doctrine of providence which, while not undervaluing the supernatural and miraculous, yet stedfastly maintains that God is none the less present in, and necessary to, what is termed the "natural."

(5) The Divine Immanence.—This idea of God's essential relation to the continuation of all things in existence is perhaps best expressed by the term "immanence." Creation emphasizes God's transcendence, while providence emphasizes His immanence. Pantheism affirms God's immanence, but denies His transcendence. Deism affirms His transcendence, but denies His immanence. Bib. theism teaches that God is both transcendent and immanent. By the term "transcendence," when applied to God, is meant that the Divine Being is a person, separate and distinct from Nature and above Nature—"Nature" being used here in its largest signification as including all created things. By the Divine Immanence is meant that God is in Nature as well as over Nature, and that the continuance of Nature is as directly and immediately dependent upon Him as the origin of Nature—indeed, by some, God's preservation of the created universe is defined as an act of "continuous creation." By the Divine Immanence is meant something more than omnipresence, which term, in itself alone, does not affirm any causal relation between God and the thing to which He is present, whereas the term "immanence" does affirm such causal relation. By asserting the Divine Immanence, therefore, as the mode of God's providential efficiency, we affirm that all created things are dependent upon Him for continued existence, that the laws of Nature have no efficiency apart from their Creator and Preserver, that God is to be sought and seen in all forms and phases of creaturely existence, in the natural as well as the supernatural and miraculous, that He is not only omnipresent but always and everywhere active both in the natural and the spiritual world, and that without Him neither the material atom, nor the living organism, nor the rational soul could have any being. He not only created all things, but "by him all things consist," that is, by Him all things are preserved in being.

What, then, let us ask, do the Scriptures teach as to the purpose and end of God's providential government of the world? Back of this question is another: What was the Divine motive and supreme End of Providence in the creation of the universe, and what the final cause and end of all things in the mind and purpose of God? If we can think God's thoughts after Him and discover this "final cause" of creation, with even approximate accuracy, then we shall find a principle that will illuminate at least, if it does not fully explain, the methods and mysteries of providence. We venture to affirm that the controlling thought in the mind of God in establishing this order of things, of which we are a conscious part, was to create a race of beings who should find their highest happiness by being in the highest degree holy, and who should, in proportion as they attain their highest holiness and happiness, thereby in the highest degree glorify their Creator. The Creator's highest glory can be promoted only by such beings as are at once rational, moral, free, holy. There are unconscious, unthinking, unmoral forms of existence, but the motive and meaning of the universe is to be found, not in the lower, the physical and animal, but in the highest, in the rational and moral. The lower exists for the higher, the material and animal for the spiritual and moral. A being whose character is formed under the conditions and laws of intellectual and moral freedom is higher than any being can be that is what it is necessitatively, that is, by virtue of conditions over which it has no control. Character that is formed freely under God's government and guidance will glorify the Creator more than anything can which is made to be what it is wholly by Divine omnipotence. These things being true, it follows that God's providence in the world will be directed primarily and ceaselessly toward developing character in free moral agents, toward reducing sin to the minimum and developing the maximum of holiness, in every way and by every means compatible with perfect moral freedom in the creature.

The possibility of sin in a world of free agents and in a state of probation is unavoidable, but to say that sin is possible does not mean that it is necessary. See CHOICE; WILL. The final cause and end, the purpose and motive, of Divine providence, then, are not the temporal, material and earthly happiness of men, but the highest ultimate moral good of free beings whose highest happiness is secured through their highest holiness—which means first, their obedience to the holy will of God as their Father, and secondly, loving and self-sacrificing service to their fellow-men. This ever-present and all-dominating moral purpose of Divine providence determines its methods and explains, in part at least, what would otherwise be its mysteries. With this conception of Divine providence the general trend of Bib. thought is in entire accord. In the light of Christ's revelation of God as a holy and loving Father who regards all men as His children and whose chief concern is to develop holiness and love in those whom He loves, we may define Divine providence as Infinite Wisdom, using infinite power to accomplish the ends of infinite holiness and love. The originating and determining cause of Divine providence is, in the NT conception of it, always to be found in the love of God, while the final cause is the glory of the Father as realized in the holiness and happiness of His children.

By the doctrine of special providence, according to the best use of that term in theological literature, is meant as already indicated, that minute care

3. Special Providence and ever-watchful supervision which God exercises over His obedient and believing children in things, both small and great, which are designed to secure their ever-increasing holiness and usefulness. God's general providence is and must be special, in that it descends to particulars—to the minute details of creaturely existence—and is always and everywhere active. But the Scriptures teach that there is a more special care over and ordering of the lives of the spiritually good than pertains to the wicked, who have not the fear of God before their eyes. The following Scriptures set forth in unmistakable terms the doctrine of a special providence exercised by the heavenly Father over and in behalf of the righteous: "A man's goings are established of Jeh; and he delighteth in his way" (Ps 37 23); "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths" (Prov 3 6); "There shall no mischief happen to the righteous" (Prov 12 21); "But seek ye first his kingdom, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Mt 6 33); "To them that love God all things work together for good" (Rom 8 28). The following points seem to be plainly involved in any statement of the doctrine of special providence that can claim to be faithful to the teachings of the Scriptures:

(1) Spiritual, not material, good to man the end sought in special providence.—A mistaken and hurtful notion has long been prevalent to the effect that special providence is designed to secure the secular and earthly good, the material and temporal prosperity, of God's children. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Material blessings may indeed come as a special providence to the child of God (Mt 6 33 et al.), but that "good" which all things work together to secure for them that love God is mainly spiritual good, and not financial, or social, or intellectual, or temporal good, except as these may secure ultimate spiritual good. Indeed, God's special providence may take away wealth and bring poverty in its stead in order to impart the "true riches." It may defeat rather than further one's worldly hopes and ambitions; may bring sickness rather than health, and even death instead of life—for sometimes a Christian can do more good by sickness or death than by health or continued life—and when that is the case, his sickness or death may well be interpreted as a special providence. "Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." Many of the OT promises do, it is true, seem to have special reference to material and temporal blessings, but we should remember that the best interpretation of these is to be found in the NT where they are (as, for example, when quoted by Christ in the Temptation) interpreted as having mainly a spiritual significance. When Our Lord speaks of the very hairs of our heads being numbered, and declares that if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without the Father's notice, surely we, who are of more value than many sparrows, cannot drift beyond His love and care. His words might be interpreted as teaching that God will save us from physical suffering and death; but such is not His meaning, for in the very same context He speaks of how they to whom He thus pledges His love and care shall be persecuted and hated for His name's sake, and how some of them shall be put to death; and yet His promise was true. God was with them in their physical sufferings, but the great blessing wherewith He blessed them was not physical, but moral and spiritual.

(2) Special providence and "accidents."—Another still more mistaken and hurtful notion concerning special providence is the association of it with, and the limitation of it largely to, what are called "accidents," those irregular and occasional occurrences which involve more than ordinary danger and risk to life. The popular notion of special providence associates it with a happy escape from visible dangers and serious injury, as when the house catches on fire, or the horses run away, or the train is wrecked, or the ship encounters an awful storm, or one comes in contact with contagious disease or the terrible pestilence that walketh in darkness. A happy escape from injury and death on such an occasion is popularly designated as a "special providence," and this regardless of whether the individual thus escaping is a saint or a sinner. We cannot too strongly emphasize the fact that God's special providence is not a capricious, occasional, and irregular intervention of His love and power in behalf of His children, but involves ceaseless—yea infinite—thought and care for those that love Him, everywhere and in all the experiences of life.

(3) Special providence as related to piety and prayer.—God's special providence is conditioned upon piety and prayer, though it far transcends in the blessings it brings, the specific requests of His children. While we may properly pray for things pertaining to our temporal and physical life with the assurance that God will answer such prayers in so far as He deems best, yet the Scriptures encourage us to make spiritual blessings the main object of our prayers. "Seek ye first his kingdom, and his righteousness," is the essence of the NT teaching on this subject; but we should not overlook the fact that this Divine injunction is both preceded and followed by the strongest assurances of the most minute and ceaseless provision for all our temporal and physical wants by the loving heavenly Father. "Therefore take no thought saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? . . . For your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you," AV. In keeping with this Scripture, the poet has written:

"Make you His service your delight;
Your wants shall be His care."

But while it is true that God has promised to make our wants His care, we should remember that He has promised this only to that devout and godly number of pious, praying souls who "seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness." His general providence is alike to all, by which "he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." But it is only "to them that love God" that it is promised that "all things work together for good"—and the proof of love is not in one's profession, but in his obedience and service.

(4) Special providence as related to human coöperation.—The words of Christ concerning the heavenly Father's watchful and loving providence do not mean that the children of God are not in any sense to take thought for food and raiment, and labor daily to obtain the necessities of life. Labor, both mental and physical, is as much a duty as prayer. The prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," does not render it unnecessary that they who offer it should work for their own daily bread. Nothing could be more hurtful to healthful Christian activity than to interpret Our Lord's insistence, in the Sermon on the Mount and elsewhere, upon trust in the heavenly Father's watchful providence as a justification of thoughtlessness, idleness, and improvidence; seeing that its purpose is simply to warn us against that needless and hurtful anxiety about the future which is not only inconsistent with trust in God, but which is utterly destructive of man's best efforts in his own behalf.

(5) General and special providence both equally Divine.—While the Scriptures appear to us to make a real and true distinction between God's natural and His supernatural order, and between His general and His special providence, yet to truly pious and wisely discerning souls all is alike Divine, the natural as well as the supernatural, general as well as special providence. So far as God's faithful and loving children are concerned, general and special providence blend into one. The only real and important distinction between the two is that made by the free wills of men, by virtue of which some are in loving accord with the Divine plans concerning them, and others are at enmity with God and oppose the purpose of His love concerning them. If all men were, and had always been, alike trustful and loving children of the heavenly Father, there would perhaps never have been any occasion for making a distinction between the general and the special providence of God. The only distinction we should have needed to recognize in that case would have been as to the varieties of Divine providence, in view of the fact that the all-loving Father would cause widely different events to happen to His different children. If anyone, therefore, is inclined to deny the distinction which we have here made between general and special providence, and prefers to affirm that there is but one general providential order over mankind in the world, that the distinction is in man and not in God's providence, his position cannot be seriously objected to, provided he does not thereby mean that the world is governed by impersonal and immutable laws, but will affirm with clearness and confidence that the world is governed by the all-loving, all-wise, omnipresent, and everywhere-active God. For, indeed, the only thing that is really "special" and out of order is the limitation which sin imposes upon the workings of Divine providence in so far as the self-will and opposition of men prevent the realization of the providential purposes of God concerning them. But, unfortunately, sin is now, and has long been, so prevalent and dominant in the world that we have come to regard God's providence as affected and limited by it, as that which is regular and general, and His more perfect and complete providence in behalf of and over the good as the exceptional and special. But whether we call Divine providence, as related to believers, "general" or "special," is of little consequence, provided we believe that "the steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord" (Ps 37 23 AV), that "all things work together for [spiritual] good to them that love God," and that to those who, duly subordinating the temporal to the spiritual, seek "first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," all things needful "shall be added" by the heavenly Father.

The problem of Divine providence has its utmost significance, not in its bearing on the laws of physical nature, but in that phase of it which concerns God's dealings with Providence moral agents, those creatures who and Human may, and often do, act contrary to Free Will His will. God governs men as a father governs his children, as a king governs his free subjects; not as a machinist works his machine, or as a hypnotist controls his mesmerized victims. A father in his family and a sovereign in his realm may each do as he pleases within certain limits, and God infinitely more: "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" (Dnl 4 35). He setteth up one and putteth down another. Nevertheless, even God acts within limits; He limited Himself when He created free agents. As a mere matter of power God can pre-determine man's volitions and necessitate his acts, but He can do so only by making of him a kind of rational machine, and destroying his true freedom. But Scripture, reason and consciousness all unite in teaching man that he is morally free, that he is an agent, and not something merely acted on. God's providential government of men, therefore, is based on their freedom as rational and moral beings, and consists in such an administration and guidance by the Holy Spirit of the affairs of men as shall encourage free moral agents to virtue, and discourage them from sin. God's providence must needs work upon and with two kinds of wills—willing wills and opposing wills.

(1) Divine providence as related to willing wills.—The apostle declares that God works in believers "both to will and to do of his good pleasure." If God's special providence over and in behalf of His children may involve an intervention of His Divine power within the realm of physical law, much more, it would seem, will it involve a similar intervention within the realm of the human mind and the human will. Spiritual guidance is one of the most precious privileges of believers, but it is difficult to conceive how the Holy Spirit can effectually guide a believer without finding some way of controlling his will and determining his volitions that is compatible with free agency. While most of man's thoughts, emotions and volitions are self-determined in their origin, being due to the free and natural workings of his own mind and heart and will, yet there are also thoughts, emotions and volitions that are Divinely produced. Even a sinner under conviction of sin has thoughts and emotions that are produced by the Holy Ghost. Much more has the believer Divinely produced thoughts and feelings; and if Divinely produced thoughts and feelings, there may be, in like manner, it would seem, Divinely produced volitions. Does this seem irreconcilable with the fact of moral free agency? We think not; it is no more subversive of human free agency for God to influence effectively a man's volitions and secure a certain course of action than it is for one man effectively to influence another. No volition that is Divinely necessitated can be a free moral volition; for moral volitions are such as are put forth freely, in view of motives and moral ends. The element of necessity and compulsion would destroy all true freedom in, and moral accountability for, any particular volition, so that it could not be either virtuous or vicious. But—and here is the crucial point—when a man, by an act of his own will, freely commits the ordering of his life to God, and prays God to choose for him what is best, working in him both to will and to do, that act of self-commitment to God involves the very essence of moral freedom, and is the highest exercise of free agency. "Our wills are ours to make them Thine," the poet has truly said. In other words, the highest moral act of man's free will is the surrender of itself to the Divine will; and whatever control of man's will on God's part results from and follows this free act of self-surrender is entirely consistent with perfect moral freedom, even though it should involve Divinely produced volitions. Does a perplexed child cease to be free when in the exercise of his freedom he asks a wise and loving father to decide a matter for him, and be his guide in attaining a certain desired end? Surely not; and this intervention of parental wisdom and love is none the less effective if it should work, as far as possible, through the mind and will of the child, rather than allow the child to be entirely passive. So God works effectually through the mind and will of every soul who unreservedly commits himself to the Divine will—commits himself not once simply, but continually. God cannot under the Divinely appointed laws of freedom work in and through the sinner "both to will and to do," because the sinner's will is bent on evil, and hence opposed to the Divine will. God's will can work, not with, but only against, a sinful will; and if it should so work and necessitate his volitions, that would destroy his true freedom. But, if God should work in and through an obedient and acquiescent will that is seeking Divine guidance, that would be an exercise of Divine power in no way incompatible with the true moral freedom of men. Such is the influence, as we conceive it, of the Divine upon the human will in providence. God's providence works effectively only through willing wills.

(2) Divine providence as related to sinful free will.—But God's providence encounters opposing as well as willing wills. Not every unconverted man, however, represents an equally antagonistic will—there are different degrees of opposition. That God's gracious and special providence in behalf of an individual often antedates his forsaking sin and his acceptance of Christ as a personal Saviour is manifest to every student of Christian biography. Much of the best training that many a "chosen vessel" ever receives for his life-work turns out to be that unconscious providential preparation which he was receiving under a Father's guidance before he consciously consecrated himself to his Divine Master. "I girded thee, though thou hast not known me," said God to Cyrus—and on this text Horace Bushnell preached one of the greatest of modern sermons on Divine providence, taking as his theme, "Every man's life a plan of God." If this be true of a Christian man, that even before his conversion the Holy Spirit was seeking him, and even preparing him, as far as was then possible, for fulfilling the "plan of God" in his life, is it not in all probability equally true that the Holy Spirit and the good providence of God were working in behalf of other sinners who persisted to the end in rebellion against God? Such is the power of moral free agency with which God has endowed man that the created free agent can defeat the plan of Infinite Love concerning his life, and frustrate the workings of providence in his behalf (Jer 18). Whether a free moral agent, then, shall allow God's providential plans to be wrought out for him or not, depends upon his own free will. It is said of the Divine Christ that He could not do many mighty works in a certain city because of their unbelief and opposition. In like manner Divine providence is conditioned and limited by a sinful free will.

That the Bib. writers do not regard the existence of evil as a valid objection to Divine providence is evident to every student of the Scriptures. Indeed, it is in working good out of what the world accounts evil that Divine providence accomplishes many of its most salutary and beneficent ends in behalf of the good. That natural or physical evil (poverty, sickness, suffering, etc) is one of the mightiest agencies in the hands of God for restraining and correcting moral evil and for working out moral and spiritual good to fallen and sinful men, admits of easy demonstration. For the existence in the world of moral evil (sin), man, the moral free agent, is wholly responsible. God could prevent moral free agents from sinning only by not creating them, or else by placing their wills under irresistible Divine restraint and compulsion. But the latter method of controlling them would virtually destroy their real and true freedom; and if this were done, then not only all sin, but all virtue and holiness as attributes of free beings would be thereby rendered impossible in men; for only such beings can put forth free holy volitions as can put forth free sinful volitions. If man had never sinned, there would probably have never been such a large providential use of natural or physical evil as at present prevails; and this because of the fact that an unfallen and holy race of beings would not have needed the presence of natural evil to secure their highest moral development. But a fallen and sinful race does need such an agency to bring it back to God and to develop holy character and the highest moral service. It is not true that sin is now always or even generally the immediate cause of an individual's suffering physical evil, or that extraordinary suffering is a proof of extraordinary sin. "Master, who did sin," asked the disciples, "this man, or his parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him" (Jn 9 2,3 AV). Human suffering is for man's spiritual good and for the Divine glory, as shown in working good out of evil—this is the explanation which the Master gives as to why natural evil is permitted or sent by God. It is not only a powerful, but, in a world like ours, a necessary agency for the correction and cure of moral evil and for the spiritual development of fallen man. "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now I observe thy word. . . . It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I may learn thy statutes" (Ps 119 67,71); "Every branch that beareth fruit, he cleanseth it, that it may bear more fruit" (Jn 15 2). The saintly and eminently useful men and women of history have, as a rule, had to undergo a severe discipline and to endure many and severe trials, and were made perfect only by their sufferings. Divine providence thus turns much of the world's natural and physical evil into moral good.

5. Divine Providence as Related to Natural and Moral Evil

Many of the things that befall the children of God are directly due to the sins of other men. That good men, even the very best of men, suffer many things at the hands of wicked men admits of no question; and yet these ills are among the "all things" which are declared by the apostle to work together for good to them that love God. The good that may ensue to good men from the evil conduct of the wicked is certainly not due to the intrinsic power in sin to work good to those against whom it is maliciously directed; it can only be due to the fact that God overrules it for the good of the innocent. "As for you," said Joseph, "ye meant evil against me; but God meant it for good" (Gen 50 20); "The things which happened unto me," said Paul, "have fallen out rather unto the progress of the gospel" (Phil 1 12). God, though foreknowing the evil that wicked men are planning to work against His children, may not prevent it; and this because He can and will overrule it for His glory and for their good, if they abide faithful. But, suppose a good man is not simply injured, but killed by the wicked, as in the case of the martyrs that died at the stake—does the principle still hold good? It does, we answer; the saint who dies in the discharge of duty and because of his fidelity to duty is not only assured, by all the promises of revelation, of a happy immortality, but he has the rare privilege of serving to advance the kingdom of God by his death as well as by his life. God's kingdom is advanced in manifold ways by the death of good men. Is not "the blood of the martyrs the seed of the church"? But we need here again to remark that it is not material and temporal, but moral and spiritual good, that God has guaranteed to His holy, loving and faithful children. If sin had an intrinsic power to work good, they would be right who maintain that "the end justifies the means, and one may do evil when good will come of it" (cf Rom 3 8); and they also would be right who maintain that God is the author of evil, seeing that evil is, on that supposition, only disguised good—propositions which are thoroughly vicious and subversive of all that is good in man or God. The Scriptures, rightly interpreted, nowhere lend themselves to such false and misleading ethics (cf Isa 45 7).

6. Evil Providentially Over-ruled for Good

To what extent may we, having studied God's providential methods as revealed in the Scriptures, in Nature, in human history, and in personal experience, venture to interpret providence as it applies to current events in our own lives and in the lives of others? Experience and observation will warn us both against haste and against too great confidence in our interpretations of providence. Hasty misinterpretations of providence in its bearing on present passing events frequently become fruitful sources of skepticism for the future. Some people are much given to interpreting providence. Certain ills or misfortunes come to a bad man; they are quick to assert that it is a Divine judgment sent upon him in view of his sin. Certain blessings come to a good man; they are sure the blessings are heaven-sent in view of his extraordinary piety. A whiskey merchant's store burns down: it is, say they, a Divine judgment, in view of his ill-gotten gains. But presently the property of an unquestionably pious and consecrated man is swept away by the flames: where now is the providence? The "oracles" fail to explain; and so they do in innumerable other cases: as, for example, when two men, a saint and a sinner, are prostrated on beds of sickness. The former, in spite of prayer and piety, continues to grow worse, and perhaps dies; while the other, without piety or prayer, is restored to health. God has not made us interpreters of His providences except for ourselves; and even much of that which we sincerely believe comes to us in a graciously providential manner we can well afford to keep as a sacred secret between ourselves and our God, seeing that God has not furnished us with any means of absolutely proving that what has happened to us might not have happened, under similar circumstances, even to sinful men. Many a Christian man comes to see that the ill that has happened to him—the loss of property, the terrible spell of sickness, and the like—things that, at the time, he would not interpret as providential—are among the best things that were ever sent upon him, in that they made him holier and more useful (cf Jn 13 7).

"Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan His work in vain;
God is His own interpreter,
And He will make it plain."

There are, however, many evident truths "writ large" on the pages of history, in the rise, decline and fall of kingdoms and nations, which he who runs may read. And to him who truly believes in the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ and who will duly consider all the facts and lessons of life, in himself and others, in individuals and in nations, and not for a day merely but patiently as the years come and go, it will be made plain that "God's in His heaven—All's right with the world," and that all things work together for the spiritual good of those who love God and who prove their love for Him by serving their fellow-men.

We conclude, then, that there is, according to the Scriptures, an ever-watchful providence exercised by the heavenly Father over His faithful and loving children, which is ceaselessly working to secure their ever-increasing holiness and usefulness here, and their perfect happiness in a future state of existence. To prepare rational and immortal free agents through holiness and usefulness here for happiness hereafter is the aim and end of this all-embracing providence of God, which includes within its loving care every human being except such as exclude themselves therefrom by their own wilful and persistent sinning. And in the accomplishment of this end, what the world counts as the misfortunes and ills of life often contribute far more than what, in the estimation of men, are accounted the greatest earthly blessings. There is no providential highway to a state here that is free from life's ills, and that abounds in temporal and earthly blessings to the good. But there is a royal and holy highway, along which moves a providential pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, leading the children of the covenant, through lives of loving service and sacrifice, to a holy land of promise, the goal of a gracious providence; and they who journey along this highway bear this seal: "The Lord knoweth them that are his: And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity" (2 Tim 2 19 AV). They who bear this seal are the Divinely chosen instruments and agents of that larger and wider providence that is ever working to establish a perfect kingdom of righteousness in the whole earth, that kingdom of God, to inaugurate which, in its Messianic form, Our Lord became incarnate, and to consummate which, in its final and perfect form, He reigns from heaven and will continue to reign until, having "put all enemies under his feet," He shall "deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father"—when the poet's vision shall be realized of "That God who ever lives and loves;

One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off Divine event,
To which the whole creation moves."

LITERATURE

Province (provincia) did not originally denote a territorial circumscription in Rom usage, since the employment of the word was much more ancient than any of the con-of the Term quests of the Romans outside of Italy.

In the most comprehensive official sense it signified a magistrate's sphere of administrative action, which in one instance might be the direction of jurisdiction at Rome, in another the management of military operations against a particular hostile community. When the imperium was conferred upon two consuls at the beginning of the Republic, and upon a praetor in 367 BC, and finally upon a second praetor in 241 BC, it became necessary in practice to define their individual competence which was unlimited in theory. When the Romans extended their control over lands situated outside of Italy, it became expedient to fix territorial limits to the exercise of authority by the magistrates who were regularly sent abroad, so that provincia signified henceforth in an abstract sense the rule of the governor, and in a concrete sense the specified region intrusted to his care; and with the development and consolidation of the Rom system of administration, the geographical meaning of the word became more and more significant.

The history of Rom provincial administration in the more definite sense commences in 227 BC, when four praetors were elected for the first time, of whom two were assigned to the government of the provinces. Three periods may be distinguished in the history of the system of provincial administration: (1) from 227 BC to Sulla, (2)

2. Roman Provincial Empire.

Administration (1) First period.—During the first period, provision was made for the government of the provinces by means of special praetors, or, in exceptional circumstances, by consuls, during their term of office. Accordingly, the number of praetors was increased from four in 227 BC to eight at the time of Sulla.

(2) Second period.—In accordance with the reforms of Sulla all the consuls and praetors remained at Rome during their year of office, and were intrusted with the administration of provinces a subsequent year with the title proconsul (pro consule) or propraetor (pro praetore). The proconsuls were sent to the more important provinces. The senate determined the distinction between consular and praetorian provinces and generally controlled the assignment of the provinces to the ex-magistrates. Julius Caesar increased the praetors to sixteen, but Augustus reduced them to twelve.

(3) Third period.—In 27 BC, Augustus as commander-in-chief of the Rom army definitely assumed the administration of all provinces which required the presence of military forces and left the other provinces to the control of the senate. There were then twelve imperial and ten senatorial provinces, but all provinces added after 27 BC came under imperial administration. The emperor administered his provinces through the agency of personal delegates, legati Augusti of senatorial, and praefecti or procuratores of equestrian, rank. The term of their service was not uniform, but continued usually for more than a single year. The senatorial administration was essentially a continuation of the post-Sullan, republican régime. The senatorial governors were called proconsuls generally, whether they were of consular or praetorian rank; but Africa and Asia alone were reserved for ex-consuls, the eight remaining senatorial provinces being attributed to ex-praetors. The financial administration of each imperial province was intrusted to a procurator, that of each senatorial province to a quaestor.

The provinces were divided into smaller circumscriptions (civitates) for the purposes of local government. In the older provinces these

3. Division of Provinces districts corresponded generally with the urban communities which had been the units of sovereignty before the advent of the Romans. Under Rom rule they were divided into different classes on the basis of their dignity and prerogatives, as follows:

(1) Coloniae: Rom or Lat colonies established after the model of the Italian commonwealths.

(2) Civitates foederatae: Communities whose independence had been guaranteed by a formal treaty with Rome.

(3) Civitates liberae: Communities whose independence the Romans respected, although not bound to do so by a formal obligation.

(4) Civitates stipendiariae: Communities which had surrendered to the discretion of the Romans and to which limited powers of local government were granted by the conquerors as a matter of convenience.

The civitates stipendiariae, and in some cases the colonies, paid taxes to the Rom government, the greater part of which was in the form either of a certain proportion of the annual products of the soil, such as a fifth or tenth, or a fixed annual payment in money or kind.

Judaea became a part of the province of Syria in 63 BC, but was assigned in 40 BC as a kingdom to Herod the Great, whose sovereignty

4. Province of Judaea became effective three years later. The provincial régime was reestablished in 6 AD, and was broken only during the years 41–44 AD, when Herod Agrippa was granted royal authority over the land (Jos, Ant, XIX, viii, 2). The Rom administration was in the hands of the procurators (see PROCURATORS) who resided at Caesarea (Jos, BJ, II, xv, 6; Acts 23 23.33; 25 1) in the palace of Herod the Great (Acts 23–35). The procurators of Judaea were subject to the authority of the imperial governors of Syria, as is evident from the deposition of Pontius Pilate by Vitellius (Jos, Ant, XVIII, iv, 2; Tac. Ann. vi.32). The procurator was competent to exercise criminal jurisdiction over the provincials in cases involving a capital sentence (Jos, BJ, II, viii, 1), but he was bound to grant an appeal by Rom citizens for trial at Rome (Acts 25 11). A death sentence by the Sanhedrin required the sanction of the procurator, as appears in the process against the Saviour. Under Rom rule cities like Caesarea, Sebaste, and Jerus became organs for local government, like the urban communities in other parts of the Empire.

The revenue of Pal under Claudius is said to have been 12,000,000 denarii (about $2,400,000, or £500,000; cf Jos, Ant, XIX, viii, 2).

5. Revenue In addition to the ground tax, the amount of which is not known, a variety of indirect contributions were collected on auctions, salt, highways, bridges, etc, which constituted, no doubt, the field of activity in which the publicans gained their unenviable reputation.

PROVOCATION, prov-ō-kā'shun, PROVOKE, prō-vōk': "Provoke," lit. "to call forth," hence to excite or stir up, whether in a good or bad sense, appears frequently in the OT as the tr of Piel, or Hiph. of קָרַע, kā'as (noun, קָרָע, ka'as), in the sense of "to make angry" (Dt 4 25; 9 18; 1 K 14 9.15, etc); sometimes of מָרָה, mārāh (Isa 3 8), and of other words. In the NT we have παραζηλώω, parazēlōō, "to make jealous" (Rom 10 19; 11 14); παροργίζω, parorgizō, "to make angry" (Eph 6 4; cf Col 3 21); with παραπικραίνω, parapikrainō, "to embitter" (He 3 16; cf in 1 Esd 6 15), and other Gr words. "Provocation" in He 3 15 (quoting Ps 95 8) is paropikrasmos, LXX for Heb מְרִיבָהּ. An example of the good sense of the word is in He 10 24, "Consider one another to provoke [lit. "to the provoking," here paroxusmōs] unto love and good works."

For "provoke" RV has "despise" (Nu 14 11; Dt 31 20), "rebel against" (Ps 78 40); for "provoked," "despised" (Nu 14 23; 16 30; Isa 1 4), "moved" (Dt 32 16; 1 Ch 21 1), "rebelled against" (Ps 78 56), "were rebellious" (106 33.43); for "provoking" (Ps 78 17), "to rebel against"; for "provoked" (2 Cor 9 2), "stirred up"; "provoked within" for "stirred in" (Acts 17 16); "provoked" for "limited" (Ps 78 41 m, "limited"); "provoketh" for "emboldeneth" (Job 16 3); instead of "Provoke not your children to anger" (Col 3 21), "Provoke not your children."

PRUDENCE, prōō'dens, PRUDENT, prōō'dent: In the OT "prudence" is the tr of מְרִיבָהּ, 'ormāh (Prov 8 12); also in AV of שֵׁכֶל, shekel (2 Ch 2 12, RV "discretion"); and "prudent" is the tr of עָרִים, 'ārūm, "subtle" (Prov 12 16.23; 13 16, etc; cf Gen 3 1; Job 5 12), and of בִּינָה, bīn (1 S 16 18, RVm "skilful"; Prov 16 21; 18 15; Isa 5 21; 10 13, ARV "understanding," etc), with other words. In the NT "prudence" occurs once as the tr of φρόνησις, phrōnēsis (Eph 1 8); "prudent" is in AV the tr of συνετός, sunetōs, changed in RV to "understanding" (Mt 11 25; Acts 13 7); in 1 Cor 1 19, ARV has "the discerning," ERV retains "prudent." In its etymological sense of seeing beforehand (contraction of "providence"), "prudence" does not occur in the NT. As forethought, foresight, prudence was reckoned one of the cardinal virtues by the ancient ethical writers. See the remarks of Coleridge on its lower and higher character in his Aids to Reflection, Aphor. 29.

LITERATURE

I. Introductory Topics.—The Heb title for the Psalter is ṣēpher ṯhillīm, "book of praises." When we consider the fact that more than

1. Title 20 of these poems have praise for their keynote, and that there are outbursts of thanksgiving in many others, the fitness of the Heb title dawns upon us. As Ker well says, "The book begins with benediction, and ends with praise—first, blessing to man, and then glory to God." Hymns of praise, though found in all parts of the Psalter, become far more numerous in Books IV and V, as if the volume of praise would gather itself up into a Hallelujah Chorus at the end.

In the Gr version the book is entitled in some MSS Psalmoi, in others Psaltērion, whence come our Eng. titles "Psalms," and "Psalter." The Gr word psalmos, as well as the Heb mizmōr, both of which are used in the superscriptions prefixed to many of the separate pss, indicates a poem sung to the accompaniment of stringed instruments. The title mizmōr is found before 57 pss. The Psalter was the hymnal of the Jewish nation. To individual pss other titles are sometimes prefixed, such as shūr, "song"; ṯhillāh, "praise"; ṯphillāh, "prayer," etc. The Psalter was both prayerbook and hymnal to the Jewish people. It was also a manual for the nurture of the spiritual life in private as well as public worship.

The Pss were placed in the ketūbhīm or "Writings," the third group of the Heb Scriptures. As the chief book of the ketūbhīm, the Psalter appears first in the great majority of German MSS, though the Spanish MSS place Pss after Ch, and the Palm puts Ruth before Pss. There has never been any serious question as to the right of the Psalter to a place in the Canon of Scripture. The book is possibly more highly esteemed among Christians than by the Jews. If Christians were permitted to retain only one book in the OT, they would almost certainly choose Pss. By 100 BC, and probably at a much earlier date, the Book of Pss was completed and recognized as part of the Harīograp̄ha, the 3d division of the Heb Bible.

According to the Heb text, followed by modern VSS, there are 150 separate poems in the Psalter. The Gr version has an additional ps, in which David describes his victory over Goliath; but this is expressly said to be "outside the number." The LXX, followed by Vulg, combined Pss 9 and 10, and also 114 and 115, into a single ps. On the other hand, they divide Pss 116 and 147 each into two poems.

Thus for the greater part of the Psalter the Heb enumeration is one number in advance of that in the Gr and Lat Bibles.

The existing division in the Heb text has been called in question at various points. Pss 42 and 43 are almost certainly one poem (see refrain in 42 5.11; 43 5); and it is probable that Pss 9 and 10 were originally one, as in LXX. On the other hand, it is thought by some that certain pss were composed of two originally separate poems. We may cite as examples Ps 19 1-6.7-14; 24 1-6.7-10; 27 1-6.7-14; 36 1-4.5-12. It is evident that such combinations of two different poems into one may have taken place, for we have an example in Ps 108, which is composed of portions of two other pss (57 7-11; 60 5-12).

(1) Value of the superscriptions.—It is the fashion among advanced critics to waive the titles of the pss out of court as wholly worthless and misleading. This method is as the Hebrew thoroughly unscientific as the older Text procedure of defending the superscriptions as part of an inspired text.

These titles are clearly very old, for the LXX, in the 2d cent. BC, did not understand many of them. The worst that can be said of the superscriptions is that they are guesses of Heb editors and scribes of a period long prior to the Gr version. As to many of the musical and liturgical titles, the best learning of Heb and Christian scholars is unable to recover the original meaning. The scribes who prefixed the titles had no conceivable reason for writing nonsense into their prayerbook and hymnal. These superscriptions and subscriptions all had a worthy meaning, when they were first placed beside individual pss. This indisputable fact of the great antiquity of these titles ought forever to make it impossible for scientific research to ignore them. Grant, for the sake of argument, that not one of them came from the pen of the writers of the Pss, but only from editors and compilers of exilic or post-exilic days, it would still be reasonable to give attention to the views of ancient Heb scholars, before considering the conjectures of modern critics on questions of authorship and date. Sources of information, both oral and written, to which they had access, have long since perished. In estimating the value of their work, we have a right to use the best critical processes known to us; but it is unscientific to overlook the fact that their proximity to the time of the composition of the Pss gave them an advantage over the modern scholar. If it be said by objectors that these ancient scribes formed their conclusions by the study of the life of David as portrayed in the historical books of K and Ch, the reply is ready that several historical notices in the titles cannot be thus explained. Who was Cush? Who was Abimelech? (Pss 7 and 34). A careful weighing of the facts concerning the superscriptions will make it seem highly improbable that the earliest of these titles does not reach back into pre-exilic times. We almost certainly have in them the results of the labors of Heb scribes and compilers stretching over several centuries. Some of the titles may have been appended by the psalmists themselves.

We are far from claiming that the titles are always intelligible to us, or that, when understood, they are always correct. The process of constructing titles indicative of authorship had not ceased in the 2d cent. BC, the LXX adding many to pss that were anonymous in the Heb. The view expressed nearly 50 years ago by Perowne is eminently sane: "The inscriptions cannot always be relied on. They are sometimes genuine, and really represent the most ancient tradition. At other times, they are due to the caprice of later editors and collectors, the fruits of conjecture, or of dimmer and more uncertain traditions. In short, the inscriptions of the Pss are like the subscriptions to the Epp. of the NT. They are not of any necessary authority, and their value must be weighed and tested by the usual critical processes."

(2) Thirtle's theory.—J. W. Thirtle (The Titles of the Ps., 1904) advances the hypothesis that both superscriptions and subscriptions were incorporated in the Psalter, and that in the process of copying the Ps by hand, the distinction between the superscription of a given ps and the subscription of the one immediately preceding it was finally lost. When at length the different ps were separated from one another, as in printed edd, the subscriptions and superscriptions were all set forth as superscriptions. Thus it came about that the musical subscription of a given ps was prefixed to the literary superscription of the ps immediately following it. The prayer of Habakkuk (Hab 3) was taken by Thirtle as a model or normal ps; and in this instance the superscription was literary, "A prayer of Habakkuk the prophet upon Shigionoth," while the subscription is musical, "For the Chief Musician, on my stringed instruments." The poem of Hezekiah in celebration of his recovery (Isa 38 9-20) seems to support Thirtle's thesis, the superscription stating the authorship and the occasion that gave birth to the ps, while ver 20 hints at the musical instruments with which the ps was to be accompanied in public worship. If now the musical notes be separated from the notes of authorship and date that follow them, the musical notes being appended as subscriptions, while the literary notes are kept as real superscriptions, the outcome of the separation is in many instances a more intelligible nexus between title and poem. Thus the subscript to Ps 55, "The dove of the distant terebinths," becomes a pictorial title of vs 6-8 of the ps. The application of the rule that the expression "for the Chief Musician" is always a subscript removes the difficulty in the title of Ps 88. The superscription of Ps 88, on Thirtle's hypothesis, becomes "Maschil of Heman the Ezrahite." Ps 87 thus has a subscript that repeats the statement of its superscription, but with an addition which harmonizes with the content of the poem. "Mahalath Leannoth," with a slight correction in vocalization, probably means "Dancings with Shoutings," and ver 7 of Ps 87 speaks of both singing and dancing. The tone of Ps 87 is exceedingly cheerful; but Ps 88 is the saddest in the entire Psalter. The application of Thirtle's hypothesis also leaves Ps 88 with a consistent literary title, whereas the usual title ascribes the ps first to the sons of Korah and then to Heman the Ezrahite.

(3) Meaning of the Hebrew titles.—Scholars have not been able to come to agreement as to the meaning and application of a goodly number of words and phrases found in the titles of the Ps. We append an alphabetical list, together with hints as to the probable meaning:

(a) Ayeleth ha-Shahar (Ps 22) means "the hind of the morning," or possibly "the help of the morning." Many think that the words were the opening line of some familiar song.

(b) Alamoth (Ps 46) means "maidens." The common view is that the ps was to be sung by soprano voices. Some speak of a female choir and compare 1 Ch 15 20; Ps 68 11, 24 f. According to Thirtle, the title is a subscript to Ps 45, which describes the marriage of a princess, a function at which it would be quite appropriate to have a female choir.

(c) Al-tasheth (Ps 57-59; 75) means "destroy not," and is quite suitable as a subscript to Ps 56-58 and 74 (cf Dt 9 26). Many think this the first word of a vintage song (cf Isa 65 8).

(d) "Ascents, Song of" (Ps 120-134): RV translates the title to 15 ps "A Song of Ascents," where AV has "A Song of Degrees." The most probable explanation of the meaning of the expression is that these 15 ps were sung by bands of pilgrims on their way to the yearly feasts in Jerus (Ps 122 4). Ps 121-23, 125, 127, 128 and 132-34 are well suited for use on such occasions (see, however, Expos T, XII, 62).

(e) "For the Chief Musician": 55 ps are dedicated to the precentor or choir leader of the temple. "To the Chief Musician" might mean that the precentor was the author of certain ps, or that there was a collection of hymns compiled by him for use in temple worship, or that certain ps were placed in his hands, with suggestions as to the character of the poems and the music which was to accompany them. It is quite likely that there was an official collection of ps for public worship in the custody of the choir-master of the temple.

(f) "Dedication of the House" (Ps 30): The title probably refers to the dedication of Jeh's house; whether in the days of David, in connection with the removal of the ark to Jerus, or in the days of Zerubbabel, or in the time of Judas Maccabaeus. It is impossible to say positively. If Ps 30 was used on any one of these widely separated occasions, that fact might account for the insertion of the caption, "a Song at the Dedication of the House."

(g) "Degrees": see "Ascents" above.

(h) Githith (Ps 8, 81, 84) is commonly supposed to refer to an instrument invented in Gath or to a tune that was used in the Philii city. Thirtle emends slightly to githoth, "wine presses," and connects Ps 7, 80 and 83 with the Feast of Tabernacles.

(i) Higgayon: This word is not strictly a title, but occurs in connection with Seläh in Ps 9 16. RV translates the word in Ps 92 3, "a solemn sound," and in Ps 19 14, "meditation." It is probably a musical note equivalent to largo.

(j) Yedhuthän: In the title of Ps 39, Jeduthän might well be identical with the Chief Musician. In Ps 62 and 77 RV renders "after the manner of Jeduthän." We know from 1 Ch 16 41; 25 3 that Yeduthän (q.v.) was a choir leader in the days of David. He perhaps introduced a method of conducting the service of song which ever afterward was associated with his name.

(k) Yänath 'elem r'hökim (Ps 56): We have already called attention to the fact that as a subscript to Ps 55 "the dove of the distant terebinths," or "the silent dove of them that are afar off," would have a point of contact with Ps 55 6-8.

(l) Mahälath (Ps 53), Mahälath l'annoth (Ps 88): Perhaps Thirtle's vocalization of the Heb consonants as mehölöth, "dancings," is correct. As a subscript to Ps 87, mehölöth may refer to David's joy at the bringing of the ark to Zion (2 S 6 14, 15).

(m) Maschil (Ps 32, 42-45, 52-55, 74, 78, 88, 89, 142): The exact meaning of this common term is not clear. Briggs suggests "a meditation," Thirtle and others "a ps of instruction," Kirkpatrick "a cunning ps." Some of the 13 ps bearing this title are plainly didactic, while others are scarcely to be classed as ps of instruction.

(n) Mikhtäm (Ps 16, 56-60): Following the rabbinical guess, some translate "a golden poem." The exact meaning is unknown.

(o) Müth lobben: The title is generally supposed to refer to a composition entitled "Death of the Son." Possibly the melody to which this composition was sung was the tune to which Ps 9 (or 8) was to be sung. Thirtle translates "The Death of the Champion," and regards it as a subscription to Ps 8, in celebration of the victory over Goliath.

(p) On "N'ghinöth" occurs 6 t (Ps 4, 6, 54, 55, 67, 76), and means "with stringed instruments." N'ghinöth (Ps 61) may be a slightly defective writing for N'ghinöth. Perhaps stringed instruments alone were used with ps having this title. According to Thirtle's hypothesis, the title was originally a subscript to Ps 3, 5, 53, 54, 60, 66, 75.

(q) N'hilöth (Ps 5), possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," possibly flutes.

(r) Seläh, though not strictly a title, may well be discussed in connection with the superscriptions. It occurs 71 t in the Ps and 3 t in Hab. It is almost certainly a technical term whose meaning was well known to the precentor and the choir in the temple. The LXX always, Symmachus and Theodotion generally, render diapsalma, which probably denotes an instrumental interlude. The Tg Aquila and some other ancient VSS render "forever." Jerome, following Aquila, translates it "always." Many moderns derive Seläh from a root meaning "to raise," and suppose it to be a sign to the musicians to strike up with a louder accompaniment. Possibly the singing ceased for a moment. A few think it is a liturgical direction to the congregation to "lift up" their voices in benediction. It is unwise to dogmatize as to the meaning of this very common word. See SELÄH.

(s) Sheminüth (Ps 6, 12), meaning "the eighth," probably denotes the male choir, as distinguished from Alamoth, the maidens' choir. That both terms are musical notes is evident from 1 Ch 15 19-21.

(t) Shiggayön (Ps 7) is probably a musical note. Some think it denotes "a dithyrambic poem in wild ecstatic wandering rhythms, with corresponding music."

(u) Shöshannim (Ps 45, 69) means "lilies." Shöshannim 'edhüth (Ps 80) means "lilies, a testimony." Shöshannim 'edhüth (Ps 60) may be rendered "the lily of testimony." Thirtle represents these titles as subscriptions to Ps 44, 59, 68, 79, and associates them with the spring festival, Passover. Others regard them as indicating the melody to which the various ps were to be sung.

(v) "Song of Loves" (Ps 45) is appropriate as a literary title to a marriage song.

(4) Testimony of the titles as to authorship.—(a) Ps 90 is ascribed to Moses. (b) To David 73 ps are ascribed, chiefly in Books I and II. (c) Two are assigned to Solomon (Ps 72, 127). (d) 12 are ascribed to Asaph (Ps 50, 73-83). (e) 11 are assigned to the sons of Korah (Ps 42-49, 84, 85, 87). (f) Ps 88 is attributed to Heman the Ezrahite. (g) Ps 89 bears the name of Ethan the Ezrahite. In most cases it is plain that the editors meant to indicate the authors or writers of the ps. It is possible that the phrase "to David" may sometimes have been prefixed to certain ps, merely to indicate that they were found in a collection which contained Davidic ps. It is also possible that the titles "to Asaph" and "to the sons of Korah" may have originally meant that the ps thus designated belonged to a collection in the custody of these temple singers.

Ps 72 may also be a prayer for Solomon rather than a ps by Solomon. At the same time, we must acknowledge, in the light of the titles describing the occasion of composition, that the most natural interpretation of the various superscriptions is that they indicate the supposed authors of the various poems to which they are prefixed. Internal evidence shows conclusively that some of these titles are incorrect. Each superscription should be tested by a careful study of the ps to which it is appended.

(5) Titles describing the occasion of writing.—There are 13 of these, all bearing the name of David. (a) Pss 7, 59, 56, 34, 52, 57, 142, 54 are assigned to the period of his persecution by Saul. (b) During the period of his reign over all Israel, David is credited with Pss 18, 60, 51, 3 and 63.

II. The Authorship and Age of the Pss.—Ps 90 is ascribed to Moses. It is the fashion now to deny that Moses wrote anything. A careful study of Ps 90 has brought to light nothing inconsistent with Mosaic authorship. The dignity, majesty and pathos of the poem are worthy of the great lawgiver and intercessor.

(1) The age of David offered fruitful soil for the growth of religious poetry.—(a) The political and religious reforms of Samuel created a

1. David as new sense of national unity, and kindled the fires of religious patriotism.

(b) Music had a large place in the life of the prophetic guilds or schools of the prophets, and was used in public religious exercises (1 S 10 5 f). (c) The victories of David and the internal expansion of the life of Israel would inevitably stimulate the poetic instinct of men of genius; of the Elizabethan age and the Victorian era in Eng. literature. (d) The removal of the ark to the new capital and the organization of the Levitical choirs would stimulate poets to compose hymns of praise to Jeh (2 S 6; 1 Ch 15, 16, 25).

It is the fashion in certain critical circles to blot out the Mosaic era as unhistoric, all accounts of it being considered legendary or mythical. It is easy then to insist on the elimination of all the higher religious teaching attributed to Samuel. This leaves David "a rude king in a semi-barbaric age," or, as Cheyne puts it, "the versatile condottiere, chieftain, and king." It would seem more reasonable to accept as trustworthy the uniform tradition of Israel as to the great leaders, Moses, Samuel and David, than to rewrite Israel's history out of the tiny fragments of historical material that are accepted by skeptical critics as credible. It is often said that late writers read into their accounts of early heroes their own ideas of what would be fitting. James Robertson's remark in reply has great weight: "This habit of explaining the early as the backward projection of the late is always liable to the objection that it leaves the late itself without explanation" (Poetry and Religion of the Pss, 332).

(2) David's qualifications for composing pss.—

(a) He was a skilful musician, with a sense of rhythm and an ear for pleasing sounds (1 S 16 15-23). He seems to have invented new instruments of music (Am 6 5). (b) He is recognized by critics of all schools as a poet of no mean ability. The genuineness of his elegy over Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1 19-27) is commonly accepted; also his lament over Abner (3 33 f). In the elegy over Saul and Jonathan, David displays a magnanimity and tenderness that accord with the representations of S as to his treatment of Saul and of Jonathan. No mere rough border chieftain could have composed a poem full of the tenderest sentiment and the most exemplary attitude toward a persecutor. The moral elevation of the elegy has to be accounted for. If the author was a deeply religious man, a man enjoying the friendship of God, it is easy to account for the moral dignity of the poem. Surely it is only a step from the patriotism and magnanimity and devoted friendship of the elegy to the religious fervor of the Pss. Moreover, the poetic skill displayed in the elegy removes the possible objection that literary art in the days of David had not attained a development equal to the composition of poems such as the Pss. There is nothing more beautiful and artistic in the entire Psalter.

Radical critics saw the David of the Bible asunder. They contrast the rough border chieftain with the pious Psalmist. Though willing to believe every statement that reflects upon the moral character of David, they consider the references to David as a writer of hymns and the organizer of the temple choirs as the pious imaginings of late chroniclers. Robertson well says: "This habit of refusing to admit complexity in the capacities of Bib. characters is exceedingly hazardous and unsafe, when history is so full of instances of the combination in one person of qualities the most diverse. We not only have poets who can harp upon more than one string, but we have religious leaders who have united the most fervent piety with the exercise of poorly developed virtue, or the practice of very questionable policy. A critic, if he has not a single measure of large enough capacity for a historical character, should not think himself at liberty to measure him out in two half-hushels, making one man of each" (Poetry and Religion of the Pss, 332). Among kings, Charlemagne and Constantine the Great have been likened to David; and among poets, Robert Burns. There were contradictory elements in the moral characters of all these gifted men. Of Constantine it has been said that he "was by turns the docile believer and the cruel despot, devotee and murderer, patron saint and avenging demon." David was a many-sided man, with a character often at war with itself, a man with conflicting impulses, the flesh lusting against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh. Men of flesh and blood in the midst of life's temptations have no difficulty in understanding the David of the Bible.

(c) David was a man of deep feeling and of imperial imagination. Think of his love for Jonathan, his grateful appreciation of every exploit done in his behalf by his mighty men, his fondness for Absalom. His successful generalship would argue for imagination, as well as the vivid imagery of the elegy. (d) David was an enthusiastic worshipper of Jeh. All the records of his life agree in representing him as devoted to Israel's God. In the midst of life's dangers and disappointments, "David strengthened himself in Jeh his God" (1 S 30 6). We should have been surprised had no trace of religious poetry come from his pen. It would be difficult to imagine Milton or Cowper or Tennyson as confining himself to secular poetry. "Comus," "John Gilpin," and the "Charge of the Light Brigade" did not exhaust their genius; nor did the elegy over Saul and Jonathan and the lament over Abner relieve David's soul of the poetry that clamored for expression. The known facts of his life and times prepare us for an outburst of psalmody under his leadership. (e) The varied experiences through which David passed were of a character to quicken any latent gifts for poetic expression.

James Robertson states this argument clearly, and yet with becoming caution: "The vicissitudes and situations in David's life presented in these narratives are of such a nature that, though we may not be able to say precisely that such and such a ps was composed at such and such a time and place, yet we may confidently say, Here is a man who has passed through certain experiences and borne himself in such wise that we are not surprised to hear that, being a poet, he composed this and the other ps. It is very doubtful whether we should tie down any lyric to a precise set of circumstances, the poet being like a painter, who, having found a fit landscape, sits down to transfer it to canvas. I do not think it likely that David, finding himself in some great perplexity or sorrow, called for writing materials in order to describe the situation or record his feelings. But I do think it probable that the vicissitudes through which he passed made such an impression on his sensitive heart, and became so inwrought into an emotional nature, that when he soothed himself in his retirement with his lyre, they came forth spontaneously in the form of a psalm or song or prayer, according as the recollection was sad or joyful, and as his singing mood moved him" (Poetry and Religion of the Pss, 343 f).

The Bib. writers, both early and late, agree in affirming that the Spirit of Jeh rested upon David, empowering him for service of the highest order (1 S 16 13; 2 S 23 1-3; Mt 22 43; Acts 2 29-31). The gift of prophetic inspiration was bestowed upon Israel's chief musician and poet.

(3) External evidence for Davidic pss.—(a) In the NT David is named as the author of certain pss. Thus Ps 110 is ascribed to David by Jesus in His debate with the Pharisees in the Temple (Mt 22 41-45; Mk 12 35-37; Lk 20 41-44). Peter teaches that David prophesied concerning Judas (Acts 1 16), and he also refers Pss 16 and 110 to David (Acts 2 25-34). The whole company of the disciples in prayer attribute Ps 2 to David (Acts 4 25 f.). Paul quotes Pss 32 and 69 as Davidic (Rom 4 6-8; 11 9 f.). The author of He even refers Ps 95 to David, following the LXX (He 4 7). From the last-named passage many scholars infer that any quotation from the Pss might be referred to David as the chief author of the Pss. Possibly this free and easy method of citation, without any attempt at rigorous critical accuracy, was in vogue in the 1st cent. AD. At the same time, it is evident that the view that David was the chief author of the Pss was accepted by the NT writers. (b) In 2 Macc 2 13 (RV), in a letter purporting to have been written by the Jews of Pal to their brethren in Egypt, about 144 BC, occurs the following: "And the same things were related both in the public archives and in the records that concern Nehemiah; and how he, founding a library, gathered together the books about the kings and prophets, and the books of David, and letters of kings about sacred gifts." We do not know the exact date of 2 Macc, but it was almost certainly in the 1st cent. BC. The author regards David as the author of books in the sacred library gathered together by Nehemiah. (c) Jesus the Son of Sirach, who wrote not later than 180 BC, and possibly a good deal earlier, thus describes David's contribution to public worship: "In every work of his he gave thanks to the Holy One Most High with words of glory; with his whole heart he sang praise, and loved him that made him" (Ecclesi 47 81 RV). David's fame as a psalmist and the organizer of choirs for the sanctuary was well known to Ben Sira at the beginning of the 2d cent. BC. (d) The author of Ch, writing not later than 300 BC, and probably much earlier, represents David as making provision for a service of song before the ark of God and in connection with its removal to the city of David (1 Ch 15, 16). It seems to be imagined by some scholars that the Chronicler, whose historical accuracy is severely attacked by certain critics, is responsible for the idea that David was a great writer of hymns. On the contrary, he has less to say about David as a poet and psalmist than the author of S. Only in 2 Ch 29 30 is there explicit mention of David as the author of praises to Jeh. The Chronicler speaks repeatedly of the instruments of David and of his organization of the choirs. And so in the kindred books of Ezr and Neh there is mention of the style of worship introduced by David (Ezr 3 10; Neh 12 24, 36). The author of the Book of K refers repeatedly to David as a model king (1 K 11 4; 2 K 14 3; 20 5 f, etc.). He becomes a witness for the high reputation of David for uprightness and religious zeal. (e) Amos refers incidentally to David's great skill as an inventor of musical instruments (Am 6 5). The same prophet is a witness to the fact that songs were sung in worship at Bethel to the accompaniment of harps or viols (Am 5 23). (f) The earliest witness, or witnesses, if the narrative be composite, we find in 1 and 2 S. David is described as a wonderful musician and as one on whom the Spirit of Jeh rested mightily (1 S 16 13-23). He is credited with the beautiful elegy over Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1 17-27) and the brief lament over Abner (2 S 3 33 f.). He is said to have danced with joy before the ark, and to have brought it up to Jerus with shouting and with sound of trumpet (2 S 6 12 ff.). He is credited with the pious wish that he might build a temple for Jeh and the ark, and is said to have poured forth a prayer of thanksgiving to Jeh for the promise of a perpetual throne (2 S 7). David dedicated to Jeh much wealth taken from his enemies (2 S 8 11). Both the good and the bad in David's life and character are faithfully set forth in the vivid narrative.

We come next to two statements that would settle the question of David's pss, if critics would only accept them as the work of an author living within a generation or so of the time of David. Unfortunately 2 S 21-24 is regarded by most critical scholars as an appendix to the early narrative of David's career. There is no agreement as to the exact date of the composition of these chapters. Naturally the burden of proof is on the critic who tries to disintegrate a document, and suspicion of bias is inevitable, if by the disintegration he is able to escape the force of a disagreeable argument. Happily, we live in a free country, every man having a right to hold and to express his own opinion, for whatever it may be worth. It seems to the present writer that 2 S 21-24 may well have come from the pen of the early narrator who told the story of David's reign in such a masterly fashion. Even if these chapters were added by a later editor as an appendix, there is no sufficient reason for putting this writer so late as the exile. His statements cannot be set aside as unreliable, simply because they run counter to the current theory as to the date of the Pss. 2 S 22 purports to give the words of a song which David spake to Jeh, when he had been delivered from Saul and from all his enemies. Ps 18 is evidently a different recension of the same poem. The differences between 2 S 22 and Ps 18 are not much greater than the differences in the various edd of "Rock of Ages." Only the most advanced critics deny that David wrote this glorious song. 2 S 23 1-7 must not be omitted, for here David claimed prophetic inspiration as the sweet Psalmist of Israel. This original and striking poem is worthy of the brilliant royal bard. (g) The titles of the Pss are external evidence of real value for determining the date and authorship of the Pss; and these ascribe 73 to David. A sweeping denial of all the forms of external evidence for Davidic pss ought to be buttressed by convincing arguments from internal evidence. Unverified conjectures will not answer.

(4) Internal evidence for Davidic pss.—The fact that many of the pss ascribed to David correspond in tone and temper and in historical allusions with incidents in his life, while not in itself convincing proof that David wrote them, certainly reinforces the external evidence in favor of Davidic pss. We must refer the reader to the commentaries of Delitzsch, Kirkpatrick, Perowne and others for the evidence discovered in individual pss. In many pss the evidence is strongly in favor of the superscriptions, in which David is named as the writer. See esp. Pss 18, 23, 32, 3.

(5) Number of Davidic pss.—Opinion varies among conservative scholars all the way from 3 or 4 to 44 or 45. It has come to pass that a critic who acknowledges even Ps 18 to be David's is called conservative. In fact, the more radical critics regard a scholar as conservative if he assigns even a small group of pss to the period before the exile. We must not allow ourselves to be deterred from ascribing to David any ps that seems to us, on the basis of both external and internal evidence, to come from his pen. Delitzsch and Kirkpatrick are safer guides than Cheyne and Duhm. Maclaren also has made a close and sympathetic study of David's life and character, and accepts the results of sane criticism. W. T. Davison (HDB, IV) speaks out clearly and strongly for Davidic authorship of Pss 7, 11, 17, 18, 19 (first half), 24 and a few other pss or parts of pss, though he makes large concessions to the present tendency to bring down the pss to a later date. He stands firmly for a large body of pre-exilic pss. Ewald assigned to David Pss 3, 4, 7, 8, 11, 18, 19, 24, 29, 32, 101; also 60 8-11 and 68 14-19. Hitzig ascribed to David Pss 3-19, with the exception of 5, 6 and 14. If one follows the titles in the Heb text, except where internal evidence clearly contradicts the superscriptions, it will be easy to follow Delitzsch in attributing 44 or 45 pss to David.

(1) Pss of Asaph (73-83, also 50).—The prophetic spirit throbs in most of the pss ascribed to ASAPH (q.v.). God is pictured as a righteous Judge. He is also pictured as the Shepherd of Israel. Ps 73 holds fast to God's righteous rule of mankind, in spite of the prosperity of the wicked. Ps 50, which is assigned by many to the time of Hosea and Isaiah, because of its powerful prophetic message, may well have come from Asaph, the contemporary of David and of Nathan. Some of the Asaph group, notably 74 and 79, belong to the period of the exile or later. The family of Asaph continued for centuries to lead in the service of song (2 Ch 35 15; Neh 7 44). Inspired poets were raised up from age to age in the Asaph guild.

(2) Pss of the sons of Korah (42-49, 84, 85, 87).—This family of singers was prominent in the temple-worship in the days of David and afterward. Several of the most beautiful poems in the Psalter are ascribed to members of this guild (see Pss 42, 43, 45, 46, 49, 84). We are not to think of these poems as having been composed by a committee of the sons of Korah; no doubt each poem had an individual author, who was willing to sink his personality in the ps he was composing. The privileges and blessings of social worship in the sanctuary are greatly magnified in this group of pss.

(3) Pss of Solomon (72, 127).—Even conservative critics are in doubt as to the Solomonic authorship of the two pss ascribed to him by the titles. Perhaps assurance is not attainable in the present state of inquiry. Delitzsch well says: "Under Solomon psalmody already began to decline; all the productions of the mind of that period bear the stamp of thoughtful contemplation rather than of direct feeling, for restless yearning for higher things had given place to sensuous enjoyment, national concentration to cosmopolitan expansion."

(4) The era of Jehoshaphat.—Delitzsch and others regard the period of Jehoshaphat as one of literary productivity. Possibly Pss 75 and 76 celebrate the deliverance from the great eastern invasion toward the close of Jehoshaphat's reign.

(5) The era of Hezekiah.—The latter half of the 8th cent. BC was one of literary vigor and expansion, esp. in Judah. Perhaps the great deliverance from Sennacherib's invasion is celebrated in Pss 46 and 48.

(6) The period of Jeremiah.—Ehrt and some other scholars are inclined to attribute to Jeremiah a considerable number of pss. Among those which have been assigned to this prophet may be named Pss 31, 35, 38, 40, 55, 69, 71. Those who deny the Davidic authorship of Ps 22 also assign this great poem to Jeremiah. Whether we are able to name definitely any pss of Jeremiah, it seems thoroughly reasonable that he should have been the author of certain of the plaintive poems in the Psalter.

(7) During the exile.—Ps 102 seems to have been composed during the exile. The poet pours out his complaint over the present distress, and reminds Jeh that it is time to have pity upon Zion. Ps 137 pictures the distress of the captives by the rivers of Babylon. The fire and fervor of the poem bespeak an author personally involved in the distress. No doubt other pss in our collection were composed during the captivity in Babylon.

(8) Post-exilic pss.—As specimens of the joyous hymns composed after the return from exile, we may name Pss 85 and 126. Many of the liturgical hymns in the Psalter were no doubt prepared for use in the worship of the second temple. Certain recent critics have extended this class of hymns so as to include the greater part of the Psalter, but that is surely an extreme view. No doubt, the stirring times of Ezra and Nehemiah stimulated poets in Jerus to pour forth thanksgiving and praise to Israel's God. Ewald taught that the latest pss in our collection were composed at this time.

(9) Are there Maccabean pss?—Calvin assigned Pss 44, 74 and 79 to the Maccabean period. If there are Maccabean pss, Calvin has perhaps hit upon three of them. Hitzig assigns to the Maccabean period all the pss from 73 to 150, together with a few pss in the earlier half of the Psalter. Among moderns, Duhm puts practically the whole Psalter in the period from 170 to 70 BC. Gesenius, Ewald, Hupfeld and Dillmann, four of the greatest names in OT criticism, oppose the view that the Psalter contains Maccabean pss. Most recent students admit the possibility of Maccabean pss. The question may well be left open for further investigation.

III. The Growth of the Psalter.—In the Heb text as well as in RV, the Pss are grouped into five books, as follows: Book I, Pss 1-41; Book II, Pss 42-72; Book III, Pss 73-89; Book IV, Pss 90-106; Book V, Pss 107-50.

1. Division into Five Books

It is possible that this division into five books may have been already made before the Chronicler composed his history of Judah (cf 1 Ch 16 36 with Ps 106 48). At the end of Book II appears a subscript which is significant in the history of the Psalter. It is said in Ps 72 20: "The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended." It would seem from this note that the editor who appended it meant to say that in his collection he had included all the pss of David known to him. Singularly enough, the subscript is attached to a ps ascribed to Solomon. Pss 51-70, however, lie near at hand, all of which are attributed to David. Ps 71 is anonymous, and Ps 72 might possibly be considered a prayer for Solomon. There is a further difficulty in the fact that the Second Book of Pss opens with nine poems ascribed to the sons of Korah and to Asaph. It is a very natural conjecture that these nine pss were at one time united with Pss 73-83. With these removed, it would be possible to unite Pss 51-70 with Book I. Then the subscript to Ps 72 would be a fitting close to a roll made up of pss ascribed to David. It is impossible at this late date to trace fully and accurately the history of the formation of the Psalter.

Within the Psalter there lie certain groups of pss which have in a measure retained the form in which they probably once circulated separately. Among these groups may be named the Psalms of Ascents (Pss 120-34), the Asaph group (Pss 73-83), the sons of Korah groups (Pss 42-49, 84-87, except 86), a Mikhtām group (Pss 56-60), a group praising Jeh for His character and deeds (Pss 93-100), to which Pss 90-92 form a fitting introduction. Pss 103-7 constitute another group of praise pss, and Pss 145-50 make a closing Hallelujah group.

The Psalter has had a long and varied history. No doubt the precentor of the temple choir had his own collection of hymns for public worship. Small groups of pss may have been issued also for private use in the home. As time went on, collections were made on different organizing principles. Sometimes hymns attributed to a given author were perhaps brought into a single group. Possibly pss of a certain type, such as Maskil and Mikhtām pss, were gathered together in small collections. How these small groups were partly preserved and partly broken up, in the history of the formation of our present Psalter, will, perhaps, never be known.

IV. The Poetry of the Psalter.—For general discussion of the form of Heb poetry, see POETRY. In the Pss almost all known varieties of poetic parallelism are exemplified. Among moderns, C. A. Briggs has made extensive research into the poetical structure of the Pss. In summing up the result of his study of the various measures employed in the Pss, he classes 89 pss or parts of pss as trimeters, that is, the lines have three main accents; 22 pss or parts he regards as tetrameters, each of the lines having four accented syllables; 25 pss or portions are classed as pentameters, and an equal number as hexameters. He recognizes some variety of measure in certain pss. There is coming to be agreement among Heb scholars that the rhythm of Heb poetry is largely determined by the number of accented syllables to the line. Some critics insist rigorously on perfect regularity, and therefore are compelled to resort to conjectural emendation. See POETRY, HEBREW.

Nine pss are known as alphabetical poems, viz. Pss 9, 10, 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, 145. The most elaborate of these is Ps 119, which is divided into 22 sections of 8 vs each. Each letter of the Heb alphabet occurs 8 t in succession as the initial letter of the verses in its section.

As to strophical structure or stanza formation, there is evidence in certain pss of such organization of the poems. The refrains with which strophes often close form an easy guide to the strophical divisions in certain pss, such as Pss 42, 43, 46, 107. Among Eng. commentators, Briggs pays most attention to strophical structure. There is some evidence of antiphonal singing in connection with the Psalter. It is thought by some that Pss 20 and 21 were sung by responsive choirs. Pss 24 and 118 may each be antiphonal.

V. The Speaker in the Pss.—Smend, in ZATW, 1888, undertook to establish the thesis that the speaker in the Pss is not an individual, but a personification of the Jewish nation or church. At first he was inclined to recognize an individual speaker in Pss 3, 4, 62 and 73, but one year later he interpreted these also as collective. Thus at one stroke individual religious experience is wiped out of the Psalter. A few scholars have accepted Smend's thesis; but the great majority of critics of every school have withheld their assent, and some of the best commentators have shown that the theory is wholly untenable.

Perhaps the best monograph on the subject, for the Ger. student, is one by Emil Balla, Das Ich der Psalmen. Balla's thesis is that the "I" pss, both in the Psalter and in the other books of the OT, are always to be understood as individual, with the exception of those in which from plain data in the text another interpretation of the "I" is necessary. Of 100 pss in which "I" occurs, Balla classes 80 as easy to interpret; in the remaining 20 there might be reasonable room for difference of opinion whether the ps was individual or collective.

Personification is largely used in all parts of the OT. There is no room for doubt that Ps 129, though using "I," "my" and "me," is the language of Israel as a people. The same is true of Ps 124. The author of Ps 126 likewise associates himself with his brethren. The author of Ps 122, however, is evidently speaking for himself individually, when he says in ver 8, "For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say, Peace be within thee." The intelligent reader usually has no difficulty in deciding, after a careful reading of a ps, whether the "I" refers to an individual Israelite or to the congregation of Israel. Sane views on this subject are important, inasmuch as Smend's theory does violence to the strength and power of the individual religious experience of OT believers. In many portions of the OT, national duties are urged, and Israel is addressed as a whole. At the same time, it would be easy to exaggerate the relatively small place that individual religion occupies in the prophetic writings and in the Law. The Psalter absolutely refuses to be shut up in the molds of a rigid nationalism.

VI. The Gospel in the Pss.—Christians love the Psalter as much as the ancient Jew could possibly have done. On every page they discover elements of religious life and experience that are thoroughly Christian. In this respect the earlier dispensation came nearer to the perfection of Christian standards than in political and social organization. Along with the NT, the aged Christian saint desires a copy of the Pss. He passes easily from the Gospels to the Psalter and back again without the sense of shifting from one spiritual level to another. Religious experience was enjoyed and was portrayed by the ancient psalmists so well that no Christian book in the apostolic period was composed to displace the Psalter.

(1) The psalmists are always reverent in their approach to Deity.—Jeh is infinitely holy (Ps 99 3.5.9). Pss 95-100 are models of adoration and worship.

1. The Soul's Converse with God (2) Thirsting for God.—Pss 42 and 43, which were originally one ps, voice the longing of the individual soul for God as no other human composition has been able to express it. Ps 63 is a worthy companion ps of yearning after God.

(3) Praising God.—More than 20 pss have for their keynote praise to God. See esp. Ps 8 1.9; 57 7-11; 71 22-24; 95 1-7. The first three vs of Pss 33, 34, 40, 92 and 105 reveal a rich vocabulary of praise for stammering human lips.

(4) Joy in God's house.—Pss 84 and 122 are classic hymns expressive of joy in public worship in the sanctuary. Religious patriotism has never received a more striking expression than is found in Ps 137 5 f.

(5) Practising the presence of God.—In Pss 91 and 23 the worshipping saint delights his soul with the sense of God's protecting presence. The Shepherd, tender and true, is ever present to shield and to comfort. The shadow of the Almighty is over the saint who dwells in the secret place of the Most High.

(6) God in Nature.—The Psalmist did not go "through Nature up to Nature's God"; for he found God immanent in all things. He heard God's voice in the thunder; felt His breath in the twilight breeze; saw the gleam of His sword in the lightning's flash, and recognized His hand in every provision for the wants of man and the lower animals. See Ps 104, "Hymn of Creation"; Ps 29, "Jeh, the God of the storm"; and the first half of Ps 19, "the heavens are telling."

(7) Love for God's word.—Ps 119 is the classic description of the beauty and power and helpfulness of the Word of God. The second half of Ps 19 is also a gem. Ps 119 was happily named by one of the older commentators "a holy alphabet for Zion's scholars." The Psalmist sings the glories of God's Word as a lamp to guide, as a spring of comfort, and as a fountain of hope.

(8) God's care of all things.—Faith in Divine Providence—both general and special—was a cardinal doctrine with the psalmists; yea more, the very heart of their religion. Ps 65 sings of God's goodness in sunshine and shower, which clothes the meadows with waving grain. The river of God is always full of water. Ps 121, "Jeh thy Keeper," was read by David Livingstone at family worship on the morning when he left home to go out to Africa as a missionary.

(9) God our refuge.—The psalmists were fond of the figure of "taking refuge in God." Jeh was to them a rock of refuge, a stronghold, a high tower, an impregnable fortress. Pss 46, 61 and 62 exalt God as the refuge of His saints. His help is always easy to find. The might and wisdom of God do not overwhelm the inspired singers, but become a theme of devout and joyous contemplation.

Our Lord Jesus found in the Pss prophecies concerning Himself (Lk 24 44-47).

(1) The suffering Saviour.—While hanging on the cross, the mind of Our Messiah Lord turned to the Psalter. He voiced the terrible anguish of His soul in the opening words of Ps 22, and breathed out His spirit at the end with the trustful words of Ps 31 5. He also invited the fulfilment of a Messianic prediction in Ps 69 21 by saying, "I thirst." Isa and the Pss did not fail Him in the hour of His shame, when reproach broke His heart, and there was none to comfort Him. Only Isa 52 13-53 12 surpasses Ps 22 as a picture of Calvary and an interpretation of the significance of the cross. Whether Ps 22 is a direct prophecy of Christ, or only a typically Messianic ps, is in dispute. Every sentence can be applied to Jesus without straining its meaning. If David or some other sufferer took up his harp to sing of his own sorrows, the Spirit of God guided him to describe those of a greater.

Rationalistic critics insist that to apply part of a ps to David and part to Christ introduces confusion. They ridicule the theory of a "double sense," and contend that the language refers to the Psalmist and to him alone, and that the application of certain vs to Our Lord Jesus is only by way of accommodation. This theory ignores the presence and activity of the Holy Spirit altogether; and when men talk of "psychological impossibilities," they may be talking nonsense; for who of us can understand fully the psychological experience of men while receiving revelations from God? The real author of inspired prophecies is the Holy Spirit. His meaning is that which the reverent interpreter most delights to find; and we have evidence that the OT writers did not fully comprehend their own predictions concerning Christ (1 Pet 1 10-12). We ought not to be surprised that we should be unable to explain fully the method of the Holy Spirit's activity in guiding the thought of prophets and psalmists in their predictions of the sufferings of Christ and the glories that should follow them.

(2) The conquering King.—Pss 2 and 110 (with which Ps 72 may be compared) describe the Messiah as Jeh's Son, a mighty Conqueror, who shall overwhelm all foes and reign supported by Jeh. Some will oppose the Messiah, and so perish; others will enter His army as volunteers, and in the end will enjoy the fruits of victory. "It is better to sit on His throne than to be His footstool."

(3) The growing kingdom.—There is room in the earth for no god other than Jeh, the Creator and Redeemer of mankind. Pss 47, 67, 96-100 and 117 are proofs of the glorious missionary outlook of the Psalter. All nations are exhorted to forsake idols and worship Jeh. Ps 47 closes with a picture of the whole world united in the worship of the God of Israel. Ps 67 is a bugle call to all nations to unite in the worship of the true God. Pss 96-100 paint the character of Jeh as a basis of appeal to all nations to turn from idols and worship the God of Abraham. Pss 96 and 98 exalt His righteousness; Ps 97 His power and dominion; Ps 99 His holiness and His fidelity to Israel, while Ps 100 tells of His goodness. Idols will finally go down before a God worthy of men's reverence and love.

The Psalter deals with man as a sinner. Seven of the best known poems in the collection are so charged with a sense of sin and of its deadly fruits that they have been known for centuries as the Penitential Pss (6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143). Besides these poems of penitence and confession, there are many passages elsewhere in the Psalter which depict the sinfulness of men. And yet there are assertions of personal innocence and righteousness in the Psalter that sound like the claims of self-righteous persons (7 3-9; 17 1-5; 18 20-24; 35 11-17; 44 17-22). The psalmists do not mean to affirm that they are sinless before God, but rather that they are righteous in comparison with their foes who are seeking to destroy them. Sometimes they plead for mercy in the same context. The honest exegete does not find the Pharisaic temper in these noble hymns, though he is quite willing to admit that the Christian cannot well employ some of the expressions concerning his own experiences. Jesus requires a humility deeper than that which was attained in OT times.

(1) Confessing sin.—(a) Individual confession: Pss 32 and 51 are notable examples of individual confession. The cries of the penitent in Ps 51 have been repeated by thousands on bended knee as the best expression of their own sense of sin and yearning for forgiveness. (b) National confession (see esp. 78, 95 and 106). Ps 105 celebrates the praises of Jeh for His unflinching kindness to Israel; 106 tells the tale of Israel's repeated rebellion.

(2) Seeking forgiveness.—Ps 51 is the penitent's cry for mercy. Never did the soul of man plead more powerfully for forgiveness. God cannot despise a heart broken and crushed with the sense of sin and pleading like a lost child for home and mother.

(3) Conquering sin.—Ps 130 begins with a cry out of the depths and ends with a note of joy over redemption from sin. The plenteous redemption of which the poet speaks includes triumph over sin in one's heart and life. The cries of the OT saints for victory over sin were not unheeded (139 23 f; 19 13; 119 133). The author of Ps 84 truthfully depicts the life of Jeh's worshippers, "They go from strength to strength." Victory over sin is sure in the end.

The ancient Hebrew seems to have had no temptation to atheism or pantheism. The author of Eccl felt the pull of agnosticism and materialism (Eccl 3 19-21; 9 2-10), but in the end he rejected both (12 7.13 f). The ancient Hebrew found in the world about him one difficulty which seemed almost insuperable. He believed in the wisdom and power and justice of God. How then could it be possible, in a world over which a wise and just God presides, that the wicked should prosper and the righteous suffer? This is the question which is hotly debated by Job and his three friends. A partial solution of the difficulty may be seen in Ps 37, the theme of which is 'the brevity of goddess prosperity, and the certainty that well-doing will lead to well-being.' A better solution is attained in Ps 73, which depicts God's attitude toward the wicked and toward the righteous. The wicked will be suddenly overthrown, while the righteous will live forever in the enjoyment of communion with God. Not even death can sever him from God. The fleeting pleasures of proud scoffers pale into insignificance before the glories of everlasting fellowship with God.

(1) Out of the depths of persecution and slander the author of Ps 31 climbed into his refuge, as he exclaimed, "In the covert of thy

5. Out of the Depths presence wilt thou hide them from the plottings of man: Thou wilt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues." (2) Ps 77 is a stairway out of the depths of suspense and anxiety. The experience of the author well illustrates Maclaren's epigram, "If out of the depths we cry, we shall cry ourselves out of the depths." (3) The author of Ps 116 looked into the jaws of death. Perhaps no other ps has so much to say of physical death. The singer is filled with gratitude as he reviews the deadly peril from which Jeh has saved him. (4) Ps 88 is unique, because it is sad and plaintive from beginning to end. The singer has long cried for deliverance from bodily weakness and from loneliness. (5) Out of the depths of disaster and defeat the authors of Pss 60, 74, 79 and 89 cry to God. The Bab exile was a sore trial to patriotic Jews. They mourned over the destruction of their beautiful temple and the holy city in which their fathers had worshipped. The author of Ps 60 closes with hope and confidence (60 12).

"Unquestionably in the Pss we reach the high-water mark of OT practical piety, the best that the OT can exhibit of heart-religion."

6. Ethical Ideals (1) What sort of man, then, would the Pss acclaim as good?—Ps 1 opens with a vivid contrast between the righteous and the wicked. Ps 15 is the most complete description of a good man to be found in the Psalter. The picture is drawn in answer to the question, What sort of man will Jeh receive as an acceptable worshipper? The morality of the Bible is rooted in religion, and the religion of the Bible blossoms and bears fruit in the highest ethics known to man. Ps 131 makes humility a prime quality in real goodness. Ps 133 magnifies the spirit of brotherly love. The social virtues had a large place in the psalmists' ideals of goodness. Humility and brotherly love are a guaranty of peace in the home, the church and the nation. Ps 24 4 is a compend of ethics in a single sentence.

(2) The ethics of speech.—Even a casual reading of the Pss must impress one with the fact that the psalmists felt very keenly the lies and slanders and boastings of the wicked. Stirred with righteous indignation, they call upon God to awake and confront the blatant foes of truth and righteousness (see esp. Pss 12, 52 and 120).

(3) Ministering to the needy.—Bible readers are familiar with the ideal of the good man in Job 29 12-16; 31 13-22. Ps 82 is a plea for justice. Venal judges are one day to confront the great Judge. Men need fair play first. Perhaps there will then be no occasion for the exercise of almsgiving. Ps 41 is a plea for kindness. The Christian reader is reminded of the words of Jesus, "Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy." The Ideal Ruler is both just and beneficent (Ps 72 2.12-14).

To be a good lover one must know how to hate. The excitement of battle throbs in many of the Pss.

7. Praying against the Wicked The enemies of righteousness are victorious and defiant. Their taunts drive the psalmists to importunate prayer. Jeh's honor is at stake and His cause in peril. More than 20 pss contain prayer for the defeat and overthrow of the wicked. Warlike imagery of the boldest kind is found in many of the imprecatory pss. To the Christian reader some of the curses pronounced against the wicked are startling and painful. Many are led to wonder how such imprecations ever found a place in the Bible. The most severe curses are found in Pss 35, 69 and 109. Maclaren's words are well worth reading as an introduction to Ps 109: "For no private injuries, or for those only in so far as the suffering singer is a member of the community which represents God's cause, does he ask the descent of God's vengeance, but for the insults and hurts inflicted on righteousness. The form of these maledictions belongs to a lower stage of revelation; the substance of them, considered as passionate desires for the destruction of evil, burning zeal for the triumph of truth, which is God's cause, and unquenchable faith that He is just, is a part of Christian perfection." Two remarks may be made, as suggestions to the student of the Psalter: (1) We ought to study the pss of imprecation in the light of their origin. They are poetry and not prose; and De Witt reminds us that the language of oriental poetry is that of exaggerated passion. Some of these imprecations pulse with the throb of actual battle. Swords are drawn, and blood is flowing. The champion of Jeh's people prays for the overthrow of His foes. The enemies cursed are men who break every moral law and defy God. The Psalmist identifies himself with Jeh's cause. "Do not I hate them, O Jeh, that hate thee? And am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee? I hate them with perfect hatred: They are become mine enemies" (Ps 139 21 f). Thus the psalmists pray with God's glory in view. (2) We ought to use the imprecatory pss in the light of Our Lord's teaching. We cannot pronounce curses on our personal enemies. This heavenly artillery may be turned upon the saloon, the brothel and the gambling hell, though we must not forget to pray for the conversion of the persons who are engaged in these lines of business.

"If a man die, shall he live again?" What answer do the Pss give to Job's cry for light? There are expressions in the Psalter which seem to forbid hope of a blessed immortality (Ps 6 5; 30 9; 39 13; 115 17). The psalmists are tempted to fear that fellowship with God would cease at death. Let this fact, however, be borne in mind, that not one of the poets or prophets of Israel settled down to a final denial of immortality. Some of them had moments of joyous assurance of a blessed life of fellowship with God in the world to come. Life everlasting in the presence of Jeh is the prospect with which the author of Ps 16 refreshes himself (16 8-11). The vision of God's face after the sleep of death is better than worldly prosperity (17 13-15). The author of Ps 73 wins rest for his distressed mind in the assurance of a fellowship with God that cannot be broken (73 23-26). God will finally take the singer to Himself. It has been well said that Ps 49 registers the high-water mark of OT faith in a future life. Death becomes the shepherd of the wicked who trusted in riches, while God redeems the righteous from the power of Sheol and takes the believing soul to Himself.

LITERATURE.—One of the most elaborate and informing articles on the history of the exposition of the Pss is found in the Intro to Delitzsch's Comm. (pp. 64-87, ET). Among the Fathers, Jerome, Chrysostom and Augustine are most helpful. Among the Reformers, Calvin, the prince of expositors, is most valuable. Among modern commentators, Ewald and Delitzsch are scholarly and sane. Their comms. are accessible in Eng. tr. Hupfeld is strong in grammatical exegesis. Baethgen (1904) is very thorough. Among recent Eng. and American commentators, the most helpful are Perowne (6th ed. 1866), Maclaren in Expositor's Bible (1890-92), and Kirkpatrick in Cambridge Bible (1893-95). Briggs in ICC (1906) is learned; Davison, New Century Bible, is bright and attractive. Spurgeon, Treasury of David, is a valuable compilation, chiefly from the Puritan divines. Cheyne, The Book of Pss (1888) and The Origin and Religious Contents of the Psalter (1891), is quite radical in his critical views. Binnie, The Pss: Their Origin, Teachings and Use (1886), is a fine introduction to the Psalter. Robertson, The Poetry and Religion of the Pss (1898), constructs an able argument against recent radical views.

LITERATURE
The extravagant claims made by some writers for a fully developed system of Bib. psychology has brought the whole subject into disrepute. So much so, that Hofmann

1. Introduction: (Schriftbeweis) has boldly asserted that Scope of "a system of Bib. psychology has Biblical Psychology been got together without any justification for it in Scripture." At the outset, therefore, it must be borne in mind that the Bible does not present us with a systematized philosophy of man, but gives in popular form an account of human nature in all its various relationships. A reverent study of Scripture will undoubtedly lead to the recognition of a

8. The Future Life mortality (Ps 6 5; 30 9; 39 13; 115 17). The psalmists are tempted to fear that fellowship with God would cease at well-defined system of psychology, on which the whole scheme of redemption is based. Great truths regarding human nature are presupposed in and accepted by the OT and the NT; stress is there laid on other aspects of truth, unknown to writers outside of revelation, and presented to us, not in the language of the schools, but in that of practical life. Man is there described as fallen and degraded, but intended by God to be raised, redeemed, renewed. From this point of view Bib. psychology must be studied, and our aim should be "to bring out the views of Scripture regarding the nature, the life and life-destinies of the soul, as they are determined in the history of salvation" (Delitzsch, Bibl. Psych., 15).

As to the origin of the soul, Scripture is silent. It states very clearly that life was inbreathed into man by God (רָפָא, wayyippah;

2. Nature and Origin of the Soul LXX ἐνεφύσασεν, enephásēsen; Vulg inspiravit). The human being thus inspired by God was thereby constituted a nephesh hayyāh ("living soul"), because the nishmath hayyim ("breath of lives") had been imparted to him (Gen 2 7). Beyond this the first book of the Bible does not go. In later books the doctrine is taught with equal clearness. Thus in the Book of Job: "The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty giveth me life" (Job 33 4). The difference in expression should be carefully noted. The "living soul" (LXX psychē zōsa) is made to depend upon, as it has its origin in, the "breath of lives" (LXX pnōē zōēs). The n'shāmāh ("breath") is characteristic of man—though it is very rarely, if ever, attributed to animals; man is described as a being 'in whose nostrils is but a breath' (n'shāmāh) (Isa 2 22). That "breath" is 'God's breath in man' (Job 32 8; 34 14), or, as it is represented in Prov 20 27, "The spirit of man [nishmath] is the lamp of Jeh." In the NT Paul evidently refers to this view of man's origin in the statement that "the first man Adam became a living soul. The last Adam . . . a life-giving [quickening] spirit" (I Cor 15 45). This too agrees with what Christ has said: "It is the spirit that giveth life [quickeneth]" (Jn 6 63), and with what Paul himself has stated elsewhere in the Ep. to the Rom (8 2): "The Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and of death."

Scripture therefore repudiates all doctrines of emanation, by which is meant a natural, forth-flowing

3. False Theories

life from God into the human sphere; it teaches a doctrine of creation, whereby it declares that the Almighty acts with deliberation and design, in free choice, and not of necessity. "Let us make man" is the sublime utterance of Divine wisdom and power. Nor does Scripture teach the preexistence of the soul—a doctrine found in the extra-canonical, platonically inspired Book of Wisd (8 19.20), "For I was a child of parts, and a good soul fell to my lot; nay rather, being good, I came into a body undefiled." This doctrine was well known to Jewish writers, and was taught in Talm and Kabbalāh.

"All souls were, according to the Talm, created and kept in secret from the first moment of creation. As creatures of the highest sphere they are omniscient; but at the moment of birth in a human body an angel touches the lips of the child, so that he forgets whatever has been" (Emanuel Deutsch, The Talmud). The doctrine, however, must be a later importation into Jewish theology through Plato and Philo. It reminds us of Vergil (Æneid vi.713), who makes the souls—destined by the Fates to inhabit new bodies on earth—drink of the waters of Lethe (the forgetfulness), so as to remove all remembrance of the joys of Elysium.

"The souls that throng the flood,
Are those to whom by Fate are other bodies owed;
In Lethe's lake they long oblivion taste
Of future life secure, forgetful of the past."

According to the Kabbalāh, souls are supposed to have an ideal as well as a real preexistence: "ideal as emanations from the s'phirōth, which are themselves emanations from the infinite real, as having been 'created' at a definite time" (cf Eric Bischoff, De Kabbala).

The doctrine with some modifications passed into the Christian church, was accepted by Justin Martyr, Theodoretus, Origen and others of the church Fathers, but became obsolete by the latter part of the 4th cent. (cf Shedd, Hist of Christian Doctrine, II, 9). It was formally condemned by a synod held at Constantinople in the 6th cent. In later times it was accepted in modified form by Kant, Schelling and others, and was specially defended by Julius Müller, who held that the soul had a timeless preexistence and underwent a fall before the final act, whereby it was united in time to the body as its temporary home (Ein ausserzeitlicher Urzustand und Urfall). Reference is sometimes made to Jer 1 5, where Jeh addresses His servant: "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee; I have appointed thee a prophet unto the nations." But this text gives no warrant to the doctrine as taught by the writers mentioned. All that may be conceded is, what Delitzsch has termed "an ideal preexistence," i.e. "a preexistence, not only of man as such, but also of the individual and of all: a preexistence in the Divine knowledge, which precedes the existence in the individual consciousness" (Bibl. Psych., 46).

A new question arises at this point, viz. Is the soul a special creation? Is it derived from the parents?

Opinions are and have been divided on this point. Many have supported the theory of Creationism, by which is meant that in every instance where a new individual comes into being a soul is specially created by God, de nihilo, to inhabit the new-formed body. This view of the soul's birth found great favor in the early church. It was dominant in the East and was advocated in the West. "Jerome asserts that God quotidie fabricatur animas, and cites Scripture in proof" (Shedd, op. cit., II, 11). Scholastic theologians in the Middle Ages, Roman Catholic divines, Reformed orthodox upheld the theory. Though finding little support in Scripture, they appealed to such texts as the following: "He fashioneth their hearts alike" (Ps 33 15 AV); Jeh "formeth the spirit of man within him" (Zec 12 1); "The spirit returneth unto God who gave it" (Eccl 12 7; cf Nu 16 22; He 12 9); "God, the God of the spirits of all flesh" (Nu 27 16)—of which Delitzsch declared: "There can hardly be a more classical proof-text for creationism" (Bibl. Psych., 137).

Traducianism again has found equal support in the Christian church. It declared that the parents were responsible, not merely for the bodies, but also for the souls of their offspring—per traducem vel per propaginem (i.e. by direct derivation, in the ordinary way of propagation). Tertullian was a strong supporter of this view: "The soul of man, like the shoot of a tree, is drawn out (deducta) into a physical progeny from Adam, the parent stock" (Shedd, Hist of Doctrine, II, 14). Jerome remarked that in his day it was adopted by maxima pars occidentaliū ("the large majority of western theologians"). Leo the Great (d. 461) asserted that "the Catholic faith teaches that every man with reference to the substance of his soul as well as of his body is formed in the womb" (Shedd). Augustine, however, though doctrinally inclined to support the claims of Traducianism, kept an open mind on the subject: "You may blame, if you will, my hesitation," he wrote, "because I do not venture to affirm or deny that of which I am ignorant." And, perhaps, this is the safest attitude to assume; for there is little Scriptural warrant for either theory. Birth is a mystery which baffles investigation, and Scripture throws no light upon that mystery. Yet some who have discussed this subject have tried actually to calculate the very day on which the soul is created or infused into the body, as it is being formed in the mother's womb—in boys on the 40th day after pregnancy and in girls on the 80th. This indeed is the reductio ad absurdum of Creationism.

Whichever theory we accept, the difficulties are great either way. For if God creates a soul, that soul must be pure and sinless and stainless at birth. How then can it be said that man is "conceived" as well as "born in sin"? If the impure, sin-stained body contaminates the pure, unstained soul by contact, why cannot the stainless soul disinfect the contaminated body? And again, if every individual soul is a special creation by direct interposition of the Almighty, what becomes of the unity and solidarity of the race? Is its connection with Adam then purely one of physical or corporeal generation? Creationism cannot account for the birth of the soul. Nor can Traducianism. For it can account neither for the origin, nor for the hereditary taint of the soul. It lands us in a hopeless dilemma. In the one case we fall back upon Creationism with its difficulties; in the other, we plunge into a materialism which is equally fatal to the theory (cf. Bavinck, Gerreformeerde Dogmatiek, II, 626). Perhaps the words of Petrus Lombardus, though frequently misunderstood and misapplied, throw most light on the subject—a light, however, which is little more than “darkness visible”—creando infundit eas Deus, et infundendo creat (“in creating God infused [the soul]; and in infusing He creates”). The problem is and remains insoluble.

Passing allusion may be made to another very curious theory, to which reference is made by Martensen (Christliche Ethik, I, 107). It bears upon human individuality, as impressed not only upon the soul, but also upon the body. The soul and the body are represented as arising at the same moment, but the latter (not in regard to its physico-chemical composition, but in other respects) is the resultant of soul-influences, whatever these may be. The soul therefore exercises a formative influence upon the body, with which it is united. This theory is attributed by Martensen to G. E. Stahl, who died in Berlin in 1734, as physician to the royal family. We are here in a region where the way is barred—a palpable obscure “without the light of day.”

The next important question which has occupied many minds is equally difficult of solution—the theory of Tripartition. Is man composed of “body” and “soul” (dichotomy) only, or is a third to be added to the two, so that “spirit” is another element in the constitution of human nature (trichotomy)? Either theory is supposed to be supported by Scripture, and both have had their defenders in all ages of the church. Where the tripartite division has found favor, soul and spirit have been distinguished from each other, as man’s lower is distinguished from his higher nature; where dichotomy prevailed, soul and spirit were represented as manifestations of the same spiritual essence. Under the influence of Platonic philosophy, trichotomy found favor in the early church, but was discredited on account of the Apollinarian heresy. The threefold division of human nature into sōma (“body”), psuchē (“soul”), pneuma (“spirit”) had been accepted by many when Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea (d. 382), attempted to explain the mystery of Christ’s person by teaching that the Logos (or second person of the Trinity) had taken the place of the rational soul in Christ, so that the person of Christ on earth consisted of the Divine Logos, a human body, and a soul (psuchē) as the link between the two.

For the tripartite division of human nature two texts are specially brought into the discussion: viz. 1 Thess 5 23, “May your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame”—a text which is popularly interpreted as conveying that “soul” stands for “our powers natural—those we have by nature,” and that by “spirit” is meant “that life in man which in his natural state can scarcely be said to exist at all, but which is to be called out into power and vitality by regeneration” (F. W. Robertson, Sermons). There is very little warrant in Scripture for such interpretation. “The language does not require a distinction of organs or substances, but may be accounted for by a vivid conception of one substance in different relations and under different aspects. The two terms are used to give exhaustive expression to the whole being and nature of man” (Davidson, OT Theology, 135). There is evidently no distinction of essence here—viz. of a soul distinct from the spirit, and a body distinct from either. In his “fervid desire for the complete and perfect sanctification of his disciples, the apostle accumulates these terms” in order to emphasize the doctrine of an entire renewal of the whole man by the working of the Holy Spirit. It has been pointed out (A. Kuyper, Het werk v. d. Heiligen Geest, III, 101)—and this must be carefully borne in mind—that “the apostle does not use the word holomereis, ‘in all your parts,’ and then summarize these parts in body, soul and spirit, but holoteleis, a word that has no reference to the parts, but to the télos, the end or aim. Calvin interprets ‘soul’ and ‘spirit’ here as referring to our rational and moral existence, as thinking, willing beings, both modes of operation of the one, undivided soul.”

The next text to which an appeal is made is He 4 12: “The word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart.” Here spirit, soul and heart are brought into close correspondence, with heart evidently as the center of personality, manifesting itself in soul and spirit. The only question is, whether the dividing which takes place by the piercing word of God is one within the soul and spirit, causing a complete exposure of the inner man, a cutting asunder of all that composes his nature, or one between the soul and spirit, causing a division between them as separate parts of human nature. The probability lies with the first of these two contradictory views. The writer evidently meant that, as a sharp two-edged sword pierces to the very marrow in its sundering process, so the sword of the spirit cuts through all obstacles, pierces the very heart, lays bare what hitherto was hidden to all observers, even to the man himself, and “discerns” the “thoughts and intents,” which in the unity of soul and spirit have hitherto been kept in the background. “The meaning is rather, that the word of God pierces and dissects both the soul and spirit, separates each into its parts, subtle though they may be, and analyzes their thoughts and intents” (Davidson, op. cit., 187). At any rate, to found a doctrine of Trichotomy on an isolated, variously interpreted text is dangerous in the extreme. The language of metaphor is not the language of literal speech; and here evidently we are in the region of metaphor.

The ground is now cleared for a fuller investigation of the meaning of these terms:

(1) The terms are used interchangeably, though they are not synonymous. Lēbhāh (“heart”), nephesh (“soul”), rūh (“spirit”) are very closely connected in the OT. The heart is there represented as “the organ, the spirit as the principle, the soul as the subject of life” (Cremer, Lexicon). Hence we read that “out of it [the heart] are the issues of life” (Prov 4 23). Dying is represented as the surrender of soul (Gen 35 18; Job 11 20), but also of spirit (Ps 31 5; 146 4). The dead are called souls (Rev 6 9; 20 4), and also spirits (He 12 23; 1 Pet 3 19). In the last mentioned text the “spirits in prison” are also called “souls.” The living are described as “disturbed” or “grieved” in soul (Jgs 10 16), “vexed” (Jgs 16 16), “discouraged” (Nu 21.4), “weary” (Zec 11 8); but also as in “anguish of spirit” (Ex 6 9), “impatient in spirit” (Job 21 4, in the Heb), “straitened in spirit” (Mic 2 7). At death the “spirit” departs (Ps 146 4, in the Heb), but also the “soul” (Gen 35 18). As in the OT so in the NT, Our Lord “sighed,” or “was troubled in the spirit” (Jn 13 21); but we also read that His soul was “exceeding sorrowful,” or troubled (Mt 26 38; Jn 12 27). See SPIRIT; SOUL; HEART.

(2) And yet there is a distinction, whatever the real nature of it may be. In Mary’s Magnificat, e.g., we find the two combined in an interesting manner: “My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour" (Lk 1 46.47), the one clause "referring to the personal emotions of Mary, to her feelings as a woman and a mother, all of which find an outlet in adoration," the second clause "appearing to indicate the moment when, in the profoundest depths of her being, by the touch of the Divine spirit, the promise of the angel was accomplished in her" (Godet, in loc.). A like contrast meets us in the story of Gethsemane. The Master was 'exceeding sorrowful in soul' (i.e. the emotional, sensitive center of His being was in deep sorrow), the disciples were 'willing in spirit,' but 'weak in the flesh' (Mt 26 38.41). In the OT we find that when a man dies his "soul" departs, and when he is restored to life his "soul" returns (1 K 17 22); but when consciousness or life-power returns to one not dead, "spirit" is used (Gen 45 27; Jgs 15 19; 1 S 30 12; 1 K 10 5). Even in popular language the distinction is recognized: we speak of so many "souls," not "spirits," as having perished.

(3) From all this it would appear that philosophic distinction or scientific accuracy of expression is not met with in Scripture. Man is there represented as a unity, and the various terms employed to indicate that unity in its diversity of activities or passivities do not necessarily imply the existence of different essences, or of separate organs, through which these are realized. Psychological action is sometimes ascribed to the body, as well as to the soul, for soul and body are inseparably united to each other. It is the possession of a soul which makes the body what it is; and on the other hand, a soul without a body is unthinkable. The resurrection of the body therefore is no mere figment of the creeds. The body is God's work (Job 10 8), inseparable from the life of the soul. In the NT it is spoken of as "the house on earth" (epigeios oikia), the "tabernacle" or tent prepared for the occupant (skēnos) (1 Cor 12 18; 2 Cor 4 7; 5 1). In the OT "we have such metaphorical expressions as 'houses of clay'; or, as in post-Bib. writings, 'earthly tabernacle.' In the latest, we have words which suggest a hollow, a framework, or a sheath, favoring the Gr idea of the body as the husk or clothing of the soul" (Laidlaw). Hence in Scripture, spirit and soul are interchangeably used with body for human nature in general, not as though indicating three separate entities, but as denoting a parallelism which brings out the full personality of man. Soul and body are threatened with destruction (Mt 10 28); body without spirit is a corpse (Jas 2 26); soul and spirit are interchangeably united: "Stand fast in one spirit, with one soul striving," etc (Phil 1 27).

(4) Gathering all together, the Scriptural position seems to be as follows: The Divine Spirit is the source of all life, and its power is communicated in the physical, intellectual and moral sphere. That Spirit, as the spiritus spirans, the inspiring spirit, by its very breath makes man a living soul: "The spirit [or breath] of God is in my nostrils" (Job 27 3); "Thou takest away their breath [ruah, "spirit"], they die, and return to their dust" (Ps 104 29). Hence God is called "God of the spirits of all flesh" (Nu 16 22; 27 16).

Soul, though identical with spirit, has shades of meaning which spirit has not; it stands for the individual. "Man is spirit, because he is dependent upon God. Man is soul, because, unlike the angels, he has a body, which links him to earth. He is animal as possessing anima, but he is a reasoning animal, which distinguishes him from the brute" (Bavinck, Ger. Dogm., II, 628).

(5) In this connection stress may be laid upon some of Paul's expressions. He exhorts the Philipians to "stand fast in one spirit [pneuma], with one soul [psuchē] striving for the faith" (Phil 1 27). He exhorts them to be "of the same mind"

(sumpsuchoi, Phil 2 2); he hopes to be "of good comfort" (eupsuchō, Phil 2 Expressions 19); he knows of 'no man likeminded, [isōpsuchon], who [would] care truly for [their] state' (Phil 2 20). Everywhere therefore we have "soul" in various combinations to indicate the mental attitude, which in the "fellowship of the Spirit" he would assume toward his readers, and his readers would adopt toward himself. There cannot be therefore that subtle distinction which men have found in the terms "spirit" and "soul," as though two separate essences were housed in one body. The text in Job (33 4), "The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty giveth me life," is the key to the whole problem. The spiritus spirans becomes the spiritus spiratus—the inspiring spirit becomes in man the life which is expired, outbreathed by man, in both soul and spirit. "Soul," therefore, may well stand for the personal, living, animated being—the suffering, acting, thinking, reasoning, dying creature, "whose breath is in his nostrils." Christ gave His 'soul' (psuchē) for His sheep (Jn 10 11). On the cross He Himself exclaimed: "Into thy hands I commend my spirit" (pneumo) (Lk 23 46). Spirit may therefore indicate the all-embracing power, guiding the inward and the outward life—principium illud internum ex quo fluunt actiones, is Bengel's comment on Eph 2 2 (cf Lk 9 55 AV; 4 36). Hence by an easy gradation it may stand for the abysmal depths of personality; while "soul" would express man's individuality in general. See SOUL; SPIRIT.

Pauline phraseology has somewhat confused the issue; at any rate, new meanings, not obvious to the reader, have been assigned to various terms. Paul contrasts the psychical and the pneumatic, the man under the influence of the Divine pneuma, and the man as influenced by his own psuchē. The psychical man is man in his natural, unregenerate state, psychical in this connection being almost equivalent to carnal; while the pneumatic man would be the man guided and directed by the Spirit from on high. Nature and grace are contrasted in the two terms as the first and second Adam are contrasted in 1 Cor 15 45—the first Adam being described as a living psuchē ("soul"), the second as a life-giving pneuma ("spirit"). Even so the psychical body is the body intended, fitted to bear the psuchē, while the pneumatic body is evidently the body capable of bearing the pneuma. Hence the one is corruptible and weak, the other incorruptible and full of power. The soul confined to the carnal body uses it as an organ, till it falls into decay and no longer lends itself to such use. The spirit, in constant fellowship with the Divine Spirit, communicates its energy to a body fitted to be the bearer of this renewed life, spiritualizes that organ, makes that body its docile instrument, enables the body to fulfil its wishes and thoughts, with inexhaustible power of action, "as we even now see the artist using his voice or his hand with marvelous freedom and thus foreshadowing the perfect spiritualizing of the body."

Other questions call for discussion here: they may be briefly touched upon. Scripture acknowledges a dualism, which recognizes the separate existence of soul and body. It rejects a monism, which makes man but "a doublefaced unity" (Bain); or considers mind and body as equally unreal, and as "aspects," "appearances," "sides" of one and the same reality (scientific monism). It knows nothing of mere idealism, which makes mind the only reality, of which matter is but a manifestation, nor of materialism, which considers matter as that which alone is substantial, while mind is a mere product of the brain (Haeckel). It does not support the theory of harmonia praestabilita—pre-established harmony, whereby because soul and body were united in harmonious action before the individual was called into active being, body and soul acting in harmony after creation like two clocks accurately regulated, pointing to the same hour on the dial plate, though driven by different springs (Leibnitz). Scripture has no theory. It deals with facts and facts only in so far as they bear upon the history of man's sin and man's redemption. It throws no light on many problems raised by science or philosophy. It does not discuss origins—the origin of evil, of matter, of mind. "All is of God" is the Scriptural answer to many questions. Thus the relation of mind to body is and remains a mystery—as great as the relation between the forces in Nature, to which the names of light and electricity have been given. Science has attempted to explain that mystery and has failed. The words of Shenstone (Cornhill Magazine, 1907) may be applied to all psychical problems, outside of Holy Writ, which by him were applied to those scientific questions which remain unanswered in spite of all our efforts at solution: "We are still very far from knowing definitely that atoms are composed entirely of electrons or that electrons are nothing else than electric charges; and though electrons have been shown to exhibit electric inertia, it has not been proved that the inertia of atoms also is electrical." The mystery of matter is great; that of soul is greater still.

"Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting."

The next question which falls to be discussed is the influence of the fall of man upon his soul. Scripture is clear upon the point. Man's fall from a primeval state of innocence is there told in unambiguous terms, though the word itself is not found in the narrative, except perhaps in Rom 11 11,2, where allusion is made to the fall (paráptōma) of Israel. With the origin of evil Scripture apparently does not concern itself, though it clearly states that man's sinful condition stands in direct connection with the transgression of Adam, as in Rom 5 12, where the introduction of sin (hamartia) into the world (kósmos) is spoken of as the act of one man (s.c. Adam), hamartia being evidently taken as a power of evil working in the world of men. The OT allusion in Hos 6 7 can hardly be referred to Adam's transgression; at any rate the reference is doubtful. AV renders the passage: "They like men have transgressed the covenant, though the revisers have tried: "But they like Adam have transgressed the covenant." The German and Dutch VSS give the same interpretation to the verse: "like Adam." The LXX takes the term as an appellative (hōs anthrōpos, "as man"), but the Vulg refers the transgression to Adam (sicut Adam transgressi sunt). The other allusions in the OT to this event are slight, as in Job 31 33; Ezk 28 13,15. In the NT, however, the references are much more frequent, esp. in the writings of John and of St. Paul (cf Jn 8 44; 1 Jn 3 8; 2 Cor 11 3; 1 Tim 2 14). The strong parallelism between Adam and Christ in Rom 5 12-21, the obedience of the one bringing freedom, while that of the other brought woe, and the contrast in 1 Cor 15 22 between Adam and Christ throw sufficient light on the question at issue.

Modern science, under the influence of the evolutionary hypothesis, has eliminated or at least has attempted to eliminate the factor of the Fall. That "fall" has been interpreted as a "rise," the "descent" is supposed to have been a real "ascent." Far down the ages, millenniums ago, "a miserable, half-starved, naked wretch, just emerged from the bestial condition, torn with fierce passions, and fighting his way among his compeers with low-browed cunning" (Orr, Christian View of God, 180) must have emerged somehow out of darkness into light. "We are no longer," says Professor J. A. Thomson, "as those who look back to a paradise in which man fell; we are as those 'who, rowing hard against the stream, see distant gates of Eden gleam, and do not dream it is a dream'" (Bible of Nature, 226). If science definitely teaches that man has arisen by slow, insensible gradations from the brute, and no further work may be said on the subject, then indeed the problem of human sin is utterly inexplicable. There can then be no agreement between the Bib. conception and the evolutionary theory as so presented. For primitive man's transgression would under such circumstances be but the natural expression of brute passion, to which the name of sin in the Christian sense can hardly be applied. But if for "minute" and "insensible" gradations in the evolutionary process be substituted the "mutations," "leaps" or "lifts," to which an increasing number of evolutionists are appealing; if primitive man be not pictured as a semi-animal, subject to brutish impulse and passion; if with man a new start was made, a "lift" occurred in the process of development under the guiding and directing influence of Almighty power, the problem assumes a different shape. A sinless creature, transgressing the moral law, is then not an unscientific assumption; conscience asserting itself as the voice Divine within the human soul is then not only possible, but actual and real in the history of man's earliest progenitors. The Bib. narrative will after all remain as the most reasonable explanation of man's original condition and his terrible fall. In that narrative will be found enshrined the "shadowing tradition" of a real, historic event, which has influenced the human race through all the ages. Professor Driver, writing under the strong influence of the evolutionary theory, and accepting as "the law stamped upon the entire range of organic nature, progress, gradual advance from lower to higher, from the less perfect to the more perfect," has wisely remarked that "man failed in the trial to which he was exposed, that sin has entered into the world . . . and that through the whole course of the race it has been attended by an element of moral disorder, and thus it has been marred, perverted, impeded or drawn back" (Driver, Genesis, 57). See FALL, THE.

An equally serious question arises as to the effects of the fall of man. Shame, corruption, death is the answer given by the OT and NT.

10. Effects of the Fall "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen 2 17) was the judgment pronounced upon man. By this was evidently meant "death" as a physical and as a spiritual fact. Man was doomed. The posse non mori, which according to older theologians was man's privilege, was lost and was succeeded by a punishment of which the non posse non mori was the doom, i.e. the possibility of immortal life was followed by the impossibility of not suffering death. Not as though immortality was absolutely lost; for with sin came decay, degeneration, death, not of the inbreathed spirit, but of the body into which the soul was breathed by God. But even the body is imperishable. It undergoes change, but not extinction. The resurrection-body has become a possibility through the atonement and resurrection of Christ. The tabernacle is removed, but renewed. The body is not a prison house, but a temple; not an adjunct but an integral part of the human being. The Bible teaches not only a resurrection-body, but a transformed body (Rom 12 1). It speaks not only of a soul to be saved, but of a body to be redeemed. Scripture alone accounts for death and explains it.

With modern evolutionists death is an unsolved problem. Weissmann (Essays on Heredity) maintains on the one hand that "death is

11. Death as a Problem not an essential attitude of matter" (p. 159), and on the other, "it is only from the point of view of utility that we can understand the necessity of death" (p. 23), and again "death is to be looked upon as an occurrence which is advantageous to the species as a concession to the outer conditions of life, and not as an absolute necessity, essentially inherent in life." He even speaks of "the immortality of the protozoa," because "an immense number of the lower organisms" are not subject to death (ib, 26). Death therefore according to him has been "acquired secondarily as an adaptation," and must in a certain sense be unnatural. It is indeed "one of the most difficult problems in the whole range of physiology." If this be so, we may safely turn to Scripture for an explanation of the problem, which has a value peculiarly its own. "By man came death" is the authoritative declaration, because by man came sin. "In Adam all die," because through Adam came sin. Here we may safely leave the problem, because "by man" will come "resurrection from the dead." See DEATH.

But if the body is mortal, is the soul immortal? On this point the NT gives no uncertain sound, and though the doctrine be not as clearly

12. Immortality of the Soul—expressed in the OT, yet even there kinship with God is man's guaranty for everlasting communion with Him (cf Ps 73). Job longed for such fellowship, which to him and to the OT saints before and after him was life. In memorable words he gave utterance to the hope which was in him: 'I know that my Redeemer liveth . . . and after my skin [read "body"] . . . has been destroyed, yet from my flesh shall I see God; whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold and not another' (Job 19 25). Hosea, the mourner, is responsible for that sublime utterance, which in its NT form is recited at the graveside of those who die in the Lord: "I will ransom them from the power of Sheol; I will redeem them from death: O death, where are thy plagues? O Sheol, where is thy destruction?" (13 14). Reference may also be made to the words of Isaiah (26 19): "Thy dead shall live; my dead bodies shall arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." Still clearer is the note sounded by Daniel (12 2.3): "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." In one word, the OT saint based all his hope and fellowship on God. That hope strengthened his soul when he shuddered at the darkness of Sheol. "It overleaps Sheol in the vigor of his faith." In the Pss we find the same hope expressed on almost every page: "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with beholding thy form" (AV "with thy likeness," Ps 17 15); and again: "Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol; neither wilt thou suffer thy holy one to see corruption. . . . In thy presence is fulness of joy; in thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore" (16 10.11). Whatever the ultimate verdict of science may be regarding the "utility" of death in regard to the human race, Scripture considers it abnormal, unnatural, a punishment, an infliction, the result of man's wrongdoing and his transgression of the law of God. But death in Holy Writ is not a hopeless separation of body and soul. The NT sounds a note even clearer than the OT; for Christ has brought "life and immortality to light." "We know," says Paul, "that we have a building from God," after the dissolution of our tabernacle (2 Cor 5 1); and that is but the necessary corollary to Christ's great utterance: "I AM THE RESURRECTION, AND THE LIFE" (Jn 11 25).

J. I. MARAIS

PTOLEMAIS, toł'ē-mā'is (Πτολεμαῖς, Ptolemaîs): Same as "Acco" in Jgs 1 31. Ptolemais was the most prominent town on the Phoen seacoast in Maccabean times (1 Macc 5 15.55; 10 1.58.60; 12 48), and is once mentioned in the NT in Acts 21 7 as a seaport at which Paul landed for one day, visiting the "brethren" in the place. See Acco; PHOENICIA.

PTOLEMY, toł'ē-mi (Πτολεμαῖος, Ptolemaios), but usually called Ptolemy—"the Warlike": The name Ptolemy is rather common from the days of Alexander the Great, but is best known as the dynastic name of the 13 (14) Macedonian kings of Egypt (323-43 BC) (as Pharaoh in the OT). Those of interest to the Bib. student are:

(1) Ptolemy I, surnamed Soter (Σωτήρ, Sōtēr, "Savior"), called also Ptolemy Lagi, was born c 366 BC, the son of Lagus and Arsinoë, a concubine of Philip of Macedon. He was prominent among the officers of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied in his eastern campaigns. On the death of Alexander, Ptolemy seized the satrapy of Egypt as his share (1 Macc 1 6 ff). Now commenced the long hostilities between Egypt and Syria, Ptolemy on more than one occasion invading Syria. In 316 he joined in a war against Antigonos during which Coele-Syria and Phoenicia were lost, but in 312 regained from Demetrius the son of Antigonos. It was most probably in this year (312) that Ptolemy captured Jerus on a Sabbath day (Jos, Ant, XII, i, 1), and by force or persuasion induced many Jews to accompany him to Egypt as colonists or mercenaries. His kind treatment of them induced others to leave Syria for Egypt. In 306 Ptolemy was defeated in the great naval fight off Salamis in Cyprus by which Cyprus was lost to Egypt. About this date Ptolemy assumed the title of "king," following the example of the Syrian ruler. In 305-304 he defended the Rhodians against Demetrius Poliorcetes, forcing the latter to raise the siege—hence the title "Savior." In 285 BC Ptolemy abdicated in favor of his youngest son Philadelphus—the son of his favorite wife Berenice—and died in 283 BC. According to the usual interpretation this Philadelphus is "the king of the south" in Dnl 11 5. This Ptolemy shares with his son and successor the honor of founding the famous Alexandrian Museum and Library.

(2) Ptolemy II, surnamed Philadelphos (Φιλάδελφος, Philádelphos, "Brother[sister?]-loving"), the youngest son of Ptolemy I; b. 309 BC in Cos; succeeded his father in 285 BC and d. 247. Like his father, he was actively engaged in two Syrian wars until peace was made about 250 BC, Berenice, the daughter of Philadelphus, being given in marriage to Antiochus II. This Ptolemy planted numerous colonies in Egypt, Syria and Pal, among which were several of the name of Arsinoë (his sister-wife), Philadelphia on the ruins of old Rabbah, Philotera south of the Sea of Galilee, and Ptolemais on the site of Acco. He devoted great attention to the internal administration of his kingdom, endowed the Museum and Alexandrian Library in which his father had taken much interest; in general he followed his father's example as a liberal patron of art, science and literature. According to one tradition it was Philadelphus who was instrumental in beginning the LXX tr (see SEPTUAGINT). At any rate, he was favorably disposed toward his Jewish subjects, and in his reign Jewish wisdom and Gr philosophy began to blend. Philadelphus is supposed to be "the king of the south" of Dnl 11 6, whose daughter "shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement."

(3) Ptolemy III, surnamed Euergetes (Ευεργέτης, Euergétes, "Benefactor"), son of Philadelphus, whom he succeeded in 247 BC. In 246 he was provoked to a Syrian war to avenge the murder of his sister Berenice at Antioch; in the course of this campaign he met with remarkable success, overran Syria, plundered Susa and Babylonia, penetrated to the shores of India and captured the important stronghold of Seleucia (1 Macc 11 8). Euergetes was, however, prevented from reaping the fruits of his victories by being recalled by internal troubles in Egypt. He brought back with him from the East the Egypt gods that Cambyses had carried away 300 years before, thus earning from the Egyptians the title of "Benefactor." Two traditions obtain as to his death: the more probable is that of Polybius (ii.71), according to which he died a natural death (222 BC), or, according to another (Justin xxix.1), he was murdered by his son. Some regard this king as the Euergetes mentioned in the Prologue to Sir, but the reference must rather be to Euergetes II (Ptolemy VII). The "shoot" who "shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north" and prevail is Euergetes I (Dnl 11 7-9), ver 8 referring to the act by which he won his title.

Octodrachm (Egyptian Talent) of Ptolemy II.

(4) Ptolemy IV, surnamed Philopator (Φιλοπάτωρ, Philopátōr, "Lover of his father"), or Tryphon (Τρύφων, Trúphōn), the eldest son of Euergetes whom he succeeded in 222 BC. Antiochus the Great of Syria declared war against Egypt about 219 BC, but, after conquering Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, he was defeated by Philopator at the battle of Raphia near Gaza (217 BC). On his victorious return to Alexandria, Philopator assumed a very anti-Jewish attitude, and indeed caused discontent generally among his subjects. In spite of the victory of Raphia, Egypt began to decline under his weakness. He was as dissolute as Nero, while his domestic tragedies are as dark as those of Herod the Great. He died in 205 BC. Dnl 11 10-12 refers to the reign of Philopator. He was most probably the oppressor of 3 Macc.

(5) Ptolemy V, surnamed Epiphanes (Ἐπιφανής, Epiphánēs, "Illustrious"). He was only 5 years old when his father Philopator died. Taking advantage of the king's minority, Antiochus the Great leagued with Philip of Macedonia against Egypt. Philip took the Cyclades and some cities in Thrace, while Antiochus defeated the Egypt general Scopas at Paneas on the Jordan in 198 BC, and thus Pal passed to the Seleucid dynasty. The Romans now interfered to make Antiochus surrender his conquests. Not daring to disobey Rome, Antiochus compromised by making peace with Ptolemy and betrothing to him his daughter Cleopatra, who was to receive as her dower the revenues of the conquered provinces Coele-Syria, Pal and Phoenicia (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 1; Polyb. xxviii.17), but the control of these provinces seems to have been retained by Antiochus. The marriage took place in 193 BC. After the dismissal of his faithful minister, Aristomenes, Epiphanes' character and reign deteriorated. At last he bestirred himself to recover the lost provinces from Seleucus, the successor of Antiochus, but was poisoned before his plans materialized, in 182 (181) BC (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 11). Dnl 11 14-17 is to be interpreted as referring to the relations between Ptolemy V and Antiochus III, "the Great."

(6) Ptolemy VI, surnamed Philometor (Φιλομήτωρ, Philométōr, "Fond of his mother"), elder son of Ptolemy V whom he succeeded in 182 (181) BC. For the first 7 years of his reign his mother Cleopatra acted as queen-regent, and peace was maintained with Syria till 173 BC. Antiochus IV Epiphanes then invaded Egypt, defeated the Egyptians at Pelusium and secured the person of Philometor, whom he spared, hoping to employ him as a tool to gain the ascendancy over Egypt. Philometor's brother was now proclaimed king by the Alexandrians, with the title of Euergetes (II). When Antiochus retired, Philometor made peace with his brother, conceding him a share in the government (170 BC). This displeased Antiochus, who marched against Alexandria, but was stopped beneath the walls by a Rom embassy (168 BC), in obedience to which he withdrew. The brothers quarreled again, and Philometor, expelled by Euergetes, went to Rome to seek assistance (164 BC). The Romans seated him again on his throne, assigning Cyrenaica to Euergetes. The next quarrel was about Cyprus. Philometor this time secured his brother as a prisoner, but sent him back to his province. Philometor was later drawn into Syrian politics in the conflict between Alexander Balas and Demetrius. The Egypt king espoused the cause of the former, to whom he also betrothed his daughter Cleopatra. But on discovering Balas' treachery, he took away his daughter from him and gave her to his opponent, Demetrius Nikator, whom he now supported against Balas. Balas was defeated in a decisive battle on the Oenoparas and killed, but Ptolemy himself died in 146 BC from the effects of a fall from his horse in the battle (1 Macc 1 18; 10 51 ff; 2 Macc 1 10; 4 21). Dnl 11 25-30 refers to the events of this reign. Philometor seems to have taken a friendly attitude toward the Jews. In his reign the Jewish temple of Leontopolis near Heliopolis was founded in 154 BC (Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 1 f), and two Jewish generals, Onias and Dositheus, were at the head of his armies and had a large share in the government (Jos, Cap, II, 5). The Jewish-Alexandrine philosopher Aristobulus probably lived in this reign.

(7) (On the death of Philometor his young son was proclaimed king as Ptolemy Eupator ["of a noble father"], but after reigning but a few months was put to death by his uncle Euergetes II [Just. xxxviii.8]. His reign being so brief he need hardly be numbered among the Ptolemies.)

(8) Ptolemy VII (VIII), surnamed Euergetes (II) and called also Physcon (Φύσκων, Phúskōn, "Big-paunch"), became sole ruler in succession to his brother Philometor (or to his murdered nephew) in 146 BC, and reigned till 117 BC. His reign was characterized by cruelty, tyranny and vice, so that he was hated by his subjects, esp. by the people of Alexandria, who on one occasion expelled him during an insurrection. It is uncertain whether Physcon was an enemy and persecutor of the Jews or their patron. Some authorities refer the persecutions mentioned in 3 Macc to this reign, but most modern authorities are disposed to date them in the reign of the anti-Jewish Ptolemy IV Philopator. The statement, "in the 38th year of King Euergetes," in the Prologue to Sir refers to Physcon Euergetes II and=132 BC, since he dated his reign from the year of joint kingship with his brother (170 BC).

The other Ptolemies of Egypt require no mention here.

The following are the apocryphal Ptolemies:

- (1) Ptolemy Macron. See MACRON.
- (2) Ptolemy, son of Abubus, son-in-law of Simon the Maccabean. He treacherously assassinated Simon and two of his sons in the stronghold of Dok near Jericho, 135 BC (1 Macc 16 15).
- (3) Ptolemy, the father of Lysimachus (Apoc) (Ad Est 11 1).
- (4) Ptolemy, son of a Dositheus; he and his father were bearers of the "epistle of Phrurai" (Ad Est 11 1).

LITERATURE.—J. P. Mahaffy, Empire of the Ptolemies, is the best account for Eng. readers. A long list of Ptolemies will be found, e.g. in Smith's Classical Dict. The ancient authorities are Josephus, Polybius, Justin, Pausanias, Plutarch (Cleom.), Livy, Diodorus, Jerome (Comm. to Dnl 11).

PUAH, pū'a, PUVAH, pū'va:

(1) פּוּאָה, pū'ah: One of the Heb midwives whom the king of Egypt commanded to kill all male children of the Hebrews at birth. The midwives, fearing God, refused to obey, pretending that the children of the Heb women were usually born before they arrived. Their act is spoken of as being meritorious in the eyes of the Lord, who is said to have rewarded them by making "houses" for them (Ex 1 15-20). In the Midrash, Ex Rabbā, Puah is identified with Miriam, and Shiprah, the other midwife, with her mother Jochebed. According to another tradition Puah was a proselyte.

(2) פּוּאָה, pū'ah, in 1 Ch 7 1; פּוּוּוּאָה, puwvāh, in Gen 46 13; Nu 26 23; written also "Pua" AV, and "Puvah" RV: Second son of Issachar, ancestor of the Punites, enumerated in the desert census taken by Moses and Eleazar.

(3) פּוּאָה, pū'ah: Member of the tribe of Issachar, mentioned (Jgs 10 1) as the son of Dodo and the father of Tola, the judge. ELLA DAVIS ISAACS

PUBLICAN, pub'li-kan. See TAX, TAXING.

PUBLIUS, pub'li-us (Πούλιος, Pólios, from the Lat praenomen Publius, derived from populus, "popular"; according to Ramsay it is the Gr form of the Lat nomen Popilius; the Gr title meaning "first," applied to Publius in Acts 28 7, was an official one, and has been found on an inscription from the island of Gaulus near Malta [cf Böckh, CIG, no. 5, 754]): Publius held office under the governor of Sicily. As the leading official in Malta, he was responsible for any Rom soldiers and their prisoners who might land there, but the account in Acts 28 7 implies that he displayed more than ordinary solicitude for Paul and his shipwrecked company, for, according to the writer, he "received us, and lodged us three days courteously" (AV). The Apocryphal "Acts of St. Paul" (see APOCRYPHAL Acts, B, 1) states also that "he did for them many acts of great kindness and charity" (cf Budge, Contentings of the Apostles, II, 605). On this occasion Paul miraculously healed the father of Publius, who "lay sick of fever and dysentery" (Acts 28 8). The exactitude of the medical terms here employed forms part of the evidence that the writer of Acts was a physician. Tradition relates that Publius was the first bishop of Malta and that he afterward became bishop of Athens. C. M. KERR

PUDENS, pū'denz, pū'dens (Πούδης, Poudēs, lit. "bashful" [2 Tim 4 21]): One of the Christians in Rome who remained loyal to

1. Faithful Paul during his second and last imprisonment there, when most of the members of the church "forsook him."

The pressure under which they acted must have been very great, as the apostle's final trial before the supreme court of the empire followed quickly after the Neronic persecution. Their defection from their loyalty to Paul must not be taken as implying that they had also proved untrue to Christ. At this time, however, there were some of the Christians who risked their earthly all, and their lives too, in order to prove their adherence to Paul, and Pudens was one of these.

Writing the last of all his letters, the Second Ep. to Tim, Paul sends greeting from "all the brethren" who were then with him. Among these he names Pudens. There are three other names associated by the apostle with that of Pudens: Eubulus, Linus and Claudia.

2. Pudens and Claudia There is an interesting conjecture regarding Pudens and Claudia, that they were husband and wife, and that Claudia was of British birth, a daughter of a British king, called Cogidunus. King Cogidunus was an ally of the Romans, and assumed the name of the emperor Tiberius Claudius, who was his patron. In this way his daughter would be named Claudia. But this identification of the British princess with the Claudia who sends salutation to Timothy is only a supposition; it lacks both evidence and proof. See CLAUDIA and CH (St. P.), ch xxvii.

In modern Rome, however, the tourist is still shown a building which is called the house of Pudens, in the same way as "Paul's hired house" is also shown. The authenticity in both cases is lacking.

Pudens is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT.

PUL, pul:

(1) An Assyrian king (2 K 15 19). See TIGLATH-PILESER.

(2) An African country and people (Isa 66 19). See PUT.

PULPIT, pūl'pit: Neh 8 4, "Ezra the scribe stood upon a mighdōl of wood." Mighdōl is one of the commonest words in the OT and means simply a high object—here a scaffolding or platform (βῆμα, bēma, 1 Esd 9 42). "Tower" (so RVm) gives an entirely wrong picture.

