After the vessel is shaped it is dried and finally fired in a furnace or kiln. The ancient Egyptian kiln was much smaller than the one used today (Wilkinson, II, 192). Most of the kilns are of the crudest form of the "up-draught" variety, i.e. a large chamber with perforated bottom and a fireplace beneath. The fire passes up through the holes, around the jars packed in tiers in the chamber, and goes out at the top. An interesting survival of an early Gr form is still used in Rachiyet-el-Fakhar in Syria. In this same village the potters also use the lead dross, which comes from the parting of silver, for glazing their jars (cf Prov 26:23).

In firing pottery there are always some jars which come out imperfect. In unpacking the kiln and storing the product others get broken. As a consequence the ground in the vicinity of a pottery is always strewn with potsherds (see also separate article). The ancient potteries can frequently be located by these sherds. The potter's field mentioned in Mt 27:7,10 was probably a field near a pottery strewn with potsherds, thus making it useless for cultivation although useful to the potter as a place in which to weather his clay or to dry his pots before firing.

Pottery was used antecedently for storing liquids, such as wine or oil, fruits, grains, etc. The blackened bot-

POUND, pound (גַּם), mâneh; μᾶρ, mār; λίτρα, litra; Lat libra): Pound does not correctly represent the Heb mâneh, which was more than a pound (see Manah). The litra of Jn 12:3 and 19:39 is the Rom pound (libra) of 4,590 grains, which is less than a pound troy, being about 10 oz. In a monetary sense (its use in Lk 19:13-25) it is the ma, or mâneh, which was either of silver or gold, the former, which is probably the one referred to by Luke, being equal to £5.17, or about $33; the latter £102.10 or $510. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Figurative: “Pound,” like “talent,” is used in the NT for intellectual gifts and spiritual endowments, as in the passage given above.

H. PORTER

POVERTY, pov'ér-ti: This word, found but once in the OT (Gen 45:11) outside of the Book of Prov in which it occurs 11 t. (6:11; 10:15; 11:24 AV; 13:18; 20:13; 23:21; 34 References 34; 28:19,22 AV; 30:8; 31:7), is a tr of עיוור, yi'ivvārēsh, “to be poor,” “to come to poverty” (Gen 45:11). Four different Heb words are used in the 11 references in Prov, all bearing the idea of being in need of the necessities of life, although a distinction is made between being in want and being in extreme want. Prov 18:23 well illustrates the general meaning of “poverty” as found in this book: “The poor [עיוור, 'irāh, “to be impoverished,” “destitute”] will use entreaties; but the rich answareth roughly.”

Rev 2:9) and is the tr of πτωχεύω, πτωχέα, "to be reduced to a state of beggary or pauperism."

2. NT References unless all the references to the "poor" and "beggars" are not connected in meaning. Indeed the word for "poverty" has its root in the word for "poor" (πτωχός, πτωχά, τρ, ο, or τι, dol). See Poom.

At least two degrees of poverty are recognized. The OT does not distinguish between them as clearly as does the NT. The NT, for example, by its use of two words for Degrees of "poor" sets forth this distinction. In Poverty 2 Cor 9, 9, "he hath given to the poor," the word used is πτωχός, πτωχή, which does not indicate extreme poverty, but simply a condition of living from hand to mouth, a bare and scant livelihood, such as that made by the widow who cast her two mites into the treasury (Lk 21:2); while in such passages as 2 Cor 6:10: "As poor, yet making many rich," and Lk 6:20: "Blessed are ye poor, for your's is the kingdom of heaven," a condition which is indicated of abject beggary, pauperism, such as that in which we find Lazarus who was laid at the gate of the rich man’s palace, begging even the crumbs which fell from the table of the rich man (Lk 16:20. 21). This is not the case with the NT, where poverty is simply a condition of not being rich, and no one can be poor in the NT unless wealthy (Lk 12:15; 2 Cor 8:9). It is not because of the rich man’s wealth as such that Paul refers to the rich as "poor" (2 Cor 8:9). What he means is that the rich are care for the poor. The exhortations to relieve poverty are numerous, esp. in the Pauline, but it is in poverty that must be treated with kindness (Dtr 15:7-11), and no one can be said to be a poor in the NT unless wealthy (Lk 12:15; 2 Cor 8:9). And if one is poor, he must be helped, even if it is to make the rich feel poor too (2 Cor 8:10). Indeed, the truth or falsity of a man’s religion is to be tested, in some sense at least, by his relation to those in need (Jas 1:27). The year of Jubilee was intended to be of great benefit to the poor by restoring to them any possessions which they, by reason of their poverty, had been compelled to cede over to their creditors (Lev 25:25-64; Dtr 15:1-15).

who were on duty as the bodyguard of the emperor and who were lodged in one of the buildings which adjoined the emperor's palace on the Palatine Hill.

Thus Lightfoot, discussing the meaning of the phrase "in the whole praetorium," in Acts 28:33 (Rom), reviews the different interpretations which have been given of the word, and shows (1) that no authority is to be found for its signifying Nero's palace on the Palatine Hill; (2) that before the death of Domitian, there was no praetorium which would make it mean the praetorian barracks on the Palatine: (3) nothing is known by any authority for making it mean the praetorian camp outside the walls of Rome. In Lightfoot's words (Acts 28:33 note), "The praetorium thus fail for want of evidence." Lightfoot accordingly defends the interpretation, "the praetorian guard," and RV, above cited, follows him in this.

One of the meanings of "praetorium" is a council of war, the officers who met in the general's tent (see Praetorium). Lightfoot is very decided in interpreting "praetorium" to mean the praetorian regiment and Ramsay mentions the imperial guards, and he adds, "in this sense and in this alone can it be safely affirmed that the apostle would hear the word praetorium used daily," and that this sense is in all respects appropriate. But the only meaning, though not appropriate here, viz., a council of war composed of the officers and their general, is much nearer to that which is now accepted by such authorities as Mommsen and Sir W. M. Ramsay, who hold that in this passage "praetorium" means a council, not of war, however, but the council of judgment, the emperor's council of appeal in which he was assisted by his legal assessors (see Mommsen, Berlin Akad. Sitzungsber., 1895, 501; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 357). The Emperor could then call together a council of war composed of the officers and their general, which, in a city like Rome, where there were many praetorians guarding various places, might be called the praetorium, and such a praetorium was the praetorium of which Paul speaks.

Thus the correct meaning of "praetorium" enables us to fix the date of the Epistle to the Romans as being written to the close of Paul's first imprisonment. That this inference is correct is fortified by various other facts, such as his promise to visit that city, his allowance of allowances, his release, and his journey to Jerusalem. We could not conceive of Paul writing like this if Mark, Luke, and John, and especially if Luke himself, and yet we know (Col 4:7, 10, 14) that each and all of these companions of the apostle were with him when he was in Rome when he wrote the Epistle to the Ephesians. From this it is evident, along with others, been sent on missions to Asia or other parts of the empire, so that Paul was well justified in the "likeminded" when he wrote to the Philippians. See Paul the Apostle; Philippians, Epistle to the.

All these facts and considerations confirm us in accepting the signification of "praetorium" as the emperor's supreme court of appeal, before which Paul when he wrote the Epistle to the Philippians was before him. The name of the court is a corruption of the Greek word, but which formerly had the meaning of the cities or princes of kings in conquered countries. Such a residence might sometimes be in a royal palace, as was probably the case in Caesarea, where the procurator used Herod's palace (Acts 23:35).

The procurator where Jesus was brought on trial has been traditionally located in the neighborhood of the present Turkish barracks where once stood the Antonia and where was stationed a large garrison (Acts 21:38; Herod's palace). The procurator used Herod's palace. It is certain that the headquarters of the procurator were at Herod's palace. This was a building whose magnificence was hardly sufficiently appraised (Wars, i, xii, 1; v, iv, 4). It was in this palace that Florus, the procurator took refuge in his quarters, and before his tribunal in front of it, held his sessions and the chief priests, influential persons and notables of the city appeared before the tribunal" (Wars, II, xiv, 8). Later on, "Florus . . . brought such as were with him out of the king's palace, and would have compelled them to get as far as the citadel [Antonia]; but his attempt failed" (II, xv, 5). The term τρις "court" had, as far as is known, the same legal meaning as "court" in Mk 15:16, "the soldiers led him away within the court [aulē], which is the Praetorium." There is no need to suppose that Herod Antipas was in the same palace (Lk 23:4 ff); it is more probable he went to the palace of the Hasmonaeans which lay lower down on the eastern slope of this southwestern hill, where at a later time it expressly states that Herod Agrippa II and his sister Bernice were living (Wars, II, xvi, 8).

The palace of Herod occupied the highest part of the southwest hill near the northwest angle of the ancient city, now traditionally called Zion, and the actual site of the Praetorium cannot have been far removed from the Turkish barracks near the so-called "Tower of David." It is interesting to note that the two stations of the Turkish garrison of Jerusalem today occupy the same spots as did the Roman garrison of Christ's time. It is needless to point out how greatly this view of the situation of the Praetorium must modify the traditional claims of the "Via Dolorosa," the whole course of which depends on the theory that the "Way of Sorrow" began at the Antonia, the Praetorium and late ecclesiastical tradition. See also GABATHA.

With regard to the expression ἐν βασιλείᾳ τῶν παρατηρητῶν, ἐν κόλπῳ τῆς πραιτορίου, in Phil 1:13, there is now a general consensus of opinion that "Praetorium" here means not a place, but the imperial praetorium guard, ten thousand in number, which was instituted by Augustus. St. Paul was allowed to reside in his private house in the custody of a praetorian guard, and the fact that these were doubled constantly, must have become "manifest" to the whole guard that his bonds were for the sake of Christ. PRAISE, πάρανομία, πάραση, "psalm," "praise," ταχθή, ἔθνη, "confession," "thanksgiving," τίμων, σαβαών, "to praise," "glorify," τίμων, σάμαρ, τίμων, "praise," "to stretch out the hand," "confess"; αἰδούς, αἰδοῦς, ἀθραυστός, ἀπανθραυστός, ἐπάνωσος, εἰς τὸν θρόνον τῶν θεῶν, ἐπάνωσος, ἐπάνωσος, ἐπάνωσος, ἐπάνωσος, ἐπάνωσος, εἰς τὸν θρόνον τῶν θεῶν, ἐπάνωσος, εἰς τὸν θρόνον τῶν θεῶν, ἐπάνωσος, εἰς τὸν θρόνον τῶν θεῶν, ἐπάνωσος, εἰς τὸν θρό

1. Its Meaning: the word comes from the Lat. preium, price, or value, and may be defined generally as an ascription of value or worth. Praise may be bestowed upon unworthy objects or from improper motives, but true praise is the expression of a real conviction of worth. Its type may be seen in the representation given in the Apocalypse of the adoration of God and of the Lamb, which is inspired by a sense of their worthiness to be adored (Rev 4:11; 5:12).

Man may be the object of praise, and may receive it either from God or from his fellow-men. In the former case (Rom 2:29; 1 Cor 4:5) the praise is inevitably just, as resting on the Divine estimate of worth; in the latter case its value depends upon the grounds and motives that lie behind it. There is a praise which is itself a condemnation (Lk 6:20), an honor which seals the eyes in unbelief (Jn 5:44), a careless use of the epithet "good" which is dishonoring to God (Lk 18:19). This is the "praise of men" which Jesus warned His followers to shun as being incompatible with the "praise of God" (Mt 6:1-4; cf Jn 12:43; Gal 1:10; 1 Thess 2:6). On the other hand, that which is the intrinsic homage of the soul to righteousness (Lk 23:47), the acknowledgment given to well-doing by just government (Rom 13:3; 1 Pet 2:14), the tribute of the churches to distinguished Christians was no inanimate object (2 Cor 11:8). Such praise, so far as being incompatible with the praise of God, is a reflection of it in human consciousness; and so Paul associates praise with virtue as an aid and incentive to holy living on which the mind should dwell (Phil 4:8).

In the Bible it is God who is esp. brought before us as the object of praise. His whole creation praises Him, from the angels of heaven (Ps 103:20; Rev 5:11) to those lower God as its existence that are uninh�iment or even inanimate (Ps 19:1-4; 148:1-10; Rev 5:13). But it is with the praises offered to God by man, and with the human duty of praising God, that the Scriptures are principally concerned. In regard to this subject the following points may be noticed.

(1) The grounds of praise.—Sometimes God is praised for His inherent qualities. His majesty (Ps 104:1) or holiness (Isa 6:3) fills the mind, and He is "glorified as God" (Rom 1:21) in view of His gifts and works. But as the Amplified Bible says, "God is praised for His works in creation, providence, and redemption.” References may be dispensed with here, for the evidence meets us on almost every page of the sacred literature from Gen to Rev, and the Book of Ps in particular, from beginning to end, in occasioning these theocratic and humanistic operations under these aspects present themselves, not simply as general effects of His power and wisdom, but as expressions of His personal love to the individual, the nation, the church, His works become benefits, and praise passes into blessing and thanksgiving (Ps 34, 103; Eph 1:3; 1 Pet 1:3).

(2) The modes of praise.—True praise of God, as distinguished from false praise (Isa 29:13; Mt 15:8), is first of all an inward emotion—a gladness and rejoicing of the heart (Ps 4:7; 33:21), a music of the soul and spirit (Ps 103:1; Lk 1:46) which no language can adequately express (Ps 106:2; 2 Cor 9:15). But utterance is natural to strong emotion, and the mouth instinctively strives to express the praises of the heart (Ps 61:15 and passim). Many of the most moving passages in Scripture come from the inspiration of the spirit of praise awakened by the contemplation of the Divine majesty or power or wisdom or kindness, but above all by the revelation of redeeming love. Again, the spirit of praise is often found in a state of deepest humiliation and utterance. The man who praises God desires to praise Him in the hearing of other men (Ps 40:10), and desires also that their praises should be joined with his own (31:3). Further, the spirit of praise is an expression of faith. It may find expression in others ways—in sacrifice (Lev 7:13), or testimony (Ps 66:16), or prayer (Col 1:3); but it finds its most natural and its fullest utterance in lyrical and musical forms. When God fills the heart with praise He puts a new song into the mouth (Ps 40:3). The Book of Ps is the proof of this for the OT. And when we pass to the NT we find that, alike for angels and men, for the church on earth and the church in heaven, the higher moods of praise express themselves in bursts of song (Lk 4:15; Eph 6:19; Col 3:16; Rev 9:11; 14:3; 15:3). Finally, both in the OT and NT, the spirit of song gives birth to ordered modes of public praise. In their earlier expressions the praises of Israel were joyful outbursts in which song was mingled with shouting and dancing to a varied accompaniment of timbrels and trumpets (Ex 15:20 f; 2 S 6:15 f). In later times Israel had its sacred Psalter, its guilds of trained singers (Ezr 3:41; Neh 7:44), its skilled musicians (Psa 81:24, etc) and the psalm that waited for God in Zion was full of the solemn beauty of holiness (Ps 29:2; 96:9). In the NT the Psalter is still a manual of social praise. The "hymn" which Jesus sang with His disciples after the Last Supper (Mt 26:30) would be a Hebrew psalm, probably from the Hallel (Pss 113-118) which was used at the Passover service, and various references in the Epistles point to the continued employment of psalms in Christian worship (1 Cor 14:26; Eph 5:19; Col 3:16; Jas 5:13). But the Psalter of the Jewish church could not suffice to express the distinctive moods of Christian feeling. Original utterance of the spirit of Christian song was one of the manifestations of the gift of tongues (1 Cor 12:18-17). Paul distinguishes hymns and spiritual songs from psalms (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16); and it was hymns that he and Silas sang at midnight in the prison of Philippi (Acts 16:25 RV). But from hymns and songs that were the spontaneous utterance of individual feeling the development was natural, in NT as in OT times, to hymns that were sung in unison by a whole congregation; and in rhythmic passages like 1 Tim 3:16; Rev 15:3 f., we seem to have fragments of a primitive Christian hymnology, such as Pliny bears witness to for the early years of the 2d cent., when he informs us that the Christians of Bithynia sing their morning meetings sang a hymn in alternate strains to Christ as God (Ep. x.97). See Perspec-tion.

(3) The duty of prayer. — Prayer is everywhere represented in the Bible as a duty no less than a natural impulse and a delight. The idea in this duty is to withhold from God a glory that belongs to Him (Ps 50:23; Rom 1:20 f.); it is to shut one's eyes to the signs of His presence (Isa 40:26 ff.), to be forgetful of His mercies (De 6:12), and unthankful for His kindness (Lk 6:35). If we are not to fall into these sins, but are to give to God the honor and glory and gratitude we owe Him, we must earnestly cultivate the spirit and habit of prayer. From holy men of old we learn that this may be done by arousing the soul from its listlessness and sluggishness (Ps 57:8; 103:1), by fixing the heart upon God (Ps 67:7; 108:1), by meditation on His works and ways (77:11 ff.), by recounting His benefits (103:2), above all, for those to whom He has spoken in His name (Pss 84:10 ff.). We may number among prayer — and thank offerings (2 Cor 9:15; cf Rom 8:31 ff; 1 Jn 3:1) — See also Wor-ship.

PRAYER, πραυρος, δεησις, προσευχη, προσευχην, προσευχην, iveruv, ενευρα, ενευρια: for an excellent discussion of the meaning of these see Thayer's Lexicon, p. 126, s.v. δεησις: the chief vbs. are ευχομαι, ευχομαι, προσευχομαι, προσευχομαι, and δεημαι, δεημαι, esp. in Lk and Acts: αυτη, υπηρς, "to ask a favor," distinguished from υπηρυστη, υπηρυστη, "to ask a ques-tion," is found occasionally): In the Bible "prayer" is used in a simpler and a more complex, a narrower and a wider signification. In the former case it is supplication for benefits either for one's self (petition) or for others (intercession). In the latter it is an act of worship which covers all the attitudes of the soul in its approach to God. Supplication is at the heart of it, for prayer always springs out of a sense of need and a belief that God is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him (He 11:6). But adoration and confession and thanksgiving also find a place, so that the supplicant becomes a worshipper. It is unnecessary to distinguish all the various terms for prayer that are employed in the OT and the NT. But the fact should be noticed that the Heb. and Gr. alike or there are on the one hand words for prayer that denote a direct petition or short, sharp cry of the heart in its distress (Ps 30:2; 2 Cor 12:8), and on the other "prayers" like that of Hannah (1 S 2:1-10), which is in reality a song of thanksgiving, or that of Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ, in which intercession is mingled with doxology (Eph 3:14-21).

The history of prayer as it meets us here reflects various stages of its development and experience. In the patriarchal period, when men began 1. In the to call upon the name of the Lord (Gen 4:26; cf 12:8; 21:33), prayer is naive, familiar and direct. (15 2 f; 17 18; 18 23 f; 24 15). It is evidently associated with the giving of the law (12:8; 13:4; 26:25), the underlying idea probably being that the gift or offering would help to elicit the desired response. Analogous to this is Jacob's vow, itself a species of prayer, in which the granting of desired benefits becomes the condition of promised service and fidelity (28:30 ff.). In the pre-exilic history of Israel prayer still retains many of the primitive features of the patriarchal type (Ex 3:4; Nu 11:11-15; Jgs 6:13 ff; 11:30 f; 1 Sc 1; 2 Sc 15:8; Ps 66:18 f). The Law has remarkably little to say on the subject, differing here from the later Judaism (see Schürer, H.I.P, II, i, 290, index-vol. p. 93; and of Mt 6:5 ff; 23:14; Acts 3:1; 16:18); while it confines the association of prayer with sacrifices, which now appear, however, not as gifts in anticipation of benefits to follow, but as expiations of guilt (Dt 21:1-9) or thank offerings for past mercies (26:1-11). Moreover, the free, frank access of the private individual to God is more and more giving place to the mediation of the priest (21:5 ff; 33:3), the intercessory service of the people (Ex 32:11-13; 1 Sc 7; 5:13; 12:23), the ordered approach of tabernacle and temple services (Ex 40:1 K 8). The prophet, it is true, approaches God immediately and freely—Moses (Ex 34:34; Dt 34:10) and David (2 S 7:27; 15:13, etc.)—but he does so in virtue of his office, and on the ground esp. of his possession of the Spirit and his intercessory function (cf Ezek 2:2; Jer 14:15).

A new epoch in the history of prayer in Israel was brought about by the experiences of the Exile. Chastisement drove the nation to seek God more earnestly than before, and as the way of approach through the external forms of the temple and its sacrifices was now closed, the spiritual path of prayer was a new avenue to divine intercessions and devotional habits of Ezra (Ezra 7:27; 8:23), Nehemiah (Neh 2:4; 4:9, etc.) and Daniel (Dn 6:10) prove how large a place prayer came to hold in the individual life; while the utterances recorded in Ezr 9:6-15; Neh 1:5-11; 9:7-15, and Isa 63:7-64:12 serve as illustrations of the language and spirit of the prayers of the Exile, and show esp. the prominence now given to confession of sin. In any survey of the OT teaching the Psalms occupy a place by themselves, both on account of the long period they cover in the history and because we are ignorant in most cases as to the particular circumstances of their origin. But speaking generally it may be said that here we see the least rigid thoughts attained by the spirit of prayer under the old dispensation—the intensest craving for pardon, purity and other spiritual blessings (61, 130), the most heartfelt longing for a living communion with God Himself (42:2; 63:1; 64:2).

Here it will be convenient to deal separately with the material furnished by the Gospel narra-tives of the life and teaching of Christ and that found in the remaining books.

2. In the NT. The distinctively Christian element of our subject comes to us from the Christ of the Gospels. We have to notice His own habits in the matter (Lk 3:21; 6:12; 9:16.29; 22:32-39- 46; 23:34-46; Mt 27:46; Jn 17), which for all who accept Him as the revealer of the Father and the final authority in religion immediately dissipate all theoretical objections to the value and efficacy of prayer. Next we have His general teaching on the subject in parables (Lk 11:5-9; 18:1-14) and incidental sayings (Mt 6:44; 6:5-8; 7:7-11; 9:38; 17:21; 18:19; 21:22; 24:20; 26:41 and 55), which presents prayer, not as more energizing of the religious soul that is followed by beneficent spiritual reactions, but as the request of a child to a father (6:8; 7:11), subject, indeed, to the father's unfailing answer (Jn 11:25; cf 6:10; 10:16; 20:17; 1 Jn 5:14), but secure always of loving attention and response (Mt 7:7-11; 21:22). In thus teaching us to approach God as our Father, Jesus raised prayer to its highest plane, making it not less reverent than it was at its best in OT times, while far more intimate and trustful. In the Lord's Prayer (q.v.) He summed up His ordinary teaching on the subject in a concrete example which serves as a model and brevity of prayer (Mt 6:9-13; Lk 11:2-4). But according to the Fourth Gospel, this was not His final word upon the subject. On the night of the betrayal, and in full view of His death and resurrection and ascension to God's right hand, He told His disciples that prayer was henceforth to be addressed to the Father in the name of the Son, and that prayer thus offered was sure to be granted (Jn 16:23-24.26). The differentia of Christian prayer thus consists in its being offered in the name of Christ: while the secret of its success lies on the one hand in the new access to the Father which Christ has secured for His people (17:19; cf He 4:14-16; 10:19-22), and on the other in the fact that prayer offered in the name of Christ will be prayer in harmony with the Father's will (15:7; cf 1 Jn 3:22 f; 5:13 f).

In the Acts and Eph. we see the apostolic church giving effect to Christ's teaching on prayer. It was in a praying atmosphere that the church was born (Acts 1:14; cf 2:1); and throughout its early history prayer continued to be its vital breath and native air (2:42; 3:1; 6:46 and passim). The Eph. abound in references to prayer. Those of Paul in particular contain frequent allusions to his own personal practice in the matter (Rom 1:9; Eph 1:16; Phil 1:9; 1 Thess 1:2, etc), and many exhortations to his readers to cultivate the praying habit (Rom 12:12; Eph 6:18; Phil 4:6; 1 Thess 5:17, etc). But the new and characteristic thing about Christian prayer as it meets us now is its connection with the Spirit. It has become a spiritual act (1 Cor 14:14-16); and even those who have not this gift in the exceptional charismatic sense may "pray in the Spirit" whenever they come to the throne of grace (Eph 6:18; Jude ver 20). The gift of the Spirit, promised by Christ (Jn 14:16 ff, etc), has raised prayer to its highest power by securing for it a Divine cooperation (Rom 8:15-26; Gal 4:6). Thus Christian prayer in its full NT meaning is prayer addressed to God as Father, in the name of Christ as Mediator, and through the enabling grace of the indwelling Spirit. See PRAYERS OF JESUS.

PRAYERS, prâz, OF JESUS:

1. The Lord's Prayer
2. Christ's Doctrine of Prayer
3. Prayers Offered by Christ
4. Prayers in the Resurrection
5. General Conclusions

In the history and doctrine of prayer, nothing is more important than the light shed upon the subject by the prayers of Jesus. These are to be studied in connection with His teaching concerning prayer found in the model of the Lord's Prayer, and general statements and hints to His disciples.

This model of prayer is given in two forms (Mt 6:9-13; Lk 11:2-4). The differences of form show that exactness of similarity in words is not essential. The prayer includes adoration, supplication for the Kingdom, for personal needs, for forgiveness, for deliverance from temptation and the ascension of glory. It is at once individual and universal; it sets the relation of Divine things first, and yet clearly asserts the ethical and social relations of life. See LORD'S PRAYER, THE.

That men should pray is taken for granted (Mt 6:5). Its sacredness is involved in the command (Mt 24:36; cf Lk 18:14); its importance is indicated by the many references to it (14-16; 26:6; 27:46). The Lord's Prayer consists of:

1. The Lord's Prayer
2. Christ's Prayer (Lk 11:5-9; 18:1-8): its necessary conditions of humility, absence of selfishness, righteousness (Lk 18:9-14), of display and repetition (Mt 6:7); necessity of faith and a long-suffering spirit (Mt 11:24-26); of agreement in social prayer (Mt 18:19); submission to the will of Christ, "in my name" (Jn 14:13).

In Mt 11:25-26 AV, Christ thanks God: "Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. 3. Prayers Even so, Father: for so it seemed good Offered by thee in thy sight." This language shows Christ the essence of prayer to be not the mere expression of need and request for what is required, but resort to God. The prayer gives us insight into the deeper experience of the Son with the Father, and his perfect submission to the Father's will, with thanksgiving even for what might seem inexplicable. If this illustrates the truth that the highest form of prayer is found in the serenity of the soul.

Mt 14:23 narrates the retirement of the Lord to "a mountain apart to pray." No word of what the prayer was is given, but the record is suggestive. Following a day of severe toil and probably excitement, Jesus betakes Himself to prayer. The reality, the true humanity of the Christ, are here revealed. The former prayer may almost be regarded as that of the Son of God addressed to the Father in the sublime communion of the Godhead. This passage emphatically is a prayer-scene of the Son of Man. The association of this incident of prayer in Christ's life with the miracle of walking on the sea (an example of miracle in the person of the Lord Himself, and not performed on another) opens up an interesting question of the relation of the supernatural and the natural. Here perhaps lies an explanation of the true significance of the miraculous. The communion of the Lord with a supreme Father had filled the personal nature of Jesus with spiritual forces which extended the power of the spirit over the material world beyond the limits by which man is bound in his normal and sinful condition (see Lange, Comm. on Mt; Mt 15:36; cf 14:19). Christ's recognition of God as the Inner self, "thanks at the deal," or "asking blessing," should be noted as an example which in modern times is largely ignored or followed as a mere formality. But it is significant; it expresses that intense and all-compelling sense of the Divine which even dwelt in Him; of which prayer is an expression, and which is so essential, as we shall see, to placing Our Lord truly at a sacred meal. In Mt 17:21, Our Lord's reference to prayer as a necessary condition of miraculous power, in the light of Mk 7:34, where "looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him [the deaf man], Ephphatha," may imply His own prayer in connection with the exercise of miraculous energy. This is apparently indicated in Jn 11:41,42, although, as above, it is the expression of the intimate relation between Christ and the Father, which is the essence of prayer, and in which relation He ever exercised the fullest power of God Himself. Mt 19:13 records that little children were brought to Him that He should put His hands on them and pray. That He prayed is not related, but ver 15 relates that He laid His hands on them and, presumably, with the imposition, prayed. The scene is most suggestive, in the light of Our Lord's words. In ver 14 and in Mt 28:26 Our Lord blesses the bread or gives thanks at the institution of the Lord's Supper, and has made of celebration universally adopted, even giving the term Eucharist ("giving of thanks") to the service.

(1) The high-priestly prayer.—This prayer (Jn 17) is the special prayer of the Lord, and may be regarded as exemplary style in which the evangelists of Our Lord's method of prayer. The thanksgiving in Mt 11:25 is the only other instance of any extent in the report of the prayers of Jesus, but even that is brief compared to what is here. The fulness of the prayer clearly shows that it was uttered in the hearing of the disciples. Their relation to it is remarkable. Auditors, they yet could not share in it. At the same time, it was a profound revelation to them both of the relation of the Master to God, and of the character of the work which He had come to perform, and the part which they were to take in it. John gives us no hint as to the place in which it was spoken; 14:31 indicates a departure from the upper room. But apparently the prayer was offered where the discourses of chs 15 and 16 were delivered. It has been suggested by Westcott that some spot in the temple courts was the scene of chs 15, 16 and 17. It has been generally supposed that the ornament of the Golden Calf, found under the vine branch which was the symbol of the Father in the temple, indicates a purpose in the prayer. Jn 18:1 shows that the prayer was offered before the Lord and His disciples had passed over the brook Kidron. The determination of the exact spot is certainly impossible, except the probability that the words were spoken in the vicinity of the temple.

The first part of the prayer (Jn 17:1-5) is an expression of profound communion between the Son and the Father that the Father would glorify His Son, but with the supreme end of the Father's own glory. This is an entirely unique character of Christ's relation to God is the calm assertion of ver 4. Its consciousness of completeness in the work which He had received from God, the impossibility of the cloud of multitude, and the self-sufficiency of the Son of God. In the second part of the prayer (Jn 17:6-19), Our Lord prays for His disciples, to whom He has revealed Himself and His relation to God (vs 7,8). He prays that they may be kept from the evil that is in the world, which is alien from them as it is from Him. In the third portion of the prayer Christ's relation to His ultimate followers is referred to. Their unity is something spiritual, but the deep, spiritual unity found by the indwelling of Christ in them and God in Christ. The prayer closes by the declaration that Christ's Father is glorified in the Holy, and all to be the indwelling of God's love in man by the dwelling of Christ in him.

This prayer is unique, not merely among the prayers of Our Lord, but also among the prayers of humanity. While it is distinctly a petition, it is at the same time a communion. In one or two places Our Lord and the Father are thus setting Himself upon a level with God. The fact of this prayer of triumph in which every petition is virtually a declaration of the absolute certainty of its realization, immediately preceding the prayer of Gethsemane, is both difficult and suggestive. This anomaly is a powerful argument for the historical reality. The explanation of these contrasted moods is to be found in the depth of Our Lord's nature, and esp. in the complete consistency of His dual nature with the spheres to which each relates; He is most Divine; He is most human. In the fulness of the reach of the prayer and its calm confidence, the believer may find a ceaseless and inexhaustible source of comfort and encouragement. Attention might be called to the remarkable forecast of the history and experience of the church which the prayer furnishes.

(2) The prayer in Gethsemane.—This is recorded by the three Synoptics (Mt 26:36-46; Mk 14:32-42; Lk 22:39-46), and is probably referred to in He 5:7. It is the most clear recognition of God's infinite power, a clear object sought by the prayer, and perfect submission to God's will. All the elements of prayer, as it can be offered by man, are here except the prayer for forgiveness. It is to be noted that the prayer was three times repeated. This is not to be regarded as inconsistent with Our Lord's prohibition of repetition. It was vain repetition which was forbidden. The intensity of the prayer is expressed by its threefold utterance (cf. Paul's prayer in regard to the thorn in 2 Cor 12:8).

(3) The prayers on the cross.—InMt 27:46; Mk 15:34, Christ uses the prayer of Ps 22:1. In the moment of complete desolation, the Sufferer claimed His unbroken relationship with God. This is the victory of the atoning sacrifice. Lk 23:34 records the prayer of intercession for those who crucified Him; in ver 46 is the calm committal of His spirit to the Father. Prayer here again assumes its highest form in the expression of recognition and trust. Thus the three prayers on the cross not only reveal the intimate relation of Our Lord to the Father, but they also illustrate prayer such as man may offer. They represent supplication, intercession, communion. They thus express prayer not only to others, to ourselves; our trust, our love, our need. In all things He was made like unto His brethren, except without sin (see Points). His prayers on the cross illustrate His high-priestly office. It rises at that intense crisis to its supreme manifestation and activity.

(4) Prayer after the resurrection.—It is to be observed that after His resurrection there is no record of any prayer offered by Christ. In the supper at Emmaus He "blessed" the bread (Lk 24:30), and the ascension took place in the midst of blessing (Lk 24:51), suggestive of the course of the church as ever beneath the benediction of the Lord, to be ended only at the final consummation. The act of eating the fish and honeycomb (Lk 24:40) seems to have been unaccompanied by any act of specifically religious form. Mk, with characteristic regard to details, records Christ's "looking up to heaven" (Mk 6:41, 7:34; Jn 11:41 refers to a similar act, and holds the Lord's words of thanksgiving that God had heard Him (see also Jn 11:40), but Mk, as often usual in association with Christ's prayers; it is appropriate and suggestive. Lk narrates that Christ prayed at His baptism (Lk 3:21); that He spent a night in prayer before choosing the Twelve (Lk 6:12,15); that the transfiguration was preceded by prayer (Lk 9:29); and records the prayer in the garden (Lk 22:41-45). The third evangelist thus in addition to the notes of Our Lord’s prayers in the Gospels, which the other evangelists record, adds these instances of the special relation of prayer to events of critical importance.

(5) General conclusions.—The following conclusions as to prayer may be drawn from the records of Christ’s prayers: (1) Prayer is the highest exercise of man’s spiritual nature. (2) It is natural to the soul even in perfect accord with God. (3) It is not only the expression of need, the supply of which is sought of God, but by the example of Christ it is the highest expression of trust, submission and union with God. (4) It is to be used both in solitude and in society; it is personal and intercessory. (5) It may be accompanied by the plea of Christ’s name, and for Christ’s sake. These are the laws which should direct it; that is to say, it should be based upon the merits of the intercession of Christ, and should be addressed to God under the limitations of the Kingdom of the Lord and His purposes for good, both for the interest of the suppliant and others, under the conditions of the interest of the whole Kingdom.

In the NT sense a preacher is a man who has the inner call from the Holy Ghost and the external call from the church, the witnessing body of Christ on earth, as it has been duly recognized as an accredited and qualified teacher of the Christian religion. His vocation is that of addressing the popular mind and heart on religious truth, as that truth is set forth in the sacred Scriptures, for the spiritual profit of those who hear as its end. The preacher, recognized as such by the church, speaks as a personal witness of God’s saving truth, explaining it and applying it as the circumstances of the people and the time may require. The gravity and importance of this vocation, as set forth in the sacred Scriptures and amply illustrated in the history of the church, surpass those of any other calling among men. Luther said, “The devil does not mind the written word, but he is put to flight whenever it is preached aloud.” The preacher, in the sense indicated above, is with all other Christians a sharer in the freedom that is in Christ. But as a recognized teacher and leader of the church, he is an official who claims the right to teach. He is not to speak as his own, but as the mouthpiece of the church whose apprehension of the gospel he has voluntarily confessed. The faith of the church is, by his own assent, his faith, and her doctrine is his doctrine, unless he is not expected to give his own, as distinct from those opposed to the faith of the church in whose name he has been set apart to proclaim the gospel. Both the personal and the representative or official are united in him and his preaching.

His work is always to be related to the OT and NT. His sermon is under the creed of his church as the creed is under the word. The preacher is a man with a message, and the preacher who has no message of the particular kind indicated above is in no true sense a preacher. It has been well expressed in one of the valuable Yale series of lectures on the subject, “Every living preacher must receive his commission, and the constant purpose of his life must be to receive it uncorrupted and to deliver it without addition or subtraction.” When he presents the message of his Divinely appointed ambassadorship in its integrity, he speaks with that peculiar kind of “authority,” which has been pronounced “the first and indispensable requisite” in giving a message from God. He manifests thereby a “high celestial dogmatism,” and “human weakness becomes immortal strength.” The true preacher preacher from a Divine impulse. He says with Paul, “Necessity is laid upon me; for woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel!” (1 Cor 9:16; cf. Jer 20:9). He says with Peter, “Whether it is right in the sight of God to hearken unto you rather than to God? Woe be ye: for we cannot but speak the things which we have heard!” (Acts 4:19-20). The message of the preacher is greater than the man, because it is from God. It largely makes the man who preaches it in its fullest sense. The preacher speaks the words of God. That faith is the sum of all gifts or whatever the alleged gift conferred in the laying on of hands, without the sense of the message he is not chosen of God to proclaim His word. Destitute of that, he does not have the sustaining impulse of his vocation to enlist his entire personality in his work and give him mastery over the minds and hearts of men.

No agency of religion is older than preaching. It is as old as the Bible itself (2 Pet 2:5). It is a necessary adjunct of a religion that is communicated to man by means of an objective and authoritative revelation, such as we have in the sacred scriptures. It is an entirely natural act which has been the means of evangelization in the OT and NT. It is strictly in harmony with those ideas that obtain in both testaments regarding the method of propagating the faith, set forth through the agency of holy men who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. That faith is disseminated by means of teaching through argument, explanation, motive and exhortation. The agency for the spread of a religion of persuasion must be preaching.

In the Bible, usage of the terms which have reference to the subject, preaching means the proclamation of religious truth. It is that continuous and public testimony which conveys the message, as in Jer 11:6, and of Messianic promise, as in Isa 61:1. The term for “preaching” is also used to designate a political propagandism set forth by the prophet (Neh 6:7). In two passages (Ps 68:11, “publish, Ps 68:11) the word means “to declare good news.” In the case of Jonah’s preaching at Nineveh, the word used to designate what it was means strictly "proclamation" and corresponds to the NT word used to define Our Lord's "proclamation" as a herald of the Kingdom. The New Testament Prophets which in its initial stages particularly was closely associated with the preaching of John the Baptist (Mt 3:1-2).

Thus while preaching belongs esp. to Christianity, it has well-defined antecedents in the OT. Under both the old and new dispensations the subject takes the church for granted and utters the gospel, not simply a message to a solitary believer, but of a Divinely founded society, whether it be of Jews or Christians. The prophetic books in the Old Testament have them the beginnings and some of the features of the preacher's office and the high function preaching. In them we find a special class of men set apart and separated unto that particular work, as we find in the Christian church, the same Divinely instituted office. The Heb prophet had a message direct from God, which frequently came with supernatural knowledge in the power of prediction. The mission of the prophet, however, was not simply or chiefly to forecast the future, but to declare a present message from the Lord to the people. The prophet of the OT was the forerunner in office and the prototype of the minister of Christ. The development of the synagogue as the center of Heb worship, and its role as well as interpretation of the Law became essential.

Moses, the most commanding figure in Heb history, was the pioneer of the messages in the OT are molded imbued with power, sublimity and pathos than those under his guidance. He devoted the greater part of Israel, not so much by his rod as by the word he delivered to the people. There are numerous indications that after Moses there was a continuous class of religious teachers whose work was to instruct men and inspire the people, as is indicated in the case of Joshua, in the history of Deborah and Barak, and in the days of solemn assembly which are inconceivable without men who spoke with authority. In the time of Samuel there was a distinct advance made in the work of the prophetic office for there was a beginning of a institution. There were schools of the prophets at Bethesda, Jericho and Gilgal, the very seats of heathen idolatry. Under the dispensation the whole course of progress was toward presenting Divine truth in its simplicity and power, by bringing it to bear upon the popular mind and heart. One of the marks of the new era beginning with John the Baptist was a revival of prophetic preaching (Mt 11:9), which again resumed its old character and meaning. See PROPHECY AND PROPHETS.

The words meaning "to proclaim as a herald" and "preaching," are frequent in the NT. The mission of Our Lord was essentially 7. Christ as one of proclaiming good tidings concern the Kingdom of God (Mt 4:17). He at once, on His entrance upon His mission gave to preaching a spiritual depth and practical range which it never had before. At that time preaching had manifestly become a fixed part of the synagogue worship, and was made one of the chief instruments in the spread of the gospel. Our Lord constantly taught in the synagogue (Mt 4:23; Mk 1:21; Jn 6:59). He thus read and interpreted and applied the Law and the Prophets (Mk 1:39; Lk 4:16). Christ's testimony about Himself was that He came "to bear witness to the truth." The spoken word became His great power in His life and ministry. Throughout His life Jesus was above all things a preacher of the truths of His kingdom. Telling men what He was in Himself, what in His relation to man and his salvation and what to God the Father, formed a large part of His public work.

The preaching of the apostles was essentially prophetic in character, and bore testimony concerning the resurrection of Jesus and His early return to judgment (Acts 2:21-33; 1 Cor 15:15). The sermons of the apostles which are reported with such fulness are both of Peter on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2), his address in the house of Cornelius at Caesarea (Acts 10), and the counsels of James to the brethren at Jerusalem, as to what ordinances should be imposed on gentile Christians. In the early church preachers were first of all those who had said and done, and to the significance to be attached to the great facts of the redemptive history. With the spread of the gospel and the passing of time, this office was taken up by others, esp. such as were endowed with "the word of wisdom" and "of knowledge" (1 Cor 12:8).

Upon the basis of what is taught in the word of God there are two fundamentally important postulates concerning preaching and the 9. Fundamental postulates of preaching is that it be the word of God (2 Tim 4:2). Out of the Bible must the life of every generation of Christians be fed. To Holy Scripture, therefore, ought the pulpit text in its integrity. In the exercise of his preacher fulfills his double office of edifying believers and subjugating the world to Christ. There must always be an organic connection between the word in the text and the sermon.

(2) "He is the ambassador", "The word of preaching is the fulfillment of a Divinely instituted ambassadorship (2 Cor 5:20). The gospel is put into the hands of men for a distinct purpose, and is to be administered in accordance with the plan of its author. The preacher is in a very distinct sense a steward, but even as a steward he is approved of God to be intrusted with the gospel, so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God who proveth our hearts" (1 Thess 2:4). Those who have accepted the responsibility imposed upon them by this Divine commission are enjoined to exercise their office so as to warrant the appointment. He who has appointed them to a special work. The homiletic practice of taking the theme of every sermon from a passage of Holy Writ has been an almost invariable rule in the history of the church. It is the business of the preacher to present the truth embodied in the text in its integrity. In the exercise of his preacher appointed ambassadorship he is to administer God's word revealed to Christian faith, not human opinions or speculations.

PRECEPT, precept: A commandment, an authoritative rule for action; in the Scriptures generally a Divine injunction in which man's obligation is set forth (Lat. præceptum, fr. præciperé, "to instruct").

Four words are so rendered in AV: (1) ἐντολή, entolé, very frequently (188 t.) "commandment," but 4 t. "precept" (in RV only Jer 35:18; Dan 9:9; 12); (2) ἐντολή, entolé, generally in AV "injunction" (65 t.), but twice "precept" (Mk 10:5; He 10:19; in both cases RV substitutes "commandment"). See COMMANDMENT.

PRECIOUS, præcious (stand. for 17 different words, chief of which are ἐπιξύσια, epixusiá, ἔπιξυσιος, epixusiós, timios): (1) Generally in the literal sense, "of great price," "costly," "expensive," of material things (e.g. Prov 1:13; Jer 20:5; Mk 14:3 AV), esp. of precious stones (2 S 12:30; 2 Ch 3:6; 1 Cor 3:14 AV, etc.), sometimes of great moral (non-material) value, "Precious in the sight of God, the death of his saints" (Ps 116:15); "his precious and exceeding great promises" (2 Pet 1:4); cf. Ps 199:17; 2 Pet 1:1. The literal and the moral aspects are both involved in the expression, "knowing that ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things, . . . but with precious blood" (1 Pet 1.

PREDESTINATION, pré-des-ti-ná'shun (próthesia, próthesis, prógnosis, prógnosiás, propórimía, propórimonía):

1. Predestination as a Biblical Question
2. Importance of the Subject for Our Time
3. Nature of Predestination
4. The Doctrine in Scripture
5. Historic Rise and Development of the Doctrine
6. The Doctrine in the Middle Ages
7. Predestination in the Reformed Theology
8. Predestination in Lutheranism
9. The Arminian View
10. Wesleyanism on Predestination
11. Present Needs and Values of the Doctrine

Predestination can be, and has sometimes been, regarded as a philosophical question rather than a Biblical one. It is with predestination as a Biblical question, however, that we are here mainly concerned.

Question: It is possible to urge, and it has been urged, that the philosophical question — whether all that occurs is free or not — is never discussed and decided by Scripture. Theology, starting from God in its interpretation of all things, has arrived at universal foreordination by a species of deductive reasoning. But we must not argue the matter from any abstract principles, but deal with the actual facts as set forth in Scripture and as found, inductively, in the experience of man.

It must first be asserted, however, in view of much loose meaning in thinking, that predestination is a category of religious thought of fundamental importance. No category of religious thought could go deeper, for it reaches down to the Infinite Will in relation to the universe of finite wills, and lays stress on will as the core of reality. The philosophy of our time may be said to have received, from the time of Schopenhauer, an impact toward will-emphasis, alike in respect of will in the individual and of the relation of the Absolute Will to the universe, and to mankind, is precisely that with which we are concerned in predestination.

Predestination is that aspect of foreordination whereby the salvation of the believer is taken to be effectuated in accordance with the will of God, who has called and elected him, in Christ, unto life eternal.

Divine plan of salvation must certainly be conceived under this aspect of individual reference. To understand and set forth the nature, and ethically justifiable character, of such a foreordination to life eternal, is our purpose. For the doctrine has need to be purged of the historic inconsistencies, and fatal illogibilities, with which, in its older form, it was presented, it was often infected. This, esp., in order that the doctrine may appear as grounded in reason and righteousness, not in arbitrariness and almighty caprice.

To begin with, it must be said that there seems to be no evading the doctrine by election by grace, as found both in the letter and the spirit of Scripture. The idea of the Doctrine in predestination is set forth, with great power and clearness, in Rom 8:29,30, and with the same parts articulated in natural and striking form. The idea recur in Eph.1, where it is finely said (v.4.5) that God hath chosen us in Christ "before the foundation of the world," having predestinated or "foreordained us unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ;" and where it is said, further, that our salvation "the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure" (v.9), which He purposed in Christ. This "eternal purpose to save men through Christ" is again referred to in Eph 3:11. This helpful mode of viewing predestination is in Christ, and never outside Him, had a place in religious thought at the Reformation time, as the famous "Formula of Concord," to be referred to below, shows. The predestined certainty of God's gracious work in Christ was not meant to impress men, but to encourage and reassure all who trust in His grace. In Rom 9:14-25, the absolute sovereignty of God is put in a form whereby election is made to originate in the Divine will apart from all human merit, whether actual or foreseen. But from this assertion of God's free supremacy we can derive no concrete theodicy, or do more than infer that God is just and wise in His exercise of free grace, even when His doings are most perplexing to us.

The needful thing is to understand, so far as may be, the nature of the cooperation that takes place between the Divine and the human.

Augustine, following upon the inculcation of the idea that nothing in Scripture points to any personal and inexcusable predestination to reprobation, the sense in which the personal election to salvation just spoken of. A non-election there may be, of course, but not in any sense that annuls full personal responsibility for coming short of life everlasting. The appeal of Scripture from first to last is to man, as free. Calvin's strange way of putting the matter was, "Man therefore falls, God's providence so ordaining, but he falls by his own fault." This idea of reprobation was first introduced by Gottschalk, a monk of the 9th cent., long after the predestination doctrine had received its first full and positive exposition by Augustine. Augustine, upon the inculcation by the fathers in the first three centuries of the church, made the doctrine of a special, personal, and in man himself, apart from any election, a work of God, in opposition to Pelagius. Augustine gave new prominence in his history to the absolute will of God: he made Divine grace the only ground of man's salvation; it was to him the irresistible power working faith and bringing heart to salvation, as it results. It was to him God's absolute predestination that determined who were believers. But Augustine held predestination as an inference from his conception of the Fall and of grace, rather than as a metaphysical principle.

In the Middle Ages, Anselm, Peter Lombard, and Aquinas, followed the Augustinian views only to a certain extent. Aquinas admits that predestination implies a relation to God, but that grace is not of the essence of predestination. Predestination is, to Aquinas, a part of Providence, and it presupposes election in the order of reason. Though Divine goodness in general be without election, Aquinas thinks the communication of a particular good cannot be without election. Predestination has, for him, its foundation in the goodness of God, which is its reason. Aquinas thinks predestination most surely takes effect, but not as from necessity; the effect takes place under the working of consciousness. From such views we are recalled to the idea of a rigorous predestination, by Thomas Bradwardine... and John Wyclif, in pre-Reformation times. We are thus brought up to the decretal system—so called from Calvin's making predestination consist of all the decrees of God, which became, in its metaphysical principle, the fundamental position of the whole Reformed theology after the Reformation.

The theology of the Reformed church adopted the Calvinistic doctrine of the decree of predestination in election. Calvin, however, 7. Predestination simply carried the Augustinian theory to its logical and necessary conclusion, and he was the first to adopt the doctrine as the cardinal point or primum movens of a theological system. Zwingli, it must be remembered, was, even before Calvin, of consistent deterministic leanings, as part of his large speculative views, which were not without a tendency to universalism. Salvation was, to Calvin, the execution of a Divine decree, which was supposed to fix the extent and conditions of such salvation.

(1) Calvin's definition.—Predestination was, for Calvin, involved in election, and Divine foreknowledge and the decree of Divinity are taken to be identical. Calvin's mode of defining predestination was as the eternal decree of God, by which He has decided with Himself what is to be of each and every individual. For all, he maintains, are not created in the same condition; but eternal life is foreordained for some, eternal condemnation for others. Calvin confesses that this is a "horrible decree," and it is not surprising to find competent theologians in our time denying such a form of predestination any thing akin to the teachings of St. Paul, who never speaks of predestination.

(2) Theology advanced by Calvin.—It is generally overlooked, however, that the theological advance registered by Calvin is to be seen by study of the views of the Middle Ages, and on to the Reformation, not by viewing Calvinism in our post-Reformation lights. It was love—"the fatherly love of God," as he terms it—the efficiency of saving love—which Calvin insisted upon, above all, in his teaching about God. But Calvin also heightened men's ideas as to the certitude of personal salvation. It is but fair to Calvin to remember—for superficial acquaintance with his teachings is far from rare—that he, in the strongest manner, maintained Divine sovereignty over all of Divinity, righteousness, riches, and love, and expressly rejected the notion of absolute power as, in this connection, a heathenish idea. The Calvinistic doctrine was not absolute, but mediated in Christ, and conditioned upon faith.

Luther and the Lutheran church at first shared the doctrine of predestination and election. Luther in his treatment of free will reproducing the Augustinian form of the doctrine, and in a sense, strictly regarded the predestination of Luther and Melanchthon proceeded, not from their conception of God, but rather from the doctrine of sin and grace. Melanchthon was less disposed than Luther to press the doctrine of absolute predestination, and, in his "synergistic" tendencies, laid increasing stress on human freedom, until he at length rejected the doctrine of absolute predestination. He was blamed by strict Lutheranism for yielding too much to Pelagianism. But the Lutheran "Formula of Concord," in 1577, was not a very logical and consistent presentation of the case, for, opposed at points to Augustinianism, it fell back, in the end, on election in the Augustinian spirit. Or, put the matter in another form, the "Formula of Concord" may have said to have held with Augustinianism, but to have differed by maintaining a universal call along with a particular election, and it rejected the decree of reprobation. Later Lutheranism adopted a more moderate form of the doctrine, wherein predestination was often identified with prescience. But Lutheranism ought not, in strictness, to be identified, as is sometimes done, with the Arminian theory. The Lutheran doctrine of predestination was further developed by Schleiermacher, who emphasized the efficiency of grace, while adopting its universality in the Lutheran sense.

Arminianism, in its earliest assertion, maintained simply universal grace and conditional election. But in the five Articles it formulated its opposition to Calvinism, although Arminius does not appear to have been more than moderately Calvinistic, as we would account it. Arminius gave grace supreme place, and made it, when welcome, pass into saving grace. He made election depend on faith, which latter is the condition of universal grace. Arminianism rejects the so-called common grace of the predestination theory, and its effectual grace for the elect, for, in the Arminian view, God's grace is not missed save by resistance or neglect. Arminianism holds the awakened human will to cooperate with Divine grace, in such wise that it rests with the human will whether the Divine grace is really accepted or resisted. It is the condition of free will to do more justice than Calvinism to faith and repentance, as conditions of personal salvation, and precedent thereto. The Arminian standpoint admits the foreknowledge of God, but denies foreordination, and, in this, it must see the foreknowledge of God to such a bare knowledge of the future. But it is, of course, freely to be granted that foreknowledge in God, simply as knowledge, does not carry any causal energy or efficiency with it. But it may still be doubted whether the prescience of God can be nothing more fruitful and creative than such a position implies, and whether its relation to predestination may not be a more necessary one. The theory seems to fail of giving satisfactory account of the Divine activity in its relation to human activity, in the sphere of grace. The shortcoming of Arminianism lies in its failing also to do justice to the spirit of Scripture with its emphatic assertion of the doctrine of God as the creator of all. Still, which, in its expression, is the sole originating power of the universe. See also Providence.

Wesleyanism, or Methodist Arminianism, maintains, like Calvinism, the will of God to be supreme. But it distinguishes between the desires 10. Wesley— and the determinations of God. It animism on takes Divine foreknowledge to preclude the Divine volitions. It makes predestination God's prescience purely intentional, deterministic, and foreordaining. He knew nowise necessitated by such knowledge, a conception of God which differentiates the Wesleyan type of thought from Calvinism. God is held to have left events in the moral sphere contingent, in an important sense, upon the human will. Hence human probation is based upon this position, as a man's free choice. Influence of God upon man's will is postulated, for its right guidance and direction, but not in any coercive sense, as Augustinianism seems to Wesleyanism to imply. Thus it is hoped to prevent man from justly attributing responsibility, between the Divine and the human factors in this spiritual cooperation.

When we come to the present needs and values of the predestination doctrine, we have to remark the primal need of a truly orthodox conception of God. The past few decades have witnessed... a lessened interest in this doctrine, largely because of the increasingly ethical conceptions of Deity. That is to say, the doctrine of the 11. Present sovereignty of God's will has ceased to be needed and values of the Fourth Gospel in modern Doctrine expressly taught that no cause or cause,we,be unconditioned will be to be sought; but he feebly tried to save Divine will from sheer omnipotence by saying that God's will have[Himself] and power in the the image of God. This is clearly the natural interpretation of the words of John's Gospel, and if it were not for the seeming contradiction to the narrative of the Synoptics it would ever have been put upon it. This question is discussed in the articles on the date of the crucifixion and the Lord's Supper, and it will be necessary only to allude to it here.
It is possible that the phrase the "Preparation of the passover" in in the preparation day (Friday) of the Passover week (see Andrews, Life of Our Lord, 431 f.; and most recently Zahn, Das Evangelium des Johannes, 1908, 657 f.). This method of harmonization seems to the present writer to be forced, and it therefore seems wise to give to the words of Jn 19 14 their natural interpretation, and to maintain that, according to the author the Passover was not celebrated at the time of the crucifixion.
There seems to be reason to believe that the ordinary view, that the Lord's Day is in some connection with the Passover, based upon the narrative in Mark (14 12 f.), does not have the unanimous support of the Synoptic Gospels.

PRESBYTERIAN,-prez'bi-t-o-n, pres'by-t-e-ri, presbytery, pres'by-t-ri-a, presbytarian, presbytarianism, presbytarianism. This latter word occurs in the Used in the NT once (1 Tim 4 14), so rendered in the NT both AV and RV. But the original Gr phrase, πρεσβυτερίον, always is "elders," is often used to indicate the same organization or court as the former, being applied earlier in the Jewish Synagogue (Mt 27 1; 28 12; Lk 9 22; Acts
4 5 8), and later in the development of the church to its governing body, either in general (Acts
24 6.22) or locally (Acts 14 23; 16 4; 20 17;
1 Tim 5 17; Tit 1 5, etc.). It is sometimes used of the body, or succession, of religious teachers and leaders of the nation's past (Mt 15 2; He 11 2).
The word "presbyter" has been contracted by later ecclesiastical usage into the title "priest," although in the NT they are by no means identical, but on the contrary are often explicitly distinguished (Mk 14 43; Acts 23 14).
The local synagogue of the Jewish church was under the care and control of a body of representative men called "the elders" (Lk 7 3). 2. Based on Synagogue Plan The local church began at Jerusalem and formed on Synagogue Plan the lines of the synagogue, took over the eldership into its own organization (Acts 11 30; 15 2; 1 Pet 5 1, etc); so also in all the cities where local churches were formed, the apostles made church organization necessary, the local synagogues readily suggested and supplied a feasible plan for such organization (Acts 14 23; Tit 1 5).
The mother-church at Jerusalem, formed after the pattern of the synagogue, might well have the 6th day (Friday) of each week. So in Did., viii and the Martyrdom of Polycarp, vii.
the phrase τον σάββατον, τον πασχαλά, "of the passover," in Jn 19 14, and of the phrase "for the day of that sabbath was a high day," in 19 31, seems to indicate that the author of the Fourth Gospel regarded the Creation of the world on the Sabbath in the year of the crucifixion.
This is clearly the natural interpretation of the words of John's Gospel, and if it were not for the seeming contradiction to the narrative of the Synoptics it would ever have been put upon it. This question is discussed in the articles on the date of the crucifixion and the Lord's Supper, and it will be necessary only to allude to it here.
It is possible that the phrase the "Preparation of the passover" in occurs in Lk 22 66, in RV trd
"the assembly of the elders," in AV simply "the elders," and in Acts 22 5, trd in RV "the estate of the elders," in both of which occurrences the word might more accurately be translated "elders," just as it is in 1 Tim 4 14. Besides these three occasions of the neuter sing, presbuterion, the masc. pl.
πρεσβύτεροι, always trd "elders," is often used to indicate the same organization or court as the former, being applied earlier in the Jewish Synagogue (Mt 27 1; 28 12; Lk 9 22; Acts
4 5 8), and later in the development of the church to its governing body, either in general (Acts
24 6.22) or locally (Acts 14 23; 16 4; 20 17;
1 Tim 5 17; Tit 1 5, etc.). It is sometimes used of the body, or succession, of religious teachers and leaders of the nation's past (Mt 15 2; He 11 2).
The word "presbyter" has been contracted by later ecclesiastical usage into the title "priest," although in the NT they are by no means identical, but on the contrary are often explicitly distinguished (Mk 14 43; Acts 23 14).
The local synagogue of the Jewish church was under the care and control of a body of representative men called "the elders" (Lk 7 3).

2. Based on Synagogue Plan The local church began at Jerusalem and formed on Synagogue Plan the lines of the synagogue, took over the eldership into its own organization (Acts 11 30; 15 2; 1 Pet 5 1, etc); so also in all the cities where local churches were formed, the apostles made church organization necessary, the local synagogues readily suggested and supplied a feasible plan for such organization (Acts 14 23; Tit 1 5).
The mother-church at Jerusalem, formed after the pattern of the synagogue, might well have offered to the churches formed elsewhere under apostolic preaching the only conceivable plan. We know from the NT passages how new elders were selected; we must infer that they were elected by the membership of the churches, as under the synagogue plan; they were then installed in their office by apostles (Acts 14:23), or by apostolic helpers (Tit 1:5), or by "the prophets" (1 Tim 4:14), or by both together (2 Tim 1:6; cf 1 Tim 4:14). So early as the Pauline letters the office of presbyter seems already to have borne the distinction of two functions: teaching and ruling (1 Thess 5:12; cf Acts 20:17; 28:1; These 5:12.13; 1 Pet 5:2).

In the NT history and epistles it does not appear that the various churches of a district were already organized into an ecclesiastical body known as "the presbytery," having found in some sense of representation from the NT constituent churches. But the absence of such mention is far from being final proof that such district organizations did not exist; little dependence can be placed on mere negative arguments. Moreover, the appointment of apostles and elders in Jesus, to which Paul and Barnabas appealed (Acts 15), is positive evidence of the principle of representation and central authority. The various district organizations would quickly follow as general administrative and judicial needs demanded; such development came early in the growth of the church, so early that it is unmistakably present in the post-apostolic age.

In Rev the 24 elders occupy a conspicuous place in the ideal church (Rev 4:4; 5:6; 11:17; etc.), sitting for those they represent, as an exalted presbytery, close to the throne of the Eternal One. "The four and twenty elders occupying thrones (not seats) around the throne are to be regarded as representatives of the glorified churches; and the number, twice twelve, seems to be obtained by combining the number of the patriarchs of the OT with that of the apostles of the NT" (Milligan on Rev 4:4 in Expositor's Bible).

Presbytery is the court, or representative body, in the Presbyterian Church next above the Session of the local church. The Session is composed of the minister and the ruling elders of a particular church, with the minister as moderator or presiding officer. The Presbytery is composed of the ordained ministers, or teaching elders, and one ruling elder from each session of each church in a given district or community. To it now as in NT times (1 Tim 4:14), is committed the power of ordination; as "ordinals" and "plenary" ministers. It has the full supervision of the affairs which are general to the churches in the province. It has the power of ruling, and can in all matters concerning the local churches (See Form of Gov. Presb. Church in U.S.A., ch x). The Presbytery elects the representatives composing the General Assembly, which is the highest court of the Presbyterian Church.

In ecclesiastical architecture the presbytery is that part of the church structure which is set apart for the clergy, usually the space between altar and nave; sometimes that of the whole choir space, but ordinarily the word is more restricted in its meaning. See further, Bishop; Church; Elders; Government.

PRESENCE, pres'ens: In the OT nearly always the translation of תְבִינָה, תְבִינָה, תְבִינָה, תְבִינָה, "face" (Gen 3:8; Ex 33:14ff; Ps 96:2; Isa 63:9, etc); occasionally of צִבְיָה, צִבְיָה, צִבְיָה, צִבְיָה, "eyeball" (Gen 23:11; De 26:9; Jer 25:11.11); and in 1 K 8:22; Prov 14:7, "the presence of" represents the prop. צִבְיָה, צִבְיָה, "behold"; cf also Aram. ציביה, ציביה, in Dn 27:27 AV (RV "before") In "Gr, "presence" has an exact equivalent in παρουσία, παρουσία, but this word is rendered now as administrative and judicial παρουσία rendered "coming," but always with the presence in the m. Otherwise in the NT "presence" represents no particular word but is introduced where it seems to suit the context (cf Acts 3:13 AV and 3:10). See Parousia.

PRESENT, prezent'. See Gift.

PRESENTLY, prezent-li: The strict meaning is of "these "at the present moment," "immediately," and the meaning force "after a short interval" is due simply to the procrastinating habits of mankind; hence RV modifications of the AV use of the word into "immediately" (Mt 21:19), "even now" (Mt 26:53), and "forthwith" (Phl 2:23). In Prov 12:16, the uncertainty of the meaning (in "openly," "Heb in the day") has led to the retention of the AV word.

President, prez'i-dent; צדוק; strathuk: Used only in Dn 6:2-7. Probably a Pers word derivative from av, "head," and the Aram equivalent for Heb אֲשֶׁר. The meaning is self-evident and refers to the appointment of Daniel by Darius to be one of the three princes who had rule over the satraps of the empire.

PRESS, pres: As a vb. is used in RV as a tr of no less than 13 Gr and Heb words (rather more in AV). All the RV uses are modern. In AV may be noted Wisd 17:11, "pressed with conscience" (RV "pressed by conscience"); Prov 16:22, "pressed on every side" (RV "surrounded by foes"); Acts 18:5, "pressed in the spirit" (RV "constrained by"). As a noun, AV uses "press" in Mk 2:4 for διαος, διαος, "crowd" (so RV). For wine press see Vine; Wine.

PRESSFAT, pres'fat (Hag 2:16 AV, ERV "wine-fat," ARV "winevat"). See Wine.

PRESUME, pre-zum'; PRESUMPTUOUS, pr'zum'p-tus, PRESUMPTUOUSLY, pr'zum'p-tus-lii: "To presume" ("to take or go beforehand") is to speak or act without warrant or proudly. In the OT the words are for the most part the tr of תִּשְׁלַח, תִּשְׁלַח, תִּשְׁלַח, "to boil up" (as water), and derivatives; hence to act proudly, to speak presumptuously, etc (Dt 18:20,22, of the prophet; Ex 21:14; Dt 1:43; 17:12.13; Ps 19:3, "presumptuous sins" [ץָה, "proudly"]; cf Ps 86:14; 119:21, etc; Prov 21:24, etc). Other words are "malicious," "to fill," "to be full" (Est 7:5, "presume"); "to fill oneself," "burst oneself" (14:41; "pressed on every side") (Gr ἐκραίνω, "with a high hand") (Nu 15:30, RV "with a high hand"); in 2 Pet 2:10 ἁμαρτάνω, "bold," "daring," is tr "presumptuous," RV "daring;" in 2 Mac 3:24; 5:15 we have κατακαυσκόνω, "transcend," is rendered "presumption" in 2 Mac 6:18, RV "daring deed." W. L. Walker PREVENT, pre-vent; צדוק; kōdham; prophēsō, prophēsō, prophēsō, phyndō, phyndō: "Prevent" occurs in AV in the literal but obsolete sense of "to come or go before." To anticipate," not in the sense of "to hinder." It is the tr of κόχλα, "to be sharp," "to be in front," "to be beforehand" (2 S 22:6,19, RV "came upon"); Job 3:12, RV "receive;" 30:27, "are come upon;" 41:11, "first given;" Ps 5:18, "are come upon;" 21:3, ARV "meetest;" 59:10, ARV "meet;" 79:8, ARV "meet;" 85:13, "come before;" 119:147.148, ARV "anticipated;" Isa 21:14, "did meet;" Am 9:10, ARV "meet." In the NT prophēsō, with same meaning, is tr pre"prevent" (Mt 17:25, "Jesus prevented him," RV "spake first to him"); phyndō (1 Thess 4:15, "shall not prevent," RV "shall in no wise precede"). "Pre-" in the above sense occurs in Wis 6:13, RV

"forestalled" (phثšnά; 16:28), "we must prevent the sun to give thee thanks," RV "rise before."
W. L. Walker

PREY, πρῆ (πρής), ὀφθαλμός, ἑρπάτερος, ἀσαφέλας, shādālī): "Prey" is frequent in the OT, chiefly as the rt of baz, "spoil," "booty," "plunder." (Nu 31:2; Isa 10:6, etc); of ἑρπάτερος, "prey of wild beasts," "torn thing" (Gen 49:9; Nu 33:24; Job 4:11, etc); of ἀσαφέλας, "a taking" (Nu 31:11, etc; Isa 49:24; 25; of shādālī "spoil" or "booty" (Jgs 5:30; Ezk 24:25; Isa 10:2, etc). Makēsh-shādālī-bāz (RVνν "the spoil speedeth, the prey hasteth") was the symbolic name given to a son of Isaiah (Isa 8:1-3). "Prey" does not occur in the NT, but is found in the Apoc: 1: Ed 8:77, "for our sins." 10:11: "we were up on," for a prey (pronome); Jth 9:4; 16:5; 1 Mace 7:47; Eccles 27:10 (θηρία); Jth 5:24 (καταδρωμα). In RV shādālī is generally tr'd "spoil" (Jgs 5:30; 8:24:25; Isa 10:2, etc), while, conversely, "prey" (nomin and vb.) is occasionally substituted for "spoils," "booty" (Nu 31:32, etc). See Broker: Spoil.
W. L. Walker

PRICE, πρᾶ: Represents various words in the OT; ῥας, τιμή, is the usual Gr word for "price" in the NT. "Price" is ἀνακόπτεα, πολύτιμον, ὕπερτιμον, in Mt 13:46, and πολυτελεία, πολυτελεία, in 1 Pet 3:4. The vb. occurs in Zec 11:13 AV and ERV as "prized." The spelling "prized" in ARV and some edd. of AV is due to a confusion with "prize." For "price of a dog" (Dt 23:18 AV) see Dog.

PRICK, πρίξ: As a noun (= any slender pointed thing, a thorn, a sting) it translates two words: (I) ἄγκον, σέκα, a "thorn" or "prickle." Only in Nu 33:55, "those that ye let remain of them be as pricks in your eyes," i.e. "shall be a source of painful trouble to you." (2) κέρατον, ἐκεὶρυ, ἐκεὶρυ, "an iron goad" for urging on oxen and other beasts of burden: "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (AV of Acts 9:5, where RV omits the whole phrase, following the best MSS, including ΝΑΒῊΕ; AV of Acts 26:14, where RV has "goad," m "Gr goad"), i.e. to offer vain and perilous resistance. See Goad. As a vb. (= "to pierce with something sharply pointed," "to sting"), it occurs once in its literal sense: "a pricking brier" (Ezk 28:24); and twice in a figur. sense to him because it is in my heart" (Ps 13:19; 21): "They were pricked in their heart" (Acts 2:37, κατακέντρον, κατακέντρον, Vulg compassio; cf Eng. word "compassion"). D. Miall Edwards PRIEST, πρήστας, kohen, "priest," "prince," "minister"; λεοψ, hieros, ἑραξεῖα, archierasia; for ἱεροσ μύας, hieres μεγᾶς, of He 10:21, see Thayer's Lexicon, s.v. λεοψ).

1. Nature of the Priestly Office. — The Scriptures furnish information touching this point. To them we at once turn. Priesthood implies choice. Not only was the office of Divine institution, but the priest himself was Divinely appointed thereto. "For every high priest, being taken from among men, is appointed for men in things pertaining to God, who by the Holy Ghost represent the sins of the people" (Heb 5:14). The priest was not elected by the people, much less was he self-appointed. Divine selection severeth him from those for whom he doth act. Even Aaron, the high priest, Jesus Christ, came not into the world unseemly. He received His commission and His authority from the fountain of all sovereignty. At the opening of His earthly ministry He said, "He anointed me. He hath sent me" (Mt 4:18). He came bearing heavenly credentials.

It implies the principle of representation. The institution of the office was God's gracious provision for a people at a distance from God. "The high priest was to act for men in things pertaining to God, "to make propitiation for the sins of the people" (Heb 13:17). He was the mediator who ministered for the guilty. The high priest represented the whole people. All Israelites were reckoned as being in him. The prerogative held by him belonged to the whole of them (Ex 19:6), but on this account it was transferred to Aaron and his sons (Num 18:20). Moreover, his appointed mediatorship involved the people in his guilt: "If the anointed priest shall sin so as to bring guilt on the people" (Lev 4:3). The LXX reads, "If the anointed priest shall sin so as to make the people sin." The anointed priest, of course, is the high priest. When he sinned, he sinned. His official act was reckoned as their action. The whole nation shared in the trespass of their representative. The converse appears to be just as true. What he did in his official capacity, as prescribed by the Law, was reckoned by the whole congregation: "Every high priest ... is appointed for men" (Heb 5:1).

It implies the offering of sacrifice. Nothing is clearer in Scripture than this priestly function. It was the chief duty of a priest to reconcile men to God by making atonement for their sins, and this he effected by means of sacrifice, blood-shedding (He 5 1; 8 3). He would be no priest who should have nothing to offer. It was the high priest who carried the blood of the sin offering into the Most Holy Place and offered it seven times on and before the mercy-seat, thus symbolically covering the sins of the people from the eyes of the Lord who dwelt between the cherubim (Ps 80 1). It was he also who marked the same blood on the horns of the altar of burnt offering in the Court of the Tabernacle, and on those of the golden altar, that the red sign of propitiation might thus be lifted up in the sight of Jeh, the righteous Judge and Redeemer.

It implies intercession. In the priestly ministry of Aaron and his sons this function is not so expressly set forth as are some of their other duties, but it is certainly included. For intercession is grounded in atonement. There can be no effective advocacy on behalf of the guilty until their guilt is rightfully expiated. The sprinkling of the blood on the mercy-seat served to cover the guilt from the face of God, and at the same time it was an appeal to Him to pardon and accept His people. So we read that after Aaron had sprinkled the blood he came forth from the sanctuary and blessed Israel (Lev 9 22-24; Nu 6 22-27).

II. The Two Great Priests of the OT.—These were Melchizedek and Aaron. No others that ever bore the name and Aaron or discharged the office rank with these, save, of course, the Lord Jehovah, whom they were distinguished types. Of the two, Melchizedek was the greater. There are two reasons why they are to be considered chiefs: first, because they are respectively the type and figure of Christ, Melchizedek was not only the head of his order, but he had no successor. The office began and terminated with him (He 7 3). The ordinary priests and the Levites depended for their official existence on Aaron. Apart from him they would not be priests. Second, the priesthood of Christ was typified by both. The office is summed up and completed in Him. They were called and consecrated that they might be prophecies of Him who was to come and in whom all priesthood and offering and intercession would find its ample fulfilment. In the Ep. to the Hebrews of both these men is combined and consummated in Christ. But let it be noted that while He is of the order of Melchizedek He exercises the office after the pattern of Aaron. He perfects all that Aaron did typically, because He is the true and the real Priest, while Aaron is but a figure.

III. Priestly Functions and Character.—These are minutely prescribed in the Law. In the institution of the office the Lord's words to Moses were, "Take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office" (Ex 25 1 AV). Their duties were strictly religious. They had no political power conferred upon them. Their services, their dependent position, and the way in which they were sustained, i.e. by the free gifts of the people, precluded them from exercising any undue influence in the affairs of the nation. It is true that in process of time the high office degenerated, and became a thing of barter and sale in the hands of unscrupulous and corrupt men, but as originally appointed the priesthood in Israel was not a caste, nor a hierarchy, nor a political factor, but a Divinely appointed medium, of communication between God and the people. The Heb priests in no wise interfered with the conscience of men. The Heb worshipper of his own dress of Egyptian Priests.

2. Priestism

Denied There were certain duties which were peculiar to the high priest. He alone could wear the "garments for glory and for beauty." To him alone it pertained to enter the Most Holy Place and to sprinkle the blood of the sin offering on the mercy-seat. To him alone it pertained to represent the congregation before the Lord as mediator, and to receive the Divine communications. He was to be ceremonially pure and holy. He must be physically perfect. Any defect or deformity disqualified a member of the priestly family from performing the duties of the office (Lev 21 17-21). The Law spoke with the utmost precision as to the domestic relations of the high priest. He could marry neither a widow, nor a divorced woman, nor one polluted, nor a harlot; only a virgin of his own people, a Hebrew of pure extraction, could become his wife (Lev 21 14-15). Nor was he to come in contact with death. He must not rend his clothes, nor defile himself, even for his father or his mother (Lev 21 10,11). His sons might defile themselves for their kin, but the high priest must not. For he was the representative of life. Death did not exist for him, in so far as he was a priest. God is the Ever-Living, the Life-Giving; and His priest, who had "the crown of the anointing oil of His God upon him," had to do with life alone.

Adolph Saphir believes there is deep significance in the miracle of Aaron’s rod that budded and bare almonds (Nu 17). It was a visible sign of the legitimacy of Aaron’s priesthood and a confirmation of it, Aaron’s Rod and a symbol of its vitality and fruitfulness. The twelve rods of the tribes were dead sticks of wood, and remained dead; Aaron’s alone had life and produced blossoms and fruit. It was the emblem of his office which correlated itself with life, and had nothing to do with death.

IV. Consecration of Aaron and His Sons (Ex 29; Lev 8).—The process of the consecration is minutely described and is worthy of a more detailed and careful study than can here be given it. Only the more prominent features are noticed.

(1) Both the high priest and his sons were together with water sprinkled on him (Ex 29.4). But when this was done, the high priest parted company with his sons. (2) Next, Aaron was arrayed in the holy and beautiful garments, with the breastplate over his heart, and the holy crown on his head, the mitre, or turban, with its golden plate bearing the significant inscription, “Holy to Jehovah.” This was Aaron’s investiture of the high office. (3) He was then anointed with the precious oil. It is noteworthy that Moses poured the oil on his head. When he anointed the tabernacle and its furniture, he sprinkled the oil; but in Aaron’s case, there was a profusion, an abundance in the anointing (Ps 133.2). (4) After the anointing of the high priest the appointed sacrifices were offered (Ex 29.10 ff.).

Up to this point in the ceremony, Aaron was the principal figure, the sons having no part save in the bathing. But after the offerings had been made the sons became prominent participants in the ceremonies, sharing equally with the high priest therein.

(5) The blood of the offering was applied to the person of father and sons alike (Ex 29.20.21). On the tip of the right ear, on the thumb of the right hand, and on the great toe of the right foot was the consecrating blood-mark set.

1. Symbol of Consecration

The significance of his action should not escape the reader. The whole person and career of the priest were thus brought under power of the blood. He placed a blod-stained hand that he might execute, rightly and efficiently, the services of the sanctuary and the duties of his great office. He had likewise a blood-stained foot that he might walk in the statutes and commandments of the Lord blameless, and tread the courts of the Lord’s house as the obedient servant of the Most High. Sacrificial blood, the blood of atonement, is here, everywhere else, the foundation for saints and sinners, for priests and for kings, in all their relations with God.

The priests of Israel were but dim shadows, obscure sketches and drafts of the one Great Priest of God, the Lord Jesus Christ. Without Archetype between the type and the archetype, I say up in a few brief sentences the perfection found in the priestly character of Christ: (1) Christ as Priest is appointed of God (He 5.5). (2) He is consecrated with an oath (He 7.20–22). (3) He is sinless (He 7.26). (4) His priesthood is unchangeable (He 7.24). (5) He is offering, present, and final (He 9.25–28; 10.12). (6) His intercession is all-prevailing (He 7.25). (7) As God and man in one Person He is a perfect Mediator (He 1.1). See Christ, Offices of, V.

LITERATURE

I. Institution of the High-Priesthood. Temples with an elaborate ritual, a priesthood and a high priest were familiar to Moses. For a millennium or two before his time these had flourished in Egypt. Each temple had its priest or priests, the larger temples and centers having a high priest. For centuries the high priest of Amon at Thebes stood next to the king in power and influence. Many other high-priesthoods of less importance existed. Moses’ father-in-law was priest of Midian, doubtless the chief or high priest. In founding a nation and establishing an ecclesiastical system, nothing would be more natural and proper for him than to institute a priestly system with a high priest at the head. The records give a fairly full account of the institution of the high-priesthood.

Aaron, the brother of Moses, was chosen first to fill the office. He was called "the priest" (ha-kohen) (Ex 31.10). As the office was to be hereditary and to be preserved in perpetuity in the family of Aaron (Ex 29.9.20), he is succeeded by his son Eleazar (Nu 20.28; Dt 10 6), and he in turn by his son Phinehas (Nu 35.11). In his time the succession was fixed (Nu 26 12.13). In Lev 4.3.5.16; 6 22 he is called "the anointed priest." Three times in the Pent he is spoken of as "great priest" or "high priest" (Lev 21 10; Nu 35.25.28).

The first of these passages identifies him with the appointed priest.

The ceremonies by which he was installed in his office are recorded in Ex 29.20 ff. Seven days of special solemnities were spent. The first consecration was by Moses: it is not said who performed the others. There was special washing and anointing with oil (Ps 133.2). After this the new high priest must wear the holy garments, as well as be specially appointed (Lev 21.10). Every day a bullock for a sin offering must be offered for atonement; the altar also must be cleansed, anointed for, the Priest, High Priest (Egyptian).
and anointed, the high priest offering a sacrifice or min-loah for himself (Lev 6 24 ff.).
Besides the highly prescribed dress of the priests, the high priest must wear the robe of the ephod, the breastplate, and the headdress (Lev 8 7–9). The robe of the ephod seems to have been a sleeveless tunic, made of fine linen and faced with alternate helpomgranates (Ex 28 31–35; 39 22–26). The ephod seemed to be a variegated dress of the four colors of the sanctuary, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine linen interwoven with gold (Ex 28 6–8; 39 2–5). This dis-inglished cloth of the holy garments was fastened at the shoulders by two clasps of sheshah stone, upon each of which was engraved the names of six tribes of Israel (Ex 28 9–14). Over the ephod and upon his breast he wore the breastplate, a four-cornered kohben suspended by a chain. Set in the breastplate were twelve precious stones, having engraved upon them the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. This breast-plate must have contained a pomegranate of some kind inside, for in it were deposited the Urim and Thummim, which seemed to be tangible objects of some kind (Ex 28 30; 39 8–21). The mitre or headdress was of fine linen, the plate of the crown of pure gold, and inscribed upon it the words, "Holy to Jehovah." (Ex 28 30–38; 39 30–31).
When entering the Holy of Holies he must be dressed wholly in linen, but in his ordinary duties in the dress of the priests; only when acting as high priest must he wear his special robes. See Priest.

In addition to his regular duties as a priest, the high priest was to enter the Holy of Holies on the first day of the new month (Lev 16 8); and must only marry

4. Duties (34). He must also officiate at the of the High- ceremony of the two goats, when one Priesthood is sent into the wilderness to Azazel, and the other slain to make atonement for the people (Lev 16 20). He alone could make atonement for the sins of the people, the priests, and his own house (Lev 4 3 ff.; 9 8 ff.; 16 6; Nu 15 25). He must offer the regular meat offering (Lev 6 14–15). He must share with the priest in the caching the lumps (Ex 27 21).
He must assist in arranging the shewbread (Ex 25 30). When he carried the breastplate with the names of the tribes inscribed thereon he acted as mediator between Israel and God (Ex 28 29). He alone could consult the Urim and Thummim before Jehovah, and according to his decision Israel must obey (Nu 27 21).

An office so important required certain special regulations. He must be free from every bodily defect (Lev 21 6–24). He must not marry

5. Special a virgin of Israel, not a widow, nor a widower, nor a slave woman (Lev 21 14). He must not observe the external signs of mourning for any person, and not leave the sanctuary while news came of the death of even a father or mother (ver 10–12). He must not dress in the garments of the common people, nor go to the camp (ver 11); and is forbidden to let his hair grow long or rend his clothes as a sign of mourning. He must not go near a corpse, but in the same position near the family of Eli, when, because of the wickedness of his sons, the family was destroyed and the position passed into the family of Ithamar (1 S 2 31–34). A descendant of that family officiated at Nob in the times of Saul (1 S 22 21; 22 11). His son, Abiathar, escaped from the slaughter, and later seems to have succeeded his father and to have been chief priest throughout David's reign (1 S 22 20–23; 23 9; 30 7). Zadok seems to have had almost equal privilege (3 S 8 17; 1 Ch 18 16; 24 6 almost certainly by enos' error, transpose Abiathar and Ahimelech; Mk 2 26 may be based on this reading. See Abiathar, etc.).

Because he joined the party of Adonijah rather than that of Solomon, Abiathar was deposed and banished to Anathoth, where he spent the last days of his life (1 K 2 26–27). Zadok was put in his place (ver 35). He seems to have been a descendant of Eli. Under Jehoshaphat, Amariah was high priest (2 Ch 16 5), and was the leading authority in all religious matters. In the time of Athaliah, during the minority of Josiah and his entire reign Jehoada was high priest and chief adviser.

He seems to have been the most influential man in the kingdom, more than half a century (2 K 11 4 ff.; 12 2–6; 2 Ch 24 16–18).

The enmities

6. The

ments

and perquisites which they enjoyed from the common fund. In Nu 18 28 the priests were to receive a tithe of the tithe paid in to the Levites. Jos says this was a common fund (1 lnt IV, iv, 4), but the high priest was probably charged with the duty of distributing it. In general the family of the high priest was well-to-do, and in the later period became very wealthy. The high priest and his family were among the richest people of the land in the time of Christ, making enormous profits out of the sacrifices and temple business.

The importance of the high priest's office manifest from the first. The high priest Eleazar is named in the first rank with Joshua, the prince of the tribes and successor of Nun (Nu 31 26). His sins were regarded as belonging to the people (Lev 4 22). He acted with Moses in important matters (Nu 26 1; 31 29). The whole congregation must go or come according to his word (Nu 27 20 f). His death was a national event, for then the high priest was 'free to leave the City of Refuge (Nu 35 25,28). He had no secular authority, but was regarded generally as the leading religious authority. Later, he became also the leading sacred king in the Davidic dynasty (1 S 15,16).

II. History of the High-Priesthood in Israel.—
In general the present writer accepts the historical records of the OT as true and rejects the critical views of a fictitious or false history (20 9; 20 8–10). He distribute the offices of the priests to those whom he would, and poor priests would appeal to him for was discovered (2 K 22 4; 23 4; 2 Ch 34 9); Zephaniah in the time of Jeremiah (Jer 29 25,5); Serah in the days of Zedekiah, who was put to death at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25 18; Jer 52 24). At the time, mention is made of a priest of the second rank (2 K 23 4; 25 18) and Zephaniah fills that office (Jer 52 24). It is doubtful whether this is the same Zephaniah mentioned in Jer 29 25. This 'second priest' was doubtless a subordinate, who was to take the lieu of the priest's place in case anything should prevent his performing the duties of the office. Lists of high priests are given in 1 Ch 6 1-15; 6 50-53. The first of these gives the line from Levi to Jozabad, who was carried away into Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar. The second traces the line from Aaron to Ahimelech, and is identical so far with the first list.

There could have been no place for the functions of the high priest during the captivity, but the family line was preserved and Joshua the son of Jehozadak was among those who first returned (Ezr 3 2). From this time the high priest becomes more prominent. The monarchy is gone, the civil authority is in the hands of the Persians, the Jews are a long way from independence, and since the chief power tends to center in the high-priesthood, Joshua appears to stand equal with Zerubbabel (Hag 1 12.14; 2 24; Zac 3 18; 4 14; 6 11-13).

He is distinctly known as high priest (ha-kohen ha-gadolah). He takes a leading part in establishing the ecclesiastro-civil system, particularly the building of the temple. In the vision of Zechariah (Zec 3 1-5) Satan accuses the high priest who is here the representative proper of the nation. The consummation of the Mosaic order cannot be completed without the cooperation of the high priest who is crowned with Zerubbabel, and sits with him on the throne (Zec 6 13). The prophet says of him: "...a man of the sign," alluding to the coming Messiah uniquely the land was to be taken away to one day (Zec 3 9 f). The promise is made to Joshua that if he will walk in Jeh's ways and keep his house, he shall judge Jeh's house, i.e., Israel, keep His court and have a place to walk among those who stand before Jeh (3 7). He is appointed equally with the prince of the royal line, for the two sons of oil (4 14) almost certainly refer to the royal Zerubbabel and priestly Joshua who are to be joint inspirers of Israel in rebuilding the temple.

This exaltation of the high priest is very different from the state of things pictured by Ezekiel (Ezk 40-42). In that picture no place is left for a high priest; the prince seemed to be the chief personage in the ecclesiastical system. Ezekiel's vision was indexing the coming system. The different institutions and conditions of the past were carried out rather than the visions of the prophet. In the time of Nehemiah, Eliashib was high priest (Neh 3 120). For abusing his office by using a temple chamber in the interests of his family he was reprimanded (13 4-9). The list of high priests from Joshua to Jaddua is given in Neh 12 10. According to Jos (Ant, X1, viii, 5) Jaddua was priest at the time of Alexander the Great (332 BC), but it is practically certain that it was Judas Maccabaeus's grandson, Simon, who was then priest (see W. J. Beecher, Reasonable Bib. Criticism, ch xviii). Thus is preserved the unbroken line from Aaron to Jaddua, the office still being hereditary. No essential change can be found among the high priests. The Books of the Maccabees tell us nothing of any change of name. It is a fixed name within the family, and from Nehemiah onwards it is almost impossible to give anything other than the name which is the obvious one. Usually the Chronicler in both Ch and Neh uses the term "the priest."

The line of Eleazar doubtless continued until the time of the Maccabees, when a decided change took place. The Syrian Antiochus deposed Onias III and put his brother Jason in his place (174 BC), who was soon displaced by Menelaus. About 153 BC Jonathan the Hasmonaean was appointed by King Alexander, and thus the high-priesthood passed to the Hasmonaeans (Ant X 18-21). Whether the family of Joiarib was a branch of the Zadokites or not cannot be determined. After the appointment of Jonathan, the office became hereditary in the Hasmonaean line, and continued thus until the time of Herod the Great. The latter set up and declared a high priest at his pleasure. The Romans did thesame, and changed so frequently that the position became almost an annual appointment. Though many changes were thus made, the high priest was always chosen from certain priestly families. From this group of deposed priests arose a class known as "chief priests." The anointing prescribed in the law of Moses was not always carried out in later times, and in fact was generally omitted. The Mish speaks of high priests who were installed in office simply by wearing their special robes (Schl. II, i, p. 217, note 24).

In NT times the high priest was the chief civil and ecclesiastical dignitary among the Jews. He was chairman of the Sanhedrin, and held the critical power of the court, though the NT knows him as the servant of the Rom government. It is not clear just how far he participated in the ceremonies of the temple. No doubt he alone entered the Holy of Holies once a year on the Day of Atonement, and probably offered the death of a week. What other part he took in the work was according to his pleasure. Jos says that he officiated at the Sabbath, the New Moon and yearly festivals. The daily minah (Lev 12 ff) which he was to offer as the result of a sin offering, was offered by the high priest in person, but he was required to defray the expense of it. This was a duty which, according to Ezekiel's vision, was to be performed by the prince. The Jews had many contentions with the Romans as to who should keep the garments of the high priest. When Jesus fell into the hands of the Romans, the robe of state also fell into their hands.

In the time of Christ, Annas and Caiaphas were high priests (Lk 5 15). It is in the appointment of Caiaphas alone accented as such. Annas had probably been deposed, yet retained much of his influence among the priestly families. For particulars see ANNAS; JESUS CHRIST. These two were also the chief conspirators against the coming Messiah. When the council of Caiaphas doubtless advised them to put Jesus to death to save the nation (Jn 11 51). He was also chairman of the council which tried and condemned Jesus (Mc 15 1-5; 57-58; Mk 14 62-63; Mt 27 24; Lk 23 24-25)). They were also leaders in the persecution of the apostles and disciples after Pentecost (Acts 4 6; 5 17-21); Saul sought letters from the high priest to Damascus to give him authority to bring any Christians he might find there bound to Jesus (Acts 9 2). He presided at the council which tried Paul (Acts 25 2; 24 13).

In the Ep. to the He the doctrine of the priesthood of Jesus is fully and carefully elaborated. Jesus is here called the great High Priest, as well as priest. The opening words of the Ep. contain the essential thought: "Since he has been made perfect forever on the basis of the sacrifice once for all of Jesus Christ, the High Priest, he needs to offer sacrifices toward sin and the dead" (5 1). The title of high priest is first introduced in 2 17, "a merciful and faithful high priest in the service of God," also in 5 1, "...the great High Priest who confers grace." Having thus fairly introduced his great theme, the writer strikes the keynote of his great argument. Having then a great high priest," etc (4 14-15). From 4 14 to 7 28 the argument deals with the high-priestly work of Jesus. The qualifications are not only those which distinguish all priesthood, but they are also unique. He is named after the order of梅 46. The qualifications are: (1) He is appointed by God to His office (5 1). (2) He is well fitted for the office by His experiences and participation in all things. He has been "made perfect forever," etc (2 46; 5 10). (3) He undergoes a Divine preparation (5 9). The statement of qualifications is: It is after the order of Melchizedek (5 10). This is an eternal one (6 20); royal or kingly (7 1-3); independent of birth or family (ver 2); it is timeless (ver 5); superior to that of Levi (vs 4–10); new and different from that of Aaron (vs 11–13). It is also indissoluble (ver 16); immutability (ver 24); with all the general and special qualifications He is completely fitted for His work (vs 20). That work consists in offering up Himself as a sacrifice for the sins of the people (ver 27); entering within the veil as a forerunner (vs 20); presenting its sacrifice in heaven (vs 25); obtaining eternal redemption (vs 12); ratifying the new covenant (vs 15–22). The result of this high-priestly work is a claim from all sin (vs 9); a possibility of full consecration to God and His service (vs 10); an ultimate plea in His name (vs 14); and full access to the throne of grace (vs 10, 21, 22)." 5. Conclusions

Priesthood is an office. It is necessary to note on this fact, for the noble word "priest" has been misapplied and misspelled, so that its intrinsic import has been impaired. There is a certain literary slang indulged in by some who talk of the "ministry of art," and similar absurdities. The idea of priest-hood, if priests have not any definite meaning, can have no place in literature or science or art or in anything of the kind. For it belongs to the realm of grace, possessing as it does the Divine purpose to remove it. Hugo Martin writes that he "would as soon think of misusing the language of geometry and of algebra to botany and talk of the hypothesis of a flower and the square root of a tree, or the differential coefficient of a convolvulus, as to speak of the priesthood of nature or letters." Priesthood is an office, embracing very specific duties and functions.

Priesthood in some form appears to have existed from the earliest times, even from the beginning of the history of our race. In patriarchal times the office was held and its duties were discharged by those who occupied some sort of headship, and particularly by the father or the chief of the family and of the tribe. Thus Noah in his capacity of priest and in behalf of his household "built an altar unto Jeh, and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar" (Gen 8 20). Abraham offered the ram "for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son" (Gen 22 13). In like manner Job offered burnt offerings for his children, and likewise by Divine direction for the three great "sacrificial victims" when the great trial passed (Job 1 5; 42 8). In these and the like instances there was priestly action no less certainly than in that of Aaron or of any regularly appointed priest in Israel. Melchizedek was "priest of God Most High" (Gen 14 18). Isaac "blessed an altar there and called upon the name of Jeh" (Gen 26 25), as did Jacob (Gen 33 20). In these cases priestly acts were performed by the patriarchs in their capacity as fathers of the families or heads of clans. From the beginning, priesthood with its acts of expiation and consecration was regarded as a Divinely instituted office. But in pre-Mosaic times there was no special class of priests recognized.

Regular priestly succession in a single family was established by Moses (Ex 28 1–9). From this point of time onward the priesthood in Israel was confined to the family of Aaron. No hereditary priesthood seems to have prevailed in patriarchal times. According to the Ep. to the Hebrews, Melchizedek, a priest of the highest rank, had neither predecessor nor successor in his great office. By Divine direction Moses designated the Aaronic family as the priestly family in Israel, and he prescribed the garments they should wear, the sacrifices they should offer both for themselves and for the congregation, their maintenance, their domestic relations, and their conduct toward their fellow-hebrews.

In the appointment of the priesthood there is no trace of Egyptian influence. Yet we know that Joseph married the daughter of the priest of On (Gen 41 50). But this fact had no bearing on the selection of Israel's priestly family. The Aaronic priesthood had nothing in common with that of Egypt; it was claimed to be of divine origin and not dependent on actions and powers in no way contradict the claim. The witness of an Egyptian archaeologist (Dr. M. G. Kyle) may be here introduced touching one essential element in the duties of the priestly office, viz., the "burnt offering." The entire absence of the offerings of old Egypt religion of any of the great Pentateuchal ideas of sacrifice, substitution, atonement, dedication, fellowship, and indeed of almost every essential idea of real sacrifice, as clearly established by recent very exhaustive examination of the offering scenes, makes for the element of revelation in the Mosaic system by delimiting the field of rationalistic speculation on the Egyptian side. Egypt gave nothing to that system, for it had nothing to give. So much may be said of the burning the priesthood; Israel took little or nothing of its powers and functions from Egyptian sources.

Although the office was limited to the Aaronic family, nevertheless in certain exigencies and emergencies sacrifices were made by priests without the Aaronic rights. Sacrifices to the Lord and were accepted by Him. Thus did Gideon in a time of great straits in Israel (Jgs 6 24–26); thus the men of Beth-shemesh (1 S 6 14–15); the prophet Samuel (1 S 7 9); David (2 S 6 13–17); Elijah (1 K 18 32–38). The chosen people appear to have felt free to offer sacrifices and to engage in priestly functions when occasion required, until the central sanctuary was established on Mt. Moriah. When the Temple was built and dedicated, priestly action was confined to Jesus and to the regularly priestly household. When Pharisaism, with its rigid legalism, with its intolerable burdens, became dominant, all liberty of worship and spontaneous service largely disappeared. The religious life of Israel stiffened into a dreadful monotony.

All priesthood reaches its climax in that of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is because of the perfection of His personhood that the "temple" which is made by Melchizedek and Aaron was effective, and fulfilled the end for which it was appointed. The one appointed. The one accepted. The one approved. The one appointed. The one appointed. The one accepted. The one approved. This type andantitype, as prediction and fulfilment. Christ's priesthood is fulfilled and joined to us in the Ep. to the Hebrews (3 4–17; 4 14–16; 5 1–10; 7 9, 10, 11). Two fundamental truths touching His priestly functions are made very prominent in the Ep. to the Hebrews: the power of the Priest, the duty of the Priest, and the duties. By the order is meant the rank or grade of the Priest, and by the duties the various functions of His Priesthood in the NT

1. The Jewish Priesthood

2. The Priesthood and High-Priesthood of Jesus Christ

3. The Priesthood of Believers

In the NT ἱερεύς, ἱερεῖα, is not found with reference to the Jewish priesthood, but ἱερέας, ἱερεῖας, and ἱερευνεῖας, "high priest," frequently occur. As until the fall of Jesus the activities of the priests were carried on in careful secrecy, the information that Zacharias was of the course of Abijah, the 8th of the 24 courses into which the priests were divided (cf. 1 Ch 24 7-18), and that in these courses the priests divided their work by lot. In the Gospels the archiereus are mentioned oftener than are the hiereus, the position of the priesthood seeming to have been absorbed by a sort of priestly aristocracy. As under the political pressure of that time the office of high priest could seldom be retained until the death of the holder, there might even be several lives at the same time who had the office, and this held the office which made a man the head of the nation, not only ritually, but also politically, since the high priest was ex officio presiding officer of the Sanhedrin. Not only would these ex-high priests retain the titles belonging to their former dignity, but probably the name had come to include as well other members of the same families or of families of equal position, so that it seems that "chief priests" is a more exact term of description. In referring to the one who was the active minister of the people, the reference of archiereus is usually, if not invariably, to the individual who at the time given was holding the unique office of high priest. The word hiereus is of course employed in its ordinary signification on several occasions when reference to the one made in the NT to corresponding ministers of other religions, as to the priest of Zeus (Acts 14 13) and also to Melchizedek (He 7 1).

Only in He is the activity of Jesus set forth as priestly and high-priestly, but in this Ep, great emphasis is laid on these aspects of His work. Interpreters seldom distinguish between these two aspects of His work, and it must be admitted that sometimes at least the author himself made no effort sharply to distinguish them.

Christ But certain considerations make it probable that they were not really confused or that he accounted for their degrees himself. For example, it is to be noted that the priesthood of Jesus is declared to be after the order of Melchizedek, and consequently radically unlike that of the Levitical priests. On the other hand, the Aaronic high-priesthood is regarded as having been analogous to that of Jesus, so that in spite of its inferiority, comparison is frequently made with it. It is readily seen that the work of the high priest, both because of his entry into the Most Holy Place and because he bore the inner garments of Israel in the breastplate of judgment for a memorial before Jehovah continually, far more suitably than that of the ordinary priests typified the atoning and intercessory work of Jesus (Ex 28 12.15).

 Attempting then to treat separately the priestly and high-priestly functions of Jesus, we note that most of what is said of the priestly functions is involved in the declaration that he is a priest after the order of Melchizedek, and this thought is handled in He 7 in such a way as to make the superiority of the priestly function of Melchizedek, and thus to confirm the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, the great theme of the book. Historically the blessing bestowed upon Abraham and the reception of tithes from him proves the superiority of Melchizedek. Lev 27:28 adds still more to the priestly descendant of Levi (7 4-10).
Further, Jesus became priest not on the ground of a "carnal commandment," i.e. in an order based on descent and inheritance, but by "the power of an endless life" (7:16), of which fact Melchizedek reminds us, since Scripture is silent alike as to his birth and his death. Again, unlike the Levitical priests, Christ is inducted into his office by the oath of God (7:20; cf. Ps 110 4). Finally, while the priests of the Levitical line were hindered from permanence in office by their death, Jesus holds His priesthood untransmitted and untransmissible (7:24-25). This discussion of the priesthood of Christ "after the order of Melchizedek" occupies almost all of ch 7, but at ver 26 His high-priesthood is suddenly introduced, and after that point, while His work is more than once contrasted with that of the temple priests (8:4-5; 9:6; 10:11), no further reference is in any way made to Melchizedek.

After having twice merely given the title of high priest to Jesus (2:17; 3:1), the writer of the Ep. to the He at 4:14 begins a statement of the resemblance between Jesus and the Jewish high priest, such "as was Aaron," finding the resemblance to reside (1) in His Divine appointment to His work (5:3), (2) in His experience of suffering (6:7-8; cf. 4:16; 5:2), and (3) in His saving work suggested by prophecy (6:9), which, however, it far transcends in value and effect. But (4) later the work of the high priest and that of Jesus are contrasted as to place where done, the high priest going into the second tabernacle, i.e. the Holy of Holies (9:7), while Christ passes through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, "heaven itself" (9:11,24). A similar contrast is (5) drawn between the sacrifices respectively offered, the ancient sacrifices being the blood of goats and calves laid on the ground (9:14), "his own blood" (9:12), "the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God" (9:14). The author also accepts and urges without argument or even explanation (6) the truly sacrificial character of this self-immolation of Jesus. Nor is this fact nullified by the emphasis which once is laid on doing God's will in an antithesis copied from the Ps (10:5-9; cf. Ps 40:6); for here the contrast drawn is not between sacrifice and obedience on the one hand, but rather between the sacrifice of animals dying involuntarily and wholly unconscious of the sacrificial significance of their death, and the offering, half the part of Jesus' intelligent purpose to carry out the will of God, by which means the body of Jesus Christ is the only acceptable offering (10:10). Further the author urges (7) the actual effectiveness of Christ's work, his argument being that it would already have been repeatedly performed if this single offering had not been sufficient for all time, "once for all" (7:27; 9:26).

Finally is asserted (8) the intercessory work of Christ, which, though not explained, seems to be a figurative presentation of basic idea that men are blessed because Christ died, i.e. this was an indispensable condition of God's manifestation of His merciful love, and that the grace consequent on the death of Christ does not merely grow out of a fact, but has actual activity of its own; and moreover, and providence for believers are exercised, neither automatically or impersonally, but in virtue of a constant personal sympathy for varying temptations and needs, a sympathy intensified by the earthy experience, temptation, suffering of Him who had been and is, not only the Divine Son, but also the Son of Man. Thus the salvation of the believer is certain and complete, and the priestly and high-priestly work of Jesus reaches its consummation.

The priesthood of believers is an idea which finds formal expression less frequently in the NT than has been the case in Protestant theology. But it does not follow that there has been a corresponding divergence from the teaching of the apostles. It only shows that a thought Priesthood which according to apostolic concept of believers was one of the Christian privileges, found, if not constant, yet sufficiently clear expression in this figurative fashion, has come, in consequence of errors which have developed, to receive in the controversies of later centuries stronger emphasis than it did at first. It may well be noted first that this conception of the priesthood of believers, standing by itself, is in no way related to the various priestly activities which are also figuratively attributed to them. The writer of the Ep. to the He, who does not speak of the priesthood of believers, knowing no Christian priesthood but that of Jesus Himself, yet calls "praise," "to do good and to communicate, sacrifices (13:15,16). So Paul bids the Romans present their bodies "a living sacrifice" (Rom 12:1), and Peter calls Christians "a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices" (1 Pet 2:5). But this figurative usage is entirely distinct from the subject of the present paragraph. Also the conception of the Christian priesthood holds the NT attache itself merely to the ministry of the Christian church, whatever may be held as to its orders or tasks. In no sense has the church or any church an official priesthood. Nor is it any part of the NT conception of the priesthood of believers that any individual should act in any respect for any other. Though the unnecessary supplication of believers in behalf of other persons has of late often been represented as a priestly act, as being, indeed, that activity which is essential to the Christian priesthood (8:22), this view is, and consequentY, as this right of approach was formerly a priestly privilege, priesthood may now be predicated of every Christian. That none needs another to intervene between his soul and God; that none can thus in the capacity of priest of the NT doctrine of the priesthood of all believers. LITERATURE
In some Mosaic inscriptions found at El-Ola, dating back about 1200-500 BC (Hommel in Hilprecht, Explorations in Bible Lands, 719), certain priests and priestesses of the god Wadd are designated by the term lēwt, fem. lēwst (op. cit., 719). It is not known whether this is due to Israelite influence.

1. Different Views of the History.—There are great divergences of opinion among modern writers as to the true course of history and the meaning of the different documents. It will therefore be best to sketch these views in rough outline, and then give the evidence of the various authorities, together with the reasons that in each case arise naturally from the consideration of that evidence.

The old belief was that the whole of the Pentateuchal laws were the work of Moses, that the account of the subsequent history given in the Books of Ch was correct, that Ezekiel's vision, if taken literally, could not be reconciled with the other known facts and was inexplicable, and that in the case of all other discrepancies harmonistic explanations should be adopted.

The modern critical school have traversed every one of these beliefs. The Chronicler is declared to be in constant and irreconcilable conflict with the older authorities, and harmonicist explanations are uniformly rejected, the Pentateuch is rejected, Ezekiel is rejected, Pentateuchal, and for an explanation of the supposed documents and a consideration of the analysis with its nomenclature. On the other hand the present article and the art. Sanctuary (q.v.) explain and discuss the widest held theory of the historical development into which the history of the supposed Pentateuchal sources has been fitted.

The dominant theory is that of Wellhausen. According to this, "Levite" originally a term denoting professional skill, and only later the priest of the tribe of Levi, but professional priests. Anybody could sacrifice. For a simple altar no priest was required, but only for a house which contained a sacred image; this demanded watching and attendance. (Wellhausen, Israel, 32). The whole Levitical Law was unknown and the distinction between priests and Levites unheard of. There were a few great sanctuaries and one influential priesthood, that of Shiloh (afterward at Nob). With the monarchical the priesthood became more important. The royal priests at Jerus grew in consequence and influence until they overshadowed all the others. Dt recognized the equal priestly right of all Levites, and Josiah's reform placed the sons of Zadok, who were the priests of Zadok, in a position of decisive superiority. Then Ezek drew a new and previously unknown distinction between "the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok," who are "keepers of the charge of the altar," and the other Levites who were made "keepers of the charge of the house" as a punishment for having ministered in the high places. The PC takes up this distinction and represents it as being of Mosaic origin, making of the sons of Zadok "sons of Aaron." In this it is the same as in the book of Leviticus, the distinction between priests and Levites. With Ezek this distinction is still an innovation requiring justification and sanction; with the PC it is a "statute forever," although even yet not absolutely undebated, as appears from the priestly version of the story of Korah's company. For all Judaism subsequent to Ezra, and for Christian tradition, the PC in this matter also has been authoritative. Instead of the Deuteronomic formula "the priests the Levites, the Levites, the Levites," the PC changes it to "the priests the Levite, the Levite, particularly in Ch" (op. cit., 147). From that time onward the priests and Levites are two sharply distinguished classes. It is an essential part of this theory that the Chronicler meant his work to be that of literal history, correctly representing the true meaning of the completed law. See Chronic.

There have been various attempts to construct less thoroughgoing theories on the same data. As a rule these views accept in some form the documentary theory of the Pentateuchal Views and seek to modify the Wellhausen theory in two directions, either by attributing earlier dates to one or more of the Pentateuchal documents—esp. to the PC—or else by assigning more weight to some of the statements of Ch (interpreted literally). Sometimes both these tendencies are combined. None of these views has met with any great measure of success in the attempt to make headway against the dominant Wellhausen theory, and it is likely that all later attempts will make shipwreck on certain portions of the evidence.

The independent investigations on which the present article is based have led the writer to a view that diverges in important particulars from all these, and it is necessary to state it briefly before proceeding to the evidence. In one respect it differs from all the rival schemes, not merely in result, but also in method, for it takes account of verisonal evidence as to the state of the texts. Subject to this it accepts the Mosaic authenticity of all the Pentateuchal legislation and the clear and consentient testimony of the Law and the Prophets (i.e. of the two earlier and more authoritative portions of the Heb Canon), while regarding Ch as representing a later interpretation, not merely of the history, but also of the legal provisions. In outline the story of the priesthood is then as follows: Moses consecrated Aaron and his sons as the priests of the desert, and of the tribe of Levi a body of sacred priests for the period of wanderings, but in the legislation of Nu he made no provision whatever for their performing any duties after the sanctuary obtained a permanent location. The whole time of priestly teaching requiring for its administration in settled conditions a numerous and scattered body of priests, such as the house of Aaron alone could not have provided immediately after the entry into Canaan. To meet this, Dt—the last legislative work of Moses—contains provisions enlarging the rights and duties of the Levites and conferring on them a priestly position. The earlier distinction was thus largely obliterated, though the high-priestly dignity remained in the person of Zadok till the time of Solomon, when it was transferred from the house of Eli to that of Zadok, who, according to Ezekiel's testimony, was a Levite (but see below, IV, 1). So matters remained till the exile, when Ezekiel put forward a scheme which together with many ideal elements proposed reforms to insure the better application of the Mosaic principle of the distinction between holy and profane to greatly altered circumstances. Taking his inspiration from the wilderness period, he instituted a fresh division in the tribe of Levi, giving to the sons of Zadok a position similar to that once held by the sons of Aaron, and degrading all other Levites from the priesthood conferred on them by Dt to a lower rank. The duties now assigned to this class of "keepers of the charge of the house" were never even contemplated by Moses, but Ezekiel applies to them the old phrases of the Pent.

1. The Levites forward by any other author, ancient or modern, sacred or profane, might impart. Every legislator is entitled to be judged on his own language, and where he has, so to speak, made his own dictionary, we are compelled to read his meaning into the terms used. The very first of the material references to the Levites drives this truth home to us, and appoints the Levites to the tabernacle of the testimony, and over all the furniture thereof" (Nu 30). It is necessary to consider whether such expressions are to be read in a wide or a narrow sense. We learn from 18 3 that death would be the result of a Levite's sin against any of these vessels, and it therefore appears that these words are meant to be construed narrowly. "They shall bear the tabernacle, and all the furniture thereof; and they shall minister unto it," are the next words (1 50) written in a sentence of which none was to be added, and which none were to bear that "they shall not touch the sanctuary, lest they die" (4 15). This shows that the service in question is strictly limited to a service of portage after the articles have been wrapped up by Aaron and his sons. No possibility could it include such a task as cleaning the vessels. It is then further directed that the Levites are to take down and set up the dwelling and camp round about it. All these are desert services and desert services only. It was expected that "the Levites shall bear the charge of the tabernacle [dwelling] of the testimony." This concludes the first material passage (Nu 1 50–53). The other passages of Nu only amplify these directions; they never change them, though some phrases are used which must be more particularly considered.

(1) Technical phrases.—We hear that the Levites are "to serve the service of the tent of meeting," and this looks as if it might refer to some general duties, but the context and the kindred passages always forbid this interpretation. Nu 7 5f is an admirable instance. Six wagons are there assigned to the Levites for this service, two to the Gershonites and four to the Merarites. But unto the sons of Kohath he assigns none, because the service of the sanctuary belonged unto them; they bare it upon their shoulders. "Here service is transport and nothing else. Again we read of the charge of the Levites in the tent of meeting, e.g. 4 25f. If we look to see what this was, we find that it consisted of transporting portions of a tent that had been packed up. The "in" of Ev does not represent the meaning of the Hebrew fairly; for the context makes it clear that the legislator means "in" aloud, because the service of the sanctuary belonged unto them; they bare it upon their shoulders." Here service is transport and nothing else. Again we read of the charge of the Levites in the tent of meeting, e.g. 4 25f. If we look to see what this was, we find that it consisted of transporting portions of a tent that had been packed up. The "in" of Ev does not represent the meaning of the Hebrew fairly; for the context makes it clear that the legislator means "in" aloud, because the service of the sanctuary belonged unto them; they bare it upon their shoulders. Here service is transport and nothing else.

(2) Other legal provisions.—The Levites were to act under the orders of Aaron and his sons, who were to assign to each man his individual functions (Nu 3, 4, etc.). They were to undergo a special rite of purification (Ex 29); if they sinned they were to be removed. They were taken in place of the firstborn (Nu 3). The age for beginning service is given in ch 4 as 30 years, but in 8 24 as 25, if the text be sound. The age for ceasing to serve was 50. In many passages the VSS suggest that a good many phrases are textually doubtful, and it is probable that when a critical text of the Pent is formed on scientific principles, a good many superfuzz expressions will be found not to be original; but there is no reason to suppose that any real difference in the meaning of the passages would be revealed by such a text.

The story of Korah is easily misunderstood. It appears from Nu 16 3 that his real object was to put himself on an equality with Moses and Aaron, and this is the reason led Lev 18 35). Nu 18 reinforces the earlier passages. It is noteworthy as showing that in the conception of the legislator the Levites were not to come near the vessels or the altar (ver 3). The penalty is death for both Levites and porters.

(3) Contrast with Ezek and Ch.—The impression as to the meaning of P which may be gathered from an examination of its statements is powerfully reinforced when they are tested by reference to Ezek and Ch. For 16 40 Wellhausen says: "The Levites some service as gatekeepers, the slaying of burnt offering and sacrifice for the people and a keeping of "the charge of the house, for all the service thereof," which in the light of vs 7 f appears to mean in his terminology, not a service of transport, but an entry into the house and the performance of certain duties there. P, on the contrary, knows nothing of gatekeepers, regards the slaying of the burnt offering and sacrifice as the duty of the individual sacrificant (Lev 1, 4), and—if, as Wellhausen thinks, it points to the temple which had been visited with death a Levite who was present in the places in which Ezek requires him to minister. Similarly for the Chronicler. For instance, he speaks of the Levites being 'for the service of the house . . . and in the courts and about the chambers, and over the cleansing of every holy thing' (1 Ch 23 28), but P knows nothing of any chambers, would not have allowed the Levites to touch (much less clean) many of the holy things, and regarded service simply as portage. In 1 Ch 23 31 the Levites are to offer burnt offerings on certain occasions; in P their approach to the altar would have meant death both to themselves and the priests themselves (Nu 19 3). Other instances will be found in Ps, 281f.

(4) What the foregoing proves.—In view of these facts it is impossible to hold that the Levites in P represent a projection of the Levites of the second temple or any post-Mosaic age into the desert period. To P they are a body of sacred porters. The temple of course could not be carried about, and it cannot be held that in this respect the legislation mirrors later circumstances. Secondly, the net result of such a scheme would be to create a body of Levites for use during wanderings and never thereafter. As soon as the desert age was over, we as a whole tribe would find their occupation gone. How can we conceive that any legislator deliberately sat down and invented such a scheme centuries after the epoch to which it relates, well knowing that in so far as his scheme purported to be a narrative of events it was fictitious from beginning to end, and in fact it might well be regarded as a hypothesis not applicable to his own or any future day, there was no line in it that could conceivably be put into practice? If any theorist can be conceived as acting in this way, how are we to suppose that his work could meet with acceptance? Only. Thirdly, P neither embodies the views of Ezk nor finds an accurate reflection in Ch. The facts are such as to enable us to say definitely that P is not in line with them. It is impossible to assume that he who proposed the death penalty for certain acts performed by Levites because they flayed the Levites to perform those acts" (PS, 241 f).

P also speaks of Aaron the priest and the sons of Aaron the priest. It is doubtful whether the expression "the sons of Aaron the priests," which occurs frequently in the Pentateuch and His MT, is ever original; the Massoretic expression is nowhere supported by all the authorities. The phrase "the sons of Aaron the priest" is entirely unknown to P. Where the high priest met with rejection, he only qualified Aaron's apposition possible in his usage is the "priest." Aaron and his sons, unlike the Levites, were consecrated, not merely purified.

At this point two features only of the legislation may be noted: the machinery of the staff to post-conquest conditions and the signs of date. For example, the leprosy laws (Lev 13 j) postulate the presence of priests to inspect and isolate the patient. "Remembering that on the critical theory P assumes the capital at Jerus as self-evident, we must ask how such provisions were to work after the conquest. During the desert period nothing could have been simpler, but what was to happen when the Israelites dwelt all over Canaan from Beersheba to Dan?" (PS, 246). The difficulty is immensely increased if we postulate an exilic or post-exilic date, when the Jewish center of gravity was in Babylonia and there were large colonies in Egypt and elsewhere. And "What are we to say when we read of leprosous garments (Lev 13 f)? Was a man to make the pilgrimage from Babylonia to Jerusalem to consult a priest about a doubtful garment? And what about the leper's offerings in ch 14? Could they conceivably have been meant to be performed by a "non-priest"? If this is the case it is no better with the law of leprous houses, which is expressed to apply to the post-conquest period (Lev 14 33-53). The notification to the priest and his inspections require a priesthood scattered all over the country, i.e. a body far more numerous than the house of Aaron at the date of the conquest. Such instances could easily be multiplied from the legislation; one more only will be cited on account of its importance to the history of the priesthood. It may be the idea of ritual sacrifice to kill the victims and flay the burnt offerings. How could such procedure be applied to such sacrifices as those of Solomon (1 K 8 62)? With the growth of luxury the sacrifices would necessarily become too large for such a ritual, and the wealth would grow in refinement and object to performing such tasks personally. This suggests the reason for later abuses and for the modifications of Ezk and the representations of the Chronicler.

THE EVIDENCE. —Thus the evidence of P is unfavorable alike to the Wellhausen and the mediating views. The indications of date are consistently Mosaic, and it seems impossible to fit the laws into the framework of any other age without reading them in a sense that the legislator can be shown not to have contemplated. On the other hand P is a torso. It provides a large body of Levites who would have nothing to do after the conquest, and a corpus of legislation that could not have been multiplied and included in settled conditions by the house of Aaron alone.

III. The Other Portions of the Pentateuch. —In Ex 19 22:24 we read of priests, but a note has come down to us that in the first of those verses Aquila had "elders," not "priests," and this appears to be the correct reading in both places, as is shown by the prominence of the elders in the early part of the chapter. In Hebrew the words differ by only two letters. It is said by Wellhausen that in Ex 33 7-11 (E) Joshua has charge of the ark. This rests on a mistranslation of Ex 33 7, which should be rendered (correcting EV), 'And Moses used to take a [or the] tent and pitch it for himself without the camp.' It is inconceivable that Moses should have taken the tent of the ark and removed it to a distance from the camp for his private use, leaving the ark bare and unguarded. Moreover, if he had done so, Joshua could not have been in charge of the ark, seeing that he was in that tent while the ark (ex hypothesis) remained in the camp. Nor had Aaron the ark yet; he only qualified as a fact a priest or the guardian of the ark in Ex: (1) in the Book of Josh E knows of priests who carry the ark and are quite distinct from Joshua (3 f); (2) in Dt 31 14 (E) Joshua is not resident in the tent (cf. above, p. 97); (3) in Ex 33 7-11 the Levites (Ex 10 6) and the Levitical priesthood is the only one recognized (Dt 33 10); (4) there is no hint anywhere of Joshua's discharging any priestly duty whatsoever. The whole case rests on his presence in the tent in Ex 33 7-11. P gives the Pentateuch (q.v.), this passage should stand after Ex 13 22.

Then it is said that in Ex 4 14; Jgs 17 7, "Levite" denotes profession, not ancestry. In the latter passage the youth whom Micah made a priest was of Levitical descent, being the grandson of Moses (Jgs 17 13), and the case rests on the phrase, "of the family of Judah." Neither of the Septuagintal translations had this text (Field, Hexapla, ad loc.), which therefore cannot be supported, since it cannot be suggested that Moses belonged to the tribe of Judah. As to Ex 4 14, the phrase "Aaron thy brother the Levite" is merely an adaptation of the more usual, "Aaron, son of Amram, the Levite," rendered "Moses, the Levite" by the LXX. If the brother Moses is the person addressed. The Wellhausen theory here is shown to be untenable in PS, 250 and KE, XI, 418.

Ex 32 20-29 foreshadows the sacred character of Levi, andDt 10 6 (E) knows the hereditary Aaronic priesthood. In D the most important passage isDt 18 6-8. In ver 7 three Septuagintal MSS omit the words "the Levites," and if this be a gloss, the whole historic sense of the passage is changed. It now contains an enactment that any Levite coming to the religious capital may minister there "as all his brethren do, who stand there," etc. i.e. like the descendants of Aaron. "The Levites" will then be the explanation of a glossator who was imbued with the latest post-exilic ideas, and thought that "his brethren" must mean those of his fellow-Levites who were not descended from Aaron. The passage is supplemented by 21 5, giving to the Levites judicial rights, and 24 8 assigning to them the duty of teaching the leprosy regulations. In Deut 33 8-10 (E), 'they rendered men kind to Jacob and thy law to Israel: they shall put incense in thy nostrils and whole burnt-offering on thine altar,' these passages complete the provisions of P in giving to the Levites an occupation on place of the priestly caste, and providing the necessary staff for administering the legislation.
when the Israelites were no longer massed together in a single camp, but scattered over the country. We shall see in the next section that this view of the meaning of the Law was taken by every writer of the second part of the Canon who touched on that subject. Everywhere we are confronted with the legitimacy of a Levitical priesthood; nowhere is there any mention of an exclusive Aaronic right. Smaller points which cannot be discussed here are examined in P'S. It only remains to notice that the Chronicler's data on the Levitical priesthood do not, with any absolute constancy, confirm the Levitical location, "the priests the Levites." One other remark must be made. Though it is not expressly stated, we may assume that consecration would be necessary in the case of any Levite acting on the observances of 18 6-8. And was not mentioned because in Heb antiquity it went without saying that every priest must be consecrated (cf Jgs 17).

IV. From Moses to Malachi.—Josh adds but little to our information. In 18 7 the priesthood is called the inheritance of the Levites, and it is singular that the Wellhausen Sources attributes this to a priestly redactor, though such a writer should have expressed his jealousy of the priestly writers as the Levite refused to withhold the priesthood from the Levites. It is very interesting to find that in Josh 3, 4, all the different critical documents speak in exactly the same terms of "the priests that bare the ark." The priestly writers, on the other hand, in the Wellhausen theory, have said "the Levites." The expression "the priests the Levites" is found alternating with the expression "the priests." All this points to the construction put upon this provision of the Pentateuch by those who found fresh confirmation in Jgs, where we see Micah rejoicing at having a Levite as a priest (17 13), thus showing that the sacred character of the tribe was recognized in the earliest periods of Moses. The lay sacrifices in this and the following books are explained under Sanctuary; Sacrifice (q.v.).

The period of the early kings shows us kings blessing the people (e.g. 2 5 6 18). It is claimed that this is the priestly story, but there is no more reason to see special priestly rights here than in David's blessing his household (2 5 20), or the frequent blessings of the Bible (e.g. Gen. passim, esp. "in thee will Israel be blessed;" 49 3; Num. 6). It is true that in these cases we actually have the words of the blessing delivered on one of these occasions by Solomon, and it is quite unlike the blessing of the priests (Nu 6 22 ff).

Textual criticism disposes of the supposed priesthood of certain non-Levitical persons. In 2 5 18 the MT makes David's sons "priests," but this reading was unknown to the LXX, Symmachus and Theodotion (Field, ed loc.). The LXX has "amanites" 1st chamberlains. That this represents a different Hebrew word is proved by the Septuagint text of 1 26-60 (on the extant in Heb), where we read that Benaiah, son of Jehoiada, was "over the armor" and over the brick-making. It cannot be suggested that this represents an original Heb "over the priesthood and over the brick-making" and that we have the existence of some secular court office which was rendered by this Gr phrase. Hoftag and Cheyne conjecture that אָבִיאֵיתָא, 1st refers to a priestly task, and that אָבִיאֵיתָא, 1st refers to a priestly place. This word gives the sense required (see 1sa 25 19, R.Vm "steward"). In 1 5 20 we read that Abiathar was a priestbred. Here is supported by Lucian and 23 38 reads אָבִיאֵיתָא, 1st as "the son of Eleazar, who was a priest." In 1 K. Nathan's son is described as "priest friend of the king;" but LXX reads only "friend of the king" (of esp. 1 Ch 24 2), and another period Nathan's son held the kindred secular office of king's counsellor (1 14), which is that which is elsewhere unfavourable to the view that he ever held priestly office. There can therefore be no doubt that the word "priest," אֵיתָא, אָבִיאֵיתָא, קָבּוֹהַ, אָבִיאֵיתָא, has arisen through diachrony of the preceding word נַתַּן, Nathan.

Various dealings with the ark in the age of Samuel require notice. As a boy Samuel himself is given into the service of Eli. It has been argued that he really officiated as a priest, though probably (cf the Chronicler) not in Levitical descent. The answer is to be found in his age. Weaning sometimes took place at as late an age as three, and accordingly the boy may have been as much as four years old when he was taken to Shiloh (1 1 24). In 1 4 5 also he is used as the "door-cloak (1 2 19) every year, and this notice also shows his extreme youth. In view of this it cannot seriously be contended that he performed any priestly service. He must have been a sort of page, and he performed some duties during the door-temple of the value at Shiloh (1 3 15).

(1) The custody of the ark.—When the ark was captured by the Philis, it was in the charge of priests. When David brought it to Jerusalem, it was again placed in priestly custody, but there is an interregnum of some 20 years (1 7 2).

It must be remembered that whatever may have happened during this period of great national confusion, the practice of all the rest of history has been to treat the Ark for 700 years, is uniform and would far outweigh any irregularities during so short and troubled a period. (2) On the destruction of the Ark. The difficulty arises on 1 6 14. In the second of these verses the Ark is depicted as lying on its side or as having been destroyed, and, in Wellhausen's words, "as it is nothing had happened, lift the ark from the now no longer existent cart, and set it upon the cart; the sacrifice is already burning" (Prolegomena, 128). It is therefore suggested that verse 15 is a gloss. But there is difficulty in verse 14 which tells of the breaking up of the cart, etc., without explaining what happened to the ark. We are told by a note of the 15th century that "the ark was put on the cart, and it was broken, and" the word of the cart, etc., followed by 100. This makes perfect sense.

(3) In Abinadab's house.—The second difficulty is made by 1 17 7 where we are told that the ark was brought to the house of Abinadab and Eleazar his son they sanctified to guard it. Its old abode, the house at Shiloh, had apparently been destroyed (Jer 7 12, 14; 6 9). There it enjoyed considerable importance, for Poel is unquestionably right in identifying the Gibeah of God (1 10 6) with the Gibeah (hill) of the ark. Thus there was a high place there and a Philis garrison of 1 13 3, where LXX and Te have "Gibeah." There remains the difficulty caused by the guardianship of Eleazar. Poels may be right in reading "כְּסָעַר הָנֵצֵא, בְּעֵרֶב, 'אֵתחָדָר, 'אֵתחָדָר" (a priest on the cart), and Eleazar his son; but in the entire absence of information, alike as to Eleazar and as to Eleazar the son, no definite can be said. The narratives of the slaughter among the Beth-shemites and the fate of Uzzah make it certain that the ark's custody was a matter of no respectable distance from it. When David brought the ark he placed it in Abinadab's house. The Ark was then carried to Jerusalem by the Levites (1 13 15) presumably of Levitical descent. No further irregularities in the account are known.

More important is the change of priesthood; 1 27 36 clearly threatens Eh, whose house had been chosen in Egypt, with a transference of the high-priesthood to another line. Careful comparison with 1 K 2 27 makes it certain that the prophecy was fulfilled when Zadok was placed by Solomon in the place of Abiathar. Who was Zadok? According to Ch (1 Ch 6 5 33; 24 3; 27 17) he was descended from Aaron through Eleazar, and this is accepted by Orr, Van Hooaen and many others, who take this to be a literal sense. According to Ezk he was a Levite (40 46). It is noteworthy that the prophetic books we always hear the Levitical priesthood, not the Aaronic (esp. 1 K 13 10; Jer 33 18-22; Mal 2), and the "father's house" of 1 27 36 that was chosen in Egypt could only be the house of ...
Aaron, not of Ithamar, if the passage is to be taken in its natural sense. On this view Zadok's appointment could only have fulfilled the prophecy if it terminated the Aaronic succession. It would seem therefore that the high-priesthood was transferred to a family of non-Aaronic Levites. For the alternative view see Zadok.

The prophet's speech in 1 S 2 27-36 is also important for the light it throws on the organization of the priesthood. The high priest has in his gift a number of priestly offices with pecuniary and other emoluments. This post was a far more advanced hierarchy than that of P.

The reference to 'the priests and the Levites' in 1 K 8 4 was unknown to the LXX, but in other passages the Books of K show further advances in hierarchical organization. There is not merely the high priest—generally like Aaron in P called 'the priest,' but sometimes the high priest—but also the second priest (2 K 25 18; Jer 52 24; 2 K 23 4, according to the Tg), three keepers of the threshold (ubi supra, and 2 K 12 10) and 'elders of the priests' (2 Ch 13 19; 18 20), perhaps also Jer 19 1). See also Jer 20 1 f.; 29 26 for priestly organization and jurisdiction in the temple precincts. All this contrasts strikingly with the simplicity of the Pentateuchal organization.

Ezekiel is entirely in line with the other sources for this period and the whole Old Testament. He seeks to institute certain reforms. He writes, 'Her priests

2. Ezekiel have done violence to my law, and have profaned my holy things: they have made no distinction between the holy and the common, neither have they caused men to discern between the unclean and the clean,' etc (Ezk 22 26).

If these words have any meaning they signify that he was acquainted with a law which followed the very words of Lev 10 and other passages of P, and was intended to reach the people through the teaching of the priests. In chs 40-48, there is a vision of the future which stands in the closest relation to the Pent. Three views have been held of this. The old view was that Ezek could not be reconciled with the Pent at all, and that the difficulties presented were insoluble. Wellhausen and his followers maintain that the prophet is prior to P, and here introduces the distinction between priests and Levites for the first time. Another view is that Ezekiel is familiar with P and drew from it the inspiration to make a fresh division among the Levites, giving the sons of Zadok a position similar to that occupied by the sons of Aaron in the wilderness period, and reuniting with slight modifications the legislation applicable to the sons of Aaron, this time applying it to the sons of Zadok. The crucial passage is 44 6-16, from which it clearly appears that in Solomon's temple aliens had performed sordid tasks that should have been performed by men of holy persons, and that Ezekiel proposes to degrade Levites who are not descended from Zadok to perform such tasks in the future as a punishment for their misdeeds to idols in high places. Either of the two latter views would explain the close connection that evidently exists between the concluding chapters of Ezek and P, and, accordingly, in choosing between them, the reader must consider four main points: (1) Is P shown on the internal evidence to be early or late? Is it desert legislation, or is it accurately reported? This point has already been discussed in part and is further treated in Pentateuch (q.v.). (2) Is the theory of the late composition of P psychologically and morally probable? On this see Pentateuch and POF, 292-99. (3) Is the theory of the late composition of P psychologically and morally probable? On this see Pentateuch and POF, 292-99. (4) Is the theory of the late composition of P psychologically and morally probable? On this see Pentateuch and POF, 292-99.

The existence of institutions of P that are held by Wellhausen and his followers to be late—e.g. more national offerings than the critics allow? On this see EPC, 200 ff., and passion; POF, 395-15, and passion; SBL and OP passion, and art. Pentateuch. (4) Does Ezekiel himself show acquaintance with P (e.g. in 22 26), or not? On this too see SBL, 96; PS, 281 f.

With regard to the non-mention of the high-priesthood and certain other institutions in Ezekiel's vision, the natural explanation is that in the case of these the prophet did not desire to institute any changes. It is to be noted that Ezekiel does not codify and consolidate all existing law. On the contrary, he is either supplementing and refining the older law, or introducing new legislation. In his temple the prince is to provide the statutory national offerings (45 17), i.e. those of Nu 28, 29. Apparently the king had provided these earlier (2 K 15 18). But in addition to these there had grown up a 'king's offering,' and it is probably to this only that 45 22 ff.; 46 2-15 relate. In 46 13 LXX, Syr, Vulg, and some Heb MSS preserve the reading 'he' for 'thou.'

V. Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles.—Whatever the account of the earlier history of the priests and Levites that we have, there is general agreement that in these books a distinction between priests and Levites is established (see e.g. Neh 10 37 f. 38 f.; 12 1 f.). We also find singers and porters (Neh 13 6, etc). Nethinim and the sons of Solomon's servants (Ex 21 1 ff.; Neh 12 4 ff.; 12 28 [29]; 11 3, etc). It must not be assumed that these classes were new. The story of the Gibeonites (Josh 9) gives us the origin of some of these grades, and the non-mention of them in many of the earlier books is easily explained by the character of those books. We know from such passages as Am 5 23 that there were musical services in far earlier times (cf Neh 12 42).

Ch presents an account of the earlier history of the priests and Levites that is in many respects does not tally with the older sources. Many modern writers think that the author's views of the past were colored by the circumstances of his own day, and that he had a tendency to carry back later conditions to an earlier period. On the other hand it is impossible to deny fairly that he used some sources which have not been preserved to us elsewhere. Again, there is evidence to show that the view expressed in Ch is not to be taken for history and would not have been so regarded by his contemporaries. Talmudic authorities held some such view as this. The historical value of his work has yet to be appraised in a more critical and impartial spirit, and in any of the current discussions. For the present purpose it is only possible to notice the effect of some of his statements, if interpreted literally. As there are passages where he has clearly substituted Levites for the less holy personages of the older sources (contrast e.g. 2 K 11 4-12 with 2 Ch 23 1-11), it may be that Levites have also been substituted by him for other persons in notices of which no other version has survived.

David and Solomon recognized the hierarchy. The former king instituted the musical services (1 Ch 6 3 fff.; 16 4 f.; 25). The Le-
Priests, Levites

Levites, and Leviticals were also the things baken in pans and the shewbread (vs 31 f.). This of course is not in accordance with the Law, but is found elsewhere in Ch. In 1 Ch 23 the Levites from 30 years and upward, of whom 24,000 oversee the work of the house of the Lord, 6,000 were officers and judges, 4,000 were doorkeepers and 4,000 were musicians. David altered the age of beginning service to 20, and an account of their functions is given in 1 Ch 23 27-32 (see, further, Music). All these arrangements were confirmed and enforced by Solomon (2 Ch 8 14 ff.). There is often uncertainty as to whether the Chronicler identifies priests and Levites in particular cases or not, e.g. in 2 Ch 30 27, "the priests the Levites" bless the people according to the ordinary text, but many authorities read "the priests and the Levites." Hezekiah appears to have undertaken some reorganization (2 Ch 29-31), but the details are not clear. Jehoshaphat established in Jersu a court composed partly of Levites and priests (19 8-11). Previously he had sent priests and Levites and others to teach the Law in Judah (ch 17). In 29 34 it is clearly the duty of the priests to flay burnt offerings (vs 17). It is impossible to draw any consistent picture from the Chronicler because he gives different data for different periods; it is doubtful whether he meant his statements to be taken as historical, e.g. in 1 Ch 26 we find Levites whose names (= "I have consecrated") are really words forming part of a prayer, and it is difficult to believe that either the Chronicler or his public intended this chapter to be interpreted in any but a spiritual sense (see Ps 8,284-86).

In Ex 2 10 the number of Israel which returned with Zerah-babel is given as 74, as against 973 priests (ver 36), 128 singers (ver 41), 139 children of the porters (ver 42), 392 Nethinim and children of Solomon's servants (ver 58), and the figures are the same in Neh 7, except that there the singers number 148 (ver 44) and the porters 138 (ver 45). Ezra went up, he was at first joined by no Levites (8 15), but subsequently gathered 38 Levites and 220 Nethinim (vs 18-20). We get glimpses of the organization in Neh 12 44-47 and 13 10 ff. It appears that in this period genealogies were carefully scrutinized in the case of doubtful claims to priestly descent (Exz 2 61 ff.; Neh 7 63 ff). In Ex 6 19 ff the Levites are represented as killing the Gibeonites of Gibeon.

Of these books no satisfactory account can be given in the present state of textual criticism and Bib. science generally. Some writers, e.g., hold that the Chronicler had before him a source to which the Levites were entirely unknown, others that he invented freely, others again that he reproduces trustworthy prexilic information. The student has only an assorted view of arguments from which to choose. The bedrock fact is that the statements depicted seem the natural meaning, convey entirely different impression from the statements of the earlier books construed similarly. Modern research has not yet been seriously addressed to the question whether all the statements were really intended to be interpreted as mere history.

VI. Legal Provisions. —Aaron and his sons underwent consecration to fit them for their duties. Ex 28 f prescribes their garments and consecration (seepriest;BREASTPLATE;EMPH;ROBE;COAT;MITRE;GIRDLE;URIM AND THUMMIM), and the account of the latter may be read in Lev 8 ff. In individual sacrifices brought to the religious capital the priests performed the part of the ritual which related to the altar (sprinkling, burning, etc) (Lev 1-7). The most important function was the duty of teaching the people the law of God (Lev 10 11; 14 54-57; Dt 24 8; 33 10; cf Ezk 44 23; Hos 4 1-6; Hag 2 11 ff, and many passages in the Prophets).

The priests were subject to special laws designed to maintain their purity (Lev 21 f; cf Ezk 44). The rules aim at preventing defilement through mourning (save in the case of ordinary priests for a near relation) and at preventing those who were physically unfit from performing certain functions; those who were, for any reason unclean from approaching the holy things. See further STRANGER. They performed several semi-judicial functions (Nu 5 5, f ff, etc; see JUDGE). They also blessed the people (Nu 6 25; cf Dt 10 8, etc. See Blessing. On their ducses see SACRIFICE;TITHES;FIRSTFRUITS;LEVITICAL CITIES;AGRARIAN LAWS;further CHEMARIM;NETHINIM;SONS OF SOLOMON'S SERVANTS; SINGERS;DOORKEEPERS;SERVING-WOMEN; JUDGE.

PRIMOGENITURE, pri-mo-jen-tur (πρωτογενής), b'kk'hōrāh, from b'kk'hōr, "firstborn," from bakkhar, "to act early," πρωτογενής, προ- tókia). The right of the first-born to inherit the headship of the family, and carrying with it certain property rights and usually such titles as those of the high-priesthood or kingship. The writings of the Hebrews take for granted the recognition of a doctrine of primogeniture from the earliest times. In the most ancient genealogies a distinction is drawn between the first-born and the other son (Gen 10 15; 22 21; 25 13; 35 23; 36 15). It is probable that parental blessings in patriarchal times great importance was attached to preferring the first-born (Gen 28 31; 27 29; 48 15; 49 3). The feud between Jacob and Esau (Gen 27 1-28 21) grew out of the stealing of the first-born's blessing by the younger brother. Joseph was displeased when, in his blessing, Jacob seemed to prefer Ephraim to Manasseh, his first-born. The father in such cases seems to have had the right to transfer the birthright from one son to another, from the days of Abraham in the case of Ishmael and Isaac, through those of Jacob in the matter of Reuben and Joseph and in the matter of Ephraim and Manasseh, down to the days of David in the selection of a successor to the kingship. Nevertheless the Mosaic code, which declared (rather than enacted) the law of primogeniture, prohibited the abuse of this parental privilege in the case of a younger son by a favorite wife (Dt 21 16 f).

The manner of acknowledging the first-born incidentally referred to in Dt is "by giving him a double portion of all that he hath" (Dt 21 17), that is to say, double the share Double of each of the other brothers. Jewish Portion tradition (Bikkhō, 46a, 47b, 61a, 51b; Bōbdhā Bathrā 122a, 122b, 123a, 124a, 142b) accepts and elaborates on this right of the first-born son. Thus, it applies to the oldest born and not the eldest surviving son; it does not apply to daughters; it has reference only to the paternal born and not to the inheritance left by a mother or other relative, nor to improvements or possessions made to an estate after the death of the father.
The object of the doctrine may be that the eldest son might be enabled to preside over the affairs of family with proper dignity, or that he might assume additional responsibilities such as this sort of unnatural re-} ried sisters. Hence one’s birthright could be waived or sold (Gen 25:31).

On the other hand it may be based in the ultimate analysis on the primitive feeling of favoritism for the firstborn reflected in the disappointment of Jacob, when he speaks of Reuben as his firstborn, his might, and the beginning of his strength (re’shith ’bn, Gen 49:3; cf Dn 21:17). This theory would be in accord with the right of the parent to transfer the right to a younger son. The suggestion of favoritism conveyed by the Heb br’khor is manifested in its figurative use of: Israel (Ex 4:22), of Ephraim (Jer 31:9), of one dearly beloved (Zec 12:10); (cf figurative usage in the NT: Rom 8:29; He 12:23; I 6; Rev 1:5).

Light is thrown on the attitude of the ancient world toward the firstborn, and hence on the history of primogeniture, by the language used in connection with the plague of the firstborn: “from the first-born of every man thy sons shall be slain, that sitteth by him in his tent” or “the captive that was in the dungeon.” Apparently no more dreadful catastrophe for a class of society could be thought of than this slaying of the firstborn (Ex 11:5; 12:29). The misguided fervor of the ancient Semites who offered their firstborn as the thing most dearly beloved as a sacrifice to their gods must be regarded in this light, whether it appears among the Moabites, the Phoenicians or the Hebrews themselves (Jer 32:35; Ezk 20:26, 31; 2 Ch 28:3). It is difficult to predicate a connection between the basis of the doctrine of primogeniture and that of the Redemption of the Firstborn, other than that both are ultimately based on the importance of a firstborn son and the fondness of his parents for him. It is interesting to note, however, that the tradition of redemption and the law of primogeniture are kept so distinct that, while the latter has reference only to the firstborn of a father, the former has reference only to the firstborn of a mother (Br’khor, vanguage, 46a; cf: peter renen, whatsoever openeth the womb, Ex 13:2). In a polygenous society such as that of prepossession, if in it is natural to suppose that the distinction between paternal and maternal primogeniture would be clearly before the minds of the people. See Birthright; Firstborn.

PRINCE, prin’: This word occurs quite frequently in our Eng. Bible, mostly in the OT. While it is never used to denote royal parentage (cf 1 Ch 29:24), it often indicates actual royal or ruling power, together with royal dignity and authority. As a rule, the name is given to human beings in a few instances it is applied to God and Christ, the angels and the devil.

In Mt 2:6 the word rendered “princes” might be ti’ “princely classes”; at least, this seems to be implied. Here the term r’khor, r’khor, “leader,” “ruler,” “prince,” is used, undoubtedly to hint at the fact that Bethlehem was the native city of a great prince. In the other NT passages the word ἀρχις, ἀρχις, “a potentate,” “a person in authority,” “a magistrate” is rendered “princes” (Acts 19:10; 23:24, 25 [RV “rulers”]; Mk 3:22; Jn 12:31; 14:30; 16:11; I Cor 2:6.8 AV; Eph 2:2; Rev 1:5 [RV “rulers”]). In most of these instances the term “prince” refers to the devil.

In Acts 3:15; 5:31, the word ἄρχις, ἄρχις, “leader,” is employed referring to Christ as the author of life and salvation (cf He 12:2, where the term archēgos is rendered “author” [RV] or “captain” [RvM]).

The OT contains a number of different words mostly rendered “prince” or “princes” in the RV. (1) בּוֹם, sar: In Josh 5:14 the mysterious armed stranger seen by Joshua near Jericho calls himself the “prince of the host of Jehovah”; a high military title applied to a superhuman being. In Isa 9:6, the name is given to the child representing the future Messiah. The term “Prince of Peace” denotes the eminent position and the peaceful sway of the Messianic king; the highest human title in its most ideal sense. Dn 8:11: here, again, as in Josh 6:14, occurs the phrase “prince of the host.” In Dn 8:25 “the prince of princes” refers to God Himself: the highest human title in its absolute sense applied to God. Dn 10:21: “Michael your prince.” Michael the archangel is here called the prince of the Jewish people. He is the prince most frequently applied to God’s people in the sight of God, a royal title suggesting high power and alliance with God in the benefits secured for them by Him and the powers of darkness. Dn 12:1: here Michael is called “the great prince” who standeth for the children of Israel; supplementing Dn 10:21. In Dn 1:13: “the prince of Persia” (cf ver 20, “the prince of Persia,” “the prince of Greece”), the expression is used in the same general sense as in Dn 10:21. Each individual nation is represented as guided by a spiritual being that may or may not be an ally of God in His combat with the devil. In the majority of cases, though, the term sar is applied (a) to men exercising royal or ruling power: Prov 8:16: “By me princes in [or “rulers”] rule”; Is 32:1: “A Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in justice.” Judicial power is included (cf Ex 2:14: “Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?” and Ps 148:11: “princes and all judges of the earth”). In some passages the word sar, having been rendered “prince,” stands for “chief,” or “so, (cf Jgs 8:14; I S 29:4; 2 S 10:3, etc). (b) To royal officers of a high rank: Gen 12:15: “the princes of Pharaoh” (cf 2 K 24:14: “Jerus and all the princes”); 1 Ch 29:29: “the princes of the provinces”; Est 1:3.14: “the seven princes”; the chief of the eunuches (Dan 6:14: “master” (Jer 51:59): “Seraiah was chief chamberlain” (in “or, quartermaster”). AV renders it “a quiet prince,” i.e. a prince having rest, instead of procuring rest (יִרְעְיָה יְשָׁר, sar melibah, “a sar of rest”). In post-exilic times: Ezr 9:1: “The princes drew near unto me.” They were the political leaders of the people (cf Is 41:1: “the princes and the elders”); Neh 9:38: “our princes, our Levites, and our priests”; Neh 11:1: “The princes of the people dwelt in Jerus”; Neh 13:31: “the princes of Judah.” Of course, they were all subject to the authority of the high priest. (c) To the priesthood: 1 Ch 24:5: “princes of the sanctuary, and princes of God” (cf Is 43:28). (d) On account of great achievements: 2 S 8:38: “Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?”—an honorary title. Generally speaking, a prince is a wealthy man (cf Job 34:19: “That respecteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor”), and he is a prominent man embodying true, although mortal, manhood (of Ps 82:7: “Nevertheless ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes”).

(2) nāḇē; nōšā: usually derived from nēḇā; nōḇā, "to lift," hence "exalted"; otherwise: a 'speaker.'

(a) An honorary title (of Gen 23:6: "Thou art a prince of God among us"). The distinction is conferred upon Abraham by the children of Hetz.

(b) A name given to the heads of the Israelitic tribes, from the head's place in the camp: "the prince of the fathers' house of the Gershonites" (of vs. 30: 35); 32: "Eleazar...shall be prince of the princes of the Levites, and have the oversight of them that keep the charge of the sanctuary"; Nu 4:34: "the prince of the congregation." They were to be identical with the "rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens" (cf. Ex 18:21; Nu 16:2). 7:2: "the princes of Israel, the heads of their fathers' houses, and the princes of the tribes" (cf. 17:26; 34:18; Josh 22:1); 1 Ch 4:38). (c) Equivalent to chief or king: Gen 17:20: "Twelve princes shall he beget" (cf. 25:16); Gen 34:2: "Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, the prince of the land"; Nu 25:15: "Coffin the daughter of the prince of Midian" (cf. Josh 13:21); 1 K 11:34: "I will make him prince all the days of his life." This was said of Solomon, which shows the term equivalent to king. Of special interest in this use of word nāḇē is Ezek. The name is given to the Jewish king (cf. 12:10: "This burden concerneth the prince in Judah"). Then, again, it is applied to the future theocratic king (cf. 34:24; 37:25, etc., and esp. chs. 45, 46). It is also used of foreign potentates and high officers (cf. 25:16: "the princes of the sea"); 28:2: "the prince of Tyre"; 30:13: "a prince from the land of Egypt"); 32:29: "Edom, her kings and all her princes"; and, likewise, of high Jewish officers (51:12). (d) A title bestowed upon Sheshbazzar (Est 1:8).

(3) bātā; nāḇiḥiḥ: 1 S 2:8: "To make them sit with princes" (cf. Ps 113:8). The original meaning of the term is the ruling or obliging; then generous ("liberal"); cf. Prov 19:6: "Many will entreat the favor of the liberal man;" yet, it might safely be rendered here "prince" (mid) or noble-minded; a gentleman, a nobleman, a person of rank, a prince. JOB 12:11: "He poureth contempt upon princes" (cf. Ps 107:40); Job 21:28: "Where is the house of the prince in whose hand is the power of life and death?" The context here suggests the thought of a wicked prince, a tyrant. Ps 47:9: "The princes of the peoples are gathered together" (cf. Ps 115:9; 146:3; Prov 17:7; 25:7; Cant 7:1).

(4) bātā; nāḇāḥiḥ: According to Gesenius, this term properly means either a high-born person (cf. the preceding word, nāḇiḥiḥ) or a speaker, a spokesman; then, a prince, a king. 1 S 13:14: "Jeh hath appointed him to be prince over his people" (cf. 2 S 5:2: "Thou shalt be prince [RVm 'leader'] over Israel"); 6:21; 7:8; 1 K 1:35; 14:7; 16:2; Job 29:9; 31:37; Ps 76:12; Prov 28:16; Ezek 23:2: "Prince of Tyre"; Dn 9:25: "the anointed one, the prince," AV the "Messiah the Prince." Dn 9:26: "the prince that shall come" (the Roman emperor?); 11:16: "the prince of the covenant" (either a high priest or some Egyptian king, Ptolemaeus Philometor?).

(5), (6) bātā; rāḏōn, and bātā; rōḇān, "a high official," "a prince," usually associated with the word "king" or "judge." Prov 14:28: "In the multitude of people is the king's glory; but in the want of people is the destruction of the prince" (rāḏōn); Jgs 5:3: "Hear, O ye kings; give ear, O ye princes (rōḇān); Prov 8:15: "By me kings reign, and princes (rōḇān) decrees judge justly." (cf. 31:4; Hab 1:10); Isa 40:20: "That bringeth persons down to nothing; that maketh the judges of the earth as vanity." (7) tāqā; nāḇāk, derived from tāqā; nāḇāh, "to install a king" (cf. Ps 2:6): hence a prince: Josh 13:21: "the princes of Sihon" (cf. Ps 83:11); Ezek 32:30: "the princes of the north"; Mic 5:5: RV "princely men." RVm "princes among men." Dn 11:8: RV "molten images." RVm "princes."
fiance to God. While Paul clearly recognized a hierarchy of such powers (Col 1 16, “thrones or dominions or principalities or powers”), it is not certain that he had elaborated a system of αἰώνια to specify the rules of the world in terms of Gnostic ethics, such as appears among the Gnostics, although they evidently believed they were developing their thought. In 1 Cor 2 6 he repudiates the wisdom of this world (aἰόνια) and of the rulers of this world (aῖνοι), and declares (Eph 6 12) that the Christian has to contend with “the world-rulers of this darkness,” and proclaims the triumph of Christ over “the principalities and the powers” in the forgiveness of sins (Col 2 15). The same personification of such agencies or powers appears also in another passage, where the rendering of RV obscures it (Eph 1 20–21: “when he raised him [Christ] from the dead, and made him to sit at his right hand in the heavenly places, far above all [read ‘every’] rule [RV ‘principle’], AV, and authority, and power, and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world [aἰόνια], but also in that which is to come”). Not the least interesting passage is Eph 3 10, where the church is said to be the means of “rendering” of the “principalities and the powers in the heavenly places.”

The word πρίντιπάς is clearly related to the elementary knowledge of Christian truth or doctrine. See Elements; Rudiments.

PRINT, print, PRINTING, prin’ting, PRINTED, prin’ted: Printing is the art of multiplying records—the “art of writing with many pens” (Jew Enc, XI, 205), or wholesale writing.

The art of making original records is a writing, this, however, is a slow process. It involves tracing letters and parts of a letter through from beginning to end by the moving point of chisel, pen, or other instrument, and this process must be repeated with every copy. As soon, therefore, as occasion arose for frequently repeating the record, man was led by the labor of forming each symbol separately. All these ways involve making a character or a series of characters on a single surface and transferring as a whole to another surface. Neither “pressure,” as some say, nor “ink,” as others, is essential to the process, for printing from a photographic negative takes no pressure, and printing for the blind takes no ink. Any process which transfers a whole surface is printing.

The earliest use of printing seems to have been for painting the face or body with ownership, tribal, trophy, or ceremonial marks for worship, war, mourning, etc. This paint might be temporary or pricked in by the tattoo process. Tattooing itself is rather a writing than a printing process, but may be thought of as the color is laid on by drawing or by the “pintader.” The “pintaderas” or “stamp used to impress patterns upon the skin” is best known from the Mexican and South American examples, but in recent years it has been found in deposits all over the Neolithic to the Iron Age (in Italy, Austria, Hungary, Mycenae, Crete, Egypt) and in Borneo at least. Many of these specimens are from the Neolithic or Copper age. Both in South America and in Neolithic Liguria, some of these stamps were cylindrical and “were used like a printer’s roller” (Moseo, The Dawn of Mediterranean Civilization, 254–61, with many illustrations, and Frobenius, Childhood of Man, fig. 31, “Dayak block for painting the body”).

The injurious practice of rev. 19 28, which is termed “print,” is commonly, and probably rightly, in view of the Heb word, supposed to refer to the permanent marks of tattooing which may or may not have been made by this printing process. Job 13 27 AV, w. speaks of printing upon the heads or soles of the feet, has been quite widely in RV, and, if the idea is one of printing at all, it refers rather to branding than stamning with color.

The use of the inkbhorn in setting the mark upon the forehead of the beast in Rev 14 1 and on the forehead of the beast in Rev 16 19 and 20, more likely refer to branding, as the Gr word pointēma and the Heb words may be connected. The stigmata of Gal 6 17 may also point to branding. Branding was at all events also a common method of printing characters on the flesh in Bib. times (Iss 3 24; perhaps Ex 21 26; a branding on the forehead, CH § 12; a branding of a slave §§ 226, 227). The reference in Jn 20 25 is, of course, to the clearly visible marks or scars left by the nails in the hands. See Mark.

The use of seals is a true printing process, whether they are used with color, as they were both in Crete and Egypt almost from the beginning of history, or impressed on clay, wax, or other plastic substances. Mention of seals is frequent in the Bible (see Seal). A new interest has been given to this aspect of the matter by the sealings discovered in Ahab’s palace and other excavations throughout Pal, which are forming one of the most useful classes of modern discoveries.

Both stamp and seal were used throughout the Middle Ages, the latter abundantly, and the stamp at least occasionally, for stamping the capital letters in Bib. and other MSS, as well as for various other purposes.

Modern printing begins with the carving of whole pages and books on blocks of wood (xylography), or metal plates for printing (chalcography). This method was quite early practised by the Chinese, and began to be common in Europe in the early 15th cent., most of the books printed by it having to do with Bib. topics (Biblia pauperum, etc.).

It was only with the invention of movable type about the middle of the 15th cent. that the multiplying of books by writing began to come to an end. The printing with movable type is also closely associated with Bib. study, the Gutenberg Psalter and the Gutenberg Bible standing with most for the very beginning of modern printing.

For the printed edd. of the Heb and Gr originals, and the various VSS, see arts. on Textual Criticism and allied topics in this encyclopedia, with their literature. The art. on “Typography” in Jew Enc is of unusual excellence, and the general literature of printing given in Enc Brit., at the end of the first part of the art. on “Typography,” is full and good. PRISCA, pris’ka, PRISCILLA, pris’il’a. See Aquila.
PRISON, pris’in, PRISONER, pris’n-er (there are various Heb words which are rendered “prison” in AV, among them: 1. Hebrew Words [1] רֶפֶאָה, qōbar, “round house,” fortress [8 t in Gen], [2] סַבָּה, kōlē, “restraint,” “confine ment” [12 t: in historic books, Isa, Jer, with “house”], [3] מַטָּרָדָה, matṭārādā, “guard,” “sentry” [13 t in Jer and Neh], [4] סַפִּיקָה, safīqā, “distorting,” i.e. stocks or pillory [4 t], [5] אַסְרָה, ‘eser, “bond,” “fetters” [Ecc 4 14; Jer 37 15]; “ward” in AV is usually the rendering for סַבָּה, mishmār]: The earliest occurrence of the word “prison” in AV is found in the narrative of Joseph’s life in Egypt (J). The term used, viz. qōbar, means perhaps “round house” or “tower.” It seems probable that among the Hebrews there were no special buildings erected as “jails” in the pre-monarchical period, and perhaps not before the post-exilic period, when the adoption of the civic institutions and customs of surrounding nations prevailed. In Egypt and Assyria, on the contrary, there were great public buildings corresponding to our modern jails. Among the Hebrews, rooms in connection with the royal palace or the residence of prominent court officials would be used for the purpose.

According to one narrative (J) in Gen the prison in which Joseph was confined had a “keeper,” while according to another narrative (E) Joseph the offending members of the royal household, viz. the royal butler and the royal baker, were placed “in ward” with the “captain of the guards” in charge, i.e. in some part of the royal palace. This is still more probable if, instead of “captain of the guard,” we should translate “chief of the cooks,” i.e. superintendent of the royal kitchen.

It was often necessary to restrict the liberty of individuals for whom various causes were a menace to those in authority, without inflicting any corporal punishment, e.g. Joseph’s brethren were kept “in ward” three days (Gen 42 23). Shimei was forbidden to pass beyond the boundary of Jerusalem (1 K 2 36); the person who caught sitting on the Sabbath was put in “ward” pending his trial (Nu 15 34). In the monarchical period, prisoners were kept in pillories or were placed in prison, e.g. Micaiah by Ahab (1 K 22 27), Hanani by Asa (2 Ch 16 10). Hosea, after his abortive effort to institute an alliance with So or Seve, king of Egypt, was shut up in prison by Shalmaneser (2 K 17 4); cf also 2 K 25 27 (Jehoiachin in Babylon); Jer 52 11 (Zedekiah in Babylon).

The Book of Jer throws considerable light on the prison system of Judah in the later monarchical period. The prophet was put “in prison” three times.

5. Under the house that were in the upper gate of Benjamin, which was in the house of the Monarchy of Jeh (20 2). Mere imprisonment was not adequate punishment for the prophet’s announcement of Judah’s doom; it was necessary to have recourse to the pillory. During the siege of Judah Jeremiah was confined in the “court of the guard, which was in the king of Judah’s house” (32 2, etc). The “court of the guard” was evidently the quarters of the sentry who guarded the royal palace. According to the narrative (Jer 37), the prophet was arrested on a charge of treachery and put in prison “in the house of Jonathan the scribe” (37 15). This verse does not necessarily mean that a private house was used as a prison. The words are capable of another interpretation, viz. that a building known as the “house of Jonathan the scribe” had been taken over by the authorities and converted into a jail. We read in the following verse that the house had a “dungeon” (lit. “house of the pit”) and “cabins” or “cells.”

The data are not sufficient to enable us to give any detailed description of the treatment of prisoners. This treatment varied according to the character of the offence. Treatment which led to incarceration. Samson of Prisoners during the period of his imprisonment was compelled to work at the stonework (Jgs 16 21). Grinding was the occupation of women, and marked the depth of Samson’s humiliation. Dangerous persons were subjected to various kinds of physical mutilation, e.g. Samson was deprived of his sight. His case is an old practice in Assyria (2 K 25 7). The thumbs and great toes of Adonibezek were cut off to render him incapable of further resistance (Jgs 1 6).

Various forms of torture were in vogue. Hanani the seer was put into the pillory by Asa (for “in a prison house” we should render “in the stocks,” see RV). In Jer 29 26 for “prison,” we should render “stocks” (so RV) or “pillory,” and for “stocks,” “collar” (as in RV). AV renders a different Heb word by “stocks” in Job (13 27; 33 11). There was a special pillory (1 K 22 27), as well as a prison garb (2 K 25 29).

There are other Heb words rendered “prison” (sometimes incorrectly) in AV. In Pe 11 27, the word which is tr. “prison” means “precarious existence,” and is derived from a root which denotes, for instance, the isolation of the leper (Lev 13 5; cf Isa 34 22; 49 7). In Isa 58 8 “oppression” as “prison” is the correct tr., while in Isa 61 1 it denotes “opening of the eyes,” rather than “opening of the prison.”

Prisoners are promised “light after darkness, gloom after gleam.”

6. The Hebrew Words 7. Other Hebrew Words

8. In the NT “prison” generally occurs for the Gr ψυλλακτής, phulakē, which corresponds to the Heb word רֶפֶאָה, mishmār, referred to above (Mt 5 25; Mk 6 17; Lk 3 20; NT Acts 5 19; 1 Pet 3 19). In Rev 18 2, AV renders this word by two different words, viz. “hold” and “cage”; RV employs “hold” in each case. RV renders “ward” as the rendering in AV (Acts 12 10). In connection with the imprisonment of John the term is used by ἐν αἰεν ἐν καταβολαῖς, “place of bonds” or “fetters” (Mt 11 2); the same word is used in the LP of Peter and John in prison, Lk 22 5, and of Paul and Silas (Acts 16 26). But the more common term is also found in these narratives. In Acts 12 17 “prison” renders a Gr word which means “dwelling.” In Acts 5 18 AV, “prison” is the rendering for another Gr word, viz. φυλακή, τίτυλος, “watching” or “ward” (RV “ward”). In Acts 4 3, AV employs “hold” as the rendering for the same word. This would correspond to the modern “police station” or “lockup.” See also Punishments.

PRISON GARMENTS. See preceding article.

PRISON, SPIRITS IN: The phrase occurs in the much-disputed passage 1 Pet 3 18–20, where the apostle, exhorting Christians to endure suffering for well-doing, says: “Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but made alive in the spirit; in whom also he was set forth unto the spirits in prison, that aforetime were disobedient, when the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, whereas, in few, that is, eight souls, were saved through PRIVY, priv'•i, PRIVILY, priv'-li: These words are obsolete in modern Eng. and are replaced by “secret,” “secrecy,” rather than by the cognates “private,” “privately.” RV usually has not altered AV’s use of the word, but in Ps 11 2 has substituted “in darkness” and in Jgs 9 31 uses “craftily,” in “in Tormah” (see TORMAHI). In Ezek 21 14, AV “entereth into their privy chambers,” “privy” is a gloss, omitted in RV, “to enter.” In 2 Tim 1 13 (“the charge is”) AV 5 2 is simply “to know it; in 8 4, RV has changed the phrase into “be initiated into.”

PRIZE, priz••: Two Gr words are so rendered in EV: (1) ἵππαρσος, brabelon, the award to the victor in the Gr games, consisting of a garland of bay, olive, or pine; so called because it was given by the ἰππαρθείς, braboulos, the adjudicator who assigned the prize at the games (Vulg bruatum, from Lati bruma mus, a gift). The termination -os, -as, would lead us to expect the active sense: “an act of grasping,” “plundering” (AV “robbery”), which would imply that Christ did not deem it an act of usurpation to claim equality with God, for such equality was His inherent right. But the context demands a reference “not to the right which He claimed, but to the dignity which He renounced” (Lightfoot); hence the majority of modern expositors take the word in a passive sense (= ἵππαρσος, brablemos): “a thing to be seized, prized, retained at all costs as a booty” (ERV “a prize,” ARV “a thing to be grasped”), implying that Christ did not regard equality with God as a thing to be clutched greedily, but waived His rights (see Lightfoot on Phil 2 6). The vb. “to prize” occurs only in Zeus 13.11; See Greek Word Index of CHRIST; KENOSIS. D. Miall Edwards

PROBATION, pro•bă•shun, SECOND, sek•ə•n. See EScATology of the NT.

PROCHORUS, pro•kör•us (Πρόχορος, Próchoros): One of “the seven” chosen by the Christian community in Jerusalem to superintend the dispensing of charity to the widows and other poor (Acts 6 5). The name has Gr, and History has “a Hellenist.” According to tradition he became bishop of Neo-media and died a martyr at Antioch.

PROCOUNSUL, pro•kōn•sul (ἀντιθεότατος, aná Asphaltos [Acts 13 7; 18 12]; AV deputy). See Province.

PROCURATOR, pro•kür•a•t•ər (ὑπηρέτης, epι• tropos): This word signifies in a general sense a steward or bailiff of a private estate, or a financial agent with special function. The coinage of the special usage of the word to denote an imperial functionary or official is characteristic of the origin of many departments of administration under the Roman Empire which sprang from the emperor’s household. At the time of Augustus, when the domestic quality of these offices had not been entirely lost, the procurators were mostly imperial freedmen. But after the systematic organization of the administration in the 2d cent., the title of procurator was reserved for functionaries of the equestrian class. In fact, the term is so intimately connected with the sphere of official activity of the Rom knights that the expressions “procuratorial career” and “equestrian career” are used synonymously (cf Hirschfeld, Die kaiserlichen Verwaltungs- beamten bis auf Diokletian, 410-65).

During the last century of the Republic, the class of knights (equestes) embraced in general all citizens of wealth who were not magistrates or members of the senate. The Roman Law (67 BC) established 400,000 sesterces (about $18,000 or £5,300) as the minimum census rating for membership in this class. The gold ring, tunic with narrow purple border, and privilege of sitting in the first 14 rows at the theater were the tokens of knighthood. Augustus added to these the public horse which was conferred henceforth by the emperor and recalled the original military significance of the order. From the time of Augustus the first three decuriae of jurors (judicis), each containing 1,000 persons, were filled with knights.
Under the Republic the influence of the equestrian class was chiefly exerted in the financial transactions of the companies which farmed the variable revenues. The importance of the publicani was greatly reduced under the Empire, but the emperors were anxious to lose the loss of opportunity by infringing them with a great variety of administrative functions. Military service as prefect or tribune was the preliminary step in the official equestrian career. The highest positions held by members of the equestrian class were called prefectures, and the guard of the prefect, of the guard, of Egypt, of the grain-supply, of the watchmen in Rome, and of the fleet. But between these extremes the title procurator was applied generally to the functionaries whose positions were of imperial origin.

The administration of the fiscus or imperial treasury at Rome and of the finances in the imperial provinces, as well as the collection of fiscal revenues in the senatorial provinces, was in the hands of procurators. They occupied many positions which, on account of their intimate relationship with the person of the monarch, could be safely intrusted only to those whose limited prestige precluded influence (Friedländer, "Staatsgeschichte der Rom", 7th ed., Part I, 132-43). Finally, several provinces, where the conditions were unfavorable to the introduction of the ordinary administrative system and Rom public law, were governed as imperial domains by officials of the equestrian class as the emperor's representatives. In Egypt the title prefect (præfectus) was employed permanently as the appellation of the viceregal, and while the same term may have been used originally to denote the governors of this class generally, when their military or civil functions, yet the designation procurator became at an early date the term of common usage to designate them (Hirschfeld, 382).

Mauretania, Rhætia, Noricum, Thrace, Cappadocia, Judaea and some smaller districts were all, for a time at least, governed by procurators (Tacitus Hist. 1.11; Dio Cassius lvi.17).

The question concerning the original title of the Roman governors of Judaea has arisen because the N T uses the noun ἡγεμόν (Mt. 27.2; 11.14-15; 21.27; 25.14; Lk 3.1; 20.20; Acts 23.24; 24.1; 26.30), which corresponds with the Lat term praeses, which might be considered synonymous with either procurator or præfectus (Hirschfeld, 354). The phrase "an inscriptional reference to establish the nomenclature of the rulers of Pal before the time of Vespasian, and Hirschfeld is of the opinion that a certain passage in Tacitus (Anna. xiv.44) where Pilate is called procurator is not sufficient proof in view of this writer's carelessness in details of this sort. Josephus (Ant. XX, i, 2), however, employs epítropos (procurator) for the time of Claudius, and it is convenient to follow common usage and assume that this title was current from the first.

It was evidently the intention of Augustus that membership in the equestrian class should be a necessary qualification for the procurators who were appointed to govern provinces. But Claudius appointed a freedman, Antonius Felix, brother of the famous minister of finance, Pallas, as procurator of Judaea (Suetonius Claud. xxvii; Tacitus Hist. v.9). This remained, however, an isolated instance in the annals of Pal (Hirschfeld, 380), and it, however, moreover, that Felix was raised to equestrian rank before the governorship was conferred upon him.

The following list of the procurators of Judaea is based on Marquardt ('Römische Staatsverwaltung', I, 409, 412) and Schürer ('Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes', I, 455-485):

PROLONG, prô-long' (תָּנָך, 'arakh, הָאמֶר, māšakāh): “Prolong, prolonged” are the tr. of ‘arakh, “to stretch long,” and frequently, “prolong days”; 4 40, etc; Job 6 11 AV; Prov 28 16; Ecc 7 15; 8 13; Isa 53 10; of māšakāh, “to draw out” (Isa 13 22; Ezek 12 25; AVr “to stretch out”), of yādēph, “to add,” “to increase” (Ps 61 6; Prov 10 27); of nābhāh, “to stretch out,” etc. (Job 30 29); neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth. ARV “neither shall their possessions be extended on the earth,” in “their produce bend to the earth”; ERV reverses text and margin; of 'arabhāh (Aram.) (Dnl 7 12). Yet their lives were prolonged.” AV “A prolonging in life was given them.” “Prolong” occurs in Exdcs 29 5, “prolong the time” (parakūthēs); 38 14, “prolong life,” RV “maintenance of life” (embōlān); 30 22, “prolongeth his days,” RV “length of days” (mākōrōμερεια). 37 31, RV “shall prolong” (prosāthē). PROMISE, prom’is (most frequently in the OT דַּבָּר, dābbar, “speaking,” “speech,” and בַּדָּר, dābbar, “to speak,” also דָּבָר, dāmar, “to say,” once in Ps 77 8, “țemer,” “speech”; in the NT ἐγγίζω, ἐπιγίζω, and the RVs, ἐγγίζων, ἐπιγίζων, and compounds): Promise holds an important place in the Scriptures and in the development of the religion that culminated in Christ. The Bible is indeed full of “precious and exceeding great promises” (2 Pet 1 4), although the word “promise” is not always used in connection with it (see below). Of the more outstanding promises of the OT may be mentioned: (1) the proto-evangelium (Gen 3 15); (2) the promise to Noah no more to curse the ground, etc (Gen 8 21; 9 1–17); (3) most influential, the promise to Abraham to make of him a great nation in whom all families of the earth should be blessed, to give to him and his seed the land of Canaan (Gen 12 2, etc), often referred to in the OT (Ex 12 25; Dt 1 8 11; 6 8; 9 28, etc); (4) the promise to David to make his house like the throne (2 S 7 12 13 28; 1 K 2 24, etc); (5) the promise of restoration of Israel, of the Messiah, of the new and everlasting kingdom, of the new covenant and outpouring of the Spirit (Isa 2 2 5; 4 2; 5 6 5; 66 13; Jer 31 3; 67 22; 23 5 6; 31 11f; 39 25f, etc). In the NT these promises are founded on, and regarded as having their true fulfillment in Christ, and those who are His (2 Cor 1 20; Eph 3 6). The promise of the Spirit is spoken of by Jesus as “the promise of my Father” (Lk 24 49; Acts 1 4), and this was regarded as fulfilled at Pentecost. The promise of a Saviour of the seed of David is regarded as fulfilled in Christ (Acts 13 23. 32, 26 6; Rom 1 2; 4 3; 10 9; 15 4). Paul argues that the promise to Abraham that he should be "heir of the world" to whom he has committed, is not confined to Israel, but is open to all who are children of Abraham by faith (Rom 4 13; cf Gal 3 16; 10 29). In like manner the writer to the Hebrews goes back to the original promises, giving them a spiritual and eternal significance (1 Jn 6 17; 11 9, etc). The NT promises include manifold blessings and hopes, among them "life," "eternal life" (1 Tim 4 8; 6 19; 2 Tim 1 1; Jas 1 12), the "kingdom" (Jas 3 5), Christ's "coming" (2 Pet 3 9, etc), "new heavens and a new earth" (2 Pet 3 13, etc). "Pronounced" and "promised" in AV, RV has frequently other terms, as "word" (Ps 105 42); "spoken," "spoken" (Dt 10 9; Jos 9 21; 22 4; 23 5 15, etc), "consented" (Lk 22 6, etc). References to the promises occur repeatedly in the Apocalypse (Bar 2 34; 2 Mace 2 18; Wisd 12 21; cf 2 Esd 3 15; 5 29). W. L. Walker

I. THE IDEA OF BIBLICAL PROPHECY.

The Seer and Seer of God. Prophecies are of two sorts: (1) In the OT and (2) in the NT. The Seer may be any man who is enabled by the power of prophecy to see the future. In the OT the Seer is usually a prophet, a man who has been called and furnished with a message from God. In the NT the Seer is usually a Christian who has the gift of prophecy. The Seer of God is a man who has been called and furnished with a message from God. The Seer of God is a man who has the gift of prophecy. The Seer of God is a man who has the gift of prophecy. The Seer of God is a man who has the gift of prophecy.
there must have been a voice which he could hear phonetically through his natural ear. The main thing is that he must have been able sharply to distinguish the contents of this voice from his own heart, i.e. from his personal consciousness. Only in this way is he capable of speaking to the people in the name of God and able to publish his word as that of Jeh. In this case he is the speaker of Jeh (nāḇīṯ'), or the mouth of the Lord (cf Ezek 7 1 with 4 16). Under these conditions he then regards it as absolute compulsion to speak, just as a person must be filled with fear when he hears a lion roaring nearby (Amos 3 5). The words burn in his soul until he utters them (Jer 20 7, 9).

The Divine power, which comes over a human being and compels him to see or to hear things which otherwise would be hidden from him, is called by various terms expression, inspiration, or phrenetical inspiration. It is said that the spirit of God has come over someone (Nu 24 2); or has fallen upon him (Ezek 1 5); or has laid hold of him (2 K 3 15; Ezek 1 3; 3 14, 22, and often); or that the Holy Spirit has been put on him as a garment, i.e. has been incorporated in him (1 Ch 12 18; 2 Ch 24 20); or that Ezekiel is the revealer of the Spirit, which has descended upon him (Nu 11 25 f; 2 K 2 15; Isa 11 2; 61 1); or that God has given this Spirit of His (Nu 11 29; Isa 42 1); or pours Him out upon man (Joel 2 28 f [Heb 3 1 f]). But this inspiration is not such that it assails the human consciousness of the recipient, so that he would receive the word of God in the state of sleep or trance. But rather the recipient is in possession of his full consciousness, and is able afterward to give a clear account of what happened. Nor is there any individuality or the prophet eliminated by this Divine inspiration; unconsciously this individuality cooperates in the formal shaping of that which has been seen and heard. In accordance with the natural peculiarity of the prophet and with the contents of the message, the psychological condition of the recipient may be that of intense excitement or of calmness. As a rule the inspiration that takes possession of the prophet is evidenced also by an exalted and poetical language in which he speaks, who afterwards assimilates the character, but is not bound to a narrow and mechanical meter. It is, however, also possible that prophetical utterances find their expression in plain prose. The individual peculiarity of the prophet is also in this respect of which revelation comes to him. In the one prophet he finds a preponderance of visions; another prophet has no visions. But the visions of the future which he sees are given in the forms and the color which have been furnished by his own consciousness. All the more the form in which the prophet gives expression to his word of God is determined by his personal talents and gifts as also by his experiences.

In a certain respect the dream can be cited as an analogous phenomenon, in which also the ideas that are slumbering in the soul uninvited put in their appearance without being controlled by consciousness and reason.

3. The Dream

On the other hand, prophecy differs specifically from dreams, first, because the genuine prophetic utterance is received when the prophet is clearly conscious, and, secondly, because such an utterance brings with it a much greater degree of certainty and a greater guaranty of its higher origin than the truth of a dream. Second, the spirit is present in the prophet as a prophetic vision, which is the nearest approach to a prophetic dream. In Jer 23 25ff it is declared that these two are entirely dissimilar, and the relation between the two is compared to straw and wheat. The Moslem Arabs also put a much lower estimate on the visionary dream than on the prophetic vision in a waking condition.

Because this Spirit of God acts with full freedom, He can select His organs at will from among every station, age or sex. The Spirit is not confined to any priestly class or organi-

4. Freedom

In the case of spiration times that a prophet gathered disciples around himself, who could themselves in turn also be seized by his spirit, although the transmission of this spirit was a difficult matter. Yet we must suppose that at times this spiration continued to be at all times a free gift of the sovereign God. Amos (7 14 f) appeals expressly to this fact, that he did not himself choose the prophet's calling nor was the pupil of a prophetic school, but that he had been directly called by Jeh from his daily occupation as a shepherd and workman. In the same way we indeed find prophets who belonged to the priestly order (Jeremiah, Ezekiel and others), but equally great is the number of those who certainly did not belong. Further, age made no difference in the call to the prophetic office. Even in his earliest youth Samuel was called to be a prophet (1 Samuel 3 1 f), and it did not avail Jeremiah anything when he excused himself because of his youth. Yet he was simultaneously seized by this Spirit. From time to time prophetesses appeared, although the female sex is by no means so prominent here as it is in the sorcery of the heathen. See Prophecy. As an exceptional case the Holy Spirit has been impressed on even a person who inwardly was entirely estranged from Him and could make an utterance through him (cf Saul, 1 Samuel 10 11; 19 24; Balaam, Nu 22 28; Canophus, Jn 11 51). As a rule, however, God has selected such persons or prophets, and they are called and dedicated for this purpose by Him through a special act (cf Moses Ex 3 1 f; 1 K 19 16, 19ff; Isa 6; Jer 1; Ezek 1). This moment was decisive for their whole lives and consstituted their authorization as far as they themselves and others were concerned. Yet for each prophetic appearance these men receive a special enlightenment. The prophet does not at all times speak in an inspired state; cf Nathan (2 Sam 7 3 ff), who afterwards was not prophetically called to take back to David the words which he had spoken on his own authority. Characteristic data on the mental state of the prophets in the reception and in the declaration of the Divine word are found in Jer 15 16 f; 20 7ff. Originally Jeremiah finds in whom it is the Holy Spirit who spoke to him (cf Ezek 3 3), but then he loses all pleasure in and would have preferred not to have uttered this word, but he could not do as he desired.

The attempt has often been made to explain prophecy as a natural product of purely human factors. Rationalistic theologians regarded the prophets as enthusiastic teachers of religion and morals, as warm patriots and politicians, to whom they ascribed nothing but a certain ability of guessing the future. But this was no explanation of the facts in the case. The prophets were themselves conscious of this, that they were not the intellectual authors of their higher knowledge. This consciousness is justified by the fact that they were in a condition to make known things which lay beyond their natural horizon and which were contrary to all probability. Those cases are particularly instructive in this respect which beyond a doubt were recorded by the prophets themselves. Ezekiel could indeed, on the basis of mere natural and religious reflections, arrive at the conviction that Zedekiah of Judah would not escape his punishment for his political treachery and for his disobedience to the word of Jeh; but he could never from this source have reached the certainty that this king, as the prophet describes the case in 12 8 ff, was to be taken captive while trying to escape from the besieged city and was then to be blinded and taken to Babylon. Just as little could he in Babylon know the exact day when the siege of Jerus began (24 2). If this prophet had learned of these things in a natural way and had afterward clothed them in the form of prophecy, he would have been guilty of a deception, something unthinkable in the case of so conscientious a preacher of morality. But such cases are frequently met with. Jeremiah predicts to Hanannah that he would die during the year (28 16), but it is not only such matters of detail that presuppose extraordinary divine vision of the prophet. The whole way also in which Jeremiah predicts the destruction of Jerusalem as inevitable, in direct contrast to the hopes of the Jerusalemites and to the desires of his own heart, shows that he was speaking under Divine compulsion, which was more powerful than his own reflections and sympathies. On any other presupposition his conduct would have been reprehensible cowardice. The case of Isaiah is exactly the same. We read that when the word of God as a guarantee that the Syrians and the Ephraimites would not capture Jerus (7 4 ff), and when he promises Hezekiah that the Assyrians would not shoot an arrow into the city, but would retreat without having accomplished their purpose (22 15), these things were so much in contradiction to all the probabilities of the course events would take that he would have been a frivolous adventurer had he not received his information from higher sources. Does it not establish this doctrine, which established and upheld the influence of the prophets. Thus in the case of Amos it was his prediction of a great earthquake, which did occur two years later (1 1); in the case of Elijah, the prediction of the long drought (1 K 17 1); in the case of Elisha, the undertakings of the enemies (2 K 6 12), and in other cases. It is indeed true that the contents of the prophetic discourses are not all confined to the future. Everything that God has to announce to mankind, revelations concerning His will, admonitions, warnings. He is also to announce the mouth of the prophet. But His determinations with reference to the future as a rule are connected with prophetic utterances of the latter kind. The prophets are watchmen, guardians of the people, who foretell to the nation the dangers and the judgments approaching, which must put in their appearance if the Divine will is disregarded. The prophets interpret also for the people that which is happening and that which has occurred, e.g. the defeats which they have suffered at the hands of their enemies, or the grasshopper plague (Joel), or a famine. They lay bare the inner reason for external occurrences and explain such events in their connection with the providential government of God. This gives to prophecy a powerful inner unity, notwithstanding the great differences of times and surrounding circumstances. It is prophecy which the Hebr people must thank for their higher conception of history. This people know of a Highest Author of all things and of a power, who, with all things that transpire must serve. God's plan has for its purpose to bring about the complete supremacy of His will among the children of men.

In genuine prophecy, according to Bib. conceptions, the fulfillment constitutes an integral part. This is set up by Dt 18 21 f as a proof of the genuineness of a prophet utterance. The prophetic word "falls to the ground" (1 S 3 19) if it is not "raised up" ydp Sim, akîman, tiollû, for which we more rarely find סָּדֵּה, mílô, but regularly in the NT ἀνομοίωσας, πλεονεκρασθαι, "being fulfilled") by the course of events. It would remain an empty word if it did not attain to its full content through its realization. In fact, in the NT case it itself there dwells a Divine power, so that at the moment when he speaks the event takes place, even if it is not yet visible to man. This realization is also not infrequently represented symbolically by the prophet in confirmation of his prediction. Thus in a certain sense it is the prophet himself who through his word builds up and pulls down, plants and roots out (Jer 1 10; 25 15 ff). But the fulfillment can be judged by the contemporaries: in the sense of an extraordinary Divine realization the fulfillment refers to the near future and when special emphasis is laid on external events. In these cases the prediction of certain events assumes the significance of a "sign" (cf Jer 28 16; Isa 6 1 f; 37 30, and elsewhere). In other cases it is only later generations who can judge of the correctness of a prediction or of a threat. In this way in Zec 6 the fulfillment of a threat is declared, and in the NT often the fulfillment of a promise is after a long time pointed out. But it is only as a genuine prophecy must be fulfilled like an edict of fate. Such prophecy is not an inevitable decree of fate, but is a word of the living God to mankind, and therefore conditioned ethically, and God can, if repentance has followed, withholds a threat (Jer 18 2 f; case of Jonah), or the punishment can be mitigated (1 K 21 29). A prediction, too, Jeh can recall if the people prove unworthy (Jer 18 9 f). A favorable or an unfavorable prediction can also be postponed, as far as its realization is concerned, to later times. If it belongs to the ultimate counsels of God, as e.g. the final judgment and deliverance on the last day. This counsel also may be realized successively. In this case the prophet already collects into one picture what is realized gradually in a longer historical development. The prophet in general spoke to his hearts in such a way as could be understood by them and could be impressed on them. It is therefore not correct to demand a fulfillment pedantically exact in the form of the historical event of the prophecy. This is what the Divine thought contained in the prophecy be entirely and completely realized. But not frequently the finger of God can be seen in the entire literal fulfillment of certain prophecies. This is the case, e.g. the case when in the NT the appearance of the Son of Man, in whom all the rays of OT prophecy have found their common center.

II. Historical Development of the Prophetic Office.—It is a characteristic peculiarity of the religion of the OT that its very elementary beginnings are of a prophetical nature. The fathers, above all Abraham, but also Isaac and Jacob, are the recipients of visions and of Divine revelations. Eps. is this true of Abraham, who appeared to the foreigners, to whom he was neither kith nor kin, to be indeed a prophet (nâhîki) (Gen 20 7; cf Ps 105 15), although in his case the command to preach the word was yet absent. Above all, the creative founder of the Israelitish national religion, Moses, is a prophet in the eminent sense of the word. His influence among the people is owing neither to his official position, nor to any military prowess, but solely and alone from the one circumstance, that since his call at the burning bush God has spoken to him. This intercourse between God and Moses was ever of a particularly intimate character. While other men of God received certain individual messages only from time to time and through the mediation of dreams and visions, God spoke directly and "face to face” with Moses (Nu 12:6ff; Dt 34:10; cf Ex 33:11). Moses was the permanent organ through whom Jeh brought about the Egypt plagues and through whom He explained what these meant to His people. He also directed them. The voice of Moses too had to explain to them the Divine signs in the desert and communicate to them the commandments of God. The legislation of Moses shows that he was not only filled with the Spirit of God occasionally, but that he abode with God for longer periods of time and produced something that is a well-ordered whole. A production such as the Law is the result of a continuous association with God.

Since that time revelation through prophecy was probably never entirely wanting in Israel (Dt 18:15). But this fountain did not always flow with the same fulness or clearness. Yet Deborah enjoyed a high rank as a prophetess, and for a long time pronounced decisions of justice in the name of the Lord before she, through her prophetess, directed people to rise up against their oppressors. What is said in 1 S 3:1 concerning the times of Eli can be applied to this whole period, namely that the word and vision of the prophet had become rare in the land. All the mouths of the people were in the action of Samuel, while yet a boy received Divine revelations (1 S 3:1ff). He was by the whole people regarded as a “seer” whose prophecies were always fulfilled (3:19f). The passage 9:6ff shows that the people expected of the prophet that he should also as a clairvoyant come to the assistance of the people in the troubles of life. Such a professional clairvoyant, indeed, Samuel was not, as he was devoted entirely to the service of his God and of his people and obeyed the Divine Spirit, even in those cases when he was compelled to act contrary to his personal inclinations, as was the case when the kingdom was established in Israel (8:6ff).

Since the days of Samuel we hear of schools of prophets, or “sons of prophets.” These associations probably originated in this way.

4. Schools

that an experienced prophet attracted of Prophets to himself bands of youths, who sought to receive a measure of his spirit. These disciples, the prophets of families, lived in colonies along the master. Possibly Samuel was the first who founded such a school of prophets. For in or near the city of Ramah we first find nāzāyāh, or colonies of such disciples (1 S 19:18f; 20:1). Among these pupils is found a much greater extent than among the teachers a certain ecstatic feature. They arouse their feelings through music and induce a frantic condition which also affects others in the same way, in which state they “prophesy” and throw off their garments, fall to the ground. In later times too we find traces of such ecstatic phenomena. Thus e.g. in Zec 13:6; 1 K 20:37,38, the “wounds” on the breast or on the forehead recall the self-mutilation of the priests of Baal (1 K 18:21). The deeds of what the dervishes of our own day do, probably were phenomena quite similar to the action of the prophets of the surrounding tribes. But that prophecy in Israel was not, as is now not infrequently claimed, merely a less crude form of the heathen prophetism, is proved by the fact that Moses and Samuel, who even in their times represent something much higher. Also in the colonies of prophets there was assuredly not to be found merely an enthusiasm without the Spirit of God. Proof for this is Samuel, the spiritual father of this colony, as Elijah was for the later colonies of this kind. These places were rather the centers of a religious life, where communion with God was sought by prayer and meditation, and where the recollection of the great deeds of God in the reception of new revelations. From such centers of theocratic ideas and ideas without a doubt there came forth also corresponding influences that affected the people. Perhaps not only was sacred music cultivated at these places but also sacred traditions, which were handed down orally and in writing. Certain it is that at these colonies the religion of Jeh prevailed.

During the period of the kings prophetically inspired men frequently appeared, who demanded even of the kings that they should submit to their Divinely inspired the Kings word. Saul, who refused such submission, perished as the result of this conflict. David owed much to the support of the prophets Samuel, Nathan, Gad (1 S 14:1ff; 2 S 7; 2 Ch 29:25, and elsewhere). But David also bowed in submission when these prophets rebuked him because of his transgression of the Divine commands (2 S 12,24). His son Solomon was educated by the prophet Haggai, and this kingdom was predicted by the prophet Abijah, the Shilonite (1 K 11:29ff). Since Jeh, as the supreme Sovereign, has the right to enthrone or to dethrone kings, this is often done through the prophets (cf 1 K 14:1ff). After the division of the kingdom we find Shemaiah forbidding Rehoboam to begin a war with his brethren of Israel (1 K 12:21; cf 2 Ch 11:2f; of another mission of the same prophet, 2 Ch 12:5ff). On the reign of God that the prophetic word is soon turned against the untheocratic rule of Jeroboam (1 K 13,14). It is in this very same Northern Kingdom that the prophets unfolded their full activity and generally in opposition to the secular rulers, although there was no lack of accommodating “prophets,” who were willing to sanction everything that the king wanted. The opposition of the true prophets to these false representatives of prophecy is illustrated in the story of Micaiah, the son of Imlah (1 K 22).

But a still higher type of prophecy above the ordinary is found in Elijah, whose historic mission it was to fight to the finish the battle between the followers of Jeh and the worship of the Tyrian Baal. He was entirely unique in every respect, and his kingdom is a deed on a grand scale (of concerning Elijah and Elisha the art, Religion of Israel). His successor Elisha inherited from him not only his mantle, but also a double measure of his spiritual gifts. He exhibits the prophetic office more from its loving side. He is accustomed to visit the schools of prophets found scattered throughout the land, calls the faithful together around himself on the Sabbaths and the new moons (2 K 4,33), and in this way establishes centers of a more spiritual culture than was common elsewhere among the people. We read that first-fruit was brought to him as to the priests (2 K 4:42). But while the activity of Elijah was entirely in antagonism to the ruling house in the kingdom, this feature is not entirely lacking in the work of Elisha also. He has even been charged with wicked conspiracies against the dynasty of Omri and the king of Syria (2 K 8,9). His conduct in connection with these events can be excused only on the ground that he was really acting in the name of a prophet. And the destruction was possible for Elisha, after the radical change in public sentiment that had followed upon the work of Elijah, in later time to assume a more friendly attitude toward the government and the people. He often assisted the king in his various contests with the Syrians (cf 6:5ff; 13:14ff). His deeds are generally of a benevolent character. In connection with these he exhibits to a remarkable degree the gift of prophetic foresight (2 K 4 16; 5 26; 6 8 ff.; 7 1 f.; 13 19). Jonah, too, the son of Amittai, had at that time a favorable message for the Northern Kingdom (2 K 14 25).

However, the flourishing condition of the kingdom under Jehosaphat 11 had an unfavorable influence on its spiritual development.

6. Amos. Soon Amos and Hosea were compelled to announce to this kingdom its impending destruction through a great world-power. These two prophets have left us books in which their prophecies and utterances into written form had already been introduced before this. At any rate, many scholars are of the conviction that the prophecies of Obadiah and Joel belong to an earlier period, although others place them in the post-exilic period. In any case, the expectation of a day of settlement by Jeh with His people was already in the days of Amos common and current (5 18 ff.). As the writing of individual prophecies (Isa 8 1; 50 5; Hab 2 2f) had for its purpose this intensification of these words in the permanent authentic form and later to convince the reader of their wonderful fulfillment, thus too the writing down of larger collections of prophecies had for its purpose to intensify the power of the prophetic word and to secure this as a permanent possession of the people (Jer 30 2; 35 1 f.). Pupils of the prophets assisted them in this writing and in preserving their books (cf Jer 36 4; Isa 8 16).

It is to this custom that we owe our knowledge of the very early versions of the prophecies of many of the prophets of a later period. In addition to the larger books of Isa, Jer, Ezk, we have a number of smaller prophetic books, which have been united into the Book of the Twelve Prophets. These utterances as a rule exhibited an elevated form of language and are more or less poetical. However, in modern times some scholars are inclined to go too far in claiming that these addresses are given in a carefully systematized metrical form. Hebrew meter as such is a freer form of expression than is Arabic or Sanskrit meter, and this is all the more the case with the discourses of the prophets, which were not intended for musical rendering, and which are expressed in a rhythmical yet connotative rhetoric, which appears now in one and then in another form of melody, and often changes into prose.

In the kingdom of Judah the status of the prophets was somewhat more favorable than it was in Ephraim. They were indeed forced to contend against the injustice on the part of the ruling classes and against immorality of all kinds. But in this kingdom there were at any rate from time to time found kings who walked more in the footsteps of David. Thus Asa followed the directions of the prophet Azariah (2 Ch 15 1 ff.). It is true that the prophet Hanami censured this king, but it was done for a different reason. Jehoshaphat also regularly consulted the prophets. Among those who had dealings with him Elisha is also mentioned (2 K 3 14), as also some other prophets (cf 2 Ch 19 2; 20 14-37). The greatest among the prophets during the period of the Assyrian invasions was Isaiah, who performed the duties of his office for more than 40 years, and under the kings Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, and possibly too under Manasseh, through his word exercised a powerful influence upon the king and the nation. Although a preacher of judgments, he at critical times appeared also as a prophet of consolation. Nor did he despise external evidences of his prophetic office (cf 7 11; 38 22-8). His contemporary Micah is in full agreement with him, although he was not called to deal with the great of the land, with kings, or statesmen, as was the case with Isaiah. Nahum, Zephaniah and Habakkuk belong rather to the period of transition from the Assyrian to the Chaldaean periods. In the days of Josiah the prophets Isaiah had great influence in Jerusalem (2 K 22 14). Much more important under this king was the prophet Jeremiah, who was called by God for a great mission. This prophet during the siege and destruction of Jerusalem and after that time spoke as an unyielding yet deeply feeling exponent of the prophetic utterance on behalf of the nation, and again to dash to the ground the false hopes of the patriots, whenever these arose. Not so firm was his contemporary and fellow-sufferer Uriah (Jer 26 20).

In the time of the exile itself we find the activity of Ezekiel. It was significant that this prophet became the recipient of divine revelations while on Bab territory. His work was, in accordance with this condition, an unfolding of the prophecies of a prophet and a literary man. He seems also to have been a bodily sufferer. His abnormal conditions became symbolical signs of that which he had to proclaim. Deuter-Isaiah, too (Isa 40 ff), spoken during the Babylonian captivity, was prepared, and prepared for the return. The peculiar prophecies of Daniel are also accorded to a prophet living during the exile, who occupied a distinguished position at the court of the heathen rulers, and whose apocalyptic utterances are of a kind different from the discourses of the other prophets, as they deal more with the political condition of the world and the drama of history, in so far as this tends toward the establishment of the supremacy of Jeh. These prophecies were collected in later times and did not receive their final and present form until the Gr period at the beginning of the 2d cent. BC.

After the return from Babylonia the Jews were exorted by Haggai and Zechariah to rebuild their temple (about 520 BC). At that time there were still to be found prophets of the Exile who took a hostile attitude to the men of God. Thus Nehemiah (Neh 6 6-14) was opposed by hostile prophets as also by a prophet of Babulon. In contrast to these, Malachi is at all times in accord with the canonical prophecies, as he was an ardent advocate for the temple cultus of Jeh, not in the sense of a spiritless and senseless external worship, but as against the current indifference to Jeh. His style and his language, too, evidence a late age. The lyrical form has given way to the didactic. This is also probably the time when the present Book of Jonah was written, a didactic work treating of an older tradition.

Malachi is regarded by the Jews as the last really canonical prophet. While doubtless there was not a total lack of prophetically endowed seers and speakers of God also in the closing centuries of the pre-Christian era, nevertheless the general conviction prevailed that the Spirit of God was no longer present, e.g. in the times of the Maccabees (cf 1 Mac 4 46; 9 37; 14 41). It is true that certain modern critics ascribe some large sections of these Books to as late as MI, even to a period as late as the Gr. But this is refuted by the fact mentioned in Eccles (beginning of the 2d cent. BC) that in the writer's time the prophetical Canon appeared already as a closed collection. Dtn is not found in this collection, but the Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets in. It was during this period that apocalyptic literature began to flourish, many specimens of which are found among the Apoc and the Pseudepigrapha. These books consist of eschatological speculations, not the product of original inspiration, but emanating from the study of the prophetic writings, and name Pseudepigrapha shows that the author issued his work, not under his own name, but under the pseudonym of some man of God from older times, such as Enoch, Ezra, Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Baruch, and others. This fact alone proves the secondary character of this class of literature. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

Malachi finds a successor in John the Baptist, whose coming the former had predicted. John is the greatest of the prophets, because he could directly point to Him who in the NT completed the old covenant and fulfilled its promises. All that we know in addition concerning the times of Jesus shows that the prophetic gift was yet thought of as possibly dwelling in many, but that prophecy was no longer the chief spiritual guide of the people (cf e.g. Jos, Ant, XIII, xi, 2; XV, x, 5, among the Essenes, or in the case of Hyrcanus, op. cit., XIII, 20). But to this time we have not the prophetic gifts at times (cf Bj, III, viii, 9). He is thinking in this connection chiefly of the prediction of some details. Such "prophets" and "prophetesses" are reported also in the NT. In Jesus Christ Himself the prophetic office reached its highest stage of development, as He stood in a more intimate relation than any other being to His Heavenly Father and spoke His word entirely and at all times.

In the Christian congregation the office of prophecy is again found, differing from the proclamation of the gospel by the apostles, evangelists, and teachers. In the NT the terms ψάφη, ψάφης, ψάφητα, ψαφήτης, ψάφητα, ψαφήτων, ψαφήτων, signify speaking under the extraordinary influence of the Holy Ghost. Thus in Acts 11:27 ff (prophecy of a fanatic by Agabus); 21:10 if (prediction of the sufferings of Paul); 13:1 if (exhortation to mission work); 21:9 if (prophecies of the daughters of Philip). Paul himself also had this gift (Acts 16:5). He sees how all Israel is united under "David" the king of the last times, when between God and the people, between heaven and earth, an unbroken covenant of love shall be made (Hos 2:1ff); and also in Isaiah, who predicts that during the reign of the Messiah the country by the Gentiles a Son of David shall be born in a miraculous manner and attain supremacy (Isa 7:14; 9:2 ff; 11:1 ff), and who speaks constantly of that Divine establishment on Zion (of the quiet waters of Shiloah, 8:6), the foundation stone that has been laid by Jeh (28:16), etc.). Micah, his contemporary, does the same, and in an entirely similar manner predicts that the radical judgment of destruction which shall come over the temple and the royal palace shall be followed by the glorious King of Peace from Bethlehem (5:1ff). Possibly even a contemporary date Zec 9:9 described this future ruler in similar terms. In general it is not probable that Isaiah and Micah were the first to speak so personally of this King. They seem to presuppose that their contemporaries were acquainted with this idea.

In recent times scholars have pointed to the fact that in the old Orient, among the Egyptians, the Babylonians and elsewhere, the expectation of a miraculously born King of the future, who was to provide for his own people and to all nations salvation and peace, was entertained at an early period. Yet so much is certain, that Isaiah and Micah did not base their hopes on the vague dreams of the gentle world, but upon the prophetic establishment of a Divine sanctuary and kingdom of Zion. The personal figure of the Son of God is not so much in the foreground in the other prophets as in Isaiah, the author to whom the exilic situation is most closely related. These prophets mention only casually the Good Shepherd, as e.g. Jer 23 1 ff.; 33 12 ff.; Ezek 34 23 f. But after that time this Messianic expectation became a permanent element in the hopes of Israel. Yet the prophets have all emphasized that Israel and Judah must first be thoroughly purified by a judgment, before the land could, through God's grace, be glorified and richly blessed. The judgment which the preexilic prophets are continually predicting is, however, only a means to an end. This judgment is not the final word of the Lord, as Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah and Habakkuk constantly teach. They announce that return to Jehovah and obedience to His commandments is the way to salvation (Isa 1 18 ff.; 40 2 ff.). However, the prophets know that the people will not turn again to God, but that first the Jewish state must be entirely overthrown (Isa 6). It is particularly deserving of notice, that believing trust in Jehovah is regarded as the proper basis and condition of rescue and peace (Isa 7 9; 30 15; Hab 2 4). It is through this that the remnant of the faithful, the kernel of the people, is saved. Also in the case of Jeremiah, whose work it was to predict the immediate destruction of Judah, there is not about to be a kind of esoteric book of consolation. His battle cry for the future is "Jeh our righteousness" (23 6; 33 16). In his case we find a rich spiritualization of religion. The external customs, circumcision and the like, he declares, do no good, if the true state of the heart is lacking. Even the ark of the covenant is unnecessary and is discarded in the enlargement of the sanctuary. Ezekiel, who lays more stress on the external ordinances, nevertheless agrees with Jeremiah in this, that Jehovah together with the tears must fall on them after this destruction the prophet in his spirit builds the sanctuary again; notwithstanding the external character of his restoration, there is yet found in his picture a further development of its spiritual character. The ethical rights and the responsibility of the individual are strongly emphasized (ch 18, 33). The land becomes transformed; the Gentiles are received into the covenant of God.

Deutero-Isa (Isa 40-66), during the time of the Bab captivity, enriches prophecy in an extraordinary manner, through the figure of the true "Servant of Jehovah," who in a peaceful way, through his words of instruction and esp. through his innocent sufferings and his viceroy deeds, converts Israel, the Lord's people, to the Servant, and also wins over the gentile world to Jehovah. It was not possible that the picture of a suffering man of God, who through his death as a martyr attains to exaltation, should be suggested to the Jews by the altogether mythical figure of a death and resurrection of a Bab god (mammuz-Adish). Since the unjust persecutions of Joseph and David they were acquainted with the sufferings of the just, and Jeremiah's life as a prophet was a continuous martyrdom. But the writer of the second part of Isaiah had before his eyes a vision that far excelled all these types in purity and in greatness to such a degree as did David's Son in Isa and Mic surpass His great ancestor. He brings to a completion the kingdom of God through His sufferings which the earth (the exiles) must suffer before it attains to the glory of rulership. In this way He unites the offices of prophet, priest and king. After the exile prophecy continues its work. The Messianic expectations, too, are developed further in the sense by Haggai, and still more by Zechariah and Zechariah. The picture of Daniel picture the transformation of the world into a kingdom of God. The latter will mark the end of the history of the world. It comes from above; the earthly kingdoms are from below, and are pictured as beasts; the Ruler of the kingdom of God is a Son of man. The latter comes with the clouds of the heaven to take possession of His kingdom (Dan 7 13 f.). Then the judgment of the world will take place and indulge also each human being, who before this will bodily arise from the dead, in order to enter upon blessedness or condemnation. Here we find indicated a universal expansion of the kingdom of God extending over the whole world and all mankind.

If we survey the picture of the kingdom of God and its Divinely blessed Ruler, the Messiah, from a Christian standpoint, we find that a grand Divine unity connects its different elements. The form of this unity is in the first place evident in the character of the views and ideas of the time of utterance.

Prophesy. The prophets were compelled to speak so that their hearers could understand them. Only gradually these limitations and forms become spiritualized, e.g. the kingdom of God is still pictured by the prophets as established around the local center of Zion. Mt. Zion is in a concrete manner exalted, in order to give expression to its importance, etc. It is the NT fulfillment that for the first time gives adequate form to Divine revelation. At least in the person of Jesus Christ this perfection is given, although the full unfolding of this kingdom is yet a matter of the future.

A second characteristic feature of prophecy is the partial nature of the individual utterances and prophetic pictures. One picture must be supplemented by the others, in order not to be misunderstood.

Character of prophecy. The prophets were compelled to speak so that their hearers could understand them. Only gradually these limitations and forms become spiritualized, e.g. the kingdom of God is still pictured by the prophets as established around the local center of Zion. Mt. Zion is in a concrete manner exalted, in order to give expression to its importance, etc. It is the NT fulfillment that for the first time gives adequate form to Divine revelation. At least in the person of Jesus Christ this perfection is given, although the full unfolding of this kingdom is yet a matter of the future.

A third feature that deserves attention is the perspective character of prophecy. The prophet sees together and at once upon the surface of the pictures things which are to be fulfilled only successively and gradually. Thus, e.g. Deutero-Isa sees of Prophecy in the near future the return from captivity, and directly connected with this a miraculous glorification of the city of God. The return of Babylon is a different figure of a death and resurrection of a Bab god (mammuz-Adish). Since this prophetic picture is that of Joseph and David they were acquainted with the sufferings of the just, and Jeremiah's life as a prophet was a continuous martyrdom. But the writer of the second part of Isaiah had before his eyes a vision that far excelled all these types these characteristics of prophecy, its contemporaneous and perspectival and at times symbolical features, are not disregarded. The firm prophetic word is intended to give the congregation certain directive lines and distinctive outlines. But an adequate idea of what is to come the Christian church will become compelled to form for itself, when the fulfilment and completion shall have taken place.

IV. Analogous Phenomena among Gentiles.—The uniqueness of Bible prophecy is grasped fully only when we try to find analogies among the gentle peoples. Here we find everywhere indeed the art of soothsaying, the headquarters for which was Babylon. But with this art the prophecy of the OT stands out in bold contrast (cf the prohibitions in Lev 19:26; 31:20; Deut. 18:10f., prohibitions that refer to necromancy for the purpose of discovering the future). This art was practised through a medium, a person who had an 'abba (Bab. 'aba), i.e. a spirit that brought forth the dead in order to question them. These were thought to speak in murmurings or piping sounds (Isa 8:19), which could be imitated by the medium (visionist). And this was the line which forbade this under penalty of death, Saul had tried to destroy those who practised incantations, who generally were women (1 Sam 8:29). This practice, however, continued to flourish. In addition, theשמה (seham) were an animal and this was also a developed art of interpretation in order to find omens for the future. Even was the examination of intestines practised by them. The liver of sacrificial animals particularly was carefully examined and, from this, good or bad omens were inferred (cf Ezek. 21:21). See Divination. This art passed over from the Babylonians to the seafaring Etruscans, and through these came to the Romans. But other phenomena also were by the different nations interpreted as prophetically significant and were by those skilled in this art interpreted accordingly. Among these were miscarriages by human beings and animals, the actions of hens, horses, the flight of birds, earthquakes, forms of the clouds, lightning, and the like. Further, mechanical contrivances were used, such as casting of lots, stones, sticks, etc.

More spiritual and popular was the interpretation of dreams. It also was the case that mediums interpreted them falsely would convert into a semi-waking trance. In this way the suitable mediums attained to a certain kind of clairvoyance, found among various peoples. This approaches the condition of an ecstatically aroused pseudo-prophet, of whom mention is made above. In Greece, too, oracles were pronounced by the Pythian prophetesses, who by vapors and the like was aroused to a practice of the mantic art. In Delos it was the voice of a woman in Nature, who appeared to read in the rustling of the trees and the murmurings of the water. How uncertain these sources were was well known to heathen antiquity. The ancients complain of the enigmatic character of the Sibylline oracles and the double nature of what was said. See Greece, Religion of. In contrast to this, Israel knows that it possesses in prophecy a clear word (Nu 23:23).

But the contents also of the Bible prophecies are unique through their spiritual uniformity and greatness. The oracle at Delphi, too, at times showed a certain moral elevation and could be regarded as the conscience of the nation. But how insignificant and mere was that which it offered to those who questioned it in comparison with the spontaneous utterances of the prophets of Israel! Also what has in recent times been said concerning the "prophetical texts" from ancient Egypt (Grashmann, Texte und Bilder, 1:188) may, indeed show some external similarity to the prophecies of Israel; but they lack the spiritual and religious depth and the strictly ethical dignity of the prophecies of the Scriptures, as also the consistency with which these from century to century reveal the thoughts of God and make known with constantly increasing clearness their purposes and goal.

PROPHESYINGS, prof'esi-nings, FALSE: The distinction between the true and the false prophecy and prophets is very difficult to state. Broadly speaking, the false prophesyings related itself to the national ideal independently of any spiritual equity, while the true prophesyings ever kept uppermost the spiritual conception of the national life. Among those given to false prophesyings were the ones who spoke after "the deceit of their own heart" (Jer 14:13). Those who were fulfilled prophesyings borrowed a message and assumed the speech of prophecy (Jer 23:25). Those who sought the prophet's rôle in order to gain the material gifts which came from the people to their prophets (Mic 3:5). These who saw themselves worthy of punishment and even death. There were, however, false prophesyings from men who honestly believed themselves to have a message from Jeh. These prophesyings from self-deceived prophets often led the people astray. The dream of national greatness was substituted for the voice of Jeh. It was against such prophesyings that the true prophets had to contend. The only test here was the spiritual character of the utterance, and this test demanded that worthy of punishment and even death. Consequently, in times of moral darkness the false prophets, predicting smooth things for the nation, independent of repentance, consolation and forgiveness, were favored above the true prophets who emphasized the moral greatness of Jeh and the necessity of righteousness for the nation. In NT times false prophesyings did much injury in the church. See Prophecy.

PROPHET, THE OLD. See OLD PROPHET, THE.

PROPHETESS, prof'et-ess (προφητής, profēthēs, prophēthēs): Women were not excluded from the prophetic office in the OT, and were honored with the right of prophetic utterance in the NT. It should be noted, however, that women like Miriam (Ex 15 20), Deborah (Jgs 4 4) and Huldah (2 K 22 LXX) were not credited with the seer's insight into the future, but were called "prophetesses" because of the poetical inspiration of their speech. Among others mentioned as having the prophetic gift we find Hannah (1 S 2 1), Abigail (1 S 29 30) and the four daughters of Philip (Acts 21 8-9). See Prophet. C. E. Sckenk.

1. Terms and Meaning

PROPITIATION, pro-pish-ə-tā′-shon: The word is Lat and brings into its Eng. use the atmosphere of high priestly rites for winning the favor, or averting the anger, of the gods. In the OT it represents a number of Heb words—ten, including derivatives— which are sufficiently discussed under ATONEMENT (q.v.), of which propitiation is one aspect. It represents in LXX the Gr terms Dαυς, kiales-, (like, kile), and καταλαγ-, with derivatives; in the NT only the latter, and is rarely used. Propitiation needs to be studied in connection with reconciliation, which is used frequently in some of the NT passages cited in the NT, esp. in the newer VSS. In H 2 17, ERV and ARV have both changed "reconciliation" of AV to "propitiation," to make it correspond with the OT use in connection with the sacrifice on the Day of Atonement (17:13, "God [Heb. קבוצת, q.v. "propitiated"] in [m 'he propitiated'] to me the sinner" [AVm]); H 8 12 (quoted from LXX); and Mt 16 22 (an idiomatc asseration as Eng, "mercy on us") will help in getting at the usage in the NT. In LXX hilastērion is the term for the "mercy-seat" or "lid of the ark" of the covenant which was sprinkled with blood on the Day of Atonement. It is employed in exactly this sense in H 9 5, where later VSS have in m "the propitiatory." Elsewhere in the NT this form is found only in Rom 3 25, and it is here that difficulty and difference are found extensively in interpreting. Greek fathers generally and prominent modern scholars understand Paul here to say that God appointed Christ Jesus to be the "mercy-seat" for sinners. The reference, while primarily to the Jewish ceremonial in tabernacle and temple, would not depend upon this reference for its comprehension, for the idea was general in religious thought, that some person or thing had to be provided for securing friendly meeting with the Deity, offended by man's sin. In Hc particularly, as elsewhere generally, Jesus Christ is presented as priest and sacrifice. Many modern writers (cf Sanday and Headlam), therefore, object that to take Him the "mercy-seat" here complicates the figure still further, and so would understand hilastērion as "expiatory sacrifice." While this is not impossible, it is better to take the word in the usual sense of "mercy-seat." It is not necessary to complicate the illustration by bringing in the idea of priest at all here, since Paul does not do so; mercy-seat and sacrifice are both in Christ. He was found in the NT only in 1 Jn 2 2; 4 10. Here the idea is active grace, or mercy, or friendliness. The teaching corresponds exactly with that in Rom. "Jesus Christ the righteous" is our "Advocate [in 'Helper'] with the Father," because He is active mercy concerning (σωτέρ, peri) our sins and those of the whole world. Or (4 10), God "loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins [αφιερούμενον σωτηρίου σκέπασμα] our sins." This last passage is parallel with Rom 3 25, the one dealing with the abstract theory, and so Christ is set forward as a "mercy-seat," the other dealing with experience of grace, and so Christ is the mercy of God in concrete expression. The basal word of the Heb term is that of covering what is offensive, so restoring friendship, or causing to be kindly disposed. The Gr terms lack the physical reference to covering but introduce the idea of friendliness hence their adoption would be natural; hence graciousness.

2. Theological Implication

Naturelly, therefore, the idea of expiation entered into the concept. It is esp. to be noted that all provisions for this friendly relationship, four kinds of God and offending man find their initiation and provision in God and are under His direction, but involve the active response of man. All heathen and unworthy conceptions are removed from the Christian notion of propitiation by the fact that God Himself proposed, or 'set forth' the God and the God and the man. man. This is the supreme expression of ultimate love. God had all the while been merciful, friendly, "passing over" man's sins with no apparently adequate, or just, ground for doing so. Now in the blood of Christ sin is condemned and expiated, and God is able to establish and maintain His character for righteousness, while He continues and extends His dealing in gracious love with sinners who exercise faith in Jesus. The propitiation originates with God, not to appease Himself, but to justify Himself in His uniform kindness to men deserving harshness. Cf also as to reconciliation, as in Rom 5 1-11; 2 Cor 5 18 ff. See also Johannine Theology, v. 2.

LITERATURE.—Besides the comm., the literature is the same as for Atonement, to recent works on which add Stalker, The Atonement: Workerman, At Oneness, or Reconciliatiol with God; Moherly, in Foundations, Christian Belief in Terms of Modern Thought. William Owen Carver.

PROPORTION, pró-pôr-shən; Occurs once in the sense of "space" as the tr of ἄκρα (1 K 7 36, AV "the breadth or open space"); once in the obsolete sense of "form" as the tr of ἀρχή, "array," or "row" (Job 41 12, RV "frame"); and once in the sense of "measure" as the tr of ἀναλογία, "proportion," or "equality" (Rom 12 6, "the proportion of faith"): the "proportion of our faith." "Proportionally" occurs in Wind 13 5, ἀναλόγος, RV "in like proportion," m "correspondently."
The stranger within the gate was free to eat meat which was prohibited to the Israelite (Dt 14:21). If, however, the stranger wished to take part in the Passover, Gentile law prohibited him; he must be circumcised. The keeping of the Sabbath and other feasts was regarded rather as a privilege than as a duty (Ex 23:12; Dt 16:11,14); but according to Lev 16:29 the gēr was obliged to keep the fast of Atonement. He was forbidden on pain of death to blaspheme (Lev 24:16) or to offer children to Molech (Lev 20:2). If he desired to bring a burnt offering, the same law applied to him as to the Israelites (Lev 17:8; 22:18). To the Jew such a law might have forced sacrifices; and it was probably for this class that tablets of warning in the temple were inscribed in Gr and Lat.

Another class kept practically all the Jewish laws and customs, but were not circumcised. Some again, though not circumcised, had their children circumcised (Juvenal Sat. xiv.96 ff). Such Jewish customs as fasting, cleansings, abstaining from pork, lighting the candles on Friday evening, and keeping the Sabbath (Jos, Cap, II, 29, etc) were observed by these "gentile sympathizers." Schürer holds that there were congregations of Greeks and Romans in Asia Minor, and probably in Rome, which, though they had no connection with the synagogue, formed themselves into gatherings after the pattern of the synagogue, with the officers of the synagogue.

Among the converts to Judaism there were probably few who were circumcised, and most of those who were circumcised submitted to the rite in order to marry Jews, or to enjoy the rights and privileges granted to Jews by Syriac and Roman rulers (Jos, Ant, XIV, vii, 2; XX, vii, 1; cf XVI, vii, 6). It would appear from Christ's words (Mt 23:15, "one proselyte") that the number of full proselytes was not large. Hyrcanus forced the Edomites to adopt Judaism by circumcision (129 BC); and on other occasions the same policy of propaganda by force was followed. Jos tells an interesting story (Ant, XX, ii, 1) of the conversion of Queen Helena of Adiabene and her two sons. The conversion of the sons was due to the teaching of a merchant called Ananias, who did not insist on circumcision. Later, another Jew, Eliezer of Galilee, told the young princes that it was not enough to read the Law, but that they must keep it. This is another instance of the same process. From this it is evident that Jewish teachers of the gentle converts varied in the strictness of their teaching.

The word "proselyte" occurs 4 times in the NT; once in Mt 23:15, where our Lord refers to the proselyzing zeal of the Pharisees, and 3 times in the NT Acts. Proselytes were present at Pentecost (Acts 2:10); Nicolas, one of the deacons appointed by the primitive church at Jerusalem, was a proselyte (6:5); and after Paul had spoken in the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia, many devout proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas (13:43). It is to be noted in this last case that the proselytes are called sebōmenoi, a word generally reserved for another class. Certain people are spoken of in Acts as phoibōmenoi tón theón, "fearing God" (10:22,35; 13:16,26), and as sebōmenoi tón theón, "reverencing God," or simply sebōmenoi (13:50; 18:14; 17:4,17,19). These (as against Berithoi and EIr) have been sympathizers with Judaism, who attended the worship of the synagogue, but were not circumcised. It was among this class that the gospel made its first impression in the world of Hellenism. These (as well as the fully circumcised) were probably the fanatical opponents of Christianity as were the Jews.
From the old strict Pharisaic-Palestinian point of view, circumcision, with the addition of baptism and the offering of sacrifice, was indispensable (so to Paul every circumcised person was a Jew; cf Gal 5:3); and thus their converts had to submit to the whole burden of the Mosaic and traditional Law. The rabbinic distinction between ġēr tōshābāb, "a settler," and ġēr ḍēkedēb, "a proselyte of righteousness," is, according to Schürer, only theoretical, and arose at a later date (Babba' Mardi 6 3; Naphta' 3 1, et al.).

While the ġēr ḍēkedēb (for ġēr hōlē, "proselyte of the covenant") was considered as being in every respect a "perfect Israelite," the ġēr tōshābāb (or ġēr sha'ār, "proselyte of the gate"); cf Ex 20 10 only professed his faith in the God of Israel, and bound himself to the observance of the 7 Noachic precepts, abstaining, ideally, from idolatry, homicide, fornication, robbery, eating the flesh of an animal that had died a natural death, and disobedience to (Jewish) authority (Sanh. 56a; cf Acts 15 20-29; 21 23). He was considered more of a Gentile than a Jew.

Three things were required for the admission of a proselyte, circumcision, baptism, and the offering of sacrifice (B'rur. 47b; Y'bbam. 45b, 46a, 45b, 76a; 'Abbōh 87a, et al.). In the case of women only baptism and the offering of sacrifice were required; for that reason there were more women converts than men. Jos (EII, xx, 2) tells how most of the women of Damascus were addicted to the Jewish religion. Doubt has been expressed as to the necessity of proselytes being baptized, since there is no mention of it by Paul or Philo or Jos, but it is probable that a Gentile, who was uncircumcised, would not be admitted to the temple without being cleansed.

The proselyte was received in the following manner. He was first asked his reason for wishing to embrace Judaism. He was told that Israel was in a state of affliction; if he replied that he was aware of the fact and felt himself unworthy to share these afflictions, he was admitted. Then he received instruction in some of the "light" and "heavy" commandments, the rules concerning cleansing and tithes, and the penalties attached to the breach of the laws. If he was willing to submit to all this, he was circumcised, and after his recovery he was immersed without delay. At this latter ceremony two "disciples of the wise" stood by to tell him more of the "light" and "heavy" commandments. If he came up after the immersion, those assembled addressed him saying: "Unto whom hast thou given thyself? Blessed art thou, thou hast given thyself to God; the world was created for the sake of Israel, and only Israelites are called the children of God. The afflictions, of which we spoke, we mentioned only to make thy reward the greater." After his baptism he was considered to be a new man, "a little child newly born" (Y'bbam. 22a, 47b, 49b, 97b); a new name was given him; either he was named "Abraham the son of Abraham," or the Scriptures were opened at hazard, and the first name that was read was given to him. Thenceforth he had to put behind him all his past; even his marriage ties and those of kinship no longer held good (cf Y'bbam. 22a; Sanh. 58a).

Although he was thus juridically considered a new man, and one whose praises were sung in the Talmudic literature, he was yet on the whole looked down on as inferior to a born Jew (Kidd. 4 3; Shabatāk 10 9, et al.). Rabbi Chelbo said: "Proselytes are an abomination as a scab" (Y'bbam. 47b; Kidd. 70b; cf Phil 3 5). See also STRANGER.

PROVE, próv (הִשָּׂאָה, báhān, נָגָה; סְכַּנְאָתָ, dokimāzō, πιείραζω, peirazo): Means (1) to test or try; (2) to establish, demonstrate; (3) to find by experience. It is for the most part in the first (original) sense that the word is found in the Scripture. If in the OT it is the word most frequently rendered "tempt" or "try" in the NT it is rendered "prove" (sometimes "try") is dokimāzo (Lk 14 19; Rom 12 2; 2 Cor 8 5, 23; 13 5; Eph 5 10; 1 Thess 5 21). Peirazo, "to tempt," "to prove," used in both a good and a bad sense, frequently trí "tempt" (q.v.), is rendered "prove" in Jn 6 6, "This he said to prove him." Both Gr words occur frequently in Apoc (Wis and Ecclus). RV has "prove" for "tempt" (Gen 22 1); for "make" (Job 24 25; Gal 2 18) for "manifest" (Ecc 3 18); "for a witness" (Cor 11 29); for "try" (1 Cor 1 13; 1 Jn 4 1), etc.

3. In Late Times

By this term mainly, but sometimes by the term "parable" (e.g. Nu 23 7.18; 24 3.15; Job 27 1; 29 1), is tr the Heb word mashal (משל), which designates the formal unit or vehicle of didactic discourse. The mashal was an enunciation of truth, self-evident and self-illustrative, in some pointed or concentrated form adapted to arrest attention and preserve thought, and remain fixed in memory. Its scope was broader than that of our word "proverb," taking in subject-matter as well as form. The mashal broadened indeed in the course of its history, until it became the characteristic idiom of Hebrew philosophy, as distinguished from the dialectic method of the Greeks. The Heb mind was not inductive but intuitive; it saw and asserted; and the word mashal is the generic term for the form in which its assertion was embodied.

1. The Primitive Sense

The mashal, nearly in our sense of proverb, traces back to the heart and life of the common folk; it is a native form reflecting in a peculiarly intimate way the distinctive genius of the Heb people. As to the primitive sense of the word, it is usually traced to a root meaning "likeness," or "comparison," as if the first sense of it were of the principle of analogy underlying it; but this derivation is a guess. The word is just as likely to be connected with the vb. mashal, "to rule" or "master"; so by a natural secondary meaning to denote that statement which gives the decisive or final verdict, says the master word. The idea of how the thing is said, or by what phrasing, would be a later differentiation, coming in with literary refinement.

The earliest cited proverb (Is 10 12, repeated with varied occasion, 1 S 19 24) seems to have risen spontaneously from the people's observation. That Saul the son of Kish, whose very different temperament everybody knew, should be susceptible to the wild ecstasy of strolling prophets was an astonishing thing, as it were a discovery in itself. As with the prophetic "yad" became a proverb, is Saul also among the prophets? A few years later David, explaining his elegance in sparing the life of the king who has become his deadly foe, quotes from a folk fund of proverbs: 1 S 24 13, "As saith the proverb of the ancients, Out of the wicked cometh forth wickedness; but my hand shall not be upon thee." The prophet Ezekiel quotes a proverb which evidently embodies a popular belief: "The days are prolonged, and every vision falleth," which he corrects to, "The days are at hand, and the fulfilment of every vision" (Ezk 12 22.23). Both Ezekiel and Jeremiah (Ezk 18 2; Jer 31 29) quote the same current proverb, "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge," in order to announce that the time has come for its discontinuance. These last two examples are very instructive. They show how the body of the people put the inwards of their history into proverb form, as it were a portable lesson for the times; they show also how the prophets availed themselves of these floating sayings to point their own message. Ezekiel seems indeed to recognize the facility with which a situation may bring forth a proverb: Ezek 16 44, "Every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb; but that same thing which shineth shall mashal against thee, saying, As is the mother, so is her daughter."

One element of the proverb, which a wide-awake people like the Hebrews would soon discover, was its adaptability for personal portrayal as a taunt, or a dart, or a thrust. Hence of Proverbs the popular use of the name mashal came to connote its animus, generally of sarcasm or scorn. The taunting verse raised against Heshbon, Nu 21 27-30, is attributed to them "that speak in proverbs" (mashalim); and Isaiah's taunt in his burden of Babylon (Isa 14 4-20) is composed in the proverb measure: "Thou shalt take up this parable [mashal, AV. "proverb"] against the king of Babylon." Answering to this prevailing animus of mashal was a growing susceptibility to their sting and rancile; they were the kind of utterance that most surely found the national and individual self-consciousness. To be a proverb—to be in everybody's mouth as a subject of laughter, or as a synonym for some awful atrocity—was about the most dreadful thing that could befall them. To be "a reproach and a proverb, a taunt and a curse" (Jer 24 9) was all that. This should be the nation's fate was held as a threat over them by lawyer and prophet (Dt 28 37; I K 9 7); and in adversities of experience, both individual and collective, the thing that was most keenly felt was to have become a byword (mashal) (Ps 44 14; 69 11).

1. Discovery of Proverbs

The rank of proverb was by no means attributed to every popular saying, however the people might set store by it. If its application was merely local (e.g. 2 S 19 24), or for temporary literary value (note how Jeremiah and Ezekiel announce popular sayings as obsolete), it remained in its place and time. About the proverb, on the other hand, there was the sense of a value universal and permanent, fitting it for literary immortality. Nor was the proverb itself a run-wild thing, at the shaping of the crowd; from the beginning it was in the hands of "those who speak in mashalim," whose business it was to put it into skilful wording. The popular proverb, however, and the literary proverb were and continued two different things. There came a time in the literary development of Israel, when the value of the mashal as a vehicle of instruction came to be recognized; from which time a systematic cultivation of this type of discourse began. That time seems most probable, was the reign of King Solomon, when in a special degree the people awoke to the life and industry and intercourse and wealth of the world about them. The king himself was "large hearted" (1 K 4 29), versatile, with literary tastes; "spake three thousand proverbs; and his songs were a thousand and five"; and his whole generation, both in Israel and surrounding nations, was engaged in a vigorous movement of thought and wisdom (see the whole passage, 1 K 4 29-34). For the unit and vehicle of this new thought the old native form of the mashal or proverb was chosen; it became the recognized medium of popular education and counsel, esp. of the young; and the mashal itself was molded to the classical form, condensed, pointed, aphoristic, which we see best exemplified in the Book of Prov 10-22 16—probably the earliest collection of this kind of literature. In this body of proverbs we see also that instead of the mere assertion of the popular proverb, as it appears in 1 S 10 12; 24 13, these composers of literary proverbs borrowed the poetic parallelism, or couplet, which in two lines sets two statements over against each other: antithesis or repetition, and cultivated this to its highest and most expressive epigrammatic construction. Thus the mashal took
2. The Diff-

to identify it with satire, and with less thought of the elements of its life and power. With the refinement of form, however, came a recognition of its awkwardness. Under the generic term mashal, certain elements were differentiated; not, however, as we are wont to distinguish—parable, fable, apologue, allegory—these remained undifferentiated. The most fundamental distinction of classes, perhaps, is given in Prov 1:6: "To understand a proverb, and a figure, the words of the wise, and their dark sayings." Here it seems the word "proverb" (mashal) and "words of the wise," paired off with each other, are the generic terms; the other two, the differentiating terms, name respectively the two fundamental directions of the mashal, toward the clear and toward the enigmatic. Both are essential elements. The word tr4 "figure" (תְּרֵ֣י, 'rē) is rather "interpretation," and seems to refer to the illuminative element of the mashal, and this was mainly analogical. Natural objects, phases of experience, contrasts were drawn in the mashal to make analogies for life; Solomon's use of plants and animals in his discourses (1 K 4:33) was not by way of natural history, but as analogies to illustrate his mashālim. The word tr4 "dark sayings" (תְּרֹ֣עֲמָ֑ה, 'rō'māmāh) is the word elsewhere tr4 "riddle" (Samson's riddle, for instance, was a khdāḥ, Jgs 14:13,14), and refers to that quality of the proverb which, by challenging the hearer's acumen, gives it zest; it is due to an association of things so indirectly related that one must supply intermediate thoughts to resolve them. All of this is required to justify the proverb as a capital vehicle for instruction and counsel; it has the elements that appeal to attention, responsive thought, and memory, while on the other hand its basis of analogies is evident.

III. As Unit of a Strain of Literature.—Until it reached its classic perfection of phrasing, say during the time from Solomon to Hezekiah, the formal development of Detachment the proverb was concentricative; the the proverb the subject craved further elucidation, and so a group of several coupled was sometimes necessary to present a case (cf. 4:9 g. about the sluggard, Prov 26:13-16). From this group of proverbs the transition was easy to a continuous passage, in which the snappy parallelism of the proverb yields to the flow of poetry; see e.g. Prov 27:23-27. This is due evidently to a more penetrative and analytic mode of thinking, which can no longer satisfy its statement of truth in a single illustration or maxim. As the store of detached utterances on various phases of practical life accumulated and the task of collecting them was undertaken, it was seen that they had a common suffusion and bearing, that in fact they constituted a distinctive strain of literature. The field of this literature was broad, and recognized (see Prov 1:1-5) as promotive of many intellectual virtues; but the inclusive name under which it was gathered was Wisdom (חָכְיָתַ֣ה, ḫokhnāh). Wisdom, deduced thus from a fund of maxims and analogies, became the Heb equivalent for philosophic. With the further history of it this article is not concerned, except to note that the mashal or proverb form held itself as a genre free from fixed phrase, except in the extended discourse, or to hold itself in to the couplet form. As to illustrative quality, too, its scope was liberal enough to include a fully developed parable; see for instance Ezk 17:1-10, where the prophet is hidden to "put forth a riddle, and speak a parable (lit. mashal, a mashal) unto the house of Israel." The existence of so considerable a body of proverbs is a testimony to the Heb genius for sententious and weighty expression, a virtue which has not disappeared.

3. In Later Time of speech which was held in special esteem. From the use of practical wisdom the mashal form was borrowed by the later scribes and doctors of the law; we see it for instance in loose and artificial use in such books as Pirkē Ḥabīlāh, which gives the impression that the utteranceParable is classically represented in the Solomonic proverbs has become decadent. It is in another direction rather that the virtues of the mashal reach their culmination. In the phrasal felicity and illustrative lucidity of Our Lord's discourses, and nosis in His parables, employed that the multifaceted "may see and yet not see" (Mk 4:12), we have the values of the ancient mashal in their perfection, in a literary form so true to its object that we do not think of its artistry at all. The Scripture book which in both the Heb and the Gr arrangement of its contents, it immediately succeeds the Ps. In the Heb Canon it stands second in the final or supplementary division called khdākhim (LXX Ἰαπουλικαὶ, Paronomatik), "writings"; placed there probably because it would be most natural to begin this section with standard collections nearest at hand, which of course would be psalms and proverbs. This book is an anthology of sayings or lessons of the sages on life, character, conduct; and as such embodies the distinctively educative strain of Heb literature.

I. The Book's Account of Itself.—At the beginning, intended apparently to cover the whole work, stands the title: "The Proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Judah." It seemed good to the compiler, however, to retain an older heading, "The Proverbs of Solomon" at ch 10, as if in some special sense the collection there beginning deserved it; and at ch 25 still another heading occurs: "These also are proverbs of Solomon, which the gazeh (13) king of Judah copied out." All these ascribe the proverbs to Solomon; but the heading (30:1), "The words of Agur" the son of Jakeh, the oracle," and the heading (31:1), "The words of king Lemuel; the oracle which his mother taught him," indicate that authorship other than that of Solomon is represented; while the mention of "the words of the wise" (1:6; 22:17), as also the definite heading, "These also are sayings of the wise" (24:23), ascribes parts of the book to the sages in general. The book is a collection of proverbs written at different times; confessedly, also, to a considerable extent at least, the work of a number, perhaps a whole guild, of writers.

It is hazardous to argue either for or against a specific authorship; nor is it my intention to do so. The question naturally arises, however, in what sense this book, with its composite structure so outspoken, can lay claim to being the work of Solomon. The title referred to actual personal names and the names of authors is more usual in the New Testament, but the Bible is as old as its assumed name, which, however, personates Solomon. The title indicates that in the compilation of the books an unusual degree of literary finish and self-consciousness, a sense on the part of writers or compilers that the literature so far was not quite up to its claims on them. But subject-matter of the books, too, bears this out; they are, relatively speaking, the secular books of the Bible and do not assume Divine origin, do law and prophecy. For the original impulse to such literary culture the history directs us to the reign of King Solomon: see 1 K 4:29-34, where is portrayed, on the part of king and court, an intense intellectual activity for its own sake, the like of which occurs nowhere else in Scripture. The form is in any case impressed upon the literature were the mashal (Proverbs), and in the older, both mashal and the versatile young king was proficient; of 1 K 4:32. For the cultivation of this art, that of these men of verse, so long avoided them, they gave to it a literary mold and finish which would then beator lasting, or as the Solomonic mashal (see Proverbs). This then was the literary form in which from the time of Solomon onward the sages of the nation put their counsels of life, character, conduct: it became as distinctively the mold for this didactic strain in the age of Dryden and Pope.

It is reasonable therefore to understand this title of the Book of Prov as designating rather a literary species than a personal authorship; it names this anthology of Wisdom in its classically determined personal, large and spacious enough to cover the centuries of its currency. Perhaps also the proverb of this type was by the term "of Solomon" differentiated from mashals of other types, as for instance those of Balam and Job and Ruth.

II. The Successive Compilations.—That the Book of Prov is composed of several collections made at different times is a fact that lies on the surface; as many as eight of subdivision is marked and perhaps, for some kind of development of a theme, or even as a unity; whatever unity it has was an afterthought. That is, perhaps, for one homogeneous body of truth, and to receive a name and a degree of articulation as such, will be maintained in a later section (see III, below). Meanwhile, we will take the sections in order and note some of the salient characteristics of each. The introductory section, of cm 1:1-11, is distinguished from all others by its added later than most of the rest; and is introductory in the sense of concentrating the thought to the concept of Wisdom, and of recommending the spiritual attitude in which it is to be received. Its style—and in this it is distinguished from the rest of the book—is hortatory; it is addressed to "my son" (1:8 and often) or "my sons" (4:1; 5:7; 7:24; 8:32), in the tone of a father or a sage, bringing stores of wisdom and experience to the young. The first six verses are prefatory, giving the purpose and use of the whole book. Then verse 7 lays down the initial point, or spiritual bedrock of Wisdom, the fear of Jehov, a principle repeated toward the end of this introductory section (9,10), and evidently regarded as very vital to the whole Wisdom system; of Job 28:25; Ps 111:10.

The most striking feature of the section, besides its general homiletic tone, is its personification of Wisdom. She is represented as calling to the sons of men and commanding to them her ways (1:20-33; 8:1-21,32-36); she condescends, for right and purity's sake, to enter into rivalry with the "strange woman," the temptress, not in secret, but in open and fearless dealing (7:6-8; 9:1-6,13-18); and, in a supremely poetic passage (8:22-31), she describes her relation from the beginning with God and with the sons of men, how her spirit, which, as the Heb mind came to set upon the human endowment of Wisdom. The Heb philosopher thought not in terms of logic and dialectics, but in symbol and personality; and to this high rank, almost like that of a goddess, his imagination has exalted the intellectual and spiritual powers of man. See Wisd.

The section 10:1-11:16, with the repeated heading "The proverbs of Solomon," seems to have been the original nucleus of the whole collection. Like all the proverbs, it is written in the form of a thought-circuit, which, in the second line gives either some contrast to or some amplification of the first. This was doubtless the classic art norm of the Solomonic mashal.

The section seems to contain the product of that period of poetic culture during which the prophetic model was a little rigid and severe, not venturing yet to limber up the form. Signs of a greater freedom, however, begin to appear, and this section is as far as possible the primary sort of compilation are represented. In chs 10-15 the prevailing couplet is ethico-literal, with an obvious closed circuit of the thought. Out of 184 proverbs only 19 do not contain some form of contrast, and 19 of these are in ch 15. In 16-22, 16, on the other hand, the prevailing form is the so-called synonymous or amplified couplet, which leaves the thought-circuit more open to illustrative additions. Out of 191 proverbs only 18 are antithetical; and these contain contrasts of a more subtle and hidden suggestion. As subject-matter, the whole section is miscellaneous; in the first half, however, where the antithetico-poetic, are the most elemental distinctions of life, wisdom and folly, righteousness and wickedness, industry and laziness, wise speech and folly, and the like. It reflects a decided tendency to go further afield for subtler and less obvious distinctions, to reflect a growing and refined literary development, the gradual shaping and accumulation of materials for a philosophy of life, so as yet, however, not articulated or reduced to unity of principle.

In the short section 22:17-24, the proverb literature seems for the first time to have become as it were self-conscious—to regard itself as a strain of wise counsel to be reckoned with, for its educative value. A Body of Solicited and Unsolicited Counsel The section is introduced by a preface (22:17-21), in which these "words of the wise" are recommended to some person or delegation, "that thou mayest carry back words of truth to them that send thee" (22:21). The counsels seem intended for persons in responsible position, perhaps attached to the court (cf 33 1–3), who, as they are to deal officially with men and affairs, need the presence, purity, and temperance which will fit them for their duties. As to form, the detached couplet appears only occasionally; the favorite form is the quatrains; but proverbs of a greater number of lines are freely used, and one, the counsel on wine drinking (33 29–35), runs to 17 lines. In tone, it is decidedly a wise. They refer to wise intercourse and ordered industry.

4. Some Precepts

The little poem on the sluggard (24 30–34), with its refrain (vs 33.34), is noteworthy as being apparently one stanza of a poem which is completed with the same refrain in the introductory section (6 6–11). The stanzas are of the same length and structure; and it would seem the latter named was either discovered later or composed as a supplement to the one in and before it is composed.

The long section (chs 25–29) is headed, “These also are proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out.”

5. The Hebrew Collection

The collection claims to be only a collection. If, as already suggested, we understand the term “proverbs of Solomon” as equivalent to “Solomonic proverbs,” referring rather to species than personal authorship, the compilation may have been made not merely from antiquity, but from the archives of the Wisdom guilds. If so, we have a clue to the state of the Wisdom literature in Hezekiah’s time. The collection as a whole, unlike secs. 3 and 4, returns predominantly to the classic form of the couplet, but with a less degree of compression and epigram. There is a tendency to group numbers of proverbs on like subjects; note for instance the group on the king (30 2–7). The most striking feature of the collection is the prevalence of simile and analogy, and in general the strong figurative coloring, esp. in secs. 26–27. It reads like a new species of proverb when we note that in all the earlier Solomonic sections there are only two clearly defined similes (10 26; 11 22).

In chs 26–27 are several proverbs of three, four, or five lines, and the end (27 28) is a charming little poem of ten lines on husbandry. Chs 28, 29 are entirely of couplets, and the antithetic proverb reappears in a considerable number. As to subject-matter, the thought of this section makes a rather greater demand on the reader’s culture and thinking powers, the analogies being less obvious, more subtle. It is decidedly the reflection of a more literary age than that of sec. 2.

Ch 30 is taken up with “the words of Agur the son of Jakeh,” a person otherwise unknown, who disclaims expert knowledge of Wisdom. Agur’s manner of speech is the same as that of the humanistic and the supposed findings of human wisdom, and as such supply a useful lightweight to the mounting pride of the scholar. Yet over this peculiar plea is placed the word “Massa” (נמא, ha-masâ), “burden” or “oracle,” the term used for prophetic disclosures; and the word for “said” ("the man said," ניב נב, n’um ha-gabber) is the word elsewhere used for mystic or Divine utterance. This seems to mark a stage in the self-consciousness of Wisdom when it was felt that its utterances could be ranked by the side of prophecy as a revelation of truth (cf 1 7–8; 22 18), and could claim the authoritative term “oracle.” For the rest, apart from the humble reverence with which they are imbued, these words of Agur do not rise to a high level of spiritual thinking; they tend rather to the riddling element, or “dark sayings” (cf 1 6). The form of his proverbs is peculiar, verging indeed on the artificial; he deals mostly in the so-called numerical proverb (“three things ... yea, four”), a style of utterance paralleled elsewhere only in 6 16–19, but something of a favorite in the later cryptic sayings of the scribes, as may be seen in Pirke ’Abhîth.

31 1–9 (possibly the whole chapter should be included) is headed, “The words of king Lemuel; the oracle which his mother taught him.” Here occurs again the mystical word “oracle,” which would seem to be open to the same interpretation as the one given in the previous paragraph, though some would make this otherwise unknown monarch a king of a tribe other than the Judahite, to the name of one of the descendants of Ishmael (Gen 25 14), presumably a tribal designation. The Heb sages from the beginning were in rivalry and fellowship with the sages of other nations (cf 1 K 4 30–31); and in the Book of Job, the supreme reach of Wisdom utterance, all of the sages, Job included, are from countries outside of Pal. King Lemuel, if an actual personage, was not a Jew; and probably Agur was not. The words of Lemuel are a mother’s plea to her royal son for chastity, temperance and justice, the kingly virtues. The form is the simple Heb parallelism, not detached couplets, but continuous.

The Book of Prov ends in a manner eminently worthy of its high standard of sanity and wisdom. Without any heading (it may possibly belong to the “oracle” that the mother Acrostic of Lemuel taught her son) the last 22 verses of Woman 8 of the Book of Lam. (31 10–31) constitute a single prayer in praise of marriage, extending esp. her household virtues.

In form these verses begin in the original with the successive 22 letters of the Heb alphabet; a favorite form of Heb verse, as may be seen (in the original) in several of the Psalms, notably Ps 119, and in chs 1–4 of the Book of Lam.

III. Movement toward a Philosophy.—It has been much the fashion with modern critics to deny to the in the Hebrews a truly philosophic mind; this they say was rather the distinctive gift of the Greeks; while for their solution of the problem of life the Hebrews depended on direct revelation from above, which precluded that quasi-acceptance of concepts, that weighing of cosmic and human elements, involved in the commonly received notion of philosophy. This criticism takes account of only one side of the Heb mind. It is true they believed their life to be in the direct contact with the will and word of Jehovah, revealed to them in terms which could not be questioned; but in the findings and deliverance of their own intellectual powers, too, they had a reliance and confidence which merits the name of an authentic philosophy. But theirs was a philosophy not of speculative world-making, but of conduct and the practical management of life; and it was intuitive and analogical and not the result of logical reasoning. Hence its name wisdom, the solution itself, rather than philosophy, the love of wisdom, the search for solution. This Book of Prov, beginning with detached maxims on the elements of conduct, reveals in many suggestive ways the gradual emergence of a philosophy, a comprehensive wisdom, as it were, in the making; it is thus the pioneer book of that Heb Wisdom which we see developed to mature things in the books of Job and Eccl. Some of its salient stages may here be traced.

We may first note it, or the literary preparation for it, in the opening part, the māshāl, or prophetic poem, having added elements of illustration, explanation, amplitude, a development that becomes more pronounced in the second section (the classic nucleus, sec. 2) at about ch. 16. The prophetic or riddling antithetical axiom is, as it were, two aspects of truth in such a way as to set the case closed; there was nothing for it but to go on with this had-had effect of setting over against each other the great elemental antitheses, righteousness and wickedness, obedience and lawlessness, teachableness and perversity, industry and laziness, prudence and presumption, reticence and prating, etc., and so far forth it was a matter of analysis of the essentials of individual and social conduct. As soon, however, as the synonymous and illustrative māshāl prevails, we are conscious of a limbering up and greater penetrativeness of the range of thought: it is open to subtler distinctions and remoter discoveries, and the analogies tend to employ the less direct, the larger signs of cause and effect. This is increased as we go on, esp. by the greater call upon the imagination in the figurative tissue of the Hezdenian section, and the decided greater tendency to the riddling and paradox element. The māshāl increases in length as the book advances, both by the growth of similar subjects and by the enlargement from the one quatrain and the developed poem. All this, while not yet in a self-conscious philosophy, is a step on the way thereto.

One solid presupposition of the sages, like an axiom, was never called into question: namely, that righteousness and wisdom are identical, that wickedness of any sort is folly, and the goodness of wisdom profit nothing; but righteousness delivereth from death" (Prov 10 2). Thus from the outset is furnished an uncompromising background on which the fascinating allurements of vice, the crooked ways of injustice and dishonesty, the sober habits of goodness and right dealing, show for what they are and what they tend to. The sages thus put themselves, too, in entire harmony with what is taught by priests and prophets; there is not one law on earth that supplies the third strand in the threefold cord of instruction (of Jer 18 18). From this basal presumption other principles, scarcely less axiomatic, come in view: that the fruit and spring of wise living is reverence, the fear of Jehovah; that the ensnaring frame of mind is teachableness, the precluding attitude of perverseness; that it is the mark of wisdom, or righteousness, to be fearless and above board, of wickedness, which is folly, to be crooked and secretive. These principles recur constantly, not as a system, but in numerous aspects and applications in the practical business of life. For their sanctions they refer naively to the Heb ideal of rewards on the one hand—wealth, honor, long life, family (of Prov 11 1)—and on the other end of destruction on the other; but these are emphasized not as direct bestowments or infusions from a personal Deity, rather as in the law of human nature. The law that evil works its own destruction, good brings its own reward, is put forth itself in men's reasoning as one of the fundamental concepts, of which grew the Wisdom philosophy.

From times long before Solomon sagacity in counsel, and skill to put such counsel into maxim or parable, gaind its possessor, whether man or woman, the natural leadership power of the local communities (2 8 14 2; 20 16); and Solomon's exceptional endowment showed itself not merely in his literary tastes, but in his ability, much esteemed among Orientals, to determine the merits of cases brought before him for judgment (1 K 3 16-28), and to answer puzzling questions (1 K 10 1.67). It was from Conception such estimate of men's intellectual powers, from the recognition of mental magnetism, from the application to the practical issues of life (of Prov 1 1-5), that the conception of Wisdom in its larger sense arose. As, however, the cultivation of such sagacity of utterance passed beyond the time of Solomon's court (cf 1 29-34) into the hands of city elders and sages, it attained to greatly enhanced value; note how the influence of such a sage is idealized (Job 29 7-25). The sages had a definite calling and mission of their own, more potent perhaps than belonged to priests and prophets; the frequent reference to the young and the 'simple' or immature in the Book of Prov would indicate that they were virtually the schoolmasters and educators of the nation. Such, working as they did in a fellowship and collaboration with each other, the subject-matter with which they dealt would not remain as casual and miscellaneous maxims, but work toward a center and system of doctrine which could claim the distinction of an artificed philosophy of mankind, and which might be identified with the great Heb ideal of righteousness and truth. We have already noted how this sense of the dignity and value of their calling manifested itself in the body of precepts sent in response to solicitation (see above), with its appendix (4; loved (Prov 22 17—24 34). It was not long after this stage of Wisdom-culture, I think, that a very significant new word came into their vocabulary, the word tashīyāth (תֹּשִׂיָּה), a puzzle to the translators, variously rendered "sound wisdom," "effectual prudence," "wise saying;" and called by the lexicographers the technical term of the Wisdom literature," BDB, s.v.). Its earliest appearance, and the only one except in the introductory section (Prov 18 1), is where the man who separates himself from others' opinions and seeks his own desire is said to quarrel with all tashīyāth. The word seems to designate Wisdom in its subjective aspect, as an authentic insight or intuition of truth, the human power to rise into the region of true revelation from below, as distinguished from the prophecies that speak thus to the people from above. Outside of Prov and Job the word occurs only twice: once in Mic 6 9, and once in Isa 28 29, in which latter case the prophet has deliberately composed a passage (vs 23—29) in the manner to which he appeals, the inspired thesaurus of insight of Jehovah. Evidently there came a time in the culture of Wisdom when its utterances attained in men's estimate a parity with utterances direct from the unseen; perhaps this explains why Agur's and Lemuel's words could be boldly ranked as oracles (see above, 6 and 7). At any rate, such a high distinction, an authority derived from intimacy with the creative work of Jehovah 30 31), is ascribed to Wisdom (bokhānah, בּוֹכָנָה, 13 7) in the introductory section; "counsel is mine," said Wisdom is made to say. (And tashīyāth, 13 8.)

Thus the Book of Prov reveals to us a philosophy, as it were, in the making and from scattered counsels attaining gradually to the summit where the human intellect could place its findings by the side of Divine ones, topical.

IV. Considerations of Age and Literary Kinship.—To get at the history of the Book of Prov, several inquiries must be raised. When were the proverbs composed? The book, like the Book of Ps, is confessional literature, to a more extent in the cases of accumulations, and both by style and maturing thought bearing the marks of different ages. When were the successive compilations made? And, finally, when did the strain of literature here represented reach that point of self-conscious unity and coördination which justified its being reckoned with as a strain by itself and choosing the comprehensive name Wisdom? What makes these inquiries hard to settle is the fact that the wisdom or proverbs and precepts for the common people, relating to ordinary affairs of the village, the market, and the field, and move in lines remote from politics and dynastic vicissitudes and wars. They are, to an extent far more penetrative and pervasive than law or prophecy, the educative literature on which, with studious rank and file of the nation was nourished. There where no vision, the people let loose," says a Hezekian proverb (Prov 29:15); but so they are also when there is no abiding tone of social convention and principle. Precisely this latter it is which this Book of Prov in a large degree reveals; and in course of time its value was so felt that, as we have seen, it could rank itself as an asset of life by the side of vision. It represents, in a word, the human movement toward self-direction and self-reliance, without supine dependence on ruler or public sentiment (cf Prov 25:26). When and how was this same and wholesome communal fiber developed?

When Solomon and his court made the māshâl an elegant fad, they built it better than they knew. They made of the proverb and parable, as reduced to the Kings epigrammatic mold and polish, the éclat of a popular literature. This was done only at first (Solomon spoke his proverbs, 1 K 4:32-33), but the recording of such carefully expressed utterances could not be long delayed; perhaps this brief style coupé was the most natural early exercise in the new transition from the unwieldily cuneiform to the use of papyrus and a more flexible alphabet, which probably was the formative step in the monarchy. At any rate, here was the medium for a practical didactic literature, applied to the matters of daily life and intercourse to which in Solomon's time the nation was enthusiastically awake. There is no valid reason for denying to Solomon, or at least to his time, the initiation of the Solomonic māshâl; and if, as has been suggested, the name "proverbs of Solomon" designates rather literary species than personal authorship, the title of (1 K 4:32-33), as well as the headings of sections (10:1; 25:1), may be given in entire good faith, whatever the specific time or personal authorship of the utterances. Nor is there anything either in recorded history or the likelihood of the case to make it probable that the activity of the "men of Hezekiah" means just what is said; these men of letters were adding this supplementary collection (Prov 25-29) to a body of proverbs that already existed and were recognized as Solomon's. This would put the composition of the main body of the proverbs (chs 10-29) prior to the reign of Hezekiah. They represent therefore the chief literary instruction available to the people in the long period of the Kings from Solomon onward, a period which otherwise was very meagerly supplied. The Mos- solnic Lot" as well as the ending of the Law in the time of Josiah (2 K 22), was at best a sequestered thing in the keeping—or neglect—of priests and judges; the prophetic word was a specific message for great national emergencies; the accumula- tion and addition of the whole property of the temple and the cultus; what then was there for the education of the people? There were indeed the folk-tales and catechetical legends of their heroic history; but there were also, most influential of all, these wise sayings of the sages, growing like grasses in the village centers, published in the open places by the gate (cf Job 29:7), embodying the elements of a common-sense religion and citizenship, and representing views of life which were not only Hebrew, but to a great extent international among the neighbor kingdoms. Understood so, these Solomonic proverbs furnish incommensurably the best reflection we have of the religious and social standards of the common people, during a period otherwise meagerly portrayed. And from it we can understand that the text of character existed after all, and how well worth preserving for a unique mission in the world, in spite of the idolatrous corruptions that invaded the sanctuaries, the self-pleasing unconcern of the rulers and the pessimistic depredations of the wars.

For the point in the Heb literary history when these scattered Solomonic proverbs were recognized as a homogeneous strain of thought and the compilations were made and recommended as Wisdom, we can do no better, I think, than to name the age of Israel's literary prime, the age of Hezekiah. The "men of Hezekiah" did more than append their supplementary section (chs 25-29); the words "these also" (Ym 25; gam elah) in their heading imply it (see Hezekiah, The Men of).

I apprehend the order and nature of their work some- how thus: Before the form of the final acrostic (see above, II. 2), which may have come to them in two subsections (chs 10-15; 25-29), they put together as the proverbs most closely associated with Solomon, without much attempt at systematizing, subs- tantially as these had accumulated through the ages in the rough order of their developing form and thought; they recorded the search for truth, and then, perhaps, in the past, the body of educational literature which lay nearest at hand, a body adapted especially, though not exclusively, as a kind of instruction manual. This done, there next came to their knowledge a remarkable body of "words of the wise" (22:17-24; 23:12-20), which had evidently been collected in some form suitable for use as a rule for life by the "wise" or "sages" (mosekim) for some persons in responsible position, and which were prefaced by a recommendation of them as "words of truth" designed to promote "trust in Jehovah" (22:19-21)—which latter, as we know from Isaiah, was the great civic issue of Hezekiah's time. With this sec- tion naturally goes the little appendix of "sayings of the wise" (24:23-34), added perhaps at about the same time. These two sections, which seem to open the collection to matter beyond the distinctive Solomonic māshâl, are, beyond the rest of the book, in the tone of the introductory section (chs 1-9), which latter, along with the Hezekiah appendix (chs 25-29), largely forms partly as a new composition, partly as incorporating some additional findings (cf for instance the composition of the poem in the sluggard, 6:6-11). Thus, by the addition of this introductory section, the Book of Prov was recognized as a unity, probably with the initial proposition (1:1-67), and launched with such hortatory material as had already, on a smaller scale, been introduced that the "men of Hezekiah" had added. It contains the praise of Wisdom as a human endowment, sharing in the mind and purpose of the Divine (8:22-31); but it has become aware also of the revelatory value of tsāhīyāh (2:7; 3:21; 8:14), or chastened intuition (see above, III. 3), and dares to aspire, in its righteous teachableness, to the intimacy or secret friendship of Jehovah (Yhwh, edhāk, 3:32). All this indicates the holy self-consciousness to which Wisdom has attained.

I see no cogent reason for postponing the sub- stantial completion of the Book of Prov beyond the time of Hezekiah and early Second Kings. Lament, with the final acrostic poem, may be later additions; but their difference in tone and workmanship is just as likely to be due to the fact that they are admitted, in the liberal spirit of the compilers, from foreign stores of wisdom. For spiritual clarity and intensity they do not rise to the height of the native Heb consciousness; and they incline to an artificial structure which suggests that the writer's interest is divided between sincere tsāhīyāh and literary skill. For the rest of the matter of something may be forgiven.

It is too early in the history of Wisdom to regard this Book of Prov as an articulated and coordinated system. It is merely what it purports to be, a col-
3. Its Stage of Progression—The strain of life, and not assuming the ordinaryWisdom reason. As such, it has a vocabulary and range of ideas of its own, which distinguishes it from other strands of literature. This is seen in those passages outside of the Book of Prov which deliberately assume, for some specific purpose, the Wisdom dialect. In Isa 28:23–29, the prophet, whom the perverse rulers have taunted with baby-talk (vs 9.10), appeals to them with the characteristic Wisdom call to attention (ver 23), and in illustrations drawn from husbandry proves to them that this also is from Jeh of hosts, 'who is transcendent in counsel, preeminent in tashqiyh' (ver 29)—teaching them thus in their own vaunted idiom. In Mic 6:9-15, similarly, calling in tashqiyh to explain the prophecy ("in voice of Jeh," הַר יָהָ¹, יָהָ¹ הָרֶפֶת הָרֶפֶת, וּתָשְׁקִי ה, 6:9), the prophet speaks of the natural disasters that men ought to deduce from their abuse of trade relations, evidently appealing to them in their own favorite strain of thinking. Both these passages seem to reflect a time when the Wisdom dialect was prevalent and popular, and both are concerned to call in sound human intuition as an ally of prophecy. At the same time, as prophets have the right to do, they labor to give revelation the casting vote; the authentic disclosure of truth from Jeh is their objective, not the mere luxury of making clever observations on practical life. All this coincides, in the Wisdom sphere, with what in Isaiah's and Micah's time was the supreme issue of state, namely trust in Jeh, rather than in crooked human devices (cf Isa 28:16; 29:15); and it is noteworthy that this is the venture of Wisdom urged by the editors of Prov in their introductory exhortations (cf 22:19; 3:5–8). In other words, these editors are concerned with inducing a spiritual attitude; and so in their literary strain they make their book an adjunct in the movement toward spirituality which Isaiah is laboring to promote. As yet, however, its findings are still in the periphrastic stage, stated as absolute and unqualified truths; it has not reached the sober testing of fact and interrogation of motive which it must encounter in order to become a seasoned philosophy of life. Its main pervading thesis—that righteousness in the fear of God is wisdom and bound for success, that wickedness is fatuity and bound for destruction—is eternally sound; but it must make itself good in a world where so many of the enterprises of life seem to come out the other way, and where there is so little appreciation of spiritual values. Nor is the time of testing and rigid testing long in coming. Two psalms of this period (as I apprehend) (Ps 73 and 49) concern themselves with the anomaly of the successes of the wicked and the trials of the righteous; the latter pointedly adopting the Wisdom or مَعْذَب style of utterance (Ps 49:5.4), both laboring to induce a more inward and spiritual attitude toward the problem. It remains, however, for the Book of Job to take the momentous forward step of setting wisdom on the unshakable foundation of spiritual integrity, which it does by subjecting its findings to the rigid test of fact and its motives to a drastic Socratic refutation; and this in the Book of Job, followed later by the Book of Ecc, that the Wisdom strain of literature, initiated by the Proverbs of Solomon, finds its OT culmination. "Providence is the most comprehensive term in the language of theology. It is the background of all the several departments of religious truth, a background mysterious in its commanding brightness and darkness. It penetrates and fills the whole compass of the relations of man, and makes the unseen with the visible creation, and the visible creation with the work of redemption, and redemption with personal salvation, and personal salvation with the life of all things. It carries our thoughts back to the supreme purpose which was in the beginning with God, and forward to the foreseen end and consummation of all things, while it includes between these the whole infinite variety of the dealings of Providence as it is set forth by Christ and the apostles.

II. Different Spheres of Providential Activity Distinguished.—The created universe may be conveniently divided, with reference to Divine providence, into three departments: first, the inanimate or physical universe, which is considered or governed by God according to certain uniform principles called the laws of Nature; secondly, animate existence, embracing the vegetable and animal world, over which God exercises that providential care which is necessary to sustain the life that He created; and thirdly, the rational world, composed of beings who, in addition to animate life, are possessed of reason and moral free agency, and are governed by God, not necessarily, but through an appeal to reason, having the power to obey or disobey the laws of God according to the decision of their own free wills. This wise paternal care and supervision which God exercises over His created universe is commonly designated as His general providence, which embraces alike the evil and the good, in addition to which there is a more special and particular providence which He exercises over and in behalf of the good, those whose wills are in harmony with the Divine will.

III. Biblical Presentation of the Doctrine of Providence.—The word "providence" is used only once in the Septuagint, rendered by the Gr. θησαυρός, and it refers, not to God, but to the treasures or riches of man, in which sense it is now seldom used. (See also Rom 13 14, where the same Gr word is tr4 "provision.") While, however, the Bib. use of the word calls for little consideration, the doctrine indicated by the term "providence" is one of the most significant in the Christian system, and is either distinctly stated or plainly assumed by every Bib. writer. The OT Scriptures are best understood when interpreted as a progressive revelation of God's plan for the future. The ancient Messianic expectations pervade the entire life and lit. of the Heb people, and the entire OT dispensation may not improperly be regarded as the moral training and providential preparation of the world, and an opening of the eyes of the Gentile world. In the apocryphal "Book of Wisdom" the word "providence" is twice used (14 3; 17 2) in reference to God's government of the world. Rabbinical Judaism, according to Jos, was much occupied with discussing the relation of Divine providence to human free will. The Sadducees, he tells us, held an extreme view of human freedom, while the Essenes were believers in absolute fate; the Pharisees, avoiding these extremes, believed in both the overriding providence of God and the responsibility of man (Ant, XIII, v, 9; XVIII, i, 3; BJ, II, viii, 14). See PHARISEES. The NT begins with the announcement that the "kingdom of heaven is at hand," which declaration carries along with it the idea of a providential purpose in the coming of the Messias and responsibility of man (Ant, XIII, v, 9; XVIII, i, 3; BJ, II, viii, 14). See PHARISEES.
through these that He does His greatest work, but through an Abraham, a Joseph, a Moses, an Isaiah, through men of lofty moral character. And this is one of the most notable lessons of OT history if it be studied as a revelation of God's providential methods and instrumentality. Among these histories of greatness there is given clearer and stronger expression to God's providential relation to the physical world as its preserver and to the moral world as its Divine Governor than the author of Nehemiah. "Thou, even thou, art Lord alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all that are therein, the seas, and all that is therein, and thou preservest them all,. . . Yet thou in thy manifold mercies forsookest them not in the wilderness; the pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither of fire by night, to shew them light, and the way wherein they should go. Thou gavest also thy good spirit to instruct them" (9 6.19.20 AV). His words reflect the views that were entertained by all the OT historians as to God's interest in the government and guidance of the nation. Heb history, because of the Divine promises and Divine providence, is ever moving forward toward the Messianic goal.

(3) The Psalms.—The poets are among the world's greatest teachers, and the theology of the best poets generally represents the highest and purest faith that is found among a people. Applying this truth to the Heb race, we may say that in the Ps and the Book of Job we reach the highest note of God's providence as seen in the Ps to the doctrine of Divine providence. The Psalmist's God is not only the Creator and Preserver of all things, but is a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God, a being so full of tender mercy and loving-kindness that He is not to fail in being, in the words of the poet: "The God whom Christ taught us to call "Our Father." Nowhere else in the entire Scriptures, except in the Sermon on the Mount, can we find such a full and clear exhibition of the minute and special providence of God over His faithful and believing children as in the Ps—notably such as Ps 91, 103, 104 and 139. Ps 106 traces God's hand in providential and gracious guidance through every stage of Israel's wondrous history. Thanksgiving and praise for past blessings and blessings undiminished in Ps 104, 86, 112, 152. While the relation of God's power and providence to the physical universe and to the material and temporal blessings of life is constantly asserted in the Ps, yet it is the connective side of spiritual nature, with righteousness and faith and love, that marks the highest characteristic of the Psalmist's revelation of the doctrine of providence.

