ing President Johnson's "last appeal to the people" as in its theory of Presidential responsibility and compulsion. Remarking on this "last appeal," it says:

He has labored with Congress, and has taken his last appeal—the last appeal he can take—to the people. The decision has upon all hand-been adverse to him. The people have given their support to Congress and its policy as against the President and his policy. President Johnson has a thousand times appressed his confidence in the people, his faith in their judgment, and his willinguess to abide by their decision. On a hundred occasions he has mid. "The people are always right." It can, therefore, be no violence to his principles or his charaster, to listen te their voice and obey it. He held out sugnited Congress last mession, became