PULSE, puls (זְרָעִים, zērō'im [Dnl 1 12 m, "herbs"], זְרָעִים, zērō'im [Dnl 1 16]; cf זְרָעָה, zērū', "sowing seed" [Lev 11 37], and זְרָעִים, zērū'im, "things sown" [Isa 61 11]): (1) In Dnl 1 12.16, it must mean herbs or vegetables grown from seeds; a vegetable diet is what is implied. (2) In 2 S 17 28, "pulse" after "parched" is not in the original, but is probably more correct than the tr in (1), as "pulse" usually implies leguminous plants, peas, beans, etc.

LITERATURE

I. Preliminary Assumptions.—(For "everlasting," where used in AV as the rendering of αἰώνιος, aiōnios, RV substitutes "eternal.") It is assumed in this art. that Scripture teaches the survival of the soul after death, the reality of retribution and of judgment to come, and a shorter or longer period of suffering for sin in the case of the unredeemed in the world beyond. Only a few words need be said, therefore, in preliminary remark on these assumptions.

Whatever view may be taken of the development of the doctrine of immortality in the OT (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT), it will

1. Survival after Death scarcely be doubted that it is through- after assumed in the NT that the souls of men, good and bad, survive death (see IMMORTALITY). Two passages only need be referred to in proof: one, Christ's saying in Mt 10 28: "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell"

(Gehenna); the other, the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus in Lk 16 19-31: Lazarus is carried by the angels to Abraham's bosom; the rich man lifts up his eyes in Hades, being in torments. The whole doctrine of the future judgment in the NT presupposes survival after death.

Retribution for sin is a cardinal point in the teaching of both the OT and NT. The doctrine of judgment, again, in the NT, with Christ as

2. Retribution for Sin—judge, turns on this point. The following passages are decisive: Isa 3 10.11; Mt 11 22.24; 12 41.42; Rom 2 5.12; 2 Cor 5 10; Gal 6 7.8, etc (see RETRIBUTION).

The conscious endurance of punishment for sin in the future state is already implied in the preceding. The parable of the Rich Man

3. Conscious Suffering in Future—speaks of it as following immediately on death in Hades; all the descriptions of the judgment imply pain and anguish as the result of condemnation (cf Rom 2 5.12). This does not settle the nature or duration of the punishment; but it excludes the idea that physical death is the extinction of being, or that annihilation follows immediately upon death or judgment.

These things being assumed, the questions that remain are: Is the period of suffering for sin eternal, or is it terminable? May it be cut short by repentance or by annihilation? Is there any final solution of the discord it implies in the universe? It is maintained here that the punishment of sin, in the case of the finally impenitent, is everlasting.

II. Scriptural Support.—The doctrine that the punishment of sin is everlasting is sustained by many plain testimonies of Scripture.

The doctrine of future punishment is not prominent in the OT, where rewards and punishments are chiefly connected with the present

1. OT and Jewish Conceptions—life. In a few passages (Ps 49 14.15; 73 18.19; cf Isa 24 21.22; 66 24), Dr. Charles thinks that "Sheol appears as the place of punishment of the wicked" (Eschatology, 73-76, 156). If so, there is no suggestion of escape from it. In Dnl 12 2, some that sleep in the dust are represented as awakening to "shame and everlasting contempt" (the word for "everlasting" is the usual one, olām). In the Jewish literature of the century before Christ, "Sheol is regarded," says Dr. Charles, "as the place of final eternal punishment, that is, it has become hell" (op. cit., 236; see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT).

In the NT, the strongest language is used by Jesus and the apostolic writers on the certainty and severity of the punishment of sin in

2. NT Teaching—the future state, and always in a manner which suggests that the doom is final.

(1) "Eternal."—The word "eternal" (aiōnios) is repeatedly applied to the punishment of sin, or to the fire which is its symbol. A principal example is Mt 25 41.46, "eternal fire," "eternal punishment" (kólasis aiōnios). Here precisely the same word is applied to the punishment of the wicked as to the blessedness of the righteous. Other instances are Mt 18 8; Jude ver 7; cf Rev 14 11; 19 3; 20 10. In 2 Thess 1 9, we have, "eternal destruction." The kindred word aidios, "everlasting," is in Jude ver 6 applied to the punishment of the fallen angels.

The reply made by Maurice (Theological Essays, 442 ff) that aiōnios in such passages denotes quality, not duration, cannot be sustained. Whatever else the term includes, it connotes duration. More pertinent is the criticism of other writers (e.g. Cox, Salvator Mundi, 96 ff; Farrar, Eternal Hope, Pref., xxxiv, pp. 78 ff, 197 ff; cf his Mercy and Judgment, passim) that aiōnios does not necessarily mean

"eternal" (according to Cox it does not mean this at all), but is strictly "age-long," is therefore compatible with, if it does not directly suggest, a terminable period. Cox allows that the term is "saturated through and through with the element of time" (p. 100), but he denies its equivalence with "everlasting." The sense, no doubt, is to be determined by the context, but it can hardly be questioned that "the aeons of the aeons" and similar phrases are the practical NT equivalents for eternity, and that aiōnios in its application to God and to life ("eternal life") includes the idea of unending duration (cf Jn 10 28.29 for express assertion of this). When, therefore, the term is applied in the same context to punishment and to life (Mt 25 46), and no hint is given anywhere of limitation, the only reasonable exegesis is to take the word in its full sense of "eternal."

(2) Equivalent expressions.—The meaning "eternal" is confirmed by the use of equivalent expressions and of forms of speech which convey in the strongest manner the idea of finality. Such are the expressions, "the unquenchable fire," the "worm" that "dieth not" (Mt 3 12; Mk 9 43-48; cf Mt 13 42.50), with those numerous references to "death," "destruction," "second death," on which the advocates of conditional immortality build their arguments for final extinction. Such is the dictum of Jesus: "He that obeyeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth [remains] on him" (Jn 3 36; the opposite of "life" is "perishing," ver 16); or that in Rev 22 11, "He that is unrighteous, let him do unrighteousness still: and he that is filthy, let him be made filthy still." Finality is the note in all Christ's warnings—"the outer darkness" (Mt 8 12; 22 13); "The door was shut . . . I know you not" (Mt 25 10.12; cf 7 23), as in those of the Epp. (e.g. He 2 3; 6 6.8; 10 27.31; 12 25.29). Jesus speaks of the blasphemy against the Spirit as a sin which shall not be forgiven, "neither in this world, nor in that which is to come" (Mt 12 32; not as implying that other sins, unforgiven in this life, may be forgiven in the next), a passage which Mk gives in the remarkable form, "hath never forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin" (Mk 3 29). The Rich Man in Hades found an impassable gulf fixed between himself and Lazarus (Lk 16 26). See GULF. It adds to the terribleness of these sayings that, as before remarked, there is nothing to put against them; no hint or indication of a termination of the doom. Why did Jesus not safeguard His words from misapprehension, if behind them there lay an assurance of restoration and mercy? One may ask with Oxenham, in a reply to Jukes, "whether if Christ had intended to teach the doctrine of eternal punishment, He could possibly have taught it in plainer terms."

(3) The last judgment.—The NT doctrine of the last judgment leads to the same conclusion. Two things seem plainly taught about this judgment: the first, that it proceeds on the matter of the present life—"the things done in the body" (Mt 25 31-46; 2 Cor 5 10; Rev 20 12); and the second, that it is decisive in its issues. Not a single suggestion is given of a reversal of its decisions in any future age. Such silence is inexplicable if the Scriptures meant to teach what the opponents of this doctrine so confidently maintain.

In corroboration of this Scriptural view analogy might be pleaded. How constantly even in this life is the law illustrated of the tendency of character to fixity! The present is the season of grace (2 Cor 6 2), yet what powers of resistance to God and goodness are seen to lie in human nature, and how effectually, often, does it harden itself under the influences that seem most fitted to break down its rebellion! What likelihood is there that eternity will alter this tendency, or make conversion more easy? Eternity can hardly be thought of as more really a scene of grace than time is for those to whom the gospel has already come. Its characteristic mark is said to be "judgment" (He 9 27). Like the photographer's bath, may its effect not be to develop and fix existing character, rather than to change it? If so, the state in which judgment finds the soul may be presumed to be one that will remain.

III. Difficulties and Objections—Rival Hypotheses.—What, it will now be asked, of the tremendous difficulties which inhere in this doctrine, with their undeniable effect in alienating many generous minds from it and from Christianity? The lurid rhetorical picturings of the sufferings of the lost, too frequent in the teaching of the past, may be discounted; it is not necessary to go beyond the inexpressibly solemn words of Christ Himself and His apostles. But even with this limitation, does it not seem as if, by this doctrine, a reflection was cast on the righteousness and mercy of God in creating such multitudes of the human race, as, on any showing, are outside the pale of Christ's salvation—the countless generations of the heathen, with the masses even in Christian lands who have not received or do not obey the light—only to doom them to endless misery? Before attempting a positive answer, it is proper that a glance be taken at the rival theories put forth in alleviation of the difficulty.

The most comprehensive solution propounded is that of universal salvation—of a final restitution of all souls to God's favor and to blessedness. This tempting speculation—Salvation for it is no more—advocated by Origen in the early church, by Schleiermacher in the last century, has been urged by many writers in modern times. One of its best known advocates was Samuel Cox, in his book Salvator Mundi. It is noticeable that not a few who favor this theory (e.g. Maurice, Farrar) decline to commit themselves to it as more than a "hope," and admit the possibility of human souls continuing to resist God endlessly (Maurice, Theological Essays, 476; Farrar, Eternal Hope, Pref., xv, xvi; Mercy and Judgment, I, 485, "In this sense there may be for some souls an endless hell"). It must, however, be evident that, be the number greater or smaller—and who shall give assurance of its smallness?—if there are any such souls, the difficulty in principle remains, and the passages alleged as teaching universal restoration are equally contradicted. The deeper objection to this theory is that, springing, not from real knowledge, but from men's hopes and wishes, it has, as already shown, the tremendous stress of Scripture testimony against it; nor do the passages commonly adduced as favoring it really bear the weight put upon them. We read, e.g., of a "restoration of all things"—the same that Christ calls the palinogenesis—but, in the same breath, we are told of those who will not hearken, and will be destroyed (Mt 19 28; Acts 3 21, 23). We read of Christ drawing all men unto Him (Jn 12 32); but we are not less clearly told that at His coming Christ will pronounce on some a tremendous condemnation (Mt 7 23; 25 41); we read of all things being gathered, or summed up, in Christ, of Christ subduing all things to Himself, etc; but representative exegetes like Meyer and Weiss show that it is far from Paul's view to teach an ultimate conversion or annihilation of the kingdom of evil (cf Meyer on 1 Cor 15 21, 28 and Eph 1 10; Weiss, Bib. Theol., II, 723, 107, 109, ET). We confess, however, that the strain of these last passages does seem to point in the direction of some ultimate unity, be it through subjugation, or in some other way, in which active opposition to God's kingdom is no longer to be reckoned with.

The view favored by another class is that of the annihilation of the finally impenitent. The type of doctrine called "conditional immortality" includes other elements which need not here be discussed (see IMMORTALITY). The annihilation theory takes different forms. So far as the annihilation is supposed to take place at death, it is contradicted by the Scriptures which support the soul's survival after death; so far as it is believed to take place after a longer or shorter period of conscious suffering (which is White's theory), it involves its advocates in difficulties with their own interpretations of "death," "destruction," "perishing," seeing that in Scripture this doom is uniformly represented as overtaking the ungodly at the day of judgment, and not at some indefinite period thereafter. The theory conflicts also with the idea of gradation of punishment, for which room has to be sought in the period of conscious suffering, and rests really on an unduly narrowed conception of the meaning of the Scriptural terms "life" and "death." Life is not bare existence, nor is "death" necessarily extinction of being. As said earlier, the language of many parts of Scripture implies the continued existence of the subjects of the Divine wrath.

It is significant that on the side alike of the advocates of restoration and of those of annihilation (e.g. E. White), refuge from the difficulties is frequently sought in the Probation hypothesis of an extended probation and work of evangelization beyond death. This theory labors under the drawback that, in marked contrast with Scripture, it throws immensely the larger part of the work of salvation into the future state of being. It is, besides, apart from the dubious and limited support given to it by the passage on Christ's preaching to "the spirits in prison" (1 Pet 3 19, 20), destitute of Scriptural support. It has already been pointed out that the final judgment is uniformly represented as proceeding on the matter of this life. The theory is considered elsewhere (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, X).

IV. Nature, Conditions and Issues.—While dogmatism like the above, which seem opposed to Scripture, are to be avoided, it is equally necessary to guard against the dogmatism of an opposite kind, as if eternity must not, in the nature of the case, have its undisclosed mysteries of which we here in time can frame no conception. The difficulties connected with the ultimate destinies of mankind are truly enormous, and no serious thinker will minimize them. Scripture does not warrant it in negative, any more than in positive, dogmatism; with its uniformly practical aim, it does not seek to satisfy an idle curiosity (cf Lk 13 23, 24). Its language is bold, popular, figurative, intense; the essential idea is to be held fast, but what is said cannot be taken as a directory to all that is to transpire in the ages upon ages of an unending duration. God's methods of dealing with sin in the eternities may prove to be as much above our present thoughts as His dealings now are with men in grace. In His hands we must be content to leave it, only using such light as His immediate revelation yields.

As respects the nature of the punishment of sin, it cannot be doubted that in its essence it is spiritual. Everything can be adopted here which is said by Maurice and others of the eternal punishment of being without the knowledge of God, who is love, and of Jesus Christ who has manifested it; even as eternal life is declared to be the having the knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ" (Theological Essays, 450). The supreme penalty of sin is unquestionably the loss of God's life and love—the being sinful. Environment, indeed, may be expected to correspond with character, but the hell is one the sinner essentially makes for himself, and, like the kingdom of God, is within. The fire, the worm, the stripes, that figure its severity, are not physical. Even should the poena sensus (were that conceivable) be utterly removed, the poena damni would eternally remain.

2. Nature of Punishment

It is a sound principle that, in His dealing with sin in the world to come, God's mercy will reach as far as ever it can reach. This follows

3. Range of Divine Mercy from the whole Scriptural revelation of the character of God. What may be included in it, it is impossible for anyone to say. It should be noticed that those of whom it is said that they shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them, are those who "obey not" the truth (Jn 3 36)—who actively and consciously disregard and oppose it. But all do not belong to this class. It may be assumed that none will be lost who can in consistency with holiness and love be saved. The most germinal goodness, which is the implantation of His own Spirit, God will acknowledge and develop. The problem of undeveloped character may receive a solution we do not wot of with the entrance into the eternal light—not in change of character, but rather, as said before, in the revelation of character's inmost bent. In this sense, the entrance into eternity may be to many the revelation of a love and grace which had not been understood or appreciated as it should have been on earth, but with which it is in essential kinship. There are at least many shades and degrees of character, and God may be intrusted to take the most just, yet most merciful, account of all.

The fullest weight must further be given to what the Scripture so expressly says of gradation of punishment, even of the unsaved. It

4. Gradation of Punishment is not the case that the lot of all who fail of the eternal life in Christ is all of one grade. There are the "few stripes" and the "many stripes" (Lk 12 47,48); those for whom it will be "more tolerable" than for others in the day of judgment (Mt 11 20,24). Even "Sodom and her daughters" will be mercifully dealt with in comparison with others (Ezk 16 48,49,53,55,61). There will be for everyone the most exact weighing of privilege, knowledge and opportunity. There is a vast area here for the Divine administration on which no light at all is afforded us.

There remain those passages already alluded to which do seem to speak, not, indeed, of conversion or admission into the light and fellow-

5. God "All in All" ship of Christ's kingdom, but still of a final subjugation of the powers of evil, to the extent, at least, of a cessation of active opposition to God's will, of some form of ultimate unification and acknowledgment of Christ as Lord. Such passages are Eph 1 10; Phil 2 9-11; above all, 1 Cor 15 24-28. God, in this final vision, has become "all in all." Here, again, dogmatism is entirely out of place, but it is permissible to believe that these texts foreshadow such a final persuasion of God's righteousness in His judgment and of the futility of further rebellion as shall bring about an outward pacification and restoration of order in the universe disturbed by sin, though it can never repair that eternal loss accruing from exclusion from Christ's kingdom and glory.

PUNISHMENTS, pun'ish-ments (ἁῶν, 'awōn, "fault," "iniquity," "punishment for iniquity," "sin" [Gen 4 13; Lev 26 41; Job 19 29; Ps 149 7; Lam 4 22; Ezk 14 10 m; Am 1 3.6.9.11.13; 2 1.4.6], חֵטְא, 'ōnesh, "tribute," "fine," "punishment" [Lam 3 39], חַטָּאת, ḥāṭṭā'ah, or חַטָּוֹת, ḥāṭṭā'oth, "sin" and its retribution, "penalty," "expiation" [Zec 14 19]; κόλασις, kólasis, "punishment," "torment" [Mt 25 46], ἐπιτίμια, epitimia, "poll tax," hence "penalty" [2 Cor 2 6], τιμωρία, timōria, "vindication," hence "penalty" [He 10 29], ἐκδίκησις, ekdikēsis, "vindication," "retribution" [1 Pet 2 14 AV]): A court could inflict for a crime against the person, a sentence of (1) death in the form of stoning, burning, beheading, or strangling, etc; (2) exile to one of the cities of refuge in case of manslaughter (Nu 35); or (3) stripes, not to exceed 40, in practice 39 or less (Dt 25 3; 2 Cor 11 24). Offences against property (theft, fraudulent conversion of deposit, embezzlement, robbery) were punished by exacting more than the value of the things taken (Lk 19 8), the excess going to the injured party, thus differing from a fine, which goes into the treasury of the community. The housebreaker was liable to be slain with impunity (Ex 22 2). A fine in the modern sense is unknown in the Scriptures, unless Lev 5 6-19 be interpreted as referring to such.

The earliest theory of punishment seems to have been that of retaliation—"blood for blood"—and to some extent this principle appears

1. History of the Hebrew Law concerning Punishment even in the Law of Moses (Lev 24 19, 20; Mt 5 38). Early in the history of the race, punishment was administered for sin and crime. Adam and Eve were driven from the Garden, and Cain, the first murderer, though not executed in retaliation for his deed, had a mark set on him. The words of Lamech (Gen 4 24) indicate that death was regarded as the fitting punishment for murder, and the same thought apparently was in the minds of the brethren of Joseph (42 21). Judah, as head of his family, seems to have had power of life and death (38 24), and Abimelech threatens his people with the extreme punishment in case they injure or insult Isaac or his wife (26 11). Similar power is ascribed to Pharaoh (41 13).

Under the Law of Moses, the murderer was to be put to death without mercy. Even if he took refuge at the altar in a sanctuary or in

2. The Mosaic Law concerning Punishment an asylum city, he would not be immune from arrest and execution, and the same principle was applied in the case of an animal (Ex 21 12,14,23, 28,36 ||). But punishment under the Mosaic Law was not to be entailed or transmitted (Dt 24 16), as was the case among the Chaldeans (Dnl 6 24) and the kings of Israel (1 K 21; 2 K 9 26).

It has been noted that capital punishment is extensively prescribed by the Mosaic Law, and undoubtedly the Law was carried out. This circumstance has been explained by reference to the fact that the nation consisted of newly emancipated slaves, and therefore required harsh measures to keep them in check.

Under the Mosaic Law, the offences that made one liable to the punishment of death were: (1) striking or reviling a parent (Ex 21 15.17); (2) blasphemy (Lev 24 14.16.23; 1 K 21 10; Mt 26 65.66); (3) Sabbath-breaking (Ex 31 14; 35 2; Nu 15 32-36); (4) witchcraft and false pretension to prophecy (Ex 22 18; Lev 20 27; Dt 13 5; 18 20; 1 S 28 9); (5) adultery (Lev 20 10; Dt 22 22); (6) unchastity: (a) before marriage, but detected afterward (Dt 22 21), (b) in case of a woman with someone other than her betrothed (Dt 22 23), (c) in a priest's daughter (Lev 21 9); (7) rape (Dt 22 25); (8) incestuous and unnatural connections (Ex 22 19; Lev 20 11.14.16); (9) man-stealing (Ex 21 16); (10) idolatry, actual or virtual, in any form (Lev 20 2; Dt 13 6; 17 2-7); (11) false witness in capital cases (Dt 19 16.19).

A large number of offences come under the law of punishment by cutting off from the people, the meaning of which expression has led to some controversy. It may signify excommunication or death, and occurs in connection with the following offences: (1) breach of morals, such as wilful sin in general (Nu 15 30.31); incestuous or unclean connections (Lev 18 29; 20 9-21); (2) breach of covenant, brought about through uncircumcision (Gen 17 14; Ex 4 24), neglect of Passover (Nu 9 13), Sabbath-breaking (Ex 31 14), neglect of Atonement Day (Lev 23 29), work done on the Atonement Day (Lev 23 30), children offered to Molech (Lev 20 3), witchcraft (Lev 20 6), anointing an alien with holy oil (Ex 30 33); (3) breach of ritual, committed by eating leavened bread during Passover (Ex 12 15.19), eating fat of sacrifices (Lev 7 25), eating blood (Lev 7 27; 17 14), eating sacrifices while unclean (Lev 7 20.21; 22 3.4.9), offering too late (Lev 19 8), making holy ointment for private use (Ex 30 32.33), making perfume for private use (Ex 30 38), general neglect of purification (Nu 19 13.20), not bringing offering after slaying a beast for food (Lev 17 9), slaying the animal at a place other than the tabernacle door (Lev 17 4), touching holy things illegally (Nu 4 15.18.20).

Of capital punishments that are properly regarded as of Hebrew origin, we note:

(1) Stoning, which was the ordinary mode of execution (Ex 19 13; Lev 20 27; Josh 7 25; Lk 20 6; Acts 7 58; 14 5). The witnesses, of whom there were at least two, were required to cast the first stone (Dt 13 9f; Jn 8 7). If these failed to cause death, the bystanders proceeded to complete the sentence, whereupon the body was to be suspended until sunset (Dt 21 23).

(2) Hanging is mentioned (Nu 25 4; Dt 21 22), probably not as a mode of execution, but rather of exposure after death. It may have been a Canaanitish punishment, since it was practised by the Gibeonites on the sons of Saul (2 S 21 6.9).

(3) Burning, before the age of Moses, was the punishment of unchastity (Gen 38 24). The Law prescribes it as a punishment in the case of a priest's daughter (Lev 21 9), and in case of incest (Lev 20 14), but it is also mentioned as following death by other means (Josh 7 25), and some believe it was never used excepting after death. That it was sometimes used as a punishment on living persons among the heathen is shown by Dnl 3.

(4) The sword or spear as an instrument of punishment is named in the Law (Ex 19 13; 32 27; Nu 25 7 ff). It occurs frequently in monarchic and post-Bab times (Jgs 9 5; 1 S 15 33; 2 S 20 22; 1 K 19 1; Jer 26 23; Mt 14 8.10), but among these cases, there are some of assassination rather than of punishment.

(5) Strangling as a form of punishment has no Scripture authority, but according to tradition was frequently employed, and is said to have been performed by immersing the convict in clay or mud, and then strangling him by a cloth tied around the neck.

Besides these, which are to be regarded as the ordinary capital punishments, we read of some that were either of foreign introduction or of irregular kind, such as: (1) crucifixion (q.v.); (2) drowning (Mt 18 6 ||); (3) sawing asunder or crushing (2 S 12 31; He 11 37); (4) torturing (1 Ch 20 3; He 11 35); (5) precipitation (2 Ch 25 12; Lk 4 29); (6) suffocation (2 Macc 13 4-8). The Persians are said to have filled a high tower a great way up with ashes, and then to have thrown the criminal into it, and continually stirred up the ashes by means of a wheel till he was suffocated (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchy, III, 246). See also HERON, II, 100.

Secondary forms of punishment not heretofore mentioned are to be noted as follows:

(1) Blinding or putting out of eyes in the case of captives (Jgs 16 21; 1 S 11 2; 2 K 25 7).

(2) Chaining by means of manacles or fetters of copper or iron, similar to our handcuffs fastened on the wrists and ankles and attached to each other by a chain (Jgs 16 21; 2 S 3 34; 2 K 25 7); also alluded to in the life of Paul (Acts 28 20; Eph 6 20; 2 Tim 1 16); and in the case of Peter (Acts 12 6).

(3) Confiscation of property that had fallen under the ban, i.e. had been singled out for destruction by the special decree of Jeh, as in Nu 21 2; Josh 6 17; or had been reserved for the use of the army (Dt 2 35; 20 14; Josh 22 8); or given over to the priesthood (Josh 6 19). The term may be extended to include all things vowed or sanctified and those irrevocably devoted or consecrated to God (Lev 27 21.28). The idea is applied with special emphasis to those things which, because of their uncleanness, must not be used by the Israelites, though, through their warfare with the heathen, they might have come into possession of them (Dt 7 26; 1 S 15 16-23).

(4) Dashing in pieces (Ps 2 9; Isa 13 18).

(5) Divine visitation. See VISITATION.

(6) Exposure to wild beasts (Lev 26 22; 1 S 17 46; Dnl 6).

(7) Flaying (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchy, I, 478; Nineveh and Babylon, mentioned figuratively in Mic 3 3).

(8) Forfeiture (Ezr 10 8).

(9) Gallows in the modern sense probably were unknown to the ancients. Where the word occurs in Est (5 14; 6 4; 7 9.10; 9 13.25), it probably refers to a beam or pole on which the body was impaled and then elevated to a height of 50 cubits as an object of warning to the people (see "Hanging").

(10) Imprisonment is frequently referred to in both the OT and the NT, indicating that this was a common mode of punishment among both the Israelites and other nations (Gen 40 3; 42 17;

Hanging.

Assyrian Sculptures (Brit. Mus.).

Lev 24 12; Nu 15 34; 1 K 22 27; Jer 37 15.21; Lk 3 20; Acts 4 3.10; 23 10; and the Epp. of Paul). See PRISON.

(11) Indignities.—In this term may be included all those outbursts of vengeance or other evil dispositions that were practised in times or under circumstances when liberties with the prisoner were permitted on the part of bystanders or those who had charge beyond the execution of the judicial decree. Instances are found in the life of Christ (Mt 26 59.67; Lk 22 63 ff; Jn 18 22); also in the life of Paul (Acts 23 2).

(12) Mutilation (Jgs 1 6.7; Ezk 23 25; 2 Macc 7).—The Law was opposed to thus treating any Israelite, and Samuel, when referring to the arbitrary power of the future king (1 S 8 10 ff), does not say that he would thus treat "their sons." It was a barbarous custom of the East (see EUNUCHS; POLYGAMY), evidently regarded, among the Hebrews, as a heinous practice (Dt 23 1). The only act authorizing mutilation (except in retaliation) is mentioned in Dt 25 11.

(13) Plucking off the hair is alluded to as a mode of punishment in Neh 13 25; Isa 50 6.

(14) Prison garments were in vogue to mark the convicts (Jer 52 33).

(15) Restitution has been alluded to in the general introduction to this topic.

(16) Retaliation was recognized by Moses as a principle, but the application of it was left to the judge (Lev 24 19-22). A fine example of it is found in the law of Dt 19 19.

(17) Scorpions, chastising with.—Probably the use of thongs armed with pointed pieces of lead or other metal (1 K 12 11; 2 Ch 10 14). See SCORPIONS.

PUNITES, pū'nīts (פּוּנִיטִים, pūnī, probably "dark"): Descendants of Puvah, of the tribe of Issachar (Nu 26 23; of Gen 46 13; Jgs 10 1; 1 Ch 7 1).

PUNON, pū'nōn (פּוּנּוֹן, pūnōn): A desert camp of the Israelites, the second after leaving Mt. Hor (Nu 33 42.43). Eusebius (Onom 299 85; 123 9) mentions an Idumaeen village, N. of Petra, in the desert, where convicts were mining copper, called Phinōn or Phainōn. These are doubtless identical. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

PUR, pūr (Est 3 7; 9 26). See PURIM.

PURAH, pū'ra (פּוּרָה, purāh, "branch"): Gideon's "servant," lit. "young man," i.e. armor-bearer (Jgs 7 10 f, AV "Phurah").

PURCHASE, pūr'chās: In modern Eng., "to acquire by payment," in Elizabethan Eng., "to acquire" by any means. In the OT, AV has used "purchase" to represent קָנָה, kānāh, and its derivatives (vb. and noun), except in Lev 25 33, where the word is גָּאָל, gā'al (RV "redeem"). In the NT the noun does not occur and the vb. is used for κτάσμαι, ktáomai, in Acts 1 18; 8 20, and περιποιέω, peripoieō, in Acts 20 28; 1 Tim 3 13. But none of these words connotes the payment of a price, so that RV has kept the word only in Acts 20 28 (m "acquired"), changing it into "obtain" in Acts 1 18; 8 20, and "gain" in 1 Tim 3 13. In the OT, RVm has "gotten" in Ex 15 16 and ARV has (very properly) introduced the same word into the text of Ps 74 2; 78 54.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

PURE, pūr, PURELY, pūr'li, PURITY, pū'ri-ti: This group of words has in the OT and the NT an almost exclusively ethical significance, though the word "pure" is of course used also in its literal sense of freedom from alloy or other alien matter (Ex 25 11, etc.). "Pure" in the OT represents many Heb words, most frequently טָהוֹר, tāhōr; "purely," occurs once only in AV, as the tr of בָּרַר, bār, properly "that which cleanses" (cf Job 9 30, RVm "Heb 'cleanse my hands with lye,'" i.e. alkali for soap) in Isa 1 25, RV "thoroughly [m "as with lye," AV "purely"] purge away thy dross"; "pureness" is the AV tr of the same word in Job 22 30, RV "cleanness." In the NT "pure" is the tr chiefly of καθάρσις, katharōs (Mt 5 8, "Blessed are the pure in heart," etc), but also of ἀγνός, hagnós (Phil 4 8; 1 Tim 5 22; Jas 3 17; 1 Jn 3 3—always in an ethical sense). A different word (eulikrinēs) is used in 2 Pet 3 1, RV "sincere." "Purity" (hagneia) occurs only in AV in 1 Tim 4 12; 5 2; in RV in 2 Cor 11 3 (as the tr of tēs hagnótētos). See CLEAN; PURITY. W. L. WALKER

PURGE, pūrj: A number of words in both the OT and the NT are so rendered in AV and RV, although frequently in RV the older Eng. word "purge" is displaced by the more applicable modern terms "cleanse" and "purify," since the emphatic and medical senses of the word, as we now use it, are not justified by some of the Heb and Gr originals. In older Eng. the word was broader in meaning, today it is specific. Occurrences in AV, with the changes made in RV, are as follows:

(1) טָהַר, tāhēr, lit. "to be clean," used of the putting-away of idolatry from Judah by Josiah (2 Ch 34 3.8). is tr'd "purge" in all VSS, but, in Ezk 24 13, ARV changes to "cleanse."

(2) קָטַף, kāṭāf, lit. "to make a sin offering" (Ps 51 7), is changed without improvement to "purify" in ARV, while "purge" is retained in ERV. (3) כָּפַר, kāphar, "to cover" or "to make atonement," occurs in Ps 65 3; 79 9; Ezk 43 20.26; in the two passages in Pss, RV has "forgive" (the "expiate" of m is still better), and in Ezk the even more accurate "make atonement." In both (4) צָרַף, ṣāraph, "to refine" (Isa 1 25), and (5) רָחַץ, rāḥaḥ, lit. "to rinse" (Isa 4 4), "purge" is well retained in RV. (6) בָּרַר, bārar, lit. "to be shining," RV retains in Ezk 20 38, but in Dnl 11 35 changes to "purify." (7) זָקַק, zākaḥ, "to pour down" as molten metal (Mal 3 3), also becomes "purify" in RV.

These occurrences are all in the figurative sense, and apply to sin, uncleanness, idolatry, etc. Most noteworthy is the ARV change of the familiar Ps 51 7.

The Gr words rendered "purge" in AV of the Apoc and NT are καθάρω, kathairō, and καθάρισμα, katharizō, and their compounds and derivatives.

2. In the NT In all passages except four, RV more properly translates "cleanse" (Mt 3 12; Mk 7 19; Lk 3 17; Jn 15 2; He 9 14.22;

10 2). In He 1 3 "when he had by himself purged our sins" is changed to "had made purification of." But in the case of the vb. compounded with the preps. ἀπό, apō, and ἐκ, ek, i.e. apokathairō and ekkathairō (Job 12 9; 1 Cor 5 7; 2 Tim 2 21), with strong signification to "cleanse out," RV properly retains "purge." Most worthy of note is the change of the familiar verse in Jn, "Every branch, that beareth fruit, he purgeth" to "Every branch . . . he cleanseth" (15 2).

PURIFICATION, pū-ri-fi-kā'shun. See PURGE; PURITY; UNCLEAN.

PURIM, pū'rim (פּוּרִים, pūrim, "lots"; LXX Φρουρά, Phourai), PUR, pūr: The name of a Jewish festival celebrated on the 14th and 15th days of the month Adar, the final month of the Bib. year, corresponding to February-March. The

1. Scripture origin of the festival is narrated in the Book of Est, and indeed is the motive of the book, as the time, reason and manner of its celebration are given in detail (Est 3 7; 9 24 ff). Reference also is made to it in apocryphal literature (Ad Est 10 10-13; 2 Macc 15 36) and in Jos (Ant, XI, vi, 13). No reference is made to this feast in the NT, as it was celebrated locally, and is therefore not to be connected with any of the festal pilgrimages to Jerus. For this reason the supposition of some that the feast of Jn 5 1 was Purim is to be rejected, mention of it being immediately followed by the words, "And Jesus went up to Jerus."

For the complete account of the institution of Purim reference must be made to the Book of Est.

2. History Only a brief statement is possible here. Haman, son of Hammedatha the AGAGITE (q.v.; cf 1 S 15 8.32), who had been made prime minister by King Ahasuerus (Xerxes), bitterly hated the Jews, some of whom, as Mordecai, were rising to prominence in the empire. After Queen Vashti had been put away from her royal position for cause (1 9-12), a Jewess named Esther, kinswoman and adopted daughter of Mordecai, was chosen to become the royal consort. This only increased the hatred of Haman, who in his jealous fury soon began to seek an opportune day to work his hate upon Mordecai and the whole Jewish people, and therefore resorted to the casting of the lots for the auspicious time: "They cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman from day to day, and from month to month, to the twelfth month, which is the month Adar" (3 7). Beginning with the 1st month, all the days and months were tried with unfavorable result, until the last. At Haman's request Ahasuerus caused his scribes to send into all the realm on the 13th day of the 1st month a decree that all Jews should be put to death on the 13th day of the 12th month (3 12 ff). As the narrative shows, the wisdom of Mordecai, Esther's heroism, and fasting and prayer availed to foil the dastardly scheme of Haman, who had already built the gallows on which his hated rival should be hanged. Haman was himself hanged on this gallows, while Mordecai was honored yet more (7 10; 8 1.2). A second decree was issued on the 23d day of the 3d month that on the 13th day of the 12th month (8 9.12), the day appointed in the first decree for their extermination, the Jews should gather together and defend themselves against their foes. On that fateful day not only did the Jews successfully resist the malice of their enemies, but the public officials also, seeing that the royal favor was with the Jews, espoused their cause. In Shushan, the royal city, a second day, the 14th, was granted the Jews for vengeance on their foes (9 11-16). In view of so great a deliverance "Mordecai wrote these things . . . unto all the Jews . . . to enjoin them that they should keep the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same, yearly, as the days wherein the Jews had rest from their enemies" (9 20-22).

Already as early as the times of the Maccabees (2 Macc 15 36), the festival was observed, the 14th day being called "Mordecai's day."

3. Manner Jos refers to it as continuously and widely observed down to his time: "For this cause the Jews still keep the forementioned days, and call them days of Purim" (Ant, XI, vi, 13). In succeeding centuries as the Jews have passed from one civilization or empire to another, so many causes have arisen to remind them of the persecutions of Haman as to make the festival of a triumph over such persecutions both attractive and most significant to them. Experiences in Syria, Egypt, Rome, Russia and elsewhere have not been lacking in suggestion of the original occasion of Purim. The 13th day has been observed by fasting in commemoration of Esther's prayer and fasting before she approached the king; in the evening, at the beginning of the 14th day, the Jews repair to the synagogues where the Book of Est, one of the m'ghillōth, is read with interpretations, execrations bursting out at the reading of Haman's name, accompanied by noise of rattles and stamping of feet, other persecutors and foes also sometimes coming in for a share of execration. The names of Mordecai and Esther receive blessings. On the following morning of the 14th synagogue services are again held, at which, in addition to the repetition of the Est reading, Ex 17 8-16, which records the destruction of the Amalekites (cf Est 3 1), is also read as the lesson from the Law, presents are given to the poor and to friends, and the rest of the day, as also the 15th, observed with feasting and rejoicing, even excesses being condoned in the exuberance of national spirit.

Many attempts have been made to trace the origin of Purim in pagan or cosmic festivals, but to the present time without success, without approach even to probability. Supposed connections with nature myths, national festivals, polytheistic legends have all found advocates. The word itself has suggested the possibility of identification with words of similar form or sound in other languages. But the ease of finding such similarities for any word casts doubt upon the reliability of any identification. (1) It has been traced to the Assy pūrā, and identified with the Assy New Year when officials entered upon their term of service. (2) The Bab puhrū, new year festival, has also been claimed as the origin of Purim; Mordecai becomes Marduk, Esther is Ishtar, while Haman, Vashti and Zeresh are Median gods. (3) The most popular attempts at identification are in the Pers field, where bahr, "lot," is claimed as the source of Pur, or puzdighān, "new year," or farwardighān, the feast of departed souls. (4) Origin also in a Gr hacchanalian occasion has been sought. (5) Others suggest origin in other Jewish experiences than that claimed by the Book of Est itself, such as a captivity in Edom, or a persecution under the Ptolemies in Egypt, or the victory of Judas Maccabaeus over Nicanor in 161 BC (1 Macc 7 49). No one of all these theories has sufficient probability to secure for itself anything like general acceptance; the Book of Est remains as the most reasonable account; the difficulties met in it are not so great as those of the explanations sought in other languages and religions.

PURITY, pū'ri-ti: The Bible bears witness to the long struggle over and in man to secure physical, mental, and moral cleanliness. The various forms of purity have relation to each other.

We have a common proverb that "cleanliness is akin to godliness." Cleanliness and aesthetics are certainly nigh neighbors. But cleanliness and ethics do not dwell farther apart. When one realizes that by uncleanness of person or property he may endanger the health or life of family, or even of society about him—as in keeping conditions that develop typhoid fever—he begins to realize that there is a close tie between cleanliness and morals. "Ought" comes in on the sphere of cleanliness, and then the whole realm of ethics is open. So near are the departments of physical and ethical cleanliness that now if one hears the word "slum" without explanation, he cannot tell whether it relates to filth or sin.

The perception of this relationship is of very ancient date. Though it is Isaiah who says (52 11), "Cleanse yourselves, ye that bear the vessels of Jeh," and Mk 7 3.4, "All the Jews, except they wash their hands diligently, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders; and when they come from the marketplace, except they bathe themselves, they eat not; and many other things there are, which they have received to hold, washings of cups, and pots, and brasen vessels," yet such statements are but summaries of directions distributed here and there throughout the whole Levitical Law. We can read therein what sounds like the hygienic orders of a general to his soldiers on the march, or like the rules of the board of health to preserve a city from pestilence. And these Levitical directions for cleanliness are connected inseparably with the worship of Jeh, as though physical purity were to that an essential. The Psalmist blends these two elements, the physical and the ethical, in the familiar question and answer (24 3-5), "Who shall ascend into the hill of Jeh? and who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto falsehood, and hath not sworn deceitfully. He shall receive a blessing from Jeh, and righteousness from the God of his salvation."

The ceremonial cleansings called for by the Law had meaning and influence. They were interpretative of something spiritual—were a parable way of illustrating the necessity of purity of heart in order to gain acceptance with God. If in after-days the thing symbolized was forgotten in the symbol, that was owing to "blindness of mind." The darkness was not necessary.

But the main subject in respect to which we shall in this art. seek light on purity from the Bible will not be hygiene or aesthetics, but morals.

1. The Sex Relation When we turn to that department we shall at once realize the fact that the sex relation is the most primitive and comprehensive of all the human relations.

The family.—The attitude of the Bible in respect to that relation is unmistakable. From the vision of the Garden of Eden to that of the New Jerusalem, the Bible rings true to the ideal of purity in family life and in the relations of the sexes to each other. This is remarkable, for it is a vast history over which its narrative sweeps, and in it every species of literature is represented. It sets forth the acts and views of a people in all the stages of civilization, from wandering nomads to dwellers in cities embellished by architecture and every device of man to set forth riches and splendor. It sets forth their crime, shame and sin, as well as their virtues, but its tone is approbative of the virtues and reprobative of the crime, shame and sin. In the Magna Charta of the Heb people—the Ten Commandments—there stands in equal rank with any other principle, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." The sanction of religion and law was thus given to the integrity and purity of family life. The minute regulations against marriage with relatives, and the severe punishments inflicted for disregard of the restrictions (Lev 18 and 20), were a powerful force in the same direction. The adultery of married persons was to be punished by the death of both the parties (Lev 20 10; Dt 22 22).

Such laws may sometimes seem severe. Doubtless they are primitive and date from the time of nomadism. In primitive conditions, penalties for infraction of law are to be severe and swift. Pioneers the world over and through time, for very self-preservation's sake, could show little favor or tolerance to lawlessness. Be these laws severe, they show the intense earnestness of a people to have a pure family life in which children born should be genuine to it. These Levitical restrictions upon intermarriage with relatives fit the sense of propriety and right of civilized people, even to this day.

There is no question about the attitude of the prophets on purity. They were in harmony with the Law. They had no tolerance for

2. The Prophets corrupt morals or manners leading to impurity or suggesting it. An illustration sometimes has the light of the sun in it. What it is that is illustrated is frequently best seen by looking at the illustration itself. The prophets were passionate monotheists. They wanted above all things that Israel should be true to Jeh and to Him alone. To the prophets, worship of other gods was treason to Jeh. One prophet after another, and over and over again, illustrates this highest of crimes by infidelity in the marriage relation. That shows in what estimate the family was held. To put any other in the place of Jeh was "to go a-whoring after other gods," or "to play the harlot." That shows as nothing else could how deep in the heart was sunk regard for pure family life. Infidelity was high treason there, or it never would have furnished language to describe high treason to God.

Prov 5 and 7 indicate the attitude of the book on purity. We may let the book make its own case.

3. The Proverbs The wives of "the strange woman" and the stupid folly and destruction of her victim are specially set forth in the chapters mentioned. In the last chapter of the book we have a portraiture of a "virtuous woman" in whom domesticity in purity has reached a high stage. "Let her own works praise her in the gates."

It is pleasant to turn from the tense severity of law, since it must deal largely with crime and sin, to the idealism of poetry. In the Ps and the Prophets the relation of husband and wife, of bridegroom and bride, of lover and loved are always treated with tenderness and reverence. Here is familiar Scripture

(Ps 19): "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork. . . . In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun, which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run his course." That does not betray any lack of sympathy with the exuberant spirit of a lover. So Isa 62 4, 5: "For Jeh delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married. For as a young man marryeth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee; and as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." Language cannot more clearly disclose delight in the joy of those who are adjusting themselves under the "primal eldest" rule over sex: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen 2 24).

It is sometimes thought strange that the Song of Songs should be in the Scripture Canon. But why should there be such doubt? It is but a more particular elaboration of what is boldly brought to notice in the quotations above. There is no more necessity of reading impurity into it than there is of reading it into the quotations above. The poem is illustrative of an experience as widely known as any in the life of the human race—an experience in which sin is no necessity. One must go out of his way who imputes sin to a single act or thought that comes to expression in the poem. The maiden is guileless and the lover is manly. The poem is said to be erotic. But the eros is idealized. It may be sensuous, but it is not sensual. It is not selfish. The passion of each finds expression in careful thoughtfulness for the other. It does not turn back to itself in coarse brute craving of lust for its own self-indulgence. The refrain of the poem is—

"I adjure you, O daughters of Jerusalem

That ye stir not up, nor awake my love."

—Cant 2 7; 3 5; 8 4.

The watchfulness is as tender as that for an infant. Where will the law lay its indictment of sin against such thoughts and feelings? The lovers are under the charm that has been and is to be from everlasting to everlasting with the human race upon the earth.

Christ at His strictest did not set Himself against the charm of love. He said it should be eternally single and true in spirit. The maiden in the song goes forth in the night, in the simplicity of her heart, to find her beloved (3 2 ff.). In the same simplicity, Evangelino wandered all the night of her life to find the object of her affection.

From the same charm in the beginning came the faithfulness of Enoch Arden. Out of the love that springs from purity has come the integrity that has endured to the end. The exuberance of the charm, like every other spring of life and action, needs regulation, but the charm itself is not to be treated as sin.

Paul has said, "Ye are not under law, but under grace" (Rom 6 14). But that depends upon the conditions to which it is applied.

5. Christ and Purity We may not be under the Levitical, ceremonial Law, but we are under the wide realm of ethical law always, even when we are under grace. What grace does is to idealize and spiritualize and make attractive and beautiful what before was perhaps hard, repellent statute and rule. Christ is sometimes thought to have relaxed the severity of "the reign of law." But six times even in the Sermon on the Mount He added to its strictness. Take the idea of the purity of the family as secured by its unity. Under the Mosaic legislation, certain not onerous forms of legal proceeding intervening, the termination of marriage might be said to be optional with the parties. All this liberty is swept away in one sentence: "I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery" (Mt 19 9). That is a law sentence. It was uttered in the realm of law. It was intended to have effect in law. No wonder, considering the liberty that had been allowed in the Law up to that time, that the disciples as soon as they got breath said, "If the case of a man is so with his wife, it is not expedient to marry." They knew that a new law for Christ's disciples was put over marriage. Even the exception confirmed His rule. If the exception is not allowed, polyandry or polygamy is established. No other sentence of human speech has done more for the purity of family life (see Divorce). But Christ did not stop with the utterance of law protective of purity physically; He went behind all acts and laid down law for the thoughts and intents of the heart: "But I say unto you, that every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Mt 5 28).

Sometimes it may be thought that there is a look of moral indifference about the way in which Jesus disposed of the woman's case who was taken in adultery (Jn 8 1-11): "Did no man condemn thee? And she said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said, Neither do I condemn thee; go thy way: from henceforth sin no more." But it must first be remembered that it was not her case but that of her accusers that was immediately before the mind of Jesus. They brought her before Him to trap Him, but He turned and put them on trial. He made their moral condition the main issue. Hers was but an incident. But then, Jesus did not leave her without impressing on her mind that she was a sinner. The last words left ringing in her ears were, "Sin no more." And she was left, as all in sin are left, to wrestle out adjustment with the Holy Spirit who leaves no soul without conviction of "sin, righteousness and judgment." The words of Jesus no more than the words of anyone else can explain all things at once. They can cover a point in view, but much must always be left to the understanding that comes from known experience under the moral government of God.

The subsequent psychology of a sinner after the words of Scripture leave him is of deepest interest. Psychological action he must have had; what is it? The question arises, Had the prodigal son completed his repentance till he had asked the forgiveness of his mother and his elder brother? What is the subsequent psychology of a sinner as he disappears from our view? We can interpret here by what we know to be the operations of the Holy Spirit in the soul; just as we know a material object that disappears from view is still under the law of gravitation. Few who have thought on this subject have expressed the truth so well as Whittier in "Our Master," or in "John Underhill" in these words:

"And men took note of his gloomy air
The shame in his eye, the halt in his prayer,
The signs of a battle lost within,
The pain of a soul in the coils of sin.

Into the desert alone rode he,
Alone with the Infinite Purity;
And bowing his soul to its tender rebuke,
As Peter did to the Master's look,
He measured his path with prayer of pain
For peace with God and nature again."

There is a recognition of the burning with fire that is infolded in the word "purity."

Paul is like his Master. He seeks for purity in this relation after marriage as well as before—purity of mind. In 1 Cor 7 we see 6. Paul how carefully and kindly Paul discoursed about all the complications in matters pertaining to sex. Then again, if Paul has exhorted wives to obedience to husbands, he has also called for equal self-surrender on the part of husbands (Eph 5 22-32): "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself up for it." Can there be any self-surrender greater than that which Christ made? Here let attention rest on the fact that in his catalogue of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5 22), if he has put "love" in the first place of emphasis among the nine, he has put "self-control" in the last.

We have only space for a glance at a few departments of action and thought to see what the world has gained in purity from the religion of the Bible. The age of chivalry ought to have a word put to its credit. The knights took the vow of chastity before the tribunals of the church. Take art—compare a Venus and a Madonna. Not only spirituality, but even intellectuality is wanting in a Venus. There is not a suggestion in a Venus that does not inhere in flesh and sense. Of what would she or could she speak if she were to open her mouth? To judge from her appearance, the utterance would be so "flat, stale and unprofitable," that even the charm of her physical beauty would disappear. In the Madonna you scarce see the physical. If she were to speak, her words would picture the peace and calm joy of a heavenly realm. If her countenance is suggestive of something far away, it is of something far above.

But art is not dead, and spiritual art did not die with the creation of the Madonna. Take St. Gaudens' "Puritan." Compare that with an Apollo. Again we have the contrast there is between a Madonna and a Venus. We have the physical and the aesthetic in an Apollo, but there is not a gleam of the intellectual. That Apollo thinks is not indicated, much less what he might be thinking about. There is not the faintest suggestion of the ethical. There is no intent and purpose in him. But in the Puritan there is intent and purpose. He means much. He is ethical. That determined bearing can only come from a spirit alive with the sense of right. When it comes to that, you will warrant that the Puritan carries more physical guns than the Apollo, and that if they were to clinch in a tug of wrestling Apollo would fall underneath. That ethical intent and purpose is masterly. You may look through a whole pantheon of Greek gods and meet not a trace of the force concentrated in the Puritan. He is forceful because right makes might. He is in the majority because he knows Who is with him. He is conscious of power because he has subdued the kingdom within. He has won the greatest of all victories—self-control.

PURLOINING, pûr-loin'ing; Lit. "for far off," hence to carry away or steal; the word is the tr of νοσφιζομαι, nosphízomai, "to take away from one's self," "to secrete," "to steal," a word appropriate to those in the position of slaves in a master's service (Tit 2 10, "not purloining").

PURPLE, pûr'p'l (אַרְגָּמָן, 'argāmān; Chald אַרְגָּמָן, 'arg'wān [2 Ch 2 7]; of Arab. اَرْجَوَان, 'arjwān, and Pers اَرْغَوَان, 'arghawān; πορφύρα, porphúra, πορφύρεος, porphúreos [LXX and NT]):

Purple dye was manufactured by the Phoenicians from a marine mollusk, Murex trunculus. The shell was broken in order to give access to a small gland which was removed and crushed. The crushed gland gives a milky fluid that becomes red or purple on exposure to the air. Piles of these broken shells still remain on the coast at Sidon and Tyre. The purple gland is found in various species of Murex and also of Purpura.

Purple cloth was used in the furnishings of the tabernacle (Ex 25 4, etc) and of Solomon's temple

(2 Ch 2 14; 3 14); in the palanquin of Solomon (Cant 3 10); and in the hangings of the palace of Ahasuerus (Est 1 6). The kings of Midian had purple raiment (Jgs 8 26); the worthy woman of Prov 31 22 has clothing of fine linen and purple. Mordecai was clothed with purple by Ahasuerus Shells of Murex trunculus (the Broken Ones from a Large Shell Heap at Sidon).

(Est 8 15); Jesus by the Rom soldiers (Mk 15 17.20; Jn 19 2.5). The rich man of Lk 16 19 and the scarlet woman of Rev 18 12.16 were arrayed in purple. In Cant 7 5 the bride has hair like purple. Purple is in the merchandise of Babylon (Rev 18 12). It is surprising that Ezekiel speaks of the Tyrians as obtaining purple from the isles of Elishah (Ezk 27 7) and from Syria (Ezk 27 16). See COLORS; DYE, DYEING.

PURPOSE, pûr'pus, OF GOD (πρόθεσις, próthēsis [Rom 9 11; Eph 1 11]): The word "purpose" seems to be an equivalent of the word "decree" as used in regard to man's relation to eternity. More correctly stated, it softens the word "decree" and refers back to the cause of the decree as lodged in an intelligent design and forward to an aim consistent with the character of God. See FOREORDINATION; PREDESTINATION.

PURSE, pûrs. See BAG.

PURSAIN, pûrs'lân, JUICE, jûos, jûs. See JUICE.

PURTENANCE, pûr'tê-nans: With the significance of "belongings," this word occurs in AV of Ex 12 9 as the tr of כֶּרֶבֶת, kerbh, "within," "inward," "roast . . . with the purtenance thereof," RV "inwards" (cf Lev 1 9; 3 3, etc).

PUT, put (פּוּט, pûl; Φούδ, Phoûd, in Gen and Ch, variant for Gen Φούτ, Phoût, for Ch, Φούθ, Phoûth):

In consequence of the identification at the time, the prophets have "Libya" (Λίβυες, Libues), except Nah 3 9, where the Gr renders the word as φρυγή, phugê, "flight." The Vulg has "Phut," "Phuth," and in the Prophets "Libyes" and "Libya"; AV "Phut."

In the "Table of Nations" Put is the third son of Ham (Gen 10 6), the first and second being Cush and Misraim, and the fourth Canaan. Put is the only one of the sons of Ham who is not credited with descendants.

In the Prophets, warriors from Put are referred to, principally in connection with the forces of Egypt. They appear as shield-bearers (Jer 46 9: "Cush and Put, that handle the shield; and the Ludim, that handle and bend the bow"). See also Ezk 30 5, where the order in the Heb is Cush, Put and Lud. In Nah 3 9 Put is the helper of No-amon (Thebes in Egypt), and in Ezk 27 10 Put appears with Persia and Lydia (Lud) as being in the army of Tyre.

The common identification of Put is the Egypt Punt (or Pwent) proposed by Ebers. The assimilation of n to a following consonant is common in the Sem languages, and would occasion no difficulty if the vocalization be found to agree. The final t of Punt, however, seems to be the Egypt fem. ending, whereas the l of Put is radical.

Nevertheless, the district would seem to be rightly identified with the tract to the E. of Abyssinia (Somaliland), and as it is described as being on both sides of the sea (the land and Red Sea), Yemen would seem to be included. In connection with this, it is worthy of note that a fragment of a Bab tablet referring to Nebuchadrezzar's campaign in Egypt in his 37th year mentions, as though in the neighborhood, the city (here, apparently, standing for the district) of Pûtu-yâman—probably not "Ionian [Gr] Put" (Lesbos, according to Winckler), but "Put of Yemen." If this be in contradistinction to the district of Put (Punt) on the African mainland, the latter would be the Pûtu referred to in the Pers inscription of Naqsh-i-Rustem, which mentions, among the tributary-countries, Kushiya, Putiya and Masiya, in Babylonian (mât) Pûta, [(mât) K]ûšu, (mât) Massû(?), "the land Put, the land Kush (Ethiopia), the land Massû(?)." The soldiers of Put in the army of Tyre may have been either from the African or the Yemenite Put, in which case there was no northern tract of that name, unless settlements had been made at any time from the original district. PUTEOLI, pû-tê'ô-li (Ποτὶολοι, Potioloi, "sulphur springs" [Acts 28 13, WH], the modern Pozzuoli): A maritime city of Campania, which occupied a central position on the northern shore of a recess in the Gulf of Naples, protected on the W. by the peninsula of Baiae and Cape Misenum. It was originally a colony of the neighboring Gr city Cumae.

The earliest event in the history of Puteoli which can be dated definitely was the repulse of Hannibal before its walls by a Rom garrison in 214 BC. The design of the Carthaginian to secure a seaport as base of supplies and communication was thus thwarted (Livy xxiv.7, 12, 13). A Rom colony was established here in 194 BC, and Puteoli thus became the first Rom port on the Gulf of Naples (Livy xxxiv.45; Strabo v.245; Velleius, i.15). Its subsequent remarkable prosperity and commercial activity are to be attributed to the safety of the harbor and the inhospitable character of the coast nearer Rome. For Puteoli became the chief seaport of the capital before the creation of an artificial harbor at Portus Augusti by Claudius, and before Trajan made the mouth of the Tiber the principal converging point for the over-sea carrying trade. The imports at Puteoli consisted mainly of Egypt grain and oriental wares, dispatched from Alexandria and other cities of the Levant (Cicero Pro Rabirio 40; Suetonius Aug. 98; Strabo xvii. 793; Cicero Pro Caelio 10). The eastern element in the population was very numerous (Petronius 81; CIL, X, 1797). The harbor was rendered doubly safe by a mole, which is known to have been at least 418 yds. in length, consisting of massive piers connected by means of arches constructed in solid masonry (Strabo v.245). Extensive remains of this mole still exist. The shore line devoted to purposes of commerce (emporium) extended for a distance of about 1½ miles westward from the mole. At the height of its prosperity under Claudius and Nero, the town is thought to have contained a population of nearly 100,000.

The region in which the town was situated is of volcanic formation, the name Puteoli being due to the odor of the sulphureous springs or to the wells of a volcanic nature which abound in the vicinity. The volcanic dust, called pozzolana today, was mixed with lime to form a cement of the greatest durability, which was proof against the influence of seawater.

Extensive remains of an amphitheater, whose axes measure 160 and 126 yds. across the space inclosed by the outer façade and 75 and 45 yds. within the arena, bear testimony to the former affluence of Puteoli.

The region about Puteoli together with Baiae became the favorite resort of the Rom nobility, and the foundations of many ancient villas are still visible, although partly covered by the sea. Cicero's villa in the territory of Puteoli (Cicero Ad Fam. v.15, 2; Ad Att. xiv.16, 1; 20, 1) was afterward selected as the place of burial of Hadrian (Spartianus Had. 25). The portion of the bay between Puteoli and Baiae was the scene of the attempt made at the instigation of Nero upon the life of his mother by means of a vessel so contrived that it was to break to pieces while conveying Agrippina toward her villa near the Lucrine Lake (Tacitus Annals xiv.8). See NERO.

The apostle Paul found a Christian community at Puteoli, when he arrived there on his way to Rome, and stopped 7 days with them (Acts 28 13, 14). At that time the ordinary route to Rome, following the Via Appia from Capua, was 155 Rom, or about 142½ Eng., miles (Nissen, Italische Landeskunde, II, 739). Later, Domitian reduced the distance to 139 Rom miles (about 129 Eng.) by laying out the Via Domitia along the coast, joining the Via Appia at Sinuessa (Geog. Raven., IV, 32; Itin. Ant., 122; Tab. Peut.).

PUHITES, pū'thīts (פִּתִּיטִים, pūthī, "simple"; AV Puhites): One of the families of Kiriath-jearim, grandchildren of Caleb (1 Ch 2 50.53).

PUTIEL, pū'ti-el (פִּטְיֵאל, pūti'el, "contemned by El"): Father of the wife of Eleazar, Aaron's son, and thus grandfather of Phinehas, Eleazar's son (Ex 6 25). See PHINEHAS, (3).

PUVAH, pū'va. See PUAH.

PYGARG, pī'gārg (דִּישׁוֹן, dīshōn; LXX πύγαργος, pūgargos; cf proper nouns, "Dishon" and "Dishan" [Gen 36 21-30; 1 Ch 1 38-42]; according to BDB, Hommel, Säugethiere, derives דִּישׁוֹן from דָּרַשׁ, dāsh, Arab. دَأَس, dās, "to tread," and cf Assy dashshu, "mountain-goat"): Dīshōn as the name of an animal occurs only in Dt 14 5 in the list of clean beasts. Both AV and RV have "pygarg," which is not the recognized name of any animal whatever. The LXX pygargos (from πύγῃ, pygē, "rump," and ἀργός, argós, "white") was used by Herodotus (iv.192) as the name of an antelope. A white rump is a very common feature of deer and antelopes, and is commonly explained as enabling the fleeing herd easily to keep in sight of its leaders. It has been used as a specific name of Cervus pygargus, the Tartarian roe, and Bubalis pygargus, a small South African antelope. The Arabic Bible has ri'm, "a white gazelle," a kindred word to re'em, AV "unicorn," RV "wild-ox." Tristram, NHB, considers dīshōn to be the addax, Antelope addax or Addax nasomaculatus. There is excellent reason, however, for believing that the range of this African antelope does not extend into Pal, Sinai or Arabia. For a discussion of the animal names in Dt 14 4,5, see ZOOLOGY.

PYRAMID, pir'a-mid (πυραμῖς, pyramis): Pyramids are mentioned in connection with the splendid monument reared by Simon Maccabaeus in memory of his parents and brethren at Modin (1 Macc 13 28; cf Ant., XIII, vi, 6). Jos describes them as "very surprising, both for their largeness and beauty." There is nothing to show how the pyramid allotted to each was distinguished, whether by difference in size or by inscriptions. It is remarkable that in Scripture there is no allusion to the giant structures in Egypt; but these may have supplied the suggestion to Simon's mind.

PYRRHUS, pir'us (Πύρρος, Púrros, "fiery-red"): The name is inserted in the text of RV in Acts 20 4 as that of the father of SOPATER (q.v.).

PYTHON, pī'thon: Occurs only in Acts 16 16, where RV reads, "a certain maid having a spirit of divination [in "a spirit, a Python"] met us." Πύθων, Pūthōn, or Πυθώ, Puthō, is the oldest name of Delphi (or the country about Delphi), in which was situated the famous Delphic Oracle. Consequently "Pythian spirit" came to be the generic title of the supposed source of inspiration of diviners, including the slave-girl of the account in Acts. Exactly what facts underlie the narrative it is rather hard to say, but it is evident that the girl was sincere in her conviction that she spoke with Pythian inspiration. Probably she represents some hysterical type, of none too strong mentality, whose confused utterances were taken as coming from some supernatural power. Impressed by St. Paul's personality, she followed him about, and, when his command came, was in a state of mind that had prepared her to obey it. The narrative, incidentally, gives an interesting sidelight on a society in which a girl with hysteria had a greater commercial value than she had after her cure. See DIVINATION.

QOPH, kóf (ק, k). See KōPH.

QUAIL, kwāl (קָלִיב, s'lāv; ὀρνυγομήτρα, ortu-gomētra; Lat Coturnix vulgaris): A game bird of the family Coturnix, closely related to "partridges" (q.v.). Quail and partridges are near relatives, the partridge a little larger and of brighter color. Quail are like the gray, brown and tan of earth. Their plumage is cut and penciled by markings, and their flesh juicy and delicate food. Their habits are very similar. They nest on the ground and brood on from 12 to 20 eggs. The quail are more friendly birds and live in the open, brooding along roads and around fields. They have a longer, fuller wing than the partridge and can make stronger flight. In Pal they were migratory. They are first mentioned in Ex 16 13: "And it came to pass at even, that the quails came up, and covered the camp; and in the morning the dew lay round about the camp." This describes a large flock in migration, so that they passed as a cloud. Nu 11 31-33: "And there went forth a wind from Jeh, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, about a day's journey on this side, and a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and about two cubits above the face of the earth. And the people rose up all that day, and all the night, and all the next day, and gathered the quails: he that gathered least gathered ten homers: and they spread them all abroad for themselves round about the camp"; cf Ps 78 26-30:

"He caused the east wind to blow in the heavens;
And by his power he guided the south wind.
He rained flesh also upon them as the dust,
And winged birds as the sand of the seas:
And he let it fall in the midst of their camp,
Round about their habitations.
So they did eat, and were well filled;
And he gave them their own desire."

Again the birds are mentioned in migration. Those that fell around the camp and the bread that was sent from heaven are described in Ps 105 39-42. Commentators have had trouble with the above references. They cause the natural historian none—they are so in keeping with the location and the laws of Nature. First the Heb s'lāv means "to be fat." That would be precisely the condition of the quail after a winter of feeding in the S. The time was early spring, our April, and the quail were flocking from Africa and spreading in clouds—even to Europe. They were birds of earth, heavy feeders and of plump, full body. Migration was such an effort that when forced to cross a large body of water they always waited until the wind blew in the direction of their course, lest they tire and fall. Their average was about 16 birds to each nest. If half a brood escaped, they yet multiplied in such numbers as easily to form clouds in migration. Pliny writes of their coming into Italy in such numbers, and so exhausted with their long flight, that if they sighted a sailing vessel they settled upon it by hundreds and in such numbers as to sink it. Taking into consideration the diminutive vessels of that age and the myriads of birds, this does not appear incredible. Now compare these facts with the text. Israelites were encamped on the Sinai Peninsula. The birds were in migration. The quail followed the Red Sea until they reached the point of the peninsula where they selected the narrowest place, and when the wind was with them they crossed the water. Not far from the shore arose the smoke from the campfires of the Israelites. This bewildered them, and, weary from their journey, they began to settle in confused thousands over and around the camp. Then the Israelites arose and, with the ever-ready "throw sticks," killed a certain number for every soul of the camp and spread the bodies on the sand to dry, just as Herodotus (ii.77) records that the Egyptians always had done (see Rawlinson, Herod, II, for an illustration of catching and drying quail). Nature and natural history can account for this incident, with no need to call in the miraculous.

GENE STRATTON-PORTER

QUARREL, kwor'el: Originally (1) "a complaint" (cf "querulous"), or (2) "a cause of complaint," and so (3) "a contention." (1) In AV Mk 6 19 (RV "set herself"; the colloquial "had it in for him" is an exact tr) and Col 3 13 (μουφή, momp'hē, "complaint"; so RV). (2) In 2 K 5 7 (אָנָה, 'anāh, "be opportune," RVm "an occasion"). (3) In AV Lev 26 25 (loose tr of נָקָם, nākām, "vengeance"; so RV). Cf Sir 31 29 AV (RV "conflict") and Prov 20 3 RV (AV "meddling").

QUARRIES, kwor'iz (קָסִילִים, qesilim [Jgs 3 19.26, "graven images"], שֶׁבְּרָרִים, shebhārīm [Josh 7 5, "Shebarim," RVm "the quarries"]):

Qesilim is elsewhere trd "graven images" (Dt 7 5; Ps 78 58; Isa 10 10; Mic 5 13, etc) and is a pl. form of qesal, "graven image" (Ex 20 4, etc), from pāsāl, "to carve." It occurs in the story of Ehud and Eglon and refers to images or hewn stones in the vicinity of Gilgal. Shebhārīm is pl. of shebher, "breach," "fracture," more often "destruction" (e.g. Prov 16 18), from shābhar, "to break." The form shebhārīm is also found in Job 41 25, "consternation," AV "breakings." In Josh 7 5 Shebarim is the point to which the Israelites were chased after their first attack upon Ai. See SHEBARIM.

Quarries in Pal are not usually very deep because there is plenty of good stone to be found at the surface. The quarryman seeks a thick stratum of firm limestone which has a favorable exposure. The vertical joint-planes divide the stratum into large blocks which the quarryman dislodges with the aid of crowbars. These great blocks he skillfully cleaves by inserting several wedges in a line in holes made by a pick, and driving the wedges in with a heavy hammer. In these days gunpowder is occasionally used, esp. when there are not favorable joint-planes producing blocks capable of being moved by the crowbar.

Another method, which is employed where stones of great size are wanted, is to carve the stones out of the rock by cutting channels around them with the pick. In the limestone quarries of Ba'albek and the granite quarries of Aṣwān at the first cataract of the Nile, enormous stones may be seen which were abandoned while in process of being removed by this method. The channels are wide enough to admit the body of the workman, and the marks of the picks on the sides of the channels are plainly visible.

QUARTER, kwôr'tēr: Lit., of course, "the fourth part," and so of the four "ends" (קצוֹת, kācāh) in Jer 49 36, and AV of the four "corners" (so RV, γωνία, gōniā) in Rev 20 8. Hence, "any part" and in this sense used freely for various words by AV. RV has usually dropped "quarter" but unfortunately has retained it in Nu 34 3; Josh 15 5; in his cell between two soldiers, "bound with two chains," his left hand chained to one and his right to the other. The other two soldiers of the quaternion mounted guard before the door, and are spoken of as "the first and the second guard" (ver 10) whom St. Peter and his angel guide had to pass on the way to liberty. The Gr word thus rendered is not found in LXX or anywhere else in the NT.

QUEEN, kwēn: The Bible applies this term: (1) To the wife of a king ("queen consort") (מַלְכָּה, malkāh). In the Book of Est it is the title given to Vashti (1 9) and Esther (2 22); cf Cant 6 8 f. Another Heb word for queen consort is קְבִירָה, q'bhīrāh, lit. "mistress" (cf 1 K 11 19, the wife of Pharaoh; 2 K 10 13, "the children of the king and

STONE IN QUARRIES AT BA'ALBEK.

18 14.15, and introduced it in Josh 18 12.14.20 for צֶדֶף, pē'āh, usually rendered "side." The result is very obscure. Elsewhere in RV only in the phrase "from every quarter" (Gen 19 4; Isa 56 11; Mk 1 45). Cf BORDER; COAST.

QUARTUS, kwôr'tus (Κούαρτος, Koúartos): A Christian in Corinth who with "Erastus the treasurer of the city" sent greetings to the Christian community in Rome (Rom 16 23). He is known to Paul only as a Christian, "the brother."

QUATERNION, kwa-tūr'ni-un (τετραδίων, tetrádion): The name given to a company of four soldiers of Herod's army (Acts 12 4). To four such companies St. Peter had been handed over, who would take their turn of acting as guard over the prisoner, each of the four watches of the night according to Rom reckoning, which Herod Agrippa I would follow. In the castle of Antonia St. Peter was thus closely secured, in order that Herod, who had already killed James, the brother of John, with the sword (12 2), might, after the solemnities of the Passover, make sure of his death likewise. On the night before his intended execution he was sleeping the children of the queen"). In Neh 2 6 and Ps 45 9 we find the expression שֶׁגַל, shēghāl, which some trace back to שָׁגַל, shāghal, "to ravish," a rather doubtful derivation. Still another term is שָׂרָה, sārāh, lit. "princess" (Isa 49 23). The LXX sometimes uses the word βασίλισσα, basilissa; cf Ps 45 9. (2) To a female ruler or sovereign ("queen regnant"). The only instances are those of the queen (malkāh) of Sheba (1 K 10 1-13; cf 2 Ch 9 1-12) and of Candace, the queen (basilissa) of the Ethiopians (Acts 8 27). In Mt 12 42 (cf Lk 11 31) Christ refers to the queen of the south (βασίλισσα νότου, basilissa nólou), meaning, of course, the queen of Sheba. (3) To a heathen deity, מַלְכֶּת הַשָּׁמַיִם, m'lekketh ha-shāmayim, "the queen of heaven" (Jer 7 18; 44 17 ff). See QUEEN OF HEAVEN.

(4) Metaphorically, to the city of Babylon (Rome) (Rev 18 7): an expression denoting sovereign contempt and imaginary dignity and power.

WILLIAM BAUR

QUEEN MOTHER (קְבִירָה, q'bhīrāh, lit. "mistress," then a female ruler, and sometimes simply the wife of a king ["queen," 1 K 11 19]; in Dnl 5 10 the term מַלְכָּתָא, mal'kathā, "queen," really means the mother of the king): It stands to reason that among a people whose rulers are polygamists the mother of the new king or chief at once becomes a person of great consequence. The records of the Books of K prove it. The g'bhīrāh, or queen mother, occupied a position of high social and political importance; she took rank almost with the king. When Bath-sheba, the mother of Solomon, desired "to speak unto him for Adonijah," her son "rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a throne to be set for the king's mother; and she sat on his right hand" (1 K 2 19). And again, in 2 K 24 15, it is expressly stated that Nebuchadnezzar carried away the king's mother into captivity; Jeremiah calls her g'bhīrāh (29 2). The king was Jehoiachin (Jeconiah, Jer 29 2), and his mother's name was Nehushta (2 K 24 8). This was the royal pair whose impending doom the prophet was told to forecast (Jer 13 18). Here again the queen mother is mentioned with the king, thus emphasizing her exalted position. Now we understand why Asa removed Maacah his (grand?) mother from being queen (queen mother), as we are told in 1 K 15 13 (cf 2 Ch 16 16). She had used her powerful influence to further the cause of idolatry. In this connection Athaliah's coup d'état may be briefly mentioned. After the violent death of her son Ahaziah (2 K 9 27), she usurped the royal power and reigned for some time in her own name (2 K 11 3; cf 2 Ch 22 12). This was, of course, a revolutionary undertaking, being a radical departure from the usual traditions.

And finally, the political importance of the g'bhīrāh is illustrated by the fact that in the Books of K, with two exceptions, the names of the Jewish kings are recorded together with those of their respective mothers; they are as follows: Naamah, the Ammonitess, the mother of Rehoboam (1 K 14 21; cf ver 31, and 2 Ch 12 13); Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom (1 K 15 2) or Absalom (2 Ch 11 20), the mother of Abijah; Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom, the mother (grandmother?) of Asa (1 K 15 10; cf 2 Ch 15 16); Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi, the mother of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22 42; cf 2 Ch 20 31); Athaliah, the grand-daughter of Omri, the mother of Ahaziah (2 K 8 26; cf 2 Ch 22 2); Zibiah of Beersheba, the mother of Jehoash (2 K 12 1; cf 2 Ch 24 1); Jehoaddin (Jehoaddan, 2 Ch 25 1) of Jerus, the mother of Amaziah (2 K 14 2); Jecoliah (Jechiliah, 2 Ch 26 3) of Jerus, the mother of Azariah (2 K 15 2) or Uzziah (2 K 15 13,30, etc; cf 2 Ch 26 3); Jerusha (Jerushah, 2 Ch 27 1), the daughter of Zadok, the mother of Jotham (2 K 15 33); Abi (Abijah, 2 Ch 29 1), the daughter of Zechariah, the mother of Hezekiah (2 K 18 2); Hephzibah, the mother of Manasseh (2 K 21 1); Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Jotbah, the mother of Amon (2 K 21 19); Jedidah, the daughter of Adaiah of Bozkath, the mother of Josiah (2 K 22 1); Hamutal, the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, the mother of Jehoahaz (2 K 23 31); Zebidah, the daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah, the mother of Jehoiakim (2 K 23 36); Nehushta, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerus, the mother of Jehoiachin (2 K 24 8); Hamutal (Hamital), the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, the mother of Zedekiah (2 K 24 18). The exceptions are Jehoram and Ahaz.

WILLIAM BAUR

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (מַלְכָּת הַשָּׁמַיִם, m'lekhet ha-shamayim, although there is another reading, מְלִיכָה, m'le'khet, "worship" or "goddess"):

Occurs only in two passages: Jer 7 18; 44 17-19,25, where the prophet denounces the wrath of God upon the inhabitants of Judah and Jerus who have given themselves up to the worship of the host of heaven. This is no doubt a part of the astral worship which is found largely developed among the Jews in the later period of their history in Canaan. It is first mentioned in 2 K 17 16 as practised by the men of the Northern Kingdom when Samaria had fallen and the ten tribes were being carried away into captivity. Moses is represented as warning the Israelites against the worship of the sun and moon and stars and all the host of heaven, practised by the people of Canaan (Dt 4 19; 17 3), and the existence of such worship among the Canaanites and neighboring nations is attested from an early period (cf Job 31 26-28). The worship of the heavenly bodies was widely spread in the East and in Arabia; and the Bab pantheon was full of astral deities, where each divinity corresponded either to an astral phenomenon or to some circumstance or occurrence in Nature which is connected with the course of the stars (Jeremias, The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, I, 100). From the prophets we gather that before the exile the worship of the host of heaven had become established among all classes and in all the towns of Israel (Jer ubi supra; Ezk 8 16). In that worship the queen of heaven had a conspicuous place; and if, as seems probable from the cakes which were offered, she is to be identified with the Assyrian Ishtar and the Canaanite Astarte, the worship itself was of a grossly immoral and debasing character. That this Ishtar cult was of great antiquity and widely spread in ancient Babylonia may be seen from the symbols of it found in recent excavations (see Nippur, II, 236). How far the astral theorists like Winckler and Jeremias are entitled to link up with this worship the mourning for Josiah, the lamentations over Tammuz, the story of Jephthah's daughter, and even the narrative of the misfortunes and the exaltation of Joseph, is questionable. But that the people of Judah in the days before the exile had given themselves over to the worst and vilest forms of heathen worship and incurred the grievous displeasure of Jeh is made clear by the denunciation of the worship of the queen of heaven by Jeremiah. T. NICOL

QUEEN OF SHEBA, shē'ba (1 K 10 1-13; 2 Ch 9 1-12, called in Mt 12 42; Lk 11 31, "the queen of the south" βασιλισσα νότου, basilissa nótou):

The two OT accounts of the coming of the queen of Sheba (see SHEBA) to Solomon differ slightly from one another, and, of the two, that in 1 K is the older. (1) The words "concerning the name of Jeh" (1 K 10 1) are wanting in 2 Ch; while LXX in 1 K has "and the name of Jeh," apparently a correction of the MT. (2) For 1 K 10 9, "because Jeh loved Israel for ever," 2 Ch 9 8 has "because thy God loved Israel, to establish them for ever"; LXX in 1 K has "because Jeh loved Israel, to establish it for ever." (3) In the last verse of each account, we find another difference: 2 Ch 9 12 says that Solomon gave to the queen all her desire, "besides that which she had brought unto the king," i.e. according to some, besides the equivalent of what she had brought to him; 1 K 10 13 m has "besides that which he gave her according to the hand of king Solomon," i.e. besides gifts commensurate with his own wealth and power (SBOT), or besides gifts which he gave her quá king.

The narrative tells of the queen of Sheba, on hearing of Solomon's great wisdom, coming to test him with perplexing questions or

2. The Narrative presents to the king, and interviewed him: "And when the queen of Sheba had seen all the wisdom of Solomon, and the house that he had built" (i.e. the palace, not the temple) as well as its arrangements, "and his burnt-offering which he offered in the house of Jeh [so read and translate with RVm in 1 K 10 5, and also in 2 Ch 9 4]; there was no more spirit in her": the half of Solomon's wisdom had not been told her. "Happy," she said to him, "are thy wives [so read with LXX, Syr and Old Lat VSS], happy are these thy servants." She then exchanged gifts with him and returned to her own land.

The narrative is a complement of that in 1 K 3 16-28, where the king's justice is exemplified; here his wisdom.

The narrative is referred to by Jesus in Mt 12 42; Lk 11 31, where He refuses to accede to the request of the scribes and Pharisees for a sign from Him. He tells them that no sign will be given them except that of Jonah, whose sign was his preaching, one that proved sufficient to the Ninevites; and 'bchold something greater than Jonah is here.' The men of Nineveh will be a living condemnation of them "in the judgment" (cf Lk 16 31); and so will the "queen of the south" who came from the ends of the earth after hearing of Solomon's wisdom, 'and behold something greater than Solomon is here.' The only sign to be given is that of the wisdom of Jesus, a wisdom far greater than that of Solomon (see D. Smith, Days of His Flesh, 176 ff).

Eastern lit. has much to say about the queen of Sheba. The Arabs called her Bilkis. Abyssinian legend declares that she came from Ethiopia, her name being Makeda, and that she had a son by Solomon. See Delitzsch, Iris, 116-27; ZDMG, X, 19f; J Pr T, VI, 524 ff (1880). Gressmann (in Schriften des AT, II, 1, 203) has further references to Wilhelm Hertz, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, 1905, 413 ff; Bezold, Kebrā Nagast, 1905, and also ZDMG, 60, 666 ff. For the Mohammedan story, see Koran xxvii, with notes in Sale's tr.

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

QUENCH, kwench, kwensh: Where the word is used of fire or of thirst it has the usual meaning: "to allay," "to extinguish," "to suppress," "to cool." In the OT it is frequently applied to the affections and passions (see 2 K 22 17; Cant 8 7; Isa 42 3; Jer 4 4; 21 12). Quenching the coal or the light of Israel may mean slaying a dear one or a brilliant leader. In the NT it is also used figuratively, as in Eph 6 16 the shield of faith quenches the fiery darts of the evil one. In Mk 9 48, σβέννυμι, sbénnumi, and its derivative are applied with reference to Gehenna (tr^d "hell"). The same word is also used of resisting the gifts of the Holy Spirit in 1 Thess 5 19.

G. H. GERBERDING

QUESTION, kwes'chun: The noun for דָּבָר, dābhār, "word," in 1 K 10 3 || 2 Ch 9 2, with "hard question" for חִדְּבָהּ, hīdhāh, "dark saying," "riddle," in 1 K 10 1 || 2 Ch 9 1. In the NT for ζήτημα, zētēma, the synonym ζήτησις, zētēsis (and 1 Tim 1 4, ἐκζήτησις, ekzētēsis), being rendered "questionings" by RV (AV does not distinguish). In Mk 11 29 for λόγος, lógos, "word" (so RVm). The vb. in the sense "ask a question" in 2 Ch 31 9 for דָּרַשׁ, dārash, and Lk 2 46; 23 9 for ἐπερωτάω, eperotāō (cf ARV, ERVm Jn 16 23). Elsewhere the vb. is for συζητέω, suzēlēō, "dispute" (Mk 1 27; etc; cf Acts 6 9; 9 29). "Called in question," Acts 19 40 AV, represents ἐγκαλέω, egkalēō, "call into court," but in 23 6; 24 21, "I am called in question" is for κρίνομαι, krīnomai, "I am being judged."

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

QUICK, kwik, QUICKEN, kwik'n: Translates in AV four different words: (1) הַיָּאֵה, hāyāh, (2) מִיְהֵאֵה, mīhyāh, (3) רָעִה, rū'eh, and (4) זָאוּ, zāo. Of these words (1) and (4) had simply the sense of life, and this idea was in 1611 adequately given by the word "quick," although this sense of the word has long been somewhat obscured. As the tr of רָעִה (Isa 11 3) "quick" as found in AV signified "acute." In this passage RV substitutes "delight" for "quick understanding." In Lev 13 10, 24 RV retains the rendering "quick," although originally the word mīhyāh must in some way have involved the conception of life, which no longer belongs to the Eng. word "quick." It is not clear exactly in what sense the flesh in the sore or scar was thought of as living, esp. as it was plainly regarded as in an unhealthy condition. Possibly the condition under consideration resembled what is sometimes idiomatically styled in Eng. "proud flesh," and was thought of as a peculiar manifestation of life.

To quicken also means a reviving, a refreshing, an increasing of life (Ps 71 20; 85 6; 119 37, 40, 88; Isa 57 10). It often has reference to the resurrection from the dead (1 Cor 15 36) and is so used in many places in AV. Where it refers to the giving of spiritual life RV has changed it in every case (Eph 2 1, 5; Col 2 13; cf Jn 5 21).

QUICKSANDS, kwik'sandz. See SYRTIS.

QUIET, kwī'et: Vb. or adj. only in EV, "quietness" being used for the noun. No special Heb or Gr words are represented, but in the OT usually for some form or derivative of שָׁקֵט, shākat, "be undisturbed" (Jgs 18 7; cf Prov 1 33, שָׁקֵט, shā'ar, "to loll," "be at ease"; Eccl 9 17, נָחַת, nahath, "quiet," "be set on"). For "them that are quiet in the land" in Ps 35 20, see MEEK; POOR. For "quiet prince" in Jer 51 59, RV substitutes "chief chamberlain," m "quartermaster." "Jacob was a quiet [מָנַח, tām, "gentle"] man" (Gen 25 27, AV "plain"). In the NT, it is the tr of ἡσυχάζω, hēsūcházō, "to refrain from gossip or meddlesomeness": "that ye study to be quiet" (1 Thess 4 11), and of ἡσυχίος, hēsūchios, "gentle": "a meek and quiet spirit" (1 Pet 3 4; cf 1 Tim 2 2).

QUIT, kwit: Same derivation as "quiet," so that "to be quit" (Ex 21 19, 28; Josh 2 20 AV) is "to be relieved of responsibility," נָקָה, nāqāh, נָקָה, nāqāh, "guiltless" (so RV Josh 2 20). Hence "to quit one's self" means "to be freed by discharging a duty." The phrase in EV, however, is a gloss, for in 1 S 4 9 it is used for הָיָאֵה, hāyāh, "to be," while in 1 Cor 16 13 ἀνδρίζομαι, andrizomai, means "to behave like a man."

QUIVER, kwiv'er (קַוֵּיפָה, 'ashpāh, תֵּלֵךְ, tēlēk; φάρετρα, pharētra [Sir 26 12]): A case or sheath for carrying arrows, a part of the ordinary equipment of the warrior, both foot-soldier and charioteer (Job 39 23; Isa 22 6), and also of the huntsman (Gen 27 3). Figuratively of a group in passages where children (Ps 127 5) or prophets of Jeh (Isa 49 2) are spoken of as arrows. Arrows are called bēnē 'ashpāh, "sons of the quiver" (Lam 3 13). By identifying the arrows with the death they produce, the quiver is likened to an open sepulcher (Jer 5 16).

LITERATURE

I. Introductory.—There are, all told, approximately 300 direct quotations from the OT in the NT. The presence of so many citations, each one of which involves an interpretation of the passage given a new context in quotation, opens many avenues of discussion and propounds many difficult and far-reaching problems. In every separate instance, in the long list of NT quotations, the principle of accommodation (see ACCOMMODATION) in some form is involved, and, consequently, the question of historical and exegetical accuracy is unavoidably raised. In the present article we shall concentrate attention upon that which is of far greater importance than the question whether the writer is incidentally correct, according to modern scientific principles, in any specific citation. This more important and vital issue we take to be the general, guiding principles adopted by the NT writers in their use of the book of the older covenant. A review of these principles, together with certain outstanding and typical instances in which these principles are used and applied, will form the substance of the discussion.

II. Constructive Principles of NT Quotation.—

In the first place, the NT writers regard the Christian religion as having its roots in the OT. From the call of Abraham to the founding and expansion of the Christian church the men of the NT recognize a single organic movement. In their use of the ancient oracles in new setting they constantly and confidently rely upon the unity of the two dispensations, that recorded in the OT and that in which they themselves were participants. Such a unity, taking for granted its existence, would remove to a degree the very distinction implied in the terms Old and New Testaments, and would involve a definite and organic relationship of all the books to each other. There are no longer two separate groups of books standing apart from each other and having bonds of union only within the group, but, on the contrary, two related sub-groups outwardly corresponding to contrasted phases of the historical movement, but inwardly conformed to the deep-lying principles which make the entire movement one. According to this idea the Book of Gen is as really related to the Gospel of Mt as it is to the Book of Ex. On the surface, and historically speaking, the Book of Gen leads immediately to the Book of Ex, which is its companion volume and complement, but go more deeply into Gen and just as really and just as directly it leads to Mt, which is also its fellow and complement. And so throughout. The unifying medium is, of course, the history which is one in that it involves the same organic principles applied to successive areas of human experience. The books of the Bible are, therefore, like any group of books on a common subject, phases of each other, contrasted and yet intimately cognate. In quoting from the OT the NT writers were simply obeying an impulse common to all thoughtful writers and accounting for all quotations, seeking for diversified expression of the same truths.

The second great constructive principle of NT quotation, and manifestly in close harmony with the first one, is that the movement from Abraham to Christ was not only organically one, but that it was from the beginning planned and prepared for. The Bible is one because the history out of which it grew is one. The history is one because God is in the history and God is one. According to the writers of the NT in this history as a whole we have the unfolding of an all-embracing plan of God, stretching out into the remotest future and coming to its culmination in the person and the kingdom of the Messiah. They maintain also that this plan was disclosed in part beforehand, by way of anticipation and preparation, in order that men might intelligently cooperate with God in the fulfilment of His purpose. This is the idea involved in prophecy and its fulfilment, and in the closely related idea of promise and its realization. One mind, one will, and one central purpose are operating throughout the entire history which is, on the Divine side, the fulfilment of a plan complete in thought before it takes shape in events. On the basis of this conception, of the foreseen plan of God and its gradual revelation to men through messages of hope and warning set in the key of the great future and pointing the way thither, the greater part of the structure of NT quotation is reared.

A third principle which really involves a combination of the other two and is prominently brought forward in the use of quotation for purposes of argument is the recognition and acceptance of the OT as authoritative, a real Word of God, in form occasional, but essentially applicable to all experiences, and hence good for all time. It is evident that the belief in the continued authority of the Scripture of the old covenant over the men of the new, rests upon the unity of the two dispensations and the acceptance of the same Divine mind and will as operating throughout all outward and historical changes. This is admirably expressed by Paul when he speaks of 'the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he purposed in him unto an economy of the fulness of the periods, to sum up all things in Christ' (Eph 1 9.10), and by the author of He when he says: 'God, having of old spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by various portions and in various ways, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son' (1 1.2).

The justification of these accepted principles of reference on the part of the NT writers lies beyond the scope of the present discussion.

4. Issue Involved in Foregoing Principles of Reference—It is sufficient to emphasize the fact that any detailed discussion of NT quotations seriatim is meaningless and futile except upon the basis of an explicit and consistent determination of these antecedent questions. To the present writer the validity of these principles is beyond question. The denial of any one of the three involves one in difficulties of interpretation, both critical and historical, from which there is no escape. It is to be noted, therefore, that the establishment of the principles, in accordance with which the NT writers quote, carries with it in a general way the justification of their usage.

III. Typical Instances of NT Quotation.—With these constructive principles in mind we are prepared to pass in review typical instances in which general principles are embodied. At this point we shall be greatly assisted in the analysis and distribution of the complex material before us by giving careful heed to the formulas, more or less fixed and uniform, by which the writers introduce quotations and indicate their sense of the value and significance of that which is quoted. While these formulas exhibit certain verbal variations, they are practically reducible to three, which correspond with substantial accuracy to the three constructive principles already noted: the unity of the OT and NT; the prevision of the NT in the OT; the authority of the OT as the Word of God intended for all time.

1. Introductory Formulas

The unity of the two dispensations is asserted in all those passages introduced by a formula, in which fulfilment is asserted as a fact, and in which the operation of identical principles in two or more separate events in the field of history is implied. A suggestive example is in Mt 13 14, where Our Lord asserts, in connection with the parable of the Sower, that in the unbelief of the people of His day "the prophecy of Isaiah" is fulfilled. The prophetic words here quoted (Isa 6 9.10) are not predictive in any immediate sense, but are susceptible of repeated application and realization because of the general principle which they contain. They apply to the prophet's own day; they also apply—and in that sense are fulfilled—to the time of Jesus, and by a legitimate extension of meaning, to stubborn unbelief in any age (cf Jn 6 45).

2. Unity of the Two Dispensations

Another passage in which the same formula is used in a very exceptional way clearly sets forth the fundamental principle upon which this usage rests. Jas 2 23 asserts that the justification of Abraham in the offering of Isaac "fulfilled" the passage which affirms that his belief was counted to him for righteousness (Gen 15 6). This passage is not predictive in any sense, nor is there in the narrative any hint of a connection between the passage and the episode on Mt. Moriah. This use of the formula of fulfilment by James involves the principle that any event which realizes the meaning and truth of a Scriptural statement fulfils it. A vast number of quotations in the NT come under this head. Persons, events, doctrines, illustrate and confirm, or embody and concretely realize, principles which are taught in the OT or implied in its history. We are warned by this passage and many others like it against a too rigid and literal interpretation of any formula implying fulfilment. While it may certainly be intended to imply literal prediction and an equally literal fulfilment, it may, on the contrary, be intended to intimate nothing more than a harmony of principle, fitting the passage to the person or event with which it is connected. In this connection it is to be remembered that a harmony of principle may extend all the way from a comparatively superficial illustrative resemblance to a profound assonance of thought. Not a few OT quotations were made for purposes of illustration and literary embellishment. Herein lies the significance of Matthew's use (2 17 f) of Jer 31 15. A glance at this quoted passage indicates that it is a figurative and poetic expression in which Rachel (already for many years in her tomb) is represented as weeping for her exiled children and refusing to be comforted except by their return. There is no strictly predictive element in the passage, save only the promise of return, which is not used by Matthew. Its applicability to the massacre of the children of Bethlehem lies in its poetical appositeness, and there alone. Once again the voice of wailing motherhood is heard in Israel. The tender and beautiful imagery is applicable in this sense and is used with true insight, but with no intention of justifying a claim of prediction and fulfilment in the literal sense.

The prevision of events in the life of Jesus and in the history of Christianity is involved in all the quotations in which a necessary connection between the passage as predictive and the event is asserted, or in which a prophet is said to have been speaking or writing concerning the event or person in question. An examination of the OT without reference to its use in the NT seems to justify the conclusion that its bearing upon the future may be particularized under four heads, which in turn with sufficient accuracy and exhaustiveness will classify the pertinent NT quotations.

(1) The prophetic teaching of Israel embodied not only in the messages of the prophets, but also in laws, institutions, and rites, has a twofold dispensational application. Reference is made here only to those explicit references to a future era of especial blessing. For example, in Acts 2 17 ff Peter interprets the Pentecostal experience in the terms of prophecy, referring to Joel (2 28 ff), who promises an outpouring of God's Spirit in a "great and notable day" of the Lord. The promise through Joel is an undeniable prediction (every promise is such), which in a measure would be fulfilled in any exceptional manifestation of God's Spirit among men. The only question which can possibly be raised in connection with Peter's use of this passage is whether the Pentecostal outpouring was the climactic realization of the promise: that is, the establishment of the era of blessing foretold by the prophet. Later in the same book (3 20-26) the same apostle sweeps the whole field of prophecy as entering in certain promises fulfilled in Christ and the Christian community.

He instances two, the prophet like Moses (Dt 18 15) and the promised inclusive blessing through Abraham (Gen 12 3). He also includes (Acts 3 26) a hint of the Servant passages of Isa. This identification of the NT movement through two specific predictive promises is wholly justified by the prophetic character of Jesus, the range and richness of the blessings brought from Abraham through Him, and by the fact elsewhere emphasized that no other has measured up to the standard of the ideal servant. Negatively, it may be urged that if these promises were not fulfilled in Christ, history affords no possibility of discovering any fulfilment measurably adequate, either in the past or future. In He (8 8-12) reference is made to the promise of a new covenant in Jer (31 31 ff) as a justification for believing that the OT dispensation was not complete in itself and that in its very constitution it pointed forward to Christianity as its fulfilment. Combining this passage with that quoted above (Acts 2 17 ff) taken from Joel, the strength of the case for this use of the OT is at once seen. Distinctively Jeremiah's "new covenant" was to be inward and gracious rather than outward and legal. The promise through Joel is an awakening of prophecy through the free outpouring of God's Spirit. The distinctive feature of the gospel is its idea of justification by faith, through grace revealed in Christ and imparted by the Holy Spirit given according to promise at Pentecost. The "new covenant" foretold by Jeremiah was established at Pentecost through the outpouring of the Spirit promised through Joel. To deny this as fulfilment is to nullify the meaning of Christian history and to erase both promises from the page of credible prophecy.

(2) Contemporary persons or institutions are sometimes interpreted, not in the terms of present actuality, but on the basis of the ideal not revealed or realized until the coming of Christ. One striking example of this method is to be found in the so-called "Immanuel passage" (Mt 1 23, quoting Isa 7 14). Undoubtedly the message of the prophet to Ahaz had an immediate and contemporary significance. But, like many another notable prophetic message, it is set in the key of the Messianic King whose unworthy predecessor Ahaz was. "The Messiah comes, but the wilfulness of Ahaz has rendered His reign impossible" (G. A. Smith, "Isa," Expositor's Bible, I, 134).

In Acts 2 24-36, passages representative of many others quoted, both the resurrection and ascension of Jesus are interpreted in the light of two quotations from the Pss (16 8ff; 110 1) as pre-determined and therefore certain events in the plan and purpose of God. In both instances the argument is that the promises nominally made to David, or claimed by him, were couched in terms too vast to find fulfilment in his own experience, but were spoken of the greater King who was to come and in whose experience alone they were realized. In the former instance, a triumph over death was anticipated with assurance which not the Psalmist but only Christ attained; in the latter a royal ascendancy was promised that only Christ's ascension to the place of power could satisfy. An examination of the passages shows that Peter's interpretation is justified not merely by the wording of the promises, which point to a fullness of experience not realized by any OT man, but still more clearly by the descriptive titles which identify the person who is the subject of the experience. In the first instance he is spoken of as Jeh's "Holy One," in the second as "My Lord." The triumph over death which the speaker anticipates is grounded in a unity of purpose and will with God—a holiness which was ideal and still unrealized until Christ came. The logic of the ps is: God's "Holy One" must not see corruption. The logic of history is: Christ is God's Holy One and He did not see corruption. The principle that triumph over death is the logical issue of holiness found its justification and proof not directly in the experience of the singer who first glimpsed it as a truth, but in the career of Christ who first realized it as a fact.

NOTE.—The argument here is not affected if one accepts the variant reading "Holy Ones" for the preceding passage.

The second passage is particularly interesting because Our Lord Himself first pointed out its implications as to the place and work of the Messiah. Such a passage as this entire ps (110) would have been impossible had not the powers and responsibilities of the Davidic King been keyed from the beginning at the Messianic level. The logic here is the same as in Ps 16. The Messianic kingdom over all nations awaited the coming of the true Messianic King. The long-delayed triumph followed hard upon the coming of the long-expected King (cf Ps 2 1.2; Acts 13 32-34).

The same principle is involved in Our Lord's use of the Servant passage (Isa 61 1ff) in His sermon at Nazareth. Here the issue as to Messianic prophecy is fairly joined at the center. It is central because it occurs in the Lord's own teaching and also because it concerns, not any external or incidental happenings in the life of Jesus, but the whole trend and movement of prophetic thought, together with the entire meaning and interpretation of His career.

Interpreted altogether apart from the NT, the passage has an unmistakable bearing upon the future. As one of the series concerned with the Servant (Isa 42 1ff), the quoted passage focuses attention upon the mission of Israel to the world, still to be carried out. "Ye are my witnesses, saith Jeh, and my servant whom I have chosen" (43 10), "Yet now hear, O Jacob my servant, and Israel, whom I have chosen" (44 1). It also involves the entire scope and meaning of the prophetic office through which Jeh's will was made known to Israel and through Israel to the world. Both these considerations sweep out into the prophet's future and both point unerringly to Christ as the historical fulfilment of Israel's mission and as the actual-realization of the ideal and ministry of prophethood. The very ambiguity of the reference in this chapter (ch 61), whether to the Servant or to the prophet, and the questions raised as to whether Israel idealized is referred to or some person or personification, serve to make more clear and unmistakable the central fact that only in Christ is the conception embodied in the entire series of passages altogether realized. It thus becomes for sober thought a distinct revelation and portraiture in advance of what Jesus was in His person and work.

(3) In the course of Israel's training to receive the Messiah, certain external items were given as bearing upon the identification of Him when He should come. We shall instance three items, closely related to each other, and each intensely interesting in itself. These three items are (a) His sonship to David (Acts 2 30.31), (b) His birth from a Virgin (Mt 1 22f), (c) His birth at Bethlehem (Mt 2 5). Objection is offered at once to the interpretation of these OT passages as predictive, and to the alleged fulfilments in the life of Jesus, on the ground mainly that being definite events (cf Mt 2 15) they are not included within the legitimate scope of prediction; and, secondarily, that being items of this external kind it would be an easy matter to invent fulfilments. It may be granted at once that incidents of this kind could be indefinitely multiplied by fabricating coincidences, but the fact remains that, in the absence of any visible check upon invention, very few such instances are alleged by NT writers. Furthermore, there are suggestive variations between the events recorded and the natural interpretations of the OT passages connected with them; that is, the fulfilments arrive by such devious routes as to make it difficult to suppose them to be due to the imaginative stimulation of the passages. For example, the birth at Bethlehem was brought about by circumstances not at all to the liking of Jewish patriots, and was obscured to contemporaries by the previous and subsequent residence at Nazareth. The kinship of Jesus to the house of David was made adoptive (unless Mary was of that house) by the virgin birth. The interpretation of Isa 7 14 as intimating a virgin birth was not compulsory to one familiar with the Heb text of the passage and would have been thought of in that connection only by one assured of the fact. The virgin birth (see IMMANUEL; VIRGIN BIRTH) is not an etymological but a providential commentary on Isa 7 14. One other consideration of primary importance remains. In the one point where the identification of Jesus with the Messiah by His followers can be tested most severely, they are most completely triumphant. It would be comparatively easy to invent incidents suggested by OT prophecies, and to take dignities and titles wholesale from the same source—but given all these, to find one capable of realizing and fulfilling the expectations so aroused is the chief problem. Here fabrication is impossible. And here too the NT meets and answers the challenge of truth. In view of these considerations it is safe to assert that even in matters of historical detail the career of Jesus was foreseen and predicted. Such passages belong to the philosophy of preparation as a whole and should be studied in that connection.

(4) In certain instances the original passage and its reappearance in quotation indicate a process which is continuous throughout all history. For example, the use of Zec 13 7 (Mk 14 27) suggests a deeper view of the connection between prophecy and history, immediate and more remote, than we are often aware of. On the face of them such passages as those concerning the Smitten Shepherd and the scattered sheep are predictions, and the life of Christ stands as fulfilment. It simply cannot be contended that such passages as these do not find fulfilment and explanation in the career of Jesus as nowhere else in the history. Nevertheless, the connection is far deeper than mere foresight of an isolated event and its occurrence. We may well say that, in a sense, the event is foreseen because it is already a fact. The allegory of the Smitten Shepherd is, as has well been said, "a summary of the history of Israel." But it is more than that. The relationship of God with Israel, which involved a dealing of Divine grace with men, their rejection of it and the consequent vicarious immolation of the Divine Friend and Shepherd, which came to its climax in the tragedy of the cross, was established in all essential factors in the early days. Therefore, Christ can say, as the outcome of the profoundest insight into the meaning of history, "That which concerneth me hath fulfilment" (cf Lk 24 44). He was more deeply concerned in the doings of an earlier time than being there foreseen. In a real sense, "the Lamb" was "slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev 13 8). In this allegory of the rejected Shepherd and in the successive delineations of the Servant passages, we have the portrait of the Christ as He was—not merely as He was to be. In these quotations deep answers to deep. The only satisfactory interpretation of the tragedy of the cross is that in accordance with principles long operative in human history, "it must needs be." The only satisfactory interpretation of the passages cited is that they disclose the actual operation of the forces which in their culmination issued in the tragedy of the cross. This brings the passages in the original and in quotation into the framework of the same course of events. Peter in his sermon in Solomon's porch thus sums up the whole process: "But the things which God foreshowed by the mouth of all the prophets, that his Christ should suffer, he thus fulfilled" (Acts 3 18).

The argumentative use of the OT involves exactly the same principles which have been dealt with in the foregoing discussion. These principles coalesce in the conception of the OT as authoritative.

4. Argumentative Quotations (1) Throughout the NT, in the teaching of Our Lord Himself and in the apostolic writings, a clear-cut distinction is drawn between the temporary and permanent offices of the OT. It is recognized that in essential principles the OT is for all time, while in its outward form and in its actualization of underlying and essential truths it is preliminary and preparatory. There are different dispensations, but one economy. Whenever Our Lord uses the OT for purposes of argument (see Mt 4 4,7; 12 17 ff; 19 18 f; Mk 10 19; Lk 19 46) it is on the basis of essential truth which is permanent and unchanging (Mt 5 17-19). On the other hand, He never hesitates to annul that which had a merely temporary or preliminary value (Mt 5 21,33,38; cf by way of contrast ver 27). He came not to destroy, but to fulfil, but fulfilment implies a new era—a new and higher stage in the delivery of truth.

(2) In like manner Paul and the other NT writers argue on the basis of an identity of principle which binds the two eras together. Paul contends for three great principles, the Messiahship of Jesus, justification by faith, the inclusion of the Gentiles in the plan of salvation (the doctrine of election is a detail of this last argument; see Rom 9 7,9,12,13,15,17). We shall consider typical examples of Paul's use of the OT in argumentation. Choice has been made of those which have provoked adverse criticism. Among these is the use of Gen 13 15; 17 8 in Gal 3 16. This is a leading example of Paul's alleged "rabbinical" method: "He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." The Heb word "seed" as applied to offspring (זֶרַע, zera') is singular. This, of course, means that a man's descendants are looked upon as organically one, inasmuch as they continue his life. The word would apply to any one of the family, but only by virtue of his belonging to the family. Etymologically Paul's argument would apply to Isaac as well as to Jesus—provided only the promise is looked upon as being fulfilled in him. But the promise which was fulfilled in Isaac, was fulfilled in a larger way in Israel as a whole, and was fulfilled in the largest way of all in Christ. The use of the sing. word indicates that Abraham's children were looked upon as one in him—they are also one in Christ. The true children of Abraham are such in Christ. Historically the argument is fully justified. "The personality of Christ is in some sense coextensive with the fulfilment of the promise to Abraham" (Beet). "Christ is the organ of fulfilment" (Meyer).

The classical passage in the discussion of justification based upon an OT quotation is Rom 1 17, quoting Hab 2 4. The quoted passage seems to fail the argument because the literal tr would appear to be that "the righteous shall live by their faithfulness." A deeper view, however, amply justifies the quotation; first, because the steadfastness demanded by the prophet is a persistent trust in God in view of the delay of the promised vision; second, the deepest principle common to the OT and NT is that stability of character has its root in trust in Jeh (Isa 28 16; cf 26 1-3). Nothing could be more foreign to the thought of the OT than that a man could be righteous without trust in God.

One further quotation argumentatively used by Paul may fitly close this section of our discussion. In Rom 11 26,27 he quotes Isa 59 20,21 as indicating the Divine purpose to include the Gentiles within the scope of salvation. This passage is doubly significant because it is attacked by Kuenen (Prophets and Prophecy in Israel) on the ground that it is uncritically taken from the LXX version which in this instance does not correctly represent the Heb text. It may be remarked that a large percentage of the NT quotations are taken from the LXX. (For estimates of the number see Johnson, Quotations of the NT, ch 1.) This prevalent habit is amply justifiable by, and in large consideration of, the fact that the NT was written for the purpose of being read and understood by those to whom the LXX was often the only version available, and the familiarity of that version was ample compensation for any slight loss in verbal accuracy. The only reasonable qualification of this general statement is that we should call in question any deviation which is depended upon for a point in argument. Kuenen, the severest critic of the NT writers in this particular, alleges very few instances, and Professor Johnson has satisfactorily dealt with these in detail (as above). In the case immediately before us the deviations in the version used by Paul do not in the least modify, in the way of strengthening, the reference to the Gentiles (beginning in ver 19 and continuing throughout) which is the point upon which Paul is laying stress. It is not too much to say that Paul's argument would be unimpaired had he used the Heb text, upon which our RV rests (cf He 2 6-8). In general, it may be premised that no stringent rule of verbal accuracy should be considered binding upon writers who address a popular audience beyond that which guards the substantial cogency of their argument. From the fair application of this reasonable rule the NT writers have nothing to fear.

For the most part the NT writers confine their quotations to the OT. In a single instance an extracanonical saying of Jesus (Acts 20 35), and, in at least two instances (Jude vs 9,14, non-canonical books are referred to. In addition to this Paul uses in the letter to Titus (1 12) and in his sermon at Athens (Acts 17 28) lines from native poets to illustrate and enforce his discussion (see POETRY, NEW TESTAMENT). In these latter instances the difference in usage from his ordinary habit of quoting authoritative Scripture is sufficiently obvious. In the case of the saying attributed to Christ, it is enough to say that it is so obviously Christlike that we need not hesitate to accept it as genuine, while in the case of Jude nothing is made to depend upon the quotations except certain accepted Christian truths (see Plummer, Expositor's Bible, "James and Jude," 434 f.).

RAAMA, rā'a-ma (רַאמָא, ra'mā): Thus spelled only in 1 Ch 1 9; elsewhere "Raamah" (רַעְמָה, ra'māh). A son of Cush and father of Sheba and Dedan (Gen 10 7=1 Ch 1 9). In Ezekiel's lament over Tyre (Ezk 27 22) the tribe of Raamah is mentioned along with Sheba as a mercantile people who provided the inhabitants of Tyre with spices, precious stones and gold. It has generally been identified with Regma, mentioned by Ptolemy and Steph. Byzant. as a city in Southeastern Arabia on the shores of the Pers Gulf. The LXX (Ρεγά, Rhégā) itself supposes this site. But the Arab. name of the city here indicated is spelled with a g and so gives rise to a phonological difficulty. A more probable identification has been found in the Sabaean ra'māh in Southwestern Arabia near Me'in in the north of Marib. Me'in was the capital of the old Minaean kingdom. A. S. FULTON RAAMIAH, rā-a-mī'a (רַעְמִיָּה, ra'amyāh; Β. Νααμιά, Naamiá, A. Ρεελμά, Rheelmá): One of the leading men who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Neh 7 7). In the corresponding passage in Ezr 2 2, where the same list is named, a slight variation in form is given. "Reelaiah" is the name found in this passage. One is doubtless a corruption of the other. Both have the same root meaning.

RAAMESSES, rā-am'sēz (Ex 1 11), RAMESES, ram'ē-sēz (Gen 47 11; Ex 12 37; Nu 33 3.5)

(רַעַמְסֵס, ra'm'sēs, רַעַמְסֵס, ra'am'sēs;

1. Meaning Ραμεσση, Rhamessē; Egypt Ra-mes- of "Store-city," "Ra created him" [or "it"]: One of the two "settlements" (misk'nōth) built, or "built up," by the Hebrews for the Pharaoh, the other being Pithom, to which the LXX adds a third, namely, "On which is Heliopolis," a town near Cairo (Ex 1 11). The Heb term misk'nōth comes from a root meaning "to settle down" (Arab. sakan, "settlement," Assy sakanu or shakanu, "to set"), but it is rendered "strong cities" in LXX, "treasure cities" in AV, and (incorrectly) "store-cities" in RV. The "land of Rameses," where Jacob and his sons settled, was apparently the "field of Zoan" (see ZOAN), thus lying in the Delta E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile.

It is often assumed that no city called Rameses would have existed before the time of Rameses II, or the 14th cent. BC, though even

2. Meaning before Rameses I the name occurs as of Name that of a brother of Horemhib under the XVIIIth Dynasty. The usual tr "Child of Ra" is grammatically incorrect in Egypt, and as Ra was an ancient name for the "sun"

it seems possible that a town may have borne the title "Ra created it" very early. The mention of Rameses in Gen (47 11) is often regarded as an anachronism, since no scholar has supposed that Jacob lived as late as the time of Rameses II. This would equally apply to the other notices, and at most would serve to mark the age of the passages in the Pent where Rameses is mentioned, but even this cannot be thought to be proved (see EXODUS). According to De Rougé (see Fierret, Vocab. Hiéroglyph., 1875, 143) there were at least three towns in Lower Egypt that bore the name Pa Rames-ses ("city of Rameses"); but Brugsch supposes that the place mentioned in the OT was Zoan, to which Rameses II gave this name when making it his capital in the Delta. Dr. Budge takes the same view, while Dr. Naville and others suppose that the site of Raameses has still to be found.

There appears to have been no certain tradition preserving the site, for though St. Silvia (about 385 AD) was told that it lay 4 miles

3. Situation from the town of Arabia (see GOSHEN), she found no traces of such a place. Brugsch ("A New City of Rameses, 1876," Aegyptische Zeitschrift, 69) places one such city in the southern part of Memphis itself. Goodwin (Rec. of Past, Old Series, VI, 11) gives an Egypt letter describing the "city of Rameses-Miamun," which appears to be Zoan, since it was on the seacoast. It was a very prosperous city when this letter was written, and a pa-khennu or "palace city." It had canals full of fish, lakes swarming with birds, fields of lentils, melons, wheat, onions and sesame, gardens of vines, almonds and figs. Ships entered its harbor; the lotus and papyrus grew in its waters. The inhabitants greeted Rameses II with garlands of flowers. Besides wine and mead, of the "conqueror's city," beer was brought to the harbor from the Kati (in Cilicia), and oil from the "Lake Sagabi." There is no reason to suppose that Zoan was less prosperous in the early Hyksos age, when the Hebrews dwelt in its plain, whatever be the conclusion as to the date when the city Rameses received that name. The description above given agrees with the OT account of the possession given by Joseph to his family "in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses" (Gen 47 11).

RABBAH, rab'a:

(1) (רַבָּה, rabbāh; Παββά, Rhabbá, Παββάθ, Rhabbāth, Παββάν, Rhabbán). The full name is רַבְתִּי בְנֵי רַבָּה, rabbath b'nē ammōn; ἡ ἀκρα τῶν υἱῶν Ἀμμών, hē ákra tōn huiōn Ammōn, Παββάθ υἱῶν Ἀμμών, Rhabbāth huiōn Ammōn, "Rabbah of the children of Ammon": This alone of the cities of the Ammonites is mentioned in Scripture, so we may take it as the most important. It is first named in connection with the "bed" or sarcophagus of Og, king of Bashan, which was said to be found here (Dt 3 11). It lay E. of the territory assigned to Gad (Josh 13 25). Whatever may have been its history in the interval, it does not appear again in Scripture till the time of David. This monarch sent an embassy of sympathy to King Hanun when his father Nahash died. The kindness was met by wanton insult, which led to the outbreak of war. The Ammonites, strengthened by Aramaean allies, were defeated by the Israelites under Joab, and took refuge in Rabbah. After David's defeat of the Aramaeans at Helam a year later, the Ammonites were exposed alone to the full force of Israel, the ark of the covenant being carried with the troops. The country was ravaged and siege was laid to Peraea. In the 4th cent. AD, it ranked with Bostra and Gerasa as one of the great fortified cities of Coele-Syria (Ritter, Bruckunde, XV, ii, 1154 f). It became the seat of a bishop. Abulfeda (1321 AD) says that Rabbah was in ruins at the time of the Moslem conquest.

Rabbah is represented by the modern 'Ammān, a ruined site with extensive remains, chiefly from Rom times, some 14 miles N.E. of Heshbon, and about 22 miles E. of the Jordan. It lies on the northern bank of Wādy 'Ammān, a tributary of the upper Jabbok, in a well-watered and fruitful valley. Possibly the stream which rises here may be "the waters" referred to in 2 S 12 27. Ancient Rabbah may have stood on the hill now occupied by the citadel, a position easy of defence because of its precipitous sides. The outer walls of RUINS AT 'Ammān—FACADE OF THEATER.

Rabbah. It was during this siege that Uriah the Hittite by David's orders was exposed "in the forefront of the hottest battle" (2 S 11 15), where, treacherously deserted by his comrades, he was slain. How long the siege lasted we do not know; probably some years; but the end was in sight when Joab captured "the city of waters" (2 S 12 27). This may mean that he had secured control of the water supply. In the preceding verse he calls it the "royal city." By the chivalry of his general, David was enabled in person to enjoy the honor of taking the city. Among the booty secured was the crown of Melcom, the god of the Ammonites. Such of the inhabitants as survived he treated with great severity (2 S 12 26-31; 1 Ch 20 1 ff).

In the utterances of the prophets against Ammon, Rabbah stands for the people, as their most important, or perhaps their only important, city (Jer 49 2, 3; Ezk 21 20; 25 5; Am 1 14). Jer 49 4 speaks of the "flowing valley"—a reference perhaps to the abundance of water and fruitfulness—and the treasures in which she gloried. Ezk 21 21 represents the king of Babylon at "the head of the two ways" deciding by means of the divining arrows whether he should march against Jerus or against Rabbah. Amos seems to have been impressed with the palaces of Rabbah.

The city retained its importance in later times. It was captured by Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 BC), who called it Philadelphia. It was a member of the league of ten cities. Antiochus the Great captured it by means of treachery (Polyb. v.71). Jos (BJ, III, iii, 3) names it as lying E. of the citadel appear to be very old; but it is quite impossible to say that anything Ammonite is now above ground. The citadel is connected by means of an underground passage with a large cistern or tank to the N., whence probably it drew its water-supply. This may be the passage mentioned in the account of the capture of the city by Antiochus.

Colonnade at 'Ammān.

"It is," says Conder (Heth and Moab, 158), "one of the finest Rom towns in Syria, with baths, a theater, and an odeum, as well as several large private masonry tombs built in the valley probably in the 2d cent. The fortress on the hill, now surrounding a considerable temple, is also probably of this same date. The church with two chapels farther N., and perhaps some of the tombs, must belong to a later age, perhaps the 4th cent. The fine mosque and the fine Moslem building on the citadel hill cannot be earlier than the 7th, and are perhaps as late as the 11th cent.; and we have thus relics of every building epoch except the Crusading, of which there appears to be no indication."

The place is now occupied by Arabs and Circassians who profit by the riches of the soil. It is brought into contact with the outside world by means of the Damascus-Hejaz Railway, which has a station here.

(2) רַבְרָבָה, hā-rabbāh; B, Σωθηβᾶ, Sōthēbā, A, Ἀρεββά, Arēbbā: An unidentified city of Judah named along with Kiriath-jearim (Josh 15 60).

W. EWING

RABBI, rab'ī, rab'ī (רַבִּי, rabbī; רַבִּי, rabbī, or רַבִּי, rabbēi): A term used by the Jews of their religious teachers as a title of respect, from רַב, rabbh, "great," so "my great one" (cf Lat magister), once of masters of slaves, but later of teachers (Mt 23 7); therefore tr^d by διδάσκαλος, didaskalos, "teacher" (Mt 23 8; Jn 1 38; cf ver 49). In AV frequently rendered "Master" (Mt 26 25.49; Mk 9 5; 11 21; 14 45; Jn 4 31; 9 2; 11 8). John the Baptist (Jn 3 26), as well as Christ, is addressed with the title (Jn 1 49; 6 25), both by disciples and others. Jesus forbade its use among His followers (Mt 23 8). Later (Galilean) form of same, RABBONI (q.v.). For Rabbinical literature see TALMUD. EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

RABBITH, rab'ith (רַבִּית, hā-rabbīth; B, Δαβεϊρών, Dabeirōn, A, Παββῶθ, Rhabbōth): A town in the territory of Issachar (Josh 19 20) which is probably represented today by Rāba, a village in the southern part of the Gilboa range and N. of Ibzāk. The hā is, of course, the def. art.

RABBLE, rab'ī: This word is not found in AV. RV has it once as the tr of ἀγοραῖος, agoraios (lit. "lounger in the market place"), in Acts 17 5, where it replaces "baser sort" of AV. It has the common meaning of an unruly, lawless set who are ready to join a mob.

RABBONI, rab-ō'nī, rab-ō'ni (רַבִּוֹנִי, rhabbonī, "my great master" [Mk 10 51]; רַבִּוֹנִי [WH -ve], rhabboni [-neī] [Jn 20 16]). See RABBI.

RAB-MAG, rab'mag (רַב־מַגִּי, rabb-māgh; LXX as proper noun, Παβμαθ, Rhabamāth): The name of one of the Bab princes who were present at the destruction of Jerus by Nebuchadnezzar, during the reign of Zedekiah, king of Judah (Jer 39 3.13). The word is a compound, the two parts seemingly being in apposition and signifying tautologically the same thing. The last syllable or section of the word, māgh, was the designation among the Medes, Persians and Babylonians for priests and wise men. Its original significance was "great" or "powerful"; Gr μέγας, mégas, Lat magis, magnus. The first syllable, rabbh, expresses practically the same idea, that of greatness, or abundance in size, quantity, or power. Thus it might be interpreted the "all-wise" or "all-powerful" prince, the chief magician or physician. It is, therefore, a title and not a name, and is accordingly put in appositive relations to the proper name just preceding, as "Nergal-sharezer, the Rab-mag," tr^d fully, "Nergal-sharezer the chief prince or magician." See NERGAL-SHAREZER.

In harmony with the commonly accepted view, the proper rendering of the text should be, "All the princes of the king of Babylon came in, and sat in the middle gate, to wit, Nergal-sharezer, Samgar-nebo, Sarsechim, [the] Rab-saris, Nergal-sharezer, [the] Rab-mag" (Jer 39 3); and "so Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard sent, and Nebushazban, [the] Rab-saris, and Nergal-sharezer, [the] Rab-mag, and all the chief officers of the king of Babylon" (39 13). WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

RAB-SARIS, rab'sa-ris (רַב־סָרִיס, rabb-sāris): As with Rab-mag, which is not regarded as a descriptive title for the person whose name precedes it (see RAB-MAG). The first part, rabbh, signifies "great" or "chief," the second, sāris, is the title for eunuch or chamberlain. The tr then would be chief eunuch or the chief of the eunuchs (or chamberlains).

The oriental custom was for the king to surround himself with a number of eunuchs, who performed varied kinds of services, both menial and dignified. They usually had charge of his harem; sometimes they occupied court positions. Frequently they superintended the education of the youth. The term itself was sometimes used to designate persons in places of trust who were not emasculated. The above title describes the highest or chief in rank of these eunuchs. See EUNUCH.

The full title is used 3 t, once in connection with the titles of other important officers who were sent by the king of Assyria with a large army to demand the surrender of Jerus. The passage would be tr^d properly, 'And the king of Assyria sent the Tartan and the Rab-saris (the chief eunuch) and the Rab-shakeh from Lachish to king Hezekiah' (2 K 18 17). Again, it refers to a Babylonian whose real name was Sarsechim, who with the other Bab princes sat in the middle gate during the capture of Jerus. This event is described as having occurred in the 11th year of Zedekiah, king of Judah (Jer 39 3). The third use is in connection with the name Nebushazban, who, with the other chief officers of the king of Babylon, sent and took Jeremiah out of the court of the guard and committed him to Gedaliah, who was to take him home to dwell with his own people (Jer 39 13).

Thus it is seen that based upon this accepted theory the three titles would be in their connections as follows: (1) simply "the chief eunuch," (2) Sarsechim, the Rab-saris (or chief eunuch), and (3) Nebushazban, the Rab-saris (or chief eunuch). See also ASSYRIA, X. WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

RABSHAKEH, rab'sha-ke, rab-shā'ke (רַב־שָׂקֵה, rabbshākēh): A compound word, the first part, rabbh, indicating "head" or "chief" (see RAB-MAG; RAB-SARIS). The second part, which in the Aram., probably meant "cupbearer," had in this connection and elsewhere, according to later discoveries, an extended significance, and meant chief officer, i.e. chief of the heads or captains.

R. was one of the officers sent by Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, with the Tartan and the Rab-saris to demand the surrender of Jerus, which was under siege by the Assy army (2 K 18 17.19.26.27.28.37; 19 4.8; Isa 36 2.4.11.12.13.22; 37 4.8). The three officers named went from Lachish to Jerus and appeared by the conduit of the upper pool. Having called upon King Hezekiah, his representatives Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, Sheb-nah, the scribe, and Joah, the recorder, appeared. R. sent through them a message to the king in which he represented himself as the spokesman for the king of Assyria. He derided King Hezekiah in an insolent fashion in representing his trust in Egypt as a bruised reed which would pierce the hand. Likewise his confidence in Jeh was vain, for He also would be unable to deliver them. Then the officers of the king replied, requesting him to speak in the Syrian language which they understood, and not in the Jews' language which the people on the wall understood. This he refused to do, speaking still more loudly in order that they might hear and be persuaded. By bribery and appeal, by promise and by deception he exhorted them to turn traitor to Hezekiah and surrender to him. The people, however, true to the command of Hezekiah (2 K 18 36), "held their peace, and answered him not a word." Afterward R. returned and "found the king of Assyria warring against Libnah" (2 K 19 8). From this description it is inferred that R. was a man of considerable literary attainment, being able, in all probability, to speak in three languages. He had, in addition to his official power, dauntless courage, an insolent spirit and a characteristic oriental disregard for veracity.

WALTER G. CLIPPINGER.

RACA, rā'ka, rā-kā' (ῥακά, rhaká, WH with codd. N^o B E, etc; ῥακά, rhachá, Tisch. with N* D; Aram. ܠܩܩܐ, rekā, from ܠܩܩܐ, rek, "empty"): Vain or worthless fellow; a term of contempt used by the Jews in the time of Christ. In the Bible, it occurs in Mt 5 22 only, but John Lightfoot gives a number of instances of the use of the word by Jewish writers (Hor. Heb., ed by Gandell, Oxford, 1859, II, 108). Chrysostom (who was acquainted with Syr as spoken in the neighborhood of Antioch) says it was equivalent to the Gr σὺ, sú, "thou," used contemptuously instead of a man's name. Jerome rendered it inanis aut vacuus absque cerebro. It is generally explained as expressing contempt for a man's intellectual capacity (= "you simpleton!"), while μωπέ, mōré (tr^d "thou fool"), in the same verse is taken to refer to a man's moral and religious character (= "you rascal!" "you impious fellow!"). Thus we have three stages of anger, with three corresponding grades of punishment: (1) the inner feeling of anger (ὀργιζόμενος, orgizómenos), to be punished by the local or provincial court (τῆ κρίσει, tē krisei, "the judgment"); (2) anger breaking forth into an expression of scorn (Raca), to be punished by the Sanhedrin (τῷ συνέδριῳ, tō sunedriō, "the council"); (3) anger culminating in abusive and defamatory language (Mōre), to be punished by the fire of Gehenna. This view, of a double climax, which has been held by foremost Eng. and Ger. commentators, seems to give the passage symmetry and gradation. But it is rejected among others by T. K. Cheyne, who, following J. P. Peters, rearranges the text by transferring the clause "and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council" to the end of the preceding verse (EB, IV, cols. 4001 f). There certainly does not seem to be trustworthy external evidence to prove that the terms "the judgment," "the council," "the Gehenna of fire" stand to each other in a relation of gradation, as lower and higher legal courts, or would be so understood by Christ's hearers. What is beyond dispute is that Christ condemns the use of disparaging and insulting epithets as a supreme offence against the law of humanity, which belongs to the same category as murder itself. It should be added, however, that it is the underlying feeling and not the verbal expression as such that constitutes the sin. Hence Our Lord can, without any real inconsistency, address two of His followers as "foolish men" (Lk 24 25, ἀνόητοι, anóētoi, practically equivalent to Raca, as is also James's expression, "O vain man," Jas 2 20).

RACAL, rā'kal (ῥακάλ, rākhāl, "trader"): A place in Judah, enumerated among "the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt," to the elders of which he sent a share of his spoils (1 S 30 29). The LXX reading "Carmel" has been adopted, by many, because of the similarity of the words in Heb (כרמל and כרמל) and because there was a Carmel in the neighborhood of Hebron (Josh 15 55; 1 S 15 12), which figures in the story of David's adventures when pursued by Saul (1 S 25) in a manner that makes it improbable that he would overlook the place in his good fortune (AV "Rachal"). NATHAN ISAACS

RACE, rās (ῥαῖος, mērōs; ἄγών, agōn, δρόμος, drómos). See GAMES, I, 2; II, 3.

RACES, rās'iz. See TABLE OF NATIONS.

RACHAB, rā'kab (Ῥαχάβ, Rhacháb): AV; Gr form of "Rahab" (thus Mt 1 5 RV).

RACHEL, rā'chel (ῤαῖλ, rāhēl, "ewe"; Ῥαχάηλ, Rhachēl [Gen 29 6; Jer 31 15, AV "Rachel"]): An ancestress of Israel, wife of Jacob, mother of Joseph and Benjamin. Rachel was the younger daughter of Laban, the Aramaean, the brother of Jacob's mother; so Rachel and Jacob were cousins. They met for the first time upon the arrival of Jacob at Haran, when attracted by her beauty he immediately fell in love with her, winning her love by his chivalrous act related in Gen 29 10 ff. According to the custom of the times Jacob contracted with Laban for her possession, agreeing to serve him 7 years as the stipulated price (29 17-20). But when the time had passed, Laban deceived Jacob by giving him Leah instead of Rachel. When Jacob protested, Laban gave him Rachel also, on condition that Jacob serve 7 years more (29 21-29). To her great dismay "Rachel was barren" (Gen 29 30-31), while Leah had children. Rachel, envious of her sister, complained to Jacob, who reminded her that children are the gift of God. Then Rachel resorted to the expedient once employed by Sarah under similar circumstances (16 2 ff); she bade Jacob take her handmaid Bilhah, as a concubine, to "obtain children by her" (30 3). Dan and Naphtali were the offspring of this union. The evil of polygamy is apparent from the dismal rivalry arising between the two sisters, each seeking by means of children to win the heart of Jacob. In her eagerness to become a mother of children, Rachel bargained with Leah for the mandrakes, or love-apples of her son Reuben, but all to no avail (30 14). Finally God heard her prayer and granted her her heart's desire, and she gave birth to her firstborn, whom she named Joseph (30 22-24).