That righteousness and obedience are necessary conditions and accomplishments of Divine providence in its moral aspects and results is evidenced by numerous declarations of the psalmists (1 6; 31 19.20; 74 12; 84 11; 91 1; 125 2). This thought finds happiest expression in Ps 37 23 AV: "The steps of a good man are ordered of the Lord, and he delighteth in his way." The inspired poets make it plain that the purpose of Divine providence is not merely to meet temporal wants and bring earthly blessings, but to secure the moral good of individuals and nations.

(4) The Wisdom Literature.—The doctrine of providence finds ample and varied expression in the Wisdom Lit. of the OT, notably in the Book of Prov. The power that preserves and governs and guides is also recognized as inseparable from the moral creation and human providence (Prov 3 21; 16 4). Divine providence does not work independently of man's free will; providential blessings are conditioned on character and conduct (Prov 26 10 AV; 2 7.8; 12 2.21). There cannot be, in OT terms of faith, any stronger statement of the doctrine of Divine providence than that given by the Wise Men of Israel in the following utterances recorded in the Book of Prov: "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths" (3 6): "A man's heart is directed this way and that by Jeh" (16 9): "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of Jeh" (16 33): "A man's goings are of Jeh" (20 24): "The king's heart is in the hand of Jeh as the watercourses: he turneth it whithersoever he will" (21 1): "The horse is prepared against the day of battle: but safety is of Jeh" (3 21-26; 12 2.21). The conception of providence that is presented in the Book of Eccl seems to reflect the views of one who had had experience in sin and had come into close contact with many of life's ills. All things have their appointed time, but the realization of the providential purposes and ends of creation's existence is, wherever human free agency is involved, always conditioned upon man's exercise of his free will. The God of providence rules and overrules, but He does not by His presence overpower and override man's true freedom. Things that are do not reflect God's perfect providence, but rather His providence as affected by human free agency and as marred by man's sin (Eccl 3 11). There is nothing better for them, than to rejoice and to do good so long as they live. And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy good in all his labor, is the gift of God" (vs 13; see also ver 14): "The righteous, and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of Jehovah" (9 1); "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong" (9 11). The same conclusion that the author of Eccl reached as to how human life is affected by Divine providence and man's sin has found expression in the oft-quoted lines of the great poet:

"There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hewn how we will.

(5) The Book of Job.—The greatest of all the inspired contributions to the Wisdom Lit. of the OT, the Book of Job, demands special consideration. It is the one book in the Bible that is devoted wholly to the doctrine of Divine providence. The perplexities of a thoughtless mind on the subject of Divine providence and its relation to human suffering have nowhere in the literature of the world found stronger and clearer expression than in this great inspired drama. The first of the father of all men's history and marvelous hero, Job. Job represents not only a great sufferer, but an honest doubter: he dared to doubt the theology of his day, a theology which he had himself doubtless believed until experience, the best of all teachers, taught him its utter inadequacy to explain the deepest problems of human life and of Divine providence. The purpose of this book in the inspired volume seems to be to correct the prevailing theology of the day with regard to the subject of sin and suffering in this world. Job is a parable of God and His grace, and a parable of man's sin. There is no more deplorable and hurtful error that a false theology could teach than that all suffering in this world is a proof of sin and a measure of one's guilt (see ATTRIBUTION). It is hard enough for the innocent to suffer. To add to their suffering by teaching them that it is all their own sinners, even though their hearts assure them that they are not, is to lay upon the innocent a burden too grievous to be borne. The value in the inspired Canon of a book written to reveal the error of such a theology is that it is easily be overestimated. The invaluable contribution which this book makes to the Bib. doctrine of providence is to be found, not in individual and detached sayings, striking and suggestive as some of these may be, but rather in the book as a whole. Statements concerning God's general providence abound in this inspired drama—such as these, for example: "The prophets that cannot find the hand of Jehovah, who hath wrought this, in whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind?" (Job 12:10); "Who hast given him a charge over the earth? or who hast disposed the whole world? He shall break in pieces mighty men without number, and set others in their stead" (34:13-24 AV).

But the special contribution of the Book of Job to the doctrine of Divine providence, as already indicated, is to set forth its connection with the fact of sin and suffering. Perplexed souls in all ages have been asking: If God be all-powerful and all-good, why should there be any suffering in a world which He created and over which He rules? If He cannot prevent suffering, is He omnipotent? If He can, but will not prevent suffering, is He infinitely good? Does the book solve the mystery? We cannot claim that it does. But it does vindicate the character of God, the Creator, and of Job, the moral free agent under trial. It does show the power and might of Israel's God in the moral arena, and the free agents that are forming character; it does show that perfect moral character is made, not by Divine omnipotence, but by trial, and that physical suffering serves a moral end in God's providential government of men and nations. While the book does not clear the problem of mystery, it does show how on the dark background of a suffering world the luminous holiness of Divine and human character may be revealed. The picture of this suffering man of Uz speaks with frightful plainness and power of the ill-spoken words of well-meaning friends, planting himself on the solid rock of his own conscious rectitude, and defying earth and hell to prove him guilty of wrong, and knowing that his Vindicator liveth and would come to his rescue—that is an inspired picture that will make every innocent sufferer who reads it stronger until the end of time. See also Job, Book of.

(6) The prophetic writings.—Nowhere in all literature is the existence and supremacy of a moral and providential order in His universe more clearly recognized than in the writings of the OT prophets. These writings are best understood when interpreted as the moral messages and passionate appeals of men who were not only prophets and preachers of righteousness, but also the students, critics, and teachers of the moral philosophy of history for all time, seers, men of vision, who interpreted all events in the light of their bearing on this moral and providential order, in which Divine order the Israelitish nation had no small part, and over which Israel's God was sovereign, doing "according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of earth." While each prophetic message takes its coloring from the political, social and moral conditions that called it forth, and therefore differs from every other message, the prophets are all one in their insistence upon the supremacy and Divine authority of this moral order, and in their looking forward to the coming of the Messiah and the setting up of the Messianic kingdom as the providential consummation of the moral order. They all describe in varying degrees of light and shade a coming time when One born of their own oppression and down-trodden race should come in power and glory, and set up a kingdom of righteousness and love, over the earth, into which all kings and all nations shall be ultimately gathered; and of His kingdom there shall be no end. God's providential government of the nation was always and everywhere directed toward this Messianic goal. The language which an inspired writer puts into the mouth of Nebuchadnezzar, the heathen king, is an expression, not so much of the gentle conception of God and His government, as it is of the faith of a Hebrew prophet in the nearness and nearness of Divine government and the future of His people, and of His favoritism, but are inseparably connected with righteous conduct and holy character. The blessings promised are mainly spiritual, but whether spiritual or material, they are always conditioned on righteousness. The Book of Isa is esp. rich in passages that emphasize the place of moral conduct and character in God's providential government of the world, the supreme purpose and end of which are to establish a kingdom of righteousness in the earth (Isa 34:13-16; 35:1-8; 43:2; 46:4; 54:14-17). Divine providence is both personal and national, and of each it is declared in varying terms of assurance that "Jehovah will go before you; and the God of Israel will be your rearward" (Exod. 16:7). The major and minor prophets confirm and reinforce the teachings of this greatest and most truly representative of all the OT prophets.

(1) The Synoptic Gospels.—The Synoptic Gospels furnish the richest possible materials for a study of the doctrine of Divine providence. 2. Divine They recognize in the advent of Christ—Divine providence the fulfillment of a long line of Messianic prophecies and the culmination of providential purposes and prophecies that had been in the Divine mind from the beginning and awaited the fulness of time for their revelation in the Incarnation (Mt 1:22; 2:15; 3:3). In His private and personal life of service and prayer Christ is a model of filial trust in the providence of the heavenly Father (Mt 11:25; 26:39; Mk 1:35; 6:46; Lk 3:21; 11:1). His private and public utterances abound in declarations concerning God's ever-watchful and loving care for all His creatures, but above all for those creatures who bear His image: "You are the children of the King of the universe!" Wherein the King- providence of God reveal a Divine providential plan for the world's redemption and education extending of necessity far into the future; and still beyond that, in His vision of Divine providence, comes a day of final purpose and reward, and reward, followed by a new and eternal order of things, in which the destiny of every man will be determined by his conduct and character in this present life (see Our Lord's parables concerning the Kingdom: Mt 13:24-40; Mk 4:24-41; Lk 14:16ff; also Mt 24 and 25). The many familiar utterances of Our Lord, found in the Synoptic Gospels, contain the most essential and precious of all the NT revelations concerning the providence of the heavenly Father (Mt 6:5-18; 26:35-40; 10:29-31; Lk 21:16-18).

(2) The Johannine writings.—St. John's Gospel differs from the Synoptic Gospels in its mode of presenting the doctrine of providence chiefly in that it goes back to the mind and purpose of God in the very beginning (Jn 1:1-5), whereas the Synoptic Gospels simply go back to the Messianic prophecies of the OT. Both the Gospel and the Epp. of John in their presentation of Divine providence place the greatest possible emphasis on the moral side of filial trust, the latter rising in many places to the point of positive assurance. The Book of Rev is a prophetical vision, in apocalyptic form, of God's providential purpose for the future, dealing not so much with individuals as with nations and with the far-reaching movements of history extending through the centuries. God is revealed in St. John's writings, not as an omnipotent and arbitrary Sovereign, but as an all-loving Father, who not only cares for His children in this life but is building for them a New Heaven and a New Earth to come a house of many mansions (Jn 14:1-20).

(3) The Book of Acts and other NT history.—The historical portions of the NT, as contained in the Acts, and elsewhere, while not eliminating or depreciating the element of human freedom in individuals and nations, yet recognize in human life and history the ever-present and all-controlling mind of that God in whom, it is declared, "we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts 17:28). The career of the first distinctive NT character begins with these words: "There came a man, sent from God, whose name was John" (Jn 1:6). But not only John, the forerunner, but every other individual, according to the NT conceptions, is a man "sent from God." The apostles conceive themselves to be such; Stephen, the martyr, was such; Paul was such (Acts 22:21). NT biography is a study in providentially guided lives, not omitting references to those who refuse to be so guided—for such there are in the human race, among whom are "sons from God" refuse to go upon their Divinely appointed mission. The Day of Pentecost is the revelation of a new power in history—a revelation of the place and power which the Divine-human Christ and the Holy Spirit are to have henceforth in making history—in making the character of the men and the nations whose deeds are to make history. The most potent moral force in history is to be, from the day of Pentecost on, the ascended Incarnate Christ, and He is to be all the more influenceful as the end of the age draws near. That Divine work shall be done through the Holy Spirit. This is the historical view of providence as connected with the person of Christ, which the NT historians present, and which we, after 19 centuries of Christian history, are warranted in holding more confidently and firmly even than the Christians of the 1st cent. could hold it; for the Christian centuries have proved it true. What God is in Nature Christ is in history. All history is becoming Christian history. This is the NT conception of Divine providence in and through Christ.

(4) The Pauline writings.—No character of whom we have any account in Christian literature was providentially prepared for his life-work and providentially employed in illustrating that life-work more truly than was the apostle Paul. We find, therefore, as we would antecedently expect, that Paul's speeches and writings abound in proofs of his absolute faith in the ever-present providence of an all-wise God. His doctrine of predestination and forordination is best understood when interpreted, not as a Divine power predetermining human destiny and nullifying the human will, but as a conception of Divine providence as the eternal purpose of God to accomplish an end contemplated by Him and foreseen from the beginning, viz. the redemption of the world and the creation in and through Christ of a new and holy humanity. Every one of the Pauline Epistles bears witness to the author's faith in a Divine providence that overrules and guides the life of every soul that works in harmony with the Divine will; but this providence is working to secure as its chief end, not material and temporal blessings, but the moral and spiritual good of those concerned. Paul's teaching concerning Divine providence, if it concerns individuals, is contained in the Epistles on character may be found summed up in what is perhaps the most comprehensive single sentence concerning providence that was ever written: "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose" (Rom 8:28 AV). Any true exposition of the NT doctrine of Divine providence that may be given can only be an unfolding of the content of this brief but comprehensive statement. The great theme that to the Rom, is a study in the divine philosophy of history, a revelation of God's providential purpose and plan concerning the salvation, not merely of individuals, but of the nations. These purposes, as Paul views them, whether they concern individuals or the entire race, are always associated with the mediatorial ministry of Christ: "For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things. To him be the glory for ever" (Rom 11:36).

(5) The Petrine Epistles and other NT writings.—The Ep. of Peter, James, and Jude, and the Ep. to the Hebrews, are all in entire accord with the teachings of the other NT writings already considered. St. Peter, who at first found it so hard to see how God's providential purpose in and for the Messiah could be realized if Christ should suffer and die, came later to see that the power and the glory of Christ and His all-conquering gospel are inseparably connected with the sufferings and death of the Messiah (1 Pet 1:18-21). Concerning God's providence over the righteous can be clearer or stronger than the following utterance of Peter: "The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, And his ears unto their supplication: But the face of the Lord is against them that do evil, And who is he that will harm you, if ye be zealous of that which is good?" (1 Pet 3:12-13). The purpose and end of Divine providence as viewed in the Ep. of Jas are always ethical: as conduct and character are the end and crown of Christian effort, so they are the end and crown in which Divine providence is wrought out by men to make them perfect (Jas 1:7; 2:5; 5:7). The apologetic value of the Ep. to the Hebrews grows out of the strong proof it presents that Christ is the fulfillment, not only of the Messianic prophecies and expectations of Israel, but of the providential purposes and plans of that God who at sundry times and in divers manners had spoken in times past unto the fathers by a long line of prophets (He 1:1-2; 11:7-40; 13:20). It would be difficult to cite a book that presents a more comprehensive study of the lessons of history that illustrate the workings and the retributions of the moral law under Divine providence than is found in the Ep. of Jude (see esp. vs. 5.7.11. 14.15.24).

From this brief survey of the teachings of the OT and NT Scriptures concerning the doctrine of Divine providence, it will be seen that, while the NT reaffirms in most particulars the doctrine of Divine providence as set forth in the OT Scriptures, there are three particulars in which the points of emphasis are changed, and by which new and changed emphasis the doctrine is greatly enriched in the NT.

(1) The fatherhood and love of God in providence. —The God of providence in the OT is regarded as a Sovereign whose will is to be obeyed, and His leading attributes are omnipotence and holiness, whereas in the NT God is revealed as a Father and His providence is set forth as the forethought and care of a father for his children. His leading attributes here are love and holiness—His very omnipotence is the omnipotence of love. To teach that God is not only the invisible and the invisible God and adored, but a tender and loving Father who is ever thinking of and caring for His children, is to make God lovable and turn His providence into an administration of Almighty love.
The place of Christ and the Holy Spirit in providence—The doctrine of providence in the NT is connected with the person of Christ and the administration of the church same in a manner that distinguishes it from the OT presentation of the work of the Lord. One God was there revealed in the simple unity of His prayer, to be answered at it be the case as some theologians have taught, that “God the Father plans, God the Son executes, and God the Holy Ghost directs.” The evidence is that the work exclusively of Christ and the Holy Spirit: but this thought is so strong that it can not be accepted as an accurate statement of Bib. doctrine with reference to Divine providence. Christ constantly refers creating and providing to the Father. But also, “My Father worketh even until now, and I work” (John 5:19). Both the NT and OT, the work both of creation and providence. Thus Paul: “For by him were all things created, that are in heaven and that are on earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist” (Col. 1:16,17 AV). Although this and other passages refer to Christ’s relation to general providence, including the government of the physical universe, yet it is only when the Divine government is concerned with the redemption of a lost world and the establishment of the Kingdom of God in the hearts and lives of men, that the full extent of Christ’s mediatorial work can be realized. The saving and perfecting of men is the supreme purpose of providence, if it be viewed from the NT standpoint, which is both mediatorial and mediatorial in every way.

1. Different views of providence—The NT not only subordinates the material and temporal aspects of providence to the spiritual and eternal more does the OT, but Christ and the apostles, to an extent that finds no parallel in the OT, place the emphasis of teaching concerning providence upon man’s moral needs and eternal interests, and upon the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, the establishment of which in the hearts and lives of men is the one great object for which the NT, the heavenly Father and His children ceaselessly work. To be free from sin, to be holy in heart and useful in life, to love and obey God as a Father, to love and serve men as brothers—this is the ideal and the end for which, according to the NT, men should work and pray, and this is the end toward which God is working by His ceaseless cooperative providence.

IV. Discussion of the Contents of the Biblical Doctrine.—There are four distinct conceptions of providence as it concerns God’s relation to the universe: (1) Theistic or Divine providence, (2) Pantheistic or general providence, (3) Atheistic, or materialism, and (4) Pantheistic or theistic Bib. view. See also God, I. 4. The named views are stated only when stated in contrast and comparison with these opposing views.

1. Atheism, or materialism, stands at one extreme, affirming that there is no God, that the material universe is eternal, and that from material atoms, eternally endowed with certain properties, have come, by a process of evolution, all existing forms of vegetable, animal and rational life. As materialism denies the existence of a personal Creator, it of course denies any and every part of Divine providence.

2. Pantheism stands at the other extreme from atheism, teaching that God is everything and everything is God. The physical universe is “the living garment of God”—God is the soul of the world, the universe His eternal form. Man is an image of God who can express His existence in terms of self-consciousness—J. Thou. H. Providence, according to pantheism, is simply the expression to the personal self differ from materialism only in the name which it gives to the infinite substance from which all things flow. Furthermore, it is taught that God created, and that He created the world, but created things do not need His presence and the mediation of His personal power in order to exist and fulfill their functions. The material universe is placed under immutable law, while man, the rational agent, is left free as he will. God sustains, according to deism, very much the same relation to the universe that the universe has to the maker, does not intervene and correct, and wound it up, he does not interfere with it, and the longer it can run without the maker’s intervention the greater the evidences of wisdom, and skill on the part of the maker. God is an instrument through which the will of a supernatural revelation to man. The only religion that is possible to man is natural religion; he may reason from the physical universe up to the Deity, from God’s existence and its subjective influence; it helps us to answer our own problems, to explain the universe as it is. If the Divine Being is a prayer-seeking, He is at least not a prayer-answering God. The laws of Nature are a test of God’s general providence; but there is no other personal and special providence than this, according to deism. God, the deists affirm, is too great, too distant, too transcendent a Being to concern Himself with the details of creation.

3. Theistic or Biblical conception of providence is not only the Creator but the Preserver of the universe, and that the direct manifestation of the universe, no less than its creation, implies and necessitates at every moment of time an omnipotent and omnipresent personal Being. This world is not “governed by the laws of Nature,” as deism teaches, but it is “governed by God, according to the laws of Nature.” “Law,” in itself, is an imperative, except as it is the expression of a free will or person back of it; “the laws of Nature” are meaningless and impotent, except as they are expressions of the uniform, according to which God preserves and governs the world. It is customary to speak of the laws of Nature as if they were certain self-existent forces or powers governing the world. But shall we not rather say that there is no real cause except that by which the Divine will or created wills? If this be true, then it is inconsistent to say that God has committed the government of the physical universe “secondary causes”—that is, to the laws of Nature—and that these laws are not in the dependent on Him for their efficiency. The omnipresent and ever-active God is the only real force and power and cause in the universe, except as created wills may be true and real causes within their limited bounds. This view of God’s relation to the created universe serves to distinguish the Bib. doctrine of Divine providence from the teachings of materialists and deists, who eliminate entirely the Divine hand from the ongoing of the universe, and in its stead make a god of the “laws of Nature,” and hence have no need for a Divine preserver. Bib. theism makes ample room for the presence of the supernatural and miraculous, but we must not be blind to a danger here, in that it is possible to make too much of the presence of God in the universe (revelation, inspiration, and miracle) as to overlook entirely His equally important and necessary presence in the natural—which would be to encourage a deistical conception of God’s relation to the world and to exaggerate the expense of His immanence. That is the true theistic doctrine of providence which, while not undervaluing the supernatural and miraculous, yet steadfastly maintains that God is none the less present in, and necessary to, what is termed the “natural.”

4. The Divine Immanence.—This idea of God’s essential relation to the continuation of all things in existence is perhaps best expressed by the term “immanence.” Creation emphasizes God’s transcendence, while providence emphasizes His immanence. Pantheism affirms God’s immanence, but denies His transcendence. Deism affirms His transcendence, but denies His immanence. Bib. theism teaches that God is both transcendent and immanent. By the term ‘transcendence,’ when applied to God, is meant that God is not dependent on any person, separate and distinct from Nature and above Nature—“Nature” being used here in its largest signification as including all created things. By the Divine Immanence is meant that God is in Nature as well as over Nature, and that the continuance of Nature is not only and immediately dependent upon Him as the origin of Nature—but, by some, God’s preservation of the created universe is defined as an act of "continuous creation." By the Divine Immanence is meant something more than omnipresence, which term, in itself alone, does not affirm any causal relation between God and the world in which He is present, whereas the term "immanence" does affirm such causal relation. By asserting the Divine Immanence, therefore, as the mode of God's providential efficiency, we affirm that all created things are dependent upon Him for continued existence, that the laws of Nature have no efficiency apart from their Creator and Preserver, that God is to be sought and seen in all forms and phases of creaturely existence, in the natural as well as the supernatural and miraculous, that He is not only omnipresent but always and everywhere active both in the natural and the spiritual world, and that without Him neither the material atom, nor the living organism, nor the rational soul could have any being. He not only created all things, but "by him all things consist," that is, by Him all things are preserved in being.

What, then, let us ask, do the Scriptures teach as to the purpose and end of God's providential work? In so far as this question is an inquiry into the Divine providence, verse, and what the final cause and purpose of God's Providence is—this is a question of supreme thought in the mind of God in establishing this order of things, of which we are a conscious part, was to create a race of beings who should find their highest happiness by being in the highest degree holy, and who should, in proportion as they attain their highest holiness and happiness, thereby in the highest degree glorify their Creator. The Creator's highest glory can be promoted only by such beings as are at once rational, moral, free, holy. There are unconscious, unthinking, unmoral forms of existence, but the motive and meaning of the universe is to be found, not in the lower, the physical and animal, but in the highest, in the rational and moral. They are the objects of His care. For Him the creature is the image of the living creature, an animal for the spiritual and moral. A being whose character is formed under the conditions and laws of intellectual and moral freedom is higher than any being can be that is what it is necessarily, that is, by virtue of conditions over which it has no control. Character that is formed freely under God's government and guidance will glorify the Creator more than anything can which is made to be what it is wholly by Divine omnipotence. These things being true, it follows that God's providence in the world will be directed primarily and ceaselessly toward developing character in free moral agents, toward reducing sin to the minimum and decreasing the probability of holiness, in every way and by every means compatible with perfect moral freedom in the creature.

The possibility of sin in a world of free agents and in a state of probation is unavoidable, but to say that sin is possible does not mean that it is necessary. See Notice: Will. The final cause and end, the purpose and motive, of Divine providence, then, are not the temporal, material and earthly happiness of men, but the highest ultimate moral good of free beings whose highest happiness is their own, and their own happiness is not what means first, their obedience to the holy will of God as their Father, and secondly, loving and self-sacrificing service to their fellow-men. This ever-present and all-dominating moral purpose of Divine providence determines its methods and explains, in part at least, what would otherwise be its mysteries.

With this view of Divine providence as the general trend of Bib, thought is in entire accord. In the light of Christ's revelation of God as a holy and loving Father who regards all men as His children and whose chief concern is to develop holiness and love in those whom He loves, we may define Divine providence as God's infinite power to accomplish the ends of infinite holiness and love. The originating and determining cause of Divine providence is, in the NT conception of it, always to be found in the love of God, while the final cause is the glory of the Father as realized in the holiness and happiness of His children.

By the doctrine of special providence, according to the best use of that term in theological literature, is meant as already indicated, that minute care and ever-watchful supervision which God exercises over His obedient and believing children in tithing, both small and great, which are designed to secure their increasing holiness and usefulness. God's general providence is and does take care of the particular—to the minute details of creaturely existence—and is always everywhere effective. The Scriptures teach that there is a more special care over and ordering of the lives of the spiritually good than pertains to the wicked. God has not the whole man's eyes. The following Scriptures set forth in unmistakable terms the doctrine of a special providence exercised by the heavenly Father over His children: "A man's going is established of Jeh; and he delighteth in his way" (Prov 16:9); "I will guide thee with my eye, even in the paths of the just, to keep thee in the way of thy going, even when ye walk upon every step of it" (Ps 119:19); "My son, attend to my words; incline thine ear unto my sayings. Let them not depart from thine eyes; keep them and they shall be thy life" (Prov 4:20); "For that which is meet for the soul, God shall provide; wherefore shall I fear? For he is my helper" (Ps 22:28); "Be not ye afraid of the terror of the earth, neither of the destruction of the son of man, of a son of the Highest" (Isa 41:10); "For ye are sons of the Highest, whose name is glorious in the earth; because of the multitude of his horses he hath providence for them" (Jer 51:18); "With her seed shall the king rejoice, and with the children of the valley shall she be gloriﬁed" (Mic 6:14).

The following excerpts seem to be plainly involved in any statement of the doctrine of special providence thus far given, and are a few of the passages from the Scriptures:

(1) Spiritual, not material, good to man the end sought in special providence—A mistaken and hurtful notion has long been prevalent to the effect that special providence is designed to secure the secular and earthly good, the material and temporary prosperity, of God's children. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Material blessings may indeed come as a special providence to the child of God (Mt 6:31), but that "good" which all things work together for their good, that is spiritual, good, and not financial, or social, or intellectual, or temporal good, except a special, ultimate spiritual good. Indeed, God's special providence may take away wealth and bring poverty in its stead in order to impaire the matter of temporal good. fortress is not the world's only hopes and ambitions; may make living sickness rather than health, and even death instead of life—for sometimes a Christian is more exemplified by sickness or death than by health or continued life—and when that is the case, his suffering is to be interpreted as a special providence. Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. Many of the OT promises do, it is true, seem to have special reference to material and temporal blessings, but we should remember that the best interpretation of these is to be found in the NT, where they are (as, for example, when quoted by Christ in the Temptation) interpreted as not in this world, but in the kingdom to come. When Our Lord speaks of the very hairs of our heads being numbered, and declares that if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without the Father's notice, surely, we, who are of more value than many sparrows, cannot drift beyond His love and care, He is interpreting us teaching that God will save us from physical suffering and death; but such is not His meaning, for in the very same context He speaks of how by whom to whom He thus pledges His love and care shall be persecuted and separated for His sake, and how in the end He will be put to death; and yet His promise was true. God was with them in their physical suffering, and did not leave the great blessing wherewith He blessed them was not physical, but moral and spiritual.

(2) Special providence and "accidents."—Another still more mistaken and hurtful notion concerning special providence is the association of it with, and the limitation of it largely to, "accidents." Such are called "casual and occasional occurrences which involve more than ordinary danger to one doing his duty;" or "special providence associates it with a happy escape from visible dangers and serious injury, as when the house catches on fire, or the horses run away, or the train is wrecked, or the ship encounters an awful storm, or one encounters a contagious disease or the terrorizing pestilence that walketh in darkness. A happy escape from injury or from death is popularly designated as a "special providence," and this regardless of whether the individual thus escaping is a saint or a sinner, strongly emphasizes the fact that God's special providence is not a capricious, occasional, and irregular intervention of His love and power in behalf of His children. It involves ceaseless, yet infrequent, thought and care for those that love Him, everywhere and in every experience of life.

(3) Special providence as related to pittance and prayer.—

God's special providence is conditioned upon pittance and prayer. It does not happen that we are to receive special provisions without providing for our temporal and physical wants by the loving heavenly Father. Therefore take no thought saying, Wherewithal shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? For your Heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.

"Make you His service your delight; Your wants shall be His care."

But while it is true that God has promised to make our wants His care, and remember us, He has promised this only to that devout and godly number of pious, praying souls who "seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." As the prayer problem emphasizes the main object and provision for all our temporal and physical wants by the loving heavenly Father, so the poem has written:

(4) Special providence as related to human cooperation.—

"The work of God to be done by

The problem of Divine providence has its utmost significance, not in its bearing on the laws of physical nature, but in that phase of it which concerns God's dealings with moral agents, those creatures who are capable of voluntary action. The problem of divine providence presents itself as a question of the relation of God's rulings to the free wills of men. Will God governs men as a father governs his children, as a king governs his free subjects; not as a machinist works his machine, or as a hypnotist controls his mesmerized victims. A father in his family and a sovereign in his realm may each do as he pleases within certain limits, and God infinitely more: "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand or say unto him, What doest thou?" (Dn 4:35). He setteth up one and putteth down another. Nevertheless, even God acts within limits; He limited Himself when He created free agents. As a mere matter of power God could determine men's volitions and necessitate his acts, but He can do so only by making of him a kind of rational machine, and destroying his true freedom. But Scripture, reason and consciousness all unite in teaching man that he is morally free, that he is an agent, and not something merely acted on. God's providential government of men, therefore, is based on their freedom as rational and moral beings, and consists in such an administration and guidance by the Holy Spirit of the affairs of men as shall ensure free moral agents to virtue, and discourage them from sin. God's providence must needs work upon and with two kinds of wills—willing wills and opposing wills.

(1) Divine providence as related to willing wills.—The apostle declares that God works in believers "both to will and to do of his good pleasure." If God's special providence over and in behalf of His children may involve an intervention of His Divine power in the course of physical law, much more would it seem, will it involve a similar intervention with His children, so realm and the human will. Spiritual guidance is one of the most precious privileges of believers, but it is difficult to conceive how the Holy Spirit can guide a believer without finding some way of controlling his will and determining his volitions. It is impossible without free agency. While many of man's thoughts, emotions and volitions are self-determined in their origin, being due to his indwelling Deity's divine life, soul and heart and will, yet there are also thoughts, emotions and volitions that are Divinely produced. Even a single act of sin has its origins in rights and emotions that are produced by the Holy Ghost. Much more abundant is that which is produced through thought and feeling, and if Divinely produced thoughts and feelings, there may be, in like manner, it would seem, Divinely produced volitions. Is it Divinely produced thought and feeling with the fact of moral free agency? We think not; it is too much subversive of our system to have a man influenced by the thought and volitions of another human being. The element of necessity and compulsion would destroy all true freedom in, and moral accountability for, any prac- tices done, or that which is voluntary in virtue or vicious. But—and here is the crucial point—when a man, by an act of his own will, freely commits the ordaining of his life to God, and ascribes it as best, working in him both to will and to do, that act of self-commitment to God involves the very essence of moral freedom, and is the highest exercise of free agency. "Our wills are ours to make them Thine, the poet has truly said. In other words, the highest moral act of man's will is the surrender of itself to the Divine will, and whatever example of man's will God's part results from and follows the free act of self- surrender is entirely consistent with perfect moral freedom, even though it should involve Divinely produced volitions. Does a perplexed child cease to be free when his parents decide for him what he shall do and tell him father to decide a matter for him, and be his guide in attaining that desired end? Surely not; and this bondage with guidance and wisdom is not the effective if it should work, as far as possible, through the mind and will of the child, and thereby follow the law of nature to be entirely passive. So God works effectually through the mind and will of every soul who unreservedly commits himself to the Divine will—commits himself not simply, but continually. God cannot under the Divinely assumed law of grace work that which is not through the inner "both to will and to do," because the sinner's will is bent on evil, and hence opposed to the Divine will. God fulfill men's wills, as, God does; a man's will, and a sinner will; and if it should work and necessitate his volitions, that is true freedom. But, if it should work in and through an obedient and acquiescent will that is seeking Divine guidance, that would be an accomplishment in no way incompatible with the true moral freedom of men. Such is the influence, a Divine cause of the Divine upon the human will, in prov- ince. God's providence works effectually only through willing wills.

(2) Divine providence as related to sinful will—
But God's providence encounters as opposing as well wills. Not every unconverted man, however, need be an example of what is called "moral un- cept degrees of opposition. That God's gracious and special providence in behalf of an individual often antedates his foreseeing sin and his acceptance of Christ as a personal Saviour is manifest to every student of Christian history. Many of the best known and most famous among the "chosen vessel" ever receives for his life-work turns out to be the result of personal discipline and preparation with which he was receiving under a Father's guidance before he con- sciously consecrated himself to the Divine Master. "I knew not what I was doing," said God's Apostle, Paul, of his conversion; and on this text Horace Bushnell preached one of his sermons on Divine providence taking as his theme, "Every man's life a plan of God." If this be true of a Christian man, that even before his conversion the Holy Spirit was seeking him, and even preparing him, as far as was then possible, for fulfilling the "plan of God" in his life, it is not in all probability equally true that the Holy Spirit and the good provid- ence of God were working in behalf of other sinners who professed and believed in Christ. Such is the power of moral free agency with which God has en- debled men that the created free agent can detract the plan of Infinite Love concerning his life, and frustrate the workings of providence in his behalf (Jer 15). Voluntary wills may be due to God's providence, or even providential plans to be wrought out for him or, not de- cided upon by him, and yet God influenced. It is said of the Divine Christ that He could not do many mighty works in a certain city because of their unbelief and opposition. In other words, God's providence is conditioned and limited by a sinful free will.

That the Bible writers do not regard the existence of evil as a valid objection to Divine providence is evident to every student of the Scriptures. Indeed, it is in working good out of what the world accounts as evil that Divine providence accomplishes many of its results. "We are more than conquerors through him who loved us" (Rom 8:37), and "all things work together for good to them that love God, and are called according to his purpose" (Rom 8:28). The natural or physical evil (poverty, sickness, suffering, etc.) is one of the mightiest agencies in the hands of God for restraining and correcting moral evil and for working out moral and spiritual good to fallen and sinful man as it can. For the existence of the actual world of moral evil (sin), man, the moral free agent, is wholly responsible. God could prevent moral evil by preventing sinners from sinning by not placing them under the moral law and the curse of it. But the latter method of controlling them would virtually destroy their real and true freedom; and if this were done, then man's voluntary viciousness and vices as attributes of free beings would be thereby rendered impossible in men; for only such beings can put forth free holy volitions as can be put forth free sinful volitions. If man had never sinned, there would probably have never been such a large providential use of natural or physical evil as at present prevails; and this because of the fact that an unfallen and holy race of beings would not have needed the presence of natural evil to secure their highest moral development. But if God did not want to bring it back to God and to develop holy character and the highest moral service. It is not true that sin is now always or even generally the immediate cause of an individual's sinning, but rather, the principle and secondary source is a proof of extraordinary sin.

"Master, who did sin," asked the disciples, "this man, or his parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God might be made manifest in him" (John 9:2-3 AV). Human suffering is for man's spiritual good and for the Divine glory, as shown in working good out of evil—this is the explanation which the Master gives as to why natural evil is permitted or sent by God. It is not only a powerful, but, in a world like ours, a necessary agency for the correction and cure of moral evil and for the spiritual development of fallen man. "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now I observe thy word. It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I may learn thy statutes (Ps 119:67,71); "Every branch that beareth fruit, he cleanseth it, that it may bear more fruit" (John 15:2). The saintly and eminently useful men and women of history have, as a rule, had to undergo a severe testing in life and been tried and tried, and were made perfect only by their sufferings. Divine providence thus turns much of the world's natural and physical evil into moral good.

Many of the things that befal the children of God are directly due to the sins of other men. That good men, even the very best of man, suffer many things at the hands of wicked men admits of no question; and yet these are among the "all things" which are declared by the apostle to work together for good to them that love God. The good that may ensue to good men from the evil conduct of the wicked is certainly not due to the internal power in sin to work good to those against whom it is maliciously directed; it can only be due to God's grace after God has wrought it. The good of the innocent, "As for you," said Joseph, "ye meant evil against me; but God meant it for good" (Gen 50:20). The thing which seemed evil to the child, said Paul, "have fallen out; rather unto the progress of the gospel" (Phi 1:12). God, though foreknowing that evil that wicked men are planning to work against His children, may not prevent it; and this because He can and will overrule it for His glory and for their good, if they abide faithful. But, suppose a good man is not simply injured, but, as the result of the wickedness of the martyrs that died at the stake—does the principle still hold good? It does, we answer; the saint who dies in the discharge of duty and his sacrifice is not only assured, by all the promises of revelation, of a happy immortality in being with the good of the martyrs the seed of the church? But we need here again to remark that it is not material and temporal sacrifices, or spiritual gifts, that God has guaranteed to His holy, loving and faithful children. If sin had an intrinsic power to work good, they would be right who maintain that "the facts" and principles are, and once may do evil when good will come of it" (Rom 3:8); and also right who maintain in God's providence, that the author of evil, seeing that evil is, on that supposition, only disguised good—propositions which are thoroughly vindicated and established by all that is good in man or God. The Scriptures, rightly interpreted, nowhere lend themselves to establish the doctrine of universalism (Rev 4:5).

7. Interpreting Providence

To what extent may we, having studied God's providential methods as revealed in the Scriptures, in Nature, in History, and in personal experience, venture to interpret providence as applicable to our own lives and the lives of others? Experience and observation will warn us both against haste and against too great confidence in our interpretations of providence. Hasty interpretations of providence in its present passing events frequently become fruitful sources of distraction for the future. Some people are much given to interpreting providence. Certain ills or fortunes come to a bad man; they are quick to assent that it is a Divine judgment sent upon him in view of his sin. Certain blessings come to a good man; they are quick to bless the heavenly sender—sent in view of his extraordinary pietie. A whiskey merchant's store burns down: it is, say they, a Divine judgment, in view of his ill-gotten gains. But presently the property of an unquestionably pious and conscientious man is swept away by a fire; who now is the providence? The "oracles" fail to explain; and cause much perplexity in every capable soul: as, for example, when two men, a saint and a sinner, are prostrated on beds of sickness. The former, in spite of prayer and medicine, is restored to good health; the latter, worse, and much longer, dies. Who, then, the other, without prayer or prayer, is restored to health. God has not furnished us with means of applying His providence, except for ourselves; and even much of that which we sincerely believe comes to us in a graciously providential manner we can well afford to believe as a sacred secret between ourselves and our God, seeing that God has not furnished us with any means of absolutely proving that what has happened to us might not have happened, under similar circumstances, even to sinful men. Many a Christian who at first saw that his providence has happened to him—because of the property, the terrible sick of sickness, and the like things that, at first sight, he would not interpret as providential—are among the best things that were ever sent upon him, in that they made him holier and more useful (cf. Jts 17).

"Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan His work in vain;
And He will make it plain."

There are, however, many evident truths "written" large on the pages of history; and the Father of Jesus Christ, who has learned the lessons of the world, and the Father of Faith, who will duly consider all the facts and lessons of life, in himself and others, in individual, and in collective life, will correctly interpret patiently as the years come and go, it will be made plain that: "God's in His heaven—All's right with the world, and all that's right will come together for the good of the children of those who love God and who prove their love for Him by serving their fellow-men."

We conclude, then, that there is, according to the Scriptures, an ever-watching providence exercised by the heavenly Father over His faithful and loving children, which is ceaselessly working to secure their ever-increasing holiness and usefulness here, and their perfect happiness in a future state of existence. To prepare rational and immortal free agents through holiness and usefulness here for happiness hereafter is the aim and end of all embracing providence of God, which includes within its loving care every human being except such as are cut off through their own wilful and persistent sinning. There is no providential highway to a state here that is free from life's ills, and that abounds in temporal and earthly blessings to the good. But there is a royal and holy highway, along which moves a providential pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, leading the children of the covenant, through lives of loving service and sacrifice, to a holy land of promise, the goal of a gracious providence; and who they journey along this highway for this end: "The Lord knoweth the way that they are: And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity" (2 Tim 2:19 AV). They who bear this seal are the Divinely chosen instruments and agents of that larger and wider providence that is ever working to perfect kingdom of righteousness in the whole earth, that kingdom of God, to inaugurate which, in its Messianic form, Our Lord became incarnate, to consummate which, in its final and perfect form, He reigns from heaven and will continue to reign until, having put all enemies under his feet," He shall "deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father"—when the poet's vision shall be realized of "That God who ever lives and loves:
One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off Divine event,
To which the whole creation moves."

Province (provincia) did not originally denote a territorial circumscription of the Roman state, but rather what was much more.

1. Meaning more ancient than any of the core of the term contexts of the Romans outside of Italy.

In the most comprehensive official sense it signified a magistrate's sphere of administrative action, which in one instance might be the direction of jurisdiction at Rome, in another the management of military operations against a particular hostile community. When the imperium was conferred upon two consuls at the beginning of the Republic, and upon a praetor in 367 BC, and finally upon a second praetor in 241 BC, it became necessary in practice to define their individual competence which was unlimited in theory. When the Romans extended their control over lands situated outside of Italy, it became expedient to fix territorial limits to the exercise of authority by the magistrates who were regularly sent abroad, so that provincia signified hencetherein an abstract sense the rule of the governor, and in a concrete sense the specified region entrusted to his care; and with the development and consolidation of the Roman system of administration, the geographical meaning of the word became more and more significant.

The history of Roman provincial administration in the more definitive sense commences in 227 BC, when four praetors were elected for the first time, of whom two were assigned to the government of
The provinces. Three periods may be distinguished in the history of the system of provincial administration: (1) from 227 BC to Sulla, (2) from Sulla to Augustus, and (3) the Provincial Empire.

2. Roman Provincial Administration

(1) First period.—During the first period, that is, from the time of Ptolemy, that is, the government of the provinces by means of special praetors, or, in exceptional circumstances, by consuls, during their term of office. Accordingly, the number of praetors was increased from four in 227 BC to eight at the time of Sulla.

(2) Second period.—In accordance with the reforms of Sulla all the consuls and praetors remained at Rome during their year of office, and were instructed with the administration of provinces a subsequent year with the title procurator (pro consule) or procurator (pro praetore). The provinces were sent to the more important provinces. The senate determined the distinction between consular and praetorian provinces and generally controlled the assignment of the provinces to the ex-magistrates. Julius Caesar increased the praetors to sixteen, but Augustus reduced them to twelve.

(3) Third period.—In 27 BC, Augustus as commander-in-chief of the Roman army definitely assumed the administration of all provinces which required the presence of the imperial forces and left the other provinces to the control of the senate. There were then twelve imperial and ten senatorial provinces, but all provinces added after 27 BC came under imperial administration. The emperor administered through the agency of personal delegates, legati Augusti of senatorial, and praefecti or procuratores of equestrian, rank. The term of their service was not uniform, but continued usually for more than a single year. The senatorial administration was essentially a continuation of the post-Sullan, republican régime. The senatorial governors were called procurators generally, whether they were of consular or praetorian rank; but Africa and Asia alone were reserved for ex-consuls, the eight remaining senatorial provinces being attributed to ex-praetors. The financial administration of each imperial province was entrusted to a procurator, that of each senatorial province to a quaestor.

The provinces were divided into smaller circumscriptions (civitates) for the purposes of local government. In the older provinces these 3. Division districts corresponded generally with the provinces of the urban communities which had been organized on the basis of sovereignty before the advent of the Romans. Under Rom rule they were divided into different classes on the basis of their dignity and prerogatives, as follows:

(1) Coloniæ: Rom or Lat colonies established after the model of the Italian commonwealth.
(2) Civitates foederates: Communities whose independence had been guaranteed by a formal treaty with Rome.
(3) Civitates liberae: Those independent the Romans respected, although not bound to do so by a formal obligation.
(4) Civitates stipulatores: Communities which had surrendered to the discretion of the Romans and to which limited powers of local government were granted by the conquerors as a matter of convenience.

4. Province of Judæa

The provincial régime was re-established in 6 AD, and was broken only during the years 41–44 AD, when Herod Agrippa was granted royal authority over the land (Jos, Ant. XIX, viii, 2). The Rom administration was in the hands of the procurators (see procuratores) who resided at Caesarea (Jos, BJ, II, xxv, 6; Acts 23 23,33; 25 1) in the palace of Herod the Great (Acts 23–35). The procurators of Judæa were subject to the authority of the imperial governors of Syria, as well as by the authority of the procurator at Palæstina. By Vitellius (Jos, Ant, XVIII, iv, 2; Tac. Ann. vi, 32). The procurator was competent to exercise criminal jurisdiction over the provincials in cases involving a capital sentence (Jos, BJ, II, xvii, 1). But in such cases it was bound to be ratified by the Roman citizens for trial at Rome (Acts 25 11). A death sentence by the Sanhedrin required the sanction of the procurator, as appears in the process against the Saviour. Under Rom rule cities like Caesarea, Sebaste, and Jerusalem became organs for local government, like the urban communities in other parts of the Empire.

The revenue of Pal under Claudius is said to have been 12,000,000 denarii (about $2,400,000, or £500,000; cf Jos, Ant, XIX, viii, 2).

5. Revenue It must be remembered that the amount of which is not known, a variety of indirect contributions were collected on auctions, salt, highways, bridges, etc., which constituted, no doubt, the field of activity in which the publicans gained their living.

In 1 Cor 1 19, ARV has "the discerning," ERV retains "prudent." In its etymological sense, ERV beforehand (contraction of "providence"), "prudence" does not occur in the NT. As forethought, foresight, prudent was reckoned one of the cardinal virtues by the ancient ethical writers. See the remarks of Coleridge on its lower and higher character in his Aids to Reflection, Aphor. 29.

LITERATURE

I. Introductory Topics.—The Heb title for the Psalter is sēpher thalithim, "book of praises." When we consider the fact that more than one title has been given with the keynotes, and that there are outbursts of thanksgiving in many others, the fitness of the Heb title dawns upon us. As Ker well says, "The book begins with benediction, and ends with prayer—a Hallelujah to man, and then glory to God." Hymns of praise, though found in all parts of the Psalter, become far more numerous in Books IV and V, as if the volume of praise would gather itself up into a Hallelujah Chorus at the end.

In the Gr version the book is entitled in some MSS Psalmoi, in others Psaltrimia, whence come our Eng. titles "Psalms," and "Psalter." The Gr word psalmoi, as well as the Heb mizmor, both of which are used in the superscriptions prefixed to many of the separate pses, indicates a poem sung to the accompaniment of stringed instruments. The title mizmor is found before 57 pss. The Psalter was the hymnal of the Jewish nation. To individual pss other titles are sometimes prefixed, such as skîr, "song"; thalith, "praise"; t'hillah, "prayer," etc. The Psalter was both prayerbook and nuptial to the Jewish people. It was also a manual for the nurture of the spiritual life in private as well as public worship.

The Ps were placed in the kethâbîm or "Writings," the third group of the Heb Scriptures. As the chief book of the kethâbîm, the Psalter appears first in the great majority of German MSS. Through the Spanish MSS place Ps after Ch, and the Talmut puts Ruth before Ps. There has never been any serious question as to the right of the Psalter to a place in the Canon of Scripture. The book is possibly more highly esteemed among Christians than by the Jews. If Christians were permitted to retain only one book in the OT, they would almost certainly choose Ps. By 190 A.D. a much earlier date than at a much earlier date, the Book of Ps was completed and recognized as part of the Hagiographa, the 3d division of the Heb Bible.

According to the Heb text, followed by modern VSS, there are 150 separate poems in the Psalter. The Gr version has 3 more additional pses besides the 150, in which David describes his victory over Goliath; but this is expressly said to be "outside the number." The LXX, following the "Number," divided Ps into a single ps. On the other hand, they divide Ps 116 and 147 each into two poems.

Thus for the greater part of the Psalter the hebrew enumeration is one number in advance of that in the Gr and Lat Versions.

The existing division in the Heb text has been called in question at various points. Ps 42 and 43 are almost certainly one ps (see refrain). Ps 89, though it is probable that Ps 9 and 10 were originally one, as in LXX. On the other hand, it is thought by some that certain pses were composed of two different poems. We may cite as examples Ps 19 1-6, 7-14; 54 1-6, 7-16; 57 6-7, 11-14; 66 1-27, 28-48. It is evident that such combinations of two different poems into one may have taken place, for we have an example in Ps 48, which is composed of portions of two other pss (57 7-11; 60 5-12).

(1) Value of the superscriptions.—It is the fashion among ancient critics to waive the titles of the ps out of court as wholly worthless and misleading. This method is as though the Hebrew thoroughly unscientific as the older Text procedure of defending the superscriptions as part of an inspired text.

These titles are clearly very old, for the LXX, in the 2d cent. BC, did not understand many of them. The worst that can be said of the superscriptions is that they are guesses of Heb editors and scribes of a period long prior to the Gr version. As to many of the musical and liturgical titles, the best learning of Jews and Christian scholars is unable to recover the original meaning. The scribes who prefixed the titles had no conceivable reason for writing nonsense into their prayerbook and hymnal. These superscriptions and subscriptions all had a worthy meaning, when they were first prefixed to individual pss. This indisputable fact of the great antiquity of these titles ought forever to make it impossible for scientific research to ignore them. Grant, for the sake of argument, that not one of them came from the pen of the writers of the Ps, but only from editors and compilers of exilic or post-exilic days, it would still be reasonable to give attention to the views of ancient Heb scholars, before considering the conjectures of modern critics on questions of authorship and date. Sources of information, both oral and written, to which they had access, have long since perished. In estimating the value of their work, we have a right to use the best critical processes known to us, but it is unscientific to overlook the fact that even a bad copy by the time of the composition of the ps gave them an advantage over the modern scholar. If it be said by objectors that these ancient scribes formed their conclusions by the study of the life of David as portrayed in the history said to be "outside the psalms," the reply is ready that several historical notices in the titles cannot be thus explained. Who was Cush? Who was Abimelech? (Pss 7 and 34). A careful weighing of the facts concerning the superscriptions will make it seem highly improbable that the earliest of these titles does not reach back into preexilic times. We almost certainly have in them the results of the labors of Heb scribes and compilers stretching over several centuries. Some of the titles may have been appended by the psalmists themselves.

We are far from claiming that the titles are always intelligible to us, or that, when understood, they are always correct. The process of constructing titles indicative of authorship had not ceased in the 2d cent. BC, the LXX adding many to ps that were anonymous in the Heb. The view expressed nearly 50 years ago by Perowne is eminently sane: "The inscriptions cannot always be relied on. They are sometimes genuine, and really represent the most ancient tradition. At other times, they are due to the caprice of later editors and collectors, the fruits of conjecture, or of dimmer and more uncertain traditions. In short, the inscriptions of the Ps are like the subscriptions to the Epp. of the NT. They are not of any necessary authority, and their

the superscription stating the authorship and the occasion that gave birth to the ps, while ver 20 hints at the musical instruments with which the ps was to be accompanied in public worship. If now the musical notes be separated from the notes of authorship and date that technical term whose meaning was well known to the precentor and the choir in the temple. The Symmachus and Theodotion generally, render didpsalma, which probably denotes an instrumental interlude.

The Tg Aquila and some other ancient VSS render "forever." Jerome, following Aquila, translates it " always."

Shushan 'edhuth (Ps 60) may be rendered "the lily of testimony." Thirtle represents these titles as subscripts to Others regard them as indicating the melody to which the various pss were to be sung.

to Heman the Ezrahite.
{g) Ps 89 bears the name of Ethan the Ezrahite. In most cases it is plain that the editors meant to indicate the authors or writers of the pss.
It is possible that the phrase "to David" may sometimes have been prefixed to certain pss, merely to indicate that they were found in a collection which contained Davidic pss.
It is also possible that the titles "to Asaph" and "to the sons of Korah" may have originally meant that the pss thus designated belonged to a collection in the custody of these temple singers.
Ps 72 may also be a prayer for Solomon rather than a ps by Solomon.
At the same time, we must acknowledge, in the light of the titles describing the occasion of composition, that the most natural interpretation of the various superscriptions is that they indicate the supposed authors of the various poems to which they are

II. The Authorship and Age of the Ps.-Ps. 90 is ascribed to Moses. It is the fashion now to deny that Moses wrote anything. A careful study of Ps. 90 has brought to light nothing inconsistent with Mosaic authorship. The dignity, majesty and pathos of the poem are worthy of the great lawgiver.

1. David as a new sense of national unity, and king, as the first of religious patriotism. (a) The political and religious reforms of Samuel created a new sense of national unity, and kingship as a symbol of religious duty. (b) Music had a large place in the life of the prophetical guilds or schools of the prophets, and was used in public religious exercises (Is. 5 1). (c) The victories of David and the internal expansion of the life of Israel would inevitably stimulate a new instinct of national unity. The negative poems of the Elizabethan age and the Victorian era in English literature. (d) The removal of the ark to the new capital and the organization of the Levitical choirs would stimulate poets to compose hymns of praise to Jeh (2 S. 6, 1 Ch. 16, 18, 25).

It is the fashion in certain critical circles to blot out the Mosaic era as unhistoric, all accounts of it being considered legendary or mythical. It is easy then to isolate the thought and teaching attributed to Samuel. This leaves David "a rude knave," or, as Cowper says, "a self-sufficient condottiere, chieftain, and king." It would seem more reasonable to accept as trustworthy the united tradition of Israel as to the great leaders, Moses, Samuel, and David, and not to divest Israel's history of the tiny fragments of historical material that are accepted by sceptical critics as credible. It is often said that late writers read into their accounts of early heroes their own ideas of what would be fitting. James Robertson's remark in reply has great weight: "This habit of explaining the early as the backward projection of the late is always liable to the objection that it leaves the late itself without explanation" (Poetry and Religion of the Ps. 332).

(2) David's qualifications for composing psalms.—(a) He was a skillful musician, with a sense of rhythm and an ear for pleasing sounds (1 S. 16 15-23). He seems to have invented new instruments of music (Am. 6 5). (b) He is recognized by critics of all schools as a poet of no mean ability. The greater part of the poetry of the Psalms (2 S. 1 19-27) is commonly accepted; also his lament over Abner (3 31-37). In the elegy over Saul and Jonathan, David displays a magnanimity and tenderness that accord with the representations of S as to his treatment of Saul and of Jonathan. No mere rough border chieftain could have composed a poem full of the tenderest sentiment and the most exemplary attitude toward a persecutor. The moral elevation of the elegy has to be accounted for. If the author was a good judge of men enjoying the friendship of God, it is easy to account for the moral dignity of the poem. Surely it is only a step from the patriotism and magnanimity and devoted friendship of the elegy to the religious fervor of the Ps. Moreover, the poetic skill displayed presses the reasonable objection that literary art in the days of David had not attained a development equal to the composition of poems such as the Ps. There is nothing more beautiful and artistic in the entire Psalter.

Radical critics saw the David of the Bible as a mere poet and moralist, or even a shrewd politician. But the man who could compose with the power of a Psalmist, though willing to believe every statement that reflects upon the moral character of David, they consider the references to David as a writer of hymns and the organization of choirs as the pious imaginings of late chronicles. Robertson well says: "This habit of refusing to admit complexity in the capacities of Biblical characters is characteristic of the late in- saine, when history is so full of instances of the combination in one person of qualities the most diverse. We only think that David, with the partiality of one string, but we have religious leaders who have united the most diverse and opposite qualities in one person, in the manner of a developed, or the practice of any questionable policy. A critic, if he has not a single measure of large enough capacity for the historical character, would like to see himself at liberty to measure him out in two half-quotations, making one man of each; or he might apply another quotation of the Ps. (332). Among kings, Charlemagne and Constantine the Great have been likened to David; and among poets, Robert Burns. The two traits of religious enthusiasm and the best elements in the moral characters of all these gifted men. Of Constantine it has been said that he was "the doleful believer and the cruel despot, devotee and murderer, patron saint and avenging demon." David was a many-sided man, with a character often at war, so that he may be himself, a man with conflicting impulses, the flesh lusting against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh. Men of flesh and blood in the midst of life's temptations have no difficulty in understanding the David of the Bible.

(c) David was a man of deep feeling and of imperial imagination. Think of his love for Jonathan, his grateful appreciation of every exploit done in his behalf, or his mighty, fervent, and dread "Absalom." His successful generalship would argue for imagination, as well as the vivid imagery of the elegy. (d) David was an enthusiastic worshipper of Jeh. All the records of his life agree in representing him as devoted to Israel's religion, an exaltation of life's dangers and disappointments, "David strengthened himself in Jeh his God!" (1 S. 30 6). We should have been surprised had no trace of religious poetry come from his pen. It would be difficult to imagine Milton or Cowper or Tennyson as confining himself to secular poetry. "Comus," "John Gilpin," and the "Charge of the Light Brigade" did not exhaust their genius; nor did the eulogy over Saul and Jonathan and the lament over Abner relieve David's soul of the poetry that clamped for expression. The known facts of his life and times prepare us for an outburst of psalmody under his leadership. (e) The varied experiences through which David passed were of a character to quicken any latent gift for poetic expression.

James Robertson states this argument clearly, and yet with becoming caution: "The vicissitudes and situations in David's life presented in these narratives are of such a nature that, though we do not know precisely that such and such a psalm was composed at such and such a time and place, yet we may feel sure that here is a man who has passed through certain experiences and borne himself in such wise that we are not surprised to see that he is troubled over one thing and the other psalm. It is very doubtful whether we should be able to lay down any rules as to the psalms, and we may say that the poet being like a painter, who, having found a fit landscape, sits down to transfer it to canvas, I do not think it likely that David, finding himself in some great perplexity or sorrow, called for writing materials in order to describe the situation or record his feelings. But I do think it probable that the vicissitudes through which he passed made such an impression on his sensitive heart, and became incorporated with the tenor of his nature, that when he soothed himself in his retirement with his lyre, they came forth spontaneously in the form of a psalm or song or prayer, according as the recollection was sad or joyful, and as his singing mood moved him" (Poetry and Religion of the Ps. 343).

The Bib. writers, both early and late, agree in affirming that the Spirit of Jehovah rested upon David, empowering him for service of the highest order (1 S. 18 13; 2 S. 23 1-3; Mt. 22 43; Acts 2 29-31). The gift of prophetic inspiration was bestowed upon Israel's chief musician and poet.

(3) External evidence for the ascription of psalms.—(a) In the NT David is named as the author of certain psalms. Thus Ps. 110 is ascribed to David by Jesus in His debate with the Pharisees in the Temple (Mt. 22 41-45; Mk. 12 35-37; Lk. 20 41-44). Peter teaches that David prophesied concerning Jesus (Acts 1 16), and he also refers Ps. 18 and 110 to...
We come next to two statements that would settle the question of David's ps. If critics would only accept them as the work of an author living within a generation or so of the time of David. Unfortunately 2 S 21-24 is regarded by most critical scholars as an appendix to the early narrative of David's life and not an agreement as to the exact date of the composition of these chapters. The author of these chapters commits the same error the critic who tries to disintegrate a document, and suspicion of bias is inevitable. If by the disintegration he is able to escape the force of the poem, he is only ascribing it to a different date, as he did to Asaph. Happily, we live in a free country, every man having a right to hold and to express his own opinion, for whatever it may be worth. It seems to the present writer that 2 S 21-24 may well have come from the pen of the early narrator who related the story of David in such a masterly fashion. Even if these chapters were added by a later editor as an allusion to David's efficient reason for putting this writer so late at the exit. His statements cannot be set aside as unreliable, simply because they run counter to the current theory as to the date of the Ps. 2 S 22 purports to give the words of a song which David spoke to Jeh, when he had been delivered from Saul and from all his enemies. Ps 13 is evidently a different recension of the same poem. The differences in the various edd. of "Rock of Ages." Only the most critical is called "Davidic." In fact, this glorious song, 2 S 23 1-7 must not be omitted, for here David claimed prophetic inspiration as the sweet Psalmist of Israel. This original formulation must be the worthy of the brilliant royal bard. 6. The titles of the Ps are external evidence of dating values. 7. The date and authorship of the Ps, and these ascribe 73 to David. A sweeping denial of all the forms of external evidence for Davidic authorship is impossible, by convincing arguments from internal evidence. Unverified conjectures will not answer.

(4) Internal evidence for Davidic ps.—The fact that many of the ps which ascribed to David correspond in tone and manner and in length and theme to incidents in his life, while not in itself convincing proof that David wrote them, certainly reinforces the external evidence in favor of Davidic ps. We must refer the reader to the commentaries of Delitzesch, Kirkpatrick, Perowne and others for the evidence discovered in individual ps. In many ps the evidence is strongly in favor of the superscriptions, in which David is named as the writer. See esp. Ps 15, 23, 2d, 3.

(5) Number of Davidic ps.—Opinion varies among conservative scholars all the way from 3 to 4 or 44 or 45. It has come to pass that a critic who acknowledges even 2 S 21-24 to be the work of the David's is called "Davidic." In fact, the more radical critics regard a scholar as conservative if he assigns even a small group of ps to the period before the exile. We must not allow ourselves to be misled from ascribing to David any ps that seems to us, on the basis of both internal and external evidence, not of his pen. Delitzesch and Kirkpatrick are safer guides than Chyenne and Duhm. McClaren also has made a case and symmetrical with the view which is not accepted by the critical school. W. T. Davidson (HBB, pp. 66-68) speaks out plainly and strongly for Davidic authorship of Ps 7, 11, 17, 18, 19 (three half), 24 and a few other ps or parts of ps, though he makes large concessions to the present tendency to bring down the dates of these ps to a later date. He stands firmly for a large body of prophetic ps, Ps 145 assigned to David, Ps 3, 4, 7, 8, 11, 18, 19, 24, 29, 33, 101; also 60 8-11 and 68 14-19. Hitzig ascribed to David Ps 3-19, with the exception of 3, 26 and 14. It is not difficult to follow Delitzesch in attributing 4s or 45 ps to David.

(1) Ps of Asaph (73-83, also 50).—The prophetic spirit thrives in most of the ps which ascribed to Asaph. God is pictured as a righteous Judge. He is also pictured as 2. Psal- memony after the period of the exile, Israel. Ps 73 holds firm to God's righteousness, but in spite of the prosperity of the wicked. Ps 50, which is assigned by many to the time of Jehovah, because of its powerful prophetic message, may well have come from Asaph, the contemporary of David's son Nathan. Some of the Asaph group, notably 74 and 79, belong to the period of the exile or later. The family of Asaph continued for centuries to lead in the service of the Ps (2 Ch 35 15; Neh 7 44). inspired poets were raised up from age to age in the Asaph guild.
Psalm 42-49, 84, 85, 87. This family of singers was prominent in the temple-worship in the days of David and afterward. Some of the most beautiful poems in the Psalms are ascribed to members of this guild (see Psalms 42, 43, 44, 46, 49, 84). We are not to think of these poems as having been composed by a committee of the sons of Korah; no doubt each poet had an individual author, who was willing to sink his personality in the one he was composing. The privileges and blessings of social worship in the sanctuary are greatly magnified in this group of psalms.

Psalm 73—127. Even conservative critics are in doubt as to the Solomonic authorship of the two psalms ascribed to him by the titles. Perhaps assurance is not attainable in the present condition of inquiry. Delitzsch well says: "Under Solomon psalmody already began to decline; all the productions of this period bear the stamp of thoughtful contemplation rather than of direct feeling, for restless yearning for higher things had given place to sensuous enjoyment, national concentration to cosmopolitan expansion." The era of Jehoshaphat. Delitzsch and others regard the period of Jehoshaphat as one of literary prosperity. Psalm 73-76 belong to the golden age of patriotic verse. The deliverance from the great eastern invasion toward the close of Jehoshaphat's reign is the great deliverance from Sennacherib's invasion is celebrated in Psalms 46 and 48.

The period of Jeremiah. —Ehren and other scholars are inclined to attribute to Jeremiah a considerable number of psalms. Among those which have been ascribed to this prophet may be named Psalms 31, 35, 38, 40, 55, 69, 71. Those who deny the Davidic authorship of Psalms 22 also assign this great poem to Jeremiah. Whether we are able to name definitely any psalms of Jeremiah, it seems thoroughly reasonable that he should have been the author of certain of the plaintive poems in the Psalter.

During the exile.—Psalm 102 seems to have been composed during the exile. The poet pours out his complaint over the present distress, and his desire that Yahweh would have pity upon them. Psalms 137 pictures the distress of the captives by the rivers of Babylon. The fire and fervor of the poem bespeak an author personally involved in the distress. No doubt other psalms in our collection were composed during the exile in Babylon.

Post-exilic psalms. —As specimens of the joyous hymns composed after the return from exile, we may name Psalms 85 and 126. Many of the liturgical hymns in the Psalms were no doubt prepared for use in the worship of the second temple. Certain recent critics have extended this class of hymns so as to include the greater part of the Psalter, but that is surely an extreme view. No doubt, the stirring times of Ezra and Nehemiah stimulated poets in Jerusalem to erect forth thanksgiving and praise to Jehovah's God. Ewald taught that the latest psalms in our collection were composed at this time.

Are there Maccabean psalms? —Calvin assigned Psalms 44, 74, and 79 to the Maccabean period. If there are Maccabean psalms, Calvin has perhaps hit upon three of them. Hitzig assigns to the Maccabean period all the psalms from 73 to 150, together with a few psalms in the earlier half of the Psalter. Among moderns, Leggins puts practically the whole Psalter in the period from 170 to 150. Ewald, Hitzig, and Dillmann, of the four great names in OT criticism, oppose the view that the Psalter contains Maccabean psalms. Most recently, however, there has been an effort to complain of the Maccabean period. The question may well be left open for further investigation.

III. The Growth of the Psalter. —In the Heb text as well as in RV, the Psalms are grouped into five books, as follows: Book I, Psalms 1-41; Book II, Psalms 42-72; Book III, Psalms 73-89; Book IV, Psalms 90-106; Book V, Psalms 107-150.

1. Division into Five Books

It is possible that this division into five books was made by the Chronicler, who compiles the history of Judah (1 Chr 16:36 with Psalms 106:48). At the end of the book there appears a parallel which is significant in the history of the Psalter. It is said in Psalms 106:20: "The singers of Asaph were ended." It would seem from this note that the editor who appended it meant to say that in his collection he had included all the psalms of David known to him. Similarly enough, the subscript is attached to a psalm ascribed to Solomon. Psalms 71:1-20, however, seems to be the last, to which no reference is made of which is attributed to David. Psalms 71 is anonymous, and Psalms 72 might possibly be considered a prayer for Solomon. The division is further evidenced by the fact that the Second Book of Psalms opens with nine poems ascribed to the sons of Korah and to Asaph. It is a very natural conjecture that these nine psalms were at one time united with Psalms 73-83. With these removed, it would be possible to unite Psalms 51-70 with Book I. Then the subscript to Psalms 72 would be a fitting close to a roll made up of psalms ascribed to David. It is impossible at this late date to trace fully and accurately the history of the formation of the Psalter.

Within the Psalter there lie certain groups of psalms which have in a measure retained the form in which they were probably originally composed separately. Among these groups may be named the Psalms of Ascents (Psalms 120-134), the Asaph group (Psalms 73-83), the sons of Korah group (Psalms 42-49, 84-87), a psalm excepted (Psalm 88), the Psalms 56-60, a group praising Jeh for his character and deeds (Psalms 93-100), to which Psalms 90-92 form a fitting introduction. Psalms 103-107 constitute another group of praise psalms, and Psalms 146-150 make a closing Hallelujah group.

The Psalter has had a long and varied history. No doubt the precursor of the temple choir had his own collection of hymns for public worship. Small groups of psalms may have been issued also for private use in the homes. As time went on, collections were made on different organizing principles. Sometimes hymns attributed to a given author were perhaps brought into a single group. Possibly psalms of a certain type, such as Maskil and Mikhlihm psalms, were gathered together in small collections. How these small groups were partly preserved and partly broken up, in the history of the formation of our present Psalter, will, perhaps, never be known.

IV. The Poetry of the Psalter. —For general discussion of the form of Heb poetry, see Poetry. In the Psalms we find four well known varieties of Hebrew hexameter: yod, lamed, tet, and mem. Of these heptameters are most frequent and are called asiph, or as will be seen, verses which have the letter of the Heb alphabet occurs 8 t in succession as the initial letter of the verses in its section. As to strophical or stratum formation, there is evidence in certain psalms of such organization of the poems. The refrains with which strophes often close form an easy guide to the strophical divisions in certain ps, as Ps 42, 43, 46, 107. Among Eng. commentators, Briggs pays most attention to strophical division, and adduces evidence of antiphonal singing in connection with the Psalter. It is thought by some that Ps 20 and 21 were sung by responsive choirs. Ps 24 and 118 may each be antiphonal.

V. The Speaker in the Ps.—Smend, in ZATW, 1888, has endeavored to establish the thesis that the speaker in the Ps is not an individual, but a personification of the Jewish nation or church. At first he was inclined to recognize an individual speaker in Ps 3, 4, 62 and 73, but one year later he interpreted these also as collective. Thus, a stroke individual religious experience is wiped out of the Psalter. A few scholars have accepted Smend's thesis; but the great majority of critics of every school have withheld their assent, and some of the leading writers have shown that the theory is wholly untenable.

Perhaps the best monograph on the subject, for the Ger. student, is one by Emil Balla, Das Ich der Psalmen. Balla's thesis is that the "I" ps, both in the Psalter and in the other books of the OT, are always to be understood as individual, with the exception of those in which it is necessary for the realization of the plan of the whole work. Of 100 ps in which "I" occurs, Balla interprets 90 as collective. In the remaining 10 there might be reasonable room for difference of opinion whether the ps was individual or collective.

Personification is largely used in all parts of the OT. There is no room for doubt that Ps 129, though using "I," "my," and "me," is the language of Israel as a people. The same is true of Ps 124. The author of Ps 126 likewise associates himself with his brethren. The author of Ps 122, however, is evidently speaking for himself individually, when he says in ver 8, "For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will say peace; but I will set them for the counsel of God's stones." A shrewd and intelligent reader usually has no difficulty in deciding, after a careful reading of a ps, whether the "I" refers to an individual Israelite or to the congregation of Israel. Some views on this subject are important, as much as Smend's theory does violence to the strength and power of the individual religious experience of OT believers. In many portions of the OT, national duties are urged, and Israel is addressed as a whole. At the same time, it would be easy to err in the relatively small place that individual religion occupies in the prophetic writings and in the Law. The Psalter absolutely refuses to be shut up in the molds of a rigid nationalism.

VI. The Gospel in the Ps.—Christians love the Psalms as the ancient Jews could possibly have done. On every page they discover elements of religious life and experience that are thoroughly Christian. In this respect the earlier dispensation came nearer to the perfection of Christian standards than in political and social organization. Along with the NT, the aged Christian saint desires a copy of the Ps. He passes easily from the Gospels to the Psalter and back again without the sense of shifting from one spiritual level to another. Religious experience was enjoyed and was portrayed by the ancient psalmists so well that no Christian book in the apostolic period was composed to displace the Psalter.

(1) The psalms are always reverent in their approach to Deity.—Ich is infinitely holy (Ps 99. 3). Ps 95-100 are models of adoration and worship.

1. The Soul's

(2) Thirsting for God.—Ps 42 and Converse 43, which were originally one ps, voice with God the longing of the individual soul for God. As no other human composition has been able to express it. Ps 63 is a worthy companion ps of yearning after God.

(3) Praising God.—More than 20 ps have for their keynote praise to God. See esp. Ps 8 1:9; 57 7-11; 74 22-24; 95 1-7. The first three vs of Ps 33, 34, 40, 85 and 105 reveal a rich vocabulary of praise for stammering human lips.

(4) Joy in God's house.—Ps 84 and 122 are classic hymns expressive of joy in public worship in the sanctuary. Religious patriotism has never received a more striking expression than is found in Ps 137 5 f.

(5) Practising the presence of God.—In Ps 91 and 23 the worshipping saint delights his soul with the sense of God's protecting presence. The Shepherd, tender and true, is ever present to shield and to comfort. The shadow of the Almighty is over the saint who dwells in the secret place of the Most High.

(6) God in Nature.—The Psalmist did not go "through Nature up to Nature's God"; for he found God immanent in all things. He heard God's voice in the thunder; felt His breath in the twilight breeze; saw the gleam of His sword in the lightning's flash, and recognized His hand in every provision for the wants of man and the lower animals. See Ps 104, Hymn of Creation; Ps 29, Jehovah, the God of the Heavens, etc. The first half of Ps 19, "the heavens are telling."

(7) Love for God's word.—Ps 119 is the classic description of the beauty and power and helpfulness of the Word of God. The second half of Ps 19 is also a gem. Ps 119 was happily named by one of the older commentators "a holy alphabet for Zion's scholars." The Psalmist sings the glories of God's Word as a lamp to guide, as a spring of comfort, and as a fountain of hope.

(8) God's care of all things.—Faith in Divine Providence—both general and special—was a cardinal doctrine with the psalmists; yea more, the very heart of their religion. Ps 66 sings of God's goodness in sunshine and shower, which clothes the meadows with waving grain. The river of God is always full of water. Ps 121, "Jeh thy Keeper," was read by David Livingston at family worship on the morning when he left home to go out to Africa as a missionary.

(9) God our refuge.—The psalmists were fond of the figure of "taking refuge in God." Jehovah was to them a rock of refuge, a stronghold, a high tower, an impregnable fortress. Ps 46, 61 and 62 exalt God as the refuge of His saints. His help is always easy to find. Here might and external danger do not overwhelm the inspired singers, but become a theme of devout and joyful contemplation.

(1) The suffering Saviour.—While

2. The hanging on the cross, the mind of Our Messiah Lord turned to the Psalter. He voiced the terrible anguish of His soul in the opening words of Ps 22, and breathed out His spirit at the end with the trustful words of Ps 31 5. He also invited the fulfillment of a Messianic prediction in Ps 69 21 by saying, "I thirst." Isa and the Ps did not fail Him in the hour of His shame, when reproach broke His heart, and there was none to comfort Him. Only Isa 52 13—53 12 surpasses Ps 22 as a picture of Calvary and an interpretation of the significance of the cross. Whether Ps 22 is a direct prophecy of Christ, or only a typically Messianic ps, is in dispute. Every sentence can be applied to Jesus without straining its meaning. If David or some other sufferer took up his harp to sing of his own sorrows, the Spirit of God guided him to describe those of a greater.

that the language refers to the Psalmist and to him alone, and that the application of certain vs to Our Lord Jesus is only by way of accommodation. This theory ignores the presence which the Holy Spirit allocates to men when men talk of "psychological impossibilities," that may be too big a term, for of whom can we understand fully the psychological experiences of men while receiving revelations from God? The real author of the Psalms is the Spirit of God. It is this meaning that which the reverent interpreter most delights to find; and we have evidence that the OT writers did not fully comprehend their own prophecies concerning the Christ (1 Pet 1:10-12). We ought not to be surprised that the writers should fail to explain the methods of the Holy Spirit's activity in guiding the thought of prophets and psalmists in their predictions of the sufferings of Christ.

(2) The conquering King.—Ps 2 and 110 (with which Ps 73 may be compared) describe the Messiah as Jeh's Son, a mighty Conqueror, who shall overwhelm all foes and reign supported by Jeh. Some will oppose the Messiah, and so perish; others will enter His army as volunteers, and in the end will enjoy the fruits of victory. "It is better to sit on His throne than to be His footstool."

(3) The growing kingdom.—There is room in the earth for no god other than Jeh, the Creator and Redeemer of mankind. Ps 47, 67, 96-100 and 110 (with which Ps 73 may be compared) glorify the glorious missionary outreach of the Psalter. All nations are exhorted to forsake idols and worship Jeh. Ps 47 closes with a picture of the whole world united in the worship of the God of Israel. Ps 67 is a bugle call to all nations to unite in the worship of the true God. Ps 96-100 paint the character of Jeh as a basis of appeal to all nations to turn from idols and worship the God of Abraham. Ps 96 and 98 exalt His righteousness; Ps 97 His power and dominion; Ps 99 His holiness and His fidelity to Israel, while Ps 100 tells of His goodness and promise. We shall finally go down before a God worthy of men's reverences and love.

The Psalter deals with man as a sinner. Seven of the best known poems in the collection are so charged with a sense of sin and of its deadly fruits that they have been well used by the authors as voluntary or inculcations, and the grace of the Spirit made the Psalter a young tree

3. The Problem of Sin

Ps 3 (32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143). Besides these poems of penitence and confession, there are many passages elsewhere in the Psalter where the sinfulness of men, and yet there are assertions of personal innocence and righteousness in the Psalter that sound like the claims of self-righteous persons (73:3-9; 17:1-5; 18:20-24; 35:11-17; 44:17-22). The psalmists do not mean to affirm that they are sinless before God. On the contrary, that they are righteous in comparison with their foes who are seeking to destroy them. Sometimes they plead for mercy in the same context. The honest exegete does not find the Pharisaic temper in these noble hymns, though he is quite willing to admit that the Christian cannot well employ some of the expressions concerning his own experiences. Jesus requires a humility deeper than that which was attained in OT times.

(1) Confessing sin.—(a) Individual confession: Ps 32 and 51, are notable examples of individual confession. The cries of the penitent in Ps 51 have been repeated by thousands on bended knee as the best expression of their own sense of sin and yearning for forgiveness. (b) National confession (see esp. 78, 86 and 106). Ps 106 celebrates the praises of Jeh for His unfailing kindness to Israel; 106 tells the tale of Israel's repeated rebellion.

(2) Seeking forgiveness.—Ps 51 is the penitent's cry for mercy. Never did the soul of man plead more powerfully for forgiveness. God cannot despise a heart broken and crushed with the sense of sin and pleading like a lost child for home and mother.

(3) Conquering sin.—Ps 130 begins with a cry out of the depths and ends with a note of joy over the redemption from sin. The pious devotion of which the psalmist is included is a birth over sin in one's heart and life. The cries of the OT saints for victory over sin were not unheeded (139:23f; 19:13; 119:133). The author of Ps 84 truthfully depicts the life of Jeh's worshippers, "They go from strength to strength." Victory over sin is sure in the end.

The ancient Hebrew seems to have had no temptation to atheism or pantheism. The author of

4. Wrestling with the Depths

The ancient Hebrew found in the world about him one difficulty which seemed almost insuperable. He believed in the wisdom and power and justice of God. How then could it be possible, in a world over which a wise and just God presides, that the wicked should prosper and the righteous suffer? This is the question which is hotly debated by Job and his three friends. A partial solution of the difficulty may be seen in Ps 37, the theme of which is "the brevity of godless prosperity, and the certainty that well-doing will lead to well-being." A better solution is attained in Ps 73, which depicts God's attitude toward the wicked and toward the righteous. The wicked will be suddenly overthrown while the righteous will live forever in the enjoyment of communion with God. Not even death can sever him from God. The fleeting pleasures of proud scoffer pale into insignificance before the glories of everlasting fellowship with God.

(1) Out of the depths of persecution and slander the author of Ps 31 climbed into his refuge, as he exclaimed, "In the covert of thy presence with the throngs of thy children, who sing the praises of thy Name, thou wilt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues." Ps 77 is a stairway out of the depths of suspense and anxiety. The experience of the author well illustrates Maclaren's epigram, "If out of the depths we cry, we shall cry ourselves out of the depths." (3) The author of Ps 116 looked into the jaws of death. Perhaps no other ps has so much to say of physical death. The singer is filled with gratitude as he reviews the body of flesh from which he has saved him. Ps 58 is unique, because it is sad and plaintive from beginning to end. The song has long cried for deliverance from bodily weakness and from loneliness. (5) Out of the depths of disaster and defeat the authors of Ps 60, 74, 79 and 89 cry to God. The Book of Psalms was a sorial test to patriotic Jews. They mourned over the destruction of their beautiful temple and the holy city in which their fathers had worshipped. The author of Ps 60 closes with hope and confidence (60:12).

"Unquestionably in the Psalms we reach the high-water mark of OT practical piety, the best that the OT can exhibit of heart-religion."

5. Ethical Ideals

(1) What sort of man, then, would the Psalms acclaim as good?—Ps 1 opens with a vivid contrast between the righteous and the wicked. Ps 15 is the most complete description of a good man to be found in the Psalter. The picture is drawn in answer to the question. What sort of man will Jeh receive as an acceptable worshipper? The morality of the Bible is rooted in religion, and the religion of the Bible blossoms and bears fruit in the highest ethics known to man. Ps 131 makes humility a prime quality for real goodness. Ps 133 is the highest ideal of brotherly love. The social virtues had a large place in the psalmist's ideals of goodness. Humility and brotherly love are a guaranty of peace in the home, the church and the nation. Ps 24:4 is a compund of ethics in a single sentence.

(2) The ethics of speech.—Even a casual reading of the Pss must impress one with the fact that the psalmist, with keen sense of the shallowoastings of the wicked. Stirred with righteous indignation, they call upon God to awake and confront the blatant foes of truth and righteousness (see esp. Ps 12, 52 and 120).

(3) Isaiah—Davidic.—Bible readers are familiar with the ideal of the good man in Job 29 12–16; 31:13–22. Ps 82 is a plea for justice.
Vehal judges are one day to confront the great Judge. Men need fair play first. Perhaps there will then be no occasion for the exercise of almsgiving. Ps 41 is a plea for kindness. The Christian reader is reminded of the words of Jesus, "Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy." The Ideal Ruler is both just and beneficent (Ps 72 2,12–14).

To be a good lover one must know how to hate.
The excitement of battle throbs in many of the Pss.
The enemies of righteousness are victorious and defiant. Their taunts are an impotent boasting against the wicked.
Hate is a sin, and prayer. Jeh's honour is a stroke to the pride. But when the Christian reader turns the page he finds the praises pronounced against the wicked are startling and painful. Many are led to wonder how such imprecations ever found a place in the Bible. The most severe curses are found in Ps 33, 67 and 69. Mcharen's words are well worth reading as an introduction to Ps 109: "For no private injuries, or for those only in so far as the suffering singer is a member of the community which represents God's cause, does he ask the descent of God's vengeance, but for the insult and tears inflicted on righteousness. The form of these malversations belongs to a lower stage of revelation; the substance of them, considered as passionate desires for the destruction of evil, burning zeal for the triumph of truth, which is God's cause, and unquenchable faith that He is just, is a part of Christian perfection." Two remarks may be made, as suggestions to the student of the Psalter:
(1) We ought to study the ps of imprecation in the light of the command. They are fiery and not prose; and De Wett reminds us that the language of oriental poetry is that of exaggerated passion.
Some of these imprecations pulse with the throb of actual battle. Swords are drawn, and blood is flowing. The champion of Jeh's people prays for the overthrow of His foes. The enemies cursed are men who break every moral law and defy God.
The Psalmist identifies himself with Jeh's cause.
"Do not I hate them, O Jeh, that hate thee? And am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee?
I hate them with perfect hatred: they are become mine enemies" (Ps 139 21f). Thus the psalmists pray with God's glory in view. (2) We ought to use the imprecation ps in the light of Our Lord's teaching. We cannot pronounce curses on our personal enemies. This heavenly artillery may be turned upon the sinner, the brothel and the the gambling hell, though we must not forget to pray for the conversion of the persons who are engaged in these lines of business.

"If a man dies, shall he live again?" What answer do the Pss give to Job's cry for light? There are expressions in the Psalter which seem to forbid hope of a blessed immortality (Ps 6 5; 30 9; 39 13; 115 17). The psalmists were tempted to feel that fellowship with God would cease at death. Let this fact, however, be borne in mind, that not one of the poets or prophets of Israel settled down to a final denial of immortality. Some of them had moments of joyous assurance of a blessed life of fellowship with God in the world to come.
Life everlasting in the presence of Jeh is the pros-ppect with which the author of Ps 16 refreshes himself (16 8–11). The vision of God's face after the sleep of death is better than worldly prosperity (17 13–15). The author of Ps 73 wins rest for his distressed soul in the assurance of fellowship with God that cannot be broken (73 23–26). God will finally take the singer to Himself. It has been well said that Ps 49 registers the high-water mark of OT faith in a future life. Death becomes the shepherd of the wicked who trusted in riches, while God redeems the righteous from the power of Sheol and takes the believing soul to Himself.

LITERATURE.—One of the most elaborate and informing articles on the history of the exposition of the Pss is found in the Introd to Delitzsch's Comm. (pp. 64–87, ET). Among the Fathers, Jerome, Chrysostom and Augustine are most helpful. Among the Reformers, Calvin, the prince of exegetes, is most valuable.
Among modern commentators, Ewald and Delitzsch are scholarly and sane. Their comm. are accessible in Eng. tr. Hupfeld is strong in grammatical exegesis.
BHS, Beckingen (1912), and the recent Eng. and American commentaries, the most helpful are Perowne (1912), and M. A. Dods (1890–92), and Kirkpatrick in Cambridge, Bible (1893–95). Briggs in ICC (1906) is learned; Davison, New Century Bible, is bright and attractive. Spurgeon, Treasury of David, is a valuable compilation, chiefly from the Puritans. The Chrysostom. The Book of Ps (1883) and The Origin and Religious Contents of the Psalter (1891), is quite radical in his critical views. Binne, The Ps.
Their Origin, Teachings and Use (1886), is a fine introduction to the Psalter. Robertson, The Poetry and Religion of the Psalms (1883), constructs an able argument against recent radical views.

Psychology
well-defined system of psychology, on which the whole scheme of redemption is based. Great truths regarding human nature are presupposed in and about the NT, and if the NT and the "LXX" stress is there laid on other aspects of truth, unknown to writers outside of revelation, and presented to us, not in the language of the schools, but in that of practical life, man is there described as fallen and degraded, but intended by God to be raised, redeemed, renewed. From this point of view Bib. psychology must be studied, and our aim should be "to bring out the views of Scripture regarding the nature, the life and destiny of the soul, as they are determined by the history of salvation" (Delitsch, Bibl. Psych., 15).

As to the origin of the soul, Scripture is silent. It states very clearly that life was "inbreathed into man by God (Ps 146:4), waqyiyâth; 2. Nature of the Soul LXX ἐνεφανείρετα, ἐνεφανερώθην; Vulg. and Origin inspiravit). The human being thus inspired by God was thereby constituted a nephes hayyâth ("living soul"), because the nishmath hayyâim ("breath of lives") had been imparted to him (Gen 2:7). Beyond this the first book of the Bible does not go. In later literature the soul is taught as equal to the breath. Thus in the Book of Job: "The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty gave me life" (Job 33:4). The difference in expression should be carefully noted. The "living soul" (LXX psuchê zôos) is made to depend upon, as it has its origin in, the "breath of life" (LXX pnuêmâ zôos). The nishmah ("breath") is characteristic of man—though it is very rarely, if ever, attributed to animals. man is described as a being in whose nostrils is but a breath (nishmath) (Isa 2:22). That "breath" is "God's breath" (Job 32:8; 34:14), or, as it is represented in Prov 20:27, "The spirit of man [nishmath] is the lamp of Jehovah," In the NT Paul evidently refers to this view of man's origin in the statement that "the first man Adam became a living soul. The last Adam... a life-giving (quickening) spirit" (I Cor 15:45). This too agrees with what Christ has said: "It is the spirit that giveth life (quickeneth)" (John 6:63), and with what Paul himself had stated elsewhere in his Epistle to the Romans (8:2): "The spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and of death."

Scripture therefore repudiates all doctrines of emanation, by which is meant a natural, forth-coming life from God to man. 3. False Theories by which they declare that the Almighty acts with deliberation and design, in free choice, and not of necessity. "Let us make man" is the sublime utterance of Divine wisdom and power. Nor does Scripture teach the preexistence of the soul—a doctrine found in the extra-canonical, platonically inspired Book of Wisd (Wis 8:19.20), "For I was a child of parts, and a good soul fell to my lot; but rather, being good, I came into a body unfallen." This doctrine was well known to Jewish writers, and was taught in Talm and Kabbalâh.

"All souls were, according to the Talm, created, and kept in secret from the first moment of creation. As creatures of the highest sphere they are omniscient; but at the moment of birth in a human body an angel touches the lips of the child, so that he forgets whatever has been (before birth)" (Bischoff, The Talm, 4). However, must be a later importation into Jewish theology through Talm and Kabbalâh. bischoff, The Talm, 4. Yet the soul is designated by the Pate to inhabit new bodies on earth—drink of the waters of Life, and live, and be filled with all remembrance of the joys of Elysium.

"The souls that transmigrate, in the flood. In Lebhe's lake they long oblivion taste. Of future life secure, forgetful of the past."

According to the Kabbalâh, souls are supposed to have an ideal as well as a real preexistence: 'ideal as emanations from the Infinite, which are the causes of the infinite real, as having been 'created' at a definite time' (cf. Eric Bischoff, De Kabbalâh).

The doctrine with some modifications passed into the Christian church, was accepted by Justin Martyr, Theodoretus, Origen and others of the church Fathers, but became obsolete by the latter part of the 4th. cent. (cf. Sheid, Hist of Christian Doctrine, 11, 9). It was formally condemned by a synod held at Constantinople in the 6th. cent. In later times it was accepted in modified form by Kant, Schelling, and others, and defended by Julius Müller, who held that the soul had a timeless preexistence and underwent a fall before the final act, whereby it was united in time to the body as its temporary home (Ein ausserer Leib). Theorized orthodoxy is sometimes made to Jer 1:5, where Jehovah addresses His servant: "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee; I have appointed thee a prophet unto the nations." There is no warrant to the doctrine as taught by the writers mentioned. All that may be conceded is, what Delitsch has termed an "ideal preexistence," i.e., a preexistence, not only of man as such, but also of the individual soul; and all of this on the ground of the Divine knowledge, which precedes the existence in the individual consciousness (Bibl. Psych., 46).

A new question arises at this point, viz. Is the soul a special creation? Is it derived from the parents? Passages and statements are and are not on this point. Many have supported the theory of Creationism by statements which point that in every instance where a new individual comes into being a soul is specially created by God, destinei to the new-formed body. This view of the soul has found great support in the Christian church. It declared that the parents were responsible, not merely for the bodies, but also for the souls of their children. It is a doctrine (i.e., by direct derivation, in the ordinary way of propagation). Tradition was a strong advocate of Creationism: "The soul of man, like the shoot of a tree, is drawn out (deducta) into a physical progeny from Adam, the parent stock" (Sheid, Hist of Doctrine, 11, 14). Jerome remarked that in his day it was adopted by maxima pars occidentalium ("the large majority of western theologians"). Leo the Great (d. 461) asserted that the Catholic faith teaches that every man with reference to the substance of his soul as well as body, is created in the womb (Sheid, Augustine, however, though doctrinally inclined to support the claims of Creationism, kept an open mind on the subject: "You may blame, if you will, my hesitation," he wrote, "because I do not venture to affirm or deny that of which I am ignorant."). And, perhaps, this is the safest attitude to assume: for it is little scriptural warrant for either theory. Birth is a mystery which necessitates investigation, and Scripture throws no light upon that mystery. Yet some who have discussed this subject have tried actually to calculate the very day on which the soul is created or infused into the body, as it is being formed in the womb. The Gospel of Nicodemus, the Apocalypse, the Necessity and in girls on the 80th. This indeed is the Reductio ad absurdum of Creationism. Whichever theory we accept, the difficulties are great either way. For if God creates a soul, that soul must be pure and sinless and stainless as it was in the womb. Then it is said that man is "conceived" as well as "born in sin"? If there is any sin, then, sin-stricken souls must be pure, unstained soul by contact, why cannot the stainless soul disfigure the contaminated body? And again, if every individual soul is a special creation by direct interposition of the Almighty, what becomes of the union and solidarity of the soul and the body? Is its connection with Adam then purely one of physical or corporeal generation? Creationism cannot account for the birth of the soul as a creature, and it cannot account for the origin, nor for the hereditary taint of the soul. Hence as in a hopeless dilemma. In the one case we fail to account for the creationism; in the other, we plunge into a materialism which is equally fatal. E. Schraven (Gereformeerde Doopsgezinde Kerk, 11, 626). Perhaps the words of Petrus Lombardus, though frequently misunderstood and misapplied, throw most light on the subject of the soul. He wrote, "which is little more than "darkness visible"—creando infinitit ex creat "in creating God infuses the soul; and in infusing He creates." The problem is and remains insoluble.

Passing allusion may be made to another very curious theory, to which reference is made by Martensen (Jen. Theol. XIX, I, 107). It bears upon human individuality, as impressed not only upon the soul, but upon the body. The soul and the body are represented as arising at the same moment, but the latter (not in regard to its physico-chemical composition, but in other respects) is the resultant of soul-influences, whatever these may be. The soul therefore exercises a formative influence upon the body, with which it is united. This theory had been accepted by E. Stalin, when he died in 1734, as physician to the royal family. We are here in a region where the way is barred—a' palpable closure without the light of day.

The next important question which has occupied many minds is equally difficult of solution—the theory of Tripartition. Is man composed of “body” and “soul” (dichotomy only), or is there a third to be added to these two, so that there is a tripartite division of the constitution of human nature (trichotomy)? Either theory is supposed to be supported by Scripture, and both have had their defenders in all ages of the church. Where the tripartite division has found favor, soul and spirit have been distinguished from each other, as man’s lower is distinguished from his higher nature; where dichotomy prevailed, soul and spirit were represented as manifestations of the same spiritual essence. Under the influence of Platonic philosophy the trichotomy found favor in the early church, but was discredited on account of the Apollinarian heresy. The threefold division of human nature into soma (“body”), psuché (“soul”), pneuma (or spirit) has been discredited. The Apolinaris, bishop of Laodicea (d. 382), attempted to explain the mystery of Christ’s person by teaching that the Logos (or second person of the Trinity) had taken the place of the rational soul in Christ, so that the person of Christ on earth consisted of the Divine Logos, a human body, and a soul (psuché) as the link between the two.

For the tripartite division of human nature two texts are specially brought into the discussion: viz. 1 Thess 5 23, “May your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame”—a text which is popularly interpreted as conveying that “soul” stands for “our powers natural—those we have by nature,” and that by “spirit” is meant “that life in man which in his natural state can scarcely be said to exist at all, but which is to be called out into power and vitality by regeneration” (F. W. Robertson, Sermons). There is very little warrant in Scripture for such interpretation. The language does not require a distinction of organs or substances, but may be accounted for by a vivid conception of one substance in different relations and under different aspects. The two terms are used to give exhaustive expression to the whole being and nature of man” (Davidson, OT Technology, 13). There is evidently a distinction of soul and spirit there—viz. of a soul distinct from the spirit, and a body distinct from either. In his fervid desire for the complete and perfect sanctification of his disciples, the apostle accumulates these terms in order to emphasize the doctrine of an entire renewal of the whole man by the working of the Holy Spirit. It has been pointed out (A. Kuyper, Het werk v. u. Heiligen Geest, 111, 101) and this must be carefully borne in mind—that the apostle does not use them—our all your parts—and then summarize these parts in body, soul and spirit, but holoteles, a word that has no reference to the parts, but to the telos, the end or aim. Calvin interprets ‘soul’ and ‘spirit’ here as referring to our rational and moral existence, as thinking, willing beings, both modes of operation of the one, undivided soul.

The next text to which an appeal is made is He 4 12: “The word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and pierces even to the division of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart.” Here spirit, soul and heart are brought into close correspondence, with heart evidently as the center of personality, manifesting itself in soul and spirit. The only question is, whether the dividing which takes place by the piercing word of God is one within the soul and spirit, causing a complete exposure of the inner man, a cutting asunder of all that composes his nature, or one between the soul and spirit, a division into that sword of the spirit cuts through all obstacles, pierces the very heart, lays bare what hitherto was hidden to all observers, even to the man himself, and “discerns” the “thoughts and intents,” which lie in the unity of soul and spirit, but which have been kept in the background. “The meaning is that, the word of God pierces and dissects both the soul and spirit, separates each into its parts, subtle though they may be, and analyzes their thoughts and intents” (Davidson, op. cit. 187). At any rate, to found a doctrine of Trichotomy on an isolated, variously interpreted text is dangerous in the extreme. The language of metaphor is not the language of literal speech; and here evidently we are in the region of metaphor.

The ground is now cleared for a fuller investigation of the meaning of these terms:

1. The terms are used interchangeably, though they are not natural Terms synonymous. Lebádh (“heart”), “purpl” (“soul”), and “purph” (“soul”) are very closely connected in the OT. The heart is there represented as “the organ, the spirit as the principle, the soul as the subject of life” (Cremer, Lexicon). Hence we read that “out of it [the heart] are the issues of life” (Prov 4 23). Dying is represented as the surrender of soul (Gen 36 18; Job 11 20), but also of spirit (Ps 31 5; 146 4). The dead are called souls (Rev 6 9; 20 4), and also spirits (He 12 23; 1 Pet 3 19). In the last mentioned text the “spirits in prison” are also called “souls.” The living are described as “disturbed” or “grieved” in soul (Jas 10 16), “ vexed” (Jas 16 16), “discouraged” (Nu 21 4, “weary” (Zec 11 8); but also as in “anguish of spirit” (Ex 6 9), “impatient in spirit” (Job 21 4, in the Heb), “straitened in spirit” (Mic 2 7). At part death the “spirit” departs (Ps 146 4, in the Heb), but also the “soul” (Gen 35 18). As in the OT so in the NT, Our Lord “sighed,” or “was troubled in the spirit” (Jn 15 21); but we also read that His soul was “overflowed by the Holy Ghost” (Lk 26 38; Jn 12 27). See Spirit; Soul; Heart.

2. And yet there is a distinction, whatever the real nature of it may be. In Mary’s Magnificat, e.g., we find the two combined in an interesting manner: “My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour" (Lk 1:46-47), the one clause "referring to the personal emotions of Mary, to her feeling as a woman and a mother, all of which find an outlet in adoration," the second clause "appearing to indicate the moment when, in the profoundest depths of her being, by the touch of the Divine spirit, the promise of the angel was accomplished in her" (Godet, in loc.). A like contrast meets us in the story of Gethsemane. The Master was 'exceeding sorrowful in soul' (i.e. the emotional, sensitive center of his being was in deep sorrow), the disciples were 'willing in spirit,' but weak in flesh (Mt 26:34). In the OT we find that when a man dies his soul departs, and when he is restored to life his soul 'returns' (1 K 17:22); but when consciousness or life-power returns to one not dead, "spirit" is used (Gen 45:27; Jcs 15:19 i 8 30 12; 1 K 10:5).

Even in popular language the distinction is recognized: we speak of so many "souls," not "spirits," as having perished.

(6) From all this it would appear that philosophical distinction and scientific accuracy of expression is not met with in Scripture. Man there represented as a unity, and the various terms employed to indicate that unity in its diversity of activities or passivities do not necessarily imply the existence of different essences, or of separate organs, through which these are realized. Psychical action is sometimes ascribed to the body, as well as to the soul; for soul and body are inseparably united to each other. It is the possession of a soul which makes the body what it is; and on the other hand, a soul without a body is unthinkable. The resurrection of the body therefore is no mere figment of the creed. The body is God's work (Job 10:8), inseparable from the life of the soul. In the NT it is spoken of as "the house on earth" (epiphanos oikia), that was prepared in the present, the abode of the occupant (skhos) (1 Cor 12:18; 2 Cor 4:7; 5:1). In the OT "we have such metaphorical expressions as 'houses of clay'; or, as in post-Bib. writings, 'earthly tabernacle.' In the latest, we have words which suggest a hollow, a framework, or a sheath, favoring the Gr idea of the body as the husk or clothing of the soul" (Laistlaw). Hence in Scripture, soul and spirit are interchangeably used by God for human nature in general, not as though indicating separate distinct entities, but denoting a parallelism which brings out the full personality of the man. Soul and body are threatened with destruction (Mt 10:28); body without spirit is a corpse (Jas 2:26); soul and spirit are interchangeably united ("Standing fast in one spirit, with one soul striving," etc (Phil 1:27).

(4) Gathering all together, the Scriptural position seems to be as follows: The Divine Spirit is the source of all life, and its power is communicated in the physical, intellectual and moral sphere. That Spirit, as the spiriits spira, the inspirer of the spirit, by its very breath makes man a living soul: "The spirit [or breath] of God is in my nostrils" (Job 27:3); "Thou takest away their breath [rpi, 'spiri'], they die, and return to their dust" (Ps 104:20). It is called, "God of the spirits of all flesh" (Nu 16:22 27; 16:27).

Soul, though identical with spirit, has shades of meaning which spirit has not; it stands for the individual. "Man is spirit, because he is dependent upon God." Man a soul, because unlike the angels, he has a body, which links him to earth. He is animal as possessing anima, but he is a reasoning animal, which distinguishes him from the brute" (Bavinck, Ger. Dogm., II, 628).

(5) In this connection stress may be laid upon some of the following texts. Philo exhorts the Philosophians to "stand fast in one spirit [pneuma], with one soul [psuche] striving for the faith" (Phil 1:27). He exhorts them to be "of the same mind" (aipneumato, Phil 2:2); he hopes to see their "good comportment" (elisapaucon, who] would care truly for their state (Phil 2:20). Everywhere therefore we have soul" in various combinations to indicate the mental attitude, which in the "fellowship of the Spirit" he would assume toward his readers, and his readers would adopt toward himself. There cannot therefore be that subtle distinction which men have found in the terms "spirit" and "soul," as though two separate essences were housed in one body. The spirit of God has made me, and the breath of the Almighty giveth me life," is the key to the whole problem. The spiritus spirare—The inspiring spirit becomes in man the life which is expired, outbreathed by man, in both soul and spirit. "Soul," therefore, may well stand for the personal, living, animated being—the suffering, acting, thinking, reasoning, dying creature, "whose breath is in his nostrils." Christ gave His soul (pneuma, or His sheath) in the cross He Himself exclaimed: "Into thy hands I commend my spirit" (pneumo) (Lk 23:46). Spirit may therefore indicate the all-embracing power, guiding the inward and the outward life—principium illustre, eupsucho, ex qux (Gen 1:26; 2:7).

Hence by an easy gradation it may stand for the abysmal depths of personality; while "soul" would express man's individuality in general. See Soul; Sprit.

Pauline phraseology has somewhat confused the issue; at any rate, new meanings, not obvious to the reader, have been assigned to various terms. Paul contrasts the psychical and the pneumatic, the man under the influence of the Divine pneuma, with the man as influenced by his own psuche. The psychical man is man in his natural, unregenerate state, psychical in this connection being almost equivalent to carnal; while the pneumatic man would be the man guided and directed by the Spirit from on high. Nature and grace are contrasted in the two terms as the first and second Adam are contrasted in 1 Cor 15:45—the first Adam being described as a living psuche ('soul'), the second as a life-giving pneuma ('spirits'). Paul's word is intended, fitted to bear the peuché, while the pneumatic body is evidently the body capable of bearing the pneuma. Hence the one is corruptible and weak, the other incorruptible and full of power. The soul confined to the carnal body uses it as an organ, till it falls into decay and no longer lends itself to such use. The spirit, in constant fellowship with the Divine Spirit, communicates its energy to a body fitted to be the bearer of this renewed life, that organ, made ready by its own spirit instrument, enables the body to fulfill its wishes and thoughts, with inexhaustible power of action, "as we even now see the artist using his voice or his hand with marvelous freedom and thus foreshadowing the perfect spiritualizing of the body."

Other questions call for discussion here: they may be briefly touched upon. Scripture acknowledges a dualism, which recognizes the separate existence of soul and body. It recognizes a body which makes man, a soul or spirit, the "original unity" (Bain); or considers mind and body as equally real, and as "aspects," "appearances," "sides" of one and the same reality (scientific monism). It knows nothing of metaphysical dualism, which makes mind and soul the only reality, of which the text in a modification nor of materialism, which considers matter as that which alone is substantial, while mind is a mere product of the brain (Haeckel). It does not support the doctrine of Kornmann praeestablished harmony, whereby: because soul and body were united in harmonious action before the individual was called into active being, body and soul acting in harmony after creation like two clocks accurately regulated, pointing to the same hour on the dial plate, though driven by different springs (Leibnitz). Science has no theory of fact which can explain and fail.

“...Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting,”

The words of Shenton (Cornhill Magazine, 1907) may be applied to all psychological problems, outside of Holy Writ, which by him were applied to those scientific questions which remain unanswered: "We are still very far from knowing definitely that atoms are composed entirely of electrons or that electrons are nothing else but electric charges; and though electrons have been shown to exhibit electric inertia, it has not been proved that the inertia of atoms also is electrical." The mystery of matter is great; that of soul is greater still.

The next question which falls to be discussed is the influence of the fall of man upon his soul. Scripture is clear upon the point. Man’s fall from a state of innocence there told in unambiguous terms, though the word itself is not found in the narrative, except perhaps in Rom. 11:12, where allusion is made to the fall of man (aparadigmata of Israel). With the origin of evil Scripture apparently does not concern itself, though it clearly states that man’s sinful condition stands in direct connection with the transgression of Adam, as in Rom. 5, where the introduction of sin (huparagia) into the world is described as the act of one man (s. Adam), and mankind being evidently working on the same line, rushing into the world of sin. The OT allusion in Hos. 6:7 can hardly be referred to Adam’s transgression; at any rate the reference is different, for the passage in which they have transgressed the covenant.”

The German and Dutch VSS give the same interpretation to the verse: “...like Adam. The LXX takes the term transgression (Makarios), but the Vulg refers the transgression to Adam (sine Adam transgressus sunt). The other allusions in the OT to this event are slight, as in Job 31:33, Eccl. 28:13, 15. In the NT, however, the references are much more frequent, esp. in the writings of John and of St. Paul. The Epistle of Jn 8:44: 1 Jn 3:8; 2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:14. The strong parallelism between Adam and Christ in Rom. 5:12-21, the obedience of the one bringing freedom, while that of the other brought woe, and the contrast in 1 Cor. 15:22 between Adam and Christ throw sufficient light on the question at issue.

Modern science, under the influence of the evolutionary hypothesis, has eliminated or at least has attempted to eliminate the factor of the Fall. That "fall" has been interpreted as a "rise," the "descent" is supposed to have been a real "ascent." Far down the ages, man has been miserable, wretched, naked, worn out, just emerged from the beastial condition, torn with fierce passions, and fighting his way among his companions with low-browed cunning (Orr, Christian View of God, 150) must have emerged somehow out of darkness. In his irresistible drive, says Professor J. A. Thomson, "as those who look back to a parliament in which man fell: we are as those who, rowing hard against an immeasurable constant grade of our own creation, do not dream it is a dream" (Bible of Nature, 226). If science definitely teaches that man has arisen by slow, insensible grades of development from the word may be said on the subject, then indeed the problem becomes utterly inexplicable. There can then be no agreement between the Bible, conception of the evolutionary theory as so presented. For primitive man’s transgression would simply be the natural expression of brute passion, to which the name of sin in the Christian sense can hardly be applied. But this "lifting" or "falling" number of evolutionists are appealing: if primitive man be not pictured as a semi-animal, subject to brutish impulse and passion, if with man’s new start was a "lift" occurred in the process of development under the guiding and directing influence of power. Almost it proves a different shape. A sinless creature, transgressing the moral law, is then not an unscientific assumption; conscience and voice Divine within the human soul is then not only possible, but actual and real, in the history of the race. It will after all remain as the most reasonable explanation of man’s original condition and his terribil fall. In that narrative will be found enshrined the "shadowing tradition" of a real, historic event, which has influenced the human race through all the ages, (essor Driver, writing under the strong influence of the evolutionary theory, and accepting as "the law stamped upon the entire range of organic nature, gradual advance from lower to higher, from the less perfect to the more perfect, has wisely remarked that "man failed in the trial to which he was exposed, that sin has entered into the world and that through the whole course of the race it has been attended by an element of moral disorder, and thus it has been marred, perverted, impeded or drawn back (ib. Driver, Genesis, 24)."

An equally serious question arises as to the effects of the fall of man. Shame, corruption, death is the answer given by the OT and NT.

10. Effects

"In the day that thou eatest thereof of the tree, thou shalt surely die." (Gen 2:17) was the judgment pronounced upon man. By this was evidently meant "death" as a physical and as a spiritual fact. Man was doomed. The posse non mori, which according to older theologians was man’s privilege, was lost and was succeeded by a punishment of which the non posse mori was the outcome. The possibility of immortal life was followed by the impossibility of not suffering death. Not as though immortality was absolutely lost; for, with sin came decay, degeneration, death, not of the inbreathed spirit, but of the body into which the soul was breathed by God. But even the body is imperishable. It undergoes change, but not extinction. The resurrection-body has become a possibility through the atonement and resurrection of Christ. The tabernacle is removed, but renewed. The body is not the prison house, but only so long as a adjunct but an integral part of the human being. The Bible teaches not only a resurrection-body, but a transformed body (Rom 12:1). It speaks not only of a soul to be saved, but of a body to be renewed. Scripture alone accounts for death and explains it.

With modern evolutionists death is an unsolved problem. Weissmann (Essays on Heredity) main- tains on the one hand that "death is not an essential attitude of matter" (p.159), and on the other, “it is only a Problem from the point of view of utility that we understand the necessity of death” (p.23), and again death is to be looked upon as an occurrence which is advantageous to the species as one of the devices of life, and not as an absolute necessity, essentially inherent in life." He even speaks of "the immorality of the protozoa," because "an immense number of the lower organisms are not subject to death (ib. 26). Death then has been "acquired secondarily as an adaptation," and must in a certain sense be unnatural. It is indeed "one of the most difficult problems in the whole range of physiology." If this be so, we cannot safely fix the solution of the problem, which has a value peculiarly its own. "By man came death" is the authoritative declaration, because by man came sin. "In Adam all die," because through Adam came sin. Here we may still leave the problem, because "by one man" will come "resurrection from the dead."—Rom. 5:12.

But if the body is mortal, is the soul immortal? On this point the NT gives no uncertain sound, and though the doctrine be not as clearly expressed in the OT, yet even there the NT form is recited at the graveside of those who die in the Lord: "I will ransom them from the power of Sheol; I will redeem them from death, where are thy plaguses? O Shoel, where is thy destruction?" (Isa. 25:8). Still clearer is the note sounded by Daniel (12:2-3): "Many of them that sleep in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." In the last word, the OT saint based all his hope and fellowship on God. That hope strengthened his soul when he shuddered at the distance of Sheol. "It overleaps Sheol in the vigor of his faith." In the Psalms we find the same hope expressed on almost every page: "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with beholding thy form" (AV "with thy likeness," Ps 17:15); and again: "Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol; neither wilt thou suffer thy holy one to see corruption. For in thy presence is fulness of joy; in thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore" (Ps 16:11).

Whatever the ultimate verdict of science may be regarding the "utility" of death in regard to the human race, Scripture considers it absurd, unnecessary, an infraction, the result of man's wrongdoing and his transgression of the law of God. But death in Holy Writ is not a hopeless separation of body and soul. The NT sounds a note even clearer than the OT; for Christ has brought "life and immortality to light." "We know," says Paul, "that we have a building from God," after the dissolution of our tabernacle (2 Cor. 5:1); and that is but the necessary corollary to Christ's great utterance: "I AM THE RESURRECTION, AND THE LIFE" (Jn. 11:25).

PTOLEMAIS, tol-é-mi-as (Πτολεμαῖος, Ptolemaios), but usually called Ptolemy—"the Warlike").

The name Ptolemy is rather common from the days of Alexander the Great. The best known as the dynastic name of the 13 (14) Macedonian kings of Egypt (323-43 BC) (as Pharaoh in the OT). Those of interest to the Bib. student are:

(1) Ptolemy I, surnamed Soter (Σωτήρ, Sóter, "Savior"). This called also Ptolemy Lagi, was born c. 366 BC, the son of Lagus and Arsinoê, a concubine of Philip of Macedon. He was prominent among the officers of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied in his eastern campaigns. On the death of Alexander, Ptolemy seized Egypt, as his share (1 Mace 1:6 f). Now commenced the long hostilities between Egypt and Syria, Ptolemy on more than one occasion invading Syria. In 316 he joined in a war against Antigonus during which Ccôl-Syria and Phoenicia were lost, but in 312 regained from Demetrius the son of Antigonus. It was most probably in this year (312) that Ptolemy captured Jerus on a Sabbath day (Jos, Anti, XII, 1, 1), by force or persuasion induced many Jews to accompany him to Egypt as colonists or mercenaries. His kind treatment of them induced others to leave Syria for Egypt. In 306 Ptolemy was defeated in the great naval fight off Salamis in Cyprus by which Cyprus was lost to Egypt. About this time Ptolemy assumed the title of "king" following the example of the Syrian rulers. In 305-304 he defended the Rhodians against Deme- trius Polorocetes, forcing the latter to raise the siege—hence the title "Savior". In 285 BC Ptolemy having subdued the king of his youngest son Philadelphe—"the son of his favorite wife Berenice—and died in 283 BC. According to the usual interpre- tation this Philadelphus is "the king of the south" in Dn. 11:5. This Ptolemy shares with his son and successor the honor of founding the famous Alex- andrian Museum and Library.

(2) Ptolemy II, surnamed Philadelphus (Φίλα- δέλφος, Philadelphos, "Brother[sister?]-loving"), the youngest son of Ptolemy I; b. 309 BC in Cos; succeeded his father in 285 BC and d. 247. Like his father, he was actively engaged in two Syrian wars until peace was made about 250 BC, Berenice, the daughter of Philadel- phus, being given in mar- riage to Antiochus II. This Ptolemy planted numerous colonies in Egypt, Syria and Palestine which were several of the name of Arsinoê (his sister-wife), Philadelphia on the ruins of old Rabbah, Philotera south of the Sea of Galilee, and Ptolemais on the site of Acco. He devoted great attention to the internal administration of his kingdom, establishing the Museum and Alexandrian Library in which his father had taken much interest; in general he followed his father's example as a liberal patron of art, science and literature. According to one tradi- tion it was Philadelphia who was instrumental in beginning the LXX (see Septuagint). At any rate, he was favorably disposed toward his Jewish subjects, and in his reign Jewish wisdom and Gr. philosophy began to blend. Philadelphia is sup- posed to be "the king of the south" of Dn. 11:6, whose daughter "shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement."

(3) Ptolemy III, surnamed Euergetes (Εὐερ- γέτης, Euergetês, "Benefactor") of Phoenicia, son of Philad- phus, whom he succeeded in 247 BC. In 246 he was provoked to war by the number of his sister Berenice at Antioch; in the course of this campaign he met with remarkable success, overran Syria, plundered Susa and Babylonia, penetrated to the shores of India and captured the important stronghold of Seleucia (1 Mace 11:8). Euergetes was, however, prevented from reaping the fruits of his victories by being recalled by internal troubles in Egypt. Antiochus fell with his army from the East the Egypt gods that Cambyses had carried away 300 years before, thus earning from the Egyptians the title of "Benefactor." Two traditions obtain as to his death: the more probable is that of Polybyus (II,74), according to which he died a natural death (222 BC), or, according to another (Justin xxii.1), he was murdered by his son. Some regard this king as the Euergetes mentioned in the Prologue to Sir, but the reference must rather be to Euergetes II (Ptolemy VII). The "shoot" who "shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north" and prevail is Euergetes I (Dnl 11:7-9), ver 8 referring to the act by which he won his title.

(4) Ptolemy IV, surnamed Philopator (Φωλοπατορ, "Lover of his father"), or Tryphon (Τρύφων, Τρύφων), the eldest son of Euergetes whom he succeeded in 222 BC. Antiochus the Great of Syria declared war against Egypt about 224 BC. After consulting with Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, he was defeated by Philopator at the battle of Raphia near Gaza (217 BC). On his victorious return to Alexandria, Philopator assumed a very anti-Jewish attitude, and indeed caused discord generally among his subjects. In spite of the victory of Raphia, Egypt began to decline under his weakness. He was as dissolute as Nero, while his domestic tragedies are as dark as those of Herod the Great. He died in 205 BC. Dnl 11:10-12 refers to the death of Philopator. He was most probably the oppressor of 3 Macc.

(5) Ptolemy V, surnamed Epiphanes (Ἐπιφάνης, "Illustrious"). He was only 5 years old when his father Philopator died. Taking advantage of the king's minority, Antiochus the Great, leagued with Philip of Macedon against Egypt. Philip took the Cyclades and some cities in Thrace, while Antiochus defeated the Egyptian general Scopas at Panaeus on the Jordan in 196 BC, and thus Pal phanised the Macedonian dynasty. Some Romans now interfered to make Antiochus surrender his conquests. Not daring to disobey Rome, Antiochus compromised by making peace with Ptolemy and betrothing to him his daughter Cleopatra, who was to succeed to the Macedonian dynasty. Some Romans now interfered to make Antiochus surrender his conquerors. Not daring to disobey Rome, Antiochus compromised by making peace with Ptolemy and betrothing to him his daughter Cleopatra, who was to succeed to the Macedonian dynasty (Jos, Anti XII, iv, 1; Polyb. xxviii.17), but the control of these provinces seems to have been retained by Antiochus. The marriage took place in 193 BC. After the dismissal of his faithful minister, Aristomenes, Epiphanes' character and reign deteriorated. At last he bestirred himself to recover the lost provinces from Seleucus, the successor of Antiochus, but was poisoned before his plans materialized, in 182 (151) BC (Jos, Anti XII, iv, ii). Dnl 11:14-17 is to be interpreted as referring to the relations between Ptolemy V and Antiochus III, "the Great."

(6) Ptolemy VI, surnamed Philometor (Φωλομέτορ, "Pond of his mother"), elder son of Ptolemy V whom he succeeded in 182 (151) BC. For the first 7 years of his reign his brother Cleopatra acted as queen-regent, and peace was maintained with Syria till 173 BC. Antiochus IV Epiphanes then invaded Egypt, defeated the Egyptians at Panaeus, and possessed the person of Ptolemy VI, whom he spared, hoping to employ him as a tool to gain the ascendancy over Egypt. Philometor's brother was now proclaimed king by the Alexandrians, with the title of Euergetes (II). When Antiochus retired, Philometor made peace with his brother, conceding him a share in the government (170 BC). This displeased Antiochus, who marched against Alexandria, but was stopped beneath the walls by a Roman embassy (168 BC), in obedience to which he withdrew. The brothers quarreled against again, and Philometor was expelled by the generals whom Euergetes' son, Rome to seek assistance (164 BC). The Romans seated him again on his throne, assigning Cyrenaica to Euergetes. The next quarrel was about Cyprus. Philometor this time secured his brother as a prisoner, but sent him back to his province. Philometor was later drawn into Syrian politics in the conflict between Alexander Balas and Demetrius. The Egypt king espoused the cause of the former, to whom he also betrothed his daughter Cleopatra. But on discovering Balas' treachery, he took away his daughter from him and gave her to his opponent, Demetrius Nikator, whom he now supported against Balas. Balas was defeated in a decisive battle on the Oenoparos and killed, but Ptolemy himself died in 146 BC from the effects of a fall from his horse in the battle (1 Mace 1:18; 10:51 ff.; 2 Macc 1:10; 4:21). Dnl 11:25-30 refers to the events of this reign. Philometor seems to have taken a friendly attitude toward the Jews. In his reign the city of Egypt was sacked by Seleucus, andSeleucids were founded in 154 BC (Dnl 11, XIII, 1, ii, 1), and two Jewish generals, Onias and Dositheus, were at the head of his armies and had a large share in the government (Jos, Cap, II, 5). The Jewish-Alexandrine philosopher Aristobulus probably lived in this reign.

(7) On the death of Philometor his young son was proclaimed king as Ptolemy Eupator ("of a noble father"), but after reigning but a few months was put to death by his uncle Euergetes II (Just. xxviii.8). His reign being so brief he need hardly be numbered among the Ptolemies.

(8) Ptolemy VII (VIII), surnamed Euergetes (II) and called also Physcon (Φυσκόν, "Big-paunch"), became sole ruler in succession to his brother Philometor (or to his murdered nephew) in 146 BC, and reigned till 117 BC. His reign was characterized by cruelty, tyranny and vice, so that he was hated by his subjects, esp. by the people of Alexandria, who on one occasion expelled him during an insurrection. It is uncertain whether Physcon was an enemy of the Jews or their patron. Some authorities refer the persecutions mentioned in 3 Macc to this reign, but most modern authorities are disposed to date them in the reign of the anti-Jewish Ptolemy IV Philopator. The statement, "in the 38th year of King Euergetes," in the Prologue to Sir refers to Physcon Euergetes II, and=132 BC, since he dated his reign from the year of joint kingship with his brother (170 BC).

The other Ptolemies of Egypt require no mention here.

The following are the apocryphal Ptolemies:

(1) Ptolemy Macron. See Macron.

(2) Ptolemy, son of Abubus, son-in-law of Simon the Maccabees. He treacherously assassinated Simon and two of his sons in the stronghold of Dok near Jericho, 133 BC (1 Macc 14:15).

(3) Ptolemy, the father of Lysimachus (Apoc) (Ad Est 11:1).

(4) Ptolemy, a son of Dositheus; he and his father were bearers of the "epistle of Phrauril" (Ad Est 11:1).

Literature.—J. P. Mahaffy, Empire of the Ptolemies, is the best account for Egypt of the 3rd—1st centuries BC. A long list of Ptolemies will be found, e.g., in Smith's Classical Dict. The ancient authorities are Josephus, Polybius, Justin, Pausanias, Plutarch (Cteom.), Livy, Diodorus, Jerome (Comm. to Dnl 11).

PULSE, pul'as [pul'des], zərō'rim [Dnl 1 12 m, "herbs"], [pul'des], zərō'rim [Dnl 1 16]; cf. ־יִת, zərō'as, "sowing seed" [Lev 11 37, and ־יִת], zərō'm, "things sown" [Isa 61 11]: (1) In Dnl 1 12, 16, it must mean herbs or vegetables grown from seeds; a vegetable diet is what is implied. (2) In 2 S 17 28, "pulse" after "parcheel" is not in the original, but is probably more correct than the tr in (1), as "pulse" usually implies leguminous plants, peas, beans, etc.

LITERATURE:

I. Preliminary Assumptions. — (For "everlasting," where used in AV as the rendering of αἰώνας, αἰών, RV substitutes "eternal.") It is assumed in this art. that Scripture teaches the survival of the soul after death, the reality of retribution and of judgment to come, and a shorter or longer period of suffering for sin in the case of the unredeemed in the world beyond. Only some few words need be said, therefore, in preliminary remark on these assumptions.

Whatever view may be taken of the development of the doctrine of immortality in the OT (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT), it will be after Death out assumed in the NT that the souls of men, good and bad, survive death (see IMMORTALITY). Two passages only need be referred to in proof: one, Christ's saying in Mt 10 28: "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell".
Punishment
THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

(Hebraea); the other, the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus in Lk 16 19–31: Lazarus is carried by the angels to Abraham's bosom: the rich man lifts up his eyes in Hades, the torment of the rich man. The whole doctrine of the future judgment in the NT presupposes survival after death.

Retribution for sin is a cardinal point in the teaching of both the OT and NT. The doctrine of judgment, again, in the NT, with Christ as judge, turns on this point. The following passages are decisive: Isa 3 10.11; Mt 11.22.24; 12 41.42; Rom 2 5.12; 2 Cor 5 10; Gal 6.7.8, etc (see retribution).

The conscious endurance of punishment for sin in the future state is already implied in the preceding. The parable of the Rich Man speaks of it as following immediately on death in Hades; all the descriptions of the judgment imply pain and anguish as the result of condemnation (cf Rom 2 5.12). This does not settle the nature or duration of the punishment; but it excludes the idea that physical death is the extinction of being, or that annihilation follows immediately upon punishment.

These things being assumed, the questions that remain are: Is the period of suffering for sin eternal, or is it terminable? May it be cut short by repentance or by annihilation? Is there any final solution of the problem through the unpunished? It is maintained here that the punishment of sin, in the case of the finally impenitent, is everlasting.

II. Scriptural Support.—The doctrine that the punishment of sin is everlasting is sustained by many plain passages of Scripture.

The doctrine of future punishment is not prominent in the OT, where rewards and punishments are chiefly connected with the present life.

1. OT and life. In a few passages (Ps 49 14.15; 73 18.19; of Isa 24 21.22; 66 24), Dr. Charles thinks that 'Sheol appears as the place of punishment of the wicked' (Eschatology, 73-76, 156). If so, there is no suggestion of escape from it. In Dnl 12, some that sleep in the dust are represented as awaking to 'shame and everlasting contempt' (the word for 'everlasting') is the usual one, 'ādām'. In the Jewish literature of the century before Christ, 'Sheol is regarded,' says Dr. Charles, 'as the place of the dead, as the judgment-seat of God's world, as the unpunished hell' (op. cit., 236; see Eschatology of the OT).

In the NT, the strongest language is used by Jesus and the apostle writers on the certainty and severity of the punishment of sin in the future state, and always in a manner "eternal" (according to Cox it does not mean this at all), but is strictly "age-long," is therefore compatible with, if it does not directly suggest, a terminal punishment, implying a process of purification, and not a mere consummation through and through with the element of time" (p. 100), but he denies its equivalence with "everlasting." The sense, no doubt, is to be determined by the context, but it can hardly be questioned that "the seques of the aeons" and similar phrases are the practical NT equivalents for eternity, and that αἰώνιος in its application to God and to life ("eternal life") includes the idea of an unending duration (cf Jn 10 28.29 for express assertion of this). When, therefore, the term is applied in the same context to punishment, it is frequently used (Mt 25 46), and no hint is given anywhere of limitation, the only reasonable exegesis is to take the word in its full sense of "eternal."

(2) Equivalent expressions.—The meaning "eternal" is confirmed by the use of equivalent expressions and of forms of speech which convey in the strongest manner the idea of finality. Such are the expressions, "the unquenchable fire," the "worm" that "doth not" (Mt 3 12; Mk 9 43-48; of Mt 13 48.50, variously those "unquenchable," "impossible," "death," "destruction," "second death," on which the advocates of conditional immortality build their arguments for final extinction. Such is the dictum of Jesus: 'He that obeiteth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him' (Jn 3 36); the opposite of "life" is "perishing," ver 16) or that in Rev 22 11, "He that is unrighteous, let him do unrighteous still: and he that is filthy, let him be made filthy still." Finally, the notable Scripture, "the outer darkness" (Mt 8 12; 22 13): "The door was shut . . . I know you not" (Mt 25 10.12; of 7 24), as in those of the Epp. (e.g. He 2 3; 6 6-8; 10 27.31; 12 25.29). Jesus speaks of the blasphemy against the Spirit as a sin which shall not be forgiven, "neither in this world, nor in that which is to come" (Mt 12 32; not as implying that other sins, unforgiven in this life, may be forgiven in the next), a passage which Mk gives in the remarkable form, "heath have neverthing, but is guilty of an eternal sin" (Mk 3 29). The Rich Man in Hades found an impassable gulf fixed between himself and Lazarus (Lk 16 26). See GULF.

It adds to the terribleness of these sayings other things that, as Dr. Charles has been at some pains to put against them; no hint or indication of a termination of the doom. Why did Jesus not safeguard His words from misapprehension, if behind them there lay an assurance of restoration and mercy? One may ask with Owenham, in a reply to Jukes, "whether if Christ had intended to teach the doctrine of eternal punishment, He could possibly have taught it in plainer terms."

(3) The last judgment.—The NT doctrine of the last judgment is orthodox and solemn conclusion. Two things seem plainly taught about this judgment: the first, that it proceeds on the matter of the present life—"the things done in the body" (Mt 25 31-46; 2 Cor 5 10; Rev 20 12); and the second, that it is decisive in its issues. Not a single suggestion is given of a reversal of its decisions in any future age. Such silence is inexplicable if the Scriptures meant to teach what the opponents of this doctrine so confidently maintain.

In corroboration of this Scriptural view analogy might be urged. How constantly referred to in this life is the law illustrated of the tend.

3. Teaching of character to fixity! The of Analogy present is the season of grace (2 Cor 6 2), yet what powers of resistance to God and goodness are seen to lie in human nature, and how effectually, often, does it harden itself under the influences that seem most fitted to break down its rebellion! What likelihood is there that eternity will alter this tendency, or make conversion more easy? Eternity can hardly be thought of as more really a threat of space than advocated by Origen to whom the gospel has already come. Its characteristic mark is said to be "judgment" (He 9:27). Like the photographer's bath, may its effect not be to develop and fix existing character, rather than to change it. Such a view in which judgment finds the soul may be presumed to be one that will remain.

III. Difficulties and Objections—Rival Hypotheses.—What, it will now be asked, of the tremendous difficulties which inhere in this doctrine, with their undeniable effect of alienating many generous minds from it and from Christianity? The lurid rhetorical picturings of the sufferings of the lost, too frequent in the teaching of the past, may be discounted; it is not necessary to go beyond the inexpressibly solemn words of Christ Himself and His apostles. But even with this limitation, does it not seem as if, by this doctrine, a reflection was cast on the righteousness and mercy of God in creating such multitudes of the human race, as, on any showing, are outside the pale of Christ's salvation? Are the generations now passing through the masses even in Christian lands who have not received or do not obey the light—only to doom them to endless misery? Before attempting a positive answer, it is proper that a glance be taken at the rival theories put forth in alleviation of the difficulty.

The most comprehensive solution propounded is that of universal salvation—of a final restitution of all souls to God's favor and to bliss.

1. Universal Salvation. This tempting speculation—Salvation for all, is no more advocated by the early church, by Schleiermacher in the last century, has been urged by many writers in modern times. One of its best known advocates was Samuel Cox, in his book Salverator Mundi. It is noticeable that not a few who favor this theory (e.g. Maurice, Farrar) decline to commit themselves to it as more than a "hope," and admit the possibility of human souls continuing to resist God endlessly (Maurice, Theological Essays, 470; Farrar, Evolution and Judgment, I, 485, "in this sense there may be for some souls an endless hell"). It must, however, be evident that, be the number greater or smaller—and who shall give assurance of its smallness?—if there are any such souls, the difficulty in the case remains and the passage alleged as teaching universal restoration is equally contradicted. The deeper objection to this theory is that, springing, not from real knowledge, but from men's hopes and wishes, it has, as already shown, the tremendous stress of Scripture testimony against it; nor do the passages commonly adduced as favoring it really bear the weight put upon them. We read, e.g., of a "restoration of all things"—the same that Christ calls the palingenesia—but, in the same breath, we are told those Pref., xxv in the N. T. will not be reckoned, and will be destroyed (Mt 19:28; Acts 3:21). We read of Christ drawing all men unto Him (Jn 12:32), but we are not less clearly told that at His coming will pronounce on some a tremendous condemnation (Mt 7:23; 25:41); we read of all things being governed, or esteemed up, in Christ, of Christ subduing all things to Himself, etc.; but representative exeges like Meyer and Weiss show that it is far from Paul's view to teach an ultimate conversion or annihilation in the future kingdom of God (cf Meyer on 1 Cor 15:21-28, and Eph 1:10; Weiss, Bib. Theol., II, 723, 107, 109, ET). We confess, however, that the strain of these last passages does seem to point in the direction of some ultimate unity, be it through subjugation, or in some other way, in which active opposition to God's kingdom is no longer to be reckoned with.

The view favored by another class is that of the annihilation of the finally impenitent. The type of doctrine called "conditional immortality" includes other elements (see IMMORTALITY). The annihilation theory takes different forms. So far as the annihilation is supposed to take place at death, it is contradicted by the Scriptures which support the soul's survival after death; so far as it is believed to take place after a longer or shorter period of conscious suffering (which is White's theory), it involves its advocates in difficulties with their own interpretations of "death," "destruction," "perishing," seeing that in Scripture this doom is uniformly represented as overtaking the ungodly at the day of judgment, and not at some indefinite period thereafter. The theory conflicts also with the idea of a gradual development of punishment, for which room has to be sought in the period of conscious suffering, and rests really on an unduly narrowed conception of the meaning of the Scriptural terms "life" and "death." Life is not bare existence, nor is "death" necessarily extinction of being. The language of most Scriptural texts implies the continued existence of the subjects of the Divine wrath.

It is significant that on the side alike of the advocates of restoration and of that of annihilation, from the difficulty of the case, refuge from the difficulties is frequently sought in the Probation hypothesis of an extended probation and work of evangelization beyond death. This theory labors under the drawback that, in marked contrast with Scripture, it throws immensely the larger part of the work of salvation into the future state of being. It is, besides, apart from the dubious and limited support given to it by the passage on Christ's preaching to "the spirits in prison" (1 Pet 3:19-20), destitute of Scriptural support. It has already been pointed out that the final judgment is uniformly represented as proceeding on the matter of this life. The theory is considered elsewhere (see also § V. X).

IV. Nature, Conditions and Issues.—While dogmas like the above, which seem opposed to Scripture, are to be avoided, it is equally necessary to guard against dogmas of an opposite kind, as if it were not possible to the human mind to find in Scripture the doctrine of a final punishment of sin. Such a doctrine is consistent with the language of Scripture, with its undisguised mysteries of which we here in time can frame no conception. The difficulties connected with the ultimate destinies of mankind are truly enormous, and no serious thinker will minimize them. Scripture does not warrant it in negative, any more than in positive, dogmas; with its uniformly practical aim, it does not seek to satisfy an idle curiosity (cf Lk 13:24-27). Its language is bold, popular, figurative, intense; the essential idea is to be held fast, but what is said cannot be taken as a directory to all that is to transpire in the ages upon ages of an unending duration. God's methods of dealing with sin in the eternities may prove to be as much above our present thoughts as His dealings now are with men in grace. In His hands we must be content to leave it, only using such light as His immediate revelation yields.

As respects the nature of the punishment of sin, it cannot be doubted that in its essence it is spiritual. Everything can be adopted here which is said by Maurice and others of the eternal punishment of being without the knowledge of God, who is love, and of Jesus Christ who has manifested it; even as... eternal life is declared to be the having the knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ" (Theological Essays, 450). The supreme penalty of sin is unquestionably the loss of God's life and love—the being sinful. Environment, indeed, may be expected to estrange him from the holy, but the hole is the sinner essentially makes for himself, and, like the kingdom of God, is within. The fire, the worm, the stripes, that figure its severity, are not physical. Even should the poena sensus (were that conceivable) be utterly removed, the poena damnation would eternally remain.

It is a sound principle that, in His dealing with the world in the coming, God's mercy will reach as far as ever it can reach. This follows

3. Range of from the whole Scriptural revelation of Divine character of God. What may Mercy be included in it, it is impossible for anyone to say. It should be noticed that those of whom it is said that they shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them, are the ones who deny not the truth (Dt 3 30) who actively and consciously disregard and oppose it. But all do not belong to this class. It may be assumed that none will be lost who can in consistency with holiness and love be saved. The most germinal goodness, which is the indwelling Spirit of our own Spirit, God will acknowledge and develop. The problem of undeveloped character may receive a solution we do not wot of with the entrance into the eternal light—not in change of character, but rather, as said before, in the revelation of character's inmost bent. In this sense, the entrance into eternity may be to many the revelation of a love and grace which had not been understood or appreciated as it should have been on earth, but with which it is essential to be familiar. There are at least many shades and degrees of character, and God may be intrusted to take the most just, yet most merciful, account of all.

The fullest weight must further be given to what the Scripture so expressly says of gradation of punishment, even of the unsaved. It is not the case that the lot of all who fail of the eternal life in Christ is all Punishment of one grade. There are the "few stripes" and the "mercy stripes" (Lk 12 47; 48); those for whom it will be "more tolerable" than for others in the day of judgment (Mt 11 20; 24). Even "Sodom and her daughters" will be mercifully dealt with in comparison with others (Ezk 16 49; 55). There is to be for every one the most exact weighing of privilege, knowledge and opportunity. There is a vast area here for the Divine administration on which no light at all is afforded us.

There remain those passages already alluded to which do seem to speak, not, indeed, of conversion or admission into the light and fellowship of all. 5. God "All ship of Christ's kingdom, but still of a in All" final subjugation of the powers of evil, to the extent, at least, of a cessation of active opposition to God's will, of some form of ultimate unification and acknowledgment of Christ as Lord. Such passages are Eph 1 10; Phil 2 9-11; above all, 1 Cor 18 24-28. God, in this final vision, has become "all in all." Here, again, dogmatism is entirely out of place, but it is permissible to believe that these texts foreshadow such a final subjugation of God's righteousness in His judgment and of the futurity of further rebellion as shall bring about an outward pacification and restoration of order in the universe disturbed therein, though it can never repair that eternal loss accruing from exclusion from Christ's kingdom and glory.

(He 12 29), ἱμπρία, ékphrēsia, "vindication," "retribution" (1 Pet 2 14 AV): A court could inflict for a crime against the person, a sentence of (1) death in the form of stoning, burning, beheading, or strangling, etc; (2) exile to one of the cities of refuge in case of manslaughter, where the stripes, not to exceed 40, in practice 39 or less (Dt 25 3; 2 Cor 11 24). Offences against property (theft, fraudulent conversion of deposit, embezzlement, robbery) were punished by exacting more than the value of the things taken (Lk 19 8), the excess going to the injured party, thus differing from a fine, which goes into the treasury of the community. The housebreaker was liable to be slain with impunity (Ex 22 2). A fine in the modern sense is unknown in the Scriptures, unless Lev 6 8-19 be interpreted as referring to such.

The earliest theory of punishment seems to have been that of retaliation—"blood for blood"—and to some extent this principle appears even in the Law of Moses (Lev 24 19-20; Mt 5 38). Early in the history of the Hebrew Law of the race, punishment was administered for sin and crime. Adam and Punishment Eve were driven from the Garden, and Cain, the first murderer, though not Putting and Cain, the first murderer, though not sentenced in retaliation in death, nevertheless, had a mark set on him. The words of Lamech (Gen 4 24) indicate that death was regarded as the fitting punishment for murder, and the same thought apparently was in the minds of the brethren of Joseph (42 21). Judah, as head of his family, seems to have had power of life and death (38 24), and Abimelech threatens his people with the extreme punishment in case they injure or insult Isaac or his wife (26 11). Similar power is ascribed to Pharaoh (41 13).

Under the Law of Moses, the murderer was to be put to death without mercy. Even if he took refuge at the altar in a sanctuary or in an asylum city, he would not be imitated and Cain, the first murderer, though not sentenced in retaliation in death, nevertheless, had a mark set on him. fact that the nation consisted of newly emancipated slaves, and therefore required harsh measures to keep them in check.

Under the Mosaic Law, the offences that made one liable to the punishment of death were: (1) sedition, or being a rebel against a parent (Ex 21 15; 17); (2) blasphemy (Lev 24 14,16-23; Nu 21 10; Mt 26 65-66); (3) Sabbath-breaking (Ex 31 14; 35 2; Nu 15 32-36); (4) witchcraft and false pretension to prophecy (Ex 22 18; Lev 20 27; Dt 17 2; 19 20; 21 9); (5) adultery (Lev 20 10; Dt 22 22); (6) murder (Nu 35 15-21); (7) keeping medical intercourse with a woman, but detected afterw blaze (Dt 22 21), (b) in case of a woman with someone other than her betrothed (Dt 22 23), (c) in a priest's daughter (Lev 21 9); (7) rap (Dt 22 25); (8) incestuous and unnatural connections (Ex 22 19; Lev 20 11 14. 16); (9) man-stealing (Ex 21 16); (10) idolatry, actual or virtual, in any form (Lev 20 2; Dt 13 6, 17 2-7); (11) false witness in capital cases (Dt 19 16,19).

A large number of offences come under the law of punishment by cutting off from the people, the meaning of which expression has led to some controversy. It may signify excommunication or death, and occurs in connection with the following offences: (a) offenses against parents, such as beheading a father (Nu 15 30.31); incestuous or unnatural connections (Lev 18 29-30-21); (2) breach of covenant, brought about through unchastened (Gen 17 14; Ex 4 24), neglect of Passover (Nu 19 13), Sabbath-breaking (Lev 26 1), neglect of Atonement Day (Lev 23 29), work done on the Atonement Day (Lev 23 30), children offered to Moloch (Lev 20 3), witchcraft (Lev 20 6), anointing an alien with holy oil (Ex 30 33); (3) breach of ritual, committed by eating leavened bread during Passover (Ex 12 15,19), eating fat of sacrifices (Lev 7 25), eating blood (Lev 7 27; 17 14), eating sacrifices while unclean (Lev 7 20.21; 11 3.4. 9), offering too late (Lev 19 8), making holy ointment for private use (Ex 30 33), making perfume for private use (Ex 30 38), general neglect of purification (Nu 19 13.20), bringing offering after slaying a beast for food (Lev 17 10), slaying the animal at a place other than the tabernacle (Lev 17 11,12), touching holy things illegally (Nu 4 15.18.20).

Of capital punishments that are properly regarded as of Hebrew origin, we note:

(1) Stoning, which was the ordinary mode of execution (Ex 19 13; Lev 20 27; Josh 7 25; Lk 23 33). Stoning was inflicted in case of women, of whom there were at least two, were required to cast the first stone (Dt 13 9 f; Jn 8 7). If these failed to cause death, the bystanders proceeded to complete the sentence, whereupon the body was to be suspended until sunset (Dt 21 25).

(2) Hanging is mentioned (Nu 25 4; Dt 21 22), probably not as a mode of execution, but rather of exposure after death. It may have been a Cannaishit punishment, since it was practised by the Gibonites on the sons of Saul (2 S 21 5-9).

(3) Burning, before the age of Moses, was the punishment of unchastity (Gen 38 24). The Law prescribes it as a punishment in the case of a priest's daughter (Lev 21 9), and in case of incest (Lev 20 14), but it is also mentioned as following death by other means (Lev. 19 26). It is possible that it was used as a form of punishment for those who were赋 death by other means (Lev 17 27 .28), and some believe it was never used excepting after death. That it was sometimes used as a punishment on living persons among the heathen is shown by Dn 3.

(4) The sword or spear as an instrument of punishment is mentioned in the law (Ex 19 13; 32 27; Nu 25 7 ff). It occurs frequently in monarchical and post-Bab times (Jgs 9 5; 1 S 15 33; 2 S 20 22; 1 K 19 1; Jer 26 23; Mt 14 8.10), but among these cases, there are some of assassination rather than of punishment.

(5) Strangling as a form of punishment has no Scripture authority, but according to tradition was frequently employed, and is said to have been performed by immersing the convict in clay or mud, and then strangling him by a cloth tied round the neck. Besides these, which are to be regarded as the ordinary capital punishments, we read of some that were either of foreign introduction or of an irregular kind, such as: (1) crucifixion (q.v.); (2) drowning (Mt 18 Foreign 6); (3) sawing asunder or crushing Origin (2 S 12 31; Ho 11 37); (4) torturing (1 Ch 20 3; He 11 35); (5) precipitation (2 Ch 26 12; Lk 4 29); (6) suffocation (2 Macc 13 4-8). The Persians are said to have filled a high tower a great way up with ashes, and then to have thrown the criminal into it, and continually stirred up the ashes by means of a wheel till he was suffocated (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchy, III, 246). See also Nuzi, II, 100.

Secondary forms of punishment not heretofore mentioned are to be noted as follows:

(1) Blinding or putting out of eyes in the case of captives (Jgs 16 21; 1 S 11 2; 2 K 25 7).

(2) Chastisement as withfuls or letters of copper or iron, similar to our handcuffs fastened on the wrists and ankles and attached to each other by a chain (Jgs 16 21; 2 S 8 34; 2 K 25 7); also alluded to in the life of Paul (Acts 28 20; Eph 6 20; 2 Tim 1 16); and in the case of Peter (Acts 12 6).

(3) Confiscation of property that had fallen under the ban, i.e. had been singled out for destruction by the special decree of Jeh, as in Nu 21 2; Josh 6 17; or had been reserved for the army (Dt 2 35; 20 14; Josh 22 8); or given over to the priesthood (Josh 6 19). The term may be extended to include all things vowed or sanctified and those irrevocably devoted to consecration to God (Lev 27 21, 28). The idea is applied with special emphasis to those things which, because of their uncleanness, must not be used by the Israelites, though, through their warfare with the heathen, they might have come into possession of them (Dt 7 20; 1 S 15 16-20).

(4) Dashing in pieces (Ps 2 9; Isa 13 18).

(5) Divine visitation.

See VISITATION.

(6) Exposure to wild beasts (Lev 26 22; 1 S 17 46; Dnl 6).

(7) Flaying (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchy, I, 478; Nineveh and Babylon; mentioned figuratively in Mic 3 3).

(8) Forfeiture (Ex 10 8).

(9) Gallows in the modern sense were probably unknown to the ancients. Where the word occurs in Est (8 14; 6 4; 7 9.10; 9 13.25), it probably refers to a beam or pole on which the body was impaled and then elevated to a height of 50 cubits as an object of warning to the people (see "Hanging").

(10) Imprisonment is frequently referred to in both the OT and the NT, indicating that this was a common mode of punishment among both the Israelites and other nations (Gen 40 3; 42 17; 2505 THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

(11) Indigities.—In this term may be included all those outbursts of vengeance or other evil dispositions that were practised in times or under circumstances when liberties with the prisoner were permitted on the part of bystanders or those who had charge beyond the execution of the judicial decree. Instances are found in the life of Christ (Mt 26 66-67; Lk 22 63 ff; Jn 18 22); also in the life of Paul (Acts 23 2).

(12) Mulctation (Jgs 6 7; Ezk 23 25; 2 Mac 7).—The Law was opposed to thus treating any Israelite, and Samuel, when referring to the arbitrary power of the future king (1 S 8 10 ff), does not say that he would thus treat “their sons.” It was a barbarous custom of the East (see Eunuchs, Polygamy), evidently regarded, among the Hebrews, as a heinous practice (Dt 23 1). The only act authorizing mulctation (except in retaliation) is mentioned in Dt 25 11.

(13) Plucking off the hair is alluded to as a mode of punishment in Neh 13 25; Isa 60 6.

(14) Prison garments were in vogue to mark the convicts (Jer 32 33).

(15) Restitution has been alluded to in the general introduction to this topic.

(16) Retaliation was recognized by Moses as a principle, but the application of it was left to the judge (Lev 24 19-22). A fine example of it is found in the law of Dt 19 10.

(17) Scorpions, chasting with.—Probably the use of thongs armed with pointed pieces of lead or other metal (1 K 12 11; 2 Ch 10 14). See Scorpions.

(18) Scourging. See separate article.

(19) Slavery. See separate article.

Punon, pūnon (πονον, πονον): A desert camp of the Israelites, the second after leaving Mt. Hor (Nu 33 42-45; Eusebius (Onom 299 85; 125 9) mentions the same place as Petra, a city rising seven days’ journey from the desert, where convicts were mining copper, called Phinon or Phainon. These are doubtless identical. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

Pur, pūr (Est 3 7; 9 26). See Purim.

Purah, pūra (πορα, purah, “branch”): Gideon’s “servant,” lit. “young man,” i.e. armor-bearer (Jgs 7 10 f, AV “Phurah”).

Purchase, pūchās: In modern Eng., “to acquire by payment,” in Elizabethan Eng., “to acquire” by any means. In the OT, AV has used “purchase” to represent παραδοτικος, and its derivatives (vb. and noun), except in Lev 26 33, where the word is παραδοτικον, and “paradotikos,” in Acts 20 28; 1 Tim 3 13. But none of these words connotes the payment of a price, so that RV has kept the word only in Acts 20 28 (in “acquired”), changing it into “obtain” in Acts 1 18; 8 20, and “gave” in 1 Tim 3 13. In the OT, RV has “gotten” in Ex 15 16 and ARV has (very properly) introduced the same word into the text of Ps 74 2; 78 54.

PURE, pūr, PURITY, pū,lī, PURITY, pū,ri,ti: This group of words has in the OT and the NT an almost exclusively ethical significance, though the word “pure” is of course used also in its literal sense of freedom from alloy or other alien matter (Ex 25 11, etc.). “Pure” in the OT represents many Heb.

words, most frequently פור ⟨פורה⟩, fāhō; “purely,” occurs only once in AV, as the tr of וא, bōr, properly “that which cleanses” (cf Job 9 30, RVm “Heb. ‘cleanse my hands with lye’”). The same word is used in Isa 1 25, RV “thoroughly [in ‘as with lye’], AV ‘purely’] purge away thy dross”; “purerness” is the AV tr of the same word in Job 22 30, RV “cleanness.” In the NT “pure” is the tr chiefly of ευπνοον, katharōs (Mt 5 8, “Blessed are the pure in heart,” etc), but also of ἀγνοον, hagnōs (Phil 4 8; 1 Tim 5 22; Jas 3 17; 1 Jn 3 3)—always in an ethical sense. A different word (εὐκορίνης) is used in 2 Pet 3 1, RV “holy.” “Purity” more accurately “make holy,” in AV in Tim 4 12; 5 2; in RV in 2 Cor 11 3 (as the tr of τὸ ἁγιαστός).

Purge, pūr: A number of words in both the OT and the NT are so rendered in AV and RV. Although frequently in RV the older Eng. word “purge” is displaced by the more applicable modern terms “cleanse” and “purify,” since the emphatic and medical senses of the word, as we now use it, are not justified by some of the Heb. and Gr. origins. In older Eng. the word was broader in meaning; today it is specific. Occurrences in AV, with the changes made in RV, are as follows:

(1) פור, fāhō, lit. “to be clean.” Used of the putting-away of idolatry from Judah by Josiah (2 Ch 34 3-8). “Purge” is used in all passages but, in Ex 23 13, ARV changes to “cleanse.” (2) ניקא, nikā, “to make a sin offering” (Ps 51 7), is changed without improvement to “purify” in AV, while “purge” is retained in ERV. (3) נפים, naphē, “to cover” or “to make atonement.” Occurs in Ps 65 8; 79 9; Ezek 43 20-26; in the two passages in Ps, RV has “forgive” (the “expire” of ἁναπνεύς) of is still better), and in Ezek the even more accurate “make atonement” (In both (4) ריקך, rīqār, “to refine” (Isa 1 25), and (5) נף, naphē, lit. “to rinse” (Isa 4 4), “purge” is well retained in RV. (6) נפק, nēfēk, “to shine.” RV retains in Ezek 20 38, but in Dtn 11 35 changes to “purify.” (7) פ:number, “to make clean.” “Purification” becomes “purify” in RV.

These usages are all in the figurative sense, and apply to sin, uncleanness, idolatry, etc. Most noteworthy is the ARV change of the familiar Ps 51 7.

The Gr. words rendered “purge” in AV of the Apc and NT are καθαρισσεως, katharιsiseōs, and καθαρισμος, katharismos, and their compounds and derivatives.

2. In the NT, (a) properly translates “cleanse” (Mt 3 12; Mk 1 7; Lk 3 17; Jn 16 2; He 9 14-22; 10 2). In He 1 10 “when he had by himself purged our sins” is changed to “had made purification.” But in the case of the vb. compounded with the prep. ἀπο, apō, and εκ, ek, i.e. apokatharizō and ekkatharizō (Job 12 9; 1 Cor 5 7; 2 Tim 2 21), with strong signification to “cleanse out,” RV more properly retains the range of the meaning. But the change of the familiar verb in Jn, “Every branch, that beareth fruit, he purgeth” to “Every branch . . . he cleanseth” (15 2).

1. Scripture References of the Purim story in the Bible are primarily in the book of Esther, as well as in the Apocrypha. The story is set in the context of Persian empire, with a plot against the Jews of Persia.

2. History of Purim Purim is a Jewish festival celebrated on the 14th day of Adar, commemorating the deliverance of the Jews from a planned massacre by Haman, the eunuch of the Persian emperor, Ahasuerus. The Purim story is told in the Book of Esther, a historical romance written in the Hebrew language.

3. Manner of Observance Purim is celebrated with feasting, drinking, and public readings from the Book of Esther. The feast is marked by merrymaking, and the story of Purim is read aloud at synagogues on the evening of the 14th of Adar.

4. Theories of Origin of the Name Purim Purim may be derived from the Hebrew word pur, meaning "rejoicing," but other explanations have been suggested. One theory is that Purim is a combination of the names of Mordecai and Esther.

Many attempts have been made to trace the origin of Purim in Persian or Greek folklore, but the present time without success, without approach to probability. It is the story of the triumph of truth, of the victory of good over evil, which has made Purim such an important festival in the Jewish calendar.

PURITY, pûr’i-ti: The Bible bears witness to the long struggle over and in man to secure physical, mental, and moral cleanliness. The various forms of purity have relation to each other.

We have a common proverb that "cleanliness is next to godliness." Cleanliness and health are certainly high neighbors. But cleanliness and ethics do not dwell farther apart. We habitually demand cleanliness of others, but we are not always willing to practice it ourselves. The Bible teaches us that cleanliness is of great importance in the home and in society. cleanliness and health are necessary to maintain the well-being of the individual and the community. Without cleanliness, diseases can easily spread, and the health of the community can be jeopardized. But cleanliness is not merely physical, but also spiritual. The Bible teaches us that purity of heart and conscience is equally important.

The perception of this relationship is very ancient. Thorough it is Isaiah who says (59:11), "Cleanse yourselves, you priests, and put on righteousness, O inhabitants of Jerusalem! Let the people of Judah seek knowledge; let your priests seek knowledge; let your rulers know righteousness. Let them judge the fatherless and the orphan, and the right of the afflicted, and of the poor.

and pots, and brason vessels," yet such statements are but summaries of directions distributed here and there throughout the whole Levitical Law. We can read therein what sounds like the hygienic orders of a general to his soldiers on the march, or like the rules of the board of health to preserve a city from pestilence. And these Levitical directions for cleanliness are connected inseparably with the worship of Jeh, as though physical purity were to that an essential. The Psalmist blends these two elements—physical and spiritual, in the familiar question and answer (24 3-5), "Who shall ascend into the hill of Jeh? and who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto falsehood, and hath not sworn deceitfully. He shall receive a blessing from Jeh, and righteousness from the God of his salvation."

The ceremonial cleansings called for by the Law had meaning and influence. They were interpretative of something spiritual—were a parable way of illustrating the necessity of purity of heart in order to gain acceptance with God. If in after-days the thing symbolized was forgotten in the symbol, that was owing to "blindness of mind." The darkness was not necessary.

But the main subject in respect to which we shall in this art, is the right of purity from the Bible, will not be hygiene or aesthetics, but morals. The Sex

1. The Sex

When we turn to that department of humanity which the well recognized in the religion of the Hebrews, the Bible recognizes the ideal of purity in family life as a thing of common life with each other. This is remarkable, for it is a vast history over which its narrative sweeps, and in it every species of literature is represented. It sets forth the acts and views of a people in all the stages of civilization, from wandering nomads to dwellers in cities embellished by architecture and every device of man to set forth riches and splendor. It sets forth their crime, shame and sin, as well as their virtues, but its tone is approbative of the virtues and reproductive of the shame and sin. In the Mosaic Laws the Commandments—there stands in equal rank with any other principle, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." The sanction of religion and law was thus given to the integral purity of family life. The minute regulations against marriage with relatives, and the severe punishments inflicted for disregard of the restrictions (Lev 18 and 20), were a powerful force in the same direction. The adultery of married persons was to be punished by the death of both the parties (Lev 20 10; Dt 22 22).

Such laws may sometimes seem severe. Doubtless they are primitive and date from the time of nomadism. In primitive conditions, penalties for infraction of law are to be severe. Pioneers the world over, and through time, for very self-preservation's sake, could show little or tolerance to lawlessness. Be these laws severe, they show the intense earnestness of a people to have a pure family life in which children born should be educated to it. The Levitical restrictions upon incest and marriage with relatives fit the sense of propriety and right of civilized people, even to this day.

There is no question about the attitude of the prophets on purity. They were in harmony with the Law. They had no tolerance for corrupt morals or manners leading to impurity or suggesting it. An illustration sometimes has the light of the sun in it. What it is that is illustrated is frequently best seen by looking at the illustration itself. The prophets were passionate monotheists. They wanted above all things that Israel should be true to Jeh and to Him alone. To the prophets, worship of other gods was treason to Jeh. One prophet after another, and over and over again, illustrates this highest form of faith by an instance of the relation. That shows in what estimate the family was held. To put any other in the place of Jeh was "to go a-whoring after other gods," or "to play the harlot." That shows as nothing else could how far the Israelites were removed from the primitive life. Indulgence was high treason there, or it never would have furnished language to describe high treason to God.

Prov 5 and 7 indicate the attitude of the book on purity. We may let the book make its own case. The wiles and the stupid folly and destruction of her victim are specially set forth in the chapters mentioned. In the last chapter of the book we have a portraiture of a "virtuous woman" in whom domesticity in purity has reached a high stage. "Let her own works praise her in the gates."

It is pleasant to turn from the tense severity of law, since it must deal largely with crime and sin, to the poetic idealism of the Psalms and Proverbs. The Sex

2. The Prophets

The Prophets the relation of husband and wife, see bridegroom and bride, are always treated with tenderness and reverence. Here is familiar Scripture (Ps 19): "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun, which, as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run his course. That does not betray any lack of sympathy for the exuberant spirit of a lover. So Is 62 4-5, "For Jeh delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married. For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy husband marry thee; and the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, and the young man over his damsel. The maiden in the joy of those who are adjusting themselves under the primal eldest" rule over sex. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen 2 24).

It is sometimes thought strange that the Song of Songs should be in the Scripture Canon. But why should there be such doubt? It is but a more particular elaboration of what is boldly brought to notice in the quotations above. There is no more necessity of reading impurity into it than there is of reading into the quotations above. It is illustrative of an experience as widely known as any in the life of the human race—an experience in which sin is no necessity. One must go out of his way who imputes sin to a single act or thought that comes to expression in the poem. The maiden is guileless and the lover is marry. The poem is said to be erotic. But the eros is idealized. It may be sensuous, but it is not sensual. It is not selfish. The passion of each finds expression in care. The thoughts for the other. It does not go back to itself in coarse brute craving of lust for its own self-indulgence. The refrain of the poem is—

"I satoure you, O daughters of Jerusalem That ye stir not up, nor awake my love;"
—Cant 2 7; 3 5; 8 4.

The watchfulness is as tender as that for an infant. Where will the law lay its indictment of sin against such thoughts and feelings? The lovers are under the charm that has been and is to be from everlasting to everlasting with the human race upon the earth.

Christ at His strictest did not set Himself against the charm of love. He said it should be eternally sincere and true in spirit. The maiden in the song goes forth in the light, in the simplicity of her heart (3 2ff). In the same simplicity, Evangelino wandered all the night of her life to find the object of her affection.
From the same charm in the beginning came the faithfulness of Enoch Arden. Out of the love that springs from the inner heart, which endures to the end. The exuberance of the charm, like every other spiritual quality of regulation, but the charm itself is not to be treated as sin.

Paul has said, "Ye are not under law, but under grace" (Rom 6:14). But that depends upon the conditions to which it is applied.

5. Christ and Purity

Christian Law, but we are under the wide realm of ethical values, even when we are under grace. What grace does is to idealize and spiritualize and make attractive and beautiful what before was perhaps hard, repellent statute and rule. Christ is sometimes thought to have relaxed the severity of "the reign of law." But six times even in the Sermon on the Mount He added to its strictness. Take the idea of the purity of the family as secured by its unity. Under the Mosaic legislation, certain not many forms of legal proceeding, terminating the union or the exception be said to be optional with the parties. All this liberty is swept away in the sentence: "I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery" (Mt 19:9). That is a law sentence. It was uttered in the realm of law. It was intended to have effect in law. No wonder, considering that, that had been allowed in the Law up to that time, that the disciples as soon as they got breath said, "If the case of a man is so with his wife, it is not expedient to marry. They knew that a new law for Christ's disciples was put up in marriage. Even the exception confirmed his rule. If the exception is not allowed, polyandry or polygamy is established. No other sentence of human speech has done more for the purity of family life (see DIVORCE). But Christ did not step with the utterance of law protective of purity physically; He went behind all acts and laid down law for the thoughts and intents of the heart: "But I say unto you, that every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Mt 5:28).

Sometimes it may be thought that there is a lack of moral indifference about the way in which Jesus disposed of the woman's case who was taken in adultery (Jn 8:5). He did condemn her. And she was cast out. No man, Lord. And Jesus said, Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more. And it must first be remembered that it was not her case but that of her accusers that was immediately before the mind of Jesus. They had brought her before Him to trap Him, but He turned and put them on trial. He made their moral condition the main issue. Her was not an incident. But then, Jesus did not leave her without impressing on her mind that she was a sinner. The last words left ringing in her ears were, "Sin no more." And she was left, as all in sin are left, to wrestle out adjustment with the Holy Spirit, who leaves no soul without conviction of sin, righteousness and judgment. The words of Jesus no more than the words of anyone else can explain all things once. They can cover a point of view, but much must always be left to the understanding that comes from known experience under the more universal law of God.

The subsequent psychology of a sinner after the words of Scripture leave him in no degree of interest. Psychological action he must have had: what is it? The question arises. Had the prodigal son completed his repentance till he had asked the forgiveness of his mother and his elder brother? What is the subsequent psychological of a sinner as he disappears from your view? We can interpret to ourselves what we know about the operations of the Holy Spirit in the soul: just as we know a material object, we can work off the spirit from where it is still under the domain of gravitation. Few who have thought on this subject have expressed the truth so well as Whittier in "Our Master's Voice": "And men took note of his gloomy air / The shame in his eye, the halt in his prayer. / The signs of a battle lost with sin / The pain of a soul in the coils of sin. / Into the desert alone rode he. / Alone with the Infinite Purity; / And bowing his head to the tender rebuke, / As Peter did to the Master's look. / He measured his path with pain of prayer / For sin with God and grace again. / There is a recognition of the burning with fire that is infolded in the word "purity."

Paul is like his Master. He seeks for purity in this relation after marriage as well as before—purity of mind.

6. Paul and Purity

how carefully and kindly Paul discussed all the complications in matters pertaining to sex. Then again, if Paul has exalted wives to obedience to husbands, he has also called for equal self-surrender on the part of husbands (Eph 5:22-33). "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself up for it." Can there be any self-surrender greater than that which Christ made? Here let attention be called to the fact that in his catalogue of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5:22), if he has put "love" in the first place of emphasis among the nine, he has put "self-control" in the last.

We have only space for a glance at a few departments of action and thought to see what the world has gained in purity from the religion of the Churches. The age of chivalry ought to have a word put to its credo. The knight took up the ideal of chastity, of reverence and purity, of the spirit of the church. Take art—compare a Venus and a Madonna. Not only spirituality, but even intellectuality was wanting from a Venus that does not inhere in flesh and sense. Of what would we or could we speak if we were to open her mouth? To judge from her appearance, the utterance would be so "flat, stale and unprofitable" that even the charm of her physical beauty would disappear. In the Madonna you scarce see the physical. If she were to speak, her words would reflect the peace and calm joy of a heavenly realm. If her countenance is suggestive of something far away, it is of something far above.

But art is not dead, and spiritual art did not die with the creation of the Madonna. Take St. Gaudens' "Puritan." We are aware that with an Apollo, again we have the contrast there is between a Madonna and a Venus. We have the physical and the aesthetic in an Apollo, but there is not a gleam of the intellectual. That Apollo thinks is not indicated, much less what he might be thinking about. There is not the faintest suggestion of the intellectual. There is no intent and purpose in him. But in the Puritan there is intent and purpose. He means much. He is still seeking, not "love" in the first place of emphasis among the nine, he has put "self-control" in the last.

PURLOILING, pur-lO\'ning: Lit. "for far off," hence to carry away or steal; the word is the tr of προφύλαξις, προφύλαξις, "to take away for one's self," "to secret," "to steal," a word appropriate to those in a position in a master's service (Tit 2:10, "not purloining").

PUPRLE, pur'pl (πορφύρα, argamā́n; Chald. πορφύρα, argamā́n [2 Ch 2:7]; of Arab. ṣ̄ārjānu, urjuwûn, and Pers 𐭫𐭥𐭩𐭢, arghadānu; πορφύρα, porphāra, πορφύρος, porphēros [LXX and NT]):

Purple dye was manufactured by the Phoenicians from a marine mollusk, Murex trunculus. The shell was broken in order to remove the soft purplish-black thread that was removed and crushed. The crushed gland gives a purple fluid that becomes red or purplish with air. Piles of these broken shells still remain on the coast at Sidon and Tyre. The purple gland is found in various species of Murex and also of Dianthus.

(Est 815); Jesus by the Rom soldiers (Mt 1517.20; Jn 192.5). The rich man of Lk 1619 and the scarlet woman of Rev 1812.16 were arrayed in purple. In Cant 75 the bride has hair like purple. Purple is in the merchandise of Babylon (Rev 1812). It is surprising that Ezekiel speaks of the Tyrians as obtaining purple from the isles of Elishah (Ezk 277) and from Syria (Ezk 2716). PURPOSE, pûr'pûs. OF GOD (προόρισμα, προβολής [Rom 911; Eph 111]). The word “purpose” seems to be an equivalent of the word “decree” as used in regard to man’s relation to eternity. More correctly stated, it softens the word “decree” and refers back to the cause of the decree as lodged in an intelligent design and forward to an aim consistent with the character of God. See Foreordination; Predestination.

PURSE, pûrs. See Bag.

PURSLAIN, pûrs'la'n, JUICE, jûs, jûs. See Juice.

PURTENANCE, pûr'te-nans: With the signification of “belongings,” this word occurs in AV of Ex 129 as the tr of ἡρεμία, “hereth,” “within,” “inward,” “roast, . . . with the pertenance thereof,” RV “inwards” (cf Lev 19; 33, etc).

PUT, put (אָמַס, pâl; φοῦθ, Phoûth, in Gen and Ch, variant for Gen פֹּר, Phoûth, for Ch, פּוֹש, Phoûth): 1. Renderings:

In consequence of the identification of the time, the prophets have “Libya” (Akkâr, Libyen), except Nah 39, where the Gr renders the word as ἰβωθ, πυφιῦ, “flight.” The Vulg has “Phut,” “Phuth,” and in the Prophets “Libyes” and “Libya”; AV “Phut.” In the “Table of Nations” Put is the third son of Ham (Gen 106), the first and second being Cush and Mischam, and the fourth Canaan. Put is the only one of the sons of Ham who is not credited with descendants.

In the Prophets, warriors from Put are referred to, principally in connection with the forces of Egypt. They appear as shield-bearers (Jer 469: “Cush and Put, that handle the shield; and the Lud, that handle and bend the bow”). See also Ezek 305, where the order in the Heb is Cush, Put and Lud. In Nah 39 Put is the number of No-amon (Thebes in Egypt), and in Ezek 2710 Put appears with Persia and Lydia (Laud) as being in the army of Tyre.

The common identification of Put is the Egypt Punt (or Pued) proposed by Ebers. The assimilation of n to a following consonant is common in the Sem languages, and would occasion no difficulty if the vocalization be found to agree. The final t of Punt, however, seems to be the g fem. ending, whereas the t of Put is radical.

Nevertheless, the district would seem to be rightly identified with the tract to the E. of Abyssinia (Somaland), and as it is described as being on both sides of the sea (the (Somali) and Red Sea), Yemen would seem to be Yemen included. In connection with this, it is worthy of note that a fragment of a Bab tablet describing Nebuchadnezzar’s campaign in Egypt in his 37th year mentions, as though in the neighborhood, the city (here, apparently, standing for the district) of Puth-yamân—probably not “Touân [Gr “Put”] (Lesbos, according to Winckler), but “Put of Yemen.” If this be in contrast to distinction to the district of Put (Punt) on the African mainland, the latter would be the Pâtu referred to in the Pers inscription of Naqsh-I-Rustem, which mentions, among the tributary countries, Kushiya, Putiya and Masiya, in Babylonia (masî, mâsû?), “the land Put, the land Kush (Ethiopia), the land Massû (?)”). The soldiers of Put in the army of Tyre may have been either from the African or the Yemenite Put, in which case there was no northern tract of that name, unless settlements had been made at some time from the original district. PUTEOLI, pû-tê'ô-lî (Πυτσελά, Putoleioi, “sulphur springs” [Acts 2313, WH], the modern Pozzuoli): A maritime city of Campania, which occupied a central position on the northern shore of a recess in the Gulf of Naples, protected on the W. by the peninsula of Baiae and Cape Misenum. It was originally a colony of the neighboring Gr city Cumae.

The earliest event in the history of Puteoli which can be dated definitely was the repulse of Hannibal before its walls by a Rom garrison in 214 BC. The design of the Carthaginian to secure a seaport as base of supplies and communication was thus thwarted (Liv xxix.7, 12, 13). A Rom colony was established here in 194 BC, and Puteoli thus became the first Rom port on the Gulf of Naples (Liv xxix.45; Strabo v.245; Velleius, i.15). Its subsequent remarkable prosperity and commercial activity are to be attributed to the safety of the harbor and the hospitable character of the coast nearer Rome. For Puteoli became the chief seaport of the capital before the creation of an artificial harbor at Portus Augusti by Claudius, and before Trajan made the mouth of the Tiber the principal converging point for the over-sea carrying trade. The imports at Puteoli consisted of Egypt grain and oriental wares, dispatched from Alexandria and other cities of the Levant (Cicerio Pro Rabirio 40; Suetonius Aug. 98; Strabo xxii. 793; Cicerio Pro Coelio 10). The eastern element in the population was very numerous (Petronius 81; CIL, X, 1797). The harbor was rendered doubly safe by a mole, which is known to have been at least 418 yds. in length, consisting of massive piers connected by means of arches constructed in solid masonry (Strabo v.215). Extensive remains of this mole still exist. The shore line devoted to purposes of commerce (emporium) extended for a distance of about 11 miles westward from the mole. At the height of its prosperity under Claudius and Nero, the town is thought to have contained a population of nearly 100,000.

The region in which the town was situated is of volcanic formation, the name Puteoli being due to the odor of the sulphureous springs or to the wells of a volcanic nature which abound in the vicinity. The volcanic dust, called pozolana today, was mixed with lime to form a cement of the greatest durability, which was proof against the influence of seawater.

Extensive remains of an amphitheater, whose axes measure 160 and 126 yds. across the space inclosed by the outer façade and 75 and 45 yds. within the arena, bear testimony to the former affluence of Puteoli.

The region about Puteoli together with Baiae became the favorite resort of the Rom nobility, and the foundations of many ancient villas are still visible, although partly covered by the sea. Cicero’s villa in the territory of Puteoli (Cicero Ad Fam. v.15,2; Ad Att. xiv.16,1; 20,1) was after- ward selected as the place of burial of Hadrian (Spartianus Had. 25). The portion of the bay between Puteoli and Baiae was the scene of the attempt made at the instigation of Nero upon the life of his mother by means of a vessel so contrived that it was to break to pieces while conveying Agrippina toward her villa near the Lucrine Lake (Tacitus Annals xiv.8). See NERO.

The apostle Paul found a Christian community at Puteoli, when he arrived there on his way to Rome, and stopped 7 days with them (Acts 28 13, 14). At that time the ordinary route to Rome, following the Via Appia from Capua, was 155 Rom., or about 1423 Eng., miles (Nissen, Italiche Landeskunde, II, 739). Later, Domitian reduced the distance to 139 Rom miles (about 129 Eng.) by laying out the Via Domitia along the coast, joining the Via Appia at Sinuessa. (Geog. Rome, IV, 32; Itin. Ant., 122; Tab. Peut.).

PUTIEL, που̂ς [πονμ, πο̂νμ, “contemned by El”): Father of the wife of Eleazar, Aaron’s son, and thus grandfather of Phinehas, Eleazar’s son (Ex 6 25). See PHINEHAS, (3).

PUVAH, πο̂υα. See PUVAH.

PYGARG, πυγαργ [πυγαργ, dishon; LXX πυγαργος, πυγαργος; of proper nouns, “Dishon” and “Dishan” (Gen 36 21-30; 1 Ch 1 38-42); accordinging to BDB, Hommel, Sanguithiere, derives דְּשָּׁן from דָּשׁ, Arab. دَشَ, “to tread,” and of Assy. dashku, “mountain-goat”): Dishon as the name of an animal occurs only in Dt 14 5 in the list of clean beasts. Both AV and RV have “pygarg,” which is not the recognized name of any animal whatever. The LXX pygargos (from πυγαργ, ῥυγ, “rump,” and ἄργος, ἄργος, “white”) was used by Herodotus (iv.192) as the name of an antelope. A white rump is a very common feature of deer and antelopes, and is commonly explained as enabling the fleeing herd easily to keep in sight of its leaders. It has been used as a specific name of Cervus pygargus, the Tartarian roe, and Bubalus pygargus, a small South African antelope. The Arabic Bible has rtlâm, “a white gazelle,” a kindred word to rtlâm, AV “unicorn,” RV “wild-ox.” Tristram, NHB, considers dishon to be the addax, Antilope addax or Addax nasomaculatus. There is excellent reason, however, for believing that the range of this African antelope does not extend into Pal, Sinai or Arabia. For a discussion of the animal names in Dt 14 4,5, see Zoology.

PYRAMIDS, πυραμίδοι (πυράμις, πυραμῖς): Pyramids are mentioned in connection with the splendid monument reared by Simon Maccabeus in memory of his parents and brethren at Modin (1 Mace 13 28; cf. Ant. XIII, vi, 6). Jos describes them as “very surprising, both for their largeness and beauty.” There is nothing to show how the pyramid allotted to each was distinguished, whether by difference in size or by inscriptions. It is remarkable that in Scripture there is no allusion to the giant structures in Egypt; but these may have supplied the suggestion to Simon’s mind.

PYRRHUS, πυρρός (Πυρρός, Πύρρος, “fiery-red”): The name is inserted in the text of RV in Acts 20 4 as that of the father of SOPATER (q.v.).

Python, πυθωνόν: Occurs only in Acts 16 16, where RV reads, “a certain maid having a spirit of divination [in “a spirit, a Python”], met us” W meet, Πυθων, or Πυθόν, Πυθόδ, is the oldest name of Delphi (or the country about Delphi), in which was situated the famous Delphic Oracle. Consequently “Pythian spirit” came to be the generic title of the supposed source of inspiration of diviners, including the slave-girl of the account in Acts. Exactly what facts underlie the narrative it is rather hard to say, but it is evident that the girl was sincere in her conviction that she spoke with Pythian inspiration. Probably she represents some hysterical type, of none too strong mentality, whose confused utterances were taken as coming from some supernatural power. Impressed by St. Paul’s personality, she followed him about, and, when his command came, was in a state of mind that had prepared her to obey it. The narrative, incidentally, gives an interesting sidelight on a society in which a girl with hysteria had a greater commercial value than she had after her cure. See DIVINATION.

birds and live in the open, brooding along roads and around fields. They have a longer, fuller wing than the partridge and can make stronger flight. In Pal they were migratory. They are first mentioned in Ex 16:13: "And it came to pass at even, that the quails came up, and covered the camp: and in the morning the dew lay round about the camp." This describes a large flock in migration, so that they passed as a cloud. Nu 11:31-33: "And there went forth a wind from Jehovah, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, about a day's journey on this side, and a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and about two cubits above the face of the earth. And the people rose up all that day, and all the night, and all the next day, and gathered the quails: he that gathered least gathered ten homers: and they spread them all abroad for themselves round about the camp"; cf Ps 78:26-30:

"He caused the east wind to blow in the heavens; And by his power he guided the south wind. He rained flesh also upon them as the dust. And winged birds at the sand of the seas: And he let it fall in the midst of their camp, Round about their habitations. So they did eat, and were well filled; And he gave them their own desire."

Again the birds are mentioned in migration. Those that fell around the camp and the bread that was sent from heaven are described in Ps 105:39-42. Commentators have had trouble with the above references. They cause the natural historian none—-they are so in keeping with the location and the laws of Nature. First the Heb争论 means "to be fat." That would be precisely the condition of the quail after a winter of feeding in the S. The time was early spring, our April, and the quail were flocking from Africa and spreading in clouds—even to Europe. They were birds of earth, heavy feeders and of plump, full body. Migration was such an effort that when forced to cross a large body of water they always waited until the wind blew in the direction of their course, lest they tire and fall. Their average was about 16 birds to each nest. If half a brood escaped, they yet multiplied in such numbers as easily to form clouds in migration. Pliny writes of their coming into Italy in such numbers, and so exhausted with their long flight, that if they sighted a sailing vessel they settled upon it by hundreds and in such numbers as to sink it. Taking into consideration, the diminutive vessels of that age and the myriads of birds, this does not appear incredible. Now compare these facts with the text. Israelites were encamped on the Sinai Peninsula. The birds were in migration. The quail followed the Red Sea until they reached the point of the peninsula where they selected the narrowest place, and when the wind was with them they crossed the water. Not far from the shore arose the smoke from the campfires of the Israelites. This bewildered them, and, weary from their journey, they began to settle in confused thousands over and around the camp. Then the Israelites arose and, with the ever-ready "throw sticks," killed a certain number for every soul of the camp and spread the bodies on sand to dry, just as Herodotus (i.77) records that Hecate Egyptians always had done (see Rawlinson, Herod, II, for an illustration of catching and drying quail). Nature and natural history can account for this incident, with no need to call in the miraculous.

Quarrel, kwor'el: Originally (1) "a complaint," (cf "querulous"), or (2) "a cause of complaint," and so (3) "a contention." (1) In AV Mk 6:19 (RV) "set herself"; the colloquial "had it in for him" is an exact tr and Col 3:13 (μαρτυρεῖν, "complaint"; so RV). (2) In 2 K 5:7 (יָרְדָּה, "be opportune," RV "an occasion"). (3) In AV Lev 26:25 (loose tr of אָרַק, "naturalize," "vengence"; so RV). Cf Sir 31:29 AV (RV "conflict") and Prov 20:3 RV (AV "meddling").

Quarries, kwor'iz (ἐργαστήρια, ἔργαστήριον [Jgs 3 19:26, "graven images"], ἐργατήριον [Josh 7 5, "Shebarim," RV "the quarries"]: ἐργαστήριον is elsewhere tr "graven images" (Dt 7:5; Ps 78:65; Isa 10:10; Mic 5:13, etc) and is a pl. form of ψάλλω "graven image" (Ex 20:5, etc.) from ψάλω, "to carve." It occurs in the story of Enub and Egeus and refers to images or hewn stones in the vicinity of Gilgal. Shebharim is pl. of shebher, "breach," "fracture," "more often "destruction" (e.g. Prov 16:18), from shbher, "to break." The form shbharim is also found in Job 41:25, "consternation." AV "breakings." In Josh 7:5 Shebarim is the point to which the Israelites were chased after their first attack upon Ai. See Shebarim.

Quarries in Pal are not usually very deep because there is plenty of good stone to be found at the surface. The quarryman seeks a thick stratum of firm limestone which has a favorable exposure. The vertical joint-planes divide the stratum into large blocks which the quarryman dislodges with the aid of crowbars. These large blocks he skillfully cleaves by inserting several wedges in a line in holes made by a pick, and driving the wedges in with a heavy hammer. In these days gunpowder is occasionally used, esp. when there are not favorable joint-planes producing blocks capable of being moved by the crowbar.

Another method, which is employed where stones of great size are wanted, is to carve the stones out of the rock by cutting channels around them with the pick. In the limestone quarries of Ba'albek and the granite quarries of Aşûn at the first cataract of the Nile, enormous stones may be seen which were abandoned while in process of being removed by this method. The channels are wide enough to admit the body of the workman, and the marks of the picks on the sides of the channels are plainly visible.

QUARTER, kwâr'tér: Lit., of course, “the fourth part,” and so of the four “ends” (איה, kâgôd) in Jer 49 36, and AV of the four “corners” (so RV, ונוד, gônta) in Rev 20 8. Hence, “any part” and in this sense used freely for various words by AV. RV has usually dropped “quarter,” but unfortunately has retained it in Nu 34 3; Josh 15 5; in his cell between two soldiers, “bound with two chains,” his left hand chained to one and his right to the other. The other two soldiers of the quater-

QUEEN, kwên: The Bible applies this term: (1) To the wife of a king (“queen consort”) (מלכה, malkâh). In the Book of Est it is the title given to Vashti (1 9) and Esther (2 22); cf Cant 6 8 f. Another Heb word for queen consort is ונוכי, ḡîrîdâh, lit. “mistress” (cf 1 K 11 19, the wife of Pârâoh; 2 K 10 13, “the children of the king and

QUARTUS, kwä'tus (Koásaro, Koâriano): A Christian in Corinth who with “Erastus the treasurer of the city” sent greetings to the Christian community in Rome (Rom 16 23). He is known to Paul only as a Christian, “the brother.”

QUATERNION, kwä-tré'në-un (τετράδιον, tetradion): The name given to a company of four soldiers of Herod’s army (Acts 12 4). To four such companies St. Peter had been handed over, who would take their turn of acting as guard over the prisoner, each of the four watches of the night according to Rom reckoning, which Herod Agrippa I would follow. In the castle of Antonia St. Peter was thus closely secured, in order that Herod, who had already killed James, the brother of John, with the sword (12 2), might, after the solemnities of the Passover, make sure of his death likewise. On the night before his intended execution he was sleeping the children of the queen”). In Neh 2 6 and Ps 45 9 we find the expression סְבָל, šēḇal, which some trace back to סְבָל, šēḇal, “to ravish,” a rather doubtful derivation. Still another term is רַגְלָה, raḡlâh, lit. “princess” (Isa 49 25). The LXX sometimes uses the word βασιλεία, basilēia; cf Ps 45 9. (2) To a female ruler or sovereign (“queen regnant”). The only instances are those of the queen (malḵâh) of Sheba (1 K 10 1–13; of 2 Ch 9 1–12) and of Candace, the queen (bâstîlîssa) of the Ethiopians (Acts 8 27). In Mt 12 42 (cf Lk 11 31) Christ refers to the queen of the south (בַּאֲרֹב נָּבְרָא, bastîlîssâ tôhô, “the queen of heaven”) (Jer 7 18; 44 17 ff). See QUEEN OF HEAVEN. (4) Metaphorically, to the city of Babylon (Rome) (Rev 18 7): an expression denoting sovereign contempt and imaginary dignity and power.

the wife of a king ("queen," 1 K 11:19); in Doh 5:10 the term נַפְתָּה, malketha, "queen," really means the mother of the king: It stands to reason that among a people whose rulers are polygamists the mother of the king or chief prince becomes a person of great consequence. The records of the Books of K prove it. The גִּבְהִירָה, or queen mother, occupied a position of high social and political importance; she took rank almost with the king. When Bath-sheba, the mother of Solomon, desired "to speak unto him for Adonijah," her son "rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a throne to be set for the king's mother; and she sat on his right hand" (1 K 2:19). And again, in 2 K 24:15, it is expressly stated that Nebuchadnezzar carried away the king's mother into captivity: Jeremiah calls her גִּבְהִירָה (29:2). The king was Jehoichin (Jecoeniah, Jer 29:2), and his mother's name was Nebushta (2 K 24:8). This was the royal pair whose impending doom the prophet was told to foretell (Jer 13:18). Here again the queen mother is mentioned with the king, thus emphasizing her exalted position. Now we understand why Asa removed Maacah his (grand?) mother from being queen (queen mother, the mother of the king) as told in 1 K 15:2 (cf 2 Ch 10:16). She had used her powerful influence to further the cause of idolatry. In this connection Athaliah's coup d'etat may be briefly mentioned. After the violent death of her son Ahaziah (2 K 9:27), she usurped the royal power and reigned for some time in her own name (2 K 11:3; cf 2 Ch 22:12). This was, of course, a revolutionary undertaking, being a radical departure from the usual traditions.

And finally, the political importance of the גִּבְהִירָה is illustrated by the fact that in the Books of K, with two exceptions, the names of the Jewish kings are recorded together with those of their respective mothers; they are as follows: Naaman, the Ammonites, the mother of Rehoboam (1 K 14:21); of ver 31, and 2 Ch 12:13); Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom (1 K 15:2) or Absalom (2 Ch 11:20), the mother of Abijah; Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom, the mother (grandmother?) of Asa (1 K 15:2; cf 2 Ch 15:16). Azubah, the daughter of Shilbi, the mother of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22:42; cf 2 Ch 20:31); Athaliah, the granddaughter of Omri, the mother of Ahaziah (2 K 8:26; cf 2 Ch 22:2); Zibiah of Beroea, the mother of Jehoash (2 K 12:1); Jerobaal (2 Ch 21:1); Jehokadin (Jehoshaddan, 2 Ch 25:1) of Jerus, the mother of Amaziah (1 K 14:22; Jecochiah (Jechiah, 2 Ch 26:3) of Jerus, the mother of Azariah (2 K 15:2) or Uzziah (2 K 15:13, etc; cf 2 Ch 26:3); Jerushe (Jerushah, 2 Ch 27:1), the daughter of Zedok, the mother of Jotham (2 K 15:33); Abi (Abijah, 2 Ch 29:1), the daughter of Zechariah, the mother of Hezekiah (2 K 18:2); Hephzibah, the mother of Manasseh (2 K 21:1); Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Jotham, the son of Amon (2 K 21:19); Zedekiah, the daughter of Asaiah of Bozkath, the mother of Josiah (2 K 22:1); Hamutal, the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, the mother of Jehoahaz (2 K 23:1); Zebiah, the daughter of Pedaiah of Ruma, the mother of Jehoahaz (2 K 23:36); Nehushta, the daughter of Elhanan of Jerus, the mother of Jehochina (2 K 24:8); Hamutal (Hamutal), the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, the mother of Zedekiah (2 K 24:18). The exceptions are Jehoram and Ahaz.

WILLIAM BAY

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (מַעֲלָה, נַפְתָּה, m'lecheth ha-shamayim, although there is another reading, מַעֲלָה, m'lecheth, "worship" or "godness"): Occurs only in two passages: Jer 7:18; 44:17–19:23, where the prophet denounces the wrath of God upon the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem who have given themselves up to the worship of the host of heaven. This is no doubt a part of the astral worship which is found largely developed among the Jews in the later period of their history in Canaan. It is first mentioned in 2 K 23:15, when men of the Northern Kingdom when Samaria had fallen and the ten tribes were being carried away into captivity. Moses is represented as warning the Israelites against the worship of the sun and moon and stars and all the host of heaven, which was practised by the inhabitants of Canaan (Dt 4:19; 17:3), and the existence of such worship among the Canaanites and neighboring nations is attested from an early period (cf Job 31:26–28). The worship of the heavenly bodies was widely spread in the East and in Arabia; and the Babylonian pantheon was full of astral deities, where each divinity corresponded either to an astral phenomenon or to some circumstance or occurrence in nature which is connected with the course of the heavenly bodies (Jeremiah, The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, I, 100). From the prophets we gather that before the exile the worship of the host of heaven had become established among all classes and in all the towns of Israel (Jer ab 2 supra; Ezek 8:10). In that worship, the queen of heaven was a prominent person.

The queen of this Ishhtar cult had a great antiquity and widely spread in ancient Babylonia may be seen from the symbols of it found in recent excavations (see Ninurta, II, 236). How far the astral theorists like Winckler and Jeremias are entitled to link up with this worship the mourning for Josiah, the denunciations over Tammuz, the story of Jephthah's daughter, and even the narrative of the misfortunes and the exaltation of Joseph, is questionable. But that the people of Judah in the days before the exile had given themselves over to the worst and vilest forms of heathen worship and incurred the grievous displeasure of Jehovah is made clear by the denunciation of the worship of the queen of heaven by Jeremiah.

QUEEN OF SHEBA, šē'bā (1 K 10:1–13; 2 Ch 9:1–12, called in Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31, "the queen of the south" בֵּאָשֶׁר, ְשֵׁבַת נַוּד) The two OT accounts of the coming of the queen of Sheba (see Sheba) to Solomon differ slightly from one another, and of the two, that in 1 K is the older. (1) The words concerning the Accounts names of Jeh in AK 10:1 are wanting in 2 Ch; while LXX in 1 K has "and the name of Jeh," apparently a corruption of the MT. (2) For 1 K 10:9, "because Jeh loved Israel for ever," 2 Ch 9:8 has "because the God loved Israel, to establish them for ever"; LXX in 1 K has "because Jeh loved Israel, to establish it for ever." (3) In the last verse of each account, with 1 K 10:10, 2 Ch 9:12 says that Solomon gave to the queen all her desire, besides that which she had brought unto the king, i.e., according to some, besides the equivalent of what she had brought to him: 1 K 10:13 has "besides that which she brought to him, according to the king's desire, whatever pleased the king." The phrase "besides gifts commensurate with his own wealth and power (sBOT), or besides gifts which he gave her queen" is not in the RSV. The narrative tells of the queen of Sheba, on hearing of Solomon's great wisdom, coming to test him with perplexing questions or riddles (cf Jgs 14:12). She brought The Narrative presents to the king, and interviewed him: "And when the queen of Sheba had seen all the wisdom of Solomon which he had built" (i.e., the palace, not the temple) as well as its arrangements, "and his burnt-offering which he offered in the house of Jeh (so read and translate with RVm in 1 K 19 5, and also in 2 Ch 9 4); there was no more spirit upon the Spirit, etc., the half of Solomon's wisdom had not been told her. "Happy," she said to him, "are thy wives [so read with LXX, Syr and Old Lat VSS], happy are these thy servants." She then exchanged gifts with him and returned to her own land.

The narrative is a complement of that in 1 K 3 16-28, where the king's justice is exemplified; here his wisdom.

The narrative is referred to by Jesus in Mt 12 42; Lk 11 31, where He refuses to accede to the request of the scribes and Pharisees for a sign from Him. He tells them that no sign will be given them except that of Jonah, whose sign was his preaching, one that proved sufficient to the Ninevites; and "behold something greater than Jonah is here." The men of Nineveh will be a living condemnation of them "in the judgment" (cf Lk 16 31); and so will the "queen of the south" who came from the ends of the earth after hearing of Solomon's wisdom, and beheld something greater than Solomon is here. The only sign to be given is that of wisdom of Jesus, a wisdom far greater than that of Solomon (see of D. M. Wise's, Days of His Flesh, 176 ff).

Eastern lit. has much to say about the queen of Sheba. The Arabs called her Bilak, Abyssinian legend declares that she came from Ethiopia, her name being Maqeda, and that she had a son by Solomon. See Delitzsch, Isa., 116-27; ZD. M. G., 19 ff.; J Fr T., VI, 523 ff. (1880). Gesammelte Abhandlungen, 1905, 413 ff.; Bezaud, Kebran Nagast, 1906, and Memmius, Qrius, 60, 666 ff. For the Mahometan story, see Koran xxvii., with notes in Sale's tr.

QUICKSANDS, kwik'sands. See STYX.

QUIET, kwit't. Vb. or adj. only in EV, "quietness" being used for the noun. No special Heb or Gr words are represented, but in the OT usually for some form or derivative of καί, σκότος, "be undisturbed," (Jgs 18 17; cf. Prov 1 33, "φοβερόν, "to be quiet," Isa 17 17, "σκότων, "quiet," "be set on"). For "them that are quiet in the land" in Ps 35 20, see MEK; POON. For "quiet prince" in Jer 51 59, RV substitutes "chief chamberlain," in "quartermaster." "Jacob was a quiet [Σκότι, τόμ, 'gentle'] man" (Gen 26 27, AV "plain"). In the NT, it is the tr of AV, hēsuschazō, "to refrain from gossip or meddlesomeness;" "that ye study to be quiet" (1 Thess 4 11), and of φυσίας, hēsychios, "gentle": "a meek and quiet spirit" (1 Pet 3 4; cf. 1 Tim 2 2).

QUIRINUS, kwir-in'i-us. See CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT, 1, 1, (2); LUKE, GOSPEL OF, 5.

QUIT, kwit: Same derivation as "quiet," so that "to be quit" (Ex 21 19-28; Josh 2 20 AV) is "to be relieved of responsibility," τί θέλεις, "wishes," πράσινον, "guiltless" (so RV Josh 2 20). Hence to quit one's self means "to be freed by discharging a duty." The phrase in EV, however, is a gloss, for in 1 S 4 9 it is used for γῆς, hāyāh, "to be," while in 1 Cor 16 13 ἀφίκομαι, andròcomai, means "to behave like a man."

QUIVER, kwiv'är (περσόν, 'asphah, 'ūts; φαρέσα, pharēsā) [Sir 26 12]: A case or sheath for carrying arrows, a part of the ordinary equipment of the warrior, both foot-soldier and charioteer (Job 39 23; Isa 22 6), and also of the huntsman (Gen 27 3). Figuratively of any one in passage, whether child (Ps 127 5) or prophets of Jeh (lsa 49 2) are spoken of as arrows. Arrows are called brūd 'asphah, "sons of the quiver" (Lam 3 13). By identifying the arrows with the arrows they produce, the quiver is likened to an open sepulcher (Jer 5 16).

LITERATURE

I. Introductory.—There are, all told, approximately 300 direct quotations from the OT in the NT. The presence of so many citations, each one of which involves an interpretation of the passage given a new context in quotation, opens many avenues of discussion and propounds many difficult and far-reaching problems. In every separate instance, in the long list of NT quotations, the principle of accommodation (see ACCOMMODATION) in some form is involved, and, consequently, the question of historical and exegetical accuracy is unavoidably raised. In the process of shaping and shifting the original meaning that which is of far greater importance than the question whether the writer is incidentally correct, according to modern scientific principles, in any specific citation. This more important and vital issue is that the general principles adopted by the NT writers in their use of the book of the older covenant. A review of these principles, together with certain outstanding and typical instances in which these principles are used as applied, will form the substance of the discussion.

II. CONSTRUCTIVE PRINCIPLES OF NT QUOTATION.

In the first place, the NT writers regard the Christian religion as having its roots in the OT. From the call of Abraham to the founding and expansion of the Christian church the men of the NT recognize a single organic movement. In their use of the ancient oracles in new setting they constantly and confidently rely upon the unity of the two dispensations, that recordation in the OT and that in which they themselves were participants. Such a unity, taking for granted its existence, would remove to a degree the very distance, the temporal gulf, between the text and the text, and would involve a definite and organic relationship of all the books to each other. There are no longer two separate groups of books standing apart from each other and having bonds of union only within the group, but, on the contrary, two related sub-groups outwardly corresponding to contrasted phases of the historical movement, but inwardly conforming to the deep-lying principles which make the entire movement one. According to this idea the Book of Gen is as really related to the Gospel of Mt as it is to the Book of Ex. On the surface, and historically speaking, the Book of Gen leads immediately to the Book of Ex, which is its companion volume and complement, but go more deeply into Gen and just as really and just as directly if leads to Mt, which is also its fellow and complement. And so throughout. The unifying medium is, of course, the history which is one in that it involves the same organic principles applied to successive areas of human experience. The books of the Bible, therefore, form a group of books on a common subject, phases of each other, contrasted and yet intimately cognate. In quoting from the OT the NT writers were simply obeying an impulse common to all thoughtful writers and accountants for quotations, seeking for diversified expression of the same truths.

The second great constructive principle of NT quotation, and manifestly in close harmony with the first one, is that the movement from Abraham to Christ was not merely a line of planned the beginning and preparation for the Bible is one because the history out of which it grew is one. The history is one because God in the history and God is one. According to the writers of the NT in this history as a whole we have the unfolding of an all-embracing plan of God, stretching out into the remotest future and coming to its culmination in the person and the kingdom of the Messiah. This plan was disclosed in part beforehand, by way of anticipation and preparation, in order that men might intelligently cooperate with God in the fulfillment of His purpose. This is the idea involved in prophecy and its fulfillment, and in the closely related idea of promise and its realization. One mind, one will, and one central purpose are operating throughout the entire history which is, on the Divine side, the fulfillment of a plan complete in thought before it was written. According to the NT, that plan is, the foreseen plan of God and its gradual revelation to men through messages of hope and warning set in the key of the great future and pointing the way thither, the greater part of the structure of the coming kingdom.

A third principle which really involves a combination of the other two and is prominently brought forward in the use of quotation for purposes of argument is the recognition and acceptance of the OT as authoritative, a real Word of God, in form occasional, but essentially applicable to all experiences, and hence good for all time. It is evident that the belief in the continued authority of the Scripture of the old covenant over the men of the new, rests upon the unity of the two dispensations and the acceptance of the same Divine mind and will as operating throughout all outward and historical changes. This is admirably expressed by Paul when he speaks of the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he purposed in him unto an economy of the fulness of times, to sum up all things in Christ (Eph 1:9-10), and by the author of Hebrews when he says in God's spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by various portions and in various ways, hath at the end of these spoken unto us in His Son (1:2).

The justification of these accepted principles of reference on the part of the NT writers lies beyond the scope of the present discussion.

4. Issue Involving in Foregoing quotations scriptural is meaningless and futile except upon the basis of an explicit and consistent determination of these antecedent questions. To the present writer the validity of these principles is beyond question. The denial of any one of the three involves one in difficulties of interpretation, both critical and historical, from which there is no escape. It is to be noted, therefore, that the establishment of the principles, in accordance with which the NT writers quote, carries with it in a general way the justification of their usage.

III. TYPICAL INSTANCES OF NT QUOTATION.

For the NT writers in mind we are prepared to pass in review typical instances in which general principles are embodied. At this point we shall be greatly assisted in the analysis and distribution of the complex material before us by giving careful heed to the formulas, more or less fixed and uniform, by which the writers introduce quotations and indicate their sense of the value and significance of that which is quoted. While the formulas exhibit certain verbal variations, they are practically reducible to three, which correspond with substantial accuracy to the three constructive principles already noted: the unity of the OT and NT; the prediction of the NT in the OT; the authority of the OT as the Word of God intended for all time.

The unity of the two dispensations is asserted in all those passages introduced by a formula, in which the fulfilment is asserted as a fact, and in which the operation of identical principles in two or more separate events in the field of history is implied. A suggestive example is in Mt 13:14, where our Lord asserts, in connection with the parable of the Sower, that in the unbelieving people of His day “the prophecy of Isaiah” is fulfilled. The prophetic words here quoted (Isa 5 9-10) are not predictive in any immediate sense, but are susceptible of repeated application and realization of the prophecies if only they contain. They apply to the prophet’s own day; they also apply—and in that sense are fulfilled—to the time of Jesus, and by a legitimate extension of meaning, to stubborn unbelief in any age of the world.

Another passage in which the same formula is used in a very exceptional way clearly sets forth the fundamental principle upon which this usage rests. Isa 2:23 asserts that the justification of Abraham in the offering of Isaac is a prototype of passage which affirms that his belief was counted to him for righteousness (Gen 15:6). This passage is not predictive in any sense, nor is there in the narrative any hint of a connection between the passage and the episode on Mt, Moriah. This use of the formula of fulfilment by James involves the principle that any event which realizes the meaning and truth of a Scriptural statement fulfils it. A vast number of quotations in the NT come under this head. Persons, events, doctrines, illustrate and confirm, or embody and concretely realize, principles which are taught in the OT or implied in its history. We are warned by this passage and many others like it against a too rigid and literal interpretation of any quoted literal passage.

While it may certainly be intended to imply literal prediction and an equally literal fulfilment, it may, on the contrary, be intended to intimate nothing more than a harmony of principle, fitting the passage to the person or event with which it is connected. In this connection it is to be remembered that a harmony of principle may extend all the way from a comparatively superficial illustrative resemblance to a profound assent of thought. Not a few OT quotations were made for purposes of illustration and literary embellishment. Herein lies the significance of Matthew’s use (2 17f) of Jer 31:15. A glance at this quoted passage indicates that it is a figurative and poetical expression in which Rachel (already for many years in her tomb) is represented as weeping for her exiled children and refusing to be comforted except by their return. There is no strictly predictive element in the passage, save only the promise of return, which is not used by Matthew. Its applicability to the massacre of the children of Bethlehem lies in its poetical completeness, and there alone. Once again the voice of wailing motherhood is heard in Israel. The tender and beautiful imagery is applicable in this sense and is used with true insight, but with no intention of justifying a claim of prediction and fulfilment in the literal sense.

The prediction of events in the life of Jesus and in the history of Christianity is involved in all the quotations in which a necessary connection between the event and the assertion is, or is made to be, or is implied in the OT speaking or writing concerning the event or person in question. An examination of the OT without reference to its use in the NT seems to justify the conclusion that its bearing upon the future may be particularized under four heads, which, in turn with sufficient accuracy and exhaustiveness will classify the pertinent NT quotations.

(1) The prophetic teaching of Israel embodied not only in the messages of the prophets, but also in laws, institutions, and rites, has a twofold dispensational application. Reference is made here only to those explicit references to a future era of especial blessing. For example, in Acts 2:17ff Peter interprets the Pentecostal experience in the terms of prophecy, referring to Joel (2:28ff), who promises an outpouring of God’s Spirit in a “great and notable day” of the Lord. The promise of the Pentecostal prediction (every promise is such), which in a measure would be fulfilled in any exceptional manifestation of God’s Spirit among men. The only question which can possibly be raised in connection with Peter’s use of this passage is whether the Pentecostal outpouring was the climactic realization of the promise: that is, the establishment of the era of blessing foretold by the prophet. Later in the same book (3:20-26) the same apostle sweeps the whole field of prophecy as centering in certain promises fulfilled in Christ and the Christian community.

He instances two, the prophet like Moses (Dt 18:15) and the promised inclusive blessing through Abraham (Gen 12:3). He also includes (Acts 3:26) a hint of the Servant: passages of Isa. This identification of the NT movement through two specific predictive promises is wholly justified by the prophetic character of Jesus, the range and richness of the blessings brought from Abraham through Him, and by the fact elsewhere emphasized that no other has measured up to the standard of the ideal servant. Negatively, it may be urged that if these promises were not fulfilled in Christ, history affords no possibility of discovering any fulfillment measurable by the idea entertained in the prophecy. In He (8:8-12) reference is made to the promise of a new covenant in Jer (31:31ff) as a justification for believing that the OT dispensation was not complete in itself and that in its very constitution it pointed forward to Christianity as its fulfillment. Combining this passage with that quoted above (Acts 2:17ff) taken from Joel, the strength of the case for this use of the OT is at once seen. Distinctively Jeremiah’s “new covenant” was to be inward and inwardly of the nature than outward and legal. The promise through Joel is an awakening of prophecy through the free outpouring of God’s Spirit. The distinctive feature of the gospel is its idea of justification by faith, through grace revealed in Christ and imparted by the Holy Spirit given according to promise at Pentecost. The “new covenant” foretold by Jeremiah was established at Pentecost through the outpouring of the Spirit promised through Joel. To deny this as fulfilment to nullify the teaching of Christian history and to erase both promises from the page of credible prophecy.

(2) Contemporary persons or institutions are sometimes interpreted, not in terms of present actuality, but on the basis of the ideal or realized until the coming of Christ. One striking example of this method is to be found in the so-called "Immanuel passage" (Mt 1:23, quoting Isa 7:14). Undoubtedly the message of the prophet to Ahaz had an immediate and contemplative function. But when a prophecy is not at once understood, and taken up by an animate and not unapt prophet, as for example the "I and my servant" (44:1), "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord" (44:10), "Yet now hear, O Jacob my servant, the Israel, whom I have chosen" (44:1). It also involves the entire scope and meaning of the prophetic office through which Jehovah's will was made known to Israel and brought to its fulfillment in history. Both point unerringly to Christ as the historical fulfilment of Israel's mission and as the actual realization of the ideal and ministry of prophethood. The very prophecy of the messianic appointment (ch 61), whether to the Servant or to the prophet, and the questions raised as to whether Israel idealized is referred to or some person or personification, serve to make more clear and unmistakable the central fact that only in Christ as the expectation embodied in the entire series of passages altogether realized. It thus becomes for sober thought a distinct revelation and portraiture in advance of what Jesus was in His person and work.

(3) In the course of Israel's training to receive the Messiah, certain external items were given as bearing upon the identification of Him when He should come. We shall instance three items, closely related to each other, and each intensely interesting in itself. These three items are (a) His birth at Bethlehem (Mt 2:1), (b) His birth to a virgin (Mt 1:23f.), (c) His birth at Bethlehem (Mt 2:5). Objection is offered at once to the interpretation of these OT passages as predictive, and to the alleged fulfilments in the life of Jesus, on the ground that they are not defined as having been to a virgin birth. Both these objections are based on the assumption that the interpretation of the OT passages connected with them; that is, the fulfilments arrive by such devious routes as to make it difficult to suppose them to be due to the imaginative stimulation of the passages. For example, the birth at Bethlehem was brought about by circumstances not at all to the liking of Jewish patriots, and was obscured to contemporaries by the previous and subsequent residence at Nazareth. The kinship of Jesus to David is not at all defined on the assumption that the mother was a virgin (unless Mary was of that house) by the virgin birth. The interpretation of Isa 7:14 as intimating a virgin birth was not compulsory to one familiar with the Heb text of the passage and would have been thought of in that connection only by one assured of the fact. The virgin birth (see IMMANUEL; VIRGIN BIRTH) is not an etymological but a providential commentary on Isa 7:14. One other consideration of primary importance remains. In the one point where the identification of Jesus with the Messiah by His followers can be tested most severely, they are most completely triumphant. It would be comparatively easy to invent incidents suggested by OT prophecies, and to take dignities and titles wholesale from the same source—but given all these, to find one capable of realizing and fulfilling the expectations so aroused is the chief problem. Here fabrication is impossible. And here too the NT meets and answers the challenge of truth. In view of these considerations it is safe to say that in matters of historical detail the career of Jesus was foreseen and predicted. Such passages belong to the philosophy of preparation as a whole and should be studied in that connection.

which is continuous throughout all history. For example, the use of Zec 13:7 (Mk 14:27) suggests a deeper view of the connection between prophecy and history, immediate and more remote, than we are often aware of. On the face of them stands the relationship of Jesus as nowhere else in history. Nevertheless, the connection is far greater than an isolated event and its occurrence. We may well say that, in a sense, the event is foreseen because it is already a fact. The allegory of the Smitten Shepherd is, as has well been said, "a summary of the history of Israel." But it is more than that. The relationship of God with Israel, which involved a dealing of Divine grace with men, their rejection of it and the consequent vicarious imolation of the Divine Friend and Shepherd, which came to its climax in the tragedy of the cross, was established in all essential factors in the early days. Therefore, Christ can say, as the outcome of the profoundest insight into the meaning of history, "Which concerneth me hath fulfilment" (of Lk 2:44). He was more deeply concerned in the doings of an earlier time than being there foreseen. In a real sense, "the Lamb" was "slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev 13:8). In this allegory of the rejected Shepherd and in the successive delivernments of the Servant passages, we have the portrait of the Christ as He was—not merely as He was to be. In these quotations deep answers to deep. The only satisfactory interpretation of the tragedy of the cross is that in accordance with prophetic argumentative in human history, "it pleased God to suffer"—as it needs be." The only satisfactory interpretation of the passages cited is that they disclose the actual operation of the forces which in their culmination issued in the tragedy of the cross. This brings the passages in the original and in quotation into the framework of the same course of events. Peter in his sermon in Solomon's porch thus sums up the whole process: "But the things which God forewarned by the mouth of all the prophets, that his Christ should suffer, he thus fulfilled" (Acts 3:18). This argument of the OT involves exactly the same principles which have been dealt with in the foregoing discussion. These principles coalesce in the conception of the OT as authoritative.

Quotations

(1) Throughout the NT, in the teaching of Our Lord Himself and in the apostolic writings, a clear-cut distinction is drawn between the temporary and permanent offices of the OT. It is recognized that in essential principles the OT is for all time, while in its outward form and in its actualization of underlying and essential truths it is preliminary and preparatory. There are different dispensations, but one economy. Whenever Our Lord uses the OT for purposes of argument (see Mt 4:4, 7; 12:17ff.; 19:16ff.; Mk 4:10ff.; Lk 19:46) it is on the basis of essential truth which is permanent and unchanging (Mt 5-19). On the other hand, He never hesitates to annul that which had a merely temporary or provisional or temporary (Mt 21:33-39; cf. Mk 12:32) and was not permanent ever ver (Mt 5-19). But to fulfill, but fulfilment implies a new era—a new and higher stage in the delivery of truth.

(2) In like manner Paul and the other NT writers argue on the basis of an identity of principle which binds the two eras together. But for the Gentiles, the Messiahship of Jesus, justification by faith, the inclusion of the Gentiles in the plan of salvation (the doctrine of election is a detail of this last argument; see Rom 9:7-9.12, 13.15.17). We shall consider typical examples of Paul's use of the OT in argumentation. Choice has been made of those which have provoked adverse criticism. Among these is the use of Gen 13:15; 17:8 in the leading position of Paul's alleged "rabbinical" method: "He is not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." The Heb word "seed" as applied to offspring (P77, zera') is singular. This, of course, means that a man's descendants are more important than inasmuch as they continue his life. The word would apply to any one of the family, but only by virtue of his belonging to the family. Etymologically Paul's argument would apply to Isaac as well as to Jesus, provided only that this is looked upon as being fulfilled in him. But the promise which was fulfilled in Isaac, was fulfilled in a larger way in Israel as a whole, and was fulfilled in the largest way of all in Christ. The use of the sing. detail indicates that Abraham's children were spoken upon as one seed to him—they are the children of Christ. The true children of Abraham are such as Christ. Historically the argument is fully justified. "The personality of Christ is in some sense coextensive with the fulfillment of the promise to Abraham" (Beet). "Christ is the organizer of the OT.

The classical passage in the discussion of justificaton based upon an OT quotation is Rom 1:17, quoting Hab 2:4. The quoted passage seems to fail the argument because the literal tr would appear to be that "the righteous shall live by their faithfulness." A deeper view, however, amply justifies the quotation; first, because the steadfastness demanded by the prophet is a persistent trust in God in view of the delay of the promised vision; second, the OT argument of the three essential principles of the OT is that stability of character has its root in trust in Jehovah (Isa 28:16; cf. 26:3-5). Nothing could be more foreign to the thought of the OT than that a man could be righteous without trust in God.

One further quotation argumentatively used by Paul may fitly close this section of our discussion. In Rom 11:26, 27 he quotes Isa 59:20, 21 as indicating the Divine purpose to include the Gentiles and to save them. This quotation was quite likely used by Paul in a large percentage of the NT quotations are taken from the LXX, the estimates of the number see Johnson, Quotations of the NT, ch.1). The text is as it was read and understood by those to whom the LXX was often the only version available, and the familiarity of that version was ample compensation for any slight loss in verbal accuracy. The only reasonable qualification of this general statement is that we should call in question any deviation which is dependent upon a point in argument. Kuenen, the severest critic of the NT writers in this particular, allows very few instances, and Professor Johnson has satisfactorily dealt with these in detail (as above). In the case immediately before us the deviations in the version used by Paul do not in the least modify, in the way of strengthening, the reference to the Gentiles (beginning NT in ver. 19 and continuing throughout) which is the point upon which Paul is laying stress. It is no more unfair to the Pauline writers than it would be unimpaired had he used the Heb text, upon which our RV rests (cf. Ho 6:9-10). In general, it may be presumed that in no instance is a quotation used by Paul should be considered binding upon writers who address a popular audience outside the sphere of the context. The substantive cogency of their arguments From the fair application of this reasonable rule the NT writers have nothing to fear.

For the most part the NT writers confine their quotations to the OT. In a single instance a canonical saying of Jesus (Acts 20:35), and, in at least two instances (Jude vs. 9, 14), non-canonical books are referred to (cf. Titus 1:12 and in his sermon at Athens (Acts 17:28) lines from native poets to illustrate and enforce his discussion (Acts 17:28). New Testament writers changed the latter instances the difference in usage from his ordinary habit of quoting authoritative Scripture is sufficiently obvious. In the case of the saying attributed to Christ, it is enough to say that it is so obviously Christlike that we need not hesitate to accept it as genuine, while in the case of Jude nothing is made to depend on it, and it is not quoted when the context shows theChapter in the light of Christian truths (see Plummer, Expositor’s Bible. “James and Jude,” 134 f.).

RAAMA, râ-a-mâ (רָאָמָא, râ’amâh): Thus spelled only in 1 Ch 1 9; elsewhere “Ramaâh” (רָמאָה, râ’âma, “Rabbah”); a son of Cash and father of Sheba and of Delan (Gen 10 7 = 1 Ch 1 9). In Ezekiel’s lament over Tyre (Ezk 27 22) the tribe of Ramaâh is mentioned along with Sheba as a mercantile people who provided the inhabitants of Tyre with spices, precious stones and gold. It has generally been identified with Rameses, mentioned by Ptolemy and Steph. Byzanzr. as a city in Southeastern Arabia on the shores of the Pers Gulf. The LXX (Πέρα, Ρημνα,) itself supposes this site. But the Arab. name of the city here indicated is spelled with a g and so gives rise to a phonological difficulty. A more probable identification has been found in the Sabean râ’âmah in Southwestern Arabia near Me’in in the north of Marib. Me’in was the capital of the old Minean kingdom. A. S. Fultron

RAAMIAH, râ-â-mâ’â (רָאָמָא, râ’amâ’h): râmâ’âh; B. Naamâ, Naamâh, A. “Pealâd, Rheelâm,” One of the leading men who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Nez 7 7). In the corresponding passage in Ezr 2 2, where the same list is named, a slight variation in form is given. “Raelah” is the name found in this passage. One is doubtful of a corruption of the other. Both have the same root meaning.

RAAMESSES, râ-am’sês (Ex 1 11), RAMESSES, ram’sês (Gen 47 11; Ex 12 37; Nu 33 35.36, 13.34, râ’mês, râmês, râmês, ram’âmas): 1. Meaning. Pâmos, Rameesî; Egypt Ramses or of “Store-settlement,” “Ra created him” or “it.” One of the two “settlements” (mish’âbah) built, or “built up,” by the Hebrews for the Pharaoh, the other being Pithom, to which the LXX adds a third, namely, “On which is Heliopolis,” a town near Cairo (Ex 1 11). The Hebrew term mish’âbah comes from a root meaning “to settle down” (Assr. askanu or shakanu, “to set”), but it is rendered “strong cities” in LXX, “treasure cities” in AV, and (incorrectly) “store-cities” in RV. The “land of Ramses” in which Jacob and his sons settled, was apparently the “field of Zaan” (see Zoan), thus lying in the Delta E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile.

It is often assumed that no city called Rameses would have existed before the time of Rameses II, the 14th cent. BC, though even before Rameses I the name occurs as the name of a city in the light of the Bubastids during the 18th Dynasty. The usual te “Child of Ra” is grammatically incorrect in Egypt, and as Ra was an ancient name for the “sun” it seems possible that a town may have borne the title “Ra created it” very early. The mention of Rameses in Gen (47 11) is often regarded as an anachronism, since no scholar has supposed that Jacob lived as late as the time of Rameses II. This would equally apply to the other notices, and at most would serve to mark the age of the passages in the Pentateuch in which the Rameses-Hyksos invasion is referred to, but even then this cannot be thought to be proved (see Exodus). According to De Rové (see Pierret, Vocab. Hébreux, 1875, 143) there were at least three towns in Lower Egypt that bore the name Pa Rames-tes (“city of Rameses”); but Brugsch supposes that the place mentioned in the OT was Zaan, to which the Rameses II gave this name when making it his capital in the Delta. Dr. Budge takes the same view, while Dr. Naville and others suppose that the site of Raameses has still to be found.

There appears to have been no certain tradition preserving the site, for though St. Silvia (about 355 AD) was told that it lay 4 miles

3. Situation. From the town of Arabia (see Goshen), she found no traces of such a place. Brugsch (“A New City of Rameses, 1876,” Aegyptische Zeitschrift, 60) places one such city in the southern part of Memphis itself. Goodwin (Rec. of Past, Old Series, VI, 11) gives an Egyptian letter describing the “city of Rameses-Miamun,” which appears to lie between Zaan and it, since it was on the south bank. It was a very prosperous city when this letter was written, and a pa-ênennu or “palace city.” It had canals full of fish, lakes swarming with birds, fields of lentils, melons, wheat, onions and sesame, gardens of vines, almonds and figs. Ships entered its harbor, the lotus and papyrus grew in its waters. The inhabitants greeted Rameses II with garlands of flowers. Besides wine and mead, of the “conqueror’s city,” beer was brought to the harbor from the Kath (in Cilicia), and oil from the Lake Saghaî. There is no reason to suppose that Zaan was less prosperous in the early Hyksos age, when the Hebrews dwelt in its plain, whatever be the conclusion as to the date when the city Rameses received that name. The description above given agrees with the OT account of the possession given by Joseph to his family “in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses” (Gen 47 11). C. R. Conder

RABBAB, rab’a: (1) “רבעב, rábâb, Pašênâ, Rabhâb, Pašênâh, Rabhâb, Pašênâh, Rabhâb, Rabhan. The full name is יַעַבְרָב, râbahth b’r’ā’āmôn; יַבְרֹע בְּרִיָּם, ’râbahth b’â’riyân; יַבְרֹע בְּרִיָּם, ’râbahth b’â’riyân. Rabbah, the children of Ammon: This alone of the cities of the Ammonites is mentioned in Scripture, so we may take it as the most important. It is first named in connection with the "bed" or sarcophagus of Og, king of Bashan, which was said to be found here (De 3 11). It lay E. of the territory assigned to Gad (Josh 13 25). Whatever may have been its history in the interval, it does not appear again in Scripture till the time of David. This monarch sent an embassy of sympathy to King Haman when his father Nahash died. The kindness was met by wanton insult, which led to the outbreak of war. The Ammonites, strengthened by Aramaean allies, were defeated by the Israelites under Joab, and took refuge in Rabbah. After David's defeat of the Aramaeans at Helam a year later, the Ammonites were exposed alone to the full force of Israel, the ark of the covenant being carried with the troops. The country was ravaged and siege was laid to Rabbah. It was during this siege that Uriah the Hittite by David's orders was exposed "in the forefront of the hottest battle" (2 S 11 15), where, treacherously deserted by his comrades, he was slain. How long the siege lasted we do not know; probably some years; but the end was in sight when Joab captured "the city of waters" (2 S 12 27). This may mean that he had secured control of the water supply. In the preceding verse he calls it the "royal city." By the chivalry of his general, David was enabled in person to enjoy the honor of taking the city. Among the booty secured was the crown of Melcom, the god of the Ammonites. Such of the inhabitants as survived he treated with great severity (2 S 12 26-31; 1 Ch 20 1-8).

In the utterances of the prophets against Ammon, Rabbah stands for the people, as their most important, or perhaps their only important, city (Jer 49 2; Ezek 21 20; 25 5; Am 1 14). Jer 49 4 speaks of the "flowing valley"—a reference perhaps to the abundance of water and fruitfulness—and the treasures in which she gloried. Ezek 21 21 represents the king of Babylon at "the head of the two ways" deciding by means of the divining arrows whether he should march against Jerus or against Rabbah. Amos seems to have been impressed with the palace of Rabbah.

The city retained its importance in later times. It was captured by Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 BC), who called it Philadelphia. It was a member of the league of ten cities. Antiochus the Great captured it by means of treachery (Polyb. v.71). Jos (BJ, III, iii, 3) names it as lying E. of the citadel appear to be very old; but it is quite impossible to say that anything Ammonite is now above ground. The citadel is connected by means of an underground passage with a large cistern or tank to the N., whence probably it drew its water-supply. This may be the passage mentioned in the account of the capture of the city by Antiochus.

"It is," says Conder (Heth and Moab, 158), "one of the finest Rom towns in Syria, with baths, a theater, and an odeum, as well as several large private masonry tombs built in the valley probably in the 2d cent. The fortress on the hill, now surrounding a considerable temple, is also probably of this same date. The church with two chapels farther N., and perhaps some of the tombs, must belong to a later age, perhaps the 4th cent. The fine mosque and the fine Moslem building on the citadel hill cannot be earlier than the 7th, and are perhaps as late as the 11th cent.; and we have thus relics of every building epoch except the Crusading, of which there appears to be no indication.

The place is now occupied by Arabs and Circassians who profit by the riches of the soil. It is brought into contact with the outside world by means of the Damascus-Hejaz Railway, which has a station here.

(2) הַֽרְבָּ֖יִת, הַֽרְבָּ֖י; B, וּֽרְבָּ֗יִת, סֹֽדְּכָ֖ה, A, אֶֽרְבָּ֖בָּה, Aрабָּבָ֖ה: An unidentified city of Judah named along with Kirath-jearim (Josh 15 60).

RABBI, rabbi, rab’hו (ר’), רבא, רָבָּבָּה, ραββάς, rabbi; a term used by the Jews of their religious teachers as a title of respect, from גָּרְבָּה, “great,” so “my great one” (cf Lat magister), once of masters of slaves, but later of teachers (Mt 23 7); therefore tr’ by δακτύλιος, δακτυλίας, “teacher” (Mt 25 8; 1 Jn 2 5; cf ver 49). In AV frequently rendered “Master” (Mt 20 25 44; Mk 9 5; 11 21; 14 15; Jn 4 31; 9 2; 11 8). John the Baptist (Jn 3 26), as well as Christ, is addressed with the title (Jn 1 49; 6 25), both by disciples and others. Jesus forbade its use among His disciples (Mt 20 25). Later (Galilean) form of same, RABBONI (q.v.). For Rabbinical literature see TALMUD. EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

RABBITH, rab’ithו (ר’), הַֽרְבָּ֖יִת; B, דַּאֲבָ֖֖דְנָא, דַאֲבָ֖֖דְנָא, דאֲבָ֖דְנָא, Dabədən, a town in the territory of Issachar (Josh 19 20) which is probably represented today by Raba, a village in the southern part of the Gilboa range and N. of lbdkt. The hab is, of course, the def. art.

RABBLE, rab’l: This word is not found in AV. RV has it once as the tr of ἄγγελος, ἄγγελος (lit. “lounger in the market place”), in Acts 17 5, where it replaces “baser sort” of AV. It has the common meaning of an unruly, lawless set who are ready to join a mob.

RABBONI, rab’-ōni, rab’-ōni (ר’), רַבְבָּבָּוּנִי, rabboni, rabboni, “my great master” (Mk 10 51); ραββαβονι [WH -wel], rabbbonti [-nei] (Jn 20 16). See RABBI.

RAB-MAG, rab’magו (ר’), רבָּם-נָ֜גְּד, Ṭaqu-mm damage; LXX as proper noun, Ῥαβμᾶκη, Ῥαβμαγῆθ: The name of one of the Rab princes who were present at the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, during the reign of Zedekiah, king of Judah (Jer 39 3 13). The word is a compound, the two parts seeming to be in apposition and signifying tautologically the same thing. The last syllable or section of the word, נָ֜גְּד, was the designation among the Medes, Persians and Babylonians for priests and wise men. Its original significance was “great” or “powerful.” Gr μεγας, μεγας, Lat magis, magus. The first syllable, rab, expresses practically the same idea, that of greatness, or abundance in size, quantity, or power. Thus it might be interpreted the “all-wise” or “all-powerful” prince, the chief magician or physician. It is, therefore, a title and not a name, and is accordingly put in appositive relations to the proper name just preceding, as “Nergal-sharezer, the Rab-mag,” tr’ fully, “Nergal-sharezer the chief prince or charioteer.” See NERGAL-SHAREZER.

In harmony with the commonly accepted view, the proper rendering of the text should be, “All the princes of the king of Babylon came in, and sat in the middle gate, to wit, Nergal-sharezer, Samgarnebo, Sarsechim, [the] Rab-saris, Nergal-sharezer, [the] Rab-mag, after 39 3; and Nergal-sharezer, the captain of the guard sent, and Nebuzaradan, [the] Rab-saris, and Nergal-sharezer, [the] Rab-mag, and all the chief officers of the king of Babylon” (39 13). WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

RAB-SARIS, rab’sar-isו (ר’), רָבָּסָּרִי, rab-shar’i: As with Rab-mag, which is not regarded as a name, but a title, so this is to be regarded as a descriptive title for the person whose name precedes it (see RAB-MAG). The first part, rab’, signifies “great” or “chief,” the second, sar’i, is the title of eunuch or chamberlain. The tr then refers to the chief eunuch or the chief of the eunuchs (or chamberlains).

The oriental custom was for the king to surround himself with a number of eunuchs, who performed varied kinds of service, both menial and dignified. They usually had charge of his harem; sometimes they occupied court positions. Frequently they superintended the education of the youth. The term itself was sometimes used to designate persons in places of trust who were not eunuchs. The above title describes the highest or chief in rank of these eunuchs. See EUNUCH.

The full title is used 3 t, once in connection with the titles of other important officers who were sent by the king of Assyria with a large army to demand the surrender of Jerusalem. The eunuch was properly, ‘And the king of Assyria sent the Tartan and the Rab-saris (the chief eunuch) and the Rab-shakeh from Lachish to king Hezekiah’ (2 K 18 17). Again, it refers to a Babylonian who bore a real name was Sarsechim, who with the other Bab honces sat in the middle gate during the capture of Jerusalem. This event is described as having occurred in the 11th year of Zedekiah, king of Judah (Jer 39 3).

The third time, in connection with the name Nebuchadzaban, who, with the other chief eunuch of the king of Babylon, sent and took Jeremiah out of the court of the guard and committed him to Gedaliah, who was to take him home to dwell with his own people (Jer 39 19).

Thus it is seen that based upon this accepted theory the three titles would be in their connections as follows: (1) simply “the chief eunuch,” (2) Sarsechim, the Rab-saris (or chief eunuch), and (3) Nebuchadzaban, the Rab-saris (or chief eunuch). See also ASSYRIA, X. WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

RABSHAKEH, rab’sha-ke, rab-sha’ke (רָבָּשָּׁקָה, rabshak’ih): A compound word, the first part, rab, indicating “head” or “chief” (see RAB-MAG; RAB-SARIS). The second part, which in the Aram., probably meant “cupbearer,” here “leader,” refers to him and elsewhere, according to later discoveries, an extended significance, and meant chief officer, i.e. chief of the heads or captains.

R, was one of the officers sent by Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, with the Tartan and the Rab-saris to demand the surrender of Jerusalem, which was under siege by the Assyrian army (2 K 18 17 19 26 27; 28 37; 19 4 8; Isa 36 2 4 11 12 22; 37 4 8). The three officers named went from Lachish to Jerusalem and appeared by the conduit of the upper pool. Having called upon King Hezekiah, his representatives Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, Sheb- nah, the scribe, and Joah, the recorder, appeared. R sent through them a message to the king in which he represented himself as the spokesman for the king of Assyria. He derided King Hezekiah in an insolent fashion in representing his trust in Egypt as a bruised reed which would pierce the hand. Likewise his confidence in Jeh was vain, for He also would be unable to deliver them. Then the officers of the king of Assyria, requesting an interpreter in the Syriac language which they understood, and not in the Jews’ language which the people on the wall understood. This he refused to do, speaking still more loudly in order that they might hear and he persuaded. He bribery and appeal, by promise and by deception he exhorted them to turn traitor to Hezekiah and surrender to him. However, true to the command of Hezekiah (2 K 18 36), "he held his peace, and answered him not a word." Afterward R. returned "found the king of Assyria warring against Libnah" (2 K 19 8). From this description it is inferred that R. was a man of considerable literary attainment, being able in all probability, to speak in three languages. He had, in addition to his official power, dauntless courage, an insolent spirit and a characteristic oriental disregard for veracity.

RACA, ra'ka; ra-kal' (raak, raakh, WH with codd. Nk Be, etc.; raheh, rauchh, Tisch. with Nk D; Aram. ra'kal, rekh, from rakheth; rakkh, vain); Vain worthless fellow; a term of contempt used by the Jews in the time of Christ. In the Bible, it occurs in Mt 5 22 only, but John Lightfoot gives a number of instances of the use of the word by Jewish writers (Hor. Heb., ed. by Gandell, Oxford, 1859, 11, 108). Chrysostom (who was acquainted with Syr as spoken in the neighborhood of Antioch) says it was equivalent to the Gr σφόν, σφομανία, "thus, 'used contemptuously instead of a man's name. Jerome rendered it manus et singulio abaque cerebro. It is generally explained as expressing contempt for a man's intellectual capacity (= 'you simpleton!'); while ματή, μαρακί (tr 'you fool!'), in the same verse is taken to refer to a man's moral and religious character (= 'you rascal'); 'you impious fellow!'). Thus we have three stages of anger, with three corresponding grades of punishment: (1) the inner feeling of anger (ήργισομαι, ἐργίσιμαι), to be punished by the local or provincial court (τῷ κάθε, τῇ κρίσει, τῷ κρίσιν; the judgment;); (2) anger breaking forth into an expression of scorn (Raca), to be punished by the Sanhedrin (τῷ συνέδριο, τῷ συνεδρίῳ, the council); (3) anger culminating in abusive and defamatory language (Mrē), to be punished by the fire of Gehenna. This view, of a double climax, which has been held by foremost Eng. and Ger. commentators, seems to give the passage symmetry and gradation. But it is rejected among others by T. K. Cheyne, who, following J. P. Peters, rearranges the text by transferring the clause "and when he shall give the law to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council" to the end of the preceding verse (ESV, IV, cols. 4001 f). There certainly does not seem to be trustworthy external evidence to prove that the terms "the judgment," "the council," the Gehenna of fire stand to each other in a relation of inferior lower hand and inferior legal court or would be so understood by Christ's hearers. What is beyond dispute is that Christ condemns the use of disparaging and insulting epithets as a supreme offence against the law of humanity, which belongs to the same category as murder itself. It should be added, however, that it is the underlying feeling and not the verbal expression as such that constitutes the sin. Hence Our Lord can, without any real inconsistency, address two of His followers as "fools" (Mr 2 24, 25; Mt 10 32a, ἀσύλος, practically equivalent to Raca, as is also James' expression, "O vain man," Jas 2 20).

RACAL, ra'kal (tlt, raqalh, 'trader'): A place in Judah, enumerated among the "places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt," to the exclusion of share of spoils (1 S 30 29). The LXX reading "Carmel" has been adopted, by many, because of the similarity of the words in Heb (רֶאֶל and רֶהֶמֶר) and because there was a Carmel in the neighborhood of Hebron (Josh 15 55; 1 S 15 12), which figures in the story of David's adventures when pursued by Saul (1 S 26) in a manner that makes it improbable that he would overlook the place in his good fortune (AV "Rachal"). RACHEL, ra'chel (tlt), râchel, 'ewe'; P'x'kh, Rachâch (Gen 29 6; Jer 31 15, AV "Rahel"): An ancestress of Israel, wife of Jacob, mother of Joseph and Benjamin. Rachel was the younger daughter of Laban, the Aramean, the brother of Jacob's mother; so Rachel and Jacob were cousins. They met for the first time upon the arrival of Jacob at Haran, when attracted by her beauty he immediately fell in love with her, winning her love by his chivalrous act related in Gen 29 10 ff. According to the custom of the times Jacob contracted with Laban for her possession, agreeing to serve him 7 years as the stipulated price (29 17-20). But when the time had passed, Laban deceived Jacob by giving him Leah instead of Rachel. When Jacob protested, Laban gave him Rachel also, on condition that Jacob serve 7 years more (29 21-29). To her great dismay "Rachel was barren" (Gen 30 30.51), while Leah had children. Rachel, envious of her sister, complained to Jacob, who reminded her that children are the gift of God. Then Rachel resorted to the expedient once employed by Sarah under similar circumstances (16 2 ff); she bade Jacob take her handmaid Bilhah, who was barren, to "obtain children by her" (30 3). Dan and Naphtali were the offspring of this union. The evil of polygamy is apparent from the dismal rivalry arising between the two sisters, each seeking by means of children to win the heart of Jacob. In her eagerness to become a mother of children, Rachel bargained with Leah for the handmaids, or love-apples of her son Reuben, but all to no avail (30 14). Finally God heard her prayer and granted her her heart's desire and she gave birth to her firstborn, whom she named Joseph (30 22-24).

Some years after this, when Jacob fled from Laban with his wives, the episode of the theft of the teraphim of Laban by Rachel, related in 31 19. 34-55, occurred. She hoped by securing the household gods of her father to bring prosperity to her own household. Though she succeeded by her cunning in concealing them from Laban, Jacob later, upon discovering them, had them put away (35 2-4). In spite of all, she continued to be the favorite of Jacob, as is clearly evidenced by 33 2, where we are told that he assigned to her the place of greatest safety, and by his preference for Joseph, her son. After the arrival in Canaan, while they were on the way from Beth-el to Ephrath, i.e. Bethlehem, Rachel gave birth to her second son, Benjamin, and died (35 16 ff).

In a marked manner Rachel's character shows the traits of her family, cunning and covetousness, so evident in Laban, Rebekah and Jacob.

2. Character

Though a believer in the true God (30 8-29), she was yet given to the superstitions of her country, the worshiping of the teraphim, etc (31 19). The futility of her efforts in resorting to self-help and superstitious expedients, the love and strongest faith of her husband (35 2-4), were the prevailing notions of purifying her character. Her memory lived on in Israel long after she died. In Ruth 4:11, the names of Rachel and Leah occur in the nuptial benediction as the foundresses of the house of Israel.

Rachel’s Tomb (לְכָּרִית נְאָר, מסקַבְבֶּה יִשְׂרָאֵל): In Gen 35:20 we read: “Jacob set up a pillar upon her grave: the same is the Pillar of Rachel’s grave unto this day’, i.e. the time of the writer. Though the pillar, i.e. sepulchral monument, has long disappeared, the spot is marked until this day, and Christians, Jews and Mohammedans unite in honoring it. The present tomb, which, apparently, is not older than the 15th cent. is built in the style of the small-domed buildings raised by Moslems in honor of their saints. It is a rough structure of four square walls, each about 23 ft. long and 20 ft. high; the dome rising 10 ft. higher is used by Mohammedans for prayer, while on Fridays the Jews make supplication before the empty tomb within. It is doubtful, but probable, that it marks the exact spot where Rachel was buried. There are, apparently, two traditions as to the location of the place. The oldest tradition, based upon Gen 35:16-20; 48:7, points to a place one mile N. of Bethlehem and 4 miles from Jerus. Mt 2:18 speaks for this place, since the evangelist, reporting the slaughter of the innocents of Bethlehem, represents Rachel as weeping for her children from her neighboring grave. But according to 1 S 10:22, which apparently represents another tradition, the place of Rachel’s grave was on the “border of Benjamin,” near Beth-el, about 10 miles N. of Jerus, at another unknown Ephrath. This location, some believe, is corroborated by Jer 31:15, where the prophet, in relating the leading away of the people of Ramah, which was in Benjamin, into captivity, introduces Rachel the mother of that tribe as bewailing the fate of her descendants. Those that believe this northern location to be the place of Rachel’s grave take the words, “the same is Beth-lehem,” in Gen 35:19; 48:7, to be an incorrect gloss; but that is a mere assumption lacking sufficient proof.

Mr. Nathan Strauss, of New York City, has purchased the land surrounding Rachel’s grave for the purpose of erecting a Jewish university in the Holy Land.

RADDAI, ra’d’a (-d’), ra’d-dai’ (-d’), roadway, ‘beating down’): The 5th of the 7 sons of Jesse, father of David, according to 1 Ch 2:14 (LXX Alex. “Rhadai”; Luc., “Rhadai”; others, “Zaddai”).

RADIAN, ra’d’i-ant (-d’), nābār, “to sparkle,” i.e. [fig.] be cheerful; hence [from the stream of a running stream], to flow, i.e. [fig.] assemble; flow [together], be lightened: ARV substitutes the active “radiant” for the passive “were lightened” in Ps 34:5; Isa 60:5 (ERV, AV “flow together”). As the earth in its moon, both the common sun and lighten each other, they are not only lightened, but radiant. So with the believers, “They looked unto him [Jeh], and were radiant.” Thus nābār combines the two ideas of being lightened and flowing together. This appears, also, in a different connection, in Isa 60:5, “Then thou shalt see and be radiant.” “It is liquid light—light that ripples and sparkles and runs across the face: . . . the light which a face catches from sparkling water” (G. A. Smith, Zieaith, II, 430). M. O. Evans

RAFT, raft. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 1, (2).

RAFTED, raft’er (Cant 1:17). See GALLERY; HOUSE.

RAG: Pl. in Prov 23:21, “Drossiness will clothe a man with rage” (שִׁפַּת, b’re-im, “torn garment”; of 1 K 11:30), and figuratively in Isa 64:6 AV, “All our righteousnesses are as filth by rage,” in the sense of “tattered clothe” (שִׁפַּת, beqhezeth, AV “garment”). In Jer 38:11:12 ARV translates תְיָרָה, קַבּוֹחַ, as “rag” (AV, ERV “old cast clout”), while AV, ERV use “torn rag” for תְיָרָה, melah (ARV “worn-out garment”). Both קַבּוֹחַ and melah mean “worn out.”

RAGAU, ra’g’ō (Paya’o [WH], ‘Paya’o, Rhagag): AV; Gr form of “Reu” (thus RV) (Lk 3:35).

RAGES, ra’jēs, RAGAU, ra’g’ō ("Rages," Tob 1:14; 4:120; 5:5; 9:12; 9:2; "Ragau," Jsh 15:15; Paya’o, Payag, Payo’o, Rago’o, Raga’o). 1. Location ‘Peyn, Rhag, Paya’o, Rago’i; in Da’rus’ Behistan Inscriptions, II, 71,72, Raga’d, a province; in Avesta, Vend. I, 15, Rago’a, city and province; perhaps, “the excellent”): In Eastern Media, one forced march from Caspian Gates, 11 days’ journey from Ecbatana, 5/4 miles S. of present Tehrān; the capital of the province of the same name, though by Ptolemy called Rhagiana.

(1) Ancient.—A very ancient city, the traditional birthplace of the Zoroastrians (Zarathushtra, Zorakah Vandishkast, Zād a’vād ad Vuri, XV, 12; 2 History. Dābāstān-i Mazābeh). In Yasna XIX, 15, of the Avesta, it is thus mentioned: “The Zoroastrians, four-chief-possessing Raga’ah, hers are the royal chieftains, both the house-chief, the village-chief, and the town-chief: Zoroaster is the fourth.” In Vend. I, 15: “As the tenth, the best of both districts and cities, I, who am Ahura Mazda, did create Raga’h, which possesses the three classes,” i.e. fire-priests, charioteers, husbandmen. Later it was the religious center of magus, a large colony of captive Israelites settled there. Destroyed in Alexander’s time, it was rebuilt by Seleucus Nicator (c 300 BC), who named it Europos. Later, Arsaces restored it and named it Arsacida.

(2) Mediæval.—In the early Middle Ages Raga’ah, then called Ra’i, was a great literary and often political center with a large population. It was the birthplace of Būrkhā’ār Khān, Timur (763 AD). It was sacked and plundered (1029 AD) by Sulṭān Mahmūd, but became Tangi-rī’s capital. In the Viṣa rām (c 1048 AD) it is an important place, 10 days’ journey according to the Zardūst. It was a small provincial town in about 1200 AD. It was sacked by Mongols in 1220 AD and entirely destroyed under Ghāzī Khān in 1259. A Zoroastrian community lived there in 1278 AD, one of whom composed the Zardūst.

(3) Present condition.—Near the ruins there now stands the village of Sīhā ‘Abūl’ Agīn, connected with Tīrān by the rail from Teherān (Persia railway in 1883).

LITERATURE.—Potter, Diodorus Siculus, Pliny, Strabo, Thān’ut Atīr, Jām’ū t Fawārid, Thāmītī.

RAGUEL, ra-qū'el (Pauōv, Rhagouēl): "The friend of God," of Echatana, the husband of Edna, father of Sarah, and father-in-law of Tobias (Tob 3 7.17; 6 10; 7 2 f.; 14 12). In 7 2 he is called cousin of Tobias, and in Tob 6 10 AV he is erroneously represented as "cousin" of Tobias= "kinsman" in RV. In En 20 4 Raguel appears as one of the archangels, perhaps by confusion for Raphael (Tob 3 17). Another form of the name is REUEL (q.v.).

RAGUEL, ra-qū'el, ra-qū'el (Rāqāq, r'qū'ēl): LXX Rhagouēl; The Midianite ḥāṭēm, i.e. either father-in-law or brother-in-law of Moses (Nu 10 29 AV, RV "Reuel"), the father of Hobab, called a Kenite, who is likewise described as a ḥāṭēm of Moses (Jgs 4 11). See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY. Moses' wife's father is called r'qū'ēl in Ex 2 18 where Lucian reads "Iothor" and EV "Reuel," which translation is adopted in RV in Nu 10 29 also. In other passages the hāṭēm of Moses is called "Jethro," i.e. "Jehotr." Among the harmonizations suggested the following are worthy of consideration: (a) that all are names or perhaps titles of one man (Raah); (b) that Reuel was the father of Hobab and Jethro, that Jethro was the father-in-law of Moses, and that "Jethro" is used for grandfather in Ex 2 18; (c) that Reuel was the father-in-law and Jethro and Hobab brothers-in-law; (d) that either Reuel or Hobab is to be identified with Jethro. None of these views is free from difficulty, nor is the view of those who would give Jethro as the name in E and Reuel as that in J and JE. See also REUEL.

(1) (רָהָב, rā'hāv, "broad"); in Jos, Ant, V, i, 2, 7, (Pāxā'ē, Rhadah); He 11 31 and Jas 2 25, (Pā'āx, Rhadah); A zōnah, that is either a "harlot," or, according to some, an "inkeeper" in Jericho (LXX πυρην, πόρην, "harlot"). The two spies sent by Joshua from Shittim came into her house and lodged there (Jos 2 1). She refused to betray them to the king of Jericho, and when he demanded them, she hid them on the roof of her house with stalks of flax that she had laid in order to dry. She pretended that they had escaped before the shutting of the gate, and threw their pursuers off their track. She then told the spies of the fear that the coming of the Israelites had caused in the minds of the Canaanites—"Our hearts did melt . . . for thou hast made God our God in heaven above, and on earth beneath"—and asked that the men promise to spare her father, mother, brothers and sisters, and all that they had. They promised her to spare them provided they would remain in her house and provided she would keep their business secret. Thereupon she let them down by a cord through the window, her house being built upon the town wall, and gave them directions to make good their escape (Josh 2 1-24). True to their promise, the Israelites under Joshua spared Rahab and her family (Josh 6 19 ff AV); and, "saying the author of Josh, "she dwelleth in Israel even unto this day." This story appealed strongly to the imagination of the people of later times. He 11 31 speaks of her as having been saved by faith; James, on the other hand, in demonstrating that a man is justified by works and not by faith only, loudly chooses the same example (Jas 2 25). Jewish tradition has been kindly disposed toward Rahab; one hypothesis goes so far as to make her the wife of Joshua himself (Jew Enc, s.v.). Naturally then the other tr of zōnah, deriving it from zān, "to feed," instead of zānāh, "to be a harlot," has been preferred by some of the commentators.

(2) (Pāxā'ē, Rhadah): Jos, Ant, V, i, 2, 7, so spells the name of (1) (LXX and NT contra). The wife of Salmon, and mother of Boaz (accord- ing to the genealogy in Mt 1 5). Query, whether there was a tradition identifying (1) and (2); see Lightfoot, Horae Heb on Mt 1 5.

(3) (רָהָב, rahab, lit. "storm," "arrogance"): A mythical sea-monster, probably referred to in several passages where the word is tr as a common noun "pride" (Jos 9 13), "the devil" (Job 8 6). Cf Ps 89 10. It is used in parallelism with lamin, "the dragon" (Isa 51 9). It is most familiar as an emblem of Egypt, "the boaster that sitteth still" (Isa 30 7; Ps 87 4; cf 89 10). The Talm in Bābah Bathrē speaks of rahabah as sar ha-yām, "master of the sea." See also ASTRONOMY.

RAHAM, rā'ham (רָהָם), raham, "pity," "love"): Son of Shema, and father of Jorkam (1 Ch 2 44).

RAHEL, rā'ehel (Jer 31 15 AV). See RACHEL.

RAID, rā'd (I 27 10). See WAR, 3.

RAIL, rā', RAILING, rā'ling, RAILER, rā'lēr: To "rail" on (in modern usage "against") anyone is to use insolent or reproachful language toward one. It occurs in the OT as the tr of דָּרָל, darāl (2 Ch 32 17, "letters to rail on Jeh"), and of רָל (ות, hē, a SV 15, 4, of Nahal, "he railed at them," ERV "flew upon them," m railed on"). In the NT "to rail" is the tr of βαράλω, blasphēmō, "rail." (Mt 15 29; Lk 23 39; "railing," 1 Tim 6 4; 2 Pet 2 11; Jude ver 9). The word lōdorō, rendered " railing" in 1 Pet 3 9 AV, is in RV "reviling," and lōdaros, "railer," in 1 Cor 6 11 is in RV "reviler." See also RACA. W. L. Walker

RAIMENT, rā'ment. See Dress.

RAIMENT, SOFT (nākēs, malakōs): In Mt 11 8 EV, where Jesus, speaking of John the Baptist, asks: "What went ye out to see? a man clothed in soft raiment?" where "raiment," though implied, is not expressed in the best text, but was probably added from Lk 7 25. It is equivalent to "elegant clothing," such as courtiers wore, as shown by the words following, "Behold, they that wear soft raiment are in kings' houses." John had bravely refused to play courtier and had gone to prison for it. In the early days of Herod the Great some scribes who attached themselves to him laid aside their usual plain clothing and wore the gorgeous raiment of courtiers (Jost, in Plumptre).

RAIN, rā'n (ология, mātār, Arab. mār, "rain," ṣā'ām, "heavy rain," ḫā'ērān, mōrēh, "early rain," ḫūlîn, yīrēh, "former rain," ṣā'ām, "latter rain"); Supply in Egypt and Palestine. In Egypt there is little or no rainfall, the water for vegetation being supplied in great abundance by the river Nile; but in Syria and Pal there are large rivers, and the people have to depend entirely on the fall of rain for water, and therefore no rain, for their fields. The children of Israel when in Egypt were promised by Jehovah a land where "drinketh water of the rain of heaven" (Dt 11). Springs and fountains are found in most of the valleys, but the flow of the springs depends directly on the fall of rain or snow in the mountains.
The cultivation of the land in Pal is practically dry farming in most of the districts, but even then some water is necessary, so that there may be moisture in the soil. In the summer months there is no rain, so that the rains of the spring and fall seasons are absolutely essential for starting and maturing the crops. The lack of this rain in the proper time has often been the cause of complete failure of the harvest. The small difference in the amount of these seasonal rains makes a large difference in the possibility of growing various crops without irrigation. Ellsworth Huntington has insisted on this point with great care in his very important work, Pal and Its Transformation. The promise of prosperity is given in the assurance of "rain in due season" (Lev 26:4 AV). The withholding of rain according to the prophecy of Elijah (1 K 17:1) caused the mountain streams to dry up (1 K 17:7), and famine ensued. A glimpse of the terrible suffering for lack of water at that time is given us. The people were uncertain of another meal (1 K 17:12), and the animals were perishing (1 K 18:5).

Pal and Syria are bordered between the sea and the desert, and besides are so mountainous, that they not only have a great range of rainfall in different years, but a great variation in different parts of the country.

The amount of rain on the western slopes is comparable with that in England and America, varying from 25 to 40 in. per annum, but it falls mostly in the four winter months, when the downpour is often very heavy, giving oftentimes from 12 to 15 in. a month. On the eastern slopes the less, varying from 15 to 30 in. per annum. The highest amount falls in the mountains of Lebanon where it averages about 50 in. in Beirut the yearly average is 24.4 in. Between 33° and 34° S. from Syria, the amount decreases (Haifa 27.75, Jaffa 22.36, Gaza 17.61), while in the Sinaitic Peninsula there is little or none. Going from W. to E. the change is much more sudden, owing to the mountains which stop the clouds. In Damascus the average is less than 10 in. In Jerus the average for 50 years is 26.16 in., and the change is from 13.39 in 1879 to 41 in. in 1904. The records in the time of Ahab and Elijah, when the rain was very light, were given in the business transactions of the people (1 K 17:1).

The amount of rainfall in ancient times was probably about the same as in present times, though it may have been distributed somewhat differently through the year, as suggested by Huntington. Conder maintains that the present amount would have been enough to support the ancient cities (Travelq in Pal). Trees are without doubt, fewer now, but meteorologists agree that trees do not produce rain. The rainfall is largely on the western slopes of the mountains, facing the sea, and the eastern slopes there is very little. The moisture-laden air comes up from the sea with the west and southwest wind. When these currents strike the hills they are thrown higher up into the cooler strata, and the moisture condenses to form clouds. This is called "rainy sea." During periods of the ridge of the rains, the currents descend on the other side to warmer levels, where the moisture is easily held in the form of vapor so that no rain falls and few clouds are seen, except in the cold mid-winter months.

The summer months are practically rainless, with very few clouds appearing in the sky. From May 1 to the middle of October one can be sure of no rain; "The winter is past; the rain is over" (Cant 2:11), so many sleep on the roofs of the houses or in tents of leaves and branches in the fields and vineyards throughout the summer. The continuous hot droughts make the people appreciate the springs and fountains of fresh running water and the cool shade of rock and tree.

The rainy season from October to May may be divided into three parts, the former, the winter, and the latter rains, and they are often referred to under these names in the OT.

The "former rains" are the showers of October and the first part of November. They soften the parched ground so that the winter grain may be sown before the heavy continuous rains set in. The main bulk of the rain falls in the months of December, January and February. Although in these months the rains are frequent and heavy, a dry, foggy day is seldom seen. The "latter rains" of April are the most highly appreciated, because they ripen the fruit and stay the drought of summer. They were considered a special blessing; Jeh "will come ... as the latter rain that watereth the earth" (Ps 68:8)."They opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain" (Job 29:23); and as a reason for worshipping Jeh who sent them, "Let us now fear Jeh our God, that giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in its season" (Jer 5:24).

The rain storms always come from the sea with a west or southwest wind. The east wind is a hot wind and the "north wind driveth away rain" (Prov 25:23 AV). "Fair weather cometh out of the north" (Job 37:22 AV).

The Psalmist recognizes that the showers that water the earth (Ps 72:6) are among the greatest blessings from the hand of Jeh: "The 5. Biblical early rain covereth it with blessings" Uses (Ps 84:6). The severest punishment of Jeh was to withhold the rain, as in the time of Ahab and Elijah, when the rain did not fall for three years (1 K 17): "the anger of Jeh be kindled against you, and he shut up the heavens, so that there shall be no rain, and the land shall not yield its fruit; and ye perish quickly" (Dt 11:17). Too much rain is also a punishment, as witness the flood (Gen 7:4) and the plague of rain and hail (Eze 10:9). Sending of rain was a reward for worship and obedience: "Jeh will open unto thee his good treasure, the heavens, to give the rain of the land in its season, and to bless all the work of thy hand!" (Dt 28:12). Jeh controls the elements and commands the rain: "He made a decree for the rain" (Job 28:26); "For he saith to the snow, Fall thou on the earth; likewise to the shower of rain" (Job 37:6).

RAINBOW, râm'bô (Heb. דָּבָל), kesheth, tr'd "a bow"; Gr. ἱψός, ἄειστα, "rainbow"): As most of the rainfall in Pal is in the form of short heavy showers it is often accompanied by the rainbow. Most beautiful double bows are the dead; and astronomically the moon is bright enough to produce the bow. It is rather remarkable that there are so few references to the rainbow in the Bible. The Heb kesheth is the ordinary word for a bow, there being no special word being before being dried.

The interpretation of the significance of the bow in the sky is given at the close of the story of the flood, where it is called "the token of the covenant" of Jeh with Noah that there should be no more flood: "I do set my bow in the cloud, .... and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh" (Gen 9 13,15). This addition to the story of the flood is not found in other mythical accounts. The foundation for the interpretation of the bow in this way seems to be that while His bow is hung in the sky God must be at peace with His people. The glory of God is likened to "the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain" (Ezk 1 28). The rainbow forms a striking part of the vision in Rev 4 3: "And there was a rainbow round about the throne." Alfred J. Hoy

RAISE, râz: "To raise" in the OT is most frequently the tr. of the Hiphil form of רָכָה, kîm, "to cause to arise," e.g. raising up seed (Gen 38 18), a prophet (Dt 18 18), judges (Jgs 2 16,18), etc; also of רכָּךְ, ër, "to awake," "stir up" (Ezr 1 5 AV; Isa 41 2, etc), with other words. In the NT the chief words are ἐρεύνα, ἐκερέμ, "to awaken," "arouse" (Mt 3 9; Lk 1 69; 3 8, etc), frequently of the sun and the world. (Dt 32 24; Jn 5 39, etc; Acts 2 24 [30 AV], etc), with compounds of the former. Among the RV changes may be noted, "to stir the fire" for "from raising" (Hos 7 4); "raised his gate" for "exacted his gate" (Prov 17 19); ARV, "can it be raised from the roots thereof" for "pluck it up by the roots thereof" (Ezk 17 9 AV and ERV); "raised up" for "rise again" (Mt 20 19; cf Mt 26 32; Rom 8 34; Col 3 1). W. L. Walker

RAISIN-CAKES, râz'n-kâks: RV gives this rendering for AV "foundations" in Isa 16 7 (Heb דַּקְקִית, from דַּקִּית, "to found," "make firm," "press"). The trade in these would cease through the devastation of the vineyards, and AV "flagon" in Hos 3 1, RV gives "cakes of raisins," such as were offered to the gods of the land, the givers of the grape (cf Cant 2 5). See next article.

RAISINS, râz'ns: (1) דָּבָל, Qimmeqim; σταφίδος, stephides, tr'd "dried grapes," Nu 6 3; mentioned in all other references as a portable food for a march or journey. Abigail supplied David with "a hundred clusters of raisins," among other things, in the wilderness of Paran (1 S 25 18); David gave two clusters of raisins to a slave of the Amalekites at Besor (30 12); raisins formed part of the provision brought to David at Hebron for his army (1 Ch 12 40); Ziba supplied David, when flying from Absalom, with a hundred clusters of raisins (2 S 16 1). (2) דַּקְקִית, Dâkkîkh, something "pressed together," hence a "cake." In Hos 3 1, mention is made of דָּבָל הַרְדֶּסִים, דַּקְקִית הַבָּדֶסִים (עֵרָה יָדִים וְעֵרָה, pâmnata metá staphídon), "cakes of raisins": "Ich loveth the children of Israel, though they turn unto other gods; and love (in "or them that love") cakes of raisins." These are supposed to have been cakes of dried, compressed grapes offered to false gods. Gritz considers that the Heb words are a corruption of 'dâshêm and hamâmêm ("sun images"). Cf Isa 17 8; 27 9. In other passages "cakes" stands alone without the "raisins," but the RV renders "cakes of raisins." Also Isa 16 7 in 2 S 6 19; 1 Ch 16 3; Cant 2 5 (AV "flagons"); Isa 16 7 in "foundations."

Raisins are today, as of old, prepared in considerable quantities in Pal, esp. at es-Salt, E. of the Jordan. The bunches of grapes are dipped in a strong solution of potash before being dried.

RAKEM, râk'kem (מַרְכֵּם, rakem, the pausal form of מַרְכָּם, rekm): The eponym of a clan of Machir (1 Ch 7 16). See Rokem.

RAKKATH, rak'kath (מַרְכָּת, rakkhath; B, רֶכְבֶּץ, Rokhekth): The Gr is obviously the result of confusing the two names Rakkath and Hammath, taking r in the former for d. Rakkath was one of the fortified cities in Naphtali (Josh 19 35). It is named between Hammath and Chinnereth. Hammath is identified with the hot baths to the S. of Tiberias. There are traces of ancient fortifications here. The rabbis think that Tiberias was built on the site of Rakkath. Certainly it is that Herod's town was built upon the ancient site, the grave of raisin, the old inhabitants being disturbed in digging the new foundations (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm, 208).

RAKKON, rak'kon (מַרְכְּנֵן), hâ-rakkôn;皮革數, Herrdôn). See Me-Jaekon.

RAM, ram (רָם, râm, "high," "exalted").

(1) An ancestor of David (Ruth 4 10 ["Appâr, Arrân"]; Mt 1 3.4 ["Abô, Arôm"]); in 1 Ch 2 9 he is called the "brother," but in ver 25, the "son of Jerahmeel" (cf ver 27). Ram as the son of Hezron appears more likely than Ram the son of Jerahmeel, since, according to the narratives of 1 and 2 S, David cannot have been a Jerahmeelite.

(2) Name of Elihu's family (Job 32 2). It is an open question as to whether Ram should be taken as a purely fictitious name, invented by the author of the Elihu speeches, or whether it is that of some obscure Arab tribe. In Gen 22 21 Aram is a nephew of Bus (cf Elihu the Buzite), and the conjecture was at one time advanced that Ram was a contraction of Bar-am or Bar-ran; but this theory is no longer held to be tenable. The suggestion that the initial a (N) has been changed by a scribal error into h (N) is more acceptable. Rash, the rabbinical commentator, takes the quaint position that Ram is identical with Abraham.

Horace J. Wolf

RAM, ram: (1) The ordinary word is רָמָה, ram, which is remarkably near to רָמִים, ragim, "deer" (cf Lat cervus, capra, "goat," and capreolus, "wild goat" or "roe-buck"; also Gr θανάτος, darkâs, "roe-buck" or "goat"). (2) רָמָה, dôhâr, lit. "male" (Exod 23 13; Dt 7 17). The RV translates "battering ram" (Ezk 4 2; 21 22); elsewhere "lamb" (Dt 32 14, etc). (1) רָמָה, "altûâh, properly 'be-goat' ("ram"); Gen 31 10.12 AV). See Sheep.

RAM, BATTERING. See Siege.

RAMA, râ'mâ (Ῥαμᾷ, Rhomâ): AV; Gr form of Ramah (q.v.) (Mt 2 18).

RAMAH, râ'mâ (Ῥαμᾷ), hâ-râmân, without the def. art. only in Neh 11 33; Jer 31 15): The name denotes height, from root רָמָה, râm, "to be high," and the towns to which it applied seem all to have stood on elevated sites.
(1) B, Arav, Arāšt, A, Raw, Ramā: A fenced city in the lot assigned to Naphtali (Josh 19 36). Only in this passage is the place referred to. It is probably identical with the modern er-Ramā, a large Christian village on the highway from Safed to the coast, about 8 miles W.S.W. of that city. To the N. rises the mountain range which forms the southern boundary of Upper Galilee. In the valley to the S. there is much rich land cultivated by the villagers. The olives grown here are very fine, and fruitful vineyards cover many of the surrounding slopes of the range. It is to be seen above ground; but the site is one likely to have been occupied in ancient times.

(2) Raw, Ramā: A city that is mentioned only once, on the boundary of Asher (Josh 19 29). The line of the boundary cannot be followed with certainty; but perhaps we may identify Ramā with the modern Rāmūn, a village situated on a hill which rises in the midst of a hollow, some 13 miles S.E. of Tyre, and 12 miles E. of the Ladder of Tyre. To the S.W. is a marshy lake which dries up in summer. Traces of antiquity are found in the cisterns, a large reservoir and many sarcophagi. To the W. is the high hill Be distrust, with ancient ruins, and remains of a temple of which several columns and pillars still stand.

(3) B, Arav, Rhamā, A, Raw, Ramūd, and other forms: A city in the territory of Benjamin named between Gibeon and Beerotth (Josh 18 25). The Levite thought of it as a possible resting-place for himself and his concubine on their northward journey (Jgs 19 13). The palm tree of Deborah was between this and Bethel (Jgs 4 5). Baseba, king of Samaria, sought to fortify Ramā against Ass, king of Judah. The latter frustrated the attempt, and carried off the materials which Baseba had collected from Ramā and his city of Benjamin and Mizpāh (1 K 15 16; 2 Ch 16 5). Here the captain of Nebuchadnezzar’s guard released Jeremiah after he had been carried in bonds from Jerusalem (Jer 40 1). It figures in Isaiah’s picture of the Assyrians’ approach (10 29). It is named by Hosea in connection with Gibeah (5 8), and is mentioned as being reoccupied after the exile (Ezr 2 26; Neh 7 30). It was near the traditional tomb of Rachel (Jer 31 15; of 1 S 10 2; Mt 2 18, Ar Ruia). From the passages cited we gather that Ramā lay some distance to the N. of Gibeah, and not far from Gibeon and Beerotth. The first is identified with Tell el-Ful, about 3 miles N. of Jerusalem. Two miles farther to the N. (el-Bih) about 3 miles W. of er-Rūmān, and Beerotth (el-Bireh) is about 4 miles to the N. Onom places Ramā 6 Roman miles N. of Jerusalem; while Jos (Ant, VIII, xii, 3) says it lay 40 furlongs from the city. All this points definitely to identification with er-Rūmān. The modern village crowds a high limestone hill to the S. of the road, a position of great strength. W. of the village is an ancient reservoir. In the hill are cisterns, and a good well to the S.

(Ammon): Ramāthaim: The home of Elkannah and Hannah, and the birthplace of Samuel (1 S 1 19; 2 11, etc.). In 1 S 1 1 it is called “Ramathaim-zophim” (רמאתם זופים, hō-Ramā-thayim-zophim). The phrase as it stands is grammatically incorrect, and suggests tampering with the text. It might possibly be tr “Ramatha-im-zoph” or “Thamathaim-zophim.” It was, however, within accessible distance of Shiloh, whether Samuel’s parents went up from year to year to worship and to sacrifice (1 3). From Ramāthaim as a center Samuel went on circuit annually, to judge Israel, to Bethel, Gibeath, and Mizpāh (7 16 f.). It is very probable that this is the city in which, guided by his servant, Saul first made the acquaintance of Samuel (9 6-10), where there was a high place (ver 12). Hither at all events came the elders of Israel with their demand that a king should be set over them (8 4 f.). After his final break with Saul, Samuel retired to Ramāthaim (16 1 f.). Here, in Naioth, David found asylum with Samuel from the mad king (19 18, etc.), and hence he fled on his ill-starred visit to Nob (20 1). In his native city the dust of the dead Samuel was laid (26 1; 28 23). In 1 Samuel 11 34 it is named as one of the three chortaphories along with Aphaeraem and Lydda, which were added to Judæa from the country of Samaria in 145 BC. Onom places it near Dipsolis (Euseb.) in the district of Timnāh (Jerome).