Some years after this, when Jacob fled from Laban with his wives, the episode of the theft of the teraphim of Laban by Rachel, related in 31 19. 34-35, occurred. She hoped by securing the household gods of her father to bring prosperity to her own new household. Though she succeeded by her cunning in concealing them from Laban, Jacob later, upon discovering them, had them put away (35 2-4). In spite of all, she continued to be the favorite of Jacob, as is clearly evidenced by 33 2, where we are told that he assigned to her the place of greatest safety, and by his preference for Joseph, her son. After the arrival in Canaan, while they were on the way from Beth-el to Ephrath, i.e. Bethlehem, Rachel gave birth to her second son, Benjamin, and died (35 16 ff).

In a marked manner Rachel's character shows the traits of her family, cunning and covetousness, so evident in Laban, Rebekah and Jacob.

2. Character—Though a believer in the true God (30 6, 8, 22), she was yet given to the superstitions of her country, the worshipping of the teraphim, etc (31 19). The futility of her efforts in resorting to self-help and superstitious expedients, the love and stronger faith of her husband (35 2-4), were the providential means of purifying her character. Her memory lived on in Israel long after she died. In Ruth 4 11, the names of Rachel and Leah occur in the nuptial benediction as the foundresses of the house of Israel.

Rachel's Tomb (מִצְבֵּאת קַרְיָה רַחֵל, maṣṣebheth k'bhurath rāhēl): In Gen 35 20 we read: "Jacob set up a pillar upon her grave: the same is the Rachel's Tomb.

Pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day," i.e. the time of the writer. Though the pillar, i.e. sepulchral monument, has long disappeared, the spot is marked until this day, and Christians, Jews and Mohammedans unite in honoring it. The present tomb, which, apparently, is not older than the 15th cent., is built in the style of the small-domed buildings raised by Moslems in honor of their saints. It is a rough structure of four square walls, each about 23 ft. long and 20 ft. high; the dome rising 10 ft. higher is used by Mohammedans for prayer, while on Fridays the Jews make supplication before the empty tomb within. It is doubtful, but probable, that it marks the exact spot where Rachel was buried. There are, apparently, two traditions as to the location of the place. The oldest tradition, based upon Gen 35 16-20; 48 7, points to a place one mile N. of Bethlehem and 4 miles from Jerus. Mt 2 18 speaks for this place, since the evangelist, reporting the slaughter of the innocents of Bethlehem, represents Rachel as weeping for her children from her neighboring grave. But according to 1 S 10 2 ff, which apparently represents another tradition, the place of Rachel's grave was on the "border of Benjamin," near Beth-el, about 10 miles N. of Jerus, at another unknown Ephrath. This location, some believe, is corroborated by Jer 31 15, where the prophet, in relating the leading away of the people of Ramah, which was in Benjamin, into captivity, introduces Rachel the mother of that tribe as bewailing the fate of her descendants. Those that believe this northern location to be the place of Rachel's grave take the words, "the same is Beth-lehem," in Gen 35 19; 48 7, to be an incorrect gloss; but that is a mere assumption lacking sufficient proof.

Mr. Nathan Strauss, of New York City, has purchased the land surrounding Rachel's grave for the purpose of erecting a Jewish university in the Holy Land.

RADDAI, rad'ā-i, ra-dā'i (רַדַּי, radday, "beating down" [?]): The 5th of the 7 sons of Jesse, father of David, according to 1 Ch 2 14 (LXX Alex, "Rhad-dai"; Luc., "Rhedai"; others, "Zaddai").

RADIANT, rā'di-ant (רַדִּיָּה, nāhar, "to sparkle," i.e. [fig.] be cheerful; hence [from the sheen of a running stream], to flow, i.e. [fig.] assemble; flow [together], be lightened): ARV substitutes the active "radiant" for the passive "were lightened" in Ps 34 5; Isa 60 5 (ERV, AV "flow together"). As the earth and moon, both being dark, face a common sun and lighten each other, they are not only lightened, but radiant. So with the believers, "They looked unto him [Jeh], and were radiant." Thus nāhar combines the two ideas of being lightened and flowing together. This appears, also, in a different connection, in Isa 60 5, "Then thou shalt see and be radiant." "It is liquid light—light that ripples and sparkles and runs across the face; . . . the light which a face catches from sparkling water" (G. A. Smith, Isaiah, II, 430). M. O. EVANS

RAG: Pl. in Prov 23 21, "Drowsiness will clothe a man with rags" (רֵעָרְעָם, k'rā'im, "torn garment"; cf 1 K 11 30), and figuratively in Isa 64 6 AV, "All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags," in the sense of "tattered clothing" (רֵעָרְעָם, beghedh, RV "garment"). In Jer 38 11.12 ARV translates רֵעָרְעָם, ṣ'ḥābhāh, as "rag" (AV, ERV "old cast clout"), while AV, ERV use "rotten rag" for מְלַח, melaḥ (ARV "worn-out garment"). Both ṣ'ḥābhāh and melaḥ mean "worn out."

RAGAU, rā'gō ('Ραγαῦ [WH], 'Ραγαύ, Rhagaú): AV; Gr form of "Reu" (thus RV) (Lk 3 35).

RAGES, rā'jēz, RAGAU, rā'gō ("Rages," Tob 1 14; 4 1.20; 5 5; 6 9.12; 9 2; "Ragau," Jth 1 5.15; 'Ραγαῦ, Rhagaú, 'Ραγα, Rhāga, 1. (1) Ancient.—A very ancient city, the traditional birthplace of Zoroaster (Zarathuštra; Pahlavi Vendidād, Zād sparad XVI, 12, and 2. History Dabistān i Mazāhib). In Yasna XIX, 18, of the Avesta, it is thus mentioned: "The Zoroastrian, four-chief-possessing Rāgha, hers are the royal chiefs, both the house-chief, the village-chief, and the town-chief: Zoroaster is the fourth." In Vend. I, 15: "As the tenth, the best of both districts and cities, I, who am Ahura Mazda, did create Rāgha, which possesses the three classes," i.e. fire-priests, charioteers, husbandmen. Later it was the religious center of magism. A large colony of captive Israelites settled there. Destroyed in Alexander's time, it was rebuilt by Seleucus Nicator (c 300 BC), who named it Europos. Later, Arsaces restored it and named it Arsacia.

(2) Mediaeval.—In the early Middle Ages Rāgha, then called Rai, was a great literary and often political center with a large population. It was the birthplace of Harūn al Rashid (763 AD). It was seized and plundered (1029 AD) by Sultān Mahmūd, but became Tughril's capital. In the Vis o Rāmin (c 1048 AD) it is an important place, 10 days' journey across the Kavir desert from Merv. It was a small provincial town in about 1200 AD. It was sacked by Mongols in 1220 AD and entirely destroyed under Ghāzān Khān c 1295. A Zoroastrian community lived there in 1278 AD, one of whom composed the Zarātūst-Nāmāh.

RAGUEL, ra-gū'el (Ραγουήλ, Rhagouēl): "The friend of God," of Ecbatana, the husband of Edna, father of Sarah, and father-in-law of Tobias (Tob 3 7.17; 6 10; 7 2 f; 14 12). In 7 2 he is called cousin of Tobit, and in Tob 6 10 AV he is erroneously represented as "cousin" of Tobias="kinsman" in RV. In En 20 4 Raguel appears as one of the archangels, perhaps by confusion for Raphael (Tob 3 17). Another form of the name is REUEL (q.v.).

RAGUEL, ra-gū'el, rag'ū-el (רַעוּאֵל, rē'ā'ēl; LXX Rhagouēl): The Midianite hōthēn, i.e. either father-in-law or brother-in-law of Moses (Nu 10 29 AV, RV "Reuel"), the father of Hobab, called a Kenite, who is likewise described as a hōthēn of Moses (Jgs 4 11). See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY. Moses' wife's father is called rē'ā'ēl in Ex 2 18 where Lucian reads "Iothor" and EV "Reuel" which transliteration is adopted in RV in Nu 10 29 also. In other passages the hōthēn of Moses is called "Jethro" or "Jethro." Among the harmonizations suggested the following are worthy of consideration: (a) that all are names or perhaps titles of one man (Rashi); (b) that Reuel was the father of Hobab and Jethro, that Jethro was the father-in-law of Moses, and that the word "father" is used for grandfather in Ex 2 18; (c) that Reuel was the father-in-law and Jethro and Hobab brothers-in-law; (d) that either Reuel or Hobab is to be identified with Jethro. None of these views is free from difficulty, nor is the view of those who would give Jethro as the name in E and Reuel as that in J and JE. See also REUEL. NATHAN ISAACS

RAHAB, rā'hab:

(1) (רַחַב, rāhābh, "broad"; in Jos, Ant, V, i, 2, 7, Ῥάχαβ, Rháchab; He 11 31 and Jas 2 25, Ῥάαβ, Rháab): A zōnāh, that is either a "harlot," or, according to some, an "innkeeper" in Jericho (LXX πόρνη, pōrnē, "harlot"). The two spies sent by Joshua from Shittim came into her house and lodged there (Josh 2 1). She refused to betray them to the king of Jericho, and when he demanded them, she hid them on the roof of her house with stalks of flax that she had laid in order to dry. She pretended that they had escaped before the shutting of the gate, and threw their pursuers off their track. She then told the spies of the fear that the coming of the Israelites had caused in the minds of the Canaanites—"Our hearts did melt . . . for Jeh your God, he is God in heaven above, and on earth beneath"—and asked that the men promise to spare her father, mother, brothers and sisters, and all that they had. They promised her to spare them provided they would remain in her house and provided she would keep their business secret. Thereupon she let them down by a cord through the window, her house being built upon the town wall, and gave them directions to make good their escape (Josh 2 1-24). True to their promise, the Israelites under Joshua spared Rahab and her family (Josh 6 16 ff AV); "And," says the author of Josh, "she dwelleth in Israel even unto this day." Her story appealed strongly to the imagination of the people of later times. He 11 31 speaks of her as having been saved by faith; James, on the other hand, in demonstrating that a man is justified by works and not by faith only, curiously chooses the same example (Jas 2 25). Jewish tradition has been kindly disposed toward Rahab; one hypothesis goes so far as to make her the wife of Joshua himself (Jew Enc, s.v.). Naturally then the other tr of zōnāh, deriving it from zūn, "to feed," instead of zōnāh, "to be a harlot," has been preferred by some of the commentators.

(2) (Ῥάχαβ, Rháchab): Jos, Ant, V, 1, 2, 7, so spells the name of (1) (LXX and NT contra). The wife of Salmon and mother of Booz (Boaz) according to the genealogy in Mt 1 5. Query, whether there was a tradition identifying (1) and (2); see Lightfoot, Horae Heb on Mt 1 5.

(3) (רַחַב, rahabh, lit. "storm," "arrogance"): A mythical sea-monster, probably referred to in several passages where the word is tr'd as a common noun "pride" (Job 9 13), "the proud" (Job 26 12; cf Ps 89 10). It is used in parallelism with tannīn, "the dragon" (Isa 51 9). It is most familiar as an emblem of Egypt, "the boaster that sitteth still" (Isa 30 7; Ps 87 4; cf 89 10). The Talm in Bābhā' Bathrā' speaks of rahabh as sar ha-yām, "master of the sea." See also ASTRONOMY.

RAHAM, rā'ham (רַחַם, rahām, "pity," "love"): Son of Shema, and father of Jorkeam (1 Ch 2 44).

RAHEL, rā'hel (Jer 31 15 AV). See RACHEL.

RAID, rād (1 S 27 10). See WAR, 3.

RAIL, rāl, RAILING, rāl'ing, RAILER, rāl'er: To "rail" on (in modern usage "against") anyone is to use insolent or reproachful language toward one. It occurs in the OT as the tr of רָרַף, hārāph (2 Ch 32 17, "letters to rail on Jeh"), and of רָרַף, rā'raf (1 S 25 14, of Nabal, "he railed at them," ERV "flew upon them," m "railed on"). In the NT "to rail" is the tr of βλασφημέω, blasphēmēō (Mk 15 29; Lk 23 39; "railing," 1 Tim 6 4; 2 Pet 2 11; Jude ver 9). The word loidoria, rendered "railing" in 1 Pet 3 9 AV, is in RV "reviling," and loidoros, "railer," in 1 Cor 5 11 is in RV "reviler." See also RACA. W. L. WALKER

RAIMENT, rā'ment. See DRESS.

RAIMENT, SOFT (μαλακός, malakós): In Mt 11 8 EV, where Jesus, speaking of John the Baptist, asks "What went ye out to see? a man clothed in soft raiment?" where "raiment," though implied, is not expressed in the best text, but was probably added from Lk 7 25 ||. It is equivalent to "elegant clothing," such as courtiers wore, as shown by the words following, "Behold, they that wear soft raiment are in kings' houses." John had bravely refused to play courtier and had gone to prison for it. In the early days of Herod the Great some scribes who attached themselves to him laid aside their usual plain clothing and wore the gorgeous raiment of courtiers (Jost, in Plumptre).

RAIN, rān (מָטָר, mātār, Arab. مَطَر, maṭar, "rain," גֶּשֶׁם, geshem, "heavy rain," מֹרֶה, mōreh, "early rain," יָרֵה, yāreh, "former rain," מִלְקָשׁ, malqōsh, "latter rain"); Supply in Egypt and Palestine βρέχω, bréchō, ἕτερός, huetós): In Egypt there is little or no rainfall, the water for vegetation being supplied in great abundance by the river Nile; but in Syria and Pal there are no large rivers, and the people have to depend entirely on the fall of rain for water for themselves, their animals and their fields. The children of Israel when in Egypt were promised by Jeh a land which "drinketh water of the rain of heaven" (Dt 11 11). Springs and fountains are found in most of the valleys, but the flow of the springs depends directly on the fall of rain or snow in the mountains.

The cultivation of the land in Pal is practically dry farming in most of the districts, but even then some water is necessary, so that there may be moisture in the soil. In the summer months there is no rain, so that the rains of the spring and fall seasons are absolutely essential for starting and maturing the crops. The lack of this rain in the proper time has often been the cause of complete failure of the harvest. A small difference in the amount of these seasonal rains makes a large difference in the possibility of growing various crops without irrigation. Ellsworth Huntington has insisted on this point with great care in his very important work, Pal and Its Transformation. The promise of prosperity is given in the assurance of "rain in due season" (Lev 26 4 AV). The withholding of rain according to the prophecy of Elijah (1 K 17 1) caused the mountain streams to dry up (1 K 17 7), and certain famine ensued. A glimpse of the terrible suffering for lack of water at that time is given us. The people were uncertain of another meal (1 K 17 12), and the animals were perishing (1 K 18 5).

Pal and Syria are on the borderland between the sea and the desert, and besides are so mountainous, that they not only have a great range of rainfall in different years, but a great variation in different parts of the country.

The amount of rain on the western slopes is comparable with that in England and America, varying from 25 to 40 in. per annum, but it falls mostly in the four winter months, when the downpour is often very heavy, giving oftentimes from 12 to 16 in. in a month. On the eastern slopes it is much less, varying from 8 to 20 in. per annum. The highest amount falls in the mountains of Lebanon where it averages about 50 in. In Beirut the yearly average is 35.87 in. As we go S. from Syria, the amount decreases (Haifa 27.75, Jaffa 22.39, Gaza 17.61), while in the Sinaitic Peninsula there is little or none. Going from W. to E. the change is much more sudden, owing to the mountains which stop the clouds. In Damascus the average is less than 10 in. In Jerus the average for 50 years is 26.16 in., and the range is from 13.39 in 1870 to 41.62 in 1897. The yearly records as given by J. Glaisher and A. Datzl in PEFQ from 1861 to 1910, 50 years, are given in the accompanying table.

The amount of rainfall in ancient times was probably about the same as in present times, though it may have been distributed somewhat differently through the year, as suggested by Huntington. Conder maintains that the present amount would have been sufficient to support the ancient cities (Tent-Work in Pal). Trees are without doubt fewer now, but meteorologists agree that trees do not produce rain.

The rainfall is largely on the western slopes of the mountains facing the sea, while on the eastern slopes there is very little. The moisture-laden air comes up from the sea with the west and southwest wind. When these currents strike the hills they are thrown higher up into the cooler strata, and the moisture condenses to form clouds and rain which increases on the higher levels. Having passed the ridge of the hills, the currents descend on the other side to warmer levels, where the moisture is easily held in the form of vapor so that no rain falls and few clouds are seen, except in the cold mid-winter months.

The summer months are practically rainless, with very few clouds appearing in the sky. From May 1 to the middle of October one can be sure of no rain; "The winter is past; the rain is over" (Cant 2 11), so many sleep on the roofs of the houses or in tents of leaves and branches in the fields and vineyards throughout the summer. The continuous hot droughts make the people appreciate the springs and fountains of fresh running water and the cool shade of rock and tree.

The rainy season from October to May may be divided into three parts, the former, the winter, and the latter rains, and they are often referred to under these names in the OT.

The "former rains" are the showers of October and the first part of November. They soften the parched ground so that the winter grain may be sown before the heavy continuous rains set in. The main bulk of the rain falls in the months of December, January and February. Although in these months the rains are frequent and heavy, a dark, foggy day is seldom seen. The "latter rains" of April are the most highly appreciated, because they ripen the fruit and stay the drought of summer. They were considered a special blessing: Jeh "will come . . . as the latter rain that watereth the earth" (Hos 6 3); "They opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain" (Job 29 23); and as a reason for worshipping Jeh who sent them, "Let us now fear Jeh our God, that giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in its season" (Jer 5 24).

The rain storms always come from the sea with a west or southwest wind. The east wind is a hot wind and the "north wind driveth away rain" (Prov 25 23 AV). "Fair weather cometh out of the north" (Job 37 22 AV).

The Psalmist recognizes that the "showers that water the earth" (Ps 72 6) are among the choicest blessings from the hand of Jeh: "The

5. Biblical Uses early rain covereth it with blessings" (Ps 84 6). The severest punishment of Jeh was to withhold the rain, as in the time of Ahab and Elijah, when the usual rain did not fall for three years (1 K 17); "the anger of Jeh be kindled against you, and he shut up the heavens, so that there shall be no rain, and the land shall not yield its fruit; and ye perish quickly" (Dt 11 17). Too much rain is also a punishment, as witness the flood (Gen 7 4) and the plague of rain and hail (Ezr 10 9). Sending of rain was a reward for worship and obedience: "Jeh will open unto thee his good treasure, the heavens, to give the rain of thy land in its season, and to bless all the work of thy hand" (Dt 28 12). Jeh controls the elements and commands the rain: "He made a decree for the rain" (Job 28 26); "For he saith to the snow, Fall thou on the earth; likewise to the shower of rain" (Job 37 6).

RAINBOW, rān'bō (קֶשֶׁת, qesheth, tr^d "a bow"; ἵρις, iris, "rainbow"): As most of the rainfall in Pal is in the form of short heavy showers it is often accompanied by the rainbow. Most beautiful double bows are often seen, and occasionally the moon is bright enough to produce the bow. It is rather remarkable that there are so few references to the rainbow in the Bible. The Heb qesheth is the ordinary word for a bow, there being no special word for rainbow.

The interpretation of the significance of the bow in the sky is given at the close of the story of the flood, where it is called "the token of the covenant" of Jeh with Noah that there should be no more flood: "I do set my bow in the cloud, . . . and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh" (Gen 9 13.15). This addition to the story of the flood is not found in other mythical accounts. The foundation for the interpretation of the bow in this way seems to be that while His bow is hung in the sky God must be at peace with His people. The glory of God is likened to "the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain" (Ezk 1 28). The rainbow forms a striking part of the vision in Rev 4 3: "And there was a rainbow round about the throne." ALFRED H. JOY

RAISE, rāz: "To raise" in the OT is most frequently the tr of the Hiphil form of רָם, kām, "to cause to arise," e.g. raising up seed (Gen 38 8), a prophet (Dt 18 18), judges (Jgs 2 16.18), etc; also of עָרַר, 'ūr, "to awake," "stir up" (Ezr 1 5 AV; Isa 41 2, etc), with other words. In the NT the chief words are ἐγείρω, egeirō, "to awaken," "arouse" (Mt 3 9; Lk 1 69; 3 8, etc), frequently of raising the dead; and ἀνίστημι, anistēmi (Mt 22 24; Jn 6 39, etc; Acts 2 24 [30 AV], etc), with compounds of the former. Among the RV changes may be noted, "to stir the fire" for "from raising" (Hos 7 4); "raiseth high his gate" for "exalteth his gate" (Prov 17 19); ARV, "can it be raised from the roots thereof" for "pluck it up by the roots thereof" (Ezk 17 9 AV and ERV); "raised up" for "rise again" (Mt 20 19; cf Mt 26 32; Rom 8 34; Col 3 1). W. L. WALKER

RAISIN-CAKES, rā'z'n-kāks: RV gives this rendering for AV "foundations" in Isa 16 7 (Heb 'āshīshāh from 'āshash, "to found," "make firm," "press"). The trade in these would cease through the desolation of the vineyards. For AV "flagons of wine" in Hos 3 1, RV gives "cakes of raisins," such as were offered to the gods of the land, the givers of the grape (cf Cant 2 5). See next article.

RAISINS, rā'z'nz: (1) צִמְמֻקִים, ḥimmūqīm; σταφίδες, staphídes, tr^d "dried grapes," Nu 6 3; mentioned in all other references as a portable food for a march or journey. Abigail supplied David with "a hundred clusters of raisins," among other things, in the wilderness of Paran (1 S 25 18); David gave two clusters of raisins to a starving Egypt slave of the Amalekites at Besor (30 12); raisins formed part of the provision brought to David at Hebron for his army (1 Ch 12 40); Ziba supplied David, when flying from Absalom, with a hundred clusters of raisins (2 S 16 1). (2) אֲשִׁישָׁה, 'āshīshāh, something "pressed together," hence a "cake." In Hos 3 1, mention is made of אֲשִׁישֵׁי עֵבְרִים, 'āshīshē 'ēvābhīm (πέμματα μετὰ σταφίδος, pémματα metá staphídos), "cakes of raisins": "Jeh loveth the children of Israel, though they turn unto other gods, and love [m "or them that love"] cakes of raisins." These are supposed to have been cakes of dried, compressed grapes offered to false gods. Grätz considers that the Heb words are a corruption of 'āshērīm and ḥammānīm ("sun images"). Cf Isa 17 8; 27 9. In other passages "cakes" stands alone without "raisins," but the tr "cakes of raisins" is given in 2 S 6 19; 1 Ch 16 3; Cant 2 5 (AV "flagons"); Isa 16 7 m "foundations."

Raisins are today, as of old, prepared in considerable quantities in Pal, esp. at es-Salt, E. of the Jordan. The bunches of grapes are dipped in a strong solution of potash before being dried.

RAKEM, rā'kem (רַקֵּם, rākem, the pausal form of רַקֵּם, rekem): The eponym of a clan of Machir (1 Ch 7 16). See REKEM.

RAKKATH, rak'ath (רַקַּת, rakkāth; B, Ὠμαθαδακῆθ, Omalthadakéth, A, Ρεκαῶθ, Rhekkáth): The Gr is obviously the result of confusing the two names Rakkath and Hammath, taking r in the former for d. Rakkath was one of the fortified cities in Naphtali (Josh 19 35). It is named between Hammath and Chinnereth. Hammath is identified with the hot baths to the S. of Tiberias. There are traces of ancient fortifications here. The rabbis think that Tiberias was built on the site of Rakkath. Certain it is that Herod's town was built upon an ancient site, the graves of the old inhabitants being disturbed in digging the new foundations (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm., 208).

RAKKON, rak'on (רַקֵּוֹן, hā-rakkōn; Ἱεράκων, Hierākōn). See ME-JARKON.

RAM, ram (רָם, rām, "high," "exalted"):

(1) An ancestor of David (Ruth 4 19 [Ἀράβν, Arrān]; Mt 1 3.4 [Ἀράμ, Arām]); in 1 Ch 2 9 he is called the "brother," but in ver 25, the "son of Jerahmeel" (cf ver 27). Ram as the son of Hezron appears more likely than Ram the son of Jerahmeel, since, according to the narratives of 1 and 2 S, David cannot have been a Jerahmeelite.

(2) Name of Elihu's family (Job 32 2). It is an open question as to whether Ram should be taken as a purely fictitious name, invented by the author of the Elihu speeches, or whether it is that of some obscure Arab tribe. In Gen 22 21 Aram is a nephew of Buz (cf Elihu the Buzite), and the conjecture was at one time advanced that Ram was a contraction of Aram; but this theory is no longer held to be tenable. The suggestion that the initial a (א) has been changed by a scribal error into h (ה) is more acceptable. Rashi, the rabbinical commentator, takes the quaint position that Ram is identical with Abraham. HORACE J. WOLF

RAM, ram: (1) The ordinary word is אֵייל, 'ayil, which is remarkably near to אַיָּל, 'ayyāl, "deer" (cf Lat caper, capra, "goat," and capreolus, "wild goat" or "roe-buck"; also Gr δορκάς, dorkás, "roe-buck" or "gazelle"). (2) דָּבָר, d'bhār, lit. "male" (Ezr 6 9.17; 7 17). (3) כָּר, kar, "battering ram" (Ezk 4 2; 21 22); elsewhere "lamb" (Dt 32 14, etc). (4) עִזָּיִד, 'attūdh, properly "he-goat" ("ram," Gen 31 10.12 AV). See SHEEP.

RAM, BATTERING. See SIEGE.

RAMA, rā'ma (Ραμᾶ, Rhamá): AV; Gr form of RAMAH (q.v.) (Mt 2 18).

RAMAH, rā'ma (רַמָּה, hā-rāmāh, without the def. art. only in Neh 11 33; Jer 31 15): The name denotes height, from root רָם, rām, "to be high," and the towns to which it applied seem all to have stood on elevated sites.

(1) B, Ἀραήλ, Araēl, A, Ῥαμά, Rhamá: A fenced city in the lot assigned to Naphtali (Josh 19 36). Only in this passage is the place referred to. It is probably identical with the modern er-Rāmeḥ, a large Christian village on the highway from Safed to the coast, about 8 miles W.S.W. of that city. To the N. rises the mountain range which forms the southern boundary of Upper Galilee. In the valley to the S. there is much rich land cultivated by the villagers. The olives grown here are very fine, and fruitful vineyards cover many of the surrounding slopes. No remains of antiquity are to be seen above ground; but the site is one likely to have been occupied in ancient times.

(2) Ῥαμᾶ, Rhamá: A city that is mentioned only once, on the boundary of Asher (Josh 19 29). The line of the boundary cannot be followed with certainty; but perhaps we may identify Ramah with the modern Rāmiyeh, a village situated on a hill which rises in the midst of a hollow, some 13 miles S.E. of Tyre, and 12 miles E. of the Ladder of Tyre. To the S.W. is a marshy lake which dries up in summer. Traces of antiquity are found in the cisterns, a large reservoir and many sarcophagi. To the W. is the high hill Belāt, with ancient ruins, and remains of a temple of which several columns are still in situ.

(3) B, Ῥαμά, Rhamá, A, Ἰαμά, Iamá, and other forms: A city in the territory of Benjamin named between Gibeon and Beeroth (Josh 18 25). The Levite thought of it as a possible resting-place for himself and his concubine on their northward journey (Jgs 19 13). The palm tree of Deborah was between this and Bethel (Jgs 4 5). Baasha, king of Samaria, sought to fortify Ramah against Asa, king of Judah. The latter frustrated the attempt, and carried off the materials which Baasha had collected, and with them fortified against him Geba of Benjamin and Mizpah (1 K 15 17; 2 Ch 16 5). Here the captain of Nebuchadnezzar's guard released Jeremiah after he had been carried in bonds from Jerus (Jer 40 1). It figures in Isaiah's picture of the Assyrians' approach (10 29). It is named by Hosea in connection with Gibeah (5 8), and is mentioned as being reoccupied after the exile (Ezr 2 26; Neh 7 30). It was near the traditional tomb of Rachel (Jer 31 15; cf 1 S 10 2; Mt 2 18, AV "Rama").

From the passages cited we gather that Ramah lay some distance to the N. of Gibeah, and not far from Gibeon and Beeroth. The first is identified with Tell el-Fūl, about 3 miles N. of Jerus. Two miles farther N. is er-Rām. Gibeon (el-Jīb) is about 3 miles W. of er-Rām, and Beeroth (el-Bīreh) is about 4 miles to the N. Onom places Ramah 6 Roman miles N. of Jerus; while Jos (Ant, VIII, xii, 3) says it lay 40 furlongs from the city. All this points definitely to identification with er-Rām. The modern village crowns a high limestone hill to the S. of the road, a position of great strength. W. of the village is an ancient reservoir. In the hill are cisterns, and a good well to the S.

(4) Ἀραμαθαίμ, Aramathaim: The home of Elkanah and Hannah, and the birthplace of Samuel (1 S 1 19; 2 11, etc). In 1 S 1 1 it is called "Ramathaim-zophim" (רַמְתַּיִם צוֹפִים, hā-rāmā-thayim-ṣōphīm). The phrase as it stands is grammatically incorrect, and suggests tampering with the text. It might possibly be tr^d "Ramathaim of the Zuphites." It was in Mt. Ephraim, within accessible distance of Shiloh, whither Samuel's parents went up from year to year to worship and to sacrifice (1 3). From Ramah as a center Samuel went on circuit annually, to judge Israel, to Bethel, Gilgal and Mizpah (7 16 f). It is very probable that this is the city in which, guided by his servant, Saul first made the acquaintance of Samuel (9 6,10), where there was a high place (ver 12). Hither at all events came the elders of Israel with their demand that a king should be set over them (8 4 f). After his final break with Saul, Samuel retired in sorrow to Ramah (15 34 f). Here, in Naioth, David found asylum with Samuel from the mad king (19 18, etc), and hence he fled on his ill-starred visit to Nob (20 1). In his native city the dust of the dead Samuel was laid (25 1; 28 3). In 1 Macc 11 34 it is named as one of the three toparchies along with Aphaerema and Lydda, which were added to Judaea from the country of Samaria in 145 BC. Onom places it near Diospolis (Euseb.) in the district of Timnah (Jerome).

There are two serious rivals for the honor of representing the ancient Ramah. (a) Beit Rīma, a village occupying a height 13 miles E.N.E. of Lydda (Diospolis), 12 miles W. of Shiloh, and about the same distance N.W. of Bethel. This identification has the support of G. A. Smith (HGHL, 254), and Buhl (GAP, 170). (b) Ramallah, a large and prosperous village occupying a lofty position with ancient remains. It commands a wide prospect, esp. to the W. It lies about 8 miles N. of Jerus, 3 W. of Bethel, and 12 S.W. of Shiloh. The name meaning "the height" or "high place of God" may be reminiscent of the high place in the city where Saul found Samuel. In other respects it agrees very well with the Bib. data.

Claims have also been advanced on behalf of Ramleh, a village 2 miles S.W. of Lydda, in the plain of Sharon. This, however, is out of the question, as the place did not exist before Arab times. Others support identification with Nēby Samwīl, which more probably represents the ancient מִצְפָּה (q.v.).

(5) Ramah of the South, AV "Ramath of the South": Ramath is the construct form of Ramah (Josh 19 8) (רַמַּת נֶגְבִי, rā'math neghebb; Βάμειθ κατά λίβα, Bāmēth katá líba). A city in that part of the territory of Judah which was allotted to Simeon. It stands here in apposition to Baalath-beer, and is probably a second name for the same place. It seems to correspond also with "Ramoth [pl.] of the South" (1 S 30 27), a place to which David sent a share of the spoil taken from the Amalekites. In this passage LXX retains the sing. form, Rhamá nōtou. Identification has been suggested with Kubbet el-Baul about 37 miles S. of Hebron; and with Kurmub a little farther S. There is no substantial ground for either identification.

(6) B, Ῥεμμῶθ, Rhemmōth, A, Ῥαμῶθ, Rhamōth: Ramah in 2 K 8 29; 2 Ch 22 6, is a contraction of Ramoth-gilead. W. EWING

RAMATH, rā'math, OF THE SOUTH (Josh 19 8 AV). See RAMAH, (5).

RAMATH-LEHI, rā'math-lē'hī (רַמַּת לֵהִי, rā-math lehī, "the hill" or "height of Lehi"; Ἀναίρεσις σιαγόνης, Anáiresis stagónos): So the place is said to have been called where Samson threw away the jaw-bone of an ass, with which he had slain 1,000 Philis (Jgs 15 17). LXX seems to have supposed that the name referred to the "heaving" or throwing up of the jaw-bone. The Heb, however, corresponds to the form used in other place-names, such as Ramath-mizpeh, and must be read as "Ramah of Lehi." The name Lehi may have been given because of some real or imagined likeness in the place to the shape of a jaw-bone (Jgs 15 9,14,19). It may have been in Wady es-Sarār, not far from Zorah and Timnath; but the available data do not permit of certain identification. See JAW-BONE; LEHI. W. EWING

RAMATH-MIZPEH, rā'math-miz'pe (רַמַּת מִצְפֶּה, rāmāth ha-mizpeh; B, Ἀραβὼθ κατὰ τὴν Μοσσηφά, Arabōth katā tēn Mossēphā, A, Ραμὸθ Μασφά, Rhamōth . . . Masphā): A place mentioned in Josh 13 26 in a statement of the boundary of Gad, between Heshbon and Betonim. It may possibly be identical with MIZPAH, (1).

RAMATHAIM, rā-ma-thā'im (1 Macc 11 34; AV Ramathem, ram'a-them). See RAMAH, (4).

RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM, rā-ma-thā'im-zō'fim. See RAMAH, (4).

RAMATHITE, rā'math-it (רַמַּתִּית, hā-rāmāthī; B, ὁ ἐκ Ῥαῆλ, ho ek Rhaēl, A, ὁ Ῥαμαθίαιος, ho Rhamathaios): So Shimei is called who was set by David over the vineyards (1 Ch 27 27). There is nothing to show to which Ramah he belonged.

RAMESES, ram'ē-sēz, ra-mē'sēz. See RAAMESSES.

RAMIAH, ra-mī'a (רַמְיָאֵה, ramyāh, "Jeh hath loosened" or "Jeh is high"): One of the Israelites, of the sons of Parosh, mentioned in the register of those who had offended in the matter of foreign marriages (Ezr 10 25). The form of the name in 1 Esd (9 26), "Hiermas," presupposes a Heb form y'remyāh or possibly yirm'yāh = "Jeremiah."

RAMOTH, rā'moth:

(1) רַמֹּת, rāmōth; ἡ Ῥαμὸθ, hē Rhamōth: A city in the territory of Issachar assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 73), mentioned between Daberath and Anem. It seems to correspond to "Remeth" in Josh 19 21, and to "Jar-muth" in 21 29, and is possibly identical with er-Rāmeḥ about 11 miles S.W. of Jenin.

(2) Ramoth of the South. See RAMAH, (5).

(3) Ramoth in Gilead. See RAMOTH-GILEAD.

RAMOTH, rā'moth (רַמֹּת, rāmōth, קֶרֶב qerēb for y'erēmōth [Ezr 10 29 AV]; RVm Kethibh makes the name similar to those in vs 26,27): One of the offenders in the matter of foreign marriages. ERV and ARV, adopting Kethibh, read JEREMOTH (q.v.).

RAMOTH (Job 28 18 AVm). See STONES, PRECIOUS.

RAMOTH-GILEAD, rā'moth-gil'ē-ad (רַמֹּת גִּלְעָד, rāmōth gil'ād; B, Ῥεμμαθ Γαλαάδ, Rhemmāth Galaād, A, Ῥαμμῶθ, Rhammōth, and other forms): A great and strong city E. of the Jordan in the territory of Gad, which played an important part in the wars of Israel. It is first mentioned in connection with the appointment of the Cities of Refuge (Dt 4 43; Josh 20 8). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh 21 38; 1 Ch 6 80). In these four passages it is called "Ramoth in Gilead" (רַמֹּת בְּגִלְעָד, rāmōth ba-gil'ād). This form is given wrongly by AV in 1 K 22 3. In all other places the form "Ramoth-gilead" is used.

Here Ben-geber was placed in charge of one of Solomon's administrative districts (1 K 4 13), which included Havvoth-jair and "the region of Argob, which is in Bashan." 1. History The city was taken from Omri by the Syrians under Ben-hadad I (Ant, VIII, xv, 3 ff), and even after the defeat of Ben-hadad at Aphek they remained masters of this fortress. In order to recover it for Israel Ahab invited Jehoshaphat of Judah to accompany him in a campaign. Despite the discouragement of Micaiah, the royal pair set out on the disastrous enterprise. In their attack on the city Ahab fought in disguise, but was mortally wounded by an arrow from a bow drawn "at a venture" (1 K 22 1-40; 2 Ch 18). The attempt was renewed by Ahab's son Joram; but his father's ill fortune followed him, and, heavily wounded, he retired for healing to Jezreel (2 K 8 28 ff; 2 Ch 22 5 ff). During the king's absence from the camp at Ramoth-gilead Jehu was there anointed king of Israel by Elisha (2 K 9 1 ff; 2 Ch 22 7). He proved a swift instrument of vengeance against the doomed house of Ahab. According to Jos (Ant, IX, vi, 1) the city was taken before Joram's departure. This is confirmed by 2 K 9 14 ff. The place is not mentioned again, unless, indeed, it be identical with "Mizpeh" in 1 Macc 5 35.

It is just possible that Ramoth-gilead corresponds to MIZPAH, (1), and to RAMATH-MIZPEH.

The spot where Laban and Jacob parted is called both Galead and Mizpah. Ramoth may become Ramoth, as we see in the case of Ramah of the South.

Merrill identifies the city with Jerash, the splendid ruins of which lie in Wādy ed-Deir, N. of the Jabbok. He quotes the Bab Talm (Makkōth 9b) as placing the Cities of Refuge in pairs, so that those on the E. of the Jordan are opposite those on the W. Shechem, being the middle one of the three W. of the Jordan, should have Ramoth-gilead nearly opposite to it on the E., and this would place its site at Gerasa, the modern Jerash (HDB, s.v.). But the words of the Talm must not be interpreted too strictly. It seems very probable that Golan lay far S. of a line drawn due E. from Kedes (Kedesh-naphtali). No remains have been discovered at Jerash older than Gr-Rom times, although the presence of a fine perennial spring makes occupation in antiquity probable. The place could be approached by chariots along Wādy Ajlūn, and the country adjoining was not unsuitable for chariot evolutions.

Conder and others have suggested Reimūn, an ancient site to the W. of Jerash. The absence of any source of good water-supply is practically fatal to this identification. Buhl (GAP, 261 ff) favors el-Jil'ād, a ruined site on a hill S. of the Jabbok; see GILEAD, (1). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom, s.v.) contradict each other, the former placing Ramoth-gilead 15 miles W., and the latter 15 miles E. of Philadelphia. It is clear, however, that this is a mere slip on Jerome's part, as both say it is near the Jabbok. Many have identified it with es-Salt, which is indeed 15 miles W. of 'Ammān (Philadelphia), but it is 10 miles S. of the Jabbok, and so can hardly be described as near that river. It is also no place for chariot warfare. The case against identification with Ramoth-gilead is conclusively stated by Rev. G. A. Cooke in Driver's Dt, xx.

In suggesting these sites sufficient attention has not been given to what is said in 1 K 4. The authority of the king's officer in Ramoth-gilead extended over the land of Argob in Bashan, as well as over the towns of Jair in Gilead. A situation therefore to the N. of Mahanaim must be sought. Guthe would find it at er-Remtheh, on the pilgrim road, about 10 miles S. of Mezērib (cf HGHL, 586 ff). Cheyne's suggestion of Šalkhad, away on the crest of the mountain of Bashan, is out of the question. Rev. Caleb Hauser (PEFS, 1906, 304 f) argues in favor of Beit Rās, over 11 miles S.E. of Gadara, a position commanding all Northern Gilead and as favorably situated as Jerash for chariot warfare and communication with the W. of Jordan.

"Here we have the heights of Northern Gilead. Ramoth, Capitolas, and Beit Rās are in their respective languages idiomatic equivalents. It is improbable that a large city like Capitolas should have superseded anything but a very important city of earlier times." We must be content to leave the question open meantime. W. EWING RAMPART, ram'pärt (Lam 2 8; Nah 3 8). See FORTIFICATION.

RAM'S HORN. See Music.

RAMS' SKINS: The skin of the sheep, roughly tanned with all the wool on, is the common winter jacket of the shepherd or peasant, the ram's being considered esp. desirable (cf He 11 37). Hence the appropriateness of these skins in the covering of the tabernacle (Ex 25 5, etc). See TABERNACLE; DYE, DYEING.

RANGE, rānj: "Range" and "rank" have the same derivation, and in the sense of a "row" (of men, etc) they were formerly interchangeable. "Range" with this meaning is found in 2 K 11 8.15 AV [2 Ch 23 14 (RV "rank"; שְׁדֵרָה, sdhērāh, "row"). Hence "to range" is "to set in a line" (Jth 2 16; 2 Macc 12 20, dialāssō) or "to move in a line" or, simply, "to roam," whence "a ranging bear" (Prov 28 15; שָׂקַק, shāqak, "run to and fro"). A cooking "range" is a stove on which pots, etc, can be set in a row, but the kīrayim (כִּירַיִם) of Lev 11 35 is a much more primitive affair, composed, probably, of two plates (kīrayim is a dual). In Job 39 8 "range of the mountains" is good modern use, but יָרַח, ythr, should be pointed yāthūr (not y'thūr as in MT) and connected with tūr, "search." So translate "He searcheth out the mountains as his pasture." BURTON SCOTT EASTON

RANK, rank: (1) אֲרָה, 'ōrah, used in Joel 2 7 of the advance of the locust army which marched in perfect order and in straight lines, none crossing the other's track. (2) מַעְרָכָה, ma'ārākāh, "battle array" (1 Ch 12 38 AV; cf 1 S 4 16; 17 22.48). See ARMY.

RANKS, rank̄s (πρασιά, prasiá, "a square plot of ground," "a garden-bed"): "They sat down in ranks" (Mk 6 40); the several reclining ranks formed, as it were, separate plots or "garden-beds."

RANSOM, ran'sum (the noun occurs in the Eng. Bible 12 t [Ex 21 30 AV, פְּדִיּוֹן, pidhyōn; 30 12; Job 33 24; 36 18; Prov 6 35; 13 8; 21 18; Isa 43 3, כֹּפֶר, kōpher; Mt 20 28; Mk 10 45, λύτρον, lutron; 1 Tim 2 6, ἀντίλυτρον, antilytron]; the verbal form occurs 4 t [Isa 35 10; Hos 13 14, פְּדָה, pādāh; Isa 51 10 AV; Jer 31 11, גָּאֹל, gā'al; these two Heb vbs. are generally rendered in other passages by the Eng. "redem"]):

LITERATURE

The supremely important instance is the utterance of the Lord Jesus Christ as reported by Matthew and Mark (Mt 20 28; Mk 10 45), and in looking at it we shall be able, by way of illustration, to glance at the OT passages. The

1. Usage by Christ context refers to the dispute among the disciples concerning position in the Kingdom, with their misconception of the true nature of Christ's Kingdom. Christ makes use of the occasion to set forth the great law of service as determining the place of honor in that Kingdom, and illustrates and enforces it by showing that its greatest exemplification is to be found in His own mission: "For the Son of man also came not to be ministered unto, but to minister" (Mk 10 45). His ministry, however, was to pass into the great act of sacrifice, of which all other acts of self-sacrifice on the part of His people would be but a faint reflection—"and to give his life [soul] a ransom for many" (ib). He thus gives a very clear intimation of the purpose and meaning of His death; the clearest of all the intimations reported by the synoptists. The word He uses bears a well-established meaning, and is accurately rendered by our word "ransom," a price paid to secure the freedom of a slave or to set free from liabilities and charges, and generally the deliverance from calamity by paying the forfeit. The familiar vb. lūō, "to loose," "to set free," is the root, then lūtrōn, that which secures the freedom, the payment or forfeit; thence come the cognate vb. lutrōō, "to set free upon payment of a ransom," "to redeem"; lutrōsis, "the actual setting free," "the redemption," and lutrōtēs, "the redeemer." The favorite NT word for "redemption" is the compound form, apolutrōsis.

The word lutron was common in Gr classical lit., constantly bearing the sense of "ransom price," and was frequently connected with ritual usage, with sacrifice and expiation. 2. OT Usage—the Law But for the full explanation of Our Lord's great thought we have to look to the OT usage. The two leading Heb vbs. tr^d in our version by "redeem," are generally rendered in the LXX by lutroō, and derivatives of these words conveying the idea of the actual price paid are tr^d by this very word lutron.

(1) General cases.—In Ex 21 30 we have the law concerning the case of the person killed by an ox; the ox was to be killed and the owner of it was also liable to death but the proviso was made, "if there be laid on him a sum of money, then he shall give for the ransom of his life whatsoever is laid upon him" (AV). The Heb for "sum of money" is kōpher, lit. "atonement" (RV "ransom"); the word for "ransom" (RV "redemption") is pidhyōn (from pādāh); the LXX renders both by lutron (rather by the pl. form lutra). In Lev 25, among the directions in relation to the Jubilee, we have the provision (ver 23) that the land was not to be sold "in perpetuity," but where any portion has been sold, opportunity is to be given for re-purchase: "Ye shall grant a redemption for the land" (ver 24). The Heb is gē'ullāh, a derivative of gā'al, the LXX lutra. In vs 25.26, the case is mentioned of a man who through poverty has sold part of his land; if a near kinsman is able to redeem it he shall do so; if there is no one to act this brotherly part, and the man himself is able to redeem it, then a certain scale of price is arranged. In the Heb it is again gā'al that is used with the cognate gō'el for "kinsman." The last clause rendered in AV, "and himself he able to redeem it" (in RV "and he waxed rich and find sufficient to redeem it"), is lit. "and his hand shall acquire and he find sufficient for its redemption"; LXX has the vb. lutroō in the first part, and renders the clause pretty literally, "and there be furnished to his hand and there be found with him the sufficient price [lutra] of it." In vs 51.52, in reference to the redemption of the Jew sold into slavery, we have twice in the Heb the word gē'ullāh, rendered in Eng. accurately "the price of his redemption"; and by LXX with equal accuracy, in both cases, lutra, "the ransom-price." In Lev 27 31 AV, the phrase "if a man will at all redeem ought of his tithes" is intended to represent the emphatic Heb idiom, "if a man redeeming will redeem," which is rendered by LXX edn dē lutrotai lutrō anthrōpos.

(2) Redemption money—the firstborn.—But perhaps the most important passage is the law concerning the half-shekel to be paid by every Israelite from 20 years old and upward when a census was taken. It was to be the same for rich and poor, and it was called "atonement money," "to make atonement for their souls." In the opening words of the law, as given in Ex 30 12 (AV), we read "Then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord"—the Heb kōpher; the LXX rendering is lutra tēs psuchēs autou, "a ransom price for his soul." All the people were thus considered as doomed and needing atonement, and it is significant that this atonement money paid at the first census furnished the silver for the sockets of the tabernacle boards, intimating that the typical tabernacle was built upon atonement. The same thought, that the people's lives were forfeited, comes out in the provision for the consecration of the Levites, recorded in full in Nu 3 40-51. The firstborn represented the people. God claimed all the firstborn as forfeited to Himself, teaching that Israel deserved the same punishment as the Egyptians, and was only spared by the grace of Jeh, and in virtue of the sprinkled blood. Now He takes to Himself for His services the Levites as the equivalent of the firstborn, and when it was found that the number of the firstborn exceeded the number of the Levites, equivalence was maintained by ransoming at a certain price the surplusage of the firstborn males. In the LXX account, lutra occurs 4 t, twice for the phrase "those to be redeemed," and twice for "redemption money." Thus the idea of ransom for the forfeited life became familiar to the people as educated by the typical system, and redemption expressed the sum total of their hopes for the future, however faulty might be their conception of the nature of that redemption.

(3) Connection with sacrifice.—It is also clear in the typical teaching that sacrifice and ransom were closely related. Even in classical Gr, as we have noted, the two conceptions were connected, and it is not surprising to find it so in the OT. Kōpher, we have seen, is lit. "atonement" and comes from kāphar, lit. "to cover," and thence by covering to make atonement, or to cover by making atonement; and so it is in the Piel form, the most common and technical Heb word for making atonement, or expiation, or propitiation, and is frequently rendered in the Gr by hilaskomai, often too by the compound exilaskomai. In Ex 21 30, kōpher, we noted, is used interchangeably with pidhyōn, both being represented in the LXX by lutra, and so in Ex 30 12; Nu 35 31-32; the Heb kōpher is lutra in the Gr. In the latter place, where it is twice stated that no satisfaction shall be taken for the life of a murderer, the Heb is kōpher, LXX lutra, RV "ransom," AV "satisfaction."

(4) Typical reference to the Messiah.—Sacrifice was thus linked with ransom. Sacrifice was the Divinely appointed covering for sin. The ransom for the deliverance of the sinner was to be by sacrifice. Both the typical testimony of the Law and the prophetic testimony gave prominence to the thought of redemption. The Coming One was to be a Redeemer. Redemption was to be the great work of the Messiah. The people seem to have looked for the redemption of the soul to God alone through the observance of their appointed ritual, while redemption, in the more general sense of deliverance from all enemies and troubles, they linked with the advent of the Messiah. It required a spiritual vision to see that the two things would coincide, that the Messiah would effect redemption in all its phases and fullness by means of ransom, of sacrifice, of expiation.

Jesus appeared as the Messiah in whom all the old economy was to be fulfilled. He knew perfectly the meaning of the typical and prophetic testimony; and with that fully in view, knowing that His death was to fulfil the OT types and accomplish its brightest prophetic anticipations, He deliberately uses this term lutron to describe it (Mt 20 28); in speaking of His death as a ransom,

He also regarded it as a sacrifice, an expiatory offering. The strong preposition used intensifies the idea of ransom and expiation, even to the point of substitution. It is anti, "instead of," and the idea of exchange, equivalence, substitution cannot be removed from it. In Nu 3 45, "Take the Levites instead of all the first-born," the LXX uses anti, which, like the Eng. "instead of," exactly represents the Heb tahath; and all three convey most unmistakably the idea of substitution. And as the Levites were to be substituted for the firstborn, so for the surplus of the firstborn the "ransom money" was to be substituted, that idea, however, being clearly enough indicated by the use of the genitive. Indeed the simpler way of describing a ransom would be with the genitive, the ransom of many; or as our version renders, "a ransom for many"; but just because the ransom here is not simply a money payment, but is the actual sacrifice of the life, the substitution of His soul for many, He is appropriately said "to give his soul a ransom instead of many." The Kingdom of God which Christ proclaimed was so diverse in character from that which Salome and her sons anticipated that, so far from appearing in dazzling splendor, with distinguished places of power for eager aspirants, it was to be a spiritual home for redeemed sinners. Men held captive by sin needed to be ransomed that they might be free to become subjects of the Kingdom, and so the ransom work, the sufferings and death of Christ, must lie at the very foundation of that Kingdom. The need of ransom supposes life forfeited; the ransom paid secures life and liberty; the life which Christ gives comes through His ransoming death.

Besides the passages in the Pent which we have noted, special mention should be made of the two great passages which bear so closely upon the need of spiritual redemption, and Job and Ps 49 7,8, "None of them can by any means redeem [pādāh; lutroō] his brother, nor give to God a ransom [kōpher; exilasma] for him (for the redemption of their life is costly, and it faileth for ever)." (The Heb gives pidhyōn for "redemption"; the Gr has "the price of the redemption of his soul.") No human power or skill, no forfeit in money or service or life can avail to ransom any soul from the doom entailed by sin. But in the same ps (ver 15) the triumphant hope is expressed, "But God will redeem [pādāh; lutroō] my soul from the power of Sheol." In Job 33 24, "Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom": God is the speaker, and whatever may be the particular exegesis of the passage in its original application, it surely contains an anticipation of the gospel redemption. This Divine eureka is explained in the light of Christ's utterance; it finds its realization through the cross: "I have found a ransom," for "the Son of Man" has given "his soul a ransom for many."

This great utterance of the Saviour may well be considered as the germ of all the apostolic teaching concerning redemption, but it is 4. Apostolic Teaching not for us to show its unfolding beyond noting that in apostolic thought the redemption was always connected with the death, the sacrifice of Christ.

Thus Paul (Eph 1 7), "In whom we have our redemption through his blood." Thus Peter (1 Pet 1 18,19), "Ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things . . . but with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ." So in He 9 12 it is shown that Christ "through his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption"; and in the Apocalypse (Rev 5 9) the song is, "Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe," etc.

In all but the last of these passages there is an echo of the very word used by Christ, apolutrōsis and lutrosis, both being connected with lutron. In 1 Tim 2 5.6 Paul has a still closer verbal coincidence when he says, "Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all" (antilutron). The word used in the Apocalypse is agorāzō, to buy in the open market, and is frequently used of the redeeming work of Christ (Rev 14 3.4; 2 Pet 2 1; 1 Cor 6 20; 7 23). In the two places where Paul uses it he adds the means of purchase: "Ye were bought with a price," which from his point of view would be equivalent to ransom. In the passage in Gal 3 13; 4 5, Paul uses the compound exagorāzō, which is equivalent to "redeem, buy off, deliver by paying the price."

The question "Who receives the ransom?" is not directly raised in Scripture, but it is one that not unnaturally occurs to the mind, and theologians have answered it in varying ways.

5. To Whom Was the Ransom Paid?

(1) Not to Satan.—The idea entertained by some of the Fathers (Irenaeus, Origen) that the ransom was given to Satan, who is conceived of as having through the sin of man a righteous claim upon him, which Christ recognizes and meets, is grotesque, and not in any way countenanced by Scripture.

(2) To Divine justice.—But in repudiating it, there is no need to go so far as to deny that there is anything answering to a real ransoming transaction. All that we have said goes to show that, in no mere figure of speech, but in tremendous reality, Christ gave "his life a ransom," and if our mind demands an answer to the question to whom the ransom was paid, it does not seem at all unreasonable to think of the justice of God, or God in His character of Moral Governor, as requiring and receiving it. In all that Scripture asserts about propitiation, sacrifice, reconciliation in relation to the work of Christ, it is implied that there is wrath to be averted, someone to be appeased or satisfied, and while it may be enough simply to think of the effects of Christ's redeeming work in setting us free from the penal claims of the Law—the just doom of sin—it does not seem going beyond the spirit of Scripture to draw the logical inference that the ransom price was paid to the Guardian of that holy law, the Administrator of eternal justice. "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us" (Gal 3 13). This essential, fundamental phase of redemption is what theologians, with good Scripture warrant, have called redemption by blood, or by price, as distinguished from the practical outcome of the work of Christ in the life which is redemption by power.

(a) Redemption by price: As to Satan's claims, Christ by paying the ransom price, having secured the right to redeem, exercises His power on behalf of the believing sinner. He does not recognize the right of Satan. He is the "strong man" holding his captives lawfully, and Christ the "stronger than he" overcomes him and spoils him, and sets his captives free (Lk 11 21.22). In one sense men may be said to have sold themselves to Satan, but they had no right to sell, nor he to buy, and Christ ignores that transaction and brings "to nought him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (He 2 14), and so is able to "deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (He 2 15).

(b) Redemption by power: Many of the OT passages about the redemption wrought on behalf of God's people illustrate this redemption by power, and the redemption by power is always founded on the redemption by price; the release follows the ransom. In the case of Israel, there was first the redemption by blood—the sprinkled blood of the Paschal Lamb which sheltered from the destroying angel (Ex 12)—and then followed the redemption by power, when by strength of hand Jeh brought His people out from Egypt (Ex 13 14), and in His mercy led forth the people which He had redeemed (Ex 15 13).

So under the gospel when "he hath visited and wrought redemption for his people" (Lk 1 68), He can "grant unto us that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies should serve him without fear" (Lk 1 74). It is because we have in Him our redemption through His blood that we can be delivered out of the power of darkness (Col 1 13.14). See further, REDEEMER, REDEMPTION.

RAPE, rāp. See CRIMES; PUNISHMENTS.

RAPHA, RAPHAH, rā'fa (רַפָּא, rāphā')

(1) In RVm these names are substituted for "the giant" in 1 Ch 20 4.6.8 and in 2 S 21 16.18.20.22. The latter passage states that certain champions of the Philis who were slain by David's warriors had been born to the rāphāh in Gath. The text is corrupt; Raphah is probably an eponym. Originally the name of one of the Philis who was of the body "Rephaites" stood in the text. The plural of this word, or at least a plural of this stem, is REPHAIM (q.v.).

(2) Raphah (AV "Rapha"), a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8 37). See REPHALAH.

RAPHAEL, raf'ā-el, rā'fā-el (רַפְּאֵל, rāphā'ēl, from rāphā' 'el, "God has healed"; 'Ραφαήλ, Rhaphaēl): The name of the angel who, as Azarias, guides Tobias to ECBATANNA and RAGES (q.v.). The purpose of his mission is, in accordance with his name, to cure Tobit of blindness, and to deliver Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, from the power of the evil spirit Asmodeus (Tob 3 8; 12 14). Later, in addition, when he reveals himself (12 15), he declares that he is "one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints, and go in before the glory of the Holy One." These seven angels are derived, according to Dr. Kohut, from the seven Am-shaspands (Amesha-spentas) of Zoroastrianism (cf Rev 4 5). At the head of the elaborate angelology of the Enoch books there are "four presences," and Raphael is one of them (En 40 9; 54 6). In the first of these passages Raphael is the healer; in the second, he with Michael, Gabriel and Phanuel lead the wicked away to punishment. These four presences seem related to the four "living creatures" of Ezk (1 5) and of the Apocalypse (Rev 4 6). While this is the general representation of Raphael's position in En, in 20 3 he is named among the angels who "watch," whose number according to the Gr text is seven. Raphael shared in the function assigned to the archangels, in the Oracula Sibyllina, of leading souls to the judgment seat of God (II, 215, Alexandre's text). He occupies a prominent place in Jewish mediaeval writings; he with Michael and Gabriel cured Abraham (Yōmā' 37a); according to the book Zōhar, Raphael conveyed to Adam a book containing 72 kinds of wisdom in 670 writings. The painters of the Renaissance frequently depicted Raphael.

RAPHAIM, raf'ā-im, ra-fā'im (B omits; S and A have 'Ραφα[ε]ίμ, Rhapha[e]im): An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).

RAPHON, rā'fon ('Ραφείων, Rhaphēiōn): The place where in his campaign E. of Jordan Judas inflicted disastrous defeat on the host of Timotheus, the fugitives fleeing for refuge to the temple at Carnaim (1 Macc 5 37 ff; Ant, XII, viii, 4). The same place is doubtless referred to by Pliny as "Raphana" (NH, v.16). It may possibly be represented by the modern Rāfeh, on the E. of the pilgrimage road, about 17 miles N. of Der'ah, and 11 miles N.E. of Tell el-'Ash'ary. It is a mile and a half N. of Wady Kanawāt, which would thus be the "brook" mentioned in the narrative. It is perhaps far enough away from Carnaim, if this is rightly placed at Tell el-'Ash'ary.

W. EWING

RAPHU, rā'fū (רָפְיָהוּ, rāphū', "one healed"): The father of Palti, the spy selected from the tribe of Benjamin (Nu 13 9).

RASSES, ras'ez (רָסַסִּים, Rhaassets, AB, Raassets, Rhassets; Vulg Tharsis; Old Lat Thiras et Rasis): The children of Rasses are mentioned with Put, Lud and the children of Ishmael as having been subdued by Holofernes (Jth 2 23).

Their identity is a matter of conjecture only. Some think Vulg Tharsis (=Tarsus) is meant, others Rosh (Ezk 38 23; 39 1), others Rhosos, a mountain range and city S. from Ananus, on the Gulf of Issus. Most probably a district, not a town, is named, situated in the eastern part of Asia Minor.

S. F. HUNTER

RATHUMUS, ra-thū'mus (Ράθυμος, Rhathumous): One of those who joined in writing a letter to protest to Artaxerxes against the Jews (1 Esd 2 16 ff). In 2 17 he is styled "story-writer," RVm "recorder" (ὁ τὰ προσκρίπτουσα sc. γράφων, ho tā prospriptonta [gráphōn])="Rehum the chancellor" of Ezr 4 8, Rathumus being a Gr form of Rehum. In 1 Esd 2 16 his title appears as an independent proper name, BEELTETHMUS (q.v.) (here AVm gives "Bahumus," a misprint), and in 2 25 R. and Beel-tethmus are given as distinct persons.

RAVEN, rā'v'n (רָבִיב, 'orēbh; κόραξ, kórax; Lat Corvus corax): A large family of the smaller birds of prey belonging to the genus Corvus corax. A bird of such universal distribution that it is known from Iceland to Japan, all over Asia, Europe and Africa, but almost extinct and not of general distribution in our own country. In no land is it more numerous than in Pal. In general appearance it resembles the crow, but is much larger, being almost two feet long, of a glossy black, with whiskers around the beak, and rather stiff-pointed neck feathers. A bird exhibiting as much intelligence as any, and of a saucy, impudent disposition, it has been an object of interest from the beginning. It has been able to speak sentences of a few words when carefully taught, and by its uncanny acts has made itself a bird surrounded by superstition, myth, fable, and is connected with the religious rites of many nations. It is partially a carrion feeder, if offal or bodies are fresh; it also eats the young of other birds and very small animals and seeds, berries and fruit, having as varied a diet as any bird. It is noisy, with a loud, rough, emphatic cry, and its young are clamorous at feeding time.

Aristotle wrote that ravens drove their young from their location and forced them to care for themselves from the time they left the nest. This is doubtful. Bird habits and characteristics change only with slow ages of evolution. Our ravens of today are, to all intents, the same birds as those of Pal in the time of Moses, and ours follow the young afield for several days and feed them until the cawing, flapping youngsters appear larger than the parents. In Pliny's day, ravens had been taught to speak, and as an instance of their cunning he records that in time of drought a raven found a bucket containing a little water beside a sepulcher and raised it to drinking level by dropping in stones.

Pal has at least 8 different species of ravens. This bird was the first sent out by Noah in an effort to discover if the flood were abating (Gen 8 6-8). Because it partially fed on carrion it was included among the abominations (see Lev 11 15; Dt 14 14). On 1 K 17 4-6, see ELIJAH and the present writer's Birds of the Bible, 401-3. Among the marvels of creation and providence in Job 38 41, we have this mention of the raven,

"Who provideth for the raven his prey,
When his young ones cry unto God,
And wander for lack of food?"

The answer to this question is in Ps 147 9:

"He giveth to the beast his food,
And to the young ravens which cry."

Both these quotations point out the fact that the young are peculiarly noisy. In Prov 30 17 it is indicated that the ravens, as well as eagles, vultures and hawks, found the eye of prey the vulnerable point, and so attacked it first. The Heb 'orēbh means "black," and for this reason was applied to the raven, so the reference to the locks of the bridegroom in the Song of Solomon becomes clear (Cant 5 11). The raven is one of the birds indicated to prey upon the ruins of Edom (Isa 34 11). The last reference is found in Lk 12 24: "Consider the ravens, that they sow not, neither reap; which have no store-chamber nor barn; and God feedeth them." This could have been said of any wild bird with equal truth. GENE STRATTON-PORTER

RAVEN, rav'n, RAVIN, rav'in: "Raven" (vb.) is from "rapine," "violent plundering," used for קָרַב, tāraph, in Gen 49 27; Ps 22 13; Ezk 22 25,27, while "ravin" (noun) is the object ravened, in Nah 2 12 the torn carcasses (קָרַבָּה, q'rēphāh). So a "ravenous bird" (Isa 46 11; Ezk 39 4) is a bird of prey (not a "hungry bird"), עֵיט, 'ayit, lit. "a screecher." "Ravenous beast" in Isa 35 9 is for פָּרִיץ, pārīṣ, "violent one." In the NT ἀρπαξ, hárpar, "rapacious," is trd "ravening" in Mt 7 15, while for the cognate ἀρπαγή, harpagē (Lk 11 39), AV gives "ravening," RV "extortion."

RAZIS, rā'zis (Ραζαῖς, Rhazeis): "An elder of Jerus," "lover of his countrymen," and for his good will toward them called "father of the Jews," accused before the Syrian general Nicanor as an opponent of Hellenism. In order to escape falling into the hands of Nicanor's soldiers he committed suicide with the greatest determination in a rather revolting manner (2 Macc 14 37 ff), in his death calling upon "the Lord of life" in the hope of a resurrection. His suicide—contrary to Jewish sentiment—was regarded with approbation by the author of 2 Macc (14 42,43).

RAZOR, rā'zēr (רֶצֶר, ta'ar, "knife" [Nu 6 5; Ps 52 2; Isa 7 20; Ezk 5 1], מִרְרָה, mōrāh, "razor" [Jgs 13 5; 16 17; 1 S 1 11]). See BARBER; HAIR.

READING, rēd'ing (מִקְרָא, mikrā; ἀνάγνωσις, anagnōsis): As a noun occurs once in the OT (Neh 8 8) and 3 t in the NT (Acts 13 15; 2 Cor 3 14; 1 Tim 4 13), each time with reference to the public reading of the Divine Law. The vb. "to read" (קָרָא, qārā; ἀναγινώσκω, anaginōskō) occurs frequently both in the OT and in the NT: (1) often in the sense of reading aloud to others, esp. of the public reading of God's Law or of prophecy, as by Moses (Ex 24 7), Ezra (Neh 8 3.18), Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4 16), of the regular reading of the Law and the Prophets in the synagogues (Acts 13 27; 15 21), and of the reading of apostolic epp. in the Christian church (Col 4 16; 1 Thess 5 27); (2) also in the sense of reading to one's self, whether the Divine word in Law or prophecy (Dt 17 19; Acts 8 28-30, etc), or such things as private letters (2 K 5 7; 19 14; Acts 23 34, etc).
D. MIALL EDWARDS

READY, red'ī (מְהֵרָה, māhēr): Occurs twice in the sense of apt, skilful (Ezr 7 6; Ps 45 1). RV gives "ready" for "fit" (Prov 24 27), for "asketh" (Mic 7 3), for "prepared" (Mk 14 15), for "not be negligent" (2 Pet 1 12).

REAIAH, rē-ā'ya, rē-ī'a (רֵאִיָּה, r'āyāh, "Jeh has seen"); LXX B, Ραδά, Rhadá, A, Ρεά, Rheía:

(1) The eponym of a Calebite family (1 Ch 4 2). The word "Reaiah" should probably be substituted for "Haroeh" in 1 Ch 2 52, but both forms may be corruptions.

(2) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 5, AV "Reaia"). See JOEL.

(3) The family name of a company of Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 50=1 Esd 5 31).

REAPING, rēp'ing (קָצַר, kāṣar; θερίζω, therizō): Reaping in ancient times, as at present, consisted in either pulling up the grain by the roots or cutting it with a sickle (see SICKLE), and then binding the stalks into bundles to be carried to the threshing-floor. If the Egypt sculptures are true to life, reaping was sometimes divided into two operations, the heads of grain and the stalks being reaped separately. In Pal and Syria both pulling and cutting are still practised, the former when the ground is stony and the spears scarce. Even where the sickle is used, much of the grain comes up by the roots, owing to the toughness of the dried stalks or the dullness of the sickle. The reaper sometimes wears pieces of cane on the fingers of the hand which gathers the grain in order to protect them from injury by the sharp grasses or the sickle. There were definite laws established by the Hebrews in regard to reaping (Lev 19 9; 23 10; 25 5.11; Dt 16 9). Samuel mentions the task of reaping the harvest as one of the requirements which would be made by the king for whom the people were clamoring (1 S 8 12).

Figurative: The certainty of the consequences of good and evil doing were often typified by the sowing and the reaping of harvests (Job 4 8; Prov 22 8; Hos 8 7; 10 12.13; 2 Cor 9 6; Gal 6 7.8). "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy" is found in the liberated captives' song (Ps 126 5). "He that regardeth the clouds shall not reap," i.e. a lack of faith in God's care will be punished (Ecc 11 4); cf also the lesson of trust drawn from the birds (Mt 6 26; Lk 12 24). Sowing and not reaping the harvest is mentioned as a punishment for disobedience (Job 31 8; Jer 12 13; Mic 6 15). Reaping where he sowed not, showed the injustice of the landlord (Mt 25 26), as did also the withholding of the reapers' wages (Jas 5 4). In God's Kingdom there is a division of labor: "He that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together" (Jn 4 36-38). In John's vision he saw an angel reap the earth (Rev 14 15.16). See AGRICULTURE; GLEANING.

REARWARD, rēr'wōrd (אַחֲרָי, 'āṣaph, "to gather," Nu 10 25; Josh 6 9 [AVM "gathering host"]; Isa 52 12). See ARMY; DAN, TRIBE OF; WAR, 3.

REASON, rēz'n, REASONABLE, rēz'n-a-b'l, REASONING, rēz'n-ing (דָּבַר, yākhah, etc; λόγος, lógos, διαλογίζομαι, -ισμός, dialogizomai, -ismós, etc): "Reason," with related terms, has a diversity of meanings, representing a large number of Heb and Gr words and phrases. In the sense of "cause" or "occasion" it stands in 1 K 9 15 for dābhār, "a word" (RVm "account"), but in most cases renders prepositional forms as "from," "with," "because of," "for the sake of," etc. As the ground or argument for anything, it is the tr of ta'am (Prov 26 16, RVm "answers discreetly"), of yākhah, as in Isa 1 18, "Come now, and let us reason together" (cf Job 13 3; 15 3); in 1 S 12 7, the word is shāphat, RV "that I may plead," etc. The principal Gr words for "reason," "reasoning," are those given above. The Christian believer is to be ready to give a reason (logos) for the hope that is in him (1 Pet 3 15 AV). "Reason" as a human faculty or in the abstract sense appears in Apoc in Wisd 17 12 (logismós); Ecc 37 16, "Let reason [logos] go before every enterprise," RV "be the beginning of every work." In Acts 18 14, "reason would" is lit. katá lógon, "according to reason"; in Rom 12 1, for "reasonable [logikós] service," RV has "spiritual," and in m "Gr 'belonging to the reason.'" In RV "reason," etc, occurs much oftener than in AV (cf Lev 17 11; Dt 28 47; Jgs 5 22; Job 20 2; 23 7, etc; Lk 3 15; 12 17; Acts 17 17, etc).

REBA, rē'ba (רְבֵעַ, rebhā, "fourth part"; LXX B, Ρόβε, Rhōbe, A, Ρέβεκ, Rhēbek): One of the five chieftains of Midian who were slain by the Israelites, under Moses (Nu 31 8; Josh 13 21). Like his comrades, he is termed a "king" in Nu, but a "chief" or "prince" in Josh.

REBEKAH, rē-bek'a (רִבְקָה, ribhāh; LXX and NT Ρεβέκκα, Rhobékka, whence the usual Eng. spelling Rebecca): Daughter of Bethuel and an unknown mother, granddaughter of Nahor and Milcah, sister of Laban, wife of Isaac, mother of Esau and Jacob.

Her name is usually explained from the Arab. رِبْعَة, rabkat, "a tie-rope for animals," or, rather, "a noose" in such a rope; its application would then by figure suggest the beauty (?) of her that bears it, by means of which men are snared or bound. The root is found in Heb only in the noun meaning "hitching-place" or "stall," in the familiar phrase "fatted calf" or "calf of the stall," and in view of the meaning of such names as Rachel and Eglah the name Rebekah might well mean (concrete for abstract, like רִקְמָה, rikmah, חֲמֵדָה, hemdah, etc) a "tied-up calf" (or "lamb" ?), one therefore peculiarly choice and fat.

Rebekah is first mentioned in the genealogy of the descendants of Nahor, brother of Abraham (Gen 22 20-24). In fact, the family is there carried down just so far as is necessary in order to introduce this woman, for whose subsequent appearance and rôle the genealogy is obviously intended as a preparation. All this branch of the family of Terah had remained in Aram when Abraham and Lot had migrated to Canaan, and it is at Haran, "the city of Nahor," that we first meet Rebekah, when in ch 24 she is made known to Abraham's servant at the well before the gate.

That idyllic narrative of the finding of a bride for Isaac is too familiar to need rehearsal and too simple to require comment. Besides, the substance both of that story and of the whole of Rebekah's career is treated in connection with the sketches of the other actors in the same scenes. Yet we note from the beginning the maiden's decision of character, which appears in every line of the narrative, and prepares the reader to find in subsequent chapters the positive, ambitious and energetic woman that she there shows herself.

Though the object of her husband's love (Gen 24 67), Rebekah bore him no children for 20 years (25 20,26). Like Sarah, she too was barren, and it was only after that score of years and after the special intercession of Isaac that God at length granted her twin sons. "The purpose of God according to election," as Paul expresses the matter in Rom 9 11, was the cause of that strange oracle to the wondering, inquiring parents, "The elder shall serve the younger" (Gen 25 23).

Whether because of this oracle or for some other reason, it was that younger son, Jacob, who became the object of his mother's special love (Gen 25 28). She it was who led him into the deception practised upon Isaac (Gen 27 5-17), and she it was who devised the plan for extricating Jacob from the dangerous situation into which that deception had brought him (vs 42-46). When the absence of Jacob from home became essential to his personal safety, Rebekah proposed her own relations in Aram as the goal of his journey, and gave as motive the desirability of Jacob's marrying from among her kindred. Probably she did not realize that in sending her favorite son away on this journey she was sending him away from her forever. Yet such seems to have been the case. Though younger than Isaac, who was still living at an advanced age when Jacob returned to Canaan a quarter of a century later, Rebekah seems to have died during that term. We learn definitely only this, that she was buried in the cave of Machpelah near Hebron (Gen 49 31).

Outside of Gen, Rebekah is alluded to in Scripture only in the passage from Rom (9 10-12) already cited. Her significance there is simply that of the wife of Isaac and the mother of two sons of such different character and destiny as Esau and Jacob. And her significance in Gen, apart from this, lies in her contribution to the family of Abraham of a pure strain from the same eastern stock, thus transmitting to the founders of Israel both an un-mixed lineage and that tradition of separateness from Can. and other non-Heb elements which has proved the greatest factor in the ethnological marvel of the ages, the persistence of the Heb people. REBUKE, rê-sûk': As a vb. "rebuke" is in the OT the tr of רָעַר, gā'ar and רָבַח, yākhah; another word, rîbh, in Neh 5 7, is in RV tr^d "contended with." "Rebuke" (noun) is most frequently the tr of g'ārāh; also in AV of herpāh (Isa 25 8; Jer 15 15, RV "reproach"), and of a few other words signifying reproach, etc. "Rebuke" (mūšār, lit. "correction," "chastisement") in Hos 5 2 has RVm "Heb 'rebuke.'" In the NT "to rebuke" is most often the tr of ἐπιτιμάω, epitimāō (Mt 8 26; 16 22; 17 18, etc); also in AV of ἐλέγχω, elégchō, always in RV rendered "reprove" (1 Tim 5 20; Tit 1 13; 2 15; He 12 5; Rev 3 19). Another word is ἐπιτίλλω (once, 1 Tim 5 1); "without rebuke" in Phil 2 15 is in RV "without blemish." On the other hand, RV has "rebuke" for several words in AV, as for "reprove" (2 K 19 4; Isa 37 4), "reproof" (Job 26 11; Prov 17 10), "charged" (Mk 10 48). In Isa 2 4; Mic 4 3, ERV has "reprove" for "rebuke," and in m "decide concerning," which is text in ARV. In Ecclus 11 7 we have the wise counsel: "Understand first, and then rebuke" (epitimāō).

RECAH, rê'ka (רֶכָּה, rēkhāh; B, Ρηκάβ, Rhēchāb, A, Ρηφά, Rhēphā; AV Rechah): In 1 Ch 4 12 certain persons are described as "the men of Rechah," but there is absolutely no information either about the place or its position.

RECEIPT, rê-sêv', OF CUSTOM. See CUSTOM.

RECEIVER, rê-sêv'ēr: Found in AV (Isa 33 18); but RV substitutes "he that weighed the tribute." The Heb is shōkēl, which means "one who weighs," "a weigher."

RECHAB, rê'kab, RECHABITES, rek'a-bīts (רֶכָּב, rēkhābh, רֶכָּבִים, rēkhābhīm): Rechab is the name of two men of some prominence in the OT records:

(1) A Benjamite of the town of Beeroth, son of Rimmon (2 S 4 2); he and his brother Baanah were "captains" of the military host of Ish-bosheth. On the death of Abner (2 S 3 30) the two brothers treacherously entered Ish-bosheth's house, when at noon he was resting and helpless, beheaded him, and escaped with the head to David at Hebron (4 6-8). They expected to receive reward and honor from David for the foul deed, which left him without a rival for the throne of all Israel. But the just and noble-minded king ordered their immediate execution (4 9-12), as in the case of the Amalekite, who asserted that he had killed Saul (2 S 1). For some reason the Beerothites left their own town and fled to Gittaim, another town in Benjamin, where they were still living when the Books of S were written (2 S 4 3).

(2) The more prominent of the men bearing this name was a KENITE (q.v.), a descendant of Ham-math (1 Ch 2 55). A part of the Kenite tribe joined the Israelites during the wilderness wanderings (Nu 10 29-32; Jgs 1 16; 4 17), becoming identified with the tribe of Judah, although Heber and Jael his wife were settled in Northern Pal (Jgs 4 17). Rechab was the ancestor or founder of a family, or order, in Israel known as the Rechabites, who at various times were conspicuous in the religious life of the nation. The most notable member of this family was Jehonadab (2 K 10 15 ff.23), or Jonadab, as he is called in Jer 35. Jehonadab was a zealous Jeh-worshipper and took part with Jehu in the extirpation of Baal-worship and the house of Ahab. He set for his descendants a vow of asceticism: that they should drink no wine, nor plant fields or vineyards, nor build nor live in houses throughout their generations (Jer 35 6,7). That must have been a singular feature in Palestinian life: the simple, nomadic life of this family from generation to generation in the midst of settled agricultural and industrial conditions! They followed this simple life in order to guard against the enervating tendencies of sensualism, and as a covenant of fidelity to Jeh, to whom they wholly devoted themselves when they joined themselves to Israel. Jeremiah used the Rechabites, who had been driven into Jerus by Nebuchadnezzar's investment of the land, as an object-lesson to covenant-breaking Judah. The Rechabites, hungry and thirsty, refused wine when it was set before them, because of the command of their ancestor Jonadab (Jer 35 8-10); but Judah refused to heed Jeh's commands or to keep His covenant (vs 14.15).

If the Rechab of Neh 3 14 is the same as this Kenite, then his descendant Malchijah, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerus, may have abandoned the vow of his ancestors, for he was "ruler of the district of Beth-haccherem" (i.e. "house of the vineyard").

LITERATURE

(1) NT usage.—In the last case, Mt 5 24, the word is not used in a doctrinal sense, though its use is very helpful in considering the

1. The force of the other terms. All the other instances are in Paul's Epp. (Rom 5 10; 1 Cor 7 11; 2 Cor 5 18-20, the vb.; Rom 5 11; 11 15; 2 Cor 5 18,19, the noun; Eph 2 16; Col 1 22, the compound). The word "reconcile" has a double meaning and usage, and the context must in each case determine how it is to be taken. The great doctrine is the reconciliation of God and men, but the question to be decided is whether it is God who is reconciled to men, or men who are reconciled to God, and different schools of theology emphasize one side or the other. The true view embraces both aspects. The word "to reconcile" means literally to exchange, to bring into a changed relationship. Some maintain that it is only a change in the sinner that is intended, a laying aside of his enmity, and coming into peaceful relations with God. But that manifestly does not exhaust the meaning, nor is it in the great Pauline passages the primary and dominant meaning.

(2) The OT usage does not materially help in the elucidation of the NT terms, for though the word occurs in a number of passages in AV, it is in RV generally changed to "atonement," which more accurately represents the Heb kāphar, which is generally rendered by "atonement," and by hīlaskomai or exilāskomai in the Gr. (In one passage of the NT [He 2 17], the phrase "to make reconciliation" represents the Gr hīlaskomai, and is better rendered in RV by "to make propitiation.") The making atonement or propitiation is the basis of the reconciliation, the means of its accomplishment, and the fact that the translators of AV sometimes rendered kāphar by "reconcile" shows that they understood reconciliation to have the Godward aspect. Whatever may be said of the nature of the atonement or propitiation in the old dispensation, it was something contemplated as appealing or satisfying, or at least in some way affecting God so as to make Him willing, or render it possible for Him, to enter into, or abide in, gracious relations with men. In one passage in the OT where "reconciliation" occurs (2 Ch 29 24) it represents a different Heb word, but here RV has changed it into "sin-offering," which is in harmony with the general meaning and usage of the Heb.

(3) Special passage in 1 S 29 4.—There is yet another Heb word rendered "reconcile" in 1 S 29 4, and inasmuch as this passage in the LXX has as the equivalent of the Heb the Gr word diállassō, it is of some importance in guiding to the NT meaning. On one occasion when the Philis gathered together to battle against Israel, David and his band of men accompanied Achish king of Gath to the muster-place. "The princes of the Philis" did not at all appreciate the presence of "these Hebrews," and although Achish testified in favor of David's fidelity, they were very indignant, and demanded that David and his men be sent back, "lest in the battle he become an adversary to us: for wherewith should this fellow reconcile himself unto his lord? should it not be with the heads of these men?" The Heb is rāçāh, which means "to be pleased with" or "to accept favorably," and the Hithpael form here used is "to make himself pleasing or acceptable," "to reconcile himself." But assuredly the Philistines' idea of David reconciling himself to Saul was not that he should lay aside his enmity against Saul, and so become friends with him. The enmity was on Saul's side, and the thought of the princes was that David by turning against them in the battle would gratify Saul, and lead him to lay aside his enmity against David.

(4) Usage in the Apocrypha.—It may be noted that in 2 Macc 5 20, katallagē is used evidently of the Godward side: "And the place which was forsaken in the wrath of the Almighty was, at the reconciliation of the great Sovereign, restored again with all glory." The vb. occurs in 2 Macc 1 5 when again the Godward side seems intended, though not perhaps so certainly: "May God . . . hearken to your supplications, and be reconciled with you," and in 7 33: "If for rebuke and chastening our living Lord has been angered a little while, yet shall he again be reconciled with his own servants," and 8 29: "They besought the merciful Lord to be wholly reconciled with his servants." In these two, esp. the last, it is unquestionably the laying aside of the Divine displeasure that is meant.

Before passing on to look at the great utterances in the Epp., we may now look at the non-doctrinal passage referred to at the beginning. There is, indeed, another non-doctrinal instance in 1 Cor 7 11, where the wife who has departed from her husband is enjoined either to "remain unmarried, or else be reconciled to her husband." But as it is indeterminate whether the wife or the husband is the offending party, and so which is the one to be influenced, the passage does not help us much. But Mt 5 24 is a very illuminating passage. Here as in the passage from 1 S, the word used is diállassō, but it is practically identified in meaning with katallássō. The injunction is given by Christ to the one who is at variance with his brother, not to complete his offering until first he has been reconciled to his brother. But the whole statement shows that it is not a question of the one who is offering the gift laying aside his enmity against his brother, but the reverse. Christ says, "If therefore thou art offering thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest [not that thou hast a grudge against thy brother but] that thy brother hath aught against thee"—the brother was the offended one, he is the one to be brought round—"leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way, first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." Plainly it means that he should do something to remove his brother's displeasure and so bring about a reconciliation.

2. Non-doctrinal Passage—Mt 5:24

(1) Rom 5.—Turning now to Rom 5, how stands the matter? Paul has been speaking of the blessed results of justification; one of these

3. Doctrinal results is the shedding abroad of the love of God in the heart. Then he dwells upon the manifestation of that love in the death of Christ, a love that was displayed to the loveless, and he argues that if in our sinful and unloving state we were embraced by the love of God, a fortiori that love will not be less now that it has already begun to take effect. If He loved us when we were under His condemnation sufficiently to give His Son to die for our salvation, much more shall His love bestow upon us the blessings secured by that death. "Much more then, being now justified by his blood, shall we be saved from the wrath of God through him" (5 9).

(a) The fact of Divine wrath: It is well to note, then, that there is "wrath" on the part of God against sin and sinners. One of the key-thoughts of the apostle in this ep. is that "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men" (1 18), and the coming day of judgment is "the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God" (2 5). And because of this stern fact, the gospel is a revelation not only of love, but specifically "a righteousness of God" (1 17). And he shows that the essence of the gospel is found in the propitiatory death of the Lord Jesus Christ (3 24.25.26), through whom alone can men who have been "brought under the judgment of God" (3 19) find justification, salvation, deliverance from the wrath of God (4 25; 5 1-6). Of course it is not necessary to add that the wrath of God is not to be thought of as having any unworthy or capricious element in it—it is the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin.

(b) Reconciliation, Godward, as well as manward: The apostle proceeds (ver 10): "For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved by his life." Now if, as many maintain, it is only the reconciliation on the manward side that is meant, that the manifested love led to the sinner laying aside his enmity, it would entirely reverse the apostle's argument. He is not arguing that if we have begun to love God we may reckon upon His doing so and so for us, but because He has done so much, we may expect Him to do more. The verse is parallel to the preceding, and the being reconciled is on the same plane as being justified; the being justified was God's action, and so is the reconciling. Justification delivers from "the wrath of God"; reconciliation takes effect upon enemies.

(c) The meaning of the word "enemies": The word "enemies" is important. By those who take the manward aspect of reconciliation as the only one, it is held that the word must be taken actively—those who hate God. But the passive meaning, "hatred of God," seems far the preferable, and is indeed demanded by the context. Paul uses the vb. echthroi, "enemies," in Rom 11 28, in antithesis to "beloved" of God, and that is the consistent sense here. The enemies are those who are the objects of the wrath of the previous verse. And when we were thus hated of God, the objects of His just displeasure on account of our sin, "we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son." God laid aside His enmity, and in the propitiatory death of Christ showed Himself willing to receive us into His favor.

(d) The manward side: By this propitiation, therefore, the barrier was removed, and, God having assumed a gracious attitude toward the sinner, it is possible for the sinner now, influenced by His love, to come into a friendly relationship with God. And so in the second phrase, the two meanings, the Godward and the manward, may coalesce: "being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." The reconciliation becomes mutual, for there is no kind of doubt that sinners are enemies to God in the active sense, and require to lay aside their hostility, and so be reconciled to Him. But the first step is with God, and the reconciliation which took place in the death of His Son could only be the Godward reconciliation, since at that time men were still uninfluenced by His love. But, perhaps, just because that first reconciliation is brought about through the Divine love which provides the propitiation, the apostle avoids saying "God is reconciled," but uses the more indirect form of speech. The manward aspect is emphasized in the next verse, although the Godward is not lost sight of: "We also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received the reconciliation" (5 11). It is therefore something that comes from God and does not proceed from

man. God is the first mover; He makes the reconciliation as already indicated, and then the fruit of it is imputed to the believing sinner, and the very fact that our receiving the reconciliation, or being brought into a state of reconciliation, follows the being reconciled of ver 10, shows that the other is Divine reconciliation as the basis of the human.

(2) 2 Cor 5 18-20.—(a) The Godward aspect primary: In the same way the great passage in 2 Cor 5 18-20 cannot be understood apart from the conception that there is a reconciliation on the Divine side. There is unquestionably reference to the human side of the matter as well, but, as in Rom, the Godward aspect is primary and dominating: "All things are of God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation." It might be possible to argue from AV that this describes the process going on under gospel influences, men being brought into gracious relations with God, but the aorist of the Gr rightly rendered by RV, "who reconciled us to himself," points back to the historic time when the transaction took place. It cannot be simply the surrender of the sinner to God that is meant, though that comes as a consequence; it is a work that proceeds from God, is accomplished by God, and because of the accomplishment of that work it is possible for a ministry of reconciliation to be intrusted to men. To make this mean the human aspect of the reconciliation, it would be necessary unduly to confine it to the reconciliation of Paul and his fellow-workers, though even then it would be a straining of language, for there is the other historic act described, "and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation." The plain meaning is that through Jesus Christ, God established the basis of agreement, removed the barrier to the sinner's approach to Himself, accomplished the work of propitiation, and, having done so, He intrusts His servants with the ministry of reconciliation, a ministry which, basing itself upon the great propitiatory, reconciling work of Christ, is directed toward men, seeking to remove their enmity, to influence them in their turn to be reconciled with God. This is more clearly set forth in the verse which follows, which in explaining the ministry of reconciliation says: "To wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses." Here there can be no question that the historic Incarnation is meant, and the reconciling of the world can be nothing other than the objective work of atonement culminating in the cross. And in that transaction there can be no thought of the sinner laying aside his hostility to God; it is God in Christ so dealing with sin that the doom lying upon the guilty is canceled, the wrath is averted, propitiation is made.

(b) The manward side also prominent: God, in a word, enters into gracious relations with a world of sinners, becomes reconciled to man. This being done, gracious influences can be brought to bear upon man, the chief of which is the consideration of this stupendous fact of grace, that God has in Christ dealt with the question of sin. This is the substance of the "word of reconciliation" which is preached by the apostle. So he continues, "We are ambassadors therefore on behalf of Christ, as though God were entreating by us: we beseech you on behalf of Christ, be ye reconciled to God." Here is the human side. The great matter now is to get the sinner to lay aside his enmity, to respond to the gracious overtures of the gospel, to come into harmony with God. But that is only possible because the reconciliation in the Godward aspect has already been accomplished. If the first reconciliation, "the reconciliation of the world unto himself," had been the laying aside of human enmity, there could now be no point in the exhortation, "Be ye reconciled to God."

(3) Eph 2 16.—The two passages where the compound word occurs are in complete harmony with this interpretation. Eph 2 16: "And might reconcile them both [Jew and Gentile] in one body unto God through the cross, having slain the enmity thereby," is the outcome of Christ "making peace" (2 15), and the reconciling work is effected through the cross, reconciliation both Godward and manward, and, having made peace, it is possible for Christ to come and preach peace to them that are far off—far off even though the reconciling work of the cross has been accomplished.

(4) Col 1 20-22.—So in Col 1 20, "And through him to reconcile all things unto himself, having made peace through the blood of his cross; through him, I say, whether things upon the earth, or things in the heavens." Here the thought of the apostle trembles away into infinity, and there seems a parallel to the thought of He 9 23, that according to the typical teaching even "the things in the heavens" in some way stood in need of cleansing. May it be that the work of Christ in some sense affected the angelic intelligence, making it possible for harmony to be restored between redeemed sinners and the perfect creation of God? In any case, the reconciling all things unto Himself is not the laying aside of the creaturely hostility, but the determining of the Divine attitude. Then comes the specific reference to the human side, "And you, being in time past alienated and enemies in your mind in your evil works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh through death"; there, as in Rom, the two phases coalescing, God appearing gracious through the work of Christ, sinners coming into gracious relation with Him. "Having made peace through the blood of his cross," the ground of peace has been established. Christ has done something by His death which makes it possible to offer peace to men. God has laid aside His holy opposition to the sinner, and shows Himself willing to bring men into peace with Himself. He has found satisfaction in that great work of His Son, has been reconciled, and now calls upon men to be reconciled to Him—to receive the reconciliation. See ATONEMENT; PROPITIATION; WRATH.

RECORD, rek'ord, rek'órd: (1) The Eng. word, where it occurs in the OT and the NT in the sense of testimony, is tr^d in RV "witness" (Dt 30 19; 31 28; Jn 1 19.32; 8 13.14; Rom 10 2, etc.). See WITNESS. But in Job 16 19 for AV "my record," RV has "he that voucheth for me." (2) In Ezr 4 15; 6 2 (dokhrân, dikhrôn), and Est 6 1 (zikkârôn), the word denotes Pers state chronicles; cf 1 Macc 14 23; 2 Macc 2 1.

RECORDER, rê-kór'dér (מִזְכִּיר, mazkîr; RVm "chronicler"): A high functionary in the court of the Jewish kings, part of whose duty seems to have been to chronicle the events of the reign, but who also occupied a position corresponding with that of the modern vizier (2 S 8 16; 20 24; 1 Ch 18 15, etc.). His high rank is shown by the facts that, with other officers, he represented Hezekiah in speaking with Rabshakeh (2 K 18 18), and, in the reign of Josiah, superintended the repairs of the temple (2 Ch 34 8).

RECOVER, rê-kuv'ér: "Recover" has (1) the transitive meaning of "to retake" or "regain" (anything); and (2) the intransitive sense of "to regain health" or "become well." In Jth 14 7 it means "restore to consciousness." In the former sense it is in the OT the tr of נָצַף, nāçal, "to snatch away" (Jgs 11 26; 1 S 30 8.22; in Hos 2 9, RV "pluck away"); also of שָׁבַח, shābh (Kal and Hiph. 1 S 30 19 AV; 2 S 8 3, etc), and of various other words in single instances. In 2 K 5 3.6.7.11, "to restore to health" is נָשַׁף, 'āshaph. In its intransitive sense "recover" is chiefly the tr of הָיָאָה, hāyāh, "to live," "revive" (2 K 1 2, etc.; Isa 38 9.21). "Recover" appears only twice in AV of the NT; Mk 16 18 (for kalōs hēxousin) and 2 Tim 2 26 (from ananē-phō, RVm "Gr 'return to soberness'"); but RV has "recover" for "do well" in Jn 11 12 (sōthēsetai; m "Gr 'be saved'"). "Recovering" (of sight) (anablepsis) occurs in Lk 4 18. W. L. WALKER

The Heb name yam-sūph has given rise to much controversy. Yam is the general word for sea, and when standing alone may refer to the Mediterranean, the Dead Sea, the Red Sea, or the Sea of Galilee. In several places it designates the river Nile or Euphrates. Sūph means a rush or seaweed such as abounds in the lower portions of the Nile and the upper portions of the Red Sea. It was in the sūph on the brink of the river that the ark of Moses was hidden (Ex 2 3.5). But as this word does not in itself mean red, and as that is not the color of the bulrush, authorities are much divided as to the reason for this designation. Some have supposed that it was called red from the appearance of the mountains on the western coast, others from the red color given to the water by the presence of zoöphytes, or red coral, or some species of seaweed. Others still, with considerable probability, suppose that the name originated in the red or copper color of the inhabitants of the bordering Arabian peninsula. But the name yam-sūph, though applied to the whole sea, was esp. used with reference to the northern part, which is alone mentioned in the Bible, and to the two gulfs (Suez and Akabah) which border the Sinaitic Peninsula, esp. the Gulf of Suez.

The Red Sea has a length of 1,350 miles and an extreme breadth of 205 miles. It is remarkable that while it has no rivers flowing into it and the evaporation from its surface is enormous, it is not much saltier than the ocean, from which it is inferred that there must be a constant influx of water from the Indian Ocean through the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, together with an outflow of the more saline water beneath the surface. The deepest portion measures 1,200 fathoms. Owing to the lower land levels which prevailed in recent geological times, the Gulf of Suez formerly extended across the lowland which separates it from the Bitter Lakes, a distance of 15 or 20 miles now traversed by the Suez Canal, which encountered no elevation more than 30 ft. above tide. The deepest portion measures 1,200 fathoms. Owing to the lower land levels which prevailed in recent geological times, the Gulf of Suez formerly extended across the lowland which separates it from the Bitter Lakes, a distance of 15 or 20 miles now traversed by the Suez Canal, which encountered no elevation more than 30 ft. above tide. In early historic times the Gulf ended at Ismailia at the head of Lake Timsah. North of this the land rises to a height of more than 50 ft. and for a long time furnished a road leading from Africa into Asia. At a somewhat earlier geological (middle and late Tertiary) period the depression of the land was such that this bridge was also submerged, so that the Red Sea and the Mediterranean were connected by a broad expanse of water which overflowed the whole surface of Lower Egypt.

The evidence of the more recent depression of the land surface in all Lower Egypt is unmistakable. Raised beaches containing shells and corals still living in the Red Sea are found at various levels up to more than 200 ft. above tide. One of the most interesting of these is to be seen near the summit of the "Crow's Nest," a half-mile S. of the great pyramids, where, near the summit of the eminence, and approximately 200 ft. above tide, on a level with the base of the pyramids, there is a clearly defined recent sea beach composed of water-worn pebbles from 1 in. to 1 or 2 ft. in diameter, the interstices of which are filled with small shells loosely cemented together. These are identified as belonging to a variable form, Alectryonia cucullata Born, which lives at the present time in the Red Sea. On the opposite side of the river, on the Mokattam Hills S. of Cairo, at an elevation of 220 ft. above tide, similar deposits are found containing numerous shells of recent date, while the rock face is penetrated by numerous borings of lithodromus mollusks (Pholades rugosa Broc.). Other evidences of the recent general depression of the land in this region come from various places on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean. According to Lartet at Ramleh, near Jaffa, a recent beach occurs more than 200 ft. above sea-level containing many shells of Pectunculus violascens Lamk, which is at the present time the most abundant mollusk on the shore of the adjoining Mediterranean. A similar beach has been described by Dr. Post at Lattakia, about 30 miles N. of Beirut; while others, according to Hull, occur upon the island of Cyprus. Further evidence of this depression is also seen in the fact that the isthmus between Suez and the Bitter Lakes is covered with recent deposits of Nile mud, holding modern Red Sea shells, showing that, at no very distant date, there was an overflow of the Nile through an eastern branch into this slightly depressed level. The line of this branch of the Nile overflow was in early times used for a canal, which has recently been opened to furnish fresh water to Suez, and the depression is followed by the railroad. According to Dawson, large surfaces of the desert N. of Suez, which are now above sea-level, contain buried in the sand "recent marine shells in such a state of preservation that not many centuries may have elapsed since they were in the bottom of the sea" (Egypt and Syria, 67).

The Red Sea is connected with the children of Israel chiefly through the crossing of it recorded in Ex (see 4, below); but there are a few references to it in later times. Solomon is said (1 K 9 26) to have built a navy at "Ezion-geber, which is beside Eloth," on the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom. This is at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, the eastern branch of the Red Sea. Here his ships were manned by Hiram king of Tyre with "shipmen that had knowledge of the sea" (ver 27). And (ver 28) "they came to Ophir, and fetched from thence gold." But Eloth was evidently lost to Israel when Edom successfully revolted in the time of Joram (2 K 8 20). For a short time, however, it was restored to Judah by Amaziah (2 K 14 22); but finally, during the reign of Ahaz, the Syrians, or more probably, according to another reading, the Edomites, recovered the place and permanently drove the Jews away. But in 1 K 22 48 Jehoshaphat is said to have "made ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir for gold: but they went not; for the ships were broken at Ezion-geber"; while in 2 Ch 20 36 Jehoshaphat is said to have joined with Ahaziah "to make ships to go to Tarshish; and they made the ships in Ezion-geber."

Unless there is some textual confusion here, "ships of Tarshish" is simply the name of the style of the ship, like "East Indiaman," and Tarshish in Ch may refer to some place in the East Indies. This is the more likely, since Solomon's "navy" that went to Tarshish once every 3 years came "bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks," which could hardly have come from any other place than India. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 1, (2).

Until in recent times it was discovered that the Gulf of Suez formerly extended 30 miles northward to the site of the present Ismailia and

4. Passage of, by Israelites the ancient Pithom, the scene of the Bib. miracle was placed at Suez, the present head of the Gulf. But there is at Suez no extent of shoal water sufficient for the east wind mentioned in Scripture (Ex 14 21) to have opened a passage-way sufficiently wide to have permitted the host to have crossed over in a single night. The bar leading from Suez across, which is now sometimes forded, is too insignificant to have furnished a passage-way as Robinson supposed (BE, I, 56-59). Besides, if the children of Israel were S. of the Bitter Lakes when there was no extension of the Gulf N. of its present limits, there would have been no need of a miracle to open the water, since there was abundant room for both them and Pharaoh's army to have gone around the northern end of the Gulf to reach the eastern shore, while S. of Suez the water is too deep for the wind anywhere to have opened a passage-way. But with an extension of the waters of the Gulf to the Bitter Lakes and Lake Timsah, rendered probable by the facts cited in the previous paragraph, the narrative at once so perfectly accords with the physical conditions involved as to become not only easily credible, but self-evidencing.

The children of Israel were at Rameses (Ex 12 37) in the land of Goshen, a place which has not been certainly identified, but could not have been far from the modern Zagazig at the head of the Fresh Water Canal leading from the Nile to the Bitter Lakes. One day's journey eastward along Wady Tumilat, watered by this canal, brought them to Succoth, a station probably identical with Thuket, close upon the border line separating Egypt from Asia. Through the discoveries of Naville in 1883 this has been identified as Pithom, one of the store-cities built by Pharaoh during the period of Heb oppression (Ex 1 11). Here Naville uncovered vast store pits for holding grain built during the reign of Rameses II and constructed according to the description given in Ex 1: the lower portions of brick made with straw, the middle with stubble, and the top of simple clay without even stubble to hold the brick together (see Naville, "The Store-City Pithom and the Route of the Exodus," Egypt Exploration Fund, 1885; M. G. Kyle, "A Re-examination of Naville's Works," Records of the Past, VIII, 1901, 304-7). The next day's journey brought them to Etham on the "edge of the wilderness" (Ex 13 20; Nu 33 6), probably in the vicinity of the modern Ismailia at the head of Lake Timsah. From this point the natural road to Pal would have been along the caravan route on the neck of land referred to above as now about 50 ft. above sea-level. Etham was about 30 miles S.E. of Zoan or Tanis, the headquarters at that time of Pharaoh, from which he was watching the movements of the host. If they should go on the direct road to Pal, his army could easily execute a flank movement and intercept them in the desert of Etham. But by Divine command (Ex 14 2) Moses turned southward on the west side of the extension of the Red Sea and camped "before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon" (Ex 14 2; Nu 33 5-7). At this change of course Pharaoh was delighted, seeing that the children of Israel were "entangled in the land" and "the wilderness" had "shut them in." Instead of issuing a flank movement upon them, Pharaoh's army now followed them in the rear and overtook them encamping by the sea, beside Pi-hahiroth, the location of which is essential to a proper understanding of the narrative which follows.

In ver 2 Pi-hahiroth is said to be "between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon." Now though Migdol originally meant "watch-tower," it is hardly supposable that this can be its meaning here, otherwise the children of Israel would have been moving directly toward a fortified place. Most probably, therefore, Migdol was the tower-like mountain peak marking the northeast corner of Jebel Geneffeh, which runs parallel with the Bitter Lakes, only a short distance from their western border. Baal-zephon may equally well be some of the mountain peaks on the border of the Wilderness of Paran opposite Chelooif, midway between the Bitter Lakes and Suez. In the clear atmosphere of the region this line of mountains is distinctly visible throughout the whole distance from Ismailia to Suez. There would seem to be no objection to this supposition, since all authorities are in disagreement concerning its location. From the significance of the name it would seem to be the seat of some form of Baal worship, naturally a mountain. Brugsch would identify it with Mt. Cassius on the northern shore of Egypt. Naville (see Murray's Illustrated Bible Dict., "Red Sea, Passage of") would connect it with the hill called Tássám E. of Lake Timsah, where there is a shrine at the present day visited every year about July 14 by thousands of pilgrims to celebrate a religious festival; but, as this is a Mohammedan festival, there seems no reason to connect it with any sanctuary of the Canaanites. Dawson favors the general location which we have assigned to Pi-hahiroth, but would place it beside the narrow southern portion of the Bitter Lakes.

Somewhere in this vicinity would be a most natural place for the children of Israel to halt, and there is no difficulty, such as Naville supposes, to their passing between Jebel Geneffeh and the Bitter Lakes; for the mountain does not come abruptly to the lake, but leaves ample space for the passage of a caravan, while the mountain on one side and the lake on the other would protect them from a flank movement by Pharaoh and limit his army to harassing the rear of the Israelitish host. Protected thus, the Israelites found a wide plain over which they could spread their camp, and if we suppose them to be as far S. as Chelooft, every condition would be found to suit the narrative which follows. Moses was told by the Lord that if he would order the children of Israel to go forward, the sea would be divided and the children of Israel could cross over on dry ground. And when, in compliance with the Divine command, Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, "Jeh caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all the night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left. And the Egyptians pursued, and went in after them into the midst of the sea, all Pharaoh's horses, his chariots, and his horsemen" (Ex 14 21-30). But when the children of Israel were safely on the other side the waters returned and overwhelmed the entire host of Pharaoh. In the Song of Moses which follows, describing the event, it is said that the waters were piled up by the "blast of thy [God's] nostrils" (Ex 15 8), and again, ver 10, "Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them." Thus 3 t the wind is mentioned as the means employed by God in opening the water. The competency of the wind temporarily to remove the water from the passage connecting the Gulf of Suez with the Bitter Lakes, provided it was only a few feet deep, is amply proved by facts of recent observation. Major General Tullock of the British army (Proc. Victoria Inst., XXVIII, 267-80) reports having witnessed the driving off of the water from Lake Menzaleh by the wind to such an extent as to lower the level 6 ft., thus leaving small vessels over the shallow water stranded for a while in the muddy bottom. According to the report of the Suez Canal Co., the difference between the highest and the lowest water at Suez is 10 ft. 7 in., all of which must be due to the effect of the wind, since the tides do not affect the Red Sea. The power of the wind to affect water levels is strikingly witnessed upon Lake Erie in the United States, where according to the report of the Deep Waterways Commission for 1896 (165, 168) it appears that strong wind from the S.W. sometimes lowers the water at Toledo, Ohio, on the western end of the lake to the extent of more than 7 ft., at the same time causing it to rise at Buffalo at the eastern end a similar amount; while a change in the wind during the passage of a single storm reverses the effect, thus sometimes producing a change of level at either end of the lake of 14 ft. in the course of a single day. It would require far less than a tornado to lower the water at Chelooft sufficiently to lay bare the shallow channel which we have supposed at that time to separate Egypt from the Sinaitic Peninsula. See EXODUS, THE.

Several objections to this theory, however, have been urged which should not pass without notice. (1) Some have said that the children of Israel would have found an insuperable obstacle to their advance in the steep banks on either side of the supposed channel. But there were no steep banks to be encountered. A gentle sag leads down on one side to the center of the depression and a correspondingly gentle rise leads up on the other. (2) Much has also been made of the statement (Ex 14 22) that "the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left"; but when we consider the rhetorical use of this word "wall" it presents no difficulty. In Prov 18 11 we are told that "The rich man's wealth is his strong city, And as a high wall in his own imagination." In Isa 26 1 we are told that God will appoint salvation "for walls and bulwarks." Again Nahum (3 8) says of Egypt that her "rampart was the sea [in "the Nile"], and her wall was of the sea." The water upon either side of the opening served the purpose of a wall for protection. There was no chance for Pharaoh to intercept them by a flank movement. Nor is there need of paying further attention to the poetical expressions in the Song of Moses, where among other things it is said "that the deeps were congealed in the heart of the sea," and that the "earth [instead of the water] swallowed them." (3) Again it is objected that an east wind does not come from the right direction to produce the desired result. On the other hand it is an east wind only which could have freed the channel from water. A north wind would have blown the water from the Bitter Lakes southward, and owing to the quantity of water impounded would have increased the depth of the water in the narrow passage from the southern end of Suez. An east wind, however, would have pressed the water out from the channel both ways, and from the contour of the shore lines would be the only wind that could have done so. (4) Again, it is objected that this explanation destroys the miraculous character of the event. But it should be noted that little is said in the narrative about the miraculous. On the other hand, it is a straightforward statement of events, leaving their miraculous character to be inferred from their nature. On the explanation we have given the transaction it is what Robinson felicitously calls a mediate miracle, that is, a miracle in which the hand of God is seen in the use of natural forces which it would be impossible for man to command. If anyone should say that this was a mere coincidence, that the east wind blew at the precise time that Moses reached the place of crossing, the answer is that such a coincidence could have been brought about only by supernatural agency. There was at that time no weather bureau to foretell the approach of a storm. There are no tides on the Red Sea with regular ebb and flow. It was by a miracle of prophecy that Moses was emboldened to get his host into position to avail themselves of the temporary opportunity at exactly the right time. As to the relation of the Divine agency to the event, speculation is useless. The opening of the sea may have been a foreordained event in the course of Nature which God only foreknew, in which case the direct Divine agency was limited to those influences upon the human actors that led them to place themselves where they could take advantage of the natural opportunity. Or, there is no a priori difficulty in supposing that the east wind was directly aroused for this occasion; for man himself produces disturbances among the forces of Nature that are as far-reaching in their extent as would be a storm produced by direct Divine agency. But in this case the disturbance is at once seen to be beyond the powers of human agency to produce.

It remains to add an important word concerning the evidential value of this perfect adjustment of the narrative to the physical conditions involved. So perfect is this conformity of the narrative to the obscure physical conditions involved, which only recent investigations have made clear, that the account becomes self-evidencing. It is not within the power of man to invent a story so perfectly in accordance with the vast and complicated conditions involved. The argument is as strong as that for human design when a key is found to fit a Yale lock. This is not a general account which would fit into a variety of circumstances. There is only one place in all the world, and one set of conditions in all history, which would meet the requirements; and here they are all met. This is scientific demonstration. No higher proof can be found in the inductive sciences. The story is true. It has not been remodeled by the imagination, either of the original writers or of the transcribers. It is not the product of mythological fancy or of legendary accretion.

LITERATURE

The idea of redemption in the OT takes its start from the thought of property (Lev 25 26; Ruth 4 4 ff). Money is paid according to law to buy back something which must be delivered or rescued (Nu 3 51; Neh 5 8). From this start the word "redemption" throughout the OT is used in the general sense of deliverance. God is the Redeemer of Israel in the sense that He is the Deliverer of Israel (Dt 9 26; 2 S 7 23; 1 Ch 17 21; Isa 52 3). The idea of deliverance includes deliverance from all forms of evil lot, from national misfortune (Isa 52 9; 63 9; cf Lk 2 38), or from plague (Ps 78 35,52), or from calamity of any sort (Gen 48 16; Nu 25 4,9). Of course, the general thought of the relation of Israel to God was that God had both a claim upon Israel (Dt 15 15) and an obligation toward Israel (1 Ch 17 21; Ps 25 22). Israel belonged to Him, and it was by His own right that He could move into the life of Israel so as to redeem Israel. On the other hand, obligation was upon Him to redeem Israel.

In the NT the idea of redemption has more a suggestion of ransom. Men are held under the curse of the law (Gal 3 13), or of sin itself (Rom 7 23 f). The Redeemer purchases their deliverance by offering Himself as payment for their redemption (Eph 1 7; 1 Pet 1 18).

Throughout both the OT and the NT there is to be observed a gradual moralizing of the meaning of redemption. The same process of

1. Gradual Moralizing of Idea all the Christian ages. Starting with the idea of redemption price, conceived almost in material terms, religious thought has advanced to conceptions entirely moral and spiritual. Through the Scriptures, too, the idea of redemption becomes more specific with the progress of Christian revelation. In the beginning

God is the Redeemer from distresses of all kinds. He redeems from calamity and from sorrows. This general idea, of course, persists throughout the revelation and enters largely into our thinking of today, but the growing moral discernment of the Bib. writers comes to attach more and more importance to sin as the chief disturber of man's welfare. We would not minimize the force of the Scriptural idea that God is the Deliverer from all misfortune to which man falls heir, but the Scriptural emphasis moves more and more to deliverance from sin. Paul states this deliverance as a deliverance from the law which brings sin out into expression, but we must not conceive his idea in any artificial fashion. He would have men delivered not only from the law, but also from the consequences of evil doing and from the spirit of evil itself (Rom 8 2).

In trying to discern the meaning of redemption from sin, toward which the entire progress of Bib. and Christian thought points, we may

2. Redemption as Life in Individual well keep in mind the Master's words that He came that men might have life and might have it more abundantly (Jn 10 10). The word "life" seems to be the final NT word as a statement of the purpose of Christ. God sent His Son to bring men to life. The word "life," however, is indefinite. Life means more at one period of the world's history than at another. It has the advantage, nevertheless, of always being entirely intelligible in its essential significance. Our aim must be to keep this essential significance in mind and at the same time to provide for an increasing fullness and enlargement of human capacity and endeavor. The aim of redemption can only be to bring men to the fullest use and enjoyment of their powers. This is really the conception implicit even in the earliest statements of redemption. The man redeemed by money payment comes out of the prison to the light of day, or he comes out of slavery into freedom, or he is restored to his home and friends. The man under the law is redeemed from the burden and curse of the law. Paul speaks of his experience under the law as the experience of one chained to a dead body (Rom 7 24). Of course, relief from such bondage would mean life. In the more spiritual passages of the NT, the evil in men's hearts is like a blight which paralyzes their higher activities (Jn 8 33-51).

In all redemption, as conceived of in Christian terms, there is a double element. There is first the deliverance as from a curse. Something binds a man or weights him down; redemption relieves him from this load. On the other hand, there is the positive movement of the soul thus relieved toward larger and fuller life. We have said that the Bib. emphasis is always upon deliverance from sin as the essential in redemption, but this deliverance is so essential that the life cannot progress in any of its normal activities until it is redeemed from evil. Accordingly in the Scriptural thought all manner of blessings follow deliverance. The man who seeks first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness finds all other things added unto him (Mt 6 33). Material, intellectual and social blessings follow as matters of course from the redemption of the inner spirit from evil. The aim of redemption, to beget in men's hearts the will to do right, once fulfilled, leads men to seek successfully along all possible avenues for life. This, of course, does not mean that the redeemed life gives itself up to the cultivation of itself toward higher excellencies. It means that the redeemed life is delivered from every form of selfishness. In the unselfish seeking of life for others the redeemed life finds its own greatest achievement and happiness (Mt 16 25).

Just as the idea of redemption concerned itself chiefly with the inner spirit, so also it concerns itself with the individual as the object of redemption. But as the redemption of the inner spirit leads to freedom in all realms of life, so also the redemption of the individual leads to large social transformations. It is impossible to strike out of the Scriptures the idea of a redeemed humanity. But humanity is not conceived of in general or class terms. The object of redemption is not humanity, or mankind, or the masses. The object of redemption is rather men set in relation to each other as members of a family. But it would do violence to the Scriptural conception to conceive of the individual's relations in any narrow or restricted fashion (1 Cor 12 12-27).

An important enlargement of the idea of redemption in our own time has come as men have conceived of the redemption of individuals in their social relationships. Very often men have thought of redemption as a snatching of individuals from the perils of a world in itself absolutely wicked. Even the material environment of men has at times been regarded as containing something inherently evil. The thought of redemption which seems most in line with Scriptural interpretation would seem to be that which brings the material and social forces within reach of individual wills. Paul speaks of the whole creation groaning and travailing in pain waiting for the revelation of the sons of God (Rom 8 22). This graphic figure sets before us the essentially Christian conception of the redemption of the forces in the midst of which men are placed. Those redeemed for the largest life, by the very force of their life, will seize all powers of this world to make them the servants of Divine purposes. The seer saw a great multitude which no man could number, of every kindred and nation and tongue, shouting the joys of salvation (Rev 7 9), yet the implication nowhere appears that these were redeemed in any other fashion than by surrendering themselves to the forces of righteousness.

We have said that the aim of redemption is to bring men to the largest and fullest life. We have also said that "life" is a general term. To keep close to the Scriptural conceptions we would best say that the aim of redemption is to make men like Christ (Rom 8 9). Otherwise, it might be possible to use the word "life" so as to imply that the riotous exercise of the faculties is what we mean by redemption. The idea of redemption, as a matter of fact, has been thus interpreted in various times in the history of Christian thinking. Life has been looked upon as sheer quantitative exuberance—the lower pleasures of sense being reckoned as about on the same plane with the higher. We can see the moral and spiritual anarchy which would thus be brought about. In Christ's words to His disciples He once used the expression, "Ye are clean because of the word which I have spoken unto you" (Jn 15 3). In this particular context the idea does not seem to be that of an external washing. Christ seems rather to mean that His disciples are cleansed as a vineyard is cleansed by pruning away some of the branches that others may bear fruit. In other words, the redemption of life is to be interpreted so that stress is laid upon the qualitative rather than the quantitative. Christ indeed found place in His instructions and in His own life for the normal and healthy activities of human existence. He was not an ascetic; He went to feasts and to weddings, but His emphasis was always upon life conceived of in the highest terms. We can say then that the aim of redemption is to beget in men life like that in Christ.

Moreover, redemption must not be conceived of in such fashion as to do away with the need of response upon the part of the individual will. The literal suggestion of ransom has to do with paying a price for a man's deliverance, whether the man is willing to be delivered or not. Of course, the assumption in the mind of the Bib. writers was that any man in prison or in slavery or in sickness would be overjoyed at being redeemed; but in dealing with men whose lives are set toward sin we cannot always make this assumption. The dreadfulness of sin is largely in the love of sinning which sinning begets. Some thinkers have interpreted redemption to mean almost a seizing of men without regard to their own will. It is very easy to see how this conception arises. A man who himself hates sin may not stop to realize that some other men love sin. Redemption, to mean anything, must touch this inner attitude of will. We cannot then hold to any idea of redemption which brings men under a cleansing process without the assent of their own wills. If we keep ourselves alive to the growing moral discernment which moves through the Scriptures, we must lay stress always upon redemption as a moral process. Not only must we say that the aim of redemption is to make men like Christ, but we must say also that the method of redemption must be the method of Christ, the method of appealing to the moral will. There is no Scriptural warrant for the idea that men are redeemed by fiat. The most we can get from the words of Christ is a statement of the persistence of God in His search for the lost: '[He goeth] after that which is lost, until he finds it' (Lk 15 4). Some would interpret these words to mean that the process of redemption continues until every man is brought into the kingdom. We cannot, in the light of the NT, limit the redeeming love of God; but we cannot, on the other hand, take passages from figurative expressions in such sense as to limit the freedom of men. The redemption must be conceived of as respecting the moral choices of men. In our thought of the Divine search for the control of inner human motive we must not stop short of the idea of men redeemed to the love of righteousness on its own account. This would do away with the plan of redeeming men by merely relieving them of the consequences of their sins. Out of a changed life, of course, there must come changed consequences. But the Scriptural teaching is that the emphasis in redemption is always moral, the turning to life because of what life is.

Having thus attempted to determine, at least in outline, the content of the Christian idea of redemption, it remains for us to point out some implications as to the work of the Redeemer. Throughout the entire teaching on redemption in the Scriptures, redemption is set before us primarily as God's own affair (Jn 3 16). God redeems His people; He redeems them out of love for them. But the love of God is not to be conceived of as mere indulgence, partiality, or good-humored affection. The love of God rests down upon moral foundations. Throughout the Scriptures, therefore, we find implied often, if not always clearly stated, the idea that God is under obligations to redeem His people. The progress of later thinking has expanded this implication with sureness of moral discernment. We have come to see the obligations of power. The more powerful the man the heavier his obligations in the discharge of this power. This is a genuinely Christian conception, and this Christian conception we apply to the character of God, feeling confident that we are in line with Scriptural teaching. Hence we may put the obligations of God somewhat as follows: God is the most obligated being in the universe. If a man is under heavy obligations to use aright the power of controlling the forces already at work in the world, how much heavier must be the obligations on the Creator who started these forces! The obligation becomes appalling to our human thought when we think that creation includes the calling of human beings into existence and endowing them with the unsolicited boon of freedom. Men are not in the world of their own choice. Vast masses of them seem to be here as the outworking of impulses almost blind. The surroundings of men make it very easy for them to sin. The tendencies which at least seem to be innate are too often tragically inclined toward evil. Men seem, of themselves, utterly inadequate for their own redemption. If there is to be redemption it must come from God, and the Christian thought of a moral God would seem to include the obligation on the part of God to redeem those whom He has sent into the world. Christ has made clear forever the absolutely binding nature of moral considerations. If the obligation to redeem men meant everything to Christ, it must also mean everything to the God of Christ. So we feel in line with true Christian thinking in the doctrine that redemption comes first as a discharge of the obligations on the part of God Himself.

If we look for the common thought in all the Christian statements of God's part in redemption we find it in this: that in all these statements God is conceived of as doing all that He can do for the redemption of man. If in earlier times men conceived of the human race as under the dominion of Satan, and of Satan as robbed of his due by the deliverance of man and therefore entitled to some compensation, they also conceived of God Himself as paying the ransom to Satan. If they thought of God as a feudal lord whose dignity had been offended by sin, they thought of God as Himself paying the cost due to offended dignity. If their idea was that a substitute for sinners must be furnished, the idea included the thought of God as Himself providing a substitute. If they conceived of the universe as a vast system of moral laws—broken by sin—whose dignity must be upheld, they thought of God Himself as providing the means for maintaining the dignity of the laws. If they conceived of men as saved by a vast moral influence set at work, they thought of this influence as proceeding, not from man, but from God. The common thought in theories of redemption then, so far as concerns God's part, is that God Himself takes the initiative and does all He can in the discharge of the obligation upon Himself. Each phrasing of the doctrine of redemption is the attempt of an age of Christian thinking to say in its own way that God has done all that He can do for men.

It is from this standpoint that we must approach the part played by Christ in redemption. This is not the place for an attempt at formal statement, but some elements of Christian teaching are, at least in outline, at once clear. The question is, first, to provide some relation between God and Christ which will make the redemptive work of Christ really effective. Some have thought to find such a statement in the conception that Christ is a prophet. They would empty the expression, "Son of God," of any unique meaning; they would make Christ the Son of God in the same sense that any great prophet could be conceived of as a son of God. Of course, we would not minimize the teaching of the Scripture as to the full humanity of Christ, and yet we may be permitted to voice our belief that the representation of Christ as the Redeemer merely in the same sense in which a prophet is a redeemer does not do justice to the Scripture teaching; and we feel, too, that such a solution of the problem of Christ would be inadequate for the practical task of redemption. If Christ is just a prophet giving us His teaching we rejoice in the teaching, but we are confronted with the problem as to how to make the teaching effective. If it be urged that Christ is a prophet who in Himself realized the moral ideal, we feel constrained to reply that this really puts Christ at a vast distance from us. Such a doctrine of Christ's person would make Him the supreme religious genius, but the human genius stands apart from the ordinary mass of men. He may gather up into Himself and realize the ideals of men; He may voice the aspirations of men and realize those aspirations; but He may not be able to make men like unto Himself. Shakespeare is a consummate literary genius. He has said once and for all many things which the common man thinks or half thinks. When the common man comes upon a phrase of Shakespeare he feels that Shakespeare has said for all time the things which he would himself have said if he had been able. But the appreciation of Shakespeare does not make the ordinary man like Shakespeare; the appreciation of Christ has not proved successful in itself in making men like unto Christ.

If, on the contrary, without attempting formal theological construction, we put some real meaning into the idea of Christ as the Son of God and hold fast to a unique relationship between Christ and God which makes Christ the greatest gift that God can give us, we find indeed that Christ is lifted up to essentially Divine existence; but we find also that this divinity does not estrange Him from us. Redemption becomes feasible, not merely when we have a revelation of how far up man can go, but when we have also a revelation of how far down God can come. If we can think of God as having in some real way come into the world through His Son Jesus Christ, that revelation makes Christ the Lord who can lead us to redemption.

Such a conception furnishes the dynamic which we must have in any real process of redemption. We need not only the ideal, but we need power by which to reach the ideal. If we can feel that the universe is under the sway of a moral God, a God who is under obligations to bear the burdens of men, and who willingly assumes these obligations, we really feel that moral life at its fullest and best is the greatest fact in the universe. Moreover, we must be true to the Scriptures and lift the entire conception of redemption beyond the realm of conscience to the realm of the heart. What the conscience of God calls for, the love of God willingly discharges. The Cross of Christ becomes at once the revelation of the righteousness of God and the love of God. Power is thus put back of human conscience and human love to move forward toward redemption (Rom 8 35-39).

The aim of the redemption in Christ then is to lift men out of death toward life. The mind is to be quickened by the revelation of the true ideals of human life. The conscience is to be reinforced by the revelation of the moral God who carries on all things in the interests of righteousness. The heart is to be stirred and won by the revelation of the love which sends an only begotten Son to the cross for our redemption. And we must take the work of Christ, not as a solitary incident or a mere historic event, but as a manifestation of the spirit which has been at work from the beginning and works forever. The Lamb was slain from the foundation of the world (Rev 13 8); the spirit of God revealed in the cross of Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever. We have in the cross a revelation of holy love which, in a sense, overpowers and at the same time encourages. The cross is the revelation of the length to which God is willing to go in redemption rather than set aside one jot or tittle of His moral law. He will not redeem men except on terms which leave them men. He will not overwhelm them in any such manner as to do away with their power of free choice. He will show men His own feeling of holiness and love. In the name of a holy love which they can forever aspire after, but which they can never fully reach, men call to Him for forgiveness and that forgiveness men find forever available.

It remains to add one further item of Scriptural teaching, namely that redemption is a continuous process. If we may again use the word "life," which has been the key to this discussion, we may say that the aim of redemption is to make men progressively alive. There are not limits to the development of human powers touched by the redemptive processes of God. The cross is a revelation of Divine willingness to bear with men who are forever being redeemed. Of course, we speak of the redeemed man as redeemed once and for all. By this we mean that he is redeemed once and for all in being faced about and started in a right direction, but the progress toward full life may be faster or slower according to the man and the circumstances in the midst of which he is placed. Still the chief fact is the direction in which the man is moving. The revelation of God who aids in redemption is of the God who takes the direction as the chief fact rather than the length of the stride or the rate of the movement. Every man is expected to do his best. If he stumbles he is supposed to find his way to his feet; if he is moving slowly, he must attempt to move faster; if he is moving at a slower rate than he can attain, he must strive after the higher rate, but always the dynamic force is the revelation of the holy love of God.

The Scriptures honor the prophets in whatever land or time they appear. The Scriptures welcome goodness under any and all circumstances. They have a place for a "light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world," but they still make it clear that the chief force in the redemption of men is the revelation of holy love in Jesus Christ. The redemption, we repeat, is never conceived of in artificial or mechanical terms. If any man hath not the spirit of Christ he does not belong to Christ (Rom 8 9). The aim of redemption is to beget this spirit, and this spirit is life.

REDNESS, red'nes, OF EYES. See DRUNKENNESS, II.

REDOUND, rē-dound' (from re, "back," and undare, "to surge as a wave"): To be sent back as a reaction, to overflow; occurs only as the tr of περισεύω, perisseúō, "to be over and above," "to superabound" (frequent in the NT); in 2 Cor 4 15, "might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God," RV "may cause the thanksgiving to abound."

REED, rēd: (1) אָהַי, 'āhū, trd "reed-grass" (Gen 41 2.18; Job 8 11m). See FLAG. (2) אֶבְהָה, 'ēbhēh, trd "swift," m "reed" (Job 9 26). The "ships of reed" are the light skiffs made of plaited reeds used on the Nile; cf "vessels of papyrus" (Isa 18 2). (3) אֲגַמְיִים, 'āghammīm, trd "reeds," m "marshes," Heb "pools" (Jer 51 32); elsewhere "pools" (Ex 7 19; 8 5; Isa 14 23, etc). See POOLS. (4) אֲרוֹת, 'ārōth; ἀχι, āchi, trd "meadows," AV "paper reeds" (Isa 19 7). See MEADOWS. (5) קָנֶה, kāneh; κάλαμος, kálamos (the Eng. "cane" comes from Heb via Lat and Gr canna), "stalk" (Gen 41 5.22); "shaft" (Ex 37 17, etc); "reed," or "reeds" (1 K 14 15; 2 K 18 21; Isa 36 6; 42 3; Ps 68 30, AV "spearmen"); "calamus" (Ex 30 23; Cant 4 14; Ezk 27 19); "sweet cane," m "calamus" (Isa 43 24; Jer 6 20); "bone"

(Job 31 22); used of the cross-beam of a "balance" (Isa 46 6); "a measuring reed" (Ezk 40 3); "a staff of reed," i.e. a walking-stick (Isa 36 6; Ezk 29 6); the "branches" of a candlestick (Ex 37 18). (6) κάλαμος, kálamos, "a reed shaken with the wind" (Mt 11 7; Lk 7 24); "a bruised reed" (Mt 12 20); they put "a reed in his right hand" (Mt 27 29.30); "They smote his head with a reed" (Mk 15 19); "put it on a reed" (Mt 27 48; Mk 15 36); "a measuring reed" (Rev 11 1; 21 15.16); "a pen" (3 Jn ver 13).

It is clear that kāneh and its Gr equivalent kalamos mean many things. Some refer to different uses to which a reed is put, e.g. a cross-beam of a balance, a walking-stick, a measuring rod, and a pen (see above), but apart from this kāneh is a word used for at least two essentially different things: (1) an ordinary reed, and (2) some sweet-smelling substance.

Reed (Arundo donax).

(1) The most common reed in Pal is the Arundo donax (N.O. Gramineae), known in Arab. as kaṣab-farasi, "Persian reed." It grows in immense quantities in the Jordan valley along the river and its tributaries and at the oases near the Dead Sea, notably around Ain Feshkkeh at the northwest corner. It is a lofty reed, often 20 ft. high, of a beautiful fresh green in summer when all else is dead and dry, and of a fine appearance from a distance in the spring months when it is in full bloom and the beautiful silky panicles crown the top of every reed. The "covert of the reed" (Job 40 21) shelters a large amount of animal and bird life. This reed will answer to almost all the requirements of the above references.

(2) Kāneh is in Jer 6 20 qualified הַשֶּׁבֶט הַקָּנֶה, kāneh ha-tōbh, "sweet" or "pleasant cane," and in Ex 30 23, קָנֶה בִשְׁמֶם, kāneh bhōsem, "sweet calamus," or, better, a "cane of fragrance." Cant 4 14; Isa 43 24; Ezk 27 19 all apparently refer to the same thing, though in these passages the kāneh is unqualified. It was an ingredient of the holy oil (Ex 30 23); it was imported from a distance (Jer 6 20; Ezk 27 19), and it was rare and costly (Isa 43 24). It may have been the "scented calamus" (Axorus calamus) of Pliny (NH, xii.48), or some other aromatic scented reed or flag, or, as some think, some kind of aromatic bark. The sweetness refers to the scent, not the taste. See also BULRUSH; PAPYRUS.

REED-GRASS (Gen 41 2.18; Job 8 11 m). See FLAG, (2); REED, (1).

REED, MEASURING, mezh'ūr-ing (מִדְּרֵהָ הַמִּדְּרֵהָ, kēnēh ha-middāh): In Ezekiel's vision of the temple a "man" (an angel) appears with a "measuring reed" to measure the dimensions of the temple (Ezk 40 3 ff; 42 16 ff). The reed is described as 6 cubits long, "of a cubit and a handbreadth each," i.e. the cubit used was a handbreadth longer than the common cubit (see CUBIT; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES; TEMPLE). In the Apocalypse this idea of a measuring reed reappears for measuring the temple (Rev 11 1) and the holy city (21 15.16, "a golden reed"). The thought conveyed is exactitude in the dimensions of these edifices, symbolic of the symmetry and perfection of God's church.

REELIAIAH, rē-el-ā'ya, rē-el-ī'a (רֵעֲלִיָּאִיָּהּ, rē-ēl-yāh): One of the 12 chiefs who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2 || Neh 7 7). In the passage in Neh the name is "Raamiah" (רַעְמִיָּאִיָּהּ, rā'amiyāh), and in 1 Esd 6 8 "Resaias." Which is the original, it is almost impossible to decide; "Reclaiiah" seems preferable.

REELIAS, rē-el-ī-as (A, Ῥεῆλιᾶς, Rhēliās [Fritzsche], B, followed by Svete, Βορολείας, Boroleiās; AV Reelias): One of the "leaders" with Zerubbabel in the return from exile (1 Esd 5 8, m "Reclaiiah"). It occupies the place of "Bigvai" in Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7, but in form it must be the equivalent of "Reclaiiah" of Ezr and "Raamiah" of Neh. It is perhaps a duplicate of "Resaias."

REESAIAS, rē-ē-sā'yas, rē-ē-sī'as: AV; RV RESAIAS (q.v.).

REFINER, rē-fin'ēr, REFINING, rē-fin'ing: Two Heb words have been tr^d "refine": (1) צָרַף, ṣārāph, lit. to "fuse" (Zec 13 9; Isa 48 10; Mal 3 2.3, etc). The same word is rendered also "tried" (Ps 66 10); "melt" (Jer 6 29 AV); "purge" (Isa 1 25). (2) זָכַק, zākak, lit. to "strain" or "sift." In the case of silver and gold the term probably referred to some washing process in connection with refining, as in Mal 3 3 both ṣārāph and zākak are used (1 Ch 28 18; 29 4; Job 28 1). The same word in Isa 25 6 referred to the straining of wine. Gr πυρῶω, pyrōō, in the passive, lit. "to be ignited," is tr^d "refined," in Rev 1 15; 3 18.

The ancient process of refining gold has already been described under METALLURGY (q.v.). Most of the Bible references are to the refining of silver (Prov 25 4; Zec 13 9; Isa 48 10). The silver used by the ancients was probably obtained by smelting lead sulphide ore, rich in silver (argentiferous galena). After the ore had been reduced to a metallic condition, the lead was separated from the silver by blowing hot air over the surface of the melted metal. The lead was thus changed to lead oxide which, in a powdered condition, was driven away by the air blast.

Blowpipe and Small Furnace.—Thebes.

The resulting lead oxide, called in the Bible silver dross, was used for glazing pottery (Prov 26 23), a use to which it is still put by Syrian potters. The description of refining in Ezk 22 18-22 may indicate that a flux (cf "as with lye," Isa 1 25 ARVm) was sometimes added to the melted metal to dissolve the oxides of copper, lead, tin and iron as they formed, thus leaving the silver pure. Crude processes similar to those described above are used in the Taurus Mountains today.

Figurative: In the various Bible references the refining of precious metals is used fig. to illustrate the kind of trial God's children are called upon to go through. If they are of the right metal the dross will finally be blown away, leaving pure, clear, shining silver. If of base metal they will be like the dross described in Jer 6 29.30. The refiner may blow fiercely, but in vain, for nothing but lead dross appears.
JAMES A. PATCH

REFORM, rē-fōrm' (רָפַר, yāsar): The word in RV is found only in Lev 26 23, in the phrase "ye will not be reformed." The meaning is, "to be instructed," or, more fully, "to let one's self be chastened," i.e. by God's discipline to learn the lessons of this chastening.

The Heb word is the same in a similar connection in Jer 6 8, where it is rendered, "Be thou instructed," and in 31 18, "I was chastised." Ps 2 10 ("instructed"); Prov 29 19 ("corrected") use the Heb term of admonition by the words of man.
AV also has "reform" in 2 Esd 8 12; Wisd 9 18.

REFORMATION, ref-or-mā'shun: The word is found only in He 9 10, being the tr of διόρθωσις, diōrthōsis, in its only occurrence. This Gr word means etymologically "making straight," and was used of restoring to the normally straight condition that which is crooked or bent. In this passage it means the rectification of conditions, setting things to rights, and is a description of the Messianic time.

REFRESH, rē-fresh', REFRESHING, rē-fresh'-ing: "Refresh" occurs a few times in the OT as the tr of נָשַׁף, nāphash, "to take breath," figurative "to be refreshed" (Ex 23 12; 31 17; 2 S 16 14); of רָוַח, rāwah, "to have room" (1 S 16 23; Job 32 20, m "find relief," AVm "may breathe"); of שָׁאֵד, šā'adh, "to support" (1 K 13 7); and in the NT as the tr of ἀναπαύω, anapaūō, "to give rest" (1 Cor 16 18; 2 Cor 7 13; Philem vs 7.20; in compound middle, Rom 15 32 AV); also of ἀναψύχω, anapsūchō, "to invigorate," "revive" (2 Tim 1 16), and other words. "Refreshing" is in Isa 28 12 margē'āh, "rest" or "quiet"; and in Acts 3 19, ἀνάψυξις, anāpsuxis, "seasons of refreshing," through the coming of Jesus, the Christ; cf 2 Esd 11 46 and AV Sir 43 22 (ἰλαρῶω).

REFUGE, ref'ūj: A place of resort and safety. The principal words in the OT are מַחְשֶׁחַ, maḥšēch (Ps 14 6; 46 1; 62 7.8; Isa 4 6, etc), and מְבוֹרָה, mābōrah (2 S 22 3; Ps 59 16, etc), both applied chiefly to God as a "refuge" for His people. For AV "refuge" in Dt 33 27, RV has "dwelling-place," and in Ps 9 9, "high tower." Conversely, RV has "refuge" for AV "shelter" in Ps 61 3, and "hope" in Jer 17 17.

REFUGE, CITIES OF (עָרֵי הַמְּקַלָּטֹת, 'arē ha-mik-lāṭ; πόλεις τῶν φυγαδευτηρίων, póleis tōn phugadeu-tērion [cf 1 Macc 10 28]), and other 1. Location forms): Six cities, three on each side of the Jordan, were set apart and placed in the hands of the Levites, to serve as places of asylum for such as might shed blood unwittingly. On the

E. of the Jordan they were Bezer in the lot of Reuben, Ramoth-gilead in the tribe of Gad, and Golan in the territory of Manasseh. On the W. of the Jordan they were Hebron in Judah, Shechem in Mt. Ephraim, and Kedesh in Naphtali (Nu 35 6. 14; Josh 20 2.7 ff; 21 13.21.27.32.38; Bezer is named in ver 36, but not described as a City of Refuge). An account of these cities is given in separate arts. under their names. Dt 19 2 speaks of three cities thus to be set apart, referring apparently to the land W. of the Jordan.

From time immemorial in the East, if a man were slain the duty of avenging him has lain as a sacred obligation upon his nearest relative.

2. Purpose In districts where more primitive conditions prevail, even to this day, the distinction between intentional and unintentional killing is not too strictly observed, and men are often done to death in revenge for what was the purest accident. To prevent such a thing where possible, and to provide for a right administration of justice, these cities were instituted. Open highways were to be maintained along which the manslayer might have an unobstructed course to the city gate.

The regulations concerning the Cities of Refuge are found in Nu 35; Dt 19 1-13; Josh 20. Briefly, everything was to be done to facilitate

3. Regulations the flight of the manslayer, lest the avenger of blood, i.e. the nearest of kin, should pursue him with hot heart, and, overtaking him, should smite him mortally. On reaching the city he was to be received by the elders and his case heard. If this was satisfactory, they gave him asylum until a regular trial could be carried out. They took him, apparently, to the city or district from which he had fled, and there, among those who knew him, witnesses were examined. If it were proved that he was not a wilful slayer, that he had no grudge against the person killed, and had shown no sign of purpose to injure him, then he was declared innocent and conducted back to the city in which he had taken refuge, where he must stay until the death of the high priest. Then he was free to return home in safety. Until that event he must on no account go beyond the city boundaries. If he did, the avenger of blood might slay him without blame. On the other hand, if he were found guilty of deliberate murder, there was no more protection for him. He was handed over to the avenger of blood who, with his own hand, took the murderer's life. Blood-money, i.e. money paid in compensation for the murder, in settlement of the avenger's claim, was in no circumstances permitted; nor could the refugee be ransomed, so that he might "come again to dwell in the land" until the death of the high priest (Nu 35 32).

A similar right of refuge seems to have been recognized in Israel as attaching to the altar in the temple at Jerus (1 K 1 50; 2 28; cf Ex 21 12 f). This may be compared with the right of asylum connected with the temples of the heathen. W. EWING

REFUSE, rē-fūz': Formerly used with the additional meaning "reject," and hence the change from AV to RV in 1 S 16 7; Ezk 5 6; 1 Tim 4 4; 1 Pet 2 7, etc.

REFUTE, rē-fūt': Only in Jude ver 22, ARV m "And some refute while they dispute with you," where RV in the text reads "And on some have mercy, who are in doubt."

The Gr text of vs 22.23 is very uncertain, being given very differently in the various MSS. RV text follows the two oldest MSS, A and B. Instead of ἐλεᾶτε, eladte, "have mercy," the reading ἐλέγχετε, elégchete, "refute."

"convict," has the powerful support of A C, the best cursives, Vulg, Memphitic, Armenian and Ethiopian VSS, and is placed in the text by Lachmann, Tischendorf and Tregelles (WH in list of "Suspected Readings" says: "Some primitive error probable: perhaps the first ἐλεᾶτε an interpolation"). Cf ver 15, where the same Gr word occurs in the same sense (AV "convince," RV "convict"); cf also 1 Tim 5 20; Tit 1 9, where the same idea of refuting the sinful occurs.

D. MIALL EDWARDS

REGEM, rē'gem (רֵגֶם, reghem, "friend" [?]): A Calebite, the son of Jahdah (1 Ch 2 47), mentioned as the eponym of a Calebite family or clan.

REGEM-MELECH, rē'gem-mē'lek, -mel'ek (רֵגֶם מֶלֶךְ, reghem melekh): One of a deputation sent to inquire concerning the propriety of continuing the commemoration of the destruction of the temple by holding a fast (Zec 7 2). The text of the passage is in disorder. The name may mean "friend of the king"; hence some have sought to remove the difficulty by interpreting reghem melekh as a title, not a personal name, reading the clause, "They of Beth-el had sent SHAREZER [q.v. (2)], the friend of the king."

REGENERATION, rē-jen-ēr-ā'shun, rē-:

I. THE TERM EXPLAINED

1. First Biblical Sense (Eschatological)
2. Second Biblical Sense (Spiritual)

II. THE BIBLICAL DOCTRINE OF REGENERATION

1. In the OT
2. In the Teaching of Jesus
3. In Apostolic Teaching

III. LATER DEVELOPMENT OF THE DOCTRINE

IV. PRESENT SIGNIFICANCE

LITERATURE

1. The Term Explained.—The theological term "regeneration" is the Lat tr of the Gr expression παλιγγενεσία, palingenesia, occurring twice in the NT (Mt 19 28; Tit 3 5). The word is usually written παλιγγενεσία, palingenesia, in classical Gr. Its meaning is different in the two passages, though an easy transition of thought is evident.

In Mt 19 28 the word refers to the restoration of the world, in which sense it is synonymical to the expressions ἀποκατάστασις πάντων, apokatástasis pántōn, "restoration of all things" (Acts 3 21; the vb. is found in Mt 17 11, ἀποκαταστήσει πάντα, apokatastēsei pánta, "shall restore all things"), and ἀνάψυξις, anapsuxis, "refreshing" (Acts 3 19), which signifies a gradual transition of meaning to the second sense of the word under consideration.

It is supposed that regeneration in this sense denotes the final stage of development of all creation, by which God's purposes regarding the same are fully realized, when "all things [are put] in subjection under his feet" (1 Cor 15 27). This is a "regeneration in the proper meaning of the word, for it signifies a renovation of all visible things when the old is passed away, and heaven and earth are become new" (cf Rev 21 1). To the Jew the regeneration thus prophesied was inseparably connected with the reign of the Messiah.

We find this word in the same or very similar senses in profane literature. It is used of the renewal of the world in Stoical philosophy. Jos (Ant, XI, iii, 9) speaks of the ἀνάκτησις καὶ παλιγγενεσία τῆς πατρίδος, "a new foundation and regeneration of the fatherland," after the return from the Bab captivity. Philo (ed. Mangey, li. 144) uses the word, speaking of the post-diluvial epoch of the earth, as of a new world, and Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (xi.1), of a periodical restoration of all things, laying stress upon the constant recurrence and uniformity of all happenings, which thought the Preacher expressed by "There is no new thing under the sun" (Eccl 1 9). In most places, however, where the word occurs in philosophical writings, it is used of the "reincarnation" or "subsequent birth" of the individual, as in the Buddhistic and Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls (Plut., ed. Xylander, ii.998c; Clem. Alex., ed. Potter, 539) or else of a revival of life (Philo i.159). Cicero uses the word in his letters to Atticus (vi.6) metaphorically of his return from exile, as a new lease of life granted to him. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, IX.

This sense is undoubtedly included in the full Bib. conception of the former meaning, for it is unthinkable that a regeneration in the eschatological sense can exist without a spiritual regeneration of humanity or the individual. It is, however, quite evident that this latter conception has arisen rather late, from an analysis of the former meaning. It is found in Tit 3 5 which, without absolute certainty as to its meaning, is generally interpreted in agreement with the numerous nouns and vbs. which have given the dogmatical setting to the doctrine of regeneration in Christian theology. Clem. Alex. is the first to differentiate this meaning from the former by the addition of the adj. πνευματική, pneumatikē, "spiritual" (cf anapsuxis, Acts 3 20; see REFRESHING). In this latter sense the word is typically Christian, though the OT contains many adumbrations of the spiritual process expressed thereby.

II. The Biblical Doctrine of Regeneration.—It is well known that in the earlier portions of the OT, and to a certain degree all through the OT, religion is looked at and spoken of more as a national possession, the benefits of which are largely visible and tangible blessings. The idea of regeneration here occurs therefore—though no technical expression has as yet been coined for the process—in the first meaning of the word elucidated above. Whether the Divine promises refer to the Messianic end of times, or are to be realized at an earlier date, they all refer to the nation of Israel as such, and to individuals only as far as they are partakers in the benefits bestowed upon the commonwealth. This is even true where the blessings prophesied are only spiritual, as in Isa 60 21.22. The mass of the people of Israel are therefore as yet scarcely aware of the fact that the conditions on which these Divine promises are to be attained are more than ceremonial and ritual ones. Soon, however, great disasters, threatening to overthrow the national entity, and finally the captivity and dispersion which caused national functions to be almost, if not altogether, discontinued, assisted in the growth of a sense of individual or personal responsibility before God. The sin of Israel is recognized as the sin of the individual, which can be removed only by individual repentance and cleansing. This is best seen from the stirring appeals of the prophets of the exile, where frequently the necessity of a change of attitude toward Jeh is preached as a means to such regeneration. This cannot be understood otherwise than as a turning of the individual to the Lord. Here, too, no ceremony or sacrifice is sufficient, but an interposition of Divine grace, which is represented under the figure of a washing and sprinkling from all iniquity and sin (Isa 1 18; Jer 13 23). It is not possible now to follow in full the development of this idea of cleansing, but already in Isa 52 15 the sprinkling of many nations is mentioned and is soon understood in the sense of the "baptism" which proselytes had to undergo before their reception into the covenant of Israel. It was the symbol of a radical cleansing like that of a "new-born babe," which was one of the designations of the proselyte (cf Ps 87 5; see also the tractate Y'bhāmōth 62a). Would it be surprising that Israel, which had been guilty of many sins of the Gentiles, needed a similar baptism and sprinkling? This is what Ezk 36 25 suggests: "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you." In other passages the cleansing and refining power of fire is alluded to (e.g. Mal 3 2), and there is no doubt that John the Baptist found in such passages the ground for his practice of baptizing the Jews who came to him (Jn 1 25–28 and 1's).

The turning of Israel to God was necessarily meant to be an inward change of attitude toward Him, in other words, the sprinkling with clean water, as an outward sign, was the emblem of a pure heart. It was Isaiah and Jeremiah who drew attention to this (Isa 57 15; Jer 24 7; 31 33–35; 32 38–40, et passim). Here again reference is made to individuals, not only to the people in general (Jer 31 34). This promised regeneration, so lovingly offered by Jeh, is to be the token of a new covenant between God and His people (Jer 31 31; Ezk 11 19–21; 18 31.32; 37 23.24).

The renewing and cleansing here spoken of is in reality nothing else than what Dt 30 6 had promised, a circumcision of the heart in contradistinction to the flesh, the token of the former (Abrahamic) covenant (of circumcision, Jer 4 4). As God takes the initiative in making the covenant, the conviction takes root that human sin and depravity can be effectually eliminated only by the act of God Himself renewing and transforming the heart of man (Hos 14 4). This we see from the testimony of some of Israel's best sons and daughters, who also knew that this grace was found in the way of repentance and humiliation before God. The classical expression of this conviction is found in the prayer of David: "Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right [m "steadfast"] spirit within me. Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy holy Spirit from me. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with a willing spirit" (Ps 51 10–12). Jeremiah puts the following words into the mouth of Ephraim: "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned" (Jer 31 18). Clearer than any passages of the OT, John the Baptist, forerunner of Christ and last flaming torch of the time of the earlier covenant, spoke of the baptism, not of water, but of the Holy Spirit and of fire (Mt 3 11; Lk 3 16; Jn 1 33), leading thus to the realization of OT foreshadowings which became possible by faith in Christ.

In the teaching of Jesus the need of regeneration has a prominent place, though nowhere are the reasons given. The OT had succeeded—and even the gentile conscience agreed with it—in convincing the people of this need. The clearest assertion of it and the explanation of the doctrine of regeneration is found in the conversation of Jesus with Nicodemus (Jn 3). It is based upon (1) the observation that man, even the most punctilious in the observance of the Law, is dead and therefore unable to "live up" to the demands of God. Only He who gave life at the beginning can give the (spiritual) life necessary to do God's will. (2) Man has fallen from his virginal and Divinely appointed sphere, the realm of the spirit, the Kingdom of God, living now the perishing earthly life. Only by having a new spiritual nature imparted to him, by being "born anew" (Jn 3 3, RVm "from above," Gr ἄνωθεν, anōthen), by being "born of the Spirit" (3 6.8), can he live the spiritual life which God requires of man.

2. In the Teaching of Jesus

These words are a NT exegesis of Ezekiel's vision of the dead bones (37 1–10). It is the "breath from Jeh," the Spirit of God, who alone can give life to the spiritually dead.

But regeneration, according to Jesus, is more than life, it is also purity. As God is pure and sinless, none but the pure in heart can see God (Mt 5 8). This was always recognized as impossible to mere human endeavor. Bildad the Shuhite declared, and his friends, each in his turn, expressed very similar thoughts (Job 4 17; 14 4): "How then can man be just with God? Or how can he be clean that is born of a woman? Behold, even the moon hath no brightness, and the stars are not pure in his sight: how much less man, that is a worm! and the son of man, that is a worm!" (25 4-6).

To change this lost condition, to impart this new life, Jesus claims as His God-appointed task: "The Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost" (Lk 19 10); "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly" (Jn 10 10). This life is eternal, imperishable: "I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand" (Jn 10 28). This life is imparted by Jesus Himself: "It is the spirit that giveth life; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit, and are life" (Jn 6 63). This life can be received on the condition of faith in Christ or by coming to Him (Jn 14 6). By faith power is received which enables the sinner to overcome sin, to "sin no more" (Jn 8 11).

The parables of Jesus further illustrate this doctrine. The prodigal is declared to have been "dead" and to be "alive again" (Lk 15 24). The new life from God is compared to a wedding garment in the parable of the Marriage of the King's Son (Mt 22 11). The garment, the gift of the inviting king, had been refused by the unhappy guest, who, in consequence, was 'cast out into the outer darkness' (Mt 22 13).

Finally, this regeneration, this new life, is explained as the knowledge of God and His Christ: "And this is life eternal, that they should know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ" (Jn 17 3). This seems to be an allusion to the passage in Hos (4 6): "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge: because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me."

It may be said in general that the teaching of the apostles on the subject of regeneration is a development of the teaching of Jesus on the lines of the adumbrations of the OT.

3. In Apostolic Teaching

Considering the differences in the personal character of these writers, it is remarkable that such concord of views should exist among them. St. Paul, indeed, lays more stress on the specific facts of justification and sanctification by faith than on the more comprehensive head of regeneration. Still the need of it is plainly stated by St. Paul. It is necessary to salvation for all men. "The body is dead because of sin" (Rom 8 3-11; Eph 2 1). The flesh is at enmity with God (Eph 2 15); all mankind is "darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God" (4 18). Similar passages might be multiplied. Paul then distinctly teaches that this is a new life in store for those who have been spiritually dead. To the Ephesians he writes: "And you did he make alive, when ye were dead through your trespasses and sins" (2 1), and later on: "God, being rich in mercy, . . . made us alive together with Christ" (2 4.5). A spiritual resurrection has taken place. This regeneration causes a complete revolution in man. He has thereby passed from under the law of sin and death and has come under "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" (Rom 8 2). The change is so radical that it is possible now to speak of a "new creature" (2 Cor 5 17; Gal 6 15, m "new creation"), of a "new man, that after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness of truth" (Eph 4 24), and of "the new man, that is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him" (Col 3 10). All "old things are passed away; behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5 17).

St. Paul is equally explicit regarding the author of this change. The "Spirit of God," the "Spirit of Christ" has been given from above to be the source of all new life (Rom 8); by Him we are proved to be the "sons" of God (Gal 4 6); we have been adopted into the family of God (υιοθετια, huiothesia, Rom 8 15; Gal 4 5). Thus St. Paul speaks of the "second Adam," by whom the life of righteousness is initiated in us; just as the "first Adam" became the leader in transgression, He is "a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor 15 45). St. Paul himself experienced this change, and henceforth exhibited the powers of the unseen world in his life of service. "It is no longer I that live," he exclaims, "but Christ liveth in me: and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself up for me" (Gal 2 20).

Regeneration is to St. Paul, no less than to Jesus, connected with the conception of purity and knowledge. We have already noted the second NT passage in which the word "regeneration" occurs (Tit 3 5): "According to his mercy he saved us, through the washing [m "laver"] of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit, which he poured out upon us richly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour." In 1 Cor 12 13 such cleansing is called the baptism of the Spirit in agreement with the oft-repeated promise (Joel 2 23 [in the Heb text 3 1]; Mt 3 11; Mk 1 8; Lk 3 16; Acts 1 5; 11 16). There is, of course, in these passages no reference to mere water-baptism, any more than in Ezk 36 25. Water is but the tertium comparationis. As water cleanseth the outer body, so the spirit purifies the inner man (cf 1 Cor 6 11; 1 Pet 3 21).

The doctrine that regeneration redounds in true knowledge of Christ is seen from Eph 3 15-19 and 4 17-24, where the darkened understanding and ignorance of natural man are placed in contradistinction to the enlightenment of the new life (see also Col 3 10). The church redeemed and regenerated is to be a special "possession," an "heritage" of the Lord (Eph 1 11.14), and the whole creation is to participate in the final redemption and adoption (Rom 8 21-23).

St. James finds less occasion to touch this subject than the other writers of the NT. His Ep. is rather ethical than dogmatical in tone, still his ethics are based on the dogmatical presuppositions which fully agree with the teaching of other apostles. Faith to him is the human response to God's desire to impart His nature to mankind, and therefore the indispensable means to be employed in securing the full benefits of the new life, i.e. the sin-conquering power (1 2-4), the spiritual enlightenment (1 5) and purity (1 27). There seems, however, to be little doubt that St. James directly refers to regeneration in the words: "Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures" (1 18). It is supposed by some that these words, being addressed "to the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion" (1 1), do not refer to individual regeneration, but to an election of Israel as a nation and so to a Christian Israel. In this case the aftermath would be the redemption of the Gentiles. I understand the expression "first-fruits" in the sense in which we have noticed St. Paul's final hope in Rom 8 21-32, where the regeneration of the believing people of God (regardless of nationality) is the first stage in the regeneration or restoration of all creation. The "implanted [RVm "inborn"] word" (Jas 1 21; cf 1 Pet 1 23) stands parallel to the Pauline expression, "law of the Spirit" (Rom 8 2).

St. Peter uses, in his sermon on the day of Pentecost, the words "refreshing" (Acts 3 19) and "restoration of all things" (3 21) of the final completion of God's plans concerning the whole creation, and accordingly looks here at God's people as a whole. In a similar sense he says in his Second Ep., after mentioning "the day of God": "We look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Pet 3 13). Still he alludes very plainly to the regeneration of individuals (1 Pet 1 3.23). The idea of a second birth of the believers is clearly suggested in the expression, "newborn babes" (1 Pet 2 2), and in the explicit statement of 1 Pet 1 23: "having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God, which liveth and abideth." It is in this sense that the apostle calls God "Father" (1 17) and the believers "children of obedience" (1 14), i.e. obedient children, or children who ought to obey. We have seen above that the agent by which regeneration is wrought, the incorruptible seed of the word of God, finds a parallel in St. Paul's and St. James's theology. All these expressions go back probably to a word of the Master in Jn 15 3. We are made partakers of the word by having received the spirit. This spirit (of the Pauline "life-giving spirit," 1 Cor 15 45), the "mind" of Christ (1 Pet 4 1), is the power of the resurrected Christ active in the life of the believer. St. Peter refers to the same thought in 1 Pet 3 15.21. By regeneration we become "an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession," in whom Divine virtues, "the excellencies of him who called you" (1 Pet 2 9), are manifested. Here the apostle uses well-known OT expressions foreshadowing NT graces (Isa 61 6; 66 21; Ex 19 6; Dt 7 6), but he individualizes the process of regeneration in full agreement with the increased light which the teaching of Jesus has brought. The theology of St. Peter also points out the contact of regeneration with purity and holiness (1 Pet 1 15.16) and true knowledge (1 14) or obedience (1 14; 3 16). It is not surprising that the idea of purity should invite the OT parallel of "cleansing by water." The flood washed away the iniquity of the world "in the days of Noah" when "eight souls were saved through water: which also after a true likeness [RVm "in the antitype"] doth now save you, even baptism, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the interrogation [RVm "inquiry," "appeal"] of a good conscience toward God, through the resurrection [life] of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet 3 20.21).

The teaching of St. John is very closely allied with that of Jesus, as we have already seen from the multitude of quotations we had to select from St. John's Gospel to illustrate the teaching of the Master. It is esp. interesting to note the cases where the apostle didactically elucidates certain of these pronouncements of Jesus. The most remarkable apostolic gloss or commentary on the subject is found in Jn 7 39. Jesus had spoken of the change which faith in Him ("coming to him") would cause in the lives of His disciples; how Divine energies like "rivers of water" should issue forth from them; and the evangelist continues in explanation: "But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive: for the Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified." This recognition of a special manifestation of Divine power, transcending the experience of OT believers, was based on the declaration of Christ, that He would send "another Comforter [RV "advocate," "helper," Gr Paraclete], that he may be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth" (Jn 14 16.17).

In his Epp. St. John shows that this Spirit bestows the elements of a Godlike character which makes us to be "sons of God," who before were "children of the devil" (1 Jn 3 10.24; 4 13, etc).

This regeneration is "eternal life" (1 Jn 5 13) and moral similarity with God, the very character of God in man. As "God is love," the children of God will love (1 Jn 5 2). At the same time it is the life of God in man, also called fellowship with Christ, victorious life which overcomes the world (1 Jn 5 4); it is purity (1 Jn 3 3-6) and knowledge (1 Jn 2 20).

The subject of regeneration lies outside of the scope of the Ep. to the He, so that we look in vain for a clear dogmatical statement of it. Still the ep. does in no place contradict the dogma, which, on the other hand, underlies many of the statements made. Christ, "the mediator of a better covenant, which hath been enacted upon better promises" (8 6), has made "purification of sins" (1 3). In contradistinction to the first covenant, in which the people approached God by means of outward forms and ordinances, the "new covenant" (8 13) brought an "eternal redemption" (9 12) by means of a Divine cleansing (9 14). Christ brings "many sons unto glory" and is "author of their salvation" (2 10). Immature Christians are spoken of (as were the proselytes of the OT) as babes, who were to grow to the stature, character and knowledge of "full-grown men" (5 13.14).

III. Later Development of the Doctrine.—Very soon the high spiritual meaning of regeneration was obscured by the development of priestcraft within the Christian church. When the initiation into the church was thought of as accomplished by the mediation of ministers thereto appointed, the ceremonies hereby employed became means to which magic powers were of necessity ascribed. This we see plainly in the view of baptismal regeneration, which, based upon half-understood passages of Scripture quoted above, was taught at an early date. While in the post-apostolic days we frequently find traces of a proper appreciation of an underlying spiritual value in baptism (cf Didache, vii) many of the expressions used are highly misleading. Thus Gregory Nazianzen (Orations, xi.2) calls baptism the second of the three births a child of God must experience (the first is the natural birth, the third the resurrection). This birth is "of the day, free, delivering from passions, taking away every veil of our nature or birth, i.e. everything hiding the Divine image in which we are created, and leading up to the life above" (Ullmann, Gregor v. Nazienz, 323). Cyril of Jerus (Cat., xvii, c. 37) ascribes to baptism the power of absolution from sin and the power of endowment with heavenly virtues. According to Augustine baptism is essential to salvation, though the baptism of blood (martyrdom) may take the place of water-baptism, as in the case of the thief at the cross (Aug., De Anima et Eius Origine, i.11, c. 9; ii.14, c. 10; ii.16, c. 12). Leo the Great compares the spirit-filled water of baptism with the spirit-filled womb of the Virgin, in which the Holy Spirit engenders a sinless child of God (Serm. xxiv.3; xxv.5; see Hagenbach, Dogmengeschichte, § 137).

In general this is still the opinion of pronounced sacramentarians, while evangelical Christianity has gone back to the teaching of the NT.

IV. Present Significance.—Although a clear distinction is not always maintained between regeneration and other experiences of the spiritual life, we may summarize our belief in the following theses:

(1) Regeneration implies not merely an addition of certain gifts or graces, a strengthening of certain innate good qualities, but a radical change, which revolutionizes our whole being, contradicts and overcomes our old fallen nature, and places our spiritual center of gravity wholly outside of our own powers in the realm of God's causation.

(2) It is the will of God that all men be made partakers of this new life (1 Tim 2 4) and, as it is clearly stated that some fall short of it (Jn 5 40), it is plain that the fault thereof lies with man. God requires all men to repent and turn unto Him (Acts 17 30) before He will or can effect regeneration. Conversion, consisting in repentance and faith in Christ, is therefore the human response to the offer of salvation which God makes. This response gives occasion to and is synchronous with the Divine act of renewal (regeneration). The Spirit of God enters into union with the believing, accepting spirit of man. This is fellowship with Christ (Rom 8 10; 1 Cor 6 17; 2 Cor 5 17; Col 3 3).

(3) The process of regeneration is outside of our observation and beyond the scope of psychological analysis. It takes place in the sphere of subconsciousness. Recent psychological investigations have thrown a flood of light on the psychic states which precede, accompany and follow the work of the Holy Spirit. "He handles psychical powers; He works upon psychical energies and states; and this work of regeneration lies somewhere within the psychical field." The study of religious psychology is of highest value and greatest importance. The facts of Christian experience cannot be changed, nor do they lose in value by the most searching psychological scrutiny.

Psychological analysis does not eliminate the direct workings of the Holy Spirit. Nor can it disclose its process; the "underlying laboratory where are wrought radical remedial processes and structural changes in the psychical being as portrayed in explicit scriptural utterances: 'Create in me a clean heart' (Ps 51 10); 'Ye must be born again' (Jn 3 7 AV); 'If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold all things are become new' (2 Cor 5 17 AV), is in the region of subconsciousness. To look in the region of consciousness for this Person or for His work is fruitless and an effort fraught with endless confusion. Christian psychology thus traces to its deep-lying retreat the Divine elaboration of the regenerated life. Here God works in the depths of the soul as silently and securely as if on the remotest world of the stellar universe" (H. E. Warner, Psychology of the Christian Life, 117).

(4) Regeneration manifests itself in the conscious soul by its effects on the will, the intelligence and the affections. At the same time regeneration supplies a new life-power of Divine origin, which enables the component parts of human nature to fulfil the law of God, to strive for the coming of God's kingdom, and to accept the teachings of God's spirit. Thus regenerate man is made conscious of the facts of justification and adoption. The former is a judicial act of God, which frees man from the law of sin and absolves him from the state of enmity against God; the latter an endowment with the Spirit, which is an earnest of his inheritance (Eph 1 14). The Spirit of God, dwelling in man, witnesses to the state of sonship (Rom 8 2.15.16; Gal 4 6).

(5) Regeneration, being a new birth, is the starting-point of spiritual growth. The regenerated man needs nurture and training. He receives it not merely from outside experiences, but from an immanent power in himself, which is recognized as the power of the life of the indwelling Christ (Col 1 26.27). Apart from the mediate dealings of God with man through word and sacraments, there is therefore an immediate communication of life from God to the regenerate.

(6) The truth which is mentioned as the agent by whom regeneration is made possible (Jn 8 32; Jas 1 18; 1 Pet 1 23), is nothing else than the Divine Spirit, not only the spoken or written word of God, which may convince people of right or wrong, but which cannot enable the will of man to forsake the wrong and to do the right, but He who calls Himself the Truth (Jn 14 6) and who has become the motive power of regenerated life (Gal 2 20).

(7) Recent philosophy expressive of the reaction from the mechanical view of bare materialism, and also from the depreciation of personality as seen in socialism, has again brought into prominence the reality and need of personal life. Johannes Müller and Rudolf Eucken among others emphasize that a new life of the spirit, independent of outward conditions, is not only possible, but necessary for the attainment of the highest development. This new life is not a fruit of the free play of the tendencies and powers of natural life, but is in sharp conflict with them. Man as he is by nature stands in direct contrast to the demands of the spiritual life. Spiritual life, as Professor Eucken says, can be implanted in man by some superior power only and must constantly be sustained by superior life. It breaks through the order of causes and effects; it severs the continuity of the outer world; it makes impossible a rational joining together of realities; it prohibits a monistic view of the immediate condition of the world. This new life derives its power not from mere Nature; it is a manifestation of Divine life within us (Hauptprobleme der Religionsphilosophie, Leipzig, 1912, 17 ff; Der Kampf um einen geistigen Lebensinhalt, Leipzig, 1907; Grundlinien einer neuen Lebensanschauung, Leipzig, 1907; Johannes Müller, Bausteine für persönliche Kultur, 3 vols, München, 1908). Thus the latest development of idealistic philosophy corroborates in a remarkable way the Christian truth of regeneration. See also CONVERSION.

REGENERATION, BAPTISMAL. See BAPTISMAL REGENERATION.

REGION, re'jun: A "district," as in modern Eng. The word "region" is used by EV interchangeably with "country," "coasts," etc, for various Heb and Gr terms, but "region round about" is usually in AV and invariably in RV the tr of περιχωρος, perichōros, "surrounding country." For a possible technical use of "region" in Acts 16 6 and RV 18 23; see GALATIA.

REGISTER, rej'is-tēr. See GENEALOGY; QUIRINIUS.

REHABIAH, rē-ha-bī'a (רְחַבְיָהּ, r'habhyāh, רְחַבְיָהּ, r'habhyāhū, "Jeh is wide"): Son of Eliezer, and grandson of Moses. Eponym of a Levitical family (1 Ch 23 17; 24 21; 26 25).

REHEARSE, rē-hūrs' (שׁוּם, sūm, דַּבַּר, dābhar, נָגַד, nāghadh, תָּנַח, tānāh; ἀναγγέλλω, anaggēllō): Usually means simply "to relate," "to tell," "to declare" (Ex 17 14; Jgs 5 11; 1 S 8 21; 17 31; Acts 14 27); with "rehearse from the beginning" in Acts 11 4 for ἀρχομαι, archomai, "begin" (so RV). RV has preserved uniformity by translating anaggēllō by "rehearse" also in Acts 15 4, and has introduced "rehearse" as the tr of ἐξηγέομαι, exēgēomai, throughout (Lk 24 35; Acts 10 8; 15 12.14; 21 19), except in Jn 1 18 ("declare"). Sir 19 7, AV has "rehearse" for δευτερόω, deuterōō, "repeat" (so RV).

REHOB, rē'hob (רְחֹב, r'hōbh; Ροάβ, Rhōbb, Παάβ, Rhāb):

(1) Etymologically the word means "broad" and might be applied either to a road or a plain. Rehob is given (Nu 13 21) as the northern limit of Israel as reached by the spies. This agrees with the position assigned to Beth-rehob in the narrative of the settlement of the Danites (Jgs 18 28). It is mentioned again along with the kingdom of Zobah in connection with the wars of Saul (1 S 14 47 LXX Lag.), and as having been associated with Zobah and Maacah against David in the Ammonite war and as having been defeated by him (2 S 10 6). Robinson sought to identify it with Hunin, but it hardly suits the references. Buhl (GAP, 240) following Thomson (LB, II, 547) seeks it at Paneas (modern Bāniās). This would suit all the requirements of the capital, Beth-rehob, which might then be the second Rehob, assigned as part of the territory of Sidon to the tribe Asher (Josh 19 28.30; Jgs 18 28). We must, however, assign to the kingdom of Rehob a territory extending from the settlements of the Danites to the "entering in of Hamath" or to Libo (modern Leboue), i.e. the Great Plain of Coele-Syria bounded by Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon and within the limits indicated.

(2) Two separate towns belonging to Asher (Josh 19 28; 19 30). One of them was given to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 21 31), and one is mentioned as remaining in the hands of the Canaanites (Jgs 1 31).

(3) Father of Hadadezer, king of Aram Zobah, who was overwhelmed by David at the Euphrates (2 S 8 3.12).

(4) One of the Levites who sealed Nehemiah's covenant on the 24th Tishri, 444 BC (Neh 10 11).

REHOBOAM, rē-hō-bō'am (רְחֹבָם), r'habh'am, "the people is enlarged," or perhaps "Am is wide"; Ροβοάμ, Rhoboām; "Roboam," Mt 1 7 AV):

1. The Disruption of the Kingdom
2. Underlying Causes of Disruption
3. Shemaiah Forbids Civil War
4. Rehoboam's Prosperity
5. Shishak's Invasion
6. His Death

The son and successor of Solomon, the last king to claim the throne of old Israel and the first king of Judah after the division of the kingdom. He was born c 978 BC. His mother was Naamah, an Ammonitess. The account of his reign is contained in 1 K 14 21-31; 2 Ch 10-12. The incidents leading to the disruption of the kingdom are told in 1 K 11 43-12 24; 2 Ch 9 31-11 4.

R. was 41 years old (2 Ch 12 13) when he began to reign (LXX 1 K 12 24a says 16 years). He ascended the throne at Jerus immediately upon his father's death with apparently no opposition. North of the Kingdom Israel, however, was dissatisfied, and the people demanded that the king meet them in popular assembly at Shechem, the leading city of Northern Israel. True, Israel was no longer, if ever, an elective monarchy. Nevertheless, the people claimed a constitutional privilege, based perhaps on the transaction of Samuel in the election of Saul (1 S 10 25), to be a party to the conditions under which they would serve a new king and he become their ruler. David, in making Solomon his successor, had ignored this wise provision, and the people, having lost such a privilege by default, naturally deemed their negligence the cause of Solomon's burdensome taxes and forced labor. Consequently, they would be more jealous of their rights for the future, and R. accordingly would have to accede to their demand. Having come together at Shechem, the people agreed to accept R. as their king on condition that he would lighten the grievous service and burdensome taxes of his father. R. asked for three days' time in which to consider the request. Against the advice of men of ripe judgment, who assured him that he might win the people by becoming their servant, he chose the counsel of the younger men, who were of his own age, to rule by sternness rather than by kindness, and returned the people a rough answer, saying: "My father made your yoke heavy, but I will add to your yoke: my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions" (1 K 12 14). R., however, misjudged the temper of the people, as well as his own ability. The people, led by Jeroboam, a leader more able than himself, were ready for rebellion, and so force lost the day where kindness might have won. The threat of the king was met by the Marcellaise of the people: "What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel: now see to thine own house, David" (1 K 12 16). Thus the ten tribes dethroned R., and elected Jeroboam, their champion and spokesman, their king (see JEROBOAM). R., believing in his ability to carry out his threat (1 K 12 14), sent Adoram, his taskmaster, who no doubt had quelled other disturbances, to subdue the populace, which, insulted by indignities and enraged by R.'s renewed insolence, stoned his messenger to death. Realizing, for the first time, the seriousness of the revolt, R. fled ignominiously back to Jerus, king only of Judah and of the adjacent territory of the tribe of Benjamin. The mistake of R. was the common mistake of despots. He presumed too much on privilege not earned by service, and on power for which he was not willing to render adequate compensation.

It is a mistake, however, to see in the disruption the shattering of a kingdom that had long been a harmonious whole. From the earliest times the confederation of tribes was imperfectly cemented. They seldom united against their common foe. No mention is made of Judah in the list of tribes who fought with Deborah against Sisera. A chain of cities held by the Canaanites, stretching across the country from E. to W., kept the North and the South apart. Different physical characteristics produced different types of life in the two sections. Old jealousies repeatedly fanned into new flame intensified the divisions due to natural and artificial causes. David labored hard to break down the old antagonisms, but even in his reign Israel rebelled twice. Northern Israel had produced many of the strongest leaders of the nation, and it was not easy for them to submit to a ruler from the Judaean dynasty. Solomon, following David's policy of unification, drew the tribes closely together through the centralization of worship at Jerus and through the general splendor of his reign, but he, more than any other, finally widened the gulf between the North and the South, through his unjust discriminations, his heavy taxes, his forced labor and the general extravagances of his reign. The religion of Jeh was the only bond capable of holding the nation together. The apostasy of Solomon severed this bond. The prophets, with their profound knowledge of religious and political values, saw less danger to the true worship of Jeh in a divided kingdom than in a united nation ruled over by R., who had neither political sagacity nor an adequate conception of the greatness of the religion of Jeh. Accordingly, Ahijah openly encouraged the revolution, while Shemaiah gave it passive support.

Immediately upon his return to Jerus, R. collected a large army of 180,000 men (reduced to 120,000 in LXX B), for the purpose of making war against Israel. The expedition, however, was forbidden by Shemaiah the prophet on the ground that they should not fight against their brethren, and that the division of the kingdom was from God. Notwithstanding the prohibition, we are informed that "there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam continually" (1 K 14 30; 2 Ch 12 15).

R. next occupied himself in strengthening the territory which still remained to him by fortifying a number of cities (2 Ch 11 5-12). These cities were on the roads to Egypt, or on the western hills of making war against Israel. The expedition, however, was forbidden by Shemaiah the prophet on the ground that they should not fight against their brethren, and that the division of the kingdom was from God. Notwithstanding the prohibition, we are informed that "there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam continually" (1 K 14 30; 2 Ch 12 15).

R. next occupied himself in strengthening the territory which still remained to him by fortifying a number of cities (2 Ch 11 5-12). These cities were on the roads to Egypt, or on the western hills of the Judaeen Shephelah, and were doubtless fortified as a protection against Egypt. According to 2 Ch 11 13-17, Rehoboam's prosperity was augmented by an immigration of priests and Levites from Israel, who came to Jerus because of their opposition to the idolatrous worship instituted by Jeroboam. All who were loyal to Jeh in the Northern Kingdom are represented as following the example of the priests and Levites in going to Jerus, not simply to sacrifice, but to reside there permanently, thus strengthening R.'s kingdom. In view of the fact that R. added to the innovations of his father, erected pillars of Baal in Jerus long before they were common in Northern Israel, and that he permitted other heathen abominations and immoralities, it seems that the true worship of Jeh received little encouragement from the king himself. As a further evidence of his prosperity, Ch gives an account of R.'s family. Evidently he was of luxurious habit and followed his father in the possession of a considerable harem (2 Ch 11 18-23). He is said to have had 18 wives and 60 concubines, (2 Ch 11 21; LXX B and Jos, Ant, VIII, x, 1 give "30 concubines").

One of the direct results of the disruption of the kingdom was the invasion of Pal by Shishak, king of Egypt, in the 5th year of R. Shishak is Sheshonk I, the first king of the XXII or Bubastite Dynasty. He is the same ruler who granted hospitality to Jeroboam when he was obliged to flee from Solomon (1 K 11 40). The LXX (1 K 12 24e) informs us that Jeroboam married Ano, the sister of Shishak's wife, thus becoming brother-in-law to the king of Egypt. It is therefore easy to suppose that Jeroboam, finding himself in straits in holding his own against his rival, Rehoboam, called in the aid of his former protector. The results of this invasion, however, are inscribed on the temple at Karnak in Upper Egypt, where a list of some 180 (Curtis, "Chronicles," ICC) towns captured by Shishak is given. These belong to Northern Israel as well as Judah, showing that Shishak exacted tribute there as well as in Judah, which seems scarcely reconcilable with the view that he invaded Pal as Jeroboam's ally. However, the king of Israel, imploring the aid of Shishak against his rival, thereby made himself vassal to Egypt. This would suffice to make his towns figure at Karnak among the cities subjected in the course of the campaign. The Chronicler saw in Shishak an instrument in the hand of God for the punishment of R. and the people for the national apostasy. According to 2 Ch 12 3, Shishak had a force of 1,200 chariots and 60,000 horsemen to which Jos adds 400,000 foot-soldiers, composed of Lubim, Sukkiim and Ethiopians. No resistance appears to have been offered to the advance of the invading army. Not even Jerus seems to have stood a siege. The palace and the temple were robbed of all their treasures, including the shields of gold which Solomon had made. For these R. later substituted shields of brass (vs 9.10). R. died at the age of fifty-eight, after having reigned in Jerus for 17 years. His son Abijah became his successor. He was buried in Jerus. Jos says that in disposition he was a proud and foolish man, and that he "despised the worship of God, till the people themselves imitated his wicked actions" (Ant, VIII, x, 2).

6. His Death Jos says that in disposition he was a proud and foolish man, and that he "despised the worship of God, till the people themselves imitated his wicked actions" (Ant, VIII, x, 2).

REHOBOTH, rē-hō'both, rē-hō'bōth (רְהוֹבוֹת), r'hōbhōth, "broad places"; Ἐρύχωρα, Euruchōria): One of the wells dug by Isaac (Gen 26 22). It is probably the Rubuta of the Am Tab (Petrie, nos.

256, 260; see also Expos T, XI, 239 [König], 377 [Sayce]), and it is almost certainly identical with the ruin Ruḥaibeh, 8 hours S.W. of Beersheba. Robinson (BE, I, 196-97) describes the ruins of the ancient city as thickly covering a "level tract of 10 to 12 acres in extent"; "many of the dwellings had each its cistern, cut in the solid rock"; "once this must have been a city of not less than 12,000 or 15,000 inhabitants. Now it is a perfect field of ruins, a scene of unutterable desolation, across which the passing stranger can with difficulty find his way." Huntington (Pal and Its Transformation, 124) describes considerable remains of a suburban population extending both to the N. and to the S. of this once important place.

REHOBOTH BY THE RIVER רְהוֹבוֹת הַיַּרְדֵּן, r'hōbhōth ha-nāhār; B, Ῥωβῶθ [Ῥωβῶθ in Ch] ἡ παρὰ ποταμῶν, Rhōbōth [Rhōbōth] hē parā potamōn, A, Ῥωβῶθ, Rhōbōth): This city is mentioned only as the residence of Shaul, one of the rulers of Edom (Gen 36 37; 1 Ch 1 48). There is nothing to guide us with certainty as to the situation of the city. Onom places it in Idumaea (Gebalene), but no trace of a name resembling this has been found in the district. "The river" usually means the Euphrates. If the city could have been so far from Edom, it might be identified with Rahaba on the W. of the river, 8 miles S. of its confluence with the Khabūr. Winckler thinks it might possibly be on the boundary between Pal and Egypt, "the river" being Wādy el-'Arīsh, "the brook of Egypt" (Nu 34 5; Josh 15 4, etc).

REHOBOTH-IR, r.-ūr, r.-ir (רְהוֹבוֹת יָרֵךְ, r'hōbhōth 'ir, "Rehoboth City"; LXX ἡ Ῥωβῶς [Ῥωβῶθ] πόλις, hē Rhōbōs [Rhōbōth] pōlis, "the city Rhōbōs, Rhōbōth"): The Rēbit Ninua (RV by Nimrod) in Assyria (Gen 10 11.12). Unlike the other three, the exact equivalent of this name is not found in Assyrian lit. Fried. Delitzsch points out (Wo lag das Paradies? 260 f) that r'hōbhōth is the equivalent of the Assyrian rēbite, "streets," and suggests that the site referred to may be the Rēbit Ninua, "streets of Nineveh," mentioned by Sargon of Assyria in connection with the peopling of Maganubba (Khorsabad or Dūr-Šarru-kīn; see NINEVEH); and it was through this tract that Esar-haddon, his grandson, caused the heads of the kings of Kundi and Sidon to be carried in procession when he returned from his expedition to the Mediterranean.

Though the probabilities in favor of Rēbit Ninua are great, it is doubtful whether a suburb could have been regarded as a foundation worthy of a primitive ruler, and that a very important city, Aššur, the old capital of Assyria, would rather be expected. One of the groups expressing its name is composed of the characters Šag-uru, or, dialectically, Šab-eri, the second element being the original of the Heb 'ir. As the "center-city," Aššur may have been regarded as the city of broad spaces (r'hōbhōth)—its ruins are of considerable extent. The German explorers there have made many important discoveries of temples, temple-towers, palaces and streets, the most picturesque anciently being the twin tower-temples of Anu (the sky) and Adad (Hadad). The ruins lie on the Tigris, about 50 miles S. of Nineveh. It practically ceased to be the capital about the middle of the 8th cent. BC. See NINEVEH.

REHUM, rē'hum (רְהוּם, r'hūm, or רְהוּם, r'hūm): (1) One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community returning from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7 [by a copyist's error "Nehum"]; 12 3; 1 Esd 5 8, "Roimus").

(2) A Pers officer of high rank (lit. "master of judgment, taste, reason") who with others wrote a letter against Jerus to King Artaxerxes (Ezr 4 8.9.17.23).

(3) Son of Bani, a Levite, one of the wall-builders under Nehemiah (Neh 3 17).

(4) One of the signers of the covenant in Neh 10 25.

(5) In Neh 12 3 (omitted in LXX) one Rehum is mentioned with those who went up with Zerubbabel. It is probable that we should read here "Harim" (הַרִים of 12 15).

REI, rē'i (רֵי, rē'i, "friendly"; Ῥησεί, Rhēsei): Rei, Shimei and the Gibborim who belonged to David are listed among those who did not join Adonijah in his attempt on the throne (1 K 1 8). The name is very uncertain. Winekler (Geschichte, II, 247) identifies him with Ira, the Jairite, who was a "priest to David" (2 S 20 26 RVm); he tries to prove that this Ira (or Jair) was a priest of Bethlehem. Stade (GVI, I, 293, n. 1) holds that Shimei and Rei were two officers of David's bodyguard. Jos (Ant, VII, xiv, 4) has δ Δαουδου φίλος, ho Dauidou philos, thus making Shimei a "friend," the courtier of 2 S 15 37; 16 16, and omitting Rei entirely. This would call for an original reading רֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ, rē' ha-melekh, or רֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ, rē'eh ha-melekh, and is too wide a variant from the MT. Assuming that Rei belongs in the text, it is safe to conjecture that he was an officer of the royal guard.

REIGN, rān: The Heb word מַלְכוּת, mal'khūth, may be rendered "kinghood," "royal dignity," "kingdom," "government" ("reign"). The vb. is מָלַךְ, mālakh, "to be king" ("to reign as king"), "to become king," "to accede to the throne," "to assume royal power publicly" and, generally speaking, "to become powerful." In the NT ἡγεμονία, hēgemonía, βασιλεία, basileía, βασιλεύειν, basileúein. The word is used, either as a noun or as a vb., of Jeh (God), the Messiah (Christ) and men (kings, etc); then of such terms as sin, death, grace; of the woman in Rev and, conditionally, of the Christians; once, ironically, of the Corinthians. "Reign" as a noun referring to the time of reigning occurs in 1 K 6 1 (Solomon); 2 K 24 12 (Nebuchadnezzar); 1 Ch 4 31 (David); cf 1 Ch 29 30; 2 Ch 36 20 ("until the reign of the kingdom of Persia"); Neh 12 22 (Darius); Est 2 16 (Ahasuerus); Lk 3 1 (Tiberius Caesar). More often occurs the vb. "to reign," mālakh, basileúein. It is applied to: (1) Jeh at the close of the song of Moses (Ex 15 18); "Jeh reigneth" (1 Ch 16 31; cf Ps 93 1; 96 10; 99 1; Rev 19 6); "God reigneth over the nations" (Ps 47 8); "Jeh of hosts will reign in mount Zion" (Isa 24 23; cf Mic 4 7); "Thy God reigneth" (Isa 62 7); "Thou hast taken thy great power, and didst reign" (Rev 11 17, meaning, probably, "thou didst assume thy might"); (2) the Messiah (Christ) as a just and righteous king (Jer 23 5); an eternal king (Lk 1 33; cf Rev 11 15); punishing and subduing His enemies (Lk 19 14.27; 1 Cor 15 25).

(3) Men (kings, etc), in regard to the source of their power ("By me [i.e. the wisdom of God], kings reign" [Prov 8 15]); respecting legitimate succession (2 Ch 23 3; meaning "to have power or dominion" [Gen 37 8 and Job 34 30]); in regard to an essential characteristic (Isa 32 1); in connection with the covenant of Jeh with David (Jer 33 21); then the word is used in 1 S 12 12, where Samuel reminds the children of Israel of their demanding a king of him (cf ver 14); of Saul

(1 S 13 1; cf 11 12); of Saul's son Ish-bosheth (2 S 2 10); of David (2 S 5 4 f; cf 3 21); of Adonijah (1 K 1 11.24; cf 2 15); of Solomon (1 K 1 13); quite frequently of the kings of Judah and Israel (in the Books of K and Ch); of the kings of Edom (Gen 36 31); of Jabin, king of Canaan, in Hazor (Jgs 4 2); of Abimelech, Jerubbaal's son, in Jotham's fable (Jgs 9 8-15); of Hanun, king of the Ammonites (2 S 10 1); of Rezon and his men in Damascus (1 K 11 24); of Hazael and Ben-hadad, kings of Syria (2 K 8 15 and 13 24); of Esar-haddon, king of Assyria (2 K 19 37); of Ahasuerus, king of Persia (Est 1 1); of Archelaus (Mt 2 22).

(4) In the NT the term basileúein, "to reign," is used to illustrate and emphasize the power of sin, death and grace (Rom 5 14.17.21 and 6 12). Sin, the vitiating mental factor, is to be looked upon as being constantly and resolutely bent on maintaining or regaining its hold upon man, its power being exercised and reinforced by the lusts of the body. Death, the logical outcome of sin, at once testifies to the power of sin and its inherent corruption, while grace is the restoring spiritual factor following up and combating everywhere and always the pernicious influence of sin. It strives to dethrone sin, and to establish itself in man as the only dominating force. (5) In describing the future glorious state of the believers, the NT uses the expression of those who endure (in faith; cf 2 Tim 2 12); of those 'purchased unto God with the blood of the Lamb' (Rev 5 10); of those partaking in the first resurrection (Rev 20 6); of the servants of God, "they shall reign for ever and ever" (22 5); on the other hand, it teaches us not to anticipate the privileges of heaven, while our Christian life is anything but satisfactory (1 Cor 4 8), and Rev 17 18 shows us the terrible fate of the woman, the great city (the corrupt church), "which reigneth over the kings of the earth." See further KING, KINGDOM.

REINS, rānz (רֵינִים, kilyāh; νεφρός, nephros, words promiscuously tr^d "heart," "inward parts," "kidneys" or "reins." The latter word, which is derived from Lat renes through OFr. reins, has given place in modern Eng. to the word "kidneys" [see Skeat, Concise Etymological Dictionary of the Eng. Language, 398]. RV has, however, retained the older word, at least in the m, in all passages in which it is found in AV): According to Heb psychology the reins are the seat of the deepest emotions and affections of man, which God alone can fully know. Thus RV has substituted "heart" for "reins" in the text of Job 19 27; Ps 7 9; 16 7; 26 2; 73 21; Jer 11 20; 12 2; 17 10; 20 12; the tr "inward parts" is found but once (Ps 139 13). In one passage AV has tr^d the Heb hālāç ("loins") with "reins" (Isa 11 5), where the RV has rightly substituted "waist" (q.v.). The Gr word nephros (which is etymologically allied to the Middle Eng. nere, Ger. Niere; see Skeat, ibid, 231, s.v. "Kidney") is found in 1 Macc 2 24; Rev 2 23. See KIDNEYS.

H. L. E. LUEKING

REKEM, rē'kem (רֵקֵם, rekem, "friendship"):

(1) One of the five kings of Midian slain by the Israelites under Moses (Nu 31 8; Josh 13 21 [B. Pékom, Rhóboç, A. Pékom, Rhókom]). Like his companions, he is called a "king" in Nu, but a "prince" or "chieftain" in the passage in Josh. The two references are hardly related; both are based on an earlier tradition.

(2) Eponym of a Calebite family (1 Ch 2 43 [B. Pékom, Rhókom]). Probably a town in Southern Judah. A town of this name is given as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18 27).

(3) A city of Benjamin, mentioned with Irpeel and Taralah (Josh 18 27); the site is unknown. See also RAKEM.

RELATIONSHIPS, rē-lā'shun-ships, FAMILY:

I. CONSANGUINITY

1. In General
2. Parents and Children
3. Brothers and Sisters
4. Uncles, Aunts, Cousins, Kinsmen

II. AFFINITY

1. Husband and Wife
2. Father-in-Law, etc
3. Brother-in-Law, etc

III. OTHER DOMESTIC RELATIONS

1. Foster-Father
2. Master and Servants
3. Host and Guest
4. The Dependent Stranger

The family or domestic relations of the Bible include (1) those of consanguinity or blood relationship, (2) affinity or marriage relationship, and (3) legal convention. Those of consanguinity may be divided into lineal and collateral groups; the former are those of parents and children, grandparents and grandchildren, and ancestors and descendants in general; the latter are those of brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts in relation to nephews and nieces, cousins of various degrees, including mere tribesmen and even remoter kinsfolk. The relations of affinity include besides that of husband and wife or concubine, the relations among rival wives, and their children, those of father-in-law and mother-in-law in relation to son-in-law and daughter-in-law, and those of brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law. The domestic relations based on legal convention are either legal fictions or the results of agreement: among the former we must include those of foster-father or mother and foster-children; among the latter the relations between master and the various classes of servants and slaves held by the ancient Hebrews, those between host and guest, esp. where they became covenant brothers, and between the citizen and the stranger who had attached himself to him for his protection.

I. Consanguinity.—Genealogies were carefully kept by the ancient Hebrews (cf those of Gen, Nu, Ch, Ezr, Neh, Mt, Lk), not only because they formed the basis of a man's

1. In General

title to his property (Nu 27 8-11; exceptional case, 36 1-12), but also because on one's pedigree depended the right of his family to intermarry with the priestly caste. Descent was traced through the father; a man's closest association was therefore with his father's family, and he was ordinarily referred to as the son of his father, thus Isaac the son of Abraham (Gen 25 19), Joshua the son of Nun, Caleb the son of Jephunneh (Nu 14 6). Still there are instances of men named for their mothers (Joab the son of Zeruiah), and a man's relation with his mother's family was fully recognized in the laws forbidding incest. No lineal relatives were permitted to intermarry (Lev 18 7.10). The relations of ancestors and descendants were considered so close that the ordinary terms of relationship between children and parents are used constantly in relation to grandparents and remoter ancestors. The wishes of a great-grandfather are respected long after his death as the wishes of a father (Jer 35 16).

The father (אב, 'ābh; πατήρ, patēr) was the head of the family (mishpāhāh) or household (bayith), which was a religious (1 S 20

2. Parents and Children 6.29; Ex 12 3; Job 1 5) as well as a social and political unit, consisting usually of a combination of families in the modern sense. As long as polygamy prevailed a family would include at least the several groups of children of the wives and concubines. The Bible represents the Heb father as commanding (Gen 50 16; Jer 35 6ff; Prov 6 20), instructing (Prov 1 8; 4 1), and rebuking (Gen 37 10; Nu 12 14); at the same time, as loving

(Gen 25 28; 37 4; 44 20), pitying (Ps 103 13), and blessing his household (Gen 27 41), rejoicing over its triumphs (Prov 10 1; 15 20), or grieving over its misfortunes (Gen 37 35). The mother, too (אם, 'ēm; μήτηρ, mētēr), naturally displays love and care (Gen 25 28; Prov 4 3; Isa 49 15; 66 13). To the Heb woman childlessness was considered the greatest of misfortunes (1 S 1 10ff, of Hannah; Gen 30 23, of Rachel). Children were looked upon as a blessing from God (Ps 127 3) and the defenders of the home (vs 4.5). In early life a child was more directly under the control of the mother than the father; the mother was its first teacher (Prov 1 8). Thereafter the father was expected to direct the training of the son (בן, bēn; υἱός, huiós, τέκνον, téknon) (Gen 18 19; Ex 12 26; 13 8.14.15; Dt 6 7), while the daughter (בַּת, bath; θυγάτηρ, thugátēr) probably remained with the mother until her marriage (Mic 7 6). Both parents are looked upon in the Law as objects of honor (Ex 20 12 || Dt 5 16 [the Fifth Commandment]; Ex 21 15; Lev 20 9; Dt 27 16; Prov 20 20; Ezk 22 7; Mic 7 6), obedience (Gen 28 7; Lev 19 3; Dt 21 18ff; Prov 1 8; 30 17) and love (1 K 19 20; Prov 28 24; 30 11). The control of parents was so great as to include the right to sell daughters in marriage, but not, without restrictions, into slavery (Ex 21 7-11; cf 22 16ff; Neh 5 5), and never into a life of shame (Lev 19 29); they could chastise children (Dt 8 5; 21 18; Prov 13 24; cf Eccles 30 1-13), and in the early days even exerted the power of life and death over them (Gen 22; Jgs 11 39; Lev 18 21; 20 2-5; 2 K 23 10; cf Mt 15 4). This power, at least for sacrificial purposes, was entirely removed by the Law, and changed, even for punishment, in the case of a stubborn, rebellious, gluttonous and disobedient son to a mere right of complaint to the proper authorities (Dt 21 18-21), who were to put him to death. Infanticide by exposure, such as was common among other ancient peoples, seems never to have been practised by the Hebrews. That the children were nevertheless the chattels of the parents seems to be attested from the fact that they could be seized for the debts of the father (2 K 4 1). The father could annul the vows of his daughter (Nu 30 3-5), and damages for wrongs done to her were paid to him, as in Eng. law "for loss of services" (Dt 22 29). A widowed or divorced daughter could return to her father (Gen 38 11; Lev 22 13; Ruth 1 15). At his death the mother would become the actual, if not the legal, head of the household (2 K 8 1-6, the Shunammite woman; Tob 1 8, Tobit's grandmother; cf the position of the mother of Jesus). This was esp. true of the queen mother (g'bhūrah), whose name is usually given in the accounts of the kings of Judah (1 K 1 11; 2 19, where a throne at the king's right hand was set for the king's mother; 11 26; 14 21.31; 15 2.10.13; 22 42; 2 K 8 26; 10 13; 14 2; 15 2.33; 18 2; 21 1.19; 22 1; 23 31.36; 24 8.12.15.18; 2 Ch 22 2; Jer 13 18; 22 26; see QUEEN MOTHER). While it is true that the position of the widowed mother depended to some extent on the will of her son (1 K 2 13ff), it must be remembered that the sense of filial duty was highly developed among all classes in Pal (Josh 2 13.18; 6 23; 1 S 22 3; 2 S 19 37; 1 K 19 20). The rebellion of children marked the acme of social degeneration (Mic 7 6; Prov 30 11); on the other hand the "great day" according to Malachi (4 5 [Heb 3 23]) is one of conciliation of parents and children.

The terms "brother" (אָח, 'āh; ἀδελφός, adelphós) and "sister" (אָחֵי, 'ahēh; ἀδελφή, adelphē) apply to children of the same father and mother (Gen 4 2), and also to children of one father (Gen 20 12) or of one mother (Gen 43 7; Lev 18 9; 20 17). The brother as well as the father was the natural protector of the honor of his sister; thus, the sons of Jacob speak of and Sisters Dinah as "our daughter" (Gen 34 17).

Absalom feels more deeply aggrieved over the crime against Tamar than does David himself (2 S 13 21). The brother's other duties toward a sister were very much like those of a father (Cant 8 8). The Law strictly forbids the intermarriage of brother and sister, whether of the same father and mother or not, whether born at home or born abroad, as a "disgraceful thing" (hesedh, a different word from hesedh, "kindness" (Lev 18 9.11; 20 17). In earlier times marriage between half-brother and sister was allowable (Gen 20 12; cf 2 S 13 13). In fact, we are expressly told that the laws against incest were not obeyed by the Egyptians or the Canaanites (Lev 18 3 ff; 20 23). Brotherly sentiment was highly developed (Gen 24 60; Josh 2 13; Prov 17 17; cf Lev 25 35; Dt 15 11 f; 25 3); the dwelling of brothers together in unity is considered good and pleasant (Ps 133 1). Brothers were ever ready to protect or avenge each other (2 S 3 27). Indeed, it is part of the unwritten, common law, recognized though not necessarily approved in the Bible, that the brother or next of kin, the gō'el, is expected to avenge a death (Nu 35 19 ff; Dt 19 6; Josh 20 3; 2 S 14 11), and no punishment is meted out to prevent such self-help, unless it occurs in a refuge-city. A brother was also expected to ransom a captive or slave (Lev 25 48; Ps 49 7). Half-brothers were of course not so near as brothers of the full blood (cf Joseph and his brothers), and it is not surprising to find the sons of a wife despising and driving out the son of a harlot (Jgs 11 1, Jephthah). The words "brother" and "sister" are used frequently of more distant relationships (see below) and figuratively of a friend.

The Heb דוד, dōdh (Lev 10 4, "uncles"; Nu 36 11, "cousins"; 1 S 14 50), coming from a primitive caressing word, possibly indicating "dandle," "fondle," "love," means both "uncle" and "beloved." It is used of the father's and also of the mother's brother, and the corresponding fem. form (דודיה, dōdhāh) is used of the father's sister (Ex 6 20; cf Nu 26 59) and even of the father's brother's wife (Lev 18 14; 20 20). Intermarriage between nephew and aunt (i.e. father's sister, mother's sister, or father's brother's wife, or, in general, uncle's wife) was prohibited (Lev 18 12.13.14; 20 19.20), though nothing is said of intermarriage between uncle and niece nor between cousins (cf Nu 36 11). On the relations between uncle and nephew compare the Bible accounts of Jacob and Laban, Abraham and Lot, David and Joab, etc. In a more general sense the word dōdh is used of kinsmen, Am 6 10 (where the dōdh, "even he that burneth him" [m'sār-phō, perhaps "maternal uncle"; Jew Enc, s.v. "Cremation"], takes charge of a dead body); ben dōdh is used of cousin (cf ben 'āhī 'immō, "son of the brother of his mother," etc) and bath dōdh of a female cousin. For other relations of this and remoter degrees the word for brother is loosely used (e.g. of nephews, Gen 13 8; 14 14, etc; of tribesmen, Lev 21 10; and of more distant relatives, Dt 2 4.8; 23 7).

II. Affinity.—The husband (איש, 'ish; cf בעל, ba'al, Hos 2 16; ἀνὴρ, anēr), though in a sense leaving father and mother for his wife

1. Husband and Wife (אשה, 'ishshāh; γυναῖκα, gunē) (Gen 2 and Wife 24), under normal conditions remained a member of his father's family. If such passages as Gen 2 24; 21 10; 24 5.6.7; 30 3;

31 31; Jgs 4 17 ff; 5 24 ff; 8 19; 9 3, indicate the existence in pre-Bib. times of a matriarchate, the allusions are at least too vague to justify the predication of its persistence in Bib. times. The wife was "taken" by her husband, or "given" by her father or, in the case of a servant, by her master or mistress (Gen 2 22; 16 3; 34 9.21), and although the contract was between the men (Gen 29; 34 16; Ex 22 16; Dt 22 29; Ruth 4 10) or the parents (Gen 21 21; 24), it is probable that the consent of the girl was usually asked (Gen 24 58). Love between the young people was given due consideration (as in the case of Samson, Shechem, Jacob and Rachel [Gen 29 18], David and Michal [1 S 18 20]); at least it developed among married people, so that Hosea could compare the attitude of husband toward wife to that of Jeh toward Israel. As a matter of legal right, it is probable that throughout the Orient long before the events narrated in the Book of Est, every man did "bear rule in his own house" (Est 1 22). In fact a precedent for the Pers decree has been traced as far back as the first human pair (Gen 3 16). Nevertheless, we find many instances in which the wife seems to take the lead in the affairs of the household, as in the case of Samson's parents (Jgs 13 23), of the Shunammite woman (2 K 4), of Jael (Jgs 4 18 ff; 5 24 ff), of Achsah (Josh 15 18 f; Jgs 1 12 f), and in less pleasant matters of Jezebel (1 K 16 4; 21), Sapphira (Acts 5 2), and Zeresh (Est 5 14), who were at least consulted in the affairs of their several households. Abraham is even commanded by the voice of God, "In all that Sarah saith unto thee, hearken unto her voice" (Gen 21 12). That most women were not so fortunate is probably best attested by the fact that at least in the earlier times the best of them had to resort to stratagem to accomplish their purposes (as in the cases of Rebekah [Gen 27 6 ff], Rachel [Gen 31 34], Leah [Gen 30 16] and Abigail [1 S 25 18 ff], and even to get information as to their husband's affairs [Sarah, Gen 18 10; Rebekah, Gen 27 5]). Perhaps their humbler sisters in later days accomplished their ends by being so contentious as to attract the notice of two proverb-collectors (Prov 21 9; 25 24). Though we have no instance of the exercise of the right of life and death over the wife by the husband, and though it is clear that the Heb husband had no power of sale (cf Ex 21 8), it is frequently asserted on the basis of the one-sided divorce doctrine of the OT (Dt 24 1), and on the basis of analogy with other ancient laws, as well as because the wife is spoken of in conjunction with property (Ex 20 17) and because the husband exercised the right to annul the wife's vows (Nu 30 6), that the wife occupied in the ordinary Heb home a very subordinate position. It must not be forgotten, however, that the husband owed duties to the wife (Ex 21 10). It must also be borne in mind that great divergence existed at different times and places, and in different stations of society. Most of our OT evidence pertains to the wealthier classes. The two extremes of the women that are "at ease in Zion" (Isa 32 9-20; cf Am 4 1 ff; 6 1 ff) and the busy "good wife" described in Prov 31 10 ff are hardly exceeded in the most complex society today. The latter probably gives the fairer as well as the more wholesome picture of the functions of the wife in the home, and it is significant that her husband as well as her sons are expected to call her blessed (Prov 31 28).

It is difficult to estimate the extent to which polygamy and concubinage were practised in ancient Pal, but it is clear that the former practice was discouraged even among kings (Dt 17 17), and the latter, an outgrowth of slavery, was not held in high repute (cf Dt 21 10-14). The position of a less-favored wife (Dt 21 15, "hated") was naturally unpleasant, and her relations with other wives of her husband decidedly bitter—they were called each other's qārōth, lit. "vexers" (RV "rivals," Lev 18 18; 1 S 1 6, AV "adversary"; cf Ecelus 37 11)—even when they were sisters (as in the case of Rachel and Leah, Gen 30 1). Hence the Law forbade the marrying of two sisters (Lev 18 18). On the other hand so strong was the desire of a Heb mother for children that the childless wife welcomed the children of a maidservant born to her husband as her own (Gen 30 1-12, etc).

In normal Heb society, for reasons already explained, the relations of a family with the husband's

- parents (אָהָב, hām, from אָהָבָה, hāmōth) were closer than those with the wife's
- 2. Father- parents (אָהָבָה, hōthēn, fem. אָהָבָה, hōthēnēth; πειθερός, -ά, peithēros, -ά).
- in-Law, etc

Where under special conditions a man remained with his wife's tribe after marriage, as in the case of Jacob, serving out his mōhar, or Moses fleeing from the wrath of the Egyptians, or the sons of Elimelech sojourning in the land of Moab because of the famine in Pal, his identity with his own tribe was not destroyed, and at the first opportunity the natural impulse was to return to his own country. The bride, on the other hand, leaving her people, would become a member of her husband's family, with all the rights and duties of a daughter (Mic 7 6). Thus Judah can order Tamar burned for violation of the obligations of a widow (Gen 38 24). No doubt the position of the daughter-in-law varied in the Heb home between the extremes of those who vexed their parents-in-law unto the death (Gen 26 35; 27 46; 28 8) and the one who said to her mother-in-law, "Jeh do so to me . . . if aught but death part thee and me" (Ruth 1 17). Parents-in-law and children-in-law were considered too closely related to intermarry (Lev 18 15; 20 12, 14).

A woman's brother acting in loco parentis might perform all the offices of a father-in-law and possibly be called hōthēn (Gen 24 50, 55; 34

- 3. Brother- 11 ff). Naturally, brothers-in-law and
- in-Law, etc sisters-in-law would be considered too closely related to intermarry (Lev 18 16, 18; 20 21). Nevertheless the husband's brother (אָהָבָה, yābhām) was expected to marry the childless widow to establish the name of the deceased on his inheritance (Dt 25 5-10). This custom dated back to Canaanitic practice (Gen 38 8), and from the connection between marrying the childless widow and the redemption of land may be called a part of the land law of Pal (Ruth 4 1-12; cf Jer 32 6 ff). In practice the Levirate was probably considered more in the nature of a moral duty than a privilege (Dt 25 7; Ruth 4 6), and devolved not only on the brother, but on other members of a deceased husband's family in the order of the nearness of their relationship to him (Ruth 3 12). In the Heb family brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law would form part of the same household. In this relation as in others we find both ideal friendship (David and Jonathan, 1 S 18 3; 2 S 1 26) and petty jealousies (in the matter of Moses' wife, Nu 12 1).

III. Other Domestic Relations.—The Heb אָמָן, 'ōmēn, fem. אָמָנָה, 'ōmenēth (participle of 'āman), lit. "nourishing," is tr^d "nursing father"

- 1. Foster- (Nu 11 12; Isa 49 23), "nursing
- Father mother" (Isa 49 23), "nurse" (Ruth 4 16; 2 S 4 4), or simply as the equivalent of "bringing up" (2 K 10 1, 5; Est 2 7). In the case of Esther and of Ahab's children, and possibly in the other instances referred to, the relation of foster-parents is suggested. The foster-children under such conditions obeyed the words of the foster-father as the words of a father (Est 2 20). Michal is spoken of as the mother of Merab's two children (2 S 21 8) because she reared them (Sanhedhrīn 19b). Adoption in the Rom sense was, however, hardly to be expected in a polygamous society where the childless father could remarry. Nevertheless, Jacob adopts Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen 48 5), and thereby makes them the fathers of tribes. According to Jos, while Abraham was childless he adopted Lot (Ant, I, vii, 1), and the daughter of Pharaoh adopted Moses (Ant, II, ix, 7; cf Ex 2 10). In NT times the notion of adoption was so familiar that Paul uses the word figuratively of conversion (uloberla, hulothesia, Rom 8 15; 9 4; Gal 4 5; Eph 1 5).

The "family" as the word is used of ancient peoples included dependents. The Heb mishpāhāh

- 2. Master is connected with the word shiphhāh,
 - and "maidservant," as the Lat familia
 - Servants is connected with famulus, "servant."
- For a discussion of the various classes of servants and slaves, Heb and foreign, male and female, see SLAVERY.

When Lot protested against betraying his visitors to the men of Sodom, forasmuch as they had come under the shadow of his roof, and he

- 3. Host even preferred to give his daughters to
- and Guest the mob rather than fall in his duties as a host (Gen 19 8), he was acting on the ancient principle of guest-friendship (cf Gr xenia), which bound host and guest by sacred ties. In the light of this principle the act of Jael, who receives Sisera as a guest, and then betrays him, becomes startling and capable of explanation only on the basis of the intense hatred existing at the time, and justifiable, if at all, only on the theory that all is fair in war (Jgs 4 18-21; 5 24-27). The nomads of ancient times and even the post-exilic Hebrews, like the Arabs of today, were bound by a temporary covenant whenever there was "salt between them," that is, in the relation of host and guest (Ezr 4 14; cf the expression "covenant of salt," 2 Ch 13 5; Nu 18 19). In the early Christian church breaking bread together served as a sort of a b'rith 'ahīm, or covenant of brothers. In large households such as those of a king, those that ate at the table were members of the household (2 S 9 11, compared to sons; cf also 2 S 9 7, 10, 13; 19 28; 1 K 2 7; 4 27; 18 19). See HOSPITALITY.

The qēr or stranger (as indicated by the expression "thy stranger" [Ex 20 10; Lev 25 6; Dt 5 14; 29 11; 31 12; cf Dt 1 16], Heb

- 4. The De- qērō, lit. "his stranger") attached
- pendent himself to an influential Hebrew for
- Stranger protection. Thus we read of a "sojourner of the priest's" (Lev 22 10, tōshābh; cf 25 6) who was in many respects a dependent, but still to be distinguished from a servant (Lev 22 11). The Mosaic Law commands that such strangers be treated with consideration (Ex 12 49; 20 10; 22 21 ff; 23 9; Lev 19 33; Dt 1 16; 10 18; 14 21, etc; Ps 146 9) and even with love (Dt 16 14; Lev 19 34). See STRANGER.

RELEASE, rē-lēs': (1) The forgiveness of a debt (שָׁמַטְהָם, sh'mittāh [Dt 15 1, 2, 9; 31 10; see JUBILEE YEAR]), with vb. shāmat, "to release," vs 2, 3. (2) To exempt from taxation or military service (שָׁמַטְהָם, hānāhāh, "release," "rest" [Est 2 18]). Some would render "granted a holiday." (3) To set a prisoner or slave at liberty (ἀπολύω, apolyō, "to let go free" [Mt 27 15 || Jn 19 10], etc).

RELIGION, rē-lij'un: "Religion" and "religious" in Elizabethan Eng. were used frequently to denote the outward expression of worship. This is the force of θρησκεία, thrēskēia, tr^d "religion" in Acts 26 5; Jas 1 26.27 (with adj. thrēskos, "religious"), while the same noun in Col 2 18 is rendered "worshipping" ("cult" would give the exact meaning). And in the same external sense "religion" is used by AV for λατρεία, latreia, "worship" (so RV), in 1 Macc 1 43; 2 19.22. Otherwise "Jews' religion" (or "religion of the Jews") appears in 2 Macc 8 1; 14 38 (RV bis); Gal 1 13.14 (Ἰουδαϊσμός, Ioudaïsmós, "Judaism"); and "an alien religion" in 2 Macc 6 24 (ἀλλοφυλισμός, allopulismós, "that belonging to another tribe"). The neglect of the external force of "religion" has led to much reckless misquoting of Jas 1 26.27. Cf Acts 17 22 and see SUPERSTITION. BURTON SCOTT EASTON.

RELIGION, SCIENCE OF. See COMPARATIVE RELIGION.

REMAINDER, rē-mān'dēr (יָתֵר, yāthar, "to be left," שְׁאֵרִית, sh'ērith, "remnant"): In 2 S 14 7 "residue" would have been clearer (cf Ps 76 10), but the changes of RV in Lev 6 16; 7 16.17 are pointless (contrast Ex 29 34).

REMALIAH, rem-a-li'a (רַמְלִיָּהוּ, remalyāhū, "whom Jeh has adorned"): The father of Pekah (2 K 15 25 ff; Isa 7 4 ff; 8 6). The contemptuous allusion to Pekah as "the son of Remaliah" in Isa 7 4 (similarly "the son of Kish," 1 S 10 11) may be a slur on Remaliah's humble origin.

REMEMBER, rē-mem'bēr, REMEMBRANCE, rē-mem'brans: "Remember" is mostly the tr, in the OT, of זָכַר, zākhār, and in the NT of μνάσθαι, mnáomai (Mt 5 23; 26 75; Jn 2 17, etc), and of μνημονεύω, mnēmoneúō (Mt 16 9; Mk 8 18; Lk 17 32, etc), and "remembrance" the tr of derivatives of these (zekher, anamnēsis, etc). There are a few other words. "To remember" is used of God in remembering persons (Gen 8 1; 19 29, etc), His covenant (Gen 9 15; Ex 2 24; Ezk 16 60, etc), in answering prayer (Jgs 16 28; Neh 13 14.22; Ps 20 3, etc), and in other ways. Men are exhorted to "remember" God's dealings with them, His commandments (Dt 8 2.18; Jgs 8 34; 1 Ch 16 12, etc), the Sabbath (Ex 20 8), etc. A specially solemn command is that relating to the Lord's Supper in Lk 22 19; 1 Cor 11 24.25, "This do in remembrance of me." "Remembrancer" (writer of chronicles) occurs in AVm of 2 S 8 16; 20 24; 1 K 4 3; 1 Ch 18 15 (text "recorder," RVm "chronicler"). In Isa 62 6, RV reads, "ye that are Jeh's remembrancers." RV has frequent changes on AV text, as "have marked" (1 S 15 2); "make mention of" (Ps 20 7; 77 11; Cant 1 4); "remember" for "be ye mindful of" (1 Ch 16 15); "memorial" for "remembrance" (Isa 57 8); in ARV, "to his holy memorial name" (Ps 30 4; 97 12, ERV "to his holy name," m "Heb 'memorial'"); in 2 Tim 1 5, "having been reminded of" for AV "call to remembrance," etc. W. L. WALKER

REMETH, rē'meth, rem'eth (רַמֶּת, remeth; B, Ρεμμάς, Rhemmás, A, Ραμάθ, Rhamáth): A place in the territory of Issachar named with En-gannim (Josh 19 21). It is probably identical with Ramoth of 1 Ch 6 73, and Jarmuth of Josh 21 29. It is represented today by the village er-Rāmeth, situated on a hill which rises abruptly from the green plain about 11 miles S.W. of Jen'in (En-gannim). While the southern boundary of Issa-char was, roughly, the southern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, the possessions of the tribes seem sometimes to have overlapped. See JARMUTH; RAMOTH.

REMISSION, rē-mish'un, OF SINS (ἀφεσις, áphesis, πάρεσις, páresis): The two Gr words, of which the latter occurs only in Rom 3 25, were tr^d by the same Eng. word in AV. In RV, páresis is tr^d "passing over." It is contrasted with the other term as pretermission with remission. Remission is exemption from the consequences of an offence, forgiveness; pretermission is the suspension of the penalty (Philippi, Ellicott, Trench Synonyms, XXXIII), Weiss; cf Acts 17 30). Cremer (Lexicon of NT Gr) regards the meaning of the two words as identical, except that the one refers to the OT and the other to the NT. Sins are remitted when the offender is treated as though the offence had never been committed. Remission is restricted to the penalty, while forgiveness refers more particularly to the person, although it may be used also of the sin itself. Remission also is used of offences against God's law; forgiveness, against either Divine or human law. See ABSOLUTION; FORGIVENESS. H. E. JACOBS

REMMON, rem'on (רִמּוֹן, rimmōn, Josh 19 7). See RIMMON.

REMMON-METHOAR, rem'on-meth'ō-ār, rem'on-mē-thō'ār (רִמּוֹן הַמֶּתְחָר, rimmōn ha-methō'ār [Josh 19 13]). See RIMMON, (3).

REMNANT, rem'nant: Remnant is the tr of יָתֵר, yether, "what is left over" (Dt 3 11; 28 54; Josh 12 4, etc); of שְׂאֵר, sh'ār, "the rest" (Ezr 3 8 AV; Isa 10 20.21.22; 11 16, etc; Zeph 1 4); more frequently of שְׁאֵרִית, sh'ērith, "residue," etc (2 K 19 4.31; 2 Ch 34 9; Ezr 9 14; Isa 14 30, etc). As the tr of the last-mentioned two words, "remnant" has a special significance in the prophecies of Isaiah, as denoting "a holy seed," or spiritual kernel, of the nation which should survive impending judgment and become the germ of the people of God, being blessed of God and made a blessing (cf Mic 2 12; 4 7; 5 7.8; 7 18; also Zeph 2 7; 3 13; Hag 1 12.14; Zec 8 6; Joel 2 32). Paul, in Rom 9 27, quotes from Isa 10 22 f, "the remnant [κατάλειμμα, "what is left over"] shall be saved"; cf also Rom 11 5 (where the word is leimma) with 2 K 19 4. Several other Heb words are less frequently tr^d "remnant": 'āhar, "after"; yāthar, "to be left over," etc; in the NT (AV) we have also loipós, "left," "remaining" (Mt 22 6; Rev 11 13, etc).

For "remnant" RV has "overhanging part" (Ex 26 12), "rest" (Lev 14 18, etc); on the other hand, gives "remnant" for "posterity" (Gen 45 7), for "rest" (Josh 10 20; 1 Ch 4 43; Isa 10 19), for "residue" (Hag 2 2; Zec 8 11), etc.

REMPHAN, rem'fan. See REPHAN.

RENDING, ren'ding, OF GARMENTS. See BURIAL, IV; DRESS.

RENEW, rē-nū': The word is used in various senses: (1) of material things, e.g. Ps 104 30; here it means to give a new appearance, to refresh, to restore the face of the earth; (2) in 1 S 11 14, to establish more firmly the kingdom by reinstalling King Saul; (3) in 2 Ch 15 8, to rebuild or repair the broken altar; (4) in Lam 5 21, "renew our days," restore the favours of former days; (5) in Isa 41 1, 'let them gather together, or marshal their strongest arguments for answer'; (6) in Ps 103 5;

Isa 40 31, it refers to the restoring of spiritual strength; (7) in the NT it invariably refers to spiritual renewal, e.g. Rom 12 2; 2 Cor 4 16; Eph 4 23; Col 3 10; Tit 3 5; He 6 6; all derivatives of καίνος, kainós, "new."
G. H. GERBERDING

REPAIR, rê-pâr' (מִצְוֵה, mahṣeh, "refuge"): In Joel 3 16, for AV "The Lord will be the hope of his people" AVm renders "place of repair," or "harbour"=haven of repair. RV gives "refuge." Other words are צִוּוּ, hāzak, "to strengthen," "harden," "fix" (2 K 12 5 and often; Neh 3); רָפְאוּ, rāphā', "to heal" (1 K 18 30); עָמַד, amadh, "to cause to stand still" (Ezr 9 9); הָיָה, hāyah, "to revive" (1 Ch 11 8); סָגַר, śāghar, "to close up" (1 K 11 27).

In RV Apoc for ὑποράπτω, hyporrāptō, "to patch up" (Sir 50 1); ἐπισκευάζω, episkeudzō, "to get ready" (1 Macc 12 37). In 1 Macc 14 34 occurs "reparation" (modern Eng. "repairs") for ἐπανόρθωσις, epanórhōsis, "straightening up."

LITERATURE

To get an accurate idea of the precise NT meaning of this highly important word it is necessary to consider its approximate synonyms in the original Heb and Gr. The psychological elements of repentance should be considered in the light of the general teaching of Scripture.

I. OT Terms.—The Heb word נָחַם, nāham, is an onomatopoeic term which implies difficulty in breathing, hence "to pant," "to sigh," "to groan." Naturally it came to signify "to lament" or "to grieve," and when the emotion was produced by the desire of good for others, it merged into compassion and sympathy, and when incited by a consideration of one's own character and deeds it means "to rue," "to repent." To adapt language to our understanding, God is represented as repenting when delayed penalties are at last to be inflicted, or when threatened evils have been averted by genuine reformation (Gen 6 6; Jon 3 10). This word is tr^d "repent" about 40 t in the OT, and in nearly all cases it refers to God. The principal idea is not personal relation to sin, either in its experience of grief or in turning from an evil course. Yet the results of sin are manifest in its use. God's heart is grieved at man's iniquity, and in love He bestows His grace, or in justice He terminates His mercy. It indicates the aroused emotions of God which prompt Him to a different course of dealing with the people. Similarly when used with reference to man, only in this case the consciousness of personal transgression is evident. This distinction in the application of the word is intended by such declarations as God "is not a man, that he should repent" (1 S 15 29; Job 42 6; Jer 8 6).

The term שָׁחַב, shūbh, is most generally employed to express the Scriptural idea of genuine repentance.

It is used extensively by the prophets, and makes prominent the idea of a "to Turn" radical change in one's attitude toward sin and God. It implies a conscious, moral separation, and a personal decision to forsake sin and to enter into fellowship with God. It is employed extensively with reference to man's turning away from sin to righteousness (Dt 4 30; Neh 1 9; Ps 7 12; Jer 3 14). It quite often refers to God in His relation to man (Ex 32 12; Josh 7 26). It is employed to indicate the thorough spiritual change which God alone can effect (Ps 85 4). When the term is tr^d by "return" it has reference either to man, to God, or to God and man (1 S 7 3; Ps 90 13 [both terms, nāham and shūbh]; Isa 21 12; 65 7). Both terms are also sometimes employed when the twofold idea of grief and altered relation is expressed, and are tr^d by "repent" and "return" (Ezk 14 6; Hos 12 6; Jon 3 8).

II. NT Terms.—The term μεταμέλομαι, metamelomai, literally signifies to have a feeling or care, concern or regret; like nāham,

1. Repent, it expresses the emotional aspect of "to Be repentance. The feeling indicated by Careful" or the word may issue in genuine repentance, or it may degenerate into mere remorse (Mt 21 29,32; 27 3). Judas repented only in the sense of regret, remorse, and not in the sense of the abandonment of sin. The word is used with reference to Paul's feeling concerning a certain course of conduct, and with reference to God in His attitude toward His purposes of grace (2 Cor 7 8 AV; He 7 21).

The word μετανοέω, metanoōō, expresses the true NT idea of the spiritual change implied in a sinner's return to God. The term signifies

2. Repent, "to have another mind," to change "to Change the opinion or purpose with regard to the Mind" sin. It is equivalent to the OT word "turn." Thus it is employed by John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles (Mt 3 2; Mk 1 15; Acts 2 38). The idea expressed by the word is intimately associated with different aspects of spiritual transformation and of Christian life, with the process in which the agency of man is prominent, as faith (Acts 20 21), and as conversion (Acts 3 19); also with those experiences and blessings of which God alone is the author, as remission and forgiveness of sin (Lk 24 47; Acts 6 31). It is sometimes conjoined with baptism, which as an overt public act proclaims a changed relation to sin and God (Mk 1 4; Lk 3 3; Acts 13 24; 19 4). As a vital experience, repentance is to manifest its reality by producing good fruits appropriate to the new spiritual life (Mt 3 8).

The word ἐπιστρέφω, epistréphō, is used to bring out more clearly the distinct change wrought in repentance. It is employed quite

3. Repent, frequently in Acts to express the positive side of a change involved in NT "to Turn repentance, or to indicate the return Over" or "Upon," to God of which the turning from sin "Unto" is the negative aspect. The two conceptions are inseparable and complementary. The word is used to express the spiritual transition from sin to God (Acts 9 35; 1 Thess 1 9); to strengthen the idea of faith (Acts 11 21); and to complete and emphasize the change required by NT repentance (Acts 26 20).

There is great difficulty in expressing the true idea of a change of thought with reference to sin when we translate the NT "repentance" into other languages. The Lat version renders it "exercise penitence" (poenitentiam agere). But "penitence" etymologically signifies pain, grief, distress, rather than a change of thought and purpose. Thus Lat Christianity has been corrupted by the pernicious error of presenting grief over sin rather than abandonment of sin as the primary idea of NT repentance. It was easy to make the transition from penitence to penance, consequently the Romanists represent Jesus and the apostles as urging people to do penance (poenitentiam agite). The Eng.

word "repent" is derived from the Lat repenitēre, and inherits the fault of the Lat, making grief the principal idea and keeping in the background, if not altogether out of sight, the fundamental NT conception of a change of mind with reference to sin. But the exhortations of the ancient prophets, of Jesus, and of the apostles show that the change of mind is the dominant idea of the words employed, while the accompanying grief and consequent reformation enter into one's experience from the very nature of the case.

III. The Psychological Elements.—Repentance is that change of a sinner's mind which leads him to turn from his evil ways and live.

1. The Intellectual Element The change wrought in repentance is so deep and radical as to affect the whole spiritual nature and to involve the entire personality. The intellect must function, the emotions must be aroused, and the will must act. Psychology shows repentance to be profound, personal and all-pervasive. The intellectual element is manifest from the nature of man as an intelligent being, and from the demands of God who desires only rational service. Man must apprehend sin as unutterably heinous, the Divine law as perfect and inexorable, and himself as coming short or falling below the requirements of a holy God (Job 42 5.6; Ps 51 3; Rom 3 20).

There may be a knowledge of sin without turning from it as an awful thing which dishonors God and ruins man. The change of view may lead only to a dread of punishment and not to the hatred and abandonment of sin (Ex 9 27; Nu 22 34; Josh 7 20; 1 S 15 24; Mt 27 4).

2. The Emotional Element An emotional element is necessarily involved in repentance. While feeling is not the equivalent of repentance, it nevertheless may be a powerful impulse to a genuine turning from sin. A penitent cannot from the nature of the case be stolid and indifferent. The emotional attitude must be altered if NT repentance be experienced. There is a type of grief that issues in repentance and another which plunges into remorse. There is a godly sorrow and also a sorrow of the world. The former brings life; the latter, death (Mt 27 3; Lk 18 23; 2 Cor 7 9.10). There must be a consciousness of sin in its effect on man and in its relation to God before there can be a hearty turning away from unrighteousness. The feeling naturally accompanying repentance implies a conviction of personal sin and sinfulness and an earnest appeal to God to forgive according to His mercy (Ps 51 1.2.10-14).

The most prominent element in the psychology of repentance is the voluntary, or volitional. This aspect of the penitent's experience is expressed in the OT by "turn," or

3. The Volitional Element "return," and in the NT by "repent," or "turn." The words employed in the Heb and Gr place chief emphasis on the will, the change of mind, or of purpose, because a complete and sincere turning to God involves both the apprehension of the nature of sin and the consciousness of personal guilt (Jer 25 5; Mk 1 15; Acts 2 38; 2 Cor 7 9.10). The demand for repentance implies free will and individual responsibility. That men are called upon to repent there can be no doubt, and that God is represented as taking the initiative in repentance is equally clear. The solution of the problem belongs to the spiritual sphere. The psychological phenomena have their origin in the mysterious relations of the human and the Divine personalities. There can be no external substitute for the internal change. Sackcloth for the body and remorse for the soul are not to be confused with a determined abandonment of sin and return to God. Not material sacrifice, but a spiritual change, is the inexorable demand of God in both dispensations (Ps 51 17; Isa 1 11; Jer 6 20; Hos 6 6).

Repentance is only a condition of salvation and not its meritorious ground. The motives for repentance are chiefly found in the goodness of God, in Divine love, in the pleading desire to have sinners saved, in the inevitable consequences of sin, in the universal demands of the gospel, and in the hope of spiritual life and membership in the kingdom of heaven (Ezk 33 11; Mk 1 15; Lk 13 1-5; Jn 3 16; Acts 17 30; Rom 2 4; 1 Tim 2 4). The first four beatitudes (Mt 5 3-6) form a heavenly ladder by which penitent souls pass from the dominion of Satan into the Kingdom of God. A consciousness of spiritual poverty dethroning pride, a sense of personal unworthiness producing grief, a willingness to surrender to God in genuine humility, and a strong spiritual desire developing into hunger and thirst, enter into the experience of one who wholly abandons sin and heartily turns to Him who grants repentance unto life.

REPETITIONS, rep-ēt-tish'unz: In Mt 6 7 only, "Use not vain repetitions," for βατταλογέω, battalogēō (so NB), a word found nowhere else and spelled variously in the MSS, battologēō in K L M, etc, batologēō in F G, blatologēō in D (probably influenced by the Lat blatero, "talk idly"); presumably connected with βατταλίω, battarizō, "stammer," and perhaps formed under the influence of the Aram. b'tā, "speak carelessly," or b'āṭel, "useless." Whether, however, battalogēō means the constant repetition of the same phrase or the mechanical recitation of a long series of obscure or meaningless formulas (if, indeed, a distinction between the acts was thought of) cannot be determined. Either practice is abundantly evidenced as a "heathen" custom of the day, and either can be classed as "much speaking." See PRAYER.

REPHAEL, rē'fā-el, rē'fā-el (רפאל), r'phā'el, "God has healed"; Ραφαήλ, Rhaphaēl): The eponym of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26 7). The name occurs in Tob and En ("Raphael"); it probably belongs to a group of late formations. See Gray, HPN, 225, 311.

REPHAH, rē'fa (רפח), rephah [the form is corrupt]; Ράφη, Rhaphē): The eponym of an Ephraimite family (1 Ch 7 25).

REPHAIHAH, rē-fā'ya, rē-fi'a (רפיה), r'phāyāh, probably "Jeh is healing"; LXX Ραφαία[s], Rhaphaiā[s]:

(1) In David's family, LXX also Rhaphāl (1 Ch 3 21).

(2) A captain of Simeon (1 Ch 4 42).

(3) A grandson of Issachar, LXX also Rhapharā (1 Ch 7 2).

(4) A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 9 43; in 8 37 called "Raphah" רפח); LXX also Raphai.

(5) One of the repairers of the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3 9).

REPHAIM, rē'fā-im, rē-fā'im (רפאים), r'phā'im, from רפף, rāphā, "a terrible one," hence "giant," as in 1 Ch 20 4, גִּבְרֵי הָרָפָאִים, gībhērē hā-rāphā'im, "sons of the giant"; AV Rephaims): A race of aboriginal or early inhabitants E. of the Jordan in Ashteroth-karnaim (Gen 14 5) and in the vale of Rephaim S.W. of Jerus (Josh 15 8). They associated with other giant races, as the Emim and Anakim (Dt 2 10.11) and the Zamzummim (ver 20). It is probable that they were all of the same stock, being given different names by the different tribes who came in contact with them. The same Heb word is rendered "the dead," or "the shades" in various passages (Job 26 5 m; Ps 88 10 m; Prov 2 18 m; 9 18 m; 21 16 m; Isa 14 9 m; 26 14.19 m). In these instances the word is derived from רָפָה, rāp̄eh, "weak," "powerless," "a shadow" or "shade."

REPHAIM, VALE OF (רְפָאִים, ṛēphā'im; κοιλὰς Ῥαφαίμ, koilās R̄haphaēim, κοιλὰς τῶν Τιτάνων, koilās tōn Titānōn): This was a fertile vale (Isa 17 5), to the S.W. of Jerus (Josh 15 8; 18 16; AV "Valley of the Giants"), on the border between Judah and Benjamin. Here David repeatedly defeated the invading Philis (2 S 5 18. 22; 23 13; 1 Ch 11 15; 14 9). It is located by Jos between Jerus and Bethlehem (Ant, VII, iv, i; xii, 4). It corresponds to the modern el-Bika', which falls away to the S.W. from the lip of the valley of Hinnom. The name in ancient times may perhaps have covered a larger area, including practically all the land between Jerus and Bethlehem, where the head-waters of Nahr Rubin are collected.

REPHAN, rē'fan: A name for Chiun, the planet Saturn. See ASTROLOGY, 7; CHIUN.

REPHIDIM, ref'i-dim (רְפִידִים, rēphīdhīm, "rests"; Ῥαφιδίμ, R̄haphidīm): A station in the Wanderings, between the wilderness of Sin and the wilderness of Sinai (Ex 17 1.8; 19 2; Nu 33 14). The host expected to find water here; to their distress the streams were dry, and water was miraculously provided. Palmer (Desert of the Exodus, 158 ff) states cogent reasons for identifying Rephidim with Wādī Feirān. It is the most fertile part of the peninsula, well watered, with a palm grove stretching for miles along the valley. Palmer speaks of passing through the palm grove as a "most delightful" walk; "the tall, graceful trees afforded a delicious shade, fresh water ran at our feet, and, above all, bulbuls flitted from branch to branch uttering their sweet notes." His camp was pitched at "the mouth of Wādī 'Aleyāt, a large open space completely surrounded by steep, shelving mountains of gneiss, the fantastic cleavage of which added greatly to the beauty of the scene. Palms and tamarisks were dotted all around, and on every knoll and mountain slope were ruined houses, churches, and walls, the relics of the ancient monastic city of Paran. Behind our tents rose the majestic mass of Serbal, and beneath the rocky wall opposite ran a purling brook, only a few inches in depth, but still sufficiently cool, clear, and refreshing."

Such a place as this the Amalekites would naturally wish to preserve for themselves against an invading people. For these desert dwellers, indeed, the possession of this watered vale may well have been a matter of life and death.

If this identification is correct, then Jebel Tahūneh, "Mount of the mill," a height that rises on the N. of the valley, may have been the hill from which Moses, with Aaron and Hur, viewed the battle.

REPROBATE, rep'rō-bāt: This word occurs in the Eng. Bible in the following passages: Jer 6 30 (RV "refuse"); Rom 1 28; 2 Cor 13 5.6.7; 2 Tim 3 8; Tit 1 16. In all these cases the Gr has ἀδόκιμος, adōkimos. The same Gr word, however, is found with other renderings in Isa 1 22 ("dross"); Prov 25 4 ("dross"); 1 Cor 9 27 ("castaway," RV "rejected"). The primary meaning of ado- kimos is "not-received," "not-acknowledged." This is applied to precious metals or money, in the sense of "not-current," to which, however, the connotation "not-genuine" easily attaches itself. It is also applied to persons who do not or ought not to receive honor or recognition. This purely negative conception frequently passes over into the positive one of that which is or ought to be rejected, either by God or men. Of the above passages 1 Cor 9 27 uses the word in this meaning. Probably Rom 1 28, "God gave them up unto a reprobate mind," must be explained on the same principle: the noūs of the idolatrous heathen is permitted by God to fall into such extreme forms of evil as to meet with the universal rejection and reprobation of men. Wettstein's interpretation, "an unfit mind," i.e. incapable of properly performing its function of moral discrimination, has no linguistic warrant, and obliterates the word-play between "they refused to have God in their knowledge [ouk edokimasan]," and "God gave them up to a reprobate [=unacknowledged, adokimos] mind." Even Tit 1 16, "unto every good work reprobate," affords no instance of the meaning "unfit," but belongs to the following rubric.

The close phonetic resemblance and etymological affinity of dokimos to the vb. dokimázō, "to try," "test," has caused the notion of "being tested," "tried," and its opposite of "being found wanting in the test" to associate itself more or less distinctly with the adjs. dokimos and adokimos. Thus the more complex meaning results of that which is acknowledged or rejected, because it has approved or not approved itself in testing. This connotation is present in 2 Cor 13 5.6.7; 2 Tim 3 8; Tit 1 16; He 6 8. In the first two of these passages the word is used of Christians who ostensibly were in the true faith, but either hypothetically or actually are represented as having failed to meet the test. "Reprobate unto every good work" (Tit 1 16) are they who by their life have disappointed the expectation of good works. The "reprobate [rejected] land" of He 6 8 is land that by bearing thorns and thistles has failed to meet the test of the husbandman. It should be noticed, however, that adokimos, even in these cases, always retains the meaning of rejection because of failure in trial; cf in the last-named passage: "rejected and nigh unto cursing."

REPROOF, rē-prōōf', REPROVE, rē-prōōv': "Reprove" in Elizabethan Eng. had a variety of meanings ("reject," "disprove," "convince," "rebuke"), with "put to the proof" (see 2 Tim 4 2 RVm) as the force common to all, although in modern Eng. the word means only "rebuke" (with a connotation of deliberateness). AV uses the word chiefly (and RV exclusively, except in 2 Esd 12 32; 14 13; 2 Macc 4 33) for קָרַח, yākhah, and ἐλέγχω, elēghō, words that have very much the same ambiguities of meaning. Hence a fairly easy rendition into Eng. was possible, but the result included all the ambiguities of the original, and to modern readers such a passage as "But your reproof, what doth it reprove? Do ye think to reprove words" (Job 6 25.26 ARV) is virtually incomprehensible. The meaning is, approximately: "What do your rebukes prove? Are you quibbling about words?" In Jn 16 8 no single word in modern Eng. will translate elēghō, and "reprove" (AV), "convince" (AVm), and "convict" (RV) are all unsatisfactory. The sense is: "The Spirit will teach men the true meaning of these three words: sin, righteousness, judgment."

REPTILE, rep'til, -tīl: Vulg in Mic 7 17 has reptilis for zōhālē, "crawling things," ARV "worms of the earth," AVm "creeping things." See LEVIATHAN; LIZARD; SERPENT; TORTOISE.

REPUTATION, rep-ū-tā'shun: AV uses "reputation" where modern Eng. would use "repute," as connoting prominence rather than moral character. Hence RV's change to "repute" in Gal 2 2 (for δοκέω, dokēō, "seem," perhaps with a slightly sarcastic touch). RV's alteration of "reputation" into "have in honor" (Acts 5 34; Phil 2 29) is to secure uniformity of tr for the derivatives of τιμή, timē, "honor," but RV retains "reputation" in Sus ver 64. AV's "made himself of no reputation" in Phil 2 7 is a gloss. See KENOSIS. On Eccl 10 1 see the commentaries.

REQUIRE, rē-kwīr': "Require" meant originally "seek after," whence "ask," and so (as in modern Eng.) "demand." All meanings are common in AV (e.g. 1 S 21 8; Eccl 3 15; Ezr 8 22; 1 Cor 4 2), and RV has made little change.

REReward, rēr'wōrd. See REARWARD.

RESAIAS, rē-sā'yas, rē-sī'as (Ῥησαίας, Rhēsaias; AV Reesaias): One of the "leaders" with Zerubabel in the return (1 Esd 5 8) = "Reelaiah" in Ezr 2 2, "Raamiah" in Neh 7 7. The name is apparently duplicated in 1 Esd 5 8 in the form "Reelias."

RESEN, rē'sen (רֶסֶן, resen; LXX Δάσεν, Dásen, Δάσεμ, Dásem): The Gr forms show that the LXX translators had Ῥ, d, for ר, r, but the reading of the MT is to be preferred.

1. The Name and Its Native Equivalent Resen—the last of the four cities mentioned in Gen 10 11.12 as having been founded by Nimrod (AV by Asshur)—probably represents the Assyrian pronunciation of the place-name Rēš-ēni, "fountain-head." The only town so named in the inscriptions is one of 18 mentioned by Sennacherib in the Bavarian inscription as places from which he dug canals connecting with the river Khosr—in fact, it was one of the sources of Nineveh's water supply. It probably lay too far N., however, to be the city here intended. Naturally the name "Resen" could exist in any place where there was a spring.

As the Bib. text requires a site lying between Nineveh and Calah (Kouyunjik and Nimroud), it is generally thought to be represented by the ruins at Selamiyeh, about 3 miles N. of the latter city. It is noteworthy that Xenophon (Anab. iii.4) mentions a "great" city called Larissa as occupying this position, and Bochart has suggested that it is the same place. He supposes that when the inhabitants were asked to what city the ruins belonged, they answered la Resen, "to Resen," which was reproduced by the Greeks as Larissa. Xenophon describes its walls as being 25 ft. wide, 100 ft. high, and 2 parasangs in circuit. Except for the stone plinth 20 ft. high, they were of brick. He speaks of a stone-built pyramid near the city—possibly the temple-tower at Nimroud. See CALAH; NINEVEH, 10. T. G. PINCHES RESERVOIR, rez'ēr-vwōr, -vwār (מִקְוֵה, mīk-wāh; AV ditch [Isa 22 11]). See DITCH; CISTERN; POOL.

RESH, resh, rāsh (ר): The 20th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as r. It came also to be used for the number 200. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

RESHEPH, rē'shef (רֶשֶׁף, resheph, "flame" or "fire-bolt"): Personal name found in Phoen as a divine name. In the OT the name of a descendant of Ephraim, the eponym of an Ephraimite family or clan (1 Ch 7 25).

RESIDUE, rez'i-dū. See REMNANT.

RESPECT, rē-spekt', OF PERSONS: The phrase נָשָׂא פָּנִים, nāsā' phānim, means lit. "lift up the face," and, among other trs, is rendered indifferently "accept" or "respect the person" in AV (contrast Prov 18 5 and 24 23). As applied to a (prostrate) suppliant, the phrase means "receive him with favor," and is so used in 1 S 25 35; Mal 1 8.9 (cf Gen 19 21, etc). By a shift in force the phrase came to mean "accept the person instead of the cause" or "show partiality" (Job 13 8.10 ARV), and is so used commonly. A literal tr into Gr gave λαμβάνω πρόσωπον, lambánō próswpon (Sir 35 13 [32 16]; Lk 20 21; Gal 2 6), with the noun προσωπολήψια, prosōpolēpsia, "face-taking" (Rom 2 11; Eph 6 9; Col 3 25; Jas 2 1), rendered uniformly "respect of persons" in EV. A noun προσωπολήπτης, prosōpolēptēs, "respector of persons," and a vb. προσωπολήπτειν, prosōpolēptēō, are found Acts 10 34; Jas 2 9. God's judgment rests solely on the character of the man and will be influenced by no worldly (Eph 6 9) or national (Rom 2 11) considerations. See also ACCEPT. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

REST (נָח, nūsh, מְנוּחָה, m'nūhāh, "cessation from motion," "peace," "quiet," etc; ἀνάπαυσις, anápausis, κατάπαυσις, katápausis): "Rest" in the above sense is of frequent occurrence, and is the tr of several words with various applications and shades of meaning, chiefly of the words given above. It is applied to God as ceasing from the work of creating on the 7th day (Gen 2 2 f); as having His place of rest in the midst of His people in the temple (1 Ch 28 2; Ps 132 8.14); as resting in His love among His people (Zeph 3 17, RVm "Heb, 'be silent'"). The 7th day was to be one of rest (Ex 16 23; 31 15; see SABBATH); the land also was to have its rest in the 7th year (Lev 25 4 f). Jeh promised His people rest in the land He should give them; this they looked forward to and enjoyed (Dt 12 9; Josh 11 23). "To rest on" often means to come upon to abide, as of the Spirit of Jeh (Nu 11 25 f; Isa 11 2), of wisdom (Prov 14 33), of anger (Eccl 7 9). There is again the "rest" of the grave (Job 3 13.17.18; Isa 57 2; Dnl 12 13). Rest is sometimes equivalent to trust, reliance (2 Ch 14 11, RV "rely"). Hence rest in Jeh (Ps 37 7, etc); "rest" in the spiritual sense is not, however, prominent in the OT. In the NT Christ's great offer is rest to the soul (Mt 11 28). In He 4 1 ff, it is argued from God's having promised His people a "rest"—a promise not realized in Canaan (ver 8)—that there remains for the people of God "a Sabbath rest" (sabbatismós, ver 9). For "rest" RV has "solemn rest" (Ex 16 23; 31 15, etc), "resting-place" (Ps 132 8.14; Isa 11 10), "peace" (Acts 9 31), "relief" (2 Cor 2 13; 7 5), etc. See also REMNANT. W. L. WALKER

RESTITUTION, res-ti-tū'shun, RESTORATION. See PUNISHMENTS.

RESTORATION, res-tō-rā'shun: The idea of a restoration of the world had its origin in the preaching of the OT prophets. Their faith in the unique position and mission of Israel as the chosen people of God inspired in them the conviction that the destruction of the nation would eventually be followed by a restoration under conditions that would insure the realization of the original Divine purpose. When the restoration came and passed without fulfilment of this hope, the Messianic era was projected into the future. By the time of Jesus the conception became more or less spiritualized, and the anticipation of a new order in which the consequences of sin would no longer appear was a prominent feature of the Messianic conception. In the teaching of Jesus and the apostles such a restoration is taken for granted as a matter of course.

In Mt 17 11 (cf Mk 9 12), the moral and spiritual regeneration preached by John the Baptist is described as a restoration and viewed as a fulfilment of Mal 4 6. It is to be observed, however, that the work of John could be characterized as a restoration only in the sense of an inception of the regeneration that was to be completed by Jesus. In Mt 19 28 Jesus speaks of a regeneration (παλιγγενεσία, palingenesia) of the world in terms that ascribe to the saints a state of special felicity. Perhaps the most pointed expression of the idea of a restoration as a special event or crisis is found in the address of Peter (Acts 3 21), where the restoration is described as an ἀποκατάστασις πάντων, apokatastasis pantōn, and is viewed as a fulfilment of prophecy.

In all the passages cited the restoration is assumed as a matter with which the hearers are familiar, and consequently its nature is not unfolded. The evidence is, therefore, too limited to justify any attempt to outline its special features. Under such circumstances there is grave danger of reading into the language of the Scriptures one's own conception of what the restoration is to embody. We are probably expressing the full warrant of the Scripture when we say that the reconstruction mentioned in these passages contemplates the restoration of man, under the reign of Christ, to a life in which the consequences of sin are no longer present, and that this reconstruction is to include in some measure a regeneration of both the physical and the spiritual world.

Whether the benefits of the restoration are to accrue to all men is also left undefined in the Scriptures. In the passages already cited only the disciples of Christ appear in the field of vision. Certain sayings of Jesus are sometimes regarded as favorable to the more inclusive view. In Jn 12 32 Jesus speaks of drawing all men to Himself, but here, as in Jn 3 14.15, it is to be observed that while Christ's sacrifice includes all men in its scope, its benefits will doubtless accrue to those only who respond willingly to His drawing power. The saying of Caiaphas (Jn 11 52) is irrelevant, for the phrase, "the children of God that are scattered abroad," probably refers only to the worthy Jews of the dispersion. Neither can the statements of Paul (Rom 11 32; 1 Cor 15 22; Eph 1 9.10; Col 1 20; 1 Tim 2 4; 4 10; Tit 2 11) be pressed in favor of the restorationist view. They affirm only that God's plan makes provision for the redemption of all, and that His saving will is universal. But men have wills of their own, and whether they share in the benefits of the salvation provided depends on their availing themselves of its privileges. The doctrine of the restoration of all can hardly be deduced from the NT. See also PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING. RUSSELL BENJAMIN MILLER

I. Israel and Immortality.—It is very remarkable that a doctrine of life after death as an essential part of religion was of very late development in Israel, although this doctrine, often highly elaborated, was commonly held among the surrounding nations. The chief cause of this lateness was that Israel's religion centered predominantly in the ideal of a holy nation. Consequently the individual was a secondary object of consideration, and the future of the man who died before the national promises were fulfilled either was merged in the future of his descendants or else was disregarded altogether.

Much speculation about life after death evidently existed, but it was not in direct connection with the nation's religion. Therefore the OT data are scanty and point, as might be expected, to non-homogeneous concepts. Still, certain ideas are clear.

The living individual was composed of "flesh" and nephesh, or rūḥ (a trichotomy appears to be post-Bib., despite 1 Thess 5 23; see PSYCHOLOGY). In the individual nephesh and rūḥ seem to be fairly synonymous words, meaning primarily "breath," as the animating principle of the flesh (so for the lower animals in Ps 104 29.30). But nephesh came to be used to denote the "inner man" or "self" (Dt 12 20, etc; see HEART), and so in EV is usually rendered "soul." But there are only a very few cases where nephesh is used for the seat of the personality after death (Ps 30 3; cf 16 10; Isa 38 17; Job 33 18, etc), and nearly all of such passages seem quite late. Indeed, in some 13 cases the nephesh of a dead man is unmistakably his corpse (Lev 19 28; Nu 5 2; Hag 2 13, etc). It seems the question of what survives death was hardly raised; whatever existed then was thought of as something quite new. On the one hand the dead man could be called a "god" (1 S 28 13), a term perhaps related to ancestor-worship. But more commonly the dead are thought of as "shades," rēphā'im (Job 26 5 m, etc), weak copies of the original man in all regards (Ezk 32 25). But, whatever existence such "shades" might have, they had passed out of relation to Jeh, whom the "dead praise not" (Ps 115 17.18; Isa 38 18.19), and there was no religious interest in them.

Indeed, any interest taken in them was likely to be anti-religious, as connected with necromancy, etc (Dt 14 1; 26 14; Isa 8 19; Ps

3. Religious Danger 106 28, etc; see SORCERY), or as connected with foreign religions. Here, probably, the very fact that the surrounding nations taught immortality was a strong reason for Israel's refusing to consider it. That Egypt held an elaborate doctrine of individual judgment at death, or that Persia taught the resurrection of the body, would actually tend to render these doctrines suspicious, and it was not until the danger of syncretism seemed past that such beliefs could be considered on their own merits. Hence it is not surprising that the prophets virtually disregard the idea or that Eccl denies any immortality doctrine categorically.

None the less, with a fuller knowledge of God, wider experience, and deeper reflection, the doctrine was bound to come. But it came slowly. Individualism reaches explicit statement in Ezk 14, 18, 33 (cf Dt 24 16; Jer 31 29,30), but the national point of view still made the rewards and punishments of the individual matters of this world only (Ezk 14 14; Ps 37, etc), a doctrine that had surprising vitality and that is found as late as Sir (1 13; 11 26). But as this does not square with the facts of life (Job), a doctrine of immortality, already hinted at (II, 1, below), was inevitable. It appears in full force in the post-Maccabean period, but why just then is hard to say; perhaps because it was then that there had been witnessed the spectacle of martyrdoms on a large scale (1 Macc 1 60-64).

Resurrection of the body was the form immortality took, in accord with the religious premises.

As the saint was to find his happiness in the nation, he must be restored to the nation; and the older views did not point toward pure soul-immortality. The "shades" led a wretched existence at the best; and St. Paul himself shudders at the thought of "nakedness" (2 Cor 5 3). The nepesh and rū'ah were uncertain quantities, and even the NT has no consistent terminology for the immortal part of man ("soul," Rev 6 9; 20 4; "spirit," He 12 23; 1 Pet 3 19; St. Paul avoids any term in 1 Cor 15, and in 2 Cor 5 says: "I"). In the Talm a common view is that the old bodies will receive new souls (Ber. R. 2 7; 6 7; Vayy. R. 12 2; 15 1, etc; cf Sib Or 4 187).

Where direct Gr influence, however, can be predicated, pure soul-immortality is found (cf Wisd 8 19,20; 9 15 [but Wisd's true teaching is very uncertain]; En 102 4-105; 108; Slav En; 4 Macc; Jos, and esp. Philo). According to Jos (BJ, II, viii, 11) the Essenes held this doctrine, but as Jos graecizes the Pharisaic resurrection into Pythagorean soul-migration (II, viii, 14; contrast Ant. XVIII, i, 3), his evidence is doubtful. Note, moreover, how Lk 6 9; 9 25; 12 4,5 has reworded Mk 3 4; 8 36; Mt 10 28 for Gr readers. In a vague way even Palestinian Judaism had something of the same concepts (2 Esd 7 88; 2 Cor 4 16; 12 2), while it is commonly held that the souls in the intermediate state can enjoy happiness, a statement first appearing in En 22 (Jub 23 31 is hardly serious).

II. Resurrection in the OT and Intermediate Literature.—For the reasons given above, references in the OT to the resurrection doctrine

1. The OT are few. Probably it is to be found in Ps 17 15; 16 11; 49 15; 73 24, and in each case with increased probability, but for exact discussions the student must consult the comms. Of course no exact dating of these Ps passages is possible. With still higher probability the doctrine is expressed in Job 14 13-15; 19 25-29, but again alternative explanations are just possible, and, again, Job is a notoriously hard book to date (see Job, Book of). The two certain passages are Isa 26 19 m and Dnl 12 2. In the former (to be dated about 332 [?]) it is promised that the "dew of light" shall fall on the earth and so the "righteous" dead shall revive. But this resurrection is confined to Pal and does not include the unrighteous. For Dnl 12 2 see below.

Indeed, resurrection for the righteous only was thought of much more naturally than a general resurrection. And still more naturally

2. The Righteous a resurrection of martyrs was thought of, such simply receiving back what they had given up for God. So in En 90 33 (prior to 107 BC) and 2 Macc 7 9,11, 23; 14 46 (only martyrs are mentioned in 2 Macc); cf Rev 20 4. But of course the idea once given could not be restricted to martyrs only, and the intermediate lit. contains so many references to the resurrection of the righteous as to debar citation. Early passages are En 91 10 (perhaps pre-Maccabean); XII P, Test. Judah 25 4 (before 107). A very curious passage is En 25 6, where the risen saints merely live longer than did their fathers, i.e. resurrection does not imply immortality. This passage seems to be unique.

For a resurrection of unrighteous men (Dnl 12 2; En 22 11; XII P, Test. Benj. 10 7,8, Armenian text —in none of these cases a general resurrection), a motive is given in En 22 13: for such men the mere condition of Sheol is not punishment enough.

For a general resurrection the motive is always the final judgment, so that all human history may be summed up in one supreme act. The idea is not very common, and XII P, Test. Benj. 10 7,8 (Gr text); Bar 50 2; En 61 1; Sib Or 4 178-90; Life of Adam (Gr) 10, and 2 Esd 5 45; 7 32; 14 35 about account for all the unequivocal passages. It is not found in the earliest part of the Talm. XII P, Test. Benj. 10 7,8 (Gr) has two resurrections.

Finally, much of the lit. knows no immortality at all. Eccl, Sir and 1 Macc are the most familiar examples, but there are many others.

4. Complete Denial It is esp. interesting that the very spiritual author of 2 Esd did not think it worth while to modify the categorical denial in the source used in 13 20. Of course, the Jewish party that persisted most in a denial of any resurrection was the Sadducees (Mt 22 23 and ||'s; Acts 23 8), with an extreme conservatism often found among aristocrats.

III. Teaching of Christ.—The question is discussed explicitly in the familiar passage Mk 12 18-27 || Mt 22 23-33 || Lk 20 27-38.

1. Mk 12: 18-27 The Sadducees assumed that resurrection implies simply a resuscitation to a resumption of human functions, including the physical side of marriage. Their error lay in the low idea of God. For the Scriptures teach a God whose ability and willingness to care for His creatures are so unlimited that the destiny He has prepared for them is caricatured if conceived in any terms but the absolutely highest. Hence there follows not only the truth of the resurrection, but a resurrection to a state as far above the sexual sphere as that of the angels. (The possibility of mutual recognition by husband and wife is irrelevant, nor is it even said that the resurrection bodies are asexual.) Luke (20 36) adds the explanation that, as there are to be no deaths, marriage (in its relation to births) will not exist. It may be thought that Christ's argument would support equally well the immortality of the soul only, and, as a matter of fact, the same argument is used for the latter doctrine in 4 Macc 7 18,19; 16 25. But in Jerus and under the given circumstances this is quite impossible. And, moreover, it would seem that any such dualism would be a violation of Christ's teaching as to God's care.

However, the argument seems to touch only the resurrection of the righteous, esp. in the form given in Lk (cf Lk 14 14). (But that Luke thought of so limiting the resurrection is disproved by Acts 24 15.) Similarly in Mt 8 11 || Lk 13 28; Mk 13 27 || Mt 24 31. But, as a 2. In Gen-eral feature in the Judgment, the resurrection of all men is taught. Then the men of Sodom, Tyre, Nineveh appear (Mt 11 22,24; 12 41,42 || Lk 10 14; 11 32), and those cast into Gehenna are represented as having a body (Mk 9 43-47; Mt 5 29,30; 10 28; 18 8,9). And at the great final assize (Mt 25 31-46) all men appear. In the Fourth Gospel a similar distinction is made (6 39,40,44,54; 11 25), the resurrection of the righteous, based on their union with God through Christ and their present possession of this union, and (in 5 28,29) the general resurrection to judgment. Whether these passages imply two resurrections or emphasize only the extreme difference in conditions at the one cannot be determined.

The passages in 4 Macc referred to above read: "They who care for piety with their whole heart, they alone are able to conquer the impulses of the flesh, believing that like our patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, they do not die to God but live to God" (7 18,19); and "They knew that dying for God they would live to God, even as Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the patriarchs" (16 25). It is distinctly possible that Our Lord's words may have been known to the author of 4 Macc, although the possibility that Christ approved and broadened the tenets of some spiritually-minded few is not to be disregarded. More possible is it that 4 Macc influenced Luke's Gr phraseology. See MACCABEES, BOOK OF, IV.