There are two serious rivals for the honor of representing the ancient Ramāthaim. (a) Bet Ramé, a village occupying a height 13 miles E.N.E. of Lydda (Diospolis), 12 miles W. of Shiloh, and about the same distance N.W. of Bethel. This identification has the support of G. A. Smith (HGHL, 254), and Bulil (GAP, 170). (b) Ramāthaim, a large and prosperous village occupying a lofty position with ancient remains. It commands a wide prospect, esp. to the W. It lies about 8 miles N. of Jerus, 3 W. of Bethel, and 12 S.W. of Shiloh. The same meaning of the height” of the place” may be reminiscent of the high place in the city where Saul found Samuel. In other respects it agrees very well with the Bib. data. Clauses have also been advanced on behalf of Ramāthaim, a village 2 miles S.W. of Lydda, in the plain of Sharon. This, however, is out of the question, as the place did not exist before Arab times. Others support identification with Nebi Samuel, which more probably represents the ancient Mizpāh (q.v.).

(5) Ramāthaim of the South, AV “Ramath of the South”: Ramāthaim is the construct form of Ramāthaim (Josh 19 8) (רמאתים נבanye, “Ramathaim neghebb”; Bāsēē sarā Mīzā, Ramāthim kāth idha). A city in that part of the territory of Judah which was allotted to Simeon. It stands here in apposition to Baalath-beer, and is probably a second name for the same place. It seems to correspond also with “Ramōth [pl.] of the South” (1 S 30 27), a place to which David sent a share of the spoil taken from the Amalekites. In this passage LXX retains the sing. form, “Ramāthaim.” Identification has been made with Kubbat el-Ba’al about 37 miles S. of Hebron; and with Kurnub a little farther S. There is no substantial ground for either identification.

(6) B, Raw, Ramūth, A, Raw, Ramūth, Ramāthaim: Ramāthaim in 2 K 8 29; 2 Ch 22 6, is a contraction of Ramōth-gilead. W. Ewing

RAMATH, rā’math, of the SOUTH (Josh 19 8 AV). See Ramāth, (5).

RAMATH-LEHI, rā’math-lehi (רמאת לי, “Ramath lehi,” “the hill”) or “height of Lehi,” (אָלֶהוֹ נָאָסִיָנָס, Anaireis nierionos): So the place is said to have been called where Samson threw away the jaw-bone of an ass, with which he had slain 1,000 Phiils (Jgs 15 17). LXX seems to have supposed that the name referred to “heaving” or throwing up of the jaw-bone. The Heb, however, corresponds to the form used in other place-names, such as Ramāth-mizpāh, and must be read as “Ramath of Lehi.” The name Lehi may have been given because of special importance in the place to the shape of a jaw-bone (Jgs 18 14, 19). It may have been in Wady es-Sarār, not far from Zorah and Timnāth; but the available data do not permit of certain identification. See JAW-BONE; LEHI. W. Ewing RAMATH-MIZPEH, ra'math-miz'pe (רַמַּתְ-מִצְפֶּה), rāmāth ha-mizjph; B, r'āmāšt ha kātā lēn Mēzōpā, Arābdūt kātā (tō Massēphā, A, Pāwād . . .; Massōpā, Rhōmōt; . . .; Massāphā): A place mentioned in Josh 13 26 in a statement of the boundary of Gad, between Heshbon and Betinom. It may possibly be identical with Mizpah, (4).

RAMATHAIM, rā-ma-th'ā-im (1 Mac 11 34; AV Ramathem, ra'am-them). See Ramah, (4).

RAMATHITE, ra'math-it (רַמַּתְיָה, ra'māštēyāh; B, ḍē 'Pāḏ, ko ek Rḥāṭ, A, ḍē Pāwāḏās, ko Rha-mathāios): So Shimei was called who was set by David over the vineyards (1 Ch 27 27). There is nothing to show to which Ramah he belonged.

RAMESES, ram'ē-sēz, ram-mē'sēz. See Ramases.

RAMAH, ra-mā'-a (רַמָּה, rāmāh; żyḥ; kē Rāmōth: A city in the territory of Issachar assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 73), mentioned between Daberath and Anem. It seems to correspond to "Remeth" in Josh 19 21, and to "Jarmuth" in 21 29, and is possibly identical with er-Rāmāh about 10 miles S.W. of Jenin. (2) Ramoth of the South. See Ramah, (5). (3) Ramoth in Gilead. See Ramoth-Gilead.

RAMOTH, ra'moth: (1) rāmōt; rāmōth; kē Rāmōth: A city in the territory of Issachar assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 73), mentioned between Daberath and Anem. It seems to correspond to "Remeth" in Josh 19 21, and to "Jarmuth" in 21 29, and is possibly identical with er-Rāmāh about 10 miles S.W. of Jenin. (2) Ramoth of the South. See Ramah, (5). (3) Ramoth in Gilead. See Ramoth-Gilead.

RAMOTH-GILEAD, ra'moth-gil'e-ad (רַמַּתְו-גִּילָּד), rāmōth gil'āḏ: B, Pāwāḏās, ḍē Rāmōth Gālāḏr, A, Pāwāḏās, Rhōmōt, and other forms): A great and strong city E. of the Jordan in the territory of Gad, which played an important part in the wars of Israel. It is first mentioned in connection with the appointment of the Cities of Refuge (Dt 4 43; Josh 20 8). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh 21 38; 1 Ch 6 80). In these four passages it is called "Ramoth in Gilead" (םַמַּת-גִּילָּד), this form is given wrongly by AV in 1 K 22 3. In all other places the form "Ramoth-gilead" is used. Here Ben-geber was placed in charge of one of Solomon's administrative districts (1 K 4 13), which included Havvoth-jair and "the 1. History region of Argob, which is in Bashan." The city was taken from Omri by the Syrians under Ben-hadad I (2d, VIII, xii, 3 b), and even now the descent of Ben-hadad at Aphek they remained masters of this fortress. In order to recover it for Israel Ahab invited Jehoshaphat of Judah to accompany him in a campaign. Despite the discouragement of Micaiah, the royal pair set out on the disastrous enterprise. In their attack on the city Ahab fought in disguise, but was mortally wounded by an arrow from a bow drawn "at a venture" (1 K 22 1-40; 2 Ch 18). The attempt was repulsed by Ahab's five sons; but his father's ill fortune followed him, and, heavily wounded, he retired for healing to Jereel (2 K 8 28 f; 2 Ch 22 5). During the king's absence from the camp at Ramoth-gilead Jehu was there anointed king of Israel by Elisha (2 K 9 1 f; 2 Ch 22 7). He proved a swift instrument of vengeance against the doomed house of Ahab. According to Jos (Ant, IX, vi, 1) the city was taken before Joram's departure. This is confirmed by 2 K 9 14 ff. The place is not mentioned again, unless, indeed, it be identical with "Mizpah" in 1 Mac 5 35. It is just possible that Ramoth-gilead corresponds to Mizpah, (1), and to Ramath-Mizpeh.

The spot where Laban and Jacob parted is called both Gilead and Gedor, and the city is often mentioned under both names. It was probably to Gilead that Ramah would naturally have been transferred in the time of the monarchy. But it is not in its original position that Mizpah Ramah may become Ramoth, as we see in the case of Ramoth of the South.

Merrill identifies the city with Jerash, the splendid ruin of which is in Wady el-Den, N. E. of the Jabbok. He quotes the Bab Talm (Makkoth 96 b) as placing the Cities of Refuge in pairs, so that those on the E. of the Jordan are opposite those on the W. Shechem, being the middle one of the three W. of the Jordan, should have Ramoth-gilead nearly opposite it to the E. and this would place its site at Gerasa, the modern Jerash (HDB, s.v.). But the words of the Talm must not be interpreted too strictly. It seems very probable that Golan, lay far S. of a stream drawn from Kedes (Kidd. naphtal). No remains have been discovered at Jerash older than Gr-Rom times, although the presence of a fine perennial spring makes occupation in antiquity probable. The place could be approached by chariots along Wady 'Ajlun, and the country adjoining was not unsuitable for chariot evolutions.

Conder and others have suggested Reimān, an ancient site to the W. of Jerash. The absence of any source of supply-such as a spring or stream-disqualifies this identification. Buhi (GAP, 261 ff) favors el-Jīlāḏ, a ruined site on a hill S. of the Jabbok; see Gilead, (1). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom, s.v.) contradict each other, the former placing Ramoth-gilead 15 miles W., and the latter 15 miles E. of Philadelphia. It is clear, however, that this is a mere slip on Jerome's part, as both say it is near the Jabbok. Many have identified it with es-Salt, which is indeed 16 miles W. of 'Ammān (Philadelphia), but it is 10 miles S. of the Jabbok, and so can hardly be described as near that river. It is also no place for chariot warfare. The case against identification with Ramoth-gilead is conclusively stated by Rev. G. A. Cooke in Driver's DI, xx.

In suggesting these sites sufficient attention has not been given to what is said in 1 K 4. The authority of the king's officer in Ramoth-gilead extended over the land of Argob in Bashan, as well as over the towns of Jair in Gilead. A situation therefore to the N. of Mahanaim must be sought. Guthe would find it at er-Romin, on the pilgrim road, about 10 miles S. of Mezerib (cf HGL, 566 ff). Cheyne's suggestion of Sabkha, away on the crest of the mountain of Bashan, is out of the question. The city of Gilead (Josh 13 31) argues in favor of Beit Rōs, over 11 miles S.E. of Gadara, a position commanding all Northern Gilead and as favorably situated as Jerash for chariot warfare and communication with the W. of Jordan.
“Here we have the heights of Northern Gilgal. Ramoth, Capitolias, and Beit Rāa are in their respective languages idiomatic equivalents. It is improbable that a large city like Capitolias should have superseded anything but a very important city of earlier times. We must be content to leave the question open meantime. W. Ewing RAMPART, ramp'part (Lam 2 8; Nah 3 8). See Fortification.

RAM'S HORN. See Music.

RAMS' SKINS: The skin of the sheep, roughly tanned with all the wool on, is the common winter jacket of the shepherd or peasant, the ram's being considered esp. desirable (cf He 11 37). Hence the appropriateness of these skins in the covering of the tabernacle (Ex 25 5, etc). See Tabernacle; Dye, Dyeing.

RANGE, rank: “Range” and “rank” have the same derivation, and in the sense of a "row" (of men, etc) they were formerly interchangeable. “Range” with this meaning is found in 2 K 11 8 15 AV (2 Ch 23 14 (RV "rank"; מְסֹפֶר, s'dherah, "row"). Hence "to range" is "to set in a line" (Jdt 2 16; 2 Mac 12 20, diatassó) or "to move in a line" or, simply, "to roam", whence "a ranging bear" (Prov 23 15; מִסְפֵּר, šāhāh; "run to and fro"). A looking "range" is a scribe on which nothing can be set in a row, but the kirjātin (קֵרְצָתִין) of Lev 11 35 is a much more primitive affair, composed, probably, of two plates (קֵרְצָתִים is a dual). In Job 39 8 "range of the mountains" is good modern use, but קֶשֶׁר, yirh, should be pointed yāhār (not yəḥār as in MT) and connected with šār, "search." So translate "He searcheth out the mountains as his pasture." Burton Scott Easton

RANK, rank: (1) מְסֹפֶר, šōrāh, used in Joel 2 7 of the advance of the locust army which marched in perfect order and in straight lines, none crossing the other's track. (2) מַסְפּוֹר, ma'darākhāh, "battle array" (1 Ch 12 38 AV; cf 1 S 4 16; 17 22 48). See Army.

RANKS, ranks (רָכָשׁ, ṭaṣād, "a square plot of ground," "a garden-bed"): “They sat down in ranks” (Mk 6 40); the several reclining ranks formed, as it were, separate plots or "garden-beds."

RANSOM, ran'sum (the noun occurs in the Eng. Bible 12 t [Ex 21 30 AV, מְשֹׁפֶר, pādāhōn; 30 12; Job 33 24; 36 18; Prov 6 35; 13 8; 21 18; Isa 43 3, מֶשָּׁפֶר, kêpher; Mt 20 28; Mk 10 45, λύτρον, luitron; 1 Tim 2 6, αὐτόλυτον, autolutron); the verbal form occurs 4 t [Isa 35 10; Hos 13 14, מְשֹׁפֶר, pādāhāh; Isa 51 10 AV; Jer 31 11, מָשֹׁפֶר, gō'āl; these two Heb vbs. are generally rendered in other passages by the Eng. "redeem"]:)

The supremely important instance is the utterance of the Lord Jesus Christ as reported by Matthew and Mark (Mt 20 28; Mk 10 45), and in looking at it we shall be able, by way of illustration, to glance at the OT passages. The

1. Usage context refers to the dispute among Christ the disciples concerning position in the kingdom, with the Kingdom, with the of the true nature of Christ's Kingdom. Christ makes use of the occasion to set forth the great law of service as determining the place of honor in that Kingdom, and illustrates and enforces it by showing that its greatest exemplification is to be found in His own mission: "For the Son of man also came not to be ministered unto, but to minister" (Mk 10 45). His ministry, however, was to pass into the great act of sacrifice, of which all other acts of self-sacrifice on the part of His people would be but a faint reflection: "and to give his life [soul] a ransom for many" (ib). He thus gives a very clear and unmistakable sense of the meaning and of His death; the clearest of all the intimations reported by the synoptists. The word He uses bears a well-established meaning, and is accurately rendered by our word "ransom," a price paid to secure the freedom of a slave or to set free from liabilities and charges, and generally deliver the deliverer from calamity by paying the forfeit. The familiar vb. רָכָשׁ, "to look for," "to set free," "to redeem," that which secures the freedom, the payment or forfeit; thence come the cognate vb. luitro, "to set free upon payment of a ransom," "to redeem," luitrois, "the actual setting free," "the redemption," andolutrois, "the redeemer." The favorite NT word for "redemption" is the compound form, αὐτολύσις.

The word luitro was common in Gr classical lit., constantly bearing the sense of "ransom price," and was frequently connected with μακρισ, and ἀναφορά, and expiation. Usage— But for the full explanation of Our the Law Lord's great thought we have to look to the OT usage. The two leading Heb vbs. tr in our version by "redeem," are generally rendered in the LXX by luitro, and derivatives of these words conveying the idea of the actual price paid are tr by this very word luitro.

The Heb is ποιλίλλον, a derivative of ποιλέλ, the LXX luitro. In vs 25, among the directions in relation to the Jubilee, we have the provision (ver 25) that the land was not to be sold "in perpetuity," but where any portion has been sold, opportunity is to be given for re-purchase: "You shall grant a redemption for the land" (vs 24). The Heb is ποιλίλλον, a derivative of ποιλέλ, the LXX luitro. In vs 25, the case is mentioned of a man who through poverty has sold part of his land, and near kin is able to redeem it he shall do so. If there is no one to act this brotherly part, and the man himself is able to redeem it, then there is the standard scale of payment of his own price which is to be paid him by him who has been "redeemed" it (in RV "and he will purchase his own redemption in AV, and not himself be able to redeem it," "will pay his own redemption")—i.e. he will pay the price for the redemption of his land, and not that of another. If he does not have the means of paying it himself, he will be paid the price of it. "You shall grant a redemption for the land" (vs 24). We must observe how accurately, in both cases, luitro, the "ransom-price." In Lev 27 31 AV, the phrase "if a man will at all redeem of his brother's inheritance" is intended to represent the typical Heb idiom, "if a man redeeming will redeem," which is rendered by LXX ποιλόν καὶ διὰ λυτρώσεως αὐτοῦ διαιρέεται.
ing the half-shekel to be paid by every Israelite from 20 years old and upward when a census was taken. It was to be the same for rich and poor, and it was called "atonement money," "to make atonement for their souls." In the opening words of the law, in Ex 30:12 (AV), we read, "Then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord"—the Heb kopher; the LXX rendering is lutra the pauchta avtoo, "a ransom price for his soul." All the people were thus considered and regarded as ransomers, and rendering the same was significant that this atonement money paid at the first census furnished the silver for the sockets of the tabernacle boards, intimating that the typical tabernacle was built upon atonement. The same thought that the people's lives were forfeited, comes out in the provision for the consecration of the Levites, recorded in full in Nu 3 40–51. The firstborn represented the people. God claimed all the firstborn as forfeited to Himself, teaching that Israel deserved the same punishment as the Egyptians, and was only spared by the grace of Jehovah, and in virtue of the sprinkled blood. Now He takes to Himself for His services the Levites as the equivalent of the firstborn, and when it was found that the number of the firstborn exceeded the number of the Levites, equivalence was maintained by ransom at a certain price the surpluses of the firstborn males. In the LXX account, lutra occurr 4 times, twice for the phrase "those to be redeemed," and twice in the plural, meaning, the idea of ransom for the forfeited life became familiar to the people as educated by the typical system, and redemption expressed the sum total of their hopes for the future, however faint they might be their conception of the nature of that redemption.

(3) Connection with sacrifice. It is also clear in the text and in the usage that sacrifice and ransom were closely related. Even in classical Gr, as we have noted, the two words were frequently connected, and it is not surprising to find it so in the O.T. Kopher, we have seen, is lit, "atonement" and comes from kopher, lit. "to cover," and hence by covering to make atonement, or to cover by making atonement: and so it is in the Patristic, the most common and technical Heb word for making atonement, or expiation, or propitiation, and is frequently rendered in the Gr by kathisma, even though very often by the compound word latura. In Ex 21:30, as we noted, is used interchangeably with pidyon, both being representative of the kopher, Ex 30:12, Lev 25:35 31.32; the Heb kopher is lutra in the Gr. In the latter place, where it is twice stated that no satisfaction was made for the life of a man, the Heb is kopher, LXX lutra, RV "ransom," AV "satisfaction." (4) Typical reference to the Messiah.—Sacrifice was thus linked with ransom. Sacrifice was the Divinely appointed covering for sin. The ransom for the deliverance of the sinner was to be by sacrifice. Both the typical testimony of the Law and the prophetic testimony gave prominence to the thought of redemption. The Coming One was to be a Redeemer. Redemption was to be the great work of the Messiah. The people seem to have looked for the redemption of the soul to God alone through their reminder of his appointed right, while redemption, in the more general sense of deliverance from all enemies and troubles, they linked with the advent of the Messiah. It required a spiritual vision to see that the two things would coincide, that Messiah would be the Redeemer in all phases and fullness by means of ransom, of sacrifice, of expiation.

Jesus appeared as the Messiah in whom all the old economy was to be fulfilled. He knew perfectly the meaning of the typical and prophetic testimony; he knew that fullness of life was to be obtained by ransom and expiation, but with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even that lamb which was taken for the Israelites in Ex 12:13. It is to be noted that Christ "through his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption." (Heb 9:12) The LXX (Rev 5:9) the song is, "Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe," etc.

He also regarded it as a sacrifice, an expiatory offering. The strong preposition used intensifies the idea of ransom and expiation, even to the point of substitution. It is antí, "instead of," and the idea of exchange, equivalence, substitution cannot be removed from this word. "Take the Levites instead of all the first-born," the LXX uses antí, which, like the Eng. "instead of," expressly represents the Heb tabath; and all three convey most unmistakably the idea of substitution. And as the Levites were to be substituted for the firstborn, so for the surplus of the firstborn the "ransom money" was to be substituted, that idea, however, being clearly enough indicated by the use of the genitive. Indeed the simpler way of describing a ransom was to be with the genitive, the ransom of many; or as our version renders, "a ransom for many," but just because the ransom here is not simply a money payment, but is the actual sacrifice of the life, the substitution of His soul for many, He is appropriately said to "give his soul a ransom instead of many." The Kingdom of God which Christ proclaimed was so diverse in character from that which Salome and her sons anticipated that, so far from appearing in dazzling splendor, with distinguished places of power for eager aspirants, it was to be a spiritual kingdom for redeemers. Men held captive by sin needed to be ransomed that they might be free to become subjects of the Kingdom, and so the ransom work, the sufferings and death of Christ, must lie at the very foundation of that Kingdom. The need of ransom supersedes life forfeited; the ransom paid secures life and liberty; the life which Christ gives comes through His ransoming death.

Besides the passages in the Pentateuch which we have noted, special mention should be made of the two great passages which bear so closely upon the need of spiritual redemption, Ps 49 78, "None of them can by any means redeem [pádhāh; lutraō] his brother, nor give to God a ransom [kopher; exōlasso] for him (for the redemption of their life is costly, and it faileth for ever)." (The Heb gives pidyon for "redemption," the Gr LXX give lutra for the price of redemption, the Eng "ransom." No human power or skill, no forfeit in money or service or life can avail to ransom any soul from the doom entailed by sin. But in the same ps (ver 15) the triumphant hope is expressed that God will redeem [pádhāh; lutraō] my soul from the power of Sheol." In Job 33 24, "Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom: God is the speaker, and whatever may be the particular exegesis of the passage in its original application, it surely contains an anticipation of the gospel redemption. This Divine eureka is explained in the light of Christ's utterance; it finds its realization through the cross: "I have found a ransom," for "the Son of Man" has given "his soul a ransom for many." This great utterance of the Saviour may well be considered as the germ of all the apostolic teaching concerning redemption, but it is

4. Apostolic not for us to show its unfolding beyond Teaching noting that in apostolic thought the "ransom" was always connected with the death, the sacrifice of Christ.

Thus Paul (Eph 1 7), "In whom we have our redemption through his blood." Thus Peter (1 Pet 1 1819), "Ye were redeemed not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, but with precious blood, of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even that Lamb that taketh away the sin of the world."

To make it most clear that Christ "through his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption." (Heb 9:12) The LXX (Rev 5:9) the song is, "Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe," etc.
In all but the last of these passages there is an echo of the very word used by Christ, ἀπολύσις and λατρεία, both being connected with λατρεύω. In 1 Tim 2.5 Paul has a still closer verbal coincidence when he says, "Christ gave himself as a ransom for all" (τυλίγματος). The word used in the Apocalypse is συρρήσσω, to buy in the open market, and is frequently used of the redeeming work in the OT (Gen 24 2, Deut 20 17). In the two places where Paul uses it he adds the means of purchase: "To were bought with a price," which view would be equivalent to ransom. In the passage in Gal 3 13, 4 Paul uses the compound γενεαλογία, which is occasionally rendered "to redeem, buy off, deliver by paying the price."

The question "Who receives the ransom?" is not directly raised in Scripture, but it is one that not unnaturally occurs to the mind, and theologians have answered it in various ways.

5. To Whom was the Ransom given (1) Not to Satan.—The idea entertained by some of the Fathers (Irenaeus, Orijen) that the ransom was given to Satan, who is conceived of as having through the sin of man a righteous claim upon him, which Christ recognizes and meets, is grotesque, and not in any way countenanced by Scripture.

(2) To Divine justice.—But in repudiating it, there is no need to go so far as to deny that there is a "righteous claim to a real redeeming transaction. All that we have said goes to show that, in no mere figure of speech, but in tremendous reality, Christ gave "his life a ransom," and if our mind demands an answer to the question to whom the ransom was given, it does not seem improbable that we are able to think of the justice of God, or God in His character of Moral Governor, as requiring and receiving it. In all that Scripture asserts about propitiation, sacrifice, reconciliation in relation to the work of Christ, it is implied that there is wrath to be averted, some wrong to be appeased, or satisfied, and while it may be enough simply to think of the effects of Christ's redeeming work in setting us free from the penal claims of the Law—the just doom of sin—it does not seem going beyond the spirit of Scripture to draw the logical inference that the ransom price was paid to the Guardian of that holy law, the Administrator of eternal justice. "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us" (Gal 3 13). This essential, fundamental phase of redemption is the faith of theologians, with good Scriptural warrant, have called redemption by blood, or by price, as distinguished from the practical outcome of the work of Christ in the life which is redemption by power.

6. Redemption by price: As to Satan's claim, Christ by paying the ransom price, having secured the right to redeem, exercises His power on behalf of the believing sinner. He does not recognize the right of Satan. He is the "strong man" holding his captives lawfully, and Christ the "stronger than he" overcomes him and spoils him, and sets his captives free (Lk 11 19-22). In one sense men may be said to have sold themselves to Satan, but they had no right to sell, nor he to buy, and Christ ignores that transaction and brings "to nothing him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb 2 14), and so able to "deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb 2 15).

(b) Redemption by power: Many of the OT passages about the redemption wrought on behalf of God's people illustrate this redemption by power, and the redemption by power is always founded on the redemption by price; the release follows the ransom. In the case of Israel, there was first the redemption by the sprinkling, and then the blood of the Paschal Lamb which sheltered from the destroying angel (Ex 12)—and then followed the redemption by power, when by strength of hand Jeh brought His people out from Egypt (Ex 13 14), and in His mercy led forth the people which He had redeemed (Ex 15 13).

So under the gospel when "he hath visited and wrought redemption for his people" (Lk 1 68), He can "grant unto us at being delivered out of the hand of our enemies should serve him without fear" (Lk 1 74). It is because we have in Him our redemption through His blood that we can be delivered out of the power of darkness (Col 1 13, 14). See further, REDEEMER, REDEMPTION.

RAPE, rāp. See Crimes; Punishments.

. RAPHA, RAPHAH, rā'fa (N.7, rāphāh):
(1) In RvM these names are substituted for "the giant" in 1 Ch 20 46-8 and in 2 S 21 16.15.20.22. The latter passage states that the son of Angel, "Raphah, Rapha, Raphael" was one of the seven. The Raphah who was slain by David's warriors had been born to the rāphāh in Gath. The text is corrupt; Raphah is probably an eponym. Originally the name of one of the Philis who was of the body of Repha'ah's stood in the text. The plural of this word, or at least a plural of this stem, is Re'phaim (q.v.).

(2) Rapha (AV "Rapha"), a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 37). See REPHEH.

Raphael, rā'f-thāl, rāf-ō-thāl (N.7, rāphā, from rāphā, 'āl, "God has healed," "Rapha, Raphael"): The name of the angel who, as Azarias, guides Tobias to Ecbatan and Rages (q.v.). The purpose of his mission is, in accordance with his name, to cure Tobit of blindness, and to deliver Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, from the power of the evil spirit Azmodanu (Tob 3 8; 12 15). Later, in addition, when he reveals himself (12 15), he declares that he is "one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints, and go in before the glory of the Holy One." These seven angels are derived, according to J. Kolbrin, from the seven Am-shapans (Amesha-spentas) of Zoroastrianism (cf Rev 4 5). At the head of the elaborate angelology of the Enoch books there are "four presences," and Raphael is one of them (En 40 9; 54 6). In the first of these passages Raphael is the healer; in the second, he with Michael, Gabriel and Phanuel lead the wicked away to punishment. These four presences seem related to the four "living creatures" of Ezek (1 5) and of the Apocalypse (4 6). While Raphael is the general representation of Raphael's position in En, in 20 3 he is named among the angels who "watch," whose number according to the Gr text is seven. Raphael shared in the function assigned to the archangels, in the Oracula Sibyllina, of leading souls to the judgment seat of God (II, 215, Alexandre's text). He occupies a prominent place in Jewish medieaval writings; he with Michael and Gabriel cured Abraham (Yoma 37a); according to the book Zabur, Raphael conveyed to Abraham a book containing 72 kinds of wisdom in 670 writings. The painters of the Renaissance frequently depicted Raphael. J. E. H. THOMSON Raphaim, ra'ph-ā-im, ra-fā-ā-im (B omits; N and A have Rāphā'ēn, Rhapha'ēn: An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).

Raphon, ra-fōn (Rāphā'ēn, Rhapha'ēn): The place where in his campaign E. of Jordan Judas Indicd disarrayed and defeated on the heights of Tmeothoas, the fugitives fleeing for refuge to the temple at Car- naim (1 Macc 5 37ff; Anti, XII, viii, 4). The same place is doubtless referred to by Pliny as "Raphana" (NH, v 16). It may possibly be represented by the modern رفاه, on the E. of the pilgrimage road, about 17 miles N. of Der'āb, and 11 miles N.E. of Tell el-'Ash'ary. It is a mile and a half N. of Wady Kanawat, which would thus be the "brook" mentioned in the narrative. It is perhaps far enough away from Carnaim, if this is rightly placed at Tell el-'Ash'ary.

W. Ewino

RAPHU, ῥᾰ́φῳ (ῥᾶφω, ῥάφω, "one healed"): The father of Palti, the spy selected from the tribe of Benjamin (Nu 13 9).

RASSES, ῥάσσες (Ῥάσσες, Rhodeses, A B, Ράσσες, Ράσσες; Vulg Tharsis; Old Lat Thrasus et Rassus): The children of Rasses are mentioned with Put, Lud and the children of Ishmael as having been subdued by Holofernes ( judges 2 23).

Their identity is a matter of conjecture only. Some think Vulg Tharsis (= Taras) is meant, others Ross (Ezk 38 23; 39 1), others Rhodes, a mountain range and city s. from Anmous, on the Gulf of Issus. Most probably a district, not a town, is named, situated in the eastern part of Asia Minor.

S. F. Hunter

RATHUMUS, ῥαθύμος (Ῥαθύμος, Rhathumos): One of those who joined in writing a letter to protest to Artaxerxes against the Jews (1 Esd 2 16 ff). In 2 17 he is styled "story-writer," RVm "recorder." (ὅ τα προσπίπτοντα σε, γραφόν, ὅ τα προσπίπτοντα [graphtin]) = "Bring the chancellor" of Esr 4 8. Rathumus being a Gr form of Beelzebub. In 1 Esd 2 16 his title appears as an independent proper name, Beelzebubus (q.v.) (here AVm gives "Babhumus," a misprint), and in 2 25 R. and Beelzebubus are given as distinct persons.

RAVEN, ῥάβν (ῥάβν, ῥαβῆ; κόρα, κόρα; Lat Corvus corax): A large family of the smaller birds of prey belonging to the genus Corvus corax. A bird of such universal distribution that it is known as any bird. It is noisy, with a loud, rough, emphatic cry, and its young are clamorous at feeding time.

Aristotle wrote that ravens drove their young from their location and forced them to care for themselves at an early age. In the time of Moses, and even in our day, ravens and jays are seen flying over the graves of men, as well as of the more recent dead. It is the favorite bird of many graves. The birds are gregarious, and are often seen in flocks of a dozen or more. Their nests are placed in trees, and are usually in holes in the branches. The eggs are from three to five in number, and are laid in May and June. The birds are said to be very fond of carrion, and are often seen feeding on dead bodies.

Pal has at least 8 different species of ravens. This bird was the first sent out by Noah in an effort to discover if the flood were abating (Gen 8 6-8). Because it partially fed on carrion it was included among the abominations (Lev 11 15; Dt 14 14). On 1 K 17 4-6, see Eliah and the present writer’s Birds of the Bible, 401-5. Among the marvels of creation and providence in Job 38 41, we have this mention of the raven,

"Who provideth for the raven his prey, When his young ones are every one heaped up in his mouth?"

The answer to this question is in Ps 147 9:

"He giveth to the beast his food, And to the young ravens which cry.

Both these quotations point out the fact that the young are peculiarly noisy. In Prov 30 17 it is indicated that the ravens, as well as eagles, vultures and hawks, found the eye of prey the vulnerable point, and so attacked it first. The Heb 'őреб means "black," and for this reason was applied to the raven, so the reference to the locks of the bride-groom in the Song of Solomon becomes clear (Cant 5 11). The raven is one of the birds indicated to prey upon the ruins of Edom (Isa 34 11). The last reference is found in Lk 12 24: "Consider the ravens, that they sow not, neither reap; which have no store-chamber nor barn; and God feedeth them. This could have been said of any wild bird with equal truth.

Gene Stratton-Porter

RAVEN, ῥαβν (ῥαβν), RAVIN, rayin: "Raven" (vb.) is from "rapine," "violent plundering," used for ῥαβάν, ῥαβαν, in Gen 49 27; Ps 22 13; Ezk 22 52, while "ravin" (noun) is the object ravened, in Nah 2 12 the two terms carcases (ῥαβανὶ, ῥαβανὸν). So a "ravenous bird" (Isa 46 11; Ezek 39 4) is a bird of prey (not a "hungry bird"), ῥαβὰν, "eagle," lit. "a screecher," "Ravenous beast" in Isa 39 5 is for ῥαβὰν, πάρκε, "violent one." In the NT ῥαβανεῖς, ῥαβανας, "rapacious," is tr" "ravening" in Mt 7 15, while for the cognate ῥαβανεῖς, ῥαβανας (Lk 11 39), AV gives "ravener," RV "extortioner.

RAZIS, ῥαζῖς (Ῥαζίς, Rhazes): "An elder of Jews," "lover of his countrystem," and for his good will toward them called "father of the Jews," accused before the Syrian general Nicanor an opponent of Hellenism. In order to escape falling into the hands of Nicanor's soldiers he committed suicide with the greatest determination in a rather revolting manner (Macc 14 37 ff), in his death calling upon "the Lord of life" in the hope of a resurrection. His suicide—contrary to Jewish sentiment—was regarded with approval by the author of 2 Macc 14 42-43.

RAZOR, ῥαζόρ (ῥαζόρ, ῥαζόρ, "knife") [Nu 6 5; Ps 62 2; Isa 7 20; Ezek 5 11, ῥαζόρ, mordh, "razor"] [Jgs 13 5; 15 17; 1 Sam 1 11]. See Barber; Hair.
READING, rēʾḏing (שְׁלָלֵי, mikraʾ; καταθλιπτικά, anagôngia): As a noun occurs once in the OT (Ne 8 8) and 3 in the NT (Acts 13 15; 2 Cor 3 14; 1 Tim 4 13), each time with reference to the public reading of the Divine Law. The vb., “to read” (שְׁלָל, קָדָר; καταθλιπτικος, anagôngos) occurs frequently both in the OT and in the NT: (1) often in the sense of reading aloud to others, esp. of the public reading of God’s Law or of prophecy, as by Moses (Ex 24 7), Ezra (Neh 8 3,18), Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4 16), of the regular reading of the Law and the Prophets in the synagogues (Acts 21 27, 16 21), and of the reading of apostolic ep. in the Christian church (Col 4 16; 1 Thess 5 27); (2) also in the sense of reading to one’s self, whether the Divine word in Law or prophecy (Dt 17 19; Acts 8 28-30, etc.), or such things as private letters (2 K 5 7; 19 14; Acts 23 34, etc.).

READY, rēʾḏ (אָבִא, māḥir): Occurs twice in the sense of apt, skilful (Ezr 7 6; Ps 45 1). RV gives “ready” for “fit” (Job 24 27), for “asketh” (Mic 7 13), for “prepared” (Mt 14 13), for “not negligent” (2 Pet 1 12).

REALIAH, rēʾi-ʾya, rēʾ-ʾi. (ריָיָה), rʾapāḥ, “Jeh has seen”, LXX B, Pašē, Ḳadd, A, Ḳad, Rheid); also a tribe of the Calebite family (1 Ch 4 2). The word “Realiah” should probably be substituted for “Haroeh” in 1 Ch 2 52, but both forms may be corruptions.

(2) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 5, AV “Rezaia”). See Josh.

(3) The family name of a company of Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 50=1 Esd 5 31).

REAPING, rēʾ-ing (שְׁלָל, קָדָר; πείδιαμα, theriaν): Reaping in ancient times, as at present, consisted in either pulling up the grain by the roots or cutting it with a sickle (see Sickle), and then binding the stalks into bundles to be carried to the threshing-floor. If the Egypt sculptures are true to life, reaping was sometimes divided into two operations, the heads of grain and the stalks being reaped separately. In Pal and Syria both pulling and cutting are still practised, the former when the ground is stony and the sparce scarce. Even where the sickle is used, much of the grain comes up by the roots, owing to the toughness of the dry stalks or the dulness of the sickle. The reaper sometimes wears pieces of cane on the fingers of the hand which gathers the grain in order to protect them from injury by the sharp grasses or the sickle. There were definite laws established by the Hebrews in regard to reaping. (Lev 19 9; 23 10; 25 5; 11;Dt 16 9). Samuel mentions the task of reaping the harvest as one of the requirements which would be made by the king for whom the people were clamoring (1 S 9 12).

Figurative: The certainty of the consequences of good and evil doing were often typified by the sowing and the reaping of harvests (Job 4 8; Prov 22 8; Hos 8 7; 10 12-13; 2 Cor 9 6; Gal 6 7,8). “They that sow in tears shall reap in joy” is found in the liberated captives’ song (Ps 126 6). “He that regardeth the clouds shall not reap,” i.e. a lack of faith in God’s care will be punished (Ecle 11 4); cf also the lesson of trust drawn from the birds (Mt 6 26; Lk 12 24). Sowing and not reaping the harvest is mentioned as a punishment for disobedience (Job 31 8; Jer 12 13; Mal 3 11). Reaping where he sowed not, showed the injustice of the landlord (Mt 25 26), as did also the withholding of the reapers’ wages (Jas 5 4). In God’s Kingdom there is a division of labor: “He that soweth to his own self shall reap to his own self” (Dn 4 36-38). In John’s vision he saw an angel reap the earth (Rev 14 15.16). See Agriculture; Gleaning.

REARWARD, rēʾ word (תַּחְנִית, ἀναφά, “to gather.” Nu 10 25; Josh 6 9 (AV ‘gathering host’); Isa 52 12). See Army; Dan, Tribe of; War, 3.

REASON, rēʾ-ʾn, REASONABLE, rēʾ-ta-n-bʾ, REASONING, rēʾ-ʾn-ing (raison, יָקָקִים, etc); καγών, ambros, Beor, (τέκνα, πείδια, συμφωνία), “Reason,” with related terms, has a diversity of meanings, representing a large number of Heb and Gr words and phrases. In the sense of “cause” or “occasion” it stands in 1 K 9 15 for dibbâr, “a word” (Rv “answer”); but in other cases renders prepositional forms as “from,” “with,” “because of,” “for the sake of,” etc. As the ground or argument for anything, it is the ταʾαι (Pro 26 16, Rv “answers discreetly”), of γάγκα, as in Isa 1 18, “Come now, and let us reason together” (cf Job 13 3; 15 3); in 1 S 12 7, the word is šāḥâk, RV “that I may plead,” etc. The principal Gr words for “reason,” “reasoning,” are those given above. The Christian believer is ready to give a reason (λογος) for the hope that is in him (1 Pet 3 15 AV). “Reason” as a human faculty or in the abstract sense appears in Apoc in Wad 17 12 (logismos); Ecles 37 16, “Let reason [logos] go before every enterprise,” RV “be the beginning of every work.” In Acts 15 14, “reason would” is lit. kad ἀλογον, “according to reason”; in Rom 12 1, for “reasonable [logikos] service,” RV has “spiritual,” and in m “Gr belonging to the reason.”’” In RV “reason, etc., occurs much oftener than in AV (cf Lev 17 11; Job 28 47; Jgs 5 22; Job 20 23; 27 3; etc; Lk 3 15; 12 17; Acts 17 17, etc).

REBA, rēʾba (רֶבֶה, rebha, “fourth part”; LXX B, ḲoBe, Ṭhbe, A, ṬqBe, Ṭhbeok, Ṭhbeok): One of the five chieftains of Midian who were slain by the Israelites, under Moses (Nu 31 8; Josh 13 21). Like his comrades, he is termed a “king” in Nu, but a “chief” or “prince” in Josh.

REBEKAH, rēʾbak (רֵבְכָּה), rēḥbakh; LXX and NT Ῥῆβεκκα, Ῥῆβεκκα, Ῥῆβεκ (the usual Eng. spelling Rebecca): Daughter of Bethuel and an unknown mother, granddaughter of Nahor and Milcah, sister of Laban, wic of Isaac, mother of Esau and Jacob.

Her name is usually explained from the Arab, ’rēʾbak, “a tie-rope for animals,” or, rather, “a noose” in such a rope; its application would then by figure suggest the beauty of (r) that beareth it, by means of which men are snared or bound. The root is found in Heb only in the noun meaning “hitching-place” or “stall,” in the “familiar paraphrased calf.” The nom. pl. “calf” is used in view of the meaning of such names as Rachel and Eglah the name Rebekah might well mean; “concrete (for abstract, like ἀγών, ἀγωνία, ἐρήμια, etc), a “tied-up calf” (or “lamb”?), one therefore peculiarly choice and fat.

Rebekah is first mentioned in the genealogy of the descendants of Nahor, brother of Abraham (Gen 22 20–24). In fact, the family is there carried down just so far as is necessary in order to introduce this woman, for whose subsequent appearance and rôle the genealogy is obviously intended as a preparation. All this branch of the family of Terah had remained in Aram when Abraham and Lot had migrated to Canaan, and it is at Haran, "the city of God," that we first meet Rebekah, when in ch 24 she is made known to Abraham's servant at the well before the gate.

That idyllic narrative of the finding of a bride for Isaac is too familiar to need theatrical and too simple to require comment. Besides, the substance and outline of the whole of Rebekah's career is treated in connection with the sketches of the other actors in the same scenes. Yet we note from the beginning the maiden's decision of character, which appears in every line of the narrative, and prepares the reader to find in subsequent chapters the positive, ambitious and energetic woman that she there shows herself.

Though the object of her husband's love (Gen 24 67), Rebekah bore him no children for 20 years (Gen 25 20). But Sarah, too, was barren, and it was only after that score of years and after the special intercession of Isaac that God at length granted her twin sons. "The purpose of God according to election," as Paul expresses the matter in Rom 9 13; was the cause of that strange oracle to the wondering, inquiring parents, "The elder shall serve the younger" (Gen 25 23).

Whether because of this oracle or for some other reason, it was that younger son, Jacob, who became the object of his mother's special love (Gen 25 28). She it was who led him into the deception practised upon Isaac (Gen 27 5–17), and she it was who devised the plan for extorting Jacob from the dangerous situation into which that deception had brought him (vs 42–46). When the absence of Jacob from home became essential to his personal safety, Rebekah proposed her own relations in Aram as the goal of his journey, and gave as motive the desirability of Jacob's marrying from among her kindred. Probably she did not realize that in sending her favorite son away on this journey she was sending him away from her forever. Yet such seems to have been the case. Though younger than Isaac, who was still living at an advanced age when Jacob returned to Canaan a quarter of a century later, Rebekah, too, had died during this term. We learn definitely only this, that she was buried in the cave of Machpelah near Hebron (Gen 49 31).

Outside of Gen, Rebekah is alluded to in Scripture only in the passage from Rom (9 10–12) already cited. Her significance there is simply that of the wife of Isaac and the mother of two sons of such different character and destiny as Esau and Jacob. And her significance in Gen, apart from this, lies in her contribution to the family of Abraham of a pure strain from the native eastern stock, that transmitting to the founders of Israel both an unmixed lineage and that tradition of separateness from Can, and other non-Heb elements which has proved the greatest factor in the ethnological marvel of the ages, the persistence of the Heb people.

REBUKE, re-bük': As a vb. "rebuke" is in the OT the tr of ḫet, qoṭar and ʿēqāḥ; yeḥāḥ; another word, ṭūḥ, in Neh 5 7, is in RV tr "contended with." Rebuked, f., whose subsequent appearance, transmitting to the founders of Israel both an unmixed lineage and that tradition of separateness from Can, and other non-Heb elements which has proved the greatest factor in the ethnological marvel of the ages, the persistence of the Heb people.

R E C A H , rē'kah, rēkhāb; Rēkhāb; Rechab; AV Rechah: In 1 Ch 4 17 certain persons are described as "the men of Rechah," but there is absolutely no information either about the place or its position.

RECEIPT, rē-kēp't, of custom. See Custom.

RECEIVER, rē-sev'er: Found in AV (Isa 33 18); but RV substitutes "he that weighed the tribute." The Heb is šeḵēd, which means "one who weighs," a "weigher."

RECHAB, rē-kāb, RECHABITES, rek'ā-bits (רֵכָּב, רֵכְּבָּהָה, rek'ā-bīthim): Rechab is the name of two men of some prominence in the OT records:

(1) A Benjamite of the town of Beeroth, son of Rimmon (2 S 4 2); he and his brother Baanah were "captains" of the military host of Ish-bosheth. On the death of Abner (2 S 3 30) the two brothers treacherously entered Ish-bosheth's house, and at noon when he was resting and helpless, beheaded him, and escaped with the head to David at Hebron (4 6–8). They expected to receive reward and honor from David for the foul deed, which left him without a rival for the throne of all Israel. But the just and noble-minded king ordered their immediate execution (4 9–12), as in the case of the Amalekite, who asserted that he had killed Saul (2 S 1). For some reason the Beerothites left their own town and fled to Gittaim, another town in Benjamin, where they were still living when the Books of S were written (2 S 4 3).

(2) The more prominent of the men bearing this name was a Kenite (q.v.), a descendant of Hamath (1 Ch 1 40) and friend of the Kenite tribe who joined the Israelites during the wilderness wanderings (Nu 10 29–32; Jgs 1 10; 4 17), becoming identified with the tribe of Judah, although Heber and Jael his wife were settled in Northern Pal (Jgs 4 17). Rechab was the ancestor or founder of a family, or order, in Israel known as the Rechabites, who at various times were conspicuous in the religious life of the nation. The most notable member of this family was Jehonadab (2 K 10 15 f).25, who, having joined and lived with the people of the town of Ben-ha-acab, a zealous Jeh-worshipper and took part with Jehu in the extermination of Baal-worship and the house of Ahab. He set for his descendants a vow of asceticism: that they should drink no wine, nor plant fields or vineyards, nor build nor live in houses throughout their generations (Jer 35 6–7). That must have been a singular feature in Palestinian life: the simple, nomadic life of this family from generation to generation in the midst of settled agricultural and industrial conditions? They followed this simple life, not outward against the enervating tendencies of sensuality, and as a covenant of fidelity to Jeh, to whom they wholly devoted themselves when they joined themselves to Israel. Jeremiah used the Rechabites, who had been driven into Gazzah by Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of the land, as an object-lesson to covenant-breaking Judah. The Rechabites, hungry and thirsty, refused wine when it was set before them, because of the command of their ancestor Jonadab (Jer 35:8-10). The Rechabites also refused to heed Jeh's commands or to keep His covenant (vs 14-15).

If the Rechab of Neh 3:14 is the same as this Kenite, then his descendant Malchijah, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerus, may have abandoned the vow of his ancestors, for he was "ruler of the district of Beth-haccherem" (i.e. "house of the vineyard").

RECONCILE, rek'-on-sil. RECONCILIATION, rek-on-sil-i'-shun (καταλλασσων, katallassos, καταλλαγη, katallage), also the compound form ἀποκαταλλασσων, apokatallassos; once the cognate διαλλασσω, diallasso (katallaššai is used in Mt 5:24).

1. The Terms

(a) NT Usage. In the last case, Mt 5:24, the word is not used in a doctrinal sense, though its use is very helpful in considering the force of the other terms. All the other instances are in Paul's Ep. (Rom 5:10; 1 Cor 7:11; 2 Cor 5:18-20, the vb.; Rom 5:11; 11:15; 2 Cor 18:19, the noun; Eph 2:16; Col 1:23, the compound). The word "reconcile" has a double meaning and usage, and the context must in each case determine how it is to be taken. The great doctrine is the reconciliation of God and man, but the question to be decided is whether it is God who is reconciled to men, or men who are reconciled to God, and different schools of theology emphasize one side or the other. The true view embraces both aspects.

The word "to reconcile" means literally to exchange, to bring into a changed relationship. Some may mean that it is only the "nature of the one in the sinner that is intended, a laying aside of his enmity, and coming into peaceful relations with God. But that manifestly does not exhaust the meaning, nor is it in the great Pauline passages the primary and dominant meaning.

(b) The OT Usage does not materially help in the elucidation of the NT terms, for though the word occurs in a number of passages in AV, it is in RV generally changed to "atonement," which more accurately represents the Heb kaphar, which is generally rendered by "atonement," and by ἀφιλα-κτασσων or εὑρισκατασσων in the Gr. (In one passage of the NT [He 2:17], the phrase "to make reconciliation" represents the Gr kileskosmati, and is better rendered in RV by "to make propitiation"). The making atonement or propitiation is the basis of the reconciliation, the means of its accomplishment, and the fact that the translators of AV sometimes renders kaphar by "reconcile" shows that they understood reconciliation to have the Godward aspect. Whatever may be said of the nature of the atonement or propitiation in the old dispensation, it was something contemplated as appeasing or satisfying, or at least in some way affecting God so as to make Him willing, or render it possible for Him to enter into a changed relationship with men. In one passage in the OT where "reconciliation" occurs (2 Ch 29:21) it represents a different Heb word, but here RV has changed it into "sin-offering," which is in harmony with the general meaning and usage of the Heb.

2. Special passage in 3 S 29:24. There is yet another Heb word rendered "reconciliation" in 1 S 29:4, and inasmuch as this passage in the LXX has as the equivalent of the Heb the word διαλλασσειν, it is possible that this word is also being used in guiding to the NT meaning. On one occasion when the Philis gathered together to battle against Israel, David and his men had evidently of men accustomed to the use of the bow to the muster-place. "The princes of the Philis" did not at all like the presence of the present king, and although Achish testified in favor of David's fidelity, they were very indignant, and demanded that David and his men leave the tribe, "lest evil event befall thee and an adversary to us: for wherewith should this fellow reconcile himself into the Lord's hand unless it be with the heads of these men?" The Heb is רכשא, which means "to be pleased with" or "to accept favorably and the Hiphil form here used is made to mean pleasing or acceptable." "to reconcile himself." But assuredly the Philistines' idea of David reconciling himself to Saul was not that he should lay aside his enmity against Saul, and so become friends with him. The enmity was on Saul's side, and the thought of the princes was that David by turning against them in the battle would: gratify Saul, and lead him to lay aside his enmity against David.

3. Usage in the Apocrypha.—It may be noted that in 2 Macc 5:18 the διαλλασσειν is used to mean the Godward side: "And the place which was forsaken in the wrath of the mighty was, at the presence of the great Sovereign, restored again with all glory." The vb. occurs in 2 Macc 5:18 when again the Godward side seems intended, though not perhaps in accord with God . . . . hearken to your supplications, and be reconciled with you, and unto thee in 7:33: "If for rebuke and chastening our living Lord has been angered a little while, yet shall he again be reconciled with his own servants," and in 9:5: "Then he taught the men of the Lord to be wholly reconciled with his servants." In these two, esp. the last, it is unreasonably the laying aside of the Divine displeasure that is meant.

Before passing on to look at the great utterances in the Ep, we must now look at the passage so referred to at the beginning. There is, indeed, another non-doctrinal instance in 1 Macc 7:11, where the king parted from her husband is enjoined other than to be reconciled to her husband." But as it is indeterminate whether the wife or the husband was the offending party, and so which is the one to be influenced, the passage does not help us much. But Mt 5:24 is a very illuminating passage. Here as in the passage from 1 S, the word used is διαλλασσειν, but it is practically identified in meaning with katallassos. The injunction is given by Christ to the one who is at variance with his brother, not to complete his offering until first he has been reconciled to his brother. But the whole statement shows that it is not a question of the one who is offering the gift laying aside his enmity against his brother, but the remission of enmity. If therefore thou art offering thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thou hast a grudge against thy brother but that thy brother hath sought against thee, the brother was the offended one, he is the one to be brought round to leave there the offering and go thy way, first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Perhaps he should do something to remove his brother's displeasure and so bring about a reconciliation.

(1) Rom 5.—Turning now to Rom 5, how stands the matter? Paul has been speaking of the blessed results of justification; one of these 3. Doctrinal results is the shedding abroad of the love of God in the heart. Then he dwells upon the manifestation of that love in the death of Christ, a love that was displayed to the ungodly and sinner and unloveable. The sinful and unloving state we were embraced by the love of God, a fortiori that love will not be less now that it has already begun to take effect. If He loved us when we were under His condemnation sufficiently to give His Son to die for us, much more shall His love bestow upon us the blessings secured by that death. "Much more then, being now justified by his blood, shall we be saved from the wrath of God through him" (8:9). (a) The fact of Divine wrath: It is well to note, then, that there is a variance of opinion of God against sin and sinners. One of the key-thoughts of the apostle in this ep. is that "the wrath of God is reconciled from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men” (1:18), and the coming day of judgment is “the day of the righteous judgment of God” (5:2). And because of this stern fact, the gospel is a revelation not only of love, but specifically “a righteousness of God” (1:17). And he shows that the essence of the gospel is found in the propitiatory death of the Lord Jesus Christ (3:14-25:26), through whom alone can men who have been “brought under the judgment of God” (3:19) find justification, salvation, deliverance from the wrath of God (4:25; 5:1-6). Christ’s propitiation is not possible of itself, or to be thought of as having any unworthy or capricious element in it—it is the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin.

(b) Reconciliation, Godward, as well as manward: The apostle proceeds (ver 10): “For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved by his life.” Now if, as many maintain, it is only the reconciliation on the manward side that is meant, that the manifested love led to the sinner laying aside his enmity, it would entirely reverse the apostle’s argument. He is not arguing that if we have begun to love God we may reckon upon His doing so and for so, but that He has done so, we may expect Him to do more. The verse is parallel to the preceding, and the being reconciled is on the same plane as being justified; the being justified was God’s action, and so is the reconciling. Justification is the deliverance “from the wrath of God”; reconciliation takes effect upon enemies.

(c) The meaning of the word “enemies”: The word “enemies” is important. By those who take the manward aspect of reconciliation as the only one, it is held that the word must be taken actively—those who hate God. But the passive meaning, “hatred of God,” seems far preferable, and is indeed demanded by the context. Paul uses the vb. echrōi, “enemies,” in Rom 11:28, in antithesis to “beloved” of God, and that is the consistent sense here. The enemies are those who are the objects of the wrath of the previous verse. And when we were thus hated of God, the objects of His just displeasure on account of our sin, “we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son.” God laid aside His enmity, and in the propitiatory death of Christ showed Himself willing to receive us into His favor.

(d) The manward side: By this proposition, therefore, the barrier was removed, and God having assumed a gracious attitude toward the sinner, it is possible for the sinner now, influenced by His love, to come into a friendly relationship with God. And so in the second phrase, the two meanings, the Godward and the manward, may coalesce; being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life.” The reconciliation becomes mutual, for there is no kind of doubt that sinners are enemies to God in the active sense, and require to lay aside their hostility, and so be reconciled to Him. But the first step is with God, and the reconciliation which took place in the death of His Son could only be the Godward reconciliation, since at that time men were still uninfluenced by His love. But, perhaps, just because that first reconciliation is brought about through the Divine transaction, the phrase avoids saying “God is reconciled,” but uses the more indirect form of speech. The manward aspect is emphasized in the next verse, although the Godward is not lost sight of: “We also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ.” Or, there have been men who have now received the reconciliation” (6:11). It is therefore something that comes from God and does not proceed from man. God is the first mover; He makes the reconciliation as already indicated, and then the fruit of it is imputed. And he exhibits the fact that our receiving the reconciliation, or being brought into a state of reconciliation, follows the being reconciled of ver 10, shows that the other is Divine reconciliation as the basis of the human.

(2) # Cor 5:18-20—(a) The Godward aspect primary: In the same way the great passage in 2 Cor 5:18-20 cannot be understood apart from the conception that there is a reconciliation on the Divine side. There is unquestionably reference to the human side, but that the whole work of God is not to be thought of as having any unworthy or capricious element in it—it is the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin.

And because of this stern fact, the gospel is a revelation not only of love, but specifically “a righteousness of God” (1:17). And he shows that the essence of the gospel is found in the propitiatory death of the Lord Jesus Christ (3:14-25:26), through whom alone can men who have been “brought under the judgment of God” (3:19) find justification, salvation, deliverance from the wrath of God (4:25; 5:1-6). Christ’s propitiation is not possible of itself, or to be thought of as having any unworthy or capricious element in it—it is the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin.

(b) Reconciliation, Godward, as well as manward: The apostle proceeds (ver 10): “For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved by his life.” Now if, as many maintain, it is only the reconciliation on the manward side that is meant, that the manifested love led to the sinner laying aside his enmity, it would entirely reverse the apostle’s argument. He is not arguing that if we have begun to love God we may reckon upon His doing so and for so, but that He has done so, we may expect Him to do more. The verse is parallel to the preceding, and the being reconciled is on the same plane as being justified; the being justified was God’s action, and so is the reconciling. Justification is the deliverance “from the wrath of God”; reconciliation takes effect upon enemies.

(c) The meaning of the word “enemies”: The word “enemies” is important. By those who take the manward aspect of reconciliation as the only one, it is held that the word must be taken actively—those who hate God. (2) # Cor 5:18-20—(a) The Godward aspect primary: In the same way the great passage in 2 Cor 5:18-20 cannot be understood apart from the conception that there is a reconciliation on the Divine side. There is unquestionably reference to the human side, but that the whole work of God is not to be thought of as having any unworthy or capricious element in it—it is the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin.

And because of this stern fact, the gospel is a revelation not only of love, but specifically “a righteousness of God” (1:17). And he shows that the essence of the gospel is found in the propitiatory death of the Lord Jesus Christ (3:14-25:26), through whom alone can men who have been “brought under the judgment of God” (3:19) find justification, salvation, deliverance from the wrath of God (4:25; 5:1-6). Christ’s propitiation is not possible of itself, or to be thought of as having any unworthy or capricious element in it—it is the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin.
ennedy, there could now be no point in the exhortation, "Be reconciled to God." (3) Eph 2:16.—The two passages where the compound word occurs are in complete harmony with this interpretation. Eph 2:16: "And might reconcile them both [Jew and Gentile] in one body unto God through the cross, having slain the enmity thereby," is the outcome of Christ "making peace" (2:15), and the reconciling work is effected through the cross, reconciliation both Godward and manward, and, having made peace, it is possible for Christ to come and preach peace to them that are far off through the reconciling work of the cross has been accomplished. (4) Col 1:20-22. — So in Col 1:20, "And through him to reconcile all things unto himself, having made peace through the blood of his cross; through him, I say, whether things upon the earth, or things in the heavens." Here the thought of the apostle trembles away into infinity, and there seems a parallel to the thought of He 9:23, that according to the typical teaching even "the things in the heavens" in some way stood in need of cleansing. May it be that the work of Christ in some sense affected the angelic intelligence, making it possible for harmony to be restored between redeemed sinners and the perfect creation of God? In any case, the reconciling all things unto Himself is not the large cosmic creating or establishing of the Divine authority. Then comes the specific reference to the human side, "And you, being in time past alienated and enemies in your mind in your evil works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh through his death there, as in Rom, the two phases coalescing, God appearing gracious through the work of Christ, sinners coming into gracious relation with Him. "Having made peace through the blood of his cross," the ground of peace has been established. Christ has done something by His death which makes it possible to offer peace to men. God has laid aside His holy opposition to the sinner, and shows Himself willing to bring men into peace with Himself. He has found satisfaction in that great work of His Son, has been reconciled, and now calls upon men to be reconciled to Him—to receive the reconciliation. See Atonement; Propitiation; Wrath.

RECORD, rek'rord, rek'tord. (1) The Eng. word, where it occurs in the OT and the NT in the sense of testimony, is tr'ed in RV "witness." (Dt 30:19; 31:28; Jn 1:19; 3:13). (2) See Witness. But in Job 19:19 for AV "my record," RV "he that voucheth for me." (2) In Ez 4:15; 6:2 (dokhrdn, dikhrdn), and Est 6:1 (zikhrdn), the word denotes Pers state chronicles; of 1 Mace 14:23; 2 Mace 2:1.

RECODER, rek'ar dr. (Rek'tor, mazkdr; RVm "chronicler"). A high functionary in the court of the Jewish kings, part of whose duty seems to have been to chronicle the events of the reign, but who also occupied a position corresponding with that of the modern King's Printer, who printed S 8:16; 20:24; 1 Ch 15:15, etc. His high rank is shown by the fact that, with other officers, he represented Hezekiah in speaking with Rabshakeh (2 K 18:18), and, in the reign of Josiah, superintended the repairs of the temple (2 Ch 34:8).

RECOVER, rek'ar vdr. "Recover" has (1) the transitive meaning of "to retake" or "to regain" (anything); and (2) the intransitive sense of "to regain health" or "become well." In Jth 14:7 it means "restore to consciousness." In the former sense it is in the O T the tr' of עָנָֹל, náqóš, "to snatch away" (Jgs 1:16:26; 1 S 3:8:23; 1 Hs 2:9, RV "pluck away"); also of עִנָּל, šabbâh (Kal and Hiph. 1 S 30:19 AV; 2 S 8:3, etc), and of various other words in single instances. In 2 K 3:6:7.11, "to restore to health" is ᾗ, ἄφημ, In its intransitive sense "recovery" is chiefly the tr' of עֵנָל, ἄφημ, "to live," "revive" (2 K 1:2, etc; Isa 36:9.21). "Recovery" appears only twice in AV of the NT; Mt 16:18 (or καθὼς ἦν ἡ σήμερον) and 2 Tim 2:26 (from ἀναπαύν- RVm "Gr return to soberness"); but RV has "recovery" for "do well" in Jn 11:12 (σωθήσεαι; or Gr "be saved"). "Recovering" (of sight) (anabaphôs) occurs in Lk 4:18. W. L. WALKER

The Heb name ym-qâph has given rise to much controversy. ym is the general word for sea, and when standing alone may refer to the Mediterranean, the Dead Sea, the Red Sea, or the Sea of Galilee. In several places it des. the river Nile. It implies that the river Nile Ex 2:3.5. But as this word does not in itself mean red, and as that is not the color of the brusht, authorities are much divided as to the reason for this designation. Some have supposed that it was the red from the blood of the mountains on the western coast, others from the red color given to the waters of the Nile by the corals, red coral, or some species of seaweed. Others still, with considerable probability, suppose that the name originated in the red or copper color of the inhabitants of the Syene pestilential peninsula. But the name m-âqâph, though applied to the whole sea, was esp. used with reference to the northern part, which is alone mentioned in the Bible, and to the gulf of Suez (Nuqâph and akâkah) which border the Sinai peninsula, esp. the Gulf of Suez.

The Red Sea has a length of 1,350 miles and an extreme breadth of 205 miles. It is remarkable that while it has no rivers flowing into it and the evaporation from its surface is enormous, it is not much saltier than the ocean, from which it is inferred that there must be a constant influx of water from the Indian Ocean through the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. The sea contains more saline water beneath the surface. The deepest portion measures 1,200 fathoms. Owing to the lower land levels which prevailed in recent geological times, the Gulf of Suez formerly extended across the land which separates it from the Bitter Lakes, a distance of 15 or 20 miles, and was traversed by the Suez Canal, which encountered no elevation more than 30 ft. above tide. In early Until in recent times it was discovered that the Gulf of Suez formerly extended 30 miles northward to the site of the present Ismailia and the ancient Pithom, the scene of the Bible of, by miracle was placed at Suez, the present head of the Gulf. But there is at Suez a passage-way of such a nature that the east wind mentioned in Scripture (Ex 14:21) to have opened a passage-way sufficiently wide to have permitted the host to have crossed over in a single night. The bar leading from Suez across, which is now 23 ft. above tide, is formed by a fixed sandbar at the entrance of the Gulf of Suez. If the wind at Suez had been such as to have furnished a passage-way as Robinson supposed (BR. 1, 56–59). Besides, if the children of Israel were S. of the Bitter Lakes when there was no extension of the Gulf N. of its present limits, with scowls, and the top of simple clay without open staddle to hold the brick together (see Naville, 'The Store-City Pithom and the Route of the Exodus,' Egg Exploration Fund, 1885; M. G. Kyle, 'A Re-examination of Naville's Works,' Records of the Past, VIII, 1901, 904–7). The next day's journey brought them to Taposiris Magna at the head of the Fresh Water Canal leading from the Nile to the Bitter Lakes. One day's journey from Taposiris Magna to the Nile enters the Nile at Apollinopolis Magna, at the site of the ancient Taposiris Magna. But then through the discoveries of Naville in 1885 this has been identified as Pithom, one of the store-cities built by Pharaoh Rameses IV, which supplied the stores for the expedition against Egypt (Ex 1 11). Here Naville uncovered vast store pits for the holding grain and querns, as was in the ancient times used for a canal, which has recently been opened to furnish fresh water to Suez, and the depression is followed by the railroad. According to Dawson, large surfaces of the desert N. of Suez, which are now above sea-level, contain buried in the sand "recent marine shells in such a state of preservation that not many centuries may have elapsed since they were in the bottom of the sea" (Egypt and Saria, 67). The Red Sea is connected with the children of Israel chiefly through the crossing of it recorded in Ex (see 4, below); but there are a few references to it in later times. Solomon is said (1 K 9 20) to have built a navy and store of ships beside Ezion-geber, which may be the same as Etham on the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom. This is at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, the eastern branch of the Red Sea. Here his ships were manned by Hiram king of Tyre with 'shipsmen that had knowledge of the sea' (ver 27). And (ver 25) they came to Etham, and fetched from thence gold. But Etham was evidently lost to Israel when Edom successfully revolted in the time of Joram (2 K 8 20). For a short time, however, it was restored to Judah by Amaziah (2 K 14 22); but the use of his foreign Syræa, Syrian or more probably, according to another reading, the Edomites, recovered the place and permanently drove the Jews away. But in 1 K 22 48 Jehoshaphat is said to have made ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir for gold; and also "he made ships of Ezion-gaber"; while in 2 Ch 20 36 Jehoshaphat is said to have joined with Ahasiah to make ships to go to Tarshish; and they made the ships in Ezion-gaber.

Unless there is some textual confusion here, "ships of Tarshish" probably means either a ship going to Tarshish or an annual return from Tarshish with its cargoes, as the scene is like the "East Indianam," and Tarshish in Ch. 2 Ch. may refer to some place in the East Indies. The probability is that went to Tarshish once every 3 years came "bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks, that could hardly be found other place than India. See Ships and Boats, II. 1 (2).
called Thane K. of Lake Timah, where there is a shrine at the present day, visited every year about July 14 by thousands of pilgrims to celebrate a religious festival; its sacredness existing on this account was so strong that it was impossible to connect it with any sanctuary of the Canaanites. Dawson favors the general location which we have assigned to Pishonoth, but would place it beside the narrow southern portion of the Bitter Lakes.

Somewhere in this vicinity would be a most natural place for the children of Israel to halt, and there is no difficulty, such as Naville supposes, to their passing between Jebel Geneefeh and the Bitter Lakes. No attempt has been made to determine exactly how near they were to the lake, but leaves ample space for the passage of a caravan, while the mountain on one side and the lake on the other would protect them from a flank movement by Pharaoh and limit his army to harassing the rear of the Israelitish host. Protected thus, the Israelites found a wide plain over which they could spread their camp, and if we suppose them to be as far S. as Chelooft, every condition would be found to suit the narrative which follows. Moses was told by the Lord that in no cold season of the children of Israel could cross over on dry ground. And, in compliance with the Divine command, Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, "Jehovah hardened the heart of Pharaoh that he would pursue them in the sea, through the daytime, and all the night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand. And the Egyptians pursued, and went in after them into the midst of the sea, all Pharaoh's horses, his chariots, and his horsemen" (Ex 14:21-30). But when the children of Israel were solely on the other side the wind returned and overwhelmed the entire host of Pharaoh. In the Song of Moses which follows, describing the event, it is said that the waters were piled up by the "blast of thy [God's] nostrils" (Ex 15:8), and again, ver 10, "Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them." Thus 34 the wind is mentioned as the means employed by God in opening the water. The competency of the wind temporarily to remove the water from the passage connecting the Gulf of Suez with the Bitter Lakes is given the trial deep and amply proved by facts of recent observation. Major General Tulloch of the British army (Proc. Victoria Inst., XXVIII, 267-80) reports having witnessed the driving off of the water from Lake Manzaleh by the wind to such an extent as to lower the level 6 ft., thus leaving small vessels over the shallow water stranded for a while in the muddy bottom. According to the report of the Suez Canal Co., the difference between the highest and the lowest water at Suez is 10 ft., 7 in., all of which must be due to the effect of the wind, since the tides do not affect the Red Sea. The power of the wind to affect water levels is strikingly witnessed upon Lake Erie in the United States, where according to the report of the Deep Waterways Commission for 1896 (165, 168) it appears that strong wind from the S.W. sometimes lowers the water at Toledo, Ohio, on the western end of the lake to the extent of more than 7 ft., at the same time causing it to rise at Buffalo at the eastern end a similar amount, while place themselves in the wind during passage this single storm reverses the effect, thus sometimes producing a change of level at either end of the lake of 14 ft., in the course of a single day. It would require far less than a tornado to lower the water at Suez more than 6 ft., which we have supposed at that time to separate Egypt from the Sinaitic Peninsula. See Exodus, The.

Several objections to this theory, however, have been urged which should not pass without notice. (1) Some have said that the children of Israel would have found an insuperable obstacle to their advance in the steep banks on either side of the supposed channel. But there were no steep banks to be encountered. A gentle slope to the center of the depression and a correspondingly gentle rise leads up on the other. (2) Much has also been made of the statement (Ex 14:22) that "the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left," but we consider the metaphorical use of this word "wall" it presents no difficulty. In Prov 18:11 we are told that, "The rich man's wealth is his strong city, And as a high wall in his own imagination." In Isa 26:1 we are told that God will appoint salvation "for walls and bulwarks." Again Nahum (3:8) says of Egypt that her "rampart was the sea in "[the Nile]", and her wall was of the sea." The water upon either side of the opening served the purpose of a wall for protection. There was no other chance for the Israelites to go forward, the sea would be divided and the children of Israel could cross over on dry ground. And when, in compliance with the Divine command, Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, "Jehovah hardened the heart of Pharaoh that he would pursue them in the sea, through the daytime, and all the night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand. SERMON ON REDEMPTION

1. Gradual Moralizing of Idea of Redemption
2. Redemption as Life in Individual
3. Redemption as Social Process
4. Moral Implications in Scriptural Idea of Redeemer
5. Preparations of Son of God as Redeemer

The idea of redemption in the OT takes its start from the thought of property (Lev 25:26; Ruth 4:4-7). Money is paid according to law to buy back something which must be delivered or rescued (Nu 3:1; Neh 5:8). From this start the word "redemption" throughout the OT is used in the general sense of deliverance. God is the Redeemer of Israel in the sense that He is the Deliverer of Israel (Dt 9:26; 2 Kgs 23:1; 1 Ch 11:21; Is 62:5). The idea of redemption includes deliverance from all forms of evil lot, from national misfortune (Isa 52:9; 63:9; cf Lk 2:38), or from plague (Ps 78:35.52), or from calamity of any sort (Gen 48:16; Nu 25:4.9). Of course, the general thought of the relation of Israel to God was that God had both a claim upon Israel (Dt 15:15) and an obligation toward Israel (1 Ch 17:21; Ps 25:22). Israel belonged to Him, and it was by His own right that He could move into the life of Israel so as to redeem Israel. On the other hand, obligation was upon Him to redeem Israel.

In the NT the idea of redemption has more of a suggestion of ransom. Men are held under the curse of the law (Gal 3:15), or of sin itself (Rom 7:24). The Redeemer purchases their deliverance by offering Himself as payment for their redemption (Eph 1:7; 1 Pet 1:18).

Throughout both the OT and the NT there is to be observed a gradual moralizing of the meaning of redemption. The process of redemption has continued throughout all the Christian ages. Starting with the idea of redemption price, conceived almost in material terms, religious thought has advanced to conceptions entirely spiritual. Through the same process of spiritualization, the idea of redemption becomes more specific with the progress of Christian revelation. In the beginning God is the Redeemer from distresses of all kinds. He redeems from calamity and from sorrows. This general idea, of course, persists throughout the revelation and enters largely into our thinking of today, but the growing moral discernment of the Bib. writers comes to attach more and more importance to sin as the chief disturber of man's welfare. We would not minimize the force of the Scriptural idea that God is the Deliverer from all misfortune to which man falls heir, but the Scriptural emphasis moves more and more to deliverance from sin. Paul states this deliverance as a deliverance from moral corruption and spiritual depression, but we must not conceive his idea in any artificial fashion. He would have men delivered not only from the law, but also from the consequences of evil doing and from the spirit of evil itself (Rom 8:2).

In trying to discern the meaning of redemption from sin, toward which the entire progress of Bib. and Christian thought points, we may be well keep in mind the Master's word as Life. It was the one human experience, life and might have it more abundantly (Jn 10:10). The word "life" seems to be the final NT word as a statement of the purpose of Christ. God sent His Son to bring men "life." The word of life is indefinite. Life means more at one period of the world's history than at another. It has the advantage, nevertheless, of always being entirely intelligible in its essential significance. Our aim must be to keep this essential significance in mind and at the same time to provide for an increasing fullness and enlargement of human capacity and enlargement. The aim of redemption can only be to bring men to the fullest use and enjoyment of their powers. This is really the conception implicit even in the earliest statements of redemption. The man redeemed by money payment comes out of the prison to the light of day, or he comes out of slavery into freedom, or he is restored to his home and friends. The man under the law is redeemed from the burden and curse of the law. Paul speaks of his experience under the law as the experience of one chained to a dead body (Rom 7:24). Of course, the examples set by men's thoughts were a mine of life this is the highest gift of redemption, so essential that the life cannot progress in any of its normal activities until it is redeemed from evil. Accordingly in the Scriptural thought all manner of blessings follow deliverance. The man who seeks first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness finds all other things added unto him (Mt 6:33). Material, intellectual and social blessings follow as matters of course from the redemption of the inner spirit from evil. The aim of redemption, to hearken in men's hearts the will to do right, once the life, leads men to seek successfully all possible avenues for life. This, of course, does not mean that the redeemed life gives itself up to the cultivation of itself toward higher excellencies. It means that the redeemed life is a new form of selflessness. In the unselfish seeking of life for others the redeemed life finds its own greatest achievement and happiness (Mt 16:25).
Just as the idea of redemption concerned itself chiefly with the inner spirit, so also it concerns itself with the individual as the object of

3. Redemption. But as the redemption of the individual leads to large social transformations. It is impossible to strike out of the Scriptures the idea of a redeemed humanity. But humanity is not conceived of in general or class terms. The object of redemption is not humanity, or a class, or the masses. The object of redemption is rather men set in relation to each other as members of a family. But it would do violence to the Scriptural conception to conceive of the individual's relations in any narrow or restricted fashion (1 Cor 12-12-27).

An important enlargement of the idea of redemption in our own time has come as men have conceived of the redemption of individuals in their social relationships. Very often men have thought of redemption as a snatching of individuals from the perils of a world in itself absolutely wicked. Even the material environment of men has at times been regarded as containing something inherently evil. The thought of redemption which seems most in line with the Scriptural idea would seem to be that which brings the material and social forces within reach of individual wills. Paul speaks of the whole creation groaning and travailing in pain waiting for the revelation of the sons of God (Rom 8:22). This graphic figure sets before us the essentially Christian conception of the redemption of the forces in the midst of which men are placed. Those redeemed for the largest life, by the very force of their life, will seize all powers of the process of redemption for Divine purposes. The see a great multitude which no man could number, of every kindred and nation and tongue, shouting the joys of salvation (Rev 7:9), yet the implication nowhere appears that these were redeemed in any other fashion than by surrendering themselves to the forces of righteousness.

We have said that the aim of redemption is to bring men to the largest and fullest life. We have also said that "life" is a general term. We need clear conceptions of the aim of redemption if we are to make men like Christ (Rom 8:9). Otherwise, it might be possible to use the word "life" so as to imply that the life consist of or is somehow other than what we mean by redemption. The idea of redemption, as a matter of fact, has been thus interpreted in various times in the history of Christian thinking. Life has been looked upon as sheer quantitative existence—the lower pleasures of sense being reckoned as about on the same plane with the higher. We can see the moral and spiritual anarchy which would thus be brought about. In Christ's words to His disciples He once used the expression, "Ye are clean because of the word which I have spoken unto you" (Jn 15:3). In this particular context the idea does not seem to be that of an external washing. Christ seems rather to mean that His disciples are cleansed as a vineyard is cleansed by pruning away some of the branches that others may bear fruit. In other words, the redemption of life is to be interpreted so that stress is laid upon the qualitative rather than the quantitative. Christ indeed found place in His instructions and in His own life for the normal and healthy activities of Scriptural interpretation would not put the accent; He went to feasts and to weddings, but His emphasis was always upon life conceived of in the highest terms. We can say then that the aim of redemption is to beget in men life like that in Christ.

Moreover, redemption must not be conceived of in such fashion as to do away with the need of response upon the part of the individual will. The literal suggestion of ransom in Scripture has to do with paying a price for a man's deliverance, whether the man is in slavery or in sickness or in being overjoyed at being redeemed; but in dealing with men whose lives are rendered useless by the sin of redemption is that which is of sin is largely in the love of sinning which sinning begets. Some thinkers have interpreted redemption to mean almost a seizing of men without regard to their own will. It is very easy to see how this conception arises. A man who himself hates sin may not stop to realize that some other men love sin. Redemption, to mean anything, must touch this inner attitude of will. We cannot then hold to any idea of redemption which brings men under a cleansing process without the assent of their own will. If we keep ourselves alive to the growing moral discernment which moves through the Scriptures, we must lay stress always upon redemption as a moral process. Not only must men be made like Christ, but we must say also that the method of redemption must be the method of Christ, the method of appealing to the moral will. There is no Scriptural warrant for the idea that men are redeemed from the world, as we can get from the words of Christ is a statement of the persistence of God in His search for the lost: 'He goeth after that which is lost, until he finds it' (Lk 15:4). Some would interpret these words to mean that the same process must be used, whether the man be brought into the kingdom. We cannot, in the light of the NT, limit the redeeming love of God; but we cannot, on the other hand, take passages from figurative expressions in such sense as to limit the freedom of men. The redemption must be conceived of as respecting the moral choices of men. In our thought of the Divine search for the control of inner human motive we must not stop short of the idea of men redeemed to the love of righteousness. Having already disposed of the idea of a plan of salvation, we can now consider what we mean by redemption. The idea of redemption is to beget in men life like that in Christ. 5. We cannot, in the light of the NT, limit the redeeming love of God; but we cannot, on the other hand, take passages from figurative expressions in such sense as to limit the freedom of men. The redemption must be conceived of as respecting the moral choices of men. In our thought of the Divine search for the control of inner human motive we must not stop short of the idea of men redeemed to the love of righteousness. Having already disposed of the idea of a plan of salvation, we can now consider what we mean by redemption. The idea of redemption is to beget in men life like that in Christ.
verse. If a man is under heavy obligations to use aright the power of controlling the forces already at work in the world, how much heavier must be the obligations on the Creator who started these forces! The obligation becomes appalling to our human thought. Man may voice the thought that the calling of human beings into existence and endowing them with the unsolicited boon of freedom. Men are not in the world of their own choice. Vast masses of them seem to be here as the outwarding of the mind of the blind. The gathering of men make it very easy for them to sin. The tendencies which at least seem to be innate are too often tragically inclined toward evil. Men seen, of themselves, utterly inadequate for their own redemption; by sin there is no redemption; but if there is to be redemption it must come from God, and the Christian thought of a moral God would seem to include the obligation on the part of God to redeem those whom He has sent into the world. Christ has made clear forever the absolutely binding nature of moral considerations. If the obligation to redeem men meant everything to Christ, it must also mean everything to the God of Christ. So we feel in line with true Christian thinking in the doctrine that redemption comes first as a discharge of the obligations on the part of God Himself.

If we look for the common thought in all the Christian statements of God's part in redemption we find it in this: that in all these statements God is conceived of as doing all, or at least a great deal, in the redemption of man. The early times men conceived of the human race as under the dominion of Satan, and of Satan as released by the deliverance of man and therefore entitled to summation, they also conceived of God Himself as paying the ransom to Satan. If they thought of God as a feudal lord whose dignity had been offended by sin, then it was not His Son, but His Son paid the cost of offended dignity. If their idea was that a substitute for sinners must be furnished, they included the thought of God Himself as providing a substitute. If they conceived of the universe as a vast system of moral laws—whose dignity must be upheld, they thought of God Himself as providing the means for maintaining the dignity of the laws. If they conceived of men as saved by a vast moral influence set at work, they thought of this influence as proceeding, not from man, but from God. The common thought in theories of redemption then, so far as concerns God's part, is that God Himself takes the initiative and does all He can in the declaration upon Himself. Each phrasing of the doctrine of redemption is the attempt of an age to express in a way of its own way that God has done all that He can for men.

It is from this standpoint that we must approach the part played by Christ in redemption. This is not the place for an attempt at formal presentation of the Christian teaching, the teaching of the Church. Some have thought to find such a statement in the conception that Christ is a prophet. They would empty the expression, "Son of God," of any unique meaning; they would make Christ the Son of God in the same sense that any great prophet could be conceived of as Son of God. Of course, we would not minimize the teaching of the Scripture as to the full humanity of Christ, and yet we may be permitted to voice our belief that the representation of Christ as the Redeemer merely in the same sense in which a prophet is Son of God, requires of course, we would not minimize the teaching of the Scripture as to the full humanity of Christ, and yet we may be permitted to voice our belief that the representation of Christ as the Redeemer merely in the same sense in which a prophet is Son of God, requires that a man must be able to say something like the Scripture teaching; and we feel, too, that such a solution of the problem of Christ would be inadequate for the practical task of redemption. If Christ is just a prophet giving us His teaching we rejoice in the teaching, but we do not know how to make the teaching effective. If it be urged that Christ is a prophet who in Himself realized the moral ideal, we feel constrained to reply that this really puts Christ at a vast distance from us. Such a doctrine of Christ's person would make Him the supreme religious genius, but the human genius stands apart from the ordinary mass of men. He may gather up into Himself and realize the ideals of men, He may voice the great aspirations; but we may not be able to make men like unto Himself. Shakespeare is a consummate literary genius. He has said once and for all many things which the common man thinks or half thinks. When the common man comes upon a phrase of Shakespeare he feels that Shakespeare has said for all time the things which he would himself have said if he had been able. But the appreciation of Shakespeare does not make the ordinary man like Shakespeare; the appreciation of Christ has not proved successful in itself in making men like unto Christ.

If, on the contrary, without attempting formal theological construction, we put some real meaning into the idea of Christ as the Son of God and hold fast to a unique relationship between Christ and God which makes Christ the greatest gift that God can give us, we find indeed that Christ is lifted up to essentially Divine existence; but we find also that this divinity does not estrange Him from us. Redemption, as it becomes feasible, would give us a revelation of how far up man can go, but when we have also a revelation of how far down God can come. If we can think of God as having in some real way come into the world through His Son Jesus Christ, that revelation makes Christ the Lord who can lead us to redemption.

Such a conception furnishes the dynamic which we must have if any real process of redemption. We need not only the ideal, but we need power by which to reach the ideal. If the universe is under the sway of a moral God, a God who is under obligations to bear the burdens of men, and who willingly assumes these obligations, we really feel that moral life at its fullest and best is the greatest fact in the universe. Moreover, we must be true to the Scriptures and lift the entire conception of redemption beyond the realm of conscience to the realm of the heart. What the conscience of God calls for, the love of God willingly fulfills. The Cross of Christ not only furnishes the revelation of the righteousness of God and the love of God. Power is thus put back of human conscience and human love to move forward toward redemption (Rom 8:35-39).

The aim of elements in education in Christ then is to lift men out of death toward life. The mind is to be quickened by the revelation of the true ideals of human life. The conscience is to be reinforced by the revelation of the moral God who carries on all things in the interests of righteousness. The heart is to be stirred and won by the revelation of the love which sends an only begotten Son to the cross for our redemption. And we must take the work of Christ, not as a solitary incident or a mere historic event, but as a manifestation of God's love which has been at work from the beginning and works forever. The Lamb was slain from the foundation of the world (Rev 13:8); the spirit of God revealed in the cross of Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever. We have in the cross a revelation of holy love which, in a sense, overpowers and at the same time encourages. The cross is the revelation of the length to which God is willing to go in redemption rather than set aside one jot or tittle of His moral law. He will not redeem men on the terms of their own power. He will not overwhelm them in any such manner as to do away with their power of free choice. He will show men His own feeling of holiness and love. In the name of a holy love which they can forever aspire after, but which they can never fully reach, men call to Him for forgiveness and that forgiveness men find forever available.

It remains to add one further item of Scriptural teaching, namely that redemption is a continuous process. If we may again use the word "life," which has been the key to this discussion, we may say that the aim of redemption is to make men progressively alive. There are not limits to the development of human powers touched by the redemptive processes of God. The cross is a revelation of Divine willingness to bear with men who are forever being redeemed. Of course, we speak of the redeemed man as redeemed once and for all. By this we mean that he is redeemed once and for all in being faced about and started in a right direction, but the progress toward full life may be faster or slower according to the man and the circumstances in the midst of which he is placed. Still the chief fact is the direction in which the man is moving. The revelation of God who aids in redemption is of the God who takes the direction as the chief fact rather than the length of the stride or the rate of the movement. Every man is expected to do his best. If he stumbles he is supposed to find his way to his feet; if he is moving slowly, he must attempt to move faster; if he is moving at a slower rate than he can attain, he must strive after the higher rate, but always the dynamic force is the revelation of the holy love of God. The Scriptures honor the prophets in whatever land or time they appear. The Scriptures welcome goodness under any and all circumstances. They have a place for a "light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world," but they still make it clear that the chief force in the redemption of men is the revelation of holy love in Jesus Christ. The redemption, we repeat, is never conceived of in artificial or mechanical terms. If any man hath not the spirit of Christ he does not belong to Christ (Rom 8:9). The aim of redemption is to beget this spirit, and this spirit is life.

REDEEMED, re-doun'd (from re, "back," and unde, "to surge as a wave"); To be sent back as a reaction, to overflow; occurs only as the tr of περισσεύω, perissēō, "to be over and above," "to superabound" (frequent in the NT); in 2 Cor 4:15, "might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God," RV may "cause the thanksgiving to abound.

REED (Job 31:22); used of the cross-beam of a "balance" (Isa 46:6); "a measuring reed" (Ezek 40:3); "a staff of reed," i.e. a walking-stick (Isa 36:6; Ezek 29:6); the "branches" of a candlestick (Ex 37:18). (6) καλαμός, καλάμος, "a reed shaken with the wind" (Mt 11:7; Lk 7:24); "a bruised reed" (Mt 12:20); they put "a reed in his right hand" (Mt 27:29,30); "They smote his head with a reed" (Mk 15:19); "put it on a reed" (Mt 27:48; Mk 15:36); "a measuring reed" (Rev 11:1; 21:15,16); "a pen" (3 Jn ver 13).

It is clear that kāneh and its Gr equivalent καλαμός mean many things. Some refer to different uses to which a reed is put, e.g. a cross-beam of a balance, a walking-stick, a measuring rod, and a pen (see above), but apart from this kāneh is a word used for at least two essentially different things: (1) an ordinary reed, and (2) some sweet-smelling substance.

REDNESS, red'nes, OF EYES. See DRUNKENNESS, II.

REDOUND, re-doun'd (from re, "back," and unde, "to surge as a wave"); To be sent back as a reaction, to overflow; occurs only as the tr of περισσεύω, perissēō, "to be over and above," "to superabound" (frequent in the NT); in 2 Cor 4:15, "might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God," RV may "cause the thanksgiving to abound.

(1) The most common reed in Pal is the Arundo donax (N.O. Gramineae), known in Arab. as kāneh ha-tāb, "sweet reed," or "pleasant cane," and in Ex 30:23, בְּרֶשֶׁת יָרֶק, krūth bēšam, "sweet calamus," or, better, a "cane of fragrance." Cant 4:14; Isa 43:21; Ezek 27:19 all apparently refer to the same thing, though in these passages the kāneh is unqualified. It was an ingredient of the holy oil (Ex 30:23); it was imported from a distance (Jer 6:20;...
Ezek 27 19, and it was rare and costly (Isa 43 24). It may have been the "scented calamus" (Azoros calamus) of the Bible (XII, xiii, 48), or some other aromatic scented reed or flag, or, as some think, some kind of aromatic bark. The sweetness refers to the scent, not the taste. See also Bulrush; Papyrus.

REED-GRASS (Gen 41 2.18; Job 8 11 m). See Flag, (2); Reed, (1).

REED, MEASURING, mes'hr-ur-ing (ם"ערא), [דמ'ערא, "measuring", "measuring rod"]). In Ezekiel’s vision of the temple a “man” (an angel) appears with a “measuring rod” to measure the dimensions of the temple (Ezek 40 3 ff; 42 16 ff). The reed is described as a cubit long, “of a cubit and a handbreadth each,” i.e. the cubit used was a handbreadth longer than the common cubit (see Curt. Weights and Measures; Temple). In the Apocalypse this idea of a measuring reed reappears for measuring the temple (Rev 11 1) and the holy city (21 15-16, "a golden reed"). The thought conveyed is exactitude in the dimensions of these edifices, symbolic of the symmetry and perfection of God’s church.

REELAIH, re-el'-a'ya, re-el'-a' (ר"לאיה), R'el'-yäh): One of the 12 chiefs who returned with Zerubbabel (Exz 2 2; Neh 7 7). In the passage in Neh the name is “Raamiah” (ר"מאיה), R'd'am-gäh), and in 1 Esd 5 8 “Resians.” Which is the original, it is almost impossible to decide; “Reeliah” seems preferable.

REELIAS, re-el'-i-ás (א ר'ליאס, Rhedias; [Fritzsche], B, followed by Swete, Bopohelas, Bollerman). AV Reelias: One of the “leaders” with Zerubbabel in the return from exile (1 Esd 5 8, m “Reelias”). It occupies the place of the “Bigvai” in Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7, but in form it must be the equivalent of “Reeliah” of Ezr and “Raamiah” of Neh. It is perhaps a duplicate of “Resian.”

REFINER, re-fin'er, REFINING, re-fin'ing: Two Hebrew words have been tr “refine”: (1) [ם"ערא], gaphar, lit. to “use” (Zec 13 9; Isa 48 10; Mal 3 2.3, etc). The same word is rendered also “tire” (Ps 66 10); “melt” (Jer 6 29 AV); “purge” (Isa 1 25). (2) [ץ"ערא], zahak, lit. to “strain” or “sift.” In the case of silver and gold the term probably referred to some washing process in connection with refining, as in Mal 3 3 both gaphar and zahak are used (1 Ch 28 18; 29 4; Job 28 1). The same word in Isa 25 6 referred to the straining of wine. Gr μαμαθέω, puréo, in the passive, lit. “to be ignited,” is tr “refined,” in Rev 1 15; 3 18. The ancient process of refining gold has already been described under Metallurgy (q.v.). Most of the Bible references are to the refining of silver. (Prov 25 4; Zec 13 9; Isa 48 10). The silver used by the ancients was probably obtained by smelting lead sulphide ore, rich in silver (argentiferous galena). After the ore had been reduced to a metallic condition, the lead was separated from the silver by blowing hot air over the surface of the melted metal. The lead was thus changed to lead oxide which, in a powdered condition, was driven away by the air blast. The resulting lead oxide, called in the Bible silver dross, was used for glazing pottery (Prov 26 23), a use to which it is still put by Syrian potters. The description of refining in Ezk 22 18-22 may indicate that a flux (cf “as with lye”, Isa 1 25 AVnavigation was sometimes added to the melted metal to dissolve the oxides of copper, lead, tin and iron as they formed, thus leaving the silver pure. Crude processes similar to those described above are used in the Taurus Mountains today.

REFORM, re-form' (ר'פור, "yasar"). The word in RV is found only in Lev 26 23, in the phrase “ye will not be reformed.” The meaning is, “to be instructed,” or, more fully, “to let one’s self be chastened,” etc, by church discipline to learn the lessons of this chastening.

The Heb word is the same in a similar connection in Jer 6 8, where it is rendered, “Be thou instructed,” and similar passages. (Jer 31 18, “Be thou instructed”; Prov 29 19 “corrected”) use the Heb term of admonition by the words of man.

AV also has “reform” in 2 Esd 8 12; Wisd 9 18.

REFORMATION, re-for-ma'shun: The word is found only in Heb 9 10, being the tr of ἁλοricht, ἁλιθίας, in its only occurrence. This Gr word means etymologically “making straight,” and was used of restoring to the normally straight condition that which is crooked or bent. In this passage it means the rectification of conditions, setting things to right, and is a description of the Messianic time.

REFRESH, re-fresh', REFRESHING, re-fresh'ing: “Refresh” occurs a few times in the OT as the tr of יִכְבָּר, yihbareh, “to take breath,” figurative “to be refreshed” (Ex 23 12; 31 17; 2 S 18 14); of יִכְבָּר, râ'abah, “to have room” (1 S 16 23; Job 32 20, m “find relief,” AVm “may breathe”); of יִכְבָּר, yâ'adâh, “to support” (1 K 13 7); and in the NT as the tr of ἐπανατέιλθαι, anapanaiô, “to give rest” (1 Cor 18 18); 2 Cor 7 13; and James 4 2.10; in compound words (1 L 15 32 AV); and anapanâvcho, “to invigorate,” “revive” (2 Tim 1 10), and other words. “Refreshing” is found in Isa 28 12 marḡ‘ôth, “rest” or “quiet”; and in Acts 3 19, ἀναπαύειν, and παράδεισος, “seasons of refreshing,” through the coming of Jesus the Christ; cf 2 Esd 11 46 and Av Sir 43 22 (יִפְדָּע). W. L. Walker

REFUGE, ref'uô: A place of resort and safety. The principal words in the OT are יִכְבָּר, yihbareh, ἁλοricht, ἁλιθίας (Ps 14 6; 46 1; 62 7.8; Isa 4 6, etc), and יִכְבָּר, yihbareh, ἁλιθίας, yihbareh (2 S 22 5; Ps 89 16, etc), both applied chiefly to God as a “refuge” for His people. For AV “refuge” in Dt 33 27, RV has “dwelling-place,” and in Ps 9 9, “high tower.” Conversely, RV has “refuge” for AV “shelter” in Ps 61 3, and “hope” in Jer 17 17.

REFUGE, CITIES OF (יִכְבָּר, יִכְבָּר, יִכְבָּר, ha-milh̀l; בֵּית הֵרְמִי, בֵּית הֵרְמִי, בֵּית הֵרְמִי, [cf 1 Macc 10 28, and other

1. Location forms: Six cities, three on each side of Jordan, were set apart and placed in the hands of the Levites, to serve as places of asylum for such as might shed blood unwittingly. On the
E. of the Jordan they were Bezer, Ramoth-gilead in the tribe of Gad, and Golan in the territory of Manasseh. On the W. of the Jordan they were Hebron in Judah, Shechem in Mt. Ephraim, and Kodosh in Naphtali (Nu 35 6, 14; Josh 20 27 ff.; 21 13-21.27.32.38; Bezer is named in ver 36, but not described as a City of Refuge). An account of these cities is given in separate arts. under their names. Dt 19 2 speaks of three cities thus to be set apart, referring apparently to the land W. of the Jordan.

From time immemorial in the East, if a man were slain the duty of avenging him has lain as a sacred obligation upon his nearest relative.

2. Purpose

In districts where more primitive conditions prevail, even to this day, the distinction between intentional and unintentional killing is not too strictly observed, and men are often done to death in revenge for what was the purest accident. To prevent such a thing where possible, and to provide for a right administration of justice, these cities were instituted. Open highways were to be maintained along which the manslayer might have an unobstructed course to the city gate.

The regulations concerning the Cities of Refuge are found in Nu 35; Dt 19 1-13; Josh 20. Briefly, everything was to be done to facilitate the flight of the manslayer, lest the average of blood, i.e. the nearest of kin, should pursue and overtake him, and, overtaking him, should smite him mortally. On reaching the city he was to be received by the elders and his case heard. If this was satisfactory, they might give him asylum, provided for his trial could be carried out. They took him, apparently, to the city or district from which he had fled, and there, among those who knew him, witnesses were examined. If it were proved that he was not a willful slayer, that he had no grudge against the person killed, and had shown no sign of purpose to injure him, then he was declared innocent and conducted back to the city in which he had taken refuge, where he must stay until the death of the high priest. Then he was free to return home in safety. Until that event he must on no account go beyond the city boundaries. If he did, the avenger of blood might slay him without blame. On the other hand, if he were found guilty of death, i.e. of a wilful slaughter, there was no more protection for him. He was handed over to the avenger of blood who, with his own hand, took the murderer's life. Blood-money, i.e. money paid in compensation for the murder, in settlement of the avenger's claim, was in no circumstances permitted; nor could the refugee be ransomed, so that he might "come again to dwell in the land" until the death of the high priest (Nu 35 32).

A similar right of refuge seems to have been recognized in Israel as attaching to the altar in the temple at Jerusalem (1 K 1 50; 2 S 12 14). This may be compared with the right of asylum connected with the temples of the heathen. W. EWING REDEMPTION, ré'gem (ירקמ), "redeem" [?] 1. A Calebite, son of Jadhai (1 Ch 2 47), mentioned as the eponym of a Calebite family or clan.

REDEMPTION-MELECH, ré'gem-me-lek, -mel'ek (ירקמ המלך): One of a deputation sent to inquire concerning the propriety of continuing the commemoration of the destruction of the temple by holding a fast (Zec 7 2). The text of the passage is in disorder. The name may mean "friend of the king"; hence some have sought to remove the difficulty by interpreting rehmekleh as a title, perhaps personal, rather than as a name. "They of Beth-el had sent Shareazer [q. v. (2)], the friend of the king.

REGENERATION, ré'jan'er-d'zhun, ré'-

I. The Term Explained

1. First explanation (Eschatological): For Acts 21 21, the vb. is found in Mt 17 11, ἀφανετασθήσεις, apokateskasthe, aor., aor. subjunctive, with ἀποκαταστάσεως, apokatapastase, "shall restore all things", and ἁμαρτίαν, ἀποκαταστάσοντα, "shall restore all things"), which signifies a gradual transition of meaning to the second sense of the word under consideration. It is supposed that regeneration in this sense denotes the final stage of development of all creation, by which God's purposes regarding the same are fully realized, when "all things are put in subjection under his feet" (1 Cor 15 27). This is a "regeneration in the proper meaning of the word, for it signifies a renovation of all visible things when the old is passed away, and heaven and earth become new" (cf Rev 21 1). To the Jew the regeneration thus prophesied was inseparably connected with the reign of the Messiah.

We find this word in the same or very similar senses in profane literature. It is used of the renewal of the world in Stoical philosophy. Jos (Ant, XI, iii. 9) speaks of the ἀνακάθεσις καὶ παλιγγενεσία τῆς πατρίδος, "a new foundation and regeneration of the fatherland," after the return from the Bab captivity. Philo (ed. Mangen, ii. 144) uses the term to signify the great post-faculating of the earth, as of a new world, and Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (xl. 1.1), of a periodical restoration of all things, laying stress upon the constant recurrence and uniformity of all happenings, which thought the Preacher expressed by the word. There is no new thing under the sun (Ec 1:9). In this sense the Gr. word is 5. first mentioned in classical Gr. It is used in the New Testament as representing the re-creation or "renovation" of the individual as described in the New Testament and Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls (Phut., ed. Xylander, 1490; Clem. Alex., ed. Potter, 1505) or else of a revival of life (Phil. 1 20). Cleeve uses the word in his letters to Atticus (v.6) metaphorically of his own life as a new exilic life granted to him. See Ecclesiastes of the NT, IX.

This sense is undoubtedly included in the full Bib. conception of the former meaning, for it is unthinkable that a regeneration in the eschatological sense can exist without a spiritual regeneration of humanity or the individual. It is, however, quite evident that this latter conception has arisen rather late, from an analysis of the former meaning. It is found in Tit 3:5 which, without absolute certainty as to its meaning, is generally interpreted to agree with the numerous nouns and vbs. which have given the dogmatical setting to the doctrine of regeneration in Christian theology. Clem. Alex. is the first to differentiate this meaning from the former by the addition of the adj. πνευματικός, pneumatikōs, "spiritual" (cf anaparistē, Acts 3:20; see Refreshing). In this latter sense the word is typically Christian, though the OT contains many adumbrations of the spiritual process expressed thereby.

II. The Biblical Doctrine of Regeneration

1. In the OT

It is well known that the earlier part of the OT, and to a certain degree all through the OT, religion is looked at and spoken of more as a national possession, the benefits of which are largely visible and tangible. The individual regeneration here occurs therefore—though no technical expression has as yet been coined for the process—in the first meaning of the word elucidated above. Whether the Divine promises refer to the Messianic end of times, or are to be realized at an earlier date, they all refer to the nation of Israel as such, and to individuals only as far as they are partakers in the benefits bestowed upon the commonwealth. This is even true where the blessings prophesied are only spiritual, as in Isa. 60:21.22. The mass of the people of Israel are therefore as yet scarcely aware of the fact that the conditions on which these Divine promises are to be attained are more than ceremonial and ritual ones. Soon, however, great disasters, threatening to overthrow the national entity, and finally the captivity and dispersion which caused national functions to be almost, if not altogether, discontinued, assisted in the growth of a sense of individual or personal responsibility before God. The sin of Israel is perceived as the sin of the individual, which can be removed only by individual repentance and cleansing. This is best seen from the stirring appeals of the prophets of the exile, where frequently the necessity of a change of attitude toward Jehovah is preached as a means to such regeneration. This cannot be understood otherwise than as a turning of the individual to the Lord. Here, too, no ceremony or sacrifice is sufficient, but an interposition of Divine grace, which is represented under the figure of a way of purification from all iniquity and sin (Isa. 1:18; Jer 13:23). It is not possible now to follow in full the development of this idea of cleansing, but already in Is 62:15 the sprinkling of many nations is mentioned and is soon understood in the sense of the "baptism" which is to be performed upon them prior to their reception into the covenant of Israel. It was the symbol of a radical cleansing like that of a "new-born babe," which was one of the designations of the proselyte (cf Ps 87:5; see also the tractate Ybākâ in the Talmud). Would it be surprising then, that Israel which had been guilty of many sins of the Gentiles, needed a similar baptism and sprinkling? This is what Ezek 36:25 suggests: "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you." In other passages the cleansing and refining power of fire is alluded to (e.g. Mal 3:2), and there is no doubt that John the Baptist found in such passages the ground for his practice of baptizing the Jews who came to him (Mt 3:5-6; Lk 3:1-16).

The turning of Israel to God was necessarily meant to be an inward change of attitude toward Him, in other words, the sprinkling with clean water, as an outward sign, was the emblem of a pure heart. It was Isaiah and Jeremiah who drew attention to this (Isa 57:15; Jer 24:7; 31:33-35; 32:38-40, et passim). Here again reference is made to individuals, not only to the people in general (Jer 31:34). This promised regeneration, so lovingly suffered by Jehovah, is at the same time the agreement between God and His people (Jer 31:31; Ezek 11:19-21; 18:31.32; 37:23-24).

The renewing and cleansing here spoken of is in reality nothing else than what Dt 30:6 had promised, a circumscription of the heart in contradistinction to the flesh, the token of the former (Abrahamic) covenant (of circumcision, Jer 4:4). As God takes the initiative in making the covenant, the conviction takes root that human sin and depravity can be effectually eliminated only by the act of God Himself renewing and transforming the heart of man (Hos 14:4). This we see from the testimony of some of Israel's best sons and daughters, who also knew that this grace was found in the way of repentance and humiliation before God. The promise of this conviction is found in the prayer of David: "Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right [in "stetfast"] spirit within me. Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy holy Spirit from me. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with a willing spirit" (Ps 51:10-12). Jeremiah puts the following words into the mouth of Ephasim: "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned" (Jer 31:18). Clearer than any passages of the OT, John the Baptist, forerunner of Christ and last flaming torch of the time of the earlier covenant, spoke of the baptism, not of water, but of the Holy Spirit and of fire (Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16; Jn 1:33), leading thus to the realization of OT foreshadings which became possible by faith in Christ.

In the teaching of Jesus the need of regeneration has a prominent place, though nowhere are the reasons given. The OT had succeeded and overthrown that conscience agreed with—it in convincing the people of this need. The clearest assertion of it and the explanation of the doctrine of regeneration is found in the conversation of Jesus with Nicodemus (Jo. 3:1). It is based upon (1) the observation that man, even the most pungent in the observance of the Law, is dead and therefore unable to "live up" to the demands of God. Only He who gave life at the beginning can give this (spiritual) life necessary to do God's will. (2) Man has fallen from his virginal and Divinely appointed sphere, the realm of the spirit, the Kingdom of God, living now the perishing earthly life. Only by having a new spiritual nature imparted to him, by being "born anew" (Jn 3:3, RV, "from above," Gr ἀνανεωθησόμενον), by being "born of the Spirit" (3:6,8), can he live the spiritual life which God requires of man.

These words are a NT exegesis of Ezekiel's vision of the dead bones (57:1-10). It is the "breath from Jehovah," the Spirit of God, who alone can give life to the spiritually dead.

But regeneration, according to Jesus, is more than life, it is also purity. As God is pure and sinless, none but the pure in heart can see God (Mt 5:8). This is always recognized by more human endeavor. Bildad the Shuhite declared, and his friends, each in his turn, expressed very similar thoughts (Job 4:17; 14:4): "How then can man be just with God? Or how can he be clean that is born of a woman? Behold, even the moon hath no brightness, and the stars are not pure in his sight: how much less man, that is a worm! and the son of man, that is a worm!" (25:4-6).

To change this lost condition, to impart this new life, Jesus claims as His God-appointed task: "The Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost" (Lk 19:10); "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly" (Jn 10:10). This life is eternal, imperishable: "I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall anyone snatch them out of my hand" (Jn 10:28). This life is imparted by Jesus Himself: "It is the spirit that giveth life; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I have spoken unto you, are spirit, and are life" (Jn 6:63). This life can be received on the condition of faith in Christ or by coming to Him (Jn 14:6). By faith power is received which enables the sinner to overcome sin, to "sin no more" (Jn 8:11).

The parables of Jesus further illustrate this doctrine. The prodigal is declared to have been "dead" and to be "alive again" (Lk 15:24). The new life from God is compared to a wedding garment in the parable of the Marriage of the King's Son (Mt 22:11). The sinner who had been refused by the unhappy guest, who, in consequence, was "cast out into the outer darkness" (Mt 22:13).

Finally, this regeneration, this new life, is expressed in the knowledge of God and His Christ: "And this is eternal life, that they should know thee, the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ" (Jn 17:3). This seems to be an allusion to the passage in Hos (4:6): "My people are destroyed through ignorance," because they have rejected knowledge: "Because thou hast rejected knowledge, I also will reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me."

It may be said in general that the teaching of the apostles on the subject of regeneration is a development of the teaching of Jesus on the lines of the adumbrations of the OT.

3. In Apostolic Teaching Considering the differences in the personal character of these writers, it is remarkable that such concord of views should exist. There is more stress on the specific facts of justification and sanctification by faith than on the more comprehensive head of regeneration. Still the need of it is plainly stated by St. Paul. It is necessary to "see and to hear," to be "attributed to sin" (Rom 8:3-11; Eph 2:1). The flesh is at enmity with God (Eph 2:15); all mankind is "darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God" (4:18). Similar passages might be multiplied. Paul then distinctly teaches that thus is a new life in store for those who have been spiritually dead. To the Ephesians he writes: "And ye did he make alive, when ye were dead through your trespasses and sins" (2:1), and later on: "God, being rich in mercy, for his sake made us alive together with Christ" (2:45). A spiritual resurrection has taken place. This regeneration causes a complete revolution in man. He has thereby passed from under the law of sin and death and has come under "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus!" (Rom 8:2). The change is so radical that it is possible now to speak of a "new creature" (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15, "new creation"), of a "new man," that after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness through faith. (Eph 2:10). This is a new man, this being reformed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him (Col 3:10). All "old things are passed away: behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5:17).

St. Paul is equally explicit regarding the author of this change. "By the Spirit of Christ" has been given from above to be the source of all new life (Rom 8); by Him we are proved to be the "sons" of God (Gal 4:6); we have been adopted into the family of God (adolescence, hupotesia, Rom 8:15; Gal 4:5). Thus St. Paul speaks of the "second Adam," by whom the life of righteousness is initiated in us; just as the "first Adam" became the leader in transgression, He is "a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor 15:45). St. Paul himself experienced this change, and henceforth exhibited the "new creature" which Christ brought out of darkness into the marvelous light of His grace. "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me: and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself up for me" (Gal 2:20).

Regeneration is to St. Paul, no less than to Jesus, connected with the conception of purity and knowledge. We have already noted the second NT passage in which the word "regeneration" occurs (Tit 3:5): "According to his mercy he saved us, through the washing in [the] "layer" of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit, which he poured out upon us richly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour." In 1 Cor 12:13 such cleansing is called the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and the repeated promise (Job 2:25 [in the Hebrew text 3:1]; Mt 3:11; Mk 1:8; Lk 3:16; Acts 1:5; 11:16). There is, of course, in these passages no reference to mere water-baptism, any more than in Ezek 36:25. Water washeth the outer body, so the spirit purifieth the inner man (cf 1 Cor 6:11; 1 Pet 3:21).

The doctrine that regeneration redounds in true knowledge of Christ is seen from Eph 3:15-19 and 4:17-24, where the ignorance of natural man is placed in contradiction to the enlightenment of the new life (see also Col 3:10). The church redeemed and regenerated is to be a special "possession," an "heritage" of the Lord (Eph 1:11,18), and the whole creation is to participate in the final redemption and a doption (Rom 8:21-23).

St. James finds less occasion to touch this subject than the other writers of the NT. His Ep. is rather ethical than doxological. Indeed, he lays more stress on the specific facts of justification and sanctification by faith than on the more comprehensive head of regeneration. Still the need of it is plainly stated by St. Paul. It is necessary to "see and to hear," to be "attributed to sin" (Rom 8:3-11; Eph 2:1). The flesh is at enmity with God (Eph 2:15); all mankind is "darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God" (4:18). Similar passages might be multiplied. Paul then distinctly teaches that thus is a new life in store for those who have been spiritually dead. To the Ephesians he writes: "And ye did he make alive, when ye were dead through your trespasses and sins" (2:1), and later on: "God, being rich in mercy, for his sake made us alive together with Christ" (2:45). A spiritual resurrection has taken place. This regeneration causes a complete revolution in man. He has thereby passed from under the law of sin and death and has come under "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus!" (Rom 8:2). The change is so radical that it is possible now to speak of a "new creature" (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15, "new creation"), of a "new man," that after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness through faith. (Eph 2:10). This is a new man, this being reformed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him (Col 3:10). All "old things are passed away: behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5:17).
pletion of God's plans concerning the whole creation, and accordingly looks here at God's people as a whole. In a similar sense he says in his Second Ep., after mentioning "the day of God": "We look for new heavens and a new earth, without righteousness" (2 Pet 3 13). Still he alludes very plainly to the regeneration of individuals (1 Pet 1 3.23).

The idea of a second birth of the believers is clearly suggested in the expression, "newborn babes" (1 Pet 2 2), and in the explicit statement of 1 Pet 1.23 "having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God, which liveth and abideth." It is in this sense that the apostle calls God "Father" (1 17) and the believers "children of obedience" (1 14), i.e. obedient children, or children who ought to obey. We have seen above that the agent by which regeneration is wrought, the incorruptible seed of the word of God, finds a parallel in St. Paul's and St. James's theology. All these expressions go back probably to a word of the Master in Jn 15 3. We are made partakers of the word by having received the spirit. This spirit (cf. the Pauline "life-giving spirit," 1 Cor 15.45), the "mind" of Christ (1 Pet 4 1), is the power of the resurrected Christ active in the life of the believer. Peter refers to the same thought in 1 Pet 3 15.21. By regeneration we become "an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession," in whom Divine virtues, the excellencies of him who called you (1 Pet 2 9), are manifested. Here the apostle uses well-known OT expressions foreshadowing NT graces (Isa 61 6; 66 21; Ex 19 6; Dt 7 6), but he individualizes the process of regeneration in full agreement with the increased light which the teaching of Jesus has brought. The theology of St. Peter also points out the continuity of regeneration with purity and holiness (1 Pet 1 15.16) and true knowledge (1 14) or obedience (1 14; 3 16). It is not surprising that the idea of purity should invite the OT parallel of "cleansing by water." The flood washed away the iniquity of the world "in the days of Noah," when "eight souls were saved through water: which also after a true likeness [Rv'm in the antitype] doth now save you, even baptism, not the putting in, but the washing, that that which proceeds from the water [Rv'm 'inquiry,' 'appeal'] of a good conscience toward God, through the resurrection [life] of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet 3 20.21).

The teaching of St. John is very closely allied with that of Jesus, as we have already seen from the multitude of quotations we had to select from St. John's Gospel to illustrate the teaching of the Master. It is esp. interesting to note the cases where the apostle didactically elucidates certain of these pronouncements of Jesus. The most remarkable apostolic gloss or commentary on the subject is found in Jn 7 39. Jesus had spoken of the change which faith in Him ("coming to him") would cause in the lives of His disciples: how Divine energies "rivers" of water should issue forth from them; and the evangelist continues in explanation: "But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive: for the Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified." This recognition of a special manifestation of Divine power, transcending the experience of OT believers, was based on the declaration of Christ, that He would send "another Comforter [Rv 'advocate,' 'helper,' Gr Paracletos], that he may be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth'" (14 16).

In his Ep. St. John shows that this spirit be-stows the elements of a Godlike character which makes us to be "sons of God," before who were "children of the devil" (1 Jn 3 10.24; 4 18, etc).

This regeneration is "eternal life" (1 Jn 5 13) and moral similarity with God, the very character of God in man. As "God is love," the children of God will love (1 Jn 5 2). At the same time it is not Jesus alone, but also fellow-believers in Christ, victorious life which characterizes the world (1 Jn 5 4); it is purity (1 Jn 3 3-6) and knowledge (1 Jn 2 20).

The subject of regeneration lies outside of the scope of the Ep. to the He, so that we look in vain for an explanation of what it is in no place contradict the dogma, which, on the other hand, underlies many of the statements made. Christ, "the mediator of a better covenant, which hath been enacted upon better promises" (8, 6), has made "purification of sins" (1 3). In contrast, distinction to the first covenant, in which the people approached God by means of outward forms and ordinances, the "new covenant" (8 13) brought an "eternal redemption" (9 12) by means of a Divine cleansing (9 14). Christ, brings many sons to glory" and is "author of their salvation" (2 10).

Immature Christians are spoken of (as were the proselytes of the OT) as babes, who were to grow to the stature, character and knowledge of "full-grown men" (1 12; 3 13).

III. Later Development of the Doctrine.—Very soon the high spiritual meaning of regeneration was obscured by the development of priestcraft within the Christian Church. While Baptism as initiation into the Church was thought of as accomplished by the mediation of ministers thereto appointed, the creation hereby employed became means to which magic powers were of necessity ascribed. This we see plainly in the view of baptismal regeneration. This, which, based upon half-understood passages of Scripture quoted above, was taught at an early date. While in the post-apostolic days we frequently find traces of a proper appreciation of an underlying spiritual value in baptism (cf Didache, vii), many of the expressions used are highly metaphorical and need to be understood in a different context. Thus, "baptism of Christ" (Acts, ii 32) is seen as the second of the three births which a child of God must experience (regeneration, the birth of Christ, the third the resurrection). This birth is "of the day, free, delivering from passions, taking away all veil of our nature or life, i.e. everything hiding the Divine image in which we are created, and leading up to the life above." (Ullmann, Gregory v. Natures, 327). Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat., xvii, c. 37) ascribes to baptism the power of absolution from sin and the power of endowment with heavenly virtues. Augustine ascribed baptism is essential to salvation, though the baptism of blood (martyrdom) may of course follow. It is significant that as in the case of the thief at the cross (Aug., De Anima et Vitae Originali, ii. 9; Epp. liii. 1), who, while changing the Great, compares the spirit-filled water of baptism with the spirit-filled womb of the Virgin, in which the Holy Spirit engenders a sinless child (cf. Gen. ii 24, xxvi. 5; see Hagenbach, Dogmengeschichte, § 137).

In general this is still the opinion of pronounced sacramentarians, that the evangelical Christianity has gone back to the teaching of the NT.

IV. Present Significance.—Although a clear distinction is not always maintained between regeneration and other experiences of the spiritual life, we may summarize our belief in the following theses:

(1) Regeneration implies not merely an addition of certain gifts or graces, a strengthening of certain innate good qualities, but a radical change, which revolutionizes our whole being, contradicts and overcomes our old fallen nature, and places our spiritual center of gravity wholly outside of our own powers in the realm of God's causation.

(2) It is the will of God that all may be made partakers of this new life (1 Tim 2 4) and, as it is clearly stated that some fall short of it (Jn 5 40), it is plain that the fault thereof lies with man. God requires all men to repent and turn unto Him (Acts 27 30) before He will or can effect regeneration.

Conversion representing in us a new faith in Christ, is therefore the human response to the offer of salvation which God makes. This response gives occasion to and is synchronous with the Divine act of renewal (regeneration). This response of God enters into union with the believing, accepting spirit of man. This is fellowship with Christ (Rom 8 10; 1 Cor 6 17; 2 Cor 5 17; Col 3 3).

(3) The process of regeneration is outside of our observation and beyond the scope of psychological analysis. It takes place in the sphere of subconscionality, and psychological investigation thus has thrown a flood of light on the psychic states which precede, accompany and follow the work of the Holy Spirit. "He handles psychic powers; he works upon psychic energies and states; and this work of reparation lies somewhere within the purview of the new manifestation."

The study of the relations psychological is of highest value and greatest importance. The facts of Christian experience cannot be changed, nor do they lose in value by the most searching psychological scrutiny.

Psychological analysis does not eliminate the direct workings of the Holy Spirit. Nor can it disclose its process; the "underlying laboratory where are wrought radical remedial processes and structural changes in the psychical being as portrayed in explicit scriptural utterances: 'Create in me a clean heart' (Ps 51 10). It must be born again." (Acts 2 38) As in Christ he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold all things are become new again (2 Cor 5 17; AV). AV is in the region of subconsciouness. To look in the region of consciousness for this Person or for His work is fruitless and conclusive with Christian conception. Christian psychology thus traces its deepest-laying retreat the Divine intervention in the regeneration of man, where God works in the depths of the soul as silently and secretly as if on the remotest world of the stellar universe." (H. E. Warner, Psychology of the Christian Life, 117).

(4) Regeneration manifests itself in the conscious soul by its effects on the will, the intelligence and the affections. At the same time regeneration supplies a new life-power of Divine origin, which enables the component parts of human nature to fall in with the law of God, to strive upward to the coming of God's kingdom, and to accept the teachings of God's spirit. Thus regenerate man is made conscious of the facts of justification and adoption. The former is a judicial act of God, which frees man from the law of sin and absolves him from the state of enmity against God; the latter an endue-ment with the Spirit, which is an earnest of his inheritance (Eph 1 14). The Spirit of God, dwelling in man, witnesses to the state of sonship (Rom 8 16; Gal 4 6).

(5) Regeneration, being a new birth, is the starting-point of spiritual growth. The regenerated man needs nurture and training. He receives it not merely from outside experiences, but from an innermost principle, which is recognized by the power of the life of the indwelling Christ (Col 1 26, 27). Apart from the mediate dealings of God with man through word and sacraments, there is therefore an immediate communication of life from God to the regenerate.

(6) The truth which is mentioned as the agent by whom regeneration is made possible (Jn 3 32; Jas 1 18; 1 Pet 2 23), is nothing else than the Divine Spirit, not only the spoken or written word of God, which may convince people of right or wrong, but which cannot enable the will of man to forsake the wrong and to do the right, but He who calls Himself the Truth (Jn 14 6) and who has become the motive power of regenerated life (Gal 2 20).

(7) Recent philosophy expressive of the reaction from the mechanical view of bare materialism, and also from the depreciation of personality as seen in socialism, has again brought into prominence the reality and need of personal life. Johannes Müller and Rudolf Eucken among others emphasize that a new life of the spirit, independent of outward conditions, is not only possible, but necessary for the attainment of the highest development. This new life is not a fruit of the free play of the tendencies and powers of natural life, but is in sharp conflict with them. Man as he is by nature stands in direct contrast to the demands of the spiritual life. Spiritual life, as Professor Eucken says, can be implanted in man by some superior power only and must constantly be sustained by superior life. It breaks through the order of causes and effects: it severs the continuity of the outer world; it makes impossible a rational joining together of realities; it prohibits a monistic view of the immediate condition of the world. This new life derives its power not from Nature; it is a manifestation of Divine life within us (Hauptprobleme der Religionsphilosophie, Leipzig, 1912, 17 ff; Der Kampf um einen geistigen Lebensinhalt, Leipzig, 1907; Grundlinien einer neuen Lebensanschauung, Leipzig, 1907; Johannes Müller, Bauernsee für persönliche Kultur, 3 vols, München, 1908).

Thus the latest development of idealistic philosophy corroborates in a remarkable way the Christian truth of regeneration. See also Conversion.

REGREATION, BAPTISMAL. See Baptistical Regeneration.

REGION, re'jün: A "district," as in modern Eng. The word "region" is used by RV interchangeably with "country," "coasts," etc., for various Heb and Gr terms, but "region round about" is usually in AV and invariably in RV the tr of ἐρεβικuentoι or ἐρεβίκον, "surrounding country." For a possible technical use of "region" in Acts 16 6 and RV 18 23; see Galatia.

REGISTER, re'jus-r. See Genealogy; QUINNIUS.

REHABIAH, re-ha-bi'a (רֶהֶבִיָּה), r'habhyah, r'habhyyah, "Jeh is wide": Son of Eliezer, and grandson of Moses. Eponym of a Levitical city (1 Ch 23 17; 24 21; 26 25).

REHEARSE, re-hér's (דְּבָה , sūm, דָּבָה, dabhār, דַּבָּה, nāhpadh, דַּבָּה, tānāh; ἀναγγέλλω, ἀναγγέλλει); Usually means simply "to relate," "to tell," "to declare" (Ex 17 14; Jgs 5 11; 1 Ss 8 21; 17 31; Acts 14 27); with ·"rehearse from the beginning" (Acts 11 5; ἐξαίρουσιν, ἐξαρχάται, begin) (so RV). RV has preserved uniformity by translating ἀναγγέλλει by "rehearse" also in Acts 16 4, and has introduced "rehearse" as the tr of ἐξαίρουσιν, ἐξαρχάται, through-out (Lk 24 35; Acts 10 8; 15 12 14; 21 19), except in Jn 1 18 ("declare"). Sir 44 7, AV has "rehearse for despouye, doutous, "repeat" (so RV).

(1) Etymologically the word means "broad" and might be applied either to a road or a plain. Reheb is given (Nu 13 21) as the northern limit of Israel as reached by the spies. This agrees with the position assigned to Beth-rehoab in the narrative of the settlement of the Danites (Jgs 18:28). It is mentioned again along with the kingdom of Zobah in connection with the wars of Saul (1 S 14:47-50, 1 Xx 37-40) and as having been associated with Zobah and Maacah against David in the Ammonite war and as having been defeated by him (2 S 10:6). Robinson sought to identify it with Hinnom, but it hardly suits the references. Buhl (GA'L, 240) following Thomson (Lb, 11, 547) seeks it at Panecas (modern Bandid). This would suit all the requirements of the capital, Beth-rehoab, which might then be the second Rehoab, assigned as part of the territory of Sidon to the tribe Asher (Josh 19:28-30; Jgs 18:28). We must, however, assign to the kingdom of Rehoab a territory extending from the settlements of the Danites to the "entering in of Hamath" or to Libo (modern Leboue), i.e., the Great Plain of Coele-Syria bounded by Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon and within the limits indicated.

(2) Two separate towns belonging to Asher (Josh 19:28; 19:30). One of them was given to the Gershonite Levites (Jgs 21:31), and one is mentioned as remaining in the hands of the Canaanites (16:3). It was one of the last Canaanite cities to be taken in the time of David.

(3) Father of Hadadezer, king of Aram Zobah, who was overwhelmed by David at the Euphrates (2 S 8:3.12).

(4) One of the Levites who sealed Nehemiah's covenant on the 24th Tisri, 4th Bi, 10th (1 Ch 9). W. M. Chishime. REHOBOAM, re-hô-bo'am (2277), rhabob'am, "the people is enlarged," or perhaps "Am is wide.

6. His Death

The son and successor of Solomon, the last king who claimed to rule the old kingdom and the first king of Judah after the division of the kingdom. He was born c. 975 BC. His mother was Naamah, an Ammonite princess. The account of his reign is contained in 1 K 14:21-31; 2 Ch 10-12. The incidents leading to the disruption of the kingdom are told in 1 K 11:43-12:24; 2 Ch 9:31-11:4. R. was 41 years old when he began to reign (1 K 14:20; 12:13; 1 Ch 22:9; 23:16 years). He ascended the throne at Jerus immemorially upon his father's death with apparent opposition. North of the Kingdom Israel, however, was dissatisfied, and the people demanded that the king meet them in popular assembly at Shechem, the leading city of Northern Israel. True, Israel was no longer, if ever, an elective monarchy. Nevertheless, the people claimed a constitutional privilege, based perhaps on the tradition of Samuel in the election of Saul (1 S 10:25), to be a party to the conditions under which they would serve a new king and he become their ruler. David, in making Solomon his successor, had ignored this wise provision, and the people, having lost such a privilege by default, naturally deemed their negligence the cause of Solomon's burdensome taxes and forced labor. Consequently, they would be more jealous of their rights for the future, and R. accordingly would have to accede to their demand. Having come together at Shechem the people agreed to accept R. as their king on condition that he would lighten the grievous service and burdensome taxes of his father. R. asked for three days' time in which to consider the request. Against the advice of men of ripper judgment, who assured him that he might win the people by becoming their servant, he chose the counsel of the younger men, who were of his own age, to rule by sibierness rather than by kindness, and returned the people a rough answer, saying: 'My father's yoke was heavy, but I will add to your yoke: my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions' (1 K 12:14). R., however, misunderstood the temper of the people, as well as his own ability. The people, led by Jeroboam, a leader more able than himself, were ready for rebellion, and so force lost the day where kindness might have won. The threat of the king was met by the Marseillaise of the people: What portion have we in David? neither have we any inheritance in the son of Jesse. A chain of cities: to your tents, O Israel: now see to thine own house, David" (1 K 12:16). Thus the ten tribes deschonned R., and elected Jeroboam, their champion and spokesman, their king (see JEROBOAM). R., believing in his ability above the old tradition, but Jeroboam, R.'s successor, was exiled ignominiously back to Jerus, king only of Judah and of the adjacent territory of the tribe of Benjamin. The mistak of the R. was the common mistake of despots. He presumed too much on privilege not earned by service, and on power for which he was not willing to render adequate compensation.

It is a mistake, however, to see in the disruption the shattering of a kingdom that had long been a harmonious monarchy from the outset. From the comparatively minor federation of tribes it was perfectly cemented. They seldom united against their common foe. No mention is made of Judah in the list of tribes who fought with Jehoram against Sessai. A chain of cities was held by the Canaanites, stretching across the country from E. to W., the North and the South apart. Different physical characteristics produced different types of life in the two sections. Old jealousies repeatedly fanned into new flame intensified the divisions due to natural and artificial causes. David labored hard to break with the past, but in his reign Israel rebelled twice. Northern Israel had produced many of the strongest leaders of the nation, and the Axum authority for this reason was usually a ruler from the Judaeas dynasty. Solomon, following David's policy of unification, directed the centralization of worship at Jerus and through the general splendor of his reign, but he, more than any other, finally divided the nation, the North and the South, through his unjust discriminations, his heavy taxes, his faded religious policy, and his general extravagance of his reign. The religion of Jeh was the only bond capable of holding the nation together. The apostasy of Solomon reversed this bond. The prophets, with their profound knowledge of religious and political values, saw less danger to the true worship of Jeh in a divided kingdom than in a united nation ruled over by R., who had neither political sagacity nor an adequate conception of the greatness of the religion of Jeh. Accordingly, Ahijah openly encouraged the revolution, while Shemaiah gave it passive support.

Immediately upon his return to Jerus, R. collected a large army of 180,000 men (reduced to 120,000 in LXX B), for the purpose of making war against Israel. The expedition, however, was forbidden by Shishak, who declared his Civil War. The ground that they should not fight against their brethren, and that the division of the kingdom was from God. Notwithstanding the prohibition, we are informed that "there was war between R. and Jeroboam continually" (1 K 14:30; 2 Ch 12:15).

R. next occupied himself in strengthening the territory which still remained to him by fortifying a number of cities (2 Ch 11:5-12). These cities were on the roads to Egypt, or on the western hills of the Judaean Shephelah, and were doubtless fortified as a protection against Egypt. According to 2 Ch 11 13-17, Rehoboam's prosperity was augmented by an immigration of Shishak's people into the new city of Jerusalem, which came to Jerus because of their opposition to the idolatrous worship instituted by Jeroboam. All who were loyal to Jeh in the Northern Kingdom are represented as following the example of the priests and Levites in going to Jerusalem to pray, not simply to sacrifice, but to reside there permanently, thus strengthening R.'s kingdom. In view of the fact that R. added to the innovations of his father, erected pillars of Baal in Jerusalem long before they were common in Northern Israel, and that he permitted other heathen abominations and immoralities, it seems that the true worship of Jeh was received little encouragement from the king himself. As a further evidence of his prosperity, Ch gives an account of R.'s family. Evidently he was of luxurious habit, and followed his father in the possession of a considerable harem (2 Ch 11 18-23). He is said to have had 18 wives and 60 concubines, (2 Ch 11 21; LXX B and Jos, Ant, VIII, x, 1 give '30 concubines').

One of the first results of the disruption of the kingdom was the invasion of Pa\ a by Shishak, king of Egypt, in the 5th year of R. Shishak is Sheshonk I, the first king of the XXIIIrd or Bubastite Dynasty. He was the same ruler who implored hospitality to Jeroboam when he was obliged to flee from Solomon (I K 11 40). The LXX (1 K 12 24) informs us that Jeroboam married A c, the sister of Shishak's wife, thus becoming brother-in-law to the king of Egypt. It is therefore easy to conceive that Jeroboam, finding himself in straits in holding his own against his rival, Rehoboam, called in the aid of his former protector. The results of this invasion, however, are inscribed on the temple at Karnak in Upper Egypt, where a list of some 180 (Curtis, 'Chronicles,' I CC) towns captured by Shishak is given. These belong to Northern Israel as well as Judah, showing that Shishak exacted tribute there as well as in Judah, which seems scarcely reconcilable with the view that he invaded Pa\ a as Jeroboam's ally. However, the king of Israel, implored the aid of Shishak against his rival, the latter made himself vassal to Egypt. This would suffice to make his towns figure at Karnak among the cities subjected in the course of the campaign. The Chronicler saw in Shishak an instrument in the hand of God for the punishment of R. and the people for the national apostasy. According to 2 Ch 12 3, Shishak had a force of 1,200 chariots and 60,000 horsemen to which Jos adds 400,000 foot-soldiers, composed of Lubim, Sukkilm and Ethipians. No resistance appears to have been offered to the advance of the invading army. Not even Jerus seems to have stood a siege. The palace and the temple were robbed of all their treasures, including the shields of gold which Solomon had made. For these R. later substituted shields of brass (vs 9,10). R. died at the age of fifty-eight, after having reigned in Jerus for 17 years. His son Abijah became his successor. He was buried in Jerus. Jerus in that disposition he was a proud and foolish man, and that he "despised the worship of God, till the people themselves imitated his wicked actions" (Ant, VIII, x, 2). S. K. MOSHMAN Rehoboth, rē-hōˈboth, rē-hōˈbōth (רֶהֶבֹ֥וֹת), rēhōbatis, "bread places"; Ἱππόλειος, Ἰππορίχαία; one of the wells dug by Isaac (Gen 26 22). It is probably the Rubata of the Am Tab (Petre, nos. 256, 260; see also Expos T, XI, 239 [König], 377 [Seyce], and it is almost certainly identical with the ruin Rēhabēb, 8 hours S.W. of Beersheba. Robinson (BR, 1, 190-97) describes that ruins of an ancient city on this spot, which "occupied a tract of 10 to 12 acres in extent": "many of the dwellings had each its cistern, cut in the solid rock"; "once this must have been a city of not less than 12,000 or 15,000 inhabitants. Now it is a perfect field of ruins, a scene of unutterable desolation, across which the passing stranger can with difficulty find his way." Huntington (Pal and Its Transformation, 124) describes considerable remains of a suburban population extending both to the N. and to the S. of this once important place.

Reho\b\o\ th by the River (רְהֶבֹ֥וֹת הַנַּ֨הְדָּה), rēhōbatis ha-nahādāh; B, Ρωθπάθα [Ρωθάδα in Ch] 'rēhōbatis ha'-nahādāh, Shishak's capital.

However, R.'s evidence only mentions that the city was possessed by R. Therefore, R. adds that the city could hardly have been Edom, for it might be identified with Rasah on the W. of the river, 8 miles S. of its confluence with the Khabir. Winckler thinks it might possibly be on the boundary between Pal and Egypt, "the river being Wady el-'Arish, the 'brook of Egypt.'" (Nn 34 5; Josh 15 4, etc.). W. EWING

Reho\b\o\ th-by the River, or, rē-hōˈboth (רְהֶבֹ֥וֹת), rēhōbatis, 'br, "Rehoboth City"; LXX Ρωθπάθα [Ρωθάδα], Ρωθόβαθ, or Rēbīt.

1. Probably "the city Rēhōbatis, Rēḥōbatis"; the Rēbit, the second of the cities built by Asshur in Ninua (RV by Nimrod) in Assyria (Gen 10 11). Unlike the other three, the exact equivalent of this name is not found in Assyriq literature. P. Delitzsch points out (Wo lag das Paradies? 2004) that Rēhōbatis is the equivalent of the Assyrian rēbīte, "streets," and suggests that the site referred to may be the Rēbit Ninua, "streets of Nineveh," mentioned by Sargon of Assyria in connection with the selection of this place as the residence of Ashur-hadda (Asshur-bani, or Dūr-Sarrukin; see Nineveh), and it was through this tract that Esar-haddon, his grandson, caused the heads of the kings of Kundi and Sidon to be carried in procession when he returned from his expedition to the Mediterranean.

Though the probabilities in favor of Rēbit Ninua are great, it is doubtful whether a suburb could have been regarded as a foundation worthy of a primitive ruler, and that a very important city, Assur, the old capital of Assyria, would rather be expected. One of the groups expressing its name composed of the characters Šag-uru, or, dialectically, Šāberi, the second element being the original of the Heb 'br. As the "center-city," Assur may have been regarded as the city of broad spaces (rēhōbatis)—its ruins are of considerable extent. The German explorers there have made many important discoveries of temples, temple-towers, palaces and streets, the most picturesque anciently being the twin tower-temples of Anu and Adad (Hadad). These ruins lie on the Tigris, about 50 miles S. of Nineveh. It practically ceased to be the capital about the middle of the 8th cent. BC. See Nineveh.

Rehum, rēˈhum (רֶהֵם), rēhām or ṛēˈham, ṛēˈham: (1) One of the twelve heads of the Jewish com-
REIGN, rān: The Heb word מָלַךְ, mālākh, may be rendered "kinghood," "royal dignity," "kingdom," "government" ("reign"). The vb is מָלַךְ, mālakh, "to be king" ("to reign as king"), "to become king," "to accede to the throne," "to assume royal power publicly" and, generally speaking, "to become powerful." In the NT γειτναία, kingly power, basileia, basileia, basileia, basileia, basileia. The word is used, either as a noun or as a vb, of Jeh (God), the Messiah (Christ) and men (kings, etc); then of such terms as sin, death, grace; of the woman in Rev and, conditionally, of the Christians; once, ironically, of the Corinthians referring to the time of reigning occurs in 1 K 6 1 (Solomon); 2 K 24 12 (Nebuchadnezzar); 1 Ch 4 31 (David; cf 1 Ch 29 30); 2 Ch 36 20 ("until the reign of the kingdom of Persia"); Neh 12 22 (Darius); Est 2 16 (Ahasuerus); Lk 3 1 (Tiberius Caesar). More often occurs the vb, "to reign," מָלַךְ, mālakh, basileuēin. It is applied to: (1) Jeh at the close of the song of Moses (Ex 15 19); "Jeh reigneth" (1 Ch 16 31; cf Ps 93 1; 96 10; 99 1; Rev 19 6); "God reigneth over nations." (Ps 47 7); "Jeh of hosts will reign in mount Zion." (Isa 24 23; cf Mic 4 7); "Thy God reigneth." (Isa 62 7); "Thou hast taken thy great power, and didst reign." (Rev 11 17, meaning, probably, "thou didst assume thy might"); (2) the Messiah (Christ) as a just and righteous king (Zec 16 5); an eternal king (Lk 1 33; cf Rev 11 15); punishing and subduing His enemies (Lk 19 14 27; 1 Cor 16 25).

(3) Men (kings, etc), in regard to the source of their power ("by me [i.e. the wisdom of God], they reign") (1 Ch 22 33); meaning "to have power or dominion." (Gen 41 42); in regard to the essential characteristic (Isa 14 1); in connection with the covenant of Jehovah and David (2 Sam 24 21); the word is used in Lk 1 30, in which the angel reminds the children of Israel of their demanding a king of him (cf ver 14); of Saul (1 S 13 1; cf 11 12); of Saul's son Ish-bosheth (2 S 2 10); of David (2 S 5 4; cf 1 S 31); of Adonijah (1 K 1 1); of all kings of Judah and Israel (in the Books of K and Ch); of the kings of Edom (Gen 36 31); of Bab, king of Canaan, Hazor (Josh 11 15); of Abimelech, the son of Jotham's fable (Jud 9 8 15); of Hanun, king of the Ammonites (2 Sam 10); of Rezin and his men in Damascus (1 K 15 24); of Hazael and Ben-hadad (2 K 8 8 13); of Esar-haddon, king of Assyria (2 K 16 7 17); Hezekiahu, king of Persia (Est 1 1); of Arbeela (2 K 22).

(4) In the NT the term basileuēin, "to reign," is used to illustrate and emphasize the power of sin, death and grace (Rom 5 14 17 21 and 6 12). Sin, the vitiating mental factor, is to be looked upon as being constantly and resolutely bent on maintaining or regaining its hold upon man, its power being exercised and reinforced by the lusts of the body. Death, the logical outcome of sin, at once testifies to the power of sin and its inherent corruption, while grace is the restoring spiritual factor following up and combating everywhere and always the pernicious influence of sin. It strives to dothrones sin, and to establish itself in man as the only dominating force. (5) In describing the future glorious aspect of the NT, the NT speaks of the power of God, the NT uses the expression of those who endure in faith; of 2 Tim 3 10 12; the NT speaks of "the purchase of the blood of the Lamb" (Rev 5 10); of those partaking in the first resurrection (Rev 20 6); of the servants of God, "they shall reign for ever and ever" (22 5); on the other hand, it teaches us not to anticipate the privileges of heaven, as all our Christian life is anything but satisfactory (1 Cor 4 5), and Rev 17 18 shows us the terrible fate of the woman, the great city (the corrupt church), "which reigneth over the kings of the earth." REINS, rānāz (רָנָּם, rānām; נְפֹרָים, nephōrām; נְפָרֶהַד, nephārēhan, nephārēhan, nephārēhan, nephārēhan; words promiscuously tr4 "heart," "inward parts," "kidneys" or "reins." The latter word, which is derived from Late reines through Off. reins, has given place in modern Eng. to the word "kidneys" [see Sket, Concise Etymological Dictionary of the Eng. Language, 398]. RV has, however, retained the older word, at least in the m, in all passages in which it is found in AV: According to Heb psychology the reins are the seat of the deepest emotions and all the passions of man, which God alone can fully know. Thus RV has substituted "heart!" for "reins" in the text of Job 19 27; Ps 7 9; 16 7; 26 2; 73 21; Prov 23 16; Jer 11 20; 12 17; 18 10; 20 12; 24 13 "inward parts" found but once (Ps 139 13). In one passage AV has tr4 the Heb בִּלְגָד ("loins") with "reins" (Isa 11 5), where the RV has rightly substituted "waist" (q.v.). The Gr word nephros (which is etymologically allied to the Middle Eng. nere, Ger. Niere; see Sket, ibid., 231, s.v. "Kidneys") is found in 1 Mac 24 22; Rev 23 22. See KIDNEYS.

REKEM, rē'kem (רֵקֶם), rekhem, "friendship").

(1) One of the five kings of Midian slain by the Israelites under Moses (Nu 31 8; Josh 13 21 [B, Pā'ak, Rhā'kem, A, Pā'ak, Rhā'kem]). Like his companions, he is called a "king" in Nu, but a "prince" or "chiefest" in the passage in Josh. The two references are hardly related; both are based on an earlier tradition.

(2) Eponym of a Calebite family (1 Ch 4 33 [Pā'ak, Rhā'kem]). Probably a town in Southern Judah. A town of this name is given as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18 27).

(3) A city of Benjamin, mentioned with Irpeel and Taralah (Josh 18 27); the site is unknown. See also RAKEM.

RELATIONSHIPS, rō-lā'shun-ships, FAMILY:

I. Consanguinity.

1. In General.
2. Parents and Children.
3. Brothers and Sisters.
4. Uncles, Aunts, Cousins, Kinsmen.

II. Affinity.

1. Husband and Wife.
2. Father-in-Law, etc.
3. Brother-in-Law, etc.

III. Other Domestic Relations.

1. Foster-Father.
3. Host and Guest.
4. The Dependent Stranger.

The family or domestic relations of the Bible include (1) those of consanguinity or blood relationship, (2) affinity or marriage relationship, and (3) legal convention. Those of consanguinity may be divided into lined and collateral groups; the former are those of parents and children, grandparents and grandchildren, and ancestors and descendants in general; the latter are those of brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts in relation to nephews and nieces, cousins of various degrees, including mere tribesmen and even remoter kindred. The relations of affinity include besides that of husband and wife or concubine, relations among rival wives, and their children, those of father-in-law and mother-in-law in relation to son-in-law and daughter-in-law, and those of brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law.

The domestic relations based on legal convention are either legal actions or the results of agreement: among the former we must include those of fosterfather or mother and foster-children; among the latter the relations between master and the various classes of servants and slaves held by the ancient Hebrews, those between host and guest, esp., where they became covenant brothers, and between the citizen and the stranger who bad attached himself to him for his protection.

I. Consanguinity. Genealogies were carefully kept by the ancient Hebrews (cf those of Gen, Nu, Ch, Ear, Neh, Mt, Mk), not only because they formed the basis of a man's title to his property (Nu 27 8-11; exceptional case, 36 1-12), but also because on certain degrees depended the right of the family to intermarry with the priestly caste. descent was traced through the father; a man's closest association was therefore with his father's family, and he was ordinarily referred to as the son of his father. Thus, e.g., the son of Abraham (Gen 25 19), Joshua the son of Nun, Caleb the son of Jephunneh (Nu 14 6). Still there are instances of men named for their mothers (Joab the son of Zeruiah), and a man's relation with his mother's family was fully recognized in the laws forbidding incest. No linear relatives were permitted to intermarry (Lev 18 7-10). The relations of ancestors and descendants were considered so close that the ordinary terms of relationship between children and parents are used constantly in relation to grandparents and remoter ancestors. The wishes of a great-grandfather are respected long after his death as the wishes of a father (Jer 35 16).

The father (ΖΗ, 'abh; σάρφη, patr) was the head of the family (mishāḥāth) or household (be-Ḥiv), which was a religious (1 S 20 62) Ex 12 3; Job 1 5) as well as and a social and political unit, consisting Children usually a combination of families in the modern sense. As long as polygamy prevailed, the family would include at least the several groups of children of the wives and concubines. The Bible represents the Hebrew father as commanding (Gen 50 18; Jer 35 6 ff; Prov 6 20), instructing (Prov 1 8; 4 1), and rebuking (Gen 37 10; Nu 12 14); at the same time, as loving (Gen 25 28; 37 4; 44 20), pitying (Ps 108 13), and blessing his household (Gen 27 41), rejoicing over its triumphs (Prov 10 1; 15 20), or grieving over its fortunes (Gen 37 35). The mother, too (2S, 'ēm; μητέρ, nētēr), naturally displays love and care (Gen 25 28; Prov 4 3; Isa 49 15; 66 13). To the Hebrew woman chilavness was considered the greatest of fortunes (1 S 1 10 ff, of Hannah; Gen 30 23, of Rachael). Children were looked upon as a blessing from God (Ps 127 3) and the defenders of the house (vs 4.5). In early life a child was more directly under the control of the mother than of the father; the mother was its first teacher (Prov 1 8). Thereafter the father was expected to direct the training of the son (2S, bēn; υἱός, ἱστερ, ἱκόν) (Gen 18 19; Ex 12 20; 13 8 14 7; Dt 6 7), while the daughter (ēh, bath; θυγατέρ, thygáter) probably remained with the mother until her marriage (Mic 6 7). Both parents are looked upon in the Law as objects of honor (Ex 20 12 | Dt 5 16 [the Fifth Commandment]; Ex 21 15; Lev 20 9; Dt 27 16; Prov 20 20; Ezk 22 7; Mic 7 5), obedience (Gen 8 12; Lev 19 18; Dt 18 18 ff, of parents); (Ps 18 19; 30 7-8), and love (1 K 19 20; Prov 28 21; 30 11). The control of parents was so great as to include the right to sell daughters in marriage, but not, without restrictions, into slavery (Ex 21 7 11; cf 21 16 ff; Fach 5 5), and never into a leper's house (Lev 20 29); they could chastise children (Dt 8 5; 21 18; Prov 13 21; of Ceclus 30 1-13), and in the early days even exerted the power of life and death over them (Gen 22; Jos 11 30; Lev 18 21; 20 2-5; 2 K 23 10; Ps 150 4). This power, at least for sacrificial purposes, was entirely removed by the Law, and changed, even for punishment, in the case of a stubborn, rebellious, glutinous and disobedient son to a mere right of complaint to the proper authorities (Dt 21 18-21), who were put to him to death. Infanticide by exposure, such as was common among other ancient peoples, seems never to have been practised by the Hebrews. That the children were nevertheless the chattels of the parents seems to be attested from the fact that they could be seized for the debts of the father (2 K 4 1). The father could annul the vows of his daughter (Nu 30 3-5), and damages for wrongs done to her were paid to him, as in Eng. law "for loss of services" (Dt 23 20). A widowed daughter might return to her father (Gen 30 11; 38 17), and be restored (Ruth 1 15). At his death the mother would become the actual, if not the legal, head of the household (2 K 8 1-6, the Shammamite woman; Tob 1 8, Tobit's grandmother; of the position of the mother of Jesus). This was esp. true of the queen mother (rēḇērēh), whose name is usually given in the accounts of the kings of Judah (1 K 11; 2 19, where a throne at the king's right hand was set for the king's mother, 11; 20, 14 21 15 2 10 18 22 22; 2 K 8 26; 10 13 14 2 15 23 18 2 21 11 23 21 31 36 24 8 12 15 18 2 Ch 22 2; Jer 13 18 22 26; see Queen Mother). While it is true that the position of the widowed mother depended to some extent on the will of her son (1 K 2 18 ff), it must be remembered that the sense of filial duty was highly developed among all classes in Pal (Josh 2 13 18 6 23 1 S 22 3 2 S 19 37; 1 K 19 20). The rebellion of children marked the apex of social degeneration (Mic 7 6; prov 30 11). Even the other children do 'great day', according to Malachi (4 5 [Heb 3 23]) is one of conciliation of parents and children.

The terms "father" (ΠΑ, 'abh; ἀδέλφος, adel-fōs) and "sister" (μῆτρα, abhē; adelphē, adelphē) apply to children of the same father and mother (Gen 4 2), and also to children of one father (Gen}
THE Lev (Gen 43 7; Lev 18 9; 20 17). The brother as well as the father was the natural protector of the honor of his children. Thus, the end of Jacob's speech (Gen 30 8) The Law strictly forbids the intermarriage of brother and sister, whether of the same father and mother or not. Whether born at home or born abroad, as a "disgraceful thing" (hezakah, a different word from hizqah, "kindly, good" (Gen 19 9, 11, 17). In earlier times marriage between half-brother and sister was allowable (Gen 20 12; cf 2 S 13 13). In fact, we are expressly told that the laws against incest were not obeyed by the Egyptians or the Canaanites (Lev 18 6 f; 20 23). Brotherly sentiment was highly developed (Gen 40 20; Josh 2 13; Prov 17 17; cf Lev 26 35; Dt 16 11 f; 25 3); the dwelling of brothers together in unity is considered good and pleasant (Ps 133 1). Brothers were ever ready to protect or avenge each other (2 S 3 27). By the law of the people, recognized though not necessarily approved in the Bible, that the brother or next of kin, the go'el, is expected to avenge a death (Nu 35 19 ff; Dt 19 6; Josh 20 3; 2 S 14 11), and no punishment is imposed (Lev 19 19), unless it occurs in a refuge-city. A brother was also expected to ransom a captive or slave (Lev 25 48; Ps 49 7). Half-brothers were of course not so near as brothers of the full blood (cf Joseph and his brothers), and it is not surprising that speak of a wife desiring and driving out the son of a harlot (Jgs 11 1, Jephthah). The words "brother" and "sister" are used frequently of more distant relationships (see below) and figuratively of a friend.

The Heb יֻדָּה, dohah (Lev 10 4, "uncles"; Nu 36 11, "cousins"; 1 S 14 50), coming from a primitive caressing word, possibly indicating "dandle," "fondle," "love," means both "uncle" and "beloved." Cousins, It is used of the father's and also of the mother's brother, and the correspond- ing fem. form יָדָה, dohah is used of the father's sister (Ex 6 20; cf Nu 26 59) and even of the father's brother's wife (Lev 18 14; 20 20). Intermarriage between nephew and aunt (i.e. father's sister, mother's sister, or father's brother's wife, or, in general, uncle's wife) was pro- hibited (Lev 18 12 14; 20 19 20); though nothing is said of intermarriage between uncle and niece nor between cousins (cf Nu 36 11). On the relations between uncle and nephew compare the Bible accounts of Jacob and Laban, Abraham and Isaac, David and Josiah, etc. In a more general sense the word dohah is used of kinsmen, Am 6 10 (where the dohah, "even he that burneth him" מָשָׁרָפָה, perhaps "maternal uncle"); Jev Enc, s.v. "Cremation," takes charge of a dead body; ben dokh is used of cousins (cf ben dokh "son of the brother of his mother," etc) and both dohah of a female cousin. For other relations of this and remoter degrees the word for brother is loosely used (e.g. of nephews, Gen 13 8; 14 14; etc; of tribesmen, Lev 21 10; and of more distant relatives, Dt 2 4 8; 20 17).

II. Affinity. — The husband (תִּשְׂבָּה, 'ish; cf תִּשְׂבָּה, ba'al, Hos 2 16; אֲבַרְיָה, 'abir), though in a sense leaving father and mother for his wife

The words "brother" and "sister" are used frequently of more distant relationships (see below) and figuratively of a friend.

The Heb יֻדָּה, dohah (Lev 10 4, "uncles"; Nu 36 11, "cousins"; 1 S 14 50), coming from a primitive caressing word, possibly indicating "dandle," "fondle," "love," means both "uncle" and "beloved." Cousins, It is used of the father's and also of the mother's brother, and the correspond- ing fem. form יָדָה, dohah is used of the father's sister (Ex 6 20; cf Nu 26 59) and even of the father's brother's wife (Lev 18 14; 20 20). Intermarriage between nephew and aunt (i.e. father's sister, mother's sister, or father's brother's wife, or, in general, uncle's wife) was pro- hibited (Lev 18 12 14; 20 19 20); though nothing is said of intermarriage between uncle and niece nor between cousins (cf Nu 36 11). On the relations between uncle and nephew compare the Bible accounts of Jacob and Laban, Abraham and Isaac, David and Josiah, etc. In a more general sense the word dohah is used of kinsmen, Am 6 10 (where the dohah, "even he that burneth him" מָשָׁרָפָה, perhaps "maternal uncle"); Jev Enc, s.v. "Cremation," takes charge of a dead body; ben dokh is used of cousins (cf ben dokh "son of the brother of his mother," etc) and both dohah of a female cousin. For other relations of this and remoter degrees the word for brother is loosely used (e.g. of nephews, Gen 13 8; 14 14; etc; of tribesmen, Lev 21 10; and of more distant relatives, Dt 2 4 8; 20 17).

II. Affinity. — The husband (תִּשְׂבָּה, 'ish; cf תִּשְׂבָּה, ba'al, Hos 2 16; אֲבַרְיָה, 'abir), though in a sense leaving father and mother for his wife

1. Husband (תִּשְׂבָּה, 'ishahb; יִבְרָיָה, gudh) (Gen 2 and Wife 24), under normal conditions remained a member of his father's family. If such passages as Gen 2 24; 21 10; 24 5 67; 30 8; less-favored wife (Dt 21 15, ‘hated’) was naturally unpleasant, and her relations with other wives of her husband decried bitterly—they were called each other’s nephews, lit. ‘breath’ (Rev ‘rivals’). Lev 18 18; 1 S 1 6, AV ‘adversary’; cf Eclesiu 37 11)—even when they were sisters (as in the case of Rachel and Leah, Gen 30 1). Hence the Law forbade the marrying of two sisters (Lev 18 18). Or the other hand so strong was the desire of a Heb mother for children that the chosen wife welcomed the children of a maid-servant born to her husband as her own (Gen 30 1–2, etc.).

In normal Heb society, for reasons already explained, the relations of a family with the husband’s parents (eph, hōthān, fem. eph, hōthāneth; tāḇēšāt, hāḇēšāt, ephēšāt, ephēšāt), were closer than those with the wife’s in-Law, etc parents (ēphēšēr, hāḇēšēr, fem. ephēšēr, hāḇēšērēneth; tāḇēšāt, ephēšāt, ephēšāt). Where under special conditions a man remained with his wife’s tribe after marriage, as in the case of Jacob, serving out his mōbar, or Moses fleeing from the wrath of the Egyptians, or the sons of Elimelech deposing in the land of Moab because of the famine in Pal, his identity with his own tribe was not destroyed, and at the first opportunity the natural impulse was to return to his own country. The bride, on the other hand, leaving her people, would become a member of her husband’s family, with the rights and duties of a daughter (Mic 7 6). Thus Judah can order Tamar burned for violation of the obligations of a widow (Gen 38 24). No doubt the position of the daughter-in-law varied in the Heb home between the extremes of those who vexed their parents-in-law unto the death (Gen 26 35; 27 46; 28 8) and the one who said to her mother-in-law, ‘Jeh do so to me . . . if I ought but death part thee and me’ (Ruth 1 17).

Parents-in-law and children-in-law were considered too closely related to intermarry (Lev 18 15; 20 12 14).

A woman’s brother acting in loco parentis might perform all the offices of a father-in-law and possibly be called hōthān (Gen 21 50 55; 24 3). Brother- 11 ff). Naturally, brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law would be considered too closely related to intermarry (Lev 18 16 18; 20 2). Nevertheless the husband’s brother (ēphēšēr, hāḇēšēr) was expected to marry the childless widow to establish the name of the deceased on his inheritance (Dt 25 5–10). This custom dated back to Canaanitic practice (Gen 38 8), and from the connection between marrying the childless widow and the redemption of land mentioned in Lev 25 23–26 was called part of the land law of Pal (Ruth 4 1–12; cf Jer 32 6 f). In practice the Levirate was probably considered more in the nature of a moral duty than a privilege (Dt 25 7; Ruth 4 6), and devolved not only on the brother, but on other members of a deceased husband’s family in the order of the nearness of their relationship to him (Ruth 3 12). In the Heb family brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law would form part of the same household. In this relation as in others we find both kindred friendship (David and Jonathan, 1 S 18 3; 2 S 1 26) and petty jealousies (in the matter of Moses’ wife, Nu 12 1).

III. Other Domestic Relations.—The Heb āḇēn, ‘father’, āḇēnām, fem. āḇēnāh, ‘beneath’ (participle of ‘āman), ‘father-in-law’, āḇēnāth, ‘father’, hōthēn, ‘father’, ‘nourishing’, ‘nursing’, ‘nursing mother’ (Nu 11 12; Isa 49 23), ‘nursing’ (Ruth 4 16; 2 S 4 4), or simply as the equivalent of ‘bringing up’ (2 K 10 1 5; Est 2 7). In the case of Absalom’s children, and possibly in the other instances referred to, the relation of foster-parents is suggested. The foster-children under such conditions obeyed the words of the foster-father as the words of a father (Est 2 20). Michal is spoken of as the mother of Merab’s two children (2 S 21 8) because she reared them (Sanhedrān 190). Adoption in the Rom sense was, however, hardly to be expected in a polygamous society where the childless father could remarry. Nevertheless, Jacob adopts Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen 48 5), and so the first sons of tribes. According to Jos, while Abraham was childless he adopted Lot (Ant, I, vii, 1), and the daughter of Pharaoh adopted Moses (Ant, II, ix, 7; cf Ex 2 10). In NT times the notion of adoption was so familiar that Paul uses the word figuratively of conversion (vōkhtēs, kaiotōthea, Rom 8 15; 9 4; Gal 4 5; Eph 1 5).

The ‘family’ as the word is used of ancient peoples included dependents. The Heb nāṣirēt is connected with the word shiphāhā, ‘maid-servant’, and the Li family and Servants for a discussion of the various classes of servants and slaves, Heb and foreign, male and female, see SLAVERY.

When Lot protested against betraying his visitors to the men of Sodom, forsooth as they had come under the shadow of his roof, and he even preferred to give his daughters to the mob rather than fail in his duties as a host (Gen 19 8), he was acting on the ancient principle of guest-friendship (of Gr. zōnia), which bound host and guest by sacred ties. In the light of this principle the act of Jacl, who receives Sisera as a guest, and then betrays him, becomes startling and capable of explanation only on the basis of the innate hatred existed at the time, and justifiable, if at all, only on the theory that all is fair in war (Jgs 4 18–21; 5 24–27). The nomads of ancient times and even the post-exilic Hebrews, like the Arabs of today, were bound by a temporary covenant whenever there was “salt between them,” that is, in the relation of host and guest (Ezr 4 14; of the expression “covenant of salt,” 2 Ch 13 5; Nu 18 19). In the early Christian church breaking bread together served as a sort of brāthūtān, or covenant of brothers. In legal terms, those of a kind, those at the table were members of the household (2 S 9 11, compared to sons; cf also 2 S 9 7 10 13; 19 28; 1 K 2 7; 4 27; 18 19). See HOSPITALITY.

The ġēr or stranger (as indicated by the expression “stranger” [Ex 20 10; Lev 25 6; Dt 5 14; 29 11; 31 12; cf of 1 16], Heb 4 The De- ħērōt, lit. “his stranger”) attached himself to an influential Hebrew for Stranger protection. Thus we read of a “sojourner of the priest” (Lev 22 10, tōshāb; of 26 6) who was in many respects a dependent, but still to be distinguished from a servant (Lev 22 11). The Mosaic Law commands that such strangers be treated with consideration (Ex 12 49; 20 10; 22 21 f; 23 8; Lev 19 33; Dt 1 16; 10 18; 14 21, etc; Ps 146 9) and even with love (Dt 16 14; Lev 19 34). See STRANGER.

RELEASE, rē-lēs’;—(1) The forgiveness of a debt (Ps 53 6; hēmīlāth [Dt 15 1.2 9; 31 10; see JUBILEE YEAR], with vb. shāmā, “to release,” vs 23. (2) To exempt from taxation (Ps 56 7; ḥāḇēshāh, “release,” “rest” [Est 2 18]). Some would render “granted a holiday.” (3) To set a prisoner or slave at liberty (āḇōḏāh, apōbōth, “to let go free” [Mt 27 15 | Jn 19 10], etc).

RELIGION, rē-lij’un; “Religion” and “religious” in Elizabethan Eng, were used frequently to denote the outward expression of worship. This is the force of ἐφησεῖα, ἐφησκέλα, τρία, "religion" in Acts 26:5; Jas 1:26.27 (with adj. ἐφήσκος, "religious"), while the same noun in Col 2:18 is rendered "worshiping" (NIV) or "would give (the exact meaning). And in the same external sense "religion" is used by AV for ἀληθεία, ἐπιστρεπτ., "worship" (so RV), in 1 Mac 1:43; 2:19.22. Other "Jews' religion" (or "religion of the Jews") appears in 2 Mac 2:15; 8:14, 38; 13:14 ("Ἰουδαϊσμός, Ἰουδαϊσμὸς, Judaism"); and "an alien religion," in 2 Mac 2:24 (ἐξωφύσεως, ἀλοφύσεως, "that belonging to another tribe"). The neglect of the external force of "religion" has led to much reckless misquoting of Jas 1:26.27. Cf Acts 17:22 and see SUPERSTITION. BURTON SCOTT EASTON.

RELIGION, COMPARATIVE. See COMPARATIVE RELIGION.

RELIGION, SCIENCE OF. See COMPARATIVE RELIGION.

REMAINDER, rē-män'dēr (יני), yëdhar, "to be left," ג'נין, shĕ'érith, "remnant"): In 2 S 14:7 "residue" would have been clearer (of Ps 76:10), but the changes of RV in Lev 6:16; 7:16.17 are pointless (contrast Ex 25:34).

REMAILAH, rem-a-lēh (רמайлה), a city in Judah, whose name has been identified with an ancient village in the Negeb, situated in the territory of Issachar named with En-gannim (Josh 19:21). It is probably identical with "Ramah of Judah" (1 Ch 2:57, and Jarmuth of Josh 21:29). It is represented today by the village er-Rameh, situated on a hill which rises abruptly from the green plain about 11 miles S.W. of Jenin (En-gannim). While the southern boundary of Issachar was, roughly, the southern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, the possessions of the tribes seem sometimes to have overlapped. See JARMUTH; RAMOTH.

REMISSION, rē-mish'ūn, OF SINS (ἀφέως, ἀφάτης, παρείς, παρεία): The two Gr. words, of which the latter occurs only in Rom 3:25, were τρία by the same Eng. word in Av. In Rv, παρεία is τρία "passing over." It is contrasted with the other term as precession with remission. Remission is the exemption from the consequences of an offence, forgiveness; precession is the suspension of the penalty (Philippi, Elliott, Trench [Synonyms, XXXIII]), Weiss; cf Acts 17:30). Cramer (Lexicon of NT Gr) regards the meaning of the two words as identical, except that the one refers to the OT and the other to the NT. Sins are remitted when the offender is treated as though the offence had never been committed. Remission is restricted to the penalty, while forgiveness refers more particularly to the person, although it may be used also of the sin itself. Remission is also used of offences against God's law; forgiveness, against other Divine or human law. See ABDUCTION; FORGIVENESS. H. E. JACOBS REMMON, rem'ōn (רמון), rimmôn, Josh 19:7). See REMMON.

REMMON-METHOAR, rem'ōn-meth'ō-ar, rem'ōn-mā-thōār (רמון מצוה, רמוןحا תרתואר) [Josh 19:13]). See REMMON, (3).

REMNANT, rem'ānt: Remnant is the tr of יב, yécher, "what is left over" (Di 3:11; 25:54; Josh 12:4, etc; of ננט, "remnant" in the AV of 3 S 8 AV; Isa 10:20.21.22; 11:16, etc; Zeph 1:8); more frequently of ג'נין, shĕ'érith, "residue," etc (2 K 19:4.31; 2 Ch 31:9; Ezr 9:14; Isa 14:30, etc). As the tr of the last-mentioned two words, "remnant" has a special significance in the prophecies of Isaiah, as denoting "a holy seed," or spiritual kernel, of the nation which should survive the impending judgment and become the germ of the people of God, being blessed of God and made a blessing (of Mic 2:12; 4:7; 5:7; 7:8; 7:15; also Zep 2:7; 3:13; Hag 1:12.14; Zec 6:8; Joel 2:32), Paul, in Rom 9:27, quoting from Isa 10:28f, ("the remainder of the house of Jacob," shall be saved"); cf also Rom 11:5 (where the word is ἐκκεννᾶ) with 2 K 19:4. Several other Heb words are less frequently tr "remnant": ἀθάνατον, "after"; yădhar, "to be left over," etc; in the NT (AV we have also laiptos, "left," "remaining" (Mt 22:6; Rev 11:3, etc).

For "remnant" RV has "overhanging part," (Ex 26:12), "rest." (Lev 14:18, etc); on the other hand, gives "remnant," "posterior," (Gen 45:7), for "rest." (Josh 10:20; 1 Ch 4:43; Isa 10:19), for "residue" (Hag 2:2; Zec 8:11, etc).

REPHAN, rem'fān. See REPHAN.

RENDING, ren'ding, OF GARMENTS. See BURLAP, IV; DRESS.

RENEW, re-nō': The word is used in various senses: (1) of material things, e.g. Ps 104:30; here it means to give a new appearance, to refresh, to restore the face of the earth; (2) in 1 S 11:14, of 1 Ch 5:20, etc, to establish more firmly the kingdom by reestablishing King Saul; (3) in 2 Ch 16:8, to rebuild or repair the broken altar; (4) in Lam 5:21, "renew our days," restore the favors of former days; (5) in Isa 41:1, 'let them gather together, or marshal their strongest arguments for answer;" (6) in Ps 103:5, ISA 40:31, it refers to the restoring of spiritual strength; (7) in the NT it invariably refers to spiritual renewal, e.g., Rom 12:2; 2 Cor 4:16; Eph 4:23; Col 3:10; Tit 3:5; He 6:6; all derivatives of sánás, rhádis, "new."—G. H. GERBERING

REPAIR, ré-pár (τεντέρ, maphēgh, "refuge"); in Joel 3:16, for AV "The Lord will be the hope of his people!" AVm renders "place of repair," or, "hut of repair." RV gives "refuge." Other words are ἔστρωμα, ἀσίλος, "to strengthen, to harden," "fix" (2 K 12:5 and often; Neh 3:1); ῥάπα, ῥαφάθ, "to heal" (1 K 18:30); ἄμαθα, ἀμάθαθ, "to cause to stand still" (Ex 9:9); ἱαύα, ἱάυα, "to revive" (1 Ch 11:5); τῇ σάβαρ, "to close up" (1 K 11:27).

In RV Apoc for ἀναθάφηκα, ἀναπράττω, "to patch up" (Sir 50:11); ἀνακαταστάλη, ἀστάθεσθαι, "to get ready" (1 Mac 12:37). In 1 Mac 14:34 occurs "reparation" (modern Eng. "repairs") for ἀπαρρίπτω, ἀπανθέσθαι, "straightening up."—M. O. EVANS

To get an accurate idea of the precise NT meaning of this highly important word, it is necessary to consider its approximate synonyms in the original Heb and Gr. The psychological elements of repentance should be considered in the light of the general teaching of Scripture.

1. OT Terms. In the Heb word הַנָּחַם, nāham, is an onomatopoeic term which implies difficulty in breathing, hence "to pant," "to sigh.
2. Repent, "to groan." Naturally it came to "to Pant," signify "to lament," or "to grieve," "to Sigh" when the emotion was produced by the desire of good for others, merged into compassion and sympathy, and when incited by a consideration of one's own character and deeds it means "to rue," "to repent." To adapt to our understanding, God is represented as repenting when a threatened penalty is at last to be inflicted, or when threatened evils have been averted by genuine reformation (Gen 6:6; Jon 3:10). This word is twice "repent" about 40 in the OT, and in nearly all cases it refers to God. The principal idea is not personal relation to sin, either in its experience of grief or in turning from an evil course. Yet the results of sin are manifest in its use. God's heart is grieved at man's iniquity, and in love He bestows His grace, or in justice He terminates His mercy. It indicates the aroused emotions of God which prompt Him to a different course of dealing with the people. Similarly when used with reference to man, only in this case the consciousness of personal transgression is evident. This distinction in the application of the word is intended by such declarations as God "is not a man, that he should repent" (1 S 15:29; Job 42:6; Jer 8:6).

The term ἀμαθή, shabb, is most generally employed to express the Scriptural idea of genuine repentance. It is used extensively by the prophets, and makes prominent the idea of "to Turn" radical change in one's attitude toward or "Return" sin and God. It implies a conscious, moral separation, and a personal decision to forsake sin and to enter into fellowship with God. It is employed extensively with reference to man's turning away from sin to righteousness (Dt 4:30; Neh 1:9; Ps 7:12; Jer 3:14). It quite often refers to God in His relation to man (Ex 32:12; Josh 7:26). It is employed to indicate the thorough spiritual change which God alone can effect (Acts 2:38). When RV has "return" it has reference either to man, to God, or to God and man (1 S 7:3; Ps 50:13 [both terms, nāham and shabb]). Isa 21:12; 66:7). Both terms are also sometimes employed when the twofold idea of grief and altered relation is expressed, they are τῇ "repent" and "return" (Ezk 14:6; Hos 12:6; Jon 3:5).

II. NT Terms. The term μετανοεῖν, metamoeik, literally signifies to have a feeling or care, concern or regret; like nāham, 1. Repent, it expresses the emotional aspect of "to Be repentance. The feeling indicated by Careful" or the word may issue in genuine repent. With" or may degenerate into mere remorse (Mt 21:29; 27:3). Judas repeated only in the sense of regret, remorse, and not in the sense of the abandonment of sin. The word is used with reference to Paul's feeling concerning a certain course of conduct, and with reference to God in His purposes of grace (2 Cor 7:8 AV; He 7:21).

The word μετανοέω, metamoeik, expresses the true NT idea of the spiritual change implied in a sinner's return to God. The term signifies to have another mind," to change the opinion or purpose with regard to the mind. It is equivalent to the OT word "turn." Thus it is employed by John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles (Mt 3:2; Mk 1:15; Lk 3:13). The idea expressed by the word is intimately associated with different aspects of spiritual transformation and of Christian life, with the process in which the agency of man is prominent, as faith (Acts 20:21), and as conversion (Acts 3:19); also with those experiences and blessings of which God alone is the author, as remission and forgiveness of sin (Lk 24:47; Acts 5:31). It is sometimes conjoined with baptism, which as an overt public act proclaims a changed relation to God (Mt 28:19; Mk 1:4; Lk 3:3; Acts 2:38; 13:24; 19:4). As a vital experience, repentance is to manifest its reality by producing good fruits appropriate to the new spiritual life (Mt 3:8).

The word ἐπιστρέφω, epistrepthō, is used to bring out more clearly the distinct change wrought in repentance. It is employed quite frequently in Acts to express the positive side of a change involved in NT repentance, or to indicate the return to God of which the turning from sin is the negative aspect. The two conceptions are inseparable and complementary. The word is used to express the spiritual transition from sin to God (Acts 9:53; 1 Thess 1:9); to strengthen the idea of faith (Acts 11:21); and to complete and emphasize the change required by NT repentance (Acts 26:20).

There is great difficulty in expressing the true idea of a change of thought with reference to sin when we translate the NT "repentance" into other languages. The Lat version renders it "exercise penitence" (poenitentiam agere). But "penitence" etymologically signifies pain, grief, distress, rather than a change of thought and purpose. Thus Lat Christianity has been corrupted by the pernicious error of proscribing grief over sin but not the abandonment of sin as the primary idea of NT repentance. It was easy to make the transition from penitence to penance, consequently the Romanists represent Jesus and the apostles as urging people to do penance (poenitentiam agire). The Eng.
word "repent" is derived from the Lat. *repens*iter, and inherits the fault of the Lat, making grief the principal idea and keeping in the background, if not altogether out of sight, the fundamental NT conception of a change of mind with reference to sin. But the exhortations of the ancient prophets, of Jesus, and of the apostles show that the change of mind is the dominant idea of the words employed, while the accompanying grief and consequent reformation enter into one's experience from the very nature of the case.

1. The Psychological Elements.—Repentance is that change of a sinner's mind which leads him to turn from his evil ways and live.

The change wrought in repentance is so deep and radical as to affect the whole spiritual nature and to involve the entire personality. The intellect must function, the emotions must be aroused, and the will must act. Psychology shows repentance to be profound, personal and all-pervasive. The intellectual element is manifest from the nature of man as an intelligent being, and from the demands of God who desires only rational service. Man must apprehend sin as unutterably heinous, the Divine law as perfect and inexorable, and himself as an offender and standing below the requirements of a holy God (Job 42:5-6; Ps 51:3; Rom 3:20).

There may be a knowledge of sin without turning from it as an awful thing which dishonors God and ruins man. The change of view may lead to action mainly to a desire of punishment and not to the hatred and abandonment of sin (Ex 9:27; Nu 22:34; Josh 7:20; 1 S 16:24; Mt 27:4). An emotional element is necessary involved in repentance. While feeling is not the equivalent of repentance, it nevertheless may be a powerful impulse to a genuine turning from sin. A penitent cannot from the nature of the case be stolid and indifferent. The emotional attitude must be altered if NT repentance is experienced. There is a type of grief that issues in repentance and another which plunges into remorse. There is a godly sorrow and also a sorrow of the world. The former brings life; the latter, death (Mt 27:3; Lk 18:23; 2 Cor 7:9-10). There must be a consciousness of sin in every repentant man and a relation to God before there can be a hearty turning away from unrighteousness. The feeling naturally accompanying repentance implies a conviction of personal sin and sinfulness and an earnest appeal to God to forgive according to Ps 51:1, 2:10-14.

The most prominent element in the psychology of repentance is the voluntary, or volitional. This aspect of the penitent's experience is expressed in the OT by "turn," or "repent." The words employed in the Heb and Gr place chief emphasis on the will, the change of mind, or of purpose, because a complete and sincere turning to God involves both the apprehension of the nature of sin and the consciousness of personal guilt (Jer 25:5; Mk 1:15; Acts 2:38; 2 Cor 7:9-10). The demand for repentance implies free will and individual responsibility. That men are called upon to repent there can be no doubt, and that God is represented as taking the initiative in repentance is equally clear. The solution of the problem belongs to the spiritual sphere. The psychical phenomena have their origin in the mysterious relations of the human and the Divine personalities. There can be no exterior cause for the internal change. Sackcloth for the body and remorse for the soul are not to be confused with a determined abandonment of sin and return to God. Not material sacrifice, but a spiritual change, is the inexorable demand of God in both dispensations (Ps 51:17; Isa 1:11; Jer 6:20; Hos 4:6).

Repentance is only a condition of salvation and not its meritorious ground. The motives for repentance are chiefly found in the goodness of God, in the Divine love, in the pitiable desire to have sinners saved, in the inevitable consequences of sin, in the universal demands of the gospel, and in the hope of spiritual life and membership in the kingdom of heaven (Ezk 33:11; Mk 1:15; Lk 13:1-3; Jn 6:26; Acts 2:38; Rom 2:4; 1 Tim 2:4). The first four beatitudes (Mt 5:3-6) form a heavenly ladder by which penitent souls pass from the dominion of Satan into the kingdom of God. A consciousness of spiritual poverty deterring pride, a willingness to surrender to God in genuine humility, and a strong spiritual desire developing into hunger and thirst, enter into the experience of one who wholly abandons sin and heartily turns to Him who grants repentance unto life.

REPETITIONS, rep-e-tish-‘unz: In Mt 6:7 only, "Use not vain repetitions, for the Father is batholôgos (so N), a word found nowhere else and spelled variously in the MSS, battolôgos in KL M, etc., batalôgos in FG, battalogos in D (probably influenced by the Lat batero, "talk idly"); presumably connected with bateros, battieros, "stammer," and perhaps formed under the influence of the Aram. bat (ba), "speak carelessly" or batel, "useless." Whether, however, battalogos means the constant repetition of the same phrase or the mechanical recitation of a long series of obscure or meaningless formulas (if, indeed, a distinction between the acts was thought of) cannot be determined. Either practice is abundantly evidenced as a "heathen" custom of the day, and either can be classed as "much speaking." See PRAYER.

REPHAEL, ref-a-’el, ref-’a-el (מִ買った, Rphah). The eponym of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26:7). The name occurs in Tob and En ("Raphael"); it probably belongs to a group of late formations. See Gray, HPN, 226, 311.

REPAH, re-’a (מִ جهة), rephah (the form is corrupt); Pádôn, Rhaphád: The eponym of an Ephraimite family (1 Ch 7:25).

REPHALAH, re-fal’-a, re-fal’-ya, re-fa’-a (מִ جهة), r’pháyyeh, probably "Jeh is healing"; LXX *Páfáda*í, *Rho- pháda*í. (1) In David's family, LXX also Rhiphát (1 Ch 3:21). (2) A captain of Simeon (1 Ch 4:42). (3) A grandson of Issachar, LXX also Riphárd (1 Ch 7:2). (4) A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 9:43; in 8:37 called "Raphah" (Rph‘eh); LXX also Raphai). (5) One of the repairers of the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3:9).

REPHAIM, re-fa-im, re-fa’-im (מִ جهة), r’phá’im, "a terrible one," hence "giant," as in 1 Ch 20:4, נְפֶרָיִים, y*télh há-á-rápháyy, "sons of the giant"; AV Rephaims: A race of aboriginal or early inhabitants E. of the Jordan in Asherith-karnaim (Gen 14:5) and in the vale of Rephaim S.W. of Jerusalem (Josh 16:8). They associated with... other giant races, as the Enim and Anakim (Dt 2:10-11) and the Zaanamim (ver 20). It is probable that they were all of the same stock, being given different names by the different tribes who came in contact with them. The same Heb word is rendered "the dead," or "the shades" in various passages (Job 36:15; Ps 68:10; Prov 2:18 m; 9:15 m; 21:16 m; Isa 14:9 m; 26:14.19 m). In these instances the word is derived from שָׂרֵפָה, šarphē, "weak," "powerless," "a shadow" or "shade."

REPHAIM, VALE OF (עֵֽגֶּר, ʿeğer, ʾemek ʾr-phāḥim; ʾemek ṝ-ʾēḇāḇ, ʾemek ṣ-ʾēḇāḇ). This was a fertile vale (Isa 17:5), to the S.W. of Jerus (Josh 15:15 8; 18:16; AV "Valley of the Giants"), on the border between Judah and Benjamin. Here David repeatedly defeated the invading Philistias (2 S 5 18; 22; 23:13; 1 Ch 11:15; 14:9). It is located by Jos between Jerus and Bethlehem (Ant, VII, iv; i, xii, 4). It corresponds to the modern el-Bīḵō, which falls away to the S.W. from the lip of the valley of Hinnom. The name in ancient times may perhaps have entered a larger area, including practically all the land between Jerus and Bethlehem, where the head-wateras of Nahr Rūbān are collected. W. Ewing REPHAN, rēʿfan: A name for Chiu, the planet Saturn. See Astrology, 7:20m.

REPHIDIM, rēʾphīdim (רַפְּהִדִּים, ʾr-phēḥīdim; ʾreḥēḏīm; ṣ-rēḥēḏīm). A station in the Wanderings, between the wilderness of Sin and the wilderness of Sinai (Ex 17:1,8; 19:2; Nu 33:14). The host expected to find water here; to their distress the streams were dry, and water was miraculously provided. Palmer (Desert of the Exodus, 158ff) states cogent reasons for identifying Rephidim with Wady Farān. It is the most fertile part of the peninsula, well watered, with a palm grove stretching for miles along the valley. Palmer speaks of passing through the palm grove as a "most delightful" walk; "the tall, graceful trees afforded a delicious shade, fresh water ran at our feet, and, above all, bulbuls flitted from branch to branch, "blessing with their sweet notes.”, The camp was pitched at "the mouth of Wady el-Aleyd, a large open space completely surrounded by steep, shelving mountains of gniss, the fantastic cleavage of which added greatly to the beauty of the scene. Palms and tamarisks were dotted all around and on every knoll and mountain slope were ruined houses, churches, and walls, the relics of the ancient monastic city of Parun. Behind our tents rose the majestic mass of Serbal, and beneath the rocky wall opposite ran a purling brook, only a few inches in depth, but still sufficiently cool, clear, and refreshing."

Such a place as this the Amalekites would naturally wish to preserve for themselves against an incursion by these desert dwellers, indeed, the possession of this watered vale may well have been a matter of life and death.

If this identification is correct, then Jobel Ṭaḥānēh, "Mount of the mill," a height that rises on the N. of the valley, may have been the hill from which Moses, with Aaron and Hur, viewed the battle. W. Ewing REPROBATE, rep-roō-bāt. This word occurs in the Eng. Bible in the following passages: Jer 6:30 (RV "refuse"); Rom 1:25; 2 Cor 13:5,6,7; 2 Tim 3:8; Tit 1:16. In all these cases it has the sense of "not-received," adokimos. The same Gr word, however, is found with other renderings in Isa 1:22 ("dross"); Prov 25:4 ("dross"); 1 Cor 9:27 ("castaway," "rejected"). The primary meaning of adokimos is "not-received," "not-acknowledged." This is applied to precious metals or money, in the sense of "not-current," to which, however, the connotation "not-genuine" easily attaches itself. It is also applied to persons who do not or ought not to receive honor or recognition. This purely negative connotation frequently passes over into the positive one of that which is or ought to be rejected, either by God or men. Of the above passages 1 Cor 9:27 uses the word in this meaning. Probably Rom 1:25, "God gave them up unto a reprobate mind," must be understood on this principle: the noise of the idolatrous heathen is permitted by God to fall into such extreme forms of evil as to meet with the universal rejection and reprobation of men. Wettstein's interpretation, "an unfit mind," i.e. incapacitated of properly performing its function of moral discrimination, has no linguistic warrant, and obliterates the word-play between "they refused to have God in their knowledge (οὐκ ἐδοκιμασαντο), and "God gave them up to a reprobate (=unacknowledged, adokimao) mind." Even Tit 1:16, "unto every good work reprobrate," affords no instance of the meaning "unfit," but belongs to the following rubric.

The close phonetic resemblance and etymological affinity of dokimos to the vb. dokimao, "to try," "test," has suggested the notion of "being tried," i.e. "tried," and its opposite of "being found wanting in the test" to associate itself more or less distinctly with the adj. dokimos and adokimos. Thus the more complex meaning results of that which is acknowledged or rejected, hence not rejected, but not approved or not approved itself in testing. This connotation is present in 2 Cor 13:5,6,7; 2 Tim 3:8; Tit 1:16; He 6:8. In the first two of these passages the word is used of Christians who ostensibly were in the true faith, but either hypothetically or actually were represented as having failed to meet the test. "Reprobate unto every good work" (Tit 1:16) are they who by their life have disappointed the expectation of good works. The "reprobate [rejected] land" of He 6:8 is land that by bearing thorns and thistles has failed to meet the test of the husbandman. It should be noticed, however, that adokimos, even in these cases, always retains the meaning of rejection because of failure in trial; of in the last-named passage: "rejected and nigh unto cursing."

REPROOF, rē-prōo-fē. REPROVE, rē-prōvē: "Reprove" in Elizabethan Eng. had a variety of meanings ("reject," "disprove," "convince," "rebuke"), with "put to the proof" (see 2 Tim 4:2 RVm) as the force common to all, although in modern Eng. the word means only "rebuke" (with a connotation of deliberateness). AV uses the word chiefly (and RV exclusively, except in 2 Esd 12:32; 14:13; 2 Mac 4:33 for ἔλεγξα, ἔλεγξα, and θερμω, ἔλεγξα, words that have very much the same amilities of meaning. Hence a fairly easy rendition into Eng. was possible, but the result included all the ambiguities of the original, and to modern readers such a passage as "But your reproof, what doth it reprove? Do ye think to reprover words?" (Job 6:23,25 ARV) is virtually incomprehensible. The meaning is, approximately: "What do your rebukes prove? Are you quibbling about words?" In Jn 16:8 no single word in modern Eng. will translate ἔλεγξα, and "reprove" (AV), "correct" (The VR), "counsel" (RV) are all unsatisfactory. The sense is: "The Spirit will teach men the true meaning of these three words: sin, righteousness, judgment." Burton Scott Easton REPTILE, rep'til, -tiil: Vug in Mic 7 17 has "rephtil for zohdil, "crawling things," ARV "worms of the earth," AVm "creeping things." See LEVIathan; LIZARD; SERPENT; TORTOISE.

REPUTATION, rep-ū-tā'shun: AV uses "reputation" where modern Eng. would use "repute," as connecting prominence rather than moral character. Hence RV's change to "repute" in Gal 2 2 (for δόξα, dōkā, "seen," perhaps with a slightly sarcastic touch). RV's alteration of "reputation," into "have in honor" (Acts 5 34; Phil 2 29) is to secure uniformity of tr for the derivatives of τιμή, timē, "honor," but RV retains "reputation in Super ven 44. AV's "made himself of no reputation" in Phil 2 7 is a gloss. See KENOSIS. On Eccl 10 1 see the commentaries.

REQUIRE, rē-kwīr: "Require" meant originally "seek after," whence "ask," and so (as in modern Eng.) "demand." All meanings are common in AV (e.g. 1 S 21 8; Ecc 3 15; Ezr 8 22; 1 Cor 4 2), and RV has made little change.

REWARD, rēr'wōrd. See REARWARD.

RESAIAS, ré-sā'yas, ré-sā'as (Psyrhos, Rhēzalas; AV Reesaias): One of the "leaders" with Zerubbabel in the return (1 Esd 5 8) as "Reelahah" in Ezr 2 21. "Reemiah" in Neh 7 7. The name is apparently duplicated in 1 Esd 5 8 in the form "Reelaisa.

RESEN, rē'sen (ע'צי), rezen; LXX Δαεος, Dæsēn, Δασις, Daisen): The Gr forms show that the LXX translators had "dē, for ḫ, r, but the reading of the MT is to be preferred. Name and Resen—the last of the four cities its Native mentioned in Gen 10 11.12 as having Equivalent been founded by Nimrod (AV by Assur)—probably represents the Assyrian pronunciation of the place-name Rēš-tini, "fountain-head." The only town so named in the inscriptions is one of 18 mentioned by Sennacherib in the Babylon inscription as places from which he dug canals connecting with the Tigris. It is one of the sources of Nineveh's water supply. It probably lay too far N., however, to be the city here intended. Naturally the name "Resen" could exist in any place where there was a spring.

The Boeotian Resin is site lying between Nineveh and Calah (Kouyunjik and Nimroud), it is generally thought to be represented

2. Possibly by the ruins at Selamiyah, about 3 miles N. of the latter city. It is noted Selamiyah worthy that Xenophon (Anab. iii.4) mentions a "great" city called Larissa as occupying this position, and Bochart has suggested it is that same place. He supposes that when the inhabitants were asked to what city the ruins belonged, they answered "La Resen," to "Resen," which was the name by the Greeks as Larissa. Xenophon describes its walls as being 25 ft. wide, 100 ft. high, and 2 parasangs in circuit. Except for the stone plinth 20 ft. high, they were of brick. He speaks of a stone-built pyramid near the city—possibly the temple-tower at Nimroud. See CALAH; NINVEH, 10. T. G. PINCHES

vōd; AV ditch (Isa 22 11). See DITCH; CISTERNS; POOL.

RESH, resh, rāsh (ם): The 20th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopedia as r. It came also to be used for the number 200. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

RESHEPH, ré'shef (רֶשֶׁף), resheph, "flame" or "fire-bolt": Personal name found in Phoen as a divine name. In the OT the name of a descendant of Ephraim, the eponym of an Ephraimite family or clan (1 Ch 7 25).

RESIDUE, res'i-dū. See REMNANT.

RESPRECT, rē-spekt', OF PERSONS: The phrase פָּרָשָׁה בַּעֲרָידה, nāṣīth pārāshā, means lit. "lift up the face," and, among other tr, is rendered indifferently "accept" or "respect the person" in AV (contrast Prov 18 11; 25 4 23). As applied to (a prostrate) suppliant, the phrase means generally "receive him with favor," and is so used in 1 S 26 35; Mal 1 8 9 (cf Gen 19 21, etc). By a shift in force the phrase came to mean "accept the person instead of the cause" or "show partiality" (Job 13 8 10 ARV), and is so used commonly. A literal translation is given ἐλεηθεροποιεῖ, ἐλεηθεροποιήσασα (Sir 35 13 32 16); Lk 20 21; Gal 2 6, with the noun προσωπολογία, προσωπολογήσασα, "face-taking" (Rom 2 11; Eph 3 13; Col 3 25; Jas 2 2). It is rendered uniformly "respect of persons" in RV. A noun προσωπολογισμός, προσωπολογημένος, "respect of persons," and a vb. προσωπολογίζω, προσωπολογήσασαι are found Acts 10 34; Jas 2 2. God's judgment rests solely on the character of the man and will be influenced by no worldly (Eph 6 9) or national (Rom 2 11) considerations. See also ACCEPT.

REST (גָּנַח, גָּנָה, מִנָּה), mānah, "cessation from motion," "peace," "quiet;" etc. בַּעֲרָידה, מַעֲרָידה, מַעֲרָידה אֵשֶׁת (מַעֲרָידה אֵשֶׁת): The above sense is of frequent occurrence, and is the tr of several words with various applications and shades of meaning, chiefly of the words given above.

It is applied to God as ceasing from the work of creating on the 7th day (Gen 2 2), as having His place of rest in the midst of His people in the temple (1 Ch 23 2; Ps 132 8 14); as resting in His love among His people (Zeph 3 17; RV "Heb, 'be silent'"). The 7th day was to be one of rest (Ex 16 23; 31 15; see SABBAT); the land also was to have its rest in the 7th year (Lev 25 4). Jeh promised His people rest in the land He should give them; this they looked forward to and enjoyed (Dt 12 9; Josh 11 23). "To rest" often means to come upon, as in the Spirit of Jeh (Nu 11 25 f.; Isa 11 2), of wisdom (Prov 14 33), of anger (Ecc 7 9). There is again the "rest" of the grave (Job 3 13 17 18; Isa 66 2; Dn 12 13). Rest is sometimes equivalent to trust, reliance (2 Ch 14 11, RV "rely"). Hence rest in Jeh (Ps 37 7, etc); "rest" in the spiritual sense is not, however, prominent in the OT. In the NT Christ's great offer is rest to the soul (Mt 11 28). In He 4 1 ff. it is argued from God's having promised His people a "rest"—a promise not fulfilled in the Canaan (ver 8)—that there remains for the people of God a "sabbath rest" (sabbatianos, ver 9). For "rest" RV has "solemn rest" (Ex 16 23; 31 15, etc), "resting-place" (Ps 132 8 14; Isa 11 10), "peace" (Acts 9 51), "relief" (2 Cor 2 13 7 5), etc. See also REMNANT.

RESTORATION, res-tōr-ā'shun: The idea of a restoration of the world had its origin in the preaching of the OT prophets. Their faith in the unique position and mission of Israel as the chosen people of God inspired in them the conviction that the destruction of the nation would eventually be fol-loved by a restoration under conditions that would insure the realization of the original Divine purpose. When the restoration came and passed without fulfillment of this hope, the Messianic era was projected into the future. By the time of Jesus the concept of the Messianic had been reduced to one more or less spiritualized, and the anticipation of a new order in which the consequences of sin would no longer appear was a prominent feature of the Messianic conception. In the teaching of Jesus and the apostles such a restoration was considered as granted as a matter of course.

In Mt 17:11 (cf. Mk 9:12), the moral and spiritual regeneration preached by John the Baptist is described as a restoration and viewed as a fulfillment of Mal 4:6. It is to be observed, however, that the work of John could be characterized as a restoration only in the sense of an inception of the regeneration that was to be completed by Jesus. In Mt 19:28 Jesus speaks of a regeneration (τονο-γενεσία, palingenesia) of the world in terms that ascribe to the saints a state of special felicity. Perhaps the most pointed expression of the idea of a restoration as a special event or crisis is found in the address of Peter (Acts 3:21), where the restoration is described as an ἀνακατάστασις πάντων, apokatástasis pánthōn, and is viewed as a fulfillment of prophecy.

In all the passages cited the restoration is assumed as a matter with which the hearers are familiar, and consequently its nature is not unfolded. The evidence is, therefore, too limited to justify any attempt to outline its special features. Under such circumstances there is grave danger of reading into the language of the Scriptures one's own conception of what the restoration is to be. We are therefore bound to the reconstruction mentioned in these passages contemplates the restoration of man, under the reign of Christ, to a life in which the consequences of sin are no longer present, and that this reconstruction is to include in some measure a regeneration of both the physical and the spiritual world.

Whether the benefits of the restoration are to accrue to all men is also left undefined in the Scriptures. In the passages already cited only the disciples of Christ appear in the field of vision. Certainly the benefits of regeneration are sometimes regarded as favorable to the more inclusive view. In Jn 12:32 Jesus speaks of drawing all men to Himself, but here, as in Jn 3:14-15, it is to be observed that while Christ's sacrifice includes all men in its scope, its benefits will doubtless accrue to those only who respond willingly to His drawing power. The saying of Caiphas (Jn 11:52) is irrelevant, for the phrase, "the children of God that are scattered abroad," probably refers only to the worthy Jews of the dispersion. Neither can the statements of Paul (Rom 11:32; 1 Cor 16:22; Eph 1:9-10; Col 1:20; 1 Tim 2:4; 4:10; Tit 2:11) be pressed in favor of the restorationist view. They affirm only that God's plan makes provision for the redemption of all, and that His saving will is universal. But men have wills of their own, and whether they share in the benefits of the salvation provided depends on their availing themselves of its privileges. The doctrine of the restoration of all can hardly be deduced from the NT. See also Punishment, Everlasting.

RESURRECTION, res-u-rek'shun (in the NT ἐκατάστασις, anastasis, with vbs. ἀναστήσω, anistēmi, "stand up," and ἐκρήξις, ekrous, "raise.") There is no technical term for the OT, but in Isa 26:19 we found the vbs. ἐκάτ, ἑκάθι, "live," ψπαθι, καθηρ, "rise," ὤτο, κηρ, "awake").

LITERATURE

1. Israel and Immortality.—It is very remarkable that a doctrine of life after death as an essential part of religion was of very late development in Israel, although this doctrine, often highly elaborated, was commonly held among the surrounding nations. The chief cause of this lateness was that Israel's religion centered predominantly in the ideal of a holy nation. Consequently the individual was a secondary object of consideration, and the future of the man who died before the national promises were fulfilled either was merged in the future of his descendants or else was disregarded altogether.

Much speculation about life after death evidently existed, but it was not in direct connection with the nation's religion. Therefore the OT data are scanty and point, as might be expected, to non-homogeneous concepts. Still, certain ideas are clear. The living individual was composed of flesh and nephesh, or life (a trichotomy appears to be post-Bib., despite 1 Thess 5:23; see Psychology). In the individual nephesh and ρύθη seem to be fairly synonymous words, meaning primarily "breath," as the animating principle of the flesh (so for the lower animals). But nephesh came to be used to denote the "inner man" or "self" (Dt 12:20, etc.; see Heart), and so in EV is usually rendered "soul." But there are only a very few cases where nephesh is used for the seat of the personality (a future life death (Ps. 115:17; Isa. 38:17; Job 33:18), and nearly all of such passages seem quite late. Indeed, in some 13 cases the nephesh of a dead man is unmistakably his corpse (Lev. 19:28; Nu 6:2; Hag 2:13, etc.). It seems the question of what survives death was hardly raised; whatever existed then was thought of as something quite new. On the one hand the dead man could be called a "god" (1 S 28:13), a term perhaps related to ancestor-worship. But more commonly the dead are thought of as "shades," ρύθηδια (Job 26:5, etc.), weak copies of the original man in all regards (Ezk 32:25). But, whatever existence such "shades" might have, they had passed out of relation to Jeh, whom the "dead praise not" (Ps. 115:17-18; Isa. 38:18-19), and there was no religious interest in them.

Indeed, any interest taken in them was likely to be anti-religious, as connected with necromancy, etc (Dt 14:1; 26:14; Isa 8:19; Ps 137:3).

3. Religious Danger

Concerning nations with foreign religions. Here, probably, the very fact that the surrounding nations taught immortality was a strong reason for Israel's refusing to consider it. That Egypt held an elaborate doctrine of individual judgment at death, or that Persia taught the resurrection of the body, would actually tend to render these doctrines suspicious, and it was not until the danger of syncretism from the Hellen past that such beliefs could be considered on their own merits. Hence it is not surprising that the prophets virtually disregard the idea that Eccl denies any immortality doctrine categorically.

The second, with a fuller knowledge of God, wider experience, and deeper reflection, the doctrine was bound to come. But it came slowly. Individualism reaches ex-

4. Belief in slowly. Individualism reaches ex-

Immortality plied in statement in Ezek 14, 18, 33 (cf. 29 20; Jer 31 31 39), but the national point of view still made the rewards and punishments of the individual matters of this world only (Ezek 14 14; Ps 37, etc.), a doctrine that had surprising vitality and that is found as late as Sir (1 13; 11 26). But as this does not square with the facts of life (Job), a doctrine of immortality, already hinted at (11, 1, below), is inevitable. It appears in force in the post-Maccabean period, but why just then is hard to say; perhaps because it was then that there had been witnessed the spectacle of martyrs on a large scale (1 Macc 10 60 64).

Resurrection of the body was the form immortality took, in accord with the religious premises.

As the saint was to find his happiness in the nation, so the body was restored to the nation; and the older views did not point toward pure soul-immortality. The "shades" led a wretched existence at the best, and St. Paul himself shudders at the thought of "the quick and the dead" (I Cor 15 51, II Thess 2 18). The rewards and punishments were uncertain quantities, and even the NT has no consistent terminology for the immortal part of man ("souls," Rev 6 9; 30 4; "spirit," He 12 23; 1 Pet 3 19; St. Paul avoids any term in 1 Cor 15 18, but is not explicit.

Yet the "souls" view is the only one that the old bodies will receive new souls (Ber. R. 2 7; 6 7; Vagg. R. 12 2; 15 1, etc.; cf Sib Or 4 187).

Where direct Gr influence is hidden, however, can be predicated, pure soul-immortality is found (cf Wis 8 19 20; 9 15 but Wis'ds true teaching is very uncertain; En 102 Concepts 4 105; 108; Slav En; 4 Macc; Jos, and esp. Philo). According to Jos (BJ, 11, v), the Eze is the core of this doctrine, but as Jos gracizes the Pharisaic resurrection into Pythagorean soul-migration (II, viii, 14; contrast Ant, XVIII, i, 3), his evidence is doubtful. Note, moreover, how Lk 6 9; 9 25; 12 4 5 hasrewarded Mk 3 4; 3 55 6; 4 56; 5 6; 8 56; 9 61; 10 50; 13 41-42, while it is commonly held that the souls in the intermediate state can enjoy happiness, a statement first appearing in En 22 (Jub 23 31 is hardly serious).

II. Resurrection in the OT and Intermediate Literature.—For the reasons given above, references in the OT to the resurrection doctrine are few. Probably it is to be found in Ps 17 15; 16 11; 49 15; 73 24, and in each case with increased probability, but for exact discussions the student must consult the commentaries. Of course no exact dating of these Ps passages is possible. With still higher probability the Resurrection shall be described in Job 19 25-29, but again alternative explanations are just possible, and, again, Job is a notoriously hard book to date (see Jos, Book on Ps). The two certain passages are Isa 26 19 m and Dnl 12 2. In the former (to be dated about 395 B.C.) it is said that the "righteous" shall fall on the earth and the "righteous" shall die never. But this resurrection is confined to Pal and does not include the unrighteous. For Dnl 12 2 see below.

In fact, resurrection for the righteous only was thought of much more naturally than a general resurrection. And still more naturally

2. The for resurrection of martyrs was thought Resurrection of, such simply receiving back what they had given up for God. See En 90 33 (prior to 107 BC) and 2 Macc 7 9 11. 14 46 (only martyrs are mentioned in 2 Macc); cf Rev 20 4. But of course the idea once given could not be restricted to martyrs only, and the intermediate forms exist. Early passages are En 91 10 (perhaps pro-Mac-

3. The Un- reservoir for , a motive for the idea in I Macc 12 13, for such men the condition of Sheol is not punishment enough.

For a general resurrection the motive is always the final judgment, so that all human history may be summed up. There is no such motive in the NT; there is not very common, and XII P, Test. Benj. 10 7 8 (Gr text); Bar 50 2; En 51 1; Sob Or 4 178 90; Life of Adam (Gr) 10, and 2 Esd 6 45; 7 32; 14 35 about account for all the unequivocal passages. It is not in the Talmud and Rabbis were uncertain.

4. Complete It is esp. interesting that the very Denial spiritual author of 2 Esd did not think it worth while to modify the categorically denial in the source used in 13 20. Of course, the Jewish party that persisted most in a denial of any resurrection was the Sadducees (Mt 22 23 and £; Acts 23 8), with an extreme conservatism often found among aristocrats.

III. Teaching of Christ.—The question is discussed extensively for the first time in Mk 12 18 27; Mt 22 23 33; Lk 20 27 38. 1. Mk 12: The Sadducees assumed that resurrection means that a person's soul is a single entity, and in the intermediate state soul, without a body. Hence there follows not only the truth of the resurrection, but a resurrection to a state so far above the sexual sphere that this and the angels. (The possibility of mutual recognition by husband and wife is irrelevant, nor is it even said that the resurrection bodies are sexual.) Luke (20 36) adds the explanation that, as there are to be no deaths, marriage (in its relation to births) will not exist. It may be thought that Christ's argument would support equally well the immortality of the soul only and, as a matter of fact, the same argument is used for the latter doctrine in 4 Macc 7 18 19; 16 25. But in Jesus and under the given circumstances this is quite impossible. And, moreover, it would seem that any such dualism would be a violation of Christ's teaching in the Sermon on the Mount.

However, the argument seems to touch only the resurrection of the righteous, esp. in the form given in Lk (cf Lk 14:14). But that Luke thought of so limiting the resurrection is disproved by Acts 24:15. Similarly in Mt 6:11 | Lk 13:22; 16:25. But, as a feature in the Judgment, the resurrection of all men is taught. Then the sedom, Tyre, Nineveh appear (Mt 11:22-24; 12:41-42 | Lk 10:14; 11:32), and those cast into Gehenna, are represented as having a body (Mt 9:43-47; Mt 25:30; 10:28; 18:9). And at the great final assize (Mt 25:31-46) all men appear. In the Fourth Gospel a similar distinction is made (6:39.40.44.54; 11:25), the resurrection of the righteous, based on their union with God through Christ and their present possession of this union, and (in 5:28.29) the general resurrection to judgment. Whether these passages imply two resurrections or emphasize only the extreme difference in conditions at the one cannot be determined.

The passages in 4 Mac referred to above read: "they who care for pious with their whole heart, they alone are able to conquer the impulses of the flesh, believing patriarchs who, as men, Isaac, Jacob and the patriarchs (16:25). It is distinctly possible that God's love works have been known to the author of 4 Mac, although the possibility that Christ approved and broadened the tenets of some spiritually-minded few is not to be ruled out; more probably the passages in 4 Mac influenced Luke's Gr phraseology. See Maccabees, Book of, IV.

IV. The Apostolic Doctrine. — For the apostles, Christ's victory over death brought the resurrection doctrine out of the realm of speculative eschatology. Henceforth it is a fact of experience, basic for Christianity. Direct references in the NT are found in Acts 2:17; 18:32; 23:6; 24:15; Rom 4:17; 5:17; 6:5.8; 8:11; 11:15; 1 Cor 6:14; 15:2 Cor 1:9; 4:14; 5:1-10; Phil 3:10.11; Col 1:18; 1 Thess 4:13-18; 2 Tim 2:18; He 6:2; 11:19.35; Rev 20:5 (martyrs only); 20:12.13. Of these only Acts 24:15; Rev 20:12-13, refer to a general resurrection with absolute unambiguity, but the doctrine is certainly contained in others and in 2 Tim 4:1 besides. A theology of the resurrection is given fully by St. Paul. Basic is the conception of the union of Christ with the believer so that every resurrection follows from His (esp. Doctrine Rom 6:5-11; Phil 3:10.11). Every deliverance from danger is a foretaste of the resurrection (2 Cor 4:10.10). Indeed so certain is it, that it may be spoken of as accomplished ( Eph 2:6). From another standpoint, the resurrection is simply part of God's general redemption of Nature at consummation (Rom 8:11.18-25). As the believer then passes into a condition of glory, his body must be altered for the new conditions (1 Cor 15:50; Phil 3:21); it becomes a "spiritual" body, belonging to the realm of the spirit (not "spiritual" in opposition to "material"). Nature shows us how different "bodies" can be from the "body" of the sun to the bodies of the lowest animals the kind depends merely on the creative will of God (1 Cor 15:38-41). Nor is the idea of a change in the body of the same thing unfamiliar: look at the difference in the "body" of a grain of wheat in its sowning and after it is grown! (Lk 12:17.) Just so, I am "seed" or "sown" in the world (probably not "buried") with one kind of body, but my resurrection will see me with a body adapted to my life with Christ and God (vs 42-44). If I am still alive at the Parousia, this new body shall be clearly mine (vs 53-55; 2 Cor 5:2-4). otherwise 1 shall be raised in it (ver 52). This body exists already in the heavens (2 Cor 5:1.2), and when it is clothes upon me the natural functions of the present body will be dispossessed (1 Cor 13:12). But, a mark for refraining from impurity is to keep undressed the body that is to rise (1 Cor 13:14).

The relation of the matter in the present body to that in the resurrection body was a question St. Paul never raised. In 1 Cor 13:14 it appears that he thought of the body as something more than the sum of its organs, for the organs perish, but the body is raised. Nor does he discuss the eventual fate of the dead body. The imagery of 1 Thes 4:16.17; 1 Cor 15:52 is that of leaving the graves, and in the case of Christ's resurrection, the type of ours, that which was buried was that which was raised (1 Cor 15:4). Perhaps the thought is that the touch of the resurrection body destroys all things in the old body that are unadapts to the new state; perhaps there is an idea that the essence of the old body is what we might call "non-material," so that decay simply anticipates the work the resurrection will do. At all events, such reflections are "beyond what is written.

A parallel to the idea of the resurrection body being already in heaven is found in Slav. En 22.8:9, where the soul "receives whatever is laid up for it" (cf Aoe. 7:22-25, especially Rev 6:11). But Christ also speaks of a reward being already in heaven (Mt 5:12). A more important question is the time of the clothing in 2 Cor 1:1-5. A group of scholars (Heinrici, Schmoller, Haermann, Clemens, Charles, etc.) consider that St. Paul has here changed his views from those of 1 Cor; that he now considers the resurrection body to be assumed immediately at death, and that translate vs 2:3 "we groan [at the burdens of life], longing to be clothed upon with our habitation which is from heaven": because, when we shall be clothed with it, we shall have no more nakedness to experience (Weizsäcker's tr of the NT). But 2 Cor would have been a most awkward place to announce a change of views, for it was written in part as a defence against inconsistency (1:17, etc.). The willingness to be absent from the body (5:8) loses all its point if another and better body is to be given at once. The grammatical reasons for the interpretation above (best sustained by Heinrici) seem to leave the text to read the verse something that simply is not there. Consequently it is far better to follow the older interpretation of Meyer (B. Weiss, Bousset, Lietzmann, Bachmann, Mezies, etc; Bachmann is esp. good) and the obvious sense of the passage: St. Paul dreads being left naked by death, but finds immediate consolation at the thought of being with Christ, and eventual consolation at the thought of the body to be received at the Parousia. (In Phil 1:21-24 this idea is expressed in the thought: Of a resurrection of the wicked, St. Paul has little to say. The doctrine seems clearly stated in 2 Cor 5:10 (and in 2 Tim 4:1, unless the Pauline authorship of 2 Tim is denied). But St. Paul is willing to treat the fate of the unrighteous with silence. V. Summary. — The points in the NT doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous, then, seem to be these: The personality of the believer survives after death and is with Christ.

1. NT Data But it is lacking in something that will make this body a body like to that of Christ. A body will be given in which there is nothing to hinder perfect intercourse with God. The connection of this body with the present body is not discussed, except for saying that some connection exists, with the necessity of a transformation for those alive at the end. In this state nothing remains that is inconsistent with the height to which man is raised, and in particular sexual relations (Mt 12: 25) and the process of nutrition (1 Cor 6: 11). For this end the whole power of God is available. And it is insured by the perfect trust the believer may put in God and by the resurrection of Christ, with whom the believer has become intimately united. The unrighteous are raised for the final vindication of God and the defeat of the Adversary. Two resurrections are found in Rev 20: 5.13 and quite possibly in 1 Thess 4: 16; 1 Cor 15: 23–24. Hence the phrase first resurrection; see also Last Judgment.

2. Interpretation. The “blanks” of this scheme the believer is naturally entitled to insert such matter as may seem to him best compatible with his other concepts of Christianity and of philosophy. As a consequence, opponents have almost always concentrated their attacks, and Christians have centered their defense, upon it. It is therefore of the utmost importance to give attention to the subject, as it appears in the NT. There are several converging lines of evidence, and none can be overlooked. Each must have its place and weight. The issues at stake are so serious that nothing must be omitted.

The first proof is the life of Jesus Christ. It is always a disappointment when a life which commenced well finishes badly. We have this feeling even in fiction; instinct demands that a story should end well. Much more is this true of Jesus Christ. This perfect life characterized by Divine claims ends in its prime in a cruel and shameful death. Is that a fitting close? Surely death could not end everything after such a noble career. The Gospels give the resurrection as the completion of the picture of Jesus Christ. There is no real doubt that Christ anticipated His own resurrection. At first He used only vague terms, such as, “Destroy this Temple, and in three days I will raise it up.” But later on He spoke plainly, and whenever He mentioned His death, He added, “The Son of man . . . must be raised the third day.” These references are too numerous to be overlooked, and, in spite of difficulties of detail, they are, in any proper treatment of the Gospels, an integral part of the claim made for Himself by Jesus Christ (Mt 12: 38–40; 16: 21; 17: 9.23; 20: 19; 27: 63; Mk 8: 31; 9: 33.1; 10: 34; 14: 58; Lk 9: 22; 18: 33; Jn 2: 19–21). His victory is at stake if He did not rise. Surely the presentation as a word of such value, that it was a testiment of itself. This is of the utmost weight. We are therefore compelled to face the facts that the resurrection of which the Gospels speak is the resurrection of no ordinary man, but of Jesus—that is of One whose life and character had been unique, and for whose noble death no proper explanation was conceivable (Deane, Jesus and the Gospel, 122f.). It is possible that, in view of His perfect truthfulness of word and deed, there should be such an anti-climax as is involved in a denial of His assurance that He would rise again (C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection, 30)? Consider, too, the death of Christ in the light of His perfect life. If that death was the close of a life so beautiful, so remarkable, so Godlike, we are faced with an insoluble mystery—the permanent triumph of wrong over right, of evil over good, of falsehood over truth or justice in the world (C. H. Robinson, op. cit., 36). So the resurrection is not to be regarded as an isolated event, a fact in the history of Christ separated from all else. It must be taken in close connection with the previous events; and the solution of the problem is to be found in that estimate of Christ which “most entirely fits in with the totality of the facts” (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 14).

Another line of proof is the fact of the empty grave and the disappearance of the body. That Jesus died was buried, and that the tomb in the morning was empty, is not now seriously challenged. The theory of a swoon and a recovery in the tomb is impossible, and to it Strauss "practically gives its deathblow" (Orr, op. cit., 223).

2. Second at Christ's burial a stone was placed Empty before it. Yet on the third morning the body had disappeared, and the tomb was empty. There are only two alternatives. His body must have been taken out of the grave by human hands or else by superhuman power. If the hands were human, they must have been those of Christ's friends or of His foes. If His friends had wished to take out His body, the question at once arises whether they could have done so in the face of the stone, the seal and the guard. If His foes had contemplated this action, the question arises whether they would seriously have considered it. It is extremely improbable that any effort should have been made to remove the body out of the reach of the disciples. Why should His enemies do the very thing that would be most likely to spread the report of His resurrection? As Chrysostom said, "If the body had been stolen, they could not have stolen it naked, because of the hair of the body and the clothes and the trouble caused by the drugs adhering to it" (quoted in Day, Evidence for the Resurrection, 35). Besides, the position of the grave-clothes proves the impossibility of the theft of the body (compare IV of Foundations, 216; Tertullian, On Christ, 14, 64; Strauss, The Resurrection Master; Expos T, XIII, 293 f; XIV, 510). How, too, is it possible to account for the failure of the Jews to prove the resurrection? Not more than seven weeks afterward Peter preached in that city the fact that Jesus had not been taken away; the grave-clothes were easier or more conclusive than for the Jews to have produced the dead body and silenced Peter forever. "The silence of the Jews is as significant as the speech of the Christians" (Fairbairn, Studies in the Life of Christ, 357).

The fact of the empty tomb with the disappearance of the body remains a problem to be faced. It is now admitted that the evidence for the empty tomb is adequate, and that it was part of the primitive belief (Pourtau, Resurrection, 134, 154). It is important to realize the force of this admission, because it is a testimony to St. Paul's use of the term "third day" (see below) and to the Christian observance of the first day of the week. And yet in spite of this we are still left to accept a mystery. And by some writers the idea of resurrection is interpreted to mean the revival of Christ's spiritual influence on the disciples, which had been brought to a close by His death. It is thought that the essential idea and value of Christ's resurrection can be conserved, even while the belief in His bodily rising from the grave is surrendered (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 23). But how can we believe in the resurrection when we regard the basis of the primitive belief in it as a mistake, not to say a fraud? The disciples found the tomb empty, and on the strength of this they believed He had risen. How can the belief be true if the foundation be false? Besides, the various forms of the vision-theory are now gradually but surely being regarded as inadequate and impossible. They involve the change of almost every fact in the Gospel history, and the invention of new scenes and conditions of which the Gospels know nothing (Orr, op. cit., 223). It has never been satisfactorily shown why the disciples should have had such a vivid experience of visions; nor why they should have had it so soon after the death of Christ and within a strictly limited period; nor why it suddenly ceased. The disciples were familiar with the appearance of a spirit, like Samuel's, and with the resurrection of a body, like Lazarus', but what they had not experienced or imagined was the fact of a spiritual body, the combination of body and spirit in an entirely novel way. So the old theory of a vision is now virtually set aside, and the disciples are left with the theory of a real spiritual manifestation of the risen Christ. The question at once arises whether this is not prompted by an unconscious but real desire to get rid of anything like a physical resurrection. Whatever may be true of unbelievers, this is an impossible position for those who believe Christ is alive.

Even though we may be ready to admit the reality of telepathic communication, it is impossible to argue that this is equivalent to the idea of resurrection. Psychological research has not proceeded far enough as yet to warrant arguments being built on it, though in any case it is difficult, if not impossible, to obtain material from this quarter which will answer to the conditions of the physical resurrection recorded in the NT. "The survival of the soul is not resurrection." "Whoever heard of a spirit being buried?" (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 229).

In view of the records of the Gospels and the general testimony of the NT, it is impossible to be "agnostic" about facts that are so large and obvious. If Jesus, even though we are quite sure that He who died now lives and reigns. It is sometimes said that faith is not bound up with holding a particular view of the relations of Christ's present glory with the body that was recorded when we are told that He is to be exercised in the exalted Lord, and that belief in a resuscitation of the human body is no vital part of it. It is no doubt true that faith today is to be exercised solely in the exalted and glorified Lord, but faith must ultimately rest on facts, and it would be "agnostic" about the historical facts of Christian faith to be "agnostic" with regard to the facts about the empty tomb and the risen body, which are so prominent in the NT, and which form an essential part of the apostolic witness. The attempt to set faith and historical evidence in opposition to each other, which is so marked a characteristic of modern thought, will never satisfy general Christian intelligence, and if there is to be any real belief in the historical character of the NT, it is impossible to be "agnostic" about facts that are so large and obvious on the face of the records. When once the evidence for the empty tomb is allowed to be adequate, the impossibility of any other explanation than that indicated in the NT is at once seen. The evidence for the empty tomb is not adequate and accepted by all. And so we come again to the insuperable barrier of the empty tomb, which, together with the apostolic witness, stands impregnable against all the attacks of vision-al and apocalyptic theories. It is becoming more evident that these theories are entirely inadequate to account for the records in the Gospels, as well as for the place and power of those Gospels in the early church and in all subsequent ages. The force of the evidence for the empty grave and the disappearance of the body is clearly seen by the explanations suggested by various modern writers (those of Oscar Holtzmann, K. Lake, and A. Meyer can be seen in Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, ch. viii, and that of Revile in C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection of Christ, 69; see also art. by Streeter in Foundations). Not one of these is tenable without doing violence to the Gospel story, and also without putting forth new theories which are not only improbable in themselves, but are without a shred of real historical or literary evidence. The one objection which baffles all these writers is the empty grave.

Others suggest that resurrection means a real objective appearance of the risen Christ, without implying any physical reanimation, that "the resurrection of Christ was an objective reality, but was not a physical resurrection" (C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection of Christ, 12). But the difficulty here is as to the meaning of the term "resurrection." If it means a return from the dead, a rising again (re-), must there not have been some identical appearance as that which was seen in the tomb, and the "objective reality" which appeared to the disciples? Wherein lies the essential difference between an objective vision and an objective appearance? If we believe the apostolic testimony to the empty tomb, why may we not accept their evidence? They evidently recognized their Master, and this recognition must have been due to some familiarity with His bodily appearance. No difficulty of conceiving of the resurrection of mankind hereafter must be allowed to set aside the plain facts of the record about Christ. It is, of course, quite clear that the resurrection body of Jesus was not exactly the same as it was when it was put in the tomb, but it is equally clear that there was definite identity as well as definite dissimilarity, and both elements must be faced and accounted for. There need be no insurmountable difficulty if we believe that in the very nature of things Christ’s resurrection must be unique, and, since the life and work of Jesus Christ transcend our experience (as the two similes they could do), we must not expect to bring them within the limitations of natural law and human history. How the resurrection body was sustained is a problem quite outside our ken, though the reference to “flesh and blood” (Acts 13:31) may suggest that the resurrection body was not constituted upon a natural basis through blood, but that it possessed “all things pertaining to a rational nature” (Church of England Article IV). We may not be able to solve the problem, but we must hold fast to all the facts, and these may be summed up by saying that the body was the same though different, different though the same. The true description of the resurrection seems to be that “it was an objective reality, but that it was not merely a physical resuscitation.” We are therefore brought back to a consideration of the facts recorded in the Gospels as to the empty tomb and the first appearances of the body of Christ. We only seek for an explanation which will take into consideration all the facts recorded, and will do no violence to any part of the evidence. To predicate a new resurrection body in which Christ appeared to His disciples in the same body which had been placed in the tomb was disposed of. Does not this theory demand a new miracle of its own (Kneen, Interpreter, V, 271)?

3. Third Proof: Transformation of the Disciples caused by the resurrection. They had seen their Master die, and through that death they lost all hope. Yet hope returned three days after. On the day of the crucifixion they were filled with sadness on the first day of the week with gladness. At the crucifixion they were hopeless; on the first day of the week their hearts glowed with certainty. When the message of the resurrection first came they were incredulous but convinced, but when once they became assured they never doubted again. What could account for the astonishing change in these men in so short a time? The mere removal of the body from the grave could never have transformed their thoughts and characters. Three days afterwards a legend to spring up which should affect them. There is needed for a process of legendary growth. There is nothing more striking in the history of primitive Christianity than this marvelous change wrought in the disciples by a belief in the resurrection of their Master. It is a psychological fact that demands a full explanation. The disciples were prepared to believe in the resurrection because they were in the tradition and the possibility of a resurrection (see Mk 16:11). Men do not imagine what they do not believe, and the women’s intention to embalm a corpse shows they did not expect His resurrection. Besides, a hallucination involving five hundred people at once, and repeated several times during forty days, is unthinkable.

From this fact of the transformation of personal life in so incredibly short a space of time, we proceed to the next line of proof, the existence of the primitive church.

4. Fourth Proof: "There is no doubt that the church of Existence of the apostles believed in the resurrection the Primitive History and Its Transmission, 74.) Church of their Lord" (Burkitt, The Gospel may be admitted on attention that the church of Christ came into existence as the result of a belief in the resurrection of Christ. When we consider its commencement, as recorded in the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, we are not surprised that the Christian society was gathered together by preaching; (2) the substance of the preaching was the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ was put to death on a cross, and would therefore be rejected by Jews as an accursed God (De 21:23). Yet multitudes of Jews were led to worship Him (Acts 2:41), and a great company of priests to obey Him (Acts 6:7). The only explanation of these facts is God’s act of resurrection (Acts 2:23), for nothing short of it could have brought the Jewish adversaries of Christ as their Messiah. The apostolic church is thus a result of a belief in the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The early chapters of Acts bear the marks of primitive documents, and their evidence is unmistakable. It is impossible to allege that the early church did not know its own history, that myths and legends quickly grew up and were eagerly received, and that the writers of the Gospels had no conscience for principle, but manipulated their material at their own will and gave an account of its history for the past fifty years or more (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 144). And it is simply absurd to think that the earliest church had no such capability. In reality there was nothing vague or uncertain about the testimony borne by the apostles and other members of the church. "As the church is too holy for a foundation of rottenness, so she is too real for a foundation of mist" (Archbishop Alexander, The Great Question, 10).

One man in the apostolic church must, however, be singled out as a special witness to the resurrection. The conversion and work of Saul of Tarsus is one of the next line of proof must be first called to the evidence of his life and writ- ing in relation to the resurrection. Some years ago an article appeared (E. Medley, Expos, V, 359), inquiring as to the conception of the resurrection which would be suggested to a heathen inquirer by a perusal of Paul. It is most extant writings. The point at least would stand out clearly—that Jesus Christ was killed (15; 4 14) and was raised from the dead (4:14). As this Ep. is usually dated about AD 61—that is, only about 22 years after the resurrection—and as the same Ep. plainly attributes the conversion of God in relation to men (1:16; 2:23; 3:11), we can really see the force of this testimony to the resurrection. Then a few years later, in another Ep., which was accepted as one of St. Paul’s, we have a much fuller reference to the event. In the well-known passage (15:3-11) where he is contrasted to Paul (not Christ’s resurrection, but) the resurrection of Christians, he naturally adds Christ’s resurrection as his own testimony to the former. I give a list of the various appearances of Christ, ending with one to himself, which he puts on an exact level with the others.
"Last of all he was seen of me also." Now it is essential to give special attention to the nature and particularity of this testimony. It is delivered unto you first of all that you might receive that Christ was found for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried; and that he was seen of them after that he (2 Cor 15:3 f.) raised from the dead 40 days according to the scriptures (1 Cor 15:3 f.). This, as it has often been pointed out, is our earliest authority for the appearance of the resurrection. It is part of the teaching which he taught that ‘Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he was raised again the third day according to the scriptures’ (Kennett, Interpreter, V. 267). And this passage, if I may say so, is a line of testimony to which we have a right to draw the same conclusion. That within a very few years of the time of the crucifixion of Christ, and to the evidence of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, we have in the mind of at least one man of education, absolutely irrefutable (Kennett, op. cit., V. 267).

Besides, we find this narrative includes one small but significant statement which at once recalls a very definite feature of the Gospel tradition—the mention of the "third day." A reference to the passage in the Gospels where Jesus Christ spoke of His resurrection will show how prominent and persistent was the mention of "third day." Why, then, should St. Paul have introduced it in his account of the Resurrection? Part of the teaching which he taught was that He ‘rose again the third day according to the scriptures’. It bears absolute testimony to the empty tomb? From all this it may be argued that St. Paul believed the story of the resurrection to be a "date when the collection fresh, when he could examine it for himself, when he could make the fullest possible inquiry of others, and when he himself was interested in seeing that it was made impossible for the adherents of Jesus Christ to maintain that that was not absolutely true. "Surely common sense requires us to believe that for which he was so passionately convinced beyond the possibility of doubt" (Kennett, op. cit., V. 271).

In view, therefore, of St. Paul's personal testimony to his own interview with those who had seen Christ on earth before and after His resurrection, and the prominence given to the "third day" in the Gospels, we may very reasonably address ourselves to the evidence for the resurrection. It is well known to Dr. Lyttelton and to Dr. Gibert West that Oxford University at the close of one academic year, certain drawing up again to give attention respectively during the long vacation to the conversion of St. Paul and the resurrection of Jesus, in order to prove the baseness of both. They met again in the autumn and compared experiences. Lord Lyttelton had become convinced of the truth of St. Paul's conversion, and Gilbert West of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. If, therefore, Paul's 25 years of suffering and service for Christ were a reality, his conversion was true, for everything he did began with that sudden change. And if his conversion was true, Jesus Christ rose from the dead. Paul was saved and he attributed to the sight of the risen Christ.

The next line of proof is that in the Gospels of the appearances of the risen Christ, and it is the most important as to the primary and major evidence. We must get behind them if we are to appreciate fully the force and variety of the evidence. It is for this reason that, following the proper logical order, we have rejected the last observation of the post-resurrection appearances of the risen Christ as given in the Gospels. The point is one of great importance (Demney, Jesus and the Gospel, 111).

Now, with this made clear, we proceed to the consideration of the accounts of the post-resurrection appearances of Christ. Modern criticism of the Gospels during recent years has tended to adopt the view of Swinburne, and that it is the source of our present evidence. It is not a question of the "one solid result" (W. S. Stone, "The Resurrection," 1CC, Preface, viii: Burkitz, The Gospel History, 37) of the literal criticism of the Gospels. If this is so, the question of the records of the resurrection is a different problem from the problem about the supposed lost ending of Mk, which, according to modern criticism, would thus close without any record of the appearances of the risen Christ. In this period, however, two things may be said at the present juncture:

(1) There are some indications that the entire question of the criticism of the Gospels is to be opened (Ramsey, St. Luke the Physician, ch. II: "The Evidence of Jesus, 63f."). (2) Even if the current theory be accepted, it would not seem the case that the intrinsic value of the records of the appearances of the risen Christ be undermined. Mark does not invent or "doctor" his material, but embodies the common apostolic tradition of his time (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 62).

We may, therefore, meanwhile examine the record of the appearances without finding them essentially affected by any particular theory of the origin and relations of the Gospels. There are two sets of appearances and altogether in Galilee and beyond. In each, the number and their amplitude and weight of their testimony should be carefully estimated.

While we are precluded from space from examining each appearance minutely, and indeed it is unnecessary for our purpose if we do so, it is impossible to avoid calling attention to two of them. No one can read the story of the walk to Emmaus (Lk 24), or of the visit of Peter and John to the tomb (Jn 20), without observing the striking marks of reality and personal testimony in the accounts. As far as the former is concerned it carries with it, as great literary critics have pointed out, the deepest inward evidences of its own literal truthfulness. For it narrates the intercourse of a 'risen God' with commonplace men as to set natural and supernatural modes of witness, for these are made impossible. To do this has always been the difficulty, the despair of imagination. The alternative has been put reasonably thus: St. Luke was either a greater poet, a more creative genius, than Shakespeare, or—he has not been a poet at all. He had an advantage over Shakespeare. The ghost in Hamlet was an effort of laborious imagination. The risen Christ on the road was a fact supreme, and the Evangelist did but tell it as it was" (Bishop Moule, Meditations for the Church, Year, 108).

It is well known that there are difficulties connected with the number and order of these appearances, but they are probably due largely to the summary character of the story, and certainly are not sufficient to invalidate the two facts which are shown in the two facts: (1) the empty grave, (2) the appearances of Christ on the third day. These are the main facts of the combined witness (Orr, op. cit., 212).

The very difficulties which have been observed in the Gospels of nearly nineteen centuries are a testimony to a conviction of the truth of the narratives on the part of the whole Christian church. The church has not been afraid to leave these records as they are because of the facts that they embody and express. If there had been no difficulties men might have said that everything had been artificially arranged, whereas the differences bear testimony to the reality of the event recorded. The fact that we possess these two sets of appearances—one in Jerusalem and one in Galilee—is really an argument in favor of their credibility, for if it had been recorded that Christ appeared in Galilee only, or Jerusalem only, it is not likely that the account might have been rejected for lack of support. It is well known that the weight of eyewitnesses is often very strong, while there is no question as to the events themselves. The various books recording the story of the Indian mutiny, or the surrender of Napoleon III at Sedan are cases in point, and Sir William Ramsay has shown the difficult problem of the "lost ending" of Mk, which, according to modern criticism, would thus close without any record of the appearances of the risen Christ. In this period, however, two things may be said at the present juncture:

7. Summary and Conclusion

The prima facie view of the evidence afforded by the New Testament suggests a miracle and that the miracles really believed in a true physical resurrection are surely beyond all question. And yet very much of present-day thought refuses to accept the miraculous. The scientific doctrine of the uniformity and continuity of Nature bars the way, so that from the outset it is concluded that miracles are impossible. We are either not allowed to believe (see Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 44), or else we are told that we are not required to believe (C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection of Christ, ch ii), in the reanimation of a dead body. If we take this view, "there is no need, really, for investigation of evidence: the question is decided before the evidence is looked at" (Orr, op. cit., 46).

It proves too much. We are not at all concerned by the charge of believing in the abnormal or unusual. New things have happened from the beginning of the present natural order, and the Christian faith teaches that Christ Himself was a new thing, and that His resurrection is "God manifest in the flesh," was something absolutely unique. If we are not allowed to believe in any Divine intervention which we may call supernatural or miraculous, it is impossible to account for the Person of Christ at all. "A false Personality would be a miracle in time." A rising out of this, Christianity itself was unique, inaugurating a new era in human affairs. No Christian, therefore, can have any difficulty in accepting the abnormal, the unusual, the miraculous. If it be said that no amount of evidence can establish a fact which is miraculous, we have still to account for the moral miracles which are really involved and associated with the resurrection, esp. the deception of the disciples, who could have found out the truth of the case; a deception, too, that has proved so great a blessing to the world. Surely to those who hold a true theistic view of the world this a priori view is impossible. Are we to refuse to allow to God at least as much liberty as we possess ourselves? Is the spontaneity of action on the part of God impossible? We may like or dislike, give or withhold, will or not will, but the course of Nature must flow on unbrokenly. Surely God cannot be conceived of as having given such a constitution to the universe as limits His power to intervene if necessary and for sufficient purpose with the work of His own hands. Not only are all things of Him, but all things are through Him, and to Him. The resurrection means the presence of miracle, and "there is no evading the issue with which this confronts us" (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 53). Unless, therefore, we are prepared to accept the possibility of the miraculous, all explanation of the NT evidence is a pure waste of time.

Of recent years attempts have been made to account for the resurrection in terms of ideas derived from Babylonian and other Eastern sources. It is argued that mythology provides the key to the problem, that not only analogy but derivation have been found. But apart from the remarkable variety of conclusions of Bab archaeologists there is nothing in their work of historical and worthy of the charge. The whole idea is arbitrary and baseless, and prejudiced by the attitude to the supernatural. There is no hint of connection between these oriental cults and the Jewish and Christian beliefs in the resurrection.

And so we return to a consideration of the various lines of proof. Taking them singly, they must be admitted to be strong, but taking them altogether, the argument is cumulative and sufficient. Every effect must have its adequate cause, and the only proper expression of Christianity today is the resurrection of Christ. Thomistic and Humean critics (G. F. Wells), no mean judge of historical evidence, said that the resurrection was the "best-attested fact in human history." Christianity welcomes all possible sifting, testing, and use by those who honestly desire to arrive at the truth, and if they will give proper attention to all the facts and factors involved, we believe they will come to the conclusion expressed years ago by the Archbishop of Armagh, that the resurrection is the rock from which all the hammering of criticism has never chipped a single fragment (The Great Question, 24).

The theology of the resurrection is very important and calls for special attention. Indeed, the prominence given to it in the NT

8. Theology of the Resurrection affords a strong confirmation of the fact itself, for it seems incredible that such varied and important truths should not rest on historic fact. The doctrine may briefly be summarized:

1. evidentiary. The resurrection is the thing which provides the atoning character of the death of Christ, and of His Deity and Divine exaltation (Rom 1:4); (2) evangelistic: the primitive gospel included testimony to the resurrection as one of its characteristic features, thereby proving to the hearts and consciences of the Divine redemption (1 Cor 15:1-4; Rom 4:25); (3) spiritual: the resurrection is regarded as the source and standard of the holiness of the believer. Every aspect of the Christian life and experience springs from, or is ratified thereby (Rom 8:11); and made like Christ's glorified body (Phil 3:21), thereby becoming spiritual bodies (1 Cor 15:44), that is, bodies ruled by their spirits and yet bodies. These points offer only the barest outline of the fulness of NT teaching concerning the doctrine of the resurrection of Christ.

RETAIL, ré-tāl'—Several Heb words are thus transliterated: ἄπειρον, ἀπέλευσα, "to hold fast" (Jgs 7:8; 19:4; Job 2:9 AV "hold fast"); Mic 7:18; τήρῳ, "to shut up" (only in Dn 10:8; 11:6); τήρου, τάρακ σα, "to hold" (Prov 3:18; 4:27; 11:16 AV "obtain"); in one case κατά, "to hold" (Dcr 8:8). In the NT πάρειν, krateō, is used in Jn 20:23 of the "retaining" of sins by the apostles (see Retention of Sins); in Rom 1:28, AV has "refused to have," m "G·, did not approve," for AV "did not like to retain" (echō); and in Philm ver 13, substitutes "fain have kept" for "retained" (katebēō). Sir 41:16 has "retain" for diaphulassō, "keep."

RETAILATION, ré-tāl-lā'shun, ré-tā'—See Law in the NT; Punishments; Retribution.

RETENTION, ré-tên'shun, of SINS (κρατης, krateō, "to lay fast, hold of" [Jn 20:23]): The opposite of "the remission of sins." Where there was no evidence of repentance and faith, the community of believers were unauthorised to give assurance of forgiveness, and, therefore, could only warn that the guilt of sin was retained, and that the sinner remained beneath God's judgment.

While such retention has its place in connection with all preaching of the gospel, since the offers of grace are conditional, there must be an assurance, given by the minister in the personal dealing of a pastor with a communicant, preparatory to the reception of the Lord's Supper. As the abolition is properly an assurance by an individual forgiveness, so the retention is an assurance of individual moral condition and the retention is exercised by the ministry. Not as an order, but as the representatives of the congregation of believers to whom grace is given, may we open it, with the advice given by Alford in his Test. on above passage. LITERATURE

The word as applied to the divine administration is not used in Scripture, but undoubtedly the idea is commonly enough expressed. The word means which God's wrath is "righteous" attributed to God; ἐκδίκεω, ἐκδίκης, ἐκδίκησις, ἐκδίκω, ἔκδίκωσις, and ἔκδικος, ἔκδικησις, "punishment"; besides στίγμα, κτίσω, κτίσα, and its derivatives, words expressive of judgment.

Rom 2 is full of the thought of retribution. The apostle, in vs 5, 6, comes very near to using the word itself, and gives indeed a good description of the day of wrath and judgment the righteous judgment of God, "who will render to every man according to his works." It is well in approaching the subject to remind ourselves that there is undoubtedly, as the apostle says, a Revelation of wrath. We are so accustomed to think of the gracious revelation which the gospel brings us, and to approach the subject of the doom of the impenitent, under the influence of the kindly sentiments engendered thereby, and with a view of God's gracious character as revealed in salvation, that we are apt to overlook somewhat the sternest facts of sin, and to misconceive the Divine attitude toward the impenitent sinner. It is certainly well that we should let the grace of the gospel have full influence upon all our thinking, but we must beware of being too fully engrossed with one phase of the Divine character. It is an infirmity of human nature that we find it difficult to let two seemingly conflicting conceptions find a place in our thought. We are apt to surrender ourselves to the sway of one or the other of them according to the pressure of the moment.

Putting ourselves back into the position of those who have come into the light of natural theology, we find that all deductions from the particular fections of God, as revealed in His works, combined with a consideration of man's sin and want of harmony with the covenant, lead to the conclusion announced by the apostle: "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men" (Rom 1:18). Wrath implies punishment, punishment is decreed, punishment is denounced. The word of God but confirms the verdict which conscience forecasts, Nature teaches that punishment, retribution, must follow sin. Within the sphere of physical law this is clearly exemplified. No breach of the so-called laws of Nature is tolerated. Strictly speaking, the laws of Nature are not laws, but habits which it is a matter of keeping in harmony with them, and the natural consequences will be trouble, punishment, retribution. Harmony with law is blessing; collision with law is loss. Thus law in Nature "worketh wrath" to the neglecters of it. Punishment necessarily results. So we may well expect that in the higher sphere, God's moral laws cannot be neglected or violated with impunity, and Scripture fully justifies the expectation and shows that sin must be punished. All things considered, the fact of punishment for sinners need not surprise; the fact of pardon is the surprising thing. The surprise of pardon has ceased to surprise us because we are so familiar with the thought. We know the "how of it because of the revelation of grace. Grace, however, saves on certain conditions, and there is no such thing known in Scripture as indiscriminate, necessary, universal grace. It is only from the Bible that we know of the salvation by grace. That same revelation shows that the grace does not come to all, in the same degree of saving grace. Though, of course, it may be considered as presented to all. Those who are not touched and saved by grace remain shut up in their sins. They are, and must be, in the nature of the case, left in their sins, with the added guilt of rejecting the offered grace. "Except ye believe that I am he," said Incarnate Grace, "ye shall die in your sins" (Jn 8:24).

Another conclusion we may draw from the general Scriptural representation is that the future retribution is one aspect of the natural consequence of sin, yet it is also in another aspect the positive infliction of Divine wrath. It is shown to be the natural outcome of sin in such passages as "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal 6:7); "He that soweth unto his own flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption" (Gal 6:8). It is not without suggestive power that the Hebrew word 'awon means both iniquity and punishment, and when Cain said "My punishment is greater than I can bear" (Gen 4 13), he really said "My iniquity is greater than I can bear"; his iniquity became his punishment. And, due consideration of the case, the fact goes a long way toward meeting many of the objections brought against the doctrine of future punishment.

The other statement, however, remains true and must be emphasized, that there is an actual infliction of Divine wrath. All the great statements about the Divine judgment imply this, and while it is wrong not to take account of the natural working out of sin in its terrible consequences, it is equally wrong, perhaps more so, to refuse to recognize this positive Divine infliction of punishment. This, indeed, is the outstanding feature of retribution as it assumes form in Scripture. Even the natural consequences of sin, rightly viewed, are part of the Divine infliction, since God, in the nature of things, has conjoined sin and its consequences, and part of the positive infliction is the judicial shutting up of sin within the sphere of the Divine wrath. For in the case of Cain, his iniquity became his punishment, inasmuch as God sentenced him to bear the consequences of that iniquity. On the other hand, we might say that even the terribly positive outpourings of God's wrath upon the sinner are the natural consequences of sin, since sin in its very nature calls down the Divine displeasure. Indeed, these two phases of future punishment are so very closely connected that a right view of the matter compels us to keep both before us, and no full explanation of the punishment is possible when either phase is ignored.

6. In the Scriptures applied to the doom of sinners all imply Divine displeasure, punitive action, retribution. The two outstanding Gr words for "wrath," ἐρήμωσις and θυμος, are both freely applied to God. Ἐρήμωσις indicates settled displeasure, whereas θυμός is rather the burning out of the anger. The former is, as we should expect, more frequently applied to God, and, of course, all that is capricious and reprehensible in human wrath must be eliminated from the word as used of God. It indicates the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin. It was an affection found in the sinned Saviour Himself, for "he looked round about on them with anger" ( Mk 3 5).

In the Baptist's warning "to flee from the wrath to come" (Mt 3 7), it is unquestionably the wrath of God that is meant, the manifestation of that being further described as the burning of the chalk with unquenchable fire (Mt 3 12). In Jn 3 36 it is said of the unbeliever that "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven to men" ( Jn 3 18), the great passage we have already quoted about "the wrath of God revealed from heaven." The connection is a suggestive one and is often overlooked. In the same passage Paul has quite a characteristic; he is ready to preach the gospel at Rome for he is not ashamed of the gospel; he is not ashamed of the gospel for it is the power of God unto salvation; it is the "power of God" for therein is revealed the righteousness of God by faith; and this salvation by faith is a necessity "for the wrath of God is revealed," etc. Thus the Divine wrath on account of sin is the dark background of the gospel message.

Had there been no such just wrath upon men, there had been no need for the Divine salvation. The despising of God's goodness by the impenitent means a treasuring up of "the wrath of the day and revelation of the righteous judgment of God" (Rom 2 3-5). God "visiteth with wrath" (1 Th 1 10).

In Rom 4 15 the apostle shows that "the law worketh wrath" (i.e. brings down the Divine displeasure), while in 6 9 he shows that believers are saved from wrath—undoubted wrath of God. The other two instances are in 2 29 when men are "the children of wrath" ( Eph 2 3); surely not "wrathful children," but liable to the wrath of God, and because of evil deeds cometh "the wrath of God upon the sons of disobedience" ( Eph 5 6; Col 3 6). Christ "delivereth us from the wrath to come" (1 Thes 1 10); wrath has come upon the opposing Jews (2 16); but believers are not appointed unto wrath (6 9). With all these specific passages in view, to say nothing of the general teaching of the apostle on the question of coming judgment and punishment, it is utterly impossible to eliminate the idea of the Divine displeasure against sinners, and His consequent retributive action toward them. Even Ritschl, who absolutely denies the great principle of retribution, of positive displeasure, admits that "Paul teaches that; hence the only way for him out of the difficulty is to reject Paul's teaching as unauthoritative. Other references to the "wrath of God" are in He 12 13; 4 13; and 6 passages in the Apocalypse—Rev 6 16 f; 11 18; 14 10; 16 19; 19 15. Two of the most terrible phrases in the whole of the NT. Θυμος is only used in the Apocalypse concerning God (Rev 14 10-19; 15 1-7; 16 1-19; 19 15). In each case it refers to the unanswerable, the blazing forth of the wrath; in the last two passages it is in passages in combination with ἐρήμωσις, and is rendered "fierceness," the fierceness of His wrath.

Ερήμωσις, which means to avenge, is twice used of God (Rev 6 10; 19 2); and ψαλίδωμα, "vengeance," 6 times (Lk 18 7 f; Rom 13 19; 2 Thess 1 8; He 10 30). In the first two instances it is used by Jesus concerning the Divine action: ἐρήμωσις, "wrath," is used in application to God (1 Thes 4 6); δίκαιος, "judgment" or "vengeance" is twice used of God (2 Thess 1 9; Jude ver 7). All of these terms shows that the punishment inflicted on sinful men is simply punishment upon the vindicatory sort, the vindication of outraged justice, the infliction of deserved penalty. Very significant is the passage in 2 Thess 1 6, "It is a righteous thing with God to recompense affliction to them that afflict you." There is no question of bettering the offender.

It is very remarkable that the terms in Gr which would carry the meaning of punishment for the good of the offender are never used in the NT of the infliction which comes upon the impenitent; these are παρεισπάντης and πανικωδής, and they are frequently used of the "chastisement of earners, but not of the impenitent. It is often claimed that the word κακοσμίας used in Mt 26 46 carries the idea of chastisement of the chaste for the removal of the offender, but although Aristotle in comparing poison to wine, "there is no reason to suppose that it is meant for the removal of the offender (what he really says is that it is not given to the sick, but to the living" it "has the punished one in view," whereas Aristotle in toxic is "harsh and severe but moderate" "the punishment of the living" "he may be satisfied")", the usage even in classical Gr is predominantly against making the supposed distinction. Reasons given by the leading classical authors, including Aristotle himself, and it is certainly clear that the thought of betterment can be in question, while all admit that in Hellenistic Gr the distinction is not maintained, and in any case ἐρήμωσις is also used of the punishment of the sinner (He 10 29).

All the representations of the coming day of judgment tell of the fact of retribution, and Christ Himself distinctly asserts it. Apart from His great eschatological discourses, concerning which criticism still hesitates and stammers, we have the solemn close of the Sermon on the Mount, and the pregnant statement of Mt 26 27: "The Son shall glorify Me in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then shall he render unto every man according to his deeds," and all the apostolic teaching upon the solemn theme is but the unfolding of the same great thought.

The conception of God as a perfect moral governor demands that His righteousness shall be fully vindicated. Looking at the course of history as it unfolds itself before us, we cannot fail to be struck with the amazing rightness of God's righteous conduct. Righteousness does not always triumph, goodness is often put to shame, wickedness appears to be profitable, and wicked men often prosper while good men are unhappy; and sometimes signal Divine interpositions proclaim that God is indeed on the side of righteousness, but too often it seems as if He were unmindful, and men are tempted to ask the old question, "How doth God know? And is there knowledge in the Most High?" (Ps 73 11), while the righteous say in their distresses, "Jeh, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph?" (Ps 94 3). The moral sense cries out for some Divine vindication, and the Scriptures, in harmony with the natural, indicate that the final judgment will bring such vindication.

In the OT it is frequently presented as the solution of the baffling problems which beset the ethical sphere, as for instance in that fine utterance of religious philosophy in 13:73; the Psalmist has before him all the puzzling elements of the human problem; the sporadic, isolated, and aggressive propensity of the wicked, the non-success, the oppression, the misery of the righteous; he is well-nigh overwhelmed by the contemplation, and nearly loses his footing on the eternal verities, until he carries the whole problem into the light of God's presence and revelation, and then he understands that the end will bring the true solution.

Some such sadder and more somber ruminations of the Prescher upon the contradictions and anomalies and mysteries of human life, "under the sun," close in the reflection which throws its searchlight upon all the blackness: "This is the end of the matter: . . . Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every work into judgment, with every hidden thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil" (Eccl 12:13). In the light of the same truth, the apostles labored, believing that when the Lord comes He "will bring both to light the counsels of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts" (1 Cor 4:5). The more fully the subject is considered, the more we must feel that for the vindication of righteousness, the justification of the Divine procedure, the rectification of the spirit of the age, the vindication of mysteries, the reward and triumph of the righteous and the confession and punishment of the wicked, a great final, retributive judgment is Scriptural, necessary, necessary.

Reu, ru'ân (רָעָן), rû'ân; Ru'ôn; Reuôn: A son of Peleg, a descendant of Shem (Gen 11:18 ff.; 1 Ch 1:25; Lk 3:35).

Reuben, rōôben, rû'ûn (רֹעֶן), rû'ûn; Reôwûn, Rhôâbôn: The eldest son of Jacob, born to him by Leah in Padan-aram (Gen 19:39). It is the Eldest Son two derivations of the name. As it stands in MT it means "beloved of a son"; but the reason given for so calling him is "the Lord hath looked upon my affliction," which in Heb is ru'ôn, "he hath looked on the bane." In his boyhood we have only the story of the mandrakes (Gen 30:14). As the firstborn he should really have been leader among his father's sons. His birthright was forfeited by a deed of peculiar infamy (35:22), and as far as we know his tribe never took the lead in Israel. It is named first, indeed, in Num 1:52, but thereafter it falls to the fourth place, Judah taking the first (2:10, etc.). To Reuben's intervention Joseph owed his escape from the fate prepared by his brothers (Gen 37:29). Some have thought Reuben designed to set him free, from a desire to rehabilitate himself with his father. But there is no need to deny to Reuben certain noble and chivalrous qualities. Jacob seems to have appreciated these, and, perhaps, therefore all the more deeply lamented the lapse that spoiled his life (Gen 49:3). It was Reuben who felt that their perils and anxieties in Egypt were a fit recompense for the unbrotherly conduct (42:22). To assure his father of Benjamin's safety Joseph asked him to be taken, Reuben was ready to pledge his own two sons (ver 37). Four sons born to him in Canaan went down with Reuben at the descent of Israel into Egypt (46:1ab).

The incidents recorded are received by a certain school of OT scholars as the vague and fragmentary traditions of the tribe, wrought into the form of a biography of the supposed ancestor of the tribe. This interpretation raises more difficulties than it solves, and the cohesion upon too many assumptions and conjectures. The narrative as it stands is quite intelligible and self-consistent. There is no good reason to doubt that, as far as it goes, it is an authentic record of the life of Jacob's son.

At the first census in the wilderness Reuben numbered 46,500 men of war (Nu 1:21); at the second they had fallen to 43,730; see 2. Tribal History.

The Reubenite among the spies was Shammus ben Zaccur (13:4). It is possible that the conspiracy against Moses organized by Reuben, Simeon and Gad, with the assistance of Korah the Levite (Nu 16), was an attempt on the part of the tribe to assert its rights as representing the firstborn. It is significant that the children of Korah did not perish (Deut 1:11). Mention of mysterious "the reward and triumph of the righteous and the confession and punishment of the wicked, a great final, retributive judgment is Scriptural, necessary, necessary.

2. Tribal History. NUMEROS. The standard of the camp of Reuben was that of the family of Shem, the first son, in the tabernacle; and with him were Simeon and Gad; the total number of fighting men in this division being 151,450. Tg Pseudojoh says that the standard was a deer, with the legend "Hear O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord." On the march this division took the second place (Nu 2:10). The prince of the tribe was Elizur ben Shedeur, whose oblation is described in 7:30 ff. The Reubenites among the spies was Shammus ben Zaccur (13:4). It is possible that the conspiracy against Moses organized by Reuben, Simeon and Gad, with the assistance of Korah the Levite (Nu 16), was an attempt on the part of the tribe to assert its rights as representing the firstborn. It is significant that the children of Korah did not perish (Deut 1:11). Moses' "mind be traced in his "blessing," wishing for the continuance of the tribe, indeed, but not in great strength (Dt 33:6)? This was a true forecast of the tribal history.

When the high plateau E. of the Dead Sea and the Jordan fell into the hands of the Israelite invaders, these spacious pastoral uplands irresistibly attracted the great flock-masters of Reuben and Gad, two tribes destined to be neighbors during succeeding centuries. At their earnest request Moses allowed them their tribal possessions here subject to one condition, which they loyally accepted. They should not "sit here," and so discourage their brethren who went to war beyond the Jordan. They should provide for the security of their cattle, fortify cities to protect their little ones and their wives from the inhabitants of the land, and their men of war should go before the host in the campaign of conquest until the children of Israel should take possession. The conditions of inheritance (Nu 32:1-27). Of the actual part they took in that warfare there is no record, but perhaps "the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben" (Josh 15:6; 18:17) marked some memorable deed of valor by a member of the tribe. At the end of the campaign the men of Reuben, having earned the gratitude of the western tribes, enriched by their share of the spoils of the enemy, returned with honor to their new home. Along with their brethren of Gad they felt the dangers attaching to their position of isolation, cut off from the rest of their people by the great cleft of the Jordan valley. They reared therefore the massive altar of Ed in the valley, so that in the very throat of that instrument of severance there might be a perpetual witness to themselves and to their children of the fate that befell the Reubenites. But many tribes misunderstood the action and, dreading religious schism, gathered in force to stamp it out. Explanations followed which were entirely satisfactory, and a threatening danger was averted (Josh 22).

It is possible that the tribal history of Reuben, which, as subsequent history was to prove, the Jordan valley was but one of many causes of sundering. The whole circumstances and conditions of life on the E. differed widely from those on the W. of the river, pastoral pursuits and life in the open being contrasted with agricultural and city life.
The land given by Moses to the tribe of Reuben reached from the Arnon, Wady el-Mo'ib, in the S., to the border of Gad in the N. In Nu 32:34 Gad gave to Reuben a tract which lay far S., Aroer being on the very top of the Arnon; but they probably were probably to be taken as an enclave in the territory of Reuben. From Josh 13:15ff it is clear that the northern border ran from some point N. of the Dead Sea in a direction E.N.E., passing to the N. of Heshbon. The Dead Sea is itself the western boundary, and it marched with the desert on the E. No doubt many districts changed hands in the course of the history. At the invasion of Tiglath-pileser, e.g., we read that Aroer was in the hands of the Reubenites, "and even unto the entrance of the wilderness from the river Euphrates" (1 Ch 5:8f). Bezer the city of refuge lay in Reuben's territory (Josh 20:8, etc.). A general description of the country will be found under Moab, while the cities of Reuben are dealt with in separate articles.

Reuben and Gad, occupying contiguous districts, and even, as we have seen, to some extent overlapping, are closely associated in the history. Neither took part in the glorious struggle against Sisera (Jgs 5:15ff). Already apparently the sunsetting influence was taking effect. They are not excepted, however, from "all the tribes of Israel" that sent contingents for the war against Benjamin (Jgs 20:10; 21:5), and the reference in 5:15 seems to show that Reuben might have done great things had he been disposed. The tribe therefore was still powerful, but perhaps absorbed by anxieties as to its relations with neighboring peoples. In guarding their numerous flocks against attack from the S., and sudden invasions from the desert, a warlike spirit and martial prowess were developed. They were "valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword, and to shoot with bow, and skilful in war" (1 Ch 5:18). They overwhelmed the Hagrites with Jeth and Naphish and Nodab, and greatly enriched themselves with the spoil. In recording the raid the Chronicler pays a compliment to their religious loyalty: "They cried to God in the battle, and he was entreated of them, because they put their trust in him" (5:19ff). Along with Gad and Maassah they sent a contingent of 120,000 men "with all manner of instruments of war for the battle, . . . men of war, that could order the battle array," men who "came with a perfect heart to Hebron, to make David king" (12:37f). Among David's mighty men was Adish'az, chief of the Reubenites, and thirty with him (11:42). In the 40th year of David's reign overseers were set over the Reubenites "for every matter pertaining to God, and for the affairs of the king" (26:22). Perhaps in spite of the help given to David the Reubenites had never quite got over their old loyalty to the house of Saul. At any rate, when disruption came they joined the Northern Kingdom (1 K 11:31).

The subsequent history of the tribe is left in much obscurity. Exposed as they were to hostile influences of Mesopotamia, and cut off from fellowship with their brethren in worship, in their isolation they probably found the descent into idolatry all too easy, and the once powerful tribe sank into comparative insignificance. Of the immediate causes of this decline we have no knowledge. Moab established its authority over the land that had belonged to Reuben; and Mesha, in his inscription (M S), while he speaks of Gad, does not think Reuben worthy of mention. They had probably become largely absorbed in the northem tribes, and were numbered as suffering in the invasion of Hazael during the reign of Jehu (2 K 10:32f). That "they trespassed against the God of their fathers, and played the harlot after the gods of the peoples of the land" is given as the reason for the fate that befell them at the hands of Pul, king of Assyria, who carried them away, "and brought them unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river of Gozan" (1 Ch 5:25f).

The resemblance of Reuben's case to that of Simeon is striking, for Simeon also appears to have been practically absorbed in the tribe of Judah. The prestige that should have been Reuben's in virtue of his birthright is said to have passed to Joseph (1 Ch 5:1). And the place of Reuben and Simeon in the march of Israel is taken by Judah, a fact referred to in the blessing of Jacob (Gen 48:6). Ezechiel finds a place for Reuben in his picture of restored Israel (48:6). He appears also—in this case preceded by Judah only—in Rev 7:5.

REUBENITES, רְוֶּבֶן-יִשְׂרָאֵל (טֹּם־יֵשָׂרֵאֵל), כֹּחַ־רְעָה־כָּנָה; שְׁעֹלָה פַּעַמְיָה, דֶּנְמוֹ רַבּוּבָה: Members of the tribe of Reuben (Nu 26:7, etc.). Adina, one of David's mighty men, was a Reubenite (1 Ch 11:42).

REUEL, רֵוְעֵל (רֵוֶּעְּל), רְעֵאל, "God is his friend"; LXX Παυσόφης, Ραγουόλ: (1) In the genealogical system Reuel is both a son of Esau by Basemat (Gen 36:4; 10.13; 17; 1 Ch 1:35); and the father of the father-in-law of Moses, Hobab (Nu 10:29). In the account of the marriage of Zipporah to Moses (Ex 2:16-21) Jethro seems to be called Reuel (of Hobab). The various names of Jethro perplexed the Talmudists, too; some held that his real name was "Hobab," and that Reuel was his father. Reuel is probably a clan name, "Nu," "HCO," and Hobab is a member of the clan ("son") of Reuel (Nu 10:29 AV reads "Raguel"). (2) The father of Eliasuaph, the prince of Gad (Nu 2:14), called (by some copyists' mistake) "D'uel" in 1:14; 7:42-47; 19:29. LXX has uniformly Ragouol.

(3) A Benjamite (1 Ch 9:8).

REUMAH, רְוֶּמָה (רַם), רִעֲמָה: The confluence of Nahor (Gen 24:24).

LITERATURE I. The Nature of Revelation.—The religion of the Bible is a frankly supernatural religion. By this is not meant merely that, according to it, all men, as creatures, live, move and have their being in God. It is meant that, according to it, God has intervened extraordinarily in the course of the sinful world's development, for the salvation of men otherwise lost. In Eden the Lord God had been present with sinless man in such a sense as to form a distinct element in his social environment (Gen 3:8). This intimate association was broken up by the Fall. But God did not therefore withdraw Himself from concernment with men. Rather, He began at once a series of interventions in history by means of which man might be rescued from his sin and brought to the end destined for him. These interventions involved the segregation of a people for Himself, by whom God should be known, and whose distinction should be that God should be "nigh unto them" and He was not to other nations (Deut 4:7; Ps 145:18). But this people was not permitted to imagine that it owed its segregation to anything in itself fitted to attract or determine the Divine preference; no consciousness was more poignant in Israel than that Jeh had chosen it, not it Him, and that Jeh's choice of it rested solely on His gracious will. Nor was this people permitted to imagine that it was for its own sake alone that it had been singled out to be the sole recipient of the knowledge of Jeh; it was made clear from the beginning that God's mysteriously gracious dealing with it had as its ultimate end the blessing of the whole world (Gen 12:2,3; 17:4,5,6,16; 18:18; 22:18; cf Rom 4:13), the bringing together again of the whole earth under the glorious reign of Jeh, and the reversal of the curse under which the whole world lay for its sin (Gen 12:3). Meanwhile, however, Jeh was known only in Israel. To Israel God showed His word and made known His statutes and judgments and after this fashion He dealt with no other nation; and therefore none other knew His judgments (Ps 147:19f). Accordingly, when the hope of Israel (who was also the desire of all nations) came, His own lips unhesitatingly declared that the salvation He brought, though of universal application, was "from the Jews" (Jn 4:22). And the nations to which this salvation had not been made known are declared by the chief agent in its proclamation to them to be, meanwhile, "far off" "having no hope" and "without God in the world" (Eph 2:12), because they were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenant of the promise. The religion of the Bible thus announces itself, manifestly, as the religion of God, if haply they may feel after Him and find Him, but as the creation in men of the gracious God, forming a people for Himself, that they may show forth His praise. In other words, the religion of the Bible presents itself as a revealed religion; Or rather, to speak more exactly, it announces itself as the revealed religion, as the only revealed religion; and sets itself as such over against all other religions, which are represented as all products, in a sense in which it is not, of the art and device of man.

It is not, however, implied in this exclusive claim to revelation—which is made by the religion of the Bible in all the stages of its history—that the living God, who made the heaven and the earth and the sea and all that in them is, has left Himself without witness among the peoples of the world (Acts 14:17). It is asserted indeed, that in the process of His redemptive work, God suffered for a season all the nations to walk in their own ways; but it is added that to none of them has He failed to do good, and to give from heaven rains and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness. And not only is He represented as thus constantly showing Himself in His providence not far from any of them, but He has also to come to Him if haply they might feel after Him and find Him (Acts 17:27), but as from the foundation of the world openly manifesting Himself to them in the works of His hands, in which He everlasting power and Divinity are clearly seen (Rom 1:20).

That men at large have not retained Him in their knowledge, or served Him as they ought, is not due therefore to failure on His part to keep open the way to knowledge of Him, but to the darkening of their senseless hearts by sin and the hardness of their sin-disposed hearts (Rom 3:19,20), by means of which they have supplanted the truth of God by a lie and have come to worship and serve the creature rather than the ever-blessed Creator. It is, indeed, precisely because in their sin they have been thus held down to the utmost ignorance and have refused to have God in their knowledge (so it is intimidated); and because, moreover, in their sin, the revelation God gives of Himself in His works of creation and providence no longer suffices for men's needs, that God has intervened supernaturally in the course of history to form a people for Himself, through whom at length all the world should be blessed.

It is quite obvious that there are brought before us in these several representations two species or stages of revelation, which should be discriminated to avoid confusion. There and Special is the revelation which God communicates to men. Revelation openly makes to all men: by it His essence and Divine attributes are known. And there is the revelation which He makes exclusively to His chosen people: through it their saving grace is made known. Both species or stages of revelation are insisted upon throughout the Scriptures. They are, as we have seen, brought significantly together in such a declaration as we find in Ps 19: "The heavens declare the glory of God . . . . their line is gone out through all the earth" (vs 1-4). "The law of Jeh is perfect, restoring the soul" (ver 7). "Thy word is more precious than gold, more than choice gold" (ver 8). Each of these provides its own revelation, and that divine revelation which is provided for the chosen people in the OT, in the Psalms, is brought forward in appropriate terms in the NT, and is indeed, as the Apostle Paul teaches us, the beginning here from the praise of the glory of God, the Creator of all that is, which has been written upon the very heavens, that none may fail to see it. From this it is easy, however, to arrive at the more full-throated praise of the mercy of Jeh, the covenant God, who has visited His people with saving instruction. Upon this higher revelation there is finally based a prayer for salvation from sin, which ends in a great threefold acclamation, instinct with adoring exultation: "O Jeh, my rock, and my redeemer" (ver 14). "The heavens, components Lord Bacon, "indeed tell of the glory of God, but not of His will according to which the poet prays to be pardoned and sanctified." In so concluding, Lord Bacon touches the exact point of distinction between the two species or stages of revelation, which is adapted to man as man; the other to man as sinner; and since man, on becoming sinner, has not ceased to be man, but has only acquired new needs requiring additional provisions to bring him to the end of his existence, so the revelation directed to man as sinner does not supersede that given to man as man, but supplements it with these new provisions for his attainment, in his new condition of blindness, helplessness and guilt induced by sin, of the end of his being.

These two species or stages of revelation have been commonly distinguished from one another by the distinctive names of natural and supernatural revelation, or general and special revelation, or natural and soteriological revelation. Each of these modes of discriminating them has its particular fitness and describes a real difference between the two in nature, reach or purpose. The one is communicated through the media of natural phenomena occurring in the course of Nature or of history; the other implies an intimate knowledge of the natural course of things and is not merely in source but in mode supernatural. The one is addressed generally to all intelligent creatures, and is therefore accessible to all men; the other is addressed to... a special class of sinners, to whom God would make known His salvation. The one has in view to meet and supply the natural need of creatures for knowledge of their God; the other to rescue broken and disarmed sinners from their sin and its consequences. By grace through the blood of Jesus Christ, who delivered them from one another, it is important that the two species or stages of revelation should not be set in opposition to one another, or the closeness of their mutual relations or the constancy of their interaction. They constitute the whole, the unitary whole, and each is incomplete without the other. In its most general idea, revelation is rooted in creation and the relations with His intelligent creatures into which God has brought Himself by giving them being. Its object is to realize the end of man's creation, to be attained only through knowledge of God and perfect and unbroken communion with Him. On the entrance of sin into the world, destroying this communion with God and obscuring the knowledge of Him derived from Nature, another species of revelation was necessitated, having also another content, adapted to the new relation to God and the new conditions of intellect, heart and will brought about by sin. It must not be supposed, however, that this new mode of revelation was an entire break, a complete and unqualified introduction, to meet an unforeseen contingency. The actual course of human development was in the nature of the case the expected and the intended course of human development, for which man was created. Revelation, therefore, in its double form was the Divine purpose for man from the beginning, and constitutes a unitary provision for the realization of the end of his creation in the actual circumstances in which he exists. We may here distinguish revelation as the many-sided, all-embracing, all-inclusive doctrine of God, His being, and His attributes, as a single fact; and revelation as special revelation, as a particular presentation of one of the elements by the cooperation of which the effect is produced; but we should bear in mind that only by their cooperation is the effect produced. Without special revelation, general revelation would be for sinful men incomplete and ineffective, and could issue, as in point of fact it has issued wherever it alone has been accessible, only in leaving them without excuse (Rom 1:20). Without general revelation, special revelation would lack that basis in the fundamental knowledge of the mighty, good and wise, righteous and good maker and ruler of all things, apart from which the further revelation of this great God's interventions in the world for the salvation of sinners could not be either intelligible, credible, or operative.