IV. The Apostolic Doctrine.—For the apostles, Christ's victory over death took the resurrection doctrine out of the realm of speculative eschatology. Henceforth it is a fact of experience, basic for Christianity. Direct references in the NT

1. Refer-ences are found in Acts 4 2; 17 18,32; 23 6; 24 15,21; Rom 4 17; 5 17; 6 5,8; 8 11; 11 15; 1 Cor 6 14; 15; 2 Cor 1 9; 4 14; 5 1-10; Phil 3 10. 11,21; Col 1 18; 1 Thess 4 13-18; 2 Tim 2 18; He 6 2; 11 19,35; Rev 20 4,5 (martyrs only); 20 12,13. Of these only Acts 24 15; Rev 20 12, 13, refer to a general resurrection with absolute unambiguity, but the doctrine is certainly contained in others and in 2 Tim 4 1 besides.

A theology of the resurrection is given fully by St. Paul. Basic is the conception of the union of the believer with Christ, so that our resurrection follows from His (esp.

2. Pauline Doctrine Rom 6 5-11; Phil 3 10,11). Every deliverance from danger is a foretaste of the resurrection (2 Cor 4 10,11). Indeed so certain is it, that it may be spoken of as accomplished (Eph 2 6). From another standpoint, the resurrection is simply part of God's general redemption of Nature at the consummation (Rom 8 11. 18-25). As the believer then passes into a condition of glory, his body must be altered for the new conditions (1 Cor 15 50; Phil 3 21); it becomes a "spiritual" body, belonging to the realm of the spirit (not "spiritual" in opposition to "material"). Nature shows us how different "bodies" can be—from the "body" of the sun to the bodies of the lowest animals the kind depends merely on the creative will of God (1 Cor 15 38-41). Nor is the idea of a change in the body of the same thing unfamiliar: look at the difference in the "body" of a grain of wheat at its sowing and after it is grown! (ver 37). Just so, I am "sown" or sent into the world (probably not "buried") with one kind of body, but my resurrection will see me with a body adapted to my life with Christ and God (vs 42-44). If I am still alive at the Parousia, this new body shall be clothed upon my present body (vs 53,54; 2 Cor 5 2-4). otherwise I shall be raised in it

(ver 52). This body exists already in the heavens (2 Cor 5 1,2), and when it is clothed upon me the natural functions of the present body will be abolished (1 Cor 6 13). Yet a motive for refraining from impurity is to keep undefiled the body that is to rise (1 Cor 6 13,14).

The relation of the matter in the present body to that in the resurrection body was a question St. Paul never raised. In 1 Cor 6 13,14

3. Conti-nuity it appears that he thought of the body as something more than the sum of its organs, for the organs perish, but the body is raised. Nor does he discuss the eventual fate of the dead body. The imagery of 1 Thess 4 16,17; 1 Cor 15 52 is that of leaving the graves, and in the case of Christ's resurrection, the type of ours, that which was buried was that which was raised (1 Cor 15 4). Perhaps the thought is that the touch of the resurrection body destroys all things in the old body that are unadapted to the new state; perhaps there is an idea that the essence of the old body is what we might call "non-material," so that decay simply anticipates the work the resurrection will do. At all events, such reflections are "beyond what is written."

A partial parallel to the idea of the resurrection body being already in heaven is found in Slav

En 22 8,9, where the soul receives clothing laid up for it (cf Asc Isa 7 Ch 5 22,23 and possibly Rev 6 11). But Christ also speaks of a reward being already in heaven (Mt 5 12). A more important question is the time of the clothing in 2 Cor 5 1-5. A group of scholars (Heinrici, Schmiedel, Holtzmann, Clemen, Charles, etc) consider that St. Paul has here changed his views from those of 1 Cor; that he now considers the resurrection body to be assumed immediately at death, and they translate vs 2,3 "we groan [at the burdens of life], longing to be clothed upon with our habitation which is from heaven': because, when we shall be clothed with it, we shall have no more nakedness to experience" (Weizsäcker's tr of the NT). But 2 Cor would have been a most awkward place to announce a change of views, for it was written in part as a defence against inconsistency (1 17, etc). The willingness to be absent from the body (5 8) loses all its point if another and better body is to be given at once. The grammatical reasons for the interpretation above (best stated by Heinrici) are very weak. And the tr given reads into the verse something that simply is not there. Consequently it is far better to follow the older interpretation of Meyer (B. Weiss, Bousset, Lietzmann, Bachmann, Menzies, etc; Bachmann is esp. good) and the obvious sense of the passage: St. Paul dreads being left naked by death, but finds immediate consolation at the thought of being with Christ, and eventual consolation at the thought of the body to be received at the Parousia. (In Phil 1 21-24 this dread is overcome.)

Of a resurrection of the wicked, St. Paul has little to say. The doctrine seems clearly stated in 2 Cor 5 10 (and in 2 Tim 4 1, unless the Pauline authorship of 2 Tim is denied). But St. Paul is willing to treat the fate of the unrighteous with silence.

V. Summary.—The points in the NT doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous, then, seem to be these: The personality of the believer

1. NT Data survives after death and is with Christ. But it is lacking in something that will be supplied at the consummation, when a body will be given in which there is nothing to hinder perfect intercourse with God. The connection of this body with the present body is not discussed, except for saying that some connection exists, with the necessity of a transformation for those alive at the end. In this state nothing remains that is inconsistent with the height to which man is raised, and in particular sexual relations (Mk 12 25) and the processes of nutrition (1 Cor 6 13) cease. For this end the whole power of God is available. And it is insured by the perfect trust the believer may put in God and by the resurrection of Christ, with whom the believer has become intimately united. The unrighteous are raised for the final vindication of God's dealings in history. Two resurrections are found in Rev 20 5,13 and quite possibly in 1 Thess 4 16; 1 Cor 15 23,24. Hence the phrase first resurrection; see LAST JUDGMENT.

Into the "blanks" of this scheme the believer is naturally entitled to insert such matter as may seem to him best compatible with his other concepts of Christianity and of philosophy. As is so often the case with passages in the Bible, the student marvels at the way the sacred writers were restrained from committing Christianity to metaphysical schemes that growth in human knowledge might afterward show to be false. But the theologian must take care to distinguish between the revealed facts and the interpretation given them in any system that he constructs to make the doctrine conform to the ideas of his own time or circle—a distinction too often forgotten in the past and sometimes with lamentable results. Esp. is it well to remember that such a phrase as "a purely spiritual immortality" rests on a metaphysical dualism that is today obsolete, and that such a phrase is hardly less naive than the expectation that the resurrection body will contain identically the material of the present body. We are still quite in the dark as to the relations of what we call "soul" and "body," and so, naturally, it is quite impossible to dogmatize. A. Meyer in his RGG art. ("Auferstehung, dogmatisch") has some interesting suggestions. For an idealistic metaphysics, where soul and body are only two forms of God's thought, the resurrection offers no difficulties. If the body be regarded as the web of forces that proceed from the soul, the resurrection would take the form of the return of those forces to their center at the consummation. If "body" be considered to embrace the totality of effects that proceed from the individual, at the end the individual will find in these effects the exact expression of himself (Fechner's theory). Or resurrection may be considered as the end of evolution—the reunion in God of all that has been differentiated and so evolved and enriched. Such lines must be followed cautiously, but may be found to lead to results of great value.

In recent years the attention of scholars has been directed to the problem of how far the teachings of other religions assisted the Jews in attaining a resurrection doctrine. Practically only the Pers system comes into question, and here the facts seem to be these: A belief among the Persians in the resurrection of the body is attested for the pre-Christian period by the fragments of Theopompus (4th cent. BC), preserved by Diogenes Laertius and Aeneas of Gaza. That this doctrine was taught by Zoroaster himself is not capable of exact proof, but is probable. But on the precise details we are in great uncertainty. In the Avesta the doctrine is not found in the oldest part (the Gathas), but is mentioned in the 19th Yasht, a document that has certainly undergone post-Christian redaction of an extent that is not determinable. The fullest Pers source is the Bundahesh (30), written in the 9th Christian cent. It certainly contains much very ancient matter, but the age of any given passage in it is always a problem. Consequently the sources must be used with great caution. It may be noted that late Judaism certainly was affected to some degree by the Pers religion (see Tob, esp.), but there are so many native Jewish elements that were leading to a resurrection doctrine that familiarity with the Pers belief could have been an assistance only. Esp. is it to be noted that the great acceptance of the doctrine lies in the post-Maccabean period, when direct Pers influence is hardly to be thought of. See ZOROASTRIANISM.

LITERATURE.—The older works suffer from a defective understanding of the presuppositions, but Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality, is always useful. Brown, The Christian Hope, 1912, is excellent and contains a full bibliography. Charles, Eschatology, and art. "Eschatology" in EB are invaluable, but must be used critically by the thorough student, for the opinions are often individualistic. Waterspoon's art. "Resurrection" in DCG is good; Bernard's in HDB is not so good. On 1 Cor, Findlay or (better) Edwards; on 2 Cor Menzies. In German the NT Theologies of Weiss, Holtzmann, Feine; Schaefer's "Auferstehung" in *PRE*³. On 1 Cor, Heinrich and J. Weiss in Meyer (eds 8 and 9); on 2 Cor, Bachmann in the Zahn series. The Resurrection has always been felt to be vital in connection with Christianity. As a consequence, opponents have almost always concentrated their attacks, and Christians have centered their defence, upon it. It is therefore of the utmost importance to give attention to the subject, as it appears in the NT. There are several converging lines of evidence, and none can be overlooked. Each must have its place and weight. The issues at stake are so serious that nothing must be omitted.

The first proof is the life of Jesus Christ Himself. It is always a disappointment when a life which commenced well finishes badly. We

1. First Proof: The Life of Jesus Christ. have this feeling even in fiction; The instinct demands that a story should end well. Much more is this true of Jesus Christ. A perfect life characterized by Divine claims ends in its prime in a cruel and shameful death. Is that a fitting close? Surely death could not end everything after such a noble career. The Gospels give the resurrection as the completion of the picture of Jesus Christ. There is no real doubt that Christ anticipated His own resurrection. At first He used only vague terms, such as, "Destroy this Temple, and in three days I will raise it up." But later on He spoke plainly, and whenever He mentioned His death, He added, "The Son of man . . . must be raised the third day." These references are too numerous to be overlooked, and, in spite of difficulties of detail, they are, in any proper treatment of the Gospels, an integral part of the claim made for Himself by Jesus Christ (Mt 12 38-40; 16 21; 17 9,23; 20 19; 27 63; Mk 8 31; 9 9,31; 10 34; 14 58; Lk 9 22; 18 33; Jn 2 19-21). His veracity is at stake if He did not rise. Surely the word of such a One must be given due credence. We are therefore compelled to face the fact that the resurrection of which the Gospels speak is the resurrection of no ordinary man, but of Jesus—that is of One whose life and character had been unique, and for whose shameful death no proper explanation was conceivable (Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, 122 f). Is it possible that, in view of His perfect truthfulness of word and deed, there should be such an anti-climax as is involved in a denial of His assurance that He would rise again (C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection, 30)? Consider, too, the death of Christ in the light of His perfect life. If that death was the close of a life so beautiful, so remarkable, so Godlike, we are faced with an insoluble mystery—the permanent triumph of wrong over right, and the impossibility of believing in truth or justice in the world (C. H. Robinson, op. cit., 36). So the resurrection is not to be regarded as an isolated event, a fact in the history of Christ separated from all else. It must be taken in close connection with what precedes. The true solution of the problem is to be found in that estimate of Christ which "most entirely fits in with the totality of the facts" (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 14).

Another line of proof is the fact of the empty grave and the disappearance of the body. That Jesus died and was buried, and that on the third morning the tomb was empty, is not now seriously challenged. The theory of a swoon and a recovery in the tomb is impossible, and to it Strauss "practically gives its deathblow" (Orr, op. cit., 43). At Christ's burial a stone was rolled before the tomb, the tomb empty was sealed, and a guard was placed before it. Yet on the third morning the body had disappeared, and the tomb was empty. There are only two alternatives. His body must have been taken out of the grave by human hands or else by superhuman power. If the hands were human, they must have been those of His friends or of His foes. If His friends had wished to take out His body, the question at once arises whether they could have done so in the face of the stone, the seal and the guard. If His foes had contemplated this action, the question arises whether they would seriously have considered it. It is extremely improbable that any effort should have been made to remove the body out of the reach of the disciples. Why should His enemies do the very thing that would be most likely to spread the report of His resurrection? As Chrysostom said, "If the body had been stolen, they could not have stolen it naked, because of the delay in stripping it of the burial clothes and the trouble caused by the drugs adhering to it" (quoted in Day, Evidence for the Resurrection, 35). Besides, the position of the grave-clothes proves the impossibility of the theft of the body (see Gr of Jn 20 6,7; 11 44; Grimley, Temple of Humanity, 69, 70; Latham, The Risen Master; Expos T, XIII, 293 f; XIV, 510). How, too, is it possible to account for the failure of the Jews to disprove the resurrection? Not more than seven weeks afterward Peter preached in that city the fact that Jesus had been raised. What would have been easier or more conclusive than for the Jews to have produced the dead body and silenced Peter forever? "The silence of the Jews is as significant as the speech of the Christians" (Fairbairn, Studies in the Life of Christ, 357).

The fact of the empty tomb with the disappearance of the body remains a problem to be faced. It is now admitted that the evidence for the empty tomb is adequate, and that it was part of the primitive belief (Foundations, 134, 154). It is important to realize the force of this admission, because it is a testimony to St. Paul's use of the term "third day" (see below) and to the Christian observance of the first day of the week. And yet in spite of this we are told that a belief in the empty tomb is impossible. By some writers the idea of resurrection is interpreted to mean the revival of Christ's spiritual influence on the disciples, which had been brought to a close by His death. It is thought that the essential idea and value of Christ's resurrection can be conserved, even while the belief in His bodily rising from the grave is surrendered (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 23). But how can we believe in the resurrection while we regard the basis of the primitive belief in it as a mistake, not to say a fraud? The disciples found the tomb empty, and on the strength of this they believed He had risen. How can the belief be true if the foundation be false? Besides, the various forms of the vision-theory are now gradually but surely being regarded as inadequate and impossible. They involve the change of almost every fact in the Gospel history, and the invention of new scenes and conditions of which the Gospels know nothing (Orr, op. cit., 222). It has never been satisfactorily shown why the disciples should have had this abundant experience of visions; nor why they should have had it so soon after the death of Christ and within a strictly limited period; nor why it suddenly ceased. The disciples were familiar with the apparition of a spirit, like Samuel's, and with the resuscitation of a body, like Lazarus', but what they had not experienced or imagined was the fact of a spiritual body, the combination of body and spirit in an entirely novel way. So the old theory of a vision is now virtually set aside, and for it is substituted the theory of a real spiritual manifestation of the risen Christ. The question at once arises whether this is not prompted by an unconscious but real desire to get rid of anything like a physical resurrection. Whatever may be true of unbelievers, this is an impossible position for those who believe Christ is alive.

Even though we may be ready to admit the reality of telepathic communication, it is impossible to argue that this is equivalent to the idea of resurrection. Psychological research has not proceeded far enough as yet to warrant arguments being built on it, though in any case it is difficult, if not impossible, to obtain material from this quarter which will answer to the conditions of the physical resurrection recorded in the NT. "The survival of the soul is not resurrection." "Whoever heard of a spirit being buried?" (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 229).

In view of the records of the Gospels and the general testimony of the NT, it is impossible to be "agnostic" as to what happened at the grave of Jesus, even though we are quite sure that He who died now lives and reigns. It is sometimes said that faith is not bound up with holding a particular view of the relations of Christ's present glory with the body that was once in Joseph's tomb, that faith is to be exercised in the exalted Lord, and that belief in a resuscitation of the human body is no vital part of it. It is no doubt true that faith today is to be exercised solely in the exalted and glorified Lord, but faith must ultimately rest on fact, and it is difficult to understand how Christian faith can really be "agnostic" with regard to the facts about the empty tomb and the risen body, which are so prominent in the NT, and which form an essential part of the apostolic witness. The attempt to set faith and historical evidence in opposition to each other, which is so marked a characteristic of much modern thought, will never satisfy general Christian intelligence, and if there is to be any real belief in the historical character of the NT, it is impossible to be "agnostic" about facts that are writ so large on the face of the records. When once the evidence for the empty tomb is allowed to be adequate, the impossibility of any other explanation than that indicated in the NT is at once seen. The evidence must be accounted for and adequately explained. And so we come again to the insuperable barrier of the empty tomb, which, together with the apostolic witness, stands impregnable against all the attacks of visional and apparitional theories. It is becoming more evident that these theories are entirely inadequate to account for the records in the Gospels, as well as for the place and power of those Gospels in the early church and in all subsequent ages. The force of the evidence for the empty grave and the disappearance of the body is clearly seen by the explanations suggested by various modern writers (those of Oscar Holtzmann, K. Lake, and A. Meyer can be seen in Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, ch viii, and that of Reville in C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection of Christ, 69; see also art. by Streeter in Foundations). Not one of them is tenable without doing violence to the Gospel story, and also without putting forth new theories which are not only improbable in themselves, but are without a shred of real historical or literary evidence. The one outstanding fact which baffles all these writers is the empty grave.

Others suggest that resurrection means a real objective appearance of the risen Christ without implying any physical reanimation, that "the resurrection of Christ was an objective reality, but was not a physical resuscitation" (C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection of Christ, 12). But the difficulty here is as to the meaning of the term "resurrection." If it means a return from the dead, a rising again (re-), must there not have been some identity between that which was put in the tomb and the "objective reality" which appeared to the disciples? Wherein lies the essential difference between an objective vision and an objective appearance? If we believe the apostolic testimony to the empty tomb, why may we not accept their evidence to the actual resurrection? They evidently recognized their Master, and this recognition must have been due to some familiarity with His bodily appearance. No difficulty of conceiving of the resurrection of mankind hereafter must be allowed to set aside the plain facts of the record about Christ. It is, of course, quite clear that the resurrection body of Jesus was not exactly the same as when it was put in the tomb, but it is equally clear that there was definite identity as well as definite dissimilarity, and both elements must be faced and accounted for. There need be no insuperable difficulty if we believe that in the very nature of things Christ's resurrection must be unique, and, since the life and work of Jesus Christ transcend our experience (as they certainly should do), we must not expect to bring them within the limitations of natural law and human history. How the resurrection body was sustained is a problem quite outside our ken, though the reference to "flesh and bones," compared with St. Paul's words about "flesh and blood" not being able to enter the kingdom of God, may suggest that while the resurrection body was not constituted upon a natural basis through blood, yet that it possessed "all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature" (Church of England Article IV). We may not be able to solve the problem, but we must hold fast to all the facts, and these may be summed up by saying that the body was the same though different, different though the same. The true description of the resurrection seems to be that "it was an objective reality, but that it was not merely a physical resuscitation." We are therefore brought back to a consideration of the facts recorded in the Gospels as to the empty tomb and the disappearance of the body, and we only ask for an explanation which will take into consideration all the facts recorded, and will do no violence to any part of the evidence. To predicate a new resurrection body in which Christ appeared to His disciples does not explain how in three days' time the body which had been placed in the tomb was disposed of. Does not this theory demand a new miracle of its own (Kennett, Interpreter, V, 271)?

The next line of proof to be considered is the transformation of the disciples caused by the resurrection. They had seen their Master die, and through that death they lost all hope. Yet hope returned three days after. On the day of the crucifixion they were filled with sadness; on the first day of the week with gladness. At the crucifixion they were hopeless; on the first day of the week their hearts glowed with certainty. When the message of the resurrection first came they were incredulous and hard to be convinced, but when once they became assured they never doubted again. What could account for the astonishing change in these men in so short a time? The mere removal of the body from the grave could never have transformed their spirits and characters. Three days are not enough for a legend to spring up which should so affect them. Time is needed for a process of legendary growth. There is nothing more striking in the history of primitive Christianity than this marvelous change wrought in the disciples by a belief in the resurrection of their Master. It is a psychological fact that demands a full explanation. The disciples were prepared to believe in the appearance of a spirit, but they never contemplated the possibility of a resurrection (see Mk 16 11). Men do not imagine what they do not believe, and the women's intention to embalm a corpse shows they did not expect His resurrection. Besides, a hallucination involving five hundred people at once, and repeated several times during forty days, is unthinkable.

From this fact of the transformation of personal life in so incredibly short a space of time, we proceed to the next line of proof, the existence of the primitive church.

4. Fourth Proof: "There is no doubt that the church of the apostles believed in the resurrection of their Lord" (Burkitt, The Gospel History and Its Transmission, 74).

It is now admitted on all hands that the church of Christ came into existence as the result of a belief in the resurrection of Christ. When we consider its commencement, as recorded in the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, we see two simple and incontrovertible facts: (1) the Christian society was gathered together by preaching; (2) the substance of the preaching was the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ was put to death on a cross, and would therefore be rejected by Jews as accursed of God (Dt 21 23). Yet multitudes of Jews were led to worship Him (Acts 2 41), and a great company of priests to obey Him (Acts 6 7). The only explanation of these facts is God's act of resurrection (Acts 2 36), for nothing short of it could have led to the Jewish acceptance of Jesus Christ as their Messiah. The apostolic church is thus a result of a belief in the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The early chapters of Acts bear the marks of primitive documents, and their evidence is unmistakable. It is impossible to allege that the early church did not know its own history, that myths and legends quickly grew up and were eagerly received, and that the writers of the Gospels had no conscience for principle, but manipulated their material at will, for any modern church could easily give an account of its history for the past fifty years or more (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 144). And it is simply absurd to think that the earliest church had no such capability. In reality there was nothing vague or intangible about the testimony borne by the apostles and other members of the church. "As the church is too holy for a foundation of rottenness, so she is too real for a foundation of mist" (Archbishop Alexander, The Great Question, 10).

One man in the apostolic church must, however, be singled out as a special witness to the resurrection. The conversion and work of Saul of Tarsus is our next line of proof. Attention is first called to the evidence of his life and writings to the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Some years ago an article appeared (E. Medley, Expos. V, iv, 359), inquiring as to the conception of Christ which would be suggested to a heathen inquirer by a perusal of Paul's earliest extant writing (1 Thess). One point at least would stand out clearly—that Jesus Christ was killed (2 15; 4 14) and was raised from the dead (4 14). As this Ep. is usually dated about 51 AD—that is, only about 22 years after the resurrection—and as the same Ep. plainly attributes to Jesus Christ the functions of God in relation to men (1 1.6; 2 14; 3 11), we can readily see the force of this testimony to the resurrection. Then a few years later, in an ep. which is universally accepted as one of St. Paul's, we have a much fuller reference to the event. In the well-known chapter (1 Cor 15) where he is concerned to prove (not Christ's resurrection, but) the resurrection of Christians, he naturally adduces Christ's resurrection as his greatest evidence, and so gives a list of the various appearances of Christ, ending with one to himself, which he puts on an exact level with the others:

5. Fifth Proof: The Witness of St. Paul

"Last of all he was seen of me also." Now it is essential to give special attention to the nature and particularity of this testimony. "I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received: that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried; and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures" (1 Cor 15 3 f). This, as it has often been pointed out, is our earliest authority for the appearances of Christ after the resurrection, and dates from within 30 years of the event itself. But there is much more than this: "He affirms that within 5 years of the crucifixion of Jesus he was taught that 'Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures'" (Kennett, Interpreter, V, 267). And if we seek to appreciate the full bearing of this act and testimony we have a right to draw the same conclusion: "That within a very few years of the time of the crucifixion of Jesus, the evidence for the resurrection of Jesus was, in the mind of at least one man of education, absolutely irrefutable" (Kennett, op. cit., V, 267).

Besides, we find this narrative includes one small but significant statement which at once recalls a very definite feature of the Gospel tradition—the mention of "the third day." A reference to the passage in the Gospels where Jesus Christ spoke of His resurrection will show how prominent and persistent was this note of time. Why, then, should St. Paul have introduced it in his statement? Was it part of the teaching which he had "received"? What is the significance of this plain emphasis on the date of the resurrection? Is it not that it bears absolute testimony to the empty tomb? From all this it may be argued that St. Paul believed the story of the empty tomb at a date when the recollection was fresh, when he could examine it for himself, when he could make the fullest possible inquiry of others, and when the fears and opposition of enemies would have made it impossible for the adherents of Jesus Christ to make any statement that was not absolutely true. "Surely common sense requires us to believe that that for which he so suffered was in his eyes established beyond the possibility of doubt" (Kennett, op. cit., V, 271).

In view, therefore, of St. Paul's personal testimony to his own conversion, his interviews with those who had seen Jesus Christ on earth before and after His resurrection, and the prominence given to the resurrection in the apostle's own teaching, we may challenge attention afresh to this evidence for the resurrection. It is well known that Lord Lyttelton and his friend Gilbert West left Oxford University at the close of one academic year, each determining to give attention respectively during the long vacation to the conversion of St. Paul and the resurrection of Christ, in order to prove the baseness of both. They met again in the autumn and compared experiences. Lord Lyttelton had become convinced of the truth of St. Paul's conversion, and Gilbert West of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. If, therefore, Paul's 25 years of suffering and service for Christ were a reality, his conversion was true, for everything he did began with that sudden change. And if his conversion was true, Jesus Christ rose from the dead, for everything Paul was and did he attributed to the sight of the risen Christ.

The next line of proof of the resurrection is the record in the Gospels of the appearances of the risen Christ, and it is the last in order to be considered. By some writers it is put first, but this is in forgetfulness of the dates when the Gospels were written. The resurrection was believed by the Christian church for a number of years before our Gospels were written, and it is therefore impossible for these records to be our primary and most important evidence. We must get behind them if we are to appreciate fully the force and variety of the evidence. It is for this reason that, following the proper logical order, we have reserved to the last our consideration of the appearances of the risen Christ as given in the Gospels. The point is one of great importance (Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, 111).

Now, with this made clear, we proceed to consider the evidence afforded by the records of the post-resurrection appearances of Christ. Modern criticism of the Gospels during recent years has tended to adopt the view that Mk is the earliest, and that Mt and Lk are dependent on it. This is said to be "the one solid result" (W. C. Allen, "St. Matthew," ICC, Preface, vii; Burkitt, The Gospel History, 37) of the literary criticism of the Gospels. If this is so, the question of the records of the resurrection becomes involved in the difficult problem about the supposed lost ending of Mk, which, according to modern criticism, would thus close without any record of an appearance of the risen Christ. On this point, however, two things may be said at the present juncture:

(1) There are some indications that the entire question of the criticism of the Gospels is to be reopened (Ramsay, St. Luke the Physician, ch. ii; see also Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 63 ff). (2) Even if the current theory be accepted, it would not seriously weaken the intrinsic force of the evidence for the resurrection, because, after all, Mark does not invent or "doctor" his material, but embodies the common apostolic tradition of his time (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 62).

We may, therefore, meanwhile examine the record of the appearances without finding them essentially affected by any particular theory of the origin and relations of the Gospels. There are two sets of appearances, one in Jerus and the other in Galilee, and their number, and the amplitude and weight of their testimony should be carefully estimated. While we are precluded by our space from examining each appearance minutely, and indeed it is unnecessary for our purpose to do so, it is impossible to avoid calling attention to two of them. No one can read the story of the walk to Emmaus (Lk 24), or of the visit of Peter and John to the tomb (Jn 20), without observing the striking marks of reality and personal testimony in the accounts. As to the former incident: "It carries with it, as great literary critics have pointed out, the deepest inward evidences of its own literal truthfulness. For it so narrates the intercourse of 'a risen God' with commonplace men as to set natural and supernatural side by side in perfect harmony. And to do this has always been the difficulty, the despair of imagination. The alternative has been put reasonably thus: St. Luke was either a greater poet, a more creative genius, than Shakespeare, or—he did not create the record. He had an advantage over Shakespeare. The ghost in Hamlet was an effort of laborious imagination. The risen Christ on the road was a fact supreme, and the Evangelist did but tell it as it was" (Bishop Moule, Meditations for the Church's Year, 108). Other writers whose attitude to the Gospel records is very different bear the same testimony to the impression of truth and reality made upon them by the Emmaus narrative (A. Meyer and K. Lake, quoted in Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 176 f).

It is well known that there are difficulties connected with the number and order of these appearances, but they are probably due largely to the summary character of the story, and certainly are not sufficient to invalidate the uniform testimony to the two facts: (1) the empty grave, (2) the appearances of Christ on the third day. These are the main facts of the combined witness (Orr, op. cit., 212).

The very difficulties which have been observed in the Gospels for nearly nineteen centuries are a testimony to a conviction of the truth of the narratives on the part of the whole Christian church. The church has not been afraid to leave these records as they are because of the facts that they embody and express. If there had been no difficulties men might have said that everything had been artificially arranged, whereas the differences bear testimony to the reality of the event recorded. The fact that we possess these two sets of appearances—one in Jerus and one in Galilee—is really an argument in favor of their credibility, for if it had been recorded that Christ appeared in Galilee only, or Jerus only, it is not unlikely that the account might have been rejected for lack of support. It is well known that records of eyewitnesses often vary in details, while there is no question as to the events themselves. The various books recording the story of the Indian mutiny, or the surrender of Napoleon III at Sedan are cases in point, and Sir William Ramsay has shown the entire compatibility of certainty as to the main fact with great uncertainty as to precise details (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 29). We believe, therefore, that a careful examination of these appearances will afford evidence of a chain of circumstances extending from the empty grave to the day of the ascension.

When we examine carefully all these converging lines of evidence and endeavor to give weight to all the facts of the case, it seems impossible to escape from the problem of a physical miracle. That the prima facie view of the evidence afforded by the NT suggests a miracle and that the apostles really believed in a true physical resurrection are surely beyond all question. And yet very much of present-day thought refuses to accept the miraculous. The scientific doctrine of the uniformity and continuity of Nature bars the way, so that from the outset it is concluded that miracles are impossible. We are either not allowed to believe (see Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 44), or else we are told that we are not required to believe (C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection of Christ, ch ii), in the reanimation of a dead body. If we take this view, "there is no need, really, for investigation of evidence: the question is decided before the evidence is looked at" (Orr, op. cit., 46).

7. Summary and Conclusion

We challenge the tenableness of this position. It proves too much. We are not at all concerned by the charge of believing in the abnormal or unusual. New things have happened from the beginning of the present natural order, and the Christian faith teaches that Christ Himself was a "new thing," and that His coming as "God manifest in the flesh" was something absolutely unique. If we are not allowed to believe in any Divine intervention which we may call supernatural or miraculous, it is impossible to account for the Person of Christ at all. "A Sinless Personality would be a miracle in time." Arising out of this, Christianity itself was unique, inaugurating a new era in human affairs. No Christian, therefore, can have any difficulty in accepting the abnormal, the unusual, the miraculous. If it be said that no amount of evidence can establish a fact which is miraculous, we have still to account for the moral miracles which are really involved and associated with the resurrection, esp. the deception of the disciples, who could have found out the truth of the case; a deception, too, that has proved so great a blessing to the world. Surely to those who hold a true theistic view of the world this a priori view is impossible. Are we to refuse to allow to God at least as much liberty as we possess ourselves? Is it really thinkable that God has less spontaneity of action than we have? We may like or dislike, give or withhold, will or not will, but the course of Nature must flow on unbrokenly. Surely God cannot be conceived of as having given such a constitution to the universe as limits His power to intervene if necessary and for sufficient purpose with the work of His own hands. Not only are all things of Him, but all things are through Him, and to Him. The resurrection means the presence of miracle, and "there is no evading the issue with which this confronts us" (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 53). Unless, therefore, we are prepared to accept the possibility of the miraculous, all explanation of the NT evidence is a pure waste of time.

Of recent years attempts have been made to account for the resurrection by means of ideas derived from Bab and other Eastern sources. It is argued that mythology provides the key to the problem, that not only analogy but derivation is to be found. But apart from the remarkable variety of conclusions of Bab archaeologists there is nothing in the way of historical proof worthy of the name. The whole idea is arbitrary and baseless, and prejudiced by the attitude to the supernatural. There is literally no link of connection between these oriental cults and the Jewish and Christian beliefs in the resurrection.

And so we return to a consideration of the various lines of proof. Taking them singly, they must be admitted to be strong, but taking them altogether, the argument is cumulative and sufficient. Every effect must have its adequate cause, and the only proper explanation of Christianity today is the resurrection of Christ. Thomas Arnold of Rugby, no mean judge of historical evidence, said that the resurrection was the "best-attested fact in human history." Christianity welcomes all possible sifting, testing, and use by those who honestly desire to arrive at the truth, and if they will give proper attention to all the facts and factors involved, we believe they will come to the conclusion expressed years ago by the Archbishop of Armagh, that the resurrection is the rock from which all the hammers of criticism have never chipped a single fragment (The Great Question, 24).

The theology of the resurrection is very important and calls for special attention. Indeed, the prominence given to it in the NT

8. Theology of the Resurrection affords a strong confirmation of the fact itself, for it seems incredible that such varied and important truths should not rest on historic fact. The doctrine may briefly be summarized:

(1) evidential: the resurrection is the proof of the atoning character of the death of Christ, and of His Deity and Divine exaltation (Rom 1 4); (2) evangelistic: the primitive gospel included testimony to the resurrection as one of its characteristic features, thereby proving to the hearers the assurance of the Divine redemption (1 Cor 15 1-4; Rom 4 25); (3) spiritual: the resurrection is regarded as the source and standard of the holiness of the believer. Every aspect of the Christian life from the beginning to the end is somehow associated therewith (Rom 6); (4) eschatological: the resurrection is the guaranty and model of the believer's resurrection (1 Cor 15). As the bodies of the saints arose (Mt 27 52), so ours are to be quickened (Rom 8 11), and made like Christ's glorified body (Phil 3 21), thereby becoming spiritual bodies (1 Cor 15 44), that is, bodies ruled by their spirits and yet bodies. These points offer only the barest outline of the fulness of NT teaching concerning the doctrine of the resurrection of Christ.

In the NT κρατέω, kratêô, is used in Jn 20 23 of the "retaining" of sins by the apostles (see RETENTION OF SINS); in Rom 1 28, RV has "refused to have," m "Gr, 'did not approve,'" for AV "did not like to retain" (échō); and in Philem ver 13, substitutes "fain have kept" for "retained" (katêchō). Sir 41 16 has "retain" for diaphulassō, "keep."

RETALIATION, rê-tal-i-â'shun, rê- See LAW IN THE NT; PUNISHMENTS; RETRIBUTION.

RETENTION, rê-ten'shun, OF SINS (κρατέω, kratêô, "to lay fast hold of" [Jn 20 23]): The opposite of "the remission of sins." Where there was no evidence of repentance and faith, the community of believers were unauthorized to give assurance of forgiveness, and, therefore, could only warn that the guilt of sin was retained, and that the sinner remained beneath God's judgment.

While such retention has its place in connection with all preaching of the gospel, since the offers of grace are conditional, it is esp. exercised, like the absolution, in the personal dealing of a pastor with a communicant, preparatory to the reception of the Lord's Supper. As the absolution is properly an assurance of individual forgiveness, so the retention is an assurance of individual non-forgiveness. That the retention is exercised by the ministry, not as an order, but as the representatives of the congregation of believers to which Christ gave the power of the keys, is shown by Alford, Gr Test., on above passage. See also Melancthon, Appendix to the "Schmalkald Articles."

LITERATURE

The word as applied to the Divine administration is not used in Scripture, but undoubtedly the idea is commonly enough expressed. The

1. NT Terms words which come nearest to it are ὀργή, orgē, and θυμός, thumós, wrath attributed to God; ἐδικέω, ekdikéō, ἐδικήσας, ekdikēsais, ἐδικός, eodikos, and δική, dikē, all giving the idea of vengeance; κόλασις, kólasis, and τιμωρία, timōría, "punishment"; besides κρίνω, krínō, and its derivatives, words expressive of judgment.

Rom 2 is full of the thought of retribution. The apostle, in vs 5.6, comes very near to using the word itself, and gives indeed a good description of the thing: the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, "who will render to every man according to his works." It is well in approaching the subject to remind ourselves that there is undoubtedly, as the apostle says, a Revelation of wrath. We are so accustomed to think of the gracious revelation which the gospel brings us, and to approach the subject of the doom of the impenitent under the influence of the kindly sentiments engendered thereby, and with a view of God's gracious character as revealed in salvation, that we are apt to overlook somewhat the sterner facts of sin, and to misconceive the Divine attitude toward the impenitent sinner. It is certainly well that we should let the grace of the gospel have full influence upon all our thinking, but we must beware of being too fully engrossed with one phase of the Divine character. It is an infirmity of human nature that we find it difficult to let two seemingly conflicting conceptions find a place in our thought. We are apt to surrender ourselves to the sway of one or the other of them according to the pressure of the moment.

Putting ourselves back into the position of those who have only the light of natural theology, we find that all deductions from the perfections of God, as revealed in His works, combined with a consideration of man's sin and want of harmony with the Holy One, lead to the conclusion announced by the apostle: "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men" (Rom 1 18). Wrath implies punishment, punishment is decreed, punishment is denounced. The word of God but confirms the verdict which conscience forecasts, Nature teaches that punishment, retribution, must follow sin. Within the sphere of physical law this is clearly exemplified. No breach of the so-called laws of Nature is tolerated. Strictly speaking, the laws of Nature cannot be broken, but let a man fail to keep in harmony with them, and the natural consequences will be trouble, punishment, retribution. Harmony with law is blessing; collision with law is loss. Thus law in Nature "worketh wrath" to the neglecters of it. Punishment necessarily results. So we may well expect that in the higher sphere, God's moral laws cannot be neglected or violated with impunity, and Scripture fully justifies the expectation and shows that sin must be punished. All things considered, the fact of punishment for sinners need not surprise; the fact of pardon is the surprising thing. The surprise of pardon has ceased to surprise us because we are so familiar with the thought. We know the "how" of it because of the revelation of grace. Grace, however, saves on certain conditions, and there is no such thing known in Scripture as indiscriminate, necessary, universal grace. It is only from the Bible that we know of the salvation by grace. That same revelation shows that the grace does not come to all, in the sense of saving all; though, of course, it may be considered as presented to all. Those who are not touched and saved by grace remain shut up in their sins. They are, and must be, in the nature of the case, left to the consequences of their sins, with the added guilt of rejecting the offered grace. "Except ye believe that I am he," said Incarnate Grace, "ye shall die in your sins" (Jn 8 24).

Another conclusion we may draw from the general Scriptural representation is that the future retribution is one aspect of the natural consequence of sin, yet it is also in another aspect the positive infliction of Divine wrath. It is shown to be the natural outcome of sin in such passages as "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal 6 7); "He that soweth unto his own flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption" (Gal 6 8). It is not without suggestiveness that the Heb word 'awōn means both iniquity and punishment, and when Cain said "My punishment is greater than I can bear" (Gen 4 13), he really said "My iniquity is greater than I can bear"; his iniquity became his punishment. A due consideration of this thought goes a long way toward meeting many of the objections brought against the doctrine of future punishment.

The other statement, however, remains true and must be emphasized, that there is an actual infliction of Divine wrath. All the great statements about the Divine judgment imply this, and while it is wrong not to take account of the natural working out of sin in its terrible consequences, it is equally wrong, perhaps more so, to refuse to recognize this positive Divine infliction of punishment. This, indeed, is the outstanding feature of retribution as it assumes form in Scripture. Even the natural consequences of sin, rightly viewed, are part of the Divine infliction, since God, in the nature of things, has conjoined sin and its consequences, and part of the positive infliction is the judicial shutting up of the sinner to the consequences of his sin. So in the case of Cain, his iniquity became his punishment, inasmuch as God sentenced him to bear the consequences of that iniquity. On the other hand, we might say that even the terribly positive outpourings of God's wrath upon the sinner are the natural consequences of sin, since sin in its very nature calls down the Divine displeasure. Indeed, these two phases of future punishment are so very closely connected that a right view of the matter compels us to keep both before us, and no full explanation of the punishment is possible when either phase is ignored.

The terms in Scripture applied to the doom of sinners all imply Divine displeasure, punitive action, retribution. The two outstanding Gr words for "wrath," orgē and thumos, are both freely applied to God. Orgē indicates settled displeasure, whereas thumos is rather the blazing out of the anger. The former is, as we should expect, more frequently applied to God, and, of course, all that is capricious and reprehensible in human wrath must be eliminated from the word as used of God. It indicates the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin. It was an affection found in the sinless Saviour Himself, for "he looked round about on them with anger" (Mk 3 5). In the Baptist's warning "to flee from the wrath to come" (Mt 3 7; Lk 3 7), it is unquestionably the wrath of God that is meant, the manifestation of that being further described as the burning of the chaff with unquenchable fire (Mt 3 12). In Jn 3 36 it is said of the unbeliever that "the wrath of God" abideth on him. In Rom it is used at least 9 t in reference to God, first in Rom 1 18, the great passage we have already quoted about "the wrath of God revealed from heaven." The connection is a suggestive one and is often overlooked. In the passage Paul has quite a chain of reasons; he is ready to preach the gospel at Rome for he is not ashamed of the gospel; he is not ashamed of the gospel for it is the power of God unto salvation; it is the "power of God" for therein is revealed the righteousness of God by faith; and this salvation by faith is a necessity "for the wrath of God is revealed," etc. Thus the Divine wrath on account of sin is the dark background of the gospel message. Had there been no such just wrath upon men, there had been no need for the Divine salvation. The despising of God's goodness by the impenitent means a treasuring up of "wrath in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God" (Rom 2 3-5). God "visiteth with wrath" (3 5).

In Rom 4 15 the apostle shows that "the law worketh wrath" (i.e. brings down the Divine displeasure), while in 5 9 he shows that believers are saved from wrath—undoubted wrath of God. The other two instances are in 9 22. Men are "by nature children of wrath" (Eph 2 3); surely not "wrathful children," but liable to the wrath of God, and because of evil deeds cometh "the wrath of God upon the sons of disobedience" (Eph 5 6; Col 3 6). Christ "delivereth us from the wrath to come" (1 Thess 1 10); wrath has come upon the opposing Jews (2 16); but believers are not appointed unto wrath (5 9). With all these specific passages in view, to say nothing of the general teaching of the apostle on the question of coming judgment and punishment, it is utterly impossible to eliminate the idea of the Divine displeasure against sinners, and His consequent retributive action toward them. Even Ritschl, who absolutely denies the great principle of retribution, of positive displeasure, admits that Paul teaches it; hence the only way for him out of the difficulty is to reject Paul's teaching as unauthoritative. Other references to the "wrath of God" are in He 3 11; 4 3; and 6 passages in the Apocalypse—Rev 6 16 f; 11 18; 14 10; 16 19; 19 15. Two of these refer to the "wrath of the Lamb," one of the most terrible phrases in the whole of the NT. Thumos is only used in the Apocalypse concerning God (Rev 14 10-19; 15 1-7; 16 1-19; 19 15). In each case it refers to the manifestation, the blazing forth of the wrath; in the last two passages it is used in combination with orgē, and is rendered "fierceness," the fierceness of His wrath.

Ekdikeō, which means to avenge, is twice used of God (Rev 6 10; 19 2); and ekdikēsis, "vengeance," 6 t (Lk 18 7 ff; Rom 12 19; 2 Thess 1 8; He 10 30). In the first two instances it is used by Jesus concerning the Divine action; ekdikos, "avenger," occurs once in application to God (1 Thess 4 6); dikē, "judgment" or "vengeance" is twice used of God (2 Thess 1 9; Jude ver 7).

The use of these terms shows that the punishment inflicted on sinful men is strictly punishment of the vindictory sort, the vindication of outraged justice, the infliction of deserved penalty. Very significant is the passage in 2 Thess 1 6, "It is a righteous thing with God to recompense affliction to them that afflict you." There is no question of bettering the offender.

It is very remarkable that the terms in Gr which would carry the meaning of punishment for the good of the offender are never used in the NT of the

8. Words Meaning "Chastisement" Not Used of the Impenitent
 Infliction which comes upon the impenitent; these are paidētia and paidēō, and they are frequently used of the "chastisement" of believers, but not of the impenitent. It is often claimed that the word kolasis used in Mt 25 46 carries the meaning of chastisement for the improvement of the offender, but although Aristotle, in comparing it with timōria, may seem to suggest that it is meant for the improvement of the offender (what he really says is that it is toū pāschantos hēneka, "on account of the one suffering it," "has the punished one in view," whereas timōria is toū poiōntos, "on account of the one inflicting" "that he may be satisfied"), the usage even in classical Gr is predominantly against making the supposed distinction. Both words are used interchangeably by the leading classical authors, including Aristotle himself, and kolasis is continually employed where no thought of betterment can be in question, while all admit that in Hellenistic Gr the distinction is not maintained, and in any case timōria is also used of the punishment of the sinner (He 10 29).

All the representations of the coming day of judgment tell of the fact of retribution, and Christ Himself distinctly asserts it. Apart

9. Judgment Implies Retribution from His great eschatological discourses, concerning which criticism still hesitates and stammers, we have the solemn close of the Sermon on the Mount, and the pregnant statement of Mt 16 27, "The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then shall he render unto every man according to his deeds," and all the apostolic teaching upon the solemn theme is but the unfolding of the same great thought.

The conception of God as a perfect moral governor demands that His righteousness shall be fully vindicated. Looking at the course of history as it unfolds itself before us, we cannot fail to be struck with the anomalies which are presented. Righteousness does not always triumph, goodness is often put to shame, wickedness appears to be profitable, and wicked men often prosper while good men are under a cloud. Sometimes signal Divine interpositions proclaim that God is indeed on the side of righteousness, but too often it seems as if He were unmindful, and men are tempted to ask the old question, "How doth God know? And is there knowledge in the Most High?" (Ps 73 11), while the righteous say in their distress, "Jeh, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph?" (Ps 94 3). The moral sense cries out for some Divine vindication, and the Scriptures, in harmony with this feeling, indicate that the final judgment will bring such vindication.

10. Moral Sense Demands Vindication of God's Righteousness

In the OT it is frequently presented as the solution of the baffling problems which beset the ethical sphere, as for instance in that fine utterance of religious philosophy in Ps 73; the Psalmist has before him all the puzzling elements of the problem; the prosperity, the insolent and aggressive prosperity of the wicked, the non-success, the oppression, the misery of the righteous; he is well-nigh overwhelmed by the contemplation, and nearly loses his footing on the eternal verities, until he carries the whole problem into the light of God's presence and revelation, and then he understands that the end will bring the true solution.

So too the somber ruminations of the Preacher upon the contradictions and anomalies and mysteries of human life, "under the sun," close in the reflection which throws its searchlight upon all the blackness: "This is the end of the matter: . . . Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every work into judgment, with every hidden thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil" (Eccl 12 13 f). In the light of the same truth, the apostles labored, believing that when the Lord comes He "will both bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts" (1 Cor 4 5). The more fully the subject is considered, the more we must feel that for the vindication of righteousness, the justification of the Divine procedure, the rectification of wrongs, the explanation of mysteries, the reward and triumph of the righteous and the confession and punishment of the wicked, a great final, retributive judgment is Scriptural, reasonable, necessary.

ARCHIBALD M'CAIG

REU, rē'ū, rōō (רֵאוּ), rē'ū; Ραγαύ, Rhagau): A son of Peleg, a descendant of Shem (Gen 11 18 ff; 1 Ch 1 25; Lk 3 35).

REUBEN, rōō'ben, rū'ben (רְאוּבֵן), rē'ūbhēn; Ρουβήν, Rhoubēn): The eldest son of Jacob, born to him by Leah in Paddan-aram (Gen 29 32). This verse seems to suggest

1. Eldest Son two derivations of the name. As it stands in MT it means "behold a son"; but the reason given for so calling him is "The Lord hath looked upon my affliction," which in Heb is rā'āh b'ōnyā, lit. "He hath seen my affliction." Of his boyhood we have only the story of the mandrakes (Gen 30 14). As the firstborn he should really have been leader among his father's sons. His birthright was forfeited by a deed of peculiar infamy (35 22), and as far as we know his tribe never took the lead in Israel. It is named first, indeed, in Nu 1 5,20, but thereafter it falls to the fourth place, Judah taking the first (2 10, etc.). To Reuben's intervention Joseph owed his escape from the fate proposed by his other brethren (Gen 37 29). Some have thought Reuben designed to set him free, from a desire to rehabilitate himself with his father. But there is no need to deny to Reuben certain noble and chivalrous qualities. Jacob seems to have appreciated these, and, perhaps, therefore all the more deeply lamented the lapse that spoiled his life (Gen 49 3 f). It was Reuben who felt that their perils and anxieties in Egypt were a fit recompense for the unbrotherly conduct (42 22). To assure his father of Benjamin's safe return from Egypt, whither Joseph required him to be taken, Reuben was ready to pledge his own two sons (ver 37). Four sons born to him in Canaan went down with Reuben at the descent of Israel into Egypt (46 8 f).

The incidents recorded are regarded by a certain school of OT scholars as the vague and fragmentary traditions of the tribe, wrought into the form of a biography of the supposed ancestor of the tribe. This interpretation raises more difficulties than it solves, and depends for coherence upon too many assumptions and conjectures. The narrative as it stands is quite intelligible and self-consistent. There is no good reason to doubt that, as far as it goes, it is an authentic record of the life of Jacob's son.

At the first census in the wilderness Reuben numbered 46,500 men of war (Nu 1 21); at the second they had fallen to 43,730; see

2. Tribal History NUMBERS. The standard of the camp of Reuben was on the south side of the tabernacle; and with him were Simeon and Gad; the total number of fighting men in this division being 151,450. Tg Pseudojon says that the standard was a deer, with the legend "Hear O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord." On the march this division took the second place (Nu 2 10 ff). The prince of the tribe was Elizur ben Shedeur, whose oblation is described in 7 30 ff. The Reubenite among the spies was Shammua ben Zaccur (13 4). It is possible that the conspiracy against Moses, organized by the Reubenites Dathan and Abiram, with the assistance of Korah the Levite (Nu 16), was an attempt on the part of the tribe to assert its rights as representing the firstborn. It is significant that the children of Korah did not perish (26 11). May not the influence of this incident on Moses' mind be traced in his "blessing," wishing for the continuance of the tribe, indeed, but not in great strength (Dt 33 6)? This was a true forecast of the tribal history.

When the high plateau E. of the Dead Sea and the Jordan fell into the hands of the Israelite invaders, these spacious pastoral uplands irresistibly attracted the great flock-masters of Reuben and Gad, two tribes destined to be neighbors during succeeding centuries. At their earnest request Moses allowed them their tribal possessions here subject to one condition, which they loyally accepted. They should not "sit here," and so discourage their brethren who went to war beyond the Jordan. They should provide for the security of their cattle, fortify cities to protect their little ones and their wives from the inhabitants of the land, and their men of war should go before the host in the campaign of conquest until the children of Israel should have inherited every man his inheritance (Nu 32 1-27). Of the actual part they took in that warfare there is no record, but perhaps "the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben" (Josh 15 6; 18 17) marked some memorable deed of valor by a member of the tribe. At the end of the campaign the men of Reuben, having earned the gratitude of the western tribes, enriched by their share of the spoils of the enemy, returned with honor to their new home. Along with their brethren of Gad they felt the dangers attaching to their position of isolation, cut off from the rest of their people by the great cleft of the Jordan valley. They reared therefore the massive altar of Ed in the valley, so that in the very throat of that instrument of severance there might be a perpetual witness to themselves and to their children of the essential unity of Israel. The western tribes misunderstood the action and, dreading religious schism, gathered in force to stamp it out. Explanations followed which were entirely satisfactory, and a threatening danger was averted (Josh 22). But the instincts of the eastern tribes were right, as subsequent history was to prove. The Jordan valley was but one of many causes of sundering. The whole circumstances and conditions of life on the E. differed widely from those on the W. of the river, pastoral pursuits and life in the open being contrasted with agricultural and city life.

The land given by Moses to the tribe of Reuben reached from the Arnon, Wady el-Môjib, in the S., to the border of Gad in the N. In Nu 32 34 cities of Gad are named which lay far S., Aroer being on the very lip of the Arnon; but these are probably to be taken as an enclave in the territory of Reuben. From Josh 13 15 ff it is clear that the northern border ran from some point N. of the Dead Sea in a direction E.N.E., passing to the N. of Heshbon. The Dead Sea formed the western boundary, and it marched with the desert on the E. No doubt many districts changed hands in the course of the history. At the invasion of Tiglath-pileser, e.g., we read that Aroer was in the hands of the Reubenites, "and eastward . . . even unto the entrance of the wilderness from the river Euphrates" (1 Ch 5 8 f). Bezer the city of refuge lay in Reuben's territory (Josh 20 8, etc.). A general description of the country will be found under MOAB; while the cities of Reuben are dealt with in separate articles.

Reuben and Gad, occupying contiguous districts, and even, as we have seen, to some extent overlapping, are closely associated in the history. Neither took part in the glorious struggle against Sisera (Jgs 5 15 ff). Already apparently the sundering influences were taking effect. They are not excepted, however, from "all the tribes of Israel" who sent contingents for the war against Benjamin (Jgs 20 10; 21 5), and the reference in 5 15 seems to show that Reuben might have done great things had he been disposed. The tribe therefore was still powerful, but perhaps absorbed by anxieties as to its relations with neighboring peoples. In guarding their numerous flocks against attack from the S., and sudden incursions from the desert, a warlike spirit and martial prowess were developed. They were "valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword, and to shoot with bow, and skilful in war" (1 Ch 5 18). They overwhelmed the Hagrites with Jetur and Naphish and Nodab, and greatly enriched themselves with the spoil. In recording the raid the Chronicler pays a compliment to their religious loyalty: "They cried to God in the battle, and he was entreated of them, because they put their trust in him" (5 19 ff). Along with Gad and Manasseh they sent a contingent of 120,000 men "with all manner of instruments of war for the battle, . . . men of war, that could order the battle array," men who "came with a perfect heart to Hebron, to make David king" (12 37 f). Among David's mighty men was Adina, "a chief of the Reubenites, and thirty with him" (11 42). In the 40th year of David's reign overseers were set over the Reubenites "for every matter pertaining to God, and for the affairs of the king" (26 32). Perhaps in spite of the help given to David the Reubenites had never quite got over their old loyalty to the house of Saul. At any rate, when disruption came they joined the Northern Kingdom (1 K 11 31).

The subsequent history of the tribe is left in much obscurity. Exposed as they were to hostile influences of Moab and the East, and cut off from fellowship with their brethren in worship, in their isolation they probably found the descent into idolatry all too easy, and the once powerful tribe sank into comparative insignificance. Of the immediate causes of this decline we have no knowledge. Moab established its authority over the land that had belonged to Reuben; and Mesha, in his inscription (M S), while he speaks of Gad, does not think Reuben worthy of mention. They had probably become largely absorbed in the northern tribe. They are named as suffering in the invasion of Hazael during the reign of Jehu (2 K 10 32 f). That "they trespassed against the God of their fathers, and played the harlot after the gods of the peoples of the land" is given as the reason for the fate that befell them at the hands of Pul, king of Assyria, who carried them away, "and brought them unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river of Gozan" (1 Ch 5 25 f).

The resemblance of Reuben's case to that of Simeon is striking, for Simeon also appears to have been practically absorbed in the tribe of Judah. The prestige that should have been Reuben's in virtue of his birthright is said to have passed to Joseph (1 Ch 5 1). And the place of Reuben and Simeon in Israel is taken by the sons of Joseph, a fact referred to in the blessing of Jacob (Gen 48 5).

Ezekiel finds a place for Reuben in his picture of restored Israel (48 6). He appears also—in this case preceded by Judah only—in Rev 7 5.

W. EWING
REUBENITES, rōō'ben-its (רֵוּבֵנִי, hā-rē'ū-bhēnī; ῥοῦβηνίται, dēmoi Rhoubēn): Members of the tribe of Reuben (Nu 26 7, etc.). Adina, one of David's mighty men, was a Reubenite (1 Ch 11 42).

REUEL, rōō'el (רְעוּל, rē'ū'ēl, "God is his friend"; LXX Ῥαγουήλ, Rhagouēl):

(1) In the genealogical system Reuel is both a son of Esau by Basemath (Gen 36 4.10.13.17; 1 Ch 1 35.37) and the father of the father-in-law of Moses, Hobab (Nu 10 29). In the account of the marriage of Zipporah to Moses (Ex 2 16-21) Jethro seems to be called Reuel (cf HOBAB). The various names of Jethro perplexed the Talmudists, too; some held that his real name was "Hobab," and that Reuel was his father. Reuel is probably a clan name (Gray, "Nu," ICC), and Hobab is a member of the clan ("son") of Reuel (Nu 10 29 AV reads "Raguel").

(2) The father of Eliasaph, the prince of Gad (Nu 2 14), called (by some copyist's mistake) "Deuel" in 1 14; 7 42.47; 10 20. LXX has uniformly Rhagouēl.

(3) A Benjamite (1 Ch 9 8).

HORACE J. WOLF
REUMAH, rōō'ma (רְעוּמָה, rē'ūmah): The concubine of Nahor (Gen 22 24).

LITERATURE

I. The Nature of Revelation.—The religion of the Bible is a frankly supernatural religion. By this is not meant merely that, according to it, all men, as creatures, live, move and have their being in God. It is meant that, according to it, God has intervened extraordinarily, in the course of the sinful world's development, for the salvation of men otherwise lost. In Eden the Lord God had been present with sinless man in such a sense as to form a distinct element in his social environment (Gen 3 8). This intimate association was broken up by the Fall. But God did not therefore withdraw Himself from concernment with men. Rather, He began at once a series of interventions in human history by means of which man might be rescued from his sin and, despite it, brought to the end destined for him. These interventions involved the segregation of a people for Himself, by whom God should be known, and whose distinction should be that God should be "nigh unto them" as He was not to other nations (Dt 4 7; Ps 145 18). But this people was not permitted to imagine that it owed its segregation to anything in itself fitted to attract or determine the Divine preference; no consciousness was more poignant in Israel than that Jeh had chosen it, not it Him, and that Jeh's choice of it rested solely on His gracious will. Nor was this people permitted to imagine that it was for its own sake alone that it had been singled out to be the sole recipient of the knowledge of Jeh; it was made clear from the beginning that God's mysteriously gracious dealing with it had as its ultimate end the blessing of the whole world (Gen 12 2.3; 17 4.5.6.16; 18 18; 22 18; cf Rom 4 13), the bringing together again of the divided families of the earth under the glorious reign of Jeh, and the reversal of the curse under which the whole world lay for its sin (Gen 12 3). Meanwhile, however, Jeh was known only in Israel. To Israel God showed His word and made known His statutes and judgments, and after this fashion He dealt with no other nation; and therefore none other knew His judgments (Ps 147 19 f). Accordingly, when the hope of Israel (who was also the desire of all nations) came, His own lips unhesitatingly declared that the salvation He brought, though of universal application, was "from the Jews" (Jn 4 22). And the nations to which this salvation had not been made known are declared by the chief agent in its proclamation to them to be, meanwhile, "far off," "having no hope" and "without God in the world" (Eph 2 12), because they were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenant of the promise.

The religion of the Bible thus announces itself, not as the product of men's search after God, if haply they may feel after Him and find Him, but as the creation in men of the gracious God, forming a people for Himself, that they may show forth His praise. In other words, the religion of the Bible presents itself as distinctively a revealed religion. Or rather, to speak more exactly, it announces itself as the revealed religion, as the only revealed religion; and sets itself as such over against all other religions, which are represented as all products, in a sense in which it is not, of the art and device of man.

It is not, however, implied in this exclusive claim to revelation—which is made by the religion of the Bible in all the stages of its history—that the living God, who made the heaven and the earth and the sea and all that in them is, has left Himself without witness among the peoples of the world (Acts 14 17). It is asserted indeed, that in the process of His redemptive work, God suffered for a season all the nations to walk in their own ways; but it is added that to none of them has He failed to do good, and to give from heaven rains and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness. And not only is He represented as thus constantly showing Himself in His providence not far from any one of them, thus wooing them to seek Him if haply they might feel after Him and find Him (Acts 17 27), but as from the foundation of the world openly manifesting Himself to them in the works of His hands, in which His everlasting power and Divinity are clearly seen (Rom 1 20).

That men at large have not retained Him in their knowledge, or served Him as they ought, is not due therefore to failure on His part to keep open the way to knowledge of Him, but to the darkening of their senseless hearts by sin and to the vanity of their sin-deflected reasonings (Rom 1 21 ff), by means of which they have supplanted the truth of God by a lie and have come to worship and serve the creature rather than the ever-blessed Creator. It is, indeed, precisely because in their sin they have thus held down the truth in unrighteousness and have refused to have God in their knowledge (so it is intimated); and because, moreover, in their sin, the revelation God gives of Himself in His works of creation and providence no longer suffices for men's needs, that God has intervened supernaturally in the course of history to form a people for Himself, through whom at length all the world should be blessed.

It is quite obvious that there are brought before us in these several representations two species or stages of revelation, which should be dis-

2. General and Special Revelation. The General Revelation is the revelation which God continuously makes to all men: by it His power and Divinity are made known.

And there is the revelation which He makes exclusively to His chosen people: through it His saving grace is made known. Both species or stages of revelation are insisted upon throughout the Scriptures. They are, for example, brought significantly together in such a declaration as we find in Ps 19: "The heavens declare the glory of God . . . their line is gone out through all the earth" (vs 1.4); "The law of Jeh is perfect, restoring the soul" (ver 7). The Psalmist takes his beginning here from the praise of the glory of God, the Creator of all that is, which has been written upon the very heavens, that none may fail to see it. From this he rises, however, quickly to the more full-throated praise of the mercy of Jeh, the covenant God, who has visited His people with saving instruction. Upon this higher revelation there is finally based a prayer for salvation from sin, which ends in a great threefold acclamation, instinct with adoring gratitude: "O Jeh, my rock, and my redeemer" (ver 14). "The heavens," comments Lord Bacon, "indeed tell of the glory of God, but not of His will according to which the poet prays to be pardoned and sanctified." In so commenting, Lord Bacon touches the exact point of distinction between the two species or stages of revelation. The one is adapted to man as man; the other to man as sinner; and since man, on becoming sinner, has not ceased to be man, but has only acquired new needs requiring additional provisions to bring him to the end of his existence, so the revelation directed to man as sinner does not supersede that given to man as man, but supplements it with these new provisions for his attainment, in his new condition of blindness, helplessness and guilt induced by sin, of the end of his being.

These two species or stages of revelation have been commonly distinguished from one another by the distinctive names of natural and supernatural revelation, or general and special revelation, or natural and soteriological revelation. Each of these modes of discriminating them has its particular fitness and describes a real difference between the two in nature, reach or purpose. The one is communicated through the media of natural phenomena, occurring in the course of Nature or of history; the other implies an intervention in the natural course of things and is not merely in source but in mode supernatural. The one is addressed generally to all intelligent creatures, and is therefore accessible to all men; the other is addressed to a special class of sinners, to whom God would make known His salvation. The one has in view to meet and supply the natural need of creatures for knowledge of their God; the other to rescue broken and deformed sinners from their sin and its consequences. But, though thus distinguished from one another, it is important that the two species or stages of revelation should not be set in opposition to one another, or the closeness of their mutual relations or the constancy of their interaction be obscured. They constitute together a unitary whole, and each is incomplete without the other. In its most general idea, revelation is rooted in creation and the relations with His intelligent creatures into which God has brought Himself by giving them being. Its object is to realize the end of man's creation, to be attained only through knowledge of God and perfect and unbroken communion with Him. On the entrance of sin into the world, destroying this communion with God and obscuring the knowledge of Him derived from Nature, another mode of revelation was necessitated, having also another content, adapted to the new relation to God and the new conditions of intellect, heart and will brought about by sin. It must not be supposed, however, that this new mode of revelation was an ex post facto expedient, introduced to meet an unforeseen contingency. The actual course of human development was in the nature of the case the expected and the intended course of human development, for which man was created; and revelation, therefore, in its double form was the Divine purpose for man from the beginning, and constitutes a unitary provision for the realization of the end of his creation in the actual circumstances in which he exists. We may distinguish in this unitary revelation the two elements by the coöperation of which the effect is produced; but we should bear in mind that only by their coöperation is the effect produced. Without special revelation, general revelation would be for sinful men incomplete and ineffective, and could issue, as in point of fact it has issued wherever it alone has been accessible, only in leaving them without excuse (Rom 1 20). Without general revelation, special revelation would lack that basis in the fundamental knowledge of God as the mighty and wise, righteous and good maker and ruler of all things, apart from which the further revelation of this great God's interventions in the world for the salvation of sinners could not be either intelligible, credible or operative.

(1) Revelation in Eden.—Only in Eden has general revelation been adequate to the needs of man. Not being a sinner, man in Eden had no need of that grace of God itself by which sinners are restored to communion with Him, or of the special revelation of this grace of God to sinners to enable them to live with God. And not being a sinner, man in Eden, as he contemplated the works of God, saw God in the unclouded mirror of his mind with a clarity of vision, and lived with Him in the untroubled depths of his heart with a trustful intimacy of association, inconceivable to sinners. Nevertheless, the revelation of God in Eden was not merely "natural." Not only does the prohibition of the forbidden fruit involve a positive commandment (Gen 2 16), but the whole history implies an immediacy of intercourse with God which cannot easily be set to the credit of the picturesque art of the narrative, or be fully accounted for by the vividness of the perception of God in His works proper to sinless creatures. The impression is strong that what is meant to be conveyed to us is that man dwelt with God in Eden, and enjoyed with Him immediate and not merely mediate communion. In that case, we may understand that if man had not fallen, he would have continued to enjoy immediate intercourse with God, and that the cessation of this immediate intercourse is due to sin. It is not then the supernaturalness of special revelation which is rooted in sin, but, if we may be allowed the expression, the specialness of supernatural revelation. Had man not fallen, heaven would have continued to lie about him through all his history, as it lay about his infancy; every man would have enjoyed direct vision of God and immediate speech with Him. Man having fallen, the cherubim and the flame of a sword, turning every way, keep the path; and God breaks His way in a round-about fashion into man's darkened heart to reveal there His redemptive love. By slow steps and gradual stages He at once works out His saving purpose and molds the world for its reception, choosing a people for Himself and training it through long and weary ages, until at last when the fulness of time has come, He bares His arm and sends out the proclamation of His great salvation to all the earth.

(2) Revelation among the heathen.—Certainly, from the gate of Eden onward, God's general revelation ceased to be, in the strict sense, supernatural. It is, of course, not meant that God deserted His world and left it to fester in its iniquity. His providence still ruled over all, leading steadily onward to the goal for which man had been created, and of the attainment of which in God's own good time and way the very continuance of men's existence, under God's providential government, was a pledge. And His Spirit still everywhere wrought upon the hearts of men, stirring up all their powers (though created in the image of God, marred and impaired by sin) to their best activities, and to such splendid effect in every department of human achievement as to command the admiration of all ages, and in the highest region of all, that of conduct, to call out from an apostle the encomium that though they had no law they did by nature (observe the word "nature") the things of the law. All this, however, remains within the limits of Nature, that is to say, within the sphere of operation of Divinely directed and assisted second causes. It illustrates merely the heights to which the powers of man may attain under the guidance of providence and the influences of what we have learned to call God's "common grace." Nowhere, throughout the whole ethnic domain, are the conceptions of God and His ways put within the reach of man, through God's revelation of Himself in the works of creation and providence, transcended; nowhere is the slightest knowledge betrayed of anything concerning God and His purposes, which could be known only by its being supernaturally told to men. Of the entire body of "saving truth," for example, which is the burden of what we call "special revelation," the whole heathen world remained in total ignorance. And even its hold on the general truths of religion, not being vitalized by supernatural enforcements, grew weak, and its knowledge of the very nature of God decayed, until it ran out to the dreadful issue which Paul sketches for us in that inspired philosophy of religion which he incorporates in the latter part of the first chapter of the Ep. to the Rom.

Behind even the ethnic development, there lay, of course, the supernatural intercourse of man with God which had obtained before the entrance of sin into the world, and the supernatural revelations at the gate of Eden (Gen 3 8), and at the second origin of the human race, the Flood (Gen 8 21.22; 9 1-17). How long the tradition of this primitive revelation lingered in nooks and corners of the heathen world, conditioning and vitalizing the natural revelation of God always accessible, we have no means of estimating. Neither is it easy to measure the effect of God's special revelation of Himself to His people upon men outside the bounds of, indeed, but coming into contact with, this chosen people, or sharing with them a common natural inheritance. Lot and Ishmael and Esau can scarcely have been wholly ignorant of the word of God which came to Abraham and Isaac and Jacob; nor could the Egyptians from whose hands God wrested His people with a mighty arm fail to learn something of Jeh, any more than the mixed multitudes who witnessed the ministry of Christ could fail to infer something from His gracious walk and mighty works. It is natural to infer that no nation which was intimately associated with Israel's life could remain entirely unaffected by Israel's revelation. But whatever impressions were thus conveyed reached apparently individuals only: the heathen which surrounded Israel, even those most closely affiliated with Israel, remained heathen; they had no revelation. In the sporadic instances when God visited an alien with a supernatural communication—such as the dreams sent to Abimelech (Gen 20) and to Pharaoh (Gen 40, 41) and to Nebuchadnezzar (Dnl 2 1 ff) and to the soldier in the camp of Midian (Jgs 7 13)—it was in the interests, not of the heathen world, but of the chosen people that they were sent; and these instances derive their significance wholly from this fact. There remain, no doubt, the mysterious figure of Melchizedek, perhaps also of Jethro, and the strange apparition of Balaam, who also, however, appear in the sacred narrative only in connection with the history of God's dealings with His people and in their interest. Their unexplained appearance cannot in any event avail to modify the general fact that the life of the heathen peoples lay outside the supernatural revelation of God. The heathen were suffered to walk in their own ways (Acts 14 16).

II. The Process of Revelation.—Meanwhile, however, God had not forgotten them, but was preparing salvation for them also through the supernatural revelation of His grace that He was making to His people. According to the Bib. representation, in the midst of and working confluent with the revelation which He has always been giving of Himself on the plane of Nature, God was making also from the very fall of man a further revelation of Himself on the plane of grace. In contrast with His general, natural revelation, in which all men by virtue of their very nature as men share, this special, supernatural revelation was granted at first only to individuals, then progressively to a family, a tribe, a nation, a race, until, when the fulness of time was come, it was made the possession of the whole world. It may be difficult to obtain from Scripture a clear account of why God chose thus to give this revelation of His grace only progressively; or, to be more explicit, through the process of a historical development. Such is, however, the ordinary mode of the Divine working: it is so that God made the worlds, it is so that He creates the human race itself, the recipient of this revelation, it is so that He builds up His kingdom in the world and in the individual soul, which only gradually comes whether to the knowledge of God or to the fruition of His salvation. As to the fact, the Scriptures are explicit, tracing for us, or rather embodying in their own growth, the record of the steady advance of this gracious revelation through definite stages from its first faint beginnings to its glorious completion in Jesus Christ.

So express is its relation to the development of the kingdom of God itself, or rather to that great series of Divine operations which are directed to the building up of the kingdom of God in the world, that it is sometimes confounded with them or thought of as simply their reflection in the contemplating mind of man.

Thus it is not infrequently said that revelation, meaning this special, redemptive revelation, has been communicated in deeds, not in words; and it is occasionally elaborately argued that the sole manner in which God has revealed Himself as the Saviour of sinners is just by performing those mighty acts by which sinners are saved. This is not, however, the Bib. representation. Revelation is, of course, often made through the instrumentality of deeds; and the series of His great redemptive acts by which He saves the world constitutes the preëminent revelation of the grace of God—so far as these redemptive acts are open to observation and are perceived in their significance. But revelation, after all, is the correlate of understanding and has as its proximate end just the production of knowledge, though not, of course, knowledge for its own sake, but for the sake of salvation. The series of the redemptive acts of God, accordingly, can properly be designated "revelation" only when and so far as they are contemplated as adapted and designed to produce knowledge of God and His purpose and methods of grace. No bare series of unexplained acts can be thought, however, adapted to produce knowledge, esp. if these acts be, as in this case, of a highly transcendental character. Nor can this particular series of acts be thought to have as its main design the production of knowledge; its main design is rather to save man. No doubt the production of knowledge of the Divine grace is one of the means by which this main design of the redemptive acts of God is attained. But this only renders it the more necessary that the proximate result of producing knowledge should not fail; and it is doubtless for this reason that the series of redemptive acts of God has not been left to explain itself, but the explanatory word has been added to it. Revelation thus appears, however, not as the mere reflection of the redeeming acts of God in the minds of men, but as a factor in the redeeming work of God, a component part of the series of His redeeming acts, without which that series would be incomplete and so far inoperative for its main end. Thus the Scriptures represent it, not confounding revelation with the series of the redemptive acts of God, but placing it among the redemptive acts of God and giving it a function as a substantive element in the operations by which the merciful God saves sinful men. It is therefore not made even a mere constant accompaniment of the redemptive acts of God, giving their explanation that they may be understood. It occupies a far more independent place among them than this, and as frequently precedes them to prepare their way as it accompanies or follows them to interpret their meaning. It is, in one word, itself a redemptive act of God and by no means the least important in the series of His redemptive acts.

This might, indeed, have been inferred from its very nature, and from the nature of the salvation which was being wrought out by these redemptive acts of God. One of the most grievous of the effects of sin is the deformation of the image of God reflected in the human mind, and there can be no recovery from sin which does not bring with it the correction of this deformation and the reflection in the soul of man of the whole glory of the Lord God Almighty. Man is an intelligent being; his superiority over the brute is found, among other things, precisely in the direction of all his life by his intelligence; and his blessedness is rooted in the true knowledge of his God—for this is life eternal, that we should know the only true God and Him whom He has sent. Dealing with man as an intelligent being, God the Lord has saved him by means of a revelation, by which he has been brought into an ever more and more adequate knowledge of God, and been led ever more and more to do his part in working out his own salvation with fear and trembling as he perceived with ever more and more clearness how God is working it out for him through mighty deeds of grace.

This is not the place to trace, even in outline, from the material point of view, the development of God's redemptive revelation from its first beginnings, in the promise given to Abraham—or rather in what has been called the Protevangelium at the gate of Eden—to its completion in the advent and work of Christ and the teaching of His apostles; a steadily advancing development, which, as it lies spread out to view in the pages of Scripture, takes to those who look at it from the consummation backward, the appearance of the shadow cast athwart preceding ages by the great figure of Christ. Even from the formal point of view, however, there has been pointed out a progressive advance in the method of revelation, consonant with its advance in content, or rather with the advancing stages of the building up of the kingdom of God, to subserve which is the whole object of revelation. Three distinct steps in revelation have been discriminated from this point of view. They are distinguished precisely by the increasing independence of revelation of the deeds constituting the series of the redemptive acts of God, in which, nevertheless, all revelation is a substantial element. Discriminations like this must not be taken too absolutely; and in the present instance the chronological sequence cannot be pressed. But, with much interlacing, three generally successive stages of revelation may be recognized, producing periods at least characteristically of what we may somewhat conventionally call theophany, prophecy and inspiration. What may be somewhat indefinitely marked off as the Patriarchal age is characteristically "the period of Outward Manifestations, and Symbols, and Theophanies": during it "God spoke to men through their senses, in physical phenomena, as the burning bush, the cloudy pillar, or in sensuous forms, as men, angels, etc. . . . In the Prophetic age, on the contrary, the prevailing mode of revelation was by means of inward prophetic inspiration": God spoke to men characteristically by the movements of the Holy Spirit in their hearts. "Prevaillingly, at any rate from Samuel downwards, the supernatural revelation was a revelation in the hearts of the foremost thinkers of the people, or, as we call it, prophetic inspiration, without the aid of external sensuous symbols of God" (A. B. Davidson, OT Prophecy, 1903, p. 148; cf pp. 12-14, 145 ff). This internal method of revelation reaches its culmination in the NT period, which is preëminently the age of the Spirit. What is esp. characteristic of this age is revelation through the medium of the written word, what may be called apostolic as distinguished from prophetic inspiration. The revealing Spirit speaks through chosen men as His organs, but through these organs in such a fashion that the most intimate processes of their souls become the instruments by means of which He speaks His mind. Thus at all events there are brought clearly before us three well-marked modes of revelation, which we may perhaps designate respectively, not with perfect discrimination, it is true, but not misleadingly, (1) external manifestation, (2) internal suggestion, and (3) concursive operation.

III. Modes of Revelation.—Theophany may be taken as the typical form of "external manifestation"; but by its side may be ranged

1. Modes of all of those mighty works by which Revelation God makes Himself known, including express miracles, no doubt, but along with them every supernatural intervention in the affairs of men, by means of which a better understanding is communicated of what God is or what are His purposes of grace to a sinful race. Under "internal suggestion" may be subsumed all the characteristic phenomena of what is most properly spoken of as "prophecy": visions and dreams, which, according to a fundamental passage (Nu 12 6), constitute the typical forms of prophecy, and with them the whole "prophetic word," which shares its essential characteristic with visions and dreams, since it comes not by the will of man but from God. By "concurive operation" may be meant that form of revelation illustrated in an inspired psalm or epistle or history, in which no human activity—not even the control of the will—is superseded, but the Holy Spirit works in, with and through them all in such a manner as to communicate to the product qualities distinctly superhuman. There is no age in the history of the religion of the Bible, from that of Moses to that of Christ and His apostles, in which all these modes of revelation do not find place. One or another may seem particularly characteristic of this age or of that; but they all occur in every age. And they occur side by side, broadly speaking, on the same level. No discrimination is drawn between them in point of worthiness as modes of revelation, and much less in point of purity in the revelations communicated through them. The circumstance that God spoke to Moses, not by dream or vision but mouth to mouth, is, indeed, adverted to (Nu 12 8) as a proof of the peculiar favor shown to Moses and even of the superior dignity of Moses above other organs of revelation: God admitted him to an intimacy of intercourse which He did not accord to others. But though Moses was thus distinguished above all others in the dealings of God with him, no distinction is drawn between the revelations given through him and those given through other organs of revelation in point either of Divinity or of authority. And beyond this we have no Scriptural warrant to go on in contrasting one mode of revelation with another. Dreams may seem to us little fitted to serve as vehicles of Divine communications. But there is no suggestion in Scripture that revelations through dreams stand on a lower plane than any others; and we should not fail to remember that the essential characteristics of revelations through dreams are shared by all forms of revelation in which (whether we should call them visions or not) the images or ideas which fill, or pass in procession through, the consciousness are determined by some other power than the recipient's own will. It may seem natural to suppose that revelations rise in rank in proportion to the fulness of the engagement of the mental activity of the recipient in their reception. But we should bear in mind that the intellectual or spiritual quality of a revelation is not derived from the recipient but from its Divine Giver. The fundamental fact in all revelation is that it is from God. This is what gives unity to the whole process of revelation, given though it may be in divers portions and in divers manners and distributed though it may be through the ages in accordance with the mere will of God, or as it may have suited His developing purpose—this and its unitary end, which is ever the building up of the kingdom of God. In whatever diversity of forms, by means of whatever variety of modes, in whatever distinguishable stages it is given, it is ever the revelation of the One God, and it is ever the one consistently developing redemptive revelation of God.

On a prima facie view it may indeed seem likely that a difference in the quality of their supernaturalness would inevitably obtain between revelations given through such divergent modes. The completely supernatural character of revelations given in theophanies is obvious. He who will not allow that God speaks to man, to make known His gracious purposes toward him, has no other recourse here than to pronounce the stories legendary. The objectivity of the mode of communication which is adopted is intense, and it is thrown up to observation with the greatest emphasis. Into the natural life of man God intrudes in a purely supernatural manner, hearing a purely supernatural communication. In these communications we are given accordingly just a series of "naked messages of God." But not even in the Patriarchal age were all revelations given in theophanies or objective appearances. There were dreams, and visions, and revelations without explicit intimation in the narrative of how they were communicated. And when we pass on in the history, we do not, indeed, leave behind us theophanies and objective appearances. It is not only made the very characteristic of Moses, the greatest figure in the whole history of revelation except only that of Christ, that he knew God face to face (Dt 34 10), and God spoke to him mouth to mouth, even manifestly, and not in dark speeches (Nu 12 8); but throughout the whole history of revelation down to the appearance of Jesus to Paul on the road to Damascus, God has shown Himself visibly to His servants whenever it has seemed good to Him to do so and has spoken with them in objective speech. Nevertheless, it is expressly made the characteristic of the Prophetic age that God makes Himself known to His servants "in a vision," "in a dream" (Nu 12 6). And although, throughout its entire duration, God, in fulfilment of His promise (Dt 18 18), put His words in the mouths of His prophets and gave them His commandments to speak, yet it would seem inherent in the very employment of men as instruments of revelation that the words of God given through them are spoken by human mouths; and the purity of their supernaturalness may seem so far obscured. And when it is not merely the mouths of men with which God thus serves Himself in the delivery of His messages, but their minds and hearts as well—the play of their religious feelings, or the processes of their logical reasoning, or the tenacity of their memories, as, say, in a psalm or in an epistle, or a history—the supernatural element in the communication may easily seem to retire still farther into the background. It can scarcely be a matter of surprise, therefore, that question has been raised as to the relation of the natural and the supernatural in such revelations, and, in many current manners of thinking and speaking of them, the completeness of their supernaturalness has been limited and curtailed in the interests of the natural instrumentalities employed. The plausibility of such reasoning renders it the more necessary that we should observe the unvarying emphasis which the Scriptures place upon the absolute supernaturalness of revelation in all its modes alike. In the view of the Scriptures, the completely supernatural character of revelation is in no way lessened by the circumstance that it has been given through the instrumentality of men. They affirm, indeed, with the greatest possible emphasis that the Divine word delivered through men is the pure word of God, diluted with no human admixture whatever.

We have already been led to note that even on the occasion when Moses is exalted above all other organs of revelation (Nu 12 6 ff), in point of dignity and favor, no suggestion whatever is made of any inferiority, in either the directness or the purity of their supernaturalness, attaching to other organs of revelation.

There might never afterward arise a prophet in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face (Dt 34 10). But each of the whole series of prophets raised up by Jeh that the people might always know His will was to be like Moses in speaking to the people only what Jeh commanded them (Dt 18 15,18,20). In this great promise, securing to Israel the succession of prophets, there is also included a declaration of precisely how Jeh would communicate His messages not so much to them as through them. "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee," we read (Dt 18 18), "and I will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him." The process of revelation through the prophets was a process by which Jeh put His words in the mouths of the prophets, and the prophets spoke precisely these words and no others. So the prophets themselves ever asserted. "Then Jeh put forth his hand, and touched my mouth," explains Jeremiah in his account of how he received his prophecies, "and Jeh said unto me, Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth" (Jer 1 9; cf 5 14; Isa 51 16; 59 21; Nu 22 35; 23 5. 12.16). Accordingly, the words "with which" they spoke were not their own but the Lord's: "And he said unto me," records Ezekiel, "Son of man, go, get thee unto the house of Israel, and speak with my words unto them" (Ezk 3 4). It is a process of nothing other than "dictation" which is thus described (2 S 14 3.19), though, of course, the question may remain open of the exact processes by which this dictation is accomplished. The fundamental passage which brings the central fact before us in the most vivid manner is, no doubt, the account of the commissioning of Moses and Aaron given in Ex 4 10-17; 7 1-7. Here, in the most express words, Jeh declares that He who made the mouth can be with it to teach it what to speak, and announces the precise function of a prophet to be that he is "a mouth of God," who speaks not his own but God's words. Accordingly, the Heb name for "prophet" (nābhī'), whatever may be its etymology, means throughout the Scriptures just "spokesman," though not "spokesman" in general, but spokesman by way of eminence, that is, God's spokesman; and the characteristic formula by which a prophetic declaration is announced is: "The word of Jeh came to me," or the brief "saith Jeh" (נָאֵם יְהוָה, n'um Yahweh). In no case does a prophet put his words forward as his own words. That he is a prophet at all is due not to choice on his own part, but to a call of God, obeyed often with reluctance; and he prophesies or forbears to prophesy, not according to his own will but as the Lord opens and shuts his mouth (Ezk 3 26 f) and creates for him the fruit of the lips (Isa 57 19; cf 6 7; 50 4). In contrast with the false prophets, he strenuously asserts that he does not speak out of his own heart ("heart" in Bib. language includes the whole inner man), but all that he proclaims is the pure word of Jeh.

The fundamental passage does not quite leave the matter, however, with this general declaration.

It describes the characteristic manner 4. Prophecy in which Jeh communicates His messages to His prophets as through the medium of visions and dreams.

Neither visions in the technical sense of that word, nor dreams, appear, however, to have been the customary mode of revelation to the prophets, the record of whose revelations has come down to us. But, on the other hand, there are numerous indications in the record that the universal mode of revelation to them was one which was in some sense a vision, and can be classed only in the category distinctively so called.

The whole nomenclature of prophecy presupposes, indeed, its vision-form. Prophecy is distinctively a word, and what is delivered by the prophets is proclaimed as the "word of Jeh." That it should be announced by the formula, "Thus saith the Lord," is therefore, only what we expect; and we are prepared for such a description of its process as: "The Lord Jeh . . . wakeneth mine ear to hear." He "hath opened mine ear" (Isa 50 4.5). But this is not the way of speaking of their messages which is most usual in the prophets. Rather is the whole body of prophecy cursorily presented as a thing seen. Isaiah places at the head of his book: "The vision of Isaiah . . . which he saw" (cf Isa 29 10.11; Ob ver 1); and then proceeds to set at the head of subordinate sections the remarkable words, "The word that Isaiah . . . saw" (2 1); "the burden [m "oracle"] . . . which Isaiah . . . did see" (13 1). Similarly there stand at the head of other prophecies: "the words of Amos . . . which he saw" (Am 1 1); "the word of Jeh that came to Micah . . . which he saw" (Mic 1 1); "the oracle which Habakkuk the prophet did see" (Hab 1 1m); and elsewhere such language occurs as this: "the word that Jeh hath showed me" (Jer 38 21); "the prophets have seen . . . oracles" (Lam 2 14); "the word of Jeh came . . . and I looked, and behold" (Ezk 1 3.4); "Woe unto the foolish prophets, that follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing" (Ezk 13 3); "I . . . will look forth to see what he will speak with me, . . . Jeh . . . said, Write the vision" (Hab 2 1f). It is an inadequate explanation of such language to suppose it merely a relic of a time when vision was more predominantly the form of revelation. There is no proof that vision in the technical sense ever was more predominantly the form of revelation than in the days of the great writing prophets; and such language as we have quoted too obviously represents the living point of view of the prophets to admit of the supposition that it was merely conventional on their lips. The prophets, in a word, represent the Divine communications which they received as given to them in some sense in visions.

It is possible, no doubt, to exaggerate the significance of this. It is an exaggeration, for example, to insist that therefore all the Divine communications made to the prophets must have come to them in external appearances and objective speech, addressed to and received by means of the bodily eye and ear. This would be to break down the distinction between manifestation and revelation, and to assimilate the mode of prophetic revelation to that granted to Moses, though these are expressly distinguished (Nu 12 6-8). It is also an exaggeration to insist that therefore the prophetic state must be conceived as that of strict ecstasy, involving the complete abeyance of all mental life on the part of the prophet (amentia), and possibly also accompanying physical effects. It is quite clear from the records which the prophets themselves give us of their revelations that their intelligence was alert in all stages of their reception of them. The purpose of both these extreme views is the good one of doing full justice to the objectivity of the revelations vouchsafed to the prophets. If these revelations took place entirely externally to the prophet, who merely stood off and contemplated them, or if they were implanted in the prophets by a process so violent as not only to supersede their mental activity but, for the time being, to annihilate it, it would be quite clear that they came from a source other than the prophets' own minds. It is undoubtedly the fundamental contention of the prophets that the revelations given through them are not their own but wholly God's. The significant language we have just quoted from Ezk 13 3: "Woe unto the foolish prophets, that follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing," is a typical utterance of their sense of the complete objectivity of their messages. What distinguishes the false prophets is precisely that they "prophesy out of their own heart" (Ezk 13 2-17), or, to draw the antithesis sharply, that "they speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of Jeh" (Jer 23 16,26; 14 14). But these extreme views fail to do justice, the one to the equally important fact that the word of God, given through the prophets, comes as the pure and unmixed word of God not merely to, but from, the prophets; and the other to the equally obvious fact that the intelligence of the prophets is alert throughout the whole process of the reception and delivery of the revelation made through them (see INSPIRATION; PROPHECY).

That which gives to prophecy as a mode of revelation its place in the category of visions, strictly so called, and dreams is that it shares with them the distinguishing characteristic which determines the class. In them all alike the movements of the mind are determined by something extraneous to the subject's will, or rather, since we are speaking of supernaturally given dreams and visions, extraneous to the totality of the subject's own psychoses. A power not himself takes possession of his consciousness and determines it according to its will. That power, in the case of the prophets, was fully recognized and energetically asserted to be Jeh Himself or, to be more specific, the Spirit of Jeh (1 S 10 6,10; Neh 9 30; Zec 7 12; Joel 2 28,29). The prophets were therefore 'men of the Spirit' (Hos 9 7). What constituted them prophets was that the Spirit was put upon them (Isa 42 1) or poured out on them (Joel 2 28,29), and they were consequently filled with the Spirit (Mic 3 8), or, in another but equivalent locution, that "the hand" of the Lord, or "the power of the hand" of the Lord, was upon them (2 K 3 15; Ezk 1 3; 3 14,22; 33 22; 37 1; 40 1), that is to say, they were under the Divine control. This control is represented as complete and compelling, so that, under it, the prophet becomes not the "mover," but the "moved" in the formation of his message. The apostle Peter very purely reflects the prophetic consciousness in his well-known declaration: 'No prophecy of scripture comes of private interpretation; for prophecy was never brought by the will of man; but it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God' (2 Pet 1 20,21).

What this language of Peter emphasizes—and what is emphasized in the whole account which the prophets give of their own consciousness—is, to speak plainly, the passivity of the prophets with respect to the revelation given through them. This is the significance of the phrase: 'it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God.' To be "borne" (φέρειν, pherein) is not the same as to be led (ἀγειν, agein), much less to be guided or directed (ὁδηγεῖν, hodgein): he that is "borne" contributes nothing to the movement induced, but is the object to be moved. The term "passivity" is, perhaps, however, liable to some misapprehension, and should not be overstrained. It is not intended to deny that the intelligence of the prophets was active in the reception of their message; it was by means of their active intelligence that their message was received: their intelligence was the instrument of revelation. It is intended to deny only that their intelligence was active in the production of their message: that it was creatively as distinguished from receptively active. For reception itself is a kind of activity. What the prophets are solicitous that their readers shall understand is that they are in no sense co-authors with God of their messages. Their messages are given them, given them entire, and given them precisely as they are given out by them. God speaks through them: they are not merely His messengers, but "His mouth." But at the same time their intelligence is active in the reception, retention and announcing of their messages, contributing nothing to them but presenting fit instruments for the communication of them—instruments capable of understanding, responding profoundly to and zealously proclaiming them.

There is, no doubt, a not unnatural hesitancy abroad in thinking of the prophets as exhibiting only such merely receptive activities. In the interests of their personalities, we are asked not to represent God as dealing mechanically with them, pouring His revelations into their souls to be simply received as in so many buckets, or violently wresting their minds from their own proper action that He may do His own thinking with them. Must we not rather suppose, we are asked, that all revelations must be "psychologically mediated," must be given "after the mode of moral mediation," and must be made first of all their recipients' "own spiritual possession"? And is not, in point of fact, the personality of each prophet clearly traceable in his message, and that to such an extent as to compel us to recognize him as in a true sense its real author? The plausibility of such questionings should not be permitted to obscure the fact that the mode of the communication of the prophetic messages which is suggested by them is directly contradicted by the prophets' own representations of their relations to the revealing Spirit. In the prophets' own view they were just instruments through whom God gave revelations which came from them, not as their own product, but as the pure word of Jeh. Neither should the plausibility of such questionings blind us to their speciousness. They exploit subordinate considerations, which are not without their validity in their own place and under their own limiting conditions, as if they were the determining or even the sole considerations in the case, and in neglect of the really determining considerations. God is Himself the author of the instruments He employs for the communication of His messages to men and has framed them into precisely the instruments He desired for the exact communication of His message. There is just ground for the expectation that He will use all the instruments He employs according to their natures; intelligent beings therefore as intelligent beings, moral agents as moral agents. But there is no just ground for asserting that God is incapable of employing the intelligent beings He has Himself created and formed to His will, to proclaim His messages purely as He gives them to them; or of making truly the possession of rational minds conceptions which they have themselves had no part in creating. And there is no ground for imagining that God is unable to frame His own message in the language of the organs of His revelation without its thereby ceasing to be, because expressed in a fashion natural to these organs, therefore purely His message. One would suppose it to lie in the very nature of the case that if the Lord makes any revelation to men, He would do it in the language of men; or, to individualize more explicitly, in the language of the man He employs as the organ of His revelation; and that naturally means, not the language of his nation or circle merely, but his own particular language, inclusive of all that gives individuality to his self-expression. We may speak of this, if we will, as "the accommodation of the revealing God to the several prophetic individualities." But we should avoid thinking of it externally and therefore mechanically, as if the revealing Spirit artificially phrased the message which He gives through each prophet in the particular forms of speech proper to the individuality of each, so as to create the illusion that the message comes out of the heart of the prophet himself. Precisely what the prophets affirm is that their messages do not come out of their own hearts and do not represent the workings of their own spirits. Nor is there any illusion in the phenomenon we are contemplating; and it is a much more intimate and, we may add, a much more interesting phenomenon than an external "accommodation" of speech to individual habits. It includes, on the one hand, the "accommodation" of the prophet, through his total preparation, to the speech in which the revelation to be given through him is to be clothed; and on the other involves little more than the consistent carrying into detail of the broad principle that God uses the instruments He employs in accordance with their natures.

No doubt, on adequate occasion, the very stones might cry out by the power of God, and dumb beasts speak, and mysterious voices sound forth from the void; and there have not been lacking instances in which men have been compelled by the same power to speak what they would not, and in languages whose very sounds were strange to their ears. But ordinarily when God the Lord would speak to men He avails Himself of the services of a human tongue with which to speak, and He employs this tongue according to its nature as a tongue and according to the particular nature of the tongue which He employs. It is vain to say that the message delivered through the instrumentality of this tongue is conditioned at least in its form by the tongue by which it is spoken, if not, indeed, limited, curtailed, in some degree determined even in its matter, by it. Not only was it God the Lord who made the tongue, and who made this particular tongue with all its peculiarities, not without regard to the message He would deliver through it; but His control of it is perfect and complete, and it is as absurd to say that He cannot speak His message by it purely without that message suffering change from the peculiarities of its tone and modes of enunciation, as it would be to say that no new truth can be announced in any language because the elements of speech by the combination of which the truth in question is announced are already in existence with their fixed range of connotation. The marks of the several individualities imprinted on the messages of the prophets, in other words, are only a part of the general fact that these messages are couched in human language, and in no way beyond that general fact affect their purity as direct communications from God.

A new set of problems is raised by the mode of revelation which we have called "concurvative operation." This mode of revelation differs from prophecy, properly so called, precisely by the employment in it, as is not done in prophecy, of the total personality of the organ of revelation, as a factor. It has been common to speak of the mode of the Spirit's action in this form of revelation, therefore, as an assistance, a superintendence, a direction, a control, the meaning being that the effect aimed at—the discovery and enunciation of Divine truth—is attained through the action of the human powers—historical research, logical reasoning, ethical thought, religious aspiration—acting not by themselves, however, but under the prevailing assistance, superintendence, direction, control of the Divine Spirit. This manner of speaking has the advantage of setting this mode of revelation sharply in contrast with prophetic revelation, as involving merely a determining, and not, as in prophetic revelation, a supercessive action of the revealing Spirit. We are warned, however, against pressing this discrimination too far by the inclusion of the whole body of Scripture in such passages as 2 Pet 1 20 f in the category of prophecy, and the assignment of their origin not to a mere "leading" but to the "bearing" of the Holy Spirit. In any event such terms as assistance, superintendence, direction, control, inadequately express the nature of the Spirit's action in revelation by "concurvative operation." The Spirit is not to be conceived as standing outside of the human powers employed for the effect in view, ready to supplement any inadequacies they may show and to supply any defects they may manifest, but as working confluent in, with and by them, elevating them, directing them, controlling them, energizing them, so that, as His instruments, they rise above themselves and under His inspiration do His work and reach His aim. The product, therefore, which is attained by their means is His product through them. It is this fact which gives to the process the right to be called actively, and to the product the right to be called passively, a revelation. Although the circumstance that what is done is done by and through the action of human powers keeps the product in form and quality in a true sense human, yet the confluent operation of the Holy Spirit throughout the whole process raises the result above what could by any possibility be achieved by mere human powers and constitutes it expressly a supernatural product. The human traits are traceable throughout its whole extent, but at bottom it is a Divine gift, and the language of Paul is the most proper mode of speech that could be applied to it: "Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth" (1 Cor 2 13); "The things which I write unto you . . . are the commandment of the Lord" (1 Cor 14 37). See INSPIRATION.

It is supposed that all the forms of special or redemptive revelation which underlie and give its content to the religion of the Bible may without violence be subsumed under one or another of these three modes of God—external manifestation, internal suggestion, and concurvative operation.

All, that is, except the culminating revelation, not through, but in, Jesus Christ. As in His person, in which dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, He rises above all classification and is sui generis; so the revelation accumulated in Him stands outside all the divers portions and divers manners in which otherwise revelation has been given and sums up in itself all that has been or can be made known of God and of His redemption. He does not so much make a revelation of God as Himself is the revelation of God; He does not merely disclose God's purpose of redemption, He is unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness and sanctification and redemption. The theophanies are but faint shadows in comparison with His manifestation of God in the flesh. The prophets could prophesy only as the Spirit of Christ which was in them testified, revealing to them as to servants one or another of the secrets of the Lord Jeh; from Him as His Son, Jeh has no secrets, but whatsoever the Father knows that the Son knows also. Whatever truth men have been made partakers of by the Spirit of truth is His (for all things whatsoever the Father hath are His) and is taken by the Spirit of truth and declared to men that He may be glorified. Nevertheless, though all revelation is thus summed up in Him, we should not fail to note very carefully that it would also be all sealed up in Him—so little is revelation conveyed by fact alone, without the word—had it not been thus taken by the Spirit of truth and declared unto men. The entirety of the NT is but the explanatory word accompanying and giving its effect to the fact of Christ. And when this fact was in all its meaning made the possession of men, revelation was completed and in that sense ceased. Jesus Christ is no less the end of revelation than He is the end of the law.

IV. Biblical Terminology.—There is not much additional to be learned concerning the nature and processes of revelation, from the terms currently employed in Scripture to express the idea. These terms are ordinarily the common words for disclosing, making known, making manifest, applied with more or less heightened significance to supernatural acts or effects in kind. In the Eng. Bible (AV) the vb. "reveal" occurs about 51 t, of which 22 are in the OT and 29 in the NT. In the OT the word is always the rendering of a

7. Complete Revelation of God in Christ

Heb term גָּלָה, gālāh, or its Aram. equivalent גָּלַח, g'lāh, the root meaning of which appears to be "nakedness." When applied to revelation, it seems to hint at the removal of obstacles to perception or the uncovering of objects to perception. In the NT the word "reveal" is always (with the single exception of Lk 2 35) the rendering of a Gr term ἀποκαλύπτω, apokaluptō (but in 2 Thess 1 7; 1 Pet 4 13 the corresponding noun ἀποκάλυψις, apokalupsis), which has a very similar basal significance with its Heb parallel. As this Heb word formed no substantive in this sense, the noun "revelation" does not occur in the Eng. OT, the idea being expressed, however, by other Heb terms variously rendered. It occurs in the Eng. NT, on the other hand, about a dozen times, and always as the rendering of the substantive corresponding to the vb. rendered "reveal" (apokalupsis). On the face of the Eng. Bible, the terms "reveal," "revelation" bear therefore uniformly the general sense of "disclose," "disclosure." The idea is found in the Bible, however, much more frequently than the terms "reveal," "revelation" in EV. Indeed, the Heb and Gr terms exclusively so rendered occur more frequently in this sense than in this rendering in the Eng. Bib. And by their side there stand various other terms which express in one way or another the general conception.

In the NT the vb. φανερόω, phanerōō, with the general sense of making manifest, manifesting, is the most common of these. It differs from apokaluptō as the more general and external term from the more special and inward. Other terms also are occasionally used: ἐπιφάνεια, epipháneia, "manifestation" (2 Thess 2 8; 1 Tim 6 14; 2 Tim 1 10; 4 1; Tit 2 13; cf ἐπιφάνω, epipháinō, Tit 2 11; 3 4); δεικνύω, deiknūō (Rev 1 1; 17 1; 22 1.6.8; cf Acts 9 16; 1 Tim 4 15); ἐξηγέομαι, exēgémāi (Jn 1 18), of which, however, only one perhaps—χρηματίζω, chrēmatisō (Mt 2 12.22; Lk 2 20; Acts 10 22; He 8 5; 11 7; 12 25); χρηματισμός, chrēmatismós (Rom 11 4)—calls for particular notice as in a special way, according to its usage, expressing the idea of a Divine communication.

In the OT, the common Heb vb. for "seeing" (רָאָה, rā'āh) is used in its appropriate stems, with God as the subject, for "appearing," "showing": "the Lord appeared unto . . ."; "the word which the Lord showed me." And from this vb. not only is an active substantive formed which supplied the more ancient designation of the official organ of revelation: רֹאֶה, rō'eh, "see"; but also objective substantives, מַרְאֵה, mar'āh, and מַרְאָה, mar'eh, which were used to designate the thing seen in a revelation—the "vision." By the side of these terms there were others in use, derived from a root which supplies to the Aram. its common word for "seeing," but in Heb has a somewhat more pregnant meaning, הִזָּהַר, hāzāh. Its active derivative, הִזְהַר, hāzeh, was a designation of a prophet which remained in occasional use, alternating with the more customary נְבִיא, nābhī', long after רֹאֶה, rō'eh, had become practically obsolete; and its passive derivatives hāzōn, hizzāyōn, hāzūh, mahāzeh provided the ordinary terms for the substance of the revelation or "vision." The distinction between the two sets of terms, derived respectively from rā'āh and hāzāh, while not to be unduly pressed, seems to lie in the direction that the former suggests external manifestations and the latter internal revelations. The rō'eh is he to whom Divine manifestations, the hāzeh he to whom Divine communications, have been vouchsafed; the mar'eh is an appearance, the hāzōn and its companions a vision. It may be of interest to observe that mar'āh is the term employed in Nu 12 6, while it is hāzōn which commonly occurs in the headings of the written prophecies to indicate their revelatory character. From this it may possibly be inferred that in the former passage it is the mode, in the latter the contents of the revelation that is emphasized. Perhaps a like distinction may be traced between the hāzōn of Dnl 8 15 and the mar'eh of the next verse. The ordinary vb. for "knowing," יָדָעַת, yādha', expressing in its causative stems the idea of making known, informing, is also very naturally employed, with God as its subject, in the sense of revealing, and that, in accordance with the natural sense of the word, with a tendency to pregnancy of implication, of revealing effectively, of not merely uncovering to observation, but making to know. Accordingly, it is paralleled not merely with גָּלָה, gālāh (Ps 98 2: 'The Lord hath made known his salvation; his righteousness hath he displayed in the sight of the nation'), but also with such terms as לָמַדְתָּ, lāmadh (Ps 25 4: 'Make known to me thy ways, O Lord: teach me thy paths'). This vb. yādha' forms no substantive in the sense of "revelation" (cf דָּבָר, da'ath, Nu 24 16; Ps 19 3).

The most common vehicles of the idea of "revelation" in the OT are, however, two expressions which are yet to be mentioned. These are the phrase, "word of Jeh," and of Jehovah" and rendered in the EV by "law." The former (d'bhār Yahweh, varied to d'bhār 'Ēlōhīm or d'bhār hā-'Ēlōhīm; cf n'um Yahweh, massā' Yahweh) occurs scores of times and is at once the simplest and the most colorless designation of a Divine communication. By the latter (lōr'āh), the proper meaning of which is "instruction," a strong implication of authoritativeness is conveyed; and, in this sense, it becomes what may be called the technical designation of a specifically Divine communication. The two are not infrequently brought together, as in Isa 1 10: "Hear the word of Jeh, ye rulers of Sodom; give ear unto the law [m "teaching"] of our God, ye people of Gomorrah"; or Isa 2 3 m; Mic 4 2: "For out of Zion shall go forth the law [m "instruction"], and the word of Jeh from Jerus." Both terms are used for any Divine communication of whatever extent; and both came to be employed to express the entire body of Divine revelation, conceived as a unitary whole. In this comprehensive usage, the emphasis of the one came to fall more on the graciousness, and of the other more on the authoritativeness of this body of Divine revelation; and both passed into the NT with these implications. "The word of God," or simply "the word," comes thus to mean in the NT just the gospel, "the word of the proclamation of redemption, that is, all that which God has to say to man, and causes to be said" looking to his salvation. It expresses, in a word, precisely what we technically speak of as God's redemptive revelation. "The law," on the other hand, means in this NT use, just the whole body of the authoritative instruction which God has given men. It expresses, in other words, what we commonly speak of as God's supernatural revelation. The two things, of course, are the same: God's authoritative revelation is His gracious revelation; God's redemptive revelation is His supernatural revelation. The two terms merely look at the one aggregate of revelation from two aspects, and each emphasizes its own aspect of this one aggregated revelation.

Now, this aggregated revelation lay before the men of the NT in a written form, and it was impossible to speak freely of it without consciousness of and at least occasional reference to its written form. Accordingly we hear of a Word of God that is written (Jn 15 25; 1 Cor 15 54), and the Divine Word is naturally contrasted with mere tradition, as if its written form were of its very

3. "The idea (Mk 7 10); indeed, the written Scriptures" body of revelation—with an emphasis on its written form—is designated expressly 'the prophetic word' (2 Pet 1 19). More distinctly still, "the Law" comes to be thought of as a written, not exactly, code, but body of Divine authoritative instructions. The phrase, "It is written in your law" (Jn 10 34; 15 25; Rom 3 19; 1 Cor 14 21), acquires the precise sense of, "It is set forth in your authoritative Scriptures, all the content of which is 'law,' that is, Divine instruction." Thus "the Word of God," "the Law," came to mean just the written body of revelation, what we call, and what the NT writers called, in the same high sense which we give the term, "the Scriptures." These "Scriptures" are thus identified with the revelation of God, conceived as a well-defined corpus, and two conceptions rise before us which have had a determining part to play in the history of Christianity—the conception of an authoritative Canon of Scripture, and the conception of this Canon of Scripture as just the Word of God written. The former conception was thrown into prominence in opposition to the gnostic heresies in the earliest age of the church, and gave rise to a richly varied mode of speech concerning the Scriptures, emphasizing their authority in legal language, which goes back to and rests on the Bib. usage of "Law." The latter it was left to the Reformation to do justice to in its struggle against, on the one side, the Romish depression of the Scriptures in favor of the traditions of the church, and on the other side the Enthusiasts' supercession of them in the interests of the "inner Word." When Tertullian, on the one hand, speaks of the Scriptures as an "Instrument," a legal document, his terminology has an express warrant in the Scriptures' own usage of tōrāh, "law," to designate their entire content. And when John Gerhard argues that "between the Word of God and Sacred Scripture, taken in a material sense, there is no real difference," he is only declaring plainly what is definitely implied in the NT use of "the Word of God" with the written revelation in mind. What is important to recognize is that the Scriptures themselves represent the Scriptures as not merely containing here and there the record of revelations—"words of God," tōrōth—given by God, but as themselves, in all their extent, a revelation, an authoritative body of gracious instructions from God; or, since they alone, of all the revelations which God may have given, are extant—rather as the Revelation, the only "Word of God" accessible to men, in all their parts "law," that is, authoritative instruction from God.

LITERATURE

The last book of the NT. It professes to be the record of prophetic visions given by Jesus Christ to John, while the latter was a prisoner, "for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (1 9), in PATMOS (q.v.), a small rocky island in the Aegean, about 15 miles W. of Ephesus. Its precursor in the OT is the Book of Dnl, with the symbolic visions and mystical numbers of which it stands in close affinity. The peculiar form of the book, its relation to other "apocalyptic" writings, and to the Fourth Gospel, likewise attributed to John, the interpretation of its symbols, with controverted questions of its date, of worship, unity, relations to contemporary history, etc, have made it one of the most difficult books in the NT to explain satisfactorily.

I. Title and General Character of Book.—"Revelation" answers to ἀποκάλυψις, apokálypsis, in ver 1.

The oldest form of the title would seem to be simply, "Apocalypse of John," the appended words "the Divine" (θεολόγος, theológos, i.e. "theologian") not being older than the 4th cent. (cf the title given to Gregory of Nazianzus, "Gregory the theologian"). The book belongs to the class of works commonly named "apocalyptic," as containing visions and revelations of the future, frequently in symbolical form (e.g. the Book of En, the Apocalypse of Bar, the Apocalypse of Ezr; see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE), but it is doubtful if the word here bears this technical sense. The tendency at present is to group the NT Apocalypse with these others, and attribute to it the same kind of origin as theirs, viz. in the unbridled play of religious phantasy, clothing itself in unreal visual form.

But there is a wide distinction. These other works are pseudonymous—fictitious; on the face of them products of imagination; betraying that this is their origin in their crude, confused, unifying character. The Apocalypse bears on it the name of its author—an apostle of Jesus Christ (see below); claims to rest on real visions; rings with the accent of sincerity; is orderly, serious, sublime, purposeful, in its conceptions; deals with the most solemn and momentous of themes. On the modern Nero-theory, to which most recent expositors give adherence, it is a farrago of baseless phantasies, no one of which came true. On its own claim it is a product of true prophecy (1 3; 22 18 f), and has or will have sure fulfilment. Parallels here and there are sought between it and the Book of En or the Apocalypse of Ezr. As a rule the resemblances arise from the fact that these works draw from the same store of the ideas and imagery of the OT. It is there the key is chiefly to be sought to the symbolism of John. The Apocalypse is steeped in the thoughts, the images, even the language of the OT (cf the illustrations in Lightfoot, Gal, 361, where it is remarked: "The whole book is saturated with illustrations from the OT. It speaks not the language of Paul, but of Isaiah and Ezekiel and Daniel". These remarks will receive elucidation in what follows.

II. Canonicity and Authority.—The two questions of canonicity and authorship are closely connected. Eusebius states that opinion in his day was divided on the book, and he himself wavers between placing it among the disputed books or ranking it with the acknowledged (homologoumena). "Among these," he says, "if such a view seem correct, we must place the Apocalypse of John" (HE, III, 25). That it was rightly so placed appears from a survey of the evidence. The first to refer to the book expressly is Justin Martyr (c 140 AD), who speaks of it as the work of "a certain man, whose name was John, one of the apostles of Christ" (Dial, 81). Irenaeus (c 180 AD) repeatedly and decisively declares that the Apocalypse was written by John, a disciple of the Lord (Adv. Haer., iv.20, 11; 30, 4; v.26, 1; 35, 2, etc), and comments on the number 666 (v.30, 1). In his case there can be no doubt that the apostle John is meant. Andreas of Cappadocia (5th cent.) in a Comm. on the Apocalypse states that Papias (c 130 AD) bore witness to its credibility, and cites a comment by him on Rev 12 7-9. The book is quoted in the Ep. on the martyrs of Vienne and Lyons (177 AD); had a commentary written on it by Melito of Sardis (c 170 AD), one of the churches of the Apocalypse (Euseb., HE, IV, 26); was used by Theophilus of Antioch (c 168 AD) and by Apollonius (c 210 AD; HE, V, 25)—in these cases being cited as the Apocalypse of John. It is included as John's in the Canon of Muratori (c 200 AD). The Johannine authorship (apostolic) is abundantly attested by Tertullian (c 200 AD; Adv. Mar., iii.14, 24, etc); by Hippolytus (c 240 AD), who wrote a work upon it; by Clement of Alexandria (c 200 AD); by Origen (c 230 AD), and other writers. Doubt about the authorship of the book is first heard of in the obscure sect of the Alogi (end of 2d cent.), who, with Caius, a Rom presbyter (c 205 AD), attributed it to Cerinthus. More serious was the criticism of Dionysius of Alexandria (c 250 AD), who, on internal grounds, held that the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse could not have come from the same pen (Euseb., HE, VII, 25). He granted, however, that it was the work of a holy and inspired man—another John. The result was that, while "in the Western church," as Bousset grants, "the Apocalypse was accepted unanimously from the first" (EB, I, 193), a certain doubt attached to it for a time in sections of the Gr and Syrian churches. It is not found in the Pesh, and a citation from it in Ephraim the Syrian († 373) seems not to be genuine. Cyril of Jerus (c 386 AD) omits it from his list, and it is unmentioned by the Antiochian writers (Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret). The Canon attributed to the Council of Laodicea (c 360 AD) does not name it, but it is doubtful whether this document is not of later date (cf Westcott; also Bousset, Die Offenb. Joh., 28). On the other hand, the book is acknowledged by Methodius, Pamphilus, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril Alex., Epiphanius, etc.

The testimony to the canonicity, and also to the Johannine authorship, of the Apocalypse is thus exceptionally strong. In full accordance with it is the claim of the book itself. It proclaims itself to be the work of John (1 1.4.9; 22 8), who does not, indeed, name himself an apostle, yet, in his inspired character, position of authority in the Asian churches, and selection as the medium of these revelations, can hardly be thought of as other than the well-known John of the Gospels and of consentient church tradition. The alternative view, first suggested as a possibility by Eusebius, now largely favored by modern writers, is that the John intended is the "presbyter John" of a well-known passage cited by Eusebius from Papias (HE, III, 39). Without entering into the intricate questions connected with this "presbyter John"—whether he was really a distinct person from the apostle (Zahn and others dispute it), or whether, if he was, he resided at Ephesus (see JOHN, GOSPEL or)—it is enough here to say that the reason already given, viz: the importance and place of authority of the author of the Apocalypse in the Asian churches, and the emphatic testimony above cited connecting him with the apostle, forbid the attribution of the book to a writer wholly unknown to church tradition, save for this casual reference to him in Papias. Had the assumed presbyter really been the author, he could not have dropped so completely out of the knowledge of the church, and had his place taken all but immediately by the apostle.

One cause of the hesitancy regarding the Apocalypse in early circles was dislike of its millenarianism; but the chief reason, set forth with much critical skill by Dionysius of Alexandria (Euseb., HE, VII, 25), was the undoubted contrast in character and style between this work and the Fourth Gospel, likewise claiming to be from the pen of John. Two works so diverse in character—the Gospel calm, spiritual, mystical, abounding in characteristic expressions as "life," "light," "love," etc, written in idiomatic Gr; the Apocalypse abrupt, mysterious, material in its imagery, inexact and barbarous in its idioms, sometimes employing solecisms—could not, it was argued, proceed from the same author. Not much, beyond amplification of detail, has been added to the force of the arguments of Dionysius. There were three possibilities—either first, admitting the Johannine authorship of the Apocalypse, to assail the genuineness of the Gospel—this was the method of the school of Baur; or, second, accepting the Gospel, to seek a different author for the Apocalypse—John the presbyter, or another: thus not a few reverent scholars (Bleek, Neander, etc); or, third, with most moderns, to deny the Johannine authorship of both Gospel and Apocalypse, with a leaning to the "presbyter" as the author of the latter (Harnack, Bousset, Moffatt, etc). Singularly there has been of late in the advanced school itself a movement in the direction of recognizing that this difficulty of style is less formidable than it looks—that, in fact, beneath the surface difference, there is a strong body of resemblances pointing to a close relationship of Gospel and Apocalypse. This had long been argued by the older writers (Godet, Luthardt, Alford, Salmon, etc), but it is now more freely acknowledged. As instances among many may be noted the use of the term "Logos" (19 13), the image of the "Lamb," figures like "water of life," words and phrases as "true," "he that overcometh," "keep the commandments," etc. A striking coincidence is the form of quotation of Zec 12 10 in Jn 19 37 and Rev 1 7. If the Gr in parts shows a certain abruptness and roughness, it is plainly evidenced by the use of the correct constructions in other passages that this is not due to want of knowledge of the language. "The very rules which he breaks in one place he observes in others" (Salmon). There are, besides, subtle affinities in the Gr usage of the two books, and some of the very irregularities complained of are found in the Gospel (for ample details consult Bousset, op.

cit.; Godet, Comm. on Jn, I, 267-70, ET; Alford, Gr Test., IV, 224-28; Salmon, Intro to the NT, 233-43, 2d ed; the last-named writer says: "I have produced instances enough to establish decisively that there is the closest possible affinity between the Revelation and the other Johannine books". Great differences in character and style no doubt still remain. Some, to leave room for these, favor an early date for the Apocalypse (68-69 BC; on this below); the trend of opinion, however, now seems, as will be shown, to be moving back to the traditional date in the reign of Domitian, in which case the Gospel will be the earlier, and the Apocalypse the later work. This, likewise, seems to yield the better explanation. The tremendous experiences of Patmos, bursting through all ordinary and calmer states of consciousness, must have produced startling changes in thought and style of composition. The "rapt seer" will not speak and write like the self-collected, calmly brooding evangelist.

III. Date and Unity of the Book.—Eusebius, in summing up the tradition of the Church on this subject, assigns John's exile to Patmos, and consequently the composition of the Apocalypse, to the latter part of the reign of Domitian (81-96 AD).

1. Traditional Date under Domitian Irenaeus (c 180 AD) says of the book, "For it was seen, not a long time ago, but almost in our own generation, at the end of the reign of Domitian" (Adv. Haer., v.30, 3). This testimony is confirmed by Clement of Alexandria (who speaks of "the tyrant"), Origen, and later writers. Epiphanius (4th cent.), indeed, puts (Haer., li.12, 233) the exile to Patmos in the reign of Claudius (41-54 AD); but as, in the same sentence, he speaks of the apostle as 90 years of age, it is plain there is a strange blunder in the name of the emperor. The former date answers to the conditions of the book (decadence of the churches; widespread and severe persecution), and to the predilection of Domitian for this mode of banishment (cf Tacitus Hist. i.2; Euseb., HE, III, 18).

This, accordingly, may be regarded as the traditional date of composition of the Apocalypse, though good writers, influenced partly by the desire to give time for the later composition of the Gospel, have signified a preference for an earlier date (e.g. Westcott, Salmon). It is by no means to be assumed, however, that the Apocalypse is the earlier production. The tendency of recent criticism, it will be seen immediately, is to revert to the traditional date (Bousset, etc.); but for a decade or two, through the prevalence of what may be called the "Nero-theory" of the book, the pendulum swung strongly in favor of its composition shortly after the death of Nero, and before the destruction of Jerus (held to be shown to be still standing by ch 11), i.e. about 68-69 AD. This date was even held to be demonstrated beyond all question. Reuss may be taken as an example. According to him (Christian Theology of the Apostolic Age, I, 369 ff, ET), apart from the ridiculous preconceptions of theologians, the Apocalypse is "the most simple, most transparent book that prophet ever penned." "There is no other apostolical writing the chronology of which can be more exactly fixed." "It was written before the destruction of Jerus, under the emperor Galba—that is to say, in the second half of the year 68 of our era." He proceeds to discuss "the irrefutable proofs" of this. The proof, in brief, is found in the beast (not introduced till ch 13) with seven heads, one of which has been mortally wounded, but is for the present healed (13 3). "This is the Rom empire, with its first 7 emperors, one of whom is killed, but is to live again as Antichrist" (cf 17 10 f). The key to the whole book is said to be given in 13 18, where the number of the beast is declared to be 666. Applying the method of numerical values (the Jewish Gematria), this number is found to correspond with the name "Nero Caesar" in Heb letters (omitting the yōdh). Nero then is the 5th head that is to live again; an interpretation confirmed by rumors prevalent at that time that Nero was not really dead, but only hidden, and was soon to return to claim his throne. As if to make assurance doubly sure, it is found that by dropping the final n in "Neron," the number becomes 616—a number which Irenaeus in his comments on the subject (v.30.1) tells us was actually found in some ancient copies. The meaning therefore is thought to be clear. Writing under the emperor Galba, the 6th emperor (reckoning from Augustus), the author anticipates, after a short reign of a 7th emperor (17 10), the return of the Antichrist Nero—an 8th, but of the 7, with whom is to come the end. Jerus is to be miraculously preserved (ch 11), but Rome is to perish. This is to happen within the space of 3½ years. "The final catastrophe, which was to destroy the city and empire, was to take place in three years and a half. . . . The writer knows . . . that Rome will in three years and a half perish finally, never to rise again." It does not matter for this theory that not one of the things predicted happened—that every anticipation was falsified. Nero did not return; Jerus was not saved; Rome did not perish; 3½ years did not see the end of all things. Yet the Christian church, though the failure of every one of these predictions had been decisively demonstrated, received the book as of Divine inspiration, apparently without the least idea that such things had been intended (see the form of the theory in Renan, with a keen criticism in Salmon's Intro to the NT, lect xiv).

What is to be said with reference to this "Nero-theory" belongs to subsequent sections: meanwhile it is to be observed that, while portions of the theory are retained, significant changes have since taken place in the view entertained of the book as a whole, and with this of the date to be assigned to it. First, after 1882, came a flood of disintegrating hypotheses, based on the idea that the Apocalypse was not a unity, but was either a working up of one or more Jewish apocalypses by Christian hands, or at least incorporated fragments of such apocalypses (Völter, Vischer, Weizsäcker, Weyland, Pfeiderer, Spitta, etc). Harnack lent his influential support to the form of this theory advocated by Vischer, and for a time the idea had vogue. Very soon, however, it fell into discredit through its own excesses (for details on the different views, see Bousset, or Moffat's Intro to the NT, 489 ff), and through increasing appreciation of the internal evidence for the unity of the book. Gunkel, in his Schöpfung und Chaos (1895), started another line of criticism in his derivation of the conceptions of the book, not from Jewish apocalypse, but from Bab mythology. He assailed with sharp criticism the "contemporary history" school of interpretation (the "Nero-theory" above), and declared its "bankruptcy." The number of the beast, with him, found its solution, not in Nero, but in the Heb name for the primeval chaos. This theory, too, has failed in general acceptance, though elements in it are adopted by most recent interpreters. The modified view most in favor now is that the Apocalypse is, indeed, the work of a Christian writer of the end of the 1st cent., but embodies certain sections borrowed from Jewish apocalypse (as 7 1-8, the 144,000; ch 11, measuring of the temple and the two witnesses; esp. ch 12, the woman and red dragon—

this, in turn, reminiscent of Bab mythology). These supposed Jewish sections are, however, without real support in anything that is known, and the symbolism admits as easily of a Christian interpretation as any other part of the book. We are left, therefore, as before, with the book as a unity, and the tide of opinion flows back to the age of Domitian as the time of its origin. Moffatt (connecting it mistakenly, as it seems to us, with Domitian's emphasis on the imperial cultus, but giving also other reasons) goes so far as to say that "any earlier date for the book is hardly possible" (Expos Gr Test., V, 317). The list of authorities for the Domitianic date may be seen in Moffatt, Intro, 508.

IV. Plan and Analysis of the Book.—The method of the book may thus be indicated. After an introduction, and letters to the

1. General Scope seven churches (chs 1-3), the properly prophetic part of the book commences with a vision of heaven (chs 4, 5), following upon which are two series of visions of the future, parallel, it would appear, to each other—the first, the 7 seals, and under the 7th seal, the 7 trumpets (chs 6-11, with interludes in ch 7 and again in 10; 11 1-12); the second, the woman and her child (ch 12), the 2 beasts (ch 13), and, after new interludes (ch 14), the bowls and 7 last plagues (chs 15, 16). The expansion of the last judgments is given in separate pictures (the scarlet woman, doom of Babylon, Har-Magedon, chs 17-19); then come the closing scenes of the millennium, the last apostasy, resurrection and judgment (ch 20), followed by the new heavens and new earth, with the descending new Jerus (chs 21, 22). The theme of the book is the conflict of Christ and His church with anti-Christian powers (the devil, the beast, the false prophet, 16 13), and the ultimate and decisive defeat of the latter; its keynote is in the words, "Come, Lord Jesus" (22 20; cf 1 7); but it is to be noticed, as characteristic of the book, that while this "coming" is represented as, in a manner, ever near, the end, as the crisis approaches, is again always postponed by a fresh development of events. Thus, under the 6th seal, the end seems reached (6 12-17), but a pause ensues (ch 7), and on the opening of the seventh seal, a new series begins with the trumpets (8 2 ff). Similarly, at the sounding of the 6th trumpet, the end seems at hand (9 12-21), but a new pause is introduced before the last sounding takes place (11 15 ff). Then is announced the final victory, but as yet only in summary. A new series of visions begins, opening into large perspectives, till, after fresh interludes, and the pouring out of 6 of the bowls of judgment, Har-Magedon itself is reached; but though, at the outpouring of the 7th bowl, it is proclaimed, "It is done" (16 17), the end is again held over till these final judgments are shown in detail. At length, surely, in ch 19, with the appearance of the white horseman—"The Word of God" (ver 13)—and the decisive overthrow of all his adversaries (vs 18-21), the climax is touched; but just then, to our surprise, intervenes the announcement of the binding of Satan for 1,000 years, and the reign of Jesus and His saints upon the earth (the interpretation is not here discussed), followed by a fresh apostasy, and the general resurrection and judgment (ch 20). Precise time-measures evidently fail in dealing with a book so constructed: the 3½ years of the Nero-interpreters sink into insignificance in its crowded panorama of events. The symbolic numbers that chiefly rule in the book are "seven," the number of completeness (7 spirits, seals, trumpets, bowls, heads of beasts); "ten," the number of worldly power (10 horns); "four," the earthly number (4 living creatures, corners of earth, winds, etc); 3½ years—42 months—"time, and times, and half a time" (12 14)=1,260 days, the period, borrowed from Dnl (7 25; 12 7), of anti-Christian ascendancy.

V. Principles of Interpretation.—As a book intended for the consolation of the church under present and future afflictions, the

1. General Interpretation Apocalypse is meant by its author to be understood (1 3; 22 7). He must have been aware, however, that, while its general scope might be apprehended, mystery must rest upon many of its symbols, till the time of their actual fulfilment. The book relates to "things which must shortly come to pass" (1 1)—in their beginnings at least—and the divers interpretations since put upon its prophecies are the best evidence of the difficulties attaching to them. Schemes of interpretation have generally been grouped into praeterist (the prophecies being regarded as already fulfilled), futurist (the fulfilment being thrown wholly into the future), and the historical (the fulfilment being looked for in the continuous history of the church from John's day till the end). (1) The older praeterist view may be taken as represented by Moses Stuart, who finds the fulfilment of chs 6-11 in the destruction of Jerus (Comm., 520 ff), and of chs 13-19 in the reign of Nero (690 ff). Even he, however, has to interpret the chapter on the last things of the future. (2) The futurist view connects the whole with the times of the second advent and the millennium. The beast is an individual who shall then appear as Antichrist. This rejects the plain intimations of the book that the events predicted lay, in their beginnings at least, immediately in the future of the writer. (3) The historical view connects the various symbols with definite occurrences—as the invasions which overthrew the Rom Empire (the first 4 trumpets), the Saracens (first woe-trumpet), the Turks (second woe-trumpet), the papacy (the beast, ch 13; the scarlet woman, ch 17), etc. A day-year principle is applied to the periods (1,260 days—1,260 years). As representatives of this view may be mentioned Mede, Vitringa, Sir Isaac Newton, Elliott in Horae Apocalypticae, A. Barnes.

These older schemes are largely put out of date by the newer theories, already alluded to, in which the Apocalypse is explained out of contemporary conditions, the legend of the returning Nero, Jewish apocalypse, and Bab mythology. These are praeterist theories also, but differ from the older in that in them all real prophecy is denied. A mainstay of such theories is the declaration of the book that the events announced are close at hand (1 1.3; 22 20). When, however, it is remembered that, on any view, this nearness includes a period of 1,000 years before the judgment and descent of the new Jerus, it will be felt that it will not do to give these expressions too restricted a temporal significance. The horizon is wider. The coming of Christ is ever near—ever approaching—yet it is not to be tied down to "times and seasons"; it is more of the nature of a process and has anticipatory exemplifications in many crises and providential events forecasting the end (see above). The "coming," e.g. to the church at Ephesus (2 5), or to the church at Pergamos (2 16)—contingent events—can hardly exhaust the full meaning of the Parousia. The Nero-theory demands a date at latest under Galba, but that date we have seen to be generally abandoned. Those who place it under Vespasian (omitting three short reigns) sacrifice the advantage of dating the book before the destruction of Jerus, and have to fall back on a supposititious Jewish fragment in ch 11, which those who incorporated it must have known had never been fulfilled. The attempt to give a "contemporary historical" interpretation to the symbols of the successive churches, as Gunkel has acutely shown, completely breaks down in practice, while Gunkel's own attempt at a Bab explanation will be judged by most to be overstrained. "Dragon" in the OT and elsewhere may be associated with widespread oriental ideas, but the definite symbolism of the Apocalypse in ch 12 has no provable connection with Bab myths. There is the widest disagreement in the theories of "composite" origin (from Jewish apocalypse). What seems simple and demonstrable to one has no plausibility to others. A form of "Nero Caesar," indeed, yields the mystic 666, but so do 1,000 other names—almost any name, with proper manipulation (cf Salmon, lect xiv). Lastly, the returning-Nero legend yields no satisfactory explanation of the language in 13 3.12.14; 17 11. The theory is that these words allude to the belief that Nero would return from the dead and become Antichrist (see above). Tacitus attests that there were vague rumors that Nero had not really died (Hist. ii.8), and later a pretender arose in Parthia taking advantage of this feeling (Suet. Nero. 57). The idea of Nero returning from the dead is categorically stated in Sib Or 5 363-70 (c 120 AD); cf Sib Or 4 119-22 (c 80 AD). Augustine mentions the idea (City of God, xx.19, 3), but without connection with the Apocalypse. By Domitian's time, however, it was perfectly certain that Nero had not returned, and there was no longer, on this interpretation, any appositeness in speaking of a "head" the "deathstroke" of which was healed (13 3), which became the "eighth head" of 17 11—if, indeed, the apostle could be conceived capable of being influenced by such vagaries. The events predicted lay, evidently, still in the future. It may be added that neither Irenaeus, nor any early interpreter, seems to have heard of the connection of 666 with "Nero." Irenaeus himself suggests the solution Lateinos (cf Salmon, ut supra).

It is not proposed here to attempt the lines of a positive interpretation. If it is once recognized that the Apocalypse is a book of true prophecy, that its symbols stand for something real, and that its perspective is not to be limited to a brief period like 3½ years, the way is opened, not, indeed, for a reading into it of a series of precise historical occurrences, but still for doing justice to the truth which lies at the basis of the historical interpretation, viz. that there are here pre-figured the great crises in the age-long conflict of Christ and His church with pagan and anti-Christian adversaries. Events and tendencies may be grouped, or under different forms may relate to the same subject (e.g. the 144,000 sealed on earth—a spiritual Israel—in 7 1-8, and the triumphant multitude in heaven, vs 9-17); successions of events may be foreshortened; different pictures may overlap; but, shining through the symbols, great truths and facts which have historical realization appear. There is no need for supposing that, in a drama of this range, the "heads" of the beast of chs 13 and 17 (behind whom is the Dragon-enemy, Satan, of ch 12) stand, in contrariety to the analogy of Dnl, for seven individual emperors, and that "the image of the beast," which has life given to it and "speaks" (13 14.15), is the statue of the emperor; or that such tremendous events as the fall of the Rom Empire, or the rise of the papacy—with which, however, must be combined all ecclesiastical anti-Christianism—or the false prophecy of later intellectual anti-Christianism have no place in the symbolism of the book. Sane, reverent thought will suggest many lines of correspondence with the course of God's providence, which may serve to illuminate its dark places. More than this need not be said here.

VI. Theology of the Book.—On this it is hardly necessary to dwell, for expositors are now well agreed that in its great doctrines of God, Christ, man, sin, redemption, the teaching of the Apocalypse does not vary essentially from the great types in the Epp. The assonances with John's mode of thinking have already been alluded to. It is granted by all writers that the Christology is as high as anywhere in the NT. "It ought unhesitatingly to be acknowledged," says Reuss, "that Christ is placed in the Apocalypse on a par with God" (op. cit., I, 397–98; cf Rev 1 4.17; 2 3; 5 12–14; 22 13, etc.). Not less striking are the correspondences with the teaching of Paul and of Peter on redemption through the blood of Christ (1 5; 5 9; 7 14; 14 4, etc.). The perverted conception of the school of Baur that we have in the book an anti-Pauline manifesto (thus also Pfeiderer; cf Hibbert Lectures, 178), is now practically dead (see the criticism of it by Reuss, op. cit., I, 308–12). The point in which its eschatology differs from that of the rest of the NT is in its introduction of the millennium before the final resurrection and judgment. This enlarges, but does not necessarily contradict, the earlier stage of thought.

REVELLINGS, rev'el-ingz (κάμος, kōmos): The word is found both in AV and in RV in Wisd 14 23 (RV "revels," orgiastic heathen worship is in point); 2 Macc 6 4; Gal 5 21; 1 Pet 4 3. In Gal 5 21 it is classed with fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, etc., as one of the works of the flesh. In 1 Pet 4 3 it is spoken of the Gentiles and is classed with drunkenness and carousings and such like. In Rom 13 13 RV has "revelling" instead of AV "rioting," and in 2 Pet 2 13, "revel" replaces "riot." Similarly in Am 6 7, "revelry" replaces "banquet." The obvious meaning of the word is excessive and boisterous intemperance and lustful indulgence.

G. H. GERBERDING

REVENGE, rê-venj', REVENGER, rê-venj'êr: The same Heb and Gr words are used to express the idea of "to avenge" and "to revenge" (נָקַם, nākam, or derivative; ἐκδικέω, ekdikéō, or derivative). In Eng. these words are synonymous in that they are both used to express the infliction of punishment upon the wrongdoer, but "to take revenge" may also imply a spiteful, wrong or malignant spirit. In the latter case RV preserves "revenge" (cf Jer 20 10; Ezk 25 15; 25 17 is an anthropomorphism), but, wherever it is synonymous with "avenge," this word is used (cf Nu 31 2.3; Ps 79 10; Nah 1 2; Jth 13 20; Rom 13 4; 2 Cor 7 11; 10 6 RV; AV has "revenge" in all these cases). In Dt 32 42, AV "revenge" is a wrong tr. Read with RV "from the head of the leaders of the enemy" or RVm "the hairy head of the enemy." Cf AVENGE, AVENGER; BLOOD; GOEL.

A. L. BRESLICH

REVENUE, rev'ê-nū: (1) אֲצִיטוֹת, 'app'thōm, "revenue or income" (Ezr 4 13 AV); (2) תְּבוּאוֹת, t'bhū'āh, "increase," "revenue" (Prov 8 19; 15 6; Isa 23 3; Jer 12 13); πρὸσοδος, prósodos, "income" (2 Macc 3 3; 4 8 [RV "fund"]; 9 16).

REVERENCE, rev'êr-ens: In the OT, "reverence" occurs as the tr of two Heb words, yārē' and shāhāh. The root idea of the former is "fear." It is used to express the attitude toward God Himself, as in Ps 89 7 AV; or toward His sanctuary, as in Lev 19 30; 26 2. So the group of ideas there would be "fear," "awe," "reverence." The root idea of the second is "falling down," as prostration of the body. It is used to express the bearing toward another who is considered superior, as in 2 S 9 6 AV; 1 K 1 31 AV; Est 3 2.5. The group of ideas here, therefore, is "honor," "obedience," "reverence."

In the NT "reverence" occurs as the tr of three Gr words, aidōs, phobēomai, and entrepomai. In the first, the idea is "modesty" (He 12 28; cf 1 Tim 2 9). In the second, "fear" (Eph 5 33 AV), though here it is used to set forth the attitude of proper subjection on the part of a wife toward her husband (cf 1 Pet 3 2.5). In the third, the idea is that of the "self-valuation of inferiority," and so sets forth an attitude toward another of doing him honor (Mt 21 37; Mk 12 6; Lk 20 13; He 12 9).

In the Apoc entrepomai occurs in Wisd 2 10; Sir 4 22. In addition, proskunēō, "make obeisance," occurs in Jth 10 23; 14 7; thaumázō, "wonder," Sir 7 29, and aischūnomai, "be ashamed," Bar 4 15.

Reverend occurs in the OT in Ps 111 9, of the name of God (yārē'), and in the Apoc in 2 Macc 15 12, "a man reverend [aidēmōn, "modest"] in bearing," and in the NT RV has "reverent in demeanor" (hieroprepēs) in Tit 2 3 and "reverend" in Phil 4 8 m (semnós).

REVILE, rê-vil'. See CRIMES; PUNISHMENTS.

REVIVE, rê-viv', REVIVING, rê-viv'ing: "To revive" is the tr of הָיָה, hāyāh, "to live," "cause to live," used of restoration to life (Gen 45 27; Jgs 15 19, etc.); of rebuilding (Neh 4 2); of restoration to well-being (Ps 85 6 [RV "quicken"]; 138 7; Isa 57 15; Hos 6 2; 14 7); of Jeh's gracious work for His people (Hab 3 2, "revive thy work in the midst of the years," etc.); "reviving" is the tr of מִיְהוּיָהּ, miyhyāh, "preservation," or "means of life" (Ezr 9 8.9). "Revive" occurs in the NT as the tr of ἀναζάω, anazāō, "to live again" (Rom 7 9, and 14 9, AV "Christ both died, and rose, and revived," RV [omitting "and rose"] "Christ died and lived again," zāō).

In 1 Macc 13 7 RV we have "And the spirit of the people revived," ἀναζωοπυρέω, anazōpurēō, "to stir or kindle up as a fire," the same word as in 2 Tim 1 6, RV "stir up the gift of God, which is in thee," m "Gr 'stir into flame.'"

In view of the frequent modern use of "revive" and "revival," it is worthy of notice that it is to Timothy himself the exhortation is addressed. We too often merely pray for "revivals," forgetting that it is for us to "stir into flame" the gift of the Spirit, which we have already received of God. It is ours from Him, but we let it lie dormant, as a slumbering ember merely.

REWARD, rê-wôrd': In modern Eng. (except when influenced by the Bib. forms) a "reward" is something given in recognition of a good act. In EV, however, "reward" is used quite generally for anything given, and the term covers the recompense of evil (Ps 91 8), wages (1 Tim 5 18 AV), bribes (Mic 7 3), and gifts (Jer 40 5 AV). RV has specialized the meaning in a number of cases (Ps 94 2; Ezk 16 34; Jer 40 5, etc), but not systematically.

REZEPH, rē'zef (רֶזֶף), receph; B, 'Ράφεις, Rhāphēis, 'Ράφεις, Rhāphes, A, τὴν 'Ράφειθ, tēn Rhāphēth [2 K 19 12], BQ^{ms} 'Ράφειθ, NQ^e 'Ράφεις, 1. Forms of A, 'Ράφεις [Isa 37 12]; Vulg Roseph the Name [2 K 19 12], Reseph [Isa 37 12]): One of the places referred to by Senacherib's Rabshakeh when delivering that king's message to Hezekiah demanding the surrender of Jerus. The names which precede are Gozan and Haran; and "the children of Eden that were in Telassar" follows.

It is now represented by Ruṣafa, E. of Tīpsah and N.E. of Hamath, and is regarded as the 'Ρησάφα, (Rhēsápha) of Ptolemy (v.15).

2. Now Called Ruṣafa It was for some time under Assyrian dominion, and appears in a geographical list (2 R 53, 37a) preceded by Arrapha (Arrapachitis) and Ḥalahū (Halah), and followed by Tamnunū, under the form of Raṣṣapa (elsewhere Raṣapi).

From the Eponym Canons, Ninip-kibsi-uṣur was it appears, prefect in 839 BC, Uraš-ereš from 804 to 775 BC, Šin-šallimanni in 747, and Bēl-ēmuranni in 737 BC. Judging

3. Its Assyrian Governors from their names, all these were Assyrians, but a seemingly native governor, Abda'u (or Abda'i), possibly later than the foregoing, is mentioned in a list of officials (K. 9921). Yaḥuṭu was šanū (deputy-governor?) of Rezeph in 673 BC. Its mention in the Assyrian geographical lists implies that Rezeph was an important trade-center in OT times.

REZIA, rē-zī'a. See RIZIA.

REZIN, rē'zin (רֶזַן), rēzīn; 'Ραασζών, Rhaas-sōn): The last of the kings of Syria who reigned in Damascus (2 K 15 37; 15 6-10; Isa 7 1; 8 4-7). Along with Pekah, the son of Remaliah, who reigned 20 years over Israel in Samaria, he joined in the Syro-Ephraimitic war against Ahaz, the king of Judah. Together they laid siege to Jerus, but were unsuccessful in the effort to take it (2 K 16 5; Isa 7 1). It was to calm the fears, and to restore the fainting spirits of the men of Judah, that Isaiah was commissioned by the Lord to assure them that the schemes of "these two tails of smoking firebrands" (Isa 7 4) were destined to miscarry. It was then, too, that the sign was given of the virgin who should conceive, and bear a son, and should call his name Immanuel. Rezin had to content himself on this campaign to the S. with the capture of Elath from the men of Judah and its restoration to the men of Edom, from whom it had been taken and made a seaport by Solomon (2 K 16 6, where it is agreed that "Syria" and "Syrians" should be read "Edom" and "Edomites," which in the Heb script are easy to be mistaken for one another, and are in fact often mistaken). Rezin, however, had a more formidable enemy to encounter on his return to Damascus. Ahaz, like kings of Judah before and after him, placed his reliance more on the arm of flesh than on the true King of his people, and appealed to Tiglath-pileser III, of Assyria, for help. Ahaz deliberately sacrificed the independence of his country in the terms of his offer of submission to the Assyrian: "I am thy servant and thy son" (2 K 16 7). Tiglath-pileser had already carried his arms to the W. and ravaged the northern border of Israel; and now he crossed the Euphrates and hastened to Damascus, slaying Rezin and carrying his people captive to Kir (2 K 16 9). In the copious Annals of Tiglath-pileser, Rezin figures with the designation Raṣunu(ni), but the tablet recording his death, found and read by Sir Henry Rawlinson, has been irrecoverably lost, and only the fact of its existence and loss remains (Schrader, COT, I, 252, 257). With the death of Rezin the kingdom of Damascus and Syria came to an end.

Rezin, Sons of: Mentioned among the Nethinim (Ezr 2 48), who returned to Jerus with Zerubbabel from captivity (cf Neh 7 50).

REZON, rē'zon (רֶזֶן), rēzōn; 'Ράζων, Rhāzōn): Son of Eliadah, and a subject of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (1 K 11 23). The name appears to be given as רֶזֶן, hezōn; 'Αζείν, Hazēin (1 K 15 18; see HEZION), where he is the father of Tabrimmon, whose son Ben-hadad I is known through his league with Asa, king of Judah. When David conquered Zobah, Rezon renounced his allegiance to Hadadezer and became powerful as an independent chief, capturing Damascus and setting up as king. Along with Hadad, the noted Edomite patriot, he became a thorn in the side of Solomon, the one making himself obnoxious in the S., the other in the N., of the kingdom of Israel, both being animated with a bitter hatred of the common foe. It is said of Rezon that he "reigned over Syria" (1 K 11 25), and if the surmise adopted by many scholars is correct that he is the same as Hezion (1 K 15 18), then he was really the founder of the dynasty of Syrian kings so well known in the history of this period of Israel; and the line would run: Rezon, Tabrimmon, Ben-hadad I, and Ben-hadad II.

RHEGIUM, rē'ji-um: This city (Ῥήγιον, Rhēgion [Acts 28 13], the modern Reggio di Calabria) was a town situated on the east side of the Sicilian Straits, about 6 miles S. of a point opposite Messana (Messina). Originally a colony of Chalcidian Greeks, the place enjoyed great prosperity in the 5th cent. BC, but was captured and destroyed by Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, in 387 BC, when all the surviving inhabitants were sold into slavery (Diodorus xiv.106-8, 111, 112). The city never entirely recovered from this blow, although it was partially restored by the younger Dionysius. On the occasion of the invasion of Italy by Pyrrhus, the people of Rhegium had recourse to an alliance with Rome (280 BC) and received 4,000 Campanian troops within their walls, who turned out to be very unruly guests. For, in imitation of a similar band of mercenaries across the strait in Messana, they massacred the male inhabitants and reduced the women to slavery (Polybius i.7; Orosius iv.3). They were not punished by the Romans until 270 BC, when the town was restored to those of its former inhabitants who still survived. The people of Rhegium were faithful to their alliance with Rome during the Second Punic War (Livy xxiii.30; xxiv.1; xxvi.12; xxix.6). At the time of the Social War they were incorporated with the Rom state, Rhegium becoming a municipality (Cicero Verr. v.60; Pro Archia, 3).

The ship in which Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli encountered unfavorable winds after leaving Syracuse, and reached Rhegium by means of tacking. It waited at Rhegium a day for a south wind which bore it to Puteoli (Acts 28 13), about 180 miles distant, where it probably arrived in about 26 hours.

RHESA, rē'sa (Ῥησά, Rhēsá): A son of Zerubbabel in the genealogy of Jesus according to St. Luke (Lk 3 27).

RHINOCEROS, rī-nos'ēr-os: This word is found in AVm to Isa 34 7 ("rhinoceros") for רִינֹסֵרֹס, rī'ēmīm, AV "unicorns," RV "wild-oxen." The word is quite inappropriate to the passage, which refers to the land of Edom. The one-horned rhinoceros, Rhinoceros unicornis, is confined to India. Other rhinoceroses are found in India and in equatorial Africa, but it is hardly to be presumed that these animals were meant by the Heb writers. See UNICORN.

RHODA, rō'da ('Ρόδη, Rhōdē, "rose"): A maid in the house of Mary the mother of John Mark. She came to answer when Peter knocked at Mary's door after his miraculous release from prison. On recognizing his voice, she so forgot herself with joy that she neglected to open the door, but ran in to tell the others the glad news. They would not believe her, thinking she was mad; and when she persisted in her statement they said it must be his angel. The Jewish belief was that each man had a guardian angel assigned to him. Peter continued knocking, and was ultimately admitted (Acts 12 1f).

RHODES, rōdz ('Ρόδος, Rhōdos): An island (and city) in the Aegean Sea, W. of Caria, rough and rocky in parts, but well watered and productive, though at present not extensively cultivated. Almost one-third of the island is now covered with trees in spite of earlier deforestation. The highest mountains attain an altitude of nearly 4,000 ft. The older names were Ophiusa, Asteria, Trinacria, Corymbia. The capital in antiquity was Rhodes, at the northeastern extremity, a strongly fortified city provided with a double harbor. Near the entrance of the harbor stood one of the seven wonders of the ancient world—a colossal bronze statue dedicated to Helios. This colossus, made by Chares about 290 BC, at a cost of 300 talents ($300,000), towered to the height of 104 ft.

In the popular mind—both before and after Shakespeare represented Caesar as bestriding the world like a colossus—this gigantic figure is conceived as an image of a human being of monstrous size with legs spread wide apart, at the entrance of the inner harbor, so huge that the largest ship with sails spread could move in under it; but the account on which this conception is based seems to have no foundation.

The statue was destroyed in 223 BC by an earthquake. It was restored by the Romans. In 672 AD the Saracens sold the ruins to a Jew. The quantity of metal was so great that it would fill the cars of a modern freight train (900 camel loads).

The most ancient cities of Rhodes were Ialysus, Ochyroma, and Lindus. The oldest inhabitants were immigrants from Crete. Later came the Carians. But no real advance in civilization was made before the immigration of the Dorians under Tlepolemus, one of the Heraclidae, and (after the Trojan war) Aethaemanes. Lindus, Ialysus and Camirus formed with Cos, Cnidus and Halicarnassus the so-called Dorian Hexapolis (Six Cities), the center of which was the temple of the Triopian Apollo on the coast of Caria. Rhodes now founded many colonies—in Spain (Rhode), in Italy (Parthenope, Salapia, Sirus, Sybaris), in Sicily (Gela), in Asia Minor (Soli), in Cilicia (Gagae), and in Lycia (Corydalla). The island attained no political greatness until the three chief cities formed a confederation and founded the new capital (Rhodes) in 408 BC. In the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, Rhodes sided with the Athenians, but, after 19 years of loyalty to Athens, went over to the Spartans (412 BC). In 394, when Conon appeared with his fleet before the city, the island fell into the hands of the Athenians again. A garrison was stationed at Rhodes by Alexander the Great. After his death this garrison was driven out by the Rhodians. It is at this time that the really great period of the island's history begins. The inhabitants bravely defended their capital against Demetrius Poliorcetes in 304 BC—the same Demetrius who two years before had won a naval victory and had coins stamped with a "Victory" that is the counterpart of the "Winged Victory"

tory" which commands the unbounded admiration of the modern world—and extended their dominion over a strip of the Carian coast, as well as over several of the neighboring islands, and for the first time in the history of the world established an international maritime and commercial law. The arts and sciences now began to flourish in the fair island in the southeastern Aegean. Aeschines, the famous orator of Athens, fled to Rhodes after his defeat by Demosthenes, and founded a school of oratory, which was attended by many Romans. Rhodes became the faithful ally of Rome after the defeat of Antiochus in 189 BC. As a reward for her loyalty she received Caria. In 168, however, only a small portion of this territory remained under Rhodian sway (Peraea, or the Chersonesus). In 42 BC the island was devastated by Cassius. Later it was made a part of the Rom province of Asia (44 AD). Strabo says that he knows no city so splendid in harbor, walls and streets. When the Rom power declined, Rhodes fell into the hands of Caliph Moawijah, but later was taken by the Greeks, from whom at a later date the Genoese wrested the island. In 1249 John Cantacuzenus attempted to recover Rhodes, but in vain. Finally, however, success crowned the efforts of the Greeks under Theodoros Protosebastos. In 1310 the Knights of St. John, who had been driven from Pal, made Rhodes their home. After the subjugation of the island by Sultan Soliman in 1522 the Knights of St. John removed to Malta, and Rhodes has remained uninterruptedly a possession of the Sublime Porte down to the recent war between Turkey and the Balkan allies, forming, with the other islands, the province of the "Islands of the White Sea" (Archipelago). It has a Christian governor whose seat, though mostly at Rhodes, is sometimes at Chios. The population of the island has greatly diminished by emigration. In 1890 the total number of inhabitants was 30,000 (20,000 Greeks, 7,000 Mohammedans, 1,500 Jews). The chief products of Rhodes are wheat, oil, wine, figs and tropical fruits. A very important industry is the exportation of sponges. The purity of the air and the mildness of the climate make Rhodes a most delightful place to live in during the fall, winter and early spring. The city, built in the shape of an amphitheater, has a magnificent view toward the sea. It contains several churches made out of old mosques. The once famous harbor is now almost filled with sand. The inhabitants number nearly 12,000 (all Turks and Jews). Rhodes is mentioned in the NT only as a point where Paul touched on his voyage southward from the Hellespont to Caesarea (Acts 21 1); but in 1 Macc 15 23 we are informed that it was one of the states to which the Romans sent letters in behalf of the Jews.

RHODOCUS, rod'ō-kus (Ῥόδοκος, Rhódokos): A Jewish traitor who disclosed the plans of Judas to Antiochus (Eupator) (2 Macc 13 21) 162 BC. Of his fate nothing more is known.

RIB (עֵלֶּה, çēlā', עֵלְיָה, çal'āh; Aram. עֵלְעֵ, 'āla'): The Heb words designate the "side," "flank," thence the "ribs." They are found thus tr^d only in connection with the creation of Eve: "He [Jeh] took one of his [Adam's] ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof: and the rib, which Jeh God had taken from the man, made he [m "buildd he into"] a woman" (Gen 2 21,22). The Aram. word is only found in Dnl 7 5.

Twice the RV uses the word "rib" in a figurative sense of two beams or rafters built into the ark of the covenant and the altar of incense, on which the golden rings were fastened, which served to carry ark and altar by means of staves (Ex 30 4; 37 27).

A curious mistr has crept into AV, which here follows Jewish commentators or etymologists, in four passages in 2 S (2 23; 3 27; 4 6; 20 10), where the "fifth rib" is mentioned as the place of the body under which spears or swords are thrust, so as to cause lethal wounds. The Heb word hōmesh, which indeed means "fifth," is here a noun, derived from a root meaning "to be staunch," "stalwart," "stout," "fleshy," "obese" (cf עֲרֹשֶׁת, hāmush, "armed," "equipped soldier"; Arab. الخميس, el khamīs [el ḥamīs], "the army," which, however, Arab. lexicographers explain as meaning "fivefold," viz. vanguard, right and left wing, center and rear guard). The word is to be tr^d "abdomen," "belly." RV renders correctly "into the body." H. L. E. LUERING

RIBAI, rī'bā-i, rī'bī (רִיבִי, ribhay; LXX Ῥεῖβά, Rheibá, with variants): A Benjamite, the father of Ἰτταῖ (q.v.), one of David's "mighty men" (2 S 23 29 || 1 Ch 11 31).

RIBBAND, rib'and, rib'an (פְּתִיל, pāthil [Nu 15 38 AV]). See COLOR, (2); CORD, (4).

RIBLAH, rib'la (רִבְלָה, ribhlāh; Ῥεβλαθά, Rheblathá, with variants):

(1) Riblah in the land of Hamath first appears in history in 608 BC. Here Pharaoh-necho, after defeating Josiah at Megiddo and destroying Kadytis or Kadesh on the Orontes, fixed his headquarters, and while in camp he deposed Jehoahaz and cast him into chains, fixed the tribute of Judah, and appointed Jehoiakim king (2 K 23 31-35). In 588 BC Nebuchadnezzar, at war with Egypt and the Syrian states, also established his headquarters at Riblah, and from it he directed the subjugation of Jerus. When it fell, Zedekiah was carried prisoner to Riblah, and there, after his sons and his nobles had been slain in his presence, his eyes were put out, and he was taken as a prisoner to Babylon (2 K 25 6,20; Jer 39 5-7; 52 8-11). Riblah then disappears from history, but the site exists today in the village of Ribleh, 35 miles N.E. of Baalbek, and the situation is the finest that could have been chosen by the Egypt or Bab kings for their headquarters in Syria. An army camped there had abundance of water in the control of the copious springs that go to form the Orontes. The Egyptians coming from the S. had behind them the command of the rich corn and forage lands of Coele-Syria, while the Bab army from the N. was equally fortunate in the rich plains extending to Hamath and the Euphrates. Lebanon, close by, with its forests, its hunting grounds and its snows, ministered to the needs and luxuries of the leaders. Riblah commanded the great trade and war route between Egypt and Mesopotamia, and, besides, it was at the dividing-point of many minor routes. It was in a position to attack with facility Phoenicia, Damascus or Pal, or to defend itself against attack from those places, while a few miles to the S. the mountains on each side close in forming a pass where a mighty host might easily be resisted by a few. In every way Riblah was the strategical point between North and South Syria. Riblah should probably be read for Diblah in Ezk 6 14, while in Nu 34 11 it does not really appear. See (2).

(2) A place named as on the ideal eastern boundary of Israel in Nu 34 11, but omitted in Ezk 47 15-18. The MT reads "Hariblah"; but the LXX probably preserves the true vocalization, according to which we should tr "to Harbel." It is said to be to the east of 'Ain, and that, as the designation of a district, can only mean Merj 'Ayun, so that we should seek it in the neighborhood of Hermon, one of whose spurs Furrer found to be named Jebel 'Arbel. W. M. CHRISTIE

RICHES, rich'ez, rich'iz: Used to render the following Heb and Gr words: (1) Ōsher, which should, perhaps, be considered the most general word, as it is the most often used (Gen 31 16; Eccl 4 8; Jer 9 23). It looks at riches simply as riches, without regard to any particular feature. Alongside this would go the Gr πλοῦτος, ploutos (Mt 13 22; Eph 2 7). (2) Hōsen (Prov 27 24; Jer 20 5), n'khāšim and r'khūsh (Gen 36 7; Dnl 11 13,24 AV) look at riches as things accumulated, collected, amassed. (3) Hōn looks upon riches as earnings, the fruit of toil (Ps 119 14; Prov 8 18; Ezk 27 27). (4) Hāmōn regards riches in the aspect of being much, this coming from the original idea of noise, through the idea of a multitude as making the noise, the idea of many, or much, being in multitude (Ps 37 16 AV). (5) Hayil regards riches as power (Ps 62 10; Isa 8 4; 10 14). (6) Yithrāh means "running over," and so presents riches as abundance (Jer 48 36 AV). Along with this may be placed shūā', which has the idea of breadth, and so of abundance (Job 36 19 AV). (7) Kinyān regards riches as a creation, something made (Ps 104 24; cf m); (8) χρῆμα (chrēma) looks at riches as useful (Mk 10 23 f ||). Like the NT, the Apoc uses only ploutos and chrēma.

Material riches are regarded by the Scriptures as neither good nor bad in themselves, but only according as they are properly or improperly used. They are transitory (Prov 27 24); they are not to be trusted in (Mk 10 23; Lk 18 24; 1 Tim 6 17); they are not to be gloried in (Jer 9 23); the heart is not to be set on them (Ps 62 10); but they are made by God (Ps 104 24), and come from God (1 Ch 29 12); and they are the crown of the wise (Prov 14 24). Material riches are used to body forth for us the most precious and glorious realities of the spiritual realm. See, e.g., Rom 9 23; 11 33; Eph 2 7; Phil 4 19; Col 1 27. Cf MAMMON; TREASURE; WEALTH. E. J. FORRESTER

RID, rid, RIDDANCE, rid'ans: "Rid" originally meant "rescue" (AV Gen 37 22; Ex 6 6; Ps 82 4; 144 7.11), whence the meaning "remove" or "clean out" (Lev 26 6 AV, with "riddance" in Lev 23 22; Zeph 1 18). The word occurs in ARV and in ERV in Ex 6 6.

RIDDLE, rid'l (רִידָה, hīdhāh; ἀίνιγμα, ainigma). See GAMES.

RIE, rī (AV, Ex 9 32; Isa 28 25). See SPELT.

RIGHT, rīt (יָשָׁר, yāshār, מִשְׁפָּט, mishpāt; δίκαιος, dikaïos, εὐθύς, euthús): Many Heb words are tr'd "right," with different shades of meaning. Of these the two noted are the most important: yāshār, with the sense of being straight, direct, as "right in the sight" of Jch (Ex 15 26; Dt 12 25, etc.), in one's own eyes (Jgs 17 6), "right words" (Job 6 25 AV, yōsher), "right paths" (Prov 4 11 AV); and mishpāt, "judgment," "cause," etc. a forensic term, as "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen 18 25). In Job 34 17, RV has "justice" (ver 6, "right"), etc. The words ḥedhek, ḥēdhākāh, ordinarily tr'd "righteousness," are in a few cases rendered "right" (2 S 19 28; Neh 2 20; Ps 9 4; 17 1; 119 75; Ezk 18 5, etc.). In the NT the chief word is dikaïos, primarily "even," "equal" (Mt 20 4; Lk 12 57, etc); more generally the word is rendered "just" and "righteous." Euthus, used by LXX for yāshār (1 S 12 23; Hos 14 9), occurs a few times (Acts 8 21; 13 10; 2 Pet 2 15); so orthōs, "straight," "upright" (Lk 10 28). "Right-hand" or "side" represents Heb yāmīn and kindred forms (Gen 48 13.14.17; Ex 15 6, etc); the Gr, in this sense, is deξιός (Mt 6 3; 20 21, etc).

RV, among other changes, has "right" for AV "judgment" in Job 27 2; 34 5, and for "right" in AV substitutes "straight" in Ezr 8 21, "skilful" in Eccl 4 4, m "successful," etc. In Jn 1 12 RV reads, "the right to become children of God" for AV "the power" (exousia); in Mt 20 7.15 "right" is omitted, with the larger part of the verse. In 2 Tim 2 15 "rightly dividing" (orthotomōō) is changed to "handling aright," with m "holding a straight course in the word of truth. Or, rightly dividing the word of truth." W. L. WALKER

RIGHTEOUSNESS, rī'chus-nes (צְדִיקָה, ḥaddik, adj., "righteous," or occasionally "just"; צְדִיק, ḥedhek, noun, occasionally="righteousness," occasionally="justice"; δίκαιος, dikaïos, adj., δικαιοσύνη, dikaïosúnē, noun, from δίκη, dikē, whose first meaning seems to have been "custom"; the general use suggested conformity to a standard: righteousness; "the state of him who is such as he ought to be" [Thayer]):

LITERATURE

In Christian thought the idea of righteousness contains both a permanent and a changing element.

The fixed element is the will to do right; the changing factor is the conception of what may be right at different times and under different circumstances. Throughout the entire course of Christian revelation we discern the emphasis on the first factor. To be sure, in the days of later Pharisaism righteousness came to be so much a matter of externals that the inner intent was often lost sight of altogether (Mt 23 23); but, on the whole and in the main, Christian thought in all ages has recognized as the central element in righteousness the intention to be and do right. This common spirit binds together the first worshippers of God and the latest. Present-day conceptions of what is right differ by vast distances from the conceptions of the earlier Hebrews, but the intentions of the first worshippers are as discernible as are those of the doers of righteousness in the present day.

There seems but little reason to doubt that the content of the idea of righteousness was determined in the first instance by the customs of social groups. There are some, of course, who would have us believe that and Righteousness what we experience as inner moral sanction is nothing but the fear of consequences which come through disobeying the will of the social group, or the feeling of pleasure which results as we know we have acted in accordance with the social demands. At least some thinkers would have us believe that this is all there was in moral feeling in the beginning. If a social group was to survive it must lay upon its individual members the heaviest exactions. Back of the performance of religious rites was the fear of the group that the god of the group would be displeased if certain honors were not rendered to him. Merely to escape the penalties of an angry deity the group demanded ceremonial religious observances. From the basis of fear thus wrought into the individuals of the group have come all our loftier movements toward righteousness.

It is not necessary to deny the measure of truth there may be in this account. To point out its inadequacy, however, a better statement would be that from the beginning the social group utilized the native moral feeling of the individual for the defence of the group. The moral feeling, by which we mean a sense of the difference between right and wrong, would seem to be a part of the native furnishing of the mind. It is very likely that in the beginning this moral feeling was directed toward the performance of the rites which the group looked upon as important (see ALMS).

As we read the earlier parts of the OT we are struck by the fact that much of the early Heb morality was of this group kind. The righteous man was the man who performed the rites which had been handed down from the beginning (Dt 6 25). The meaning of some of these rites is lost in obscurity, but from a very early period the characteristic of Heb righteousness is that it moves in the direction of what we should call today the enlargement of humanity. There seemed to be at work, not merely the forces which make for the preservation of the group, not merely the desire to please the God of the Hebrews for the sake of the material favors which He might render the Hebrews, but the factors which make for the betterment of humanity as such. As we examine the laws of the Hebrews, even at so late a time as the completion of the formal Codes, we are indeed struck by traces of primitive survivals (Nu 5 11-31). There are some injunctions whose purpose we cannot well understand. But, on the other hand, the vast mass of the legislation had to do with really human considerations. There are rules concerning sanitation (Lev 13), both as it touches the life of the group and of the individual; laws whose mastery begets emphasis, not merely upon external consequences, but upon the inner result in the life of the individual (Ps 51 3); and prohibitions which would indicate that morality, at least in its plainer decencies, had come to be valued on its own account. If we were to seek for some clue to the development of the moral life of the Hebrews we might well find it in this emphasis upon the growing demands of human life as such. A suggestive writer has pointed out that the apparently meaningless commandment, "Thou shalt not boil a kid in its mother's milk" (Ex 23 19), has back of it a real human purpose, that there are some things which in themselves are revolting apart from any external consequences (see also Lev 18).

An index of the growth of the moral life of the people is to be found in the changing conception

3. Changing Conception of Character of God

We need not enter into the question as to just where on the moral plane the idea of the God of the Hebrews started, but from the very beginning we see clearly that the Hebrews believed in their God as one passionately devoted to the right (Gen 18 25). It may well be that at the start the God of the Hebrews was largely a God of War, but it is to be noticed that His enmity was against the peoples who had little regard for the larger human considerations. It has often been pointed out that one proof of the inspiration of the Scriptures is to be found in their moral superiority to the Scriptures of the peoples around about the Hebrews. If the Hebrews used material which was common property of Chaldaeans, Babylonians, and other peoples, they nevertheless used these materials with a moral difference. They breathed into them a moral life which forever separates them from the Scriptures of other peoples. The marvel also of Heb history is that in the midst of revoltingly immoral surroundings the Hebrews grew to such ideals of human worth. The source of these ideals is to be found in their thought of God. Of course, in moral progress there is a reciprocal effect; the thought of God affects the thought of human life and the thought of human life affects the thought of God; but the Hebrews no sooner came to a fresh moral insight than they made their moral discovery a part of the character of God. From the beginning, we repeat, the God of the Hebrews was a God directed in His moral wrath against all manner of abominations, aberrations and abnormalities. The purpose of God, according to the Hebrews, was to make a people "separated" in the sense that they were to be free from anything which would detract from a full moral life (Lev 20 22).

We can trace the more important steps in the growth of the Heb ideal. First, there was an increasingly clear discernment that certain things are to be ruled out at once as immoral. The primitive decencies upon which individual and social life depended were discerned at an early period (cf passages in Lev cited above). Along with this it must be admitted there was a slower approach to some ideals which we today consider important, the ideals of the marriage relations for example (Dt 24 1.2). Then there was a growing sense of what constitutes moral obligation in the discharge of responsibilities upon the part of men toward their fellows (Isa 5 8.23). There was increasing realization also of what God, as a moral Being, is obligated to do. The hope of salvation of nations and individuals rests at once upon the righteousness of God.

By the time of Isaiah the righteousness of God has come to include the obligations of power (Isa 63 1). God will save His people, not merely because He has promised to save them, but because He must save them (42 6). The must is moral. If the people of Israel show themselves unworthy, God must punish them; but if a remnant, even a small remnant, show themselves faithful, God must show His favor toward them. Moral worth is not conceived of as something that is to be paid for by external rewards, but if God is moral He must not treat the righteous and the unrighteous alike. This conception of what God must do as an obligated Being influences profoundly the Heb interpretation of the entire course of history (10 20.21).

Upon this ideal of moral obligation there grows later the thought of the virtue of vicarious suffering (ch 53). The sufferings of the good man and of God for those who do not in themselves deserve such sufferings (for them) are a mark of a still higher righteousness (see HOSEA, BOOK OF). The movement of the Scriptures is all the way from the thought of a God who gives battle for the right to the thought of a God who receives in Himself the heaviest shocks of that battle that others may have opportunity for moral life.

These various lines of moral development come, of course, to their crown in the NT in the life and death of Christ as set before us in the Gospels and interpreted by the apostles. Jesus stated certain moral axioms so clearly that the world never will escape their power. He said some things once and for all, and He did some things once and for all; that is to say, in His life and death He set on high the righteousness of God as at once moral obligation and self-sacrificing love (Jn 3 16) and with such effectiveness that the world has not escaped and cannot escape this righteous influence (Jn 12 32). Moreover, the course of apostolic and subsequent history has shown that Christ put a winning and compelling power into the idea of righteousness that it would otherwise have lacked (Rom 8 31.32).

The ideas at work throughout the course of Heb and Christian history are, of course, at work today.

Christianity deepens the sense of obligation to do right. It makes the moral spirit essential. Then it utilizes every force working for the increase of human happiness to set on high the meaning of righteousness. Jesus spoke of Himself as "life," and declared that He came that men might have life and have it more abundantly (Jn 10 10). The keeping of the commandments plays, of course, a large part in the unfolding of the life of the righteous Christian, but the keeping of the commandments is not to be conceived of in artificial or mechanical fashion (Lk 10 25-37). With the passage of the centuries some commandments once conceived of as essential drop into the secondary place, and other commandments take the controlling position. In Christian development increasing place is given for certain swift insights of the moral spirit. We believe that some things are righteous because they at once appeal to us as righteous. Again, some other things seem righteous because their consequences are beneficial, both for society and for the individual. Whatever makes for the largest life is in the direction of righteousness. In interpreting life, however, we must remember the essentially Christian conception that man does not live through outer consequences alone. In all thought of consequences the chief place has to be given to inner consequences. By the surrender of outward happiness and outward success a man may attain inner success. The spirit of the cross is still the path to the highest righteousness.

4. Righteousness as Inner

The distinctive note in emphasis upon righteousness in our own day is the stress laid upon social service. This does not mean that Christianity is to lose sight of the worth of the individual in himself. We have come pretty clearly to see that the individual is the only moral end in himself. Righteousness is to have as its aim the upbuilding of individual lives. The commandments of the righteous life are not for the sake of society as a thing in itself. Society is nothing apart from the individuals that compose it; but we are coming to see that individuals have larger relationships than we had once imagined and greater responsibilities than we had dreamed of. The influence of the individual touches others at more points than we had formerly realized. We have at times con-

Christianity is to lose sight of the worth of the individual in himself. We have come pretty clearly to see that the individual is the only moral end in himself. Righteousness is to have as its aim the upbuilding of individual lives. The commandments of the righteous life are not for the sake of society as a thing in itself. Society is nothing apart from the individuals that compose it; but we are coming to see that individuals have larger relationships than we had once imagined and greater responsibilities than we had dreamed of. The influence of the individual touches others at more points than we had formerly realized. We have at times condemned the system of things as being responsible for much human misery which we now see can be traced to the agency of individuals. The employer, the day-laborer, the professional man, the public servant, all these have large responsibilities for the life of those around. The unrighteous individual has a power of contaminating other individuals, and his deadliness we have just begun to understand. All this is receiving new emphasis in our present-day preaching of righteousness. While our social relations are not ends in themselves, they are mighty means for reaching individuals in large numbers. The Christian conception of redeemed humanity is not that of society as an organism existing on its own account, but that of individuals knit very closely together in their social relationships and touching one another for good in these relationships (1 Cor 12; Rev 7 9,10). If we were to try to point out the line in which the Christian doctrine of righteousness is to move more and more through the years, we should have to emphasize this element of obligation to society. This does not mean that a new gospel is to supersede the old or even place itself alongside the old. It does mean that the righteousness of God and the teaching of Christ and the cross, which are as ever the center of Christianity, are to find fresh force in the thought of the righteousness of the Christian as binding itself, not merely by commandments to do the will of God in society, but by the inner spirit to live the life of God out into society.

In all our thought of righteousness it must be borne in mind that there is nothing in Christian revelation which will tell us what

6. Expanding in Content righteousness calls for in every particular circumstance. The differences between earlier and later practical standards of conduct and the differences between differing standards in different circumstances have led to much confusion in the realm of Christian thinking. We can keep our bearing, however, by remembering the double element in righteousness which we mentioned in the beginning; on the one hand, the will to do right, and, on the other, the difficulty of determining in a particular circumstance just what the right is. The larger Christian conceptions always have an element of fluidity, or, rather, an element of expansiveness. For example, it is clearly a Christian obligation to treat all men with a spirit of good will or with a spirit of Christian love. But what does love call for in a particular case? We can only answer the question by saying that love seeks for whatever is best, both for him who receives and for him who gives. This may lead to one course of conduct in one situation and to quite a different course in another. We must, however, keep before us always the aim of the largest life for all persons whom we can reach. Christian righteousness today is even more insistent upon material things, such as sanitary arrangements, than was the Code of Moses. The obligation to use the latest knowledge for the hygienic welfare is just as binding now as then, but "the latest knowledge" is a changing term. Material progress, education, spiritual instruction, are all influences which really make for full life.

Not only is present-day righteousness social and growing; it is also concerned, to a large degree, with the thought of the world which now is. Righteousness has too often been conceived of merely as the means of preparing for the life of some future Kingdom of Heaven. Present-day emphasis has not ceased to think of the life beyond this, but the life beyond this can best be met and faced by those who have been in the full sense righteous in the life that now is. There is here no break in true Christian continuity. The seers who have understood Christianity best always have insisted that to the fullest degree the present world must be redeemed by the life-giving forces of Christianity. We still insist that all idea of earthly righteousness takes its start from heavenly righteousness, or, rather, that the righteousness of man is to be based upon his conception of the righteousness of God. Present-day thinking concerns itself largely with the idea of the Immanence of God. God is in this present world. This does not mean that there may not be other worlds, or are not other worlds, and that God is not also in those worlds; but the immediate revelation of God to us is in our present world. Our present world then must be the sphere in which the righteousness of God and of man is to be set forth. God is conscience, and God is love. The present sphere is to be used for the manifestation of His holy love. The chief channel through which that holy love is to manifest itself is the conscience and love of the Christian believer. But even these terms are not to be used in the abstract. There is an abstract conscientiousness which leads to barren living: the life gets out of touch with things that are real. There is an experience of love which exhausts itself in well-wishing. Both conscience and love are to be kept close to the earth by emphasis upon the actual realities of the world in which we live.

FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL

RIMMON, rim'on:

(1) The rock Rimmon (רִמּוֹן קָלַע רִמּוֹן, šela' rimmōn; ἡ πέτρα 'Ρεμμών, hē pétra Rhemmōn): The place of refuge of the 600 surviving Benjamites of Gibeah (Jeba') who "turned and fled toward the wilderness unto the rock of Rimmon, and abode in the rock of Rimmon four months" (Jgs 20 45,47; 21 13). Robinson's identification (RB, I, 440) has been very generally accepted. He found a conical and very prominent hill some 6 miles N.N.E. of Jeba' upon which stands a village called Rummōn. This site was known to Eusebius and Jerome (OS 146 6; 287 98), who describe it as 15 Rom miles from Jerus. Another view, which would locate the place of refuge of the Benjamites in the Mughāret el jai, a large cavern on the south of the Wādy Suweinūt, near Jeba', is strongly advocated by Rawnsley and Birch (see PEF, III, 137-48). The latter connects this again with 1 S 14 2, where Saul, accompanied by his 600, "abode in the uttermost part of Gibeah" under the pomegranate tree (Rimmon).

(2) (רִמּוֹן, rimmōn; 'Ερεμμών, Eremmōn, or 'Ρεμμώθ, Rhemmōth): A city in the Negeb, near the border of Edom, ascribed to Judah (Josh 15 32) and to Simeon (19 7; 1 Ch 4 32, AV "Remmon"). In Zec 14 10 it is mentioned as the extreme S. of Judah—"from Geba to Rimmon, S. of Jerus." In the earlier references Rimmon occurs in close association with 'Ain (a spring), and in Neh 11 29, what is apparently the same place, 'Ain Rimmon, is called En-rimmon (q.v.).

(3) (רִמּוֹן, rimmōn [Josh 19 13], רִמּוֹנָה, rimmōnāh, in some Heb MSS רִמְנָה, dimmnāh [see DIMNAH] [Josh 21 35], and רִמּוֹנִי, rimmōnō [1 Ch 6 77]): In AV we have "Remmon-methoar" in Josh 19 13, but RV translates the latter as "which stretcheth." This was a city on the border of Zebulun (Josh 19 13) allotted to the Levites (Josh 21 35, "Dimnah"; 1 Ch 6 77). The site is now the little village of Rummāneh on a low ridge S. of the western end of the marshy plain el Battāuf in Galilee; there are many rock-cut tombs and cisterns. It is about 4 miles

N. of el Mesh-hed, usually considered to be the site of Gath-hepher. See PEF, I, 363, Sh VI.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

RIMMON (רִמּוֹן, rimmōn, "pomegranate"; see RIMMON-PEREZ):

(1) A Syrian god. Naaman the Syrian leper after being cured is troubled over the fact that he will still have to bow down in the house of the Syrian god, Rimmon, when his master goes into the house to worship leaning on his hand (2 K 5 18). Elisha answers him ambiguously: "Go in peace." Judging from Naaman's position and this incident, R. must have been one of the leading gods of the Syrians worshipped in Damascus. He has been identified with Rammānu, the Assyr god of wind, rain and storm. The name appears in the Syrian personal names HADARIMMON and TABRIMMON (q.v.) and its meaning is dubious (ramānu, "to thunder" [?])

(2) A Benjamite of Beeroth, whose sons Baanah and Rechab assassinated Ish-bosheth (2 S 4 2.5.9).

NATHAN ISAACS

RIMMON-PEREZ, r-pē'rēz (רִמּוֹן פְּרִיץ, rimmōn perez; AV Rimmon-parez): A desert camp of the Israelites (Nu 33 19f), unidentified. Gesenius translates rimmōn as "pomegranate," the place deriving its name from the abundance of pomegranates. But Conder derives it from rāmam, "to be high," and translates it "cloven height." See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

RIMMON, ROCK OF. See RIMMON, (1).

RIMMONAH, rim-mō'na, RIMMONO, rim-mō'no. See RIMMON, (3).

RING (AS Hring, "ring"): The word renders (ARV) two Heb words (in AV and ERV three) and two Gr words. טַבַּעַת, tabba'ath, the principal Heb word, is from טָבַעַ, ṭābho, "sink," either because the ring is something "cast" or molded, or, more probably, since the principal use of the ring was as a seal, because it "sank" into the wax or clay that received the impression. In Ex, tabba'ath, "ring," is a detail of furniture or equipment, as the rings of the ark through which the staves were thrust (Ex 25 12, etc), rings for curtains, in the high priest's ephod (Ex 28 28; 39 21), etc. Its other use was perhaps the original, to describe the article of personal adornment worn on the finger, apparently in the OT always a signet-ring, and as such an indispensable article of masculine attire. Such a ring Pharaoh gave Joseph as a symbol of authority (Gen 41 42); and Ahasuerus gave Haman (Est 3 10); with it the royal missive was sealed (Est 3 12; 8 8 bis. 10). It was also a feminine ornament in Isaiah's list of the fashionable feminine paraphernalia, "the rings and the nose-jewels" (quite likely rings also) (Isa 3 21). Either as ornaments or for their intrinsic value, or both, rings were used as gifts for sacred purposes from both men and women: "brooches, and ear-rings, and signet-rings" (m "nose-rings") (Ex 35 22); "bracelets, rings [ARV "signet-rings"], ear-rings" (Nu 31 50 AV). חֹתָמִים, hōthām, "signet," mentioned in Gen 38 18.25; Ex 28 11.21.36; Ex 39 6.14.30; Jer 22 24; Hag 2 23, etc, was probably usually a seal ring, but in Gen 38 and elsewhere the seal may have been swung on wire, and suspended by a cord from the neck. It was not only an identification, but served as a stamp for signature. גָּלִיל, gālīl, "circle" (cf "Galilee," "Circle" of the Gentiles), rendered "ring" in Est 1 6; Cant 5 14, may rather mean "cylinder" or "rod" of metal. Earring (q.v.) in AV is from totally different words: נֶזֶם, nezem, whose etymology is unknown, עֲגִיל, 'āghīl, "round," or לַחֶשֶׁת, laḥash, "amulet"; so RV. The "rings" of the wheels in Ezk 1 18 (AV) are גָּב, gab, "curved," and mean "rims" (ARV), "felloes." Egyptians esp. wore a great profusion of rings, principally of silver or gold, engraved with scarabaei, or other devices. In the NT the ring, δακτύλιος, daktūlios, "finger-ring," is a token of means, position, standing: "put a ring on his hand" (Lk 15 22). Perhaps also it included the right to give orders in his father's name. To be χρυσοδακτύλιος, chrusodaktūlios, "golden-ringed," perhaps with more than one, indicated wealth and social rank: "a man with a gold ring" (Jas 2 2). See also EARRING; SIGNET; SEAL.

Egyptian Signet Rings and Impressions Made from Them.

PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

RINGLEADER, ring'led-ēr: In Acts 24 5 the tr of πρωτοστάτης, prōtostátēs, "one who stands first." Not an opprobrious word in the Gr.

RINGSTREAKED, ring'strēkt (AV and ERV ringstraked): Gen 30 35.39.40; 31 8 (bis).10.12 for עֲקֹד, 'āḳōdh. In the context of 30 35, etc, 'āḳōdh certainly denotes defective coloring of some sort, but the exact meaning of the word is uncertain. The tr "ringstreaked" ("marked with circular bands") comes from connecting the word with the √ 'ḳd, "to bind" (Gen 22 9), but this connection is dubious.

RINNAH, rin'a (רִנָּה, rinnāh, "praise to God"; LXX B, 'Ανά, Aná, A, 'Ρανών, Rhannōn): A Judahite, according to MT a son of Shimon (1 Ch 4 20). But LXX makes him a son of Hanan (B, Phaná, A, Anán) by reading "ben" in the next name (Ben-hanan) as "son of."

RIOT, ri'ut: Properly, "unrestrained behavior" of any sort, but in modern Eng. usually connoting mob action, although such phrases as a "riotous banquet" are still in common use. AV uses the word in the first sense, and it is retained by RV in Lk 15 13; Tit 1 6; 1 Pet 4 4 for ἀσώτως, asōtōs, ἀσωτία, asōtia, "having no hope of safety," "profligate." In Prov 23 20; 28 7 RV has preferred "gluttonous," "glutton," in Rom 13 13, "revelling," and in 2 Pet 2 13, "revel."

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

RIPHATH, ri'fath (רִיפַתַּי, rīphath): A son of Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet (Gen 10 3; 1 Ch 1 6, where MT and RV read DIPHATH (q.v.)). Jos (Ant, I, vi, 1) identifies the Ripheans with the Paphlagonians, through whose country on the Black Sea ran the river "Rhebas" (Pliny, NH, vi.4).

RISING, riz'ing (רִשָּׁעַת, s'ēth, "a tumor," "swelling" [Lev 13 2.10, etc]). See LEPROSY.

RISSAH, ris'a (רִסָּה, riṣṣāh, "dew"): A camp of the Israelites in the wilderness wanderings between Libnah and Kehelahah (Nu 33 21 f). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

RITHMAH, rith'ma (רִיתְמָה, rithmāh, "broom"): A desert camp of the Israelites (Nu 33 18.19). The name refers to the white desert broom. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

RIVER, riv'er:

(1) The usual word is נָהָר, nāhār (Aram. נְהַר, nēhar [Ezr 4 10, etc]), used of the rivers of Eden (Gen 2 10-14), often of the Euphrates (Gen 15 18, etc), of Abana and Parpar (2 K 5 12), the river of Gozan (2 K 17 6), the river Chebar (Ezk 1 1), the rivers (canals?) of Babylon (Ps 137 1), the rivers of Ethiopia (Isa 18 1; Zeph 3 10). Cf نَهْر, nahr, the common Arab. word for "river."

(2) נְיֹר, y'ōr, according to BDB from Egypt 'iotr, 'io'r, "watercourse," often of the Nile (Ex 1 22, etc). In Isa 19 6, for נְיֹרֵי מִצְרַיִם, y'ōrē mācōr, AV "brooks of defence," RV has "streams of Egypt." In Isa 19 7.8, for y'ōr, AV "brooks," and Zec 10 11, AV "river," RV has "Nile." In Job 28 10, AV "He cutteth out rivers among the rocks," RV has "channels," RVm "passages."

(3) There are nearly 100 references to נַחַל, nahal. In about half of these AV has "brook" and in about half "river." RV has more often "brook" or "valley." But RV has river in "whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers" (Lev 11 9); "the river Jabbok" (Dt 2 37; Josh 12 2); the stream issuing from the temple (Ezk 47 5-12). RV has "brook of Egypt," i.e. el-Arish (Nu 34 5; Josh 15 47; 1 K 8 65; 2 K 24 7; 2 Ch 7 8; Am 6 14, "of the Arabah"); "brook [AV "river"] of Kanah" (Josh 16 8); "valley [AV "river"] of the Arnon" (Dt 2 24). EV has "valley": of Gerar (Gen 26 17), of Zered (Nu 21 12), but "brook Zered" (Dt 2 13), of Eschol (Nu 32 9), of Sorek (Jgs 16 4), of Shitim (Joel 3 18). EV has "brook": Besor (1 S 30 10), Kidron (2 S 15 23), Gaash (2 S 23 30), Cherith (1 K 17 3); also the fem. נַחְלָה, nahlāh, "brook [AV "river"] of Egypt" (Ezk 47 19; 48 28). The torrent-valley (wādī) is often meant.

(4) פֶּלֶג, peleg, with fem. פֶּלְגָה, pelgāh, AV "river," is in RV trd "stream," except EV "river of God" (Ps 65 9); "streams of water" (Ps 1 3; Prov 5 16; Isa 32 2; Lam 3 48); "streams of honey" (Job 20 17); "streams of oil" (Job 29 6).

(5) אֵפֶיק, āphik, AV "river," except EV "water brooks" (Ps 42 1), is in RV "watercourses" (Ezk 6 3; 31 12; 32 6; 34 13; 35 8; 36 4.6), "water-brooks" (Cant 5 12; Joel 1 20).

(6) רִיבָל, yūbhal, EV "river" (Jer 17 8). אֲבָל, ūbhāl, and אֲרָבָל, ārbāl, EV "river" (Dnl 8 2.3.6).

(7) ποταμός, potamós: of the Jordan (Mk 1 5); Euphrates (Rev 9 14); "rivers of living water" (Jn 7 38); "river of water of life" (Rev 22 1). So always in Gr for "river" in RV Apoc (1 Esd 4 23, etc). See BROOK; STREAM; VALLEY.

RIZIA, riz'i-a (רִיצְיָא, riçyā): An Asherite (1 Ch 7 39).

RIZPAH, riz'pā (רִצְפָה, riçpāh, "hot stone"; Jos, Ραισφά, Rhaisphá): In 2 S 3 7 the subject of a coarse slander. 2 S 21 contains the pathetic story of Rizpah's faithful watch over the bodies of her dead sons Mephibosheth and Armoni (vs 10.11).

Did this story suggest Tennyson's "Rizpah"? A three years' famine had made David anxious, and in seeking a reason for the affliction he concluded that it lay in Saul's unavenged conduct to the Gibeonites (ver 2). To appease Jeh he gave up to the Gibeonites the two sons of Saul, Mephibosheth and Armoni, as well as Saul's 5 grandsons (whether by Michal or Merab; see MERAB). These seven were hanged at Gibeah. Rizpah watched 5 months over their exposed bodies, but meanwhile the famine did not abate. Word was brought to David of Rizpah's act (vs 10.11), and it is possible that her action suggested to David his next step in expiation. At any rate, he remembered the uncared-for bones of Jonathan and Saul lying in ignominy at Jabesh-gilead, whither they had been carried by stealth after the Philis had kept them hung in the streets of Beth-shan for some time. The bones were recovered and apparently mingled with the bones Rizpah had guarded, and they were together buried in the family grave at Zelah. We are told that then "God was entreated for the land" (ver 14).

ROBBER, rob'er, ROBBERY, rob'er-i: "Robber" represents no particular Heb word in the OT, but in the Apoc and the NT is always a tr of ληστής, lēstēs (see THIEF). In AV Job 5 5; 18 9, "robber" stands for the doubtful word צַמְמִים, çammīm, RV "hungry" in 5 5 and "snare" in 18 9. The meaning is uncertain, and perhaps çmē'im, "thirsty," should be read in both places. Ps 62 10, "Become not vain in robbery," means "put not your trust in riches dishonestly gained." RV's changes of AV in Prov 21 7; Dnl 11 14; Nah 3 1 are obvious. In Phil 2 6 AV reads "thought it not robbery to be equal with God." ERV has "a prize," while ERVm and ARV read "a thing to be grasped," ARV rewording "counted not the being on an equality with God a thing to be grasped." The Gr here is ἀρπαγμός, harpagmós, a word derived from harpázō, "to ravish away," "carry off," "plunder" (cf "harpy"). Properly speaking, the termination -mos should give the derived noun an active sense, "the act of plundering," whence AV's "robbery." The verse would then mean "who thought that being on an equality with God did not consist in grasping," and this tr gives good sense in the context and has some excellent scholarly support. But a passive significance is frequently found despite a -mos termination, giving to harpagmos the sense of "thing grasped," as in RV. Usually Eng. commentators take "grasped" as meaning "clung to"—"did not think equality with God should be clung to tenaciously"—but "to cling to" seems unknown as a tr of harpazō. Hence render "a thing to be grasped at"—"did not seek equality with God by selfish methods but by humbling himself." It is to be noticed, naturally, that St. Paul is thinking of "equality with God" simply in the sense of "receiving explicit adoration from men" (vs 10.11), and that the metaphysical relation of the Son to the Father is not at all in point. ROBBERS OF TEMPLES (ιερόσυλοι, hierósuloi, "guilty of sacrilege"): A term used by the town clerk of Ephesus (Acts 19 37, AV "robbers of churches"). As the temple of Diana had a great treasure-chamber, the offence might not be unknown among them; cf Rom 2 22.

In 2 Macc 4 42 AV the epithet "church-robber" (RV "author of the sacrilege") is applied to LYSIMACHUS (q.v.).

ROCK, rok ([1] סֶלַע, šela'; [2] צִיָּר, šūr; [3]

הַלְלָמִישׁ, hallāmīsh, "flint"; cf Arab. حَلَنْبُوس, khalanbūs, "flint"; [4] כְּפִיָּם, kēphīm

1. Names [Job 30 6; Jer 4 29]; cf Κηφᾶς, Kēphās, "Cephas" = Πέτρος, Pétros, "Peter" [Jn 1 42 AV and RVm]; [5] πέτρα, pétrā; šūr and šela' are the words most often found, and there is no well-defined distinction between them. They are frequently coupled together in the parallelism which is characteristic of the Heb writers: e.g.

"Be thou to me a strong rock [šūr],
A house of defence to save me.
For thou art my rock [šela'] and my fortress" (Ps 31 2,3).

"He clave rocks [šūr] in the wilderness,
And gave them drink abundantly as out of the depths.
He brought streams also out of the rock [šela'],
And caused waters to run down like rivers" (Ps 78 15,16).

It is plain here that the two words are used for the sake of variety, without any clear difference of meaning. Even hallāmīsh (tr^d "flint") is used in the same way with šūr in Ps 114 8:

"Who turned the rock [šūr] into a pool of water,
The flint [hallāmīsh] into a fountain of waters."

(1) Some of the most striking and beautiful imagery of the Bible is based upon the rocks. They are a symbol of God: "Jeh is my rock, and my fortress" (2 S 22 2; Ps 18 2; 71 3); "God, the rock of my salvation" (2 S 22 47; cf Ps 62 2,7; 89 26); "my God the rock of my refuge" (Ps 94 22); "the rock of thy strength" (Isa 17 10); "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I" (Ps 61 2); repeatedly in the song of Moses (Dt 32 3,4,18,30,31; cf 2 S 22 32). Paul applies the rock smitten in the wilderness (Ex 17 6; Nu 20 11) to Christ as the source of living water for spiritual refreshment (1 Cor 10 4).

2. Figura- and my fortress" (2 S 22 2; Ps 18 2; 71 3); "God, the rock of my salvation" (2 S 22 47; cf Ps 62 2,7; 89 26); "my God the rock of my refuge" (Ps 94 22); "the rock of thy strength" (Isa 17 10); "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I" (Ps 61 2); repeatedly in the song of Moses (Dt 32 3,4,18,30,31; cf 2 S 22 32). Paul applies the rock smitten in the wilderness (Ex 17 6; Nu 20 11) to Christ as the source of living water for spiritual refreshment (1 Cor 10 4).

(2) The rocks are a refuge, both figuratively and literally (Jer 48 28; Cant 2 14); "The rocks are a refuge for the conies" (Ps 104 18). Many a traveler in Pal has felt the refreshment of "the shade of a great rock in a weary land" (Isa 32 2). A very different idea is expressed in Isa 8 14, "And he shall be for a sanctuary; but for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence" (cf Rom 9 33; 1 Pet 2 8).

(3) The rock is a symbol of hardness (Jer 5 3; cf Isa 50 7). Therefore the breaking of the rock exemplifies the power of God (Jer 23 29; cf 1 K 19 11). The rock is also a symbol of that which endures, "Oh that they . . . were graven in the rock for ever!" (Job 19 23,24). A rock was an appropriate place for offering a sacrifice (Jgs 6 20; 13 19). The central feature of the Mosque of 'Umar in Jerus is Kubbat-ūš-Sakhrat, the "dome of the rock." The rock or sakhirat under the dome is thought to be the site of Solomon's altar of burnt offering, and further is thought to be the site of the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite which David purchased to build an altar to Jeh.

(1) The principal rock of Pal and Syria is limestone of which there are many varieties, differing in color, texture, hardness and degrees of impurity, some of the limestone having considerable admixtures of clay or sand. Some of the harder kinds are very dense and break with a conchoidal fracture similar to the fracture of flint. In

3. Kinds of Rock rocks which have for ages been exposed to atmospheric agencies, erosion has produced striking and highly picturesque forms. Nodules and layers of flint are of frequent occurrence in the limestone.

(2) Limestone is the only rock of Western Pal, with the exception of some local outpourings of basaltic rock and with the further exception of a light-brown, porous, partly calcareous sandstone, which is found at intervals along the coast. This last is a superficial deposit of Quaternary or recent age, and is of aeolian origin. That is, it consists of dune sands which have solidified under the influence of atmospheric agencies. This is very exceptional, nearly all stratified rocks having originated as beds of sand or mud in the bottom of the sea.

(3) In Sinai, Edom, Moab, Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon is found the Nubian sandstone, a silicious sandstone which, at least in the N., is of middle or lower Cretaceous age. In the S., the lower strata of this formation seem to be paleozoic. Most of it is not sufficiently coherent to make good building stone, though some of its strata are very firm and are even used for millstones. In some places it is so incoherent or friable that it is easily dug with the pick, the grains falling apart and forming sand that can be used in mortar. In color the Nubian sandstone is on the whole dark reddish brown, but locally it shows great variation, from white through yellow and red to black. In places it also has tints of blue. The celebrated rock tombs and temples of Petra are carved in this stone.

(4) Extensive areas of the northern part of Eastern Pal are covered with igneous rock. In the Jaulān S.E. of Mt. Hermon, this has been for ages exposed to the atmosphere and has formed superficially a rich dark soil. Further S.E. is the Leja' (Arab. "refuge"), a wild tract covered with a deposit of lava which is geologically recent, and which, while probably earlier than man, is still but little affected by the atmosphere. It is with difficulty traversed and frequently furnishes an asylum to outlaws. See CRAIG; FLINT; GEOLOGY; LIME.

ROCK-BADGER, r.-baj'ér: This term is found in RVm for "coney," שֹׁפָן, shāphān (Lev 11 5; cf Dt 14 7; Ps 104 18; Prov 30 26). It is a tr of klip das, the name given by the Boers to the Cape hyrax or coney. See CONEY.

ROD (מַקְלֵל, makkēl, מַטֵּה, matteh, שֵׁבֶט, shēbhet; ῥάβδος, rhābdos): Little distinction can be drawn between the Heb words used for "rod" and "staff." Makkēl is the word used in Gen 30 37 ff for the twigs of poplar put by Jacob before his sheep, and in Jer 1 11 of the "rod of an almond-tree." Matteh is used of a rod in the hand, as the "rods" of Moses and of Aaron (Ex 4 2 ff; 7 9 ff, etc). Shēbhet is used, but sometimes also matteh, of the rod used for correction (Ex 21 20; 2 S 7 14; Prov 10 13; 13 24; Isa 10 5, etc). In Ps 23 4 ("Thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me"), however, shēbhet is the shepherd's rod, figurative of Divine guidance and care. In Ezk 21 10,13, the word stands for the royal scepter. In the NT "rod" is used of a rod of correction (1 Cor 4 21), Aaron's rod (He 9 4), a ruler's rod "of iron" (severity, as in Rev 2 27; 12 5; 19 15), a measuring rod (Rev 11 1). See also ARMOR, ARMS.

RODANIM, rod'a-nim: The reading of MT in 1 Ch 17 for the DODANIM (q.v.) of Gen 10 4, corresponding to the Ῥόδιοι, Rhōdioi of LXX in both passages. The Rodanim are generally identified as inhabitants of the island of RHODES (q.v.), well known to the ancient Phoenicians (Homer's Iliad).

ROE, rō, ROEBUCK, rō'buk: AV has "roe" and "roebuck" for צביר, ṣḅhīr, צבירה, ṣḅhīyāh. RV usually substitutes "gazelle" in the text (Dt 12 15, etc) or m (Prov 6 5, etc), but retains "roe" in 2 S 2 18; 1 Ch 12 8; Cant 3 5; 7 3. So RV has "gazelle" for AV "roe" in Sir 27 20 (dorkās). RV has Gazelle (Antilope dorcas).

"roe-buck" for יהמיר, yahmūr (Dt 14 5; 1 K 4 23), where AV has "fallow deer." In the opinion of the writer, אַיָּל, 'ayyāl, EV "hart," should be tr^d "roe-buck," yahmūr "fallow deer," and ṣḅhī "gazelle." See DEER; GAZELLE. ALFRED ELY DAY

ROGELIM, rō'gē-lim, rō-gē'lim (רֹגְלִים, rōghē'lim; Ρωγελίμ, Rhōgelleim): The place whence came Barzillai the Gileadite to succor David in his flight from Absalom (2 S 17 27; 19 31). It probably lay near the path followed by David, but it is not identified.

ROHGAH, rō'ga (K'thīb רוּגָה, rōhāghāh, K'rē רוּגָה, rohgāh): A name in the genealogy of Asher (1 Ch 7 34).

ROIMUS, rō'i-mus (Ῥόειμος, Rhōeimos, Α, Ῥομῆλιος, Rhomēlios): One of the leaders with Zerubbabel in the return (1 Esd 5 8) = "Rehum" in Ezr 2 2, of which it is the Gr form = "Nehum" in Neh 7 7.

ROLL, rōl (SCROLL): The usual form of book in Bib. times. It had been in use in Egypt for perhaps 2,000 years at the time when, according to the Pent, the earliest Bib. books were written in this form. The Bab tablet seems to have been the prevailing form in Pal up to about 1350 BC, but by 1100 BC, at least, the roll had been in established use for some time as far N. as Byblos. Two Heb words, gillāyōn, mēghillāh, one Aram., ṣḅphar, and one Gr word, biblion, are so tr^d in AV. Ṣḅphar (Ezr 6 1, RV "archives," m "books"), with the corresponding Heb form ṣephēr, is the generic word for any whole work large or small, but as a book form (Isa 34 4) it may mean "roll," and, according to Blau (pp. 37, 45, etc), it never does mean anything else. Both the other words seem to be connected with gālal, "roll," which is the technical term for opening or closing a book. The mēghillāth ṣephēr (Jer 36 2) means the unwritten roll, or the roll considered in its material form as contrasted with the work. Mēghillāh, which is found in Ezr 6 2 (EV "roll"), Jer (often), Ezk (often) and Zec, is a somewhat late word, and came to mean a small roll (but with a complete work) as distinguished from a book, corresponding thus to the modern distinction of pamphlet and book or document and book. The word gillāyōn is tr^d in RV as "tablet," and is universally regarded as meaning (Isa 8 1) some smooth surface, corresponding to the same word in Isa 3 23 which is rendered "hand-mirror." But "cylinder-seal" would possibly fit the sense in both cases; this being hung round the neck as an ornament in one case and inscribed with a personal name in the other.

Egyptian Roll and Case.

Biblion is regarded by the Bible translators as equivalent to mēghillāh in the sense of small roll. It is in fact 4 t in the LXX of Jer 36 used as the tr for mēghillāh, but very much oftener it is the tr for ṣephēr, for which in fact it is the correct technical equivalent (Birt, Buchrolle, 21). Indeed the "small book" (Thayer, Lex., 101) is hardly consistent with the ideas of the heavens as a scroll, of the Lamb's Book of Life, or of the vast quantity of books of Jn 21 25, although in Lk 4 17 it may perhaps correspond closely with mēghillāh in the sense of a complete roll and work, which is at the same time a whole part of a larger work. Its use in Rev 6 14 is reminiscent of Isa 34 4 ("scroll"), and is conclusive for the roll form. It is indeed always technically a roll and never codex or tablet.

It is not likely that Isaiah and St. John (here and in his Gospel, 21 25) refer directly to the Bab idea that the heavens are a series of written tablets or to the rabbinic saying that "if all the oceans were ink, all reeds pens, the heavens and earth sheets to write upon, and all men writers, still it would not suffice for writing out the teachings of my Masters" (Blau, op. cit., 34). Nevertheless, the "whole Cosmos" does suggest "the heavens and earth" as sheets to write on, and under all there does perhaps lurk a conception of the broad expanse of heaven as a roll for writing upon.

LITERATURE

I. Outline of Roman Empire.—The founding of the Rom empire was the grandest political achievement ever accomplished. The conquests of Alexander the Great, Charlemagne and Napoleon seem small compared with the durable structure reared by Julius and his successor, Augustus. In one sense Julius Caesar—the most wonderful man that Rome or any other country produced—was the founder of the empire, and Augustus the founder of the principate. But the Rom empire was the culmination of a long process of political, constitutional, and social growth which gives a lasting interest to Rom history. The Rom empire was the only possible solution of a 700 years' struggle, and Rom history is the story of the conflict of class with class, patrician against plebeian, populus against plebs, the antagonism of oligarchy and democracy, plutocracy against neglected masses. It is the account of the triumphant march of democracy and popular government against an exclusive governing caste. Against heavy odds the plebeians asserted their rights till they secured at least a measure of social, political and legal equality with their superiors (see ROME, I, 2-4). But in the long conflict both parties degenerated until neither militant democracy nor despotic oligarchy could hold the balance with justice. Democracy had won in the uphill fight, but lost itself and was obliged to accept a common master with aristocracy. It was of no small importance for Christianity that the Rom empire—practically synonymous with the orbis terrarum—had been converging both from internal and external causes toward a one-man government, the political counterpart of a universal religion with one God and Saviour.

(1) Julius Caesar.—For a couple of generations political leaders had foreseen the coming of supreme power and had tried to grasp it. But it was Julius Caesar who best succeeded in exploiting democracy for his own aggrandizement. He proved the potent factor of the first triumvirate (60 BC); his consulship (59) was truly kingly. In 49 BC he crossed the Rubicon and declared war upon his country, but in the same year was appointed Dictator and thus made his enemies the enemies of his country. He vanquished the Pompeians—senatorial and republican—at Pharsalia in 48 BC, Thapsus in 46 BC, and Munda in 45 BC. Between 46 and the Ides of March 44 no emperor before Diocletian was more imperial. He was recognized officially as "demigod"; temples were dedicated to his "clemency." He encouraged the people to abdicate to him their privileges of self-government and right of election, became chief (princeps) of the senate and high priest (pontifex maximus), so that he could manipulate even the will of the gods to his own purposes. His plans were equally great and beneficent. He saw the necessity of blending the heterogeneous populations into one people and extending Rom citizenship. His outlook was larger and more favorable to the coming of Christianity than that of his successor, Augustus. The latter learned from the fate of Caesar that he had advanced too rapidly along the imperial path. It taught Augustus caution.

(2) Augustus.—Octavian (Augustus) proved the potent factor of the second triumvirate. The field of Actium on September 2, 31 BC, decided the fate of the old Rom republic. The commonwealth sank in exhaustion after the protracted civil and internecine strife. It was a case of the survival of the fittest. It was a great crisis in human history, and a great man was at hand for the occasion. Octavian realized that supreme power was the only possible solution. On his return to Rome he began to do over again that Caesar had done—gather into his own hands the reins of government. He succeeded with more caution and shrewdness, and became the founder of the Rom empire, which formally began on January 16, 27 BC, and was signaled by the bestowal of the title Augustus (q.v.). Under republican forms he ruled as emperor, controlling legislation, administration and the armies. His policy was on the whole adhered to by the Julio-Claudian line, the last of which was Nero (d. 68 AD).

(3) Flavian Dynasty.—In 68 AD a new "secret of empire" was discovered, viz. that the principate was not hereditary in one line and that emperors could be nominated by the armies. After the bloody civil wars of 68, "the year of the four emperors," Vespasian founded the Id Dynasty, and dynastic succession was for the present again adopted. With the Flavians begins a new epoch in Rom history of pronounced importance for Christianity. The exclusive Rom ideas are on the wane. Vespasian was of plebeian and Sabine rank and thus non-Rom, the first of many non-Rom emperors. His ideas were provincial rather than Rom, and favorable to the amalgamation of classes, and the leveling process now steadily setting in. Though he accepted the Augustan "diarchy," he began to curtail the powers of the senate. His son Titus died young (79-81). Domitian's reign marks a new epoch in Imperialism: his autocratic spirit stands half-way between the Augustan principate and the absolute monarchy of Diocletian. Domitian, the last of the "twelve Caesars" (Suetonius), was assassinated September 18, 96 AD. The soldiers amid civil war had elected the last dynasty. This time the senate asserted itself and nominated a brief series of emperors—on the whole the best that wore the purple.

(4) Adoptive or Antonine emperors.—The Antonine is another distinct era marked by humane government, recognition of the rights of the provinces and an enlargement of the ideas of universalism. Under Trajan the empire was extended; a series of frontier blockades was established—a confession that Rome could advance no farther. Under Hadrian a policy of retreat began; henceforth Rome is never again on the aggressive but always on the defensive against restless barbarians. Unmistakable signs of weakness and decay set in under Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius. This, the best and happiest period of Rom imperial government, was the beginning of the end. In this era we detect a growing centralization of authority; the senate practically becomes a tool of the emperor. A distinct civil service was established which culminated in bureaucracy under Hadrian.

(5) Changing dynasties, 193-284 A.D.—On the death of Commodus, whose reign 180-93 A.D. stands by itself, the empire was put up for sale by the soldiery and knocked down to the highest bidder. The military basis of the empire was emphasized—which was indeed essential in this period of barbaric aggressiveness to postpone the fall of the empire until its providential mission was accomplished. A rapid succession of rulers follows, almost each new ruler bringing a new dynasty. Those disintegrating forces set in which developed so rapidly from the reign of Diocletian. The pax Romana had passed; civil commotion accentuated the dangers from invading barbarians. Plague and famine depopulated rich provinces. Rome itself drops into the background and the provincial spirit asserts itself proportionally. The year 212 A.D. is memorable for the edict of Caracalla converting all the free population into Rom citizens.

(6) From Diocletian till partition.—In the next period absolute monarchy of pure oriental type was established by Diocletian, one of the ablest of Rom rulers. He inaugurated the principle of division and subdivision of imperial power. The inevitable separation of East and West, with the growing prominence of the East, becomes apparent. Rome and Italy are reduced to the rank of provinces, and new courts are opened by the two Augusti and two Caesars. Diocletian's division of power led to civil strife, until Constantine once more united the whole empire under his sway. The center of gravity now shifted from West to East by the foundation of Constantinople. The empire was again parceled out to the sons of Constantine, one of whom, Constantius, succeeded in again reuniting it (350 A.D.). In 364 it was again divided, Valentinian receiving the West and Valens the East.

(7) Final partition.—On the death of Theodosius I (395), West and East fell to his sons Honorius and Arcadius, never again to be united. The western half rapidly degenerated before barbaric hordes and weakening rulers. The western provinces and Africa were overrun by conquering barbarians who set up independent kingdoms on Rom soil. Burgundians and Visigoths settled in Gaul; the latter established a kingdom in Spain. The Vandals under Genseric settled first in Southern Spain, then crossed to Africa and reduced it. Goths burst over Rom frontiers, settled in Illyria and invaded Italy. Alaric and his Goths spared Rome in 408 for a ransom; in 409 he appeared again and set up Ataulus as king of the Romans, and finally in 410 he captured and sacked the city. It was again sacked by the Vandals under Genseric in 462, and, lastly, fell before Odoacer and his Germans in 476; he announced to the world that the empire of the West had ceased. The empire of the East continued at Constantinople the greatest political power through a chequered history down to the capture of the city in 1214 and its final capture by the Turks in 1453, when its spiritual and intellectual treasures were opened to western lands and proved of untold blessing in preparing the way for the Reformation of the 16th cent. The East conquered the West intellectually and spiritually. In the East was born the religion of humanity.

(1) Exhaustion of parties.—The Rom world had for two generations been steadily drifting toward monarchy, and at least one generation before the empire was set up clear minds saw the inevitable necessity of one-man government or supreme power, and each political leader made it his ambition to grasp it. The civil wars ceased for a century with the death of Antony. But the struggles of Tiberius Gracchus and Scipio Aemilianus, Caius Gracchus and Opimius, Drusus and Philippus, Marius and Sulla, Pompey and Caesar, and lastly Octavian and Antony had exhausted the state, and this exhaustion of political parties opened the way for monarchy. In fact it was a necessity for the welfare of the commonwealth that one should be elevated who could fairly hold the balance between oligarchy and the commons and duly recognize the claims of all parties. Even Cato Uticensis—the incarnation of republican ideas—admitted it would be better to choose a master than wait for a tyrant. The bloody wars could find no solution except the survival of the fittest. Moreover, the free political institutions of Rome had become useless and could no longer work under the armed oppression of factions. If any form of government, only supreme power would prove effectual amid an enfeebled, unpopular senate, corrupt and idle commons, and ambitious individuals.

(2) Inability of either aristocracy or democracy to hold equilibrium.—Events had proved that a narrow exclusive aristocracy was incapable of good government because of its utterly selfish policy and disregard for the rights of all lower orders. It had learned to baffle liberty by political murders. Neither was the heterogeneous population of later Rome disciplined to obey or to initiate just government when it had seized power. This anarchy within the body politic opened an easy way to usurpation by individuals. No republic and no form of free popular government could live under such conditions. Caesar said of the republic that it was "a name without any substance," and Curio declared it to be a "vain chimera." The law courts shared in the general corruption. The judicia became the bone of contention between the senate and the knights as the best instrument for party interests, and enabled the holders (a) to receive large bribes, (b) to protect their own order when guilty of the most flagrant injustice, and (c) to oppress other orders. Justice for all, and esp. for conquered peoples, was impossible. Elective assemblies refused to perform their proper functions because of extravagant bribery or the presence of candidates in arms. In fact, the people were willing to forego the prerogative of election and accept candidates at the nomination of a despotic authority. The whole people had become incapable of self-government and were willing—almost glad—to be relieved of the necessity.

(3) Precedents.—Besides, precedents for one-man government, or the concentration of supreme power in one hand, were not wanting, and had been rapidly multiplying in Rom history as it drew nearer to the end of the republic. Numerous protracted commands and special commissions had accustomed the state to the novelty of obedience without participation in administration. The 7 consulships of Marius, the 4 of Cinna, the 3 extraordinary commissions of Pompey and his sole consulship, the dictatorship of Sulla without time limit, the two 5-year-period military commands of Caesar, his repeated dictatorships the last of which was to extend for 10 years—all these were pointing directly toward Caesarism.

(4) Withdrawal from public life: individualism.—On another side the way was opened to supreme power by the increasing tendency for some of the noblest and best minds to withdraw from public life to the seclusion of the heart life and thus leave the field open for demagogic ambition. After the conquests of Alexander the Great, philosophy abandoned the civic, political or city-state point of view and became moral and individual. Stoicism adopted the lofty spiritual teachings of Plato and combined them with the idea of the brotherhood of humanity. It also preached that man must work out his salvation, not in public political life, but in the secret agonies of his own soul. This religion took hold of the noblest Rom souls who were conscious of the weariness of life and felt the desire for spiritual fellowship and comfort. The pendulum in human systems of thought generally swings to the opposite extreme, and these serious souls abandoned public life for private speculation and meditation. Those who did remain at the helm of affairs—like the younger Cato—were often too much idealists, living in the past or in an ideal Platonic republic, and proved very unequal to the practical demagogues who lived much in the present with a keen eye to the future. Also a considerable number of the moderate party, who in better days would have furnished leaders to the state, disgusted with the universal corruption, saddened by the hopeless state of social strife and disquieted by uncertainty as to the issue of victory for either contending party, held aloof and must have wished for and welcomed a paramount authority to give stability to social life. Monarchy was in the air, as proved by the sentiments of the two pseudo-Sallustian letters, the author of which calls upon Caesar to restore government and reorganize the state, for if Rome perish the whole world must perish with her.

(5) Industrial.—To another considerable class monarchy must have been welcome—the industrial and middle class who were striving for competence and were engaged in trade and commerce. Civil wars and the strife of parties must have greatly hindered their activity. They cast their lot neither with the optimates nor with the idle commonalty. They desired only a stable condition of government under which they could uninterceptedly carry on their trades.

(6) Military.—Military conditions favored supreme power. Not only had the lengthened commands familiarized the general with his legions and given him time to seduce the soldiery to his own cause, but the soldiery too had been petted and spoiled like the spoon-fed populace. The old republican safeguards against ambition had been removed. The ranks of the armies had also been swollen with large numbers of provincials and non-Romans who had no special sentiment about republican forms. We have seen the military power growing mere and more prominent. The only way of averting a military despotism supported and prompted by the soldiers was to set up a monarchy, holding at the military, legislative and administrative functions of the state in due proportion. This was superior to a merely nominal republic always cringing under fear of military leaders.

(7) Imperial interests.—Lastly, the aggression and conquests of the republic had brought about a state of affairs demanding an empire. The East and the West had been subdued; many provinces and heterogeneous populations were living under the Rom eagle. These provinces could not permanently be plundered and oppressed as under the republican senate. The jus civile of Rome must learn also the jus naturale and jus gentium. An exclusive selfish senatorial clique was incapable of doing justice to the conquered peoples. One supreme ruler over all classes raised above personal ambition could best meet their grievances. The senate had ruled with a rod of iron; the provinces could not possibly be worse under any form of government. Besides, monarchy was more congenial to the provincials than a republic which they could not comprehend.

(8) Influence of Orient.—The Orientals had long been used to living under imperial and absolute forms of government and would welcome such a form among their new conquerors. Besides, residence in the Orient had affected Rom military leaders with the thirst after absolute power. And no other form was possible when the old city-state system broke down, and as yet federal government had not been dreamed of. Another consideration: the vast and dissimilar masses of population living within the Rom dominions could more easily be held together under a king or emperor than by a series of ever-changing administrations, just as the Austro-Hungarian and the British empires are probably held together better under the present monarchies than would be possible under a republican system. This survey may make clear the permanent interest in Rom history for all students of human history. The Rom empire was established indeed in the fulness of the times for its citizens and for Christianity.

II. Preparation of the Roman Empire for Christianity.—About the middle of the reign of Augustus a Jewish child was born who was destined to rule an empire more extensive and lasting than that of the Caesars. It is a striking fact that almost synchronous with the planting of the Rom empire Christianity appeared in the world. Although on a superficial glance the Rom empire may seem the greatest enemy of early Christianity, and at times a bitter persecutor, yet it was in many ways the grandest preparation and in some ways the best ally of Christianity. It ushered in politically the fulness of the times. The Caesars—whatever they may have been or done—prepared the way of the Lord. A brief account must here be given of some of the services which the Rom empire rendered to humanity and esp. to the kingdom of God.

The first universal blessing conferred by the empire was the famous pax Romana ("Rom peace").

1. Pax Romana and Unification of the World

The world had not been at peace since the days of Alexander the Great. The quarrels of the Diadochi, and the aggression of the Rom republic had kept the nations in a state of constant turmoil. A universal peace was first established with the beginning of the reign of Augustus and the closing of the temple of Janus. In all the countries round the Mediterranean and from distant Britain to the Euphrates the world was at rest. Rome had made an end of her own civil wars and had put a stop to wars among the nations. Though her wars were often iniquitous and unjustifiable, and she conquered like a barbarian, she ruled her conquests like a humane statesman. The quarrels of the Diadochi which caused so much turmoil in the East were ended, the territory of the Lagids, Attalids, Seleucids and Antigonids having passed under the sway of Rome. The empire united Greeks, Romans and Jews all under one government. Rome thus blended the nations and prepared them for Christianity. Now for the first time we may speak of the world as universal humanity, the orbis terrarum, ἡ οἰκουμένη, ἡ οἰκουμένη (Lk 2 1), the genus humanum. These terms represented humanity as living under a uniform system of government. All were members of one earthly state; the Rom empire was their communis omnium patria.

This state of affairs contributed largely to the spread of cosmopolitanism which had set in with the Macedonian conqueror. Under the

2. Cosmopolitanism Rom empire all national barriers were removed; the great cities—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, etc—became meeting-places of all races and languages. The Romans were everywhere carrying their laws and civilization; Greeks settled in thousands at all important centers as professors, merchants, physicians, or acrobats;

Oriental were to be found in large numbers with their gods and mysteries in Rome, "the epitome of the world." In the Rom armies soldiers from all quarters of the empire became companions. And many thousands of slaves of fine education and high culture contributed much to cosmopolitanism. Being in many cases far superior in culture to their masters, they became their teachers. And in every city of importance, East or West, large bodies of the Jewish Diaspora were settled.

This cosmopolitanism gave great impetus to a corresponding eclecticism of thought. Nothing could have been more favorable to

3. Eclecticism

Christianity than this intermixture of all races and mutual exchange of thought. Each people discovered how much it had in common with its neighbors. From the days of the Diadochi, Stoicism had been preaching the gospel of a civic and ethical brotherhood of humanity. In the fusion of different philosophic systems the emphasis had shifted from the city-state or political or national to the moral and human point of view. All men were thus reduced to equality before the One; only virtue and vice were the differentiating factors. Men were akin with the Divine—at least the wise and good—so that one poet could say, "We are His offspring."

Stoicism did a noble service in preparation for Christianity by preaching universalism along the path of individualism. It also furnished comfort and strength to countless thousands of weary human lives and ministered spiritual support and calm resignation at many a heathen deathbed. It may be declared to be the first system of religious thought—for it was a religion more than a philosophy—which made a serious study of the diseases of the human soul. We know of course its weakness and imperfections, that it was an aristocratic creed appealing only to the elect of mortals, that it had little message for the fallen and lower classes, that it was cold and stern, that it lacked—as Seneca felt—the inspiration of an ideal life. But with all its failures it proved a worthy pedagogue to a religion which brought a larger message than that of Greece. It afforded the spiritual and moral counterpart to the larger human society of which the Rom empire was the political and visible symbol. Hitherto a good citizen had been a good man. Now a good man is a good citizen, and that not of a narrow city-state, but of the world. Stoicism also proved the interpreter and mouthpiece to the Rom empire of the higher moral and spiritual qualities of Gr civilization; it diffused the best convictions of Greece about God and man, selecting those elements that were universal and of lasting human value (see Stoics).

The mind of the Rom empire was further prepared for Christianity by the Jewish Diaspora. Greeks learned from Jews and Jews from Greeks and the Romans from both. The unification effected by Rom Law and administration greatly aided the Diaspora. Jewish settlements became still more numerous and powerful both in the East and West. Those Jews bringing from the homeland the spiritual monotheism of their race combined it with Gr philosophy which had been setting steadily for monotheism. With the Jews the exclusively national element was subordinated to the more human and universal, the ceremonial to the religious. They even adopted the world-language of that day—Greek—and had their sacred Scriptures tr^d into this language in which they carried on an active proselytism. The Rom spirit was at first essentially narrow and exclusive. But even the Romans soon fell beneath the spell of this cosmopolitanism and eclecticism. As their conquests increased, their mind was correspondingly widened. They adopted the policy of Alexander—sparing the gods of the conquered and admitting them into the responsibility of guarding Rome; they assimilated them with their own Pantheon or identified them with Rom gods. In this way naturally the religious ideas of conquered races more highly civilized than the conquerors laid hold on Rom minds (see DISPERSION).

Another inestimable service rendered to humanity and Christianity was the protection which the

Rom power afforded the Gr civilization. We must remember that the Romans were at first only conquering barbarians who had little respect for culture, but idealized power. Already they had wiped out two ancient and superior civilizations—that of Carthage without leaving a trace, and that of Etruria, traces of which have been discovered in modern times. It is hard to conceive what a scourge Rome would have proved to the world had she not fallen under the influence of the superior culture and philosophy of Greece. Had the Rom Mars not been educated by Pallas Athene the Romans would have proved Vandals and Tartars in blotting out civilization and arresting human progress. The Greeks, on the other hand, could conquer more by their preëminence in everything that pertains to the intellectual life of man than they could hold by the sword. A practical and political power was needed to protect Gr speculation. But the Romans after causing much devastation were gradually educated and civilized and have contributed to the uplifting and enlightenment of subsequent civilizations by both preserving and opening to the world the spiritual qualities of Greece. The kinship of man with the Divine, learned from Socrates and Plato, went forth on its wide evangel. This Gr civilization, philosophy and theology trained many of the great theologians and leaders of the Christian church, so that Clement of Alexandria said that Gr philosophy and Jewish law had proved schoolmasters to bring the world to Christ. Paul, who prevented Christianity from remaining a Jewish sect and proclaimed its universalism, learned much from Gr—esp. from Stoic—thought. It is also significant that the early Christian missionaries apparently went only where the Gr language was known, which was the case in all centers of Rom administration.

The state of the Rom empire linguistically was in the highest degree favorable to the spread of Christianity. The Gr republics by their enterprise, superior genius and commercial abilities extended their dialects over the Aegean Islands, the coasts of Asia Minor, Sicily and Magna Graecia. The preëminence of Attic culture and literature favored by the short-lived Athenian empire raised this dialect to a standard among the Gr peoples. But the other dialects long persisted. Out of this babel of Gr dialects there finally arose a normal koinē or "common language." By the conquests of Alexander and the Hellenistic sympathies of the Diadochi this common Gr language became the lingua franca of antiquity. Gr was known in Northern India, at the Parthian court, and on the distant shores of the Euxine (Black Sea). The native land of the gospel was surrounded on all sides by Gr civilization. Gr culture and language penetrated into the midst of the obstinate home-keeping Palestinian Jews. Though Gr was not the mother-tongue of Our Lord, He understood Gr and apparently could speak it when occasion required—Aram. being the language of His heart and of His public teachings. The history of the Maccabean struggle affords ample evidence of the extent to which Gr culture, and with it the Gr language, were familiar to the Jews. There were in later days Hellenistic bodies of devout Jews in Jerus itself. Gr was recognized by the Jews as the universal language: the inscription on the wall of the outer temple court forbidding Gentiles under pain of death to enter was in Gr. The koinē became the language even of religion—where a foreign tongue is least likely to be used—of the large Jewish Diaspora. They perceived the advantages of Gr as the language of commerce—the Jews' occupation—of culture and of proselytizing. They threw open their sacred Scriptures in the LXX and other VSS to the Gr-Rom world, adapting the tr in many respects to the requirements of Gr readers. "The Bible whose God was Yahweh was the Bible of one people: the Bible whose God was kúpios [kúrios, "Lord"] was the Bible of humanity." When the Romans came upon the scene, they found this language so widely known and so deeply rooted they could not hope to supplant it. Indeed they did not try—except in Sicily and Magna Graecia—to suppress Gr, but rather gladly accepted it as the one common means of intercourse among the peoples of their eastern dominions (see LANGUAGE OF THE NT).

Though Latin was of course the official language of the conquerors, the decrees of governors generally appeared with a Gr tr, so that they might be "understanded of the people," and Gr overcame Lat, as English drove out the French of the Norman invaders. Lat poets and historians more than once complained that Graecia capta ferum victorem cepit ("conquered Greece vanquished its stern conqueror"). With the spread of Lat there were two world-languages side by side for the whole Rom empire, but Gr was prevailing the language of the eastern half of the Rom empire which was the first soil for Christian churches and the first half of the empire to be Christianized. Later when Christianity was able to extend her activity to the West, she found Lat ready as the common means of intercourse. That Rome respected Gr is greatly to her credit and much to the advantage of Christianity. For Christianity, when it began to aim at universalism, dropped its native Aramaic. The gospel in order to become a world-evangel was tr^d into Gr. The early Christian missionaries did not learn the languages or patois of the Rom empire, but confined themselves to centers of Gr culture. Paul wrote in Gr to the church in Rome itself, of which Gr was the language. And while Christianity was spreading through the Gr East under the unification of Rom administration, the Romans were Romanizing and leveling the West for Lat Christianity (see LATIN). In the West it may be noted that the first foothold of the Christian religion was in Gr—witness the church in Gaul.

In material ways too Rome opened the way for Christianity by building the great highways for the gospel. The great system of roads that knit the then civilized world together served not only the legions and the imperial escorts, but were of equal service to the early missionaries, and when churches began to spring up over the empire, these roads greatly facilitated that church organization and brotherhood which strengthened the church to overcome the empire. With the dawn of the pax Romana all these roads became alive once more with a galaxy of caravans and traders. Commerce revived and was carried on under circumstances more favorable than any that obtained till the past century. Men exchanged not only material things, but also spiritual things. Many of these early traders and artisans were Christians, and while they bought and sold the things that perish, they did not lose an opportunity of spreading the gospel. For an empire which embraced the Mediterranean shores, the sea was an important means of inter-communication; and the Mediterranean routes were safer for commerce and travel at that period than during any previous one. Pompey the Great had driven the pirates off the sea, and with the fall of Sextus Pompey no hostile maritime forces remained. The ships which plied in countless numbers from point to point of this great inland sea offered splendid advantages and opportunity for early Christian missionary enthusiasm.

The large measure of freedom permitted by Rom authorities to the religions of all nations greatly favored the growth of infant Christianity. The Rom empire was never in principle a persecutor with a permanent court of inquisition. Strange cults from the East and Egypt flourished in the capital, and except when they became a danger to public morality or to the peace of society they were allowed to spread unchecked under the eyes of the police. See below on non-Rom religions.

Further, the Rom empire afforded Christianity a material and outward symbol for its spiritual ambition. It enlarged the vision of the church. Only a citizen (Paul) of such a world-empire could dream of a religion for all humanity. If the Rom sword could so conquer and unify the orbis terrarum, the militant church should be provoked to attempt nothing less in the religious sphere. It also furnished many a suggestion to the early organizers of the new community, until the Christian church became the spiritual counterpart of the Rom empire. The Christians appropriated many a weapon from the arsenal of the enemy and learned from them aggressiveness, the value of thorough organization and of military methods.

Rom law in its origins was characterized by the narrowest exclusiveness, and the first formal Rom code was on Gr patterns, yet the Romans here as in so many other respects improved upon what they had borrowed and became masters of jurisprudence in the antique world. As their empire and conceptions expanded, they remodeled their laws to embrace all their subjects. One of the greatest boons conferred by Rome upon the antique world was a uniform system of good laws—the source of much of our European jurisprudence. The Rom law played an equally important rôle with the Jewish in molding and disciplining for Christianity. It taught men to obey and to respect authority, and proved an effective leveling and civilizing power in the empire. The universal law of Rome was the pedagogue for the universal law of the gospel. See ROMAN LAW.

The Romans could offer their subjects good laws, uniform government and military protection, but not a satisfactory religion. A universal empire called for a universal religion, which Christianity alone could offer. Finally, not only by what Rome had accomplished but by what she proved incapable of accomplishing, the way of the Lord was made ready and a people prepared for His coming. It was a terrible crisis in the civilization and religion of antiquity. The old national religions and systems of belief had proved unable to soothe the increasing imperious moral and spiritual demands of man's nature. A moral bankruptcy was immanent. The old Rom religion of abstract virtues had gone down in formalism; it was too cold for human hearts. Man could no longer find the field of his moral activity in the religion of the state; he was no longer merely an atom in society performing religious rites, not for his own soul, but for the good of the commonwealth. Personality had been slowly emerging, and the new schools of philosophy called man away from the state to seek peace with God in the solitude of his own soul first of all. But even the best of these schools found the crying need of a positive, not a negative religion, the need for a perfect ideal life as a dynamic over ordinary human lives. Thus was felt an imperious demand for a new revelation, for a fresh vision or knowledge of God. In earlier days men had believed that God had revealed Himself to primitive wise men or heroes of their race, and that subsequent generations must accept with faith what these earlier seers, who stood nearer God, as Cicero said, had been pleased to teach of the Divine. But soon this stock of knowledge became exhausted. Plato, after soaring to the highest point of poetic and philosophic thought about the Divine, admitted the need of a demon or superman to tell us the secrets of eternity. With the early Rom empire began a period of tremendous religious unrest. Men tried philosophy, magic, astrology, foreign rites, to find a sure place of rest. This accounts for the rapid and extensive diffusion of oriental mysteries which promised to the initiated communion with God here, a "better hope" in death, and satisfied the craving for immortality beyond time. These were the more serious souls who would gladly accept the consolations of Jesus. Others, losing all faith in any form of religion, gave themselves up to blank despair and accepted Epicureanism with its gospel of annihilation and its carpe diem morals. This system had a terrible fascination for those who had lost themselves; it is presented in its most attractive form in the verses of Lucretius—the Omar Khayyám of Lat literature. Others again, unable to find God, surrendered themselves to cheerless skepticism. The sore need of the new gospel of life and immortality will be borne in upon the mind of those who read the Gr and Rom sepulchral inscriptions. And even Seneca, who was almost a Christian in some respects, speaks of immortality as a "beautiful dream" (bellum somnium), though tribulation later gave a clearer vision of the "city of God." Servius Sulpicius, writing to Cicero a letter of consolation on the death of his much-missed Tullia, had only a sad "if" to offer about the future (Cic. Fam. iv.5). Nowhere does the unbelief and pessimism of pre-Christian days among the higher classes strike one more forcibly than in the famous discussion recorded by Sallust (Bel. Cat. li f) as to the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators. Caesar, who held the Rom high-priesthood and the highest authority on the religion of the state, proposes life imprisonment, as death would only bring annihilation and rest to these villains—no hereafter, no reward or punishment (eam cuncta mortalium mala dissolvere; ultra neque curae neque gaudio locum esse). Cato next speaks—the most religious man of his generation—in terms which cast no rebuke upon Caesar's Epicureanism and materialism (ib, 52). Cicero (In Cat. iv.4) is content to leave immortality an open question. The philosophers of Athens mocked Paul on Mars' Hill when he spoke of a resurrection. Such was the attitude of the educated classes of the Gr-Rom world at the dawn of Christianity, though it cannot be denied that there was also a strong desire for continued existence. The other classes were either perfunctorily performing the rites of a dead national religion or were seeking, some, excitement or aesthetic worship or even scope for their baser passions, some, peace and promise for the future, in the eastern mysteries. The distinction between moral and physical evil was coming to the surface, and hence a consciousness of sin. Religion and ethics had not yet been united. "The throne of the human mind" was declared vacant, and Christianity was at hand as the best claimant. In fact, the Gr-Rom mind had been expanding to receive the pure teachings of Jesus.

III. Attitude of the Roman Empire to Religions.—The history of Rom religion reveals a continuous penetration of Italian, Etruscan, Gr, Egypt and oriental worship and rites, until the old Rom religion became almost unrecognizable, and even the antiquarian learning of a Varro could scarcely discover the original meaning or use of many Rom deities. The Rom elements or modes of worship progressively retreated until they and the foreign rites with which they were overlaid gave way before the might of Christianity. As Rome expanded, her religious demands increased. During the regal period Rom religion was that of a simple agricultural community. In the period between the Regifugium and the Second Punic War Rom religion became more complicated and the Rom Pantheon was largely increased by importations from Etruria, Latium and Magna Graecia. The mysterious religion of Etruria first impressed the Rom mind, and from this quarter probably came the Trinity of the Capitol (Jupiter, Juno, Minerva) previously introduced into Etruria from Gr sources, thus showing that the Romans were not the first in Italy to be influenced by the religion of Greece. New modes of worship, non-Rom in spirit, also came in from the Etruscans and foreign elements of Gr mythology. Latium also made its contribution, the worship of Diana coming from Aricia and also a Lat Jupiter. Two Lat cults penetrated even within the Rom pomoerium—that of Hercules and Castor, with deities of Gr origin. The Gr settlements in Southern Italy (Magna Graecia) were generous in their contributions and opened the way for the later invasion of Gr deities. The Sibylline Books were early imported from Cumae as sacred scriptures for the Romans. In 493 BC during a famine a temple was built to the Gr trinity Demeter, Dionysus, and Persephone, under the Lat names of Ceres, Liber, and Libera—the beginning of distrust in the primitive Rom numina and of that practice, so oft repeated in Rom history, of introducing new and foreign gods at periods of great distress. In 433 Apollo came from the same region. Mercury and Asclepius followed in 293 BC, and in 249 BC Dis and Proserpina were brought from Tarentum. Other non-Rom modes of approach to deity were introduced. Rome had been in this period very broad-minded in her policy of meeting the growing religious needs of her community, but she had not so far gone beyond Italy. A taste had also developed for dramatic and more aesthetic forms of worship. The period of the Second Punic War was a crisis in Rom religious life, and the faith of the Romans waned before growing unbelief. Both the educated classes and the populace abandoned the old Rom religion, the former sank into skepticism, the latter into superstition; the former put philosophy in the place of religion, the latter the more sensuous cults of the Orient. The Romans went abroad again to borrow deities—this time to Greece, Asia and Egypt. Gr deities were introduced wholesale, and readily assimilated to or identified with Rom deities (see ROMÉ, III, 1). In 191 BC Hebe entered as Juventas, in 179 Artemis as Diana, in 138 Ares as Mars. But the home of religion—the Orient—proved more helpful. In 204 BC Cybele was introduced from Pessinus to Rome, known also as the Great Mother (magna mater)—a fatal and final blow to old Rom religion and an impetus to the wilder and more orgiastic cults and mysterious glamor which captivated the common mind. Bacchus with his gross immorality soon followed. Sulla introduced Mâ from Phrygia as the counterpart of the Rom Bellona, and Egypt gave Isis. In the wars of Pompey against the pirates Mithra was brought to Rome—the greatest rival of Christianity. Religion now began to pass into the hands of politicians and at the close of the republic was almost entirely in their hands. Worship degenerated into formalism, and formalism culminated in disuse. Under the empire philosophic systems continued still more to replace religion, and oriental rites spread apace. The religious revival of Augustus was an effort to breathe life into the dry bones. His plan was only partly religious, and partly political—to establish an imperial and popular religion of which he was the head and centering round his person. He discovered the necessity of an imperial religion. In the East kings had long before been regarded as divine by their subjects. Alexander the Great, like a wise politician, intended to use this as one bond of union for his wide dominions. The same habit extended among the Diadochian kings, esp. in Egypt and Syria. When Augustus had brought peace to the world, the Orient was ready to hail him as a god. Out of this was evolved the cult of the reigning emperor and of Roma personified. This worship gave religious unity to the empire, while at the same time magnifying the emperor. But the effort was in vain: the old Rom religion was dead, and the spiritual needs of the empire continued to be met more and more by philosophy and the mysteries which promised immortality. The cult of the Genius of the emperor soon lost all reality. Vespasian himself on his deathbed jested at the idea of his becoming a god. The emperor-worship declined steadily, and in the 3d and 4th cents. oriental worships were supreme. The religion of the Rom empire soon became of that cosmopolitan and eclectic type so characteristic of the new era.

The non-Rom religions were divided into religiones licitae ("licensed worships") and religiones illicitae ("unlicensed"). The Romans at different times, on account of earthquakes, pestilences, famine or military disasters, introduced non-Rom cults as means of appeasing the numina. This generally meant that the cults in question could be performed with impunity by their foreign adherents. It legalized the collegia necessary for these worships from which Rom citizens were by law excluded. But, generally speaking, any people settling at Rome were permitted the liberty of its own native worship in so far as the exercise of it did not interfere with the peace of the state or corrupt the morals of society. On one occasion (186 BC), by a decree of the senate, a severe inquisition was instituted against the Bacchanalian rites which had caused flagrant immorality among the adherents. But Rome was never a systematic persecutor. These foreign rites and superstitions, though often forbidden and their professed adherents driven from the city, always returned stronger than ever. Rom citizens soon discovered the fascination of oriental and Gr mysteries, and devoted themselves to foreign gods while maintaining the necessary formalism toward the religion of the state. Very often too Rom citizens would be presidents of these religious brotherhoods. It should not be forgotten that the original moral elements had fallen out of Rom religion, and that it had become simply a political and military religion for the welfare of the state, not for the salvation of the individual. The individual must conform to certain prescribed rites in order to avert calamity from the state. This done, the state demanded no more, and left him a large measure of freedom in seeking excitement or aesthetic pleasure in the warm and more social foreign mysteries. Thus, while the Romans retained the distinction of religiones licitae and illicitae, they seldom used severity against the latter. Many unlicensed cults were never disturbed. In fact, the very idea of empire rendered toleration of non-Rom religions a necessity. Practically, though not theoretically, the empire abandoned the idea of religiones illicitae, while it retained it upon the statute-book to use in case of such an emergency as the Christian religion involved. Not only the government was tolerant, but the different varieties of religions were tolerant and on good terms with each other. The same man might be initiated into the mysteries of half a dozen divinities. The same man might even be priest of two or more gods. Some had not the slightest objection to worshipping Christ along with Mithra, Isis and Adonis. Men were growing conscious of the oneness of the Divine, and credited their neighbors with worshipping the One Unknown under different names and forms. Hadrian is said to have meditated the erection of temples throughout the empire to the Unknown God.

(1) Judaism a "religio licita."—An interesting and, for the history of Christianity, important example of a religio licita is Judaism. No more exclusive and obstinate people could have been found upon whom to bestow the favor. Yet from the days of Julius Caesar the imperial policy toward the Jew and his religion was uniformly favorable, with the brief exception of the mad attempt of Gaius. The government often protected them against the hatred of the populace. Up to 70 AD they were allowed freely to send their yearly contribution to the temple; they were even allowed self-governing privileges and legislative powers among themselves, and thus formed an exclusive community in the midst of Rom society. Even the disastrous war of 68-70 AD and the fall of Jerus did not bring persecution upon the Jew, though most of these self-governing and self-legislating powers were withdrawn and the Jews were compelled to pay a poll-tax to the temple of the Capitoline Jupiter. Still their religion remained licensed, tolerated, protected. They were excused from duties impossible for their religion, such as military service. This tolerance of the Jewish religion was of incalculable importance to infant Christianity which at first professed to be no more than a reformed and expanded Judaism.

(2) Why Christianity alone was proscribed.—The question next arises: If such was the universally mild and tolerant policy of the empire to find room for all gods and cults, and to respect the beliefs of all the subject peoples, how comes the anomaly that Christianity alone was proscribed and persecuted? Christianity was indeed a religio illicita, not having been accepted by the government as a religio licita, like Judaism. But this is no answer. There were other unlicensed religions which grew apace in the empire. Neither was it simply because Christianity was aggressive and given to proselytism and dared to appear even in the imperial household: Mithraism and Isism were militant and aggressive, and yet were tolerated. Nor was it simply because of popular hatred, for the Christian was not hated above the Jew. Other reasons must explain the anomaly.

(3) Two empires: cause of conflict.—The fact was that two empires were born about the same time so like and yet so unlike as to render a conflict and struggle to the death inevitable. The Christians were unequivocal in asserting that the society for which they were waiting and laboring was a "kingdom."

(a) Confusion of spiritual and temporal: They thought not merely in national or racial but in ecumenical terms. The Romans could not understand a kingdom of God upon earth, but confused Christian ambition with political. It was soon discovered that Christianity came not to save but to destroy and disintegrate the empire. Early Christian enthusiasm made the term "kingdom," very provoking to pagan patriotism, for many, looking for the Parousia of their Lord, were themselves misled into thinking of the new society as a kingdom soon to be set up upon the earth with Christ as king. Gradually, of course, Christians became enlightened upon this point, but the harm had been done. Both the Rom empire and Christianity were aiming at a social organization to embrace the genus humanum. But though these two empires were so alike in several points and the one had done so much to prepare the way for the other, yet the contrast was too great to allow conciliation. Christianity would not lose the atom in the mass; it aimed at universalism along the path of individualism—giving new value to human personality.

(b) Unique claims of Christianity: It seemed also to provoke Rom pride by its absurd claims. It preached that the world was to be destroyed by fire to make way for new heavens and a new earth, that the Eternal City (Rome) was doomed to fall, that a king would come from heaven whom Christians were to obey, that amid the coming desolations the Christians should remain tranquil.

(c) Novelty of Christianity: Again after Christianity came from underneath the aegis of Judaism, it must have taken the government somewhat by surprise as a new and unlicensed religion which had grown strong under a misnomer. It was the newest and latest religion of the empire; it came suddenly, as it were, upon the stage with no past. It was not apparent to the Rom mind that Christianity had been spreading for a generation under the tolerance granted to Judaism (sub umbraculo licitae Judaeorum religionis: Tert.), the latter of which was "protected by its antiquity," as Tacitus said. The Romans were of a conservative nature and disliked innovations. The greatest statesman of the Augustan era, Maecenas, advised the emperor to extend no tolerance to new religions as subversive of monarchy (Dio Cassius lii.36). A new faith appearing suddenly with a large clientèle might be dangerous to the public peace (multitudo ingens: Tac. Ann. xv.44; πολλὸ πλῆθος: Clem. Rom.; Cor 1 6).

(d) Intolerance and exclusiveness of Christian religion and society: In one marked way Christians contravened the tolerant eclectic spirit of the empire—the intolerance and absoluteness of their religion and the exclusiveness of their society. All other religions of the empire admitted compromise and eclecticism, were willing to dwell rather on the points of contact with their neighbors than on the contrast. But Christianity admitted no compromise, was intolerant to all other systems. It must be admitted that in this way it was rather unfair to other cults which offered comfort and spiritual support to thousands of the human race before the dawn of Christianity. But we shall not blame, when we recognize that for its own life and mission it was necessary to show itself at first intolerant. Many heathen would gladly accept Christ along with Mithra and Isis and Serapis. But Christianity demanded complete separation. The Jesus cult could tolerate no rival; it claimed to be absolute, and worshippers of Jesus must be separate from the world. The Christian church was absolute in its demands; would not rank with, but above, all worships. This spirit was of course at enmity with that of the day which enabled rival cults to co-exist with the greatest indifference. Add to this the exclusive state of Christian society. No pious heathen who had purified his soul by asceticism and the sacraments of antiquity could be admitted into membership unless he renounced things dear to him and of some spiritual value. In every detail of public life this exclusive spirit made itself felt. Christians met at night and held secret assemblies in which they were reputed to perpetrate the most scandalous crimes. Thyestean banquets, Oedipean incest, child murder, were among the charges provoked by their exclusiveness.

(e) Obstinatio: Add to this also the sullen obstinacy with which Christians met the demands of imperial power—a feature very offensive to Rom governors. Their religion would be left, them undisturbed if they would only render formal obedience to the religion of the state. Rom clemency and respect for law were baffled before Christian obstinacy. The martyr's courage appeared as sheer fanaticism. The pious Aurelius refers but once to Christianity, and in the words ψιλή παράταξις, ψιλή παράταξις, "sheer obstinacy," and Aristides apparently refers to Christianity as αὐθάδεια, αὐθάδεια, "stubbornness." See PERSECUTIONS, 18.

(f) Aggressiveness against pagan faith: But the Christians were not content with an uncompromising withdrawal from the practices of heathen worship; they also actively assailed the pagan cultus. To the Christians they became doctrines of demons.

The imperial cult and worship of the Genius of the emperor were very unholy in their sight. Hence they fell under the charges of disloyalty to the emperor and might be proved guilty of majestas. They held in contempt the doctrine that the greatness of Rome was due to her reverence for the gods; the Christians were atheists from the pagan point of view. And as religion was a political concern for the welfare of the state, atheism was likely to call down the wrath of divinity to the subversion of the state.

(g) Christianos ad leones: Very soon when disasters began to fall thickly upon the Rom empire, the blame was laid upon the Christians. In early days Rome had often sought to appease the gods by introducing external cults; at other times oriental cults were expelled in the interests of public morality. Now in times of disaster Christians became the scapegoats. If famine, drought, pestilence, earthquake or any other public calamity threatened, the cry was raised "the Christians to the lions" (see NERO; PERSECUTIONS, 12). This view of Christianity as subversive of the empire survived the fall of Rome before Alaric. The heathen forgot—as the apologists showed—that Rome had been visited by the greatest calamities before the Christian era and that the Christians were the most self-sacrificing in periods of public distress, lending succor to pagan and Christian alike.

(h) Odiū generis humani: All prejudices against Christianity were summed up in odiu generis humani, "hatred for the human race" or society, which was reciprocated by "hatred of the human race toward them." The Christians were bitterly hated, not only by the populace, but by the upper educated classes. Most of the early adherents belonged to the slave, freedman and artisan classes, "not many wise, not many noble." Few were Rom citizens. We have mentioned the crimes which popular prejudice attributed to this hated sect. They were in mockery styled Christiani by the Antiochians (a name which they at first resented), and Nazarenēs by the Jews. No nicknames were too vile to attach to them—Asinariū (the sect that worshipped the ass's head), Sarmenticū or Semazii. Rom writers cannot find epithets strong enough. Tacitus reckons the Christian faith among the "atrocious and abominable things" (atrocita aut pudenda) which flooded Rome, and further designates it superstitio exitiabilis ("baneful superstition," Ann. xv.44), Suetonius (Ner. 16) as novel and malefic (novae ac maleficae), and the gentle Pliny (Ep. 97) as vile and indecent (prava immodica). Well might Justus say the Christians were "hated and reviled by the whole human race." This opprobrium was accentuated by the attacks of philosophy upon Christianity. When the attention of philosophers was drawn to the new religion, it was only to scorn it. This attitude of heathen philosophy is best understood in reading Celsus and the Christian apologists.

(4) The Roman empire not the only disturbing factor.—Philosophy long maintained its aloofness from the religion of a crucified Galilean: the "wise" were the last to enter the kingdom of God. When later Christianity had established itself as a permanent force in human thought, philosophy deigned to consider its claims. But it was too late; the new faith was already on the offensive. Philosophy discovered its own weakness and began to reform itself by aiming at being both a philosophy and a religion. This is particularly the case in neo-Platonism (in Plotinus) in which reason breaks down before revelation and mysticism. Another force disturbing the peace of the Christian church was the enemy within the fold. Large numbers of heathen had entered the ecclesia bringing with them their oriental or Gr ideas, just as Jewish Christians brought their Judaism with them. This led to grave heresies, each system of thought distorting in its own way the orthodox faith. Later another ally joined the forces against Christianity—reformed paganism led by an injured priesthood. At first the cause of Christianity was greatly aided by the fact that there was no exclusive and jealous priesthood at the head of the Gr-Rom religion, as in the Jewish and oriental religions. There was thus no dogma and no class interested in maintaining a dogma. Religious persecution is invariably instituted by the priesthood, but in the Rom world it was not till late in the day when the temples and sacrifices were falling into desuetude that we find a priesthood as a body in opposition. Thus the Rom imperial power stood not alone in antagonism to Christianity, but was abetted and often provoked to action by (a) popular hate, (b) philosophy, (c) pagan priesthood, (d) heresies within the church.

IV. Relations between the Roman Empire and Christianity.—We have here to explain how the attitude of the Rom empire, at first friendly or indifferent, developed into one of fierce conflict, the different stages in the policy—if we can speak of any uniform policy—of the Rom government toward Christianity, the charges or mode of procedure on which Christians were condemned, and when and how the profession of Christianity (nomen ipsum) became a crime. We shall see the Rom empire progressively weakening and Christianity gaining ground. For the sake of clearness we shall divide the Rom empire into six periods, the first from the commencement of the Christian era till the last of the Julio-Claudian dynasty.

At first the presence of the Christian faith was unknown to Rom authorities. It appeared first merely as a reformed and more spiritual Judaism; its earliest preachers and adherents alike never dreamed of severing from the synagogue. Christ till Death of Nero, 68 AD sects to which a Jew might belong while adhering to Mosaism and Judaism. But soon this friendly relation became strained on account of the expanding views of some of the Christian preachers, and from the introduction of gentile proselytes. The first persecutions for the infant church came entirely from exclusive Judaism, and it was the Jews who first accused Christians before the Rom courts. Even so, the Rom government not only refused to turn persecutor, but even protected the new faith both against Jewish accusations and against the violence of the populace (Acts 21 31 f). And the Christian missionaries—esp. Paul—soon recognized in the Rom empire an ally and a power for good. Writing to the Romans Paul counsels them to submit in obedience to the powers that be, as "ordained of God." His favorable impression must have been greatly enhanced by his mild captivity at Rome and his acquittal by Nero on the first trial. The Rom soldiers had come to his rescue in Jerus to save his life from the fanaticism of his own coreligionists. Toward the accusations of the Jews against their rivals the Romans were either indifferent, as Gallio the proconsul of Achaia, who "cared for none of those things" (Acts 18 12 ff), or recognized the innocence of the accused, as did both Felix (Acts 24 1 ff) and Porcius Festus (25 14 ff). Thus the Romans persisted in looking upon Christians as a sect of the Jews. But the Jews took another step in formulating a charge of disloyalty (begun before Pilate) against the new sect as acting "contrary to the decrees of Caesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus" (Acts 17 7; cf 25 8). Christianity was disowned thus early by Judaism and cast upon its own resources. The increasing numbers of Christians would confirm to the Rom government the independence of Christianity. And the trial of a Rom citizen, Paul, at Rome would further enlighten the authorities.

The first heathen persecution of Christianity resulted from no definite policy, no apprehension of danger to the body politic, and no definite charges, but from an accidental spark which kindled the conflagration of Rome (July, 64 AD). Up to this time no emperor had taken much notice of Christianity. It was only in the middle of the reign of Augustus that Jesus was born. In the reign of Tiberius belong Jesus' public ministry, crucifixion and resurrection; but his reign closed too early (37 AD) to allow any prominence to the new faith, though this emperor was credited with proposing to the senate a decree to receive Christ into the Rom pantheon—legend of course. Under the brief principate of the mad Gaius (37–41 AD) the "new way" was not yet divorced from the parent faith. Gaius caused a diversion in favor of the Christians by his persecution of the Jews and the command to set up his own statue in the temple. In the next reign (Claudius, 41–54 AD) the Jews were again harshly treated, and thousands were banished from Rome (Judaeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulsi: Suet. Claud. 25). Some would see in this an action against the Christians by interpreting the words as meaning riots between Jews and Christians, in consequence of which some Christians were banished as Jews, but Dio Cassius (ix.6) implies that it was a police regulation to restrain the spread of Jewish worship. It was in the reign of Nero, after the fire of 64 AD, that the first hostile step was taken by the government against the Christians, earliest account of which is given by Tacitus (Ann. xv.44). Nero's reckless career had given rise to the rumor that he was the incendiary, that he wished to see the old city burned in order to rebuild it on more magnificent plans. See NERO. Though he did everything possible to arrest the flames, even exposing his own life, took every means of alleviating the destitution of the sufferers, and ordered such religious rites as might appease the wrath of the gods, the suspicion still clung to him.

"Accordingly in order to dissipate the rumor, he put forward as guilty [subdidit reos] and inflicted the most cruel punishments on those who were hated for their abominations [flagitia] and called Christians by the populace. The originator of that name, Christus, had been executed by the procurator Pontius Pilatus in the reign of Tiberius, and the baneful superstition [exitabilis superstitio] put down for the time being broke out again, not only throughout Judaea, the home of this evil, but also in the City [Rome] where all atrocious and shameful [atrocia aut pudenda] things converge and are welcomed. Those therefore who confessed [i.e. to being Christians] were first arrested, and then by the information gained from them a large number [multitudo ingens] were implicated [coniuncti] is the MS reading, not convicti), not so much on the charge of incendiarism as for hatred of mankind [odio humani generis]. The victims perished amid mockery [text here uncertain]; some clothed in the skins of wild beasts were torn to pieces by dogs; others impaled on crosses in order to be set on fire to afford light by night after daylight had died. . . . Whence [after these cruelties] commiseration began to be felt for them, though guilty and deserving the severest penalties [quamquam adversus sotes et novissima exempla meritos], for men felt their destruction was not from considerations of public welfare but to gratify the cruelty of one person [Nero]."

This passage—the earliest classical account of the crucifixion and the only mention of Pilate in a heathen author—offers some difficulties which require to be glanced at. It is held by some that Tacitus contradicts himself by writing subdidit reos at the beginning and sotes at the end, but sotes does not mean guilty of incendiarism, but guilty from the point of view of the populace and deserving severe punishment for other supposed flagitia, not for arson. It is thus quite clear that Tacitus regards the Christians as innocent, though he had not the slightest kindly feeling toward them. Qui fatebantur means most naturally, "those who confessed to being Christians," though Arnold argues that confiteri or profiteri would be the correct word for professing a religion. But this would contradict both the sense and the other evidences of the context; for if fatebantur could mean "confessed to arson," then the whole body of Christians should have been arrested, and, further, this would have diverted suspicion from Nero, which was not the case according to Tacitus. Some Christians boldly asserted their religion, others no doubt, as in Bithynia, recanted before tribulation. By indicio eorum Ramsay (Christianity in the Rom Empire, 233) understands "on the information elicited at their trial," i.e. from information gathered by the inquisitors in the course of the proceedings. This incidental information implicated a large number of others, hence Ramsay prefers the MS reading coniuncti to the correction convicti. This is in order to explain the difficulty seemingly raised, viz. that the noblest Christians who boldly confessed their Christianity would seek to implicate brethren. But it is not impossible that some of these bold spirits did condescend to give the names of their coreligionists to the Rom courts. Hence Hardy (Christianity and the Rom Government, 67) prefers the more usual rendering of indicio eorum as "on information received from them." This may have occurred either (1) through torture, or (2) for promised immunity, or (3) on account of local jealousies. The early Christian communities were not perfect; party strife often ran high as at Corinth. And in a church like that of Rome composed of Jewish and pagan elements and undoubtedly more cosmopolitan than Corinth, a bitter sectarian spirit is easy to understand. This as a probable explanation is much strengthened and rendered almost certain by the words of Clement of Rome, who, writing to the church at Corinth (ch vi) from Rome only a generation after the persecution, and thus familiar with the internal history of the Rom ecclesia, twice asserts that a ᾠδὴ πόντος (psalē plēthos—Tac. multitudo ingens) of the Rom Christians suffered διὰ ζήλος (diā zēlos), "through jealousy or strife." The most natural and obvious meaning is "mutual or sectarian jealousy." But those who do not like this fact explain it as "by the jealousy of the Jews." Nothing is more easily refuted, for had it been the jealousy of the Jews Clement would not have hesitated one moment to say so. Those who are familiar with the Christian literature of that age know that the Christians were none too sensitive toward Jewish feelings. But the very fact that it was not the Jews made Clement rather modestly omit details the memory of which was probably still bearing fruit, even in his day. Once more corrupti, usually rendered "arrested," is taken by Hardy as "put upon their trial." He argues that this is more in accord with Tacitean usage. A "huge multitude" need not cause us to distrust Tacitus. It is a relative term; it was a considerable number to be so inhumanly butchered. There is some hesitation as to whether odio humani generis is objective or subjective genitive: "hatred of the Christians toward the human race" or "hatred of the human race toward the Christians." Grammatically of course it may be either, but that it is the former there can be no doubt: it was of the nature of a charge against Christians (Ramsay). See PERSECUTION.

Some have impugned the veracity of Tacitus in this very important passage, asserting that he had read back the feelings and state of affairs of his own day (half a century later) into this early Neronian period. This early appearance of Christianity as a distinct religion and its "huge multitude" seem impossible to some. Schiller has accordingly suggested that it was the Jews who as a body at Rome were persecuted, that the Christians being not yet distinct from Jews shared in the persecutions and suffered, not as Christians, but as Jews. But Tacitus is too trustworthy a historian to be guilty of such a confusion; besides, as proconsul in Asia he must have been more or less familiar with the origin of the Christian party. Also Poppaea was at this time mistress of Nero's affections and sufficiently influential with him to stay such a cruel persecution against those to whom she had a leaning and who claimed her as a proselyte. Again, the Jewish faith was certe licita and a recognized worship of the empire.