Revelation in Eden.—Only in Eden has general revelation been adequate to the needs of man. Not being a sinner, man in Eden had no need of that grace of God itself by which sinners are restored to communion with Him, or of the special revelation of this grace of God to sinners to enable them to live with God. And not being a sinner, man in Eden, as he contemplated the works of God, saw God in the unclouded mirror of his mind with a clearness of vision, and lived with Him in the untroubled depths of his heart with a trustful intimacy of association, inseparable from sinners. Nevertheless the revelation of God in Eden was not merely “natural.” Not only does the proposition of the forbidden fruit involve man's redemption (Rom 5:15-21; 1 John 1:2-4; 2:1), but the whole history implies an immediacy of intercourse with God which cannot be set to the credit of the picturesque, swift, and spontaneous creative, or be fully accounted for by the vividness of the perception of God in His works proper to sinless creatures. The impression is strong that what is meant to be conveyed to us is that man dwelt with God in Eden, and entered with Him immediately, and by a mediatory communion. In that case, we may understand that if man had not fallen, he would have lived in Redemption, in the presence with God, and that the cessation of this immediate intercourse is due to sin. It is not the “iniquity” from which man is rooted in sin, but, if we may be allowed the expression, the specialness of sin and its consequences which is represented as the fallen, lost, helpless man would have continued to lie about him through all his history, as it lay about his infancy; even man himself having had it in himself from the very beginning of speech with Him. Man having fallen, the cherubim and the flame of a sword, turning every way, keep the path; and God breaks His way in a round-about fashion into man's darkness in order to reveal the guidance of the way of life. By slow steps and gradual stages He at once works out His saving purpose and molds the world for its reception of Him, of His new man, and of His new life for the world. He talked with Adam and Eve until the enforcement of those hard laws, and He talked with Abraham until the proclamation of His great salvation to all the earth.

(2) Revelation among the heathen.—Certainly, from the gate of Eden onward, God's general revelation ceased to be, in the strict sense, supernatural. It is, of course, not meant that He abandoned His world and left it to foster in its iniquity. His providence still ruled over all, leading steadily onward to the goal for which man had been created, and of the attainment of which in God's own good time and way the very continuance of men's existence, under God's providential government, was a pledge. And His Spirit still everywhere wrought upon the hearts of men, stirring up all their powers (though created in the image of God, marred and impaired by sin) to their best activities, and to such splendid effects in every age, as to constitute an achievement as to command the admiration of all ages, and in the highest region of all, that of conduct, to call out from an apostle the encomium that "though they had no law they did by nature (observe the word "nature") the things which the law required;" this, however, remains within the limits of Nature, that is to say, within the sphere of operation of Divinely directed and assisted second causes. It illustrates merely the heights to which the powers of man may attain under the providence of Nature, and the influences of what we have learned to call God's "common grace." Nowhere, throughout the whole ethnic domain, are the conceptions of God and His ways put within the reach of man, through God's revelation of Himself in the world of creation and providence, transcended; nowhere is the slightest knowledge betrayed of anything concerning God and His purposes, which could be known only by its being supernaturally told to men. Of the entire body of "saving truth," for example, which is the burden of what we call "special revelation," the whole heathen world remained in total ignorance. And even its hold on the general truths of religion, not being vitalized by supernatural enforcement and new, and very different, very nature of God decayed, until it ran out to the dreadful issue which Paul sketches for us in that inspired philosophy of religion which he incorporates in the latter part of the first chapter of the Ep. to the Rom.

Behind even the ethnic development, there lay, of course, the supernatural intercourse of man with God which had obtained before the entrance of sin into the world, and the supernatural revelations at the gate of Eden (Gen 3:8), and at the second origin of the human race, the Flood (Gen 8:21, 22; 9:1-17). How long the tradition of this primitive revelation lingered in moeks and corners of the heathen world, conditioning and vitalizing the natural revelation of God all accessible, we have no means of estimating. Neither is it easy to measure the extent of God's special communication to His people upon men outside the bounds of Judaeism, but coming into contact with, this chosen people, or sharing with them a common natural inheritance. Lot and Ishmael and Esau can scarcely have been wholly ignorant of the word of God which came to Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and of the part of the covenant whose bonds God wrenched His people with a mighty arm fall to learn something of Jeh, any more than the mixed multitude who witnessed the ministry of Christ could fail to infer something from His gracious walk and mighty works. Not natural light gave them a conception of the nation which was intimately associated with Israel's life could remain entirely without the supernatural light by which what whatever impressions were thus conveyed reached apparently individuals only: the heathen which surrounded Israel, even though ignorant of the word of God, the heathen which remained heathen; they had no revelation. In the special instance of the case when the word of God and its object, its natural communication—such as the dreams sent to Abimelech (Gen 20) and to Pharaoh (Gen 40, 41) and to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 2:17) and to the soldier in the camp of Midian (Jgs 7:16)—it was in the interests, not of the heathen world, of the chosen people that they were sent; and these instances derive their significance wholly from the fact that they remain, no matter how the marvelous figure of Melchizedek, perhaps also of Jethro, and the strange apparition of Balaam, who also, however, stood in the sacred narrative only in connection with the history of God's dealings with His people and in the unexplained apparition occasioned by their acts; in any event avail to modify the general fact that the life of the heathen peoples lay outside the supernatural revelation, and that the prophets were suffered to walk in their own ways (Acts 14:16).

II. The Process of Revelation.—Meanwhile, however, God had not forgotten them, but was preparing salvation for them also through the supernatural revelation of His grace that He was making to His people. According to the Bible representation, in the midst of and working confluently with the revelation which He has always been giving of Himself on the plane of nature, God was making also from the very fall of man a further revelation of Himself on the plane of grace. In contrast with His general, natural revelation, in which all men by virtue of their very nature as men share, this special, supernatural revelation was given only to a select few, thus progressively to a family, a tribe, a nation, a race, until, when the fulness of time was come, it was made the possession of the whole world. It may be difficult to obtain from Scripture a clear account of the general, natural revelation as thus to give the true idea of the progressive and methodical way in which God grafts itself in His grace only progressively; or, to be more explicit, through the process of a historical development. Such is, however, the ordinary mode of the Divine working: it is so that God makes the world know Him, by the grace which He bestows on the recipient of this revelation, it is so that He builds up His kingdom in the world and in the individual soul, which only gradually comes whether to the knowledge of God or to the fruition of His salvation. As to the fact, the Scriptures are explicit, tracing for us, or rather embodying in their own growth, the record of the steady advance of this gracious revelation through definite stages from its first faint beginnings to its glorious completion in Jesus Christ.

So express is its relation to the development of the kingdom of God itself, or rather to that great series of Divine operations which are directed to the building up of the kingdom of God in the world, that it is almost impossible not to connect the thought of as simply their reflection Redemptive Acts of God in the contemplating mind of man. Thus it is not infrequently said that revelation, meaning this special, redemptive revelation, has been communicated in deeds, not in words; and it is occasionally elaborately argued that the sole manner in which God has revealed Himself as the Saviour of sinners is just by performing those mighty acts by which sinners are saved. This is not, however, the Bible representation. Revelation is, of course, often made through the instrumentality of deeds; and the series of His great redemptive acts by which He saves the world constitutes the preeminent revelation of the grace of God—so far as these redemptive acts are open to observation and are perceived in their significance. But revelation, after all, is the correlate of understanding and has as its proximate end just the production of knowledge, though not, of course, knowledge from the beginning sufficient to enable people to live by it. Revelation. The series of the redemptive acts of God, accordingly, can properly be designated "revelation" only when and as far as they are contemplated as adapted and designed to produce knowledge of God and of His redemptive method. No less series of unexplained acts can be thought, however, adapted to produce knowledge, esp. if these acts be, as in this case, of a highly transcendental character. Nor can this particular series of acts be thought to have as its main design the production of knowledge; its main design is rather to produce grace, to lead men to the experience of the Divine grace, which is one of the means by which this main design of the redemptive acts of God is attained. But this only renders it the more necessary that the proximate result of producing knowledge should not fail; and it is doubtless for this reason that the series of redemptive acts of God has not been left to explain itself, but the explanatory word has been added to it. Revelation thus appears, however, not as the mere reflection of the redemptive acts of God, but as a factor in the redemptive work of God, a component part of the series of His redeeming acts, without which that series would be incomplete and so far imperative for its main end. Thus the Scriptures represent it, not confounding revelation with the series of the redemptive acts of God, but placing it among the redemptive acts of God and giving it a function as a substantive element in the operations by which the world is saved. It must either have been made even a more constant accompaniment of the redemptive acts of God, giving their explanation that they may be understood. It occupies a far more independent place among them than this, and as frequently to give the revelation in such a way as it accompanies or follows them to interpret their meaning. It is, in one word, itself a redemptive act of God and by no means the least important in the series of His redemptive acts.

This might, indeed, have been inferred from its very nature, and from the nature of the salvation which was being wrought out by these redemptive acts of God. One of the most grievous of the effects of sin is the deformation of the image of God reflected in the human mind, and there can be no recovery from sin which does not bring with it the correction of this deformation and the reflection in the soul of man of the whole glory of the Lord God Almighty. Man is an intelligent being; his superiority over the brute is found, among other things, precisely in the direction of all his life by his intelligence; and his blessedness is rooted in the true knowledge of his God—for this is life eternal, that we should know the only true God and Him whom He has sent. Dealing with man as an intelligent being, He may be said to do so by means of a revelation, by which he has been brought into an ever more and more adequate knowledge of God, and been led ever more and more to do his part in working out his own salvation with fear and trembling as he perceived with ever more and more clearness how God is working it out for him through mighty deeds of grace.

This is not the place to trace, even in outline, from the material point of view, the development of God's redemptive revelation from its first beginnings, in the promise of Material given to Abraham—or rather in what Development, at the gate of Eden—to its completion by the advent and work of Christ and the teaching of His apostles; a steadily advancing development, which, as it lies spread out to view in the pages of Scripture, takes to those who look at it from the consummation backward, the appearance of God's grace and the sake of human salvation. The series of the redemptive acts of God, accordingly, can properly be designated "revelation" only when and so far as they are contemplated as adapted and designed to produce knowledge of God and of His redemptive method. No less series of unexplained acts can be thought, however, which is the whole object of revelation. Three distinct steps in revelation have been discriminated from this point of view. They are distinguished primarily by the increasing independence of revelation of the deeds constituting apocalyptic as distinguished from acts of God, in which, nevertheless, all revelation is a substantial element. Discriminations like this must not be taken too absolutely; and in the present instance the chronological sequence cannot be said to imply an exact interfacing, three generally successive stages of revelation may be recognized, producing periods at least characteristically of what we may somewhat conventionally call theophany, prophecy and inspiration. What may be somewhat indefinitely summed up as this Patriarchal age is characterized essentially as "the period of Outward Manifestations, and Symbols, and Theophanies"; during it "God spoke to men through their senses, in physical phenomena, as the burning bush, the cloudy pillar, or in sensuous forms, as men, angels, etc. . . . In the Prophetic age, on the contrary, the prevailing mode of revelation was by means of inward prophetic inspiration": God spoke to men characteristically by the movements of the Holy Spirit in their hearts. "Prevalently, at any rate, and by the downward way, supernatural revelation was a revelation in the hearts of the foremost thinkers of the people, or, as we call it, prophetic inspiration, without the aid of external sensuous symbols of God?" (A. B. Davidson, OT Prophecy, 1903, p. 148; of pp. 12-14, 164 ff.) This internal method of revelation reaches its culmination in the NT period, which is predominantly the age of the Spirit. What is esp. characteristic of this age is revelation through the medium of the written word, what may be called the apostolic mode of prophetic inspiration. The revealing Spirit speaks through chosen men as His organs, but through these organs in such a fashion that the most intimate processes of their souls become the instruments by means of which He speaks His mind. Thus at all events there are brought clearly before us three well-marked modes of revelation, which we may perhaps designate respectively, not with perfect discrimination, it is true, but not misleadingly, (1) external revelation, (2) internal suggestion, and (3) concrescent operation.

III. Modes of Revelation.—Theophany may be taken as the typical form of external manifestation; but by its side may be ranged the three modes of Revelation, as He Himself known, including express miracles, no doubt, but along with them every supernatural intervention in the affairs of men, by means of which a better understanding is communicated of what God is or what are His purposes of grace to a sinful race. Under "internal suggestion" may be subsumed all the characteristic phenomena of what is most properly spoken of as "prophecy": visions and dreams, which, according to a fundamental passage (Nu 12 6), constitute the condition, (2) internal suggestion, and with them the whole "prophetic word," which shares its essential characteristic with visions and dreams, since it comes not by the will of man but from God. By "concrescent operation" may be meant that form of revelation constituted in an inspired psalm or other history, in which no human activity not even the control of the will—is superceded, but the Holy Spirit works in, and through them all in such a manner as to communicate to the product qualities distinctly surpassing the human in their composition. It is thus the religion of the Bible, from that of Moses to that of Christ and His apostles, in which all these modes of revelation do not find place. One or another may seem particularly characteristic of this age of or that; but they all occur in every age. And they occur side by side, broadly speaking, on the same level. No discrimination is drawn between them in point of worthiness as modes of revelation; and much less in point of purity of the revelations themselves. At the same time the circumstance that God spoke to Moses, not by dream or vision but mouth to mouth, is, indeed, adverted to (Nu 12 8) as a proof of the peculiar favor shown to Moses and even of the superior dignity of Moses above other organs of revelation: God admitted him to an intimacy of intercourse which He did not accord to others. But though Moses was thus distinguished above all others in the dealings of God with him, no distinction is drawn between the revelations given through him and those given through other organs of revelation in point of either of Divinity or of authority. And beyond this we have no Scriptural warrant to go on in contrasting one mode of revelation with another. Dreams may seem to us little fitted to serve as vehicles of Divine communications. But there is no suggestion in Scripture that revelations through dreams stand on a lower plane than any others; and we should not fail to remember that the essential characteristics of revelations through dreams are shared by all forms of human speech (even those we should call them visions or not) the images or ideas which fill, or pass in procession through, the consciousness are determined by some other power than the recipient's own will. It may seem natural to suppose that dreams rise from the natural relation to the fulness of the engagement of the mental activity of the recipient in her reception. But we should bear in mind that the intellectual or spiritual quality of a revelation is not derived from the recipient's previous spiritual excitation. The fundamental fact in all revelation is that it is from God. This is what gives unity to the whole process of revelation, given though it may be in divers portions and in divers manners and distributed though it may be through the ages in accordance with the mere will of God, or as it may have suited His developing purpose—this and its unitary end, which is ever the building up of the kingdom of God. In whatever diversity of forms, by means of whatever variety of modes, in whatever distinguishable stages it is given, it is ever the revelation of the One God, and it is ever the one consistently developing redemptive revelation of God.

On a prama facie view it may indeed seem likely that a difference of mode of giving the messages would inevitably obtain between revelations given through dreams and those through other organs. The completely supernatural character of revelations given in theophanies is obvious. He who makes His gracious purposes toward him, has no other recourse here than to pronounce the stories legendary. The objectivity of the mode of communication which is adopted is intense, and it is thrown up to observation with the greatest emphasis. Into the natural life of men and things there is deeply seared, a purely supernatural communication. In these communications we are given accordingly just a series of "natural" forms of prophecy, and although the Patriarchal age were all revelations given in theophanies or objective communications. This is true of visions and visions, and revelations without explicit intention in the narrative of how they were communicated. And when we pass on in the history, we do not, indeed, leave behind us theophanies and objective appearances. It is not only made the very characteristic of Moses, the greatest figure in the whole history of revelation except only that of Christ, that he knew God face to face (Dt 34 10), and that Moses spoke to him's word when manifest, and not in dark speeches (Nu 12 8); but throughout the whole history of the appearance of Jesus to Paul on the road to Damascus, God has shown Himself visibly to His servants whenever it has seemed good to Him, to impress them in objective speech. Nevertheless, it is expressly made the characteristic form of the Prophecy that the God makes Himself known to His servants "in a vision, in a dream" (Nu 12 8). And although, throughout its entire duration, God, in fulfilment of His promise (Dt Revelation 18:18), put His words in the mouths of His prophets and gave them His commandments to speak, Yet it would seem that the employment of men as instruments of revelation that the words of God given through them is, in effect, the same as His direct speech, but their minds and hearts as well—the play of their creative processes of the logical reasoning, or the tenacity of their memories, as, say, in a psalm or an epitome, or a history—the supernatural element is there. It may easily seem to retie itself farther into the background. It can scarcely be a mere formula will but as a revelation, has been raised as to the relation of the natural and the supernatural in such revelations, and, in many current manuals of the prophetic, the completeness of their supernatural has been limited and curtailed in the interests of the natural methodologies employed. The plausibility of such reasoning rests on the more necessary that we should observe the unvarying emphasis which the Scriptures place upon the absolute supernatural revelation in all sabbatical alike. In the view of the Scriptures, the completely supernatural character of revelation is in no way lessened by the circumstance that it has been given through the instruments (Dt 18:18), and they are the greatest possible emphasis that the Divine word delivered through men is the pure word of God, diluted with no human admixture whatever.

We have already been led to note that even on the occasion when Moses is exalted above all other organs of revelation (Nu 12:6 ff), in point of dignity and favor, no suggestion whatever is made of any inferiority, in either the directness or the mouthpiece the purity of their supernaturality, attaching to other organs of revelation. There might never afterward arise a prophet in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face (Dt 34:10). But each of the whole series of prophets raised up by Jehovah that the people might always know His will was to be like Moses in speaking to the people only what Jehovah commanded them (Dt 18:15-18,20). In this great promise, securing to Israel the succession of prophets, there is also included a declaration of precisely how Jehovah would communicate His messages not so much to them as through them. "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I command him." The process of revelation through the prophets was a process by which Jehovah put His words in the mouths of the prophets, and the prophets therefore spoke precisely those words and not others. So the prophets themselves ever asserted. "Then Jehovah put forth his hand, and touched my mouth," explains Jeremiah in his account of how he received his prophecies, "and Jehovah said unto me, Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth." (Jer 1:9; of 6:14; Isa 51:16; 59:21; Nu 22:35; 23:5. 12:16). Accordingly, the words "with which they spoke were not their own but the Lord’s: "And he said unto me, records Ezekiel, "Son of man, go, get thee unto the house of Israel, and speak with my words unto them." (Ezk 3:4). It is a process of nothing other than "dictation" which is thus described (2Sa 3.11), though, of course, the question may remain open as to the exact processes by which this dictation is accomplished. The fundamental passage which brings the central fact before us in the most vivid manner is, no doubt, the account of the commissioning of Moses and Aaron given in Ex 4:10-17. 7-1: Here, in the time of Jehovah did Moses declare that He had made the mouth can be with it to teach it what to speak, and announces the precise function of a prophet to be that he is "a mouth of God," who speaks not his own but God's words. Accordingly, the Hebrew name for "prophet" (nabi), whatever may be its etymology, means throughout the Scriptures just "spokesman," though not "spokesman" in general, but spokesman by way of eminence, that is, God’s spokesman; and the characteristic formula by which a prophetetic declaration is announced is: That the mouth of Jehovah has spoken (for the brief "Jehovah said," see above). In no case does a prophet put his words forward as his own words. That he is a prophet at all is due not to choice on his own part, but to a call of God, obeyed often with reluctance; and he prophesies or forbears to prophesy, not according to his own will but the will of Jehovah: (Ezk 3:20.1) and creates for him the fruit of the lips (Isa 57:19; of 6:7; 50:4). In contrast with the false prophets, he strenuously asserts that he does not speak out of his own heart ("heart" in Bib. language includes the whole inner man), but all that he proclaims is the pure word of Jehovah.

The fundamental passage does not quite leave the matter, however, with this general declaration. It describes the characteristic manner of the prophetic revelation (see below). Neither visions in the technical sense of that word, nor dreams, appear, however, to have been the conventional mode of revelation of the prophets, the record of whose revelations has come down to us. But, on the other hand, there are numerous indications in the record that the universal mode of revelation to them was one which was in some sense "a vision, and a spoken word." In the category distinctively so called.

The whole nomenclature of prophecy presupposes, indeed, its vision-form. Prophecy is distinctively a word, and was delivered by Jehovah, as is denounced as the "word of Jehovah." That it should be announced by the formula, "Thus saith the Lord," is, therefore, on that very ground that we expect to find for such a description of its process as: Jehovah ... wakens the ear to hear and the eyes to see open mine ears." (Isa 50:5). But this is not the way of speaking of their messages which is most usual in the usual. Rather is the whole body of prophecy cursorily presented as a thing seen. Isaiah places at the head of his book. "The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz ... as he saw." (Isa 29:10-11; Ob 1:2). And then proceeds to set at the head of subordinate sections the remarkable words, "The word of Jehovah came to me in visions of Jehovah's. His messages to His prophets as through the medium of visions and dreams.

4. Prophetic Form.

views is the good one of doing full justice to the objective character of these revealed messages. Prophets; and, indeed, we can see that these revelations took place entirely externally to the prohets, that they stood off and contemplated them, or if they were impelled to verify them, so violent as not only to supersede their mental activity but (for that very reason) to annihilate it—would be quite clear that they came from a source other than the prophets’ own minds. It is undoubtedly the fundamental truth of the prophetic message that the whole activity has been given through them not their own but wholly God’s. The spirit that speaks through the prophecies is that same spirit that speaks through the holy prophets (Ezk 13 3—17; or, to draw the anathema sharply, that they speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the heart of the Spirit of God). But then, extreme views fail to do justice, the one to the equally important fact that the gift of prophecy goes through the prophets, comes as the pure and undistorted word of God not merely to, but from, the prophets; and the other to the equally obvious fact that the intelligence of the prophets is alert throughout the whole process of the reception and delivery of the revelation made through them (see INSPIRATION; PROPHETY).

That which gives to prophecy as a mode of revelation its place in the category of visions, strictly so called, and dreams is that it shares with them the distinguishing characteristic which determines the class. In them all alike the movements of the mind are conditioned by something extraneous to the subject’s will, or rather, that are speaking of supernaturally given dreams and visions, extraneous to the totality of the subject’s own psychoses. A power not himself takes possession of his consciousness and determines it according to its will. That power, in the case of the prophets, was fully recognized and energetically asserted to be Jeh Himself or, to be more specific, the Spirit of Jeh (1 S 10 610; Neh 9 30; Zec 7 12; Joel 2 28 29). The prophets were therefore ‘men of the Spirit’ (Hos 9 7). What constituted them prophets was that the Spirit was poured upon them (Isa 61 1) or poured out on them (Joel 2 28 29), and they were consequently filled with the Spirit (Mic 3 8), or, in another but equivalent location, that “the hand” of the Lord, or ‘the power of the hand’ of the Lord, was upon them (2 K 3 15; Ezek 1 3; 3 14 22; 33 22; 37 1; 40 1), that is to say, they were under the Divine control. This control is represented as complete and compelling, so that, under it, the prophet becomes not the ‘mover,’ but the moved; is put into conditions, or subjected to the will of the apostle Peter very purely reflects the prophetic consciousness in his well-known declaration: ‘No prophecy of scripture comes of private interpretation; for prophecy was never brought by the will of man; but it was borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God’ (2 Pet 1 20 21).

What this language of Peter emphasizes—and what is emphasized in the whole account which the prophets give of their own consciousness—is, to speak plainly, the passivity or passivity of the prophets with respect to the revelation given through them. This is the significance of the phrase: ‘it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God.’ To be ‘borne’ (φησε, φέρειν) is not the same as to be led (ἀνέχεται), which means (ἐφησεν, ἐφέραν): he that is ‘borne’ contributes nothing to the movement induced, but is the object to be moved. The term ‘passivity’ is, perhaps, however, liable to some misapprehension, and should not be overdrawn. It is not intended to deny that the intelligence of the prophets was active in the reception of their message; it was by means of their active intelligence that their message was received: their intelligence was the instrument of revelation. It is intended to deny only that their intelligence was active in the production of their message: that it was creatively as distinguished from receptively active. For reception itself is a kind of activity.

What the prophets achieved by what we shall understand is that they are in no sense co-authors with God of their messages. Their mesgages are given them, given them entire, and given them precisely as they are given out by God. God speaks through them, not as his messengers, but “His mouth.” But at the same time their intelligence is active in the reception, retention and announcing of their messages, contributing nothing to them but presenting fit instruments for the communication of them—instuments capable of being used profoundly and zealously proclaiming them.

There is, no doubt, a not unnatural hesitancy abroad in thinking of the prophets as exhibiting only such mercy and fertility as the natural minds of any personality to which they are assigned. If this were the case then we are asked not to represent God as dealing mechanically with them, pouring His revelations into their souls but merely to receive and to be moved by them in the same way as they were received by the prophets—merely to be moved by God’s word, but not to have it in any sense its “passivity”

beasts speak, and mysterious voices sound forth from the void; and there have not been lacking instances in which men have been compelled by the same power to speak what they would not, and it is not a power which profits to raise strange noises out of their ears. But ordinarily when God the Lord would speak to men He avails Himself of the services of a human tongue with which to speak, and He employs this tongue according to its nature as a tongue and according to the particular nature of the tongue which He employs. It is vain to say that the message delivered through the instrumentality of this tongue is conditioned at least in its form by the tongue by which it is spoken, if not, indeed, limited, curtailed, in some degree determined even in its matter, by it. Not only was it God the Lord who made the tongue, and who made this particular tongue with all its peculiarities, not without regard to the message He would deliver through it; but His control of it is perfect and complete, and it is as absurd to say that He cannot speak His message by it purely without that message suffering change from the peculiarities of its tone and modes of enunciation, as it would be to say that no new truth can be announced and no new element of speech by the combination of which the truth in question is announced are already in existence with their fixed range of connotation. The marks of the several individualities imprinted on the messages of the human tongues, are only a partial clue to the general fact that these messages are couched in human language, and in no way beyond that general fact affect their purity as direct communications from God.

6. Revelation by Inspiration. This mode of revelation differs from prophecy, properly so called, precisely by the employment in it, as is not done in prophecy, of the total personality of the organ of revelation, as a factor. It has been common to speak of the mode of the Spirit's action in this form of revelation, therefore, as an assistance, a superintendence, a direction, a control, the meaning being that the effect aimed at—the discovery and enunciation of Divine truth—is attained through the action of the human powers—historical research, logical reasoning, ethical thought, religious apprehensions, not by the exercise of the human soul, but under the prevailing assistance, superintendence, direction, control of the Divine Spirit. This manner of speaking has the advantage of setting this mode of revelation sharply in contrast with prophetic revelation, as involving merely a determining, and not, as in prophetic revelation, a supercessive action of the revealing Spirit. We are warned, however, against pressing this discrimination too far by the inclusion of the whole body of Scripture in this category of prophecy, and the assignment of their origin not to a mere "leading" but to the "bearing" of the Holy Spirit. In any event such terms as assistance, superintendence, direction, control, inadequately express the nature of the Spirit's action in revelation by "concursive operation." The Spirit is not to be conceived as standing outside of the human powers employed for the effect in view, ready to supplement any inadequacies they may show and to supply any defects they may manifest, but as working confluently in, with a superintendence of, elevating them, directing them, controlling them, energizing them, so that, as His instruments, they rise above themselves and under His inspiration do His work and reach His aim. The product, therefore, which by their accomplishment is His product through them. It is this fact which gives to the process the right to be called actively, and to the product the right to be called passively, a revelation. Although the circumstance that what is done is done by and through the action of human powers keeps the product very properly from a true sense human, yet the confluent operation of the Holy Spirit throughout the whole process raises the result above what could by any possibility be achieved by mere human powers and constitutes it expressly a supernatural product. The human traits are traceable through it; and yet bottom it is a Divine gift, and the language of Paul is the most proper mode of speech that could be applied to it: "Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth" (1 Cor. 2:13); "The things which I write unto you . . . are the commandment of the Lord" (1 Cor. 14:37). See Inspiration.

It is supposed that all the forms of special or redemptive revelation which underlie and give its content to the religion of the Bible 7. Complete may without violence be subsumed under Revelation; of the other three modes of God—external manifestation, internal sag in Christ, and concursive operation. All, that is, except the culminating revelation, not through, but in, Jesus Christ. As in His person and work, so also in His Spirit, the Godhead bodily, He rises above all classification and is sui generis; so the revelation accumulated in Him stands outside all the divers portions and divers manners in which otherwise revelation has been given and summed up in itself, and that alone or can be made known of God and of His redemption. He does not so much make a revelation of God as Himself is the revelation of God; He does not merely disclose God's purpose of redemption, He is unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness and sanctification and redemption. The theophanies are but faint shadows in comparison with His manifestation of God in the flesh. The prophets could prophesy only as the Spirit of Christ which was in them testified, revealing to them as to servants one or another of the secrets of the Lord Jeh; from Him as His Son, Jeh has no secrets, but whatsoever the Father knows that the Son knows also. Whatever truth men have been made partakers of by the Spirit of truth and of the power thereof (the Father hath are His) and is taken by the Spirit of truth and declared to men that He may be glorified. Nevertheless, though all revelation is thus summed up in Him, we should not fail to note very carefully that it would also be all sealed up in Him—so little is revelation conveyed by fact alone, without the word—had it not been thus taken by the Spirit of truth and declared unto men. The entirety of the NT is but the explanatory word accompanying and supplementing the travail of Christ. And when this fact was in all its meaning made the possession of men, revelation was completed and in that sense ceased. Jesus Christ is no less the end of revelation than He is the end of the law.

IV. Biblical Terminology.—There is not much additional to be learned concerning the nature and processes of revelation, from the terms currently employed in Scripture to express the idea. These terms are common words for a common idea, and their meaning is passively, making known, manifest, applied with more or less heightened significance to supernatural acts or effects in kind. In the Eng. Bible (AV) the vb. "reveal" occurs about 51 t., of which 22 are in the OT and 29 in the NT. In the OT the word is always the rendering of a Heb term יד, gālah, or its Aram. equivalent גָּלָה, the root meaning of which appears to be "nakedness." When applied to revelation, it seems to hint at the removal of obstacles to perception of the underlying objects to perception. In the NT the word "apokaluptō" is always used with the singular exception of Lk 2:50 in the rendering of a Gr term ἀποκάλυπτω, apokaluptō (but in 2 Thess 1:7; 1 Pet 4:13 the corresponding noun ἀποκάλυψις, apokalupsis), which has a very similar basic significance with ἀποκάλυπτη (nu). As this Hebrew word formed no substantive in this sense, the noun "revelation" does not occur in the Eng. OT, the idea being expressed, however, by other Heb terms variously rendered. It occurs in the Eng. NT, on the other hand, about a dozen times, and always as the rendering of the substantive corresponding to the vb, rendered "reveal." On the face of the Eng. Bible, the terms "reveal," "revelation" bear therefore uniformly the general sense of "disclose," "dislosure." The idea is found in the Bible, however, much more frequently than the terms "reveal," "revelation" in EV. Indeed, the Heb and Gr terms exclusively so rendered occur more frequently in this sense than in this rendering in the Eng. Bib. And by their side there stand various other terms which express in one way or another the general conception.

In the NT the vb. εἰδοὺ, phanerō, with the general sense of making manifest, manifesting, is the most common of these. It differs from ἀποκάλυπτω as the more general and external term from the more special and inward. Other terms also are occasionally used: ἐστών, epiphanēs, "manifestation" (2 Thess 2:8; 1 Tim 6:14; 2 Tim 1:10; 4:1; Tit 2:13; cf. ἐπιφάνεια, epiphānēs, Tit 2:11; 3:4; ὁσιότατος, ὁσιότατος (Rev 1:1; 17:1; 22:16.8; of Jas 1:16; 1 Tim 4:15); ἐπιφανής, epiphanēs (Jn 1:18), of which, however, one only perhaps—χρηστοτης, χρηστοτης (Mt 2:12.22; Lk 20:1 Acts 10:22; He 8:5; 11:27; 12:25); χρηστοτης, χρηστοτης, χρηστοτης (Rom 11:4)—calls for particular notice as in a special way, according to its usage, expressing the idea of a Divine communication.

In the OT, the common Heb vb. for "seeing" (בָּאָרְךָ, rā'ēh) is used in its appropriate stems, with God as the subject, for "appearing," "showing": "the Lord appeared unto..." "the word which the Lord spake unto..." And from the vb. not only is an active substantive formed which supplied the more ancient designation of the official organ of revelation: רָאֶה, rā'ēh, "seer"; but also objective substantives, רָאֶה, rā'ēh, רָאֶה, rā'ēh, which were used to designate the thing seen in a revelation—the "vision." By the side of these terms there were others in use, derived from a root which supplies to the Aram. its common word for "seeing," but in Heb has a somewhat more pregnant meaning, יָרָא, רָאֶה. Its active derivative, יָרָא, רָאֶה, רָאֶה, was a designation of a prophet which remained in occasional use, alternating with the more customary נָבִיה, נָבִיה, long after יָרָא, rā'ēh, had become practically obsolete; and its passive derivatives רָאֶה, רָאֶה, רָאֶה, תָּהָר, רָאֶה, כָּלַּח, provided the ordinary form for the substance of the revelation or "vision." The distinction between the two sets of terms, derived respectively from רָאֶה and רָאֶה, while not to be unduly pressed, seems to lie in the direction that the former suggests external manifestations and the latter internal revelations. The rā'ēh he to whom Divine manifestations, the rā'ēh he to whom Divine communications, have been vouchsafed; the rā'ēh is an appearance, the rā'ēh and its companions a vision. It may be of interest to observe that mar'ēh is the term employed in Nu 12:6, while it is hazon which commonly occurs in the headings of the written prophetic books to indicate their revelatory character. From this it may possibly be inferred that the former, informing it is the mode, in the latter the contents of the revelation that is emphasized. Perhaps a like distinction may be trace by the hazon of Dn 8:15 and the mar'ēh of the next verse. The ordinary vb. for "knowing," ייִהוּה, ייִהוּה, expressing in its causative stems the idea of making known, informing, is also very naturally employed, with God as its subject, in the sense of revealing, and that, in accordance with the natural sense of the word, with a tendency to pregnancy of implication, of revealing effectively, of not merely uncovering to observation, but making to know. Accordingly, it is paralleled not merely with יד, יד (Ps 98:2: "The Lord hath made known his salvation; his righteousness hath he displayed in the sight of the nation"), but also with such terms as יד, יד (Ps 26:4: "Make known to me thy ways, O Lord: teach me thy paths"). This vb. ייִהוּה-forms no substantive in the sense of "revelation" (cf. יד, יד, dothah, Nu 24:16; Ps 19:3).

The most common vehicles of the idea of "revelation" in the OT are, however, two expressions which are yet to be mentioned. These are the phrase, "word of Jehovah," and the term commonly rendered in the EV by "law." The former (ד'バー יַהוּא, ד'バー יַהוּא, ד'バー יַהוּא, ד'バー יַהוּא, ד'バー יַהוּא, ד'バー יַהוּא) occurs scores of times and is at once the simplest and the most colorless designation of a Divine communication. By the latter (ד'רְאָה, ד'רְאָה), the proper meaning of which is "instruction," a strong implication of authoritativeness is conveyed; and, in this sense, it becomes what may be called the technical designation of a specifically Divine communication. The two are not infrequently brought together, as in Isa 1:10: "Hear the word of Jehovah, ye rulers of Sodom; give ear unto the law [in "teaching" ] of our God, ye people of Gomorrah;" or Isa 2:3:4; Mic 4:2: "For out of Zion shall go forth a word, and his declaration shall pass over the rivers. And he shall utter his words against the sea, and against all the people of the isles." Both terms are used for any Divine communication of whatever extent; and both came to be employed to express the entire body of Divine revelation, conceived as a unitary whole. In this comprehensive usage, one could have come to fall more on the graciousness, and of the other more on the authoritiveness of this body of Divine revelation; and both passed into the NT with these implications. The "word of God," or simply "the word," comes thus to mean in the NT just the gospel, "the word of the proclamation of redemption, that is, all that which God has to say to man, and causes to be said" looking to his salvation. It expresses, in a word, precisely what we technically speak of as God's redemptive revelation. The "law," on the other hand, means in this NT use, just the whole body of the authoritative instruction which God has given men. It expresses, in other words, what we commonly speak of as God's supernatural revelation. The two things, of course, are the same: God's authoritative revelation is His gracious revelation; God's redemptive revelation is His supernatural revelation. The two terms merely look at the one aggregate of revelation from two aspects, and each emphasizes its own aspect of this one aggregate revelation.

Now, this aggregated revelation lay before the men of the NT in a written form, and it was impossible to speak freely of it without consciousness of and at least occasional reference to its written form. Accordingly we hear of a Word of God that is written (Jn 15:25; 1 Cor 15:54), and the Divine Word is naturally contrasted with mere tradition, as is its written word, or one of its versions.

3. "The Scipures" body of revelation—with an emphasis on its written form—is designated expressly 'the prophetic word' (2 Pet 1:19). More distinctly still, the Law comes to be thought of as written, not exactly, code, but body of Divinely authoritative instructions. The phrase, "It is written in your law" (Jn 10:34; 15:25; Rom 3:19; 1 Cor 14:21), acquires the precise sense of, 'It is written in the authentically inspired written Scripture, the content of which is 'law,' that is, Divine instruction.' Thus "the Word of God," "the Law," came to mean just the written body of revelation, what we call, and what the NT writers called, in the same sense in which we give the term, "the Scriptures." These "Scipures" are thus identified with the revelation of God, conceived as a well-defined corpus, and two conceptions rise before us which have had a determining part to play in the history of Christianity—the conception of an authoritative Canon of Scripture in the sense of the conception of this Canon of Scripture as the very Word of God written. The former conception was thrown into prominence in opposition to the gnostic heresies in the earliest age of the church, and gave rise to a real variance of speech concerning the Scriptures, emphasizing their authority in legal language, which goes back to and rests on the Bible, usage of "Law." The latter it was left to the Reformation to do justice to in its struggle against, on the one side, the Roman depression of the Scriptures in favor of the traditions of the church, and on the other side the Enthusiasts' supercession of them in the interests of the "inner Word." When Tertullian, in the one hand, speaks of the Scriptures as an "Instrument," a legal document, his terminology has an express warrant in the Scripture's own usage of τοῦθα, "law," to designate their entire content. And when John Gerhard argues that "between the Word of God and Sacred Scripture, taken in a material sense, there is no real difference," he is only declaring plainly what is definitely implied in the NT use of "the Word of God" with the written revelation in mind. What is important to recognize is that the Scriptures themselves represent themselves not merely as normative authority, and there the record of revelations—"words of God," τοῦθα—given by God, but as themselves, in all their extent, a revelation, an authoritative body of gracious instructions from God; and, since they alone, of all the other books that God may have written, are authentic—rather as the Revelation, the only "Word of God," accessible to men, in all their parts "law," that is, authoritative instruction from God.

REVELATION OF JOHN:

I. TITLE AND GENERAL CHARACTER OF BOOK

1. Title

The oldest form of the title would seem to be simply, "Apocalypse of John," appended with the designation "the Divine" (θεόλογος, theologos, i.e. "theologian") not being older than the 4th cent. (cf. the title given to Gregory of Nazianzus, "Gregory the theologian"). The book belongs to the class of works commonly named "apocalyptic," as containing visions and revelations of the future, frequently in symbolical form (e.g. the Book of En, the Apocalypse of Bar, the Apocalypse of Ezev; see Apocalyptic Literature), but it is doubtful if the word here bears this technical sense. The divinity at the end is implied in the NT Apocalypse with these others, and attributable to it the same kind of origin as theirs, viz., in the unbridled play of religious pantocy, clothing itself in unreal visual form.

But there is a wide distinction. These other works are propositional, fictitious; on the face of them products of imagination; but betraying that this is their origin in their crude, confused, unfounding character. The Apocalypse bears on visions the name of its author—an apostle of Jesus Christ (see below); claims to rest on real visions; rings with the accent of sincerity; is orderly, serious, sublime, purposeful, in its conceptions; deals with the most solemn and momentous of themes. On the modern Neo-theory, to which most recent expositors give adherence, it is a farrago of baseless phantasies, no one of which came true. On its own claim it is a product of true prophecy (1:3; 22:18), and has or will have sure fulfilment. Parallels here and there are sought in the Book of En or the Apocalypse of Ezev. As a rule the resemblances arise from the fact that these works draw from the same store of the ideas and imagery of the OT. It is there the key is chiefly to be sought to the symbolism of John. The Apocalypse is steeped in the thoughts, the images, even the language of the OT (of the illustrations in Lightfoot, Gal, 361, where it is remarked: "The whole book is saturated with illustrations from the OT. It speaks not the language of Paul, but of Isaiah and Ezekiel and Daniel." These remarks will receive elucidation in what follows.

II. Canonicity and Authority.—The two questions of canonicity and authorship are closely connected. Eusebian states that opinion in his day was divided on the book, and that it was written by John himself. The book was quoted by Muratorius (c. 170 AD), one of the churches of the Apocalypse was written by John, a disciple of the Lord (Adv. Haer., iv.20, 11; 30, 4; v. 26, 1; 35, 2, etc), and comments on the number 666 (v.30, 1). In his case there can be no doubt that the author is John meant. Andreas of Capadocia (5th cent.) states that the Apocalypse is a work of the 2nd century (HE, IV, 26); was used by Theophilus of Antioch (c 185 AD) and by Apollonius (c 210 AD); HE, V, 25). In these cases being cited as the Apocalypse of John, it is included in the works of John's in the Canon of Muratori (c 200 AD). The Johannine authorship (apocalyptic) is abundantly attested by Tertullian (c 200 AD; Adv. Mar., iii.14, 24, etc); by Hippolytus (c 240 AD), who wrote a work upon it; by Clement of Alexandria (c 200 AD); by Origen (c 230 AD), and other writers. Doubt about the authorship of the book is first heard of in the obscure sect of the Alogi (end of 2nd cent.), which, with Caius, a Rom presbyter (c 205 AD), attributed it to Cerinthus. More severely criticized by Dionysius of Alexandria (c 250 AD), who, on internal grounds, held that the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse could not have come from the same pen (Euseb., HE, VII, 25). He granted, however, that it was the work of a holy man and Apocalypse of John. The result was that, while "in the Western church," as Bousset grants, "the Apocalypse was accepted unanimously from the first" (EB, I, 193), a certain doubt attached to it for a time in sections of the Gr and Syrian churches. It is not found in the Pesh. and a citation from it in Ephraim the Syrian († 373) seems not to be genuine. Cyril of Jerusalem (c 386 AD) omits it from his list, and it is unmentioned by the Antiochian writers (Chrysoostome, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret). The Canon attributed to the Council of Laodicea (c 360 AD) does not name it, but it is doubtful whether this document is not later date (cf Westcott; also Bousset, Die Offen. Joh., 28). On the other hand, the book is acknowledged by Methodius, Pachomius, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril Alex., Epiphanius, etc.

The testimony to the canonicity, and also to the Johannine authorship, of the Apocalypse is thus exceptionally strong. In any event it is the claim of the book itself. It proclaims itself to be the work of John (1 1.4.9; 22 8), who does not, indeed, name himself an apostle, yet, in his inspired character, position of authority in the Asian churches, and selection as the medium of these revelations, can hardly be thought of as other than the well-known John of the Gospels and of consentant church tradition. The alternative view, first suggested as a possibility by Eusebius, and largely favored by him, is that the John intended is the "presbyter John" of a well-known passage cited by Eusebius from Papias (HE, III, 39). Without entering into the intricate questions connected with this "presbyter John"—whether he was really a distinct person from the apostle (Zahn and others dispute it), or whether, if he was, he resided at Ephesus (see John, Gospel of)—it is enough here to say that the reason already given, viz: the importance and place of authority given the Apocalypse in the Asian churches, and the pathetic testimony above cited connecting him with the apocata, forbid the attribution of the book to a writer wholly unknown to church tradition, save for this casual reference to him in Papias. Had the assumed presbyter really been the author, he could not have dropped so completely out of the knowledge of the church, and had his place taken all but immediately by the apocata.

One cause of the hesitancy regarding the Apocalypse in early circles was dislike of its millenarianism—"that is, with much critical skill by Dionysius 3. Objec- tions to John. Two Gospel works so diverse in character—the Gospel calm, spiritual, mystical, abounding in characteristic sayings as "life," "love," etc, written in idiomatic Gr, the Apocalypse abrupt, mysterious, material in its imagery, inexact and barbarous in its idioms, sometimes employing solecisms—could not, it was argued, proceed from the same author. Not much, beyond amplification of detail, has been added to the force of the arguments of Dionysius. There were three possibilities—either first, admitting the Johannine authorship of the Apocalypse, to assail the genuineness of the Gospel—this was the method of the School of Dialects; or, secondly, to seek a different author for the Apocalypse—John the presbyter, or another: thus not a few reverend scholars (Bleek, Neander, etc); or, third, with most moderns, to deny the Johannine authorship of both. The Gospel, at least, seems to be the "presbyter" as the author of the latter (Har- nack, Bousset, Moffatt, etc). Singularly there has been of late in the advanced school itself a movement in the direction of recognizing that this difficulty of style is less formidable than it looks—that, in fact, beneath the surface difference, there is a strong body of resemblances pointing to a close relationship of Gospel and Apocalypse. This had long been argued by the older writers (Gogel, Luthardt, Allford, Salmon, etc), but has as yet been more freely acknowledged. As instances among many may be noted the use of the term "Logos" (19 13), the image of the "Lamb," figures like "water of life," words and phrases as "true," "he that over- cometh," "keep the commandments," etc. A striking coincidence is the form of quotation of Zec 12 10 in Jn 19 37, and Rev 1 7. If the Gr in parts shows a certain abruptness and roughness, it is plainly evidenced by the use of the correct con- structions in the full accuracy of the want of knowledge of the language. "The very rules which he breaks in one place he observes in others" (Salmon). There are, besides, subtle affinities in the Gr usage of the two books, and some of the very irregularities complained of are found in the Gospel (for ample details consult Bousset, op.
2.584 to the short 1-8, to the every be the composition proof, of traditional in case the Gospel will be the earlier, and the Apocalypse the later work. This, likewise, seems to yield the better explanation. The tremendous experiences of Patmos, bursting through all ordinary and calmer states of consciousness, must have produced startling changes in thought and style of composition. The “rapt seer” will not speak and write like the self-collected, calmly brooding evangelist.

III. Date and Unity of the Book.—Eusebius, in summing up the tradition of the Church on this subject, assigns John’s exile to Patmos, and consequently the composition of the Apocalypse, to the later part of the 1st cent. of our era. Domitian Ireneaus (c 180 AD) says of the book, "For it was seen, not a long time ago, but almost in our own generation, at the end of the reign of Domitian" (Adv. Haer., v.30, 9). This tradition is confirmed by Clement of Alexandria (who speaks of “the tyrant”), Origen, and later writers. Epiphanius (4th cent.), indeed, puts (Haer., l.12, 233) the exile to Patmos in the reign of Claudius (41–54 AD); but as, in the same sentence, he speaks of the apostle as 90 years of age, it is plain there is a strange blunder in the name of the emperor. The former date answers to the conditions of the book (decadence of the churches; widespread and severe persecution), and to the prediction of Domitian for this mode of banishment (of Tacitus Hist, i.2; Euseb., HE, III, 18).

This, accordingly, may be regarded as the traditional date of composition of the Apocalypse, though good writers, influenced partly by the desire to give the later composition of the Gospel, have signified a preference for an earlier date (e.g. Westcott, Salmon). It is by no means to be assumed, however, that the Apocalypse is the earlier of the two books. The Apocalypse, if not the first, will be immediately, to revert to the traditional date (Bouset, etc.); but for a decade or two, through the prevalence of what may be called the “Nero-theory” of the book, the pendulum swung strongly in favor of its composition shortly after the death of Nero, and before the destruction of Jerusalem (held to be shown to be still standing by ch 11), i.e. about 68-69 AD. This date was even held to be demonstrated beyond all question. Reuss may be taken as an example. According to him (Christian Theology of the Apostolic Age, I, 369 ff, ET), apart from the ridiculous preconceptions of theologians, the Apocalypse is “the most simple, most transparent book that prophet ever penned.” “There is no other apocalyptic writing of which the chronology of which can be more exactly fixed.” “It was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, under the emperor Galba—that is to say, in the second half of the year 68 of our era.” He proceeds to the irrefutable proof of this. The proof, in brief, is found in the beast (not introduced till ch 13) with seven heads, one of which has been mortally wounded, but is for the present healed (13 3). “This is the Rom empire, with its first 7 emperors, one of whom is killed, but is to live again as Antichrist” (cf 17 10 f). The key to the whole book is said to be given in 13 18, where the number of the beast is declared to be 666. Applying the method of numerical values (the Jewish Gematria), this number is found to correspond with the name Nero (Cæsar) in Hebrew letters. Nero then is the 5th head that is to live again; an interpretation confirmed by rumors prevalent at that time that Nero was not really dead, but only hidden, and was soon to return to claim his throne. As it to make assurance doubly sure, it is found that by dropping the final n in “Neron” the number becomes 616—which a number which Ireneaus in his comments on the subject (v.30.1) tells us was actually found in some ancient copies. The meaning therefore is thought to be clear. Writing under the emperor Galba, the 6th emperor (reckoning from Augustus), the author anticipates, after a short reign of a 7th emperor (17 10), the return of the Antichrist Nero—an 8th, but of the 7, with whom is to come the end. Jesus is to be miraculously preserved (ch 11), but Rome is for this. This is to happen within the space of 3½ years. “The final catastrophe, which was to destroy the city and empire, was to take place in three years and a half. . . . The writer knows. . . . that Rome will fall in three years and a half, and will then reappear again.” It does not matter for this theory that not one of the things predicted happened—that every anticipation was falsified. Nero did not return; Jesus was not saved; Rome did not perish; 3½ years did not see the end of all things. Yet the Christian church, though the failure of every one of these predictions had been decisively demonstrated, received the book as of Divine inspiration, apparently without the least idea that such things could have been intended (see the form of the theory in Renan, with a keen criticism in Salmon’s Intro to the NT, lect xiv).

What is to be said with reference to this “Nero-theory” belongs to subsequent sections: meanwhile it is to be observed that, while portions of the theory are retained, significant changes have since taken place in the view entertained of the book as a whole, and with this the Christian Theory has given place to a more Babylonian Theory. The Dietrich (c 1822) of the book, as a book of Christian origin, was desire to give the later composition of the Apocalypse, but for a decade or two, through the prevalence of what may be called the “Nero-theory” of the book, the pendulum swung strongly in favor of its composition shortly after the death of Nero, and before the destruction of Jerusalem (held to be shown to be still standing by ch 11), i.e. about 68-69 AD. This date was even held to be demonstrated beyond all question. Reuss may be taken as an example. According to him (Christian Theology of the Apostolic Age, I, 369 ff, ET), apart from the ridiculous preconceptions of theologians, the Apocalypse is “the most simple, most transparent book that prophet ever penned.” “There is no other apocalyptic writing of which the chronology of which can be more exactly fixed.” “It was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, under the emperor Galba—that is to say, in the second half of the year 68 of our era.” He proceeds to the irrefutable proof of this. The proof, in brief, is found in the beast (not introduced till ch 13) with seven heads, one of which has been mortally wounded, but is for the present healed (13 3). “This is the Rom empire, with its first 7 emperors, one of whom is killed, but is to live again as Antichrist” (cf 17 10 f). The key to the whole... this, in turn, reminiscent of Bab mythology). These supposed Jewish sections are, however, without real support in anything that is known, and the symbolism admits as easily of a Christian interpretation as any other. We are left, therefore, as before, with the book as a unity, and the tide of opinion flows back to the age of Domitian as the time of its origin. Moffatt (connecting it mistakenly, as it seems to us, with Domitian's emphasis on the imperial cultus, but giving also other reasons) goes so far as to say that "any earlier date for the book is hardly possible" (Expos Gr Test., V, 317). The list of authorities for the Domitianic date may be seen in Moffatt, Intro, 508.

IV. Principles and Analysis of the Book. The method of the book may thus be indicated. After an introduction, and letters to the 1. General seven churches (chs 1-3), the properly prophetic part of the book commences with a vision of heaven (chs 4, 5), following upon which are two series of visions of the future, parallel, it would appear, to each other—the first, the 7 seals, and under the 7th seal, the 7 trumpets (chs 6–11, with interludes in ch 7 and again in 10; 11: 1–12); the second, the woman and her child (chs 12 and 13), and, after the new interludes (ch 14), the bowls and 7 last plagues (chs 15, 16). The expansion of the last judgments is given in separate pictures (the scarlet woman, doom of Babylon, Har-Magedon, chs 17–19), then come the closing scenes of the millennium, the last apostasy, resurrection and judgment (ch 20), followed by the new heavens and new earth, with the descending new Jerusalem (chs 21, 22). The theme of the book is the conflict of Christ and His church with the great powers of evil (the devil, the beast, the false prophet, 16:13), and the ultimate and decisive defeat of the latter; its keynote is in the words, "Come, Lord Jesus" (22:20; cf 1:7); but it is to be noticed, as characteristic of the book, that while this "coming" is represented as, in a manner, ever near, the end, as the crisis approaches, is again always postponed by a fresh development of events. Thus, under the 6th seal, the end seems reached (6:12–17), but a pause ensues (ch 7), and on the tenth, after the new seal, begins with the trumpets (8:2 ff). Similarly, at the sounding of the 6th trumpet, the end seems at hand (9:12–21), but a new pause is introduced before the last sounding takes place (11:15 ff). Then is announced the final victory (11:16), as yet only in summary. A new series of visions begins, opening into large perspectives, till, after fresh interludes, and the pouring out of 6 of the bowls of judgment, Har-Magedon itself is reached; but, though at the outpouring of the 7th bowl, it is proclaimed, "It is done" (15:17), the end is again held over till these final judgments are shown in detail. At length, surely, in ch 19, with the appearance of the white horseman—"The Word of God" (ver 13)—and the decisive overthrowing of all his adversaries (vs 18–21), the great conflict is finished; but just then, to our surprise, intervenes the announcement of the binding of Satan for 1,000 years, and the reign of Jesus and His saints upon the earth (the interpretation is not here discussed), followed by a fresh apostasy, and the general resurrection and judgment (ch 20). Precise time-measures evidently fail in dealing with a book so constructed: the 3½ years of the Nero-interpreters sink into insignificance in its crowded panorama of events. The symbolic numbers chiefly are "seven," the number of completeness (7 spirits, seals, trumpets, bowls, heads of beasts); "ten," the number of worldly power (10 horns); "four," the earthly number (4 living creatures, corners of earth, winds, etc); 3½ years—42 months—"time, and times, and half a time" (12:14) 1,290 days, the period, borrowed from Dnl (7:25; 12:7), of anti-Christian ascendency.

The following is a more detailed analysis:

I. Introduction
1. Title and Address (1:1–8)

4. Opening of Seventh Seal: Under This Seven Trumpets, of Which Six Were Sounded (chs 8, 9)
(1) Earth and Fire on Earth (8:7)
(2) Burning Mountain in Sea (vs 8–9)
(3) Burning Star on Rivers and Fountains (vs 10–11)
(4) One-third Sun, Moon, and Stars Darkened (vs 12–13)
(5) Woe—Trumpets to vs 13
(6) The Fallen Star—Locusts (vs 13)
(7) The Angel—Loosed from Ephraim—Horses of War (vs 14–16)

5. Interludes

6. Seventh Trumpet Sounded—Final Victory (vs 14–19)

III. Second Series of Visions: The Woman and the Red Dragon; the Two Beasts; the Bowls and Last Plagues
1. The Woman and Child: the Red Dragon and His Persecutions (ch 12)

2. The Beast from the Sea, Seven-headed, Ten-horned (13:1–10); the Two-horned Beast (vs 11–18)

3. Interlude (ch 14)
(1) The Lamb on Mt. Zion: the 144,000 (vs 1–5)
(2) The Angel with "an Eternal Gospel" (vs 6–7)
(3) Second Angel—(Anticipatory) Proclamation of Fall of Babylon (vs 8)
(4) Third Angel—(Proclamation) of the Three Witnesses (vs 9–10)
(5) Blessedness of the Dead in the Lord (ver 13)
(6) The Son of Man and the Great Vantage (vs 14–20)

4. The Seven Last Plagues—the Angels and Their Bowls: the Preparation in Heaven (ch 19)—the Outpouring (ch 16)
(1) On Earth (16:2)
(2) On Sea (vs 5)
(3) On Rivers and Fountains (vs 4–7)
(4) On Sun (vs 9)
(5) On Seat of Beast, (vs 10–11)

5. The Last Judgment
(1) The Wrath of the Beast: Har-Magedon (vs 12–16)
(2) In the Air—Victory and Fall of Babylon (vs 17–21)

IV. Expansion of Last Judgments (chs 17–19)
1. The Scarlet Woman on Beast—Her Judgment (ch 17)

2. Doom of Babylon and Lament over Her (ch 18)

3. Interlude—Announcement of Marriage of the Lamb (ch 19:1–10)

4. Rider on White Horse ("The Word of God") and His Army—Lamb, Dove, and Beast, False Prophet, and Their Followers (vs 11–21)

V. The Millennium—New Heavens and New Earth (chs 20–22)
1. Satan Bound: First Resurrection and Reign of Saints for 1,000 Years (20:1–6)

2. Loosing of Satan and Final Conflict—Doom of Adversaries and of the Devil (vs 7–10)

V. Principles of Interpretation.—As a book intended for the consolation of the church under future afflictions, the Apocalypse is meant by its author to be understood (1 3; 22 7). He must have been aware, however, that, while its general scope might be apprehended, an accurate interpretation upon many of its symbols, till the time of their actual fulfillment. The book relates to “things which must shortly come to pass” (1 1)—in their beginnings at least—and the divergent interpretations since put upon its prophecies are the best evidence of the difficulties attaching to them. Schemes of interpretation have generally been grouped into praetriterist (the prophecies being regarded as already fulfilled), futuristic (the fulfilment being thrown wholly into the future), and the historical (the fulfillment being looked for in the continuous history of the church from the beginning to the end). (1) The older praeterist view may be taken as represented by Moses Stuart, who finds the fulfillment of chs 6–11 in the destruction of Jeus (Comm., 520 ff), and of chs 13–19 in the reign of Nero (690 ff). Even he, however, has to interpret the chapter on the last things of the future. (2) The futuristic view connects the whole with the times of the second advent and the millennium. The beast is an individual who shall then appear as Antichrist. This rejects the plain intimations of the book that the events predicted lay in their beginnings at least, immediately in the future of the writer. (3) The historical view connects the various symbols with definite occurrences—as the invasions which overthrew the Rom Empire (the first 4 trumpets), the Saracens (first voo-trumpet), the Turks (second voo-trumpet), the papacy (the beast, ch 13; the scarlet woman, ch 17), etc. A day-year principle is applied to the periods (1,260 days = 1,260 years). As representatives of this view may be mentioned Mede, Vitringa, Sir Isaac Newton, Ellicott. Apocalypticæ, A. Barnes.

These older schemes are largely horizon-oriented by the newer theories, already alluded to, in which the Apocalypse is explained out of contemporary conditions, the legend of the returning Nero, Jewish apocalyptic and Babylonian influence. These are praeterist theories also, but differ from the older in that in them all real prophecy is denied. A mainstay of such theories is the declaration of the book that the events announced are close at hand (1 1-3; 22 20). When, however, it is remembered that, on any view, this nearness includes a period of 1,000 years before the judgment and descent of the new Jersus, it will be felt that it will not do to give these expressions too restricted a temporal significance. The horizon is wider. The coming of Christ is ever near—ever approaching—but it is not to be tied down to “times and seasons”; it is more of the nature of a process and has anticipatory exemplifications in many crises and providential events forecasting the end (see above). The “coming,” e.g., to the church at Ephesus (2 5), or to the church at Pergamos (2 16)—contingent events—can hardly exhaust the full meaning of the Parousia. The Nero-theory demands a date most lust under Galley, but that date we have seen to be generally abandoned. Those who place it under Vespasian (omitting three short reigns) sacrifice the advantage of dating the book before the destruction of Jersus, and have to fall back on a supposititious Jewish fragment in ch 11, which those who incorporated it must have known had never been fulfilled. The attempt to give a “contemporary historical” interpretation to the symbols of the successive churches, as Gunkel has neatly shown, completely breaks down in practice, while Gunkel’s own attempt at a Bab explanation will be judged by most to be overstepped. “The Tribulation” in the OT and elsewhere may be associated with widespread oriental ideas, but the definite symbolism of the Apocalypse in ch 12 has no provable connection with Bab myths. There is the widest disagreement among the theories of the seven heads of the beast (from Jewish apocalyptic). What seems simple and demonstrable to one has no plausibility to others. A form of “Nero Caesar,” indeed, yields the mystic 666, but so do 1,000 other names—almost any name, with proper manipulation (cf. Salmon, lect xiv). Lastly, the returning-Nero legend yields no satisfactory explanation of the language in 13 3.12.14; 17 11. The theory is that these words allude to the belief that Nero would return from the dead and become Antichrist (see above). Tacitus attests that there were vague rumors that Nero had not really died (Hist. ii.8), and later a pretender arose in Parthia taking advantage of this feeling (Suet. Nero 57). The idea of Nero returning from the dead is categorically denied in Sib Or 119–22 (c 80 AD). Augustine mentions the idea (City of God, xx.19, 3), but without connection with the Apocalypse. By Domitian’s time, however, it was perfectly certain that Nero had not returned and there was no longer, on this interpretation, any apposition in speaking of a “head” the “deathstroke” of which was healed (13 3), which became the “eighth head” of 17 11—if, indeed, the apostle could be conceived capable of being informed by such a later interpretation, as the book was written in the past tense, being evidently, still in the future. It may be added that neither Irenæus, nor any early interpreter, seems to have heard of the connection of 666 with “Nero.” Irenæus himself suggests the solution Latinus (cf. Salmon, ut supra).

It is not proposed here to attempt the lines of a positive interpretation. If it is once recognized that the Apocalypse is a book of true prophecy, that its symbols stand for things unborn at the time of its writing, it is not to be limited to a brief period in the future.

3. The True Prophecy Book a statement that credits the Apocalypse like 31 years, the way is opened, not, indeed, for a reading into it of a series of precise historical occurrences, but still for doing justice to the book in which lies at the basis of the historical interpretation, viz. that the prophetic schemes figure the great crises in the age-long conflict of Christ and His church with pagan and anti-Christian adversaries. Events and tendencies may be grouped, or under different forms may relate to the same subject (e.g. the 144,000 sealed on earth—a spiritual Israel—in 7 1–8, and the triumphant multitude in heaven, vs 9–17); successes of events may be foreshortened; different pictures may overlap; but, shining through the symbols, great truths and facts which have historical realization appear. There is no need for supposing that, in a drama of this range, the “heads” of the beast of chs 13 and 17 (behind whom is the Dragon-enemy, Satan, of ch 12) stand, in contrast to the analogy of Dan, for seven individual emperors, and that “the image of the beast,” which has life given to it and “speaks” (13 14.15), is the statue of the emperor; or that such tremendous events as the fall of the Rom Empire, or the rise of the papacy—with which, however, no number is connected—and the new ecclesiastical anti-Christianism—or the false prophecy of later intellectual anti-Christianism have no place in the symbolism of the book. Sane, reverent thought will suggest many lines of correspondence with the course of God's providence, which may serve to illuminate its dark places. More than this need not be said here.

VI. Theology of the Book.—On this it is hardly necessary to dwell, for expositors are now well aware of the great truths that lie behind the Book, Christ, man, sin, redemption, the teaching of the Apocalypse does not vary essentially from the great types in the Ep. The assonances with John's mode of thinking have already been alluded to. It is granted by all writers that the Christology is as high as and essentially the same as in the body. It is thought unwise not necessarily to be acknowledged," says Reuss, "that Christ is placed in the Apocalypse on a par with God" (op. cit., I, 397-98; cf Rev 4 17; 2 3; 5 5-14; 22 13, etc). Not less striking are the correspondences with the teaching of Pâmos and Peter on redemption through the blood of Christ (1 5; 5 9; 7 14; 14 4, etc). The perverted conception of the school of Baur that we have in the book an anti-Pauline manifesto (thus also Plei- derer; cf Hibbert Lectures, 178), is now practically dead (see the criticism of it by Reuss, op. cit., I, 308-12). The point in which its eschatology differs from that of the rest of the NT is in its introduction of the millennium before the final resurrection and judgment. This, so far as it is necessarily contradicting, the earlier stage of thought.

REVELLINGS, rev'el-ing (rêv'ə-lîngg; rêv'ə-lîng; rêv'ə-lîng). The word is found both in AV and in RV in Wisd 14 23 (RV "revels," orgiastic heathen worship is in point); 2 Macé 6 4; Gal 5 21; 1 Pet 4 3. In Gal 5 21 it is classed with fornication, uncleanness, lust, as one of the works of the flesh. In 1 Pet 4 3 it is spoken of the Gentiles and is classed with drunkenness and carousings and such like. In Rom 13 13 RV has "reveling" instead of AV "rioting," and in 2 Pet 2 13, "revel" replaces "riot" in AV. In Am 6 7, "revelry" replaces "banquet." The obvious meaning of the word is excessive and boisterous intemperance and lustful indulgence. G. H. GEBBERDING REVENGE, rë-vən', REVENGER, rë-vən'ér. The same Heb and Gr words are used to express the idea of "to avenge" and "to revenge" (גֶּדֶר, náášam, or derivative; δικαιό, dikéeá, or derivative). In Eng. these words are synonymous in that they are both used to express the infliction of punishment upon the person or thing that has offended. They both "to take revenge" may also imply a hateful, wrong or malignant spirit. In the latter case RV preserves "revenge" (cf Jer 20 10; Ezek 25 15; 26 17 it is an anthropomorphism, but, wherever it is synonymous with "avengeance," this word is used (cf Nu 31 23; Ps 79 10; Nah 1 2; Jer 13 20; Rom 3 4; 2 Cor 7 11; 10 6 RV; AV has "revenge" in all these cases). In Dt 32 42, AV "avenger" is a wrong tr. Read with RV "from the head of the leaders of the enemy" or RVm "the hairy head of the enemy." Cf Avenge, Avenging, Blood, Géél.

REVENUE, rev'ə-nú: (1) כִּמֵּה, app'țhóm, "revenue or income" (Exr 4 13 AV); (2) סִיָּרָּה, t'há'dáh, "increase," "revenue" (Prov 8 19; 18 6; 21 3; Jer 12 13); παροδο, προδο, "income" (2 Mac 3 5; 4 8 [RV "fund"]; 9 16).

REVERENCE, rev'er-ens: In the OT, "reverence" occurs as the tr of two Heb words, yárdé, and šădlóh. The root idea of the former is "strain," it is used to express the attitude toward God Himself, as in Ps 89 7 AV; or toward His sanctuary, as in Lev 19 30; 26 2. So the group of ideas there would be "fear," "awe," "reverence." The root idea of the second is "falling down," as prostration of the body. It is sought under another who is considered superior, as in 2 S 9 6 AV; 1 K 3 1 AV; Est 3 2 5. The group of ideas here, therefore, is "honor," "obedience," "reverence." In the NT "reverence" occurs as the tr of three Gr words, αἵλος, phóbémon, and entrepómaí. In the first, the idea is "modesty" (He 12 28; cf 1 Tim 2 9). In the second, "fear" (Eph 5 3 3 AV), though here it is used to set forth the attitude of proper subjection on the part of a wife toward her husband (cf 1 Pet 3 2 5). In the third, the idea of the self-cost of inferiority," and so sets forth an attitude toward another of doing him honor (Mt 21 37; Mk 12 13; Lk 20 12). Is 12 0 3.

In the Apoc entrepómaí occurs in Wisd 2 10; Sir 4 22. In addition, proskowné, "make obeisance," occurs in Jth 10 23; 14 7; thauámdó, "wonder," Sir 7 29, and aischnomón, "be ashamed," Eze 4 16.

REVEREND occurs in the OT in Ps 111 9, of the name of God (yárdé), and in the Apoc in 2 Mac 15 12, "a man revered (aidbhôn, "modest") in bearing," and in the NT RV has "reverent in demeanor" (hieroprepis) in Tit 2 3 and "reverend" in Phil 4 6 (sánmos). E. J. FORREST

REVILE, rë-vil. See Crimes; Punishments.

REVIVE, rë-viv, REVIVING, rë-viv-ing. "To revive" is the tr of ἀναζω, hýghō, "to live," "cause to live," used of restoration to life (Gen 45 27; Jgs 16 19, etc); of rebuilding (Neh 4 2); of restoration to well-being (Ps 56 6 [RV "quicken"]; 138 7; Isa 57 15; Hos 5 2; 14 7); of Jeh's gracious work for His people (Hab 2 2, "revive thy work in the midst of the years, etc); "reviving" is the tr of ἀναζω, hýghō, "preservation," or "means of life" (Ezr 8 9). "Revive" occurs in the NT as the tr of ἀναζω, ἀναζω, "to live again" (Rom 7 9, 14 9, AV "revived both died and rose, and revived, RV "ruminating and rose") "Christ died and lived again," zóo).

In 1 Mac 13 7 7 RV we have "And the spirit of the people revived," ἀναζω, ἀναζω, "to stir or kindle up as a fire," the same word as in 2 Tim 1 5 7, 6 "stir up the gift of God, which is in thee," n. Gr "stir into flame.""

In view of the frequent modern use of "revive" and "revival," it is worthy of notice that it is to Timothy himself the exhortation is addressed. We too often merely pray for "revivals," forgetting that it is for us to "stir into flame" the gift of the spirit which we have already received of God. It is ours from Him, but we let it lie dormant, as a slumbering ember merely.

REWARD, rë-wûrd: In modern Eng. (except when influenced by the Bib, forms) a "reward" is something given in recognition of a good act. In RV, however, "reward" is used quite generally for anything given, and the term covers the recompense of evil (Ps 1 11 8; Proverbs 1 18 AV, "reward" (Mic 7 8), and gifts (Jer 40 5 AV). RV has specialized the meaning in a number of cases (Ps 94 2; Ezek 16 34; Jer 40 5, etc), but not sys-tematically.

REZON, re-zö'n (רֶזון), rezôn; 'Páuev, Rhádson, son of Eliakah, and a subject of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (1 K 11 20). It is often used to be given as 'Rezón (?), kezôn; 'Atis, Hazein (1 K 15 18; see Hezon), where he is the father of Tabrimon, whose son Ben-hadad I is known through his league with Assa, king of Judah. When David conquered Zobah, Rezon renounced his allegiance to Hadadezer and became powerful as an independent chief, capturing Damascus and setting up as king.
Along with Hadad, the noted Edomite patriot, his son, as a thorn in the side of Solomon, the one making himself obnoxious in the S., the other in the N., the kingdom of Israel, both being animated with the bitter hatred of the common foe. It is said of Rezon that he "reigned over Syria" (1 K 11 25), and if the surmise adopted by many scholars is correct that he is the same as Hezon (1 K 15 18), then he was really the founder of the dynasty of Syrian kings so well known in the history of this period of Israel; and the line would run:
Rezon, Tabrimon, Ben-hadad I, and Ben-hadad II.

RHEGIUM, ré'ji-um: This city (Ῥήγιον, Ῥῆγιον [Acts 28 13], the modern Reggio di Calabria) was a town situated on the east side of the Sicilian Straits, about 6 miles S. of a point opposite Messana (Messina). Originally a colony of Chalcidian Greeks, the place enjoyed great prosperity in the 5th cent. BC, but was captured and destroyed by Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, in 387 BC, when all the surviving inhabitants were sold into slavery (Diodorus xiv.106–9, 111, 112). The city never entirely recovered from this blow, which was partially restored by the younger Dionysius. On the occasion of the invasion of Italy by Pyrrhus, the people of Rhegium had recourse to an alliance with Rome (280 BC) and received 4,000 Campanian troops within their walls, who turned out to be very untrustworthy. For, in imitation of a similar band of mercenaries across the strait in Messana, they massacred the male inhabitants and reduced the women to slavery (Polybius 1.7; Orosius iv.3).
They were not punished by the Romans until 270 BC, when the town was restored to those of its former inhabitants who still survived. The people of Rhegium were faithful to their alliance with Rome during the Second Punic War (Livy xxii.30; xxv.1; xvii.12; xxviii.9). At the time of the Social War they were incorporated with the Roman state, Rhegium becoming a municipality (Ciceron Verr.
v.60; Pro Archía, 3).

The ship in which Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli encountered unfavorable winds after leaving Syracuse, and put in anchor by means of <tacking. It waited at Rhegium a day for a south wind which bore it to Puteoli (Acts 28 13), about 180 miles distant, where it probably arrived in about 20 hours. (George H. Allen

RHESA, re'âr (Ῥησά, Ῥῆσα): A son of Zerubabel in the genealogy of Jesus according to St.
Luke (Lk 3 27).
RHINOCEROS, rī-nōs'ĕr-ōs: This word is found in AV in Isa 34 7 ("rhinocerots") for "unōn," re'emim, AV "unicorns," RV "wild-oxen." The word is quite inappropriate to the passage, which refers to the Edomites. The one-horned rhinoceros, Rhinoceros unicornis, is confined to India. Other rhinoceroses are found in India and in equatorial Africa, but it is hardly to be presumed that those animals were meant by the Heb writers. See Unicorn.

RHODA, rō'da (Po'sō, Rhōđe, "rose"); A maid in the house of Mary the mother of John Mark. She came to answer when Peter knocked at Mary's door after his miraculous release from prison. On recognizing his voice, she so forgot herself with joy that she neglected to open the door, but ran in to tell the others the glad news. They would not believe her, thinking she was mad; and when she persisted in her statement they said it must be his angel. The Jewish belief was that each man had a guardian angel assigned to him. Peter continued knocking, and was ultimately admitted (Acts 12 12 ff.).

RHODES, rō'dēs (Pāsōe, Rhōđaios). An island (and city) in the Aegean Sea, W. of Crete and N. of Italy, the ruins of which are on the tip called the Camirus or Lycia (Rhodes). The Tlepolemus, Carians. The Colossus of Rhodes, was a colossus, made by Chares about 290 BC, at a cost of 300 talents ($300,000), towered to the height of 104 ft.

In the popular mind—both before and after Shakespeare represented Caesar as bestriding the world like a colossus—this gigantic figure is conceived as an image of a human being of monstrous size with legs spread wide apart, at the entrance of the inner harbor, so huge that the largest ship with sails spread could move in under it. In that sense, however, this conception is based seems to have no foundation.

The statue was destroyed in 223 BC by an earthquake. It was restored in 187 AD. The Saracens sold the ruins to a Jew. The quantity of metal was so great that one could fill the cars of a modern freight train (900 camel loads).

The most ancient cities of Rhodes were Ialisus, Ochryma, and Lindus. The oldest inhabitants were immigrants from Crete. Later came the Carians. But no real advance in civilization was made before the immigration of the Dorians under Tlepolemus, one of the Heraclidae, and (after the Trojan war) Aethaenaeides. Lindus, Ialisus and Camirus formed with Cos, Cnidus and Halicarnassus the so-called Dorian Hexapolis (Six Cities), the center of which was the temple of the Triopian Apollo on the coast of Caria. Rhodes now founded many colonies—in Spain (Rhode), in Italy (Parthenope, Salapia, Sirus, Sybaris), in Sicily (Gela), in Asia Minor (Sol), in Cilicia (Gage), and in Lycia (Corydalla). The island was the birthplace of Antiochus and Alexander the Great. After his death this garrison was driven out by the Rhodians. It is at this time that the really great period of the island's history begins. The inhabitants bravely defended their capital against Demetrius Poliorcetes in 304 BC—the same Demetrius who two years before had won a naval victory and had coins stamped with a "Vic-tory" that is the counterpart of the "Winged Vic-tory" which commands the unbounded admiration of the modern world—and extended their dominion over a strip of the Carian coast, as well as over several of the neighboring islands, and for the first time in the history of the world established an international maritime, and commercial law. The arts and sciences now began to flourish in the fair island in the southeastern Aegean. Aeschines, the famous orator of Athens, fled to Rhodes after his defeat by Demosthenes, and founded a school of oratory, which was attended by many Romans. Rhodes became the faithful ally of Rome after the defeat of Antiochus in 189 BC. As a reward for her loyalty she received Caria. In 108, however, only a small portion of this territory remained under Rhodian sway (Pera, or the Chersonese). In 42 BC the island was devastated by Cassius. Later it was made a part of the Rom province of Asia (44 AD). Strabo says that he knows no city so splendid in harbor, walls and streets. When the Rom power declined, Rhodes fell into the hands of Caliph Moawijah, but later was taken by the Greeks, from whom at a later date the Genoese wrested the island. In 1249 John Cantacuzenus attempted to recover Rhodes, but in vain. Finally, however, success crowned the efforts of the Greeks under Theodoros Protobastos. In 1310 the Knights of St. John, who had been driven from Pal, made Rhodes their home. After the subjugation of the island by Sultan Sollman in 1522 the Knights of St. John moved to Malta (now called the Island of Rhodos). It remained uninterruptedly a possession of the Sultane Porte down to the recent war between Turkey and the Balkan allies, forming, with the other islands, the province of the "Islands of the White Sea" (Archipelago). It has a Christian governor whose seat, though mostly at Rhodes, is sometimes at Chios. The population of the island has greatly diminished by emigration. In 1890 the total number of inhabitants was 30,000 (20,000 Greeks, 7,000 Mohammedans, 1,500 Jews). The chief products of Rhodes are wheat, oil, wine, figs and tropical fruits. A very important industry is the exportation of sponges. The purity of the air and the mildness of the climate make Rhodes a most delightful place to live in during the fall, winter and early spring. The city, built in the shape of an amphitheater, has a magnificent view toward the sea. It contains several churches made out of old mosques. The once famous harbor is now almost filled with sand. The inhabitants number nearly 12,000 (all Turks and Jews). Rhodes is mentioned in the NT only as a point where Paul touched on his voyage southward from the Hellespont to Caesarea (Acts 21 1); but in 1 Mace 15 23 we are informed that it was one of the states to which the Romans sent letters in behalf of the Jews.
RHODEUS, rod'kus (ῬΩΘΟΣ, Rhodótos): A Jewish traitor who disclosed the plans of Judas to the Roman (Papætor) (2 Macc. 13:21) 102 BC. Of his fate nothing more is known.

RIB (ריב, ṭâb,タル, ṭâlib; Aram. ṭâbî): The Heb words designate the "side," "flank," hence the "rib." They are found thus only in connection with the creation of Eve: "He [Jeh] took one of his [Adam's] ribs, and closed up the flesh else-where: and the rib, which Jeh God had taken from the man, made he [in "built" him into"] a woman." (Gen 2:21,22). The Aram. word is only found in Dn 7:5.

Twice the RV uses the word "rib" in a figurative sense of two beams or rafters built into the ark of the covenant and the altar of incense, on which the golden rings were fastened (Ex 30:4; 37:27).

A curious mistr has crept into AV, which here follows Jewish commentators or etymologists, in four passages in 2 S (2:29; 3:27; 4:6; 20:10), wherein mentions of "rib" are placed as the name of the body under which spears or swords are thrust, so as to cause lethal wounds. The Heb word hâmôš, which indeed means "fifth," is here a noun, derived from a root meaning "to be staunch," "stalwart," "stout," "flabby," "obese" (of עוג, hâmôsh, "armed," "equipped soldier"); Arab.

RIBAL, rîbâl, rîbâl (ריבל, ṭâbî): LXX Ροθά, Rethêd, with variants): A Benjamite, the father of ÍTÁI (q.v.), one of David's "mighty men" (2 S 23:29 | 1 Chr 11:31).

RIBBAND, rîbînd, rîbîn (ריבן, pâthîl [Nu 15:38 AV]): See Colson, (2); Coam, (4).

RIBLAH, rîbîla (ריבלה, ṭâblâh): LXX Ῥιβαλά, Rhéblathâd, with variants):
(1) Riblah in the land of Hamath first appears in history in 606 BC. Here Pharaoh-nechoh, after defeating Josiah at Megido and destroying Kady-tis or Kadeshe on the Orontes, fixed his headquarters, and while in camp he deposed Jehoahaz and cast him into chains, fixed the tribute of Judah, and appointed Jehoiskim king (2 K 23:31-35). In 583 BC Nebuchadnezzar, at war with Egypt and the Syrian states, also established his headquarters at Riblah, and from it he directed the subjugation of Judas. When it fell, Zedekiah was carried prisoner to Riblah, and there, after his sons and his nobles had been slain in his presence, his eyes were put out with rib by the chief prisoner to Babylon (2 K 25:6.20; Jer 39:5-7; 52:8-14). Riblah then disappears from history, but the site exists today in the village of Riblah, 35 miles N.E. of Baalbek, and the situation is the finest that could have been chosen by the Egyptians for kings for their headquarters in Syria. An army camped there had abundance of water in the control of the copious springs that go to form the Orontes. The Egyptians coming from the S. had behind them the command of the rich corn and forage lands of Coele-Syria, while the Bab army from the N. was equally fortunate in the rich plains extending to Hamath and the Euphrates. Lebanon, close by, with its forests, its hunting grounds and its snows, ministered to the needs and luxuries of the officers. Riblah commanded the chief trade and war route between Egypt and Mesopotamia, and, besides, it was at the dividing-point of many minor routes. It was in a position to attack with facility Phoenicia, Damascus or Pal, or to defend itself against attack from those places while a few miles to the S. the mountains on each side close in forming a pass where a mighty host might easily be resisted by a few. In every way Riblah was the strategic point between North and South Syria. Riblah should probably be read for Dibalh in Ezk 14:6; Hân in Nu 34:11 it does not really appear. See (2).

(2) A place named as on the ideal eastern boundary of Israel in Nu 34:11, but omitted in Ezk 47:15-18. The MT reads "Hariblah"; but the LXX probably preserves the true vocalization, according to which we should read to "Harbel." It is said to be to the east of Ain, and that, as the designation of a district, can only mean Merj 'Ayun, so that we should seek it in the neighborhood of Hermon, one of whose spurs Purrer found to be named nôbel Arbâl.

RICHERS, rich'ez, rich'iz: Used to render the following Heb and Gr words: (1) ὀσχή, which should, perhaps, be considered the most general word, as it is the most often used (Gen 31:16; Ecc 4:8; Jer 9:23). It looks at riches simply as riches, without regard to any particular feature. Alongside this would go the Gr φαρόν, ploûtos (Mt 13:22; Eph 2:7). (2) ὧσμος (Prov 27:24; Jer 20:5), ὧσμα (Gen 36:7; Dn 11:13,24 AV) look at riches as things accumulated, collected, amassed (6). ὧσμα looks upon riches as earnings, the fruit of toil (Ps 119:14; Prov 8:18; Ezk 27:27). (4) ἠδικός regards riches as in the aspect of being much, this coming from the original idea of noise, through the idea of a multitude as making the noise, the "richness" of many, or being in multitude (Ps 37:16 AV).

(5) ἡγιάλ regards riches as power (Ps 62:10; Isa 8:4; 10:14). (6) Yīthrah means "running over," and so presents riches as abundance (Jer 46:36 AV). Along with this may be placed ἄκρα, which has the idea of a hill, and so of abundance (Job 36:19 AV). (7) Κύπριλδ regards riches as a creation, something made (Ps 104:24; cf m); (8) χρύσα (chêrûm) looks at riches as useful (Mk 10:23 f.). Like the NT, the Apoc uses only ploutos and chêrûm.

Material riches are regarded by the Scriptures as neither good nor bad in themselves, but only according as they are properly or improperly used. They are transitory (Prov 27:24); they are not to be trusted (Mk 10:23; Lk 18:24; 1 Tim 6:17); they are not to be gloried in (Jer 9:23); the heart is not to be set on them (Ps 62:10); but they are made by God (Ps 104:24), and come from God (1 Chr 29:12); and they are the crown of the wise (Prov 14:24). Material riches are used to body forth for us the most precious and glorious realities of the spiritual realm. See, e.g., Rom 9:23; 11:33; Eph 2:7; Phil 4:19; Col 1:27. Cf MAM-MON; TREASURE; WEALTH. E. J. FORRESTER RID, rid, RIDDANCE, rid'dans: "Rid" originally meant "rescue" (AV Gen 37:22; Ex 6:6; Ps 82:4; 144:7,11), whence the meaning "remove" or "clean out" (Lev 26:6 AV, with "riddance" in Lev 23:22; Zeph 1:18). The word occurs in ARV and in ERV in Ex 6:6.

RIDDLE, rî’dl, ḫinhā ( ḫdhāh; ʿalwyna, ʿal wynā). See GAMES.

RIGHT, rît (רח, yāshêr, ṭērâvi, mishpâhî; ḫēkîōs, ḫēkãs, ēthûs, ēthûs). Many Heb words are trd “right,” with different shades of meaning. Of these the two noted are the most important: yāshêr, with the sense of being straight, direct, as “right in the sight” of Jeh (Ex 15 20; Dt 12 25; etc), and ṭērâvi, “right paths” (Prov 4 11 AV); and mishpâhî, “judgment,” “cause,” etc, a forensic term, as “Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?” (Gen 18 25). In Job 34 17, RV has “justice” (ver 6, “right”), etc. The words ḫēkîōs, ṭēḥēk, ṭēḥāhāh, ordinarily trd “righteousness,” are in a few cases rendered “right” (2 S 19 28; Neh 2 20; Ps 9 4; 17 1; 119 75; Ezek 18 5, etc). In the NT the chief word is ḫēkîōs, primarily “even,” “equal” (Mt 20 4; Lk 12 57, etc); more generally the word is rendered “just” and “righteous.” Euthus, used by LXX for ḫāshêr (1 S 12 23; Hos 14 9), occurs a few times (Acts 8 21; 13 10; 2 Pet 2 15); so orthôs, “straight,” “upright” (Lk 10 28). “Right” also represents Heb yāshêr, and kindred forms (Gen 48 13 14.17; Ex 15 6, etc); the Gr, in this sense, is δικαιος (Mt 6 3; 20 21, etc).

RV, among other changes, has “right” for AV “truth” in Job 27 2; 34 5, and for “right” in AV substitutes “straight” in Ezr 8 21, “akin” in Ecc 4 4, m “successful,” etc. In Jn 1 1 12 RV reads, “the right to become children of God” for AV “the power” (ἐξουσία); in Mt 20 7.15 “right is qualified with the larger part of the verse. In 2 Tim 2 15 “rightly dividing” (orthotomeó) is changed to “handling aright,” with m “holding a straight course in the word of truth.” Or, rightly dividing the word of truth.” W. L. WALKER RIGHTEOUSNESS, rî’th woman (רֵחַ, ḫâdith, adj., “righteous,” or occasionally “just”; ḫâdîth, noun, occasionally “righteousness,” occasionally “justice”; ḫēkîōs, ḫēkãs, adj., ḫēkîōson, ḫêkûson, ḫêkâsion, noun, from ḫîq, ḫîk, whose first meaning seems to have been “custom”; the general use suggested conformity to a standard; righteousness, “the state of him who is such as he ought to be” [Thayer] 1. In Christian thought the idea of righteousness contains both a permanent and a changing element. The fixed element is the will to do right; the changing factor is the conception of what may be right at different times and under different circumstances. Throughout the entire course of Christian revelation we discern the emphasis on the first factor. To be sure, in the days of later Pharisaism righteousness came to be so much a matter of externals that the inner intent was often lost sight of altogether (Mt 23 23); but, on the whole and in the main, Christian thought in all ages has recognized as the central element in righteousness the intention to be and do right. This common spirit binds together the first worshippers of God and the latest. Present-day conceptions of what is right differ by vast distances from the conceptions of the earlier Hebrews, but the intentions of the first worshippers are as discernible as are those of the doors of righteousness in the present day.

There seems but little reason to doubt that the content of the idea of righteousness was determined in the first instance by the customs of social groups. There are some, of course, who would have us believe that what we experience as inner moral sanction is nothing but the fear of consequences which come through disobeying the will of the social group, or the feeling of pleasure which results as we know we have acted in accordance with the social demands. At least some thinkers would have us believe that this is all there was in moral feeling in the beginning. If a social group was to survive it must lay upon its individual members the heaviest exactations. Back of the performance of religious rites was the fear of the group that the god of the group would be displeased if certain honors were not rendered to him. Merely to escape the penalties of an angry deity the group demanded ceremonial observances. For the basis of fear in the minds of the individuals of the group have come all our later movements toward righteousness.

It is not necessary to deny the measure of truth there may be in this account. To point out its inadequacy, however, a better statement would be that from the beginning the social group utilized the native moral feeling of the individual for the defence of the group. The moral feeling, by which we mean a sense of the difference between right and wrong, would seem to be a part of the native furnishing of the mind. It is very likely that in the beginning this moral feeling was directed toward the performance of the rites which the group looked upon as important (see ALMS).

As we read the earlier parts of the OT we are struck by the fact that much of the early Heb moral way was of this group kind. The righteous man was the man who performed the rites which had been handed down from the beginning (Dt 5 23). The meaning of all of these rites was that there was a fundamental demand but from a very early period the characteristic of Heb righteousness is that it moves in the direction of what we should call today the enlargement of humanity. There seemed to be at work, not merely the forces which make for the perfection of the group, not merely the desire to please the God of the Hebrews for the sake of the material favors which He might render the Hebrews, but the factors which make for the betterment of humanity as such. As we examine the laws of the Hebrews, even at so late a time as the completion of the formal Codes, we are indeed struck by traces of primitive survivals (Nu 5 11–31). There are some injunctions, whose purpose we cannot well understand. But, on the other hand, the vast mass of the legislation had to do with really human considerations. There are rules concerning sanitation (Lev 13), both as it touches the life of the group and of the individual; laws whose mastery begets emphasis, not merely upon external consequences, but upon the inner result in the life of the individual (Ps 61 3); and prohibitions which would indicate that morality, at least in its plainer decrees, had come to be valued on its own account. If we were to seek for some clue to the development of the moral life of the Hebrews to a sense of the inner life in relation to the growing demands of human life as such. A suggestive writer has pointed out that the apparently meaningless commandment, “Thou shalt not boil a kid in its mother’s milk!” (Ex 23 19), has back of it a real human purpose, that there are some things which in themselves are revolting apart from any external consequences (see also Lev 18).

An index of the growth of the moral life of the people is to be found in the changing conception of the character of God. We need not, in our thought of God, find what we might expect to find in the Hebrews. We need not, as it were, go back to the beginning of the Hebrews started, but from the very beginning we see clearly that the moral life of the Hebrews was largely a God of War, but it is to be noticed that His enmity was against the peoples who had little regard for the larger human considerations. It has often been pointed out that one proof of the inspiration of the Scriptures is to be found in their moral superiority to the Scriptures of the peoples around about the Hebrews. If the Heb writers used material which was common property of Chaldeans, Babylonians, and other peoples, they nevertheless used these materials with a moral difference. They breathed into them a moral life which forever separates them from the Scriptures of other peoples. The marvellous also of Hebrew history is in their compelling to the very morbidly immoral surroundings the Hebrews grew to such ideals of human worth. The source of these ideals is to be found in their thought of God. Of course, in moral progress there is a reciprocal effect; the thought of God affects the thought of human life, and the thought of human life affects the thought of God; but the Hebrews no sooner came to a fresh moral insight than they made their moral discovery a part of the character of God. From the beginning, we represent God of the Hebrews as a God directed in His moral wrath against all manner of abominations, aberrations and abnormalities. The purpose of God, according to the Hebrews, was to make a people “separated!” in the sense that they were to be free from anything which would detract from a full moral life (Lev 20 22).

We can trace the more important steps in the growth of the Heb ideal. First, there was an increasingly clear discernment that certain things are to be ruled out at once as immoral. The primitive deceptions upon which the moral and social life depended were discerned at an early period (cf passages in Lev cited above). Along with this it must be admitted there was a slower approach to some ideals which we today consider important, that is, the real standards of moral behavior. (Dt 24 1.2). Then there was a growing sense of what constitutes moral obligation in the discharge of responsibilities upon the part of men toward their fellows (Isa 6 8-23). There was increasing realization also of what God, as a moral Being, is obliged to do. The hope of salvation of nations and individuals rests at once upon the righteousness of God.

By the time of Isaiah the righteousness of God had come to include the obligations of power (Isa 63 1). God will save His people, not merely because He has promised to save them, but because He must save them (42 6). The must is moral. If the people of Israel show themselves unworthy, God must punish them; but if a remnant, even a small remnant, show themselves faithful, God must show His favor toward them. Moral worth is not conceived of as something that is to be paid for by external rewards, but if God is moral He must treat the righteous and the unrighteous alike. This conception of what God must do as an obligation and being influences profoundly the Heb interpretation of the entire course of history (10 20-21).

Upon this ideal of moral obligation there grows later the thought of the virtue of vicarious suffering (ch 53). The sufferings of the good man and of God for those who do not in themselves deserve such sufferings (for them) are a mark of a still higher righteousness (see Hosea, Book or). The movement of the Scriptures is all the way from the thought of the people who were larger for the thought of a who receives in Himself the heaviest shocks of that battle that others may have opportunity for moral life.

These various lines of moral development come, of course, to their crown in the NT in the life and death of Christ as set before us in the Gospels and interpreted by the apostles. Jesus stated certain moral axioms so clearly that the world never will escape their power. He said some things once and for all, and He did some things once and for all; that is to say, in His life and death He set on high the righteousness of God as at once moral obligation and self-sacrificing love (Jn 3 16) and with such effectiveness that the world has not escaped and cannot escape this righteous influence (Jn 12 32). Moreover, the course of apostolic and subsequent history has shown that Christ put a winning and compelling power into the idea of righteousness that it would otherwise have lacked (Rom 8 31).

The ideas at work throughout the course of Heb and Christian history are, of course, at work today.

Christians Christians deepen the sense of obligation to do right. It makes the moral spirit essential. Then it utilizes every force working for the increase of human happiness to set on high the meaning of righteousness. Jesus spoke of Himself as “life,” and declared that He came that men might have life and have it more abundantly (Jn 10 10). The keeping of the commandments was an important part of the unfolding of the life of the righteous Christian, but the keeping of the commandments is not to be conceived of in artificial or mechanical fashion (Lt 10 25-37). With the passage of the centuries some commandments once conceived of as essential drop into the secondary place, and other commandments take the controlling position. In Christian development increasing place is given for certain swift insights of the moral spirit. We believe, for instance, that man needs to be set free from the moral demands that at once appeal to us as righteous. Again, some other things seem righteous because their consequences are beneficial, both for society and for the individual. Whatever makes for the largest life is in the direction of righteousness of that life, however, we must remember the essentially Christian conception that man does not live through outer consequences alone. In all thought of consequences the chief place has to be given to inner consequences. By the surrender of outward happiness and outward success a man may attain inner success. The spirit of the cross is still the path to the highest righteousness.

The distinctive note in emphasis upon righteousness in our day is the stress laid by the social service. This does not mean that

5. Righteousness as Inner Christianity is to lose sight of the righteousness worth of the individual in himself. As Social We have come pretty clearly to see that the individual is the only moral end in himself. Righteousness is to have as its aim the upbuilding of individual lives. The commandments of the righteous life are not for the sake of society as a thing in itself. Society is nothing apart from the individuals that compose it; but we are coming to see that the lives of individuals have meaning than we had once imagined and greater responsibilities than we had dreamed of. The influence of the individual touches others at more points than we had formerly realized. We have at times con-defined the system of things as being responsible for much human misery which we now see can be traced to the sin of individuals. The employer, the day-laborer, the public servant, all these have large responsibilities for the life of those around. The unrighteous individual has a power of contaminating other individuals, and his sinfulness we have just begun to understand. All this receiving new emphasis in our present-day preaching of righteousness. While our social relations are not ends in themselves, they are mighty means for reaching individuals in large numbers. The Christian conception of redeemed humanity is that of a new creature existing on its own account, but that of individuals knotted very closely together in their social relationships and touching one another for good in these relationships (1 Cor 1 2; Rev 7 9,10). If we were to try to point out the line in which the Christian doctrine of righteousness is to move more and more through the years, we should have to emphasize this element of obligation to society. This does not mean that a new gospel is to supersede the old or even place it in the old. It cannot mean that the righteousness of God and the teaching of Christ and the cross, which are as ever the center of Christianity, are to find fresh force in the thought of the righteousness of the Christian as binding itself, not merely by commandments to do the will of God in society, but in the inner spirit to live the life of God out into society.

In all our thought of righteousness it must be borne in mind that there is nothing in Christian revelation which will tell us what righteousness calls for in every particular circumstance. The differences between different standards in different circumstances have led to much confusion in the realm of Christian thinking. We can keep our bearing, however, by remembering the double element in righteousness which we mentioned in the beginning; on the one hand, the will to do right, and, on the other, the difficulty of determining in a particular circumstance just what the right is. The larger Christian conceptions always have an element of fluidity, or, rather, an element of expansiveness. For example, it is clearly a Christian obligation to talk in a spirit of godliness, but what does love call for in a particular case? We can only answer the question by saying that love seeks for whatever is best, both for him who receives and for him who gives. This may lead to one course of conduct in one situation and to quite a different course in another. We must, however, keep before us always the aim of the largest life for all persons whom we can reach. Christian righteousness today is even more insistent upon material things such as sanitary arrangements, than was the Code of Moses. The obligation to use the latest knowledge for the hygienic welfare is just as binding now as then, but the "latest knowledge" is a changing term. Material progress, education, spiritual instruction, are all influences we are called upon to make for full life.

Not only is present-day righteousness social and growing; it is also concerned, to a large degree, with the thought of the world which now is. Righteousness has too often been conceived of merely as the means of maintaining the life of man in a present future Kingdom of Heaven. Present-day emphasis has not ceased to think of the life beyond this, but the life beyond can now best be met and faced by those who have been in the full sense righteous in the life that now is. There is here no break in true Christian continuity. The seeds who have understood Christ's tianity best always have insisted that to the fullest degree the present world must be redeemed by the life-giving forces of Christianity. We still insist that all idea of earthly righteousness takes its start from heavenly righteousness, or, rather, that the righteousness of man is to be based upon his conception of the righteousness of God. Present-day thinking concerns itself largely with the idea of the immanence of God in this present world. This does not mean that there may not be other worlds, or are not other worlds, and that God is not also in those worlds; but the immediate revelation of God to us is in our present world. Our present world is existing on the sphere of the righteousness of God and of man is to be set forth.

God is conscience, and God is love. The present sphere is to be used for the manifestation of His holy love. The chief channel through which that holy love is to manifest itself is the conscience and very of the Christian, but even those terms are not to be used in the abstract. There is an abstract conscientiousness which leads to barren living: the life gets out of touch with things that are real. There is an experienced conscience which exhausts itself in criticism. Both conscience and love are to be kept close to the earth by emphasis upon the actual realities of the world in which we live.

RIMMON, rimmon: (1) The rock Rimmon (דִּמְנָם, qdl. rimmon; שַׁעַרְוָּא יֵשָׁמָה, Sh. Rimmon; 'Pemâw, hê pêtra Rheomôn); The place of refuge of the 600 surviving Benjamites of Gibeah (Jeffo) who "fanned and fled to the wilderness unto the rock of Rimmon, and abode in the rock of Rimmon four months" (Jgs 20 45.47; 21 13). Robinson's identification (RB, I, 440) has been very generally accepted. He found a conical and very prominent hill some 6 meters high, which he thought stood upon which stands a village called Rimmon. This site was known to Eusebius and Jerome (OS 146 6; 287 95), who describe it as fifteen Roman miles from Jerus. Another view, which would locate the place of refuge of the Benjamites in the large cove on the south of the Wady Suweint, near Jeba, is strongly advocated by Ravnsby and Birch (see PEF, III, 131-48). The latter connects this again with 1 Sm 14 2, where Saul, accompanied by his 600 horsemen in the uplands of Gibeath under the pomegranate tree (Rimmon).

(2) (דִּמְנָם, rimmon; 'Rimmon, Eremon, or 'Pemâw, Rheomôn); A city in the Negeb, near the border of Edom, ascribed to Judah (Josh 15 32) and to Simeon (19 7; 1 Ch 4 32, AV "Rimmon"). In Zec 14 10 it is mentioned as the extreme S. of Judea—"from Geba to Rimmon, S. of Jerus."

In the earlier references Rimmon occurs in close association with 'Ain (a spring), and in Neh 11 29, what is apparently the same place, 'Ain Rimmon, is called En-rimmon (q.v.):

(3) (דִּמְנָה, rimmon; Josh 19 13, 'Rimnah, rimmonah, in some Heb. MSS רַמְנָה, rimnah; see also Dan 7 Josh 21 55), and רָמַנָה, rimmonah (1 Ch 6 77)).

In AV we have often met with the life of Rimmonah in future Kingdom of Heaven. Present-day emphasis has not ceased to think of the life beyond this, but the life beyond can now best be met and faced by those who have been in the full sense righteous in the life that now is. There is here no break in true Christian continuity. RIMMON (רִימְמֹן, rīmmono, "pomegranate"); see RIMMON-PEREZ.

(1) A Syrian god. Naaman the Syrian leper after being cured is troubled over the fact that he will still have to bow down in the house of the Syrian god, Rimmon, when his master goes into the house to worship leining on his hand (2 K 5 18). Elisha answers him ambiguously: "Go in peace." Judging from Naaman’s position and this incident, R. must have been one of the leading gods of the Syrians worshipped in Damascus. He has been identified with Rammunu, the Assyrian god of wind, rain and storm. The name appears in the Syrian personal names Hadadrimmon and Tabbarrimmon (q.v.) and its meaning is dubious (ramānu, "to thunder") (?).

(2) A Benjaminite of Beeroth, whose sons Bannah and Rechab assassinated Ish-bosheth (2 S 4 2 5 9).

RIMMON-PEREZ, r-pē’rez (רְמְמוֹן הָפְּרֶאצ, rimmon perez; AV Rimmon-parez); A desert camp of the Israelites (Nu 33 19 f), unidentified. Gesenius translates rimmon as "pomegranate," the place deriving its name from the abundance of pomegranates. But Conder derives it from rāmon, "to be high," and translates it "clove height." See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

RIMMON, ROCK OF. See RIMMON, (1).

RIMMONAH, rim-mō’na, RIMMONO, rim-mō’no. See RIMMON, (3).

RING (AS HING, "ring"); The word renders (ARV) two Heb words (in AV and ERV three) and two Gr words. μαλακτές, tābba’eth, the principal Heb word, is from בַּבָּא, "sink," either because the ring is something "cast" or molded, or more probably, since the principal use of the ring was as a seal, because it "sank" into the wax or clay that received the impression. In Ex, tābba’eth, "ring," is a detail of furniture or equipment, as the rings of the ark through which the staves were thrust (Ex 25 12, etc), rings for curtains, in the high priest’s ephod (Ex 28 28; 39 21), etc. Its other use was perhaps the hope, to describe the article of personal adornment worn on the finger, apparently in the OT always a signet-ring, and as such an indispensable article of masculine attire. Such a ring Pharaoh gave Joseph as a symbol of authority (Gen 41 42); and Ahasuerus gave Haman (Est 3 10); with it the royal missive was sealed (Est 3 12; 8 8 hos 10). It was also a feminine ornament in Israel’s list of the fashionable feminine paraphernalia, "the rings and the nose-jewels" (quite likely rings also) (Isa 3 21). Either as ornaments or for their intrisic value, or both, rings were used as gifts for sacred purposes from both men and women: "brooches, ear-rings, and signet-rings" (Mo "rose-rings") (Ex 22 22); "bracelets, rings (ARV "signetrings"), ear-rings" (Nu 31 50 AV). כְּנֵי, hōthām, "signet," mentioned in Gen 38 18 25; Ex 28 11. 21.36; Ex 39 614 30; Jer 22 24; Hag 2 23, etc, was probably usually a seal ring, but in Gen 38 and elsewhere the seal may have been swung on wire, and suspended by a cord round the neck. It was not only an identification, but served as a stamp for signature. וְלָל, gādāl, "circle" (cf "Galleı̇e," "Circle" of the Gentiles), rendered "ring" in Est 1 6; Cant 5 14, may rather mean "cylinder" or "rod" of metal. Earring (q.v.) in AV is from totally different words: לָל, lehōsh, "amulet"; so RV. The "rings" of the wheels in Ezek 1 18 (AV) are מֹמְibilidad, gādāl, "curved," and mean "rings" (ARV), "felloes." Egyptians esp. wore a great profusion of rings, principally of silver or gold, engraved with scarabaei, or other devices. In the NT the ring, δακτύλιον, δακτυλίων, "fingerring," is a token of means, position, standing: "put a ring on his hand!" (Lk 15 21) which so far it included the right to give orders in his father’s name. To be χειροδακτυλιον, chrusodaktulios, "golden-ringed," perhaps with more than one, indicated wealth and social rank: "a man with a gold ring" (Jas 2 2). See also EARRING; SIGNET; SEAL.

RINGLEADER, ringb‘ld-er: In Acts 21 5 the τριστήραρχος, ἐπιστολιστής, "one who stands first," Not an opprobrious word in the Gr.

RINGSTREAKED, ring’strēkt (AV and ERV ringstreaked): Gen 30 35 39 40; 31 8 (b);10.12 for תָּפְּק, tāqādāh. In the context of 30 35, etc, tāqādāh certainly denotes defective coloring of some sort, but the exact meaning of the word is uncertain. The tr "ringstreaked" ("marked with circular bands") comes from connecting the word with the suffix, "tāqādāh, to bind" (Gen 22 9), but this connection is dubious.

RINNAH, rin’a (רִינָנָה, rimnah, "praise to God"); LXX B, ἀνή, ἀνὴ, Α, Παννα, Ραββαν; A Judahite, according to MT a son of Shimon (1 Ch 4 20). But LXX makes him a son of Haman (B, Phond, A, Andna) by reading "ben" in the next name (Ben-hanan) as "son of."*

RIOU, ri’ut: Properly, "unrestrained behavior" of any sort, but in modern Eng. usually connoting mob action, although such phrases as a "rural banquet" are still in common use. AV uses the word in the first sense, and it is retained by RV in Lk 15 13; Tit 1 6; 1 Pet 4 4 for ἀντροσία, ἀνθοῦσα, ἀναρατησία, ἀνάρατος, "having no hope of safety," "profligate." In Prov 23 20; 28 7 RV has preferred "gluttonous," "gullet," in Rom 13 13, "revelling," and in 2 Pet 2 13, "revel.

RIPHATH, ri’fath (ריפח, ri’phath); A son of Gomer, the eldest son of Japheth (Gen 10 3; 1 Ch 1 6), where MT and RV read Dufath (q.v.). Jos (Ant, vi, 1) identifies the Riphathans with the Paphlagonians, through whose country on the Black Sea ran the river "Rhebas" (Pliny, NH, vi.4).

RISING, ri’zin (רָאשׁ, sō’eth, "a tumor," "swelling" [Lev 13 2 10, etc]. See Leprosy.

RISSEAH, ris’a (רִיסָא, risā, "dew"): A camp of the Israelites in the wilderness wandering between RITHMAH, rith'ma (רִיתָם, rithmah), "broom"): A desert camp of the Israelites (Nu 33 18-19). The name refers to the white desert broom. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

RIVER, riv'ér: (1) The usual word is נְחָר, nāḥār (Aram. נֶחָר, nēḥār, nāḥār [Ezr 4 10, etc.], used of the rivers of Eden (Gen 2 10-14), often of the Eufrates (Gen 15 18, etc.), of Ararat and Pharpar (2 K 5 12), the river of Gozan (2 K 17 5), of the river Chabor (Ezr 1 1), the rivers (canals?) of Babylon (Ps 137 1), the rivers of Ethiopia (Isa 18 1; Zeph 3 10). Cf נַחֲלָה, nahlāh, the common Aram. word for "river." (2) נָחַר, yə'ār, according to BDB from עַר, 'aro, "watercourse," often of the Nile (Ex 1 22, etc.). In Isa 19 6, for יְרָח, yērāch, yə'ārē māqōr, AV "brooks of defense," RV has "streams of Egypt." In Isa 19 7-8, for yə'ār, AV "brooks," and Zec 10 11, AV "river," RV "Nile." In Job 28 10, AV "He cutteth out rivers among the rocks," RV "has channels," AV "ravines," (3) There are nearly 100 references to נְחָר, nāḥār. In about half of these AV has "brook" and in about half "river." RV has more often "brook" or "valley." But RV has river in "whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers" (Lev 11 9); "the river Jabbok" (Dt 2 37; Josh 13 2); the stream issuing from the temple (Ezek 47 5-12). RV has "brook of Egypt," i.e. el-'Arṭuh (Nu 34 5; Josh 15 17; 1 K 8 65; 2 K 24 7; 2 Ch 7 8; Am 6 14, "of the Arabah"); "brook of the river of Kanah" (Josh 16 18); "valley [AV "river"] of the Arnon" (Dt 2 24). EV has "valley": of Gerar (Gen 26 17), of Zered (Nu 21 12), but "brook Zered" (Dt 2 13), of Eschol (Nu 32 9), of Sorek (Jgs 16 4), of Shittim (Joel 3 18). EV has "brooks": Besor (1 S 30 10), Kidron (2 S 23 16), Gash (2 S 23 30), Cherith (1 K 17 3); also the fem. נְחַרָה, nāḥārāh, "brook [AV "river"] of Egypt" (Ezek 47 19; 48 28). The torrent-valley (עֵדֶּיה, vedēḥ) is often meant.

(4) נָחַל, nāḥal, with fem. נָחַלָה, nāḥalāh, ποηγός, AV "river," is in RV τῆς "stream," except EV "river in [Ps 66 9]; streams of water" (Ps 1 3); Prov 5 15; Lam 4 6); "stream of his bones" (Job 20 17); "streams of oil" (Job 29 6). (5) נֶחַל, nēḥal, AV "river," is in RV τῆς "stream," except EV "water-brooks" (Ps 42 1), is in RV "watercourses" (Ezek 6 3; 31 12; 32 6; 34 14; 35 8; 36 4.6), "water-brooks" (Cant 5 12; Joel 1 20). (6) נָחַל, nāḥal, yēḥelah, EV "river" (Jer 17 8). נָחֲלָה, and נָחְלָה, nāḥalāh, "brook, EV "river" (Dn 6 2.3.6). (7) וַרְאָה, pā'āḥa, pā'āḥā, of the Jordan ( Mk 5 5): Euphrates (Rev 9 14); "rivers of living water" (Jn 7 38); "rivers of water of life" except EV "water-brooks" (Ps 42 1), is in RV "watercourses" (Ezek 6 3; 31 12; 32 6; 34 14; 35 8; 36 4.6), "water-brooks" (Cant 5 12; Joel 1 20). RIZIA, rìz'-ə (רִיצָא, rïzā; pēsh., pēshā; A.V. Rizia, Rizia): An Asherite (1 Ch 7 39).

RIZPAH, rìz'-pā (רִיצָפָה, rïzōfāh, "hot stone"); Jos, Pā'āch, Phēthoph): In 2 S 3 7 the subject of a coarse slander. 2 S 21 contains the pathetic story of Rizpah's faithful watch over the bodies of her dead sons Mephibosheth and Armoni (vs 10.11).

Did this story suggest Tennyson's "Rizpah"? A three years' famine had made David anxious, and in seeking a reason for the affliction he concluded that it lay in Saul's unavenged conduct to the Gibeonites (ver 2). To appease Jeh he gave up to the Gibeonites the two sons of Saul, Mephibosheth and Armoni, as well as Saul's five grandsons (whether by Michal or Merab; see MEHAB). These sons were hanged at Gibeath. Rizpah watched 5 months over their exposed bodies, while meanwhile the famine did not abate. Word was brought to David of Rizpah's act (vs 10.11), and it is possible that her action suggested to David his next step in expiation. At any rate, he remembered the uncared-for bones of Jonathan and Saul lying in ignominy at Jabesh-gilead, whether they had been carried by stealth after the Philis had kept them hung in the streets of Beth-shan for some time. The bones were recovered and apparently mingled with the bones Rizpah had guarded, and they were together buried in the family grave at Zelah. We are told that then "God was entreated for the land" (ver 14).

ROAST, rōst. See Food.

ROBBER, rob'ər, ROBBERY, rob'ə-rē: "Robber" represents no particular Heb word in the OT, but in the Apoc and the NT is always a tr of λαθρεύω, λαθραίος (see Thier). In AV Job 5 5; 18 9, "robber" stands for the doubtful word ἄνθρωπος, ἄνθρωπον, RV "hungry" in 5 5 and "snares" in 18 9. The meaning is "robber," and perhaps "slave," "thievish" should be read in both places. Ps 62 10, "Become not vain in robbery," means "put not your trust in riches dishonestly gained." RV's changes of AV in Prov 21 7; Dn 11 14; Nah 3 1 are obvious. In Phil 2 6 AV reads "thought it not robbery to be equal with God." ERV has "a prize," while ERVm and ARv read "a thing to be grasped," ARv wording "counted not the being on an equality with God a thing to be grasped." The Gr here is ἀνθρωπόμως, a word derived from ἄνθρωπος, "to ravish away, 'carry off,' 'plunder' (cf. "harpy"). Properly speaking, the termination -mos should give the derived noun an active sense, "the act of plundering," whence AVv's "robbery." The verse speaks of the man who "thought that being on an equality with God did not consist in grasping," and this tr gives good sense in the context and has some excellent scholarly support. But a passive significance is frequently found despite a -mos termination, giving to ἀνθρωπόμως the sense of "thing grasped," as in RV. Usually Eng. commentators take "grasped" as meaning "clung to"—"did not think equality with God should be clung to tenaciously"—but "to cling to" seems unknown as a tr of ἀνθρωπόμως. Hence render "a thing to be grasped at"—"did not seek equality with God by selfish methods but by humbling himself." It is to be noticed, naturally, that St. Paul is thinking of "equality with God" simply in the sense of "receiving explicit adoration from men" (vs 10.11), and that the metaphysical relation of the Son to the Father is not at all in point. ROBBERS OF TEMPLES (ἰπποδότοι, hierosoloi, "guilty of sacrilege"): A term used by the town clerk of Ephesus (Acts 19 38) for the 'chaplains of churches'). As the temple of Diana had a great treasure-chamber, the offence might not be unknown among them; cf Rom 2 22.
ROBE, ráb. See DUES, 1, (3).

ROBOAM, rō-bō'am (Ρωμᾶς, Rhodobam). AV; Gr form of "Rhobos" (thus RV) (Mt 1:7); successor of Solomon.

1. Names [Job 30:6; Jer 4:20; cf Kykkēs, Kykkēs, "Cynapsis" = Ἡρός, Pyros, "Peter" [In 1 42 AV and RVm]; [5] πέτρα, pētra]: ēr and sela are the words most often found, and there is no well-defined distinction between them. They are frequently coupled together in the parallelism which is characteristic of the Heb writers: e.g. 2596

2. In 2 Mach. 4:12 AV the epithet "church-robb'er" (RV 'author of the sacrilege') is applied to Lystima-cus (q.v.).

3. Rock which have for ages been exposed to atmospheric agencies, erosion has produced striking and highly picturesque forms. Nodules and layers of flint are of frequent occurrence in the limestone of Asia.

(2) Limestone is the only rock of Western Pal. with the exception of some local outpourings of basaltic rock and with the further exception of a light-brown, porous, partly calcareous sandstone, which is found at intervals along the coast. This last is a superficial deposit of Quaternary Recent age, and is of aeolian origin. That is, it consists of dune sands which have solidified under the influence of atmospheric agencies. This is very exceptional, nearly all stratified rocks having originated as beds of sand or mud in the bottom of the sea.

(3) In Sinai, Edom, Moab, Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon is found the Nubian sandstone, a silicious sandstone which, at least in the N., is of middle or lower Cretaceous age. In the S., the lower strata of this formation seem to be paleozoic. Most of it is not sufficiently coherent to make good building stone, though some of its strata are very firm and are even used for millstones. In some places it is so incoherent or friable that it is easily dug with the pick, the grains falling apart and forming sand that can be used in mortar. In color the Nubian sandstone is on the whole dark reddish brown, but locally it shows great variation, from white through yellow and red to black. In places it also has tints of blue. The celebrated rock tombs and temples of Petra are carved in this stone.

(4) Extensive areas of the northern part of Eastern Pal are covered with igneous rock. In the Jauālān S.E. of Mt. Hermon, this has been for ages exposed to the atmosphere and has formed superficially a rich dark soil. Further S.E. is the Leje' (Arab. "refuge"); a wild tract covered with a deposit of lava which is geologically recent, and which, while probably earlier than man, is still but little affected by the atmosphere. It is with difficulty traversed and frequently furnishes an asylum to outlaws. See CRAG; FLINT; GEOLOGY; LIME.

ROCK OF AGES. See AGES, ROCK OF; ISAIAH, VII.

ROCK-BADGER, r-baj'ér: This term is found in RVm for "coney," הָרָקֶפָן, ḥāşphān (Lev 11:5; cf Dt 14:7; Ps 104:18; Prov 30:26). It is a tr of klip das, the name given by the Boers to the Cape hyrax or coney. See Coney.

ROD (דָאָב, makābēl, ṣāleb, ṣāleb, ꜱẖēḥḥet; ṣābeṣ, ṣābās): Little distinction can be drawn between the Heb words used for "rod" and "staff." Makābēl is the word used in Gen 30:37ff for the twigs of poplar put by Jacob before his sheep, and in Jer 11:11 of the "rod of an almond-tree." Makābēl is used of a rod in the hand, as the "rod" of Moses and of Aaron (Ex 4:2ff; 7ff, etc). Ṣẖēḥḥet is used, but sometimes also ṣāleb, of the rod used for correction (Ex 21:20; 2 S 7:14; Prov 10:13; 13:24; Isa 10:5, etc). In Ps 23:4 "Their rod and their staff, they all together; however, ṣẖēḥḥet is the shepherd's rod, figurative of Divine guidance and care. In Ezk 21:10.13, the word stands for the royal scepter. In the NT ṣāleb is used of a rod of correction (1 Cor 4:21), Aaron's rod (Ex 4:20). It is a measure of iron (severity, as in Rev 2:27; 12:5; 19:15), a measuring rod (Rev 11:1). See also ARMOR, ARMS.

JAMES ORR
RODANIM, rod'a-min: The reading of MT in 1 Ch 7 7 for the RODANIM (q.v.) of Gen 10 4, corresponding to the Pēšon, Rhōthoi of LXX in both passages. The Rodanim are generally identified as inhabitants of the island of Rhodes (q.v.), well known to the ancient Phoenicians (Romer's Ḥiād).

ROE, rō, ROEBUCK, rō-buk: AV has "roe" and "roe-buck" for אָבָק, כַּבָּק, כָּבָּק, כָּבָּק. RV usually substitutes "gazelle" in the text (Dt 12 15, etc) or m (Prov 6 5, etc), but retains "roe" in 2 S 2 18; 1 Ch 12 8; Cant 3 5; 7 3. So RV has "gazelle" for AV "roe" in Sir 27 20 (dorkas). RV has "roe-buck" for אָבָק, כַּבָּק, כָּבָּק, כָּבָּק. See Deer; Gazelle. ALFRED ELY DAY

ROGELIM, rō-gē-līm, rō-gē-līm; Ρόγελιμ, ρόγελιμ: The place whence came Barzillai the Gileadite to succor David in his flight from Absalom (2 S 17 27; 19 31). It probably lay near the path followed by David, but it is not identified.

ROHGAH, rō-ga (Κ'θῆθι ῥογᾶ, ρόγος, K' rōgā, roghah): A name in the genealogy of Asher (1 Ch 7 34).

ROIMUS, rō-imus (Ῥώιμος, Rhéimos, A, Ρ'μος, Rhomous): One of the leaders with Zerubbabel in the return (1 Esd 5 8) = "Rehuma" in Ezr 2 2, of which it is the Gr form = "Nehum" in Neh 7 7.

ROLL, rōl (SCROLL): The usual form of book in Bib. times. It had been in use in Egypt for perhaps 2,000 years at the time when, according to the Pent, the earliest Bib. books were written in this form. The Bab tablet seems to have been the prevailing form in Pal up to about 1350 BC, but by 1100 BC, at least, the roll had been in established use for some time as far N. as Byblos. Two Heb words, גיליון, m'gillah, one Aram., שפופר, and one Gr word, βιβλίον, are so tr in AV: "scroll" (Ezr 6 1, RV "archives," m "books"), with the corresponding Heb form שפּהֶר, is the generic word for any whole work large or small, but as a book form (Isa 30 19) it may mean "roll," and, according to Blau (pp. 37, 45, etc), it never does mean anything else. Both the other words seem to be connected with גָּלָל, "roll," which is the technical term for open-of singer in David's time (I Ch 25:4.31). See JOSHBEKASHAH.

LITERATURE

I. OUTLINE OF ROMAN EMPIRE.—The founding of the Roman empire was the grandest political achievement ever accomplished. The conquerors of Alexander the Great, Carthage, and Rome were a magnum and Napoléon seem small compared with the durable structure reared by Julius and his successor, Augustus. In one sense Julius Caesar the most wonderful man that Rome or any other country produced—was the founder of the empire, and Augustus the founder of the princeps. But the Roman empire was the culmination of a long process of political, constitutional, and social growth which gave a lasting aspect to the Roman state. The Roman empire was the only possible solution of a 700 years' struggle, and Roman history is the story of the conflict of class with class, patrician against plebeian, populus against plobr, the antagonism of oligarchy and democracy, the conflict against neglect and abuse. It is the account of the triumphant march of democracy and popular government against an exclusive governing caste. Against heavy odds the plebeians asserted their rights till they secured at least a measure of social, political and legal equality with their kinsmen (see Rome, I, 2, 4). But in the long conflict both parties degenerated until neither militant democracy nor despotic oligarchy could hold the balance with justice. Democracy had won in the uphill fight, but lost itself and was obliged to consent to a common master with autocratic

Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius. This, the best and longest lasting of the imperial governments, was the beginning of the end. In this era a dangerous centralization of authority; the senate practically became a side issue of minor importance, and a so-called "dictatorship" was established which culminated in bureaucracy under Hadrian.

2. Coming of Monarchy.

(2) Exhaustion of parties. —The Roman world had for two generations been in a crisis, and at least one generation before the emperors. There was set up the inevitable necessity of one-man government or supreme power, and each political leader made it his ambition to grasp it. The civil wars ceased for a century with the death of Antony. But the struggles of Tibullus Gracchus and Scipio Africanus was the end of the republic.

2. Coming of Monarchy.

(2) Exhaustion of parties. —The Roman world had for two generations been in a crisis, and at least one generation before the emperors. There was set up the inevitable necessity of one-man government or supreme power, and each political leader made it his ambition to grasp it. The civil wars ceased for a century with the death of Antony. But the struggles of Tibullus Gracchus and Scipio Africanus. The Roman Empire.

3. Free of popular government could live under such conditions. Caesar said of the republic that it wore a name without any substance, and Cicero said that "it was a "van chimer." The law courts shared in the general corruption. The civil strife was one of the most bitter, and the laws between the senate and the knights was the best instrument for party interests, and enabled the holders (a) to receive large personal fortunes, (b) to take advantage of the gravity of the most flagrant injustices, and (c) to oppress other orders. In any case, the whole body of people was impossible. Effective assemblies refused to perform their proper functions because of extravagant bribery or the threat of assassination. Furthermore, the people were willing to forgo the prerogatives of election and participate in the despotism of a despotic authority. The whole people had become incapable of self-government and were willing—almost had to be—subjected to a monarch.
ambition could best meet their grievances. The senate had ruled with a rod of iron; the provinces could not possibly prosper under any form of central government. Besides, monarchy was more congenial to the provincials than a republic, which they could not comprehend.

10. Influence of Orient.—The Orientals had long been used to living under imperial and absolute forms of government, and of late years they had been drawn into the new conquerors. Besides, residence in the Orient had affected Rom military leaders with the thirst after another empire; and no other form was possible when the old city-state system broke down, and as yet federal government had not been dreamed of. Another consideration: the vast and dissimilar masses of population living within the Roman dominions could more easily be held together or emasculated than by a series of ever-changing administrations, just as the Austro-Hungarian and the British empires are probably held together better under the present monarchy than would be possible under a republican system. This survey may make clear to any student the history of the Orient for all students of human history. The Roman empire was established indeed in the fulness of the times for its citizens and for Christianity.

II. Preparation of the Roman Empire for Christianity.—About the middle of the reign of Augustus a Jewish child was born who was destined to rule an empire more extensive and lasting than that of the Caesars. It is a striking fact that almost simultaneously with the planting of the Roman empire Christianity appeared in the world. Although on a superficial glance the Roman empire may seem the greatest enemy of early Christianity, and at times a bitter persecutor, yet it was in many ways the greatest promoter, and in some ways the best ally of Christianity. It ushered in politically the fulness of the times. The Caesars—whatever they may have been or done—prepared the way of the Lord. A brief account must here be given of some of the services which the Roman empire rendered to humanity and esp. to the kingdom of God.

The first universal blessing conferred by the empire was the famous Pax Romana ("Roman peace").

1. Pax Romana and Universalism of the World

The world had not been at peace since the days of Alexander the Great. The quarrels of the Diadochi, and the aggression of the Roman republic had kept the nations in a state of constant turmoil. A universal peace was first established with the beginning of the reign of Augustus and the closing of the temple of Janus. In all the countries round the Mediterranean and from distant Britain to the Euphrates the world was at rest. Rome had made an end of her own civil wars and had put an end to wars among the nations. Though her wars were often iniquitous and unjustifiable, and she conquered like a barbarian, she ruled her conquests like a humane statesman. The quarrels of the Diadochi which caused so much turmoil in the East were ended, the territory of the Lagids, Attalids, Seleucids and Antigonids having passed under the sway of Rome. The empire united Greeks, Romans and Jews all under one government. Rome thus blended the nations and assimilated them to Christianity. New for the first time we may speak of the world as universal humanity, the orbis terrarum, earthly man (Lk 2:1), the genus humanum. These terms represented humanity as living under a uniform system of government. All were members of one earthly state; the Roman empire was their commiss. omnium patriae.

This state of affairs contributed largely to the spread of cosmopolitanism which had set in with the Macedonian conqueror. Under the Romans all language barriers were removed; the great cities—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, etc.—became meetingplaces of all races and languages. The Romans were everywhere carrying their laws and civilization. Greeks settled thousands in all important centers as professors, merchants, physicians, or nobles; Orientals were to be found in large numbers with their gods and mysteries in Rome, "the epitome of the world." In the Roman armies soldiers from all quarters of the empire became companions. And many thousands of slaves of fine education and high culture were drawn among them as new conquerors. Being in many cases far superior in culture to their masters, they became their teachers. And in every city of importance, East or West, large bodies of the Jewish Diaspora were settled.

This cosmopolitanism gave great impetus to a corresponding eclecticism of thought. Nothing could have been more favorable to 3. Eclectic Christianity than this mixture of the Christian and non-Christian. Each person discovered how much he had in common with his neighbors. From the days of the Diadochi, Stoicism had been preaching the gospel of a civic and ethical brotherhood of humanity. In the fusion of different philosophic systems the emphasis had shifted from the city-state or the political or national to the human point of view. All men were thus reduced to equality before the One; only virtue and vice were the differentiating factors. Men were akin with the Divine—at least the wise and good—so that one poet could say, "Whoever is good is a God." Stoicism did a noble service in preparation for Christianity by preaching universalism along the path of individualism. It also furnished comfort and strength to countless thousands of weary human lives and ministered spiritual support and calm resignation at many a hearth devastated. It may be that the universal system of religious thought—for it was a religion more than a philosophy—which made a serious study of the diseases of the human soul, gave rise to theAttempts of Chrysostom and Augustine to use the Stoic little message for the fallen and lower classes, that it was cold and stern, that it lacked—as Seneca felt—the inspiration of an ideal life. But with all its failures it proved a worthy pedagogue to a religion which brought a larger message than that of Greece. It afforded the spiritual and moral counterpart to the larger human society of which the Roman empire was the political and visible symbol. Hitherto a good citizen had been a good man. Now a good man is a good citizen, and that not of a narrow city-state, but of the world. Stoicism also proved the interpreter and mouthpiece to the Roman empire of the higher moral and spiritual qualities of Gr civilization: the use of reason and virtue to express the Greek and about God and man, selecting those elements that were universal and of lasting human value (see STOICISM).

The mind of the Roman empire was further prepared for Christianity by the Jewish Diaspora. The Jews, learning from Jews and Romans and Greeks, were creating a new Judaism and the Romans from both. The unification effected by Rom law and administration greatly aided the Diaspora. Jewish settlements became still more numerous and powerful both in the East and West. Those Jews bringing from the homeland the spiritual monotheism of their race combined it with Gr philosophy which had been setting steadily for monotheism. With the Jews the exclusively national element was subordinated to the more human and universal, the ceremonial to the religious. They even adopted the world-language of that day—Greek—and had their sacred Scriptures translated into this language in which they carried on an active proselytism. The Roman spirit was at first essentially that of the old Paganism, and exclusive. But the Romans soon fell beneath the spell of this cosmopolitanism and eclecticism. As their conquests increased, their mind was correspondingly widened. They adopted the policy of Alexander—sparing the gods of the conquered and admitting them into the responsibility of guarding Rome, and setting them with their own Pantheon or identified them with Rom gods. In this way naturally the religious ideas of conquered races more highly civilized than the conquerors held on Rom minds (see DISPERSION).
Another inestimable service rendered to humanity and Christianity was the protection which the Roman power afforded the Greek civilization.

We must remember that the Romans were at first only conquering barbarians who had little respect for culture, but idealized the culture of Greece already then had wiped out two ancient and superior civilizations—that of Carthage without leaving a trace, and that of Etruria, traces of which have been discovered in modern times. It is hard to conceive what a surge of human progress to the world she had not fallen under the influence of the superior culture and philosophy of Greece. Had the Rom Mars not been educated by Pallas Athene the Romans would have proved Vandals and Tartars in blotting out civilization and arresting human progress. The Greeks, on the other hand, could conquer more by their preeminence in everything that pertains to the intellectual life of man than they could hold by the sword. A practical and political power was needed to protect Greek speculation. But the Romans after causing much devastation were gradually educated and civilized and have contributed to the uplifting and enlightenment of subsequent civilizations by both preserving and opening to the world the wondrous gifts of Greece. The kinship of man with the Divine, learned from Socrates and Plato, went forth on its wide evangel. This Greek civilization, philosophy and theology trained many of the great theologians and leaders of the Christian churches. That Clement of Alexandria said that Greek philosophy and Jewish law had proved schoolmasters to bring the world to Christ, Paul, who prevented Christianity from remaining a Jewish sect and proclaimed its universalism, learned much from Greek—much from Stoic thought. It is significant that the early Christian missionaries apparently went only where the Greek language was known, which was the case in all centers of Rom administration.

The state of the Roman empire linguistically was in the highest degree favorable to the spread of Christianity. The Greek republics by their enterprise, superior genius and commercial abilities extended their dialects over the Aegean Islands, the coasts of Asia Minor, Sicily, and Africa. The preeminence of Attic culture and literature favored by the short-lived Athenian empire raised this dialect to a standard among the Gr peoples. But the other dialects long persisted. Out of this babel of Greek dialects there arose a normal koine or "common language." By the conquests of Alexander and the Hellenistic sympathies of the Diadochi this common Gr language became the lingua franca of antiquity. Gr was known in Northern India, at the Parthian court, and on the distant shores of the Euxine (Black Sea). The native land of the gospel was surrounded on all sides by Gr civilization. Gr culture and language penetrated into the midst of the obstinate home-keeping Palestinian Jews. Though Gr was not the mother-tongue of Our Lord, He understood Gr and apparently could speak it when occasion required—Aram. being the language of His heart and of His public teachings. The history of the Maccabean struggle affords ample evidence of the extent to which Gr culture and words with the Gr language were familiar to the Jews. There were in later days Hellenistic bodies of devout Jews in Jerusalem. Gr was recognized by the Jews as the universal language: the inscription on the wall of the outer temple court found among the doomed priests under penalty of death to enter was in Gr. The koine became the language even of religion—where a foreign tongue is least likely to be used—of the large Jewish Diaspora. They perceived the advantages of Gr as the language of commerce—the Jews' occupation—of culture and of proselytizing. They threw open their sacred Scriptures in the LXX and other VSS to the Gr-Rom world, adapting the tr in many respects to the requirements of the readers. "Isaiah Yahweh was the Bible of one people: the Bible whose God was kuros [kurios, "Lord"] was the Bible of humanity." When the Romans came upon the scene, they found this language so widely known and so deeply rooted they could not hope to suppress it. So they did what they had done in Sicily and Magna Graecia—to suppress Gr, but rather gladly accepted it as the one common means of intercourse among the peoples of their eastern dominions (see LANGUAGE OF THE NT).

Though Latin was of course the official language of the conquerors, the decree of governors generally appeared with a Gr tr, so that they might be "understood of the people," and Gr overcame Lat, as English drove out the French of the Norman invaders. Lat poets and historians more than once complained that Graecae eorundem motus linguas ("conquered Greece vanquished its stern conqueror"). With the spread of Lat there were two world-languages side by side for the whole Rom empire, but Gr was prevailing. The language of the eastern half of the empire was the Rom empire, of that soil for Christian churches and the first half of the empire to be Christianized. Later when Christianity was able to extend her activity to the West, she found Lat ready as the common means of intercourse. That Rome respected Gr is greatly to her credit and much to the advantage of Christianity. For Christianity, when it began to aim at universalism, dropped its native Aramaic. The gospel in order to become a world-evangel was tr into Gr. The early Gr Christians did not hesitate to use languages or patois of the Rom empire, but confined themselves to centers of Gr culture. Paul wrote in Gr to the church in Rome itself, of which Gr was the language. And while Christianity was spreading through the Gr East under the influence of Rom administration, the Romans were Romanizing and leveling the West for Lat Christianity (see LATIN). In the West it may be noted that the first foothold of the Christian religion was in Gaul—without a sign of Gr. In material ways too Rome opened the way for Christianity by building the great highways for the gospel. The great system of roads that knit the then civilized world together served not only the legions and the imperial escorts, but were of equal service to the early missionaries, and when churches began to spring up over the empire, these roads greatly facilitated that church organization and brotherhood which strengthened the church to overcome the empire. With the dawn of the pax Romana all these roads became alive once more with a galaxy of caravans and traders. Commerce revived and was carried on under circumstances more favorable than any that obtained till the past century. Men exchanged not only material things, but also spiritual things. Many of these early traders and artisans were Christians, and while they bought and sold the things that perish, they did not lose an opportunity of spreading the gospel. For an empire which embraced the Mediterranean shores, the sea was an important means of intercommunication; and the Mediterranean routes were safer for commerce and travel at that period than during any previous one. Poets might not paint it; but the sea, and with the fall of Sextus Pompey no hostile maritime forces remained. The ships which plied in countless numbers from point to point of this great inland sea... offered splendid advantages and opportunity for early Christian missionary enthusiasm.

The large measure of freedom permitted by Rom authorities to the religions of all nations greatly favored the growth of infant Christianity. The Rom empire was the first in principle a persecutor with a permanent court of inquisition. Strange cults from the East and Egypt flourished in the capital, and except when they became a danger to public morality or to the peace of society they were allowed to proselytize with the eyes of the police. See below on non-Rom religions.

Further, the Rom empire afforded Christianity a material and outward symbol for its spiritual am-bitition. It enlarged the vision of the church. Only a citizen (Paul) of such a universal religion for all humanity. If the Rom Church sword could so conquer and unify the orbis terrarum, the militant church should be provoked to attempt nothing less in the religious spirit of the empire.
A suggestion to the early organizers of the new community, until the Christian church became the spiritual counterpart of the Rom empire. The Christians appropriated many a weapon from the arsenal of the empire and learned from them aggressiveness, the value of thorough organization and of military methods.

9. Roman Law

Rom law in its origins was characterized by the narrowest exclusiveness, and the first formal Rom code was that of the Ludi Romani, yet the Romans here as in so many other respects improved upon what they had borrowed and became masters of jurisprudence in the antique world.
As their empire and conceptions expanded, they refined their laws to embrace all their subjects. One of the greatest boons conferred by Rome on the antique world was a uniform system of good laws—the source of much of our European jurisprudence. The Rom law played an equally important role with the Jewish in molding and disciplining for Christianity. It taught men to obey and to respect authority, and proved an effective leveling and civilizing power in the empire. The universal law of Rome was the pedagogue for the universal law of the gospel. See ROMAN LAW.

The Romans could offer their subjects good laws, uniform government and military protection, but not a satisfactory religion. A universal empire called for a universal religion, which Christianity alone could offer. Finally, not only by what Rome accomplished, but by what she improved incapable of accomplishing, the way of the Lord was made ready and a people prepared for His coming. It was a terrible crisis in the civilization and religion of antiquity. The old national religions and systems of belief had proved unable to soothe the increasing imperious moral and spiritual demands of man's nature. A moral bankruptcy was imminent. The old Rom religion of abstract virtues had gone down in formalism; it was too cold for human hearts. Man could no longer find the field of his moral activity in the religion of the state; he was no longer merely an atom in society performing religious rites, not for his own soul, but for the good of the commonwealth. Personality had been slowly emerging, and the new schools of philosophy called man away from the state to seek peace with God in the solitude of his own soul first of all. But even the best of these schools found the crying need of a positive, not a negative religion, the need for a perfect ideal life and dynamics dynamism over other lives. Thus was felt the deep and unceasing demand for a new revelation, for a fresh vision or knowledge of God. In earlier days men had believed that God had revealed Himself to primitive men or heroes of their race, and that subsequent generations must accept with faith what these earlier seers, who stood nearer God, as Cicero said, had been pleased to teach of the Divine. But soon this stock of knowledge became exhausted. Plato, after soaring to the highest point of poetic and philosophic thought about the Divine, admitted the need of a demon or omniscient to tell the secret of eternity. With the early Rom empire began a period of tremendous religious unrest. Men tried philosophy, magic, astrology, foreign rites, to find a sure place of rest. This accounts for the rapid and extensive diffusion of the mysteries which promised to the initiated communion with God here, a "better hope" in death, and satisfied the craving for immortality beyond time. These were the more serious souls who would gladly accept the consolations of Jesus. Others, losing all faith in any form of religion, gave themselves up to blank despair and accepted Epicureanism with its gospel of amniiliation and its carpe diem morals. This system had a terrible fascination for those who had lost themselves; it is presented in its most attractive form in the letters of Lucius, the Charon of Oriental literature. Others again, unable to find God, surrendered themselves to cheerless skepticism. The sore need of the new gospel of life and immortality will be borne in upon the mind of those who read the Gr and Rom religions.

And even Seneca, who was almost a Christian in some respects, speaks of immortality as a "beautiful dream" (belum somnium), though tribulation later gave a clearer vision of the city of God. Servius Tullianus, writing to Cicero a letter of consolation on the death of his much-missed Tullia, therefore had a sad "if" to offer about the future (Cic. Fam. iv.5). Nowhere does the unbelief and pessisimism of post-Christian days among the higher classes strike one more forcibly than in the pensive dialogue recorded by Sallust (Bel. Cat. li f) as to the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators.
Caesar, who held the Rom high-priesthood and the highest authority on the religion of the state, proposes life imprisonment, as death would only bring annihilation and rest to these villains—no hereafter, no reward or punishment (eam cuncta mortalium mala dissolvere; ultra neque curae neque gaudii nescum esse). The next speaker, a religious man of his generation—in terms which can only rebu”e upon Caesar's Epicureanism and materialism (ib. 52), Cicero (In Cat. iv.4) is content to leave immortality an open question. The philsophism of pre-Christian days, with the higher classes, struck him as a "sore suspicion" (mors nescum esse). Such was the attitude of the educated classes of the Gr-Rom world at the dawn of Christianity, though it cannot be denied that there was also a strong desire for continued existence. The other classes were either perfunctorily performing the rites of a dead national religion or were seeking, some, excitement or aesthetic worship or even scope for their baser passions, some, peace and promise for the future, in the eastern mysteries. The distinction between moral and physical evil was coming to the surface, and hence a consciousness of sin. Religion and ethics had not yet been united. "The throne of the human mind" was declared vacant, and Christianity was at hand as the best claimant. In fact, the Gr-Rom mind had been expanding to receive the pure teachings of Jesus.

almost unrecognized, and even the antiquarian learning of a Varro could scarcely discern the original meaning or use of many Rom deities. The Rom elements or modes of worship progressively retreated until they and the foreign rites with which they were overlaid gave way before the might of Christianity. As Rome expanded, her religion was developed and expanded. During the regal period Roman religion was that of a simple agricultural community. In the period between the Regium and the Second Punic War Roman religion became more complicated and the Rom Pantheon was largely increased by imports from Etruria, Latium, and Magna Graecia. The mysterious religion of Etruria first impressed the Rom mind, and from this quarter probably came the Trinity of the Capitol (Jupiter, Juno, Minerva) previously introduced into Etruria from Gr sources, thus showing that the Romans were not the first in Italy to be influenced by the religion of Greece. New modes of worship, non-Rom in spirit, also came in from the Etruscans and foreign elements of Gr mythology. Latium also made its contribution, the worship of Cybele and Diana coming from Aricia and also a Lat cult. Two Lat cults penetrated even within the Rom pomorum—that of Heracles and Castor, with deities of Gr origin. The Gr settlements in Southern Italy (Magna Graecia) were generous in their contribution, and were largely responsible for the later invasion of Gr deities. The Sibyls Book lines were early imported from Cumea as sacred scriptures for the Romans. In 493 BC during a famine a temple was built to the Gr Trinity Demeter, Dionysus, and Persephone, under the Lat names Ceres, Liber, and Libera—the beginning of distrust in the primitive Rom numina and of that practice, so oft repeated in Rom history, of introducing new and foreign gods at periods of great distress. In 433 and 427 the temples of the Gauls and Asclepius followed in 293 BC, and in 249 BC Dis and Proserpina were brought from Tarentum. Other non-Rom modes of approach to deity were introduced. Rome had been in this period very broad-minded in her policy of meeting the growing religious needs of her community, but she had not so far gone beyond Italy. A taste had also developed for dramatic and more aesthetic forms of worship. The period of the Second Punic War was a crisis in Roman religion, and the faith of the Romans waned before growing unbelief. Both the educated classes and the populace abandoned the old Rom religion, the former sank into skepticism, the latter into superstition; the former put philosophy in their place, the latter the more sensuous cults of the Orient. The Romans went abroad again to borrow deities—this time to Greece, Asia and Egypt. Gr deities were introduced wholesale, and readily assimilated to or identified with Rom deities (see Rom, III, 1). In 191 BC Hebe entered as Juventas, in 179 Artemis as Diana, in 138 Area as Mars. But the home of religion—the Orient—proved more helpful. In 204 BC Cybele was introduced from Pessinus to Rome, known also as the Great Mother (magnus mater)—a fatal and final blow to old Rom religion and an impetus to the wilder and more orgiastic cults and mysterious glamour which captivated the common mind. Baeus with his gross immorality soon followed. Sulla introduced Mā from Phrygia as the counterpart of Rom Bellona, and Egypt gave Isis. In the wars of Pompey against the pirates Mithra was brought to Rome—the greatest rival of Christianity. Religion now began to pass into the hands of politicians and at the expense of all religious feeling in their hands. Worship degenerated into formalism, and formalism culminated in disuse. Under the empire philosophic systems continued still more to replace religion, and oriental rites spread apace. The religious revival of Augustus was an effort to breathe life into the dry bones. His plan was only partly religious, and partly political—to establish an imperial and popular religion of which he was the head and centering round his person. He discovered the necessity of a modified religion. During his reign had long before been regarded as divine by their subjects. Alexander the Great, like a wise politician, intended to use this as one bond of union for his wide dominions. The same habit extended to the Diadochian kings, esp. in Egypt and Syria. When Augustus had brought peace to the world, the Orient was ready to hail him as a god. Out of this was evolved the cult of the reigning emperor and of Roma personified. This worship gave religious unity to the empire, while at the same time magnifying the emperor. But the effort was in vain: the old Rom religion was dead, and the spiritual needs of the empire continued to be met more and more by philosophy and the mysteries which promised immortality. The cult of the Genius of the emperor soon in its turn became an emperor himself on his deathbed jested at the idea of his becoming a god. The emperor-worship declined steadily, and in the 3d and 4th cents. oriental worship were supreme. The religion of the Rom empire soon became the Graecia with its cosmopolitan and eclectic type so characteristic of the new era.

The non-Rom religions were divided into religiones licites ("licensed worship") and religiones illicitae ("unlicensed"). The Romans divided these religions into different names, on account of earthquakes, pestilences, famine or military disasters, introduced non-Rom cults as means of appeasing the numina.

2. Religiones licites and religiones illicitae

This generally meant that the cults in question could be performed with impunity by their foreign adherents. It legalized the colegia necessary for these worship from which Rom citizens were by law excluded. But, generally speaking, any people settling at Rome was permitted the liberty of its own native worship in so far as the exercise of it did not interfere with the peace of the state or corrupt the morals of society. On one occasion (156 BC), by a decree of the senate, a severe inroad was made on the licit and illicit foreign rites which had caused flagrant immorality among the adherents. But Rome was never a systematic persecutor. These foreign rites and superstitions, though often forbidden and their adherents sentenced to death from the city, always retained a stronger hold than ever. Rom could never overcome the fascination of oriental and Gr mysteries, and devoted themselves to foreign gods while maintaining the necessary formalism toward the religion of the state. Very often too Rom citizens would be presidents of these religious brotherhoods. It should not be forgotten that the original moral elements had fallen out of Rom religion, and that it had become simply a political and military religion for the welfare of the state, not for the salvation of the individual. The individual must conform to certain prescribed rites in order to avert calamity from the state. This done, the state demanded no more, and left him a large measure of freedom in seeking excitement or aesthetic pleasure in the warm and more social foreign mysteries. Thus, while the Romans retained the distinction of religiones licites and illicitae, they seldom used severity against the latter. Many unlicensed cults were never disturbed. In fact, the very idea of empire rendered the toleration of these religions of the republic necessary. Theoretically, though not theoretically, the empire abandoned the idea of religiones illicitae, while it retained it upon the statute-book to use in case of such an emergency as the Christian religion involved. Not only the government was tolerant, but the different varieties of religions were tolerant and on good terms with each other. The same man might be initiated into the mysteries of half a dozen divinities. The same man might even be priest of two or more gods. Some had not the slightest objection to worshipping Christ along with Mithra, Isis and Adonai. Men could conceive of Christianity as the presence of the Divine, and credited their neighbors with worshipping the One Unknown under different names and forms. Hadrian is said to have meditated the erection of temples throughout the empire to the Unknown God.

(1) Judaism, a "religio licita."—An interesting and, for the history of Christianity, important example of a religio licita is Judaism. No more exclusive and obstinate people could have been found upon whom to bestow the favor. Yet from the days of Julius Caesar the imperial policy toward the Jew and his religion was uniformly favorable, with the brief exception of the mad attempt of Gaius. The government often protected them against the hatred of the populace. Up to 70 AD they were allowed freely to send their yearly contribution to the temple; they were even allowed self-governing privileges and legislative powers among themselves, and thus formed an exclusive community in the midst of a city. Even the tumultuous events of 68-70 AD and the fall of Jesus did not bring persecution upon the Jew, though most of these self-governing and self-legislating powers were withdrawn and the Jews were compelled to pay a poll-tax to the temple of the Capitoline Jupiter. Still their religion remained licensed, tolerated, protected. They were excused from duties impossible for their religion, such as military service. This tolerance of the Jewish religion was of inestimable importance to infant Christianity which at first preferred to be no more than a reformed and expanded Judaism.

(2) Why Christianity alone was proscribed.—The question next arises: If such was the universally mild and tolerant policy of the empire to find room for all gods and cults, and to respect the beliefs of all the subject peoples, how comes the anomaly that Christianity alone was proscribed and persecuted? Christianity was indeed a religio licita, not having been accepted by the government as a religio licita, but this is no answer. There were other unlicensed religions which grew apace in the empire. Neither was it simply because Christianity was aggressive and given to proselytism and dared to appear even in the imperial household: infant Christianity was not aggressive toward the world and yet were tolerated. Nor was it simply because of popular hatred, for the Christian was not hated above the Jew. Other reasons must explain the anomaly.

(3) Two empires: cause of conflict.—The fact was that two empires were born about the same time so like and yet so unlike as to render a conflict and struggle to the death inevitable. The Christians were unequivocal in asserting that the society for which they were waiting and laboring was a "kingdom."

(a) Confusion of spiritual and temporal: They thought not merely in national or racial but in eccumenical terms. The Romans could not understand a kingdom of God upon earth, but confused Christian ambition with political. It was soon discovered that Christianity came not to save but to destroy and disintegrate the empire. Early Christian enthusiasm made the term "kingdom" a vote of "proving," pagana per targeta, for many, looking for the Parousia of their Lord, were themselves misled into thinking of the new society as a kingdom soon to be set up upon the earth with Christ as king. Gradually, of course, Christians became enlightened upon this point, but the harm had been done. Both the Rom empire and Christi-ty were aiming at a social organization to embrace the genus humanum. But though these two empires were so alike in several points and the one had done so much to prepare the way for the other, yet the contrast was too great to allow conciliation. The Romans, with their heritage of humanism and liberal spirit, aimed at universality along the path of individualism—giving new value to human personality.

(b) Unique claims of Christianity: It seemed also to provoke Rom pride by its absurd claims. It preached that the world was to be destroyed by fire to make way for a new heaven and earth, that the Eternal City (Rome) was doomed to fall, that a king would come from heaven whom Christians were to obey, that amid the coming desolations the Christians should remain tranquil.

(c) Novelty of Christianity: Again after Christitunity came from underneath the aegis of Judaism, it must have taken the government somewhat by surprise as a new and unlicensed religion which had grown strong under a misnomer. It was the newest and latest religion of the empire, it came from the East, as it were, at the stage when reason was not apparent to the Rom mind that Christianity had been spreading for a generation under the tolerance granted to Judaism (sub umbraclu licita Judaeoreligio licita judaeorum Tert.), the same religious which "protected by its antiquity," as Tacitus said. The Romans were of a conservative nature and disliked innovations. The greatest statesman of the Augustan era, Maecenas, advised the emperor to extend no tolerance to new religions as averse to monarchy (Dio Cassius li.36). A new faith appearing suddenly with a large clientele might be dangerous to the public peace (multitudo ingens: Tac. Ann. xv.44; πολλὰ πᾶρθοι: Clem. Rom.; Cor 1 9).

(4) Intolerance and exclusiveness of Christian religion and society: The marked way Romans contended for the tolerant effective spirit of the empire—the intolerance and exclusiveness of their religion and the exclusiveness of their society. All other religions of the empire admitted compromise and eclecticism, were willing to dwell rather on the points of contact with their neighbors than on the contrast. But Christianity admitted no compromise, was intolerant to all other systems, must be admitted that in this way it was rather unfair to other cults which offered comfort and spiritual support to thousands of the stateless and of the outcast of society. But we shall not blame, when we recognize that for their own life and for their own race, they must show itself at first intolerant. Many heathen would gladly accept Christ along with Mithra and Isis and all other religions, but Christianity demanded absolute separation. The Jesus cults could tolerate no rival; it claimed to be the absolute truth, and aggression was from the world. The Christian church was absolute in its demands; it would not rank with, but above, all worships. This spirit was of course displayed by the day which enabled rival cults to co-exist with the greatest indifference. Add to this the exclusive state of Christian society. No pious heathen who had purified his soul by asceticism and the sacraments of antiquity could be admitted into membership unless he denounced things dear to him and of some spiritual value. In every detail of public life this exclusive spirit made itself felt. Christians met at night and held secret assemblies in which they were reputed to perpetrate the most scandalous crimes. Thyestes and the Agamemnon, incest, child murder, were among the charges provoked by their exclusiveness.

(c) Obstinatio: Add to this also the sullen obstinacy with which Christians met the demands of imperial power—a feudagio very offensive to Rom governors. Their religion would be left, them undisturbed if they would only render formal obedience to the religion of the state. Rome was in fact and recognized before Christian obstinacy. The martyr's courage appeared as sheer fanaticism. The pious Aurelia refers but once to Christianity, and in the words μὴ ἐπιταγής, μὴ παραδίκης, "sheer obstinacy," and Aristides apparently refers to it as "fanaticism, παραθυρία, "stubbornness." See PERSECUTIONS, 18.

(f) Aggressiveness against pagan faith: But the Christians were not content with an uncompromising withdrawal from the practices of heathen worship: they also actively assailed the pagan cults. To the Christians they became doctines of demons.
The imperial cult and worship of the Genius of the emperor were very unholy in their sight. Hence they fell under the charges of disloyalty to the emperor and might be proved guilty of majestas. They held in contempt the doctrine that the greatness of Rome was due to her reverence for the gods; the Christians were atheists from the pagan point of view. And as religion was a political concern for the welfare of the state, atheism was likely to call down the wrath of divinity to the subversion of the state.

(g) Christianos ad bonos: Very soon when disasters began to fall thickly upon the Roman empire, the blame was laid upon the Christians. In early days Rome had often sought to appease the gods by introducing external cults; at other times oriental cults were expelled in the interests of public morality. Now in times of disaster Christians became the scapegoats. If famine, drought, pestilence, earthquake or any other public calamity threatened, the cry was raised “the Christians to the lions!” (see Nero; PERSECUTIONS, 12). This view of Christianity as subversive of the empire survived the fall of Rome before Alaric. The heathen forgot—as the apologists showed—that Rome had been visited by the greatest calamities before the Christian era and that the Christians were the most self-sacrificing in periods of public distress, lending succor to pagan and Christian alike.

(b) Odium generis humani: All prejudices against Christianity were summed up in odium generis humani, “hatred for the human race” or society, which was reciprocated by “hatred of the human race toward them.” The Christians were bitterly hated, not only by the populace, but by the upper educated classes. Most of the early adherents belonged to the slave, freedman and artisan classes, “not many wise, not many noble.” Few were Roman citizens. We have mentioned the crimes which popular prejudice attributed to this hated sect. They were in mockery styled Christiani by the Antiochians (a name which they at first resented), and Nazarenes by the Jews. No nicknames were too vile to attach to them—Astinari (the sect that worshipped the ass’s head), Sarmentici or Semazeti. Rom writers cannot find epithets strong enough. Tacitus reckons the Christian faith among the “atrocious and abominable things” (atrocia aut pudenda) which flooded Rome, and further designates it superstes exitibus (‘benevolent superstition’) (Ann., xv, 44), Suetonius (Ner. 16) as novel and malefic (noveo ac malefice), and the gentle Pliny (Ep. 97) as vile and indecent (prava immodica). Well might Justus say the Christians were “hated and reviled by the whole human race.”

This opprobrium was accentuated by the attacks of philosophy upon Christianity. When the attention of philosophers was drawn to the new religion, it was only to scorn it. This attitude of heathen philosophy is best understood in reading Celsus and the Christian apologists. Their polemics were recast in the popular language of their time, with much exaggeration, which was often due to the ignorance of the heathen writers about their Christian opponents. (4) The Roman empire not the only disturbing factor.—Philosophy long maintained its aloofness from the religion of a crucified Galilean: the “wise” were the last to enter the kingdom of God. When later Christianity had established itself as a permanent force in human thought, philosophy designed to consider its claims. But it was too late; the new faith was already on the offensive. Philosophy discovered its own weakness and began to reform itself by aiming at being both a philosophy and a religion. This is particularly the case in Neoplatonism (in Plotinus) in which reason breaks down before revelation and mysticism. Another force disturbing the peace of the Christian church was the enemy within the fold. Large numbers of heathen had entered the ecclesia bringing with them their oriental or Gr ideas, just as Jewish Christians brought their Judaism with them. This led to grave heresies, each system of thought distorting in its own way the orthodox faith. Later another ally joined the forces against Christianity—reformed paganism led by an injured priesthood. At first the cause of Christianity was greatly aided by the fact that there was no exclusive and jealous priesthood at the head of the Gr-Rom religion, as in the Jewish and oriental religions. There was thus no dogma, no class interested in maintaining a dogma. Religious persecution is invariably instituted by the priesthood, but in the Rom world it was not till late in the day when the temples and sacrifices were falling into desuetude that we find a priesthood as a body in opposition. Thus the Rom imperial power stood not alone in antagonism to Christianity, but was abetted and often provoked to action by (a) popular hate, (b) philosophy, (c) pagan priesthood, (d) heresies within the church.

IV. Relations between the Roman Empire and Christianity.—We have here to explain how the attitude of the Rom empire, at first friendly or indifferent, developed into one of fierce conflict, the different stages in the policy—if we can speak of any uniform policy—of the Rom government toward Christianity, the charges or mode of procedure on which Christians were condemned, and when and how the profession of Christianity (solum ipse, Johnson) became a crime. The rise of the Rom empire progressively weakening and Christianity gaining ground. For the sake of clearness we shall divide the Rom empire into six periods, the first from the commencement of the Christian era till the last of the Julio-Claudian dynasty.

At first the presence of the Christian faith was unknown to Rom authorities. It appeared first merely as a reformed and more spiritual Judaism; its earliest preachers and adherents severing from the synagogue. Christians were only another of the Jewish sects to which a Jew might belong while adhering to Mosaic and Juda-ism. But soon this friendly relation became strained on account of the expanding views of some of the Christian preachers, and from the introduction of gentile proselytes. The first persecutions for the infant church came entirely from exclusive Judaism, and it was the Jews who first accused Christians before the Rom courts. Even so, the Rom government not only refused to turn persecutor, but even protected the new faith both against Jewish accusations and against the violence of the populace (Acts 21 31). And the Christian missionaries were recognized in the Rom empire as an ally and a power for good. Writing to the Romans Paul counsels them to submit in obedience to the powers that be, as “ordained of God.” His favorable impression must have been greatly enhanced by his mild captivity at Rome and his acquittal before the emperor Claudius, who “cared for none of those things” (Acts 18:12 ff), or recognized the innocence of the accused, as did both Felix (Acts 24:1 f) and Porcius Festus (25:14 ff). Thus the Romans persisted in looking upon Christians as a small sect of Jews on the who were bent upon in formulating a charge of disloyalty (begun before Pilate) against the new sect as acting “contrary to the decrees of Caesar,” saying that there is another king, one Jesus (Acts 17:7; cf 26:8). Christianity was disowned thus early by Judaism and cast upon its own resources. The increasing numbers of Christians would confirm to the Roman government the independence of Christianity. And the trial of a Roman citizen, Paul, at Rome would further encourage the emperor.

The first heathen persecution of Christianity resulted from no definite policy, no apprehension of danger to the holy polity, and no definite charges, but from an accidental spark which kindled the conflagration. This is clearly shown to this fact that no emperor had taken much notice of Christianity. It was only in the middle of the reign of Augustus that Jesus was born. In the reign of Tiberius belonging Jesus’ public ministry, crucifixion and resurrection of Christ closed too (Acts 37 AD) for allow any prominence to the new faith, though this emperor was credited with proposing to the senate a decree to receive Christ into the Roman pantheon—a legend of course. Under the brief principate of the mad Gaius (37-41 AD) the “new way” was not yet divorced from the parent faith. Gaius caused a diversion in favor of the Christians by his persecution of the Jews and the command to set up his own statue in the temple. In the next reign (Claudius, 41-54 AD) the Jews were again harshly treated, and thousands were banished from Rome (Judaeos impulserint Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulsit: Suet. Claud., 25). Some would see in this an action against the Christians by interpreting meaning fire between Jews and Christians, in consequence of which some Christians were banished as Jews, but Dio Cassius (l.xi.6) implies that it was a police regulation to restrain the spread of Jewish worship. It was in the reign of Nero, after the fire of 64 AD, that the first hostile step was taken by the government against the Christians, earliest account of which is given by Tacitus (Ann. xv.44). Nero’s reckless career had given rise to the rumor that he was the incarnate god, to see the city burned in order to rebuild it on more magnificent plans. See Nero. Though he did everything possible to arrest the flames, even exposing his own life, took every means of alleviating the distress of the sufferers, and ordered such religious rites as might appease the wrath of the gods, the suspicion still clung to him.

"Accordingly in order to dissuade the rumor, he put forward as guilty [subdit deo] and inflected the most extreme sentences against them. For abominations [Magia] and called Christians by the populace. The originator of that name, Christians, had been banished by Tiberius, and the baneful superstition [exitiabilis superstition] put down for the time being broked out again, not only throughout Judaea, the home of this evil, but also in the City (Rome) where all atrocious and shameful [aevum] things were done. Those therefore who confessed [i.e. to being Christians] were first arrested, and then by the information gained from them a large number [multitudes ingens] were implicated [consecuti est MS reading, not consuci], not so much on the charge of incense to the abominable, as to the heathen kind of mankind [ado humani generis]. The victims perished in mills and mocking was text here uncertain, but the skins of wild beasts were torn to pieces by dogs; others impaled on crosses in order to be set on fire to afford light after death. Whence [after these cruelties] commiseration began to be felt for them..." But Tacitus does not say that these things were not from considered that, as “hatred of one person [Nero]."

This passage is the earliest classical account of the crucifixion and the only mention of Pilate in a heathen author—offers some difficulties which require to be balanced at. It is held by some as being true, the emperor himself by writing subdidit reos at the beginning and santes at the close, another demonstration of how the effects of this condescension, but guilty from the point of view of the populace and deserving severe punishment for other supposed offenses. Tacitus regards the Christians as innocent, though he had not the slightest kindly feelings toward them. Qui [Tatianus] mutilat, nullius ("those who confessed to being Christians.") though Arnold argues that confessors to heathenism were word for professing a religion. But this would contradict both the sense and other evidence of the context, for it is not meant "confessed" to be brought to the notice of the emperor by such means. Christians should have been apprehended, and, further, this would have been a very good argument in favor of them, but not the case according to Tacitus. Some Christians were boldly asserting their religion, and the emperor, Gallicanus, went before it, and the word, which is not in the text. This had occurred either (1) through torture, or (2) for promised immunity, or (3) account of local rebellions. The early Christian communities were not perfect; party strife often ran high as at Corinth. And in a church like that of Rome composed of Jewish and pagan elements and undoubtedly more cosmopolitan than Corinth, a bitter sectarian spirit is easy to understand. This is a plausible explanation which is much stronger and rendered almost certain by the words of Clement of Rome, who writing to the church of Corinth (c. 96) that during "the first generation after the persecution, and thus familiar with the internal history of the Rom ecclesia, twice asserts that a "true word" (multitus ingens) of the Roman Christians suffered (the Jews) (did) show" jealousy, etc. This is the most natural and obvious explanation, though it is "mutual or sectarian jealousy."

But those who do not like this fact explain it as God’s jealousy of the Jews, which is more easily refuted, for had it been the jealousy of the Jews Clement would not have hesitated one moment to say so. Those who are familiar with the Hebrew literature of that age know that the Christians were none too sensitive toward Jewish feelings. But the very fact that it was not the Jews made Clement rather modestly omit an details the memory of which would be probably still bearing fruit, even in his day. Once more, the word, usually rendered, "arrested," is taken by Hardy as "put upon their trial." Emile argues that this is more in accord with Tactian usage. A "huge multitude" need cause us to distrust Tacitus. It is a relative term; it was a considerable number to be so inhumanly butchered. There is some hesitation as to whether the word "humani generis" is objective of "hatred of the Christians toward the human race" or "hatred of the human race toward the Christians." Grammatically it is possible but that may be the former there can be no doubt: it was of the nature of a charge against Christians (Ramsay). See persecution.

Some have impugned the veracity of Tacitus in this very important passage, asserting that the feelings and state of affairs of his own day (half a century later) into this early Neronian period. This early appearance of Christians in Rome is probably, and its "huge multitude" seem impossible to some. But Schiller has gone beyond anything in the case of those who as a body at Rome were persecuted, that the Christians being not yet distinct from Jews shared in the persecutions and suffered, not as a sect, but as the entire body. But Tacitus is too trustworthy a historian to be guilty of such a confusion of facts. And this conflict have been more or less familiar with the origin of the Christian party. Also Poppaea was at this time mistress of Nero's affections and sufficiently influential with him to stay the crude persecution against those whom she had a leaning and who claimed her as a proselyte. Again, the Jewish faith was certe ficta and a recognized worship of the empire.

The next question is, Why were the Christians alone selected for persecution? That they were so singled out we know, but exactly for what reason is hard to say with certainty. A number of reasons no doubt contributed. (1) Farrar (Early Days, etc.) sees "in the proselytism of Poppaea, guided by Jewish malice, the only adequate explanation of the first Christian persecution," and Lightfoot is of the same opinion, but this by itself is inadequate, though the Jews would be glad of an opportunity of taking revenge on their persecutory opponents.

(2) Christians had already become in the eyes of the Roman authorities a distinct sect, either from the reports of the eastern provincial governors, where Christianity was making most headway, or from the attention attracted by Paul's first trial. They were thus the newest religious sect, and as such would serve as victims to appease deity and the populace. (3) Even if ingenia multisides be rhetorical, the Christians were no doubt considered by Roman prejudiced and active proselytism made their numbers even more formidable. (4) They were uncompromising in their expression of their beliefs; they looked for a consummation of the earth by fire and were also eagerly expecting the triumph of the kingdom of God in their lifetime. These tenets together with their calm faith amid the despair of others would easily cast suspicion upon them. (5) For whatever reason, they had earned the opprobrium of the populace. The hatred for them is transferred to hatred for the Christians" (Mommsen). A people whom the populace so detested must have fallen under the surveillance of the city police administration.

(6) A large proportion of the Christian community at Rome would be non-Rom and so deserve no recognition of Roman privileges. These reasons together may or may not explain the singling-out of the Christians. At any rate they were chosen as scapegoats to serve Nero and his minion Tigellinus. The origin of the first persecution was thus purely accidental in order to remove suspicion from Nero. It was not owing to any already formulated policy, neither through apprehension of any danger to the state, nor because the Christians were guilty of any crimes, though it gave rise of inquiry and accumulation of evidence. But accidental as this persecution was in origin, its consequences were of far-reaching importance. There are three principal views as to the date of the policy of proscription of the new faith by the Rom government: (1) the old view that persecution for the name, i.e. for the mere professed Christianity, began under Trajan in 112 AD—a view now almost universally abandoned; (2) that of Ramsay (Christianity in the Rom Empire, 242 ff, and three arts. in Expos, 1893), who holds that this development from punishment for definite crimes (flagitia) to proscription "for the name" took place between 68 and 96 AD, and (3) that of Hardy (Christianity and the Rom Government, 77), Mommsen (Expos, 1893, 1-7) and Sandys (1893, 1-7)—and adopted by the writer of this article—that the trial of the Christians under Nero resulted in the declaration of the mere profession of Christianity as a crime punishable by death. Tacitus apparently represents the persecution of the Christians as accidental and isolated and of brief duration (i.e.), while Suetonius (Ner. 16) mentions the punishment of Christians in a list of permanent police regulations for the maintenance of good order, into which it would be inconsistent to introduce an isolated case of procedure against the "baneful superstition" (Ramsay, op. cit., p. 230). But these two accounts are not contradictory, Tacitus giving the initial stage and Suetonius "a brief statement of the principles to which Nero's action ultimately resolved itself" (ib, 232). Nero's police administration, then, pursued as a permanent policy what was begun merely to avert suspicion from Nero. But as yet, according to Ramsay, Christians were not condemned as Christians, but on account of certain flagitia attaching to the profession and because the Roman police authorities had learned enough about the Christians to regard them as hostile to society. A trial still must be held and condemnation pronounced in the name but of serious offences naturally connected with the name,” viz., first incendiarism, which broke down, and secondly hostility to civilized society and charges of magic. The others agree so far with Ramsay as describing the first stages, but assert that odium humani generis was not of the nature of a definite charge, but disaffection to the social and political arrangements of the empire. At the outset a trial was needed, but soon as a consequence the trial could be used against aggressive and active opponents of the Romans being “recognized as a society whose principle might be summarized as odium generis humani. A trial became unnecessary; the religion itself involved the crimes, and as a religion it was henceforth proscribed. The punishment of their condemnation was left to the police administration which could step in at any time with severe measures or remain remiss, as according to exigencies demanded. Christianity was henceforth a religio publica. The Rom government was never a systematic persecutor. The persecution or non-persecution of Christianity depended henceforth on the mood of the reigning emperor, the character of his administration, the activity of provincial governors, the state of popular feeling against the new faith, and other local circumstances. There is no early evidence that the Neronian persecution extended beyond Rome, though of course the “example set by the emperor necessarily guided the action of all Rom officials." The stormy close of Nero's reign and the tumultuous days till the accession of Vespasian created a diversion in favor of Christianity. Orosius (Hist. vii.7) is too late an authority for a general persecution (per omnes provincias parti persecutione extenti imperii) (odio, secutioneque extrema . . .). Besides, Paul, after his acquittal seems to have prosecuted his missionary activity without any extraordinary hindrances, till he came to Rome the second time. This Neronian persecution is important for the history of Christianity: Nero commenced the principle of punishing Christians, and thus made a precedent for future rulers. Trouble first began in the world-capital; the next stage will be found in the East; and another in Africa and the West. But Nero's persecution was only local. Nero was the first of the Rom persecutors who, like Herod Agrippa, came to a miserable end—a fact much dwelt upon by Lactantius and other Christian writers.

In the Flavian period no uniform imperial policy against Christianity can be discovered. According to Ramsay the Flavians developed the practice set by Nero from punishment of Christians for definite crimes to proscription of the name. But, as we have seen, the Neronian government set the future attitude of the Rom state toward the new faith. The Flavians could not avoid following the precedent set by Nero. Christianity was spreading—esp. in the East and at Rome. We have no account of any persecution under Vespasian (though Hilary erroneously speaks... of him as a persecutor along with Nero and Decius) and Titus, but it does not follow that none such took place. As the whole matter was left to the police administration, severity would be spasmodic and called for circumstances. The fact that Jesus must have had profound influence both on Judaism and on Christianity. For the former it did what the fall of Rome under Goths, Vandals, and Germans did for the old Roman religion—it weakened the idea of a national God and brought up with a political religion. The clef1t between Judaism and its rival would now become greater. Christianity was relieved from the overpowering influence of a national center, and those Jews who now recognized the futility of political dreams would more readily join the Christian faith. Not only the distinction but the opposition and hostility would now be more apparent to outsiders, though Vespasian imposed the poll-tax on Jewish Christians and Jews alike. No memory of harshness against Christianity under Vespasian has survived. Ramsay, op. cit., 257 would interpret a mutilated passage of Suéttonius (Vesp. 15) as implying Vespasian's reluctance to carry out justa supplicia against Christians. Titus, "the darling of the human race," is not mentioned as his owner of Judaism and Christianity as stated in the council of war before Jesus in 70 AD and recorded by Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii.30; 6) is interesting as an approval of the policy adopted by Nero. Severus' authority is undoubtedly only that of Ramsay and Mommens. The authenticity of the speech as contradicting the account of Jos is been impugned; at any rate it represents the point of view of Tacitus. Titus then advocates the destruction of the Temple in order that religion of the Jews and the Christians may be more thoroughly extirpated (quo plenius Judaorum et Christianorum religio tolleretur), since these religions though opposed to each other were of the same origin. The Christians having sprung from the Jews. If the root was removed the stem would readily perish (radice subtata, stirpem faciliter periurum). We know, however, of no active measures of Titus against either party, his short reign perhaps allowing no time for them.

It is Domitian who stands out prominently as the persecutor of this period, as Nero of the first period. His procedure against Christians was not an isolated act, but part of a general policy under which the whole Christian population was affected in accordance with ancient principles. He attempted to reform morals, suppress luxury and vice, banish immoral oriental rites, actors, astrologers and philosophers. It was in his attempt to revive the national religion that he came in conflict with the universal religion. His own cousin, Flavius Clemens, was condemned apparently for Christianity (atheism), and his wife, Domitilla, was banished. The profession of Christianity was not sufficient for the condemnation of Roman citizens of high standing; hence the charges of atheism or majestas were put forward. refusal to comply with the religion of the national gods could be brought under the latter. But for ordinary Roman citizens and for provincials the profession of Christianity merited death. No definite edict or general proscription was enacted; only the principle instituted by Nero was allowed to be carried out. There was, as Mommens remarks, a standing proscription of Christians as of brigands, but harsh penalties were inflicted only on the caprice or character of provincial governors. Domitian took one definite step against Christianity in establishing an easy test by which to detect those who were Christians and so facilitate inquests. This test was the demand to worship the Genius of the emperor. This too was only part of Domitian's general policy of asserting his own dominus et deus title and emphasizing the imperial cult as a bond of political union. The Apocalypse reflects the sufferings of the church in this reign.

(1) Nerva and Trajan. On the death of Domitian peace was restored to the Christian church, which lasted throughout the brief reign of Nerva (96–98) and the first 13 years of Trajan. It is a curious fact that some of the best of the Roman emperors (Marcus Aurelius and Diocletian) were harsh to the Christians, while some of the worst (as Commodus, Caracalla, Heligabala) left them in peace (see Persecution, 17). Christianity had been rapidly spreading and became governor of Bithynia in 111 AD and found, esp. in the eastern part of his province, the temples almost deserted. Some Christians were brought before him and as established precedents were ordered to be executed for their religion. But Pliny soon discovered that many of both sexes and all ages, provincials and Rom citizens, were involved. The Roman citizens he sent to Rome for trial; but being of a humane disposition he shrank from carrying into effect the wholesale execution required by a consistent policy.

He wrote to Trajan telling him what he had already done, rather covertly suggesting toleration measures. Should no distinction be made between old and young? Should pardoned offenders be allowed to return to their trade or worship the emperor's image and cursed Christ? Should mere profession (nomen sacer) be a capital offence if no crimes could be proven, or should the crimes rather be punished that were associated with the faith (an fapia)? It was on this point that he explained his procedure: he gave those who were accused an abundant opportunity to retract thereupon to Christ, and their faith was executed. He considered their "stubbornness and inflexible obstinacy" (pertinacia corte et scherchilatem obstinacionem) as insuperable evidence. But the administration having once interfered found plenty to do. An anonymous list of many names was handed in, most of whom, however, denied being Christians. Informers then put forward others who likewise denied belonging to the faith. Pliny was convinced their meetings were harmless, and on examination of two deacons under torture discovered nothing but a perverse extravagant superstition (super, passim immolandi); Trajan replied that no universal and definite rule could be laid down regarding the correctness of Pliny's action and perhaps distinguishing Pliny from not yielding to private suggestions. Nevertheless, the emperor made three important concessions: (1) the Christians were not to be sought out by the police authorities, but those who were known and convicted they must be punished; (2) anonymous denunciations of those suspected of fapia in the past were to be pardoned on proving they were not Christians or on renouncing Christianity. Some Christians, as of Trajan as the first official and legal authorization to prosecute Christianity: but we have already seen that Christianity as such was proscribed as a result of the Neronian investigations. Besides, there is not the slightest trace of any new principle of severity, either in the letters of Pliny or in the rescript of Trajan.

The persecution of Christianity had been "permanent" like that of highwomen, but not systematic or general. Neither was Trajan's rescript an edict of toleration, though on the whole it was favorable to the Christians in minimizing the dangers to which they were exposed. The question was as yet purely one of administration.

Trajan initiated no procedure against Christians—in fact rather discouraged any, asking his heliomenian to close down any Jewish or Christian offices which he suspected in the caprice or character of provincial governors. This two was only part of Domitian's a state of terrorism was imminent if delatores were encouraged against Christians making a profession of delatio (giving information). As we saw in the last chapter, Pliny, ever the non-Christian, was accused, and any information against Christians could be threatened by these informers in order to secure a bribe for proceeding no farther. Licinius Silvanus Granius, like Pliny, found himself involved in difficulties and wrote to Hadrian for advice. Hadrian replied impressively to Granius's successor, Minucius Fundanus, the proconsul of Asia, about 124 AD. The genuineness of this important document, though impugned by Overbeck, Keim, and Lipsius, is vouched for by Mommsen, Hardy, Lightfoot, and Ramsay. Indeed, it is no easier accounted for as authentic than as a forgery, for who but the broad-minded Hadrian could have written such a rescript? Apparently the questions put by the proconsul must have been of a similar nature to those to which Pliny replied. The answer of Hadrian is a decided step in favor of Christianity and goes beyond that of Trajan: (1) information is not to be passed over (a) lest the innocent suffer (as was the case under Pliny), and (b) lest informers should make a trade of lodging accusations; (2) protest against the Chias theory that the accused have committed something illegal; (3) mere petitions and accusations against the Christians are not to be admitted; (4) a prosecutor on failing to make good his case is to be punished. These terms would greatly increase the risk for informers and lessen the dangers for Christians. That the name is a crime is not admitted, neither is this established principle rescinded. It is quite possible that Hadrian's rescript "gave a certain stimulus toward the employment of the more definite and regular legal procedure."

(3) Antoninus Pius (138-61).—The liberal policy of Trajan and Hadrian was continued by Antoninus, though persecution occurred in his reign in which Ptolemais and Lycia were executed at Rome and Polycarp at Smyrna. But he decidedly confirmed Hadrian's policy of protecting the Christians uncondemned against mob violence in his letters to Larissae, Athens, Thessalonica and to "all the Proconsuls" at Smyrna, his rescript was in advance of public feeling," and so was disregarded. Anonymous delation was also repressed.

(4) Marcus Aurelius (161-80).—Under Aurelius a strong reaction set in affecting the Christians, caused partly by superstition, partly by public building and partly by Aurelius' policy of returning to ancient principles and reviving the Roman national religion. In this reign we find persecution extending to the West (Gaul) and to Africa—a step toward the general persecutions of the next century. Though no actual change was made by Aurelius, the lassitude of the last three reigns is absent. No general edict or definite rescript of persecution was issued; the numerous martyrdoms recorded in this reign are partly due to the fuller rise of the Christian literature. Christianity in itself still constituted a crime, and the obstinacy (παράθεσις, παράτασις) of Christians in itself deserved punishment. Aurelius seems to have actually rebuked the severity of the Roman governors at Augsburg, an action which further discouraged the trade of informers against Christians. Tertullian actually styles him as debeatolor Christianorum ("protector of Christians"). We find as yet therefore no systematic or serious attempt to extirpate the new faith. The central policy of the government was to continue the policies of the previous reign. Under the rule of Commodus (180-92) Christians again enjoyed a respite. The net result of the collisions between the new faith and the government in this period is somewhat differently estimated by Ramsay and by Hardy (The Other World and Roman Empire, 150 f.) that Ramsay "has to some extent anticipated the extinction of anything like a Christian faith," due to an undetected period of constant and a state of persecution, due to a state of persecution, due to a state of persecution, due to a state of persecution; and Hardy thinks that the Christian organization was not a more than an abstract danger during the first two centuries. Hadrian had taken the same attitude, and its organization was a real danger and an imperium in imperio, she must have taken a systematic exterminating policy during a period when Christianity could have least withstood it. When the empire did—as it did in the 2nd century—outstrip the power of the severest of Zeus, Christianity was already too strong to be harmed, and we shall find the empire henceforth entirely on the defensive against it.

In the next period the insecurity of the church, when in less than 100 years a number of scenes of candidates were the purple and almost each emperor began a new dynasty, enabled Christianity to spread practically untroubled. Further divisions in its favor were created by those fierce barbarian wars and by the necessity of renewed vigilance at the frontier posts. The Christians' aloofness from political strife and their acquiescence in each new dynasty brought them generally peace; in particular we see the great increase in the number of Christians, and the effect of the Christian population in the eastern towns increased. The number of emperors turned from a Church to a Christianized Church, but positively friendly. In this period we find no severe (except perhaps that of Decius) and certainly no protracted persecution. The Christian Church had become the principle of the imperial government, and made herself thus strong and united, so that when the storm did come she remained unshaken. In 202 Severus started a cruel persecution in Africa and Egypt, but peace was restored by the savage Caracalla (lacte Christiano educatus: Tert.). Helogabalus assisted Christianity indirectly (1) by the degradation of Rome, and (2) by tolerance. According to one writer he proposed to fuse Christianity, Judaism, and Roman paganism into one.

The first general persecution was that of Decius, in which two features deserve notice: (1) that death was not the immediate result of Christian profession, but every means was employed to induce Christians to recant; (2) Rom authorities already cognizant of the dangers of Christian organization directed their efforts esp. against the officers of the church. Gallus continued this policy, and Valerian, after first stopping persecution, tried to check the spread of the worship by banishing bishops and closing churches, and later enacted the death penalty. Gallienus promulgated what was virtually the first edict of toleration, forbade persecution and restored the Christians' temporal rights, but on Christianity now entered upon a period of 40 years' tranquility: as outward dangers decreased, less desirable converts came within her gates and her adherents were overtaken in a flood of worldliness, stayed only by the peremptory order of the last emperor. Like some other persecutors, Diocletian was one of the ablest Rom rulers. He was not disposed to proceed against the Christians, but was finally driven to harsh measures by his son-in-law Galerius. The first edict, February 21, 303, was not intended to exterminate Christianity, but to check its growth and weaken its political influence, and was directed principally against Bibles, Christian assemblies and churches. The second was against church organization. A sudden and unexpected call for the payment of tithes recanted, but sought to compel the submission of recalcitrants by tortures —a partial confession of failure on the part of the imperial government. Christianity was avoided and the death penalty omitted. But a fourth edict issued by Maximin prescribed the death penalty and required the act of sacrifice to the gods. In the same year (304) Diocletian, convinced of the uselessness of these measures, stayed the death penalty. The change of policy on the part of the emperor and his abdication next year were virtually a confession that the Galilean had conquered. After the persecution had raged 8 years (or 10, if we include local persecutions after 311), Galerius, overcome by a loathsome disease, issued from Nicomedia with Constantine and Licinius the first general edict of toleration, April 30, 311. Christianity had thus in this period proved a state within a state; it was finally acknowledged as religio licite, though not yet on equality with paganism.

In the next period the first religious wars began, and Christianity was first placed on an equal footing with its rival, then above it, and finally it became the state religion of both west and east. As soon as the state, the empire, adopted Christianity, it immediately became an intolerant, bitter persecutor, both of its old rival and of heresy. Constantine, having done so much toward the triumph of the Christian faith, though his whole life was a compromise. His dream was to weld pagan and Christian into one society under the same laws; he in no way prohibited paganism. With the founding of Constantine the emperor became the historically the state religion—an alliance with benevolent consequences for Christianity. It now began to stifle the liberty of conscience for which it had suffered so much, and orthodoxy began its long reign of intolerance. The sons of Constantine inherited their father's cruel nature with his nominal Christianity. Constantine had left the old and the new religions on equal footing: his sons began the work of exterminating paganism by violence. Constantius, when sole emperor, inherited not only his father's compromise or caution, and prompted by women and bishops, published edicts demanding the closing of the temples and prohibiting sacrifices. Wise provincial administrators hesitated to carry out these pernicious measures. Christianity was now in the ascendancy and on the aggressive. It not only persecuted paganism, but the dominant Christian party proscribed its rival—this time heterodoxy banishing orthodoxy. The violence and intolerance of the son of Constantine justly elicited the national reaction under Julian the Apostate—the most humane member of the Constantine family. He made a "romantic" effort to reestablish the old religion, and while proclaiming tolerance for Christianity, he endeavored to weaken it by heaping ridicule upon its doctrines, rescinding the privileges of the clergy, prohibiting the church from receiving many bequests, removing Christians from public positions and forbidding the teaching of classics in Christian schools lest Christian tongues should become better fitted to meet heathen arguments, and lastly by bidding removed splendor to pagan service as a counter-attraction. But the moral power of Christianity triumphed. Dying on a battle-field, where he fought the Persians, he is said (but not on good authority) to have exclaimed, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!" (σειρομενον Μακαριονε, μεγαλην φωλο το βαθαίνεις). For a brief period after his death there was religious neutrality. Gratian— at the instigation of Ambrose—departed from this neutrality, removed the statue of Victory from the senate-house, refused the title and robes of pontifex maximus, prohibited bloody sacrifices, and dealt a severe blow to the old faith by withdrawing some of the treasury grants, thereby making it dependent on the voluntary system. Theodosius I, or the Great, adopted a strenuous religious policy against both heresy and paganism. His intolerance must be attributed to Ambrose—a bigot in whose eyes Jews, heretics and pagans alike had no rights. Systematic proscription of paganism began. In 381 Theodosius denied the right of making a will to apostates from Christianity, in his edict against heresy, in 391 heathen public worship was interdicted, in 392 several acts of both private and public heathen worship were forbidden, and greater penalties were attached to the performance of sacrifice. Christian vandalism became rampant; all kinds of violence and confiscation were resorted to, monks or priests often leading the populace. For the present the West did not suffer so severely from fanatic iconoclasm. Under the sons of Theodosius the suppression of paganism was steadily pursued. Honorius in the West excluded (408 AD) pagans from civil and military offices; in a later edict (423) the very existence of paganism is doubted (paganus . . . quemquam iam nullus esse credamus). That heathenism was still an attraction is proved by the repeated laws against apostasy. Under Valentinian III (423-55) and Theodosius II, laws were enacted for the destruction of temples or their conversion into Christian churches. In the western empire heathenism was persecuted. Its final overthrow was hastened by the extinction of the western empire (476). In the East Justinian closed the heathen schools of philosophy at Athens (529 AD), and in a despotic spirit prohibited even heathen worship in private under pain of death.

V. Victory of Christianity and Conversions to the Roman Empire.—Christianity was now acknowledged as the religion of both East and West. It had also grown strong enough to convert the barbarians who overrun the West. It restrained and educated them under the lead of the papacy, so that his conquests now extended beyond the Roman empire.

Mervale (preface to Conversion of Rom Empire) attributes the conversion of the Roman empire to four causes: (1) the external evidence of apparent fulfilment of prophecy and the evidence of miracles, (2) internal evidence as satisfying the spiritual wants of the empire and offering a beneficial for the physical wants of the empire, (3) the lives and heroic deeds of the early Christians, and (4) the success which attended the Christian cause under Constantine. Gibbon (ch xx of Decline and Fall) seeks to account for the phenomenal success of Christianity in the empire by the "miraculous design of the God of men and all the Christians, (2) the belief in Christianity in immortality with both future happiness and future punishment, (3) the miracle, (4) the high ethical code and pure morals of professing Christians, and (5) strong ecclesiastical organization on imperial patterns. The weight of these causes seems to account satisfactorily for the progress and success of the religion of Jesus.
— the moral and spiritual bankruptcy of the ancient world, the internal rottenness and decay of heathen systems. All ancient national religions had failed and were abandoned alike by philosophers and masses, and no universal religion for humanity was offered except by Christianity. Worship had degenerated into pure formalism which brought no comfort to the heart. An imperious demand for religious change, by which no philosophy or natural religion could satisfy.

But it was to positive causes chiefly that the success of the new religion was due, among which were the zeal, enthusiasm, and moral earnestness of the Christian faith. Its sterling qualities were best shown in persecution and the heroic deaths of its adherents. Paganism, even with the alliance of the civil power and the prestige of its romantic past, could not withstand persecution. And when heathenism was thrown back on the voluntary system, it could not prosper as Christianity did with its ideals of self-sacrifice. The earnestness of early Christianity was raised to its highest power by its belief in a near second coming of the Lord and the means of propagation greatly helped the spread of Christianity, the principal means being the exemplary lives of its professors. It opposed moral and spiritual power to political. Besides, Christianity when once studied by the thinkers of the ancient world was found to be in accord with the highest principles of reason and Nature. But "the chief cause of its success was the cognizance of its teaching with the spiritual nature of mankind" (Lecky). There was a deep-seated earnestness in a large section of the ancient world to whom Christianity offered the peace, comfort and strength desired. It was possessed also of an immense advantage over all competing religions of the Roman empire in being adapted to all classes and conditions and to all changes. There was nothing local or national about it; it gave the grandest expression to the contemporary ideal of brotherhood. Its respect for woman and its attraction for this sex gained it many converts who brought home about it; it was far superior to its greatest rival, Mithraism. In an age of vast social change and much social distress it appealed to the suffering by its active self-denial for the happiness of others. As an ethical code it was equally superior to the latest consistent propertied systems. One inexcusable advantage it could show above all religions and philosophies — the charm and power of an ideal perfect life, in which the highest manhood was held forth as an incentive to nobler living. The person of Jesus was an ideal and moral dynamic for both philosopher and the common man, far above any abstract virtue. "It was because it was true to the moral sentiments of the age, because it represented faithfully the supreme type of excellence to which men were then tending, because it corresponded with their religious wants, aims and emotions, because the whole spiritual being could then expand and expatriate under its influence that it planted its roots so deeply in the hearts of men" (Lecky, Hist. of European Morals, ch iii). Add to all this the favorable circumstances mentioned under "Preparation for Christianity," above (II), and we can understand how the Roman empire became the kingdom of Christ.

LITERATURE.

In the present art. we shall treat (1) Rom Private Law and (II) Criminal Law only, reserving a consideration of the development of the principles of constitutional law for the art. on Rome, since it is so closely interwoven with the political history of the state.

It will be necessary to confine the discussion of private law to its external history, without attempting to deal with the substance of the law itself. In the treatment of criminal law our attention will be directed chiefly to the constitutional guarantees which were intended to protect Rom citizens against arbitrary and unjust punishments, these being one of the most important privileges of Rom citizenship (see Civiznen). Rom law found its original source in the family as a corporation. The proprietary rights of the poter familias as representative of the unitive unit of organization are a fundamental element in private law, and the scope of the criminal jurisdiction of the state was limited by the power of life and death which was exercised by the head of the family over those who were under his authority, and by virtue of which their transgressions were tried before the domestic tribunal.

It is likewise of fundamental importance to recall the fact that before the earliest period in the history of Rom law of which we have positive information, the Rom statesmen developed a large number of different classes of crime were punished by the priests as sacrilege, in accordance with divine law (fas), by putting the offender to death as a sacrifice to the offended deity, while restitution for private wrongs or injury was left to private initiative to seek. For a law of the Twelve Tables that the person guilty of cutting another's grain by night should be hanged, as an offering to Ceres, is a survival of the older religious character of condemnation to death, and the right to private execution, and the night-time theft of grain might be cited as survivals of primitive private vengence. The secular conception of crime as an offence against the welfare of the state gradually superseded the older conception, while private law arose when the community did away with the divine or public exercise of self-defense in assigning to secure justice, by insisting that the parties to a disagreement should submit their claims to an arbitrator.

1. Roman Private Law.—Rom private law was at first a body of unwritten usages handed down by tradition in the patrician families.

2. Civil Procedure an outline of the disputed issues, called a forum, which was submitted to the judex, or arbitrator, a jury, as it were, consisting of one man, who decided the questions of fact involved in the case. Neither praetor nor judex had special legal training. The court had recourse, therefore, for legal guidance to those who had gained distinction as authorities on the law, and the opinions, or responsa, of these scholars (jurisprudentes) formed a valuable commentary on the legal institutions of the time. In this way a body of rules was amassed by interpretative adaptation which the authors of the Twelve Tables would never have recognized.

3. Jus honorarium derived its name from the circumstance that it rested upon the authority of the praetors (hence the magistracy). In this respect and because it was composed of orders issued for the purpose of affording relief in cases for which the existing law did not make adequate provision, this second agency for legal expansion may be compared with English equity. These orders issued by the praetors had legal force during the tenure of their office only, but these the expediency of which had been established by this period of trial were generally reissued by succeeding magistrates from year to year, so that in time a large, but uniform body of rules, subject to annual renewal, formed the greater part of the edict which was issued by the praetors before entering upon their term of office. By these means Rom law maintained a proper balance between elasticity and rigidity.

After the institution of the praetor peregrinus (241 BC), who heard cases in which one or both of the parties were foreigners, a series of similar edicts proceeded from those who were chosen to this tribunal. The

4. The praetor peregrinus annual edicts of the praetor peregrinus became an important means for broadening Rom law, for the strangers who appeared in these courts were mostly Greeks from Southern Italy, so that the principles of law which were gradually formulated as a basis for proceedings were largely an embodiment of the spirit of Gr law.

Direct legislation superseded the other sources of law under the empire, taking the form, occasionally, of bills ratified by the people (leges), but usually of enactments of the senate (senatus consulto), or imperial ordinances. The

5. Imperial Ordinances the latter, which eventually prevailed to the exclusion of all other types, may be classed as edicta, which were issued by the emperor on the analogy of the similar orders of the republican magistrates, decreta, or decisions of the imperial tribunal, which had force as precedents, and rescripta, which were replies to requests for the interpretation of the law. All these acts of imperial legislation were known as constitutiones.

In the 2d cent. Salvius Julianus was commissioned to invest the praetorian edict with definite form. The Institutes of Gaius appearing about the same time became a model for subsequent textbooks on juristic jurisprudence (Gaii institutionum commeniaris quaedam, discovered by Niebuli in 1810 at Verona in a palimpsest).

This was the Golden Age of juristic literature. A succession of able thinkers, among whom Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian, Modestinus, and Gaio held foremost rank (of Codex Theodosianus 1, 4, 3), applied to the inchoate mass of legal lore the methods of scientific investigation, developing a system of Rom law and establishing a science of jurispru-

The period of the later empire was characterized by various attempts at codification which culminated in the final treatment of the body of Rom law under Justinian. The work of the board of eminent jurists to whom this vast undertaking was intrusted was published in three parts: (1) the Code, which contains a selection of the imperial enactments since Hadrian in twelve books, (2) the Digest or Pandects, which is composed of extracts from the juristic literature in fifty books, and (3) the Institutes, which is a textbook in four books. In this form mainly Rom private law has come down to modern times, and has become, in the words of an eminent authority (Bryce, Studies in History and Jurisprudence, Oxford, 1901), next to the Christian religion, the most plentiful source of the rules governing actual conduct throughout Western Europe.

II. Roman Criminal Law.—In the royal period criminal jurisdiction, in so far as it was a function of secular administration, belonged mainly to the king. But under the first centuries the praetors and praetores peregrindii and duumviri perdueltions, belonging to officials to whom the royal authority in these matters was occasionally delegated, indicate the nature of the earliest crimes brought under secular jurisdiction. The royal prerogative passed to the republican magistrates, and embraced, besides the right to punish crimes, the power to compel obedience to their own decrees (coercitio) by means of various penalties.

But the right of the people to final jurisdiction in cases involving the life or civil status of citizens was established by an enactment (lex Valeria) which is said to have been proposed by one of the first consuls (509 BC), and which granted the right of appeal to the assembly (pro-vocatio) against the execution of a capital or other serious penalty pronounced by a magistrate (Cicero De Rep. ii.31-34; Tacitus iii.41). This right of appeal was reinforced or extended by subsequent decrees of 367 and 296 BC. It was valid against penalties imposed by virtue of the coercive power of the magistrates as well as those based upon a regular charge, and liberalized the magistrates made no provisional sentence of their own, but brought their charges directly before the people.

(1) Penalties.—The death penalty was practically abrogated in republican times by allowing the accused

Roman Law

The Romans rarely employed imprisonment as a punishment. The imposition of fines above a certain amount was made subject to the right of appeal. At first the dictator possessed absolute power of life and death over the citizens, but this authority was limited, probably about 300 BC (Livy xlvii.6.5), by being made subject to the right of appeal.

(3) The Punic law. The right of appeal to the people was valid within the city and as far as the first milestone; and although it was never extended beyond this limit, yet its protection was virtually secured for all Rom. citizens, wherever they might be, by the provision of the Punic law (of unknown date), which established their right to trial at Rome. In consequence of this a distinction of great importance was created in criminal procedure in the provinces, since Roman citizens were sent to Rome, whereas other persons were subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the municipalities, except when the governor summoned them before his own tribunal.

The exercise of popular jurisdiction in criminal matters was gradually curtailed by the establishment of permanent courts (quaestiones perpetuae) by virtue of laws by which the people delegated their authority to judge certain classes of cases. The first of these courts was authorized in 149 BC for the trial of charges of extortion brought against provincial governors. Compensation was the main purpose of accusers in bringing charges before this and later permanent courts, and for this reason, perhaps, the procedure was similar to that which was employed in civil cases. A praetor presided over the tribunal; a number of justices took the place of the single juror. The laws by which Sulla reorganized the systems of criminal jurisdiction provided for seven courts dealing individually with extortion, treason, peculation, corruption, extortionate practices, murder, fraud, and assault.

The justice, or jurors, were originally chosen from the senate. A law passed by C. Gracchus transferred membership in all the juries to the equestrian order, thus excluding the senators.

of 70 BC provided for the equal representation of all three classes of the people in the courts. There were then about 1,080 names on the list of available jurors, of whom 76 seem to have been chosen for each trial (Cicero In Pisonem 40). Caesar abolished the plebeian jurors (Suetonius Caesar 41). Augustus restored the representatives of the third class (Suetonius Aug. 32), but confined their action to civil cases of minor importance. He likewise excused the members of the senate from service as jurors.

The system of criminal courts (quaestiones perpetuae) diminished in importance under the empire and finally disappeared toward the close of the 2nd cent. Their place was taken by the senate under the presidency of a consul, the emperor, and eventually by imperial officials by delegated authority from the emperor. In the first case the senate stood in somewhat the same relation to the presiding consul as the jurors in the permanent courts to the praetor. But the emperor and imperial officials decided without the help of a jury, so that after the 3rd cent., when the judicial competence of the senate was gradually lost, trial by jury ceased to exist.

An important innovation in the judicial system of the empire was the principle of appeal from the decision of lower courts to higher tribunals. For the emperors and eventually their delegates, chiefly the praefectus urbi and praefectus praetorio, heard appeals from Rom. and Italian magistrates and provincial governors.

Under the early empire, provincial governors were generally under obligation to grant the demand of Roman citizens for the privilege of trial at Rome (Digest xlviii.6.7).

Although there appear to have been some exceptions to this rule (Pliny, Epist. ii.11; Digest xlviii.8.16). Lysias, tribune of the cohort at Jerus. sent St. Paul as prisoner to Caesarea, the capital of the province, so that Felix the procurator might determine what was to be done in his case, inasmuch as he was a Rom citizen (Acts 23:27), and two years later St. Paul asserted his privilege of being tried at Rome by the emperor for the same reason (25:11). It is, therefore, very proper for us to try to bring together either before the senate or emperor, but cognizance of these cases by the imperial tribunal was more usual, and finally supplanted entirely that of the senate, the formula of appeal becoming proverbial: cives Romanus sum, provoco ad Caesarem (Kaisara epikoloumai: Acts 25:11).

As Roman citizenship became more and more widely extended throughout the empire the relative value diminished, and it is obvious that many of the special privileges, such as the right of trial at Rome, which were attached to it in the earlier period must have been gradually lost. It became customary for the emperors to delegate their power of final jurisdiction over the lives of citizens (ius gladii) to the provincial governor, and finally, after Roman citizenship had been conferred upon the inhabitants of the empire generally by Caracalla, the right of appeal to Rome remained the privilege of certain classes only, such as senators, municipal decurions (Dioecet xi. 19), and certain of equestrian rank in the army, and centurions (Dio Cassius lii. 22, 33).

LITERATURE

This is the greatest, in every sense, of the apostolic letters of St. Paul; in scale, in scope, and in its wonderful combination of doctrinal, ethical and administrative wisdom and power. In some respects the later Epp., Eph and Col, lead us to even higher and deeper arcaea of revelation, and they, like Rom, combine with the exposition of truth a luminous doctrine of duty. But the range of Rom is larger in both directions, and presents us also with noble and far-reaching discussions of Christian pravity, with inscriptions in spiritual utterance and the like, to which those Epp. present no parallel, and which only the Corinthian Epp. rival.

No suspicion on the head of the genuineness of the Ep. exists which needs serious consideration. Signs of the influence of the Ep. can be traced, at least very probably, in the NT itself; in 1 Pet, and, as some think, in Jas. But in our opinion Jas was the earlier writing, and Lightfoot has given strong grounds for the belief that the paragraph on faith and justification (Jas 2) has no reference to perversions of Pauline teaching, but deals with rabbinism. Clement of Rome repeatedly quotes Rom, and so do Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin. Tertullian includes it in his list of Pauline Epp., and it is safe to say in general Rom "has been recognized in the Christian church as long as any collection of St. Paul's Epp. has been extant" (A. Robertson, in HDB, s. v.). But above all other evidences it testifies to itself. The fabrication of such a writing, with its clear and expansive tone, its well marked originality of treatment, its noble morale, and its spiritual elevation and ardor, is nothing short of a moral impossibility. A mighty mind and equally great heart live in every page, and a soul exquisitely sensitive and always intent upon truth and holiness. Literary personation is an art which has come to anything like maturity only in modern times, certainly not before the Renaissance. In a fully developed form it is hardly earlier than the 19th cent. And even now who can point to a consciously personated authorship going along with high moral principle and purpose?

The question remains, however, whether, accepting the Ep. in block as Pauline, we have it, as to some details, just as it left the author's hands. Particularly, some phenomena of the text of the last two chapters invite the inquiry. We may—in our opinion we must—grant those chapters to be Pauline. They breathe the St. and we can hardly read precisely like part of a letter to Rome? For example, we have a series of names (16:1-15), representing a large circle of personally known and loved friends of the writer, a much longer list than any other in any of the Epp., and all presumably—on the theory that the passage is integral to the Ep.—residents at Rome. May not such a paragraph have somehow crept in, after date, from another writing? Might not a message to Philippian or Ephesian friends, dwellers in places where St. Paul had already established many intimacies, have fallen out of its place and found lodgment by mistake at the close of this letter to Rome? It seems enough to reply by one brief statement of fact. We possess some 300 MSS. of Rom, and not one of these, so far as it is uninjured, fails to give the Ep. complete, all the chapters as we have them, and in the present order (with one exception, that of the final doxology). It is observable meanwhile that the difficulties, supposing St. Paul to have sent a large group of friends living at Rome, before his own arrival there, is not serious. To and from Rome, through the whole empire, there was a perpetual circulation of population. Suppose Aquila and Priscilla (18:22) to have received 18:2) to Rome from Ephesus, and suppose similar migrations from Greece or from Asia Minor to have taken place within recent years; we can then readily account for the greetings of Rom 16.

Lightfoot has brought it out in an interesting way (see his Philippians, on 4:22) that many of the names (e.g. Ampliatus, Urbanus, Tryphena) in Rom 16 are found at Rome, in inscriptions of the early imperial age, in cemeteries where members of the widely scattered "household of Caesar" were interred. This at least suggests that there may have been nothing more than the incident, that the converts and friends belonging to the "household" who, a very few years later, perhaps not more than three, were around him at Rome when he wrote to Philippian (Phil 4:22), and sent their special greeting ("shelied they") to the Philippians, were formerly residents at Philadelphia, or elsewhere in Macedonia, and had moved thence to the capital not long before the apostle wrote to the Romans. A. Robertson (ut supra) comes to the same conclusion, as he carefully noticed that they that the case for transferring this section . . . from its actual connection to a lost Ep. to Ephesus is not made out?"

Two points of detail in the criticism of the text of Rom may be noted. One is that the words "at Rome” (1.7.15) are omitted in a very few MSS, in a way to remind us of the interesting phenomenon of the omission of “at Ephesus” (Eph 1.1 m). But the evidence for this omission being original is entirely inadequate. The fact may perhaps be accounted for by a possible circulation of Rom among other mission churches as an Ep. of universal interest. The case would be the more likely if the MSS and other authorities in which the last two chapters are missing were identical with those which omit “at Rome,” but this is not the case.

The other and larger detail is that the great final doxology (1.25-27) placed by many critics in the encolpsach 14 and is omitted freely by three MSS and by Marcion. The leading uncial and a large preponderance of ancient evidence place it where we have it. It is quite possible that St. Paul may have reissued Rom after a time, and may only then have added the doxology, which has a certain resemblance in manner to his later (capitular) style. But it is at least likely that dogmatic objections led Marcion to delete it, and that his action accounts for the other phenomena which are observed against its place at a final place.

It is worth noting that Hort, a singularly fearless, while sober student, defends without reserve the entirety of the Ep. as we have it, or practically so. See his essay printed in Lightfoot’s Bib. Studies.

We can fix the proximate date with fair certainty within reasonable limits. We gather from 15.19 that St. Paul, when he wrote, was in the act of closing his work in the East and was looking definitely westward.

But he was first about (15, 25-26) to revisit Jerusalem, and his collection was mainly in Macedonia and Achaia, for the “poor saints.” Placing these allusions side by side with the references in 1 and 2 Cor to the collection and its conveyance, and again with the narrative of Acts, we may date Rom very nearly at the same time as 2 Cor, just before the visit to Jerusalem narrated in Acts 20, etc. The year may be fixed with great probability as 58 AD. This estimate follows the lines of Lightfoot’s chronology, which Robertson (1904, 241) approves. More recent schemes would move the date back to 56 AD.

“The reader’s attention is invited to this date. Broadly speaking, it was about 30 years at the most after the Crucifixion. Let anyone in mind the many events of that time, whether public or private, which 30 years ago made any marked impression on his mind, as if ever we knew how prescient men and women still are the prominent personages of 30 years ago, many of whom are still with us. And let him transform for this thought to the 1st cent., and to the time of our Ep. Let him remember that we have at least this one great Christian writer composed, for certain, within such easy reach of the very lifetime of Jesus Christ when His contemporary friends were still, in numbers, alive and active. Think him open the Ep. again, and read, as if for the first time, its estimate of Jesus Christ—a figure then of no legendary past, with its halo, but of the all but present day. Let him note that this transcendent estimate comes to us conveyed in the vividness and the rhetoric, but of a treatise pregnant with masterly argument and admirable practical wisdom, tolerant and comprehensive. And we think that the reader will feel that the result of his meditations on date and circumstances is reassuring as to the solidity of the historic basis of the Christian faith.” (from the present writer’s introduction to the Ep. in the Temple Bible; see also his Light from the First Days: Short Sketches, 177.)

With confidence we may name Corinth as the place of writing. St. Paul was at the time in some “city” (16.23). He was staying with one Gaius, or Caius (ib), and we find Writing in 1 Cor 14 a Gaus, closely connected with St. Paul. He commends to the Romans the deaconess Phoebe, attached to “the church at Cenchreae” (18.1), presumably a place near that from which he was writing; and Cenchreae was the southern part of Corinth.

The first advent of Christianity to Rome is unrecorded, and we know very little of its early progress. Visiting Romans (ērōyōteuses, epidōnouštes), both Jews and proselytes, appear at Pentecost (Acts 2.10), and no doubt some of these returned home believers. In Acts 18.2 we have Aquila and Prisca, cella, Jews, evidently Christians, “late come from Italy,” and probably from Rome. But we know practically nothing else of the story previous to this Ep., which is itself so important and already spiritually advanced. On the other hand (a curious paradox in view of the historical development of Rom Christianity), there is no allusion in the Ep. to church organization. The Christian ministry (apart from St. Paul’s own apostleship) is not even mentioned. It may fairly be said to be incredible that if the legend of St. Peter’s long episcopate were historical, no allusion whatever to his work, influence and authority should be made. It is at least extremely difficult to prove that he was even present in Rome till shortly before his martyrdom, and the very ancient belief that Peter and Paul founded the Rom church is more likely to have had its origin in their martyrdom there. St. Peter’s history in St. Peter’s was, indeed, the sense shared in the early evangelization of the city.

As to Rome itself, we may picture it at the date of the Ep. as containing, with its suburbs, a closely massed population of perhaps 800,000 people; a motley host of many races, with a strong oriental element, among which the Jews were present as a marked influence, despised and sometimes dreaded, but always attracting curiosity.

The Ep. was written in Gr, the “common dialect,” the Gr of universal intercourse of that age. One naturally asks, why not in Lat., when the message was addressed to the supreme Lat. city? The large majority of Christian converts beyond doubt came from the lower middle and lowest classes, not least from the slave class. These strata of society were supplied greatly from immigrants, much as in parts of East London now aliens make the main population. Not Lat. but Gr, the then lingua franca of the Mediterranean, would be the usual speech of the apostles. We know that all the early Rom bishops bear Gr names. And some 40 years after the date of this Ep. we find Clement of Rome writing in Gr to the Corinthians, and later again, early in the 2nd cent., Ignatius writing in Gr to the Romans.

We cannot specify the occasion of writing for certain. No hint appears of any acute crisis in the mission (as when 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal, or 4. Place Col were written). Nor would personal reminiscences influence the writer, for he had not yet seen Rome. We can only suggest some possibilities as follows:

1. A good opportunity for safe communication was offered by the deaconess Phoebe’s proposed visit to the metropolis. She doubtless asked St. Paul for a commenda-dory letter, and this may have suggested an extended message to the church.

2. St. Paul’s thoughts had long gone toward Rome. See Acts 19.21: “I must see Rome,” words which seem perhaps to have some Divine significance. And his own life-course would fall in with such a supernatural call. He had always aimed at large centers; and no place was larger in the year 58 than the Levant, and Rome was closing; he had worked at Ephesus, Thessalonica, Corinth; he was at last in the very center of all. Rome must always have had a dominant interest for the “Apostle of the Nations,” and any suggestion that it would be a great city to evangelize might have intensified it to the highest degree.

3. The form of the Ep. may throw further light on the occasion. The document falls, on the whole, into three parts. First we have Elias 1-8 inclusive, a prolonged... exposition of the contrasted and related phenomena of sin and salvation, with special initial references to the cases of Jew and non-Jew respectively. Then come chapters 12-18. Some account of the writer’s plans, and his salutations to friends, requests for prayer, etc., form the central greatness of Rom. It suggests its main成为一个 Christian duty in common life, personal, civil, religious. Under the latter head we have a noble treatise on religious observances, among the converts, Jew and Gentile.

Such phenomena cast a possible light on the occasion of writing. The Rom mission was only one side, by its locality and surroundings, eminently gentle. On the other, there was, as we have seen, a strong Judaic element in Rom life, particularly in its lower strata, and no doubt around the Jewish community proper there had grown up a large community of “worshippers” (งรขงข extractos, ἔμποροι) or, as we commonly call them, “proselytes” (“adherents,” in the language of modern missionary enterprise), people who, without receiving circumcision, attended Jewish worship and shared largely in Jewish beliefs and ideals. Among these proselytes, we may believe, the earliest evangelists at Rome found a favorable field, and the mission church as St. Paul knew of it contained accordingly not only two conversion classes, but a number of converts from native Judaism, but very many in whose minds both traditions were working at once. To such converts the problems raised by Judaism, both within and without the church, would come home with a double weight and force, and their case may well have been present in a special degree in the apostle’s mind alike in the early passages (chs 1-3) of the Ep. and in such later parts as chs 2-11, 14, 15. On the one hand they would greatly need the guidance of the apostolic teaching of the past of Israel and on the destiny of the chosen race in the future. Moreover, discussions in such circles over the way of salvation would suggest to the great missionary his exposition of man’s reconciliation with a holy God and of His secrets for purity and obedience in an unholy world. And meanwhile the ever-recurring problems raised by ceremonial rules in common daily life—problems of days and seasons, and of forbidden food—would, for such diverse and equitably minded people, be a living problem.

(4) Was it not with this position before him, known to him through the many means of communication between Rome and Corinth, that St. Paul cast his letter into this form? And did not the realization of the general nature of the theme suggest to an ample scale? The result was a writing which shows everywhere his sense of the presence of the Judaic problem. Here he meets it by a statement, massive and tender, of “heaven’s easy, artless, unencumbered plan” of redemption, grace, and glory, a plan which on its other side is the very mystery of the love of God, which statement is now and forever a primary treasure of the Christian faith. And then again he lays down for the too eager champions of the new “liberty” a law of loving tolerance toward slower and narrower views which is equally our permanent spiritual possession, bearing a significance far-reaching and benign.

(5) It has been held by some great students, notably Lightfoot and Hort, that the main purpose of Rom was to reconcile the opposing “simpler” and “higher” sides of the church, and that its exposition of the salvation of the individual is secondary only. The present writer cannot take this view. Read the Ep. from its spiritual center so to speak, and is not the perspective very different? The sense is of the collective aspect of the Christian life, an aspect vital to its full health. But is he not giving his deepest thought, animated by his own experience of conviction and conversion, to the sinful man’s relation to eternal law, to redeeming grace, and to eternal life? And by his own personal salvation which with St. Paul seems to us to live and move always in the depth of his argument, even when Christian polity and policy is the immediate theme.

Excepting only Eph (the problem of the authorship of which is insoluble, and we put that great document here aside), Rom. is, of all the New Testament books, St. Paul has written, least a letter and most a treatise. He is seen, as we read, to support his religious beliefs in the highest order in a free but reasoned succession; problems of the darkness and of the light, of sin and grace, fall and restoration, doom and remission, faith and obedience, suffering and glory, transcendent hope and humble duty, now in their relation to the soul, now as to develop the holy collectivity of the common life. The Rom converts are always first in view, but such is the writer, such his handling, that the results are for the universal church and for every believer of all times. Yet all the while (and it is this in a splendid example of that epistolary method of revelation which is one of the glories of the NT) it is never for a moment the mere treatise, however great. The writer is always very personal, and constant in personae. The Ep. is indeed a masterpiece of doctrine, but also always “the unforced, unartificial utterance of a friend to friends.”

Approaching the Ep. as a treatise rather than a letter (with the considerable reservations just stated), we indicate briefly some of its main doctrinal deliverances. Obviously, in the Teachings of the Epistle, limine, it is not set before us as a complete system either of theology or of morals; to obtain a full view of a Pauline dogma and ethics we must certainly place Eph and Col, not to speak of passages from Thess, beside Rom. But it makes by far the nearest approach to doctrinal completeness among the Epistles.

(1) The doctrine of man.—In great measure this resolves itself into the doctrine of man as a sinner, as being guilty in face of an absolutely holy and absolutely imperative law, whether announced by abnormal revelation, as to the Jew, or through nature and conscience only, as to the Gentile. The back of this presentation lies the full recognition that man is cognizant, as a spiritual being, of the eternal difference of right and wrong, and of the universal sense of creation to personal “eternal power and Godhead” as its cause, and that he is responsible in an awe-inspiring way for his unfaithfulness to such cognitions. He is a being great enough to be in personal moral relation with God, and able to realize his ideal only in true relation with Him; therefore a being whose sin and guilt have an unfathomable evil in them. So is he bound by his own failure that he cannot restore himself; God alone, in sovereign mercy, provides for his pardon by the propitiation of Christ, and for his restoration by union with Christ in the life given by the Holy Spirit. Such is man, once restored, once become “a saint” (a being hallowed), a ‘son of God’ by adoption and grace, that his final glorification will be the signal (in some sense the cause?) of a transfiguration of his whole personality. A man is a being actually in the midst of a life of duty and trial, a member of civil society, with obligations to its order. He lives not in a God-forsaken world, belonging only to another and evil power. His life is the whole of the Spirit in him, to show itself in a conduct and character good for the state and for society at large, as well as for the “brotherhood.”
(2) The doctrine of God.—True to the revelation of the OT, St. Paul presents God as absolute in will and power, so that He is not only the sole author of all, particularly the sole cause of all good, but the sole cause of goodness in man. To Him in the last resort all is due, not only the provision of atonement but the power and will to embrace it. The great passages which set before us a “fore-foregoing” (προφανή, preceding “predestination”) and election of the saints are all evidently inspired by this motive, the jealous resolve to trace to the one true Cause all motions and actions of good. The apostle seems e.g. almost to risk affirming a sovereign causation of the opposite, of unbelief and its sequel. But patiently and truly Paul repudiates the notion that God is said to “fit for ruin” the “vessels of wrath.” Their woeful end is overruled to His glory, but nowhere is it taken to be caused by Him. All along the writer’s intense purpose is to constrain the actual believer to see the whole causation of his salvation in the will and power of Him whose inmost character is revealed in the supreme fact that, “for us all,” “he spared not his Son.”

(3) The doctrine of the Son of God.—The Ep. and the other New Testament epistles present a magnificently large Christology. The relation of the Son to creation is indeed not expounded in terms (as in Col), but it is implied in the language of ch 5, where the interrelation of our redemption and the transfiguration of the Son by the Father is said to be in the Son’s consciousness. His Sonship is the entire basis of the terms of Exposition, the only condition of our relation to God. It follows that the sovereign freedom of our acceptance for Christ’s sake alone, and so absolutely that (6 1.2.15) the writer anticipates the inference (by foes, or by mistaken friends), “Let us continue in sin.” But the answer coincides with the doctrine of the Son’s role as the Mediator of the covenant. The Son is not only the mediator of any existing covenant, but also the one in whom that covenant is consummated, and from whom it is to proceed. See Justification; Propitiation.

In closest connection with this message of justification is the teaching regarding union with the Christ who has procured the justification. This is rather assumed than expounded in Rom (we have the exposition more explicitly in Eph, Col, and Gal), but the assumption is present wherever the pregnant phrase “in Christ” is used. Union is, for St. Paul, the central doctrine of all, giving life and relation to the whole range. As Lightfoot has well said (Sermons In St. Paul’s, no. 16), he is the apostle not primarily of justification, or of liberty, great as these truths are with him, but of union with Christ. It is through union that justification is ours; the merits of the Head are for the member. If full union with that spiritual liberty and power are ours; the Spirit of life is from the Head to the member. Held by grace in this profound and multiplex connection, where life, love and law are interlaced, the Christian is entitled to an assurance full of peace that he will be rewarded, “in accordance with the works of the righteous, and he, and with the announcement of its issues. The promises to Israel have never failed, nor are they canceled. At the worst, they have always been inherited by a chosen remnant, Israel within Israel. And a time is coming when, in a profound connection with Messianic blessing on the Gentiles, “all Israel shall be saved.”

(4) The doctrine of the Spirit of God.—No writing of the NT but St. John’s Gospel is so full upon this great theme as Rom. Ch 8 may be said to be the locus classicus in the Epv. for the work of the Holy Ghost in the believer. By implication it reveals personality as well as power (see esp. ver 26). Note the great unity of the grace governs which revelation and profoundest conditions run into each other. It follows ch 7, in which the apostle depicts, in terms of his own profound and typical experience, the struggles of conscience and will over the awful problem of the “bondage” of indwelling sin. If we interpret the passage as if the case supposed is that of a regenerate man, who, however, attempts the struggle against inward evil armed, as to consciousness, with his own faculties merely, and finds the struggle insupportable. Then comes St. Paul’s solution, the promised Spirit of life and liberty, welcomed and put into use by the man who has found his own resources vain. “In Christ Jesus,” in union with Him, he “by the Spirit does to death the practices of the body,” and rises through conscious liberty into an exulting hope of “the liberty of the glory of the sons of God”—not so, however, as to know nothing of “groaning within himself,” while yet in the body; but it is a groan which leaves intact the sense of responsibility and the value of one’s life, and the expectation of a final completeness of redemption.

(5) The doctrine of duty.—While the Ep. is eminently a message of salvation, it is also, in vital connection with this, a treasury of principle and prescription. It deals with the sovereign freedom of our acceptance for Christ’s sake, and so absolutely that (6 1.2.15) the writer anticipates the inference (by foes, or by mistaken friends), “Let us continue in sin.” But the answer coincides with the doctrine of the Son’s role as the Mediator of the covenant. The Son is not only the mediator of any existing covenant, but also the one in whom that covenant is consummated, and from whom it is to proceed.

with a salvation which shall in turn be new life to the world outside Israel. Throughout the passage St. Paul speaks, not as one who "will not give up a hope," but as having had revealed to him a vast and definite prospect, in the Divine purpose.

In the present essay it is our aim to work out other lines of the message of Rom. Perhaps enough has been done to stimulate the reader's own inquiries.

LITERATURE.—Of the Fathers, Chrysostom and Augustine are the most prominent as interpreters of Rom. Chrysostom in his expository Homilies, models of eloquence and illustrative discourse, boasts of "sanctifying common sense," while not perfectly appreciative of the utmost doctrinal characteristics; Augustine, not in any comparable sense, but in his anti-Pelagian writings, which show the sympathetic intensity of his study of the doctrine of the Ep., not so much on justification as on grace and the will. Of the Reformers, Calvin is eminently the great commentator, almost modern in his constant aim to ascertain the sacred writer's meaning by open-eyed inference direct from the words. On Rom he is at his best; and it is remarkable that on certain leading passages where grace is the theme he is much less rightly "Calvinistic" than some of his followers. In modern times, the not learned but masterly exposition of Robert Haldane (c 1830) claims mention, and his thoughts, rightly suggestive of his exposition of the letters (about the same date) of Thomas Chalmers. H. A. W. Meyer (5th ed. 1872. ET 1873-74) among the Germans excelled in thoroughness and insight: Godet (1879, ET 1881) equally so among French-writing divines; of later writers the best French are C. H. J. C. Jeannin (1905), and the many revisions, in particular Banday and Headlam (1957, in the "International" series) and E. H. Gifford (admirable for scholarship and exposition of his work) who worked first in the translator’s (J. R. C. Boak, 1866, now separately) claim particular mention. J. H. Parry writes on Rom in The Expositor’s Gr. Text. (1930).

Luther’s lectures on Rom, delivered in 1516-17 and long since been recovered and published, are published by J. Ficker in 1908. Among modern German commentators the most important is B. Weiss in the later revisions of the Meyer series (9th ed. 1890), while a very elaborate comm. has been produced by Zahn. In his work, a prelude and a prologue, is his book on the works of Lukanisch (Hand-Kommentar, 2d ed. 1892, very scholarly and suggestive). L. Schmoller’s Handbuch zum ersten christlichen Theologenleben (linguistic), and Julliér (J. Weiss, Schriften des NT, 2d ed. 1906, an intensely able piece of popular exposition).

A. E. Garfle has written a brilliant little comm. in the "New Century" series (no date); that of R. St. John Parry in the Cambridge Gr. Text, 1913, is more popular with less use of the Gr text. F. B. Westcott’s St. Paul and Justification, 1915, contains a close grammatical study with an excellent paraphrase.

The poetical treatment is to some extent accompanied by his shorter comm. (1879) in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and a few more recent not in a more homiletic style, in the Expositor’s Bible, 1934.

LITERATURE

Rome (Lat. and Ital. Romo; Ρώμη, Rhôme): The capital of the Roman republic and empire, later the center of Lat Christendom, and since 1871 capital of the kingdom of Italy, is situated mainly on the left bank of the Tiber about 15 miles from the Mediterranean Sea in 14° 53′ 54″ N. lat. and 12° 0′ 12″ long. E. of Greenwich. It would be impossible in the limited space assigned to this article to give even a comprehensive outline of the ancient history of the Eternal City. It will suit the general purpose of the work to consider the relations of the Rom government and society with the Jews and Christians, and, in addition, to present a rapid survey of the earlier development of Roman institutions and power, so as to provide the necessary historical setting for the appreciation of the position of the Jews in the Roman State.

1. Development of the Republican Constitution.

—The traditional chronology for the earliest period of Rom history is altogether unreliable.

1. Original able, partly because the Gauls, in ravaging the city in 390 BC, destroyed the monuments which might have offered faithful testimony of the earlier period (Liv. vi.1). It is known that there was a settlement on the site of Rome before the traditional date of the founding (753 BC). The original Rom state was the product of the coalition of a number of adjacent clan-communities, whose names were perpetuated in the Rom gentes, or groups of imaginary kindred, a historical survival which had lost all significance in the period of authentic history. The chieftains of the associated clans composed the primitive senate or council of elders, which exercised sovereign authority. But as is customary in the development of human society it is a military or monarchical form of government which supplanted the looser patriarchal or sacerdotal organs of authority. This second stage may be indicated by the legendary rule of the Tarquins, which was probably a period of Etruscan domination. The confederation of clans was welded into an homogeneous political entity, and society was organized for civic ends, upon a timocratic basis. The forum was drained and became a social, industrial and political center, and the Capitoline temple of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva (Etruscan pseudo-Hellenic deities) was erected as a central shrine; but people, not above all the Romans are indebted to these foreign kings for a training in discipline and obedience which was exemplified in the later conception of magisterial authority signified by the term imperium.

The prerogatives of the kings passed over to the consuls. The reduction of the tenure of power to a single year and the institution of the principle of colleguiality were the earliest checks to the abuse of unlimited authority. But the true cornerstone of Rom liberty was thought to be the lex Valeria, which provided that no citizen should be put to death by a magistrate without being allowed the right of appeal to the decision of the assembly of the people.

A period of more than 150 years after the establishment of the republic was consumed chiefly by the struggle between the two classes or orders, the patricians and plebeians.

2. Struggle between Patricians and Plebeians.

Patricians and plebeians, in a more particular sense. The plebeians were descendants of former slaves and dependents, or of strangers who had been attracted to Rome by the obvious advantages for industry and trade. They enjoyed the franchise as members of the military assembly (comitia centurionum), but had no share in the magistracies or other civic honors and emoluments, and were excluded from the knowledge of the civil law which was handed down in the patrician families as an oral tradition.

The first step in the progress of the plebeians toward political equality was taken when they were protected from the patricians by a privilege of choosing representatives from among themselves, the tribunes, whose function of bearing aid to oppressed plebeians was rendered effective by the right of veto (intercession), by virtue of which any act of a magistrate could be arrested. The codification of the law in the Twelve Tables was a distinct advantage to the lower classes, because the evils which they had suffered were largely due to a harsh and abusive administration of legal institutions, the nature of which had hitherto been shrouded in mystery (see Roman law). The abrogation, directly thereafter, of the prohibition of intermarriage between the classes resulted in their gradual intermingling.

The kings had reduced the senate to the position of a mere advisory body. But under the republican régime it recovered in fact the authority of which it was deprived in theory. The controlling power of the senate is the most significant feature of the republican government, although it was recognized by no statute or other constitutional document. It was due in part to the diminution of the power of the magistrates, and in part to the manner in which the senators were chosen. The lessening of the authority of the magistrates was the result of the increase in their number, which led not only to the curtailment of the actual prerogatives of each, but also to the contraction of their aggregate independent influence. The augmentation of the number of magistrates was made necessary by the territorial expansion of the state and the elaboration of administration. But it was partly the result of plebeian agitation. The events of 367 BC may serve as a suitable example to illustrate the nature of these influences. For when the plebeians carried by storm the citadel of patrician exclusiveness in gaining admission to the consulsip, the highest regular magistracy, the necessity for another magistrate with general competency afforded an opportunity for making a compensating concession to the plebeian party. Thus, a new magistracy was created, to which at first members of the old aristocracy were alone eligible. Under the fully developed constitution the regular magistrates were five in number, consulship, praetorship, and censorship, tribunate, and quaestorship, all of which were filled by annual elections.

Mention has been made of the manner of choosing the members of the senate as a factor in the development of the authority of the supreme council. At an early period officers of the state exercised the right of selecting new members to maintain the senators at the normal number of three hundred. Later this function was transferred to the censors who were elected at intervals of five years. The number and birthright of the most distinguished citizens should be chosen, and in the Roman community the highest standard of distinction was service to the state, in other words, the holding of public magistracies. It followed, therefore, that the senate was in reality an assembly of all living ex-magistrates. The senate included, moreover, all the political wisdom and experience of the community, and so great was its prestige for these reasons, that, although the expression of its opinion (senatus consultum) was enforced by law with no compelling force, it inevitably guided the conduct of the consulting magistrate, who was practically its minister, rather than its president.

When the plebeians gained admission to the magistracies, the patriciate lost its political significance. But only the wealthier plebeian families were able to profit by this extension of privilege, inasmuch as a political career required freedom from gainful pursuits and also personal influence. The old aristocracy, however, was still solidly connected with the patricians and formed a new aristocracy, which is called nobilitas for the sake of distinction. It rested ultimately upon the foundation of wealth. The dignity conferred by the holding of public magistracies was its title to distinction. The senate was its organ. Rome was never a true democracy except in theory. During the whole period embraced between the final levelling of the old distinctions based upon blood (387 BC) and the beginning of the period of revolution (287 BC), the senators occupied almost exclusively by the representatives of the comparatively limited number of families which constituted the aristocracy. These alone entered the senate through the doorway of the magistracies, and the data would almost justify us in asserting that the republican and senatorial government were substantially and chronologically identical.

The seeds of the political and social revolution were sown during the Second Punic War. The stream of gold which found its way from the provinces to Rome was a bait to attract the cupidity of the less scrupulous senators, and led to the growth of the worst kind of professionalism in politics. The middle class of small farmers decayed for many reasons; the remoter and poorer rich but effete countries of the Orient attracted many. The cheapness of slaves made independent farming unprofitable and led to the increase in large estates; the cultivation of grains was partly displaced by that of the olive and vine, which were less subject to the hazards and ability of the older class of farmers.

The more immediate cause of the revolution was the inability of the senate as a whole to control the conduct of its more radical or violent members. For as political ambition became more ardent with the increase in the material prizes to be gained, aspiring leaders turned their attention to the people, and sought to attain the fulfilment of their purposes by popular legislation setting at nought the concurrence of the senate, which custom had consecrated as a requisite preliminary for popular action. The loss of initiative by the senate meant the subversion of senatorial government. The senate possessed in the veto power of the tribunes a weapon for compelling unusually radical acts, but one of the ten tribunes could always be induced to interpose his veto to prohibit the passage of popular legislation. But this weapon was broken when Tib. Gracchus declared in 133 BC that a tribune who opposed the wishes of 100,000 Romans might command his representative, and sustained this assertion.

It would be foreign to the purpose of the present article to trace the vicissitudes of the civil strife of the last century of the republic. A few words will suffice to suggest the lying general principles which lay beneath the surface of political and social phenomena. Attention has been called to the ominous development of the influence of military commanders and the increasing emphasis of popular favor. These were the most important tendencies throughout this period, and the coalition of the two was fatal to the supremacy of the senatorial government. Marius, after winning unparalleled military glory formed a political alliance with Gaius and Saturninus, the leaders of the popular faction in the city in 100 BC. This was a turning-point in the course of the revolution. But the importance of the sword soon outweighed that of the pen. These principles thus constituted. In the civil wars of Marius and Sulla constitutional questions were decided for the first time by superiority of military strength exclusively. Repeated appeals to brute force dulled the perception for constitutional restraints and the right of minorities. The senate and already a played signs of partial paralysis at the time of the Gracchi. How rapidly its debility must have increased as the sword cut off its most stalwart members! Its power expired in the proscriptions, or organized murder of political opponents. The popular party was nominally triumphant, but in theory the Roman state was still an urban commonwealth with a single political center. The franchise could be exercised only at Rome. It followed from this that the actual political assemblies were made up largely of the worthless element which was so numerous in the city, whose irrational instincts were guided and controlled by shrewd political leaders, particularly those who united in themselves military ability and the wiles of the demagogue. Sulla, Crassus, Julius Caesar, Antony, and lastly Octavian were in effect the ancient counterpart of the modern political "boss." When such men realized their ultimate power and inevitable rivalry, the ensuing struggle for supremecy and for the survival of the fittest formed the necessary process of elimination leading naturally to the establishment of the monarchy, which was in this case the rule of the last survivor. When Octavian received the title Augustus and the proconsular power (27 BC), the transformation was accomplished.

LITERATURE.—The standard work on Rom political institutions is Mommsen and Marquardt, Handbuch der historischen Alterthiimerei, (3d ed.). Other Political Institutions, Boston and London, 1901, offers a useful summary treatment of the subject.

II. Extension of Roman Sovereignty.—See Rome. 1. IMPERIALISM; CHRISTIANITY.

III. The Imperial Government.—Augustus displayed considerable tact in blending his own mystery in the state with the old institutions.

1. Imperial authority, legally, rested mainly upon the tribunician power, which he had probably regained as early as 27 BC, when it was established on a better basis in 23 BC, and the proconsular prerogative (imperium proconsulare), conferred in 27 BC. By virtue of the first he was empowered to summon the senate or assemblies and could vote in election of almost any magistrate. The second title of authority conferred upon him the command of the military forces of the state and consequently the administration of the provinces where troops were stationed, besides a general supervision over the government of the other provinces. It follows that a distinction was made (27 BC) between the imperial provinces which were administered by the emperor's representatives (legati Augusti pro praetore) and the senatorial provinces where the republican machinery of administration was retained. The governors of the latter were called generally proconsuls (see Province). Mention is made of two proconsuls in the NT: Gallio in Asia Minor (Acts 18:12) and Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (13:7). It is instructive to compare the lenient and common-sense attitude of these trained Rom aristocrats with that of the turbulent local mobs who dealt with St. Paul in Asia Minor, Judea, or Greece (Tucker, Life in the Rom World of Jesus, NY, 1909, p. 95).

Rom citizens were still divided into three classes socially, senatorial, equestrian, and plebeian, and the whole system of government harmonized with this triple division. The senatorial class was composed of descendants of senators and those upon whom the emperors conferred the laetus clovis or privilege of wearing the tonic with broad purple border, the sign of membership in this order. The quaestorship was still the door of admission to the senate. The qualifications for admission to the senate were the possession of senatorial rank and property of the value of not less than 1,000,000 sesterces ($45,000; £9,000). Tiberius transferred the election of magistrates from the people to the senate, which was already practically a closed body. Under the empire senatus consultum received the force of law. Likewise the senate acquired judicial functions, sitting as a court of justice for trying important criminal cases and hearing appeals in civil cases from the senatorial provinces. The equestrian class was made up of those who possessed property of the value of 400,000 sesterces or more, and the privilege of wearing the narrow purple band on the tonic. With the knights the emperors filled many important financial and administrative positions in Italy and the provinces which were under their control.

IV. Roman Religion.—(1) The Rom religion was originally more consistent than the Gr, because the deities as conceived by the unimpassioned Lat people were without human character. They were the influences or forces which directed the visible phenomena of the physical world, whose favor was necessary to the material prosperity of mankind. It would be incongruous to assume the existence of a system of theological doctrines in the primitive period. Ethical considerations entered to only a limited extent into the attitude of the Romans toward their gods. Religion partook of the nature of a contract by which men pledged themselves to the scrupulous observance of certain sacrifices and other ceremonies, and in return deemed themselves entitled to expect the active support of the gods in bringing their projects to a fortunate conclusion. The Romans were naturally polytheists as a result of their conception of divinity. Since before the dawn of science there was no semblance of unity in the natural world, there could be no unity in heaven. There must be a controlling spirit over every influence or change of conditions, a very person, and every process of nature. The gods, therefore, were more numerous than mankind itself.

(2) At an early period the government became distinctly secular. The priests were the servants of the community for preserving the venerable re-creation and ceremonial, many of which lost at an early period such spirit as they once possessed. The magistrates were the true representatives of the community in its relationship with the deities both in seeking the divine will in the auspices and in performing the more important sacrifices.

(3) The Romans at first did not make statues of their gods. This was partly due to lack of skill, but mainly to the vagueness of their conceptions of the higher beings. Symbolic representations of their existence, a spear, for instance, standing for Mars. The process of reducing the gods to human form was inaugurated when they came into contact with the Etruscans and Greeks. The Tarquins summoned Etruscan artisans and artists to Rome, who made the terracotta, terra cotta as statues and a pediment group for the Capitol temple.

The types of the Gr deities had already been definitely established when the Hellenic influence in molding Roman culture began to predominate. The gods were entirely the Gr gods became familiar to the Romans in works of sculpture, they gradually supplanted those Rom deities with which they were not nominally related, a real or fancied resemblance.

See Greece, Religion in.

(4) The importation of new gods was a comparatively Polytheism is by its nature tolerant because of its indefiniteness. The Romans could no more presume to have exhaustive knowledge of the gods than they could pretend to possess a comprehensive acquaintance with the universe. The many gods of their creed increased as necessity and human consciousness of natural phenomena expanded. Besides, it was customary to invite the gods of conquered cities to transfer their abodes to Rome and favor the Romans in their undertakings. But the most productive source for religious expansion was the Sibylline Books. This oracular work was brought to Rome from Cumae, a center of the cult of Apollo. It was consulted at times of crisis with a view to discover what special ceremonies would secure adequate divine aid. The forms of worship recommended by the Sibylline Books were exclusively Gr. As early as the 5th cent. BC the cult of Apollo was introduced at Rome. Heracles and the Dioscuri found their way thither about the same time. Later Italian Diana was merged with Artemis, and the group of Ceres, Liber, and Libera were identified with foreign Demeter, Dionysus, and Persephone. Thus Roman religion became progressively Hellenized. By the close of the Second Punic War the greater gods of Greece had all found a home by the Tiber, and the myriad of petty local deities who found no counterpart in the celestial beings of Mt. Olympus fell into oblivion. Their memory was retained by the antiquarian lore of the priests alone (see Roman Empire and Christianity, III, 1).

Rom religion received with the engrailed branches of Gr religion the germs of rapid decay, for its Hellenization made Rom religion peculiarly susceptible to the attack of philosophy. The cultivated class in Gr society was already permeated with skepticism. The philosophers made the gods appear ridiculous. Gr philosophy gained a firm foothold in Rome in the 2d cent. BC, and it became customary a little later to look upon Athens as a sort of university town where the sons of the aristocracy should be sent for the completion of their education in the schools of the philosophers. Thus at the termination of the republican era religious faith had departed from the upper classes largely, and during the turmoil of the civil wars even the external ceremonies were often abandoned and many temples fell into ruins. There had never been any intimate connection between formal religion and conduct, except when the faith of the gods was invoked to insure the fulfilment of sworn promises.

Augustus tried in every way to restore the old religion, rebuilding no fewer than 82 temples which lay in ruins at Rome. A revival of religious faith did occur under the empire, although its spirit was largely absent to that which had been displayed in the performance of the official cult. The people remained superstitious, even when the cultivated classes adopted a skeptical philosophy. The formal religion of the state no longer appealed to them, since it offered nothing to the emotions or hopes. On the other hand the sacramental, mysterious character of oriental religions inevitably attracted them. This is the reason why the religions of Egypt, and Syria spread over the empire and exercised an unconscious influence on the life of the people. The partial success of Judaism and the ultimate triumph of Christianity may be ascribed in part to the same causes.

In concluding we should bear in mind that the state dictated no system of theology, that the empire in the beginning presented the spectacle of a sort of religious chaos where all national cults were guaranteed protection, that Rom polytheism was naturally tolerant, and that the only form of religion which the state could not endure was one which was equivalent to an attack upon Polytheism as a whole, since this would imperil the welfare of the community by depriving the deities of the offerings and other services in return for which their favor could be expected.

V. Rome and the Jews.—Judea became a part of the province of Syria in 63 BC (Jos, BJ, vii, 7), and Hyrcanus, brother of the last king, remained as high priest (archierus kai archdrchos; Jos, Ant, XIV, iv, 4) invested with judicial as well as religious functions. But Antony and Octavius gave Pal (40 BC) as governors a kingdom to Herod, surnamed the Great, although his rule did not become effective until 3 years later. His sovereignty was upheld by a Rom legion stationed at Jerus (Jos, Ant, XV, iii, 7), and he was obliged to pay tribute to the Rom government and provide auxiliaries for the Rom army (Appian, Bell. Civ., v, 75). Herod built a temple in honor of Augustus (Jos, Ant, XV, ix, 6), and the Rom procurators later made it the seat of government. At his death in 4 BC the kingdom was divided between his three surviving sons, the largest portion falling to Archelaus, who ruled Judea, Samaria and Idumea with the title archdrchos (Jos, Ant, XVII, xi, 4) until 6 AD, when he was deposed and his realm reduced to the position of a province. The administration by Rom procurators (see Procurator), which was now established, was interrupted during Jos, Ant, XIX, vi, 1; viii, 4.

After the fall of Jerus and the termination of the great revolt in 70 AD, Pal remained a separate province. Henceforth a legion (legio X Fretensis) was added to the military forces stationed in the land, which was encamped at the ruins of Jerus. Consequently, imperial governors of praetorian rank (legati Augusti pro praetore) took the place of the former procurators (Jos, BJ, VII, i, 2, 3; Dio Cassius IV, 23).

Several treaties are recorded between the Romans and Jews as early as the time of the Maccebees (Jos, Ant, XII, x, 6; XIII, ix, 2; viii, 5), and Jews are known to have been at Rome as early as 138 BC. They became very numerous in the capital after the return of Pomp and many captives (see Libertines). Cicero speaks of multitudes of Jews at Rome in 58 BC (Pro Flacco 28), and Caesar was very friendly toward them (Suetonius Caesar 84). Held in favor by Augustus, they recovered the privilege of collecting sums to send to the temple (Phil. Legatio ad Casum 46). Agrippa offered 100 oxen in the temple when visiting Herod (Jos., Ant. XVI, ii, 1); and Augustus established a daily offering of a bull and two lambs. Upon the whole the Roman government displayed noticeable consideration for the religious scruples of the Jews. They were exempted from military service and the duty of appearing in court on the Sabbath. Yet, Tiberius repulsed Jewish rites in Rome in 19 AD (Suetonius Tiberius 36) and Claudius expelled the Jews from the city in 49 AD (Suetonius Claudius 25); but in both instances repulsion was not of long duration.

The Jews made themselves notorious in Rome in propagating their religion by means of proselytizing (Horace Satires i.4, 142; i.9, 2. Jewish 69; Juvenal xiv.96; Tacitus Hist. Proscription v.5), and the literature of the Augustan age contains several references to the observation of the Sabbath (Thubalus 13; Ovid Ars amatoria i.67, 415; Remedium amoris 219). Proselytes from among the Gentiles were not always required to observe all the prescriptions of the Law. The proselytes of the Gate (sedobenomen), as they were called, were tolerated in the domestic affairs of the city, and abstained from the blood and meat of sacrificed animals. Among such proselytes may be included the centurion of Capernaum (Lk 7, 5), the centurion Cornelius (Acts 10, 1) and the emperor Poppaea (Jos. Ant., XX, viii, 11; Tacitus Ann. xvi.6).

On "proselytes of the Gate," GJV, IV, 157, 177, very properly corrects the error in UJP. These "Gate" people were not proselytes at all; this was the first step that carried them into Judaism—viz., circumcision (Ramsey, Expos. 1890, p. 200; Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, I. 11; see Devletius: Proselytis).

Notwithstanding the diffusion of Judaism by means of proselytism, the Jews themselves lived for the most part in isolation in the poorest parts of the city or suburbs, across the Tiber, near the Circus Maximus, or outside the Porta Capena. Inscriptions show that there were seven communities, each with its synagogue and council of elders presided over by a gerousia. Five cemeteries have been discovered with many Gr., a few Lat., but no Heb. inscriptions.

VI. ROMA AND THE CHRISTIANS.—The date of the introduction of Christianity into Rome cannot be determined. A Christian community 1. Intro- 1. existed at the time of the arrival of St. of Acts (28 15), to which he had Christianity addressed his Ep. a few years before (58 AD). It is commonly thought that the statement regarding the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius on account of the commotion excited among them by the agitaton of Chrestus (Suetonius Claudius 25; Juveno impul- sive Ceres adico tumultuosa Rome opera, probably in 49 AD), is proof of the diffusion of Christ inatian teaching in Rome, on the ground that Chrestus is a colloquial, or mistaken, form of Christus. It has been suggested that the Christian faith was brought to Rome by Paul, who was one of the Romans who were converted at the time of Pentecost (Acts 2.10.41). It would be out of place to discuss here the grounds for the traditional belief that St. Peter was twice in Rome, once before 50 AD and again subsequent to the arrival of St. Paul, and that together the two apostles established the church there. Our present concern is with the attitude of the government and society toward Christianity, when once established. It may suf- fice, therefore, to remind the reader that St. Paul was permitted to preach freely while nominally in custody (Phil 1 13), and that as early as 46 AD the Christians were very numerous (Tacitus Ann. xv.44: "multitudo ingens").

At first the Christians were not distinguished from the Jews, but shared in the toleration, or even protection, which was usually conceded to the sects. There was no legal proscription of one of the peoples embraced within the empire. Christianity was not legally proscribed until after its distinction from Judaism was clearly perceived. Two questions demand our attention: (1) When was Christianity recognized as a distinct sect of Judaism? (2) When was the profession of Christianity declared a crime? These problems are of fundamental importance in the history of the church under the Roman empire.

(1) If we may accept the passage in Suetonius cited above (Claudius 25) as testimony on the vices of Christianity, we infer that at that time the Christians were confused with the Jews. The name of Pontius Pilate, the procurator of Judaea, who was committed to the jurisdiction of her husband (Tacitus Ann. xiii.32) for adherence to a foreign belief (taperata religio), formed the basis of Tacitus' proof that as early as 57 AD Christianity had secured a covert, though imperceptible, degree of recognition. The weight of evidence in this case by the contemporary authority from whom Tacitus has gleaned this incident would supply approximately the same number of several oriental religions from the point of view of Romans of that time; for Persians, Parthians, and Aureans were exempted in manner since 44 AD. Since there is some other evidence that Pontius was a Christian, the indefinite account of the accusation against him as mentioned by Tacitus is partial proof that Christianity had not as yet been considered a threat to the empire. Such a development is clearly indicated by the letter of Domitian in A.D. 88 to the Roman council (Marucchi, Eléments d'archéologie chrétienne I. 13). At the time of the great conflagration in 64 AD the populace knew of the Christians and had charged them collectively with a plot to destroy the city (Tacitus Ann. xiv.44). The recognition of the distinctive characteristics of Christianity is already taken for granted. This was probably due in large measure to the circumstances of St. Paul's sojourn and trial in Rome and to the unprecedented number of converts made at that time. The emperor Vespasian, who was probably an adherent of Judaism (Jos. Ant. XX. viii), may have enlightened the imperial court regarding the heresy of the Christians and their separation from the parent stock.

(2) In attempting to determine approximately the time at which Christianity was placed under the official ban of the imperial government, it is convenient to adopt as starting-points certain incontestable dates between which the act of proscription was, in all probability, issued. It is clear that at the time of the great conflagration (64 AD), the profession of Christianity was not a ground for any special action. It was not until Nero was at liberty by decree of the imperial court (cf. 2 Tim 4 17) that he had charge against the Christians as a plot to burn the city, not adherence to a proscribed religion, and they were condemned, as it appears, for an attitude of hostility toward the human race (Pliny, xii.59; Tacitus Ann. xiv.44). While governor of Bithynia (c. 112 AD), Pliny the younger addressed Trajan in a celebrated letter (x.96) asking advice to guide his conduct in the trial of many persons who were accused as Christians, and inquiring particularly whether Christianity in itself was culpable, or only the faults which usually accompanied adherence to the new faith. The reply of the emperor makes quite plain the fundamental guilt at that time of adherence to Christianity, and it supposes a law already existing against it (x.97). It follows, therefore, that the law against Christianity which was the legal basis for persecution was not an expedient to meet (such, for example, as) a rebellion in 64 AD and Pliny's administration of Bithynia. We cannot define the time of this important act of legislation more closely with absolute certainty, although evidence is not wanting for the support of theories of more or less contemporaneous origin. Tradition ascribes a general persecution of the reign of Domitian, which would follow that Christianity was already forbidden religion at that time. Allusions in Rev. 6, 9, the references to recent calamities in Rome by St. Clement in his letter to the Corinthians in A.D. 96, and the condemnation of Aculius Glaubri (Dio Cassius xvii.13), a man of consular rank, together with the emperor's cousin Flavius Clemens (Dio Cassius, xii) and Flavia Domitilla and many others on the charge of atheism and Jewish customs (cf. 46 AD), are cited several times as evidence of persecution. The fact that a number of persons in Bithynia addressed Christians two years before the judicial investigation of Pliny (Pliny x.96) is of importance as corroborative evidence.
ROSE, roō. (1) (ῥόδινον, ἡ ῥόδοπετάλη; ἀνθός, ἀνθώς, "a flower") [Cant 2:1], ὄφρον, κρίνον, "a lily" [Isa 35:1]: By general consent EV is wrong: in Cant 2:1 it reads "Heb ἱβασπεράλη, the autumn crocus," and in Isa 35:1 it reads "or autumn crocus." This is the Colchicum autumnale (N.O. Lilico-eae). A Tg on Cant 2:1 explains the Heb word as "narcissus," a very common plant in the plains and mountains of Pal and a great favorite with the ancients. Two species, N.O. Narcissus pseudonarcissus (N.O. Amaryllidae), occur, the latter being the finer; they are autumn plants. All authorities agree that the so-called "rose" was some kind of bulbous plant. (2) ἰβοῦρ, ῥόδον, "the rose," mentioned in Ecles 24:14; 39:13; 50:5; Wisd 2:2; 2 Esd 2:19: There is no reason why the rose, of which several varieties are common in Pal, should not be meant. Tristram favors the rhododendron. The expression, "rose plants in Jericho," in Ecles 24:14 has nothing whatever to do with what is now sold there as a "rose of Jericho," a dwarf annual plant, Aruncus hierochuntina (N.O. Cruciferae), which dries up and can be made to reaspnd by placing the root in water.

ROSH, roōsh (ר"ש, ro'ash): A son or grandson of Benjamin (Gen 46:21)

ROSH (ר"ש, ro'ash); 'Pēs, Rhōs, var. [Qē] kephalēs, kephalōs; Vulg captivos): This name occurs in the prophecies against Gog in Ezek 38 and 39, where AV has "Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of Renderings Meshech and Tubal." This tr is due to ro'ash being the common Heb word for "head" or "chief" (cf the Gr variant and the Vulg), and is regarded as incorrect, that of the RV, “Gog, of the land of Magog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal,” being preferred.

The identification of Rosh is not without its difficulties. Gesenius regarded it as indicating the Russians, who are mentioned in Byzantine writers of the 10th cent. under the name of Rosh. He adds that they are also noticed by Ibn Fasalan (same period), under the name of Rūsā, as a people dwelling on the river Rha (Veilga). Apart from the improbability that the dominion of Gog extended to this district, it would be needful to know at what date the Rūsā of the Veilga arrived there.

Notwithstanding objections on account of its eastern position, in all probability Fried. Delitzsch’s identification of Rosh with the māt Rāḵā, “land of Rāḵā” of the Assyrian inscriptions, is the best. Sargon of Assyria (c 710 BC) conquered the countries “from the land of Rāḵā on the border of Elam as far as the river of Rūsā,” and this country is further described in the Khorsabad Inscription, 18, as “the land of Rāḵā, of the boundary of Elam, which is beside the Tigris.”

Assyria having disappeared from among the nations when Ezekiel wrote his prophecies, Babylonia was probably the only power with which “Gog of the land of Magog” would have had to reckon, but it may well be doubted whether the Bab king would have been able to exercise power in the district of Rāḵā, except as a very faithful vassal. It may here be noted that the Heb spelling of Rōṣā presupposed an earlier pronunciation as ṛāḵā, a form agreeing closely with that used by the Assyrians. See Fried. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? 225.

ROT, rot, ROTTENNESS, rottenness (vb. ṣad, ṣadē, noun ṣadāh, ṣadākhān, Job 41 27), with ṣad-q, mak, “decay” [Isa 5 24], and ṣad-q, ṣadāh, “shrivele” [so Joel 1 17 RVm]: “Rottenness of the bones” (Prov 12 4; 14 30; Hab 3 16), has in addition, has “rot” in Nu 5 21, 22, 27, where RV has “fall away” (ṣad-q, nāphāl), but a euphemistic phrase is in point (see the note on Joel). In Jer 11, 12 AV has “old rotten rags” for ṣād-q, melah, “rag” (RV “worn-out garments,” a term that specializes too far).

ROTE, rōt: RVm gives “learned by rote” in Isa 9 13 for AV “taught,” which indicates that the service of Jeh was merely formal.

ROWER, rō’er, ROWING, rō’ing. See Ships and Boats, III, 1.

ROYAL, rō’al: Either belonging to a king (kingdom) or having kingly power, dignity, authority, etc. In Heb, the word is expressed by using different nouns in the gen. case (the “construct state”), They are: (1) melek, “king”: “Asher . . . shall yield royal dainties,” lit. choice morsels of the king, meaning fit for a king (Gen 49 20); “besides that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty,” lit. which he gave her according to the hand (the wealth) of King Solomon (1 K 10 13; cf RVm); “a royal statute,” lit. statute of a melek, which is the emphatic Aram. term for melek, “king” (2 K 16 7); (2) mamlākhāh, “the power and dignity of a king,” “Gibeah one of the royal cities” in a capital city with a king of her own (Josh 10 2; cf 1 S 27 5); “all the seed royal,” lit. the seed of the kingdom (2 K 11 1; cf 2 Ch 22 10); (3) melkhāhū, “kinghood,” “kingdom” “royal majesty,” lit. majesty of kingdom (1 Ch 29 25); quite frequently in the Book of Est; royal wine (1 7); crown (1 11; 2 17; 6 8); commandment (1 19); “her royal estate,” lit. her kingdom (1 19); house royal (2 16; of 1); royal apparel (5 1; cf 6 8, 15); throne (5 1); “royal presence,” lit. “royal city,” lit. the city of the kingdom, meaning here that part of the city (Rabbah) in which the royal palace was situated (2 S 12 26); “royal diadem,” lit. turban of kingdom (2 S 25 3); (5) in Jer 43 10 we find the word shaphrēr; its meaning is uncertain; “royal pavilion” (RV and AV), “glittering” (RVm), “scepter,” “a carpet covering a throne.”

The NT uses the word for basilikōs, “belonging to a king”: “royal apparel” (Acts 12 21); “the royal law,” something like “the golden rule,” being foremost because including all others (Jas 2 5), and for basileus (being vested with kingly power and honor) “royal priesthood,” the Heb rendering would be mamlēkhēth kōhānîm, “a kingdom of priests,” i.e. a kingdom whose citizens are priests, emphasizing the two facts that the true Christians have free access to the grace of God and that they enjoy the liberties and privileges of His kingdom (1 Pet 2 9).

ROYAL CITY. See Royal, (2), (4).

RUBY, rū’bi. See STONES, Precious.

RUDDER, rud’er, Rudder-Bands. See SHIPS AND BOATS, III, 2, (3).

RUDDY, rud’i (רְדִי), ‘adhmonî [1 S 16 12; 17 42; Gen 26 25 RVm, דַּעְמִי, ‘adhām [Can 5 10]; vbs. דַּעְמִי, ‘adhām [Lam 4 7], and ἐπιφάνεια, ἐπιφάνεια, “to blush” [Ad Est 15 5]): “Ruddy” is the term taken by the adj. “red” used as a term of praise of the human skin, and this is its use in the Bible (the Heb and Gr words are all usual words for “red” or “to be red”). The dark-skinned Hebrews found great beauty in a clear complexion.

RUDIMENTS, rō’di-ments (ῥυτίξεια, stoicheia, pl. of ῥυτίξεον, stoicheion) [Gal 4 3,9; Col 2 8, 20; He 5 12; 2 Pet 3 10,12]): This word occurs 7 times in the NT, and AV translates it in three different ways. In the two passages in Gal, and in the two in 2 Pet, it is rendered “elements.” In the two passages in Col, it is tr “rudiments.” In He it is rendered “first principles.”

The etymological meaning of the word is, that which belongs to a state or rank, hence any first thing, an element, first principle. It denotes, specially (1) the letters of the logical alphabet, the spoken sounds, as the elements of speech; (2) the material elements of the universe, the physical atoms of which the world is composed; (3) the heavenly bodies; (4) the elements, rudiments, fundamental principles of any art, science or discipline; of the phrase, “the a, b, c.”

(1) The NT use of the word, where it always occurs in the pl., is as follows: In 2 Pet 3 10,12, “The elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat,” that is, the physical elements of the world and of the heavens are to be consumed, or subjected to change, by means of fire. In He 5 12, AV "Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God." This means that the Heb Christians had not understood the Advance, or the Book (N.O. Rutaceae) is the official rue, and a very similar species, R. chalepensis, is indigenous. Rue is a small shrub growing 2 to 4 ft. high, with a heavy odor, disagreeable to Westerners, but a favorite with Orientals. A sprig of it is often fixed on a child's cap or clothes as a kind of charm.

RUE, ῥοῦ (ῥιγγαος, ῥηγμόν): One of the plants mentioned in Lk 11 42 as subject to tithe: in the passage, Mt 23 23, anise and cummin are mentioned. Rue (Ruta graveolens) is the official rue, and a very similar species, R. chalepensis, is indigenous. Rue is a small shrub growing 2 to 4 ft. high, with a heavy odor, disagreeable to Westerners, but a favorite with Orientals. A sprig of it is often fixed on a child's cap or clothes as a kind of charm.

RUFUS, ῥοῦσος (Ῥοῦσος, Rhoaihos): The name is mentioned twice: (1) Simon of Cyrene, who was compelled to bear the cross of Jesus, is "the father of Alexander and Rufus" (Mk 15 21); (2) Paul sends greetings to Rom Christians, "Rufus the chosen, and his mother and mine" (Rom 16 13). Rufus was well known among those for whom Mark primarily wrote his Gospel, and according to tradition this was the Christian community at Rome. There seems no reason to doubt, therefore, that the Rufus of Mark and the Rufus of Paul are the same person. The name, meaning "red," "reddish," was, however, one of the commonest of slave names; the identification of these two is therefore merely a conjecture. The Rufus whom Paul greets is "the chosen in the Lord," i.e. "that choice Christian" (Demetrius). Since all Christians are "chosen," this title must express some distinction. The mother of Rufus had played the mother's part to Paul on some occasion of which we are ignorant, hence the phrase "his mother and mine" (cf Mk 10 30).

RUG, rug: Alternative rendering of a word (Ῥῦγμα, smitikha) in Jgs 4 18 RV, "mantle" AV. The tr is doubtful; OHl gives "rug or thick coverlet (?)"

RUHAMAH, ῥοῦ-χαμα, ῥοῦ-χαμα: See Lo-Ruhamah, the symbolic name of Hosea's daughter (Hos 1 6.8).

RUIN, ῥοῖν (Ῥῶιν, hērīs, etc.; ῥῆγμα, ῥήγμα): "Ruin," the tr of hēriša (Am 9 11; cf Acts 15 16, where RV Gr text, lā katestramēnōn), and of a number of other Heb words: in Lk 6 49 ῥῆγμα, "breakage," is used both in a literal sense (Isa 23 13; 26 2, of fallen buildings; Ezk 27 27; 31 13, of a state or people; Lk 6 49, of a house, etc) and with a moral significance (Prov 26 28). RVn correctly renders mikhēh in Ezk 18 30 "stumblingblock" (AV "ruin"), and RV in 21 15 "stumblings" (AV "ruins"). RV has "ruins" for AV "desolation" in Ezk 9 9, m "waste places"; Ps 74 3; in their ruins for "with their mant- tockas" (2 Ch 34 6, m "with their axes! The Heb is obscure); midst of the ruin for "deso- lation" (Job 30 14); their ruin for "their wicked- ness" (Prov 21 12). "Ruinen" is the tr of nap- polaha (1 Sam 17 1) and of nēzēk (2 K 19 25; Isa 37 26).

RULER, ῥοῦλερ: (1) ῥουλ, mōshēl, "rueler," "prince," "master" (tyrant), applied to Joseph in Egypt (Gen 45 8; cf Ps 106 21); to the Philis (Jgs 15 11); to David's descendants, the future kings of Israel (2 Ch 7...
8. of a number of instances RV renders it "prince," where AV has ruler (1 S 26 30; 2 S 21; 1 K 1 35, etc.). It was used of Azrikam having charge of the palace of King Ahaz (2 Ch 22 7; "grand vizier" or "minister" of Nebuchadnezzar (Ezech 21 20; 17 11), who is called the "ruler of the house of God" (1 Ch 9 11; cf 2 Ch 31 13); he was the leader of a division or group of priests. In 2 Ch 36 8 the names of three others are given (Hilkiah, Zedekiah and Jehiel).

9. The word means, "nāḇāl, "prince" (so Nu 13 2, AV "ruler"); generally speaking, the nāḇāl is one of the public authorities (Ex 22 28); the rulers of the congregation (Ex 16 22; cf 34 31); "The rulers brought the oxen stones" (Ex 35 27), as it was to be the business of the people of the tribe of Simeon and financial ability: "when a ruler [the head of a tribe or tribal division] sinneth" (Lev 4 22).

10. gāḏāhān, the representative of a king or a prince; a vice-regent; a governor; then, in the times of Ezra and Nehemiah, a leader or principal of the priests under the general supervision of these two men. The AV renders it "ruler" (Ezek 23 12 23, "deputy" (Jer 51 23 28 57), and, in most cases, "ruler" with "deputy" in m (Ex 9 2; Neh 2 16; 4 14 19; 6 7 17; 7 5; 12 40; 13 11; Isa 41 25; Eze 23 6) always used in pl.

11. kāḏān, a "judge" or "magistrate" (Isa 1 10; 3 6 7; 22 3; Mic 1 19); "a military chief" (Josh 10 24).

12. rōḏēk, one having dominion: "There is little Benjamin their ruler" (Ps 68 27); the meaning is obscure; still we may point to the facts that Saul, the first one to conquer the heathen (1 S 14 47), came of this the smallest of all the tribes, and that within its boundaries the temple of Jeh was erected.

13. rōḏēm, a "dignitary," "a prince." "The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against Jeh" (Ps 2 2); in the NT the word rendered archēgos (Acts 4 26).

14. sār, "chief; "head"; prince, king, nobleman having judicial or other power; a royal officer. RV renders it frequently "prince": "rulers over my cattle" ("head-shepherds", Gen 47 6); "rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds," etc (Ex 18 21); they had to be men of good character because they were endowed with judicial power (ver 22); in Dt 1 15 the rendering of EV is "captains," etc; they were military leaders. "Zebul the ruler of the city" (of Shechem, Jgs 9 30), meaning "governor" (1 K 22 26; 2 K 23 8); "rulers [or captains; of 1 K 16 9] of his [Solomon's] chariots" (1 K 22 12); the rulers of Jezreel (2 K 10 1) were, presumably, the ruler of the palace of the king and the ruler of the city of Samaria (cf ver 5). It is difficult to explain why they should be called the rulers of Jezreel; both the LXX and AV omit their word; "the rulers of the substance which was king David's" (1 Ch 27 31) overseers of the royal domain; "The rulers were behind all the house of Judah" (Neh 4 16), the officers were ready to assemble a large force in case of an attack.

15. shillōth, "a commander," "an officer": "the rulers of the provinces" (Dol 3 27); shilūth, "a person in power," "a potentate" (Dol 2 10); there seems to be little doubt that the Aram, term is used as an adj. (cf RVm); in Dnl 5 7 occurs the vb. shēlāq, "to have dominion," "he shall rule as the third in rank" (cf vs 16 29).

16. Nāḇāhān, "shied": "Her rulers [shields] dearly love shame" (Hos 4 18). Perhaps we ought to read (with LXX) ἀγαπέων, "their glory," and to translate it as they love shame more than their glory; they would rather have a good (!) time than a good name.

17. ἀρχή, ἀρχηγός, used of the "rulers" of the Spartans (1 Mac 14 20) and, in a general sense, of the Romans (1 Mac 2 41 2). RVm has the word also in a general sense in Gen 11 18 (RV "ruler"); a "helmsman," "ruler," etc, "one leading the way." A quite general term, Sir 10 2 (ruler of a city); 17 17 (of gentile nations); 46 18 (of the Tyrians). Also 2 17 AV (RV "he that ruleth"); and 10 35 AV (RVm "master of a feast, AV "master") of the city of Philippi; "Thou shalt not speak evil of a ruler of thy people" (Acts 23 5; cf Ex 22 28, nāḇāl; see, 1 [3] above), a magistrate, a person in authority (cf Acts 7 27 35; Rom 13 3, the public authorities; "the elders of this city of Cezaerah", persons being mentally superior to their fellow-men, and so having great influence in shaping their opinions and directing their actions.

18. ἀρχηγός, ὀρχήστρα, "ruler of the synagogue." There was the permanent president, a board of elders, who had charge of the synagogue. Sometimes they, also, were given the same name (of "one of the rulers of the synagogue," Mk 5 22 25; Lk 8 41.49; in Mt 9 18 Jairus is simply called archēn; the ruler mentioned in Lk 13 14 was, of course, the president of the board (of Acts 18 17, Sothelines), while in Acts 13 15 the phrase "rulers of the synagogue" simply signifies the board. It was a deliberative body, but at the same time responsible for the maintenance of good order in the synagogue and the observance of its members having, therefore, disciplinary power, they were authorized to reprimand, and even to excommunicate, the guilty ones (cf Jn 9 22; 12 45; 16 2).

19. ὀρχήστριος, ὀρχήστρις, the ruler ("steward," RVm) of the feast (Jn 2 8). See separate articles.

20. κοσμοκράτωρ, kosmokrátōr, a "world-ruler" (Eph 6 12). The angels of the devil (Mt 25 41; 12 45) or Satan, the prince of this world (Jn 12 31), participate in his power; they are his tools, their sphere of action being "this darkness," i.e. the morally corrupt state of our present existence.

21. πατρόκλους, patroklous; the prefect of a city (Acts 17 6 8). Luke being the only one of the Bb. authors to hand down to us this word, it is a noteworthy fact that, in relatively modern times, a Gr inscription was discovered containing this very word and, moreover, showing reference to the city of THEBE (A.T. ibid.). From where it was lost is where Paul and Silas preached the gospel so successfully that the Jews, “being moved with jealousy,” caused Jason and certain brethren to be dragged before the rulers of the city (eph tois politaríchas). These magistrates suffered themselves to be made the tools of the unscrupulous Jews by demanding and getting security from Jason and the rest.

WILLIAM BAUR

RULER OF THE FEAST (ἀρχιτρικλίτων, architriklinos; AV governor): The word occurs in the N.T. in the account of the wedding feast in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2 8,9). According to Eusebius (321) it was customary to appoint a “master of the ceremonies” from among the invited guests. It was his duty to determine the places of the guests, to see that the ordinary rules of etiquette were observed, etc., and generally to supervise the arrangements. RVm “steward” is possible if the “governor of the feast” meant the “head waiter” (Merx renders “head servant of the feast”), and not one of the guests appointed for that purpose. But the context is in favor of the view that the person in question was one of the prominent guests—an intimate friend or relative of the host. See Ruler, 2, (2). T. LEWIS

RULER OF THE SYNAGOGUE. See RULERS, 3, (1), (2).

RUMAH, ῥούμα (Ῥούμα, ῥαμά; B, 'Pepá, Rhound, A, 'Pepá, Rhound): To this place belonged Pedaiah whose daughter Zebudah (RV “Zebahah”) entered the harem of Josiah, king of Judah, and became the mother of Jehoiakim (2 K 23 36). Jos (Ant, x, v, 2) calls the place Abumoa, but this is an obvious clerical error for Arumah. This suggests a possible identification with Arumah (Jgs 9 41), which lay not far from Shechem. Another possible identification is with the Rumah mentioned by Jos (BJ, III, vii, 21) in Galilee (cf Nebi, Gögo de Talm, 263), which may be identical with the modern Dayr Râmah, about 3 miles N. of 'Effâsâra. Some, however, would identify Rumah with Dumah of Josh 15 52, where the substitution of r for d is supported by the LXX (Rheu-ma), possibly represented by the modern Dûmah, about 13 miles S.E. of Beit Jibrin. This of course was in the territory of Judah, and no question of juss connubium is involved, such as might arise in the case of a Galilean site.

W. EWING

RUMP, rump: AV uses this word as tr of ῥοδάν, 'alyah (Ex 29 22; Lev 3 9; 7 3; 8 25; 9 19), where RV correctly renders “fat tail.” Reference is here to the broad tail of the Syrian sheep, which occasionally weighs as much as 20 lbs., and is considered one of the daintiest portions of mutton. It was one of those portions of the peace and tresspass offering which were not eaten by the priest or the sacrificer, but which with other choice portions were waved before the Lord and wholly burnt on the altar as a sweet savor unto Jeh.

RUNAGATE, run-'a-gát: A runaway: “The runagates continue in scarceness” (Ps 68 6, Prayer Book Version, RV “The rebellious dwell in a parcelled land”).

RUNNER, run'er. See GAMES.

RUSH: (1) ῥοδάν, gwón; πὁρυγα, pápyros, “bulrushes,” m “papyrus” [Ex 2 3]; “rush,” m “papy-rus” [Job 8 11]; “papyrus,” AV “rush” [Isa 18 2]; “rushes” [55 7]: This is almost certainly the famous papyrus, Cyperus papyrus (N.O. Cypero-ae), known of 598-463 B.C. as “papyrus,” m “paphaving married women of Moab, in the course of a further ten years also died, and left Orpah and Ruth widows (1 5). Naomi then decided to return to Judah and her two daughters-in-law accompanied her on her journey. Orpah gave up the journey and returned to Moab, but only Ruth remained with Naomi, journeying with her to Bethelam, where they arrived "in the beginning of barley harvest" (1 22). The piety and fidelity of Ruth are thus early exhibited in the course of the narrative, in that she refused to abandon her mother-in-law, although thrice exhorted to do so by Naomi herself, on account of her own great age and the better prospects for Ruth in her own country. Orpah yielded to persuasion, and returned to Moab, but Ruth remained with Naomi.

At Bethelam Ruth employed herself in gleaning in the field during the harvest and was noticed by Boaz, the owner of the field, a near kinsman of her father-in-law Elimelech. Boaz gave her permission to glean as long as the harvest continued; and told her that he had heard of her filial conduct toward her mother-in-law. Moreover, he directed the reapers to make intentional provision for her by dropping her a bundle of barley and wheat grain before their bundles (2 15). She was thus able to return to Naomi in the evening with a whole ephah of barley (ver 17). In answer to questioning she explained that her success in gleaning was due to the good-will of Boaz, and that she was far from laboring without wages. Naomi was so much heartened by what had occurred that she sent to Boaz to recall to him his duty as near kinsman of her late husband Elimelech (3 1 f.). Boaz acknowledged the claim and promised to take Ruth in marriage, subjecting fullfilment of the legal duty of another whose relationship was nearer than that of Boaz himself (3 8–13). Naomi was confident that Boaz would fulfill his promise, and advised Ruth to wait in patience.

Boaz then adopted the customary and legal measures to obtain a decision. He summoned the near kinsman before ten elders at the gate of the city, related to him the circumstances of Naomi's return, with her desire that Ruth should be married and settled with her father-in-law's land as her marriageportion according to the laws of Israel: and gave to the elders a bundle of barley and wheat grain before his bundles (4 1–5). The near kinsman, whose name and degree of relationship are not stated, declared his inability to undertake the charge, which he renounced in legal form in favor of Boaz according to ancient custom in Israel (4 6 ff.). Boaz accepted the charge thus transferred to him, the elders and bystanders bearing witness and pronouncing a formal blessing upon the union of Boaz and Ruth (4 9–12). Upon the birth of a son in due course the women of the city gathered to the house of Naomi, singing songs of joy in the home of her family and house was now assured, and the latter became the child's nurse. The name of Obed was given to the boy; and Obed through his son Jesse became the grandfather of David (cf Mt 1 5 f.; Lk 3 31 ff.).

Thus the life and history of Ruth are important in the eyes of the narrator because she forms a link in the ancestry of the greatest king of Israel. From a more modern point of view the book is a simple but interesting and affectionate history, showing how the faithful loving service of Ruth to her mother-in-law met with its due reward in the restored happiness of a peaceful and prosperous home-life for herself. Incidentally are illustrated also ancient marriage customs of Israel, which in the time of the writer had long since become obsolete. The narrative is brief and told without affectation of style, and on that account will never lose its interest. It has preserved more than memory of an incident, the national significance of which has survived, but to which value will always be attached for its simplicity and natural grace.

Ruth, Book of: The place which the Book of Ruth occupies in the order of the books of the Eng. Bible is not, that of the Heb.

1. Order in Canon. There is one of the five the canon מֵגִּיהָלָּה or Rillos, which were ordered to be read in the synagogue on 5 special occasions or festivals during the year.

In printed ed of the OT the מֵגִּיהָלָּה are usually arranged in the order: Cant. Ruth, Lam. Eccl. Est. Ruth occupied the second position because the book was appointed to be read at the Feast of Weeks which was the second of the 5 special days. In Heb MSS, however, order was considerably altered. marginal heads were considered generally, and in one at least of the Ger. school cited by Dr. Ginzburg (Intro to the Heb. Bible, London, 1897, 4), Ruth precedes Cant: and in the former Eccl is placed before Lam. The מֵגִּיהָלָּה constitute the second portion of the קְרִית הַנַּהֲרָה or "reading of the river," as in the case of the books of the Heb Scriptures. The Talm, however, disapproved of Ruth altogether, and placed מֵגִּיהָלָּה, and places it first among the Hagiographa, before the Book of Ps. By the Gr translators the book was removed to the position where it now stands in the Can., and because it described events contemporary with the Judges, was attached as a kind of appendix to the latter work. This sequence was adopted in the Vulg. and has thus been passed into all modern Bibles.

The book is written without name of author, and there is no direct indication of its date. Its aim is to record an event of interest and importance in the family history of David, and incidentally to illustrate ancient custom and marriage law. There is no ground for supposing, as has been suggested, that the writer had a polemical purpose in view, and desired to show that the strict and stern action taken by Ezra and Nehemiah after the return in forbidding mixed marriages was not justified by precedent. The narrative is simple and direct, and the presentation of the story and its records of the descent of Israel's royal house from a Moabite ancestress was probably due in the first instance to oral communication for some considerable time before it was committed to writing. The writer also makes no distinction between David and Moab, when during the period of his outlawry the future king confided his father and mother to the care of the king of Moab (1 & 23 3 f.), and so far supports the truth of the tradition which is embodied in the Book of Ruth.

With regard to the date at which the narrative was committed to writing, it is evident from the position of the Book of Ruth in the 2. Authorship and Purpose. It is also important in the position of the book of Ruth in the 3. Date of Heb Canon that the date of its com- Composition. Position to the closing of the great period of the "earlier prophets." Otherwise it would have found a natural place, as was assigned to it in the Gr Bible, together with the Book of Jgs and other historical writings, in the second division of the Heb Scriptures. In the opening words of the book also, "It came to pass in the days when the judges judged" (Ruth 1 1), the writer appears to look back to the period of the Judges as to a comparatively distant epoch. The character of the district is pure and chaste, but has been supposed in certain places in the presence of so-called Aramaisms, to betray a late origin. The reference to the observance of marriage customs and their sanctions "in former time in Israel" (4 7) does not necessarily imply that the composition of Ruth was ante-exilic, for the laws and rights of the succession are enjoined, or that the writer of the former work was acquainted with the latter in its existing form. Slight differences of detail in the procedure would seem to suggest the contrary. On the other hand, the motive of the book, being the exhibition of the ancestry of David's house would have lost its significance and raison d'être with the death or disappearance of the last ruler of David's line in the early period of the return from Babylon (cf Zec 4:9). The most probable date therefore for the composition of the book would be in the later days of the exile, or immediately after the return. There is no clue to the authorship. The last four verses, giving the genealogy from Perez to David (cf 1 Ch 2:4-15; Mt 1:3-6; Lk 3:31-33), are generally recognized as a later addition.

The ethical value of the Book of Ruth is considerable, as setting forth an example of steadfast filial piety. The action of Ruth in refusing to desert her mother-in-law and accompanying her to her own land meets with its due reward in the prosperity and happiness which become hers, and in the honor which she receives as ancestress of the royal house of David. The writer desires to show in the person and example of Ruth that a sincere and generous regard for the claims of duty and affection leads to prosperity and honor; and at the same time that the principles and recompense of right dealing are not dependent upon race, but are as valid for a Moabitess as for a Jew. There is no distinctive doctrine taught in the book. It is primarily historical, recording a decisive incident in the origin of David's house; and in the second place ethical, indicating and enforcing as a well-known example the advantage and importance of right dealing and the observance of the dictates of filial duty. LITERATURE.—Eng. comm. upon the Book of Ruth are naturally not numerous. Cf G. W. Thatcher, "Judges and Ruth," in [New] Century Bible; R. A. Forms of read shabhâ'nîm but rendered as though the Word from shabhâ', "to imbibe," hence "drunkards;" אוֹבָנִים, oûbâ'nîm, "wine-drunkens" (Ezk 23:42 AV): "Sabaean" is also the tr. of the name of the country itself (םבאה, shabhâ') in Job 4:15; 6:19. This last, which is the root of shabhâ'nîm, is regarded by Arabists as coming from that root with the meaning of "to take captive," though she'bâ', "he raided" (cf Job 1:15), has also been suggested.

As Sheba is said in Gen 10:7, 10:28, and 25:3 respectively to have been (1) a son of Javan, the 4th son of Cush; (2) the 10th son of Joktan; (3) the 1st son of Jokshan, 2d son of Abraham and Keturah, at least two nationalities of this name are implied. The former were identified by Jos (Ant, II, x, 2) with the tall people of Saba in Upper Egypt, described by him as a city of Ethiopia, which Moses, when in the service of the Egyptians, besieged and captured.

It is the Sem Sabaeans, however, who are the best known, and the two genealogies attributed to them (Joktan-Abraham and Jokshan-Abraham) seem to imply two settlements in the Sabaeans land regarded as that of their origin.

3. Semitic and Commercial As Ezekiel 27:23 mentions Haran (Hirran), Cusheth (Kannah), and Edom as being connected with Sheba, and these three places are known to have been in Southern Arabia, their Sem parentage is undoubted. The Sabaeans are described as being exporters of gold (Isa 60:6; Ps 72:15, precious stones (Ezk 27:23), perfumes (Ezr 8:20; Isa 28:11), and if the rendering "Sabaean" for Joel 3 (4) be correct, the Sheba, "a nation far off," dealt in slaves. LITERATURE

The Sabbath was the day on which man was to leave off his secular labors and keep a day holy to Jeh.

1.  Origin of the Sabbath.—The sketch of creation in Gen 1:1—2:3 closes with an impressive account of the hallowing of the seventh day, but also rested from all his labor, and the seventh day became to him and his descendants a sacred day, a day of rest.

2.  Biblical Account creatively. The word “Sabbath” does not occur in the story; but it is recognized by critics of every school that the author (P) means to describe the Sabbath as primeval. In Ex 20:8—11 (ascribed to JE) the reason assigned for keeping the 7th day as a holy Sabbath is the fact that Jeh rested after the six days of creative activity. Ex 31:17 employs a bold figure, and describes Jeh as refreshing Himself “catching His hands after six days of work.” Thus a statement that God set apart the seventh day for holy purposes in honor of His own rest after six days of creative activity is boldly challenged by many modern scholars as merely the product of a priestly imagination of the sixth day. There are so few hints of a weekly Sabbath before Moses, who is comparatively a modern character, that argumentation is almost excluded, and each student will approach the question with the bias of his whole intellectual and spiritual history. There is no distinct mention of the Sabbath in Gen, though a 7-day period is referred to several times (Gen 7:4, 10; 8:10,12; 29:27 f.). The first express mention of the Sabbath is found in Ex 15:21—26, in connexion with the giving of the law. Jeh taught the people in the wilderness to observe the 7th day as a Sabbath of rest by sending no manna on that day, a double supply being given on the 6th day of the week. Here we have to do with a weekly Sabbath as a day of rest from ordinary secular labor. A little later the Ten Words were spoken by Jeh from Sinai in the hearing of all the people, and were afterward written on the two tables of stone (Ex 20:1—17; 31:18). The Fourth Commandment enjoins upon Israel the observance of the 7th day as a holy day of rest, the week as a holy day on which no work shall be done by man or beast. Children and servants are to desist from all work, and even the stranger within the gates is required to keep the day holy. This provision is that Jeh rested on the 7th day and blessed it and hallowed it. There is no hint that the restrictions were meant to guard against the wrath of a jealous and angry deity. The Sabbath was meant to be a blessing to man and not a burden.

After the sin in connection with the golden calf Jeh rehearsed the chief duties required of Israel, and again announces the law of the Sabbath (Ex 34:21, ascribed to J). In the Levitical legislation there is frequent mention of the Sabbath (Ex 31:13—16; 32:6; Lev 19:33; 25:3—8). A wilful Sabbath-breaker was put to death (Nu 15:32—36).

In the Deuteronomic legislation there is equal recognition of the importance and value of the Sabbath (Dt 5:12—15). Here the reason assigned for the observance of the Sabbath is philanthropic and humanitarian: “that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou.” It is thus manifest that all the Pentateuchal codes, whether proceeding from Moses alone or from many hands in wide different centuries, equally recognize the Sabbath as one of the characteristic institutions of Israel’s religious and social life. If we cannot point to any observance of the weekly Sabbath prior to Moses, we can at least be sure that this was one of the institutions which he gave to Israel. From the days of Moses until now the holy Sabbath has been kept by devout Israelites.

“The older theories of the origin of the Jewish Sabbath (connecting it with Egypt, with the day of Saturn, or in general with the planetary) have been almost entirely abandoned” [see ASTRONOMY, I, 5]. The disposition at present is to regard the day as originally a lunar festival, similar to a Bab custom (Schrader, Stud. u. Krit., 1874), or the rather as a day of rest, its name being merely by a radiol of work to the Babylonian (Schrader, Stud. u. Krit., 1874). It is customary to connect the name with the Heb word sabattan. Thus wrote Professor C. H. Toy in 1899 (JBL, XVIII, 190). In a syllable {I R, 32, 160} sabattan is said to be equivalent to the Heb libbi, the natural tr of which seemed to be “day of rest of the heart.” Schrader, Sayce and others so understood the phrase, and naturally looked upon sabattan as equivalent to the Heb Sabbath. But Jensen and others have shown that the phrase should be rendered “day of the appeasement of the mind” (of an offended deity). The reference is to a day of atonement or pacification rather than a day of rest, a day in which one must be careful not to arouse the anger of the god, therefore one should do over the same day particular day. Now the term sabattum has been found only 5 or 6 in the Bab inscriptions and in none of them is it connected with the 7th day of a week. There was, however, a sort of institution among the Assyrians that it was not eaten food prepared by fire, not to put on royal dress, not to ride in his chariot, etc. As to the 19th day, it is thought that it was included among the unlucky days because it was the 49th (7 times 7) from the 1st of the preceding month. As there were 30 days in the month, it is evident that we are not dealing with a recurring 7th day in the week, as is the case with the Heb Sabbath.

Moreover, no proof has been adduced that the term sabattum ever applied to sabbath or other unlucky days. Hence the assertions of some Assyriologists with regard to the Bab origin of the Sabbath must be taken with several grains of salt. Notice must be taken of an ingenious and able paper by Professor M. Jastrow, which has been presented before the Eleventh International Congress of Orientalists in Paris in 1897, in which the learned author attempts to show that the Heb Sabbath was originally a day of propitiation like the Bab sabattum (AJT, II, 31—32). He argues that the restrictive measures in the Heb laws for the observance of the Sabbath arose from the original conception of the Sabbath as an unfavorable day, a day in which the anger of Jeh might flash forth against men. Although Jastrow has supported his thesis with many arguments that are cogent, yet the reverent student of the Scriptures will find it difficult to resist the impression that the OT writers without exception thought of the Sabbath not as an unfavorable day; but rather as a day set apart for the benefit of man. Whatever may have been the attitude of the early Hebrews toward the day which was to become a characteristic institution of Judaism in all ages and in all lands, the organs of revelation throughout the OT enforce the observance of the Sabbath by imposing upon it beneficent and humanitarian aspects.

We must call attention to Meinhold’s ingenious hypothesis as to the origin of the Sabbath. In 1894...
Theophrastus G. Pinches discovered a tablet in which the term "shabbat" is applied to the 15th day of the month. Moderns in Bab denote the day of the full moon. Dr. Skinner thus develops Meinhold's theory: "He points to the close association of new-moon and Sabbath, as in the present references to the OT, I Chron 8:5; Hos 2:11; Isa 1:13; 2 K 4:23; and concludes that the early Israel, as in Babylonia, the Sabbath was the full moon festival. The phrases of the weekly Sabbath he traces to a desire to accommodate the Israelites for the loss of the old lunar festivals, when these were abrogated by the Deuteronomic reform. This innovation he attributes to Ezekiel; but steps toward it were produced in a new yearly day of rest during harvest, only (on the ground of Dt 16:8; cf Ex 34:22), and its observance was thus made in profusion of the year (Lev 25), which he considers to be older than the weekly Sabbath" (ICC on Gen, p. 39). Dr. Skinner well says: "the whole story involves the improbability. It is not certain that the Babians applied the term 'sabbata' to the 15th day of the month because it was the day of the full moon; and it is by no means certain that the early prophets in Israel identified sabbath with the festival of the new moon.

The wealth of learning and ingenuity expended in the search for the origin of the Sabbath has brought to the present yielded small returns.

II. History of the Sabbath after Moses.—The early prophets and historians occasionally make mention of the Sabbath. It is sometime named in connection with the festival of the new moon (2 K 4:23; Am 8:5; Hos 2:11; Isa 1:13; Ezek 48:3). The prophets faulted faithfulness to the worship on the Sabbath, because it was not spiritual nor directed to the glory of God. The Sabbath is exalted by the great prophets who faced the crisis of the Bab exile as one of the most valuable institutions in Israel's life. Great promises are attached to faithful observance of the holy day, and possession is made of Israel's unfaithfulness in profaning the Sabbath (Jer 17:21–27; Isa 56:2–4; 58:13; Ezek 20:12–24). In the Pers period Nehemiah struggled earnestly to make the people of Israel observe the law of the Sabbath (Neh 10:31; 13:15–22).

With the development of the synagogue the Sabbath became a day of worship and of study of the Law, as well as a day of cessation from all secular employment. That the Inter-testamental Period the pious in Israel carefully observed the Sabbath is clear from the conduct of the Maccabees and their followers, who at first declined to resist the onslaught made by their enemies on the Sabbath (1 Macc 2:29–38); but necessity drove the faithful to defend themselves against hostile attack on the Sabbath (1 Macc 2:39–41). This was during the period between Ezra and the Christian era that the spirit of Jewish legalism flourished. Innumerable restrictions and rules were formulated for the conduct of life under the Law. Great principles were lost to sight in the mass of petty details. Two entire treatises of the Mish, Shabbath and 'Erubbin, are devoted to the details of Sabbath observance. The subject is touched upon in other parts of the Mish; and in the Gemara there are extended discussions, with citations of the often divergent opinions of the Tannaim. In the Mish (Shabbath, vi.2) there are 39 classes of prohibited actions with regard to the Sabbath, and there is much hair-splitting in working out the details. The beginnings of this elaborate definition of actions permitted and actions forbidden are to be found in the centuries immediately following the Christian era. The movement was at flood tide during Our Lord's earthly ministry and continued for centuries afterward, in spite of His frequent and vigorous protests.

Apart from His claim to be the Messiah, there is no subject on which Our Lord commented more than religious leaders of the Jews as in the matter of Sabbath observance. He set Himself squarely against the current rabbinic restrictions as contrary to the spirit of the original law of the Sabbath. The rabbis seemed to think that the Sabbath was an end in itself, an institution to which the pious Israelite must subject all his personal interests; in other words, that man was made for the Sabbath; man might suffer hardship, but the institution must be preserved inviolate. Jesus, on the contrary, taught that the Sabbath was made for man's benefit. If there should arise a conflict between man's needs and the letter of the Law, man's needs must have precedence over the law of the Sabbath (Mt 12:1–14; Mk 2:23–3:6; Lk 6:1–11; also Jn 6:1–18; Lk 13:10–17; 14:1–6). There is no reason to think that Jesus meant to discredit the Sabbath as an institution. It was His custom to attend worship in the synagogue on the Sabbath (Lk 4:16). The humane element in the rest day at the end of every week must have appealed to His sympathetic nature. It was the one precept of the Decalogue that was predominantly ceremonial, though it had distinct sociological and moral import. As an institution for the benefit of toiling men and animals, Jesus held the Sabbath in high regard. As the Messiah, He was not subject to its restrictions; He could and did on many occasions give the law of the Sabbath (Mk 2:28). The argument was not on a par with the great moral precepts, which are unchangeable. It is worthy of note that, while Jesus pushed the moral precepts of the Decalogue into the inner realm of thought and desire, thus making the requirement more difficult and the law more exacting, He fought for a more liberal and lenient interpretation of the law of the Sabbath. Rigorous sabbatarians must look elsewhere for a champion of their views.

The early Christians kept the 7th day as a Sabbath, much after the fashion of other Jews. Gradually the 1st day of the week came to be recognized as the day on which the followers of Jesus would meet for worship. The resurrection of Our Lord on that day made it for Christians the most joyous day of all the week. When Gentiles were admitted into the church, the question at once arose whether they should be required to keep the Lord of the Jews. It was held that he fought for and won freedom for his gentle fellow-Christians. It is significant of the attitude of the apostles that the decrees of the Council at Antioch in 56, which as we know of Sabbath observance in the requirements laid down, were rejected (Acts 15:21). Paul boldly contended that believers in Jesus, whether Jew or Gentile, were set free from the burdens of the Mosaic Law. Even circumcision counted for nothing, now that men were saved by believing in Jesus (Gal 5:6). Christian liberty as proclaimed by Paul included all days and seasons. A man could observe special days or not, just as his own judgment and conscience might dictate (Rom 14:5); but in all such matters one ought to be careful not to put a stumbling-block in another's way (Rom 14:13). That Paul contended for personal freedom in respect of the Sabbath is made quite clear in Col 2:16, where he groups together dietary laws, feast days, new moons and sabbaths. The early Christians brought over into their midst the practice of observing the Lord's Day the best elements of the Jewish Sabbath, without its onerous restrictions. SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST POSITION

The views entertained by Seventh-Day Adventists concerning the nature and obligation of the Sabbath may conveniently be presented under three general considerations: (1) what the law says concerning the Sabbath; (2) what history says concerning the Sabbath; (3) the significance of the Sabbath.

(1) OT teaching.—In their views concerning the institution and primal obligation of the Sabbath, Seventh-Day Adventists are in harmony with the Scriptures. What the law says concerning the Sabbath day is recorded in Genesis 2:3. The blessing here placed upon the Sabbath day distinguishes it from the other days of the week, and the day thus blessed was "sanctified" (AV, RV "holy-apart from other days").

That the Sabbath thus instituted was well known throughout the Patriarchal age is clearly established both by direct evidence and by necessary inference. "If we had no other passage than this of Gen. 2 3, there would be no difficulty in deducing from it a precept for the universal observance of a Sabbath, or seven days, to be devoted to God as holy time by all of that race for whom the law was given. All the things therein were special preparations. The first men must have known it. The word does not mean that men were to observe it otherwise. They would be a blank unless in reference to some who were required to keep it holy" (Lange's Comm. on Gen. 2 3, I, 187).

"And the day arrived when Moses went to Goshen to see his brethren, that he saw the children of Israel in their hardness and hard labor, and Moses was grieved on their account. And Moses returned to Egypt and came to the house of Pharaoh, and came before the king, and Moses bowed down before the king. And Moses said unto Pharaoh, I pray thee, my lord, I come to speak a small request from thee, turn not away my face empty; and Pharaoh said unto him, Speak. And Moses spake unto Pharaoh, saying, let my people go to serve the Lord, and let them sacrifice to the Lord their Creator. And Pharaoh said, I will let them go, if they shall sacrifice to me in this land. And Moses said, Behold I have lifted up thy face in this thing to grant thy request. And Pharaoh ordered a preparation throughout all his places, and gave to Pharaoh saying, To you, all the children of Israel, thus says the king. Shall do your work, and labor, both on the sixth day you shall rest, and shall not perform any work; thus shall you do in all the days, as the king and Moses the son of Bithia have commanded. And Moses rejoiced at this thing which the king had granted to him, and all the children of Israel did as Moses ordered them. For this thing was from the Lord to the children of Israel, for the Lord had begun to remember the children of Israel to save them for the sake of their fathers, And the Lord was with Moses, and his fame went throughout Egypt, and Moses became great in the eyes of all the Egyptians, and in the eyes of all the children of Israel, seeking good for his people Israel, and speaking words of rebuke to the king regarding his request to the king" (Book of Joshua 70:41-51, published by Noah & Gould, New York, 1895-1899).

"Hence you can see that the Sabbath was before the law of Moses came, and has existed from the beginning of the world. And if Moses and Moses were in the presence of the true faith, met together and called upon God on this day, (Ex. XXXV, p. 32). Why should God begin two thousand years after (the creation of the world) to give men a Sabbath upon the reason of His rest from the creation? He left none called man to that commemoration before? And it is certain that which was observed in the falling of the manna before the giving of the Law; and let any considering Christian judge . . . (1) whether the note was not more rest of God's rest in the creation, and was this called upon that to the original reason of the Sabbath; (2) and then the first, and should not have been said. Remember to keep holy the Sabbath day, for six days the manna fell, and not on the seventh; rather than for six days God created heaven and earth, etc. and rested the seventh day". And it is usually added. Wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it." Nay, consider whether this annexed reason intimates not that the day on this ground being divided into two parts, God had sent not down the manna on that day, and that He prohibited the people from seeking it" (Richard Baxter, Practical Wisdom, 1711, II, 774, ed. 1875). That the Sabbath was known to those who came out of Egypt, even before the giving of the Law at Sinai, is shown from the experience with the manna, as recorded in Ex 16:22-30. The double portion on the sixth day, and its preservation, was the constantly recurring miracle which reminded the people of their obligation to rest, so that the Sabbath was a definite day, the seventh day.

To the people, first wondering at this remarkable occurrence, Moses said, "This is that which the Lord hath said, To morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord" (ver 29 AV). To some who went out to gather manna on the seventh day, the Lord administered this rebuke: "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?" (ver 28). All this shows that the Sabbath law was well understood, and that the failure to observe it rendered the people justly subject to Divine reproof.

At Sinai, the Sabbath which was instituted at creation, and had been observed during the intervening centuries, was embodied in a statement of man's duties usually designated as the "Ten Commandments." It is treated as an institution already well known and the command is, "Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy" (Ex 20:8). That in the 4th commandment that tenet of the Sabbath is revealed. It is a memorial of the Creator's rest at the close of those six days in which He made "heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them". For this reason 'Jehovah blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it'. This blessing was not placed upon the day at Sinai, but in the beginning, when "God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it" (Gen 2:3).

From the very nature of the basis of the Sabbath, as set forth in this commandment, both the institution itself and the definite day of the Sabbath are of a permanent nature. So long as it is true that God created heaven and earth, and all things therein, so long will the Sabbath remain as a memorial of God's work; and so long as it is true that this creative work was completed in six days, and that God Himself rested on the seventh day, and was refreshed in the enjoyment of His completed work, so long will it be true that the memorial of that work can properly be celebrated only upon the seventh day of the week.

During all the period from the deliverance out of Egypt to the captivity in Babylon, the people of God were distinguished from the nations about them by the worship of the only true God, and the observance of His holy day. The proper observation of the true Sabbath would preserve them from idolatry, being a constant reminder of the one God, the Creator of all things. Even when, however, suffering from the attacks of the Babylonians, God assured His people, through the prophet Jeremiah, that if they would hallow the Sabbath day, great should be their prosperity, and the city should remain forever (Jer 17:18). This shows that the spiritual observance of the Sabbath was the supreme test of people's relation to God. And all the prophecies of Isaiah, which deal primarily with the restoration from Babylon, remarkable promises were made to those who would observe the Sabbath, as recorded in Isa 66:1-7.

(2) NT teaching.—From the record found in the four Gospels, it is plain that the Jews during all the previous centuries had preserved a knowledge both of the Sabbath institution and of the definite day.
It is equally plain that they had made the Sabbath burdensome by their own rigorous exactions concerning it. And Christ, the Lord of the Sabbath, both by example and by precept, brushed aside those objections that He then revealed of the Sabbath of the commandment as God gave it—a blessing and not a burden. A careful reading of the testimony of the evangelists will show that Christ taught the observance of the commandments of God rather than the traditions of men, and that the charge of Sabbath-breaking was brought against Him for no other reason than that He refused to allow the requirements of man to change the Sabbath, blessed of God, into merely a human institution, grievous in its nature, and enforced upon the people with many and troublesome restrictions.

All are agreed that Christ and His disciples observed the seventh-day Sabbath previous to the crucifixion. That His followers had received no intimation of any proposed change at His death, is evident from the recorded fact that on the day when He was in the tomb they rested, "on the sabbath . . . according to the commandment." (Le 23:56) and that they treated the following day, the first day of the week, the same as old, is further evidenced upon that day they came unto the sepulcher for the purpose of anointing the body of Jesus. In all, whatever charge was made against the work of the disciples in proclaiming the gospel of a risen Saviour, no other Sabbath is recognized than the seventh day by their conduct and by the record of the Scriptures, in which He expressly stated that Sunday was only a human ordinance, but that He had added nothing to the command. There would be no restoration of the Sabbath whatever by the circumstances that men did not fast upon it, and that they prayed standing up and not kneeling, as Christ had now been raised from the dead. The festival of Sunday, like all other festivals, was always only a human ordinance, and it was far from the intentions of the apostles to establish a Divine command in this respect, far from them, and from the early apostolic church, to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday. Perhaps at the end of the 2d cent., a false application of this kind had begun to falsify anything else, "God save everything that he had made, and, behold, it was signification of very good" (Gen 1:31). The Sabbath was both the sign and the memorial of that creative power which is able to make all things good, and the image of God, lost that image through sin. In the gospel, provision is made for the restoration of the image of God in the soul of man. The Creator is the Redeemer and redemption is the new creation. As the Sabbath was the sign of that creative power which wrought in Christ, the Word, in the making of the heaven and the earth and all things therein, so it is the sign of that same creative power working through the same eternal Word for the restoration of all things. Wherefore, if man is in sin, as there is a new creation: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5:17). "For neither is circumcision anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation" (Gal 6:15). "For all things are made new. . . . Christ be exalted in your hearts, who God afore prepared that we should walk in them" (Eph 2:10).

A concrete illustration of this gospel meaning of the Sabbath is found in the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The same creative power which was exercised in the signs and miracles which preceded their deliverance, and in those miracles, such as the opening of the Red Sea, the transformation of the stone into bread from the rock, which attended the journeys of the Israelites. In consequence of these manifestations of creative power in their behalf, the children of Israel were instructed to remember in their observance of the Sabbath that they were delivered from Egypt, as a new creation. And so the deliverance from Egypt is the type of every man's deliverance from sin; and the instruction to Israel concerning the Sabbath is both historical and typical.
the Sabbath shows its true significance in the gospel of salvation from sin, and the new creation in the image of God.

Furthermore, the seventh-day Sabbath is the sign of both the divinity and the deity of Christ. God only can create. He through whom this work is wrought must be one with God. To this the Scriptures testify: "In the beginning was the Word, . . . . and the Word was God. . . . All things were made through him; and without him was not anything that was made." But the same Word which was with God, and was God, "became flesh, and dwelt among us" (Jn 1 1.3.14).

This is the eternal Son, "in whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of his grace" (Eph 1 7). To the Christian the Sabbath, which was the sign and memorial of that Divine power which wrought through the eternal Word in the creation of the heaven and the earth, becomes the sign of the same power working through the same eternal Son to accomplish the new creation, and is thus the sign of both the divinity and the deity of Christ.

Inasmuch as the redemptive work finds its chief expression in the cross of Christ, the Sabbath, which is the sign of that redemptive work, becomes the sign of the cross.

Seventh-Day Adventists teach and practise the observance of the Sabbath, not because they believe in salvation through the keeping of a man's law, but because they believe in that salvation which alone can be accomplished by the creative power of God working through the eternal Son to create believers anew in Christ Jesus. Seventh-Day Adventists believe, and teach, that the observance of any other day than the seventh as the Sabbath is the sign of that predicted apostasy in which the man of sin would be revealed who would cause himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped. Seventh-Day Adventists believe, and teach, that the observance of the Sabbath in this generation is a part of that gospel work which is to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY, jûr'ni (σαββαθῶν ὁδὸς, sabbithôn hodos): Used only in Acts 1 12, where it designates the distance from Jesus to the Mount of Olives on which He discipled His disciples on the day of His ascension. The expression comes from rabbinical usage to indicate the distance a Jew might travel on the Sabbath without transgressing the Law, the command against working on that day being interpreted as including travel (see Ex 16 27–30). The limit set by the rabbis to the Sabbath day's journey was 2,000 cubits from one's house or domicile, which was derived from the statement found in Josh 3 4 that this was the distance between the ark and the people on their march, this being assumed to be the distance between the tents of the people and the tabernacle during the sojourn in the wilderness. Hence it must have been allowable to travel thus far to attend the worship of the tabernacle. We do not know when this assumption in regard to the Sabbath day's journey was made, but it seems to have been in force in the time of Christ. The distance of the Mount of Olives from Jesus is stated in Jos (Ant. XX, xvi, 6) to have been five stadia or furlongs, and in B. B. V, i, six stadia, the discrepancy being explained by supposing a different point of departure. This would make the distance of the Sabbath day's journey from 1,000 to 1,200 yds., the first agreeing very closely with the 2,000 cubits. The rabbis, however, invented a way of increasing this distance without technically infringing the Law, by depositing some food at the 2,000-cubit limit, before the Sabbath, and declaring that spot a temporary domicile. They might then proceed 2,000 cubits from this point without transgressing the Law.

And in some cases even this intricacy of preparation was unnecessary. If, for instance, the approach of the Sabbath found one on his journey, the traveler might select some tree or some stone wall at a distance of 2,000 paces and mentally declare this to be his residence for the Sabbath, in which case he was permitted to go the 2,000 paces to the selected tree or wall and also 2,000 paces beyond, but in such a case he must do the work thoroughly and must say: "I should be at the trunk of that tree," for if he merely said: "Let my Sabbath residence be under that tree," this would not be sufficient, because the expression would be too general and indefinite (Tract. 'Erbûnî 4 7).

Other schemes for extending the distance have been devised, such as regarding the quarter of the town in which one dwells, or the whole town itself, as the domicile, thus allowing one to proceed from any part of the town to a point 2,000 cubits beyond its utmost limits. This was most probably the case with walled towns, at least, and boundary stones have been found in the vicinity of Gaza with inscriptions supposed to mark these limits. The 2,000-cubit limits around the Levitical cities (Nu 35 5) may have suggested the limit of the Sabbath day's journey also. The term came to be used as a designation of distance which must have been more or less definite.

SABBATH, SECOND AFTER THE FIRST (σαββάτῳ δεύτερῳ τρίτῳ, sabbatô deuterô troîth; [Lk 6 1; lit. "the second-first Sabbath," of RV's): We will mention only a few of the explanations elicited by this expression. (1) It was the first Sabbath in the second year of a 2-year cycle comprising the period from one Sabbath year to the other; (2) the first Sabbath after the second day of Passover, i.e. the first of the seven Sabbaths the Hebrews were to "count unto" themselves from "the morrow after the Sabbath" (the day after Easter) until Pentecost (Lev 23 15); (3) the first Sabbath in the Jewish ecclesiastical year (about the middle of March), the first Sabbath in the civil year (about the middle of September) being counted as the first "first-first Sabbath"; (4) the word is a monstrous combination of the words δεύτερος, "second," and πρῶτος, "first," attributable to unskilful attempts at textual emendation on the part of copyists. This supposition would, of course, render unnecessary all other efforts to unravel the knotty problem, and, as a matter of fact, δευτερο-πρῶτος is omitted by many MSS (including K and B). To those not feeling inclined to accept this solution we would suggest the first of the above-named explanations as the most natural and probable one.

SABBATHES, sab-a-thé's: AV = RV SABBATHES (q.v.).

SABBATHS, sab-ath'z, OF YEARS (τὰ ἰερήματα, thâ ierê'mata; ἀναπαύσεως τὰς, anapausiseos tâs; [Lev 25 8]): The seven sabbatic years preceding the Year of Jubilee. See SABBATICAL YEAR; JUBILEE YEAR; ASTRONOMY, I, 5.

SABBATICAL, sa-bâ'tik-al, YEAR (τὸ ἰερήμα, tô ierê'ma; sabbath; ἀναπαύσεως, anapausiseos, "a year of solemn rest"; or τὸ ἱερήματος, tô ierê'matos, sabbath; ἀναπαύσεως, sabbata anapausiseos, "a sabbath of solemn rest" [Lev 25 4]; or ἡμέρα τοῦ Χαμέρα, χαμήρα ἡς τὴν μήνα τῆς Χαμήρας, "the year of release" ([Dt 15:9; 31:10]). We find the first rudiments of this institution in the so-called Covenant Book (Ex 21:1–23). Its connection with the day of rest (Sabbath) is obvious, although it strikes us as somewhat remarkable that in Ex 23:10–12 the regulation regarding the 7th year should precede the statute respecting the 7th day. Still it seems natural that after the 9th year, "whence Israel was sojourners in the land of Egypt," the Covenant Book should put in a good word for the poor in Israel (ver 11: "Let it rest and lie fallow, that the poor of thy people may eat"). Even the beasts of the field are remembered (cf Jon 4:11).

We must, therefore, conclude that in this early period of the history of Israel the regulation regarding the 7th year was primarily intended for the relief of the poor and for the awakening of a sense of responsibility in the hearts of those better provided with the means of subsistence. It would be wrong, however, to deny its Sabbatic character, for the text expressly says: "But the 7th year shall be a Sabbath to the land" (lit. "thou shalt release it"), implying that the land was entitled to a rest because it needed it; it must be released for a time in order to gain fresh strength and insure its future fertility. Two motives, then, present themselves most clearly, one of a social, the other of an economic character, and both are rooted in God's dealings with Israel (cf Ex 21:1).

Another evidence of the humane spirit pervading the Mosaic Law may be found in Ex 21:2–6, where in the case of a Hebrew slave, the term of his servitude is limited to six years. The connection of this passage with the idea of the Sabbatical year is evident, but we fail to detect here any reference to the Sabbatical year. It is clear that the 7th year in which a slave might be set free need not necessarily coincide with the Sabbatical year, though it might, of course. The same is true of Dt 15:12–15: it has nothing to do with the Sabbatical year. On the other hand it is reasonable to assume that the "release" mentioned in Dt 15:1–3 took place in the Sabbatical year; in other words, its scope had been enlarged in later years so as to include the release from pecuniary obligation, i.e. the remission of debts or, at least, their temporary suspension. This moral principle of Israel was now developing from a purely agricultural to a commercial nation. Still the same spirit pervaded the command for the poor to be fed and for the land to be allowed to rest. In the former period, it goes without saying that the old regulations respecting the release in the 7th year was still in force. (cf ver 2: "because Jehovah's release hath been proclaimed").

According to ver 6 of this proclamation occurred at the end of every 7 years, or, rather, during the 7th year; for we must be careful not to strain the expression "at the end" (cf ver 9, where the 7th year is called "the year of release"); it is quite natural to identify this 7th year with the Sabbatical year.

Moreover, we are now almost compelled to assert that the Sabbatical year by this time had become an institution observed simultaneously all over the country. From the wording of the regulation regarding the 7th year in the Covenant Book we are not certain about this in the early periods. But now, it is different. Jehovah's release hath been proclaimed.

It was a solemn and general proclamation, the date of which was very likely the day of atonement in the 7th month (the Sabbatical month). The observance of the Feast of Tabernacles (booths) began five days later and it lasted from the 15th day to the 21st of the 7th month (Tisri). In the Sabbatical year, at that time, the Law was read "before all Israel in their hearing," a fact which tends to prove that the Sabbatical year became a matter of general and simultaneous observance (cf Dt 31:10–13). Another lesson may be deduced from this passage: it gives us a hint respecting the use to which the people may have put their leisure time during the 12 months of Sabbatical rest; it may have been a period of religious and probably other instruction.

In Lev 25:1–7 the central idea of the Sabbatical year is under consideration. Although we should be careful not to look for too much of the ideal and dogmatic in the institutions of the children of Israel, yet we must never lose sight of the religious and educational character even of their ancient legislation.

One central thought is brought home to them, viz. God is the owner of the soil, and through His grace only the chosen people have come into its possession. Their time, i.e. they themselves, belong to Him: this is the deepest meaning of the day of rest; their land, i.e. their means of subsistence, belong to Him: this reveals to us the innermost significance of the year of rest. It was Jehovah's pleasure to call the children of Israel into life, and if they live and work and prosper, they are indebted to His unmerited loving-kindness. They should, therefore, put their absolute trust in Him, never doubt His word or His power, always obey Him and so always receive His unbounded blessings.

If we think of the purely religious character of the Sabbatical year, we are now keeping with the idea permeating the OT, namely that the children of Israel are the chosen people of Jehovah. All their agricultural, social, commercial and political relations are to be based upon calling and shaped according to God's sovereign will.

But did they live up to it? Or, to limit the question to our subject: Did they really observe the Sabbatical year? There are those who hold that the regulations regarding the Sabbatical year was not observed before the captivity. In order to prove this assertion they point to Lev 26:34 f. 43; also to 2 Ch 36:21. But all we can gather from these passages is the palpable conclusion that the law regarding the Sabbatical year had not been strictly obeyed, a deficiency which may mar the effect of any law.

The possibility of observing the precept respecting the Sabbatical year is demonstrated by the post-exilic history of the Jewish people. Nehemiah registers the solemn fact that the reestablished nation entered into a covenant to keep the law and to maintain the temple worship (Neh 9:8; 10:32 f.). In ver 31 of the last-named chapter he alludes to the 7th year, "that we would forego the 7th year, and the exact time are not sure of the exact meaning of this short allusion; it may refer to the Sabbatical rest of the land and the suspension of debts.

For a certainty we know that the Sabbatical year was observed by the Jews at the time of Alexander the Great. When he was petitioned by the Samarians "that he would remit the tribute of the 7th year to them, because they did not sow therein, he asked who they were that made such a petition"; he was told they were Hebrews, etc (Jos, Ant, XI, viii, 6).

During Maccabean and Asmonean times the law regarding the Sabbatical year was strictly observed, although it frequently weakened the cause of the Jews (1 Macc 6:40, 53; Jos, Ant, XIII, viii, 1; cf I Rd, i, ii, 4; Ant, XIV, x, 6; XV, i, 2). Again we may find references to the Sabbatical year in Jos, Ant, XIV, xvi, 2, etc; Tac. Hist. v. 4, etc, all of which testifies to the observance of the Sabbatical year in the Herodian era. The words of Tacitus show the popular and an emphasis on the Jewish character and customs: "For the 7th day they are said to have prescribed rest because this day ended their labors; then, in addition, be being allured by their lack of energy, they also spend the 7th year in laziness. See also Astronom. 1, 5, 3 (4); Judæus Year. W. F. BAUD.
SABBAT, or SABTHAH, sab'ta (סבתא, sabbathā', סבתא, sabbathā): Third son of Cush (Gen 10 7 = 1 Ch 1 9). A place Sabta is probably to be looked for in South Arabia. Arab geographers give no exact equivalent of the name. Al Bekri (185) quotes a line of early poetry in which Dhu 'l Sabta is mentioned, and the context might indicate a situation in Yemamah; but the word is possibly not a proper name. It is usually identified with Sabatha (Ptol., vi.7, 28) or with the Sabota of Pliny (vi.22; xii.32), an old mercantile city in South Arabia celebrated for its trade in frankincense and, according to Ptolemy, possessing 60 temples. It is said also to have been the territory of a king Elishar, whose name presents a striking resemblance to Dhu 'l-Ashtar, one of the "Tabbas" or Himyarite kings of Yemen. Another conjecture is the Saphtha of Ptolemy (vi.7, 30) near the Arabian shore of the Pers Gulf.

SABTECA, sab'tē-ka (סבתה, sabbēkhāh'; סבתה, sabatha; סבתה, Sabatha; סבתהא, śabethaḥ; Sabatha): The 5th name of the sons of Cush in the genealogy of Gen 10 5-7. In 1 Ch 1 8,9 AV reads "Sabtechah," RV "Sabteca." Many conjectures have been made as to the place here indicated. Recently Glazer (Skizze, II, 252) has revived the suggestion of Bochart that it is to be identified with Samylda in Carmania on the E. of the Pers Gulf. This seems to rest on nothing more than superficial resemblance of the names; but the phonetic changes involved are difficult. Others have thought of various places in Arabia, toward the Pers Gulf; but the data necessary for any satisfactory decision are not now available.

SACAR, sakkār (סקר, sakkār): (1) Father of Abiam, a follower of David (1 Ch 11 35, B, אֶשֶׁר, Achōr, A, סָכָר, Sakkār = "Sharar" of 2 S 23 33; Sharar is favored as the original reading). (2) Eponym of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26 4).

SACRAMENTS, sak'ra-ments: The word "sacrament" comes from the Lat sacramentum, which in the classical period of the language was used in two chief senses: (1) as a legal term to denote the sum of money deposited by two parties to a suit which was forfeited by the loser and appropriated to sacred uses; (2) as a military term to designate the oath of obedience taken by newly enlisted soldiers. Whether referring to an oath of obedience or to something else, the term has figured with such importance in the history of Christianity that it is evident that sacramentum would readily lend itself to describe such ordinances as Baptism and the Lord's Supper. In the Gr NT, however, there is no word nor even any general idea corresponding to "sacramentum"; nor does the earliest history of Christianity afford any trace of the application of the term to certain rites of the church. Pliny (c 112 AD) describes the Christians of Bithynia as "binding themselves by a sacramentum to commit no kind of crime" (Ep. x.97), but scholars are now pretty generally agreed that Pliny here uses the word in its old Rom sense of an oath or solemn obligation, so that its occurrence in this passage is nothing more than an interesting coincidence.

It is in the writings of Tertullian (end of 2d and beginning of 3d cent.) that we find the first evidence of the adoption of the word as a technical term to designate Baptism, the Eucharist, and other rites of the Christian church. Though the term of sacramentum may have been partly occasioned by the evident analogies which the word suggests with Baptism and the Eucharist; but what appears to have chiefly determined its history in this direction was the fact that in the Old Lat VSS (as afterward in the Vulg) it had been employed to translate the Gr μεταμορφωσ, μεταστασις, "a mystery" (e.g. Eph 5 32; 1 Tim 3 16; Rev 1 20; 17 7)—an association of ideas which was greatly fostered in the early church by the rapidly growing tendency to an assimilation of Christian worship with the mystery-practices of the Gr-Rom world.

Though esp. employed to denote Baptism and the Eucharist, the name "sacraments" was for long used so loosely and vaguely that it was applied to facts and doctrines of and Christianity as well as to its symbolic rites. Augustine's definition of a sacrament as "the visible form of an invisible grace" is far limited in its application by but we see how widely even a definition like this might be stretched when we find Hugo of St. Victor (12th cent.) enumerating as many as 30 sacraments that had been recognized in the church. The Council of Trent was more exact when it declared that visible forms are sacraments only when they present an invisible grace and become its channels, and when it sought further to delimit the sacramental area by rescripting (1547) a decision of the Council of Florence (1439), in which for the first time the authority of the church was given to a suggestion of Peter Lombard (12th cent.) and other schoolmen that the number of the sacraments should be fixed at seven, viz. Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony—a suggestion which was supported by certain fanciful analogies designed to show that seven was a sacred number.

The divergence of the Protestant churches from this definition and scheme was based on the fact that these proceeded on no settled principles. The notion that there are seven sacraments has no NT authority, and must be described as purely arbitrary; while the definition of a sacrament is still so vague that anything but an arbitrary selection of particular forms is perfectly arbitrary. For example, for the sake of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, which were instituted by Christ as ordinances of the church, in the same category with marriage, which rests not on His appointment but on a natural relationship between the sexes that is as old as the human race. While, therefore, the Reformers retained the term "sacrament" as a convenient one to express the general idea that has to be expressed in the Christian church, the various classes together under this name, they found the distinguishing marks of sacraments (1) in their institution by Christ, (2) in their being enjoined by Christ in the New Testament, (3) in their being bound up with His word and revelation in such a way that they become "the expressions of Divine thoughts, the visible symbols of Divine acts." And as Baptism and the Lord's Supper are the only two rites for which such marks can be claimed, it follows that there are only two NT sacraments. Their unique status is thus apparent in separating them from all other rites and ceremonies that may have arisen in the history of the church, since it raises them to the dignity of forming an integral part of the historical gospel. A justification for their being classed together under a common name may be found, again, in the way in which they are associated in the NT (Acts 2 41.42; 1 Cor 10 1–4) and also in the analogy which Paul traces between Baptism and the Lord's Supper, with the Passover—the two most distinctive rites of the Old Covenant—on the other (Col 2 11; 1 Cor 5 7; 11 26).

The assumption made above, that both Baptism and the Lord's Supper owe their origin as sacraments of the church to their definite appointment by Christ Himself, has been strongly challenged by some modern critics.

In regard to Baptism it has been argued that as Mk 16 15 f occurs in a passage (vs 9–20) which textual criticism has shown to have formed part of the original Gospel, Mt 28 19, standing by itself, is too slender a foundation to support the belief that the ordinance rests upon an injuction of Jesus, more esp. as its statements are inconsistent with the results of historical criticism. These results, it is affirmed, prove that all the narratives of the Forty Days are legendary, that Mt 28 19 in particular only canonizes a later ecclesiastical situation, that Universalism is contrary to the facts of early Christian history, and its Trinitarian formula "foreign to the mouth of Jesus" (see Harmon, History of Dogma, 1, 79, and the references there given); it is evident, however, that such an objection is based upon anti-supernatural pre-suppositions that really beg the question at issue, and others on conclusions for which real premises are wanting. Over against them all we have to set the positive and weighty fact that from the earliest days of Christianity Baptism appears as the rite of initiation into the fellowship of the church (Acts 2 38.41, et passim), and that even Paul, with all his freedom of thought and spiritual interpretation of the gospel, never questioned its necessity (cf Rom 6 3 f; 1 Cor 13 13; Eph 4 5). On any other supposition than that of its appointment by Our Lord Himself it is difficult to conceive how within the brief space of years between the death of Jesus and the apostle's earliest references to the subject, the ordinance should not only have originated but have established itself in so absolute a manner for Jewish and gentile Christians alike.

(2) In the case of the Lord's Supper the challenge of its institution by Christ rests mainly upon the fact that the saying, "This do in remembrance of me," is absent from the Mk text, and is found only in the Supper-narratives of Paul (1 Cor 11 24.25) and his disciple Luke (Lk 22 19). Upon this circumstance large structures of critical hypothesis have been reared. It has been affirmed that in the upper room Jesus was only holding a farewell supper with His disciples, and that it never occurred to Him to institute a feast of commemoration. It has further been maintained that the views of Jewish regard the speedy consummation of His kingdom make it impossible that He would have dreamed of instituting a sacrament to commemorate His death. The significance of the feast was eschatological merely; it was a pledge of a glorious future hour in the perfected kingdom of God (see Mt 5 9 and parallels). And the theory has even been advanced that the institution of this sacrament as an ordinance of the church designed to commemorate Christ's death was due to the initiative of Paul, who is supposed to have been influenced by traditions of what he had seen in Corinth and elsewhere of the mystery-practices of the Gr world.

All these hypothetical fabrics fall, of course, to the ground if the underlying assumption that Jesus never said, "This do in remembrance of me," is shown to be unwarrantable. And it is unwarrantable to assume that a saying of Jesus which is vouched for by Paul and Luke cannot be authentic because it does not occur in the corresponding narratives of the synoptics, which are highly compressed in any case, the first two evangelists would seem to have confined themselves to setting down those sayings which formed the essential moments of the Supper and gave its symbolic contents. Moreover, they may have regarded as sufficiently embodied and expressed in the universal practice of the church from the earliest days. For as to that practice there is no question (Acts 2 42.46; 20 7; 1 Cor 11 23.26), and just as the Supper rests upon the belief that Christ had enjoined it. "Every assumption of its having originated in the church from the recollection of intercourse with Jesus at table, and the necessity felt for recalling His death, is precluded" (Weissäcker, Apostolic Age, II, 279). That the simple historical supper of Jesus with His disciples in the upper room was converted by Paul into an institution for the gentile and Jewish churches alike is altogether inconceivable. The primitive church had its bitter controversies, but there is no trace of any controversy as to the origin and institutional character of the Lord's Supper.

In the NT the sacraments are presented as means of grace. For example Acts 2 42–46, spiritual quickening (Col 2 12) is associated with Baptism; the Lord's Supper is declared to be a participation in the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor 10 16). So far all Christians are agreed; but wide divergence shows itself thereafter. According to the doctrine of the Rom church, sacraments are efficacious ex opere operato, i.e. in virtue of a power inherent in themselves as outward acts whereby they communicate saving benefit to those who receive them without opposing any obstacle. The Reformed doctrine, on the other hand, teaches that their efficacy lies not in themselves as outward acts, but in the blessing of Christ and the operation of His Spirit, and that it is conditioned by faith in the recipient. The traditional Lutheran doctrine agrees with the Reformed in affirming that faith is necessary as the condition of saving benefits in the use of the sacraments, but resembles the Rom teaching in ascribing the efficacy of Baptism and the Lord's Supper not to the attendant working of the Holy Spirit, but to a real inherent and objective virtue resident in them—a virtue, however, which does not lie (as the Rom church says) in the mere elements and actions of the sacraments, but in the power of the Divine word which they embody. See Baptism; Lord's Supper.

to Deity and given back by Him to the offerer to be used in the priest service. This practice was called "heave offering," something lifted up, or properly, separated from the rest and given to the service of the Deity. It is the expressing homage or gratitude thus separated for the priest. The term is applied to products of the soil or portion of land separated unto the Divine service, etc.

Theory of Sacrifice — "an oblation," or "offering"; another generic term for all kinds of offerings, animal, vegetable, or even gold and silver derived from the vb. lībah, "to draw near," it signifies what is drawn or brought near and given to God. "Theoroi" or "theories" is a sort of etymological food.

Kīlīth — "whole burnt offering," the entire animal being burned upon the altar. Sometimes used synonymously with āśeke. A technical word in the Carthaginians.

Lībbar — a "feast," used metaphorically for a sacrificial feast because the meat of the sacrifices constituted the main part of the feast. Lībbar, "frankincense," "incense," used in combination with the meat offerings and burnt offerings and placed also upon the altar in the holy place. See INCENSE.

Kīrōth, Kīrōth — "smoke," odor of sacrifice, or incense offerings, as a soothing savour and supposed to be pleasing and acceptable to God. It is offered as a sign of sacrifice because of its purifying and preserving qualities.

Shemen — "oil," generally olive oil, used with the meat offerings of cakes and wafers, etc.

Sacrifice is thus a complex and comprehensive term. In its simplest form it may be defined as a "gift to God." It is a presentation to Deity of some material object, the possession of the offerer, as an act of worship. It may be to attain, restore, maintain or to celebrate friendly relations with the Deity. It is religion in action—in early times, almost the whole of religion—an inseparable accompaniment to all religious exercises. Few or many motives may actuate it. It may be wholly puerile and expository, or an offering of food as a gift to the God. It may be practically a Bribe, or prayer, an expression of dependence, obligation and thanksgiving. It may express repentance, faith, adoration, or all of these combined. It was the one and only way of approach to God. Theoretically, it defined the right shoulder or thigh as the need. Hubert and Mauss define it as "a religious act which by the consecration of the victim modifies the moral state of the sacrificer, or of certain material objects which he has in view, i.e., either confers sanctity or removes it and its analogue, impurity."

II. Origin and Nature of Sacrifices

The beginnings of sacrifice are hidden in the mysteries of prehistoric life. The earliest narrative in Gen records the fact, but gives no account of the origin and primary idea. The custom is sanctioned by the sacred writings, and later on the long-established custom was adopted and systematized in the Mosaic Law. The practice was almost universal. The Vedas have their elaborate rituals. Some Semitic peoples, Greeks, Romans, Africans, and Indians of Mexico offered human sacrifices. It is unknown in Australia, but even there something akin to it exists, for some natives offer a portion of a kind of honey, others offer a pebble or a spear to their god. For his own universal habit of the race, several solutions are offered.

One view maintains that God Himself initiated the rite by Divine order at the beginnings of human history. Such a theory implies a monothestic faith on the part of primitive man. This theory was strongly held by many of the Rformed theologians, and was based mainly on the narrative in Gen 4:4.

1. Theory of Sacrifice — According to the theory that the origin of sacrifice was the offering of a strong plea as follows: Since faith was Revelation what made the sacrifice acceptable to God, this faith must have been based upon a positive enactment of God in the past. Without this divine positive enactment to guarantee its truthfulness, faith, in Abel, would have been superstition. In other words, faith, in order to be truly based and properly directed, must have a revelation from God, a positive expression of the Divine will. Fairbairn, in his Typology, goes further and says that the gods of the Greeks and Eve were clothed from animals which had been slain in sacrifices. This is entirely without support in the narrative. The theory of a Divine order cannot be maintained on the basis of the Bib. narrative. Moreover, it involves certain assumptions regarding the nature of faith and revelation which are not generally held in this age. A revelation is not necessarily a positive Divine command, an external thing, and faith may be just as real and true without such a revelation as is with it. There may have been such a revelation cannot be denied, but it is not a necessary or probable explanation.

(I) The gift-theory. — By this it is held that sacrifices were originally presented to God, a deity which the offerer sought to placate or to the burnt offerings. It may account for some heathen systems of sacrifice, but can help in no degree in understanding the Bib. sacrifices.

Cicero vouches for such a view when he says: "Let not the impious dare to appease the gods with gifts. Let them hearken to Plato, who tells us that justice can be no doubt what God's disposition to them will be. Even an empty thing will return good to the wicked." (HDB, IV, 331a). This view of sacrifice prevails in classical literature. Spencer therefore thinks that it is self-evidently false, and that the natural explanation of the act of gift is "a thing of beauty." Tylor and Herbert Spencer also find the origin of sacrifices in the idea of a gift, whether to the dead, to the dead ancestors, food being placed for them, and this afterward comes to be regarded as a sacrifice. Such a view gives no account of the peculiar value attached to the burnt offerings or to the burnt offerings. It may account for some heathen systems of sacrifice, but can help in no degree in understanding the Bib. sacrifices.

(2) The magic theory. — There are two slightly variant forms of this: (a) that of R. C. Thompson (Sem Magic, Its Origins and Developments, 174-218), who holds that a sacrificial animal serves as a substitute victim offered to a demon whose activity has brought the offerer into trouble: the aim of the priest is to entice or drive the malignant spirit out of the sick or sinful man into the sacrificial victim where it can be isolated or destroyed; (b) that of L. Marilier, who holds that sacrifice in its origin is essentially a magical rite. By a magical force the effusion of the victim's blood will injure the god to the will of the man. From this arose under the "cult of the dead" the gift-theory of sacrifice. Men sought to ally themselves with the god in particular by purifying walls and offering him the blood by the application of the blood to the altar, or by the sacrifice of a living animal and the contact of the sacrificial with its blood. Such theories give no account of the burnt offerings, meal offerings and sin offerings. They do not connect themselves entirely from the development from God, and divest them of all sacrificial value. They may account for certain deified and hidden systems, but not for the Biblical.

(3) The table-bone theory. — Ably advocated by Wellhausen and others, it says that the burnt offerings were meals which the worshippers and the god shared, partaking of the same food and thus establishing a firmer bond of fellowship between the two. Nature of Sacrifice.
Sacrifices, 75) first advocated this, holding that the efficacy of sacrifices is "the fact that eating and drinking were the ordinary symbols of friendship, were the usual rites in engaging in covenants and leagues." Thus sacrifices are more than gifts; they are "oath of hospitality," which knits gods and worshippers together. W. R. Smith has expounded the idea into the modern theory that sacrifice was the victim—whether animal or man—which the sacrificer par take of. Though this view may contain an element of truth in regard to certain biblical customs, it certainly helps not to account for all the sacrifices. A. B. Davidson says, "it falls utterly to account for the burnt offering, which was one of the earliest, most solemn and at times the most important of all the sacrifices."

(4) The sacramental communion theory.—This is a modification of the table-bond theory. The basis of it is the totemistic idea of reverencing an animal which is believed to share with man the Divine nature. On certain solemn occasions this animal would be sacrificed to furnish a feast. At this meal, according to men's savage notions, they literally "ate the god," and thus incorporated into themselves the physical, the intellectual and the moral qualities which characterized the animal. If the Divine life dwelt in certain animals, then a part of that precious life would be distributed among all the people (658, 313). In some cases the blood is drunk by the worshippers, thus imbibing the life. Sometimes, in such cases as the camel, this would be the quivering flesh before the animal was really dead, and the entire carcase was eaten up before morning.

The brilliant work of W. R. Smith has not been universally accepted. L. Marillier has criticized it along several lines. It is by no means certain that totemism prevailed so largely among Semites and there is no evidence of its existence in Israel. Also, if an original bond of friendship existed between the god and the king, there is no need to maintain it by such sacrificial rites. There is no clear instance of this having been done. If on the other hand there was no common bond between the god and the people but that of a common meal, it does not appear that the god is a totem god. There is no reason why the animal should have been a totem. In any case, this idea of sacrifice could hardly have been anything but a slow growth, and consequently not the origin of sacrifice. Hubert and Mauss, however, point out that such a theory is far from having established the historical or the logical connection between the common meal and the other kinds of sacrifices. Under piacula he confines purification, propitiation and expiations. His attempts to establish a relationship between this totemic character and the late and not sacrificial do not succeed. Smith's theory is mainly the sacramental, though he does recognize the honorable and piacular element. The theory may be applicable to some of the heathen or savage feasts of the Arabs, but not to the practices of the Hebrews (see Enc Brit, XXIII, 951).

(5) The homage theory.—This has been advocated by Warburton and F. D. Maurice. The idea is that sacrifices were originally an expression of homage and dependence. Man naturally felt impelled to seek closer communion with God, not so much from a sense of guilt as from a sense of dependence and a desire to show homage and obedience. In giving expression to this, primitive man had recourse to acts rather than words and thoughts. Thus sacrifice was an act of prayer, rather than a prayer in words. It was an expression of his longings and aspirations, his reverence and submission. There is much truth in this view; the elements of prayer and submission enter into some sacrifices, the burnt offerings in particular; but it does not account for all kinds of offerings.

(6) The piacular theory.—This holds that sacrifices are fundamentally expiatory or atoning, and the death of the beast is a vicarious expiation of the sins of the offerer. Hubert and Mauss admit that in all sacrifices there are some ideas of purchase or substitution, though these may not have issued from some primitive form. The unifying principle in all sacrifices is that the Divine is put in communication with the profane by the intermediary of the victim—whether animal or man—which the sacrificer particpates. It is thus a messenger, a means of divination, a means of aliminating the eternal life of the species, a source of magical energy which the rite diffuses over objects in its neighborhood. Westermarck (Origin of Moral Ideas) makes an original idea in sacrifice a piaculum, a substitute for the offerer.

This view is the most simple, the most natural, and the only one that can explain certain sacrifices. Man felt himself under liability to punishment or death. The animal was his, it had life, it was of value, and perchance the god would accept that life in place of his. He felt that it would be accepted, and thus the animal was sacrificed. The offerer in a sense gives up part of himself. The beast must be his own; no sacrifice can be made of another person's property (2 S 24 24a). The true spirit of sacrifice appears in a willingness to acknowledge God's right to what is best and dearest (Gen 12).

Objection is raised to this by A. B. Davidson (Theology of the Old Testament, 981). While, however, others, on the ground that such an origin represents too advanced a stage of ethical thought and reflection for primitive man. We question seriously whether this be an advanced stage of moral reflection. On the contrary it represents a very simple and primitive stage. The feeling that sin of some kind is never absent from human life, and that its true penalty is death, has been inseparable from the human heart's sense of sin. What could be more simple and natural than to take an innocent animal and offer it in place of himself, hoping that the Deity would accept it instead? Nor is there much force in Professor Paterson's objection that sacrifices were preponderantly joyous in character and therefore could not be offered as an expiation. This joyous character belongs to such sacrifices as peace offerings and thank offerings, but does not belong to the 'olah and others. In most cases the joyous feast followed the killing of the animal by which the expiation was accomplished. Why atone for a sin, only because atonement had been made. In fact, many sacrifices were of the most solemn character and represented the deepest and most serious emotions of the heart.

(7) Originating in religious instincts.—Neither the theory of an objective Divine revelation, nor of a human origin will account for the universality and variety of sacrifices. The truth lies in a proper combination of the two. The notion of offering a gift to the Deity arose out of the religious instincts of the human heart, which in an early period had a consciousness of something wrong between itself and God, and that this something would mean death sooner or later. Added to these true instincts was the Omnipresent Spirit to guide men in giving expression. What could be more simple and primitive than to offer something possessing life? Of course the notion originated in simple and childish ideas of God, and its real motive was not to gratify God by sharing a meal with Him, or to gain His favor by a bribe, but to present Him with something that represented a part of the offerer which might be accepted in his stead. Thus sacrifices became the leading features of the religious life of primitive man. Naturally other ideas would be added, such as that a gift of food had a sacred use, the peace offerings, etc, to celebrate the friendly relations with God, the thank offerings, the sin offerings, etc, all of which naturally and logically developed from the primitive idea. It might be expected that there would be many corruptions and abuses, that the sense of sin would be obscured or lost among some peoples, and the idea of sacrifice correspondingly degraded. Such has been the case, and as well might we try to understand man at his best by studying the aboriginal tribes of Africa and Australia, or in other isolated and primitive communities, as to attempt to understand the Bible ideas in sacrifices by studying the cults of those heathen and savage tribes of Semites, etc.

III. Classification of Sacrifices.—Maimonides was among the first to classify them, and he divided them into two kinds: (1) Those on behalf of the whole congregation, fixed by statute, time, number, etc., and sacrificed. As these would include burnt, meat and peace offerings, we shall deal with their accompaniments. (2) Those on behalf of the individual, whether by virtue of his connection with the community or as a private person. These would be burnt, sin and guilt offerings with their accompaniments.

Others, such as W. R. Smith, classify them as: (1) honorific, or designed to render homage, devotion, or adoration, such as burnt, meat and peace offerings; (2) piacular, designed to expiate or make atonement for the errors of the people, i.e., burnt, sin and guilt offerings.

2. W. R. Smith and Others

3. Oehler

Oehler divides them into two classes, viz.: (1) those which assume that the covenant relation is undisturbed, and the offerings were undisturbed symbols of submission; and (2) those which intend to do away with any disturbance in the relation which had been right, such as burnt, sin and guilt offerings.

Professor Paterson and others divide them into three: (1) animal sacrifices, burnt, peace offerings; (2) vegetable sacrifices, meat offerings, shewbread, etc.; (3) liquid and incense offerings; wine, oil, water, etc.

5. Wiener

H. M. Wiener offers a more suggestive and scientific division (Beihefte zu Sachristolchen, 200 f.): (1) customary lay offerings, such as had been offered in the temple or at home at fixed times; (2) offerings on altars of earth or stone, without priest, used and regulated by Moses and in more modern times, viz., burnt, peace, meal and peace offerings; (3) statutory individual offerings, introduced by Moses, offered by laymen with priestly assistance and at the religious capital, i.e., burnt, peace, meal, sin and guilt offerings; (3) statutory national offerings introduced by Moses and offered by the priest at the religious capital, viz., burnt, meal, peace and sin offerings.

IV. Sacrifices in the Pre-Mosaic Age.—Out of the obscure period of origins emerge the dimly-lighted | feet of ancient history. Everywhere sacrifices existed and sometimes abounded as an essential part of religion. The space of the archaeologist, and the researches of scholars help us understand the pre-Mosaic period.

1. In Egypt—probably from the beginning of the 4th millennium there were sacrifices and sacrificial systems. Temples at Abydos, Thebes, On, etc., were great priests' centers with high priests, lower priests, rituals and sacri-

2. In Babylonia,

all peace offerings predominated. Oxen, wild goats, pigs, geese were the chief animals offered. Besides these, wine, oil, beer, milk, cakes, grain, olives, flowers, fruit, vegetables were offered, but not human beings. In these offerings there were many resemblances to the Heb gifts, and many significant exceptions. Moses would be somewhat familiar with these practices though not with the concept of the ritual. He would appreciate the unifying power of a national religious center. It is inconceivable that in such an age a national leader and other people would not take special care to institute such a system.

In Babylonia, from the year 3000 BC or thereabouts, according to a scribe (Geschichte des Altherums), there were many centers of worship such as Sippar, Agade, Assur, Ur, Nisibis, Laredo, Sippur, etc. These and others continued for centuries with elaborate systems of worship, sacrifices, temples, priesthoods, etc. Considerably over 100 temples and sanctuaries are mentioned, with hundreds in the temple tablets, so that Babylon was studded with temples and edifices for the gods. At all these temples people offered—primarily human, vegetable. A long list of the offerings of King Gudea includes oxen, sheep, goats, lambs, deer, fish, birds (1,200), milk, green, light, frost. In HDB, V. 520, f. s.v.). The sacrifices provided an income for the priests, as did the Mosaic system at a later time. It had long passed the stage when it was supposed to furnish a man with the food, etc., of the gods, as it is no uncompromised a consultation with a priest, and was really an assessment for the services rendered. It was not a voluntary offering, its ritualistic object was primarily to flatter, to propitiate, to incite the favor of the gods. Special sacrifices on special occasions were offered in Babylonia and Assyria, including many strange and unacccustomed, both as regards the purely legal portions and those sections dealing with religious ritual, Bab methods of legal procedure and of ritual developed in Bab temples must be taken into consideration as determining factors.

We do not doubt that Moses made use of many elements found in the Egypt and Bab systems, and added to or subtracted from or parodied as occasion required. As sacrificial systems and ritual had been in use more than a millennium before Moses, there is absolutely no need to suppose that Osian ritual was a thin sinew, even in its developing, and was completed after the exile. To do so is to turn history upside down.

3. Nomads and Tribes of Arabia and Syria, sacrifices had been common for millenniums before Moses. There is no reason to doubt that Smith are valuable here, whatever one may think of their theories. The offerings were usually from the herd animals, sometimes from the spoils taken in war or the fruits of the fields. The occasions were many and various, and the ritual was very simple. A rude altar of earth or stone, with a scapegoat, the offerer killing the victim and burning all, or perhaps certain parts, or carrying it as part of the offering. Family, constituted the customary details. Sometimes wild animals were offered. Babylonians, Phoenicians and Arabs offered sacrificial beasts. Sacrifices of captives and of the fruit of the earth were made. There were no sacrifices in the service of kings. Assyrians sometimes sacrificed captive kings. The Canaanites and others sacrificed children. The account of the offerings of Cain and Abel (Gen 4:41) show that the ceremony dates from almost the beginnings of the human race.

4. Cain and Abel

5. Noah

The account of the offerings of Cain and Abel (Gen 4:4) shows that the ceremony dates from almost the beginnings of the human race. The custom of offering the first-lings and first-fruits had already begun.

6. Abraham

The sacrifices of Noah followed and celebrated the epochal and awe-inspiring event of the ark and beginning life anew. He offered burnt offerings of all the clean animals (Gen 8:20). On such a solemn occasion only an 'olah would suffice. The custom of using domestic animals had arisen at this time. The sacrifices expressed adoration, recognition of God's power and sovereignty, and a gift to please Him, for it was said He smelled the sweet savor and was pleased. It was an odor of satisfaction or restful-ness. Whether or not the idea of expiation was included is difficult to prove.

Abraham lived at a time when sacrifices and religion were virtually one. He set an example of his offering at Ur or Haran, but

6. Abraham on his arrival at Shechem he erected an altar (Gen 12:7). At Bethel also (ver 8), and on his return from Egypt he worshipped there (Gen 13:4). Such sacrifices expressed adoration and prayer and probably propitiation. They constituted worship, which is a complex exercise. At Hebron he built an altar (Gen 13:18), officiating always as his own priest. In 16:4 ff he offers a ‘covenant’ sacrifice, when the animals were slain, divided the horns, set open the carcases for the appearance of the other party to the covenant. The exact idea in the killing of these animals may be difficult to find, but the effect is to give occasion great solemnity and the highest religious sanction. What was done with the carcases afterward is not told. That animals were slain for food with no thought of sacrifice is shown by the narrative in ch 18, where Abraham had a calf slain for the meal. This is opposed to one of the chief tenets of the Wellhausen school, which maintains that all slaughtering of animals was sacrificial until the 7th cent. BC. In ch 22 Abraham attempts to offer up Isaac as a burnt offering, as was probably the custom of his neighbors. That he attempted it shows that the practice was not shocking to his ethical nature. It tested the strength of his devotion to God, shows the right spirit in sacrifices, and teaches for all time that God does not desire human sacrifice—a beast will do. What God does want is the obedient heart. Abraham continued his worship at Beer-sheba (Gen 21:33).

Whatever may be the date of the writing of the Book of Job, the saint himself is represented as living in the Patriarchal age. He constantly offered sacrifices on behalf of Job of his children (1:5), ‘sanctifying’ them. His purpose no doubt was to atone for possible sin. The sacrifices were mainly expiatory. This is true also of the sacrifices of his friends (42:7-9).

Isaac seems to have had a permanent altar at Beer-sheba and to have regularly offered sacrifices. Adoration, expiation and supplication would constitute his chief motives (Gen 26:25).

Jacob’s first recorded sacrifice was the pouring of the oil upon the stone at Beth-el (Gen 28:18). This was consecration or dedication of the awe-inspiring presence of the Deity. After his covenant with Laban he offered sacrifices (‘z’bhākim) and they ate bread (Gen 31:54). At Shechem, Jacob erected an altar (Gen 33:20). At Beth-el (35:7) and at Beer-sheba he offered sacrifices to Isaac’s God (46:1). While the Israelites were in Egypt they would be accustomed to spring sacrifices and spring feasts, for these had been common among the Arab tribes, Egyptians, etc., for centuries. In Egypt sacrifices have been mentioned (see above). At these spring festivals it was probably customary to offer the firstlings of the flocks (cf Ex 13:15). At the harvest festivals sacrificial feasts were celebrated. It was to some such feast Moses said Israel as a people wished to go in the wilderness (Ex 3:18; 5:3ff; 7:16). Pharaoh understood and asked who was to go (Ex 10:8). Moses demanded flocks and herds for the feast (10:9). Pharaoh would keep the flocks, etc (10:24), but Moses said they must offer sacrifices and burnt offerings (10:25f).

The sacrifice of the Passover soon occurs (Ex 12:3-11). That the Hebrews had been accustomed to sacrifice in their firstborn, at this season has no support and is altogether improbable (Frazier, Golden Bough, pt. III, 175f). The whole ceremony is very primitive and has retained its primitiveus to the end. The choosing of the lamb or kid, the killing at a certain time, the family gathered in the home, the carcase roasted whole, eaten that night, and the remainder, if any, burned, while the feasters had staff in hand, etc, all this was continued. The blood in this case protected from the Deity, and the whole ceremony was “holy” and only for the circumcised. Frazier in his Golden Bough gives a good account.

As a priest of Midian Jethro was an expert in sacrificing. On meeting Moses and the people he offered both ‘olah and z’bhākim and 11. Jethro made a feast (Ex 18:12).

From the above it is evident that sacrifices were almost the substance of religion in that ancient world. From hilltops and temples innumerable, the smoke of sacrifices was constantly rising heavenward. Burnt sacrifices and offerings and peace offerings were well established. Moses, in establishing a religion, must have a sacrificial system.

He had abundance of materials to choose from, and under Divine guidance would adopt such rules and regulations as the pedagogic plans and purposes of God would require in preparing for better things.

V. The Mosaic Sacrificial System.—The fundamental function of Moses’ work was to establish the covenant between Israel and God.

1. The important transition took place at Sinai and was accompanied by sacrifice. The foundation principle was obedience, not sacrifices (Ex 19:4-8). No mention is made of these at the time, as they were incidental— mere by-laws to the constitution. The center of gravity in Israel’s religion is now shifted from sacrifices to obedience and loyalty to Jehovah. Sacrifices were helpful to that end and without obedience there was nothing.

This is in exact accordance with Jer 7:21f. God did not speak unto the fathers at this time about sacrifices; He did speak about obedience.

The covenant having been made, the terms and conditions are laid down by Moses and accepted by the people (Ex 24:3). The Decalogue and Covenant Code are given, an altar is built, burnt and peace offerings of oxen are slain by young men servants of Moses, not by priests, and blood is sprinkled on its altar (24:4ff). The blood would symbolize the community of life between Jehovah and Israel, and consecrated the altar. The Law was read, the pledge again given, and Moses sprinkled the representatives of the people, consecrating them also (24:7f). Descending the mount, they had a vision of God, held a feast before God, and ate the joys and privileges of the new relationship. The striking feature of these ceremonies is the use of the blood. It is expiatory and consecrating, it is life offered to God, it consecrates the altar and the people; they are now acceptable to God and dare approach Him and feast with Him. There is no idea of God’s drinking the blood. The entire ritual is far removed from the crass features of common Sem worship.

In the Covenant Code, which the people accepted, the customary altars are not abolished, but regulated (Ex 20:24ff). This law expressly applies to the time when they shall be settled in Canaan. In the Common Altars whole place where I cause my name to be remembered, etc (ver 21f). No need to change the reading to “in every place where I cause,” etc, as the Wellhausen school does for obvious reasons. All the land was eligible. On such rude altars no further allowed. This same law is implied in Dt 16:21 a passage given or explained away by the Wellhausen school (see Wiener, Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, 200f).

Saul, David, Elijah and many others used such altars. There were altars at Shechem (Josh 24:1), Mizpeh in Gilgal (Jgs 11:11), Gilgal (1 S 13:9). High places were chiefly used until the times of Solomon, when they were abolished because of their corruption. The purpose of such altars were perfectly legitimate and in fact necessary, until there was a central capital and sanctuary in Jerusalem. The customary burnt and peace offerings with the priest officiating were the chief factors. Heathen sacrifices and the use of heathen altars were strictly forbidden (Ex 22:20; Heb 19; 34:15).

The altar used at the consecration of Aaron and his sons was a “horne’d” or official altar, the central one. The offerings were a bullock, two rams, unleavened bread, etc (Ex 29:1-4), and were brought to the door of the sanctuary. The ritual consists: the altar hand on the bullock’s head, designating it as his substitute (29:10), killing it before the tent of meeting (ver 11), smearing some blood on the horns of the altar, and pouring the rest at its base (ver 12). The blood was sprinkled on the altar, the life was given as atonement for the atonees, the bullock being burned as food for God, and the flesh and remainder were burned without the camp (vs 13,14). This is a sin-offering—horne’d—the term is from the verb “horn”. Probably introduced by Moses, it was intended to be peculiar and to signify that seven bullocks, the smallest, in which the fire was sprinkled round about the altar, flesh was cut in pieces, washed and piled on the altar, then burned as an offering by Aaron unto God. This burnt offering was an odor of a sweet savour (vs 15-18). The naive and primitive nature of this idea is apparent. The other ram, the ram of consecration, is slain, blood is smeared on Aaron’s right ear, thumb and great toe; in the case of other offerings it was on the right hand. The blood is sprinkled on the altar, and the fire is kindled around about; some upon the garments of Aaron and his sons (vs 19-21). Certain parts were waved before the fire along with the bread, and are then burned upon the altar (vs 22-25). The breast is offered as a wave offering (trusháh) with the right thigh or shoulder as alesh for Aaron (trusháh). These portions here first mentioned were the central sanctuary offerings, although this particular one went to Moses, since he officiated (vs 26-30). The flesh must be boiled in a holy place, and must be eaten by Aaron and his sons only, and at the sanctuary. What was left till morning must be burned (vs 31-34). Consecrated to a holy service it was dangerous for anyone else to touch it, or the Divine wrath would frame forth. The same ceremony on each of the seven days attuned for, cleansed and consecrated the altar to the service of Jehovah, and it was most holy (vs 35-37). The forehead is presented to the altar (Ex 30:1), and Aaron is to put the blood of the sin offering once a year upon its horns to consecrate it.

When the golden calf was made an altar was erected, burnt and peace offerings were presented. From the latter a feast was made, the festival followed the usual habits at such gatherings before the festivals, went to excess and joined in Golden Calf revelry. Moses’ ear quickly detected the nature of the sounds. The covenant was now broken and no sacrifice was available for this sin. Vengeance was executed on 3,000 Israelites. Moses mightily interceded with God. A moral reaction was begun; new tables of the Law were made with more stringent laws against idols and idol worship (Ex 32:1-55).

At the setting-up of the tabernacle burnt and meal offerings were sacrificed (Ex 40:29). The law of the burnt offering is found in Lev 1.

5. Law of the Burnt Offering (‘olah)

Common altars and customary burnt offerings are no minute regulations, but this ritual was intended primarily for the burnt offerings and were brought to the priest as needed. They were for the statutory individual and national offering upon the “horne’d” altar before the sanctuary. Already the daily burnt offerings of the priests had been provided for (Ex 29:38). The burnt offering is here called korban, “oblation.”

(1) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 1:3-17).—This may have been from the herd or flock or fowls, brought to the tent of meeting; hands were laid (heavily) upon its head designating it as the offerer’s substitute, it was killed, flayed and cut in pieces. If of the flock, it was to be killed on the north side of the altar; if a fowl, the priest must kill it.

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 1:5-17).—If a bullock, of or over one year old, was one of the one-horned bullocks, it was to be placed upon a fire, and the fire run round about the altar, put on the fire, the wood and pieces of the carcase, wash the inwards, legs, etc, and burn it all as a sweet savour to God. If a fowl, he must wring the neck, drain out the blood on the side of the altar, cast the crop, filth, entrails among the ashes, remove dividing the bird and burn the carcase on the altar.

(3) General laws for the priest.—The burnt offering must be continued every morning and every evening (Ex 29:8; Nu 28:3-8). At the fulfillment of his vow the Nazite must present it before God and offer it upon the altar through the priest (Nu 6:16): on the Sabbath, two lambs (Nu 28:9); on the first of the month, two bullocks, one ram and seven lambs (Nu 28:10); on the day of the atonement (Yom Kippur) only, the same (Nu 29:27); on the 1st day of the 7th month, one bullock, one ram, seven lambs (Nu 28:9); on the 15th day, 13 bullocks, 2 rams, 14 lambs, the number of bullocks diminishing daily until the 7th day, when only 12 lamb and 28 bullocks were offered (Nu 29:12-34); on the 22nd day of this month one bullock, one ram and seven lambs were offered (Nu 29:35-36). Non-Israelites were permitted to offer the ‘olah, but no other sacrifices (Lev 17:8; 22:15-25).

(4) Laws in Dt (12:6-18,14,27; 27:6).—Anticipating a central sanctuary in the future, the lawgiver counseled the people to bring their offerings there (12:6,11); they must be careful not to offer them in any place (ver 19), but must patronize the Levites. He gave the Aaronic common altars and customary sacrifices were allowable and generally necessary (16:21; 27:6).

The term “meal offering” is here confined to offerings of flour or meal, etc (AV “meat-offering”), and was first used at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29:41). These must not be offered on the altar of incense (Ex 30:9); were used at the completion of the tabernacle (40:29); and always with the morning and evening burnt offerings.

6. Law of the Meal Offering (minahah)

(1) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 2:1-8).—It must be of fine flour, with oil and frankincense added, and brought to the priest; it baked in the oven, unleavened, mixed with oil, and seasoned with frankincense; then took it, and fasted the morning, when he burned the incense as incense on the altar, an offering of sweet savour (ver 3). The “ollah” and “minahah” were distinct, the former was burnt, the latter was “to eat” or “eaten”. "Eaten" means partaken of, or given to the people, or “sacrifice”, or "offer". It was a libation to God, and an expression of gratitude to God, or a thank offering.

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 2:1-8).—This required him to take a handful with the oil and frankincense therewith and burn it as a memorial upon the altar. The remainder was holy and belonged to the priest. Of the ashes, after burning them to the altar, he was to take an handful, pour it and appropriate the remainder, the same with the first-fruits.

(3) General laws for the priest (Lev 6:14-18 [Heb 7:11], etc).—He might eat his portion without leaven in the holy place. At his own free will he might give his own oblation of fine flour—1/3 of an ephah, one-half in the morning and one-half in the evening. If baked, it must be with oil. The meal offering must be burnt; none could be eaten. With the sin and guilt offerings every meal offering must be baked. (Lev 7:9,10; 10:12; Nu 18:9). The meal offerings accompanied the other offerings on all important occasions, such as the consecration of Aaron (Lev 9:4-17); cleansing of a leper (Lev 14:10,20,21,31); feast of first-fruits.
The sin offering was a sacrifice of a special kind, doubtless peculiar to Israel and first mentioned at the consecration of Aaron and his sons. It is not then spoken of as an offering innovation. It was of special value as an expiatory sacrifice.

1. Use of the Sin Offering (Nu 4:16; Ex 29:10 ff).—A bullock was killed before the altar, some blood was put upon the horns of the altar by Moses, the rest was poured out at the base. The fat of the inwards was burned upon the altar, the flesh and skin were burned without the camp. Every day during the consecration this was done (Ex 29:36).

2. The law of the sin offering (Lev 4:1-35; 6:24-30, etc.).—(a) The occasion and meaning: Specifically to atone for unwitting sins, sins of criminal (sā'bā'yāh), mistakes or rash acts, unknown at the time, but afterward made known. There were gradations of these for several classes of offenders: the anointed priest (vs 3-12), the whole congregation (vs 13-21), a ruler (vs 22-26), one of the common people (vs 27-30), and the heave offering (ver 2) or the uncleanness of man (ver 3), or rashly swearing in ignorance (ver 4). For conscious and wilful violations of the Law, no atonement was possible, with some exceptions, for which provision was made in the guilt offering.

(b) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 4:1-5:13, etc.).—The anointed priest must offer a bullock at the tent of meeting, lay his hands upon it and slay it before Jehovah. The congregation was also required to bring a young bullock before the tent of meeting; the elders were to lay their hands upon it and slay it before Jehovah. The ruler must bring a he-goat and do the same. One of the common people might bring a he-goat or lamb and do the same. If too poor for these, two turtledoves or young pigeons, one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering, might suffice. If too poor for these, one tenth of an ephah of fine flour without oil or frankincense would suffice.

(c) The ritual for the priest (Lev 4:1-5:13, etc.).—He must bring the bullock's blood to the tent of meeting, dip his finger into it and sprinkle blood 7 times before the veil of the sanctuary, and put some on the horns of the altar of incense. The blood must be poured out at the base of the altar. The fat must be burned upon the altar, all the rest of the carcass must be carried to a clean place without the camp and burned. In the case of the whole congregation, the ritual is the same. In the case of a ruler, the blood of the altar of burnt offering, not the altar of incense. In the case of one of the common people, the ritual is similar, and that of the he-goat. Sometimes the carcass belonged to the priest. If a bird, the priest must touch its head, sprinkle blood and blood on the side of the altar and pour the rest at the base. Nothing is said of the disposal of the carcass. If of fine flour, the priest must touch the head of it, dip a handful of meal in fine flour, keeping the remainder for himself. The use of fine flour for an offering was to be eaten by the worshippers. It was exceptional and intended to be so. Though life was not given, yet a necessity of life—that which represented life—was offered.

(d) General laws for the priest (Lev 6:24-30): The sin offering was to be slain in the same place as the burnt offering. It was most holy, and the priest alone might eat what was left of the ram, pigeon or flour, in the holy place. Whatever touched it to be holy, any garment sprinkled with the blood must be washed in a holy place, earthen vessels used must be broken, and brazen vessels thoroughly scourged and rinsed.

(e) Special uses of the sin offering: (i) The consecration of Aaron and his sons (Lev 8:21.4-15) was similar to that of Lev 4:11-12, only Moses was to kill the offerings and put their blood upon the horns of the altar. On the 8th day a bull-calf was offered (Lev 9:2), and the congregation offered a he-goat (ver 3). In this case Aaron performed the ceremony, as in Lev 4:11-12. Moses complained that they had not eaten the flesh of the calf and goat in the sanctuary, since that was required by law and was not brought into the sanctuary (Lev 10:16-20).

(ii) Purifications from uncleannesses required after childbirth a young pigeon or turtle dove (Lev 12...
6–8). The heifer must bring a guilt offering (a special kind of sin offering), a he-lamb (Lev 14 12–14.19); if too poor for a lamb, a turtledove or young pigeon (vs 22.31). Special use of the blood is required (ver 25). In uncleanness from a sin offering of a turtledove or young pigeon must be offered by the priest (Lev 16.15–30).

(iii) On the Day of Atonement (Lev 16 1–28) Aaron must take a bullock for himself and house, two he-goats for the people, present the goats at the sanctuary, cast lots, one for Jeh, as a sin offering, and the other for the LORD, as a sin offering; the bullock was killed, sweet incense was burned within the rail, blood was sprinkled on the mercy-seat and before it 7 times. The one he-goat was killed and a similar ceremony was performed. Blood must be put on the horns of the altar and sprinkled 7 t about it. The other goat was presented, hands were laid on it, the sins of all confessed and put upon the goat, and it was sent into the wilderness. The carcass of the bullock and he-goat were burned without the camp. At the feast of first-fruits a he-goat was offered (Lev 23 19).

(iv) Other special instances were: in the case of defilement, the Nazirite must offer a turtledove or young pigeon on the 8th day after contrition (Lev 14 8.18); when a he-goat fulfills an offering, it was to be offered; the twelve tribes included in each case a he-goat for sin offering (7 16 ff); at the consecration of the Levites a young bullock (8 12). For unwitting sins at the congregation a he-goat was to be offered (15 24–25). If one person sinned, a she-goat was permitted (ver 27). A sin offering was required at the feast of the new moon (28 15), at the Passover (ver 22), at Pentecost (ver 30), on the 1st day of the 7th month (29 5), at the days of Atonement (30 1), on the solemn days of the wave offering to eat it in a clean place (Lev 10 14). The he-goat’s head was to be waved by the priest, before being offered (Lev 10 11.15); vs 31: ‘&’ (ver 14 24). At the feast of first-fruits the sheaf must be waved before the Lord (Lev 23 10.11.15); two loaves also (vs 17.20). Of the Nazirite the priest took the boiled shoulder, a cake and a wafer, put them on the Nazirite’s hand and waved them before Jeh (Nu 6 19 ff).

10. Wave Offerings. It must be brought from the peace offerings of the offerer himself. At Aaron’s consecration Moses put the breast, etc. on Aaron’s hands and waved them before Jeh (Lev 8 27). On the 8th day Aaron, the priests, the Levites and all the priests, when the breast and bread were waved before Jeh (Lev 7 30.34 fixes the law of offerings, and the custom was seemingly initiated at the consecration of Aaron and his sons, Num 6 21–25). When the breast and bread were waved before the priest, the breast and bread were not included in the other offerings (cf 14—6).

11. Heave Offerings. It must be brought from the remaining part of the peace offering (Lev 7 14). The offering must be eaten in a clean place (Lev 7 14) by the priests, family only unless the Nazirite offered the heave offering then the peace offering was also given to the priest (Nu 6 20). If the Nazirite was in the promised land to eat bread, they must offer a heave offering of the dough, a cake (Nu 15 19.20.21). The law is repeatedly noted (Nu 15.1.2) to have a tithing of the heave offerings of the people (ver 24). They were in turn to offer up a tithe of this to the priests (vs 26–32). The portion of the spoil of Midian was a heave offering (31 29.41). Dt commands that all heave offerings he brought to the central sanctuary and eaten there (12 6.11).

Jacob poured oil on the stone he had set up (Gen 28 18) in honor of the Deity and consecrated the spot. Jacob later (Gen 35 14) set up a pillar where God had revealed Himself. Offerings or a sacred drink offering were called Libations. It probably wine was used. Drink offerings accompanied many of the sacrifices (Ex 29 40.41). None could be poured upon the altar of Incense (Ex 30 9). At all set feasts the drink offerings must be presented (Lev 23 13.18.37). The Nazirite was not exempt (Nu 15 17). Wine and oil must accompany all votive and freewill offerings (15 4.5.7.10.24); the continual burnt offering (28 7.8); libations with all their libation set feasts (Ex 29 5–39, passem). That drink offerings were common among the heathen is shown by Dt 32 29.

The cultus is thoroughly in keeping with and adapted to the age, and yet an ideal system in many respects. The ethical side is in the background, the external has the emphasis. No sacrifices will avail for a breach of the covenant between God and the people. People thoroughly believed in the efficacy of the blood. It secured stoneament and forgiveness. Their religious life found expression in the sacrifices.

God was fed and pleased by the offerings by fire. Many of the customs are ancient and crude, so that it is difficult to imagine how such a primitive system could have been arranged and accepted afterward by the people who had the lofty ethical teachings of the prophets in their hands.

VI. Sacrifices in the History of Israel.—The tribes were outwardly consolidated, and a religious system was provided. Some of it was for the rulers, much for the people and sacrifices would naturally use the high places, when possible. The stationary altars of the Canaanites were of course unlawful. The inevitable tendency would be to imitate the worship of the Canaanites. They were reburied and threatened for this, and, consequently, offered sacrifices at Bethim (Jgs 2 1–5). Gideon rebuilt an altar of Jehovah and offered a bullock as a burnt offering (6.25.26). The kid prepared for the angel was not first a sacrifice, but its acceptance as a gift was indicated by its being burned (6.19 f). Jephthah offered up his daughter as a burnt offering, believing such a sacrifice well-pleasing to Jehovah (11.31.39). Manoah and his wife prepared a kid for a burnt offering, a meat offering accompanying it (12.16 f). At the time of the civil war with Benjamin the ark and statutory altar seemed to be at Bethel, where they offered burnt and peace offerings (20.26). The feasts at Shiloh imply at least peace offerings (21.19).

4. In the Time of Samuel and Saul offering appears to be at Shiloh. Elkanah sacrifices, and the feasts there yearly (17 1.3 f). Such feasts were joyous and tended to excesses, as drunkenness—seen common (1 13 f). All Israel came thither (2 14); the priests claimed their portion, seizing it in an unlawful manner before the fat had been burned, or the flesh had been boiled (13.17). This shows that such ritual as was prescribed in Lev was practised and considered by the people the only lawful custom. Was it in writing? Why not? Guilt offerings were made by the Philis when smitten by the Gibeonites, and the LXX, etc., is a sacrificial feast in a small city (9.12.13) on a high place. At Gilgal there were burnt and peace offerings (10 S; 15.21). Saul offered burnt offerings himself (13.9–12), but his fault was not in offering them himself, but in his haste and disobedience toward Samuel. "To obey is better than sacrifice," etc., says Samuel (15.22), recognizing the fundamental principle of the covenant and realizing that ceremonies are in themselves worthless without the right spirit. The same truth is reiterated by the prophets later. To prevent the offering of flesh with the blood Saul built a special altar (14.32–35). Family and clan sacrifices and feasts were evidently common (16.2–5).

5. In the Days of Gideon, David, and Solomon sacrifices for the feasts of the new moon, when peace offerings would be sacrificed (1 S 20.5.24–29). The sanctuary at Nob had the sheep bread upon the table (21.4 ff) according to Ex 25.30. When the ark was brought up to Jerus, burnt and meal offerings were offered according to the Law (2 S 6.17–18; 1 Ch 16.24). Ahithophel offered private sacrifices at Shiloh (2 S 15.12). David offered up burnt, meal, and peace offerings when purchasing the threshing-floor of Araunah (1 Ch 21.23–26). The statutory burnt altar at this time was at Gibeon (2 Ch 1.6; 1 Ch 21.26), but was soon removed to Jerus (1 Ch 22.1). In the organized sanctuary and ritual, Levites were appointed for attendance on the sanctuary, meal and burnt offerings, burnt offerings, morning and evening sacrifices, sabbaths, new moons, the feasts of weeks, etc. (23.23–31), attempting to carry out the Levitical laws as far as possible. At the dedication of the temple Solomon offered burnt, meal, and peace offerings in enormous quantities (1 K 8.63; 2 Ch 7.4–7); also burnt and peace offerings numerically (1 K 8.25). The ritual at the regular seasons, daily, sabbaths, new moons, set feasts, etc., was observed according to the Levitical Law (2 Ch 2.4; 8.13). Was it written? The golden calf worship was carried on at Dan and Bethel, with priests, altars and ritual (1 K 12.27 f). The high places were in use, but very corrupt (13.2 f). A common offering ancient was in use at Mt. Carmel. A common offering ancient was in use at Mt. Carmel. Kingdom (18.30.32). Many others were known as Jeh's altars (19.10). The sanctuary was in full swing in Amos' time (Am 4.4.5) at Bethel and Gilgal and probably at Beer-sheba (5.1). Amos bitterly satirizes the hollow, insincere worship, but does not condemn the common altars and sacrifices, as these were legitirom. With Hosea's situation is worse, the cultus has been "canonized," priests have been led on the sin or sin offerings of the people, and the kingdom soon perished because of its corruption.

The high places were still in use and not denounced yet by the prophets (1 K 3.2; 2 K 14.4; 16.4.35). Worship was not fully centralized, though tending in that direction. In the days of Abijah...
the temple cult was in full operation according to Moses' Law (2 Ch 13 10 f). Asa removed many strange altars and high places because of their corruption (14 3), but not all (15 17, 20 35). In the days of Je- hoshaphat, the kings of Judah were on different terms according to Moses (23 18; 24 14 b; 2 K 12 4–16). Sin and guilt offerings were in sufficient numbers to be mentioned, but the money went to the priests. Kautzsch (HDB, V, 234; V, 234 Paton, V, 234), with others, think these offerings were only fines and altogether different from those of Lev 4, 5. Such a statement is wholly gratuitous. The guilt offerings must be accompanied by fines, but not necessarily by the sin offerings. The passage speaks of both as perfectly familiar and of long standing, but details are lacking and there can be no certainty in the matter, except that it proves nothing regarding a ritual of sin and guilt offerings existing or non-existent at that time. Kautzsch's and Paterson's motives are obvious. Having reversed the history and put the ritual law late, they must needs make adjustments in the records to have them agree. In the days of Ahaz, the regular offerings were observed for priests, kings and people (2 K 16 13–15). Hezekiah offered them many high places (18 4). When repairing the temple, many sin offerings were presented to expiate the terrible sins of the previous reigns and the desecration of the temple (2 Ch 29 21–24); and so, also, burnt offerings (27 f), peace and thank offerings etc., in large number (28 3). As for I sa 1 10–17. The Passover was celebrated with peace offerings (2 Ch 30 1.2.15.22), oblations and tithes (31 12); courses of Levites were established (31 2), and the king's portion (ver 3). All the common altars of the time were removed, and worship centralized in Jerus (32 12). Reversed by Manasseh (33 3 f), the high places were again used (ver 17). Josiah purged Jerus (34 3), and on the discovery of the Book of the Law, with its rule regarding a central sanctuary, that law was rigidly enforced (35 6–14). The reformation under Josiah did not change the hearts of the people, and the rule followed in spite of all the efforts of Jeremiah and other prophets. That the temple was entirely suspended in Jerus from 586 to 536 BC seems certain. There is no support for G. F. Moore's statement (8 B, IV) that an altar was soon re-built and sacrificing was carried on there. It is true that in the book of the exiles an altar was soon built and the continual burnt offerings began (Ezr 3 2 f), and likewise at the Feast of Tabernacles, new moons and set feasts (va 4–7). Darius decreed that the Israelites should be given what was needed for the sacrifices (6 9 f). The band under Ezra offered many sin offerings on their return (8 35). At the dedication of the temple many burnt and sin offerings were made for all the tribes (6 17). Those who had married foreign women offered guilt offerings (16 9). The firmans of Artaxerxes provided money for bullocks, rams, lambs, with meal and drink offerings (7 17). Under Nebuchadnezzar and after the formal acceptance of the Law, a more complete effort was made to observe it. The shew- bread, continual burnt and meal offerings, sabbaths, new moons, sabbaths, sin offerings, first-fruits, firstlings, first-fruits of dough, heave offerings of all trees, wine and oil, etc., were carefully attended to (Neh 10 33–37) and were in full force later (13 5 f). There is no hint of innovation, only a thoroughgoing attempt to observe laws that had been somewhat neglected. At the time of Nehemiah and probably two or three centuries previous, there existed a temple on the island of Elephanta in the Nile. It was built by a Jewish military colony, and a system of sacrifices was observed how far they could, by all the laws, and what were their ideas of a central sanctuary are uncertain. Several semi-tribal nations practiced offerings at Elephanta human sacrifices. It was common among the Canaanites, as is shown by the exca- vations at Gezer, the Israelites. They seem to have offered children in sacrifice in the laying of foundations of houses or other construc- tions. Among the Carthaginians, Phoenicians, Greeks and Romans human sacrifices were all too common. The custom was not unknown to the Israelites. Abraham called upon the Lord three times (Gen 15 9–18). They offered the act, and a lesson was given for all time. 9. A Temple, and Sacrifices.—In Israel's Sacrifices. It is common among the Phantime Israelites, as is shown by the exca- vations at Gezer, the Israelites. They seem to have offered children in sacrifice in the laying of foundations of houses or other construc- tions. Among the Carthaginians, Phoenicians, Greeks and Romans human sacrifices were all too common. The custom was not unknown to the Israelites. Abraham called upon the Lord three times (Gen 15 9–18). They offered the act, and a lesson was given for all time. 10. Human Sacrifices. The abominable practice is forbidden by the Law (Lev 18 19). It was the act of as a passing through the fire to Moloch, referring to the Phoenician and Ammonite practices. Anyone practising it was to be stoned (Lev 20 2). 11. Certain Heathen Sacrifices. In Israel's History. When the destruction of the Temple was imminent, and the temple was to be burnt, Ezra (12 31; 13 10). The rash vow of Jephthah resulted in the immolation of his daughter, but the incident is recorded as something extraordinary (Jgs 11 31 f). The execution of Zebah and Zalmunna is a case of blood revenge, not sacrifice (18 18 f). Nor is the slaughter of Agag in any sense a sacrifice (1 10 32 f). The death of Saul's sons because of his breach of coven- ant with the Gibeonites was an expiatory sacrifice, to atone for the father's peridy (2 9). The Mosaic law in desiring offerings might be taken to appease the anger of Chemosh, and the effect was start- ing to the heathens (2 K 10 18–24). Yet, it is clear that the abomination in times of trouble (16 3). Such sacrifices were intended to secure favor with the Deity or appease his wrath. The firstborn of all the firstborn of oversum- mer (Ex 13 2). They were probably sacrificed at the rebuilding or fortifying of Jericho (1 K 9 27 f); of Jos (Josh 24 18). They were an essential part of the custom (2 K 21 6), but it was stopped by Josiah (23 10). Micah's words were probably applicable to those times of Anah, Micah was probably thinking of God's way to obtain God's favor by costly gifts apart from ethical regulation (Jgs 21 26). Thus, in the case of the custom practised by Israel of slaying the children in secret places (Isa 57 5), and Jeremiah represents it as practised in his time (Jer 32 19). At the same time, the same practice (Ezk 16 20 21 23 37). Heathen sacrifices were mentioned in the later books, such as awine, a mouse, a horse, a dog (Jgs 65 4; 66 317; Ezek 8 10; 2 K 25 11). All such ani- mals were unclean to the Hebrews, and the practice had its roots in some form of primitive totemism which survived in these heathen cults. They were little practised among the Israelites. See Totemism. VII. The Prophets and Sacrifices.—The prophets were reformers, not innovators. Their emphasis was on the ethical, rather than the ritual. They based their teachings on the central ideas of the covenant, not the-incidents. They accepted sacrifices as part of the religious life, but would give them their right place. They accepted the law regarding common altars, and Samuel, David and Solomon enlarged the temple and movement toward a central sanctuary, but it is the abuse of the cult that they condemned, rather than its use. They combated the heathenish idea that all God needed was gifts, lavish gifts, and would condone any sin if it only bestowed abundance of gifts. They demanded an inward religion, moral- ity, justice, righteousness, in short, an ethical religion. They preached an ethical God, rather than the profane, debasing and almost blasphemous god of the heathens. They reminded the people of the covenant at Sinai, the foun- dation principle of which was obedience and loyalty to Jeh. If Joel be early, the cult is in full practice, as he deplores the cutting-off of the meal offering, or minhah, and the negel or drink offering, through the devastation of the locusts. He deplores the stop- ping of the burnt offerings, etc., as these would not be cut off by the locusts (Joel 1 7 13; 2 14). Joel emphasized the need for a genuine repentance, telling them to rend their hearts and not their garments (2 13). Among the heathen, a crude, licentious and sarcastically bids them go on transgressions (4 4 5), mentions burnt, peace, thank and freewill offerings (4 4 f; 5 22), reminds them of the fact that they did not offer sacrifices in the wilderness (6 25), but demands rather righteousness and justice. There is nothing here against the Mosaic origin of the laws.

In Hosea's time the hollow externalism of the cult had become worse, while vice, falsehood, murder, oppression, etc., were rampant. He utters an epoch-making statement when he says, "I desire mercy, and not sacrifice," etc. (6:6). This is no sweeping renunciation of sacrifices, as such; it is only putting the emphasis in the right place. Such sacrifices as Hosea speaks of were worse than worthless. It is somewhat extravagant for Kautzsch to say, "it is perfectly futile to read out of 6:6 anything else than a categorical rejection of sacrifices." Hosea recognizes their place in religion, and deplores the loss during exile (3:4). The corrupt cults he condemns (4:13, f), for they are as bad as the Canaan- itish cults (4:9). Jeh used them (8:13; 9:4). The defection of the nation began early (11:2), and they have multiplied altars (12:1; 13:2). He predicts the time when they shall render as bullocks the "calves" of their lips (14:2 A.V.).

Sacrifice is emphatic. The sacrifices were more costly in his day, in order the more surely to purchase the favor of the Deity. Human sacrifices were in vogue, but Micah says God requires them "to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with his God." This does not mean that the least affect sacrifices of the right kind and with the right spirit.

Isaiah faces the same situation. There are multitudes of sacrifices, burnt offerings, blood of bullocks and goats, with incense, he-bears, etc., but no justice, morality, love, truth or goodness. Thus their sacrifices, etc., are an abomination, though right in themselves (1:11-17; 61:8). The same is true of all pious performances today. Israel is just as much talked of as a temple (6:1.6). In his eschatological vision there is freedom to offer sacrifices in Egypt (19:19.21). The people are to worship in the holy mountain (27:13). Ariel must let the feast come around (28:1).

Jeremiah maintains the same attitude. Your "frankincense from Sheba, and the sweet cane," burnt offerings and sacrifices are not pleasing to God (6:20; 14:12). They made the temple a den of robbers, in the streets they baked cakes to the Queen of Sheba and burnt incense to her, saying, "Add your burnt-offerings unto your sacrifices, and eat ye flesh. For I spake not unto your fathers, . . . concerning . . . sacrifices: but . . . commanded . . . saying, Hearken unto Me. . . ." (7:21-23). This was literally true, as we have seen above; the covenant was not based on sacrifices but on obedience. Such a statement does not deny the institution of sacrifices for those within the covenant who are obedient. It is no "subterfuge," as Kautzsch calls it, "to say that the prophets never polemicize against sacrifice per se, but only against offerings presented hypocritically, without repentance and a right disposition, with blood-stained hands; against the opera operata of the carnally-minded, half-heavenly mass of the people. This is exactly what they do, and they are in perfect harmony with the covenant constitution and with their own ethical and spiritual functions. Kautzsch can make such an extravagant assertion only by ignoring the fact that Jeremiah himself in predicting the future age of righteousness and blessedness makes sacrifice an important factor (33:11.18). Picturing possible prosperity and glory, Jeremiah speaks of burnt and meal offerings, frankincense, thank offerings, etc., being brought into the house of the Lord (17:25). (We are aware of the humanity of an arbitrary transference of this passage to a later time.)

Ezekiel is called by Kautzsch "the founder of the Levitical system. He is said to have preserved the fragment of the ritual that was broken up in the exile. But his references to the burnt, sin and trespass offerings presuppose familiarity with them (40:38-42). He assigns the north and south chambers for the meal, sin and trespass offerings (42:13). The cleansing of the altar (42:10) is a sin offering, with burnt and peace offerings with a ritual similar to Lev 8:11 (Ex 29:8-27). There are to be ministers and slav burnt offerings and sacrifice for the people (44:11). The priest must offer his sin offering before he offers the burnt offering, and then sacrifice the sin and trespass offerings as in 44:29. In chapter 45, the people are to give the king lambs for meal, burnt and peace offerings, while the prince shall give the meal, burnt and drink offerings for the feasts and new moons, and the Sabbaths and feasts. He is to prepare them to make atonement (45:13-17). In cleansing the sanctuary the Levitical ritual is followed with added details (45:18-20). The Passover requires the burnt, sin and meal offerings with an extra burnt offering. The prince's burnt and peace offerings (46:2-4.6.9-12) for the sabbaths, new moons, etc. The daily burnt offerings (vs 13-15) must have a sixth instead of a tenth part of an ephah, as in Lev 1. The sin and guilt offerings are to be held in a certain place, and the meal offering baked (vs 20.26). Ezek varies from the Levitical Law in the quantity of the burnt offering, pictures it as a grander ideal situation than Moses. The people are all righteous, with new hearts, the Spirit in them enabling them to keep the Law (36:26), and yet has "no spirit of purification for them. Does this seem to indicate that the prophets would abolish sacrifices entirely? It is strange reasoning which makes the prophets denounced the whole sacrificial system, when one of the greatest authors of the OT seeks to convey this hope for the blessed age in the future.

In the second part of Isa, God declares that He has not been honored by the people with burnt and meal offerings, etc., and that He has not burdened them with such offerings, but that it is burdened with sins (56:3-6). Those foreigners who respect the covenant shall offer acceptable sacrifices (56:7) in the holy city to God. The Servant of Jehovah is to be be a guilt offering (53:10) to expiate the sins of Israel. Sacrifice is here for the first time lifted out of the animal sacrifice and placed upon the link between the OT and the NT. In the glorious age to come there shall be priests and sacrifices, new moons, sabbaths and worship in Jerus (66:21.23).

Daniel speaks of the meal offering being caused to cease in the midst of the week (9:27).

Zechariah pictures the golden age to come when all nations shall go up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of tabernacles, which implies sacrifices. Pets are used, and all the worshipers shall use them in the ritual (14:16-21).

In Malachi's age the ritual was in practice, but grossly abused. They offered polluted bread (1:7), and sacrificed the blind, lame and the sick, etc., as sacrifices. He rules against ephahs, saying, "I have no delight in the name of the God of Jacob, and I have no respect for you. . . . For from the day that your fathers听了 the voice of the Lord God, they have transgressed and have not kept his covenant and the commandments which he commanded their fathers. . . . Yet they have not hearkened, nor have they abased themselves concerning their iniquity. . . ." (3:10-11). The Gentiles offer better ones (1:11). The Israelites covered the altar of Jehovah with tears by their hypocrisy. The sacrifice was literally the flesh of the goat, robbed God in withholding tithes and heavy offerings (3:8). It is the abuse of the cult that is denounced here, as in all the other Prophets.

A special use of the term "sacrifice" is made by Zephaniah (1:7 f), applying it to the destruction of Israel by Jehovah. Bozrah and Edom are to be victims (3a 34b); also Gog and Magog (Ezk 39 17.19).

In summing up the general attitude of the prophets toward sacrifices, even G. F. Moore in Zeph 2b admits that the prophets "in the main distinctly entertained the idea of a religion without a cultus, a purely spiritual worship. Sacrifice may well have seemed to them the natural expression of homage and gratitude." He might have added, "and of atonement." For it is of the essence of propitiation that there is VIII. Sacrifice in the "Writings."—Dates are very uncertain here. The Ps and Prov extend from David and Solomon into the Pers period.

The sages take the same attitude as the prophets. They enjoin the sacrifice of first-fruits (Prov 3:9). A characteristic maxim of the Talmud is, 'In the peace offerings (14.14). The trespass Proverbs offering (7) has no meaning to fools (14.9), and the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to God (15.8; 21.27). Right-ousness and justice are more acceptable to Jeh than sacrifices (21:3), yet to them sacrifices are a regular part of worship. Köheleth speaks of sacri-cifices as quite the custom, and depreciates the offers of fools (Eccel 5:1, 9:2).

The Psalmist is remarkable from the faithful to offer the sacrifices of righteousness, i.e. sacrifices offered in the right spirit (4:5). The drink offerings of idolaters are well known (16:4). Prayer is made for the acceptance of sacrifices (20:3). It is a coveted privilege to offer them (27:6; 84:1–4).
The true relation between sacrifice and obedience is expressed in 40:6–8. As in Jer 7:21 f, the emphasis is laid on obedience, without which sacrifices are worthless and repugnant to God. They are not the important thing in Israel's religion, for that religion could exist without them as in the wilderness and exile. The teaching corresponds exactly with that of the prophets and is probably late.
Ps 80 is even more emphatic. The Psalmist knows that sacrifices are in the covenant regulations (ver 5), but repudiates the idea of giving anything to God or of feeding Him (vs 12,13). Everything belongs to Him, He is not hungry, He would scorn the idea of drinking the blood of goats, etc. The idea of the cultus being of a real value to God is scorned.
Yet in the next verse the reader is admonished to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving and pay vows (ver 14).
The sacrifices that express worship, penitence, prayer, thanksgiving and faith are acceptable.
The penitent Psalmist speaks of thanksgiving.
Sacrifices as such are no delight to God, the real sacrifice is a broken heart (61:16). When the heart is right, then, as an expression of true-heartedness, devotion, repentance and faith, burnt offerings are highly acceptable (Ps 50:10). The Psalmist promises a freewill offering to God (64:6; 66:13.
15). Sacrifices of thanksgiving are advised (96:8; 107:22; 118:27) and promised (116:17). Prayer is likened to the evening sacrifice (141:2).

IX. The Idea and Efficacy of Sacrifices.—That the Hebrews thoroughly believed in the efficacy of sacrifices is without doubt. What ideas they entertained regarding them is not so clear. No single theory can account for all the facts. The unholy sacrifices were regarded as food for the Deity, or a pleasant odor, in one instance, taking the place of a bloody offering (see above).
The bloody offerings present some difficulties, and hence many different views.

Included in this list of foods of food to the Deity would be the meal and peace offerings, in so far as they were consumed by fire, the burnt offerings and the shewbread, etc. They were food-fare, the firedistilled essence or etherealized food for God which gave Him pleasure and disposed Him favorably toward the offerer. They were intended either to appease wrath, to win favor, or to express thanks and gratitude for favors experienced. The offering, and more naive idea was probably to win the favor of the Deity by a gift.
Later, other ideas were expressed in the offerings.

The burnt offering best gave expression to the sentiments of adoration and devotion, though they may not be excluded from the meal and peace offerings. In other words, sacrifice meant worship, which is a complex exercise of the soul. Such was Abraham's attempted sacrifice of Isaac. The daily burnt offerings were intended to have value to God as a broken course of adoration and devotion, to keep the right relations with the Deity. On particular occasions, special offerings were made to insure this relation which was specially needed at that time.

3. A Means of Purification from Uncleanliness

The burnt and sin offerings were the principal kinds used for the purpose of purification; water being used in case of uncleanness from contact with the dead. There were three classes of uncleanness: (1) those resulting from contact with men and women; (2) those resulting from contact with a corpse; (3) the case of recovery from leprosy. Purification ceremonies were the condition of such persons enjoying the social and religious life of the community. They may have been necessary when most of them occurred in the regular course of nature and could not be guarded against, can be understood only as we consider that these offences were the effects of sin, or the weaknesses of the fleshly nature, due to sin. Such unclean-lessness was the subject unift for society, and that unfitness was an offence to God and required a piacul offering.

Consecration was of men and things. The ceremonies at the sealing of the covenant and the consecration of the Levites and of Aaron

This is the view of Schults, and partly that of Kautzsch, in regard to earlier ideas of sacrifice. Such a view may have been held by certain peoples in primitive times, but it does not do justice to the Levitical system.

The view of Ritschl is that sacrifices served as a form of self-protection from God with whom there is no relationship unless mediated through self-sacrifice and self-abasement. Such offerings were regarded as a natural act of communion. The blood was offered to God as an object of communion which He enters into, on which He places His seal. As such it is the source of all the ceremonies of consecration which are in relation to the consecrated person. This view is probably nearer to the reality than that of the covenant idea. It explains properly why the blood is used in sacrifice.
From Ritschl's view it can be understood why the blood is used in sacrifice. The blood “covers" all sin and de-

That sacrifices were really a sacrament has been advocated by many. According to some theologians, the sacrifices were signs of spiritusome of these ideas, it is not the idea expressed in the cultus, and seems to read into the ritual the

they were merely figures, adumbrations of the true Sacrifice to come, which alone could take away sin? Did they understand that their Messiah was to be sacrificed, His blood shed, to make an atonement for them, and that their Liberty given means of atonement all unreal? The answer must be an emphatic "No." There is no hint that their minds were directed to think of the Coming One as their sacrifice, foreshadowed by their offerings. That was the one thing they had not and could not grasp. We must understand, and to this day the cross is their chief stumbling-block. The statement that the Servant is to be a guilt offering (Isa 53 10) is the nearest approach to it, but this is far from saying that the whole sacrificial system was understood as foreshadowing that event. The stretching of the sacrificial system in full vogue in the Messianic age.

We prefer to regard the sacrificial system as a great religious educational system, adapted to the capacity of the people at that age, intended to develop right conceptions of sin, proper appreciation of the holiness of God, correct ideas of how to approach God, a familiarity with the idea of sacrifice as the fundamental thing in redemption, life, and service to God and man. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

I. TERMS OF SACRIFICE EPISTEMOS

I. Terms of Sacrifice Epistemos—The word "offering" (προσφορά, προσφορά) describes the death of Christ, once in Paul's Teaching (Acts 3:31; 2:20; 13:33; 1 Cor. 15:3; Rev. 4:6; 2 Cor. 5:14; 5:19), and twice in the NT (Rev. 4:6; 2 Cor. 5:14). The verb προσφέρω, προσφέρομαι, "to offer," is also used in 5:15 in He (Acts 13:19; 1 Cor. 15:3; 16:17; 2 Cor. 8:1; 12:8; 1 Cor. 10:16; 11:4). The noun προσφορά occurs 15 t in LXX, usually as the tr of τέμπον, "sacrifice." This noun in the NT refers to OT sacrifices in Acts 7:42; 21:26, to the offering of money in Acts 24:21. The same noun is also used in 3 t in He (7:27; 9:28; 13:15); also in Pet 2:5.

The word "sacrifice" (θυσία, θυσίαν) translates in LXX 8 Heb words for various kinds of sacrifice, occurring about 115 times: (1) The Servant's death, once in LXX (Ps 46:4); (2) sacrifices for sin, once in LXX (Ps 32:2); (3) sacrifices for sin, 2 t in He (9:23; 10:12); it refers several times to sacrifice demanded of the one giving (Phil 2:17, 4:18, Heb 13:15, 16; 1 Pet 2:5). The verb "to sacrifice" (θυσίαν, θυσίαν) is used once by Paul to describe Christ's death (1 Cor 15:31).

The blood (παράδοσις, kalma) of Christ is said to secure redemption and an eternal inheritance (He 9:12; 1 Cor. 10:16; Eph 1:17; 2:13; Col 1:20); 3 t in He (9:12, 14; 10:19; cf also 10:20); 2 t in Pet (1:21) and 5 t in the Johannean writings (1 Jn 1:7; 5:6, 8; Rev 1:5). Unmistakably this figure of the blood refers to Christ's sacrifice, and its "balm" is repeatedly referred to in the NT. In Ex 21:8, meaning the ransom paid by a father to redeem his daughter from a cruel master signifies (1) deliverance gained by Christ's death, 5 t in Paul (Rom 3:24; 1 Cor 6:20; 1 Pet 1:18, 19, 20); (2) once in He (10:5); (3) once in He (9:15); (4) general deliverance (twice (Lk 22:17, 20) the Christian's final deliverance, physical and spiritual (Rom 8:33; Eph 4:30). The simple word θύσια (θύσια, "redeeming" in Ex 21:8) means once only in the NT (1 Tim 2:6).

καταλλάγα (καταλλαγή, "reconciliation," only twice in LXX), means the relation to God into which men are brought by Christ's death, 4 t by Paul (Rom 5:11; 11:15; 2 Cor 5:18, 19) καταλλάξω (καταλλάξεω, "to reconcile," 4 t in LXX), means to bring men into the state of reconciliation with God, 5 t in Paul (Rom 5:18, 19, 20; Col 1:22; 1 Cor 15:20, 21). The words with the propitiatory idea occur as follows: ἐξαρατέομαι (ἐξαραθώ, "to propitiate," 12 t in LXX, τι "to forgive") occurs twice (Lk 18:13; Heb 9:17); ἐκκατορτίζω (ἐκκαταρτίζω, 7 t in LXX, ἐκκαταρτίζων) also occurs (atone; "forgiveness") occurs twice in 1 Jn (2:2, 4:10); ἐκκατορτίζωs ἐκκαταρτίζων, 21 t in LXX, translates "mercy-seat," where God was gracious and spoke as God (He 9:5).

The idea of sacrifice demanded of His disciples and to make His own cross the symbol of sacrifice (Mt 10:38; 16:24; Mk 8:34; Lk 9:23; 14:27, with contexts; 14:14; 12:32, etc).

Though it is not our province in this article to discuss the origin and history of sacrifice in the ethnic religions, it must be noted that sacrifice has been a chief element in almost every religion (Jiinns and Baals are being the most notable exceptions). The bloody sacrifice, where the idea of propitiation is prominent, is well-nigh universal in the ethnic religions, being found among even the most enlightened peoples like the Greeks and Romans (see art. "Expiation and Atonement" in ERE). Whether or not the system of animal sacrifices would have ceased, not only in Judaism but also in all the ethnic religions, had not Jesus lived and taught and died, is a question of pure speculation. It must be conceded that the sect of the Jews (Essenes) attaining to the highest ethical ideals and living the most unselfish lives of brotherhood and benevolence did not believe in animal sacrifices. But they exerted small influence over the Jewish nation as compared with the Pharisees. It is also to be noted that the prophets Amos, Hosea, Micah and Isaiah excelled the ethical far above the ceremonial; even denounced the sacrifice of animals if not accompanied by personal devotion to rightness (Am 5:21 ff.; Hos 6:5; Mic 6:6 ff.; Isa 1:11 ff.). The Stoic and Platonic philosophers also attacked the system of animal sacrifices. But these exceptions only accentuate the historical fact that man's sense of the necessity of sacrifice to Deity is well-nigh universal. Only the sacrifice of Christ and the destruction of Jesus caused a cessation of the daily, weekly, monthly and annual sacrifices among the Jews, and only the knowledge of Christ's sacrifice of Himself will finally destroy the last vestige of animal sacrifice.

II. Attitude of Jesus and NT Writers to the OT Sacrificial System.—Jesus never attacks the sacrificial system. He often takes for sacrifices (Mt 5:24). More than that, He accepted the whole sacrificial system, a part of the OT scheme, as of Divine origin, and to the moral laws, as shown by His

He endorsed Hosea's fine ethical epigram, 'God will have mercy and not sacrifice' (Mt 9:13; 12:7). He also commends as near the kingdom the scribe who put love to God and man above sacrifice (Mt 12:35). But Jesus teaches not merely the inferiority of sacrifice to the moral laws, but the termination of sacrifice as a system, when He said, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many" (Mt 14:24; Mt 26:28; Lk 22:20). Not only is the ethical superior to the ceremonial, but the sacrifice of Himself is an superior to the sacrifices of the old system as the new covenant is superior to the old.

Paul's estimate of the Jewish sacrifices is easily seen, although he does not often refer to them. Once only (Acts 21:26) after his conversion does he offer the Jewish sacrifice, and then as a matter of expediency for winning the Judaistic wing of Christianity to his universal gospel of grace. He regarded the sacrifice of the OT as type of the true sacrifice which Christ made (1 Cor 5:7).

The author of the Ep. to the Hebrews discusses the OT sacrifices more fully than other NT writers. He regards the bloody sacrifices as superior to the unbloody and the yearly sacrifice on the Day of Atonement by the high priest as the climax of the OT system. The high priest under the old covenant was the type of Christ under the new. The sacrifices of the old covenant could not take away sin, or produce the remission; but the merits of the sacrifices of the new covenant are calculated according to the fruits of men (10:11), shown by the necessity of repeating the offerings (6:2), and because God had appointed another high priest, His Son, to supplant those of the old covenant (5:5; 7:1-28). The heart of this author's teaching is that animal sacrifices cannot possibly atone for sin or produce moral transformation, since they are Divinely appointed only as a type or shadow of the one great sacrifice by Christ (8:7; 10:1).

To sum up, the NT writers regarded the OT sacrificial system as of Divine origin and so obligatory in its day, but imperfect and only a type of Christ's sacrifice, and so to be supplant by His perfect sacrifice.

III. The Sacrificial Idea in the NT.—The one central idea of NT writers is that the sacrifice made by Christ on the cross is the final perfect sacrifice for the atonement of sin and the salvation of men, a sacrifice typified in the various sacrifices of the OT, which are in turn abrogated by the operation of the final sacrifice. Only James and Jude among NT writers are silent as to the sacrifice of Christ, and they write for practical purposes only.

The Baptist, it is true, presents Jesus as the coming Judge in the Synoptic Gospels, but in Jn 1:29-30 he refers to Him as 'the Lamb of God,' in the former passage adding of John the "that taketh away the sin of the world." Westcott (Comm. on St. John, 20) says, "The title as applied to Christ , a title worthy of the infinite suffering, of patient submission, of sacrifice, of redemption, etc." There is scarcely any doubt that the Baptist looked upon the Christ as the one who came to make the great sacrifice for man's sins. Professor Burton in his Ideas of Atonement, (Burton, Smith and Smith, 107) says that John sees Christ 'suffering under the load of human sin.'

There are recorded in the Synoptic Gospels two unmistakable references by Jesus to His death as a sacrifice: (1) He did not regard it as a sacrifice (Lk 22:20; Mt 26:20); (2) He came to give His life a ransom. Thayer (Gr-Eng. Lex. of the NT) says this word means "the price paid for redeeming." Hence the idea in ransom must be of sacrificial significance. But if there could be any doubt as to the sacrificial import of this passage, there is a clear case of the sacrificial idea in Mk 10:34, where Jesus declared His own suffering to be for the sins of men who stumbled and were turned aside by the word of the kingdom, and who shall be the salt of the earth, for if the salt become tasteless, it is good for nothing but to be cast out and be trodden under foot of men. Thus, Jesus' sacrifice is for the whole creation, and He is to be the "salt of the earth." Several other passages in the NT teach that Jesus' sacrifice is in the sense of the atonement, and not comparable to the sacrifices of the OT.

Paul's teaching on the atonement is admirably clear and comprehensive in Rom 3:24-26. He points out that sin and death are the penalty of transgression, but God sparing all men, declaring the just cause of grace, and having mercy and not sacrifice, gave His Son for the salvation of men, that all men might be justified unto life. In 1 Pet 2:24, He declared that the change in the sacrifice was for the sins of all men, and that He was himself offered to God as sacrifice for the sins of many. In 1 Pet 3:18, He declared that Christ died to reconcile the Jews with God, and that He was offered a sacrifice for sin. In 1 Pet 2:24, He declared that Christ died for the sins of men, and that He was offered a sacrifice for sin. In 1 Pet 3:18, He declared that Christ died for the sins of men, and that He was offered a sacrifice for sin. In 1 Pet 3:18, He declared that Christ died for the sins of men, and that He was offered a sacrifice for sin. In 1 Pet 3:18, He declared that Christ died for the sins of men, and that He was offered a sacrifice for sin. remission of sins). In his First Ep. (1 18.19) he expressly declares that we are redeemed by the blood of the spotless Christ, thus giving the sacrificial significance to His death. The same is implied in 1 2; 3 18.

4. Paul's Teaching.

He ascribes saving efficacy to the blood of Christ in Rom 3 25; 5 9; 1 Cor 10 16; Eph 1 7; 2 13; Col 1 14. In the pastoral letters (1 Tim 2 6) he teaches that Christ gave "himself a ransom for all." This is the only NT passage in which occurs the strong word antilutron for "ransom." In his old age the apostle feels more positively than ever before that Christ's death is the ransom price of man's deliverance from sin.

The author of He asserts that Christ by the sacrifice of Himself "obtained eternal redemption" for man (9 12). John says that Christ "loosed (δελυσθη) us from our sins by his blood" (Rev 5 9). This idea in John is akin to that of redemption or deliverance by ransom. Peter teaches in 1 Pet 1 19. So, we see, Jesus and all the NT writers regard Christ's sacrifice as the procuring cause of human redemption.

5. Teaching eternal high priest, after the order of Melchizedek, and offering Himself as the final sacrifice for sin, and for the moral transformation of man (4 14; 10 18).

In the First Ep. of Jn. (1 7; 2 2; 5 6.8) propitiation for sin and cleansing from sin are ascribed to the blood of Christ. In Rev 1 5 John ascribes deliverance (not washing or cleansing, according to best MSS) from sin to the blood of Christ. Several times he calls Christ the Lamb, making the sacrificial idea prominent. Once he speaks of Him as the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (15 8).

To sum up, all the NT writers, except James and Jude, refer to Christ's death as the great sacrifice for sin. Jesus Himself regarded His death as such. In the various types of NT teaching Christ's death is presented (1) as the covenant sacrifice (Mk 14 24 || Mt 26 28 || Lk 22 20; He 9 15-22); (2) as the sin offering (Rom 8 3; 2 Cor 5 21). This is, the offering of the paschal lamb (1 Cor 5 7); (4) as the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement (He 2 17; 9 12 ff).

IV. Relation of Christ's Sacrifice to Man's Salvation.-The saving benefits specified in the NT as resulting from the sacrificial death of Christ are as follows:

Redemption or deliverance from the curse of sin: This must be the implication in Jesus' words, There is no passage of man's own saving of man. 1. Redemp- tion or Deliverance: captive in sin, the Father sends His Son to pay the ransom price for the deliverance of the captive, and the Son's death is the price paid. Paul also uses the words "redeemed" and "redemption" in the same sense. In the great letters he asserts that we are "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God set forth to be a propitiation, ... in his blood" (Rom 3 24-25). Then the apostle traces justification back to redemption as the means for securing it, and redemption back to the "blood" (Christ's death) as the cause of its procurement. Thus, Christ's death secures redemption and redemption procures justification. In Gal (3 13), he speaks of being redeemed "from the curse of the law." The law involved man in a curse because he could not keep it. This curse is the penalty of the broken law which the transgression must bear, and which deliverance from said penalty is somehow secured. Paul represents Christ by His death as securing for sinners deliverance from this curse of the broken law (cf Gal 4 5 for the same thought, though the word 'curse' is not used). Paul emphasizes the teaching in the Captivity Ep.: "In whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses" (Eph 1 7; of Col 1 14).

2. Reconciliation: the restoration of favor between the two parties. There is a strange- ment between God and man. Reconciliation is the restoration of favor between the two parties. Jesus does not utter any direct message on reconciliation, but implies God's saving sin and strained relations between God and the unrepentant sinner (see Lk 18 13). He puts into the mouth of the praying tax-gatherer the words, 'God be propitio... (see Thayer, Gr.Eng., Lex., hikalaskein, but Jesus' word is a word implying propitiation as wrought by the death of Christ. So the doctrine of reconciliation is also in the Ep. to the Eph. John teaches the sacrifice procures "covenant," through Christ our Advocate, but does not expressly connect it with his death as the procuring cause (1 Jn 2 2). Peter is likewise silent on this point.

Reconciliation implies that God can forgive; yea, has forgiven. Jesus and the NT writers declare the death of Christ to be the basis of God's forgiveness. Jesus in insti- tution of Sinns tating the memorial supper said, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26 28). It is true Mk and Lk do not record this last phrase, "unto remission of sins." But there is no intimation that this phrase is the result of Matthew's theologizing on the purpose of Christ's death (see Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, II, 239 ff, who claims this phrase is not from Jesus; also Allen in "Mt," ICC, in loc.). But Paul leaves no doubt as to the connection between man's forgiveness by God and Christ's sacrifice for him. This idea is rooted in the great passage on justification (Rom 3 21-8 21; see esp. 4 7), is positively declared in Eph 1 7; Col 1 14. The author of He teaches that the shedding of Christ's blood under the new covenant is as necessary to secure forgiveness as the shedding of animal's blood under the old. John also implies that forgiveness is based on the blood (1 Jn 1 7-9).

True reconciliation and forgiveness include the canceling of the offender's guilt. Jesus has no direct word on the cancellation of guilt. Paul does express his argument for the universality of human sin by asserting that “all the world may be brought under the judgment of God” (AV Cancellation “guilty before God.” Rom 3:19).

4. The guilt of man is so heinous that it necessitates a sacrifice that can only be done by God. Thayer (Gr-Eng. Lex., in loc.) says of the Greek word "guilt" means “owing satisfaction to God” (liable to punishment by God). But in Rom 8:13 Paul exclaims, “There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus... God, sending his own Son in the likeness of his flesh without sin, (Rom 8:3) (a sacrifice identical to an offering for sin).” The guilt, or exposure of the sinner to God’s wrath and so to punishment, is removed by the sin offering which Christ made. This idea is implied by the author of He (2:15), but is not expressed in Peter and John.

Right standing with God is also implied in the preceding idea. Forgiving sin and canceling guilt are the negative, bringing into right standing with God the positive, assertion of the same transaction. “He who partakes of the same of God, he shall be made partakers of his righteousness” (Rom 2:21).

Standing in the sin offering; so Augustine and with God other Fathers, Ewald, Ritschl; see Meyer, Comm., in loc., who denies this meaning on our behalf that Paul can mean “the righteousness of God in him” (2 Cor 5:21). In this passage Paul makes justification the divine purpose of the sacrificial death of Christ. This thought is elaborated by the apostle in Gal and Rom, but is not expressed by Jesus, or in He, in Pet or in Jn.

Jesus does not connect our cleansing or sanctification with His death, but with His word (Jn 17:17).

The subl. cleansing (καθαρισμος, καθαρισμός) is not used by Paul, and the or Sanctification vb. “to cleanse” (καθαρίζω, katharizo) occurs only twice in his later letters (Eph 6:26; Tit 2:14). He does use the idea of sanctification, and in Rom 6-8 teaches that sanctification is a logical consequence of justification which is secured by Christ’s sacrificial death. In Phil 3:10,11, he views Christ’s death and resurrection as the dynamic of transformation in the new life. The author of He (1:3, 9:14:22:23; 10:2), following the OT figures, uses the idea of cleansing for the whole process of putting away sin, from atonement to sanctification (see Westcott, Comm., in loc.). He makes Christ’s death the procuring cause of the cleansing. John does the same (1 Jn 3:7).

Divine sonship of the believer is also traced by Paul to the sacrificial death of Christ (Rom 8:17), though this thought is not found in Sonship other NT writers.

So, we sum up, the whole process of salvation, from reconciliation with God to the adoption of the saved sinner into heaven’s household, is ascribed, to some extent by Jesus, largely by Paul the theologian of the NT, and, in varying degrees, by other NT writers, to the sacrificial death of Christ. Even Holtzmann (Neutest. Theol., II, 111) admits “It is upon the moment of death that the grounding of salvation is exclusively concentrated.”

V. How Christ’s Sacrifice Procedes Salvation.—It must be conceded that the NT writers, much less Jesus, did not discuss this subject from the philosophical point of view. Jesus never philosophizes except incidentally. Paul, the author of He, and John had a philosophy underlying their theology, the first and second dealing most with the sacrificial work both with His person. But Paul and the author of He did not write their letters to produce a philosophical system explaining how Christ’s sacrificial death can and does procure man’s salvation.

By some it is claimed that the word “ransom” (Mk 10:45) gives us the key to the philosophical of the atonement, as presented in the NT. But the rules of exegesis are against this supposition. Jesus in the context is teaching his disciples that God is great. To illustrate the truth He refers to His own example of coming to minister, and our example of giving his life for his friends. This is the manner of enforcing a practical principle and not elaborating a theoretical truth. Moreover, this word is used metaphorically, and the laws of exegesis forbid us to press the literal meaning of a figure. The figure suggests captivity and ransom and delivers us out of a price (the price of the death of Christ). But Jesus does not tell us how His sacrifice procures salvation for man’s redemption from sin. The word “ransom” does give the clue to the development of the vicarious sacrifice (laborately later by Paul. Ritschl; see Thayer, Verh. 1888, 53) does not do the word “ransom” justice when he claims that it merely represents the meaning of the Heb. פֶּן, “kopher, “covering as a protection,” and that Christ’s death, like a covering, delivers us by stimulating us to lead the life of sacrificial service as Christ did. (Lk 22:27; Teaching of Jesus, II, 226) admits the “ransom” idea in the word, but says Christ delivers us from bondage to suffering and death, not by His death, but by His teaching which is illustrated by His sacrificial death. Boyschlag (Neutest. Theol., I, 135) finds worldly ambitions and such sins by showing us the example of Jesus’s sacrifice of Himself (Rom 8:32, 1 Cor 3:18). So, he thinks Christ’s “surrender of His life... avails as a ransom which He gives instead of the many.” (Rom 2:25) who were not able to pay the price, He adds, “The saying regarding the ransom lays emphasis upon the God’s vicarious performance of Jesus which secures the salvation,” etc.

Nor does Jesus’ saying at the Last Supper, “This is my blood of the covenant” (Mt 26:28) give us in any acceptable evidence of how His death saves man. It does not teach that sinners on entering the kingdom come into a new covenant relation with God which implies forgiveness of sin and fellowship with God, and that, as the covenant sacrificers at Mt. Sinai (Exod. 24:7-11), have a legal covenant between God and His people, so the death of Christ as the covenant sacrificer of God procures forgiveness of sin for the recipient person. Moreover, of grace between God and lost sinners, by virtue of which covenant God on His part forgives the penitent sinner, and the one. (Ritschl) which reappearing sinners present to himself to God for the life of sacrifice. But this statement fails to tell us how God can forgive sin on the basis of a covenant thus ratified by Christ’s death. Does it mean substitution, in that as the animal whose blood ratified the covenant was slain instead of the people, so Christ was slain in the place of sinners? Or does it suggest the imputability of the covenant on the basis of the animal’s (and so Christ’s) representing both God and man, and killing signifying loss of life or will to change the covenant (so Westcott, Comm. on He, 301) from the could scarcely mean that Christ’s sacrifice was the offering of a perfect acceptable sacrifice. (lsa 53:10-12, 1 Cor 3:11), or that Christ’s death is viewed merely as the common meal sacrifice, that God and His people thus enter into a new relationship of union with God. Among evolutionists in the study of comparative religion; see Menzies, Hist of Religion, 416 ff.

Ritschl and many modern scholars are disposed to reject all atonement in religion. They say, “Back to Christ.” Paul was only a human teacher of Jesus. But he was a Teaching Divinely-guided interpreter, and we need his first-hand interpretations of Jesus. What has to be said as to how Christ’s death saves men?

(1) The words expressing the idea of redemption.—See above on the terms of sacrifice. The classical passage containing the idea of redemption is Rom 3:24-26: “He has now been manifest in the flesh; as a propitiation through faith in his blood, to show his righteousness because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God; who in the former times did wait in the patience of his counsel toward the fatherless, lest he should be unjust, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus.” A fair interpretation of this passage gives us the following propositions: (a) The believer obtains right standing with God by means of, through the channel of, and only, see Thayer, II, 313, 2), redemption which is in Christ. (b) This redemption in Christ involves, or is based upon, the Divinely-purposed propitiation which Christ made...
Sacrifice (NT)

3 25) does Paul use the word "propitiation." As we saw in (1) above, the redemption in Christ is based upon the propitiation which Christ made in His death. Thayer (Gr-Eng. Lex., in loc.) says the noun signifies "a means of appeasing, expiating, propitiation, an expiatory sacrifice." He thinks it has this meaning in Rom. 3 25, but refers to it in the "mercy-seat" in He 9 5. Sanday (Comm. on Rom., 88) regards καταλέστρων as an adj. meaning "propitiatory."

De Wette, Frötsche, Meyer, Lipsius and many others take it in this sense; Gifford, Vaughan, Liddon, Reichenbach, think it means sacrifice in the same way as in He. But with either meaning the blood of Christ is viewed as securing the mercy of God. Propitiation of God is made by the blood of Christ, and because of that men have access to the mercy-seat of God's grace through faith in Christ, and because of that He became a "curse" for man's sins. See Romans, Epistle to the, 9, 3.

(4) The prepositions ἐν, ὑπὲρ, and ἀντί, antithetical. Paul never uses ἀντί ("for," instead of, "in place of," so Thayer) to express what Christ's sacrifice does for the sinner, but ὑπὲρ ("for one's sake") is the only word, and, if anything, is a shade of meaning "instead of," so Thayer. See Rom 5 8; 8 32; 14 15; 1 Cor 11 24; 2 Cor 5 15; Gal 3 13; Eph 5 2 25; 1 Thess 5 10; 1 Tim 2 6; Tit 2 14. It is to be noted that in 1 Tim 2 8 Paul uses αὐτίδρομον, "ransom," surrounded with the word ἀντί, which follows it with ὑπέρ, which may suggest that ὑπέρ is here used in the sense of ἀντί, "in the place of."

Summing up Paul's teaching as to how Christ's sacrifice saves: (a) The propitiatory sacrifice does not "soften God, or assuage the anger of God," but claims the advocates of the satisfaction theories assert, Vindictive Sacrifice, 486. God is already willing to save men. His love makes the propitiatory sacrifice (Rom 5 8). God's love makes the sacrifice, not the sacrifice His willingness to save men. (b) The sacrifice is not a sacrifice under the curse, the penalty of the broken law (Gal 3 13), and so was under God's wrath (Rom 1 18), i.e., man's sin exposed him to punishment, while at the same time God's love for the sinner was greater. (c) Christ by His sacrificial death made it possible for God to show His righteousness and love at the same time; i.e. that He did punish sin, but did love the sinner and will to save him (Rom 2 25, 26; 5 8). (d) Christ, who was sinless, suffered vicariously for sinful men. His death was not due to His sins but those of men (2 Cor 5 21). (e) His death, followed by His resurrection which marked Him off as the sinless Representative of God, and so appointed the Saviour of men (Rom 1 4), was designed by God to bring men into right relation with God (Rom 3 26; 2 Cor 5 21). So, we may say, Paul explained the relation not by the sinner's spiritual life by thinking of a transfer of the sinner's "curse" to Christ, which was placed under the cross (Rom 5 8), and of God's righteousness through Christ (Phil 3 9) to the sinner by faith in Christ. But we must not press this vicarious substitution too far, for both the atonement and claim that the system is the teaching of Paul. The substitutional, compensational nature of the atonement is not in Paul's mind. The language of redemption, propitiation, ransom, is largely figurative. We must feel the spiritual truth of a qualitative transfer of sin from man to Christ and of righteousness from Christ to man, and rest the matter there, so far as Paul's teaching goes. Beyond this our conclusions as to substitution as the method of atonement are results of philosophizing on Paul's teaching.

The author of He adds nothing to Paul's teaching respecting the method whereby Christ's sacrifice operates in saving men. His purpose

The access to the holies of God by Christ's death, 10 19, 20), which gives us data for forming a system based on a real propitiation for sin and reconciliation of God similar to the Pauline teaching formulated above.
Peter asserts that Christ suffered vicariously (1 Pet 2:22-24), who, although He "did no sin," "his own self bare our sins in his body for us."

4. Petrine upon the tree; who "suffered for and joined" sins once, the righteous for [huper, nine Teach- not add] the unrighteous" (1 Pet 5:18). No farther than Paul (perhaps not so far) in elaborating how Jesus' vicarious suffering saves the sinner. The Johannine writings contain the propitiatory idea (1 Jn 2:2; 4:10), although John wrote at the close of his life. The sacrifice was voluntary, and all but Peter suggest the idea of propitiation as to the mode of its operation. There is no direct discussion of what propitiation means.

VI. The Human Conditions of Application.

1. Jesus' Teaching in the OT and in the NT.

2. Paul's Teaching in the Galatians and Romans.

3. The teaching in Hebrews.

4. Peter and John do not discuss the ground of efficacy, and so add nothing to our conclusions above. The efficacy of the sacrifice is suggested by describing the glory of the person (1 Pet 1:19; 2:22-23; 1 Jn 1:17; 2:2).

To sum up our conclusion as to the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice: Jesus and the leading NT writers intimate that the efficacy of His sacrifice centers in His person, but they do not discuss the subject directly. Paul, though discussing it more extensively, does not do so fully, but the author of Hebrews and Paul concludes his argument for the finality of Christianity, in the superior efficacy of Christ's sacrifice, which is grounded in His personality, Divine, royal, sinless, eternal (see Ménage, Théol. de l'Esp. de Hébreu.). It is easy to see, from the position taken by the author of He, how Asenlum in Cor Deus Homo developed his theory of the sacrificial Christ, according to which the Divinity in Christ gave His atomic sacrifice its priceless worth in God's eyes.

VII. The Human Conditions of Application.

The sacrificial death of Christ is universal in its objective potentiality, according to Jesus (Lk 24:47, "unto all the nations"); according to Paul (Rom 1:5; 5:18; 11:32; 2 Cor 1. Universal 15:14; Gal 3:14); according to the

1. General to the objective author of He (2:9, "death for Potency every man"); and according to John (1 John 2:2, "propitiation for the whole world").

The objective redemption to be efficacious must be subjectively applied. The blood of Christ is the universally efficacious remedy for the sin-sick souls of men, but it must be applied individually.

2. The subjectively application of the NT doctrine of the sacrifice. How is the application applied? And the threefold answer is, by repentance, by faith, and by obedience.

By repentance. The Baptist and Jesus emphasized repentance (change of mind or heart, change of action and life) as the condition of entrance into the kingdom of God (Mt 3:2; Mk 1:15). Peter presented repentance at Pentecost and immediately after as a means of obtaining forgiveness (Acts 2:38). Paul also, although emphasizing faith, also stressed repentance as an element in the human side of salvation (Acts 20:19; Rom 10:13; Rev 2:20; Rev 2, 3, 21). Repentance is the condition of receiving the benefit of the sacrifice, though not stressing it as a means of receiving the benefit of the sacrifice. (1) By faith. Jesus connected faith with repentance (Mk 1:15) as the condition of receiving the Messianic salvation. Paul, as the great teacher of the NT teaching, is applying the work of Christ. The gospel is "the power of God unto salvations to every one that believeth" (Rom 1:16), whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith (3:25), not works, is reckoned for righteousness. The NT in the letters to the Cor, in the Captivity and the Pastoral Ep. empowers repentance as the act of bringing forth the faith which works salvation in us. Paul "heart" meant the seat or essence of the whole personality, and by this faith which works salvation in us, in Paul is the personal commitment of one's self to Christ as Saviour and Lord (2 Cor 5:15; compare Thayer, Gr-Eng. Lex. as a part of the discussion of the meaning of faith in this verse. The author of He discusses esp. faith as a conquering power, but also implies that it is the condition of entrance upon the life of spiritual rest and fellowship (ch 3:4 and 5:4, etc). Peter also emphasizes this phase of the human condition of salvation when he shows how sanctification grows spontaneously out of justification (Rom 6:8) and when he says that what "avails" is "faith working through love" (Gal 5:6). The author of He says, "He became unto all them that obey him the author (Gr ar, atis, cause) of eternal salvation" (1 Pet 3:21). Peter and James emphasize the keeping of His commandments, of His life and service, as the means of approaching to the fullest the saving benefits of Christ's death. The theologians in classrooms and preachers in the pulpits have failed to emphasize this aspect of "saving faith," as did Jesus, Paul, the author of He, and John. The NT teaching is a life as well as an act of repentance in the part of God, and the process is carried on by means of obedience, the life of service, which is appropriate by faith the dynamic of Christ's sacrifice.

VIII. The Christian Life. The Life of Sacrifice.

This discussion of the faith that "obeys" leads to the consideration of that climactic thought of NT writers, namely, that the Christian's life is sacrificial living based on Christ's sacrifice for him.

We note in outline the following:

1. The Christian's life of sacrifice is the logical consequence of Christ's sacrificial death. The Christ who sacrificed Himself for the believer is now continuing the sacrifice in the believer's life exercise of all our gifts and graces is viewed by Peter as sacrificial living (1 Pet 2:5): "Ye also, as living stones, are built up a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices," etc. All Christians daily die to one degree or another as they present their best efforts to be acceptable to God, if they 'suffer as Christians' (1 Pet 2:20; 3:18) in the exercise of their graces and powers.

But how do these sacrifices of the Christian affect him and God? The NT writers never hint that our sacrifices propitiate God, or so win His favor that He will or can on account of our sacrifices forgive our sins. They are 'well-pleasing' to Him, a 'sweet odor'; that is, they win His approval of our lives the more appropriately in the service which Christ gives us. Their influence on us is the increase of our spiritual efficiency and power and finally a greater capacity for enjoying spiritual blessings in heaven (1 Cor 3:14).

Some scholars (Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, etc.) regard the memorial supper as a kind of sacrifice which the Christian offers in worship.

5. The Supper as a Sacrifice

Neither Jesus, Paul, the author of He, or Peter, or John, ever hints that in eating the bread and drinking the wine we give a sacrifice to God in Christ. Paul teaches that in partaking of the Supper we "proclaim the Lord's death till he come" (1 Cor 11:26). That is, instead of offering a sacrifice ourselves to God, in partaking of the Supper we proclaim the offering of Christ's sacrifice in which Christ gives us. Their influence on us is the increase of our spiritual efficiency and power and finally a greater capacity for enjoying spiritual blessings in heaven (1 Cor 3:14).

See the above books for the argument supporting this position.

To sum up our conclusions on sacrifice in the NT:

(1) Jesus and NT writers regard the OT sacrificial system as from God, but imperfect, the various sacrifices serving only as types of the one great sacrifice which Christ made.

(2) All the writers, except James and Jude, with Jesus, emphasize the sacrificial idea. Jesus less, giving only the hint of His sacrificial death in the Synoptic Gospels, the author of He putting the climactic emphasis on Christ's sacrifice as the sacrifice of atonement.

(3) As to the relation of Christ's sacrifice to man's salvation, the latter is the achievement of the former, so expressed only twice by Jesus, but emphatically so declared by Paul, the author of He, Peter, and John (Paul and He laying most emphasis on this point).

(4) As to how Christ's sacrifice saves men, Jesus, the author of He, Peter and John suggest the idea of propitiation, while Paul emphatically teaches that man is under a curse, exposed to the displeasure of God, and that Christ's sacrifice secured the reconciliation of God by vindicating His righteousness in punishing sin and His love in saving sinners. Jesus and the leading NT writers agree that Christ saves men through His vicarious suffering.

(5) As to the rational basis of efficacy in Christ's sacrifice, there is no direct discussion in the NT except by the author of He who grounds its final, eternal efficacy in Christ's personality, Divine, royal, sinless and eternal.

(6) As to the conditions of applying Christ's sacrifice, repentance and faith, which lives and fruits in obedience and sacrificial living, are recognized by Jesus and all the leading NT writers as the means of appropriating the benefits of Christ's sacrifice.

(7) By Jesus, Paul, the author of He, Peter and John the Christian life is viewed as the life of sacrifice. Christ's death is at once the cause, motive, SACRIFICE, HUMAN, ἵμαν: As an expression of religious devotion, human sacrifice has been widespread at certain stages of the race's development. The tribes of Western Asia were deeply affected by the practice, probably prior to the settlement of the Hebrews in Pal, and it continued at least down to the 5th century B.C. At times of great calamity, anxiety and danger, parents sacrificed their children as the greatest and most costly offering which they could make to propitiate the anger of the gods and thus secure their favor and help. There is no intimation in the Bible that enemies or captives were sacrificed; only the offering of children by their parents is mentioned. The belief that this offering possessed supreme value is seen in Mic 6:6; where the sacrifice of the firstborn is the climax of a series of offerings which, in a rising scale of values, are suggested as means of propitiating the angry Jehovah. A striking example of the rite as actually practised is seen in 2 K 3:27, where Mesha the king of Moab (made famous by the Moabite Stone), under the stress of a terrible siege, offered his eldest son, the heir-apparent to the throne, as a burnt offering upon the wall of Kir-hareseth. As a matter of fact this horrid act seems to have had the effect of driving off the allies.

Human sacrifice was ordinarily resorted to, no doubt, only in times of great distress, but it seems to have been practised among the old Canaanitic tribes with some frequency (Dt 12:31). The Israelites are said to have borrowed it from their Canaan neighbors (2 K 16:3; 2 Ch 28:3), and as a matter of fact human sacrifices were never offered to Jehovah, but only to various gods of the land. The god who was most frequently worshipped in this way was Moloch or Molech, the god of the Ammonites (2 K 23:11; Lev 18:10). The word used in Jeremiah 31 and 10 attaches to Molech are the words which, in a rising scale of values, are suggested as means of propitiating the angry Jehovah. A striking example of the rite as actually practised is seen in 2 K 3:2, where Mesha the king of Moab (made famous by the Moabite Stone), under the stress of a terrible siege, offered his eldest son, the heir-apparent to the throne, as a burnt offering upon the wall of Kir-hareseth. As a matter of fact this horrid act seems to have had the effect of driving off the allies.

SACRIFICE, HUMAN, ἵμαν: As an expression of religious devotion, human sacrifice has been widespread at certain stages of the race's development. The tribes of Western Asia were deeply affected by the practice, probably prior to the settlement of the Hebrews in Pal, and it continued at least down to the 5th century B.C. At times of great calamity, anxiety and danger, parents sacrificed their children as the greatest and most costly offering which they could make to propitiate the anger of the gods and thus secure their favor and help. There is no intimation in the Bible that enemies or captives were sacrificed; only the offering of children by their parents is mentioned. The belief that this offering possessed supreme value is seen in Mic 6:6, where the sacrifice of the firstborn is the climax of a series of offerings which, in a rising scale of values, are suggested as means of propitiating the angry Jehovah. A striking example of the rite as actually practised is seen in 2 K 3:27, where Mesha the king of Moab (made famous by the Moabite Stone), under the stress of a terrible siege, offered his eldest son, the heir-apparent to the throne, as a burnt offering upon the wall of Kir-hareseth. As a matter of fact this horrid act seems to have had the effect of driving off the allies.

This prominent Jewish sect, though not so numerous as their opponents, the Pharisees, by their wealth and the priestly descent of many of them had an influence which fully balanced that of their more popular rivals. They were a political party, of priestly and aristocratic tendency, as against the more religious and democratic Pharisees.

I. Introductory.—The Talm form suggests derivation from the name of their founder, but the form in NT and Jos would imply connection with the vb. "to be righteous." The probability is, that the name is derived from some person named "Zadok." The most prominent Zadok in history was the Davidic high priest (2 S 8 17; 15 24; I K 1 35), from whom all succeeding high priests were claimed to descend. It is in harmony with this, that in the NT the Sadducees are the party to whom the high priests belonged. On the authority of "Aḥōḥāt d '-Rabbī Nāṭḥan (a 1000 AD), another Zadok is asserted to be he from whom the Sadducees received their name. He was a disciple of Antigonus of Socho (c 250 BC) who taught that love to God should be absolutely disinterested (Pirkē Aḥōḥāt, i.3). "Aḥōḥāt d '-Rabbī Nāṭḥan's account of the derivation of the Sadduceanism from this teaching is purely an imaginary deduction (Charles Taylor, "Sayings of the Jewish Fathers", 112). The majority of authoritative writers prefer to derive the name from Zadok, the colleague of Abiathar, the contemporary of David.

Our main authorities for the teaching of the Sadducees are the NT and Jos. According to the former, the Sadducees denied the resurrection of the body, and did not believe in angels or spirits (Mt 22 23; Ac 28 25). That they did not understand from Jos, but his evidence is to be received with caution, as he was a Pharisee and moreover, had the idea that the Sadducees were to be paralleled with the Epicureans. The Talm is late. Before even the Mishna was committed to writing (c 200 AD) the Sadducees had ceased to exist; before the Gemara was completed (c 700 AD) every valid tradition of their opinions must have vanished. Further, the Talm is Pharisaic. The Fathers, Origen, Hippolytus, Epiphanius and Jerome, have derived their information from late Pharisaic sources.

II. Origin and History.—Jos describes the Sadducees along with the contemporary sects, the Pharisees and the Essenes (Jos, Ant, XIII, v, 9; X, vi, 2; XVII, i, 4, 5; BJ, II, v, 14). His earliest notice of Josephus is after his account of the treaties of Jonathan with the Romans and the Lacedemonians. He indicates his belief that the parties were ancient; but if so, they must have formerly had a name not given by Josephus. It is only in the earlier form of the conflict between the Sadducees and Pharisees was opposition between the priests and the prophets. This, however, is not tenable; in the Southern Kingdom there was no such opposition; whatever the state of matters in the Northern Kingdom, it could have had no influence on opinion in Judaea and Galilee in the times of Our Lord. By others the rivalry is supposed to be inherited from that between the scribes and the priests, but Ezra, the earliest scribe, in the later sense of the term, was a priest with strong sacerdotal sympathies.

Probably the priestly party only gradually crystallized into the sect of the Sadducees. After the return from the exile, the high priest drew to himself all powers, civil and religious. To the Pers. authorities he was, as the Jews, the king of the Jews. The high priest and those about him were the persons who had to do with the heathen supreme government and the heathen nationalities around; this association would tend to lessen their religious fervor, and, by reaction, this roused the zeal of a section of the people for the law. With the Gr. domination the power of the high priests at home was increased, but they became still more subservient to their heathen masters, and were the leaders in the Hellenizing movement. They took no part in the Maccabean struggle, which was mainly supported by their opponents the Hasideans, as they were called (the Hasidaeans of 1 Macc 2 42). When the ḥaṣidīm, having lost sympathy with the Maccabees, sought to reconcile themselves to the priestly party, Akhmus, the legitimate high priest, by his treachery and cruelly soon renewed the breach. The Hasmoneans then were confirmed in the high-priesthood, but were only lukewarmly supported by the ḥaṣidīm.

The division between the Hasmoneans and ḥaṣidīm, or, as they were now called, Pharisees, culminated in the insult offered by 3. Favored mane high priest (Jos, Ant, XIII, 118). Alexandra, the son of Hyrcanus, became a violent partisan party. Toward the end of his life he fell out of sympathy with the Sadducees, and on his deathbed recommended his wife Alexandra Salome, who as guardian to his sons succeeded him, to favor the Pharisees, which she did. In the conflict between her two sons, John Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II, the Sadducees took the side of Aristobulus, the younger. It is evident that the contest was between Jews, the Sadducean candidate prevailed. When the Romans were called in, they gave the advantage to Hyrcanus.

Elezar to John Hyrcanus, the Has-

Thrown into the background by the overthrow of their candidate for the high-priesthood, they soon regained their influence. They allied themselves with the Herodians who had supported Hyrcanus, but were subservient to Rome. Though they believed in the Messiah, they became so to defend their policy against the attacks of the Pharisees. A historical parallel may be found in the Cavaliers of the reign of Charles I, as against the Puritans.

The Sadducees at first regarded the struggle between Our Lord and the Pharisees as a matter with which they had no concern. It was not until Our Lord claimed to be the Messiah, and the excitement of the people consequent on this proved likely to injure the Pharisees, that the Sadducees attacked Him. A secret was shared among the Jews the belief in the coming of a Jewish king who was to rule the world, and that one who appeared claiming to be this Messiah, very soon would the quasi-independence enjoyed by the Jews be taken from them, and with this the influence of the Sadducees would depart. An oligarchy is proverbially sensitive to anything that threatens its stability; a priesthood is unmeasured in its vindictiveness; and the Sadducees were a priestly oligarchy. Hence it is not wonderful that only the death of Jesus would satisfy them.

After the resurrection, the Pharisees became less hostile to the followers of Christ; but the Sadducees maintained their attitude.

Antagonistic. Although a Pharisee, it was as agent to the Apostles after Christ's Departure in the Sanhedrin, and later, under the leadership of Annas, or as he is sometimes called by Jos, Annas, the high priest, they put James the brother of Our Lord to death (Jos, Ant, XX, i, 1) with many others, presumably Christians. The Pharisees were against these proceedings; and even sent messengers to meet Albinus who was coming to succeed Festus as governor to entreat him to remove Annas from the high-priesthood.

With the outbreak of the Jewish war, the Sadducees with their allies the Herodians were driven into the background by the Zealots, John of Gischala and Simon ben Gioras. Annas and Joshua, also called high priest by Jos, were both put to death by the Zealots and their idumaean allies (Jos, BJ, IV, v, 2). With the destruction of the temple and the fall of the Jewish state the Sadducean party disappeared.

III. Dogres of the Sadducees.—As the ascetic party, the Sadducees laid great stress on the ceremonial of sacrifice, and rejected the changes introduced by their opponents unless these found support in the words of the Law.

The most prominent doctrine of the Sadducees was the denial of the immortality of the soul and of the resurrection of the body. The Sadducees believed that Moses had declared the Sadduceans were the descendants of the house of Aaron and that the Messiah was to arise from their midst. The Sadduceans also rejected the traditions concerning the resurrection of the dead, the existence of angels, and the coming of the Messiah.

2. Disbelief in the resurrection, in Spiritual World and in Judgment.

As appearances of angels are mentioned in the Law, it is difficult to harmonize their reverence for the Law with this denial. They have regarded these angelophanies as theophanies. Jos distinctly asserts (Ant, XVIII, i, 4) that the Sadducees believe that the soul dies with the body. They deny, he says, Divine providence (BJ, II, viii, 14). Their theology might be called "religion within the limits of mere sensation."

The Fathers, Hippolytus, Origen and Jerome, credit the Sadducees with regarding the Pentateuch and the prophets as the canonical books of the Bible. The Talmud does not mention this among their errors.

It is certain that they gave more importance to the Pentateuch than to any other of the books of Scripture. Hence Our Lord, in the passage commented on by Origen and Jerome, appeals to the Law rather than to the Prophets or the Psalter.

follows from the little value they put upon the Prophets that they had no sympathy with the Messianic hopes of the Pharisees. It need hardly be said that there was no real connection between Sadduceanism and the doctrine of resurrection. The Sadducees had no other characteristic resemblance which was purely accidental. Their favor for Hellenism would give a color to this identification.

IV. Character of the Sadducees.—Jos says that while the Pharisees have amiable manners and cultivate concord among all, the Sadducees are "very boorish" (BJ, II, viii, 14). This want of manners is not a characteristic usually associated with an aristocracy, or with supreme diplomats, yet it suits what we find in the NT. The cruel horseplay indulged in when Our Lord was tried before the irregular meeting of the Sanhedrin (Mt. 26.67, 68), the shows of Annas at the trial of Paul before the same tribunal who "emits him on the mouth," show them to be rough and overbearing. What Jos relates of the conduct of Annas (or Annas) in regard to James, above referred to, agrees with this. Jos, however, does not make any such condemnation of Annas in the NT (IV, v, 2) he calls him "a man venerable and most just." Only the violence which, as Jos relates in the chapter immediately preceding that from which we have quoted, Annas resorted to against the Zealotsbetter than the dict of Jos than the later. As to their general character Jos mentions that when the Sadducees became magistrates they conformed their judgments to Pharisaic opinion, otherwise they would not have been terrors of Ant, XVIII, 1.

As noted above, the Talmud account is untrustworthy, late and Pharisaic. The Gemara from which most of the references were taken was not committed to writing till 7 centuries after Christ, when the traditions concerning the Sadducees, such as had survived, had filtered through 20 generations of Pharisaism. Despite this lengthened time and suspicious medium, these may be some truth in the representations of the Talmudic rabbins. In Pesahim 57a it is said, "Woes to him on account of the house of Hanan [Annas], woe's me on account of the house of Kastrius, woe's me on account of their house, woe's me on account of their house, woe's me on account of their house." These voices represent the Pharisees saying: "Would these have judged as we?"

2. Talmudic Accounts of the Sadducees.

Accounts of the Sadducees when the traditions concerning the Sadducees, such as had survived, had filtered through 20 generations of Pharisaism.

The Sadducean high priests made Hophni and Phinehas too much their models. Annas and his sons had booths in the courts of the temple for the sale of sacrificial requisites, tables for money-changers, as ordinary coins had to be changed into the shekels of the sanctuary. From all these the priests of the high-priestly caste derived profit at the expense of degrading the temple (Ederhalam, Life and Times of Jesus, I, 371 ff). They did not, as did the Pharisees, pay spiritual religion the homage of hypocrisy; they were frankly irreligious. While officials of religion, they were devoid of its spirit. This, however, represents an earlier stage.

The favor for the memory of John Hyrcanus shown by the writer of 1 Mace (16.23.34) renders probable Geiger's opinion that the author was a Sadducee. He shows that Hyrcanus devoted his life to the temple: his outlook on life is eminently sane, and his history is trustworthy. He has sympathy with the patriotic spirit of the Jews, but none with the religious scruples which led them to desert Judas Maccabaeus. That the writer of Eccles from his silence as to the national expectation of a Messiah and the hope of a future life was also a Sadducee, is almost certain.

V. The Relation of the Sadducees to Jesus.—As the doctrines and practices of the Sadducees were quite alien from the teaching of our Lord, the question has occurred as to whether there were any points of agreement.

1. Less Denounced by Jesus Than the Pharisees. —Our Lord made no allusions to the Sadducees save along with their opponents the Pharisees; whereas He frequently denounced the Pharisees alone. As His position, both doctrinal and practical, was much nearer that of the Pharisees, it was necessary that He should clearly mark Himself off from them. There was not the same danger of His position being confused with that of the Sadducees. Jos informs us that the Sadducees had influence with the rich; Jesus drew His adherents chiefly from the poor, from whom also the Pharisees drew. The latter opposed Him all the more that He was sapping their source of strength; hence He had to defend Himself against them. Further, the Gospels mainly recount our Lord's ministry in Galilee, whereas the Sadducees were chiefly to be found in Jerusalem and its neighborhood; hence there may have been severe denunciations of the Sadducees that have not come down to us.

The Sadducees probably regarded Jesus as a harmless fanatic who by His denunciations was weakening the influence of the Pharisees. Only when His claim to be the Messiah brought Him within the sphere of practical politics did they desire to intervene. When they determined to come into conflict with Jesus, they promptly decreed His arrest and death; only the arrest was to be secret, “lest a tumult arise among the people” (Mt 26:5). In their direct encounter with Our Lord in regard to the resurrection (Mt 22:25ff.; Mk 12:20ff.; Lk 20:29ff.), there is an element of contempt implied in the illustration which they bring, as if it was almost the end they failed to take Him seriously. For Literature see PHARISEES.

SADUK, sad'uk (A. Fritzsche, Σάδουκειος; Saddingus, Σάδδουκες; Saddoukos; Saddokeous; Saddoulkos; AV Saducee): The high priest, an ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd 8:2) = "Zadok" in Ezr 7:2 = "Saddo" in 2 Esd 11.

SADOC, sad'dok: (1) (Lat Sadosch): An ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd 1:1) = "Zadok" in Ezr 7:2 = "Sadduk" in 2 Esd 8:2. (2) (Σαδώκ, Saddok): A descendant of Zerubbabel and ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1:14).

SAFFRON, saf'run (κόκκινος, kókkinos; krókos): Identical with the Arab. kurkum, the same as zaférân, "saffron." The source of the true saffron is Crocus sativus (N.O. Iridaceae), a plant cultivated in Pal; there are 8 wild varieties in all of which, as in the cultivated species, the orange-colored styles and stigmas yield the yellow dye, saffron. C. sativus is treated in C. sativus and C. rhodostemon. There is a kind of bastard saffron plant, the Carthamus tinctorius (N.O. Compositae), of which the orange-colored flowers yield a dye like saffron.

SAIL, sail, SAILOR, sâl'er. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, 3; III, 2.

SAINTS, sânts: In AV 3 words are thus rendered: (1) wâdîn, kadôshôl (in Dn the same root occurs several times in its Aram. form, wâdîn, kad-of the Saints" (Rom 16:2) and as such "as becometh saints" (Eph 5:3). The thought of the holy character of the "saints," which is now so common as almost completely to obscure the real thought of the NT writers, already lay in their thinking very close to the clear designation of saints and their consecration by God to His own.

SALAMI, sa-lä’mi-il (B A, Σαλαμιφ, Saloniti, S Salonit, Σαλονίτης, an ancestor of Judith (Jth 8:1) = AV "Samael."" SALAMIS, sa-la’mis ( prá the ancient N of Cyprus, situated some 3 miles S of the ancient capital and nearest good harbor and was the most populous and flourishing town of Cyprus in the Hellenic and Roman periods, carrying on a vigorous trade with the ports of Cilicia and Syria. Its population was mixed, consisting of Gr and Phoen. elements. The former, however, gave its tone and color to the city, and the chief cult and temple were those of Salaminian Zeus.

Tradition represented Salamis as founded soon after the fall of Troy by Teucer, the prince of Gr archers according to the narrative of the Iliad, who named it after his home, the island of Salamis off the Attic coast. In the 6th cent. BC it figures as an important Hellenic city, ruled by a line of kings reputed to be descended from Teucer and strengthened by an alliance with Cyrene (Herd, iv. 162). Gorgus, who was on the throne in 496 BC, refused to join the Ionian revolt against Persia; but the townsmen, led by his brother Onuchus, took up arms in the struggle for freedom. A crushing defeat, however, inflicted under the walls of Salamis, restored the island to its Pers overlords, who reinstated Gorgus as a vassal prince (Reis. of v. 1591). In 449 a Gr fleet under Athenian leadership defeated the Phoen. navy, which was in the service of Persia, off Salamis; but the Athenians, for whatever reason, failed to press the battle to a decided anti-Hellenic reaction, until the able and vigorous Salaminian prince Euphorbus, who was a warm friend of the Athenians (Isocrates, Euyp) and a successful champion of Hellenism. In 306 a Salaminian nobleman was found guilty of Salamis, in which Demetrius Poliorcetes defeated the forces of Ptolemy the Great, thus ending the struggle of Egypt for 11 years. In 58 BC the town came into Ptolemy's hands and, with the rest of the island, remained an appanage of the Egypt king until the incorporation of Cyprus in the Roman Empire (58 BC).

When Barnabas and Paul, accompanied by John Mark, set out on their 1st missionary journey, they sailed from Seleucia, the seaport of Antioch, and landed at Salamis, about 150 miles distant, as the harbor nearest to the Syrian coast. There they preached the gospel in the synagogues of the Jews (Acts 13:5); the phrase is worth noting as pointing to the existence of several synagogues and thus of a large Jewish community in Salamis. Of work among the Gentiles we hear nothing, nor is any indication given either of the duration of the apostles' visit or of the success of their mission; but it would seem that after a short stay they proceeded to the W of the island, 50 miles, to Paphos. The words seem to imply that they visited all, or at least most, of the towns in which there were Jewish communities. Paul did not return to Salamis, but Barnabas doubtless went there on his 2nd missionary journey (Acts 15:8), and tradition states that he was married there in Nero's reign, on the site marked by the monastery named after him.

In 116 AD the Jews in Cyprus rose in revolt and massacred 240,000 Greeks and Romans. The rising was crushed with the utmost severity and the island was almost completely depopulated; and its destruction was afterward consummated by earthquakes in 332 and 342 AD. It was rebuilt, though on a much smaller scale, by the emperor Constantine II (337-61 AD) under the name Constantin, and became the metropolitan see of the island. The most famous of its bishops was Epiphanius, the staunch opponent of heresy, who held the see from 367 to 403. In 647 the city was finally destroyed by the Saracens. Considerable remains of ancient buildings still remain on the site; an account of the excavations carried on there in 1890 by Messrs. J.A. R. Murno and H. A. Tubbs under the auspices of the Cyprus Exploration Fund will be found in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, XII, 58-68.

SALASDÁI, sa-las’á-th’ (A, Σαλασάθ, Saladai, B, Σαρασάθ, Sarasáathi, C, Sarathai, Saris- sáati) an ancestor of Judith (Jth 8:1).

SALATHIEL, sa-lä’th-é-il: (1) (Σαλαθήθ, Salathith): AV; Gr form of "Saelith" (thus RV). The father of Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5:48-56; 6:2; Mt 1:12; Lk 3:28). (2) Another name of Estras (2 Esd 3:1, "Salaithie").

SALE, säl’ (זְמַקְר, смкăr): The word is used: (1) in the sense of the transaction (Lev 25:30); (2) in the sense of the limit of time involved in the transaction (Lev 25:27); (3) in the sense of the price paid in the transaction (Lev 19:9), though it may be the same as (1) above.

SALEKH, sa’lé-ka, salchah, salchah, sal’ka (Σαλγχ, salghch; B, Σεσκα, Sescah, יבש, Achh, Σαλδά, Solá, A, אבכה, Elchhā, ašelkhā, ašelkhā, Σαχά, Selchā): This place first appears in Dt 3:10 as marking the eastern boundary of Bashan. It is named as one of the cities in which Og, king of Bashan, ruled (Josh 13:5). It must certainly have been included in the portion given to the half tribe of Manasseh, "all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan," although it is not named among the cities that fell to him (Josh 13:29 f). At a later time we are told that Gad dwelt over against the Reubenites in the land of Bashan unto Salech (1 Ch 5:11). The boundaries of the tribes probably changed from time to time.

The ancient city is represented by the modern Salkhad, a city in a high and strong position at the southern end of Jebel ed-Drūze (the Mountain of Bashan). On a volcanic hill rising some 900 ft. above the town, in what must have been the crater, stands the castle. The view from the battlements, as the present writer can testify, is one of the finest of E. of the Jordan, including the rich hollow of the Haurán, Mt. Hermon, and all the intervening country to the mountains of Samaria, with vast reaches of the desert to the S. and to the E. The old Rom roads are still clearly seen running without curve or deviation across the country to Bozrah and Derah, away to the S.E. over the desert to Keltai el-Drūz, and eastward to the Pers Gulf. The castle was probably built by the Romans. Restored by the Arabs, it was a place of strength in Crusading times. It has now fallen on evil days.

The modern town, containing many ancient houses, lies mainly on the slopes S.E. of the castle. The inhabitants are Druzes, somewhat noted for turba-lence. In the recent rising of the Druzes (1911) the place suffered heavily from bombardment by the Turks. For water-supply it is entirely dependent on cisterns filled during the rainy season.

SALEM, sâlîm (םָלִים, shâlîm; Σαλημ, Salîm): The name of the city of which Melchizedek was king (Gen 14: 18; He 7 1, 2; cf Ps 76 2). To all appearance it lay near and "the Vale of Shaveh," described as "the King's Vale." The general opinion among the Jews was that Salem was the same as Jerus, as stated by Jos (Ant I, x, 2), who adds (VII, iii, 2) that it was known as Solyma (Σαλημα, Sôlûma, variants, according to Whiston, Salem and Hierosolyma) in the time of Abraham. It was also reported that the city and its temple were called Solyma by Homer, and he adds that the name in Heb means "security." This identification with Jerus was accepted by Onkelos and all the Tgs, as well as by the early Christians. The Samaritans have always identified Salem with Salim, E. of Nahalîmus, but Jewish and Christian tradition is more likely to be correct, supported, as it is, by Ps 76 2.

The testimony of the Am Tab is apparently negative. Knudtzon's no. 287 mentions "the land" and "the lands of Salam," twice, with the prefix for "city:" no. 289 likewise has this prefix twice; and no. 290 refers to "the city" or "a city of Amarna Tablets (Berlin, pl. 1197). As there is no prefix of any kind before the element salam, it is not probable that this is name of either a man (the city's founder) or a god (like the Assyr Šalmanu). The form in Sennacherib's inscriptions (cf Taylor Cylinder, III, 50), Ursalimmu, gives the whole as a single word in the nominative, the double m implying that the ì was long. As the Assyrians pronounced ì as sh, it is likely that the Urusalimites did the same, hence the Heb yĕrhôbalîm, with sh. See Jerusalem.

SALEM (Σαλημος, Salêmôs; AV Salum): An ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd 8 1) = "Shallum" in Ezr 7 2 = "Salem" in 2 Esd 1 1.

SALEMAS, sal'ē-mas, sa-lē'mas (Late Salome; AV Sadamias): An ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd 1 1) = "Shallum" in Ezr 7 2; called also "Salem" in 1 Esd 8 1.

SALIM, sâlîm (Σαλημ, Salîm): A place evidently well known, since the position of Aeonon, the springs where John was baptized, was defined by reference to it: they were "near to Salim" (Jn 3 23). It must be sought on the W. of the Jordan, as will be seen from comparison of Jn 1 28; 3 26; 10 40. Many identifications have been proposed: e.g., that of Afford with Shilhem and Ain in the S. of Judah; that of Bölshing with 'Ain Kârim, and that of Barday, who would place Salim in Wady Salem near 'Anâda, making Aeonon the springs in Wady Fâr'ah. These are all ruled out by their distance from the district where John is known to have been at work. If there were no other objection to that suggested by Conder (Tent Work, 49 f) following Robinson (BR, III, 333) with Salim in the plain E. of Nablûs, Aeon being 'Ainân in Wady Fâr'ah, it would be sufficient to say that this is the very heart of Samaria, and therefore impossible. In any case the position of Aeon, 6 miles distant, with a high mountain intervening, would hardly be defined by the village of Salîm, with the important city of Shechem quite as near, and more easily accessible.

ONOM places Aeneon 8 Roman miles S. of Scythopolis (Beisâm), near Salvumius (Sâlim) and the Jordan. This points to Tell Rûdîyah, on the northern side of which is a shrine known locally as Sheikh Salîm. Not far off, by the banks of Umân el-'Amâdân, there are seven copious fountains which might well be called Amon, "place of springs." There is reason to believe that this district did not belong to Samaria, but was included in the lands of Scythopolis, which was an important member of the league of ten cities.

SALIMOTH, sal-'imoth (B, Σαλημοθ, Salêmôth, A, Α'ςαλημοθ, Α'salêmôth; the latter is due to a wrong division of syllables; AV Assalimoth): The same as "Shelemith" (Ezr 8 10). S., the son of Josaphias, of the family of Banias, and with him 130 men went up to Jerus with Ezra (1 Esd 8 36).

SALLAI, sal'ā, sal'ah (טיל, salây; Σαλημ, Salôm, A, Σαλα, Σαλα, Salâ, with variants): (1) Eponym of a Benjamite family which settled at Jerus after the return, descendants of "Salal" (1 Ch 9 7; Neh 11 7 8); the pedigrees of Sallal differ decidedly in the two passages. Curtius (ICC) suggests that "son of Hodaviah, the son of Hase'mah" (Ch) is a corruption or derivation of "Judah the son of Hassenuah" (Neh).

(2) Name of a priestly family (Neh 12 20), called "Sallu" in ver 7.

SALLU, salū. See SALLAI.

SALLUMUS, sa-lē'mus, sa-lē'mos (Σαλημοςους, Sôlômosousoi): One of the porters who had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 25) = "Shallum" in Ezr 10 24; called also "Salum" in 1 Esd 5 28.

SALMA, sal'ma. See SALMON.

SALMAI, salmî, salmâ'î (שָלָם, salmây, salmây; AV Shalmi [AV in Neh 7 48 is "Shalmai" = Ezr 2 40; RV "Salmai"]: The eponym of a family of Nethan, called "Shamali" in Ezr 2 46 (Kêrê, ש�מלויא, shamlîy; Qôra, קְמֵלַי, shemlay, K'tibhîth, שֶׁמֶלְי, shemlay), followed by AV text, "Shalma"); B, Samâx, Samânî, A, Shôelâ, Salâmî; Neh 7 48, B, Salâmî, Salâmî, A, Shôelâ, Salâmî, B, Samâx, Samâlî. The name suggests a foreign origin. In 1 Esd 5 30 the corresponding name is "Sabai".

SALMANASAR, sal-ma'na'sar (2 Esd 13 40) = Shâlmaneser (q.v.).

SALMON, sal'mon, SALMA (שָלָם, salmôn, "investiture" [Ruth 4 21], יִשְׂרָאֵל, isrâ'el, "clothing" [Ruth 4 20], יָשִׂרְאֵל, isrâ'el; 1 Ch 11 51, 54; Σαλμών, Salômôn): (1) The father of Boaz the husband of Ruth, and thus the grandfather of Jesse, David's father (Ruth 4 20 21). He is mentioned in both the genealogies of Jesus (Mt 1 4 5; Lk 3 32). From Mt 1 5 we learn that he married Rahab, by whom he begat Boaz.

(2) In 1 Ch 2 51 ff, we read of a Salma, "the father of Beth-lehem," a son of Caleb the son of Hur. He is also said to be the father of "the Netophathites, Atroth-beth-joab, and half of the Ma'nathathites, the Zorites, and several 'families of scribes.'" See also SALMON.

SALMONE, sal-mô'nê (Σαλμωνη, Salômône): Acts 27 7. See PHOENIX.

SALOM, sālō'm (Σαλόμ, Salōm):
(1) The father of Heklias (Bar 1:7). Gr form of "Salathiel".
(2) AV=RV "Salu" (1 Macc 2:26).

SALOME, sa-lō'mē (Σαλόμη, Salōmē):
(1) One of the holy women who accompanied with Jesus in Galilee and ministered to Him (Mt 27:56; Mk 16:10, 41, 47). She was present at the crucifixion (15:40), and was among those who came to the tomb of Jesus on the resurrection morning (16:12). Comparison with Mt 27:56 clearly identifies her with the wife of Zebedee. It is she, therefore, who made the ambitious request for her sons James and John is recorded in Mt 20:20-24; Mk 10:35-40. From Jn 19:25 many infer that she was a sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus (thus Meyer, Luthardt, Alford); others (see Godet) dispute the inference.
(2) Salome was the name of the daughter of Herodias who danced before Herod, and obtained as a reward the head of John the Baptist (Mt 14:3-11; Mk 6:17-28; cf. Jos. Ant., XVIII, v.4). She is not named in the Gospels.

SALT, sōlt (σάλσ, melih; ἀσά, ἡδα, ἢδα, ἢδε): Common salt is considered by most authorities as an essential ingredient of our food. Most people intentionally season their cooking with more or less salt for the sake of palatability. Others depend upon the small quantities which naturally exist in water and many foods to furnish the necessary amount of salt for the body. Either too much salt or the lack of it creates undesirable disturbance in life. The Men and animals alike instinctively seek for this substance to supplement or improve their regular diet. The ancients appreciated the value of salt for seasoning food (Job 6:6). So necessary was it that they dignified it by making it a requisite part of sacrifices (Lev 2:13; Ezr 6:9; 7:22; Ezk 43:24; Mk 9:49). In Nu 18:19; 2 Ch 13:5, a "covenant of salt" is mentioned (cf Mk 9:49). This custom of pledging friendship or confirming a compact by eating food containing salt was common among Arab-speaking peoples. The Arab, word for "salt" and for its "compact" or "treaty" is the same. Doughty in Arabia had more than once to the superstitious belief of the Arabs in the "salt covenant," to save his Arab he had in his tent even his worst enemy and has eaten salt (food) with him, he is bound to protect his guest as long as he remains. See COVENANT OF SALT.

The chief source of salt in Pal is from the extensive deposits near the "sea of salt" (see Dead Sea), where there are literally mountains and valleys of salt (2 S 8:13; 2 K 14:7; 1 Ch 18:12; 2 Ch 26:11). On the seacoast the inhabitants frequently gather the sea salt. They fill the rock crevices with sea water and leave it for the hot summer sun to evaporate. After evaporation the salt crystals can be collected. As salt-gathering is a government monopoly in Turkey, the government sends men to pollute the salt which is being surreptitiously crystallized, so as to make it unfit for eating. Another extensive supply comes from the salt lakes in the Syrian desert E. of Damascus and toward Palmyra. All native salt is more or less bitter, due to the presence of other salts such as magnesium sulphate.

Salt is used not only as a food, but as an antiseptic in medicine. Newborn babes were bathed and salted (Ezk 16:4), a custom still prevailing. The Arabs of the desert consider it so necessary, that in the absence of salt they bathe their infants in camels' urine. Elisha is said to have healed the waters of Jericho by casting a crust of salt into the spring (2 K 2:20f). Abimelech sowed the rubies of Shechem with salt to prevent a new city from arising in its place (Jgs 9:45). Lot's wife turned to a pillar of salt (Gen 19:26).

SALT, CITY OF: The pillar of salt is emblematic of loyalty and friendship (see above). A person who has once joined in a "salt covenant" with God then breaks it is only to be cast out (cf Mt 5:13; Mk 9:50). Saltiness typified barrenness (Dt 29:23; 1 Esd 7:6). The types compared the same mouth giving forth blessings and cursings to the fountain of providing both sweet and salt water (Jas 3:11f).

SALT, CITY OF (יִבְנַיָּה הַשָּׁרוֹן), 'tr ha-melah: Αυταὶ ταῖς ἀλαίσι, hai pōleisis halais): One of the six cities in the wilderness of Judah mentioned between Nibshan and Engedi (Josh 15:62). The site is very uncertain. The large and important Tell el-Milh (i.e. "the salt hill"), on the route from Hebron to Akaba, is possible.

SALT, COVENANT OF. See COVENANT OF SALT.

SALT, PILLAR OF. See LOT; SALT; SIDDIM; SLIME.

SALT SEA. See Dead Sea.

SALT, VALLEY OF (נֶשֶׁר הַשָּׁרוֹן, ge ha-melah): The scene of battles, firstly, between David or his lieutenant Abishai and the Edomites (2 S 8:13; 1 Ch 18:12; Ps 60, title), and later between Amaziah and these same foes (2 K 14:7; 2 Ch 25:11). It is tempting to connect this "Valley of Salt" with es Serekh, the marshy, salt-impregnated plain which extends from the southern end of the Dead Sea to the foot of the cliffs, but in its present condition it is an almost impossible place for a battle of any sort. The ground is so soft and spongy that a wide detour around the edges has to be made by those wishing to get from one side to the other. It is, too, highly probable that in earlier times the whole of this low-lying area was covered by the waters of the Dead Sea. It is far more natural to identify ge ha-melah with the Wady el-Milh ("Valley of Salt"), one of the three valleys which unite at Beersheba to form the Wady es-Sheba'. These valleys, el-Milh and es-Sheba', together make a natural frontier to Canaan.

SALT-WORT, sōlt-wōrt (σαλαριά, melitē, a word connected with melih, "salt," tr in LXX ἀλαρια, ἀλίμων, hēlimerion; AV mallow): The halimos of the Greeks is the sea orache, Atriplex halimus, a silvery whitish shrub which flourishes upon the shores of the Dead Sea alongside the ruin (see JUNIPER). Its leaves are oval and somewhat like those of an olive. They have a sour flavor and would never be eaten when better food was obtainable (Job 30:4). The "mallows" is due to the apparent similarity of the Heb mallit-h to the Gr μαλλίς, mallowe, which is the Lat melon and Eng. "mallow." Certain species of mallow known in Arabic, as 3ṭāt, khubbātē, are very commonly eaten by the poor of Pal.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

SALU, sālū (סָלָע, gālā; LXX Ὁλόμ, Salōn, Σαλων, Ἁλόα, Sału; AV has "Salom" in 1 Macc 2:20): A prince and the head of the tribe of Simeon and the father of Zimri who was slain by Phinehas along with the Midianitish woman whom he had brought to the camp of Israel (Nu 25:14; 1 Macc 2:26).

SALUM, sálūm (Σαλωμ, Salōm): The head of the one of the families of porters (1 Esd 5:28; om. in B) = "Shallum" in Ezr 2:42; 10:24; Neh 7:45 = "Sallumus" in 1 Esd 9:25.

SALUTATION, sal-ō-ta’shun (ἀσπασμός, aspas-mós): A greeting which might be given in person, orally (Lk 1:20-41:44), or in writing, usually at the close of a letter (1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18; 2 Thess 3:17; Acts 16:3). See σαλώμ (joy) in Jas 1:1). The Pharisees and Jews loved salutations in public places (Mt 23:7; Mk 12:38, AV "greeting," RV "salutation"); Lk 11:43; 20:46). Often these salutations were very elaborate, involving much time in prostrations, embracing, etc. When Jesus therefore sent out the Seventy, He forbade salvation by the way (Lk 10:4), though He ordinarily encouraged proper civilities of this sort (Mt 5:47; 10:12).

LITERATURE

In EV the words "salvation," "save," are not technical theological terms, but denote simply "deliverance," in almost any sense the latter word can have. In systematic theology, however, "salvation" denotes the whole process by which man is delivered from all that would prevent his attaining to the highest good that God has prepared for him. Or, by a transferred sense, "salvation" denotes the actual enjoyment of that good. So, while these technical senses are often associated with the Gr or Heb words τρέχειν "save," etc, yet they are still more often used in connection with other words or represented only by the general sense of a passage. And so a collection of the original terms for "save," etc, is of use only for the student doing minute detailed work, while it is the purpose of the present article to present a general view of the Bih. doctrine of salvation.

I. IN THE OT.—(1) As long as revelation had not raised the need that separates this life from the next, the Israelite thought of his high-
1. General cost good as long life in a prosperous
Pal, as described most typically in Dt 28:1-14. But a definite religious idea was present also, for the "land of milk and honey," even under angelic protection, was worthless without access to God (Ex 33:1-4), to know whom gives happiness (Isa 11:9; Hab 2:14; Jer 31:34).

Such a concept is normal for most of the OT, but there are central significances of huge emphases of it. That Israel should receive God's characteristic of righteousness is a part of the ideal (Isa 1:26; 3:4; 32:1-8; 33:24; Jer 31:33; Ezk 36:25; 26; Zec 8; Dn 9 24; Ps 81:10-12). God was found in the extension of Israel's good to the surrounding nations (Mic 4:1-4; Isa 2:2-4; 45:5; Zec 2:11; 8:2223; Isa 60:66:19-21; Zec 14:16-17, etc), even to the extension of the legitimate sacrificial worship to the soil of Egypt (Isa 19:22). Pal was insufficient for the enjoyment of God's gifts, and a new heaven and a new earth were to be received (Isa 66:17; 66:22), and a share in the glories was not to be denied even to the dead (Isa 26:19; Dn 12:2). And, among the people so glorified, God would dwell in person (Isa 60:19; 21:20; Zec 2:10-13). (2) Salvation, then, means deliverance from all that interferes with the enjoyment of these blessings. So it takes countless forms — deliverance from natural plagues, from internal dissensions, from external enemies, or from the subjugation of conquerors (the exile, particularly). As far as enemies constitute the threatening danger, the prayer for deliverance is often based on their evil character (Ps 101, etc). But for the individual all these evils are summed up in the word "death," which was thought to terminate all relation to God and all possibility of enjoying His blessings (Ps 115:17; Isa 38:18, etc). And so "death" became established as the antonym to "salvation," and in this sense the word has persisted, although the equation of salvation = physical death has long been transcended. But death and its attendant evils are worked by God's wrath, and so it is from this wrath (that salvation is sought (Josh 7:26, etc). And thus, naturally, salvation is from everything that raises that wrath, above all from sin (Eek 36:25,26, etc).

(1) At first the "unit of salvation" was the nation (less prominently the family), i.e. a man though righteous could lose salvation through the faults of others. A father could bring a curse on his children (2 S 21:1-14), a king on his subjects (2 S 24), or an unknown sinner could bring guilt on an entire community (Dt 21:1-9). (On the other hand, ten righteous would have saved Sodom (Gen 18:30). And the principle of personal responsibility was grasped but slowly. It is enunciated partly in Dt 24:16 (cf Jer 31:29-30), definitely in Eek 14:12-20; 33:1-20, and fairly consistently in the Pss. But even Ezekiel still held that five-and-twenty could defile the whole nation (S 16), and he had not the premises for resolving the problem — that temporal disasters need not mean the loss of salvation.

(2) But even when it was realized that a man lost salvation through his own sin, the converse did not follow. Salvation came, not by the man's mere merit, but because the man belonged to a nation peculiarly chosen by God. God had made a covenant with Israel and His fidelity insured salvation: the salvation comes from God because of His promise or (in other words) because of His name. Indeed, the great failing of the people was to trust too blindly to this promise, an attitude denounced continually by the prophets throughout (from, say, Am 3:2 to Mt 3:9). And yet even the prophets admit a real truth in the attitude for despite Israel's sins, eventual salvation is certain. Eek 20 states this baldly: there has been nothing good in Israel and there is nothing good in her at the prophet's own day, but, notwithstanding, God will give her restoration (cf Isa 8:17-19; Jer 32:15-18, etc).
Salvation
THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

Hence, of the human conditions, whole-hearted trust in God is the most important. (Belief in God is, of course, never argued in the Bible.) Salvation is 3. Faith Inconsistent with such trust are, for instance, seeking aid from other nations (Isa 30:1–5), putting reliance in human skill (2 Ch 16:12), or forsaking Yahweh through fear (Jer 42).
In Isa 26:20 entire passivity is demanded, and in 2 K 13:19 lukewarmness in executing an apparently meaningless command is rebuked. (1) Next in importance is the attainment of a moral standard, expressed normally in the various codes of the Law. But fulfilment of the letter of the commandment was by no means all that was required. (For instance, the Law permitted the selling of a debtor into slavery (Dt 16:12), but the reckless use of the creditor's right is sharply condemned (Neh 5:1–13). The prophets are never weary of giving short formulas that will exclude such supra-legalism and reduce conduct to a puremotive: "Hate the evil, and love the good, and establish justice in the gate" (Am 5:15); "To do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God" (Mic 6:8). And the chief emphasis is properly placed usually, in the books, esp. Ps 119 (cf Ps 147:20). (2) Certain breaches of the Law had no pardon, but were visited with death at once, even despite repentance and confession (Josh 7). But for the most part it is promised that no one need remove the guilt of the sin if the sin be forsaken (Ezek 18) or, in the case of a sin that would not be repeated, if contrition be felt (2 S 12). Suffering may be a part of salvation by bringing knowledge of sin to the conscience, the exile being the most important example (Ezek 36:27). But almost always it is assumed that the possibility of keeping the Law is in man's own power, Dt 30:11–14 stating this explicitly, while the Wisdom Books equate virtue with learning. Consequently, an immense advance was made when men felt the need of God's help to keep the Law, the need of the inscription of the Laws on the heart (Jer 31:31–34). So an outlook was opened to a future in which God would make the nation righteous (see references in 1, above). Instead of repentance as expiating past sins was an act of God's mercy. And so His mercy instituted other and additional sacrificial means of expiation, most notably that of the sacrifices. But a theology of sacrifice is conveyed most usefully by the OT, for Lev 17:11 is too incidental and too obscure to be an exception. The Christian (or very late Jewish) interpretations of the ritual laws lack all solidarity of exegetical foundation, despite their one-time prevalence. Nor is the study of origins of much help for the meaning attached to the rites by the Jews in historic times. General ideas of offering, of self-denial, of propitiation of wrath, and of entering into communion with God assuredly existed. But in the advanced stages of the religion there is no evidence that sacrifices were thought to produce their effect because of any of these things, but solely because God had commanded the sacrifices. (2) Most sins required a sacrifice as part of the act of repentance, although in case of injury done to the neighbor, only after reparation had been made. It is not quite true that for conscientious sins no sacrifices were appointed, for in Lev 5:1; 6:1–3, sins are included that could not be committed through mere negligence. (1) The reference to such sins may not be construed too rigorously. (3) Sacrifices as means of salvation are taught chiefly by Ezek, while at the rebuilding of the temple (Hag, Zec) and the depression that followed (Mal), they were much in the foreground, but the pre-Christian prophets have little to say about their positive value (Jer 7:22 is the nadir). Indeed, in pre-Christian times the danger was the exaltation of sacrifice at the expense of morality, esp. with the peace offering, which could quite turn into a money-making deal (Am 5:21–24; Isa 22:13; cf Prov 7:14). Attempts were made to "strengthen" the sacrifices to Yahweh by the use of ethnic rites ( Hos 4:14; Isa 66:1–5), even with the extreme of human sacrifice (Jer 7:31; Ezek 20:26). But insistence on the strict conformity of the rite, allowing increasing emphasis laid on the sin and trespass offerings did away with the worst of the abuses. And many of the Ps, esp. 66,118, give beautiful evidence of the devotion that could be nourished by the sacrificial rites. Of the other means of salvation the ritual law (not always sharply distinguishable from the moral law) bully rather large in the legislation, but is not prominent in the Law prophets. Requisite to salvation was the abstention from certain acts, articles of food, etc., such abstention seeming to reside at the background of the term "holiness." But a ritual breach was often a matter of moral duty (burning the dead, etc), and, for such breaches, the ritual means of expiation as a matter dropped. Evidently such things lay rather on the circumference of the religion, even to Ezekiel, with his anxious zeal against the least defilement. The highest ritual point is touched by Zec 9:5–7, when it is said that the rite would not be unfit to use in the temple (cf Jer 31:38–40). Yet, even with this perfect holiness, sacrifices would still have a place as a means by which the holiness could be increased. Indeed, this more "positive" view of sacrifice was doubtless retained in the NT.
II. Intermediate Literature.—(1) The great change, compared with the earlier period, is that the idea of God had become more transcendent. But this did not necessarily mean an increase in religious value, for there was a corresponding tendency to take God out of relation to the world by an intellectualizing process. This, when combined with the persistence of the older concept of salvation in this life only, resulted in an emptying of the religious instinct and in indifferentism. This tendency is well represented in Ecclesiastes, more acutely in Sir, and in NT times it dominated the thought of the Sadducees. On the other hand the expansion of the idea of salvation to correspond with the higher conception of God was through some of the apocalyptic life and created the new literary form of apocalyptic literature, represented in the OT esp. by Zec 9:14–17; Isa 24–27, and above all by Dnl. And in the intermediate literature all shades of thought between the two extremes are represented. But too much emphasis can hardly be laid on the fact that this intermediate teaching is in many regards simply faithful to the OT. Almost anything that can be found in the OT—with the important exception of the note of joyfulness of Dt, etc.—can be found again here. (2) Of the conceptions of the highest good the lowest is the Epicureanism of Sir. The highest is probably that of 2 Esd 7 91–98 RV: "To behold the face of him whom in their lifetime they served," the last touch of materialism being eliminated. Indeed, real materialism is notably absent in the period, even En 10 17–19 being less exuberant than the fancies of such early Christian writers as Papias. Individualism is generally taken for granted, but that the opposite opinion was by no means dormant even at an early date is shown by Mt 3:9. The idea of a special privilege of Israel, however, of course pervades all the literature, Sib Or 6 and Jub being the most exclusive books and the XII Tests. the most broad-hearted. In place of national privilege, though, is sometimes found the still less edifying feature of party privilege (Ps Sol; En 94:105), the most offensive case being the assertion of En 90 6–9 that the (inactive) Israel will be saved by the exertions of the "little lamb" Pharisees, before whom every knee shall bow in the Messianic kingdom.

(1) The conceptions of the moral demands for salvation at times reach a very high level, esp. in the XII Tests. (making every allowance for Christian interpretations). The spirit of love worketh together with the law of God in long-suffering unto the salvation of men" (Test. Gad 4:7) is hardly unworthy of St. Paul, and even Job can say, "Let each love his brother in mercy and justice, and let none wish the other evil" (36:8). But the great tendency is to view God's law merely as a series of written statutes, making no demands except those gained from a rigid construing of the letter. In Lk 10:29, "Who is my neighbor?" is a real question—if he is not my neighbor I need not love him! So duties not literally commanded were settled by utilitarian motives, as outside the domain of religion, and the unhealthy phenomenon of works of supererogation made its appearance (Lk 17:10). The writer of Wisd can feel and rightly allow of salvation because idolatry had been abstained from (15:4; contrast St. Paul's polemic in Rom 2). And discussions about "greatest commandments" caused character in its relation to religion to be forgotten. (2) As God's commands were viewed as statutes the distinction between the moral and the ritual was lost, and the ritual law attained enormous and familiar proportions. The beautiful story of Judith is designed chiefly to teach abstinence from ritual uncleanness. And the most extreme case is in Jdb 9:31-38—all of Israel's woes come from keeping the feasts by the actual moon instead of by a correct (theoretical) moon (1). (3) Where self-complacency ceased and a strong moral sense was present, despair makes its appearance with extraordinary frequency. The period is the period of penitential prayers, with an undercurrent of doubt as to how far mercy can be expected (Three vs. 3–22; Pr Man; Bar 3:1-8, etc.). "What profit is it unto us, if there be promised us an immortal time, whereas we have done the works that the Lord commanded?" (Jdb 119 RV). The vast majority of men are lost (9:16) and must be forgotten (6:55), and Ezra can trust for his own salvation only by a special revelation (77:77 RV). So, evidently, St. Paul's pre-Christian expositions are not the less important for the NT background is the extreme lack of prominence of the sacrifices. They are never given a theological interpretation (except in Philo, where they cease to be sacrifices). Indeed, in Sir 38 they are explicitly said to be devotions for the righteous only, apparently prized only as an inheritance from the past and "because of the commandment" (Sir 35:5; yet of 38:11). When the temple was destroyed and the sacrifices ceased, Judaism went on its way almost unaffected, showing that the sacrifices meant nothing essential to the people. And, even in earlier times, the Essenes rejected sacrifices altogether, without losing thereby their recognition as Jews.

III. The Teaching of Christ.—The Baptist proclaimed authoritatively the near advent of the kingdom of God, prepared by a Messianic judgment that would bring fire for the wicked and the Holy Spirit for the righteous. Simple but incisive moral teaching and warning against trusting in national privileges, with baptisms, was an earnest toke upon the people, who were to prepare men to face this judgment securely. But we have no data to determine how much farther (if any) the Baptist conceived his teaching to lead.

It was in the full heat of this eschatological revival that the Baptist had fanned, that Christ began to teach, and He also began 2. Kingdom with the eschatological phrase. The kingdom of God was the symbol of absolute dominion. Consequently His teaching must have been taken at once in an eschatological sense, and it is rather futile to attempt to limit such implications to passages where modern eschatological phrases are used unambiguously. "The kingdom of God is at hand!" had the inerrant exclamation "Judgment is at hand," and in this context, "Repent ye" (Mk 1:15) must mean "lost ye be judged." Hence, Our Lord's teaching about salvation had primarily a future content: positively, admission into the kingdom of God, and negatively, deliverance from the preceding judgment. So the kingdom of God is the "highest good" of Christ's teaching but, with His usual reserve, He has little to say about its external. Man's nature is to be perfectly adapted to his spiritual environment (see ESCHATOLOGY), and man is to be with Christ (Lk 22:30) and the patriarchs (Mt 8:11). But otherwise—and again as usual—the current descriptions are used without comment, even when they rest on rather materialistic imagery (Lk 16:19). The kingdom of God is, however, its meaning is not certainly not exhausted by a mere reformation of the present order of material things. But the fate of man at judgment depends on what man is before judgment, so that the practical problem is salvation from the conditions that will bring judgment; i.e., present and Future and future salvation are inseparably connected, and any attempt to make rigid distinctions between the two results in logomachies. Occasionally there is a Christian reference to the kingdom of God as present, in the sense that citizens of the future kingdom are living already on this earth (Mt 11:11; Lk 17:21[?]; the meaning of the latter verse is very dubious). Such men are "saved" already (Lk 19:9; 7:50?), i.e., such men were delivered from the bad moral condition that was so extended that Satan could be said to hold sway over the world (Lk 10:18; 11:21).

That the individual was the unit in this deliverance needs no proof. Still, the Divine privilege of the Jews was a reality and Christ's normal work was limited to them (Mt. 23:38; Mk 10:5; 15:20, etc.). He admitted even that the position of the Jewish leaders rested on a reversal of this. A important factor for the NT background is the extreme lack of prominence of the sacrifices. They are never given a theological interpretation (except in Philo, where they cease to be sacrifices). Indeed, in Sir 38 they are explicitly said to be devotions for the righteous only, apparently prized only as an inheritance from the past and "because of the commandment" (Sir 35:5; yet of 38:11). When the temple was destroyed and the sacrifices ceased, Judaism went on its way almost unaffected, showing that the sacrifices meant nothing essential to the people. And, even in earlier times, the Essenes rejected sacrifices altogether, without losing thereby their recognition as Jews.

IV. Individual.—The Baptist proclaimed authoritatively the near advent of the kingdom of God, prepared by a Messianic judgment that would bring fire for the wicked and the Holy Spirit for the righteous. Simple but incisive moral teaching and warning against trusting in national

5. Moral Progress came from the Pharisaic casuistry which had invented limits to righteousness, and an exact code tokens of a perfect morality, and contemplated permitting angry thoughts if actual murder was avoided, and so on. In contrast is set the idea of character, of the single eye (Mt 6:25), of the pure heart (8:8). Only so can the spiritual house he built on a rock foundation. But the mere ideal is not enough; persistent effort toward it and a certain amount of progress are demanded imperatively. Only those who have learned to forgive can ask for forgiveness (Mt 6 12; 18 35). They who have not works have no share in the kingdom (25 31-46), for even idle words will be taken into account (12 36), and the most precious possession that interferes with moral progress is to be sacrificed ruthlessly (19 8-9, etc.). Men are known by their fruits (7 20); for he who does the will of the Father shall enter into the kingdom (7 21), and the final ideal—which is likewise the goal—is becoming a son of the Father in moral likeness (5 45). That this progress is due to God's aid is so intimately a part of Christ's teaching on the entire dependence of the soul on God that it receives little explicit mention, but Christ refers even His own miracles to the Father's power (Lk 11 20).

Moral effort, through God's aid, is an indispensable condition for salvation. But complete success in the moral struggle is not at all a condition, in the sense that moral perfection is required. For Christ's disciples, to whom the kingdom is promised (6 21), the one who receives remission of sins (Mt 2 5), Zaccheus who is said to have received salvation (Lk 19 9), were far from being models of sinlessness. The element in the character that Christ teaches as making up for the lack of moral perfection is becoming 'a little child' (of Mk 10 15). Now the point here is not ceduleousness (for belief is not under discussion), nor is it meekness (for children are notoriously not meek). And it most certainly is not the pure passivity of the newly born infant, for it is gratuitous to assume that only such infants were meant even in Lk 1 15, while in Mt 18 2 (where the child comes in answer to a call) this interpretation is excluded. Now, in the wider teaching of Christ the meaning is made clear enough. Salvation is for the poor in spirit, for those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for the prodigal knowing his wretchedness. It is for the penitent publican, while the self-satisfied Pharisee is rejected. A sense of need and a desire that God will give them help is prerequisite. A child does not argue that it has earned its father's benefits but looks to him in a feeling of dependence, with a readiness to do his bidding. So it is the soul that desires all of righteousness, strives toward it, knows its need and trust, and turns to its Father for the rest, that is the savable soul.

Christ speaks of the pardon of the publican (Lk 18 9ff) and of the prodigal welcomed by the Father (Lk 15 20), both without Christ necessary to assume that all of those finding the strait gate (Mt 7 14) were explicitly among Christ's disciples. But would Christ have admitted that anyone who had come to know Him and refused to obey Him would have been saved? To ask this question is to answer it in the negative (Mk 9 40 is irrelevant). Real knowledge of the Father is possible only through the unclouded knowledge of the Son (Lk 10 21.22), and lack of knowledge of the Son (Lk 10 12-23) and lack of faith in the Son forfeits all blessings (Mt 6 5-6; 8 23). Faith in Him brings instant forgiveness of sins (Mt 2 5), and love directed to Him is an indubitable sign that forgiveness has been taken place (Lk 7 46). But Christ the servant of the Father's Messiah is 'not to be emptied of its meaning, this made Him judge of the world (such verses as Mk 8 38 are hardly needed for direct evidence). And, since for Christ's consciousness an earthly judgment is unthinkable, a transcendental judgment is the sole alternative, corroborated by the use of the title Son of Man. But passage from simple humanity to the transcendental glory of the Son-of-Man Messiah involved a change hardly expressible except by death and resurrection. And the expectation of death was in Christ's mind from the beginning by Mk 2 18,19 (even without ver 20). That He could have viewed His death as void of significance for human salvation is simply inconceivable, and the ascription of Mk 10 45 to Pauline influence is in defiance of the facts. Nor is it credible that Christ conceived that in the interval between His death and His Parousia He would be out of relation to His own. To Him the unseen world was in the closest relation to the visible world, and His passage into glory would strengthen, not weaken, His position. So there is a complete justification of Mk 14 22-25: to Christ His death had a significance that could be paralleled only by the death of the Covenant victim in Ex 24 6-8, for by it an entirely new relation was established between God and man.

(1) Salvation from physical evil was a very real part, however subordinate, of Christ's teaching (Mk 1 34, etc.). (2) Asetic practices as a necessary element in salvation can hardly claim Christ's authority. It is true that the pained Jesus is not Christ's only disciples. Certainly not all of the hundred and twenty of Acts 1 15 (ef ver 21), nor of the five hundred of 1 Cor 12 6, were converted after the Passion. And they all certainly could not have been asked to travel to the ends of the earth for the demands made in the special case of the Twelve (still less in such an extremely special case as Mk 10 21) in no way represent Christ's normal practice, whatever readiness for self-sacrifice may have been asked of all. So the representations of Christ as ruthlessly exacting all from everyone are quite unwarranted by the facts. And it is well to remember that it is Mt 11 19 that contains the term of reproach that His adversaries gave Him.

IV. St. Paul. Instead of laying primal stress on St. Paul's peculiar contributions to soteriology, it will be preferable to start from such Pauline passages as simply continue the explicit teaching of Christ. Particularly due to the characteristics of this method of this that the present acute 'Jesus-Paulus' controversy exists.

That St. Paul expected the near advent of the kingdom of God with a judgment preceding, and a deliverance from this judgment, need not be argued. And, accordingly, emphasis is thrown sometimes on the future deliverance and sometimes on the present conditions for the deliverance (contrast Rom 5 9 and 8 24), but the practical problem is the latter. More explicitly than in Christ's recorded teaching the nature and the blessings of the kingdom are described (see KINSONOM OF GOD), but the additional matter is without particular religious import. A certain privilege of the Jews appears (Rom 3 1-8; 9-11), but the practical content of the privilege seems to be eschatological only (11 26). Individual conversion is of course taken for granted, but the life after that becomes highly corporate (see CURUCU).

(1) The moral ideal is distinctly that of character. St. Paul, indeed, is frequently obliged to give directions as to details, but the 2. Moral detailed directions are referred con- Progress stantly to the underlying principle, such as Rom 14 or 1 Cor 8 being excellent examples of this, while 'love is the fulfilment of the law' (Rom 13 10) is the summary. (2) Persistent moral effort is indispensable, and the new life absolutely must bring forth fruit to God (Rom 6 4; 13 12; Gal 5 24; Col 3 5; Eph 2 3; 4 17 22-32; Tit 2 11-14). Only by good conduct can one please God (1 These 4 1), and the works of even Christians are to be watched as a fire (1 Cor 3 13; 4 5; 2 Cor 5 10) in a judgment not to be faced without the most earnest striving (1 Cor 10 12; Phil 2 12), not even by St. Paul himself (1 Cor 9 27; Phil 3 12-14). And the possibility of the peril of a lack of moral attainment must not be permitted to leave the mind (1 Cor 3 17; Gal 5 21; cf Rom 8 12.13; 11 20; 1 Cor 10 12; Gal 6 7-9). Consequently, growth in actual righteousness is as vital in St. Paul's soteriology as it is in that teaching of Christ: Christians have "put off the old man with his doings" (Col 3 9).

That this growth is God's work is, however, a point where St. Paul has expanded Christ's quiet assumption rather elaborately. In particular, what Christ had made the source of His own supernatural power —the Holy Spirit—is specified as the source of the power of the Christian's ordinary life, as well as of the more special endowments (see St. Paul's Correspondence). In the Spirit the Christian has received the blessing promised to Abraham (Gal 3 14); by it the deeds of the body can be put to death and all virtues flow into the soul (Gal 5 16-26), if a man walks according to it (1 Cor 6 19.20; 1 Thess 4 6-7). In ch 7 St. Paul looks back with a shudder on his pre-Christian helplessness (it is naturally the extreme of exegetical perservity to argue that he dreaded not the sin itself but only God's penalty on sin). But the Spirit got us to put to death the deeds of the body (8 13), to disregard the things of the flesh (8 5), and to fulfil the ordinance of the Law (8 4). Such moral power is the test of Christianity: as many as are led by the Spirit of God these are the sons of God (8 14).

This doctrine of the Spirit is simply that what Christ did on earth would be carried on with increased intensity after the Passion. 4. Mystical. That this work could be thought of out of relation to Christ, or that Christ Himself could have so thought of it (see above, III, 7) is incredible. So the exalted Christ appears as the source of moral and spiritual power (St. Paul speaks even more of Christ's resurrection than of the Spirit): hence Pauline (Christ and the Spirit) being very closely combined in 2 Cor 3 17; Rom 8 9; Gal 4 6. Our old man has been crucified, so putting an end to the bondage of sin, and we can prevent sin from reigning in our mortal bodies, for we have been brought into divine union with Christ's death was to enable us to walk in newness of life (Rom 6 2-14). The resurrection is a source of power, and through Christ's strength all things can be done (Phil 4 13.20). Christ is the real center of the believer's personality (Gal 2 20; the man has become a new creature (2 Cor 5 17; cf Col 2 20; 3 3); we were joined to another that we might bring forth fruit to God (Rom 7 4). And by contact with the glory of the Lord we are transformed into the same image (2 Cor 3 18), the end being conformation to the image of the Son (Rom 8 29). 5. Forgiveness. (Rom 5 8-9). And the acquisition of forgiveness strength through union with Christ is vitally connected with the remission of sins. In Rom 7 1-6 (cf Col 2 11.12), the mystical union with Christ makes His death ours (cf Col 3 8) and so provokes God's appeal to the Law (Rom 3 25; 4 25; 15 56), which has no relation to the dead. And by the life-giving power of this union the strength of sin is broken (Rom 6 6). (2) The condition in man that makes forgiveness possible.St. Paul calls it "washing" (1 Cor 3 3; 4 5; 2 Cor 6 18). Its chief use, however, is in opposition to "works" (most clearly in Rom 9 30-10 13). The Jews' "purposet after righteousness"—the attempt to wring salvation from God as wages earned—was vain (Rom 10 13); and in a doubt is the appeal to God, the conscious relinquishment of all claim (4 5). The soul looks trustingly for salvation to its Father, precisely the attitude of the "children" in the teaching of Christ. But no more than in the teaching of Christ is faith a purely passive virtue, for man must be "obedient to it" (Rom 1 5; 10 16; 1 Thess 2 13). And for the necessary presence of love in faith of 1 Cor 13 2; Gal 5 6; Eph 3 17.

Because of faith—specifically, faith in Christ (except Rom 4; Gal 3 6)—God does not visit the penalties of sins on believers, but 6. Atonement treats them as if they were righteous (Rom 5 1, etc). But this is not because of a quality in the believer or in the faith, but because of an act that preceded any act of Christian faith, the death of Christ (not the cross, specifically, for St. Paul does not argue from the cross in all of Rom). Through this death God's mercy could be extended safely, while before this the exercise of mercy had been limited to God's elect (Rom 3 25.26). And this death was a sacrifice (Rom 3 25, etc). And it is certain that St. Paul conceived of this sacrifice as existing quite independently of its effect on any human being. But he has given us no data for a really complete sacrificial doctrine, a statement sufficiently proved by the hopeless variance of the interpretations that have been propounded. And that St. Paul ever constructed a theory of the operation of sacrifices must be doubted. There is none in the contemporary Jewish literature, there is none in the OT, and there is none in the rest of the NT, not even in He. Apparently the rites were so familiar that sacrificial terminology was ready to hand and was used without particular reflection and without attempting to give it precise theological content. This is borne out by the ease with which in Rom 3 24.25 St. Paul passes from a ransom (redemption) illustration to a (quite discordant) propitiation illustration. Paul has two sources for his teaching about Justification. Here it is enough to say that to make a juridical theory constructed from Pauline implications and illustrations central in Christianity is to do exactly what St. Paul did not do.

Summing up the whole thought in St. Paul: the remission of penalties through the atoning death of Christ and the—7. Summary of the power of sin through strength flowling from Christ, the human element in both cases being faith. The question of the order of the steps is futile, for "to have faith," "to be in Christ," and "to have the Spirit" are convertible terms, i.e. in doctrinal phraseology, the beginnings of sanctification are simultaneous with justification. Attempts to unify the two lines of thought into a single theory cannot claim purely Bib. support. The "ethical" theory, which in its best form makes God's pardon depend on the fact that the sinner will be made holy (at least in the next world), introduces the fewest extraneous elements, but it says something that St. Paul does not say. On the other hand one may feel that considering St. Paul as a whole—to say nothing of the rest of the NT—the pure justification doctrine has bulked a little too large in our discussion. St. Paul's pardon for a sin is immensely important, but still more important is the new power of holiness.
8. Notes
Paul today thun would have been a martyr to religion and such passages as Rom 6:1–7; Gal 3:27; Col 2:12 make it certain that he regarded baptism as conferring very real spiritual powers. But that he made a mechanical distinction between the blessings given then and those given at some other time must be doubted. (2) Salvation from the flesh (Rom 7:24) involves no metaphysical dualism, as “flesh” is the whole of the lower nature from which the power to holiness saves a man (Rom 13). Indeed, the body itself is an object of salvation (Rom 8:11; and see Revelation).
(5) Quite in the background lies the idea of salvation from physical evil (2 Cor 1:10, etc.). Such evils are real evils (1 Cor 11:30), but in God’s hands they may become pure blessings (Rom 6:3; 2 Cor 12:7). (4) Salvation from sin after conversion is due to God’s “covenant in the man in terms of the acquired supernatural nature (Rom 8:14, etc.). Yet certain sins may destroy the union with Christ altogether (1 Cor 3:17, etc.), while others bring God’s chastening judgment (1 Cor 11:30–32). Only the chastisement or, St. Paul himself (1 Cor 5:1–5; 1 Tim 1:20) or by the congregation (Gal 6:1; 2 Thess 3:10–15; 2 Cor 2:6).
V. Rest of NT. Summary.
—(1) St. John had the task of presenting Christ to Gentiles, who were as unfamiliar with the technical meaning 1. St. John of such phrases as “kingdom of God” or “Son of Man” as is the world today, and to Gentiles who had instead a series of concepts unknown in Pal. So a “translation of spiritual values” became necessary if the gospel were to make an immediate appeal, a translation accomplished so successfully that the Fourth Gospel has always been the most popular. The Synoptists, esp. the extremely literal St. Mark, imperatively demand a historical commentary, while St. John has successfully avoided this necessity. (2) The “kingdom of God,” as a phrase (3:35; cf. 18:36), is replaced by “eternal life.” This life is given in the person of Christ (ch. 5:25–27; 6:46), but its full realization will be in the “mansion mansions” of the Father’s house (14:2), where the believer will be with Christ (17:24). A judgment of all men will precede the establishment of this glorified state, but the believer may face the judgment with equanimity (5:24). So the believer is delivered from a state of things so bad as expressible as a world under Satan’s rule (12:31; 14:30; 16:11), a world in darkness (3:19), in ignorance of God (17:25), and in sin (5:21), all expressible in the one word “death” (5:21). (3) The Jews had real privilege in the reception of Christ’s message (1:11; 4:22, etc.), but the extension of the good tidings to all men was inevitable (12:23,32, etc.). Belief in Christ is “wholly a personal matter, but the believers enter a community of service (15:14), with the death of the Father and Son as their ideal (17:21).
(4) The nature of the moral ideal, reduced to the single word “love” (13:34; 15:12), is assumed as known and identified with “Christ’s words” (5:24; 6:63, etc.), and the necessity of progress toward it as sharply pointed as in the Synoptists. The sinner is the servant of sin (8:4, a total change of character is needed (3:6), and the blessing is only on him who does God’s commandments (17:17). This “doing” is the proof of love toward Christ (13:14; 15:21); only by bearing fruit and more fruit can discipleship be maintained (15:1–6; of 14:21), and, indeed, by bearing fruit men actually become Christ’s disciples (15:8, cf.). The knowledge of Christ and of God that is eternal life (17:3) comes only through moral effort (7:17). In St. John the contrasts are colored so vividly that it would almost appear as if perfection were demanded. But he does not present even the apostles as models of sanctity (cf. Acts 3:13; 18:9, 19, and see John 19:19, with or without compromise; the crowning sin is to say, “We see” (9:41). It is the Son who frees from sin (8:36), delivers from darkness (8:12; 12:46), and gives eternal life (11:25,26; cf. 16:5; 2:46; 4:47). This emphasis on the Divine side of the process is probably the reason for the omission of the terms “repent,” “repentance,” from the Gospel in favor of “faith” (6:29, esp.), but this “faith” involves in turn human effort, for, without “abiding,” faith is useless (8:30,31). (6) An advance on the Synoptists is found in the number of times Christ speaks of His death (3:14,15; 10:11,15; 12:24,32; 17:19) and in the greater emphasis laid on it, but no more than in the Synoptist is there any explanation of how the Atonement became effectual. A real advance consists in the prospect of Christ’s work after His death, when, through the Paraclete (7:38,39; 14:16 ff), a hitherto unknown spiritual power would become available for the world. And spiritual power is due not only to a union of will with Christ, but with God in general; cf. 15:1–9. See above, III, 7, for the relation of these thoughts to the synoptic teaching.
(1) The emphasis of He is of course on the sacrificial work of Christ, but the Ep. makes practically nothing but a contribution to the theology of 2. Hebrews Sacrifice. The argument is this: The OT sacrifices certainly had an efficacy; Christ’s sacrifice fulfilled their types perfectly, therefore it had a perfect efficacy (9:13,14). This is a tremendously potent argument for He’s own purpose, but it is little held to by the modern theologian. (2) More than in St. Paul is emphasized the human training of Christ for His high-priestly work. Since He laid hold of the seed of Abraham (2:16), He learned by experience all that man had to suffer (2:17; 4:15; 5:8, etc.). In He the essence of the sacrifice lies not in the death but in what we call the ascension—the presentation of the blood in the heavenly tabernacle (9:11–14; see the normal). That the death was specifically tolerable (12:2; cf. 9:27) was the stage of training and had no especial significance in the sacrificial scheme. Christ’s intercession for us in heaven receives more emphasis than in the rest of the New Testament.
The one other distinct contribution to NT soteriology is made in 1 Pet’s evaluation of the vicarious suffering of the “Servant” of Isa 53.
3. St. Peter
What Christ did through His sufferings we may do in some degree through our sufferings; as His pains helped not only living mankind, but even departed sinners, so we may face persecution more happily with the thought that our pains are benefitting other men (3:16–20). It is hardly possible that St. Peter thought of this comparison as conveying an exhaustive description of the Atonement (of 1:19), but that the comparison should be made at all is significant.
(1) Salvation is both a present and a future matter for us. The full realization of all that God promised in the Old Covenant is not to be ours until the end of human history (if, indeed, there will not be opened infinite possibilities of eternal growth), but the enjoyment of these blessings depends on conditions fulfilled in this life and by us. But a foretaste of the blessings of forgiveness of sins and of comfort and peace is present on this earth. The pardon depends on the fact of God’s mercy through the death of Christ—a fact for religious experience but probably incapable of expression as a complete philosophical dogma.
Salvation
Samaria

Ruins in Samaria.

But strength comes from God through the glorified Christ (or through the Spirit), this vital union with God being pivotal. These lines are in large degree independent, and the selection of the proportions profitable to a given soul is the task of the pastor. (2) That human effort is an essential in salvation is not to be denied in the face of all the NT evidence, esp. St. Paul taken as a whole. And yet no one with the faintest conception of what religion means would think of coming before God to claim merit. Here the purely intellectual discussions of the subject and its psychological course in the soul run in different channels, and 'anti-synergistic' or 'salvationism' are regarded as based on attempts to petrify psychological experience in terms of pure dogma. (3) Still more true is this of attempts to describe mathematically the steps in salvation—the ordo salutis of the older dogmatists—here this differs with different souls. In particular, NT data are lacking for the development of the individual born of Christian parents in a Christian country. (4) Further, the social side of salvation is an essentially Christian doctrine and cannot be detached from the corporate life of the Christian church. Salvation from temporal evils is equally, if secondarily, Christian. Nationalism in salvation is at present much in the background. But it is as true today as it was in ancient Israel that the sins of a nation tend to harm the souls of even those who have not participated actively in those sins.

LITERATURE.—The literature of salvation is virtually the literature of theology (see under separate arts., Atonement; Sanctification; Punishment of Christ; Johannine Theology; Pauline Theology, etc.), but a few recent works may be mentioned. Indispensable are the works of Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation and The Pauline Theology. Carlyle's Romans in the "New Century" series should be used as a supplement to any other comm. on Rom. The juridical theology of the Atonement has its best defender in Eng. Deaney's The Death of Christ. The ethical theory is best presented in the works of Du Bos, The Gospel in the Gospels, The Gospel according to St. Paul, and High-Friehood and Sacrifice (Sandy's Expos reviews of the two former, reported in The Life of Christ in Recent Research, should be read in any case).

SAMARIA, sa-mā'ri-a, CITY OF (יִשָּׁם, shām-ron'; שָׂמָרְיָה, Samudreia, Sopam, Semerōn, and other forms):
(1) Shechem was the first capital of the Northern Kingdom (1 K 12 25). Jeroboam seems later to have removed the royal residence to Tirzah (14 17). After the brief reigns of Elah and Zimri came that of Omri, who reigned 6 years at Tirzah, then he purchased the hill of Samaria and built a city there, which was thenceforward the metropolis of the kingdom of Israel (16 24). Here the hill and the city are said to have been named after Shechem, the original owner of the land. There is nothing intrinsically improbable in this. It may naturally be derived from shāmør, and the name in the sense of "outlook" would fitly apply to a city in such a commanding position. The residence, it was also the burying-place, of the kings of Israel (1 K 16 25; 22 37; 2 K 10 35; 13 9 13; 14 16).

Toward the western edge of the Ephraimite uplands there is a broad fertile hollow called Wādī ets-Sha'tir, "valley of barley." From the midst of it rises an oblong hill to a height of over 300 ft., with a level top. The sides are steep, esp. to the S. The greatest length is from E. to W. The surrounding mountains on three sides are much higher, and are well clad with olives and vineyards. To the W. the hills are lower, and from the crest a wide prospect is obtained over the Plain of Sharon, with the yellow ribbon of sand that marks the coast line, and the white foam on the tumbling billows; while away beyond stretch the blue waters of the Mediterranean. On the eastern end of the hill, surrounded by olive and cactus, is the modern village of Shobak, under which a low neck of land connects the hill with the eastern slopes. The position is one of great charm and beauty; and in days of ancient warfare it was one of remarkable strength. While it was overlooked from three sides, the battlements crowning the steep slopes were too far off to be reached by missiles from the only artillery known in those times—the sling and the catapult. For besiegers to attempt an assault at arms was only to court disaster. The methods adopted by her enemies show that they relied on famine to do their work for them (2 K 6 24 f., etc.). Omri displayed excellent taste and good judgment in the choice he made.

The city wall can be traced in almost its entire length. Recent excavations conducted by American archaeologists have uncovered the foundations of Omri's palace, with remains of the work of Ahab and of Herod (probably here was Ahab's ivory palace), on the western end of the hill, while on the western slope the gigantic gateway, flanked by massive towers, has been exposed to view.

Under the influence of Jezebel, Samaria naturally became a center of idolatrous worship. Ahab "reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria. And Ahab made the Asherah" (1 K 16 32 f.). Jehoram his son put away the pillar of Baal (2 K 3 2), and within the temple Jehu made an end at once of the instruments of idolatry and of the priests (16 19 f.). There are many prophetic references to the enormities practised here, and to their inevitable consequences (Isa 8 1; 9 9; 10 9, 28, 30, 31; 14 21, 28; 16 9; 25 13; Ezk 23 4; Hos 7 1; 13 16; Am 3 12; Mic 1 6, etc.).

Under pressure of Damascas Omri conceded to the Syrians the right to “make streets in Samaria” (1 K 20:34).

Ben-hadad II besieged the city, but suffered ignominy in the defeat (2 K 20:1–24; Jos, Ant, x, iii, 14). Persistent attempts by the Syrians to recapture the city in the time of Jehoram were frustrated by Elisha (2 K 6:1–6; Jos, Ant, IX, iv, 3). At length, however, Ben-hadad again invested the city, and the besieged were reduced to dire straits, in which, urged by famine, record of awful horror were enacted (2 K 6:24 ff). A mysterious panic seized the Syrians. Their deserted camp was discovered by despairing lepers who carried the good news to the famished citizens of the plenty to be found there. Probably in the height of the great western gateway occurred the crush in which the incredulous captain was trampled to death (ch 7; Jos, Ant, IX, iv, 5).

Here the 70 sons of Ahaz were slain by Jehu in the general destruction of the house of Ahaz (2 K 10:18). In Samaria, the Chronicler tells us, Abijah in vain hid from Jehu (2 Ch 22:9; cf 2 K 9:27). Pekah brought hither much spoil from Jerus and many captives, whom, at the instance of the prophet Oded, he released (2 Ch 28:8 ff). The siege of Samaria was begun by Shalmaneser in the 7th year of Hoshea, and the city was finally taken by Sargon II at the end of 3 years, 722 BC (2 K 17:1; 18:9; Jos, Ant, XIX, iv, 1). This marked the downfall of the Northern Kingdom, the people being carried by the conqueror. That the city was not done in a thoroughgoing way is evident from the fact recorded in the inscriptions that two years later the country had to be subdued again. Colonists were brought from other parts to take the place of the inhabitants (2 K 17:24, 25). Against the greatest the city took in the 331 BC, killed many of the inhabitants, and settled others in Shechem, replacing them with a colony of Syro-Macedonians. He gave the adjoining country to the Jews (C, Ap, II, 4). The city suffered at the hands of Ptolemy Lagi and Demetrius Poliorcetes, but it was still a place of strength (Jos, Ant, XII, x, 2) when John Hyrcanus came against it in 120 BC. It was taken after a year’s siege, and the victor tried to destroy the city utterly. His turning of the water into trenches to undermine the foundations could only refer to the suburbs under the hill. From the only two sources, ‘Ain Harûn and ‘Ain Kefr Ritma, to the E. of the town, the water could not rise to the height of the mount, by which Ben- jamin of Tudela says he saw on the top, from which water enough could be got to fill the trenches, are certainly not to be seen today, and they have left no trace behind them. The city was rebuilt by Pompey and, having again fallen under misfortune, was restored by Gabinius (Jos, Ant, XIV, iv, 4; v, 3; BJ, I, vii, 7; viii, 4). To Herod it owed the chief splendor of its later days. He extended, strengthened and adorned it on a scale of great magnificence, calling it Seleuceia (Augusta), a honor of the emperor, a name which survives in the modern Sebastiyeh. A temple also was dedicated to Caesar. Its site is probably marked by the imposing flight of steps, with the pedestal on which stood the gigantic statue of Augustus, which recent excavations have revealed. The statue, somewhat mutilated, is also to be seen. Another of Herod’s temples W. of the present village was cleared out by the same explorers. The remains of the great circular colonnaded street, which ran round the upper terrace of the hill, bear further testimony to the splendor of this great builder’s work (Jos, Ant, XV, vii, 3; viii, 5; BJ, I, xxi, 2). It was here that Herod killed perhaps the only human being whom he ever really loved, his wife Mariamme. Here also his sons perished by his hand (Jos, Ant, XVII, vii, 5–7; XVI, iii, i–5; xi, 7).

It is commonly thought that this city was the scene of Philip’s preaching and the events that followed recorded in Acts 8, but the absence of the place in the lists of the apostles and missionaries (Phil. 1:23) is an argument to the contrary. The city was settled here by Septimius Severus. From that time little is known of the history of the city; nor do we know to what the final catastrophe was due. It became the seat of a bishopric and was represented in the councils of Nicea, Constantinople and Chalcodon. Its bishop attended the Synod of Jerusalem in 536 AD.

The Church of St. John, a Crusading structure beside the modern village, is now a Moslem mosque. It is the traditional burying-place of John the Bapt- ist’s body.

(2) 众 山亚, ha Samurâea: A town mentioned in 1 Macc 5:66 as on the road followed by Judas from the district of Hebron to the land of the Philis. The name is probably a clerical error. The margin reads Mariesa, and probably the place intended is Mareshah, the site of which is at Tell Sandanahann, about a mile S. of Beit Jibrin.

from Hamath and Sepharvaim," cities which had already bowed to the Assyrian power (ver 24). It appears from the Assyrian inscriptions that the number carried away was 27,639. The number afterward deported from Judah was 200,000, and then the poorest of the land were left to be vine-dressers and husbandmen (2 K 25 12). It is evident that a similar policy must have been followed in Samaria, as 27,639 could certainly not include the whole population of the cities and the country. But it would include the higher classes, and esp. the priests from whom the victors would have most to fear. The population therefore after the conquest contained a large proportion of Israelites. It was no doubt among these that Judah exercised his reforming energy (2 K 23 19 f; 2 Ch 34 6 f). Here also must have been that "remnant of Israel," Manasseh and Ephraim, who contributed for the repair of the house of God (ver 9). These people, left without their religious guides, mingling with the heathen who had brought their gods and, presumably, their priests with them, were apt to be turned from the purity of their faith. A further importation of pagan settlers took place under Assur-bani-pal (Dan 11, 10). The latter is to be identified with Assur-bani-pal. What the proportions of the different elements in the population were, there is now no means of knowing. That there was some intermarriage is probable; but to racial exclusiveness, we need not suppose that it was not common. When the Jews deny to them any relation to Israel, and call them Cuthaean, as if they were the descendants purely of the heathen settlers, the facts just mentioned should be borne in mind.

After the Assyrian conquest we are told that the people suffered from lions (2 K 17 25). Jos (Ant, IX, xiv, 3) says "a plague seized upon them." In accordance with the ideas of the time, the strangers thought this due to the anger of the tutelary deity of the land, because they worshipped other gods in his territory, while neglecting him. Ignorant of his special ritual ("manner"), they petitioned the Assyrian king, who sent one (Jos says "some") of the priests who had been carried away to teach them "how they should fear the Lord." How much is implied in this "fearing of the Lord" is not clear. They continued at the same time to serve their own gods. There is nothing to show that the Israelites among them fell into their idolatries. The interest of the people at that time was that of preserving what strength they may now have shared with the Jews, is proved by 2 Ch 34 9. In another place we are told that four score men "from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria," evidently Israelites, were going up with their offerings to the house of the Lord (Jer 41 5). Once the people of the country are called Samarians (2 K 17 29). Elsewhere this name has a purely religious significance. See Samaritans.

Of the history of Samaria under Assyry and Babylonia we know nothing. It reappears at the return of the Jews from Persia auspiciously. The Jews refused the proffered assistance of the Samaritans in rebuilding the temple and the walls of Jerusalem (Ezr 4 1 3). Highly offended, the latter sought to frustrate the pious work of the Jews (Ezr 4 4 ff; Neh 4 7 ff; 1 Esd 2 16 ff). That the Samaritans were accustomed to worship in Jerusalem is perhaps implied by one phrase in the letter sent to the Persian king: "The Jews that came up from thee are come to us unto the house of their GodJerusalem;" (Ezr 4 4). They may also be those referred to in 6 21. Idolatry is not alleged against the "adversaries." We can hardly err if we ascribe the refusal in some degree to the old antagonism between the N. and the S., between Ephraim and Judah. Whatever the cause, it led to a wider estrangement and a deeper bitterness. For the history of the people and their temple on Gerizim, see Samarians.

Samaria, with Pal, fell to Alexander after the battle of Issus in 333 BC. The number of the population at that time has not been preserved. The Bible gives a figure of 250,000 (2 M 3 22). Some suppose that this was the number of the people of the city and not the country. But it is certain that the latter was considerably larger, as Samaria was a commercial center of considerable importance. It was the seat of the highest authority in Palestine, and a favorite resort of the Jews during the time of the Roman domination. The olive grows plentifully, and other fruit trees abound. There is much excellent soil, and fine crops of barley and wheat are reaped annually. The vine also is largely cultivated on the hill slopes. Remains of ancient forests are found in parts. As Jos said, it is not naturally watered by many rivers, but derives its chief moisture from rain water, of which there is no lack (BJ, II, iii, 4). He speaks also of the excellent grass, by reason of which the cows yield more milk than those in any other place.

There is a narrow road connecting Samaria with Jaffa; and by a road not quite so good, it is now possible to drive a carriage from Jerus to Nazareth, passing through Samaria.

SAMARITANS, sa-mar‘i-tans (σαμαριταί, shemmetrical), Σαμαριταί, Σαμαρίται [sing.], Samarites): The name "Samaritans" in 2 K 17 29 clearly applies to the Israelite inhabitants of the Northern Kingdom. In subsequent history it denotes a people of mixed origin, composed of the peoples brought by the conqueror from Babylon and elsewhere to take the places of the extirpated Israelites and those who were left in the land (722 BC). Sargon claims to have carried away only 27,290 of the inhabitants (KIB, II, 55). Doubtless these were, as in the case of Judah, the chief men, and men of war and prominent men, who explicitly, the priests, the hosanah classes being left to till the land, the vineyards, etc. Hezekiah, who came to the throne of Judah probably in 715 BC, could still appeal to the tribes of Ephraim, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, and Zebulon (2 Ch 30 10.11.18ff); and the presence of these tribesmen is implied in the narrative of Josiah's reformation (34 6f). Although the number of the colonists was increased by Esarhaddon and Osipap (Assur-bani-pal, Ezr 4 29 f), the population, able and willing, previously Israelite; otherwise their religion would not so easily have won the leading place. The colonists thought it necessary for their own safety to acknowledge Jeh, in whose land they dwelt, as one among the gods to be feared (2 K 17 21ff). In the intermixure that followed "their own gods" seem to have fallen on evil days; and when the Samaritans asked permission to share in building the temple under Zerubbabel, they claimed, apparently with a good conscience, to serve God and to sacrifice to Him as the Jews did (Ezr 4 1f). Whatever justification there was for this claim, their proffered friendship was turned to deadly hostility by the blunt refusal of their request. The exegetes of the north and south doubt intensified the quarrel, and the antagonism of Jew and Samaritan, in its bitterness, was destined to pass into a proverb. The Samaritans set themselves, with great temporary success, to frustrate the work in which they were not permitted to share (Ezr 4 4ff; Neh 6 7ff. etc).

From the strict administration of the Law in Jerusalem malcontents found their way to the freeer atmosphere of Samaria. Among these renegades was Manasseh, brother of the high priest, who had married a daughter of Sanballat, the Pers governor of Samaria, to Josiah, son of Manasseh, with the sanction of Alexander the Great, built a temple for the Samaritans on Mt. Gerizim, of which Manasseh became high priest (Ant. XI, vij, 2; vii. 22 ff.). Jos. however, places Manasseh a century too late. He was a contemporary of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 13. 28).

When it suited their purpose the Samaritans claimed relationship with the Jews, asserting that their roll of the Pentateuch was the only authentic copy (see Pentateuch, The Samaritans); yet they were equally ready to deny all connection in times of stress, and even to dedicate their temple to a heathen deity (Jos., Ant. XII, v, 5). In 128 BC, John Hyrcanus destroyed the temple (XIII, ix, 1). In the time of Christ the Samaritans were ruled by procurators under the Roman governor of Syria. Lapse of years brought no lessening of the hatred between Jews and Samaritans (Ant. XX, vi, 1). To avoid insult and injury at the hands of the latter, Jews from Galilee were accustomed to reach the feast at Jerusalem by way of Perea. "Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a demon" was an expression of opprobrium (Jn. 8. 48). Although Jesus forbade the Twelve to go into any city of the Samaritans (Mt. 10. 5), the province was the scene of the Samaritan shows that His love overleaped the boundaries of national hatred (Lk. 10. 30 ff.; of 17. 16; Jn. 4. 9).

During the Jewish war Cæcilius treated the Samaritans with great severity. On one occasion (67 AD) he slaughtered 11,000 on Mt. Gerizim. For some centuries they were found in considerable numbers throughout the empire, east and west, with their synagogues. They were noted as "bankers" and money-changers. For their anti-Christian attitude and conduct Justinian inflicted terrible vengeance on them. From this the race seems never to have recovered. Gradually dwindling, they now form a small community in Nablus of not more than 200 souls. Their great treasure is their ancient copy of the Law. See SAMARIA.

SAMATUS, sam'at-us (Σαματός, Ŝamatos): One of the sons of Esor who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd. 9. 34). It is difficult to say whether, if any, name it represents in Ex. 10. 34 ff., where no "sons of Esor" are inserted between "sons of Bani" and "sons of Nebo": probably Shallum (ver. 42), but possibly Shemariah (ver. 41).

SAMECH, sam'ek (ਸ, samekh): The 15th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as s. It came to be used for the number 60. For name, etc., see ALPHABET.

SAMEUS, sa-maw'yus: AV = RV Sameus (q.v.).

SAMELLIUS, sam-e'l'i-us (B, Σαμελλίος, Samellius; A, Σαμελλίος, Sesellius, al Σαμελλίος, Semelius; AV Semellius): "The scribe," one of those who wrote a letter to Artaxerxes against the building of Jerusalem by the returned exiles (1 Esd. 2. 16. 17. 25. 50 = "Shimshai" in Ex. 4. 8).

SAMEUS, sam'aw'us (A and Fritsch, Σαμας, Samas; B, Σαμασ, Samass; Thunemann; AV Sameus): One of the sons of Enmer who put away their subversive wives" (1 Esd. 9. 21) = "Samshai" (RVm "Maasiai"") of the sons of Harim in Ezr. 10. 21.

SAMGAR-NEBO, sam-gar-ne'bo (םעגַר נבֵו, Samgar Nebô, a Bab name): An officer of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who accompanied him on his expedition of Jer. 39. 3, took his seat with other nobles in the middle gate of Jerusalem after the Chaldean army had taken the city. Schrader (COT, ii, 109) holds that the name is a Hebraized form of the Assyr. Sargarnabu ("the gracious, Nebo"), but Giesbrecht (Comm., 211) conjectures for Samgar a corruption of Sir-mag (sam-rag), equivalent to Rab-mag (rab-maghi), which implies virtual dittography. The number of variant readings exhibited by the LXX seems to confirm the belief that the text is corrupt. Nebô (nabo) is there joined with the following Sarsechim to agree with Nebuzaradan of ver. 13. If the name Samgar-nebo is correct, the first Nergal-sharer should perhaps be dropped; we would then read: "Samgar-nebo the Sarsechim, Nebuzaradan the Rab-saris [of ver 18] and Nergal-sharer the Rab-mag [Saysce]." See Rab-mag = Rab-saris.

SAMI, sa'mî: AV = RV Sari (q.v.).

SAMIS, sa'mis: AV = RV Someus (q.v.).

SAMLAH, sa'm'la (שַׁמָּלָה, samdrâ): Σαμολά, Samolā, One of the kings of Edom, of the city of Masreka. He reigned before the Israelites had kings (Gen. 36. 38. 37; 1 Ch. 4. 47. 48). The fact that the city is mentioned in connection with the name of the king suggests that Edom was a confederacy at this time and the chief city was the metropolis of the whole country.

SAMMUS, sa'mus (Α, Σαμμοῦς, Samnous; B, Σαμμοῦς, Sameous): One of those who stood on Ezra's right hand as he expounded the Law (1 Esd. 9. 43) = "Shema" in Neh 8. 4.

SAMOS, sa'mos (Σάμος, Sámos, "height," "mountain" [see Strabo, §48, 457]): One of the most famous of the Ionian islands, third in size, after Rhodes, which includes Lesbos, Curo (q.v.), and Cos (q.v.). It is situated at the mouth of the bay of Ephesus, between the cities of Ephesus and Miletus (q.v.), and separated from the mainland of Ionia, by the narrow straits where the Greco-Bactrian kings conquered the Pers fleet in the battle of Mycale, 479 BC (Herod. ix. 100 ff.). The surface of the island is very rugged and mountainous, Mt. Kerkì (modern name) rising to a height of 4,700 ft., and it was due to this that the island received its name (see above; see also Samothrace).

Samos was renowned in antiquity as one of the noted centers of Ionian luxury, and reached its zenith of prosperity under the rule of the famous tyrant Polycrates (533-522 BC), who made himself master of the Aegean Sea. He carried on trade with Egypt, and his intercourse with that country, his friendship with Amasis, the famous "ring" story and the revolving manner of the death of Polycrates are all told in one of the most interesting stories of Herodotus (Herod. iii. 39 ff.).

In 84 BC, the island was joined to the province of Asia, and in 17 BC it became a civitas libera, through the favor of Augustus (Disp. Cn. iv. 9; Flivy, NH, v. 37). Both Marcus Agrippa and Herod visited the island; and according to Jos. (Ant. XVI, ii, 2; BJ, i, xxx, 11) "bestowed a great many benefits" on it. In the Apoc. Samos is mentioned among the places to which Lucas, consul of the Romans, wrote, asking their good will toward the Jews (1 Mac. 15. 25).
In the NT, Paul touched here, after passing Cyrus (q.v.), on his return from his third missionary journey (Acts 20:15). In TR, he is found in this pasture

Theodore, who is the former Dardanian; for change of name see Pausanias vii.4.3; Strabo x.457, and for a full discussion on; Hauser and Klauser. Ate, "the Thracian " (see Saan), and towers above Thermon when viewed from the Trojan coast. The summit is about a mile high. It is mentioned in the Thiod (xii.13.12), as the seat of Poseidon and referred to by Virgil Aeneid vii.208.

The island was always famous for sanctity, and the seat of a cult of the Cabeiri, which Herodotus (I.51) says was derived from the Phoenician inhabitants (see also Aristophanes, IV 277). The mysteries connected with the worship of these gods later rivaled the famous mysteries of Eleusis, and both Philip of Macedon and Olympia his wife were initiated here (Plut. Alex. 3).

Probably because of its sacred character the island did not figure to any extent in history, but in the expedition of Xerxes in 480 BC, one ship at least of the Samothracian contingent is mentioned as conspicuous in the battle (Xen. Hel. iv.3).

The famous "temple of Samothrace" (now in the Louvre) was set up here by Demetrius Poliorcetes in 300 BC, and was discovered in 1863. Since that time (1873-75), the Austrian government carried on extensive excavations (see Conze, Hauser and Bendendorf, op. cit.).

In the NT the island is mentioned in Acts 16:11. From Troas, Paul made a straight run to Samothrace, and the next day sailed to Neapolis (q.v.) on the Thracian coast, the port of Philippi (q.v.). At the northern end of S., was a town where the ship could anchor for the night, and on the return journey (Acts 20:6) a landing may have been made, but no details are given. Pliny characterizes the island as being most difficult for anchorage, but because of the hazards of sailing by night, the navigator always anchored somewhere if possible.

A town in Asia Minor.

Samson was a judge, perhaps the last before Samuel. He was a Nazirite of the tribe of Dan (Jgs 13:5); a man of prodigious strength, a giant and a gymnast—the champion of the Philistines who had overthrown Israel some time before the birth of Samson, and was willing to fight them alone. He seems to have been actuated by little less than personal vengeance, yet in the NT he is named among the heroes of faith (He 11:32), and was in no ordinary sense an OT worshipper. He was good-natured, sarcastic, full of humor, and fought with his wits as well as with his fists. Milton has graphically portrayed his character in his dramatic poem Samson Agonistes (1671), on which Handel built his oratorio Samsun (1743).

The story of S.'s life is unique among the biographies of the OT. It is related in Jgs 13-16.

3. Story of His Life

To Manoah's wife the angel of Jehovah appeared twice (13-16), directing that the child which should be born to them should be a Nazirite from the womb, and that he would "begin to save Israel out of the hand of the Philistines" (13:7-14). The spirit of Jehovah first began to move in Mahaneh-dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol (13:25). On his arriving at manhood, five remarkable circumstances are recorded of him.

(1) His marriage with a Philistine wife of Timnah (ch. 14). His parents objected to the alliance (14:3), but S.'s motive in marrying her was that he sought an occasion against the Philistines. At the wedding feast S. proppused to his guests a riddle, wagering that if they guessed its answer he would give them 30 changes of raiment. Dr. Moore felicitously renders the text of the riddle thus:

'Of the eater came they to eat, And out of the strong came something sweet' (14:14).

The Philistines threatened the life of his bride, and she in turn wrung from S. the answer; whereupon he retorted (in Dr. Moore's version):

'If with my heifer ye did not plough, Ye had not found out my riddle, I trow' (14:18).

Accordingly, in revenge, S. went down to Ashkelon, slew some 30 men, and paid his debt; he even went down without his family to save her from shame gave her to S.'s "best man" (14:20). It has been suggested by W. R. Smith ('Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia,' 70-76) that S. did not from the first intend to take his bride to his home, his marriage being what is known among the Arabs as a kadibat, or gift marriage, by which is meant that the husband becomes a part of the wife's tribe. This assumes that the social relations of the Hebrews at that time were matriarchate, the wife remaining with her family, of which custom there are other traces in the OT, the husband merely visiting the wife from time to time. But this is not so obvious in S.'s case in view of his pique (14:19), and esp. in view of his parents' objection to the marriage outside of Israel (14:3). Not knowing that his bride had been given by her father to his friend, S. went down to Timnah to visit her, with a kid; when he discovered, however, that he had been taken advantage of, he went out and caught 300 jackals, and put a fire between every two tails, he burned up the grain fields and olive yards of the Philistines. The Philistines, however, showed they could play with fire, too, and burned his wife and her father. Thereupon, S. smote the Philis in revenge, "hip and thigh" (15 1-8).

(2) When he escaped to Etam, an almost vertical rock cliff in Judah (by some identified with 'Aray Jasim, near Zela), the Philis invaded Judah, encamped at Lehi above Etam, and demanded the surrender of their arch-enemy. The men of Judah were willing to hand S. over to the Philis, and accordingly went down to the cliff Etam, bound S. and brought him up where the Philis were encamped (15 9-13). When S. came to Lehi the Philis shouted as they met him, whereupon the spirit of Jehovah came mightily upon him, so that he broke loose from the two new ropes with which the 3,000 men of Judah had bound him, and seizing a fresh jawbone of an ass he smote with it 1,000 men of the Philis, assuming as he did so in pun-like poetry, 'With the jawbone of an ass, m. ass upon m.-ass'; or, as Dr. Moore translates the passage, 'With the bone of an ass, I ass-ailed my ass-ailants' (15 16).

At the same time, S. reverently gave Jehovah the glory of his victory (15 18). S. being thirsty, Jehovah provided water for him at a place called En-hakkore, or "Partridge Spring," or "the Spring of the Caller", another name for Partridge (15 17-19).

(3) S. next went down to Gaza, to the very stronghold of the Philis, their chief city. There he saw a harlot, and, his passions not being under control, he went in unto her. It was soon noised about that S., the Heb giant, was in the city. Accordingly, the Philis laid wait for him. But S. arose at midnight and laid hold of the doors of the gate and their two posts, and carried them a full quarter of a mile up to the top of the mountain that looketh toward Hebron (16 1-3).

S. betook himself to the valley of Sorek where he fell in love with another Phili woman, named Delilah, through whose machinations he lost his spiritual power. The Philis bribed her with a very large sum to deliver him into their hands. Three times S. deceived her as to the secret of his strength, but at last he explains that he is a Nazirite, and that his hair, which has never been shorn, is the secret of his wonderful power. J. G. Frazer (Golden Bough, III, 390 ff) has shown that the belief that some mysterious power resides in the hair is still widespread among savage peoples, e.g. the Fiji Islanders. Thus S. fell. By disclosing to Delilah this secret, he broke his covenant vow, and the Spirit of God departed from him (16 4-9). S. then hid his jawbone, but on his eyes, brought him down to Gaza, bound him with fetters, and forced him to grind in the prison house. Grinding was women's work! It is at this point that Milton catches the picture and writes, "Eyeless in Gaza, at the mill with slaves." Howbeit, the hair of his head began to grow again; but his eyes did not (16 21,22).

(5) The final incident recorded of S. is in connection with a great sacrificial feast which the Philis lords gave in honor of Dagon, their god. In their joyous celebration they sang in rustic rhythm: "Our god has given us into our hand The best fruit of our hand, Whom even our most powerful band Was never able to withstand" (16 24).

This song was accompanied probably, as Mr. M'Calister suggests, by hand-clapping (Gezer, 129). When they thought they had succeeded, they called for S. to play the bufoon, and by his gesticulations to entertain the assembled multitude. The house of Dagon was full of people; about 3,000 were upon the roof beholding as S. made sport. With the new power of his jawbone his strength had returned to him. The dismantled giant longed to be venged on his adversaries for at least one of his two eyes (16 25).

He prayed, and Jehovah heard his prayer. Guided by his attendant, he took hold of the wooden posts of the two middle pillars upon which the portico of the house rested, and slipping them off their pedestals, he did a great work, and killed there the 3,000 men that were therein. "So the dead that he slew at his death were more than they that he slew in his life" (16 29,30). S.'s kinsmen came and carried him up and buried him near his boyhood home, between Zorah and Eshtaol, on the tomb of his father. "And he judged Israel twenty years" (16 31).

The story of S. is a faithful mirror of his times: "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (16 17; 21 29). In those days, i.e. no central government. Each tribe was separately occupied driving out their individual enemies. For 40 years the Philis had oppressed S.'s tribal compatriots. Their superiority was also recognized by Judah (14 4; 15 11). S. was the hero of the tribe. The general historicity of his story cannot be impeached on the mere ground of improbability. His deeds were those which would most naturally be expected from a giant, filled with the gospels of justice and mercy. His popularity which is a man of extraordinary prowess would naturally be widespread. All peoples knew his feats. The theory that the record in Jgs 13-16 is based upon some "solar myth" is now generally abandoned. That there are incidents in his story the difficulty of which is difficult to explain, is freely granted. For example, that he killed a lion with his bare hands (16 4) is not without parallel in the lives of Samson and Beniah did the same (1 S 17 34-36; 2 S 20 20).

God always inspires a man in the line of his natural endowments. S.'s greater endowment (16 15) is no more marvelous than what God did for Saul in the wilderness (Gen 31 19-20). To push S. carried off the doors of the gate of Gaza and their two posts, far and all, must not confound us till we know more definitely their size and the distance of the hill to which he carried them. The fact that he pulled down the roof on which there were 3,000 men and women is not at all impossible, as Mr. Macalister has shown. If we suppose that there was an immense portico to the temple of Dagon, as is entirely supported by two main pillars of wood resting on bases of stone, like the main pillar of the temple of Solomon (1 K 7 22), all that S., therefore, necessarily did, was to push the wooden beams so that their feet would slide over the stone base on which they rested, and the whole portico would collapse. Moreover, it is not said that the whole of the 3,000 on the roof were destroyed (16 30). Many of those in the temple proper probably perished in the number (R. A. S. McCalister, Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer, 1900, 127-33).