The next question is, Why were the Christians alone selected for persecution? That they were so singled out we know, but exactly for what reason is hard to say with certainty. A number of reasons no doubt contributed. (1) Farrar (Early Days, ch iv) sees "in the proselytism of Poppaea, guided by Jewish malice, the only adequate explanation of the first Christian persecution," and Lightfoot is of the same opinion, but this by itself is inadequate, though the Jews would be glad of an opportunity of taking revenge on their aggressive opponents. (2) Christians had already become in the eyes of the Rom authorities a distinct sect, either from the reports of the eastern provincial governors, where Christianity was making most headway, or from the attention attracted by Paul's first trial. They were thus the newest religious sect, and as such would serve as victims to appease deity and the populace. (3) Even if ingens multitudo be rhetorical, the Christians were no doubt considerably numerous in Rome. Their aggressiveness and active proselytism made their numbers even more formidable. (4) They were uncompromising in their expression of their beliefs; they looked for a consummation of the earth by fire and were also eagerly expecting the Parousia of their king to reconstitute society. These tenets together with their calm faith amid the despair of others would easily cast suspicion upon them. (5) For whatever reason, they had earned the opprobrium of the populace. "The hatred for the Jews passed over to hatred for the Christians" (Mommsen). A people whom the populace so detested must have fallen under the surveillance of the city police administration. (6) A large proportion of the Christian community at Rome would be non-Rom and so deserve no recognition of Rom privileges. These reasons together may or may not explain the singling-out of the Christians. At any rate they were chosen as scapegoats to serve Nero and his minion Tigellinus. The origin of the first persecution was thus purely accidental—in order to remove suspicion from Nero. It was not owing to any already formulated policy, neither through apprehension of any danger to the state, nor because the Christians were guilty of any crimes, though it gave an opportunity of investigation and accumulation of evidence. But accidental as this persecution was in origin, its consequences were of far-reaching importance. There are three principal views as to the date of the policy of proscription of the new faith by the Rom government: (1) the old view that persecution for the name, i.e. for the mere profession of Christianity, began under Trajan in 112 AD—a view now almost universally abandoned; (2) that of Ramsay (Christianity in the Rom Empire, 242 ff, and three arts. in Expos, 1893), who holds that this development from punishment for definite crimes (flagitia) to proscription "for the name" took place between 68 and 96 AD, and (3) that of Hardy (Christianity and the Rom Government, 77), Mommsen (Expos, 1893, 1-7) and Sanday (ib, 1894, 406 ff)—and adopted by the writer of this article—that the trial of the Christians under Nero resulted in the declaration of the mere profession of Christianity as a crime punishable by death. Tacitus apparently represents the persecution of the Christians as accidental and isolated and of brief duration (i.e.), while Suetonius (Ner. 16) mentions the punishment of Christians in a list of permanent police regulations for the maintenance of good order, into which it would be inconsistent to introduce an isolated case of procedure against the "baneful superstition" (Ramsay, op. cit., p. 230). But these two accounts are not contradictory, Tacitus giving the initial stage and Suetonius "a brief statement of the permanent administrative principle into which Nero's action ultimately resolved itself" (ib, 232). Nero's police administration, then, pursued as a permanent policy what was begun merely to avert suspicion from Nero. But as yet, according to Ramsay, Christians were not condemned as Christians, but on account of certain flagitia attaching to the profession and because the Rom police authorities had learned enough about the Christians to regard them as hostile to society. A trial still must be held and condemnation pronounced "in respect not of the name but of serious offences naturally connected with the name," viz. first incendiarism, which broke down, and secondly hostility to civilized society and charges of magic. The others agree so far with Ramsay as describing the first stages, but assert that odium humani generis was not of the nature of a definite charge, but disaffection to the social and political arrangements of the empire. At the outset a trial was needed, but soon as a consequence the trial could be dispensed with, the Christians being "recognized as a society whose principle might be summarized as odium generis humani." A trial became unnecessary; the religion itself involved the crimes, and as a religion it was henceforth proscribed. The surveillance over them and their punishment was left to the police administration which could step in at any time with severe measures or remain remiss, according as exigencies demanded. Christianity was henceforth a religio illicita. The Rom government was never a systematic persecutor. The persecution or non-persecution of Christianity depended henceforth on the mood of the reigning emperor, the character of his administration, the activity of provincial governors, the state of popular feeling against the new faith, and other local circumstances. There is no early evidence that the Neronian persecution extended beyond Rome, though of course the "example set by the emperor necessarily guided the action of all Rom officials." The stormy close of Nero's reign and the tumultuous days till the accession of Vespasian created a diversion in favor of Christianity. Orosius (Hist. vii.7) is too late an authority for a general persecution (per omnes provincias pari persecutione excruciaci imperavit; ipsum nomen extirpare conatus . . .). Besides, Paul after his acquittal seems to have prosecuted his missionary activity without any extraordinary hindrances, till he came to Rome the second time. This Neronian persecution is important for the history of Christianity: Nero commenced the principle of punishing Christians, and thus made a precedent for future rulers. Trouble first began in the world-capital; the next stage will be found in the East; and another in Africa and the West. But as yet persecution was only local. Nero was the first of the Rom persecutors who, like Herod Agrippa, came to a miserable end—a fact much dwelt upon by Lactantius and other Christian writers.

In the Flavian period no uniform imperial policy against Christianity can be discovered. According to Ramsay the Flavians developed the practice set by Nero from punishment of Christians for definite crimes to proscription of the name. But, as we have seen, the Neronian persecution settled the future attitude of the Rom state toward the new faith. The Flavians could not avoid following the precedent set by Nero. Christianity was spreading—esp. in the East and at Rome. We have no account of any persecution under Vespasian (though Hilary erroneously speaks of him as a persecutor along with Nero and Decius) and Titus, but it does not follow that none such took place. As the whole matter was left to the police administration, severity would be spasmodic and called forth by local circumstances. The fall of Jerus must have had profound influence both on Judaism and on Christianity. For the former it did what the fall of Rome under Goths, Vandals, and Germans did for the old Rom religion—it weakened the idea of a national God bound up with a political religion. The cleft between Judaism and its rival would now become greater. Christianity was relieved from the overpowering influence of a national center, and those Jews who now recognized the futility of political dreams would more readily join the Christian faith. Not only the distinction but the opposition and hostility would now be more apparent to outsiders, though Vespasian imposed the poll-tax on Jewish Christians and Jews alike. No memory of harshness against Christianity under Vespasian has survived. Ramsay (op. cit., 257) would interpret a mutilated passage of Suetonius (Vesp. 15) as implying Vespasian's reluctance to carry out justa supplicia against Christians.

2. The Flavian Period, 68-96 AD

Titus, "the darling of the human race," is not recorded as a persecutor, but his opinion of Judaism and Christianity as stated in the council of war before Jerus in 70 AD and recorded by Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii.30, 6) is interesting as an approval of the policy adopted by Nero. Severus' authority is undoubtedly Tacitus (Bernays and Mommsen). The authenticity of the speech as contradicting the account of Jos has been impugned; at any rate it represents the point of view of Tacitus. Titus then advocates the destruction of the temple in order that the religion of the Jews and the Christians may be more thoroughly extirpated (quo plenius Judaeorum et Christianorum religio tolleretur), since these religions though opposed to each other were of the same origin, the Christians having sprung from the Jews. If the root was removed the stem would readily perish (radice sublata, stirpem facile perituram). We know, however, of no active measures of Titus against either party, his short reign perhaps allowing no time for such.

It is Domitian who stands out prominently as the persecutor of this period, as Nero of the first period. His procedure against Christians was not an isolated act, but part of a general policy under which others suffered. His reign was a return to ancient principles. He attempted to reform morals, suppress luxury and vice, banish immoral oriental rites, actors, astrologers and philosophers. It was in his attempt to revive the national religion that he came in conflict with the universal religion. His own cousin, Flavius Clemens, was condemned apparently for Christianity (atheism), and his wife, Domitilla, was banished. The profession of Christianity was not sufficient for the condemnation of Rom citizens of high standing; hence the charges of atheism or majestas were put forward. Refusal to comply with the religion of the national gods could be brought under the latter. But for ordinary Rom citizens and for provincials the profession of Christianity merited death. No definite edict or general proscription was enacted; only the principle instituted by Nero was allowed to be carried out. There was, as Mommsen remarks, a standing proscription of Christians as of brigands, but harsh procedure against both was spasmodic and depended on the caprice or character of provincial governors. Domitian took one definite step against Christianity in establishing an easy test by which to detect those who were Christians and so facilitate inquiries. This test was the demand to worship the Genius of the emperor. This too was only part of Domitian's general policy of asserting his own dominus et deus title and emphasizing the imperial cult as a bond of political union. The Apocalypse reflects the sufferings of the church in this reign.

(1) Nerva and Trajan.—On the death of Domitian peace was restored to the Christian church which lasted throughout the brief reign of Nerva (96–98) and the first 13 years of Trajan. It is a curious fact that some of the best of the Rom emperors (Trajan, Marcus Aurelius, Decius and Diocletian) were harsh to the Christians, while some of the worst (as Commodus, Caracalla, Heliogabalus) left them in peace (see PERSECUTION, 17). Christianity had been rapidly spreading in the interval of tranquillity. Pliny became governor of Bithynia in 111 AD and found, esp. in the eastern part of his province, the temples almost deserted. Some Christians were brought before him and on established precedents were ordered to be executed for their religion. But Pliny soon discovered that many of both sexes and all ages, provincials and Rom citizens, were involved. The Rom citizens he sent to Rome for trial; but being of a humane disposition he shrank from carrying out the wholesale execution required by a consistent policy.

He wrote to Trajan telling him what he had already done, rather covertly suggesting tolerant measures. Should no distinction be made between old and young? Should pardon not be extended to those who recanted and worshipped the emperor's image and cursed Christ? Should mere profession (nomen ipsum) be a capital offence if no crimes could be proven, or should the crimes rather be punished that were associated with the faith (an flagitia cohaerentia nomini)? He then explains his procedure: he gave those who were accused an abundant opportunity of recanting; those who persisted in this faith were executed. He considered their "stubbornness and inflexible obstinacy" (pernitentiam certe et inflexibilem obstinationem) as in itself deserving punishment. But the administration having once interfered found plenty to do. An anonymous list of many names was handed in, most of whom, however, denied being Christians. Informers then put forward others who likewise denied belonging to the faith. Pliny was convinced their meetings were harmless, and on examination of two deaconesses under torture discovered nothing but a perverse extravagant superstition (sup. pravam immodicam). Trajan replied that no universal and definite rule could be laid down, apparently confirming the correctness of Pliny's action and perhaps disappointing Pliny in not yielding to his humane suggestions. Nevertheless, the emperor made three important concessions: (1) the Christians were not to be sought out by the police authorities, but if they were accused and convicted they must be punished; (2) anonymous information against them was not to be accepted; (3) even those suspected of flagitia in the past were to be pardoned on proving they were not Christians or on renouncing Christianity. Some regard this rescript of Trajan as the first official and legal authorization to proscribe Christianity; but we have already seen that Christianity as such was proscribed as a result of the Neronian investigations. Besides, there is not the slightest trace of any new principle of severity, either in the letters of Pliny or in the rescript of Trajan. The persecution of Christianity had been "permanent" like that of highwaymen, but not systematic or general. Neither was Trajan's rescript an edict of toleration, though on the whole it was favorable to the Christians in minimizing the dangers to which they were exposed. The question was as yet purely one of administration.

Trajan initiated no procedure against Christians—in fact rather discouraged any, asking his lieutenant to close his eyes to offenders—and Pliny consulted him in the hope of obtaining milder treatment for the Christians by putting in question form what he really wished to be approved. Trajan's rescript "marks the end of the old system of uncompromising hostility" (see PERSECUTION, 15).

(2) Hadrian.—The reign of Hadrian (117–38) was a period of toleration for the Christians. He was no bigot, but tolerant and eclectic, inquiring into all religions and initiated into several mysteries and willing to leave religion an open question. In Asia, where Christianity was making most progress, a state of terrorism was imminent if delatores were encouraged against Christians making a profession of delatio (giving information). As we saw in the letter of Pliny, even non-Christians were accused, and any professing Christian could be threatened by these informers in order to secure a bribe for proceeding no farther. Licinius Silvanus Granius, like Pliny, found himself involved in difficulties and wrote to Hadrian for advice. Hadrian's rescript in reply is addressed to Granius' successor, Minucius Fundanus, the proconsul of Asia, about 124 AD. The genuineness of this important document, though impugned by Overbeck, Keim and Lipsius, is vouched for by Mommsen, Hardy, Lightfoot and Ramsay. Indeed, it is much easier accounted for as authentic than as a forgery, for who but the broad-minded Hadrian could have written such a rescript? Apparently the questions put by the proconsul must have been of a similar nature to those extant of Pliny. The answer of Hadrian is a decided step in favor of Christianity and goes beyond that of Trajan: (1) information is not to be passed over (a) lest the innocent suffer (as was the case under Pliny), and (b) lest informers should make a trade of lodging accusations; (2) provincials accusing Christians must give proof that the accused have committed something illegal; (3) mere petitions and acclamations against the Christians are not to be admitted; (4) a prosecutor on failing to make good his case is to be punished. These terms would greatly increase the risk for informers and lessen the dangers for Christians. That the name is a crime is not admitted, neither is this established principle rescinded. It is quite possible that Hadrian's rescript "gave a certain stimulus toward the employment of the more definite and regular legal procedure."

(3) Antoninus Pius (138-61).—The liberal policy of Trajan and Hadrian was continued by Antoninus, though persecution occurred in his reign in which Ptolemaeus and Lucius were executed at Rome and Polycarp at Smyrna. But he decidedly confirmed Hadrian's policy of protecting the Christians uncondemned against mob violence in his letters to Larissae, Athens, Thessalonica and to "all the Hellenes." As at Smyrna, his "rescript was in advance of public feeling," and so was disregarded. Anonymous delation was also repressed.

(4) Marcus Aurelius (161-80).—Under Aurelius a strong reaction set in affecting the Christians, caused partly by the frontier disasters and devastating pestilence and partly by Aurelius' policy of returning to ancient principles and reviving the Rom national religion. In this reign we find persecution extending to the West (Gaul) and to Africa—a step toward the general persecutions of the next century. Though no actual change was made by Aurelius, the leniency of the last three reigns is absent. No general edict or definite rescript of persecution was issued; the numerous martyrdoms recorded in this reign are partly due to the fuller accounts and the rise of a Christian literature. Christianity in itself still constituted a crime, and the obstinacy (παράταξις, παράταξις) of Christians in itself deserved punishment. Aurelius seems to have actually rebuked the severity of the Rom governor at Lugdunum, and to have further discouraged the trade of informers against Christians. Tertullian actually styles him as debellator Christianorum ("protector of Christians"). We find as yet therefore no systematic or serious attempt to extirpate the new faith. The central government "was all this time without a permanent or steady policy toward the Christians. It had not yet made up its mind" (Hardy).

Under the rule of Commodus (180-92) Christians again enjoyed a respite. The net result of the collisions between the new faith and the government in this period is somewhat differently estimated by Ramsay and by Hardy. The latter thinks (Christianity and Rom Government, 156 f) that Ramsay "has to some extent antedated the existence of anything like a policy of proscription," due to antedating the time when Christianity was regarded as a serious political danger. Hardy thinks that the Christian organization was never suspected as more than an abstract danger during the first two centuries. Had Rome taken the view that Christianity in its organization was a real danger and an imperium in imperio, she must have started a systematic exterminating policy during a period when Christianity could have least withstood it. When the empire did—as in the 3d cent.—apprehend the practical danger and took the severest general measures, Christianity was already too strong to be harmed, and we shall find the empire henceforth each time worsted and finally offering terms.

In the next period the insecurity of the throne, when in less than 100 years about a score of candidates wore the purple and almost each new emperor began a new dynasty, enabled Christianity to spread practically untroubled. Further divergences in its favor were created by those fierce barbarian wars and by the necessity of renewed vigilance at the frontier posts. The Christians' aloofness from political strife and their acquiescence in each new dynasty brought them generally into no collision with new rulers. Further, the fact that many of these emperors were non-Rom provincials, or foreigners who had no special attachment to the old Rom faith, and were eclectic in their religious views, was of much importance to the new eastern faith. Moreover, some of the emperors proved not only not hostile to Christianity, but positively friendly. In this period we find no severe (except perhaps that of Decius) and certainly no protracted persecution. The Christian church herself was organized on the principle of the imperial government, and made herself thus strong and united, so that when the storm did come she remained unshaken. In 202 Severus started a cruel persecution in Africa and Egypt, but peace was restored by the savage Caracalla (lacte Christiano educatus: Tert.). Heliogabalus assisted Christianity indirectly (1) by the degradation of Rom religion, and (2) by tolerance. According to one writer he proposed to fuse Christianity, Judaism and Samaritanism into one religion. Alexander Severus was equally tolerant and syncretic, setting up in his private chapel images of Orpheus, Apollonius, Abraham, and Christ, and engraving the golden rule on his palace walls and public buildings. He was even credited with the intention of erecting a temple to Christ. Local persecution broke out under Maximin the Thracian. The first general persecution was that of Decius, in which two features deserve notice: (1) that death was not the immediate result of Christian profession, but every means was employed to induce Christians to recant; (2) Rom authorities already cognizant of the dangers of Christian organization directed their efforts esp. against the officers of the church. Gallus continued this policy, and Valerian, after first stopping persecution, tried to check the spread of the worship by banishing bishops and closing churches, and later enacted the death penalty. Gallienus promulgated what was virtually the first edict of toleration, forbade persecution and restored the Christian endowments. Christianity now entered upon a period of 40 years' tranquillity: as outward dangers decreased, less desirable converts came within her gates and her adherents were overtaken in a flood of worldliness, stayed only by the persecution of Diocletian.

Like some other persecutors, Diocletian was one of the ablest Rom rulers. He was not disposed to proceed against the Christians, but was finally driven to harsh measures by his son-in-law Galerius. The first edict, February 24, 303, was not intended to exterminate Christianity, but to check its growth and weaken its political influence, and was directed principally against Bibles, Christian assemblies and churches. The second was against church organization. A third granted freedom to those who recanted, but sought to compel the submission of recalcitrants by tortures—a partial confession of failure on the part of the imperial government. Bloodshed was avoided and the death penalty omitted. But a fourth edict issued by Maximin prescribed the death penalty and required the act of sacrifice to the gods. In the same year (304) Diocletian, convinced of the uselessness of these measures, stayed the death penalty. The change of policy on the part of the emperor and his abdication next year were virtually a confession that the Galilean had conquered. After the persecution had raged 8 years (or 10, if we include local persecutions after 311), Galerius, overtaken by a loathsome disease, issued from Nicomedia with Constantine and Licinius the first general edict of toleration, April 30, 311. Christianity had thus in this period proved a state within a state; it was finally acknowledged as a religio licita, though not yet on equality with paganism.

5. Diocletian till First General Edict of Toleration, 284-311 AD

In the next period the first religious wars began, and Christianity was first placed on an equal footing with its rival, then above it, and finally it became the state religion of both West and East. As soon as Christianity had gained tolerance it immediately became an intolerant, bitter persecutor, both of its old rival and of heresy. Constantine, having defeated Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge (October 27, 312), became sole ruler of the West, and, in conjunction with his eastern colleague Licinius, issued the famous edict of toleration from Milan, March 30, 313, by which all religions were granted equal tolerance, and Christianity was thus placed on an equal footing with heathenism. Constantine's favors toward the Christian faith were largely political; he wished simply to be on the winning side. With each fresh success he inclined more toward Christianity, though his whole life was a compromise. His dream was to weld pagan and Christian into one society under the same laws; he in no way prohibited paganism. With the founding of Constantinople Christianity became practically the state religion—an alliance with baneful consequences for Christianity. It now began to stifle the liberty of conscience for which it had suffered so much, and orthodoxy began its long reign of intolerance. The sons of Constantine inherited their father's cruel nature with his nominal Christianity. Constantine had left the old and the new religions on equal footing: his sons began the work of exterminating paganism by violence. Constantius when sole emperor, inheriting none of his father's compromise or caution, and prompted by women and bishops, published edicts demanding the closing of the temples and prohibiting sacrifices. Wise provincial administrators hesitated to carry out these premature measures. Christianity was now in the ascendancy and on the aggressive. It not only persecuted paganism, but the dominant Christian party proscribed its rival—this time heterodoxy banishing orthodoxy. The violence and intolerance of the sons of Constantine justified the mild reaction under Julian the Apostate—the most humane member of the Constantine family. He made a "romantic" effort to reestablish the old religion, and while proclaiming tolerance for Christianity, he endeavored to weaken it by heaping ridicule upon its doctrines, rescinding the privileges of the clergy, prohibiting the church from receiving many bequests, removing Christians from public positions and forbidding the teaching of classics in Christian schools lest Christian tongues should become better fitted to meet heathen arguments, and lastly by adding renewed splendor to pagan service as a counter-attraction. But the moral power of Christianity triumphed. Dying on a battle-field, where he fought the Persians, he is said (but not on good authority) to have exclaimed, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilean" (νενίκηκας Γαλιλαίε, νενίκηκας Γαλιλαίε). For a brief period after his death there was religious neutrality. Gratian—at the instigation of Ambrose—departed from this neutrality, removed the statue of Victory from the senate-house, refused the title and robes of pontifex maximus, prohibited bloody sacrifices, and dealt a severe blow to the old faith by withdrawing some of the treasury grants, thereby making it dependent on the voluntary system. Theodosius I, or the Great, adopted a strenuous religious policy against both heresy and paganism. His intolerance must be attributed to Ambrose—a bigot in whose eyes Jews, heretics and pagans alike had no rights. Systematic proscription of paganism began. In 381 Theodosius denied the right of making a will to apostates from Christianity, in 383 the right of inheritance, in 391 heathen public worship was interdicted, in 392 several acts of both private and public heathen worship were forbidden, and greater penalties were attached to the performance of sacrifice. Christian vandalism became rampant; all kinds of violence and confiscation were resorted to, monks or priests often leading the populace. For the present the West did not suffer so severely from fanatic iconoclasm. Under the sons of Theodosius the suppression of paganism was steadily pursued. Honorius in the West excluded (408 AD) pagans from civil and military offices; in a later edict (423) the very existence of paganism is doubted (paganos . . . quamquam iam nullos esse credamus). That heathenism was still an attraction is proved by the repeated laws against apostasy. Under Valentinian III (423-55) and Theodosius II, laws were enacted for the destruction of temples or their conversion into Christian churches. In the western empire heathenism was persecuted till the end, and its final overthrow was hastened by the extinction of the western empire (476). In the East Justinian closed the heathen schools of philosophy at Athens (529 AD), and in a despotic spirit prohibited even heathen worship in private under pain of death.

V. Victory of Christianity and Conversion of the Roman Empire.—Christianity was now acknowledged as the religion of both East and West. It had also grown strong enough to convert the barbarians who overran the West. It restrained and educated them under the lead of the papacy, so that its conquests now extended beyond the Roman empire.

Merivale (preface to Conversion of Rom Empire) attributes the conversion of the Roman empire to four causes: (1) the external evidence of apparent fulfilment of prophecy and the evidence of miracles, (2) internal evidence as satisfying the spiritual wants of the empire and offering a Redeemer, (3) the example of the pure lives and heroic deaths of the early Christians, and (4) the success which attended the Christian cause under Constantine. Gibbon (ch xv of Decline and Fall) seeks to account for the phenomenal success of Christianity in the empire by (1) the zeal and enthusiasm of the early Christians, (2) the belief of Christianity in immortality with both future rewards and future retributions, (3) miracles, (4) the high ethical code and pure morals of professing Christians, and (5) strong ecclesiastical organization on imperial patterns. But neither of these lists of causes seems to account satisfactorily for the progress and success of the religion of Jesus.

This was due in the first place to negative causes —the moral and spiritual bankruptcy of the antique world, the internal rottenness and decay of heathen systems. All ancient national religions

1. Negative Causes had failed and were abandoned alike by philosophers and the masses, and no universal religion for humanity was offered except by Christianity. Worship had degenerated into pure formalism which brought no comfort to the heart. An imperious demand for revelation was felt which no philosophy or natural religion could satisfy.

But it was to positive causes chiefly that the success of the new religion was due, among which were the zeal, enthusiasm, and moral earnestness of the Christian faith. Its

2. Positive Causes sterling qualities were best shown in persecution and the heroic deaths of its adherents. Paganism, even with the alliance of the civil power and the prestige of its romantic past, could not withstand persecution. And when heathenism was thrown back on the voluntary system, it could not prosper as Christianity did with its ideals of self-sacrifice. The earnestness of early Christianity was raised to its highest power by its belief in a near second coming of the Lord and the end of the aeon. The means of propagation greatly helped the spread of Christianity, the principal means being the exemplary lives of its professors. It opposed moral and spiritual power to political. Besides, Christianity when once studied by the thinkers of the ancient world was found to be in accord with the highest principles of reason and Nature. But "the chief cause of its success was the congruity of its teaching with the spiritual nature of mankind" (Lecky). There was a deep-seated earnestness in a large section of the ancient world to whom Christianity offered the peace, comfort and strength desired. It was possessed also of an immense advantage over all competing religions of the Rom empire in being adapted to all classes and conditions and to all changes. There was nothing local or national about it; it gave the grandest expression to the contemporary ideal of brotherhood. Its respect for woman and its attraction for this sex gained it many converts who brought honor to it; in this respect it was far superior to its greatest rival, Mithraism. In an age of vast social change and much social distress it appealed to the suffering by its active self-denial for the happiness of others. As an ethical code it was equal and superior to the noblest contemporary systems. One incalculable advantage it could show above all religions and philosophies—the charm and power of an ideal perfect life, in which the highest manhood was held forth as an incentive to nobler living. The person of Jesus was an ideal and moral dynamic for both philosopher and the common man, far above any abstract virtue. "It was because it was true to the moral sentiments of the age, because it represented faithfully the supreme type of excellence to which men were then tending, because it corresponded with their religious wants, aims and emotions, because the whole spiritual being could then expand and expatiate under its influence that it planted its roots so deeply in the hearts of men" (Lecky, Hist of European Morals, ch iii). Add to all this the favorable circumstances mentioned under "Preparation for Christianity," above (II), and we can understand how the Rom empire became the kingdom of Christ.

LITERATURE

In the present art. we shall treat (I) Rom Private Law and (II) Criminal Law only, reserving a consideration of the development of the principles of constitutional law for the art. on ROME, since it is so closely interwoven with the political history of the state.

It will be necessary to confine the discussion of private law to its external history, without attempting to deal with the substance of the law itself. In the treatment of criminal law attention will be directed chiefly to the constitutional guaranties which were intended to protect Rom citizens against arbitrary and unjust punishments, these being one of the most important privileges of Rom citizenship (see CITIZENSHIP).

Rom law found its original source in the family as a corporation. The proprietary rights of the pater familias as representative of this primitive unit of organization are a fundamental element in private law, and the scope of the criminal jurisdiction of the state was limited by the power of life and death which was exercised by the head of the family over those who were under his authority, by virtue of which their transgressions were tried before the domestic tribunal.

It is likewise of fundamental importance to recall the fact that before the earliest period in the history of Rom law of which we have positive information, there must have been a time when a large number of different classes of crime were punished by the priests as sacrilege, in accordance with divine law (fas), by putting the offender to death as a sacrifice to the offended deity, while restitution for private violence or injustice was left to private initiative to seek. For a law of the Twelve Tables that the person guilty of cutting another's grain by night should be hanged, as an offering to Ceres, is a survival of the older religious character of condemnation to death, and the right to kill the nocturnal thief and the adulterer caught in the act may be cited as survivals of primitive private vengeance. The secular conception of crime as an offence against the welfare of the state gradually superseded the older conception, while private law arose when the community did away with the disorder incident to the exercise of self-help in attempting to secure justice, by insisting that the parties to a disagreement should submit their claims to an arbitrator.

I. Roman Private Law.—Rom private law was at first a body of unwritten usages handed down by tradition in the patrician families.

1. The Twelve Tables The demand of the plebeians for the publication of the law resulted in the adoption of the famous Twelve Tables (449 BC), which was looked upon by later authorities as the source of all public and private law (quae nunc quoque in hoc immenso altiarum super alias acervatarum legum cumulo fons omnium publici privatique est iuris: Livy iii.34, 6), although it was not a scientific or comprehensive code of all the legal institutions of the time. This primitive system of law was made to expand to meet the growing requirements of the republican community chiefly by means of interpretation and the ius honorarium, which corresponds to equity.

The function of interpretation may be defined by mentioning the principal elements in civil procedure.

2. Civil Procedure The praetor, or magistrate, listened to the claims of the litigants and prepared an outline of the disputed issues, called a formula, which was submitted to the judex, or arbitrator, a jury, as it were, consisting of one man, who decided the questions of fact involved in the case. Neither praetor nor judex had special legal training. The court had recourse, therefore, for legal enlightenment to those who had gained distinction as authorities on the law, and the opinions, or responsa, of these scholars (jurisprudentes) formed a valuable commentary on the legal institutions of the time. In this way a body of rules was amassed by interpretative adaptation which the authors of the Twelve Tables would never have recognized.

Ius honorarium derived its name from the circumstance that it rested upon the authority of magistrates (honor=magistracy). In this respect and because it was composed of orders issued for the purpose of affording relief in cases for which the existing law did not make adequate provision, this second agency for legal expansion may be compared with English equity. These orders issued by the praetors had legal force during the tenure of their office only; but those the expediency of which had been established by this period of trial were generally reissued by succeeding magistrates from year to year, so that in time a large, but uniform body of rules, subject to annual renewal, formed the greater part of the edict which was issued by the praetors before entering upon their term of office. By these means Rom law maintained a proper balance between elasticity and rigidity.

3. Jus honorarium After the institution of the praetor peregrinus (241 BC), who heard cases in which one or both of the parties were foreigners, a series of similar edicts proceeded from those who were chosen to this tribunal. The annual edicts of the praetor peregrinus became an important means for broadening Rom law, for the strangers who appeared in the court of this magistrate were mostly Greeks from Southern Italy, so that the principles of law which were gradually formulated as a basis for proceedings were largely an embodiment of the spirit of Gr law.

4. The praetor peregrinus Direct legislation superseded the other sources of law under the empire, taking the form, occasionally, of bills ratified by the people (leges), but usually of enactments of the senate (senatus consultum), or imperial ordinances. The

5. Imperial Ordinances latter, which eventually prevailed to the exclusion of all other types, may be classified as edicta, which were issued by the emperor on the analogy of the similar orders of the republican magistrates, decreta, or decisions of the imperial tribunal, which had force as precedents, and rescripta, which were replies by the emperor to requests for the interpretation of the law. All these acts of imperial legislation were known as constitutiones.

In the 2d cent. Salvius Julianus was commissioned to invest the praetorian edict with definite form. The Institutes of Gaius appearing about the same time became a model for subsequent textbooks on jurisprudence (Gaii institutionum commentarii quattuor, discovered by Niebuhr in 1816 at Verona in a palimpsest).

6. Golden Age of Juristic Literature This was the Golden Age of juristic literature. A succession of able thinkers, among whom Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian, Modestinus, and Gaius hold foremost rank (cf Codex Theodosianus I, 4, 3), applied to the incoherent mass of legal material the methods of scientific investigation, developing a system of Rom law and establishing a science of jurisprudence.

The period of the later empire was characterized by various attempts at codification which culminated in the final treatment of the body of Rom law under Justinian. The work of the board of eminent jurists to whom this vast undertaking was intrusted was published in three parts:

7. Codification in the Later Empire (1) the Code, which contains a selection of the imperial enactments since Hadrian in twelve books, (2) the Digest or Pandects, which is composed of extracts from the juristic literature in fifty books, and (3) the Institutes, which is a textbook in four books. In this form mainly Rom private law has come down to modern times, and has become, in the words of an eminent authority (Bryce, Studies in History and Jurisprudence, Oxford, 1901), next to the Christian religion, the most plentiful source of the rules governing actual conduct throughout Western Europe.

II. Roman Criminal Law.—In the royal period criminal jurisdiction, in so far as it was a function of secular administration, belonged by right to the king. The titles quaestores parricidii and duumviri perduellionis, belonging to officials to whom the royal authority in these matters was occasionally delegated, indicate the nature of the earliest crimes brought under secular jurisdiction. The royal prerogative passed to the republican magistrates, and embraced, besides the right to punish crimes, the power to compel obedience to their own decrees (coercitio) by means of various penalties.

But the right of the people to final jurisdiction in cases involving the life or civil status of citizens was established by an enactment (lex Valeria) which is said to have been proposed by one of the first consuls (509 BC), and which granted the right of appeal to the assembly (provocatio) against the execution of a capital or other serious penalty pronounced by a magistrate (Cicero De Re Publica ii.31, 54; Livy H.S. 2; Dionysius v.19). This right of appeal was reinforced or extended by subsequent enactments (leges Valeriae) in 449 and 299 BC. It was valid against penalties imposed by virtue of the coercive power of the magistrates as well as those based upon a regular criminal charge. Generally the magistrates made no provisional sentence of their own, but brought their charges directly before the people.

1. Jurisdiction in the Royal Period (1) Penalties.—The death penalty was practically abrogated in republican times by allowing the accused

2. Right of Appeal

(1) Penalties.—The death penalty was practically abrogated in republican times by allowing the accused the alternative of voluntary exile. The Romans rarely employed imprisonment as a punishment. The imposition of fines above a certain amount was made subject to the right of appeal. At first the dictator possessed absolute power of life and death over the citizens, but this authority was limited, probably about 300 BC (Livy xxvii.6, 5), by being made subject to the right of appeal.

(2) The Porcian law.—The right of appeal to the people was valid within the city and as far as the first milestone; and although it was never extended beyond this limit, yet its protection was virtually secured for all Rom citizens, wherever they might be, by the provision of the Porcian law (of unknown date), which established their right to trial at Rome. In consequence of this a distinction of great importance was created in criminal procedure in the provinces, since Rom citizens were sent to Rome for trial in all serious cases, while other persons were subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the municipalities, except when the governor summoned them before his own tribunal.

of 70 BC provided for the equal representation of all three classes of the people in the courts. There were then about 1,080 names on the list of available jurors, of whom 75 seem to have been chosen for each trial (Cicero In Pisonem 40). Caesar abolished the plebeian jurors (Suetonius Caesar 41). Augustus restored the representatives of the third class (Suetonius Aug. 32), but confined their action to civil cases of minor importance. He likewise excused the members of the senate from service as jurors.

The system of criminal courts (quaestiones perpetuae) diminished in importance under the empire and finally disappeared toward the close of the 2d cent. Their place was taken by the senate under the presidency of a consul, the emperor, and eventually by imperial officials by delegated authority from the emperor. In the first case the ROMAN FORUM.

The exercise of popular jurisdiction in criminal matters was gradually curtailed by the establishment of permanent courts (quaestiones

3. Popular Jurisdiction Curtailed perpetuae) by virtue of laws by which the people delegated their authority to judge certain classes of cases. The first of these courts was authorized in 149 BC for the trial of charges of extortion brought against provincial governors. Compensation was the main purpose of accusers in bringing charges before this and later permanent courts, and for this reason, perhaps, the procedure was similar to that which was employed in civil cases. A praetor presided over the tribunal; a number of judices took the place of the single juror. The laws by which Sulla reorganized the systems of criminal jurisdiction provided for seven courts dealing individually with extortion, treason, peculation, corrupt electioneering practices, murder, fraud, and assault.

The judices, or jurors, were originally chosen from the senate. A law proposed by C. Gracchus transferred membership in all the juries to the equestrian class. Sulla replenished the senate

4. Jurors by admitting about 300 members of the equestrian class, and then restored to it the exclusive control of the juries. But a judicial law senate stood in somewhat the same relation to the presiding consul as the jurors in the permanent

5. Disappearance of Criminal Courts courts to the praetor. But the emperor and imperial officials decided without the help of a jury, so that after the 3d cent., when the judicial competence of the senate was gradually lost, trial by jury ceased to exist.

An important innovation in the judicial system of the empire was the principle of appeal from the decision of lower courts to higher tribunals. For the emperors and eventually their delegates, chiefly the praefectus urbi and praefectus praetorio, heard appeals from Rom and Italian magistrates and provincial governors.

Under the early empire, provincial governors were generally under obligation to grant the demand of Rom citizens for the privilege

6. Right of Trial at Rome of trial at Rome (Digest xlviii.6, 7), although there appear to have been some exceptions to this rule (Pliny, Epist. ii.11; Digest xlviii.8, 16). Lysias, tribune of the cohort at Jerus, sent St. Paul as prisoner to Caesarea, the capital of the province, so that Felix the procurator might determine what was to be done in his case, inasmuch as he was a Rom citizen (Acts 23 27), and two years later St. Paul asserted his privilege of being tried at Rome by the emperor for the same reason (25 11.21).

Rom citizens who were sent to Rome might be brought either before the senate or emperor, but cognizance of these cases by the imperial tribunal was more usual, and finally supplanted entirely that of the senate, the formula of appeal becoming proverbial: cives Romanus sum, provoco ad Caesarem (Kaisara epikaloumai: Acts 25 11).

As Rom citizenship became more and more widely extended throughout the empire its relative value diminished, and it is obvious that many of the special privileges, such as the right of trial at Rome, which were attached to it in the earlier period must have been gradually lost. It became customary for the emperors to delegate their power of final jurisdiction over the lives of citizens (ius gladii) to the provincial governors, and finally, after Rom citizenship had been conferred upon the inhabitants of the empire generally by Caracalla, the right of appeal to Rome remained the privilege of certain classes only, such as senators, municipal decurions (Digest xlviii.19, 27), officers of equestrian rank in the army, and centurions (Dio Cassius lii.22, 33).

LITERATURE

This is the greatest, in every sense, of the apostolic letters of St. Paul; in scale, in scope, and in its wonderful combination of doctrinal, ethical and administrative wisdom and power. In some respects the later Epp., Eph and Col, lead us to even higher and deeper arcana of revelation, and they, like Rom, combine with the exposition of truth a luminous doctrine of duty. But the range of Rom is larger in both directions, and presents us also with noble and far-reaching discussions of Christian polity, instructions in spiritual utterance and the like, to which those Epp. present no parallel, and which only the Corinthian Epp. rival.

No suspicion on the head of the genuineness of the Ep. exists which needs serious consideration.

Signs of the influence of the Ep. can be traced, at least very probably, in the NT itself; in 1 Pet, and, as some think, in Jas. But in our opinion Jas was the earlier writing, and Lightfoot has given strong grounds for the belief that the paragraph on faith and justification (Jas 2) has no reference to perversions of Pauline teaching, but deals with rabbinism. Clement of Rome repeatedly quotes Rom, and so do Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin. Marcion includes it in his list of Pauline Epp., and it is safe to say in general Rom "has been recognized in the Christian church as long as any collection of St. Paul's Epp. has been extant" (A. Robertson, in HDB, s.v.). But above all other evidences it testifies to itself. The fabrication of such a writing, with its close and complex thought, its power and marked originality of treatment, its noble morale, and its spiritual elevation and ardor, is nothing short of a moral impossibility. A mighty mind and equally great heart live in every page, and a soul exquisitely sensitive and always intent upon truth and holiness. Literary personation is an art which has come to anything like maturity only in modern times, certainly not before the Renaissance. In a fully developed form it is hardly earlier than the 19th cent. And even now who can point to a consciously personated authorship going along with high moral principle and purpose?

The question remains, however, whether, accepting the Ep. in block as Pauline, we have it, as to details, just as it left the author's hands. Particularly, some phenomena of the text of the last two chapters invite the inquiry. We may—in our opinion we must—grant those chapters to be Pauline. They breathe St. Paul in every sentence. But do they read precisely like part of a letter to Rome? For example, we have a series of names (16 1–15), representing a large circle of personally known and loved friends of the writer, a much longer list than any other in the Epp., and all presumably—on the theory that the passage is integral to the Ep.—residents at Rome. May not such a paragraph have somehow crept in, after date, from another writing? Might not a message to Philippian, Thessalonian or Ephesian friends, dwellers in places where St. Paul had already established many intimacies, have fallen out of its place and found lodgment by mistake at the close of this letter to Rome? It seems enough to reply by one brief statement of fact. We possess some 300 MSS of Rom, and not one of these, so far as it is uninjured, fails to give the Ep. complete, all the chapters as we have them, and in the present order (with one exception, that of the final doxology). It is observable meanwhile that the difficulty of supposing St. Paul to have had a large group of friends living at Rome, before his own arrival there, is not serious. To and from Rome, through the whole empire, there was a perpetual circulation of population. Suppose Aquila and Priscilla (e.g.) to have recently returned (Acts 18 2) to Rome from Ephesus, and suppose similar migrations from Greece or from Asia Minor to have taken place within recent years; we can then readily account for the greetings of Rom 16.

Lightfoot has brought it out in an interesting way (see his Philippians, on 4 22) that many of the names (e.g. Amplias, Urbanus, Tryphena) in Rom 16 are found at Rome, in inscriptions of the early imperial age, in cemeteries where members of the widely scattered "household of Caesar" were interred. This at least suggests the abundant possibility that the converts and friends belonging to the "household" who, a very few years later, perhaps not more than three, were around him at Rome when he wrote to Philippi (Phil 4 22), and sent their special greeting ("chiefly they") to the Philippians, were formerly residents at Philippi, or elsewhere in Macedonia, and had moved thence to the capital not long before the apostle wrote to the Romans. A. Robertson (ut supra) comes to the conclusion, after a careful review of recent theories, "that the case for transferring this section . . . from its actual connection to a lost Ep. to Ephesus is not made out."

Two points of detail in the criticism of the text of Rom may be noted. One is that the words "at Rome" (1 7.15) are omitted in a very few MSS, in a way to remind us of the interesting phenomenon of the omission of "at Ephesus" (Eph 1 1 m). But the evidence for this omission being original is entirely inadequate. The fact may perhaps be accounted for by a possible circulation of Rom among other mission churches as an Ep. of universal interest. This would be much more likely if the MSS and other authorities in which the last two chapters are missing were identical with those which omit "at Rome," but this is not the case.

The other and larger detail is that the great final doxology (16 25-27) is placed by many cursives at the end of ch 14, and is omitted entirely by three MSS and by Marcion. The leading uncials and a large preponderance of ancient evidence place it where we have it. It is quite possible that St. Paul may have reissued Rom after a time, and may only then have added the doxology, which has a certain resemblance in manner to his later (captivity) style. But it is at least likely that dogmatic objections led Marcion to delete it, and that his action accounts for the other phenomena which seem to witness against its place at the finale.

It is worth noting that Hort, a singularly fearless, while sober student, defends without reserve the entirety of the Ep. as we have it, or practically so. See his essay printed in Lightfoot's Bib. Studies.

We can fix the proximate date with fair certainty within reasonable limits. We gather from 15 19 that St. Paul, when he wrote, was in the act of closing his work in the East and was looking definitely westward.

But he was first about (15 25.26) to revisit Jerus with his collection, mainly made in Macedonia and Achaia, for the "poor saints." Placing these allusions side by side with the references in 1 and 2 Cor to the collection and its conveyance, and again with the narrative of Acts, we may date Rom very nearly at the same time as 2 Cor, just before the visit to Jerus narrated in Acts 20, etc. The year may be fixed with great probability as 58 A.D. This estimate follows the lines of Lightfoot's chronology, which Robertson (ut supra) supports. More recent schemes would move the date back to 56 A.D.

"The reader's attention is invited to this date. Broadly speaking, it was about 30 years after the most after the Crucifixion. Let anyone in middle life reflect on the freshness in memory of events, whether public or private, which 30 years ago made any marked impression on his mind. Let him consider how concrete and vivid still are the prominent personages of 30 years ago, many of whom of course are still with us. And let him transfer this thought to the 1st cent., and to the time of our Ep. Let him remember that we have at least this one great Christian writing composed, for certain, within such easy reach of the very lifetime of Jesus Christ when His contemporary friends were still, in numbers, alive and active. Then let him open the Ep. afresh, and read, as if for the first time, its estimate of Jesus Christ—a Figure then of no legendary past, with its halo, but of the all but present day. Let him note that this transcendent estimate comes to us conveyed in the vehicle not of poetry and rhetoric, but of a treatise pregnant with masterly argument and admirable practical wisdom, tolerant and comprehensive. And we think that the reader will feel that the result of his meditations on date and circumstances is reassuring as to the solidity of the historic basis of the Christian faith" (from the present writer's introduction to the Ep. in the Temple Bible; see also his Light from the First Days: Short Studies in 1 Thess).

With confidence we may name Corinth as the place of writing. St. Paul was at the time in some "city" (16 23). He was staying with

4. Place of Writing one Gaius, or Caius (ib), and we find in 1 Cor 1 14 a Gaius, closely connected with St. Paul, and a Corinthian.

He commends to the Romans the deaconess Phoebe, attached to "the church at Cenchreae" (16 1), presumably a place near that from which he was writing; and Cenchreae was the southern part of Corinth.

The first advent of Christianity to Rome is unrecorded, and we know very little of its early progress. Visiting Romans (ἐπίδημοῦντες, ἐπίδημοῦντες), both Jews and proselytes, appear at Pentecost (Acts 2 10), and

5. Destination no doubt some of these returned home believers. In Acts 18 2 we have Aquila and Priscilla, Jews, evidently Christians, "lately come from Italy," and probably from Rome. But we know practically nothing else of the story previous to this Ep., which is addressed to a mission church obviously important and already spiritually advanced. On the other hand (a curious paradox in view of the historical development of Rom Christianity), there is no allusion in the Ep. to church organization. The Christian ministry (apart from St. Paul's own apostleship) is not even mentioned. It may fairly be said to be incredible that if the legend of St. Peter's long episcopate were historical, no allusion whatever to his work, influence and authority should be made. It is at least extremely difficult to prove that he was even present in Rome till shortly before his martyrdom, and the very ancient belief that Peter and Paul founded the Rom church is more likely to have had its origin in their martyrdoms there than in St. Peter's having in any sense shared in the early evangelization of the city.

As to Rome itself, we may picture it at the date of the Ep. as containing, with its suburbs, a closely massed population of perhaps 800,000 people; a motley host of many races, with a strong oriental element, among which the Jews were present as a marked influence, despised and sometimes dreaded, but always attracting curiosity.

The Ep. was written in Gr, the "common dialect," the Gr of universal intercourse of that age.

6. Language One naturally asks, why not in Lat, when the message was addressed to the supreme Lat city? The large majority of Christian converts beyond doubt came from the lower middle and lowest classes, not least from the slave class. These strata of society were supplied greatly from immigrants, much as in parts of East London now aliens make the main population. Not Lat but Gr, the then lingua franca of the Mediterranean, would be the daily speech of these people. It is remarkable that all the early Rom bishops bear Gr names. And some 40 years after the date of this Ep. we find Clement of Rome writing in Gr to the Corinthians, and later again, early in the 2d cent., Ignatius writing in Gr to the Romans.

We cannot specify the occasion of writing for certain. No hint appears of any acute crisis in the mission (as when 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal, or

7. Occasion Col were written). Nor would personal reminiscences influence the writer, for he had not yet seen Rome. We can only suggest some possibilities as follows:

(1) A good opportunity for safe communication was offered by the deaconess Phoebe's proposed visit to the metropolis. She doubtless asked St. Paul for a commendatory letter, and this may have suggested an extended message to the church.

(2) St. Paul's thoughts had long gone toward Rome. See Acts 19 21: "I must see Rome," words which seem perhaps to imply some Divine intimation (cf 23 11). And his own life-course would fall in with such a supernatural call. He had always aimed at large centers; and now his great work in the central places of the Levant was closing; he had worked at Ephesus, Thessalonica, Corinth; he was at last to think of the supreme center of all. Rome must always have had a dominant interest for the "Apostle of the Nations," and any suggestion that his Lord's will tended that way would intensify it to the highest degree.

(3) The form of the Ep. may throw further light on the occasion. The document falls, on the whole, into three parts. First we have chs 1-8 inclusive, a prolonged exposition of the contrasted and related phenomena of sin and salvation, with special initial references to the cases of Jew and non-Jew respectively. Then come chs 9-11, which deal with the Jewish rejection of the Jewish Messiah, developing into a prophetic revelation of the future of Israel in the grace of God. Lastly we have chs 12-16. Some account of the writer's plans, and his salutations to friends, requests for prayer, etc. form the close of this section. But it is mainly a statement of Christian duty in common life, personal, civil, religious. Under the latter head we have a noble treatment of problems raised by varying opinions, particularly on religious observances, among the converts, Jew and Gentile.

Such phenomena cast a possible light on the occasion of writing. The Rom mission was on one side, by its locality and surroundings, eminently gentile. On the other, there was, as we have seen, a strong Judaic element in Rom life, particularly in its lower strata, and no doubt around the Jewish community proper there had grown up a large community of "worshippers" (σεβόμενοι, sebōmenoi) or, as we commonly call them, "proselytes" ("adherents," in the language of modern missionary enterprise), people who, without receiving circumcision, attended Jewish worship and shared largely in Jewish beliefs and ideals. Among these proselytes, we may believe, the earliest evangelists at Rome found a favorable field, and the mission church as St. Paul knew of it contained accordingly not only two definite classes, converts from paganism, converts from native Judaism, but very many in whose minds both traditions were working at once. To such converts the problems raised by Judaism, both without and within the church, would come home with a constant intimacy and force, and their case may well have been present in a special degree in the apostle's mind alike in the early passages (chs 1-3) of the Ep. and in such later parts as chs 2-11, 14, 15. On the one hand they would greatly need guidance on the significance of the past of Israel and on the destiny of the chosen race in the future. Moreover, discussions in such circles over the way of salvation would suggest to the great missionary his exposition of man's reconciliation with a holy God and of His secrets for purity and obedience in an unholy world. And meanwhile the ever-recurring problems raised by ceremonial rules in common daily life—problems of days and seasons, and of forbidden food—would, for such disciples, need wise and equitable treatment.

(4) Was it not with this position before him, known to him through the many means of communication between Rome and Corinth, that St. Paul cast his letter into this form? And did not the realization of the central greatness of Rome suggest its ample scale? The result was a writing which shows everywhere his sense of the presence of the Judaic problem. Here he meets it by a statement, massive and tender, of "heaven's easy, artless, unencumbered plan" of redemption, grace, and glory, a plan which on its other side is the very mystery of the love of God, which statement is now and forever a primary treasure of the Christian faith. And then again he lays down for the too eager champions of the new "liberty" a law of loving tolerance toward slower and narrower views which is equally our permanent spiritual possession, bearing a significance far-reaching and benign.

(5) It has been held by some great students, notably Lightfoot and Hort, that the main purpose of Rom was to reconcile the opposing "schools" in the church, and that its exposition of the salvation of the individual is secondary only. The present writer cannot take this view. Read the Ep. from its spiritual center, so to speak, and is not the perspective very different? The apostle is always conscious of the collective aspect of the Christian life, an aspect vital to its full health. But is he not giving his deepest thought, animated by his own experience of conviction and conversion, to the sinful man's relation to eternal law, to redeeming grace, and to a coming glory? It is the question of personal salvation which with St. Paul seems to us to live and move always in the depth of his argument, even when Christian polity and policy is the immediate theme.

Excepting only Eph (the problem of the authorship of which is insoluble, and we put that great document here aside), Rom is, of all

8. Some Character-istics St. Paul has written, least a letter and most a treatise. He is seen, as we read, to approach religious problems of the highest order in a free but reasoned succession; problems of the darkness and of the light, of sin and grace, fall and restoration, doom and remission, faith and obedience, suffering and glory, transcendent hope and humblest duty, now in their relation to the soul, now so as to develop the holy collectivity of the common life. The Rom converts are always first in view, but such is the writer, such his handling, that the results are for the universal church and for every believer of all time. Yet all the while (and it is in this a splendid example of that epistolary method of revelation which is one of the glories of the NT) it is never for a moment the mere treatise, however great. The writer is always vividly personal, and conscious of persons. The Ep. is indeed a masterpiece of doctrine, but also always "the unforced, unartificial utterance of a friend to friends."

Approaching the Ep. as a treatise rather than a letter (with the considerable reserves just stated), we indicate briefly some of its main doctrinal deliverances. Obviously, in limine, it is not set before us as a complete system either of theology or of morals; to obtain a full view of a Pauline dogma and ethics we must certainly place Eph and Col, not to speak of passages from Thess, beside Rom. But it makes by far the nearest approach to doctrinal completeness among the Epp.

(1) The doctrine of man.—In great measure this resolves itself into the doctrine of man as a sinner, as being guilty in face of an absolutely holy and absolutely imperative law, whether announced by abnormal revelation, as to the Jew, or through nature and conscience only, as to the Gentile. At the back of this presentation lies the full recognition that man is cognizant, as a spiritual being, of the eternal difference of right and wrong, and of the witness of creation to personal "eternal power and Godhead" as its cause, and that he is responsible in an awe-inspiring way for his unfaithfulness to such cognitions. He is a being great enough to be in personal moral relation with God, and able to realize his ideal only in true relation with Him; therefore a being whose sin and guilt have an unfathomable evil in them. So is he bound by his own failure that he cannot restore himself; God alone, in sovereign mercy, provides for his pardon by the propitiation of Christ, and for his restoration by union with Christ in the life given by the Holy Spirit. Such is man, once restored, once become "a saint" (a being hallowed), a "son of God" by adoption and grace, that his final glorification will be the signal (in some sense the cause?) of a transfiguration of the whole finite universe. Meanwhile, man is a being actually in the midst of a life of duty and trial, a member of civil society, with obligations to its order. He lives not in a Godsaken world, belonging only to another and evil power. His new life, the "mind of the Spirit" in him, is to show itself in a conduct and character good for the state and for society at large, as well as for the "brotherhood."

(2) The doctrine of God.—True to the revelation of the OT, St. Paul presents God as absolute in will and power, so that He is not only the sole author of nature but the eternal and ultimately sole cause of goodness in man. To Him in the last resort all is due, not only the provision of atonement but the power and will to embrace it. The great passages which set before us a "fore-defining" (προόρισις, proōrīsis, "predestination") and election of the saints are all evidently inspired by this motive, the jealous resolve to trace to the one true Cause all motions and actions of good. The apostle seems e.g. almost to risk affirming a sovereign causation of the opposite, of unbelief and its sequel. But patient study will find that it is not so. God is not said to "fit for ruin" the "vessels of wrath." Their woful end is overruled to His glory, but nowhere is it taken to be caused by Him. All along the writer's intense purpose is to constrain the actual believer to see the whole causation of his salvation in the will and power of Him whose inmost character is revealed in the supreme fact that, "for us all," "he spared not his Son."

(3) The doctrine of the Son of God.—The Ep. affords materials for a magnificently large Christology. The relation of the Son to creation is indeed not expounded in terms (as in Col), but it is implied in the language of ch 8, where the interrelation of our redemption and the transfiguration of Nature is dealt with. We have the Lord's manhood fully recognized, while His Godhead (as we read in 9 5; so too Robertson, ut supra) is stated in terms, and it is most certainly implied in the language and tone of e.g. the close of ch 8. Who but a bearer of the Supreme Nature could satisfy the conception indicated in such words as those of 8 32.35-39, coming as they do from a Heb monotheist of intense convictions? Meantime this transcendent Person has so put Himself in relation with us, as the willing worker of the Father's purpose of love, that He is the sacrifice of peace for us (ch 3), our "propitiatory" One (ἱλαστήριον, hilastērion, is now known to be an adj.), such that (whatever the mystery, which leaves the fact no less certain) the man who believes on Him, i.e. (as ch 4 fully demonstrates) relies on Him, gives himself over to His mercy, is not only forgiven but "justified," "justified by faith." And "justification" is more than forgiveness; it is not merely the remission of a penalty but a welcome to the offender, pronounced to be lawfully at peace with the eternal holiness and love. See JUSTIFICATION; PROPITIATION.

In closest connection with this message of justification is the teaching regarding union with the Christ who has procured the justification. This is rather assumed than expounded in Rom (we have the exposition more explicitly in Eph, Col, and Gal), but the assumption is present wherever the pregnant phrase "in Christ" is used. Union is, for St. Paul, the central doctrine of all, giving life and relation to the whole range. As Lightfoot has well said (Sermons in St. Paul's, no. 16), he is the apostle not primarily of justification, or of liberty, great as these truths are with him, but of union with Christ. It is through union that justification is ours; the merits of the Head are for the member. It is through union that spiritual liberty and power are ours; the Spirit of life is from the Head to the member. Held by grace in this profound and multiplex connection, where life, love and law are interlaced, the Christian is entitled to an assurance full of joy that nothing shall separate him, soul and (ultimately) body, from his once sacrificed and now risen and triumphant Lord.

(4) The doctrine of the Spirit of God.—No writing of the NT but St. John's Gospel is so full upon this great theme as Rom. Ch 8 may be said to be the locus classicus in the Epp. for the work of the Holy Ghost in the believer. By implication it reveals personality as well as power (see esp. ver 26). Note particularly the place of this great passage, in which revelation and profoundest conditions run continually into each other. It follows ch 7, in which the apostle depicts, in terms of his own profound and typical experience, the struggles of conscience and will over the awful problem of the "bondage" of indwelling sin. If we interpret the passage aright, the case supposed is that of a regenerate man, who, however, attempts the struggle against inward evil armed, as to consciousness, with his own faculties merely, and finds the struggle insupportable. Then comes in the Divine solution, the promised Spirit of life and liberty, welcomed and put into use by the man who has found his own resources vain. "In Christ Jesus," in union with Him, he "by the Spirit does to death the practices of the body," and rises through conscious liberty into an exulting hope of "the liberty of the glory of the sons of God"—not so, however, as to know nothing of "groaning within himself," while yet in the body; but it is a groan which leaves intact the sense of sonship and Divine love, and the expectation of a final completeness of redemption.

(5) The doctrine of duty.—While the Ep. is eminently a message of salvation, it is also, in vital connection with this, a treasury of principle and precept for the life of duty. It does indeed lay down the sovereign freedom of our acceptance for Christ's sake alone, and so absolutely that (6 1.2.15) the writer anticipates the inference (by foes, or by mistaken friends), "Let us continue in sin." But the answer comes instantly, and mainly through the doctrine of union. Our pardon is not an isolated fact. Secured only by Christ's sacrifice, received only by the faith which receives Him as our all, it is ipso facto never received alone but with all His other gifts, for it becomes ours as we receive, not merely one truth about Him, but Him. Therefore, we receive His Life as our true life; and it is morally unthinkable that we can receive this and express it in sin. This assumed, the Ep. (ch 12 and onward) lays down with much detail and in admirable application large ranges of the law of duty, civil, social, personal, embracing duties to the state, loyalty to its laws, payment of its taxes, recognition of the sacredness of political order, even ministered by pagans; and also duties to society and the church, including a large and loving tolerance even in religious matters, and a response to every call of the law of unselfish love. However we can or cannot adjust mentally the two sides, that of a supremely free salvation and that of an inexorable responsibility, there the two sides are, in the Pauline message. And reason and faith combine to assure us that both sides are eternally true, "antinomies" whose harmony will be explained hereafter in a higher life, but which are to be lived out here concurrently by the true disciple, assured of their ultimate oneness of source in the eternal love.

(6) The doctrine of Israel.—Very briefly we touch on this department of the message of Rom, mainly to point out that the problem of Israel's unbelief nowhere else in St. Paul appears as so heavy a load on his heart, and that on the other hand we nowhere else have anything like the light he claims to throw (ch 11) on Israel's future. Here, if anywhere, he appears as the predictive prophet, charged with the statement of a "mystery," and with the announcement of its issues. The promises to Israel have never failed, nor are they canceled. At the worst, they have always been inherited by a chosen remnant, Israel within Israel. And a time is coming when, in a profound connection with Messianic blessing on the Gentiles, "all Israel shall be saved," with a salvation which shall in turn be new life to the world outside Israel. Throughout the passage St. Paul speaks, not as one who "will not give up a hope," but as having had revealed to him a vast and definite prospect, in the Divine purpose.

It is not possible in our present space to work out other lines of the message of Rom. Perhaps enough has been done to stimulate the reader's own inquiries.

LITERATURE.—Of the Fathers, Chrysostom and Augustine are preëminent as interpreters of Rom; Chrysostom in his expository Homilies, models of eloquent and illuminating discourse, full of "sanctified common sense," while not perfectly appreciative of the inmost doctrinal characteristics; Augustine, not in any continuous comm., but in his anti-Pelagian writings, which show the sympathetic intensity of his study of the doctrine of the Ep., not so much on justification as on grace and the will. Of the Reformers, Calvin is eminently the great commentator, almost modern in his constant aim to ascertain the sacred writer's meaning by open-eyed inference direct from the words. On Rom he is at his best; and it is remarkable that on certain leading passages where grace is the theme he is much less rigidly "Calvinistic" than some of his followers. In modern times, the not learned but masterly exposition of Robert Haldane (c 1830) claims mention, and the eloquent and highly suggestive expository lectures (about the same date) of Thomas Chalmers. H. A. W. Meyer (5th ed, 1872, ET 1873-74) among the Germans is excellent for carefulness and insight; Godet (1879, ET 1881) equally so among French-writing divines; of late English interpreters I. A. Beet (1877, many revisions), Sanday and Headlam (1895, in the "International" series) and E. H. Gifford (admirable for scholarship and exposition; his work was printed first in the Speaker's [Bible] Comm., 1881, now separately) claim particular mention. J. Denney writes on Rom in The Expositor's Gr Test. (1900).

Luther's lectures on Rom, delivered in 1516-17 and long supposed lost, have been recovered and were published by J. Fieker in 1908. Among modern German commentators, the most important is B. Weiss in the later revisions of the Meyer series (9th ed, 1899), while a very elaborate comm. has been produced by Zahn in his own series (1910). Briefer are the works of Lipsius (Hand-Kommentar, 2d ed, 1892, very scholarly and suggestive); Lietzmann (Handbuch zum NT, interest chiefly linguistic), and Jülicher (in J. Weiss, Schriften des NTs, 2d ed, 1908, an intensely able piece of popular ex-position).

A. E. Garvie has written a brilliant little comm. in the "[New] Century" series (no date); that of R. St. John Parry in the Cambridge Gr Test., 1913, is more popular, despite its use of the Gr text. F. B. Westcott's St. Paul and Justification, 1913, contains a close grammatical study with an excellent paraphrase.

The writer may be allowed to name his short comm. (1879) in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and a fuller one, in a more homiletic style, in the Expositor's Bible, 1894.

Rome (Lat and Ital. Roma; Ῥώμη, Rhōmē): The capital of the Rom republic and empire, later the center of Lat Christendom, and since 1871 capital of the kingdom of Italy, is situated mainly on the left bank of the Tiber about 15 miles from the Mediterranean Sea in 41° 53' 54" N. lat. and 12° 0' 12" long. E. of Greenwich.

It would be impossible in the limited space assigned to this article to give even a comprehensive outline of the ancient history of the Eternal City. It will suit the general purpose of the work to consider the relations of the Rom government and society with the Jews and Christians, and, in addition, to present a rapid survey of the earlier development of Rom institutions and power, so as to provide the necessary historical setting for the appreciation of the more essential subjects.

I. Development of the Republican Constitution.

—The traditional chronology for the earliest period of Rom history is altogether unreliable, partly because the Gauls, in 1. Original Roman State ravaging the city in 390 BC, destroyed the monuments which might have offered faithful testimony of the earlier period (Livy vi.1). It is known that there was a settlement on the site of Rome before the traditional date of the founding (753 BC). The original Rom state was the product of the coalition of a number of adjacent clan-communities, whose names were perpetuated in the Rom gentes, or groups of imaginary kindred, a historical survival which had lost all significance in the period of authentic history. The chieftains of the associated clans composed the primitive senate or council of elders, which exercised sovereign authority. But as is customary in the development of human society a military or monarchical régime succeeded the looser patriarchal or sacerdotal organs of authority. This second stage may be identified with the legendary rule of the Tarquins, which was probably a period of Etruscan domination. The confederacy of clans was welded into a homogeneous political entity, and society was organized for civic ends, upon a timocratic basis. The forum was drained and became a social, industrial and political center, and the Capitoline temple of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva (Etruscan pseudo-Hellenic deities) was erected as a common shrine for all the people. But above all the Romans are indebted to these foreign kings for a training in discipline and obedience which was exemplified in the later conception of magisterial authority signified by the term imperium.

The prerogatives of the kings passed over to the consuls. The reduction of the tenure of power to a single year and the institution of the principle of collegueship were the earliest checks to the abuse of unlimited authority. But the true cornerstone of Rom liberty was thought to be the lex Valeria, which provided that no citizen should be put to death by a magistrate without being allowed the right of appeal to the decision of the assembly of the people.

A period of more than 150 years after the establishment of the republic was consumed chiefly by the struggle between the two classes or orders, the patricians and plebeians. The former were the descendants of the original clans and constituted the populus, or body-politic, in a more particular sense. The plebeians were descendants of former slaves and dependents, or of strangers who had been attracted to Rome by the obvious advantages for industry and trade. They enjoyed the franchise as members of the military assembly (comitia centuriata), but had no share in the magistracies or other civic honors and emoluments, and were excluded from the knowledge of the civil law which was handed down in the patrician families as an oral tradition.

The first step in the progress of the plebeians toward political equality was taken when they wrested from the patricians the privilege of choosing representatives from among themselves, the tribunes, whose function of bearing aid to oppressed plebeians was rendered effective by the right of veto (intercessio), by virtue of which any act of a magistrate could be arrested. The codification of the law in the Twelve Tables was a distinct advantage to the lower classes, because the evils which they had suffered were largely due to a harsh and abusive interpretation of legal institutions, the nature of which had been obscure (see ROMAN LAW). The abrogation, directly thereafter, of the prohibition of intermarriage between the classes resulted in their gradual intermingling.

The kings had reduced the senate to the position of a mere advising body. But under the republican régime it recovered in fact the

3. Senate and Magistrates authority of which it was deprived in theory. The controlling power of the senate is the most significant feature of the republican government, although it was recognized by no statute or other constitutional document. It was due in part to the diminution of the power of the magistrates, and in part to the manner in which the senators were chosen. The lessening of the authority of the magistrates was the result of the increase in their number, which led not only to the curtailment of the actual prerogative of each, but also to the contraction of their aggregate independent influence. The augmentation of the number of magistrates was made necessary by the territorial expansion of the state and the elaboration of administration. But it was partly the result of plebeian agitation. The events of 367 BC may serve as a suitable example to illustrate the action of these influences. For when the plebeians carried by storm the citadel of patrician exclusiveness in gaining admission to the consulship, the highest regular magistracy, the necessity for another magistrate with general competency afforded an opportunity for making a compensating concession to the patricians, and the praetorship was created, to which at first members of the old aristocracy were alone eligible. Under the fully developed constitution the regular magistracies were five in number, consulship, praetorship, aedileship, tribunate, and quaestorship, all of which were filled by annual elections.

Mention has been made of the manner of choosing the members of the senate as a factor in the development of the authority of the supreme council. At first the highest executive officers of the state exercised the right of selecting new members to maintain the senators at the normal number of three hundred. Later this function was transferred to the censors who were elected at intervals of five years. But custom and later statute ordained that the most distinguished citizens should be chosen, and in the Rom community the highest standard of distinction was service to the state, in other words, the holding of public magistracies. It followed, therefore, that the senate was in reality an assembly of all living ex-magistrates. The senate included, moreover, all the political wisdom and experience of the community, and so great was its prestige for these reasons, that, although the expression of its opinion (senatus consultum) was endowed by law with no compelling force, it inevitably guided the conduct of the consulting magistrate, who was practically its minister, rather than its president.

When the plebeians gained admission to the magistracies, the patriciate lost its political significance. But only the wealthier plebeian families were able to profit by this extension of privilege, inasmuch as a political career required freedom from gainful pursuits and also personal influence. These plebeian families readily coalesced with the patricians and formed a new aristocracy, which is called the nobilitas for the sake of distinction. It rested ultimately upon the foundation of wealth. The dignity conferred by the holding of public magistracies was its title to distinction. The senate was its organ. Rome was never a true democracy except in theory. During the whole period embraced between the final levelling of the old distinctions based upon blood (287 BC) and the beginning of the period of revolution (133 BC), the magistracies were occupied almost exclusively by the representatives of the comparatively limited number of families which constituted the aristocracy. These alone entered the senate through the doorway of the magistracies, and the data would almost justify us in asserting that the republican and senatorial government were substantially and chronologically identical.

The seeds of the political and social revolution were sown during the Second Punic War and the period which followed it. The prorogation of military authority established a dangerous precedent in violation of the spirit of the republic, so that Pub. Cornelius Scipio was really the forerunner of Marius, Julius Caesar, and Augustus. The stream of gold which found its way from the provinces to Rome was a bait to attract the cupidity of the less scrupulous senators, and led to the growth of the worst kind of professionalism in politics. The middle class of small farmers decayed for various reasons; the allurements of service in the rich but effete countries of the Orient attracted many. The cheapness of slaves made independent farming unprofitable and led to the increase in large estates; the cultivation of grain was partly displaced by that of the vine and olive, which were less suited to the habits and ability of the older class of farmers.

The more immediate cause of the revolution was the inability of the senate as a whole to control the conduct of its more radical or violent members. For as political ambition became more ardent with the increase in the material prizes to be gained, aspiring leaders turned their attention to the people, and sought to attain the fulfilment of their purposes by popular legislation setting at naught the concurrence of the senate, which custom had consecrated as a requisite preliminary for popular action. The loss of initiative by the senate meant the subversion of senatorial government. The senate possessed in the veto power of the tribunes a weapon for coercing unruly magistrates, for one of the ten tribunes could always be induced to interpose his veto to prohibit the passage of popular legislation. But this weapon was broken when Tib. Gracchus declared in 133 BC that a tribune who opposed the wishes of the people was no longer their representative, and sustained this assertion.

It would be foreign to the purpose of the present article to trace the vicissitudes of the civil strife of the last century of the republic. A

4. Underlying Principles few words will suffice to suggest the general principles which lay beneath the surface of political and social phenomena. Attention has been called to the ominous development of the influence of military commanders and the increasing emphasis of popular favor. These were the most important tendencies throughout this period, and the coalition of the two was fatal to the supremacy of the senatorial government. Marius after winning unparalleled military glory formed a political alliance with Glauca and Saturninus, the leaders of the popular faction in the city in 100 BC. This was a turning-point in the course of the revolution. But the importance of the sword soon outweighed that of the populace in the combination which was thus constituted. In the civil wars of Marius and Sulla constitutional questions were decided for the first time by superiority of military strength exclusively. Repeated appeals to brute force dulled the perception for constitutional restraints and the rights of minorities. The senate had already displayed signs of partial paralysis at the time of the Gracchi. How rapidly its debility must have increased as the sword cut off its most stalwart members! Its power expired in the proscriptions, or organized murder of political opponents. The popular party was nominally triumphant, but in theory the Rom state was still an urban commonwealth with a single political center. The franchise could be exercised only at Rome. It followed from this that the actual political assemblies were made up largely of the worthless element which was so numerous in the city, whose irrational instincts were guided and controlled by shrewd political leaders, particularly those who united in themselves military ability and the wiles of the demagogue. Sulla, Crassus, Julius Caesar, Antony, and lastly Octavian were in effect the ancient counterpart of the modern political "boss." When such men realized their ultimate power and inevitable rivalry, the ensuing struggle for supremacy and for the survival of the fittest formed the necessary process of elimination leading naturally to the establishment of the monarchy, which was in this case the rule of the last survivor. When Octavian received the title Augustus and the proconsular power (27 BC), the transformation was accomplished.

III. The Imperial Government.—Augustus displayed considerable tact in blending his own mastery in the state with the old institutions

1. Imperial Authority of the republican constitution. His authority, legally, rested mainly upon the tribunician power, which he had probably received as early as 36 BC, but which was established on a better basis in 23 BC, and the proconsular prerogative (imperium proconsulare), conferred in 27 BC. By virtue of the first he was empowered to summon the senate or assemblies and could veto the action of almost any magistrate. The second title of authority conferred upon him the command of the military forces of the state and consequently the administration of the provinces where troops were stationed, besides a general supervision over the government of the other provinces. It follows that a distinction was made (27 BC) between the imperial provinces which were administered by the emperor's representatives (legati Augusti pro praetore) and the senatorial provinces where the republican machinery of administration was retained. The governors of the latter were called generally proconsuls (see PROVINCE). Mention is made of two proconsuls in the NT, Gallio in Achaia (Acts 18 12) and Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (13 7). It is instructive to compare the lenient and common-sense attitude of these trained Rom aristocrats with that of the turbulent local mobs who dealt with St. Paul in Asia Minor, Judaea, or Greece (Tucker, Life in the Rom World of Nero and St. Paul, New York, 1910, 95).

Rom citizens were still divided into three classes socially, senatorial, equestrian, and plebeian, and the whole system of government harmonized with this triple division. The senatorial class was composed of descendants of senators and those upon whom the emperors conferred the latus clavus, or privilege of wearing the tunic with broad purple border, the sign of membership in this order. The quaestorship was still the

2. Three Classes of Citizens door of admission to the senate. The qualifications for membership in the senate were the possession of senatorial rank and property of the value of not less than 1,000,000 sesterces ($45,000; £9,000). Tiberius transferred the election of magistrates from the people to the senate, which was already practically a closed body. Under the empire senatus consulta received the force of law. Likewise the senate acquired judicial functions, sitting as a court of justice for trying important criminal cases and hearing appeals in civil cases from the senatorial provinces. The equestrian class was made up of those who possessed property of the value of 400,000 sesterces or more, and the privilege of wearing the narrow purple band on the tunic. With the knights the emperors filled many important financial and administrative positions in Italy and the provinces which were under their control.

IV. Roman Religion.—(1) The Rom religion was originally more consistent than the Gr, because the deities as conceived by the un-

1. Deities imaginative Lat genius were entirely without human character. They were the influences or forces which directed the visible phenomena of the physical world, whose favor was necessary to the material prosperity of mankind. It would be incongruous to assume the existence of a system of theological doctrines in the primitive period. Ethical considerations entered to only a limited extent into the attitude of the Romans toward their gods. Religion partook of the nature of a contract by which men pledged themselves to the scrupulous observance of certain sacrifices and other ceremonies, and in return deemed themselves entitled to expect the active support of the gods in bringing their projects to a fortunate conclusion. The Romans were naturally polytheists as a result of their conception of divinity. Since before the dawn of science there was no semblance of unity in the natural world, there could be no unity in heaven. There must be a controlling spirit over every important object or class of objects, every person, and every process of nature. The gods, therefore, were more numerous than mankind itself.

(2) At an early period the government became distinctly secular. The priests were the servants of the community for preserving the venerable aggregation of formulae and ceremonies, many of which lost at an early period such spirit as they once possessed. The magistrates were the true representatives of the community in its relationship with the deities both in seeking the divine will in the auspices and in performing the more important sacrifices.

(3) The Romans at first did not make statues of their gods. This was partly due to lack of skill, but mainly to the vagueness of their conceptions of the higher beings. Symbols sufficed to signify their existence, a spear, for instance, standing for Mars. The process of reducing the gods to human form was inaugurated when they came into contact with the Etruscans and Greeks. The Tarquins summoned Etruscan artisans and artists to Rome, who made from terra cotta cultus statues and a pediment group for the Capitoline temple.

The types of the Gr deities had already been definitely established when the Hellenic influence in molding Rom culture became predominant. When the form of the Gr gods became familiar to the Romans in works of sculpture, they gradually supplanted those Rom deities with which they were nominally identified as a result of a real or fancied resemblance. See GREECE, RELIGION IN.

(4) The importation of new gods was a comparatively easy matter. Polytheism is by its nature tolerant because of its indefiniteness. The Romans could no more presume to have exhaustive knowledge of the gods than they could pretend to possess a comprehensive acquaintance with the universe. The number of their gods increased of necessity as human consciousness of natural phenomena expanded. Besides, it was customary to invite the gods of conquered cities to transfer their abode to Rome and favor the Romans in their undertakings. But the most productive source for religious expansion was the Sibylline Books. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, V. This oracular work was brought to Rome from Cumae, a center of the cult of Apollo. It was consulted at times of crisis with a view to discover what special ceremonies would secure adequate divine aid. The forms of worship recommended by the Sibylline Books were exclusively Gr. As early as the 5th cent. BC the cult of Apollo was introduced at Rome. Heracles and the Dioscuri found their way thither about the same time. Later Italian Diana was merged with Artemis, and the group of Ceres, Liber, and Libera were identified with foreign Demeter, Dionysus, and Persephone. Thus Rom religion became progressively Hellenized. By the close of the Second Punic War the greater gods of Greece had all found a home by the Tiber, and the myriad of petty local deities who found no counterpart in the celestial beings of Mt. Olympus fell into oblivion. Their memory was retained by the antiquarian lore of the priests alone (see ROMAN EMPIRE AND CHRISTIANITY, III, 1).

Rom religion received with the engrafted branches of Gr religion the germs of rapid decay, for its Hellenization made Rom religion peculiarly susceptible to the attack of philosophy. The cultivated class in Gr society was already permeated with skepticism. The philosophers made the gods appear ridiculous. Gr philosophy gained a firm foothold in Rome in the 2d cent. BC, and it became customary a little later to look upon Athens as a sort of university town where the sons of the aristocracy should be sent for the completion of their education in the schools of the philosophers. Thus at the termination of the republican era religious faith had departed from the upper classes largely, and during the turmoil of the civil wars even the external ceremonies were often abandoned and many temples fell into ruins. There had never been any intimate connection between formal religion and conduct, except when the faith of the gods was invoked to insure the fulfilment of sworn promises.

Augustus tried in every way to restore the old religion, rebuilding no fewer than 82 temples which lay in ruins at Rome. A revival of religious faith did occur under the empire, although its spirit was largely alien to that which had been displayed in the performance of the official cult. The people remained superstitious, even when the cultivated classes adopted a skeptical philosophy. The formal religion of the state no longer appealed to them, since it offered nothing to the emotions or hopes. On the other hand the sacramental, mysterious character of oriental religions inevitably attracted them. This is the reason why the religions of Egypt and Syria spread over the empire and exercised an immeasurable influence in the moral life of the people. The partial success of Judaism and the ultimate triumph of Christianity may be ascribed in part to the same causes.

In concluding we should bear in mind that the state dictated no system of theology, that the empire in the beginning presented the spectacle of a sort of religious chaos where all national cults were guaranteed protection, that Rom polytheism was naturally tolerant, and that the only form of religion which the state could not endure was one which was equivalent to an attack upon the system of polytheism as a whole, since this would imperil the welfare of the community by depriving the deities of the offerings and other services in return for which their favor could be expected.

V. Rome and the Jews.—Judaea became a part of the province of Syria in 63 BC (Jos, BJ, vii, 7), and Hyrcanus, brother of the last

1. Judaea king, remained as high priest (archier- under eus kai ethnarches; Jos, Ant, XIV, Roman iv, 4) invested with judicial as well as Procurators sacerdotal functions. But Antony and Octavius gave Pal (40 BC) as Governors a kingdom to Herod, surnamed the Great, although his rule did not become effective until 3 years later.

His sovereignty was upheld by a Rom legion stationed at Jerus (Jos, Ant, XV, iii, 7), and he was obliged to pay tribute to the Rom government and provide auxiliaries for the Rom army (Appian, Bell. Civ., v.75). Herod built Caesarea in honor of Augustus (Jos, Ant, XV, ix, 6), and the Rom procurators later made it the seat of government. At his death in 4 BC the kingdom was divided between his three surviving sons, the largest portion falling to Archelaus, who ruled Judaea, Samaria and Idumaea with the title ethnarches (Jos, Ant, XVII, xi, 4) until 6 AD, when he was deposed and his realm reduced to the position of a province. The administration by Rom procurators (see PROCURATOR), which was now established, was interrupted during the period 41–44 AD, when royal authority was exercised by Herod Agrippa, grandson of Herod the Great, over the lands which had been embraced in the kingdom of his grandfather (Jos, Ant, XIX, viii, 2), and, after 53 AD, Agrippa II ruled a considerable part of Pal (Jos, Ant, XX, vii, 1; viii, 4).

After the fall of Jerus and the termination of the great revolt in 70 AD, Pal remained a separate province. Henceforth a legion (legio X Fretensis) was added to the military forces stationed in the land, which was encamped at the ruins of Jerus. Consequently, imperial governors of praetorian rank (legati Augusti pro praetore) took the place of the former procurators (Jos, BJ, VII, i, 2, 3; Dio Cassius iv.23).

Several treaties are recorded between the Romans and Jews as early as the time of the Maccabees (Jos, Ant, XII, x, 6; XIII, ix, 2; viii, 5), and Jews are known to have been at Rome as early as 138 BC. They became very numerous in the capital after the return of Pompey who brought back many captives (see LIBERTINES). Cicero speaks of multitudes of Jews at Rome in 58 BC (Pro Flacco 28), and Caesar was very friendly toward them (Suetonius Caesar 84). Held in favor by Augustus, they recovered the privilege of collecting sums to send to the temple (Philo Legatio ad Caium 40). Agrippa offered 100 oxen in the temple when visiting Herod (Jos, Ant, XVI, ii, 1), and Augustus established a daily offering of a bull and two lambs. Upon the whole the Rom government displayed noticeable consideration for the religious scruples of the Jews. They were exempted from military service and the duty of appearing in court on the Sabbath. Yet Tiberius repressed Jewish rites in Rome in 19 AD (Suetonius Tiberius 36) and Claudius expelled the Jews from the city in 49 AD (Suetonius Claudius 25); but in both instances repression was not of long duration.

The Jews made themselves notorious in Rome in propagating their religion by means of proselytizing (Horace Satires i.4, 142; i.9, 69; Juvenal xiv.96; Tacitus Hist. Proselytism v. 5), and the literature of the Augustan age contains several references to the observation of the Sabbath (Tibullus i.3; Ovid Ars amatoria i.67, 415; Remedium amoris 219). Proselytes from among the Gentiles were not always required to observe all the prescriptions of the Law. The proselytes of the Gate (sebōmenoi), as they were called, renounced idolatry and serious moral abuses and abstained from the blood and meat of suffocated animals. Among such proselytes may be included the centurion of Capernaum (Lk 7 5), the centurion Cornelius (Acts 10 1), and the empress Poppaea (Jos, Ant, XX, viii, 11; Tacitus Ann. xvi.6).

On "proselytes of the Gate," *GJV*⁴, III, 177, very properly corrects the error in HJP. These "Gate" people were not proselytes at all; they refused to take the final step that carried them into Judaism—viz. circumcision (Ramsay, Expos., 1896, p. 200; Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, I, 11; see DEVOUT; PROSELYTES).

Notwithstanding the diffusion of Judaism by means of proselytism, the Jews themselves lived for the most part in isolation in the poorest parts of the city or suburbs, across the Tiber, near the Circus Maximus, or outside the Porta Capena. Inscriptions show that there were seven communities, each with its synagogue and council of elders presided over by a gerusiarch. Five cemeteries have been discovered with many Gr, a few Lat, but no Heb inscriptions.

LITERATURE.—Ewald, The Hist of Israel, ET by Smith, London, 1885; Renan, Hist of the People of Israel, ET, Boston, 1896; Schürer, The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, ET by MacPherson, New York.

VI. Rome and the Christians.—The date of the introduction of Christianity into Rome cannot be determined. A Christian community existed at the time of the arrival of St. Paul (Acts 28 15), to which he had addressed his Ep. a few years before (58 AD). It is commonly thought that the statement regarding the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius on account of the commotion excited among them by the agitation of Chrestus (Suetonius Claudius 25; Judeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantis Roma expulsi), probably in 49 AD, is proof of the diffusion of Christian teaching in Rome, on the ground that Chrestus is a colloquial, or mistaken, form of Christus. It has been suggested that the Christian faith was brought to the capital of the empire by some of the Romans who were converted at the time of Pentecost (Acts 2 10.41). It would be out of place to discuss here the grounds for the traditional belief that St. Peter was twice in Rome, once before 50 AD and again subsequent to the arrival of St. Paul, and that together the two apostles established the church there. Our present concern is with the attitude of the government and society toward Christianity, when once established. It may suffice, therefore, to remind the reader that St. Paul was permitted to preach freely while nominally in custody (Phil 1 13), and that as early as 64 AD the Christians were very numerous (Tacitus Ann. xv.44: multitudo ingens).

At first the Christians were not distinguished from the Jews, but shared in the toleration, or even protection, which was usually conceded to Judaism as the national religion of the peoples embraced within the empire. Christianity was not legally proscribed until after its distinction from Judaism was clearly perceived. Two questions demand our attention: (1) When was Christianity recognized as distinct from Judaism? (2) When was the profession of Christianity declared a crime? These problems are of fundamental importance in the history of the church under the Rom empire.

(1) If we may accept the passage in Suetonius cited above (Claudius 25) as testimony on the vicissitudes of Christianity, we infer that at that time the Christians were confused with the Jews. The account of Pomponia Graecina, who was committed to the jurisdiction of her husband (Tacitus Ann. xiii.32) for adherence to a foreign belief (superstitiois externae reae), is frequently cited as proof that as early as 57 AD Christianity had secured a convert in the aristocracy. The characterization of the evidence in this case by the contemporary authority from whom Tacitus has gleaned this incident would apply appropriately to the adherence to Judaism or several oriental religions from the point of view of Romans of that time; for Pomponia had lived in a very austere manner since 44 AD. Since there is some other evidence that Pomponia was a Christian, the indefinite account of the accusation against her as mentioned by Tacitus is partial proof that Christianity had not as yet been commonly recognized as a distinct religion (Marucchi, Éléments d'archéologie chrétienne I, 13). At the time of the great conflagration in 64 AD the populace knew of the Christians, and Nero charged them collectively with a plot to destroy the city (Tacitus Ann. xv.44). The recognition of the distinctive character of Christianity had already taken place at this time. This was probably due in large measure to the circumstances of St. Paul's sojourn and trial in Rome and to the unprecedented number of converts made at that time. The empress Poppaea, who was probably an adherent of Judaism (Jos, Ant, XX, viii), may have enlightened the imperial court regarding the heresy of the Christians and their separation from the parent stock.

(2) In attempting to determine approximately the time at which Christianity was placed under the official ban of the imperial government, it will be convenient to adopt as starting-points certain incontestable dates between which the act of prosecution must have been issued. It is clear that at the time of the great conflagration (64 AD), the profession of Christianity was not a ground for criminal action. St. Paul had just been set at liberty by decree of the imperial court (cf 2 Tim 4 17). Moreover, the charge against the Christians was a plot to burn the city, not adherence to a proscribed religion, and they were condemned, as it appears, for an attitude of hostility toward the human race (Tacitus Ann. xv. 44). While governor of Bithynia (c 112 AD), Pliny the younger addressed Trajan in a celebrated letter (x.96) asking advice to guide his conduct in the trial of many persons who were accused as Christians, and inquiring particularly whether Christianity in itself was culpable, or only the faults which usually accompanied adherence to the new faith. The reply of the emperor makes quite plain the fundamental guilt at that time of adherence to Christianity, and it supposes a law already existing against it (x.97). It follows, therefore, that the law against Christianity which was the legal basis for persecution must have been issued between the conflagration in 64 AD and Pliny's administration of Bithynia.

We cannot define the time of this important act of legislation more closely with absolute certainty, although evidence is not wanting for the support of theories of more or less apparent probability. Tradition ascribes a general persecution to the reign of Domitian, which would imply that Christianity was already a forbidden religion at that time. Allusions in Rev (as 6 9), the references to recent calamities in Rome by St. Clement in his letter to the Corinthians (1 Ad Cor.), the condemnation of Acilius Glabrio (Dio Cassius lxxvii.13), a man of consular rank, together with the emperor's cousin Flavius Clemens (Dio Cassius, xiii) and Flavia Domitilla and many others on the charge of atheism and Jewish customs (95 AD), are cited as evidence for this persecution. The fact that a number of persons in Bithynia abandoned Christianity 20 years before the judicial investigation of Pliny (Pliny x. 96) is of some importance as corroborative evidence.

But there are grounds worthy of consideration for carrying the point of departure back to Domitian. The letter of St. Peter from Babylon (Rome?) to the Christians in Asia Minor implies an impending persecution (1 Pet 4 12-16). This was probably in the closing years of the reign of Nero. Allard cleverly observes (Histoire des persécutions, 61) that the mention of the Neronian persecution of the Christians apart from the description of the great fire in the work of Suetonius (Ner. 16), amid a number of acts of legislation, is evidence of a general enactment, which must have been adopted at the time of, or soon after, the proceedings which were instituted on the basis of the charge of arson. Upon the whole the theory that the policy of the imperial government was definitely established under Nero carries with it considerable probability (cf Sulpitius Severus, Chron., ii.41).

Although the original enactment has been lost the correspondence of Pliny and Trajan enables us to formulate the imperial policy in dealing with the Christians during the 2d cent. Adherence to Christianity was in itself culpable. But proceedings were not to be undertaken by magistrates on their own initiative; they were to proceed only from charges brought by voluntary accusers legally responsible for establishing the proof of their assertions. Informal and anonymous information must be rejected. Penitence shown in abjuring Christianity absolved the accused from the legal penalty of former guilt. The act of adoring the gods and the living emperor before their statues was sufficient proof of non-adherence to Christianity or of repentance.

The attitude of the imperial authorities in the 3d cent. was less coherent. The problem became more complicated as Christianity grew. Persecution was directed more esp. against the church as an organization, since it was believed to exert a dangerous power. About 202 AD, Septimius Severus issued a decree forbidding specifically conversion to Judaism or Christianity (Spartianus, Severus, 17), in which he departed from the method of procedure prescribed by Trajan (conquirendi non sunt), and commissioned the magistrates to proceed directly against suspected converts. At this time the Christians organized funerary associations for the possession of their cemeteries, substituting corporative for individual ownership, and it would appear that under Alexander Severus they openly held places of worship in Rome (Lampadius, Alexander Severus, 22, 49). The emperor Philip (244-49) is thought to have been a Christian at heart (Eusebius, HE, VI, 34). A period of comparative calm was interrupted by the persecution under Decius (250-51 AD), when the act of sacrifice was required as proof of non-adherence to Christianity. Several certificates testifying to the due performance of this rite have been preserved.

Under Valerian (257 AD) the Christian organizations were declared illegal and the cemeteries were sequestrated. But an edict in 260 AD restored this property (Eusebius, VII, 13). A short persecution under Aurelian (274 AD) broke the long period of calm which extended to the first edict of persecution of Diocletian (February 24, 303). The Christians seem to have gained a sort of prescriptive claim to exist, for Diocletian did not at first consider them guilty of a capital crime. He sought to crush their organization by ordering the cessation of assemblies, the destruction of churches and sacred books, and abjuration under pain of political and social degradation. (Lactantius, De Morte Persecutorum, x.11, 12, 13; Eusebius, VIII, 2; IX, 10). Later he ordered the arrest of all the clergy, who were to be put to death unless they renounced the faith (Eusebius, VIII, 6). Finally the requirement of an act of conformity in sacrificing to the gods was made general. This final persecution, continuing in an irregular way with varying degrees of severity, terminated with the defeat of Maxentius by Constantine (October 29, 312). The Edict of Milan issued by Constantine and Licinius the following year established toleration, the restoration of ecclesiastical property and the peace of the church. ROOF, rōōf. See HOUSE.

ROOF-CHAMBER. See HOUSE.

ROOM, rōōm. See HOUSE.

ROOT, rōot (שֹׁרֶשׁ, shōresh; ῥίζα, rhiza): Frequently mentioned in the OT and NT, but almost always in a figurative sense, e.g. "root of the righteous" (Prov 12 3.12); "root that beareth gall"

(Dt 29 18); "Their root shall be as rottenness" (Isa 5 24); "root of bitterness" (He 12 15). Also of peoples: "they whose root is in Amalek" (Jgs 5 14); of Assyria (Ezk 31 7); "Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up" (Hos 9 16); "Judah shall again take root downward" (2 K 19 30; cf Isa 27 6; 37 31); the root of Jesse (Isa 11 10; Rom 15 12); root of David (Rev 5 5; 22 16).

ROOT OF DAVID. See DAVID, ROOT OF.

ROOT OF JESSE (שֹׁרֶשׁ יֵשׁוּעַ, shōresh yishay [Isa 11 10]; ῥίζα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, rhiza tou Iessai [Rom 15 12]): The Heb and Gr words are practically the same in meaning. "Root" means descendant, branch of the family or stock. The Messianic king was to be of the family of Jesse the father of David. In Rom 15 12 Paul quotes the LXX of Isa 11 10. Jesus is a branch or descendant of the family of Jesse, as well as of David. See also DAVID, ROOT OF.

ROPE, rōp: Used in the OT for הֶבֶל, hebbel, "that which binds" (2 S 17 13, etc), and for עֲבֹת, abbōth, "that which is woven" (Jgs 15 13, etc). In neither word is any specified thickness or strength connoted, and hebbel is tr^d equally well by "line" (2 S 8 2, etc) or "cord" (Josh 2 15, etc), and abbōth by "cord" (Ps 118 27, etc), as best suits the context. Similarly in the NT the word σχοινίον, schoinion, lit. "made of rushes," can mean the rope by which a boat is fastened (Acts 27 32) or small cords suitable for a whip (Jn 2 15). The usual material for ropes was certainly flax (hemp), but the Egyptians, and so possibly the Hebrews, at times made ropes of leathern thongs. See CORD; LINE; SHIPS AND BOATS, III, 2.

ROSE, rōz: (1) רֹז (רֹזֶת), hābhāqceleth; ἄνθος, anthos, "a flower" [Cant 2 1], κρινόν, krinon, "a lily" [Isa 35 1]): By general consent EV is wrong: in Cant 2 1 m reads "Heb hābazeleth, the autumn crocus," and in Isa 35 1, m reads "or autumn crocus." This is the Colchicum autumnale (N.O. Liliaceae). A Tg on Cant 2 1 explains the Heb word as "narcissus," a very common plant in the plains and mountains of Pal and a great favorite with the natives. Two species, N. tazetta and N. serotinus (N.O. Amaryllidaceae), occur, the latter being the finer; they are autumn plants. All authorities agree that the so-called "rose" was some kind of bulbous plant. (2) ῥόδον, rhōdon, "the rose," mentioned in Ecclus 24 14; 39 13; 50 8; Wisd 2 8; 2 Esd 2 19): There is no reason why the rose, of which several varieties are common in Pal, should not be meant. Tristram favors the rhododendron. The expression, "rose plants in Jericho," in Ecclus 24 14 has nothing whatever to do with what is now sold there as a "rose of Jericho," a dwarf annual plant, Anastatica hierochuntina (N.O. Cruciferae), which dries up and can be made to reexpand by placing the root in water. ROSH, rosh, rōsh (רֹשׁ, rō'sh): A son or grandson of Benjamin (Gen 46 21).

ROSH (רֹשׁ, rō'sh; Ῥός, Rhōs, var. [Q^mε] κεφαλή, kephalēs; Vulg capitis): This name occurs in the prophecies against Gog in Ezk

1. Rosh 38 2.3 and 39 1, where AV has "Gog, and its the land of Magog, the chief prince of Renderings Meshech and Tubal." This tr is due to rō'sh being the common Heb word for "head" or "chief" (cf the Gr variant and the Vulg), and is regarded as incorrect, that of the RV,

"Gog, of the land of Magog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal," being preferred.

The identification of Rosh is not without its difficulties. Gesenius regarded it as indicating the Russians, who are mentioned in Byzantine writers of the 10th cent. under the name of 'Pōs, Rhōs. He adds that they are also noticed by Ibn Fossilan (same period), under the name of Rūs, as a people dwelling on the river Rha (Volga). Apart from the improbability that the dominion of Gog extended to this district, it would be needful to know at what date the Rūs of the Volga arrived there.

Notwithstanding objections on account of its eastern position, in all probability Fried. Delitzsch's identification of Rosh with the māt Rāši, "land of Rāsh" of the Assyrian inscriptions, is the best. Sargon of Assyria (c 710 BC) conquered the countries "from the land of Rāšu on the border of Elam as far as the river of Egypt," and this country is further described in his Khorsabad Inscription, 18, as "the land of Rāšu, of the boundary of Elam, which is beside the Tigris." Assyria having disappeared from among the nations when Ezekiel wrote his prophecies, Babylonia was probably the only power with which "Gog of the land of Magog" would have had to reckon, but it may well be doubted whether the Bab king would have allowed him to exercise power in the district of Rāšu, except as a very faithful vassal. It may here be noted that the Heb spelling of Rosh presupposes an earlier pronunciation as Rāsh, a form agreeing closely with that used by the Assyrians. See Fried. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? 325.

ROT, rot, ROTTENNESS, rot'n-nes (vb. רָקַב, rākēbh, noun rākābh [rikkābhōn, Job 41 27], with מַא, maḥ, "decay" [Isa 5 24], and שֶׁבַח, 'ābhash, "shrivel" [so Joel 1 17 RVm]): "Rottenness of the bones" (Prov 12 4; 14 30; Hab 3 16) is ulceration (caries) of the bones, used as an example of an intensely painful disease. AV, in addition, has "rot" in Nu 5 21.22.27, where RV has "fall away" (נָפַל, nāphal), but a euphemistic paraphrase is in point (see the comms.). In Jer 38 11.12 AV has "old rotten rags" for מֵלֶאֱח, melāḥ, "rag" (RV "worn-out garments," a tr that specializes too far).

ROTE, rōt: RVm gives "learned by rote" in Isa 29 13 for AV "taught," which indicates that the service of Jeh was merely formal.

ROWER, rō'ēr, ROWING, rō'ing. See SHIPS AND BOATS, III, 1.

ROYAL, roi'al: Either belonging to a king (kingdom) or having kingly power, dignity, authority, etc. In Heb, the word is expressed by using different nouns in the gen. case (the "construct state"). They are: (1) melekēh, "king": "Asher . . . shall yield royal dainties," lit. choice morsels of the king, meaning fit for a king (Gen 49 20); "besides that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty," lit. which he gave her according to the hand (the wealth) of King Solomon (1 K 10 13; cf RVm); "a royal statute," lit. statute of a malkā, which is the emphatic Aram. term for melekēh, "king" (Dnl 6 7); (2) mamlākāh, "the power and dignity of a king," "Gibeon . . . one of the royal cities," i.e. a capital city with a king of her own (Josh 10 2; cf 1 S 27 5); "all the seed royal," lit. the seed of the kingdom (2 K 11 1; cf 2 Ch 22 10); (3) malkhūth, "kinghood," "kingdom": "royal majesty," lit.

majesty of kinghood (1 Ch 29 25); quite frequently in the Book of Est; royal wine (1 7); crown (1 11; cf 2 17; 6 8); commandment (1 19); "her royal estate," lit. her kinghood (1 19); house royal (2 16; cf 5 1); royal apparel (5 1; cf 6 8. 15); throne (5 1); (4) m'lākāh, "kingdom," "kingly power and dignity": "royal city," lit. the city of the kingdom, meaning here that part of the city (Rabbah) in which the royal palace was situated (2 S 12 26); "royal diadem," lit. turban of kinghood (Isa 62 3); (5) in Jer 43 10 we find the word shaphrīr; its meaning is uncertain: "royal pavilion" (RV and AV), "glittering" (RVm), "scepter," "a carpet covering a throne."

The NT uses the word for basilikós, "belonging to a king": "royal apparel" (Acts 12 21); "the royal law," something like "the golden rule," being foremost because including all others (Jas 2 8), and for basileios (being vested with kingly power and honor), "royal priesthood," the Heb rendering would be mamlēketh kōhānīm, "a kingdom of priests," i.e. a kingdom whose citizens are priests, emphasizing the two facts that the true Christians have free access to the grace of God and that they enjoy the liberties and privileges of His kingdom (1 Pet 2 9).

RUBY, rōō'bi. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

RUDDER, rud'ēr, RUDDER-BANDS. See SHIPS AND BOATS, III, 2, (3).

RUDDY, rud'i (רֹדְדִי, 'adhmonē [1 S 16 12; 17 42; Gen 25 25 RVm], רֹדְדִי, 'adhōm [Cant 5 10]; vbs. רֹדַד, 'ādham [Lam 4 7], and ἐρυθρίαώ, eruthriāō, "to blush" [Ad Est 15 5]): "Ruddy" is the form taken by the adj. "red" when used as a term of praise of the human skin, and this is its use in the Bible (the Heb and Gr words are all usual words for "red" or "to be red"). The dark-skinned Hebrews found great beauty in a clear complexion.

RUDE, rōōd: Not "impolite" in EV (except perhaps 2 Mac 12 14), but "untrained," "ignorant"; of the modern phrase, "a rude drawing." So Sir 8 4 (ἀπαίδευτος, apaidēutos) and 2 Cor 11 6 (ἰδιώτης, idiōtēs, "though I lack technical training in rhetoric"); cf AV and RVm Sir 21 24.

RUDIMENTS, rōō'di-ments (στοιχεῖα, stoicheia, pl. of στοιχείον, stoicheion [Gal 4 3.9; Col 2 8.20; He 5 12; 2 Pet 3 10.12]): This word occurs 7 t in the NT, and AV translates it in three different ways. In the two passages in Gal, and in the two in 2 Pet, it is rendered "elements." In the two passages in Col, it is tr'd "rudiments." In He it is rendered "first principles."

The etymological meaning of the word is, that which belongs to a row or rank, hence any first thing, an element, first principle. It denotes, specially (1) the letters of the alphabet, the spoken sounds, as the elements of speech; (2) the material elements of the universe, the physical atoms of which the world is composed; (3) the heavenly bodies; (4) the elements, rudiments, fundamental principles of any art, science or discipline; cf the phrase, "the a, b, c."

(1) The NT use of the word, where it always occurs in the pl., is as follows: In 2 Pet 3 10.12, "The elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat," that is, the physical elements of the world and of the heavens are to be consumed, or subjected to change, by means of fire. In Hc 5 12, AV "Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God." This

2. Use of Term in the NT means that the Heb Christians had not made the advance expected, in grace and in the knowledge of God, but were in need of instruction in the elementary truths of the Christian faith.

(2) The Pauline use of the term is in Gal and Col; see references as above. In Gal 4 3.9 AV Paul writes, "When we were children, [we] were in bondage under the elements of the world"; "How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?" The apostle here means the ceremonial precepts of the worship of the Jews. These requirements involved much and protracted difficulty in their observance; they were "a yoke . . . which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear" (Acts 15 10). Yet the Galatian converts were turning back again to these legal ordinances, and desired to be in bondage to them. These elements were "of the world," they had reference to material and not to spiritual things, they were formal and sensuous. They were "weak," for they had no power to rescue man from condemnation, and they could not save him from sin. They were "beggarly," for they brought no endowment of the heavenly riches. By these epithets Paul signifies that rites, ordinances, sacrifices, observance of days and seasons belonged to the elementary stages of the Jewish religion, which had now attained its end and purpose in the coming of Christ and His work. These things were necessary at the time they were Divinely instituted, but the time had come when they were no longer required. They contained and conveyed an elementary knowledge, and were intended, from the first, to lead to an advance in the moral and spiritual life, which is now revealed in Christ.

It has been thought by some that what is meant by "elements" or "rudiments" in Gal and Col is the physical elements, presided over by angels, and that this is in some way connected with the worship of angels, to which Paul refers in Col 2 18. The Jews believed that there were angels of fire and of the wind, and of the other physical elements. The apostle therefore wished to show the foolishness of the worship of angels and of the heavenly bodies which they were supposed to control.

This latter meaning of the term is a possible, but not a probable one. The interpretation, already first given, which understands "elements" to mean the ordinances of Jewish legalism, is most in harmony with the gospel and with the teaching of Paul. "This is probably the correct interpretation, both as simpler in itself and as suiting the context better. St. Paul seems to be dwelling still on the rudimentary character of the law, as fitted for an earlier stage in the world's history" (Lightfoot, Comm. on Gal, 167).

In Col 2 8 AV Paul writes, "Beware lest any man spoil you . . . after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ"; and in ver 20, AV "Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why . . . are ye subject to ordinances?" The meaning of the term here is the elements of religious training, the ceremonial precepts of the Jewish Law. In Col and Gal the meaning is that the systems of the false teachers, both in Colossae and in Galatia, laid stress on Jewish ritual, ceremonial law and ascetic observances—things of this world, belonging to the visible sphere, things elementary, and intended, so far as the Jewish Law is concerned, simply as a preparation for the coming of Christ. Such were the rudiments of the world, so far as their source was Jewish. On their heathen side they were still more decidedly anti-Christian. Both of these tendencies, Jewish and heathen, were "not according to Christ." For Christ Himself who atoned for sin, and who now lives and reigns, delivers believers from all such methods, as well as from the need of them. JOHN RUTHERFURD

RUE, rōō (πήγανον, péganon): One of the plants mentioned in Lk 11 42 as subject to tithe: in the passage, Mt 23 23, anise and cummin are mentioned. Ruta graveolens (N.O. Rutaceae) is the officinal rue, and a very similar species, R. chalepensis, is indigenous. Rue is a small shrub growing 2 to 4 ft. high with a heavy odor, disagreeable to Westerners, but a favorite with Orientals. A sprig of rue is often fixed on a child's cap or clothes as a kind of charm.

Rue (Ruta graveolens).

RUFUS, rōō'fus (Ρούφος, Rhoúphos): The name is mentioned twice: (1) Simon of Cyrene, who was compelled to bear the cross of Jesus, is "the father of Alexander and Rufus" (Mk 15 21); (2) Paul sends greetings to Rom Christians, "Rufus the chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine" (Rom 16 13). Rufus was well known among those for whom Mark primarily wrote his Gospel, and according to tradition this was the Christian community at Rome. There seems no reason to doubt, therefore, that the Rufus of Mark and the Rufus of Paul are the same person. The name, meaning "red," "reddish," was, however, one of the commonest of slave names; the identification of these two is therefore merely a conjecture. The Rufus whom Paul greets is "the chosen in the Lord," i.e. "that choice Christian" (Denney). Since all Christians are "chosen," this title must express some distinction. The mother of Rufus had played the mother's part to Paul on some occasion of which we are ignorant, hence the phrase "his mother and mine" (cf Mk 10 30). S. F. HUNTER

RUG, rug: Alternative rendering of a word (שִׁמְרִיָּה, s'mikhāh) in Jgs 4 18 RV, "mantle" AV. The tr is doubtful; OHL gives "rug or thick coverlet [?]."

RUHAMAH, rōō-hā'ma, rōō-hā'ma: See LO-RUHAMA, the symbolical name of Hosea's daughter (Hos 1 6.8).

RUIN, rōō'in (הַרְיִסָּה, hārīśāh, etc; ῥήγμα, rhēgma): "Ruin," the tr of hārīśāh (Am 9 11; cf Acts 15 16, where RV Gr text, tá katestramména), and of a number of other Heb words: in Lk 6 49 rhēgma, "breakage," is used both in a literal sense (Isa 23 13; 25 2, of fallen buildings; Ezk 27 27; 31 13, of a state or people; Lk 6 49, of a house, etc) and with a moral significance (Prov 26 28). RVm correctly renders mikhshōl in Ezk 18 30 "stumblingblock" (AV "ruin"), and RV in 21 15 "stumbleings" (AV "ruins"). RV has "ruins" for AV "desolations" in Ezr 9 9, m "waste places"; Ps 74 3; "in their ruins" for "with their mattocks" (2 Ch 34 6, m "with their axes." The Heb is obscure"); "midst of the ruin" for "desolation" (Job 30 14); "their ruin" for "their wickedness" (Prov 21 12). "Ruinous" is the tr of map-pālāh (Isa 17 1) and of nāçāh (2 K 19 25; Isa 37 26). W. L. WALKER

RULER, rōō'l'er:

(1) מֶשֶׁל, mōshēl, "ruler," "prince," "master" (tyrant), applied to Joseph in Egypt (Gen 45 8; cf Ps 105 21); to the Philis (Jgs 15 11); to David's descendants, the future kings of Israel (2 Ch 7

18; cf Jer 33 26); to Pharaoh (Ps 105 20); to a wicked prince, a tyrant (Prov 28 15; cf Isa 14 5; 49 7); to the theocratic king,

1. In the the Messiah (Mic 5 2); it is often OT used in general (Prov 6 7; 23 1; 29 12; Eccl 10 4; Isa 16 1, etc).

(2) נָגִיד, nāghīdh, "leader," "noble" (nobles), "prince." In a number of instances RV renders it "prince," where AV has ruler (1 S 25 30; 2 S 6 21; 1 K 1 35, etc). It is used of Azrikam having charge of the palace of King Ahaz (2 Ch 28 7, "governor" of the house, AV); of Azariah (Seraiah, Neh 11 11), who is called the "ruler of the house of God" (1 Ch 9 11; cf 2 Ch 31 13); he was the leader of a division or group of priests. In 2 Ch 35 8 the names of three others are given (Hilkiah, Zechariah and Jehiel).

(3) נָשִׂיב, nāsīv, "prince" (so Nu 13 2, AV "ruler"); generally speaking, the nāsīv is one of the public authorities (Ex 22 28); the rulers of the congregation (Ex 16 22; cf 34 31); "The rulers brought the onyx stones" (Ex 35 27), as it was to be expected from men of their social standing and financial ability: "when a ruler [the head of a tribe or tribal division] sinneth" (Lev 4 22).

(4) שָׁגְחָן, shāghān, the representative of a king or a prince; a vice-regent; a governor; then, in the times of Ezra and Nehemiah, a leader or principal of the people of Jerus under the general supervision of these two men. The EV renders it "ruler" (Ezk 23 12,23), "deputy" (Jer 51 23,28,57), and, in most cases, "ruler" with "deputy" in m (Ezr 9 2; Neh 2 16; 4 14,19; 5 7,17; 7 5; 12 40; 13 11; Isa 41 25; Ezk 23 6) always used in pl.

(5) קַדְשֵׁיךָ, kāḥṣīn, "a judge" or "magistrate" (Isa 1 10; 3 6,7; 22 3; Mic 3 1,9); "a military chief" (Josh 10 24).

(6) רֹדֵה, rōdheh, one having dominion: "There is little Benjamin their ruler" (Ps 68 27); the meaning is obscure; still we may point to the facts that Saul, the first one to conquer the heathen (1 S 14 47 f), came of this the smallest of all the tribes, and that within its boundaries the temple of Jeh was erected.

(7) רֹזֵן, rōzēn, a "dignitary," a "prince." "The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against Jeh" (Ps 2 2); in the NT the word is rendered archontes (Acts 4 26).

(8) שָׂר, sar, "chief," "head"; prince, king; a nobleman having judicial or other power; a royal officer. RV renders it frequently "prince": "rulers over my cattle" ("head-shepherds," Gen 47 6); "rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds," etc (Ex 18 21); they had to be men of good character because they were endowed with judicial power (ver 22); in Dt 1 15 the rendering of EV is "captains," etc; they were military leaders. "Zebul the ruler of the city" (of Shechem, Jgs 9 30), meaning "governor" (cf 1 K 22 26; 2 K 23 8); "rulers [or captains; cf 1 K 16 9] of his [Solomon's] chariots" (1 K 9 22); the rulers of Jezreel (2 K 10 1) were, presumably, the ruler of the palace of the king and the ruler of the city of Samaria (cf ver 5). It is difficult to explain why they should be called the rulers of Jezreel; both LXX and Vulg omit the word; "the rulers of the substance which was king David's" (1 Ch 27 31) overseers of the royal domain; "The rulers were behind all the house of Judah" (Neh 4 16), the officers were ready to assume active command in case of an attack.

(9), (10) שְׂלִטוֹן, shlītōn, "a commander," "an officer": "the rulers of the provinces" (Dnl 3 2 f); שְׂלִיט, shallūt, "a person in power," "a potentate" (Dnl 2 10); there seems to be little doubt that the

Aram. term is used as an adj. (cf RVm); in Dnl 5 7 occurs the vb. shlāt, "to have dominion," "he shall rule as the third in rank" (cf vs 16,29).

(11) מַגְחָן, māghān, "shield": "Her rulers [shields] dearly love shame" (Hos 4 18). Perhaps we ought to read (with LXX) migg'onām, "their glory," and to translate it "they love shame more than their glory"; they would rather have a good (!) time than a good name.

(1) ἀρχων, archōn, used of the "rulers" of the Spartans (1 Macc 14 20) and, in a general sense, of the priest Mattathias (1 Macc 2 17). AV has the word also in a general sense in Sir 41 18 (RV "mighty man").

2. In the Apoc (2) ἡγούμενος, hēgōūmenos, "one leading the way." A quite general term, Sir 10 2 (ruler of a city); 17 17 (of gentile nations); 46 18 (of the Tyrians). Also 2 17 AV, (RV "he that ruleth"), and 32 1 RV ("ruler of a feast," AV "master").

(3) οἱ μεγιστάνες, hoi megistānes, a rare word found only in the pl. for "rulers of the congregation" (Sir 33 18). The same word in Mk 6 21 is tr'd "lords."

(4) 2 Macc 4 27 AV for ἐπάρχος, epárchos (RV "governor").

(5) AV inserts the word without Gr equivalent in 1 Macc 6 14; 11 57; 2 Macc 13 2.

(1) ἀρχων, archōn, "a person in authority," "a magistrate," "a judge," "a prince"; a councillor, a member of the supreme council of

3. In the NT the Jews; a man of influence. "There came a ruler" (Mt 9 18), meaning a ruler of the synagogue (cf Mk 5 22; Lk 8 41); see (2) below; "one of the rulers of the Pharisees" (Lk 14 1), perhaps a member of the Jewish council belonging, at the same time, to the Pharisees, or, more probably, one of the leading Pharisees; "the chief priests and the rulers" (Lk 23 13,35; 24 20; cf Jn 3 1; 7 26,48; 12 42; Acts 3 17; 4 5,8; 13 27; 14 5); the rulers were, with the chief priests and the scribes, members of the Sanhedrin, either of two councils of the Jews (the Great and the Lesser); they were lay-members (elders); "before the rulers" (Acts 16 19), the police magistrates (praetores, "praetors") of the city of Philippi; "Thou shalt not speak evil of a ruler of thy people" (Acts 23 5; cf Ex 22 28, nāsīv; see 1, [3] above), a magistrate, a person in authority (cf Acts 7 27,35; Rom 13 3, the public authorities); "the rulers of this world" (1 Cor 2 6,8), persons being mentally superior to their fellow-men, and so having great influence in shaping their opinions and directing their actions.

(2) ἀρχισυνάγωγος, archisynāgōgos, "ruler of the synagogue." He was the presiding officer of a board of elders, who had charge of the synagogue. Sometimes they, also, were given the same name (cf "one of the rulers of the synagogue," Mk 5 22,35; Lk 8 41,49; in Mt 9 18 Jairus is simply called archōn); the ruler mentioned in Lk 13 14 was, of course, the president of the board (cf Acts 18 17, Sosthenes), while in Acts 13 15 the phrase "rulers of the synagogue" simply signifies the board. It was a deliberative body, but at the same time responsible for the maintenance of good order in the synagogue and the orthodoxy of its members; having, therefore, disciplinary power, they were authorized to reprimand, and even to excommunicate, the guilty ones (cf Jn 9 22; 12 42; 16 2).

(3) ἀρχιτεράκλιος, architēriklios, the ruler ("steward," RVm) of the feast (Jn 2 8,9). See separate article.

(4) κοσμοκράτωρ, kosmokrātōr, a "world-ruler" (Eph 6 12). The angels of the devil (Mt 25 41; 12 45) or Satan, the prince of this world (Jn 12 31), participate in his power; they are his tools, their sphere of action being "this darkness," i.e. the morally corrupt state of our present existence.

(5) πολιτάρχης, politárchēs; the prefect of a city (Acts 17 6,8). Luke being the only one of the Bib. authors to hand down to us this word, it is a noteworthy fact that, in relatively modern times, a Gr inscription was discovered containing this very word and, moreover, having reference to the city of Thessalonica (AJT, 1898, II, 598-643). Here it was where Paul and Silas preached the gospel so successfully that the Jews, "being moved with jealousy," caused Jason and certain brethren to be dragged before the rulers of the city (epi tous politarchas). These magistrates suffered themselves to be made the tools of the unscrupulous Jews by demanding and getting security from Jason and the rest.

RULER OF THE FEAST (ἀρχιτρικλινος, architríklinos; AV governor): The word occurs in the NT in the account of the wedding feast in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2 8.9). According to Ecclus (32 1) it was customary to appoint a "master of the ceremonies" from among the invited guests. It was his duty to determine the places of the guests, to see that the ordinary rules of etiquette were observed, etc. and generally to supervise the arrangements. RVM "steward" is possible if the "governor of the feast" meant the "head waiter" (Merx renders "head servant of the feast"), and not one of the guests appointed for the purpose. But the context is in favor of the view that the person in question was one of the prominent guests—an intimate friend or relative of the host. See RULER, 2, (2). T. LEWIS

RUMAH, rōō'ma (רומה, rūmah; B, Ρουμά, Rhōumá, A, Ρουμά, Rhōumá): To this place belonged Pedaiah whose daughter Zebudah (RV "Zebidah") entered the harem of Josiah, king of Judah, and became the mother of Jehoiaikim (2 K 23 36). Jos (Ant, X, v, 2) calls the place Abouma, but this is an obvious clerical error for Arouma. This suggests a possible identification with Arumah (Jgs 9 41), which lay not far from Shechem. Another possible identification is with the Rumah mentioned by Jos (BJ, III, vii, 21) in Galilee (cf Neubauer, Géog. du Talm., 203), which may be identical with the modern Khirbet Rūmeh, about 3 miles N. of Seffūriyeh. Some, however, would identify Rumah with Dumah of Josh 15 52, where the substitution of r for d is supported by the LXX (Rheuma), possibly represented by the modern Dōmeh, about 13 miles S.E. of Beit Jibrin. This of course was in the territory of Judah, and no question of jus connubium is involved, such as might arise in the case of a Galilean site. W. EWING

RUMP, rump: AV uses this word as tr of רִמְפָּה, 'alyāh (Ex 29 22; Lev 3 9; 7 3; 8 25; 9 19), where RV correctly renders "fat tail." Reference is here had to the broad tail of the Syrian sheep, which occasionally weighs as much as 20 lbs., and is considered one of the daintiest portions of mutton. It was one of those portions of the peace and trespass offering which were not eaten by the priest or the sacrificer, but which with other choice portions were waved before the Lord and wholly burnt on the altar as a sweet savor unto Jeh.

RUNAGATE, run'a-gāt: A runaway: "The runagates continue in scarceness" (Ps 68 6, Prayer Book Version, RV "The rebellious dwell in a parched land").

RUNNER, run'ēr. See GAMES.

RUSH: (1) (רֹמֶשׂ, gōme'; πάπυρος, pápyros, "bulrushes," m "papyrus" [Ex 2 3]; "rush," m "papyrus" [Job 8 11]; "papyrus," AV "rush" [Isa 18 2]; "rushes" [35 7]): This is almost certainly the famous papyrus, Cyperus papyrus (N.O. Cyperaceae), known in Arab. as babir (whence comes our word "paper"). This plant, the finest of the sedges, flourishes plentifully in Upper Egypt; in Pal there is a great mass of it growing in the marsh to the N. of Lake Huleh, and it also occurs on the Lake of Galilee and the Jordan. Light boats of plaited papyrus have been used on the Nile from ancient times and are mentioned by many writers (cf Ex 2 3; Isa 18 2).

(2) (רֹמֶשׂ, 'aghamōn, "rope," m "Heb 'a rope of rushes," AV "hook" [Job 41 2]; "[burning] rushes," AV "caldrón" [Job 41 20]; "rush," AV "bulrush" [Isa 58 5]; "rush" in Isa 9 14; 19 15, used of the humble and lowly folk as contrasted with the "palm branch," the highest class): The word 'aghamōn comes from רֹמֶשׂ, 'āgham, meaning a marsh (see POOLS), being transferred from the place of the things growing there. The word doubtless includes not only the rushes—of which there are several kinds in Pal—but also members of the sedge family, the Cyperaceae. See also REED.

RUST, rust (רֹמֶשׂ, hel'āh; βρῶσις, brōsis): Strictly speaking rust is the red oxide of iron formed by the corrosion of that metal, but by extension it has come to mean corrosion produced on any metal. Hel'āh is tr^d "rust" in Ezk 24 11.12. This rendering is probably based on ver 11. Copper caldrons are still used in Bible lands. Such vessels must be constantly watched when on the fire to guard against the possibility of their becoming dry. If this should happen the contents, whatever they may be, and the vessel itself will be injured. The copper of the caldrón oxidizes and scales off in black or brownish scales, or rust. Wōs, wōs, was used in Gr to denote the corroding of metals. In Jas 5 3 occurs, "Your gold and your silver are rusted; and their rust . . . shall eat your flesh as fire." The writers must have had in mind the actions of chemicals upon these metals which formed some such compound as the caustic silver nitrate.

Brōsis, lit. "eating," which occurs in Mt 6 19. 20, may refer to the diseases which attack such vegetation as wheat, grapes, cucumbers, etc. In no country is the saying "where moth and rust consume" (Mt 6 19) more true than in Syria. Any metal subject to corrosion seems to rust faster in that country than anywhere else. There are also many rusting fungi which the people have not learned to destroy and which do much damage to the crops. See also SCUM. JAMES A. PATCH

RUTH, rōōth (רוּת, rūth; Ρούθ, Rhōūth): The name Ruth is found in the OT only in the book which is so entitled. It is a contraction for re'ūth (רֵעִית), perhaps signifying "comrade," "companion" (fem.; cf Ex 11 2, "every woman of her neighbor"). OHL, 946, explains the word as an abstract noun = "friendship." The Book of Ruth details the history of the one decisive episode owing to which Ruth became an ancestress of David and of the royal house of Judah. From this point of view its peculiar interest lies in the close friendship or alliance between Israel and Moab, which rendered such a connection possible. Not improbably also there is an allusion to this in the name itself.

The history lies in the period of the Judges (1 1), at the close of a great famine in the land of Israel.

Elimelech, a native of Bethlehem, had, 1. History with his wife Naomi and two sons, taken refuge in Moab from the famine. There, after an interval of time which is not more precisely defined, he died (1 3), and his two sons, having married women of Moab, in the course of a further ten years also died, and left Orpah and Ruth widows (1 5). Naomi then decided to return to Pal, and her two daughters-in-law accompanied her on her way (1 7). Orpah, however, turned back and only Ruth remained with Naomi, journeying with her to Bethlehem, where they arrived "in the beginning of barley harvest" (1 22). The piety and fidelity of Ruth are thus early exhibited in the course of the narrative, in that she refused to abandon her mother-in-law, although thrice exhorted to do so by Naomi herself, on account of her own great age and the better prospects for Ruth in her own country. Orpah yielded to persuasion, and returned to Moab, but Ruth remained with Naomi.

At Bethlehem Ruth employed herself in gleaning in the field during the harvest and was noticed by Boaz, the owner of the field, a near kinsman of her father-in-law Elimelech. Boaz gave her permission to glean as long as the harvest continued; and told her that he had heard of her filial conduct toward her mother-in-law. Moreover, he directed the reapers to make intentional provision for her by dropping in her way grain from their bundles (2 15 f). She was thus able to return to Naomi in the evening with a whole ephah of barley (ver 17). In answer to questioning she explained that her success in gleaning was due to the good-will of Boaz, and the orders that he had given. She remained accordingly and gleaned with his maidens throughout the barley and wheat harvest, making her home with her mother-in-law (2 23). Naomi was anxious for the remarriage of Ruth, both for her sake and to secure compliance with the usage and law of Israel; and sent her to Boaz to recall to him his duty as near kinsman of her late husband Elimelech (3 1 f). Boaz acknowledged the claim and promised to take Ruth in marriage, failing fulfilment of the legal duty of another whose relationship was nearer than that of Boaz himself (3 8-13). Naomi was confident that Boaz would fulfil his promise, and advised Ruth to wait in patience.

Boaz then adopted the customary and legal measures to obtain a decision. He summoned the near kinsman before ten elders at the gate of the city, related to him the circumstances of Naomi's return, with her desire that Ruth should be married and settled with her father-in-law's land as her marriage-portion, and called upon him to declare his intentions. The near kinsman, whose name and degree of relationship are not stated, declared his inability to undertake the charge, which he renounced in legal form in favor of Boaz according to ancient custom in Israel (4 6 ff). Boaz accepted the charge thus transferred to him, the elders and bystanders bearing witness and pronouncing a formal blessing upon the union of Boaz and Ruth (4 9-12). Upon the birth of a son in due course the women of the city congratulated Naomi, in that the continuance of her family and house was now assured, and the latter became the child's nurse. The name of Obed was given to the boy; and Obed through his son Jesse became the grandfather of David (cf Mt 1 5 6; Lk 3 31 32).

Thus the life and history of Ruth are important in the eyes of the narrator because she forms a link in the ancestry of the greatest king of Israel. From a more modern point of view the narrative is a simple idyllic history, showing how the faithful loving service of Ruth to her mother-in-law met with its due reward in the restored happiness of a peaceful and prosperous home-life for herself. Incidentally are illustrated also ancient marriage customs of Israel, which in the time of the writer had long since become obsolete. The narrative is brief and told without affectation of style, and on that account will never lose its interest. It has preserved more-over the memory of an incident, the national significance of which may have passed away, but to which value will always be attached for its simplicity and natural grace.

RUTH, BOOK OF: The place which the Book of Ruth occupies in the order of the books of the Eng. Bible is not that of the Heb. 1. Order in Canon. There it is one of the five the Canon m^ghillōth or Rolls, which were ordered to be read in the synagogue on 5 special occasions or festivals during the year.

In printed edd of the OT the m^ghillōth are usually arranged in the order: Cant, Ruth, Lam, Eccl, Est. Ruth occupied the second position because the book was appointed to be read at the Feast of Weeks which was the second of the 5 special days. In Heb MSS, however, the order varies considerably. In Spanish MSS generally, and in one at least of the Ger. school cited by Dr. Ginsburg (Intro to the Heb Bible, London, 1897, 4), Ruth precedes Cant; and in the former Eccl is placed before Lam. The m^ghillōth constitute the second portion of the k^thūbbim or Hagiographa, the third great division of the books of the Heb Scriptures. The Talm, however, dissociates Ruth altogether from the remaining m^ghillōth, and places it first among the Hagiographa, before the Book of Pss. By the Gr translators the book was removed from the position which it held in the Heb Canon, and because it described events contemporaneous with the Judges, was attached as a kind of appendix to the latter work. This sequence was adopted in the Vulg, and so has passed into all modern Bibles.

The book is written without name of author, and there is no direct indication of its date. Its aim is to record an event of interest and importance in the family history of David, and incidentally to illustrate ancient custom and marriage law. There is no ground for supposing, as has been suggested, that the writer had a polemical purpose in view, and desired to show that the strict and stern action taken by Ezra and Nehemiah after the return in forbidding mixed marriages was not justified by precedent. The narrative is simple and direct, and the preservation of the tradition which it records of the descent of Israel's royal house from a Moabite ancestress was probably due in the first instance to oral communication for some considerable time before it was committed to writing. The Book of 1 S also indicates a close relation between David and Moab, when during the period of his outlawry the future king confided his father and mother to the care of the king of Moab (1 S 22 3 f), and so far supports the truth of the tradition which is embodied in the Book of Ruth.

With regard to the date at which the narrative was committed to writing, it is evident from the position of the Book of Ruth in the Heb Canon that the date of its composition is subsequent to the close of the great period of the "earlier prophets." Otherwise it would have found a natural place, as was assigned to it in the Gr Bible, together with the Book of Jgs and other historical writings, in the second division of the Heb Scriptures. In the opening words of the book also, "It came to pass in the days when the judges judged" (Ruth 1 1), the writer appears to look back to the period of the Judges as to a comparatively distant epoch. The character of the diction is pure and chaste; but has been supposed in certain details, as in the presence of so-called Aramaisms, to betray a late origin. The reference to the observance of marriage customs and their sanctions "in former time in Israel" (4 7) does not necessarily imply that the composition of Ruth was later than that of Dt, in which the laws and rights of the succession are enjoined, or that the writer of the former work was acquainted with the latter in its existing form. Slight differences of detail in the procedure would seem to suggest the contrary. On the other hand, the motive of the book in the exhibition of the ancestry of David's house would have lost its significance and raison d'être with the death or disappearance of the last ruler of David's line in the early period of the return from Babylon (cf Zec 4 9). The most probable date therefore for the composition of the book would be in the later days of the exile, or immediately after the return. There is no clue to the authorship. The last four verses, giving the genealogy from Perez to David (cf 1 Ch 2 4-15; Mt 1 3-6; Lk 3 31-33), are generally recognized as a later addition.