Not a few important and suggestive lessons are deductible from the hero's life: (1) S. was the object of parental solicitude from even before 5. Religious his birth. One of the most suggestive Value and beautiful prayers in the OT is that for the blessing of his yet unborn child (13 8). Whatever our estimate of his personality is, S. was closely linked to the covenant. (2) He was endowed with the Spirit of Jehovah—the spirit of personal patriotism, the spirit of vengeance upon a foe of 40 years' standing (13 1-25; 14 6 19; 15 14). (3) He also prayed, and Jehovah answered him, though in judgment (16 30). But he was prodigal of his strength. S. had spiritual power and performed feats which an ordinary man would hardly perform. But he was unconsciuos of his high vocation. In a moment of weakness he yielded to Delilah and divulged the secret of his strength. He was careless of his personal endowment. He did not realize that physical endowments must be combined with spiritual gifts and the training that to retain them we must be obedient. (4) He was passionate and therefore weak. The animal of his nature was never curbed, but rather ran unchained and free. He was given to sudden fury. S. was a wild thing, a Passion ruled. He could not resist the blandishments and allurements of women. In short, he was an overgrown schoolboy, without self-mastery. (5) He accordingly wrought no permanent deliverance for Israel; he lacked the spirit of cooperation. He undertook a task far too great for even a giant single-handed. Yet, it must be allowed that S. paved the way for Saul and David. He began the deliverance of Israel from the Philis. He must, therefore, be judged according to his times. In his days there was unrestrained individual independence on every side, each one doing as he pleased, and differed from his contemporaries in that he was a hero of faith (He 11:32). He was a Nazirite, and therefore dedicated to God. He was given to revenge, yet he was ready to sacrifice himself in order that his own and his people's enemies might be overthrown. He was willing to lay down his life for the sake of his fellow tribesmen—not to save his enemies, however, but to kill them. (Cf Mt 5:43f; Rom 5:10.)

Samuel, sam`u-el (שָׁמוּעֵל, sh'mū'ēl; Σαμουήλ, Samouel), The word "Samuel" signifies "name of God," or "his name is El" (God). Other interpretations of the name that have been offered are almost certainly mistaken. The play upon the name in 1 S 1:20 is not intended of course to be an explanation of its meaning, but is similar to the play upon the name of Moses in Ex 6:3 and frequently elsewhere in similar instances. Thus by the addition of a few letters sh'mū'ēl becomes sh'āl mē'ēl (שָׂאלוּ מְאֵל, shōlū mē'ēl), "asked of God," and recalls to the mother of Samuel the circumstances of the Divine gift to her of a son. Outside of the 1st Book of S the name of the great judge and prophet is found in 1Ch 1:45; 1 Sa 9:26; 1Ch 6:9, and in 1 and 2 Ch. The reference in Jgs seems intended to convey the same impression that is given by the narrative of 1 S, that in some sense Samuel had come to be regarded as a second Moses, upon whom the mantle of the latter had fallen, and who had been once again the deliverer and guide of the people at a great national crisis.

The narrative of the events of the life of Samuel appears to be derived from more than one source (see Samuel, Books, 1 and 2). The narrative sources and character of the history are thus presented on the whole harmonious and consistent, and gives a very high impression of his piety and loyalty to Jeh, and of the wide influence for good which he exerted. There are divergences apparent in detail and standpoint between the sources or traditions, some of which may probably be due merely to misunderstanding of the true nature of the events recorded, or to the failure of the modern reader rightly to appreciate the exact circumstances and time. The greater part of the narrative of the life of Samuel, however, appears to represent a single origin.

In the portion of the general history of Israel contained in 1 S are narrated the circumstances of the future prophet's birth (ch 1); of his childhood and of the custom of his parents to take him to the tabernacle at Shiloh (2 11:18-21 26); of his vision, and the universal recognition of him as a prophet enjoying the special favor of Jeh (3-4 1). The narrative is then interrupted to describe the conflicts with the Philis, the fate of Eli and his sons, and the capture of the ark of God. It is only after the return of the ark, and apparently at the close of the 20 years during which it was retained at Kiriath-jearim, that Samuel again comes forward publicly, exhorting the people to repentance and promising them deliverance from the Philis. The main narrative is then given of the summoning of a national council at Mizpah, at which Samuel "judged the children of Israel," and offered sacrifice to the Lord, and of Jeh's response in a great thunderstorm, which led to the defeat and panic-stricken flight of the Philis. Then follows the narrative of the erection of a commemorative stone or pillar, Eben-ezer, "the stone of help," and the recovery of the Israelite cities which the Philis had captured (7 5-14). The narrator adds that the Philis came no more within the border of Israel all the days of Samuel (7 13); perhaps with an intentional reference to the troubles and disasters of which this people was the cause in the time of Saul. A brief general statement is appended of Samuel's practice as a judge of going on annual circuit through the land, and of his home at Ramah (7 15-17).

No indication is given of the length of time occupied by these events. At their close, however, Samuel was an old man, and his sons who had been appointed judges in his place at Ramah by office proved unworthy (8 1-3). The elders of the people therefore came to Samuel demanding the appointment of a king who should be his successor, and should judge in his stead. The request was regarded by Samuel as an act of disloyalty to Jeh, but his protest was overruled by Divine direction, and at Samuel's bidding the people dispersed (8 4-22).

At this point the course of the narrative is again interrupted to describe the family origin of Saul, his personal ambition, and the search for the lost asses of his father (9 1-5); his meeting with Samuel in a city in the land of Zuph, in or on the border of the territory of Benjamin (Zuph is the name of an ancestor of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, in 1 S 1:1), a meeting of which Samuel had received Divine pre-intimation (9 15); the honorable place given to Saul at the feast; his anointing by Samuel as ruler of Israel, together with the announcement of three 'signs' which should herald the inauguration of the reality of his appointment and destiny; the spirit of prophecy which took possession of the future king, whereby is explained a proverbial saying which classed Saul among the prophets; and his silence with regard to what had passed between himself and Samuel on the subject of the kingdom (9 6-10 16).

It is usually, and probably rightly, believed that the narrative of these last incidents is derived from a different source from that of the preceding chapters. Slight differences of inconsistency or disagreement lie on the surface. Samuel's home is not at Ramah, but a nameless city in the land of Zuph, where he is priest of the high place, with a local but, as far as the narrative goes, not a national influence or reputation; and it is anticipated that, he will require the customary present at the hands of his visitors (9 6-8). He is described, moreover, not as a judge, nor does he discharge judicial functions, but expressly as a "seer," a name said to be an earlier title equivalent to the later "prophet". Apart, however, from the apparently different position which Samuel occupies, the tone and spirit of the narrative is altogether distinct from that of the preceding chapters. It suggests, both in its form and in the religious conceptions which are assumed or implied, an older and less elaborated tradition than that which has found expression in the greater part of the book; and it seems to regard events as it were from a more primitive standpoint than the highly religious and monothetic view of the later accounts. It is possible to write off the prophet's apparent imperfections, but perhaps rather enhanced by its separate and independent position. Samuel's character is, however, best as a whole in his completed narrative at the point at which he judged most suitable. To the same source or possibly to that which preceded the announcement of Saul's rejection in 13 8-15.

The course of the narrative is resumed at 10 17 ff, where, in a second national assembly at Mizpah, Saul is selected by lot and accepted by the people as king (10 17-24); after which the people dispersed, and Saul returned to his home at Gibeah (vs 25-27). At a solemn assembly at Gilgal, at which the king received again formally the consecrated anointing oil from Samuel, and delivered a farewell address to his fellow-countrymen. A thunderstorm terrified the people; they were reassured, however, by Samuel with promises of the protection and favor of Jehovah, if they continued to fear and serve Him (11 1-12 25). The selection and rejection of a successor to Samuel together with the lamentations of the people for him, are briefly recorded in 25 1, and referred to again in 28 3.

Samuel's life, therefore, in which he is brought into relation with the future king David. No indication of date or circumstance is given except that the first incident apparently follows immediately upon the second and final rejection of Saul (chs 15 and 16 1-13). It narrates the commission of Samuel to anoint a successor to Saul, and the fulfilment of the commission by the choice of David the son of Jesse, the Bethlehemite. And, in a later chapter (19 18-24), a second commission is narrated on which the prophecies uttered and the prophecy came upon Saul, and again on the prophet's part. "Is Saul also among the prophets?" is quoted (19 24; cf 10 11.12), and is apparently regarded as taking its origin from this event.

The anointing of David by Samuel is a natural sequel to the anointing of Saul. When the latter has been rejected and his authority and rights as king have ceased. There is nothing to determine absolutely whether the narrative is derived from the same source as the greater part of the preceding history. Slight differences of style and terminologies of the same composition of the latter have led most scholars to the conclusion that it has a distinct and separate origin. When the compiler of the Books of Samuel drew upon a third source for his narrative of the life of the seer, a source which there is no reason to regard as of inferior authority and accuracy. With the second incident related in 19 18-24, the case is different. In this passage the text and context are drawn upon in such an emended form that its relation to the earlier version is suggested and passed into currency independently on two distinct occasions. It seems evident that here two independent sources or authorities were employed, which preserved hardly reconcilable accounts of the origin of a well-known saying, in one of which it has been mistakenly attributed to a similar but not identical occurrence in the life of Saul. In the final composition of the book both accounts were then inserted, without notice being taken of the inconsistency which was apparent between them.

Yet later in the history Samuel is represented as appearing to Saul in a vision at Ezel on the eve of his death (28 11-20). The witch also sees the prophet and is stricken with fear. He is described as in appearance an old man "covered with a robe" (ver 14). In characteristicly grave and measured tones he tells the sorceress of death against the king for his disobedience to Jehovah, and announces its execution on the morrow; Saul's sons also will die with him (ver 19), and the whole nation will be involved in the penalty and suffering, as they all have been in sin. The high place which Samuel occupies in the thought of the writers and in the tradition and esteem of the people is manifest throughout the history. The different sources from which the narrative is derived are at once in this, although perhaps not to an equal degree. He is the last and greatest of the judges, the first of the prophets, and inaugurates under Divine direction the Israelite kingdom and the Davidic line. It is not without reason, therefore, that he has been regarded as in dignity and importance occupying the position of Moses a second Moses in relation to the people. In his exhortations and warnings the Deuteronomic discourses of Moses are reflected and repeated. He delivers the nation from the hand of the Philistines, as Moses from Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and opens up for them a new national era of progress and order under the rule of the kings whom they have desired. Thus, like Moses, he closes the old order, and establishes the people with brighter prospects upon more assured foundations for the future and great. In nobility of character and utterance also, and in fidelity to Jehovah, Samuel is not unworthy to be placed by the side of the older lawgiver. The record of his life is not marred by any act or word which would appear unworthy of his office or preceptor. And the few references to him in the later literature (Ps 99 6; Jer 15 1; 1 Ch 6 28; 9 22; 11 3; 26 28; 29 29; 2 Ch 35 18) show how high was the estimation in which his name and memory were held by his fellow-countrymen in subsequent ages.

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF:

I. Place in the Canon.—In the Heb Canon and enumeration of the sacred books of the OT, the two Books of Samuel were reckoned as one, and formed the third division of the earlier Prophets (נביאים נביאים, n'bh'im r'sh'hn'tm). The one book bore the title "Samuel" (נביאים, n'sh'ml', not because Samuel was the author, but because his life and acts formed the main theme of the book, or at least of its earlier part. Nor was the Book of Samuel separated by any real division in subject-matter or continuity of style from the Book of Kings, which in the original formed a single book, not two as in the Eng. and other modern VSS. The history was carried forward without interruption; and the record of the life of David, begun in Samuel, was continued in Kings. This continuity in the narrative of Israelite history was made more prominent in the LXX, where the four books were comprised under one title and were known as the four "Books of the Kingsdom" (ββασιλεία, ββασιλεία). This name was probably due to the translators or scholars of Alexandria. The division into four books, but not the joint title, was then adopted in the Lat. tr, where, however, the influence of Jerome secured the restoration of the Heb names, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings (Regum). Jerome's example was universally followed, and the fourfold division with the Heb title found a place in all subsequent VSS of the OT Scriptures. Ultimately the distinction of Samuel and Kings each into two books was received also into printed editions of the Heb Bible. This was done for the first time in the editio princeps of the Rabbinic Bible, printed at Venice in 1516-17 AD.
II. Contents and Period of the History.—The narrative of the two Books of S covers a period of about a hundred years, from the close of the unsettled era of the Judges to the establishment and consolidation of the kingdom under David. It is therefore a record of the changes, national and constitutional, which accompanied this growth and development of the national life, at the close of which the Israelites found themselves a united people under the rule of a king to whom all allegiance, controlled and guided by more or less definitely established institutions and laws. This may be described as the general purpose and main theme of the books, to trace the advance of the people under Divine guidance to a state of settled prosperity and unity in the promised land, and to give prominence to the theocratic rule which was the essential condition of Israel’s life as the people of God under all the changing forms of early government. The narrative therefore centers itself around the lives of the three men, Samuel, Saul and David, who were chiefly instrumental in the establishment of the monarchy, and to whom it was due more than to any others that Israel emerged from the depressed and disunited state in which the tribes had remained during the period of the rule of the Judges, and came into possession of a combined and effective national life. If the formal separation therefore into two books be disregarded, the history of Israel as it is narrated in ‘Samuel’ is most naturally divided into three periods, which are followed by an appendix recording words and incidents which for some reason had not found a place in the general narrative:

A. The life and rule of Samuel (1 S 1—15) (death 1 S 16:1).
B. The life, reign and death of Saul (1 S 16—2 S 1).
C. The reign and acts of David to the suppression of Amnon and Absalom and the death of Joab (2 S 2—20).
D. Appendix; other incidents in the reign of David, the names of his thirty valiant warriors and his Song of Praise (2 S 21—34).

III. Summary and Analysis.—To present a brief and clear analysis of these Books of S is not altogether easy. For as in the Pent and the earlier historical Books of Joshua and Judges, repetitions and apparently duplicate accounts of the same event are interwoven with the chronological development of the narrative. Even the main divisions, as stated above, to a certain extent overlap.

(1) Visit of Hannah to Shiloh, and promise of the birth of a son (1 S 1:3–18).
(2) Birth of Samuel, and presentation to Eli at Shiloh (1 S 1:19–25).
(3) Death of the old Eli, on the occasion of the burning of the golden calf (1 S 4).
(4) Disinfection of Dagon before the ark of God at Ashdod; return of the ark to Beth-shemesh, with expiatory offerings; anathematization of the town; its two sons slain by wild beasts at Kirjath-jearim (1 S 5:1–7 4).
(5) Assembly of Israel under Samuel at Mizpah, and victory over the Philistines (7:1–5); Samuel established as judge over all Israel (15:17–26).
(6) Samuel’s summons to the people to judge and the consecration of the people for a king; Samuel’s warning concerning the character of the king for whom they were preparing (ch. 4).
(7) Saul’s search for the lost asses of his father and meeting with Samuel (ch. 9).
(8) Saul’s appointment by Samuel to be ruler over the people of Israel, and receives the gift of prophecy (10:1–16); second assembly of the people at Mizpah, and anointing of Saul to be king (ch. 17–27).
(9) Victory of Saul over the Ammonites and deliverance of Jabesh-gilead (11:1–15); Saul made king in Gibeon (vv 14:15).
(10) Samuel’s address to the people in Gilgal, demanding his own life and action, and exhorting them to fear and serve the Lord (ch. 12).
(11) Saul at Gilgal offers the burnt offering in Samuel’s absence; gathering of the Philis to battle at Michmash; the bribe of Saul’s son; an attempt on the life of Jonathan; the people unanimously anoint David king (ch. 13).
(12) Jonathan’s surprise of the Philis army, and their sudden panic (14:1–23); Saul’s vow, unwittingly broken by Jonathan, and his attempt to murder Jonathan (vs 24–45); victories of Saul over his enemies on every side (ch. 16–22).
(13) War against Amalek, and Saul’s disobedience to the Divine command to exterminate the Amalekites (1:15).

(a) Anointing of David as Saul’s successor (16:1–13); his summons to the court of Saul as anoint as minister before the king (vs 14–25).
(2) Reign of David and Goliath (ch. 17).
(3) Saul’s death at the hand of Jonathan (ch. 18:1–4); the former’s advancement and fame, the jealousy of Saul, and his attempt to kill David (18:5–16; 29:20); David’s marriage to the daughter of Saul (vs 17–25).
(4) David’s victory, and Saul’s renewed jealousy of David and second attempt to kill him (19:1–17; 20:1).
(5) Jonathan’s warning to David of his father’s resolve and their parting (ch. 20).
(6) David at Nob (21:1–9); and with Achish of Gath (vs 10–15).
(7) David’s band of outlaws at Adullam (22:1–3); his provision for the safety of his father and mother in Moab (vs 3–6); the vengeance of Saul on those who had helped David (vs 6–23).
(8) Repeated attempts of Saul to take David (chs 23, 24).
(9) Death of Samuel (25:1); Abigail becomes David’s wife, after the death of her husband Nabal (vs 2–44).
(10) Saul’s further pursuit of David (ch. 26).
(12) David’s pursuit of the Amalekites who had raided Ziklag, and victory of his men (ch. 29).
(13) Battle between the Philis and Israel in Mt. Gilboa (28:1–6; 31:2–9).
(14) News of Saul’s death brought to David at Ziklag (2 S 1:1–16); David’s lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (ch. 31:17).
(15) David’s seven and a half years’ reign over Judah in Hebron (2 S 1:3–5 3;)
(1) Return of the ark to the city of David (ch. 6).
(2) David’s purpose to build a temple for the Lord (7:1–3); the Divine answer by the prophet Nathan, and the king’s prayer (vs 4–29).
(3) Victories over the Philis, Syrarians, and other peoples (ch. 8).
(4) David’s reception of Mephibosheth (9).
(5) Defeat of the Ammonites and Syrians by the men of Israel under the command of Joab (10:1–11:1).
(6) David and Uriah, the latter’s death in battle, and David’s marriage with Bath-sheba (ch. 11).
(7) Nathan’s parable and David’s conviction of sin (12:1–16); the king’s grief and intercession for his sick son (vs 16–25); siege and capture of Rabbah, the Ammonite capital (vs 26–31).
(8) Amnon’s murder of Absalom (13:1–22); Absalom’s revenge and murder of Amnon (vs 23–36); flight of Absalom (ch. 37–39).
(9) Return of Absalom to Jerus (14:1–24); his beauty, and reconciliation with the king (vs 25–33).
(10) Absalom’s method of ingratiating himself with the people (15:1–6); his revolt and the flight of the king from Jerus (vs 7–31); meeting with Hushai (vs 32–37); Absalom in Jerusalem (vs 36–37).
(11) David’s meeting with Ziba (16:1–4), and Shimuel (vs 5–14); counsel of Ahithophel and Hushai (16:15–17:4); the latter’s death (17:13–22); flight of David (vs 18–20).
(12) David’s flight from Maon (17:24–29).
(13) The revolt subdued, death of Absalom, and reception by David of the tidings (ch. 18:1–19:8).
(14) Return of David to the king’s quarters at Hebron (18:19–40).
V. Character and Date of Sources.—Attempts which have been made to determine the date of these two sources, or to identify them with one or other of the fragments of the traditions from which the historical narratives of the Pentateuch are derived, have not been successful. The judgment of some, however, the later of the two sources should be regarded as a continuation of the narrative of the document known as E, and as representing a historical work or a collection of historical documents related to J. The style of the latter has much in common with the style of J, and is clear, vigorous and poetical, as religious conclusions also that are drawn are of a simple and early type. The later writing has been supposed to give indications of the influence of the prophetic teaching of the 8th century. The indications, however, are not sufficiently decisive to enable one to form any definite conclusions. It is therefore possible that J and E represent rather schools of teaching and thought than individual works, the characteristics of the two sources of the Books of S would not be out of harmony with the view that from those two schools respectively were derived the materials out of which the history was compiled. The "sources" would then, according to the usual view, belong to the 9th century of the Christian era; and to a period not more than a century or a century and a half later should be assigned the final compilation of the completed form of the narratives contained in the Hebrew Canon of Scripture.

VI. Greek and Other Portions of the Bible.—The attempts to determine the approximate and understanding of the history and text of the Books of S account must further be taken of the Gr version or versions. In the LXX there is a great divergence from the Massoretic text, and it is probable that in the course of transmission the Gr text has been exposed to corruption to a very considerable extent. At least two recensions of the Gr text are in existence, represented by the Vatican and Alexandrian Codices, respectively, of which the latter is nearer to the Heb original, and has apparently been more in the main text. The rest of the text, the Massoretic Heb and B and A in the Greek. The correct form of the text recovered, would represent a text anterior to the Masoretic recension, differing from, but not necessarily superior to, the latter. For the restoration of the Gr text, the Old Lat. where it is available, affords valuable help. It is evident than that in any given instance the agreement of these three types or recensions of the text is the strongest possible witness to the originality and authenticity of a reading; but that the weight attaching to the testimony of A will not in general, on account of the history of its text, be equivalent to that of either of the other two.

VII. Ethical and Religious Teaching.—The religious teaching and thought of the two Books of S it is difficult to summarize. The books are in form a historical record of events; but they are also at the same time conceived with a definite purpose, and made to subserve a definite moral and religious aim. It is not a narrative of events solely, or the preservation of historical detail, that the writer has in view, but rather to elucidate and enforce from Israel's experience the significance of the Divine and moral government of the nation. The duty of king and people alike is to obey Jeh, to render strict and willing deference to His commands, and on this path of obedience and righteousness, national independence and prosperity be secured. With this is connected also, of course, pious and appropriate, and with uncompromising severity, sin even in the highest places is condemned; and an ideal of righteousness is set forth in language and with an earnestness which is a rebuke and a severe exhortation. Thus the same is true of the Book of Judges, the first book in the Pentateuch or the OT; they are composed with a didactic aim. The experience of the past is made to afford lessons of warning and encouragement for the present. To the writer or writers of the sources, the destruction and after the fall and upbuilding of the Israelite kingdom is pregnant with a deeper meaning than lies on the surface, and this meaning he endeavors to make plain to his readers through the record. The issues of the events derived from other sources, and additions made by the editor or editors. This general determination of sources presents a basis upon which the idea of dependence, and upon slighter varieties of style which are neither so pronounced nor so readily distinguished as in the books of Joshua, Judges and Ruth. It is in the mind that a close and exact division or line of demarcation in essential detail is not to be drawn at this point. and the events themselves are under the guidance and control of Jehovah, who always condemns and punishes wrong, and approves and rewards righteousness. Thus the narrative is history utilized to convey moral truth. And its value is estimated, not primarily as recording the great deeds of the past, but as conveying ethical teaching; that by means of the history Jehovah strengthens the moral and spiritual interest the people may be recalled to a sense of their high duty toward God, and be warned of the inevitable consequences of disobedience to Him.

Sanada, san'á-as (A and Fritzsche, Zavádas, Sanásas, B, Zaqá, Sandi; AV Annaas): The sons of Sanada returned in large numbers with Zerubbabel (7,000) in Ezra 2:61. The numbers vary in each case (Ezd, 3,330 or 3,301; Ezr, 3,630; Neh, 3,930).

Sanabásaros, san-á-bas'ár (in 1 Esd 2:12,15). Sanabásaru (Sanabásar, Sanabásásaros, B, Sanamásósrá, Sanamásásrád, in 2:12[1]) (RVm Samanassar), Sanavarásró, Samanassarán, in 2:13[1], but Sanabasá-sáró, Sabanásásará, in 6:18[17] (RVm) and Sanábá-sáró, Sanabásárosaró, in 6:20 [19]: He was "governor of Judaea" under Cyrus, conveyed the holy vessels of the temple from Babylon to Jerusalem and laid the foundations of the house of the Lord for the first time since its destruction (Ezd 2:25; 12:15; 6:18-20) = "Sneshbárasar [q.v.] the prince of Judah." (Ezd 1:8).

Some identify him with Zerubbabel as AVm in 1 Esd 6:18: "Z., which also is S. the ruler." This view appears to be favored by the order of the names here, where, in case of two persons, one might expect "S., the ruler," to come first. Zerubbabel appears as "governor of Judæa also in 1 Esd 6:27-29. Ezr 3:10 speaks of the foundation of the temple under Zerubbabel and 5:16 as under Sanabásaro. "Sanbahaz" in Ezd 2:35, in the Chronicle of Sudek. "Sanabazus, in 5[4]:40, where Nehemiah and Atthisar refer to the same person, identify Sanabásaro; Zerubbabel is not a styled ruler or governor either in Neh or Ezr, but in Hag 1:14; 2:21 he is rahsh or governor of Jehovah; no exact rendering for it in the double name as in the case of e.g. Daniel. Beltshazzar; the language of Ezr 5:14 seems to refer to a title used for a different position than Zerubbabel. Nor is there any reason against supposing a first return under Sheshbazzar (Sanabasáro) and a foundation of the temple previous to the time of Zerubbabel—an undertaking into which the Jews did not enter heartily, perhaps because Sanabásar may have been a foreigner (though it is uncertain whether he was a Babylonian, a Persian, or a Jew). A later proposal is to identify Sanabásar with Sheshbazzar, the uncle of Zerubbabel in 1 Ch 3:18. But either of these identifications must remain doubtful. See Sneshbáras [q.v.]; Zerubbabel.

Sanadás, san'á-dás (Fritzsche, Zawadá, Sanazád, but B and Swete, Zavádas). A, "A'avásib (Anazád): Found only in 1 Esd 5:24, where the sons of Jedu, the son of Jesus, are a priestly family returning "among the sons of Sanadás." The name is not found in the [Ezd 2:36; Neh 7:32] and is perhaps preserved in the Vulg "Eliasaht.

Sanballat, san-bal'át (सांभल, sanbhálát; Gr and Vulg Sanbhálát, Pesh Samballat): Sanballat the Horonite was, if the appellation which follows his name indicates his origin, a Moabite, a Horonite, a city of Moab mentioned in Isa 15:5; Jer 48:21; Am, XII, xiiii; XIV, ii. He is named along with Tobiah, the Ammonite slave (Neh 4:1), and Geshem the Arabian (Neh 6:1) as the leading opponent of the Jews at the time when Nehemiah undertook to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 2:10; 4:1; 6:1). He was related by marriage to the son of Eliashib, the high priest at the time of the annulment of the mixed marriages forbidden by the Law (Neh 13:28).

Renewed interest has been awakened in Sanballat from the fact that he is mentioned in the papyri I and II of Sachau (Die aramischen Papyrusurkunden aus Elephantina, Berlin, 1905, and in later work, Aramäische Papyri und Ostraka, Leipzig, 1911; cf Stucken's convenient ed in Lietzmanns Kleine Texte 687) as regularly receiving from the governor (pahath) of Samaria some time before the 17th year of Darius (Nohous), i.e. 408-407 BC, when Bagohi was governor of Judah. His two sons, Deliah and Shelemiah, received a letter from Jehoidiah and his companions the priests who were in Yeb (Elephantine) in Upper Egypt. This letter contained information concerning the state of affairs in the Jewish colony of Yeb, esp. concerning the destruction of the temple or synagogue (agoras) which had been erected at that place.

The address of this letter reads as follows: "Our lord Bagohi, the governor of Judaea, his servants Jehoidiah and his companions, the priests in the fortress of Yeb [Elephantine, etc.]. Say the God of heaven (who) inquire much at every time after the peace of our lord and put thee in peace in favor before Bagohi the king," etc. The conclusion of the letter reads thus: "Now, my lord and his companions and the Jews, all citizens of Yeb, may thus: If it seems good to you, think on the rebuilding of that temple [the agora which had been destroyed by the Egyptians]. Since it has not been permitted to us hitherto, do thou look on the receivers of thy benefactions and favors here in Egypt. Let a letter with regard to the rebuilding of the temple of the God Jehovah in the fortress of Yeb, as it was formerly built, be sent from thee. In thy name will they offer the meal offerings, the incense, and the burnt offerings upon the altar of the God Jehovah and we shall always pray for thee that thy days may be long in a land of peace and that all the Jews found here, until the temple has been rebuilt. And it will be to thee a meritorious work [erdikkh] in the sight of Jehovah, the God of Heaven, greater than the meritorious work of a man who offers to him a burnt offering and a sacrifice of a value equal to the value of 1,000 talents of silver. And as to the gold [probably that which was sent by the Jews to Bagohi as a baksheesh] we have sent word and given knowledge. Also, we have in our name communicated in a letter all [these] matters unto Deliah and Shelemiah, the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria. Also, from all that has been done these days, Arahsham [the scribe of Egypt] has learned nothing.

Sanballat is the Bab Sin-biballit, "may Sin give him life," a name occurring a number of times in the contract tablets from the time of Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus, and Darius Hystaspis. (See Tallquist, NeuBABylonisches Namenbuch, 153.)

Sanctification, sanクト-ti-ti-kə shun:

Etymology:
I. The formal sense
1. In the NT
II. The ethical sense
1. Transformation of formal to ethical idea
2. Our relation to God as personal: NT idea
3. Sanctification of we, as individuals
4. Questions of time and method
5. An element in all Christian life
6. Following from fellowship with God
7. Is instantaneous and entirety?
8. Sanctification as man's task

Literature:
The root is found in the OT in the Heb vb. עֲקַדָּת, ḫādāš, in the NT in the Gr vb. ἁγιάζω, ἁγιάζειν. The noun "sanctification"

Etymology (ἁγιάζω, hagiazoō) does not occur in south of OT and is not used in the NT, but the roots noted above appear in a group of important words which are of very frequent occurrence. These words are "holy," "hallow," "hallowed," "holiness," "consecrate," "saint, sanctify," "sanctification." It must be borne in mind that these words are all of the same root, and that the point of them can be treated adequately without reference to the others. All have undergone a certain development. Broadly stated, this has been from the formal, or ritual, to the ethical, and these different meanings must be carefully distinguished.

1. The Formal Sense.—By sanctification is ordinarily meant that hallowing of the Christian believer by which he is freed from sin and enabled to realize the will of God in his life. This is not, however, the first or common meaning in the Scriptures. To sanctify, as this common word is made to mean, is to separate from the world and consecrate to God. To understand this primary meaning we must go back to the word "holy" in the OT. That is holy which belongs to Jeh. There is "prostitute" here in the sense of OT character. It may refer to days and seasons, to places, to objects used for worship, or to persons. Exactly the same usage is shown with the word "sanctify." To sanctify something is to declare it as belonging to God: "Sanctify unto me all the first-born... it is mine" (Ex 13:2; cf Nu 3:13; 8:17). It applies thus to all that is connected with worship, to the Levites (Nu 3:12), the priests and the tent of meeting, to the altar and that touching it (Ex 29:36), and the offering (Ex 29:27; cf 2 Macc 2:18; 1 Esd 7:31). The feast and holy days are to be sanctified, that is, set apart from ordinary business as belonging to Jeh (the Sabbath, Nu 15:33; Joel 1:14). The nation as a whole is sanctified when Jeh acknowledges it and receives it as His own, "a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Ex 19:5,6). A man may thus sanctify his house or his field (Lev 27:14,16), but not the firstling of the flock, for this is already Jeh's (Lev 27:26).

It is this formal usage without moral implication that explains such a passage as Gen 38:21. The word translated "sanctify" is used in gen 40:8, 9. Meant meaning it, as elsewhere, the sanctified or consecrated one (kadosoh; see margin and cf Dt 9:1; 1 K 14:24; Hos 4:14). It is the hierodule, the familiar figure of the old pagan temple, the sacred slave consecrated to God and the temple for immemorial purposes. The practice is protested against in Israel (Dt 23:17), but the use of the term illustrates clearly that this word essentially belongs to its primary meaning (cf also 2 K 10:20, 26; and Jehu said, "It shall be none other... for Baal. And they proclaimed it!" cf Joel 1:14).

Very suggestive is the transitive use of the word in the phrase, "to sanctify Jeh." To understand this we must note the use of the word "holy" as applied to Jeh in the OT. Its meaning is not primarily ethical. Jeh's holiness is His supremacy, His sovereignty, His glory, His essential being as God. To say the Holy One is simply to say God. Jeh's holiness is seen in His might, His manifest glory; it is that before which peoples tremble, which makes the nations dread (Ex 15:11-18; cf 1 S 4:6-20; Ps 68:6-25; 89:7, 55). Significance is in the way in which "jealous" and "holy" are almost identified (Josh 24:19; Ezek 38:23). It is God asserting His supremacy, His unique claim. To sanctify Jeh, therefore, to make Him holy, is to assert or acknowledge or bring forth His being as God, His supreme power and glory, His sovereign claim. Ezekiel brings this out most clearly. Jeh has been profaned in the eyes of the nations through Israel's defeat and captivity. True, it was because of Israel's sin, but the nations thought it was because of Jeh's weakness. The ethical is not wanting in these passages. The people are to be separated from their sins and given a new heart (Ezek 36:25; 20:33). But the word "sanctify" is not used for this. It is applied to Jeh, and it means the assertion of Jeh's power in Israel's triumph over the vengeant of her foes (20:41; 26:25; 35:23; 38:16; 39:27). The sanctification of Jeh is thus the assertion of His being and power as God, just as the sanctification of a person or object is the assertion of Jeh's right and claim in the same.

The story of the waters of Meribah illustrates the same meaning. Moses' failure to sanctify is his failure to declare Jeh's glory and power in the miracle of the waters (Ex 15:21; cf Dt 32:40). The story of Nadab and Abihu points the same way. Here "I will be sanctified" is the same as "I will be glorified" (Lev 10:1-3). Not essentially is the same in Isa 5:16; "Jeh of hosts is exalted in justice, and God the Holy One is sanctified in righteousness." Holiness again is the exaltedness of God, His supremacy, which is seen here in the judgment (justice, righteousness) rooted out to the disobedient people (cf the recurrent refrain of 5:25; 9:12.17.21; 10:4; see Justice: Justice of Ps. Isa. 8:13; 29:22 suggest the same lines by the same in which they relate "sanctify" to fear and awe. One NT passage brings us the same meaning (1 Pet 3:15): "Sanctify in your hearts Christ as Lord," that is, exalt Him as supreme.

In a few NT passages the OT ritual sense reappears, as when Jesus speaks of the temple sanctifying the gold, and the altar the gift (Lk 21:5; cf Mt 21:13). The NT continues to use this word in the same sense of making holy in the ethical sense. As the whole context shows, it means to consecrate for His mission in the world. The reference to the disciples, "that they themselves also may be sanctified in truth," has a meaning that they may not be apart (for Jesus sends them, as the Father sends Him), and that they may be made holy in truth.

This same meaning of consecration, or separation, appears when we study the word saint, which is the same as "sanctified one." Aside from its use in the NT, the word is found mainly in the OT. Outside the Gospels, where the term "disciples" is used, it is the common word to designate the followers of Jesus, occurring some 56 times. By "saint" is not meant the morally perfect, but the one who belongs to Christ, just as the sanctified priest or offering belonged to the temple. This Paul can salve the dis- ples at Corinth as saints and a little later rebuke them as carnal and babes, as those among whom are jealous and strife, who walk after the manner of men (1 Cor 1:2; 3:1-3). In the same way the phrase "the holy" or "those who are holy" is used to designate the believers. By "the inheri- tance among all them that are sanctified" is meant the heritage of the Christian believer (Acts 20:32; 26:18; cf 1 Cor 1:2; 6:11; Eph 1:18; Col 1:12). This is the meaning in He, which speaks of the believer as being sanctified by the blood of Christ. In 10:29 the writer speaks of one who has fallen away, who "hath counted the blood of the covenant whereby he was sanctified an unholy thing." Evidently it is not the inner and personal holiness of this apostate, but that is referred to the sacrifice of the whole, but that he had been separated unto God by this sacrificial blood and had then counted the holy offering a common thing. The contrast is between a sacred and common, or between moral perfection and sin (cf 10:10; 13:12). The formal meaning appears again in 1 Cor 7:12-14, where the unbelieving husband is said to be sanctified by the wife, and vice versa. It is not moral character that is meant here, but a certain separation from the profane and unclean and a certain relation to God. This is made plain by the reference to the children: "Else were your children unclean; but now are they holy." The formal sense is less certain in other instances where we have the thought of sanctification in or by the Holy Spirit or in Christ; as in Rom 16 16, "being sanctified by the Holy Spirit"; 1 Cor 1 2, "to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus;" and "in sanctification of the Spirit." Paul's doctrine of the Spirit, and of God it seems to enter in, and yet the reference to 1 Cor suggests that the primary meaning is still that of setting apart, the relating to God.

II. The Ethical Sense. We have been considering what has been called the formal meaning of the word; but the chief interest of Christian thought lies in the ethical idea, sanctification considered as the active deed or process by which the life is made holy. Our first question is, How does the idea of belonging to God become the idea of transformation of life and character? The change is, indeed, nothing less than a part of the whole movement for which the entire moral and spiritual life of the believer is fitted. Now the pivot of this movement is the conception of God. As the thought of God grows more ethical, more spiritual, it molds and changes all other conceptions. Thus what it means to belong to God (holy), sanctification) depends upon the nature of the God to whom man belongs. The hierarchies of Corinth are women of shame because of the nature of the goddess to whose temple they belong. The prophets caught a vision of Jehovah, not jealous for His prerogative, not craving for a show of pantheism, but with a gracious love for His people and a passion for righteousness. Their great message is: This now is Jehovah; hear what it means to belong to such a God and to serve Him. What unto me is the multitude of your sacrifices? Wash you, make you clean; seek justice, relieve the oppressed" (Isa 1 11-16). "When Israel was a child, then I loved him. . . . I desire goodness, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings" (Hos 11 1; 6). In this way the formal idea that we have been considering becomes charged with moral meaning. To belong to God, to be His servant, His son, is no mere external matter. Jesus' teaching as to the part of sanctification does not occur in the Synoptic Gospels at all, but "sonship" with the Jews expressed this same relation of belonging. For them it meant a certain obedience on the one hand, a privilege on the other. Jesus declares that belonging to God means likeness to Him, sonship is sharing His spirit of loving good will (Mt 5 43-48). Brother and sister for Jesus are those who do God's will (Mk 3 35). Paul takes up the same thought, but joins it definitely to the word "sanctification." The religious means the ethical, those "that are sanctified" are "called to be saints" (1 Cor 1 2). The significant phrase is the same as in Rom 1 1, "Paul . . . called to be an apostle." In this light we read Eph 4 1, "Walk worthy of the calling wherewith you were called." 1 Thess 2 12; Phil 2 27. And the end of this calling is that we are "foreordained to be conformed to the image of His Son" (Rom 8 29). We must not limit ourselves to the words "saint" or "sanctify" to get this teaching, it goes along with the whole of Paul's mind and compelling moral appeal: You belong to Christ; live with Him, live unto Him (Col 3 1-4; 1 Thess 5 8). It is no formal belonging, no external surrender. It is the yielding of the life in its passions and purposes, in its deepest affections and highest powers, to be ruled by a new spirit (Eph 4 13-20; 23.24.32; cf Rom 12 1).

But we do not get the full meaning of this thought of sanctification as consecration, or belonging, until we grasp the NT thought of our relation to God. Jesus as the Father has always been that this consecration personal should be thought of in a negative or passive way. Now the Christian's surrender is not to an outer authority but to an inner living fellow being. This consecrated life is thus a life of personal fellowship lived out with the Father in the spirit of Christ in loving trust and obedient service. This positive and vital meaning of sanctification dominates Paul's thought. He speaks of living unto God, of living to the Lord, and, most expressively of all, of being alive unto God (Rom 14 8; cf 6 13; Gal 2 19). So completely is his life filled by this fellowship that he can say, "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me" (Gal 2 20). But there is no quietism here. It is a very rich and active life, this life of fellowship to which we are surrendered. It is a life of sonship in trust and love, with the spirit that enables us to say, "Abba, Father" (Rom 8 15; Gal 4 6). The whole teaching is that the life is lived by God and good will (Mt 5 43-48). It is a life of "faith working through love" (Gal 5 6), it is having the mind of Christ (Phil 2 5). The sanctified life, then, is the life so fully surrendered to fellowship with Christ day by day, that the inner spirit and outward expression are ruled by His spirit.

We come now to that aspect which is central for Christian interest, sanctification as the making holy of life, not by our act, but by God's act. Sanctification as God's Gift in conformity with God's will, then sanctification is the deed or process by which that state is wrought. And this deed we are to consider now as the work of God. Jesus says that the Father may sanctify His disciples in truth (Jn 17 17). So Paul prays for the Thessalonians (1 Thess 5 23), and declares that Christ is to sanctify His church (cf Rom 6 22; 2 Thess 2 13; 2 Tim 2 21; 1 Pet 1 2). Here sanctification means to make clean or holy in the ethical sense, though the idea of consecration is not necessarily lacking. But aside from special passages, we must take into account the whole NT teaching, according to which every part of the Christian's life belongs to God and wrought by His Spirit. "It is God that worketh in you both to will and to work" (Phil 2 13; cf Rom 8 2-3.14.16-26; Gal 5 21). Significant is the use of the words "creature" ("creation," see margin) and "workmanship" with Paul (2 Cor 5 17; Gal 6 15; Eph 2 10; 4 24). The new life is God's second work of creation.

When we ask, however, when and how this work is wrought, there is no such clear answer. What we have is on the one hand an uncompro- mising ideal and demand, and on the other absolute confidence in God. By 4. Questions of Time and Method adding to these two the evident fact that the Christian believers seen in the NT are far from the attainment of such Christian perfection, some writers have assumed to have the foundation here for the doctrine that the state of complete holiness of life is a special experience in the Christian life wrought in a definite moment of time. It is well to realize that no NT passages give any answer to these questions and time and method, and that our conclusions must be drawn from the general teaching of the NT as to the Christian life.

First, it must be noted that in the NT view sanctification in the ethical sense is an essential element
Sanctification

and inevitable result of all Christian life and experience. Looked at from the religious point of view, it is the logical outcome of regeneration. Regeneration is the implanting of a new life in man. So far as that is a new life from God it is ipso facto holy. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit teaches the same (see HOLY SPIRIT). There is no Christian life from the very beginning that is not the work of the Spirit. "No man can [even] say, Jesus is Lord, but in the . . . Spirit" (1 Cor 12:3). But this Spirit is the Holy Spirit, whether with Peter, or with the Christians of Spirit of God (Rom 8:9). His presence, therefore, is in far forth means holiness of life. From the ethical standpoint the same thing is constantly declared. Jesus builds upon the prophets: no religion without righteousness; clean hands, pure hearts, deeds of mercy are not mere conditions of worship, but joined to humble hearts are themselves the worship that God desires (Am 6:21-25; Mic 6:6-8). Jesus deepened the conception, but did not change it, and Paul was true to that succession. "If any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ is in you, . . . the spirit is life because of righteousness" (Rom 8:9,10). There is nothing in Paul’s teaching to suggest that sanctification is the special event of a unique experience, or that there are two kinds or qualities of sanctification. All Christian living meant for him clean, pure, right living, and that was sanctification. The simple, practical way in which he teaches the banish of sexual impurity in his pagan congregations shows this. This is the whole life of God, even the whole sanctification that ye abstain from fornication; that each one of you know how to possess himself of his own vessel in sanctification and honor. For God called us not for uncleanness, but in sanctification" (1 Thess 4:3,4). The strength of Paul’s teaching, indeed, lies here in this combination of moral earnestness with absolute dependence upon God.

The second general conclusion that we draw from the NT teaching is this: the Christian life is this: the sanctification which is a part of all which we know as the Spirit of Christ. Such a fellowship is the supreme moral force for the molding of life, for the shaping of character. It is an analogue of this, and we know with what power it works on life and character. It cannot, however, set forth either the intimacy or the power of this supreme and final relation where our Friend is not another but the very Self. So much we know: this fellowship means a new spirit in us, a renewed and daily renewing life.

It is noteworthy that Paul has no hard-and-fast forms for this life. The reality was too rich and great, and he uses example and command rather than appeal upon theological forms which may serve to comprize the truth instead of expressing it. Here are some of these expressions for this life in us that have "the mind of Christ" (1 Cor 2:16; Phil 2:5), "the Spirit of Christ" (Rom 8:9), "Christ is in you" (Rom 8:10), "the spirit which is from God" (1 Cor 2:12), "the Spirit of God" (1 Cor 3:16), "the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 2:13), "the God of the Lord" (2 Cor 1:2), "the Lord of the Spirit" (2 Cor 3:18). But in all this one fact stands out, this life is personal, a new spirit in us, and that spirit is one that we have in personal fellowship with God; it is His Spirit. Especially significant is the way in which Paul relates this new life to Christ. We have already noted that Paul uses indifferently "Spirit of God" and "Spirit of Christ," as one in the same, as identical, and as the symbol of a new life, the general term, one of the qualities of Christ. Thus the presence of the Spirit is not evidenced in the unusual, the miraculous, the ecstatic utterance of the enthusiast, or some strange deed of power, but in the workaday quality of kindness, goodness, the love of self-sacrifice (Gal 5:22,23). With this, he notes the Spirit of the Christ in mind, we can better understand the passages in which Paul brings out the relation of Christ to the sanctification of the believer. He is the goal (Rom 5:17). We are to grow up in Him and be formed in us (Gal 4:19). We are to behold Him and be changed into His image. This deepens into Paul’s thought of the mystical relation with Christ. The Christian dies to sin with Him that he may live with Him a new life. Christ is now his real life. He dwells in Christ, Christ dwells in him. He has Christ’s thoughts, His mind. See Rom 6:5-11; 8:10; 1 Cor 2:16; 15:22; Gal 2:20.

This vital and positive conception of the sanctification of the believer must be asserted against some popular interpretations. The symbols of fire and water, as suggesting cleansing, have some connection with the key idea of sanctification as a moral basis for a whole superstructure of doctrine. For the former, note Isa 6:6; Lk 3:16; Acts 3:3; for the latter, Acts 1:3-9; Acts 5:32; Tit 3:5; Heb 10:22; Rev 1:5; 7:14.) There is a two-fold danger from which we have escaped. The symbols suggest cleansing, and their over-implication has meant first a negative and narrow idea of sanctification of any change or defilement. This is a falling back to certain OT views. Secondly, these have been too literalized, and the result has been a sort of mechanical or magical conception of the work of the Spirit. But the soul is not a substance for mechanical action, however sublimated. It is personal life that is to be hallowed, thought, affections, motives, desires, will, and only a personal agent through personal fellowship can work this end.

The clear recognition of the personal and vital character of sanctification will help us with another point. The whole life is God’s requisition and at the same time His instantaneous deed, why should not this sanctification and Entire? be instantaneous and entire? And does not Paul imply this, not merely in his demands and his prayer for the Thesalonians, that God may establish the latter in the former, that He may sanctify them wholly and preserve spirit and soul and body entire, without blame at the coming of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Thess 3:13; 5:23)?

In answer to this we must first discriminate between the ideal and the empirical with Paul. Like John (1 Jn 1:6; 3:9), Paul insists that the life of Christ and the life of sin cannot go together, and he knows no qualified obedience, no graduated standard. He brings the highest Christian demand to be reached of his pagan converts. Now have we any finer proof of his faith than this uncompromising idealism. On the other hand, how could he ask less than this? God cannot require less than the highest, but it is another question how the ideal is to be achieved. In the demand of the ideal it is always either . . . or. In the realm of life there is another category. The question is not simply, Is this man sinner or saint? It is rather, What is he becoming? This matter of becoming is the really vital issue. Is this man turned the right way with the right motive? Is he doing his part in the Divine fellowship? Not the degree of achievement, but the right attitude toward the ideal, is decisive. Paul does not stop to resolve paradoxes, but practically he reckons with this idea. Side by side with his prayer for the Thessalonians are his admonitions to growth and progress (1 Thess 3 12; 5 14). Neither the absolute demand or the promise of grace gives us the right to conclude how the consummation shall take place.

That conclusion we can reach only as we go back again to the fundamental principle of the personal character of the Christian life and the relation thus given between the ethical and the religious. All Christian life and task are to work out your own salvation . . . for it is God who worketh in you” (Phil 2 12 f). All is from God; we can only live what God gives. But there is a converse to this: only as we live it out can God give it to us. This is the principle that Wesley’s teaching is as to sanctification. It is not only God’s gift, but our task. “This is the will of God, even your sanctification” (1 Thess 4 3). “Having therefore these promises . . . let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness (hagiosanageneia) in the fear of God” (2 Cor 7 1). Significant is Paul’s use of the word “walk.” We are to “walk in newness of life,” “by [or in] the Spirit,” “in love,” and “in Christ Jesus the Lord” (Rom 6 4; Gal 5 16; Eph 5 2; Col 2 6). The gift in each case becomes the task, and indeed becomes real and effective only in this activity. It is only as we walk by the Spirit that this becomes powerful in overcoming the lusts of the flesh (Gal 5 16; cf. 5 25). But the ethical is the task that ends only with God’s gift, and where God gives grace only as He lives, then He cannot give all at once. Sanctification is then the matter of a life and not of a moment. The life may be consecrated in a moment, the right relation to God assumed and the man stand in saving fellowship with Him. The life is thus made holy in principle. But the real making holy is coextensive with the whole life of man. It is nothing less than the constant in-forming of the life of the inner spirit and outer deed with the Spirit of Christ until we, “speaking truth in love, growing in all things into Him, who is the head” (Eph 4 15). (Read also Rom 6; that the Christian is dead to sin is not some fixed static fact, but is true only as he refuses the lower and yields his members to a higher obedience. Note that in 1 Cor 6 5 Paul in the same verse does “quench” the Spirit, and then exHORTs “Purge out the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump” (cf. also 1 Thess 5 5 10.)

We may sum up as follows: The word “sanctify” is used with two broad meanings: (1) to devote, to consecrate to God to recognize as holy, that is, as belonging to God. This is the regular OT usage and is most common in the NT. The prophets showed that this belonging to Jeh demanded righteousness. The NT deepens this into a whole-hearted surrender to the fellowship of God and to the rule of His Spirit. (2) Though the word itself appears in but few passages with this sense, the NT is full of the thought of the making holy of the Christian life by the Spirit of God in that fellowship into which God lifts us by His grace and in which He gives Himself to us. This sanctifying, or hallowing, is not mechanical or magical. It is wrought out by God’s Spirit in a daily fellowship to which man gives himself in aspiration and trust and obedience, receiving with open heart, living out in obedient life. It is not negative, the mere separation from sin, but the progressive hallowing of a life that grows constantly in capacity, as in character, into the stature of full manhood as it is in Christ. Only open to this view it nature it is not momentary, but the deed and the privilege of a whole life. See also Holy Spirit and the following article.

WESLEYAN DOCTRINE

1. Doctrine Stated
2. Objections Answered
3. Importance for the Preacher
4. Emendations
5. Its Glorious Results
6. Wesley’s Personal Testimony

Christian perfection, through entire sanctification, by faith, here and now, was one of the doctrines by which John Wesley gave

1. Doctrine great offence to his clerical brethren

Stated in the Anglican church. From the beginning of his work in 1739, till 1760, he was formulating this doctrine. At the last note there suddenly arose a large number of witnesses among his followers. Many of these he questioned with Baconian skill, the result being a confirmation of his theories on various points.

In public address he used the terms “Christian Perfection,” “Perfect Love,” and “Holiness,” as synonymous, though there are differences between them when examined critically. With St. Paul he taught that all regenerate persons are saints, i.e. holy ones, as the word “saint,” from Lat sanctus, Pr. through the stem “sanct-” (1 Cor 1 2; 2 Cor 1 1). His theory is that in the normal Christian the principle of holiness, beginning with the new birth, gradually expands and strengthens as the believer grows in grace and in the knowledge of the truth, from a natural to a final, all-surrendering act of faith in Christ, it reaches an instantaneous completion through the act of the Holy Spirit, the sanctifier: 2 Cor 7 1, “perfecting holiness,” etc.; Eph 4 13, AV “Till we all come . . . into a perfect man” etc. Thus sanctification is gradual, but entire sanctification is instantaneous (Rom 6 6, “our old man was crucified,” etc., a sudden death; Gal 2 20, “I have been crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I that live”). In 1 Thess 4 25, the word “sanctify” is a Gr or acr, tense, signifying an act and not a process, as also in Jn 17 19, “that they . . . may be sanctified in truth,” or truly. (See Meyer’s note.) Many Christians experience this change on their deathbeds. If death suddenly ends the life of a growing Christian before he is in a state of final, all-surrendering act of faith in Christ, it perfects the work. Wesley’s advice to the preachers of this evangelical perfection was to draw and not to drive, and never to quote any threatenings of God’s word against God’s children. The declaration, “With the preaching, no man shall see the Lord” (He 12 14), does not apply to the saints, “the holy ones.”
Sanctification

Sacramentary

Wesley's perfection of love is not perfection of degree, but of kind. Pure love is perfect love. The gradual growth toward perfect purity of love is beautifully expressed in Morod's hymn, "..."O sheer shame and sorrow!" The first response to the Saviour's call is, "All of self, and none of Thee." But after a view of Christ on the cross, the answer is faintly, "Some of self, and none of Thee." Then, after a period of growing love, the cry is, "Less of self, and more of Thee." After another period, the final cry is, "None of self, and all of Thee!" as an aspiration for pure love, without any selfishness.

The attainment of this grace is certified by the total cessation of all servile fear (1 Jn 4:18). Wesley added to this the witness of the Spirit, for which his only proof-text is 1 Cor 2:12.

(1) Paul, in Phil 3:12, declares that he is not "made perfect"; (a) in ver 15, he declares that he is perfect; (b) "made perfect" is a term, borrowed from the ancient games, signifying a finished course. This is answered one of the meanings of telicó̱, as seen also in Lk 13:32 m, "The third day I end my course." Paul no more disclaims spiritual perfection in these words than does Christ before the "third day." Paul claims in ver 15, by the use of an adj., that he is perfect. In ver 12 Paul claims that he is not perfect as a victor, because the race is not ended. In ver 15 he claims that he is perfect as a racer.

(2) Paul says (1 Cor 15:51), "I die daily." This does not refer to death to sin, as some say that it does, but to his daily danger of being killed for preaching Christ, as in Rom 8:36, "we are killed all the day long." (3) Jn 1:8: "If we say that we have no sin," etc. (a) If this includes Christians, it contradicts John himself in the very next verse, and in 3:9, "Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin," and Jn 8:36, "If, ... the Son shall make you free, etc., and in all those texts in the NT declaring sins forgiven.

(3) Bishop Westcott says that the expression, "to have sin," is distinguished from "to sin," as the sinful principle is considered free from the act in itself. It includes the idea of personal guilt. Westcott asserts that John refers to the Gnostics, who taught that moral evil exists outside of the soul, and never touches spirit, which is always holy; and, therefore, though guilty of all manner of evil act in their bodies, they were untouched by sin, which existed only in their bodies, as it does in all matter. When tell that this is the spirit of Gnosticism, he deny the reality of His body, saying that it was only a phantom. Hence, in the very first verse of this Ps., John writes evidently against the gnostic error, quoting three of the five senses to prove the reality of Christ's humanity. (By all means, see "The Epp. of St. John." Cambridge Bible for Schools, etc., 17-21.)

The relation of this doctrine to the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States is seen in the following questions, which have been affirmatively answered in public by all its preachers on their admission to the Conferences: Are you going on to perfection? Do you expect to be made perfect in love in this life? Are you earnestly striving after it? The hymns of the Wesley's, still universally sung, are filled with this doctrine, in which occur such expressions as: "Take away our bent to sinning." "O keep that second advent." "Make and keep me pure within." "To die! Thou dost this moment save, with all salvation, bless me!" To the preaching of Christian perfection Wesley ascribed the success of his work in the conversion, religious training and intellectual education of the masses of Great Britain. It furnished him a multitude of consecrated workers, many of them lay preachers, who labored nearly every hamlet, and who carried the gospel into all the British colonies, including America. It is declared by secular historians that this great evangelical movement, in which the doctrine of entire sanctification was so prominent, saved England from a disastrous revolution, like that which drenched France with the blood of its royal family and its nobility, in the last decade of the 18th cent. It is certain that the great Christian and humanitarian work of William Booth, originally a Methodist, was inspired by this doctrine which he constantly preached. This enabled his followers in the early years of the Salvation Army to endure the persecutions which befell them at that time.

Wesley's own experience of this grace is found in his journal, March 1741: "I felt my soul was all love. I was so stayed on God as I never felt before, and knew that I loved Him with all my heart. When I came home I was so moved that I could not sit still, and the idea of God had saved me from all my sins greater every hour. On Wednesday this was stronger than ever. I have never since found my heart wander from God." This is as explicit a testimony to his entire sanctification as his only recorded testimony to his justification in these words (May 24, 1783): "I felt my heart strangely warmed . . . and an assurance was given me, that He had taken away my sins," etc.

The present art. is designed to supplement the arts. on ALTARS; HIGH PLACE; PENTATEUCH; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE, by giving an outline of certain rival views of the of the course of law and history as regards the place of worship. The subject has a special importance because it was the turning-point of Wellhausen's discussion of the development of Israel's literature, history and religion. He himself writes: I differ from Graf chiefly in this: that I always go back to the centralization of the cultus, and deduce from it the particular divergences. My whole position is contained in my first chapter" (Prolegomena, 368). For the purposes of this discussion it is necessary to use the symbols J, E, D, H, and P, which are explained in the art. PENTATEUCH. It is said that there are three distinct stages of law and history.

1. In the first stage all slaughter of domestic animals for food purposes was sacrificial, and every layman could sacrifice locally at an altar of earth or unhewn stones. The law of JE is contained in Ex...

Sanctuary

20 24–26, providing for the making of an altar of earth or stones, and emphasis is laid on the words “of earth” and “of stones.” Grammatically an equally possible rendering is “in the place” (Jgs 6 26). The question of a hypothetical altar is as a matter of necessity presupposed.

2. The Graf–Wellhausen Hypothesis. This, it is claimed, permits a plurality of sanctuaries. Illustrations are provided by the history. The patriarchs moved about the country freely and build altars at various places. Later sacrifices or altars are mentioned in connection with Jethro (Ex 18 12), Moses (17 15, etc), Joshua (Josh 8 30), Gideon (Jgs 6 26 etc), Samuel (1 Sam 7 3–5) and Manasseh (1 K 18 32), to take but a few instances. Perhaps the most instructive case is that of Saul after the battle of Michmash. Observing that the people were eating meat with blood, he caused a large stone to be rolled to him, and we are expressly told that this was the first altar that he built to the Lord (1 S 14 35). While some of these examples might be accounted for by theophrases or other special circumstances, they are too numerous when taken together to explain them as a single phenomenon. In many instances they represent the conduct of the most authoritative and religious leaders of the age, e.g., Samuel, and it must be presumed that such men knew and acted upon the Law of their own day. Hence the Law and the history are in unison in permitting a multiplicity of sanctuaries.

Wellhausen adds: “Altars as a rule are not built by the patriarchs according to their own private judgment whereversoever they please; on the contrary, a theophany calls attention to, or, at least afterward, confirms, the holiness of the place” (op. cit., 31).

(2) The second stage is presented by Dt. In the Law and Josiah’s reformation in the history. Undoubtedly Dt 12 permits local non-sacrificial slaughter for the purposes of food, and enjoins the destruction of heathen places of worship, insisting with great vehemence on the central sanctuary. The narrative of Josiah’s reformation in 2 K 23 tallies with these principles.

(3) The third great body of law (P) does not deal with the question (save in one passage, Lev 17). In Dt “the unity of the cultus is commanded; in the PC it is presupposed. . . . What follows from this forms the question before us. To my thinking, this: the history of the Law of Ex 20 are in unison in permitting a multiplicity of sanctuaries. . . . Plainly the common man did not quite understand the newly drawn and previously quite unknown distinction between the religious and the profane act” (Prolegomena, 50). Accordingly, this legislator strives to meet the difficulty by the new enactment. See Criticism (The Graf–Wellhausen Hypothesis).

(1) Slaughter not necessarily sacrificial. The general substratum afforded by the documentary basis falls within the scope of the Pentateuch. The present discussion is limited to the legal and historical outline traced above. The view that all slaughter of domestic animals was in every place the blood of Josiah is rebutted by the evidence of the early books. The following examples should be noted: in Gen 18 7 a calf is slain without any trace of a sacrifice, and in 27 9–14 (Jacob’s substitute for venison) no altar or religious rite can fairly be postulated. In 1 S 21 the slaughter is performed by a woman, so that here again sacrifice is out of the question. If Gideon performed a sacrifice when he “made ready the kid” (Jgs 6 26), it is not to be presumed that the broth of which the narrative speaks, the animals in question must have been sacrificed twice over, once when they were killed and again when the food was consumed by flames. Special importance attaches to Ex 22 1 (Heb 21 57), for there the JE legislation itself speaks of slaughter by cattle thieves as a natural and probable occurrence, and it can surely not have regarded this as a sacrificial act. Other instances are to be found in Gen 43 16; 1 S 25 11; 1 K 19 21. In 1 S 8 13 the word “cooks” means “sacrificers” (or “women-sacrificers”). All these instances are prior to the date assigned to Dt. With respect to Lev 17 1–7 also, the theory is unworkable. At any time in King Josiah’s reign or after, it would have been utterly impossible to limit all slaughter of animals for the whole race wherever resident to one single spot. This part of the theory therefore breaks down.

(2) Sacrifice and theophany. The view that the altars were erected at places that were peculiarly holy, or at any rate were subsequently sanctified by a theophany is also fraught with difficulties at an archaic age. We may refer to Gen 4 6, where the calling on God implies sacrifice but not theophanies. Abram at Bethel (12 8) and Mamre (13 18), and Jacob’s sacrifices (31 54; 33 20). Compare later Samuel’s account at Ramah, Acts 7 36 and En-rogel (1 K 1), Naaman’s earth (2 K 5), David’s cain’s sacrifice (1 S 20 6.29). It is impossible to postulate theophanies for the sacrifices of every clan in the country, and it becomes necessary to translate Ex 20 24 “in all the place” (see supra 21) and to understand “the place” as the territory of Israel.

(3) Alleged plurality of sanctuaries. The hypothesis of a multiplicity of sanctuaries in JE and the history also leaves out of view many important facts. The truth is that the word “sanctuary” is ambiguous and misleading. A plurality of altars of earth or stone is not a plurality of sanctuaries. The early legislation knows a “house of Jeh” in addition to the primitive altar (Ex 23 19; 34 26; of the parts of Josh 9 23.27 assigned to J). No eye-witness could mistake a house for an altar, or vice versa.

(4) The altar of God’s house. Moreover a curious little bit of evidence shows that the “house” had quite a different kind of altar. In 1 K 1 50; 2 28 ff, we hear of the horns of the altar of (Am 3 14). Neither earth nor unhewn stones (as required by the Law of Ex 20) could provide such horns, and the historical instances of the altars of the patriarchs, religious leaders, etc, to which reference has been made, show that they had no horns. Accordingly we are thrown back on the description of the great altar of burnt offering in Ex 27 and must assume that an altar of this type was to be found before the ark before Solomon built his Temple. Thus the altar of the House of God was quite different from the customary lay altar, and when we read of “mine altar” as a refuge in Ex 21 14, we must refer it to the former, as is shown by the passages just cited. In addition to the early legislation and the historical passages cited as recognizing a House of God with a horned altar, we see such a house in Shiloh where Eli and his sons of the house of Aaron (1 Sam 2 27) ministered. A great part of both JE and the history show us a House of God with a horned altar side by side with the multiplicity of stone or earthen altars, but give us no hint of a plurality of legitimate houses or shrines or sanctuaries.

(5) Local altars in Deuteronomy. Dt also recognizes a number of local altars in 16 21 (see ICC, ad loc.) and does D2 in Josh 8:30 ff. There is no place for any of these passages in the Wellhausen theory; but again we find one house side by side with many lay altars.

4. The Alternative View

Mosaic times customary sacrifices had been freely offered by laymen at altars of earth or stone which were not procedure sanctuaries, but places that could be used for the nonce and then abandoned. Slaughter, as shown by the instances cited, was not necessarily sacrificial. Moses did not forbid or discourage the custom he found. On the contrary, he regulated it in Ex 24:24-28; Dt 18:11 ff. to prevent possible abuses. But he also superimposed two other kinds of sacrifice—certain new offerings to be brought by individuals to the religious capital and the national offerings of Nu 28, 29 and other passages. The assumption that the Law consists of teaching intrusted to the priests, embracing the procedure to be followed in these two classes of offerings, and does not refer at all to the procedure sanctuaries, which were regulated by immemorial custom. Dt thunders not against the lay altars—which are never even mentioned in this connection—but against the Canaanite high places. Dt 12 contemplates only the new individual offerings. The permission of lay slaughter for food was due to the fact that the in-fidelity of the Israelites in the wilderness (Lev 17:5-7) had led to the universal prohibition of lay slaughter for the period of the wanderings only, though it appears to be continued by Dt for those who lived near the House of God (see 12:21, limited to the case "if the place . . . be too far from thee").

(3) Three pilgrimage festivals in J.E.—The JE legislation itself recognizes the three pilgrimage festivals of the House of God (Ex 34:22 f.). One of these festivals is called "the feast of weeks, even of the bikkurim [a kind of first-fruits] of wheat harvest," and as 23:19; 34:26 require these bikkurim to be brought to the House of God. It is not to a altar, it follows that the pilgrimages are as firmly established here as in Dt. Thus we find a House (with a horned altar) served by priests and lay altars of earth or stone side by side in law and history till the all away. It is by breaking the continuity of tradition and practice paved the way for a new and artificial interpretation of the Law that was far removed from the intent of the lawgiver.

The Elephantine temple.—Papyri have recently been found at Elephantine which show us a Jewish community in Egypt which in 405 BC possessed a local temple. On the

5. The Elephantine

Wellhausen hypothesis it is usual to assume that P and Dt were still unknown and not recognized as authoritative in this community at that date, although the Deuteronomistic law of the central sanctuary goes back at least to 621. It is difficult to understand how a law that had been recognized as Divine by Jeremiah and others could still have been unknown or destitute of authority. On the alternative view this phenomenon will have been the result of an interpretation of the Law to suit the needs of an age subsequent to the death of Moses in circumstances he never contemplated. The Pent apparently permits sacrifice only in the land of Israel: in the altered circumstances the choice lay between interpreting the Law in this way or abandoning public worship altogether; for the synagogue with its non-sacramental form of public worship had not yet been invented. All old legislations have to be construed in this way to meet changing circumstances, and this example contains nothing exceptional or surprising.

SAND (Σαν, ἕλ; ἀμος, ἄμμος; a variant of the more usual ψάμμος, ψαμμίτης; cf ἀμαθος, ἀμαθεῖα, ἄμαθος)

Sand is primarily produced by the grinding action of waves. This is accompanied by chemical solution, with the result that the more soluble constituents of the rock diminish in amount or disappear, and the sands tend to become more or less purely silicious, silica or quartz being a common constituent of rocks and very insoluble. The rocks of Pal are so largely composed of limestone that the shore and dune sands are unusually calcareous, containing from 10 to 20 per cent of calcium carbonate. This is subject to solution and redeposition as a cement between the sand grains, binding them together to form the porous sandstone of the seashore, which is easily worked and is much used in building. See Rock, III, (3).

Figurative: (1) Used most often as a symbol of countless multitude; esp. of the children of Israel (Gen 22:17; 32:12; 2 Sam 17:11; 1 K 4:20; Isa 10:22; 48:19; Jer 33:32; Hos 1:10; Rom 9:27; He 11:12); also of the enemies of Israel (Josh 11:4; Jgs 7:12; 1 S 13:5; cf Rev 20:8). Joseph laid up grain as a reserve of the land of Egypt. The modern sand gave Solomon wisdom and understanding and largeness of heart as the sand that is on the seashore (1 K 4:29); Job says "I shall multiply my days as the sand" (Job 29:18); the multitude of quails provided for the Israelites in the desert is compared to the sand (Ps 78:27); the Psalmist says of the thoughts of God, "They are more in number than the sand" (Ps 139:18); Jeremiah, speaking of the desolation of Israel, says that the number of widows is as the sand (Jer 15:8). (2) Sand is also a symbol of weight (Job 6:3; Prov 27:3), and (3) of instability (Mt 7:26).

It is a question what is meant by the "hidden treasures of the sand" in Dt 33:19.

SAND-LIZARD, sand' liz'ard (Σανάδης, ἕλομετ; LXX σαχάρα, σακάρα, "lizard"; AV snail): ἕλομετ is 7th in the list of unclean "creeping things" in Lev 11:29,30, and occurs nowhere else. It is probably a skink or some species of Lacerta. See Lizard; Snail.

SANDAL, san'dal. See Dress; 6; Shoe; Shoe- Latchet.

SANHEDRIN, san héd'rin (Σανήδρινον, σανάδρινον, the Talmudic transcription of the Gr ounhádron, sunhêdrion): The Sanhedrin was, at

1. Name and before the time of Christ, the name for the highest Jewish tribunal, of 71 members, in Jerusalem, and also for the lower tribunals, of 23 members, of which Jesus had two (Théographe Hýgâphýn 11 9; Sanh. 1 6; 11 2). It is derived from σᾶν, "together," and ἡδρα, "seat." In Gr and Rom literature the sénates of Sparta, Carthage, and even Rome, are so called (cf Pausan. iii.11,2; Polyb. iii.22,1; Livy v.23,44). In Jos we meet with the word for the first time in connection with the governor Gabinius (67–55 BC), who divided the whole of Pal into 5 sunèdrinai (Ant, XIV, v, 4), or sunadrai (BJ, I, viii, 5); and with the term sunde- rion for the high council in Jerus first in Ant, XIV, ix, 3-5, in connection with Herod, who, when a youth, had to appear before the sunedrion at Jerusalem to answer for his doings in Galilee. But before that date the word appears in the LXX version of Proverbs (c 130 BC), esp. in 22 10; 31 23, as an equivalent for the Mishnaic bêt-din = "judgment-chamber.

In the NT the word sometimes, esp. when used in the pl. (Mt 10 17; Mk 13 9; cf Sanh. 1 5), means simply "court of justice," i.e. any judiciary (Mt 5 22). But in most cases it is used to designate the supreme Jewish Court of Justice in Jerusalem, in which the processes against Our Lord was carried on, and from which Sanhedrin, Gedaliah, and Elders (1 Peter and John, Stephen, and Paul) had to justify themselves (Mt 26 59; Mk 14 55; 16 1; Lk 22 66; Jn 11 47; Acts 4 15; 5 21 ff.; 6 12 ff.; 22 30; 23 1 f.; 24 27). Sometimes preterition (Lk 22 66; Acts 22 6) and gerosia (Acts 5 21) are substituted for sunedrion. See Senate.

In the Jewish tradition-literature the term "Sanhedrin" alternates with yëshākhath, "meeting-place" (Mish. Ta'anith 10, compiled in the 1st cent. AC). Ani bêt-din, "court of justice" (Sanh. 11 134). As, according to Jewish tradition, there were two kinds of sunedria, viz. the supreme sunedrion in Jerusalem of 71 members, and lesser sunedria of 23 members, which were appointed by the supreme one, the words of sunedrion (teshākhath "the great Sanhedrin," or bêt-din ha-gēdūli, "the great court of justice") (Midr. 5 4; Sanh. 1 6), or sunedrion grēdhā ḫa-yōsebehēb b-ḥāshketh ha-gēdūth, "the great Sanhedrin which sits in the hall of heaven stone.

There is lack of positive historical information as to the origin of the Sanhedrin. According to Jewish tradition (cf Sanh. 1 6) it was constituted by Moses (Nu 11 16-24 and History) and was reorganized by Ezra immediately after the return from exile (cf the Tg to Cant 6 1). But there is no historical evidence to show that previous to the Gr period there existed an organized aristocratic governing tribunal among the Jews. Its beginning is to be placed at the period in which Asia was convulsed by Alexander the Great and his successors.

The Hellenistic kings conceded a great amount of internal freedom to municipal communities, and Ptolemy then practically under home rule, and was governed by a council of Elders (1 Macc 12 6; 2 Macc 1 10; 4 44; 11 27; 3 Macc 1 8; cf Jos, Ant, XII, iii, 4; XIII, v, 8; Mish. Ta'anith 10), the head of which was the hereditary high priest. The court was called Gerosia, which in Gr always signifies an aristocratic body (see Westernmann in Pauly's RE, III, 49). Subsequently this developed into the Sanhedrin.

During the Roman period (except for about 10 years at the time of Gabinius, who applied to Judea the Roman system of government; cf Marquardt Römische Staatsverwaltung, 1, 501), the Sanhedrin's influence was most powerful, the internal government of the country being practically in its hands (Ant, XX, x), and it was religiously recognized as the fountain of the Diaspora (cf Acts 9 25; 22 5; 25 12). According to Schürer (HJP, div II, vol 1, 171; JGFV, 236) the civil authority of the Sanhedrin, from the time of Archelaus, Herod the Great's son, was probably restricted to Judea proper, and for that reason, in his times, it had no judicial power over our Lord so long as he remained in Galilee (but see G. A. Smith, Jerus, I, 416).

The Sanhedrin was abolished after the destruction of Jerusalem (70 AD). The bêt-din (court of judgment) in Babæan (68-80), in Usæan (80-116), in Shafran (140-63), in Sepphoris (163-93), in Tibera rass (193-220), though regarded in the Talm (cf Rôsh ha-shânhâd 32a), as having been the direct continuation of the Sanhedrin, had essentially different character; it was merely an assembly of scribes, whose decisions had only a theoretical importance (cf Sanh. 9 11).

The Great Sanhedrin in Jerusalem was formed (Mt 26 35; Lk 22 46; Acts 4 5 f.; 5 21; 22 30) of high priests

3. Constitution

(i.e. the acting high priest, those who had been high priests, and members of the privileged families from which the high priests were taken), elders (tribal and head families of the people, and priesthood), and scribes (i.e. legal assessors), Pharisees and Sadducees alike (cf Acts 4 1 ff.; 5 17; 34; 23 6). In Mk 15 43; Lk 23 30, Joseph of Arimathea is called bouleutēs, "councillor," i.e. member of the Sanhedrin.

According to Jos and the NT, the acting high priest was as such always head and president (Mt 26 35; Acts 5 17 ff.; 7 1; 9 1 f.; 22 5; 23 24; 24 1; Ant, IV, vii, 17; XX, x). Caiphas is president at the trial of Our Lord, and at Paul's trial Ananias is president. On the other hand, according to the Talm (esp. H. 3:2), the Sanhedrin is represented as a judicial tribunal of scribes, in which one scribe acted as nasi', "prince," i.e. president, and another as ab-bēṯ-dīn, father of the judgment-chamber, i.e. vice-president. So far, it has not been found possible to reconcile these conflicting descriptions (see "Literature," below).

Sanh. 4 3 mentions the sopheret ha-todaymin, "notaries," one of whom registered the reasons for or against, and the other the reasons for confirmation. In the NT we read of ἄρχοντας, "constables" (Mt 25 25) and of the "servants of the high priest" (Mt 26 51; Mk 14 47; Jn 18 10), whom Jos describes as "enlisted from the rudest and most restless characters" (Ant, XX, viii, 5; ix, 2). Jos speaks of the "public whip," Matthew mentions "tormentors" (18 34), Luke speaks of "spies" (20 20).

The whole history of post-exilic Judaism circles round the high priests, and the priestly aristocracy always played the leading part in the Sanhedrin (cf Sanh. 4 2). But the more the Pharisees grew in importance, the more were they represented in the Sanhedrin. In the time of Salome they were so powerful that "the question of men in name, but the Pharisees were the Elders" (Ant, XIII, ii, 2). In the time of Christ, the Sanhedrin was formally led by the Sadducean high priests, but practically ruled by the Pharisees (Ant, XVIII, i, 4).

In the time of Christ the Great Sanhedrin at Jerusalem enjoyed a very high measure of independence. It exercised not only civil jurisdiction, but also, in a juristic sense, some degree, criminal. It had administrative authority and could order arrests by its own officers of justice (Mt 26 47; Mk 14 43; Acts 4 3; 5 17 f.; 9 2; cf Sanh. 1 5). It was empowered to judge cases which did not involve capital punishment, which latter required the confirmation of the Roman procurator (Ant 19 31; cf Jérus. Sanh., 1 1; 7 2 p. 24); Jos, Ant, XX, i, 15.

But, as a rule, the procurator arranged his judgment in accordance with the demands of the Sanhedrin.

For one offence the Sanhedrin could put to death, on its own authority, even a Roman citizen, namely, in the case of a Gentile passing the fence which divided the inner court of the Temple from that of the Gentiles (BJ, VI, ii, 4; Middoth 11 3; cf Acts 21 28). The only case of capital punishment in a connection with the High Priest was that of Judas, Our Lord. The stoning of Stephen (Acts 7 54 ff) was probably the illegal act of an enraged multitude.
The Talmudic tradition names "the hall of heaven stone," which, according to Middath 5:4, was on the south side of the great court, as the seat of the Great Sanhedrin (P'eh 189). But the place of Meeting last sittings of the Sanhedrin were held in the city outside the Temple area (Sank. 41a; Shabbath 15b; 'Akev ha-shanah 31c; 'Ahadahah sarah 8c). Jos also mentions the place where the bouleutai, "the councillors," met as the sibbehet, one of David's heroes (2 S 21:18; 1 Ch 20:4). It is supposed by some that he was the son of the giant Goliath, but this is not proved. In 1 Ch 20:4, the same person is called "Sippai."

SAPHATIAS, sa-ō-thi-as (Zabarias, Saphadias, B, Zapharias, Saphathias; omitted in A): Name of a family of returning exiles (1 Esd 8:34) "Shephatiyath" in Ezr 8:8. If Saphatias (1 Esd 8:34) = Saphat (6:9), as would appear, then part of the family went up with Zerubbabel and part with Ezra.

SAPHETH, sāfēth: AV = RV Saphethi (q.v.).

SAPHIR, sāfe (םphalt, śaphir). See Saphir.

SAPPHUSI, sa-fáthi, sa-fáthi (A and Fritzsche, *Śaphētii, Saphēthi, B [and Swete], *Śaphii, Saphetii; AV Sapheth): Name of one of the families of the "sons of the servants of Solomon" (1 Esd 5:33) = "Shephatiyah" in Ezr 2:57; Neh 7:59.

SAPPHIRA, sa-firá (םphalt, śaphirā): Aram. for either "beautiful" or "sapphire": Śaphētā, Saphēthā; Wife of Ananias (Acts 5:1–10). See ANANIAS, (1).

SAPHIRE, sa-īr. See STONES, Precious.

SARABIAS, sar-ā-bi-ās (Zaphabias, Sarabias): One of the Levites who taught and expounded the Law for Ezra (1 Esd 9:48) = "Sherebiah" in Neh 8:7, probably identical with the "Azebebias" in 1 Esd 8:47 (Ezr 8:18).

SARAH, sarā, Sarai, sarē: 1. In Gen 17:15 the woman who up to that time has been known as Sarai (םphalt, śapay; Sāpa, Sāra) receives by Divine command the name Sarah (םphalt, śārē; Sarah, Sārā). (This last form in Gr preserves the ancient doubling of the r, lost in the Heb and the Eng. forms.)

The former name appears to be derived from the root as Israel. If, indeed, Gen 32:28 is intended as an etymology of Israel, "she that strives," a contentious person, is a name that might be given to a child at birth (Rom 12:20). In later times it seems to have been adopted as a name by the Semites to designate a ruler of greater or lesser rank.
In the verse following the one where this name is conferred, it is declared of Sarah that "kings of peoples shall be of her" (Gen 17:16).

We are introduced to Sarai in Gen 11:29. She is here mentioned as the wife that Abraham "took," while still in Ur of the Chaldees, that is, while accompanying Terah. It is immediately added that "Sarah was barren; she had no child." By this simple remark in the opening of his narrative, the writer sounds the motif that is to be developed in all the sequel. When the migration to Haran occurs, Sarai is named along with Abram and Lot as accompanying Terah. It has been determined (or authors of ch 11) knew nothing of the relationship announced in 20:12. But there can be no proof of such ignorance, even on the assumption of diversity of authorship in the two passages.

Sarah's career as described in ch 11 was not dependent on her being the daughter of Terah. Terah had other descendants who did not accompany him. Her move men were determined for her being Abram's wife. It appears, however, that she was a daughter of Terah by a different mother from the mother of Abram. The language of the OT would indeed admit of her being Abram's niece, but the fact that there was but 10 years' difference in the ages (see Gen 17:17) renders this hypothesis less probable. Marriage with half-sisters seems to have been not uncommon in antiquity (see the OT 13:19).

This double relationship suggested to Abraham the expedient that he twice used when he lacked faith in God to protect his life and in cowardice sought his own safety at the price of his wife's honor. The first of these occasions was in the earlier period of their wanderings (ch 12). From Canaan they went down into Egypt. Sarai, though above 60 years of age according to the chronology of the sacred historian, made the impression on the Egyptians by her beauty that Abraham had anticipated, and the result was her freely concubine to the royal palace. But this was in direct contravention of the purpose of God for His own kingdom. The earthly majesty of Pharaoh had to bow before the Divine majesty, which plagued him and secured the stranger's exodus, thus foreshadowing the later exodus when Abraham's and Sarah's seed "spoiled the Egyptians."

We meet Sarah next in the narrative of the birth of Ishmael and of Isaac. Though 14 years separated the two births, they are closely associated in the story because of their literal bearing on the barrenness that persisted. She was now far past middle life, even on a patriarchal scale of longevity, and there appeared no hope of her ever bearing that child who should inherit the promise of God. She therefore adopts the expedient of being "builded up" by her personal slave, Hagar the Egyptian (see Gen 16:2 m). That is, according to contemporary law and custom as witnessed by the (see Abraham, IV, 2), a son born of this woman would be the free-born son and heir of Abraham and Sarai.

Such was in fact the position of Ishmael later. But the language of the 12 would accord the vindictive jealousy of the mistress and led to a painful scene of unjustified exclusion. Hagar, however, returned to God's blessing and humbled herself before Sarah, and bore Ishmael in her own father's house. Here he remained the sole and rightful heir, until the miracle of Isaac's birth disappointed all human expectations and resulted in the ultimate expulsion of Hagar and her son.

The change of name from Sarah to Sarah when Isaac was promised has already been noted. Sarah's language indicates that when she hears the promise is of course associated with the origin of the name of Isaac, but it serves also to emphasize the miraculous character of his birth, coming as it does after his parents are both so "well stricken in age" as to make an assured bearing again.

Before the birth of this child of promise, however, Sarah is again exposed, through the cowardice of her husband, to dishonor and ruin. Abimelech, king of Gerar, desiring to be allied by marriage with a man of Abraham's power, sends for Sarah, where he knows only as Abraham's sister, and for the second time she takes her place in the harem of a prince. But the Divine promise is not to be thwarted, even by persistent human weakness and sin. In a dream God reveals to Abimelech the true state of the case, and Sarah is restored to her husband with an indemnity. Thereupon the long-delayed son is born, the jealous mother secures the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael, and her career is sealed by the birth of a child at the age of 127, at Hebron, long time her home. The grief at all this was broadly displayed in ch 23, in which he seeks and obtains a burying-place for his wife. She is thus the first to be interred in that cave of the field of Machpelah, which was to be the common resting-place of the fathers and mothers of the future Israel.

The character of Sarah is of mingled light and shade. On the one hand we have seen that lapsed from faith which resulted in the birth of Ishmael, and that land has been his. On the other hand she is a true Hebrew, as on 4:21, literally rendered. That is, in her outbreak against Hagar and Ishmael she was in general "in subjection to her husband" and of "a meek and quiet spirit," appears from her husband's genuine grief at her decease, and still more clearly from her son's prolonged mourning for her (Gen 24:67; cf 17:17 and 25:20). And He who maketh even the wrath of man to praise Him used even Sarah's jealous anger to accomplish His purpose that "the son of the freewoman, Isaac, born through promise," should alone inherit that promise (Gal 4:22-31).

Apart from the three NT passages already cited, Sarah is alluded to only in Isa 51:2 ("Sarah that bare you," as the mother of the nation), in Rom 4:19 ("the deadness of Sarah's womb"), and 9:9, where God's promise in Gen 18:10 is quoted. Yet her existence and her history are of course presupposed wherever allusion is made to the stories of Abraham and of Isaac.

To many modern critics Sarah supplies, by her name, a welcome argument in support of the mythical view of Abraham. She has been held to be the local name to whom the covenanted was worshiped in Arabia under the title Duresae, i.e. Husband-of-Sarah; or, the female associate of Sin the moon-god, worshiped at Haran. On these views the student will do well to consult Baethgen, Beiträge, 94, 167, and, for the most recent point of view, Grossmann's art. "Sag und Geschichte in den Patriarchenzeitungen," J.Z.T. 1910, and Eerdmans, Alte-mendite Geschichte, 11, 13.

SARAPH, sar'af, sar'af (סֶרָפ, לָאָרָפ, "noible one"); cf. סֶרָפ, "burn", "shine": A descendant of Judah through Shelah (1 Chr 4 1).

SARCHEDONUS, sar'ke'do-nus (B N, סַרְכֶדוֹנָס, Sarcheridonos, A, Сарчедон, Sarcherdion, but Сархедон, Sarchedonos in Tab 2 22): An incense-burning church; both in AV and RV, for Sacerdus in Tab 1 21 f., another form of Esar-haddon.

SARDEUS, sar'de-us: AV=RV ZARDEUS (q.v.).

SARDINE(S), sar'din, sar'din, SARDIUS. See Stones, Precious.

SARDIS, sar'diss (Σάρδης, Sárdeis): Sardis is of special interest to the student of Herodotus and Xenophon, for the Artaxerxes, the brother of Xerxes, lived there and planned to start an invasion of Greece. He was stopped and turned back by the Ionians, but the Ionians were defeated at Lade. They invaded Cilicia and Asia Minor, and when they occupied the region of the Pactolus River, they became a great power. The city of Sardis became the capital of the rulers of Asia Minor, and it grew in wealth and importance. It was the capital of Lydia, a province of Asia Minor.

The ancient city was noted for its fruits and wool, and for its temple of the god Cybele, whose worship resembled that of Diana of Ephesus. Its wealth was also partly due to the gold which was found in the sand of the Pactolus River, and it was here that gold and silver coins were first struck. During the Roman period its coins formed a beautiful series, and are found in abundance by the present-day excavations. The ruins of the buildings which stood at the base of the hill are visible from above.

The hill upon which the acropolis stood measures 990 ft. high; the triple walls still surround it. The more imposing of the ruins are on the lower slope of the hill, and among them the temple of Cybele is the most interesting, yet only two of its many stone columns are still standing. Equally imposing is the necropolis of the city, which is at a distance of two hours' ride from Sard, S. of the Grecian lagoon. The modern name of the necropolis is Bin Tepe or Thousand Mounds, because of the large group of great mounds in which many burials were made. Many of the mounds were long ago excavated and plundered.

We quote the following from the Missionary Herald (Boston, Mass., August, 1911, pp. 361-62):

Dr. C. C. Tracy, of Masovian, has made a visit to ancient Sardis and has sent me the following information, Professor Burrows, of Princeton University, who is uncovering the ruins of that famous city of the past. Already rich "finds" have been made. The modern name of the ancient city, Sardis, is derived from the famous Sardis of the OT, the capital of Lydia, a province of Asia Minor.

The city of Sardis was the capital of Lydia, and it was a center of trade and commerce. It was a rich city, and its wealth was based on its location on the Pactolus River, which was rich in gold and silver. The city was also famous for its woolen products.

Among the ruins of Sardis is the famous temple of Cybele, which was dedicated to the goddess of fertility and nature. The temple was one of the most important religious centers in the region, and it was visited by many pilgrims and tourists.

In the year 361-362, when the city was under siege, a number of men and women were buried in the necropolis of Sardis. The bodies were carefully placed in tombs, and the tombs were sealed with stone slabs. The necropolis was surrounded by a high wall, and it was protected by a large gate.

The ruins of Sardis are an important archaeological site, and they are a reminder of the great city that once stood there. Today, the ruins are a popular tourist destination, and they are a witness to the rich history of the region.

SARDONYX, sar'do-niks. See Stones, Precious.

SAREPTA, sa-rep'ta (Σαρεπτα, Sareptah): The city mentioned in Luke 4:26 AV, following the Gr. of the Phoen city to which Elijah was sent in the time of the great famine, in order to save the lives of a widow and her son (1 K 17 9-10). RV adopts the form of the name based upon the Heb, and in the OT: ZAREPHATH (q.v.).

SARD, sar'd (סָרָד, sarad; B, אֶסְרֹד, Arderad, Arderad, Asereb, Asereb, Asereb, Asereb, Asereb, Asereb, Sarid, Sarad): A place on the southern border of the land of Canaan (Josh 19 10). It is mentioned but not identified in Osee. Prob shall we read "sadd", and in that case may with Conder locate it at Tell Shaddad, an artificial mound with some modern ruins and good springs.
SARGON, sár'gon (722–705 BC): The name of this ruler is written 𒊉𒊏𒂗, sargôn, in the OT, Shar-ukin in the cuneiform inscriptions, 'Aprâ, Arnu, in the LXX, and Ἀρναοῦς, Arkanos, in the Septuagint. Sargon is mentioned but once by name in the OT (Isa 20: 1), when he sent his Tartan (turtanu) against Ashdod, but he is referred to in 2 K 17: 6 as "the king of Assyria" who carried Israel into captivity.

Shalmanezer V had laid siege to Samaria and besieged it three years. But shortly before or very soon after its capitulation, Sargon, perhaps being responsible for the king's death, overthrew the dynasty, and in his annals credited himself with the capture of the city and the deportation of its inhabitants. Whether he assumed the name of the famous ancient founder of the Accad dynasty is not known.

Sargon at the beginning of his reign was confronted with a serious situation in Babylon. Merodach-baladan of Kaldi, who paid tribute to previous rulers, on the change of dynasty had himself proclaimed king, New Year's Day, 721 BC. At Dur-ili, Sargon fought with the forces of Merodach-baladan and his ally Khumbanigash of Elam, but although he claimed a victory the result was apparently indecisive. Rebellions followed in other parts of the kingdom.

In 720 Ilu-bi'di (or Yau-bi'di), king of Hamath, formed a coalition against Sargon with Hanno of Gaza, Shib'a of Egypt, and with the cities Arpad, Sidiria, Damascus and Samaria. He claims that Shib'u fled, and that he captured and flayed Ilu-bi'di, burned Karkar, and earned Hanno captive to Assyria. After destroying Raphi, he carried away 9,033 inhabitants to Assyria.

In the following year Ararat was invaded and the Hitite Caremehish fell before his armies. The territory of Russas, king of Ararat, as well as a part of Mellite became Assyrian provinces.

In 710 Sargon directed his attention to Merodach-baladan, who no longer enjoyed the support of Elam, and whose rule over Babylon had not been popular with his subjects. He was driven out from Babylon and also from his former capital Bit-Yakin, and Sargon had himself crowned as the slavemaster of Babylon.

In 706 the new city called Dur-Sharrulkh was dedicated as his residence. A year later he was murdered. It was during his reign that the height of Assyr ascendancy had been reached.

SARON, sâr'ôn (Σαρών, Sarōn): AV; Gr form of Sharon (Acts 9: 35).

SAROTHE, sa-ro'thē (A, Saperbë, Saréthë, B and Swete, Saperbë, Sarothë): Name of a family of "the sons of the servants of Solomon" who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5: 34); it is wanting in the lists in Ezra 2. 57; Neh 7: 59.

SARSECHIM, sâr'sek-im (Sarék'im, Sarêk'îm): A prince of Nebuchadnezzar, present at the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in the 11th year of Zedekiah (Jer 39: 3). The VSS with their various readings—"Naboushehar," "Nabousarach," "Sarscheim"—point to a corrupt text. The best emendation of the reading is "Nabûshâzibbûn" ( = Nabûshâzib-anni, "Nebo delivers me"); this is based on the reading in Jer 39: 13.

SARUCH, sârûk (Σαρούχ, Sarouch, Σαροῦχ, Sarouch): AV; Gr form of Serug (thus Lk 3: 35 RV).

1. Names of Satan.
2. Character of Satan.
3. Names of Satanic figures.
4. History of Satan.
5. General Considerations.
6. Conclusions.

I. Definition.—A created but superhuman, personal, evil, world-power, represented in Scripture as the adversary both of God and men.

II. Scriptural Facts concerning Satan.—The most important of these are the Heb and Gr equivalents noticed above. These words are used in the general sense justified by their etymological significance. It is applied even to Jehovah (Nu 22: 22, 32; cf 1 S 29: 4; 2 S 19: 22; Ps 109: 6, etc). The word "Satan" is used 241 in the OT. In Job (1: 6) and Zec (3: 1) it has the prefixed definite article. In all cases but one when the art. is omitted it is used in the general sense. This one exception is 1 Ch 21: 1 (cf 2 S 24: 1), where the word is generally conceded to be used as a proper name. This meaning is fixed in NT times. We are thus enabled to note in the term "Satan" (and Devil) the growth of a word from a general term to an appellation and later to a proper name. All the other names of Satan save only these two are descriptive titles. In addition to these two principal names a number of others deserve specific enumeration. Tempor (Mt 4: 5; 1 Thes 3: 5); Beelzebub (Mt 12: 24); Enemy (Mt 13: 39); Evil One (Mt 13: 19-38; 1 Jn 2: 13–14; 3: 12, and particularly 5: 18); Belial (2 Cor 6: 15); Adversary (ἀδικεως, antidikos), (1 Pet 5: 8); Deceiver (lit. "the one who deceives") (Rev 12: 9); Dragon (Great) (Rev 12: 5); Father of Lies (Jn 8: 44); Murderer (Jn 8: 44); Sinner (1 Jn 3: 8)—these are isolated references occurring from 1 to 3 each. In the vast majority of passages (70 out of 85) either Satan or Devil is used.

Satan is consistently represented in the NT as the enemy both of God and man. The popular notion is that Satan is the enemy of 2. Charac- man and active in misleading and ter of Satan cursing humanity because of his intense hatred and opposition to God. Mt 13: 39 would seem to point in this direction, but if one were to venture an opinion in a region where there are not enough facts to warrant a conviction,
The fundamental moral description of Satan is given by Our Lord when He describes Satan as the “evil one” (Mt 13:19,38; cf. Is 5:19: “The Lord loved Jacob and hated Esau, and made the sons of Esau a land’s end”). It is evident that this description could not be applied to Satan as originally created. Ethical evil cannot be created. It is the creation of each free will for itself. We are not told in definite terms how Satan became the evil one, but certainly it could be no other process than a fall, whereby, in the mystery of free personality, an evil will takes the place of a good one.

The world-wide and age-long works of Satan are to be traced to one predominant motive. He hates both God and man and does all that is in his power to maintain a kingdom of evil, in the seduction and ruin of man. The Bible and the story of the history of the world are the surest evidence of Satan’s power and presence among men, but it exhibits a dependable accuracy and consistency of statement which is most reassuring. Almost nothing is said concerning Satanic agency other than wicked men who mimic its activity. The Book of Job, which contains the controversy with His opponents concerning exercise (Mk 3:22 f and Lk 11:17), is the first reference in the Bible to Satan. Our Lord rebuts their slanderous assertion that He is in league with Satan by the simple proposition that Satan does not work against himself. But in so saying He does far more than refute this slander. He defines the role of Satan in the history of the world. It is true that in Lk 2:29 Satan’s Lord speaks of the woman who was bowed over as one “whom Satan has bound, lo, these eighteen years,” and that in 2 Cor 12:7 Paul of Tarsus says of his infirmity as a “messenger of Satan sent to buffet him.” Paul also speaks (1 Thess 2:16) of Satan’s hindering him from visiting the church at Thessalonica. A careful study of these related passages (together with the prologue of Job) will reveal the fact that Satan’s direct agency in the world among men is very limited. Satan may be said to be implicated in all the disasters and woes of human life, in so far as they are more or less directly contingent upon sin (see particularly He 2:14). On the contrary, it is perfectly evident that Satan’s power consists principally in his ability to deceive. It is interesting and characteristic that according to the Bible Satan is fundamentally a liar and his kingdom is a kingdom founded upon lies and deceit. The description of Satan therefore corresponds in every important particular to the general lie, namely, the emphasis upon truth. “The truth shall make you free” (Jn 8:32)—this is the way of deliverance from the power of Satan.

It would be that the general tenor of Scripture indicates quite the contrary, namely, that Satan’s jealousy and hatred of men has led him into a tendency to love and serve God and the kingdom to good effect.

these insurgent forces and also points to their final and utter destruction. The putting of Satan in bonds is evidently both constant and progressive. The beginning of the end of evil that is to be, and its ultimate overthrow are foreshadowed in the Book of Job (chs 38-41), where Jeh’s power extends even to the symbolized spirit of evil.

According to synoptic tradition, Our Lord in the crisis of temptation immediately following the baptism (Mt 3 and Lk 1:6-11) is presented with the acceptance of a complete victory. According to Lk (10:18), when the Seventy returned from their mission flushed with victory over evil, Jesus said: “Now Satan is shown (not "fallen"; see Plummer, “Lk.” JCC. in loc.) as light- ning from heaven to pursue His power and the power of evil Christ beheld in vision the downfall of Satan. In connection with the coming of the Hellenists who wished to see Him, Jesus asserted (Jn 12:31). “Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out.” In each of His approaching passion He says again (Jn 14:30). “The prince of the world cometh; and he hath nothing in me.” Once again in connection with the triumph of Christ, the Good Samaritan cut off the power of Satan (Jn 18:10). The victory of Christ is the defeat of Satan; Jesus asserted (Jn 16:11) that the Spirit would convict the world of judgment, “because the prince of this world hath been cast out.” In (16:14-15) it is said that Christ took upon Himself human nature in order “that through death He might destroy him who has the power of death, that is, the devil.” In 1 Jn 3:8 it is said, “This is the Son of God, manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil.” In Rev 12:9-11 it is asserted, in connection with Christ’s ascension, that Satan was cast out to the earth and to his angels, with him. According to the passage immediately following (12:10-12), this casting down was not complete or final in the sense of extinguishing his activities altogether, but it involves the potential and certain triumph of God and His saints over Satan and eventually certain defeat of Satan. In 1 Jn 2:13 the young men are addressed as those who “have overcome the evil one.” In Rev 20 the field of the future is covered in the victory of Christ, He “bound a thousand years”; then loosed “for a little time,” and then finally “cast into the lake of fire.”

A comparison of these passages will convince the careful student that while we cannot construct a definite chronological program for the career of Satan, we are clear in the chief points. He is limited, judged, condemned, imprisoned, reserved for judgment from the beginning. The outcome is certain though the process may be tedious and slow. The victory of Christ is the defeat of Satan; first, for Himself as Leader and Saviour of men (Jn 14:30); then, for believers (Lk 22:31; Acts 26:18; Rom 16:20; Jas 4:7; 1 Jn 2:13; 5:4-8); and, finally, for the whole world (Rev 20:10). The victory of Christ has already destroyed the empire of Satan.

III. General Considerations.—There are, no doubt, serious difficulties in the way of accepting the doctrine of a personal, superhuman, evil power as Satan is described to be. It is doubtful, however, whether these difficulties may not be due, at least in part, to a misunderstanding of the doctrine and certain of its implications. In addition, it must be acknowledged, that whatever difficulties there may be in the teaching, they are certainly not, in the same time, not fairly met by the vague and irrational skepticism which denies without investigation. There are difficulties involved in any view of the world. To say the least, some problems are met by the view of a superhuman, evil world-power present in this section certain general considerations are urged with a view to lessening difficulties keenly felt by some minds. Necessarily, certain items gathered in the foregoing section are here emphasized again.

The Scriptural doctrine of Satan is nowhere systematically developed. For materials in this field we are shut up to scattered and incidental references. These passages, which even in the aggregate are not numerous, tell us what we need to know concerning the nature, history, kingdom and works of Satan, but offer scant satisfaction to the merely speculative temper. The comparative lack of development in this field is due partly to the fact that the Bible, writers are primarily interested in the reality and power of the light of God’s holiness as prophetically revealed in the providential world-process which centers in Christ. It is a significant fact that the statements concerning Satan become numerous and definite only in the NT. The daylight of the Christian revelation was necessary in order to uncover the lurking foe, dimly disclosed but by no means fully known in the earlier revelation. The disclosure of Satan is, in form at least, historical, not dogmatic.

In the second place, the relationship of Satan to God, already emphasized, must be kept constantly in mind. The doctrine of Satan and God emerges in the general doctrine concerning angels (see ANGELS). It has often been pointed out that the personal character of Satan is connected with the problem of forming a Divine function and having his place in the heavenly train. In the accounts of David’s numbering of Israel (1 S 24:1; 1 Ch 21:1) the tempting of David is attributed both to Jeh and Satan. This means that, though his temptation is of men is also a part of his providence,’ or that in the interval between the documents the personality of the tempter has more clearly emerged. In this case the account in Ch would nearly approximately the NT teaching. In the Book of Job (1:6), however, Satan is among the Sons of God and his assaults upon Job are Divinely permitted. In Zec (3:1.2) Satan is also a servant of Jeh. In both these passages there is the hint of opposition between Jeh and Satan. In the former instance Satan assails unsuccessfully the character of one whom Jeh honors; while in the latter Jeh explicitly rebukes Satan for his attitude toward Israel (see G. A. Smith, BTP, II, 316f). The unveiling of Satan as a world-wide evil power by Jesus at the NT, and with this fuller teaching the symbolic treatment of temptation in Gen is to be connected. There is a sound pedagogical reason, from the viewpoint of revelation, for this earlier withholding of the whole truth concerning Satan. In the early stages of religious thinking it would seem to be difficult, if not impossible, to hold the sovereignty of God without attributing to His agency those evils in the world which are more or less directly connected with judgment and punishment. (cf Is 5:27; Am 3:6). The OT sufficiently emphasizes man’s responsibility for his own evil deeds, but superhuman evil is brought upon him from above. “When willful souls have to be misled, the spirit who does so, as in Abraham’s case, comes from above” (G. A. Smith, op. cit., 317). The progressive revelation of God’s character and purpose, which more and more imperatively demands that the origin of moral evil, and consequently natural evil, must be traced to the created will in opposition to the Divine, leads to the ultimate declaration of the morally fallen being to whose conquest the Divine Power in history is pledged. There is, also, the distinct possibility that in the significant transition from the Satan of the OT to that of the NT we have the outlines of a biography and an indication of the way by which an angel fell.
A third general consideration, based upon data given in the earlier section, should be urged in the same connection. In the NT delineation of Satan, his limitations are Essentially clearly set forth. He is superhuman, Limited but not in any sense Divine. His activities are cosmic, but not universal or transcendent. He is a created being. His power is definitely circumscribed. He is doomed to final destruction as a world-power. His entire career is that of a secondary and dependent being who is permitted to interact in the person of Satan, as the false teacher, or is thrown in by the Lord.

These three general considerations have been grouped in this way because they dispose of three objections which are current against the doctrine of Satan.

4. Conclusions

(1) The first is, that it is mythological in origin. That it is not dogmatic is a priori evidence against this hypothesis. Mythology is primitive dogma. There is no evidence of a theodicy or philosophy of evil in the Bib. treatment of Satan. Moreover, while the Scriptural doctrine is unsystematic in form, it is rigidly limited in scope and everywhere essentially consistent. Even in the Apocalypse, where naturally more scope is allowed to the imagination, the sinfulness of the wares and the person of Satan corresponds, item for item, to the intellectual sainess and ethical earnestness of the Bib. world-view as a whole. It is, therefore, not mythological. The restraint of chastened imagination, not the extravagance and brutality of fancy, it is in evidence throughout the entire Bib. treatment of the subject. Even the use of terms current in mythology (as perhaps Gen 3 1.3.14; Rev 12 7-9; cf 1 Pet 5 8) does not imply more than a literary clothing of Satan in the stories commonly ascribed to malignant and disorderly forces.

(2) The second objection is that the doctrine is due to the influence of Pers dualism (see Persian Religion; Zoroastranism). The answer to this is plain, on the basis of facts already adduced. The Bib. doctrine of Satan is not dualistic. Satan's empire had a beginning, it will have a definite and permanent end. Satan is God's great enemy in the cosmic sphere, but he is God's creation, exists by Divine will, and his power is commensurate with God's and that of men. Satan awaits his doom. Weiss says (concerning the NT representation of conflict between God and the powers of evil): "There lies in this no Manichaean dualism, but only the deepest experience of the work of redemption as the definite destruction of the power from which all sin in the world of men proceeds" (Bib. Theol. NT, ET, II, 272; cf G. A. Smith, op. cit., II, 318).

(3) The third objection is practically the same as the second, but addressed directly to the doctrine itself, apart from the question of its origin, namely, that it destroys the unity of God. The answer to this also is a simple negative. To some minds the reality of evil and the evils is dualistic and therefore untenable. But a true doctrine of unity makes room for other than God's—namely of those beings upon whom God has bestowed freedom. Herein stands the doctrine of sin and Satan. The doctrine of Satan no more militates against the unity of God than the idea, so necessary to morality and religion alike, of other created wills set in opposition to God's. Just as the conception of Satan merges, in one direction, in the general doctrine of angels, so, in the other, it blends with the broad and difficult subject of evil (cf "Satan," JDB, IV, 412n).

LITERATURE.—All standard works on Bib. Theology, as well as Dictionaries, etc. treat with more or less thoroughness the doctrine of Satan. The German theologians of the more evangelical type, such as Weiss, Lange, Martensen (Danish), Dörner, while putting a tendency toward excessive speculation, discern the deeper aspects of the doctrine. Of monographs known to the writer none are to be recommended. It is a subject on which the Bible is its own best interpreter.

LOUIS MATTHEWS SWEET

SATAN, DEPTHS OF (το βαθύ το Σατανά, to bathé tou Satana): Found in Rev 2 24, and has reference to false teaching at Thyatira. It is a question (that perhaps may not be decided) whether the false teacher represented in the claim is Satan, or someone else. Did those false teachers claim to know "the depths" of Satan? Or was it that they claimed to know "the depths" of Deity, and the Lord said it was rather the "depths of Satan"? In either case the antithesis to "depths of Satan" is "depths of God," as referred to in Rom 11 33; 1 Cor 2 10.

E. J. FORRESTER

SATAN, SYNOGNAGUE OF: The expression occurs neither in the Hev nor in the Gr of the OT, but in Apoc. Three passages in the OT and one in Apoc suggest the idea conveyed in the expression. In Nu 14 27-35, Jeh expresses his wrath against "the evil congregation" (LXX σαταναίς ποιηματα, σατανήδες ποιηματα, which He then thrusts in the wilderness. In Ps 21 (22) 16, we find, "A company of evil doers [LXX σαταναίς ποιηματα, σατανήδες ποιηματα] have inclosed me." In Sir 16 6, we read, "In the congregation of sinners [LXX σατανιασαν, σατανές] shall a fire be kindled." Only in the NT occurs the phrase "synagogue of Satan," and here only twice (Rev 2 9; 3 9). Three observations are evident as to who constituted the "synagogue of Satan" in Smyrna and Philadelphia. (1) They claimed to be Jews, i.e. they were descendants of Abraham, and so laid claim to the blessings promised by Jah to him and his seed. (2) But they are not regarded by John as real Jews, i.e. they are not the genuine Israel of God (the same conclusion as Paul reached in Rom 2 28). (3) They are persecutors of the Christians in Smyrna. The Lord "knows their blasphemy," their sharp denunciations of Christ and Christians. They claim to be the true people of God, but really they are "of Satan." (4) The deposit of the Christian faith, "Satan" is the possessive gen. These Jewish persecutors, instead of being God's people, are the "assembly of Satan," i.e. Satan's people.

In Polyc., Mar. xvii.2 (c 155 AD) the Jews of Smyrna were still persecutors of Christians and were conspicuous in demanding and planning the martyrdom of Polycarp the bishop of Smyrna, the same city in which the revelator calls persecuting Jews "the assembly of Satan." In the 2nd cent., in an inscription (CII, 3418) describing the classes of population in Smyrna, we find the expression ἵνα ἴωναί, καὶ ἵωναί, καὶ ἱωναί, which Mommsen thinks means "Jews who had abandoned their religion," but which Ramsay says "are probably survivals of those who formerly were the nation of the Jews, but have lost the legal standing of a separate people."

CHARLES B. WILLIAMS

SATCHEL, satch'el. See Bag.

SATISFACTION, sat-ee-fak-shun: Occurs twice in AV (Nu 35:31,32) as a rendering of the Heb kopher (RV "ransom"). It means a price paid as consideration for the life of another. The passage cited provides a prohibition against accepting such payment in case of murder, or for the return of the manslayer. Such compensation was permitted in ancient justice among many peoples. Cf pahor, point, which Liddell and Scott define as "properly quit-money for blood spilt, the fine paid by the slayer to the kinsman of the slain, as a ransom from all consequences." The same custom prevailed among Teutonic peoples, as seen in the Ger. Wereld and Old Eng. wereld. The Heb laws of the OT permit it only in the case of a man or woman gored to death by an ox (Ex 21:30-32).

BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

SATRAPS, sâ'traps, satraps (ΣΑΤΡΑΠΗΣ, 'bhabsharpaym', Exz 8:36; Est 3:12; 8:9; 9:3, AV "lieutenants"; Dn 3:23-27, 6:1ff, AV " princes"): The viceroy or vassal rulers to whom was intrusted the government of the provinces in the Persian empire. The word answers to the Old Pers khsha-thrapâvan, "protectors of the realm."

SAT'RY, sat'-er, s'ät-r, lit. "he-goat"; cf רֵעֵי, sa'ir, "hairy" (Gen 27:11, of Esau), and Arab. ʃראל, 'sha'ar, "hair;") pl. ʃר'ים, s'îrim): For sî'rîm in Lev 17:7 and 2 Ch 11:15, AV has "devils," RV "he-goats," ERV "satyrs," LXX τῶν ματαιῶν, τότε ματαιῶν, "vain things." For sî'rîm in Isa 13:21, AV and ERV have "satyrs," ERV "he-goats," ARV "wild goats," LXX Λύπαιν, doaimânia, "demons." For sîrâ in Isa 34:14, AV and ERV have "satyrs," ERV "he-goat," ARV "wild goat." LXX has ἑτέρω πρὸς τὰ τρέφων, ἑτέρω πρὸς ἑτέρων, "one to another," referring to doaimânia, which here stands for ɣôlm, "wild beasts of the desert."

The text of AV in these passages is as follows: Lev 17:7, "And they shall not make their sacrifices unto the he-goats, after which they play the harlot;" 2 Ch 11:15, "And he [Jeroboam] appointed him priests for the high places, and for the he-goats, and for the calves which he had made": Isa 13:21 (of Babylon), "But wild beasts of the desert [qôlm] shall lie there; and the wild beasts of the desert shall howl, and the wild goats [wîrîm] shall dance there. And wolves [lîyim] shall dwell there, and dragons of the valleys shall howl there. And the panthers [chînîm] shall be there; and the wild beasts of the desert shallhover there, and the vultures shall sit there; and the kestrels shall be there;"

The question is whether sî'rî and sî'rîm in these passages stand for real or for fabulous animals. In Lev 17:7 and 2 Ch 11:15, it is clear that they are objects of abhorrence and that such words open the question of their nature, though it may to many minds make "devils" or "demons" or "satyrs" seem preferable to "he-goats." In Isa 13:20 we read, "neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the camel make his nests to lie down there." This very may likely have influenced the American Committee of Revisers to use "wild goat" in Isa 13:21 and 34:14 instead of the "he-goat" of the other passages. In ARV, no fabulous creatures (except perhaps the "night-monster") are mentioned here, but LXX employs doaimânia, "demons," in Isa 13:21 for sîrîm and in 34:14 for ɣôlm; ἑκτεραποῦ, ἑκταναυτῷ, from ἐκ, ἐκνο, ἐκνό, "ass," and κεταναυτός, κεταναυτῷ, "centaur," in Isa 13:22 and 34:14 for ɣôlm, and again in 34:14 for ɣîlîth; ἑσερεῖ, ἑσερείν, "sirens," in Isa 13:21 for ɣîlîth ἡ γαῖανδῆ, and in 13:34 for τὰ τὰν. We must bear in mind the uncertainty regarding the identity of ɣîlîth, ἡ γαῖανδῆ, and τὰ τὰν, as well as some of the other names, and we must recall the tales that are hung about the name ɣîlîth (AV "screech owl," AVm and RV "night-monster," RVm "Lilith"), While sîrâ is almost alone among these words in having ordinarily a well-understood meaning, i.e., "the goat," there is good reason for considering that here it is used in an exceptional sense. The tr "satyr" certainly has much to be said for it. See GOAT; JACKAL.

The last verse contains a very curious scribal error, a yodh having slipped out of one word in it into another. It states that both Abner and Ner were sons of Abiel. These apparent inconsistencies are to be explained by the fact that in Heb, as in Arab., "son" is often used in the sense of grandson. Also, with the facility of divorce then prevalent, by "brother" and "sister" we must in most cases understand half-brother and half-sister. Moreover, Saul's mother might have been the wife at different times of Kish and of his brother Ner (cf 1 S 20:30). This is quite common, and in some cases compulsory (20:5-9).

Saul's home was at Gibeah (q.v.), which is also called Gibeon of Saul, i.e. Saul's Hill (1 S 11:4; 1 S 30:26; also 10:5, God's Hill, or simply The Hill and Station of Benjamin or of the Benjamites (1 S 13:15; 2 S 23:29). It is usually identified with Tell el-Ful, but perhaps its site is marked rather by some ruins near but beneath that eminence. The tribe of Benjamin was the fighting tribe of Israel, and Kish seems to have been one of its most important members. Saul's remarks in deprecation (1 S 9:21) are not to be taken literally.

The circumstances of Saul's career are too well known to require recapitulation. It will be sufficient to refer to some of the recognized difficulties of the narrative. These difficulties arise from the fact that we appear to have two distinct biographies of Saul in the present Books of S.

4. Sources
This may well be the case as it is the practice of the Samael historian to set the events out of order, e.g., the expulsion of the Philistines before the coronation of David. This was so successful that the whole Philist army was seized with panic, and the onset of Saul and the desertion of their Hebrew allies completed their discomfiture. Saul followed up his victory by making predatory excursions on every side (14:47)

5. Election as King
Saul's election was against the Amalekites under Agag, who were likewise completely defeated. The fight was carried out with all the remorselessness common to tribal wars.

6. Reorgan- tion Pronounced
The election of Saul at Michmash is recorded in the presence of the chief- tains of the clans: it is not to be supposed that the whole nation was present. As soon as it was over, the electors went home, and Saul also returned to his father's farm and, like Cincinnatus, once more followed the plough.

7. Two Accounts
We have two accounts of Saul's rise to power. In one (1 Sam 15:24) Saul talks of the Philistines as his enemies. In the other (15:18), he says they are his allies. This confusion of Saul with his son was, no doubt, the cause of the later confusion between Samuel and David.

8. Final Conflict
The last battle of Saul was at Michmash. In dismay, Saul's troops deserted (16:6), and then all Saul was left with only 600 (16:2)

9. In this battle, Jonathan precipitated military disasters by a reckless attack upon the Philistine hosts. This was so successful that the whole Philist army was seized with panic, and the onset of Saul and the desertion of their Hebrew allies completed their discomfiture. Saul followed up his victory by making predatory excursions on every side (14:47). Saul's new enemy was against the Amalekites under Agag, who were likewise completely defeated. The fight was carried out with all the remorselessness common to tribal wars.

10. Saul's Reign
The story of Saul's reign is told in detail (1 Sam 13:1-17:58), and in the LXX, and in the Books of Samuel in the Old Testament.

11. Saul as the successor of David was a mistake, as David was not only the greater of the two kings, but he was the only king of the United Kingdom of Israel. Saul was a failure, and his story is a warning to all who would seize power by force.

12. Saul's Life
Saul's life is marked by a series of failures, and his death is a tragic end to a life of constant struggle.

13. Saul's Death
Saul died at Michmash at the hands of his own men. His life was a tragic one, and his death a sad commentary on the futility of human effort.
Saul’s Envy of David

Saul could not believe that David could remain loyal to him (24:9); at the first favorable opportunity he would turn upon him, hurl him from the throne, and exterminate his whole house. In these circumstances, it was his first interest to get rid of him. His attempt to do so (omitting Saul’s actions with LXX 18:8–11) was to encourage him to make raids on the Philistines in the hope that these might kill him (18:21ff); his next, assassination by one of his servants (19:1), and then by his own hand (19:9ff). When David was compelled to fly, the quarel turned to civil war. The superstitious fear of hurting the chosen of Jeh had given place to blind rage. Those who sheltered the fugitive, even priests, were slaughtered (22:17ff). Fro one spot to another David was hunted, as he says, like a partridge (26:20).

It is generally maintained that here also we have duplicate accounts; for example, that there are two accounts of David’s escape to Achish, king of Gath, and two of his sparing Saul’s life. The latter are contained in chs 24 and 26, but the points of resemblance are slight. Three thousand (24:2; 26:2) was the number of Saul’s picked men (cf 13:2). David uses the simile of “a flea” in 24:14, but in 26:20 for “a flea” LXX has “my soul,” which is no doubt original. The few other expressions would occur naturally in any narrative with the same contents.

Obviously the divided energies could not hold out long; he could not put down the imaginary rebellion within, and at the same time keep at bay the foreign foe. No sooner had he got the fugitive within his grasp than Paul had him away by a raid on the Philis (23:27ff); but after his life had been twice spared, he seemed to realize at last that the latter were the real enemy, and he threw his whole strength into one desperate effort for existence.

Saul himself saw that his case was desperate, and that in fact the game was up. As a forlorn hope he determined to seek occult advice. He could no longer use the official means of divination (28:6), and he was obliged to have recourse to a necromancer, one of a class whom he himself had taken means to suppress (28:3). The result of the séance confirmed his worst fears and filled his soul with despair (28:7ff).

It says much for the man that, hopeless as he was, he engaged in one last forlorn struggle with the enemy. The Philis had gathered in great force at Shunem. Saul drew up his army on the opposing hill of Gilboa. Between the two armies was a valley (of 14:4). The result was what had been foreseen. The Israelites, no doubt greatly reduced in numbers (contrast 11:8), were completely defeated, and Saul and his sons slain. Their arms were placed in the temple of Ashtarah, and their bodies hung on the wall of Bethshan, but Saul’s head was set in the temple of Dagon (1Ch 10:10). The citizens of Jabesh-gilead, out of ancient gratitude, rescued the bodies and, in un-Semitic wise, burned them and buried the bones. Saul’s death and burial were, however, much more delayed than the text indicates.

Once more we have, according to most present-day critics, duplicate accounts of the death of Saul.

14. Double Accounts

Regarding this, we may note a number of particular points.

a. The accounts are common

b. The accounts differ

c. The accounts are parallel

With Saul the first Israelite dynasty began and ended. The names of his sons are given in 1S 4:49 as Jonathan, Ishvi and Malchishua. Ishvi or Ishaio (LXX) is Present.

Saul’s Posternity

Eshbaaz, 1S 1:26 called in LXX "new born", q.v.
1. Ch 8:33 adds Abinadab. Jonathan left a long line of descendants famous, like himself, as archers (1Ch 8:34ff). The rest of Saul’s posternity apparently died out.

Malchishua and Abinadab were slain at Gibeon (1S 31:6; 1Ch 10:2), and Ish-bosheth was assassinated shortly after (2S 4:2ff). Saul had also two natural sons by Rizpah who were put to death by David in accordance with a superstitious custom, as sons were the five chief Merab (2S 21:8, not Michaell; of 1S 18:19). Saul’s other daughter Michal apparently had no children. Saul had, it seems, other wives, who were taken into the harem of David in accordance with the practice of the times (2S 12:8), but of them and their descendants we know nothing.

III. Character

Saul’s life and character are disposed of in a somewhat summary fashion by the Chronicler (1Ch 10, esp. vs. 13:14).

1. Book of Samuel was rejected because he was disloyal to Jeh, esp. convicted him a necromancer. The major premise of this conclusion, however, is the ancient dictum, “Misfortune presupposes sin.” From a wider point of view Saul cannot be dismissed so cavalierly. Like everyone else, Saul had his virtues and his failings. His chief weakness seems to have been want of decision of character. He was easily swayed by events and by people.

2. Saul’s Failures

The praises of David (1S 18:7f) at once set his jealousy on fire. His persecution of David was largely due to the instigation of mischievous courtiers (24:9). Upon remonstrance his repentance was as deep as it was short-lived (24:16; 25:21). His impulsive was such that he did not know where to stop. His interdict (14:24f) was quite as uncalled for as his religious zeal (15:9) was out of place. He was always at one extreme. His hatred of David was only equal to his affection for him at first (18:2). His pusillanimity led him to commit crimes which his own judgment would have forbidden (22:17). Like everyone else, Saul had his virtues and his failings. His chief weakness seems to have been want of decision of character. He was easily swayed by events and by people.

ject to external influences, so that he was now a respectable man of the world, now a prophet (10: 11; 19: 24).

On the other hand, Saul possessed many high qualities. His dreads of office (10: 22) was only equalled by the coolness with which he accepted it (11: 5). To the first call to action he responded with promptitude (11: 6 ff.). His timely aid excited the last lingering doubts of the people of Jabez-gilead (31: 11 ff.). If we remember that Saul was openly disowned by Samuel (16: 30), and believed himself cast off by Jah, we cannot but admire the way in which he fought on to the last. Moreover, the fact that he retained not only his own sons, but a sufficient body of fighting men to engage a large army of Phibs, shows that there must have been something in him to excite confidence and loyalty.

It is, however, no question as to the honorable and noble qualities of Saul. The chief were his prowess in war and his generosity.

4. David's in peace. They have been set down Elegy by the man who knew him best in what are among the most authentic verses in the Bible (2 S 1: 190).

THOMAS HUNTER WEIR

SavarAN, sav'-ra:n: AV—RV AVARAN (q.v.).

SAVE, sav'v In the sense "except," the word came into Eng. through the Fr. (sauf) and is fairly common (38 t, in addition to "saving," AV Eccl 5: 11; Am 9: 8; Mt 5: 32; Lk 4: 27; Rev 2: 17). It represents no particular Heb or Gr terms but is employed wherever it seems useful. It is still in good (slightly archaic) use, and RV has few good alternatives (Dt 16: 4 AV; Ps 18: 31b, etc.), but ERV has dropped "saving" in Lk 4: 27 and Rev 2: 17 and ARV also in Eccl 5: 11; Am 9: 8, retaining it only in Mt 5: 32.

SAVIAS, sa-v'as (Sauia, Sauia): In 1 Esd 8: 2, for Uzzi, an ancestor of Ezra, in Ezr 7: 4.

SAVIOUR, sav'vur: (1) While that "God is the deliverer of his people" is the concept on which, virtually, the whole OT is based (see SALVATION), yet the Hebrews seem never to have felt the need of a title for God that would sum up this aspect of His relation to man. Nearest to our word "Saviour" is a participial form (2: 10, 39; 6: 8) from the vb. yhšā (Qal not used; "save" in Highb.), but even this participle is not frequently applied to God (some 13 t of which 7 are in Isa 43: 63). (2) In the NT, however, the case is different, and Soter, Sôtr, is used in as technical a way as is our "Saviour." But the distribution of the 24 occurrences of the word is uncertain, for two-thirds of them are found in the later books of the NT—10 in the Pastoral, 5 in 2 Pet, and one each in Jn, 1 Jn, and Jude—while the other instances are Lk 1: 47; 2: 11; Acts 5: 31; 13: 23; Eph 5: 28; Phil 3: 20 (R). And there are no occurrences in Mt, Mk, or the earlier Pauline Ep. The data are clear enough. As might be expected, the fact that the OT used no technical word for Saviour meant that neither did the earliest Christianity use any such word. Doubtless for Our Lord "Messiah" was felt to convey the meaning. But in Gr-speaking Christianity, "Christ," the tr of Messiah, soon became treated as a proper name, and a new word was needed. (3) Sôtr expressed the exact meaning and had already been set apart in the language of the NT as a religious term, having one of the most popular Divine titles in use. Indeed, it was felt to be a most inappropriate word to apply to a human being. Cicero, for instance, arraigns Verres for using it: "Soter . . . How much does this imply? So much that it cannot be expressed by "God in Latin" (Verr. ii.2, 63, § 154). So the adoption of Sôtr by Christianity was most natural, the word seemed ready-made. (4) That the NT writers derived the word from its contemporary use is shown, besides, by its occurrence in combination with such terms as "manifestation" (Phanéria, 2 Tim 1: 10; Tit 2: 13), "love toward man" (Phanínthrôpia, Tit 3: 4), "captain" (archégós, Acts 5: 31; cf He 2: 10), etc. These terms are found in the Gr sources many times in exactly the same combinations with Sôtr. (5) In the NT Sôter is uniformly reserved for Christ, except in Lk 1: 47; Jude vers 25, and the Pastoral. In 1 Tim (1: 1; 2: 3; 4: 10) it is applied only to the Father, in 2 Tim (1: 10, only) it is applied to Christ, while in Tit there seems to be a deliberate alternation: of the Father in 1: 5; 2: 10; 3: 4; of Christ in 1: 4; 2: 13; 3: 6.

SAVOR, sâv'âr Yvû, râ'h; ómê): (1) The primary meaning of the word is "taste," "flavor" (from Lat savor, "taste"). So in Mt 5: 13; Lk 14: 34, "if the salt have lost his savor (μακρινόθεν, ìnappetent, "tasteless," "insipid," so as to lose its characteristic preserving virtue). (2) But generally it has the meaning of "smell," "odor": (a) once of evil odor: "Its stench shall come up, and its ill savor shall come up" (Joel 2: 20); (b) elsewhere in the sense of unpleasantness: the exception of Ex 5: 21 and AV Cant 1: 3 (RV "fragrance"), it is always accompanied by the adj. "sweet." It stands for the smell of sacrifices and oblations, in agreement with the ancient anthropomorphoeitic idea that God smells and is pleased with the fragrance of sacrifices (e.g. "Jeh smelled the sweet savor," Gen 8: 21; "to make a sweet savor unto Jeh," Nu 15: 3; and frequently). In the NT, "savor" in the sense of smell is used metaphorically: (a) once for the metaphor borrowed from the incense which attends the victor's triumphal procession; God is said to make manifest through His apostles "the savor of His knowledge in every place" as He "leads them in triumph in Christ" (2 Cor 2: 14; 3: 18). "Turrn" is the metaphor borrowed from the fragrant smell of the sacrifices. The apostles "are a sweet savor of Christ unto God" (2 Cor 2: 15), i.e. they are, as it were, a sweet odor for God to smell, an odor which is pleasing to God, even though its effect upon men varies (to some it is a "savor from death unto death," i.e. such as is emitted by death and itself causes death; to others it is a "savor from life unto life," ver 10). By the same sacrificial metaphor, Christ's offering of Himself to God is said to be "for a sweet smelling savor" (Eph 5: 2 AV, RV "for an odor of a sweet smell"); the same phrase is used in Phil 4: 18 of acts of kindness to Paul, which were "a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God." (3) Once it is used in the figurative sense of reputation: "Ye have made our savor to be abhorr'd [lit. "our smell to stink"] in the eyes of Pharaoh" (Ex 5: 21). Cf the Eng. phrase, "to be in bad odor.

The vb. "to savor" means: (1) Intransitively, to taste or smell or partake of (the odor of), as in the Preface of AV, "to savour more of curiosity than wisdom," or (2) transitively, to perceive by the taste or smell, to discover: "thou sav'st the savor of God" (AV Mt 6: 23; Mk 8: 33, RV "mindest"); "savoring, phrenízomai, sa-" and "savor" (sa-vor), occurs only in Gen 27: 4, 13, 17, 18 ("savor food") and RV Isa 30: 24 ("savored").

SCAB, skab, SCABBED, skab-ed, skab'd (ギ'ギ), yallepheth, ג'גלפ, mispaaph, מ'מעפא, sappath, vb. ג'סקפ, יסמאזא, שמשא, מלת'ף, לכת'. These are generic terms for any skin disease in which there are patches of hard crusts on the surface. The commonly used terms are the formal names e'ga'ma, herpes and, perhaps, psoriasis, all of which are common in Bible lands. Milder cases in which the disease was localized and in small patches (the 'sma'za of LXX) did not render the bearer unclean, and they were to be distinguished by the priest (Lev 13 2 6) from the more virulent and spreading eruptions which (ver 7) were regarded as causes of ceremonial uncleanness. These severer forms are the leich'en of LXX mentioned in Lev 21 20, which disqualified any son of Aaron from serving as a priest, and when affecting an animal rendered it unfit to be offered as a burnt offering (Lev 22 22). Hippocrates speaks of these cases as obstinate and persistent, and Galen believed that they might degenerate into leprosy; hence the terms in which Aeschylus speaks of it (Choephori 281). Celsius, however, recognized that leich'en was a popular eruption, not a true scab. The name yallepheth seems to have been given to it on account of the firmness of attachment of the scales, while mispaaph refers to its tendency to spread and cover the surface. A cognate word in Ezk 13 18 is the name of a large tallith or prayer veil used by the false prophets in Israel (ttz kchurch'). Scabs were esp. disfiguring on the head, and this infestation was threatened as a punishment on the daughters of Zion for their wanton haughtiness (Isa 3 17). In Middle Eng., "scab" is used for itch or mange, and as a term of opprobrium, as in Greene, Bacon and Bunyan, 35, 1591.

SCABBARD, skab'ard, SHEATH, sketh. See Armor, III, 5; WAR, 9.

SCAFFOLD, skaf'old (ギ'ギ, kiyyor). The Eng. word is used once of Solomon's "brazen scaffold" on which he knelt at the dedication of the temple (2 Ch 6 13).

SCALE, skål. See Siege, 4, (e); Weights and Measures.

SCALES, skålz ([ギ'ギ], kasketheth, "fish-scales"; [2] ג'תק, m'g'mhinuth, ג'מק'حن, maghen, "scales of the crocodile"); [3] צ'סק, lepis, with vb. צ'סק, צ'סק, "scale away" [20 3 17; 11 13]): (1) The first Heb word kasketheth means the imbricated scales of fish, which together with the dorsal fin were a distinguishing mark of all fish allowed as food to the Israelite (Lev 11 9 f.; Dt 14 9 f.). In the figurative sense the word is used of a cost of mail (1 S 17 5 38): (2) M'g'mhinath from m'g'mhen, lit. "a backlet" or "small shield" (2 Ch 23 4; Jer 26 3), is used in the description of the crocodile (see LEVIATHAN) for the horny scales or scutes imbedded in the skin, not imbricated upon it (Job 41 15 [Heb ver 7]). (3) The Gr lepis, which in classical language has a much wider range of meaning than the above Heb words ("rind" "buckles" "shell" "fish-scale," "scale of snake," "flake of metal and of snow," etc), is found in the NT description of St. Paul's recovery from temporary blindness, "And straightway there fell from his eyes as it were scales, and he received his sight" (Acts 9 18). There is nothing in the words of the sacred text which compels us to think of literal scales. (In Tob, however, a literal flaking-off of foreign substance is meant.) We have here rather a description of the sensation which terminated the three days' period of blindness which the apostle suffered after his meeting with the risen Lord on the road to Damascus. The apostle himself does not use this expression in his own graphic description of the same experience: "In that very hour I looked upon him" (22 13). The phrase has, however, come to us for we speak of "scales falling from one's eyes" when we mean a sudden illumination or remission or a dissipation of harassing doubt.

SCALL, sk6l (צ'סק, nethek; צ'שקעא, thrama). This only occurs in Lev 13 and 14 where it is used 14 t o describe bald or scaly patches of eruption on the skin. Such patches are generally the result of the action of parasitic organisms. The common form known now as scaled head is produced by a microscopic plant, Achorean schoenoleinii. In Old and Middle Eng., scall was used for scabbiness of the head (Chaucer and Spenser). See also Skent, Concise Etymol. Diet. of Eng. Language.

SCENT, sent: (1) In Hos 14 7, "the scent [in his memorial] thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon." "Scent" is used for צ'ק, zekher (so MT, but the pointing is uncertain), properly "memorial," whence RVn. The Eng. tr comes through the LXX which took it as "offering of sweet savour," and so "sweet savour." For "wine of Lebanon" see WINE. If this tr is not right, the alternative is "memorial" in the sense of "renown." (2) Job 14 9; Jer 48 11 for צ'ק, צ'ק, "odor," "Scent" of the water in Job 14 9 is poetic for "contact with water." (3) Psa 13 5 says, "the smell of scattered smoke," where "scent" is used in the obsolete sense of "disagreeable odor." The tr is, however, very loose, and "scent's" is a gloss; RV "noisome smoke." SCEPTRE, SECEPTER, sep'ter (צ'שק, shbbhet, expanded form in Est 4 11; 5 2; 8 4; פ'בש3, rbhlo). [Ad Est 15 11; He 1 8]}

SCHEVA, see'wa (Σκέβα, Skewd). A Jew, a chief priest, resident in Ephesus, whose seven sons were exorcists (Acts 19:16). Ewald regards the name as being Heb shebhabhyah. He was not an officiating priest, as there were only synagogue in Asia Minor. He may have belonged to a high-priestly family, or perhaps at one time he had been at the head of one of the courses in the temple.

In the narrative the construction is loose. There were seven sons (ver 14), and it would appear (ver 16) that in this particular case all were present. But (ver 16) the demon-possessed man overpowered them. This was done by omitting "both," but NAB, B, Tisch. WH, Soden, and best critics, retain the difficult reading. The explanation is that ver 14 states the custom: "who did this" being hol tolo pioinates, "who used to do this." Vs 15 and 16 state a particular case in which two took part, but the incident is introduced in a careless manner.

Ewald would translate amphoteran as "in both sides," but this is impossible. Baur understood "disciples" for "sons." D and Sprech have an interesting expansion which Blass considers original (ver 14): "Among whom also the sons [Sgr 'seven'] of a certain Seeva, a priest, wished to do the same, who were in the custom of exorcising such. And entering into the demon-possessed they began to call upon the Name, saying, 'We charge you by Jesus whom Paul preaches to come out.'"

SCISM, sir'in (σχίσμα, schima). Only in 1 Cor 12:28. The same Gr word as lit. "a split," in Acts 15:16; Mk. 2:21; and "divine" in Jn 7:43; 9:16; 10:19. It designates "a separation," not from, but within, the church, interfering with the harmonious cooperation and cooperation of the members described in the preceding verses (1 Cor 12:18ff). The ecclesiastical meaning is that of a break from a church organization, that may or may not be connected with a doctrinal dissent.

SCHOOL, skool (σχολή, scholē). See TYRANNUS.

SCHOOLMASTER, skool'mas-tər. Gal 3:24 f. AV reads: "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster. "Schoolmaster" is a tr of παιδαγός, paidagogos, lit. "child-leader." This paidagog was not a teacher but a slave, to whom in wealthy families the general oversight of a boy was committed. It was his duty to accompany his charge to and from school, never to lose sight of him in public, to prevent association with objectionable companions, to inculcate moral lessons at every opportunity, etc. He was a familiar figure in the streets, and the (sour) "face of a paidagogos" and "to follow one like a paidagogos" were proverbial expressions. Naturally, to the average boy a paidagogos was a tramp in the incorporation of everything objectionable. Hence St. Paul's figure may be paraphrased: "The law was a paidagogos, necessary but irksome, to direct us until the time of Christ. Then was the time of our spiritual commisions of age, that the control of the paidagogos ceased." The word paidagogos was taken over into Aram. at an early date, and St. Paul's language, which is hardly that of a mere adult observer, suggests that he had had personal experience with the institution. Wealthy and intensely orthodox Jewish parents living in a gentle city may well have adopted such a precaution for the protection of their children.

No Eng. word renders paidagogos adequately. "Schoolmaster" is quite wrong, but RV's "tutor" (cf 1 Cor 4:15) is little better in modern Eng.

SCIENCE, si'ens: This word as found in AV means simply "knowledge." "Science" occurs in AV only in two places, Dull 1:4, "children . . . understanding science" (γνῶσις γνώσεως, "those who understand science"). The meaning of the term here is "knowledge," wisdom. The only other occurrence of "science" is in the NT (1 Tim 6:20). "Avoiding . . . the error of the devil which is falsely called science." Thus at the root of this widespread Christian and Divine things, which false teachers alleged that they possessed, and of which they boasted. It was an inecipient form of Gnosticism, and it prevailed to a considerable extent in the churches of preconsular Asia, e.g. in Colossae and Ephesus. Timothy is put on his guard against the teaching of this gnosis falsely so called, for it set itself in opposition to the gospel. See Gnosticism.

"Science" in the modern sense of the word, as the discovery and orderly classification and exposition of the phenomena and of the laws of Nature, is not found either in the OT or the NT unless the passage in Dull be interpreted as meaning the scientific knowledge which the learned men of Babylon possessed of mathematics and astronomy, etc. See also ALCHEMY. The Heb word all natural phenomena meant the working of the hand of God in the world, directly and immediately, without the intervention of any secondary laws.

JOHN RUTHERFORD
SCIMITAR, sim't-tar, -tēr (ἀκτενώ, akitekē): Formerly given as “fauchion” in AV Jth 13 6; 18 9, lit., a weapon, which Judith took down from the wall of the bed at Holofernes’ head and with which she severed his head from his body.

SCOFF, skof, SCOIFFER, skof'r: The vb. indicates the manifestation of contempt by insulting words or acts; it combines bitterness with ridicule. It is much more frequent in RV than in AV, replacing “scorn” of the latter in Ps 1 1; Prov 1 22, etc. “Scorn” refers rather to an inner emotion based on a sense of superiority; “scoff,” to the outward expression of this emotion.

SCORN, skōrn: Fox Talbot connects this Eng. word with the Danish skørn, “dirt,” “ordure,” “mud,” “mire.” As distinguished from such words as “mock,” “deride,” “scoff,” all of which refer specifically to the various ways in which scorn finds outward expression, scorn itself denotes a subjective state or reaction.

Further, this state or reaction is not simply but complex. It involves a sense of superiority, resentment, and aver- sion. This reaction occurs when one is confronted with a person or a proposition that by challenging certain things for which he has feelings of superiority, awakens mingled resentment, repulsion and contempt by the hollowness of its claims and its intrinsic inferiority or weakness. Scorn is a hotter, fiercer emotion than disdain or contempt. It is obvious that scorn may—indeed, it must—arise in connection with an ungrounded, arrogant sense of self-esteem.

The word, outside of the phrase “laugh to scorn,” is found only in the OT, and then only 4 t (Est 3 6; AV Ps 44 13; 79 4; Hab 1 10), and it represents three different Heb words for none of which it is a suitable rendering. The two words “thought scorn” in Est 3 6 represent but one in Heb, viz. bāzāh, for which “disdain” would be a nearer equivalent. In Hab 1 10 AV the word tr’ “scorn” is mishāh, “an object of laughter,” “laughing-stock.” In Ps 44 13; 79 4 the Heb word is la’agh from a root, probably meaning “to stutter,” “stammer,” for which “mocking” is a better Eng. equivalent. In AV Job 34 7; Ps 123 4, la’agh is rendered “seeming” (the rendering given in Prov 22 22 to la’agh “a word from a totally different root and one much more nearly approximating the fundamental idea of the Eng. word “scorn.” In Prov 29 8 and Isa 28 14 la’agh is rendered “scornful”)

As a vb. the word is the tr’ given to la’agh, “to mock.” (Job 22 19; Ps 22 7; Isa 28 14; 22 19; Ps 22 7; “all laugh to scorn”; kōleth = “to scoff” (Ezk 16 31, “Gr scoffer,” but text still “scorneth”); for the noun ἐλαγή, “laugh to scorn” (RV “laughing-stock,” Job 12 4); ἐλαγὴ = “to scoff” (as used in Ethical and religious connections) (Job 16 20; Prov 3 34; 9 12, “all scoff” in RV); in Prov 19 28, “not happily (the at,” RV is warranted in substituting “scold” for “scorn” because the context indicates some form of outward expression of the scorn.

RV always (except Job 12 4; Sir 6 4; 1 Mac 10 70) retains “laugh to scorn” (2 K 19 21; 2 Ch 30 10; Neh 2 19; Job 22 19; Ps 22 7; Isa 37 22; Ezk 16 31; 32 32; 2 Esd 2 21; Jth 12 12; 14 18; 23 19; Jer 10 17; Mt 6 24; Mk 6 40; Lk 8 53). The vb. in Apoc and the NT is usually καταγίζω, καταγίδω, but in Wisd 4 1 κεκλίσεως, κεκλίσω; in Sir 13 7 κατακόρυφος, κατακόρυφος; and in 2 Esd 2 21 κατερίδω. In addition “scorn” is retained in Est 3 6; Job 39 17 8; 2 Esd 2 21 (commonly subst. to mock at, but elsewhere invariably to “scold.”

Scorer is the tr. of the participle ἐλαγέω, and once of the participle laγέω. For “scoffer” RV everywhere substitutes—properly—“scoffer.” Outside of Proph. (and Hos 7 5) the word is to be found only in Ps 1 2. The force of the word has been well indicated by Cheyne, who says that the “scoffer [scorcher] is one who despises that which is holy and avoids the company of the noble ‘wise men,’ but yet in his own vain way seeks for truth, and his character is marked by arrogance as that of the wise is characterized by devout caution.”

W. M. McPHEETERS

SCORPION, skōr'pee-on (ἀκρωτήρ, akhrotēr; of Arab.スクローサ, akhabb, "scorpion"); ἀκρώτηρ, akrotēr, "the ascent of Akribabm"; ἀκροπός, skropios. Note that the Gr and Heb may be akin; cf., omitting the vowels, 'kürb and spk). In Dt 8 15, we have, “who led thee through the great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents [nādashāsārdāh] and scorpions [akhabb],” Rehoboam (1 K 12 11 14; 2 Ch 10 11 14) says, “My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.” Ezekiel is told to prophesy to the children of Israel (2 6), “Be not afraid of them, neither be afraid of their words, though briars and thorns are with thee, and thou shalt dwell among scorpions.” “The ascent of Akribabm,” the north end of Wādī al-ʿArabah, S. of the Dead Sea, is mentioned as a boundary 3 t (Nu 34 4; Josh 13 5; 13 15; 12 2; 15 10; 18 17). To the Seventy (Lk 10 19), “Behold, I have given you authority to tread upon serpents and scorpions,” and again in Lk 11 12 He says, “Or if he shall ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion?”

Note that we have here three dualts, the la, the stone, the fish and the serpent, and the egg and the scorpion, whereas in the passage in Mt (7 9 f) we have only the lion and the stone and the fish and serpent. EB (s. v., “Scorpion”) ingeniously seeks to bring Lk into nearer agreement with Mt by omitting from Lk the second dualt, the lion and the serpent, inserting some texts as authority for the omission, and reading ψέαν, ἐπών, “Thou hast sown thorns, etc.”

In Rev 9 2–10 there come out of the smoke of the abyss winged creatures (“locusts,” ἐπέτρεπαν, ἐπετρέπεαν) like war-horses with crowns of gold, with these faces of men, hair of women, teeth of lions, breastplates of iron, and with stinging tails like scorpions. In Ecclus 26 7 it is said of an evil wife, “He that taketh hold of her is as one that graspeth a scorpion.” In 1 Mac 6 61 we find mention of “pieces [ραχίδια, πλακίδια, diminutive of skorphos] to cast darts.” In Plutarch skorphus is used in the same sense (Liddell and Scott, s. v., “scorpio”).

In the passage cited from Dt, and probably also in the names国庆 of Akribabm, we find references to the abundance of scorpions, esp. in the warmer parts of the country. Though there is a Gr proverb, “Look for a scorpion under every stone,” few would agree with the categorical statement of Tristram (NHB) that “every third stone is sure to conceal one.”

Nevertheless, campers and people sleeping on the ground need to exercise care in order to avoid their sting, which, though often exceedingly painful for several hours, is seldom fatal.

Scorpions are not proper insects, but belong with spiders, mites and ticks to the Arachnidae. The scorpions of Pal are usually 2 or 3 in long. The short cephalothorax bears a powerful pair of arthrodial or terminating with pincers, which make the creature look like a small crystal or lobster, and is armed behind with long sharp stings. The rest of the body consists of the abdomen, a broad part continuous with the cephalothorax, and a slender part forming the tail which ends in a short spike. The tail is usually carried curved over the back and is used for steering, as the prey into insensibility. Scorpions feed mostly on insects for which they lie in wait. The scorpion family is remarkable for having existed with very little change from the Silurian age to the present time.

It does not seem necessary to consider that the words of Rehoboam (1 K 12 11, etc.) refer to a whip that was called a scorpion, but rather that as the sting of a scorpion is worse than a lash, so his treatment would be harsher than his father’s.

ALFRED ELY DAY

SCORPIONS, skôr’pi-uhn, CHASTISING WITH. See PUNISHMENTS, 3, (17); SCPRIONS.

SCOURGE, skôrj, SCOURAGING, skôr’jing (mâstîk, mêsîk, mästîq, mastîq; in Acts 22 25 màstév, mastév, in Mk 15 15 Mt 27 26 tròpik-Loq, Livep, Lk 18 31, 35; Mk 4 3) term implemented for severe bodily punishment. Horace calls it horrible flagellum. It consisted of a handle, to which several cords or leather thongs were affixed, which were weighted with jagged pieces of bone or metal, to make the blows more painful and effective. It is comparable, in its horrid effects, only with the Russian knout. The victim was tied to a post (Acts 22 25) and the blows were applied to the back and loins, sometimes even, in the wanton cruelty of the executioner, to the face and the bowels. In the tense position of the body, the effect can easily be imagined. So hideous was the punishment that the victim can usually faint and not rarely died under it. Eusebius draws a horribly realistic picture of the torture of scourging (HE, IV, 15). By its application secrets and confessions were wrung from the victim (Acts 22 24). It usually preceded capital punishment (Lk 23 18). It was illegal to apply the flagellum to a Roman citizen (Acts 22 25), since the Porcian and Sempronian laws, 248 and 123 BC, although these laws were not rarely broken in the principate (Tac. Hist. iv. 27; Cic. Verr. v.6, 62; Jos. BJ, II, xiv, 9). As among the Russians today, the number of blows was not usually fixed, the severity of the punishment depending entirely on the commanding officer. In the punishment of Jesus depicted of the words of Lk 19 3, among the Jews the punishment of floggation was well known since the Egypt days, as the monuments abundantly testify. The word “scourge” is used in Lev 19 20, but ARV translates “punished,” the original was bággeth opposing the expression of the idea of investigation. De 25 3 fixed the mode of a Jewish flogging and limits the number of blows to 40. Apparently the flogging was administered by a rod. The Syrians reintroduced true scourging into Jewish life, when Antiochus Epiphanes forced them by means of it to eat swine’s flesh (2 Mac 6 30; 7 1). Later it was legalized by Jewish law and became customary (Mt 10 17; 23 34; Acts 22 19; 26 11), but the traditional limitation of the number of blows was still preserved. Says Paul in his “polish boasting”: “in stripes above measure,” “of the Jews the five times received I forty stripes save one,” distinguishing it from the “beatings with rods,” thrice repeated (2 Cor 11 23-25).

The other OT references (Job 5 21; 9 23; Isa 10 26; 28 15.18 (NIV, shoph); Josh 23 13 (NIV, shophè), are figurative for “affliction.” Notice the common use of metaphors in the phrase “overflowing scourge” (Isa 18 15.18).

SCRABBLE, skrâb’l: Occurs only in 1 S 21 13, as the tr of נֵפָר, tawâh: “David . . . feigned himself mad and scrawled on the doors of the gate.” “To scrabble” (modern Eng. “scrawl”) is here to make unmeaning marks; tawâh means “to make a mark” from tên, “a mark,” esp. as a cross (Ezk 9 4), a signature (Job 31 35, see RV), the name of the letter נ, originally made in the form of a cross; RVm has “made marks” and LXX has μαντισσα, “to beat as the LXX,” which bears resemblance to Drucker and others follow (“beat upon” or “drummed on the doors of the city,” which seems more probable).

SCREECH, skrâch, OWL. See NIGHT-MONSTER.

SCRIRES, skrîz. The existence of law leads necessarily to a profession whose business is the study and knowledge of the law; at any rate, if the law is extensive and complicated. At the time of Ezra and probably for some time after, this was chiefly the business of the priests. Ezra was both priest and scholar (גניך, gánhêkh). It was chiefly in the interest of the priestly cult that the most important part of the Pent (P) was written. The priests were therefore also in the first instance the scholars and the guardians of the Law; but in the course of time this was changed. The more highly esteemed the Law became in the eyes of the people, the more its study and interpretation became a life-work by itself, and thus there developed a class of scholars who, though not priests, devoted themselves assiduously to the Law. These became known as the scribes, that is, the students of the Law. During the Hellenistic period, the priests, esp. those of the upper class, became tainted with the Hellenism of the age and frequently turned their attention to paganistic culture, thus neglecting the Law of their fathers more or less and arousing the scribes to opposition. Thus the scribes and not the priests were now the zealous defenders of the Law, and hence were the true teachers of the people. At the time of Christ, this distinction was complete. The scribes formed a solid profession which held undisputed sway over the thought of the people. In the NT they are usually called ᾪπαματας, γραμματεῖς, i.e. “students of the Scriptures,” “scribes,” corresponding to the Heb גניך, gánhêkh, nêmôth = honorables literati, who make a profession of literary studies, which, in this case, of course, meant chiefly the Law. Besides this general designation, we also find the specific word γραμματικός, nomikós, i.e. “students of the Law,” “lawyers” (Mt 22 35; Lk 7 30; 10 25; 11 45.52; 14 3); and in so far as they not only know the Law but also teach it they are called ἀποστόλος, aposthôl, “doctors of the Law” (Lk 5 17; Acts 5 34).

The extraordinary honors bestowed on these scholars on the part of the people are expressed in their honorary titles. Most common was the appellative “rabbî” or “my lord.” (Mt 23 7 and otherwise). This word of polite address gradually became a title. The word “rabboni” (Mt 10 31; Lk 20 19) is an extensive form, and was employed by the disciples to give expression to their veneration of Christ. In the Gr NT “rabbi” is tr as ῥαββί, rhâbbî, i.e. “master” (Mt 8 6.8.21-25 and otherwise), or bârrâ, bârâkâ, bârâkâ (Mt 8 9 and otherwise), in Lk by τὸν ῥαβδὸς, ῥαβδόν (Lk 5 5; 9 24.45; 9 31-32; 17 13). Besides these, we find suggh, pater, “father,” and καθηγητής, kathēghêtês, “teacher” (Mt 23 9.5).

From their students the rabbis demanded honors even surpassing those bestowed on parents. “Let the honor of thy friend border on the honor of thy teacher, and the honor of thy teacher on the fear of God” (Abbâhô 4.12). “The honor of thy teacher must surpass the honor bestowed on thy master; for son and father are both in duty bound to honor the teacher” (Kritthôth 6 9). Everywhere the rabbis demanded the position of first rank (Mt 23 6f; Mk 12 38; Lk 11 45; 12 12; 20 40), that of the nobility. They wore στολὰς, stolàs, “tunics,” and these were the mark of the upper class.
Since the scribes were lawyers (see LAWYER), much of their time was occupied in teaching and in judicial functions, and both these activities must be pursued gratuitously. Rabbi Zadok said: 'Make the knowledge of the Law neither a crown in which to glory nor a spade with which to dig.' Hillel used to say: 'He who employs the crown of the Law as a school and school work in it, and warning is given not to overestimate the value of the ordinary avocation. It was a saying of Hillel: 'He that devotes himself to trade will not become wise.' The principle of gravity was professedly carried out in practice even in connection with the judicial activity of the scribes; hardly in connection with their work as teachers. Even the Gospels, in spite of the admonition that the disciples should give without pay because they had received with pay (Mt. 10:10; Mk. 10:7), and Paul (1 Cor. 9:14) states it as his just due that he receive his livelihood from those to whom he preaches the gospel, even though he makes use of this right only in exceptional cases (1 Cor. 9:3-18; 2 Cor. 11:8-9; Gal. 6:6; Phil 4:10, 18). Since this appears to have been the thought of the times, we are undoubtedly justified in assuming that the Jewish teachers of the Law also demanded pay for their services. Indeed, the admonitions above referred to, not to make instruction in the Law the object of self-interest, lead to the conclusion that gravity was not the rule; and in Christ's Pharisees against the scribes and Pharisees. He makes special mention of their greed (Mt. 23:14), and although they ostensibly gave instruction in the Law gratuitously, they must have practised methods by which they indirectly secured their fees.

Naturally the place of chief influence for the scribes up to the year 70 AD was Judea. But not only there were they to be found. Wherever the zeal for the law of the fathers was a perceptible force, they were indispensable; hence we find them also in Galilee (Lk 5:17) and in the Diaspora. In the Jewish epitaphs in Rome, dating from the latter days of the empire, grammatici are frequently mentioned; and the Bab scribes of the 5th and 6th cent, were the authors of the most monumental work of rabbinical Judaism—the Talmud.

Since the separation of the Pharisaic and the Sadducean teachers into two classes, the scribes generally belonged to the Pharisaic class; for this latter is none other than the party which recognized the interpretations or traditions which the scribes in the course of time had developed out of the body of the written Law and endeavored to press as the binding rule of life. Since, however, scribes are merely "students of the Law," there must also have been scribes of the Sadducee type; for it is not to be imagined that this party, which recognized only the written Law as binding, could not have had some opposing students in the other class. Indeed, various passages of the NT which speak of the "scribes of the Pharisees" (Mt. 23:5; Lk. 6:50; Acts 18:23, 24) indicate that there were also "scribes of the Sadducees."

Under the reign and leadership of the scribes, it became the ambition of every Israelite to know more or less of the Law. The aim of education in family and school was to make him familiar with the code of the people of the Law. Even the common laborer should know what was written in the Law; and not only know it, but also do it. His entire life should be governed according to the norm of the Law, and, on the whole, this purpose was realized in a high degree. Jews everywhere, even the most they held of our riches and our cities and our other goods, the Law remains our possession forever. And no Jew can be so far removed from the land of his fathers nor will he fear a hostile commander to such a degree that he would not fear his Law more than his commander." So loyal were the majority of the Jews toward their Law that they would gladly endure the tortures of the rack and even death for it. This frame of mind was due almost wholly to the systematic and objective instruction of the scribes.

The motive underlying this enthusiasm for the Law was the belief in Divine retribution in the strictest judicial sense. The prophetic idea of a covenant which God had made with His select people was interpreted purely in the judicial sense. The covenant was a contract; parties were mutually bound. The people are bound to observe the Divine Law literally and conscientiously; and, in return for this, God is in duty bound to render the promised reward in proportion to the services rendered. This applies to the people as a whole as well as to the individual. Services and reward must always stand in mutual relation to each other. He who renders great services may expect from the justice of God that he will receive great returns as his portion, while, on the other hand, every transgression also must be followed by its corresponding punishment.

The results corresponded to the motives. Just as the motives in the main were superficial, so the results were an exceedingly shallow view of religious and moral life. Religion was reduced to legal formalism. All religious and moral life was dragged down to the level of the Law, and this must necessarily lead to the following results: (1) The individual is governed by it, and hence he can have only evil results when applied in this realm. Law has the purpose of regulating the relations of men to each other according to certain standards. Its object is not the individual, but only the body of society. In the law, the individual must find the proper rule for his conduct toward society as an organism. This is a matter of obligation and of government on the part of society. But religion is not a matter of government; where it is found, it is a matter of freedom, of emotion, and of conduct. (2) By reducing the practice of religion to the form of law, all acts are placed on a par with each other. The motives are no longer taken into consideration, but only the deed itself. (3) From this it follows that the highest ethical attainment was the formal satisfaction of the Law. The scribes' principle was literalism. (4) Finally, moral life must, under such circumstances, lose its unity and be split up into manifold precepts and duties. Law always affords opportunity for casuistry, and it was the development of this attitude in the face of our Jewish religious life through the "precepts of the elders" which called forth Christ's repeated denunciation of the work of the scribes.

SCRAP, scrap: A word connected with "scrip," and meaning a "bag," either as made from a "scrip," writers, and the description of them given by Herodotus in book iv of his history represents a race of savages, inhabiting a region of rather indefinite boundaries, north of the Black and Caspian seas and the Caucasus Mountains. They were nomads who neither plowed nor sowed (iv. 19), moving about in wagons and carrying their dwellings with them (ib. 46); they had the most filthy habits and never washed in water (ib. 75); they drank the blood of the first enemy killed in battle, and made napkins of the scalps and drinking bowls of the skulls of the slain (ib. 64–65). Their deities were many of them identified with those of the Greeks, but the most characteristic rite was the worship of the naked sword (ib. 62), and they sacrificed every hundredth man taken in war to this deity. War was their chief business, and they were a terrible scourge to the nations of Western Asia. They broke through the barrier of the Caucasus in 632 BC and swept down like a swarm of locusts upon Media and Assyria, turning the fruitful fields into a desert; pushing across Mesopotamia, they ravaged Syria and were about to invade Egypt when Psammitichus I, who was besieging Ashkelon, bought them off by rich gifts, but they remained in the Negeb 28 years, according to Herodotus. It is supposed that a company of them settled in Beth-shean, and from this circumstance it received the name Scythopolis. Various branches of the race appeared at different times, among the most noted of which were the Parthians (q.v.).

SEA, sē (Σaviour, sēlēs, sēlēs; in Acts 27 5 παλαις, παλαις): The Mediterranean is called ha-sēn ha-gūdōh, “the great sea” (Nu 34 6; Josh 1 4; Ezek 47 10, etc); ha-sēn ha-hā’drōn, “the hinder,” or “western sea” (Dt 11 24; 34 2; Joel 2 20; Zec 14 8); sēn yis-hūtin, “the sea of the Philistines” (Ex 23 31); AV translates yām yāhōh in Ex 3 7 by “sea of Joppa,” perhaps rightly.

The Dead Sea is called yām ha-mēlekh, “the Salt Sea” (Nu 34 3; Dt 3 17; Josh 3 16, etc); ha-sēn ha-ta-kênōw, “the east sea” (Ezek 18 17; Joel 2 20; Zec 14 5); yām hā-gūdōh, “the sea of the Arabah” (Dt 3 17; Josh 3 16; 12 3; 2 K 14 25).

The Red Sea is called yām yēqōh, lit. “sea of weeds” (Ex 10 19; Nu 14 25; Dt 1 1; Josh 2 10; Jgs 11 16; 1 K 9 26; Neh 9 9; Ps 106 7; Jer 49 21, etc); yām yēl-šāsa, erṣēf yām ha-gūdōh, “the sea of the Arabah” (Wisd 19 7; Acts 7 30). He 11 29; yām mi-nir-yōm, “the Egypt sea” (Isa 11 15).

Yām is used of the Nile in Nah 3 8 and probably also in Isa 19 5, as in modern Arab. bahr, “sea,” is used of the Nile and its alluviums. Yām is often used for “west” or “westward,” as “look from the place where thou art,” “westward” (Gen 13 14); “western border” (Nu 34 6). Yām is used for “sea” in general (Ex 20 11) also for “molten sea” of the temple (1 K 7 23).

The Sea of Galilee is called kinnērēth, “Chinnereth” (Nu 34 14; Jgs 11 20, etc); kinnīrēth, “Chinnereth” (1 K 15 20); yām kinnērēth, “the sea of Chinnereth” (Nu 34 11; Josh 13 27); yām kīn-nērēth, “the sea of Chinnereth” (Josh 12 3); ḫānān yēfēnē, ḫānān yēfēnē, “the lake of Gennesaret,” “the lake of Gennesaret” (Lk 5 2; and yām yēfēnē, yēfēnē, “the water of Gennesaret” (1 Mace 11 67), from late Heb ḫēnē, ḫēnē; or ḫēnē, ḫēnē; ḫēnē of the Gallalais; ḫēnē of the Galiilais, “the sea of Galilee” (Mt 4 18; 15 29; Mk 1 16; 7 31; Jn 6 1); ḫānān yēfēnē, “the lake of Gennesaret; ḫēnē of the Galiilais, “the sea of Tiberias,” “the sea of the lake,” “the sea of Tiberias” (Jn 21 1; Codex Sinaiticus).

In mishbar yām, “the wilderness of the sea” (Isa 21:1), there may perhaps be a reference to the Pers Gulf.

SEA-MEW, sōn'mū (נָּבָר, shābāph; λάρος, lāros; Lat Larus canus): The sea-gull. Used by modern translators in the list of abominations in the place of the cuckoo (Lev 11:16; Dt 14:15). It is very probable that the sea-gull comes closer to the bird intended than the Cuckoo (q.v.). The sea-gull is a “slender” bird, but not “lean” as the root shābāph implies. However, with its stretch of wing and restless flight it gives this impression. Gulls are common all along the Mediterranean coast and around the Sea of Galilee. They are thought to have more intelligence than the average bird, and to share with some eagles, hawks, vultures and the raven the knowledge that if they find a mollusk they cannot break they can carry it aloft and drop it on the rocks. Only a wise bird learns this. Most feathered creatures pick at an unyielding surface a few times and then seek food elsewhere. There are two reasons why these birds went on the abomination list. To a steady diet of fish they add carrion. Then they are birds of such nervous energy, so exhaustless in flight, so daring in flying directly into the face of fierce winds, that the Moslems believed them to be terrors of the sea. Moses was raised and educated among the Egyptians, and the laws he formulated often are tinged by traces of his early life. History fails to record any instance of a man reared in Egypt who permitted the killing of a gull, jisus, or hoopoe.

SEA, THE GREAT (גָּדְלַיָּה הַיָּם, ha-yām ha-gādēh): This is the name given to the Mediterranean, which formed the western boundary of Pal (Nu 34:6; Josh of the Sea 15:12; 47; Ezk 47:19; 48:28). It is also called “the hinder sea” (Heb ha-yām ha-abdēn), i.e., the western sea (Dt 11:24; 34:2; Jos 2:23; Zec 14:8), and “the sea of the Philistia” (Ex 23:31), which, of course, applies esp. to the part washing there of the Philistia, from Jaffa southward. Generally, when the word “sea” is used, and no other is definitely indicated, the Mediterranean is intended (Gen 49:12; Nu 13:29, etc.). It was the largest sheet of water with which the Hebrews had any acquaintance. Its gleaming mirror, stretching away to the sunset, could be seen from many an inland height.

It bulked large in the minds of the landsmen—for Israel produced few mariners—impressing itself upon their speech, so that “seaward!”

2. Israel was the common term for “westward” and the Sea (Ex 26:22; Jos 5:1, etc.). Its mystery and wonder, the raging of the storm, and the sound of “sorrow on the sea,” borne to their upland ears, infected them with a strange dread of its wide waters, to which the seer of Patmos gave the last Scriptural expression in his vision of the new earth, where “the sea is no more” (Rev 21:1).

Along the coast lay the tribal territories assigned to Asher, Zebulun, Manasseh, Dan and Judah. Many of the cities along the shore were the sanctuary of sea-gods, and much of the land. The coast line offered little facility for the making of harbors. The one seaport of which in ancient times the Hebrews seem to have made much use was Doppar—the modern Jaffa (2 Ch 2:18, etc.). From this place, probably, argoses of Solomon turned their prows westward. Here, at least, “ships of Tarshish” were wont to set out upon their adventurous voyages (Jon 1:3). The ships on this sea figure in the beautiful vision of Isaiah (60:8 f.). See ACCO; JERUSALEM.

The boy Jesus, from the heights above Nazareth, must often have looked on the waters of the great sea, as they broke in foam on the curving shore, from the roots of the Carmel to the point at Acre. Once only in His journeys, so far as we know, did He approach the sea, namely on His ever-memorable visit to the “borders of Tyre and Sidon” (Mt 16:21; Mk 7:24). The sea, in all its moods, was well known to the great apostle of the Gentiles. The three shipwrecks, which he suffered (2 Cor 11:25), were doubtless due to the power of its angry billows over the frail craft of those old days. See PAUL.

The land owes much to the great sea. During the hot months of summer, a soft breeze from the water springs up at dawn, fanning all the seaward face of the Central Palestine to Range. At sunset the chilled air of the sea slips down the slopes and the higher strata drift toward the uplands, charged with priceless moisture, giving rise to the refreshing dews which make the Palestinian morning so sweet. See, further, MEDITERRANEAN SEA. W. EWING

SEA, THE MOLten, mōl'thın, or BRAZEN (יוֹם הַקּוֹדֶשׁ, yôm ha-kōḏesh); This was a large brazen (bronze) reservoir for water which stood in the court of Solomon’s Temple between the altar and the temple porch, toward the S. (1 K 7:23-26; 2 Ch 4:2-5.10). The bronze from which it was made is stated in 1 Ch 18:8 to have been taken by David from the cities Tithath and Cun. It replaced the layer of the tabernacle, and, like that, was used for storing the water in which the priests washed their hands and feet (cf Ex 30:18; 38:8). It rested on 12 brazen (bronze) oxen, facing in four groups the four quarters of heaven. For particulars of shape, size and ornamentation, see TEMPLE. The “sea” served its purpose till the time of Ahaz, who took away the brazen oxen, and placed the sea upon a pavement (2 K 16:17). It is recorded that the oxen were afterward taken to Babylon (Jer 52:20). The sea itself shared the same fate, being first broken to pieces (2 K 25:13.16).

SEAH, sē‘ā (סֵאָה, sē‘āh): A dry measure equal to about one and one-half pecks. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

SEAL, sēl (subst. מְדִינָה, mōḏīnā, “seal,” “signet,” בַּרְבָּת, barḇa’taḥ, “signet-ring”; Aram. נְצֻר, nēṣūr; עָטָה, ʿātā, inornament, signet; סְפּוֹרָה, sopheraḥ; vb. סָפַר, saphar, “to seal”); also סְפָר (Arab. سُفَر, ṣafar); סְפָרָה (ṣferaḥ, סְפָרַד, sferad, kataphrugoniti, “to seal”). A seal is an instrument of stone, metal or other hard substance (sometimes set in a ring), on which is engraved some device or figure, and is used for making an impression on some soft substance, as clay or wax, affixed to a document or other object, in token of authenticity. The use of seals goes back to a very remote antiquity, esp. in Egypt, Babylonia and Assyria. Herodotus (1.95) records the Babylon custom of wearing signets. In Babylonia the seal generally took the form of a cylinder cut in clay, with some hard stone, which was bored through from end to end and a cord passed through it. The design, often accompanied by the owner’s name, was engraved on the curved part. The signet was then suspended by the cord round the neck or waist (cf RV “cord” in Gen 35:18; “thou shalt put upon thine arm,” i.e. on the Antiquity.

1. Prevalence in but this form was in Egypt gradually superseded by the scarab (= beetle-shaped) as the prevailing type. Other forms, such as the cone-shaped, were also in use. From the earliest period of civilization the finger-ring on which some distinguishing badge was engraved was in use as a convenient way of carrying the signet, the earliest extant rings being those found in Egypt tombs. Other ancient peoples, such as the Phoenicians, also used seals. From the East the custom passed into Greece and other western countries. Devices of a variety of sorts were in use at Rome, both by the emperors and by private individuals. In ancient times, almost every variety of precious stones was used for seals, as well as cheaper material, such as limestone or terra-cotta. In the West the wax came early into use as the material for receiving the impression of the seal, but in the ancient East clay was the usual medium (cf Job 38:14). Pigment and ink also came into use.

That the Israelites were acquainted with the use in Egypt of signets set in rings is seen in the statement that Pharaoh delivered to Joseph his royal signet as a token of deputed authority (Gen 41:41). They were also acquainted with the use of seals among the Persians and Medes (Est 3:12; 8:10.11; Dnl 6:17). The Hebrews themselves used them at an early period, the first recorded instance being Gen 38:15.25, where the patriarch Judah is said to have pledged his word to Tamar by leaving her his signet, cord and staff. We have evidence of engraved signets being in important use among them in early times in the description of the two stones on the high priest’s ephod (Ex 28:11; 39:6), of his golden plate (Ex 28:30; 39:30), and breastplate (39:14). Ben-Sirach mentions as a distinct occupation the work of engraving on signets.

Sealskin, s’dél: Skin of rams or goats, from which were made seals: The rendering of RV (Ex 25:5; Ezk 16:10) for שֵׁלֶּשׁ כַּפַּר, “or toshah. RVm “peccary-skinned,” AV “lizards’ skin.” A seal, Μοναχος αἰγίπτεως, is found in the Mediterranean, though not in the Red Sea, but it is likely times a metaphor for sorcery. That which is beyond the comprehension of the unintimated is usual to be called “a book that is sealed” (Isa 29:11 ff.; Rev 5:1 ff.). Daniel is bidden to “shut up the words” of his prophecy “and seal the book, even to the time of the end,” i.e. to keep his prophecy a secret till it shall be revealed (Dan 12:4; cf. Rev 10:4). Elsewhere it stands for the ratification of prophecy (Jer 33:14). The exact meaning of “a book that is sealed” is sometimes ambiguous (as in Job 33:16; Ezk 28:12). In the NT the main ideas in the figure are those of authentication, ratification, and security. The believer in Christ is said to “set his seal to this, that God is true” (1Jn 3:35), i.e. to attest the veracity of God, to stamp it with the believer’s own endorsement and confirmation. The Father has sealed the Son, i.e. authenticated Him as the bestower of life-giving bread (Jn 6:27). The circumcision of Abraham was a “sign” and “seal,” an outward ratification, of the righteousness of faith which He had already received while uncircumcised (Rom 4:11; cf. the prayer offered at the circumcision of a child, “Blessed be He who sanctified His beloved from the womb,” Ps 132:13). His seal was His offering with the sign of a holy covenant” (also Tg Cant 38: “The seal of circumcision is in your flesh as it was sealed in the flesh of Abraham”). Paul describes his act in making over to the saints at Jerusalem the distribution of the Gentiles as “sealed” to them this fruit” (Rom 15:28); the meaning of the phrase is doubtful, but the figure seems to be based on sealing as ratifying a commercial transaction, expressing Paul’s intention formally to hand over to the Jerusalem converts the spiritual blessings which through him the Gentiles had enjoyed, and to mark it as their own property. Paul’s converts are the “seal,” the authentic confirmation, of his apostleship (1 Cor 9:2). God by His Spirit indicates who are His, as the owner sets his seal on his property; and just as documents are sealed up until the proper time for opening them, so Christians are sealed up by the Holy Spirit “unto the day of redemption” (Eph 1:13; 4:30; 2 Cor 1:22). Ownership, security, and authentication are implied in the words, “The firm foundation of God standeth, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his” (2 Tim 2:19). The seal of God on the foreheads of His servants (Rev 7:2–4) marks them as His own, and guarantees them, by eternal security, whereas those that “have not the seal of God on their foreheads” (Rev 9:4) have no such guaranty.

On the analogy of the rite of circumcision (see above), the term “seal” (σφαῖρα) was at a very early period applied to Christian baptism. But there is no sufficient ground for referring such passages as Eph 1:13; 4:30; 2 Cor 1:22 to the rite of baptism (as some do). The use of the metaphor in connection with baptism came after NT times (early instances are given in Geburah-Hebrews, i.e. across the foot on 2 Clem 7). Harnack and Hatch maintain that the name “seal” for baptism was taken from the mysteries, but Ancher and Sanday-Headlam hold that it was borrowed from the Jewish view of circumcision as a seal. See MYSTERIES.

SEALE, s’dél: FOUNTAIN: These words, applied to the bride (Cant 4:12), find their explanation under SEAL (q.v.). Anything that was to be authoritatively protected and preserved by water was one of the most precious things, as in the East, fountains and wells were often sealed (Gen 29:3; Prov 5:15–18).

SEALSkin, s’dél’skin: The rendering of RV (Ex 25:5; Ezk 16:10) for סֵלֶשׁ כַּפַּר, “or toshah. RVm “peccary-skinned,” AV “lizards’ skin.” A seal, Μοναχος αἰγίπτεως, is found in the Mediterranean, though not in the Red Sea, but it is likely (Sir 38:27). From the case of Judah and the common usage in other countries, we may infer that every Hebrew of any standing wore a seal. In the case of the signet ring, it was usual to wear it on one of the fingers of the right hand (Jer 22:24). The Hebrews do not seem to have developed an original type of signets. The seals so far discovered in Palestine prove that the predominating type was the Babylonian, and that to a less degree the Egyptian.

(1) One of the most important uses of sealing in antiquity was to give a proof of authenticity and authority to letters, royal commands, etc.

3. Uses of—It served the purposes of a modern signature at a time when the art of writing was only known to a few. Thus Jezebel "wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with his seal" (1K 21:8); the written commands of Ahasuerus were "sealed with the king's ring," 'for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse" (Est 8:10; 3:12). (2) Allied to this is the formal ratification of a transaction or covenant. Jeremiah sealed the deeds of the field which he bought from Hanamel (Jer 32:10–14); cf. with which are affixed their seal to the written covenant between God and His people (Neh 9:38; 10:1 ff.). (3) An additional use was the preservation of books in security. A roll or other document intended for preservation was sealed up before it was deposited in a place of security (Jer 32:14; cf. the book "...close sealed with seven seals," Rev 5:1). In sealing the roll, it was wrapped round with flaxen thread or string, then a lump of clay was attached to it impressed with a seal. The seal would have to be broken by an authorized person before the book could be read (Rev 5:2.5.9; 6:1.3, etc.). (4) Sealing was a badge of deputed authority and power, as when a king handed over his signet ring to one of his officers (Gen 41:42; Est 3:10; 8:2; 1Macc 6:15). (5) Closed doors were often sealed to prevent the entrance of any unauthorized person. So the door of the lion's den (Dnl 6:17; cf. Bel ver 14). Herodotus mentions the custom of sealing tombs (ii.121). So we read of the chief priests and Pharisees rolling a stone at the mouth of Our Lord's tomb in order to "make the sepulchre sure" against the intrusion of the disciples (Mt 27:66). Cf. the sealing of the abyss to prevent Satan's escape (Rev 20:3). A door was sealed by stretching a cord over the stone which blocked the entrance, spreading clay or wax on the cord, and then impressing it with a seal. (6) To any other object might a seal be affixed, as an official mark of ownership; e.g. a large number of clay stoppers of wine jars are still preserved, on which seal impressions of the cylinder type were stamped, by rolling the cylinder along the surface of the clay when it was still soft (Isa 48:14).

II. Metaphorical Use of the Term.—The word "seal," both subst. and vb., is often used figuratively for the act or token of authentication, confirmation, proof, security, or possession. Sir 38:11 is not to be understood by God, but treasured and stored up with Him against the sinner, under a seal (Dt 32:34; Job 14:17). A lover's signet is the emblem of love as an inalienable possession (Cant 8:6); an unassailable maiden is "a spring shut up, a fountain sealed" (Cant 4:12). To seal is some-that takhash means the dogong, which is found in the Red Sea. See Bagdaz; Porpoise.

SEAM, sém, SEAMLESS, sém-les: The coat or inner garment (חֵלֶד, chilôn) of Jesus is described in John as "without seam" (*קָטָרֶה, katārēph), i.e. woven in one piece.

SEAR, sér: In 1 Tim 4:2 for κατευθύνουμαι, kataeuθynoun, "burn with a hot iron" (cf. "cauterize"); AV having their conscience seared with a hot iron, and... in this construction means "made insensible," like the surface of a deep burn after healing. The vb., however, probably means "brand" (so RV). "Criminals are branded on their forehead, so that all men may know their infamy. The consciences of certain men are branded just as truly, so that there is an inward consciousness of hypocrisy." See the conns.

SEARCH, sērch: Some peculiar senses are:

1. In the books of Moses, esp. in Nu, "searching out the land!" means to spy out (תֵאר, te'ar), to investigate carefully, to examine with a view to giving a full and accurate report on.
2. When applied to the Scriptures, as in Ezr 4:15.19 (*תֵאר בֵּיתוُ", bakër);
   - Jn 5:39; 1 Pet 1:11 (*קַאֲדוּר, kādūr), it means to examine, to study out the meaning.
   - In Acts 1:10, examine (*הִטָּשׁ, hīṭash), of AV. See SEARCHINGS.
3. "Search out!" often means to study critically, to investigate carefully, e.g. Job 8:8; 29:16; Ecel 1:13; Lam 3:50; Mt 2:8; 1 Cor 2:10; 1 Pet 1:10. (4) When the word is applied to God's searching the heart or spirit, it means His opening up, laying bare, disclosing what was hidden, e.g. 1 Ch 28:9; Ps 44:21; 139:1; Prov 20:27; Jer 17:10; Rom 8:27.

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES: The sentence beginning with *קַאֲדוּר, kādūr, in Jn 5:39 AV has been almost universally regarded as meaning "Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life." But one cannot read as far as *דְּקֵלֵתו, *dekēlo, "ye think," without feeling that there is something wrong with the ordinary version. This vb. is at least a disturbing element in the current of thought (if not superfluous), and only when the first vb. is taken as an indicative does the meaning of the writer become clear. The utterance is not a command, but a declaration: "Ye search the scriptures, because ye think that in them," etc. Robert Barclay as early as 1675, in his Apology for the True Christian Divinity (91 ff), refers to two scholars before him who had handed down the correct tradition: "Moreover, that place may be taken in the indicative mood, Ye search the Scriptures; which interpretation the Gr word will bear, and so Pasor tr. it; which by the reproof following secondly also to apply to God's searching the heart or spirit, as Cyril long ago hath observed." So Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, in his Johnnine Grammar (London, 1906, §2439 [i]). See also Transactions American Philological Association, 1901, 641. J. E. Harry SEARCHINGS, sēr'chings (*תֵארשֵׁים, te'arshēm), birkēl (תְּבַרְסְקֹל), from bāqar, to search, explore, examine thoroughly): In the song of Deborah the Reubenites are taunted because their great resolves of heart, birkēl (תְּבַרְסְקֹל), led to nothing but great "searchings of heart, birkēl (תְּבַרְסְקֹל), and no activity other than to remain among their flocks (Jgs 5:15). The first of the two Heb expressions so emphatically contrasted (though questioned by commentators on the authority of 5 MSS as a corruption of the second) can with reasonable certainty be interpreted "acts prescribed by one's understanding" (of the expressions hākham lēb, nḇān lēb, in which the heart is looked upon as the seat of the understanding). The second expression may mean either irresolution or hesitation based on selfish motives, as the heart was also considered the seat of the feelings, or answerability to God (cf Jer 17:10; Prov 25:3); this rendering would explain the form lightgalahd in Jgs 6:16, lit. "for the water courses of Reuben, great the searchings of heart!"

SEASONS, sē'zn (summer: *יָמִים, *yāmîm, Chal d yāmîy; Dnl 2:35); *θερός, *thēros; winter: *יָמִים, *yāmîm, θερός [Cant 2:11], *hèreph; χειμῶν, cheimōn): The four seasons in Pal are not so marked as in more northern countries, summer gradually fading into winter and winter into summer. The range of temperature is not great. In the Bible we have no reference to spring or autumn; the only seasons mentioned are "summer and winter" (Gen 8:22; Ps 74:17; Zec 14:8).

Winter is the season of the rain lasting from November to May. "The winter is past, the rain is over" (Cant 2:11). See RAIN. The temperature at sea-level in Pal reaches freezing-point occasionally, but seldom is less than 40° F. On the hills and mountains it is colder, depending on the height. The people have no means of heating their houses, and suffer much from the cold. They wrap up their necks and heads and keep inside the houses out of the wind as much as possible. "The sluggard will not plow by reason of winter" (Prov 20:4). Jesus in speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter" (Mt 24:20). Paul asks Timothy to "come before winter" (2 Tim 4:21) as navigation closed then and travel was virtually impossible.

Summer is very hot and rainy. "When the fig tree . . . putteth forth its leaves, ye know that the summer is nigh" (Mk 13:28); "The harvest is past, the summer is ended" (Jer 8:20). It is the season of harvesting and threshing (Dnl 2:35). "He that gathereth in summer is a wise son" (Prov 10:5). See COLT; HEAT; ASTRONOMY, 1, 5.

SEAT, sēt: This word is used to translate the Heb words *בְּכָרָה, *bēkārāh, *בְּכָרָה, *bēkārāh; *סֶבֶא, *sēbāh; *סָבָא, *Sabā, Gen 17:10; 1 Ch 1:9); Gr ἂν, but B has *Σαβάν, Sabān;

1. Son of first son of Benjamin.
2. Brothers
   a. Forms of being Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Name, and Sabtecha.
   b. In Ps 72:10 and Isa 43:3 Parentage (where the Gr has *Σέφρα, *Sēphrā, *Σέφρα, Sēphrā).
   c. Of Seba (Gen 7:19). Seba is mentioned with Egypt and Ethiopia, and the Septuagint before have been a southern people. In Is 19:1 we meet with the gentile form, *Σαβάζαυ, *Sabāzāv (Sabtēza, Sabachīm), rendered "Sabaean," who are described as "men of stature" (i.e. tall), and were to come over to Cyprus in chains, and acknowledge that God was in him— their merchandise, and that of the Ethiopians, and the labor of Egypt, were to be his.

SEATS, sēts, CHIEF. See CHIEF SEATS.

SEBA, sēbā (גְּבָא, gēbāh; *Σαβά, *Sabā; Gen 10:7; 1 Ch 1:9); Gr *βάν, but B has *Σαβάν, Sabān;
Their country is regarded as being, most likely, the district of Saba, N of Adulis, on the west coast of the Red Sea. There is just a possibility that the Saba River, stretching from the coast to the Zambesi and the Limpopo, which was utilized as a waterway by the states in that region, though, through silting, not suitable now, may contain a trace of the name, and perhaps testifies to still more southern extensions of the power and influence of the Sebaim. (See Th. Bent, The Ruined Cities of Mashonaland, 1892.) The ruins of this tract are regarded as being the works of others than the black race and the country. Dillmann, however, suggests (on Gen 10 7) that the people of Seba were another branch of the Cushites E. of Napatha by the Arabian Sea, of which Strabo (xiv. 4, 8, 10) and Ptolemy (iv. 7, 7 f) give information. See SHEBA and HBD, s.v.

SEBAM, seb'am (סבַמ, s'hbam; סָבָאָם, Seba'am; AV Shebam): A town in the upland pasture land given to the tribes of Reuben and Gad. It is named along with Heshbon, Eleach and Nebo (Nu 32 50). It is probably the same place as Simnah (AV "Shimah") (so also Josh 13 19). In the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah it was a Moabite town, but there is no record of how or when it was taken from Israel. It appears to have been famous for the luxuriance of its vines and for its summer fruits (Isa 16 8 f; Jer 48 22). Onam calls it a city of Moab in the land of Gilead which fell to the tribe of Reuben. Jerome (Comm. in Isa 5) says it was about 500 paces from Heshbon, and he describes it as one of the strong places of that region. It may be represented by the modern Swatin, which stands on the south side of Wady Hesbon, about 2 miles from Hesbān. The ancient ruins are considerable, with large sarcophagi; and in the neighboring rock wine presses are cut (PEF, "Eastern Palat", 221 f).

SEBAT, se-ba't, se'bat (Zec 1 7). See SHEBAT.

SECAH, se-kā'ḥa, sek-a-ka (סְכַה, s'khāhāh; B, sêqâjâ, A, sêqâjâ, Sochochd): One of the 12 cities 'in the wilderness of Judah' (Josh 15 61), that is in the uncultivated lands to the W. of the Dead Sea, where a scanty pasturage is still obtained by wandering Bedouin tribes. There are many signs in this district of more settled habitation in ancient times, but the name Secah is lost. Conder proposed K. el Dikkeh (also called Kh. es Sikkeh), "the ruin of the path," some 2 miles S. of Bethany. Though an ancient site, it is too near the inhabited area; the name, too, is uncertain (PEF, III, 111, Sh XVII). E. W. G. Masterman

SECHENIAS, sek-ên'êas: (1) (A, סְכֵנִית, Sochenias; omitted in B and Swete): 1 Esd 8 29 = "Shecaniah" in Ezr 8 3; the arrangement in Ezr is different. (2) (A, Sochenias, but B and Swete, Ecceiasia, Ecciehiasia, Ecciehiasia): Name of a person who went up at the head of a family in the return with Ezra (1 Esd 8 32) = "Shecaniah" in Ezr 8 5.

SECHE, se'kê (סָכֶה, seehê). See SCHE.

SECOND COMING, sek'und kom'ing. See PAROUSIA; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, V.

SECOND DEATH. See DEATH; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, X, (6).

SECOND SABBATH. See SABBATH, Second.

SECONDARILY, sek'un-da-li: AV for sek'dere, deuteron (1 Cor 12 28). Probably without distinction from "secondly" (so RV, and so RV also for deuteron in 2 Cor 3 23). Still AV may have wished to emphasize that the prophets have a lower rank than the apostles.

SECRET, sek'ret: In Esd 7 22, RV has 'secret' for הֵסְדָה, 'hids,' 'treasure.' A correct tr ? 'secondly.' They shall have a name mar. cherished place' (Jerus), and there is no reference to the Holy of Holies. The other uses of "secret" in RV are obvious, but RV's corrections of AV in Jgs 13 18; 1 S 5 9; Job 16 11 should be noted.

SECT, sek't: (a) apópeic, hairiness): "Sect" (Lat secta, from sequi, "to follow") is in the NT the tr of hairises, from hairis, "to take," "to choose"; also tr "heresy," not heresy in the later ecclesiastical sense, but a school or party, a sect, without any bad meaning attached to it. The word is applied to schools of philosophy; to the Pharisees and Sadducees among the Jews who adhered to a common religious faith and worship; and to the Christians. It is tr "sect" (Acts 5 17, of the Sadducees; 15 5, of the Pharisees; 26 5, of the Pharisees; 28 22, of the Christians); also RV 24 14 (AV and ERVm "heresy"). "After the Way which they call a sect, so serve I the God of our fathers" (just as the Pharisees were "a sect"); it is tr "heresies" (1 Cor 13 19, "sects"); AV "factions," m "Gr heresies"; ERVm reverses the ARV text and margin; Gal 5 20, ARV "parties," m "heresies"; ERVm reverses text and margin; 2 Pet 2 1, "damnable heresies," RV "destructive heresies," m "sects of perdition"); the "sect" in itself might be harmless; it was the teaching or principles which should be followed by those sects that would make them "destructive." Hairis occurs in 1 Mace 8 30 ("They shall do it at their pleasure," i.e. "choice"); of LXX Lev 22 18.21. See HERESY.

SECU, sekk'ū (סֹכּוֹ, sêkkihā; B, iv ṭe Secel, en ṭo Sephel, iv ṭo Sephel, A, iv Socho, en Sochoh; AV Sechu): This name occurs only in the account of David's visit to Samuel (1 S 19 22). Saul, we are told, went to "Ramah and came to the great wood that is in Secu," where he inquired after Samuel and David. It evidently lay between the residence of Saul at Gibeah and Ramah. It is impossible to come to any sure conclusion regarding its identity. Conder suggested its identification with Khirbet Suwike, which lies to the S. of Bireh. This is possible, but perhaps we should read with LXX B, "He came to the cistern of the threshing-floor that is on the bare hill" (en ṭo Sephel). The threshing-floors in the East are naturally on high exposed ground where this is possible, and often form part of the area whence water in the rainy season is conducted to cisterns. This might have been a place actually within the city of Ramah.

SECUNDUS, sek'und-us (WH, Σεκούνδος, Se-koundos, TH, Σεκούνδος, Sekoundos): A Thessalonian who was among those who accompanied Paul from Greece to Asia (Acts 20 4). They had preceded Paul and waited for him at Troas. If he were one of the representatives of the churches in Macedonia and Greece, travelling with Paul to the western tributaries to Jerusalem (Acts 24 17; 2 Cor 8 3), he probably accompanied Paul as far as Jerusalem. The name is found in a list of palliarchins on a Thessalonian inscription.

SECURE, sek'ûr, SECURITY, sek'ûr-i: the word ἰάπα and its derivatives in Heb point to se-SEDECAS, sed-e-kas'as: AV = RV SEDEKIAS (q.v.).

SEDEKIAS, sed-e-khi-as: (1) (B A, Zedekias, Sedecias; AV Zedekias): 1 Esd 1 46 (44)=Zedekiah king of Judah; also in Bar 1 8 where AV reads "Sedecias." (2) In Bar 1 1 (AV "Sedecias"), an ancestor of Baruch, "the son of Asadius," sometimes (but incorretly) identified with the false prophet "Zedekiah the son of Massah" (Jer 29 21).

SEDITION, sed-i-shun: The tr in Ezr 4 15.19 for ἐσθάσειν, "esthaddar, "struggling," "revolt;" in 2 Esd 15 16 for inconstabilitio, "instability;" with "be seditious" for στάθηκα, "standing up," "revolt" (RV "insurrection") in Lk 23 19-20; Acts 24 5, with διστασθησθαι, "a standing asunder" (RV "division") in Gal 5 20. An "sedition" does not include open violence against a government, the word should not have been used in any of the above cases.

SEDUCE, sed-us', SEDUCER, sed-us'er (Hipil of γυναίκα, or γυναῖκα, γυναῖκα, "to err;" of γυναῖκα, παθητε, "to be simple"; παθητε, παθητε, παθητε, "a perjurer;" to lead astray, to "lead away"; "to cause to err," as from the paths of truth, duty or religion. It occurs in AV and RV Exe 13 10; 2 K 21 20; 1 Tim 4 1; Rev 2 20; in AV only, Prov 12 26 (RV "cause to err"); Isa 19 13 (RV "caused to go astray"); Mk 13 22; 1 Jn 2 26 (RV "lead astray"). The noun "seducer" (2 Tim 3 13 AV, γυναῖκα, γυναῖκα) is correctly changed in RV into "imposter." (2) It is not found in its specific sense of "to entice a female to surrender her chastity." Yet the crime itself is referred to and condemned.

Three cases are to be distinguished: (a) The seduction of an unbetrothed virgin: In this case the seducer according to JE (Ex 22 16) is to be compelled to take the virgin as his wife, if the father consents, and to pay the latter the usual purchase price, the amount of which is not defined. In the Deuteronomical Code (Dt 22 28) the amount is fixed at 50 shekels, and the seducer forfeits the right of divorce. (b) The seduction of a betrothed virgin: This case (Dt 22 23-27; not referred to in the other codes) is treated as virtually one of adultery, the virgin being regarded as pledged to her future husband as fully as if she were formally married to him; the penalty therefore is the same as adultery, viz. death for both parties (except in the case where the girl can reasonably be assumed to have consented, which case the man only is put to death). (c) The seduction of a betrothed bondmaid (mentioned only in Lev 19 20-22): Here there is no infliction of penalty, but the woman was not free and the seducer shall make a trespass offering, besides paying the fine. See Crimes; Penumishments.

SEE, sē: In addition to the ordinary sense of percieving by the eye, we have (1) γυναῖκα, ἔκτοθ, "to see" (in vision): "Words of Amos . . . . which he saw concerning Israel" (Am 1 1). The revelation was made to his inward eye. The word of Jeh . . . , which he saw (Micah 3 14) is concerning the king (Mic 1 1), describing what he saw in prophetic vision (cf Hab 1 1); see Revelation, III, 4; (2) ἰδον, ἰδον, "to take heed": "See thou say nothing" (Mk 1 44); (3) ἵδον, ἵδον, "to know," to note with the mind: "Jesus made it answeringly" (Mk 12 34); (4) θέαν, θεόθροι, "to view," "to have knowledge or experience of": "He shall never see death" (Jn 8 51). M. O. EVANS SEED, sēd (OT always for גַּנֵה, זְדֶא, Aram. [Dan 2 43] גַּנֵה, זְדֶא, except in Joel 1 17 for דְּרָעַד, חַרְבָּד [pl. RV "seeds," AV "seed"]; and Lev 19 19 [AV "mingled seed"] and Dt 22 9 [AV "divers seeds"]) for דְּרָעַד, חַרְבָּד, lit. "two kinds," RV "two kinds of seed." Inherantly in Gr Apoc and usually in the NT for σπέρμα, σπέρμα, but Mk 4 26-27; Lk 8 11; 2 Cor 9 10 for σπέρμα, σπέρμα, and 1 Pet 2 25 for σπέρμα, σπέρμα: (1) For "seed" in its literal sense (i.e. "what was sowed that he answered discreetly" (Mk 12 34); (2) [the word] 'seed,' except for the word 'seed' in the sense of a biological entity, it is the method of measuring land by means of the amount of seed that could be sown on it (Lk 17 26). The prohibition against using two kinds of seed in the same field (Lev 19 19; Dt 22 9) undoubtedly rests on the fact that the practice had some connection with Canaanitish worship, making the whole crop "consecrated" (taboo). Jer 31 27 uses "seed of man" and "seed of beast" as a figure for the means by which God will increase the prosperity of Israel (i.e. "seed yielding men"). (2) For the transferred physiological application of the word to human beings (Lev 15 16, etc) see CLEAN; UNCLEAN. The conception of Christians as "born" or "begotten" of God (see REGENERATION) gave rise to the figure in 1 Pet 1 23; 1 Jn 3 9. If the imagery is to be stressed, the Holy Spirit is meant. In 1 Jn 3 9 a doctrine of certain Gnostics is opposed. They taught that by learning certain formulas and by submitting to certain rituals God and salvation could be attained without holiness of life. St. John's reply is that union with a righteous God is meaningless without righteousness as an ideal, even though shortcomings exist in practice (1 Jn 1 8). The logical use of "seed" the transition to the sense of "offspring" was easy, and the word may mean "children" (Lev 18 21, etc) or even a single child (Gen 4 25; 4 8 11 RVm). Usually, however, it means the whole posterity (Gen 3 15, etc), of "seed royal" (2 K 11 1, etc), and "Abraham's seed" (2 Ch 20 7, etc) or the "holy seed" (Ezr 9 2; Isa 6 13; 1 Esd 8 70; cf Jer 21 21) as designations of Israel. So "to show one's seed" (Ezr 2 59; Neh 7 63) is to display one's genealogy, and "one's seed" may be simply one's union with Jehovah, conceived of as a single family (Est 10 3). From this general sense there developed a still looser use of "seed" as meaning simply "men" (Mal 2 15; Isa 1 4; 67 4; Wisd 10 15; 12 11, etc).

In Gal 3 16 St. Paul draws a distinction between "seeds" and "seed" that has for its purpose a proof that the promises to Abraham were realized in Christ and not in Israel. The distinction, however, overstates the language of the OT, which never uses "seed" as a designation of "many ancestors" (pl. only in 1 S 8 15; cf Rom 4 18; 9 7). But in an argument against rabbinical adversaries St. Paul was obliged to use rabbinical methods (cf Gal 4 25). For modern purposes it is probably best to treat such an exegetical method as belonging simply to the (now superseded) science of the times.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

SEER, sə'ér, sêr: The word in EV represents two Heb. words, יָשָׁר, yəšār, and יָשָׁר, yəšār (1 S 9:11,18,19; 2 S 15:27; 1 Ch 9:22, etc.), and יָשָׁר, yəšār, hōzēk (2 S 24:11; 2 K 17:13; 1 Ch 21:9; 25:5; 29:29, etc.). The former designation is from the ordinary vb. "to see;" the latter is connected with the vb. used of prophetic vision. It appears from 1 S 9:9 that 'seer' (yəšār) was the older name for those who, after regular prophetic orders, were called "prophets." It is not just, however, to speak of the "seers" or "prophets" of Samuel's time as on the level of mere fortune-tellers. What insight or vision they possessed is traced to God's Spirit. Samuel was the yəšār by preeminence, and the name is little used after his time. Individuals who bear the title "seer" (hōzēk) are mentioned in connection with the kings and as historiographers (2 S 24:11; 1 Ch 21:9; 25:5; 29:29; 2 Ch 9:29; 12:15; 19:2, etc.), and distinction is sometimes made between "prophets" and "seers" (2 K 17:13; 1 Ch 29:29, etc.). Hävernick thinks that "seer" denotes one who does not belong to the regular prophetic order (Intro to OT, 50 ff., ET), but it is not easy to fix a precise distinction. See Prophecy, PROPHECY.

JAMES ORS

SEETHE, sēth: Old Eng. for "boil;" past tense, "sod" (Gen 25:29), past participle, "sodden" (Lam 4:10). See Ex 23:19 AV.

SEGUB, sə'gūb, səgūbb [K'tîb], sə'gūb, səgūbb [K'tîb]; B, Zegovō, Zegobā, A, Zegovō; Segobā:

(1) The youngest son of Heiel, the builder of Jericho (1 K 16:34). The death of Segub is probably connected with the primitive custom of laying foundations with blood, as, indeed, skulls were found built in with the brickwork when the tower of Bel at Nippur was excavated. See Gezza. If the death of the two sons was based on the custom just mentioned, the circumstance was deliberately obscured in the present account. The death of Segub may have had the death of Heiel's oldest and youngest sons with a curse said to have been pronounced by Joshua to the land that should venture to rebuild Jericho (Josh 6:26).

(2) Son of Hezron and father of Jair (1 Ch 2:21).

SEIR, sə'îr:

(1) (םֵיֵר, sə'îr), har sə'îr, "Mt. Seir" [Gen 14:6, etc.]. יֶשׁ "ר, 'eres sə'îr [Gen 29:3, etc.]; 7 בֵּי סֵיֵר, bēh se'îr; 7 בֵּי סֵיֵר, bēh se'îr]: In Gen 32:3 "the land of Seir" is equated with "the field of Edom." The Mount and the Land of Seir are alternative appellations of the mountainous tract which runs along the eastern side of the Arabah, occupied by the descendants of Horites, who succeeded the ancient Horites (Gen 14:6; 36:20), "came-dwellers" or "in possession. For a description of the land see Edom.

(2) יֵשׁ "ר, yəshēr; B, Assārā, Assārā, A, Sgeṭēr, Sēdēër]: A landmark on the boundary of Judah (Josh 15:10), not far from Kiriath-jearim and Chesalon. The name means "shaggy," and probably indicates a wooded height. It may be that part of the range which runs N.E. from Sārās by Kārēd-el-'Anab and Bēyda to the plateau of el-Ib. Traces of an ancient forest are still to be seen here.

SEIRATH, sə'îr-ôth, sə'î-ôth: [םֵיֵר, sə'îr], ho's-sə'î-rôth; B, Segobodā, Sefi'robā, Sefi'robā, A, Segobodā, Segobodā: AV Seirath; the place to which Ehud escaped after his assassination of Eglon, king of Moab (Jgs 3:20).

The name is from the same root as the Hebrew words for "wood," and probably applied to some shaggy forest. The quarries by which he passed are said to have been by Gilgal (ver 19), but there is nothing to guide us to an identification. Onom gives the name, but no indication of the site.

SEIRATH, sə'î-rath, sə'î-rath. See Seirah.

SELA, sə'î-lə, sə'î-lə, ho's-sə'î-lə [with the art.]: 'sela, petra, ĕh 'sela, hă petra; AV Selah (2 K 14:7). EV renders this name of a valley in 2 K 14:7; Isa 16:1. In Jgs 1:36; 2 Ch 25:12; and Ob ver 3, it translates lit. "rock;" but RVm in each case "Selah." It is impossible to assume with Hull (HDB, s.v.) that this name, when it appears in Scripture, always refers to the capital of Edom, the great city in Wady Māsā. In Jgs 1:36 its association with the Ascent of Arakabbin shuts us up to a position toward the southwestern end of the Dead Sea. Probably in that case it does not denote a city, but some prominent crag. Moore ("Judges," ICC, 50), writing of Buḥ, noting the south-es-Sē‘lāth, "a bare and dazzlingly white sandstone promontory 1,000 ft. high, E. of the mud flats of es-Sebkah, and 2 miles S. of the Dead Sea." A more probable identification is a high cliff which commands the road leading from Buḥ to the Dead Sea, "valley of Salt," to Edom, over the pass of Akabrim. This was a position of strategic importance, and if fortified would be of great strength. (In this passage "Edomites" must be read for "Amorites"). The victory of Ahab was won in the Valley of Salt. He would naturally turn his arms at once against this stronghold (2 K 14:7); and it may well be the rock from the top of which he hurled his prisoners (2 Ch 25:12). He called it Jokneam, a name the meaning of which is obscure. Possibly it is the same as Jekuthiel (1 Ch 4:18), and may mean "preservation of God" (OHL, s.v.). No trace of this name has been found. The narratives in which the place is mentioned put identification with Petra out of the question.

"The rock" (RVm "Sela") in Ob ver 3, in the phrase "thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock," is only a vivid and picturesque description of Edom. The purple mountains into which wild eden clambered run out from Syria upon the desert, some hundred miles wide, twenty, on the E. They are said to be the finest rock scenery in the world. "Salvator Rosa never conceived so savage and so suitable a haunt for the handiwork of God." The cliffs are overhanging by defiles so narrow that two horsemen may scarcely ride abreast, and the sun is shut out by the overhanging rocks. . . . Little else than wild fowls' nests are the villages: human erryls perched on high shelves of hidden away in caves at the ends of the deep gorges" (C. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, II, 178 f.).

In Isa 16:1; 42:11 RV, perhaps we have a reference to the great city of Petra. Jos (Ant, IV, vii, 1) tells us that among the kings of the Medes who fell before Moses was one Reken, king of Rekem (akre, or rekeme), the city deriving its name from its founder. This he says was the Arab, name; the Greeks called it Petra. Onom says Petra is a city of Arabia in the land of Edom. It is called Jechthoel; but the Syrians call it Rekem. Jokneam, as we have seen, must be sought elsewhere. There can be no doubt that Jos intended the city in Wady Māsā. Its OT name was Bozrah (Am 1:12, etc.). Wetstein (Ecclesiast in Delitzsch's Int., 696 f) hazards the conjecture that the ancient name was Bozrah has-Seira, "Bozrah of the Rock.

This "rose-red city half as old as Time" was for long difficult of access, and the attempt to visit it was fraught with danger. In recent years, however, it has been seen by many tourists and exploring parties. Of the descriptions written the best is undoubtedly that of Professor Dalman of Jerus (Petra und seine Felsfriedgärten, Leipzig, 1908). An excellent account of this wonderful city, brightly and interestingly written, will be found in Lithby and Hoskins' book (The Jordan Valley and Petra, New York and London, 1905; see also National Geographic Magazine, May, 1907, Washington, D.C.). The ruins lie along the sides of a spacious hollow surrounded by the many-hued cliffs of Edom, just before they sink into the Arabah on the W. It is near the base of Jebel Harân, about 50 miles from the Dead Sea, and just N. of the watershed between that sea and the Gulf of Akaba. The valley owes its modern name, Wâdy Mâa, "Valley of Moses," to its connection with Moses in Mohammedan legends. While not wholly inaccessible from other directions, the two usual approaches are that from the S.W. by a rough path, partly artificial, and that from the E. The latter is by far the more important. The valley closes to the E., the only opening being through a deep and narrow defile, called the Sîk, "shaft," about a mile in length. In the bottom of the Sîk flows westward the stream that rises at A'in Mâa. E. of the cleft is the village of El'î, an ancient site, corresponding to Gaia of Onom. Passing this village, the road threads its way along the shadowy winding gorge, overhung by lofty cliffs. When the valley is reached, a sight of extraordinary beauty and impressiveness opens to the beholder. The temples, the tombs, the theater, etc, hewn with great skill and infinite pains from the living rock, have defied to an astonishing degree the tooth of time, many of the carvings being as fresh as if they had been cut yesterday. An idea of the scale on which the work was done may be gathered from the size of the theater, which furnished accommodation for no fewer than 3,000 spectators.

Such a position could not have been overlooked in ancient times; and we are safe to assume that a city of importance must always have existed here. It is under the Nabataeans, however, that Petra begins to play a prominent part in history. This people took possession about the end of the 4th cent. B.C., and continued their sway until overcome by Hadrian, who gave his own name to the city—Hadrians. This name, however, soon disappeared. Under the Romans Petra saw the days of her greatest splendor.

According to old tradition St. Paul visited Petra when he went into Arabia (Gal 1 17). Of this there is no certainty; but Christianity was early introduced, and the city became the seat of a bishopric. Under the Nabataeans she was the center of the great caravan trade of that time. The merchandise of the East was brought hither; and hence set out the caravans for the South, the West, and the North. The great highway across the desert to the Pers Gulf was practically in her hands. The fall of the Nabataean power gave Palmyra her chance; and her supremacy in the commerce of Northern Arabia dates from that time. Petra shared in the declining fortunes of Rome; and her death blow was dealt by the conquering Moslems, who desolated Arabia Petraea in 629-32 A.D. The place now furnishes a retreat for a few poor Bedawy families.

SELÂ, sê-lâ. See Music, II, 1.

SELED, sê-led (םלד, seledh): A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 30 bis).

SELEMA, sele-mâ'â: One of the swift scribes whose services Ezra was commanded to secure (2 Esd 14 24). The name is probably identical with Selémias of 1 Esd 9 34 (q.v.).

SELEMIA, sel-e-mí-a: One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 34) = "Selémiash" in Ezra 10 39, and probably identical with "Selémia" in 2 Esd 14 24.

SELEUCIA, sele-'u-kî-a (Seleucia, Seleukia): The seaport of Antioch from which it is 16 miles distant. It is situated 5 miles N. of the mouth of the Orontes, in the northeastern corner of a fruitful plain at the base of Mt. Rhoous or Pleria, the modern Jebel Músâ, a spur of the Amanus Range. Built by Seleucus Nicator (d. 280 B.C.) it was one of the Syrian Tetrapolis, the others being Apamea, Laodicea and Antioch. The city was protected by nature on the mountain side, and, being strongly fortified on the S. and W., was considered invulnerable and the key to Syria (Strabo 751; Polyb. v.55). It was taken, however, by Ptolemy Euergetes (1 Mac 11:8) and remained in his family till 219 BC, when it was recovered for the Seleucids by Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who then rebuilt and adorned it. Captured again by Ptolemy Philometor in 146 BC, it remained for a short time in the hands of the Egyptians. Pompey made it a free city in 64 BC in return for its energy in resisting Tigranes (Pliny, N. H. v.15), and it was then greatly improved by the Romans, so that in the 1st cent. AD it was in a most flourishing condition.

On their first missionary journey Paul and Barnabas passed through it (Acts 13:4; 14:26), and though it is not named in Acts 15:30–36, this route is again implied; while it is excluded in Acts 15:3.

The ruins are very extensive and cover the whole space within the line of the old walls, which shows a circuit of four miles. The position of the Old Town, on whose site the City and its suburbs may still be identified, as also that of the Antioch Gate, the Market Gate and the King’s Gate, which last leads to the Upper City. There are rock-cut tombs, broken statuary and sarcophagi at the base of the Upper City, a position which probably represents the burial place of the Seleucids. The outline of a circus or amphitheater can also be traced, while the inner harbor is in perfect condition and full of water. It is 2,000 ft. long by 1,200 ft. broad, and covers 47 acres, being oval or pear-shaped. The passage seaward, now silted up, was protected by two strong piers or mole, which are locally named after Barnabas and Paul. The most remarkable of the remains, however, is the great water canal running behind the city, which the emperor Constantius cut through the solid rock in 338 AD. It is 3,074 ft. long, has an average breadth of 20 ft., and is in some places 120 ft. deep. Two portions of 102 and 293 ft. in length are tunneled. The object of the work was clearly to carry the mountain torrent direct to the sea, and so protect the city from the risk of flood during the wet season.

Church synods occasionally met in Seleucia in the early centuries, but it gradually sank into decay, and long before the advent of Islam it had lost all its significance. W. M. Christie SELECTUDES, se-lo’si’dé. See Seleucus.

SELEUCUS, se-lo’kus (Σαλακος, Šéleukos): (1) Seleucus I (Nicator, "The Conqueror"), the founder of the Seleucidæ or House of Seleucus, was an officer in the grand and thoroughly equipped army, which was perhaps the most important part of the inheritance that came to Alexander the Great from his father, Philip of Macedon. He took part in Alexander’s Asiatic conquests, and on the division of these on Alexander’s death he obtained the satrapy of Babylonia. By later conquests and under the name of king, which he assumed in the year 310 BC, he became ruler of Syria and the greater part of Asia Minor. His rule extended from 312 to 280 BC, the year of his death; at least the Seleucid era which seems to be referred to in 1 Mac 1:6 is reckoned from Seleucus I, 312 BC to 65 BC, when Pompey reduced the kingdom of Syria to a Roman province. He followed generally the policy of Alexander in spreading Greek civilization. He founded Antioch and its port Seleucia, and is said by Jos (Ant. XII, iii, 1) to have conferred civic privileges on the Jews. The reference in Dnl 11:5 usually referred to be to this ruler.

(2) Seleucus II (Callinicus, "The Gloriously Triumphant"), who reigned from 246 to 226 BC, was the son of Antiochus Soter and is "the king of the north" in Dnl 11:7–9, who was expelled from his kingdom by Ptolemy Euergetes.

(3) Seleucus III (Ceranus, "Thunderbolt"), son of Seleucus II, was assassinated in a campaign which he undertook into Asia Minor. He had a short reign of rather more than 2 years (220–223 BC) and is referred to in Dnl 11:5–6.

(4) Seleucus IV (Philopator, "Fond of his Father") was the son and successor of Antiochus the Great and reigned from 187 to 175 BC. He is called "King of Asia" (2 Mac 3:3), a title claimed by the Seleucidae even after their serious losses in Asia Minor (see 1 Mac 8:6; 11:13; 12:29; 13:32). He was present at the decisive battle of Magnesia (190 BC). He was murdered by Heliodorus (q.v.), one of his own courtiers whom he had sent to plunder the Temple (2 Mac 3:1–40; Dnl 11:20).

For the connection of the above-named Seleucidae with the "ten horns" of Dnl 7:24, the commentators must be consulted.

Seleucus V (125–124 BC) and Seleucus VI (95–93 BC) have no connection with the sacred narrative.

SELF-CONTROL, self-kon-trôl (ὑγράπτεια, egkôría): Rendered in AV "temperance" (cf Lat temperatio and continentia), but more accurately "self-control," as in RV (Acts 14:25; Gal 5:23; 2 Pet 1:6); adj. of same, ἐγκράτεια, egkrateia, "self-controlled" (Tit 1:8 RV); cf vb. forms in 1 Cor 7:9, "have . . . continency"; 9:25, the athlete "exerciseth self-control." Self-control is therefore repeatedly set forth in the NT as among the important Christian virtues.

SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS, self-r’chus-nes: A term that has come to designate moral living as a way of salvation; or as a ground for neglecting the redemptive work of Jesus Christ. The thought is present in the teaching of Jesus, who spoke one parable particularly to such as reckoned themselves to be righteous (Lk 18:9 ff.). The Pharisees quite generally resented the idea of Jesus that all men needed repentance and that they regarded themselves as righteous and looked with contempt on "sinners." Paul in all his writings, esp. Rom 3; Gal 3; Eph 2; Phil 3, contrasts the righteousness that is God’s gift to men of faith in Jesus Christ with righteousness of the law and "in the flesh." By this latter he means formal conformity to legal requirements in the strength of unregenerate human nature. He is careful to maintain (cf Rom 7) that the Law is never really kept by one’s own power. On the other hand, in full agreement with Jesus, Paul looks to genuine righteousness in living as the demand and achievement of salvation based on faith. God’s gift here consists in the capacity progressively to realize righteousness in life (cf Rom 8:19). See also sanctification. William Owen Canver SELF-SURRENDER, self-su-ren’der: The struggle between the natural human impulses of self-seeking, self-defence and the like, on the one hand, and the more altruistic impulse toward self-denial, self-surrender, on the other, is as old as the race. All religions imply some conception of surrender of self to deity, ranging in ethical quality from a heathen fanaticism which impels to complete physical exhaustion or rapture, superinduced by more or less mechanical means, to the high spiritual quality of self-sacrifice to the divinest aims and achievements. The Scriptures represent self-surrender as among the noblest of human virtues.

1. In the OT.—In the OT self-surrender is taught in the early account of the first pair. Each was to be given to the other (Gen 2 24; 3 16b) and it was both under God's command. Abraham's offerings (Gen 22 1-19) were characteristic of self-surrender. Abraham left home and native country to go to a land unknown to him, because God called him to do so (12 1). He would give up all his cherished hopes in his only son Isaac, at the voice of God (22 1-18). Moses, at the call of Jeh, surrendered self, and undertakes to deliver his people, but not on his own account (Ex 3 11, 14; cf He 11 25). He would be utterly cast out of God's book, if only the people might be spared destruction (Ex 32 32).

The whole Levitical system of sacrifice may be said to imply the doctrine of self-surrender. The nation itself was a people set apart to Jeh, a holy people, a surrendered Levitical nation (Ex 19 5-6; 22 31; Lev 20 7; Dt 7 6; 14 2). The whole burnt offering implied the complete surrender of the worshipper to God (Lev 1). The ceremony for the consecration of priests emphasized the same fundamental doctrine (Lev 8); so also the law as to the surrender of the firstborn child (Ex 13 13 ff; 29 63).

In the Divine call to the prophets and in their life-work self-surrender is prominent. The seer, as such, must be receptive to the Divine impress, and as mouthpiece of God, his mouth speaks not his own words, but God's: "Thus saith the Lord." He was to be a "man of God," a "man of the spirit." The hand of the Lord was upon me (Ezk 1 3; 3 14) implies complete Divine mastery. Isaiah must submit to the Divine purification of his lips, and hearken to the inquiry, "Who will go for us?" with the surrendered response, "Here am I; send me" (Isa 6 8). Jeremiah must yield his protestations of weakness and inability to the Divine wisdom and the promise of endowment from above (Jer 1 1-10). Ezekiel surrendered to the dangerous and difficult task of becoming messenger to a rebellious house (Ezk 1 3-3). Jonah, after flight from duty, at last surrenders to the Divine will and goes to the Ninevites (Jon 3).

On the return of the faithful remnant from captivity, self-giving for the sake of Israel's faith was dominant, the people enduring great hardships for the future of the nation and the accomplishment of Jeh's purposes. This is the spirit of the great Messianic passage, Isa 53 7: "He was oppressed, yet when he was afflicted he opened not his mouth; as a lamb that before its sheurers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." Nehemiah surrendered position in Shushan to help reestablish the returned exiles in Jerus (Neh 2 5). Esther was ready to surrender her life in pleading for the welfare of her people (Est 4 16).

1. Christ's Teaching and Example.—As presented in the Gospels, give to it special emphasis. It is a prime requisite for becoming His disciple (Mt 10 38 f; 16 21; Lk 9 23 24; 50 f; 14 27 33; cf Mt 19 27; Mk 8 34). When certain of the disciples were called they left all and followed (Mt 4 20; 9 9; Mt 20 20; Lk 9 26; 15 27). His followers must so completely surrender self, as that father, mother, brother, self-kindred, and one's own life must be, as it were, hatred for His sake (Lk 14 26). The rich young ruler must renounce self as an end and give his own life to the service of men (Mt 19 21; Mk 10 21; cf Lk 12 33). But this surrender of self was never a loss of personality; it was the finding of the true self-hood (Mt 8 35; Mt 10 39). Our Lord not only taught self-surrender, but practised it. As a child, He subjected Himself to His parents (Lk 2 51).

The early disciples practised the virtue of self-surrender. Counting none of their possessions their own, they gave to the good of all (Acts 2 44 45; 4 34 35 37). Stephen and Apollos others throw themselves in their witnessing with the perfect abandon of the martyr; and Stephen's successor, Paul, counted not his life dear unto himself that he might finish the Divinely appointed course (20 22 24).

The Epps are permeated with the doctrine of self-surrender. The Pauline Epp, are particularly full of it. The Christian life is conceived of as a dying self and to the service of Paul world—a dying with Christ, a crucifixion of the old man, that a new man may live (Gal 2 20; 6 14; Col 2 20; 3 3; Rom 6 6), so that no longer the man lives but Christ lives in him (Gal 2 20; Phil 1 21). The Christian is no longer his own but Christ's (1 Cor 6 19 20). He is to be a living sacrifice (Rom 12 1); to die daily (1 Cor 15 31). As a corollary to surrender to God, the Christian must surrender himself to the welfare of his neighbor, just as Christ pleased not Himself (Rom 15 5); also to leaders (1 Cor 15 16), and to earthly rulers (Rom 13 1).

In the Epp. of Peter self-surrender is taught more than once. Those who were once like sheep astray now submit to the guidance of the Shepherd of souls (1 Pet 2 25). Peter is the Christian is saved not by his own wisdom but under the mighty hand of God (5 6); the younger to be subject to the elder (5 5); and all to civil ordinances for the Lord's sake (2 13).

Self-will, self-will (παραστασίς, ἀναθεματισμὸς, ἀπολύτρωσις): Found once in the OT (Gen 49 6, "In their will they have hocked an ox") in the death song of Jacob (see Hock). The idea is found twice in the NT in the sense of "pleasing oneself": "not self-willed, not soon angry" (Tit 1 7); and "daring, self-willed", they tremble not to rota around dignitaries (2 Pet 2 10). In all these texts it stands for a false pride, for obstinacy, for "a pertinacious adherence to one's will or wish, esp. in opposition to the dictates of wisdom or propriety or the wishes of others."—Henry E. Dusker

The words “Semite,” “Semitic,” do not occur in the Bible, but are derived from the name of Noah’s oldest son, Shem (Gen 5 22; 6 10).

1. Biblical
   9 15 23 ff; 10 1 21 ff; 11 10 ff; 1 Ch References 1). Formerly the designation was limited to those who are mentioned in Gen 10, 11 as Shem’s descendants, most of whom can be traced historically and geographically; but more recently the title has been expanded to apply to others who are not specified in the Bible as Semites, and indeed are plainly called Hamitic, e.g. the Babylonians (Gen 10 10) and the Phoenicians and Canaanites (vs 15-19). The grounds for the inclusion of these Bib. Hamites among the Semites are chiefly linguistic, although political, commercial and religious affinities are also considered. History and the study of comparative philology, however, suggest the inadequacy of a linguistic argument.

The sons of Shem are given as Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, Lud and Aram (Gen 10 22). All except the third have been readily identified, Elam as the historic nation in the highlands E. of the Tigris, between Media and Persia; Asshur as the Assyrians; Lud as the Lydians of Asia Minor; and Aram as the Syrians both E. and W. of the Euphrates. The greatest uncertainty is in the identification of Arphaxad, the most linguistic ancestor of the Semitic tongue, of those of Bib, and more recent importance.

2. Five Sons

From him descended the Hebrews and of Shem the Arab tribes, probably also some East African colonies (Gen 10 24-30; 11 12-26). The form of his name (Ἀρφάχθαδ, Arphaxad) has given endless trouble to ethnographers. Most critics divide the two sons, Arpach or Arpeth, unidentified, and kessed, the sing. of kasdim, i.e. the Chaldeans; Schrader also holds to the Chaldaean interpretation, and the Chaldeans themselves traced their descent from Arphaxad (Jos, Ant I, vi, 4); it has been suggested also to interpret as the “border of the Chaldeans” (BDB; Dillmann, in loc.). But the historic, ordinary and most satisfactory identification is with Arrapachaitis, N.E. of Assyria at the headwaters of the Upper Zab in the Armenian highlands (so Ptolemy, classical geographers, Gesenius, Delitzsch). Delitzsch calls attention to the Armenian termination shahd (Comm. on Gen, in loc.).

If we accept, then, this identification of Arphaxad as the most northeasterly of the five Sem tribes (Gen 10 22), we are still faced by the problem of the primitive racial and cultural roots of the Semites.

3. Original Home of the Semites

Various theories of course have been proposed; fancy and surmise have ranged from Africa to Central Asia. (1) The most common, almost generally accepted, theory places their beginnings in Arabia because of the conserva- and primitive Semitic of the Arabic language, the desert characteristics of the various branches of the race, and the historic movements of Sem tribes northward and westward from Arabia. But this theory does not account for some of the most significant facts: e.g. that the Sem developments of Arabia are the last, not the first, in time, as must have been the case if Arabia was the cradle of the race. This theory does not explain the Sem origin of the Elamites, except by denial; much less does it account for the location of Arphaxad still farther north. It is not difficult to understand a racial movement from the moun- tains of the N.E. into the lowlands of the South and West. But the primitive Arabs could have migrated uphill, as it were, to settle in the Median and Armenian hills is a much more difficult proposition.

(2) We must return to the historic and the more natural location of the ancient Sem home on the hillsides and in the interior of Asia Minor. The majority of the eldest branch migrated in prehistoric times south- ward to become historic Elam; Lud moved west- ward into Asia Minor. Asshur found his way down the Tigris to become the sturdy pastoral people of the middle Mesopotamian plain; Aram poured into the highlands of the Bab colonists and civilization; Aram found a home in Upper Mesopotamia; while Arphaxad, remaining longer in the original home, gave his name to at least a part of it. There in the fertile valleys along the high hills the ancient Semites developed their distinctive tribal life, emphasizing the beauty and close relationship of Nature, the sacredness of the family, the moral obligation, and faith in a personal God of whom they thought as a member of the tribe or friend of the family. The confinement of the mountain valleys is just as adequate an explanation of the Sem traits as the isolation of the oasis. So from the purer life of their highland home, where had been developed the dis- tinctive and virile elements which were to impress the Sem face to the world at any time, increasing multitudes of Semites poured over the mountain barriers into the broader levels of the plains. As their own mountain springs and torrents sought a way to the sea down the Tigris and Euphrates beds, so the Sem tribes followed in turn their fertile valleys of early Babylonia, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Arabia, Pal. Thus who settled Arabia sent further migrations into Africa, as well as rehoming into the desert west of the Euphrates, Syria and Pal. Thus Western Asia became the arena of Sem life, whose influences also reached Egypt. Although Phoenicia, the far-western Mediterranean.

While we properly may call Western and Southwestern Asia the home of the Sem peoples, there still remains the difficulty of separating the language of the Sem occupants of the Levant from those of the Hamites who went earlier toward the South and as their younger relatives, the Aravans, were to go northward and westward—with marked racial traits and a pronounced religious development, to play a leading part in the life of man.

The phrase Sem Language is used of a group of languages which have marked features in common, which also set them off from other languages. We must avoid the customary inference that nations using the same or similar languages are necessarily of common stock. There are other explanations of linguistic affinity than racial, as the Indians of Mexico may speak Spanish and Sem have developed a language such as the Semitic languages of the modern Hebrew, or Arabic, or the Assyr-

4. Confusion with Other Babylarians, e.g., were Sem; yet they dispossessed an earlier non-Sem people, and were themselves frequently invaded by other races, such as the Hittites, and even the Egyptians. It is not certain therefore which gods, customs, laws, etc., of the Babylarians were Sem, and not adopted from other Sem races which they superseded.

Assyria was racially purely Sem, but her laws, customs, literature, and religion of the Sem peoples were acquired from Babylonia; to such an extent was this true that we are indebted to the Sem people for much that we know of Bab Sem religion, literature and history. In Syria also the same mixed conditions prevailed, for throughout the whole area of the Euphrates lay the highway of the nations, and Hittite and Mitannian at times shared the land with her, and left their influence. Possibly in Arabia Sem blood ran purest, but even in Arabia there were tribes from other races; and the table of the nations in Genesis divides that land among the descendants of both Ham and Sem (see Table of Nations). In Palestine, in the borderland of the Semic historic period, we find an intermingling and confusion of races and religions such as no other Sem center presented. A Hamitic people gave one of its common Sem names to the country—Canaan, while the pagan and late-coming Philistines left the country and the Canaanites. The archaic remains of Horite, Avite and Hivite are being uncovered by exploration; these races survived in places, go doubt, long after the Sem invasion, contributing their quota to the customs and religious practices of the land. The Hittite also was in the land, holding outposts from his northern empire, even in the extreme south of Pal. If the blue eyes and fair complexion of the Americans pictured on Egyptian monuments are true representations, we may believe that the gigantic Aryans of the North had their portion also in Pal.

It is customary now in Bib. etymology to disregard the classification of Gen 10, and to group together the Canaanite and the Semitic languages. Along with the Hebrew, McCurdy postulates the Canaanite and the Phoenician 5. Reliability of Gen 10 in the Standard BD treats the various origin of the Semitic races and religious customs of Pal as though they were all Sem, although uniformly these are represented in the OT as persecutions and enormities of alien races which the Hebrews were commanded to exterminate. The adoption of this would be, and was, inimical to their own ancestral faith. Because the language of the Canaanite, appropriated his art and empowers, did traffic in his ships, and in Ahab's reign adopted his Baal and Anat, we were not warranted at all in rushing to the conclusion that the language of the Phoenicians represented a primitive Sem type. Racial identification by linguistic argument is always precarious, as history clearly shows. One might as well say that Latin and the gospel were Saxon. There are indications that the pagan and even the later language of the Hebrews were different from those of the people whom they subdued and dispossessed. Such is the consistent tradition of their race, the Bible always emphasizing the irreconcilable difference between the Sem and the Sem and the practice of the people of Canaan. We may conclude that the reasons for disregarding the classification of Gen with reference to the Semites and neighboring races are not final. Out from that fruitful womb of nations, the Cau-

6. Semitic Languages

The Semitic languages are a group of languages which have marked features in common, which also set them off from other languages. We must avoid the customary inference that nations using the same or similar languages are necessarily of common stock. There are other explanations of linguistic affinity than racial, as the Indians of Mexico may speak Spanish and Sem have developed a language such as the Semitic languages of the modern Hebrew, or Arabic, or the Assyr-

7. Semitic Religion

In the study of Sem Religion there are two tendencies toward error: (1) The Western pragmatical and unreflecting view of Oriental Nature-symbols and vividly imaginative speech. Because the Semite used the figure of the rock (De 32:18,30) in describing God, or poetically conceived of the storm and its effect as the beam and the flash of lightning, he must not be led into believing that his religion was a savage animism, or that Jeh of Israel was only the Zeus of the Greeks. How should an imaginative child of Nature speak of the unseen Spiritual Power, except in the richest analogies of Nature? (2) The second error is the tendency to treat the acceptions acquired by contact with other nations as of the essence of Sem religion, e.g. the golden calf following the Egyptian bondage, and the sexual abominations of the Canaanites, brought to the lose.

The primitive and distinctive beliefs of the Sem peoples lie still in great uncertainty because of the long association with other peoples, whose practices they readily took over, and because of the lack of records of the primitive periods of Sem development, their origin and dispersion among the nations being prehistorical. Our sources of information are the Bab and Assyry tablets and monuments, the Egyptian inscriptions, Phoen history, Arabian traditions and inscriptions, etc., pertaining to the Semites. We can never know perhaps how much the Semites of Babylonia and Assyrians were diverted and corrupted by the developed civilization which they invaded and appropriated; Egypt was only indirectly affected by Sem life; Sem development in Arabia was the latest in each group, upon which the monuments and ruins of Arabian antiquity which have come down to us are comparatively few; and the Phoen development was corrupted by the intrusions of the ancient Canaanitish cults, while the Bible of the Hebrews probably differed a good deal from the unw hose religions of Pal their own faith, which was ancestral, revealed and pure. Was that Bible faith the primitive Sem cult? At least we must take the Heb tradition at its face value, for important features of an ancient belief, preserved through one branch of the Sem group. We are met frequently in these Heb records by the claim that the religion they present is not a new development, nor a thing apart from the origin of their race, but rather the preservation of an ancient worship, Abraham, Moses, and the prophets appearing not as originators, but reformers, or revivers, who sought to keep their people true to an inherited religion. Its elemental features are the following:

(1) _It was pronouncedly theistic_; not that other religions do not affirm a god; but the theism of the Semites was such as to give their religion a unique place among all others. To say the least, it had the germ of or the tendency toward monothelism, if we are to believe evidence to reform its name monotheism, and to rate the later polytheistic representations of Babylonia and Assyria as local perversions. If the old view that Sem religion was essentially monothelitic be incapable of proof, it is true that the development of the concept of God must ultimately arrive at monotheism. This came to verification in Abram the Hebrew, Jesus the Messiah (Jo 4 21-24) and Mohammed the false prophet. A city-state exclusively, a nation pre-dominantly, worshipped one god, often through some nature-symbol, as sun or star or element. With the coming of world-conquest, intercourse and vision, the one god of the city or the chief god of the nation became universalized. The ignorant and materialistic Hebrew might localize the god of Israel in a city or on a hilltop; but to the spiritual mind of Amos or in the universal vision of Isaiah He was Jeh, Lord of all the earth.

(2) Closely related to this high conception of Deity was the apparently contradictory but really potent idea of the Deity as a personality. The Semite did not grossly materialize his god as did the savage, nor thinly abstract and etherealize him and so eliminate him from the experience of man as did the Grecian; but to him the universal was also the personal and intimate. The Hebrew ran the risk of conditioning the spirituality of God in order to maintain his real personality. Possibly this has been the most potent element in Sem religion; God was not far from every one of them. He came into the closest relations as father or friend. He was the companion of king and priest. The affairs of the nation were under His immediate care; He went to war with armies, was a partner in harvest rejoicing, the home-rite. This conception of Deity carried with it the necessary implication of revelation (Am 3 8). The office, message and power of the Heb prophet were also the logical consequence of knowing God as a Person.

(3) _Its peculiar view of Nature_ was another feature of Sem religion. God was everywhere and always present in Nature; consequently its symbolism was the natural and ready expression of His nature and presence. Simile, parable and Nature-marvels cover the pages and tablets of their records. Unfortunately this poetic conception of Nature's quaternity was encroached upon by a ready path in which wayward feet and carnal minds might wander toward Nature-worship with all of its formalism and its degrading excesses. This feature of Sem religion offers an interesting commentary on its religious philosophy. With them the doctrine of Second Causes received no emphasis; God worked directly in Nature, which became to them therefore the continuous arena of signs and marvels. The thunder was His voice, the sunshine the light of His countenance, the winds were His messengers. And so through this imaginative view of the world the Semite dwelt in an enchanted realm of the miraculous.

(4) The Semite believed in a _God who is a moral being_. Such a faith in the nature of it was certain to influence profoundly their own moral development, making for them a racial character which has been distinctive and persistent through the changes of millennia. By it also they have impressed other nations and religions, with which they have had contact. The CH is an expression of the moral issues of theirism. The Law and the Prophets of Israel arose out of the conviction of God's righteousness and of the moral order of His universe (Ex 19 5-6; Jsa 6 1-8; De 7 6-25).

While these elements are not absent altogether from other ancient religions, they are pronouncedly characteristic of the Sem to the extent that we have given to it its permanency of development, and its primacy among the religions of the human race. To know God, to hear His eternal voice, to clothe Him with light as with a garment, to establish His throne in righteousness, to perceive in the holiness of His universe the all-pervading atmosphere of His presence—such convictions were bound to affect the life and progress of a race, and to concentrate them as a nation of priests for all mankind.

_Literature—_For discussion of the details of Sem peoples and religions reference should be made to particular articles, such as _Abraham_, _Abraham_, _Moses_, _Pharaoh_, _Sanad_, _Sennacherib_, _Semites_, _Sennacherib_, _Sanad_, _Sennacherib_, _Sennacherib_, _Sennacherib_, _Sennacherib_, _Sennacherib_, _Sennacherib_, _Sennacherib_. The children of Sem are mentioned by a few old and part of the company returning from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 35; Neh 7 38). The numbers vary as given by Ezr (3,630) and Neh (3,930), while 1 Esd 5 23 puts them at 3,330. In the last place the name is Sanah, A V and _Aram._ The name Sanad, A V, _Aram._ In Neh 3 3 the name occurs with the def. art., ha-sanah. The people may be identical with the Benjamite clan Hassehna (1 Ch 9 7). Onom speaks of Magdal-senta, a village about 7 miles N. of Jericho, which may be the place intended, but the name is not known. W. EWING

_SENATE_ sem'at, _Senator_, sem'at-tar: in 1 Po 105 22, "teach his senators [IVV "advice""] wisdom.", 1 Th 5 21, "the Heb is ?", 2 Th 3 1, "by LXX perebore, presbiteroi." In Acts 5 21, "called the council together and all the senate of the children of Israel." The Gr _γεωργία, γεωργία, is here evidently used as a more precise equivalent of the foregoing "council" (_συνέδριον, συνέδριον_), to which it is also rendered by ral, le, etc. Biblical has not to the Sanhedrin. See _SANEDRIN._ This term _γεωργία_ occurs in LXX Ex 3:16, etc., and in 1 Mac 12:6; 2 Mac 1:10; 44 of the supreme council of the Jews (see Government). In 1 Mac 8:15; 12:3, Boulethorpos, bouleutherion, is used of the Rom senate, which is said to consist of 320 members meeting once a month; the council, when not convened, is supposed to be the supreme magistrates, to which the people are to go in case they may be well governed. These statements are not quite accurate, since the senate consisted normally of 300 members, and met not daily, but on call of the magistrates. Originally, like the gerousia of the Jews, the representatives of families and clans (genetes), the senators were subsequently the exmagistrates, supplemented, to complete the tale of members, by representatives of patrician (in time also of plebeian) families selected by the censor. The tenure was ordinarily for life, though it might be terminable for cause by the censor. Although constitutionally the senate was only an advisory body, its advice (senatus consultum, auctoritas) in fact became in time a mandate which few dared to disregard. During the republican period the senate practically ruled Rome; under the empire it tended more and more to become the creature and subservient tool of the emperors.

Seneh, sen'ne (סנה, seneh; Σαννά, Sanná): This was the name attaching to the southern of the two great cliffs between which ran the gorge of Michmash (1 S 14:4). The name means "acacia," and may have been given to it from the thorn bushes growing upon it. Jos (BJ, V, ii, 1) mentions the "plain of thorns" near Gabathasaul. We may hear an echo of the old name in that of Wady Saueinih, "valley of the little thorn tree," the name by which the gorge is known today. The cliff must have stood on the right side of the valley, see Boenz. Conder gives an excellent description of the place in Tent Work in Pal, II, 112-14.

Senir, se'nir (סניר, 8nir; Σαννήρ, Saneir): This was the Amorite name of Mt. Hermon, according to Dt 3:9 (AV "Shenir"). But in 1 Ch 5:25; Cant 4:8, we have Senir and Hermon named as distinct mountains. It seems probable, however, that Senir applied to a definite part of the Anti-Lebanon or Hermon range. An inscription of Shalmaneser III, king of Damascus, fortified Mt. Senir over against Mt. Lebanon. So in Ezek 27:5, Senir, whence the Tyrians got planks of fir trees, is set over against Lebanon, where cedars were obtained. The Arab geographers give the name part of Jebel Ser, to the part of the Anti-Lebanon range which lies between Damascus and Homs (Yakut, c 1225 AD, quoted by Guy le Strange in Pal under the Mamelons, 79. He also quotes Maasudi, 943 AD, to the effect that Baalbek is in the district of Senir, 205).

Sennacherib, se-nak'er-ib (סנָכַּרְוּ, gınkarthih; Σανναχερίμ, Sennacherîm, Assyr Sin-akkî-erba, "the moon-god Sin has increased the brothers"): Sennacherib (704-682 BC) ascended the throne of Assyria after the death of his father Sargon. Appreciating the fact that Babylon would be difficult to control, instead of endeavoring to conciliate the people he ignored them. The Babylonians, being indignant, crowned a man of humble origin, Nergalushshu, as king by name. He ruled over a month, having been driven from power by the ascendancy of Merodach-baladan, who again appeared on the scene.

In order to fortify himself against Assyria the latter sent an embassy to Hezekiah, apparently for the purpose of inspiring the W. to rebel against Assyria (2 K 20:9-19).

Sennacherib in his first campaign marched into Babylonia. He found Merodach-baladan intrenched at Kish, about 9 miles from Babylon, and defeated him; after which he entered the gates of Babylon, which had been thrown open to him. He massacred a Babylonian, named Bêl-ibni, on the throne.

This campaign was followed by an invasion of the country of the Cassites and Isubigalleans. In his third campaign he directed his attention to the W., where the people had become restless under the Assy yoke. Hezekiah had been victorious over the Philis (2 K 18:8). In preparation to withstand a siege, Hezekiah had built a conduit to bring water within the city walls (2 K 20:20). Although strongly opposed by the prophet Isaiah, gifts were sent to Egypt, whence assistance was promised (Isa 30:1-4). Apparently also the Phoenicians and Philis, who had been sore pressed by Assyria, had made provision to resist Assyria. The first move was at Ekron, where the Assy governor Padi was put into chains and sent to Hezekiah at Jerusalem.

Sennacherib, in 701, moved against the cities in the W. He ravaged the environs of Tyre, but made no attempt to take the city, which was supported by a naval force. After Elulaeus the king of Sidon fled, the city surrendered without a battle, and Ethbaal was appointed king. Numerous cities at once sent presents to the king of Assyria. Askelon and other cities were captured. The king of Babylon was routed at Eltekeh, and Ekron was destroyed. He claims to have conquered 46 strongholds of Hezekiah's territory, but he did not capture Jerus, for concerning the king he said, in his annals, "himself like a bird in a cage in Jerus, his royal city, I penned him." He states, also, how he reduced his territory, and how Hezekiah sent to him 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver, besides hostages.

The Bib. account of this invasion is found in 2 K 18:13-19:17; Isa 36, 37. The Assy account differs considerably from it; but at the same time it corroborates it in many details. One of the striking parallels is the exact amount of gold which Hezekiah sent to the Assy king (see Expos T, XII, 225, 405; XIII, 236).

In the following year Sennacherib returned to Babylonia to put down a rebellion by Bêl-ibni and Merodach-baladan. The former was sent to Assyria, and the latter soon afterward died. Ashur-nadin-shum, the son of Sennacherib, was then crowned king of Babylon. A campaign into Cilicia and Cappadocia followed.

In 694 Sennacherib attacked the Elamites, who were in league with the Babylonians. In revenge, the Elamites invaded Babylonia and carried off Ashur-nadin-shum to Elam, and made Nergalushshu king of Babylon. He was later captured and in turn carried off to Assyria. In 691 Sennacherib again directed his attention to the S., and at Khaldûth fought with the combined forces. Two years later he took Babylon, and razed it to the ground.

In 681 Sennacherib was murdered by his two sons (2 K 19:37; see Shanitzer). Eshar-haddon their younger brother, who was at the time conducting a campaign against Ararat, was declared king in his stead.

Senses, sen'zē: The tr of ἀκοῆς, ακοθήριον (He 6:4, 14, "those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern good"). The word means, primarily, the seat of the senses, the region of feeling; in the LXX of Jer 4:19, it represents the Heb בור, "the walls of the heart" (see RV), and is used to denote the internal sense or faculty of perceiving and judging, which in He 5...
14 is regarded as becoming perfected by use or exercise (cf. Eph 4:12 f.; 1 Tim 4:7; 2 Pet 3:18).

In 2 Esdr 10:36 we have "Or is my sense deceived, or do I see in a dream?" Lat. sensus, here "mind," rather than "sense." W. L. Walker

SENSUAL, sen'shə-nil (ψυχικός, psuchikós, "animal," "natural"): Bib. psychology has no English equivalent for this Gr original. Man subject to the lower appetites, sarkikos, "fleshly," in the communion of his spirit with God he is πνευματικός, pneumatikós, "spiritual." Between the two is the ψυχή, psuchē, "soul," the center of his personal being. This ψυχή or "I" in each man is bound to the spirit, the higher nature; and to the body or lower nature.

The soul (psuchē) as the seat of the senses, desires, affections, appetites, passions, i.e. the lower animal nature common to man with the beasts, was distinguished in the Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy from the higher rational nature (nous, poiesma).

The subjection of the soul to the animal nature is man's debasement, to the spirit indwelt of God is his exaltation. The Gr. equivalent for psuchikos, "psychic," does not express this debasement. In the NT "sensual" indicates man's subjection to self and self-interest, whether animal or intellectual — the selfish man in whom the spirit is degraded into subordination to the debased psuchē, "soul." This debasement may be (1) intellectual, "not wisdom... from above, but... earthly, sensual" (Jas 3:15); (2) carnal (and of course moral), "sensual, having not the Spirit" (Jud 20:10). It ranges all the way from sensuality to self-indulgence to gross immorality. In the utter subjection of the spirit to sense it is the utter exclusion of God from the life. Hence "the natural [psuchikos] man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God" (1 Cor 2:14). This term is equivalent to "the mind of the flesh" (Rom 8:7) which is "not subject to the law of God." See PSYCHOLOGY. Dwight M. Pratt

SENT (σήμα, shēlāh; σαρτόλα, apostēlah): "Sent!" in the OT is the tr of shēlāh, "to send!" (of presents, messengers, etc., Gen 32:18; 44:3; Josh 6:14; 1 K 14:6; Est 3:13; Prov 17:11; Jer 49:14; Ezek 3:23; 40: Dtn 10:11, 12; Ob 1:7). Of ἁπλώνshēlāh, "sending" (Ex 15:13), ἀποστέλλειν, "to send off or away," "to send forth" (Jn 9:7), "the pool of Siloam [which is by interpretation, Sent]" (cp. Lk 13:4; Neh 3:15, the "pool of Siloah," RV Shēlēkha; Isa 8:6, "the waters of Shiloah that go softly," where LXX has Siloah for Heb shēlāh, in sending," which rather than "Sent," is the original meaning—a sending forth of waters. See Siloam. "Sent!" is also the tr of ἀπόστολος, "one sent forth" (the original of the familiar word "apostle"); cp. in Jn 13:16, "one that is sent" (m Gr an apostole,); of He 1:14. W. L. Walker SENTENCE, sen'tens: Eight Heb and three Gr words are thus tr. In AV: Sometimes it points to a mystery (Dtn 5:12; 8:29); then again to the contents of the Law (Dt 17:11); then again to the idea of judgment (Ps 17:2) or of a judicial sentence (2 Cor 1:9; Lk 23:24), or of judicial advice (Acts 15:19, ARV "judgment").

SENUAH, sēnū'a, sēn-ū'-a (סנוא, sō'nā): In AV "A Benjamite" (Neh 11:9); RV has "Hassenuah," transliterating the def. art. AV is to be preferred (cf 1 Ch 9:7).

SEORIM, sē-ôrîm, sē-ôrîm (סֵ֫וֹרִים, sō'rim): The name borne by one of the (post-exilic) priestly courses (1 Ch 23:8).

SEPARATE, sep'a-rat: The tr of a number of Heb and Gr words, יָ֫זֶר, yāzer, bāḥāl (Lev 20:24, etc), and ἄφωνομ, aphōnōμ (Mt 26:32, etc), being the most common. "To separate" and "to consecrate" were originally not distinguished (e.g. Nu 6:1-3), and probably the majority of the Gr. words "separate" in EV connote "to set apart for God." But precisely the same term that is used in this sense may also denote the exact opposite (e.g. the use of ναζαρ in Ezek 14:7 and Zec 7:3). See HOLY; NAZRITE; SAINT.

SEPARATION, sep'a-rā'shun: In the Pent the word niddah specially points to a state of ceremonial uncleanness (Lev 12:2-5; 15:20f; Nu 6:4f; 12:13; 19:21). For a description of the "water of purification," used for cleansing what was ceremonially unclean (Nu 19), see ḤEIPHER, RED; UNCLEANNESS. For "separation" in the sense of nēzer, see NAZRITE.

SEPHER, sep'fär: Only in Gen 10:30 (תֵ֫פֶ֫ר, tōfēr, "toward Sephar"), as the eastern limit of the territory of the sons of Yoktan (Joktan). From the similarity between the names of most of Yoktan's sons and the name of his great-grandsons, towns or districts, it can hardly be doubted that Sephar is represented by the Arab. Zafār. The appropriateness of the site seems to outweigh the discrepancy between Arab. شَفَر and Heb שָׁבְר. But two important towns in South Arabia bear this name. The one lies a little to the S. of Ṣanʿa. According to tradition it was founded by Shammar, one of the Sabaeans kings, and for a long time served as the royal seat of the Tubbas. The other Zafār stands on the coast in the district of Shahr, E. of Ḥodra-munt. The latter is probably to be accepted as the Bib. site. A. S. Pezron SEPHERAD, sep'fə-rad, sep'-fə-rad (שֵ֫פֶ֫רְד, shōphērād, "toward Sephar"): Mentioned in Ob 20 as the place of captivity of certain "captives of Jerus," but no clear indication is given of locality. Many conjectures have been made. The Tg of Jonathan identifies with Spain; hence the Spanish Jews are called Sepharadim. Others (Pusey, etc) have connected it with the Ḥepārī of the Babylonian Inscriptions, and some have even identified it with "Sardis." The now generally accepted view is that which connects it with the "Separdas" of the Assyrian inscriptions, though whether this is to be located to the E. of Assyria or in Northern Asia Minor is not clear. See Schrader, "Sepphar" in DB, 145-46; Sayce, HCM, 482-84; arts. in DB, HDB, EB, etc.

It was one of the two great seats of the worship of the Bab sun-god Šamaš, and also of the goddess Ishtar and Anunit, and seems to have had two principal districts, Sippur of Šamaš, and Sippur of Anunit, which, if the identification were correct, would account for the dual termination -ayin, in Heb.    LITERATURE
I. Importance—The Gr VS of the OT commonly known as the Septuagint holds a unique place among translations. Its importance is many-sided. Its chief value lies in the fact that it is a VS of a Heb text earlier by about a millennium than the earliest dated Heb MS extant (916 AD), a VS, in particular, prior to the formal rabbinical revision of the Heb which took place early in the 2d cent. AD. It supplies the materials for the recovering of an older form of the Heb than the MT reproduced in our modern Bibles. It is, moreover, a pioneering work; there was probably no precedent in the world's history for a series of translations from one language into another on so extensive a scale. It was the first attempt to reproduce the Heb Scriptures in another tongue. It is one of the outstanding results of the breaking-down of international barriers by the conquests of Alexander the Great and the dissemination of the Gr language, which were fraught with such vital consequences for the history of religion. The cosmopolitan city which he founded in the Delta witnessed the first attempt to bridge the gulf between Jewish and Gr thought. The Jewish commercial settlers at Alexandria, forced by circumstances to abandon their language, clung tenaciously to their faith; and the tr of the Scriptures into their adopted language, produced to meet their own needs, had the further result of introducing the outside world to a knowledge of their history and religion. Then came the most momentous event in its history, the starting-point of a new life; the tr was taken over from the Jews by the Christian church. It was the Bible of most writers of the NT. Not only were the majority of their express citations from Scripture borrowed from it, but their writings contain numerous reminiscences of its language. Its words are household words to them. It laid for them the foundations of a religious and legal language which became a potent weapon for missionary work, and, when VSs of the Scriptures into other languages became necessary, it was in most cases the LXX and not the Heb from which they were made. Preeminent among these daughter VSs was the Old Lat which preceded the Vulg. Jerome's VS, for the most part a direct tr from the Heb, was in portions a mere revision of the Old Lat; our Prayer-book VS of the Psalter preserves peculiarities of the LXX, transmitted through the medium of the Old Lat. The LXX was also the Bible of the early Gr Fathers, and helped to mold dogma; it furnished proof-texts to both parties in the Arius controversy. Its language gives it another strong claim to recognition. Undecided and unchristian as much of it appears, we now know that this is not wholly due to the hampering effects of translation. "Biblical Greek," once considered a distinct species, is now a rather discredited term. The hundreds of contemporary papyrus records (letters, business and legal documents, etc) recently discovered in Egypt illustrate much of the vocabulary and grammar and go to show that many so-called "Hebraisms" were in truth integral parts of the "Hebraic" or "common language." i.e. the international form of the Heb since the time of Alexander, replaced the old dialect, and of which the spoken Gr of today is the literal descendant. The VS was made for the populace and written in large measure in the language of their everyday life.
II. Name—The name "Septuagint" is an abbreviation of Interpretatio secundum (or iuxta) Sepquinta seniorum (or viros), i.e. the Gr tr of the OT of which the first installment was, according to the Alexandrian legend (see III, below), contributed by 70 (or 72) elders sent from Jerusalem to Alexandria for the purpose at the request of Ptolemy II. The legend in its oldest form restricts their labors to the Pent, but they were afterward credited with the tr of the whole Bible, and before the 4th cent. It had become customary to apply the title to the whole collection: Aug., De Civ. Dei, xvii.42, "quorum interpretatio ut Septuaginta vocetur iam obtinuit consuetudo" ("whose tr is now by custom called the Septuagint"). The N T translators refer to them under the abbreviation of ⲳⲧⲧ Ⲣⲧⲧⲧⲧⲧⲧ ("the seventy"), or ⲧⲧⲧⲧⲧⲧⲧ ("the seventy-two"). The "Septuagint" and the abbreviated form "LXX" have been the usual designations hitherto, but, as these are based on a now discredited legend, they are coming to be replaced by "the OT in Greek," or "the Alexandrian version" with the abbreviation "Ω.

III. Traditional Origin.—The traditional account of the tr of the Pent is contained in the so-called letter of Aristeas (see Gr text, F. Wendland, Teubner series, 1890, and Thackeray in the App. to Swete's Intro to the OT in Gr, 1900, etc; Wendland's sections cited below appear in Swete's Intro, ed 2; ET by Thackeray, Macmillan, 1904, reprinted from JQR, XV, 357, and H. T. Andrews in Charles's Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT, II, 58-122, Oxford, 1913).

The writer professes to be a high official at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 BC), a Greek interested in Jewish antiquities.

1. Letter of Aristeas.—In his Philemometer (182-146 BC), writes the letter to Philadelphia at the request of the Jewish leaders, including Eleazar. Aristeas describes an embassy to Jerusalem in which he has recently been sent with another courtier Andras. According to his narrative, Demetrius of Phalerum, a prominent figure in later Athenian history, who here appears as a royal librarian at Alexandria, convinced the king of the importance of securing for his library a tr of the Jewish Law. The text at the same time, to propitiate the nation from whom he was asking a favor, composed, on the suggestion of Aristeas, to liberate all Jewish slaves in Egypt; we severely", of the letters which passed between Ptolemy and Eleazar, the high priest at Jerusalem. Ptolemy requests Eleazar to select and dispatch to Alexandria 72 elders, proficient in the Law, 6 from each tribe, to undertake the tr, the importance of which task requiring the services of a large number to secure an accurate VS. Eleazar complies with the request and the names of the selected translators are appended to his letter.

The translators arrive at Alexandria, bringing a copy of the Law written in letters of gold on rolls of skin, and are honorably received by Ptolemy. A seven days' banquet follows, at which the king tests the proficiency of each in the task handling. Three days later Demetrius conducts them across the mole known as the Heptastadion to the island of Pharos, where, with all necessaries provided for their convenience, they continue their task, as by a miracle, in one day, "we seventy", that their work was the result of collaboration and comparison. The completed VS was read by Demetrius to the Jewish community, who received it with enthusiasm and begged that a copy might be intrusted to their leaders; a solemn curse was pronounced on any who should venture to add to or subtract from or make any alteration in the tr. The whole VS was then read aloud to the king who expressed his admiration and his desire that Gr writers had remained in ignorance of its contents; he directed that the books should be preserved with scrupulous care.

To set beside this account we have two pre-Christian allusions in Jewish writings. Aristobulus, addressing a Ptolemy who has been identified as

2. Evidence from Ptolemy Philadelphus and Irenaeus. — A large number of the main features of the story were believed at Alexandria within a century of the date assigned by "Aristeas" to the tr. Philo (Vit. Mose, ii.5 ff) repeats the story of the sending of the translators by Eleazar at the request of Philadelphia, adding that in his day the completion of the undertaking was celebrated by an annual festival on the island of Phares. It is improbable that an artificial production like the Aristeas letter should have occurred and spread among the translators. Philo's evidence seems therefore to rest in part on an independent tradition. His account in one particular paves the way for later acceptions; he hints at the inspiration of the translators and the miraculous acquisition of their separate parts, as if they prophesied like men possessed, not one in one way and one in another, but all producing the same words and phrases as though some unseen prompers were at the ears of each. At the end of the 1st cent. AD one his rare MSS (XI, ii. 1 ff) large portions of the letter, which he paraphrases, but does not embellish.

Christian writers accepted the story without suspicion and amplified it. A catena of their evidence is given here, an abbreviated list of the MSS.

3. Later Accretions.—Principal additions to the narrative, all clearly baseless fabrications.

(1) The translators worked independently, in separate cells, and produced identical versions. Ptolemy proposing this test of their genuineness, at the head of a list of Alexandria, Augustine, the Chronicon Paschale and the Epitome of Eusebius (wrongly attributed to the author of the last work asserts that he had seen the books of the Law while in Alexandria and had secured a copy of the original tr. A modification of this legend says that the translators worked in pairs in 36 cells. So Epiphanius (d. 403 AD), and later G. Syncellus, Julius Pollux and Zonaras. Epiphanius' account is the most detailed. The translators were locked up in sky-lighted cells in pairs with attendants and shorthand writers; each pair was entrusted with one book, the books were then circulated, and 36 identical VS of the whole Law, as well as apocryphal books, were produced; Ptolemy wrote two letters, one asking for the original scriptures, the second for the translations. The immediately, the two embassies appears already in the 2nd cent. AD, in Justin's Apology (XIII, viii.3-4), as the estimation of the translators and the confirmation of the fact by the Prophets and the whole Bible recurs in the two Cyril and in Chrysostom. (5) The miraculous agreement of the translators presents the most striking evidence for the authors (Brennan, etc. of Philo). (6) As regards date, Clement of Alexandria omits the translation, with a note referring the VS back to the time of the first Ptolemy (522-385 BC); while Chrysostom brings it down to "a hundred or more years elsewhere, "not many years" before the coming of Christ." Justin ably states that Ptolemy's embassy was sent to King Herod: the Chronicon Paschale calls the high priest of the time Onias Simon, brother of Eleazar.

Jerome was the first to hold these later inventions up to ridicule, contrasting them with the older and genuine traditions in Jewish circles at Alexandria. The origin of the legend of the miraculous consensus of the 70 translators has been reasonably sought in a passage in Ex 54 LXX to which Epiphanius expressly refers. We there read of 70 elders of Israel, not heard of again, who with Aaron, Nadab and Abihu form a link between Moses and the people. After reciting the Book of the Covenant Moses ascends to the top of the mount; the 70, however, ascend a little way and are hidden from view:

According to the LXX text "They saw the place where the God of Israel stood . . . and of the elect of Israel not one perished" (ver 11), i.e. they were privileged to escape the usual effect of a vision of the Deity (Ex 33 20). But the vb. used for "perish" (diapathomai) was uncommon in this sense; "not one disagreed" would be the obvious meaning; hence apparently the legend of the agreement of the translators, the later intermediaries between Moses and Israel of the Dispersion. When the translations were recited, "no difference was discoverable," says Epiphanius using the same word, cave-dwellings in the island of Pharsus probably account for the legend of the cells. A curious phenomenon has recently suggested that there is an element of truth in one item of Epiphanius' obviously apocryphal narrative, viz. the working at the translators in pairs. The Greek books of Jer and Ezek fall into two nearly equal parts, apparently the work of separate translators (see VII, 1, [2], below); while in Ex, Lev and Psalms orthographical details indicate a similar division of the books for clerical purposes. There was, it seems, a primitive custom of transcribing each book on 2 separate rolls, and in the case of Jer and Ezek the practice goes back to the time of tr (TS, IV, 245 ff., 398 ff.; LS, 85 ff.).

Beside the later extravagances, the story of Aristaeus appears problematical. Yet it has long been recognized that much of the story is unhistorical, in particular the professed date and nationality of the Aristaeus writer. Its claims to authenticity are those of the later, not the earlier, Ptolemaic age.

The letter was used by Jos and probably known to Philo. How much earlier is it? Schurer (HJR, II, iii, 309 f. [614], III, 698-16), relying on the passage (1), the surgeon of Philo, and the tradition that the age of the translator is one of Palestinian translators is likewise fictitious. Dr. Swete acutely observes that Aristaeus, in stating that the tr was read to and welcomed by the Jewish community before being presented to the king, unconsciously reveals its true origin. It was no doubt produced to meet their own needs by the large Jewish colony at Alexandria. A demand that the Law should be read in the synagogues in a tongue "understood of the people" was the originating impulse.

IV. Evidence of Prologue to Strach.—The interesting, though in places tantalizingly obscure, prologue to Ecclesiastes throws light on the progress made with the tr of the remaining Scriptures before the end of the 2nd cent. BC.

The translator dates his settlement in Egypt, during which he produced his VS of his grandfather's work, as "the 38th year under Euergetes the king." The records have kept the subject of the tr before the majority of critics, we may interpret this to mean the 38th year of Euergetes II, reckoning from the beginning (1 Macc. 5, 3) of his joint reign, i.e. 132 BC. Euergetes I reigned for 25 years only. Others, in the absence of the superscription, suppose that the age of the translator is intended, but the superscriptional form of expression is not unparalleled. A recent explanation of the date (Hart, Ecclus in Gr) that the 38th year of Philadephos which was also the last year of Euergetes I (i.e. 247 BC) is more ingenious than convincing.

The prologue implies the existence of a Gr VS of the Law, the Prophets and "the rest of the books." The translator, craving his readers' indulgence for the imperfections of his work, due to the difficulty of reproducing Heb in Gr, adds that others have experienced the same difficulties and that the work itself and the prophecies and the rest of the books have no small difference when spoken in their original language. From these words we may understand that at the time of writing (132-100 BC) Alexandrian Jews possessed Gr VSS of a large part (probably not the whole) of the "Prophets," and of some of the "Writings" or Hagiographies. For some internal evidence as to the order in which the several books were tr see VIII, below.

V. Transmission of the LXX Text.—The main value of the LXX is its witness to an older Heb text than our own. But before we can reconstruct this Heb text we need to have a pure Gr text before us, and this we are at present far from possessing. The Gr text has had a long and complex history of its own. Used for centuries by both Jews and Christians it underwent corruption and interpolation, and, notwithstanding the multitude of materials for its restoration, the original text has yet to be recovered. We are now more certain of the rabbin of the ipsissima verba of the NT writers than of the original Alexandrian VS of the OT. This does not apply to all portions alike. The Gr Pent, e.g., has survived in a relatively pure form. But everywhere we have to be on our guard against interpolations, sometimes extending to whole paragraphs. Not a verse is without its array of variant readings. An indication of the amount of "mixture" which has taken place is afforded by the numerous "doubts" or alternative renderings of a single Heb word or phrase which appear side by side in the transmitted text.

Textual corruption began early, before the Christian era. We have seen indications of this in the letter of Aristeus (III, 5, [0] above). Traces of corruption appear in Philo's Corruption of Text (e.g. his comment, in Quis Rer. Div. Her. 56, on Gen 16, 15, shows that already in his day taφες, "buried," had become τραφεσ, "nurtured," as in all our MSS); doubtless also Symmachus, the NT author of He quotes (12 15) a corrupt form of the Gr of Dt 29 18.

But it was not until the beginning of the 2nd cent. AD that the divergence between the Gr and the Palestinian Heb text reached an acute stage. One cause of this was the revision of the Heb text which took place about this time. No actual record of this revision exists, but it is beyond doubt that it originated in the rabbinical school, of which Rabbi Akiba was the chief representative, and which had its center at Jamnia in the years following the destruction of Jerusalem. The Jewish doctors, their temple in ruins, concentrated their attention on the settlement of the text of the Scriptures which remained to them. This school of eminent critics, precursors of the Massoretes, besides settling outstanding questions concerning the Canon, laid down strict rules for Bib. interpretation, and in all probability established an official text.

But another cause widened still farther the distance between the texts of Jews and Christians.

This was the adoption of the LXX by the Christian Church. A做的事c. AD 50 the Christian LXX writers, and in proof of their doctrines, the Jews began to question its accuracy. Hence mutual recensions which are reflected in the pages of Justin's Dialogue with Trypho. "They dare to assert," says Justin (DiaL, 68), "that the interpretation produced by your seventy elders under Ptolemy of Egypt is in some points inaccurate." A crucial instance cited by the Jews was the rendering γενικην in Is 7 14, where they claimed with justice that "young woman" would be more accurate. Justin retaliates by charging the Jews with deliberate excision of passages favorable to Christianity.

That such accusations should be made in those critical years was inevitable, yet there is no evidence of any material interpolations having been introduced by either party. But the Alexandrian VS, in view of the revised text and the new and stricter canons of interpretation which were set by the Jews to be inadequate, and a group of new translations of Scripture in the 2d cent. AD supplied the demand. We possess considerable fragments of the work of three of these translators, viz. Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion, besides scanty remnants of further anonymous VSS.

The earliest of the "three" was Aquila. A proselyte to Judaism, and, like his NT namesake, a native of Pella, he was friends with Herod the Great and was thus to a certain extent under Hadrian (117-38 AD) and was related to that emperor: there is no possibility that Epiphanius' statement that Hadrian intrusted to Aquila the supervision of the building of the temple, which was only completed when he was certain that there he was converted to Christianity by Christian exiles returning from Pella, but that refusing to abandon his astrological he was forced on to Rome and to Jew and was actuated by a bias against Christianity in his revision of the OT, is that in certain cases of the new rabbinical school, in particular of Rabbi Akiba (95-135 AD), and that his VS was an attempt to reproduce exactly the revised official text. The result was an extraordinary production, unparalleled in Gr lit., if it can be classed under that category at all. No jot or tittle of the Heb might be neglected, and a manuscript of each Heb word must be preserved and the etymological kinship of different Heb words represented. Such were some of his leading principles. The opening words of his text (Gen 1 1) may be rendered: In heading forth God said, God created heaven and earth."

"or "summary" was selected because the Heb word for "beginning" (Monda) represents the same word prefixed to the accusative case, but indistinguishable from the proposition "with" (Gen 1 1). Though the Textual Gr was not the text, but written in archaic Heb characters, a slave to the ipsissima verba as Origen has been aptly described by a modern writer as "a colossal crip" (Burkitt, JQR, October, 1906, 207 ff). Yet it was a success in the days of the young Church. It was taken in part by the Jews, figures in the Antiochian Septuagint, and continued in use for several centuries; just as the Gr, expressly sanctioned its use in the synagogues (Nov. 146). Its lack of style and violation of the laws of grammar were not due to ignorance of Gr, of which the compiler shows a considerable command, its importance lay in its being the closest (as far as it was preserved) in its exact reproduction of the rabbinical text of the 2d cent. AD. It may be regarded as the beginning of the scientific study of the Heb Scriptures. Though bold attempts have been made to make it an authoritative text, it cannot be charged with being intentionally antagonistic to Christianity. If the origin of the "seven variant" is due to the fact that only from extracts in MS, some palimpsest fragments were recovered from the Cairo Genizah in 1897 and edited by E. C. Burkitt (Critical Edition of the Books of Psalms, 1909), and by C. Taylor (Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, 1897; Hebr-Gr Psalters) 1000. The student of Swete's OT will trace Aquila's unmistakable style in the footnote to the Books of S and K; the longer and shorter Texts in those books has to a great extent been supplemented in the text from Aquila. A longer specimen of his work occurs in the Heb Psalter of the Sectarians, there is no claim to be regarded as "Septuagint"; Jerome refers to a second ed of Aquila's VS, and the Gr Eccl is perhaps his revised ed of this book. An early MS hand of an unrevised Heb text (McIntire, Int. Text to Eccl, Cambridge, 1904, App. 14) and the supposition of Dr. Onkelos, the editor of the Tg of that name, has not been generally accepted.

Aquila's comments on the dates and history of Theodotion and Symmachus is untrustworthy. He has to be reversed or probably misled by the order of the translations in the columns of the Hexapla (see below). He also apparently confused Aquila and Theodotion in calling the latter a native of Pontus. As regards date, Theodotion's critics are agreed, preceded Symmachus and probably flourished under M. Aurelius (161-80), whereas Symmachus lived under Commodus (180-192). Irrelevant notes of Aquila and Theodotion, and that of Symmachus had in his day other baseless or at least not widely circulated. According to the modern sect of the 13th and 14th centuries, Theodotion was an Ephesian and a convert to Judaism. He constantly agrees with the LXX, and was rather a revision of it, to bring it into accord with the current Heb text, than an independent work. The supplements (labyrinth of laiacan in the LXX and the fact that the older VS of some books did not aim at completeness is one of the more curious and least popular among Theodotion. The text of Heb is preserved by Cod Q in Jer. As regards the additional matter contained in LXX, Theodotion is inconsistent. He has admitted, e.g., that the book of Job (138) was in the LXX, but did not apparently admit the non-canonical books and adopted his own in the LXX, which has survived in only one MS; but the date when the changes took place is unknown and the early historv of the two Gr texts is obscure. Theodotion's renderings have been found in writings before his time (180-92), and it is reasonably conjectured that even before the 3rd cent. AD the LXX text had been discarded and that Theodotion's VS is but a working copy of an alternative VS. Theodotion is free from the barbarisms of Aquila, but is addicted to transliteration. He inverts the order of the Heb words and substitutes Gr letters. His reasons for this habit are not always clear; ignorance of Heb will not account for all (cf VIII. 1, 2 below).

Beside the two VSS produced by, and primarily intended for, the Jewish Christian sects, there was a third, probably intended to meet the needs of a Christian sect that was dissatisfied with the LXX. Symmachus, as his author, wrote a commentary on MT, a copy of which was given to Origen by Juliana, a lady who received it from its author (Euseb., HE, VI. 17). Epiphanius' description of him as a Samaritan convert to Judaism may be rejected. The date of his work, as above stated, was probably the reign of Commodus (180-92 AD). In one respect the VS he produced in its faithful adherence to the sense of the current Heb text, a style, however, which was flowing and literary, was a revolt against Aquila's monstrosities. It seems to have been a revising of Aquila's VS, with free use of both LXX and Theodotion. It carried further a tendency apparent in the LXX to refine away the anthropomorphisms of the OT.

Of the other three MSS discovered by Origen (one at Nicopolis in Greece, one at Jericho) and known from the Hexaplar, the Septuagint, Symmachus' text and the later manuscripts (of the LXX), little is known. There is no reason to suppose that Symmachus endeavored to produce yet another version, which is characterized by Field as the most elegant of the Gr VSS. F. C. Burkitt has discussed the so-called 'text of 4 Kings' in the SFA. The Christian origin of Symmachus is traced by Epiphanius in his Hexapla 11 ("Thou wentest forth to save the people for the sake of (or "by") Jesus thy anointed one").

These later VSS play a large part in the history of the text of the LXX. This is due to the labors of the greatest LXX scholar of antiquity, the celebrated Origen of Alexandria, who was a pupil of the first half of the 3rd cent. Origen, most of his works, who was the spiritual and the Hexapla recognized, and wished Christians to recognize, the merits of the later VSS, and the divergences between the LXX and the current Heb. He determined to provide the church with the materials for ascertaining the true text and meaning of the OT. With this object he set himself to learn Heb—a fact probably unprecedented among non-Jewish Christians of that time—and to collate the Heb VSS. The later VSS, however, were not available to Origen, nor did he have access to them, and the amends he conceived for the LXX seemed to him an inspiration: 'By the gift of God we found a remedy for the divergence in the copies of the OT, namely to use the other editions as a criterion' (Comm. on Mt. 15. 14). The emphasis which he laid on the researches of his labors was known as the Hexapla or "six-column" edition. This stupendous work has not survived; a fragment was discovered toward the end of the 19th cent. in the Ambrosian Library at Milan (Swete, Intro. to LXX) and another among the Cairo Genizah palimpsests (ed. C. Taylor, Cambridge, 1900).

The material was arranged in six parallel columns containing (1) the current Heb text, (2) the same in Gr letters, (3) the VS of Aquila, (4) that of Symmachus, (5) the divisions of the Heb text, (6) the column of Theodotion. The text was broken up into short clauses; not more than two words, usually one only, stood in the first column. The order of the columns doubtless represents the degree of conformity to the Heb text of Aquila's, or the LXX, that of Symmachus is on the whole a revision of Aquila as Theodotion's is of the LXX. But Origen was not content with merely collating the VSS; his aim was to revise the LXX and the 5th column (Symmachus). The text discovered in 1949 was the current Alexandrian text of the 5th cent. AD; this was supplemented or corrected where necessary by the other VSS. Origen, however, deprecated alteration of a text which had received ecclesiastical sanction, without some indication of its extent, and the construction of the 6th column presented difficulties. There were (1) numerous cases of words or paragraphs contained in the LXX but not in the Heb, which could not be wholly rejected, (2) cases of omission from the LXX of words in the Heb, (3) cases of two Heb parallel passages in the LXX; (4) variations in the order of words or chapters. Origen here had recourse to a system of critical signs, invented and employed by the grammarian Aristarchus (3rd cent. BC) in his ed of Homer. Passages of the first class were left in the text, but had prefixed to them an obelus, a sign of which the original form was a "spit" or "spear," but figuring in LXX MSS as a horizontal line usually with a dot above and a dot below (\(\overline{\mathbf{\alpha}}\)); other varieties are \(\overline{\mathbf{\alpha}}\), \(\overline{\mathbf{\alpha}}\), the sign in Aristarchus indicated censure, in the Hexapla the doubtful authority of the words which followed. The close of the obelized passage was marked by the met abolus, a colon (\(\,:\)) or, in the Syr VSS, a vallum (\(\mathbf{\nu}\)). Passages missing in the LXX were supplied from one of the other VSS (Aquila or Theodotion), the beginning of the extract being marked by an asterisk (\(X\))—a sign used by Aristarchus to express special approval—the close, by the metabolus. Where LXX and Heb widely diverged, Origen occasionally gave Heb, LXX and the other VSS, the corrector being the one that of LXX obelized. Divergence in order was met by transposition, the Heb order being followed; in Prov, however, the two texts kept their respective order, the discrepancy being indicated by a combination of signs. Minor supposed or real corruptions in the Gr were tacitly corrected. Origen produced a minor edition, the Tetrapla, without the first two columns of the larger work. The Hexapla and Oecolapla, occasionally mentioned, appear to be a partial revision of the Hexapla at points where the number of columns was increased to receive other fragmentary VSS. This gigantic work, which according to a reasonable estimate must have filled 5,000 leaves, was probably never copied in extenso. The original was preserved for some centuries in the library of Pamphilus at Caesarea; there it was studied by Jerome, and thither came owners of Bib. MSS to collate their copies with it, as we learn from some interesting notes in our Syr MSS (e.g. an addendum to Est in cod. 8). The Library probably perished c. 638 AD, when Caesarea fell into the hands of the Saracens.

But, though the whole work was too vast to be copied, it was simple task to copy the 5th column. This task was performed, partly in prison, by Pamphilus, a martyr in the Diocletian persecution, and his friend Eusebius, the great bishop of Caesarea. Copies of the "Hexaplaric" LXX, i.e. Origen's doctored text with the critical signs and perhaps occasional notes, were, through the initiative of these two, widely circulated in Palestine in the 4th cent. Naturally, however, the signs became unintelligible to a later generation, and until Eusebius of Caesarea explained them; scribes neglected them, and copies of the doctored text, lacking the precautionary symbols, were multiplied. This carelessness has wrought great confusion; Origen is, through others' fault, indirectly responsible for the production of MSS in which the current LXX text and the other VSS are hopelessly mixed. No MSS give the Hexaplaric text as a whole, and it is preserved in a relatively pure form in very few: the uncials G and H (Pent and Jer), the two codices of SS and SS of Antioch, and the cursive S6 and S8 (Prophet). Other so-called Hebrew MSS, notably cod. Q (Marchalianus: Proph.) preserve fragments of the 6th and of the other columns of the Hexapla. (For the Syro-Hexaplar see below, VI. 1.) Yet, even did we possess the 5th column.
entire, with the complete apparatus of signs, we should not have "the original LXX," but merely, after removing the asterisked passages, a text current in the 3rd cent. The fact has to be emphasised that Origen's gigantic work was framed on erroneous principles. He assumed (1) the purity of the current Heb text, (2) the corruption of the current LXX text where it deviated from the Hebr. The modern critic recognizes that the LXX on the whole represents the older text, the divergences of which from the Heb are largely due to an official revision of the latter early in the Christian era. He recognizes also that in some books (e.g. Job) the old Gr VS was only a partial one. To reconstruct the original text he must therefore have recourse to other authorities beside Origen.

Such assistance is partly furnished by two other recensions made in the century after Origen. Jerome (Proef, in Paralip.; cf. Adv. Ref., ii. 27) states that in the 4th cent. three recensions circulated in different parts of the Christian world: "Alexandria and Jerome Egyptian in their Septuagint acclaim Hesychius as their authority, the region from Constantinople to Antioch approves the copies of LXX which they received, the Punjab and Palestinian provinces read the MSS which were promulgated by Eusebius and Pamphilus on the basis of Origen's labors, and the whole world is divided between these three varieties of text."

Hesychius is probably to be identified with the martyr bishop of Thmuis, and it is thought that these two were engaged in revising the LXX at the time when Pamphilus and Eusebius were employed on a similar task under similar conditions. How far existing MSS preserve the Hesychian recension is uncertain; agreement of their text with that of Egypt VSS and Fathers (Cyril in particular) is the criterion. For the Prophets Ceriani has identified cod. Q and its kin as Hesychian. For the Octateuch N. McLean (JTS, ii, 306) finds the Hesychian text in a group of cursives, 44, 74, 78, 84, 106, 154, etc., and states that the first instalments of the Hebrew Cambridge LXX raise the question whether Cod. B (Vaticanus) may not itself be Hesychian; its text is more closely allied to that of Cyril Alex. than to any other patristic text, and the consensus of these two witnesses against the rest (Ex xii. 16) speaks of the infinite variety of old LXX, though they may ultimately prove all to fall into two main families, African and Egyptian. The recension of patristic quotations from the Old Lat is still useful, though verified by recent editions of the Fathers. Of Old Lat MSS one of the most important is the cod. Lugdunensis, edited by U. Robert (Penatiuechi e cod. Lug., versio Lat., antiquissima, Paris, 1831; Novi lnterpret.: parte post. versio Lat. antiqu. e cod. Lugd., Lyons, 1890). The student should consult also Burkitt's ed. of The Rules of Tyrconnus ("Texts and Studies," 1, l, Cambridge, 1894) and The Old Latin and the Itala (60, IV, 3, 1836).

Jerome's Vulgate is mainly a direct text from the Heb, but the Vulg. Psalter, the so-called Gallican, is one of Jerome's two revisions of the Psalter. This later VS from the Heb, and some details in our Prayer-book Psalter are usually derived from the LXX (e.g. Ps 93:2) and not from the LXX. Parts of the Apocalypse (Wisd, Ecclus, Bar. I and 2 Macc) are also pure Old Lat, untouched by the LXX.

The early date (3d cent. AD) once claimed for the LXX or Codex VSS (Bongers, E. J. Gr and in part at least from an earlier text; Rahlfis (Sept-Stud., ii, 1907) identifies the Bohemian Psalter as the Hesychian recension. The Sahidic VS of Josias has fortunately preserved the shorter text lacking the later insertions from Theodotion (Lagarde, and J. Gr; E. J. Gr). Rahlfis in this does not conclusively prove that it is pre-Origenic; it may be merely a Hesychian text with the later passages omitted (Burkitt, E. B., IV, 5027). The influence of the Hexapluar is traceable elsewhere in this VS.

The Ethiopic text was made in Egypt and in part at least from an early text; Rahlfis (Sept Stud., 1, 1904) considers its text of S-K, with that of cod. B, to be pre-Hegelian.

The Vulg or Peshitta Syriac VS was made from the Heb, though partly influenced by the LXX, as we shall see below. Another VS of primary importance is the LXX text, viz. that of Paul, bishop of Tella (Constantine in Mesopotamia), executed at Antioch, known as the Syro-Hexapla. This is a hald Syr VS of the LXX column of the Hexapla, containing the LXX passages, the MS of the present printed books is in the Ambronas Library at Milan and has been edited by Ceriani (Manuscripte e cod. Oxyrhynch., lxxxv-1000). Fragments of the historical books are also extant (Lagarde and Rahlfis, Bibliotheca Syriaca, Gottingen, 1892). This VS supposes the Gr Hexapla as the principal authority for Origen's text. For the original VS of Dsl, which has survived in only one late MS, the pars prior, Göttingen, 1883); his death prevented the completion of the work. Lagarde's edition is vitiated by the fact that he does not quote the readings of the individual MSS composing the group, and it can be regarded only as an approximate reconstruction. It is evident, however, that the Lucianic LXX possessed much the same qualities as the Syrian revision of the NT; lucidity and completeness were the main objects. It is a "full" text, the outcome of a desire to include, so far as possible, all that was suitable to be written down, and consequently numerous. While this "confabulation" of texts detracts from its value, the Lucianic revision gains importance from the fact that the sources from which it gleaned include an element of accuracy which the Hexapla lacked; where it unites with the Old Lat VS against all other authorities its evidence is invaluable.

VI. Reconstruction of LXX Text; Versions, Manuscripts and Printed Editions. — The task of restoring the original text is beset with difficulties. The materials (MSS, VSS, patristic citations) are abundant, but none has escaped "mixture," and the principles for reconstruction are not yet securely established (Suetio, Irod, i. iv; III, vi).

Among the chief aids to restoration are the daughter VSS made from the LXX, and above all, the texts of the Hexapla (pre-Hieronymian) VS, for the earliest text of Old Lat MSS, Old 1 and the 20th cent. AD, i.e. before Origen, and contains a text from which the ascribed Hexapla passages in Hexapla VS are absent. It thus 'brings us the best independent evidence that we have that the MSS introduced by Origen can be relied on for the reconstruction of the LXX' (Burkitt). The Old Lat also enables us to recognize the ancient element in the Lucianic recension. But the Lucian evidence itself is by no means uncontaminated. In Ps 82, verses 16 speaks of the infinite variety of old LXX, though they may ultimately prove all to fall into two main families, African and Egyptian. The influence of patristic quotations from the Old Lat is still useful, though verified by recent editions of the Fathers. Of Old Lat MSS one of the most important is the cod. Lugdunensis, edited by U. Robert (Pentatiuechi e cod. Lug., versio Lat., antiquissima, Paris, 1831; Novi interpret.: parte post. versio Lat. antiqu. e cod. Lugd., Lyons, 1890). The student should consult also Burkitt's ed. of The Rules of Tyrconnus ("Texts and Studies," 1, l, Cambridge, 1894) and The Old Latin and the Itala (60, IV, 3, 1836).

Syr.-Hexaplar supplies a second and older authority of great value.

The Armenian VS (ascribed to the 5th cent.) also owes in the whole a troubleshooting antecedent; its text of the Octateuch is largely Hexaplaric.

A bare mention must suffice of the Arabic VS (of which the text is conjecturally rendered from the LXX); the fragments of the Gothic VS (made from the Latin recension), and the Slavonic (particularly the Russians and Georgians) are more digraphic.

For a full description of the Gr MSS see Swete, Intro., I, ch. v., the Gnomon of 1911; the text (a culmos of collations or minuscules) into uncials and cursive is, according to the former ranging from the 4th cent. (Alexandrinis, Constantinopolitan, etc.), to the 3rd cent. (Nestle in P.E., XXIII); the latter, if not against the 3rd, at the latest to the 16th cent. Complete Bibles are few; the majority contain groups of books only, such as the Pentateuch (Gen-Ruth), the later historical books, the Psalter, the 3 or 5 "Solomonic" books, the Prophets (major, minor, and the common section), the common-codices, and the Pauline letters (in the ed of Holmes and Paternoster Roman figures); cursive, of which over 300 are known, are part of Arabic; in the larger Cambridge LXX the selected cursive are denoted by small Roman letters.

The following are the chief uncials containing, or which in whole or in part (Bible, Vulgate, at Rome, 4th cent. AD, adopted as the standard text in... and the evidence of the older 6th cent. underlies a medial gr of works of Euphem the Syrian. For the Octateuch and the historical books: D (Cottonianus, Heptameron, etc.), 3rd cent. AD, is the only one to which the evidence of the MS can be attributed; the MS does not contain a variant: P (Ambrosianus, Milan, 6th cent. AD, fragments of the Octateuch; D: (Sarasinianus, fragments of Leiden, Paris, and St. Petersburg, 4th to 5th cent.), important as containing parts of the Gospel of Nicodemus. Illuminated Gen, the hulk of which perished in a fire at Alexandria in 1721, but earlier collations of Graebe and others are extant, which for the lost portions are cited in the Cambridge texts as D (Diff.i.e. ed. 1712). The Smi-Deissel text of the MSS, it is believed that the MS did not contain a variant: P (Ambrosianus, Milan, 5th cent. AD, fragments of the Chief, by which the translation from uncial to cursive script occurs, until his death. The long-concealed fact that the second edition of a part of a set of MS cameral light through Swete's identification of the Cambridge Lexicon, which the MSS still represent, but which has not been resolved. Much of the MSS still vary in respect of the MSS are generally regarded as the oldest MSS. The use of the LXX for lexicographical purposes was inherited by the church from the Jews. The MSS in the text of the LXX are agreed to represent an old system; light may also be expected from them on the local distribution of various types of text.

Of the printed texts the first four editions were (1) the Complutensian Polyglot of Cardinal Ximenes, 1514-17, comprising the Heb and Vulgate texts in the middle place of honor being compared to Jesus in the midst of the chief by the Roman ed of 1519, based on Venetian MSS. (2) The ed of 1522, published at Rome in 1522, under the auspices of Pope Sixtus V and frequently reprinted. (3) The ed of 1523, based on the cod. Dalmatian, the authority of which text is justly recognized in the interpolated sin plasm (printed in Swete's Intro.). (4) The ed of 1527, begun by the same Printer of the cod. Dalmatian, the script of which text is justly recognized in the interpolated text of the ed (id. 1712) was based on the cod. Alexandrinus, with aid from other MSS. and had the advantage that it employed Origen's emendation and different sizes of text, to show the divergence between the Gr and the Heb. Of more recent importance: (5) The great Oxford ed of Holmes and Paternoster (Oxford, 1887-1837, 5 vols. folio) was the first attempt to bring together in a gigantic apparatus of the evidence of the codices and current MSS (upward of 200). VSS and early citations from P. and R. and the evidence of the ed of 1837. Other important ed of materials: "H. and P." will not be wholly superseded by the latest of 1913. The serviceable ed of Swete's Text ed. 3, 1901-7, 3 vols. Svo), is in the hands of serious LXX students. The text is that of B, or (where B fails) of A.

4. Reconstr. of the LXX

The task of reconstructing the oldest text is still unaccomplished. Materials have accumulated, and much preliminary "spade-work" has been done, yet the best of the MSS of the LXX are not in the text. The MSS of the LXX are divided into two groups: (1) the 3rd to the 6th cent. (2) the 9th to the 15th cent. The latter, which is the shakiest, the task of reconstructing the LXX is the most difficult. Clearly no single MS presents the oldest text. That of cod. B, as in the NT, is preserved in the whole LXX. It has been possible that from the 1st to the 3rd cent. (1-2 K), e.g., it has escaped the Occipital defacement which has been introduced in more recent MSS. The LXX is, however, of unequal value, and many MSS are inferior. In some MSS, the text is undoubtedly late, in some earlier. In others, the text is the primitive text. In some MSS, the text is the older and more primitive text.

VII. Notes, Titles, and Order of Texts

In addition to the Heb and Vulgate texts, the LXX includes the books in the Eng. Apoc.

1. Contents except 2 Esd (Pr Man only finds a place among the canopies appended in some MSS of the Ps) besides a 3rd and 4th book of Macc. Swete, Intro. pp. 368-393. See his series of Gr books on the borderland of canonicy the Ps of Sol (found in some cursive and mentioned in the list in cod. A.), the Gr fragments of the Book of En and the ecclesiastical canopies above mentioned. The MSS in quoting freely from these additional books are not necessarily lost; they only perpetuate a tradition inherited from the Jews of Alexandria. Most of the books being original Gr compositions were ipso facto excluded from a place in the Heb Canon. Greater latitude as regards canonicity prevailed at Alexandria; the Pent occupied a place apart, but as regards later books no very sharp line of differentiation between "canonical" and "uncanonical" appears to have been drawn.

Palestinian Jews employed the first word or words of each book of the Pent to serve as its title; Gen e.g. was denoted "in the beginning," and the names of a few of the later books have similar titles. It is to the LXX, through the medium of the Lat VSS, that we owe the familiar descriptive titles, mostly suggested by phrases in the Gr VS. In some books there are traces of rival titles in the Ptolemaic age. Exodus ("outgoing") is also called Ezagqan ("leading out") by Philo and by the Hellenist Ezekiel who gave that name to his drama on the deliverance from Egypt. Philo has also alternative names for Dt—Epinomis ("after-law") borrowed from the title of a pseudo-Platonic treatise, and for Jgs "the Book of Judgments." The last title resembles the Alexandrian name for the books of S and K, viz. the four Books of Kingdoms or the four volumes of the Prophets given in the first place to a partial VS including only the reigns of the first few monarchs. Jerome's influence in this case restored the old Heb names as also in Ch (= Heb "Words of Days," "Diaries"), which in LXX bear the titles Paralipomena, "omissions," as being a supplement to the Books of Reigns.

Another innovation, due apparently to the Gr translators or later editors, was the breaking up of some of the long historical narratives in volumes of more manageable size. In the Heb MSS, S, K, Ch, Ezr-Neh form respectively one book apiece. In the LXX the first three of these collections are subdivided into two volumes as in modern Bibles; an acquaintance with the other arrangement is, however, indicated in cod. B by the insertion at the end of 1 R, 3 R, 1 Ch of the first sentence of the succeeding book, a reminder to the reader that a continuation is to follow. Ezr-Neh, the Gr VS (2 Esd) being a mere translation of the Persian tradition, remains undivided. Originally Ch-Ezr-Neh formed a unit, as was apparently still the case when the oldest Gr VS (1 Esd) was made.

In the arrangement of books there is a radical departure from Palestinian practice. There were three main unalterable divisions in the 4.

3. Bipartition of Books

Ezr-Neh form respectively one book

4. Grouping Heb Bible, representing three stages in and Order the formation of the Canon: Law, Books of Prophets ("Former," i.e. Josh, Jgs, S, K, and "Latter") and "Writings." This arrangement was known at Alexandria at the end of the 2d cent. BC (Sir, prol.) but was not followed. The "Writings" were a miscellaneous collection of history and poetry with one prophetic book (Dan). Alexandrian scholars instrumental in the subsequent literary system, bringing together the books of each class and arranging them with some regard to the supposed chronological order of their authors. The Law, long before the Gr tr, had secured a position of supreme sanctity; this group was kept undisturbed, it kept its precedence and the individual books their order (Lev and Nu, however, exchange places in a few lists). The other two groups are broken up. Ruth is removed from the "Writings" and attached to Jgs. Ch and Ezr-Neh are similar and transferred to the end of the historical group. This group, from chronological considerations, is followed by the poetical and other "Writings," the Prophets coming last (so in B, etc.; in SA prophets predece poets). The internal order of the Gr Hagiographa, which includes quasi-historical (Est, Tob, Jth) and Wisdom books, is variable. Dan now first finds a place among the Prophets. The 12 minor prophets usually precede the major (Jer, Lam, etc.—Westerhausen in order of precedence), and the order of the first half of their company is shuffled, apparently on chronological grounds, Hos being followed by Am, Mic, Joel, Ob, Jon. Jer has his train of satellites, Bar, Lam (transferred from the "Writings") and Ep. Jer; Sus and Bel consort with the other names; a deviation in the order of books is partly attributable to the practice of writing each book on a separate papyrus roll, kept in a cylindrical case; rolls containing kindred matter would tend to be placed in the same bundle, hence hierarchy would be in the two principal parts of this order. We may inquire whether the order of these separate items until the copying of large groups in book-form came into vogue (Swete, Intro., 225 f., 229 f.).

VIII. Characteristics of the Version and Its Component Parts. Notwithstanding the uncertain state of the text, some general characteristics of the VS are patent. It is clear that, like the Heb itself, it is not a single book, but a library. It is a series of VSS and Gr compositions covering well-nigh 400 years and the jurisdiction of different compilers, of whom the hitherto closest approximation to the order of rendering is not an infallible proof that different hands have been employed, since the invariable uniformity in its arrangement of the text and indeed was not the aim of the translators, but may rather to have studied variant readings. If, however, a Heb word is consistently rendered by one Gr word in one version and by another elsewhere, and if each of the two portions has other features peculiar to itself, then, on this basis the two portions are the work of different schools. Among "test-words" which yield results of this kind are "servant" in "Moses the servant of the Lord," "Hosts" in "Lord of Hosts," "Philistines" (Swete, Intro., 317 f.; Thackeray, Grammar of the OT, 7 f.). (2) We may compare the Gr with that of the doxological and apocryphal portions of the Ptolemaic age. The trs were written in the koine or "common" Gr, most of them in the vernacular, a translation into the vernacular exhibiting the new cosmopolitan language was in the making; the abundant dated papyrus enables us to trace its evolution. Some, the Petrie and Hibeh papyri of the 3d cent. BC afford the closest parallels to the Gr Pent. The following centuries witness a tendency to "coherence" or "degeneracy" in the language, of which traces may be found in the Gr of the prophetic books. Beside the vernacular, in the 1st cent. BC was the literature of the "Atticist" school which persistently struggled, with indifferent success, to recover the lost forms and styles of the Gr masterpieces. This style is represented in the LXX by most of the original Gr writings and by the paraphrases of some of the "Writings." (3) We may compare the Gr books as translations, noting in which books license is allowed and which adhere strictly to the Heb. The general movement is in the direction of greater literalism; the later books show an increasing reverence for the letter of the scripture, recognition of the pedantic literalism of the 3d cent. AD in the barbarians of Aquila. Some of the "Writings" were freely handled, because they had not yet obtained canonical rank at the time of tr. Investigation of the evidence lines good to the conclusion that the tr was approximately that of the Heb Canon. The Gr Hexateuch may be placed in the 4th cent. BC; the Prophets mainly in the 3d and 2d cent. BC. The tr of the Pent.

(1) The Hexateuch.—The Gr Pent should undoubtedly be regarded as a unit; the Aristotelian view that the books should be regarded as a single unified work at a level of the "common" vernacular style, combined with faithfulness to the Heb, was retained. It was no longer seen as a "common" vernacular style, combined with faithfulness to the Heb, rarely lapsing into literalism. It set the standard which later translators tried to imitate. The text was more securely established in this period, and substantial variant readings are relatively few. The latter part of Ex is an exception; the Heb had Chapter 1—3 obscure. Free 12—21 11, the probably the anthropomorphisms the Lucian's 2730 They the interesting the in inherited Ezk times, 24-38) the sages being being thus; understand occurs have earlier certain attributable the nearly Pent. nearly Pentecost, the first Jews.—even two-thirds of the Lord."

The last ch (52) is probably a later addition in the Gr. The translator of the second half of Jer also tr² the first half of Bar (1 1—3 8); he was incompetent and his work, if our text may be relied on, affords flagrant examples of Gr words being selected to render Heb words which he did not understand merely because of their similar sound. Ezk is similarly divided, but here the translator of the first half (chs 1—27) undertook the difficult labor of dividing the text, and remained being left to a second worker. An outstanding test is afforded by the renderings of the refrain, "They shall know that I am the Lord." The Gr VS of "the twelve" shows no trace of a similar division; it is chieflv by the Gr of Ezk and is perhaps by the same hand (JTS, IV, 245, 398, 578). But this official VS of the Prophets had probably been preceded by VSS of short passages selected to be read on the festivals in the synagogues. Lectionary requirements occasioned the earliest VSS of the Prophets, possibly of the Pent as well. Two indications of this have been traced. There exists in four MSS a Gr VS of the Psalm of Habakkuk (Hab 3), a chapter which has been a Jewish lesson for Pentecost from the earliest times, independent of and apparently older than the LXX and made for synagogue use. Similarly in Ezk LXX there is a section of sixteen verses (36 24—38) with a style quite distinct from that of its context. This passage was also an early Christian lesson for Pentecost, and its lectionary use was inherited from Judaism. Here the LXX translators seem to have incorporated the older VS, whereas in Hab 3 they rejected it (JTS, XIII, 191; 177). 3 Partial version of the "Former" Prophets (1—3 B).—The Gr style indicates that the history of the monarchy was not all tr² at once. Ulfilas is said to have omitted these books from the Gothic VS as likely to inflame the military temerity of his race; for another reason the Gr translators were at first content with a partial VS. They omitted as unedifying the more disastrous portions, David's sin with the subsequent calamities of his reign and the later history of the divided monarchy culminating in the captivity. Probably the earliest VSS embraced only (1) 1 K (2) 2 R 1 1—11 (David's early reign), (3) 3 R 2 12—21 13 (Solomon and the beginning of the divided monarchy); the third book of "Reigns" opened with the accession of Solomon (as in Lucian's text), not at the point where 1 R opens. These earlier portions are written in a freer style than the rest of the Gr "Reigns," and the Heb original differed widely in places from that tr² in the Eng. Bible (JTS, VIII, 262). 4 The "Writings."—The Hagiographa at the end of the 2d cent. BC were regarded as national lit. (Sir, prol. "the other books of our fathers"), but not as canonical. The translators did not scruple to treat these with great freedom, undeterred by the prohibition against alteration of Scripture (Dt 4: 2; 12: 32). Free paraphrases of extracts were produced, sometimes with legendary additions. A partial VS of Job (one-sixth being omitted) was among the first; Aristean, the historian of the 2d cent. BC, seems to have been the author (Freudenthal, Hellenistische Studien, 1875, 136 ff). The translator was a student of the Gr poets; his VS was probably produced for the general reader, not for the synagogues. Hatch's theory (Essays in B. Gr, 1889, 214) that his text was shorter than ours and was expanded later is untenable; avoidance of anthropomorphisms explains some omissions, the reason for others is obscure. The first Gr narrative of the return from exile (1 Esl) was probably composed by the Gr translators (e.g. the Neh. group round a fable of non-Jewish origin, the story of the 3 youths at the court of Darius. The work is a fragment, the end being lost, and it has been contended by some critics that the VS once embraced the whole of ch-Ezr—Neh (C. T. Torrey, Ezra Studies, Chicago, 1910). The Gr is obviously earlier than Esl B and is of great value for the reconstruction of the Heb. The same translator appears from peculiarities of diction to have produced the edifying treatise on morality in the Heb. Ps 3, 19—22 (Ps 11, 20—22, 1904—6, 1906, 1909, 1912) which was expanded into a longer work. The Heb of this treatise has been traced in a fragmentarily preserved copy, included in the collection of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The Hebrew was the original, the Gr version was made later. The Gr version uses the Heb with great freedom, incorporating extraneous matter (The Three Children, Sus, Bel). The Gr text has been traced to the 2d cent. BC, and is preserved only from ch-Dnl. group round a fable of non-Jewish origin, the story of the 3 youths at the court of Darius. Some of these appear to be derived from a lost Heb collection, others are of purely Gr origin. This translator also knew and imitated the Gr classics; the numerous fragments of iambic and hexameter verse in the tr cannot be accidental (JTS, XIII, 46). The Psalter is the one tr in this category in which liberties have not been taken; in Ps 13 (14) 3 the extracts from other parts of Ps and from Isa included in the B text must be an interpolation possibly based before St. Paul's time (Rom 3 13 ff), or else taken from Rom. The little Ps 151 in LXX, described in the title as an "auto- graph" work of David and as "outside the number," is clearly a late Gr production, perhaps an appendix added after the VS was complete. 5 The latest LXX translations.—The latest VSS included in the LXX are the productions of the Jewish translators of the 2d cent. AD; some books may be rather earlier, the work of pioneers in the new school which advocated strict adherence to the Heb. The books of "Reigns," for instance, were translated by Theodotion, perhaps, or by one of his school; the later portions (2 R 11 2—3 R 2 11, David's downfall, and 3 R 22—1 R end, the downfall of the monarchy) are by one hand, as shown by peculiarities in style, e.g. "I am with child" (2 R 11 5) = "I am with child," a use which is due to a desire to distinguish the longer form of the pronoun 'ānōkhī ("I," also used for "I am") from the shorter 'ānī. A complete VS of Jgs was now probably the "two hands" of the Alexandrian mt 11; the VSs were replaced. Theodotion's Dtl, as above stated, superseded in the Christian church the older VS. A new and complete VS of Ch-Err-Neh was made (Ed B), though the older VS retained its place in the Chalc. on account of the interesting legend imbedded in it; the new VS is here again possibly the work of Theodotion; the numerous transliterations are characteristic of him (Torrey, Ezra Studies; the theory had previously been advanced by Sir H. Howorth). In the Gr Edc we have a specimen of Aquila's style (see McNeile's ed, Cambridge, 1904). Canticles is another late VS.

A marked feature of the whole tr is the scrupulous avoidance of anthropomorphisms and phrases derogatory to the Divine transcendence, thus 2 16, "Now shalt be to him in things pertaining to God" (Heb "for" or "as God"); 15 3, "The Lord is a breaker of battles" (Heb "a Man of war"); 24 10, "They saw the place where the God of Israel stood" (cf "the God of Israel"); ver 11, "Of the elect of Israel not one perished and they were seen in the place of God" (Heb "Upon the nobles . . . He laid not His hand, and they beheld God"). The comparison of God to the rock was common; the words used as idolatrous, as was sometimes the comparison to the sun from fear of sun-worship (Ps 83 [84] 12, "The Lord loves mercy and truth" for Heb "The Lord is a sun and shield"). The sons of God" (Gen 6 2) becomes "the sons of God" in Gr (cf J 2), e.g. slight amplifications, interpretation of difficult words, substitution of Gr for Heb coinage, tr of place-names, see Swete, Intero, 323 ff. Blunders in tr are not uncommon, but the difficulties which these pioneers had to face must be remembered, esp. the palaeographical character of the Heb originals. These were written on flimsy papyrus rolls, in a script, probably in a transitional stage between the archaic and the later square characters; the words were not separated, and the division of the stanzas (nāōa and yōdēh) were also frequently omitted. Add to this the absence at Alexandria, for parts at least of the Scriptures, of any sound tradition as to the meaning. On the other hand the vocalization adopted by the translators, e.g. the confusion of proper names, is of great value in the history of early Sem pronunciation. It must further be remembered that the Sem language most familiar to them was not Heb but Aram, and some mistakes are due to Aram. or even Arab. colloquialism (Swete, Intro, 310).

IX. Salient Differences between Greek and Hebrew Texts. — Differences indicating a Heb original other than the MT affect either the sequence or the subject-matter (of Swete, Intero, 251 ff).

The most extensive discrepancies in arrangement of materials occur in (1) Ex 35—39, the construction of the Tabernacle and the ornaments of its ministers, (2) 3 R 4–11, Solomon's reign, (3) Jer (last half), (4) Prov (end). (1) In Ex 40 the LXX gives precedence to the priests' ordinances, which in the Heb follow the account of the Tabernacle, and omits altogether the altar of incense. The whole section describing the execution of the instructions given in the previous chapters in almost identical form is omitted. The last portions of the Pent and the text had clearly not been finally fixed in the 3rd cent. BC; the section was perhaps absent from the oldest Gr VS. In Ex 20 13–15 cod. B arranges three of the commandments in the Alexandrian order (7, 8, 6), attested in Philo and in the NT. (2) Deliberate rearrangement has taken place in the history of Solomon, and the LXX unquestionably preserves the older text. The narrative of the building of the Temple, like the two of tithing, is one of the clearest examples of editorial revision in the MT (Wellhausen, Hist of Israel, 67, 250, etc.). At the end of 3 R LXX places chs 20 and 21 in their proper order; MT reverses this, interposing the Naboith story in the connected account of the seven wars and justifying the change by a short preface. (3) In Jer the chapter numbers differ from the middle of ch 25 to the end of ch 51, the historical appendix (eh 26) concluding both texts. This is due to the different position assigned to a group of prophecies against the nations: LXX places them in the center, MT at the end. The items in this group are also rearranged. The diversity in order is earlier than the Gr tr; see JTS, IV, 245. (4) The order of some groups of maxims at the end of Prov was not finally fixed at the time of the Gr tr; like Jeremiah's prophecies against the nations, these little groups seem to have circulated as late as the 2d or 1st cent. BC as separate pamphlets. The Ps numbers from 10 to 147 differ by one in the LXX and 146 in the Gr, due to the lines of demarcation between individual pss.

Excluding the end of Ex, striking examples of divergence in the Pent are few. LXX alone preserves Cain's words to his brother, while not preserved in the Pent, or into the fiction (cf 8 8).

2. Subject-Matter

The close of Moses' song appears in an expanded form in LXX (Dt 32 43). Similarly Hannah's song in 1 R 2 7 (originally a warrior's triumph-song) has been rendered more appropriately as a near homily by LXX, with her 8c of words about the answer to prayer, and enlarged by the insertion of a passage from Jer; the changes in both songs may be connected with their early use as canticles. In Josh the larger amount of divergence suggests that this book did not share the peculiar sanctity of the Law. But the books of "Reigns" present the widest differences and the fullest scope for the textual criticism. The LXX here proves the existence of two independent accounts of the time and its events, one of the kingdom; 16 26a–h a second summary of Jehoshaphat's reign (cf 22 41 ff); 4 R 1 18a another summary of Joram's reign (cf 3 1 ff). Conversely in 1 R 17–18, MT has apparently preserved two contradictory accounts of events in David's early history, while LXX presents a shorter and consistent narrative (Swete, Intero, 245 f). An "addition" in LXX of the highest interest appears in 3 R 5 536, where a stanza is put into the mouth of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple: it takes from the "Song-book" (probably the Book of Psalms) the MT gives the stanza in an edited form earlier in the chapter (8 12f); for the reconstruction of the original Heb see JTS, X, 439; XI, 518. The last line proves to be a title, "For the Sabbath—On Alamoth" (i.e. for soprano), showing that the song was set to music for liturgical purposes. In Jer, besides transpositions, the two texts differ widely in the way of excess and defect; the verdict of critics is mainly in favor of the priority of the LXX (Struven, Hist of Jer). The most important differences in the "Writings" see VIII, above; for additional titles to the Ps see Swete, Intero, 250 ff.

A comparison of the two accounts reveals certain striking differences. A total of 47 verses of the account in Mt have no parallel in Lk, while but 4 verses of the latter are wanting in the former. On the side of Lk there are 35 + 17 verses quite lacking in the Sermon of Lk, amounting in all to 52 verses, appear elsewhere distributed throughout the Lukan narrative and in some instances connected with different incidents and circumstances.

These facts give rise to some interesting literary and historical questions. Many of the two distinct discourses dealing with the same general theme but spoken on different occasions, or are they simply different reports of the same discourse. If it be held that the Sermon was delivered but once, which of the aspects of the theme were the essential address? Is the discourse in Mt homogeneous or does it include sayings originally spoken on other occasions and early incorporated in the Sermon?

II. Historicity of the Discourse.—There have been a number of scholars who regard the sayings recorded in Mt and Lk as collections of sayings spoken on different occasions, and maintain that they do not represent any connected discourse ever delivered by Jesus. In their view the Sermon is either a free compilation by the evangelists or a product of apostolic teaching and oral tradition.

The prevailing opinion among NT scholars is, however, that the sayings represent a single historical discourse. The Sermon as recorded in Mt bears such marks of inner unity of theme and exposition as to give it a kind of uniqueness. Jesus should deliver a discourse of this kind accords with the circumstances of the time. His ministry. Besides, we know that in His teaching He was accustomed to speak to the multitudes at length, and we should expect Him to give early in His ministry some formal exposition of the kingdom, the burden of His first preaching. Such a marked interruption of important discourses should have been preserved is altogether probable.

On the other hand, it may be conceded that the accounts need not necessarily be regarded as a full or exact reports of the discourse but possibly and probably much summaries of its theme and substance. Our Lord was accustomed to teach at length, but this discourse is more closely connected in a few paragraphs. While His popular teaching was marked by a unique wealth of illustration the Sermon is largely gnomic in form. His general style and the gravity of the usual concrete and illustrative elements suggest the probability of condensation in transmission. Moreover, it is hardly probable that such an address of Jesus would be recorded at the time of its delivery or would be remembered in detail.

There is evidence that the account in Mt 5-7 contains some sayings not included in the original discourse. This view is confirmed by the fact that a number of the sayings are given in Luke's Gospel in settings that appear more original. It is easy to understand that other occasions may have become associated with the Sermon in apostolic teaching and thus handed down with it, but if the discourse were well known in a specific form, such as that recorded in Mt, it is hardly conceivable that Luke or anyone else would have picked it up and distributed the fragments or associate them with other incidents, as some of the sayings recorded in both Gospels are found associated in Lk.

III. Time and Occasion.—Both Matthew and Luke agree that the delivery of the Sermon to the first half of the Galilean ministry. The former apparently places it a little earlier than the latter, in whose account it follows immediately after the appointment of the twelve apostles. While the time cannot be accurately determined, the position assigned to the Sermon in both Gospels is approximately correct and is supported by the internal evidence. Portions of the Sermon imply that the opposition of the religious teachers was already in evidence, but it clearly belongs to the first year of Our Lord's ministry because to the situation in Galilee serious. On the other hand, the occasion was sufficiently late for the popularity of the new Teacher to have reached its climax. In the early Galilean ministry Jesus confined His teaching to the synagogues, but later, when the great crowds pressed about Him, He resorted to open-air preaching after the manner of the Sermon. Along with the growth in His popularity there is observed a change in the character of His teaching. In the Sermon on the Mount, we find Him teaching in the direction and fits naturally into the circumstances to which it has been assigned. Luke probably gives the true historical occasion, i.e. the appointment of the Twelve.

IV. Scene.—According to the evangelists, the scene of the delivery of the Sermon was one of the mountains or foothills surrounding the Galilean plain. Probably one of the hills lying N.W. of Capernaum is meant, for shortly after the Sermon we find Jesus and His disciples entering that city. There are no data justifying a closer identification of the place. There is a tradition dating from the time of the Crusades that identifies the mount of the Sermon with Karm Hoffin, a two-peaked hill on the road from Capernaum to Tiberias to which no means of confirming this late tradition and the identification is rather improbable.

V. The Hearers.—The Sermon was evidently addressed, primarily, to the disciples of Jesus. This is the apparent meaning of the account of both evangelists. According to Matthew, Jesus, ‘seeing the multitudes’ . . . ‘went up into the mountain: and when he had sat down, his disciples came unto him: and he opened his mouth and taught them.’ The separation of the multitudes from the disciples is an instance of technical procedure. Jesus’ words to the disciples seem clear, and the distinction appears intentional on the part of the writer. However, it must be observed that in the closing comments on the Sermon the presence of the multitudes is implied. In Luke’s account the distinction is less marked. Here the order of events is: the night of prayer in the mountain, the choice of the twelve apostles, the descent with them into the presence of the multitude of His disciples and a great number of people of Judaea, Jesus and the coast country, the healing of great numbers, and, finally, the address. While the continued presence of the multitudes is implied, the plain meaning of the words, ‘And he lifted up his eyes on them and said, . . .’ is that His address was intended esp, for the latter. This view is borne out by the address itself as recorded in both accounts. Observe the use of the second person in the reference to suffering, poverty and persecution for the sake of the Son of Man. Further the sayings concerning the ‘salt of the earth’ and ‘the light of the world’ could hardly have been addressed to any but His disciples. The term disciple, however, was doubtless employed in the broader sense by both evangelists. This is clearly the case in Matthew’s account of the appointment to which the Twelve had not yet been appointed.

VI. The Message: A Summary.—It is hardly proper to speak of the Sermon on the Mount as a digest of the teaching of Jesus, for it does not include any reference to some very important subjects discussed by Our Lord on other occasions in the course of His ministry. It is, however, the most comprehensive and important collection or summary of His sayings that is preserved to us in the gospel record. For, as in the case of the Sermon on the Mount, the words in Christian thought the first place of esteem among all the NT messages. As an exposition of the ideal life and the program of the new society which Jesus proposed to create, its interpretation is of the deepest interest and the profoundest concern.
Sermon on Mount

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

It may assist the student of the Sermon in arriving at a clear appreciation of the argument and the salient features of the discourse if the whole is first considered in outline. There is some degree of opinion among scholars as to the precise nature of the outline, but generally the following analysis and, consequently various outlines have been presented by different writers. Those of C. W. Votaw in BDB, Canon Gore in The Sermon in the Mount, and H. C. Kline in The Ethics of Jesus are worthy of special mention. The following arrangement of the Sermon as presented by Matthew is given as the basis of the present discussion.

1. Analysis

1. The subjects of the kingdom (5 3-16).
   a. The quality of character essential to happiness and influence (vs 3-12).
   b. The higher fulfillment of the new righteousness illustrated by a comparison of its principles with the Mosaic Law as currently taught and practiced (vs 21-48).
   i. (1) The higher law of brotherhood judgements ill will as murder (vs 21-26).
   ii. (2) The higher law of purity condemns lust as adultery (vs 27-32).
   iii. (3) The higher law of truth forbids oaths as perjury and evil (vs 33-37).
   v. (5) The higher law of love demands universal goodwill as evidence of a supernatural quality like that of the Father (vs 45-48).

2. The new righteousness. Its motives as applied to religious (practical and social) duties, or the principles of conduct (6 1-7 12).
   a. Reverence toward the Father essential in all acts of worship (vs 1-18).
      i. (1) In all duties (ver 1).
      ii. (2) In unwaveringness (vs 2-4).
      iii. (3) In prayer (vs 5-15).
      iv. (4) In fasting (vs 16-18).
   b. Loyalty toward the Father fundamental in all social relations (7 1-12).
      i. (1) Critical estimate of self instead of censorious judgment of others (vs 1-5).
      ii. (2) The communication and communication of spiritual values (vs 6-8).
      iii. (3) Kindness toward others in all things before the Father's kindness toward all His children (vs 7-12).

3. Love toward the Father dynamic in all social relations (7 1-12).
   a. Critical estimate of self instead of censorious judgment of others (vs 1-5).
   b. Communication and communication of spiritual values (vs 6-8).
   c. Kindness toward others in all things before the Father's kindness toward all His children (vs 7-12).

   a. The two gates and the two ways (vs 13-14).
   b. The tests of character (vs 15-27).

(1) Characteristics of the subjects (5 3-12).

The Sermon opens with the familiar Beatitudes. Unlike many reformers, Jesus begins with the exposition of His program with a promise of happiness, with a blessing rather than a curse. He thus connects His program directly with the hopes of His hearers, for the central features in the current Messianic conception were deliverance and happiness. But the conditions of happiness proposed were in strong contrast with those in the popular thought. Happiness does not consist in being Jesus, in what one possesses, in lands and houses, in social position, in intellectual attainments, but in the wealth of the inner life, in moral strength, in self-control, in spiritual insight, in the character one is able to form within himself and in the service he is able to render to his fellowmen, like character, is a by-product of right living. It is presented as the fruit, not as the object of endeavor.

It is interesting to note that character is the secret of happiness both for the individual and for society. There are two groups of Beatitudes. The first four deal with personal qualities: humility, penitence, self-control, desire for righteousness. These are the sources of inner peace. The second group deals with social qualities: meekness toward others, purity of heart or reverence for personality, peace-making or solicitude for others, self-sacrificing loyalty to righteousness. These are the sources of social rest. The blessings of the kingdom are social as well as individual.

(2) Vocation of the subjects (5 13-16).

Men of the qualities described in the Beatitudes are called "the salt of the earth," the light of the world." They are not happy, but they are not on that account to withdraw from the world. On the contrary, by the leaven of character and the light of example they are to help others in the appreciation and the attainment of the ideal life. By their character and deeds they are to make their influence a force for good in the lives of men. In this sense the men of the kingdom are the salt of the earth, the light of the world. See BEATITUDE.

(3) The relation of the new righteousness to the Mosaic Law (5 17-48).

(a) Relation defined (5 17-20): The qualities of character thus set before the citizens of the kingdom were so surprising and revolutionary as to suggest the inquiry: What is the relation of the new teaching to the Mosaic Law? This Jesus defines as continuity and fulfillment. His hearers are not to think that He has come to destroy the law. On the contrary, He has come to fulfill and fulfill. The old law is imperfect, but God does not despair of what is imperfect. Men and institutions are judged, not by the level of present attainment, but by character and direction. The law moves in the right direction and is so valuable that those who violate even its least precepts have a very low place in the kingdom.

The new righteousness then does not set aside the law or offer an easier religion, but one that is more exacting. The kingdom is concerned, not so much with ceremonies and external rules, as with motives and social virtues. It abrogates the law, but not its social virtues, purity, honesty and generosity. So much higher are the new standards of righteousness that Jesus is constrained to warn His hearers that to secure even a place in the kingdom, their righteousness must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees.

(b) The relation illustrated (5 21-48): In illustration of the deeper meaning of the new righteousness and its relation to the Mosaic Law, Jesus proceeds to deal in detail with the precepts of the old moral law, deepening it as He proceeds into the higher law of the kingdom. In each instance the standard of judgment is raised and the individual precepts are deepened into spiritual principles that call for perfect fulfillment. In considering specific precepts no account is taken of overt acts, for in the new righteousness they are impossible. All acts are treated as expressions of the inner life. The law is carried back to the impulse and the will to sin, and these are judged as in the old law the completed acts were judged. Therefore all anger and lust in the heart are strictly enjoined. Likewise every word is raised to a sacredness equal with that of the most solemn religious vow or oath. Finally, the instinct to avenge is entirely forbidden, and universal love is that of the Father, not the fundamental law of the new social life. Thus Jesus does not abrogate any law but interprets its precepts in terms that call for a deeper and more perfect fulfillment.
(4) Motives and principles of conduct (6 1—7 12).

—The relation of His teaching to the law defined, Jesus proceeds to explain the motives and principles of conduct as applied to religious and social duties.

(a) In worship (6 1—18): In the section 6 1—12 there is one motive that the Father would have His children look toward God. He is at once the source and the aim of life. Therefore worship aims alone at Divine praise. If acts of worship are performed before men to be seen of them there is no reward for the Father. In this Jesus is passing no slight on public worship. He Himself instituted the Lord's Supper and authorized the continuance of the rite of baptism. Such acts have their proper value. His censure is aimed at the love of ostentation so often associated with them. The root of ostentation is selfishness, and selfishness has no part in the new righteousness. Any selfish desire for the approval of men thwart the purpose of all worship. The object of almsgiving, of prayer, or of fasting is the expression of brotherly love, communion with God or spiritual enrichments. The possibility of any of these is excluded by the presence of the desire for the approval of men. It is not merely a Divine fiat but one of the deeper laws of life which decrees that the only possible reward for the acts performed with such motives is the cheap approval of men as well as the impoverishment of the inner life.

(b) In life's purpose (6 19—34): The same principle holds, says Jesus, in the matter of life's purpose. There is only one treasure worthy of man's search, only one object worthy of his highest endeavor, and that is the kingdom of God and His righteousness. Besides, there can be no division of aim. God will be first and only. Material benefits can be set by Christ. With any lower aim the new righteousness would be no better than that of the Gentiles. And such a demand is reasonable, for God's gracious providence is ample guaranty that He will supply all things needful for the accomplishment of the purposes He has planned for our lives. So in our vocations as in our worship, God is supreme and effectual motive.

(c) In social relations (7 1—12): Then again brothership of the Father and the supreme object of desire for all men, great reverence is due toward others. Considerate helpfulness must replace the censorious spirit. For the same reason men will have too great reverence for spiritual values to cast them carelessly to the winds. Therefore in all His acts and all personal and social conduct is judged by the quality of the motives.

(d) In religious teaching (7 13—27):—(a) The narrow way (7 13—14): In the hortatory conclusion (7 13—27), Jesus first of all warns His hearers that the way into the kingdom is a narrow one. It might seem that it ought to be different; that the way of destruction should be narrow and there is wail way to life broad and easy, but it is not so. The way to all worthy achievement is the narrow way of self-control, self-sacrifice and infinite pains. Such is the way to the righteousness of the kingdom, the supreme object of our fathers. "No one is "I", and straitened the way, that leadeth unto life." (b) The tests of character (7 15—27): The test of the higher fulfilment is fruit. By their fruits alone the subjects of the kingdom will be known. In the presence of the Father there is no room for those who bring nothing but the leaves of empty professions. The kingdom is for those alone who do His will. The test of righteousness is illustrated in concluding with a beautiful parable the five Builders. The difference between the two is essentially one of character. It is largely a question of fundamental honesty. The one is superficial and thinks only of that which is visible to the eye and builds only for the present. The other is honest enough to build well where only God can see, to build for others and for all time. Thus he builds also for himself. The character of the builder is revealed by the building.

VII. Principles.—The Sermon on the Mount is neither the golden rule, nor are the set of fixed legal regulations. It is, instead, a statement of the principles of life essential in a normal society. Such a society is possible in so far as men attain the character and live the life expressed in these principles. Their correct interpretation is therefore important.

Many of the sayings of the Sermon are metaphorical or proverbial statements, and are not to be understood in a literal or legal sense. In them Jesus was illustrating principles in concrete terms. Their interpretation literally and strictly is contrary to the intention and spirit of Jesus. So interpreted, the Sermon becomes in part a visionary and impractical ideal. But rather the principles behind the concrete instances are to be sought and applied anew to the life of the present, as Jesus applied them to the life of His own time.

The following are some of the leading ideas and principles underlying and expressed in the Sermon:

(1) Character is the sum of strength. Men of the qualities described in the Beatitudes are called "blessed." Happiness consists, not in external blessings, but in the inner peace of a normal life. The virtues of the Beatitudes are also the elements of strength. Righteousness, self-control, purity and loyalty are the genuine qualities of real strength. Men of such qualities are to inherit the earth because they are the only ones strong enough to possess and use it.

(2) Righteousness is grounded in the inner life. Character is something not imposed from without but a life that unfolds from within. The hope of a perfect morality and a genuine fulfilment of the law lies in the creation of a sound inner life. Therefore the inner acts and all personal and social conduct is judged by the quality of the motives.

(3) The inner life is a unity. The spiritual nature is all of a piece, so that a moral slump at one point imperils the whole life. Consequently, all spiritual asceticism, even to the extent of extreme mortification, is a dangerous experiment. The right eye casteth thy stumbling block out, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not thy whole body be cast into Gehenna (Mt 5 29).n)

(4) Universal love is the fundamental social law. It is the dynamic principle of true character and right conduct. In this respect, at least, the perfection of the Father is set as the standard for men. Kindliness in disposition, in word and in set is an obligation binding on all. We may not feel like it, but we must be set to do good even to our enemies. In this the supernatural quality of the Christian life may be known.

(5) The Sermon is the very heart of the Father's teaching. It is the center of life. Character and life exist in and for fellowship with the Father. All work is to be directed toward God. His service is the supreme duty. His perfection is the standard of character. His goodness the ground of universal love. Given this fact, all the essentials of religion and life follow as a matter of course. God is Father to all men are brothers. God is Father, all duties are sacred. God is Father, infinite patience is the heart of the world and life is of infinite worth.

(6) Fulfilment of the final promise. The blossoms of promises must ripen into the fruit of abiding character. The leaves of empty professions have no value in the eyes of the Father. Doers and thinkers of things that ni       dle, and endurance is the final test. The life of perfect character is the narrow way through the ages. See further ETHIC; ETHICS OF JESUS; KINGDOM OF GOD.

LITERATURE.—The standard comm. and Lives of Christ. Among the most important encyclopaedic ars are those of C. W. Votaw in DBB, James Moffatt.
SERMON ON THE PLAIN, THE: This title is sometimes given to the discourse recorded in Lk 6:20-49, because according to the Gospel (ver 17) it was delivered on a plain at the foot of the mountain. In many respects this address resembles the one recorded in Mt 5-7, but in general the two are so different as to make it uncertain whether they are different reports of the same discourse or reports of different addresses given on different occasions. See SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

In contrast with the Sermon on the Mount which is assigned a place early in the Galilean ministry, and prior to the appointment of the Twelve, that event is generally represented as the occasion of this discourse. If the two accounts are reports of the same address the setting of Lk is probably the historical one.

The Sermon of Lk includes a little less than one-third of the matter recorded in the Sermon on the Mount. The Lukan discourse includes 1. The Topic, that event which is represented as the occasion of this discourse. If the two accounts are reports of the same address the setting of Lk is probably the historical one.

length of two meters. It is usually black and much resembles the American black snake, Zamenis constrictor. Like all species of Zamenis, these are harmless. Other common harmless snakes are Zamenis daboia, Tropidonota tessellataus which is often found in pools and streams.

Cerastes melanocephalus, the small, nearly toothless snake with the crown of the head coal black. Among the somewhat poisonous snakes, a very common one is Coelopeltis mosepsulana, Arab. n'hosheih, 'afa, which is about two meters long, as large as the black snake. It is uniformly reddish brown above, paler below. Another be snake is Fenatikhis schokari.

al-baitay ul-barakat, which is about two meters long, as large as the black snake. It is uniformly reddish brown above, paler below. Another be snake is Fenatikhis schokari.

Arab. n'hosheih, 'afa, which is about two meters long, as large as the black snake. It is uniformly reddish brown above, paler below. Another be snake is Fenatikhis schokari.

As stated above, all of the Heb and Gr names except kippōs, which occurs only in Isa 34 15, are used of snakes actually or supposedly poisonous. This absence of discrimination between poisonous and non-poisonous kinds makes determination of the species difficult. Further, but few of the Heb names are from roots whose meanings are clear, and there is little evident difference in name to Arab. names to Arab. names.

(1) The commonest Heb word is נָחָשׁ, nāshāh, which occurs 31 t and seems to be a generic word for serpent. While not always clearly indicating a venomous serpent, it frequently does: e.g. Ps 68 4; 140 3; Prov 33 32; Ecc 10 8.11, Isa 14 29; Jer 8 17; Am 5 18. According to BDB it is perhaps from an onomatopoetic נָחַשׁ, nāshāh, "to hiss." It may be akin to the Arab. خَنَصَ, hanash, which means "snake" in general, or esp. the black snake. Cf. Ir-nahash (Ch 4 12); Nahash (a) (1 S 11 1; 2 S 10 2), (b) (2 S 27 17), (c) (2 S 17 25); also עָנָשׁ, mānashūth, "copper" or "brass"; and עָנָשׁ, mānashūth (Nehustah), the brazen serpent (2 K 18 4). But BDB derives the last two words from a different root.

(2) נָעִי, na'āy, apparently from נָעַפ, na'âph, "to burn," is used of the fiery serpents of the wilderness. In Nu 21 8, it occurs in the sing.: "Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a standard." In ver 6 we have נָעִי נָעִי נָעִי נָעִי, na'āy na'āy na'āy na'āy, "fiery serpents"; in Dt 8 15 the same in the sing.: נָעִי, na'āy, nāshāh na'āy, also tr."fiery serpents"; in Isa 14 29; 30 6 we have נָעִי נָעִי נָעִי נָעִי, na'āy na'āy na'āy na'āy, "fiery flying serpent." The same word in the pl. נָעִי נָעִי נָעִי נָעִי, na'āy na'āy na'āy na'āy, is tr."seraphim" in Isa 6 2.6.

(3) נַעְרָי, na'ārī, elsewhere "dragon" or "sea-creature," (q.v.), is used of the serpents into which the gods of Aaron and the magicians were transformed (Ex 7 9.10.12), these serpents being designated by נַעְרָי in Ex 4 3; 7 15. Taninn is rendered, "serpent" (AV "dragon") in Dt 32 33, "Their spears of poison of serpents," and Ps 91 13, "The young lion and the serpent shalt thou trample under foot." On the other hand, nāshāh seems in three passages to refer to a mythical creature or dragon: "His hand hath pierced the swift serpent" (Job 26 13); "In that day Jeh . . . will punish leviathan the swift serpent and leviathan the crooked serpent" (Isa 27 1); ". . . they will be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and it shall bite them" (Am 4 3).

(4) נִזֹּה, nizzôh, is tr."crawling things" in Dt 32 24 (AV "serpents") and in Mic 7 17 (AV "worms").

(5) נָעִי, nāy, occurs only in Ps 140 3, where it is tr."adder" (LXX δράκων, asps, Vulg aspis), "adders' poison is under their lips." It has been suggested (BDB) that the reading should be נִזָּה, nizzôh, "adder" (q.v.). The word is in the previous line is nābāsh.

(6) נָעֶה, na'ēh, like most of the other names of a word of uncertain etymology, occurs 6 t and it is tr."asp," except in Ps 91 13. "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder." According to Liddell and Scott, aspis is the name of the Egyptian cobra, Ναϊα ἱαταί, which is not included in (2) above, because it does not certainly appear to have been applied to any of the snakes which are encountered are harmless. Aspis occurs in Rom 3 13 in a paraphrase of Ps 140 3 (see (5) above), it occurs frequently, though not uniformly, in LXX for (2), (5), (6), (7), (8) and (10).

(7) נֶפֶשׁ, nēfset, or נֶפֶשׁ, nēfseth, "coptacatre," occurs in Prov 23 32. At the last it biteth like a serpent [nābāsh], and stingeth like an adder[ xiphtēn]. In Isa 11 8; 59 5, and Jer 8 17, ARV has "adder," while AV has "coptacatre" and ERV has "basilisk.

(8) נֶפֶשׁ, nēfset, or נֶפֶשׁ, nēfseth, "coptacatre," occurs in Prov 23 32. At the last it biteth like a serpent [nābāsh], and stingeth like an adder[ xiphtēn]. In Isa 11 8; 59 5, and Jer 8 17, ARV has "adder," while AV has "coptacatre" and ERV has "basilisk.

(9) נֶפֶשׁ, nēfset, "shyphilōn, occurs only in Gen 49 17: "Dan shall be a serpent [nābāsh] in the way. An adder [ kēfipēnōn] in the path. That biteth the horse's heels. So that his rider falleth backward."

This has been thought to be Cerastes cornutus, on the authority of Tristram (NNB), who says that the serpent in the path it will attack the passer-by, while most snakes will glide away at the approach of a person or large animal. He also that his horse was much frightened at seeing one of these serpents coiled up in a camel's footprint. The word is perhaps akin to the Arab. سُفَع, suff, or حَرَطَفَ, ḥaraf, "suff" which denotes a spotted and deadly snake.

(10) נֶפֶשׁ, nēfset, "epheh," is found in Job 30 6; Isa 30 6; 59 5, and in EV is uniformly tr."viper." It is the same as the Arab. نِفَحَ، nēfah, "a'qa, which is usually tr."viper," though the writer has never found anyone who could tell what snake the name belongs. In Arab. as in Heb a poisonous snake is always understood.

(11) נֶפֶשׁ, nēfset, kippōs, ARV "dart-snake," ERV "arrowsnake," AV "great owl," only in Isa 34 15. "There shall the dart-snake make her nest, and lay, and hatch, and gather under her shade; yes, there shall the kites be gathered, every one with her mate." This is the concluding verse in a vivid picture of the desolation of Edom. The renderings "dart-snake" and "arrowsnake" rest on the authority of Bochart, but LXX has ἐχίνα, echinas, "hedgehog," and Vulg ericus, "hedgehog." The rendering of AV "great owl" seems preferable to the others, because the words "make her nest, and lay, and hatch them under her shades" are as a whole quite inapplicable to a mammal or to a reptile. The derivation from θηρ, ὑγιαῖς; cf. Arab. ʾḥāṣ, ʾḥāṣ, "to spring," "to dart," suits it; it is true, a snake, and not a hedgehog, but may also suit an owl. Finally, the next word in Isa 34 15 is "kites," מִיִּים, δαργάθ; cf. Arab. ʾḥāṣ, ʾḥāṣ, ʾḥāṣ, "to dart.

See BITTERN; OWL; PORCUPINE.

(12) ὁπίς, a general term for "serpent," occurs in numerous passages of the NT and LXX, and is fairly equivalent to ναῦθας.

(13) ἀσίς, aspis, occurs in the NT only in Rom 3 13 | to Ps 140 3. See under (5) ἄσιασθίν (6). Then found in LXX for these words, and also for ἐχίνος (Isa 30 6).

(14) ἐρίξαω, ἐχίνα, occurs in Acts 28 3. "A viper came out . . . and fastened on his [Paul's] hand," and 4 t in the expression "offspring [AV generation]" (cf. Job 26 13, 27 10, 28 20, 30 26, 37 18; Hengstenberg's note supra). In LXX, for these verbs, and also for ἐχίνος (Isa 30 6).

(15) ἐφέρον, ἐρέπτην, "creeping thing," AV "serpent," is found in Jas 3 7.

That the different Heb and Gr names are used without clear distinction seen from several examples of the employment of two different names in t expressions:

Their poison is like the poison of a serpent [ναῦθας]; they are like the deaf adder [πεθεν] that stoppeth her ear (Ps 38 4).

They have sharpened their tongue like a serpent [ναῦθας]; Adders' [πεθενιμι] poison is under their lips (Ps 140 3).

For, behold, I will send serpents [πεθενιμι], adders [ἰχθυοκούναμα], among you, which will not be charmed; and they shall bite you, saith Jeh (De 8 15, 20).

They shall lick the dust like a serpent [ναῦθας]; like crawling things of the earth [τῇ ἐξοχῇ οἰκονομίαν] and wormwood shall be the dwelling places of their close places (Mic 7 17).

He should teach the poison of asp [πηθήν]: The viper's [ἐχίνος] tongue shall slay him (Job 30 16).

"Their wine is the poison of serpents [καμαλίμαμ], and the venom of adders [ἰχθυοκούναμα], the deaf adder's (Dt 8 15).

And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp [πηθήν], and the weaned child shall put his hand on the adder's [ἰχθυοκούναμα] den" (1sa 11 8). See also (8) and (9) above.

Most of the Bib. references to serpents are of a figurative nature, and they usually imply poisonous qualities. The wicked (Ps 66 4), the persecutor (Ps 140 4), and the enemy (Jer 8 17) are likened to venomous serpents. The effects of wine are compared to the bites of serpents (Prov 23 32). Satan is a serpent (Gen 3; Rev 12 9; 20 2). The term "serpent" (either as a unit or as a group) is applied to Judas the Baptist to the Pharisees and Sadducees (Mt 3 7) or to the multitudes (Lk 3 7) who came to hear him; and by Jesus to the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 12 34; 23 33). Dan is a "serpent" in the way of the horse's head (Gen 44 17).

Serpents are among the terrors of the wilderness (Dt 8 15; Isa 30 6). Among the signs accompanying believers is that "they shall take up serpents" (Mk 16 18; cf.Acts 28 5). It is said of him that trusts in Jeh: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: The young lion and the serpent shalt thou trample under foot" (Ps 91 13).

In the millennium, "the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the adder's den" (Isa 11 8) The serpent is subtle (Gen 3 1; 2 Cor 11 3); wise (Mt 10 16); accused (Gen 3 14); eats dust (Gen 3 14; Isa 65 25; Mic 7 17). The adder is deaf (Ps 58 4). The serpent lurks in unexpected places (Gen 49 17; Eccl 10 8; Am 5 19). Serpents may be charmed (Ps 58 5; Eccl 10 11; Jer 8 17). Among four wonderful things is "the way of a serpent upon a rock" (Prov 30 19).

SERPENT, BRAZEN, בֹּשָׁן. See NEHEMIAH.

SERPENT-CHARMING. -charm'ing: Allusion to this art, widely practised by the ancients (see references in DB, s.v.; esp. Bochart, Hieron., III, 161, 164, etc), as by modern Orientalists, is found in Ps 68 5; Ex 31 11; Jer 8 17; Sir 13 13, perhaps in Jas 3 7. The skill displayed in taming snakes, often without removing the poison fangs, is very surprising. Bruce, Davy and other travelers give striking illustrations. See esp. the interesting account of serpent-charming in Hengstenberg's Egypt and the Books of Moses, ET, 100-104.

SERPENT, CROOKED, krook'ed: With reference to the constellation round the North Pole, in the latter part of the passage, AV "serpent," is changed in RV to "swift serpent," in "gliding" or "slithering." See Astronomy, 11, 1.

SERPENT, FIERY. See Serpent, 3, (2).

SERPENT WORSHIP, wū'ship: Traces of this superstition are thought by certain critics to be discernible in the religion of Israel. Stade mentions that W. R. Smith supposed the serpent to be the totem of the house of David (Geschichte, 1, 465). H. P. Smith says: "We know of a Serpent's Stone near Jerusalem, which was the site of a sanctuary (1 K 10 19) and this sanctuary was dedicated to Jeh" (Hist of OT, 238, 240). Special reliance is placed on the narrative of the bruised serpent, which, according to Hengsten-kiah is recorded to have destroyed as leading to idolatry (2 K 18 4). "In that case," says H. P. Smith, "we must treat the Nehushtan as a veritable idol of the people of Israel, which had been worshipped in the temple area (Jer 5 24, etc); and its execution, Serpent worship is so widespread that we should be surprised not to find traces of it in Israel" (ut supra). In the same line, see G. H. Gray, Nu, 275-76. The fancifulness of these deductions is obvious. See NEHEMIAH. JAMES O'NEILL

SERUG, se'rug (Σέρογ, st'ērōq; Σερογ, Scroth): Son of Reu and great-grandfather of Abraham (Gen 11 20; f 1 Ch 1 26; Lk 3 35).

SERVANT, sərv'vant (ἀσθενής, 'ebhēth; δοῦλος, doulos): A very common word with a variety of meanings, all implying a greater or less degree of inferiority and want of freedom: (1) The most frequent usage is as the equivalent of "slave" (q.v.), with its various shades in position (Gen 9 25; 24 9; Ex 21 5; Mt 10 24; Lk 17 7), and often; but also a hired workman where "hired servant" translates Heb and Gr expressions which differ from the above. (2) An attendant in the service of someone, as Joshua was the "servant," RV "minister," of Moses (Nu 11 28). (3) In a term of respectful self-deprecation: referring to one's self, "thy servant" or "your servant" is used in place of the personal pronoun of the first person: (a) in the presence of superiors (Gen

A century and a half had passed since the great days of Isaiah in Jerusalem. The world had vastly changed during those long decades when politicians had planned, armies had fought back and forth, and tribes and nations had lost or won in the struggle for existence, place and power. The center of the world had changed—for Assyria had gone to its long home, and the city claiming pre-eminence was not Nineveh but Babylon.

Nowhere perhaps had time laid a heavier hand than on the city ofJerusalem and the country of Judah. For city and land had come to desolation, and the inhabitants of the country had become familiar with the strange sights and sounds of Babylonia, whether they had been carried by their conquerors. Many had found graves in the land of the exile, and new generations had arisen who had no memory of the hill country of their fathers. It is the situation of these captive Jews in Babylonia which is reflected and they who are addressed at the waning of the long night of captivity by the stirring message recorded in Isa chs 40-66 (leaving out of account here disputed passages in chs 40-66).

The more one studies the problem of the authorship of these chapters, the more likely does it seem that their author penned them 150 years before the time with which they are usually connected. It is obviously impossible to treat that problem by a live theory, but one may sum up the arguments by saying that in theological ideas, in style, and use of words they show such differences from the assured productions of Isaiah's pen as to point to a different authorship. And the great argument, the argument which carries the most weight to the author of this article, is that these late chapters are written from the standpoint of the city.

The exile is assumed in what is said. These chapters do not prophesy the exile, do not say it is coming, they all the time speak as though it had come. The exilic is not that an exile is to be, but beginning with the fact that the exile already is, it foretells deliverance. Now of course it is conceivable that God might inspire a man to put himself forward 150 years, and with some grace to prophesy the life, knowing their circumstances as a background of what he said, but it is improbable to the last degree. To put it in plain, almost gruff, English, it is not the way God did things. The prophet's message was always primarily a message to his own age. Then there is an ease in the chapters themselves that Isaiah was their author. And having once been so that it was supposed they were by Isaiah—placed so through causes we do not know—the fact that in speaking of passages from these chapters NT authors referred to them by a name the people would recognize, is not a valid argument that they meant to teach anything as to their authorship. The problem has been settled by NT times.

As Professor Davidson has suggested, has a parallel in the Book of Job, each the production of a great mind, each from an author we do not know (cf. Isaiah).

Out of the deep gloom of the exile—when the Jew was a man without a country, when it seemed as if the nation's sins had murdered hope—

The out of this time comes the voice most full of gladness and abounding hope—

The prophet of the Exile of all the voices from the OT life. In the midst of the proud, confident civilization of Babylonia, with its teeming wealth and exhaustless splendor, came a man who dared to speak for Jehovah—a man of such power to see reality that to him Babylonia was already doomed, and he could summon the people to prepare for God's deliverance.

In recent criticism, esp. in Germany, there has been a strong tendency to assign the last chapters of this section to a different author, a later date and a different author. In the background it is claimed is not Bab; it is the Exile which is the author's home and which he addresses when at home in Judaea, and in which one or more of the passages are said to be witness to the fact that the temple at Jerusalem seems to be standing, and that the Jewish theocracies need not be disputed, but it seems to me that again and again in them one can find the hand of Second Isaiah. Then undoubtedly the author quotes from previous prophecies which we can recognize, and the suggestion that some of the difficult passages may be quotations from other older prophecies which are not preserved to us, I think an exceedingly good one. The quotation of passages from the Book of Hosea and the Ezekiel prophesy of the prophet's feeling of the need of the people, would seem to me not at all unnatural. If a later hand was responsible for some utterances in the latter part of the section, it seems to me fairly clear that most of it is from the hand of the great unknown prophet and has not been Shirred.

The questions regarding the Servant Passages as affecting the unity of the book will be treated later.

The first part of this section vividly contrasts Jeh and the idols worshipped with such splendor and ceremony. All the resources of irony and satire are used to give point and effect to the contrast. Cyrus the Median conqueror is already on the throne, and he is Jehovah's instrument in the deliverance. The idols are described in process of manufacture; they are addressed in scornful apostrophe, they are seen carried away helpless. On the other side Jeh, with illimitable foresight and detached wisdom, sees the deliverance, and reveals the future. They know and reveal nothing. He brings to pass what He has planned. They do nothing. Not only the idols but Babylon itself is made the victim of satire—and the prophet hurls a taunt song at the proud but impotent city.

Israel—the people of Jeh—the elect of God—is given the prophet's message. The past is called up as a witness to Jeh's dealings. His righteousness—His faithfulstness to His people—shall not fail. They are wretched, with a meekness that is felt, and out of it community salvation is provided. And with joy of this salvation from exile and from sin the book rings and rings. The Zion of the restored Israel is pictured with all the color of glory and richness of imagery at the prophet's command. And it is the one thing which, if we have a world-mission, It is to fall upon all lands. It is to minister salvation to all races of men.

But back of and under these pictures of great hope is the prophet's sense of his people's sin and their struggle with it. In chs 40, 41, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64 this comes out clearly. And the mood of these chapters is expressed as well. And feeling out of the deep things of the Servant passages came. There is no need to insist that the chapters as they stand are in the order
The word "servant," as applied to servants of God, is not an unfamiliar one to readers of the OT. It is applied to different individuals and by Jeremiah to the nation (cf Jer Servant— 30 10; 46 27); but its message is on the whole so distinct and complete in Second Isa that we can study it without any further reference to previous usage.

The "servant" first appears in Isa 41 8. Here the reference is undoubtedly to Israel, chosen and called of God and to be upheld by Him. Here Israel is promised victory over its enemies. In vivid picture their destruction and Israel's future triumph are portrayed.

There are several incidental references to Israel as Jeh's servant: created by Jeh and not to be forgotten (41 8); Cyrus is said to be called for the sake of His servant Jacob (44 4); Jeh is said to have redeemed His servant Jacob (43 20).

In 44 20 "servant" seems to be used with the meaning of prophet. It is said of Jeh that He "confirmeth the word of His servant, and performeth the counsel of his hands." In 42 19 we find the failure and inadequacy of Israel presented in the words, "Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf, but the prophet that I send?" This passage is an explanation of the exile. Israel proved unworthy and sinned, hence His punishment, but even in the exile the lesson had not been taken to heart.

In 43 7f Jeh summons Israel the servant, who in spite of blindness and deafness yet is His witness. It has at least seen enough to be able to witness for Him in the presence of the heathen.

In 44 1f leaving the unworthiness of the actual Israel, there comes what seems to me a summons in the name of the ideal. The prevailing thought here is call to the high future which God has ready to give.

This covers the reference to the servant outside the great Servant-passages to which we now come. There are four of these: 42 1–9; 49 1–9a; 60 4–11; 62 13—63 12. 61 1–4 perhaps represents words of the Servant, but may refer to words of the prophet as a whole; and, as at any rate it adds no new feature to the picture of the Servant already given in the passages undoubtedly referring to him, we will not discuss it.

(1) Date of the Servant-passages.—Ewald long ago suggested that the last of the Servant-passages must have been borrowed from an earlier composition, which he assigned to the age of Manasseh. "If we find in the study of the passage reason for its vividness, we shall not need to seek its origin in the description of some past martyrdom."

DuBose quotes Cheyne that the Servant-passages post-exilic. The gentleness and quiet activity of the Servant for one thing, according to Duhm, suggest the age of the scribes, rather than that of the exile. But might not an age of suffering be in line with the generation of prophets? According to Skinner, Duhm thinks the passages were inserted almost haphazard, but Skinner also refers to Kosters, showing that the passages cannot be lifted without carrying some of the succeeding verses with them. This is particularly significant in view of the recent growth of other theories which deny the Servant-passages to the hand and time of Second Isa. The theory that these passages form by themselves a poem or a set of poems which have been inserted here can boast of distinguished names.

There does not seem much to commend it, however. As to the argument from difference as to rhythm, there is disagreement, and the data are probably not of a sort to warrant much significance being attached to them. The fact that the passages are not always a part of a connected narrative may, however, have if made a universal principle of discrimination as to authorship in the prophecies of the OT. If we succeed in giving the fundamental ideas of the passages a place in relation to the thought of Deutero-Isa, an argument for which cogency might be claimed will be dissipated. But this is by no means conclusive. To deny certain ideas to an author simply because he has not expressed them is not writing acknowledged to him is pernicious business. A message of hope surely does not preclude an appreciation of the dark things.

The truth of the matter is that even by great scholars the temptation to a criticism of knighth-servantry is not always resisted. And I think we shall not make any mistake in believing that this is the case with the attempt to throw doubt upon the Deutero-Isalian authorship of the Servant-passages.

(2) Discussion of the passages.—42 1–9: In these verses Jeh Himself is the speaker, describing the Servant as His chosen, in whom His soul delights, upon whom He has put His spirit. He is to bring justice to the Gentiles. In His quiet and gentle, and the very forlorn hope of goodness He will not quench. He is to set justice in the earth, and remote countries are described as waiting for His law. Then comes a declaration by the prophet that Jeh, the Creator of all, is the speaker of words declaring the Servant's call in righteousness to be a covenant for the people, a light to the Gentiles, a helper to those in need—the blind and imprisoned. Jeh's glory is not to be given to another, nor does He promise to give Him images. Former prophecies have come to pass. New things He now declares. One's attention needs to be called to the distinction of the Servant from Israel in this passage. He is to be a covenant of the people: according to Delitzsch, "in whom and through whom Jeh makes a new covenant with His people in place of the old one that has been broken."

49 1–9a: Here the Servant himself speaks, telling of his calling from the beginning of his life, of the might of his word, of his shelter in God, of a time of discouragement in which he almost lay in vain, followed by insistence on his trust in God. Then Jeh promises him a larger mission than the restoration of Israel, viz. to be a light to the Gentiles. Jeh speaks of the Servant as one despised, yet to be triumphant as the new friend of earth and princes. He is to lead his people forth at their restoration, "to make them inherit the desolate heritages; saying to them that are bound, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Show yourselves."

Clearly the Servant is distinct from the people Israel in this passage. Yet in ver 3 he is addressed as Israel. The word Israel here may be a gloss, which would solve the difficulty, or the Servant may be addressed as Israel because he gathers up in himself the meaning of the ideal Israel. If it is true that the prophet gradually passed from the conception of Israel as a nation to a person through whom its true destiny would be realized, this last suggestion would gain in probability.

One notices here the emphasis on the might of the Servant, and in this passage we come to understand that he is to pass through a time of ignominy. The phrase "a servant of rulers" is a difficult one, which would be clear if the prophet conceived of him as one of the exiles, and typically representing them. The Servant's mission in this passage seems quite bound up with the restoration.
speaking. He is taught of God continually, that he may bring a message to the weary. He has opened his ear so that he may fully understand Jeth's message. The Servant and after Him coming to judgment. This, because of his obedience. He was not rebellious and did not turn back from his mission. Faintly he set his face to the thing which was assigned him, after language vivid with a sense of nearness, assured consciousness of victory and faith in God are expressed.

In vs 10-11, according to Delitzsch, Jeth speaks, first entering into the idea of the Servant, then addressing those who despise his word. Cheyne thinks that Delitzsch misreads the passage. "In vs 10, May be the prophet, but I prefer Delitzsch's view.

53 13—53 12: The present division of 52 13—
53 12 is unfortunate, for obviously it is all of a piece and ought to stand together in one chapter.

In 52 13-15 Jeth speaks of the humiliation and later of the exaltation of the Servant. He shall deal wisely—the idea here including the success resulting from wisdom—and shall be exalted. Words are piled upon each other here to express his exaltation. But the appearance of the Servant is such as to suggest the very opposite of his dignity, which will astonish nations and kings when they come to understand it.

Entering upon ch 53 we find the people of Israel speaking confessing their former unbelief, and giving as a reason the repulsive aspect of the Servant—despised, sad, sick with a visage to make men turn from him. It is said as though he had been a leper. They thought all this had come upon him as a stroke from God, but they now see how he went even to death, not for his own transgression but for theirs. Their peace and healing came through his suffering and death. They have been sinful and erring; the result of it all God has caused to light upon him.

They look back in wonder at the way he bore his sufferings—like a lamb led to the slaughter; with a false judicial procedure he was led away, no one dividing his death, or its relation to them. His grave even was an evidence of ignominy.

Beginning at ver 10 the people cease speaking, according to Delitzsch, and the prophecy becomes the organ of God who acknowledges His Servant. The reference to a trespass offering in vs 10 is remarkable. Nowhere else is prophecy so connected with the sacrificial system (A.B. Davidson).

It pleased God to bruise the Servant—his soul having been made a trespass offering; that time of humiliation is a time of exaltation that has come.

By his knowledge we are told—here a momentary reversion to the time of humiliation taking place—by his knowledge he shall justify many and bear their iniquities. Then comes the picture of exaltation—his exalted glory—there are stinging words—there is no home in his suffering. The great fact of ch 53 is vicarious suffering.

(3) Whom did the prophet mean by the Servant?—
(a) Obviously not all of Israel always, for the Servant is distinguished from Israel. (b) Not the godly remnant, for he is distinguished from them. Then the godly remnant does not attain to any such proportions as to fit the description of ch 53. (c) And other passages accept the idea that the prophetic order is intended. The whole order is not great enough to exhaust the meaning of one of a half-dozen of the greatest lines in ch 53.

Professor A. B. Davidson's OT Prophecy contains a brilliant and suggestive survey of the whole field of Biblical knowledge as it approaches from the standpoint of Bib. rather than simply exegetical theology. His fundamental position is that in the prophet's outlook the restoration is the consummation. In his mind the Servant and his work are not come in the restoration. The Servant, if a real person, must be one whose work lies in the past or the present, as there is not room in the future for him, for the restoration which is at the door brings felicity, for the Servant can only come in the past and not in the future. Hence the Servant cannot be to the prophet's mind a real person (see CONIAB).

Of course Davidson relates the result to his larger conception of the prophet's task. As the Servant the Messiah, as the Servant of the Servant the Messiah, as the Servant of the Servant of the Servant the Messianic signification of the passages in relation to the fulfillment of the prophecy. The ideas they contain are realized in Him.

But coming back to the prophet's mind—if the Servant was not a person to him, what is the meaning of the Servant? The answer according to Davidson is, He is a great personification of the ideal Israel, an inner Israel according to its idea. "To quote more fully, "The prophet has created out of the Divine determinations imposed on Israel, election, creation and former, endowment, endowment with the word or spirit of Jeth, and the Divine purpose in these operations, an ideal Being, an inner Israel in the heart of the phenomenal or actual Israel, an indestructible Being having these Divine attributes or endowments, present in the outward Israel in all ages, powerful and effectual because really composed, if I can say so, of Divine forces, who cannot fail in God's purpose, and who as an inner power within Israel by his obedience makes all Israel to become a true servant" (cf Davidson, OT Prophecy, 136).

Now it seems to me that Davidson is more effective in his destructive than in his constructive work. One must confess that his discussion presents real difficulties in his holding to a personal Servant as the prophet's conception. But on the other hand when he offers a more adequate conception I do not think he conscientiously succeeds.

The greatest of the Servant-pasages (it seems to me) presents more than can be successfully dealt with under the conception of the Servant as the ideal Israel. The very great emphasis on vicarious suffering in ch 53 simply is not answered by the theory. Words would not leap with such a flavor of reality in describing the suffering of a personification. The case of sin being atoned for is not a thing whose problem could be solved by a glittering figure of speech. There it surges—the movement of an aroused conscience—and the answer to it could never be anything less than a real deed by a real person. My own feeling is that if language can express anything it expresses the fact that the prophet had a real personal Servant in view.

But what of the difficulties Davidson suggests? Even if the answer were not easy to find, one could rest on the total impression the passages make. One cannot take a passage out of context, fitting it in an environment in which one believes it belongs. As Cheyne in other days said, "In the abstrusest of the descriptions of the Servant I am unable to resist the impression that we have the presentment of an ideal Servant and a historical Servant torn off, yet each really seen in the colors of the present. Then we must remember that the prophets did not relate all their conceptions. They stated truths whose meaning and articulation they did not understand. They were not philosophers for a total view of life, and when we try to read them from this standpoint we misjudge them. Then we must remember that the prophet may have here been lift to a height of prophetic receptiveness where he received and uttered what went beyond his capacity to comprehend.

To be sure there was a point of contact, but I see no objection to the thought that in a place of unique significance and importance like this, God might use a man to utter words which reached far beyond the limits of his own understanding. In this connection revealed to his Professor Hermann Schultz are worth quoting: "If it is true that the prophet could ascribe such greatness, conceiving as he did that he was to come at once? surely a similar question would be fair in relation to Isaiah's Messiah. The truth is that even on the threshold of the restoration there was type for a greater, wondrously to appear. As John the Baptist on the Jordan watched for the coming One whom he knew not, yet who was "future," so the great prophet of the exile may have watched even day by day for the coming Servant whose work had been revealed to him.

But deep in the psychology of the prophecy is the sense of sin out of which these passages came and indications of which I think are found in the latter part of the book. The great guilt-laden past lay terribly behind the prophet, and as he mused over the sufferings of the righteous, perhaps esp. drawn to the heart-rent Jeremiah, the thought of redemptive suffering may have dawned upon him. And if in its light, and with a personal sense of sin drawn from what experiences we know not, he grapples with the problem, can we not understand, can we not see that God might flash upon him the great conception of a sin-bearer?

At last the idea of vicarious suffering had been connected with deep things of the nation's life, and henceforward was a part of its heritage. To the profoundest souls of the Servant—its wisdom would be a part of the nation's forward look. The priestly idea had been deepened and filled with new moral meaning. The Servant was a prophet too—so priest and prophet met in one. And I think Cheyne was right when he suggested that in the Servant's exultation in ch 51, the Servant is brought nearer to the king than we sometimes think. So in suggestion, at least, prophet, priest and king meet in the great figure of the suffering Servant.

A new rich stream had entered into prophecy, full of power to fertilize whatever shores of thought it touched. In the thoughts of these passages prophecy seemed pressing with impatient eagerness to its goal, and though centuries were to pass before that goal was reached, its promise is seen here, full of assurance and of knowledge of the kind of goal it is.

But whatever our view of the meaning of the prophet, we must agree (cf Mt 8 17; 12 18-21; 26 67; Jn 12 41, et al.) that the conception he so boldly and powerfully put upon his canvass had its reality in its fulfillment in the One who spoke to the world from the cross on Calvary. And in its darkly glorious shadow the Christian, with all the sadness and joy and wonder of it, with a sense of its solving all its problems and meeting in the deepest places of his own heart, can feel a strange companionship.

SERVANTS, SOLOMON'S. See SOLOMON'S SERVANTS.

SERVICE, sdr-vis: Six Heb, two Aram. and four Gr words are so rendered.

In the OT the word most used for 'service' is (1) 'abbahdáh, from 'abhadh, which is the general word, meaning "to work" and so "to serve," viz.

1. In the OT

The word "service" is used in describing work in the fields (Ex 1 41, et al.), work in the tabernacle (Ex 27 19, et al.), sanctuary service (Nu 7 9), service of Jeh (Nu 8 11), Levitical or priestly service (Nu 8 22), kingly service (1 Chr 26 30), etc. Reference is made to instruments, wood vessels, cattle, herbs, shekels for the service in the house of Jeh. (2) 'Abhadh itself is a "service," in Nu 8 15; 15 23; Jer 22 13. (3) Serádth means "stitching," i.e. piercing with a needle; it occurs only 4 t, and in each case in AV instead of "service" is used "filly wrought garments" (Ex 31 10; 35 19; 59 1). (4) Sharáth means primarily "to attend" as a servant or worshipping, and to contribute to or render service, wait on, and thence service; occurs only 3 t (Ex 35 19; 39 1.1 AV) and in ARV is rendered "for ministering." (5) Cíbbáh is found 7 t, used in the same connection each time, and refers to those numbered for service in the tent of meeting. Its primary root meaning refers to service for war, campaign, hardship (Nu 4 30.33-39.43; 8 24).

(6) Yádh, means "hold," an "offering," for direction, power, and so ministry as in 1 Chr 6 31, where David appoints certain ones to have direction of the music, t (1 Chr 29 5, RV not service, but "himself.") (7) 'Abbadháh means "business," "labor," "service."(8) Ear 6 19 is the only place where it is found. (8) Pólín, from root meaning "to worship," "minister to," and so in Ez 7 19 vessels given for service.

The following are the uses in the NT: (1) Diakonía, from root meaning "to run on errands," and so attendance, aid as a servant, min-

2. In the NT

Eng. word "deacon"; Paul: "that I might minister unto you" (2 Cor 11 8); also found in Rom 15 31 ("ministration") and Rev 2 19 ("ministry"). (2) Douolía, lit. "to be a slave," in bondage, service (Gal 4 8, "bondage"); Eph 6 7, "service"); 1 Tim 6 2, "serve").

(3) Latría, from root meaning "to render religious homage," menial service to God, and so worship (Jn 15 2, "service"); Rev 12 1, "service"); Rom 12 1 ("spiritual service"); He 9 10 ("service"); 1 Cor 9 12, "service").

(4) Léitourgia, from root "to perform religious or charitable functions," worship, relieve, obey, minister, and hence a public function, priestly or charitable (liturgy) (2 Cor 9 12, "service"); also in Phil 2 17 30).

Thus (a) To attack: Jer 9 33, AV “and set upon the city.” (b) To imprint: Gen 4 15, AV “The Lord set a mark upon Cain.” (c) To trust: 1 K 2 15, “And that all Israel set their faces on me.” (d) To place: 1 K 20 12, Ben-hadad shouted one word to his allies: “Set,” i.e. set the armies in array, the battering-rams and engines of attack in their place. (e) To incline toward: Ezek 40 4, “Set thy heart upon all that I shall show thee.” (f) To trust: Ps 62 10, “If riches increase, set not your heart thereon.” (g) To place before: Ps 90 8, “Thou hast set our inquiries before thee.” Ps 143 3, “Set a watch, O Jehovah, before my mouth.” (h) To go down: of the setting of the sun (Mic 3 2), Lk 4 11, “To be proud.” Mal 3 15, AV “They that work wickedness are set up.” (j) To fill in: Ezek 36 9, “stones to be set, for the ephod.” (k) To plant: Mic 12 1, “set a hedge about it.” (l) To mock: Lk 23 11, “The Lord set him at nought.” (m) To honor: 1 S 18 30, “so that his name was much set by.” (n) To start: Acts 21 2, “We went aboard, and set sail.” As may be seen the word is used in an endless variety of meanings.

SETH, seth. SHETH, sheth (שֶׁת, shèth, סֵתָה, Sèth):

(1) The son born to Adam and Eve after the death of Abel (Gen 4 25; 5 3 ff; 1 Ch 1 1; Sir 49 16; Lk 3 38). In Gen 4 25 the derivation of the name is given as Eve’s “called him Seth,” for she said, God hath appointed that he shall seed instead of Abel.” In 1 Ch 1 1 AV, the form is “Sheth”; elsewhere in AV and in RV throughout the form is “Seth.”

(2) AV “the children of Sheth,” RV “the sons of nhamuk.” According to AV rendering, the name of an unknown race mentioned in Balaam’s parable (Nu 24 17).

S. F. Hunter

SETHER, se’ther (סְתֶר), Sethur; Sadoe, Sa-toiur; An Asherite spy (Nu 13 13 [14]).

SETTING, set’ing (מָקָם, makhôm, lit. “a filling”): The word is used in the description of the manufacture of the breastplate of judgment (Ex 28 17). The instruction runs: Thou shalt set it in its settings of stones, vis. four rows of precious stones. The same word is rendered “inclosings in ver 20, and in 39 13 AV.

Settle, set’l (סְתַל, ‘shèth). For this word in Ezek 43 14.17.20; 45 19, ARV and ERV substitute more correctly ‘ledge.’ See Temple.

Settle: The Heb language has 8 words which are thus tr*: yashabh, nabhath, anaath, sshabat, tlhaba, râ‘abâm, mâmôn, bôthâh’. Now the meaning is to settle down, to cause to occur (Ezek 36 11 AV, 1 Ch 17 14); then it denotes fixedness (2 K 8 11; Ps 119 89; Prov 8 25); again it points to a condition of absolute quiescence, as the settings on the les (Jer 48 11); and in still another place it means packing solidly together (Ps 65 10). In the NT the words ἐπαφέω, ἐπαφέως, ὕπαρξην, they employ, and ἔγείμω, ἀπασχολέω, have been tr* “settle.” RV in 1 Pet 5 10 has tr* “establish,” and the context unquestionably points to the idea of a fixed establishment in the faith. In Lk 21 14 the word the tr* “settle” evidences points to a fixed determination.

SEVENEH, sē-wen'ē, se-wē'ne (סבִּינֵנָה), sṭāwēnē). For AV "the tower of Syene," in Ezk 29 10; 30 6, RV reads, "the tower of Seveneh," with note m, "or, from Migdol to Syene." Seveneh is the town at the First Cataract of the Nile as Assuan. SEVENTY DISCIPLES: The account of the designation and mission of these is found only in Lk 10. Some have therefore sought to maintain that we have here only a confused variant of the appointment of the Twelve, but this is impossible to determine which is the correct reading; and internal evidence does not help us in this case. There is nothing in the function or circumstances to indicate any reason for the specific number.

Commentators have sought parallels in the seventy elders chosen to assist Moses (Nu 11) and suppose that Jesus was intending for His disciples, the "prophet like unto Moses" whom God would raise up. Again, the Jews popularly reckoned the "number of the nations of the earth" at seventy (see Gen 10), and some have supposed Jesus to be thus indicating that His Church, which makes no distinction between Jews and Gentiles, is to extend the kingdom of God to all nations. But it is more probable that the seventy were not so far found, some, again, have supposed that Jesus had in mind the Jewish Sanhedrin, composed of seventy (or seventy-two), and that the appointment of a like number to extend the work of the kingdom was a parabolic recognition that as the Jews were officially rejecting Him, so He was replacing them as agents for the work of the kingdom. It is impossible to speak with any certainty as to any of these suggestions.

Inasmuch as no further mention is made of these seventy, it is to be understood that they were appointed for a temporary ministry. Tradition maintains that the number was reduced to twenty in the latter part of the first century. The disciples active after Pentecost. While it is probable that some of these were witnesses later, the tradition is worthless in details. The mission of these and the reason assigned for their appointment are essentially the same as in the case of the Twelve. Jesus is now completing His last popular campaign in preaching and introducing the kingdom of heaven. The employing of these in this service is in line with the permanent ideal of Christiandom. In Eph 4:11-16 distinction is made between the "laymen" and the "clergy" in responsibility and service. Jesus was perhaps employing all whose experience and sympathy made them fit for work in the harvest that was so plenteous while the laborers were few. He found seventy-two (Acts 1:8) and would find a hundred and twenty such after His ascension (Acts 1:15). WILLIAM OWEN CARVER

SEVEN YEARS: The "seventy weeks" of the prophecy in Dnl 9 24–27 have been a subject of controversy in the critical schools. The conflicting views may be seen very fully in Dr. Driver's Dnl, 91 ff, 145 ff, and Dr. Pusey's Daniel the Prophet, lects 11, 111, IV. On both sides it is agreed that the "weeks of years," as in the 70 weeks represent 490 years. This period, commencing with "the going forth of the commandments to restore and build Jerusalem" (ver 25), is divided into three parts, 7 weeks (49 years), 62 weeks (484 years), and one and 39 weeks (28 years). The third part to the appearance of "an anointed one [Heb "Messiah"], the prince" (ver 25), who, after the 62 weeks, shall be "cut off" (ver 26), apparently in the "midst" of the 70th week (ver 27). On the traditional view (see Pusey), the 69 weeks (483 years) mark the interval from the decree to rebuild Jerusalem till the appearance of Christ; and if, with Pusey, the decree in question be taken to be that of the 7th year of Artaxerxes (457–56 BC; the mission of Ezra; cf Ezr 7 8 ff), confirmed and extended in the 20th year of the same king (mission of Nehemiah; cf Neh 2 1 ff), the 483 years run out about 27–28 AD, when Our Lord's public ministry began. On the other hand, the view which supposes that the Book of Dnl belongs wholly to the Maccabean age, and does not here contain genuine prediction, is under the necessity of making the 490 years terminate with the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (171–164 BC), and this, it is admitted, cannot be done. To give time the violent expediency is adopted of dating the commencement of the 70th week from the prophecy of Jeremiah of the 70 years' captivity, or from the rebuilding of Jerusalem (606 or 587 BC), i.e. before the captivity had begun. Even this, as Dr. Driver admits (p. 146), leaves us in 171 BC, a period 87 years short of the duration 490 years, and a huge blunder of the writer of Dnl has to be assumed. The divergent reckonings are legion, and are mutually contradictory (see table in Pusey, p. 217). To invalidate the older view Dr. Driver supposes (p. 145) that the 69 weeks extend to ver 25 and 27 in ERV. It is to be noted, however, that ARV does not follow ERV in these changes. Thus, whereas ERV reads in ver 25, "Unto the anointed one, the prince, shall be seven weeks: and three-score and two weeks, it shall be cut again; and accordingly takes "the anointed one" of ver 26 to be a distinct person, ARV (as also ERVn) reads, as in AV, "shall be seven weeks, and three-score and two weeks." Again, where ERV reads in ver 27 "For the half of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," ARV (and ERVn) has as formerly, "In the midst of the week he shall cause" etc (conversely, in ver 25 ARVn gives the ERV rendering). The question cannot be dismissed here. It is well recognized that the interpretation may yet claim acceptance from those who do not accept the postulates of the newer critical writers. JAMES OER SEVETH YEAR: The period assigned by Jeremiah for the duration of the Jewish exile in Babylon (Jer 25 11 12, 29 10; cf 2 Ch 36 21; Ezr 1 1; Dnl 9 2). If the period be reckoned from the date of the first deportation in the 4th year of Jehoiakim (Ver Dnl 36 6 ff), Dnl 1 1 by another reckoning calls it the 3d year), i.e. 606 BC, till the decree of Cyrus, 536 BC, the prediction was fulfilled to a year. See CAPTIVITY.

SEVER, sev'-er: The three Heb words badhal, pâldh and pâraḏh are thus tr1. The idea conveyed is that of setting apart (Lev 20 26 AV) or of setting someone or something apart in a miraculous way (Ex 8 22; 9 4 AV, ERV), or, again, of simple separation on one's own volition (Jgs 11 11 AV, ERV). The Gr word ἀφορίζω, aphorizō (Mt 24 32) stands for final judicial segregation.

SEVERAL, sev'-er-al, SEVERALLY, sev'-er-a-ly: The Heb and Gr words ἀρματικῶς, armatikōs and ἀρματικῶς, armatikōs in both cases tr4 "separate!" in ARV, and indicate ceremonial uncleanness and consequent severance on account of leprosy. In the parable of the Talenta (Mt 25:15) and also in 1 Cor 12:11 the word σήμερον, ἀδιός, is "several," "severely." In both cases it points to the individuality of the recipients of the gift bestowed.

SHAALABBIN, ša-a-šal-bā'īn (שֹׁלַבְבִין, sha'allabbin; B, Ṣalābīn, Ṣalābat, A, Ṣalābīn, Ṣalaleim): A town in the Dan territory of Benjamin (Jos 19:42). It seems to be identical with SHAALABIM.

SHAALABIM, ša-a-šal-bīm (שֹׁלַבִים, sha'allabim; B, Ṣalābīm, Béthalame, A, Ṣalābīn, Salaleim, in Josh B.A, Ṣalābīn, Thalabim): When the Amorites had forced the children of Dan into the mountain they came and dwelt in Mt. Heres, Aijalon and Shaalabim, where, it appears, they were made tributary to the house of Joseph (Jgs 1:35). In the time of Solomon it was included in the administrative district presided over by Ben-hoker, along with Makaz, Beth-shehem and Elon-ban-hanan (1 K 4:9). Beth-shehem is the same as Ir-shechem (Jos 19:42). Shaalabim is probably only another name of Shaalabbin. One of David's mighty men is called "Shalabba" in 2 Sam 23:23; 1 Ch 11:33, which again is probably identical with Shaalabim. Onom identifies it with Salala, a large village in the district of Sebastae (Samaria), which apparently Eusebius and Jerome thought to be in the territory of Dan. It seems, however, too far to the N. Jerome in his comm. on Ezk 48:15 speaks of the towers of Aijalon and Selebi and Emmaus. Conder would identify Selebi with Selâbî, 3 miles N.W. of Aijalon (Yâdî), and 8 miles N. of Beth-shehem. This would suit for Shaalabim, as far as position is concerned; but it is difficult to account for the heavy f. name, if derived from Shaalabim.

SHAALBONITE, ša-a-lâl-bô-nît, ša-a-bô-nît (שֹׁלַבֹּן, ha-shallbonîn; A Samlûnîn, ho Salâbînetis [2 S 23:32]; B, U Q, ho Hemûl, A, Šalâbîn, Šalâbîn): Eliezer, one of David's heroes, a native of Shaalbon. See SHAALABIM.

SHAALIM, ša-a-lîm, LAND OF (שֹׁלַל, אַלִים, erosh shoalâm; B, Ṣyôf ha-Šalûmû, Ṣyôf Eassàûmû, A, Ṣyôf ha-Šalûnû, Ṣyôf Šcâlûmû; AV Shalôm): Saul attains the research of his father's ass passed through Mt. Ephraim and the land of Shalishah, then through the land of Shaalim and the land of y'renî. This last name EV renders "Benjamin" (1 S 9:4). The whole passage is so obscure that no certain conclusions can be reached. The search party may have proceeded northward from Gibeah, through the uplands of Ephraim, turning then westward, then southward, and finally eastward. We should thus look for the land of Shalishah and the land of Shaalim on the right side of the mountain range; and the latter may have been on the slopes to the E. of Lydda. Possibly we ought here to read "Shalbim," instead of "Shaalim." W. Ewing

SHAAP, ša-a-f (שָׁאָב, sha'ab): (1) A son of Jablai (1 Ch 2:47). (2) The son of Maschah, a concubine of Caleb, the brother of Jerahmeel. Shaaph is called the "father," or founder, of the city Madmannah (1 Ch 2:45).f

SHARAIM, ša-a-rânîm (שֹׁאָרִים, sha'aronim), "two gates"; Ṣeṣaḏuḏ, Ṣorâkeim; AV Sharamaim): (1) A city in the Shephelah or "lowland" of Judah mentioned (Jos 15:36) in close association with Sooch and Azekah; the vanquished army of the Philis passed a Shaaraim in their flight from Sooch toward Gath and Ekron (1 S 17:52). It is possible that in this latter reference the "two gates" may refer—as LXX implies—to the two Philistine strongholds themselves. Shaaraim has been identified with Tell Zakariyya (see however Azekah) and with Kh. Sa'trekh (PEF, 111, 124, Sh XVII), an old site W. of Beth 'Atib. Both proposals are hazardous.

(2) One of the towns of Simeon (1 Ch 4:31), called (Josh 19:6) "Saraheben" and, as one of the uttermost cities of Judah, called (Josh 19:6) "Shilhîm." This town was in Southwestern Pal and is very probably identical with the fortress Sharhana, a place of some importance on the road from Cjara to Egypt. Asmuss (XVIIIth Dynasty) besieged and captured this city in the 5th year of his reign in his pursuit of the flying Hykaos (Petræ, Hist, II, 22, 35), and a century later Tahutmes III, in the 23rd year of his reign, took the city of Sharhuben on his way to the siege and capture of Megiido (Petræ, Hist, II, 104). On philological grounds Tell esh-Sherî'â, 12 miles N.W. of Beersheba, a large ruin, has been proposed, but it does not suit at all the Egypt data (PEF, III, 399, Sh XXIV).

SHAASHEGAZ, ša-a-sh'gaz (שֹׁשַגְぞ, sha'ashgaz), LXX reads Gs'a, Gai, the same name it gives to the official referred to in Est 2:15, the name may go back to the Old Acanan word Sâshakhant, "one anxious to learn" [Schatz]; most commentators suggest no explanation. A chamberlain of Ahasuerus, king of Persia; as keeper of "the second house of women," he had Esther under his charge (ver 14).

SHABBETHAI, shah-b't-hî (שֶׁבֶתָהִי, sha'bthahy), "one born on the Sabbath"; B, Ṣāḇaṭâh, Šabatâh, A, Ḫâḇaṭâχ, Kabbathah = "Sabbatean" of 1 Es 9:14): A Levite who opposed (?) Ezra's suggestion that the men who had married foreign wives put them aside (Ezr 10:15). Kuenen, however, renders the phrase P̄N̄ s̄w̄, a vbhhol 'al zîth, of which Asahel and Jahaziah are the subjects, to mean "stand against," "oppose" (Gemamme Abhandlungen, 247 f); this would make Shabbethai, who was in accord with the two men mentioned above, an ally rather than an opponent of Ezra. We incline toward Kuenen's interpretation of the position attained by Shabbethai under Nehemiah—one he would have been unlikely to attain had he been hostile to Ezra. He is mentioned among those appointed to explain the Law ( Neh 8:7), and as one of the chief s of the Levites who had the oversight of "the outward business of the house of God" ( Neh 11:16).

SHACHIA, ša-ki'a, šak'î-urnished (שָׁכִי, sâkîyd, so Baer, Ginsberg; some edd read N̄s̄w̄, sakîyd, or N̄s̄w̄, sakâryā; also 1546, shakîyd, and 1546, shakhâryâh, and 1546, shakhâryâh): This last reading is favored by the Syrian and the LXX [B, Ṣâḇâs, Ṣâḇâ, Ṣâḇâ, Ṣâḇâ, Ṣâḇâ, but Luke, 1546, Shc̄aḥ], the forms in kh (2) instead of bh (2) have the support of the Vulg, Sechía, "Yahweh has forgotten"?: A name in a genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch 8:10).

SHADDAI, šad'dâ-î, shad'dât. See GOD, NAMES OF, 11, 8.

SHADE, šâd, SHADOW, shadâh, SHADOVING, shad-dâh-ing (ΣΤ, σίδ; σκιά, skiah): A shadow is any obscuration of the light and heat with the form of the intervening object, obscurely projected, constantly changing and passing away. "Shadow" is used lit. of a roof (Gen 19 8), of mountains (Jgs 9 36), of trees (Jgs 9 15, etc.), of wings (Ps 17 8, etc.), of a cloud (Isa 21 5), of a great rock (Isa 35 20), of a roof (Gen 5 15), of the shadow on the dial (2 K 20 9, etc.), of Jonah's gourd (Jon 4 5 f.). It is used also figuratively (1) of shelter and protection (of man, Gen 19 8; Cant 2 3; Isa 16 3, etc.; of God, Ps 36 7; 91 1; Isa 4 6, etc.); (2) of anything fleeting or transient, as of the days of man's life on earth (1 Ch 29 15; Job 8 9; Ps 109 23); (3) with the idea of obscurity or imperfection (in He 8 5; 10 1, of the Law; cf Col 2 17); (4) of darkness, gloom; see SHADOW OF DEATH. In Jas 1 17, we have in AV, "the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (apokolksma), RV "shadow that is cast by turning"; the reference is to the unchangeableness of God as contrasted with the changes of the heavenly bodies. RV has "of the rising and setting of the sun" for "shadowing with wings" in Isa 18 1; ARV has "shade" for "shadow" in various places (Jgs 9 15; Job 40 22; Isa 4 6, etc.). In Job 40 21-22, for "shadowy trees" RV has "lotus-trees."

W. L. Walker

SHADOW OF DEATH (םגמלות, qalmaweth): The Heb word trv "shadow of death" is used poetically for thick darkness (Job 3 5), as descriptive of Sheol (Job 3 21; 12 22; 38 17); figuratively of deep distress (Job 12 22; 16 16; 24 17 bis; 28 3; 34 22 [in the last three passages ARV has "thick darkness" and "thick gloom"]; Ps 23 4, RV "deep darkness [and so elsewhere]"; 44 19; 107 10.14; Isa 9 2; Jer 2 6; 13 10; Am 5 8; Mt 4 16; Lk 1 79, 80, 89. When Heb words are translated by English words meaning of gê, "shadow," and ma'aheth, "death," and the idea of "the valley of the shadow of death" was most probably derived from the deep ravines, darkened by over-hanging briars, etc., through which the shepherd had sometimes to lead or drive his sheep to new and better pastures.

SHADRACH, sha'drakh: The Bab name of one of the so-called Heb children. Shadrach is probably the Syrian form of the Bab Kadramu-Aki, "servant of Sin." It has been suggested by Meinhold that we should read Merodach instead of Shadrach. Since there were no vowels in the original Heb or Aram., and since sh and m as well as r and d are much alike in the old alphabet in which Dn 1 was written, this change is quite possible.

Shadrach and his two companions were trained along with Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, who had carried all four captive in the expedition against Jerus. in the 3rd year of Jehoiakim (Dnl 1 1). They all refused to eat of the food provided by Ashpenaz, the master who had been set over them by the king, but preferred to eat pulse (Dnl 1 12). The effect was much to their advantage, as they appeared far fatter and fatter than those who ate of the king's meat. At the end of the appointed time they passed satisfactory examinations, both as to their physical appearance and their intellectual requirements, so that none were found like them among all with whom the king communed, and they stood before the king (see Dnl 1).

When Daniel heard that the wise men of Babylon were to be slain because they could not tell the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, after he had gained a respect from the king, he told the thing known to his three companions that they might unite with him in prayer to the God of heaven that they all might not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon. After God had heard their prayer and the dream was made known to the king by Daniel, Nebuchadnezzar, at Daniel's request, set Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego over the affairs of the province of Babylon (Dnl 2). With Meshach and Abed-nego, Shadrach was cast into a fiery furnace, but escaped unhurt (Dnl 3). See Abed-nego; Hananiah; Song of Three Children.

SHADY, sha'di, TREES (Job 40 21 f.). See LOTUS TREES.

SHAFAR, shaf't: Isa 49 2 for 77b, הָג, "an arrow"; also Ex 25 31; 37 17; Nu 8 4 AV for a part of the candlestick of the tabernacle somewhat vaguely designated by the word 777, יָרֶק, "thigh." The context in the first 2 verses shows that the upright stem or "shaft" is intended, but in Nu 8 4 a different context has caused RV to substitute "base." See also Archery; Armor, Arm.

Shaghe, shâ'gê (נִשָּׁג, shagheh'; KJV, Shaghe); B, Solâ, Solá, A, Sâ'gå, Sâ'gât; AV Shage: The father of Jonathan, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11 34).

Shaharaim, shâ-âr-â-im (שוֹבָרָיִם), shobăr-ayim; B, Sâ'orôl, Sareaîl, A, Sâ'orô, Sareaîm: A Benjamite name (1 Ch 8 8). The passage is corrupt beyond any of the most tentative emendation. "Sharahim" has no connection with the foregoing text. One of the suggested readings is: "And Shaharaim dwelt in the field of Moab, after he had driven them [i.e. the Moabites] out, from Hodesh his wife, Jobah," etc (Curtis, ICC).

Shahazumah, sha-ha-zô-ô-ma, sha-hâzô'ô-ma (שָׁהַצּוּמָה, shahâçumâh; B, Sâ'âlîm nâ-tâ êdâsâsûn, Sâ'âlîm hâ-tâ êdâsâsûn, A, Sâ'âlîmâh, Sâ'âlîmâh; AV Shazrah, shahâ'zimâh): A town in the territory of Issachar on the boundary which run from Tabor to the Jordan (Josh 19 22). The site, which has not yet been recovered, must be sought, probably, to the S.E. of the mountain.

Shalem, šâ'le'm, šâlām; el šâ'lêm, el šâlêm (סַלֵם, šâlôm): The word as a place-name occurs only in Gen 33 18. With Luther, following LXX, Pesch and Vulg, AV reads "And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem," RV with the Tgs Onqos and (pseudo-Jonathan) and the S. and the Ash, "and read, "came in peace to the city of Shechem." There is a heavy balance of opinion among scholars in favor of the latter reading. It is certainly a remarkable fact, supporting AV, that about 4 miles E. of Shechem (Shekho), there is a village bearing the name šâlôm. If AV is right, this must represent the city referred to; and E. of šâlôm would transpire the events recorded in Gen 44. Against this is the old tradition locating Jacob's well and Joseph's tomb near to Shechem. Šonöm gets over the difficulty by identifying Shalem with Shechem. W. Ewing Shalm, šâ'îm. See Shaalim.

Shalishah, šâ-li'sha, šâ-li'ehš, LAND OF (סַלִישָה, šâlîsâh; KJV, 'ever shalishah; B, ḫ ṭ šâlîsâh, Ḫ ṭ šâlîsâh; A, ḫ ṭ ṭālîsâa, Ḫ ṭ ṭālîsâa; E, ḫ ṭ ūlîsâs): If the general indication of the route followed by Soul, given under Salmash, is correct, the land of Shalishah (1 S 9 4) will lie to the N.E. of Lydda on the western slope of the range. Baal-shalishah would most likely be in the district, and may indeed have given its name to it. If Conder is right in identifying this city with Khirbet Kefer Thilith, about 10 miles N.E. of Jaffa, it meets well enough the general indication given above. Šonöm knows the name, but gives no guidance as to where the district is.
Baal-shalishah it places in the Thammite region, 15 miles N. of Diospolis (Lydda). No boundaries can be laid down, but probability points to this neighborhood. W. Ewing

SHALLECHETH, shal'k-keth, sha-lék-keth, THE GATE (םשֶׁלֶכֶת, šəlākeḵeth, i.e. as m, "Casting forth"): A gate of the temple "at the causeway that goeth up" (1 Ch 26 16)—probably an ascent from the Tyropoan Valley to the W. of the temple. It has been supposed on account of the meaning of the name that the temple and gate of the temple were cast forth there, but this is very unlikely—they were thrown into the Kidron valley to the E. or S.E. The LXX has παστορφορίον, pastophorion, which seems to point to a building with chambers; in consonance with this Cheyne reads in the Heb רַּבְּשֶׁת, rashkoth, "[of] the chambers." E. W. G. Masterman

SHALLUM, shal'um (שַׁלֹּם, shāllum, šalām; shalām; various forms in LXX): This is the name of not less than 12 Heb persons:

1. The youngest son of Naphtali (1 Ch 7 13). He is also called "Shilem" in Gen 46 24; Nu 26 49.
2. A descendant of Simeon, the son of Shaal and the father of Mibsam (1 Ch 4 25). He lived in 1618 BC.
3. The son of Sismai "son" of Sheerah of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 2 40 41). He lived in 1300 BC.
4. A son of Kore, a porter of the sanctuary during the reign of David (1 Ch 9 17 19 31; Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45). The name is also written "Me-shalum" in Neh 12 25, "Salum" in 1 Esd 6 28, "Meshelemiah" in 1 Ch 26 1 2 9, and "Shelemiah" in 1 Ch 26 14. He lived about 1050 BC.
5. A son of Zadok and father of Hilikiah, a high priest and ancestor of Ezra the scribe (1 Ch 6 12; Ezr 7 2). In the works of Jos he is called "Salmus"; in 1 Esd 8 1, "Salem," and in 2 Esd 1 1, "Salemes.
6. The 13th king of Israel. See following article.
7. A son of Bani, a priest who had taken a heathen wife and was compelled by Ezra the scribe to put her away (Ezr 10 42; omitted in 1 Esd 9 34).
8. The father of Jehizkiah, an Ephraimite in the time of Ahaz king of Israel (2 Ch 22 5).
9. The husband of the prophetess Huldah (2 K 22 14; 2 Ch 34 22). He was the keeper of the sacred wardrobe and was probably the uncle of Jeremiah the prophet (Jer 32 7; cf Jer 35 4).
10. King of Judah and son of Josiah (Jer 22 11; 1 Ch 3 15), better known by the name Jehohaz II. This name he received when he ascended the throne of Judah (2 Ch 36 1).
11. A Levite who was a porter at the time of Ezra (Ezr 10 24; "Salmus" in 1 Esd 9 25).
12. A ruler over a part of Judah and a son of Halkesh. He with his daughters aided in building the walls of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 3 12).

S. L. UMBACH

SHALUM (שָלֹם, shalām, šalām, "the required one" [2 K 15 10 15]): The 15th king of Israel, and successor of Zechariah, whom he publicly assassinated in the 7th month of his reign. Nothing more is known of Shallum than that he was a son of Jabesh, which may indicate that he was a Gileadite from beyond Jordan. He is said to have made a "conspiracy" against Zechariah, so was not alone in his crime. The conspirators, however, had but a short-lived success, as, when Shallum had "reigned for the space of a month in Samaria," Menahem, then at Tirah, one of the minor capitals of the kingdom, went up to Samaria, slew him and took his place.

It was probably at this time that Syria threw off the yoke of Assyria to Israel (see JEROBOAM II), as when next we meet with that kingdom, it is under its own king and in alliance with Samaria (2 K 16 5).

The 10 years of rule given to Menahem (2 K 16 17) may be taken to indicate his military violence under Zechariah and Shallum, and cover the full years 758 750, with portions of years before and after counted as whole ones. The unsuccessful usurpation of Shallum may therefore be put in 758 BC (some date later).

W. Shaw Caldecott

SHALLUN, shal'um, shalūm, not in LXX: Another form of Shallum, the son of Col-hozea. He was the ruler of the district of Mizpah. He assisted Nehemiah in building the wall of Jerusalem and in repairing the gate by the Pool of Siloah at the King's Gardens (Neh 3 16).

SHALMAI, shal'māy, shal'māy: AV form in Ezr 2 46 for "Shamlai"; Neh 7 48 "Salmai" (q.v.).

SHALMAN, shal'man (שַׁלֹּמָן, shālman): A name of uncertain meaning, found only once in the OT (Hos 10 14), in connection with a place-name, equally obscure, "as Shalman destroyed Beth-arbel." Shalman is most commonly interpreted as a contracted form of Shalmaneser, the name of several Assyrs kings. If this explanation is correct, the king referred to cannot be identified. Some have thought of Shalmaneser IV, who is said to have undertaken expeditions against the West in 775 and in 773 772. Others have proposed Shalmaneser V, who attacked Jerusalem in 723. This, however, is improbable, because the activity of Hosea ceased before Shalmaneser V became king. Shalman has also been identified with Salamanu, a king of Moab in the days of Hosea, who paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser V of Assyria; and with Shalma, a North Arabian tribe that invaded the Negeb. The identification of Beth-arbel (q.v.) is equally uncertain. From the reference it would seem that the event in question was well known and, therefore, probably one of recent and considerable importance, but our present historical knowledge does not enable us to connect any of the persons named with the destruction of any of the localities suggested for Beth-arbel. The ancient text offer no solution; they too seem to have been in the dark.

SHALMANESER, shal'-ma-něs'er (שַׁלֹּמָן-אֵשֶּר, shalmanešer): LXX Σαλμάναρ, Sammanešer, Σαλμάναρας, Salmanasor, Salmandaros): The name of several Assyrs kings. See ASYRIA; ASSYRIAN CAPTIVITY. It is Shalmaneser IV who is mentioned in the Bib. history (2 K 17 3; 18 9). He succeeded Tiglath-pileser on the throne in 772 BC, but whether he was a son of his predecessor, or a usurper, is not apparent. His reign was short, and, as no annals of it have come to light, we have only the accounts contained in 2 K for his history. In the passages referred to above, we learn that Hoshea, king of Israel, who had become his vassal, refused to continue the payment of tribute, relying upon help from So, king of Egypt. No help, however, came from Egypt, and Hoshea had to face the charging forces of his suzerain with his own unpaid resources, the result being that he was taken prisoner outside Samaria and most likely carried away to Nineveh. The Bib. narrative goes on to say that the king of Assyria came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria and besieged it 3 years. There is reason to believe that, as the siege of Samaria was proceeding, Shalmaneser retired to Nineveh and died, for, when the city was taken in 722 BC, it is Sargon who claims, in his copious annals, to have captured it and carried its inhabitants into captivity. It is just a contraction for Shalmaneser, but the identity of Shalman and of Beth-archel named in the same passage is not sufficiently made out.

SHAMA, shā'mā (תַּשָּׁם, shā'mā): One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11 44).

SHAMAI, shăm'ā'i. See Salm.

SHAMARIAH, shăm-a-ri'a, sha-mā'r'yā. See Shemariah.

SHAMBLES, shăm'blz (μαστόλον, makeldon): A slaughter-house; then a butcher's stall, meat-market. The word is once used in the NT in 1 Cor 10 25.

SHAME, shâm (עָזֹא, bēshk, "to be ashamed," רֵזָה, rēzah, "shame," בֶּשֶׁת, "shame," קַלָּן; ašūr, ašūr, "shame; "ignominious," אַתְמָה, atimā, "dishonor," and other words): An oft-recurring word in Scripture almost uniformly bound up with a sense of sin and guilt. It is figuratively set forth as a wild beast (Jer 3 24), a Nessus-garment (3 25), a blight (20 18), a sin against one's own soul (Hab 2 10), and twice as the condensed symbol of Heb abomination—Baal (Jer 11 13 m; Hos 9 10 m; see Isu—horrētēth). It is bracketed with defeat (Isa 30 3), reproach (Ps 69 7; Isa 64 4; Mic 2 6), confusion (Isa 6 7), nakedness (Isa 47 3; Mic 1 11), everlasting contempt (Dan 12 2), folly (Prov 18 13), cruelty (Isa 50 6; He 12 2), poverty (Prov 13 18), nothingness (Prov 9 7 AV, "vainness") (1 Cor 11 16; 14 35 AV; Eph 5 12), and "them that go down to the pit" (Ezk 32 25). In the first Bib. reference to this emotion, "shame" appears as "the correlative of sin and guilt" (Delitzsch, "New Comm. on Gen. and Bib. Psychology"). Shamelessness is characteristic of abandoned wickedness (Phil 3 19; Jude ver 13, מ "Gr. 'shames'"). Manifestly, then, shame is a comcomitant of the Divine judgment upon sin; the very worst that a Hebrew could wish for an enemy was that he might be covered with shame (Ps 149 5; Mic 1 11), and the judgment of God might rest upon him visibly.

Naturally, to the Hebrew, shame was the portion of those who were idolaters, who were faithless to Jeh or who were unfriendly to themselves—the elect people of Jeh. Shame is to come upon Moab because Moab held Israel in derision (Jer 48 39 27), and upon Edom "for violence against his brother Jacob" (Ob 19 10). But also, and impartially, shame is the portion of faithless Israelites who deny Jeh and follow after strange gods (Ezk 17 18; Mic 7 10; Hos 10 6, and often). But shame, too, comes upon those who exalt themselves against God, who trust in earthly power and the show of material strength (2 Ch 35 21; Isa 30 3); and upon those who make a Mock of righteousness (Jeb 6 23; Ps 56 20; 133 18). With a fine sense of ethical distinctions the Bib. writers recognize that in confessing to a sense of shame there is hope for better things. Only in the most desperate cases is there no place (Hos 4 15; Zeph 3 5; Phil 3 19; Jude ver 13); in pardon God is said to remove shame (Isa 64 4 bis; 61 7).

On conditions beyond the grave the Bib. revelation is exceedingly reticent, but here and there are hints that shame waits upon the wicked here and hereafter. Such an expression as that in Dnl (12 2) cannot be ignored, and though the writing itself may belong to a late period and a somewhat sophisticated theological development, the idea is but a reflection of the earlier and more elementary period, when the voice of crime and cruelty went up from earth to be heard in the audience chamber of God (Gen 4 11; 6 13). In the NT there is similar reticence but also similar implications. It cannot be much amiss to say that in the mind of the Bib. writers sin was a shameful thing; that part of the punishment for sin was a consciousness of guilt in the sense of shame; and that from this consciousness of guilt there was no deliverance while the sin was unconfessed and unforgiven. "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt." From one's own past there is no deliverance, save through contrition of spirit and the grace and forgiveness of God. While the sense of shame persists, or, in other words, while the moral constitution of man's nature remains as it is, there will never be wanting an avenger of sin.

SHAMEFACELESSNESS, shăm-fā'se-nēs, shám-fā'sed-nēs. See Shamefastness.

SHAMEFASTNESS, shăm'fāst-nēs, shăm-fā'sed-nēs: The original AV tảsbs, täsbs, in Sir 41 18 and 1 Tim 2 9 (Perhaps half a century later the Hebrew "shamefacelessness" supplanted the better form, and continues in the ordinary editions of the King James Version. RV, however, rightly restores "shamefastness."

SHAMER, shâm'mër. See Shemer.

SHAMGAR, shâm'gär (שמגאר, shampagar): One of the judges, son of Anath (מָנָת, "Anath"), in whose days, which preceded the time of Deborah, it is stated (Jgs 5 6 7) and followed those of Ac Hola of old, Israel's subjugation was so complete that "the highways were unoccupied, and the travelers walked through byways." The government had become thoroughly dishonored, and apparently not a day of Deborah, the people were entirely unprepared for war. Shamgar's improvised weapon with which he helped to "save Israel" is spoken of as an oxgoad. With this he smote the Philis 600 men. This is the first mention of the Philis asTrouble-some neighbors of the Israelites (Jgs 3 31). According to a tradition represented in Jos (Am, V. 4, 3), Shamgar died in the year he became judge. Several writers have challenged the Bib. account on the following grounds: that in Jgs 6 no mention is made of any deliverance; that the 2. Critical name "Shamgar" resembles the name Hypotheses of a Hittite king and the name "Anath" that of a Syrian goddess; that the deed recorded in Jgs 3 31 is analogous to that of Samson (Jgs 15 15), and that of Shamshah, son of Age (2 S 23 11 f); and lastly, that in a group of Gr MSS and other VSS this verse is inserted after the account of Samson's exploits. None of these is necessarily inconsistent with the traditional account. Nevertheless, they have been used as a basis not only for overthrowing the tradition, but also for constructive theories such as that which makes Shamgar a foreign oppressor and not a judge, and among the fathers of the Philis. There is, of course, no limit to which this kind of interesting speculation cannot lead.

SHAMHUTH, sham'huth. See Shammua, IV.

SHAMIR, šāmîr (שָׁמִיר, šāmîr; שָׁמוֹם, Sameir):
1) Mentioned along with Jattir and Socoh (Josh 16 48) as one of the cities of Judah in the hill country. Possibly it is Kh. be 20; So 21. 2,000 ft. above sea-level, a site with ancient walls, caves, cisterns, and tombs not far W. of Debir (edh Dhatheyc) and 2 miles N. of Anab (Anab) (PEF, III, 262, 286, Sh XX).
2) In the hill country of Ephraim (Jgs 10 1) from which came “Tola, the son of Puah, a man of Issachar,” who judged Israel 23 years; he died and was buried in the place with the semi-fortified and strongly-located town of San 2 on the road from Nablus to Jenin. A local chieftain in the early part of the last century fortified San 2 and thus dominated the whole district. That San 2 could hardly have been within the bounds of Issachar is an objection, but not necessarily a fatal one. It is noticeable that LXX A has ἀνάβεια, Ἀραμεία, for Shamir (PEF, II, Sh XI).

SHAMIR (שָׁמִיר, šāmîr; שָׁמוֹם, Sameir): A Kohathite, son of Miech (1 Ch 24 24).

SHAMLAI, sham'la'i, sham'lli. See Salmai.

SHAMMA, sham'a (שָׁמָה, sham'ma): B, שָׁמוֹת, Same, A, שָׁמָא, Samma): An Asherite (1 Ch 7 37).

SHAMMAH, sham'a (שָׁמָה, sham'ma):
1) The son of Reuel, the son of Esau, a tribal chief of Edom (Gen 36 13 17; 1 Ch 1 37, Ṣượ, Same, 2) The third son of Jesse and brother of David. Together with his two other brothers he fought under Saul in the campaign against the Philistines and was with the army in the valley of Elah when David slew Goliath (1 S 17 13 ff). One reductor states that he and his two brothers, who were also sons of Jesse, were joint recipients of the armor of David by Samuel (1 S 16 1–13). He was the father of Jonadab, the friend of Amnon (2 S 13 3 ff), and that Jonathan whose victory over the Philistines is narrated in 2 S 21 20 ff was also his son. His name is rendered as “Shammah” (1 S 16 9; 17 13), “Shimeah” (2 S 13 32), “Shmei” (2 S 21 21), and “Shimea” (1 Ch 2 13; 20 7).

2) The son of Agee, a Hararite, one of the “three mighty men” of David (2 S 23 11, LXX Σαμαθ, Samada), who held the field against the Philistines. The passage (1 Ch 11 10 ff) ascribes this deed to Eleazar, the son of Dodo. The succeeding incident (2 S 23 13 ff), viz. the famous act of three of David’s heroes who risked their lives to bring their leader water from the well of Bethlem, has frequently been credited to Shammah and two other members of “the three”; but the three warriors are plainly said (ver 13) to belong to “the thirty”; ver 33 should read “Jonathan, son of Shammah, the Hararite.” Jonathan, one of David’s “three,” was a son of Shammah; the word “son” has been accidentally omitted (Driver, Buidé, Kittel, etc.). The passage (1 Ch 11 34) has “son of Shache,” which is probably a misreading for “son of Agee.” Lucian’s version, “son of Shammah,” is most plausible. “Shimei the son of Ela” (1 K 4 18) should also appear in this passage if Lucian’s reading of “Ela” for “Agee” (2 S 23 11) be correct.

4) A Harodite (2 S 23 25 33), i.e. probably a native of ‘Ain-barad (‘Ain Jalud, Jgs 7 1; see Harod). One of “the thirty” and captain of Solomon’s 5th month course. In the lists (1 Ch 11 27) he is called “the Harorite” (this last being a scribal error for Harodite) and “Shammuth the Izrahite” (1 Ch 27 8).

SHAMMAH, sham’a, shamm’ah (שָׁמָה, sham’mah):
1) A Reubenite spy (Nu 13 4, Ṣאום, Samoul, and other forms).
2) One of David’s sons (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 14 4, Ṣאום, Samma). In 1 Ch 3 5 he is called “Shimea.”
3) A Levite (Neh 11 17): he is called “She- maiah” in 1 Ch 9 16.
4) The head of a priestly family (Neh 12 18); a contemporary of Joakim.

SHAMSHERAII, shams-šer-ı, sham-she-ra’i (שָׁמְשֶר-י, shamšeray): A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 26).

SHAPE, shap: In AV the tr of elōth, elod, “form,” “appearance” (Lk 3 22; Jn 6 37), and of ḥayyōn, homîlôtâ, “likeness,” “resemblance” (Rev 9 7). The meaning of these words is not so much “tangible shape,” in which sense we use the word in modern Eng., but rather “aspect,” “appearance,” the looks of a thing or a person. This is the case in the phrase “the word is joined with the sâd, sâwarâd, sâmāhah, ‘bodily,’ as in the passage Lk 3 22, “The Holy Spirit descended in a bodily form [i.e. "in a corporeal appearance," AV "in a bodily shape"], as a dove, upon him.” The second passage also refers to the “appearance” of God, and cannot therefore be regarded as mater- ial shape: “Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his form” (AV “shape”) (Jn 5 37). As has been seen from the above quotations, RV, which retains the tr “shape” for homîlôtâ, has tr “form” for ḥayyōn, which also serves to render several other Gr synonyms, such as μορφή, μορφής (Mk 16 12; Phil 2 6 f), μορφών, μορφοσία (Rom 2 20; 2 Tim 3 5), τόπος, τόποι, RVm "pattern," “pattern,” Rom 6 17, and στοιχεῖα, στοιχεοπαίδες (RV “pattern,” “pattern,” 2 Tim 1 13). In AV Wisd 18 1 “shape” translates μορφή, RV “form.”

SHAPHAP, shâfâm (שָׁפָם, shâphâm; סַפָּם, Sapîm, Sapâr, Sabâd): Name of a Gadite chief, who had the second place in command of his tribe (1 Ch 5 12). So far as the fragmentary genealogies are intelligible, they seem to indicate that Shapham and his chief, Joel, lived in the time of Saul and shared in the war against the Hagrites (1 Ch 5 7–10 18–22), but it is to be noted that these lists were first recorded between the years 750 and 740 BC, just before the eastern tribes were carried into captivity.

SHAPHAM, shafan (שָׁפָן, shaphâm, “rock-badger,” EV “ceney”); “Saphan, Saphephon”: An old totem clan name (so W. R. Smith; cf. however, art. TOTEMISM: Gray, HPN, 103 ff, and Jacob’s Studies in Bib. Archaeology, 84 ff).

(1) Son of Azaliah and scribe of King Josiah. He received from Hilkiah the Book of the Law which had been found in the Temple (2 K 22 3 ff; 2 Ch 34 8–28). It was from Shaphan’s lips that Josiah heard the Law read. Shaphan was also one of those sent by the king to the prophetess Huldah (2 K 22; 2 Ch 34). He was undoubtedly one of the staunchest supporters of Josiah in his work of reform. He was the father of Ahikam (2 K 22 12; 2 Ch 20 34; Jer 26 24), who befriended and protected the prophet Jeremiah. Another son, Eliasah, was one of the two men intrusted by Jeremiah with his letter to the captives in Babylon (Jer 29 3). A third son, Gemariah, vied (of Judah) to prevent King Jehoiakim from burning “the roll” (Jer 36 10.11.12. 25). The Micaiah of Jer 36 11.12, and Gedaliah, the governor of Judaea after the captivity of 586 BC, were his grandsons (Jer 39 14).

(2) Perhaps the father of Jazaniah, one of the 70 men whom Ezekiel saw in his vision of the Temple, sacrificing to idols (Ez 8 11).

HORACE J. WOLF

SHAPHAT, sha’fat (שָׂפָט), shaphatḥ (שָפָט): (1) The Simeonite spy (Nu 13 5; Zeph, Sapahṭ).
(2) The father of the prophet Elisha (1 K 19 16; 2 K 4 1; LXX Sapahṭ).
(3) A name in the royal genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 3 22).
(4) A Gadite (1 Ch 5 12).
(5) One of David’s herdersmen (1 Ch 27 29).

SHAPHER, sha’fer. See SHEPHER.

SHAPHIR, sha’fer (שַׁפִּר, shaphir), “glittering”; kalṣōṣ, kalōz; AV Saphir: One of a group of towns mentioned in Mic 1 10–15. From the association with Gath, Azor (of Judah) and Mare(shah, it would seem that the places mentioned were in Southwestern Pal. According to Onom, there was a Zaphir, Sapheir, “in the hill country” (from a confusion with Shamir [Josh 15 48], where LXX A han Sapheir) between Eautrophos and Ascalon. The name probably survives in that of three villages called es-Safir, in the plain, some 34 miles S.E. of Ashdod (PER, 11, 413, 5b XV). Cheyne (EB, col. 4582) suggests the white “glittering” hill Tell es-Safir, at the entrance to the Wady es-Sant, which is known to the Crusaders as Blan-garde, but this site seems a more probable one for Gath (q.v.).

SHARAI, sha-raj, sha’ri (שָׁרָי, šārəy): One of the sons of Bani who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 40).

SHARAIM, sha-raj-im. See SHAARAIM.

SHARAR, sha-raj. See SCHAR.

SHARE, sha’ar. See FLOW.

SHAREZER, sha-re-zèr (שָׁרֶצֶר, sar’ezer, ‘ṣ; Shareer): (1) Connotes to the Assyri Shar-ugur, “protect the king”; found otherwise, not as a complete name, but as elements in personal names, e.g. Bel-šar-ugur, “may Bel protect the king,” which is the equivalent of Belshazzar (Dan 5 1). The name is borne by two persons in the OT:
(1) The son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, who with Adrammelech and Tachcun was slain by his father (2 K 19 37; Isa 37 38). The Bab Chronicle says concerning Sennacherib’s death: “On the 20th day of Tibet Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was slain by his son in a revolt.” This differs from the OT account in that it speaks of only one murderer, and does not give his name. How the two accounts can be harmonized is still uncertain. Hitzig, (Kritik, 1941 ff), following Ahydenius, as quoted by Eusebius, completed the name of Sennacherib’s son, so as to read Nergal-sharezer = Nergal-šar-ugur (Jer 39 3.13), and this is accepted by many modern scholars. Johns thinks that Sharezer (šar’ezer or sar’ezer) may be a corruption from Sharr’-etir-Asur, the name of a son of Sennacherib (1-vol. HDB, s.v.). The question cannot be definitely settled.

(2) A contemporary of the prophet Zechariah, mentioned in connection with the sending of a delegation to the spiritual heads of the community to inquire concerning the propriety of continuing the fertility observance. Perhaps Sharr’-etir has a connection with Sharezer, and is possibly related to “they of Beth-el,” hence some have thought, esp. since Sharezer seems incomplete, that in the two words Beth-el and Sharezer we have a corruption of what was originally a single proper name, perhaps Bel-sharezer = Bel-šar-ugur = Belshazzar. The present text, no matter how it reads, presents difficulties. See REGEM-MELECH.

F. C. EISELEI

SHARON, sha’rôn (שָׁרוֹן, ha-sharon), with the del. art. possibly meaning “the plain”; ṭo n라도, ṭo pedion, ṭo drumos, ṭo drumo, ṭo Sarōn. (1) This name is attached to the strip of fairly level land which runs between the mountains and the shore of the Mediterranean, stretching from Nahr Robin in the S. to Mt. Carmel in the N. There are considerable rolling hills; but, compared with the mountains to the E., it is quite properly described as a plain. The soil is a deep rich loam, which is favorable to the growth of cereals. The orange, the vine and the olive grow to great perfection. Where the many-colored flowers are in bloom it is a scene of rare beauty.

Of the streams in the plain four carry the bulk of the water from the western slopes of the mountains to the sea. They are also perennial, being fed by fountains. Nahr el-A‘ujeh enters the sea to the N. of Jaffa; Nahr Iskanderînâ 7 miles, and Nahr el-Mefîr fully 2 miles S. of Caesarea; and Nahr ez-Zerkâ, the “Crocodile River,” 2½ miles N. of Caesarea. Nahr el-Valîk runs its short course about 12 miles N. of Nahor el-A‘ujeh, and at almost any point it may be obtained by digging. Deep, finely built wells near some of the villages are among the most precious legacies left by the Crusaders. The breadth of the plain varies from 8 to 12 miles, being broadest in the S. There are traces of a great forest in the northern part, which accounts for the use of the term drumos. Jos (Ant., XIV, xiii, 3) speaks of “the woods” (hoi drumol) and Strabo (xiv) of “a great wood. There is still a considerable oak wood in this district. The “excellency” of Carmel and Sharon (Isa 35 2) is probably an allusion to the luxuriant oak forests.

As in ancient times, great breaths are given up to the pasturing of cattle. Over David’s herds that fed in Sharon was Shime a in the Sharonite (1 Ch 27 29). In the day of Israel’s sin “Quail shall be a fold of flocks” (Isa 66 10). Jerome speaks of the fine cattle fed in the pastures of Sharon, and also sings the praises of its wine (Comm. on Isa 33 and 65). Toward the S. no doubt there was more cultivation than in the present day. The Ger. colony to the N. of Jaffa, preserving in its name, Sarôna, the old Gr. name of the plain, and several Jewish colonies are proving the wonderful productivity of the soil. The orange groves of Jaffa and Caesarea indicate that the land is still the same.

“The rose of Sharon” (Cant 2 1) is a mistranslation: hâbâqâceleth is not a “rose,” but the white narcissus, which in season abounds in the plain.
Sharon is mentioned in the NT only in Acts 9 35.
(2) A district E. of the Jordan, occupied by the tribe of Gad (1 Ch 5 16; here the name is without the art.). Kittel ("Ch., 'SBOT") suggests that this is a corruption from "Sirion," which again is synonymous with Hermon. He would therefore identify Sharon with the pasture lands of Hermon. Others think that the mtsbar or table-land of Gilead is intended.

(3) In Josh 12 18 we should perhaps read "the king of Aphek in Sharon." See LASHARON. The order seems to point to some place N.E. of Tabor. Perhaps this is to be identified with the Sarona of Onom in the district between Tabor and Tiberias. If so, the name may be preserved in that of Sarona on the plateau to the S.W. of Tiberias.

W. EWING

Canaanitish descent. The patronymic Shaulites is found in Nu 26 13.
(3) An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6 24 [Heb 9]); in ver 36 he is called "Joel."

SHAVEH, sha've, VALE OF ("^", 'emek shâ'el). See King's Vale.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM, shâ've-kir-ya-thâ'îm ("^", shâ'ew kir'ya-thâ'îm; en Saôthâ'ti-pol). Here Chedorlaomer is said to have defeated the Emim (Gen 14 5). RV reads "the plain of Kiriathaim." If this rendering is right, we must look for the place in the neighborhood of Kiriathaim of Moab (Jer 48 1, etc), which is probably represented today by el-Kâreiyât, about 7 miles to the N. of Dibon.

SHARONITE, shâr'ûn-ît ("^", ho-shâró'tî; ε Σαρωνιτής, ho Sarōnîtîs): Applied in Scripture only to Shitrai (1 Ch 27 20). See SHARON.

SHARUHEN, sha-ro'hen ("^", shâ'râh'en; οι ἀγολ αὐτῶν, ho agol autôn): One of the cities in the territory of Judah assigned to Simeon (Josh 19 6). In 15 32 it is called "Shilhim," and in 1 Ch 4 31, "Shaaraim" (q.v.).

SHASHAI, sha'shâ'î ("^", shâ'shâ'y; Σασσεί, Sesset): One of the sons of Bani who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 40) = "Sessis" in 1 Esd 9 34.

SHASHAK, shâ'shâk ("^", shâshâh'; Ἀσσαχ): Eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8 14 25).

SAUL, shâ'ul, SHALULITES, shâ'ûl-ît's ("^", shâ'îl; Σαοῦ, Saûol):
(1) A king of Edom (Gen 36 37 ff = 1 Ch 1 48 f).
(2) A son of Simon (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 13; 1 Ch 4 24). The clan was of notoriously impure stock, and, therefore, Shaul is called "the son of a Canaanitish woman" (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15); the clan was of mixed Israelitish and Shaving, shaving (in Job 1 20, gâ'az, usually gâ'â, gâ'âh; in Acts 21 24, ἔποτα, xurââ): Customs as to shaving differ in different countries, and in ancient and modern times. Among the Egyptians it was customary to shave the whole body (cf Gen 41 14). With the Israelites, shaving the head was a sign of mourning (Dt 21 12; Job 1 20); ordinarily the hair was allowed to grow long, and was only cut at intervals (cf Absalom, 2 S 14 26). Nazirites were forbidden to use a razor, but when their vow was expired, or if they were defiled, they were to shave the whole head (Nu 6 5.9.18 ff; cf Acts 21 24). The shaving of the beard was not permitted to the Israelites; they were prohibited from shaving off even "the corner of their beard" (Lev 21 5). It was an unpardonable insult when Hahn, king of the Ammonites, cut off the half of the beards of the Israelites whom David had sent to him (2 S 10 4; 1 Ch 13 4).

Shaving "with a razor that is hired" is Issiah's graphic figure to denote the complete devastation of Judah by the Assyry army (Isa 7 20).

SHAVSHA, shav'sha ("^", shav'shâ'; in 2 S 20 25, K'tibhâ, N'tâ, shav'â; K'tê, N'tê, shô'â; EV "Sheva," are refuted by LXX; in 2 S 8 15-18, in other respects identical with Ch, “Seraiah” is found. LXX. David's personages in all passages; it is the general consensus that Shavsha is correct): State secretary or scribe during the reign of David (1 Ch 18:16; 2 S 20:25). He was the first occupant of this office, which was created by David. It is significant that his father's name is omitted in the very exact list of David's officers of state (1 Ch 18:11-17), in this fact, coupled with the foreign sound of his name, points to his being an "alien"; the assumption that the state secretary handled correspondence with other countries may explain David's choice of a foreigner for this post. Shavsha's two sons, Eliehoeph and Ahijah, were secretaries of state under Solomon; they are called "sons of Shisha" (1 K 4:3), "Shisha" probably a variant of "Shavsha."

Horace J. Wolf

SHAWL, sōl: RV substitutes "shawls" for AV "wimples" in Isa 3:22. See DRESS.

SHEAF, shēf; SHEAVES, shāv (םש), "'almāḥ, ʿōmer, ṭemār, ṭemēr): When the grain is reaped, it is laid in handfuls back of the reaper to be gathered by children or those who cannot stand the harder work of reaping (Ps 129:7). The handfuls are bound into large sheaves, two of which are laden at a time to a donkey (cf Neh 5:15). In some districts carts are used (cf Am 2:13). The sheaves are piled about the threshing-floors until threshing time, which may be several weeks after harvest. It is an impressive sight to see the huge stacks of sheaves piled about the threshing-floors, the piles often covering an area greater than the nearby villages (see AGRICULTURE). The ancient Egyptians bound their grain into small sheaves, forming the bundles with care so that the heads were equally distributed between the two ends (see Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, 1878, II, 22; cf Joseph's dream, Gen 37:5-8). The sheaves mentioned in Lev 32:10-12.15 must have been handfu.l. It is a custom in parts of Syria for the gatherers of the sheaves to run toward a passing horseman and wave a handful of grain, shouting kemshi, kemshi (lit. "handful"). They want the horseman to feed the grain to his horse. In OT times forgotten sheaves had to be left for the sojourner (Dt 24:19); cf the kindness shown to Ruth by the reapers of Boaz (Ruth 2:7-8).

Figurative: "Being hungry they carry the sheaves" is a picture of torment similar to that of the hungry horse urged to go by the bundle of hay tied before him (Job 34:10). The joyful sight of the sheaves of an abundant harvest was used by the Psalmist to typify the joy of the returning captives (Ps 126:6).

James A. Patch

SHEAL, sēl (שֵׁל, sēlād, "request"): One of the Israelisites of the sons of Bani who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10:34; LXX: Solowai, LXX Luc., Assālī; 1 Esd 9:30, "Janassul").

SHEALTIEL, sēl-ōltī-ēl (שֵׁלתֵי-ל, sēlēltēl, but in Hag 1:12, 14; 2:1; LXX: Saulitēl; LXX and the NT always Saulēthiā, Saulēthiēl, hence "Sala- thiel") of 1 Esd 5:48.56; 6:2; AV of Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27: Father of Zerbabel (Ex 3:2:5; 5:2; Mt 1:12,13; Lk 3:27,14; Luke 3:27,14; fact, coupled with the statement of the first in Hag 1:17, Shealtiel was the oldest son of King Jeconiah; in ver 19 the MT makes Pedaiah, a brother of Shealtiel, the father of Zerbabel (cf Curtis, ICC)."}

SHEAR, šēr. See SHEEP; SHEEP TENDING.

SHEARAH, shē-ā-ri'a, shē-ăr'ya (שְׁרָיָה, šārāyah; Šarād, Sarād): A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:38; 9:44).

SHEARING, shēr'ing, HOUSE: SHEAR, shēr (שֵׁר, šēr): "house of binding of the shepherds"; B, Bāsdākā (א. בָּשָׁדָקָה) for nāqāmōn, nāqātēthākā (Bathkkādā, tvā nāqāmānān): Here in the course of his extinction of the house of Ahab, Jehu met and destroyed 42 men, "the brethren of Aha- ziah king of Judah" (2 K 10:12-14). Onom takes the phrase as a proper name, Bethacath, and locates the village between Lod and Ramah in the plain. This seems to point to identification with Beit Kād, about 3 miles E. of Jenin.

SHEAR-JASHUB, shē-ār-jāshūb or jāshūb (שֵׁיהוּב, shē'ār yāshāhb, "a remnant shall return"): LXX ko katalerphtheis lusoubl: The son of Isaiah, who accompanied him when he set out to meet Ahaz (Isa 7:3). The name like that of other children of prophets (cf "Immanuel," "Mathershalash-baz," "Lo-ruhamah," etc) is symbolic of mercy in which the prophet wishes to emphatize. Thus Isaiah uses the very words shē'ār yāshāhb to express his oft-repeated statement that a remnant of Israel will return to Jeh (Isa 10:21).

SHEATH, sēth. See SWORD.

SHEBA, šē̄ba (שֶׁבָּה, šēbāh; Šephā, Sābī): (1) Sheba and Dedan are the two sons of Raamah son of Cush (Gen 10:7). (2) Sheba and Dedan are the two sons of Jokshan the son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen 25:3). (3) Sheba is the son of Eber who was a descendant of Shem (10:28).

From the above statements it would appear that Sheba was the name of an Arab tribe, and consequently of Sem descent. The fact that Sheba and Dedan are represented as Cushite (Gen 10:7) would point to a migration of part of these tribes to Ethiopia, and similarly their derivation from Abraham (25:3) would indicate that some families were located in Syria. In point of fact Sheba was a South-Arabian or Southean tribe (Gen 10:29), and his own name and that of some of his brothers (e.g. Hazarmaveth = Hadhrumaut) are place-names in Southern Arabia. The Sabaeans or people of Saba or Sheba, are referred to as traders in gold and spices, and as inhabiting a country remote from Pal (1 K 10:1; Isa 60:6; Jer 6:20; Ezek 27:22; Ps 72:15; Mt 12:42), also as slave-traders (Joel 3:8), or even desert-rangers (Job 1:15; 6:19; cf CTS 84:3).

By the Arab genealogists Saba is represented as great-grandson of Kąhtán (=Joktan) and ancestor of all the South-Arabian tribes. He is the father of Himyar and Kahřán. He is said to have been named Saba because he was the first to take prisoners (shābālah) in war. He founded the capital of Saba and built its citadel Marīb (Marib), famous for its mighty barrage. The authentic history of the Sabaeans, so far as known, and the topography of their country are derived from South-Arabian inscription.

1. History: which began to be discovered about the middle of the last century, and from coins dating from about 150 BC to 150 AD, the first collection of which was published in 1850, and from the South-Arabian geographer Eudoxus, which was later made known to European scholars. One of the Sabaeans kings is known from Assyrian inscriptions of the year 715 BC; and he is apparently not the earliest. The native monuments are scattered over the period extending from before that time until the 6th cent. AD, when the Sabaean state came to an end, being most numerous about the commencement of the Sabean and the name of the nation of which Marib was the usual capital. The Sabaeans at first shared the sovereignty of South Arabia with Himyar and one or two other nations, but gradually absorbed the territories of these some time after the Christian era. The form of government seems to have been that of a republic or oligarchy, the chief magistracy going by a kind of rotation, and more than one "king" holding office simultaneously (similarly Dt 4:47 and often in the OT). The people seem to have been divided into patricians and plebeians, the former of whom had the right to build castles and to share in the government.

A number of deities are mentioned on the inscriptions, two chief being Baal-Makki and Ta'lab. Others are Athtar (masc. form of the Bib. 'dathr'), Hammon (the Bib. Rimmon), the Sun, and others. The Sun and Athtar were further defined by the addition of the name of a place or tribe, just as Baal in the OT. Worship took the form of gifts to the temples, of sacrifice, incense, of pilgrimages and prayers. Ceremonial ablution, and abstinence from certain things, as well as formal dedication of the worshipper and his household and goods to the deity, were also religious acts. In return the deity took charge of his worshipper's castle, wells, and belongings, and supplied him with cereals, vegetables and fruits, as well as granted him male issue.

(1) The chief occupations of the Sabaeans were raising and trade. The chief products of their country are enumerated in Is 60:16, which agrees with the Assyrian inscriptions. The most important of all commodities was incense, and it is significant that the same word which in the other Sem languages means "gold," in Sabaean means "per-fume" (and also "gold"). To judge, however, from the number of times they are mentioned upon the inscriptions, agriculture bulked much more largely in the thoughts of the Sabaeans than commerce, and was of equal importance with religion.

(2) The high position occupied by women among the Sabaeans is reflected in the story of the Queen of Sheba and Solomon. In almost all respects women appear to have been considered the equal of men, and to have shared the same religious and even military functions. Polygamy does not seem to have been practised. The Sabaeans inscriptions do not go back far enough to throw any light upon the queen who was contemporary with Solomon, and the Arab, Khalif. It was information of her who is merely due to the latter being the only Sabaean queen known to them. Bilkiš must have lived several centuries later than the Heb monarch.

(3) The alphabet used in the Sabean inscriptions is considered by most scholars to be the original Sem alphabet, from which the others are derived. In other respects Sabean art seems to be dependent upon that of Assyria, Persia and Greece. The coins are Gr and Rom style, while the system of weights employed is Persia. See further SABAENS.

SHEBA, sheb'h (שֵׁבָה; shehba'ha; Zêber, Sêber, or Sâmê, Sâmâ); The name of one of the towns allotted to Simeon (Josh 19:12). AV mentions it as an independent town, but as it is not mentioned at all in the parallel list (1 Ch 4:28), and is omitted in Josh 19:2 in some MSS, it is probable that RV is correct in its tr "Ieer-sheba or Sheba." Only in this way can the total of towns in this group be made 13 (Josh 19:6). If it is a separate name, it is probably the same as SHEMA (q.v.).

SHEBA, QUEEN OF. See QUEEN OF SHEBA.

SHEBAH, sheb'hasha. See SHEBAH.

SHEBAM, sheb'hash. See SHEBAH.

SHEBAH, sheb'ha'shána. See SHEBAH.

SHEBAHANIAH, sheb-a'nhâ, sheb-bân'ya (שְׂבַּה חַנָּא; sheb'hanyâh), in 1 Ch 16:24, sh'b'hanyâhâh): (1) Name of a Levite or a Levitical family that participated in the religious rites that followed the reading of the Law (Neh 9:4). The name is given in Neh 10:10 among those that sealed the covenant.

(2) A priest or Levite who took part in the sealing of the covenant (Neh 10:4; 12:14). See SHECAHIAH.

(3) Another Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:12).

(4) A priest in the time of David (1 Ch 15:24).

SHEBARIAM, sheb'ârim, sheb'hâ'rim (שֶׁבַּרְיָה; sh'bharyâh; ka-shb'hârîm; sôrâ'pâ'rim, sôd'ârâ'rim): After the repulse of the first attack on their city the men of Ai chased the Israelites "even unto Shebariam" (Josh 7:5). RV reads "the quarter"; so Keil, Steuernagel, etc. LXX reads "until they were broken," translating "the quarter" as "leaders." The direction of the flight was of course from Ai toward Gilgal in the Jordan valley. No trace of such a name has yet been found.

SHEBAT, sheb'at' (שֵׁבַת; shb'hāṭ): The 11th month of the Jewish year (See 1:7), corresponding to February. See CALENDAR.

SHEBER, sheb'her (שֶׁבֶר; shehber'; B, Zêbêp, Sêber, A, Zêbêp, Sêber): A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Ch 2:48).

SHEBNA, sheb'nâ (שֵׁבֵן; shebh'na; Zômâos, Sâmâos; but רבנָה, shebh'nâh, in 2 K 18:10, 18:18:26:37 and 19:2 = Isa 36:11:22 and 37:2; Isa 22:15)): In Isa 22:15 Shebna is referred to as he "who is over the house," or household, apparently that of the king. The phrase is the 3rd "steward of the house" in RV of Gen 43:16:19; 44:1, in Isa 22 and occurs also in 39:4, "overseer;" 44:4. It is used of an officer of the Northern Kingdom in 1 K 15:2; 18:11, 3:15: K 10:5. This officer is distinguished from him "that was over the city" in 2 K 10:5, and it is said in 2 K 15:5 that after his father Azariah was stricken with leprosy, "Joatham, the king's son, was over the household, judging all the people of the land." Again Isa 22:15 speaks of "this sôkhên," a phrase that must apply to Shebna if the prophecy refers to him. This word is the participle of a vb. meaning "to be of use or service;" so "to benefit" in Job 15:13; 22:2; 34:9. The fem. participle is employed of Ahishag in 1 K 2:24, where AV translates "cherisher;" BDB renders it "servitor" or "steward" in Isa 22:15. It occurs also as a Can. gloss in the Am Tab. (Winckler no. 2579:9). The sôkhên was a high officer: Shebna had splendid chariots (v. 18), but what the office exactly was is not certain. The other reference to Shebna in the title of the prophecy would lead one to conclude that it denoted him "who was over the household,"

Shebna

i.e. governor of the palace, probably, or major-domo. The word ἱκέν is thus a general title; others deny this, maintaining that it would then occur more frequently.

In 2 K 18 f = Isa 36 f we find too a Shebna mentioned among the officers of Hezekiah. There he is called the σήφερ, "scribe" or "secretary," a minister of state of some kind, whereas Eliakim is he "who is over the household." Is then the Shebna of Isa 22 the same as this officer? It is of course possible that two men of the same name should hold high office about the same time. We find Shebna (Shebhnî) twice in the prophecies of Isaiah and Hosea: (2 K 18 18) and a Joah (ben Jozahz) having the very same position under Josiah a century later (2 Ch 34 8). But such a coincidence is rare. Had there been two high officials of state bearing this name, it is most probable that they would somehow have been distinguished one from the other. Shebna's name is thought to be Aram., thus pointing to a foreign descent, but G. B. Gray, "Isc.," ICC, 373 f, denies this. We can perhaps safely infer that he was a native from the fact that he was hewing himself a sepulchre in Jerus., apparently among those of the Heb nobility, whereas a native would have an ancestral burial-place in the land.

However, in 2 K 21, Shebna is the scribe and not the governor of the palace. How is this to be explained? The answer is in Isaiah's prophecy.

The prophecy of Isa 22 divides itself into 3 sections. The words "against [not as RV "unto"] and is over the house," or is over the palace, are properly the title of the 15 ff. section, and should come therefore at the very beginning of ver 15.

(1) Vs 15-18 form one whole. In ver 16 the words "hewing him out a sepulchre," etc. should be placed immediately before the rest of the verse as ver 16a with the rest of the section is in the second person. We thus read (vs 15-17): 'Against Shebna who was over the house. Thus saith the Lord, Jeh of hosts, Go unto this steward (RV'm) that is hewing him out a sepulchre on high, graving a habitation for himself in the rock, [and say] What dost thou here and whom hast thou here that thou hast hewed thee out here a sepulchre? Behold, Jeh of hosts,

Box (Isa) would further transpose some parts of vs 17 f. Shebna is to be looked as a ball into "a land wide of sides," i.e. a broad extensive land. He is addressed as a disigrant to the house of his royal master. The prophecy is not a personal inveighing, and one asks what had made him so indignant. Some (e.g. Dillmann, Delitzsch) suggest that Shebna was the leader of a pro-Egypt party, while others (e.g. Cheyne) believe that the party was pro-Assyrian (Sadd 5 5-9a). The actual date of the prophecy can only be inferred.

(2) Isa 22 19-23 contains a prophecy, which states that Eliakim is to be given someone's post, apparently that of Shebna, if this section be by Isaiah; ver 23, however, is held by many to be a gloss. These verses are not so vehement in tone as the previous ones. Some maintain that the section is not by Isaiah (Duhm, Marti). It can, however, be Iisianic, only later in date than vs 15 f, being possibly meant to modify the former utterance. The palace governor is to lose his office and to be succeeded by Eliakim, who is seen to hold that post in 2 K 18 f (see Eliakim).

(3) Vs 24 f are additions to the two utterances by a later hand; they predict the ruin of such official life to his own family.

There is nothing a priori against believing that these three sections are entirely independent one of another, but there seems to be some connection between (1) and (2), and again between (2) and (3).

Note the question to be preceded.

4. Date Is that of the relation of Isa 22 15 ff of the Prophecy given the events of 701 BC. We have the following facts: (a) Shebna is scribe in 701, and Eliakim is governor of the palace in Isa 22 15, and is to be deposed; (b) if Isa 22 18-22 be by Isaiah, Eliakim was to succeed Shebna in that post. Omitting for the moment everything but (a) and (b), the only solution that is to any extent satisfactory is that Isa 22 15-18 is to be dated previous to 701 BC. This is the view preferred by G. B. Gray, op. cit. And this is the most satisfactory theory if we take (2) above into consideration. The prophecy then contained in (1) had not been as yet fulfilled in 701, but (2) had come to pass; Shebna was no longer governor of the palace, but held the position of scribe. Exile might still be in store for him.

Another explanation is put forward by K. Fullerton in 1917, LX, 337 ff., that Isa 22 15-18 is a later history, perhaps as late as the year 621-42. Fullerton sets vs 24 f as not due to Isaiah, and maintains that Isa 22 15-18 was spoken by the prophet early in the reign of Manasseh, i.e. later than 2 K 18 f. "not so much as a prophecy, a sample pronouncement, as an attempt to save the palace office..." It must be admitted that Isaiah probably did not succeed. The reactionary party seems to have remained in council during the reign of Manasseh. Unfortunately, the moral significance of Isaiah does not depend on the fulfillment of this or that specific prediction. We are dealing not with a walking oracle, but with a great character and a noble life (p. 639). He does, however, feel from the end of the house," that a conspiracy had been formed against him by the prophetic party which proposed to place Eliaim on the throne" (p. 560). Isaiah thinks he would not "resort to such violent measures," and so the character of Isaiah makes it questionable whether he was the author of vs 20-23. This part would then be due to the prophetic party who went a step further than their great leader would approve. This view assumes too much, (a) that the terms in vs 20-23 refer toingly power; (b) that Eliakim was of Davidic descent, unless we have a man of non-Davidic origin aspiring to the throne, which is again a thing unheard of in Isaiah; and (c) that there was such a plot in the reign of Manasseh, of which we have no proof.

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

SHEBUEL, sh'e-búl'd, sheb'úl'd (םשבוייל, Shebhi'el; Σωβαύλ, Soubail): (1) A son of Gershom and grandson of Moses (1 Ch 23 16). He was "ruler over the treasures" (26 24). In 24 20 he is called "Shubael," which is probably the original form of the name (see Gray, HIN, 310).

(2) A son of Heman (1 Ch 25 4), called in ver 20 "Shubael" (LXX as in ver 4).

SHECANIAH, SHECHANIAH, shek-an'-í-a, shek'án-ya (שְׁכַנִּית, Shekhannya) [in 1 Ch 24 11; 2 Ch 31 15, Shekhannah; B. Ἰσχάνα, Iischanâ, Σέχανα, Sekhâni]: (1) A descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 21 22). This is the same Shecaniah mentioned in Ezra 8 8.

(2) "The sons of Shecaniah," so the MT of Ezra 8 5 reads, were among those who returned with Ezra, but a name appears to have been lost from the text, and we should probably read "the sons of Shecaniah the son of Jahaziel" (of 1 Esd 8 32, "of the sons of Zattoshe, Schenias the son of Jezzebel").

(3) Chief of the tenth course of priests (1 Ch 24 11).

(4) A priest in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 15).

(5) A contemporary of Ezra who supported him in his opposition to foreign marriages (Ezr 10 2).

(6) The father of Shechaniah, "the keeper of the east gate" (Neh 3 29).
(7) The father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh 6:18).
(8) The eponym of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:3). It is the same name which, by an interchange of (2) bh and (2) kh, appears as Shebaniah (see Shebaniah, [2]) in Neh 10:4-12.14.

Shechem, shē'kem (Σχῆμα; șekhem, "shoulder"); Συχέμ, Suchém, ἡ Σίκιμα, ἡ Σικίμα, τὰ Σίκιμα, τὰ Σικίμα, etc; AV gives "Shechem" in 1. Histori- Gen 12:6; and "Sycem" in Acts 7:16): This place is first mentioned in connection with Abraham's journey from Haran. At the oak of Moreh in the vicinity he reared his first altar to the Lord in Pal (Gen 12:6f). It was doubtless by this oak that Jacob, on his return from Paddan-aram, buried "the strange [ARV "foreign"] gods" (36:4). Hither he had come after his meeting with Esau (33:18). Onom here identifies Shechem with Shalem; but see SHLEM. To the E. of the city Jacob pitched his tent in a "parcel of ground" which he had bought from Hamor, Shechem's father (ver 19). Here also he raised an altar and called it El-Elohe-Israel, "God, the God of Israel" (ver 20). Then follows the story of Dinah's defilement by Shechem, son of the city's chief; and of the treacherous and terrible vengeance exacted by Simeon and Levi (ch 34). To the rich pasture land near Shechem Joseph came to seek his brethren (37:2). It is mentioned as lying to the W. of Michmethath (el-Mothneh) on the boundary of Manasseh (Josh 17:7). It was in the territory of Ephraim; it was made a city of refuge, and assigned to the Kohathite Levites (20:7; 21:21).

Near the city the Law was promulgated (Dt 27:11; Josh 8:33). When his end was approaching Joshua gathered the tribes of Israel here and addressed to them his final words of counsel and exhortation (ch 24). Under the oak in the neighboring sanctuary he set up the stone of witness (ver 20). The war of conquest being done, Joseph's bones were buried in the parcel of ground which Jacob had bought, and which fell to the lot of Joseph's descendants (ver 33). Abimelech, whose mother was a native of the city, persuaded the men of Shechem to make him king (Jgs 9:1-6), evidently seeking a certain consecration from association with "the oak of the pillar that was in Shechem." Joshua's parable was spoken from the cliff of Gerizim overlooking the town (vs 7f). After a reign of three years Abimelech was rejected by the people. He captured the city, razed it to the foundations, and sowed it with salt. It was then the seat of Can. idolatry, the temple of Baal-berith being here (Jgs 9:44). In the time of the kings we find that the city was once more a gathering-place of the nation. It was evidently the center, esp. for the northern tribes; and hither Rehoboam came in the hope of getting his succession to the throne confirmed (1 K 12:1; 2 Ch 10:1). At the disruption Jeroboam fortified the city and made it his residence (ver 25; Ant, VIII, viii, 4). The capital of the Northern Kingdom was moved, however, first to Tirzah and then to Samaria, and Shechem declined in political importance. Indeed it is not named again in the history of the monarchy. Apparently there were Israelites in it after the captivity, some of whom on their way to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem passed through the hands of Ishmael ben Nethaniah (Jer 41:5ff). It became the central city of the Samaritans, whose shrine was built on Mt. Gerizim (Sir 60:26; Ass, XI, viii, 6; XII, i, 1; XIII, iii, 4). Shechem was captured by John Hyrcanus I B.C. (Ass, XIII, ix, 1; BJ, i, 6). It appears in the NT only in the speech of Stephen (Acts 7:16, AV "Sychem"). Some (e.g., Smith, DB, s.v.) would identify it with Sychar of Jn 4:5; but see SheCh. Under the Romans it became Phila. Neapolis. It bore the name of a bishopric; the names of five occupants of the see are known.

There is no doubt as to the situation of ancient Shechem. It lay in the pass which cuts through Mt. Ephraim, Ebal and Gerizim.

2. Location guarding it on the N. and S. respectively, and Physically. Along this line runs the great biblical road which from time immemorial has formed the easiest and the quickest means of communication between the E. of Jordan and the sea. It must have been a place of strength from antiquity. The name seems to occur in Travels of a Mohar (Max Müller, Asien u. Europa, 394), "Mountain of Sahams" probably referring to Phila. (i.e., Gerizim). The ancient city may have lain somewhat farther E. than the modern Nablus, in which the Rom name Neapolis survives. The situation is one of great beauty. The city lies close to the foot of Gerizim. The terraced slopes of the mountain rise directly on the S. side of the valley, with the sound of running water, the great bulk of Ebal rises on the N., its sides, shaggy with prickly pear, sliding down into corn fields and orchards. The equis springs which supply abundance of water rise at the base of Gerizim. The fruitful and well-wooded valley winds westward among the hills. It is traversed by the carriage road leading to Jaffa and the sea. Eastward the valley opens upon the plain of Makmeh. To the E. of the city, in a reccia at the base of Gerizim, is the sanctuary known as the Elijah of Mount, i.e., "men of the column" or "pillars," where some would locate the ancient "Oak of Moreh" or "of the pillar." Others would find it in a little village farther E. with a fine spring called Ballat or Ballat, the name which may be connected with ballat, "oak." Still farther to the E. and near the base of Ebal is the traditional tomb of Joseph, a little white-domed building beside a luxuriant orchard. On the slope of the mountain beyond is the village of el-Azor, see Sychar. To the S. of the vale is the traditional Well of Jacob; see Jacob's Well. To the S.W. of the city is a small mosque on the spot where Jacob is said to have moured over the blood-stained coat of Joseph. In the neighboring mararet is a stone whereon the Ten Commandments are engraved in Samaritan characters. The main center of the town in the town is the synagogue of the Samaritans, with their ancient MS of the Pent.

The modern town contains about 20,000 inhabitants, the great body of them being Moslems.

3. Modern Shechem

The church. The Samaritans do not total more than 200. The place is still the market for a wide district, both E. and W. of Jordan. A considerable trade is done in cotton and wool. Soap is manufactured in large quantities, oil for this purpose being plentifully supplied by the olives growing in the vicinity, and leather goods are also carried on. In old times the slopes of Ebal were covered with vineyards; but these formed a source of temptation to the "faithful." They were therefore removed by authority, and their place taken by the prickly pears mentioned above.

SHCHEMITEs, she-kem-its (וֹשֵׁךְ, ha-shekhitm, סְכֵּמִי, Suchemeli); The descendants of Shechem the son of Gilead, a clan of Eastern Manasseh (Nu 26:31; Josh 17:3).

SHED, SHEL'ING, The three Heb words, naphar, sâm or süm and shaphak, tr'd "shed" in many OT passages, always mean a "pouring out," and in nearly every case the point to the effusion of blood (Gen 37:26; 44:9; Josh 21:22; 1 Ch 22:8; Prov 16, etc.). The Gr words ἔκχω, ἐκχέω, and ἐκχώρηω, have precisely the same specific meaning (Mt 23:35; 26:28; Mk 14:24; Lk 11:50; He 9:22, Rev 16:6). Sometimes they are tropically used in reference to the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2 33 AV; Tit 3:6), and to the outpouring of the love of God in the believer's heart (Rom 5:5).

Henry E. Dusker

SHED'EUR, shed'-er, shëd-ä'r, "daybreak"; Sh'dbör, She'doër, She'doir, She'dōir, "lightning"; She'döir, "shock"; (Num 15:1; 34:5, AV, B.B.); She'dbir, "third" (Num 15:1; 34:5; B.B.; Gr. Ipsi, "third"; Acts 7:43). Fr. Delitzsch correctly conceives the name as an Assyrian compound, šará udir, "daybreak." Cf., however, Gray, HPN, 169, 107, who emends the text to read Shaddâ'dūr, "Shaddai is flame.

SHEEP, shipt. The usual Heb word is נָקָה, cō'n, which is often tr'd "flock," e.g., "Abel . . . brought of the firstlings of his flock" (Gen 4:4); 1. Names "butter of the herd, and milk of the flock" (De 32:14). AV and ERV have "milk of sheep." Cf Arab. ʼā'd, ʼān. The Gr word is ἐκπλασθέω, probatón. For other names, see notes under CATTLE; EWE; LAMB; RAM.

The origin of domestic sheep is unknown. There are 11 wild species, the majority of which are found in Asia, and it is conceivable that they may have spread from the highlands of Central Asia to the other portions of their habitat. In North America is found the "bighorn," which is very closely related to a Rasmaskan species. One species, the wild aoudad, Ovis aries, is found in Europe. The Barbary sheep, Ovis tragelaphus, also known as the black or ariel, or its races, the AOU or the black Barbary sheep, Ovis aries, is found in Europe. The wild sheep of Europe is known as the Armenian wild sheep, Ovis aries, or the "black sheep" of Asia Minor and Persia. The wild sheep are in the same genus as the domestic sheep, and all are characterized by the possession of an enormous fat tail which weighs many pounds and is known in Arab. as ʼālūyāt, "fat tail" (AV "rumpp") (Ex 29:22; Lev 3:9; 7:3; 8:25; 9:19), which was burned in sacrifice. This is at the present day esteemed a great delicacy. Sheep are kept in large numbers by the Bedawin, but a large portion of the supply of mutton for the cities is from the sheep of Armenia and Kurdistan, of which great droves are brought down to the coast in easy stages. Among the Moslems every well-to-do family sacrifices a sheep at the feast of al-‘udha’, the 10th day of the month dhul-hijjat, 40 days after the end of azadad, the month of fasting. In Lebanon every peasant family during the summer fattens a young ram, which is literally cramped by one of the women of the household, who keeps the creature’s jaw moving with one hand while with the other she stuffs its mouth with vine or mulberry leaves. Every afternoon she washes it at the village fountain. When slaughtered in the fall it is called , , , , , , , and is very fat and the flesh very tender. Some of the meat and fat are eaten at once, but the greater part, fat and lean, is cut up fine, cooked together in a large vessel with pepper and salt, and stored in an earthen jar. This, the so-called , , , is used as needed through the winter.

In the mountains the sheep are gathered at night into folds, which may be caves or enclosures of rough stones. Fierce dogs assist the shepherd in warding off the attacks of wolves, and remain at the fold through the day to guard the slight bedding and simple utensils. In going to pasture the sheep are not driven but are led, following the shepherd as he walks before them and calls them. “When he hath put forth all his own, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice” (Jn 10:4).

The sheepfolds of Reuben on the plain of Gilad are referred to in Nu 32:16 and Jgs 5:10. A cave is mentioned in 1 S 24:3 in connection with the pursuit of David by Saul. The shepherd origin of David is referred to in Ps 78:70: ‘He chose David also his servant; And took him from the sheepfolds.’

Cf also 2 S 7:8 and 1 Ch 17:7.

The sheering of the sheep was a large operation and evidently became a sort of festival. Absalom invited the king’s sons to his sheep-shearing in Baal-hazor in order that he might find an opportunity to put Amasa to death while his heart was “very soft” (2 S 13:23-29). The character of the occasion is evident also from the indignation of David at Nabáal when the latter refused to provide entertainment at his sheep-shearing for David’s young men who had previously protected the sheep of Nabáal (1 S 25:2-15). There is also mention of the sheep-shearing of Judah (Gen 38:12) and of Laban (Gen 31:19), on which occasion Jacob stole away with his wives and children and his flocks.

Sheep were the most important sacrificial animals, a ram or a young male being often specified.

In the Books of Ch we find statements of enormous numbers of animals consumed in sacrifice: “And king Solomon offered unto the Lord upon the altar nineteen thousand oxen, and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep” (2 Ch 7:11); “And three sacrifices unto the Lord in that day in the reign of Asa ... seven hundred oxen and seven thousand sheep” (2 Ch 15:11); at the cleansing of the temple by Zerubbabel (the consecrated things comprising two hundred and one hundred oxen and three thousand sheep. But the priests were too few, so that they could not carry all the burnt offerings: wherefore their brethren the Levites did help them” (2 Ch 29:33); and “Hoshea king of Judah did give to the assembly a thousand bullocks and ten thousand sheep” (2 Ch 30:24). In the account of the war of the sons of Reuben and their allies with the Hagrites, we read: “And they took away their cattle; of their camels fifty thousand, and of sheep two hundred and fifty thousand, and of asses two thousand, and of men a hundred thousand” (1 Ch 21:1). A king of Moab is called a “sheep-master,” and we read that “he rendered unto the king of Israel the wool of a hundred thousand rams, and of a hundred thousand rams” (2 K 3:4).

Christ is represented as the Lamb of God (Isa 53:7; Jn 1:29; Rev 5:6). Some of the most beautiful passages in the Bible represent God as a shepherd: “From thence is the shepherd, the stone of Israel” (Gen 49:24); “Jeh is my shepherd: I shall not want” (Ps 23:1; cf Isa 40:11; Ezk 34:12-16). Jesus said “I am the good shepherd; and I know mine own, and mine own know me; and I lay down my life for the sheep” (Jn 10:14). The people without leaders are likened to sheep without a shepherd (Nu 27:17; 1 K 22:17; 2 Ch 18:16; Ezk 34:5). Jesus at the Last Supper applies to Himself the words of Zec 13:7; “I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad” (Mt 26:31; Mk 14:27). The enemies of Jeh are compared to the fat of the sacrifice that is consumed away in smoke (Ps 37:20). God’s people are “the sheep of his pasture” (Ps 79:13; 96:7; 100:3). In sinning they become like lost sheep (Isa 53:6; Jer 50:6; Ezk 34:6; Lk 15:3ff). In the mouth of Nathan the poor man’s one little ewe lamb is a vivid image of the treasure of which the king David has robbed Uriah the Hittite (2 S 12:4). In Cant 6:6, the teeth of the bride are likened to a flock of ewes, so that “the wolf shall dwell with the lamb” (Isa 11:6) and that “the wolf and the lamb shall feed together” (Isa 65:25). Jesus says to His disciples, “I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves” (Mt 10:16; cf Lk 10:3). In the parable of the good shepherd we read: “He is a hireling, and not a shepherd, whose own sheep are not, beholdeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth” (Jn 10:12).

SHEEP COT, shēp‘kot, shēp’kōt, SHEEPFOLD, shēp’fəld (תְּבֶל, gēḇēresh, תְּבֶל, mikhālah, תְּבֶל, mishyphthayim, תְּבֶל, nāvōch; ‘adīk, ‘ađel): At night the sheep are driven into a sheepfold if they are in a district where there is danger from robbers or wild beasts. These folds are simple walled enclosures (Nu 32:16; Jgs 5:16; 2 Ch 32:28; Ps 78:70; Lk 13:31; Zeph 2:6). One of these sheepfolds is heaped thorny brushwood as a further safeguard. Sometimes there is a covered hut in the corner for the shepherd. Where there is no danger the sheep huddle together in the open until daylight, while the shepherd keep the flocks (Gen 30:28; 2 S 5:2). In the winter time caves are sought after (1 S 34:3; Zeph 2:6). The antiquity of the use of some of the caves for this purpose is indicated by the thick deposit of potassium nitrate formed from the decomposition of the sheep dung.

SHEEP GATE (סֵפֶר), sha'or ha-gōn (Neh 3 132; 12 39): One of the gates of Jerusalem, probably near the northeast corner. See Jerusalem. For the "sheep gate" of Jn 5 2, see Bethesda; Sheep Market.

SHEEP MARKET (Jn 5 2, RV "sheep gate"): The Gr (παρατήριον, hê probable) means something simply that pertains to sheep. See Bethesda; Sheep Gate.

SHEEP-SHEARING, shēp’she-ring: The shearing is done in the springtime, either by the owner (Gen 31 19; 35 13; Dt 15 19; 1 S 25 24) or by regular "shearers" (תֹּפֶר, gōzāw) (1 S 25 7 11; Isa 63 7). There were special houses for this work in OT times (2 K 10 12 14). The shearing was carefully done so as to keep the fleece whole (Jgs 6 37). The sheep of a flock are not branded but spotted: Lime or some dyestuff is painted in one or more spots on the wool of the back as a distinguishing mark. In 2 K 3 4, Mesha, the chief or shepherd of Moab, was a sheep-master, lit. "a sheep spotter." JAMES A. PATCH

SHEEPSKIN, shēp'skin. See Bottle; Dress; Rams' Skins, etc.

SHEEP TENDING, ten'ding: The Scriptural allusions to pastoral life and the similes drawn from that life are the most familiar and revered in the Bible. Among the first verses that a child learns is "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want" (Ps 23 1 AV, ERV). What follower of the Master does not love to dwell on the words of the "Good Shepherd" chapter in the Gospel of John (Jn 10)? Jesus must have drawn a sympathetic response when he referred to the relationship of sheep to shepherd, a relationship familiar to all His hearers and doubtless shared by some of them with their flocks. As a rule the modern traveler in the Holy Land meets with disappointment if he comes expecting to see things as they were depicted in the Bible. An exception to this is the pastoral life, which has not changed one whit since Abraham and his descendants fed their flocks on the rich plateau E. of the Jordan or on the mountains of Pal and Syria. One may count among his most prized experiences the days and nights spent under the spell of Syrian shepherd life. JAMES A. PATCH

SHEERAH, shē'ra (םֶ֖שֶרַ), shē'rah'; A, Šaşād, Sārār, B omission): A daughter of Ephraim, who, according to the MT of 1 Ch 7 24 (AV "Sherah"), built the two Beth-horons and Uzzen-sheerah. The verse has been suspected because elsewhere in the OT the founders of cities are men. Uzzen-sheerah as a place is unidentified; Conder suggests as the site Bēt Sīrā, a village 2 miles S.W. of the Lower Beth-horon (Mem 3 10).

SHEET, shēt. See Dress; cf Acts 10 11, "as it were a great sheet" (ἐνθέον, olothēn).

SHEHARIAH, shē-ha-ri’a (שֵּׁשֶׁהַרִי), shēharyāh): A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 26).

SHEKEL, shēk’l, shēk’el, shēk’el, shēk’ul (שַֽיֵּךְ), shēkel): A weight and a coin. The Heb shekel was the 50th part of a mina, and as a weight about 224 grains, and as money (silver) was worth about 2s. 9d., or 66 cents. No gold shekel has been found, and hence it is inferred that such a coin was not used; but as a certain amount of gold, by weight, it is mentioned in 2 Ch 3 9 and is probably intended to be supplied in 2 K 5 5. The gold shekel was 1/60 of the heavy Bab mina and weighed about 232 grains. In value it was about equal to £2 1s. 6d., or $10. See Money; Weights and Measures. In RV of Mt 17 27 "shekel" replaces "piece of money" of AV, the tr of σταρίον, sta'ter. See STATER.

H. PORTER

SHEKEL OF THE KING'S WEIGHT, or ROYAL SHEKEL (תֹּפֶ֖ר גֹּתַּמ, 'ebhen ha-melekî), "stone i.e. weight of the king"): The shekel by which Absalom's hair was weighed (2 S 14 26), probably the light shekel of 130 grams. See Weights and Measures.

SHEKEL OF THE SANCTUARY, or SACRED SHEKEL (תֹּפֶ֖ר חֵיֵם, shekel ha-kodshēh [Nu 7 passim]): The same as the silver shekel mentioned under Shekel (q.v.), except in Ex 38 24, where it is used in measuring gold. The term is used for offerings made for sacred purposes.

SHEKINAH, shē-kī'nah (שֵּׁקִינָה), shekînâh, "that which dwells," from the vb. ṣhâkān, ṣhākân, or ṣhākhan, "to dwell," "reside"). This word is not found in the Bible, but there are allusions to it in Isa 60 2; Mt 17 5; Lk 2 9; Rom 9 4. It is first found in the Tgs. See Glory.

SHELAH, shē'la (שֶּלַח), shēlāh; Zānā, Sālah): (1) The youngest son of Judah and the daughter of Shua the Canaanite (Gen 36 5 11 14 26; 46 12; Nu 26 20 [16]; 1 Ch 2 3 4 21). He gave his name to the family of the Shelanites (Nu 26 20 [16]). Probably "the Shelanites" should be substituted for "the Shelemites" of Neh 11 5; 1 Ch 9 5.

(2) (תֹּפֶ֖ר, shēlēh): The son of the LXX grandson of Arpachshad and father of Eber (Gen 10 24; 11 13 [12]; 14 15; 1 Ch 1 18 24; Lk 3 35).

(3) Neh 3 15 = Shilohah" of Isa 8 6. See SİLOAH.

SHELEMIAH, shēl-ēm’i-ah, shēl-ēm’yā (שֶׁלֶמְיָהוּ), shelemīyāh; B, Sâlām, Selemid, A, Sâlāmās, Selēmās): (1) One of the sons of Bani who married foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10 39), called "Selemias" in 1 Esd 9 34.

(2) Father of Hananiah who restored part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 30) (B, Tēśwād, Tēlēmīd, N, Tēmūdās, Tēlēmīdās).

(3) A priest who was appointed one of the treasurers to distribute the Levitical tithes by Nehemiah (Neh 13 13).

(4) The father of Jehucal (or Jucal) in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 37 2; 38 1; in the second passage the name is Telyahānāh).

(5) The father of Irijah, the captain of the ward, who arrested Jeremiah as a deserter to the Chaldaea (Jer 37 13).

(6) 1 Ch 26 14. See MESHHELPHIAH.

(7) Another of the sons of Bani who married foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10 41). It is of interest to note that the order of names in this passage—Sharai, Azarel, and Shelemiah—is almost identical with the names in Jer 36 26, viz. Seriah, Azriel, Shelomith.

(8) Ancestor of Jehudi (Jer 36 14).

(9) (LXX omits.) Son of Abdeel, one of the men sent by Jehoiakim to seize Baruch and Jeremiah after Baruch had read the "roll" in the king's presence (Jer 36 26). See MESHEMIAH.

HORACE J. WOLP
SHELEPH, šé'lef (שֶּלֶף, šâlēf, in pause; LXX Ἀδεφ, Ἀδελφός): Son of Joktan (Gen 10:26; 1 Ch 1:20). Sheleph is the name of a Yemenite tribe or district, named on Saubian inscriptions and also by Arabians, located in Southern Arabia.

SHELESH, šé'leš (שֶּלֶשׁ, šâlešh; B, סֶלֶשׁ, Sâmēh, A, סָלֶשׁ, Salmēth, Lc, סילום, Sâlem): An Asherite, son of Helam (1 Ch 7:35).

SHELOMITH, šé'loməth (שֶּלֹמִית, šâlōmîṯ; in Ezra 8:10, ולום, šâlōmîṯ): (1) The mother of the man who was stoned for blasphemy (Lev 24:11) (B, סָלָומִית, Šalômîṯ, Lc, סַלְמִית, Šalmîṯ).

(2) Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:19) (B, סָלָומִית, Šalômîṯ, A, סָלָמִית, Šalômîṯ, Lc, סלָמִית, Šalmîṯ).

(3) One of the "sons of Izhar" (1 Ch 22:18) (B, סָלָומִית, Šalômîṯ, A, סָלָמִית, Šalômîṯ, Lc, סולומית, Šalômîṯ), called "Shealomith" in 24:22.

(4) The name of a family whose representatives returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:10) (B, סָלָומִית, Šalômîṯ, A, סָלָמִית, Šalômîṯ). The MT here should read, "and the sons of Bani; Shelomith, son of Josephiah"; and in 1 Esd 8:36, "of the sons of Banias, Salimoth, son of Josephasah."

HORACE J. WOLF

SHELOMOTH, šé'lō-moth, šé'lo-moth, -moth (שֶּלֹה-מִית, šâlōh-mîṯ): (1) An Izharite (1 Ch 24:22, B, סָלָומִית, Šalômîṯ, Lc, סַלְמִית, Šalmîṯ = "Shealomith") of 23:18).

(2) A Levite descended from Elizer ben Moses (1 Ch 26:25, "סָלָמִית", šâlômîṯ; 26:28).

(3) A Gershomite (1 Ch 23:9, "סָלָמִית", šâlômîṯ; B, סָלְמִית, Šalmîṯ, A, סָלָמִית, Šalômîṯ). No context is provided at this point. Both the punctuation and interpretation are in doubt. MT punctuates the first element as a passive participle; the use of the participle in compounds is common in Assyri but rare in Heb (cf Gray, HPN, 200). The meaning of the present form, if it be correct, is "at peace with God." [Hommed, AMHT, 200, ‘my friend is God’]. LXX reads סלומיה (Salomêth), Prince of the tribe of Simeon (Nu 1:6; 2:12; 7:36:41; 10:19). The genealogy of Judith (8:1) is carried back to this Shelumiel or Shlemiel, called there "Salmelid."

SHEM, shem (שֵׁם, šām; סֵם, Sām; Stm): The eldest son of Noah, from whom the Jews, as well as the Semitic ("Semitic") nations in general 1. Position have descended. When giving the names of Noah’s three sons, Shem is always mentioned first (Gen 9:18; 10:21); it is interesting to note that Shem may be the usual Heb word for "name" (šām), given him because he was the firstborn—a parallel to the Assy-Bab usage, in which "son," "name" (šām) are synonyms (W. A. Inserations, V. pl. 23, II. 20—23a).

Shem, who is called the "father of all the children of Eber," was born when Noah had attained the age of 500 years (Gen 5:32). Though married at the time of the Flood, Shem had no children. Alied by Japheth, he covered the nakedness of their father, from whom the youngest brother, had revealed to them; but unlike the last, Shem and Japheth, in their filial piety, approached their father walking backward, in order not to look him. Two years after the Flood Shem being then 100 years old, his son Arpachshad was born (Gen 11:10), and was followed by further sons and daughters during the remaining 500 years which preceded Shem's death. Noah's pious blessing, on awakening from his wine, may be regarded as having been fulfilled in his descendants, who occupied Syria (Aram), Pal (Canaan), Chalada (Arpachshad), Assiya (Assheer), part of Persia (Elam), and Arabia (Joktan). In the first three of these, as well as in Elam, Canaanites had settled (not in the other districts mentioned), but Semites ruled, at some time or other, over the Canaanites, and Canaan thus became "his servant" (Gen 9:25). The tablets found in Cappadocia seem to show that Semites (Assyrians) had settled in that district also, but this was apparently an unimportant colony. Though designated sons of Shem, some of his descendants (e.g., the Elamites) did not speak a Semitic language, while other nationalities, not his descendants (e.g., the Canaanites), did. See HAM; JAPETH; TABLE OF NATIONS.

SHEMA, šē'ma (שֵׁמָא, šēmā; סָמא, Ša'māt, Šamād): A city of Judah in the Negeb (Josh 15:26). If, as some think, identical with SHEBA (q.v.) of Josh 19:2, then the latter must have been inserted here from Josh 15:26. It is noticeable that the root letters (םש) were those from which Simeon is derived, and Shema is probably identical with Jesha (Neh 11:26). The place was clearly far S., and it may be Kh. Sa’swā, a ruin upon a prominent hilltop between Kh. ’Aϊṭir and Kh. el-Milh. There is a wall around the ruins, of large blocks of conglomerate flint (PEF, III, 409, Sh XXXV).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

SHEMA (שֵׁם, šēm):

(1) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5:8, 8, B, סָמא, Šāma, Lc, סם, Šām, Shemamed). See SHEBA.

(2) One of the heads of "fathers’ houses" in I Ajalon, who put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (1 Ch 13:8, 8, B, סמא, Šāma, Lc, סם, Šām, Shemamed); in ver 21 he is called "Shemei." The statement is very obscure and the whole incident is probably due to some marginal note.

(3) One of those who stood at Ezra’s right during the reading of the Law (Neh 8:4, 4, Nema’s, Šimnāt). He is called "Shammus" in 1 Esd 9:43.

SHEMAH, šē'mā (שֵׁמַא, šēmā; ko-šēmād; B, זאמ, Amud, A, סמא, Šāmā, Lc, "אمؤ, Šma’), A Benjaminite, who was the father, according to the MT, of Ahiezer and Joash; but according to the LXX vio, hūsios = ἃ (ben) instead of τοῦ (bēn) of Joash alone (1 Ch 12:3). The original text may have read Σαμᾶ ο, ben γνήσιον, hōsiam' (of Šēmeter, hōsiam', of Ἀσία, 13); then a dittography of the following μ (h) caused the error (Curtis, ICC).

SHEM'AH, šē'ma’ya (שֵׁמה’יא, šēma’ya; šē’ma’yaḥ in 2 Ch 11 2; 17 8; 31 15; 35 9; Jer 26 20; 29 24; 36 12, še’ma’yaḥ), "Jaheb hears":

Sheep Gate
Shemaiah
The name is most frequently borne by priests, Levites and prophets.

(1) B. Samias, Sammaias, A, Zaqais, Samoias (2 Ch 13 5-7).
A prophet who, together with Ahijah, protested against Rehoboam's contemplated war against the ten revolted tribes (1 K 12 22-24 = 2 Ch 11 2-4). He declared that the rebellion had Divine sanction. The second Gr account knows nothing of Ahijah in this connection and introduces Shemaijah at the gathering at Shechem where both Jeroboam and Rehoboam were present; it narrates that on this occasion Shemaijah (not Ahijah) rent his garment and gave ten parts to Jeroboam to signify the ten tribes over which he was to become king. (This version, however, is not taken very seriously, because of its numerous inconsistencies.) Shemaijah also prophesied at the invasion of Judah by Shishak (2 Ch 12 5-7). His message was to the effect that as the princes of Israel had humbled themselves, God's wrath against their idolatrous practices would not be poured out upon Judah by the hand of Shishak (2 Ch 13 7). He is mentioned as the author of a history of Rehoboam (2 Ch 12 15).

(2) Son of Shecaniah (1 Ch 3 22, Zaqais, Samaid), a descendant of Zerubbabel. This is also the name of one of the men who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3 29, Zaqais, Semelai [N] [cf Com., ICC, in vv 7-24 of 1 Ch 3]).

(3) A Simeonite (1 Ch 4 37, B, Zaqais, Semelai, A, Zaqais, Samoiias), identical, perhaps, with the Shemel of 1 Ch 4 26:27.

(4) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 4, B, Zaqais, Semelai, A, Zaqais, Semleim), called Shema in ver 8.

(5) A Merarite Levite (1 Ch 6 14; Neh 11 15, Zaqais, Samoias, B, Zaqais, Samoiias) of those who dwelt in Jerusalem.

(6) A Levite of the family of Jeduthun, father of Obadiah or Abda (1 Ch 9 16, B, Zaqais, Semeid, A, Zaqais, Samoias, called "Shammua" in Neh 11 17).

(7) Head of the Levitical Kohathite clan of Elisaphan in the time of David (1 Ch 15 8, B, Zaqais, Samoias, A, Zaqais, Samoiias, B, Zaqais, Samoias; ver 11, B, Zaqais, Samoias, A, Zaqais, Samoiias, Semelai, B, Zaqais, Samai).

He may be the same person as (8).

(8) The scribe (1 Ch 24 6), the son of Nethanel, who registered the names of the priestly courses.

(10) A Levite (2 Ch 17 5, B, Zaqais, Samoias, A, Zaqais, Samoiias), one of the commission appointed by Jehoshaphat to teach the book of the Law in Judah. The names of the commission members as a whole belong to a period later than the 9th cent. (Gray, HPN, 231).

(11) One of the men "over the free-will offerings of God" (2 Ch 31 15, Zaqais, Semelai).

(12) A Levite of the family of Jeduthun in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 14), one of those who assisted in the purification of the Temple.

(13) A chief of the Levites (2 Ch 35 9), called "Samaish" in LXX and 1 Esd 1 9.

(14) A "chief man" under Ezra (Ezr 8 16), called "Massmas" and "Samaish" in 1 Esd 8 43.

(15) A member of the family of Adonikam (Ezr 8 13, B, Zaqais, Samoias, A, Zaqais, Samoiias, "Samaish" in 1 Esd 8 39).

(16) A priest of the family of Harim who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 21), called "Samoeus" in 1 Esd 9 21.

(17) A layman of the family of Harim who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 31), called "Sahbees" in 1 Esd 9 32.

(18) A prophet (Neh 6 10-14, B, Zaqais, Semelai, A, Zaqais, Semelai), employed by Sanballat and Tobiah to frighten Nehemiah and hinder the rebuilding of the wall.

(19) One of the 24 courts of priests, 16th under Zerubbabel (Neh 13 6-8, A, Zaqais, Semelaias), 15th under Joiakim (Neh 12 18, B, Zaqais, Semelaias), and 21st under Nehemiah (Neh 10 8, Zaqais, Samoiias), mentioned in connection with the dedication of the wall.

(20) A priest, descendant of Asaph (Neh 12 35).

(21) A singer (or clan) participating in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 36).

(22) Father of the prophet Urijah (Jer 26 20, B, Zaqais, Samoias, A, Maacai, Maakot).

(23) A false prophet who was upbraided by Jeremiah (29 24-32) for attempting to hinder his work. He is styled "the Nehedamite" and was among those carried into captivity with Jehoiachin. In opposition to Jeremiah, he predicted a speedy ending to the captivity. Jeremiah foretold the complete destruction of Shemaijah's family.

(24) Father of Delahai, who was a prince in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 36 12).

(25) "The great," kinsman of Tobias (Tob 5 13).

SHEMEBER, shem'-e-bair, shem'-e-bair, "shem'-e-bair": The king of Zeboim (Gen 14 2). See SHIMAIH.

SHEMED, shem'-ed. See SHEMER, (4).

SHEMER, shem'-er (שֵׁמֶר), shem'er; Σαμηρ, Sémér, Luc., Σαμηρ, Sémér, "shepherd";

(1) The owner of the hill which Omri bought and which became the site of Samaria (1 K 16 24, שֵׁמֶרִים, shomerim). Shemer may be an ancient clan name. The fact, however, that the mountain was called Shomeron when Omri bought it makes one doubt that the city of Samaria was named after Shemer; the passage is questionable. The real etymology of Samaria roots it in "watch mountain" (see Stade, Zeitschrift, 165 f).

(2) A Merarite (1 Ch 6 46 [31], Σαμηρίς, Sémér). Shemer.

(3) An Asherite (1 Ch 7 34, A and Luc., Σαμηρίς, Sémér), called "Shomer" in ver 32.

(4) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 20, B, Σαμηρίς, Sémér, A, Σαμηρίς, Sémér, Luc., Σαμηρίς, Sémér, RV "Shemed." AV "Shamed.")

The Heb MSS differ; some read "Shemer," others "Shemed." HORACE J. WOLF

SHEMIDA, SHEMIDAH, shem'-id'-a, SHEMIDAIITES, shem'-i-da'-i'tes (שֵׁמִידָה, shemedē), A Gileadite clan belonging to Manasseh (Nu 26 32; Josh 17 2; B, Σαμηρίς, Sémér, A, Σαμηρίς, Sémér, Σαμηρίς, Σαμηρίς, Σαμηρίς, Σαμηρίς, Σαμηρίς, Σαμηρίς, Σαμηρίς).

SHEMAROTH, šē-mı́r’a-moth, šē-mı́r’ra-mōth, šem-rā’moth (שֵׁם רָמָה, שֶׁמֶרָמְתוֹת) in 2 Ch 17:8, Kôthîb שֵׁם רָמָה; Ḡîqqaḥ שֵׁמֶרָמְתוֹת; Samaritans, Semenamoth): The name of a Levitical family. In 1 Ch 15:16-17, 18:16-17, 19:15 it is listed among the names of David’s choir. In 2 Ch 17:8 the same name is given among the Levites delegated by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah. According to Schrader (KAT [2], 366) the name is to be identified with the Assyr Summar- mat; the latter seems to be a wrong name on the monuments, more esp. on the statues of Nobe from Nimrod. Another suggestion is that Shemiramoth was originally a place-name meaning “image of Shemiram” (=name of Ram or “the Exalted One”).

HEMITES, šēmî’tēs. See SEMITES.

SHEMUEL, šē-mu’ēl, šem-ā’ēl (שֵׁם עֵמֶל, שֶׁמֶל), “name of God” (?[1 Ch 6:33 (18)]; RV Samuel, the prophet [see Samuel]; of Gray, HPN, 200, n. 3): (1) The Simeonite appointed to assist in the division of the land (Nu 34:20). The MT should be emended to שֵׁם עֵמֶל, šem-ēmel, to correspond with the form found in 1 6; 2 12; 7 36;41, 10 19. LXX has uniformly Σαλαμίτης, Salamitēs. (2) Graddon of Issachar (1 Ch 7:2) (B, Іσαבο- φ, Іσαβωφ, Σαμωφ, Σαμουφ), and Luc, Σαλαμιτη, Samoith). SHEN, šēn (שֵׁן), ha-shēn, “the tooth” or “peak”; τὶς παλαῖας, the palaias): A place named only in 1 S 7:12 to indicate the position of the stone set up by Samuel in connection with the victory over the Philis, “between Mizpah and Shen.” LXX evidently read yāšān, “old.” Probably we should here read yēshān, as in 2 Ch 13:19 (OHL, s.v.). Then it may be represented by ‘Ăin Sinia, to the N. of Beitha.

SHENAZAR, šē-nā’zār: AV = RV Shenazzar (q.v.).

SHENAZAR, šē-nāz’ăr (שֶׁנָּצָר, shen‘azer): A son of Jeconiah (Jehoachin) and uncle of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:18, B, Σαμαρόν, Samaaron, Luc, Σαμαράν, Samaaron, Vulg Sennaser, Senneser). It is highly probable that Sheshbazzar (Exr 1:8.11), “the prince of Judah,” and Shenazzar are identical (so Meyer, Rotherstein, etc). The name is difficult; some suggest corruption of בְּשֶׁנְבָּלֶקְוֹר, beshen‘belqor, and as equivalent to Sin-usur, “Sin [the moon-god] protected.”

SHENIR, šēnîr (שֶׁנְיֵר, šen‘îr, šen‘îr, šen‘îr): Only found in Cant 4:8 (MT). See SENIR.

SHEOL, šē’ōl (שְׁאֹל, she‘ol): 1. The Name 2. The Abode of the Dead (1) Not a State of Unconsciousness (2) Not Removed from God’s Jurisdiction (3) Relation to Immortality 3. Post-canonical Period This word is often tr̄ in AV “grave” (e.g. Gen 37:35; 1 S 2:6; Job 7:9; 14:13; Ps 6:5; 49:14; Is 14:11, etc) or “hell” (e.g. Dt 32:22; Ps 9:17; 18:5; Is 14:9; Am Name 9:2, etc); in 3 places by “pit” (Nu 16:30;33; Job 17:16). It means really the unseen world, the state or abode of the dead, and is the equivalent of the Gr Ἅιδες, by which word it is tr̄ in LXX. The Eng. Revisers have acted somewhat inconsistently in leaving “grave” or “pit” in the historical books and putting “Sheol” in the margin, while substituting “Sheol” in the poetical writings, and putting “grave” in the margin (“hell”) is retained in Is 14:14. Cf their “Preface. The American Revisers more properly use “Sheol” throughout the etymologically equivalent vulg Raphah, a derivation is from šādāl, “to ask” (cf Prov 1:12; 27:20; 30:15.16; Is 5:14; Hab 2:5); others prefer the ḥ šādāl, “to be hollow.” The Babylonians are said to have a similar word Sinuš, though this is questioned by some. Into Sheol, when life is ended, the dead are gathered in their tribes and families. Hence the expression frequently occurring in the Dead (to go to one’s father’s; etc) (Gen 15:17; 25:8.17; 49:33; 50:21; Ps 23:4; 31:2; Dt 32:50; 34:5). It is figured as an underworld (Isa 44:23; Ezek 26:20, etc), and is described by other terms, as “the pit” (Job 33:24; Ps 83:1; 30:3; Prov 1:12; Is 36:18, etc), Anaddon (q.v.) or Destruction (Job 26:6; 28:22; Prov 15:11), the place of “silence” (Ps 94:17; 116:17), “the land of darkness and the shadow of death” (Job 10:21 f). It is, as the antithesis of the living condition, the synonym for everything that is gloomy, insubstantial (the abode of phosphorescent shades, Job 26:5; Prov 18:15; 21:16; Is 14:9; 26:14). It is a “land of forgetfulness,” where God’s “wonders” are unknown (Ps 88:10-12). There is no remembrance or praise of God (Ps 6:5; 88:12; 116:13, etc). In its still more abysmal powerlessness, lack of knowledge and inactivity, it is a true abode of death (see DEATH); hence is regarded by the living with shrinking, horror and dismay (Ps 39:13; Isa 38:17-19), though to the enfeebled, weary and tired, it may present the aspect of a welcome rest or sleep (Job 3:17-22; 14:12 f). The Gr idea of Hades was not dissimilar.

(1) Not a State of unconsciousness.—Yet it would be a mistake to infer, because of these strong and sometimes poetically heightened contrasts to the world of the living, that Sheol was conceived of as absolutely a place without consciousness, or some dim remembrance of the world above. This is not the case. Necromancy rested on the idea that there was some communication between the world above and the world below (Dt 18:11): a Samuel could be summoned from the dead (1 S 28:11-15). Sheol from beneath was stirred at the descent of the king of Babylon (Isa 14:9 f). The state is rather that of slumberous and semi-consciousness (the abode of ἐνυπνάσθαι, the insensible, from which in a partial way the spirit might temporarily be aroused. Such conceptions, it need hardly be said, did not rest on revelation, but were rather the natural ideas formed of the future state, in contrast with life in the body, in the absence of revelation.

(2) Not removed from God’s jurisdiction.—It would be yet more erroneous to speak with Dr. Charles (Eschatology, 35 ff) of Sheol as a region “quite independent of Yahweh, and outside the sphere of His rule.” “Sheol is naked before God,” says Job, “and Abaddon hath no covering” (26:6). “If I make my bed in Sheol,” says the Psalmist, “beloved thou art there” (Ps 139:8). The wrath of Jehovah burns unto the lowest Sheol (Dt 32:22). As a rule there is little sense of moral distinctions in the OT representations of Sheol, yet possibly these are not altogether wanting (on the above and others points in the theology of Sheol, see Eschatology of the OT).

Dr. Charles probably goes too far in thinking of Sheol in Ps 49 and 73 as "the future abode of the wicked only; heaven as that of the righteous" (op. cit., 74); but different destinies are clearly indicated.

There is no doubt, at all events, that in the post-canonical Jewish lit. (Apoc and apocalyptic) a very considerable development is manifest in the idea of Sheol. Distinction between good and bad in Israel is emphasized; Sheol becomes for certain classes an intermediate state between death and resurrection; for the wicked and for Gentiles it is nearly a synonym for Gehenna (hell). For the various views, with relevant lit. on the whole subject, see ESCATOLOGY OF THE NT; also DEATH; HADES; HELL, etc. JAMES ORR

SHEPHAM, šēbḵam (שֶׁבֶחּם, šepḥam; Zephīmā, Sephīmār): A place, probably a hill town, on the ideal eastern boundary of Israel, named in Nu 34:10, but omitted in Ezk 47 15–18. It lay between Hazar-esan and Harbel (MT "Harbillah"), which must have been in the territory of Issachar. It belongs to the tribe of Zebulun. The word means a "naked" place, and doubtless indicates one of the barier midway ridges of Anti-Lebanon. It was probably the native place of Zabdi the Shphamite, who was David's chief vine-gardener (1 Ch 27:27).

SHEPHAHAT, šēf-āt-ṯā, šē-faṭ-ṯā (שֶׁפֶחַת, šeph̄atā): "Jeh has judged":
1. A son of David, by Abital (2 S 8 3; 1 Ch 3:9).
2. A Benjamite, father of Mesbullah, of Jerus (1 Ch 9 8).
3. A Benjamite, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 5).
5. A son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21 2).
6. A family, 372 of whom returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 4; Neh 7 9); 80 more males of this family, with their head, returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 8).
7. A servant of Solomon, 392 of whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59 ff); "Saphat" in 1 Esd 5 9 and "Saphatas" in 1 Esd 8 34.
8. A Perezite (Judahite), some of whose descendants dwelt at Jerus in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 11 4).
9. A son of Mattan, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer 38 1).

SHEPHELAH, šēf-əlā (שֶׁפֶלֶל, ha-shēphēlāh; ṣephēlā, sōphēlā, sōphālā, sōphēlā): The word denotes "lowland," and is variously
1. Name rendered in AV. It is "vale" in Dt and Refer- 1 7; Josh 10 40; 1 K 10 27; 2 Ch ences 1 15; Jer 33 13; "valley" in Josh 11 11; 12 20; 12 15; 15 35; Jgs 1 9; Jer 32 44; "low plain" in 1 Ch 27 28; 2 Ch 9 27; "plain" in Jer 17 26; Ob 19; Zec 7 7; and "low country" in 2 Ch 28 18. RV renders uniformly "lowland." As the word always occurs with the definite art., indicating a distinct district, it might have been well to retain it without tr. The boundaries of the district are clearly marked and include much broken country; the hills being low compared with the mountains to the E., but much higher than the plain that runs to the shore. If a tr. was to be made, perhaps "lowlands" would have been the best, as applied to the "Low-lands" of Scotland, "which likewise are not entirely plain, but have their groups and ranges of hills" (HGL, 203). In the wide sense the Shephelah included the territory originally given to the tribe of Dan, and also a considerable part of Western and Southern Judaea. The early days of the tribes of Dan and Simeon were practically absorbed by Judah, and hence we find in Josh 15 many cities in the Shephelah which belonged to that tribe (LB, I, 211).

(1) The sites of many ancient cities named in the Shephelah have been identified. They all lie within the strip of hill country that runs along the western base of the mountains of Judah, terminating in the X. at the Valley of Ajalon. Once indeed the name appears to apply to the low hills N. of this (Josh 11 16, "the mount of Israel and its Shephelah"). Every other reference applies only to the S.

Principal G. A. Smith has pointed out the difference between the district of the N. and that of the S. of Ajalon (HGL, 203 f). "North of Ajalon the low hills which run over to Sharon are flanked by high mountains behind them. You ascend to the latter from Sharon either by long sloping ridges, such as that which today carries the main road of Hermon. Sharon means a "naked" place, and doubtless indicates one of the barier midway ridges of Anti-Lebanon. It was probably the native place of Zabdi the Shphamite, who was David's chief vine-gardener (1 Ch 27:27).

(2) On the E. of the Shephelah, then, taking the name in this more limited sense, rises the steep wall of the mountain, into which access is gained only by narrow and difficult defiles. The hills of the Shephelah are from 500 to 800 ft. high, with nothing over 1,500. The formation is soft limestone. In the valleys and upland plains there is much excellent land which supports a fairly good population still. Wheat, barley and olives are the chief products. But western wine is proverbial, and it testifies to the culture of the vine in old times. The district is almost entirely dependent on the rain for its water-supply. This is collected in great cisterns, partly natural. The rocks are in many places hewncombed into caves.

The western boundary is not so definite as that on the E. Some have held that it included the Phili plain. This contention draws support from the mention of the Phili cities immediately after those of Judah, which are said to be in the Shephelah (Gosh 15 45 ft.; these verses can hardly be ruled out as of a later date). On the other hand the Phili are said to have invaded the cities of the Shephelah (2 Ch 28 18), which implies that it was outside their country. In later times the Talmi (Jerus Sbhelāh 2 2) distinguishes the "northern Shephelah," the Shephelah, and the Plain. See, however, discussion in Buhl (GAP, 104, n.); and G. A. Smith, Expos, 1896, 404 ff.

The Shephelah is crossed by five wide valleys which furnish easy passes from the plain. These are of importance chiefly because from each

3. The Five of them a way, crossing the "foss," Valleys enters one of the defiles by which alone armies could approach the uplands of Judaea. The hills of Judaea are much steeper on the east than on the west, where they fall away to Philistia in long-rolling hills, forming the Shephelah.

(1) The most noteworthy of these is the Vale of Aja-lon. It winds its way first in a north-easterly direction, past the Beth-horons, then, turning to the S.E., it reaches the plateau at el-Jib, the ancient Gibeon, fully 5 miles N.W. of Jerus. This is the eastern end of all the avenues leading from the plain to the heights, and it is the one along which the tide of battle most frequently rolled from the days of Joshua (Josh 10 12) to those of the Maccabees (1 Macc 3.16 ff., etc.). It occupies also a prominent place in the records of the Crusades.

(2) Wady es-Surâr, the Valley of Sorek, crosses the Shephelah S. of Gezer, and pursues a tortuous course past Beth-shemesh and Kirjath-jearim to the plateau S.W. of Jerus. This is the line followed by the Jaffa-Jerus Railway.

(3) Wady es-Sunt runs eastward from the N. of Tell es-Sûfâh (Gatli) up the Vale of Elah to its confluence with Wady es-Surâr which comes in from the S. near Kâribat Shaveleh (Souch); and from that point, as Wady el-Jindéy, pursues its way S. of Timnah to the uplands W. of Bethlehem.

(4) Wady el-'Afrânj crosses the plain from Ashdod (Esjud), passes Beth Jibrin (Eleutheropolis), and winds up through the mountains toward Hebron.

(5) Wady el-'Afrânj, from the sea about 7 miles N. of Ga'aac, runs eastward with many windings, passes to the N. of Lachish, and finds its way to the plateau some 6 miles S.W. of Hebron.

From the Shephelah thus opened the gateways by which Judaea and Jerus might be assailed: and the course of these avenues determined the course of much of the history. It is evident that the Shephelah lay open to attack from both sides, and for centuries it was the debatable land between Israel and the Philis. The ark for a time sojourned in this region (1 S 5.6 f.). In this district is laid the scene of Samson's exploits (Jgs 14-16). The scene of David's memorable victory over the giant was in the Wady es-Sunt, between Sooch and Azækah (1 S 17.1). David found refuge here in the cave of Adullam (1 S 22.1). For picturesque and vivid accounts of the Shephelah and of the part it played in history see Smith, HGL, 201 ff.; A. Henderson, Palestine, Its Historical Geography, 1894.

SHEEPHE, she'fér (שֵׁפֶר, shepher, "beauty"): A mount near which the Israelites encamped (Nu 33.23 f.). See Wanderings of Israel.

SHEPHERD, shep'erd (שֶׁפֶר, רְדֶח, רְדִּי, רוֹדִי; ποιμήν, ποιμέν, "a feeder"): The sheep owner frequently tends the flocks himself (Gen 4.4; 30.40; cf. Ezek 34.12), but more often he delegates the work to his children (Gen 29.9; 1 S 16.19; 17.15) or relatives (Gen 31.6). In such cases the sheep have good care because the keepers have a personal interest in the well-being of the animals, but when they are attended by a hireling (1 S 17.20) the flocks may be neglected or abused (Isa 55.10.11; Ezek 34.8.10; Zec 11.15.17; Jn 10.12). The chief care of the shepherd is to see that the sheep find plenty to eat and drink. The flocks are not fed in pens or folds, but, summer and winter, must depend upon foraging for their sustenance (Ps 23.2). In the winter of 1910-11 an unprecedented storm ravaged Northern Syria. It was accompanied by a snowfall of more than 3 ft., which covered the ground for weeks. During that time, hundreds of thousands of sheep and goats perished, not so much from the cold as from the fact that they could get no food. Goats hunt out the best feedingfeeding-grounds. Even should two shepherds call their flocks at the same time and the sheep be intermingled, they never mistake their own master's voice (Jn 10:3-5).

The shepherd's equipment is a simple one. His chief garment is a cloak woven from wool or made from sheepskins. This is sleeveless, and so made that it hangs like a cloak on his shoulders. When he sleeps he curls up under it, head and all. During the summer a lighter, short-sleeved 'aba or coat is worn (Job 30:15; Ezra 8:18; LXX omits), and had charge, along with eleven others, the silver and gold and vessels for the Temple (ver 24, BA, Σαμαθα, Σαραθα, Luc., Σαραθας, Σαραθα, Σαραθας). He aided in the exposition of the Law ( Neh 8:7), was among those who made public confession (9:4) and sealed the covenant (10:12 [13]). His name also appears in 12:24. In every passage listed above except 10:12 (13), BA read Σαραθας, Σαραθα, Luc., Σαραθας, Σαραθας. In I Esd 8:47 the name appears as "Asebebius;" RV "Asebebius;" in ver 54, "Esebias," RV "Esebias;" and in Esd 48, "Sarabia." Many of the companion-names on the lists are plainly ethnic (Cheyne).

SHERER, she'resh (שֶרֶשׁ, šə'resh; B, Σόφος, Σώφος, Σώφος, Luc., Σόφος, Σφηρός, Σφηρός; A, Σόφος, Σφηρός, Luc., Σφηρός, Σφηρός | Gen 36:23): A Machirite name in a genealogy of Manasseh (1 Ch 7:16).

SHEREZER, she-řez'ér (Zec 7:2 AV). See SHAREZER.

SHERGHT, še'reg't, še'reg't, ASHUR, or ASSUR: The name of the first capital city of Assyria is known by the Arabs as Kal'at Sherghat, or the Fortress of Sherghat. Its ancient name was Assur or Assur (Gen 10:11 m). From it was derived the name of the country, Assyria, and of the people, Assyrians. The date of the founding of the city is not known. Apparently about 2000 BC a colony of Babylonians migrated northward along the Tigris River and settled upon the right shore about halfway between the Upper and Lower Zab, or halfway between the modern cities of Mosul and Bagdad. Assur, the local deity of the place, became the national god of Assyria. It is uncertain whether the deity gave the name to the city, or the city to the deity, but probably an early shrine of Assur stood there, and the people, building their city about it, became known as the Assyrians. At first the city was a Bab dependency, governed by priests from Babylon. In time, as the city acquired a political significance, the power of the priesthood declined; allegiance to Babylonia ceased, and the Assyrian empire came into existence. About 1200 BC the political power had so increased that a new capital, Nimrud (Calah) was built to the N, near the junction of the Upper Zab with the Tigris. In 722 BC the capital was transferred by Sargon to his new city, Dur-Sharrukin, and in 705 BC Sennacherib enlarged Nineveh, and it remained the capital city till the fall of the empire in 609 BC. Assur, however, as the seat of the national deity, never ceased to be the chief religious center.

The mounds of Assur are among the largest in Mesopotamia. They rise abruptly from the Tigris, which they follow for about half a mile, and extend a quarter of a mile inland. In the surrounding plain are other mounds, marking the sites of temples, and indicating that a part of the city was without the walls. At the northern end the mounds are surmounted by a high conical peak, which represents the tower or zigurrat of the temple of Assur.

Of the early excavators Layard and Rassam examined the ruins, but the fanaticism of the surrounding Arabs prevented extensive excavations. In 1904 Dr. W. Andrae, for the Deutsche Orient-gesellschaft, began the systematic excavations which have been continued by Dr. P. Maresch for ten years. Discoveries of the greatest importance have been made. The city was found to have been surrounded on the land side by a double wall. The space between the walls, several rods in width, was occupied by houses, possibly the homes of the soldiers. The base of the outer wall was of stone; above it were mud bricks strengthened at intervals with courses of burned bricks. Along the outer upper edge was a parapet, protected by battlements. From the floor of the parapet small holes were bored vertically downward, so that the soldiers, without exposing themselves, might discharge their arrows at the enemy close to the base of the wall. Many of the holes are still visible. The wall was pierced with several gateways; the names “Gate of Assur,” “Gate of the Tigris,” “Gate of the Sun God” have survived. At the sides of the gateways were small chambers for the guards, and from them passageways led to the parapet above. The gates were reached by bridges which spanned the moat. Along the river side the city was protected by a high steep embankment, which was built partly of limestone, but chiefly of square bricks laid in bitumen.

The temple of Assur at the northern end of the city has been thoroughly excavated. With its outer and inner court and tower it conformed in its general plan to the older Bab temples. Several of the palaces of the early kings were discovered, but the best-preserved of the palaces was one which the excavators have called the residence of the mayor. It stood near the western edge of the city on the main street which ran from the western gate to the Tigris. It consisted of two courts surrounded by chambers. Grooves in the paved floor conducted fresh water to the kitchen, the baths and the chambers, and round tiles beneath the floor carried away the waste water to the arched city sewer and to the Tigris. To the rear of the mayor’s house was a crowded residential quarter. The streets were very narrow and winding. The houses were exceedingly small; in some of them one could not lie at full length upon the floor. Among their ruins appear little but stone mortars and broken pottery and other essential household implements.

Near the southern end of the city a most remarkable discovery was made. About a hundred monoliths, from 4 to 8 ft. high, were found still standing erect. On the side of each one, near the top, was an inscription on several lines, dedicating the stone to some individual who had been of great service to the state. They were not tombstones; apparently they had been erected during the lifetime of the people whom they honored. Of the greatest interest was one which bore the name of Sammuramat or Semiramis, the once supposed mythical queen of Nineveh. Its tr reads: “The column of Sa-am-mu-ri-mat, the palace wife of Samsi-Adad, king of the world, king of Assyria, the mother of Adad-Nirari, king of the world, king of Assyria, the ... of Shalmaneser, king of the four regions.” The inscription not only makes Semiramis a historical character, but places her among the foremost rulers of Assyria.

The tombs of the kings and nobles were found deep in the ruins in the very center of the city. They were rectangular structures of cut stone, covered above with a rounded arch of burned bricks. In some cases the massive stone doors still turned in their sockets. The roofs of many of them had fallen in; others, which were intact, were filled with dust. From the tombs a vast amount of silver, gold and copper jewelry and stone beads and ornaments were recovered.

One of the chief temples of the city stood at a short distance without the eastern wall. Nothing but its foundations remain. However, the temple was surrounded by a park, traces of which still exist. The soil of the surrounding plain is a hard clay, incapable of supporting vegetable life. Into the clay large holes, several feet in diameter, were dug and filled with loam. Long lines of the holes may still be traced, each marking the spot where a tree, probably the date palm, stood in the temple park. A modern cemetery on the summit of the main mound is still used by the neighboring Arabs, and therefore it will likely prevent the complete excavation of this oldest of the capital cities of Assyria. See further Assyria.

SHERIFF, sher’if (Aram. שֶׁרֶף, šārēf, “militia,” “lawbreaker,” “a sheriff” [Dnl 3:29]); Probably a “lawyer” or “jurist” whose business it was to decide points of law. At best, however, the tr “sheriff” is but a conjecture.

SHESHACH, šēshak (שׂשְׁחָק, šēshākh), as if “humiliation”; cf נָשְׁחָה, nēshākah, “to crouch”: The general explanation is that this is “a cypher-form of ‘Babylon’” which is the word given as equivalent to “Sheshach” by the Tg (Jer 25:26; 51:41; LXX omits in both passages). By the device known as Atbas (תבש), i.e. disguising a name by substituting the last letter of the alphabet for the first, the letter next to the last for the second, etc, שׁשָּח is substituted for בָּבִיל, bāḇīl. This theory has not failed of opposition. Delitzsch holds that "Sheshach" represents Ṣīl-kā-KI of an old Bab regal register, which may have stood for a part of the city of Babylon. (For a refutation of this interpretation see Schrader, KAT, 415; COT, 11, 108.) Lauth, too, takes "Sheshach" to be a Heb: Hebraizm of Ṣīkā, a Bab district. Winckler and Sayce read Ṣiw-saqqa. Finally, Cheyne and a number of critics hold that the word has crept into the text, being "a conceit of later editors." See further Jeremiah, 6.

SHESHBAZZAR, shesh-ba'zar (שֶׁשֶם, shēsh-baça), or "שָׁשֶׁבַּזַּב, shāshēbazzāḇ): Sheshbazzar is the Heb or Aram. form of the Bab Shamsam-ah-usr, or Shamash-bana-usur: "Oh Shamash, protect the father." It is possible that the full name was Shamash-bana-siri-Babili-usur; "Oh Shamash, protect the father [builder] of the seed of Babylon." (See Zerubbabel, and compare the Bab names Ashar-bana-usur, Ban-siri, Nebi-bana-siri, Shamash-ban-apli, Shamash-apil-usur, Shamash-ban-ahī, and others in Tallequist's Neubabylonisches Namenbuch, and the Aram. names on nos. 35, 44, 36, and 45 of Clay's Aramäische Dokumente.) If this were the case, there would be little doubt that Sheshbazzar may have been the same person as Zerubbabel, since the former is called in Ezr 5 14 the governor of Judah, and the latter is called by the same title in Hag 1 1. The name is very probable, however, because Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel were different persons, and that Sheshbazzar was governor of Judah in the time of Cyrus and Zerubbabel in that of Darius. It is possible that Sheshbazzar came to Jerusalem in the time of Cyrus and laid the foundations, and that Zerubbabel came later in the time of Darius Hystaspis and completed the building of the temple (cf Ezr 2 65; 4 2; Hag 1 14).

According to Ezr 1 8 Sheshbazzar was the prince (Hammam) of Judah into whose hands Cyrus put the vessels of the house of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had brought forth out of Jerusalem and had put in the house of his gods. It is further said in ver 11 that Sheshbazzar brought these vessels with them of the captivity which he brought up from Babylon to Jerusalem. In Ezr 5 14 it is said that these vessels had been delivered by Cyrus unto one whose name was Sheshbazzar, whom he had made governor (pēhēd), and that Sheshbazzar came and laid the foundations of the house of God which was in Jerusalem. See SANABASSAR.

SHESHAI, šésh'ē (שֶׁשֶּה, šēshē): One of the sons of Anak, perhaps an old Hebronite clan name. (Sayce combines the name with Šāqū, יִשְׂרָאֵל, the Egypt name for the Syrian Bedouins.) The clan lived in Hebron at the time of the conquest and was expelled by Caleb (Nu 13 22, B, Ɔsādē, Ṣassēl, A, Ɔsēd, Șemen; Jos 15 14, B, Ɔsēdō, Șonatē, A, Ɔsēd, Șonat; Jgs 1 10, B, Ɔsēdē, Ṣassēl, A, Șēdē, Șonatē).

SHESHAN, šésh'ēn (שֶׁשֶּה, šēshēn; Ṣōvā', Šōvān; Șōvān): A Jerahmeelite whose daughter married his servant Jarha (1 Ch 2 31.34.35). The genealogical list which follows embraces some very early names (cf Curtis, ICC, ud loc.)

SHETH. See SETH.

SHETHAR, shēth'ār (שֶׁתֶר, šēṭēr; B and Luc., Șādrābōn, Sōdrān, Șādrān, Sōdrān, Șādrān, Sādrābōn): One of the "seven princes" at the court of Ahaseurus (Est 1 14); these princes "sat first in the kingdom" and had the right of entrance to the king's presence at any time, except when he was in the company of one of his wives. (According to Marquart, Fund., 69, Shethar comes from רֵשֶׁר, with which the Pers šēkāta, "joy," is to be compared.) The word has never really been satisfactorily explained; it is presumably Pers.

SHETHAR-BOZNAI, šēth'th-ōr-ōz'ēn, shēth'th-ōr-ōz'ēn: Among the conjectures as to the meaning and derivation of the name, the following may be mentioned: (1) Shethar-boznai may be a corruption of רֵשֶׁר-בּוֹצָנָא, methaphasa, Mithrabozana, Old Pers Mithraubazana—i.e. "Mithra is deliverer." (2) It is identical with the Old Pers Sēsē ("seed," "brilliance"); the names have been confounded in the Aramaic. (3) It may be a title, but shēthar, must then be read for shēthar. (4) It is equivalent to the Old Pers Sétirubazana, "empire-delivering"; cf B, Art., "Shētharubazana," and 2 Dn 2 30.

SHEVA, šēv'ā (שְׁוָא, še'vā); B, Șoā, Șoāt, Șoāt, Șoād, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl; (A, Șādā, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl, Șoāl): (1) A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Ch 2 49).

(2) See SHAVSHAI.

SHEW, SHOW, shō: "Show" (so always ARV) is simply a modernized spelling of "shew" (so always in AV and generally in ERV), and it should be carefully noted that "shew" is never pronounced "shoo," not even in the combination "showbread"; cf "see.

In AV "shew" as a vb. is the tr of a very large number of terms in the original. This number is reduced considerably by RV (esp. in the NT), but most of these changes are to secure uniformity of rendition, rather than to correct obscurities. The proper sense of the vb., of course, is "to cause a person to see" (Gen 12 1, etc) or "to cause a thing [or person] to be seen" (Dt 4 35; Jgs 12 22, etc.). "Seeing," naturally, can be taken as intellectual or moral (Jer 38 21; Ps 16 11, etc.), and can even be used for "hearing" (Isa 43 9, etc; contrast RV 1 8 9 27). Hence "shew" can be used as a general tr for the most various phrases, as be "shewed" for γίνεσθαι, γινομαι, "come to pass" (Acts 4 22, RV "see wrought"); "shew forth themselves" for εἰρήνω, εἰρήνη, "be active" (Mt 14 2, RV "work"); "shew" for τοιεύω, τοιεύω, "do" (Acts 7 36, RV "having wrought"); for δοκίμασαι, δοκιμαζομαι, "beolate" (Lk 8 39, RV "declare"); for ὑπακούω, ὑπακούομαι, "make clean" (2 Pet 1 14, RV "signify"), etc. In Cant 2 9 AV (ERV) "shewing himself" and ERV (ERVm) "glimpse" both miss the poetry of the original: His eyes shine in through the lattice (יָרַע, "blosso," "sparkle").

AV's uses of the noun "shew" usually connote appearance in contrast to reality. So Lk 20 47, "for a show" (ῥητορικός, ῥητορική, "false, pretense"); Col 2 23, "shew of wisdom" (so RV, λόγος, λόγος, "words, "words of authority"); Gal 6 12, "make a fair shew" (so RV, εὑρομένος, εὑρομένος, "have a fair face"); Ps 39 6, "vain shew" (so ARV וַעַנֵּא, gelem, "image," RVm "shadow"). However, in Sir 43 1 (דַּשֵּׁא, הַרְּוָא, "spectacle" [so RV]) and in Col 2 15 (דֹּקָה, דֹּקָה, "to display") "shew" = "spectacle."
SHEWBREAD, shi'brad, THE (דְּשֶׁבֶּרֶד), lehem ha-µa'om, “bread of the presence”; שֵׁבֶרֶד (Ex 25:30); ARV “showbread.”

1. The Term
See SHEWBREAD. The marginal reading of Ex 25:30; 37:15, 16, RV “Presence-bread,” exactly gives the meaning of the Heb. In 2 Ch 2:7 it is spoken of as the “continual showbread,” because it was to be before Jeh “always” (Ex 25:30).

Later Judaism has much to say as to the number and size of the loaves, more properly thin cakes, which bore this name, together with

2. Mosaic many minute regulations as to the Regulations placing of the loaves, the covering of them with frankincense, and other ritualistic values for the continuance of the Mosaic legislation. All that the legislation required was that, once in every week, there should be twelve cakes of unleavened bread, each containing about four-fifths of a peck of fine flour, placed in two piles upon a pure table with frankincense beside each pile and changed every Sabbath day (Lev 24:3–9). From the description of the table upon which the flat cakes were to lie (Ex 25:23–30; 37:10–16), it held a series of golden vessels comprising dishes, spoons, flagons and bowls. As it is unlikely that empty cups were set before Jeh—thely being described as “the vessels which were upon the table”—we may conclude that the table held presentation offerings of “grain and wine and oil,” the three chief products of the land (Dt 7:13). The “dishes” were probably the salvers on which the thin cakes were piled, six on each. The “flagons” would contain wine, and the bowls (made with spoons, “to pour withal”); the oil, while the “spoons” held the frankincense, which was burned as a memorial, “even an offering made by fire unto Jeh.” The cakes themselves were eaten by the priests on every Sabbath day, as being among the “most holy” sacrifices. Each of the synagogists refers to the incident of David and his companions having eaten of the shewbread (hoi ártov òts prosthésen), as told in 1 S 21:6–6 (Mt 12:4; Mk 2:26; Lk 6:4).

At such times as the removal of the tabernacle took place, the separate appointments of the table of incense were not parted from it, but were carried with it—dishes, Journeyings spoons, bowls, and cups (Nu 4:7). These, like the other furniture, were borne by the Kohathite Levites, but a few articles of lighter weight were in the personal care of the high priest. These comprised the oil for the candlestick, the sweet incense, the holy oil of consecration, and the meal offering, the continual burnt offering (Nu 4:7.8.16). Small quantities of these alone would be borne from place to place, such as would be needed with the least delay to refresh the vessels of the sanctuary on every re erection of the tent of meeting.

With this view of the nature, we have a natural and adequate sense of the meanings and importance of the shewbread, in the economy of the temple ritual and service. It was a continual reminder to the worshippers of the truth that man does not live by bread alone, emphasized by the fact that these most holy offerings were afterward eaten. It was the OT version of the prayer, “Give us this day our daily bread”; and in the fact that the holy table was never for a moment left without some loaves lying on it, we have the symbol of man’s continued and unbroken dependence upon God. Even during the travels of the table of shewbread with the tabernacle, the “continual bread” was required to be in its place thereon (Nu 4:7).

It has been usual to say that “frankincense in golden urns stood beside the twelve loaves” (EB, IV, col. 4212). But this is a mere repetition of a Jewish legend, as spoons were the recognized holders of the frankincense. In many cases (of Nu 7:14 ff.). Such spoons formed a part of the equipment of the shewbread table, and on the removal of the week-old cakes the spoons were carried forth and the frankincense in them burned on the great altar on the Sabbath day. If this were done while the grain and wine and oil were being consumed, it would derive additional significance, as betokening the gratitude and adoration of the representative recipients of the bounties of Nature, just as the daily burning of incense in the holy place betokened the worship and adoration of the praying multitudes without the temple (Lk 1:10). See SHREW- TABLE, OF.

SHEWBREAD, TABLE OF (דְּשֶׁבֶּרֶד, shulhan-bréd), [Ex 25:25–30, etc.]; הֶּרֶם תַּנֹּתְנָה, he próthetais lón ártov (He 9:2)); For construction, see TABERNACLE; Temple. A rude representation of the table is given on the Arch of Titus in Rome. The base-relief was measured by Professor Boni in 1905, and the height and width of the represented tables were found to be 48 cms., or nearly 19 in. The table represented is, of course, that of Herod’s temple, taken at the fall of Jerusalem in 70 AD. See the author’s art. “The Temple Spoons” in PEPS, 1906, 306 ff.

The table of shewbread is to be distinguished from the altar of incense. It has become the fashion of the newer critics to deny the existence of the altar of incense in preexilic times, and to explain the allusion to it in 1 K 6:20 as the table of shewbread (so in Ezk 41:22). The other references (1 K 6:22; 7:48; 9:25) are dismissed as interpolations. The procedure is radically vicious. The table of shewbread is not an “altar,” though the altar is once spoken of as a “table” (Ezk 41:22). There was only one altar of incense (1 K 6:20), but (in 2 Ch 4:8) ten tables of shewbread. See SHEW-BREAD.

SHIBAH, shībä (דִּישָּׁב) seven; אֶפֶס, hórkos; Swete reads Φιλας ἄρτος, Phēkeb hórikos, lit. “well of cattle”; AV Shebah: The name of the original seat of Beer-sheba according to Gen 26:33. See BIB.-SHEBA.

SHIBBOLETH, shibbô-leth (דִּישָּׁבֵל, shibboleth): A test of speech applied by the men of Gilead to the Ephraimites, who wished to cross the Jordan, after defeat. If they pronounced the word gībbolīth, their dialectic variety of speech betrayed them (Jgs 12:6). The word probably has the sense of “stream” or “flood” (cf Ps 69:2).

SHIBMAH, shīb'ma (דִּישָּׁבָה, shibmah). See Sû- MAH.

SHICRON, shik'ron (דִּישָּׁכוֹן, shikron). See SHIKKERON.

SHIELD, shi'ild. See ARMOR, IV, 1.

SHIGGAION, shī-g'yoùn, shi-gô'un (שִּחְּגַיִון, shigga'yôn): Occurs in the title of Ps 7, and, in the pi., in the verse introducing Habakkuk’s prayer (Hab 3:1). Derived from a vb. meaning “to wander,” it is generally taken to mean a dishebramt, or rhapsody.
This is not supported by the Gr VSS, but they are evidently quite at a loss. See Psalms, Book of.

SHIHON, shif'hôn (םיִיְחֹן, shihôn). See SHILOH.

SHIHOR, shîhôr (שִׁיוֹר), shîhôr, also written without "i" in Heb and incorrectly "Sihôr" in Eng.: A stream of water mentioned in connection with Egypt. Joshua (13:3) speaks of the "Sihôr, which is before Egypt," a stream which commentators have thought to be "the brook of Egypt," the stream which separated Egypt from Pal, now called Wady el-'Arish. Jeremiah (2:18 AV) says, "When the Lord brought thee out of the land of Egypt," to drink the waters of Sihôr." Commentators have thought Shihor in this case to be a name for the Nile. Both interpretations cannot be correct. Whatever the name Sh means, at least it did not denote a movable river. It must be the same stream in both these passages, and no identification of the stream can be correct that does not satisfy both of them. Professor Naville has recently shown conclusively (Proc. Soc. Bib. Arch., January, 1913) that neither the interpretation of the name is strictly correct, and has made clear the Bib. references to S. In the northeasternmost province of ancient Egypt, Khentah ("Fronting on the East"), was a canal, a fresh-water stream drawn off from the Nile, called in ancient times, "the Holy Canal" (the -t is an Egypt fem. ending). There have been many changes in the branches and canals from the Nile in the Delta, and this one with many others has lost altogether; but there is a tradition of a branch of the 4th or 5th Orders to this day that once a branch of the Nile came over to that point. This Shi-h-Hor, "Stream of Horus," makes perfectly clear and harmonious the different references of Scripture to S. It was "before Egypt" as Josh describes it, and it was the first sweet water of Egypt which the traveler from Pal in those days was able to obtain, as the words of Jeremiah indicate. "To drink the waters of S." meant to reach the supply of the fresh water of the Nile at the border of the desert. The two other references to S. (I Ch 13:5; Is 23:3) are perfectly satisfied by this identification. The "seed of S." (Isa 23:3 AV) would be grain from Egypt by way of the Sihor.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH, shîhôr-libnath (שִׁיוֹר לִיבְנָתָה). A place named on the boundary of Asher (Josh 19:26). It seems to mark with Carmel the western limit, and may have been on the S. of that mountain. Pesh, Syr, and Onam take this as two distinct names attaching to cities in this region. So far, however, no trace of either name has been found in the course of very careful exploration. More probably Shihor was the name of a river, "Libnath" distinguishing it from the Nile, which was called Shihor of Egypt. It may have been called Shihor because, like the Nile, it contained crocodiles. The boundary of Asher included Dor (Tantarah), so the river may be sought S. of that town. Crocodiles are said still to be found in the Khion; but this river runs N. of Carmel. The Crocodilodon of Potamia (V. xxv.5; xvi.2) and Pinny (v.19), which latter makes the southern boundary of Phoenicia, may possibly be Naher ez-Zerka, which enters the sea about 5 miles S. of Tantarah. Here also it is said the crocodile is sometimes seen. Perhaps therefore we may identify this stream with Shihor-libnath.

SHIKKERON, shîk'ker-on (שִׁיקֶרֶון, shîkkrôn; AV Shicron): A place mentioned in Josh 15:11 as being on the northern border of Judah, between Ekron and Baalath, Jabneel being beyond, toward the sea. The site is unknown, but Rev. C. Hauer (PEFS, 1907, 289) suggests Tell es-Sellakeh, N.W. of Akir, remarking that if this were the site the boundary would follow a natural course over the mountain to Jabneel.

SHILHIL, shîlhi (שִׁילְי, shîlî): Father of Jehoshaphat's mother (1 K 22:42 = 2 Ch 20:31). BA in 2 Ch, Zekel, Solei, B in 1 K, Zekel, Semei, A in 1 K, Zelah, Solei. Luc. in both, Zekel, Semei. Comment (EB, art. "Shihil") ventures the supposition that "Shihil" is a misreading for "Shihim" (Josh 15:32), and is therefore the name of a place rather than that of a person; he holds it to be the name of the birthplace of Azubah, the king's mother.

SHILHIM, shîlhim (שִׁילְיִם, shîlîm) [Josh 15:32]: See SHARRAM, (2). Possibly Azubah the mother of Jehoshaphat, who is called "the daughter of Shilhî" (1 K 22:42 = 2 Ch 20:31), was a native of Shilhîm.

SHILLEM, shîl'lem, SHILEMITEs, shîl'lem-its (שִׁילֶם, shîl'lem, שִׁילֶםִים, ha-shilemîm): Shillem is found in Gen 46:24, a son of Naphtali; Shilemites, his descendants, are mentioned in Nu 26:48; Shallum (q.v.) is found in 1 Ch 7:13.

SHILLOAH, shîl-lô'ah, shîl-lô'a (Isa 8:6). See SLOAH.

SHILLOH, shîl'lo (שִׁילָה), shîlôh: The prophecy in Gen 49:10, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, . . . until Shiloh come," etc, has been the subject of very diverse interpretations. RV gives as alternative renderings, "Till he come to Shiloh having the obedience of the peoples' Or, acc. to Syr, 'Till he come whose it is, etc.' (1) From the earliest times the passage has been regarded as Messianic, but the rendering in the text, which takes "Shiloh" as a proper name, bearing a meaning such as "peaceful" (cf Isa 9:6, "Prince of Peace"), labors under the difficulty that Shiloh is not found elsewhere as a personal name in the OT, nor is it easy to extract from it the meaning desired. Further, the word was not personally applied to the Messiah in any of the ancient VSS, which rather assume a different reading (see below). Apart from a purely fanciful passage in the Talm (cf Driver, Gen, 413), this application does not appear earlier than the Septuagint version of Seb. Münster in the 16th cent. (1534).

(2) The rendering, "Till he come to Shiloh," where Shiloh is taken as the name of a place, not a person, is plausible, but is felt to yield no suitable sense in the context. It is, therefore, now also set aside by most recent scholars. (3) The 3d rendering, which regards Shiloh as representing the Heb shilîh (שִׁילְיָה) = shilshôl for תִּשְׁלָךְ, "asher lô, "whose [it is]," has in its favor the fact that this is evidently the reading presupposed in the LXX, the Pesh, and the Jewish Tg, and seems to be alluded to in Ezk 21:27, "until he come whose right it is." In this view the passage has still a Messianic reference, though critics argue that it must then be regarded as late in origin. Other interpretations need not detain us. See for details the full discussions in E. H. Thompson's Christology, 1.54 ff., ET, the comms. of Delitzsch, Driver, and Skinner in Gen (esp. Excursus II in Driver), and the arts. in the various Bible dicts.; see also PROPHECY.

SHILLOH (the most usual form is שִׁילָה, shilôh, but it appears  שִׁלָּה, shilô, and שִׁלּוֹ, shullo, etc)
Shilon, Shilshah, Shimeathites

Shilonite, shîlô-nîth (םילוניט), shîlônî [2 Chr 9:29], shîlônî [10:15; Neh 11:5], shîlônî [13:16]; Shîlônî, Shîlôneh, Shîlônîth [תשלונית]: This denotes an inhabitant of Shiloh, and applies (1) to Ahijah the prophet (1 K 14:19, etc.); and (2) to a family of the children of Judah, who, after the exile, made their home in Jerusalem (1 Chr 9:5; Neh 11:5, AV "Shiloni").

Shilshah, shîlshâh (םילשח, shîlshâh): See Shammua and Shammah.
(1) Brother of David (see Shammah).
(2) Son of David (1 Chr 3:5, B, Ṣimʿâr, Sôman; but in 2 S 5:14, 1 Chr 14:4, "Shammua").
(3) A Merarite Levite (1 Chr 6:30, B, Ûômâ, Šîmônâ, A, Ṣûdâ, Šûmâd, Luc, Ṣâdûd, Samad).
(4) A Gershonite Levite (1 Chr 6:30[24], Šîmâd, Šûmâd).

Shimeathites, shîmʾâth-îsî (םיימאתים, shîmʾâthîm; BA, Ṣâdûthîm, Samathîm, Luc, Ṣûdûthîm, Samathîm): A subdivision of the tribe of Caleb (1 Chr 2:55). In the three families mentioned in this passage Jerome saw three distinct classes of religious functionaries: Vulg concones atque resonantes et in tabernaculis commorantes. The Tg has a similar explanation, except that the "Sacaithites are those covered" with a spirit of prophecy. Bähr (Handbuch zum AT) accepts Jerome's explanation, except that he regards the first class as gate-keepers (Aram. תירא, 'irâ; Heb תירא, shaʾar) and the second as the "men of the Forty." These are also the "men of Shimeath" (cf Torrey, Ezra Studies, 215).

Horace J. Wolf

Shimeath, shîmʾâth (םיימא, shîmʾâth, or שיםא, shîmʾâth; LXX in 2 K, 'Ismoûth, Yismôth, B in 2 Chr, Šûdâ, Šûmâd, A, Ṣûdâ, Šûmâd, Luc, Ṣâdûd, Samad): Father of Jozacar (2 K 2:21), one of the murderers of Joash, king of Judah. According to 2 Chr 24 26 Shimeath is an Ammonites and the mother, not the father, of Jozacar. Many textual emendations have been suggested (af HDD, art. "Shimeath"), but they are unnecessary, as the Chronicler's revised version of the incident in K was a deliberate one. The Chronicler was a sturdy opponent of intermarriage, and in the story of the assassination of King Joash he saw an opportunity to strike a blow against the hated practice of intercourse with non-Israelites. In this particular story, the two conspirators are given as "Jozakar the son of [shîmʾâth], and Jehozabad the son of [shîmʾâth]." The two names are both masc.; but the final of the former looked to the Chronicler like the fem. ending and offered him his opportunity. In his account, the two of the murderers (dastardly villains, even though the king had merited death) was the "son of [shîmʾâth], the Ammonite," and the other was "the son of [חָוִית], the Moabite" (cf Torrey, Ezra Studies, 212).

Shimeathites, shîmʾâth-îsî (םיימאתים, shîmʾâthîm; BA, Ṣâdûthîm, Samathîm, Luc, Ṣûdûthîm, Samathîm): A subdivision of the tribe of Caleb (1 Chr 2:55). In the three families mentioned in this passage Jerome saw three distinct classes of religious functionaries: Vulg concones atque resonantes et in tabernaculis commorantes. The Tg has a similar explanation, except that the "Sacaithites are those covered" with a spirit of prophecy. Bähr (Handbuch zum AT) accepts Jerome's explanation, except that he regards the first class as gate-keepers (Aram. תירא, 'irâ; Heb תירא, shaʾar). Wellhausen (DGJ, 30 f) finds underlying the three names תירא, תירא, the technical term for sacred music-making, תירא, תירא, the Halacha or sacred tradition. Buhl (HWB 248) derives Shimeathites and Sukethites from unknown places. Keil interprets as descendants from the unknown Shenei (cf. Curtis, ICC). The passage is hopelessly obscure. Horace J. Wolf SHIMEI, shim'i (םימה, shimm', possibly "hear me [El]" or "Jah"); Shem'e, Semei, Seme, Seme'ah. A frequent occurrence throughout the OT records, sometimes varying slightly in form. AV has "Shimi" in Ex 6 17; "Shimhi" in 1 Ch 8 21; "Shimeah" in 2 S 21 21. RV has "Shim'ites" in Zec 12 13, where AV has "Shomites". Shime'ah in 1 Ch 18 21 has "Shema" in 1 Ch 18 21 21 m for the "Shime" of ver 21. In all others of the many occurrences in AV and RV the form is "Shimei.

(1) A family name among the Levites before and after the exile, at least five of whom bore it: (a) Son of Gershom and grandson of Levi (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18; 1 Ch 6 17; 23 7 10). The text of 1 Ch 6 and 23 is corrupt, making difficult the tracing of the various genealogies and the identification of the several Shimeis. Evidently that of 23 is nearer for one of its four sons (Ladan or Libni, whose names are given in the preceding verse. (b) An ancestor of Asaph the musician (1 Ch 6 42), possibly the same as (a) above, Jahath the son of S. (cf. 23 10) being by a copyist's error transposed so as to be the father of S. (c) A descendant of the Merarite branch of the Levites (1 Ch 6 29). (d) One of the 288 trained singers in the service of the sanctuary under Asaph (1 Ch 25 17). (e) One of the Levites who helped to cleanse the Temple in Hezekiah's reformation (2 Ch 27 14). He was a descendant of Heman the musician. Hezekiah afterward appointed him with Conaniah to have chief oversight of "the oblations and the tithes and the dedicated things" which were brought into the chambers of Jeh's house prepared for them (2 Ch 31 11 12). (f) A Levite who under Ezra put away his foreign wife (Ezr 10 23), "Semeic" in 1 Esd 9 23.

(2) The best-known Bible character of this name is the Benjamite, of the family of Saul (2 S 16 5 12; 19 16 20; 1 K 2 8 9 36 36), who met David at Bahurim as he was fleeing from Absalom, and in bitter and cowardly fashion cursed and attacked the hard-pressed king. Apparently David's flight to the Jordan led through a narrow ravine, on one side of which stood Shimei, on the ridge above, stood Shimei in safety as he cast stones at David and his men, cursing as he threw (2 S 16 5 6). His hatred of David who had displaced his royal kinsman Saul had smouldered long in his mean heart; and now the flame burst out, as the aged and apparently helpless king flees before his own son. S. seizes the long-coveted opportunity to pour out the acid hate of his heart. But when David's faithful companion could not make the ravine to make quick work of S., the noble king forbade him with these remarkable words: "Behold, my son, who came forth from my bowels, seeketh my life: how much more may this Benjamite now do it? let him alone, and let him curse; for Jeh hath bidden him. It may be that Jeh ... will require me good for his cursing" (2 S 16 11 12). After Absalom's overthrow, as the king was returning victorious and vindicated, S. met him at the Jordan with most abject confession and with vows of allegiance (2 S 18 16 23).

The king spared his life; but shortly before his death charged his son Solomon to see that due punishment should come to Shimei for his sins: "Foul shalt bring his儿子 sons upon me in time to come; (1 K 2 9). When he came to the throne Solomon summoned Shimeai and made him his chief house in Jerusalem, which he shared with and from which he must not go out on pain of death (1 K 2 36 38). Feeding secure after some years, Shimei left his home in Jerusalem to recapture some escaped slaves (vs 39 41), and in consequence he was promptly dispatched by that gruesome avenger of blood, the royal executioner. "Benjamin fell upon him," as he had upon Adonijah and Joab, "so that he died" (ver 46).

(3) Another Benjamite, mentioned with Rei as an officer in the king's bodyguard, who was faithful to David in the rebellion of Adonijah (1 K 1 5 8). Jos reads Rei as a common noun, describing S. as "the friend of David." He is to be identified with the son of Elah (1 K 4 18), whom Solomon, probably because of his fidelity, named as one of the 12 chief commissary officers appointed over all Israel, "who provided victuals for the king and his household."

(4) A man of some prominence in the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 21), whose home was in Ahijah, where he was a "head of fathers' houses" (ver 13); but his descendants lived in Jerusalem (ver 28). In AV he is called "Shimi"; in ver 13 he is called "Shema.

(5) Another Benjamin, an ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2 5), "Seme'as" in Est 11 2.

(7) A man of Judah, called "the Ramathite," who was "over the vineyard" in David's reign (1 Ch 27 27).

(8) A Simeonite living in the time of David (1 Ch 4 20 27), whose chief claim to distinction was that he was father of 10 sons and 6 daughters. The descendants of such a numerous progeny, not being able to maintain themselves in their ancestral home in Beer-sheba, in the days of Hezekiah fell upon Gerar, and dispossessed "the sons of Ham" (ver 20 LXX), and upon Mt. Seir, driving out the Amalekites (ver 43).

(9) A man of Reuben, son of Gog (1 Ch 5 4).

(10), (11) Two men of "Israel," i.e. not priests or Levites, one father of the sons of Hasenuah (Est 10 33), the other "of the sons of Bani" (10 35), who put away their foreign wives at Ezra's command. In 1 Esd called respectively "Semei" (9 35) and "Seme'et" (9 34).

(12) A brother of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 19).

The Shimeites were descendants of Shimei, grandson of Levi; cf (1) (a) above (Nu 3 21; Zec 12 13).

SHIMEON, shimön (שֵׁם, shem'; elsewhere "Simeon"): One of the sons of Harmi who had married foreign wives (Est 10 31; BA, Zevan, Semein, Luc., Zevane, Simean = 1 Esd 9 32, "Simon Chosemann").

SHIMHI, shim'hi. See SHIMEI.

SHIMI, shim'i, sh'nt, SHIMITES, shim'mas. See SHIMEI.

SHIMMA, shim'ma. See SHAMMAR.

SHIMON, shimón (שֵׁם, shem'; B, Simeon, Simeon, Simeon, Luc., Sapi, Samit): A name in the Judahite genealogy (1 Ch 4 20).

SHIRUmRATH, shirumrath (שִׁרְמָרָת, Shirumarath; Sama- rath, Samarath): The last of nine sons of Shimei of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 21).

SHIMRI, shim'ri (שֶׁם, sherm; various forms in LXX): There are four Hebrews mentioned in the Bible who bear this name:

(1) A Simeonite, a son of Shemiah and father of Jedediah, a chief of his tribe (1 Ch 4 37).

(2) The father of Jedediah, a bodyguard of King David (1 Ch 1 45).

(3) A son of Hoshah, a Levite. He was appointed by David to be doorkeeper in the house of the Lord. He was made chief of the tribe, although not the firstborn of his family (1 Ch 26 10).

(4) One of the sons of Elizaphan, a Levite. He assisted in purifying the temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29:13).

SHIRMITH, shim' rith (שִׁмяרִית, shimrith, "guard," fem.): A Moabitess, the mother of Jehozabad, one of those that conspired against King Joash (2 Ch 24:26). Elsewhere (2 K 12:21) Jehezabad is described as the son of Shomer (q.v.), the same name without the fem. ending.

SHIRMON, shim' ron (שִׁמְרֹן, shimron; B, שְׁמֹרֹן; Summon, A, שָׁמֹרֶנָה, Sameron; and other forms): A town whose king was tributary to Jabin king of Hazor, and who joined in the attempt to resist the invasion under Joshua (Josh 11:1). It was in the territory allotted to Zebulon (15:15). No sure identification of the site is given. Uder Etn and Talm both omit the r from the name; and Neubauer would identify it with Simonia (Vita, 24), the Simonia of the Talum, which is now represented by Semânîyê, a village about 5 miles W. of Nazareth, on the edge of the plain (Assur, du Talum). Beil Laḥm, named by Jos along with it, is a short distance to the N.W. Es-Semirîyê, about 3 miles N. of Acre, has also been suggested; but it is perhaps too far to the W.

SHIRMON-MERON, shim' ron-mê' ron (שִׁמְרֹן מֶרִון, shimron merôn; Summon . . . Meror; Summon . . . Marrom, A, Σαμαρεία . . . Μαροῦν, Samron . . . Phasdi . . . Maron): A royal city of the Canaanites, the king of which was slain by Joshua (12:20). Here the name is followed by that of Adashiphon, which also follows the name of Shirmon in 11:1. This suggests that the two are in reality one, and that Shirmon-meron may only be the full name. A royal Can. city, Samsimuruna, is mentioned in the inscriptions of Samascharr, Esar-haddon and Assur-bani-pal, which were found by Julius Schrader (KAT, 163) would identify with this, and thinks it may now be represented by es-Semirîyê. See Shirmon.

SHIMSHAI, shim'shāi, shim'shā' (שִׁמְשָי, shimshay; B, Σάμαρα, Samasdr, Samal, Shamshâ, Samasdr, Samasar, Sames, Σαμαρεία, Samas, Σαμαρ, Luc., Σαμάθα, Samatos, throughout; in 1 Ead 2:17 he is called "Semellius," RV "Samellius"); there are two explanations of this name; he has been generally favored. One conjecture traces it to an Old Persian compound șimash, in the sense of "servant" (cf. BDB, s.v. The name looks as though it were derived from șimash, "shemesh," "the sun"): A state secretary who, with Rehum (q.v.) and others, wrote to Artaxerxes to persuade him to prohibish the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 4:8, 9.17.23).

SHIN, shin, SIN, sēn (שֵׁנ), șen: The 21st letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as š, ș. It came also to be used for the number 300. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

SHINAB, shin' āb (שִׁנָּב, shināb', Sum, ſhînôh, shinār; Šinādār, Šennadr): King of Admah (q.v.). He is mentioned with Shemever, king of Zeboiin; he was attacked by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen 14:2). The reading is very uncertain. If the incident narrated is founded on fact, Shinab may be identical with Sinib, an Ammonite king in the time of Tgath-pileser III (so Fr. Delitzsch, Wo lag der Paradies? 294); or the name may be equated by the Assyry scholars (cf. "Shenaaz"); and Semer with the Assyry Semus-abi (Sacey, Expose 7, VIII, 463). Jewish exegesis gives a sinister explanation of all four names (ver 2). The Mihir (Br. Bab. 42) explains Shinab as șināb bāšab, "one who draws money [wherever he can]." It is of interest to note that the names fall into two alliterative pairs and that each king's name contains exactly the same letters as that of his city. On the whole, however, the list leaves an impression of artificiality; as the names are not repeated in ver 8, it is highly probable that they are later additions to the text.

SHINAR, shin' nār (שִׁנָּר), shin' ar; Šinnār, Šen̄nādār, Šennadār):

1. Identification
2. Possible Babylonian Form of the Name
3. Sumerian Name, and Corresponding Semitic Name
4. The Syriac Šen' ar
5. The Primitive Tongue of Shinar
6. Comparison with the Semitic Idiom

The name given, in the earliest Heb records, to Babylonia, later called Babel, or the land of Babel (בַּבֵּל, bavel, 'ereq bavel). In Gen 10:10

1. Identity—It is the district wherein lay Babel, the ancient name, of Erech, Accad, and Calneh, cities which were the "beginning" of Nimrod's kingdom. In 11:2 Shinar is described as the land of the plain where migrants from the E. settled, and founded Babel, the city, and its great tower. Though sometimes identified with the Bab Šomer, the connection of Shinar with that name is doubtful.

The principal difficulty lies in
2. Possible Babylonian Form (סִינָר)

3. Sumerian and Other Equivalent Forms (which would alone furnish a satisfactory basis of comparison, names not found, and would, if existent, only apply to the southern portion of Babylonia. The northern tract was called Akkad, after the name of its capital city (see Accan). The Gr form Šen(n)ār shows that, at the time the LXX tr was made, there was no tradition that the ʾqinā was guttural, as the supposed Bab forms would lead us to expect. As the Bib. form Šinar indicates the whole of Babylonia, it corresponds with the native (Sumerian) Kingi-Ura, rendered "Sumer and Akkad," from which, by changing K into Š (found in Sumerian), Shinar may have been derived, but this explanation is not free from difficulties.

This twofold designation, Kingi-Ura, is that which is commonly used in the inscriptions of the earlier kings, though it cannot then have indicated always the whole country, but only such parts of it as acknowledged their overlordship.

Latin Equivalents on the corresponding term seems to have been "Kos" ("the territory of the Koskam") to all appearance a term introduced by the Kasite rulers. Nabonassar and his successors seem to have contented themselves with the title "king of Babylon," rule in the city implying also the dominion over the whole country. Often, however, the equivalent term for Babylonia is Ee', probably an abbreviation of Erûdu, and here standing for the land belonging to that sacred city—"the good city," a type of Paradise, Babylonia being, in fact, situated upon the édînu, or "plain" (see Édînu).

All these comparisons tend to show that the Bab equivalent of Shinar is not any of the above, and as yet has not, in fact, been found. This is also implied by the fact that Sen'ar was used in Sýr for the country around Baghdad, and accordingly included may be supposed (plain upon which the ruins of Babylon stand. Sen'ar was therefore in all probability an ancient Bab designation of the tract, now lost, but regarded by the Hebrews as synonymous with Babylonia.

From the inscriptions it would seem that the primitive language of Shinar was not Semitic, but the agglutinative idiom now named

5. Primitive Sumerian—a tongue long regarded as Tongue of Turanian, and having, it is thought, Turkish as its Chinese affinity. áyalk, "to be," Turkish ol-mak; ana (ana), "mother," Turkish ana; abba, "old man," Turkish Baba, "father"; ë; ë, "house," Turkish ev, etc. The Chinese affinities seem close lest, but the following may be quoted: ë(y)u, "father." Chinese ye (Amoy ë); ge, "night." Chinese ye; gu, "to speak," Chinese yâ; shu, "hand," Chinese shuë; kin, "business," Chinese kung, "work," etc. Chinese and Turkish, however, have had time to pass through many changes since Sumerian was current in Shinar. Many words of the Sumerian language were borrowed by the Sem Babylonians, and a few (like hêkal, "temple," Sem 'hêgal, "great house") entered the other Sem languages.

Halfey's contention, that Sumerian is simply "an allography" for the expression of Sem Bab, seems to be untenable, as they differ not only in words, but also in grammar: moreover, Sumerian had a dialect, called by the natives "woman's tongue." For the rest, the principal differences between Sumerian and Sem Bab are: (1) oppositional suffixes instead of prepositions; (2) verbs with long strings of prefixes and infixes to express the person and regiments, instead of a prefix and a suffix; (3) compound words, both nouns and verbs, are common instead of rare. Sumerian seems to have borrowed several words from Sem Bab.

Not only the language, but also the sculptures which they have left, point to the probability that the earlier inhabitants of Shinar belonged to a different race from the Turanians. The inscriptions and bas-reliefs show, they have been sited in any case, their warriors, in the better bas-reliefs, as well as the figures of the god Nin-Girsu (formerly known as "the god with the firestick"), and the engraved cylinders, have this type. Moreover, the sculptures and cylinder-seals show that certain classical objects or the like—were common shaven, in marked contrast to Sem usage elsewhere.