The ethical value of the Book of Ruth is considerable, as setting forth an example of steadfast filial piety. The action of Ruth in 4. Ethical refusing to desert her mother-in-law Teaching and persevering in accompanying her to her own land meets with its due reward in the prosperity and happiness which become hers, and in the honor which she receives as ancestress of the royal house of David. The writer desires to show in the person and example of Ruth that a sincere and generous regard for the claims of duty and affection leads to prosperity and honor; and at the same time that the principles and recompense of righteous dealing are not dependent upon race, but are as valid for a Moabitess as for a Jew. There is no distinctive doctrine taught in the book. It is primarily historical, recording a decisive incident in the origin of David's house; and in the second place ethical, indicating and enforcing in a well-known example the advantage and importance of right dealing and the observance of the dictates of filial duty. For detailed contents see preceding article.

LITERATURE.—Eng. comms. upon the Book of Ruth are naturally not numerous. Cf G. W. Thatcher, "Judges and Ruth," in [New] Century Bible; R. A. Watson, in Expositor's Bible; the most recent critical comm. is by L. B. Wolfenson in AJSL, XXVII (July, 1911), 285 ff, who defends the early date of the book. This last, which is the root of shēbhā'im, is regarded by Arabists as coming from that root with the meaning of "to take captive," though seba'a, "he raided" (cf Job 1 15), has also been suggested.

2. Two Different Races Joktan, son of Eber; (3) the 1st son of Jokshan, 2d son of Abraham and Keturah, at least two nationalities of this name are implied. The former were identified by Jos (Ant, II, x, 2) with the tall people of Saba in Upper Egypt, described by him as a city of Ethiopia, which Moses, when in the service of the Egyptians, besieged and captured.

It is the Sem Sabaeans, however, who are the best known, and the two genealogies attributed to them (Joktan-Eber and Jokshan-Abraham)

3. Semitic Sabaeans and Their Commerce seem to imply two settlements in the land regarded as that of their origin. As Ezekiel (27 23) mentions Haran (Hirran), Canneh (Kannah), and Eden (Aden) as being connected with Sheba, and these three places are known to have been in Southern Arabia, their Sem parentage is undoubted. The Sabaeans are described as being exporters of gold (Isa 60 6; Ps 72 15), precious stones (Ezk 27 23), perfumes (Jer 6 20; Isa and Ezk), and if the rendering "Sabaeans" for Joel 3 (4) 8 be correct, the Sebaim, "a nation far off," dealt in slaves. The Sabbath was the day on which man was to leave off his secular labors and keep a day holy to Jeh.

I. Origin of the Sabbath.—The sketch of creation in Gen 1 1—2 3 closes with an impressive account of the hallowing of the

1. The Biblical Account 7th day, because on it God rested from all the work which He had made creatively. The word "Sabbath" does not occur in the story; but it is recognized by critics of every school that the author (P) means to describe the Sabbath as primeval. In Ex 20 8-11 (ascribed to JE) the reason assigned for keeping the 7th day as a holy Sabbath is the fact that Jeh rested after the six days of creative activity. Ex 31 17 employs a bold figure, and describes Jeh as refreshing Himself ("catching His breath") after six days of work. The statement that God set apart the 7th day for holy purposes in honor of His own rest after six days of creative activity is boldly challenged by many modern scholars as merely the pious figment of a priestly imagination of the exile. There are so few hints of a weekly Sabbath before Moses, who is comparatively a modern character, that argumentation is almost excluded, and each student will approach the question with the bias of his whole intellectual and spiritual history. There is no distinct mention of the Sabbath in Gen, though a 7-day period is referred to several times (Gen 7 4.10; 8 10.12; 29 27 f). The first express mention of the Sabbath is found in Ex 16 21-30, in connection with the giving of the manna. Jeh taught the people in the wilderness to observe the 7th day as a Sabbath of rest by sending no manna on that day, a double supply being given on the 6th day of the week. Here we have to do with a weekly Sabbath as a day of rest from ordinary secular labor. A little later the Ten Words were spoken by Jeh from Sinai in the hearing of all the people, and were afterward written on the two tables of stone (Ex 20 1-17; 34 1-5.27 f). The Fourth Commandment enjoins upon Israel the observance of the 7th day of the week as a holy day on which no work shall be done by man or beast. Children and servants are to desist from all work, and even the stranger within the gates is required to keep the day holy. The reason assigned is that Jeh rested on the 7th day and blessed it and hallowed it. There is no hint that the restrictions were meant to guard against the wrath of a jealous and angry deity. The Sabbath was meant to be a blessing to man and not a burden. After the sin in connection with the golden calf Jeh rehearses the chief duties required of Israel, and again announces the law of the Sabbath (Ex 34 21, ascribed to J). In the Levitical legislation there is frequent mention of the Sabbath (Ex 31 13-16; 35 2 f; Lev 19 3.30; 23 3.38). A wilful Sabbath-breaker was put to death (Nu 15 32-36). In the Deuteronomic legislation there is equal recognition of the importance and value of the Sabbath (Dt 5 12-15). Here the reason assigned for the observance of the Sabbath is philanthropic and humanitarian: "that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou." It is thus manifest that all the Pentateuchal codes, whether proceeding from Moses alone or from many hands in widely different centuries, equally recognize the Sabbath as one of the characteristic institutions of Israel's religious and social life. If we cannot point to any observance of the weekly Sabbath prior to Moses, we can at least be sure that this was one of the institutions which he gave to Israel. From the days of Moses until now the holy Sabbath has been kept by devout Israelites.

"The older theories of the origin of the Jewish Sabbath (connecting it with Egypt, with the day of Saturn, or in general with the seven planets) have now been almost entirely abandoned [see ASTRONOMY, I, 5]. The disposition at present is to regard the day as originally a lunar festival, similar to a Bab custom (Schrader, Stud. u. Krit., 1874), the rather as the cuneiform documents appear to contain a term šabattu or šabattum, identical in form and meaning with the Heb word šabbāthōn." Thus wrote Professor C. H. Toy in 1899 (JBL, XVIII, 190). In a syllabary (II R, 32, 16a, b) šabattum is said to be equivalent to am nah libbi, the natural tr of which seemed to be "day of rest of the heart." Schrader, Sayce and others so understood the phrase, and naturally looked upon šabattum as equivalent to the Heb Sabbath. But Jensen and others have shown that the phrase should be rendered "day of the appeasement of the mind" (of an offended deity). The reference is to a day of atonement or pacification rather than a day of rest, a day in which one must be careful not to arouse the anger of the god who was supposed to preside over that particular day. Now the term šabattum has been found only 5 or 6 t in the Bab inscriptions and in none of them is it connected with the 7th day of a week. There was, however, a sort of institution among the superstitious Babylonians that has been compared with the Heb Sabbath. In certain months of the year (Elul, Marcheshvan) the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st and 28th days were set down as favorable days, or unfavorable days, that is, as days in which the king, the priest and the physician must be careful not to stir up the anger of the deity. On these days the king was not to eat food prepared by fire, not to put on royal dress, not to ride in his chariot, etc. As to the 19th day, it is thought that it was included among the unlucky days because it was the 49th (7 times 7) from the 1st of the preceding month. As there were 30 days in the month, it is evident that we are not dealing with a recurring 7th day in the week, as is the case with the Heb Sabbath. Moreover, no proof has been adduced that the term šabattum was ever applied to these dies nefasti or unlucky days. Hence the assertions of some Assyriologists with regard to the Bab origin of the Sabbath must be taken with several grains of salt. Notice must be taken of an ingenious and able paper by Professor M. Jastrow, which was read before the Eleventh International Congress of Orientalists in Paris in 1897, in which the learned author attempts to show that the Heb Sabbath was originally a day of propitiation like the Bab šabattum (AJT, II, 312-52). He argues that the restrictive measures in the Heb laws for the observance of the Sabbath arose from the original conception of the Sabbath as an unfavorable day, a day in which the anger of Jeh might flash forth against men. Although Jastrow has supported his thesis with many arguments that are cogent, yet the reverent student of the Scriptures will find it difficult to resist the impression that the OT writers without exception thought of the Sabbath not as an unfavorable or unlucky day but rather as a day set apart for the benefit of man. Whatever may have been the attitude of the early Hebrews toward the day which was to become a characteristic institution of Judaism in all ages and in all lands, the organs of revelation throughout the OT enforce the observance of the Sabbath by arguments which lay emphasis upon its beneficent and humanitarian aspects.

We must call attention to Meinhold's ingenious hypothesis as to the origin of the Sabbath. In 1894

Theophilus G. Pinches discovered a tablet in which the term shapattu is applied to the 15th day of the month. Meinhold argues that shabbath in Bab denotes the day of the full moon. Dr. Skinner thus describes Meinhold's theory: "He points to the close association of new-moon and Sabbath in nearly all the preëxilic references (Am 8 5; Hos 2 11; Isa 1 13; 2 K 4 23 f); and concludes that in early Israel, as in Babylonia, the Sabbath was the full-moon festival and nothing else. The institution of the weekly Sabbath he traces to a desire to compensate for the loss of the old lunar festivals, when these were abrogated by the Deuteronomic reformation. This innovation he attributes to Ezekiel; but steps toward it are found in the introduction of a weekly day of rest during harvest only (on the ground of Dt 16 8 f; cf Ex 34 21), and in the establishment of the sabbatical year (Lev 25), which he considers to be older than the weekly Sabbath" (ICC on Gen, p. 39). Dr. Skinner well says that Meinhold's theory involves great improbabilities. It is not certain that the Babylonians applied the term sabattu to the 15th day of the month because it was the day of the full moon; and it is by no means certain that the early prophets in Israel identified Sabbath with the festival of the full moon.

The wealth of learning and ingenuity expended in the search for the origin of the Sabbath has up to the present yielded small returns.

II. History of the Sabbath after Moses.—The early prophets and historians occasionally make mention of the Sabbath. It is sometimes named in connection with the festival of the new moon (2 K 4 23; Am 8 5; Hos 2 11; Isa 1 13; Ezk 46 3). The prophets found fault with the worship on the Sabbath, because it was not spiritual nor prompted by love and gratitude. The Sabbath is exalted by the great prophets who faced the crisis of the Bab exile as one of the most valuable institutions in Israel's life. Great promises are attached to faithful observance of the holy day, and confession is made of Israel's unfaithfulness in profaning the Sabbath (Jer 17 21-27; Isa 56 2,4; 58 13; Ezk 20 12-24). In the Pers period Nehemiah struggled earnestly to make the people of Jerusalem observe the law of the Sabbath (Neh 10 31; 13 15-22).

With the development of the synagogue the Sabbath became a day of worship and of study of the Law, as well as a day of cessation from all secular employment. That the pious in Israel carefully observed the Sabbath is clear from the conduct of the Maccabees and their followers, who at first declined to resist the onslaught made by their enemies on the Sabbath (1 Macc 2 29-38); but necessity drove the faithful to defend themselves against hostile attack on the Sabbath (1 Macc 2 39-41). It was during the period between Ezra and the Christian era that the spirit of Jewish legalism flourished. Innumerable restrictions and rules were formulated for the conduct of life under the Law. Great principles were lost to sight in the mass of petty details. Two entire treatises of the Mish, Shabbâth and Erûbhîn, are devoted to the details of Sabbath observance. The subject is touched upon in other parts of the Mish; and in the Gemara there are extended discussions, with citations of the often divergent opinions of the rabbis. In the Mish (Shabbâth, vii.2) there are 39 classes of prohibited actions with regard to the Sabbath, and there is much hair-splitting in working out the details. The beginnings of this elaborate definition of actions permitted and actions forbidden are to be found in the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era. The movement was at flood tide during Our Lord's earthly ministry and continued for centuries afterward, in spite of His frequent and vigorous protests.

Apart from His claim to be the Messiah, there is no subject on which Our Lord came into such sharp conflict with the religious leaders of the Jews as in the matter of Sabbath observance. He set Himself squarely against the current rabbinic restrictions as contrary to the spirit of the original law of the Sabbath. The rabbis seemed to think that the Sabbath was an end in itself, an institution to which the pious Israelite must subject all his personal interests; in other words, that man was made for the Sabbath: man might suffer hardship, but the institution must be preserved inviolate.

Jesus, on the contrary, taught that the Sabbath was made for man's benefit. If there should arise a conflict between man's needs and the letter of the Law, man's higher interests and needs must take precedence over the law of the Sabbath (Mt 12 1-14; Mk 2 23-3 6; Lk 6 1-11; also Jn 5 1-13; Lk 13 10-17; 14 1-6). There is no reason to think that Jesus meant to discredit the Sabbath as an institution. It was His custom to attend worship in the synagogue on the Sabbath (Lk 4 16). The humane element in the rest day at the end of every week must have appealed to His sympathetic nature. It was the one precept of the Decalogue that was predominantly ceremonial, though it had distinct sociological and moral value. As an institution for the benefit of toiling men and animals, Jesus held the Sabbath in high regard. As the Messiah, He was not subject to its restrictions; He could at any moment assert His lordship over the Sabbath (Mk 2 28). The institution was not on a par with the great moral precepts, which are unchangeable. It is worthy of note that, while Jesus pushed the moral precepts of the Decalogue into the inner realm of thought and desire, thus making the requirement more difficult and the law more exacting, He fought for a more liberal and lenient interpretation of the law of the Sabbath. Rigorous sabbatarians must look elsewhere for a champion of their views.

The early Christians kept the 7th day as a Sabbath, much after the fashion of other Jews. Gradually the 1st day of the week came to be recognized as the day on which the followers of Jesus would meet for worship. The resurrection of Our Lord on that day made it for Christians the most joyous day of all the week. When Gentiles were admitted into the church, the question at once arose whether they should be required to keep the Law of Moses. It is the glory of Paul that he fought for and won freedom for his gentile fellow-Christians. It is significant of the attitude of the apostles that the decrees of the Council at Jerus made no mention of Sabbath observance in the requirements laid upon gentile Christians (Acts 15 28 f). Paul boldly contended that believers in Jesus, whether Jew or Gentile, were set free from the burdens of the Mosaic Law. Even circumcision counted for nothing, now that men were saved by believing in Jesus (Gal 5 6). Christian liberty as proclaimed by Paul included all days and seasons. A man could observe special days or not, just as his own judgment and conscience might dictate (Rom 14 5 f); but in all such matters one ought to be careful not to put a stumbling-block in a brother's way (Rom 14 13 ff). That Paul contended for personal freedom in respect of the Sabbath is made quite clear in Col 2 16 f, where he groups together dietary laws, feast days, new moons and sabbaths. The early Christians brought over into their mode of observing the Lord's Day the best elements of the Jewish Sabbath, without its onerous restrictions. JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST POSITION

The views entertained by Seventh-Day Adventists concerning the nature and obligation of the Sabbath may conveniently be presented under three general divisions: (1) what the Bible says concerning the Sabbath; (2) what history says concerning the Sabbath; (3) the significance of the Sabbath.

(1) OT teaching.—In their views concerning the institution and primal obligation of the Sabbath, Seventh-Day Adventists are in harmony with the views held by the Bible Says early representatives of nearly all the evangelical denominations. The Sabbath is coeval with the finishing of creation, and the main facts connected with establishing it are recorded in Gen 2 2.3. The blessing here placed upon the seventh day distinguishes it from the other days of the week, and the day thus blessed was "sanctified" (AV, RV "hallowed") and set apart for man.

That the Sabbath thus instituted was well known throughout the Patriarchal age is clearly established both by direct evidence and by necessary inference.

"If we had no other passage than this of Gen 2 3, there would be no difficulty in deducing from it a precept for the universal observance of a Sabbath, or seventh day, to be devoted to God as holy time by all of that race for whom the earth and all things therein were specially prepared. The first men must have known it. The words, 'He hallowed it,' can have no meaning otherwise. They would be a blank unless in reference to some who were required to keep it holy" (Lange's Comm. on Gen 2 3, I, 197).

"And the day arrived when Moses went to Goshen to see his brethren, that he saw the children of Israel in their burdens and hard labor, and Moses was grieved on their account. And Moses returned to Egypt and came to the house of Pharaoh, and came before the king, and Moses bowed down before the king. And Moses said unto Pharaoh, I pray thee, my lord, I have come to seek a small request from thee, turn not away my face empty; and Pharaoh said unto him, Speak. And Moses said unto Pharaoh, Let there be given unto thy servants the children of Israel who are in Goshen, one day to rest therein from their labor. And the king answered Moses and said, Behold I have lifted up thy face in this thing to grant thy request. And Pharaoh ordered a proclamation to be issued throughout Egypt and Goshen, saying, To you, all the children of Israel, thus says the king, for six days you shall do your work and labor, but on the seventh day you shall rest, and shall not perform any work; thus shall you do in all the days, as the king and Moses the son of Bathia have commanded. And Moses rejoiced at this thing which the king had granted to him, and all the children of Israel did as Moses ordered them. For this thing was from the Lord to the children of Israel, for the Lord had begun to remember the children of Israel to save them for the sake of their fathers. And the Lord was with Moses, and his fame went throughout Egypt. And Moses became great in the eyes of all the Egyptians, and in the eyes of all the children of Israel, seeking good for his people Israel, and speaking words of peace regarding them to the king" (Book of Jasher 70:41-51, published by Noah & Gould, New York, 1840).

"Hence you can see that the Sabbath was before the Law of Moses came, and has existed from the beginning of the world. Esp. have the devout, who have preserved the true faith, met together and called upon God on this day" (Luther's Works, XXXV, p. 330).

"Why should God begin two thousand years after (the creation of the world) to give men a Sabbath upon the reason of His rest from the creation of it, if He had never called man to that commemoration before? And it is certain that the Sabbath was observed at the falling of the manna before the giving of the Law; and let any considering Christian judge . . . (1) whether the not falling of manna, or the rest of God after the creation, was like to be the original reason of the Sabbath; (2) and whether, if it had been the first, it would not have been said, Remember to keep holy the Sabbath day; for on six days the manna fell, and not on the seventh; rather than 'for in six days God created heaven and earth, etc. and rested the seventh day.' And it is casually added, 'Wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it.' Nay, consider whether this annexed reason intimates not that the day on this ground being hallowed before, therefore it was that God sent not down the manna on that day, and that He prohibited the people from seeking it" (Richard Baxter, Practical Works, III, 774, ed 1707).

That the Sabbath was known to those who came out of Egypt, even before the giving of the Law at Sinai, is shown from the experience with the manna, as recorded in Ex 16 22-30. The double portion on the sixth day, and its preservation, was the constantly recurring miracle which reminded the people of their obligation to observe the Sabbath, and that the Sabbath was a definite day, the seventh day. To the people, first wondering at this remarkable occurrence, Moses said, "This is that which the Lord hath said, To-morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord" (ver 23 AV). And to some who went out to gather manna on the seventh day, the Lord administered this rebuke: "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?" (ver 28). All this shows that the Sabbath law was well understood, and that the failure to observe it rendered the people justly subject to Divine reproof.

At Sinai, the Sabbath which was instituted at creation, and had been observed during the intervening centuries, was embodied in that formal statement of man's duties usually designated as the "Ten Commandments." It is treated as an institution already well known and the command is, "Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy" (Ex 20 8). In the 4th commandment the basis of the Sabbath is revealed. It is a memorial of the Creator's rest at the close of those six days in which He made "heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is." For this reason "Jeh blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it." This blessing was not placed upon the day at Sinai, but in the beginning, when "God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it" (Gen 2 3).

From the very nature of the basis of the Sabbath, as set forth in this commandment, both the institution itself and the definite day of the Sabbath are of a permanent nature. So long as it is true that God created heaven and earth, and all things therein, so long will the Sabbath remain as a memorial of that work; and so long as it is true that this creative work was completed in six days, and that God Himself rested on the seventh day, and was refreshed in the enjoyment of His completed work, so long will it be true that the memorial of that work can properly be celebrated only upon the seventh day of the week.

During all the period from the deliverance out of Egypt to the captivity in Babylon, the people of God were distinguished from the nations about them by the worship of the only true God, and the observance of His holy day. The proper observance of the true Sabbath would preserve them from idolatry, being a constant reminder of the one God, the Creator of all things. Even when Jerus was suffering from the attacks of the Babylonians, God assured His people, through the prophet Jeremiah, that if they would hallow the Sabbath day, great should be their prosperity, and the city should remain forever (Jer 17 18). This shows that the spiritual observance of the Sabbath was the supreme test of their right relation to God. In those prophecies of Isaiah, which deal primarily with the restoration from Babylon, remarkable promises were made to those who would observe the Sabbath, as recorded in Isa 56 1-7.

(2) NT teaching.—From the record found in the four Gospels, it is plain that the Jews during all the previous centuries had preserved a knowledge both of the Sabbath institution and of the definite day.

It is equally plain that they had made the Sabbath burdensome by their own rigorous exactions concerning it. And Christ, the Lord of the Sabbath, both by example and by precept, brushed aside these traditions of men that He might reveal the Sabbath of the commandment as God gave it—a blessing and not a burden. A careful reading of the testimony of the evangelists will show that Christ taught the observance of the commandments of God, rather than the traditions of men, and that the charge of Sabbath-breaking was brought against Him for no other reason than that He refused to allow the requirements of man to change the Sabbath, blessed of God, into a merely human institution, grievous in its nature, and enforced upon the people with many and troublesome restrictions.

All are agreed that Christ and His disciples observed the seventh-day Sabbath previous to the crucifixion. That His followers had received no intimation of any proposed change at His death, is evident from the recorded fact that on the day when He was in the tomb they rested, "on the sabbath . . . according to the commandment" (Lk 23 56); and that they treated the following day, the first day of the week, the same as of old, is further evident, as upon that day they came unto the sepulcher for the purpose of anointing the body of Jesus. In the Book of Acts, which gives a brief history of the work of the disciples in proclaiming the gospel of a risen Saviour, no other Sabbath is recognized than the seventh day, and this is mentioned in the most natural way as the proper designation of a well-known institution (Acts 13 14, 27, 42; 16 13; 18 4).

In Our Lord's great prophecy, in which He foretold the experience of the church between the first and the second advent, He recognized the seventh-day Sabbath as an existing institution at the time of the destruction of Jerus (70 A.D.), when He instructed His disciples, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on a sabbath" (Mt 24 20). Such instruction given in these words, and at that time, would have been confusing in the extreme, had there been any such thing contemplated as the overthrow of the Sabbath law at the crucifixion, and the substitution of another day upon an entirely different basis.

That the original Sabbath is to be observed, not only during the present order of things, but also after the restoration when, according to the vision of the revelator, a new heaven and a new earth will take the place of the heaven and the earth that now are, is clearly intimated in the words of the Lord through the prophet Isaiah: "For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith Jeh, so shall your seed and your name remain. And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith Jeh" (Isa 66 22, 23).

Seventh-Day Adventists regard the effort to establish the observance of another day than the seventh by using such texts as Jn 20 19, 26; Acts 20 7; 1 Cor 16 1, 2; Rev 1 10 as being merely an afterthought, an effort to find warrant for an observance established upon other than Bib. authority. During the last two or three centuries there has been a movement for the restoration of the original seventh-day Sabbath, not as a Jewish, but as a Christian, institution. This work, commenced and carried forward by the Seventh-Day Baptists, has been taken up and pushed with renewed vigor by the Seventh-Day Adventists during the present generation, and the Bible teaching concerning the true Sabbath is now being presented in nearly every country, both civilized and uncivilized, on the face of the earth.

(1) Josephus.—This summary of history must necessarily be brief, and it will be impossible, for lack of space, to quote authorities. From the testimony of Jos it is clear that the Jews, as a nation, continued to observe the seventh-day Sabbath until their overthrow, when Jerus was captured by Titus, 70 A.D. As colonies, and individuals, scattered over the face of the earth, the Jews have preserved a knowledge of the original Sabbath, and the definite day, until the present time. They constitute a living testimony for the benefit of all who desire to know the truth of this matter.

(2) Church history.—According to church history the seventh-day Sabbath was observed by the early church, and no other day was observed as a Sabbath during the first two or three centuries (see HDB, IV, 322 b).

In the oft-repeated letter of Pliny, the Rom governor of Bithynia, to the emperor Trajan, written about 112 A.D., there occurs the expression, "a certain stated day," which is usually assumed to mean Sunday. With reference to this matter W. B. Taylor, in Historical Comms., ch i, sec. 47, makes the following statement: "As the Sabbath day appears to have been quite as commonly observed at this date as the sun's day (if not even more so), it is just as probable that this 'stated day' referred to by Pliny was the 7th day as that it was the 1st day; though the latter is generally taken for granted." "Sunday was distinguished as a day of joy by the circumstances that men did not fast upon it, and that they prayed standing up and not kneeling, as Christ had now been raised from the dead. The festival of Sunday, like all other festivals, was always only a human ordinance, and it was far from the intentions of the apostles to establish a Divine command in this respect, far from them, and from the early apostolic church, to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday. Perhaps at the end of the 2d cent., a false application of this kind had begun to take place; for men appear by that time to have considered laboring on Sunday as a sin" (Tertullian De Orat., c. 23). This quotation is taken from Rose's Neander, London, 1831, I, 33 f, and is the correct tr from Neander's first Ger. ed., Hamburg, 1826, I, pt. 2, p. 339. Neander has in his 2d ed., 1842, omitted the second sentence, in which he expressly stated that Sunday was only a human ordinance, but he has added nothing to the contrary. "The Christians in the ancient church very soon distinguished the first day of the week, Sunday; however, not as a Sabbath, but as an assembly day of the church, to study the Word of God together and to celebrate the ordinances one with another: without a shadow of doubt this took place as early as the first part of the 2d cent." (Geschichte des Sonntags, 60).

Gradually, however, the first day of the week came into prominence as an added day, but finally by civil and ecclesiastical authority as a required observance. The first legislation on this subject was the famous law of Constantine, enacted 321 A.D. The acts of various councils during the 4th and 5th cents. established the observance of the first day of the week by ecclesiastical authority, and in the great apostasy which followed, the rival day obtained the ascendancy. During the centuries which followed, however, there were always witnesses for the true Sabbath, although under great persecution. And thus in various lands, the knowledge of the true Sabbath has been preserved.

In the creation of the heavens and the earth the foundation of the gospel was laid. At the close of His created work, "God saw everything 3. The Significance of very good" (Gen 1 31). The Sabbath bath was both the sign and the memorial of that creative power which is able to make all things good. But man, made in the image of God, lost that image through sin. In the gospel, provision is made for the restoration of the image of God in the soul of man. The Creator is the Redeemer and redemption is the new creation. As the Sabbath was the sign of that creative power which wrought in Christ, the Word, in the making of the heaven and the earth and all things therein, so it is the sign of that same creative power working through the same eternal Word for the restoration of all things. "Wherefore if any man is in Christ, there is a new creation: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5 17 m). "For neither is circumcision anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation" (Gal 6 15 m). "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God afore prepared that we should walk in them" (Eph 2 10).

A concrete illustration of this gospel meaning of the Sabbath is found in the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The same creative power which wrought in the beginning was exercised in the signs and miracles which preceded their deliverance, and in those miracles, such as the opening of the Red Sea, the giving of the manna, and the water from the rock, which attended the journeyings of the Israelites. In consequence of these manifestations of creative power in their behalf, the children of Israel were instructed to remember in their observance of the Sabbath that they were bondmen in the land of Egypt. Israel's deliverance from Egypt is the type of every man's deliverance from sin; and the instruction to Israel concerning

2. What History Says about the Sabbath and the definite day, until the present time. They con-

the Sabbath shows its true significance in the gospel of salvation from sin, and the new creation in the image of God.

Furthermore, the seventh-day Sabbath is the sign of both the divinity and the deity of Christ. God only can create. He through whom this work is wrought must be one with God. To this the Scriptures testify: "In the beginning was the Word, . . . and the Word was God. . . . All things were made through him; and without him was not anything made that hath been made." But this same Word which was with God, and was God, "became flesh, and dwelt among us" (Jn 1 1.3.14). This is the eternal Son, "in whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of his grace" (Eph 1 7). To the Christian the Sabbath, which was the sign and memorial of that Divine power which wrought through the eternal Word in the creation of the heaven and the earth, becomes the sign of the same power working through the same eternal Son to accomplish the new creation, and is thus the sign of both the divinity and the deity of Christ.

Inasmuch as the redemptive work finds its chiefest expression in the cross of Christ, the Sabbath, which is the sign of that redemptive work, becomes the sign of the cross.

Seventh-Day Adventists teach and practise the observance of the Sabbath, not because they believe in salvation through man's effort to keep the law of God, but because they believe in that salvation which alone can be accomplished by the creative power of God working through the eternal Son to create believers anew in Christ Jesus.

Seventh-Day Adventists believe, and teach, that the observance of any other day than the seventh as the Sabbath is the sign of that predicted apostasy in which the man of sin would be revealed who would exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped.

Seventh-Day Adventists believe, and teach, that the observance of the true Sabbath in this generation is a part of that gospel work which is to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY, jūr'ni (σαββάτου ὁδός, sabbátou hodós): Used only in Acts 1 12, where it designates the distance from Jerus to the Mount of Olives, to which Jesus led His disciples on the day of His ascension. The expression comes from rabbinical usage to indicate the distance a Jew might travel on the Sabbath without transgressing the Law, the command against working on that day being interpreted as including travel (see Ex 16 27-30). The limit set by the rabbis to the Sabbath day's journey was 2,000 cubits from one's house or domicile, which was derived from the statement found in Josh 3 4 that this was the distance between the ark and the people on their march, this being assumed to be the distance between the tents of the people and the tabernacle during the sojourn in the wilderness. Hence it must have been allowable to travel thus far to attend the worship of the tabernacle. We do not know when this assumption in regard to the Sabbath day's journey was made, but it seems to have been in force in the time of Christ. The distance of the Mount of Olives from Jerus is stated in Jor (Ant, XX, viii, 6) to have been five stadia or furlongs and in BJ, V, ii, 3, six stadia, the discrepancy being explained by supposing a different point of departure. This would make the distance of the Sabbath day's journey from 1,000 to 1,200 yds., the first agreeing very closely with the 2,000 cubits. The rabbis, however, invented a way of increasing this distance without technically infringing the Law, by depositing some food at the 2,000-cubit limit, before the Sabbath, and declaring that spot a temporary domicile. They might then proceed 2,000 cubits from this point without transgressing the Law.

And in some cases even this intricacy of preparation was unnecessary. If, for instance, the approach of the Sabbath found one on his journey, the traveler might select some tree or some stone wall at a distance of 2,000 paces and mentally declare this to be his residence for the Sabbath, in which case he was permitted to go the 2,000 paces to the selected tree or wall and also 2,000 paces beyond, but in such a case he must do the work thoroughly and must say: "Let my Sabbath residence be at the trunk of that tree," for if he merely said: "Let my Sabbath residence be under that tree," this would not be sufficient, because the expression would be too general and indefinite (Tract. Erübbin 4 7).

Other schemes for extending the distance have been devised, such as regarding the quarter of the town in which one dwells, or the whole town itself, as the domicile, thus allowing one to proceed from any part of the town to a point 2,000 cubits beyond its utmost limits. This was most probably the case with walled towns, at least, and boundary stones have been found in the vicinity of Gaza with inscriptions supposed to mark these limits. The 2,000-cubit limits around the Levitical cities (Nu 35 5) may have suggested the limit of the Sabbath day's journey also. The term came to be used as a designation of distance which must have been more or less definite.

SABBATH, SECOND AFTER THE FIRST (σάββατον δευτερόπρωτον, sabbaton deutero-prōton [Lk 6 1], lit. "the second-first sabbath," of RVm): We will mention only a few of the explanations elicited by this expression. (1) It was the first Sabbath in the second year of a 7-year cycle comprising the period from one Sabbatic year to the other; (2) the first Sabbath after the second day of Passover, i.e. the first of the seven Sabbaths the Hebrews were to "count unto" themselves from "the morrow after the sabbath" (the day after Easter) until Pentecost (Lev 23 15); (3) the first Sabbath in the Jewish ecclesiastical year (about the middle of March), the first Sabbath in the civil year (about the middle of September) being counted as the "first-first" Sabbath; (4) the term deutero-prōtos, is a monstrous combination of the words deuteros, "second," and prōtos, "first," attributable to unskillful attempts at textual emendation on the part of copyists. This supposition would, of course, render unnecessary all other efforts to unravel the knotty problem, and, as a matter of fact, deutero-prōtos is omitted by many MSS (including \aleph and B). To those not feeling inclined to accept this solution we would suggest the first of the above-named explanations as the most natural and probable one.

SABBATHEUS, sab-a-thē'us: AV=RV SABBATEUS (q.v.).

SABBATHS, sab'aths, OF YEARS (שְׁבֻתֹת שָׁנִים, shabb'oth shānīm; ἀναπαύσεις ἐτών, anapaúseis etōn [Lev 25 8]): The seven sabbatic years preceding the Year of Jubilee. See SABBATICAL YEAR; JUBILEE YEAR; ASTRONOMY, I, 5.

SABBATICAL, sa-bat'ik-al, YEAR (שְׁבֻתֹת שָׁנִים, sh'nath shabbāthōn; ἐνιαυτὸς ἀναπαύσεως, eniaylōs anapaúsēs, "a year of solemn rest"; or שְׁבֻתֹת שָׁנִים, shabbath shabbāthōn; σάββατα ἀνάπαυσις, sabbata anápausis, "a sabbath of solemn rest" [Lev 25 4]; or שנת השמיטה, sh'nath ha-shemittah; ἔτος τῆς ἀφέσεως, étos tēs aphéseōs, "the year of release" [Dt 15 9; 31 10]: We find the first rudiments of this institution in the so-called Covenant Book (Ex 21-23). Its connection with the day of rest (Sabbath) is obvious, although it strikes us as somewhat remarkable that in Ex 23 10-12 the regulation regarding the 7th year should precede the statute respecting the 7th day. Still it seems natural that after the allusion in ver 9, "Ye were sojourners in the land of Egypt," the Covenant Book should put in a good word for the poor in Israel (ver 11: "Let it rest and lie fallow, that the poor of thy people may eat"). Even the beasts of the field are remembered (cf Jon 4 11).

1. Primary Intention We must, therefore, conclude that in this early period of the history of Israel the regulation regarding the 7th year was primarily intended for the relief of the poor and for the awakening of a sense of responsibility in the hearts of those better provided with the means of subsistence. It would be wrong, however, to deny its Sabbatic character, for the text says expressly, "But in the 7th year thou shalt let it rest" (lit. "thou shalt release it"), implying that the land was entitled to a rest because it needed it; it must be released for a time in order to gain fresh strength and insure its future fertility. Two motives, then, present themselves most clearly, one of a social, the other of an economic character, and both are rooted in God's dealings with Israel (cf Ex 21 1).

Another evidence of the humane spirit pervading the Mosaic Law may be found in Ex 21 2-6 where, in the case of a Heb slave, the length of his servitude is limited to six years. The connection with the idea of the Sabbath is evident, but we fail to detect here any reference to the Sabbatical year. It is clear that the 7th year in which a slave might be set free need not necessarily coincide with the Sabbatical year, though it might, of course. The same is true of Dt 15 12-15; it has nothing to do with the Sabbatical year. On the other hand it is reasonable to assume that the "release" mentioned in Dt 15 1-3 took place in the Sabbatical year; in other words, his scope had been enlarged in later years so as to include the release from pecuniary obligation, i.e. the remission of debts or, at least, their temporary suspension. This means that the children of Israel were now developing from a purely agricultural people to a commercial nation. Still the same spirit of compassion for the poor and those struggling for a living asserts itself as in the earlier period, and it goes without saying that the old regulation concerning the release of the land in the 7th year was still in force (cf ver 2: "because Jeh's release hath been proclaimed").

According to ver 1, this proclamation occurred at the end of every 7 years, or rather, during the 7th year; for we must be careful not to strain the expression "at the end" (cf ver 9, where the 7th year is called "the year of release"; it is quite natural to identify this 7th year with the Sabbatical year).

Moreover, we are now almost compelled to assert that the Sabbatical year by this time had become an institution observed simultaneously all over the country. From the wording of the regulation regarding the 7th year in the Covenant Book we are not certain about this in those early times. But now it is different. "Jeh's release hath been proclaimed."

It was a solemn and general proclamation, the date of which was very likely the day of atonement in the 7th month (the Sabbatical month).

3. General Observance The celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (booths) began five days later and it lasted from the 15th day to the 21st of the 7th month (Tisri). In the Sabbatical year, at that time, the Law was read "before all Israel in their hearing," a fact which tends to prove that the Sabbatical year had become a matter of general and simultaneous observance (cf Dt 31 10-13). Another lesson may be deduced from this passage: it gives us a hint respecting the use to which the people may have put their leisure time during the 12 months of Sabbatical rest; it may have been a period of religious and probably other instruction.

In Lev 25 1-7 the central idea of the Sabbatical year is unfolded. Although it has been said we should be careful not to look for too much of the ideal and dogmatic in the institutions of the children of Israel, yet we must never lose sight of the religious and educational character even of their ancient legislation.

One central thought is brought home to them, viz. God is the owner of the soil, and through His grace only the chosen people have come

4. Central Idea into its possession. Their time, i.e. they themselves, belong to Him: this is the deepest meaning of the day of rest; their land, i.e. their means of subsistence, belong to Him: this reveals to us the innermost significance of the year of rest. It was Jeh's pleasure to call the children of Israel into life, and if they live and work and prosper, they are indebted to His unmerited loving-kindness. They should, therefore, put their absolute trust in Him, never doubt His word or His power, always obey Him and so always receive His unbounded blessings.

If we thus put all the emphasis on the religious character of the Sabbatical year, we are in keeping with the idea permeating the OT, namely that the children of Israel are the chosen people of Jeh. All their agricultural, social, commercial and political relations were to be built upon their Divine calling and shaped according to God's sovereign will.

But did they live up to it? Or, to limit the question to our subject: Did they really observe the Sabbatical year? There are those who hold that the law regarding the Sabbatical year was not observed before the captivity. In order to prove this assertion they point to Lev 26 34 f.43; also to 2 Ch 36 21. But all we can gather from these passages is the palpable conclusion that the law regarding the Sabbatical year had not been strictly obeyed, a deficiency which may mar the effect of any law.

The possibility of observing the precept respecting the Sabbatical year is demonstrated by the post-exilic history of the Jewish people. Nehemiah registers the solemn fact that the reestablished nation entered into a covenant to keep the law and to maintain the temple worship (Neh 9 38; 10 32 ff). In ver 31 of the last-named chapter he alludes to the 7th year, "that we would forego the 7th year, and the exaction of every debt." We are not sure of the exact meaning of this short allusion; it may refer to the Sabbatical rest of the land and the suspension of debts.

For a certainty we know that the Sabbatical year was observed by the Jews at the time of Alexander the Great. When he was petitioned by the Samaritans "that he would remit the tribute of the 7th year to them, because they did not sow therein, he asked who they were that made such a petition"; he was told they were Hebrews, etc (Jos, Ant, XI, viii, 6).

During Maccabean and Asmonean times the law regarding the Sabbatical year was strictly observed, although it frequently weakened the cause of the Jews (1 Macc 6 49.53; Jos, Ant, XIII, viii, 1; cf BJ, I, ii, 4; Ant, XIV, x, 6; XV, i, 2). Again we may find references to the Sabbatical year in Jos, Ant, XIV, xvi, 2, etc; Tac. Hist. v.4, etc, all of which testifies to the observance of the Sabbatical year in the Herodian era. The words of Tacitus show the proud Roman's estimate of the Jewish character and customs: "For the 7th day they are said to have prescribed rest because this day ended their labors; then, in addition, being allured by their lack of energy, they also spend the 7th year in laziness." SABBEUS, sa-bē'us (Σαββα(ας), Sabbatias): In 1 Esd 9 32, the same as "Shemaiah" in Ezr 10 31.

SABI, sā'bī:

(1) A, Σαβέλ, Sabel, B, Τωβέλι, Tōbeis, Fritzsche; AV Sami): Eponym of a family of porters who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 28) = "Shobai" in Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45.

(2) AV = RV SABIE (q.v.).

SABIAS, sa-bī'as (Σαβίας, Sabias, Fritzsche, Ἀσαβίας, Asabias; AV Assabias): One of the six "captains over thousands" who supplied the Levites with much cattle for Josiah's Passover (1 Esd 1 9) = "Hashabiah" in 2 Ch 35 9.

SABIE, sā'bi-ē (Σαβειή, Sabeiē, or Σαβιή, Sabiē; AV Sabi): In 1 Esd 5 34 both AV and RV, following A, read "the sons of Phacareth, the sons of Sabie" (AV "Sabi") for the "Pochereth-hazzebaim" of Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59. B reads correctly as one proper name: "Phacareth Sabie."

SABTA, or SABTAH, sab'ta (סַבְתָּא, ṣabhtā', סַבְתָּה, ṣabhtāh): Third son of Cush (Gen 10 7 = 1 Ch 1 9). A place Sabta is probably to be looked for in South Arabia. Arab geographers give no exact equivalent of the name. Al Bekri (i.65) quotes a line of early poetry in which Dhu 'l Sabta is mentioned, and the context might indicate a situation in Yemamah; but the word is possibly not a proper name. It is usually identified with Saubatha (Ptol., vi.7, 38) or with the Sabota of Pliny (vi.32; xii.32), an old mercantile city in South Arabia celebrated for its trade in frankincense and, according to Ptolemy, possessing 60 temples. It is said also to have been the territory of a king Elisarus, whose name presents a striking resemblance to Dhu 'l-Adhār, one of the "Tubbas" or Himyarite kings of Yemen. Another conjecture is the Saphtha of Ptolemy (vi.7, 30) near the Arabian shore of the Pers Gulf. A. S. FULTON

SABTECA, sab'tē-ka (סַבְתְּכָא, ṣabht'khā'; Σαβακαθά, Sabakathá, Σεβέθαχά, Sebethachá; AV Sabtechah): The 5th named of the sons of Cush in the genealogy of Gen 10 5-7. In 1 Ch 1 8.9 AV reads "Sabtecha," RV "Sabteca." Many conjectures have been made as to the place here indicated. Recently Glazer (Skizze, II, 252) has revived the suggestion of Bochart that it is to be identified with Samyake in Carmania on the E. of the Pers Gulf. This seems to rest on nothing more than superficial resemblance of the names; but the phonetic changes involved are difficult. Others have thought of various places in Arabia, toward the Pers Gulf; but the data necessary for any satisfactory decision are not now available. W. EWING

SACAR, sā'kār (סַכָּר, sākhār):

(1) Father of Ahiam, a follower of David (1 Ch 11 35, B, Ἀχάρ, Achár, A, Σαχάρ, Sachár = "Sharar" of 2 S 23 33; Sharar is favored as the original reading).

(2) Eponym of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26 4).

SACKBUT, sak'but. See MUSIC, III, 1, (f).

SACKCLOTH, sak'klōth. See BURIAL.

SACRAMENTS, sak'ra-ments: The word "sacrament" comes from the Lat sacramentum, which in the classical period of the language was used in two chief senses: (1) as a legal term to denote the sum of money deposited by two parties to a suit which was forfeited by the loser and appropriated to sacred uses; (2) as a military term to designate the oath of obedience taken by newly

1. The Term enlisted soldiers. Whether referring to an oath of obedience or to something set apart for a sacred purpose, it is evident that sacramentum would readily lend itself to describe such ordinances as Baptism and the Lord's Supper. In the Gr NT, however, there is no word nor even any general idea corresponding to "sacrament," nor does the earliest history of Christianity afford any trace of the application of the term to certain rites of the church. Pliny (c 112 AD) describes the Christians of Bithynia as "binding themselves by a sacramentum to commit no kind of crime" (Epp. x.97), but scholars are now pretty generally agreed that Pliny here uses the word in its old Rom sense of an oath or solemn obligation, so that its occurrence in this passage is nothing more than an interesting coincidence.

It is in the writings of Tertullian (end of 2d and beginning of 3d cent.) that we find the first evidence of the adoption of the word as a technical term to designate Baptism, the Eucharist, and other rites of the Christian church. This Christian adoption of sacramentum may have been partly occasioned by the evident analogies which the word suggests with Baptism and the Eucharist; but what appears to have chiefly determined its history in this direction was the fact that in the Old Lat VSS (as afterward in the Vulg) it had been employed to translate the Gr μυστήριον, mysterion, "a mystery" (e.g. Eph 5 32; 1 Tim 3 16; Rev 1 20; 17 7)—an association of ideas which was greatly fostered in the early church by the rapidly growing tendency to an assimilation of Christian worship with the mystery-practices of the Gr-Rom world.

Though esp. employed to denote Baptism and the Eucharist, the name "sacraments" was for long

2. Nature and Number used so loosely and vaguely that it was applied to facts and doctrines of Christianity as well as to its symbolic rites. Augustine's definition of a sacrament as "the visible form of an invisible grace" so far limited its application. But we see how widely even a definition like this might be stretched when we find Hugo of St. Victor (12th cent.) enumerating as many as 30 sacraments that had been recognized in the church. The Council of Trent was more exact when it declared that visible forms are sacraments only when they represent an invisible grace and become its channels, and when it sought further to delimit the sacramental area by reenacting (1547) a decision of the Council of Florence (1439), in which for the first time the authority of the church was given to a suggestion of Peter Lombard (12th cent.) and other schoolmen that the number of the sacraments should be fixed at seven, viz. Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony—a suggestion which was supported by certain fanciful analogies designed to show that seven was a sacred number.

The divergence of the Protestant churches from this definition and scheme was based on the fact that these proceeded on no settled principles. The notion that there are seven sacraments has no NT authority, and must be described as purely arbitrary; while the definition of a sacrament is still so vague that anything but an arbitrary selection of particulars is impossible. It is perfectly arbitrary, for example, to place Baptism and the Lord's Supper, which were instituted by Christ as ordinances of the church, in the same category with marriage, which rests not on His appointment but on a natural relationship between the sexes that is as old as the human race. While, therefore, the Reformers retained the term "sacrament" as a convenient one to express the general idea that has to be drawn from the characteristics of the rites classed together under this name, they found the distinguishing marks of sacraments (1) in their institution by Christ, (2) in their being enjoined by Him upon His followers, (3) in their being bound up with His word and revelation in such a way that they become "the expressions of Divine thoughts, the visible symbols of Divine acts." And as Baptism and the Lord's Supper are the only two rites for which such marks can be claimed, it follows that there are only two NT sacraments. Their unique place in the original revelation justifies us in separating them from all other rites and ceremonies that may have arisen in the history of the church, since it raises them to the dignity of forming an integral part of the historical gospel. A justification for their being classed together under a common name may be found, again, in the way in which they are associated in the NT (Acts 2 41.42; 1 Cor 10 1-4) and also in the analogy which Paul traces between Baptism and the Lord's Supper on the one hand, and Circumcision and the Passover—the two most distinctive rites of the Old Covenant—on the other (Col 2 11; 1 Cor 5 7; 11 26).

The assumption made above, that both Baptism and the Lord's Supper owe their origin as sacraments of the church to their definite appointment by Christ Himself, has been strongly challenged by some modern critics.

(1) In regard to Baptism it has been argued that as Mk 16 15 f occurs in a passage (vs 9-20) which textual criticism has shown to have formed no part of the original Gospel, Mt 28 19, standing by itself, is too slender a foundation to support the belief that the ordinance rests upon an injunction of Jesus, more esp. as its statements are inconsistent with the results of historical criticism. These results, it is affirmed, prove that all the narratives of the Forty Days are legendary, that Mt 28 19 in particular only canonizes a later ecclesiastical situation, that its universalism is contrary to the facts of early Christian history, and its Trinitarian formula "foreign to the mouth of Jesus" (see Harnack, History of Dogma, I, 79, and the references there given). It is evident, however, that some of these objections rest upon anti-supernatural presuppositions that really beg the question at issue, and others on conclusions for which real premises are wanting. Over against them all we have to set the positive and weighty fact that from the earliest days of Christianity Baptism appears as the rite of initiation into the fellowship of the church (Acts 2 38.41, et passim), and that even Paul, with all his freedom of thought and spiritual interpretation of the gospel, never questioned its necessity (cf Rom 6 3 ff; 1 Cor 12 13; Eph 4 5). On any other supposition than that of its appointment by Our Lord Himself it is difficult to conceive how within the brief space of years between the death of Jesus and the apostle's earliest references to the subject, the ordinance should not only have originated but have established itself in so absolute a manner for Jewish and gentile Christians alike.

(2) In the case of the Lord's Supper the challenge of its institution by Christ rests mainly upon the fact that the saying, "This do in remembrance of me," is absent from the Mk-Mt text, and is found only in the Supper-narratives of Paul (1 Cor 11 24.25) and his disciple Luke (Lk 22 19). Upon this circumstance large structures of critical hypothesis have been reared. It has been affirmed that in the upper room Jesus was only holding a farewell supper with His disciples, and that it never occurred to Him to institute a feast of commemoration. It has further been maintained that the views of Jesus regarding the speedy consummation of His kingdom make it impossible that He should have dreamed of instituting a sacrament to commemorate His death. The significance of the feast was eschatological merely; it was a pledge of a glorious future hour in the perfected kingdom of God (see Mt 26 29 and parallels). And the theory has even been advanced that the institution of this sacrament as an ordinance of the church designed to commemorate Christ's death was due to the initiative of Paul, who is supposed to have been influenced in this direction by what he had seen in Corinth and elsewhere of the mystery-practices of the Gr world.

All these hypothetical fabrics fall, of course, to the ground if the underlying assumption that Jesus never said, "This do in remembrance of me," is shown to be unwarrantable. And it is unwarrantable to assume that a saying of Jesus which is vouched for by Paul and Luke cannot be authentic because it does not occur in the corresponding narratives of Matthew and Mark. In these narratives, which are highly compressed in any case, the first two evangelists would seem to have confined themselves to setting down those sayings which formed the essential moments of the Supper and gave its symbolic contents. The command of its repetition they may have regarded as sufficiently embodied and expressed in the universal practice of the church from the earliest days. For as to that practice there is no question (Acts 2 42.46; 20 7; 1 Cor 10 16; 11 26), and just as little that it rested upon the belief that Christ had enjoined it. "Every assumption of its having originated in the church from the recollection of intercourse with Jesus at table, and the necessity felt for recalling His death, is precluded" (Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, II, 279). That the simple historical supper of Jesus with His disciples in the upper room was converted by Paul into an institution for the gentile and Jewish churches alike is altogether inconceivable. The primitive church had its bitter controversies, but there is no trace of any controversy as to the origin and institutional character of the Lord's Supper.

In the NT the sacraments are presented as means of grace. Forgiveness (Acts 2 38), cleansing (Eph 5 25 f), spiritual quickening (Col 2 4. Efficacy 12) are associated with Baptism; the Lord's Supper is declared to be a participation in the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor 10 16). So far all Christians are agreed; but wide divergence shows itself thereafter. According to the doctrine of the Rom church, sacraments are efficacious ex opere operato, i.e. in virtue of a power inherent in themselves as outward acts whereby they communicate saving benefits to those who receive them without opposing any obstacle. The Reformed doctrine, on the other hand, teaches that their efficacy lies not in themselves as outward acts, but in the blessing of Christ and the operation of His Spirit, and that it is conditioned by faith in the recipient. The traditional Lutheran doctrine agrees with the Reformed in affirming that faith is necessary as the condition of saving benefits in the use of the sacraments, but resembles the Rom teaching in ascribing the efficacy of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, not to the attendant working of the Holy Spirit, but to a real inherent and objective virtue resident in them—a virtue, however, which does not lie (as the Rom church says) in the mere elements and actions of the sacraments, but in the power of the Divine word which they embody. See BAPTISM; LORD'S SUPPER.

LITERATURE

I. Terms and Definitions.—זָבַח, zebhaḥ, "sacrifice"; עֹלָה, 'olāh, "burnt offering"; חַטָּאת, ḥāṭṭāh, "sin offering"; אֲשָׁם, 'āshām, "guilt" or "trespass offering"; שְׁלֵמִים, shēlem, "peace offerings"; מִנְחָה, minḥāh, "offering," "present"; זֶבַח שְׁלָמִים, zebhaḥ shēlāmīm, "sacrifice of peace offerings"; זֶבַח הַתְּוֹדָה, zebhaḥ ha-tōdhāh, "thank offerings"; זֶבַח נְדָבָה, zebhaḥ nēdhābhāh, "free-will offerings"; זֶבַח נֶדֶר, zebhaḥ nedher, "votive offerings"; תְּנוּפָה, tēnūphāh, "wave offering"; תְּרוּמָה, tērūmah, "heave offering"; קָרְבָן, qorbān, "oblation," "gift"; אִשְׁשֶׁה, 'ishsheh, "fire offering"; נֶסֶךְ, nesekh, "drink offering"; כָּלִיל, kālil, "whole burnt offering"; חַג, ḥagh, "feast"; לְבֹנָה, lēbhōnāh, "frankincense"; קְטֹרֶת, qetōrēth, "odor," "incense"; מְלַח, melah, "salt"; שֶׁמֶן, shemen, "oil":

Zebhaḥ: a "slaughtered animal," a "sacrifice," general term for animals used in sacrifice, including burnt offerings, peace offerings, thank offerings, and all sacrifices offered to the Deity and eaten at the festivals. More particularly it refers to the flesh eaten by the worshippers after the fat parts had been burned on the altar and the priest had received his portion.

'Olāh: a "burnt offering" sometimes whole burnt offering. Derived from the vb. 'alāh, "to go up." It may mean "that which goes up to the altar" (Knobel, Wellhausen, Nowack, etc), or "that which goes up in smoke to the sky" (Bähr, Delitzsch, Dillmann, etc); sometimes used synonymously with kālil (q.v.). The term applies to heast or fowl when entirely consumed upon the altar, the hide of the beast being taken by the priest. This was perhaps the most solemn of the sacrifices, and symbolized worship in the full sense, i.e. adoration, devotion, dedication, supplication, and at times expiation. Ḥāṭṭāh, ḥāṭṭāḥ: a "sin offering," a special kind, first mentioned in the Mosaic legislation. It is essentially expiatory, intended to restore covenant relations with the Deity. The special features were: (1) the blood must be sprinkled before the sanctuary, put upon the horns of the altar of incense and poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering; (2) the flesh was holy, not to be touched by worshipper, but eaten by the priest only. The special ritual of the Day of Atonement centers around the sin offering.

'Ashām: "guilt offering," "trespass offering" (AV; in Isa 53 10, AV and RV "an offering for sin," ARV "trespass offering"). A special kind of sin offering introduced in the Mosaic Law and concerned with offences against God and man that could be estimated by a money value and thus covered by compensation or restitution accompanying the offering. A ram of different degrees of value, and worth at least two shekels, was the usual victim, and it must be accompanied by full restitution with an additional fifth of the value of the damage. The leper and Nazirite could offer he-lambs. The guilt toward God was expiated by the blood poured out, and the guilt toward men by the restitution and fine. The calling of the Servant an 'ashām (Isa 53 10) shows the value attached to this offering.

Shēlem, shēlāmīm: "peace offering," generally used in the pl., shēlāmīm, only once shēlem (Am 5 22). These were sacrifices of friendship expressing or promoting peaceful relations with the Deity, and almost invariably accompanied by a meal or feast, an occasion of great joy. They are sometimes called zēbhāḥīm, sometimes zebhaḥ shēlāmīm, and were of different kinds, such as zebhaḥ ha-tōdhāh, "thank offerings," which expressed the gratitude of the giver because of some blessings, zebhaḥ nēdhābhāh, "free-will offerings," bestowed on the Deity out of a full heart, and zebhaḥ nedher, "votive offerings," which were offered in fulfillment of a vow.

Minḥāh: "meal offering" (RV), "meat offering" (AV), a gift or presentation, at first applied to both bloody and unbloody offerings (Gen 4 5), but in Moses' time confined to cereals, whether raw or roasted, ground to flour or baked and mixed with oil and frankincense. These cereals were the produce of man's labor with the soil, not fruits, etc, and thus represented the necessities and results of life, if not life itself. They were the invariable accompaniment of animal sacrifices, and in one instance could be substituted for them (see SIN OFFERING). The term minḥāh describes a gift or token of friendship (Isa 39 1), an act of homage (1 S 10 27; 1 K 10 25), tribute (Jgs 3 15, 17 f), propitiation to a friend wronged (Gen 32 13, 18 [Hob 14 19]), to procure favor or assistance (Gen 43 11 ff; Hos 10 6).

Tēnūphāh: "wave offering," usually the breast, the priest's share of the peace offerings, which was waved before the altar by both offerer and priest together (the exact motion is not certain), symbolic of its presentation to Deity and given back by Him to the offerer to be used in the priests' service.

Tērūmah: "heave offering," something lifted up, or, properly, separated from the rest and given to the service of the Deity. Usually the right shoulder or thigh was thus separated for the priest. The term is applied to products of the soil, or portion of land separated unto the Divine service, etc.

Korbān: "an oblation," or "offering"; another generic term for all kinds of offerings, animal, vegetable, or even gold and silver. Derived from the vb. kārobh, "to draw near," it signifies what is drawn or brought near and given to God.

Ishsheh: "fire offering," applied to offerings made by fire and usually bloody offerings, but at times to the minhāh, the sacred bread and frankincense placed on the tables as a memorial, part of which was burned with the frankincense, the bulk, however, going to the priest. The gift was thus presented through fire to the Deity as a sort of etherialized food.

Nesekh: "drink offering," or "libation," a liquid offering of wine, rarely water, sometimes of oil, and usually accompanying the 'olāh, but often with the peace offerings.

Kālil: "whole burnt offering," the entire animal being burned upon the altar. Sometimes used synonymously with 'olāh. A technical term among the Carthaginians.

Haq̄h: a "feast," used metaphorically for a sacrificial feast because the meat of the sacrifices constituted the material of the feast.

L'bhōnāh: "frankincense," "incense," used in combination with the meal offerings and burnt offerings and burned also upon the altar in the holy place. See INCENSE.

K'tōrāh, k'tōreth: "smoke," "odor of sacrifice," or incense ascending as a sweet savor and supposed to be pleasing and acceptable to God.

Melah: "salt," used in all sacrifices because of its purifying and preserving qualities.

Shemen: "oil," generally olive oil, used with the meal offerings of cakes and wafers, etc.

Sacrifice is thus a complex and comprehensive term. In its simplest form it may be defined as "a gift to God." It is a presentation to Deity of some material object, the possession of the offerer, as an act of worship. It may be to attain, restore, maintain or to celebrate friendly relations with the Deity. It is religion in action—in early times, almost the whole of religion—an inseparable accompaniment to all religious exercises. Few or many motives may actuate it. It may be wholly piacular and expiatory, or an offering of food as a gift to God; it may be practically a bribe, or a prayer, an expression of dependence, obligation and thanksgiving. It may express repentance, faith, adoration, or all of these combined. It was the one and only way of approach to God. Theophrastus defines it as expressing homage, gratitude and need. Hubert and Mauss define it as "a religious act which by the consecration of the victim modifies the moral state of the sacrificer, or of certain material objects which he has in view, i.e., either confers sanctity or removes it and its analogue, impiety."

II. Origin and Nature of Sacrifices.—The beginnings of sacrifice are hidden in the mysteries of prehistoric life. The earliest narrative in Gen records the fact, but gives no account of the origin and primary idea. The custom is sanctioned by the sacred writings, and later on the long-established custom was adopted and systematized in the Mosaic Law. The practice was almost universal. The Vedas have their elaborate rituals. Some Sem peoples, Greeks, Romans, Africans, and Indians of Mexico offered human sacrifices. It is unknown in Australia, but even there something akin to it exists, for some natives offer a portion of a kind of honey, others offer a pebble or a spear to their god. For this practically universal habit of the race, several solutions are offered.

One view maintains that God Himself initiated the rite by Divine order at the beginnings of human history. Such a theory implies a monotheistic faith on the part of primitive man. This theory was strongly held by many of the Reformed theologians, and was based mainly on the narrative in Gen 4 4 f. Abel offered an acceptable sacrifice, and, according to He 11 4, this was

1. Theory because of his faith. Faber makes a of a Divine strong plea as follows: Since faith was Revelation what made the sacrifice acceptable to God, this faith must have been based upon a positive enactment of God in the past. Without this Divine positive enactment to guarantee its truthfulness, faith, in Abel, would have been superstition. In other words, faith, in order to be truly based and properly directed, must have a revelation from God, a positive expression of the Divine will. Fairbairn, in his Typology, goes further and holds that the skins wherewith Adam and Eve were clothed were from animals which had been slain in sacrifices. This is entirely without support in the narrative. The theory of a Divine order cannot be maintained on the basis of the Bib. narrative. Moreover, it involves certain assumptions regarding the nature of faith and revelation which are not generally held in this age. A revelation is not necessarily a positive Divine command, an external thing, and faith may be just as real and true without such a revelation as with it. That there may have been such a revelation cannot be denied, but it is not a necessary or probable explanation.

(1) The gift-theory.—By this it is held that sacrifices were originally presents to the deity which the offerer took for granted would be re-

2. Theories ceived with pleasure and even grati- of a Human tude. Good relations would thus be Origin established with the god and favors would be secured. Such motives, while certainly true among many heathen people, were obviously based upon low conceptions of the deity. They were either Nature-spirits, ancestral ghosts or fetiches which needed what was given, and of course the god was placed under obligations and his favor obtained. Or, the god may have been conceived of as a ruler, a king or chief, as was the custom in the East.

Cicero vouches for such a view when he says: "Let not the impious dare to appease the gods with gifts. Let them hearken to Plato, who warns them that there can be no doubt what God's disposition to them will be, since even a good man will refuse to accept presents from the wicked" (HDB, IV, 331a). This view of sacrifice prevails in classical literature. Spencer therefore thinks it is self-evident that this was the idea of primitive man. Tylor and Herbert Spencer also find the origin of sacrifices in the idea of a gift, whether to the deity or to dead ancestors, food being placed for them, and this afterward comes to be regarded as a sacrifice. Such a view gives no account of the peculiar value attached to the blood, or to the burnt offerings. It may account for some heathen systems of sacrifice, but can help in no degree in understanding the Bib. sacrifices.

(2) The magic theory.—There are two slightly variant forms of this: (a) that of R. C. Thompson (Sem Magic, Its Origins and Developments, 175-218), who holds that a sacrificial animal serves as a substitute victim offered to a demon whose activity has brought the offerer into trouble; the aim of the priest is to entice or drive the malignant spirit out of the sick or sinful man into the sacrificial victim where it can be isolated or destroyed; (b) that of L. Marillier, who holds that sacrifice in its origin is essentially a magical rite. The liberation of a magical force by the effusion of the victim's blood will bend the god to the will of the man. From this arose under the "cult of the dead" the gift-theory of sacrifice. Men sought to ally themselves with the god in particular by purifying a victim and effecting communion with the god by the application of the blood to the altar, or by the sacrifice of the animal and the contact of the sacrificer with its blood. Such theories give no account of the burnt offerings, meal offerings and sin offerings, disconnect them entirely from any sense of sin or estrangement from God, and divest them of all piacular value. They may account for certain depraved and heathen systems, but not for the Biblical.

(3) The table-bond theory.—Ablly advocated by Wellhausen and W. R. Smith, this view holds that sacrifices were meals which the worshippers and the god shared, partaking of the same food and thus establishing a firmer bond of fellowship between them. Sykes (Nature of Sacrifices, 75) first advocated this, holding that the efficacy of sacrifices "is the fact that eating and drinking were the known and ordinary symbols of friendship and were the usual rites in engaging in covenants and leagues." Thus sacrifices are more than gifts; they are deeds of hospitality which knit god and worshipper together. W. R. Smith has expounded the idea into the notion that the common meal unites physically those who partake of it. Though this view may contain an element of truth in regard to certain Arabian customs, it does not help much to account for Bible sacrifices. As A. B. Davidson says, "It fails utterly to account for the burnt offering, which was one of the earliest, most solemn and at times the most important of all the sacrifices."

(4) The sacramental communion theory.—This is a modification of the table-bond theory. The basis of it is the totemistic idea of reverencing an animal which is believed to share with man the Divine nature. On certain solemn occasions this animal would be sacrificed to furnish a feast. At this meal, according to men's savage notions, they literally "ate the god," and thus incorporated into themselves the physical, the intellectual and the moral qualities which characterized the animal. If the Divine life dwelt in certain animals, then a part of that precious life would be distributed among all the people (*RS*², 313). In some cases the blood is drunk by the worshippers, thus imbibing the life. Sometimes, as in the case of the sacred camel, they devoured the quivering flesh before the animal was really dead, and the entire carcase was eaten up before morning.

The brilliant work of W. R. Smith has not been universally accepted. L. Marillier has criticized it along several lines. It is by no means certain that totemism prevailed so largely among Semites and there is no evidence of its existence in Israel. Also, if an original bond of friendship existed between the god and the kin, there is no need to maintain it by such sacrificial rites. There is no clear instance of this having been done. If on the other hand there was no common bond between the god and the people but that of a common meal, it does not appear that the god is a totem god. There is no reason why the animal should have been a totem. In any case, this idea of sacrifice could hardly have been anything but a slow growth, and consequently not the origin of sacrifice. Hubert and Mauss also point out that W. R. Smith is far from having established the historical or the logical connection between the common meal and the other kinds of sacrifices. Under piacula he confuses purification, propitiation and expiations. His attempts to show that purifications of magical character are late and not sacrificial do not succeed. Smith's theory is mainly the sacramental, though he does recognize the honorific and piacular element. The theory may be applicable to some of the heathen or savage feasts of the Arabs, but not to the practices of the Hebrews (see Enc Brit, XXIII, 981).

(5) The homage theory.—This has been advocated by Warburton and F. D. Maurice. The idea is that sacrifices were originally an expression of homage and dependence. Man naturally felt impelled to seek closer communion with God, not so much from a sense of guilt as from a sense of dependence and a desire to show homage and obedience. In giving expression to this, primitive man had recourse to acts rather than words and thoughts. Thus sacrifice was an acted prayer, rather than a prayer in words. It was an expression of his longings and aspirations, his reverence and submission. There is much truth in this view; the elements of prayer—dependence and submission—enter into some sacrifices, the burnt offerings in particular; but it does not account for all kinds of offerings.

(6) The piacular theory.—This holds that sacrifices are fundamentally expiatory or atoning, and the death of the beast is a vicarious expiation of the sins of the offerer. Hubert and Mauss admit that in all sacrifices there are some ideas of purchase or substitution, though these may not have issued from some primitive form. The unifying principle in all sacrifices is that the Divine is put in communication with the profane by the intermediary—the victim—which may be piacular or honorific. It is thus a messenger, a means of divination, a means of alimending the eternal life of the species, a source of magical energy which the rite diffuses over objects in its neighborhood. Westermarck (Origin of Moral Ideas) makes the original idea in sacrifice a piaculum, a substitute for the offerer.

This view is the most simple, the most natural, and the only one that can explain certain sacrifices. Man felt himself under liability to punishment or death. The animal was his, it had life, it was of value, and perchance the god would accept that life in place of his. He felt that it would be accepted, and thus the animal was sacrificed. The offerer in a sense gives up part of himself. The beast must be his own; no sacrifice can be made of another person's property (2 S 24 24a). The true spirit of sacrifice appears in a willingness to acknowledge God's right to what is best and dearest (Gen 12).

Objection is raised to this by A. B. Davidson (OT Theology), Paterson (HDB, IV, 331) and others, on the ground that such an origin represents too advanced a stage of ethical thought and reflection for primitive man. We question seriously whether this be an advanced stage of moral reflection. On the contrary, it represents a very simple and primitive stage. The feeling that sin of some kind is never absent from human life, and that its true penalty is death, has been inseparable from the human heart's sense of sin. What could be more simple and natural than to take an innocent animal and offer it in place of himself, hoping that the Deity would accept it instead? Nor is there much force in Professor Paterson's objection that sacrifices were preponderantly joyous in character and therefore could not be offered as an expiation. This joyous character belongs to such sacrifices as peace offerings and thank offerings, but does not belong to the 'olâh and others. In most cases the joyous feast followed the killing of the animal by which the expiation was accomplished, and the feast was joyous because atonement had been made. In fact, many sacrifices were of the most solemn character and represented the deepest and most serious emotions of the heart.

(7) Originating in religious instincts.—Neither the theory of an objective Divine revelation, nor of a human origin will account for the universality and variety of sacrifices. The truth lies in a proper combination of the two. The notion of offering a gift to the Deity arose out of the religious instincts of the human heart, which in an early period had a consciousness of something wrong between itself and God, and that this something would mean death sooner or later. Added to these true instincts was the Omnipresent Spirit to guide men in giving expression. What could be more simple and primitive than to offer something possessing life? Of course the notion originated in simple and childlike ideas of God, and its real motive was not to gratify God by sharing a meal with Him, or to gain His favor by a bribe, but to present Him with something that represented a part of the offerer which might be accepted in his stead. Thus sacrifices became the leading features of the religious life of primitive man. Naturally other ideas would be added, such as a gift of food by fire to the Deity, the peace offerings, etc., to celebrate the friendly relations with God, the thank offerings, the sin offerings, etc., all of which naturally and logically developed from the primitive idea. It might be expected that there would be many corruptions and abuses, that the sense of sin would be obscured or lost among some peoples, and the idea of sacrifice correspondingly degraded. Such has been the case, and as well might we try to understand man at his best by studying the aboriginal tribes of Africa and Australia, or the inmates of asylums and penitentiaries, as to attempt to understand the Bible ideas in sacrifices by studying the cults of those heathen and savage tribes of Semites, etc.

III. Classification of Sacrifices.—Maimonides was among the first to classify them, and he divided them into two kinds: (1) Those on behalf of the whole congregation, fixed by statute, time, number and ritual being specified. This would include burnt, meal and peace offerings with their accompaniments. (2) Those on behalf of the individual, whether by virtue of his connection with the community or as a private person. These would be burnt, sin and guilt offerings with their accompaniments.

Others, such as W. R. Smith, classify them as: (1) honorific, or designed to render homage, devotion, or adoration, such as burnt, meal and peace offerings; (2) placular, designed to expiate or make atonement for the errors of the people, i.e. burnt, sin and guilt offerings; (3) communistic, intended to establish the bond between the god and the worshipper, such as peace offerings.

Oehler divides them into two classes, viz.: (1) those which assume that the covenant relation is undisturbed, such as peace offerings; (2) those intended to do away with any disturbance in the relation and to set it right, such as burnt, sin and guilt offerings.

Professor Paterson and others divide them into three: (1) animal sacrifices, burnt, peace, sin and guilt offerings; (2) vegetable sacrifices, meal offerings, shewbread, etc; (3) liquid and incense offerings; wine, oil, water, etc.

H. M. Wiener offers a more suggestive and scientific division (Essays on Pentateuchal Criticism, 200 f): (1) customary law offerings, such as had from time immemorial been offered on rude altars of earth or stone, without priest, used and regulated by Moses and in more or less general use until the exile, viz. burnt, meal and peace offerings; (2) statutory individual offerings, introduced by Moses, offered by laymen with priestly assistance and at the religious capital, i.e. burnt, peace, meal, sin and guilt offerings; (3) statutory national offerings introduced by Moses and offered by the priest at the religious capital, viz. burnt, meal, peace and sin offerings.

IV. Sacrifices in the Pre-Mosaic Age.—Out of the obscure period of origins emerged the dimly lighted period of ancient history. Everywhere sacrifices existed and sometimes abounded as an essential part of religion. The spade of the archaeologist, and the researches of scholars help us understand the pre-Mosaic period.

In Egypt—probably from the beginning of the 4th millennium BC—there were sacrifices and sacrificial systems. Temples at Abydos, Thebes, On, etc. were great priestly centers with high priests, lower priests, rituals and sacrifices in abundance. Burnt, meal and peace offerings predominated. Oxen, wild goats, pigs, geese were the chief animals offered. Besides these, wine, oil, beer, milk, cakes, grain, ointment, flowers, fruit, vegetables were offered, but not human beings. In these offerings there were many resemblances to the Heb gifts, and many significant exceptions. Moses would be somewhat familiar with these practices though not with the details of the ritual. He would appreciate the unifying power of a national religious center. It is inconceivable that in such an age a national leader and organizer like Moses would not take special care to institute such a system.

In Babylonia, from the year 3000 BC or thereabouts, according to E. Meyer (Geschichte des Alterthums), there were many centers of worship such as Eridu, Nippur, Agade, Erech, Ur, Nisin, Larsa, Sippar, etc. These and others continued for centuries with elaborate systems of worship, sacrifices, temples, priesthoods, etc. Considerably over 100 temples and sanctuaries are mentioned on inscriptions, and several hundreds in the lit. and tablets, so that Babylonia was studded with temples and edifices for the gods. At all these, sacrifices were constantly offered—animal and vegetable. A long list of the offerings of King Gudea includes oxen, sheep, goats, lambs, fish, birds (i.e. eagles and doves), dates, milk, greens (Jastrow, in HDB, V, 580 f, s.v.). The sacrifices provided an income for the priests, as did the Mosaic system at a later time. It had long passed the stage when it was supposed to furnish a meal for the god. A sacrifice always accompanied a consultation with a priest, and was really an assessment for the services rendered. It was not a voluntary offering or ritualistic observance. The priests on their own behalf offered a daily sacrifice, as in the Mosaic Law, and likewise on special occasions, to insure the good will of the gods they served. It seems certain that in some of the larger centers of worship animals were offered up twice a day, morning and evening. At these sacrifices certain portions were consumed on the altar, the rest belonging to the priest. The similarity of much of this to the Mosaic institutions is obvious. That the culture and civilization of Babylon was known to Egypt and Israel with other nations is shown clearly by the Am Tab. Special sacrifices on special occasions were offered in Babylonia as in Israel. As Jastrow says, "In the Heb codes, both as regards the purely legal portions and those sections dealing with religious ritual, Bah methods of legal procedure and of ritual developed in Bab temples must be taken into consideration as determining factors." We do not doubt that Moses made use of many elements found in the Egypt and Bah systems, and added to or subtracted from or purified as occasion required. As sacrificial systems and ritual had been in use more than a millennium before Moses, there is absolutely no need to suppose that Israel's ritual was a thousand years in developing, and was completed after the exile. To do so is to turn history upside down.

Among the nomads and tribes of Arabia and Syria, sacrifices had been common for millenniums before Moses.

The researches of Wellhausen and W. R. Smith are valuable here, whatever one may think of their theories. The offerings were usually from the flocks and herds, sometimes from the spoils taken in war which had been appropriated as their own. The occasions were many and various, and the ritual was very simple. A rude altar of earth or stone, or one stone, a sacred spot, the offerer killing the victim and burning all, or perhaps certain parts and eating the remainder with the clan or family, constituted the customary details. Sometimes wild animals were offered. Babylonians, Phoenicians and Arabs offered gazelles, but the Hebrews did not. Arabs would sometimes sacrifice a captive youth, while the Carthaginians chose some of the fairest of the captives for offerings by night. Assyrian kings sometimes sacrificed captive kings. The Canaanites and others constantly sacrificed children, esp. the firstborn.

The account of the offerings of Cain and Abel (Gen 4 4f) shows that the ceremony dates from almost the beginnings of the human

4. Cain and Abel race. The custom of offering the firstlings and first-fruits had already begun.

Arabian tribes later had a similar custom. Cain's offering was cereal and is called minhäh, "a gift" or "presentation." The same term is applied to Abel's. There is no hint that the bloody sacrifice was in itself better than the unbloody one, but it is shown that sacrifice without a right attitude of heart is not acceptable to God. This same truth is emphasized by the prophets and others, and is needed in this day as much as then. In this case the altars would be of the common kind and no priest was needed. The sacrifices were an act of worship, adoration, dependence, prayer and possibly propitiation.

The sacrifices of Noah followed and celebrated the epochal and awe-inspiring event of leaving the ark and beginning life anew. He offered burnt offerings of all the clean animals (Gen 8 20ff). On such a solemn occasion only an olah would suffice. The custom of using domestic animals had arisen at this time. The sacrifices expressed adoration, recognition of God's power and sovereignty, and a gift to please Him, for it is said He smelled a sweet savor and was pleased. It was an odor of satisfaction or restfulness. Whether or not the idea of expiation was included is difficult to prove.

Abraham lived at a time when sacrifices and religion were virtually identical. No mention is made of his offering at Ur or Haran, but 6. Abraham on his arrival at Shechem he erected an altar (Gen 12 7). At Beth-el also (ver 8), and on his return from Egypt he worshipped there (Gen 13 4). Such sacrifices expressed adoration and prayer and probably propitiation. They constituted worship, which is a complex exercise. At Hebron he built an altar (Gen 13 18), officiating always as his own priest. In 15 4 ff he offers a "covenant" sacrifice, when the animals were slain, divided, the parts set opposite each other, and prepared for the appearance of the other party to the covenant. The exact idea in the killing of these animals may be difficult to find, but the effect is to give the occasion great solemnity and the highest religious sanction. What was done with the carcasses afterward is not told. That animals were slain for food with no thought of sacrifice is shown by the narrative in ch 18, where Abraham had a calf slain for the meal. This is opposed to one of the chief tenets of the Wellhausen school, which maintains that all slaughtering of animals was sacrificial until the 7th cent. BC. In ch 22 Abraham attempts to offer up Isaac as a burnt offering, as was probably the custom of his neighbors. That he attempted it shows that the practice was not shocking to his ethical nature. It tested the strength of his devotion to God, shows the right spirit in sacrifices, and teaches for all time that God does not desire human sacrifice—a beast will do. What God does want is the obedient heart. Abraham continued his worship at Beer-sheba (Gen 21 33).

Whatever may be the date of the writing of the Book of Job, the saint himself is represented as living in the Patriarchal age. He constantly offered sacrifices on behalf of his children (1 5), "sanctifying" them. His purpose no doubt was to atone for possible sin. The sacrifices were mainly expiatory. This is true also of the sacrifices of his friends (42 7-9).

Isaac seems to have had a permanent altar at Beer-sheba and to have regularly offered sacrifices. Adoration, expiation and supplication would constitute his chief motives (Gen 26 25).

Jacob's first recorded sacrifice was the pouring of the oil upon the stone at Beth-el (Gen 28 18).

This was consecration or dedication in recognition of the awe-inspiring presence of the Deity. After his covenant with Laban he offered sacrifices (z'bhāhim) and they ate bread (Gen 31 54). At Shechem, Jacob erected an altar (Gen 33 20). At Beth-el (35 7) and at Beer-sheba he offered sacrifices to Isaac's God (46 1).

While the Israelites were in Egypt they would be accustomed to spring sacrifices and spring feasts, for these had been common among the Arabs and Syrians, etc, for centuries. Nabataean inscriptions testify to this. Egypt sacrifices have been mentioned (see above). At these spring festivals it was probably customary to offer the firstlings of the flocks (cf Ex 13 15). At the harvest festivals sacrificial feasts were celebrated. It was to some such feast Moses said Israel as a people wished to go in the wilderness (Ex 3 18; 5 3 ff; 7 16). Pharaoh understood and asked who was to go (Ex 10 8). Moses demanded flocks and herds for the feast (10 9). Pharaoh would keep the flocks, etc (10 24), but Moses said they must offer sacrifices and burnt offerings (10 25 f).

The sacrifice of the Passover soon occurs (Ex 12 3-11). That the Hebrews had been accustomed to sacrifice their own firstborn at this season has no support and is altogether improbable (Frazer, *Golden Bough*³, pt. III, 175 f). The whole ceremony is very primitive and has retained its primitiveness to the end. The choosing of the lamb or kid, the killing at a certain time, the family gathered in the home, the carcass roasted whole, eaten that night, and the remainder, if any, burned, while the feasters had staff in hand, etc, all this was continued. The blood in this case protected from the Deity, and the whole ceremony was "holy" and only for the circumcised. Frazer in his Golden Bough gives a very different interpretation.

As a priest of Midian Jethro was an expert in sacrificing. On meeting Moses and the people he offered both 'olāh and z'bhāhim and made a feast (Ex 18 12).

From the above it is evident that sacrifices were almost the substance of religion in that ancient world. From hilltops and temples innumerable, the smoke of sacrifices was constantly rising heavenward.

Burnt offerings and peace offerings were well known. Moses, in establishing a religion, must have a sacrificial system.

He had abundance of materials to choose from, and under Divine guidance would adopt such rules and regulations as the pedagogic plans and purposes of God would require in preparing for better things.

V. The Mosaic Sacrificial System.—The fundamental function of Moses' work was to establish the covenant between Israel and God.

This important transaction took place at Sinai and was accompanied by solemn sacrifices. The foundation principle was obedience, not sacrifices (Ex 19 4-8).

No mention is made of these at the time, as they were incidental—mere by-laws to the constitution. The center of gravity in Israel's religion is now shifted from sacrifices to obedience and loyalty to Jeh. Sacrifices were helps to that end and without obedience were worthless. This is in exact accordance with Jer 7 21 ff. God did not speak unto the fathers at this time about sacrifices; He did speak about obedience.

The covenant having been made, the terms and conditions are laid down by Moses and accepted by the people (Ex 24 3). The Decalogue and Covenant Code are given, an altar is built, burnt and peace offerings of oxen are slain by young men servants of Moses, not by priests, and blood is sprinkled on the altar (24 4 ff). The blood would symbolize the community of life between Jeh and Israel, and consecrate the altar. The Law was read, the pledge again given, and Moses sprinkled the representatives of the people, consecrating them also (24 7 f). Ascending the mount, they had a vision of God, held a feast before Him, showing the joys and privileges of the new relationship. The striking feature of these ceremonies is the use of the blood. It is expiatory and consecrating, it is life offered to God, it consecrates the altar and the people: they are now acceptable to God and dare approach Him and feast with Him. There is no idea of God's drinking the blood. The entire ritual is far removed from the crass features of common Sem worship.

In the Covenant Code, which the people accepted, the customary altars are not abolished, but regulated (Ex 20 24 ff). This law expressly applies to the time when they shall be settled in Canaan.

2. The Common Altars whole place where I cause my name to be remembered,' etc (ver 24 m). No need to change the reading to "in every place where I cause," etc, as the Wellhausen school does for obvious reasons. All the land was eligible. On such rude altars sacrifices were allowed. This same law is implied in Dt 16 21, a passage either ignored or explained away by the Wellhausen school (see Wiener, Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, 200 f).

Moses commanded Joshua in accordance with it (Dt 27 5 ff). Joshua, Gideon, Jephthah, Samuel, Saul, David, Elijah and many others used such altars. There were altars at Shechem (Josh 24 1.26), Mizpah in Gilead (Jgs 11 11), Gilgal (1 S 13 9). High places were chiefly used until the times of Hezekiah and Josiah, when they were abolished because of their corruptions, etc. All such altars were perfectly legitimate and in fact necessary, until there was a central capital and sanctuary in Jerus. The customary burnt and peace offerings with the worshipper officiating were the chief factors. Heathen sacrifices and the use of heathen altars were strictly forbidden (Ex 22 20 [Heb 19]; 34 15).

The altar used at the consecration of Aaron and his sons was a "horned" or official altar, the central one. The offerings were a bullock, two rams, unleavened bread, etc (Ex 29 1-4), and were brought to the door of the sanctuary. The ritual consisted of Aaron laying his hand on the bullock's head, designating it as his substitute (29 10), killing it before the tent of meeting (ver 11), smearing some blood on the horns of the altar, and pouring the rest at its base (ver 12). The blood consecrated the altar, the life was given as atonement for sins, the fat parts were burned upon the altar as food for God, and the flesh and remainder were burned without the camp (vs 13.14). This is a sin offering—hattā'th—the first time the term is used. Probably introduced by Moses, it was intended to be piacular and to "cover" possible sin. One ram was next slain, blood was sprinkled round about the altar, flesh was cut in pieces, washed and piled on the altar, then burned as an offering by fire ('ishsheh) unto God as a burnt offering, an odor of a sweet savor (vs 15-18). The naive and primitive nature of this idea is apparent. The other ram, the ram of consecration, is slain, blood is smeared on Aaron's right ear, thumb and great toe; in the case of his sons likewise. The blood is sprinkled on the altar round about; some upon the garments of Aaron and his sons (vs 19-21). Certain parts are waved before Jeh along with the bread, and are then burned upon the altar (vs 22-25). The breast is offered as a wave offering ('nāphāh), and the right thigh or shoulder as a heave offering ('rūmāh). These portions here first mentioned were the priests' portion for all time to come, although this particular one went to Moses, since he officiated (vs 26-30). The flesh must be boiled in a holy place, and must be eaten by Aaron and his sons only, and at the sanctuary. What was left till morning must be burned (vs 31-34). Consecrated to a holy service it was dangerous for anyone else to touch it, or the Divine wrath would flame forth. The same ceremony on each of the seven days atoned for, cleansed and consecrated the altar to the service of Jeh, and it was most holy (vs 35-37). The altar of incense is ordered (Ex 30 1), and Aaron is to put the blood of the sin offering once a year upon its horns to consecrate it.

When the golden calf was made an altar was erected, burnt and peace offerings were presented.

From the latter a feast was made, the 4. Sacrifices people followed the usual habits at such before the festivals, went to excess and joined in Golden Calf revelry. Moses' ear quickly detected the nature of the sounds. The covenant was now broken and no sacrifice was available for this sin. Vengeance was executed on 3,000 Israelites. Moses mightily interceded with God. A moral reaction was begun; new tables of the Law were made with more stringent laws against idols and idol worship (Ex 32 1-35).

At the setting-up of the tabernacle burnt and meal offerings were sacrificed (Ex 40 29). The law of the burnt offering is found in Lev 1.

5. Law of the Burnt Offering ('ōlāh) Common altars and customary burnt offerings needed no minute regulations, but this ritual was intended primarily for the priest, and was taught to the people as needed. They were for the statutory individual and national offering upon the "horned" altar before the sanctuary. Already the daily burnt offerings of the priests had been provided for (Ex 29 38-42). The burnt offering is here called korban, "oblation."

(1) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 1 3-17).—This may have been from the herd or flock or fowls, brought to the tent of meeting; hands were laid (heavily) upon its head designating it as the offerer's substitute, it was killed, flayed and cut in pieces. If of the flock, it was to be killed on the north side of the altar; if a fowl, the priest must kill it.

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 1 3-17).—If a bullock or of the flock, the priest was to sprinkle the blood round about the altar, put on the fire, lay the wood and pieces of the carcass, wash the inwards, legs, etc, and burn it all as a sweet savor to God. If a fowl, he must wring the neck, drain out the blood on the side of the altar, cast the crop, filth, etc, among the ashes, rend the wings without dividing the bird and burn the carcass on the altar.

(3) General laws for the priest.—The burnt offering must be continued every morning and every evening (Ex 29 38f; Nu 28 3-8). At the fulfilment of his vow the Nazirite must present it before God and offer it upon the altar through the priest (Nu 6 14. 16); on the Sabbath, two lambs (Nu 28 9); on the first of the month, two bullocks, one ram and seven lambs (Nu 28 11); on the day of first-fruits, the same (Nu 28 27); on the 1st day of the 7th month, one bullock, one ram, seven lambs (Nu 29 8); on the 15th day, 13 bullocks, two rams, 14 lambs, the number of bullocks diminishing daily until the 7th day, when seven bullocks, two rams, 14 lambs were offered (Nu 29 12-34); on the 22nd day of this month one bullock, one ram and seven lambs were offered (Nu 29 35.36). Non-Israelites were permitted to offer the 'ōlāh, but no other sacrifices (Lev 17 8; 22 18.25).

(4) Laws in Dt (12 6.13.14.27; 27 6).—Anticipating a central sanctuary in the future, the law-giver counsels the people to bring their offerings there (12 6.11); they must be careful not to offer them in any place (ver 13), but must patronize the central sanctuary (ver 14). In the meantime common altars and customary sacrifices were allowable and generally necessary (16 21; 27 6).

The term "meal offering" is here confined to offerings of flour or meal, etc (AV "meat-offering"), and was first used at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29 41). These 6. Law of the Meal Offering (minhāh) must not be offered on the altar of incense (Ex 30 9); were used at the completion of the tabernacle (40 29); and always with the morning and evening burnt offerings.

(1) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 2 1-16).—It must be of fine flour, with oil and frankincense added, and brought to the priest; if baked in the oven, unleavened cakes mingled with oil, or wafers and oil; if of the baking pan, fine flour mingled with oil parted into pieces and oil thereon; if of the frying pan, the same ingredients. Leaven and honey must never be used as they quickly become corrupt. Every offering must be seasoned with salt. If of the first-fruits (bikkūrim), it should consist of corn in the ear, parched with oil and frankincense upon it.

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 2 1-16).—This required him to take out a handful with the oil and frankincense thereon and burn it as a memorial upon the altar. The remainder was holy and belonged to the priest. Of the cakes, after bringing them to the altar, he was to take a portion, burn it and appropriate the remainder; the same with the first-fruits.

(3) General laws for the priest (Lev 6 14-18 [Heb 7-11], etc).—He might eat his portion without leaven in the holy place. At his anointing Aaron offered his own oblation of fine flour— $\frac{1}{10}$ of an ephah, one-half in the morning and one-half in the evening. If baked, it must be with oil. This meal offering must all be burnt; none could be eaten. With the sin and guilt offerings every meal offering baked in any way belongs to the priest (Lev 7 9.10; 10 12; Nu 18 9). The meal offerings accompanied the other offerings on all important occasions, such as the consecration of Aaron (Lev 9 4.17); cleansing of a leper (Lev 14 10.20.21.31); feast of first-fruits

(Lev 23 13); Pentecost (Lev 23 16); set feasts (Lev 23 37). Special charge was given to Eleazar to care for the continual meal offerings (Nu 4 16). The Nazirite must offer it (Nu 6 15.17). When the tribes presented their offerings, meal offerings were always included (Nu 7 13.19, etc); when the Levites were set apart (Nu 8 8); with vows of freewill offerings (Nu 15 4.6); with the sin offerings (15 24); at all the several seasons (Nu 28 5—29 39). A special form was the "showbread" (bread of memorial). Twelve loaves were to be placed in two rows or heaps of six each on a pure table in the holy place, with frankincense on each pile or row. These were to remain for one week and then to be eaten by the priests. They were an offering of food by fire, though probably only the frankincense was actually burned (Lev 24 5 f).

The peace offerings indicated right relations with God, expressing good-fellowship, gratitude and obligation. The common altars were fitted for their use (Ex 20 24), as the Peace feasts had been thus celebrated from time immemorial. At the feast before God on the Mount, peace offerings provided the food (Ex 24 5); also before the golden bull (Ex 32 6). The wave and heave offerings were portions of these.

(1) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 3 1-17).—The offering might be a bullock, a lamb, or a goat, either male or female, latitude being allowed in this case. The ritual was the same as in the case of the burnt offering (see above).

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 3 1-17).—Blood must be sprinkled on the altar round about, the caul, the liver and the kidneys must be taken away and the fat parts burned on the altar; the fat tail of the lamb must also be burned. These portions were offerings of food by fire to the deity. The ritual for a goat was the same as for a bullock.

(3) General laws for the priest (Lev 6 12 [Heb 5]; 7 1 ff).—The fat was to be burned on the altar of burnt offering. If it was a thank offering (zebhoh ha-tôdhâh), it must have unleavened cakes with oil, cakes mingled with oil and fine flour soaked. Cakes of leavened bread might be offered, and one cake was to be a heave offering to the priest. The flesh was to be eaten that day, none was to be left till morning (Lev 22 30). If it was a votive offering (zebhah nedher) or a freewill offering (zebhah n'dhâbhâh), it might be eaten on the first and second days, but not on the third day; it should then be an abomination (Lev 7 18 f). If eaten then by anyone, that person was to be cut off from the community. Of all peace offerings the wave-breast and heave-thigh belong to the priest (Lev 7 29-34), the remainder was to be eaten by the worshippers. At Aaron's consecration an ox and a ram were the peace offerings (Lev 9 4. 18.22). The priest's portion was to be eaten in a clean place by the priest's family (Lev 10 14). When Israel should have a central sanctuary, all were to be brought there (Lev 17 4.5). When they had no central place, the common altars would suffice. All peace offerings must be made in an acceptable manner (Lev 19 5). Votive offerings must be perfect (Lev 22 18-22), but certain imperfections are allowable in freewill offerings (ver 23). At Pentecost two he-lambs of the first year could be offered as peace offerings (Lev 23 19). The Nazirite at the end of his separation must offer one ram for a peace offering with unleavened bread (Nu 6 14.17), and the hair shaved from his head must be burned under the peace offerings (6 18). This hair was regarded as a thing having life and offered as a sacrifice by other nations. The various tribes brought peace offerings (ch 7, passim), and at the feast of trumpets the people were to rejoice and blow trumpets over the peace offerings (10 10). Some further regulations are given (15 9 f).

The sin offering was a sacrifice of a special kind, doubtless peculiar to Israel and first mentioned at the consecration of Aaron and his sons. It is not then spoken of as an innovation. It was of special value as an expiatory sacrifice.

(1) Use at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29 10 ff).—A bullock was killed before the altar, some blood was put upon the horns of the altar by Moses, the rest was poured out at the base. The fat of the inwards was burned upon the altar, the flesh and skin were burned without the camp. Every day during the consecration this was done (Ex 29 36).

(2) The law of the sin offering (Lev 4 1-35; 6 24-30, etc).—(a) The occasion and meaning: Specifically to atone for unwitting sins, sins of error (sh'ghâghâh), mistakes or rash acts, unknown at the time, but afterward made known. There were gradations of these for several classes of offenders: the anointed priest (vs 3-12), the whole congregation (vs 13-21), a ruler (vs 22-26), one of the common people (vs 27-35), forswearing (5 1), touching an unclean thing (ver 2) or the uncleanness of man (ver 3), or rashly swearing in ignorance (ver 4). For conscious and wilful violations of the Law, no atonement was possible, with some exceptions, for which provision was made in the guilt offerings (see below).

(b) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 4 1-5.13, etc): The anointed priest must offer a bullock at the tent of meeting, lay his hands upon it and slay it before Jeh. The congregation was also required to bring a young bullock before the tent of meeting, the elders were to lay hands upon it and slay it before Jeh. The ruler must bring a he-goat and do the same. One of the common people might bring a she-goat or lamb and present it in the same manner. If too poor for these, two turtledoves or young pigeons, one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering, would suffice. If too poor for these, the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour without oil or frankincense would suffice.

(c) The ritual for the priest (Lev 4 1-5.13, etc): He must bring the bullock's blood to the tent of meeting, dip his finger into it and sprinkle blood 7 t before the veil of the sanctuary, and put some on the horns of the altar of incense, but most of the blood must be poured out at the base of the altar. The fat must be burned upon the altar, all the rest of the carcass must be carried to a clean place without the camp and burned. In the case of the whole congregation, the ritual is the same. In the case of a ruler, the blood is to be put upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, not the altar of incense. In the case of one of the common people, the ritual is similar to that of the ruler. In both the latter cases the carcass belonged to the priest. If a bird, the priest must wring off its head, sprinkle some blood on the side of the altar and pour the rest at the base. Nothing is said of the disposal of the carcass. If of fine flour, the priest must take out a handful and burn it upon the altar, keeping the remainder for himself. The use of fine flour for an expiatory sacrifice is evidently exceptional and intended to be so. Though life was not given, yet a necessity of life—that which represented life—was offered.

(d) General laws for the priest (Lev 6 24-30): The sin offering was to be slain in the same place as the burnt offering. It was most holy, and the priest alone might eat what was left of the ram, pigeon or flour, in the holy place. Whatever touched it was to be holy, any garment sprinkled with the blood used must be washed in a holy place, earthen vessels used must be broken, and brazen vessels thoroughly scoured and rinsed.

(e) Special uses of the sin offering: (i) The consecration of Aaron and his sons (Lev 8 2.14.15) was similar to that of Lev 4 11.12, only Moses was to kill the offering and put the blood on the horns of the altar. On the 8th day a bull-calf was offered (9 2), and the congregation offered a he-goat (ver 3). In this case Aaron performed the ceremony, as in Lev 4 11.12. Moses complained that they had not eaten the flesh of the calf and goat in the sanctuary, since that was requisite when the blood was not brought into the sanctuary (Lev 10 16-20).

(ii) Purifications from uncleanness required after childbirth a young pigeon or turtledove (Lev 12

6-8). The leper must bring a guilt offering (a special kind of sin offering), a he-lamb (Lev 14 12-14.19); if too poor for a lamb, a turtledove or young pigeon (vs 22.31). Special use of the blood is required (ver 25). In uncleanness from issues a sin offering of a turtledove or young pigeon must be offered by the priest (Lev 15 15.30).

(iii) On the Day of Atonement (Lev 16 1-28) Aaron must take a bullock for himself and house, two he-goats for the people, present the goats at the sanctuary, cast lots, one for Jeh, as a sin offering, the other for Azazel, to be sent into the wilderness. The bullock was killed, sweet incense was burned within the rail, blood was sprinkled on the mercy-seat and before it 7 times. The one he-goat was killed and a similar ceremony was performed. Blood must be put on the horns of the altar and sprinkled 7 t about it. The other goat was presented, hands were laid on it, the sins of all confessed and put upon the goat, and it was sent into the wilderness. The carcass of the bullock and he-goat were burned without the camp. At the feast of first-fruits a he-goat was offered (Lev 23 19).

(iv) Other special instances were: in the case of defilement, the Nazirite must offer a turtledove or young pigeon on the 8th day after contraction (Nu 6 10 ff); when the days of the separation were fulfilled a ewe-lamb with the other offerings (ver 14) was to be offered; the twelve tribes included in each case a he-goat for sin offering (7 16 ff); at the consecration of the Levites a young bullock (8 8.12). For unwitting sins of the congregation a he-goat was to be offered (15 24.25). If one person erred, a she-goat was permitted (ver 27). A sin offering was required at the feast of the new moon (28 15), at the Passover (ver 22), at Pentecost (ver 30), on the 1st day of the 7th month (29 5), and on the 10th, 15th-22d days (vs 10-38). The ceremony of the red heifer (19 1-10.17) was a special sin offering for purification purposes only. It was of ancient and primitive origin. The young cow was brought without the camp and was slain before the priest's face, blood was sprinkled 7 t before the sanctuary, the entire carcass with cedar wood, hyssop and scarlet was burned, the ashes gathered and laid without the camp in a clean place to be kept for the water of impurity. It was to purify after contact with the dead. In the case of the unknown homicide (Dt 21 1-9) a young unbroken heifer was brought to a running stream, its neck was broken, the elders washed their hands over the heifer in the presence of the priests, declaring their innocence. Thus the bloodshed was expiated. The action was a judicial one, but essentially vicarious and expiatory and had doubtless a primitive origin.

The guilt offering (AV "trespass offering") (Lev 5 14-6 7) was a special kind of sin offering, always of a private character and accompanied by a fine. It expressed expiation and restitution. The classes of sin requiring a guilt offering with reparation in money are: (1) a trespass in the holy things done unwittingly; (2) anything which the Law forbade depriving God or the priest of their due; (3) dealing falsely with a neighbor in a deposit, or pledge, or robbery, or oppression; (4) swearing falsely regarding anything lost; (5) seduction of a betrothed bondmaid (Lev 19 20-22). The first two of these are unwitting sins, the others cannot be. The clear statement is made in another place that sins done with a "high hand," i.e. in rebellion against the covenant and its provisions, can have no sacrifice (Nu 15 30). Is this a contradiction, or a later development when it was found that the more stringent law would not work? (See J. M. P. Smith, et al., Atonement, 47 f.) Neither conclusion is probable. These conscious sins are of a kind that will admit of full reparation because against rights of property or in money matters. The sin offering makes atonement toward God, the restitution with the additional one-fifth makes full reparation to man. No such reparation can be made with such sins described as committed with a "high hand." In the case of seduction, rights of property are violated (cf Nu 5 5-8; Dt 22 29).

(1) The ritual (Lev 5 14-6 7).—A ram proportionate in value to the offence and worth at least two shekels is required. The ritual is probably the same as that of the sin offering, though no mention is made of the laying on of hands, and the blood is not brought into the sanctuary, but sprinkled about the base of the altar, the fat and inside parts being burned, and the flesh eaten by the priests in a holy place.

(2) Special statutes.—The leper, when cleansed, on the 8th day must bring a guilt offering of two he-lambs and one ewe-lamb; the priest must wave one he-lamb before Jeh, kill it, and smear blood on the right ear, thumb and toe of the leper. The guilt offering belongs to the priest (Lev 14 12-20). If the leper were too poor for two lambs, one sufficed, with a corresponding meal offering, or one turtledove and a young pigeon (vs 21.22). The Nazirite, if defiled during his period of separation, must bring a he-lamb for a guilt offering (Nu 6 12). All guilt offerings were the priests' and most holy (18 9).

The wave offerings were parts of the peace offerings, and the custom was seemingly initiated at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29 24-27).

10. Wave Offerings when the breast and bread were waved before Jeh. Lev 7 30.34 fixes the law. It must be brought from the peace offerings of the offerer himself. At Aaron's consecration Moses put the breast, etc. on Aaron's hands and waved them before Jeh (Lev 8 27). On the 8th day Aaron did the waving (Lev 9 21). The priests were to eat it in a clean place (Lev 10 14 f). The leper's he-lamb was to be waved by the priest, before being offered (Lev 14 12); the lamb of the guilt offering also (14 24). At the feast of first-fruits the sheaf must be waved before Jeh (Lev 23 10.11.15); two loaves also (vs 17.20). Of the Nazirite the priest took the boiled shoulder, a cake and a wafer, put them on the Nazirite's hand and waved them before Jeh (Nu 6 19 f).

Heave offerings also are parts of the peace offerings, and refer particularly to what is lifted up, or separated into the service of Jeh. They are first

11. Heave Offerings mentioned at the consecration of Aaron (Ex 29 27.28). The offering consisted of the right shoulder or thigh and was the fixed due of the priest (Lev 7 32.34). One cake of the peace offering must be heaved (Lev 7 14). The offering must be eaten in a clean place (Lev 7 14) by the priest's family only (Lev 10 14.15). Of the Nazirite's offering the heave thigh also went to the priest (Nu 6 20). When the Israelites should come into the promised land to eat bread, they must offer a heave offering of the dough, a cake (Nu 15 19.20.21). The law is repeated in Nu 18 8.11.19, and the Levites are to receive a tithe of the heave offerings of the people (ver 24). They were in turn to offer up a tithe of this to the priests (vs 26-32). A portion of the spoil of Midian was a heave offering (31 29.41). Dt commands that all heave offerings be brought to the central sanctuary and eaten there (12 6.11).

Jacob poured oil on the stone he had set up (Gen 28 18) in honor of the Deity and consecrated the spot. Jacob later (Gen 35 14) set up

12. Drink Offerings or Libations a pillar where God had revealed Himself and poured drink offerings and oil upon it. Probably wine was used. Drink offerings accompanied many of the sacrifices (Ex 29 40.41). None could be poured upon the altar of incense (Ex 30 9). At all set feasts the drink offerings must be presented (Lev 23 13.18.37). The Nazirite was not exempt (Nu 6 15.17). Wine and oil must accompany all votive and freewill offerings (15 4.5.7.10.24); the continual burnt offering (28 7.8); sabbaths (vs 9.10) and all the other set feasts (vs 14-31; 29 6-39, passim). That drink offerings were common among the heathen is shown by Dt 32 38.

The cultus is thoroughly in keeping with and adapted to the age, and yet an ideal system in many respects. The ethical side is in the background, the external has the emphasis. No sacrifices will avail for a breach of the covenant

13. Primitive Nature of the Cultus between God and the people. The people thoroughly believed in the efficacy of the blood. It secured atonement and forgiveness. Their religious life found expression in the sacrifices.

God was fed and pleased by the offerings by fire. Many of the customs are ancient and crude, so that it is difficult to imagine how such a primitive system could have been arranged and accepted afterward by the people who had the lofty ethical teachings of the prophets in their hands.

VI. Sacrifices in the History of Israel.—The tribes were outwardly consolidated, and a religious system was provided. Some of it was for the rulers, much for the people and much for the priests alone. The various laws were given in portions and afterward compiled. No one expected them to be observed until the nation had a capital and central sanctuary. Even then not every detail was always possible. They were not observed to any extent in the wilderness (Am 5 25), as it was impracticable. Even circumcision was neglected until the wanderers crossed the Jordan (Josh 5 2). The body of the system was not in full practice for 300 or 400 years. The ritual, as far as it could be observed, served as an educational agency, producing in the minds of the worshippers proper conceptions of the holiness of God, the sinfulness of man, and the proper spirit in approaching God.

Lay or common altars were in accordance with Ex 20 24; Dt 16 21; 27 7. In the days of Joshua, the Passover was celebrated (Josh 5 10 f). At Ebal an altar was erected, burnt and peace offerings were presented (Josh 8 30-32). The tabernacle was set up at Shiloh with a horned altar doubtless (Josh 18 1), and the cultus was observed to some extent. Concerning the altar on the east side of the Jordan, see ALTAR.

Canaanitish altars were abundant with their corrupt and licentious cults of the Nature-gods. Israelites with their common altars would naturally use the high places, when possible. The stationary altars of the Canaanites were of course unlawful. The inevitable tendency would be to imitate the worship of the Canaanites. They were rebuked and threatened for this, and, weeping, offered sacrifices at Bochim (Jgs 2 1-5). Gideon rebuilt an altar of Jeh and offered a bullock as a burnt offering (6 25, 26). The kid prepared for the angel was not first a sacrifice, but its acceptance as a gift was indicated by its being burned (6 19 f). Jephthah offered up his daughter as a burnt offering, believing such a sacrifice well-pleasing to Jeh (11 31, 39). Manoh and his wife prepared a kid for a burnt offering, a meal offering accompanying it (13 16 f). At the time of the civil war with Benjamin the ark and statutory altar seemed to be at Beth-el, where they offered burnt and peace offerings (20 26). The feasts at Shiloh imply at least peace offerings (21 19).

Common lay altars and customary sacrifices were still much in use. The official altar with the statutory individual and national offerings appears to be at Shiloh. Elikanah sacrifices and feasts there yearly (1 S 1 3 f). Such feasts were joyous and tended to excesses, as drunkenness seemed common (1 13 f). All Israel came thither (2 14); the priests claimed their portion, seizing it in an unlawful manner before the fat had been burned, or the flesh had been boiled (2 13-17). This shows that such ritual as was prescribed in Lev was practised and considered by the people the only lawful custom. Was it in writing? Why not? Guilt offerings were made by the Philis when smitten by tumors (6 3, 4, 8, 17). There were five golden mice and five golden tumors. Crude as were their ideas of a guilt offering, their actions show familiarity with the concept. Burnt offerings were used on special occasions and in great crises, such as receiving the ark (6 14 f), going to war (7 9 f; 13 9-12), victory (11 15), etc. Saul met Samuel at a sacrificial feast in a small city (9 12, 13) on a high place. At Gilgal there were burnt and peace offerings (10 8; 15 15, 21). Saul offered burnt offerings himself (13 9-12), but his fault was not in offering them himself, but in his haste and disobedience toward Samuel. "To obey is better than sacrifice," etc, says Samuel (15 22), recognizing the fundamental principle of the covenant and realizing that ceremonies are in themselves worthless without the right spirit. The same truth is reiterated by the prophets later. To prevent the eating of flesh with the blood Saul built a special altar (14 32-35). Family and clan sacrifices and feasts were evidently common (16 2-5).

The common altars and those on the high places were still in use. The central sanctuary at Shiloh had been removed, first apparently to

5. In the Days of David and Solomon Gilgal, then to Nob, and later to Gibeon. David's and Saul's families kept the feast of the new moon, when peace offerings would be sacrificed (1 S 20 5, 24-29). The sanctuary at Nob had the shewbread upon the table (21 4 ff) according to Ex 25 30. When the ark was brought up to Jerus, burnt and peace offerings were offered according to the Law (2 S 6 17, 18; 1 Ch 16 2, 40). Ahithophel offered private sacrifices at Shiloh (2 S 15 12). David offered up burnt, meal and peace offerings when purchasing the threshing-floor of Araunah (1 Ch 21 23-26). The statutory horned altar at this time was at Gibeon (2 Ch 1 6; 1 Ch 21 29), but was soon removed to Jerus (1 Ch 22 1). In the organized sanctuary and ritual, Levites were appointed for attendance on the shewbread, meal offerings, burnt offerings, morning and evening sacrifices, sabbaths, new moons and set feasts (23 23-31), attempting to carry out the Levitical laws as far as possible. At the dedication of the temple Solomon offered burnt, meal and peace offerings in enormous quantities (1 K 8 63; 2 Ch 7 4-7); also burnt and peace offerings with incense triennially (1 K 9 25). The ritual at the regular seasons, daily, sabbaths, new moons, set feasts, etc, was observed according to the Levitical Law (2 Ch 2 4; 8 13). Was it written?

The golden calf worship was carried on at Dan and Beth-el, with priests, altars and ritual (1 K 12 27 f). The high places were in use,

6. In the Northern Kingdom but very corrupt (13 2 ff). A common altar was in use on Mt. Carmel (18 30, 32). Many others were known as Jeh's altars (19 10). The system was in full swing in Amos' time (Am 4 4, 5) at Beth-el and Gilgal and probably at Beer-sheba (6 5). Amos bitterly satirizes the hollow, insincere worship, but does not condemn the common altars and sacrifices, as these were legitimate. With Hosea the situation is worse, the cultus has been "canonized," priests have been fed on the sin or sin offerings of the people, and the kingdom soon perished because of its corruption.

The high places were still in use and not denounced yet by the prophets (1 K 3 2; 2 K 14 4; 15 4, 35). Worship was not fully centralized, though tending in that direction. In the days of Abijah the temple cult was in full operation according to Moses' Law (2 Ch 13 10 f). Asa removed many strange altars and high places because

7. In the Southern Kingdom to the Exile of their corruption (14 3), but not all (15 17; 20 33). In the days of Jehoiada priests and Levites were on duty according to Moses (23 18; 24 14 b; 2 K 12 4-16). Sin and guilt offerings were in sufficient numbers to be mentioned, but the money went to the priests. Kautzsch (HDB, V) and Paterson (HDB, IV), with others, think these offerings were only fines and altogether different from those of Lev 4, 5. Such a statement is wholly gratuitous. The guilt offerings must be accompanied by fines, but not necessarily the sin offerings. The passage speaks of both as perfectly familiar and of long standing, but details are lacking and there can be no certainty in the matter, except that it proves nothing regarding a ritual of sin and guilt offerings existent or non-existent at that time. Kautzsch's and Paterson's motives are obvious. Having reversed the history and put the ritual law late, they must needs make adjustments in the records to have them agree. In the days of Ahaz, the regular offerings were observed for priests, kings and people (2 K 16 13-15). Hezekiah destroyed many high places (18 4). When repairing the temple, many sin offerings were presented to expiate the terrible sins of the previous reigns and the desecration of the temple (2 Ch 29 21-24); and so, also, burnt offerings (vs 27 f), peace and thank offerings, etc, in large number (vs 31-35; cf Isa 1 10-17). The Passover was celebrated with peace offerings (2 Ch 30 1.2.15.22), oblations and tithes (31 12); courses of Levites were established (31 2), and the king's portion (ver 3). All the common altars were abolished as far as possible, and worship centralized in Jerus (32 12). Reversed by Manasseh (33 3 f), the high places were again used (ver 17). Josiah purged Jerus (34 3), and on the discovery of the Book of the Law, with its rule regarding a central sanctuary, that law was rigidly enforced (35 6-14). The reformation under Josiah did not change the hearts of the people, and the rule followed in spite of all the efforts of Jeremiah and other prophets.

That the cultus was entirely suspended in Jerus from 586 to 536 BC seems certain. There is no support for G. F. Moore's statement (EB, IV) that an altar was soon rebuilt and sacrificing was carried on with scarcely a break. On the return of the exiles an altar was soon built and the continual burnt offerings began (Ezr 3 2 f), and likewise at the Feast of Tabernacles, new moons and set feasts (vs 4-7). Darius decreed that the Israelites should be given what was needed for the sacrifices (6 9 f). The band under Ezra offered many sin offerings on their return (8 35). At the dedication of the temple many burnt and sin offerings were made for all the tribes (6 17). Those who had married foreign wives offered guilt offerings (10 19). The firman of Artaxerxes provided money for bullocks, rams, lambs, with meal and drink offerings (7 17). Under Nehemiah and after the formal acceptance of the Law, a more complete effort was made to observe it. The shewbread, continual burnt and meal offerings, sabbaths, new moons, set feasts, sin offerings, first-fruits, firstlings, first-fruits of dough, heave offerings of all trees, wine and oil, etc, were carefully attended to (Neh 10 33-37) and were in full force later (13 5.9). There is no hint of innovation, only a thoroughgoing attempt to observe laws that had been somewhat neglected.

8. In the Exilic and Post-exilic Periods At the time of Nehemiah and probably two or three centuries previous, there existed a temple on the island of Elephantine on the Nile. It was built by a Jewish military colony, and a system of sacrifices was observed. Just how far they copied the laws of Moses, and what were their ideas of a central sanctuary are uncertain.

9. A Temple and Sacrifices at Elephantine Several Sem tribes or nations practised human sacrifices. It was common among the Canaanites, as is shown by the excavations at Gezer, Taanach, etc. They seem to offer children in sacrifice at the laying of cornerstones of houses and other such occasions. Among the Carthaginians, Phoenicians, Greeks and Romans human sacrifices were all too common. The custom was not unknown to the Israelites. Abraham felt called upon to offer up Isaac, but was stopped in the act, and a lesson was given for all time. The abominable practice is forbidden by Moses (Lev 18 21), where it is spoken of as a passing through the fire to Moloch, referring to Moabitish and Ammonitish practices. Anyone practising it was to be stoned (Lev 20 2-5; Dt 12 31; 18 10). The rash vow of Jephthah resulted in the immolation of his daughter, but the incident is recorded as something extraordinary (Jgs 11 31 f). The execution of Zebah and Zalmunna is a case of blood revenge, not sacrifice (8 18 ff). Nor is the slaughter of Agag in any sense a sacrifice (1 S 15 32 f). The death of Saul's sons because of his breach of covenant with the Gibeonites was an expiatory sacrifice, to atone for the father's perfidy (2 S 21 9). The Moabite king in desperation offered up his firstborn and heir to appease the anger of Chemosh, and the effect was startling to the Israelites (2 K 3 27). Ahaz practised the abomination in times of trouble (16 3). Such sacrifices were intended to secure favor with the Deity or appease His wrath. Hiel's firstborn and youngest sons were probably sacrificed at the rebuilding or fortifying of Jericho (1 K 16 34; cf Josh 6 26). Manasseh practised the custom (2 K 21 6), but it was stopped by Josiah (23 10). Micah's words were probably applicable to those times of Ahaz or Manasseh, when they thought to obtain God's favor by costly gifts apart from ethical conditions (Mic 6 6-8). Isaiah refers to a heathen custom practised by Israel of slaying the children in secret places (Isa 57 5), and Jeremiah represents it as practised in his time (Jer 7 31; 19 5). Ezekiel denounces the same practice (Ezk 16 20.21; 23 37).

Heathen sacrifices are hinted at in the later books, such as swine, a mouse, a horse, a dog (Isa 65 4; 66 3.17; Ezk 8 10; 2 K 23 11). All such animals were unclean to the Hebrews, and the practice had its roots in some form of primitive totemism which survived in those heathen cults. They were little practised among the Israelites. See TOTEMISM.

11. Certain Heathen Sacrifices

VII. The Prophets and Sacrifices.—The prophets were reformers, not innovators. Their emphasis was on the ethical, rather than the ritual. They based their teachings on the fundamentals of the covenant, not the incidentals. They accepted sacrifices as part of the religious life, but would give them their right place. They accepted the law regarding common altars, and Samuel, David and Elijah used these altars. They also endorsed the movement toward a central sanctuary, but it is the abuse of the cult that they condemned, rather than its use. They combated the heathenish idea that all God needed was gifts, lavish gifts, and would condone any sin if only they bestowed abundance of gifts. They demanded an inward religion, morality, justice, righteousness, in short, an ethical religion. They preached an ethical God, rather than the profane, debasing and almost blasphemous idea of God which prevailed in their times. They reminded the people of the covenant at Sinai, the foundation principle of which was obedience and loyalty to Jeh. If Joel be early, the cult is in full practice, as he deplors the cutting-off of the meal offering, or minhāh, and the nešekh or drink offering, through the devastation of the locusts. He does not mention the burnt offerings, etc, as these would not be cut off by the locusts (Joel 1 7.13; 2 14). Joel emphasized the need for a genuine repentance, telling them to rend their hearts and not their garments (2 13).

Amos condemns the cultus at Beth-el and Gilgal, and sarcastically bids them go on transgressing (4 4.5), mentions burnt, peace, thank and freewill offerings (4 4 f; 5 22), reminds them of the fact that they did not offer sacrifices in the wilderness (5 25), but demands rather righteousness and justice. There is nothing here against the Mosaic origin of the laws.

In Hosea's time the hollow externalism of the cult had become worse, while vice, falsehood, murder, oppression, etc. were rampant. He utters an epoch-making sentence when he says, "I desire mercy, and not sacrifice," etc (6 6). This is no sweeping renunciation of sacrifices, as such; it is only putting the emphasis in the right place. Such sacrifices as Hosea speaks of were worse than worthless. It is somewhat extravagant for Kautzsch to say, "It is perfectly futile to read out of 6 6 anything else than a categorical rejection of sacrifices." Hosea recognizes their place in religion, and deplores the loss during exile (3 4). The corrupt cults he condemns (4 13 f), for they are as bad as the Canaanitish cults (4 9). Jeh will spurn them (8 13; 9 4). The defection of the nation began early (11 2), and they have multiplied altars (12 11; 13 2). He predicts the time when they shall render as bullocks the "calves" of their lips (14 2 AV).

Micah is as emphatic. The sacrifices were more costly in his day, in order the more surely to purchase the favor of the Deity. Human sacrifices were in vogue, but Micah says God requires them "to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God" (6 8). This does not in the least affect sacrifices of the right kind and with the right spirit.

Isaiah faces the same situation. There are multitudes of sacrifices, burnt offerings, blood of bullocks and goats, oblations, sweet incense, beasts, etc, but no justice, morality, love, truth or goodness. Thus their sacrifices, etc, are an abomination, though right in themselves (1 11-17; 61 8). The same is true of all pious performances today. It is probable that Isaiah worshipped in the temple (6 1.6). In his eschatological vision there is freedom to offer sacrifices in Egypt (19 19.21). The people are to worship in the holy mountain (27 13). Ariel must let the feasts come around (29 1).

Jeremiah maintains the same attitude. Your "frankincense from Sheba, and the sweet cane," burnt offerings and sacrifices are not pleasing to God (6 20; 14 12). They made the temple a den of robbers, in the streets they baked cakes to the Queen of heaven, etc. He speaks sarcastically, saying, "Add your burnt-offerings unto your sacrifices, and eat ye flesh. For I spake not unto your fathers . . . concerning . . . sacrifices: but . . . commanded . . . saying, Hearken unto my voice," etc (7 21-23). This was literally true, as we have seen above; the covenant was not based on sacrifices but on obedience. Such a statement does not deny the institution of sacrifices for those within the covenant who are obedient. It is no "subterfuge," as Kautzsch calls it, "to say that the prophets never polemize against sacrifice per se, but only against offerings presented hypocritically, without repentance and a right disposition, with blood-stained hands; against the opera operata of the carnally-minded, half-heathen mass of the people." This is exactly what they do, and they are in perfect harmony with the covenant constitution and with their own ethical and spiritual functions. Kautzsch can make such an extravagant assertion only by ignoring the fact that Jeremiah himself in predicting the future age of righteousness and blessedness makes sacrifice an important factor (33 11.18). Picturing possible prosperity and glory, Jeremiah speaks of burnt and meal offerings, frankincense, thank offerings, etc, being brought into the house of Jeh (17 26). (We are aware of the harsh and arbitrary transference of this passage to a later time.)

Ezekiel is called by Kautzsch "the founder of the Levitical system." He is said to have preserved the fragment of the ritual that was broken up in the exile. But his references to the burnt, sin and trespass offerings presuppose familiarity with them (40 38-42).

He assigns the north and south chambers for the meal, sin and trespass offerings (42 13). The cleansing of the altar requires a bullock and he-goat for a sin offering, with burnt and peace offerings with a ritual similar to Lev 8 1 f (Ezk 43 18-27). The Levites are to be ministers and slay burnt offerings and sacrifice for the people (44 11). The priest must offer his sin offering before he ministers in the sanctuary (44 27). They are to eat the meal, sin, and trespass offerings as in 44 29. In ch 45, the people are to give the wheat, barley, oil and lambs for meal, burnt and peace offerings, while the prince shall give the meal, burnt and drink offerings for the feasts, the new moons, sabbaths and appointed feasts. He is to prepare them to make atonement (45 13-17). In cleansing the sanctuary the Levitical ritual is followed with added details (45 18-20). The Passover requires the burnt, sin and meal offerings with an extra amount of cereal. The priests prepare the prince's burnt and peace offerings (46 2-4.6.9-12) for the sabbaths, new moons, etc. The daily burnt offerings (vs 13-15) must have a sixth instead of a tenth part of an ephah, as in Lev 1. The sin and guilt offerings are to be holled in a certain place, and the meal offering baked (vs 20.26). Ezk varies from the Levitical Law in the quantity of the meal offering, picturing the ritual in a more ideal situation than Moses. The people are all righteous, with new hearts, the Spirit in them enabling them to keep the Law (36 26 f), and yet he institutes an elaborate ritual of purification for them. Does this seem to indicate that the prophets would abolish sacrifices entirely? It is strange reasoning which makes the prophets denounce the whole sacrificial system, when one of the greatest among them seeks to conserve an elaborate cult for the blessed age in the future.

In the second part of Isa, God declares that He has not been honored by the people with burnt and meal offerings, etc., and that He has not burdened them with such offerings, but that He is wearied with their sins (43 23 f). Those foreigners who respect the covenant shall offer acceptable sacrifices (56 7) in the blessed age to come. The Servant of Jeh is to be a guilt offering (53 10) to expiate the sins of Israel. Sacrifice is here for the first time lifted out of the animal to the human sphere, thus forging the link between the OT and the NT. In the glorious age to come there are to be priests and Levites, new moons, sabbaths and worship in Jerus (66 21.23).

Daniel speaks of the meal offering being caused to cease in the midst of the week (9 27).

Zechariah pictures the golden age to come when all nations shall go up to Jerus to keep the Feast of Tabernacles, which implies sacrifices. Pots are used, and all the worshippers shall use them in the ritual (14 16-21).

In Malachi's age the ritual was in practice, but grossly abused. They offered polluted bread (1 7), blind, lame and sick animals (1 13 f). Jeh has the same attitude toward these as toward those in the times of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah (Mal 1 10 f). The Gentiles offer better ones (1 11). The Israelites covered the altar of Jeh with tears by their hypocritical, non-ethical actions (2 13). They robbed God in withholding tithes and heave offerings (3 8). It is the abuse of the cult that is denounced here, as in all the other Prophets.

A special use of the term "sacrifice" is made by Zephaniah (1 7 f), applying it to the destruction of Israel by Jeh. Bozrah and Edom are to be victims (Isa 34 6); also Gog and Magog (Ezk 39 17.19).

In summing up the general attitude of the prophets toward sacrifices, even G. F. Moore in EB admits: "It is not probable that the prophets distinctly entertained the idea of a religion without a cultus, a purely spiritual worship. Sacrifice may well have seemed to them the natural expression of homage and gratitude." He might have added, "and of atonement for sin, and full fellowship with God."

VIII. Sacrifice in the "Writings."—Dates are very uncertain here. The Pss and Prov extend from David and Solomon into the Pers period.

The sages take the same attitude as the prophets. They enjoy the sacrifice of first-fruits (Prov 3 9).

A feast usually follows a sacrifice of 1. In the peace offerings (7 14). The trespass Proverbs offering (?) has no meaning to fools (14 9), and the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to God (15 8; 21 27). Righteousness and justice are more acceptable to Jeh than sacrifices (21 3), yet to them sacrifices are a regular part of worship. Kōheleth speaks of sacrifices as quite the custom, and deprecates the offerings of fools (Ecc 5 1; 9 2).

The Psalmist admonishes the faithful to offer the sacrifices of righteousness, i.e. sacrifices offered in the right spirit (4 5). The drink offerings of idolaters are well known (16 4). Prayer is made for the acceptance of sacrifices (20 3). It is a coveted privilege to offer them (27 6; 84 1-4). The true relation between sacrifice and obedience is expressed in 40 6-8. As in Jer 7 21 f, the emphasis is laid on obedience, without which sacrifices are worthless and repugnant to God. They are not the important thing in Israel's religion, for that religion could exist without them as in the wilderness and exile. The teaching corresponds exactly with that of the prophets and is probably late. Ps 50 is even more emphatic. The Psalmist knows that sacrifices are in the covenant regulations (ver 5), but repudiates the idea of giving anything to God or of feeding Him (vs 12, 13). Everything belongs to Him, He is not hungry, He would scorn the idea of drinking the blood of goats, etc. The idea of the cultus being of any real value to God is scouted. Yet in the next verse the reader is admonished to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving and pay vows (ver 14). The sacrifices that express worship, penitence, prayer, thanksgiving and faith are acceptable. The penitent Psalmist speaks in similar terms. Sacrifices as such are no delight to God, the real sacrifice is a broken heart (51 16 f). When the heart is right, then, as an expression of true-heartedness, devotion, repentance and faith, burnt offerings are highly acceptable (ver 19). Another Psalmist promises a freewill offering to God (54 6; 66 13, 15). Sacrifices of thanksgiving are advised (96 8; 107 22; 118 27) and promised (116 17). Prayer is likened to the evening sacrifice (141 2).

IX. The Idea and Efficacy of Sacrifices.—That the Hebrews thoroughly believed in the efficacy of sacrifices is without doubt. What ideas they entertained regarding them is not so clear. No single theory can account for all the facts. The unbloody sacrifices were regarded as food for the Deity, or a pleasant odor, in one instance, taking the place of a bloody offering (see above). The bloody offerings present some difficulties, and hence many different views.

Included under the head of gifts of food to the Deity would be the meal and peace offerings, in so far as they were consumed by fire, the burnt offerings and the shewbread, etc. They were fire-food, the fire-distilled essence or etherealized food for God which gave Him pleasure and disposed Him favorably toward the offerer. They were intended either to appease wrath, to win favor, or to express thanks and gratitude for favors experienced. The earlier and more naïve idea was probably to win the favor of the Deity by a gift. Later, other ideas were expressed in the offerings.

The burnt offering best gave expression to the sentiments of adoration and devotion, though they may not be excluded from the meal and peace offerings. In other words, sacrifice meant worship, which is a complex exercise of the soul. Such was Abraham's attempted sacrifice of Isaac. The daily burnt offerings were intended to represent an unbroken course of adoration and devotion, to keep the right relations with the Deity. On particular occasions, special offerings were made to insure this relation which was specially needed at that time.

The burnt and sin offerings were the principal kinds used for the purpose of purification; water being used in case of uncleanness from

3. A Means contact with the dead. There were of Purification three classes of uncleanness: (1) those inseparable from the sex functions of men and women; (2) those resulting from contact with a corpse; (3) the case of recovery from leprosy. Purification ceremonies were the condition of such persons enjoying the social and religious life of the community. Why they should require a sin offering when most of them occurred in the regular course of nature and could not be guarded against, can be understood only as we consider that these offences were the effects of sin, or the weaknesses of the fleshly nature, due to sin. Such uncleanness made the subject unfit for society, and that unfitness was an offence to God and required a peculiar offering.