Deities, however, always had hair and beard, implying that they came from a different, though possibly related, stock. These deities were very numerous, and it is not unlikely that, though those with Sumerian names may be counted by hundreds, those with Sem names are only to be reckoned by tens.

Though there is no certain indication which race entered Shinar first, it is to be noted that Nimrod, presumably Shinar's first king and the founder of its great cities, was a son of Cush (Gen 10:8), and the name of Shinar seems to have existed before the foundation of Babel (Babylon) and its tower (Gen 11:2). In the native sculptures, moreover, the name Sen'ar was prominently pre-eminent, and in the inscriptions the non-Sem idiom precedes that of the Sem tr. Everything points, therefore, to the Semarians having been in Babylonia before the Sem inhabitants.

At the earliest period to which our records refer the Semarians of Shinar were divided into a number of small states, of which the following may be regarded as the principal:

6. of Shinar (1) Sippar or Sippar-Arusu (Ye-ruru), possibly including Accad (Gen 10:1), some distance S.W. of Baghdad. It is the modern 'Abu-rabbah, "father of grain." Though it seems to have fallen early under the dominion of the Semites, it was at first Semarian, as its native name, Zimhir, and the ideographic writing thereof show. According to Berosus, who calls it Pontapiblion, one of its earliest kings was Amelon or Amillaros, who reigned 13 sari, or 45,800 years. Later on comes Eredesh, the name Enne-duran-ki, renowned as a priest favored by the gods.

(2) About 18 miles N. of Babylon lay Kâš, now Kishina—found as Babylon the capital of Shinar. Its early name, Asag-shau, is said to have been the name of a place, or of a wine-merchant, and to have reigned 100 years.

(3) Babylon, for which see BABEL; BABYLON. As one of its early kings, Berosus mentions Aloros, "the shepherd of the people," as having reigned for 10 sari, or 30,000 years. The state of Babylon probably included Cuthah (Tel Ibraheim), which once had kings of its own, and possessed a special legend of the Creation. Belonging to Babylon, also, was the renowned city Borsippa, now Bira, or the Bira Nimrud, the traditional site of the Tower of Babel (see BABEL, TOWER OF).

(4) Some distance S.E. of Babylon lay Nippur or Niffer, now Niffer (Noufar), identified by the rabbis with the 'Calneh' of Gen 10:10. It was the place of considerable importance under the Assyrians, and the worship of Enlil and Ninlil, later, also, of their son Ninip and his spouse (see CALNEH). The American excavations on this site have thrown a flood of light upon almost every branch of Assyriological research.

(5) Adab, now called Bismanyag, the city of Mah, the goddess of reproduction. One of the earliest rulers of Adab was probably known as Linga-lol, of whom a fine statue, discovered by the American explorers, exists. It was apparently renowned as a necropolis.

(6) S. and a little W. of Adab was Šurippak, now Fara. This was the birthplace of the Bab Noah, Ut-napishtim, son of Oparsa (Umbara-Tulu), a Chaldaean of Erech. The coming of the Flood was revealed to Ut-napishtim here.

(7) Practically E. of Fara lay Unma or Gišá or Gišá or Gišá, now Jochâ. This city was apparently of considerable importance, and the traditional type of Lulli.

(8) S. of Fara lay Unuqa, Sem Urak, the Bib. Ereck (q.v.), now Warka. Its most celebrated king, after Gilgamesh, was Lugal-zaggi-Ši, one of the opponents of the rulers of Lagash.

(9) Some distance E. of Warka was the territory of Lagash, now Tel-hah—a little state, rather inaccessible, but of considerable importance to the antiquarian, which is a testimonial to the advance in civilization which it had made. Its kings and viceroys were among the most renowned, though apparently unknown outside their own domains. The most celebrated were the reformer Uru-kagina and viceroy Guda, to whom many erections in the city were due. (See Guda's remarkable statue in the Louvre.)

(10) Some time after the S.E. of Warka lay Larsa, the “Elassar” of Gen 14 1 (q.v.). This center of learning maintained its independence even after the other states had been absorbed by Hammurabi and his dynasty into the Babylon empire.

(11) To the S.E. of Warka and Senqara lies the site of the ancient Ur of the Chaldees (q.v.). This city was given to Abraham, and much of its plan is preserved by the ruins of modern Mesopotamia, which were once the seat of the ancient city.

(12) Of the Ur lay Erédin, or, in full, GURDUGA, “the good city,” wherein, apparently, lay the earthly Paradise. This is identified with the present “Abu-shahrein,” and was the seat of Ea or Enki, god of the sea and of fertilizing streams. According to the tradition, it was there that the “dark vine grew”—a type generally of the tree of life. The later kings of Babylon sometimes bear the title “king of Erédin,” as though rulers of the domain of Paradise.

(13) The Land of the Sea (that bordering on the Pers Gulf), in which, seemingly, the Chaldeans afterward settled, seems to have played an important part in the early history of Shinar. Berosus speaks of its king Ammenak, who reigned 12 sari, or 43,200 years, and in whose time the Musurus Oannes, or Annedotus, arose out of the Pers Gulf. In references referred to in the legends which Berossus refers to, he was half-man and half-fish. It is thought that these incidents, though evidently mythical, point to the introduction of civilization into Babylonia, from this point. See also Jonaiah, The Book of

(14) N. of the Ur lay Isin, or Karrar, seat of the worship of Nin-Karrara, was also an important state governed by its own kings.

(15) Upé or Upia, the Gr Opis, apparently obtained renown at a very early date, its kings being given in the great chronological list before those of Kassite.

(16) Other well-known cities, possibly state-capitals, were Larak, Gr Laranche; Amarda, one of the centers of the worship of Nergal; Allmanu, a province E. of the present Bagdad; Dilmu, now Nuru, Ennigu, and Kabara, seeming centers of the worship of Hadad; Tilman, at the head of the Pers Gulf, and including the island of Bahrein; the province of Sabu; Sebes or Bagdadu, possibly the modern Bagdad, and several others.

Whether the country was in the same seemingly uncared-for state as at present is unknown; but one cannot help admiring the courtesy of the original immigrants into such a district, for example, as that of Lagas. This, which belongs to Lagas, is without an equal among the neighboring peoples. The watercourses and marshes are like the whole of Shinar in general, it is more or less dried up in summer, and unhealthy for Europeans. The alternations in the waterways, owing to changes in the irrigation-dikes, must then, as now, have hindered communication. Sharp cold, with frost, succeeds the heat of summer, and from time to time sand-storms sweep across the plain. Notwithstanding the destruction sometimes wrought, the floods were always welcomed in consequence of the fruitfulness which followed, and which was such as to make Babylonia one of the most fertile tracts known.

The reference to the Sumerian sculptures in (7) above will have shown that the inhabitants of the state of Shinar possessed no mean order and of some antiquity, even at the time when it first presents itself to our notice. It is true that many specimens are crude and uncouth, but this is probably due to the sculptures having been, often enough, the slaves of their material. Their stones were frequently more or less pebble-shaped, and they had neither the skill nor the tools to reduce them to better proportions—moreover, reduction of bulk would have meant a diminution of their importance. The broad, squat figures which they produced, however, gave them bad models for their bas-reliefs, and it was long ere this defect was removed, notwithstanding the superior work produced by their seal-engravers during and after the 4th millennium BC.

But in all probability special renown will always be attached to the non-Semitic inhabitants of Shinar as the inventors, or at least the users, of the writing-cum-Language. According to the study of the system which they introduced, the whole of the present Near East was divided into cuneiform script, and ideographic for the roots. To show this the following transcribed example will probably suffice:

Énu-DU URU nu-DIM, A house was not built, a city was not constructed; URU nu-DIM ADAM nu-mun-GAR, This city was not constructed, a community nation was not founded;

ABZU nu-DU GURDUGA nu-DIM, The abyss was not built, Erédin was not constructed;

ÉAZAGA DINGIR-Ene KI-DURA-bi nu-DIM, The holy house of the gods, its seat was not constructed;

SU-nu-NIGA KURKUR-AGA ABDADAD, The whole of the lands was sea.

The nominal and verbal roots of the above extract from the bilingual account of the Creation are in capitals, and the pronominal prefixes and suffixes are in smaller letters, with a couple of lengthening suffixes and few pronunciations of the nouns, in small letters. This will not only give an idea of the poetical form of the Sumerian legend of the Creation by Merodach and Aratu, but also show how short and concise, as a language, was the speech of Shinar, before Sem supremacy.

SHINE, shin: The Heb words 'elah, 'or, hadal, zahr, zarah, žabba', žaphah, 'öshath and karon are all tr. "shine." All indicate either the direct or indirect diffusion of beams of light. In a direct and literal sense the word "shine" is used of the heavenly bodies, or of candles, and fire (Job 18 5; 26 5 AV; 29 3; 31 20; 2 K 3 22). In a figurative sense it is used of reflected light, which dazzles in any sense (Ex 34 29 f.35; Is 60 1; Ezk 43 2; Dn 12 3). God as the sun of righteousness is thus depicted in Ps 50 2. The NT words astrapé, astrapá, ãmpá, phainó and phainó are tr. "shine." Thus literally it is said of the lightning that it shines (Mt 24 27; Lk 17 24). The term is also applied to the life of faith or to men prominent in the kingdom of God (Mt 5 16; Jn 5 35; 2 Cor 4 6; Phil 2 15; 2 Pet 1 19); to the glory of God (Lk 2 9); to angelic appearances (Lk 24 4; Acts 12 7); or to Christ as He appeared to John on Patmos (Rev 1 10).

SHION, shi'ôn (שִׁיאָן); B; Ἰσαάκ, Σίσιν, Α, Ἦσαίας, Σίσιν): A town in the territory of Issachar, called with Shunem, Haparah and Anaharath (Josh 19:20). It is possibly identical with Khirbet Shâ'ân, near 'Ai in Bashan, 4 miles N.W. of Mt. Tabor.

SHIPHI, shi'î (שִׁיִּח); B; Ἰςάφαδ, Ἰσραήλ, Α, Ἰσαήλ, Ἰσραν: A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4:37 [360]).

SHIPMITE, shîp'mît. See SHEPHAN; SHIP-MOTH.

SHIPIRAH, shîp'rá (שֵׂיפֶרָה, shiphrâ), "fairness," "beauty": LXX Σεφήρα, Septuagint, the rendering also of ספֶרָה, siphrâ, in Ex 2:21); The name of one of the Hebrew midwives (Ex 1:15). See also Ziph-Forah.

LITERATURE

In the OT the following words are found:

(1) The word most commonly used in Heb.) "a ship, a vessel, a boat, a ship's crew" (Prov 28:39; 1 Jon 4:34), of which the pl. ספָרֵים is found most frequently (Jgs 5:17; 1 K 22:48 ft, and many other places).

The collective term for "a army of ships" is שְׂפָרִים (1 K 20:26 f; 10:22; "unto Tarshish," a "navy [of ships] of Tarshish," 1 K 10:22; "shipped a "collared with rope.")

(2) ספֶרָה, siphrâ (Nu 24:24; Exk 39:9; Isa 33:21; 11:12; "gallant ship"); Dan 11:30; "cümm Kitim, "ships of Kitim.

(3) ספֶרָה, siphrâ, "innermost parts of the ship; RV, "sides of the ship" AV (Jon 1:5, the only place where the word is found).

In Acts 20:7; 21:24, plôoan, is the usual word (Wisd 14:1; Eccles 33:2, etc), τρ' "vessel" in Wisd 14:1, but "ship" elsewhere. For "ship" Wisd 5:10 has מָלַל, מַלֶל, "a boat in 2 Macc 18:3.6 is for ἱππάν, ἱππάν, and "navy" in 1 Macc 1:17; 2 Macc 13:9; 14:1 for ἱππάν, ἱππάν, in Wisd 14:6 Noah's ark is called a σκύλος, σκύλος, σκύλος, a "clumsy ship" (the literal tr 'raft" in RV is impossible). In the NT there are four words in use: (1) πλῶν (Acts 27:41, the only place where it occurs, designating the large sa-ca-going vessel in which St. Paul sailed to Crete) (2) πλοῖον, πλοίον, πλοῖον, "a little boat" (Mt 4:21, 22 and all other places where the ship carrying St. Paul is mentioned, except Acts 27 above). In Jas 3:8; Rev 19:17, πλοῖον is rendered "ship." (1) σκύλος, σκύλος, σκύλος, "boat" (Acts 27:16-30, 32, where it means the small boat that carried St. Paul) (3) πλοῖον, πλοῖον, "a boat")

I. THE HEBREWS AND THE SEA.—The Hebrews were a pastoral and agricultural people, and had no inducements to follow a seafaring life. They were possessed of a considerable seaborde along the Mediterranean, but the character of their coast gave little encouragement to navigation. The capture of the land of Israel from Carmel southward had no bays and no estuaries or river-mouths to offer shelter from storm or to be havens of ships. Solomon landed his timber and other materials for the Temple at Joppa, and tradition has handed down what is called "Solomon's Harbor" there. The builders of the second temple also got timber from Lebanon and conveyed it to Joppa. It was Simon Maccabaeus, however, who built its harbor, and the harbor at Joppa was "the first and only harbor of the Jews" (G. A. Smith, I H G L, 136). Caesarea in NT times was a place of shipping and possessed a harbor which Jos declared to be greater than the Piraeus, but it was Herod's and more Gr and Rom than Jewish. It was mostly inhabited by Greeks (Jos. BJ, III, ix, 1). Now Caesarea has disappeared; and Joppa has only an open roadstead where vessels lie without shelter, and receive and discharge cargo and passengers by means of boats pulling between them and the shore. It was in other directions that Israel made acquaintance with the activities of the sea. Of internal navigation, beyond the fishing-boats on the Sea of Galilee which belong exclusively to the NT, the ferry boat on the Jordan (2 S 5:18, "shîphrâth, "islands"; and even that is not perfectly clear (RV "convo," but a "ford" is doubtless meant). It is from Tyre and Egypt and even Assyria and Babylonia, rather than from their own waters, that the Hebrew prophets and psalmists drew their pictures of seafaring life.

II. SHIPS IN THE OT AND APOC.—(1) In early times.

—In the early books of the OT there are references connecting certain of the tribes, and the northern tribes, with the activities of the sea. (Gen 49:13; Dt 33:19); and in Deborah's Song, which is acknowledged to be a very early fragment of Heb lit., "shipped a "sailed with anchors".

II. During the monarchy.—It is not till the time of the monarchy that the Hebrews begin to figure as a commercial people. Already in the time of David commercial relations had been established between Israel and Tyre (2 S 5:11); the friendly cooperation was continued by Solomon, who availed himself of a fleet of cedar and the grip at Hiram's command on Lebanon, but also of the skilled service of Hiram's men to bring the timber from the mountains to the sea. Hiram also undertook to make the cedar and the fir into rafts (1 K 5:9, 12, 27, dóbbróth, AV 'floats'; 2 Ch 2:16, 'flotes'); raphddoth, 'flotes' AV, 'floats' RV) to go by sea and to deliver them to Solomon's men at the place appointed, which the Chronicler tells us was Joppa. From this cooperation in the building of the Temple there grew up a larger connection in the pursuit of sea-borne commerce. It was at Ezion-geber near to Elath on the Red Sea, in the land of Edom which David had conquered, that Solomon had his fleet, "a navy of ships" (1 K 9:26-28). Hiram joined Solomon in these enterprises which had their center on the Red Sea, and thus the Phoenicians had water communication with the coasts of Arabia and Africa, and even of India. The wool and spices which existed for the commerce of the West. "For the king [Solomon] had at sea a navy of Tarshish with the navy of Hiram: once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, and ivory, and apes, and peacocks" (1 K 10:22).

Tarshish is the name of the Phoen colony on the river Tartessus, called also Baetic, the modern Andalucia. It was the farthest limit of the western world as known to the Hebrews. It was no doubt a strong enterprise where they had held their commerce, but Tarsus is much nearer to it than Tarragona (Hab 2.14). In the days of Ahaz (2 K 16:6) it was seized by the Syrians in the days of Ahaz (2 K 16:6).

From Solomon's time onward the kings of Judah retained their hold upon Eloth (1 K 22:46; 2 Ch 20:35-37) till it was seized by the Syrians in the days of Ahaz (2 K 16:6).

(3) In later times.—As Solomon had the cooperation of Hiram in securing materials and craftsmen for the building of the first Temple, so Joshua and Zerubbabel by the favor of Cyrus obtained timber from Lebanon, and masons and carpenters from Sidon and Tyre for the building of the second. Again, cedar trees were brought from Lebanon by sea to Joppa, and thence conveyed to Jerusalem (Ezr 3:7).

From Joppa Jonah fled to avoid compliance with God's command to preach repentance there (Jon 1:17). He found a ship bound for Tarshish as far toward the W. as Nineweh to the E. The fare (qaddar) for such a voyage was a passenger of the ship in which he stowed himself away (qaddihan), the crew (malkhim), the captain or shipmaster (rabh ha-babkh), the storm, the angry sea, the terrified mariners and their cry to their gods, and the casting of Jonah overboard to appease the raging waters—all make a likeable picture.

It was in the time of Simon, the last survivor of the Maccabean brothers, that Joppa became a seaport with a harbor for shipping. "Amid all his glory he took Joppa for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea" (1 Mac 14:3). When Simon reared his monument over the sepulcher of his father and brothers at Modin, he set up seven pyramids with pillars, upon which were carved figures of ships to be "seen of all that sail on the sea" (1 Mac 13:29). About this period we hear of ships in naval warfare. When Antiochus IV Epiphanes planned his expedition against Egypt, he had with other armaments "a great navy," presumably ships of war (1 Mac 1:17); and at a later time Antiochus VII speaks expressly of "ships of war" (1 Mac 15:8).

1. Egypt.—The Egyptians, like other nations of antiquity, had a great horror of the open sea, although they were expert enough in the management of their commerce and the building of Neighboring Pharaoh-necho built up a powerful navy to serve him both in commerce and in war. See PHARAOH-NECHO.

Of explicit references to Egyptian ships in the OT there are but few. Isaiah speaks of vessels of papyrus upon the waters of the Upper Nile, on board of which are the messengers of Cush or Ethiopia returning to tell the tidings of the overthrow of Assyria to the inhabitants of those remote lands (18:2, AV) which "hurried" instead of "papyrus." Ezekiel also, foretelling the overthrow of Egypt, speaks of messengers traveling with the news on swift Nile boats to strike terror into the hearts of the "courageous Egyptians." (30:9). When Jeh compares his days to "the swift ships" (c. the ships of reed "RVm), the allusion is most likely to Egypt's, these being skiffs with a wooden keel and the rest of buirissons, sufficient to carry one person, or at most two, and light, to travel swiftly (9:20).

2. Assyria and Babylonia.—The Assyrians and Babylonians were mainly an inland people, but their rivers gave them considerable scopes for navigation. The Assyrian monuments contain representations of naval engagements and operations on the Euphrates. When Isaiah pictures Jeh as a better defender of Judah than the rivers and streams of his country, he speaks of water coming up to the doors of his city (1:7). Day by day the wondrous narratives come to us which Ezekiel tells (ch. 27, with Davidson's notes) brings together more of the features of the ship of antiquity than any other that has come down to us. Her builders have made her perfect in beauty with planks of fir or cypress, most of cedar, oars of the oak of Bashan, benches or deck of ivory inlaid with boxwood, sail of fine linen with brodered work from Egypt, and an awning of blue and purple from the coasts of Elahiah (possibly Sidon). She is described as oarsmen of Sidon and Arvad, pilots of the wise men of Tyre, callers from Gebal to stop up the cracks and seams in their timbers, mariners and men of war from other lands who enhanced her beauty by hanging up the shield and hem of their flag in her. She is furnished with the most varied cargo, the produce of the lands around, her customers, or as they are called, her traffickers, being Tarshish in the far W., Sheba and Arabia in the S., Haran and Asshur in the E., Javan, which is Grecia, and Tubal, which is Spain, in the W.

One or two of the particulars of this description may be commented upon. (a) As regards rigging, the Phoen ships of the time of Ezekiel, as seen in Assyri representations, had one mast with one yard and carried a square sail.

Egypt ships on the Red Sea about the time of the Exodus, from relics of the XIXth Dynasty, had one mast and two yards, and carried also one large square sail. The masts and yards were made of fir, or of pine, and the sails of linen, but the fiber of maysur was employed as well as flax in the manufacture of sail-cloth. The sail had also to serve "for an ensign" (Ex. EK 27 7). "The flag proper," says Davidson (ad loc.), "seems not to have been used in ancient navigation": its purpose was found to have been served as for example in the battle of Actium the ship of Antony was distinguished by its purple sail."

As regards the crew, in the two-hanked Phoen ships the rowers of the first bank work their oars over the top of the mast, while those of the second portage lower down, so that each may have free play for his oar. The callers were those who filled up seams or cracks in the hulls with pitch, and covered them with pitch and wax, after the manner of the instruction given to Noah regarding the Ark. Thou shalt set pitch it within and without with pitch" (Gen 6 14).

(c) As regards cargo, it is to be noted that "the person of men: that is, slaves, formed an article of merchandise in which Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, countries to the N., traded with Tyre.

Of general references to shipping and seafaring life there is an exemplary few in the OT. In his great series of Nature-pictures in 3. General Ps 104, the Psalmist finds a place for References the sea and ships (ps 25 ff), and in Ps 107 there is a picture of the storm overtaking them that go down to the sea in ships, and of the deliverance that comes to them when God "bringeth them into their desired haven" (vs 23 ff). In the Book of Prov the ideal woman who brings her food from far is like "the merchant ships" (31 14). In the same book the drunkard, because of his unnatural insensibility to danger, is likened to a man "that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast" (33 34); and among the inscrutable things of the world the writer includes "the way of a ship in the midst of the sea" (30 19). In Wisd, human life is described "as a ship passing through the billowy water, whereof, when it is gone by, there is no trace to be found, neither pathway of its keel in the billows" (5 10). The same book notes it as a striking example of the case of a divine and benevolent Providence that "men intrust their lives to a little piece of wood, and passing through the surge on a raft are brought safe to land" (14 1-5). The Jews like the Egyptians and the Assyrians had a natural shrinking from the sea, and the Ecclesiastical interprets their feeling when he says: "They that sail on the sea tell of the danger thereof; and when we hear it with our ears, we marvel" (43 24).

III. Ships in the NT—It is the fishing-boats of the Sea of Galilee which exclusively occupy attention in the Gospels. In the time of Our Lord's ministry in Galilee the shores of the Sea were densely peopled, and there must have been many boats engaged in the fish-catching industry. Bethsaida at the northern end of the Lake and Tiberias at the southern end were great centers of the trade. The boats were probably of a size and build similar to the few employed on the Lake today, which are between 20 and 30 ft. in length and 7 ft. in breadth. The word "launch," of putting a boat or a ship into the sea, has disappeared from RV, except in Lk 8 22, where it is more appropriate to an inland lake. They were propelled by oars, but no doubt also made use of the sail when the wind was favorable (Lk 8 22), though the pictures which we have in the Gospels are mostly of the boatmen toiling in rowing in the teeth of a gale (Mk 6 48), and struggling with the threatening waves (Mt 14 24). In the boat on which Jesus and the disciples were crossing the Lake after the feeding of the 5,000, Jesus was in the stern "asleep on the cushion" (Mk 4 38, AV "a pillow"; Gr proskephalaion, "headrest"). More than once Jesus made special use of a boat. As He was by the seashore a great concourse of people from all parts made it desirable that "a small boat" (ploiarion) should be in attendance off the shore to receive Him in case of need, though He does not seem to have required it (Mk 3 9).

On another occasion, when the crowds were still greater, He went into a boat and sat "in the sea with the multitude on the sloping beach before Him (Mk 4 1; Lk 5 3). This boat is said in St. Luke's narrative to have been Simon's, and it seems from reference to it as "the boat" on other occasions to have been generally at the disposal of Jesus.

It is St. Paul's voyages which yield us the knowledge that we possess from Bib. sources of ships in NT times. They are recorded for us in the Acts by St. Luke, who, as Sir Ramsay puts it, had the true Apostles' Gr feeling for the sea (St. Paul the Traveller, 21). In St. Luke's writings there are many nautical terms, peculiar to him, used with great exactitude and precision.

When St. Paul was a prisoner in Rome and was proceeding to Rome in charge of Julius, the centurion, along with other prisoners, a ship of Adramytium, a coastering vessel, carried the party from Caesarea along the Syrian coast, northward of Cypria, past Cilicia and Pamphylia, to Myra of Lycia. There the centurion found a ship of Alexandria sailing for Italy, one of the great corn fleet carrying grain from Egypt for the multitudes of Rome. (After the capture of Jesus the emperor Titus returned to Italy in such a vessel, touching at Rhugium and landing at Puteoli.) The size of the vessel is indicated by the fact that there were 276 persons on board, crew and passengers all told (Acts 27 37). St. Luke has made no note of the name of this or of the previous vessels in which St. Paul had voyaged. Of the presumably larger vessel, also an Alexandrian corn ship bound for Rome, which had wintered in Melita, and which afterward took on board the shipwrecked party (Acts 28:11), "the sign" (παράσημον, parásemmon) is given, and she is called "The Twin Brothers." This expression shows that it was in painting or relief; a figurehead, with the Twin Brothers represented, would be given by ἐκταμαξιν, ektamaxin. The cargo (φορτίον, phortion, Acts 27:10, AV and RV "lading") in this case was wheat (27:28), but another word is used, γόες, γόμης, by St. Luke of a ship's load of wheat (Acts 21:3; cf. Rev 18:11 ff.). Of those engaged in handling the ship we find (ver 11) the master (κυβερνήτης, kubernētēs), the owner (καλλικῶν, kallikōn, although this expression seems not quite consistent with the ownership of a ship, in its legal sense, by a local service, and Ramsay's distinction between the words, making the former "sailing-master" and the latter "captain," may be better), the sailors (ver 30, who treacherously sought to lower the ship's boat on the pretence of laying out anchors from the "foreship" or prow, and to get away from the doomed vessel.

Of operations belonging to the navigation of the vessel in the storm there were (1) the taking on board of the ship's boat and securing it with ropes (ver 16, in which operation St. Luke seems to have taken part; cf ver 32), (2) the undergirding of the ship (ver 17, using helps, that is taking masts and rigging and everything else that may be of help, and adopting the expediency, only resorted to in extremities, of passing cables under the keel of the ship to keep the hull together, and to preserve the timbers from starting), (3) the lowering of the gear (ver 17, reducing sail, taking down the mainsail and the main yard), (4) throwing freight, overboard and later casting out the tackle of the ship (ver 19), (5) taking soundings (ver 28), (6) letting go four anchors from the stern (ver 29, stern-anchoring being very unusual, but a necessity in the circumstances), (7) further lightening the ship by throwing the wheat into the sea (ver 28), (8) cutting the anchor cables, unlashing the rudders, hoisting up the foresail to the wind, and holding straight for the beach (ver 40).

The parts of the ship's equipment there are mentioned as "the sounding lead" (βούλι, and, though it is the vb. which is here used), "the anchors" (ἀλάνεσσα, ἀλάνεια, of which every ship carried several, and which at successive periods have been made of stone, iron, lead and perhaps other metals, each having two flukes and being held by a cable or a chain), "the rudders" (ππᾶδλα, pīdalia, of which every ship had two or steering, which in this case had been lifted out of the water and secured by "bands" to the side of the ship and unlashed when the critical moment came), "the foresail" (στρογγυλέως, στρογγυλή, not the mainsail, but the small sail at the bow of the vessel which at the right moment was hoisted to the wind to run her ashore), and "the boat" (πάροδος, skēphē, which had been in tow in the wake of the vessel, according to custom still prevalent in those coasting-vessels being sometimes blemished, when the crew cut into the small boat and take the ship in tow, using the oars to get her round a promontory or into a position more favorable for the wind). The season for navigation in those seas in ancient times was from April to October. During the winter the vessels were laid up, or remained in the shelter of some suitable haven. The reason for this was not simply the tempestuous character of the weather, but the obscuration of the heavens which prevented observations being taken for the steering of the ship (Acts 27:20).

In 2 Cor 11:25 St. Paul mentions among sufferings he had endured for Christ's sake that thrice he had suffered shipwreck, and that he had been "a night and a day in the deep," implying that he had been in danger of his life clinging to a spar, or borne upon ver Projected constructed raft. It may be a reminiscence of the sea when St. Paul in the very earliest of his Epp. (1 Thess 4:16), speaking of the coming of the Lord, says "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout! (ἐκκολοκοῦν, on kolokoun), and with a great voice, to the sign" (ναύκλειον, kaleusai, giving the time to the rowers on board a ship. Although ἡμετέρα, hypēdēris, was "an underrover" and ἄρημος, ἄρσης, "the crew of a ship," as contrasted with κυβερνήτης, kubernētēs, "the sailing-master," the derived meaning of "servant" or "officer" has lost in the NT all trace of its origin (Mt 5:25; Lk 1:2 and many passages; of σῶλον, σῶλον, and σῶλον, σῶλον, where the idea of "furling" or "shifting a sail" is entirely lost: 1 Cor 7:29; 2 Cor 8:20).

Figurative: In He the hope of the gospel is figured as "an anchor, sure and steadfast, entering into that which is within the veil" (6:19, esp. with Ebrard's note in Oxford, ad loc.), St. James, showing the one thing that adds to the ships, large though they be, and driven by fierce winds, turned about by a very small "rudder," ἀντωτριδα, πίσθινον, as "the small steersman will" (Isa 3:4). In Rev there is a representation of the fall of Babylon in the image reminiscence of 27), in which lamentations arise from the merchants of the earth who can no more buy her varied merchandise (τον γόα, τὸν γόμη, "cargo" RV) and shipmasters and passengers and seafaring people look in terror and shout upon the smoke of her burning (Rev 18:12-16).

LITERATURE. — The usual books on Gr and Rom antiquities furnish descriptions and illustrations. Works on the monuments like Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, 1853; Maspero, Ancient Egypt and Assyria; Ball, Light from the East, and Reissner, Cairo Museum Catalogue, "Models of Ships and Boats," 1913, contain descriptions and figured representations which are instructive. On shipping and navigation in classical antiquity Smith of Jordanhill, Voyages and Shipwreck of St. Paul, is still the standard authority.

SHISHAK, shish'ak (Σίσιχα, shishā [1 K 14:25]; Σουσσακιφ, Sussakhe): Sheshonk or Sheshonq I, who is called on the stele of the 1. Shishak, founder of the XXIId Dynasty, was 963-930 BC in all probability of Libyan origin. It is possible that his claim to the throne was that of the sword, but it is more likely that he acquired it by marriage with a princess of the dynasty preceding. On the death of Pasekhkhanu II, the last of the kings of the XXIst Dynasty, 932 BC, Shishak ascended the throne, with an efficient army and a well-filled treasury at his command. He was a warlike prince and cherished dreams of Asiatic dominion.

He had not long been seated on the throne when Jeroboam the son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, whom Solomon had promoted but who had been left far behind had escaped from the displeasure of his sovereign to the court of Shishak (1 K 11:26 ff.). There Jeroboam remained till the death of Solomon, when he returned to Canaan, and, on Rehoboam's returning an unsatisfactory answer to the people's demands for relief from their burdens, headed the revolt of the Ten Tribes, over whom he was chosen king with his capital at Shechem (1 K 12:25 ff.). Whether there was not in the XXIst Dynasty some kind of suzerainty of Egypt over Pal, when Solomon married Pharaoh's daughter and received with her Gezer as a dowry, seems not to be clearly established.

It is, however, natural that Jeroboam's patron in the day of adversity should take sides with him against Rehoboam, now that the kingdom was divided. Active support of Jeroboam would be in the line of his dreams of an eastern empire.

So it came to pass that in the 5th year of Rehoboam, Shishak came up against Judah with 1,200 chariots, and 60,000 horsemen, and people without number out of Egypt, the Libyans, Sukkites, and Ethiopians, and took the fenced cities of Judah, and came to Jerusalem. At the preaching of the prophet

4. Shishak's Record at Karnak

Figure of the God Amon Holding Captive the Cities of Judah for Shishak. One of the Heads of the Cities, Jud-ha-malek (Jehud of the King, Josh 19:45). Which is the Third behind the Knee of the God Amon.

Shemaiah, Rehoboam and his people repented, and Jerus was saved from destruction, though not from plunder nor from servitude, for he became Shishak's servant. (2 Ch 12:8). Shishak took away the treasures of the house of the Lord and the treasures of the king's house, carrying off among the most precious of the spoils all the shields of gold which Solomon had made (1 K 14:25 ff; 2 Ch 12:3–9). From the narrative it does not appear that there was any occupation of Pal by the Egypt forces on this occasion.

There is, however, a remarkable contemporary record of the campaign engraved on the south wall of the Temple of Amon at Karnak by Shishak himself. Not only is the expedition recorded, but there is a list of districts and towns of Pal granted to his victories engraved there. A number of tovets mentioned in the Book of Josh have been identified, and among the names of the list are Rahabah, Taanach, Gibeon, Mahanaim, Beth-horon and other towns both of Israel and Judah. That names of places in the Northern Kingdom are mentioned in the list does not imply that Shishak had directed his armies against Jeroboam and plundered his territories. It was the custom in antiquity for a victorious monarch to include among conquered cities any place that paid tribute or was under suspicion, whether captured in war or not; and it was sufficient reason for Shishak to include these Israelite places that Jeroboam, as seems probable, had invited him to come to his aid. Among the names in the list was "Jud-ha-malek"—Yahmalak on the monuments—which was at first believed to reflect the king of Judah with a fictitious name which passed for Rehoboam. Being, however, a place-name, it is now recognized to be the town Yehudah, belonging to the tribe of Judah. On the death of Shishak, his successor assumed a nominal suzerainty over the land of Canaan.

SHITTIM, shî'tîm (תַּשְׁתִּים), ha-shittim, "the acacias"; סַתֵּרְיָה, Sattê; (1) This marked the last camping-ground of Israel before they crossed the Jordan to begin the conquest of Western Pal. Here it was that the people fell into the snare set for them by the satanic counsel of Balaam, who thus brought upon them greater evil than all his prohibited curses could have done (Nu 25:1 ff; 31:16). In Nu 33:49 it is called Abel-shittim. It was from Shittim that Joshua sent the spies to view out the land and Jericho (Josh 2:1); and from this point the host moved forward to the river (3:1). The place is mentioned by Micah in a passage of some difficulty (6:5); after "what Balaam the son of Bun answered," perhaps, some such phrase as "remember what I did" has fallen out. This would then be a reference to the display of Divine power in arresting the flight of Jordan until the host had safely crossed. Those places the camp "near Jordan where the city Abila now stands, a place full of palm trees" (Ant, IV, viii. 1). Onom says Shittim was near to Mt. Peor (Fogor). It may possibly be identical with Kherbet el-Refrain, about 6 miles S. of the Jordan, on the lip of Wady Seubdan, where there are many acacias. (2) In Joel 3:18 we read of the valley of Shittim which is to be watered by a fountain coming forth of the house of the Lord. It must therefore be sought on the W. of the Jordan. The waters from the Jerus district are carried to the Dead Sea down the Wady which continues the Brook Kidron: Wady en-Náár. The acacia is found plentifully in the lower reaches of this valley, which may possibly be intended by the prophet.

SHOE, shō, SHOE-LATCHET, shōo'lach-et (שֹׁעֶל, nā'al, lit. "that which is fastened," with derivative vb. לָשֵׁט, "to provide with shoes") [2 Ch 28 15; Ezk 16 10]; ὑπόδημα, hupó démā [Sir 46 19; Mt 3 11, etc.], from the vb. ὑπήδησεν, hupódēsen [Mt 6 9; Eph 6 15], "to bind under," σαμαδύω, samadýō, "sandals" [Jth 10 4; 16 9; Mk 6 9; Acts 12 8]; AV, RVm also have "shoe" for נָעָל, minâ'él, "bar" [as RV text] in Dt 33 25; the "latchet" is either נָעָל, nā'al, "twisted thing" [Gen 14 23; Isa 5 27], or יִֽדְּס, yīdâs, "leather thong" [Mt 1 7; Lk 3 16; Jn 1 27]; The nā'el was a simple piece of leather tied on the foot with the strâkh, so easy of construction that its low cost was proverbial (Am 2 6; 8 6; Sir 46 19; cf. Gen 14 23), and to be without it was a sign of extreme poverty (2 Ch 28 13; Isa 20 2). Women, however, might have ornamental sandals (Cant 7 1; Jth 16 9), and Ezekiel names "sealskin" (16 10) as a particularly luxurious material, but the omission of sandals from the list of Isa 3 18–25 shows that they were not customarily made articles of great expense. The hupódēma was likewise properly a sandal, but the word was also used to denote a shoe that covered the foot. The contrast between hupódēma in Mt 10 10 and sandalion in Mk 6 9 seems to show that this meaning is not unknown in the NT, the "shoe" being regarded as an article of luxury (cf Lk 15 22). But in Mt 3 11 and 1's, only the sandal can be meant.

Sandals were not worn indoors, so that putting them on was a sign of readiness for activity (Ex 12 11; Acts 12 8; Eph 6 15), the more wealthy having them brought (Mt 3 11) and fastened (Mk 1 7 and [']s) by slaves. When one entered a house they were removed; all the more, naturally, on entering the sanctuary (Ex 3 5; Josh 15 15; 19 33). Mourners, however, did not wear them even out of doors, as a sign of grief (Ezk 24 17, 23), perhaps for the same reason that other duties of the toilet were neglected (2 S 12 20, etc.). A single long journey was often without a pair of sandals (2 S 19 5, 18), and the preservation of the "latchet of their shoes" from being broken (Isa 5 27) would require almost miraculous help.

Ruth 4 7ff states as a "custom in former times in Israel," that when any bargain was closed, "a man drew off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbor." This was of course simply a special form of earnest-money, used in all transactions. In Dt 25 9ff the custom appears in a different light. If a man refused to perform his duty to his deceased brother's wife, the priest of the city were to remove his shoe and disgrace him publicly. "And his name shall be called in Israel, the house of him that hath his shoe loosed." The removal of the shoe is apparently connected with the rite in Ruth 4 7 as a remanement of the man's privilege. But the general custom seems to have become obsolete, for the removal of the shoe is now a reproach.

The meaning of Ps 89 8 108 9, "Upon [m "unto"] Edom will I cast my shoe," is uncertain. נָעָל, "shoe," may mean either "upon" or "unto." If the former, some (otherwise unsubstantiated) custom of asserting ownership of the shoes of another may be meant. If the latter, the meaning is "Edom I will treat as a slave," to whom the shoes are cast on entering a house.

SHOHAM, shō'ham (םיהם, shōhum, "onyx"); B, 'Iṣorām, Iṣadīm, A, 'Iṣorām, Iṣadīm): One of the sons of Merari (1 Ch 24 27).

SHOMER, shō'mer (םומר, shōmēr): (1) The father of one of the conspirators who killed Joash (2 K 12 21). See SHIMEATH.

(2) One of the sons of Heber the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 32). See SHEMER.

SHOPACH, shō'fak. See Sborah.

SHOPHAN, shō'фан (שופן, shōphān). See APROTH-SHOPHAN.

SHORE, shōr: (1) שָׁר, hoph, always of the Mediterranean, variously transl. "haven," "beach," "shore," "seashore," "coast," "sea coast" (Gen 39 13; Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; Jgs 5 17; Jer 47 7; Ezk 26 15). (2) מָרִים, marīm, lit. "lips," of Arab. مَّرَّ, mar, "lip," of the sand upon the seashore, a figure of multitude (Gen 23 17; Ex 14 30; Josh 11 4; Jgs 7 12; 1 S 13 5; 1 K 4 29); the shore of the Red Sea or Gulf of 'Abab.
by Ezion-geber (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17); the brink of the River Nile (Gen 41 3 17); the edge (AV "brink") of the valley of Arnon (Dt 2 36). (3) koph, koph, lit. "end," "extremity," the uttermost part (AV "shore") of the Salt Sea (Josh 15 2); "end of the earth" (Ps 46 9; cf. Arab. ʾašqā-l-ʿard, "the uttermost parts of the earth." (4) ʾašqāl, ʾašqal, lit. "high," was the ancient name by the sea shore (He 11 12). (5) ayyāyās, ayyāsōl, the beach (AV "shore") of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 13 2 48; Jn 21 4); of the Mediterranean (Acts 21 5; 27 39 40). (6) āṣōn pareshēm tōn Kūriōn, āson parēléghōn tēn Krētēn, double reading, "sailed along Crete, close in shore" (AV "sailed from one port to another") (Acts 27 13). See COAST; HAVEN; SAND. SHORTEN, šōr't:n: The Heb word ʾāšar and the Gr kóllōlōi lit. indicate abbreviation of time or space (Ps 59 45; Prov 10 27; Ezek 43 5); figuratively they point to limitation of power or of suffering (Nuz 11 23; Isa 50 2; 59 1; Mt 24 22; Mk 13 20).

SHOShANNIM EDUTH, šō'-shan-im ʾed'-uth. See Song; Psalms.

SHOULDER, shōld'ér (ʾēḇāḵ, ʾēḇḵēm, ʾēḇḵ, kāthēp, ʾēḇk, ʾēḇḵō, ʾēḇḵōr, ʾēḇḵōl, ʾēḇḵōlā, ʾēḇḵōlāh; ʾēḇḵōs, ʾēḇḵōs, ʾēḇḵōsaph, ʾēḇḵōsaphā; brachion, Sir 7 31 only): The meanings of the Heb words are rather varied. The first (ʾēḇḵēm) has perhaps the widest application and is used for the part of the body on which heavy loads are carried (Gen 21 14; 24 15 45; Ex 12 34; Josh 4 5; Jgs 9 48). King Saul's impressive personalitv is thus described: "There was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people" (1 S 9 2; 10 23). To carry loads on the shoulder or to have "a staff on the shoulder" is expressive of subjection and servitude, yea, of oppression and cruel punishment, and the removal of such burdens or of the rod of the oppressor connotes delivery and freedom (Isa 9 4; 14 25).

Figuratively: The shoulders also bear responsibility and power. Thus it is said of King Messiah, "The government shall be upon his shoulders" (Isa 9 6) and "the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; and he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open" (22 22). Job declares that he will refute all accusations of unlawful conduct made against him, in the words: "Oh that I had the indictment which mine adversary hath written! Surely I would carry it upon my shoulder." (Job 31 35 f.).

The Heb word kāthēp comes very close in meaning to the above, though it is occasionally used in the sense of arm- and shoulder-piece of a garment. Like the Heb ʾēḇḵēm, it is used to describe the part of the body accustomed to carry loads. On it the Levites carried the implements of the sanctuary (Nu 7 9; 1 Ch 15 15; 2 Ch 35 3). Oriental mothers and fathers carried their children on the shoulder astride (Isa 49 22; cf. 60 4); thus also the Heb speaker in the psalm of personal lament (Ezk 12 19). The loaded shoulder is likely to be "worn" or chafed under the burden (29 18). In the two passages of the NT in which we find the Gr equivalent of shoulder (ōmos, fairly common in Apoc.), it corresponds most closely with this use (Mt 28 4; Lk 15 5). Of the shoulders of animals the word ʾēḇḵēm is used in Ezek 34 21 (of sheep, where, however, men are intended) and in Isa 30 6 (of asses).

Stubborn opposition and unwillingness is expressed by "withdrew the shoulder" (Neh 9 29), or "pulled away the shoulder" (Zech 7 11), where the meaning of the word is "the gage or "turned up a stubborn shoulder." Contrast "how the shoulder," i.e. "submit" (Bar 2 21). Of "stiffnecked"; see NECK. Somewhat difficult for the understanding of Occidentals is the poetical passage in the blessing of Ephraim (Gen 49 19), "Benjamin shall dwell in safety by him; he covereth him all the day long, and he dwelleth between his shoulders" (Dt 33 12). The "shoulders" refer here to the mountain saddles and proclivities of the territory of Benjamin between which Jerus, the beloved of Jeh, which belonged to Judah, lay nestling close upon the confines of the neighboring tribe, or even built in part on ground belonging to Benjamin.

Much less frequently than the above-mentioned words, we find zōōṯ, zōōṭ, which is used of the "balled shoulder of the ram" which was a wave offering at the consecration of a Nazirite (Nu 6 19) and of one of the priestly portions of the sacrifice (Dt 15 21). In Sir 7 31 this portion is called brachion, properly "arm," but both AV and RV translate "shoulder." The sheep and heave offerings see SACRIFICE. AV frequently translates Heb ḥēḵāh, lit. "leg," "shin" (q. v.) by "shoulder," which RV occasionally retains (e.g. Ezk 42 16; Nu 6 20).

SHOULDER-BLADE, shōld'èr-blad (ʾēḇḵōšēph, shōkēnāh): Then let my shoulder (kāthēp) fall from the shoulder-blade (shōkēnāh), and mine arm (zōōṯ) be broken from the bone (kānēḵ)" (Job 31 22). The Heb word is the fem. of šēkēm (see SHOULDER). It is found only in this passage.

SHOULDER-PIECE, shōld'èr-pēs (ʾēḇḵōsōp, kāthēp): The word designates the two straps or pieces of cloth which passed from the back of the ephod (see EPHOD) of the high priest over the shoulder and were fastened at the front. These shoulder-pieces seem to have been made of a precious texture of linen (or byssos) with threads of gold, blue, purple and scarlet, to which two onyx (or beryl) stones were attached bearing the names of six tribes of Israel each. These are called the "stones of memorial" (Ex 39 18). These shoulder-pieces were fastened the plated or waved bands ("wreathed chains") from which, by means of two golden rings, the breastplate was suspended. It is by no means clear from the descriptions (Ex 28 7 12 35; 39 4 18 20) how we are to imagine the form and attachment of these shoulder-pieces. It has been thought that the ephod might be of Egypt origin, which is not very probable, though V. Anessi, Annales de philosophie chrétienne, 1872, 45 ff, reproduces some representations from the great work of Lepsius, Denkmäler, where costly royal garments have two shoulder straps, like the ephod. Usually Egypt garments have no shoulder strap, or at most one.

SHOVEL, šùv̄l: (1) ʾēḇḵōṯ, raboth, is a wooden shovel used on the threshing floor for winnowing the grain (Isa 30 24). (2) ʾōḇōṯ, ʾōḇāth, is used in various passages to indicate some instrument employed to carry away ashes from the altar (Ex 27 3; 38 3; Nu 14; 1 K 7 40 42; 2 K 26 14; 2 Ch 4 11 16; Jer 62 18). It was very likely a small shovel of those used in connection with modern fireplaces for cleaning away the ashes of (Heb ʾēḇāth, "to sweep away") or for carrying live coals to start a new fire. (3) ʾēḇḵōṯāh, yāḏēhāth (Dt 13 16 RVm). JAMES A. PATCH SHOWER, shō'âr. (1) שְׁפֵר, 'ĕshî'hām, a pl. form apparently denoting gentle rain, usually used figuratively, as in Dt 32 2; Ps 72 6; Mic 5 7. (2) שפּר, geshem, used of gentle rain in Job 37 6: “shower of rain,” AV “small rain”; used of the flood in Gen 7 12. Figuratively, of blessing, “showers of blessing” (Exk 34 20); of destruction: “There shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger, and great hailstones in wrath to consume it” (Ezk 13 13). (3) שפור, zerem, usually storm or tempest (cf Isa 4 6; 28 2): “They are wet with the showers of the mountain” (Job 24 8). (4) שפּופ, ṭabros (Lk 12 54). Rain is unknown in Pal in the long summer of 5 or 6 months. A few showers usually fall in September, succeeded by fine weather for some weeks before the beginning of the heavy and long-continued winter rains.

SHRINE, shrin (va'd, mado). In Acts 19 24 small models of temples for Diana.

SHROUD, shroud (תָּשׁוֹר, hōres, “bough”): Winding-sheets for the dead. See BURIAL. Used in AV, ERV Exk 31 3 in the rare old sense of “shelter,” “covering.” ARV has “a forest-like shade” (תָּשׁוֹר, hōres, “wood,” “wooded height”) (Isa 17 9, etc). Cf Milton, Comus, 147.

SHRUB, shrub (תָּשׁוֹר, nîr) [Gen 21 15]. See BUSH, (2).

SHUA, SHUAH, shō'â: (1) (תָּשׁוֹר, šhîrā, “prosperity”): A Canaanite whose daughter Judah took to wife (Gen 38 2.12; 1 Ch 2 3; see BATH-shua). (2) (תָּשׁוֹר, šhîrâ, “prosperity”): Daughter of Heber, an Asherite (1 Ch 7 32). (3) (תָּשׁוֹר, šhîrâ, “depression”): A son of Keturah by Abraham (Gen 25 2; 1 Ch 1 32), and his posterity. See BILDAD. (4) A brother of Caleb (1 Ch 4 11). See SHUHAL.

SHUAL, shō'âl (תָּשׁוֹר, šhādāl): An Asherite (1 Ch 7 36).

SHUAL, LAND OF (תָּשׁוֹר, תָּשׁוֹר, אֶרֶץ שׁוֹדָל; ה שְּמָוָל, hē Sōgāl): From their encampment at Michmash the Philistines sent out marauding bands, one going westward toward Beth-horon, another eastward, “the way of the border that looketh down upon the valley of Zeboim.” The pass to the S. was held against them by Israel. The third party therefore went northward, turning “unto the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual” (1 S 13 17 f). Ophrah is probably identical with et-Tamieh, a village which lies some 5 miles E. of Bešîtn (Bethel). It is in this district therefore that the land of Shual must be sought, but no definite identification is possible. W. EWING

SHUBABAEL, shōbôhâl, shōbôhâl (תָּשׁוֹר, shābahâlēl): (1) A Levite, son of Anram (1 Ch 24 20); one of the leaders of song in the temple (1 Ch 25 20). See SHEBEUEL; Men, H.P.N., 130. (2) A son of Hemam (1 Ch 26 4). See SHEBEUEL.

SHUHAH, shōbôhâ (תָּשׁוֹר, shābah, “depression”): A brother of Caleb (1 Ch 4 11).

SHUHAM, shōbôham (תָּשׁוֹר, šabôhàm): Son of Dan, ancestor of the Shubamites (Nu 26 42 f). In Gen 46 23 called “Hushim.”

SHUHITE, shōhoht (תָּשׁוֹר, šhôhât): Cognomen of Bildad, one of Job’s friends (Job 2 11; 8 1, 18 1; 25 1; 42 9). The place referred to cannot be definitely located. See BILDAD; SHUH.

SHULAMMITE, shō'ôlâh-îm (תָּשׁוֹר, Shulamîth): One of the families of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2 53).

SHUNEM, shō'ônêm (תָּשׁוֹר, šhûnîn; B, Ṣ̄ôvăv, Ṣônâ, A, Šôvâvâ, Šûnânîs): Applied to natives of Shunem. (1) Abishag, who was brought to minister to the aged king David, love for whom led Adonijah to his doom (1 K 3 13; 2 17, etc). (2) The woman, name unknown, whose son Elisha raised from the dead (2 K 12, etc). Later when apparently she had become a widow, after seven years’ absence on account of famine, in the land of the Philis, she returned to find her property in the hands of others. Elisha’s intervention secured its restoration (8 1–6).

(3) The Shuhamite (Cant 6 13). In this name there is the exchange of l for n which is common. W. EWING

SHUNEM, shō'ônêm (תָּשׁוֹר, šhûnîn; B, Ṣ̄ôvăv, Šûnâdân, A, Šôvâvâ, Šûnâdôn): A town in the territory of Issachar named with Jezreel and Chisloth (Josh 19 18). Before the battle of Gilboa the Philis pitched their camp here. They and the army of Saul, stationed on Gilboa, were in full view of each other (1 S 28 4). It was the scene of the touching story recorded in 2 K 4 8–37, in which the prophet Elisha raises to life the son of his Shunamite benefactress. Onom describes it as a village called Sulem, 5 Rom miles S. of Mt. Tabor. This points to the modern Sālam, a village surrounded by cactus hedges and orchards on the lower southwestern slope of Jebel ed-Duby ("Hill of Moreh"). It commands an uninterrupted view across the plain of Esdraelon to Mt. Carmel, which is about 15 miles distant. It also looks into the valley of Jezreel to the slopes of Gilboa on the S. It therefore meets satisfactorily the conditions of Josh and 1 S. A question has, however, been raised as to its identity with the Shunem of 2 K 4. Elisha’s home was in Samaria. Apparently Carmel was one of his favorite haunts. If he passed Shunem “continually” (ver 9), going to and coming from the mountain, it involved a very long detour if this were the village visited. It would seem more natural to identify the Shunem of Elisha with the Samim of Onom, which is said to be in the territory of Sebaste (Samaria), in the region of Akraibatta; or perhaps with Sâlem, usually a mile N. of Taanach, as nearer the line of travel between Samaria and Carmel.

There is, however, nothing to show that Elisha’s visits to Shunem were paid on his journeys between Samaria and Carmel. It may have been his custom to visit certain cities on circuit, on business calling for his personal attention, e.g. in connection with the “schools of the prophets.” The materials do not exist on which any certain conclusion can rest. Both Sālam and Sâlem are on the edge of the splendid grain fields of Esdraelon (2 K 4 18). W. EWING

SHUNI, šo[b]nî, SHUNITES, šo[b]nîts (šuN, ša努î): One of the sons of Gad and his descendants (Gen 46 16; Nu 26 15).

SHUPHAM, šo[b]'am, SHUPHAMITES, šo[b]'-fam-îts. See SHEEPUPHAM.

SHUPPM, shup'ım (šuP, shuppm): (1) One of the descendants of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 12 15). (2) One of the porters in the temple (1 Ch 26 16). See MUPPM; SHEEPUPHAM.

SHUR, shûr, šâbîr (šwîr, šâr; Šisô, Šorî): The name of a desert E. of the Gulf of Suez. The word means a "wall," and may probably refer to the mountain wall of the Tib plateau as visible from the shore plains. In Gen 16 7 Hagar at Kadesh (Ain Kadsî) (see ver 14) is said to have been "in the way to Shur." Abraham also lived "between Kadad and Shur" (Gen 20 1). The position of Shur is defined (Gen 25 18) as being "opposite Egypt on the road from Beer-sheba to Asman." After crossing the Red Sea (Ex 15 4) the Hebrews entered the desert of Shur (ver 22), which extended southward a distance of three days' journey. It is again noticed (1 S 15 7) as being opposite Egypt, and (2 S 6) as near Egypt. The term thus no doubt covers a large area on the E. of the Red Sea, and the S. of the Bitter Lakes.

Brusenge, however, proposed to regard Shur ("the wall") as equivalent to the Egyptian ḥaša ("wall"), the name of a fortification of some kind apparently near Asman (2 S 6), probably near the entrance to Egypt on the road from Pelusium to Zan. The extent of this "wall" is unknown, but Brusenge connects it with the wall mentioned by Diodorus Siculus (14) who wrote about 8 BC, and who attributed it to Seleucus I who defended "the E. coast of Egypt against the incursions of the Syrians and Arabians, by a wall drawn from Pelusium through the deserts as far as to Heliopolis, for a space of 1,500 furlongs." Heliopolis lies 90 miles (not 185) S.W. of Pelusium: this wall, if it existed at all, would have run on the edge of the desert which extends N. of the Nile. The wall which Diodorus speaks of as being built by Alexander the Great, but this then on the borders of Goshen, is evidently much too far W. to have any connection with the desert of Shur E. of the Gulf of Suez. See Budge, Hist. Egypt, 90; Brusenge, Egypt under the Pharaohs, abridged edition, 320.

SHUSHAN, šo[b]šan (šwšan, Sůshûn; Šiswâr, Šušân, Šora, Šušân): This city, the Šuš or Šaban of the Babylonians, and the native 1. Position, (Elamite) Šabûn, is the modern Shushter Erytology and ETYMOLOGY (Sus) in Southwestern Persia, a series and forms of ruin-mounds on the banks of the of its Name river Karkhe. The ancient etymology gives ("city of lilies" or "of horses") are probably worthless, as an etymology in the language of the place would rather be expected. Sayce therefore connects the name with ṣâšin, meaning "forerunner," and pointing to some such meeting place. It is frequently mentioned in the BAB inscriptions of the 3rd millennium BC, and is expressed by the characters for the goddess Ishtar and for "oeder," implying that it was regarded as the place of the "divine grove" (see S, below). In later days, the Assyrians substituted for the second character, that having the value of (Š), possibly indicating its pronunciation. Radu (Early BAB History, 235) identifies Shushan (Susa) with the Šâša of the Bab king Kudur-nahar (11th cent. BC, if the first of the name), who dedicates to the Bab goddess Ninlil an inscription of a certain Sushan, who had, at an earlier date, dedicated it to Ishtar for the life of the Bab king Dungi (c 2500 BC).

The surface still covered with ruins is about 2,000 hectares (2,940 acres), though this is but a fraction compared with the ancient extent of the city, which is estimated to have been between 12,000 and 15,000 hectares (29,640-37,000 acres). Though considerable, the extent of Susa was small compared with Nineveh and Babylon. 2. The Ruins The ruins are divided by the French explorers into four tracts: (1) The Apadana-mound (W.), the Archaemenian period (5th cent. BC), c 1,476 by 820 ft., dominating the plain (height c 124 ft.). (2) The Royal City on the E. of the Citadel, composed of two parts: the Apadana (N.E.), and a nearly triangular tract extending to the E. and the S. This contains the remains of the palaces of Darius and his successors, and occupies rather more than 123 acres. The palace proper and the throne-room were separated from the rest of the official buildings. (3) The City, occupied by artisans, merchants, &c. (4) The district on the right bank, similarly inhabited. This area extended into all the lower plain, between the Shour and the Karkhe. Besides these, there were many isolated ruins, and the suburbs contained a number of villages and separate constructions.

Most of the constructions at Susa are of the Persian period. In the northern part of the Royal City, the palace of Apadana, the only great monument of which remains were found on the level. (1) The principal portion of the hall of columns, known as the throne-room or Apadana, with inscriptions of Darius and his successors on the walls. The Apadana was destroyed by fire in the time of Artaxerxes II.

3. The "Royal Citadel." and the Ruins

Shushan, built by Darius, is a massive palace of which a few later structures were erected. The name is probably derived from the Sabean name Shushah, which was adopted as a place-name, and came to mean the "city of the sun," or "sun rising." The palace was probably built by Susa, and extended to the S., and the E. The palace began to be an important center in the Persian period. The Achaemenian palace of Susa was destroyed by fire in the time of Artaxerxes II, and was thereafter rebuilt by Xerxes. The palace was later destroyed by fire, and the site was subsequently occupied by small towers and fortifications, which continued to be inhabited until the time of Alexander the Great.

The number of important antiquities found on the site is considerable. Among the finds may be mentioned the triumphal stele of Naram-Sin, king of Agade (3d-4th millennium BC); the statues of the Bab king Dungi (c 2600 BC); the inscriptions of the Elamite king Be(?)-Sa-Shinak (c 2400 BC); the obelisk inscribed with the laws of Hammurabi of Babylon; the bronze bas-relief of the Elamite king Shutruk-Nahhunte (c 1120 BC), who carried off from Babylon the stela of Naram-Sin and Hammurabi above mentioned, together with numerous other inscriptions and monuments, of which the stele of Adda-hamiti-In-Sushak, of a much later date, together with numerous other objects of art and inscriptions—a most precious archaeological find.

Shushan passed through many serious crises, one of the severest being its capture and destruction by the armies of the Assyrian king Assur-bani-apli about 640 BC. According to Assur-bani-apli's account, the ziqqurat or temple-tower of Susa was built of enameled bricks inlaid with lapis-lazuli, and was adorned with pinnacles of bright bronze. The god of the city was Shusnakh, who dwelt in a secret place, and none ever saw the form of his divinity. Lagalamu (Laomer) and five other of the city's deities were adored by kings, and their images, with those of 12 more (worshipped by the people), were carved off as spoil to Assyria. Winged bulls and genii adorned Susa's temples, and figures of wild bulls protected the entrances to the shrines. Other noteworthy things were the sacred groves into which no stranger might enter, and the burial-places of the Elamite kings. After recovering from the blow inflicted by the Assyrians, Shushan ultimately regained its old importance, and, as the summer residence of the Pers kings, became... the home of Abasurus and Queen Esther (Neh 1:1; Est 1:25; 2: 3; 13:9; 11ff; Dan 8:2; Ad Est 11:3).

SICK, sik, SICKNESS, sik’nes (ם"שק), bālāh [Gen 48:1, etc; ד”שת, ḥǎhšt [Dt 28:61, etc; מ"שך, ṭāḥad’a [Dt 29:21, etc; מ"שקה, nāḥālah [Ex 23:25, etc; מ"שקר, ḏāzech [Lev 16:33, etc; מ"שץ, ṭāmash [2 S 12:15, etc; מ"שעט, asthenē [Mt 10:8, etc; cf 2 Macc 9:22], מ"שעוק, kōlos ḥōn [Lev 7:2], מ"שעון, ḥōn’nas, ḥōn’nas [Lev 21:14, etc; מ"שעטמה, orkhēstēna [Sir 10:10, etc; with various cognates, ק”ש, ק”מ, ק”מ], ק”נך, ק”נך [Jas 5:15]; Lat morbus [2 Esd 8:31]). Compared with the number of deaths recorded in the historical books of the Bible the instances in which diseases are mentioned are few. “Sick” and “sickness” (including “disease,” etc) are the tr of 6 Heb and 9 Gr words and occur 56 t in the OT and 57 t in the NT. The number of references in the latter is significant as showing how much the healing of the sick was characteristic of the Lord’s ministry. The diseases specified are varied. Of infantile sickness there is an instance in Bath-sheba’s child (2 S 12:15), whose disease is termed ṭānash, not improbably trismus nascantum, a common condition in Palestinian infants. In Paul there are recorded the unspecified sickness of Abijah (1 K 14:1), of the widow’s son at Zarephath (1 K 17:17), the sunstroke of the Shunammite’s son (2 K 4:19), the epileptic boy (Mt 17:15), Jairus’ daughter (Mt 9:18), and the young man’s son (Jn 4:46). At the other extreme of life Jacob’s death was preceded by sickness (Gen 48:1). Sickness resulted from accident (Ahasiah, 2 K 2:2), wounds (Joram, 2 K 8:29), from the violence of passion (Amnon, 2 S 13:2), or mental emotion (Dol 8:27); see also in this connection Cant 2:5; 5:8. Sickness the result of drunkenness is mentioned (Hos 7:5), and as a consequence of famine (Jer 14:18) or violence (Mic 6:13). דוקח or periodic sickness is referred to (Lev 15:15, 20:18), and an extreme case is that of Lk 8:43.

In some examples the nature of the disease is specified, as Asa’s disease in his feet (1 K 15:23), for which he sought the aid of physicians in vain (2 Ch 15:12). Hezekiah and Job suffered from sore boils, but were delivered from these by God’s healing hand (2 Ch 29:21), as did Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc 9:5). Probably the sudden and fatal disease of Herod was similar, as in both cases there is reference to the presence of worms (cf Acts 19:23 and 2 Macc 9:9). The disease of Publius’ father was also dysentery (Acts 28:8). Other diseases specified are paralysis (Mt 8:6; 9:2), and fever (Mt 8:14). Not improbably the sudden illness of the young Egyptian at Ziklag (1 S 30:11), and the illness of Ben-hadad which weakened him so that he could not resist the violence of Hazael, were also the common Pal fever (2 K 8:15) of whose symptoms and effects there is a graphic description in Ps 38. Unspecified fatal illnesses were those of Elisha (2 K 13:14), Lazarus (Jn 11:1), Tabitha (Acts 9:37). In the language of the Bible, leprosy is spoken of as a defilement to be cleansed, rather than as a disease to be cured.

The proverb concerning the sick quoted by the Lord at Capernaum (Mk 2:17) has come down to us in several forms in apocryphal and rabbinical writings (Babda Kalama ed 26:13; Šanhedar 176), but is nowhere so terse as in the form in which He expresses it. The Lord performed His healing of the sick to demonstrate His word or to utter one of the most emphatic charges which He gave to His disciples when sending them out was to heal the sick. One of the methods used by them, the anointing with oil, is mentioned in Mk 6:13 and enjoined by James (5:15). In later times the anointing which was at first used as a remedial agent became a ceremonial in preparation for death, one of the seven sacraments of the Rom church (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae suppl. ad P. iii. 29).

The duty of visiting the sick is referred to in Ezk 34:4.16, and by the Lord in the description of the Judgment scene (Mt 25:36.43). It is incorporated in some of the rabbinical tracts. “He that visits the sick lengthens his life, he who refrains shortens it,” says Rabbi Ishanan in Nāḥārim 29.

In Shulhan Arukh, Yoreh De‘arah there is a chapter devoted to this duty, which is regarded as incumbent on the Jew, even though the sick person be a Gentile (Gil’ena 61a). The church’s duty to the sick, so long neglected, has now been recognized in the mission field, and has proved, in heathen lands, to be the most important of all pioneer agressive methods.

While we find that the apostles freely exercised their gifts of healing, it is noteworthy that we read of the sickness of two of St. Paul's companions, Epaphroditus (Phil 2 26) and Trophimus (2 Tim 4 20), for whose recovery he seems to have used no other means than prayer. See also Disease.

SICKLE, sik'le (σικέλη, ἵρμντις [Dt 16 9; 23 25], ῥοζόβα, magäll), c.f Arab. m'injil [Jer 50 16; Joel 3 13]; ἤπερανοῦ, ἰδρέανον [Mk 4 29; Rev 14 14–19]). Although the ancients pulled much of their grain by hand, we know that they also used sickles. The form of this instrument varied, as is evidenced by the Egyptian sculptures. The earliest sickle was probably of wood, shaped like the modern scythe, although much smaller, with the cutting edge made of sharp flints set into the wood. Sickle-bits were found at Tel el-Hesi. Crescent-shaped iron sickles were found in the same mound. In Pal and Syria the sickle varies in size. It is usually made wholly of iron or steel and shaped much like the instrument used in western lands. The smaller-sized sickles are used both for pruning and for reaping.

SICYON, sish'-ion (Σικυών, Σικύων, Σικύων, Σικύων, Σικύων), (Σικύων, Σικύων): Mentioned in 1 Mac 16 2 23 in the list of countries and cities to which Lucas the Roman envoy, probably Lucius Junius Bocchus Lucianus (Burnouf LXX 130 BC) wrote, asking them to be friendly to the Jews. The Jewish dispersion had already taken place, and Jews were living in most of the seaports and cities of Asia Minor, Greece and Egypt (cfr Sib C 14 2 and Plato).

Sicyon was situated 18 miles W. of Corinth on the south side of the Gulf of Corinth. Its antiquity and ancient importance are seen by its coins still extant, dating from the 5th cent. Though not as important as Corinth in its sea trade, the burning of that city in 143 BC, and the favor shown to Sicyon by the Hellenistic authorities in adding to its territory and assigning to it the direction of the Isthmian games, increased its wealth and influence for a time.

SIDDIM, sid'Im, VALE OF (σιδώμ, σίδωμ, 'emek ha-siddim; LXX ἡ φάραγγι [or κολάδα] ἡ ἄνω, ἢ φάραγγι [κολάδα] ἡ ἐλαφότειν): The place mentioned in Gen 14 3–8 as being the scene of encounter between Chedorlamen and his allies with the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim and Zoar. In verse 3 it is identified with the Salt Sea, and in verse 10 it is said to have been full of slime pits ("bitumen").

According to the traditional view, the Vale of Siddim was at the southern end of the Dead Sea. But in recent years a number of eminent authorities have maintained that it was at the northern end of the Dead Sea, in the vicinity of Jericho. Their argument has mainly been based on incidental references in the scene (Gen 13 1–13) describing the parting of Lot and Abram, and again in the account of Moses' vision from Pisgah (Dt 34 3).

In the account of Abram and Lot, it is said that from Bethel towards the Plain of the Delta of the Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before Jeh destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah. The word here is "plain" means "circle," and well describes the view which one has of the plain about Jericho as Bethel as he looks down the valley past Achor. But it seems to go beyond the text to assume that the Vale of Siddim was within that circle of the 4th cent. In Gen 14 3:10 it says that Lot dwelt "in the cities of the Plain, and moved his tent as far as Sodom." In the vision of Moses, likewise, we have a very general and condensed description in which it is said that he was shown "the Plain of the valley of Jehoshaphat, upon trees, unto Sodom." And, as we learn from Gen 19 22, was not far from the Vale of Siddim. It is true that from the traditional site of Pisgah on the Arabian side, the apparent limits do not extend to the Dead Sea; but we are by no means sure that the traditional site of Pisgah was the correct one, or that the limits of this language should be restricted to the points which are actually within range of vision.

The tendency at the present time is to return to the traditional view that the Vale of Siddim was at the south end of the Dead Sea. This is supported by the fact that Jebel Uдум, the salt mountain at the southwest corner of the Dead Sea, still bears the name of Sodom, Uдум being simply another form of the word Uдум. Still stronger argument, however, is drawn from the general topographical and geological conditions. In the first place, Zoar, to which Lot is said to have fled, was not far away. The most natural site for it is near the mouth of the Wady Kerak, which comes down from Meab into the southern end of the Dead Sea. The city was ever afterward spoken of as a Moabite city, which would not have been the case if it had been at the north end of the sea. It is notable in Josh 13 15–21, where the cities given to Reuben are enumerated, that, though the slopes of Pisgah are mentioned, Zoar is not mentioned.

In Gen 14, where the battle between Amraphel and his allies with Sodom and the other cities of the plain is described, the south end of the Dead Sea comes in logically in the progress of their campaign, and special mention is made of the sites of the salt or bitumen pits which occurred in the valley, and evidently played an important part in the outcome of the battle.

At the south end of the Dead Sea there is an extensive circular plain which is better supplied with water for irrigation than is the region about Jericho, and which, on the supposition of slight geological changes, may have been extremely fertile in ancient times; while there are many indications of such fertility in the ruins that have been described by travelers about the mouth of the Kerak and other localities nearby. The description, therefore, of the fertility of the region in the Vale of Siddim may well have applied to this region at the time of Lot's entrance into it.

There are very persistent traditions that great topographical changes took place around the south end of the Dead Sea in connection with the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, while the opinion has been universally prevalent among the earlier historical writers that the site of Sodom and Gomorrah is beneath the waters of the Dead Sea.

Geological investigations, so far from disproving these traditions, render them altogether possible and credible. There is a remarkable contrast between the two ends of the Dead Sea, and the Dead Sea and of the south end. Near the north end the depth descends to 1,300 ft., whereas for many miles out from the south end it is very shallow, so that at low water a ford exists, and is occasionally used, from the north end of the salt mountain across to el-Lisân.

The precipitous salt cliffs of Jebel Uдум which border the southwest corner of the Dead Sea would indicate that, in comparatively recent times, there had been abrupt subsidence of a good many feet in the bottom of the Dead Sea and at the foot of the cliffs. Such subsidences of limited areas and in connection with earthquakes are by no means uncommon. In 1819 an area of 2,000 sq. miles about the delta of the Indus river sank beneath the level of the sea, so that the tops of the houses were barely seen above the water. A smaller area in the delta of the Scléma River sank during the last century beneath the waters of Lake Baikal. Professor R. H. Tarr of Cornell University has recently described the effects produced by earthquakes in the northern part of Alaska, in which there was a change of level of 47 ft.

More probably (see ARABAH; DEAD SEA) there has been a rise in the waters of the Dead Sea since Abraham's time, caused by the encroachment upon the original alluvial floor. Out of this rise have been pushed into the main part of the depression by the Jordan, and various smaller streams descending from the highlands on either side. In consequence of these encroachments, the equilibrium between precipitation and evaporation could be maintained only by a rise in the water causing it to spread over the shallow shelf at the south end, thus covering a large part of the bay of Sidon with the shoal water now found between el-Lisân and Jebel Ḫuslum.

SIDE, sîdā (Σίδη, Sîdî): An ancient town of Pamphylia, occupying a triangular promontory on the coast. It was one of the towns to which a letter favorable to the Jews was sent by the Roman consul Lucius (1 Mac 16:23). The town seems to have been of considerable antiquity, for it had existed long before it fell into the possession of Alexander the Great, and for a time it was the metropolis of Pamphylia. Off the coast the fleet of Antiochus was defeated by the Rhodians. During the 1st cent. Side was noted as one of the chief ports of pirates who disposed of much of their booty there. The ruins of the city, which are now very extensive, bear the name Eski-Adâh, but among them there are no occupied houses. The two harbors protected by a sea wall may still be traced, but they are now filled with sand. The wall on the land side of the city was provided with a gate which was protected with round towers; the walls themselves are in ruins. Within the wall the most important of the remains are three theaters leading from the city gate to the harbors. Without the walls, the street leading to the city gate is lined with sarcophagi, and among the shabbiness of the neighboring fields are traces of many buildings and of an aqueduct.

SIDES, sîdz (Σῆδης, yarḥāhāh, "thigh," "flank"): RV substitutes "innermost parts" for AV "sides" in Jon 1:5; cf 1 S 24:2.

SIDON, sîdon (Σίδων, cîdhôn): The eldest son of Canaan (Gen 10:15).

SIDON, sîdon (Σίδων, Sîdôn; ΣΔων, Sîdon; AV Sidon and Zidon; RV SIDEON only): One of the oldest Phoen cities, situated on a narrow plain between the range of Lebanon and the sea, in lat. 33°34', nearly. The plain is well watered and fertile, and the surface of the city is elevated about 390 ft. above the sea, and was built on a small elevation formed from a little N. S. of Sarepta to the Bestrenus (Nahr et-Âlûy). The ancient city was situated near the northern end of the plain, surrounded with a strong wall. It possessed two harbors, the northern one about 500 yds. long by 200 wide, well protected by little islets and a breakwater, and a southern about 600 by 400 yds., surrounded on three sides by land, but open to the W., and thus exposed in bad weather. The date of the founding of the city is unknown, but we find it mentioned in the Am Tal in 14, and in Gen 10:19 it is the chief city of the Canaanites, and Joshua (Josh 11:8) calls it Great S. It led all the Phoen cities in its early development of maritime affairs, its sailors being the first to launch out into the open sea out of sight of land and to sail by night, guiding themselves by the stars. They were the first to come into contact with the Greeks and we find the mention of them several times in Homer, while other Phoen towns are not noticed. S. became early distinguished for its manufacture of the skill of its artisans, such as beautiful metal-work in silver and bronze and textile fabrics embroidered and dyed with the famous purple dye which became known as Tyrian, but which was earlier produced at S. Notices of these choice articles are found in Homer, both in the Iliad and the Odyssey. S. had a monarchical form of government, as did all the Phoen towns, but it also held a sort of hegemony over those to the S. as far as the limit of Phocinia. It likewise made use of the Nile valley with the shoal water now found between el-Lisân and Jebel Ḫuslum.

2. Historical

(1) The independence of S. was lost when the kings of the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties of Egypt added Pal and Syria to their dominions (1580-1205 BC). The kings of S. were allowed to remain on the throne as long as they paid tribute, and perhaps still exercised authority over the towns that had before been subject to them. When the power of Egypt declined under Amenhotep IV (1375-1358), the king of S. seems to have thrown off the yoke, as appears from the Am Tal. Ribaddi of Gebal writes to the king of Egypt that Zimri, king of S., had joined the enemy, but Zimrida himself claims, in the letters he wrote, to be loyal, declaring that the town belonging to him had been taken by them. In 147, the king of S. (Isaiah 21:19), with the other towns, eventually became independent of Egypt, and she retained the hegemony of the southern towns and perhaps added Dor, claimed by the Philis, to her dominion. This may have been the reason for the war that took place about the middle of the 12th cent. BC, in which the Philis took and plundered S., whose inhabitants fled to Tyre and gave the latter a great impetus. S., however, recovered from the disaster and became powerful again. The Book of Jgs claims that Israel was an inland colony by S. (10:12), but it is probable S. stands here for Phoenicia in general, as being the chief town.

(2) S. submitted to the Assyrian kings as did the Phoen cities generally, but revolted against Senacherib and again under Esar-haddon. The latter destroyed a large part of the city and carried off most of the inhabitants, replacing them by captives from Babylon and Elam, and renamed it Ir-Esar-haddon ("City of Esar-haddon"). The settlers readily mingled with the Phoenixians, and S. flourished again when Assyria fell, was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar at the time of his siege of Jerus and Tyre, and was taken, having lost about half of its inhabitants by plague. The fall of Babylon gave another short period of independence, extending to 196, but S. was subdued by Persia and fell into the hands of Darius, 50,000 horse, which so frightened Tabnit that he betrayed the city to save his own life. But the citizens, leaving the stronghold, first burned their fleet and then their houses, perishing with their wives and children rather than fall into the hands of Ochus, who butchered all whom he seized, Tabnit among them. It is said that 40,000 perished in the flames. A list of the kings of S. in the Persian period has been recovered from the inscriptions and the coins, but the dates of their reigns are not accurately known. The dynasty of the known kings begins with Esnunazar I, followed by Tabnit I, Amastoreth; Esnunazar II, Sennacherib, and Tabnit II (Tennes) and Strato II. Inscriptions from the time of Esnunazar recently discovered give name of a Boldastart and a son Yatonnellik, but whether the first is one of the Stratos above mentioned or a third is uncertain; also whether the son ever reigned or not. As Boldastart calls himself the grandson of Esnun-azar, he is probably Strato I who reigned about 374-363 BC, and hence his grandfather, Esmonazar I, must have reigned in 400 BC or earlier. Strato II was on the throne when Alexander took possession of Phoenicia and made no resistance to him, and even aided him in the siege of Tyre, which shows that S.

had recovered after the terrible disaster it suffered in the time of Ochus. It perhaps looked upon the advance of Alexander with content as its avenger. The devastation of Tyre increased the importance of S., and after the death of Alexander it became attached to the kingdom of the Ptolemies and remained so until the victory of Antiochus III over Scopas (198 BC), when it passed to the Seleucids and from them to the Romans, who granted it a degree of autonomy with native magistrates and a council, and it was allowed to coin money in bronze.

S. comes into view several times in the NT; first when Christ passed into the borders of Tyre and S. and healed the daughter of the Syro-

It was noted for its school of philosophy under Augustus and Tiberius, its inhabitants being largely Greek; and when Berystus was destroyed by an earthquake in 551, its great law school was removed to S. It was not of great importance during the Crusades, being far surpassed by Acre, and in modern times it is a small town of some 15,000.

LITERATURE

In early Heb history, siege operations are not described and can have been little known. Although the Hebrews had acquired a certain degree of military discipline in the wilderness, when they entered Canaan they had no experience of the operations of a siege and were without the engines of war necessary for the purpose. Jericho, with its strongly fortified wall, was indeed formally invested—it "was straitly shut up because of the children of Israel: none went out, and none came in" (Josh 6:1)—but it fell into their hands without a siege. Other cities seem to have yielded after pitched battles, or to have been taken by assault. Many of the Canaanite fortresses, like Gezer (2 S 5:25; Josh 10:10), Taanaah and Megiddo (Jgs 1:27), remained unreduced. Jerus was captured by the men of Judah (Jgs 1:8), but the fort of Jebus remained unconquered till the time of David (2 S 5:6).

In the days of the monarchy more is heard of siege operations. At the siege of Rabbath-Ammon Joab seems to have deprived the city of its water-supply and rendered it untenable (2 S 11:1; 12:27). At Abel of Beth-maconah siege operations are described in which Joab distinguished himself (2 S 20:15). David and Solomon, and, after the disruption of the kingdom, Rehoboam and Jeroboam built fortresses which for long became the scene of siege operations. The war between Judah and Israel in the days of Nadab, Baasha, and Elah was, for the most part, a war of sieges. It was while besieging Gibbethon that Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, was slain by Baasha (1 K 15:27), and, 27 years after, while they were still investing the same place, the soldiery chose their commander Omri to be king over Israel (1 K 16:16). From the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Assyrians, and the Chaldaeans, with whom they came into relations in later times as allies or enemies, the people of the Southern and of the Northern Kingdoms learned much regarding the art, both of attack and of defence of fortified places.

It was an instruction of the Deuteronomistic Law that before a city was invested for long siege, it should be summoned to capitulate.

If the offer of peace be to Siege declined, then the siege is to be proceeded with, and if the city be captured, all the male population is to be put to death, and the women and children reserved as a prey for the captors. To this humane reservation the cities of the Canaanites were to be an exception: their inhabitants were to be wholly exterminated (Dt 20:16-18).

The same law prescribed that there should be no unnecessary destruction of fruit trees in the prosecution of a long siege: trees not yielding fruit for human subsistence might be cut down: "And thou shalt build bulwarks [ma\-go\r, "siegeworks"] against the city that maketh war with thee, until it fall" (Dt 20:19,20). This instruction to have regard to the fruit trees around a hostile city seems to have been more honored in the breach than in the observance, even in Israel. When the allied kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom were invading Moab and had instruction to "spoil every fortified city," the prophet Elisha bade them also "fell every good tree, and stop all fountains of water, and mar every good piece of bread with stones" (2 K 3:19,20). When the assault of Jerus by the Chaldaeans was imminent, Jeh commanded his captains, standing down outside the city, in traditional Arabian warfare, we are told, the destruction of the enemy's palm groves was a favorite exploit (Robertson Smith, OTIFS, 369), and the Assyrians when they captured a city had no compunction in destroying its plantations (Inscription of Shalmaneser II on Black Obelisk).

From passages in the Predilect, upon which much light has been thrown by the ancient monuments of Assyria and Chaldaea, we gain a very

4. Siege clear idea of the siege works directed Operations: against a city by Assyrian or Chaldaean Attack invaders. The siege of Laodice (2 K 8:20; Isa 36:1; Jer 34:14; Isa 37:6) is the subject of a series of magnificent reliefs from the mound of Koyunjik (Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, II, plates 20, 21, 22). The downfall of Nineveh as predicted in Nahumi's prophecy lets us see the siege operations proceeding with striking realism (see Der Untergang Niniveh by A. Jeremias and Colonel Billerbeck). Nowhere, however, are the incidents of a siege—the gathering of hostile forces, the slaughter of peaceful inhabitants, the cutting off of water supplies, the laying and raising of siege works, the setting of engines of war against the walls, the demolition of the towers, the breach in the principal wall, the rush of men and the clatter of horses' hoofs through the streets, the slaughter, the piling, the desolation of houses—all—repeatedly and faithfully recorded than by Ezekiel when predicting the capture of Tyre by Nebuchadrezzar (Ezk 26 7–12). The siege of Tyre lasted 13 years, and Ezekiel tells how every head was made bald and every shoulder bent by the hard service of the besiegers (Ezk 29 18). There were various ways in which an invading army might deal with a fortified city so as to secure its possession. Terms might be offered to secure a capitulation (1 K 20 1 f; 2 K 18 14 f). An attempt might be made to reduce the city by starvation (2 K 6 24 f; 2 K 17 5 f). The city might be invested and captured by assault and storm, as Lachish was by Sennacherib (2 K 18 13; 19 S; see Layard, op cit., II, plates 20–24). The chief operations of the besiegers were as follows: (1) There was the "invest," or the setting of siege works by the besieging army. It was sometimes necessary to establish a fortified camp, like that of Sennacherib at Lachish to guard against sorties by the defenders. Of the siege of Jerus we read that Nebuchadrezzar came, "he and all his army, the tents of his, and all the camp against it" (Jer 52 4; cf 2 K 25 1). From the commencement of the siege, slingers and archers were posted where they could keep the defenders engaged; and it is to this that reference is made when Jeremiah says, "When the archers against Babylon, all them that bend the bow; encamp against her round about; let none thereof escape" (Jer 50 29).

(2) There was next the drawing of a line of circumvallation (dāyēl) with eachched forts round about the walls. These forts were towers manned by archers, or they were used as stations from which to discharge missiles (Jer 62 4; Ezek 17 17). In this connection the word "munitio" in AV and ERV (mānôt) disappears in ARV and is replaced by "fortress."

(3) Following upon this was the mound (gōdēl), or earthworks, built up to the height of the walls, so as to command the streets of the city, and strike terror into the besieged. The mound was covered with earth, and the besiegers were able to batter the upper and weaker part of the city wall (2 S 20 15; Isa 37 33; Jer 6 6; Ezek 4 2; Dan 11 15; Lam 4 18). If, however, the town, or fortress, was built upon an eminence, an inclined plane reaching to the height of the eminence might be formed of earth or stones, or trees, and the besiegers would be able to bring their engines to the foot of the walls. This road was even covered with bricks, forming a kind of paved way, up which the ponderous machines could be drawn with difficulty. To such roads there are references in Scripture (Job 19 12; Isa 29 3, "siege works"); of Layard, Niniveh and Its Remains, II, 366 f). In the case of Tyre this mound, or way of approach, was a dam thrown across the narrow strait to obtain access to the walls (Ezk 26 6). It was often, too, there was a trench, sometimes filled with water, at the foot of the wall, which had to be dealt with previous to an assault.

(4) The earthworks having been thrown up, and approaches to the walls secured, it was possible if set and to work the battering-rams (kārim) which were employed in breaching the walls (Ezk 4 2), or in bursting open the gates (Ezk 21 22). The battering-rams were of different kinds. On metal forming its head, they can hardly fail to make an impression, and gradually, by the constantly repeated shocks, a breach is opened and the besiegers are able to rush in and bear down the defenders. It is to the shelter furnished by these towers that the prophet Nahum refers (2 5) when he says, "The mantelet is prepared," and that Isaiah points when he declares that the king of Assyria "shall not come unto this city, nor shoot an arrow there, neither shall he come before it with shield [māğlēn], nor cast up a mound against it" (Isa 37 33). Ezekiel has the same figure when, describing the siege of Tyre by Nebuchadrezzar, he declares that he shall "cast up a mound" against her, and "raise up the buckler," the buckler (gīvād) being like the Rom testudo, or roof of shields, under cover of which the besiegers carried on operations (Exk 26 8; Colonel Billerbeck [op. cit., 178] is doubtful whether this device was known to the Assyrians). Under the shelter of their moveable towers the besiegers could push forward mines, an operation known as part of siegecraft from a high antiquity (see 2 S 20 15, where ARV and ERV give "undermined" as an alternative to "battered"; tunneling was well known in antiquity, as the Sibon tunnel shows).

(5) The culminating operation would be the storming of the walls, the rushing of the breach. Scaling-ladders were employed to cross the encircling trench or ditch (Prov 21 22); and Joel in his powerful description of the army of locusts which had devastated the land says that they "climb the wall like men of war" (Joel 2 7). Attempts were made to set fire to the gates and to break them open with axes (Jgs 9 7; 2 3; Ezek 26 9). Jeremiah tells of the breach that was made in the city when Jerus was captured (Jer 39 2). The breaches in the wall of Samaria are referred to by Amos (4 3), who pictures the women rushing forth headlong like a herd of kine with hooks and fishhooks in their nostrils.

While the besiegers employed this variety of means of attack, the besieged were equally ingenious and active in maintaining the defence.

5. Siege

All sorts of obstructions were placed in the way of the besieging army.

Defence

Springs and cisterns likely to afford supplies of water to the invaders were carefully covered up, or drained off into the city. Where possible, trenches were filled with water to make them impassable. As the siege-works of the enemy approached the main wall, it was usual to build inner fortifications, and for this purpose houses were pulled down to provide the needed space and also to supply building materials (Isa 22:10). Slingers placed upon the walls hurled stones upon the advancing enemy, and archers from loopholes and protected battlements discharged arrows against the warriors in their movable towers. Sorties were made to damage the siege-works of the enemy and to prevent the battering-rams from being placed in position. To counteract the assaults of the battering-rams, sacks of chalk were let down like a ship's fender in front of the place where the engine operated—a contrivance countered again by poles with reeds upon which they cut off the sacks (Jos, BJ, III, vii, 20). So, too, the defenders, by dropping a doubled chain or rope from the battlements, caught the ram and broke the force of its blows. Attempts were made to destroy the ram also by fire. In the great bas-relief of the siege of Lachish an inhabitant is seen hurling a lighted torch from the wall; and it was a common device to pour boiling water or oil from the wall upon the assailants. Missiles, too, were thrown with deadly effect from the battlements by the defenders, and it was by a piece of a millstone thrown by a woman that Abimelech met his death at Thebez (Jgs 9:53). While Uzziah of Judah furnished his soldiers with shields and spears and helmets and coats of mail and bows and slingers, he also ‘made in Jerusalem engines, invented by skillful men, to be on the towers and upon the battlements, wherewith to shoot arrows and great stones’ (2 Ch 26:15). The Jews had, for the defense of Jerusalem against the army of Titus, engines which they had taken from the Twelfth Legion at Beth-horon which seem to have had a range of 1,200 ft. Many ingenious devices are described by Jos as employed by himself when conducting the defence of Jotapata in Galilee against Vespasian and the forces of Rome (BJ, III, vii).

When Nahash king of the Ammonites laid siege to Jabesh-gilead in the opening days of the reign of Saul, the terms of peace offered to 6. Raising the inhabitants were so humiliating of the Siege and cruel that they sought a respite of seven days and appealed to Saul in their distress. When the newly chosen king heard of their desperate condition he assembled a great army, scattered the Ammonites, and raised the siege of Jabesh-gilead, thus earning the lasting gratitude of the inhabitants (1 S 11; cf I S 31:12, 13). When Zelekiah of Judah found himself besieged in Jerusalem by the Chaldean army under Nebuzaradan, he sent intelligence to Pharaoh Hophra who crossed the frontier with his army to attack the Chaldeans and obliged them to desist from the siege. The Chaldeans withdrew for the moment from the walls of Jerusalem and offered battle to Pharaoh Hophra and his host, but the courage of the Egyptian king failed him and he retired in haste without encountering the Chaldeans in a pitched battle. The siege was prosecuted to the bitter end, and Jesus was captured and completely overthrown (2 K 25:1; Jer 37:3-10; Ezek 17:17). In the ancient law of Israel ‘siege’ is classed with drought and pestilence and exile as punishments with which Jehovah would visit his people.

7. Horrors of Siege and Capture. Of the horrors there described they were reduced that they cooked and ate their own children (2 K 6:28). In the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, which ended in the overthrow of the city and the destruction of the Temple, the sufferings of the inhabitants from hunger and disease were incredible (2 K 25:2; Jer 32:24; Lam 2:20; 4:8–10). The horrors of siege have, perhaps, reached their climax in the account given by Jos of the tragedy of Masada. To escape capture by the Romans, ten men were chosen by lot from among the occupants of the fortress, 960 in number, including combatants and non-combatants, men, women and children, to slay the rest. From these ten one was similarly chosen to slay the survivors, and he, having accomplished his awful task, ran his sword into his own body (Jos, BJ, VII, ix, 1). While all the inhabitants of a city under siege suffered the famine of bread and the thirst for water, the combatants ran the risk of impalement and other forms of torture to which prisoners in Assyria and Chaldaea and Rome were subjected.

The horrors attending the siege of a city were only surmounted by the barbarities perpetrated at its capture. The emptying of a city by its capture is likened to the hurling of a stone from a sling (Jer 10:17,18). Deportation of the whole of the inhabitants often followed (2 K 17:6; 24:14). Not only were the inhabitants of the captured city deported, but their gods were carried off with them and the idols broken in pieces. This is predicted or recorded of Babylon (Isa 21:9; 46:1; Jer 50:2), of Egypt (Jer 43:12), of Samaria (Hos 10:6). Indiscriminate slaughter followed the entrance of the assailants, and the city was usually given over to the flames (Jer 39:8,9; Lam 4:18). “Cities without number,” says Shalmaneser II in one of his inscriptions, “I wrecked, razed, burned with fire.” Houses were destroyed and women dishonored (Zec 14:2). When Darius took Babylon, he impaled three thousand prisoners (Herod. III,159). The Scythians scalped and flayed their enemies and used their skins for horse trappings (ib, iv,64). The Assyrian sculptures show prisoners subjected to horrible tortures, or carried away into slavery. The captured Zeleskiah had his eyes put out after he had seen his own sons cruelly put to death (2 K 25:7). It is only employing the imagery familiar to Assyrian warfare when Isaiah represents Jeh as saying (14:23): "Therefore will I put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest" (Isa 37:29). Anticipating the savage barbarities that would follow the capture of Samaria by the Assyrians, Hosea foresees the infants being dashed to pieces and the women with child being ripped open (Hosea 14:3; 15:18). The prophet Nahum predicting the overthrow of Nineveh recalls how at the capture of Nine-oman (Egyp Thebes) by the Assy conqueror, Ashurbanipal, "her young children also were dashed in pieces at the head of all the streets; and they cast lots for her honorable men, and all her great men were bound in chains" (Nah 3:10).

The only explicit reference to siege operations in the NT is Our Lord's prediction of the complete destruction of Jerusalem when He wept over its coming doom: "... for the days shall come on thee, when thine enemies shall cast up a bank [...], and thy children within thee; and they shall dash thee to the ground, and thy children with thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another" (Lk 19:44). The order and particulars of the siege are in accordance with the accounts of siege operations in the OT. How completely the prediction was fulfilled we see from Jl 2:10; Zech 1:10.

8. Siege in the NT.

Figurative: In St. Paul's Ep. there are figures taken from siege operations. In 2 Cor 10:4 we have "the casting down of strongholds," where the Gr word καινάρως, καθαρίσεως, from καθαρισμός, καθαταρήσως, is the regular word used in LXX in for the reduction of a fortress (Prov 21:22; Lam 2:2; 1 Mac 5:65). In Eph 6:16 there is allusion to siege-works, for the subtle temptations of Satan are set forth as the flaming darts hurled by the besiegers of a fortress which the Christian soldier is to quench with the shield of faith.

SIGLOS, siglos (σιγλος, sigozos): A Pera silver coin, twenty of which went to the gold Daric (q.v.).

SIGN, σῦν, "a sign," "mark," γραμμή, "wonder"; σημάδιον, σημεῖον, "a sign," "signal," "mark": A mark by which persons or things are distinguished and made known. In Scripture used generally of an address to the senses to attest the existence of supersensible and therefore Divine power. Thus the plagues of Egypt were "signs" of Divine displeasure against the Egyptians (Ex 4:8 ff; Josh 24:17, and often); and the miracles of Jesus were "signs" to attest His unique relationship with God (Mt 12:38; Jn 2:18; Acts 2:22). Naturally, therefore, both in the OT and the NT, "signs" are assimilated to the miraculous, and prevalently associated with immediate Divine interference. The popular belief in this kind of communication between the visible and the invisible worlds has always been, and is now, widespread. So-called "natural" explanations, however ingenious or cogent, fail with the great majority of people to explain anything. Wesley and Spurgeon were as firm believers in the validity of such methods of intercourse between man and God as were Moses and Gideon, Peter and John.

The faith that walks by signs is not by any means to be lightly esteemed. It has been allied with the highest nobility of character and with the most signal achievement. Moses accepted the leadership of his people in response to a succession of signs: e.g. the burning bush, the rod which became a serpent, the leprous hand, etc (Ex 3 and 4); so, too, did Gideon, who was not above making proof of God in the sign of the fleece of wool (Jgs 6:36-40). In the training of the Twelve, Jesus did not disdain the use of signs (Lk 5:11-11, and often); and the visions by which Peter and Paul were led to the evangelization of the Gentiles were interpreted by them as signs of the Divine purpose (Acts 10 and 16).

The sacramental use of the sign dates from the earliest period, and the character of the sign is as diverse as the occasion. The rainbow furnishes radiant suggestion of God's overarching love and assurance that the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy the earth (Gen 9:13; cf. 4:15); the Feast of Unleavened Bread is a reminder of God's care in bringing His people out of bondage (Ex 13:3); the Sabbath is an oft-recurring proclamation of God's gracious thought for the wellbeing of man (Ex 31:13; Ezek 20:12); the brazen serpent, an early foreshadowing of the cross, perpetuates the imperishable promise of forgiveness and redemption (Nu 21:9); circumcision is made the seal of the special covenant under which Israel became a people set apart (Gen 17:11); baptism, the Christian equivalent of circumcision, becomes the sign and seal of the dedicated life and the mark of those avowedly seeking to share in the blessedness of the Kingdom of God (Lk 3:12-14; Acts 2:41, and often); bread and wine, a symbol of the spiritual manna by which soul and body are preserved unto everlasting life, is the hallowed memorial of the Lord's death until His coming again (Lk 22:14-20; 1 Cor 11:23-28). Most common of all were the local altars and mounds consecrated in simple and sincere fashion to a belief in God's ruling and overruling providence (Josh 4:1-10).

Signs were offered in proof of the Divine commission of prophet (Isa 20:3) and apostle (2 Cor 12:12), and of the Messiah Himself (Jn 20:30; Acts 22); and they were submitted in demonstration of the Divine character of their message (2 K 20:9; Jn 20:31; Acts 22:1). Assurance of the resurrection of the child to be born of a young woman (Isa 7:10-16; of Lk 2:12) is to certify the prophet's pledge of a deliverer for a captive people. See Imm Emanuel.

With increase of faith the necessity for signs will gradually decrease. Jesus hints at this (Jn 4:48), as does also Paul (1 Cor 1:22). Nevertheless "signs," in the sense of displays of miraculous powers, are to accompany the faith of believers (Mk 16:17-18), i.e. in and forthwith characterize the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, and mark the consummation of the ages (Rev 15:1). See also Miracle.

SIHON, sîhon (םִהוֹן, sîhôn): King of the Amorites, who vainly opposed Israel on their journey from Egypt to Pæl, and who is frequently mentioned in the historical books and in the Psalms because of his prominence and as a warning for the Jews against idolatry (Gen. 15:19; Deut. 2:11, 21, and often; Dt 1:4; 31:4; Josh 2:10; Jgs 11.19. 20:21; 1 Kgs 22; Ps 135:11; 136 19; Jer 48 45).

SIHOR, sî'hôr. See Shihor.

SILAS, sî'lás (Σίλας, Silas), probably contraction for Σίλιανος, Silianos; the Heb equivalents suggested are שִׂלָּח, shîlâkh, "Tertius," or Σιλίας, Silias, "asked" [Zahn]). The Silas of Acts is generally identified with the Silvanus of the Epistle. His identification with Titus has also been suggested, based on 2 Cor 1:19; 8:23, but this is very improbable (cf. Knowing, Expositor's Gr. Text, II, 328). Silas, who was probably in fact Silianos [cf. Acts 16:37], accompanied Paul during the greater part of his 2d missionary journey (Acts 15-18). At the meeting of the Christian community under James at Jerusalem, which decided that circumcision should not be obligatory in the case of Gentile converts, Silas and Judas Barabas were appointed along with Paul and Barnabas to convey to the churches in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia the epistle informing them of this decision. As "leading men among the brethren" at Jerusalem, and therefore more officially representative of the Jerusalem church than Paul and Barnabas, Silas and Judas were further commissioned to confirm the contents of the letter by "word of mouth." On arrival at Antioch, the epistle was delivered, and Judas and Silas, "being themselves also prophets, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them." Their mission being thus completed, the four were "dispersed in peace from the brethren unto those that had sent them" (Ry. V), or "unto the assemblies" (ASV, Acts 15 22-26).

Different readings now render the immediate moves of Silas somewhat obscure; ver 33 would imply that he returned to Jerusalem. But some texts proceed in ver 34 (cf. Acts 15 19) and tell of his going to Thessalonica, Thessalonians, and Corinth, where he held a church at Corinth (cf Acts 15:18). On the last journey Silas to Thessalonica is said to be still, and others add "and Judas alone proceeded." One of the principal derivations of the first half is accepted by Ry.

The principal texts however reject the whole verse and are followed in this by Ry. It is held by some that he remained in Antioch till chosen by Paul (ver 40). Others maintain that he returned to Jerusalem where John Mark then was (cf. Acts 15:19); and that either during the interval of "some days" (Acts 15:26), when the events described in Gal 2:1-14 took place (Wend.), he returned to Antioch along with Peter, or that he and John Mark were summoned thither by Paul and Barnabas, subsequent to their decision regarding Mark (cf. Knowing, Expositor's Gr. Text, II, 330, 332-35).

Upon Barnabas' separation from Paul, Silas was chosen by Paul in his place, and the two missionaries, "after being commended by the brethren [at Antioch] to the grace of the Lord," proceeded on their journey (Acts 16:3). They were being through Syria, Cilicia, Galatia, Phrygia and Mysia, where they delivered the decree of the Jerusalem council and strengthened the churches, and were joined by Timothy, they eventually reached Troas (Acts 16:10-15); the indications are given that at this city Luke also became one of their party (cf. also the apocryphal "Acts of St. Paul," where this is definitely stated; Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, 11, 544).

Upon the call of the Macedonians, the missionary band set sail for Greece, and after touching at Samothrace, they landed at Neapolis (Acts 16 9-11). At Philippi, Lydia, a seller of purple, was converted, and with her they made their abode; but the exorcism of an evil spirit from a sorceress brought upon Silas and Paul the enmity of her masters, whose source of gain was being charged before the magistrates with causing a breach of the peace and preaching false doctrine, their garments were rent off them and they were scourged and imprisoned. In no way dismayed, they prayed and sang hymns to God, and an earthquake in the middle of the night secured them a miraculously release. The magistrates, on learning that the two prisoners whom they had so maltreated were Rom citizens, came in person and besought them to depart out of the city (Acts 16 12-39). After a short visit to the house of Lydia, where they held an interview with the brethren, they departed for Thessalonica, leaving Luke behind (cf Knowing, op. cit., 354-51). There they made many converts, esp. among the Greeks, but upon the house of Jason, their host, being attacked by hostile Jews, they were compelled to escape by night to Berea (16:40-41). There they received a better hearing from the Jews, but the enmity of the Thessalonian Jews still pursued them, and Paul was conducted for safety to Athens (cf. Acts 17:15), and Timothy being left behind. On his arrival, he dispatched an urgent message back to Berea for Silas and Timothy to rejoin him at that city (17:11-15). The narrative of Acts implies, however, that Paul had left Athens and had reached Corinth before he was overtaken by his two followers (18:5). Knowing (op. cit., 363-64) suggests that they may have actually met at Athens, and that Timothy was then sent to Thessalonica (cf. 1 Thess 3:12), and Silas to Philippi (cf. Phil 4:15), and that the two came together again at Corinth. The arrival of Silas and Timothy at that city is probably referred to in 2 Cor 11:9. It is implied in Acts 18:18 that Silas did not leave Corinth at the same time as Paul, but no further definite reference is made to him in the narrative of the 2d missionary journey.

Assuming his identity with Silvanus, he is mentioned along with Paul and Timothy in 2 Cor 1:19 as having preached Christ among the Corinthians (cf Acts 18:5, 8). In 1 Thess 3:10 he is not the same send greetings to the church at Thessalonica (cf Acts 17:1-9). In 1 Pet 5:12 he is mentioned as a "faithful brother" and the bearer of that letter to the churches of the Dispersion (cf. Knowing). The epistle, in which assigns He to the authorship of Silas is untenable.

SILENCE, sîl'ens: Five Heb roots, with various derivatives, and two Gr words are thus transliterated. The word is used lit. for dumbness, interrupted speech, as in Lam 2 10; Ps 32 3; Eccl 3 7; Am 5 13; Acts 16 12; 1 Cor 14 28; 1 Tim 2 11.12 AV (ARV "quietness"); Rev 8 1, or figuratively of the unanswered prayers of the believer (Ps 83 1; 30 22; Jer 8 14); of awe in the presence of the Divine majesty (Isa 41 1; Zec 2 13), or of death (1 S 2 9; Ps 94 17; 116 17).

The INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA
Silkworm.
1. Moth. 2. Chrysalis. 3. Cocoon.

Silkworm. The only undoubted reference to silk in the Bible is the passage cited from Rev, where it is mentioned among the merchandise of Babylon. Seroton, "silk," is from Sfr, the Gr name of China, when that silk was first obtained. The equivalent Lat sericum occurs frequently in classical authors, and is found in the Vulg (Est 8 15) for bac, "fine linen." For bac, bassus, and shesh EV has nearly always "fine linen," but for shesh in Prov 31 22, AV has "silk," and in Gen 41 42 and Ex 25 4, AV has "silk" and RV has "cotton." See LINEN; FINE.

There can be little doubt of the correctness of EV "silk" for meshi in Ezk 16 10, "I girded thee about with fine linen [sheth], and covered thee with silk [meshi]," and in the similar passage, Ezk 16 13.

Silk is produced by all Lepidoptera, butterflies and moths, but it is of great economic importance only in the Chinese silkworm, Bombyx mori, whose larva, a yellowish-white caterpillar from 2 to 3 in. long, feeds on the leaves of the mulberry (Morus). A pair of large glands on the two sides of the stomach secrete a viscous fluid, which is conveyed by ducts to an orifice under the mouth. On issuing into the air, the fine stream is hardened into the silk fiber, which the caterpillar spins into a cocoon. Within the cocoon the caterpillar is presently transformed into the chrysalis or pupa. The cocoons from which silk is to be spun are subjected to heat which kills the pupa and prevents them from being transformed into the perfect insects or moths, which would otherwise damage the cocoons as they made their exit.

The raising of silkworms, and the spinning and weaving of silk are now important industries in Syria, though the insect was unknown in Bible times. It was introduced to the Mediterranean region from China centuries after Christ. Coarse silk is produced from the Chinese oak silk-moth, Saturnia perniciosa, and from the Japanese oak silk-moth, Saturnia yama-maki. The domestic moth of Syria and Pal is Saturnia pyri, from which silk has also been spun, but not commercially. See, further, WEAVING.

ALFRED ELY DAY

SILLA, sil'a (םיל, silla); B, Γαλλία, Galld, A, Γαλλαλδά, Gaullald; Jos: was assassinated by his servants "at the house of Millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla" (2 K 12 20). Wherever Beth-millo stood, Silla was evidently in the valley below it; but nothing is known of what it was or where it stood.

SILIOAM, si-l'ō-am, si-lō'am, SILOAH, si-lo'ā, SHELAL, she'lā, SHILAOH, shi-lō'ā: (1) נֵמְשָׁה, nemsha, mā ha-shilāh (shilah or shilôh) is a passive form and means "sent" or "conducted"), "the waters of [the] Shiloh" (Isa 8 6). (2) נֵמִשְׁתָּה, nemšeth, bvekhth ha-shelah, "the pool of [the] Shelah" (AV "Silloah") (Neh 3 15). (3) נֶפֶלְצָה, nefelzah, τοῦ τῶν (or τῶν) Σιλωάν, τῶν κοιλωθηκρίνων τοῦ (his) Siloam, "the pool of Siloam" (Is 9 7). (4) ἐν τῷ Ἐλλωύα, εἰς τὸν Σιλωάν, "the pool in Siloam" (Lk 13 4).

Although the name is chiefly used in the OT and Jos as the name of certain "waters," the surviving name today, Siloan, is that of a fairly prosperous village which extends along the steep east side of the Kidron valley from a little N. of the "Virgin's Fountain" as far as Bvr Eyyâb. The greater part of the village, the older and better built section, belongs to Moslem fellâhin who cultivate the well-watered gardens in the valley and on the hill slopes opposite, but a southern part has recently been built in an extremely primitive manner by Yemeni Jews, immigrants from South Arabia, and still farther S., in the commencement of the Wâdy en Nâr, is the wretched settlement of the lepers. How long the site of Siloan has been occupied it is impossible to say. The village is mentioned in the 10th cent. by the Arab writers, and the numerous rock cuttings, steps, houses, caves, etc., some of which have at times served as chapels, show that the site has been much inhabited in the past, and at one period at least by hermits. The mention of "those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and killed them" (Lk 13 4) certainly suggests that there was a settlement there in NT times, although some writers consider that this may have reference to some tower on the city walls near the Pool of Siloam.

Opposite to the main part of Siloan is the "Virgin's Fount," ancient Gihon (q.v.), whose waters are practically monopolized by the villagers. It is the waters of this spring which are referred to in

2. The Modern Siloam Aqueduct

Siloam Aqueduct. Isa 8 6.0: "Forasmuch as this people have refused the waters of Shiloah that go softly, . . . now therefore, behold, the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the River."

The contrast between the little stream flowing from the Gihon and the great Euphrates is used as a figure of the vast difference between the apparent strength of the little kingdom of Judah and the House of David to the west, and the might of "Rezin and Remaliah's son" and "all his glory." Although it is quite probable that in those days there was an open streamlet in the valley, yet the meaning of Shiloah, "sent" or "conducted," rather implies some kind of artificial channel, and there is also archaeological evidence that some at least of the waters of Gihon were even at that time conducted by a rock-cut aqueduct along the side of the Kidron valley (see Jerusalem, VII, 5). It was not, however, till the days of Hezekiah that the great tunnel aqueduct, Siloam's most famous work, was made (2 K 20:20): "Hezekiah also stopped the upper spring of the waters of Gihon, and brought them straight down on the west side of the City of David" (2 Ch 32:30). They stopped all the fountains, and the brook (nahr) that flowed through the midst of the land, saying, Why should the kings of Assyria come, and find much water? (2 Ch 32:4; Esclus 48:17). Probably the exit of the water at Gihon was entirely covered up and the water flowed through the 1,700 ft. of tunnel and merged in the pool made for it (now known as the Birket Silwan) near the mouth of the Tyropoan valley. This extraordinary winding aqueduct along which the waters of the Virgin's Point still flow is described in Jerusalem, VII, 4 (q.v.).

The lower end of this tunnel which now emerges under a modern arch has long been known as Ain Silwan, the "Fountain of Siloam," and indeed, until the rediscovery of the tunnel connecting this with the Wad, the Kidron is known to some in the 13th cent., but by no means generally known until the last century, it was thought this was simply a spring. So many springs all over Pal issue from artificial tunnels—it is indeed the rule in Judaea—that the mistake gives no hint that he knew of so great a work as this of Hezekiah's, and in the 5th cent. a church was erected, probably by the emperor Eudoxia, at this spot, with the high altar over the sacred spring. The only pilgrim who mentions this is Theodoretus (c. 520) and after its destruction, probably by the Persians in 614, it was entirely lost sight of until excavated by Messrs. Blais and Dickie. It is a church of extraordinary architectural features; the floor of the center aisle is still visible.

The water from the Siloam aqueduct, emerging at Ain Silwan, flows today into a narrow shallow pool, approached by a steep flight of modern steps; from the southern extremity of this pool, a watercourse runs under the modern road by means of an aqueduct, and after traversing a deeply cut rock channel below the scarped cliffs on the north side of el-Wad, it crosses under the modern Kidron and forms a number of channels of irrigation distributed among the gardens of the people of Silwan. The water here, as at its origin, is brackish and impregnated with sewage.

The modern Birket es-Silwan is but a poor survivor of the fine pool which once was here. Bliss showed by his excavations at the site that once there was a great rock-cut pool, 71 ft. N. and S. by 75 ft. E. and W., which may, in part at least, have been the work of Hezekiah (2 K 20:20), approached by a splendid flight of steps along its west side. The pool was surrounded by an arcade 12 ft. wide and 22 ft. high, and was divided by a central arcade, to make in all probability a pool for men and another for women. These buildings were probably Herodian, if not earlier, and therefore this, we may reasonably picture, was the condition of the pool at the time of the incident in Jn 9:7, when Jesus sent the blind man to wash in the pool of Siloam. This pool is also probably the Pool of Shelah described in Neh 3:15 as lying between the Fountain Gate and the King's Garden. It may also be the "king's pool" of Neh 2:14. If we were in any doubt regarding the position of the pool of Siloam, the explicit statement of Jos (Bl, V, iv, 1) that the fountain of Siloam, which he says was a plentiful spring of sweet water, was at the mouth of the Tyropoan would make us sure.

A little below this pool, at the very mouth of el-Wad, is a dry pool, now a vegetable garden, known as Birket el Hamra (the red pool). For many years the sewage of Jerusalem found its way to this spot, but when in 1904 an ancient city sewer was rediscovered (see Jerusalem, VI, 5, 392-394), the sewage was diverted and the dry pool to the W. of it was sold west of it which surrounded it with a wall. Although this is no longer a pool, there is room enough but not a great deal of water in a pool because the great and massive dam which Bliss excavated here (see Jerusalem, VI, 5) had clearly been made originally to support a larger body of water. It is commonly supposed that the original pool here was older than Birket Silwan, having been fed by an aqueduct which was constructed from Gihon along the side of the Kidron valley before Hezekiah's great tunnel. If this is correct (and excavations are needed here to confirm this theory), then this may be the "lower pool" referred to in has 229, the waters of which Hezekiah "stopped," and perhaps, too, that described in the same passage as the "old pool."

The earliest known Heb inscription of any length was accidentally discovered near the lower end of the Siloam aqueduct in 1886, and reported by Dr. Schick. It was cut upon a stone from Siloam a rock-smoothed surface about 27 in. square, some 15 ft. from the mouth of the aqueduct; it was about 3 ft. above the bottom of the channel on the east side. The inscription consisted of six lines of Aramaic, of which the Heb, and has been translated by Professor Sayce as follows:

(1) Behold the excavation. Now this [is] the history of the tunnel: while the excavators were still lifting up
(2) The pick toward each other, and while there were yet three cubits to be broken through. . . .
(3) This passage, for there was an [7] excess in the rock on the west. They rose up . . . . .
(4) Excavation; the excavators struck, each to meet the other, pick to pick. And there flowed
(5) The waters from their outlet to the pool for a thousand, two hundred cubits.
(6) Of a cubit, was the height of the rock over the head of the excavators . . . . .

It is only a roughly scratched inscription of the nature of a graffiti; the flowing nature of the writing is fully explained by Dr. Reisner's recent discovery of cuneiform at Samaria (1905). It is not in ink, but in black ink. It is not an official inscription, and consequently there is no kingly name and no date, but the prevalent view that it was made by the work people who carried out Hezekiah's great work (2 K 20:20) is now further confirmed by the character of the Heb in the ostraca which Reisner dates as of the time of Ahaz.

Unfortunately this priceless monument of antiquity was violently removed from its place by some miscreants. The fragments have been collected and are now placed together in the Constantinople museum. Fortunately several excellent "squeezes" as well as transcriptions were made before the inscription was broken up, so that the damage done is to be regretted rather on sentimental than on literary grounds. SILIOAM, TOWER IN. See Jerusalem; Siloam.

SILVANUS, sil-van-us (Σίλβανος, Silvanos [2 Cor 1:19]). See Silas.

SILVER, sil'ver (σέλανος, kephel; ὄρυγμα, argurion, ὄρυγας, argura): Silver was known in the earliest historic times. Specimens of early Egypt and Bab silver work testify to the skill of the ancient silversmiths. In Pal, silver objects have been found antedating the occupation of the land by the Hebrews. This metal was used for making all kinds of ornamental objects. In the mound of Gezer were found bowls, vases, ladles, balsam pins, rings and bracelets of silver. The rings and settings for scarabs or seals were commonly of this metal. The first mention of silver in the Bible is in Gen 13:2, where it says that Abraham was rich in cattle, in silver and gold. At that time it was commonly used in exchange in the form of bars or other shapes. Coins of that metal were of a much later date (Gen 20:16; 23:15; 24:53; 37:28, etc.). Booty was collected in silver (Josh 6:19); tribute was paid in the same (1 K 15:19). It was also used for jewelry (Gen 44:2). The Children of Israel systematically despooled the Egyptians of their silver before the exodus (Ex 3:22; 11:2; 12:35, etc.). Ex 20:23 implies that idols were made of it. It was largely used in the fittings of the tabernacle (Ex 27:3) and later of the temple (2 Ch 2:11).

It is likely that the ancient supply of silver came from the mountains of Asia Minor where it is still found in abundance associated with lead as argentiferous galena, and with copper sulphide. The Turkish government mines this silver on shares with the natives. The Smiithi bowls, vases, ladles, rings, pins, and also ornaments of ancient silver were also furnished them. Later Phoenicians shipped quantities of it from Greece and Spain. The Arabians are doubtful (2 Ch 9:14). Although silver does not tarnish readily in the air, it does corrode badly in the limestone soil of Pal and Syria. This probably partly accounts for the small number of objects of this metal found. On the site of the ancient jewelers' shops of Tyre the writer found objects of gold, bronze, lead, iron, but none of silver.

Figurative: Silver to be as stones in Jerus (1 K 10:27) typified great abundance (cf. Job 3:5; 22:25; 27:16; also Isa 60:17; Zec 9:3). The trying of men's hearts was compared to the refining of silver (Ps 66:10; Isa 48:10). Jeh's words were as pure as silver refined seven times (Ps 12:6). The gaining of understanding is better than the gaining of silver (Prov 3:14; of 8:19; 10:20; 16:16; 22:11). Silver become cross desolated deterioration (Isa 1:22; Jer 6:30). Breast and arms of silver was interpreted by Daniel to mean the inferior kingdom to follow Nebuchadnezzar's (Dan 2:32, 39).

In the NT, reference should be made esp. to Acts 19:24; Jas 5:3; Rev 18:12. James A. Patch

SILVERLING, sil'vär-ling (σιλίνγκ, idéph keqeph [Isa 7:23]): 'A thousand of silver means a thousand shekels. See PIECE OF SILVER.

SILVERSMITH, sil'vér-smith (ἀργυρόκότας, argyrokótas): Mentioned only once (Acts 19:24), where reference is made to Demetrius, a leading member of the silversmiths' guild of Ephesus.

SIMALCUE, si-mal'-kú: AV = RV IMALCUE (q.v.).

SIMEON, sim'é-on (Σιμών, Simón; שִׂמְואֵן, Simeon, Simeon): the Heb root is from שֶׁמַע, sh'ma', "to hear" (Gen 29:33; some modern scholars [Hitzig, W. R. Smith, Stadermann] derive it from Arab. sim'a, "the offspring of the hyena and female wolf"). In Gen 29:33; 30:18-21; 35:23, Simeon is given as full brother to Reuben, Levi, Judah, Issachar and Zebulun, the son of Leah; and in Gen 46:9 as the brother of Levi and Dinah. He was left as a hostage in Egypt by orders of Joseph (Gen 42:24; 43:23).

In the "blessing" of the dying Jacob, Simeon and Levi are linked together:

1. The Patriarch:
   - Simeon and Levi are brethren.
   - "Woes upon violate idle words.
   - "Unto their assembly, my glory, he not thou united:"

2. Data:
   - For in their anger they slew a man.
   - And when they were found in their own fields, and took an ox.
   - Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; And their wrath, for it was cruel: it will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel. (Gen 49:5-7).

Whatever view may be taken of the events of Gen 34:25 (and some would see in it "a tradition of the settlement of Jacob which belongs to a cycle quite independent of the descent into Egypt and the Exodus") (see S. A. Cook, Enc Brit, art. "Simeon"), it is clear that we have here a reference to it and the suggestion that the subsequent history of the tribe, and its eventual absorption in Judah, was the result of violence. In the same way the priestly Levite (Gen 10:14) became distributed throughout the other tribes without any tribal inheritance of their own (De 13:1; Josh 13:14). From the mention (Gen 46:10; Ex 6:15) of Shaul as being the son of a Canaanite woman, it may be supposed that the alien tribes were distributed through the commonwealth. Whatever the history of the tribe and number and raising problems. Of the many theories advanced to meet them it cannot be said that any one answers all difficulties.

In the wilderness of Sinai the Simeonites camped beside the Reubenites (Nu 2:12; 10:19); it was Fennari, a member of one of the leading families of this tribe, who was slain by the tribe in the affair of Baal-pear (Nu 26:14).

2. The Tribe in Phinehas in the affair of Baal-pear (Nu 26:14). The statistics in Nu 1:22f, where the Simeonites are given as 69,300, compared with the 20 census (Nu 26:14), where the numbers are 22,200, indicate a diminishing tribe. Some have connected this with the sin of Zinari.

At the recital of the laud at Mt. Gerizim, Simeon is mentioned from among those that are "blessed by the blessings" (De 27:12). In the conquest of Canaan "Judah said unto Simeon his brother, Come up with me into my lot, that we may fight against the Canaanites; and I likewise will go with thee into thy lot." (Gen 3:1; cf. ver 17). (Many scholars find in Num 34 a tribal attempt on the part of the Simeonites to gain possession of Shechem; if this is so, Judah did not assist, and the utter failure may have been of cause Simeon's subsequent dependence upon, and final absorption in, Judah.) In Gen 4 and 5 Simeon is never mentioned. In the settlement of the land there is no account of how Simeon established himself in his territory (except the scanty reference in Jgs 1:5), but "their inheritance was as the midst of the inheritance of the children of Judah" (Josh 19:1); this is accounted for (ver 9), "for the portion of the children of Judah was too much for them." Nevertheless we find there the very cities which are apportioned to Simeon, allotted to Judah (Jgs 18:21-22; cf. Neh 11:26-29). It is suggested (in 1 Ch 4:31) that the independent possession of these cities ceased in the time of David. David sent spoil to several Simeonite towns (1 S 30:26 f), and in 1 Ch 12:23 it is stated that 30,000 Simeonite warriors came to David in Hebron. In 1 Ch 27:16 we have mention of a ruler of the Simeonites, Shephatiah, son of Maacah.
In 1 Ch 4:39 I mention is made of certain isolated exploits of Simeonites at Gedor (q.v.), against the Meunim (q.v.), and at Mt. Seir (q.v.). Later references associate certain Simeonites with the Northern Kingdom (2 Ch 15:9; 34:6), and tradition seems to view them as one of the ten tribes (cf. Ezek 48:21-25:38; Rev 7:7), although all the history of them we have is bound up with Judah and the Southern Kingdom. There is no mention of the return of any Simeonites after the captivity; their cities fall to Judah (Neh 11:20 f.). It has been supposed by many authorities that the name Shim'on occurs in the list of places plundered by Thothmes III (see Petrie, Hist., 11, 104: also Hommel, Assyri Inscriptions in Egypt and Judaea, 395). In the 7th cent. we have a doubtful reference in an inscription of Esar-haddan relating his Egyptian campaign when a city Ap-ku is mentioned as in the country of Su-me-na (a), which may possibly be a reference to Simeon. The survival of the name so late, if true, is strange, in the light of what we gather from the Bible about the tribe. (For discussion of both of these inscriptions, with references to the lit., see Be, coll. 4225-30.)

4. The Simeonites of Simeon as given in Josh 19:2-6 and 1 Ch 4:28-31 are (the names in parentheses are variations in the latter reference): Beer-sheba, Moladah, Hazar-shual, Territory Balah (Diblah), Azem (AV) (Azen), of Simeon Eltolad, Bethacar, Hemath, Ziklag, Beth-marechah, Beth-sasseth (Hazaz Susim), Beth-lebaoth (Beth-biri), Sharuneh (Sharraim) (Etam), Ain Rimmon, Ether (Tochen), Ashan—in all, 16 cities in Josh and 17 in 1 Ch. Ashan (1 Ch 6:15) is the only one not assigned to the priests. It is written wrongly as "Ain" in Josh 21:16. All the above cities, with certain variations in form, and with the exception of Etam in 1 Ch 4:32, which is probably a mistake, occur in the list of the cities of Judah (Josh 15:26-32:42). Ziklag is mentioned (1 S 7:6) as being the private property of the kings of Judah from the days of David, who received it from Achish, king of Gath.

For the situation of these cities, so far as is known, see under their names. It is clear that they were all situated in the southwestern part of Pal, and that Simeon had no definite territorial boundaries, but isolated cities, with their villages, among those of the people of Judah.

SIMEON (יִשְׂמָךְ, shim'on; Σιμών, Simeon): (1) The 2d son of Jacob by Leah (see separate art.). (2) Great-grandfather of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 2:1). (3) A man in Jesus described as "righteous and devout, looking for the consolation of Israel." When the infant Jesus was brought into the Temple, he took Him into his arms and blessed God in words which are famous as the New name of Jesus. Simeon bestowed his blessing on the wondering father and mother (Lk 2:25-34). Legend has made him the son of Hillel and father of Gamaliel I, but this has no historical basis.

(1) An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3:30); RV "Simeon". (5) RV "Symeon": one of the prophets and teachers in the Christian community at Antioch. He is also called Niger, which was the gentile name he had assumed, Symeon being Heb. He was associated with St. Paul in Damascus for their missionary work (Acts 13:12). Nothing more is known of him.

(6) RV "Symeon": the Heb name of Simon Peter (Acts 15:14). S. F. Hunter

SIMEON (NGIER, m'j'er): AV in Acts 13:1, RV "Symeon" (q.v.).

SIMEONITES, sim'è-ón-ìts. See Simeon.

SIMILITUDE, si-mil'i-tud: In AV means either "an exact facsimile" (Ps 106:20 AV, RV "likeness"); Rom 6:14, etc, or else "the form itself" (Nu 12:8; Dt 4:12.15.16 for form, "form" [so RV]); cf. Likeness. ERV has retained the word in 2 Ch 4:3; Dn 10:16 (ARV "likeness"), while the NIV and JPS have used "likeness" in Hos 12:10 (יהוֹנָה, dannah, "be like"). The meaning is "I have inspired the prophets to speak parables."

SIMON (Simon, Gr form of Simeon [q.v.]): The persons of the name of Simon mentioned in the Apocrypha are:

(1) Simon the Maccabean (Hasmonaean), surname Thassi (q.v.), the 2d son of Mattathias and elder brother of Judas Maccabaeus. On his deathbed, Mattathias commended Simon as a "man of counsel" to be his "father" to his brother (1 Macc 2:65), and a "man of counsel" he proved himself. But it was not till after the death of Judas and the capture of Jonathan that he played the chief rôle. Dispatched by Judas with a force to the relief of the Jews in Galilee, he fought against Tryphon (5:17 ff.; Jos, Ant, X, viii, 1 f). We find him next taking revenge along with Jonathan on the "children of Jambri" (1 Macc 9:33 ff.), and cooperating in the successful campaign around Bethbasa against Bacchides (c 156 BC) (9:62 ff.), and in the campaign against Apollonius (10:74 ff.). In the conflict between Tryphon and Demetrius II, Simon was appointed by Antiochus VI "captain from the Ladder of Tyre unto the borders of Egypt" (11:39). After the capture of Jonathan at Ptolemais by Tryphon, Simon became acknowledged leader of his party. He thwarted Tryphon in his attempts upon Jesus, in revenge for which the latter murdered Jonathan (13:29). Simon then took the side of Demetrius on condition of immunity for Judea, and so 'in the 170th year' (143-142 BC) 'the yoke of the heathen was taken away from Israel' (13:41). Simon applied himself to rebuild the strongholds of Judea, reduced Gazara, captured the Acra (citadel) and made Joppa a stronghold of Delos (14:6 ff.), and showed his wisdom most of all in his internal administration: "He sought the good of his country"; commerce and agriculture revived; lawlessness was suppressed, and "the land had rest all the days of Simon (14:4 ff.). His power was revivified, as by Sparta and Rome (14:16 ff). In 141 BC he was appointed by the nation leader, high priest and captain "for ever, until there should arise a faithful prophet" (14:41 f.), and thus the Hasmonaean dynasty was founded. A new chronological era began with the first year of his administration, and he minted his own coins. A few years later Simon again meddled in Syrian politics (139 BC), this time at the entreaty of Antiochus VII (Sидetes) in his contest against Tryphon; when, however, Antiochus was assured of success, he refused the help of Simon and sent Cendebeaues against Judaea. Judas and John, sons of Simon, defeated the invaders near Modin (137-136 BC). In 153 BC Simon met his death by treachery. Ptolemy the son of Abubus, Simon's own son-in-law, determined to secure supreme power for himself and, in order to accomplish this, to assassinate the whole family of Simon. He accordingly invited Simon and his sons to a banquet at Jerusalem, where he treacherously murdered Simon with his two sons Mattathias and Judas. The other son, John Hyrcanus, governor of Gaza, received intimation of the plot and saved himself to become the head of the Hasmonaean dynasty. "The significance of Simon's administration consists in this, that he completed the work of Jonathan and left the Jewish people absolutely independent of Syria" (Schürer). See MACCABAEOI, II, 4.

(6) A man of Tyrege, who succeeded c 300 BC. He was one of the last of the Great Synagogue, and to him is attributed the saying, "On three things the world depends— the Law, worship and the showing of kindness. According to Jn, Ant, XII, ii, 5) this Simon was called "the Disturber" (ἀναδίκαιος), "on account of his piety and his benevolent disposition toward his countrymen."

Many authorities (Herzfeld, Derenburg, Stanley, Cheyne) assert that Jos is wrong in attaching this epithet to Simon I instead of Simon II. and Schürer is not certain on this question. But the Tal'm passage which Derenburg cites means the opposite of what Joseph, viz., it is intended to show how splendid and holy were the days of Simon (ha-kaddik) compared with the later days. Besides, Jos is more likely to have known the truth on this matter than these later authorities. The same uncertainty obtains as to whether the euologion in Sir 50 l f of the "great priest" refers to Simon I or Simon II. Schürer and others refer it to Simon II. It is more likely to refer to the Simon I, who was famous as the "Just," and consequently to Simon I. Besides what is said of the achievements of Simon II to entitle him to such praise. The building operations mentioned would suit the time of Simon I better, as Polenky captures Jerusalem and probably caused considerable destruction. The Tal'm states that this Simon (and not Jaddua) met Alexander the Great.

(3) Simon II, high priest, son of Onias II and grandson of Simon I and father of Onias III, flourished about the end of the 3rd cent. BC. and was succeeded by his son Onias III c 198 BC. Jos says that this Simon in the conflict of the sons of Joseph sided with the elders sons against Hyrcanus the younger. Schürer (probably incorrectly) thinks he is the Simon praised in Sir 50 l f. See (2) above (3 Macc 2; Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10).

(4) Simon, a Benjamite, guardian of the temple, who, having quarreled with the high priest Onian III, informed Apollonius of the untold sums of money in the temple treasury. Apollonius laid the matter before the king Seleucus IV, who sent Heliodorus to remove the money. An apprization prevented Heliodorus from accomplishing his task (2 Macc 3; 4 f). It is further asserted, that Simon constrained his son to go to Onias. He is spoken of as brother of the renegade Menelaus (4 23). Of his end we know nothing.

(5) Simon Chosemus (I and Swetel, Σωτιώμων, Chosemas, A, Σωτιώμων, in the names of those who had married "strange wives" (I Esd 9 32). Simon apparently is "Shimeon" (şimון) of the sons of Harim (Ezr 10 31); Chosemus is probably a corruptstanding in the place of, but not resembling, any of the three names of Benjamin, Malluch, Shemaraiab, which Eed emits from the Ezr list.

SIMON, s'mon (Σίμων, Sim'on): (1) Simon Peter. See Peter (Simon).

(2) Another of the Twelve, Simon, the Canaanite (Mt 10 4; Mk 3 18), "the Zealot" (Lk 6 15; Acts 1 13). See CANAANEAN.

(3) One of the brethren of Jesus (Mt 13 55; Mk 6 3). See BROTHERS OF THE LORD.

(4) "The leper" in Bethany (Lk 17 11), whose house a woman poured upon the leper of precious ointment over the head of Jesus (Mt 26 6; Mk 14 3). He had probably been healed by Jesus; in that case his ungracious behavior was not consistent with due gratitude. However he was healed, the title referred to his disposition in the past, as lepers were ostracized by law.

(5) A Pharisee in whose house a woman, "a sinner," wet the feet of Jesus with her tears, and anointed them with ointment (Lk 7 36 ff). By some he is identified with (4), this being regarded as Luke's version of the incident recorded in Mt 26 and Mk 14. Others as strongly deny this view. For discussion see Mary, IV.

(6) A man of Tyrege, who succeeded c 300 BC. S. ANGUS

SIMON MAGUS, má'gus (Σίμων, Simón), Gr form of Heb סֵימֹן, simmôn; Gesenius gives the meaning of the Heb word as "hearing with acceptance"; it is formed from שים, shāmā, "to hear":

1. Simon, a Magician
2. Simon and the Apostles
3. Simon and Philip
4. Simon and Peter and John
5. The Magicians and the Gospel
6. Testament of Early Christian Writers
7. Sources of Legendary History
8. Traditions of His Death
9. The Simonian
10. Was Simon the Originator of Gnosticism?

The name or term "Magus" is not given in the NT; but, it is used or at least the participle magiános is used, and is tr4, both in AV and in RV, "used sorcery." Simon accordingly was a sorcerer, he "bewitched the people of Samaria" (AV). In ver 11 it is also said that "of long time he had amazed" them "with his sorceries" (μαγείαι). The Simon's claim, given in ver 6, that Simon indeed was a great one; and this claim was acknowledged by the Samaritans, for previous to the introduction of the gospel into Samaria, "they all gave heed [to him], from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is that power of God which is called Great" (ver 10).

(1) It so happened, however, that Philip the deacon and evangelist went down from Jerusalem to Samaria, and "proclaimed unto them the Christ" (ver 5); and as the result of the proclamation of the gospel, many were gathered into the Christian church. Many miracles also were performed by Philip, sick persons cured, and demons cast out. Simon fell under the influence of all these things, both of the preaching and of the "signs." So great was the impression now made upon Simon that he "believed" (ver 13). This means, at least, that he saw that Philip was able in the name of Jesus Christ to display powers greater than anything he himself was acquainted with: Philip's power was greater by far than Simon's. He therefore came forward as one of the new converts, and was baptized. After his baptism he continued with Philip. The signs which accompanied the introduction of the gospel to this city did not cease, and Simon seeing them "was amazed," The word denoting Simon's amazement at the "signs" wrought by Philip is the same as that used to express how the people of Samaria had been amazed at Simon's sorceries. It is an indication of the nature of the faith which he possessed in the gospel—wondering amazement at a new phenomenon not yet understood, not repentance or trust in Christ.

(2) Jews having reached Jerusalem of the events which had occurred in Samaria, the apostles sent Peter and John to establish the work there. These two apostles prayed for the converts that they might receive the Holy Ghost, which they had not yet received. And when they laid their hands upon the converts, the Spirit was given to them. At this early period in the history of the church the Holy Ghost was bestowed in a visible manner which showed itself in such miraculous gifts as are described in Acts 2. Simon saw what had taken place, and then, instead of joining the company of those who had truly repented and trusted Christ, he came forward with the same amazement as he had previously shown, and offered money to Peter and John, if they would impart to him the power of giving the Holy Ghost to others. Peter instantly rebuked this bold and ungodly request, and did so with such sternness as to cause Simon to ask that the judgment threatened by the apostle might not fall upon him.

It is not strange to find the gospel brought into direct conflict with magicians, for in the 1st and 2nd centuries there were a multitude of such persons who pretended to possess supernatural powers, which they endeavored to deceiving men. They flattered the sinful inclinations of the human heart, and fell in with men's current ways of thinking, and required no self-renunciation at all. For these reasons the magicians found a ready belief on the part of many. The emperor Tiberius, in his later years, had a host of magicians in constant attendance upon him. Elymas, with whom Paul came in contact in Cyprus "with his magies," Paul called him "a prudent man" (Acts 13:7 AV). Elymas was one of those magicians, and he endeavored to turn away the deputy from the faith. Luke expressly calls this man "magoi," Elymas the magus (Acts 13:6 B). They were not only the organizers of all that came between the ears of the disciples and the Gospel. They were also the means to which the apologetics of the Christian faith had as an object to the progress of the Christian faith, which had to force its way through the delusions with which these sorcerers had surrounded the hearts of those whom they deceived. When the gospel came in contact with these magicians and with their works, it was necessary that there should be striking facts, works of supernatural power strongly appealing to men's outward senses, in order to bring them out of the bewilderment and deception in which they were involved, and to make them able to receive the impression of spiritual truth. Such miracles were wrought both in Cyprus and in Samaria, the spheres of influence of the magicians Elymas and Simon. These Divine works first arrested men's attention, and then dispelled the delusive influence of the sorcerers.

(1) The history of Simon Magus does not close with what is narrated in the Acts, for the early Christian writers have much to say in regard to him.

Martyr, himself a Samaritan, states that Simon Magus was a "Samaritan from the village called Gittin." Justin Martyr says that, in the time of Claudius, Caesar, Simon was worshipped as a god at Rome upon account of his magical powers, and that a statue had been erected to him, on the island in the river Tiber, with the inscription Simoni Deo Sanclo, that is, "To Simon the sacred god." Curiously enough, in the year 1574, a stone monument appears in influx of the church of a statue of Simon Magus, was dug up in the Tiber at the spot described by Justin; and on it it was written: "Simon: Sanclo Deo Filio Sacrum, that is, the stone then discovered was dedicated to the god Semo Sanclo, the Sabine Sanclo. This stone might well prove that Justin was mistaken in what he said about a statue having been erected to Simon Magus. "It is incredible that the folly should ever be carried to such an extent as that a statue should be erected, and the senate should have voted a decree declaring Simon Magus among the deos Romas" (Neander, Church History, vol. iv. p. 125). The following inscription shows the source of the error into which Justin had fallen.

There are many stories told by some of the early Christian writers, regarding Simon Magus; some of them, perhaps, are true, and others are false; some are of legend and fable: some of them are improbable in the extreme and border on the impossible.

(3) Jerome, who proceeds to quote from writings of Simon, presents him as employing these words in reference to himself: "I am the Word of God, I am the Father, I am the Son, I am all there is of God" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heretics, 82). Trencaus (Mansel, ib. 82) writes regarding him: "Simon, having purchased a certain woman named Helen, who had been a prostitute in the city of Tyre, carried her about with him, and said that she was the first conception of all things, by whom, in the beginning, he conceived the wisdom of nature. The angels and other powers which from this conception proceeded forth from him, and knowing her father's wishes, she descended to the lower world, and produced the gods and powers which made the world. After she had produced them, she was retained by them, as they were unwilling to be considered the offspring of any other being; for he himself was entirely unknown by Helen; but he delivered her by those powers and angels which were put forth from her, and suffered every insult and all that might return upward to her father; and this went so far that she was even confined within a human body, and for ages passed into another female body, as if from mother to mother. She said also that she was that Helen, on whose account the Trojan war was fought. Helen, after passing from one body to another, and constantly meeting with insult, at last she became a public prostitute, and that this was the Helen on whom the Jews had put their hope. On this account she is said that he might first of all reclaim her and free her from her chains, and then give salvation to men through the knowledge of himself. For since the angels ruled the world badly, because one of them desired the chief place, he had come down for the restoration of all things, and had descended, being changed in figure, and made like to principialities and powers and angels, so that he appeared among men as a man, and was thought to have suffered in Judaea, though he did not suffer..." Furthermore it should be noted that the entire history of Simon Magus is so inconsistent with itself that his prophecies under the inspiration of those angels who accompanied him in his travels were not preserved, but were lost. The apostles did not believe on him and his Helen no longer cared for them. But as few men would act as they pleased, for that men are saved by his [i.e. Simon's] practices, the angels to their own just works, for that no acts were just by nature, but by the apostle, accomplished by the angels, who made the world, and who attempted by their prophecies to bring men into bondage. For this reason it is promised that he will be released, and those who are his set at liberty from the government of those who made the world.

The chief sources of the legendary history of Simon Magus are the collection of writings known as The Clementines (see Literature, 5. Sources Sub-apostolic; Peter, First Epistle of Legend- or, Peter, Second Epistle of), which is the account of the sources.

What is there said of him is, that he studied at Alexandria, and that he went to Rome, and that he instructed in a city of the desert, and that he was the apostle of the Gentiles. This is the account of his travels, of which we have no other record. These record the supposed travels of Clement, a Roman citizen. Clement meets with Barnabas and with Peter. Then there is a narrated a discussion between Peter and Simon Magus. This disposition lasts for three days, Simon maintaining that there are two gods, and that the God of the OT is an imperfect being. Simon Magus withdraws to Tyre and then to Sidon. Peter follows Simon from place to place, countering his sorceries, and instructing the people. At Laodicea a second dispute takes place between the apostle and Simon on the same subjects.

The Homilies are not a Christian protest against Gnosticism, but merely that of one gnostic school or sect against another, the Ebionite against the Marcionite. The Deity of Christ is denied, and He is regarded as one of the Jewish prophets.

In the legends Simon is represented as constantly opposing Peter, who ultimately discredits and vanquishes him. These legends occur in more forms than one, the earlier form selecting Antioch as the place where Simon was discomfited by the apostle and where he also died. The later tradition chooses Rome for these events.

One tradition tells how the magician ordered his followers to bury him in a grave, promising that if this were done, he would rise again on the third day. They did as he wished and buried him; but this Death was the end of him, for he did not rise again.

Simon is said to have met his death at Rome, after an encounter with the apostle Peter. During this final controversy with the apostle, Simon had raised himself in the air by the help of evil spirits, and in answer to the prayer of Peter and Paul he was dashed to the ground and killed.

According to another form of this tradition, Simon proposed to the Roman emperor a proof of his power by flying off to God. He succeeded, it is said, in flying for a certain distance over Rome, but in answer to the prayer of Peter he fell and broke one of his legs. This tradition accounts for his end by saying that the people stoned him to death.

The Simonians, the Simonians or followers of Simon, were an eclectic sect, who seem, at one time, to have adopted tenets and opinions derived from paganism, at another, from Judaism and the beliefs of the Samaritans, and at another still, from Christianity. Sometimes they seem to have been ascetics; at others they are wild scoffers at moral law. They regarded Simon Magus as their Christ, or at least as a form of the redemption, and manifested himself also in Jesus. The Simonians were one of the minor gnostic sects and were carried far away both from the doctrine and from the ethical spirit of the Christian faith.

Origin denies that the followers of Simon were Christians in any sense. The words of Origin are, "It escapes the notice of Celsus that the Simonians do not in any way acknowledge Jesus as the Son of God, but they call Simon the Power of God." In the time of Origin the followers of Simon had dwindled in number to such a degree that he writes, "I do not think it possible to find that all the followers of Simon in the whole world are more than thirty: and perhaps I have said more than there really are" (Contr. Cel., 1.9, quoted by Alford, GrNT, Acts 8 9).

Irenaeus also has much to say regarding Simon and his followers. He makes the legendary Simon identical with the magician of Acts 8, makes him also the first bishop of Rome. He gives of heretics, and also says that it was from him that Gnosticism sprang. The account which he gives of the Simonians shows that by the time Irenaeus lived, their system had been absorbed into Gnosticism; but this fact does not justify Irenaeus in the assertion that Simon of Acts 8 is the originator of the gnostic system. The early Christian writers took this view, and regarded Simon Magus as the founder of Gnosticism. Perhaps they were right, "but from the very little authentic information we possess, it is impossible to ascertain how far he was identified with their tenets" (Alford, N7, II, 58).

In the midst of the various legends regarding Simon, it may be that there is a substratum of fact, of such a nature that future investigation and discovery will justify these early Christian writers in their judgment, and will show that Simon Magus is not to be overlooked as one of the sources from which Gnosticism sprang. The exact origin of Gnosticism is certainly difficult to trace, but there is little or no indication that it arose from the incidents narrated in Acts 8. It cannot be denied that a connection is possible, and may have existed between the two, that is between Simon Magus and some of the gnostic heresies; but the facts of history show widespread tendencies at work, during and even before the Apostolic age, which may account for the origin of Gnosticism. These are found e.g. in the Alexandrian philosophy, and in the tenets of the false teachers at Colosse and in other places. These philosophical and theosophical ideas commingled with the influences of Zoroastrianism from Persia, and of Buddhism from India, and these tendencies and influences, taken in conjunction, were the sources of the various heresies known by the name of Gnosticism. See Gnosticism.

SIMON PETER. See Peter, Simon.

SIMON THE CANAANITE, OR CANANAEN, OR ZEALOT (Σίμων Καναανητός, Simon Kananaos; NT: kanaanad, "the Jewish (or Israelite) sect"); One of the Twelve Apostles. This Simon was also named "the Canaanite" (Mt 10 4; Mk 3 18 AV) or "the Cananaean" (Mt 10 4; Mk 3 18 RV) or "Zealotes" (Lk 6 15; Acts 1 13 AV) or "the Zealot" (Lk 6 15; Acts 1 13 RV).

According to the "Gospel of the Ebionites" or "Gospel of the Twelve Apostles" (of the 2nd cent. and mentioned by Origen) Simon received his call to the apostleship along with Andrew the brother of Peter, the sons of Zebedee, and Judas Iscariot at the Sea of Tiberias (cf Mt 4 18-22; see also Hennecque, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 24-47).

Although Simon, like the majority of the apostles, was probably a Galilean, the designation "Cananaean" is regarded as of political rather than of geographical significance (cf St. Luke's rendering). The Zealots were a faction, headed by Judas of Galilee, who "in the days of the enrolment" (cf Acts 5 37; Lk 2 1 2) bitterly opposed the threatened increase of taxation at the census of Quirinius, and would have hastened by the sword the fulfillment of Messianic prophecy.

Simon has been identified with Simon the brother of Jesus (Mt 6 3; Mt 13 55), but there also are reasons in favor of identifying him with Nathanael.

Thus (1) all the arguments adduced in favor of the Bartholomew-Nathanael identification (see Nathanael) can equally be applied to that of Simon-Nathanael, except the second. But the second is of no account, since the Philip-Bartholomew connection in the Synoptists occurs merely in the apocryphal lists, while in St. John it is narrative. Further, in the Synoptists, Philip is connected in the narrative, not with Bartholomew but with Andrew.

(2) "The identity is definitely stated in the Genealogies of the Twelve apostles (see Nathanael) can equally be applied to that of Simon-Nathanael, except the second. But the second is of no account, since the Philip-Bartholomew connection in the Synoptists occurs merely in the apocryphal lists, while in St. John it is narrative. Further, in the Synoptists, Philip is connected in the narrative, not with Bartholomew but with Andrew.

(3) Simon is the zealot; or Simon son of Cleopas" (cf Budge, II, 70 f) has the heading, "The preaching of the blessed St. Simon, the son of Cleopas, who was surnamed Judas, which is interpreted Nathanael, who became bishop of Persia after Justin, who lives 56 years in the same city, and is also referred to a Simon who succeeded James as bishop of Judea and suffered martyrdom under Trajan and Hadrian, and whose prophecies, to quote, calls this Simon a son of Cleopas."
(3) The invitation of Philip to Nathanael (cf. Jn 1:45) was to one who would naturally be addressed to a follower of the Zealots, who based their cause on the fulfillment of Messianic prophecies.

(4) As Alphaeus, the father of James, is generally regarded as the same as Cleopas or Cleopas (see JAMES, A), this identity of the angel of the Annunciation and Simon Nathanael, son of Cleopas, with Simon Zelotes would shed light on the reason of the juxtaposition of Jn and Simon Zelotes in the apocryphal lists of St. Luke and Acts, i.e. they were brothers.

SIMPLE, sim'pl; in the OT the uniform tr of the Heb word pethî (root pâthâh, "be open"). Like the Eng. word "simple" (etymologically "of one fold"), the Heb pethî is used sometimes in a good sense, i.e. "open-minded" (Ps 19:17; 116:6; 119:130), possibly in all three cases the sense is neutral rather than positively good, and sometimes in a bad sense (Prov 7:7, 1 to "destitute of understanding"; 8:5, 1 to "fools" [blockheads]; 14:15, opposed to prudent). The fundamental idea of pethî seems to be open to influence, i.e. easily influenced. That openness to influence would as a rule be classed with the irreligious is one of many instances in which language is an unwilling witness to the misunstraining moral atmosphere in which we live. The line between moral weakness and moral turpitude, between negative good, and indeed such a thing be conceived of as positive badness, is soon passed.

In the NT the word "simple" is found only in Rom 16:18.9 AV. In the first of these passages it is used to translate abakos (RV "innocent"). In He 7:26 AV the same word is rendered "harmless"—the rendering of RV in this instance being "guileless." This would suit Rom 16:18 better than "innocent." Guilelessness is not a synonym for gullibility; but the guileless are frequently the prey of designing men. In Rom 15:19 the word "simple" is mentioned, but it is not defined, "sincere" (Trench and Godet; Young, erroneously "horrible" and so "harmless"). "Uncontaminated" seems to be the idea of the apostle. He would have those to whom he wrote "wise as regards good", and not ignorant as regards evil—for that would be impossible, even if desirable—but without that kind of knowledge of evil that comes from engaging in it, as we say, mixing themselves up with it, unalloyed with evil.

SIMPLICITY, sim-pli-"ti (σιμπλεξ, plothýth; ἀπλόντας, haplôta): The words in the OT commonly tr "simplicity" are pethî, "simple" (Prov 1:22), plothýth, "simplicity" (9:13m), ἀπλόντας, "simplicity," (2 S 15:27). They were used in their simplicity. In the NT, haplôtis, "simplicity of mind," "simplicity," occurs in Rom 12:8, "He that giveth him do it with simplicity," RV "liberality," Gr "simplicity" (2 Cor 1:12), in simplicity and godly sincerity; RV (with corrected text) "in holiness and sincerity of God"; 11:3, "the simplicity that is in Christ," RV (with corrected text) "the simplicity and the purity that is toward Christ"; of Eph 6:5; Col 3:22, where the tr is "simplicity." In Wg 1:11 we have, "Think ye not to be a good mind [AV "heart"], and in singleness [AV "simplicity"] of heart seek ye him" (haplôtis). Our Lord also speaks (Mt 6:22; Lk 11:34) of the "single eye" (haplôtis), and James (1:5) applies haplôtis, "simply," "directly," without and with singleness, and RV (with corrected text) "in holiness and singleness," tr [who had been described by Plato (Rep. ii.382 E) as being perfectly simple (haplôtè) and true, both in word and deed. In such "simplicity"—openness, sincerity, freedom from double-mindedness—man most resembles God and is most open to His visitation and blessing.

enial spiritual truth is at once apparent. There has been much progress in religious thinking concerning sin during the Christian ages, but the progress has not been away from this central concept of sin in life, but rather toward a differentiation of sin from God.

In this early Bib. account there is implicit the thought of the freedom of man. The idea of transgression has sometimes been interpreted in such wise as to do away with the concept of sin completely. An unbiased reading of the Scriptures would, with the possible exception of some passages which designingly lay stress on the power of God (Rom 8 29-30), produce on the mind the impression that freedom is essential to sin. Certainly there is nothing in the account of the OT or NT narratives to warrant the conception that men are born into sin by forces over which they have no control. The argument of the tempter with the woman is an argument aimed at her will. By easy steps, indeed, she moves toward the transgression, but the transgression is a transgression and nothing else. Of course, the evil deed is at once followed by attempts on the part of the transgressors to explain themselves, but the futility of the explanations is part of the point of the narratives. The all-determining factor of the transgression as relating to sin, we must remember that the Bib. revelation is from first to last busy with the thought of the righteousness and justice and love of God (Gen 6 9 tells us that because of justice or righteousness, Noah walked with God). Unless we accept the doctrine that God is Himself not free, a doctrine which is nowhere implied in the Scripture, we must insist that the condemnation of men as sinful, when they have not had freedom to be otherwise than sinful, is out of harmony with the Bib. revelation of the character of God. Of course this does not mean that a man is free in all things. Freedom is limited in various ways, but we must retain enough of freedom in our thought of the constitution of men to make possible our holding fast to the Bib. idea of sin as transgression. Some who take the Bib. narrative as literal historical fact maintain that all men sinned in Adam (see IMPLICATION, III, 1). Adam may have been free to sin or not to sin, but, "in his fall we sinned all," they shall mention the hereditary influences of sin in a later paragraph; here it is sufficient to say that even if the first man had not sinned, there is nothing in our thought of the nature of man to make it impossible to believe that this or that instance of human sinfulness has been initiated by some descendant of the first man far down the line.

The progress of the Bib. teaching concerning sin also would seem to imply that the transgression of the law must be a transgression committed against the light (Acts 17 30; 1 Tim 1 13). To be sinful in any full sense of the word, a man must know that the course which he is adopting is an evil course. This does not necessarily mean the full realization of the evil of the course. It is a fact, both of Bib. revelation and of revelation of all times, that men who commit sin do not realize the full evil of their deeds until after the sin has been committed (2 Pet 1 13). This is partly because of the remorse of the conscience; and partly from the humiliation at being discovered; but in some sense there must be a realization of the evil of the course itself. E.g. in estimating the moral worth of Bib. characters, esp. those of earlier times, we must keep in mind the standards of the times in which they lived. These standards were partly set by the customs of the social group, but the customs were, in many cases, made sacred by the claim of Divine sanction. Hence we find Bib. characters giving themselves readily to polygamy and warfare. The Scriptures themselves, however, throw light upon the action of men toward a course which he himself later considered evil, because of that earlier course he had acted ignorantly (Acts 26 9; 1 Tim 1 13).

The Bib. narratives, too, show us the passage over from sin conceived of as the violation of external commands to sin conceived of as an unwillingness to keep the commandments in the depths of the inner life. The course of Bib. history is one long protest against conceiving of sin in an external fashion.

(1) PROPHETS.—In the sources of light which are to help men discern good from evil, increasing stress is laid upon inner moral insight (cf Isa 58 5; Hos 6 1-7). The power of the prophets was in their direct moral insight and the fervor with which they made these convictions known to the people of their time.

Of course it was necessary that the spirit of the prophets be given body and form in carefully articulated law. The progress of the Hebrews from the insight of the seer to the statute of the lawmakcr was not different from our progress in any other nations. It is easy to see, however, how the hardening of moral precepts into formal codes, absolutely necessary as that task was, led to an externalizing of the thought of sin. The man who did not keep the formal law was a sinner. On such basis there grew up the artificial systems which came to their culmination in the NT times in Pharisaism. On the other hand, a fresh insight by a new prophet might be in violation of the Law, considered in its literal aspects. It might be necessary for a prophet to attack outright some additions to the Law. We regard as a high-water mark of OT moral utterances the word of Micah that the Lord requires men to do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with Him (Mic 6 8). In the delivery of that utterance, the people were giving themselves up to multitudes of sacrifices. Many of these sacrifices called for the heaviest sufferings on the part of the worshippers. It would seem that an obligation was placed upon us, that sacrifices could be performed or offered in order that the Hebrews might not be behind the neighboring heathen nations in observances of religious codes. The simple direct word of Micah must have seemed heresy to many of its first hearers. The outcome, however, of this conflict between the inner and the outer in the thought of transgression was finally to deepen the springs of the inner life. The extremes of externalism led to a break with moral realities which tended to become apparent to the most ordinary observer. The inventive of Jesus against NT Pharisaism took its force largely from the fact that Jesus gave clear utterance to what everyone knew. Those who thought of religion as external gave themselves to formal keeping of the commandments and allowed the inner life to run riot as it would (Mt 23 23, et al.).

(2) PAUL.—With the more serious-minded the keeping of the Law became more and more a matter of the inner spirit. There were some who, like Paul, found themselves opposed to the mass of the people and find peace of conscience (Rom 7). It was this very impossibility which forced some, like Paul, to understand that, after all, sin or righteousness must be judged by the inner disposition. It was this which led to the search for a conception of God who looks chiefly at the heart and judges men by the inner motive.

(3) Jesus.—In the teaching of Jesus the emphasis upon the inner spirit as the essential factor in the moral life came to its climax. Jesus honored the Law, but He pushed the keeping of the Law back from the mere performance of externals to the inner stirrings of motives. It is not merely the actual commission of adultery, for example, that is sin: it is the lustful desire which leads to the evil glance; it is not merely the actual killing of the man that is murder; it is the spirit of hatred which makes the thought of murder welcome (Mt 5:21,27). Paul caught the spirit of Jesus and carried the thought of Jesus out into more elaborate and formal statements. There is a law of the inner life with which man should bind himself, and this law is the law of Christ’s life itself (Rom 8:1-4). While both Jesus and Paul recognized the place of the formal codes in the moral life of individuals and societies, they brought a great service for righteousness in setting on high the obligations upon the inner spirit. The follower of Christ is to guard the inmost thoughts of his heart. The commandments are not always precepts which can be given articulated statement; they are rather instincts and intuitions and glimmerings must be followed, even when we cannot give them full statement.

From this standpoint we are able to discern something of the force of the Bib. teaching as to whether sin is to be looked upon as negative evil. Yet the question of sin is defined as the mere absence of goodness.力

8. Sin a Positive Force

The man who sins is one who does not keep the Law. This, however, is hardly the full Bib. conception. Of course, the man who does not keep the law is regarded as a sinner, but the idea of transgression is very often that of a positive refusal to keep the commandment and a breaking of the commandment. Two courses are set before men, one good, the other evil. The evil course, in a sense, something positive in itself. The evil man does not stand still; he moves as truly as the good man moves; he becomes a positive force for evil. In all our discussions we must keep clearly in mind the truth that evil is not only something in and of itself, but that Scripture deals with evil men, and the evil men are as positive as their natures permit them to be. In this sense the word sin does run a course of positive destruction. In the thought, e.g., of the writer with whom we are concerned in Gen 6 we were made necessary the Flood, we have a positive state of evil contaminating almost the whole world (Gen 6:11). It would be absurd to characterize the world in the midst of which Noah lived as merely a negative world. The world was positively set toward evil. And so, in later writings, Paul’s thought of Rom society is of a world of sinful men moving with increasing velocity toward the destruction of themselves and of all around them through doing evil. It is impossible to believe that Rom 1 conceives of sin merely in negative terms. We repeat, we do not do full justice to the Bib. conception when we speak of sin merely in negative terms. If we may be permitted to use a present-day illustration, we may say that in the Bib. thought sinful men are like the destructive forces in the world of Nature which must be removed before there can be peace and health for human life. For example, science today has much to say concerning gases of various sorts which poison human life. A large part of modern scientific effort has been to rid the world of these gaseous, or at least to cleanse human surroundings from their contaminating touch. The man who sterilizes the human environment so that these forces cannot touch men does in one sense a merely negative work; in another sense, however, his work makes possible the positive development of the forces which make for health.

It is from this thought of the positiveness of sin that we are to approach the problem of the hereditary transmission of evil. The

9. Heredity Bib. teaching has often been misinterpreted at this point. Apart from certain passages, esp. those of St. Paul, which set forth the practically universal contamination of sin (e.g. Rom 5:18, etc.), there is nothing in the Scriptures to suggest the idea that men are born into the world under a weight of guilt. We hold fast to the idea of God as a God of justice and love. There is no way of reconciling these attributes with the condemnation of human souls before these souls have themselves transgressed. Of course much theological teaching moves on the assumption that the tendencies to evil are so great that the souls will necessarily transgress, but we must keep clearly in mind the difference between a tendency to evil and the actual commission of evil. Modern scientific research reinforces the conception that the children of sinful parents, whose sins have been such as to impress their lives throughout, will very soon manifest symptoms of evil tendency. Even in this case, however, we must distinguish between the psychological and moral. The child may be given a wrong tendency from birth, not only by hereditary transmission, but by the imitation of sinful parents; yet the question of personal responsibility is altogether another matter. Modern society has come to recognize something of the force of this distinction. In dealing with extreme cases of this kind, the question of the personal guilt of the child is rather pressed. The thought of the environment that will correct the abnormal tendency. But there can be little gain saying the fact that the presence of sin in the life of the parent may go as far as to mark the life of the child with the sinful tendency.

The positive force of sinful life also appears in the effect of sin upon the environment of men. It is not necessary for us to believe that all the physical universe was cursed by the sin of Adam. The Bib. conception is in order to hold that there is a curse upon the world because of the presence of sinful men. Men have sinful disposed the world for their own selfish purposes. They have wasted its resources and by their behavior have had the grace put to have made good into the channels of evil. In their contacts with one another also, evil men furnish an evil environment. If the employer of 100 men be himself evil, he is to a great extent the evil environment of those 100 men. The curse of his evil is upon them. So with the relations of men in larger social groups: the forces of state-life which are intended to work for good can be made to work for evil. So far has this gone that some earnest thinkers have thought of the material conditions of man’s lives, as necessarily and inherently evil. In other days this led to retreats from the world in monasteries and in solitary cells. In our present time the same thought is back of much of the pessimist idea that the world itself is like a sinking ship, absolutely doomed. The most we can hope for is for saving individuals here and there from imminent destruction. Yet a more Bib. conception keeps clear of all this. The material forces of the world—apart from certain mass-destroying physical necessities (e.g. earthquakes, storms, floods, pestilence, famines), whose presence does more to furnish the conditions of moral growth than to discourage that growth—are what men cause them to be. Social forces are nothing apart from the men who are themselves the forces. No one can deny that evil men can use physical forces for evil purposes, and that evil men can make bad social forces, but both these forces, can be used for good as well as for evil. "The whole creation groaned together in travail of pain" waiting for the redemption at the hands of the sons of God (Rom 8:19–23).

In the thought of Jesus, righteousness is life. Jesus came that men might have life (Jn 10:10).

11 Redemption

It must follow therefore that in His thought sin is death, or rather it is the positive course of transgression which makes toward death (Jn 5:24).

But man is to cease to do evil and to learn to do well. He is to face about and walk in a different direction; he is to be born from above (Jn 3:3), and surrender himself to the forces which beat upon him from above rather than to those which surge upon him from below (Rom 12:2). From the realization of the positiveness both of sin and of righteousness, we see the need of a positive force which is to bring men from sin to righteousness (Jn 3:3–8).

Of course, in what we have said of the positive nature of sin we would not deny that there are multitudes of men whose evil consists in their passive righteousness. Multitudes of men may not be lost, in the sense that they are breaking the more obvious of the commandments. They are lost, in the sense that they are drifting about, or that they are existing in a condition of inertia with no great inward force at work to make spiritual ideals. But the problem even here is to find a force strong enough and positive enough to bring such persons to themselves and to God. In any case the Scriptures lay stress upon the seriousness of the problem constituted by sin. The blood is sprinkled upon the sinner for redemption. Repentance from sin is thought of as carrying with it redemption from all other calamities. If the kingdom of God and of His righteousness can be seized, all other things will follow with the seizure (Mt 6:33). The work of Christ is set before us as chiefly a work of redemption from sin. A keen student once observed that almost all failures to take an adequate view of the person of Christ can be traced to a failure to realize adequately the seriousness of sin. The problem of changing man is the essence of the positive life set toward sin is a problem which may well tax the resources of the Almighty. Lives cannot be transformed merely by precept. The only effective force is the force of a Divine life which will reach and affect the heart (see REDEMPTION).

We are thus in a position to see something of the positiveness of the life that must be in Christ if it is to be a Saviour from sin. That positiveness must be powerful enough to make men feel that in some real sense God Himself has come to their rescue (Rom 8:32–39). For the problem of salvation from sin is manifold. Sin long persisted in begets evil habits, and the habits must be broken. Sin lays the conscience under a load of distress, for the only check of a sense of forgiveness. Sin frightens and paralyzes the faculties to such a degree that only the mightiest of tonic forces can bring back health and strength. And the problem is often more serious than this. The presence of evil in the world is serious in the sight of a Holy God that He Himself, because of His very holiness, must be under stupendous obligation to aid us to the utmost for the redemption of men. Out of the thought of the disturbance which sin makes in the heart of God, we see something of the reason for the doctrine that in the cross of Christ God was discharging a debt to Himself and to the whole world; for the insistence also that in the cross there is opened up a fountain of life, which, if accepted by sinful men, will heal and restore them.

It is with this seriousness of sin before us that we must think of forgiveness from sin. We can understand the idea adequately only on condition that men seek forgiveness in the name of the highest manifestation of holiness which they have known. For those who have had the preaching of the cross and have seen something of the real meaning of that preaching, the way to forgiveness is in the name of the cross. In the name of a holiness which men would make their own, if they could; in the name of an ideal of holy love which men of themselves cannot reach, but which they forever strive after, they seek forgiveness. But the forgiveness is to be taken seriously. In both the OT and NT repentance is not merely a changed attitude of mind. It is an attitude which shows its sincerity by willingness to do everything possible to undo the evil which the sinner has wrought (Lk 19:8). If there is any consequence of the sinner's own sin which the sinner can himself make right, the sinner must in himself genuinely repent and make that consequence right. In one sense the forgiveness is not altogether something done once for all. The seductiveness of sin is so great that there is need of humble and continuous watching. While anything like a morbid introspection is unscriptural, constant alertness to keep to the straight and narrow path after is everywhere enjoined as an obligation (Gal 6:1).

There is nothing in the Scriptures which will warrant the idea that forgiveness is to be conceived of in such fashion as would teach that the consequences of sin can only be easily forgiven and quickly eliminated. Change in the attitude of a sinner necessarily means change in the attitude of God. The sinner and God, however, are persons, and the Scriptures always speak of the problem of sin after a completely personal fashion. The changed attitude affects the personal standing of the sinner in the sight of God. But God is the person who creates and carries on a moral universe. In carrying on a universe, He must keep personal relations with Himself, and these relations must be in their proper place as the constitutional principles of the universe. While the father welcomes back the prodigal to the restored personal relations with himself, he cannot, in the full sense, blot out the fact that the prodigal has, through his own personal forgiveness may be complete, but the elimination of the consequences of the evil life is possible only through the long lines of healing set at work. The man who has sinned against his body can find restoration from the consequences of the sin only in the forces which make for bodily healing. So also with the mind and will. The mind which has thought evil must be cured of its tendency to think evil. To be sure the curative processes may come almost instantly through the upbuilding of a great experience of God, but, from a conservative point of view the curative processes may have to work through long years (see SANCTIFICATION). The will which has been given to sin may feel the stirrings of sin after the life of forgiveness has begun. All this is a manifestation, not only of the power of sin, but of the constitutional morality of the universe. Forgiveness must not be interpreted in such terms as to make the transgression of the Law of God in any sense a light or trivial offence. But, on the other hand, we must not set up any limit to the working of the cross of God. With the removal of the power which makes for evil the possibility of development in real human experience is before the life (see FORGIVENESS). The word of the Master is that He "came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly" (Jn 10:10). Sin is serious, because it thwart life. Sin is given so large a place in the thought of the Bib. writers simply because it blocks the channel of that movement toward the fullest life which the Scriptures teach is the aim of God in placing man in the world. God conceived of as the Father in Heaven. Sin has a deeply disturbing effect in restraining the relations between the Father and the sons and of preventing the proper development of the life of the sons. SIN, sin (אֵין, "clay or mud"). Sinai, Subn, A, Tavn, Tavn: A city of Egypt mentioned only in Ezek. 30:15, 16. This seems to be a pure Sem. name. The ancient Egyptian name, if the place ever had one such, is unknown. Pelusium (Gr. Peladoe or Pelasion) also meant "the clayey or muddy town." The Pelusiac mouth of the Nile was "the muddy mouth," and the modern Arab. name of this mouth has the same significance. These facts make it practically certain that the Vulg is correct in identifying S. with Pelusium. But although Pelusium appears very frequently in ancient history, its exact location is still not entirely certain. The list of cities mentioned in Ezek in connection with S. furnishes no clue to its location. From other historical notices it seems to have been a frontier city. Ramesses II built a wall from S. to Heropolis, probably by the aid of Hebrew slaves (Diodorus Siculus; cf. Budge, Hist of Egypt, V, 90), to protect the eastern frontier. S. was a meeting-place of Egypt with her enemies who came to attack her, many great battles being fought at or near this place. Sennacherib and Cambyses both fought Egypt near Pelusium (Herod. ii, 141; iii, 10-15). Antiochus IV defeated the Egyptians here (Budge, VII, 25), and the Romans under Gabinius defeated the Egyptians in the same neighborhood. Pelusium was also accessible from the sea, or it was very near a seaport, for Pompey after the disaster at Pharsalia fled into Egypt, sailing for Pelusium. These historical notices of Pelusium make its usual identification with the ruins near el-Kantara, a station on the Suez Canal 29 miles S. of Port Said, most probable. "S., the stronghold of Egypt," in the words of Ezek (30:15), would thus refer to its inaccessibility because of swamps which served as impassable moats, the wall on the S. and the sea on the N. also protected it on either flank. SINA, s'na: In Acts 7:38 AV, RV "Sinai" (q.v.).

SINAI, s'n, s'nâ-i (אֵין, "clay or mud"); A, Sivá, Siná, B, Ziíná, Seind): The name comes probably from a root meaning "to shine," which occurs in Syr. and which in Bab is found in the name sinu for "the moon." The old explanation, "clayey," is inappropriate to any place in the Sinaiic desert, though it might apply to Sin (Ex 30:15), and Pelusium; even there, however, the applicability is doubtful. The desert of Sin (Ex 16:1; 17:1; Nu 33:11) lay between Sinai and the Gulf of Suez, and may have been named from the "glare of its white chalk. But at Sinai "the glory of Jehovah like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel" (Ex 24:17); and, indeed, the glory of the Lord still dyes the crags of Jebel Musa (the "mountain of Moses") with fiery red, reflected from its red granite and pink gneiss rocks, long after the shadowy crags have fallen on the plain beneath. Sinai is mentioned, as a desert and a mountain, in 35 passages of the OT. In 17 passages the same desert and mountain are called "Horeb," or "the waste." This term is chiefly used in Dt, though Sinai also occurs (Dt 33:2). In the other books of the Pent, Sinai is the usual name, though Horeb also occurs (Ex 3:1; 17:6; 33:6), applying both to the "Mount of God" and to the desert of Rephidim, some 20 miles to the N.W.

The indications of position, in various passages of the Pent, favor the identification with the traditional site, which has become generally accepted by all these explorers who have carefully considered the subject, though two other theories may need notice. Moses fled to the land of Midian (or "empty land"), which lay E. of the Sinaic peninsula...
(Nu 22:47; 26:31), and when he wandered with his flocks to Horeb (Ex 31) he is said to have reached the west side of the desert. In another note (Dt 1:2) we read that the distance was "eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea" or Petra (see WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL), the distance being about 145 miles, or 14 miles of daily march, though Israel—in the mountains—made 16 marches between these points, Sinai again is described as being distant from Egypt "three days' journey into the wilderness" (Ex 5:3), the actual route being 117 miles, which Israel accomplished in 10 journeys. But, for Arabs not encumbered with families and herds, this distance could still be covered by an average march of 39 miles daily, on riding camels, or even, if necessary, on foot.

These distances will not, however, allow of our placing Sinai farther E. than Jebel Mûsa. Lofty mountains, in all parts of the world, have always been sacred and regarded as the mysterious abode of God; and Jos says that Sinai is "the highest of all the mountains thereabouts," and again is "the highest of all the mountains that are in that country, and is not only very difficult to be ascended by men, on account of its vast altitude, but because of the sharpness of its precipices: nay, indeed, it cannot be looked at without pain of the eyes, and besides this it was terrible and inaccessible, on account of the rumor that passed about, that God dwelt there" (Ant. II, xii, 1; III, y, 1). Evidently in his time Sinai was supposed to be one of the peaks of the great granitic block called et Tûr—a term applying to any lofty mountain. This block has its highest peak in Jebel Kûtorû (so named from a legend of St. Catherine of Egypt), rising 8,550 ft. above the sea. N.E. of this is Jebel Mûsa (7,570 ft.), which, though less high, is more conspicuous because of the open plain called er Râhôh ("the wide") to its N.W. This plain is about 4 miles long and has a width of over a mile, so that it forms, as Dr. E. Robinson (Bib. Res., 1838, I, 89) seems to have been the first to note, a natural camp at the foot of the mountain, large enough for the probable numbers (see EXOYU, 3) of Israel.

Jebel Mûsa has two main tops, that to the S.E. being crowned by a chapel. The other, divided by gorges into three precipitous crags, has the Convent to its N., and is called Rûâ-er-Sâfôfèh, or "the willow top." N. of the Convent is the lower top of Jebel ed Deir ("mountain of the monastery").

These heights were accurately determined by Royal Engineer surveyors in 1868 (Sir C. Wilson, Ordnance Survey Jebel Mûsa of Sinai); and, though it is impossible to say which of the peaks Moses ascended, yet they are all much higher than any mountains in the Sinaitic desert, or in Midian. The highest tops in the Tûr desert to the N. are not much over 4,000 ft. Those in Midian, E. of Elath, rise only to 4,200 ft. Even Jebel Serbûl, 20 miles W. of Sinai—a ridge with many crags, running 3 miles in length—is at its highest only 6,750 ft. above the sea. Horeb is not recorded to have been visited by any of the Hebrews after Moses, excepting by Elijah (1 K 19:8) in a time of storm. In favor of the traditional site it may also be observed that clouds suddenly formed, or lasting for days (Ex 24:15 f.), are apt to cap very lofty mountains. The Hebrews reached Sinai about the end of May (Ex 19:1) and, on the 3d day, "there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount" (ver 16). Such storms occur as a rule in the Sinaic desert only in December and January, but thunderstorms are not unknown in Palestine in May.

A constant tradition fixing the site is traceable back to the 4th cent. AD. Eusebius and Jerome (Onom., s.v. "Choreb") place Horeb or Mount Sinai near Paran, which in their time was evidence (Onom., s.v. "Raphidim") in Wady Feiran. Anchorites lived at Paran, and at Sinai at least as early as 365 AD, and neighborhood of Jebel Masa would, I think, bear comparison with many mountain districts of the world in regard to its supply of water. There is also no other district in the Peninsula which affords such excellent fasturage.

This is important, as Israel encamped near Sinai from the end of May till April of the next year. There is also a well on the lower slope of Jebel Masa itself, where the ascent begins.

Another theory, put forward by Mr. Baker Greene (The Heb. Mountain from Egypt to Sinai, 1854, Dr. Sayce (Higher Criticism, 1894, 268).

7. Greene's Theory

Mr. Greene supposed Elana (Ex 15: 27) to be Elath (De 2: 8), now 'Atha at the head of the Gulf of Akaba, and the Gulf of Suez was the scene of many early events (Phil. 1: 7), "without corruption" (Eph 6: 24, AV "that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, ARV "with a love incorruptible," m "in incorruption.") See Rom 2:7, "un corruption," "sincerity," RV "uncorruptness," etc. (2 Cor 8: 8); elikrinias, lit., judged of in the sunlight, hence, "clear," "manifest" (Phil 1: 10); elikrinia, with same meaning, is tr "sincerity" (1 Cor 8: 6; 2 Cor 1.12; 2.17)

RV has "sincerity" for "pure" (2 Pet 3: 1), "sincerely" for "clearly" (Job 33: 3).

In Wind 7: 25 we have elikrinias in the description of Wisdom as a "pure influence," RV "clear influence."

SINWEN, sin'ən (שִׁיוֹנ, giō: Job 10: 11, etc). The tendons and sinews of the body are uniformly (7 t) thus called. "Therefore the children of Israel eat not the sinew of the hip which is upon the hollow of the thigh: unto this day: becoming the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew of the hip" (Gen 32: 32). In the poetical description of Behemoth (hippopotamus) it is said: "He moveth his tail like a cedar: the sinews of his thighs are knit together" (Job 40: 17). The prophet Ezekiel saw in his vision (37: 6) that the dry bones were gathered together, that they were covered with sinews, flesh and skin, and that they were revived by the spirit of the Lord. In figurative language the neck of the ox varies opposite to that of a "iron sinew" (Isa 48: 4). AV "my sinews take no rest" (w'ə'rər'kəy 1'əō gīshkābbān, Job 30: 17) has been corrected by RV into "the pains that gnaw me take no rest," but the earlier version has been retained in the margin.

SINGERS, sing'ərz, SINGING, singing: Singing seems to have become a regular profession at a quite early date among the Hebrews. David had his troupe of "singing men and singing women" at Jerusalem (2 S 19: 35), and no doubt Solomon trained to their numbers. Isa 25: 10 suggests that it was not uncommon for foreign female ministrs of questionable character to be heard making "sweet melody," singing songs along the streets and highways of Judaea. Nor was the worship of the temple left to the usually incompetent and insistent leadership of apostles. The elaborate regulations drawn up for the constitution of the temple orchestra and chorus are referred to under Musaeq (q.v.). It has been inferred from Ezr 2 65 that women were included among the temple singers, but this is erroneous, as the musicians there men tioned were of the class usually employed at banquets, festivals, etc. The temple choir consisted exclusively of Levites, one essential qualification of an active member of that order being a good voice.

Of the vocal method of the Hebrews we know nothing. Wellhausen imagines that he can detect one of the singers, in the portrayal of an Assyrian band, compressing his throat in order to produce a vibrato; and it is quite possible that in other respects as well as this, ancient and modern oriental vocalization resembled each other. But that is about all that can be said.

On the other hand, we cannot repeat too often that we are quite unable to identify any intervals, scales, or modes that have been used by ancient Israel.
Even those who hold that the early church took the Gregorian "tones" from the synagogue, confess that it was "certainly not without considerable modifications." And, of course, there was not the slightest affinity between the Hebrew and the Anglican chant. See Music; Praise; Song; Temple.

SINGLE, sin'g'l. EYE: Mt 6 22 f. |Lk 11 34:
"If therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness." "Single," and "evil" here represent παρθένος, haplous, and πονερός, poneros. Poneros elsewhere in the NT means "wicked"; haplous occurs only here in the NT, but is very common in ordinary Gr and always has the meaning "simple." But in view of the context, most commentators take haplous here as meaning "normal," "healthy," and poneros as "diseased," so rendering "Just as physical enlightenment depends on the condition of the eye, so divine understanding depends on the condition of the heart." This is natural enough, but it is not satisfactory, as it gives to haplous a unique sense and to poneros a sense unique in the 73 NT examples of the word. Moreover, the similar English word "evi-locard" is found in Mt 20 15; Mk 7 22, where it means "jealousy" or "covicateness." With poneros="covetous," haplous would = "generous;" and this rendition gives excellent sense in Mt, where the further context deals with love of money. Yet in Lk it is meaningless, where the context is of a different sort, a fact perhaps indicating that Lk has placed the saying in a bad context. Or the Gr ter of Christ's words used by Matthew and Luke may have taken the moral terms haplous and poneros to translate physical terms ('healthy' and "diseased") employed in the original Aramaic.
The Sinaic Syr version of Lk 11 36 may perhaps contain a trace of an older rendering. See Juthe

SINGULAR, sin'g-lar: "Pertaining to the single person," "individual," and so sometimes "unusual," "remarkable." So Wisd 14 18, AV "the singular diligence of the artificer" (ποιοτικός, philotimia, "love of honor," RV "ambition"). In Lev 27 2 by AV a man shall make a singular vow; RV seems to have understood a "personal" or "private" vow. RV has "accomplish a vow," with m "make a special vow." The same phrase (γεμάτα [γεμάτε] neither) used of the Nazirite vow in Nu 6 2.

SINIM, sin'im, sin'im, LAND OF (סִינִימ), 'ereq sinim; γῆ Πορέων, εἰς Πορέα: The name occurs in Isaiah's prophecy of the return of the people from distant lands: "Lo, these shall come from far; and, lo, these from the north and from the west; and these from the land of Sinim" (49 12, RV). The land is clearly far off, and it must be sought either in the S. or in the E. LXX points to an eastern country. Many scholars have favored identification with China, the classical Sinamese. It seems improbable that Jews had already found their own way to China; but from very early times trade relations were established with the Far East by the way of Arabia and the Pers Gulf; and the name may have been used by the prophet simply as suggesting extreme remoteness. Against this view are Dillmann (Comm. on Isa), Duhm, Cheyne and others. Some have suggested places in the S.: e.g. Sin (Pelusium, Ezk 30 15) and Syene (Cheyne, Intro to Isa, 275). But these seem to be too near.
In harmony with his reconstruction of Bib. history, Cheyne finally concludes that the reference here is to the return from a captivity in this part of Persia (A.D. s.v.). While no certain decision is possible, pro-ability points to the E., and China cannot be quite

SINITES, sin'itsu (סינִיטִים), A CANADIAN people mentioned in Gen 10 17; 1 Ch 1 13. The identification is uncertain. Jerome mentions a ruined city Sin, near Arka, at the foot of Lebanon.

SINLESSNESS, sin'les-nas: The 15th Anglian article ("Of Christ Alone without Sin") may be quoted as a true summary of Scripture teaching on sinlessness: "Christ in the truth of our nature was made like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, from which He was clearly (προσωπικός) void, both in His flesh and in His spirit. . . . Sin, as Saint John saith, was not in Him. But all we the rest, thought baptised, and born again in Christ, yet offend in many things; and, if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves."

Here the sinlessness of the Incarnate Son is affirmed. It is a true and not an elaborated truth.
To show that this is the affirmation of
1. Christ. Scripture. It is not only, as we are Sinless reminded above, definitely taught there. Yet more is it implied in the mysterious moral character, the perfect personal manifestation of the Lord's evidently total immunity from the sense of sin, His freedom from inward discord or imperfection, from the slightest discontent with self. It is not too much to say that this representation is self-evident of its truth. Had it been the invention of worshiping disciples, we may say with confidence that they (supposed thus capable of "free handling") would have been certain to betray some moral aberrations in their portraiture of their Master. They must have failed to put before us the profound ethical paradox of a person who, on the one hand, enjoys pene-tance and (with a tenderness infinitely deep) loves the penitent, and, on the other hand, is never for a moment penitent Himself, and who all the while has proved, from the first, a supreme moral and spiritual magnet, "drawing all men to him." Meanwhile the Scripture represents the sinlessness of the Innarnated Lord as no mere automatic or effortless condition. He is sensitive to temptation, to a degree which makes it "when a man shall make a singular vow, he seems to have understanding a "personal" or "private" vow. RV
has "accomplish a vow," with m "make a special vow." Of the same phrase (γεμάτα [γεμάτε] neither) used of the Nazirite vow in Nu 6 2.
2. SAINTE

Not Sinless

In John 3:9, 10 (which affirm of the regenerate man that he "sineth not.") But it seems obvious to remark that such words, taken without context and balance, would prove too much; they would make the smallest sense of sin a tremendous evidence against the person's regeneration at all. It would seem that such words practically mean that sin and the regenerate character are diametrical opposites, so that sinning is out of character, not in the man as such, but in the Christian as such. And the practical result is an unconquerable aversion and opposition in the regenerate will toward all known sin, and a readiness as sensitive as possible for confession of failure. Meanwhile such passages as 1 John are, to the unbiased reader, an urgent warning of the peril of affirming our perfect purity of will and character. But then, on the other hand, Scripture abounds in both precepts and promises bearing on the fact that in Christ and by the power of His Spirit, received by faith into a watchful soul, our weakness can be sanctified and transformed that a moral purification and emancipation is possible for the weakest Christian which, compared with the best efforts of unregenerate nature, is a "more than conqueror" over evil (see e.g. 2 Cor 12:9-16; Gal 2:20; Eph 6:16; Jude verse 24). See further Pusey, Stuart.

HANDLEY DUNELM SINNER, sin'ér (ἡ σινή, κοτία; ἀμαρτολός, λαμαρtόλας, "devoted to sin," "erring one"): In the NT, in addition to its ordinary significance of one that sins (Lk 5:8; 13:2; Rom 6:19, 13:1; Tim 1:15; He 7:20), the term is applied to those who lived in disregard of ceremonial provision (Mt 9:11-12; Mk 2:15ff; Lk 5:30; Gal 2:15); to those stained with certain definite vices or crimes, as the publicans (Lk 15:2; 18:13; 19:7); to the heathen (Mt 26:45; Gal 2:15; cf Tob 13:6; 1 Mac 1:34; 2 Mac 2:48, 62); to the preeminently sinful (Mk 8:38; Jn 9:24. 31; Gal 2:17; 1 Tim 1:9; Jude verse 15). It was the Jewish term for a woman of ill-name (Lk 7:37; cf Mt 21:32, where it is stated that such had come even to the temple and also). For the general Heb. conception of the term, see SIN.

SION, sión (יוֹסִיָּה, סִיů; סִיאַ, סִין. (1) A name given to Mt. Hermon in Dt 4:45. The name may mean 'protuberance' or 'peak,' and may have denoted the high, snow-covered horn of the mountain as seen from the S. It may, however, be a scirbal error for Sirion, the name by which the mountain was known to the Zidonians. Siry takes it in this sense, which, however, may be a correction of the Heb. It is possible that this name, like Senir, may have applied to some distinct part of the Hermon Range.

(2) Mt. Sion; see ZION.

SIPHMOTH, sip'moth, sip'moth (טִּפְפִּים, siph-môth) [Ginsburg]. הָעַפַּה, siphâphâh [Barz]; סַפְּת, Sip'th. One of the titles to which David presents from Zikklag (1 S 30:28). It occurs between Aroer and Eshtemoa, so it must have been somewhere in Southern Judah. The site has not been recovered. Zadbi the Shiphmite (1 Ch 27:27) may quite probably have been a native of this place.

SIPPAI, sip'î, sip'î. See SAPPH.

SIR, sir: In the OT this word in Gen 43:20 AV (אַבָּדוּ) is changed in RV into "my lord." In the NT the word sometimes represents ἄραγον, andρός, as in Acts 7:26; 14:15; 19:25, etc.; more frequently σέαρος, ἄριος, "lord," as in Mt 13:27; 21:30; 27:36; Jn 4 11.15.19.40 (RVm "lord"); 20:15. In Rev 7:14, RV renders "my lord."
attempt to represent in writing the natural sound of the final letter ʿaleph in the Heb name as in the Gr. Ακλαμανακλαμανακ, Ακλαμανακ, for the Aram. ḫēkāl demā (Acts 1:19). Da lkman, however (Aram. Gram., 161, n. 6), follows his source, and makes that the Aklam is simply a sign that the word is indecipherable; cf ḫêkāl, ḫō skeptical.

II. Canonlcy.—Though older than both Dal and Est, this book was never admitted into the Jewish Canon. There are numerous quotations from it, however, in Talmudic and Rabbinic literature, and the bulk of modern Protestant scholars set a much higher value upon it than they do upon many books in the Protestant Canon (Ch, Est, etc.). It was accepted as of canonical rank by Augustine and by the Councils of Hippo (419) and Carthage (397), yet it was omitted from the lists of accepted books given by Melito (c 150 AD), Origen, in the Apoll. Canon, and in the lists of the Councils of Laodicea (341 and 351). Jerome writes in Libri Sacri: "Let the Church read these two books [Wisdom and Sir] for the instruction of the people, not for establishing the authority of the dogmas of the Church." It suffered in the respect of many because it was not usually connected with a great name; cf the so-called "Berthold Homer," etc., that is prefixed frequently in the Ep. of Jas (Jas 1:4—cf Sir 2:1—5; Jas 1:5—cf Sir 1:26; 41:22; 51:13 f; Jas 1:8 ["double minded"]—cf Sir 1:28, etc.). The book is often cited in the works of the Fathers (Clem. Alex., Origen, Augustine, etc.) and in the Apos Const with the formula that introduces Scripture passages: "The Scripture says," etc. The Reformers valued Sir highly, and parts of it have been incorporated into the Anglican Prayer-book.

III. Contents.—It is quite impossible in the book as a whole to lay down any consistent scheme of thought, for the author's mind moves lightly from topic to topic, recurring frequently to the same theme and repeating not seldom the same idea. It is, however, too much to say with Sonntag (De Jesu Seriapode, etc.) that the book is a Farrago of sayings with no connection, or with Berthold that "the work is but a haphazard," for the whole is informed and controlled by one master thought, the supreme value to every one of Wisdom. By this last the writer means the Jewish religion as conceived by enlightened Jews toward the beginning of the 2nd cent. BC, and as reflected in the Law of Moses (see 24.23—31), and in a degree less in the books of the Prophets and in the other writings (see Prologue). The book follows the lines of the canonical Book of Prov, and is made up of short pithy sayings with very occasional digressions, largely confined but in part composed, and all informed and governed by the dominant note of the book: true Wisdom, the chief end of man. Most of the book is poetical in form, and even in the prose parts the parallelism of Heb poetry is found. Many unsuccessful attempts have been made to trace an adequate continuous line of reasoning in the book, but the vital differences in the schemes propounded suggest what an examination of the book itself confirms, that the compiler and author put his materials together with little or no regard to logical connection, though he never losses sight of his main theme—Wisdom the chief thing.

Kichthorn (Einleitung, 50 f.) divides the book into three parts (chs 1—23; 24—10; 11—50), and maintains that at first each of these was a separate work, united subsequently by the author. For the work into three, Scholz into twelve, Fritzsche (Einleit., xxvii), and Ryssel (op. cit., 240) into seven, Eberspielm (op. cit., 201, 304 and 305) and R. G. Moulton (Moo. Cosm. Bible: Eccles, xvi ff) into five portions, and many other arrangements have been proposed. The portionings of Ewald, Holzmann, Bissell, Zöckler, etc. That there are small independent sections, essays, etc., poems, etc., was seen by the early critics to whom the Law in its present form was largely due, for they have prefixed headings to the sections of various parts of the book: "The Son of Man" (Temperance of Soul); 20:27 (Proverbs); 23:7 (Discipline of the Mouth); 24:1 ("The Praise of Wisdom"); 29:18 ("Concerning Prayer"); 30:18 ("Concerning Foods"); this is also the view of many Mos, though retained by Swete, who however, omits the preceding headings. 30:24 (Ev 33:24; 1 Concerning Servants); 35:21 ("Concerning Rulers"); 34:17 ("The Praise of the Father"); 51:1 ("The Prayer of Jesus, Son of Sirach"). Probably this whole book possessed such headings at one time, and it is quite evident, that as guide readers after the book had become one of the chief church reading-books (so W. J. Deane in Fos., ii, vi, 327). These headings are given in Ev, in proper (i.e., the margin, though in modern reprints, as also in Ev, they are unfurled). The whole book has been arranged in headed sections by H. J. Holo (Bunsen's Berliner, 139 ff) and by R. G. Moulton (op. cit.).

IV. Teaching.—In general it may be said that the principles enunciated in this book agree with those of the Wisdom school of Palestinian Judaism about 200 BC, though there is not a word in the book about a Messianic hope or the setting up of a Messianic kingdom. None of the views characteristic of Alexandria Judaism are absent from the teaching of Palestinian Judaism are to be found in this book, though of some at least are represented in Wiel (Wisom of Solomon, vi, 36). The outstanding features of Alexandrianism are the allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, its conception of the Christian city of God, and its teaching of mediating powers between man and God and its adoption of purely Ger ideas. None of these can be traced in Sir. The Hebrews never developed a theoretical or speculative theology or philosophy; all their thinking was gathered in the practical duties that men owed to God and to one another; the hopes that they cherished and the fears by which they were animated. This is the only philosophy which the Bible and the so-called Apoc teach, and it is seen at its highest point in the so-called Wisdom Literature (q.v.). The main lines of the teaching of Sir may be set out as follows, under the three heads of religion, morals, and manners.

(i) God.—The view of God given in this book agrees generally with that put forth by the later of the Old Testament prophets, e.g., 1

1. Religion (Second Isa, Job, etc.) onward, though the God of this book lacks the love and tenderness of the Jeh of the OT prophets. God is present everywhere (16.17—23); He created the world which is founded on Gen 1, and it may fairly be inferred that creation out of nothing is meant. Wesl, on the other hand, teaches the Christian doctrine of half of the Creator's work consisted of fashioning, adapting and beautifying. The world is a creature of God, not (as in Philo, etc) an emanation from Him. Yet is He compassionate and forgiving (17 24 ff). His works are past finding out (18 2 f); but His compassion is upon all flesh (18 13), i.e. upon every soul that accepts His chastening and seek to do His will (18 14). In 43 27 God is said to be "the all" (כְּכֵל, כְּכַנ), which simply means that He pervades and is the ground of everything. It is not Alexanderian pantheism that is taught. Gfrörer and others take a contrary view.

(2) Revelation.—In harmony with other products of the "Weekly Men," Sir sets out upon natural lines the revelation in the instincts, reason and conscience of man as well as by the sun, moon, stars, etc. Yet Sir gives far more prominence than Prov to the idea that the Divine Will is specially made known in the Law of Moses (24 22; 45 1-4). We do not meet once with the word "law" in Ecc, nor law in the technical sense (Law of Moses) in either Job, Wis or Prov. In the last-named it is simply one of many synonyms denoting "Wisdom." In Sir the word occurs over 20 t. not, however, always, even with the sense of "the Law." 1 Esdo 17:3, where the usage is used, in the sense of the "five books" (Pent). It generally includes in its connotation also "the prophecies and the rest of the books" (Prologue; see 32 (LXX 35) 24; 33 (LXX 36) 1-3). This was to the wrong exercise of man's free will. Men can. if they like, keep the commandments, and when they break from them they are themselves alone to be blamed (15 14-17). Yet it was through a woman (Eve) that sin entered the world and by sin (25 24; cf 1 Tim 2 14). See Rom 5 12 where "one man," strictly "human being" (ver 14, "Adam"), is made the first cause of sin. But nowhere in Sir is the doctrine of original sin taught.

(4) Predestination.—Notwithstanding the prominence given to "free will" (see [3], above), Sir teaches the doctrine of predestination, for God has determined that some men should be high and some low, some blessed and others cursed (35 10 ff).

(5) Satan.—The word "Satan" (Sara, Sarode, Sotade), in 21 27 (it occurs nowhere else in the Apoc) denotes one's own wicked heart, as the parallelism shows.

(6) Salvation.—There is no salvation except by way of good works on man's part (14 16 f) and forgiveness on God's (17 24-32). The only atonement is through one's own good works (6 5 f), honoring parents (32 14 f), almsgiving, etc (3 30; 17 19 f). There is no objective atonement ("expiation," i.e., the removal of guilt) (cf the Gr. hagiasmos, exáslakómaí, the great LXX word for the Heb ἡσσή, kipper, "to atone").

(7) Sacrifice.—The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to God (34 18 f), though He Himself appointed sacrifices and first-fruits (45 20 f), and when the righteous offer sacrifices to God they are accepted and remembered in the time to come (35 1-12).

(8) Feasts.—Festivals as well as seasons are ordained by God to be observed by man (39 [LXX 36] 8 f; cf Gen 1 14).

(9) Prayer.—The duty of prayer is often pointed out (37 15, etc), the necessary preparation defined (17 25; 18 20-23), and its successful issue promised (35 17). There must be no vain repetitions (7 14; cf Mt 6 7), nor should they be accompanied by heartlessness in the matter (5 10; cf Jas 1 6). Men are to pray in sickness (38 9), but all the same the physician should be consulted and his advice followed (39 1 f). 12 ff.

Sirach nowhere clearly expresses his belief in angels or uses language which implies such a belief. For "an angel [טטם עטני, הוֹעַגְלֶה] destroyed them" the Heb of the original passage (2 K 19 35) has גַּלְפָּם, magpaphah, "plague," and so the Syr, though the LXX (followed by the Vulg) has "angel."

(11) Eschatology.—Nowhere in this book is the doctrine of a future life taught, and the whole teaching of the book leaves no place for such a doctrine. Men will be indeed rewarded according to their conduct, but in this world (see 2 10 f; 9 12; 11 26 f). The retribution is, however, not confined to the individuals in their lifetime; it extends to their children and involves their own glorious or inglorious name after death (see 11 15 ff; 18 1-10). The passage concerning Gehenna (7 17) is undoubtedly spurious and is lacking in the Syr, Ethiopic, etc. Since the book is silent as to a future life, it is of necessity silent on the question of a resurrection. Nothing is hinted as to a life beyond the grave, even in 41 1-4, where the author deprecates the fear of death. In these matters Sir agrees with the Pent and the prophetic and poetical books of the OT (Psa, Job, etc), none of which give any intimation of a life beyond the grave. For this reason is said of the Messianic hope which must have been entertained largely by Palestinian Jews living in the author's time, though in 36 (LXX 33) 1-17 the writer prays for the restoration of Israel and Jesus, i.e., R. H. Charles (Scheuchzer, Eschatology, pp. 61-65), for the bringing in of the Messianic kingdom.

(12) Sirach's doctrine of Wisdom.—For a general discussion of the rise and development of the conception of Wisdom in the OT and in the Apoc see Wisom Literature, 1. the development of what the word implies in Sir is all that can here be attempted. It is in chs 1 and 24 that Ben Sira's doctrine is chiefly contained.

Wisdom is from God: He created it and it must therefore have a separate existence. Yet it is dependent on Him. It is omnipresent, though it dwells in a peculiar sense with all flesh. The root and beginning of Wisdom, its fulness and crown, are the fear of God (1 14.16.18.21); so that only the obedient and pious possess it (1 10 26); indeed Wisdom is identified with the fear of the Lord and the observance of the Law (19 20); it is even made one with the Law of Moses (24 23, i.e. it consists of practical principles, of precepts regulating the life.

In this doctrine we have a blend of Alexandrian, Jewish, Platonic, Stoic, and Christian elements. It would be a mistake to suppose that Sirach finds the general idea of Wisdom in the OT; he is more concerned with the conception of Wisdom as given by Socrates, and in a less exclusive sense in that of Plato and Aristotle, the good man is the wise one. Cheyne (Job and Sol, 190) goes probably too far when he says, "By Gr philosophy Sirach, as far as we can see, was wholly uninfluenced."

The ethical principle of Sir is Hedonism or individual utilitarianism, as is that of Prov and the OT generally, though in the Ps and Moralists in the prophetic writings gratitude to God for the love He has shewn and the kind act He has performed has been an end in itself, appeals and vows. Moreover, the individual point of view is reached only in the late parts of the OT. In the older OT books, as in Plato, etc, it is the state that constitutes the unit, not the individual human being. The rewards and penalties of conduct, good or bad, belong to the state, and to no one else. See what is said in (11) "Ecclesiastical," above; see also 2 7 f.; 11 17; 16 6 f.; 40 13 f.

The hedonistic principle is carried far that we are urged to help the good because they are most likely to prove serviceable to us (22 2); to aid our fellow-man in distress, so that in his days of prosperity he may be our friend (22 23); contrast the teaching of Jesus Christ (Lk 6 30-36). Friends are to be bemoaned for appearance's sake (38 17). Yet many of the precepts are lofty. We are exhorted to show kindness and forbearance to the poor and to give help to our fellow-man (29 8-20); to give alms (12 3); speak kindly (18 15-18); masters should treat servants as brethren, nay as they would themselves be treated (7 20-22; 33 30 f.); parents should give heed to the proper training of their children (3 2; 7 23; 30 1-13); and children ought to respect and obey their parents (3 1-16). It is men's duty to defend the truth and to fight for it. So well do they for their faith (4 25-28). Pride is denounced (10 2 ft.); and humility (3 18), as well as forgiveness (28 2), commended.

Sir is as much a code of etiquette as one of ethics, the motive being almost invariably the individual's own good. Far more attention is given to "manners" in Sir than in Prov, owing to the fact that a more complex and artificial state of society had arisen in Pal. When one is invited to a banquet he is not to show good manners, or to be too sparing in helping himself to the good things provided. He is to be the first to leave and not to be insatiable (31 12-18). Moderation in eating is necessary for health as well as for appearance's sake (31 19-22). Mourning for the dead is a social propriety, and it should on that account be carefully carried out, since failure to do this brings bad repute (38 16 f.). It is quite wrong to stand in front of people's doors, peeping and listening; only fools do this (21 23 f.). Music and wine are praised: nay even a "concert of music" and a "banquet of wine" are good in their season and in moderation (32 [LXX 35] 5 f.). The author has not a high opinion of woman (25 13). A man is to be on his strict guard against singing and dancing girls and harlots, and adultery is an evil to be avoided (36 1-27). As.Prov. has it, the woman sin began, and it is through her that we all die (25 4). Yet no one has used more eulogistic terms in praising the good wife than Ben Sira (26 1 ff.), and in extolling the happiness of the home when the husband and wife "walk together in agreement" (25 1). Never lend money to a man more powerful than thyself or thou wilt probably lose it (8 12). It is unwise to become surety for another. 4. Counsels (29 15; 5 19), yet for a good man one of Prudence would become surety (29 14) and he would even lend to him (29 1 f.). It should be remembered that in those times lending and becoming financially liable were acts of kindness, pure and simple: the Jewish Law (Deut 23 19) forbade the taking of interest, even in any form (see Century Bible, "Eara," etc. 198). "A slip on a pavement is better than a slip with the tongue," so guard thy mouth (20 18); "He that is wise in words shall advance himself; and one that is prudent will please great men" (20 27). The writer has this in mind when he speaks in the proverbs of his time of the "heathen untrained mind, that of the ploughman, carpenter and the like, has little capacity for dealing with problems of the intellect (38 24-34).

V. Literary Form.—The bulk of the book is poetical in form, abounding in that parallelism which characterizes Heb poetry, though it is less antithetic and regular than in Prov. No definite metre has been assigned, though Bickell, Margoliouth and others maintain the contrary (see Poetry, Hebrew). Even in the prose parts parallelism is found. The only strophic arrangement is that suggested by similarity of subject-matter.

Bickell (Zeitschr. für katholische Theol., 1882) trsf 51 1-20 back into Hebraic, good proof that 51 is a诗etic acrostic ps. and Taylor supports this view by an examination of the lately discovered fragments of the Heb text (see The Book of Ben Sira). After Ps 15 1-93; 29 7 f. (Ps 15 1-3, 30 1-15 and C. Taylor, lxxix f). After 51 12 the Gr and other versions select the Heb text for 40 1-163; but the Heb V8 of 51 1-20 does not favor Bickell's view, nor does the ps, found only in the Heb, lend much support to what either Bickell or Taylor says. Space precludes detailed proofs.

VI. Author.—The proper name of the author was Jesus (Jeshua, Gr Ioseph!), the family name being Ben Sira.' The full name would be therefore "Jesus Ben Sira." In Son of the Talm and other Jewish writings Sirach he is known as "Ben Sira," lit. "son [or descendant?] of Sira." Who Sira was is unknown. No other book in the Apoc gives the name of the author as the title: "Ben Sira." In the best Gr MSS (BNA) of 50 27, the author's name appears as Ἰερώνυμος ὁ Σεραχίας Ἰεροσολύμων ἐξ οཏοιοῦτος ἐξελανεῖ ἡ ἱεροσολύμητις, "Jesus the son of Sirach [son of] Eleazar the Jew of Jerusalem." In the last two words Ἰερώνυμος has by a copyist's error, Ἰερώνυμος ὁ Ἱεροσολύμων, ho hiero-solymētis, "the Solomon-like priest." The Heb text of 50 27 and 51 30 gives the following genealogy: Simeon son of Jesus, son of Eleazar, son of Sira, making him the grand-son and not the son of Sira, and so he is called by Saadia; see HDB (Nestle) and EB, II, 1165 (Tov).

We know nothing of Ben Sira beyond what can be gathered from the book itself. He was a resident in Pal (34 10 f.), an orthodox Jew, well read in at least Jewish lit., a shrewd observer of life, with a philosophical bent, though true to the national faith. He had traveled far and seen much (34 11 f.).

His interests were too general and his outlook too wide to allow of his being either a priest or a scribe.

Many suppositions have been put forward as to the author's identity: (1) That the author was a priest: so in cod. N (50 27). In 7 29-31 he makes much of the priest's power and his divine mission. There are numerous references to sacrifices in the book. In 45 6-26 he has a long poem in praise of a certain high priest. Yet on the whole Ben Sira does not write like a priest.

(2) That he was a high priest: so Syncellus (Chron, ed Dindorf, I 525) through a misunderstanding of a passage in Eusebius. But the teaching and temper of the book make this supposition more improbable than the last.

(3) That he was a physician: an inference drawn from 38 11, 12 ff and other references to the professional skill of the body (10 10). But this is a very small foundation on which to build so great an edifice.

(4) That he was one of the 72 translators (LXX): so Lapide (Comm., Calmet, Goldschmied, a wholly unsupported hypothesis.

(5) No one of course believes that Solomon wrote the book, though many of the early Fathers held that he was the author of the five Wisdom Books, Prov, Ecc, Cant, Sir and Wisd.

VII. Unity and Integrity.—There is on the whole, such a uniformity in the style and teaching of the book that most scholars agree in ascribing the whole book (except the Prologue, which is the work of the translator) to Ben Sira. This does not mean that he composed every line; he must have adopted current sayings, written and oral, and this will account for the apparent contradictions, as about becoming surety (29 14), and refusing to be a surety with him (29 13; 29 18); and it is possible that in 28 1-5: 25 1 f. and 26 18-26; the varying estimates of life (36 16-35;
40 1–11), etc. But in these seeming opposites we have probably no more than complementary principles, the whole making up the complete truth. Nothing is more manifest in the book than the all-pervading thought of one dominant mind. Some have denied the genuineness of ch 51, but the evidence is at least indecisive. There is nothing in this chapter inconsistent with the rest of the book.

In the recently discovered fragments of Heb text there is a passage which is that of the round EV which seems to be a copy of Ps 136. It is absent from the VSS and its thought is lost. But in the Heb and Gr texts there are undoubted additions and omissions. There are, in the Gr, frequent glosses by Christian editors which were later changes (by the translators) in the direction of Alexandrian Judaism; see Speaker's Apoc and Tob.

VIII. Date.—In the book itself there is one mark of definite date (50 1), and in the Prologue there is another. Unfortunately both are ambiguous. In the Prologue the translator, whose grandfather or ancestor (Gr ἀνθέας ιδωνος) wrote the book (the younger Siracides, as he is called), says that he reached Egypt, where he found and transcribed this book in the reign of Euergetes, king of Egypt. But there were two Egyptian kings called Euergetes, viz. Ptolemy Euergetes, or Euergetes I (247–222 BC), and Ptolemy VII Physis, or Euergetes II (218–198 BC). Sirach mentions the greatest among whom he praises, Simon the high priest, son of Onias, who is named last in the list and lived probably near the time of the elder Siracides. But there were two high priests called Simon and each of them was a son of Onias, viz. Simon I, son of Onias I (c. 310–290 BC), and Simon II, son of Onias II (c. 218–198 BC). Scholars differ as to which Euergetes is meant in the Prologue and which Simon in 50 1.

The conclusions to which the evidence has brought the present writer are these: (1) that Simon I (d. 290 BC) is the high priest meant; (2) that Ptolemy VII Physis (218–198 BC) is the Euergetes meant.

1. Most Probable Views

(1) In favor of the first proposition are the following:

(a) The book must have been written some time after the death of Simon, for in the meantime an artificial fame had gathered around the name, and the very allusion to him as a hero of the past makes it clear that he had been long dead. Assuming that Simon I lived and died in the 2nd century BC, it is a reasonable conclusion that the original Heb work was composed somewhat later than 250 BC.

If Simon II is the man intended, the book could hardly have been composed before 150 BC, an impossible date; see below.

(b) In the list of great men in chs 44–50 the praises of Simon (50 1 ff.) are sung after those of Nehemiah (49 13), suggesting that the space of time between them was not very great.

(c) The "Simon the Just" of Jos was certainly Simon I, he being so called, this Jewish historian says (Ant., XII, ii, 5), on account of his piety and kindness.

(d) It is probable that the "Simon the Just" of the Mish. (Ab. i.2) is also Simon I, though this is not certain. It is said of him that he was one of the last members of the great synagogue and in the Talm he is the hero of many glorifying legends. The so-called great synagogue never really existed, but the data adduced to it in modern tradition shows that Simon I is that which is thought of.

(e) In the Syr. PS (Pesh.) 50 23 reads thus: "Let it peace be established with Simon the Just," etc. Some MSS have "Simon the Kind." This text may of course be wrong, but Graetz and Ederheim have in this case the parallel text given to Simon I by Jos (op. cit.), the Mish and by Jewish tradition generally.

(f) The only references to Simon II in Jewish history and tradition depict him in an unfavorable light. In 2 Macc. 3:8–10 he is called), a son of Tobias against Hyrcanus, son of Joseph, the wrong side from the orthodox Jewish point of view.

(g) The high priest Simon is said (50 13) to have repaired the temple and fortified the city. Edersheim says that the temple and city stood in need of what is here described in the time of Simon I, but not at the time of Simon II (247–222 BC) in his wars with Demetrius destroyed many fortifications in Pal to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, among which Acco, Joppa, Gaza are named, and it is natural to think that the capital and its sanctuary were included. This is, however, but a priori reasoning, and Dengerbourg argues that Simon II must be meant, since according to Jos (Ant., XII, iii, 3) Antiochus the Great (223–187 BC) wrote a letter in which he undertakes to show that the city and temple of Jerusalem will be fully restored. This is not, however, to say that Simon II or anyone else did, at that time, restore either.

(h) Of the numerous errors in the Gr text some at least seem due to the fact that the VS in that language was made so long after the composition of the original Heb that the sense of several Heb words had become lost among the Alexandrian Jews. If we assume that the Simon of ch 50 was Simon I (d. 290 BC) while the Heb text was composed about 250 BC; if we further assume that the Euergetes of the Prologue was Ptolemy VII (d. 198 BC), there is a reasonable space of time to allow the sense of the Heb to be lost in many instances (see HALÉVY, Rev. Sem., July, 1890). It must be admitted that there is no decisive evidence on one side or the other, but the balance weighs in favor of Simon I in the opinion of the present writer.

(2) That the Euergetes of the Prologue in whose reign the translation was made must have been Ptolemy VII Physis, or Euergetes II, seems proved by the translator’s statement that he came to Egypt in the 38th year, ετῶν τοῦ Εὐεργέτου δεκαπενήχυρον, i.e. almost certainly of the reign of Euergetes II. Euergetes I and Simon I are, relatively speaking, the most sure foundation for giving him his own age? Now Euergetes I reigned but 25 years, but Euergetes II (Physis) reigned in all 54 years, from 170 to 145 BC as regent with his father, and from 145 to 116 BC as sole monarch. If we accept this interpretation of the above words, the question is settled. Westcott, however (DB, 1863, I, 479, n. c), says "the words can only mean that the translator in his 38th year came to Egypt during the reign of Euergetes." The other rendering adopted by Eichhorn is, he adds, "absolutely set at variance with the grammatical structure of the sentence." In the second ed. of DB (1893) this note has become expunged, and the article as edited by D. S. Margoliouth (I, 841) teaches the contrary view, which is now accepted by nearly all scholars (Scherer, etc.). We may therefore assume that the original Heb book was composed about 240–200 BC, or some 50 or more years after the death of Simon I, and that the translation was made about the year 241 BC for the younger Siracides came to Egypt in 132 BC, and he gives us to understand in the Prologue that he transcribed the Heb work of his grandfather almost immediately after reaching that country. If Simon II (d. 198 BC) is meant in ch 50, we are compelled to assume that the date for the Heb work is given to Simon II in order to allow time for the growth of the halo of legend which had gathered about Simon. The translation must, in that case, have been completed some 20 years after the composition of the Heb, a conclusion which the evidence opposes. The teaching of the book belongs to 200 BC, or slightly earlier. The doctrine of the resurrection taught in Dn 165 BC is ignored in Sir, as it has not yet become a Jewish doctrine.

(1) That the Energetes of the Prologue and the Simon of ch 50 are in both cases the first so called. So Hug, Scholz, Weit, Kell, Edersheim, Lampard and many others. The book was accordingly written after 200 BC, perhaps some time after, and the translation was made some time after 220 BC, say 200 BC (2) That Energetes II (d. 116 BC) and the actual Energetes are the very persons referred to. So Elchhorn, De Wette, Ewald, Franz Delitzsch, Hitzig, Schürer.

IX. Original Languages.—Even before the discovery of the substantial fragments of what is probably the original Heb text of this book, nearly all had reached the conclusion that Sir was composed in Hebrew. (1) The fact of a Heb original is definitely stated in the Prologue. (2) Jerome (Proef. in vers. libri Sed.) says that he had seen the Heb original—the same text probably that underlies the fragments recently published, though we cannot be sure of this. (3) Citations apparently from the same Heb text are made not seldom in Talmudic and rabbinical literature. (4) There are some word-plays in the book which in the Gr are lost, but which reappear in the discovered Heb text, e.g. (43 8) δὲ ἡρῴν κατὰ τὸ βοῶν ἀνάιθεν κενν ἀναγεννηθεὶς (read ἀναγέννηθε, ho μην κατὰ τὸ βοῶν αλλὰ εστίν αὐξανόμενες (read αὐξανάμενες). (The month) is called after her name, [ἡ] βαρμᾶνια, [ἡ] ἤρῳνία ἤρῳνίαν ἄνω ἢν ἵθηκεν, [ἡ] βαρμᾶνια τὰ μιθηθόρα, “the moon, according to its name renews itself”; the Heb words for “moon” and “renews itself” come from one root, as if we said in English—what of course is not English—“the moon moons itself.” There are other cases where mistakes and omissions in the Gr are explained by a reference to the newly found Heb text.

The strongly supported conjecture of former years that the book was composed in Heb was turned into a practical certainty through the discovery of the Heb text in 1889 and after, of the fragments of a (probably the) Heb text called now A B C and D. These contain much over half the whole book, and that the text in them, nearly always identical when the same passages are given in more than one, is the original one, is exceedingly likely, to say the least.

D. S. Margoliouth (Origin of the Original Heb of Ecclesiastes, 1889) has tried to prove that the Heb text of the fragments is a tr of a Pers text, which is itself derived from Gr, the words he offers have not convinced scholars.

(1) He refers to words in Heb which in that language are senseless, and he endeavors to show that they are disguised Pers words. As a matter of fact, it underlines the copies which have wholly gone wrong or the word is indecipherable.
(2) There do appear to be Pers glosses, but they are not a part of the original text, and there can be no reasonable doubt that they are due to a Pers reader or copyist.
(3) There are many cases in which the Heb can be proved to be a better and older text than the Gr or Sir (see König, Expos T, XI, 170 ff).
(4) As regards the character of the language, it may be said that in syntax it agrees in the main with the classical Heb of the OT, but its vocabulary links it with the latest OT books. Thus we have the use of the “waw-consecutive” with the imperfect (43 23; 44 9.23; 45 2, f) and with the perfect (42 1.8.11), though the use of the simple waw with both tenses occurs also. This mixed usage is exactly what we find us in the latest part of the OT (Ecc, Est, etc). As regards vocabulary, the word לֵבֶת, ἰσχυρός, has the sense of “thing,” “matter,” in 20 9, as in Ecc 3 1; 5 7; 8 6. In general it may be said that the Heb is that of early post-Bib. times.

Margoliouth holds that the extant Heb VS is no older than the 11th cent., which is impsense. The mistake is due to confounding the age of the MSS with that of the VS they contain.

(5) It is nevertheless admitted that in some cases the Sir or the Gr both together preserve an older and correcter text than the Heb, but this because the latter has sometimes been miscopied and intentionally changed.

(6) The numerous Hebraisms in the Gr VS which in the Heb have their original expression point to the same conclusion—that this Heb text is the original form.

Margoliouth has been answered by Smend (TLZ, 1889, col. 506), König (Expos T, X, 1899-1900), Nöeldeke (ZATW, XX, 81-94), and by many others. Bickell (Zeitschrift für katholische Theol., III, 387 ff) holds also that the Heb Sir extant is a tr from the Gr or Siry or both.

X. Versions.—The LXX tr was made from the Heb direct; it is fairly correct, though in all the extant MSS the text is very corrupt in several places. (1) The text occurs in the uncials B S 1 248 and part of A fairly free from glosses, though abounding in obvious errors. (2) The text is found in a much purer form in cod. V and also in Ν α and part of A. All extant Gr MSS except the late cursive 248 seem to go back to one original Μ, since in all of them the two sections 30 25—33 15 and 33 16—36 11 have changed places, so that 33 16—36 11 follows 30 24 and 30 25—33 15 comes after 36 11. Most scholars accept the explanation of Fritzche (Exeg. Handbuch zu der Apokalypse, V, 21 f) of which these two parts (of similar size) were written got mixed, the wrong one being put first. On the other hand, the cursive 248 (14th cent.) has these sections in their proper order, and the same is true of the Sir (Pesh.), which seems to be the latest part of the Gr VS of the Compiutnens Polyglot (which follows throughout 248 and not the uncials) and EV which is made from this Polyglot. The superiority of 248 to the older MS (B S A C V) is seen in other parts of the Gr text. In the other Gr MSS, 3 25 is omitted, as it is by Edersheim and most commentators before the discovery of the Heb text. But this last supports 248 in retaining the verse, and it is now generally kept. In 43 23 “islands” is properly read “islands,” Vulg, Sir, 23 and the Heb, but older Gr MSS read “Jesus, whom he planted” (“Jesus planted there”) [σωρν, αὐτοῦ] for “he planted islands therein”). The other MSS have a text which yields no sense in 43 26: EV “By reason of him his end hath successes.” The Gr of 248 and the Heb give this sense: “The angel is equipped for his task,” etc. The Sir (Pesh) VS is now almost universally acknowledged to have been made from the Heb, of which, on the whole, it is a faithful rendering. In some places, however, it agrees with the LXX against the Heb, probably under the influence of the inaccurate idea that the Gr text is the original one. In the VS the two sections 30 25—33 5 and 33 16—36 11 are in proper order, as in the Heb, a fresh proof that the Syr is not tr² from the Gr.

The Vulg agrees with the Old Lat which follows the LXX closely. Lapide, Sabatier and Bengel tried to show that the lost original Heb, but the evidence they supply falls far short of proof, and recently discovered Heb fragments show that they were wrong. The two sections transposed in the LXX (except 248) are also transposed in the Lat, showing that the latter is based on the LXX. The Lat text of both Sir and Wis according to the cod. Amlant is given by Lagarde in his Mittheilungen, I, 248–54. This closely follows the Gr text.

AV follows the cursives and often repeats their errors. RV try to indicate the uncertainty, and thus often departs from the Heb.

4. English 3 19 is retained by AV but omitted by RV. For the latter clause of the verse ("mysteries are revealed unto the meek"), AV is supported by cod. 219, the Syr and the Heb. Both EV should be corrected by the Heb in 7 26 and 38 1.5.

For fuller details concerning VSS see Speaker's Apoc, II, 23–32 (Edersheim); Kautzsch, Die Apok. des AT, I, 242 ff (Rysseil), and the art. by Nestle in ZAW, vol. 50, p. 42 ff.

LITERATURE.—In addition to books mentioned under Apoc and in the course of the present art., note the following:

(1) The text of the Heb fragments: For accounts of the discovery and decipherments of these see HDB, IV, 540 f (Nestle); Bible Polyglotte (Vulgares), V, 44 f; Schürer, GJV, III, 221 f. The text of the Heb as yet remains to be printed. In the following: H. Strack, Die Sprache Jesus, etc. (with notes and glossary), Leipzig, 1903; Issac Levi, The Heb Text of Ecclesiastical (Heb), notes and index, Ledson, 1908; J. Rudolf Smend, Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach, Heb and Deutsch (with notes and index), Berlin, 1906. The Heb appears also in the Bible Polyglotte, ed. L. Vigouroux, with the LXX, Vulg and a French translation in columns. (No other Polyglot has appeared since the discovery of this Heb.) There are texts in Heb, Syr, Gr and Eng., and also useful notes and tables in The Original Heb of Sir 39 16–49 11, by Cowley and Neubauer, Oxford, 1897. Still later and fuller is The Wisdom of Ben Sira in Heb and Eng., with notes on the Heb by Schulten and Taylor, Cambridge, 1899.

(2) Commentaries: The works of Fritzsch (1858), which note the evidence of the Syr and ignore the Heb idiom in the book, and of Bissell (1880) and Edersheim (1880) were the first to give a critical account of these Heb fragments. The last-named shows both learning and ingenuity in tracking the Heb idiom and in explaining difficulties. The following comments take full note of the Heb text as far as discovered: Issac Levi, La langue en la sapiencer de Jesus Sire; traduit et comenté, Paris, 1898, 1901; Rysseil in Kautzsch's Apok. des AT, I, 290–475, exceedingly valuable, esp. for the text and Introduction, but he takes account of the Heb fragments published by Cowley and Neubauer only in this book. To complete his treatment of the Heb parts published after he wrote, see further articles by him in Stud. u. Krit., 1900, 2; Knabenhaur, Commentarii in Ecclesiasticum, Paris, 1902; Peters, Der jüngst wieder ausgesandte hebräische Text des Buches Ecclesiasticum, 1902; (cf the notice by Smend, TIZ, 1903, 72–77; Smend, Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach erneut, etc. of his second edition of the commentary); and also by Eisengrein, Die Prophetenbaum (1874), Tiberias, 1875. The Heb text is not published, and there is no complete critical edition of the Heb text, as far as we know. The limitation of the following treatment is that the Heb is not printed, but the principal authorities, MS and printed. SIRACH, THE ALPHABET OF: Usually called The Alphabet of Ben Sira. The compilation so designated consists of two lists of proverbs, 22 in Aram, and 21 in Heb, arranged in such a manner as to present them as alphabet acrostics. Each of these proverbs is followed by a homiletic comm., with legends and tales, many of them homiletic. Some of the proverbs in the Alphabet are probably genuine compositions by Ben Sira and are quoted as such in the Talmud, but in their present form the Alphabets are at least as late as 11th cent. AD.

LITERATURE.—The only complete copy of the text known is in the British Museum, the copy in the Bodleian being defective. S. Steinschneider (Jahresberichte, 1909) has published the last-named of this last with critical notes (Alphabetum Syntaxis, Berlin, 1864). Cowley and Neubauer (the Original Text of a Portion of Ecclus.), besides giving a general account of this work, add a tr into Eng. of the Aram. books, O.S.A., and show in this the Gr text.

Dr. Louis Ginzberg (New York) also gives a tr of the 22 Aram. proverbs with useful remarks after each. The words appear in Yiddish (often), Judaeo-Spanish, Fr. and Ger., but never so far, completely into English.

SIRAH, ʾṣr, WELL OF (יָּרֵד הַשַׁרְרָה, bêr ha־shârâh, "the pit," "well" or "citizen of Sarah"): The spot from which Abner was enticed back to Hebron to his death (2 S 3 26). Jos. (Ant., VII, 1, 5) calls it Be(b)pard, Be(b)cred, implying that it was a "well." It is possible that this spot is now 'Āin Sārah, a spring which flows into a little tank near the west side of the road about a mile out of ancient Hebron, on the way to Jerusalem. There is, however, a curious cistern with steps known as Hamam Sarah (Sarah's bath) near Barahim, which is also possibly the site (PEF, 314, Sh XXI).

SIRION, sīr-i-on (סִרְיֹון), sîr-yôn, Zānār, Sanār): The name of Mt. Hermon among the Phœnicians (Dt 3 9). It is given as "Shirion" in Ps 29 6 (Heb, "breastplate" or "body armor"). Here it is named with Lebanon. Sirion therefore probably did not denote a particular part of the Hermon Range, as did Senir, but may have been suggested by the construction of the range itself, as seen from the heights above the Phœn coast.

SISMAI, sîs-mî. See SISMAI.

SISERA, sīs-erā (スキル), sîs′erd, of doubtful meaning; סִירָא, Sîrā (םי). (1) Given in Jgs 4 as the captain of the army of Jabin, king of Hazor. The accounts given of the battle of Sisera with Barak, as found in Jgs 4 and 5, have important points of difference. The first is the presence of the second and important Barak in the first only. Napoleon and Zeno mention Jabin as being under the command of Barak; in the second 6 tribes are given as being under his command. In Jgs 4 Sisera is known as the captain of Jabin's forces, while in Jgs 5 he seems to have been an independent leader. There is also a difference as to the scene of the battle and as to the manner in which Sisera met his death at the hand of Jael. Because of these points of difference, added to the fact that this is the only account, in these early times, where a king did not lead his own forces, it is thought by many that there is here the combination of two traditions dealing with different and distinct events.

Sisera resided in Harosheth of the Gentiles, a place identified with el-Ḥafirīyeh, on the right bank of the Kishon and commanding the way from the Central Plain to the sea. Taking the versions in the two chapters of Jgs as being the account of a single campaign, we find Deborah urging Barak to combine the forces of Israel to wage war with Sisera as the representative of Jabin, the king of Hazor. The scene of the battle was on the plain at the foot of the slopes of Mt. Tabor (4 12–14), or at the foot of the Carmel heights (6 19). The attack of Barak and Deborah was so furious, animated as it was by the hatred of Sisera and the Canaanites, that the hosts of Sisera were put to rout, and Sisera, Sisimai, si-sim-'ai (Σίσιμαι, Sisimai); AV Sisaimai. A Judahite, of the descendants of the daughter of Sheshan and Jarha, his Egyop servant (1 Ch 2:40). Commentators have compared the name to סִיָּם (sīyam), a Phoen god (cf. Rudolph Kittel, Comm. ad loc.; DBB, s.v.).

Sister, sis-'ter (Σίστρο), 'áthóth): Used repeatedly in the OT of a female (1) having the same parents as another; or (2) having one parent in common, with another, half-sister (Gen 20:12; Lev 18:9), and also (3) of a female belonging to the same family or clan as another, so a kinswoman (Gen 24:60; Job 42:11); (4) also of a woman of the same country (Nu 25:18). (5) Figuratively, the two kingdoms, Israel and Judah, are sisters (Ezk 33:7 ff.). (6) Confederate cities are conceived of as sisters (Ezk 16:45 ff.). (7) 'áthóth is used of objects which go in pairs, as curtains, each 'coupled to its sister' (Ex 23:36), and of wings in pairs (Ex 1:9; 3:13); (8) of virtues or conditions, with which one is closely connected ("say unto wisdom, thou art my sister" (Prov 7:4; cf. Job 17:14); (9) of a lover concerning his wife, as a term of endearment (Cant 4:9 ff.; 5:11; 8:8).

In the NT, ádeλφη, adelphé, used (1) in sense of physical blood kinship (Mt 12:50; 13:56; 19:28; Lk 10:49; 14:26; Jn 11:1 ff.; 19:25; Acts 23:16); (2) of fellow-members in Christ: "Phoebe, our sister" (Rom 16:1); see also 1 Cor 7:15; 1 Tim 5:1; Jas 2:15); (3) possibly, of a church, "thy elect sister" (2 Jn ver 13). See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY.

Sister's Son: AV translates rightly (1) τιτριδήν, ben-'áthóth (Gen 29:13); and (2) κόσμησαν ἐν ἀδελφῆ, húdós its adelphês (Acts 23:16), and wrongly, (3) ἀνέφες, anepheis (Col 4:10), where, without doubt, the real meaning is "cousin," as in RV. See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY.

Sith, sith: An Anglo-Saxon word meaning "afterward," "since" (Ezk 35:6 AV and ERV, ARV "since").

Sithri, sith-'ri (σίθριον, sithri): A grandson of Kohath (Ex 6:22).

Sithnah, sith-'nah (σίθνα, sithnah); "hatred," "hostility"; ἔχονθρα, echhrión, the name of the second of the two wells dug by the herdsmen of Isaac, the cause of further "enmity" with the herdsmen of Gerer (Gen 26:21, m "That is, Enmity"). "In Paul people sit at all kinds of work: the carpenter saws, planes, and hews with his hand-axe, sitting upon the ground or upon the plank he is planing. Skill, skil, skilful, skil'ful (forms of סִיָּם, yāshāh' [2 Ch 2:14, etc.], סִיָּם, bīh [1 Ch 15:28], סִיָּם, sikkhal [Dan 1:4, etc.], סִיָּם, lāmāh [1 Ch 6:18], סִיָּם, lākham [1 Ch 28:21], סִיָּם, hārash [Ezk 21:31], סִיָּם, yāshāh [Ps 33:3], in Apoc דעומל, ὕπερκία [Wis 13:13], וְשִׁרֵת, epōstēmē [Sir 1:19; 38:36]); advb. ταῦτα, evamathōs [Wis 13:11]: As a vb. "to skill," meaning to have understanding or to be dexterous, common in Elizabethan Eng. and in AV and ERV (1 K 5:6; 2 Ch 2:7; 34:12), is obsolete. ARV substitutes such expressions as "manage well" (1 K 5:6) and "were skilful with" (2 Ch 34:12). As a noun the word is used in the sense of "knowledge" (Eccl 9:11), "insight" (Dan 1:17), and "wisdom" (1 Ch 28:21). The adj. skilful is used in corresponding senses, esp. in ARV, where it takes the form of "cunning" (Ex 26:31; 31:4; 35:33:35; 36:23; 2 Ch 2:7; 13:14; Cant 7:1; Isa 40:20; Jer 10:9) and of "curious" (Ex 36:32), where the Heb bāshāh suggests planning or devising, and thus what we should call "original" work. Both ERV and ARV use the word in place of "eloquent" (Isa 3:3), "right" (Eccl 4:4) and "cunning" (1 Ch 25:5).

In the first of these instances the Heb word means "understanding"; in the second, it refers to the manner of doing a thing, and in the third, to the training that makes one "skilled." RV uses the word "skilled" of those that "took the war upon them" (Nu 31:27 AV). Skillfulness (Ps 78:72) is used with reference to the hands, not only in their work, but also in guiding (as, e.g., a pilot). To play well (Heb kēdōnāb nāgās) is rendered "play skillfully" (Ps 33:3). "Unskilful" is used with reference to the initiates in the sense of "inexperienced" (He 6:13, ἀορίστος, ἀορίστος).

Skin (הָדָם, heled, "human skin") [Job 16:15], בָּדָא, bādāh, "flesh," in the sense of "nakedness" (Ps 102:5 AV); ἑπικον, dērma):
SKIRT, skâr't: (1) .Up, kâbdhâb, "wing," "extremity" (Ruth 3 9, etc), is the usual word. But in 1 S 24 4 if perhaps "corner" is the best tr. (2) .ápp, shâl, "loose hanging" (Ex 28 33, etc; in AV often rendered "hem"). (3) 7p, peh, "mouth," "opening" (Ps 133 2, "the precious oil . . . that came down upon the skirt"). But the word "opening" does not for the hand, that RVm "collar" is the correct tr. "Skirt" is frequently used in a euphemistic sense, for which the comm's must be consulted. See Dress; Train.

SKULL, skul (����, gulpdeth; kparav, kra'men): The Heb word, which is well known to Bible readers in its Aram.-Gr form "Golgotha," expresses the more or less globular shape of the human skull, being derived from a root meaning "to roll." It is often tr in EV by "head," "pulp," etc. In the meaning "skull" it is found twice (Jgs 9 53; 2 K 9 35). In the NT the word is found only in connection with Golgotha (q.v.), "the place of a skull" (Mt 27 33; Mk 15 22; Jn 19 17), or "the skull" (Lk 23 33).

SKY, ski (����, shabab, "fine dust" or "cloud," apparently from ����, shabok, "to rub," "to pulverize"; Sam m'skâh, sh'dbâdgh). 1. In the OT ����, shâmâgin; ����, sâk=k = "cloud"; "small dust"): RV has "skies" for AV "clouds" in Ps 36 5; 37 21; Ps 36 5; 57 10; 68 34; 75 23; 104 8; Prov 20 8; 25, in which passages BDB supports the rendering of AV. In Ps 89 6.37 RV has "sky" for AV "heaven." EV has "sky" in Dt 33 20; 2 S 29 12; Job 37 18; Ps 18 11; 77 17; Isa 45 5; Jer 51 9. The word occurs mainly in poetical passages.

In the OT sô'ânâth, ouandâs, is trd "heaven" (AV "sky") in connection with the weather in Mt 16 2; Lk 12 56. In He 11 12 2. In the NT ����, ouandâs, is trd "heaven" (the NT "sky") as a figure of multitude. The conception, however, that the visible "sky" is but the dome-like floor of a higher world often makes it hard to tell whether "heaven" in certain passages may or may not be identified with the sky. See Heaven; Cosmogony.

As a rule it is a false charge (Mt 5 11); but it may be a truth circulated insidiously and with a hostile purpose (e.g. Dn 3 8, "brought accusation against," and LXX has di'dalbôb, "slander"). Lk 16 1, the same Gr word. Warnings, condemnations and complaints in reference to this sin are very frequent, both in the OT and NT. Mischievous "tale-bearing" or "whispering" is condemned (Lev 19 16; Ezk 22 9). There are repeated warnings against evil-speaking (as in Ps 34 13; Prov 15 16; Eph 4 29; Col 3 8; Jas 4 11; 1 Pet 3 10), which is the cause of such strife between man and man (Prov 16 27-30), and which recoils on the speaker himself to his destruction (Ps 101 3; 140 11). 1. Acquiring of Slaves
2. Hebrews as War Captives
3. Freedom of Slaves
4. Rights of Slaves
5. Rights of Slave Masters
6. The NT Conception

Literature

The origin of the term "slave" is traced to the Ger. släve, meaning a captive of the Slavonic race who had been forced into servitude (cf. Slav); Fr. esclave; Dutch slaaf, Swedish slaf, Spanish esclavo. The word "slave" occurs only in Jer 2 14 and in Rev 18 13, where it is suggested by the context and not expressed in the original languages (Heb yôâdôh bârîth, "one born in the house"); Gr ephô, "body"). More often the Heb word בָּנַי (Barâhî), in the OT and the Gr word δουλος, doulos, in the NT more properly might have been used as "slave" instead of "servant" or "bondservant," understanding though that the slavery of Judaism was not the cruel system of Greece, Rome, and later nations. The principal term in the OT is servâh, and in the servant under the law render free service, the slave, obligatory, restricted service.

Scripture statement rather than philological study must form the basis of this article. We shall notice how slaves could be secured, sold and redeemed; also their rights and masters' rights; confining the study to OT Scripture, noting in conclusion the NT conception. The word "slave" in this art. refers to the Heb slave unless otherwise designated.

Slaves might be acquired in the following ways, viz.:

1. Bought.—There are many instances of buying slaves (Lev 25 39 f). Heb slavery broke into the ranks of every human relationship:
   a. a father could sell his daughter (Ex 21 7; Neh 5 5); b. a widow's children might be sold to pay their father's debt (2 K 4 1); c. a man could sell himself (Lev 25 39); d. a woman could sell herself (Dt 15 12.13.17), etc. Prices paid were somewhat indefinite. According to Ex 21 20 thirty shekels was a standard price, but Lev 27 3—7 gives a scale of 10 from 3 to 50 shekels according to age and sex, with a provision for an appeal to the priest in case of undue value (v 5). This scale is the price set for a young man (ver 5), and this corresponds with the sum paid for Joseph (Gen 27 28).

But in Ex 21 7 b 11 the price on the average is 90 for a talent, i.e. 40 shekels each. The ransom of an entire talent for a single man is (K 20 39) more than that of a slave was set on this particular captive.

There were certain limitations on the right of sale (Lev 25 1 f).

2. Exchange.—Slaves, i.e. non-Heb slaves, might be traded for food, beasts, or provisions.

3. Satisfaction of debt.—It is probable that a debtor, reduced to extremity, could offer himself in payment of his debt (Lev 25 39), though this was forbidden in the Torâh (cf. Oser Yîsrâ'el, vii 29). That a creditor could sell into slavery a debtor or any of his family, or make them his own slaves, has some foundation in the statement of the poor widow whose pathetic cry reached the ears of the prophet Elisha: "Thy servant my husband is dead; . . . . and the creditor is come to take unto him my two children to be bondmen" (K 4 1).

4. Gift.—The non-Heb slave, and possibly the Heb slave, could be acquired as a gift (Gen 29 24).

5. Inheritance.—Children could inherit non-Heb slaves as their own possessions.

6. Voluntary surrender.—In the case of a slave's release in the seventh year there was allowed a willing choice of indefinite slavery. The ceremony at such a time is interesting: "Then his master shall bring him unto the judges [m], and shall bring him to the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him for ever" (Ex 21 6).

A pierced ear probably meant obedience to the master's voice.

History, however, does not record a single instance in which such a case occurred.

7. Arrest.—"If the thief be found breaking in, . . . . he shall make restitution: if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft" (Ex 22 5).

8. Birth.—The children of slaves, born within the master's house of a wife given to the slave there, became slaves, and could be held, even if the father went free (Ex 21 4; cf Lev 25 51).

9. Capture in war.—Thousands of men, women and children were taken in war as captives and reduced, sometimes, to mere slavery. Such slavery, however, was more humane than wholesale butchery according to the customs of earlier times (Nu 31 7—35). Males were usually slain and females kept for slavery and concubination (Dt 21 10.11.14). Captive slaves and bought slaves, "from nations round about," forced moral ruin into Israel's early civilization. See Siege, 3.

The two principal sources of slave supply were poverty in peace and plunder in war.

The Hebrews themselves were held as captive slaves at various times by (1) Phenicians (the greatest slave traders of ancient times), (2) Phills, (3) Syrians (2 K as War 5 2 ff.), (4) Egyptians, and (5) Romans.

Captives There must have been thousands subjected to severest slavery. See also Egypt; Israel; Pharoah; Servant, etc.

The freedom of slaves was possible in the following ways:

1. By redemption.—Manumission by (a) the nearest to the seventh year or the Jubilee year, (b) the first purchase price, and (c) personal consideration, and the freedom of the one in bondage. A slave could be redeemed as follows:

(a) by himself, (b) by his uncle, (c) by his nephew or cousin, (d) or by any near relative (Lev 25 48–55). The price depended on certain conditions as indicated above.

4. Rights of Slaves

(a) Human cruelty. Certain rights were discretionary, it is true, but many Hebrew slaves enjoyed valuable individual and social privileges. As far as Scripture statements throw light on this subject, the slaves of OT times might claim the following rights, viz.: (1) Freedom. Freedom might be gained in any one of the above-mentioned ways or at the master’s will. The non-Hebrew could be held as a slave in perpetuity (Lev 25 44–46). (2) Good treatment. “You shall not rule over him [Heb slave] with rigor, but shall fear thy God . . . . Ye shall not rule, one over another, with rigor” (Lev 25 43–46). The non-Hebrew seemed to be left unprotected.

5. Voluntary slavery. Even when the seventh year came, the slave had a right to pledge himself, with awi-pierced ear, to perpetual service for his master (Ex 21 5; Dt 15 16). The traditional interpretation of “for ever” in these passages is “until the next Jubilee year” (cf Koldaasen 21).

6. Money or property. Some cases at least indicate that slaves could have money of their own. Thus, if a poor slave “waxed rich” he could redeem himself (Lev 25 49). Of 1 S 9 5–10, where, however, the Heb throughout calls the “servant” n’or, “a youth,” never ‘ebosh.

7. Children. If married free, the slave could take wife and children with him when freedom came, but if he was married after becoming a slave, his wife and children must remain in possession of his master. This law led him often into perpetual slavery (Ex 21 3 f).

8. Elevation. A chance to rise was allowable in some instances, e.g., Eliezer, a foreign slave in a Heb household, and Joseph, a Heb slave in a foreign household. Each rose to a place of honor and usefulness (Gen 15 2; 39 4).

9. Religious worship. After being circumcised, slaves were allowed to participate in the paschal sacrifice (Ex 12 44) and other religious occasions (Dt 12 12).

10. Gifts. Upon obtaining freedom, slaves, at the discretion of masters, were given supplies of cattle, grain and wine (Dt 15 13 f).

As noted in the beginning of this article, the Heb slaves fared far better than the Grecian, Rom and other slaves of later years. In general, the treatment they received and the rights they could claim made their lot reasonably good. Of course, a slave was a slave, and there were masters who disobeyed God and even abused their “brothers in bonds.” As usual the unfortunate female slave got the full measure of cruelty. Certain rights were discretionary, it is true, but many Hebrew slaves enjoyed valuable individual and social privileges. As far as Scripture statements throw light on this subject, the slaves of OT times might claim the following rights, viz.: (1) Freedom. Freedom might be gained in any one of the above-mentioned ways or at the master’s will. The non-Hebrew could be held as a slave in perpetuity (Lev 25 44–46). The non-Hebrew seemed to be left unprotected. (3) Justice. An ancient writer raises the query of fairness to slaves. “If I have despised the cause of my man-servant or of my maid-servant, when they contended with me; what then shall I do when God riseth up?” (Job 31 13 f). No doubt the true Heb master was considerate of the rights of his slaves. But on the contrary, Abram seems to contemplate with horror the possibility that Eliezer will take possession of his goods in the absence of an heir. In view of the fact that adoption, the adrogatio of the Rom law, was unknown both to Bib. and Talmudic law (see Jev Ene, e.v.), the statement in Gen 15 2 does not seem to indicate any such custom as the adoption of slaves. If any method of emancipation is here suggested, it is by the death of the master without heir, a method thoroughly discussed in the Talm (mibhah ha’atidah).

By direct command of Jeh.—“The word that came unto Jeremiah from Jeh, . . . . that every man by paying ransom shall purchase the slave and an heir to his possessions. But on the contrary, Abram seems to contemplate with horror the possibility that Eliezer will take possession of his goods in the absence of an heir. In view of the fact that adoption, the adrogatio of the Rom law, was unknown both to Bib. and Talmudic law (see Jev Ene, e.v.), the statement in Gen 15 2 does not seem to indicate any such custom as the adoption of slaves. If any method of emancipation is here suggested, it is by the death of the master without heir, a method thoroughly discussed in the Talm (mibhah ha’atidah).

pation other than at the Sabbatical and Jubilee years was evidently the right of masters; (6) to circumcise slaves, both Jew and Gentile, within his own household (Gen 17:12); (7) to sell, give away, or trade slaves (Gen 29:24). According to Tovrath Kôhântîm a Hebra servant could be sold only under certain restrictions (See 2, [1]), (8); to sell male and female slaves, though not unto death (Ex 21:20); (9) to marry a slave himself, or give his female slaves in marriage to others (1 Ch 2:35); (10) to marry a daughter to a slave (1 Ch 2:34 f.); (11) to purchase slaves in foreign markets (Lev 25:46); (12) to keep or hire out, the remainder way slave from a foreign master (Dt 23:15,16). See 3, [5]; (13) to enslave or sell a caught thief (Gen 44:8-33; Ex 22:3); (14) to hold, in perpetuity, non-Heb slaves (Lev 25:46); (15) to seek advice of slaves (1 S 16:14); (16) but the reference here is open to doubts. See 4, [6]; (16) to demand service (Gen 14:14; 24).

Throughout OT times the rights of both slaves and masters varied, and in general the above may be said to be the settled code. In later times Zedekiah, covenanted with the Hebrews never again to enslave their own brothers, but they broke the covenant (Jer 34:8).

There were slaves during NT times. The church issued no edict sweeping away this custom of the old Judaism, but the gospel of Christ with its warm, penetrating love.

Conception message mitigated the harshness of ancient times and melted cruelty into kindness. The equal dignity, justice and love of Christ's teachings changed the whole attitude of man to man and master to servant. This spirit of brotherhood quickened the conscience of the age, leaped the walls of Judaism, and penetrated the remoter regions. The great apostle proclaimed this truth: "There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, . . . ye all are one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28).

The Christian slaves and masters are both exhort to Paul's letters to live, go up, and make Christ-like relations on them to the other—obedience to masters and forbearance with slaves. "Bondervants [m.], be obedient unto . . . your masters, . . . as bondservants [m] of Christ. . . . And, ye masters, . . . forbear threatening: . . . their Master is in heaven, and there is no respect of persons with him" (Eph 6:5–9).

Christ was a reformer, but not an anarchist. His gospel was dynamic but not dynamitic. It was heaven, electric with power, but permeated with love. Christ's life and teachings were against Judaistic slavery, Rom slavery and any form of human slavery. The love of His gospel and the light of His life were destined, in time, to make human emancipation earth-wide and human brotherhood as universal as His own benign presence.

SLAYING, slâying (by spear, dart, or sword). See Punishments.

SLEEP, slâp: Represents many words in Heb and Gr. For the noun the most common are ύπνος, shênâh, and ζώος, hîpons; for the vb., τεθύνειν, yâkhên, ùphnôs, shâkhâbîn, and καθάειν, kateâdôs. The figurative uses for death (Dt 31:16, etc.) and sluggishness (Eph 5:14, etc.) are very obvious. See Dreams.

SLEEP, DEEP (",.,, ταρδῆμα, tardêmâh, vb., ταρδημά), râdham, from a root meaning "to be deaf"!). The vb. râdham has no further meaning than "to be fast asleep" (Jgs 4:21; Jon 1:5), but AV used "deep sleep" as a tr only in Dn 8:15; 10:9, where a sleep supernaturally caused (a "trance") is meant (cf. "dead sleep" in Ps 76:6). RV's insertion of "deep sleep" in place of AV's "fast asleep" in Jgs 4:21 is consequently unfortunate. The noun tardêmâm has the same meaning of "tranced" in Gen 21:16; 15:12; 1 S 2:4; Job 4:14. In Prov. 19:15; Isa. 29:10, it is used figuratively of torpor.

In Acts 20:9 (hîpôs bathûs), heavy natural sleep is meant.

SLAVE, slaves (Gen 37:3 m.). See Dress.

SLEIGHT, slît: No connection with 'slight,' but from the same root as "sly" and so-called. So in Eph 4:14, "slight of men," for κυβέλα, κυβέλα, "dice-playing" (cf. "cubicle," "gamblers' trickery.

SLIME, slim, SLIME PITS, slim'pits (םו, bêtôm, LXX δαφαλός, asbestos; Vulg bitumen; RVv 'bitumen'; cf. Arab. ج," hammār, "bitumen;" and מז"ה, hōmer, "clay," "mortar"): In the account of the ark in Gen 6:14, "םס, kopher (LXX δαφαλός, asbestos; Vulg bitumen; c fr. Ar. حفر, "kuff, "pitch") does not necessarily denote vegetable pitch, but may well mean bitumen. The same may be said of פס, ze'pheth, "pitch" (cf. Arab. حفر, zīf, "pitch"), in Ex 2:3 and Isa 34:9. The word "slime" occurs in the following passages: "And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar" (Gen 11:3); "Now the vale of Siddim was full of slime pits" (Gen 14:10, m "bitumen pits"); "She took for him an ark of dry bricks, and daubed it with slime and with pitch" (Ex 2:3).

Bitumen is a hydrocarbon alloyed to petroleum and natural gas. It is a lustrous black solid, breaking with a conchoidal fracture, burning with a yellow flame, and melting when ignited. It is probably derived from natural gas and petroleum by processes of oxidation and evaporation, and its occurrence may be taken as a sign that other hydrocarbons are or have been present in the strata. It is found in small lumps and larger masses in the cretaceous limestone on the west side of the Dead Sea, and there is reason to believe that considerable quantities of it rise to the surface of the Dead Sea during earthquakes. In ancient times it was exported to Egypt to be used in embalming mummies. Important mines of it exist at Hûdâyra near Mt. Hermon and in North Syria. Springs of liquid bituminous matter exist in Mesopotamia, where according to Herodotus and other classical writers it was used as mortar with sun-dried bricks. Various conjectures have been made as to the part played by bitumen in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrahs. Diodorus Siculus calls the Dead Sea "lake asbestos," an "lake of asphalt." SLOPES, slôps. See AEIDOTHE-PISGAI.

SLOW, slô: Chiefly for סָלֹו, 'erekh, lit. "long," in the phrase "slow to anger" (Neh 9 17, etc.). In Ex 4 10; Lk 24 25; Jas 1 19, for זָלֵו, kâbdhêth; בָּזָלָו, brudais, both meaning "heavy," "sluggish," while Sir 35 uses "be slow" for ובוים, okômê; "hesitate." In addition, AV uses "slow" for אָדוּס, "inactive," in Wisd 15 15, "slow to go" (RV "helpless for walking"), and in Tit 1 12, "slow belies" (RV "idle gluttons"). In Sir 61 24, AV has "be slow" for בָּזָוֶע, kusterêth, "be lacking" (so RV).

SLUGGARD, slug'ard: Found only in the OT, and there only in Prov. It is the rendering given the word 'גֶּל everywhere in RV, but in AV only in Prov 6 9; 10 28; 13 4; 20 4; 26 16 (elsewhere AV translates by "idolatrous" or "disorderly"). The literal meaning of גֶּל is "to be sluggis;" "stupid." The Eng. word "slug" is said to be "allied to slack" (Webster).

SLUICE, slûs (םֵּלח, sekker, lit. "hire"): In Isa 19 10, AV reads, "all that make sluices and ponds for fish." RV entirely alters the tr of the whole verse. It reads, "And the pillars of Egypt shall be broken in pieces; all they that work for hire [m "that make dams"] shall be grieved in soul.

SMELL, smell (Heb and Aram. סִּימָל, râ'h, as noun, "savor," "scent"); סִלֶּמ, râ'h, as vb., lit. "to breathe," "to inhale," thence "to smell;" בָּרָה, osmê, the smell, "savor," "savor," εὐώδια, εὐώδια, "sweet smell," "fragrance," ἐνόφριον, ἐνόφριον, "the sense of smell;" vb. ἐνόφριον, ἐνόφριον, ἐνόφριον, ἐνόφριον). And he came near, and kissed him: and he smelled [nose- yârâh] the smell [râ'h] of his raiment, and blessed him, and said, See, the smell [râ'h] of my son is as the smell [râ'h] of a field which Jeh hath blessed" (Gen 27 27). Idols are described as "gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell" (Dt 4 28). Acceptable sacrifices and pious conduct are called a "sweet smell" or "savor" (Ex 29 18; Eph 5 2; Phil 4 18), well-pleasing to God. The godless life, which dishonors God, is hateful to Him: "I will not smell the savor of your sweet odors" (Lев 26 31). The phrase, "being in bad odor with a person," can be traced to Bib. language: "Ye have made our savor to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants" (Ex 5 21). Thus "smell" is occasionally equivalent with "quality," "character." His [Moab's] taste remaineth in him, and his scent is not changed" (Jer 48 11). Character or quality is the most infaillible test, the most manifest advertisement of a thing or a person; thus we find the following very instructive passage: "[God] maketh manifest through us the savor [osmê] of his knowledge in every place. For we are a sweet savor [εὐώδια] of Christ unto God, in better: "among" them that are saved, and in better: "among" them that perish; to the one a savor [osmê] from death unto death; to the other a savor [osmê] from life unto life" (2 Cor 2 14–16). See TITHING. In the passage Isa 3 24; AV "sweet smell" (םֵּלח, bâemân, "balsam plant") has been changed to "sweet spices" in RV.

SMOKE, smôk: tesp figuratively of the Divine jealousy (Dt 29 20) and anger (Ps 74 1); symbolic of the glory of the Divine holiness (Isa 4 5; 6 4; Rev 15 8)

SMYRNA, smôr'na (Σμύρνα, Smyrna), a large ancient city on the western coast of Asia Minor, at the head of a gulf which reaches 30 miles inland, was originally peopled by the Asiaties known as the Lelages. The city seems to have been taken from the Lelages by the Aeolian Greeks about 1100 BC; there still remain traces of the cyclopean masonry of that early time. In 688 BC it passed into the possession of the Ionian Greeks and was made one of the cities of the Ionian confederacy, but in 627 BC it was taken by the Lydians. During the years 301 to 281 BC, Lysimachus entirely rebuilt it on a new site to the S.W. of the earlier cities, and surrounded it by a wall. Standing, as it did, upon a good harbor, at the head of one of the chief highways to the interior, it early became a great trading-center and the chief port for the export trade. In Rom times, Smyrna was considered the most brilliant city of Asia Minor, successfully rivaling Pergamos and Ephesus. Its streets were wide and paved. Its system of coinage was old, and now about the city coins of every period are found. It was celebrated for its schools of science and medicine, and for its handsome buildings. Among them was the Homatrum, for Smyrna was one of several places which claimed to be the birthplace of the poet. On the slope of Mt. Pagus was a theatre which seated 20,000 spectators. In the year 23 AD a temple was built in honor of Tiberius and his mother Julia, and the Golden Street, connecting the temples of Zeus and Cybele, is said to have been the best in any ancient city. Smyrna early became a Christian city, for there was one of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev (2 8–11). There Polycarp, the bishop of Smyrna, was martyred, though without the sanction of the Rom government. It seems that the Jews of Smyrna were more antagonistic than were the Romans to the spread of Christianity, for it is said that even on Saturday, their sacred day, they brought wood for the fire in which Polycarp was burned. His grave is still shown in a cemetery there. Like many other cities of Asia Minor, Smyrna suffered frequently, esp. during the years 178–80 AD, from earthquakes, but it always escaped entire destruction. During the Middle Ages the city was the scene of many struggles, the most fierce of which was directed by Tunar against the Christians. Tradition relates that there he built a tower, using as stones the heads of a thousand captives which he put to death, yet Smyrna was the last of the Christian cities to hold out against the Mohammedans; in 1424 it fell into ancient Aqueduct at Smyrna.
the hands of the Turks. It was the discovery of America and the resulting discovery of a sea route to India which ruined the Smyrna trade.

Modern Smyrna is still the largest city in Asia Minor, with a population of about 250,000, of whom half are Greek and less than one-fourth are Mohammedans. Its modern name, Izmir, is but a Turkish corruption of the ancient name. Even under the Turkish government the city is progressive, and is the capital of the Aidin vilayet, and therefore the home of a governor. Several railroads follow the courses of the ancient routes into the distant interior. In its harbor ships from all parts of the world may be seen. The ancient harbor of Paul's time has been filled in, and there the modern bazaars stand.

The old stadium has been destroyed to make room for modern buildings, and a large part of the ancient city, as far as theies, is not near 13 Mace (18 ft.), and is covered symbolically of anything that may kill: 91 3; 124 7; 140 5; 141 9; Prov 7 23; 13 14; 18 7; 20 23; 22 25; 29 25; Eccl 9 12. "But this is a people robbed and plundered; they are all of them ensnared in holes, and they are hid in prisons; when they are for a prey, and none delivereth; for a spoil, and none saith, Restore" (Isa 42 22). Here it is specified that the snare was in a hole so covered as to conceal it. Jer 18 22 clearly indicates that the digging of the pit was customary, and also the hiding of the snare for the feet. North American Indians in setting a snare usually figure on catching the bird around the neck. Jer 50 24, "I have laid a snare for thee"; Hos 9 3, "A fowler's snare is in all his ways"; Am 5 5 seems to indicate that the snare was set for the feet; Lk 21 34, "But take heed to yourselves, lest haply . . . that day come on you suddenly as a snare"; Rom 11 9, "Let their table be made a snare, and a trap"; 1 Cor 7 35, "not that I may cast a snare upon you"; 1 Tim 3 7, "the snare of the devil"; also 6 9, "but that they that are minded to be rich fall into a temptation and a snare and many foolish and hurtful lusts, such as drown men in destruction and perdition." See GIN; NET; TRAP.

SNAEEZE, snæz (םְגָע, zörér, Pā'el-form טְג, zörar): "The child sneezed seven times, and the child opened his eyes" (2 K 4 35). "Sneezing," better "snorting," is found in the description of Leviathan (the crocodile): "His sneezings are as the horn of a great herd, and are like the eyes of the morning." (Job 41 18 (Heb 10)). See NEEZING.

SNOW, snaw (םָג, shlekh, GO, επικ, Dnl 7 9): (1) Snow is not uncommon in the winter in Jerusalem, but it never reaches any depth and in many wares it is not secret at all. It usually disappears, for the most part, as soon as the sun appears, though it may "hide itself" for a time in the gorge cut by a stream (Job 6 16). On lower levels than Jerusalem there is never sufficient to cover the ground, though it is often seen in the air. Even at sea-level there is occasionally a sufficient fall of hail to cover the ground. A very exceptional snowfall is related in 1 Macc 13 22 at Adora (near Hebron). It was heavy enough to prevent the movement of troops. (2) The tops of the mountains of Lebanon are white with snow for most of the year, and snow may be found in large banks in the valleys and the northern slopes at any time in the summer. Mt. Hermon, 9,200 ft. high, has long streaks of snow in the valleys all the summer. (3) The snow of the mountains is the source of the water of the springs which last throughout the drought of summer. In case the snow falls there is sure to be a lack of water in the fountains: "Shall the snow of Lebanon fall . . . or shall the cold waters that flow down from afar be dried up?" (Jer 18 14). (4) Large quantities of snow are stored in caves in the mountains in winter and are brought down to the cities in summer to be used in place of ice for cooling drinks and refrigerating purposes.

(5) God's power over the elements of Nature is often brought out in the OT: "For he saith to the snow, Fall thou on the earth!" (Job 37 6); but man cannot fathom the works of God: "Hast thou entered into the treasures of snow?" (Job 38 18). The snows of the mountains were customary and the "fear of snow" (Prov 31 21) are figurative uses describing winter and cold. "Snow in summer” (Prov 26:1) would be most out of place, yet it might be most refreshing to the tired workmen in the time of harvest.

(6) Snow is the symbol of purity and cleanliness, giving us some of our most beautiful passages of Scripture: “Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow” (Ps 51:7); “Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow” (Isa 1:18). Carrying the figure further, snow-water might be expected to have a special value for cleansing: “If I wash myself with snow-water” (Job 9:30). The most common use in Scripture is to denote whiteness in color and implying purity as well: “His rainment was white as snow” (Dn 7:9; Mt 28:3; Mk 9:5; Rev 1:14).

(7) The whiteness of leprosy is compared to snow (Ex 4:6; Nu 12:10; 2 K 5:27).

SNUFFERS, snuf'ters. SNUFFDISHES, snuf'dish-es (םוֹרֶפֶן, melkahayim, פֹּּרֶפֶן, mahôth): These two utensils are three mentioned in connection with the wilderness tabernacle (Ex 30:26; 37:23; Nu 4:9). ARV prefers to read “snuffers and snuffdishes” in place of “tongs and snuffdishes” (cf 2 Ch 4:22), the connection between the two utensils is indicated by the fact that both are said to belong to the seven lamps, and were to be made out of the talent of gold which was specified as the weight of the whole (Ex 25:37-39).

The seven-branched candlestick which stood in the holy place of both tabernacle and temple was surmounted, in each of its arms, by a removable lamp in which olive oil was burnt. From the requirement of keeping these lights brilliantly burning throughout each night of the year, arose the need for snuffers and snuffdishes. By the former, and the burnt portions of the wick were removed; in the latter they were deposited previous to removal. The lamps may have required to be trimmed as often as every half-hour. For this purpose a priest would enter the outer chamber “accomplishing the services” (He 9:6).

In the time of Solomon’s Temple another word than melkahayim was used to describe this utensil. It is שִׁפְרֶפֶן, me'ammaroth, from a vb. meaning “to prune” or “trim,” and is found in 1 K 7:50; 2 K 12:13; 26:14; 2 Ch 4:22; Jer 52:18. In 4 Q573, a talmudic MS, the Eng. text reads, “the snuffers and the bases’; the 5th is merely a summary of things taken to Babylon (2 K 25:14). In this constant later association of “bases” and “snuffers” it is seen that the bases referred to were used for the reception of the cast-off portions of the wicks of the seven lamps, and took the place of the snuffdishes of an earlier age. SO, sô (סֹו, ָּּ), although the Heb might be pointed סֹּו, شו: Assyr Sôw; LXX Σπαρ, Σαγηρ, סַּּד; Σεναχος, Σειιαλος, Σειεκοθος, Σειεκοτος; Lat Senechus; Herod. [ii. 137ff], Σαβακιν, Sababkôn: In all probability the “Subaen” of Herodotus, the Shabaka, who founded the Ethiopian dynasty, the XXVth of Egypt kings. Its date is given as 715-707 BC (Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt, III, 281 ff), but we may suppose that before his accession to the throne he was entitled to be designated king, as being actually regent. To this So, Hoshea, king of Israel, made an appeal for assistance to enable him to throw off the yoke of the Assyry Shalmaneser IV (2 K 17:3ff). But Hoshea’s submission to So brought him no advantage, for Shalmaneser came up throughout all the land and laid siege to Samaria. Not long after the fall of Samaria, So ventured upon an eastern campaign, and was defeated by Sargon, the successor of Shalmaneser, in the battle of Raphia in 720 BC.

SOAP, sôp (םוֹרֶפֶן, bornîth; AV sope): Bôrîth is a derivative of כֹּר, bôr, “purify,” hence something which cleanses or makes pure. Soap in the modern sense, as referring to a salt of a fatty acid, for example, that produced by treating olive oil with caustic soda, was probably unknown in OT times. Even today there are districts in the interior of Syria where soap is never used. Cooking utensils, clothes, even the body are cleansed with ashes. The ashes of the household fires are carefully saved for this purpose. The cleansing material referred to in Jer 2:22 (cf LXX ad loc., where bôrîth is rendered by σάλα, pòla = “gruss”) and Mal 3:2 was probably the vegetable lye called in Arab. el kali (the origin of Eng. alkali). This material, which is a mixture of crude sodium and potassium carbonates, is sold in the market in the form of greyish lumps. It is produced by burning the desert plants and adding enough water to the ashes to agglomerate them. Before the discovery of Leblanc’s process large quantities of kali were exported from Syria to Europe.

For washing the women sprinkle the powdered kali over the wet garments and then place them on a flat stone and pound them with a wooden paddle. For washing the body, oil is first smeared over the skin and then kali rubbed on and the whole slimy mixture rinsed off with water. Kali was also used anciently as a flux in refining precious metals (cf Mal 3:2). At the present time many Syrian soap-makers prefer the kali to the imported caustic soda for soap-making.

In Sus (ver 17) is a curious reference to “washing balls” (emégmate). JAMES A. PATCH

SOBER, sôbër, SOBERIETY, sôb'ri-e'ty, SOBERNESS, sôb'ër-ness (Gr adj. sôphron, and its related nouns, sôphroíne, sôphronímos; vbs. sôphronoî, and sôphronizô; adv. sôphronós, “of sound mind,” “self-possessed,” “without excesses of any kind,” “moderate and discreet”): In Mk 8:5; Lk 8:35, “sane,” said of one out of whom demons had just been cast. In the Pastoral Epp., this virtue is esp. commended to certain classes, because of extravagances characterizing particular periods of life, that had to be guarded against, viz. to aged men, with reference to the querulousness of old age (Tit 2:2); to young men, with reference to their wanton views of life, and their tendency to disregard consequences (Tit 2:6); enjoined upon young women, with reference to extravagance in dress and speech (Tit 2:5; 1 Tim 2:9); and, in a similar manner, commended to ministers, because of the importance of their judgment and conduct, as teachers and exemplars (1 Tim 3:2). “Words of sobriety” (Acts 26:25) are contrasted with the “mania,” “madness,” that Festus had just declared to be the explanation of Paul’s eloquence (ver 24).

In a few passages, the Gr vb. nêpháio and its derivative adj. nêphálos are used in the same sense. The word originally had a physical meaning, as opposed to drunkenness, and is thus used in 1 Thess 5:6, 8, as the foundation of the deeper meaning. Used metaphorically also in the Pastoral Epp. and 1 Pet, as sometimes in the classics, for “cool,” “unimpassioned.” Eliocott, on 1 Tim 3:211, distinguishes between the two words by regarding sôphrôn “as pointing to the outward exhibition of the inward virtue” implied in nêphálos.
